Explorers of the "Liquid Sky"

THE sea has been called the new frontier, and with the amazing new equipment available to the daring and the curious, one is now able to investigate a maritime world many times the size of the one above the surface.

In Part I of the thrilling story of diving, we traced the early efforts by daredevils to conquer the domain of the deep. Modern skin diving began with the invention, in 1926, of "frog's feet" by Commander Corlieu of the French Navy. In combination with underwater goggles, the rubber fins gave an underwater swimmer added speed and maneuverability.

Now it needed only the "air-lung" to usher in the era of the skin-diver. A giant step toward this goal was made by another Frenchman, Yves Le Prieur, who invented a lightweight steel cylinder with a breathing-regulator attachment. This was combined with a face mask that covered the diver's nose and mouth. A gauge told the diver the amount of air left in reserve, and a hand-operated valve enabled him to regulate the flow of air into the mask as depth and pressure required.

Ten years later came the Cousteau-Gagnan aqua-lung. Captain Jacques-Yves Cousteau, forced to shore by the scuttling of the French fleet in the harbor of Toulon to forestall its falling into Nazi hands, now had the time to work out his plans for a new type of aqualung with engineer Emile Gagnan. Instead of steel cylinders, duralumin was used for the air reservoirs which the diver carried on his back. This arrangement, plus the light nature of the equipment, gave the wearer increased mobility with an almost weightlessness underwater.

Another feature of the aqua-lung was an air-demand regulator valve which operated automatically by the pressure of the depths. The mask covered only the eyes and nose while the air tube was held in the mouth by the diver's teeth. Exhaled air was forced out of a rubber non-return valve.

Although this model carried no air-indicator gauge, a system of air reserves warned the diver when nine-tenths of his air was used up, so that he could use his remaining onetenth for surfacing.

Throughout 1944, Cousteau conducted numerous underwater tests until he was satisfied as to its safety and utility. Then, two years later, the aqua-lung began appearing on the market, and from that time on the fever of undersea exploration spread all over the world.

It was inevitable that once the problem of providing the diver with suitable breathing apparatus was solved, the problem of underwater transportation would follow. Since the skin-diver carries his own air supply, he needs only a small machine which he can sit on or in. World War II hastened the development of underwater craft.

The British and Italian Navies both developed vehicles which their divers could maneuver and control underwater, while carrying a load of explosives.

The first successful vehicle was called the sea sled. A current model is a delta-shaped wing-type sled, designed to be towed by a motorboat. This craft is provided with a plastic shield, to protect the diver's head, and a set of controls. The slightest pull on the aileron controls will send the machine down to 100 feet or bring it up.

The MiniSub is an actual submarine, despite its size, and can be controlled from the interior by the operator.

The AquaPed, which is an adaptation of the bicycle, is powered by pedals geared to two counter-rotating propellers. The operator sits astride the device, with two suspender straps looped over his shoulders, and applies power to the pedals in the same manner as he would to drive a unicycle or bicycle.

Experts believe that in time diving equipment will be developed to the point that a diver will be able to remain underwater for indefinite periods. When that time comes, all the mysteries of the underwater world will be investigated by explorers of the "liquid sky."

UNABLE TO FREE THEMSELVES FROM THE POWERFUL GRIP OF THE CRIMINAL CREATURE, THE CAPTIVES ARE NOW WRENCHED FROM THEIR NATURAL HABITAT,

SO YOU THOUGHT YOU) TH-THEN, OUTWITTED ME, EH? YOU HA, HA! IN ONE HOUR, THE SEA WILL BE RID OF YOU FOREVER! KNOW OUR

ABOUT! WEAKNESS?

YES -- I KNOW THAT IF YOU ARE REMOVED FROM CONTACT WITH WATER FOR ONE HOUR, YOU WILL PERISH! BUT I WILL GIVE YOU ONE CHANCE TO SAVE YOURSELVES! WHAT THAT?

I--I'M BEGINNING TO GET WEAK,

SURE -- AND YOU'LL KEEP GETTING WEAKER AND WEAKER -- UNTIL YOU'RE FINISHED!

SHORTLY AS GIANT STRIDES REMOVE THE AQUATIC ACES FROM THE SIGHT AND SOUNDS OF THE SEA...

THIS TIME, NOTHING CAN SAVE YOU! WHY DON'T YOU STOP BLUFFING, AQUAMAN? YOU'RE GOING TO LET YOUR LITTLE PAL DIE -- JUST TO SAVE THE GOLD? Y-YOU'RE RIGHT...I CAN'T LET THAT HAPPEN!

"AQUALAD AND I HAD ALREADY LAPSED INTO UNCONSCIOUSNESS WHEN THE GULLS RETURNED! SOME OF THEM WERE CARRYING INFLATED BIOW-FISHES..."

BEFORE ..

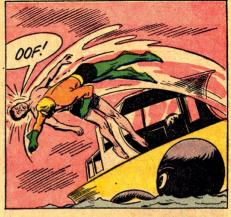

VERY CLEVER ... BUT I'M NOT FINISHED YET! THESE HAND GRENADES WILL TAKE CARE OF YOU AND YOUR FISH!
