SUMMING UP

ury service. It's a public duty, or so I was informed when I started my two-week stint in early December.

For those of you who aren't acquainted with the British system of justice, every week some unlucky member of the population gets a message from their nearest court requesting that they attend on a specific date. They duly turn up, are shown into a waiting room and there they remain unless called to a court to act as a juror on a case.

I may sound sarcastic about the whole system but it kind of gets you that way when six out of your ten days at court are spent reading and chatting to anyone who will listen. I must, however, admit that the British jury system gave me the idea for this month's editorial – and no, it's not boring or about boredom.

Looking at the way a jury operates, I decided to apply similar principals to see what the genres of fantasy, horror and science fiction promise to be like in the next decade. After all, a jury looks at the facts to determine the truth and, often, those convicted of crimes are likely to re-offend. So it is with the three genres that operate in cycles of popularity.

Currently the horror market is undergoing rapid change and, as a result, a slight dip in popularity. The reason is a dissatisfaction with gore and a thirst for good, inventive storylines. Movies such as The Guardian and Nightbreed will fill the gaps in the cinema next year but the book market is falling apart because of lack of input and young blood. The faddism of Splatterpunk has died and the market needs an injection of adrenalin if it is not to go into a decline similar to that of the Western at the end of the Seventies.

Fortunately, horror is a flexible field and there are several aces near the top of the deck. One of them is an increased interest in the occult and black magic which surfaced last year and looks set to wax during the early Nineties. Also, Gothic influences are reappearing and, mixed with contemporary themes and settings, could prove the lifeblood of the industry – unless, of course, authors and filmmakers go for hackneyed clichés, ripping off the likes of Poe or, shock of shocks, transforming the tenets of Gothic horror for the modern world. If those transformations are successful we can look forward to healthy growth in the horror genre, at least during the next five years.

Those five years are also likely to see an increased blurring of the genres as branches of fantasy and SF grow more and more into the horror story and vice versa. Until recently, the genres have kept strictly to their own techniques, concepts and timezones. Now writers in each of the genres are abandoning their elitism, preconceptions and timidity to combine the elements of fantasy and SF. After all, who says you can't have speculative high tech stories with twists of horror? In the same way, now that we've got out of the gore rut, horror stories can concentrate on moving back the boundaries. After all, there have been a lot of promises made in that direction during the past year, but very little fulfilment.

The blur in the line between horror and fantasy, exacerbated by the dereliction by writers known for the former to the apparently milder boundaries of the latter, again means that the horror genre is losing its identity. So-called fantastic fiction, which appears to be more acceptable to the reading public and, therefore, publishers, is replacing hardline horror on the shelves and occasionally getting into the bestseller lists. Many of those lists, however, are made up of orders from distributors to retailers, not retailers to customers, and a great many of these 'sophisticated' fantasies spend several months on the shelves – which just goes to prove that the public hates pretension.

Unsurprisingly, the SF field is increasing in popularity. Generally untainted by the tussle between 'fantasy' and 'horror', it enters the Nineties in fine fettle with a whole new generation of talented fictioneers culled from the mature ranks of industry pundits who, it must be said, know their onions and can deliver a tasty tale. Unfortunately, there is little recognisable new talent in the horror or even the fantasy fields. There are one or two up-and-coming young writers but, unfortunately, in the world of horror you're either a somebody or a nobody. Not so in science fiction, in which ideas never give way to a writer's popularity and, in the great majority of cases, an author's name is usually set smaller than the title of their book.

So it looks to be an undoubtedly great year for the science fiction buff with a great deal of effort being put into promotion by publishers such as Legend and Pan. If horror and fantasy can overcome their identity crises, it looks like being a hot decade for them. Of course, only time, and a vast jury of readers and cinemagoers, will tell.

I rest my case for another year...

"The market needs an injection of adrenalin if it is not to go into a decline similar to that of the Western at the end of the Seventies"

Revenge of Billy the Kid has the lot – Satanic monsters, blighted love, corpses and dung heaps. FEAR's Patience Coster visited the MacDonald family's farm to experience a day in the shoot of a new British independent movie.

A wellington-booted figure looms into view, struggling through the sea of mud. 'I wouldn't park there,' it cries urgently. 'You may never get out alive!'

Until this moment it has been one of those mellow November mornings. The Welsh countryside – all long shadows, ground mist and golden sun – is at its most atmospheric. But down on Pontysgib Farm, in the lee of the Black Mountain five miles north of Abergavenny, the failing light is already beginning to pose problems for the cast and crew of Revenge of Billy the Kid.

From a distance, the rambling farmhouse looks innocent enough, but on closer inspection the reasons why Montage Films chose this location in which to shoot their first film – a low budget horror/comedy – become painfully apparent.

The wellington-booted figure turns out to be Ross Smith, unit publicist and co-writer on Billy; he chats enthusiastically as we make our way slowly through the swamp and into the yard. 'It's pure cow shit as far as the eye can see,' he comments with evident satisfaction.

A handful of actors and technicians, in various stages of dishevelment, wade around in the mire – getting into role, taking light readings, drinking tea, shoeing chickens into (or out of) shot. Liquid manure slops over the tops of their wellies.

'Great location, isn't it?' Ross's promotional zeal seems somehow to extend beyond the bounds of duty.

Alongside a roofless cowshed, a ten foot high wall of dung is banked up. In front of it another oozing heap is crowned with a wooden crucifix set at a jaunty angle. Below the crucifix, half buried in shit, lies a semi-decomposed corpse. Stifling the urge to scream, I follow Ross into the farmhouse.

"It's pure cow shit as far as the eye can see"

The house is pretty much an extension of the yard – there is no running water, no inside toilet, no heat save from a cast iron range in the kitchen – cats occupy every available piece of furniture and ancient newspapers and boxes litter the mud-besmirched squares of broken linoleum on the floor. 'This is exactly how we found it,' says Ross. 'We just added a few cobwebs, that's all. Actually, we're thinking of telling people the film was shot in a studio, and that we production designed it!'

THE THREE RONNIES

The story of Revenge of Billy the Kid centres on the MacDonalds, a farming family who inhabit an imaginary island. The farmer's daughter, Ronnie ('all three children are called Ronald because their mum liked the name . . .') begins an affair with a boy from the mainland and a feud ensues because the islanders hate the mainlanders and vice versa ('It's a real Romeo and Juliet number . . .'). To add to the MacDonald family's troubles, the island is terrorised by an ugly monster called Billy, who is half man and half goat.

THERE'S MONTAGE

'The monster is based on the idea of a pagan image of Satan,' says Ross, who wrote the film's script with producer Tim Dennison and director Jim Groom back in August 1988. 'We wanted to do a horror movie, but we only had a very low budget. Our original idea was to do a horror movie set in a hospital, but when we finished the treatment we decided it was actually offensive. We thought: 'Let's not do something offensive, let's just do something in bad taste.' So we decided to set it on a farm.' The three started to look for locations and discovered Pontysgib Farm almost immediately: 'But Jim's a perfectionist and he wanted to look further . . . ' After a year of hunting they returned to their original choice. 'It was definitely the best,' says Ross.

With a twenty-five strong crew, eleven of whom have never worked on a feature film before, and a budget of under £1 million, there is certainly very little spare fat on this project. But Ross says everyone concerned is immensely committed and enthusiastic and believes that working a fifteen hour day in freezing and filthy conditions has been conducive to creativity: 'Everyone just mucks in.' Which reminds me to take him to task about the stiff on the dung heap. 'Oh, that's Grandpa Pete. In the movie he just drops down dead one evening so the MacDonalds stick him on the compost heap - they're a hick family, you see. They put a cross there with his name on it and the body gradually decomposes.' Although the corpse outside is obviously a dummy, Tim Dennison was granted the dubious honour of playing the live-action Pete. 'We threw Tim on the compost heap and he slid all the way down to the bottom - he did it in just one take!'

KILLING MACHINE

During the course of the film, Billy the monster mutates through three stages of animatronic and prosthetic development, from cuddly, slimy baby to seven foot killing machine, so it is fortunate for Montage that they are able to call on the skills of FX specialists Neill Gorton, Steve Painter and Alan Hedgcock. The three artists recently left Bob Keen's Image Animation to set up on their own and Billy is their first solo project.

Although baby Billy is just a latex dummy, Billy Mark Two is a working model constructed of foam rubber over fibreglass and linked to a slave system so that facial muscles and limbs can be made to move. And Billy Mark Three? He's a closely guarded secret, but suffice it to say that, when he reaches maturity, Billy the Kid is a real mean dude.

Still only in their early twenties, Neill, Steve and Alan have an impressive track record, including work on Waxworks, The Unholy, Hellbound, Lair of the White Worm and the forthcoming Clive Barker feature Nightbreed. So how did they scale these dizzy heights so quickly? Neill explains: 'From kids we've always been interested in special effects as a hobby - we used to get all the mags and read up on it all the time. We were just lucky that it turned into a profession. There's so much to it, but you can learn a lot in school as well. We use a lot of chemistry to make foam skins and various makeup materials; engineering is helpful as well - with all the metalwork. You soon learn that FX is a lot more than just rubber masks.'

'I dropped out of art college after six months because it was hindering me more than anything else. I didn't have any time to do a portfolio. Then I got some work with Chris Tucker - so after that I had a name behind me, which was useful - then I came to London and went round knocking on doors. You've really got to push yourself - and steer away from doing gore effects, they don't impress. An interest in design and sculpture is very useful; I know people who have got jobs just with sketches, because their designs and ideas are so good. Originality is the main thing.'

FILTH AND SQUALOR

Another impressive aspect of this entrepreneurial caper is that Revenge of Billy the Kid has been financed solely by Montage Films.

Until recently, Tim Dennison and Jim Groom ran Montage exclusively as a postproduction and editing company, but the lack of available funding for first time features in Britain prompted them to branch out into film production. 'People were interested in the project,' says Tim, 'but only to the extent that they would give us a distribution deal once the picture was shot, which didn't help us. So that was the prime reason for doing something with our own money.'

Tim is perfectly candid about the source of inspiration for the plot of Billy, which arose out of the constraints of their budget. 'We all liked the horror genre, so we thought: 'Well, why not?'

The film is shot on a new type of 16mm Kodak stock and then blown up to 35mm. 'We did some test shots and got the labs to blow them up,' says Jim. 'Then we viewed them at the Odeon Leicester Square, so that we could see them on a really big screen. I've been in editing for twelve years or so now, and I couldn't tell whether it had been shot on 35mm or on 16mm - it looked that good. The rushes have a kind of comic book feel; for the comedy scenes, the colours are very rich and exaggerated but, when the horror aspect comes in, we're going to make it much moodier and darker.'

Ross looks concerned: 'The trouble with film is that it seems to take away all the rough edges,' he says ruefully, 'although the location is dirty, it's difficult to make it appear dirty enough on film.'

By whom or what have the three filmmakers been influenced? 'Well, I think a lot of the camerawork and angles are influenced by Joe Dante,' says

Ross, 'and there's a bit of Jabberwocky in there too. But Revenge of Billy the Kid is, without doubt, the dirtiest film in the history of the British film industry. The claim is that Monty Python and the Holy Grail is probably the dirtiest film ever made - until now! I don't think we could have done it, though, had it been a three month shoot - or a Kubrick special - but getting mucky for one month is OK.'

At that moment, director of photography Dave Read slashes hurriedly across the yard. 'We're losing the light,' he bellows, and several chickens stand to attention. Ross grabs his clipboard and wades back onto the battlefield. 'It's just filth and squalor all the way . . . ' he shouts back over his shoulder. 'Great fun!'

"Revenge of Billy the Kid is, without doubt, the dirtiest film in the history of the British film industry"

MARK OF THE BEAST

After years of character acting on stage and in film, British thespian Roy Dotrice has suddenly found fame in a new television adaptation of the classic fantasy, Beauty and the Beast. Below, Juanita Elefante-Gordon talks to the man who brings wit and wisdom to the role of Father.

es, the rumour of Catherine Chandler's demise is true. Sadly for Beauty and the Beast, actress Linda Hamilton has left the series to become a full time mother. In fact, the two hour Beauty and the Beast special series premiere will be, as it were, her swan song.

While it is difficult to imagine this classic fable minus the Beauty, actor Roy Dotrice maintains that things are not as beastly as they may seem. 'Our feeling around the set is one of guarded optimism,' he says. Still, the question ringing in people's minds will be: Does it take two to tango?

'Well, there are several kinds of romance; Beauty and the Beast is romantic in the spirit of Byron and Shelley as opposed to, you know, Harlequin Romances,' argues Dotrice. 'It's the sort of romance that goes beyond just love stories; it's a way of looking at the world, a way of looking at life. It's the whole notion of living life to the fullest – that the world is still full of adventure and compassion and wonderful stuff.'

I think the writers have handled this issue as realistically as possible. So yes, I think the shows are going to continue to be romantic.'

Dotrice plays Father, a warm, witty storyteller with a bone-dry sense of humour, a brilliant recluse who has given up life Above for a home in the secret chambers and tunnels beneath New York City. In this literary fantasy drama, Father is Vincent's (the Beast's) surrogate parent, having raised him underground from the time when he was abandoned as an infant. Father is the founder of the utopian society which exists Below, and serves as mentor and guide to all its inhabitants.

'Until the part of Father came along I had driven myself into obscurity as a character actor in layers of makeup for parts such as Caliban and Julius Caesar – which I used to think of as acting with a capital 'A', says Dotrice. 'Now I'm able to put my own looks and personality into the Father character. We're even similar in many ways – particularly in sharing a sensitivity to good theatre and good music,' he smiles.

Ironically, Dotrice nearly ended up beneath some really heavy makeup – as Vincent. 'I read for the role a couple of times and everybody seemed pleased. Then Ron Perlman came in. He's very athletic, and he has the size – he's huge – and the voice . . . Well, I was obviously very much out of the picture at that point. [laughs] But two weeks later, I received a call from the show's producers asking if I would be interested in playing Father.

'Doing a weekly series had been my dream, and the idea of more people seeing me on television in one night than have seen me perform throughout my entire career on stage was also an inducement. I said yes . . . And I'm thrilled that I didn't get Ron Perlman's part of Vincent, because the poor lad is in makeup four and a half hours a day!'

RUSSIAN PLAGUE

The character of Father took a dramatic rise in the second season and was, Dotrice concedes, assisted by a little creative manipulation on his part, like penning the episode Ashes . . .

'There wouldn't be any point in writing an episode if I didn't write a good part for myself! I tried to think of the most horrendous thing that could happen down in the caves and tunnels. So I thought: what would happen if we had a situation where an epidemic, a plague, hit that underground community? They can't all suddenly run upstairs; they have to stay down there and isolate themselves. The result is that it would spread like wildfire.

I thought it might be an idea if we had the plague brought in by a Russian. So I had a Russian defecting from a ship in New York Harbour; he comes ashore and is rescued by Vincent and brought down to Dad in the caves. He gets on very well and speaks pretty good English. An opportunity, I thought, to discuss philosophies between East and West – which, looking back now, seems almost obsolete! Anyway, you have this chap from a communist country extolling the virtues of capitalism and Father, who is in a capitalist country, and who has formed down there an almost perfect communist state.

'It's a commune where decisions are made by committee and by majority vote. Everybody has equal rights and everything is shared equally – communism in its purest form, really. This is kind of sardonic because Father was originally jailed when his career was ruined with the McCarthy trials – he was accused of communism and put in prison for it!'

A veteran of more than a dozen films, Dotrice is best known by fantasy genre fans as the crazed scientist in Eliminators and for his portrayal of Commissioner Simmonds in the Breakaway and Earthbound episodes of Space: 1999. He also appeared as the French vampire in the My Ghost Writer – The Vampire episode of Tales From the Darkside. He is, however, particularly thrilled with the role of Father which he feels more or less able to play as himself.

'There's a sense of elegance about the language and a literacy which is quite astounding for primetime television. For years we've been underestimating the intelligence of the average American audience. Now I think we're allowing for the fact that we think they're erudite and can appreciate these things – and our ratings have proved that we're right.

A while ago the producers were a little terrified of plunging people into a subterranean world, because people have been brought up on a glamorous diet of Dallas and Dynasty. They thought it would be too much of a culture shock going down into that dark, dank atmosphere of the caves. But in all the letters we get the interest is not with the DA's office and what happens 'up there' but in the underground world and what happens 'down there'.

Beauty and the Beast may be high quality TV fare, but it is not without its share of amusing mishaps. 'I remember right at the beginning of the series when Ron had these teeth – these canines – which just didn't fit properly. On one occasion he had to kiss me and, when he came away, I had these fangs stuck in my forehead!'

'Father was exactly the type of exposure I needed,' Dotrice admits. 'The fact that people recognise me in the street now is actually quite astounding. It's always been a case of 'Will the real Roy Dotrice please stand up?' and now I'm getting the opportunity to do just that!'

"I'm thrilled that I didn't get Ron Perlman's part of Vincent, because the poor lad is in makeup four and a half hours a day"

I AM LEGEND

As a writer, Richard Matheson has done it all. His classic novels include The Shrinking Man and Hell House, and his screenplays have been produced by the likes of Steven Spielberg. However, as FEAR's Stanley Winter discovered, this veteran writer is at odds with some of the things that have been done in the name of fantasy.

Who is Richard Matheson, you say? Well, he's just someone whose words have had an effect on literally millions of people because he is, in fact, four writers.

Firstly, Matheson is the author of such classic novels as I Am Legend, The Shrinking Man, Hell House, Bid Time Return and What Dreams May Come. His most recent book, published so far only in England, is Earthbound, which was originally released in the 1970s in a botched and heavily edited edition which he disowned and had issued under his pseudonym, Logan Swanson.

Secondly, he is a marvellous short story writer, and recognised as one of the most talented in the field. Indeed, his best work will be issued soon by the American specialty publisher Scream/Press as the Collected Stories of Richard Matheson, though these pieces of fiction first appeared in such treasured paperback volumes as Shock!, Third From the Sun and The Shores of Space.

Thirdly, as a screenwriter Matheson was responsible for a number of fine 1960s horror movies inspired by the stories of Edgar Allan Poe, directed by Roger Corman and starring Vincent Price. Beyond Poe films (House of Usher, The Pit and the Pendulum, Tales of Terror, The Raven, Comedy of Terrors), he also worked on films produced in England: Burn, Witch, Burn (based on the novel Conjure Wife by Fritz Leiber), De Saule, Die! Die! My Darling and The Devil's Bride. He also adapted his novels The Shrinking Man, Hell House (released as The Legend of Hell House) and Bid Time Return (released as Somewhere in Time). Two unsuccessful versions of I Am Legend have so far been produced.

Finally, however, Matheson—who was born in New Jersey in 1926 and has lived for many years in southern California—is perhaps best known for his television work. Besides teleplays for such memorable movies as Duel, directed by Steven Spielberg, he also wrote the teleplay for what was to become (at that time) the most successful made-for-television movie ever—The Night Stalker. This film later inspired a sequel and the television series starring the unflappable reporter, Kolchak.

Matheson was also, incidentally, one of the top writers for a half hour black-and-white television series called The Twilight Zone. So evidently only the surface has been scratched of this mountain of talent.

POWER MISUSED

SW: Admirers of your work will say that you've written far too few novels in your career. One of your most popular, Hell House, was reportedly written over a ten year period. Why so long?

RM: Well, it wasn't because I was writing it for ten years! I had so much other work to do out here that I would put it aside, then go back to it. It doesn't sound like much money, compared to what they're paying for books now, but at the time I had gotten a $5000 advance, and I was too cheap to give it back [laughs], even though I just wanted to drop the whole project. So I just kept labouring at it through the years.

The first version of Hell House I submitted was told in the first person - each of the characters writing their own story - which is kind of interesting, but it's very difficult, if not impossible, to get any suspense that way. Because everybody who's writing can only write about something that's already taken place. Therefore, if somebody's writing a book, you know that no matter what they go through, they already got through it, because they're writing a book!

SW: When you say 'other work', you're of course referring to your numerous television and film assignments?

RM: Oh, sure. Of course. Although I've had success in novels, I sometimes think maybe I should no longer keep trying, because although they work out reasonably well, none of them have sold a lot. Maybe Hell House did. But their only value to me financially was that they sold as motion pictures. I suppose it's nice to have a couple of novels that people call 'classics' - The Shrinking Man and I Am Legend - so obviously I'm going to keep on writing them. But I do feel that the film medium is a tremendously powerful one, if used properly. Of course, it is very rarely used properly.

TWILIGHT YEARS

SW: I'm hardly the first to tell you what an enormous influence you've been on an entire generation of young writers and filmmakers. Do you think the influence has come mostly from your published writing or your Twilight Zone episodes and the horror and suspense novels?

RM: I know Stephen King has said this, which is very gratifying. King said that, because of reading I Am Legend, he realised it was not necessary to write everything like H.P. Lovecraft. That you could have a contemporary shopping mall, housing-tract setting and still do a horror story. So that was very crucial in his decision as to what he was going to write.

But now, of course, people probably don't read books or short stories that much anyway, and there are producers out here who only know me - there is ageism out here in Hollywood and I would qualify for it - because a lot of young producers and executives grew up with the Twilight Zone. It is understandable, because that's all they could know - I don't have anything in print in particular, except an occasional reprint.

SW: In spite of the influence you've had on others in the field of horror and dark fantasy, the term 'Horror' is one you've never appreciated having associated with your work.

RM: If things like Friday the 13th and A Nightmare on Elm Street and Scanners is 'horror', then I've never written horror. I don't think I've ever written anything - except maybe a scene here and there in Hell House - that was gruesome, ghastly stuff. It was explicit sexually, yes, but I don't know if it was more 'horrible' than anything that had been written before. But sex and horror are all the rage now.

NEEDLEWORK

SW: Certainly none of the films you wrote in the 1960s would qualify as what most young people label as horror. Nowadays the popular theory is that we must see everything.

RM: I think now the viewers are anaesthetised; they've seen so much of it that the only way to reach them is to stick the needle in further every time - to get any kind of reaction. This is not a good thing, by any means.

SW: Do you think today's horror writers and filmmakers have to do this because audiences are so jaded they won't accept anything else but the explicit blood and gore?

RM: Oh, sure. They don't have to do this - they do it because it's what sells. It's bullshit if they're trying to say it's anything else.

SW: Yes, but what about the classic philosophy of the catharsis - we purge our evil intentions by seeing others act them out on stage or in a book or movie?

RM: Like everyone, I used to believe in the old theory that, by experiencing these horrors vicariously, you are able to get them out of your system and are therefore able to cope with the horrors of reality more efficiently. I don't believe that now. I believe everything you put in your mind stays there. The more crap these kids and young people are putting in their minds, the worse their minds are going to get. Because it doesn't 'trickle out' while they're asleep. It's always in there. It's rooted. And one of the proofs is that the only things that will scare them are things that get worse and worse all the time. More horrific.

I don't want to blow up an entire field of literature, which would be ridiculous. But we are living in a very violent period of time - with the drugs and the street killings, the drive-by shootings... New York is like a nightmare, a jungle. Washington DC is a total horror. And Los Angeles is apparently now the number one drug centre in the country. There's been a general deterioration in society - there's no doubt about it. The horror movies are just a reflection of that. It's symbiotic: the public wants it, and Hollywood therefore provides it. It's a circle which just goes on and on - they keep making pictures like that knowing they'll succeed, and if some of them don't succeed, they assume it's because they're not horrific enough. So they'll make it even worse.

Even that's not working now. I think there's actually a change in the attitude of the mass viewers, because pictures are making money now at the box office that didn't for a while, films like Parenthood and Dead Poets Society and Rain Man.

THE DREAMER OF OZ

SW: Has your work been of any benefit to society?

RM: Beyond entertainment value? Probably not. I can't think of any. Just the fact that I've been able to scare people doesn't make me a great guy. I've entertained them, that's about all you can say.

SW: Is that enough?

RM: No! It's not enough for me now. That's why I'm trying to get into projects that have something more to say.

SW: Is part of the reason you've never had a chance to work on major mainstream projects the fact that you've always been identified strongly as a genre writer? As you know all too well, you're best known to the public as 'Science fiction writer, Richard Matheson'.

RM: I still don't understand why - I haven't written any science fiction. But I can see my own obituary: 'Science fiction writer Richard Matheson succumbs to ennui'. But this labelling hasn't helped my career at all. Not at all. Years ago I wrote a movie on alcoholism for television called The Morning After, and it worked beautifully. I was told that it was so definitive that it was shown in medical schools. It was a marvellous study. But there was a reviewer who used words almost like: 'This is a true horror story, and who better to write the script than...'. And I thought, 'Oh, hell! I'll never get away from it'. They don't want you to get out of your category! You try and get out and, boy, they smack you on the head and say, 'Get back in there!' God knows what the reviewers are going to say about the television movie I just wrote on the life of L. Frank Baum called The Dreamer of Oz - there's not a scare in it.

"There's been a general deterioration in society - there's no doubt about it. The horror movies are just a reflection of that"

STEEL COFFIN

SW: I think I speak for many when saying that your fantasy novels Bid Time Return and What Dreams May Come are your finest.

RM: I feel that Bid Time Return is the best book I've written. I've created, in a sense, a whole society of people out there who responded not only to the film, but to the book, the music, everything. I feel very good about that. I feel extremely good about What Dreams May Come because I've had letters from people saying, 'My mother was dying, and I let her read this book, and she faces her death now with peace'. And I think no writer can do more than that. But the critics didn't like it. They wanted me to do horror.

Once gave a speech at a writers' conference on why I hate the genres. Do everything you can to destroy genres. A good story is a good story. If you tell a love story, and you set it on Mars, then it's a science fiction. You tell it set in the old West, and it becomes a western. You tell it in the midst of a detective story, and it's a detective story. And so on and so forth. This idea that there's this 'genre' that exists like a steel coffin, and you've got to jump inside it to write your story. . . . In many cases, it's not that these writers, including Robert Bloch and myself, have not attempted other fields. It's just that there's not a welcome mat in these fields and they've got to batter their way into it if they're going to do it. And even if they do it, the long-time readers are going to say, 'Aw, gee, why don't you do the old stuff?'

SW: But marketing labels aside, certainly you can't deny that you're a writer of the 'fantastic'?

RM: Oh, sure. On my tombstone they can put 'Fantasy Writer'. I don't mind that. 'Off Beat Writer'. That's fine.

A FIELD TOO FAR

SW: When you were writing for The Twilight Zone and various other television and movie projects in the early 1960s, with such colleagues as Beaumont and Serling, did you have any idea what effect your work would eventually have?

RM: We enjoyed what we were doing. Certainly, we were trying to earn money and support our families, but we were doing it in a way that interested us and in a way that we could do our best. We were pretty good at it. But when I started writing books like Bid Time Return and What Dreams May Come, a lot of readers in the fantasy, horror and science fiction world thought, 'Well, Matheson's brain has turned to mush. He doesn't write that nice lean, hard, scare 'em to death stuff anymore'. But you know, who cares? [laughs] If that's where you want to stay fixated at, that's your privilege.

SW: Despite the fact that many of the screenplays you've written have never been produced - which is the norm in the film industry - they've apparently always paid better than any novel you've written. You worked for years on a mini-series dealing with the paranormal, but it never got off the ground, and you worked more years on a still unproduced mini-series based on Philip Wylie's The Disappearance . . .

RM: It's hard when you're making a living as a writer and some producer comes to you with something that sounds interesting. You don't say, 'I'm sorry, I think I'm going to be poor this year and write a novel'. And I've never been in that category where millions of dollars have been made available. I obviously quit the field too soon - I may be ahead of my time, but I'm sure a poor judge of time! I give up fields just before they hit big. Consider that I sold I Am Legend for $3000 way back when. But, as my wife keeps reminding me, I was supporting four children, so I really didn't have that much in terms of options. But I look at all these screenplays that never got made, and they're just sitting on the shelf. No one will ever see them. No one has any idea of the wonderful work I did on them.

NO SECRETS

SW: What advice do you have for the aspiring writer?

RM: If somebody is really intent on being a writer, it doesn't matter what anybody says to them. When I was starting as a writer, people were always saying, 'Well, how long are you going to give it?' and, 'When are you going to get a job?'. I would just stare at them blankly. It's the ones who send me and other writers letters asking, 'Tell me how to become a writer. Tell me how to get started'. They're the ones who are in trouble! I never asked anybody how to get started! I corresponded in the early days with Ray Bradbury, but only to tell him how much I liked his work, and he wrote me back telling me how much he enjoyed my early short stories. But I wasn't asking for advice on how to become a writer.

There is no big secret. Just keep writing. And keep writing about the things you feel strongly about. You should not write anything that doesn't absolutely turn you on. I love writing. It's a hard field. It's very often unrewarding financially - and certainly creatively - for the majority. But if you do love it - great! Stay with it! You should love any field you go into. I love it, and I will stay in it until the day I die.

FEAR, TOGETHER WITH PUBLICITY OVERLOAD, is offering a four volume set of videos to TEN lucky winners of this fab competition.

The This is Horror compilation tapes include interviews with Dario Argento, Brian Yuzna, Joel and Ethan Coen and Robert Bloch, reports from the sets of Texas Chainsaw Massacre 3 and Hellbound and behind the scenes peeks at A Nightmare on Elm Street 4 and Re-Animator. Each tape has an introduction by the master of terror himself, STEPHEN KING and lasts for approximately 48 mins.

To win a set of these unique videos we would like you to imagine yourself the compiler of a all-time greats horror encyclopedia. What movie would you place at the top of your list, and why? Please keep your answer to no more than 25 words in length and send it, along with your name and address, to This is Horror Competition, FEAR, PO Box 10, Ludlow, Shropshire SY8 1DB to reach us no later than 16 February, 1990. Usual competition rules apply.

When Neil Gaiman told his careers advisor he wanted to write 'American comics', the man 'looked like someone had tried to force feed him a herring', and offered accountancy as an alternative. Since then, Neil has tackled discouragement his way. Working as a journalist and feature writer for Today and Knave magazine paid the bills and allowed time to work on prose and comics. His first major comic work for DC was the visually stunning but narratively weak Black Orchid.

Sandman, a monthly comic, is his most successful project to date. Its design and feel is unorthodox: an omnipotent being creates and guides our dreams, always skirting past, yet never fully entering, our lives. It is a disturbing idea, but well handled with style and a wry undercurrent of humour. 'The first image I had for the series was of a naked man in a cell for eighty years. Then it spread out from there. I drew the initial design of the character and sent the drawings to Sam Keith, the artist.

"I don't know what I will do if they ever turn round and say, 'No, you can't do that'"

'I knew the kind of feel I wanted to have, which wasn't a superhero comic or fantasy or horror. I wanted it to be a walk through the genres, almost charting their history, so that you could recap it through the first eight Sandmans. I liked that idea and I also wanted to write the comic I wanted to read every month.'

DESTINY

The horror elements in Sandman hit home. Despite their obsession with horror, comics have made but a small contribution to the genre's development. They have concentrated on blood splattered pages and the gruesome details of murders in an increasingly desperate attempt to retain the reader's interest.

Sandman has altered this approach by introducing an age-old literary technique - characterisation. The most unsettling of the latest batch of issues is number six, in which a supervillain, Dr Destiny, waits quietly in a small town diner. Around him is a cross section of the citizenry, a microcosm of middle America. While Dr Destiny subjects his fellow diners to a series of perverse experiments, Gaiman takes his chance to explore each character. So, when each victim meets their fate, the strength of Gaiman's writing ensures that we identify with them.

'I don't think horror means anything unless you care: I don't think anything means anything unless you care about people. There is a level at which I like the fact that people get very upset about number six, because a lot of people did get very upset. These are the people who will quite casually read books and comics and see movies which have huge death counts and they don't give a fuck. What I wanted to do was say, 'Let's look at the side effects'. We have this supervillain who, for a supervillain, isn't doing very much. He is just killing a day and killing five people.

'I had originally intended the twenty-four hours to go over twenty-four pages, but I discovered that I couldn't set up the characters, so I took the first six pages to do this, and that was one of the things I enjoyed. For example, the necrophilia page. I don't think that it's particularly horrible, I think it's rather sad. From that page, I think you begin to understand people's hidden secrets and sexual kinks slightly better. It's not there for shock value and it's not there to gross people out, it's there for characterisation and because of that it walks close to the edge.

'Luckily, so far, I haven't been censored even through issue six. I think DC looked at it and thought, 'Yes, it's strong, it's over the top, it's probably the nastiest thing we have ever published in any DC comic. But it's right for the story. It's valid and it makes significant moral points. Yes, okay, we'll go for it.'

'I don't know what I will do if they ever turn round and say, 'No, you can't do that'. Still, we can burn that bridge when we come to it.'

Sandman's central character, Kai Ckul (Sandman), the lord of dreams, proves to be morally bankrupt, suffering from violent mood swings that endanger friends and loved ones.

'He can be a total bastard. People come up to me and ask, 'Is he good or evil?' From his own perspective, he is good. The mistake people make with him is assuming that he is human, or assuming that he has a human perspective, and all of a sudden, now and then, he will do something and you'll suddenly go, 'No, he isn't'. He has his own set of rules.'

GOOD OMENS

Comics are the most lucrative and high profile area of Neil's career, but they only form part of his output. He is also a talented humourist and the author of Don't Panic, a guide to The Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy, and with Kim Newman, Ghastly Beyond Belief, a collection of dreadful SF quotes. Most recently, he completed a collaborative novel with friend and bestselling Disc World author, Terry Pratchett.

'The book is called Good Omens and it's about heaven and hell, Armageddon, the four motorcyclists of the Apocalypse and the other four motorcyclists of the Apocalypse, the lost remnants of the Witchfinder's army. Remember Witchfinder General? Well, all we have is a sergeant and a private. The anti-Christ is in it too - his name is Adam Young and he's eleven - and so are his friends Pepper, Winsledale and his dog, who's called Dog. In it you will discover the occult significance of the M25 and why it is that any cassette left in the car for more than two weeks becomes The Best of Queen. You will also get to read about the only book of true prophecy ever written. I hope it will be very funny.'

It proved to be long distance collaboration. 'What we are hoping now is that we can sell the book before the telephone bills come in, because most of it was plotted and written over the phone. Then he [Pratchett] and I would go off and write out sections and chapters. We would send computer discs back and forth and, when it got to the end of the book and things were going on a very immediate basis, we were actually squirting things up and down country by modem.'

"The anti-Christ is in it too - his name is Adam Young and he's eleven"

MIRACLEMAN

Neil had the initial idea for the book. 'I started writing it about two years ago, I wrote the first five thousand words and then I thought, 'Hang on, if I write a funny novel having just finished Don't Panic I will be pegged forever as a writer of funny books, which is only one side of what I can do. So I left the book there, having already sent it to Terry.

'About eight months ago he rang me up and said that he was sick of doing Disc World novels and: 'Remember that book you started? Do you want to do it together?' So Terry, being frighteningly prolific, took the first five thousand words and rewrote them, and by the time he was finished they were the first ten thousand words.

'What happened was, he started doing it because he had a couple of months off, and I had managed to arrange things so that this was my busiest period. I wound up writing the book between two and five o'clock in the morning, after I had finished Sandman or my new project for DC, The Book of Magic or, for Eclipse, Miracleman.

One danger of collaborating is that one author may overshadow his partner and the novel then becomes bitty. This appears not to be the case here. 'It was very easy and pleasant writing with Terry. We have known each other for years and we have a similar sense of humour. We have, however, very different strong and weak points. So I don't think that Good Omens will read like a Terry Pratchett book. It also doesn't read like a Neil Gaiman book.

SCREENBOUND

Gaiman has refused to be labelled as a comic book writer. 'What I like doing is telling stories, putting words together and creating images. I like the whole territory of the fantastic, the whole sense of wonder, but it's a huge world out there and there are all sort of things I haven't written yet. I've never written the text on the back of a cornflakes packet; somebody does and it's very important, a lot of people read it in the morning.'

Since Violent Cases, an atmospheric story about the unreliability of memory, violence and Al Capone's osteopath, which was essentially an illustrated short story rather than a graphic novel, Gaiman has developed the ability to gauge accurately which medium is appropriate to a given subject. 'What is nice is being able to look at a subject and look at what kind of medium it is best suited for.

'I've recently written a book called Cold Colours which Dave McKean is going to be illustrating, and it is basically a very long poem about the relationship between computers, high finance and black magic. It obviously wasn't a comic, it was a poem, so that is how I wrote it.

'My new project for DC, The Book of Magic, some of that will be poetry and short stories. I've also recently written a film treatment with Pete Atkins, the screenwriter of Hellbound. That started with a discussion about why I didn't want to write movies, turned into a discussion about what kind of movies I wanted to write and ended with us sitting together and plotting a movie. It has to be a movie. It couldn't be a novel, it would be terrible, same way it would be a terrible comic, but it would make a great movie. I think that it's a very exciting period to be in comics and it's a very exciting period to be a writer.'

"Each skeleton had five appendages, and every frame of film you had to move and keep them in synchronisation"

It's impossible to assess the career of Ray Harryhausen without reference to his mentor Willis O'Brien. 'He's the father of the whole shebang,' says Harryhausen who saw King Kong for the first time at the tender age of thirteen. 'In 1933 I innocently walked into Grauman's Chinese Theatre in Hollywood, and haven't been the same since.'

He has seen the film over a hundred times. 'I couldn't resist it. Every time it was reissued I'd go with two friends, Ray Bradbury and Forry Ackerman, to see it and other Merian Cooper pictures like She and The Last Days of Pompeii. That was our staple diet, because they had an imagination to them. They weren't the mundane subject matter so prevalent at the time.'

Kong is still a classic of composite photography and animation. The concept of leading you from the mundane world into the utmost pangs of fantasy is really remarkable because the structure of the script built your credulity into accepting the most fantastic images on the screen.

O'Brien used Gustav Doré as his guide. If you look, you'll see a lot of Paradise Lost and the various other books he illustrated. Doré had a sense of drama in his engravings. A lot of people have forgotten him because the abstract came into fashion and anything representational went out. There's a great deal of Doré in King Kong, and in The Most Dangerous Game, as well.'

But Harryhausen's interest in fantastic movies started much earlier than Kong. 'In 1923, when I was three or four, my parents took me to see The Lost World. Then of course I grew up on pictures like Metropolis, and there were movies in the silent days I could trace back as influences on my later work.'

At school, he built three-dimensional models in clay, and came to enjoy working with his

THE MAN, THE MYTHS AND THE MODELS

His startling animation techniques brought the monsters out of the closet and onto the cinema screen. Now Ray Harryhausen's achievements are on show at London's Museum of the Moving Image. FEAR's Stan Nicholls went along for a personal tour of the exhibits, and talked to the man behind the models.

hands. 'I made dioramas of prehistoric scenes,' he recalls, 'having always admired Charles Knight's restorations of prehistoric life at the American Museum of Natural History in New York.'

Inspired by King Kong, he saw a way of making his dioramas move. 'I took my mother's fur coat, which she kindly donated against her will, and used it to make a furry cave bear with a wooden armature in it. Then I borrowed a 16mm camera from a friend. I was so hypnotised by these models moving by themselves I just kept going on and on. That first primitive experiment finally developed into a profession.'

Harryhausen has been approached several times to remake Kong, but he has always turned the chance down. 'A classic like that shouldn't be remade. The best you could do would be to imitate the original.' Nor is he enthusiastic about the recent colourised version. 'I couldn't believe it, it's frightening. I heard they are also going to colourise Mighty Joe Young. I don't mind them colourising a Laurel and Hardy or a musical - they could be nice colourised, perhaps. But I think it ruined the whole mystique of Kong which, apart from anything else, was lit for black-and-white purposes.'

DYNAMATION

Harryhausen's first professional break came when George Pal made his Puppetoons and Madcap Models shorts for Paramount. 'We turned out six ten minute subjects a year, and I did most of the animation for the early ones.' But he had been in touch with Willis O'Brien before that, when he was making War Eagles, and found his technique much more interesting than Pal's. 'Pal used individual figures to make one step,' he points out. 'You needed twenty-five separate figures for each movement, and that never appealed to me because it was pre-animation. The process O'Brien developed, where you have a single figure, is much more creative, with one pose leading to the next.'

He finally found the courage to show O'Brien some samples of his work, and was taken on as his assistant for Mighty Joe Young. 'To work with him, Merian Cooper and Ernest B Schoedsack, having seen King Kong and practically worshipping it to the point of being a fanatic, was a dream come true.'

In the event, he ended up doing about eighty-five per cent of the animation on Mighty Joe, as O'Brien was so tied up with the technical problems and preparing new set-ups.

The film won an Oscar in 1947, but this was probably as much in recognition of Kong, which had appeared before there was a category for special effects.

In 1952, Harryhausen directed the effects for The Beast From 20,000 Fathoms, based on a story by Bradbury. From here on, each of his features presented problems which stretched him a little further technically each time. In this one he perfected a technique for combining live action backgrounds with animated models. In Kong and Mighty Joe Young most of the scenery was painted on sheets of glass measuring eight by ten feet. It gave the films a unique quality of mystery and wonder, but was a very expensive process. We had four matte painters on Mighty Joe for almost a year, and they got a high salary. It cost an enormous amount of money to do it that way.

'So I devised a technique which we later called Dynamation, where you split the screen and insert the creature against a realistic background. It avoided building complicated miniature sets, or having big glass paintings. It was purely for economic reasons because we had to make these films on a reasonable budget.

SINBAD REFLOATED

His next project saw the beginning of an association with a producer, which was to last for over twenty years. 'I met Charles Schneer after The Beast From 20,000 Fathoms and he wanted to make a film showing an octopus pulling down the Golden Gate Bridge. That interested me because of the gigantism. So I went to work with him and we made It Came From Beneath the Sea'.

When Schneer formed Morningside Pictures, he began looking for subject matter and this gave Harryhausen the opportunity to reactivate a project first conceived some years before. 'I remember in my youth being so disappointed when Douglas Fairbanks Jr played Sinbad alongside Maureen O'Hara. They talked about the roc, they talked about the cyclops, but you never saw them. I wanted to see them! I swore I was going to put the fantasy element on the screen. So, after Mighty Joe Young, I did some drawings and a ten page outline for The Seventh Voyage of Sinbad, and took them all over Hollywood, but nobody wanted to know. None of the producers seemed to have any imagination.

Unfortunately, while I was trying to sell Seventh Voyage, Howard Hughes released Son of Sinbad with Little Sincere and Her Bosom Pals. She was a stripper and they had Dale Robertson, who usually played cowboys, as Sinbad, and Vincent Price as a so-called comedian. That laid a big egg and everybody said costume pictures were out. It wasn't until Charles Schneer realised there was something important in these drawings that we finally made Seventh Voyage. The film was brought in for around $650,000 and turned out to be a blockbuster.

ANIMATED ARGOSY

The technical breakthrough here was that the film was the first Dynamation subject to be shot in colour. Less happily, it fell foul of the British Board of Film Censors, which removed the classic skeleton scene and cut half the cyclops sequence.

The skeleton fight in Seventh Voyage, and the much more ambitious battle in Jason and the Argonauts, underline the impression that the hardest thing to animate is the human body, if only because we are so familiar with it.

Seventh Voyage was followed by The Three Worlds of Gulliver, which was originally intended as a musical vehicle for Danny Kaye, and later, Jack Lemmon. Harryhausen maintains the picture had a lot of values, but it was not a success. However, it brought him to England, where he was to make the rest of his films. 'Hollywood didn't have a proper travelling matte process, only the blue backing, which was prohibitively costly. We heard about the yellow backing process here and came over to make Gulliver and Mysterious Island. We had Rank laboratories do our processing work, and used yellow backing for both films. We decided to settle in this country and we've been here ever since.'

His next production, Jason and the Argonauts, seems to be everyone's favourite Harryhausen picture. 'I feel it's the most complete, and it pleases me the most. We had to manipulate the story a bit to make it dramatically sound, but it has all the creatures logically built in.'

He has been quoted as saying he would have liked the skeleton fight to have taken place at night. Was this an afterthought? 'Yes, but we may have got an X certificate if it had been at night. We got an X with the Seventh Voyage skeleton, as you know, and didn't want to get seven Xs for Jason. I guess it would have been a little more dynamic after night, but then again what's done is done, we can't change it now.'

He acknowledges the complexity of the scene, in which he had to cope with seven skeletons and three men. 'Each skeleton had five appendages, and every frame of film you had to move and keep them in synchronisation. You can't just move the arm - you have to move the arm, the body and the head at the same time in order to get a flow.' How did he keep track? 'You do it by sense, feeling and experience. I would keep a record of the live action, and know that when Jason or whoever swung their sword it would take ten frames, and I had to meet it at that point. But the actual animation I did freehand, without a record.'

SHAGGY DOG STORIES?

The innovation with First Men in the Moon was widescreen, which he had some apprehensions about. 'Someone once said the only use of CinemaScope was to photograph the Last Supper,' he jokes. 'Most of my technique is miniature projection, where you re-photograph an image that's projected on a little screen behind the animated characters. You can't do that with a long, thin picture. I had to redesign the whole movie, and make sure of travelling mattes. We had a great deal of travelling mattes in First Men in the Moon which we wouldn't ordinarily use.'

One Million Years BC, on the other hand, was a big hit. It also marked a radical departure for Hammer Films, though they needed no persuasion. 'They in fact approached me. I hated to do a remake, but on One Million BC, where they used men in dinosaur suits and lizards with fins glued on, I thought I could do much better. So I took it on and worked with Michael Carreras and Anthony Hinds, and we got a script out similar to the original.'

He refuses the criticism that there is no evidence that men and dinosaurs coexisted. 'That's nonsense. The whole essence of fantasy is 'What if?' They still haven't proven beyond doubt that man didn't live in the days of the dinosaurs. There is even the theory that we were planted on this earth by flying saucers. Which isn't so far fetched. It's as reasonable as being fashioned from the dust of the earth - which is symbolic, of course.'

'We're not making documentaries about the world and its vicissitudes, we're making entertainments that will please people for an hour and a half. If you want to combine man with dinosaurs, I see no reason why not. It's a fantasy.'

One Million BC was his only remake. The Valley of Gwangi, originally an abandoned Willis O'Brien project, doesn't count, but it was intended as a tribute to O'Brien even though he didn't get a screen credit. 'He started that in 1942, but it was called off because of the war. They didn't want to invest in a long term picture, so they made Little Orphan Annie instead.'

DUMMY RUNS

Following Giorgi, Harryhausen returned to the Arabian Nights with The Golden Voyage of Sinbad, the plot of which incorporated his interest in the supernatural. 'I believe there is a basis for the occult, as phenomena we are not acquainted with scientifically. I find it fascinating to put it into film form. For instance, the homunculus, as seen in The Golden Voyage of Sinbad, is purely an occult concept. Paracelsus was thought to have created a little humanoid figure out of mandrake root and various chemicals. There are all sorts of legends about homunculi. Devil Doll was based on that concept; Bride of Frankenstein had them, and they have always fascinated me.

'But you have to keep magic logical. That's why, in Golden Voyage, Koura the villain had limitations put on his powers. Many films give the magician latitude to do anything he wants. Well, in the first reel he could kill your hero. So we put restrictions on Koura by making him age every time he used his magic. He had to limit it, and it made him human.'

Clash of the Titans, Harryhausen's last and most costly film, also had the best cast of any of his features, including Lord Olivier, Sian Phillips and Burgess Meredith. Previously he had always felt he didn't need big name stars - 'Our stories were concerned with visuals rather than intellectual acting. Also, a lot of actors don't want to take a back seat to special effects. In the same way many actors won't play in a film where there's a child or a dog to steal the scene. To me, it would be a challenge, if I were an actor. I'd like to try upstaging a dummy!'

In any event, to Ray Harryhausen his models are characters as real as any actor, and on more than one occasion they have taken over. 'There is something about it. It grows, like a homunculus. You become fond of it and try to make it as realistic as possible. It's a study in synthetic movement, an exercise in creating artificial life. I have no God complex! But it's a kind of magic. When you see something like Medusa, with the snakes writhing in her hair, and shooting a bow and rattling her tail, it gives you the creeps. Because you don't quite know how that was achieved.'

CLEAN CUT

Amongst the projects he intended to make at one time was Conan, but it would have been quite different from the film that was finally made. 'We never saw Conan as just a big hulk wandering around slaughtering people. We wanted to make it with more emphasis on the fantastic, rather than the muscleman elements.' He also considered Food of the Gods and The Hobbit. 'Food of the Gods I would love to have made. I don't think The Hobbit was suitable, although a lot of people thought it was for us. On balance, it was better as a cartoon than it would have been as a dimensional model animation subject.'

Does he keep up with modern fantastic cinema? 'I try to. But although techniques have advanced a great deal, I feel the stories have disappeared and been replaced by just a series of happenings.'

In our films we kept the heroes clean-cut. In the Sixties, the anti-hero became prevalent, and I think that's why we are facing up to historians tackle this period of history, they will find we are going through another decadent period, what you might call a dark age. Films, being popular culture, reflect and encourage this.'

But we are unlikely to see further contributions to that popular culture from Ray Harryhausen. 'I've retired from making films,' he says, 'it takes too much out of my life. It was a religion with me in a sense and I just can't devote the time any more. I've made seventeen features and I've got to see my family, not spend another two years in a dark room putting a picture together, then have some critic say, 'Well, it wasn't very good.''

He doesn't regret things he didn't do, projects that never happened? 'I did practically

"Who wants to see Jack Nicholson puking on people in church? It's shocking, yes, but I wouldn't call it entertainment" crime today. We have no heroes to worship. We tried to have a hero, and not an anti-hero who beats up old ladies and takes lollipops away from children.

Films are getting more gory. Producers are scraping the bottom of the barrel in order to shock you out of your socks. Actors are even resorting to vomiting on each other. Who wants to see people going to the bathroom? Who wants to see conversations carried out in a urinal? Who wants to see Jack Nicholson puking on people in church? It's shocking, yes, it brings in tickets; but I wouldn't call it entertainment.

I think that one day, when everything I wanted to. There are a few things I'd like to do and, if the right script came along, maybe I'd fall for it. But I don't know. At the moment I'm doing a lot of travelling to exotic places I've always wanted to visit, and I enjoy going to conventions and talking to young people. They seem to have a great regard for our films and it's fun discussing them.'

Ray Harryhausen's exhibition, Creatures of Fantasy, runs at the Museum of the Moving Image until April 1990. His Film Fantasy Scrapbook is published by Titan Books at £8.95.

Titan Books have repackaged Ray Harryhausen - Film Fantasy Scrapbook, last seen in 1981, at £8.95. It's basically a collection of black and white film stills and sketches covering all the films he has been involved in, with his own commentary on each enterprise.

Lacking a more comprehensive overview of the master's work, this 142-page (including eight pages of colour) is worth a look. It's a pity, however, that no one bothered to date the projects clearly!

ONE MAN'S MEAT

Cannibal films have a surprisingly prolific history which dates back to the early days of silent cinema. But today, fictional images of cannibalism are viewed with fear and loathing by the guardians of public decency. At what point did the old-fashioned jungle movie turn into a serious threat to morality? In the first of two articles, Julian Petley looks at the most controversial of all the sub-genres of the horror film.

In the early days of video, long before the Video Recordings Act, Go Video produced a particularly gruesomely packaged tape entitled Cannibal Holocaust. The cover promised 'The Ultimate Terror Movie' and featured a lurid painting of what purported to be a cannibal with a bloody hunk of human flesh between its teeth. Hardly surprisingly perhaps, Cannibal Holocaust was soon the subject of complaints to the Advertising Standards Authority, and by July 1982 this particular video, along with Driller Killer, I Spit On Your Grave, Death Trap and 55 Experiment Camp was being proceeded against by the Director of Public Prosecutions in the first of the famous 'video nasty' cases.

For many people, even horror fans, Cannibal Holocaust (a 1979 production directed by Ruggero Deodato) was the first indication that there was actually any such thing as a cannibal movie. By the end of the Seventies, of course, flesh-eating zombies had become quite a familiar part of the cinematic scene, thanks mainly to George Romero; but there's a big difference between zombies and cannibals.

For however realistic the make-up or plausible the storyline, we always know deep down that zombies are purely creatures of the imagination. But what about cannibals? Might they not still exist in some far flung parts of the world? And doesn't Cannibal Holocaust have an uncomfortably documentary look about it? Indeed, couldn't this be an example of the dreaded 'Snuff Movie'?

In fact, although the first cannibal movie proper (Deep River Savages, Umberto Lenzi, 1972) had not been released in cinemas in the UK, several others had already appeared as films here before the brouhaha over the video of Cannibal Holocaust. These were Prisoner of the Cannibal God (Sergio Martino, 1978), Emanuelle and the Last Cannibals (Joe D'Amato, 1977) and Cannibal, Deodato's 1976 forerunner to Cannibal Holocaust. However, all of these had been heavily cut by the British censor, and it was not until video came along (before it too was censored) that British audiences experienced the full force of what might be called the Italian Third World cannibal film, perhaps the most controversial of all the sub-genres of the horror movie.

DARK CONTINENT

Yet, for all the vituperation heaped on Cannibal Holocaust and its kind, it can be argued that these films are not quite as 'other' as their critics would like to make out, and that they share all sorts of characteristics with much more 'respectable', even 'classic', films, both past and present. In particular, they relate very closely to the whole tradition of 'jungle exotics', the most famous examples of which are the King Kong and Tarzan films.

As Steve Bissette points out in his excellent article on cannibal films in The Deep Red Horror Handbook, these are 'firmly rooted in the British and American exploration/adventure genre of literature and film. It is a tradition that began with the publication of the sensational newspaper reports, journals and autobiographies (usually embellished considerably for dramatic impact) that documented the exploration of the 'dark continents' of Africa, South America and Malaysia. Exotic and dangerous locales, fauna and peoples were essential ingredients and cannibals (mythical and genuine) were most terrible and thrilling of all. Given the prevalent notions of 'the white man's supremacy', religion and colonialism, these thrilling accounts of exploration usually involved extreme subjugation and exploitation of the native tribal people and the wildlife.'

Little changed with these stories' transition from page to screen, and as the historian of black cinema Thomas Cripps puts it in his book Slow Fade to Black: 'of all the genres, jungle movies were most spoiled by vestigial racism'

Cannibalism crops up in the cinema as early as 1908 in the Biograph comedy King of the Cannibal Islands, and in episodes of Tarzan the Tiger (1930) and Tarzan the Fearless (1933) as well as the feature The Capture of Tarzan: Tarzan Escapes (1936). Other jungle exotics which played on the horrific element in a manner that makes them precursors of the cannibal cycle include Jugugi (1930), Coona Coona (1932), Savage Gold (1933), Voodoo (1933), Uncivilised (1937), Budou (1938), Dark Rapture (1938), Five Came Back (1939), Wild Rapture (1950), Jungle Headhunters (1951), Karamoja (1954), Cannibal Attack (1954), Cannibal Island (1956), Back From Eternity (1956) and The Naked Prey (1966). This last film, an update of The Most Dangerous Game, in which Cornel Wilde is forced to flee for his life through the African jungle, most definitely prefigures the horrific odysseys which give most of the cannibal films their distinctive narrative structure.

It's perhaps also worth noting that cannibalism crops up, in a very respectable cultural context, in Joseph Mankiewicz's film of Tennessee Williams' play Suddenly Last Summer (in which a homosexual is hacked to death and eaten on the stones of a Spanish pagan temple by a gang of young beggars), and that for many years it was only under the guise of 'exotics' that any form of screen nudity was allowed, witness the famous fertility dance in Zulu. A similar exemption applied to magazines, which undoubtedly helped to explain the success of the famous National Geographic.

"These films provoked charges of gross voyeurism, of revelling in what they purported to condemn, and of blatantly appealing to the lowest common denominator"

EXOTICA AND EROTICA

The other key precursor of the cannibal film was the cycle sparked off by Mondo Cane in 1961. This film, along with several of its successors, was the brainchild of Gualtiero Jacopetti and Franco Prosperi. The format was simple: a montage of bizarre and sometimes horrific events from around the world, with the accent on exotic locales, violence to human beings and animals alike and, of course, sex. Not unnaturally these films provoked charges of gross voyeurism, of revelling in what they purported to condemn, and of blatantly appealing to the lowest common denominator in audiences. More serious criticisms still were laid at the door of one of the most interesting off-shoots of the cycle, Africa Addio (1965).

In the early Sixties Jacopetti and Proserpi spent some considerable time in Africa examining the changing, and often violent, face of the continent. The footage they compiled was nothing if not controversial, including several scenes of actual killing. When the film was released, several UN delegates from African countries felt moved to protest, and the directors were accused of, at best, not trying to stop some of the horrors they had filmed and, at worst, of actually participating in them. Jacopetti, Proserpi and their spawn are also quite clearly the subject of the 1967 Italian feature The Savage Eye, aptly described by Variety as 'a strange, sometimes exciting but generally disconcerting behind-the-scenes glimpse of a feature-documentary maker at work which at times falls prey to the very footage it wants to attack and debunk, namely the out-of-context glimpses of exotica and erotica in various lands, or the restaging – with apt exaggeration – of sensation-rousing things and events.' Ten years later, exactly the same criticism would be levelled at Cannibal Holocaust.

A film which was not actually intended to be part of the Mondo cycle, but which was distributed and exhibited in such a way as to cash in on it, was The Sky Above – The Mud Below (1960), a French documentary epic about a thousand-mile journey across the uncharted interior of the former the cannibal genre on account of its setting (the aerial shots of vast tracts of jungle are especially premonitory) and its endurance-test aspects.

TRIBAL RITUALS

Other serious movies around this time which featured the cannibal theme were Pasolini's Pigssty (1969), in which a bizarre medieval figure kills and eats travellers in a bleak volcanic landscape, and Don Santos' How Tasty Was My Little Frenchman (1971), a remarkable Brazilian black comedy set in the sixteenth century which uses the cannibal theme as a means of making an oblique comment about cultural difference and imperialism. Less serious, but undeniably 'arty' (the director, Barbet Schroeder, had produced films by Jean-Luc Godard and Eric

Dutch New Guinea. According to the Monthly Film Bulletin 'as an account of sustained and exceptional privation voluntarily endured, the film certainly lives up to its title. Its chief value, however, is geographical and anthropological; it reveals vast landscapes almost untouched by man, and the customs of Stone Age societies of pygmies, cannibals and head-hunters, many of whom had never before seen white people.' Far less sensational or voyeuristic than any Mondo movie (although let down by a crass commentary) the film does nonetheless prefigure

'It's one of the genre's unpleasant tricks to place scenes of real cruelty to animals in the same context as faked cruelty to humans, with the deliberate aim of making the latter seem more 'realistic' by association''

Rohmer) was The Valley (1972), in which, to the accompaniment of a Pink Floyd soundtrack, a group of chic Parisian boulevard hippies traverse the wilds of New Guinea in search of a mythical valley paradise. Admittedly there is no actual cannibalism, but tribal rituals abound, and for all its Shangri-La overtones, the representation of New Guinea has something distinctly threatening and disturbing about it.

Finally, in this brief excavation of the roots of the Italian Third World cannibal cycle, mention must be made of a Western made in 1970 – A Man Called Horse – in which Richard Harris, in an absurdly macho-masochistic role, plays an English Lord who is captured by the Sioux and undergoes a series of gruesome initiation ceremonies in order to become a member of the tribe. Most famous of these is the Sun Vow ritual in which he is suspended in mid-air from ropes inserted in his chest – a scene which finds an even more grisly and suspect reprise in Cannibal Ferox (Umberto Lenzi, 1981) in which a woman captured by cannibals is hung up by her breasts.

If A Man Called Horse is in many ways an even more gruelling reworking of The Naked Prey, then the first true Italian Third World cannibal movie, Deep River Savages (Umberto Lenzi, 1972) is really a remake of A Man Called Horse. The story of an English explorer and photographer, Bradley, who is captured by a tribe living on the contemporary Thailand/Burma border, treated as a freak but eventually accepted by them (after, of course, various unpleasant initiation ceremonies), it stars Ivan Rassimov and Me Me Lai, both of whom were to become regular fixtures of the genre, like the director. It is also significant that Bradley is an avid photographer – this both looks back to the Mondo cycle and forward to the rest of the cannibal genre in which, as we shall see, reporters, journalists and filmmakers absolutely abound.

UNPLEASANT TRICKS

What distinguishes Deep River Savages from all that has gone before, however, (and it's certainly not the direction, which is dull and pedestrian) are the numerous scenes of clearly un-simulated cruelty to animals and the ferocity (presumably simulated) of the scenes of cruelty – including cannibalism – to human beings. The film's introductory titles state that 'even though some of the rites and ceremonies shown are perhaps gruesome they are portrayed as they are actually carried out'. However, it's one of the genre's unpleasant tricks to place scenes of real cruelty to animals in the same context as faked cruelty to humans, with the deliberate aim of making the latter seem more 'realistic' by association. Human scenes include a tongue being cut out and a widow being forced to have ritual sex in the ashes of her husband's funeral pyre, whilst animal indignities include a duel between a snake and a mongoose, a cock fight, a monkey having the top of its head chopped off and its brains scooped out and eaten, a snake cut in half, and the skinning of a live crocodile.

Given all this brutality, real or faked, it comes as no little surprise to learn, some twenty minutes into the film, that Bradley is not actually in the clutches of cannibals at all, and that these live further up the river, frequently terrorising Bradley's captors. Inevitably the cannibals eventually appear, killing and eating one of the female members of the tribe, and finally setting fire to the whole village. In fact, the scenes of cannibalism are pretty brief, if gruesome, and filmed in a particularly dull, flat manner, but they decisively set the pattern for later films in the genre (indeed Lenzi himself re-used them in Eaten Alive, 1980).

The cannibals are filthy, grotesque, almost sub-human, and utterly bereft of any redeeming human qualities – they seem to lack even a language. In other words, they are what in previous times would have been called 'savages'. The genre's residual racism is underlined by Bradley's remark to Me Me Lai (who plays the tribeswoman he marries) that 'you think you love me but you haven't yet learned what love really means', by his calling his new born son a 'little black savage', and, of course, by the very title of the film itself. It's also worth pointing out, in the light of the following films, that there is already apparent here an unpleasantly sexual quality to the scenes of cannibalism; not only is the victim a woman, but we also see her breast being sliced off and eaten. The fact that the whole enterprise is spiced up with soft core sex scenes of Rassimov and Lay romping in the jungle serves only to make it all the more distasteful and dubious. But this, too, is a portent of things to come (most notably in Emanuelle and the Last Cannibals, Joe D'Amato, 1977). However, what Deep River Savages does not prepare us for is just how effective the genre can be in the hands of a director such as Ruggero Deodato.

Before we go on to look at his work, and other examples of the genre, in the next issue, it's important to note that the cycle was also helped into life by a real-life incidence of cannibalism. This occurred in the Andes in 1972, when the survivors of an air crash were forced to live off the flesh of the dead until they were eventually rescued. Almost inevitably, a film was made out of this event (although in Mexico, not in Italy). This was Survive! (1976), by exploitation hack Rene Cardona Sr. The same year Deodato made Cannibal which, as we shall see, took the nascent genre to new heights – or depths – depending on your point of view.

MEMOIRS FOR A SPACE AGE

J G Ballard is one of the most highly acclaimed authors of our age. In work spanning SF, fantasy, horror and reality he charts the course of our short histories, but portrays characters and situations that belong to all times and places. In this, the first instalment of a rare two-part interview, he talks to David Pringle about the science, mysticism and politics behind his fictions.

which can reflect the real sources of human behaviour far more accurately than the social chit-chat you get in mainstream fiction.

I take the standpoint of modern neuro-science: the world that presents itself to our senses – this room, the streets we drive down – is in fact a ramshackle construct that our brains have devised to allow us to move around more or less successfully in our tasks of maintaining ourselves and reproducing our species. One needs to dismantle this ramshackle construct in order to understand what is actually going on. The apparent visual space we occupy does not actually coincide with the optical reality. The brain warps a large part of the data that strikes the retina. For example, shadows are in reality far deeper than they appear to us; the brain softens out the sharp contrasts that exist between light and dark spaces in order to be able to analyse the physical environment more clearly – otherwise it would be a mass of zebra stripes. Our consciousness is an elaborate artifact constructed by the central nervous system to make both the internal and external environments negotiable. These are complex neuro-psychological devices, and one needs to analyse them, insofar as it is possible to do by the imagination, to try and grasp what is going on.

“The present day equivalents of haunted castles are psychiatric hospitals; the blade-tipped pendulum has given way to the scalpel in the neurosurgeon’s fingers”

In my stories Myths of the Near Future, Memories of the Space Age and New From the Sun, I was doing just that – analysing what our sense of time plays for us. It may be that time is a neuro-psychological structure we’ve inherited from the distant past along with other no longer needed organs, like the appendix and the little toe. We are, to some extent, trapped by this archaic structure of our day-to-day sense of time, which limits our perception of a much larger world. Once we get away from our sense of serial time horror fiction is strictly Edgar Allan Poe and W W Jacobs and Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde.

DP: Would you consider yourself a writer of horror stories?

JGB: You could say Crash is on the edges of horror fiction. I take it that, in horror fiction, the horrific effects are the object of the exercise. In the Gothic novel the clanking chains and creaking drawbridges and whistling pendulums are the object; the chill of terror and fear is the whole purpose. Whereas in a book like Crash I’m not out to make the blood run cold: I’m trying to look at the eroticism of the car crash and the way modern technology has infiltrated our minds, taken over a large part of our imaginations and created a world of very different values.

I’ve never thought of myself as a writer of horror. When you’re dealing with a sensational subject matter, where you’re showing radical changes with people making sudden discoveries about the reality of their lives in dramatic circumstances, where people are being plagued by intense mental crises (as they are in a lot of my fiction), you’re getting into an area close to horror fiction. The main props of the classic tale of terror were haunted castles and alike. The present day equivalents of haunted castles are psychiatric hospitals; the blade-tipped pendulum has given way to the scalpel in the neurosurgeon’s fingers. It’s not the evil potion in a dusty bell-jar that frightens us now, it’s the contents of the hypodermic syringe, and the needle that may not be too clean. The props have changed. There are sudden glimpses of the shocking and unspeakable in my fiction too, so there is a certain overlap.

WARP FACTOR

DP: You once wanted to be a doctor. How has that affected your imagination?

JGB: My interest in medicine runs through all my fiction. I make use of the medical studies I did as a way of trying to get at the truth about our physical selves and our mental behaviour – I intended originally to be a psychiatrist. We all have a very conventionalised view of our own bodies and minds, and yet we are entirely the creatures of our central nervous systems. Most novelists describe characters exclusively in terms of their sensibilities, their highest levels of consciousness, their social relationships and attitudes, but I think it’s important to try and see all this within a larger frame – the frame of the central nervous system –

James Graham Ballard (born 15 November, 1930 in Shanghai, China) is one of the best known British SF writers, and is also celebrated for his war novel Empire of the Sun (1984), filmed two years ago by Steven Spielberg. His most recent books are the novel The Day of Creation (Gollancz, 1987), about a man who becomes obsessed with a newly sprung river in Central Africa, and the novella Running Wild (Hutchinson, 1988), which concerns a shocking Thames Valley massacre. Ballard has also recently published a collection of short stories called Memories of the Space Age (Arkham House), atmospheric tales of an abandoned Cape Canaveral in the near future.

HORROR HAS A PLACE

DP: Have you read any modern horror – Stephen King, for example?

JGB: I enjoyed Clive Barker’s WeaveWorld. He gave me a copy, and it was a pleasure to read.

“I know nothing about the world of horror. My reading of horror fiction is strictly Edgar Allan Poe and W W Jacobs and Dr Jekyll and Mr Hyde”

He’s an engaging, lively character. I liked him enormously – very lucid and intelligent and simpatico. But, I’m afraid, apart from the Barker, I’ve read almost nothing. No, I haven’t read Stephen King, though I enjoyed the TV movie of Salem’s Lot. I thought that was well done, but then I enjoyed the Omen films too. I know nothing about the world of horror. My reading of into, say, some more complex notion of time – time perceived as a simultaneity – we are beginning to reach the threshold of a larger mental consciousness of the kind that's perceived by mystics and by ordinary people during moments of revelation or at times of great crisis as in, say, near death experiences. I take that standpoint, and I try to pursue it in my fiction – even in something like this novella that's just come out, Rimming Wild. There I'm looking at the behaviour of these brainwashed children, as a group of laboratory specimens exposed (if you like) to sensory deprivation. My interest in medicine and the sciences is largely because I see them as the best tools for dismantling conventionalised reality.

"It's not the evil potion in a dusty bell-jar that frightens us now, it's the contents of the hypodermic syringe, and the needle that may not be too clean"

TUNNEL VISION

DP: Are you interested in near death experiences?

JGB: I've never undergone one, though everybody who has suffered from nightmares or been through periods of fever has had experiences slightly similar. All I know is what I've read. Recently in New Scientist there was a fascinating article on the neuro-psychological basis of near death experiences, and why people going through them seem to pass through tunnels. It was explained on the basis of the fading input of visual data to the optical cortex, and the way the desperate brain, slightly deprived of oxygen, is scanning its collapsing field of vision and then generating from this faltering stream of data its own illusionist space to compensate. The brain tends to construct out of concentric rings of cells in the visual cortex the illusion of a tunnel, and so on.

Various other aspects of the visual phenomena, the apparent distance of the dying person from himself, can all be explained in neuro-psychological terms. Under extreme pressure, the various centres in the brain which organise a coherent view of the world begin to break down. If they're being starved of input they begin to construct these artificial structures or entities – out of which come our very extraordinary visions of heaven and hell, and almost everything else besides. So many of our most moving experiences – emotional, visionary, religious – can be attributed to that.

FALL OF AN EMPIRE

DP: Did the Spielberg film of Empire of the Sun bring any more complaints from those women who were in Lunghua camp at the same time as you, and who were unhappy with your account in the book?

JGB: They protest about the film, but many of them were even younger than I was at the time... Western entrepreneurs – bankers, businessmen and manufacturers – built Shanghai, which became a vast metropolis. By the 1930s it had a population of about five million, which made it one of the largest cities in the world and a magnet to millions of poverty-stricken people fleeing the wars and famines of China.

"Our consciousness is an elaborate artifact constructed by the central nervous system to make both the internal and external environments negotiable"

Tens of thousands of peasants and members of the Shanghai working class perished every year. They died in droves from malnutrition, from untreated cholera, smallpox, typhoid. Every day a fleet of trucks would tour the city, collecting the bodies of people who were lying dead in the street. When I went to school as a boy I would regularly pass bodies in the gutter. I would see coffins decked with flowers, these small coffins which would hold a dead child. Now the Westerners – my parents included – who created the city, felt no responsibility for these things. Remember there was no welfare state, no dole, no national health service: if you fell to the Shanghai sidewalks in a faint from hunger, you'd lie there until you died. It was the most brutal and cruel city – as well as being an extraordinarily vital and exciting place.

The downside was this Darwinian struggle to survive that my parents' generation felt absolutely no responsibility for. And, of course, any criticism you make of it immediately comes up against the sort of reactions that these ladies have displayed: 'What on earth is he talking about? We were not responsible for this'. But they or people like them created the situation in which these appalling events took place. I was brought up in a well-to-do Western enclave which enjoyed an enormously high standard of living, cheek to jowl with appalling poverty and suffering. I was aware of the irony then, as a boy. My parents and all the European and American adults had completely closed their eyes to reality. But Shanghai was created by the West. So all these people take a very dim view of my apparent criticisms of the British.

DP: To be fair, they're not so much talking about the situation in Shanghai, but of your treatment of the camp: they say you've exaggerated that.

JGB: I'm not so sure. What I did was conflate the experiences of my own camp with those of other camps in the Far East, to convey the general atmosphere of what it was like in a civilian camp. In many respects what I show – not just in the camp, but in life in Shanghai as a whole during and after the war – is much less brutal than the reality. Anyway, the point is that Empire of the Sun is a novel, and I tried to reach some sort of imaginative truth.

Just as Robert Bloch seems to be best known as 'the author of Psycho', so Richard Laymon looks set to find himself tagged as 'the author of The Cellar'. Still, that's no bad thing: when it was published nearly a decade ago, Laymon's first novel sold over 300,000 copies in the United States alone.

The man who created all manner of horrors for his fictional Beast House (and came in for a fair amount of flak for the book's pederasty, bestiality and, of course, 'a certain peculiarity of the creature's anatomy') is finally poised to enter the big league alongside such writers as his close friend Dean R Koontz. But Richard Laymon has had to work long and hard to reach this prestigious position. Through no fault of his own, his literary career stumbled and nearly collapsed after the runaway success of The Cellar in 1980. Now, however, he's back – and on top form too.

"I am very fond of old, tacky amusement parks. I find them sleazy, spooky and exotic"

Richard Carl Laymon was born in Chicago, Illinois, on 14 January, 1947. 'I seem to be the exception to the rule that writers have miserable childhoods,' he says. 'I grew up in a suburb with terrific parents, an older brother named Bob who didn't spend all his time tormenting me, and a dog named Laddie who ate a light bulb when he was a puppy and survived it – which was, I suppose, my first experience of gore!'

Laymon always wanted to write, and made his first attempts at fiction when just seven or eight years old. 'I used to write novels in secret after school,' he confesses. 'I was about eleven or so when my first effort, a poem, was published in a school magazine. It was a Kipling imitation about a sailor who ran into all kinds of trouble but never lost his head – until he was ship-wrecked on a desert island and met the natives, that was. Then he lost his head – quite literally!'

THE CELLARMAN

As a teenager at Redwood High School in Larkspur, California, Richard took creative writing courses and garnered his first rejection slip with a vignette about a soldier getting 'potted' by a sniper in Flanders' fields. 'It was modelled on Hemingway's In Our Times,' Laymon recalls, 'which is no big surprise, since Hemingway was probably the biggest influence on my writing career.'

Richard's education led to an MA in English Literature from Loyola University, Los Angeles, and a lifetime teaching certificate for English and Library Science. In his spare time, however, he was beginning to make the first of many short fiction sales to magazines such as Ellery Queen, Alfred Hitchcock, Mike Shayne, Cavalier and Gallery.

After one year in his first job, 'attempting to teach English to ninth-grade hoodlums at a Catholic girls' school in downtown L.A.', he moved on to become a library assistant at Mount St Mary's College and later John Adams Junior High School in Santa Monica.

It was while working as Head Librarian at John Adams that he wrote and sold The Cellar. Although his previous stories had all been mysteries, horror had been a dominant influence on his work ever since his parents allowed him to stay up late one night to watch Boris Karloff in Frankenstein.

'In any case,' Laymon continues, 'crime and horror often have similar plot structure. Mayhem has been committed; the protagonists find themselves in jeopardy; after chases, narrow escapes and assorted blood-lettings, the perpetrator is identified and stopped just in time to bring about a sometimes cheery ending. In my own case, I frequently use policemen as main characters. This seems natural to me since cops are the people who would most logically have to deal with problems involving violent death.'

Another reason why Laymon's books generally stick to this formula is that the author is not overly fond of the occult and supernatural plot devices. 'I prefer to keep things more down-to-earth. Oh sure, I've employed a number of beasts and black magic curses, but most of my stories actually focus on the adventures of rather screwy, malevolent humans and the torments they hope to visit upon my protagonists.'

LIGHTS OUT

Inspired by The Cellar's success, Laymon quit work to write full time. 'A job is always an odious necessity for a writer. If he can make ends meet by writing, he's wasting his time working for other people. Of course, it's a gamble, and in my case it resulted in a couple of years of

KEEP THE CAMPFIRES BURNING

Horror is the forerunner of all types of fiction, according to author Richard Laymon. Primitive tribes people gathered around camp fires to tell tales of evil spirits, carnivorous creatures and violent death. Now the author of The Cellar, Flesh and the recently released Funhouse tosses another log onto the flames for FEAR's David Whitehead.

hard times, but I certainly don't regret it. I got to spend four years at home with my wife Ann and my daughter Kelly, and wrote a lot of books which are now paying off.

However, his next 'nasty' novel, The Woods Are Dark (1981), failed to enjoy the success of its predecessor. 'The cover that my American publisher, Warner Books, put on Woods didn't really do much to make people reach out and buy it. I mean, based on the cover, even I wouldn't have bought it.'

As the book didn't sell well, his following novel, Out Are the Lights (1982) received poor distribution, and thereafter he found himself in the curious position of being an American author writing American horror stories which, though selling well in England and France, weren't being published in America.

Laymon managed to pay the bills by selling another suspense novel aimed at young adults, Nightmare Lake (again under the Carl Laymon pseudonym). He even penned a western for Dell Books: Making America saga. The Laymen was published under the house name of Lee Davis Willoughby.

CLASSIC LITERATURE

Despite these occasional departures from style and theme, however, Laymon was always pleased to get back to horror. 'I've never really had the urge to write anything else. I guess I'm just drawn to the bizarre. Some people think of the horror story as cheap, tawdry and brutish entertainment - the lowest form of literature - but I believe the opposite to be true. In fact, I think it quite likely that all literature is descended from the horror story. After all, the very first yarns, told around campfires long before man could write, were probably stories of monsters, evil spirits,

"I've employed a number of beasts and black magic curses, but most of my stories actually focus on the adventures of rather screwy, malevolent humans" encounters with the living dead and various other things that go bump in the night. Such tales are told even today.

Anyone who doubts the primacy of horror as a literary form needs only to read the classics of English Literature - Beowulf, Chaucer and Shakespeare for starters. They're loaded with beasts, ghosts, witches and gore.'

So, indeed, were Laymon's next few books, Night Show (1984), Beware!, Allhallow's Eve (both 1985), and a sequel to The Cellar entitled The Beast House (1986), which all saw first publication in Europe.

After four years as a full time

"Anyone who doubts the primacy of horror as a literary form needs only to read the classics of English Literature - Beowulf, Chaucer and Shakespeare for starters" writer, Laymon regrettably went back to work as an office temp, and it was while writing reports for a law firm specialising in personal injury defence work that Tor gave him another chance to crack the American market by purchasing Night Show and Tread Softly (1987, published in the UK under the pseudonym Richard Kelly).

The timing could not have been better, for the third book in Laymon's comeback was to prove his strongest to date. In fact, Flesh (1987), a chilling tale of cannibalism not dissimilar to David Cronenberg's 1975 film Shivers, was so highly regarded that the Science Fiction Chronicle named it Best Horror Novel of 1988, and the Horror Writers of America nominated it for the prestigious Bram Stoker Award.

TROLLING

Laymon's biggest strength is that he is able to provide lighthearted fun and disturb at the same time, as his next Richard Kelly novel, The Midnight's Lair and Resurrection Dreams (both 1988) amply testify.

His latest book, Funland, is all the more disturbing because it has its basis in fact. 'Santa Cruz is a rather artsy community on the California coast south of San Francisco. Along one of its beaches is a boardwalk with an old, tacky amusement park. Now, I am very fond of old, tacky amusement parks. I find them sleazy, spooky and exciting. But when I visited Santa Cruz several years ago with my wife and daughter, we were constantly being confronted by filthy, crazed beggars. They seemed to be everywhere. The citizens there called them 'trolls'.

Laymon's wife found a newspaper clipping which brought the so-called 'sport' of 'trolling' to his attention. 'Apparently, groups of teenagers were stalking these derelicts at night, beating them up and giving them rides out of town. And while some citizens denounced the practice, many more actually seemed to appreciate it. I mean, we actually saw signs condemning trolls and applauding the efforts of the trolls.'

Laymon is quick to stress that Boleta Bay, the fictional setting for Funland's gruesome action, is not based upon Santa Cruz, but it remains a matter of public record that a form of 'trolling' did take place there when he made his first visit. And even more unsettling is the fact that, on his last return trip to the coast: 'I didn't see a single troll.'

OUT OF THE BAG

Normally, Laymon writes about two and a half books each year, but because of various other commitments (including Night Visions 7, in which he shares space with Gary Brandner and Chet Williamson) his new novel, The Stake, took up the best part of a year.

The Stake is about a horror writer who discovers the withered body of a young woman with a stake through her heart. 'Someone apparently thought she was a vampire,' Richard teases. 'But is she?'

His UK publisher, W H Allen, purchased The Stake for a high five-figure sum, and no less than three publishing houses made bids for it when it went up for auction in America.

Laymon is slightly less willing to discuss his current project, which is known only as 'Untitled', but he is much more specific about his future beyond that. 'I want to continue giving my readers nightmares. Or at the very least a little chill. If possible, I want to keep them worried about what might be peering in at the window while they read.'

'A writer does not need to step outside the horror field in order to deal with any aspect of the human condition. A horror novel is like a big bag. Maybe it has a skull printed on the outside, but inside the bag is empty. The writer can stuff into it whatever he likes.

"I want to continue giving my readers nightmares. Or at the very least a little chill"

'I've never written a post-apocalyptic novel. The subject seems too dreary for my kind of fictional fun. But I know one thing for certain about those who survive the fall of civilisation. After the day is done, in the time before sleep comes, stories will be told around the dwindling cookfires. But they won't be love stories, or whodunnits, or westerns, or stories about space travel. Oh no! A maniacal glint comes into Richard Laymon's eyes. 'They'll be stories of monsters and demons,' he concludes, 'and things that go bump in the night.'

ABANDON REALITY

The world's first visionary fantasy art gallery, Abandon Art, is open and showing a range of work from big name artists.

Set up by Games Workshop cofounder Steve Jackson, Abandon Art's first exhibition features the fairytale dream world of Patrick Woodroffe, the heroic fantasies of Chris Achilleos, and visions of the far future from Jim Burns together with other superb work from Roger and Linda Garland, Ian Miller, Les Edwards, John Blanche, Iain McCaig and Terry Oakes.

The gallery is run by Catherine Outten and can be found at 16 King Street, Richmond, Surrey TW9 1ND. For more information on current artists call 01 940 9307.

SOMTOW DOES MOON DANCE

S P Somtow's first horror novel since the cult classic Vampire Junction is published in the US by Tor in hardback this month.

Moondance does for werewolves what that first book did for vampires. It tells the multi-generational story of the Lykanthropverein, a society of decadent Eastern European werewolves who, fleeing persecution in Austro-Hungary, emigrate to the American West during the gold rush and Red Indian wars.

The novel starts with a woman reporter trying to uncover the mysterious story of a schizophrenic killer whose life cuts across those involved in the werewolf uprising. Protagonists include Count Hartmut von Bacht-Wolfing, leader of the wolves, Scott Harper, a cavalry officer turned were-wolf, Cordwainer Claggart, snake oil merchant, circus impresario and serial killer, and the shapechanging Sioux Indians who dance the moon dance to renew the cycle of the earth.

A British publisher has yet to pick up the book and, until that happens, it can be obtained from Tor or, if you ask nicely, ordered through fantasy specialist shops in Britain.

NECROSCOPE SAGA CONTINUES

Brian Lumley, author of the Necroscope novels, is rapidly becoming one of the most internationally successful horror novelists.

His next book, Deadspook, continues the saga of the vampiric Wamphyri. The story again features Harry Kuogh, a man who is able to talk to the dead. Caught in a battle with the mighty Wamphyri, he loses his gift and is ignorant of the cries of the dead, who warn him that Janos Ferenczy, vampire and black magician, is resurrected and about to unleash his curse upon the world. Bereft of his powers, Harry must fight Janos or lose everything to chaos and death.

Deadspook will be published by Tor Paperbacks in August/September and will be available from Grafton in the UK at about the same time.

BLACK SUNDAY UPDATE

Northern film festival, Black Sunday, continues to build its impressive repertoire of movies. Organiser Malcolm Dalglish has added I Bought a Vampire Motorcycle to a list already heavy with big titles which include Anthony Hickox's Sundown, Stepfather 2, Society and Phantom of the Opera.

The bill is bound to be bigger come February showtime at venues in Manchester and Glasgow. Ticket information can be obtained from Black Sunday, 70 Thatch Leach Lane, Whitefields, Manchester M25 6EW.

MORE HAUNTED VISIONS

Visionary and author Leilah Wendell is following her last novel, The Book of Azrael, with a compendium of metaphysical poetry and art.

Shadows in the Hall Light includes fifty photo-collages, drawings and paintings, coupled with verse and prose. Publisher Westgate Press describes it as 'A visual companion to The Book of Azrael, but one need not be familiar with that book.' It can be obtained mail order from Westgate Press (US), 8 Bernstein Blvd, Centre Moriches, New York 11934, USA or from Gazelle Book Services Ltd, Falcon House, Queen Square, Lancaster, LA1 1RN.

UNION HACK

NO TO HELLGATE!

Our review and the ad for New World Video's Hellgate has caused a stir: in short, politics rears its ugly head, and FEAR has been asked to print the following statement. The facts below were news to us, and should be news to you...

TO THE READERS OF FEAR, FROM IMAGE ANIMATION PLC

Following the recent press campaign and various misinformed reviews of the film Hellgate, I would like you to know that Image Animation PLC had nothing to do with the creation of the make-up or visual effects on this production.

When Hellgate was offered to us a large section of the crew, including myself, did not want to work on it as the film was to shoot in South Africa, and our political views regarding apartheid made it impossible for us to even consider working on this film. A report on the Media Show last year and an editorial by John Gilbert served to highlight the poor conditions under which the largely non-white crew were working, justification, if any were needed, for our stand. It was decided then, by the directors of IA, that the company would have no involvement with this production.

However, some personnel who have worked for Image Animation on both Heltraiser and Hellbound did work on this film, setting up their own effects unit in another private workshop. It appears to be they who have been getting this rather mis-directed credit.

With the film's release on video we have been seeing the full-page ads, like the one in FEAR which, although the wording is in one sense correct, are deliberately misleading and could, we feel, damage Image Animation's good name or even the personal reputations of those members of the crew who chose not to work on Hellgate.

The producers of Hellgate have already been contacted regarding this flagrant misuse of our previous credits and we will be contacting our lawyers regarding this latest incident.

HOLLYWOOD - THE FINAL FINANCIAL FRONTIER

DATELINE: New York City, December 1989

The Sony Corporation's buy out of Columbia Pictures for roughly three quarters of a billion dollars on 26 November last year will have serious repercussions for the industry as a whole. The $200 million Sony paid for Batman producers Peter Guber's and Jon Peters' production company, Guber-Peters Entertainment (part of the deal was to install the mavericks as studio heads) has left all other studio heads feeling insignificant. The result? Higher executive costs and higher fees for top directors, writers and actors. The bottom line? Production costs will soar and the disparity between independent, low budget pictures and even mid-level studio movies will widen. In the face of such a situation, is there any hope for the independents other than video?

The reason why the Japs paid so much for Columbia, one of Hollywood's least successful studios, is simple: everyone wants a slice of the Tinseltown pie, which has grown to gigantic proportions over the last ten years. 1988 saw a box office record of $4.38 billion. According to the New York Times, by late November, box office grosses were running over $500 billion.

All of this great news for the Gubers and Peters of the business, and even for the lowest paid studio executive. But it means novice directors and writers who have to cut their teeth in the independent sector will have less of a chance to prove themselves in the face of such competition. And this is also true of the situation in publishing.

With advances reaching immense proportions (eg the $5 million paid to Thomas Harris for his next two books) it means that first time novelists have little chance of achieving respectable sales, as they have no back list to support them and little money for promotion. If a publisher pays an advance of £75,000 for a book, then at least the same again will be spent on promotion. For a company to break even the book must then sell at least 100,000 copies. As an insider at W H Allen was recently quoted as saying: 'The difference between lead titles and mid list books is astonishing. Most mid list books are lucky if they sell around 3,000 copies, as all efforts are being concentrated on the leads.' Before money mania gripped the entertainment industry, publishers played a waiting game, allowing authors to build up a steady following with each successive book. Now everyone wants overnight success to mean sums in the region of £175,000.

BOOK OF THE DEAD 2

After years of being told that anthologies don't sell, 1989 saw the publication of more short story collections than any other year. Now 1990-91 is shaping up to be an even richer harvest for the lover of short fiction with at least twelve collections already in the works and several others waiting in the wings.

One of last year's most successful anthologies was the Skipp & Spector-edited zombie volume Book of the Dead, which sold out most of its 125,000 print run within a couple of months of publication.

Consequently, Book of the Dead 2 is currently in the works and, according to John Skipp, the response has been overwhelming.

'When Craig and I first came up with the idea back in 1987 we were delighted with the immediate reaction we got. George A Romero was sceptical about the project (Romero did the introduction to the book) but it seemed everyone had a zombie story they wanted to tell. But since we put out the word on Book of the Dead 2 things have got crazy. Clive (Barker) has said he really wants to do a story for us, Mick Garris is currently working on one, Gahan Wilson wants to do one, Richard Christian Matheson's promised us a new tale - a whole bunch of people. So far we've got a totally wired story from Marc Arnold, who wrote Pilgrims to the Cathedral for Dave Schow's Silver Scream anthology, a really great story from Elizabeth Massey, and a heavy one about sex, drugs and zombie snuff cults from Nancy Collins, who wrote the vampire novel Sunglasses After Dark.

Arnold's Silver Scream contribution was one of that volume's wildest tales and Skipp has high praise for the writer. 'Marc's Book of the Dead story poses some editorial problems because there are so many great ideas flying around in there. He's got this amazing talent for filling his short stories with more concepts than you usually find in a novel.'

Other potential contributors include Angela Carter, Thomas Harris, Dean Koontz and Dennis Etchison.

Books being assembled at the moment include Hot Blood 2 (Jeff Gelb), Boarderlands 1 and 2 (Thomas F Monteleone), Dangerous Women and Blood Is Not Enough 2 (Ellen Datlow), After the Darkness (Stanley Wiater), Darklands (Nicholas Royle), Visions In Viscera (David Khules - title undergoing change), Splatterpunk (Paul M Sammon), an as yet untitled collection of Christmas ghost stories (Kathryn Kramer), Obsessions (Gary L Raisor), Women of Darkness 2 (Kathryn Ptachek), Blood and Roses, (Lisa Feerick), and three comic-book related anthologies from Bantam featuring Superman, Wonder Woman and the Joker (Martin H Greenberg) which are companion volumes to their successful New Adventures of Batman book.

Add to this list further volumes of Dark Harvest's popular Night Visions series and no less than three Joe R Lansdale collections from Mark Zeising, and the market place starts to look crowded.

Of the collections listed, FEAR contributor Stanley Wiater's promises to be unusual. Wiater eschews the typical anthology format by replacing introductions to the stories with afterwords in the form of interviews with each contributor, detailing how they came to write their tales.

WORKS IN PROGRESS

To say that Richard Christian Matheson has been busy since we profiled him in FEAR 3 is a huge understatement. In 1990/91 he will be working on the following: a novel, a second short story collection, plus four feature film scripts in various stages of development. He is also scheduled to write at least two other screenplays, anticipates producing two films, has developed three TV series which have now been sold to the networks, is contracted to write the pilots for two others, is working on a Broadway show with his father, the legendary Richard Matheson, and will see the publication of eight new short stories in some of the anthologies mentioned elsewhere in this column. Lastly, he is due to work with Steven Spielberg on another film following their collaboration on Phil Joanou's debut movie Three O'Clock High (now available on video here and recommended).

We finally managed to catch up with Richard and asked him to explain whether he is A - a workaholic, B - crazy, C - destined for an early grave, or D - all three.

According to Matheson: 'Basically, I've always found it possible to deal with several projects at once without any of them appearing to suffer. But, with the way things are headed, I think I will need to slow down a little as some of them are going to be pretty demanding. The answer to how can I handle so much is simple: the imagination is like a muscle, and the more I work out the stronger it gets. The more I do, the more I find I can do. But obviously you reach a point where you have to draw the line. I think I've now reached that point.'

Of all the projects he's currently working on, the one he seems most pleased about is his forthcoming novel, due to be published by Bantam/Doubleday/Dell in the early spring of 1991. The book (the title of which he will not divulge as he says it will give away the central conceit) is a satirical horror fantasy about show business set in Hollywood.

'The best way to describe it is as a mixture of Kurt Vonnegut and Franz Kafka, and stylistically it's akin to the Magical Realism of Borges and other South American writers. Maybe I should change my name to Jorge Luis Matheson or Richard Marquez,' he jokes. 'Seriously though, it's exciting to be writing an extended prose work.'

It's surprising that Matheson has taken so long to get around to a novel considering his father's prolific output and the fact that the younger Matheson has been earning a living writing in one form or another since his late teens (he started out penning and selling gags to stand-up comics when he was seventeen). 'Television is the answer to that,' he explains. 'When I first got involved with the business I was suddenly presented with a lot of opportunities, had the chance to work on so many different shows, it just ate up all of my time and energy. But at the same time I did start writing short stories.'

The novel was sold on the strength of the first 80 pages of the draft and five-page outline for a six figure advance. 'I think the publication of Scars helped with the sale. Although the short story collection wasn't a huge seller - anthologies seldom are - it meant I had a track record of sorts. Yet the reason why Bantam jumped at the book depends on its subject matter. It's very high concept and original, which is why I decline to go into any real detail at this point. The book is going to have a 500,000 print run on the first edition. Obviously I'm delighted by that, and somewhat surprised. At the moment Bantam are deliberating whether or not it's going to be a hardback or mass market paperback. I'd prefer the latter,' he confides.

Film-wise Red Sleep - the modern day vampire tale he is co-writing with Mick Garris, reported on last issue - is still moving forwards, though at a slower pace than first reported. 'We're no longer dealing with the Geffen Company,' Matheson explains, 'and Lesley Belzberg, John Landis' partner, isn't involved anymore, but John still plans to executive produce. As Mick's been adapting In the Flesh, the Clive Barker story, for Warner Brothers, which Mick is due to direct, and I've been busy writing and developing the TV series this year, we haven't finished the screenplay yet. Originally, we held back because it looked likely we were going to get a development deal with either Joel Silver and Universal or David Geffen. But we've now decided to complete it on spec as it puts the juggernaut on your side of the net. In the last couple of years I've seen nearly a dozen spec scripts get sold and made. It's easy to get into a development deal then lose all enthusiasm when the script goes through dozen of changes. Anyway, Red Sleep should be ready for financing in January.'

The film awaiting release is Loose Cannons, a dark comedy starring Gene Hackman and Dan Aykroyd as a pair of cops - only the Aykroyd character suffers from multiple personality syndrome and his partner never knows who he's dealing with. Directed by Bob Clark (Porky's, Murder By Decree), the picture penned by both Mathesons is scheduled to open in the US in late winter. The project awaiting production, also a collaboration between father and son, is Shifter a mega-budget science fiction action horror script purchased by The Richard Donner Company, to be helmed by the Lethal Weapon director himself. Further to this, Matheson and Garris have been approached by Stewart Cornfeld, the producer of the original, to co-write The Fly 3.

'We're first in line to do it,' he reveals, 'with Mick to direct and me to produce. Stewart liked the work Mick did on Fly 2 but then left the project. The film that resulted was so far removed from Mick's intentions I think he'd like the opportunity to redeem himself. People see your name on a movie and they immediately hold you responsible even if only a small percentage of your material made it to the screen.'

Comedy still features strongly in Matheson's areas of interest, and not surprisingly the TV series are all situation comedies. 'But we're not talking thirtysomething or Married With Kids here: these are series like Cheers and Taxi, bittersweet comedies grounded in character rather than a string of gags. Also these series are quite dark, almost horror comedies, which is just how the stuff I write comes out. Writing horror and comedy comes naturally to me. They really are both sides of the same coin.'

FEAR FICTION

What more exciting news could we in the FEAR fiction department hope for than the glad tidings contained in a letter we received a few weeks ago from Jeff Vandermeer? An American author from Gainesville, Jeff had his story So the Dead Walk Slowly published in the November issue of FEAR and he wrote to tell us that he has since been approached by the editor of an anthology who has asked him to submit a piece. The editor had been impressed with So the Dead when he read it in FEAR.

This is precisely the sort of gratifying news we want to hear. So if you have been asked to submit further work on the basis of a story you've had published in these pages – do let us know. It cheers us up to know that your efforts – and ours! – have been justly rewarded.

If you have a tale to tell, and if it fits FEAR's horror, science fiction or fantasy brief, then send it to David Western, Fiction Editor, FEAR, PO Box 10, Ludlow, Shropshire SY8 1DB. Please remember to indicate the wordage of your story (which must be typed, preferably double spaced) and ensure that you enclose a day-time phone number, a photograph of yourself and a fifty-word biography.

Readers whose stories are being considered for publication will receive notification of this in writing. This is not a guarantee that your story will be published and, as we can only feature five or six new stories per issue, it could be some time before those eventually selected appear in print. So please be patient – and keep those phone calls to a minimum! Of course, if you need your story back urgently, you can contact us on the usual number.

We are obliged to remind new writers that FEAR does not look kindly upon works of plagiarism. So if you haven't got anything new to say, don't rip off somebody else – sit back instead and savour another fantasy-packed, horror-filled wedge of fabulous FEAR fiction.

This month we are delighted to feature Ian Watson as our celebrity author. Ian kicks off our fiction section with his curiously compelling monologue, Lambert Lambert.

IAN WATSON

"You need to appreciate what a kindness I'm doing you"

You must be finding your present situation pretty odd, eh? Bear up, pal! Chin up. There's company awaiting you further on inside.

Why me? you're wondering. I took pity on you, see. Yes, pity! I decided to save you.

'Course, once I started doing this trick of mine I developed a certain appetite for it, as you might say. I won't go so far as to call it a craving. If I craved, could I control myself, could I choose my customers? Could I ration myself sensibly? Whatever my girth, I'm no glutton. No addict, me. I feel a definite relish; that's about it.

Listen up, lad, and you'll understand. What's in a name? asked the Bard. Quite a lot, I do believe. To a greater extent than chance can explain, people's names can be unusually fitting. I'd go so far as to say that in good many cases the name maketh the man.

Take me, Bert Brown. Blunt and solid, eh? Bert Brown could hardly be a violinist or a philosopher. He could be a bus driver or a postman. In my case, a prison camp guard. Right? You agree? Only my pals inside know differently.

Oh, you'll meet them just as soon as I do my trick the next time, and you get squeezed within. Interesting company! Your sort. The people they put in these camps are usually interesting, at least when they arrive and for a few months afterwards. Then they stop being quite so interesting. Lack of the old brain-food, eh? Gruel and thin soup, scabby veg and stale bread wears them down. You're still able to peep out. When that stops, you'll meet the others. Oh, I can talk to them or just listen to them nattering but you can't yet.

By 'inside' I'm not of course referring to the electrified fences, the rows of huts. I'm talking about me. This here is my standard orientation lecture. How thoughtful of me to provide one! Well, it calms you down, otherwise you might thrash around and give me a spot of indigestion, as t'were. You might unbalance me a bit; though for a fact that would take some doing! I'm carrying ballast, chum. You need to appreciate what a kindness I'm doing you. I'm sure you're catching on, you're getting there.

Where were we? Oh yes, my name. Bert's a useful sort of moniker to have these days. Doesn't attract attention; doesn't mark a fellow out. That's how I see it. It's a name, if you'll excuse my humour, lacking any colour.

But thirty years gone by, my mum and dad named me Lambert. Lambert Brown. That's what Mum always called me when I was a nipper. 'My little lamb, Lambert!' 'Lambkin Lambert' 'Where are you, Lambkin?' She stopped that caper as soon as I started fattening up. Problem with the glands, right? Soon I became bloated Bert, who got bullied at school. That's what makes me sensitive; that's how I can sympathise with people like you. Then I got a bit too big to bully.

Mum actually took the name from an old encyclopedia that was lying around. Chap called Lambert Simnel attempted to seize the throne of Britain back in the time of Henry VII; he got chopped for his pains. Lambert Simnel was named after a Saint Lambert, a Billy Graham type who also got the chop. Belgium has lots of churches in his honour. Belgium: mayonnaise and chips. I know things, see. It's the company I keep.

Not a very good track record so far for Lamberts? Mum didn't care much about history; it was the little lamb aspect that appealed to her. She was like that: of diminished IQ. Dad, too, I suppose, though he must have been a bit brighter because he pissed off. Presumably I get my brains from him. Simnel's some kind of kraut cake. Very fattening. I used to eat a fair whack of rich stodgy cake when I was a kid. I don't now. I'm very stringent about my diet.

Stop twitching, will you? Won't do any good. Think about the word 'lam'. Means to thump, to thrash. That's what goes on inside the wire. Beatings. My fellow goons like to cut a prisoner out of the herd now and then and work him over. At random, when the fancy takes them. Nothing systematic. If starving doesn't get you, a thumping might. You're finished after that.

Commander doesn't mind. Relieves the strain. They're all missing persons in there, to begin with. If someone becomes more missing, who cares? He certainly hasn't done a runner. No inmate gets through the high-voltage wire or the auto-guns. So, pal, you won't be missed. No one's looking for you.

I mean, that applies across the board to all the prisoners. They can forget any silly notion of help from some other country — which is where it would need to come from. From America or Russia. But every country's in a mess. Sea level, economic collapse, heat, famine; need I go on? We have this country sewn up tight for a long time to come. Count your blessings. I feel sorry for people like you.

'Lam' also means to escape, to beat it. You're on the lam now. Thanks to me.

All comes down to names, doesn't it?

I was working as a debt collector in Leicester. See, I could intimidate people. That's where I discovered about my namesake and felt such a strong yen to join the penal service. Not surprising, huh? Best job these days. So many nuisances being rounded up. Pinkos. Greens. Poofsters and wogs. Domeheads and Arty-Farties. All the stirrers. Got to belt up about stuff like freedom and politics and art if this country's going to survive the greenhouse. Doesn't really require as much exertion as sticking one's bod in some pensioner's doorway; not with all the control equipment at our disposal. If goons want to work up a sweat thrashing a detainee, that's their business. I don't join in. Other fish to fry. Not that I'm easily exhausted, by the way. I'm a tireless fellow.

Same as my namesake. My double! Right: chap name of Daniel Lambert. The fat man of Leicester.

Found out about him when a hailstorm chased me into the museum. Hail the size of bloody golf balls, shooting down at machine-gun rate, bouncing as high as a bus. Several people were killed that day. Old folks, babies in prams. Windows shattered all over. The climate's all screwed up and that's a fact. Anyway, the museum was showing Lambert's clothes and other memorabilia.

He was born in the year 1770, and his Dad ran the House of Correction, the Bridewell prison. This Bridewell wasn't for your murderers or forgers or thieves who were bound for the noose and the gibbet. No, it housed people who had committed what you might call moral offences against society. Debts, drunkenness, vagrancy, that type of thing. You ought to know about moral offences against society, humm? They're what landed you in the camp.

In his earlier days Lambert's dad was huntsman to the Earl of Stamford. His uncle was gamekeeper to the next Earl, and his grandad on his mum's side was a famous cock-fighter. Thus young Daniel grew up real sporty. Swimming, fishing, riding to hounds, hunting otters, fighting cocks. 'Course the countryside wasn't any distance from the heart of the city back then. Oh, he loved the sporting life. Pinkos like you did your damndest to spoil all that. Still, what does it matter nowadays?

With all that exercise our Dan became a powerful fellow. Could carry quarter of a ton without any fuss. Could kick seven feet high, standing on one leg. Once he thumped a whopping dancing bear owned by some Froggy entertainers. You see, they were performing in the street outside the gaol when the gaol dog went for the bear, and this Froggy in charge unmuzzled Ursa Major to let her kill the dog. Felled her with one blow to the skull, did our Dan. The bear threw in the sponge.

Dan's folks apprenticed him to the button trade in Birmingham. To learn die-sinking and engraving. Must have seemed a bright idea at the time. A few years later, fashion turned topsyturvy. Out went buckles and fancy buttons. And it was a time of unrest: the factory burned down in a riot. So Dan returned to Leicester, Dad resigned from the Bridewell, and his boy took over as keeper.

Boy, am I saying? Dan started putting on weight at a swingeing pace. (Could it have been the lack of sporty exercise, running a prison? Not to mention the glands?) Wasn't too long before he weighed in at nearly fifty-three stone. Measured three feet round each leg, and nine feet round the body. When he was sitting down, his belly buried his thighs to the knees. His legs were pillows almost smothering his feet. The flap of his waistcoat pocket stretched a foot across. Special clothes for him, special chairs more like sofas.

One remarkable fact was how healthy our Dan was. When he finally died, most likely of a heart attack, at the Waggon and Horses in Stamford where he'd gone for the races, they needed to demolish a wall of the inn to get him out in his coffin — he was putrefying fast. But up until then, not a whisper of frailty! Dan could fair trot upstairs. He could outwalk most fellows. He'd teach kids to swim in the river Soar — he could float with two grown men on his back. Never caught a cold in his life, even when he used to come in soaking wet and sleep with his window open then don the same damp clothes in the morning. He never snored. Never panted. Perfect bronchials. His voice was a sweet, strong tenor.

I'm a lot like our Dan Lambert with regard to health and vigour. Additionally he was a very nice bloke. So am I — as you must agree — saving you from slow starvation! Really considerate to the guests in his lock-up, he was. Humane? Benevolent? Why, he was a byword. Departing prisoners sometimes wept with gratitude.

But in 1805 the magistrates decided that such prisoners as those would be better employed labouring in the town's factories. So Daniel's job came to an end; though not without an annuity of fifty pounds a year for life for him, freely granted as a mark of esteem.

Alas, fifty pounds proved insufficient for his needs. That's why our man-mountain began to exhibit himself to the curious. Either that, or hide in his house! Such was the fame of his bulk, people would knock at the door on any pretext.

In the main, the exhibiting down in London went off really well, since our Dan was such a damn decent fellow. Holding gracious court, more like a king of men than a freak. Thus there was nothing ludicrous about the occasion when the largest man in the world met the smallest man — a Polish dwarf named Count Borulawski, whose missus used to pop him on the mantleshelf as a punishment when she was feeling peeved with him. A single one of Dan's sleeves could easily have provided a whole suit of clothes for the Count. This was a meeting of two civilised prodigies. Ah, civilisation's taken a downturn since those days, hasn't it just?

Dan's head was perfectly proportioned, by the way. No bloating or grossness about his face! A normal, handsome head was simply dwarfed by a giant body.

Do I hear you enquire as to his diet? Simplicity itself! Quite Spartan. A single dish at a meal, and he only ever drank water. A little like the menu in the camps.

I can tell you, how little he ate came as a revelation to me. Did he convert the whole of his modest intake of food into flesh, a hundred per cent? Didn't he ever crap or pee? Seems that all of his bodily secretions were quite normal! So where did his bulk come from? Out of thin air?

You've heard the old saying how inside every fat man there's a thin man crying to get out? Do I hear you crying right now? Don't bother. Wipe your sobs away. Adjust to circumstances, that's the ticket.

Let's put two and two together tentatively. Soon as our Dan becomes boss of that gaol he puts on stones and stones of extra weight without any evidence of gluttony. And he liked his prisoners; he was good to them.

Could he have been so kindly disposed that he liberated his favourites — by engulfing them? By absorbing them into himself? Now there's a fine way to solve overcrowding in prisons! The gaoler becomes his own private gaol.

Ah, but magistrates back in those days were finicky. They kept count. Had ledgers and lists. Families enquired after prisoners. Creditors bore them in mind. Prisoners didn't merely disappear, as nowadays. Once you're behind the wire now, it's do-as-you-please.

Let me tell you, it pleased me very much when I absorbed my first prisoner. (Pleased me for his sake too! I was saving him.)

Dan Lambert inspired me. But it was me myself, Bert Brown, who cottoned-on to the trick. The cottoning-on was a leap such as bloody Einstein made. Fourth dimension and all that. That's where you all are: stacked behind each other in another dimension inside of me. Soon as I cottoned on, I could do it.

Quite a party's going on in here. You're busy debating, arguing, telling your life stories. Making friends and quarrelling. Comforting and entertaining one another. Drawing up manifestos, playing games, composing poems. And not worrying at all about starving or thumpings. All courtesy of big Bert Brown. Lambert Brown.

Naw, not you yet. I've told you, you need to wait till I absorb someone new; that's how it works. I grab one of you spindly types, one that I fancy, take him somewhere quiet. I wrap myself around him, I engulf, I crush. And into me goes the personality — after the ritual. Eating some liver, heart and brain; right. Fair's fair; gives me a spot of extra nourishment to fuel the procedure, very like what I gather savages in the South Seas used to get up to. Only I do it properly seeing as how I understand about the fourth dimension I'm putting you into.

I'm sure Dan Lambert didn't do my trick, but I think there must have been something a bit four-dimensional about him, don't you. Four dimensions squashed into three. If everything possesses four dimensions the way Einstein said then that includes food and drink. Your ordinary run of geezer only uses three dimensions; that's all he can take. A Dan Lambert could digest the fourth dimension of food too — that's how he got so big on so little. There's the explanation.

Me, I'm a step beyond our Dan, aren't I? Good thing for you I am! Welcome to the family. I'm really expanding wonderfully within. It's an education, all these new persons inside me. Henry and Crispin and Alec and Mohammed and Rasta and Lucian and Tony... Oooh, a good thirty lodgers by now, with plenty of room for expansion. More customers pouring into the camp everyday.

I wouldn't have thought I had it in me! But I do. I can contain multitudes; could be my very own prison camp.

Actually, so as not to keep you on tenterhooks, I think I'll take another stroll inside the wire pretty soon, stomp into a hut, haul out a nice face; then it's off to somewhere special and get down to business. My fellow goons don't know what they're missing.

All this hard graft of thinking at you is fair working me up an appetite.

SIX DEAD BOYS IN A VERY DARK WORLD

By Mark Chadbourn

"Six pairs of eyes stared glassily into the gloom"

It was very dark in the house, and very cold. Soon, quite soon, it would be darker still. There was no sunlight in Gary Nicholson's new world, no comfort, no joy. But that was then; seven hours earlier things had been very different...

'Hey! Careful you don't fall!'

Elma Jacobs teetered on top of a pair of rickety stepladders as she scrubbed frantically at a stubborn spot on her gleaming window.

She looked down on hearing Gary's call, and smiled. She had forgotten to put her teeth in again. 'I know what I'm doing, young Mr Nicholson. I've been climbing up and down these steps for fifty years now without tumbling off them, and I'm not about to start now.'

'Just being careful, Mrs Jacobs. Just being careful.'

Gary's heart skipped a beat as she unsteadily negotiated the creaking steps, but she made it onto solid ground without a mishap. 'You off to the Job Centre again, then?' she asked, peering at him through her spectacles. He nodded. 'Well, I hope they find something for you this time. Don't like to see strapping boys like yourself sitting round with nothing to do.'

'I'm not exactly over the moon about it myself, Mrs J, but I do my best not to let it get me down.'

'Aye, you do at that, Gary. Always a happy face and a smile for your neighbours.' She pinched his cheek like a maiden aunt teasing a baby, an action which prompted him to blush involuntarily. 'They never should have shut that factory down, putting lads like you on the dole. These are the best years of your life. You need a good job, bit of money in your pocket. You need somewhere a bit better than that bedsit.'

'Ah, the bedsit's fine. And, even if I did have more space, I wouldn't have anything to put in it.' He couldn't help but smile at her. She looked like an old wizened mole, her lined face

"All the bodies were as fresh as if their hearts had ceased to beat mere moments before"

screwed up tightly as she tried to shield her eyes from the sun. 'Anyway,' he continued, 'I'd better be on my way. I don't want to find I've been beaten to the job of the year.'

'Don't lose heart, love.' She waved as he walked off.

'Don't worry,' he shouted back. 'I'll never do that.'

When he found himself out of a job, Gary's greatest fear had been of suffering like some of the other unemployed people he saw, overcome by a creeping lethargy that sapped both desire and ambition. But in the two months he had been out of work things had still been good. He was happy. Many people had told him how depressing life was in northern towns these days; no hope, no humour, just a numbing realisation that everything was grinding you down. He didn't see it like that. All around him were real people with a great joy for life. But many of them kept it well hidden, so that the avaricious and the twisted could not crush it underfoot.

At the corner of the street he ducked into the newsagent's for a pack of twenty Camel. Although he had to watch every single penny carefully since he had started on the dole, this was one of the few luxuries he allowed himself. Mr Patel cracked a few jokes and then apologised for his five-year-old son who was tugging at Gary's trouser leg. Gary rubbed the lad's hair and laughed as the youngster giggled and ran into the back room. Mr Patel smiled and muttered something about the waywardness of children.

Outside the shop, Gary lit a cigarette and drew the smoke in deeply as he gazed up and down the street he had lived in for a year since he moved out of his parent's home. He did not have much, he thought, but at least he was content; he turned and set off along his regular daily route to the Job Centre. In two months he had never deviated from his carefully planned path along the back streets but that morning, as his thoughts drifted, he suddenly felt the urge to walk down a different street.

He wrinkled his nose as he turned the corner; there was a strange smell in the air like rotting vegetables, and though it was broad daylight the street was in shadow. Halfway along he paused — the strange, overpowering silence suddenly became as obvious as if music had been blaring from every window — and, as he did so, one of the houses on the right caught his eye. The building was old and obviously deserted, the windows gaped blackly like toothless mouths. A bed had been placed across one of the upstairs windows, but the mattress had sagged inwards dramatically and only served to draw attention to the fact that the house had been empty for a long time. Gary leaned on the wall and looked closer, flinging his cigarette butt onto the pavement. There was a hole under the ground floor front window, as if workmen had started to excavate and then stopped suddenly; scrubby yellow weeds poked up high through the concrete. The front door was yellow too, and faded and peeling with the effects of the weather.

Gary was about to move on when he thought he heard a noise. He could not quite make out what it was... an animal perhaps, trapped and frightened... but it fired his curiosity and prompted him to investigate. Looking over his shoulder to make sure no one was watching, he stepped into the front garden and surreptitiously tried the door. With a slight push from his shoulder it opened, creaking and grinding as it swung inwards and forced back the pile of rubbish and rubble behind it.

The smell of rotting vegetables seemed to hang in the dank air of the corridor. It was cold in there, like the inside of a church, and Gary shivered and flicked his lighter to provide some illumination.

As the shadows receded, Gary could see that the corridor was strewn ankle deep in litter; beer bottles, rusty cans, broken bricks and mortar, yellowing newspapers, a bicycle frame, pieces of dismantled furniture. It was like a rubbish tip and he thought twice about walking over it, wondering what vermin crawled around beneath the surface.

To his left the stairs rose up, dark and imposing, but he found himself drawn past them to a door which stood open. He peered into the dense, black space and could faintly make out steps leading down to a cellar.

All thoughts of the Job Centre had vanished, sucked into a vacuum which had also claimed his natural sense of wariness; he put one foot on the creaking stairs. All that mattered at that moment was to see what was at the bottom.

He descended the stairs slowly, stopping regularly to flick his lighter. Then the flame was extinguished by a sudden movement, which plunged him into a darkness more overwhelming than space. The strange odour still hung in the air, but it no longer seemed to bother him, nor did the chill which increased the further down the steps he progressed.

Gary paused when he came to the bottom. The darkness at the foot of the stairs seemed impenetrable, but slowly his eyes adjusted and he could make out basic shapes, alien and strangely distorted in the gloom. His foot struck something and, when he stooped down to see what it was, he noticed an old wine bottle with a well-used candle in the neck. Cautiously he lit the taper and the darkness danced, wavered and reluctantly receded, revealing a horrific sight which made Gary catch his breath in a mixture of surprise and fear.

Slumped against the damp, salt-encrusted cellar walls were three corpses; two more bodies lay on their backs on the ground and another hung by his neck from a shattered light fitting. Six pairs of eyes stared glassily into the gloom. The bodies were all of men in their late teens. The most striking aspect was their pale and hollow-cheeked faces which seemed to have a universal expression of extreme melancholy. Gary looked around the room nervously for the perpetrator of this crime, but discovered that he was alone. Then he noticed that three of the corpses had been there for a considerable period of time; dust covered them like a fine layer of snow and cobwebs trailed magnificently from their clothes.

Gary made a closer inspection of the bodies, the candle flame wavering with his movements, and saw to his amazement that there was no decomposition. All the bodies were as fresh as if their hearts had ceased to beat mere moments before. He thought he vaguely recognised two of the youths, but though he racked his memory, he could not remember where he had seen them before.

Baffled by the chilling scene, Gary slumped into a broken wooden chair and stared incredulously from one corpse to another. Finally, his gaze fell upon a thick, blue exercise book lying on the floor. He leaned forwards, picked it up and began casually to flick through the creamy-white pages. The first few were taken up with writing in different hands, some in ink, thin and scratchy, and some thick and blocked in felt-tip pen. He studied the cover and saw that the volume had originally been entitled ONE DEAD BOY IN A VERY DARK WORLD, but that had been altered to read TWO then THREE, FOUR and FIVE. But each time the word had been furiously scratched out, until now the title read: SIX DEAD BOYS IN A VERY DARK WORLD.

Gary sat there with the exercise book on his lap and with six strangely fresh corpses surrounding him, and wondered why his initial fear had departed. He felt uncommonly calm as he turned to the first page and began to read:

'My name is Robert Buckley, and in half an hour I am going to kill myself. I can see no reason to continue living. The world is a very cold and dark place and I find no warmth or love to keep me going into an uncertain future. There is no one to support me, no one to care for me. There is nothing beyond the bleak, meaningless existence we find ourselves in. People have told me that there is a God, but I can see no sign of Him and if He is not there to give a reason to this suffering, then what is the point in continuing? I have prepared myself for that simple, tiny step into the great void and I welcome death with open arms.'

'Let me tell you about myself so that you can understand how I have reached this moment. I am nineteen years old and have just completed my first year at university. For the last three years I have been dating this girl who lives on the other side of town. Her name is Kathleen Harrison and she is the most beautiful girl I have ever seen. Her hair is long and brown, her eyes are hazel and she has a smile that would make the coldest heart melt. Our love grew stronger as the months passed until it became the glue that held my life together; just before I left home for university we discussed marriage and our life together, we planned our future.

'I was ecstatically happy. I no longer felt the need to go out on the town drinking with my friends. I felt good merely sitting in front of the TV with Kathleen, watching ridiculous programmes and laughing, locked in our own private world.

'It is difficult to describe how much she came to mean to me, how much my world became totally centred around her. Whenever we were apart, my thoughts always turned to her. Whenever we were together, I would find myself staring at her or watching her from out of the corner of my eye. No one could have asked for a better life.

'Then one day it all came crashing down. I returned home from university for a few weeks' holiday and rushed round to her house, expecting her to put her arms around me and kiss me as she always did. But all she said was; 'It's over'. At first I thought she was joking. How could it be true? We had the perfect relationship. There was no reason for her to want to end it. But she just said that while I had been away she'd been thinking, and now she had decided she wanted to be on her own. I looked through the open door into the room behind her, and saw a large bouquet of flowers in a vase.

'As I walked away all I could think about was that huge, yawning hole which had suddenly appeared in my life. You cannot imagine the feeling of emptiness. I wandered the streets, trying to think what I had done wrong, what I could do to put it right: then I came across this house. An overwhelming desire to escape it all came over and I broke in through the front door and came down here to the cellar. As I sit thinking, I know there is no reason to continue. Without her, I am nothing. In my pocket is the engagement ring I bought with all my savings. She will never see it now.'

Gary leaned back against the cold wall and shook his head. The handwriting faltered towards the end of the piece as if a stream of sorrow from the heart had dried in the heat of futility. Gary could almost feel his sadness; it seemed to leak out from the pages of the book like a cloying mist swirling up around his head, and a lump rose in his throat. He stared across at what appeared to be the oldest of the six boys. The sadness was there in his eyes like stone. One ghostly white hand clutched a rusty razor blade and Gary could see the dark lines across his wrist and the black stain on the floor where the blood had seeped away. All he could think about was the incredible waste of such a young life and the powerful emotions which must have spurred him to his end.

He looked around at the other bodies and, with his curiosity aroused once more, he turned the page. The handwriting there was different, clumsier and with fewer flourishes, but as Gary read on it was obvious that the sentiments were the same.

'I've been sitting here thinking for half and hour after reading the previous pages, and I've decided that this boy was right. There is no reason for living. I'm going to put an end to it all as soon as I've finished writing this. I've got to take my time because this is important; it tells the people who come afterwards why we did it and gives a meaning to our deaths. There has to be some meaning somewhere, doesn't there?

'My name is Dave Hodges. I'm a builder by trade, seventeen years old, and I live in South Street with my parents and my brother. Three days ago, I watched my grandmother die. It was the first time I'd ever come face to face with death and it has affected me deeply. She had cancer. They only diagnosed it three weeks ago, so it all happened very suddenly. It has taken me a while to come to terms with her death, but I've spent every day since she went thinking about it. She wasn't in pain or anything like that — it was quite a peaceful death. But that's not the point.

'When I was younger I thought she would always be around. It never entered my head that one day she wouldn't be there, but over the last three days I've discovered an emptiness that I know is going to be with me for ever. It's the little things that really get to you. One less place at the dinner table, her empty chair in front of the TV... The everyday routine just seems so strange and you know things are never going to be the same again.

'One image in particular has remained with me. Just before she died the whole family gathered round her bed, crying. I looked from one face to the next and then to my grandmother and suddenly I realised that one day they'd be gone too and I'd be all alone. I just couldn't see the point of living if it all just ended in death, and I knew I wouldn't be able to face all that heartbreak in the future.

'So I've decided to end it all now, get it all out of the road. It's the easiest way. What's the point in suffering? I've a bottle of tablets from the medicine cabinet and I'm going to take them all at once. I won't feel a thing.'

Gary looked over at the boy lying on his back on the floor. Beneath a mop of blond hair the face was unlined, peaceful, almost angelic. The bottle lay next to one of his tattooed arms.

Gary returned to the journal, flicking feverishly through the pages to read the other accounts. They were all similar; tales of loss and sadness, stories of people unable to cope in a world which seemed unnecessarily harsh. His throat grew dry and his eyes moistened as he read each new statement, turning the pages slowly with a trembling hand.

Then one paragraph in the final letter from the dead caught his eye.

'I've read everything that's gone before and I just wondered: what if despair is like a disease? What if it waits here in this cellar, infecting each visitor with a mind-numbing melancholy? Or what if it's worse? What if it actually exists, a sentient being, invisible but powerful, living and growing strong in the shadows in order to taint anyone who comes close. Maybe it feeds on the sadness. I don't know. But if it exists it has me now, and I'm happy.'

Gary closed the book quietly, trying not to make any sound which might disturb the reverential quiet in the shrine of despair. He looked again at the boys, glancing from one face to another, and they returned his gaze. Now they were at peace, they had escaped the awfulness of it all. There was a tear in his eye, and he smiled.

Outside there was a chill in the air which had nothing to do with summer. Slowly he retraced his steps, carefully examining the dreary terraced houses that lined the road, dull in their monotony. On the street corner there was a gang of youths, jobless like himself, frittering away the precious minutes of their lives on mundane activities; there was no work to break the tedium or provide them with the money they needed to do anything that mattered. Overhead, slate grey clouds swept up from the horizon cutting off the wan, sickly sunlight. Mr Patel's son was bawling loudly and Mrs Jacobs was peering out from behind her lace curtains, her face pinched and mean.

Gary went into the house and climbed the dark stairs to his dingy bedsit. The bed had not been made. The breakfast pots were unwashed in the sink beneath the monotonous drip of the leaking tap. There was a faint smell of sweat in the air. He searched in a cupboard for the box he wanted and then, taking a can of lager and a felt-tip pen from the sideboard, he returned to the derelict house.

In the cold darkness of the cellar, before his silent companions, he placed the box of rat poison and the lager beside him and scored through the title of the book with the pen. Then he wrote beneath it: SEVEN DEAD BOYS IN A VERY DARK WORLD.

Something Old, Something New

By M W Gower

Sarah inspected the contents of the room with professional detachment. One or two likely pieces caught her eye immediately. Almost unconsciously, her mind began an evaluation.

Nothing fantastic of course but, well, that oak dresser, for instance. I got a good price on the last one I sold. And those paintings. Oils always sell. Mind you, the oldest thing in this house seems to be the owner...

The old man regarded her with a look of fearful anticipation she had become used to seeing on the faces of her victims. Clients, she reminded herself. They're clients.

He gave the impression of incredible age. His limbs were matchstick thin under a shiny black suit. From under a fraying cuff, the hand that grasped the battered walking-stick was gnarled and twisted with arthritis. Liver spots lavishly decorated hands and face alike. Weak, watery eyes sank deep into the wrinkled flesh of the face; next to the jutting, beak-like nose, they seemed like craters whose depths flashed with a penetrating inner light. His eyes locked momentarily with hers.

Instinctively, Sarah backed away.

He's an ugly old thing, she thought. Why do old people always have to be so revolting. They make my skin crawl.

The idea that someday she might be like that hovered at the edge of her consciousness. Fiercely she rejected it and turned to a mirror on the wall beside her for reassurance.

She was about to look away, satisfied with the sight of the fresh, twenty-year-old complexion glowing beneath waves of dark blonde hair, when her attention was caught by the elaborate carving of the frame around the mirror.

Surmounting the mirror was a bird arising, wings outstretched, from a bed of flames. A phoenix. It was carved in such elaborate, painstaking detail that it looked almost real.

'This is quite unusual, Mr...' Sarah struggled to remember the old man's name from the previous day's phone call. '...Mr Fonica. I don't think it has any real value. It is very nice though.'

Mr Fonica stepped closer to her and peered

"She had to resist an overwhelming urge to push the decaying old body away from hers, to see it lying broken at the foot of the stairs" shortsightedly at the mirror.

'Ah, yes, the phoenix.' His voice sounded worn out. It was reedy and gasping. 'You might say it's a sort of family emblem.' He paused for breath. 'I carved the frame myself, you know. As a present for my wife. More years ago than you can imagine.'

'Your wife...?'

'Departed this world a long time ago.'

Sarah heaved an inward sigh of relief. One decrepit old person at a time was quite enough for her. She changed the subject.

'You're moving to somewhere new then?'

'Yes.' He seemed to hesitate for a second before voicing his answer. 'Yes. I decided it was time to... to have some new things around me.'

Sarah mentally revised her tactics — I'll have to play up to this one a bit; he doesn't seem as confused as some of the other senile old buggers.

She adopted her warmest, most reassuring manner.

'Yes, I think you've made the right decision. Old things are very nice in their own way, but they do take so much looking after.' She waved her arm, indicating the dust-mantled furniture. 'Sooner or later it always makes more sense to change to something new. A nice new home with modern furnishings will be much better for you. Much more convenient.'

Mr Fonica nodded distantly.

Perhaps he is senile, thought Sarah. I'm sure he hasn't been listening to a word I've said. The day might turn out to be more profitable than I originally thought.

Not for the first time, she noticed the musty odour that she always associated with old houses. She wrinkled her nose in disgust, quelling a sudden impulse to make a dash for the fresher air of the young, vigorous world outside.

'Are you interested in trinkets at all?' Mr Fonica asked. The light pressure of his claw-like hand on her arm brought her back down to earth. Reflexively, she drew her arm away from his, as if fearing contagion.

'I have a few pieces upstairs. Perhaps you would like to see them?' He didn't wait for her response. 'I'm afraid you will have to help me with the stairs though,' he brandished his walking-stick apologetically, 'I can't seem to manage them on my own these days.'

Somewhere in the depths of Sarah's mind, a luminescent display of pound signs began to flash on and off.

This could be the jackpot, she thought. I'll bet that mirror is worth a small fortune. The senile old fool couldn't have carved it himself! And jewellery too. Thank you God.

'I sometimes handle one or two small items,' she replied. 'Let's have a look at them, shall we?' She forced a smile.

It took an age for the frail old man to shuffle on his unwilling legs to the foot of the stairs. When at last he reached them, he turned and looked expectantly at Sarah. She took a deep breath, gritted her teeth, and gingerly placed a supporting arm around his waist.

Only the thought of the money enabled Sarah to control her revulsion. She had to resist an overwhelming urge to push the decaying old body away from hers, to see it lying broken at the foot of the stairs. Her last reserves of willpower were needed to fix the smile on her face, as his foetid breath filled her delicate nostrils. Her skin crawled at the touch of his hands, which clutched at her body in an almost exploratory manner as they searched for support.

Even the rancid smell which permeated the bedroom was preferable to the memory of that nightmare journey to the first floor. On Mr Fonica's direction, she opened a deep drawer in the base of a heavy walnut wardrobe to reveal several items of assorted jewellery.

Nice enough pieces if I can get them cheap. That wedding ring's definitely gold and the locket could be early Victorian. I'll bet it's solid silver.

'Lift up the baize.' The old man's tone was commanding; a marked contrast to his earlier feeble whine.

Sarah found a minute leather thong attached to the bottom of the drawer. When she pulled at this, the base of the drawer lifted up on a hinge. A fantastic sight shimmered into view. Sarah prided herself on her ability to value items at a glance. One look at the item which now burned into her vision convinced her that here was a piece that defied all her assessment skills.

Even Sotheby's would be hard pressed to place a value on this one. The idea both excited and disturbed her.

Her hands reached out with no conscious direction on her part. Her trembling fingers fumbled at the fastenings of the collar as she placed it around her own slender neck. She savoured the cold weight of it against her skin. A mirror on the wardrobe door reflected her image, picking out the dull, golden gleam of the outstretched bird's wings that formed the main body of the collar.

It's mine — it's meant for me!

Desire filled her head, swamping all other thoughts. One outstanding priority now overrode all others. She had to possess this object: she had to make it hers in any way open to her.

Sarah reviewed the options. The senile old fool wouldn't hide the thing like that if he didn't have some idea of its worth. What about getting the Harris brothers to do a drainpipe job? No. This is mine. I won't share it. It belongs to me!

'Has anyone made an offer?' She enquired tentatively.

'You are the first to see it. I selected you with great care.'

A puzzled frown creased Sarah's brow. She looked sharply at Mr Fonica. He regarded her intently; his eyes seemed sharper, more piercing. They burned into her, penetrating to the darkest recesses of her mind.

Then he spoke. 'I am aware of the collar's worth. It is indeed beyond value.' His voice had lost its reedy quality, and seemed more confident, more assured. 'However, it does bear a price... one that you are able to pay.'

A bony talon stabbed at her upper body, indicating her new found obsession. She backed away, fearing that he would try to take it from her.

'It can become yours... if you are willing to pay the price.' He pushed his face towards hers until that great beak of a nose almost touched her own. 'Look in the mirror... A collar such as this is made to adorn a pretty, young neck. Don't you feel that it belongs there? Almost as if it has become a part of you?'

Sarah nodded, she was hypnotised by the compulsive tone of his voice and the heady feeling of just possession imparted to her by the collar.

'If you can meet my price, the collar might remain there.' His tone was gentler now, almost cajoling. Like that of a parent attempting to coax a young child into making the right decision.

'What... What is your price?' Sarah's voice caught in her throat.

Even as she asked the question, the answer was already forming in her mind. Her stomach churned in anticipatory revulsion. His words burned into her ears with heart-stopping clarity. And she knew that, for her, only one response was possible...

She undressed in front of the full length wardrobe mirror, unsuccessfully seeking reassurance from the familiar appearance of her lithe body and trim waist. Even the sight of her flawless legs emerging from the anonymity of her grey business suit failed to impart the usual thrill of self-satisfaction.

Divesting the old man of his mildewed garments required even more determination. Sarah could not recall ever having performed a more unpleasant task. She tried to detach herself from reality of the situation by concentrating on the glittering array of figures which spun through her head like a protective mantra. Eventually the job was done and she shuddered at the feel of his scaly hide scraping against the suppleness of her skin.

Ugh. I feel sick. It makes my skin crawl when he touches me like that — and he smells. Oh my God, it's disgusting. I can't believe I'm really doing this. At least he won't really be able to do anything, not at his age. Pathetic. A few minutes of fumbling and groping should satisfy him — please don't let him drool over me again or I shall be sick. Don't think about him. Think about the collar, think about... Oh, my God! What's he doing — he can't! No, for Christ's sake, no! Please! Oh, oh my God!

Sarah genuinely had not believed that the old man would be capable of the act. She was, therefore, unprepared for the steely hardness which seared its way into her. A wave of revulsion swept over her entire body. His face came down towards her. She tried to turn her head away but his gaze locked with hers, and burned into her skull.

Suddenly the entire world seemed to disappear in a burst of incandescent pain. She was torn apart in an explosion of sensation which took her to the brink of excruciating agony before delivering her mercifully into oblivion.

She finally came round with an incredible sensation of weakness. Her hand felt like a lead weight as she explored the bed. She was alone.

Her ears detected curiously muffled sounds, like someone moving behind a blanket of cotton wool. Her eyes refused to focus properly.

Something moved across her blurred field of vision. By squinting and using all her powers of concentration Sarah managed to bring the image into a sort of hazy focus. It was a girl. She was dressing hurriedly, inelegantly — like a man.

That's my suit, Sarah thought, weakly. The girl, now fully dressed, approached the bed and leaned over her.

Where have I seen that face? It was a sweet face, innocent looking, utterly free of lines, suffused with youth and vitality. The eyes gazed down on Sarah and glowed with a penetrating inner radiance. One exquisitely manicured hand brushed away a stray wisp of dark blonde hair as the girl spoke.

'I am sorry, my dear. But sometimes the only realistic option is to change to something new. You see, old things become so worn out and inconvenient!'

The girl straightened up. A shaft of light from the window outlined her upper body. Something almost hidden by the stiff, white collar of her blouse, threw the light back in a glittering golden gleam.

In panic, Sarah reached with numb fingers for the object that should have adorned her own neck, but she could only find folds of sagging flesh.

A wave of horror passed through her body like an electric current. She struggled to get up from the bed, but the girl put one hand on her chest and pushed her back effortlessly. Her touch was gentle, compassionate — almost a caress.

Those penetrating brown eyes regarded her pityingly for a second. 'You came here with the intention of obtaining an old man's possessions. You may have them. They are yours. The house and all it contains. A gift. I have no further use for them.' She paused for a moment as if in thought. 'And you may find that you have need of them.'

The girl took a couple of unsteady steps away from the bed. With a frown she stooped and removed the unfamiliar high heels; she winked at Sarah as she strode athletically from the room.

With an effort, Sarah raised her head from the pillow in time to witness Fonica's exit. She couldn't help but admire the supple grace with which the girl moved. A brief thought arose, unbidden, from her subconscious as her head sank back onto the pillow in exhaustion: A body like that must be worth a fortune!

CARL BOSCZEK IS DEAD

STEPHEN HAND

I admit I am a shade fastidious in such matters, but that's just tough. I'm not going to sit around spouting generalisations for any bugger. It's just not me. If I say something which I feel requires some qualification, then I supply it. The few times I gloss over issues, I get stress. That said, I do strive to find a compromise between maintaining the flow of a conversation and not having a nervous breakdown.

Right.

So here I am with my cassette recorder, talking into the condensed microphone. I'm sorry you've had to put up with all this, but at least it's helped me to relax. No doubt some journalists would accuse me of being unprofessional in my approach. Well, in the immortal words of Dennis Potter, they can just 'piss off'.

All right then. Here goes.

This is Stephen Hand, dictating a commissioned piece for House of Phantasmagoria magazine, on the 26th of August, 1988. Greg, I'm sorry this is on audio rather than disc but, given the circumstances, I'm sure you'll forgive me. I've got to do this as fast as I can, and typing would just take too long. It does mean, however, that you'll have to do a bit more — make that a lot more — subbing than usual. As for payment... God knows. Anyway, I'd better get on with it before the police arrive.

This is it.

What you are about to read may seem incredible. Is that too corny? No. Leave it in. Right. What you are about to read may astound you, but it is the truth. Carl Bosczeck is dead, and you can be the first to read all about it, here in this HoP exclusive.

Originally this space was to be devoted to an interview with the great man himself but, given our unique insight into his untimely demise and the lack of any other interview material with him, we believe it to be more fitting to present a tribute to his amazing career. A tribute that ends with one man's perception of the bizarre events surrounding his tragic death.

As you all know, Carl Bosczeck was the universally acknowledged king of horror special effects (FX). He has dominated the last three decades with make-up techniques and FX stunts which have left his peers standing. Sadly, yet understandably, he never took on a disciple and so his great secret talent has followed him to the grave.

Bosczeck first appeared on the movie scene in

No, too clichéd. Okay then, how about 'The Late Great Carl Bosczeck'? No, that's too formal. Aww, what the hell, it doesn't matter anyway. It's the ed's problem.

Editor?

That's a bit optimistic isn't it? This piece'll probably never see the light of day, and even if it does, it'll be presented as a nice little scandal piece in some cheap tabloid. Delvings into the Mind of a Madman, or something similar.

Oh, come on Steve — get your act together and cut the crap. It's not as if you've got all the time in the world, is it?

Okay.

Here goes.

Shit, I hate these things. Give me a blank page any day. Some writers have trouble getting their first words down; I have trouble talking to Dictaphones. Obviously something to do with the sound of my own voice; some kind of hang-up. Though when I say Dictaphone, I really mean cassette player. It's not even one of those Walkman things. Well, 'Walkman' is actually a trade name for a specific brand of portable cassette player (so's Dictaphone, I think), so I really shouldn't refer to them as Walkmans. Or should that be Walkmen? Whatever. Mine isn't portable. It's a massive thing which you die carrying.

If Mandy were here, she would've killed me by now. Nothing irritates her more than when I go off at tangents from the main thrust of a conversation. Another acquaintance would have berated me for the use of the word 'thrust', with all its connotations of masculine dominance.

Whatever.

"Well, in the immortal words of Dennis Potter, they can just 'piss off'"

1957 with Night of the Sasquatch, a Canadian B-movie which many many critics hailed as a work ahead of its time. From total obscurity, Bosczech was made Head of Special Effects and Make-Up and rightly so for, even now, many people find it difficult to watch that Dormobile purée ending.

Crossing the border, Bosczech worked on films for a number of US independents, most notably the 3D psychedelic montage of Edgar Allan Poe, gang violence and surf music, The Pit and the Pantihose. Filmed for United American Pictures in 1965, this overpowering movie offers 86 minutes of unbelievable three-dimensional Splatter, which necessitated the distribution of barf bags amongst Sixties' audiences across the States.

By this stage in his career, Carl was making a bigger name for himself, not least for his secrecy. Variety writer Mike Foswell discovered that Bosczech actually directed, lit and filmed all his FX work himself. Foswell also managed to lay his hands on Bosczech's contract for Six Foot Under, only to find that it stipulated Bosczech should have complete control of all the FX scenes. His method of working demanded total secrecy; he never allowed anybody but the necessary actors onto a set when the FX were being shot, and none of those actors have ever revealed his methods.

However, Bosczech had to ensure that his work fitted the overall style of a picture containing his FX. There was a clause in each contract stating that, if there was a break in continuity of style, the scenes would have to be reshot, and the additional cost would be deducted from Bosczech's salary. This clause was never activated and this led many critics to wonder why Bosczech never took up directing himself, as he clearly had a good grasp of a whole range of shooting styles.

These critics never knew the size of his pay checks. In fact, they knew very little about this reputedly quiet and generous man who only ever gave three interviews in his entire career, and who was fiercely protective of his private life.

Bosczech went mainstream in the late Sixties with a number of big budget classics which made him more of a known quantity. He stunned audience everywhere with the quality and clarity of his work in greats such as The Earwig, Curse of the Reptile-Man and Dracula, Bloody Dracula.

His work on Dracula inspired Bob Martin (now working on January 1st: A New Year) also to pursue a vocation of fake blood and exploding corpses. In a recent interview, Bob recalled his affection for Bosczech's work:

'It was like... well, heck, what can I say? I used to watch these things when I was a kid. Secretly, on the late night networks while ma and pa were asleep. And when I saw Bloody Dracula at the drive-in, I thought, 'My God. This is where it's at'. I mean, you look at the chapel scene. The guy runs into view, bang goes the giant stake and whoosh, there are bits of him everywhere. I've watched that clip a million times; slow motion, freeze-frame, you name it, and I still can't find the cut. The edit is so good you think the camera's still on. And the limbs... This is before latex as we know it today. Before modern prosthetics. As far as I'm concerned, Bosczech's the man.'

Having made a comfortable living working for the majors, Bosczech went underground at the turn of the decade; he worked under a variety of pseudonyms and at one stage he even funded a couple of college productions, neither of which made it onto the main circuits.

Many of his followers claim to have spotted Bosczech's touch in a number of other films from that period: science fiction, war movies and even westerns supposedly contain scenes of Bosczech Splatter. Typically, the man himself never admitted or denied making such non-genre flicks and only resurfaced for sure to work on that most influential of all film series: the Zombie Ninja trilogy.

Made in the early Seventies, these three films were primarily the brain-children of Enrico Pagliacci, a spaghetti western director who conceived, directed, scripted and produced the series. And it was while Pagliacci was involved in some private fund-raising in Beverly Hills that the two men met.

There is no denying the pace, style and quality of these films, and it must be said that they form an unbelievable showcase for the most visual, daring and impossible effects that Bosczech has ever done. The gore is so realistic and outrageous, that numerous bodies, both here and in the US, tried to get the films banned. Indeed, while the Zombie trilogy is still the main source of inspiration for most horror celluloid today, some have labelled it the pioneer of another more repulsive kind of film; namely, the snuff movie.

The American press had a field day with Bosczech, who had done nothing more to incur their wrath than keep them at a distance. All the same, the ensuing witch-hunt led to a federal investigation and a rare appearance by Pagliacci and Bosczech on the Johnny Carson Show where the two men defended their finest work. As expected, Pagliacci did most of the talking, but the slim, dark, moustached Bosczech came across as a modest and intelligent man. The official inquiry cleared both men, who then set in motion a battery of law suits against a multitude of newspapers and commenced a legal battle which lasted for almost a decade.

All the same, this and other experiences in the land of the free left a sour taste in Bosczech's mouth. He upped and moved across the Atlantic in 1977 when, ironically, the third of the Zombie Ninja pics, Dawn of the Dan, was making its London debut. Bosczech's experiences also led him to script, produce and direct that infamous '78, black-and-white sickie: The Awful Dead.

Targeted with scathing directness at the tiresome charade of US presidential election campaigns, the film portrayed the effects on a small Midwestern town of a supernatural disease cutely called 'the election bug'. Its victims wake to find themselves transformed into badge-wearing, pennant-waving mindless morons who roam the streets, and stumble from one arena of carnage to another.

"When I saw Bloody Dracula at the drive-in, I thought, 'My God. This is where it's at'"

The Awful Dead was Bosczech's first critical rejection. Some thought the political allegories were too facile, some labelled his gore too predictable, and others simply called the film 'a pile of crap'. Perhaps surprisingly, his direction also came in for some harsh criticism. Another of Bosczech's devotees, Mikel Stapps (currently overseeing FX on the remake of The Slob) once commented:

There's no denying the FX genius of the man, but I think he came to believe too much in the public image of himself. Though he never went public, whole volumes were printed about him. All the usual anecdotes about the secrecy, the privacy, the complete control of his work, the infamous contracts — which I'm sure were nothing more than calculated hype — I think he came to believe all this, that he was more than the actors, the director, the best boy and even the assistant grip. Awful Dead showed that he thought he could do it all himself. Even his FX suffered as a result of this megalomania.

His previous underground stuff was different, it was a real expression of something genuine. But Awful Dead was a knee-jerk reaction to the bad press over the snuff thing, and a reaction to his press image — the well-spoken gore fiend, the paradox. He'd been getting this free print for years and now they had turned against him, which I think must have hurt him — or at least hurt his image — more than it should have done.

Bosczech spent two years hidden away in his Henley-on-Thames manor house before consenting to help out on the highly controversial Paddy McGinty's Goat.

This 1981 French film was banned in many countries including Ireland, where all the location sequences were shot, because of one particular scene which, oddly enough, did not feature Bosczech's work. The scene in question shows the title's eponymous manifestation of Satan forcing a devout Catholic teenage girl to swallow contraceptive pills.

Followers of Bosczech once more frowned on the presence of a political dimension to his work, a dimension which, Bosczech argued, was part of everything he did, at one level or another.

Another hiatus followed, leading many to regard Bosczech as history, even to the extent of delineating 1964-76 as his 'Golden Age'. Then, out of the blue, he participated in a phone interview for an English music magazine, Kerrplunkk, which was running a two-issue review of early Splatter. The conversation yielded this revealing insight of the man behind the splat:

I've always had trouble expressing myself verbally — in conversation or in writing. Even this is proving a little difficult. I've always tried to express myself in what I do, in my work, in my effects. If I've ever gone overboard by, say, making too literal a statement, then the public has the right to tell me where to get off. Having said that, I try to maintain a balance in what I do and, yes, I've always believed that I make heavy metal motion pictures.

Three more years of silence followed before Bosczech shocked the genre world in 1986 by joining the newly formed English horror film company, Malleus. Now five movies old, this hugely successful group combines all the Gothic finesse of British films of the Sixties with the visceral subtlety of a brick in the teeth.

Bosczech was back — and with style!

Whatever the behind-the-scenes arrangements, Bosczech's Malleus FX were as good as they had ever been, and regained a certain flair and excitement that had been absent for years. And it was this surprise comeback which set us at HoP thinking that now was the time to try and get another interview with the man himself.

However, this proved to be no easy task. I had to go through a multitude of company and agency switchboards before learning that the man was as difficult to nail down as ever. There was only one thing for it.

Malleus are currently filming My Wife Was a Teenage Phantom of the Opera, a project that Bosczech would almost certainly be working on. So what else could I do but try to ambush him outside the gates of Malleus' studios deep in the heart of woody Hertfordshire?

For a week or so, my efforts came to nothing.

Then came the payoff.

Before I continue I must stress that much of what follows is impressionistic; in other words, I have endeavoured to present my thoughts as and when they occurred. I think you will agree that the unique nature of the interview demands this unusual indulgence.

I was standing, discreetly huddled in the rain, clutching a Thermos, a pack of soggy chicken sandwiches and a copy of the previous day's Evening Standard. It was growing dark and a multitude of people were passing out through the studio gates. I recognised more than a few of them and so hid my face. I was disguised in a manner which I thought typical of the average autograph hunter; it must have been pretty effective, as I was uniformly ignored.

One hour — two hours — passed, and then I heard a sharp voice call melodramatically through the fencing: 'Mr Hand, I presume?'

I looked up from my newspaper and found myself face-to-face with Carl Bosczech.

He smiled and extended a hand. 'How many days have you been hanging around here, three?'

'Erm... eight.' I felt like a jerk, my interviewer's composure dripping away like so much Kensington Gore.

'Well,' he prompted, 'don't just stand there.

"The gore is so realistic and outrageous that numerous bodies, both here and in the US, tried to get the films banned"

Come on in.' He motioned the guard to let me through, and in I went, tiptoeing between the puddles.

We walked quietly, side-by-side, towards the main studio, and I tried to get some impression of the man. Bosczek had aged well; the only difference I could detect from the few photos I'd seen of him was the addition of a few pounds and a clutch of grey above each temple. He was taller than I had expected, and very self-assured in his demeanour, possessing that confidence common to all rich people.

Then we were there, inside the glorified, giant Portakabin.

'Welcome to the Morgue of Malleus,' he bellowed.

Now I'm no stranger to film sets but the scene before me almost took my breath away. It was an exquisitely detailed, and incredibly well-rendered section of a Gothic cathedral. A couple of props lay here and there, but there was no one around. A single arc lamp illuminated the corner of the building we occupied. Two chairs stood facing one another. I sat in one and he took the other. Then, before I could speak, he said: 'Forgive my malicious streak, but I was wondering how long you would wait to catch sight of me.'

'Sorry?'
'Oh, Mr Hand, your enquiries at the agents' offices etcetera have gone as unnoticed as a cowpat in Harrods.'

'That's my job,' I shrugged, feeling unaccountably guilty.

'Of course.'
I didn't like his smile. He offered me a cigarette. I don't smoke, thanks.

'Yes, it is a bad habit. My GP has been telling me to quit for years. It's playing havoc with my blood pressure. To tell you the truth, I haven't really got that long to live. I've had two strokes already.'

I offered him a chicken sandwich. It was his turn to decline, so I pigged out solitaire, shocked at this candid admission of his ill health.

'But you don't want to hear that, do you?'
'Au contraire, I'm sure my readers would like to read anything and everything about you.'

'You're too kind.'
He went off in search of an ashtray and I assaulted my second sandwich. God it was rank.

'Well,' he said on his return, 'seeing that you are so interested in this, the twilight of my career, and as you've waited so long to speak to me, what can I do but grant you the interview of interviews?'

'Come again?'
That was twice he'd thrown me off guard, and I liked his smile even less.

The interview that finally gets to the bottom of Carl Bosczek; exhaustive, frank and complete. The one that lays the enigma to rest. One you'll be able to sell again and again and again.'

'Off the record — why me?'

'Two reasons. I've read your columns. They're enthusiastic, well-balanced and sympathetic, but they also display a degree of critical sensibility. Secondly, you happen to be here. I've got to set the record straight before I hit the Pearly Gates.'

Something was wrong.
I sat there waiting for the punch-line, but could only manage a comment that was pretty crass, even for me.

'Your accent is remarkably English.'

'Thank you.'
I couldn't believe it. The man was here, prepared to spill the beans; his life, his loves, his beliefs, everything. It was like a dream come true. With shaking fingers, I grabbed hold of my notebook and left it open on my lap. I held a pencil in my right hand and yet another of those evil sandwiches in my left. He waited patiently.

'Okay then, Mr Bosczek...'
'Carl.'
'Carl. Let's start at the beginning. Your first film was the Ontario bigfoot feature in the late Fifties...'

'No, I'd worked on Invasion of the Ga Ga Gorillas in '52, and a number of trash items in between.'

'I didn't know that.'
'No, you wouldn't.'
'Well, how did you get started in Splatter effects? It was hardly a popular, or even known, line of work then, was it?'

'No, but you see, given my ability, there wasn't much else I could do. And I had such a unique talent that I was determined to make my fortune out of it. It's the same talent that has made life so difficult for me.'

'In what way?'
'In every way. It's affected my personal life, my work and my relationship with the rest of the film industry. And if I don't get it off my chest now, I never will and I'll die half insane. You see, I just have to tell someone. Maybe that's a function of the human ego. I don't know.'

'Don't you feel this is a rather dramatic way to discuss horror make-up? Surely any anxiety is of your own making, with your demand for secrecy and such?'

'You don't understand. I can't let anybody watch me work. I have to do it all myself.'

'What about the actors?'

'There are no actors in my effects scenes. There never have been.'

'What?'
Unprofessional. One should never show surprise.

'What you see on the screen is always me. No matter how many people die, male or female. It's always me — in costume. Sure, there are scenes where I just make people up for multiple shots or mass wipe-outs, but for the motion effects, the hard core gore where you see the thing in the process of happening... that's me.'

'But has all this secrecy been necessary? I mean, there was no one who could touch you

"Some have labelled it the pioneer of another more repulsive kind of film; namely, the snuff movie" until at least the late Seventies.'

'There never will be anyone to touch me. They don't have the talent.'

Another chilling smile. Perhaps it was his arrogance I could smell.

'Again, why the secrecy?'

'Because of my talent. You see...'

He stopped and took a deep breath. I didn't know what was coming, but I sensed bad vibes.

'You see, ever since I was a child, I've had this strange ability...'

Oh God! The guy's a weirdo.

'This 'talent', as I call it. Don't ask me how, but I discovered that, just by willing it, I could make any injury appear on my body... anywhere at all, with no pain and no matter how bad it looked.'

'You don't really...'

He ignored me, so I just carried on making notes. I mean, it was still something I could sell.

'I could do anything, anything at all. Now most people would have panicked, but not me. I didn't mention it to anyone, not even the doctor. I just made it my secret and planned how best I could use it. It's very tiring and sometimes, for instance when I have nightmares, it happens all by itself which is why I can never get close to anyone. The strain of keeping it all to myself has been unbearable. You can't appreciate what a relief it is for me to tell someone at last...'

'Well,' I ventured, 'you must admit your story's a little strange.'

'Sure. I think that's why I'm also slightly unhinged.'

And he said that in all seriousness.

'But let me show you,' he smiled.

What a giveaway! It was all leading up to some practical joke. Teach the persistent interviewer a lesson he'll never forget. I almost managed a laugh, so suddenly had the sense of relief flooded over me. All the same, a wodge of bread was still stuck in my throat.

'Here. Let me take you through some of my specialities... Vampire bites...'

Wow! How did he do that?

'...Stigmata. Considered tasteless in some countries...'

Fantastic.

'...Slit throat...'

Neat.

'... Gouged eyes, hanging eyeballs...'

Oh my God.

'...Pneumatic drill churned stomach...'

Where's the exit?

He did 'em. Every last one of 'em, just as he said he could. I saw it all with my own eyes. There was no way he could fake it, and it only took an instant for a wound to appear or vanish, the appropriate area of his body just moved, tore or whatever, as if the injury was actually being inflicted by some invisible device.

'...Machine gun shots...'

His body jerked, spraying blood and stuff over me and my sandwich. I froze, bottom jaw sagging.

When he 're-formed', all the blood and stuff just zipped back into place. It didn't even leave a stain on my clothes.

'...And check this...' he screamed, 'Total Splat-out!'

His head dropped onto his lap, then rolled onto the floor. His arms just flew off somewhere in space; I didn't know where 'cause I was feeling kind of faint. His legs split open at the knees, calves and feet falling forwards, thighs to the side. His body severed from groin to neck and his guts spilled out, his skin peeled inside out. Then the monstrous remains just plopped onto the floor.

I was up to my knees in red, honking up my sandwiches, and making sure that the acrid yellow puddles landed somewhere behind me. I dunno, but maybe if my vomit had mixed with 'Bosczech', then something terrible would have happened, you know like in The Earwig.

I pulled myself together and wiped the mess off my lips with my sleeve. I just could not believe it. It was the most gross, sick thing I had ever seen. To think that I'd spent money watching this very effect in Bosczech's 1963 cheapie Jackie the Ripper. And I still don't know why I didn't collapse or run; I suppose the horror just hadn't had time to sink in.

A minute or two passed and gave me time to fight back another wave of nausea. Then I noticed something. He hadn't reassembled himself again.

My voice sounded weak, pathetic.

'Great... neat trick, Carl... erm... some talent!'

His pancreas stared me mutely in the eye, his spleen showed no sign of moving.

'Right. I've seen it. Come on. We have more things to discuss. Carl?'

Nothing.

'CARL!'

Dead.

'CARRRRLLLL!!!'

The bastard was dead. He'd done his effect and dropped dead. He must've had a stroke or something, or...

'My God! He's bloody dead! And I'm here. He's dead and I'm the only one who knows his secret; his talent. He's dead and his guts are all over the floor and I'm here. He's dead and I'm alive, up to my knees in his blood.'

I was simultaneously overcome by a feeling panic and a sense of indignation.

'You thoughtless, selfish bastard!'

His dead mouth gawped moronically, his eyes two mocking haemorrhages.

'Bastard!'

I kicked his head, scoring a goal through one of the mock arch windows, and it was just then that the cleaning lady entered stage left and screamed.

So, that's it.

In a nutshell.

Take it or leave it.

It looks as though I've finished just in time, too — there's somebody at the door. Now put yourself in my shoes. What would you tell them?

By J A Hall

Rolgar awoke suddenly from a sound sleep, knowing that this was the day. He floated down from the sleeping rail, and settled by the table. As he did so, there was a faint tap at the door and the new little maid came in with his breakfast which she placed on the table.

When the maid turned to go, Rolgar said: 'Wait.'

She paused, knowing quite well what he wanted.

'What is your name?' asked Rolgar.

'Sharvlen, Lord.'

'A pretty name,' said Rolgar, stroking her side with a tentacle.

Sharvlen put up only a token resistance, and afterwards they ate breakfast together. Rolgar noted with some amusement that there were two portions of everything.

Just as they were finishing their meal, there was another knock at the door; this was louder and more peremptory. In response to Rolgar's call, the door opened, and one of the King's messengers came in.

'They are here?' asked Rolgar.

'Yes. They will be taken to the Palace for the formal reception.'

'I shall come at once.'

And with that Rolgar left, stopping only to make a fluttering gesture in the direction of the maid, a gesture which meant: 'I shall see you again'.

'Ready, Mr Ambassador?' asked Hawkins as the ship moved out of orbit for the final descent.

'I believe so,' said Merritt, the white-haired, distinguished golden boy matured in the service of the Federation, well-suited by birth, education and experience for this, the most important task ever entrusted to an Ambassador.

The ship settled gently on the ground; it was a unique event in the history of a planet which had never had a human being on its soil before.

Merritt had been a touch stand-offish on the journey but now, when the thing was so near, he felt disposed to talk.

'A first for them, Captain,' he said, 'and a first for us too.'

'The first non-human world?'

'The first we've found with a life form of comparable intelligence to our own — and, of course, the first we've tried to persuade to join the Federation.'

They had all seen the sencoms, but the reality still came as something of a shock. The Dayash were beings in the shape of two metre diameter spheres of opaque jelly; each sphere had a single eye in a range of colours in its centre, and a mass of tentacles hanging down underneath. Presumably, thought Chuck Mason, the third officer, we must look like nothing on Earth — or wherever — to them.

The Ambassador was accompanied by his personal staff, and Captain Hawkins had decided that he must have some moral support as well, which is why Chuck had gotten to go planetside. The exec and second mate were too valuable, they had remained with the ship, just in case. Hawkins had hesitated a little: the other

"We are an ancient culture' said the King, and some of us have little taste for contact with strangers"

two were wearing more impressive uniforms than Chuck. Hell, he didn't want the ship's company to look cheap! Eventually he had settled on giving Chuck honorary ADC status, lots of unofficial gold braid hanging off the left shoulder. Hawkins and Chuck agreed it looked good.

The effect was rather spoiled by the fact that the Dayash wore no clothes, and so were unimpressed by uniforms. Nevertheless, it made the humans feel better.

Dayash nudity extended to the King himself; he wore no crown, no robes, nothing. He seemed indistinguishable from the rest of his people.

'Your Majesty,' said Merritt, once the introductions were out of the way, 'you have had time to consider the formal offer from the Federation that you should join us. May we now know your decision?'

The King who, along with most of the Dayash, had been studying StandEng, made a slight fluttering of the tentacles which meant 'Don't rush me,' but this was lost on the humans.

'We are an ancient culture,' said the King at last, 'and, to speak plainly, some of us have little taste for contact with alien... that is, with strangers. Yet there are those who see a lot of potential benefits in this contact. We have been unable to decide what to do for the best.'

'I understand,' said Merritt automatically, 'but has your Majesty not the casting vote?'

'I beg your pardon?'

'You can't make a decision yourself?'

The King fluttered his eighteenth and thirty-third tentacles, which would have meant 'not in these trousers', if he had worn any.

'The title 'King', he explained, 'does not, perhaps, have quite the same meaning for us that it does for you. I am more of a spokesman for the whole race. No, we simply cannot make up our mind, so we've decided that the matter should be settled in the old way.'

'The old way?'

'Generations ago,' said the King, 'the Dayash came to the conclusion that war was insane. We began to settle disputes — there were still disputes then, before the different tribes became one — by single combat.'

'Single combat,' repeated Merritt.

'Each party to the dispute appoints a Champion,' said the King patiently, 'and the Champions fight. One is killed — his side loses. One lives — his side wins.'

'And you propose we should use this method to decide whether or not you join the Federation?'

'Just so. Our Champion, Rolgar — ' he gestured to a member of his entourage who looked, to Chuck, just the same as all the others, 'will fight for staying out. Your Champion will fight for our going in.'

'But we have no Champion,' said Merritt.

'Yes we have,' said Chuck.

'You?' Merritt and Hawkins chorused in unison. Before Chuck could answer, Hawkins pulled his comrades to one side and asked in a low tone: 'Just what do you intend?'

'Look,' said Chuck, 'it's obvious. I'm the weapons officer, I'm more or less expendable. Do I need to list all my qualifications?'

'I guess not,' said Hawkins. 'You're right, of course, you are probably as good a choice as any.'

'Hold it,' Merritt broke in, 'how do we know whether your qualifications or experience will be of any relevance? These characters might use swords, or bare fists... bare... tentacles.'

He turned to the King.

'Your Majesty,' he asked in a treacly voice which betrayed none of the emotion he felt, 'may I ask what weapons the Champions use?'

'Traditionally, they would use the xlanth, a sword-edged flail which is exceedingly difficult to master. The inexperienced frequently kill themselves whilst learning to handle it.'

'I see,' said Merritt.

'Of course,' the King continued, 'that was a long time ago. There have been considerable technical advances since then.'

'So now?'

'Now they use scout ships fitted with interstellar drive and armed with plasma inducers.'

'Ah.'

'Rolgar will instruct your appointed Champion,' said the King airily. 'Naturally, should you decline to take part in the contest, then you will simply lose by default.'

'Certainly not,' Chuck put in, 'I'll give it a go.'

The drive and controls of the scout ships proved quite easy to manage, especially after a little tentacle-to-hand adaptation, but the plasma inducer was more tricky. Working on the laser principle, it boosted two separate microwave frequency beams to an intensity at which they turned any solid object, at their point of intersection, into a plasma. The whole trick was in targeting the thing, and there was a screen with two crosses for angle and range. When the crosses and target coincided, you fired. Simple — on land.

In space, it required some practice. And the day appointed for the contest was fast approaching.

'No problem,' said Chuck to anyone who asked. 'I've got the hang of it, I just need a bit more practice.'

Rolgar was dubious. 'It has taken me many years of continuous practice to master it,' he told Chuck, 'I am not sure you will be ready.'

'Chicken, huh?'

Rolgar thought for a while, then said: 'I believe my concern is based on the fact that I have grown to like you, and shall not enjoy killing you.'

Chuck did not reply.

"Naturally, should you decline to take part in the contest, you will simply lose by default"

Ready or not, the day arrived. Since the contest was to take place twenty miles above the surface of the planet, there would be no spectators. Rolgar said this was traditional. Chuck was rather glad; he had an idea that this was going to be tough enough as it was.

Although they had covered the handling of the ship and the operation of the plasma inducer, Rolgar had said nothing about the conduct and etiquette of the contest, so Chuck decided it was now the time to ask.

'No rules,' said Rolgar, 'we simply try to kill each other. Eventually one of us succeeds, and returns to claim victory.'

'What if both Champions get killed?'

'It happened — once,' said Rolgar.

'What happened?'

'In the combat? No one knows. They just got another two Champions and re-enacted the encounter. You do realise that you're just not good enough, don't you?'

Thrown by this sudden change of subject, Chuck forgot his spirit of bravado. 'I know,' he said, 'that is, I'm not sure, now you mention it, but even if I'm not good enough, I represent humanity, and I'm not going to back down. Though I will admit I'm scared.'

Rolgar fluttered a movement which said 'Well done', but Chuck missed it.

It was time to go. Chuck left the planet's surface first, ten minutes before Rolgar. The Dayash told him that this was the privilege of the challenger, but they were lying. Normally the Champions tossed for it, going first gave a slight advantage; and they reckoned Chuck would need one.

Chuck arrived at the appointed spot, and easily recognised old communications satellite, and cruised around, waiting. Before long, he saw Rolgar's ship coming towards him, and moved to the top surface of the satellite where he might not be seen right away.

He was not at all happy about this contest; he had no desire to kill someone who was not only a willing and able teacher, but also a friend. However, it now dawned on Chuck that everyone except him was absolutely serious about this business. Rolgar would kill him if he could, and what is more, the future of the Federation, perhaps of all humanity, would be affected by what happened here. It was important that the Dayash join, it would prevent the Federation becoming a cosy little club for humanity. Chuck decided that, come what may, he would do his best to kill Rolgar.

Rolgar's ship had slowed down, and was now about a mile below, well within range, so Chuck moved out slowly and cautiously. He had plenty of time to line up angle and range controls, and fire. The beams left only the faintest of traces, which were easily missed, if you happened to be careless, but bright enough for Rolgar to see and gently evade them. Behind him, the beams met with just the merest sign of the enormous energy that had been released, a slight blueness in the grey of space.

Rolgar seemed to be manoeuvring, and Chuck guessed he was going to fire back. Yes, that slight trace was visible as the beams came for him. Chuck moved back behind the satellite, and was able to observe the beams meeting close up. They were slightly more impressive this close than from a mile away, but they still didn't seem like much to worry about, although Chuck knew that their appearance was deceptive.

"My concern is based on the fact that I have grown to like you, and shall not enjoy killing you"

Now Rolgar was moving again, away from the vicinity of the satellite and out into space. Chuck followed, he did not intend to fire again until he knew where Rolgar was going and what he intended.

They travelled sixty miles or so, then Chuck realised what Rolgar was heading for: a huge heap of scrap metal floating in space. It looked as though it had once been a dock for deep-space vessels, with repair facilities and living accommodation all abandoned long ago, with no attempt made to salvage anything. Once Rolgar moved in amongst that lot, he would be impossible to find. Besides which, there was every possibility that Rolgar knew his way around, he might have been here every week for the whole of his life.

On impulse, Chuck targetted and fired, but Rolgar easily evaded him. Chuck wondered how; true, through the dome-shaped windows there was uninterrupted vision all around, but Chuck found it difficult enough to see everything with two eyes, and Rolgar only had one. Instinct?

Rolgar had slowed right down, Chuck did the same and tried to see where the other ship might be going. Rolgar headed into what looked like a dock, but Chuck decided that he didn't want to go in amongst the tangled heap of scrap, so he moved to a position where he had some solid metal underneath him.

He waited twenty minutes by his watch, but it felt like forever. Then he saw Rolgar moving out again below him; he almost had a chance to fire, but the angle was wrong.

Carefully, Chuck eased out from behind the twisted metal, and as he did so, Rolgar began to move faster, away from the heap of debris.

Chuck had to speed up to follow him, and soon they were tearing along, Rolgar weaving faster and faster so that Chuck could never get a straight shot at him.

Then he was gone.

Chuck blinked, then turned his head as he realised that the Dayash had dived, spun, and come out on his tail. Sure enough, there he was.

Rolgar gripped the trigger as the crosses coincided on his screen, saw before him the man he had grown to like. He hesitated —

Generations ago, the Dayash Champions had often hesitated at the last moment. After all, there were only a few Champions, they tended to know each other, very often trained together and took an interest in one another's fights. So they sometimes found it difficult to kill someone they liked and admired. But the rules were inflexible: a fight was to the death. The Dayash had overcome this difficulty quite simply, by joining the whole race with the mind of the Champion at the moment of victory. This had a twofold result: it made for a clean kill, and it had a cathartic effect that proved very useful to a race which generally deplored violence. At that moment, Rolgar was the Dayash.

Then he fired.

Chuck's ship disintegrated in a flash of hot gas, which dispersed immediately. Rolgar flew back to the space station and landed on top of it. There he sat, lost in thought for some considerable time, before going home.

*****

'So,' said Merritt, 'that about does it. I shall tell my people that you do not wish to join us. This I deeply regret, it would have been of benefit to both our races.'

'On the contrary,' said the King, 'we do wish to join you.'

'But we lost the combat!'

'Precisely. Your Champion knew he could never win, he knew that he would be killed, yet he went ahead anyway. We are not afraid to admit that we might have been wrong, only a fool makes a virtue of never changing his mind. We admire bravery, and your Champion's death has converted many who were most strongly opposed to our joining you. Besides, such foolhardiness tends to run in species, and can take a less pleasant form. We realise that, should we not join you now, your race will return at some time in the future, and next time you might not behave so reasonably. No, we shall join your Federation. Stay here for a while — there will be a certain amount of formal debauchery.'

*****

The little maid, Sharvlen, stepped into Rolgar's room, pushing a baby bubble ahead of her.

'What's this?' asked Rolgar.

'My son, Lord.'

'And mine, Wife,' said Rolgar formally.

'Thank you, Husband. You will need to name him.'

'That is easy, I shall call him Chuck.'

His new wife fluttered in complete horror mingled with dissent, but said only: 'That is certainly an unusual name.'

'It was the name of a brave man,' Rolgar explained, 'and, if we are to associate with these people, we might as well get used to their names. Perhaps one day they will use our names for their children.'

'Yes. And perhaps one day our son will be a Champion.'

'Never,' said Rolgar firmly, 'It's no job for anyone with a shred of decency, and besides, things will change as we get to know humanity better; there will be less call for Champions. I want him to be a poet.'

'A poet?'

'Yes. There's more money in it, and more respect. And it's the sort of job where having an unusual name is almost certainly a guarantee of fame and fortune.'

DAVID L DUGGINS

Mike wanted to know what time it was. That was the only thing about riding with Mike: he asked what the time was about every twenty minutes.

'Time for you to get your own fucking watch,' Jeff growled. 'And if you ask me again, you can walk the rest of the way back to New York.'

Mike didn't give him any shit in reply. He was pretty cool, except for always hassling about the time.

'Where are we, anyway?' Mike asked finally.

Jeff shrugged. 'Don't know. Virginia, maybe. Still one hell of a long way from home.'

'But not far away from rich,' Mike said. He sang a chorus of 'White Christmas'. Jeff laughed, nodding. He glanced up into the rearview mirror. The interstate traffic was light for a Sunday.

'Is the shit okay?' he asked Mike. He couldn't see Mike's face, but he figured Mike was probably rolling his eyes; he guessed he was asking that question about as often as Mike asked what time it was.

'Yeah, yeah, it's okay, it ain't going anywhere.'

'Check it again anyway,' Jeff snapped. 'It's only about a million and a half on the street, you know.'

'Yeah,' Mike said disgustedly, leaning over the front seat. Reaching under the corner of the back seat, he flipped a hidden latch. The seat tipped up to reveal a compartment filled to the brim with plastic bags containing a fine white powder.

'Yeah, it's a million and a half,' Mike said. 'Closer to two, if we stretch it. But it ain't got legs, Jeff. It's not gonna get up and walk away.'

'Don't count on it,' Jeff snorted. 'You're damned right we're gonna stretch it, he thought. Another half mil in our pockets, thanks to a little help from a lot of powdered baby formula. 'I protect my interests.'

'Yeah,' Mike said.

When we get home and unload this haul, you can go out and buy yourself a four thousand dollar Rolex, man. We get this shit on the street, and I won't have to listen to you ask me the time, and you won't have to listen to me ask you to check the stuff. Until then, I'm gonna worry.'

"Something cold and slimy seemed to inch its way up his back, finally lodging in his throat"

'Yeah,' Mike said. 'I'm gettin' hungry, man. Can we grab a bite somewhere?'

Jeff sighed. 'Sure,' he said. 'I'll find us a quickie mart and we can grab and go. Can you hang with that?'

'That's cool.'

Really, things hadn't gone badly at all, Jeff mused. Not bad for a weeks' work — and not bad for their first deal. Leave for Florida from New York with the cash in an envelope on Friday, drive a couple of days, meet with the dude late Monday night, party it through until Tuesday morning, get laid, hand the dude the envelope, drive the car around back, load up and get gone. Three days back, and help yourself to a little of the merchandise, just to keep the momentum going. If the going gets really grungy, stop for some z's at the local fleabag. A day or two either way, who cares? Jeff thought. What you're looking at is a healthy profit.

Pretty sweet.

His stomach growled. He spotted the skyscraper-sized sign of an off-ramp market, flipped on the turn signal and eased out of the interstate flow, decelerating onto the exit ramp. 'I'm fucking seriously hungry, man,' he said.

'No doubt,' Mike said. 'My stomach's eating my leg.'

'I'm gonna buy my own market when we unload,' Jeff said as he pulled into the parking lot. 'All we'll stock is brew, rubbers and blow.'

'We could run a whorehouse out of the back,' Mike said with a grin.

'Outstanding! Give the people what they want.'

'Fucking-A'

Jeff and Mike got out. The parking lot was deserted. The market was deserted except for the cashier. The traffic on the interstate was a distant whisper.

'In and out and on the road again,' Jeff said, heading for the big glass double doors, Mike behind him.

Inside they found the usual junk food and soda, along with an assortment of everything from rock T-shirts to crab medicine. They grabbed bags of chips, cookies, snack cakes and sixpacks of soda, deciding against brew for the road.

'Just a risk we don't need,' Jeff said.

'Shouldn't drink and drive,' Mike added. They laughed.

The cashier smiled as he rang up their purchases. 'Going far?' he asked.

Jeff nodded. 'Came a long way, and got a long way to go yet.'

'I used to love road trippin',' the cashier said. 'Driving just gives me a bitch of a headache these days.'

'Yeah,' Mike said.

'You got a bathroom?' Jeff asked.

'In back around the corner.' The cashier pointed to the rear of the store.

'Thanks,' Jeff said. 'Gotta lighten the load before we hit the road, you know.'

'I hear you,' the clerk said, still smiling.

'I think that guy's a faggot, man,' Mike said after he and Jeff had found the men's room and closed and locked the door behind them.

'Naw,' Jeff said, doing a hit from the glass vial he kept in his front pocket. 'You think everybody's a faggot.' He handed the vial to Mike, sniffing deeply. This uncut shit was so smooth; it never burned or made you sneeze.

'He was staring at your crotch the whole time we were standing there,' Mike said, inhaling the remainder of the contents of the vial.

'You're just jealous,' Jeff said.

'Yeah, right,' Mike said. 'Anyway, I don't think everybody's a faggot. I just know you are.'

'Fuck you and the horse you rode in on,' Jeff replied. 'Let's roll. My feet are itchin'.'

They checked out each other's noses for telltale traces of white as they left the washroom. The cashier looked up from the paperback novel he was reading and gave them a wave. 'Maybe see ya again sometime,' he said.

'Never can tell, can ya?' Mike said, snickering. They'd left the junk food cache on the counter while they were in the can; Jeff grabbed the bags and Mike got the door for him.

The silence was like a slap. It was only when they walked out and let the market door slam shut behind them that Jeff realised the cashier had been listening to a radio.

'Jesus,' he said. 'Let's hit it. I want to hear some jam.'

'Seriously,' Mike said. 'You're driving on the interstate,' he intoned, imitating Rod Serling. 'you think the exit ramp leads to a place to eat, but in fact you just exited into The Twilight Z—'

They both stopped short when they saw the car. Mike shut his mouth with a snap. Jeff moved a couple of steps closer. The bags dropped to the pavement.

'Son of a bitch,' Jeff said quietly.

The hood of the car was covered in graffiti. Slogans had been cut through the paint with a very sharp object and were scored deep into the metal underneath. Crude pictures had been drawn.

As Jeff read the slogans, something cold and slimy seemed to inch its way up his back, finally lodging in his throat.

Brotherhood of Hell — Lemmy Doc Jasper '88, one of the slogans read. Darkness From the Depth said another. He rules both Pit and Earth above Kingdom of Sin. King of Chaos. Pain is his Pudding.

'Jeff, look,' Mike said urgently, pointing across the parking lot. A kid about their own age, late teens or early twenties, had materialised out of the tall grass beside the outbuilding that housed the gas pumps. The kid had long, dirty brown hair. He wore a brown leather hat and a jean jacket. He had a piece of hay sticking out of the corner of his smiling mouth. The smile was made sinister by many missing teeth.

In his left hand was a knife with a long, curved blade and a serrated edge.

Jeff walked around the car toward the kid. 'Did you do this shit to my car, you little fuck?' he snarled, red color rising into his face.

'Jeff, what are you doing, man?' Mike hissed. 'We don't need any trouble. Let's just blow, man. We don't need no cops showing up.'

'Fuck that,' Jeff said, clenching his fists. 'Little bastard wrote that evil shit on my car. He cut that shit into my car!'

'Just let it go,' Mike said. 'Come on.'

'Go around to the trunk,' Jeff said. 'There's a tire iron in there.'

'No, man,' Mike pleaded. 'How long were we in there? Five minutes, tops? You think he did all that damage by himself in five minutes? Let's just blow, we don't need any shit coming down on us.'

Jeff glared at him. 'Get it,' he said.

The boy stood at the edge of the parking lot, still smiling.

'You'd better start running, man,' Jeff yelled. 'You're gonna need a good head start. I'm not kidding.'

The boy didn't move.

'Your ass is mine,' spat Jeff, and then a loud maring and screeching was in his ears, coming from behind. He knew what it was before he glanced round. A huge, white station wagon sped into the parking lot, leaving black streaks on the pavement and a haze of white oilsmoke in the air. It swerved left, heading straight for the back of Jeff's car, straight for Mike.

'Heads up, man!' Jeff screamed. Mike looked up as he shut the trunk, the tire iron in his hand.

'Huh?' he said, and blinked.

The white station wagon slammed into Mike, and, an instant later, into the back of Jeff's car. Metal popped; glass jingled. Jeff heard Mike's ribcage splinter. He saw blood spray from his mouth and nose. As the two cars met, he saw the skin along the side of Mike's midsection split. He ripped open like a doll with a badly stitched seam and slid to his knees, arms crossed, gripping himself, his mouth open and sluicing blood. Mike coughed once, made a gargling sound. He sagged, arms loosening, and then his ruined ribcage parted and his abdomen opened and Mike came apart on the pavement. His shattered body twitched. Droplets of blood danced upward and pattered onto the pavement.

Jeff opened his mouth to scream and suddenly found himself doubled over, hands cupped over his crotch. The long-haired boy stood over him. 'Gonna kick you again,' he said conversationally, and backed off a little. He wore boots with pointed toes, and the toe caught Jeff on the underside of the chin. He went down, sprawled full-length. His mind swam. His vision was hazy. A roaring sound filled his ears, and it took him a second to realise that it was the station wagon again. He heard the rattle and pop of gravel under its tires as it reversed across the parking lot. He heard the hum of the engine, and he felt the vibration of it through the contact of his head with the pavement. It was turning toward him. He had to move. But he couldn't. Pain imprisoned him.

The long-haired boy stepped back as the big car rolled forward, forward. Jeff smelled heat, rubber. He closed his eyes. He could feel it, right next to him. The engine idled.

The gearshift engaged. The car rolled backward. Jeff tried to move again; no good. He opened his eyes. His vision had cleared.

He looked up just in time to see the station wagon roll forward again. The sun glinted on the grillwork, making the car seem to grin. It loomed over him, huge and blocky, and the right front tire rolled over his right hand. The car stopped, trapping his pinky and ring fingers under the wheel.

Jeff howled. The long-haired boy laughed in answer.

The engine died. The driver's and passenger's side doors opened and two more sets of boots with pointed toes hit the pavement. Jeff looked up into two pairs of cold, dark eyes, two vacant smiles. These two had long hair as well, and were dressed like the boy with the knife. One was similarly armed; the other held a meat cleaver.

'Go take care of the other one,' the boy with the knife said. The boy with the cleaver smiled, and moved off, while the other crouched down beside Jeff.

'C'mere, Lenny,' he said. The boy who had kicked Jeff came over.

'How's your nuts, guy?' Lenny said. The two boys laughed.

'Lenny did a job on you, man.'

'Hey, Doc,' Lenny said quietly, 'can I have his eyes, man? It's my turn.'

Doc chuckled. 'You'll have to share with your brother. One for you, one for him.'

'I want 'em both,' Lenny sulked. 'Jasper got 'em last time. It's my turn.'

'Share and share alike,' Doc said.

'It's my turn,' Lenny said sullenly.

Brotherhood of Hell — Lenny Doc Jasper '88, Jeff remembered. He rules both Pit and Earth above. Pain is his Pudding.

His hand was burning agony. He fought to think. Doc and Lenny are here, keeping an eye on me. What's Jasper doing?

He heard it then — a series of wet chopping sounds. He closed his eyes, weeping hopelessly.

'Tough day, huh, guy?' Doc said. 'Everybody needs a friend on days like this — right, Lenny?'

'Right,' Lenny answered up.

'Bring this guy his friend, Jasper,' Doc said.

Thumping footsteps moved across the pavement. Jeff kept his eyes closed. Jasper's shadow fell across his face. Jeff felt a soft weight fall onto his chest.

'With friends like these,' Doc said, 'who needs enemies? Right, guy?'

Jeff didn't want to open his eyes. They opened, anyway.

Mike's head sat propped up on Jeff's chest,

DAVID L. DUGGINS is an American in the US Forces stationed in High Wycombe. He has had several stories published in American small press magazines; this is his first professional sale. He is currently looking for an agent for his first novel and is working on a second.

the dead eyes staring through him, beyond him. They had stuffed something into his mouth. Jeff couldn't tell what it was, but he could see that it was part of Mike.

'Good friends stick together through thick and thin,' Doc commented.

That was certainly true. Jeff's mind floated back to a time when he and Mike were kids. They were playing on the big kids' swingsets Municipal Park. They weren't supposed to use the big swingsets, Mom had told them that a million times if she'd told them once, but they had to see what the big swings were like. Jeff had fallen off in the middle of a forward swing and landed on his head. He woke up in a hospital and his Mom told him that Mike had come running up to a policeman and reported what had happened, and the policeman had called an ambulance. The policeman said Mike had been very calm and brave.

Mike is certainly calm now, Jeff thought.

'Wake up, sleepyhead,' Lenny said, kicking Jeff in the side of the head.

'Have a little courtesy,' Doc said. 'Let's try to make his last moments comfortable, shall we?' He leaned over, his nose almost touching Jeff's. 'Do you know anything about sacrifice, man?' he asked. His breath reeked. 'I wonder if anybody these days really knows anything about sacrifice. People these days aren't willing to make sacrifices, you know? If things don't go their way they just... bug out... sell out... take the easiest path, and they don't care who they fuck over on the way out. You get what I'm saying?'

Jeff didn't answer. The pain was a claxon in his nerve endings. Doc eased himself into a sitting position and continued.

'It's a tough old world,' Doc said, 'but there are ways to get by. You can get what you want. There are ways.' He paused. 'But it can't... be... done... without sacrifice.'

Lenny and Jasper stood at the edge of Jeff's vision, eyes gleaming.

'Sacrifice for friends,' Doc said. 'Sacrifice for loved ones.'

Lenny and Jasper moved closer.

'Sacrifice to your god.'

Jeff tensed, but Doc wasn't finished yet. The pain was a deep throbbing, living in his mind. Pain was not a thing of the flesh; it was a thing of the mind. He worked on driving it out.

'Do you believe in God, man?' Doc asked. 'I do. Man, you'd be crazy not to, all the wild shit that happens in the world. Yeah, I believe in God. I believe he's a cruel, childish son of a bitch.'

Lenny and Jasper laughed.

'He's fine for heaven,' Doc said. 'He's fine for up there, for that great kingdom in the sky, you know what I'm saying? He's a king in his kingdom, up there. But what is he down here, man? What is he?'

Doc cracked his knuckles, flipped the knife into the air, deftly caught it with one hand. 'He ain't nothing down here, man. You pray to him from way down here... and maybe he can hear you... but He can't reach you from way up there. Maybe he could a long time ago, in the Old Testament days, but not any more. He's moving away from us. We don't mean so much any more. He sees us down here in all our pettiness and foolishness and he says, 'Fuck this, I'm out of here, these cats are undeserving.'

Doc stood, and lifted his head. 'He will receive us unto Heaven!' Doc shouted. 'But what the fuck am I supposed to do while I'm down here?'

Lenny and Jasper watched, hypnotised. Jeff watched, too, but his mind was occupied. He was chasing the pain away. He could feel it disappearing.

Doc knelt down again. 'So I looked for an alternative, and be damned if there isn't one!' He tilted his head, considering. 'Actually, I'll most likely be damned because there is one.' All three of them laughed this time.

Jeff looked up at the sky. The colors were moving, deepening with the approach of dusk.

The pain was gone. He was weak, but the pain was gone.

Lenny reached down and rolled Mike's head off Jeff's chest. Jasper scooted it clear with his foot, and then kicked it across the parking lot.

'You understand, I hold nothing against you,' Doc said apologetically. 'But sacrifices must be made. That's the way it's got to be. It's what my god demands.' He raised the knife above Jeff's chest.

'It's too bad about your friend there,' Doc said. 'He would have been good, but he was already dead when we got to him.'

Jeff locked his eyes on the blade of the knife.

'He would have been good. But, see, we've got to have your guts out of you while you're still alive. My god demands it.'

Jeff's vision clouded around the shape of the blade. He breathed evenly, deeply. He saw nothing but the blade.

'It's good to learn sacrifice, don't you agree?' Doc said to Lenny and Jasper. They nodded, staring at Jeff, their faces wet, soft.

Doc grinned. 'This will only hurt for a second,' he said, and he brought the knife down.

Jeff watched the blade descend. He did not blink. He saw it fall from the top of its arc all the way down to a line he had mentally drawn in space about a half inch above his chest. When the tip of the blade crossed that line, Jeff moved. He twisted sideways. His trapped fingers ripped free with twin popping sounds. Jeff heard the sound of metal against concrete as the blade struck the ground where he had been. He continued to roll. He rolled into Lenny and Jasper's feet and knocked them both down. Knife and cleaver flew. He came up, saw the cleaver, and grabbed it.

Jeff's grip on the cleaver was strange, awkward. He realised he had left his pinky and ring fingers underneath the wheel of the white station wagon.

'No!' Doc wailed, knife held high again. Lenny and Jasper were struggling to their feet.

Jeff sidestepped over to where the knife lay and kicked it into the grass, out of reach.

'You're not supposed to move,' Doc moaned. 'You're supposed to lie there... be afraid... accept the sacrifice. My god needs you to be afraid! He needs a sacrifice!'

'Maybe he's not too particular about where his dinner comes from,' Jeff said, and he leapt in. He dodged around a clumsy thrust from Doc, brought the cleaver up and slammed it into Doc's face. Doc fell backward into the white station wagon. Jeff had hit him hard enough to slide the top corner of the cleaver's blade bloodlessly through the back of his head; the passenger's side window shattered as he fell against it.

Doc slid down the front of the car. The corner of the meat cleaver left a long scratch in the paint.

Lenny and Jasper looked at Doc, then looked at each other, and ran. They loped across the parking lot with broken, irregular strides. Jeff could tell by watching them that they were not used to running.

He could catch up easily.

Smiling, Jeff strolled to his car. The front had been slightly damaged in its collision with the side of the market, but it didn't seem too bad; perhaps the car would start. If it doesn't, I'll just take the station wagon, Jeff thought. Run them down in their own car.

The back of the car was much more badly damaged than the front. The rear window had been broken out, the fender mangled, lights smashed.

Blood was splashed outside and inside, clear up to the front seat; and there were pieces of Mike scattered all around the car. Jeff stepped over them and got in, inserting the key into the ignition. He turned once, tamping the gas pedal. The car started immediately. He backed it up, ignoring the slight thump-and-rattle of whatever he was backing over, and swung out of the market's parking lot. As he turned the wheel he saw his right hand for the first time.

The ring and pinky fingers were strange glistening knobs, black with coagulated blood. The fingers had simply come free of the sockets. The bleeding had stopped. There was no pain, and there would be none. Maybe later, when I get to New York, he thought. No time for it now.

He saw them, running along the side of a little two-lane country road that lay parallel to the interstate. Right beside the road, Jeff thought, as he turned onto it. Idiots. If you'd cut across a field or something, you might have had a chance.

Jeff cut the distance between himself and the two boys in half, and then in half again, and he saw them turn and try to run into the field next to the road. There was a high board fence there. Neither of them could manage to scramble over it.

My God demands a sacrifice: Doc's words rang in Jeff's ears.

Lenny and Jasper were dark shapes against the darker plane of the fence. Jeff kicked on the headlights. Only one of them worked. He thought of Mike, always wanting to know what time it was, not knowing how little he actually had left. He thought of the deal that lay ahead, in New York. He thought again of Doc.

My God demands a sacrifice.

'My God helps those who helps themselves,' Jeff said aloud. He laughed as he gunned the car forward, backward, forward again. The wheel lurched and spun in his hand. Backward, forward again. His hands changed places in the range of his vision. His watch was on his left wrist, and he caught a glimpse of it out of the corner of his eye.

Mike: always wanting to know what time it was.

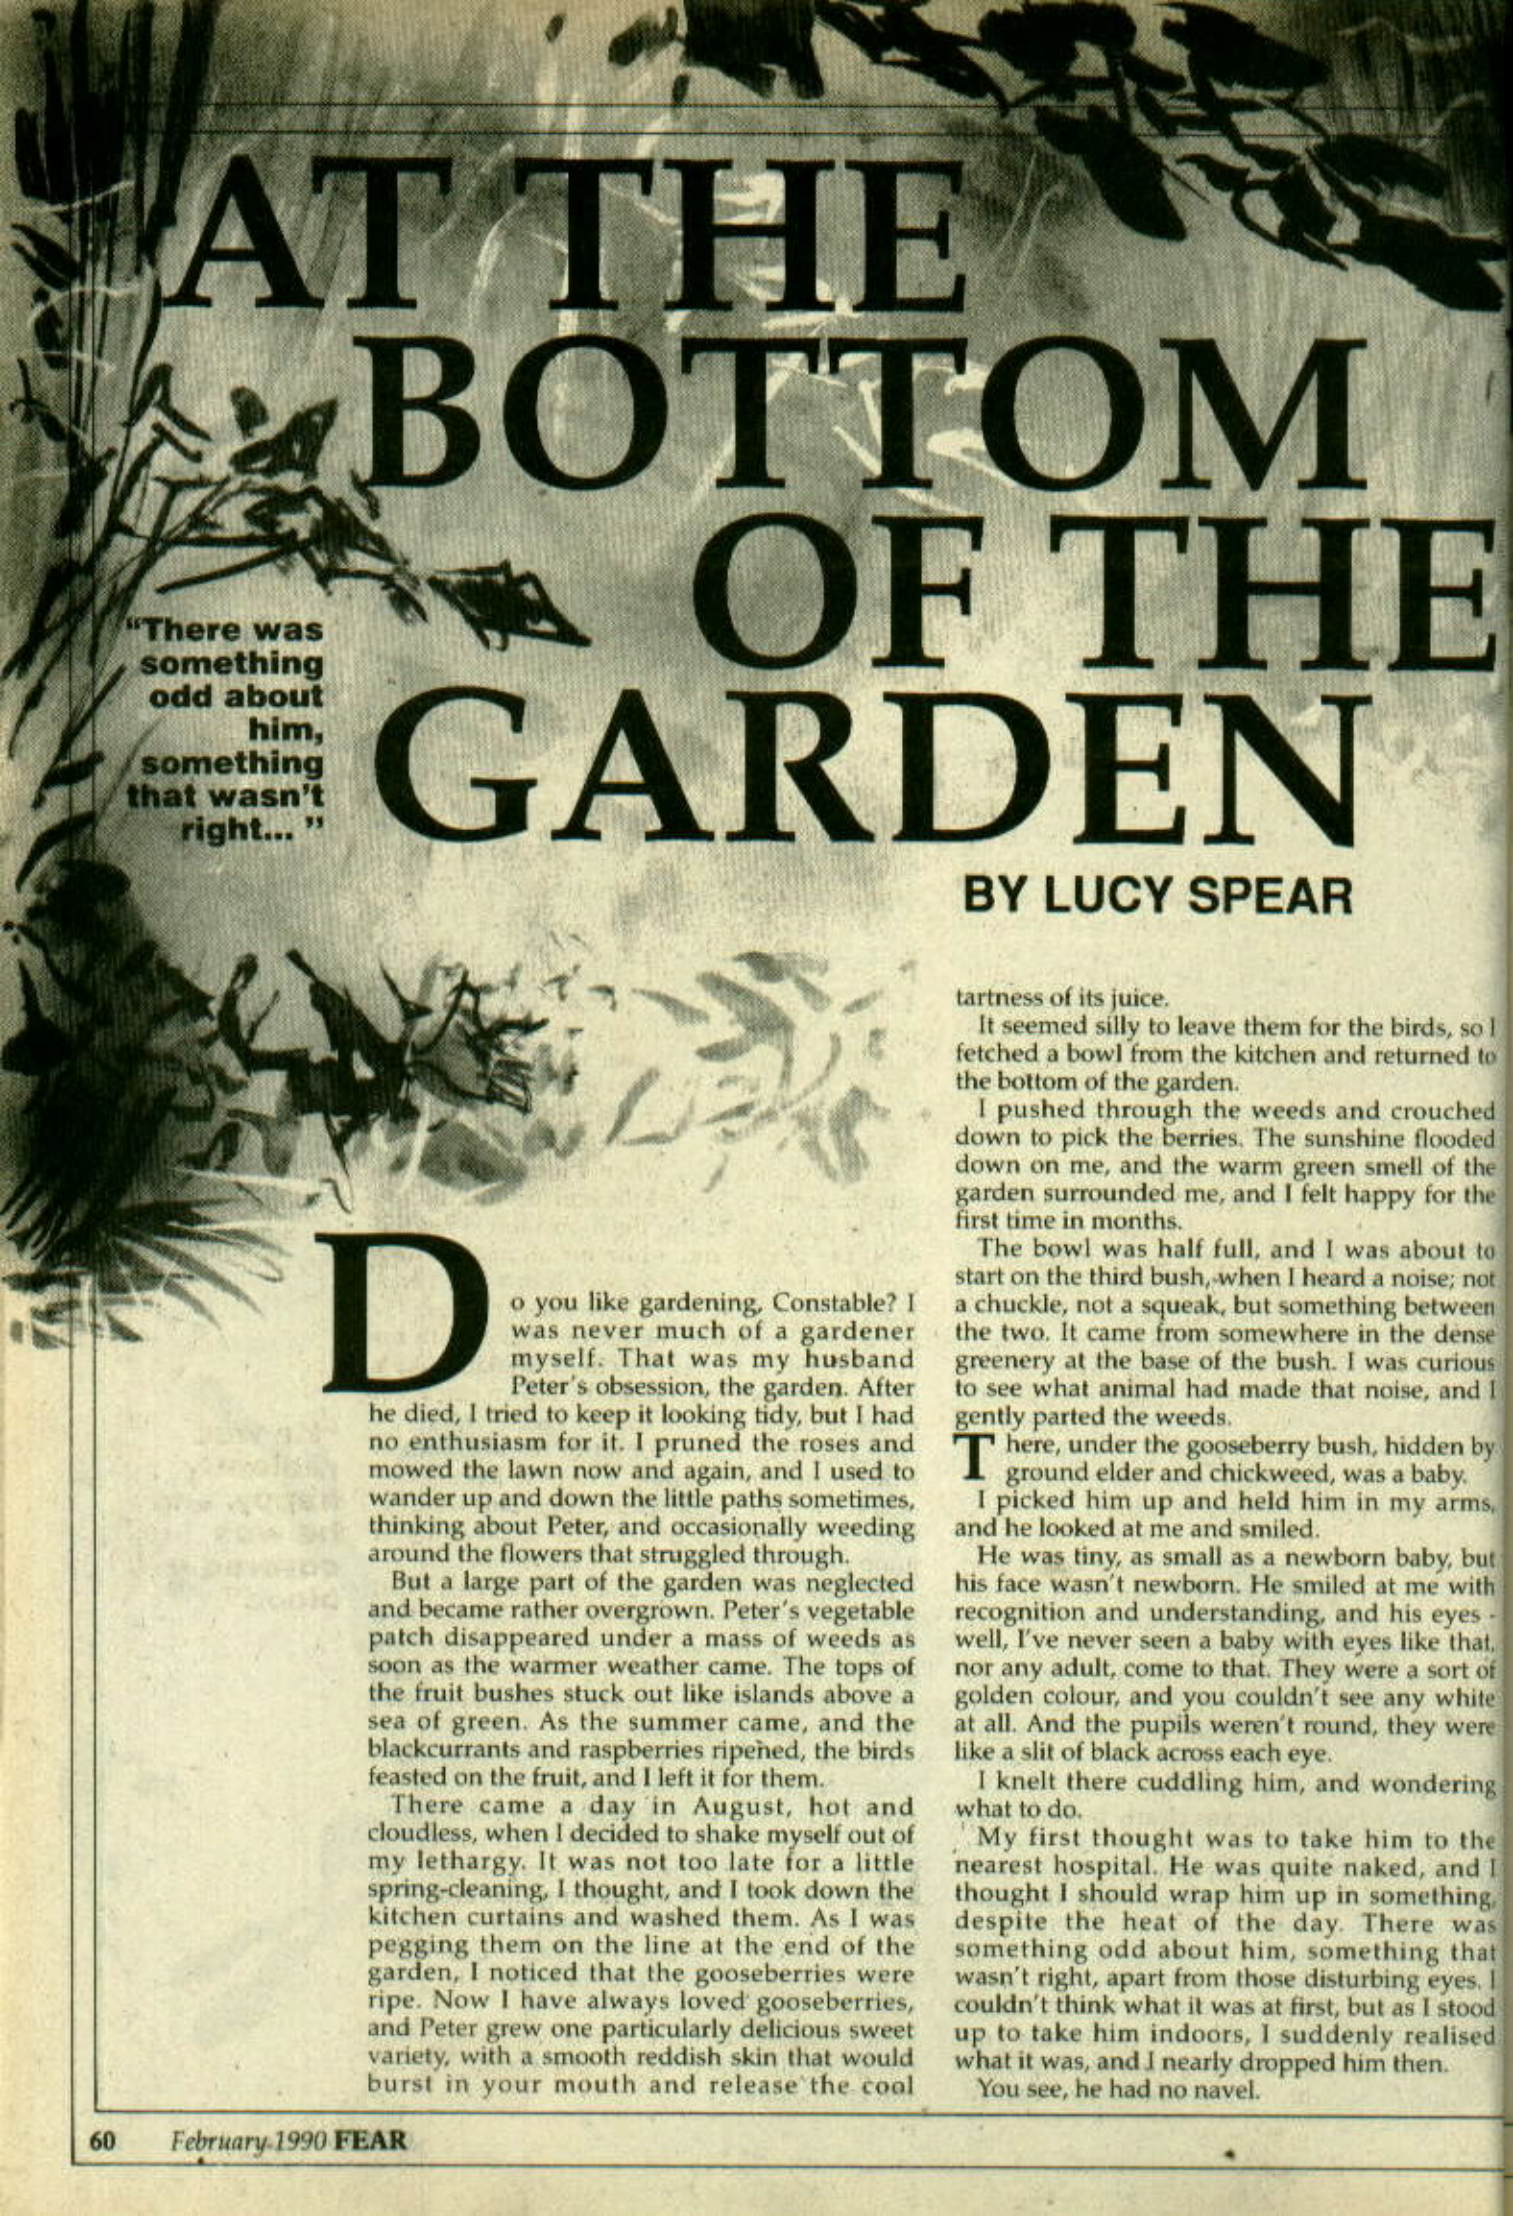

Backward, forward again.

'It's five past four,' Jeff said, laughing.

AT THE BOTTOM OF THE GARDEN

"There was something odd about him, something that wasn't right..."

BY LUCY SPEAR

Do you like gardening, Constable? I was never much of a gardener myself. That was my husband Peter's obsession, the garden. After he died, I tried to keep it looking tidy, but I had no enthusiasm for it. I pruned the roses and mowed the lawn now and again, and I used to wander up and down the little paths sometimes, thinking about Peter, and occasionally weeding around the flowers that struggled through.

But a large part of the garden was neglected and became rather overgrown. Peter's vegetable patch disappeared under a mass of weeds as soon as the warmer weather came. The tops of the fruit bushes stuck out like islands above a sea of green. As the summer came, and the blackcurrants and raspberries ripened, the birds feasted on the fruit, and I left it for them.

There came a day in August, hot and cloudless, when I decided to shake myself out of my lethargy. It was not too late for a little spring-cleaning, I thought, and I took down the kitchen curtains and washed them. As I was pegging them on the line at the end of the garden, I noticed that the gooseberries were ripe. Now I have always loved gooseberries, and Peter grew one particularly delicious sweet variety, with a smooth reddish skin that would burst in your mouth and release the cool tartness of its juice.

It seemed silly to leave them for the birds, so I fetched a bowl from the kitchen and returned to the bottom of the garden.

I pushed through the weeds and crouched down to pick the berries. The sunshine flooded down on me, and the warm green smell of the garden surrounded me, and I felt happy for the first time in months.

The bowl was half full, and I was about to start on the third bush, when I heard a noise; not a chuckle, not a squeak, but something between the two. It came from somewhere in the dense greenery at the base of the bush. I was curious to see what animal had made that noise, and I gently parted the weeds.

There, under the gooseberry bush, hidden by ground elder and chickweed, was a baby.

I picked him up and held him in my arms, and he looked at me and smiled.

He was tiny, as small as a newborn baby, but his face wasn't newborn. He smiled at me with recognition and understanding, and his eyes - well, I've never seen a baby with eyes like that, nor any adult, come to that. They were a sort of golden colour, and you couldn't see any white at all. And the pupils weren't round, they were like a slit of black across each eye.

I knelt there cuddling him, and wondering what to do.

My first thought was to take him to the nearest hospital. He was quite naked, and I thought I should wrap him up in something, despite the heat of the day. There was something odd about him, something that wasn't right, apart from those disturbing eyes. I couldn't think what it was at first, but as I stood up to take him indoors, I suddenly realised what it was, and I nearly dropped him then.

You see, he had no navel.

There were other things about him that were different, too, I noticed afterwards, once I had decided to keep him. The tiny nails on his fingers and toes were pointed, like little claws and, under his shiny brown curls, his ears were pointed too. But it was the fact that he had no navel that made me decide not to take him to a hospital, not to tell anyone at all, but to keep him myself. I knew that he wasn't human. I knew that if I gave him up, he would become a scientific curiosity, something to be observed and discussed, perhaps even experimented upon. I couldn't bear to think of him never having a proper home, never having somebody to love him, and I felt sorry for him.

So I kept him, and said nothing. Because I knew he wasn't human, I didn't worry when he acted differently from human babies. He wouldn't drink milk, and I wondered what to feed him on at first, until I saw the way he looked at the bowl of gooseberries. I mashed some up and fed them to him on a spoon, and he loved that. He ate nothing but gooseberries for nearly a fortnight, and he was thriving. He grew plump and strong, and was sitting up by himself and beginning to crawl by the time the gooseberries in the garden were nearly all finished.

I always left him at home while I went out for my little bits of shopping down the road. I made sure I was never out for long, but now that he was so active, I worried about him hurting himself while I was out.

I hurried to the shops and back, and as I opened the front door, I could hear him crying in the kitchen. I found him sitting beside the open fridge, a lump of cheese on the floor beside him. He had bitten into it and spat the mouthful out again; he was clearly both hungry and frustrated.

As he opened his mouth to wail again, I could see that several little teeth had come through. They were very white, and they were pointed.

I picked him up and soothed him. Still holding him in one arm, I began to unpack my shopping basket. I put apples and carrots on the table, and then I reached into the basket and pulled out the plastic bag containing the lamb chop I had bought for my dinner. He reached across and snatched it from my hand. Before I could do anything, he was tearing at the plastic with his hands and teeth, and had begun to chew the raw, damp meat with evident enjoyment. I sat him down on the floor and watched with some alarm as he ate the whole chop, worrying and chewing at the bone in the end, and contentedly licking the blood from his tiny hands to finish with.

From that day on he would only eat raw meat. At first I bought him more lamb chops, and a piece of steak now and then. But as the days went on and he began to toddle around, his appetite grew, and I had to buy him a leg of lamb, or a beef joint, every day. The butcher must have thought I was crazy, buying so much meat, but I didn't dare tell him about my boy.

I began to worry about what I could do if his appetite grew any bigger. I was eating little enough myself as it was, as it cost so much to feed him now.

Then one day I came home with some nice liver for him, and found him sitting on the floor surrounded by feathers. His mouth and hands were smeared with blood, and those unhuman eyes were glazed with satisfaction. The back door was open. I hadn't realised he was able to unlock it and go in and out as he chose. He had somehow managed to catch a bird, a blackbird I think it must have been. He had eaten everything except the feathers and part of the head.

The next morning, when I went downstairs into the kitchen, I found the remains of a cat. My boy had eaten all the flesh and left a ragged skin, the ginger and white fur all matted with blood. There were one or two clean white bones lying there, but he must have eaten the rest. He lay curled up under the kitchen table, with his chubby hands under his cheek, looking like a sleeping cherub, apart from the brown smears of dried blood on his face and hands.

After that, I locked him in his bedroom at night. This morning, I went to let him out, and found his room was empty. The window was open. I hadn't thought he could climb or jump from there, but he must have done.

He didn't come home until this evening. I had left the back door open, hoping. He toddled wearily over the doorstep and stood swaying slightly in the middle of the kitchen, blinking and smiling at me. He was radiantly happy, and he was covered with blood.

In one hand he held the end of a big stick which trailed on the floor behind him. Then I saw that it wasn't a stick at all, but a child's arm, gnawed off at the shoulder and partly eaten.

He's at home now. He's asleep under the kitchen table, still clutching that arm. I've locked the doors, but if he wakes up he knows how to get out. If you come quickly, Constable, you should be able to catch him while he's still asleep.

I'm going to clear the weeds tomorrow. Then I'm going to dig up all the gooseberry bushes, and burn them.

GETTING WHAT YOU WANT

By

Blakey

From the moment I saw her I knew my life had changed. She was sleek, smooth and curved in all the right places. The only problem was the fact that some other guy had his hands all over her. And that 'some-other-guy' was Fergus; 'boil-bum' Fergus, arch-rival-creep Fergus from college days gone past. I swallowed my gall and strode across the street towards him.

'Fergus,' I called out as heartily as I could, 'where have you been all these years?' It struck me that he didn't seem to have aged as much as I had, in fact he looked just like I remembered him.

He looked puzzled for a moment, though I'm sure he recognised me instantly and was just playing me along.

'Karl... Is it Karl...?'

'Constant,' I added before he could finish the charade.

'Yes, of course, Karl Constant from Cambridge.'

He remembered all right, you could see the synapses firing behind his eyes as he calculated the possibilities of something happening to his advantage.

But I didn't care; I was interested in what was behind him. He noticed my look and swept a long, lingering wipe across the smooth purity of her frame.

With obvious pride he said, 'Do you like her? She's the latest model.'

He was referring to his MT. MT was short for Matter-Transfer which was the invention that made instantaneous travel possible. It was one of the 'gifts' received by humanity since contact had been made with other worlds.

For some unknown but highly technical reason, the machine refused to function unless it was beautifully designed and aerodynamically perfect, even though air resistance was not a factor. And it was because of this paradox that people started to refer to the machines as women. Which in fact seemed to help them function better. Real women complained that it was degrading, but the fact was, the machines really did work better if they were petted and polished and made a fuss of.

'She's beautiful,' I gushed. She really was. One of the Ferrari models; a clean sphere glowing with ethereal light and emitting a low, sensual, purring hum.

'Yes, she is,' he agreed. And I'm sure that as he stepped closer and rubbed a bit harder with his polishing cloth the hum increased in pitch, like a moan of pleasure.

I swallowed the lump in my throat. 'Fergus, how can you afford something like this?'

'I don't suppose you take much note of the news, but if you did you would know that the lottery last month was won by someone who preferred to remain anonymous.'

'You mean you...?' I stammered.

He smiled. 'And you always said I was so uncreative' he said, and all the time he kept caressing and stroking her, knowing it was driving me insane.

Sweat had broken out on my forehead, I had to use my handkerchief to mop my face because salty drops were dripping from my eyebrows. Fergus looked as cool as ever in his designer jacket. I decided to drop all pretense and speak my mind.

'Is it true,' I asked, 'what everyone says about travelling in an MT?'

He wasn't going to make it easy for me. 'I don't know, what do people say?'

I plunged ahead: 'You know, the rumour about how MT is better than sex. Is it true?'

He laughed. 'How would I know? You got all the girls when we were at school. I never had the time.' Then he did something with his hands and an opening appeared in the side of the MT. He climbed into the aperture, and settled himself into the seat with an audible sigh. The iris closed, there was a slight change in frequency, then a pop, and he was gone.

From that moment, my life began to go downhill.

It was as if I had been drugged or hypnotised. I stood there for the longest time, staring into space, until a passer-by stopped to ask if I felt all right.

'Yeah, fine, OK... just day dreaming,' I muttered unconvincingly, but managed to get my feet moving in the direction of the park. I found an unoccupied bench and used my card to release the force field so I could sit down. I felt too shaky to walk much further and I couldn't cope with the park wardens shooing me off the grass.

All I could think of was how I could get an MT. I'd seen them before on the 3D but never close up, never driven and owned by someone I knew. And especially not by someone I had hoped to forget.

I was trembling and my heart was pounding. I thought I could hear voices, like at a party when you hear your own name spoken and it stands out above the general noise. The voices in the noise of my mind were telling me to do something, not just sit there, not just roll over and play dead...

The bench started bleeping. I jumped up. 'No more from me, you bloodsucker!' I yelled, startling a young couple passing by. I was on my way. To the MT dealer.

The fact that I had been on my way to work seemed to have escaped my mind as I risked arrest by running across the grass to the tube entrance. But I wasn't spotted, apart from by a few horrified pedestrians who could only stand with their mouths open as I desecrated the greenery.

There was only one dealer in the city, naturally in the most exclusive part, and it took me three security checks and four random body searches, plus who knows how many unauthorised hidden invasions of my privacy, before I arrived. MTs were manufactured by an enormous multi-world conglomerate who held the monopoly on Earth. The building that housed the MT dealer was a study in opulence. With space in Earth at an absolute premium, they actually had a flower garden larger than the park I had just visited. With real flowers — that you could smell. I think they were roses.

I walked up to the gate and stood waiting. The gate said, 'Good day, please insert your card and state your name and business.'

I did as I was told and replied, 'Karl Constant, I am interested in purchasing an MT.'

The gate remained closed. My card was returned. 'Your credit rating is inadequate,' said the synthetic voice.

I kicked the gate. It made no difference, except that it bruised my toe, but it was better than seething inside for the rest of the day. So my credit was so limited that I couldn't even get inside to discuss terms! I'd show them, snooty bastards!

It took me about an hour to find out that there was no legal way for me to make enough money to buy an MT. One bank manager gleefully informed me that it would take me 257 years, at my present salary, before I could buy one. And that was if I didn't eat or live in my apartment in the meantime.

So I had no alternative but to go outside.

There were fewer body checks on the way out of the business sector, just the usual screens and card scans, so my journey was considerably faster. Emerging from the tube, I found my way to The Bar.

Inside it was dark and smoky; a throwback to the Seventies and Eighties, with a tobacco machine which kept the room hazy. The stench was overpowering. I ordered a drink. They had a real bartender, he actually mixed and poured drinks. Very unhygienic. I sipped my drink, trying not to touch my lips to the glass.

An image kept replaying itself in my mind. It was Fergus stepping into his MT and vanishing — pop! — I'd never seen that in real life and I was obsessed with a desire to experience it for myself. Whatever the cost, I had to have one!

I leaned over the bar and whispered to the bartender: 'Do you know a man called Sting?'

He gestured with his head towards a dark shape in the corner.

As I approached, the man said, 'Sit down, Mr Constant.' I made to sit to one side. 'No, not there, here in front of me.' It was obvious why he wanted me to sit opposite, the light was arranged to keep him in shadow and to illuminate my face.

I must have looked surprised because he continued: 'You paid by card, Mr Constant. To me that means an instant baring of your plastic soul.'

He must have had a wrist viewer linked to the bar's till. I decided not to waste time: 'I want an MT and I'll do anything to get one,' I said.

In all fairness, he tried to discourage me; he had his goons throw me out of the bar three times but I kept coming back and I think that impressed him. I wish now he had been more persistent.

'OK,' he said, 'you're crazy enough. Come back tomorrow night and I might have something you can do for me.'

Suddenly I experienced a prick of conscience. 'You don't want me to kill someone...?'

He laughed, a deep oily, unhealthy laugh that turned into a rasping cough. 'Murder ain't for amateurs. Besides, it don't pay enough — no risk!'

The following evening I returned to the bar. Mr Sting wasn't there but two other guys were sitting at his table and the bartender directed me to them. They were both wearing night-specs and I knew they could see me a lot better than I could see them. Before I could speak, they stood up and walked out of the bar. I followed.

I didn't like the feeling I was experiencing — but what could I do? I was committed. I followed them down the street until they turned left into a small opening between two buildings. There was no light at all and the darkness blinded me completely.

I felt hands grabbing me, pinning me against the wall. My pockets were emptied and I saw for a second the dim red light of a reader as they checked my credentials. One of them grunted and the other one released me.

A voice said, 'Listen close and don't ask questions. You won't like what we're gonna do but if you keep your mouth shut and put up with it, Mr Sting says you can have what you want.'

Before I could say anything, I felt a piercing blow to my throat, then a savage kick to my abdomen and more and more pain until mercifully I passed out.

When I regained consciousness I was in a bed. There was a strange beeping noise and when I tried to move my arm I noticed there was a tube connecting me to a bottle suspended above. The beeping noise was some sort of monitor, the beeps were synchronised with my heart beat and were very rapid. An alarm bell sounded. The door flew open and a nurse and a doctor hurried into the room.

It's funny how vulnerable you feel lying in a bed with people peering down at you. The doctor spoke. 'Well, Mr Constant, good to see you back with us. You had us a bit worried.'

I tried to speak but nothing came out. A blinding pain shot from my throat down into my chest.

'Don't try to talk, the cartilage in your throat has been torn and it will be a while before you can speak again. You're lucky to be alive, so relax and take it easy. You've also had abdominal surgery for the internal injuries — don't try to sit up.'

I nodded, indicating that I understood — which seemed to please them. The nurse asked me if I was in pain. I nodded again. She moved to a machine, adjusted a dial and the pain subsided. I smiled.

Immobilisation of the body gives the brain a wonderful chance to exert itself, and mine was no exception. Primarily I was thinking what an idiot I'd been, how stupid I was, what a fool and what a dope.

But I was also wondering why I'd been put in hospital and why I'd been rendered speechless in such a painful way? And I'd come to the conclusion that I'd been taught a very painful lesson. At this moment of discovery, the nurse brought me a very strange message.

She came in looking very pleased. 'Mr Constant,' she said, plumping up the pillows, 'your brother was here today and he has arranged for you to go to a private nursing home... Oh, I'm sorry, did I hurt you? I'll turn up the input.' She adjusted the dial on the machine. 'Is that better?'

I think I smiled. It was hard not to smile when she increased the current, the sensation was not just an absence of pain, it was an orgasmic pleasure. I now saw what wire-heads rave about. But deep down I was worried.

You see, I don't have a brother.

That evening I was moved by ambulance to a private hospital within the enclave. As they went through the security checks I heard the two drivers joking about the amount of credit they would need just to sleep on the street.

Once installed in my private room, with my tubes and electrodes in place, I was left on my own to wait.

I didn't have to wait long.

The door opened, and in walked Mr Sting. I say walked, but I should say waddled. He was smiling, and he wasn't even connected to my machine.

'Mr Constant,' he beamed, 'how nice to see you looking so well.'

I grimaced. 'Don't exert yourself,' he continued, 'I know you are unable to speak, so just relax and listen.' He pulled up a chair that looked totally inadequate for his girth, and lowered himself into it with a sigh.

'You will be happy to know that your ordeal is nearly over. There is just one small detail to attend to and that has been arranged for tomorrow morning.' He leaned closer. I could smell his breath — it wasn't pleasant. 'You are scheduled for a minor operation...'

I tried to speak and sit up both at the same time. The pain was excruciating; my entire body was bathed in a clammy sweat. He made no move towards the machine. I pleaded with my eyes: Stop the pain, stop the pain!

He ignored my silent plea. 'As I was saying, you are scheduled for an operation,' he paused and reached for a tissue which he handed to me. I mopped the perspiration from my forehead. 'After that, all you have to do is get well, then you can go home and spend your money.'

As he left he called to the nurse. I heard him say, 'I think our friend is in need of some stimulation.' Mercifully she rushed in and turned on the machine.

That night was the worst I have ever spent. I lay in the dark wondering what Sting had meant by 'a minor operation'. I knew there was a thriving black market in replacement organs but, if that was the case, why not just tell me? Why go through the elaborate scenario of having me beaten and transferred from one hospital to another?

Then I thought, maybe they are going to kill me or do some sort of medical experiment. It wasn't unknown for very rich people to use another person's body to keep themselves alive. It was illegal, but when did the law ever have any control over the incredibly rich? Was this scheduled operation the preliminary blanking of my brain that would prepare me for connection to some old corporate chairman's rotting body? No, it still didn't fit. If they wanted me for that they wouldn't have damaged me; they could have stunned me, or drugged me instead.

I didn't know what was happening or why it was going to happen, and I was scared.

At one point during the night a nurse came into the room and put something into the intravenous tube. I tried to tell her no, but she ignored my thrashing head and a few seconds later I was unconscious.

I woke up in the operating theatre. There was a lot of noise and I could see two faces looking down at me, but they weren't doctors, they weren't wearing masks. They were police officers.

'He's coming round now chief, shall I read him his rights?' one of them said to the other.

The chief lifted one of my eyelids and shone a small light into my eye. I tried to blink. 'Yeah, he's conscious enough to know what's going on.'

As he turned away, I could see a doctor and two nurses spreadeagled against the tiled wall. They were being searched. What was going on? I heard the other man begin to read from a card: 'You have the right to remain silent...'

The next few months were an escalation of horror. I had been caught smuggling drugs worth billions of credits on the black market. The drugs were inside my abdominal organs; they had been implanted by the doctor in the first hospital and were in the process of being removed by the second doctor in the private hospital when the place was raided. My protestations of innocence were ignored when the prosecution presented photographs of me sitting opposite Mr Sting in the bar, along with a recording in which I was saying, 'I want an MT and I'll do anything to get one.'

I was sentenced to twenty-five years penal servitude on one of the prison planets. Twenty-five years toiling in primitive conditions, sweating and freezing so that one day immigrants might come and enjoy the fruits of my labour.

And the ultimate irony of it all? Well, how do you think they transported me 3,000 light years away? And are the rumours true? Is travel by MT better than sex?

I'm not telling — what will you do to find out?

OFF THE SHELF

Comic book collecting is all the rage, but where do you start? And how do you avoid being ripped off? We sent Graham Evans to scour the shelves and bring back some top titles.

The 'graphic novel' style should really be regarded as a medium in its own right. It stands alone not only from the caricature-based traditional cartoon form but from film and literature as well; it is more immediate than prose, and although it relies on image it does so without the inevitable photographic realism of filmed action.

Fantasy and horror feature prominently in the current wave. The medium is well-suited to the suspension of disbelief in the fantastic, and it comes as no surprise to learn that the likes of James Herbert, Clive Barker and Ramsey Campbell are beginning to work in the field.

What follows is a brief introduction to just a little of the confusing flood of brilliant, good, mediocre and downright bad graphic novels, anthologies, multi-series and regular monthlies available.

AI

A quarterly perfect bound anthology (Atomeka Press, £4.95), and a sort of successor to Warrior, a monthly British anthology comic of the early Eighties that struggled along for twenty-six issues. Alan Moore had already worked for 2000 AD and the British division of Marvel Comics, but Warrior was where he made his name and created 'V for Vendetta' and recreated 'Miracleman', two of his best series. Warrior was the reason for DC Comics becoming interested in British talent. AI is edited by Dave Elliott and Garry Leach, Dez Skinn's assistant at Warrior, and several of the creators used AI Volume 1 worked regularly on Warrior. Two of the better strips, Moore and Parkhouse's 'The Bojefries Saga', and Moore and Leach's 'Warpsmith' are direct continuations from that magazine. AI fails to achieve its ambition, stated in the first editorial, of reflecting 'the vast range of the contemporary comics scene', but it is definitely worth watching.

DRACULA: A SYMPHONY IN MOONLIGHT AND NIGHTMARES

A one-off graphic novel (Epic/Marvel, £5.95) by Jon J. Muth. Muth uses characters from Stoker's classic novel to create a symbolic, dreamlike and haunting meditation on love and sacrifice, sex and death. Economically and lyrically written, lavishly and impressionistically painted, the effect is poetic.

HELLBLAZER

A monthly series from DC now being reprinted in black and white graphic novel format by Titan, £5.95 each, four issues a volume.

The adventures of John Constantine, an Alan Moore created character from the pages of Swamp Thing. Intelligently written by Jamie Delano and drawn by Ron Tiner. The grittily realistic art this strip has featured from the beginning makes it look better in black and white, but check out the recent Hellblazer Annual 1, a double-sized comic for £1.85 written by Delano and drawn by Bryan Talbot, the creator of Luther Arkwright, a character very similar in some ways to Constantine.

LITTLE NEMO IN SLUMBERLAND

There are various reprint volumes around, currently being collected in four large volumes. 'Little Nemo in Slumberland' is Winsor McKay's classic newspaper strip. Comics have been around for a long time; Nemo began in 1905 and is one of comics' first and greatest masterpieces, the Art Nouveau dream visions of a small boy called Nemo who roams through Slumberland in his dreams. Surreal, baroque, breathtaking and brilliantly coloured.

MOEBIUS: THE INCAL, BLUEBERRY, VARIOUS ANTHOLOGIES

Jean 'Moebius' Giraud is one of the most inventive artists in comics. It's impossible to describe his work fully; bizarre yet lucid is one phrase which springs to mind. Le Blueberry will eventually consist of ten volumes, all reprints, written by Jean-Michel Charlier; The Incal is a three volume mystery story scripted by Alexandro Jodorowsky (yes, that is the director of Santa Sengre); and there are six anthology volumes written by Moebius himself, some of which are interlinked.

A NIGHTMARE ON ELM STREET

Marvel, magazine size, £1.45. Lasted just two issues. Written by Steve Gerber and drawn by Tony DeZuniga and Alfredo Alcalá, three of the people associated with the Marvel horror wave of the Seventies. Reads as a pale imitation of that period; the art is competent enough, but Gerber's scripting has lost most of its former subtle intelligence and has become lacklustre.

THE SANDMAN

Monthly series from DC, £1.00. The Sandman is an imaginary mythological figure, one of the Endless, the Master of Dreams, King Morpheus. The art is first by Sam Keith and Mike Dringenberg, now by Dringenberg and Keith Jones. Probably the best ongoing comic-book series. The best issues to date are 3, in which the Sandman meets John Constantine; 4, in which he goes to Hell; and 8, an encounter with his big sister, Death. This comic boasts some magnificent covers by Dave McKean, Gaiman's artist on Violent Cases (Titan, £3.95), the one volume 'graphic short story' with which Gaiman and McKean made their names, and Black Orchid (three volumes, DC, £1.95 each).

SWAMP THING

Monthly series from DC, £1.00. Alan Moore's sojourn on the strip is collected in eleven black and white volumes from Titan, £5.95 each, four issues a volume.

Made great by Moore's scripting and Stephen Bissette and John Totleben's art, this is the one that triggered the New Wave. After Moore left, Rick Veitch - who'd already taken over as artist - became scripter and the comic maintained its high standards, though it began to slip downhill just before his recent departure. Bissette and Totleben went on to publish the Taboo anthology. Bissette also contributed to Goreshriek, an inferior version of Taboo put out by Fantaco, and has two adaptations coming in 1990: Night of the Living Dead and the long-awaited Rainhead Rex. The best stories are in volumes 3, 4 and 5.

Coming soon: Warren Lapworth, FEAR's own comic-book character, wades through sand and swamps and grabs the crisps and Coke before settling down to review graphic Marvels... DC... Arcane... Eclipse...

THE HOPE

James Lovegrove
Publisher Macmillan
Format HB, £12.95
Category Horror

James Lovegrove's debut novel is a bizarre, loosely connected series of short stories set aboard the eponymous ship. Five miles long, carrying over a million passengers and costing more than many a small country, the Hope is not an aptly named ship. On the day of its launch the philanthropist who paid for it commits suicide. This is on page one and thereafter it's all downhill.

The first of the short stories, 'A Bath of Blood', picks up the ship's story an indeterminate length of time after its first putting out to sea. The ship has deteriorated into a kind of floating Third World country, with paupers such as Mary Shitshoes forced to rummage through the rubbish for food.

Why the ship has deteriorated so far, and how such a ship can be so completely lost are initially unexplained. Lovegrove is clearly uninterested in providing any pseudo-technical reason for how Mankind's most massive construction could be lost, and there is only the slightest hint of any thermonuclear horror closing off the outside world's interest in it.

The ship is, on the whole, merely a fascinating setting for the short stories. This is no bad thing, and the weirdness of the Hope provides a compelling force to reading the book – although none of the short stories are outstanding individually. On the debit side, Lovegrove tends to utilise a very colloquial narrative voice, which too often limits the prose to a rather mundane style. Moreover, coarse and scatological references in both dialogue and descriptions too often, in my opinion, works against the fantastical nature of the Hope's voyage. In a more realistic setting they might have passed unnoticed, but here they are rather jarring.

The subject matter of the stories is uniformly bleak. From an entire family painfully poisoned, to a girl slicing off her fingers and then feeding them to her boyfriend. Lovegrove seems to be trying for a fairly ambitious fantasy horror story, while never flinching from detailing gore in the clearest way possible. While ultimately flawed, The Hope is an interesting and unusual debut. Devoid of a single ray of hope, it's well worth checking out for a complete lack of compromise.

HIGHWAY OF ETERNITY

Clifford D Simak is one of my favourite science fiction writers, mainly because he is able to tell a seemingly straightforward story which usually contains a wicked sting in the tail. Highway of Eternity (Mandarin, paperback, £2.99) is one such tale.

Both of the main characters in this novel have strange abilities. Tom Boone, a journalist by trade, is able to 'walk round corners' in times of danger; in other words he can teleport himself out of a scrape, although he doesn't know how. Jay Corcoran, an ex-CIA agent, was badly injured when his plane crashed after a successful spying mission. He barely survived, but an emergency operation saved his life and he now possesses the ability to see things that ordinary people can't.

The story starts with Corcoran calling on Boone's special talent to solve a mystery. For many years, a man calling himself Andrew Martin has paid Corcoran for information. Corcoran has provided the information and been handsomely rewarded, but one day Martin mysteriously flees after receiving news that someone is looking for a place called Hopkins Acre. Our heroes discover that Hopkins Acre once existed, but that it disappeared from the face of the earth many years ago. Corcoran tracks Martin to a soon-to-be-demolished hotel called The Everest. There he spots a large box-like structure clinging to the side of the hotel just outside Martin's room, so he asks Boone to use his talent to get them into the box and discover just what is inside.

This sets them on an adventure through both space and time. Along the way they meet up with a wolf, a creature they call The Hat, many aliens and robots. Eventually, they discover an answer to all the questions that Simak skillfully poses in the text, and the novelist surpasses himself with a totally unexpected ending.

DRAGONLANCE PRELUDES 2 KENDERMORE

The Dragonlance saga runs on like an ageing ship on water. Borne on a simple stream rather than a raging river, the second volume, Kendernmore (Penguin, paperback, £3.99), written by Mary Kirchoff, reintroduces Tasselchoff Burrfoot, one of the most popular characters from the Dragonlance Chronicles. This time, though, Kirchoff sets her story five years before those Chronicles began.

Tas is, as usual, not having much luck. Usually adept as an escape artist, he falls foul of a bounty hunter who intends to take him back to Kender for a shotgun wedding. His problems multiply as his bride to be disappears, he is put on a wizard's menu and discovers that, as is the custom in such books, he must save his homeland.

As Michael Palin has oft said in Monty Python: 'It's all pretty mundane stuff, really', but Tas is an irrepressible character and there's never a dull moment in his adventures. For that reason, Kendernmore is an improvement on the first volume of this series, although I suspect that this series will be as good as its individual parts and, on current performance, I do not have high hopes.

MICROCOSM

Hmmm. Ian Lynch's Tales From the Microcosm (Gazelle Book Services, paperback, £2.50) is one of those educational books which claims to be suited to both children and adults. For adults, at least, this is always something to be wary of.

daydreaming youngster Christopher, and 'the lady' – a scientist the same age as his mother. One is naive and agog, the other is serious and all-knowing, and there isn't much more to them than this. Christopher meets the lady at a telephone exchange, which is improbably and secretly used by her as a physics laboratory. She's developed the RASREM, or Reversible Anti-matter Sinusoidal Reduction Module. This is not, as you might expect, a dramatic way of clearing your sinuses – but a machine to shrink people.

Christopher is promptly taken on the first run of this prototype and is soon observing Ellie Electron and Pat Proton. This is obviously the point of the exercise and at the back of the book there's a two page list of the nuclear physics described in the fiction, with processes ranging from ionisation to the relativity of speeds in different dimensions. It's to Lynch's credit that all these details are fairly well hidden in an uncomplicated plot concerning an anti-matter monster which aims to destroy the world.

The anthropomorphisation of the various atomic particles, giving them human characteristics, is an unoriginal idea which initially disappoints, (isn't reality exciting enough?) but becomes more intriguing as Lynch struggles to explain how Ellie Electron – who was happily living with Pat Proton – can so happily switch to being with another two protons!

A slender 63 pages with an even slighter plot and a few okay story illustrations, there's no disguising the fact Microcosm is a well-intended introduction to physics dressed up as SF. Still, physics is a difficult subject and personalising it could ease the pain later, and even spark an interest in the dreaded subject. In short, a good present for a young cousin.

METROPOLIS

The musical may have folded, but for those interested in Fritz Lang's movie Metropolis, Faber paperbacks have released the apparently unexpurgated version of the shooting script for the most reasonable price of £4.99.

I say 'apparently unexpurgated' because the original shooting script was not available and this version was compiled shot-for-shot by watching the film. A frontispiece, originally written by Paul M Jensen for The Cinema of Fritz Lang, describes how the film was put together and discusses its dark vision of the future.

The book is annotated with stage directions for the reader's benefit and illustrated with stills to give some impression of the mood of this movie. It has obviously impressed contemporary directors such as George Lucas and Gary Kurtz because they willingly acknowledge that they were influenced by Lang's work.

Metropolis, the script, should sit well on any film fan's bookshelf. If nothing else, it shows that fantasy is not simply a province of contemporary filmmakers and that directors were using pretty heavy SF concepts way back in 1927.

THE INTERGALACTIC JOKE BOOK

A pseudonymous book by Ann Droid (Knight Books, paperback, £1.99) and, judging by the standard of some of these jokes, it's not surprising.

The compendium is divided into alphabetical sections, starting with Androids, Asteroids, Astronauts, Aliens and Atomic Scientists, zipping through Quasar Quips and landing in lunatic mood with Intergalactic Zoos and Zombies. While it's not my habit to quote from books, it would be unfair of me not to illustrate the levels of levity contained within the joke book's claustrophobically packaged confines.

RUN TO THE STARS

Set in the thirtieth century, Mike Scott Rohan's new novel (Futura, paperback, £3.50) may miss out on one thousand years of technological innovation beloved by most other SF writers, but his socio-economic scenario seems familiar in the late twentieth century.

LAST ACT

Christopher Pike
 Publisher: Lightning
 Format: PB, £2.50
 Category: Mystery/thriller

Christopher Pike is a bestselling writer of thrillers aimed primarily at the youth market but, as is often the case with such fiction, enjoyed by many adults.

Hodder and Stoughton's Lightning imprint hoped that he would have as great a success in the UK as in the US when they introduced his first two titles - Chameleon and Spellbound - earlier this year, and to some extent he has fulfilled their enthusiasm.

Pike writes a mean mystery, in this case about about Melanie, a new girl in town who auditions for the school play and, rather surprisingly, lands the starring role. Unfortunately, one of the props - a gun - turns out to be more real than intended and the young heroine becomes involved in a staged death.

Last Act is part whodunnit, part thriller and, as with all Pike's books, it also involves a close identification with the main characters, in this case Melanie. Youth fiction is one of the most government is highly hierarchical and officials within its web are all too willing to destroy any of their friends or comrades in order to get promotion. Security Chief Mark Bellamy is just one innocent framed by bureaucratic mobsters, this time for a particularly vicious murder.

As the State tries to track him down he decides to escape in the most dramatic way possible, with thirty thousand passengers aboard a space ship bound for the stars. It's twenty-two year journey has only one purpose, to find out what is Out There, to find

Space voyage books are two a penny in SF, but Rohari's description of how people can be changed by circumstance and how, when you leave an established pattern of behaviour, absolute goods or evils vanish, made this more than a run of the mill SF travelogue with crusading adventurer thrown in for good measure.

THE PALADIN

C J Cherryh's new novel, The Paladin (Mandarin, paperback, £3.99) shows just how flexible fantasy can be. Set in a world of Samurai justice, it parables the rise to greatness of Taizu, a young girl who pretends poverty to win a scholarship with Shoka, a hermit swordmaster, of whom she quickly grows fond.

The cloistered life is self-imposed, but the story behind it leaves her wanting revenge on the court of Chiyaden, ruled over by the ironfisted Lord Ghita. Once trained in the arts of sharp steel, Taizu's aim is to topple Ghita and re-install the rightful heir to Chiyaden's throne. But Shoka is tired of the dangers of court intrigue and Taizu has to work hard to impress him to join her mission of vengeance.

The Paladin - which, incidentally, means a champion knight - is set in a world close in concept to sixteenth century Japan but far enough away to be credible as a medieval world created by this very able writer's imagination. Certainly, the honour codes appear to be the same, but despite local names, the world in which Taizu fights for justice might be situated anywhere, even on another planet. For that reason, the story, rather than the setting, is the core of the novel.

Cherryh ignores irrelevant description in favour of a fast flowing narrative. As a result, the book does not come across as James Clavell visits dreamland, for which I am extremely grateful. It also shows that high fantasy can be moulded from societies other than those of medieval England. It's fresh and inviting. Something for jaded readers.

THE EARTH LORDS

Gordon R Dickson is best known for his Dorsai series, but his latest book, The Earth Lords (Sphere, paperback, £3.50), appears to be a one-off, and set on our home planet to boot.

Not that you'd recognise good ol' Earth with what Dickson has done to it. The main thrust of the story takes place in a labyrinthine city built by aliens under the Canadian wilderness - sounds familiar? Here the Earth Lords keep humans as slaves, often using them as elementary transport. One such 'steed' is Bart Dybig, a man who works conscientiously for his masters but secretly dreams of escaping to what remains of the outside world.

His dreams become more insistent as he learns that the Earth Lords are building a weapon designed to destroy any remaining pockets of human life on the planet's surface. Using his unusual psychic and physiological powers, he intends to escape and stop the dominators in their tracks.

The Earth Lords, like so much of Dickson's other work, does not make great literature but it does provide racy, unelaborate and, above all, unpretentious entertainment for his constantly growing band of fans.

GOTHAM BY GASLIGHT

Imagine the sprawling city of Gotham one hundred years ago, yet already defended by the ever-popular night creature, the Batman. The alternative history presented in Gotham By Gaslight (Titan, limpback, £2.50) begins with millionaire and part-time vigilante Bruce Wayne returning to his Gotham mansion after five years in England.

As the Batman, Bruce soon sets about cleaning up the ever-growing criminal elements, and his caped alter-ego becomes big news. However, he must share the headlines with the most famous street murderer in history, Jack the Ripper. By an unhappy coincidence, the Ripper and the Batman surface in Gotham at the same time, so the Batman is widely rumoured to be the murderer. This becomes academic when a bloody knife and gloves are found at the Wayne mansion and Bruce is tried, found guilty and sentenced to death.

Reminiscent of The Dark Knight Returns, the artwork (pencilled by Michael Mignola, inked by P Craig Russell) sets the mood of the time and location well. By using simple sketchy images and dull, moody colours (by David Hornung), a grim, old-fashioned world is recreated, full of dark corners in which a street stalker might hide.

Brian Augustyn's script is light on text in many places and tells the mildly amusing story with clarity and at a casual pace - its only major fault is some artificial-sounding dialogue. It really could have been Sherlock Holmes in place of the Batman, as the piece is more of a whodunnit yarn than an action-packed adventure, but it's almost impossible not to wonder who Augustyn chose to play his Ripper.

Far from being an essential purchase but inexpensive enough for an impulse buy, Gotham By Gaslight's nineteenth century Batman is regrettably a lot less interesting than his modern-day self.

THE DUNGEON BOOK 1 THE BLACK TOWER

What do writers do if they want to use the old trappings of fantasy but don't want to be accused clichéd repetition? Why, use the relatively new device of producing a series of novels in a shared world environment and add a big name to the title to ensure that it sells, of course.

Harold Robbins did it once, with disastrous results, and now Philip Jose Farmer has followed a similar path with The Dungeon, a unique prison planet where your worst nightmares exist, including violent worlds within worlds, well known creatures of fantasy and myth, and the sort of traps you're likely to find in most role-playing games. Anything is possible here, as the world which Farmer describes is open-ended and appears to have few rules.

David Hero and Eldin The Wanderer continue their passage through the Dreamlands, a journey started in book one of this series, Hero of Dreams.

Much has happened since Hero and Eldin realised that sleep took them to another dimension inhabited by hulking Lovecraftian creatures, brooding, malevolent magicians and castles full of traps.

In case you haven't read the first book, Hero is - technically - the brawn of the outfit while Eldin, a professor in the real world, is the brains. As Ship begins, they are both in extremis, both dead to reality and, therefore, trapped in increasingly realistic dreams. Eldin has just lost his bride to be because she can return to the waking world and the two of them, like Burroughs' John Carter of Mars, have to get used to their prison world.

Most of the book describes an episodic journey in a pirate sky galleon called Cadaver. This odyssey is similar to that embarked upon in C S Lewis' Voyage of the Dawn Treader, but Moorcockian in content. Although Brian Lumley's high fantasy books are not quite as outlandish as Moorcock's, the chapter headings, such as 'The Snufflers of the Dark, The Running Thing' and 'Swords of Setanm', together with the plot structure prove that he is as successful at writing this type of story as Lovecraft, Howard and Moorcock.

Indeed, Ship of Dreams is for those who mourn the passing of Elric and the ageing of Conan. Hero lives up to his name and should keep pulp readers addicted for some time to come.

FORGOTTEN LIFE

Brian Aldiss
Publisher Mandarin
Format PB, £3.99

If your kids think you're over the hill, and you've yet to hit fifty, if friends are presidents of companies while you're still only the tea-boy, if you just don't understand life and it depresses you – then join Clement Winter, the tragic comic protagonist of Brian Aldiss's latest novel.

While not strictly fantasy, horror or SF, Forgotten Life dares to examine the fears of 'middle-age' from the point of view of a man with big dreams who, like many people, just hasn't accomplished as much as the stars of this life.

His feeling of underachievement is generally made worse by two unrelated events in his life. The first is his wife's huge success as a fantasy writer. She could so easily have been one of life's failures but, in his role as psychoanalyst, Winter almost guaranteed her success and set himself up for feelings of inadequacy.

This inadequacy is further tempered when his brother Joe dies and he reads about his exploits in Burma while he was attached to the Forgotten Army. All seems lost but, as they say, from the depths of despair – in this case the menopausal shakes – can come rays of hope and, in a myriad facets of other peoples' personalities and histories, Winter eventually finds solace.

Forgotten Life is likely to be an uncomfortable read for those approaching Winter's own age of forty-nine, or anyone who doesn't want to dwell on that coming of a certain age, but Aldiss adds humour to a subject which, at first sight, seemed to me to be humourless. He also shows that he is a consistently good writer. John Gilbert by Richard A Lupoff (Bantam, paperback, £3.99), follows Clive Foliott's quest to find his twin brother, Neville, inside the inhospitable, multi-levelled dungeon. It's a place in which heroes are born, and where readers who are also role-playing dungeon masters will find ideas for their games. It is not, however, a place from which great fantasy novels are spawned and this whole Dungeon venture screams gimmick as soon as you open the cover. Farmer tries to be impressive in his foreword, with a role call of his own works, but unfortunately none of this convinces me that the series is a worthwhile project. John Gilbert

ARROWS OF EROS

Sex and SF: at first sight there could not be two greater opposites. Sex is, usually, an emotional adventure while science fiction, to many people, broods on the future.

Not so, and, as editor Alex Stewart ably demonstrates in Arrows of Eros (NEL, paperback, £3.50), the realm of speculative fiction is ready to cover any form of human endeavour.

Several of the writers in this anthology have already approached the subject of sex in their novels, though not solely in the SF genre. Tanith Lee, for instance, is well known for the erotic, though not necessarily sexual, ambiances in some of her books. Her contribution to this volume, The Beautiful Biting Machine is, however, slightly different to her usual fare, harder in its SF, with an emphasis on humour created by clashing cultures.

Alternatively, David Langford's story, The Motivation, at first appears closer to home and creates an atmosphere in which most porn shop perverts would delight. Brian Stableford plunges through the earth to an underground civilisation set up during an ice age. The inhabitants of this underworld are only just considering the possibility that what now exists in the Wildlands above may just invade their gloomy territory. It's a sort of Morlocks in reverse story and harkens back to the days before Stableford's Empire of Fear, when he turned out a great deal of high quality pulp SF.

Iain M Banks is a perfect contributor to a volume about SF sex. Combining the weirdness of The Wasp Factory, the stark, dangerous alter-reality of The Bridge, and the straight SF of The Player of Games, his story, Odd Attachment, tells of unacknowledged love with a difference.

Other entrants to the 'let's talk about sex' stakes include Freda

Warrington, who is fast becoming a favourite of mine, Garry Kilworth, who I'm not sure actually lives on this planet, Stephen Gallagher, an accomplished SF writer at heart, and Kim Newman who provides his usual humour and sound story sense.

Editor Alex Stewart is to be congratulated on a strong performance, though, as I said when I reviewed Ramsey Campbell's Scared Stiff, Arrows of Eros is less about sex as an act than the strange maze of twists that love and lust can evoke.

DEVIANT

Harold Schechter
Publisher New English Library
Format PB, £3.99
Category Non-fiction

Ed Gein, a quiet, well-mannered American backwoods farmer of average intelligence, is the man solely responsible for many of the stalk-and-slash horror movie successes of the past thirty years.

As a child he was the victim of a domineering mother, a drunkard of a father who often beat his two sons, and the kids at the local school who thought him peculiar. As a man, fixated with a perverse love for his dead mother, he literally butchered local women all of whom failed in his eyes to live up to her saintly image. He was also implicated in the fiery fatal accident that befell his brother shortly before his mother's death.

Author Harold Schechter begins the book by identifying Gein with Norman Bates, the pathetic killer of Robert Bloch's novel Psycho, which was later filmed by Alfred Hitchcock. Schechter also alludes to the fact

THAT OLD BLACK MAGIC

CAUGHT IN CRYSTAL

Patricia C Wrede
Publisher Futura
Format PB, £3.50
Category Fantasy

Evil sorcery lies at the heart of this story in which a series of wars, fought and settled more than a millenium past, cannot be forgotten by the human inhabitants of Lyra.

The Wars of Binding were waged by four supernatural races called the Wyrds, the Neira, the Shee and, of course, the humans. Without the occult advantages of the other races, the humans were at something of a disadvantage and, when the other races left the land, the human Elders banned the practice of magic.

Unfortunately, magic is not the only 'evil' in the land. The Windhome mountains house the Twisted Tower, which in turn contains a crystal that holds an ancient corruption. It is bound by a wizard's spell but those wards are weakening and a champion must be found to fight what, in a matter of time, will be set loose in the tower. That champion is Kayl, a swordswoman long past her prime, who must live up to the legendary exploits of her youth.

Sounds like an interesting concept, but the book's plot is too contrived for my liking and the characters, although full of life, are cutouts in the functions they perform. Caught in Crystal also

that Gein provided the inspiration for such films as the Texas Chainsaw Massacre, Halloween and Friday the 13th though, for reasons that become apparent later in the book, he doesn't automatically label him as a horror movie abomination made real.

By the end of his introduction, Schechter has you believing that Gein was a psychopathic creature who was hardly human; but then he hits you with a series of tragic events that probably served to turn this quiet little boy into a morose fiend. Deviant is written in the style of a novel, yet it describes the investigation into Gein's crimes and doesn't dwell on the acts of violence as they were committed. At the end of the book you are left in a quandary, feeling repulsion at the acts of murder catalogued in its pages but sympathy for the pathetic little man who committed them.

Gein is truly something to behold, and Schechter's book acquaints you with his personality in the most unnerving way. Deviant is one of the decade's best true crime canons, comparable only with Killing For Company, which described British mass murderer Dennis Neilsen's crimes in an unsensational way. It's a book that everyone interested in the whys and wherefores of murder should read. Shocking, compulsive – a work of true, unsensational, untainted journalism.

CRESTWOOD HEIGHTS

The evils of scientific experimentation have long been a subject of debate. If the news is not full of terrible tales about tests on animals or genetic research, we are constantly bombarded with dread information about pollution.

Christopher Hyde has identified a wide range of techno-fears and transplanted them into his latest chunky novel, Crestwood

Heights (Headline, paperback, £4.50). This concerns a small community which has been set aside as one huge eco-experiment by the scientific establishment. The town even has a slogan. The Future Is Now, and families living there are expected to take on board incredible high tech innovations which control environment and, in many cases, lifestyles.

As you can probably gather, the place sounds a little too perfect and, when Kelly Rhine inherits a house in Crestwood Heights, she makes the mistake of living there. She soon discovers that, during the decades in which the community has existed, inhabitants have mysteriously and unnecessarily died; not for a scientific dream – which could be excusable to warped minds – but for the financial greed of the masterminds behind the project.

Hyde writes a wicked thriller, backed up by as much scientific information as necessary and no more. But, as I commented in my review of his last book Jericho Falls, his writing to date is somewhat imitative of others who have tapped the genre, such as Michael Crichton and Dean R Koontz. Hyde is, however, more than just a mimic. Crestwood Heights shows that he can create knuckle-cracking tension, involving action and only slightly plastic main characters in a tight mesh of swift-change narrative.

But it's back to the drawing board for plot.

creation of Alien's strange world which lies ready and waiting for discovery by the Nostromo's crew. It is equally interesting to see drawings turned to three-dimensional reality, as documented by the numerous photos of models and sets in construction.

This is a book for Alien fans, while giving Giger aficionados an insight into their master's mind. Newcomers to his art should be sufficiently hooked to hope more of his work will be made available in book form. Giger, unfortunately, does not seem to have involved himself in film work since Alien, choosing to concentrate on the gallery circuit instead. Perhaps a reissue of another Big O Publishing book of the late Seventies, which covered more of his output, would be good for Titan.

Oliver Frey

GIGER'S ALIEN

Swiss artist H R Giger first hit the limelight with his film designs for Ridley Scott's Alien, and quite rightly so. It's not often that a serious artist is called to help design a film, but Giger's preoccupations and style caught Dan O'Bannon's eye when he was involved in preproduction work on Alien. The morbidly erotic visions of slimy monstrosities painstakingly air-brushed in greys and browns seemed just what the film and its alien protagonist needed.

This book, first published in 1979 by Big O Publishing and now reissued by Titan Books at £14.95, is Giger's own record of his involvement in the project. Giger was used to working alone in his studio in Zurich, and this book documents his trials and tribulations in the film world which was so new to him. The account is fascinating, revealing as it does part of Giger's psyche while allowing a behind-the-scenes look at special effects production on a difficult movie.

The real stars however are the reproductions of his sketches and paintings, which meticulously, and in all details, begin the

LAST SHIP HOME

This second volume of paintings, illustrations and designs by Rodney Matthews (Paper Tiger, hardback, £14.95/limpbac, £8.95) continues where the previous collection left off. One cannot criticise the book for its production: Paper Tiger are always excellent, and the colour reproductions are profuse and of high quality. Nigel Suckling's accompanying text is informative, while a touch in awe; but then the pictures should speak for themselves.

I put Matthews into the same category as Patrick Woodroffe and lesser illustrators: his paintings are distinguished by their obsessive attention to detail and high finish, a meticulousness which all too often results in mere decorativeness with no sense of drama. To call Matthews twee would be unjust, but for all his

Format PB, £3.50

A welcome return to the Magic Kingdom, first visited in the novel Magic Kingdom For Sale/Sold and the continuance of a humour style which Terry Brooks appeared to develop when he finished his Shannara trilogy of books.

Brooks has decided that the boundaries of the Magic Kingdom are not enough for him and develops the planet Earth as a parallel world. A witless court wizard called Questor Thews tries to transfer the spirit of the court scribe from the dog in which he currently resides back to his human body, but the spell goes wrong, the scribe disappears and in his place sits a small bottle. All wouldn't be quite so dire if the scribe had not been wearing High Lord Ben's medallion when he vanished.

Worse is yet to come: the scribe is located safe on Earth, but at the castle of the son of the old High Lord, one of his worst enemies. Ben attempts a rescue but meantime Questor is left in charge of the kingdom, and the result can only mean ruin.

Terry Brooks' humour is not sophisticated - who else, for instance, would call a race of dwarves the G'home Gnomes? - but his swashbuckling characters appear to have as much fun as I did reading Wizard at Large, so it can't be that bad.

Mark Westerby

vivid imagination and inventiveness he seems to lose sight of the grand conception, the striking image. What one is left with is a preoccupation with the slightly Victorian neo-Gothic, transposed into fantasy-land and lacking all menace or romance, and full of crotchety whimsy.

It's obvious though that a lot of love goes into his work, and he does seem to have many admirers here and abroad. If more brute strength were injected, the combination might win me over too. In the meantime I'll stick to Tim White who combines photo-finish with startling intentions that stick in the mind.

identify his body, and this appears to be the finale to this particularly nasty and tragic episode. Not so, however, as the child appears to her in psychic visions in which he begs her to save him from some sort of imprisonment.

Shortly after Tony's death, a strange painting is delivered to Lois' house. The picture depicts an old country scene and includes the figure of an old man who appears to move in a similar way to that described in the classic M R James short story The Mezzotint. The engraving possesses her of a desire to find her son, and takes her on a quest to Scotland where, finally, she comes face to face with a family and bloodline of which previously she knew nothing.

St Clair stands with John Saul as an author who continues to use children to uncover our deepest fears. And yet, whereas Saul constantly used his children as the main characters, St Clair uses them in different plot positions to gain variety. He has not been greatly promoted in the past, but with Bloodline I suspect all that will change.

ARKHAM ASYLUM

Arkham asylum is a home for the criminally insane to which the Batman has sent many of Gotham City's most feared villains. In Arkham Asylum, the graphic novel, the lunatics have taken over. Led by the Joker, they've taken asylum staff members as hostages and thus far their childish demands for food, clothing, furniture and shop dummies have been met. But they want one thing more. They want Batman.

Batman has little choice but to go to Arkham and there he faces the cold, harsh reality of the place to which he condemns so much low-life. There is no way out of the building, and the Joker gives Batman an hour to explore and find a hiding place, after which he'll send the lunatics after him.

Batman's encounters with various strange and surreal villains are interspersed with the fall into insanity of Amadeus Arkham who founded the asylum. And what's more, Batman has to defeat his own mental instabilities: 'just like coming home'.

Visually, Arkham Asylum is stunning, 128 pages of beautiful artwork by Dave McKean showing madness in a way words could never describe. In a mixture of paintings, pencil drawings and strangely shot but highly artistic photographs, McKean's deft use of form, shade and colour is some of the best ever seen in a graphic novel. He switches styles for major characters; using realism for Amadeus Arkham, Batman as a lurking silhouette and the Joker as a bright, angular-faced, bug-eyed harlequin. This mixture of styles is complemented by Gaspar Saladino lettering, a red scrawl for the Joker and white-on-black speech bubble for Batman.

Grant Morrison's script takes a back seat to the artistic splendour. That's not to say it's bad but there aren't as many twists and turns in the plot as one would expect, Batman's encounters are a mere collection of events rather than a cohesive, progressive trip towards madness, and much of the dialogue is too overtly comic-book. Amadeus' story is a better written and more involving one but, interrupted by the main story, it never achieves full pace or impact.

Fifteen pounds is a considerable amount of money to pay for a story you'll re-read only very occasionally, but this is a graphic novel (emphasis on graphic) that no Bat or comic fan should be without.

In this, the one doll movie that worked in 1989, screenplay, direction and acting all combined to produce one of this year's most memorable supernatural thrillers.

Tom Holland has always been one of my favourite director/writers because he always manages to make well-worked sub-genres his own, squeezing as much humour out of every moment as is inhumanly possible. The premise is in this case singularly implausible but, by the movie's end, Chucky, the evil doll at the centre of the saga, becomes very real to the viewer as well as to the characters.

As ever, Holland opens with a bang. Cop Chris Sarandon chases mass murderer The Strangler (Dourif) into a toy shop where the killer is shot down. But before he dies, The Strangler uses voodoo to transmigrate into one of the talking dolls that has tumbled down from a display.

The doll finds its way into Catherine Hicks' home and becomes an ever-present part of her small son's life. One night the boy's babysitter appears to take a leap from the kitchen window of their high rise flat, and the boy says Chucky frightened her.

Hicks at first does not believe his story but soon both she and Sarandon find themselves in a battle of souls with The Strangler's new incarnation.

Sarandon and Hicks are marvellous as a team but Brad Dourif floors them all as Chuckie's marvellously wicked voice. I challenge anyone not to smile when the doll's sweet little boy lost voice gives way to Doesn't anybody want to play with Chucky?

Dourif's 'fuck you, bitch'. Great entertainment and the gore is kept to a minimum, so if you Take a plot about a saxophonist mutant, add humour and you've got the movie that Spacelab should have been.

Twenty-three years ago, Max, the ugly hero of the piece, was leaving the USS Constitution for his next gig when the transporter malfunctioned, leaving him as little more than a stream of particles stranded in space.

It is now the present day and Max's beam is picked up and unscrambled by the nutty crew of the USS Bounty, but their transporter comes up with the wrong transfer pattern and he materialises as a smoking wreck, his face moulded with bits of mechanical space debris. After an hysterical attempt at plastic surgery by the ship's chain-smoking nympho doctor, Max has to learn that he's missed his gig, all his friends are probably dead, and he's one ugly sucker. He's also lost his luggage and gained a strange-looking pack which belongs to some fairly wacky bounty hunters. Even he wouldn't want to be him when they find out where he's hiding.

Robert Torrance's film, though obviously made on a miniscule budget, relies upon the comedic talents of the cast and some half-decent computer graphics. The ship's android captain, who occasionally turns into a transvestite when his circuits overload, deserves an award for camp acting and the ship's doctor (Victoria Catlin) should be struck off the medical register for the way she treats her patients.

This film may deserve a turkey - but rent it, watch it, and make it a golden one!

It all happens in a most curious, disjointed manner; the direction is basic, the editing illogical and continuity apparently unheard of. Apart from the adequate performance of Michelle (by Mia Ruiz), the acting is little short of horrendous; Dolores the Temptress is played with more ham than Dewhursts and William is a very flat lead role – perhaps because the actor appears to be fifteen years older than his student character.

Boredom sets in well before this

A tempting moment in wicked Witchcraft 2?

The boxes are being sent to William by a busty blonde witch called Dolores, the Temptress of the title, and it is she who tells him of his family history. William is related to John and Elizabeth Stockton, witches who were burnt at the stake three hundred years ago but who survived to bring about the eventual conception of William within the body of Grace, his non-witch natural mother. Now it is time for William to fulfil his purpose as witch leader, and spread evil magic across the world.

Joanna Darby has got it made. She's a highly successful American fashion designer with a yuppie boyfriend, Glenn, and her latest portfolio is about to get its airing on the catwalk. But during a party she wanders distractedly into the garden and almost drowns in the swimming pool. She's revived by Glenn and ex-boyfriend Peter but not before she's had an alarming out-of-body experience in which she floats above her drowning body and then drifts down a smoky tunnel, towards a bright light. She passes six dark figures who try to stop her on her return journey down the tunnel to life and consciousness.

Joanna is disturbed by the strange experience, even more so when the very next day she's almost run down by a speeding car and then, while on holiday in New Mexico, is attacked by a previously friendly tourist. Her investigations lead her to discover that the two people involved - who were both killed in their incidents - were what are known as 'walkers', people who, through clerical error or other reasons, are recorded as having two times and causes of death.

Joanna speaks with a gypsy known to Peter who explains that the dead want her amongst them and that, as she passed six figures during her experience, six 'walkers' will try to claim her. So, in the next lunar month, she has to survive the attacks of four others before she's safe.

As well as having an awful, semi-pun title, From the Dead of Night used to be a mini-series and has been cut down for video rental. But it hasn't been cut enough; it's still well over two hours long and full of overstatement and unnecessary scenes. The fashion business and the trials and tribulations of Joanna's relationships with Glenn and Peter are all things better left to Dynasty and other such soaps.

Joanna's encounters with the temporarily undead 'walkers' are wholly unexciting and utterly contrived, and the last part of the film relies on four deaths conveniently occurring in less than 36 hours and all within a one mile radius of her. I know the US is portrayed as a violent and dangerous place in most thrillers but I still think statisticians should look into it.

Lindsay Wagner hasn't been seen by the Great British Public since The Bionic Woman and, although she puts in a good performance as a stylish damsel in distress, it's a shame she bothered to show herself in this ponderous 'epic'. Cut by another half hour it would have had enough pace to pass the time of night but as it stands, it's like the packaging says: 'Don't disturb the Walkers'.

After his moderate success in The 'Burbs, Bruce Dern must be as sick as a radioactive pig to have this new year turkey appear on video.

From the outset you can tell that writer Jorge Llamacona has a thing for Fifties B movies. We start with Dern's first-person introduction to the sleepy post-apocalyptic hamlet of Lost Wells.

Miles away from the big bad towns, where rioters are rife and water is in short supply, these survivors are, well, surviving, until the psychopath (played with zeal by one-time pop star Adam Ant) arrives with his bunch of lunatic weapon worshippers. They rape, pillage - and threaten to come back.

Dern is not keen to wait for another visit and takes a trip to the nearest town where Michael Pare and his fellow mercenaries await the chance to play ass-kicking and agree, under the weediest of motivations, to return to Lost Wells and ensure that the Ant and his killers get their just deserts. What follows is a series of self-consciously strung together episodic scenes, featuring Pare's love interest, Catherine Mary Stewart, dream sequence sadism

ON THE ROPES

Shadow police gives Shorty the opportunity to steal the money for Steve's ticket home. Unfortunately, he has stolen from vile crime boss Rogor (Marc Alaimo), who soon tracks them down. The ticket is unrefundable, and Rogor gives Steve ten hours to return the money; if he fails to do so Rogor threatens to kill Shorty.

Steve's only course of action is to borrow from Quinn, a female manager for Arena fighters. The Arena is the main form of entertainment on the space stations; under strength-equalising beams, various creatures battle each other one-on-one in a no-holds-barred boxing match. The only way Steve can pay Quinn back is by fighting in the Arena.

His first fight is a success and, brimming with enthusiasm, he vows to become the first ever human Arena champ there has been for fifty years. But with the current champ, Horn, managed by the devious Rogor, the task

Imagine a cross between Rocky, Buck Rogers and Al Capone movies and you'll have a fair idea of what Arena is like. The emphasis is on Rocky, with Horn an alien equivalent of a mean Russian, and viewers find themselves forced to root for Rock-er, Steve.

The set designers can't decide whether to go for gritty cyberpunk or squeaky-clean high-tech, and most of the aliens are derivative of well-known sources (notably the cantina scene from Star Wars). The most endearing of them is Shorty, a character played mainly for laughs (several of them visual, using his four arms). Big boss Rogor and his infinitely sneaky cohort, Weezil (Armin Shimerman), inject criminal and gangster elements that prove this is really an old, familiar movie plot in the future's clothing.

Arena doesn't pretend to be original or clever but succeeds brilliantly at being a jolly, entertaining family movie. Well made and flowing at a lively pace, it'll keep you glued to the TV set for the duration and, while it won't knock you out, you certainly won't want to throw in the towel.

Warren Lapworth

The good guys in World Gone Wild

again involving Pare, and Alan Autry's grisly, but throwaway, death - he really should have stayed at home in In the Heat of the Night. All of this fairly thin story line is pumped up with an injection of cat fights between the surviving townspeople and Ant's men. The result is conclusive for the good guys. Ant goes up in flames in a fairly unspectacular anticlimax. But then, once you've persevered through to the end of the tape, it's unlikely you'll be expecting anything better.

SCARECROWS

Starring: Ted Vernon, Michael Simms, Richard Vidan

Director: William Wesley

Distributor: Medusa

Cert 18, 79 mins

Rental

Crime doesn't pay, particularly in films such as this. Five trained commandos steal three million dollars in notes and hijack a plane to make good their escape. An argument develops and the money is thrown out the plane, with two of the robbers following it. The plane lands and all but one of the thieves regroup in an abandoned house.

The missing robber gets lost in nearby fields and is slain by one of the many scarecrows grouped around the house. He ain't dead yet, though: he attacks the other robbers who have to decapitate him to stop his psychotic behaviour. They discover that many of his organs are missing and his torso is full of straw. During the remainder of the film the other characters wander the fields, gathering money and being carved up by the scarecrows, who strongly believe in spare part surgery and replace their straw and cloth with flesh to keep themselves animated.

The basic concept of animated scarecrows maiming anyone who dares disturb them is not a bad one but in practice it certainly is bad. Terrible, in fact. Early on there are major inconsistencies. The twin-prop plane has the truly remarkable ability to hover or circle very tightly indeed while appearing to travel in a straight line; the female robber has near-telescopic eyesight and is able to see everything happening on the ground in perfect detail. No doubt it was she who spotted the convenient clear strip of land amongst the dense trees and crops, perfect for landing a plane on, but quite where the scarecrows found their nice, shiny, stainless steel knives and cleavers is a mystery.

Scarecrows is short, thankfully, but still would have benefited from additional cuts - if you've seen one straw-filled cloth sack, you've seen 'em all, really. Better still, those tedious linking scenes could have been replaced by some bloody death scenes; in the main, Scarecrows' gore is artificial, tailor's dummy stuff. To be quite honest, spending 79 minutes standing in the middle of a desolate field tied to a pole is mildly preferable to viewing this fatuous nonsense.

SLUGS

Starring: Michael Garfield, Kim Terry, Philip Machale, Alicia Moro
Director J P Simon
Distributor New World
Cert 18, 90 mins
Rental

You'll believe a slug can swim! Yes, this grossly offensive and immature attempt at moviemaking has to be seen to be believed.

I am not surprised that Shaun Hutson, author of the original novel, has disowned it. At least he went to the library to discover whether huge carnivorous gastropods existed. He found that they did and, despite all the gory mayhem, the creatures in that novel behave realistically.

Not so the film. Here we have a boyfriend sucked into a lake by slugs who are no doubt wearing aqualungs; we have slugs who survive in a stomach full of acid and salt long enough to gnaw through bone, get into the brain and explode a diner's head in full view of other restaurant customers. One also suspects that the emphasis in this crudely exploitative horror film is changed when the scriptwriter or director feels the need for a little titillation—admittedly on the part of female viewers. In one of the novel's scenes left largely unscathed for the screen, a very muscular young man romps stark naked on a bed with a similarly-nude girl. Only when he steps off the bed are we asked to believe that the floor is swarming with slugs who polish off both boy and girl with bloody gusto. But any horror in this scene is quickly diminished by the emphasis on nudity and, I hope, black comedy. Whatever the director was trying to do, he did not succeed. After all, blood is not everything. And that's the story of this movie which has, not unsurprisingly, taken several years to make it to the screen. If you're a fan of Shaun Hutson's work miss this tripe—and that's on the recommendation of the man himself.

LEATHERFACE: TEXAS CHAINSAW MASSACRE 3

Starring: Kate Hodge, William Butler, Ken Foree, R A Mihailoff, Miriam Byrd-Nethery
Director Jeff Burr
Distributor New Line
Cert TBA

New Line may be in trouble with Freddy Krueger's drop in popularity, but to bring back undoubtedly the most notorious of movie killers? There must be some big excuse!

That excuse may be purely financial but, on the basis of what we've seen, the movie could establish gore as a going concern again. Originally written by the irrepressible, and extremely talented, David J Schow (see FEAR issue 13), in this sequel Leatherface gets away with just about as much as you can in America without being subbed out of existence or banned outright.

The hot licks start when Ryan and Michelle, a young couple on their way to deliver a Mercedes in Florida, take a detour through Texan back country which is, unfortunately, inhabited by mass murderer Leatherface and his family.

After their car plunges down an incline, the couple are rescued by a survivalist who at first does not believe their story. But he's soon captured by Leatherface and taken back to the ranch where Mama prepares to roast his chestnuts. From then on it's a quick descent into a maelstrom of butchery as Leatherface and his growing band of compatriots take revenge for crimes done to cannibals all over the world (see page 18 of this issue).

The meaty mayhem in this film harks back to the second TCM and even puts one in mind of the more gruesome aspects of The Hills Have Eyes, for the simple reason that the TCM3 admits that there could be more monsters than just Leatherface and family in the Texan bush.

THE GUARDIAN

Starring: Dwier Brown, Carey Lowell, Jenny Seagrove
Director William Friedkin
Distributor Universal/UIP
Cert TBA

William Friedkin joins friend William Peter Blatty in a separate assault on the horror movie industry. Like Blatty, who has just completed Exorcist 1990, Friedkin has been away from the genre for a while but The Guardian, a romp through dark faerie territory, in which the forces of nature rule rather than innate evil. It's a doctrine that Friedkin used in his thriller Rampage earlier this year and one that fits neatly into a horror field which has been overfed with Freddys and all that is evil.

Here we have a young couple who move away from town noise and into the countryside. They employ a nanny (Seagrove) to look after their young son, but soon begin to wonder just who is in charge of the boy's future. The nanny is linked to a tree demon who survives by sipping on the lives of young innocents. It wants the child and Seagrove will have him unless the parents can rid themselves of their pig-headed disbelief, and take her on.

Like Blatty's Exorcist 1990, this movie relies heavily on drama rather than effects, but there are some startling fantasy sequences in which a huge old tree comes to life (see FEAR issue 13 for set report). The Guardian represents a new movement of innovation in the horror movie market which audiences are likely to enjoy. So prepare to be dazzled when this movie hits the screens some time next year.

*FEAR US PREVIEW

No doubt the original production storyline will be considerably cut when the movie makes it through its classification battle, but it's good to see that New Line is backing the film's makers by ensuring that TCM3 is the most explicitly intact movie possible despite contemporary censorship problems (see last issue's American Nightmares for details).

The film has no UK release date as yet and James Ferman has, on several occasions, voiced his dislike of chainsaws, but with luck he'll find the same good grace he showed so recently to Society and Bad Taste. If he doesn't, several new horror flicks, including Brian Yuzna's Bride of Re-Animator as just one example, may be substantially snipped.

CHILDS PLAY

CHUCKY WANTS TO PLAY - WITH YOU!

CHUCKY, THE CUTE KILLER DOLL, is fast becoming the hottest character in horror films. His first outing is released on video this month and a sequel to the hugely popular movie, Child's Play, is on the way.

Not only have we got FIVE copies of the the Warner video but, just for you, the film's distributor is parting with FIVE CHUCKY DOLLS. Accurate in most details, down to the cigarette burn on his cheek and cute red hair, Chucky is a smaller version of the movie's original. The ideal gift for a horror film fan, his hands and feet sport suction cups so that you can attach him to the back window of your car.

To win these fabulous frighteners, name the director of Child's Play (and Fright Night). Jot your answer on a postcard or back of a sealed envelope and send it to Are You All Right Chuck? Competition, FEAR, Newsfield Publications, PO Box 10, Ludlow, Shropshire SY8 1DB. All entries should reach us by 16 February 1990 and, as usual, no employees of Newsfield or Warner Home Video - or their relatives - may take part. Please remember to state which format of video you require.

We would also like to stress that the doll is a promotional device and not suitable for use by young children.

EYE STRAIN FROM EDDINGS?

Dear FEAR

I have recently read David Eddings' latest book, The Sorceress of Darshion, and was shocked by three things.

First, the phrase 'rat-faced little Drasnian' is not used to describe one of the characters in the book until page 64. Second, as far as I can remember, this phrase is not used again.

Either of these facts taken on their own might not appear to be very significant but, bearing in mind that in the previous eight volumes one could not read more than five pages without coming across the phrase, together they cause, in the reader, a certain feeling of vague unease.

Finally, about halfway through the book, the reader is introduced to a deformed academic of slight stature who has devoted his life to the study of alchemy. Over the course of the next few pages, and sometimes twice on the same page, he is described as 'a club-footed little alchemist'.

Far be it from me to propose that this lack of imagination suggests that Mr Eddings may have become as tired of the series as some of his readers.

C D Ward (pseud)

Thanks once again to the pseudonymous C D for his comments. David Eddings does indeed produce long sagas, parts of which could be described as unimaginative. But he tends to concentrate on character rather than swift plots, and he's also one of the most successful fantasy authors of the last decade, which is a mighty big reason for his books to be in print. Anyone else out there agree - or disagree?

EAGER EAST MEETS WEIRD WEST

Dear FEAR

I write to you as the editor of the first and only Russian Gothic/weird/supernatural horror quarterly the Mad Lab (translated from the Russian). In this country, we are the first to challenge the thrilling worlds of fear which the official culture has no visa to. Deprived of any pilot charts and outfit we are in bad need of aid and support from those stalking sure and FEARless in the dark.

Maybe some of your readers would like to make their names known to the Ruskies? The guidelines are available for an SAE and IRC. The premiere issue of Mad Lab is dedicated to the supernatural horror fantasy genre and the attitude to it in the USSR and abroad. Issue 2 will deal with the 100th anniversary of H P Lovecraft (editorial deadline April 10).

Vladimir V Shelukhin, Editor, The Nikolaev branch of Oversun Fan News Agency, Oversun, NB, GOS-3, POB 22, 327003 Nikolaev, USSR

Okay readers, they need your support. Here's your chance to spread a little info amongst our knowledge-started neighbours in the East. Get writing.

HOT FOR HUTSON

Dear FEAR

As a Shaun Hutson fan, I was looking forward to receiving issue 12 to read the interview, so when it arrived I opened it with bated breath.

So what did I think? Brilliant! Your interviewer (Dave Hughes, I believe) is to be congratulated on a fine job. The interview was very informative and a good read to boot. Also thanks to Shaun for revealing some more of his pseudonyms. I, for one, will be scouring the local bookshop for these books.

G Jukes, Warley, West Midlands

The irregular At Home features do seem to be going down well (congrats to Dave for another job well done) but we would like to know whose home you want to gawp at in the future. Stephen Gallagher is next up, when his latest novel, Rain, is published in March. But don't wait until then, sharpen your crayons and let us know.

KISS OF DEATH

Dear FEAR

I am very pleased and impressed with the interview we did (Daniel Rhodes, issue 7). Your insightful questions brought out precisely the points and emphasis I wanted.

On my end of things: Adversary is hitting the stands in paperback over here. I've finished rewriting the third novel (unrelated to the first two, although still horror), finally settled on the title Kiss of Death. It will come out from St Martin's Press this spring. Meanwhile, I'm hard at work on a new book, which I hope to have finished by next summer. Daniel Rhodes, USA

Dear FEAR

First of all, all this talk of "bad-mouthing", "venting bad blood" and "mischiefmakers" is a little silly; I've always got on pretty well with David Wingrove when I've met him, and my comments were about his book.

But it seems that despite his own experience as an SF critic, he cannot accept criticisms, he wrote a similarly angry and hurt letter to Foundation, the critical journal of the Science Fiction Foundation, when it dared to point out some of the weaknesses of Trillion Year Spree, which he co-wrote with Brian Aldiss.

Okay, so he's hurt that I said I thought his book was bad; he's put years of love and work into it, and I understand his feeling that way; but stamping his foot and yelling abuse in this way is really not on. I criticised the book, not the author; Wingrove has criticised me personally. His suggestion that I might not have "even opened the bloody cover" is possibly libellous, in that it impugns my integrity as a critic; it is certainly untrue. I read every word of the book, knowing that I would be reviewing it; if I hadn't been reviewing it, I would have given up very early on, and saved myself a lot of boredom.

I stand by every word I've said about it; I honestly believe that it is a seriously bad book. Wingrove wishes you to "force Barrett to state — in perfect detail — what's so bad about the book". Rather than drag on this debate here, I would refer Wingrove and any other interested readers to my 2,000 word critique of Chung Kuo which should be in the next edition of Foundation.

David Wingrove asks "what does publishers' hype have to do with the subject itself"? A good question. In this particular case nothing. As a fulltime journalist, I read press releases and publicity puff pieces almost every day. I'm used to hype, but the amount of quite unjustified praise that Wingrove himself heaps on the book in the 16 A4 pages of hype that was sent out with Chung Kuo was vomit-inducing. I say Wingrove rather than a PR writer because much of it was in the form of first person answers to questions, or the author himself saying "How I came to write this book". I've no objection to an author saying what a book is about, but I do object to an author praising his own work in such a self-congratulatory manner. That's bad. David V Barrett, Croydon, Surrey
