PIONEERS UNDER THE SEA

CAN you imagine a mountain range that stretches clear around the globe? Or a chasm so large that at least six Grand Canyons could disappear inside it?

These are only two of the mighty wonders that are being explored by hardy and persistent oceanographers, as part of a world-wide project to map the vast area under the sea.

Sixty-six nations from both East and West joined forces in 1957, the International Geophysical Year, to get under way the most ambitious global exploration in world history, and the work is still going on.

And since, for many years, scientists have actually known more about the surface of the moon than they did about the vast underwater worlds, attention is naturally centering on the undersea explorations. Already, fantastic discoveries have been made.

One of the first explorations in the Atlantic Ocean, was of the tremendous welt, called the Mid-Atlantic Ridge. Occupying a third of the Atlantic, oceanographers now began to map its vast extent. To their own amazement, they learned that it measured, in some places, as wide as 1,200 miles. At the base of the ridge, in the Atlantic's abyss, are bumpy stretches called abyssal hills. These lie about three miles below sea level, and are the deepest part of the North Atlantic, with the exception of the 27,510-foot-deep Puerto Rico Trench.

While the Atlantic floor has many plains, scientists learned that the floor of the Pacific on the other hand is possibly the largest and roughest feature on earth's surface. In the Pacific are the most breathtaking heights and depths on the globe. Hawaii itself is the peak of a 32,024-foot-high underwater mountain; and most recent measurements list the Mariana Trench as 32,024 feet deep.

Awesome are the gigantic east-west cracks that split the Pacific floor—the Mendocino, Murray, Clarion and Clipperton. These fractures stretch across five percent of the earth, and are up to 30 miles wide, 3,300 miles long, and 10,500 feet deep!

But the IGY scientists have not confined themselves simply to taking measurements. A large part of their time and effort were expended on the task of solving some of the mysteries that have long puzzled oceanographers.

For instance, for years scientists have been aware of an unaccountable rocking motion of the Hawaiian Islands.

Long study led to the discovery of a vast shifting process of the Pacific floor. And the scientists actually observed Hawaii in the throes of massive palpitations, as the Islands moved up and down four inches a day under the moon's gravitational pull.

Scientists are now certain that the Hawaiian Islands, which are surrounded by a deep underwater moat, will someday in the far future, sink into the ocean altogether.

The same natural phenomenon of the Pacific floor's shifting is also responsible for the gradual splitting away of California from the rest of the continental U.S. No one alive will ever see it, of course, but our great great grandchildren may live in a time when California will be several miles offshore—and, indeed, perhaps a thousand or two years from today, the state may be somewhere in the middle of the Pacific.

At the same time, scientists have tracked the emergence of new land in the Red Sea, in the Gulf of California, and in the Caribbean. These land areas, actually the peaks of undersea mountains, are gradually rising toward the surface, and will someday appear on the surface as islands.

The newly-discovered globe-circling mountain chain mentioned earlier is the 3,000-mile-wide East Pacific Rise which loops around Australia from South America toward the Indian Ocean, where it joins the Mid-Atlantic Ridge, making up a 40,000-mile-long subterranean range.

And the trench in which six Grand Canyons could sink and get lost in, is the awesome Tonga-Kermadec Trench of the southwest Pacific—an incredible area that is 1,600 miles long and 34,876 feet deep.

Yet, the work of the IGY scientists has hardly begun. As they well know, many more startling discoveries remain deeply hidden in the unknown and uncharted wastelands of the vast subterranean worlds.

THE IMPOSSIBLE HAS HAPPENED! AQUAMAN AND AQUALAD HAVE BEEN DRIVEN FROM THE SEVEN SEAS-- AND NOW THEIR FINNY FRIENDS BECOME THEIR ENEMIES, AS THE OMINOUS WORDS GO OUT THAT...
