THE FRIENDLY GHOST Casper IN VICE VERSA AND HOW THEY GOT OUT OF IT!

The SWITCH

They just couldn't believe it.

"Oh, no!" shouted Kittie Cat.

"It's impossible!" joined in Carlos Cat.

"But it's true!" said Kittie Cat.

They peered down the edge of the hill, and breathlessly watched a tiny little mouse chase Allie Cat!

"Leave me alone!" screamed Allie. "Oh, please don't chase me anymore! I'll be good to you . . . I'll do anything you'd like!"

"Squeeeaaaakkkkk!" squeaked the mouse, who wasn't giving up the chase.

Finally, the little mouse put on the brakes and came to a halt. "Oh, well," he said in a tiny little voice, "I believe that I have thoroughly made my point. I will stop chasing you for the time being, young man, but if I see you start any trouble with anyone, believe me, you will not easily forget the results!"

Allie Cat had been hiding behind a wall listening to this squeak box vibrate. Then he stuck out his head and said, "I unnerstand yah, Mistah Mouse. You won't have no more trouble from me!"

And hearing that, the little mouse turned himself around and walked away.

As soon as the mouse was out of sight and sound, Kittie yelled down from the hill. "Hey, Allie," she screamed, "aren't you ashamed of what just happened? Hah! Hah!"

"Boy, you sure are a scream!" chimed in Carlos.

"Well, I'm not afraid of cats!" said Allie, and with that he dived at the troublesome pair.

"Gee we're only fooling," smiled Carlos, as he joined Kittie with their backs to the wall.

"Oh, no, you weren't," scowled Allie. "You think I'm yellah, don't you? You're thinkin' I'm a disgrace to all cat-kind . . . a real catastrophe!"

"Oh no we weren't," said both Carlos and Kittie in a pair of weak voices.

"Well you were!" insisted Allie. "And maybe you're right! But maybe you're wrong! And we're going to give you both a chance to prove it. I'm going to have that little mouse chase you. While he's chasing you, you're going to have a choice. You see, I'll be waiting for you at the other end of his chase! So we'll see what you'll do . . . whether you'll face the music with the mouse . . . or whether you'll face the claws of this cat!"

Without a further word, Allie dashed off yelling, "Oh, mouse! Oh, little mouse!"

Carlos looked at Kittie. Kittie looked at Carlos. Then the two of them said it at the same time: "What do you think we ought to do?"

Carlos said, "I don't think we should be afraid of a little mouse."

Kittie said, "Sure nothing to worry about . . . a mere mouse! Hah! Hah!"

Carlos said, "But tell me, Kittie, are you really afraid?"

Kittie said, "As afraid as you are . . . and you're shivering in your skin!"

Carlos said: "You're right!"

Then Kittie and Carlos said together: "Oh, what can we do?"

But there wasn't an answer forthcoming. They'd just have to wait it out. They didn't have any idea of what to expect. They only knew it would spell trouble.

Now there wasn't any more time. For here came the little mouse. Just a little tiny speck moving closer and closer to them.

They turned and saw Allie, waiting for them with open claws! They turned to face the mouse again. He was coming closer.

"I-I wonder wh-what h-he d-does?" stuttered Kittie.

"W-we'll s-soon s-s-see," said Carlos.

And then they saw . . . then they knew! And as fast as they could, they whipped around, and dashed right in the direction of Allie. Allie wasn't waiting for trouble either. He joined them in their run. Then the three of them turned around to look at the rushing mouse, and to plead: "Oh, please mouse with the limburger cheese smell, oh please leave us alone!"

CASPER, THE FRIENDLY GHOST

MOTHER EARTH

THE STORY OF THE SKY:

"Gee, lookit that jet plane go," exclaimed Jed Jenson, pointing to a vapor trail streaking across the sky. "I wonder how the earth looks from where he is!"

"Probably a lot like the other planets," said his friend, Alton White, putting down his book. "Just a big ball whirling in space with ridges and stuff."

"What do you mean, like other planets?" inquired Jed. "I thought the earth was, well—different!"

"It's different in a lot of ways," Alton told him. "But it's a planet just the same. It's a planet 93 million miles from the sun, and while it's larger than Mercury and Mars, it's much smaller than many others."

"Oh, all right, Professor Know-It-Alton," sniffed Jed. "You're so smart, tell me how our planet is different from the others, besides having us on it."

"Gladly," replied Alton, always glad to share his knowledge. "For one thing

the Earth has magnetism—"

"Oh, sure, I know," interrupted the other. "That's why my compass needle points to the North Magnetic Pole."

"Yes, although we don't know just why," went on Alton. "Scientists think it has something to do with the Earth's interior; maybe it's just a big mass of iron."

"Golly, why don't they dig it up and make a fortune," exclaimed Jed, who always had an eye for business.

"Nobody knows much about the inside of the Earth yet," was the reply. "The deepest oil well only goes down 21,000 feet; we aren't even sure how hot it is inside the Earth."

"Well, OK, what else is different about our good old planet?" Jed asked impatiently.

"Most important for us is the atmosphere around the Earth," continued Alton. "It contains a lot of oxygen so it's possible for us to live and breathe."

"You mean other planets don't get a deal like that?" said Jed.

"Well, other planets have atmosphere," replied Alton "but it doesn't support life like ours. Another thing—only the Earth has water, like lakes and oceans."

"Yipes," exclaimed Jed. "Imagine living where you couldn't go swimming."

"Yes, we're lucky to have a planet like ours," Alton reminded him.

"You bet," said Jed, slapping his comrade on the back. "Thanks for all the information, pal. Next time I feel like visiting the other planets, I'll remember—there's no place like home."
