NOTES ON NEWS.

The bourgeois press is very busy in making the least of the demonstrations of the unemployed in London and in telling us that the crowds who assemble to show themselves in the streets are composed largely of persons who would not work if they could. Now it may at once be admitted that there are such men among them, although the crowd is mostly composed of men only too anxious to work. But who makes these loafers loaf? That is the question. Everybody knows that when a manual worker has been long out of work he gets "soft." The terrible discouragement of having to look for work day after day with very slight prospect of finding it takes the heart out of him; and in time he loses all capacity of seeking for work, and is then the loafer whom false society has made, and whom she punishes for existing.

Also, trite as the observation is growing, one must really say that it ill befits a "society" that rewards some people so munificently for doing nothing, to insult and oppress the poor people who won't work to earn the semi-starvation wages which it offers them. Let us admit that it is a crime to live without producing, and accept the consequences that flow from that admission, to wit, that a society that will not allow men to work though they want to is the very essence of this criminality, and is of no good except to rebel against.

The police-onslaughts of Friday the 14th inst., and the following days, is of evil augury for the coming winter. They are to be, it seems, as ever, not the servants of the public, engaged in guarding peaceful citizens against accident, but the servants of a peevish and easily frightened minority, and the masters of all the rest of us whose arbitrary bidding we are to do under penalty of suffering immediate corporal violence, which as G. B. Shaw said at South Place, we may seek a remedy for after we have suffered it. Really if this is to go on we might as well live in Moscow—or Chicago. We might as well be Russian peasants—or American citizens.

The accompanying extract from the Chicago Morning News, shows how right the speakers were at the South Place meeting in their view that the prisoners were condemned not for their deeds but for their opinions:

"The address of A. R. Parsons, the condemned Anarchist, to 'the American people' is by no means unworthy of perusal. For the most part, it is quite as argumentative and dispassionate in tone as could be reasonably expected from a man who stands in the shadow of the gallows. We doubt not it will evoke sympathy from very many who are incapable of coping with the adroit reasoning of the author. Beyond the line covered by this special pleading, however, there remains the great, stubborn fact that Parsons cast his fortunes with the enemies of law and order; that the whole drift of his life during the two years which preceded the Haymarket horror was in the direction of anarchy; that his teachings, if they meant anything at all, were provocative of riot and murder. Such at least was the judgment of a jury of his peers. Such also was the judgment of the highest court of appeals. The law which Parsons sought to overthrow is rightly regarded as the great bulwark protecting the rights of the citizen. With scrupulous regard for his every equity the verdict has been made up. Nothing is likely now to alter his fate."

♣ A friend told me this morning that speaking to some American acquaintances on this subject they answered his expostulations by saying something like this: "Ah, but you forget that Most has published a most atrocious book against society." This is exactly the spirit of the Chicago trial. One man has written a book, so seven others are to be hanged for it. The American bourgeoisie are well known to be an inventive set of people; but surely this "short method of dealing with political opponents" is the cutest of all their inventions. Mr. Balfour had best learn from such passed masters in the art of suppression of free speech.

W. M.

At the Taghmon (county of Wexford) police-court on Friday twenty persons were prosecuted under the Crimes Act for using intimidating language. Sixteen were dismissed for want of sufficient evidence, but four—two young men, a lad of fourteen, and a girl named Lawlor—were convicted. The young men and the boy were sentenced to a fortnight's imprisonment with hard labour. The chairman said the girl should find bail for her future good behaviour, as they "did not like to cast a stigma on her character by sending her to prison." She replied that it was "no disgrace to go to gaol for Ireland," and refused to give bail.

Disgrace! She has placed her name on record as an example of pluck and self-sacrifice, and one cannot wonder that her counsel called her "the best little girl in Ireland, and a credit to her country."

"The further anticipated failures on the Stock Exchange have come, and amid circumstances which very much disturbed the markets. One defaulter, liabilities over £60,000, is said to have absconded, having misappropriated moneys and securities. An old member of Lloyd's was forced to stop payment, with unpaid differences amounting to £60,000. These, and other two small failures in the House as well as one outside, led to forced sales and to the demoralisation of the markets."

All which simply refers to the "division of the spoil," and affects the workers only as showing them how much of what they have produced is played with by these gamblers. Every penny of it is unpaid labour.

From Sydney, New South Wales, we have received copies of the Morning Herald, the Daily Telegraph, and the Echo, giving accounts of the foundation of the Socialist League there by former members of our own organisation. This is cheering news, more especially as the organisation starts with fair chances of success.

Only the last-named paper notices the League editorially, and that does so with mingled sneering and abuse. Well, our comrades are, no doubt, fully prepared for that kind of thing and will persevere in the great work they have undertaken.

Is not the insanity or worse of our present society shown up strongly in the tremendous fuss that has been made over whether a certain speech was or was not made by the Grand Duke Nicolas of Russia?

This man is no orator able to sway multitudes by his fervid speaking, or great thinker whose utterance upon a subject will change the thought of thousands. No! but he is a despot and the son of a despot, able to wield a gigantic force against whom he will and to waste millions of lives to sate his lust of conquest.

Mr. Courtney, M.P., said last week that the police at Mitchelstown "may have acted indiscreetly"! Mr. Speaker Peel's tuition has evidently borne fruit, and we may now expect to hear bludgeoning a cripple called a "gentle remonstrance," and dainty phrases found for every governmental villainy.

POLICE LAW IN ENGLAND.

POLICE rule in England is extending, the power of the police is rapidly increasing. The police of London, like the police of Ireland, is an Imperial institution under Imperial control. The Royal Irish Constabulary are not under the control of the people of Ireland, and the Metropolitan police are independent of the people of the Metropolis. And even where the police are under the direction and control of the local authorities, the power of the police is growing, and their increasing influence is everywhere felt. At times we hear a great deal about Socialism being un-English and of Continental growth, but the Government are undoubtedly introducing Continental ideas as regards the supremacy of the police.

The police everywhere claim to be over and above the people; their supremacy is becoming a recognised fact. They are everywhere organised as a semi-military force, they are a kind of omnipresent body, not so much for the detection of crime as to overawe the people. They are organised and drilled as a semi-military force, and the higher officials belong to the military class; their training and their military appearance does not make them a terror to the well-known thief, and to a great extent disqualifies them from dealing with ordinary crime. Every street urchin knows the policeman's step.

"The Police and the People," "the Police and the Public," are now very familiar phrases. Their absolute supremacy in Ireland has long been recognized by both Liberals and Conservatives, and many people thought that while their supremacy was confined to Ireland there was not much to grumble at. But why should Great Britain escape? We hear a great deal about Ireland having the same institutions as England, if so, why not England have the same institutions as Ireland, and if the supremacy of the police is good for Ireland why not for England?

We now read that in the Metropolis the police are interfering with the right of public meetings, even with meetings belonging to the Liberal Associations; that they have gone so far (Daily News, September 29), as to demand the names of speakers and copies of the resolutions to be proposed. And we hear of indignation meetings to be held to protest against this tyrannical interference of the police. Such action on the part of the police is truly continental, whether Socialism is or not. One writer observes that Londoners may yet have to send the names of speakers and copies of resolutions to Scotland Yard for approval. It is quite possible such may be the case, even in this land of boasted freedom. Police supremacy will extend its influence, will increase through all the ramifications of society. The Liberal Associations of the metropolis are advised to refuse to give the police any information, either as to who the speakers are to be or the nature of the resolutions to be proposed at any meeting; also, if the police attend the meetings they are to be placed so as to be seen by all as the despicable tools of a detestable tyranny. These suggestions are very good, and I hope will be acted upon. But if good for Liberal meetings they are equally good for Socialist meetings.

It is true we are told the police have received no fresh orders; that they are only doing what they have a right to do, and what they have done on other occasions. And had they not interfered with the meetings of the Liberal Associations, but had confined their attention to Socialist meetings, there might not have been any outcry in reference to their present action.

But the Government has all the powers essential for a policy of coercion in England, without any special powers for such a purpose. From 1794 to 1806 the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended no less than seven times: in 1794 for nine months; 1795 for nine months; 1798 nine months; 1799 nine months; and in 1800 for nine months. Again in 1803 for a shorter term; in 1806 for six months; and in 1817 for nine months because of the agitation for radical reform. During all this period the private correspondence of suspected persons was regularly opened at the post-offices by order of the Government. And since 1837, by the written order of any one of her Majesty's Ministers, the letters of any suspected person can be seized and opened and the contents sent to the Home Office. Then in 1848 we had the Crown and Government Security Act, the third clause of which makes it felony to organise a movement for the abolition of Royalty or to bring pressure to bear upon either House of Parliament, or intimidate the same. And if extra powers were needed both Houses would be too glad to be called together to give almost unlimited powers to her Majesty's Government to preserve law and order, so essential for the plundering classes.

It is strange that even in this England of ours, the land of the brave and the free, while the franchise has been extended to every householder, all real power is being concentrated more and more in the hands of the Government; that with household suffrage we are falling under the rule of the baton; that while boasting of our freedom as a people and our glory as a nation we are becoming more helpless every day. Taking the old Radical notions the people to-day ought to be all-powerful, yet even with the vote they are still political nonentities, and under the present political system it cannot be otherwise. The evil lies in the very principle of government by representation.

What is government by representation? Its basis is the rule of the majority. The House of Commons is elected by and represents the constituencies. There sovereign power resides; there is deposited the concentrated wisdom and authority of the enfranchised millions. The House of Commons is supreme, is omnipotent. The majority of the Commons represent a majority of the constituencies; in that majority resides the concentrated wisdom and authority of a majority of the people. In that majority, then, is supreme power, is sovereign authority; that majority is omnipotent. The Government have the confidence of, and are sustained in power by, the majority of the Commons, therefore the Government is rightfully supreme, and in the Government resides the concentrated power and wisdom of a majority of the constituencies. This is government by representation, the supreme rule of the majority. If this rule be right, the Government is rightfully supreme, and its supremacy should not be called in question. When the people have delegated their authority to their representatives, when they have voted them supreme power and authority, why not trust their greater wisdom? Why not recognise their supreme authority? What need, what right, of public meetings to call in question the wisdom, or to condemn the action of the representatives of the majority, the rule of the majority being the basis of government by representation. It is not a question of eternal right, of equal liberty, but of the dominant majority for the time being. It is the system, and not the mere effects of the system with which we should deal.

Government by representation is the negation of the sovereignty of the people. It rests on the assumption that will can be represented, that rights can be alienated, that duties can be transferred. Under our modern representative system, government is virtually independent of and above the people. Such a government rests on the assumption that sovereign power can be transferred from the people to their representatives to be again transferred by them and centred in the Government for the time being, which practically becomes a centralised despotism. But rights can never be alienated, can never be transferred; the sovereignty of the people can never be abdicated.

No man can transfer to another his life, or his right to think, or speak, or his right of free association. These are inseparable from the individual, and render all government by representation impossible, except as resting on usurpation.

We hear at times a great deal about the abolition of the State Church. But we never dream of the abolition of the State itself. Yet the State to-day is nothing more than a centralised despotism. All admit that the tyranny and corruption of the Church are the result—the inevitable result—of its connection with the State; but few regard the State as the seat of that tyranny and corruption. Nor is the State more sacred than the Church. The abolition of the State must follow the abolition of the Church. We do not accept the infallibility of the Church. Why should we accept that of the State? We do not recognise the omnipotence of the Crown. Why retain the omnipotence of Parliament? Government by representation must give place to the government of the people, by the people, and for the people. The people alone is sovereign. All else is but usurpation.

J. SKETCHLEY.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

(Concluded from p. 331.)

Now, it is admitted, even by Sir Thomas Brassey, that "Labour is the vivifying principle which preserves Capital from decay." This sounds very like the proposition of Adam Smith, namely: "Labour is the source of all wealth;" for, if it preserves it from decay, it must follow that re-creation is only a repetition of the act creation; therefore on this, as on the preceding proposition, wealth is due to Labour.

And here, it may be noted, Mr. B. did not tell his hearers what Capital was, but only used the bungled propositions of Sir Thomas Brassey (a representative of Capital) which deal only with the source of Capital.

Capital is both stored-up, and unpaid labour-results—at present monopolised by the few to the detriment of the many.

Now, as for the second proposition—namely, that the advance of wages depend on the increase of capital, a few facts and figures will not only contradict that statement, but will reverse the proposition.

According to Mr. J. Low, the income of the country in 1823 was £261,000,000; and, according to Mr. Mulhall, in 1882 it was £1,247,000,000. The total wealth of the country in 1823, according to Mr. Low, was £2,000,000,000; and, according to Mr. Mulhall, the total wealth in 1882 was £8,720,000,000. Here we see an enormous increase of capital, and, according to Mr. Bradlaugh's contention, wages ought to be very high and the condition of the labourers very good. Let us see.

If we take the actual number of workers at the following periods as near as can be obtained, we shall find the average value of the labour of each was as follows:—In 1823, £48, 6s. 8d.; in 1840, £80, 6s. 4d.; in 1871, £137, 10s.; and in 1878, £171, 9s.

"In 1883, in his paper before the British Association at Southport, Mr. Mulhall estimated the wealth of the country in 1840 at £2,190,000,000, equal to £150 per head of population; in 1860 at £4,030,000,000, equal to £190 per head; in 1878 at £7,960,000,000; and in 1882, £8,720,000,000, equal to £249 per head of population. Taking, then, the returns for 1840 and 1882, while the population has increased 45 per cent., the wealth of the country has increased 394 per cent."—Sketchley's "European Society."

Let us see how this enormous mass of wealth is distributed. We turn again to Mr. Mulhall.

The higher classes, who number only 222,500 families, possess wealth of the value of £5,728,000,000; the middle classes, who number 1,824,400 families, possess £1,834,000,000; the working classes, who number 4,629,100 families, possess only £398,000,000.

Is there anything like equity here? The non-producing classes possess a total of £7,569,000,000 to £398,000,000, possessed by the working classes, by whose labour and skill the whole has been produced.

Truly, English society is one huge system of robbery!

"In dealing with the question of the income of the different classes in 1823, Mr. Low estimated the income of the working classes at £90,000,000 out of a total of £261,000,000. In 1866, Mr. Leone Levi estimated this income at £418,300,000, but he included then, as at a later period, a number of items which were quite inadmissible. From the same data, on which he founded his estimate, Mr. Dudley Baxter estimated their income at £325,000,000. From the same data, or nearly so, Mr. W. E. Gladstone estimated their income at £250,000,000."—Sketchley.

More recently, Mr. Leone Levi estimated the average wages of the principal classes of workers at 18s. 7d. per week. Magnificent remuneration!

One out of every three of the workers die either in the workhouse or hospital. "In 1885 the mean number of chronic paupers in England and Wales was 758,993; in Scotland, 97,504; in Ireland, 105,153: in all 971,595. Of the persons actually relieved from the rates in the course of a year, one in three, according to Mr. Mulhall, or one in three-and-a-half, according to Dudley Baxter, becomes a chronic pauper."—Reynolds.

Mr. Edwin Chadwick, C.B., states that the mean age of the gentry is 50 years; of shopkeepers, 27 years; of the wage-workers, 23 years; while in the case of these three classes, out of 100 children of the gentry 13 die under the age of five; of 100 children of the shop-keeping class 38 die under that age; and out of 100 children of the wage-earning class no less than 48 die under that age.

Dr. Lyon Playfair tells us that of the children of the upper class 18 per cent. die under five years of age; of those of the tradesmen class, 36; and of the working class, 55 per cent.

Mr. Bradlaugh quoted the speech of Sir Thomas Brassey, at the Industrial Remuneration Conference, on Capital. I therefore quote Frederick Harrison at the same Conference on the condition of the labourer:—"To me, at least, it would be enough to condemn modern society as hardly an advance on slavery or serfdom if the permanent condition of industry were to be that which we behold—that 90 per cent. of the actual producers of wealth have no home that they can call their own beyond the end of the week; have no bit of soil, or so much as a room, that belongs to them; have nothing of value of any kind except as much old furniture as will go in a cart; have the precarious chance of weekly wages which barely suffice to keep them in health; are housed, for the most part, in places that no man thinks fit for his horse; are separated by so narrow a margin from destitution that a month of bad trade, sickness, or unexpected loss brings them face to face with hunger and pauperism. This is the normal state of the average workman in town and country."—Quoted in Reynolds, August 14.

We are now able to see how true is the proposition that the wages of the worker advance with the increase of capital, and, at the same time, to see what are the conditions under which he "contracts."

If we were to first cut off the arms of a man and then tell him he was free to use his hands in his own defence, we should be doing on a small scale what is done on a large—in fact, what the present system of industry does to the working class.

"It is a long lane that has no turning," says an old proverb, and the day of awakening is at hand. Already Labour shakes his chains, to the terror of his oppressor, and is preparing to knock off the fetters that bind him. The worker is now beginning to understand that the more useful he is to society the less is his chance to live; the more wealth he produces the less he gets—in a word, the richer the nation grows the poorer he becomes. Until all this is reversed the workers must remain in their present condition of slavery, and any scheme which has not in view the changing of the present conditions from top to bottom is not worth attention.

H. DAVIS.

SOCIALISM IN NORTH WALES.

On the 24th of September I set out for a few days' rest in Barmouth, North Wales. I spent a few days' in rambling round the neighbourhood; visited several small quarries in the district, notably that at Henddol, where I found some seventy men working for the benefit of a man who lived in a fine big mansion some few miles off. Of course everyone could understand that he owned the quarry, but, for a time, couldn't see how the men belonged to him. But immediately it was pointed out that while they got an average of 3s. a-day for working hard, and lived in tumble-down cottages, he did no work and lived in a mansion, and it was only by their working that he was able to live there; that they were compelled to sell their bodies to him in order to live, and the difference between the price he paid them and what he made out of them was his profit,—they began to see how it was. After this visit I decided to hold a meeting that very evening in Barmouth, and lay before such as chanced to listen the views of a Socialist. So at half-past six I took up a stand on the quay at Barmouth and began the first address on Socialism ever delivered there. It was soon evident that however new the ideas of Socialism were to those present, there was much that was in accord with their natural feelings as regards the duty of one man to another; that they as much disapproved of the present system of society as I did; for when it was proclaimed that the rich were getting richer and the poor getting poorer, and the difficulty of getting a job of work increasing day by day and the wages going lower and lower, it was earnestly emphasised. The assertion that there were two classes of idlers in the country, the idle rich and the idle poor, was sneeringly interrupted by a well-dressed young man, but approved by all others; and when I suggested that the said young man had better clothes than manners he was very wroth, at which I further observed that although better dressed than the working men around me, he hadn't near so much good behaviour. The upshot of this meeting was a request from some score working men to give a lecture in one of the public rooms on the question of Christian Socialism. Of course I gladly acceded to their request, and forthwith arrangements were set about. The minister of the Congregational Church was seen, and he cordially approved the idea. The deacons of his church were also consulted, and finally they kindly granted the use of the schoolroom free of expense.

Previous to this meeting (Friday the 30th) I decided to hold another out-door meeting. So on the Thursday evening I again took up a position and held one of the most fervent meetings that ever I addressed or witnessed; for despite a drenching downpour of rain, the audience stood throughout, and even after it was over congregated in groups.

An amusing incident occurred through these outdoor addresses. The day after the first address I went into one of the tradesmen's shops, and he commenced to tell me about this stranger who had been holding a meeting on Socialism, and he innocently enough asked, "What is a Socialist?" and straightway proceeded to analyse the term in the following manner: "Socialism—assosin; Socialist—assosin." I then asked him what "assosin" meant in Welsh, thinking of course that it was perhaps a Welsh term. To my surprise, he told me it was English.

I then tumbled to it that he meant "assassin"; and I commenced a soliloquy as to what I should be taken for next—me, the peace-at-any-price man! Of course I soon relieved him on the point, but refrained from making myself known to him on that occasion at all events. I met him afterwards, and we had a good laugh over it. I told him that I forgave him freely, but forgot him I never should. He now thoroughly approves the Socialist ideal, and his brother is a most active and intelligent supporter.

The indoor lecture was a thoroughly successful one, and I think will bear good fruit. That a complete revolution of the present system of society is absolutely necessary for the removal of the existing evils was admitted by every one present; and that it was within the reach of man and thoroughly practicable in the opinion of all present was aptly illustrated by the enthusiastic manner in which they applauded my remarks when referring to the capturing of political power and the formation of a great Socialist Labour Party whose only aim should be the taking possession of all the means of labour and the using of them only in the interest of all who worked. "Yes," said one, "if we would only be as enthusiastic and self-sacrificing for the establishment of Socialism as we are for our ordinary politics and religion, it could soon be brought about; and when brought about it would be practical application of all the best teachings believed in to-day." The same speaker also pointed out to me that there is a great amount of Socialism carried out in the different religious bodies, and instanced the manner in which they clung together for the good of all, and the equality that is insisted on.

One great difficulty in the propaganda is that whilst nearly all can understand a fluent English speaker, very few can read English books. Still I have every confidence that North Wales could soon be successfully organised.

HAYDN SANDERS.

A PROCESSIONAL HYMN.

TUNE—St. Gertrude—SIR A. S. SULLIVAN.

"Onward! Christian Soldier."

TOILERS of the nations,
Thinkers of the time,
Sound the note of battle
Loud through every clime!
March ye 'gainst the tyrants
Heedless of their steel,
Be a band of brothers,
Speed the Common Weal!

Onward! friends of freedom,
Onward! for the strife,
Each for all we struggle,
One in death or life.

Seamstress in the hovel,
Women of the mill,
Low indeed ye grovel,
Tame ye are and still.
Come like the Walkyries
Beauteous in your might,
Sing us songs of valour,
Nerve us for the fight!

Chorus.

Teachers of the people,
Priests beside the shrine,
Men of light and leading,

Edinburgh.

Speak the word divine;
Gather us together
In a holy band,
Sworn to help each other,
Pledged both heart and hand

Chorus.

Toil we now no longer
For another's gain;
While our wives and children
Pine in want and pain;
Grieve we now no longer
At another's good,
Let us all be brothers,
Let us all have food!

Chorus.

Come, then, worn and weary,
Come, then, stout and brave,
Join this noble army
Sworn our land to save,
From the power of tyrants,
From the curse of greed—
Down with the destroyers!
Crush the serpents' seed!

Chorus.

J. G.

THEIR CRIME.

Down deep in the slough of human misery they delved and brought to the light of nineteenth century civilisation the cruel results of man's inhumanity to man.

Over the pathway trodden by the burden-bearers of this land they travelled, and, finding it strewn with the bleaching bones of their fellow-toilers—Wrong's victims—cried aloud, and bitterly, against the miserable system that caused it.

Into the maw of the beast of competitive industry they threw the light of scientific investigation, and, finding it the grave of human hopes and happiness, vowed it should die.

Out into the darkness of Labour's long night they thrust a loving arm and sought to bring the wandering prisoner of poverty into a higher life, a nobler ambition.

Guided by the impulse of tender hearts they sought to break the chains encircling the limbs of Labour—poor sightless Sampson that he is—and drive Shylock from the temple of man's hopes, ambitions, and higher development.

And this hath been the height of their offending; this the reason that they are called anarchists; this the reason they are sentenced to be hung.—(Denver) Labour Enquirer.

I have never hesitated when I have seen my way clearly according to my lights, to follow it. I have always endeavoured to hew to the line, let the chips fall where they would. Some people do not do that. That is what is the trouble with the world. A great many people ask, when they find what their duty is, does it pay? If it pays they will follow it, and they care not where the payment comes from.—Samuel Fielden.

I am an internationalist. My patriotism covers more than the boundary lines of a single state; the world is my country, all mankind my countrymen. That is what the emblem of the red flag signifies; it is the symbol of free, of emancipated labour. The workers are without a country. In all lands they are disinherited, and America is no exception. The wage-slaves are the dependent hirelings of the rich in every land. They are everywhere social pariahs without home or country. As they create all wealth, so also they fight every battle, not for themselves but for their masters. There is an end to this self-degradation. In the future labour will fight only in self-defence and work for itself and not for another.—Albert R. Parsons.

THE CONDEMNED MEN AT CHICAGO.

On Friday, Oct. 14th, South-place Institute was crowded to the doors, and beyond, by an enthusiastic audience; who vigorously applauded the points made by each speaker, and unanimously passed the resolution which follows:—

"That the English workers in this meeting desire earnestly to urge on their fellow workers in America the great danger to Public Liberty that arises from suffering citizens to be punished for resisting attempts to suppress the rights of Public Meeting and Free Speech, since a right that the people are punished for enforcing is evidently thereby made no right at all, but a crime. That the fate of the seven men now under sentence of death for holding a public meeting in Chicago, at which certain policemen were killed for attempting forcibly to disperse the people and silence the speakers, is of deep concern to us as English workers, because their case is the case of our comrades in Ireland to-day, and is likely to be ours to-morrow unless the workers from both sides of the Atlantic declare with one voice that all who interfere with the rights of Public Meeting and Free Speech act unlawfully and at their own peril. We cannot admit that the political views of the seven condemned men have anything to do with the principle involved; and we protest against their sentence, which, if carried out, will practically make the holding of meetings by working-men in their own interests a capital offence throughout the United States of America, since it is always possible for the authorities to provoke a crowd to reprisals involving danger to life. We look to our American comrades, of all shades of political opinion, to demand the unconditional release of the seven men in whose persons the liberties of all workers are now in peril."

In opening the proceedings the Rev. Stewart Headlam, who took the chair, laid great stress upon the fact that in this meeting were gathered together men of very varied opinions, Socialists and Radicals, some of them anti-Socialists, but all resolved upon maintaining free speech for themselves, defending it for others as far as in them lay. While he was not an Anarchist, regarding, indeed, the doctrine of Anarchism with aversion, he demanded for its expounders as full or fuller liberty than that he himself enjoyed. As a priest of a Christian Church it was his clear duty to defend for all the right of serving truth by speaking it as they saw it, and the more they differed from him the more imperative this duty became. In the name of his Master and of Humanity he demanded the release of these men.

Letters of adhesion and sympathy were read from many associations and individuals in various parts of the country.

Mrs. Wilson, in moving the resolution, detailed step by step the events that led up the Haymarket meeting and that occurred there. These men, she said, amid great cheering, were not to be hanged for any crime but that of having been prominent advocates of the cause of the toilers; for having dared to reveal to the slaves the causes of their slavery. They were men of spotless character, the most vicious organs of "public opinion" had been unable to vilify them; their whole lives had been traced with minute care in the vain hope of finding some offence which could be flung at them.

William Morris seconded the resolution, saying that the evidence which was taken as sufficient whereon to condemn these men was surely the very reduction to absurdity of the legal chicanery that obtains in such matters. He pointed out how the law had been strained and the furious prejudice shown by the court.

George Standring, delegate of the Hall of Science Club, as an Individualist, and a known advocate of a doctrine the very reverse in most respects of that for which these men were to suffer, would not, he thought, be suspected of being moved by anything but the desire of free thought and speech for all in protesting against what he considered a judicial murder.

Stepniak said that in Russia, Germany, or other confessedly despotic States, such behaviour as that of the Chicago Court would almost pass unchallenged, it was so naturally part of the system. A tyrant maintained himself by the strong hand and treachery; these were the weapons of despotism, and in countries that he knew were a matter of course and so accepted. But to him, and those like him, who living under the shadow of despotism had been from their youth up taught to look to England, and, it might be even more to America, as the home of freedom and the model toward which they should work; to them it was unnatural and strange when they saw the old familiar methods employed in what were called "free" countries. It showed, at least, that under every form of class-domination lay the same spirit; and when roused it was manifested in much the same way. He was delighted at the manifest interest in the question shown by the English workers.

Mr. George, by permission of the chairman, described to the meeting an instance of police brutality that has just occurred that day, in the clubbing of the unemployed who were marching peaceably through the streets.

Peter Kropotkin described the Chicago affair as a retaliation upon prisoners taken in the virtual civil war that was going on between the two great classes. Against this idea of retaliation we must constantly protest; it inevitably led to cruelty and injustice. It was unavoidable that as the struggle grew more keen this kind of thing would recur more frequently. The people of no one country can afford to neglect the affairs of another; the essence of the workers' movement is its internationality, and the wrongs of one part are the wrongs of all; and while they cannot counsel revenge and so follow their "rulers" into wrongdoing, the workers of each country should encourage the workers of others to resistance of such things as this Chicago affair.

H. B. Tarleton, as a delegate of the Hammersmith Liberal Club, spoke of the failure to prove any connection between these men and the "crime," so-called, for which they were suffering, and said that the sentence if carried out would justify any reprisal that might be made.

James Blackwell, of the S.D.F., was in the States when the affair occurred, having gone over there in order to watch the great strike of May 1886, and report thereupon to the workers of England. He described the situation, and characterised the "riot," etc., as bourgeois devices to get hold of the men who had made themselves dangerous by the clearness with which they stated the Labour problem.

George Bernard Shaw (Fabian) disclaimed any sympathy with Anarchism or Anarchists, but emphatically supported the view that this was a question alone of freedom of speech and opinion. The case of these men to-day, to-morrow might be that of any one of us, of any political sect or party, who made himself obnoxious to the Government of the day.

Annie Besant (Fabian) classed this Chicago affair with kindred events that were happening nearer home. By intense effort and constant struggle, that had cost kings their thrones and many men their lives, we had won a certain measure of freedom; we held this at the price of eternal vigilance, and whether in America or Ireland, or anywhere else, if we allowed encroachments upon it to pass unchallenged, by so much did we sacrifice it.

A cablegram was sent from the meeting to the Leader, New York, of greeting to the demonstration there with the same object on Saturday.

£3 5s. 5d. was subscribed at the doors for the expenses of the hall and the literature that has been distributed on the question.

At a mass meeting on Sunday in Victoria Park the same resolution was also carried. Many meetings are being organised by Radical clubs, etc., with the same object. S.

DIDN'T KNOW ENOUGH.—"I am not a Socialist," reiterates Mr. Terence Vincent Powderly. This reminds us of the small boy who, when asked why he had not risen above the primary class, replied, "Because I don't know enough."—American paper.

To-day as the beautiful autumn sun kisses with balmy breeze the cheek of every free man, I stand here never to bathe my head in its rays again. I have loved my fellow men as I have loved myself. I have hated trickery, dishonesty, and injustice. The nineteenth century commits the crime of killing its best friend. It will live to repent of it. But, as I have said before, if it will do any good, I freely give myself up. I trust the time will come when there will be a better understanding, more intelligence, and, above the mountains of iniquity, wrong and corruption, I hope the sun of righteousness and truth and justice will come to bathe in its balmy light an emancipated world.—Samuel Fielden.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOCIALIST CO-OPERATION.

SIR,—The subject matter of the Co-operative lecture of the 21st is so little touched by friend Tarn's letter, that it would hardly be necessary to reply were it not that we hope to make that meeting the preliminary to a serious attempt to carry out the views then laid down, and it would, therefore, be a pity to allow any misconceptions to pass unnoticed.

Comrade Tarn's letter is a practical admission that he and those who thought with him were unable in their speeches to explain their ideas to the meeting, and I am glad that he recognises this. But I am afraid that his letter has only increased the haziness which hangs over whatever may be the reasons for their opposition. But his letter reveals one other fact, not perhaps flattering to me, namely, that I was not able to make my position understood by the whole of the persons present. As this was the first attempt I had made to lecture to an audience of the kind, this is scarcely surprising, and I can very well be satisfied that the bulk of the audience seemed not only to understand my proposals but to sympathise with them, and that many have pledged themselves to assist in putting them into practice.

Comrade Tarn opens by stating that the object was for a group of people to start a co-operative store for their own benefit. Now, if this were really the case, their object could be more easily attained by joining one of the existing Co-operative Societies. But I think it would be best here to state what were the exact proposals made.

First, then, it was proposed to raise funds by bonds of say 5s. each, and with the money thus raised to open a store, and sell to the members such commodities as they require and are at present purchasing elsewhere; selling them, however, at prices as near cost as was compatible with the safe conduct of the business, and which would be fixed too low to enable the ordinary shopkeeper to sell at and make a profit for himself. At these low prices a fair trade should easily be got together. But, owing to the greater economy at which Co-operative Societies are able to work through concentrating the trade of a dozen shops under one establishment, and thereby saving the rents, gas, etc., of at least nine of the other shops, and further saving expenses of advertising, and the thousand and one ways by which tradesmen attempt to distance their rivals, there would still, as experience abundantly shows, be a surplus left at the disposal of the society.

Mr. Tarn sneers at this saving as profits, but it does not represent what is usually understood by that term. By profits we usually designate any surplus resulting from a trading transaction between two separate persons, and which really mean that A has got more value from B than he gives to B, and which surplus he appropriates for himself, i.e., profits represent unequal exchange. But the transactions of this society would not be as between separate individuals, but really mean that the persons concerned have combined for the purpose of supplying their mutual wants without the intervention of a profit-making trader at all.

The surplus proposed to be made by this society does not represent the profit made by the ordinary trader (that is, to be given to the purchaser with each purchase), but merely the saving effected by a more economical system of distribution; and this surplus, or profit if you will, is not to become the property of any individual at all, not even of the persons who establish this society, for THEIR OWN BENEFIT, but is to remain as a common fund to be used only in extending the benefits of this method of self-supply.

Further, we know from the experience of the co-operative movement that this fund would soon be more than sufficient for distribution, and it would then be used for the employment of the members in the production of the commodities sold in the stores, employing them in factories which should be under their own control, and from which no profits should be sought to be made.

Comrade Tarn protests that this is the ordinary competitive method of trading, but I think any reader will see that there is a great gulf fixed between these two systems of supplying our daily wants, both as to method and results aimed at. He also alleges that we represented this would of itself bring about Socialism.

Now it was not put forward as a complete measure of Socialism at all, although the writer believes it capable of such expansion as will keep pace with the growth of public opinion in the direction of Socialism; so far, that is, as the management of the production and exchange of ordinary commodities are concerned, but it is obvious that it makes no attempt to deal with the wealth inherent in the land, that which has been produced by former generations on such works as railways, canals, etc.

But it is seriously contended that it is Socialistic, and I think even Mr. Tarn will admit that its three main points, viz. :—

1. The abolition of usury,
2. The practical abolition of individual profit-making,
3. The capitalising for common use of the savings rendered possible by common action, would be three great practical steps towards Socialism.

Comrade Tarn then makes a complaint that sounds strange from a Socialist, that this system would kill out the shopkeeper. What then? Is it not one of the aims of Socialists to abolish the classes who live on profits? I am unable to see any "sneaking" about this. What does my critic mean by killing in a straightforward way?

But I must remind him that we cannot save the shopkeeper even if we would. He is at present being rapidly and mercilessly exterminated by the larger capitalists. But we can determine whether he shall be replaced by the Maples, Peter Robinsons, and Whiteleys, with the Rothschilds at their back, or absorbed by the growth of some such Co-operative effort as we propose. Besides, all those really engaged in actual distribution would find a place to fill under the new conditions.

It is then asserted that we should commence with Co-operative production. This seems to me attempting to drive in the wedge by the thick end. The first necessity for success would be a ready prepared market, and I am sorry that our friend should consider an honest attempt to secure this as not straightforward.

We now come to friend Tarn's own proposals as to what should be done. He commences by an assertion that the work of the League (and I presume he means by that other Socialists,) must ever consist in promoting international union. Not being intimately acquainted with the future I am unable to judge as to the accuracy of this; but it appears to my less extended view that there is also other good work to be done. But I am really unable to entertain the idea that we should attempt to heal the wounds of humanity with free concerts or even free evening schools. This is "Rose-water for the Plague" with a vengeance.

I believe the maintenance of the present state of society is only possible through the existence of a large middle-class, who believe it is their interest to maintain it, as Morris says, speaking of the aristocracy and monopolists generally: "They are scant of numbers, and have no power of their own, but depend upon the support of the class next below them—the middle-class."

It is this class that I wish to destroy; it is this class that I have tried to show we can destroy, and I would appeal for the help of all Socialists, and even of all social reformers to bring down this great prop of the existing order of society, whose fruits are misery for all, even of the fortunate who can think and feel, and for the masses degradation and death.

ALFRED CLARE VARLEY.

THE MINERS NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

THE four days' sitting at Edinburgh has been rather a barren one. The easy-going way in which these workmen's representatives take their labours is rather disgraceful. A four days' conference of men sent at great expense from all parts of the three countries to transact most important business gets through its work in this way:—First day: sits from 10 to 12.30; hears a weak, halting, and pointless speech from Mr. Burt, though at one point the honourable gentleman, in a sudden spasmodic burst of revolutionary ferocity declares that the House of Lords is an "anachronism"; this from T. Burt, M.P., astonishes the delegates and exhausts Mr. Burt himself; so after electing secretaries and doing some formalities the conference languidly adjourns. Second day: sits from 10 to 4; discusses about a score of motions and passes none; result of discussion is that a "general sentiment," as the chairman, Mr. Burt, calls it, is evolved and a committee appointed to boil down the score of motions into one which shall include all the first ones and the "general sentiment" besides. These unhappy men, instead of sinking beneath their task, coolly report at the next sitting that they have not held a meeting yet. This report occasions no surprise; perhaps it is regarded as a splendid imitation of parliamentary ways. Third day: another sitting from 10 to 4; energetic discussion, with the magnificent result that one clause of a resolution is carried. Fourth day: the conference actually begins work at 9 a.m. This extraordinary affair, however, is easily explained. The purpose of beginning one hour earlier is to stop several hours earlier, on the principle that an hour in the morning is worth two in the afternoon. This also proves that the British working-man's delegate has not thrown off his historic laziness.

On the whole, the conference must be a sickening disappointment to the miners throughout the country who looked to it for some help and guidance in their present difficulties. The men of light and leading meet together at great expense to their associations. They proceed to talk over a few things in the most leisurely way, as if meanwhile all was well enough. The miserable sterility of their deliberations is made the more exasperating by their splendid self-satisfaction. It is surely time that the mass of the miners in the country hurried these fellows up a bit and sharpened their wits for them.

However, the situation was not without an element of hope. The conference was valuable as the first occasion on which a new departure in trades-unionism was distinctly noticeable. There were two distinct sections in the conference—the official gang of Burt and Co., and a more advanced party, prominent amongst which were Messrs. J. Keir Hardie (N. Ayrshire), Chisolm Robertson (Stirlingshire), Wm. Small (Lanarkshire), John Wilson (Borxburn), and other Scotch delegates. Some of the English delegates were also with the advanced party; but it was curious to notice that the Scotch delegates were distinctly in advance of the English. It is a pity that the miners were represented by such weaklings as their discredited M.P.'s. The hottest work was over the Eight Hours Bill. The advanced party were for parliamentary interference. The others aired the cant about the miners' independence of the State which they learned from Mr. Bradlaugh last session. Wm. Small moved for legislative interference, and in spite of the opposition of Messrs. Burt, Fenwick, and the whole official gang, it was carried by an overwhelming majority.

The Eight Hours motion is of course a matter of no vital importance; in itself it is chiefly interesting as the first motion carried against the orthodox party. Any awakening of the trades-unionists is too valuable to be despised, and if they once begin to go forward they may go a long way before they stop.

Mr. R. B. Cunninghame Graham, M.P., made a most interesting and valuable speech, in which his formal adherence to Socialism was declared. Having been challenged by Mr. Haldane, M.P., to say how far he agreed with Karl Marx's theories, he replied: "Mr. Haldane had asked him, did he (Mr. Graham) go in heart and soul with Karl Marx's theories, and did he know what he pledged himself to regarding this mining question? His answer was, absolutely and entirely." As appearances go at present, there may soon be a Scottish Labour Party formed, of which Mr. Cunninghame Graham will be the chief. This party may not be definitely Socialistic, but it will be a great advance on the old methods.

J. L. MAHON.

EARLY CLOSING.—A traders' conference was held last week at the Craven Hotel, Lavender Hill, Mr. Richard Philips in the chair, to bring about the practice of earlier closing of all shops in that district. After a long discussion, in which the fullest sympathy was shown with the proposals made by the Early Closing Association, it was agreed to adjourn the conference for a week with a view to obtain the support of the few firms who have not yet given in their adhesion to the movement.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

CLOSING OF COLLIERIES.—Arrangements are in progress for closing twelve collieries in the Ettingshall district, near Wolverhampton. This result is said to be due to the impossibility of making them yield a profit under the operations of the Mines Drainage Commissioners.

EXTENSIVE LOCK-OUT.—On Saturday 2000 men were locked out at the Landore-Siemens Steel Works, Swansea, owing to a strike amongst the melters. These men, only forty in number, have been on strike nine weeks against a reduction, and as it is impossible to go on without them, the lock-out was resorted to, with the result that on Tuesday the melters waited on the manager and announced their surrender.

WEAVERS.—At Preston the dispute at Messrs Owtram and Co.'s mills still continues, the firm refusing to discharge the hands who remained at work during the strike. In the same town the weavers employed by Mr. J. Humber have also turned out against the employment of a "tackler" whom they object to. At Barnoldswick also the strike continues, although the employers have engaged fresh hands to fill up the vacancies; and a strike in the cotton trade is feared at Blackburn.

GALSTON—MINERS' STRIKE.—Some four weeks ago the miners employed in Goatfoot and Burnbank pits, numbering in all about 350, struck work in consequence of the proprietor allowing six men to work on the weekly holiday. After coming out the men resolved not to resume work until an advance of 6d. per day was obtained. On Tuesday morning the men, including all the oncost men, who have hitherto worked at the employers' terms, joined their fellows on strike.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—On Friday afternoon the joint-committee of men submitted proposals for the settlement of the dispute, which has now extended to 23 weeks, and which proposal it is generally understood is accepted by the employers, who have been consulted as to the construction of the proposals. The men agree to take the Oldham list of wages as the basis of settlement, and will resume work at once at the rate of wages in force before the strike commenced. Should it be found that the Oldham list is above the Bolton list, the advance to date from January 1. Nothing is said about the imported men lodged at present in the works affected.

REDUCTION OF SCAVENGER'S WAGES.—At the monthly meeting of the Walsall Town Council on Monday, Oct. 10th, it was decided to reduce the wages of a number of the scavengers from 18s. to 16s. per week. The explanation given for this cheese-paring policy is that most of the men whom the reduction will affect are old and infirm men, without families, and no longer able to do heavy manual labour, therefore these wage-slaves are to be paid at a rate which will not supply food in return for their work. There is likely to be considerable agitation in the town about the matter.

THE BROXBURN MINERS.—The struggle of the shale miners with the Oil Companies is more fierce than ever. All except the Broxburn men resumed work at the full reduction, and now the fight is confined to Broxburn. The evictions instead of making the men more despondent has made them more determined. They are being fairly well supported, and will fight on for another two months if necessary. As will be seen from another column, the shale miners by the resolution have acknowledged that the means of production must be made the property of the community. Further details of the struggle will appear next week.—J. L. M.

THE STRIKE IN THE NAIL TRADE.—The largest meetings of nailers that have been held since the commencement of the present strike, took place on Friday at Bromsgrove and Halesowen. The masters offer of the 1879 list less a discount of 30 per cent. off hobnails, and 10 per cent. off all other nails was unanimously rejected, and resolutions were passed to continue the strike until the 1879 list is conceded in its entirety. The operatives in the Black Heath and Rowley districts have unanimously decided not to return to their employment until the list claimed is paid. Later.—Two meetings were held at Halesowen on Monday, at which the Rev. A. O'Neill, of Birmingham, announced that he had issued an appeal for funds, and several friends had responded to it. It was resolved to play on. A number of the operatives in the Sedgley and Coseley districts, it is said, took out iron on Saturday at the employers terms. In the Halesowen, Old Hill, and Rowley districts, the operatives remain firm, and refuse to take out iron under the 1879 list of prices.

THE CONDITION OF THE WORKERS.

HAMPSHIRE—FAREHAM AND DISTRICT.

Occupation.—This district is almost exclusively agricultural. There is a little ship-lading at Porchester, where lighters come for chalk, but the number of men employed probably does not exceed a score.

Farm-Labourers.—The usual wage of this class of men is about 15s. per week, out of which they pay half-a-crown for a cottage. Sometimes they are provided with a cottage on the farm, when the wage is 11s. per week. Carters get about 16s. Labourers do not as a rule keep a pig, the farmers generally objecting to this. A constant hand—that is, a labourer always on the farm—gets 25s. a-week during the month of harvest. The driver of the threshing-machine gets about 20s. per week; the "feeder"—that is, the man who puts the corn into the machine—about 18s.

"Commons."—All the "common-land" has been filched. There is a common at Penbrok, but the landlord of the adjoining property has laid claim to it, and no one seems to object.

Landlord.—The great landlord here is a man named Thistlethwaite. He is very wealthy, and a hard, cruel landlord. I could narrate numerous cases of his brutality, but I am afraid they would take up too much room. He got £95,000 as compensation from the Government for confiscated rights of property, and he has obtained possession of nearly the whole of this property again.

Remarks.—One sees very few old agricultural labourers, the majority of them being in the workhouse. There is a strong inclination among the young ones for the navy. They are becoming very dissatisfied with the way in which they are living, and Socialism would soon make great headway among them.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

We have received the first number of a new Austrian paper, devoted specially to the baker trade's interests—the Bäcker-Zeitung (the Bakers' Organ). The publishers are A. Kreuzer, W. Nemetz, T. Tobola, members of the bakers trade union; the editor is K. Gargula. The paper will appear on the first and on the third Thursday of every month. Among others, their programme includes the following: 1. Federation of all the bakers' associations in Austria-Hungary; 2. Reduction of the hours of work; 3. Abolition of all night work; 4. Discussion of all corporative, economical, socialistic and scientific questions of the day.

After a long interruption, a new number of the Arbeit (the Work) appeared last week at Linz. It was at once confiscated by the police.

BELGIUM.

At the municipal elections of last Sunday, 16th inst., all the candidates of the Parti Ouvrier (Worker's Party) have been beaten everywhere. That is the just reward they deserve for their ugly mingling with Liberals and bourgeois of all kinds. Even at Brussels, the headquarters of the Party, not a single candidate has been elected.

ITALY.

The Socialist papers of our Italian friends are confiscated nearly every day, but Socialism nevertheless is increasing very rapidly among the workers. Last week, as states the Gazzetta Operaia (the Workers Journal), the police has suppressed the first issue of Sempre avanti (Always A-head) at Livorno; the eighth number of Fiaccola rossa (Red Torch) of Florence; the twenty-first number of Humanitas, of Naples; the first issue of Il demolitore (the Destroyer) of the same town; and La Lotta (the Struggle) of Mantua.

At Venice, a new Anarchist-Communist paper has been started under the title of Ottanta nove (the Year 1789) and at Livorno, a corporative organ, Punattiere italiano (the Italian Baker).

DENMARK.

The Danish Socialists publish at the present moment five important organs: Social-Demokraten, at Christiania, edited by comrade Sabroe; Demokraten, at Aarhus, edited by E. Marrott and Harold Tensen; Reform, at Lolland-Falsten, edited by Th. and Chr. Hansen; Randers Folkeblad, at Randers, edited by P. Sabroe; and Nordjyllands Arbejderblad, at Aalborg, edited by Christensen. Socialism is making considerable progress in Denmark, specially among the organised bodies of workmen, who formerly only occupied themselves with mere co-operation, if not saturated with Socialist ideas, is only another form of bourgeois competition.

STRIKE OF MINERS IN SOUTH INDIANA.—New York, Oct. 13.—Two thousand five hundred miners in South Indiana have struck for an advance of wages.

RENT AGITATION IN SOUTH DEVON.—The whole of the tenant-farmers on Lord Devon's estate at Salcombe, Marlborough, and South Huist have signed a petition to the manager, stating that unless their rents are reduced they will quit at Lady Day. The rents average about 22s. 6d. per acre, and the farmers say that unless there is a reduction they must be ruined.

A LONDON HOUSE-RENT CAMPAIGN.—A "House-Rent League" is the title of a movement which a number of working men in the East-end of London have formed a committee to carry on somewhat on the lines of the Irish National League. Some private meetings have been held and enquiries made in St. George's-in-the-East, Wapping, Shadwell, and other parts, by the local committees, as to the amounts at which houses are assessed and also the amounts at which they are let, and the committee allege that in some cases nearly double the assessed rent is obtained by the landlords. The committee of the League have issued a manifesto, and they will carry on their agitation in the winter by meetings, and propose to adopt similar tactics to the Irish League—namely, the appointment of responsible trustees to receive the tendered rent if not accepted by the landlords.

It is characteristic of the age in which we live that while processions and demonstrations of the starving people of London receive a few lines of small type in the daily press, the announcement of a new burlesque at a theatre can have a very prominent position, with wide-spaced type. How true it is that one half of the world knows not how the other half exists. It will be well if there is not a rude awakening for many people in London who are both thoughtless and careless as to the human smouldering volcano.—Labour Tribune.

The Northumberland coal-miners in England have supported in parliament two men as their representatives for years. The two men, Burt and Fenwick, were real good conservative fellows, who had grown fat and contented on their £500 per year paid them by the miners. Fat and contentment are not the starting or initiative forces of reforms, consequently Burt and Fenwick sought more to keep the poor, miserably paid miners contented than to mark out a line of advance. The English Socialists saw the condition of things and sent speakers into the mining hamlets of bleak Northumberland. They did their work well. Burt and Fenwick are looking for another fat job of keeping working men content. And the best of it is that the miners will, from all accounts, elect two Socialists in their places.—(Denver) Labour Enquirer.

Trade unions, then, have two classes of opponents. On the one hand, misallied Conservatives, or opponents of progress, who, in fancied security of possession of abnormal privileges, revile all who protest against their sufferings, and treat with disdainful contempt all who do not complain; on the other hand, misallied Radicals, recruited from all classes of society, who, in their blind zeal for progress, would destroy all organisation, and organisations, the good with the bad. The blind fatality of action, or rather inaction, of the first-named class, the opponents of progress, is tending toward the most terrible social disturbance the world has ever seen. The second-named class, practical opponents of all order, are powerful only for destruction, since no two factions of that class possess half-a-dozen ideas in common.—The Painter.

This that they call Organisation of Labour is the Universal Vital Problem of the World. It is the problem of the whole future for all who will in future pretend to govern men.—Thomas Carlyle.

LETTERS FROM AMERICA.

III.

In the case of the seven Anarchists in Chicago, General Pryor is preparing the writ of error, which he expects to have ready about the 10th of October. Meetings of workmen belonging to all the different organisations are called every day, passing resolutions in favour of the men. Only the ultra-conservative element in the ranks of organised labour does not look favourably upon any expression of sympathy with the condemned, and to the best of my knowledge the decision of the Court has immensely helped the cause of Socialism.

Public affairs are fast becoming Russianised in the States. Even the shadow of the right of free meeting has disappeared, as the following case will amply prove to the readers of the Commonweal.

Last Sunday, Oct. 2nd, a meeting was convened at Union Hill, North Hudson County, New Jersey State, by the Local Assembly 1864 Knights of Labour, composed of silk weavers; the local union of the American Order of Carpenters and Joiners, one of the most conservative unions connected with the building trades; and the local union of the International Cigar-maker's Union. To these bodies of organised labour was added a small section of the Socialistic Labour Party, consisting of about 40 men. The conveners of the meeting had issued a circular calling upon the workmen to assemble in the Skating Rink, Union Hill, and to protest against the proposed judicial murder in Chicago. The hall was decorated with red flags. At about one o'clock it became known the police would attempt to prevent the meeting being held. In the morning the Corporation counsel, one Smith, had declared that the display in a hall of red or black flags was an act of treason. He had ordered the meeting to be suppressed by force.

Police were gathered from other towns to the number of sixty. Special officers were sworn in, the sheriff being also summoned; a large posse was sworn in. The fire company was prepared for action, and the members of a Grand Army Post are reported to have armed themselves for action.

A cordon of police formed a circle around the doorway, and waited for the procession of the workmen. It was nearly 3 o'clock before the procession headed for the rink, and by that time the whole town had turned out. The men carried no flags in their ranks, and on their arrival they tried to enter the hall. The police brutally pushed them back, and at once began to use their clubs without stint. Henry Tueber, one of the men, got a severe clubbing from two policemen. The crowd tried to rescue their friends; the police, however, knew no mercy, and clubbed right and left; and out of the affair emerged what was once Richard Wohlmann, with a badly beaten and swollen head that was scarcely recognisable; the blood issued freely from deep cuts. Four of the men were carried off to the jail. The police by this time began to attack in most brutal fashion everybody standing around, and gradually succeeded in dispersing the crowd. Colonel Hinton, an editor of the Leader, and one of the announced speakers, remonstrated with a dirty wretch who seemed to be the man in authority, and who turned out to be the chief detective, but of course it was of no use. Wohlmann is a little better to-day. The police boast loudly that an indictment will be found against the men now in jail. So much for free speech in the land of manhood suffrage, annual parliaments, payment of members, etc.

Henry George is at present stamping the State. Nobody could describe more graphically and more truthfully the evils resulting from the present system than this caretaker of "number one," but as soon as he comes to an analysis of the cause or to a remedy, his logic becomes of the same shoddy quality as British woollens are in our day. In spite of all this, I expect he will poll about 200,000 votes.

John Swinton, on the ground of ruined personal affairs, has declined to run as the candidate of the Progressive Labour Party. The "ticket" of that party is now composed of: I. Edward Hall, machinist, for Secretary of State; Herbert A. Barker, Cigarmakers' International Union, for Comptroller; Henry Emisch, secretary of Furniture-makers' Union, for Treasurer; Thaddeus B. Wakeman, councillor-at-law, for Attorney-General. There are now five parties in the field—viz., the Republicans, the Democrats, the Prohibitionists, the United Labour Party, and the Progressive Labour Party. The game at politics will be lively this fall, and this Punch and Judy show will last till the asses, fools, and sentimentalists are dodos of the past.

To-morrow the Convention of the Knights of Labour will meet in Minneapolis. A lively time is expected. A large number of Knights are at last discontented with Powderly's administration, and general secretary Litchman will be accused of misappropriation of funds. Powderly, under the circumstances, will not be content with a simple vote of confidence, but will place himself before the convention in such a manner that a test vote of his popularity will be unavoidable. The conservative element in the order will never allow him to be dismissed by the radicals. Unfortunately, if they succeed Powderly will be stronger with the order than ever. Should Powderly be victorious, he will at once, it is understood, propose a plan for the entire reconstruction of the executive department of the organisation. The members of the General Executive Board, according to this new idea, instead of being elected by the General Convention, will henceforth be appointed by the General Master Workman, and will be known as members of his cabinet. This amounts to a coup d'état of the vilest description, which would make Powderly as absolute as the Tsar of all the Russians, and which would prove to be the coup de grace of the organisation known as Knights of Labour. Within the last two years, owing to Powderly's high-handedness, the order lost 400,000 members, which joined the American Federation of Labour.

STRIKES.

The strike at the American Ironworks in Pittsburgh, 3000 men, against the employment of non-union men, has ended favourably to the strikers.

The strike of weavers in the woollen mills of Louisville for an increase of wages, which began two months ago, has failed.

The strike of coal-miners at Etansville and the vicinity has assumed serious proportions; about 2000 men are now out, and as the supply of coal is short, prices have advanced about 10 per cent.

A dispatch from Pittsburgh says: "The strike of the window-glass workers has been averted and operations will be resumed in all the factories of the west as soon as the furnaces can be heated, about ten days. Instead of an advance in wages of 10 per cent. and pay for extras, the workmen agreed to accept a 5 per cent. increase, and the manufacturers promised to bring all outside factories into the association. The settlement of the strike will give employment to 7000 men who have been idle since the beginning of June, although a strike had not been officially declared."

"THE TABLES TURNED."

On Saturday at Farringdon Hall, at a concert in aid of the Commonweal Printing Fund, was produced "a Socialist interlude" by William Morris, with the following cast: Mr. La-di-da (found guilty of swindling), H. Bartlett; Mr. Justice Nupkins, W. Blundell; Mr. Hungary, Q.C. (council for the prosecution), W. H. Utley; Sergeant Sticktoit (witness for prosecution), James Allman; Constable Potlegoff (witness for prosecution), H. B. Tarleton; Constable Strongthoath (witness for prosecution), J. Flockton; Mary Pinch (a labourer's wife, accused of theft), May Morris; Foreman of Jury, T. Cantwell; Jack Freeman (a Socialist, accused of conspiracy, sedition, and obstruction of the highway), H. H. Sparling; Archbishop of Canterbury (witness for defence), W. Morris; Lord Tennyson (witness for defence), A. Brookes; Professor Tyndall (witness for defence), H. Bartlett; William Joyce (a Socialist Ensign), H. A. Barker; Usher, J. Lane; Clerk of the Court, J. Turner; Jurymen, Interrupters, Revolutionists, Neighbours, etc. The play was well received and much applauded. So many people were unable to obtain admittance that it was decided to repeat the performance this Saturday (Oct. 22), when the same tickets will be available. Performances are also being arranged for Hammersmith and Bloomsbury; and it was further announced that any Radical Club or branch of the League or S.D.F. possessing a stage and willing to aid in the raising of the Commonweal Fund, could arrange with the manager to have the same company, scenery, etc. Songs, duets, and instrumental music were also given by Miss V. Paul and John Burns, Miss Miles, Miss Rose Sutherland, Harvey J. Miles, G. Brocher, and Mr. Beber, who sang Morris's "March of the Workers" to his own music. "The Tables Turned; or, Nupkins Awakened" has been printed, and can be had at the Commonweal Office, price 4d. A very favourable report of the performance appeared in the Pall Mall on Monday.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE continued violent and brutal attacks made on the public by the police have added another element to the demonstrations of the Unemployed: a deliberate attack on the freedom of speech is now being made. The respectability of London is, it would seem, so terrified at the sight of the misery it has created that at all hazards it must be swept out of sight. So the police have, it cannot be doubted, received orders to fall upon any assembly of ill-dressed persons who may have the temerity to assemble together to try to find out why they are ill-dressed and half-starved. These wickedly rash people they are to beat, kick, and otherwise ill-use as much as possible on the spot, and they are also to bring home a bag of game in the form of anyone they can catch who is ill-dressed enough to be considered a criminal at sight: it being quite a minor consideration as to whether he has taken any part in the "riot," since the police themselves are always ready with any amount of evidence that may be necessary for the conviction of the criminal (who has certainly committed the crime of being poor) before the Nupkins of the hour.

All this is done, it must be repeated, just to drive the symptoms of the disease which is eating out capitalistic society below the surface—for a month or two; and if in the process the right of public meeting and free speech receives such a blow as nothing but the most vigorous protest will remedy, what does it matter? For these people are not a long way off, like the Irish cottars; their woes are very unpicturesque; and though in fact they bear the old historic name of proletarians, well known to Rome when she was sickening for her death, the English Liberal thinks not of the history but the nuisance of them; as, if he were living in Ireland, he would think of those valiant Celts, over whom Mr. Gladstone has thrown his cloak, and thereby made them respectable.

This is a very poor game for the Great Liberal Party to play, but it seems it is good enough for persons blinded by the base political struggle, the great game of ins and outs. Meantime, are there no Radicals who remember something of their old traditions, of dislike to officialism, of resistance to arbitrary authority? If that is so, then it is a clear case that the Socialists are the only body of men in these islands who have any regard for liberty.

Or what do they think about the dictum quoted by the Bow Street Nupkins in sentencing the "rioters" for allowing themselves to be knocked about by the police? which, stripped of its verbiage, amounts to this, that when the police (the servants of the public) are running a-muck it is the business of peaceable citizens to prove on the spot, when they are under the batons of these philosophers, that they are peaceable citizens, and, if they don't, that they may be sent to prison for their carelessness; so that they had better not go out of their houses at all, for fear lest they should fall in with one of the guardians of Law and Order.

On this maxim the police are now acting; but fortunately in the hurry of the moment they have sometimes attacked persons of undoubted respectability. More power to their elbows in so doing! since if that goes on we shall still be allowed, perhaps, to hold out-door meetings without the accompaniment of a probable cudgelling on Saturday and a sentence on Monday.

Our friends of the Social Democratic Federation have issued a manifesto concerning the unemployed, which all Socialists must read with interest. It must be said of it that if it were possible for a bourgeois government to carry out the proposals contained in it, they are very reasonable ones considering the present condition of society; and one would think that the bourgeois themselves, those of them at least who have any real good-will towards working-men, and don't class them all as mere necessary nuisances, would be of that opinion. But then no capitalistic government will attempt to carry out any one of them, and in truth it could not do so. These proposals all attack the sacredness of "free contract" between the master who gives men leave to work on payment of a sufficient tribute, and refuses it on any other terms, and the workman who must work or die; and the maintenance of this holy law is the one function of a capitalistic government.

Therefore, it seems to me that our friends ask either too much or too little. Even a transitional administration (if such a thing be possible) would give much more, because it must be said (as our friends would doubtless admit) that if all these demands were granted the workers would still be in a condition of miserable slaves; while on the other hand, as aforesaid, the maximum which a capitalistic government would or could grant would be a wretched concession of mere "charity" or out-a-door relief. That concession will have to be made, whether or no, and therefore to my mind it is a mistake for Socialists to take steps which may mix them up in the granting of this misery of a concession.

One can easily imagine the song of triumph and self-congratulation which the capitalist government will set up when it has been forced to set on foot a few relief works with pauper wages for payment of the workers. "We are all Socialists now," will be the cry, "what do you cantankerous revolutionists want now?" "What do we want?" we shall have to answer, "Why all that we have always wanted, the Freedom of Labour, the abolition of private property in the means of production." I think that answer will come clearer from us if we have allowed the capitalists to grant the palliatives they could not help granting. Don't let us mind their gaining what transient credit they can gain from such measures; it will soon pass away. "The poor ye have always with you," is the doom of capitalism.

"The police have adopted a milder bearing towards the crowds," says the Daily News of October 24th, after Sunday's events. In other words, the police have been beaten once more, and have had to give way before the gathering indignation of the public, and probably also before the task of bludgeoning a Sunday crowd, more numerous than a mere week-day one. The Daily News, the advocate of free speech in Ireland and of the suppression of free speech in England, has a good deal to say on the subject, which, however, doesn't come to much in the teeth of the fact that all that the objectors to police violence put forward has been proven true by events. During the week small bodies of men met, and were attacked by the police, so there was "rioting"; on the Sunday large bodies of men met, and there was apparently well-founded fear in some people's minds that there would be a great disturbance, but there was none. Why? Because, in the words of the Daily News, "the police have adopted a milder bearing toward the crowd"—that is, they have not made a riot as they did on the other days.

Now that the police have proved themselves a set of ruffianly rioters, and that Sir Charles Warren has written himself down an ass in characters which he who runs may read, surely even the Law-and-Order (in England) Daily News will admit that it is preposterous to keep the citizens in prison whom the Bow Street and other Nupkins have sentenced to one, three, and six months' hard labour for performing their duty as citizens. The only question is what compensation is to be made to them for the ill-treatment of the police and the police-court, and with what amount of ignominy Nupkins and Co. are to be dismissed.

The scene has shifted to Ireland again. Mr. Wilfrid Blunt has received the diploma of honour which the policeman's hand gives now-a-days, and with him Mr. John Roche, the President of the local Association. The Daily News will (of course) condemn their resistance to undoubted legal authority, but we shall congratulate them for serving the same cause as the poor workmen in London are serving.

Once more an Irish policeman, Connor, has shown that he is a man by refusing at his own peril to fall on harmless and unarmed citizens. Such men give one hopes for the Social Revolution, and the heroism which will be necessary to carry it through.

I see that one or two geniuses have been writing to the Pall Mall Gazette proposing a scheme for inveigling the unemployed into the ranks of the British army: that noble body of warriors which is at present to act as burglars abroad and bum-bailiffs at home—since Ireland is still "united" to England—and whose future function will be perhaps the attempted suppression of rising liberty in England. Well, I doubt if the cock will fight; but if any workmen are driven by starvation into the army, let them at least remember what they were, and like the gallant man mentioned in the note last above, refuse to attack their brethren if they should be called on to do so.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE FOX AND THE GEESE.

I HAD occasion a week or two ago in these columns to animadvert somewhat strongly on the employes of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway for their extraordinary proposal to give a week's pay to the company on account of the losses in connection with the collision at Hexthorpe. Incredibly foolish as the mere resolution appeared, the circumstances connected with the case are vastly more absurd. I have before me "a report of the proceedings at an interview between the directors and a deputation of the employes," and I wish it were possible to spare space for its reprinting in the Commonweal, for a more ridiculous farce it is scarce possible to conceive. Let our readers picture to themselves the scene. The pompous, portly directors—lords, baronets, M.P.'s, etc.—comfortably lounging in the board-room awaiting the sheepish deputation of servile simpletons, who came cringing, cap in hand, almost overwhelmed by the presence of a real live lord and a noble earl, to beg the poor dear directors to receive their offering. Positively the speakers, one after the other, humbly thanked their proposed beneficiaries for their kindness in allowing them to be present, and a goods-guard apologised for not making a formal report on the grounds that "it has been very late at nights before we have finished and we have not had an opportunity to meet," and "the traffic was so heavy for our staff that most of the men were tired out."

Sir Edward Watkin, Bart., presided. His speech to the deputation was an inimitable piece of humbug. One can imagine him with his tongue in his cheek as he gets off the following definition of equality:

"We have always desired that it should be a partnership on just and equal terms, and that we should, whatever we do, avoid those complications which every now and then have marked as well as disfigured the great history of labour. And after all, gentlemen, we are very much on an equality—I mean the shareholders on one side, and those who work for pay on the other. Taking the last year as a test, I find that the total net profit earned was £776,056. On the other side, we paid in regular wages and salaries in that year £685,609. I find also that there being 11,396 shareholders, their share of net profit on the year was £67, 11s. a head. I find that we have 9935 persons employed, and that their share came to £69, 0s. 2d. per head. Therefore there is not so much of a difference in the result, when we divide it by heads, between the man who finds the capital and the man who works."

"Hear, hear," respond the delighted delegates, forgetful of the very great "difference" that their £69, 0s. 2d. per per year, or 25s. per week, is obtained only by hard and wearisome work in all weathers and often at risk of life and limb. To us Sir Edward's figures are interesting as confirming our comrade Carpenter's contention that every railway employé has, figuratively, to carry a shareholder on his back.

Here is another choice morsel:

"Now, I know there are those who say that the capitalist who finds the money for undertakings like ours is a 'bloated aristocrat,' and that in point of fact you are working so many hours for him before you are able to secure anything for yourselves; but all sensible men—as you are—must know very well that if a hard-saving man had not provided the capital, and invested it, and so instituted the means of employment, there would be no employment for the workman, and that therefore it is idle to say you are working for somebody else, while that somebody else has really found the money that enables you to work at all!"

Funny, isn't it? Divine institution, Profit! but for kind Sir Edward and his crew employing us, the earth would become depopulated—a barren waste!

Mr. T. H. Sidebottom, M.P., "as a large employer of labour, as well as being a director of this company," was delighted at the spirit shown by the employes, which "is a strong illustration of the truth that the interests of employers and employed are identical." Cheers followed this stupid lie. Then Mr. Chapman is introduced by the chairman as one "almost born a director of this company." "He inherited a large fortune in the stock of this company invested by his father, and he is the largest sufferer—in a pecuniary sense." Very touching is Mr. Chapman's reference to the reduction of his Christmas dividend, and very edifying the martyr-like spirit with which, strengthened and comforted by the touching generosity of the employes, he is prepared to submit to his loss. Happy workers! how thankful we ought to be that we have no Christmas dividends to worry about!

It is droll yet sad to observe, in spite of Sir E. Watkin's assertion of "equality," that the "men" one and all appeared to think they owed a debt of gratitude to the directors for permitting them to live. In fact, they evidently suffer under the delusion that the M. S. and L. Railway is a heavenly institution devised by these good, kind, charitable capitalists in order to provide the workers with employment.

Such stupidity, it is to be hoped, is exceptional even among railway men. In the meantime, I would advise that the executive of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants take advantage of the abnormal "benevolence" of the employes of the M. S. and L. R. Sir E. Watkin states that a week's pay would amount to £12,000 or £13,000. Now, surely men who can feel so keenly for the aforesaid earls, lords, baronets, etc., that they are prepared to subscribe their guinea lest poor Mr. Chapman and his fellow-shareholders should have their bankers' balance reduced, will be only too ready to help their unfortunate fellow-workers whose sufferings take the severer form of deprivation of dinners instead of a mere diminution of dividends. The Midland Railway Strike Fund, for the assistance of the sufferers by the late strike, at present amounts only to about £340. I expect in the course of a few days to hear that the treasurer has received, say, a cheque for £1000 on behalf of the employes of the M. S. and L. Railway.

In vain is the earth fertile and the climate benign if human labour be wanting.

FROM THE PRISON CELL.

ALBERT R. PARSONS has been busily engaged on the Supreme Court opinion of the Anarchist case since the date of its publication, and has issued his individual position and defence, from which the following extracts are taken:

"Fellow-citizens: As all the world knows, I have been convicted and sentenced to die for the crime of murder, the most heinous offence that can be committed. Under the form of law two courts—viz., the Criminal and Supreme courts of the state of Illinois—have sentenced me to death as an accessory before the fact to the murder of Officer Degan, on May 4, 1886. Nevertheless I am innocent of the crime charged, and to a candid and unprejudiced world I submit the proof.

"In the decision affirming the sentence of death upon me the Supreme court of the state of Illinois says: 'It is undisputed that the bomb was thrown that caused the death of Degan. It is conceded that no one of the defendants threw the bomb with his own hands. Plaintiffs in error are charged with being accessories before the fact.' If I did not throw the bomb myself it becomes necessary to prove that I aided, encouraged, and advised the person who did throw it. Is that fact proved? The Supreme court says it is. The record says it is not. I appeal to the American people to judge between them.

"Mayor Harrison, who was present and heard the speech, testified before the jury that it was simply 'a violent and political harangue' and did not call for his interference as a peace officer. The speech delivered by me at the Haymarket and which I repeated before the jury is a matter of record and undisputed, and I challenge any one to show therein that I incited any one to acts of violence. The extract reported by Mr. English, when taken in connection with what preceded and what followed, cannot be construed by the wildest imagination as incitement to violence. Extracts from three other speeches alleged to have been delivered by me were more than one year prior to May 4, 1886, are given. Two of these speeches were reported from the memory of the Pinkerton detective Johnson. These are the speeches quoted by the court as proof of my guilt as accessory to the murder of Degan. Where, then, is the connection between these speeches and the murder of Degan? I am bold to declare that such connection is imperceptible to the eye of a fair and unprejudiced mind. But the honourable body the Supreme court of Illinois has condemned me to death for speeches I never made and for articles I never wrote. In the affirmation of the death sentence the court has 'assumed,' 'supposed,' 'guessed,' surmised, and 'presumed' that I can and did 'so and so.' This the record fully proves.

"The court says: 'Spies, Schwab, Parsons, and Engel were responsible for the articles written and published by them, as above shown; Spies, Schwab, Fielden, Parsons, and Engel were responsible for the speeches made by them respectively, and there is evidence in the same record tending to show that the death of Degan occurred during the prosecution of a conspiracy planned by the members of the International groups who read these articles and heard these speeches.'

"Now I defy any one to show from the record the proof that I wrote more than one of the many articles alleged to have been written by me. Yet the Supreme court says that I wrote and am responsible for all of them. Again—concerning the alleged speeches—they were reported by the Pinkerton detective Johnson, who was, as the record shows, employed by Lyman Gaze, president of the First national bank, as the agent of the Citizens' association, an organisation composed of the millionaire employers of Chicago.

"I submit to a candid world if this hired spy would not make false reports to earn blood-money. Thus, it is for speeches I did not make and articles I did not write I am sentenced to die because the court 'assumes' that these articles influenced some unknown and still unidentified person to throw the bomb that killed Degan. Is this law? Is this justice?

"The Supreme court, in affirming the sentence of death upon me, proceeds to give further reasons, as follows: 'Two circumstances are to be noted. First, it can hardly be said that Parsons was absent from the Haymarket meeting when he went to Zepf's Hall. It has already been stated that the latter place was only a few steps north of the speakers' waggon and in sight from it. We do not think that the defendant Parsons could escape his share of the responsibility for the explosions at the Haymarket because he stepped into a neighbouring saloon and looked at the explosion through a window. While he was speaking men stood around him with arms in their hands. Many of these were members of the armed sections of the International groups. Among them were men who belonged to the International rifles, an armed organisation in which he himself was an officer and with which he had been drilling in preparation for the events then conspiring.'

"The records of the trial will show that not one of the foregoing allegations is true. The facts are these: Zepf's Hall is on the north-east corner of Lake and Desplaines streets, just one block north of the speakers' waggon. The court says 'it was only a few steps north of the speakers' waggon.' The court says further that 'it can hardly be said that Parsons was absent from the Haymarket meeting when he was at Zepf's Hall.' If this is correct logic, then I was at two different places a block apart at the same instant. Truly the day of miracles has not yet passed. Again, the record will show that I did not 'step into a neighbouring saloon and look at the explosion through a window.' It will show that I went to Zepf's Hall, one block distant, and across Lake Street, accompanied by my wife and another lady and my two children (a girl of 5 and a boy of 7 years of age), they having sat upon a waggon about ten feet from the speakers' waggon throughout my speech; that it looked like rain; that we had started home and went into Zepf's Hall to wait for the meeting to adjourn, and walked home in company with a lot of friends who lived in that direction. Zepf's building is on the corner and opens on the street with a triangular door six feet wide. Myself and ladies and children were just inside the door. Here, while waiting for our friends and looking towards the meeting, I had a fair view of the explosion. All this the record will show.

"It would seem that, according to circumstances, a block is at one time 'a few steps' or a 'few steps' is more than a block, as the case may suit. The logical as well as the imaginative faculties of the Supreme court are further illustrated in a most striking manner by the credence of the court to the 'yarn' of a 'reporter,' who testified that Spies had described to him the 'czar' bombs and the men who were to use them as follows. 'He spoke of a body of tall, strong men in their organisation who could throw bombs weighing five pounds 150 paces. He stated that the bombs in question were to be used in case of conflict with the police or the militia.'

"The court gives this sort of testimony as proof of the existence of a conspiracy to murder Degan. Wonderful credulity. To throw a five-pound bomb 150 paces or yards is to throw it 450 feet or a quarter of a mile.

"Gulliver, in his travels among the Brobdingnag race, tells us of the giants he met, and we have also heard of the giants of Patagonia. But we did not know until now that they were mere Lilliputians as compared with the 'anarchist Swedes' of Chicago.

"I appeal to the American people, to their love of justice and fair play. I submit that the record does not show my guilt of the crime of murder, but on the contrary it proves my innocence.

"Against me in this trial all the rules of law and evidence have been reversed, in that I have been held as guilty until I prove my innocence. I have been tried ostensibly for murder, but in reality for Anarchy. I have been proved guilty of being an Anarchist, and condemned to die for that reason. The State's Attorney said in his statement before the court and jury, in the beginning of the trial, 'These defendants were picked out and indicted by the grand jury; they are no more guilty than the thousands who follow them; they are picked out because they are leaders. Convict them and our society is safe.' And in their last appeal to the jury the prosecution said, 'Anarchy is on trial. Hang these eight men and save our institutions. These are the leaders: make examples of them.' This is a matter of record.

"So far as I have had time to examine the records, I find the same fabrication and perversion of testimony against all my comrades as exists against myself. I therefore again appeal to the American people to avert the crime of judicial murder.

"My ancestors partook of all the hardships incident to the establishment of this republic. They fought, bled, and some of them died that the declaration of independence might live and the American flag wave in triumph over those who claim the 'divine right of kings to rule.' Shall the flag now, after a century's triumph, trail in the mire of oppression and protect the perpetration of outrages and oppressions that would put the older despotisms of Europe to shame?

"Knowing myself innocent of crime, I came forward and gave myself up for trial. I felt that it was my duty to take my chances with the rest of my comrades. I sought a fair and impartial trial before a jury of my peers, and knew that before any fair-minded jury I could with little difficulty be cleared. I preferred to be tried and take the chances of an acquittal with my friends to being hunted as a felon. Have I had a fair trial?

"The lovers of justice and fair play are assiduously engaged in an effort to thwart the consummation of judicial murder by a commutation of sentence to prison. I speak for myself alone when I say that for this I thank them and appreciate their efforts. But I am an innocent man. I have violated no law; I have committed no offence against any one's rights. I am simply the victim of the malice of those whose anger has been aroused by the growth, strength, and independence of the Labour organisations of America. I am a sacrifice to those who say, 'These men may be innocent. No matter. They are Anarchists. We must hang them anyway.'

"My council informs me that every effort will be made to take this case before the highest tribunal in the land, and that there is strong hope of a hearing there. But I am also reliably informed that from three to five years will elapse before the Supreme Court of the United States can hear and adjudge the case.

"Since surrendering myself to the authorities I have been locked up in close confinement twenty-one hours out of every twenty-four for six days, and from Saturday afternoon till Monday morning (thirty-eight hours) each week in a noisome cell, without a ray of sunlight or a breath of pure air. To be compelled to bear this for five or even three years would be to suffer a lingering death; and it is only a matter of serious consideration with me whether I ought to accept the verdict as it stands rather than die by inches under such conditions. I am prepared to die. I am ready, if needs be, to lay down my life for my rights and the rights of my fellow-men. But I object to being killed on false and unproved accusations. Therefore I cannot countenance or accept the efforts of those who would endeavour to procure a commutation of my sentence to an imprisonment in the penitentiary. Neither do I approve of any further appeals to the courts of law. I believe them to be all alike—the agency of the privileged classes to perpetuate their power, to oppress and plunder the toiling masses. As between capital and its legal rights, the courts of law must side with the capitalistic class. To appeal to them is in vain. It is the appeal of the wage-slave to his capitalist master for liberty. The answer is—curses, blows, imprisonment, death.

"If I had never been an Anarchist before, my experience with courts and the laws of the governing classes would make an Anarchist of me now. What is Anarchy? It is a state of society without any central or governing power. Upon this subject the court, in its affirmation of the death sentence, defines the object of the International Working People's Association as follows: 'It designed to bring about a social revolution. Social revolution meant the destruction of the right of private ownership of property, or of the right of the individual to own property. It meant the bringing about of a state of society in which all property should be held in common.' If this definition is right, then it is very similar to that advocated by Jesus Christ, for proof of which I refer to the fourth and fifth chapters of the Acts of the Apostles; also Matthew xxi., 10 to 14, and Mark x., 15 to 19.

"No, I am not guilty. I have not been proved guilty. I leave it to you to decide from the record itself as to my guilt or innocence. I cannot, therefore, accept a commutation to imprisonment. I appeal—not for mercy, but for justice. As for me, the utterance of Patrick Henry is so appropos that I cannot do better than let him speak: 'Is life so dear and peace so sweet as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!'

A. R. PARSONS.

"Prison Cell 29, Chicago (Ill.), Sept. 21, 1887."

Force is seldom justifiable as a method of reform, but the impetuous revolutionist who believes in and uses it is much less vitally in error than the wicked hypocrite who pretends to see no distinction between force used in vindication of rights and force used in their violation.—Liberty.

It is well never to lose sight of the ultimate aim and intent of the Labour movement—the total abolition of the wage-system; but those things which promise present benefit should neither be despised nor neglected. Only be careful that what promises present benefit is not calculated to hinder the great object.—(Toronto) Labour Reformer.

The main arguments in the political venture of Messrs. George and McGlynn seem to be embodied in the words "applause," "tremendous applause," and "uproarious applause" (see Standard), coming from the lily throats, through pearly-white teeth and ruby lips, of the female portion of the audience. Thus is taxation made popular.—Workmen's Advocate.

WE'LL TURN THINGS UPSIDE DOWN!

Oh, the world is overburdened
With the idle and the rich!
They bask up in the sunshine,
While we plod in the ditch;
But, zounds! we'll put some mettle
In their fingers and their thumbs—
For we'll turn things upside down, my lads,

When the revolution comes!

Oh, we'll turn things upside down,
Oh, we'll turn things upside down;
They will wonder what has happened,
When we turn things upside down!

Plain living may be wholesome,
And wondrous virtues may Abound beneath ribs scant of flesh,
And pockets scant of pay.
It may be poverty is best
If rightly understood;
But we'll turn things upside down, my lads!

We don't want all the good!

Oh, we'll turn, etc.
Oh, we'll turn, etc.
May they thrive on their philosophy,
When we turn things upside down!

They are never done extolling
The nobility of work;
But the knaves! they always take good care
Their share of toil to shirk!
Do they send their sons and daughters
To the workshop or the mill?

Oh, we'll turn things upside down, my lads!
It will change their tune, it will!
Oh, we'll turn, etc.
Oh, we'll turn, etc.
They can practise all their precepts
When we turn things upside down!

They live in splendid mansions,
And we in hovels vile;
Their lives are spent in pleasure,
And ours in cheerless toil;
They jaunt about the world, while we
Are pinned down to one spot;
But we'll turn things upside down, we will!

It is time, lads, is it not?

Oh, we'll turn, etc.
Oh, we'll turn, etc.
Life then may be worth living,
When we've turned things upside down!

Then let us, lads, right lustily
Support the glorious cause,
To overturn the whole vile lot
With their lying and their laws!
And let us all together
Put our shoulders to the wheel,
That will turn things upside down, hurrah!
All for the common weal!
Oh, we'll turn, etc.
Oh, we'll turn, etc.
The world will be far better

QUERIES FROM 'THE QUERIST.'

[The Querist was first issued anonymously by its author, the celebrated George Berkeley, D.D., Bishop of Cloyne, in 1735. The following queries are selected from the 1752 edition, published at Dublin, with author's name, style, and title in full.—S.]

WHETHER the drift or aim of every wise State should not be to encourage industry in its members? And whether those who employ neither head nor hands for the common benefit, deserve not to be expelled like drones out of a well-governed State?

Whether the four elements and man's labour therein, be not the true source of wealth?

Whether it were not wrong to suppose land itself to be wealth? And whether the industry of a people is not first to be considered, as that which constitutes wealth, which makes even land and silver to be wealth, neither of which would have any value but as means and motives to industry?

Whether a single hint be sufficient to overcome a prejudice? And whether even obvious truths will not sometimes bear repeating?

Whether, if human labour be the true source of wealth, it doth not follow that idleness should of all things be discouraged in a wise State?

Whether necessity is not to be hearkened to before convenience, and convenience before luxury?

Whether a people who had provided themselves with the necessities of life in good plenty, would not soon extend their industry to new arts and new branches of commerce?

Whether the vanity and luxury of a few ought to stand in competition with the interest of a nation?

Whether national wants ought not to be the rule of trade? And whether the most pressing wants of the majority ought not to be first considered?

Whether she would not be a very vile matron, and justly thought either mad or foolish, that should give away the necessities of life from her naked and famished children, in exchange for pearls to stick in her hair and sweetmeats to please her own palate?

Whether a nation might not be considered as a family? Whether the real foundation for wealth must not be laid in the numbers, the frugality, and the industry of the people? And whether all attempts to enrich a nation by other means, as raising the coin, stockjobbing, and such arts, are not vain?

Whether the public aim ought not to be that men's industry should supply their present wants, and the overplus be converted into a stock of power?

Whether all manner of means should not be employed to possess the nation in general, with an aversion and contempt for idleness and all idle folk?

Whether it is not a great point to know what we would be at? And whether whole States, as well as private persons, do not often fluctuate for want of this knowledge?

TORY ROUGHS AT YARMOUTH.—The following is a cutting from the Eastern Daily Press of last Friday, with reference to the weekly Yarmouth meeting:—"Fired by the example of their Lowestoft brethren, a mob attempted last night to create a disturbance at the weekly Socialist meeting held on the Quay. Only one Socialist speaker was present, Fred Henderson from Norwich, and he had no sooner begun to speak than the riotous crowd endeavoured to personally assail him. A large number of sympathisers were present, and many Radicals, who, while not agreeing with the speaker's ideas, still urged his right of free speech. The crowd would quickly have retaliated on the mob, who found the tables completely turned against them, had not the speaker urged his supporters to exercise tolerance towards the interrupters. The roughs then contented themselves with remaining in the background and yelling violently. At the conclusion of the meeting a bodyguard surrounded Henderson, and escorted him to the station. It is scarcely likely, in the face of their defeat, that the roughs will repeat their tactics, as it was only with difficulty that the crowd was restrained from treating them as they had wished to treat the Socialist speaker."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. L. (Aberdeen), and others.—We must again call your attention to the standing notice and to the special request made in this column on Oct. 8. By disregarding the request there made, much extra labour is wantonly inflicted on editors and printers.

F.—Yes! there is such a paper. It is the Bartlett (Tenn.) News, and "believes in State Sovereignty—including secession as an incident; believes that negro suffrage should be put down with drawn knives and loaded shot-guns, if the negro persist in voting"; denounces the "lollypop and flap-doodle of conciliation"; and is an instructive example of the "Dodo in Politics." Its political editor is the well-known Will. H. Kernan. It has one or two feeble imitators, but keeps its evil eminence.

THE UNEMPLOYED.

THE winter is beginning, and with it is beginning the open complaint of the workers whom our system of employment for profit will only allow to work sometimes, although, like other men, they have needs which always press upon them, and which, since they own nothing but the power of labour inherent in their own bodies, they can only satisfy by receiving wages, or else "charity," from persons who own the property, the use of which is necessary to enable the workman to work.

Although many people are unemployed in the summer as well as in the winter, yet the interruption caused by the season in certain industries, and the additional pressure which its inclemency puts on the miserable incomes of working people, specially forces this terrible wrong on public attention at this season; and every winter henceforth, as long as the capitalist system lasts, we may expect to have the case of the most unfortunate of the disinherited classes put before us, and threatening the well-to-do with disturbance and riot, the forerunners of the ruin which is advancing upon them.

At such a time it especially behoves the Revolutionary Socialists to face the matter with foresight, and to express their opinions regardless of the anger or favour of any party or set of men. The Council of the Socialist League therefore thinks it necessary to lay the following remarks before Socialists and the public in general.

In the first place, we express the fullest sympathy for the poor people who are the immediate victims of the great system of wrong, mis-called society; which is founded on the privilege accorded to the owners of the means necessary to labour for production to rob the whole of the workers of a large part of the wealth which they have created. We assert that the needs of these people must be immediately satisfied, at whatever cost to those who live on the labour of the working classes. These outcasts of commercialism must be fed, clothed, and housed by their masters, even though they produce nothing for those masters.

It is futile, however, to expect the State to employ these men on labour which would produce a profit to it with any advantage, even temporarily, to the whole body of the workers. They have been thrust out of the organisation of commerce because there is no place for them; if they are arbitrarily replaced in it they will but displace other workers who are now employed, and the matter will not be mended in the least. It would be quite as idle to expect the State to employ them on unproductive work at wages which the supply and demand of the Labour Market gives to workers in ordinary employment. For the State is but an executive which exists to carry out the behests of the privileged classes, who live on the labour of the workers: and it is well understood by them—nay, it has become a kind of sacred doctrine of theirs—that the unfortunates of the workers, those who are distanced in the race of competition, must be tortured by the cruelties and indignities of the Poor Law in order that a terror may be held up before the great body of workmen which will make them stick to their hopeless, repulsive, and shamefully-paid tasks.

Outdoor relief, therefore, in some form or other, is all that can be looked for from the State: this the mere circumstances of the case will compel it to give, and to do so right and left with little discrimination. The bourgeois will cry out, "But this will mean perpetually extending pauperism and at last ruin for the State." We answer, Most surely: but it will be done; nor can ruin be averted except by the privileged classes giving up their privilege and the State melting into Society, and then the question of the unemployed will have come to an end, as we shall work for ourselves and shall ourselves consume what we have produced.

While the present State lasts, therefore, and the privileged classes, there is no remedy possible for this huge misery and wrong. Must we Socialists tell this, then, to starving men seeking victuals and shelter for the passing day? Yes, we must tell it them, for we believe nothing short of that; and to give them lying and delusive hopes of a decent livelihood which they have no chance of obtaining is not doing them a service. But we must address them, not specially as men out of work, but as a part of the great body of workmen, who are always being robbed and oppressed. They are not a special class as unemployed workmen: the threat of coming to this pass always hangs over the life of the worker. There is no salvation for the unemployed but in the general combination of the workers for the freedom of labour—for the REVOLUTION which will enable all workmen to employ themselves by using the means of production, which will then be theirs, without cringing to an idle rich man for leave to be allowed to work.

But what else are we to say to them? How are we to enable them to gain that palliative, that wretched pittance of out-door relief, under whatever specious form it may be given, which we have already said circumstances will force the State to give them? We hold that there is no direct way in which we Socialists as Socialists can help them.

Whoever may read these lines, and whatever use our opponents of the ruling class may make of them against us, we feel it our duty to speak plainly and without concealment on this matter. Deputations to members of the Government, proofs of the fact (which everybody knows) that there are many people out of employment, will do nothing to quicken the advent of this palliative. Some of the workers may think that the terror caused by rioting might do more; but once for all, unless we Socialists are prepared to organise and lead such disturbances, and carry them through to the bitter end, we are bound, under penalty of being justly blamed for egging on people to do what we dare not heartily take part in, to point out to the unemployed what would probably be the results of a riot or series of riots.

The unemployed alone are not organised and cannot be organised, for resistance to the brute-force of authority: they can attain no success except the mere terror and disturbance which the riots might cause, and that at the expense of at least the imprisonment of their leaders and many of their rank and file. They would be repressed; and as the authorities recovered from their first surprise, and handled their organised forces, the ease of repression would increase, unless the rising were general. Furthermore, the terror so caused could not, as things now are, produce more advantage for the workers than hastening on the granting of that palliative of outdoor relief, which we have spoken of above.

Such risings can only be worth the necessary sacrifices which they entail when they are supported by the general body of the workers, and express their definite aim, not towards a mere palliative, but towards some step which will lead us directly to the Social Revolution. Whereas now, even supposing it possible that a rising should grow to such proportions as to cause what is sometimes called a Revolution, that is an unseating of the present authority, the people are not yet enough educated in Socialism to deal with such a crisis, and if it took place they would once more fall into the hands of a political party, which would delude them while they were plundered, as other political parties have done.

Therefore, we repeat, we express our utmost sympathy for the unemployed whether they have learned what Socialism means or whether they have not. We protest most emphatically against the brutal assaults made upon those who have met to put forward their wrongs; believing indeed that these wanton attacks on peaceable citizens are made with the deliberate intention of forcing them into riot in order to give the authorities an excuse for another step in the suppression of free speech, now so grievously attacked throughout all capitalist countries. At the same time we feel that as a body whose business is to educate the people into Socialism, since we cannot, as above said, give direct help to the unemployed, our duty is to go on putting before all workmen, employed or unemployed, the necessity for their hastening and preparing for the advent of that Social Revolution which will put an end to all the miserable wrongs and sordid makeshift of our modern system, now happily fast rotting away. It is to the employed among the workmen, therefore, rather than to the unemployed that we address our last words, and to those especially who are receiving what are conventionally called "good wages," but which mean after all a miserably stinted and pinched life compared to that which, not only they, but all workers ought to attain to, and will attain to when they look from the narrow interests of their household, their workshop, their trade, to the whole world of workers, whose conscious or unconscious struggles are slowly building up the New Society. To these we say: Fellow-workers, do not any longer dissociate yourselves from your less fortunate brethren, from those who have been doomed to feel the whole weight of the burden which sits comparatively lightly on your shoulders. Do you call them thriftless, idle, drunken, brutal, in a word degraded? Perhaps you may call them in one word less lucky than yourselves; and remember that the remorseless wheel of competitive commerce is going on grinding everybody beneath it; while you are refusing to learn what your position is, and what your claims ought to be, or while you are halting between two opinions, your great master Machinery, which should be your servant, is getting more and more powerful, more and more exacting every day, and in a few years unless you have made up your minds to get rid of mastership, many of you certainly, and probably most of you, will find yourselves no longer skilled workmen but mere labourers cumbering a market which is getting ever more and more overstocked with such common and worthless wares as mere men. And do you think that when you are come to that pass you will be any better than those poor fellows of the fringe of labour whom you now despise? It is not likely—it is not possible. Be wise in time and resolve that you will not come to that pass, which you will be able to avoid by combining together in a steady, continuous, unfaltering resistance to the authority of the false society founded on privilege; which makes you inferior beings to the owners of capital or land; which takes from you two-thirds of all you produce; which if any one of those many accidents befall you that in our life of to-day, so hard and full of constant struggle, we are all liable to, throws you into a prison under the name of a workhouse, or lets you rot away body and mind in the street.

It is the business, fellow-workers, of the whole intelligence of the working-classes to see that there are no longer either unemployed, or wage-slaves, or masters.

On behalf of the Council of the Socialist League,

HENRY. A. BARKER, Secretary.

PRACTICAL POLITICS AT NOTTINGHAM.

THE orthodox Liberals have had a great field day at Nottingham under very brilliant circumstances, all things considered; the democratic portion of the population of England, Scotland, and Wales, and it is even hoped the voters in general who have any claim to be considered Liberals, are prepared to accept Home Rule for other people though they have scarcely begun even to think of it for themselves. This acceptance of Home Rule for Ireland, by everybody who could ever possibly accept it, is so universal that there are no shades of opinion on the subject; the unspoken (nay, sometimes the spoken) word when people meet now is, "You are a Home Ruler and a beast!" "You are a Unionist and a rascal!" Argument is at an end, and people, dog-sick of the question, would be much relieved if it were possible for a thousand champions a-side to meet on Wimbledon Common, or some other suitable place, and there fight it out to the death like Clan Chattan and Clan Quhele of old days; but since civilisation and the natural desire to best one's opponent at no expense to oneself forbids such a proceeding, all people are looking forward with disgust to the long spell of Parliamentary tactics, which will on this occasion as on other similar ones in modern times, take the place of "point and edge" with small advantage to the public generally.

Such a condition of things was, I repeat, most favourable to the occasion, which was certainly made the most of. Mr. Gladstone exhibited himself for the worship of the faithful, which was poured forth on him in the most abundant measure, so that he must have thought it worth while indeed to be a statesman. He exercised the art of oratory if not to the fullest, yet at least as far as need be; the art, I mean, which consists of spinning out two or three sentences of meaning into speeches getting on for two hours long, so that the audiences mostly were thoroughly delighted. Indeed, those of them who had memories capable of resisting the wear and tear of five or six years might have employed the leisure which the great man's flow of speech-words afforded them in blessing their stars and their leader that it was not they but their adversaries this time who were trying to wield the great net of Coercion, with the certainty of their knocking themselves into the water with it. Some of them might also have remembered the roars of joy with which pure Liberal meetings received the news of their present ally Mr. Parnell's arrest and imprisonment; and probably Mr. John Morley was now and then pensively thinking of the evening, when before the electors of Westminster in 1880 he put down his foot on Home Rule in such a clear, brief, and convincing speech, that everybody in the hall, except a few grumblers and Irishmen, shouted for joy.

However, let pardon be given to those who have changed their opinions in the right direction, and let us hope that such changes will be common during the next few years among political men. It is at least satisfactory to see that Mr. Gladstone is doing no backsliding in this Irish matter, that he who is exceedingly slow to perceive that the enemy must be attacked in front has at last seen it. All that he has to do now is to set his political wits to work to get rid of the Tory majority in the house before some portion of his men, the really anti-Radical part, who much outnumber the Radical, swing in the other direction, and carry him along with their impetus. Don't let him dally with the crisis as he dearly loves to do, like a too artistic angler, who having a good fish on his line plays him showily to show his art, and loses him in the end.

Well, the Irish Question disposed of, what other schemes of reform had this enthusiastic multitude of delegates and notabilities, sitting in the good town of Nottingham, where, forsooth, they might have some rather serious thoughts suggested to them by the locality and its industries. I remember I was there some six years ago, and trade was booming then. I was told, I don't know with how much truth, that an ordinary twister-in, or lace-weaver, could earn £6 a-week; prosperity was great, and the horrible red-brick blue-slatted shanties of a prosperous Midland town were effacing the last remains of the beautiful crocus-meadows, for which the town was once famous; and any hints I ventured timidly to give as to how long this prosperity might last, were received with the contempt which prophecies deserve. Whereas, now it would seem by the weekly trade reports as if the population, high and low, would soon be reduced to living on taking in each other's washing.

Well, as to the reforms to be taken in hand after the carrying of Home Rule, the Liberal Conference at Nottingham has been what its members call bold indeed: venturing to go in for disestablishment of the Welsh Church; the abolition of plural votes, by means of having all the elections on one day, shortening the period of residence which qualifies a voter; free education (important this, at any rate); local option (this also important—for the vote); London government; allotments for labourers (i.e., permission to them to pay their own poor-rates); and what is called "free land"—i.e., all obstacles removed which might stand in the way of Mr. Wynans or his like buying up all England to turn it into a deer-forest.

All this, which is heralded in the Liberal newspapers as an "advanced programme," in all the dignity of extra large type, is indeed quite as far as anyone could have expected the Liberal Party to go as a body—i.e., with the leave of Mr. Gladstone and its other bosses; and one must admit that most of these reforms will have to be done, whether they greatly matter or not. But it is not much wool for so great a cry; and when one thinks that this is received as an "advanced programme" with a regular flourish of trumpets by the party which considers itself the popular party, in righteous opposition to the Tories or reactionists, one cannot help noting how much of an accident it has been that the Liberals have been driven to make peace with Ireland, and that Home Rule once gained the Liberal Party will have performed its functions to the very end, and must either make its exit or must go about with the brains knocked out of it. And that all the more as the Tory Party is quite capable of dishing the Liberals on all these great reforms, and probably will do so.

And meanwhile the trades unions are crying out for a Labour Party, have declared for land nationalisation, and have their faces turned towards Socialism; and all over the country workmen are asking themselves why they are in a position of inferiority to those who do not work. The authorities in London are as afraid to let workmen speak their minds there as the Irish authorities to let the Irish speak, and a terrible winter of misery and want of employment is opening out before us.

Of all these things the Nottingham delegates took as much cognisance as though they were living in another planet. These things, since they concern the daily life and happiness and misery of the working classes, are, forsooth, "not within the scope of practical politics."

Query—What are practical politics? Answer—Vote-catching for election time, so that we may be in and you may be out.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

JOHN RUSKIN ON COMMUNISM.

I AM myself a Communist of the old school—reddest of the red. . . Will you be at the pains, now, however, to learn rightly, and once for all, what Communism is? First, it means that everybody must work in common, and do common or simple work for his dinner; and that if any man will not do it he must not have his dinner. . . Second, that the public, or common, wealth, shall be more and statelier in all its substance than private or singular wealth. Then farther, according to old Communism, the private dwellings of uncommon persons—dukes and lords—are to be very simple, and roughly put together—such persons being supposed to be above all care for things that please the commonalty; but the buildings for public or common service, more especially schools, almshouses, and workhouses, are to be externally of a majestic character, as being for noble purposes and charities; and in their interiors furnished with many luxuries for the poor and sick. And finally and chiefly, it is the absolute law of old Communism that the fortunes of private persons should be small, and little account in the State; but that the common treasure of the whole nation should be of superb and precious things in redundant quantity, as pictures, statues, precious books; gold and silver vessels preserved from ancient times; gold and silver bullion laid up for use, in case of any chance need of buying anything suddenly from foreign nations; noble horses, cattle, and sheep, on the public lands; and vast spaces of land for culture, exercise, and garden, round the cities, full of flowers, which, being everybody's property, nobody could gather; and of birds which being everybody's property, nobody could shoot. And, in a word, that instead of a common poverty, or national debt, which every poor person in the nation is taxed annually to fulfil his part of, there should be a common wealth, or national reverse of debt, consisting of pleasant things, which every poor person in the nation should be summoned to receive his dole of, annually; and of pretty things, which everyone capable of admiration, foreigners as well as natives, should unfeignedly admire.—'Fors Clavigera.' Letter vii., dated July 1st, 1871.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

NORTHAMPTON SHOEMAKERS.—The attempt to settle the strike by arbitration having failed, the men are now again on strike.

NOTTINGHAM INDUSTRIES.—Owing to the slackness in the local industries—hosiery and lace—the number of unemployed is very large.

THE AGRICULTURAL LABOUR MARKET.—The hirings are now taking place and the demand for labourers is not equal to the supply. Wages, therefore, have a downward tendency. A large number of farms are now without tenants, and the uncultivated acres show a great increase.

ABERDEEN SHIPBUILDERS.—The strike among the shipbuilders in the employment of Messrs. Hall, Russell, & Co., Aberdeen, has terminated. The men were formerly paid at the rate of from 2d. to 6d. extra per day for certain kinds of work, but they wanted to be remunerated at a uniform rate of 1s. per day extra. This request was refused, and the men resumed work under the old conditions.

THE CHAINMAKERS' STRIKE.—A meeting of chainmakers was held on Monday at Cradley Heath. It was reported that the majority of the men had turned out on strike. There was a universal determination on the part of the operatives to cease work. There were a number of men and women who could not turn out until they had completed their orders. It is expected that the strike will again be very general. The notices expired on Saturday last.

PPESTON WEAVERS.—The Secretary of the Powerloom Weavers' Association has issued a circular to the members in which he says: "The committee return their thanks to every individual who has in any way rendered assistance to the weavers in the dispute at Messrs. Outram & Co.'s mills. The strike, we are happy to say, is settled after a ten week's struggle for justice, and we maintain that we were justified in the action we have taken from the beginning to the end."

DISCHARGE OF WORKMEN.—Messrs Caird & Co. having now finished the new P. and O. steamer Britannia, and having no other work on hand, have discharged all their workmen, with few exceptions, both in their shipbuilding yard and engine works. Messrs. Rankin & Blackmore, Eagle Foundry, have also paid off a large number of workmen, the work on hand being nearly finished. Messrs. Scott & Co., shipbuilders, have also suspended a number of their workmen, the vessels on hand not being sufficiently forward to give employment to the number of men presently engaged in the yard.

THE STRIKE IN THE NAIL TRADE.—The strike in the wrought-nail trade continues, although the masters have offered to grant the 1879 list, less 20 per cent. off the price paid for hobs, and 10 per cent. for all other classes of nails, which is equivalent to an advance of 10 per cent. all round; but the workers are determined to keep out until the 1879 list is granted without any deductions. On Monday morning a meeting of delegates was held at the Cross Guns Inn, Birmingham Street, Hales Owen, Mr. J. Price presiding. It was stated that the strike in the Bromsgrove district was very general. The distribution of relief was going on very satisfactorily. Substantial donations had been contributed, and bread and soup had been given to the operatives. The relief had been carried on under the direction of Mr. Coxell, relieving officer. The chairman remarked that there would be no difficulty, he believed, in getting the prices established in the markets. He believed that the time was not far distant when they should hear that the strike had terminated. The whole of the operatives throughout all the districts had manifested a determination not to return to work until they gained the list. A resolution was passed to continue the strike.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—The hopes as to the speedy settlement of the Bolton engineers' strike have again been disappointed, the employers having rejected the latest proposals from the men. These proposals suggested a reference on the basis of wages now paid in Oldham, it being a competitive town with Bolton. A board of conciliation was to be formed, consisting of six Bolton employers and six representatives of the workmen, to consider evidence as to the rate of wages paid in Oldham, and if found to be higher than in Bolton, the advance to be conceded to the men on strike at the commencement of next year. If these proposals were accepted the strike should be declared closed and the men return to work at once at the old rate of wages, and work overtime when required at breakdowns and repairs until the award is given, after which all restrictions as to overtime shall be removed. The board of conciliation was to give their award in a month. To these proposals the employers replied that they were unanimously declined. They could not discuss any restriction upon overtime. To refer to any particular town as to wages paid was objectionable, and the comparison could have been obtained by a juster method of open arbitration, which the men had rejected. The strike has now lasted twenty-five weeks with the outlook darker than ever.

The capitalistic, no less than the aristocratic class, is responsible for the stupid and wicked policy that has turned many of the fairest lands of the world into huge military camps, and has deluged every continent in blood for the aggrandisement of their own countries, and to force upon the conquered peoples the products which their makers cannot consume in consequence of the lowness of their wages. The working-class, although its ignorance has sometimes made it the tool of politicians, cannot fairly be charged with any part of this guilt and folly. The wealth, greatness, and glory of any nation have meant very little for the working-class. Rather, they have delayed its emancipation. It is the highest interest of every worker that he should concentrate his attention upon the Labour question. To the working-people it is of very little consequence whether the United States have a fleet of iron-clads or whether the Republican, Democratic, or any other party are successful in their struggles for office, loaves, and fishes; but it is of very great importance that they have a fair share of the products of their skill, of their brain and muscle; that the necessities and comforts of life be within their reach; that they be not herded like brutes in poisonous tenements; that their children be spared the slavery of the coal bunkers and factory, and be permitted to acquire the best possible education; that their noble feelings of human dignity be not outraged by the arbitrary regulations of an irresponsible and immoral capitalistic class. We, in this generation, by means of our trades' unions, have challenged the capitalistic policy, and we will not cease our efforts until all workers, regardless of creed, colour, or nationality, are united in the fraternal bond of one grand federation, making war and robbery forevermore impossible.—Union Advocate.

LETTERS FROM AMERICA.

IV.

SIR ROBERT N. FOWLER, M.P., fop, snob, and fool, arrived in New York last Sunday. Interviewed by a reporter, he made the following statement concerning Anarchists:—

"What is the extent of the Anarchist movement in Great Britain, or London? It is understood over here that the English Anarchists sympathise deeply with the condemned Chicago Anarchists?"

"I have not heard very much about it. There is always a certain Anarchist or Communistic feeling in all large cities, but I don't know that it is any stronger in London now than it has been for many years past."

"Then it may be supposed that you would favour the execution of the Chicago Anarchists?"

"You will do the right thing if you hang them."

Of course, Fowler knows as much about the case as the man in the moon but his talk proves clearly how much these people respect law, order, and justice. It is to be hoped the English workers will not forget such sentiments uttered by individuals but expressing the ideas of a large class.

The Henry George-McGlynn business is fast arriving at the farcical stage. Henry George never speaks without mentioning "that noble and heroic man, that glorious priest so much beloved by the people, the Rev. Dr. McGlynn," etc., and the Rev. Dr. McGlynn in return butters back by calling George "that greatest of all philosophers, our prophet Henry George." George in order to catch votes is getting vaguer and vaguer in his theories. It is even no longer State appropriation of rent, but mere taxation of the unearned increment which he now advocates.

The General Assembly of the delegates of the Knights of Labour met in Minneapolis last week. The following short notes in reference to the Assembly may be of interest to the readers of the Commonweal.

P. H. Craig, a coloured man, represents District 176, Augusta Ga., composed of 3,000 white members and 1,500 negroes. He was unanimously elected, and his election is taken as a proof that the colour line in the South is entirely wiped out.

Joseph R. Buchanan, the editor of the Labor Enquirer, Denver, Col., leader of the opposition against Powderley, and delegate of District Assembly 89, has been refused admission to the General Assembly on the grounds that he being a member of Local Assembly 2237, which has been suspended for non-payment of dues, he was himself a suspended member. Buchanan alleges the suspension to be a conspiracy on the part of the administration.

Michael Davitt addressed the Assembly last Wednesday, claiming the Irish movement to be a part of the international working-men's movement.

Mrs. Leonora M. Barry, general investigator of the condition of working-women, made a report. Portions of this report relating to the shame and degradation to which women and girls who cannot eke out a living on the pittance paid them are subjected, could not be read to an audience of men.

It has been proposed that the Knights of Labour and the Farmers' Alliance (both in session at Minneapolis) shall amalgamate. Each claims to have about 600,000 members.

The General Master Workman in his report, suggests the following programme:—

"I believe the day has come for united labour to ask at the hands of Congress the passage of a law creating a department of labour at the seat of the National Government. Labour cannot be called a class, for it is everywhere. To have a man in his cabinet with whom to consult on the question of labour, the President would be in a better position to deal with the question of labour. . . . I believe that the Government of the United States should operate its own line of telegraph. I believe that the Government should control our railways."

This is the whole programme of one of the largest labour organisations in the world. Oh shame upon such spoilers of healthy movements! When will the men become tired of all monarchs in labour organisations? Ah, when?

The report of the General Secretary contains the following interesting details:—

"The order consists at present of 10,421 local assemblies, and 60,000 letters were received and answered. The number of members in good standing at the last session was 702,924; in arrears, 26,753. The total number of members reported in good standing now is in round figures 485,000; in arrears, about 50,000; total, 535,000; which shows a decrease of 195,000 members who have mostly joined the American Federation of Trades."

On Monday, Oct. 10th, in the afternoon, James E. Quinn, of District 49, quietly arose in the assembly and presented the following resolution:—

"Considering that the development of the human mind in the nineteenth century has reached a point expressed almost universally against capital punishment, or taking human life by judicial process, as a relic of barbarism, therefore be it resolved, That this Convention express sorrow that the men in Chicago were doomed to death, and that we use every endeavour to secure the commutation of the sentence of death passed upon them."

The moment this was read there was an uproar. Quinn made a speech asking in the name of humanity and justice that the resolution be adopted. Mr. Powderley, who presided, declared the resolution out of order. An appeal was taken, and George A. Shilling (of Chicago) and Joseph Labadie (of Detroit) spoke in favour of the resolution. Powderley left the chair, and made a long and vigorous speech against the resolution. Mr. Powderley was sustained by a vote of 150 against 50, and that settles the matter as the Herald puts it. Comment on such outrageous action, it is to be hoped, is superfluous.

The affair at Union Hill, New Jersey, which I reported to you last week, has had an afterpiece of a rather amusing character. The labour organisations intended to hold a meeting on Wednesday, Oct. 5th. The Chief of Police by the consent of the Town Council had taken extra precautions to suppress the meeting. There were 30 policemen stationed near the meeting-place. A messenger was employed to stand by the police, and on the first intimation of any meeting he was to convey the news to the Town Hall, where a man was stationed ready to toll the bell. The fire department with 50 volunteers was in readiness to turn the hose on the men. At 7.30 p.m., the town was blocked with people from all over Jersey. Only an informal meeting was held by the United Order of American Carpenters and Joiners Lodge 24. The subject discussed was, "Why do we need a Union?" The evening passed quietly. The police employed themselves by clubbing some men and all small boys on the legs to make them move on.

Hardly a week passes without the ruling classes showing by the action of their minions how little they care for the constitution. Last Sunday we were presented with a new proof, this time of even a more serious nature. On Saturday October 8th the Progressive Labour Party held a mass meeting in Union Square, New York, to explain its platform to the workers. The night was exceptionally fine, and about 10,000 people attended the meeting. The proceedings were most orderly, and perfect harmony prevailed except around one platform where a small number of men—supposed to be followers of George—kept on calling out, rather monotonously, "George, Henry George, George," etc., and now and then indulged in cat-calls. Most of the speakers had already addressed the meeting, when suddenly the torches and transparencies were extinguished, and the police dashed into the meeting and began at once belabouring the crowd in brutal fashion with their clubs. A panic of course was the immediate result. The crowd neither resisted nor remonstrated, but, taken completely by surprise, fled in all directions. Several men got a severe clubbing and women were maltreated by the police in a shameful, disgusting fashion. It is perfectly clear that it was determined the peaceable meeting should be turned into a riot. People were to be maltreated until they in their anger would turn upon their clubbers and supply the police with an excuse for a wholesale arrest, and perhaps hanging. The police had arranged themselves with care so as to form a complete semicircle that would embrace the whole crowd. Captain Reilly, the officer in command came to the reporters, after the collision, and without being asked made a statement that he had been invited to disperse a crowd that kept on annoying the meeting by cat-calls and calls for Henry George. His men misunderstood him, and the "incident," for which he was extremely sorry, was the result. The clubbed, bleeding, defenceless men rallied round as soon as they saw the speakers were holding the platform, and the meeting was continued. The men, in spite of the outrage, pressed forward to support the speakers, and eventually the meeting dispersed quietly. A few more of such "incidents" and even the most conservative working-man will comprehend what government of the people by the people means over here. He will comprehend that as long as he permitted himself to be fleeced without resistance by a miserable class he had all the liberty he wished at his disposal. He will comprehend that as soon as he begins to resist being fleeced the ruling classes will quickly bring him to his senses, not with the ballot-box but with the club.

LABOUR MOVEMENTS.

Owing to the strike of coal-miners about Springfield, Ill., the Springfield Rolling Mill has been obliged to shut down. About 1000 men are idle in consequence.

The Lehigh Valley coal-miners on strike are still firm, regardless of the threat made by the Lehigh Valley Coal and Navigation Company to stop work for one year unless the men return to work. The Wyoming region is overrun with strikers from the Lehigh sections.

The strikers at the cotton-factory of the Moss Manufacturing Company, Westerly, R.I., have finally surrendered. This was the contest in which the "Slater Club" was enlisted in behalf of the corporation. In other words, the combined capital of the Rhode Island cotton manufacturing companies was arrayed in support of a single concern which had a dispute with its workmen.

LITERARY NOTICES.

'The Chicago Anarchists. A Statement of Facts.' By E. and E. M. Aveling, has been reprinted from To-Day (November 1887), and is for sale by W. Reeves, 185 Fleet Street, E.C. Single copy, 1d., 100 copies, 1s.

In reprinting John Most's 'Deistic Pestilence' (Metzcow, Bruce Grove, N.) the comrades who have had it done would have been wise in securing a competent hand to revise the English in which the translation is presented. No doubt when it was written this brochure did good service, and it naturally now bears a certain historic interest, but it may be doubted whether its present reissue will either do much credit to the author or service to the cause he has at heart. Author, publisher, and price are alike left without mention.

'The Labour Movement in America,' by Frederick Engels (Reeves, 3d.), is a reprint of the preface to the 'Condition of the Working Classes in England in 1844,' published a few months ago, and is so reprinted to enable it to reach a larger number of readers than otherwise it would. In 8 pp. of even close print there is but small room to say much upon such a large theme, but the author gets more into the space than might have been deemed possible, and has assuredly made an earnest, thoughtful and thought-producing contribution to the consideration of the question of which it treats. S.

THE CONDEMNED ANARCHISTS.

The Labour Emancipation League held a mass meeting on Sunday morning to protest against the judicial murder of our Chicago comrades, at which a resolution of sympathy and protest was carried with only one dissident.

At a meeting of the Clay Cross and District Socialist Society on the 20th inst. the following resolution was passed: "That this meeting of Derbyshire miners and others protest against the judicial murder of the seven Chicago Anarchists, and, looking at the nature of the evidence, considers a new trial absolutely necessary; and that this resolution be sent to the president of the United States and for publication in the English Commonwealth."

A public meeting of Scandinavians, convened by the Scandinavian Working Men's Clubs, was held on Sunday the 23rd, in 56 Greek Street, Soho, when the following resolution was unanimously passed: "This meeting of Scandinavians from all the northern countries, recognising that the sentence to death of the seven Chicago Anarchists is nothing but an attempt to knock down by one crushing blow the movement raised for the liberation of the working class from the yoke of the upper classes, joins in the protest of the workers of all civilised countries."

THE KNIGHTS OF LABOUR AND CO-OPERATION IN AMERICA.

LAST February J. P. McGaughey, of Minneapolis, secretary of the Co-operative Board of the Knights of Labour, sent out 8000 circulars asking for information on the subject of co-operation, and has received upwards of 5000 answers. Of the co-operative concerns started there are no failures reported, and a steady growth is almost without exception noted. Following are a few examples:

The Trenton (N. J.) Co-operative Store shows a remarkable growth. Jan. 1, 1886, its membership was 193; at the end of the year it was 420. There is scarcely a store in any of the great cities of the country which supplies so many families. The paid-up capital of the concern Jan. 1886 was £466; Jan. 1887 it was £1157. The premises now occupied by the store were purchased for £2000. During the year 1886 the profits were £1412.

The Michigan City (Ind.) Co-operative Reed-Chair Company issues stock only to members of the Knights of Labour. By its constitution one-third of the profits goes to the stockholders, one-third to employees, and the remaining third is placed to the credit of the factory. This company began business August 1886. Up to December 31 of the same year the business transacted amounted to £400, on which there was a profit of 25 per cent. At the time of the report there were 250 members.

The Raleigh (N. C.) Co-operative Tobacco Factory is a foster-child of the Knights of Labour. Its entire capital stock is owned by one hundred local assemblies and a thousand individuals. In 1886 the goods sold amounted to £2063, on which there was a profit over all expenses of £67.

The Fulton County Co-operative Leather Glove and Mitten Factory, of Johnstown, N. Y., was organised August 1886, and has now 225 members and £2000 capital. Its business up to Jan. 1, 1887, amounted to £600, and the profits above all expenses were £59.

Probably the only co-operative bank in the country is the Patrons' Co-operative Bank of Olathe, Kas. The report of the institution made July 1886 shows a paid-in capital stock of £2788, with deposits amounting to £14,177.

Building and loan associations, on the plan of the ordinary mutual building and loan association, are also very numerous within the Order.

NOTES ON NEWS.

Mr. Wilfrid Blunt is to go to prison for asserting the rights of free speech in Ireland. Well and good so far; but surely he is not to be the only one of the English Home Rulers who is going through this business: one could name half-a-dozen who would be fitter for the task than Mr. Blunt, who is a "faddist," which is the political jargon for a man who has some idea of justice outside mere party necessities, as witness Arabi and the Egyptian matter. Let some of the orthodox show the genuineness of their convictions on coercion, and for once be of some service to the cause of progress that they profess. It will be a shabby business indeed if they don't share the glory and discomfort with the candidate for Deptford.

Or the Balfour will score a victory, and the process may be a long one. But once for all there is a method of shortening the struggle, or rather of finishing it at one blow, which, strange to say, has not suggested itself to any Gladstonian partisan yet. Though I believe my following suggestion will not be accepted as the Columbus egg-trick by the whole Home Rule Liberal Party if, as is doubtful, they happen to read the Commonweal, yet it certainly should be so accepted.

Let Mr. Gladstone go over to Ireland and follow Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's example, and coercion is at an end, and the Tory Government along with it.

Yes, I know the orthodox will receive that as an unworthy joke; but the very fact that they will do so, and that I have been obliged to put it as a joke, shows how lightly politicians treat the matters which they talk about so solemnly. Here we have them gravely discussing the legality or illegality of Mr. Blunt's action when they know very well that he went to do what was at once illegal and reasonable. If Mr. Gladstone were to do the like, how the unreasonable legality would vanish amidst roars of laughter, and the discussion about Home Rule and the squeezing of rent from people who can't pay would enter on a new phase. But it is a joke to propose it for that very reason. It would crush the Tory party, and to do that is exactly what the orthodox Liberals will by no means do. A famous chess-player doesn't want to exterminate his adversary; or who is he to play with? He wants to beat him at the game, that is all. If there were no Tories to play with and make about the same moves as the Liberals, the latter might have to deal with realities—and what would they do then?

I repeat, let the great man go to Ireland and get arrested for speaking on the side of freedom at Woodford or elsewhere, and thereby put his political opponents in the deepest hole any government were ever in, and himself become the most popular man of the century.

Says a correspondent of the Daily News, "When any disturbance does occur it is the police that begin it." It is not London that he is speaking of but Woodford in Ireland; that is, doubtless, because he has not been in London for the last three weeks.

Mr. Chabmerlain's expression of passionate devotion to law-and-order is touching, coming as it does from the man who gave that warning to the rich about ransom. And it must be said that, if there is anything genuine about him at all, probably this later view of his is his genuine one; he is what the cabman once called the almost forgotten Robert Lowe (now Lord something or other) "a harbitrary gent."

Poor Samuel Huby has had very bad luck with Mr. Nupkins-Mansfield. The policeman in the attack on the citizens of October 20th, hit him and he very naturally hit the policeman, who being knocked down either received or imagined a kick. Huby explained that the policeman hit him three times and knocked him down; but though his old master came forward and gave him a good character, and though the policeman himself said: "he seems to be a respectable and very good lad," yet the thing on the bench paid no more attention to his statement than if it had been the wind blowing, and had the impudence to remark in the true Nupkins style, "It would be a most improbable thing for the constable to strike you without provocation." So Mr. Huby got three months' hard labour in order to increase his affection for the beauties of law and order. I don't know if he was a Socialist before his introduction to the Nupkins of Marlborough Street; but I should think he would lose no time in becoming one now.

The Daily News is very severe on the deputation sent on the 28th October to the Board of Works, for what it called their "Jack Cade" behaviour there; but may there not be another side to that story? Suppose that the deputation were treated by the majority of the board with that circumlocution-office off-handedness which is a standing insult to the citizen, and which everybody having business with an official body is sure to receive, as I by personal experience can declare, unless he is known as a "person of importance." If that were the case, is it wonderful that men on such serious business as the trying to get work in order to prevent them from starving, should show some resentment at this supercilious bad manners, not knowing perhaps that such bad manners are habitual and a part of what we pay for. The representatives of a vast body of starving men don't to my mind need forgiveness if they lose their temper when brought face to face with the brazen wall of official impudence and unreason, which even Dickens' immortal humour failed to shake by a hairs'-breadth.

The police have been spinning if not one of the longest, yet at least one of the stupidest of galley yarns on record about Clan-na-Gael conspirators and jubilees, and lodgings and swell hotels, and the Lord knows what, clearly under instructions and for the purpose of discrediting the Home Rule agitation. Stupid as it is, it will no doubt be an effective weapon as far as it goes, that is, it will frighten some timid voters who take everything for gospel which they see in an official report. But, really, was it worth the wear and tear?

W. M

IS LUXURY GOOD FOR TRADE?

UNDER this heading there has been a brief passage-at-arms in the correspondence columns of the Daily News between Sir Henry E. Knight, Alderman, of the one part, and Mr. Sidney Webb, Professor of Political Economy, of the other part. "A happy combination of defects, natural and acquired," renders the worthy Alderman a fitting exponent of the time-honoured fallacy he set forth:—

"Money spent in entertainment goes into the pockets of the working classes. . . . I say further that for every pound spent in entertainment another pound is spent by the entertained, so that at least double the cost of the entertainment is distributed in wages; therefore he who spends encourages and promotes expenditure and is the best friend of the working classes."

In a second letter he disposed of his opponent's reply in an off-hand fashion with great satisfaction to himself, and still further established his claims to bourgeois orthodoxy by sacrificing those to sense. His "argument" is worth reproducing in full (but with a few words italicised):—

"Always putting aside abuse, which, being contrary to the laws of God and man, cannot be countenanced, can there be a doubt that the answer to this question [i.e., Is luxury good for trade?] must be Yes? Nay, is it not an absolute necessity in order to find mankind in employment? Are not all things beyond the requirements of food, clothing, and shelter more or less luxuries? No doubt we could all live on plain food and drink water, and would perhaps be healthier and better than we are now, but in that case what would become of the millions who earn their living in the production and preparation of what we may call fancy food and drinks, and those great industries which produce the luxuries of beer and wine? We could all be clothed in homespun, but what would become of those millions who are employed in the manufacture of other dress goods—silks, satins, broadcloth, and hundreds of other cognate articles? We might also all be reduced to an equality (the Socialists' idea) and live in comfortable houses quite sufficient to afford the necessary amount of food and shelter; but in that case what would become of those millions connected with the trades which flourish by the erection of large premises and also the decoration and furnishing thereof? Can it be doubted that gold and silver plate, jewellery, carriages, and no end of other things in every-day use and consumption, are luxuries? Yet no one in their senses would propose to abolish them, as it would simply mean destroying the living of the best and most intelligent mechanics on the face of the earth. Need I pursue the subject further? Surely it is evident that the non-consumption of luxuries would mean the destruction of nearly the whole trade and industry of the human race."

The man who puts forward such a plea might lay claim to exceptional courage, were it not too evidently but an accidental audacity born of ignorance, "the colossal ignorance which drives the political economist to despair," as Mr. Webb calls it. The last-named put the whole case so far as concerns the present system, very clearly and cleverly:—

"Sir Henry Knight is apparently unaware even of the existence of a great body of ascertained and undisputed truth on the subject on which he undertakes to enlighten the 'ignorant working classes.' The blunder into which he has fallen is explained in the first few pages of every text-book on economics; yet even when his attention is called to it, he does not think it worth while to consult the most elementary primer, but denounces an unknown correspondent as 'an agitator.' Now the point at issue is the pons asinorum of political economy. If Sir Henry Knight believes not Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill, Jevons and Marshall, neither will he hearken unto me. Nevertheless I will endeavour to make it clear to any but aldermanic intelligence. In an advanced industrial community all money incomes are necessarily spent in payments for labour, whether expended in luxuries or not. (The actual hoarding of metallic currency is of course excepted.) The owner of the income can exercise an option as to the kind of labour he will buy. He may, like Sir Henry Knight, hire cooks and wine-growers, or he may not. But if he does not spend his income in quickly consumed commodities, he nevertheless hires labour. When Lord Mayors read economics and abandon wasteful banquets, they will 'save' a portion of their incomes, and cease to employ so many cooks. But that 'saved' income is merely lent by them to their bankers, and thus placed at the disposal of builders, railway-makers, and other borrowers, who borrow in order to spend in wages. The Lord Mayor would, in effect, employ railway navvies instead of cooks. The amount spent in wages does not in the least depend upon whether luxuries or investments are preferred, as the choice of the owner determines only the kind of labour employed. If consumers elect to have merely transient pleasures, wages are paid, the ginger is a moment hot in the mouth, and all is gone. If they prefer 'investments,' wages are equally paid, and the world is enriched with a new railway or improved artisans' dwellings. It must be added that the form of industry does exercise an important influence on the prosperity of the workers, but this point has no reference to the distinction between employments productive of durable and of transient commodities. The most easily accessible authorities on the point may be added: Jevon's 'Primer of Political Economy,' para. 14 (Macmillan, 1s.); Marshall's 'Economics of Industry,' ch. 2, sec. 3 (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.); J. S. Mill's 'Principles of Political Economy,' bk. 1, ch. 5, sec. 5 (Longmans, 5s.); Cairnes's 'Some Leading Principles,' p. 31 (Macmillan); McCulloch's 'Principles,' part iv., p. 217 (Murray's Reprints); Adam Smith's 'Wealth of Nations,' bk. ii., ch. 3, p. 272 (Ward, Lock, and Co.). I conclude with a short quotation from Professor Cairnes, which may serve to clinch the matter; it is from the work and passage above cited: 'That useful function, therefore, which some profound writers fancy they discover in the abundant expenditure of the idle rich turns out to be a sheer illusion. Political economy furnishes no such palliation of unmitigated selfishness. Not that I would breathe a word against the sacredness of contracts; but I think it important, on moral no less than on economic grounds, to insist upon this, that no public benefit of any kind arises from the existence of an idle rich class. The wealth accumulated by their ancestors or others on their behalf, where it is employed as capital, no doubt helps to sustain industry; but what they consume in luxury and idleness is not capital, and helps to sustain nothing but their own unprofitable lives. By all means they must have their rent and interest, as it is written in the bond; but let them take their proper place as drones in the hive, gorging at a feast to which they have contributed nothing.' No wonder aldermen and the idle rich do not care to read political economy! I wonder how long they will continue to endow its professors?"

Two other correspondents who joined in the fray to the extent of a short note each, put these pertinent queries:—

"Does he understand the difference between productive and non-productive labour? between labour that grinds corn and labour that grinds wind? If so, Sir Henry's 'words, words, words' are merely clouds of dust raised to cover his retreat. Granted that money spent in 'entertainments' represents wages. So does money spent in productive labour. But this latter has the advantage of rendering the community richer; while the former leaves it poorer—merely shifts wealth from pocket to pocket without increasing it; necessities already produced being consumed in the meantime."

"Sir Henry Knight shows such a masterly knowledge of social science, and argues so ably that 'luxury is good for trade,' that it is difficult to understand why he did not also advise the deputation to the Guildhall that destruction of property might be good for trade. Surely the same arguments would hold good. Is it not more than possible that from such dangerous and false theories our unemployed may draw for themselves this perfectly just conclusion?"

To all of which one would add that Sir Henry Knight unconsciously conceded more than he knew in that letter of his; and he assuredly answered his own question as to "what would become of the millions, etc.," when he said that "we might all (including presumably the said millions) . . . live in comfortable houses."

There is an old proverb which says that "Wilful waste makes woful want," but like most old saws it is belied by the present system. Under class-rule, and where all production is for the pleasure or profit of the dominant class, all waste and destruction is good for the passing time to the workers whom it enables to "find employment," though to the community as a whole it be injurious. Such conditions carry with them their own destruction, and ensure that humanity, even if only from sheer despair and weariness, will get rid of monopoly and privilege—those things that make it a seeming truth that folly is the highest wisdom and the benefit of society to be wrought by wanton indulgence of base desire.

A rhetorical device is cleverly employed in the play upon the word "luxury," and its definition so as to include all comfort and beauty. Against "luxury" in that sense, we Socialists have nothing to say but this: It is allowable—nay, commendable to a high degree—for men to adorn and beautify their lives and their surroundings, but they must produce the wherewithal and not steal it from others; they must not compel others to toil fourfold or tenfold that they may be kept in idle comfort. The "luxury" of the few to-day is founded on the misery of the many; being itself debased and brutalised thereby. Men who amass money by the chicanery of modern commerce or the undisguised rascality of the "money-market," are naturally unfitted for other than aldermanic "luxury"; but there are some of us who look forward to a time when all shall be comfortable at the price of moderate exertion; when there shall be no "employers" supported by other men's labour; when leisure shall be the heritage of all; when personal existence will be freed from care and common life made beautiful.

H. HALLIDAY SPARLING.

We recognise the fact that the Labour question is social rather than political; that while just political action will bring relief, the full remedy for the evils which men of toil suffer can only be obtained by the cordial co-operation of all workers in sustaining the principles that underlie this great question. When the rights of labour, and the true relations of labour and capital, are fully understood and acknowledged by the mass of the people, reform must follow. Society will demand it, and no power can withstand the force of such demand.—Paterson Labour Standard.

THE EMIGRATION FRAUD AGAIN.

WE are allowed by a friend to make use of the following extracts from a private letter lately received from a young wife, who with her husband and four children was enrolled among the victims of enveigling Emigration Agents. What she writes was intended only for the eyes of her relatives, and bears the impress of unexaggerated truth in every line:—

"Perth, West Australia.

"My Dear Aunt,—I put off writing until we got settled a bit, but we seem just as far off it as we did five months ago. I will confess that I feel more homesick and miserable than I ever thought it possible I could be. The West Australia Land Company is a complete swindle; so far from finding their emigrants work, they never even countersigned the contract tickets that we received at Blackwall. The agent from the railway contractors came on board the Yeoman the day we arrived, and told the men if they with their families would go 140 miles up country, live in a tent 12 ft. long and 10 ft. wide (which was necessary on account of the camp being continually shifted), they could provide pick and shovel work. On the other hand, people who came to fetch their friends told us there was no work whatever to be got in the towns of Freemantle and Perth, many men being out four months at a stretch. This was "Jubilee day," and a day of suspense and misery it was to most of those on board the Yeoman. The day also being a holiday they could not get the people to bring the tender alongside to fetch us ashore, and our ship was too large to get in close to the jetty. Neither would the very hospitable Australians bring any fresh meat, which a great many of the emigrants expected, as after we left England, with one or two exceptions, we got nothing but tinned meat and salt junk. W—— and P—— suffered very much from dysentery, and W—— was so bad I was afraid he would never see the end of the voyage. . . . I don't think I ever can forget the scene the night we left Cape Town. The doctor came on board mad drunk, and most of the sailors in the same condition (several Lascars and Greeks amongst them), and they began fighting with knives—the two bakers had broken open some of the emigrant's boxes and robbed them.

"We left Cape Town at five o'clock, and ten of the single men were left behind; those of them who had friends on board begging the captain to wait for them, but he would not. It was truly a scene better imagined than described.

"I told you at the beginning of this letter that we arrived on 'Jubilee' day, and the next day were taken on to the Government depot, where we got a dinner of fresh meat and potatoes. The following morning a notice was posted up that all the married people and twenty single men were to start for Beverley by the 6 a.m. train the next day to work on the railway cutting. In the meantime, A—— had been to see Mr. — and Rev. Mr. —, to whom J—— gave him letters of introduction, and they strongly advised us not to think of going up country to the bush, as the camps were most lawless places. Where they were sending the Yeoman people they would be 40 miles from a doctor, school, or church. A—— also met with people who had been working up the country and had had to give it up; they were people who came out a ship or two before us. They gave the camps a dreadful name; they said water was very scarce and bad, that the contractors put new hands to work with the colonial navvies, and if they could compete with them they were put on piece-work, so that they could not earn more than a certain amount. You had to buy your own tent, pick, and shovel at extortionate prices, buy all your food of the contractor at his own price, and at the end of the month when the men were paid they generally found themselves in debt. We had this fully confirmed before a fortnight was at an end. Several of the single men came back. They told us that after going a railway journey of over 100 miles, men, women, and children were huddled together in one large shed to sleep. There was no food provided, and next morning trucks came and took all luggage; but every one (children included) had to tramp the remainder of the distance of over 40 miles through the bush. I leave you to imagine what a sensation this caused amongst those who had refused to go. There were 15 other families besides us who refused, and the caretaker told us all that having refused this magnificent offer, the Land Company washed their hands of us, and we were not to have any more rations and to clear out of the depot at once. The land agent took care not to show himself, or I am afraid he would have tasted a little lynch law. There were so many men out of work in Freemantle that the Government had started relief works, and A—— got five days work there at 5s. per day.

"Mr. — was very kind in trying to get A—— into the police force, but without success. A—— was then walking about for nearly a fortnight, when he got a pass for himself to go to where they were making a branch line, 70 miles from Freemantle, 60 miles by rail. The other ten he tramped through the bush in company with two Irishmen, and when they arrived at the camp it was dark, and all the tents being full they made a fire and built a hut of rushes and branches of trees, and laid down in their blankets to sleep. Food was so scarce that none could be bought. A—— shared a loaf and some tea he had taken with him, with these two men. The ganger could not start them to work either that day or the next, and all the food they got was a handful of rice and a small loaf. The third day they were up and at the hardest work in the colony, i.e., digging, shovelling, and loading tip carts with ballast and then spreading it, and every now and then having to run for their lives as they were blasting rocks with dynamite. A—— had to give the work up after the first day, and came back to us at Freemantle. He said the navvies were rough-looking but very good-natured; but if any looked rougher than he did I should like to have seen them. He was away just a week and 7s. 6d. out of pocket. After that he was walking about between Freemantle and Perth for over three weeks, and then he got a job to drive a one horse trolley for the West Australian Carrying Company, but that finished up a week ago. The Company winds up on account of business being so slack. The manager strongly advised A—— to go to either Sydney or Melbourne, as he felt sure A—— would do well either at his own trade or on the railways; but as it would cost nearly as much as it did to come from England it is quite out of our power. A—— has tried all departments of the railway here, but 'Not at present' is the answer. . . . Will you, dear aunt, kindly tell J—— that Mr. — was fully aware of the condition of this colony, for I have spoken to people who came out in the Hampshire and the Chollerton, who wrote direct to him; but I suppose he gets a commission for every poor wretch he deludes.

"So far from the West Australian Land Company's people being the beneficent fairies Miss C— stated they were, they are bound as one of the conditions under which they hold their land, to bring out so many emigrants annually. The captain and doctor receives a commission for every one of us landed in good health; the agent here gets a commission of something like £5 per head from the Government, and they dare to boast of England freeing slaves!

"So far from the schools being free, I have to pay 6d. per week for J— and A—, and the first week had to pay 7s. for books, etc. I forgot to mention that provisions are more than double the prices they are in England. I have sent a letter to Miss C—, though it will not do us any good, it may be the means of preventing other poor creatures being sent out here. It grieves me very much to think of all the children will lose."

LETTERS FROM AMERICA.

V.

THE cowardly attempt of the German authorities to murder John Neve inch by inch has caused most intense bitterness in Socialistic circles here. Neve was known for his abnormal devotion to the cause, his heroic, unpretentious willingness to undertake any work, however dangerous, that had to be done; and many a personal friend of his, hearing the terrible news, silently shed a tear, and pledged himself yet to settle accounts with the German bourgeoisie for this latest outburst of ferocity.

Judging from the reports cabled daily to the American press, people think England is on the eve of a great revolution. It is sincerely to be hoped they think correctly. The situation is painted in the deepest black, and we read of nothing but immense crowds parading the streets of London, with black flags, demanding bread or lead, and attacking the police,—in fact, showing altogether a spirit much to be feared by the have-alls. Gladstone is severely blamed for having taken up the cudgels for Lyons. The "respectable" people in general are said to have lost all respect for and confidence in the police. Of course Socialists never had any.

The Rev. R. S. Holland, professor of ethics at Maryland College, of Woodstock, Maryland, has written a book on 'Ownership and Natural Right.' I recommend it to all Socialists for perusal. It is endorsed by Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Corrigan, and plainly shows how despicable a man can become if he engages in the craft of priestdom, especially of jesuitism. The arguments are based on the most outrageous fallacies, historical as well as economical; every word is deeply underlined by sophistry, and the whole trash smells of most cunning insincerity.

At Minneapolis the opposition has almost given up the struggle, as everything is one-sided, and the administration has had matters nearly all its own way. The principal fight was made over the great Chicago stockyard strike. The Chicago men feel sore over the defeat of the strike, and are backed up by T. B. Barry of the General Executive Board. They assert that the G. E. B. had no right to order off a strike when the Board was a thousand miles away from the scene of action and knew little about the case. They further maintain that if G. M. W. Powderly had not ordered off the strike they would have gained the day. Documents have been introduced in the General Assembly to prove this to be the case, and the Chicago delegates gave the history of the strike, pictured the grievances of the men, told how many of them were blacklisted, could not obtain work, all on account of the G. E. B. A resolution was introduced censuring the Board, but suffered speedy defeat by a vote of 161 to 49. After that Powderly thought it high time to carry into effect his coup d'état. He wanted to oust the two independent members of the Board—viz., T. B. Barry and W. H. Bailey, and he also desired to be absolute master. So the committee on law sprang the following proposition on the delegates: "That the term of the general officers are only for one year and that the Executive Board consist of the General Master Workman and approved by the General Assembly." In spite of Powderly's passionate speech urging the delegates to adopt this plan, they rejected it. Then Powderly tried on another trick. He and all other members of the E. B. resigned, but Barry and Bailey seeing through this little game could not be persuaded to do the same, and stuck to their posts. The delegates begged the clan to withdraw the resignation, which they did. They had to give up the fight eventually, and the Executive Board remains as last year. The Assembly dissolved on the 20th inst. Resumé of work done: Propositions to start Governmental telegraph lines, and to demand a Cabinet Minister for trade; the rest personal squabbling. The staff to do this in one year costs £15,000. Comment superfluous.

Henry Tueber, one of the two men charged with assaulting policeman Feeney, and with resisting this officer in the discharge of his duty at Union Hill on Sunday, Oct. 2, has been found guilty by a Jersey jury. The instructions (?), as the phrase over here goes for summing up, given by Judge Lippincott to the jury, were a most decided plea, aye, a demand for conviction.

The defence proved clearly that the police wantonly charged the crowd; that the crowd was peaceable, in fact, a good deal more orderly than the police liked it to be. The following stuff and nonsense uttered by the prosecuting attorney Winfield shows what sort of people he knew the jury consisted of: "Gentlemen of the jury, this man had in his possession a circular, where amongst other bloodthirsty sentences the following is to be found: 'Brutus, sleepest thou?' Do you know, gentlemen of the jury, who Brutus was? Brutus was a vulgar assassin, who backwardly slew one of Rome's finest men. This man had also in his pocket a knife. What does all this mean? It means that this man intended to imitate Brutus and to murder everybody." On the motion of the defence a stay of proceedings was granted until the 21st inst. Mrs. Hinton, the wife of the editor of the Leader, entered formal charges before the grand jury against officer Feeney for deliberate perjury during the trial of Tueber. The trial of Wohlman jointly charged with Tueber will begin to-day.

Albert R. Parsons, one of our Chicago comrades, has written an open letter to the Governor of Illinois, demanding if innocent his liberty, or if guilty his death, and rejects once for all all commutation to imprisonment for a charge of which he is not guilty. General Ben Butler, General Pryor, Captain Black, and Mr. Salomon, the lawyers retained for the seven, have started to-day for Washington to make an application for a stay of proceedings.

An immense crowd numbering about 20,000 men, assembled Monday, Oct. 17th, in mass meeting at Union Square, New York, to protest against the brutal police outrage of Saturday, Oct. 8th. Resolutions strongly condemning the authorities, and pledging the men to defend at all hazards the right of Free Speech, were adopted unanimously. Things are getting worse and worse. Last Sunday, a hawk of Socialist papers had his wares stolen by the police in Hoboken, New Jersey, under the pretext of the Chief of Police, who desired to first peruse such periodicals to prevent the sale of treasonable literature. Members of the Social Democratic and Anarchistic parties in New York, are also constantly shadowed by detectives of the Central Office. There is but little difference between the New York police department and the notorious Third Section department in St. Petersburg.

The Conservative wing of the Labour movement had a huge mass meeting last night at Cooper's Union to protest against the intended judicial murder in Chicago. The American flag over the speaker's desk was draped with crape.

LABOUR MOVEMENT.

The bosses of the locked out brass-workers have refused to grant the Saturday half-holiday with full pay, and have notified the strikers that they will hereafter hold no conferences except with their own men.

Work in the Carmel Colliery was resumed October 7th. The same wages will be paid as those paid by the Reading Company.

Coxe Bros. and Co.'s Derringer Colliery, and S. C. Haydon and Co.'s mine at Jamesville, have resumed work with non-union hands.

In consequence of the strike of the hundred cigar-makers at Boyertown, Pa., recently for an advance of 1 dol. per thousand, the firm formerly exploiting them has decided to discontinue work and remove its factory from that point to Greenville, Pa.

A strike of street-car drivers at Beaver Falls, Pa., is intended. The men ask for an advance in wages of 25c. a-day. They are now getting 1 dol. 50c. and want 1 dol. 75c.

The scarcity of sand is said to be likely to restrict work in the glass trade at Pittsburgh. A want of cars to haul the sand in is the reason assigned.

The strike of the green-glass blowers east of the Alleghenies, on September 1st, for an increase of 10 per cent. in their wages, was settled October 7th, by an agreement on part of bosses to pay 5 per cent. advance, and work is to be resumed on October 17th. About 5,000 men are involved.

The Tardee Colliery at Hazleton, Pa., has resumed work under police protection with non-union men.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

THE PROSPECTS OF LABOUR.

Even judges may be sometimes mistaken. The accompanying letter from the Daily News rudely shakes the optimistic views of Mr. Justice Field as to the prosperity of the county of Kent:

"SIR,—You publish to-day some remarks of Mr. Justice Field, made at the opening of the Assizes at Maidstone, on the prosperity of agriculture in Kent district. His remarks about the scarcity of farms to let are very misleading, as in this neighbourhood, right on the Kentish border and in Kent there are hundreds of acres to let, or being carried on at a loss by the landlords themselves. One agent near here, I believe, has had nearly 8000 acres to let, and has not, I believe, succeeded in letting one-tenth part of that amount. Let his lordship go to Rolvenden, Tenterden, Bevington, Cranbrook, Hawhurst, or anywhere in this district, and perhaps when he finds there are thousands of acres "to let" he will alter his opinion. The deep distress prevailing here is greatly underrated, and well may jurymen shrug their shoulders when one of England's judges (unintentionally) makes such a misleading statement. If you want to see the genuine unemployed, come down to this district, Sir. If you want to see penniless farmers struggling along, trying to do battle with low prices, come here. If you want to see ruin, poverty and starvation, come to this district for the winter. In the little parish of Wittersham (in Kent) there are already 30 families out of employ, and as many as 25 houses tenanted; and a year or two back this was the most prosperous parish in the neighbourhood. It requires an able pen to paint the picture of misery and ruin that really exists. My heart is full, but I cannot paint the picture of misery one-tenth part black enough. May the state of affairs become known to some able penman, who may wake the country with the tale of ruin and of misery that is existing in this district!—A SUBSCRIBER."

The following goes somewhat deeper into the question: it is from the St. James's Gazette:

"SIR,—Whatever we may think of the character and composition of the Hyde Park mobs, it will be well to bear in mind that the present condition of the labour market, bad as it is, is likely to become much worse; and that this state of things will probably not be temporary, but permanent.

"Any sudden increase of the number of those out of work must necessarily augment existing distress; and there is every prospect of such an addition. The farm-labourers' wages have just been reduced to 9s. a week in some districts, and the fall will soon be general; considerable quantities of land, especially in Berks, Wiltshire, Norfolk, and Essex, will pass out of cultivation this winter. Much has already been deserted, and the young men are enlisting. The men with families have not yet found their way to the towns. When they do, it will be to beg—not to work, for there is none that they can find. But others are arriving now. Like the small streams that make their way through a dam before it bursts, the country artisans are dribbling into London. All over the country the makers of agricultural machinery are closing their works or reducing their numbers, and the men are seeking work in town. A further fall of 2s. or 3s. in the price of wheat will send the labourers after them, and this may happen in a year at the present rate of decrease. Even if we are spared a sudden influx from the fields, is there any hope of better wages or constant work for the ordinary 'hand'? No one who has any practical knowledge of the history of labour during the last fifteen years believes it."

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

PESSIMISM.

Is pessimism increasing? is a question frequently asked. It is generally answered in the affirmative. Yet as it is constantly asserted that we are advancing towards a higher civilisation—that we have many advantages which our forefathers had not, that we have comforts and privileges which our forefathers never thought of—there seems to be inconsistency in giving an affirmative answer. Is an affirmative answer correct? We think it is; and that along with the advantages of modern civilisation are disadvantages which almost if not more than counterbalance the benefits. It is not that the benefits do not exist, but that the management of human affairs has not so progressed as to diffuse the full capabilities of our civilisation among the whole population. It is the custom of a large section of those who write to dwell almost exclusively upon certain improvements or advances we have made; but there is no systematic attempt made to ascertain whether the mass of mankind have the benefit of the discoveries which have been made. The increase of our scientific knowledge is extensively proclaimed. Our fertility in mechanical invention and adaptation is continually paraded. But the debtor side is entirely overlooked. It is seldom mentioned that the great proportion of working men has been reduced to the position of machines. They are drilled to attend to a machine which performs a certain operation, and instead as in past terms making an article they now only assist in making a fragment of an article. Machinery has taken away the independence of those who live by their labour and skill, as the great cost of machinery completely prevents their chance of getting out of their state of servitude. In many other ways is the present position of workmen full of unfavourable and depressing influences which cannot fail to develop pessimism. And yet he who writes a sensational novel is immediately lionised by an unthinking horde of mis-called aristocrats; while he who works for the elevation of the mass of his fellow-men and women, who strives for their better education and just rights, is decried by those in high place. Ought there, under these conditions of life, to be an increase of pessimism? Yes; and I am surprised that it is not ten-fold more than it is. The passive pessimism which exists at present must be educated and fanned into a fierce and relentless persecution of the tyrants who grind to death, by poverty and injustice, the mass of mankind. The mass of mankind have nothing to lose but everything to gain by an overthrow of the existing system, under which the vilest of men ascend to power and influence. How could honest, kind-hearted, amiable men and women be otherwise than pessimistic under a regime which favours the success of the unscrupulous, the hard-hearted, and cruel? For the sake of rents the land tyrants have depopulated the country; for the greed of gain man has been made subservient to machinery.

Workmen may make themselves more proficient in technical education, but it will only be to maintain their masters in luxury and vice. It is not the labourer but the capitalist who overspreads the country with vice. No one scarcely can succeed unless they pander to capitalists. The foreman, the overseer, the manager, are generally the harshest—the bullies, in fact, in the capitalist's employment. Such undoubtedly are the characteristics of the men who find favour with the employers; for such men will naturally most readily carry out the behests of the capitalist, who is eager only for gain, and cares nothing for the condition of his employes.

For the sake of gain there is a strong tendency in this age to increase the artificial wants of man. Men anxious only for their own gain skillfully discover some desire among a portion of a community, or ingeniously kindle a desire to satisfy which will be profitable to them. Man now strives after many luxuries which are detrimental to him, and masters, in order to gratify their desires, reduce their servants' wages. The immense inequality which every one daily sees, and which is not owing to superior ability or higher morality, undoubtedly spreads pessimistic views of life. How is it possible that men and women of excellent character, much intellectual power and keen sympathy, can escape a pessimistic expression when they see the unscrupulous and the low-minded secure the material advantage here, and prove the truth of the saying: "Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn."

The extensive pessimism which now prevails proves the existence of a wide-spread dissatisfaction. Many who feel a depressing influence have never attempted to find out its cause, and many who have made attempts to discover the cause of their pessimistic feeling have not had the courage to admit to themselves that it is due to the false, or rather non-organisation of modern Society, although they have a perception that the present disorganised state of Society is answerable for many evils. This increasing pessimism may be regarded as a hopeful sign by social and industrial reformers. But, of course, it is necessary that the people should not be allowed to sink into a condition of lethargy with no energy to seek and obtain such a change as will bring them justice. The new gospel, which is to revive and quicken the spirit of men, is that of Socialism, whose advocates will, however, no doubt meet with persecution, as all movements for the good of mankind have encountered the fiercest opposition.

SAMUEL SIDNEY.

HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY; OR, THE INCONVENIENCE OF STEALING.

SCENE—A Suburban Highway, tending townward.

EVANS (turning round as BROWN catches him up on the road). Well, Brown, you look in a deuce of a hurry this morning.

BROWN (sulkily). And you look as if you have no need to hurry.

E. No, I haven't—because I must write my own books and paint my own pictures myself—but don't be in such a hurry, old man; it's a long time since I have had a talk with you, although we live next door but one to each other.

B. (testily). No, no, it's all very well for you, who have all the day before you to loaf in, to take it easy; but I must get on to my business, and catch the 'bus.

E. Come now, Brown! You know well enough that your clerks don't want you; and they can't idle, because they have got old Jackson to drive them; and he does it as a pleasure and not as a duty. You will only be in the way when you get there.

[BROWN's sulkiness visibly increases; but he slows down, and they walk on side by side for a little, but without talking, EVANS whistling 'The Last Rose of Summer' very much out of tune.]

B. Well, now, why don't you talk, Evans, since you have kept me here lounging along with you: and there you go mooning along, pretending to be pondering over your novel, or your picture, and really thinking about nothing.

E. Well, you see, I like human company even when it doesn't talk. But what were you thinking about Brown?

B. (very testily). You.

E. Curious! I was thinking about you, and wondering what had put you out so this morning; because you are generally rather a cheery kind of a bird.

B. Well, I admit that I am in a bad temper—there.

E. Or rather you were; but since you have made up your mind to tell me all about it you are beaming as usual. Well, "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh;" abound my friend, abound!

B. Well you know, Evans, you may think it a little thing, but there's that jolly little garden of mine, all spoilt this morning. You know, the square piece between the trees.

E. Hilloa! who's done that? One of your Tory friends been spitting you these brisk political times, like Mr. Whiteley's desperate enemies?

B. Well you see, it's the pears. They have come after them; you know, that jargonelle tree close by.

E. Come after them? Yes, and got them too, I suppose—boys, I should think.

B. Every blessed one—no, no! it isn't boys, its blackguards; blackguards I tell you. No one can keep any fruit for them in this beastly hole.

[Here he uses the resources of the English language in a manner too emphatic for our printer to render with the resources of type.]

E. My dear Brown, calm yourself, when its done you all the good it can! I suppose these blackguards had no pears and wanted some, and had no money to buy them with. Blackguards seldom have any money, I notice. It often happens so to me.

B. No, blast them! They had spent it all in beer.

[The resources of the English language drawn on again.]

E. Doubtless; and the pears would come refreshing to them after hot-coppers—if blackguards ever have hot-coppers!

B. Refreshing! don't be a fool! Don't you know that they would sell 'em and buy more beer with them, blast them!

E. Touching instance of the Marxian formula, C—M—C! Never mind me, Brown, my mind wanders a little sometimes. But I say, really, don't let it put you out so, for you can easily buy some more pears, and much better ones; you're not a blackguard, and you have got plenty of money, and the ones that were gone were no great shakes after all. And then they won't be wasted, somebody will eat them; and look here, it quite squares with your dignified position as a leading Radical in the neighbourhood to grow fruit for the public benefit. By Jove! an idea seizes me. Suppose you put up for Parliament here next election, you might get a good deal of popularity by this affair if you managed it properly. But since the pears were what they were, perhaps they will give people the gripes; but even then that's a kind of revenge for you at the worst, even if the stealers exchange their commodity pears, for money wherewith to buy the commodity beer; some one will get the gripes.

B. Now look here, Evans, you think yourself damned clever with your chaff; but you know very well I don't care about the value of the pears, but one does want to know what becomes of one's own fruit. And when you talk of the gripes and the beer and all that; that just what I say. It damages me and doesn't do any good to them. That's what always comes of stealing. And as to the pears being wasted, I know my garden is wasted; why my wife had tears in her eyes when I fetched her out before breakfast to look at the damage those damned blackguards had done; all those single dahlias broken down and all, and she doesn't care about flowers anything like as much as I do! Damnation!

E. Poor Mrs. Brown!

B. Now there you go! You won't understand me! they are welcome to the fruit. Next year I'll have it all picked and put in baskets before the door in the open street with a placard over them, "Blackguards are requested to partake of other people's property; scoundrels are begged to accept what other people have worked for."

E. A very proper thing to do! and won't do your popularity any harm. People will take in your pears much quicker than your jokes, though they are not bad. If only you understood where they would lead you if you followed them up properly.

B. What I mean is this, and I'm sure when you think fit to be serious, you will agree with me; that in stealing it isn't so much the shifting of the property from one man to another, especially if he is a rich man, that is so bad, as the confusion and nuisance of it, and its waste and destruction, and the heart-burning and hatred it causes. In short, as I said, it does harm both to the stealer and the stolen from; in short, it is bad all round.

E. Isn't even good for trade?

B. Of course not. (Pompously) Nothing is good for trade except steady production, and honest dealing in the things produced. But, Evans, I really wonder at a decent man like you, a very good-natured fellow, being so flippant about such a beastly, miserable, destructive, inconvenient vice as stealing. The more I think of it the more I hate it: it is simply the worst form of war. Come, my dear fellow, be serious.

E. I assure you I'm as serious as possible, and quite delighted to hear that you hate stealing, since I quite agree with all that you have been saying about it.

B. (mollified). Well, I thought you would.

E. Yes; and what you have been saying makes me bold to say something to you in return: that since you hate stealing, you ought to do your best to get rid of it altogether.

B. Well, so I do, don't I?

E. Do you? How, pray?

B. Why, I look sharp after my property; don't allow anyone that I have to do with to be backward with their accounts; don't put temptation in anyone's way; whilst at the same time I must say for myself that I am liberal in my dealings—give my servants good wages, and my clerks too, though you did sneer at me about old Jackson; who, I must tell you, is a very useful person, and a precious good screw he gets from me. In short, I'm none of your sloppy, indulgent, weakly good-natured persons like—like—

E. Like me, eh?

B. Well, don't take offence; but you are, rather, you know, ain't you? But look here, Evans, it don't do, you know—that sort of thing; you do much more harm by it than good. Now I really take trouble with the people I have to deal with, and both by example and by looking sharply after them and treating them justly (and they know when they are justly treated, bless you!) I do hope I make them honest persons. I hold that a man has no right to have property unless he accepts its responsibilities and takes that kind of trouble: and it is a trouble, mind you. Now you—

E. But do you never try to do anything to keep yourself from stealing?

B. There, there! you are at it again!—never serious for two minutes together! But you needn't look penitent; I wasn't offended, my dear fellow.

E. Well, but I am not penitent at all; but I am somewhat discouraged, because I was deadly serious, and was going to beg you to help me and others to put an end to stealing, both other peoples' and our own.

B. Evans, what do you mean?

E. Since you did really seem to hate stealing so, and since I know you are an honest man enough at heart, I was going to ask you to join the Socialist League, to which I belong—

E. Evans! Evans!

B. And the object of which is to get rid of all stealing for good and all.

B. Get rid of all property, you mean! But I never knew that you were a Socialist;—I am shocked, I am shocked! And the Socialist League, too! Well!

E. How you fly out at a man! How should you have known I was a Socialist? If ever I began to talk about the wrongs of the working class, or the stupidity of our system of production, you would take me all cross, and think I was only talking Ruskinism; and then you would shut me up with some Radical aphorism, and get excited about Gladstone, and not listen to one word I had to say. And I didn't like to push myself forward, as if I were a person of any importance.

B. Well, only to think of it! And let me tell you, Mr. Socialist, when you call me a thief, I call you a coward for not telling me before.

E. (penitently). Well, it was rather cowardly. But now you see I've done it; so you need not twit me with it. And I won't be cowardly any more about it; and I'll speak at the open-air meetings about here, instead of at the East-end only.

B. What! you a street-preaching demagogue too!—go about advising people to rebellion and murder and all that?

E. No; I advise them not to steal or let others steal. Come, I say, I don't mind your hard words, but just think it over about joining us.

B. NO!!!

E. Well, here we are close to the Straightway and the 'bus. Let's make peace, at any rate; and come in this evening and have a pipe, and convert me, if you can, to the ways of peace, righteousness—and stealing; and forget about your garden.

B. Well, I will come in; but no Socialist politics, if you please. Well, I promise to come.

E. Well, we won't talk politics. I'll read you the manuscript of my last poem, on the Birth of the Bruce: it isn't very long.

B. (dubiously). All right, all right. Now I must be off: 'bus is just going to start. (Exit on 'bus.)

E. (to himself). Well, I've caught him properly. Because, don't you see, when he comes in and sees my MS. on the table, he will be anxious to put off the evil half-hour of the reading, and he will be glad to let me begin to talk of Socialism or anything else rather than read my poetry to him. And when I once begin he will presently get hot and argue; and even if I don't sow a seed or two in him (and really he is a very good fellow) at all events it will be good practice for me against my next open-air speech.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

AN ADDRESS TO PRINTERS.

THE following is an extract from an address delivered by the Rev. Hugh O. Pentecost recently at a United Labor Party's mass meeting, under the auspices of the Printing Trades' Legion, at the Cooper Union Hall, N.Y.:

"Fellow Craftsmen,—I have been a minister of the gospel for several years, and prepared myself for the pulpit by working at the case in a printing office. Society at large is similar to a printing office. I once worked in Indianapolis. One or two men got all the 'fat takes,' and when it was found that they obtained them through trickery a revolution was threatened unless fair play was given to all, and we got it. There never was a day when I was a 'rat,' or had anything to do with a 'rat.' When I was a printer and there was a strike I was in the strike. Were I back to-morrow and a strike should come I would be in it. We hold that the rich as a class are rich because they have taken that which belongs to somebody else. This great battle we have undertaken should and will be carried on until every reasonable desire of mind, body, and soul shall be gratified. We have repudiated the doctrine that God is responsible for poverty. The reason why some people are on the top of the heap financially is not because they are superior to others in brains, but because they are inferior to others in conscience. There is no difference between men of different nationalities. The German is as good as the Englishman, the Irishman as good as the Frenchman or American, and so it goes. It is the surroundings and influences, not the blood, that makes the man. Society is at present organised in the form of 'pie,' which we must 'reset' and place in a 'chase' of justice, place about it 'sidesticks' of fairness and equality, stick in 'quoins' of reason, use a 'shooting stick' of logic, and drive it with a 'mallet' of conscience."

UNEMPLOYED BOATMEN.—About 200 men have been thrown out of work by the suspension for the winter of the steamboat traffic on the Thames.

A strike in the Bolton bleaching trade is imminent, as the men have given notice for an advance which the masters decline to give.

BRITAIN.

A large number of rivet makers in the Blackheath district of Staffordshire have struck against a reduction in wages. The men remaining at work will subscribe for their support.

REDUCTION OF IRONWORKERS' WAGES.—Messrs. Green Brothers, of the Norfolk Foundry, Ecclesfield Common, have intimated to the moulders, grinders, and fitters in their employ that owing to the depressed state of trade, it is their intention to give a fortnight's notice of a reduction of 10 per cent.

MATCH-MAKERS.—The match manufactory at Newton Heath, established nearly a quarter of a century, ceased working on Saturday, the business being transferred to the chief works of Messrs. Bryant and May, London. The extensive timber trade originally carried on in conjunction with the matchmaking will be retained at Newton Heath, but the hands employed in matchmaking are all thrown out of an employment which many of them have been accustomed to all their lives.

DESTITUTION AMONGST LABOURERS IN IRELAND.—Pitiable accounts are continually being received of the distress amongst the labouring population. At a recent meeting of the Tullamore guardians about fifty labourers forced their way into the boardroom and appealed piteously to the guardians for work or relief. They said they were starving—their wives and children were starving—and they could endure it no longer. Some of them, it appeared, had not been working for two months, and were in a very weak state for want of food.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.—Whitchurch, Dorset, Oct. 26.—Agricultural labourers' wages are being reduced in the villages in Dorset, from 11s. and 12s. per week to 9s. and 10s. There are from six to fifteen men out of work, in most villages. Many cottages are empty as the people are gone into the towns to seek work; the farmers don't employ them although the land is full of couch and other weeds. I see from six to fifteen poor men on tramp passing through the village daily asking for bread tickets, they having slept in the union the previous night; these men are mostly tradesmen from the towns. It is worse now than I ever remember, and I can't think what will be the end of it.—J. S.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—Two hundred engineers at Yates's Canal Foundry Blackburn, the most important engineering establishment in North-east Lancashire, have struck work as a protest against the alleged wrongful dismissal of one of their number for taking an active part in organising collections for the Bolton engineers' strike. They also decline to work unless an advance of 2s. per week be granted them, and are organising for a long struggle.—The dispute at Bolton is reported to be at an end. A conference was held and it has been arranged that the men shall resume work at the old terms; a board of conciliation, to be composed of both masters and men, to be appointed to settle what, if any, is to be the rate of advance. The objections as to overtime are to be withdrawn by the men.—The knobsticks who have been lodged inside the works, left the town on Monday, followed by great crowds.

STAFFORDSHIRE MINERS.—At a conference of miners representing the whole of the districts of South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire, resolutions were passed in favour of restricting the hours of labour to eight per day, and calling upon all those who were at work longer than that to cease doing so. It was also agreed that it would be a politic thing to observe every Monday as a holiday, and the desirability of a week's cessation from work was also insisted upon. It was further resolved that the time had come when united action should be taken to secure an advance of wages, and the conference decided to give such notice on November 12.

WELSH MINERS.—An important conference of Welsh miners has been held at Merthyr Tydvil, delegates representing over 40,000 men attending. The meeting was called for the purpose of considering the question of the renewal of the sliding-scale as a means of adjusting wages, notice having been given by the men's representatives on the scale to terminate the agreement next month. After a discussion lasting many hours, the question whether or not the sliding-scale should be continued was put to the meeting, with the result that delegates representing 21,720 miners voted for, and delegates representing 18,927 against the continuance of the scale. The secretary of the conference was therefore instructed to withdraw the notice to terminate the agreement. By a majority, a resolution in favour of the federation of the South Wales miners was adopted, and another resolution was passed, supporting the eight hours movement.

STRIKES IN THE COAL TRADE.—The threatened adoption of an idle week by the colliers, as recommended at the National Conference at Edinburgh, does not occasion any apprehensions among the coalmasters. The last time the restriction was resorted to in Scotland, it had the effect of enabling the coalmasters to clear away from the pitheads enormous quantities of stuff that, in other circumstances, they could not have disposed of at any price. For this material they obtained good prices. They did not suffer on account of a scarcity of good coals so far as their obligations under contracts were concerned, because all contracts of any importance now contain a strike clause, the effect of which is to allow the coalmaster to supply the best material he can at the enhanced price given to it by the general scarcity in the market. If the idle week is adopted the same thing will be repeated, and the masters will be the gainers and the men the losers.

THE NAILMAKERS' STRIKE.—The great strike in the nailmaking industry of the Midlands still runs on, and a good deal of distress and privation is being experienced by the unfortunate operatives who have now been on strike seven weeks in the hope of obtaining from the employers a return to what is known as the "1879 list." The masters have offered to give them an advance, but not to the extent demanded, though it is known that some of the employers would do so if the general body of employers were willing. It is the conduct of the little masters which tells against the interest of the men, but their want of unity has prevented them resisting the low prices of the "foggers." The latter undersell the market owing to the cheap labour they get. Even at the best of times the earnings of the nailers are very small. Their position at the present time is very trying, and relief funds have been opened to assist them.

CONVICTION UNDER THE FACTORIES ACT.—Messrs. J. J. Metcalfe and Co., printers, 3, Grocers' Hall-court, attended at the Mansion House on Friday, on two summonses, charging them with infringing the Factories and Workshops Act, 1878, in having employed a lad under the age of 16, from eight o'clock one morning until one o'clock the next, and in engaging the same lad for a year without obtaining a certificate in the prescribed form of his fitness for employment in their factory. Mr. J. B. Lakeman, one of H.M. Majesty's Inspectors of Factories, attended in support of the complaint. The defendants admitted the infringement, and explained that the lad was employed after hours in an emergency, owing to a machine hand absenting himself, but he was allowed a holiday on the following day to make up for it. In the other matter, the absence of the formal certificate was due to the illness of a partner. Sir Robert Carden in the first case merely ordered the costs to be paid, and in the second imposed a fine of 5s. and 2s. costs.

THE SHOP HOURS' REGULATION ACT.—At Lambeth police-court on Friday, a master hairdresser was summoned at the instance of Mr. H. H. Champion, of 13, Paternoster-row, hon. secretary of the Shop Hours' Regulation Act Committee, for breaches of the Act passed at the instance of Sir John Lubbock, in that he employed a youth under 18 years of age for 98 hours in one week, 74 being the statutory limit. He was also charged under a second summons for not exhibiting in his shop any notice of the provisions of the Act. Mr. T. Southerst, who prosecuted, pointed out the evils resulting from his long hours of confinement. Mr. Chance said that the defendant had not, according to the evidence, caused the ill-health of the boy, but held that he had committed two breaches of the Act. The prosecution did not press for a heavy penalty, and the magistrate bound the defendant in £10 not to employ the boy more than 74 hours per week, and to exhibit a notice of the provisions of the Act.

NORTHAMPTON SHOEMAKERS.—It is generally believed by the boot operatives of Northampton that a general lock-out is imminent. The strike of boot rivetters and finishers at Messrs. Cove and West's factory is farther off a settlement than ever. Both masters and men, after the strike had lasted 11 weeks, accepted arbitration, but the first point upon which the Board of Arbitration could not agree the masters unanimously refused to refer to the unanimously appointed referee. The Arbitration Board immediately broke up with no prospect of re-forming. The manufacturers approved of the action of their representatives on the board, and sixty-five boot manufacturing firms, employing about fifteen thousand "hands," intimated to the Workmen's Union that it would be impossible to carry on the trade of the town under the conditions required by the men's representatives on the Arbitration Board. The men at a mass meeting held immediately after this decided to uphold their representatives; and the Boot Stitchers' Union decided to support the rivetters and finishers. It is anticipated that to-day (Monday) the stitchers (cordwainers) employed at Messrs. Cove and West's Northampton manufactory will come out on strike. The operatives of Northampton expect that this decision on the part of the men will be met by a lock-out by the sixty-five manufacturers who have supported their arbitration representatives. The strike has already lasted fifteen weeks.

THE CONDEMNED ANARCHISTS.

On October 29th the Extreme Left of the French Chamber addressed the following telegram to the Government of Illinois:—"In the name of humanity and of the solidarity between the two great Republics, the deputies assembled in Paris who are in favour of the abolition of capital punishment for political offences ask of the Government of Illinois the lives of the seven Chicago Anarchists now lying under sentence of death."

At a meeting of working men held at Chesterfield on Sunday evening, the following resolution was passed:—"That this meeting protests against the execution of the sentence passed upon the seven Chicago Anarchists, and having examined the evidence, considers that it entirely fails to prove that either of the seven men now under sentence of death had anything to do with the throwing of the bomb."

Many meetings have also been held in France, Italy, Spain, and many parts of the British Isles.

A largely attended meeting of ironworkers was held at Walsall on Monday. Mr. Trow, secretary of the Iron and Steel Workers' Association, delivered a powerful address upon the need of organisation, and it was decided to form a branch of the National Association.

Endacott has of course been acquitted, and the jury practically dispensed with in the matter. This was to be expected, official witnesses must be defended at any cost, and those whom they bear witness against must put up with the trifling inconveniences resulting to them from the exercise of official imagination. Surely we must sacrifice something to Law and Order.

"A WIFE'S OPINION."—Under this heading a Fireman's Wife gives the following excellent advice in a letter to the Railway Review. Would that there were more women like her to preach the true Labour gospel, "One for all: all for one":—"I have read your very interesting paper for a very long time, and I have often thought I should like to send a little letter to you, but have put it off, because I am a wife and not a husband. I don't, however, see why your paper should not be open to women as well as men. Excuse me if I am proposing anything out of place, but often the wife is really the head of the house, although the man does the bread-winning part; but if the wife had a word in the Review I am sure you would get more husbands to join the valuable Society, although, I am sorry to say, mine does not at present, yet I think before long he will. For myself, I think it is a great mistake that every railwayman does not belong to it. I believe in it myself, and if all those men on the Midland had been banded together in one common cause and studied their own as well as one another's interest, they must have won the day. I can see it myself, although I do not profess to understand railway work. I am so sorry to see that their fellow-men have been so backward in giving their mite towards their comrades in need. I think if more men were true believers in the gospel they would be better men in themselves and truer to each other. How much better it would be if they were more united in the bonds of love to their fellows. There would have been more real assistance given both to the men of the Midland and those of the Hexthorpe disaster. If each man had given sixpence a-week for three months it would never have hurt any of them. I am sure many railwaymen spend more fools' pence than six times sixpence a-week. Now they would be all the better off in their heads and their hearts too, I am sure, for giving it to help a brother, especially as they never know who may need it next. Do to others as, if it was your case, you would wish to be done by; and, as I said before, if women were to write to the Review, I am sure their hearts would warm to a sister in distress, or I am much mistaken; and seeing it so, perhaps the men would feel ashamed and come forward more largely, and not let the weaker vessel beat the lords of creation."

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOCIALISM AND CO-OPERATION.

Albert Tarn writes in reply to Varley, insisting:—

"That the Socialistic way of getting capital is to seize that of individual capitalists and use it for the benefit of the whole community; and that the Socialistic way of dealing with shopkeepers is to tell them they are not wanted and to provide them with useful work for the benefit of the community. Does comrade Varley imagine that shopkeepers are such out of 'sheer cussedness'? My idea is that they are shopkeepers because there is no room under the present system in other occupations. My objection to the competitive way of going to work is that it tells most against the honest folk and tends to make them take to dishonest ways. I am afraid Maple, Peter Robinson, etc., will be found tough customers. . . . I think the elimination of small shopkeepers will take place in the ordinary course of events, and if I were comrade Varley I wouldn't waste my energy on such work."

H. Davis writes contending that "Socialist co-operation cannot be obtained without full possession of raw material and the means of production. . . . We can do nothing by such schemes as these while competition lasts; while we are uniting the power of our shillings, the Rothschilds and others are uniting their pounds and are sure to beat us out of the market."

THE PROPAGANDA IN NORFOLK.

At first we were ridiculed; now, that having failed, our opponents are trying to crush us out by brute-force. They began at Lowestoft, where our comrades were attacked by roughs; now it has spread to Yarmouth. Thursday week a crowd of Primrose Leaguers attacked the meeting on the Quay, but were completely beaten by sympathisers. During the next week, however, they organised for the purpose of ill-treating whatever speaker might go down. The police authorities drafted in extra officers for fear of a disturbance. I went down by an earlier train than usual, and disappointed the kindly intentions of those who wished to mob me at the station. At the usual time I began to speak, and it was evident that the crowd meant mischief. A number of Radical friends formed a ring, and I was allowed to proceed; but when I referred to the Primrose League, this seemed to be the signal for an outburst. The mob made a rush, shouting "Put him in the river." I began to feel comfortable, for the river was not twenty yards off and a strong tide was running. At this point, however, the chief constable and his men came up, and the hustling stopped until I finished my address. Then it was resumed with greater fury than ever. As a free fight seemed imminent, and I had an hour to wait for my train, I was conveyed to the police-station and waited there, having in the interval of waiting the pleasure of talking about Socialism to a large number of assembled constables. I reached the station in safety, changing hats with the chief-constable to prevent recognition, and as the night was dark the plan succeeded. A number of sympathisers were assembled at the station, who heartily wished me good-night; and we resolved that the meeting should not be given up, whatever action the Primrose League may choose to take.

Norwich, October 31.

FRED HENDERSON.

TEN COMMANDMENTS FOR BAKERS.

1. Thou shalt never forget that you also are human; nothing of interest to humanity should be beyond your reach; you should love and aspire to what is good and noble, and abhor everything that might debase you.
2. Thou shalt work only a reasonable number of hours, and remember that in working excessive hours you not only deprive those of bread that are wandering from shop to shop to obtain work, but you are also lowering your own wages.
3. Thou shalt not be arrogant toward your boss, nor shall you allow him to be arrogant toward you. Behave yourself as a man and insist upon being treated as such by everybody.
4. Thou shalt not try to teach good manners to your boss if he does not possess them, but rather leave him than run any risk of having your own good manners spoiled.
5. Thou shalt not believe that your boss is the one that maintains you, but think over the matter whether you are not the one that maintains him.
6. Thou shalt belong to the union, for if you are not a member you only aid in making yourself a life-long slave.
7. Thou shalt not believe that after having paid fifty cents. to the union that your wages will be doubled the following week and the working hours reduced one-half, but consider that it takes many drops of water and considerable time before a hole is drilled in a stone.
8. Thou shalt never think that they will get along without you, and thus excuse your absence from the meetings of your union, but always believe that there is one missing by your not being present.
9. Thou shalt not trust the man working with you unless he belongs to the union, for such a man is full of cunning and intrigues; he only waits for others to spread the table to sit down and help to eat what they cook for themselves.
10. Thou shalt subscribe for and read the Labour paper, and induce others to follow your example, so that your mind will be improved, that you may not only be happy in heaven after death, but also prosper while living on earth.—Bakers' Journal (U.S.A.).

'THE TABLES TURNED.'

On Saturday, Oct. 22nd, the "Socialist Interlude" by Wm. Morris, was reproduced at Farringdon Road, and last Saturday, Oct. 29th, at the Athenæum Hall, Tottenham Court Road. On both occasions there were good audiences, including many people who are not often seen at a Socialistic meeting, and in this way there is no doubt that some good propagandist work is being done. The contrast is very effective between the Court Scene, which C. and H. A. Barker have made very realistic, and Mr. Campfield's pretty Landscape, with its tree for the open-air communal council, and its dwellings in the distance. Comrades Krapotkin and Reclus are talking of putting Nupkins into a French dress, and sending him forth to do additional good in that fashion. To-day (Saturday 5th) a performance will be given in the Hall of the Hammersmith Branch, and the manager (H. A. Barker) is arranging for its repetition elsewhere.

THE MODERN GUY FAWKES.

He lurks deep down beside the base
Of that proud edifice, Society,
Where fashionable idlers chase
The phantom-form they call "variety";
Where landlords lounge from room to room,
And millionaires suspect no treason—
Deep down in subterranean gloom
He lives, and lurks, and bides his season.

Above, through many a spacious hall,
Deck'd gorgeously with stolen treasure,
They ply their pastime, one and all,
The votaries of pelf and pleasure;
Indulging every wanton whim,
Carousing, trading, gambling, whoring,
How should they pause to think of him—
That fellow underneath the flooring?

A rude, rough fellow, who delights
To scout conventional civility;
Who cares no whit for vested rights,
Nor cultivates respectability;
Who hath no balance at the bank,
No Sunday pew in church or chapel—
Take heed, ye men of wealth and rank,
Foredoom'd with this grim foe to grapple!

For this is he, the modern Guy,
By poets famed as Demogorgon,
Who, unbeheld of mortal eye,
Constructs a strange explosive organ,

By which those careless folk, intent
On everlasting rouse and revel,
Will see their festal mansions sent
In swift combustion to the devil.

E'en now they riot flush'd with wine,
And the mad din swells loud and louder;
Deep down he stores the secret mine,
And lays the silent train of powder;
No chemic compound, subtly wrought,
Is this, for death and devastafon;
Nay, but a train of kindling thought,
A mine of moral indignation.

A fierce, consuming, quenchless blast
Of righteous wrath and fiery feeling,
By which that fabric of the past,
Piled high through centuries of stealing,
Shall start and shiver at the roar
Of the loud summons democratic,
Fate-stricken to its inmost core,
From lowest base to highest attic.

When comes the crash? No tongue may tell.
The train is laid; the fuse is ready;
Deep down in subterranean cell
He bides his season, stern and steady.
Take heed, ye lofty millionaires!
Proud dames and high-born lords, remember
The rude rough Guy that lurks downstairs,
On this—the fifth day of November!

REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—Business meeting Oct. 27th, T. J. Dalziel elected secretary, and several suggestions for improvement of branch brought forward and adopted. Meeting at St. Pancras Arches Sunday morning, Oct. 30th, addressed by Bartlett, Mainwaring, Wardle, Henry, Turner, and Dalziel. Commonweal sale increasing.—T. J. D.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Oct. 26th, H. H. Sparling lectured to us on "Wealth." Sunday evening, good open-air meeting on Green, addressed by Barker and Turner. In the hall, T. E. Wardle lectured on "Law and Order." Lively discussions.—A. T. and W. B.

HOXTON.—Good meetings Thursday evening and Sunday morning. Literature sold well. Evening in hall, Mrs. C. M. Wilson lectured to a large audience on "The Social Revolution." Good discussion followed.—C. J. Y.

KINGSLAND GREEN.—A very good meeting was addressed here by W. B. Parker, A. Cores, and a friend from Chicago, on Sunday morning.

MERTON.—We held our usual meeting on Mitcham Fair Green, Eden and Kitz entertaining a good audience. The following resolution was unanimously carried: "That this meeting sympathises with the men imprisoned in consequence of their opposition to the police in their brutal attacks upon the people, and calls for assistance for their wives and families." This was responded to by a collection amounting to 3s. 6d. for that object. We wish to inform our comrades and friends of Mitcham that a course of lectures will be delivered during the coming winter months, commencing Sunday, Nov. 6th, when comrade Gregory will give a reading and address.—R. C.

NORTH LONDON.—Meeting of about 600 or 700 people at Regent's Park on Sunday morning, when Cantwell, Nicoll, E. and E. B. Aveling spoke. 8s. 9d. collected for propaganda. Good sale of literature.—T. C.

STAMFORD HILL.—A good audience were here addressed on Sunday evening by Brooks, Cores, Cantwell, and W. B. Parker.

GLASGOW.—Usual meeting Saturday in Jail Square, speakers, Downie and Glasier. On arriving at Paisley Road Toll on Sunday, we found the Orange rowdies, who have several times attempted to break up our meetings, had taken up our place of meeting with an orator of their own. We started our meeting not far off, and carried it through without any annoyance. In evening, after address from Glasier in Watson Street, we adjourned to hall, where we had a lecture from Daniel McCulloch on "Education under Capitalistic and under Socialistic Conditions."—A. M'K.

LEICESTER.—There has been a three night's debate here at the Secular Hall between T. Slater (of Bury) and comrade Barclay, on "Co-operation or Socialism: which is best calculated to improve the condition of the People?" Slater showed the great progress co-operation had made, advocated thrift, and defended competition. Barclay showed that capitalism had made greater progress in same time, and must needs because those in possession of the capital can "get more off their own bat in the game" than by becoming co-operators. Nothing could improve the condition of the whole people but nationalisation not only of land but of all capital. On 28th, Mr. Holt, a new member, read paper on "The Condition of the Workers."—J. F.

LEEDS.—Sunday morning Solitt and Paylor held meeting in Vicars Croft. In evening, Hill lectured at rooms on "The Labour Struggle." Animated discussion followed.—T. P.

NOTTINGHAM.—On Sunday, Wm. Morris delivered two lectures in Secular Hall, at 3 p.m. on "The Origins of Ornamental Art," the Rev. Prof. Symes in the chair, and at 7 p.m. on "Monopoly." Lectures well received by large audiences. Several questions asked, but no real opposition offered. At 5 in club room we had a tea for members and friends; Morris was present. Also on Saturday evening, a social gathering of members and friends, including the Rev. Prof. Symes, Rev. A. H. Baynes, J. P. Briscoe, librarian of Nottingham Free Library, G. H. Wallis, curator of the Castle Museum, and E. Cockburn. Meetings reported in local press, and we feel satisfied that the visit has been a success.—A. M. C.

WALSALL.—Two outdoor meetings held by Donald Saturday, one on The Bridge, the other top of Park Street. Great opposition evinced, and dealt with by Donald to the apparent satisfaction of the large majority.

WEDNESBURY.—Donald lectured in Market Place on Thursday night. Branch is arranging for carrying on propaganda indoors during winter.

St. FAITH'S.—Henderson spoke on Green Sunday afternoon.

NORWICH ANARCHIST GROUP.—Meetings during the week on St. George's Plain, Haymarket, and Market Place.

CARROW.—Meeting held on Friday by Henderson at Carrow.

BIRMINGHAM.—Four meetings held here on Sunday. Two indoor at Baskerville Hall, where Donald lectured morning and night, also addressing open-air meeting in afternoon at Council House. Sanders and Sketchley spoke in Bull Ring in evening; numerous questions put and satisfactorily answered. Our audiences continue to increase, and a good impression is being made.

WEST BROMWICH.—Sanders addressed indoor meeting here on Saturday.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—Our recent meeting and resolution, protesting against execution of Chicago Anarchists, has evoked considerable attention from the "largest circulation in Ireland," viz., Irish Times (Conservative), during past week. We have got several leaders, letters, etc., and are now called on to state our aims and how we propose to carry them out, which we will do. Pressure being put on the landlord of our hall, we were evicted on termination of our terms of occupying. We expect to engage suitable accommodation immediately.—J. M'C.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

EDINBURGH.—At the Earl of Meath's lecture on "State Colonisation," Mahon and J. D. Christie moved an amendment and made speeches in opposition, which were well received. Arrangements have been made for sending Edinburgh members to lecture at the new branches, and start branches at Leith and Kirkcaldy.

DYSART AND GALLATOWN.—A branch member has been nominated for the Town Council, with a good chance of success. The branch is steadily progressing.

COWDENBEATH.—A good body of members have been got together here, and with further effort there will be still better fruit. The greatest difficulty is that in the whole place a room for the branch cannot be obtained.

LOCHGELLY.—Mahon lectured on "Wrongs and Rights of Labour." Branch formed, several members being eager to take up the work and push it on.

DUNDEE.—Three meetings held here on Sunday by Mahon, Weksleder, Duncan, Carr, Dempster, Simpson, and Grainger. Evening meeting in Trades' Hall was very successful, and lecture well received. Class arranged for study of Socialism Sunday mornings, also class for singing which comrade Weksleder undertook to conduct, and a monthly programme of lectures. Several joined, progress being made.

ARBROATH.—A good debate on Friday. Arrangements made for Mahon's visit on Tuesday, and how to increase the sale of Commonweal.

NOTES ON NEWS.

C The Supreme Court of the United States has refused to grant a writ of error in the case of the condemned of Chicago, and as I write there is nothing between them and the gallows except the will of the Governor of Illinois, who can, if he pleases, commute their sentence. The Press is already gloating on the preparations for their slaying with that base pruriency which is one of the most horrible symptoms of the degradation which the criminal law-court brings on civilised humanity. Before the date of this issue of the Commonweal the people of America will have decided upon one of the most momentous events in their history. It is a hope against hope that they will yet give themselves a chance of repairing the injustice they have already done to our friends, and that yet some ray of intelligence may pierce to the dull brains of the money-lords there ; so I will yet express a hope, so likely to be falsified before this appears in print.

C If not, what can one say but that social crimes do of necessity bear their fruits and prepare a natural and inevitable punishment which no constitution or law can bar. I say this to the well-to-do people of America : If you are sure that henceforward the working-men of your country will live placid and happy lives then you need think no more of the murder you have committed ; for happy people cannot take vengeance, however grievously they have been wronged. But if it be so with you as with other nations of civilisation, that your workers toil without reward and without hope, oppressed with sordid anxiety for mere livelihood, deprived of the due pleasures of humanity, if there is yet suffering and wrong amongst you, then take heed ! increase your army of spies and informers, hire more reckless swashbucklers to do your will, guard every approach to your palace of pleasure without scruple and without mercy—and yet you will but put off for a while the certain vengeance of ruin that will overtake you, and your misery and suffering, which to you in your forgetfulness of your crimes will then seem an injustice, will have to be the necessary step on which the advance of humanity will have to mount to the happier days beyond. You yourselves will have made it necessary by making people unhappy and then punishing them for their unhappiness. You have sown the wind, you must reap the whirlwind.

The shopkeepers in the neighbourhood of Trafalgar Square are once again very angry ; and under the very natural impression that the Square belongs to them and no one else, or at anyrate should do so, they are petitioning to prohibit meetings there. Before the meeting at Exeter Hall took place they are reported to have determined that if the request was not acceded to they would take other and more drastic measures for helping themselves. I don't see how they can take more "drastic" measures for helping themselves (to other people's earnings) than they already have taken ; but I suppose they mean that they will hire roughs to keep the peace in Trafalgar Square by breaking heads ; which may turn out rather a dangerous game for them. Perhaps they will go further, and imitate their brethren on the other side of the Atlantic, and get up another Pinkerton army here ; they will find that very convenient no doubt ; but it will have the disadvantages of war—in the long run the knocks wouldn't be all on one side.

In the meantime if their businesses have suffered from the meetings of the unemployed, whose fault is it ? Whose, but those who raised the ridiculous outcry in the press about the dangerous attitude of the demonstrators, who were perfectly peaceable until they had to defend themselves against the police ? Whose but those who hounded on the police against the peaceable people ?

And yet it lies deeper than that ; if there were no unemployed, no poor in short, there would be no rich shopkeepers dealing in wares that nobody wants, but for which they can manage to tease a price out of the vacant lives of the rich who live on the labour of others.

However it is not unlikely that this Exeter Hall attack on free speech is part of a regular conspiracy of coercion, which the Government and its allies are on the point of setting on foot, irritated by their disgraces in the Irish campaign. The double arrest of our comrade Allman and the arrest of others points to this ; and the morning's paragraph makes it pretty certain that so it is. "It is understood that the matter under discussion [at the interviews between Matthews and Lord Salisbury and Matthews and Warren and Howard] was the measures which the Government are resolved to take regarding the continued assemblies in Trafalgar Square, and the use of seditious language."

We Socialists will have every reason to thank the Government if they put such a clear and simple issue before us as the freedom of speech, and we believe that we also shall find allies in this case as in the affair of Dod Street. The Tories should remember that what drew that enormous crowd into the streets was the certainty in the public mind that the police had interfered with the meetings not because they inconvenienced the public, but because the authorities did not like the opinions of the speakers at them. Since then, when we have been harassed by the police, we have been informed with all official solemnity that we were brought before the magistrates not for opinion, but for that remarkably elastic offence, obstruction. It will be a good thing if the mask is at last stripped off, and we find ourselves attacked for doing what we must do, telling our fellow-citizens the truths we have learned, and urging them to accept their consequences.

At first sight all this fussing and fuming at the peaceful meeting of a few hundred unarmed and unorganised men in the streets seems so cowardly and foolish as to be difficult to understand. But what we have to remember is this. It is not a riot, even a serious one, which the authorities are afraid of ; they have ample force to quell it at once ; and perhaps would not be sorry to show what organised force could do, and to have an opportunity of striking terror into the hearts of the discontented. It is not what goes on in the open street that is alarming our masters, but what is happening in the workshop, the factory, and the counting-house. The spectre of coming ruin is rising up behind the dusky procession of the unemployed, and its "still small voice" is being heard amidst their cries and the answering bluster of the lords of society. Coercion is a good weapon in the hands of a class whose business is going well, and when all is prosperous with it ; but then in such times it seldom has to be used, for then the poor are helpless. When the complaint of the poor forces itself on the ears of the rich it is a certain sign that, however unconsciously, they are aiming at better days to come. The Fear of the Rich is the Hope of the Poor.

Our masters are not so much afraid of what their slaves mean to do as of what they will be forced to do. It was not the hope of the glory of conquest that urged the tribes of the North to fall on the effete Roman Empire, but hunger rather ; and so it will be again. And yet in our days when the force behind the workers grows strong enough, their aim will grow clear, because they are the workers and must reconstruct as well as destroy ; the stir amongst them throughout civilisation is as much a sign of their growing knowledge as of their growing necessity. The Government will do well to put down sedition, i.e., the sowing of revolt—if it can.

C "Bombs have been 'discovered' in Lingg's cell," says an American telegraph, "and a revulsion of feeling has been caused against the condemned men." Indeed ! Who put the bombs there ? Is this not proof rather of the disgrace of the American capitalists ? Does it not make it certain that there was no case against the men when authority is forced to resort to such base and clumsy shifts as this to justify its murder ?

C Henry George approves of this murder ; do not let anybody waste many words to qualify this wretch's conduct. One word will include all the rest—TRAITOR !! W. M.

PRISON LIFE IN ENGLAND.

IN writing a short account of my experience of prison life, I do so for the purpose of showing my comrades what they may expect when it comes to be their turn to take a holiday in one of "Her Most Gracious Majesty's" country mansions. It is needless for me to explain the crime for which I was sentenced to nine months ; let it suffice when I say it was for addressing an unemployed meeting in Norwich on January 14th, 1887. And I may say in passing that I hope my friends and comrades will never waste money by engaging "counsel," commonly called "liars," to defend me whenever I may get "run in" again. I was advised in every manner possible to "twist" and "lie" in order to get out of being sent to prison. I called no witnesses, simply because if they had spoken the truth I should have received a heavier sentence than nine months, considering the temper of those who had to try me. I was certainly guilty of addressing the meeting, and taking the policeman's truncheon out of his pocket, but I was not guilty of saying to the police, "For God's sake, don't use these things!" I received my sentence for showing a "good" example by disarming the policeman nearest to me. I will not comment on the judge's summing-up or the constable's evidence, but will at once begin to describe my reception in the prison, and the kind of employment, diet, etc., which I received.

I felt a little strange the first day when, under the hands of the reception officer, the first performance I had to undergo was a bath (warm), after which I received flannel underclothing, cotton shirt, worsted socks, fustian trousers and vest, light-brown shoddy jacket, and Scotch cap, nicely besprinkled with broad arrows, also ankle shoes, after which I went under the hands of the hair-dresser, who took good care that I should not require a comb and brush for some considerable time. On seeing myself in the glass which stood upon his desk, I really thought myself a "masher." I felt a little uncomfortable when I found my splendid curls and moustache, like Othello's occupation, "gone," but fortunately for me they did not take out the roots.

In describing the cell in which I was confined (and all are nearly the same), I wish to point out that it was about 9 ft. by 6 ft., nicely ventilated, and in winter time heated by hot air. The furniture consisted of a stool, a plank bed, a side cupboard, the top of which was used for storing bed and bed-clothing, a wooden spoon, tin-pot, comb and brush, salt-cellar, bible, prayer, and hymn-book. There are four stages through which all prisoners must go:—

The 1st stage (for one month) each prisoner must (unless disqualified by the doctor) go upon the "wheel," or, as it was commonly called, the "monkey's piano." He must do four hours a day upon this instrument of torture, after which he must pick a certain quantity of oakum, sometimes consisting of 1 lb., sometimes more according to the number of previous convictions, or the temper of the oakum officer. He earns no gratuity, sleeps on a plank bed, and is not allowed exercise on a Sunday.

The 2nd stage (or second month) each prisoner receives a bed, which he is not allowed to use for two nights of the week. He also receives 1s. gratuity per month, has school-books and slate in his cell, is also allowed "exercise" on Sundays, and is employed on oakum picking (quantity, 3 lb. per diem), which will take a novice ten hours or more to do.

The 3rd stage (or third month) each prisoner is allowed to use his bed except one night per week; receive 1s. 6d. gratuity per month; has exercise on Sundays, school-books and slate, and also library books (mostly those published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge), and is employed on oakum picking (quantity, 3 lb.)

The 4th stage (or fourth month) each prisoner is eligible for employment of trust in the service of the prison, such as cleaning, painting, or other kinds of work in and around the prison. He also receives his bed every night, has exercise on Sundays, and earns a gratuity of 2s. per month.

He remains in this stage during the remainder of his imprisonment, providing his conduct is good. The gratuity paid to a prisoner on his discharge must not in any case exceed 10s. Each prisoner must go to chapel every morning, unless he receives leave of absence from the governor; and when in chapel he must listen with patience (a very hard task) to the greatest humbug it has ever been my lot to listen to. He receives a double dose of this salvation on Sundays. For my part, I should have objected to go to this piece of mummery, had it not been that we were confined in our cell for 23 hours out of the 24; so that it was the means of getting us half an hour or more out of our cell, and it also gave me an opportunity of sometimes talking to other prisoners, most of whom knew I was a Socialist. It also was the means of making me, if that were possible, hate the accursed cant more than I had hitherto done. It is needless to say that there was very little religion among the prisoners, who it seems always recognised the "parson" as J.C. (I don't think this meant Joe Chamberlain). The chaplain was a very good hand at his business of trying to make believe, but I fancy he found me too hard a nut to crack. We afterwards had short discussions on Socialism, one of which took place when Mrs. A. Besant paid a visit to Ipswich to lecture (this prison is better than Norwich). I was rather rough upon him when in the heat of discussion he called our comrade Mrs. Besant a pestiferous woman, I in return risking the punishment attaching to insulting the representative of "God" on earth, told him he was neither able or plucky enough to meet this pestiferous woman on a public platform and confute her arguments. I also called him a d—d humbug. But he was a good-tempered little fellow, and tried very hard to win my "soul" from "eternal blazing damnation," but could not. I flatter myself I converted him to Socialism, for he himself told me he had been induced by my arguments to buy five books on Socialism. Poor fellow! he seemed dreadfully frightened that Atheism and Socialism were rapidly spreading among the working-men of this country, a statement which filled me with pleasure.

Those that labour starve, and those that do nothing wear fine clothes and live in luxury. The slightest inconveniences of the great are magnified into calamity, and while tragedy mounds out their sufferings in all the strains of eloquence, the miseries of the poor are entirely disregarded; yet some of the lower ranks of people undergo more real hardship in one day than those of exalted stations suffer in their whole lives.—Goldsmith.

THE BISHOP OF HEREFORD ON SOCIALISM.

THE DIVINE INSTITUTION OF PRIVATE PROPERTY DEMONSTRATED.

THOSE who seriously think that the bishops and clergy of the Established Church are likely to do anything towards making England a land where useful work will be duly rewarded and idleness punished, should read the speech delivered at an ale-house in Hereford called the "Green Dragon" last week by the Bishop of Hereford. It was as full crammed of vindictiveness towards the people as it was possible to be. A Mr. Rankin, M.P., had made a speech on what he called the progress of the country during the Queen's reign, upon which the Bishop rose and stated that he was much interested in the account Rankin had given of the progress of the nation, and especially of the progress of the nation in education. It was, he stated, a matter of great importance that the young should be carefully trained,—a truly original and brilliant remark! He then gave his notion of the training that was good for the [class] State, for the Throne, and [least important and therefore last] the welfare of the people. The children should be brought up religiously and carefully, and shown what an advantageous thing it was for them to have landlords to appropriate rents, to have clergy to guzzle tithes, to have capitalists to pocket profit, and usurers to fatten on interest, so that they should not be at the trouble of having to use all the wealth they have produced. They were to be carefully taught that in the infiniteness of his wisdom God has ordained that the producers should honour the queen, the landlord, and the man of money, and allow the produce of their labour to be quietly confiscated; and most important of all, should it happen that in the mysterious workings of Providence when they grew to be men they found themselves hungry and homeless, they were on no account to demonstrate or hold meetings for having affairs righted.

The bishop then went on to commend a series of lying and spiteful articles which have appeared in the Birmingham Post during the past few weeks on Socialism, and on the Socialist candidature of a member of the S.D.F. for the Birmingham Municipal Council; after which his lordship gave his experiences regarding the recent unemployed demonstrations in London. He began with a well-worn lie that has been public property for about three years. To give the yarn an air of truth he coupled the name of a friend of his called Fairbairn with it. This gentleman—a baronet—having nothing on hand, desired to go to Paris to spend the money most likely he had managed to scrow from some of the workers. He wanted a jacket to go in, and having, as is the habit of baronets, left everything in the way of stores to the last minute, he told the tailor to be as quick as possible. Being, probably, of a flighty disposition, as is not unusual in the "hupper circle," he resolved to go a day earlier than he first intended, so he visited his tailor to hurry him on with the jacket; but the veracious tailor, no doubt having had similar visits from other of his customers, was sorry he could not comply with Fairbairn's desires, as his foreman had gone to attend a meeting of the unemployed! The paper reports that loud laughter followed the joke; but the really curious part of the matter is the right reverend father in God did not seem to know it was an old joke he had been retailing. After this exhibition Englishmen must not say anything about Scotchmen being unable to understand a joke—unless it should turn out that this bishop was a Scotchman. After the story the bishop proceeded to say that he yielded to no man in his sympathy for those who could not get work—which, judging from the tone of his speech, is most likely untrue; and wound up by solemnly asserting that the unemployed should not be allowed to meet together, and that if they persisted in doing so, advised that they should be dispersed by force.

Stripped of verbiage, this is a sample of the after-dinner oratory of one of the dignitaries of the Church of England. Milton described the clergy of his day as "blind mouths," and to-day it is to be feared that a very large proportion of them, especially among the higher clergy, are still more anxious to shear their sheep and sell their wool than to tend them. A prophet of Judah once proclaimed to his countrymen that "In Judah, her princes in the midst of her are roaring lions; her judges are ravening wolves, they leave nothing till to-morrow. Her prophets are light and treacherous persons; her priests have profaned the sanctuary, they have done violence to the law." And so it is in England to-day, and we fear they will never mend themselves, nay, more, that they never can be mended, but must be utterly swept away.

A. K. DONALD.

A few days back I was in the Strand, and I saw the army of the unemployed passing on its way from the Square to the City, their only standard a red handkerchief roughly tied upon a broomstick. As usual, there were police to the right of them, police to the left of them, police in front of them, and mounted police behind them. As I looked on the long array of lean, hungry, hopeless men, and saw how physically incapable many of them seemed, I asked myself, why does authority fear them? Are these the terrible unemployed at the mention of whom the West-end shopkeeper shivers with fright behind his counter? Surely there must be some mistake—these men are too weak, too helpless, too despairing to rise against their oppressors. Then came the words of a great novelist into my mind: "There is a prodigious strength in hunger and despair"; and then I remembered how starving peasants of France were as crushed-down and dispirited as the men who were then passing, yet rose one day when their load of misery became too heavy to bear, and perfumed seigneurs fled before the starving canaille. The procession passed on and one heard a shrill and doleful sound: it was the crowd who were singing the "Marseillaise." A middle-class lady laughs; "How absurd!" she exclaims. Some day she may cry "How terrible!" when she hears that tune thundered forth as the battle-song of a risen people.—Norwich Daylight.

THE SHEEP WITHOUT A SHEPHERD.

(AFTER VICTOR HUGO).

"In Tenebris Colocavit me."

Poor trembling, shivering crowd! Through storm and mist
Treading the dreary highway of the world,
While tempests rage and bleak winds slay like death;
What hand has shorn you of the sacred fleece
God gave you as your right, and left you bare
To the wild driving of the pitiless rain?
On, on, for ever on, the mournful march
Of toiling, suffering, working, dying men;
Naked, while weaving royal robes for kings;
Houseless, while building gorgeous palaces;
Starved, while they fill the granaries of others;
Oh, patient people, ye who nourish all,
Where is your recompense? Robbed, scorned, despoiled—
Men of the honour due to honest toil—
Women of holy joy in motherhood—
Maidens of all that makes life beautiful—
From God or man have you no higher right
Than ceaseless toil, and want for evermore?
See how your masters revel in their wealth,
And grind your lives down for their luxuries;
Body and soul and brain—the rich want all,
And no man pleads for you. Chiefs, Leaders, Priests—
Can they not shield you from the greed of those Who take the wool and then will take the flesh?
Oh, haggard crowd! Wild, wasted, wandering flock,
So helpless 'neath the blows that drive you on,
While every word held sacred on our lips,
Truth, Justice, Right, and manlike dignity
Is trampled in the dust along with you,
Is there no help for this eternal war
That fate and laws and social usages,
Still wage against the poor? God knoweth best—
Yet, why should trouble beat them to the earth
And hungry want bite through them like a serpent?
Why must the shadow fall upon their lives
So darkly that it blots out all the sun?
Still no help comes. The doom remains unlifted,
And patiently through sorrow, toil, and tears,
The poor must bear the bitter yoke of want
Until the rending of the thunder-cloud
Flashes the light of Freedom on the world,
And the dread vengeance of the Lord comes down
On those who left them naked to the blast.
Pass on, O pallid crowd! Soon not a trace
Of all who toiled and suffered will remain
Amid the work their hands and brain have builded.
Pass on to nameless graves, unwept, unpitied—
Innumerable hosts of weary men
Lost in the darkness of eternal night!

IS FREE TRADE A FRAUD?

Have Liberals, Radicals, and above all, Socialists, a right to advocate Free Trade? Free Trade to-day means that if I go to another country where the price paid for labour is much less than our own, and buy articles and supply them to Englishmen at a lower price than they have paid for home produce, I am allowed to bring them here free, and thereby stop the production of those articles in this country; the other country and myself growing richer upon the transaction. If this Free Trade is allowed to continue, shall we not have every article brought from abroad which can be produced cheaper through the low wages paid to the workers, until there is no necessity to produce anything in this country? If it is right to bring one article from abroad that can be produced here, it is right to bring all articles, until our workers are compelled to work at the starvation wages of downtrodden Russia, etc., and after that point has been reached, nation will have harder to compete against nation, each trying to cut out the other, and trying their hardest to force all the wealth into the pockets of the Free Trade capitalists. I have heard it stated several times from Radical platforms that the reason we benefit so much from Free Trade is, "that we pay for all our imports by goods produced here, and the country grows richer year after year," but it does not necessarily follow that the people are better provided for. There is not as much manual labour done per head of the population for the relative value received, as there was before machinery had reached such vast productive proportions. If machinery will do as much per hour as 20, 30, or 40 men could do, it means that, although the production is larger it requires less men to produce it, and yet the population is growing larger and larger, and are compelled to subsist upon what half their number had to subsist upon two generations ago. Free Trade is a Robbery! I have a slight remembrance that a President, some three years ago, of one of our colonies, whom the National Reformer claimed to be a Freethinker, stated "that he considered it to be dishonourable to bring Chinese or low-paid labour into his country, where the people had been educated up to a higher class living and requirements." Now what is the difference between bringing low-paid labour into our country to compete with our workers, or to take the work done from the low-priced workers and place it free in our markets to compete against our own production? The only difference that I can see is that the goods are manufactured there instead of here.

THE POLICE AND THE PUBLIC.

In Marlborough Street police-court, on Monday last, Oct. 31, a painter out of work, named Oldland, was committed for trial on the charge of assaulting the police at Hyde Park, on October 18th. The original charges included one of riotous assembly, but Mr. Poland dropped this at the conclusion of the third day's hearing. Evidence was given that on the day in question much disturbance had been caused by the action of the police, who closed the Park gate in the face of the crowd seeking egress and then charged them, thus hemmed in, the foot police striking right and left indiscriminately with their staves, and the mounted police charging at full gallop. A reporter bore witness that Oldland had done his best to restrain the crowd thus angered, had interfered to save a solitary policeman who was surrounded by angry men, and had tried to prevent the breaking of the trees. Several witnesses gave evidence that he was deliberately attacked by the police, and most brutally beaten. As a matter of fact he was disabled by the blows he received, and two days afterwards he was scarcely able to walk. It is admitted that he struck two blows in self-defence, and the whole question turns on the point: "Has a man a right to defend himself against a constable who strikes him when he is exercising his ordinary rights as a citizen?" We say Oldland was illegally prevented from leaving the park, and that he did nothing to provoke the assault committed on him by the police. A few friends have saved him from the rough and ready "justice" dealt out by Mr. Newton at Marlborough Street, and the case has been sent for trial.

Our object in making this statement is to ask those who consider that the public have a right to hold a meeting in Hyde Park without being shut in, charged by mounted and foot police, and then brought up as rioters if they defend themselves against blows, to help us with the money needed for Oldland's defence. We have made ourselves peculiarly responsible for it, but we are both poor and cannot bear it alone. If Oldland were a rich man, or a member of Parliament (in England), the police would not have dared to touch him. He is poor and helpless, and we have interfered to get him at least a fair trial, and to expose the way in which the police have lately been handled. We confidently ask those who think we have done right to give us the money of which we stand in need. Cheques, postal orders, or stamps can be sent to Annie Besant, 19, Avenue Road, Regent's Park, N.W., or to the Rev. S. D. Headlam, 31, Upper Bedford Place, Russell Square, W.C.; and an account of receipts and expenditure will be sent to each subscriber when the case is concluded. The trial will take place at the Middlesex Sessions commencing on November 7th.

A CHARLATAN'S "OPINIONS."

The blush of shame for their leader must mantle the cheeks of such honest men as have so far followed blindly the erratic leadership of Henry George when they read his late ebullitions against those who have permitted a "sense of right and justice to guide them in their actions regarding the "shamelessly illegal" conviction of the so-called Anarchists of Chicago. In a pettish tirade against the Labour Party of New York, George takes occasion to class them with violent outlaws because they have the courage to protest against the judicial murder of seven men who are the victims of a class conspiracy and a jury chosen for their willingness to render a verdict in accordance with the desire of their employers. But it is not necessary for us to accuse Mr. George of charlatanism—he convicts himself. We simply point out the facts. In his paper of the 8th inst., he says that a Socialist, at the previous meeting of the New York Central Labour Union, "called on God to bless the hand that threw the bomb at Chicago." Now Mr. George was better informed than that; but he elected to utter a lie in company with his fellows of the "satanic press." Why? Simply to gratify a petty spite that indicates only too plainly the smallness of his soul and the narrowness of his intellect. When it seemed to his advantage to tell the truth in the matter of the Haymarket affair, he used his ability as a dispenser of "King's English" to earn the approval of fair-minded men. Thus he said in the Standard of January 15 last that "Spies and his associates were convicted by a jury chosen in a manner so shamelessly illegal that it would be a charity to suspect the judge of incompetency." Yet in the same paper of October 8 he said: "The truth is that there is no ground for asking executive clemency as a matter of right." So he practically asserts that men who were convicted by an illegally chosen jury have no right to clemency! And why does he change his tune? Evidently because men who have fathomed his shallow pretences adhere to their convictions and express themselves as George did last January. Again, George said in his paper of January 15: "No well-informed lawyer can defend the conviction upon legal grounds." But in his last week's issue he says: "It was proved beyond a doubt that these men were engaged in a conspiracy, as a result of which the bomb was thrown, and were therefore under the laws of Illinois as guilty as though they themselves had done the act."

And this is the man that would pose as a leader of intelligent and honest working men! This is the author (or compiler) of 'Progress and Poverty'! Surely adulation and petty ambition have done their degrading work, and the man who was honoured for the good he promised is first pitied and then loathed. Oh, the pity of it! One more quotation which convicts its writer "out of his own mouth": "Which, then, is the law and order class—the class that demands a lawful trial for victims of popular hate and fear, and out of its slender means contributes to that end, or the class that uses the machinery of the law to mangle the law itself in an endeavour to silence doctrinal adversaries?" The answer is obvious: it is the latter class. And with that class we must include those who use the press to mangle the truth in order to cast obloquy upon doctrinal adversaries and to gratify a most unworthy and pitiful spite—those whose "opinions" are the expressions of charlatanism and demagoguery. But they convict themselves. Henry George stands self-convicted.—From the Workmen's Advocate.

One of the best articles that has ever appeared in the ordinary press on the Unemployed question was in the Dublin Nation of the 29th ult. It is more especially worth notice, as showing the educative effect of the long continuance of the land war in Ireland.

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN KNEW IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY; OR, THE INCONVENIENCE OF STEALING.

PART II.

SCENE—A Room in Mr. OLAF EVAN's house, a good deal littered with odds and ends of art and literature; pipes and tobacco, and materials for grog on the table; in a conspicuous place a rather large bundle of MS.

Brown. Well, you see I've come.

Evans. Yes, and thank you for coming. Do you know, this morning you were very nearly quarrelling with me. However, let us hope the Bruce will mend all that."

B. (hastily, and looking furtively at the MS) Oh yes, I was glad to come and have a talk with a neighbour.

E. Well, light up, and let me mix you a glass of grog before I begin.

B. (taking his eye from the M.S., and looking hard into a corner of the room.) Oh, thanks, thanks, presently; I'm not in a hurry.

[Lights his pipe and smokes busily.]

E. How is business?

B. So-so; it's the old story. I have got to do twice the business to make half the money that my father did.

E. How do you account for that?

B. Competition; things must be sold cheap or down you go.

E. A good thing for the country though, especially for the working-classes.

B. Well, I'm not so sure of that; to tell you the truth, taking them all round, I don't think they are so much better off; if they get nominally higher wages they don't get such constant employment, and some don't get higher wages. There are the clerks now—do you call them part of the working-classes?

E. Well, yes, as things go. They certainly don't belong to the proprietary classes.

B. Well, I tell you that they are not as well off as they used to be, by a long way; I can get a steady going German who knows three languages thoroughly for 30s. a-week or less. Some years ago there would have been a fight for such a youth at the price.

E. Still, to have things cheap ought to be a benefit.

B. Well, I don't want them cheap. And look here, if things go on at this rate I shall have to sell my business at what it will fetch, and live as well as I can on the interest of what I have saved. I can't go on for ever slaving for 2½ per cent. And what I shall do other people will do, and are doing. Capital will be withdrawn from business wholesale, and then a nice mess your working-men will be in with nobody to employ them.

E. H'm—well now shall I mix for you—and begin the business of the evening?

B. Oh, we needn't be in a hurry, there's plenty of time. Let us talk.

E. Very well, I'm agreeable; only I hope we shan't quarrel.

B. I don't think we shall. You are in a reasonable humour now, I can see, and inclined to listen to people when they talk on subjects that they understand better than you.

E. Yes, there are many business matters I don't understand. I'll ask you a question or two presently.

B. Do; and one thing I can easily make clear to you, that an employer of labour doesn't lie on a bed of roses in these days. Everything that's done now must be for the benefit of the working-classes; as to the middle-classes, the real back-bone of the country, the real working-classes, mind you, they may take care of themselves.

E. Well, they can do that pretty well, I think.

B. How, I should like to know, with prices falling and wages rising on all hands?

E. But I thought you said you could get clerks (who we are agreed are working-men) cheaper than you used to do.

B. Not in proportion to the profits I make.

E. Well, let that pass; for I want to raise your spirits by showing you how the middle-classes can take good care of themselves, and in fact do so. Only I think you must abandon your ideal of their all retiring from business, and all living on the interest of their savings.

B. Well, I warn you that you trades' unionists and Socialists may drive us to that if you don't take care.

E. If we could only drive you to trying it! but it won't go quite in that way, I fear. But I admit that many of you can retire without bringing the whole thing about your ears, and can so take care of yourselves; while the rest of you take care of themselves by going down to their offices and looking at their clerks, and doing other laborious work for four hours a-day when they are not holiday-making.

B. Now, Evans, you are getting unreasonable again; talking about matters you don't understand.

E. Excuse me, Brown, my questions, the answers to which are to enlighten my ignorance, are just going to begin. What are you going to live on when you retire disgusted with 2½ per cent. profits, on what I imagine to be a biggish turnover?

B. (rather crustily) On my earnings.

E. On what you have made?

B. Yes, of course, on the money I have made.

E. Oh! I didn't know you made money, I thought you made soap.

B. Yes, of course. I manufacture soap, but I make money.

E. Manufacture—to make with the hands—soap is a cheapish article. What a lot of soap you must have made with your hands to live on your earnings in the style in which you live! You must be one of the cleverest men alive; I am quite proud of your acquaintance, Brown.

B. Here come these nonsensical paradoxes again! However, go on; go on.

E. Paradoxes? Don't you make the soap with your hands then?

B. Why, you know I don't, not an ounce. Go on with your questions.

E. But you manufacture many tons of it?

B. Why, of course I do. How could I live else?

E. And who does make the soap with his hands which you manufacture?

B. With his hands? Why, I employ over 500 men at my works.

E. Oh! I see! But I can't understand how soap is so cheap then. Because as those men make the soap and you don't, and you I suppose are only a kind of hanger-on or parson to them, of course they must live as comfortably as you do, and like you can retire from business when they are tired of slaving for small profits! How can it be done?

B. (who has mixed for himself, with a grin.) Well, I answer you to keep up the game, because of course you know better than that; the men in my works, the mere workmen, get from 18s. to 30s. a-week.

E. Ah! they need some other people to take care of them then, as long as that lasts. But I want to get at what your manufacturing means in modern speech, since it seems its etymology goes for nothing. You doubtless see to the men's work, superintend the mixing and boiling, and whatever goes on there.

B. I can't say I do; the foremen and managers of the departments do that.

E. And what style do they live in? Can they retire on their earnings? Not that I much care though if they cannot, since the other men cannot.

B. Well, they get £2 and £3 a-week, and the managers more.

E. Well, the soap being made must be sold. Who sells it?

B. It is travelled; the travellers sell it; and then there are the clerks and old Jackson.

E. And could they retire from business and live on their earnings?

B. You heard what I said about the clerks; as for the travellers, no, of course not. Old Jackson might, he has always been a close man; I think he's warm. But look here, of course I know what you are driving at, Evans, and you must admit that I've kept my temper well. Come, now, ask me what I do.

E. Well, I ask it.

B. I'll tell you. First I find the capital, that you understand; and since you must admit that that is necessary, if I'm not to be paid for that what am I to be paid for? Well, then there is my risk consequent on my allowing my property to be used for the production of wealth; then am I to be paid nothing for superintending such a vast affair? and then remember in these days of sharp competition what a job it is to look after the markets and keep pace with the march of commerce. I tell you it's a regular war with the other manufacturers. I say that I earn my money well, much better than if I helped to make a few tons of soap every week; all the more as it's the machines that do it, much more than the men. (Getting hot.) I heartily wish it was all machines and no men; such a bother as we have with them.

E. Shall I tell you a little fable, Brown?

B. Oh, go on—go on!

E. Well, once upon a time the lion and the other carnivorous beasts went a-hunting,¹ and had good sport; and at the end of the day they met to divide the spoil, the lion in the chair. The chairman bade the carcases be separated into four equal portions, besides the guts and other offal, which was put in a heap by itself. Great expectancy there was among the beasts: the leopard purred and waved his tail; the bear rolled about jovially; water ran from both sides of the wolf's mouth; the jackals whined happily;—the fox, though he smiled a good deal, as his custom is, was the only one that seemed uneasy. "Friends," said the chairman, "here is the wealth which our united labour has produced; I thus apportion it according to the sacred rights of property: the first is mine because I am called lion; the second because I kindly allow you to live; the third because of my strength, beauty, and nobility, without which the world were a dull place indeed; as for the fourth, let him touch it who dares; but yonder heap of offal you may divide it amongst you as you please; but if you follow my advice you will consume it with thrift and temperance." So said the lion; and the other beasts, like the law-abiding citizens they were, declared themselves contented.—Well, Brown, it seems to me that the lion managed to take good care of himself.

B. Again I see what you are driving at; but I don't think much of your fable as applied to a captain of industry.

E. Well, you see, Brown, all fables have their weak places, this amongst others. As you have noticed, I suppose, the lion probably did a good share of the hunting, being in that respect quite unlike the captain of industry. But, to leave fable and come to your statement of what you do, you say you find the capital: yes, pretty much as those—individuals—found your pears last night. And as to the risk you run in employing what you have found, I daresay they run some risk in turning these findings into the universal equivalent. As to your payment for superintending such a vast affair, you as good as told me that Jackson in the office and the managers at the works did that: so at any rate don't take too much—the lion's share—for that service. There remains your payment for that war with your brother soap-boilers which you told me about, which I admit under the circumstances seems necessary: yet don't you think it rather rough on those that make the soap that they should have to pay for that incident of its manufacture?

B. Rough on them—what do you mean? What have they got to do with it?

E. Nothing, I admit.

B. Well, you have got some preposterous utopian nonsense in your head, so you had better bring it out at once, since we have got on this unlucky subject again.

E. My utopianism drives me to wishing that the word "manufacture" could be used in its original sense, and that there should be no occasion for using it in its modern sense.

B. Well, you see the fact that it has so changed its sense ought to show you how much more important in the production of wealth is the direction of labour than the labour itself.

E. (softly, as if to himself). H'm: the foremen couldn't retire, nor the managers at the works; Jackson might, perhaps, and you certainly could,—a sliding-scale of usefulness at all events from the foremen downwards: the men who do most get least.

B. You are getting rude again, Evans.

E. I am afraid I shall get ruder presently. I really must say that the—individuals—who—did business—in your pears have a right to claim the title of manufacturers—so far as they went.

B. (emphatically, but not angrily). Meaning that I'm a thief?

E. Well, you are not a thief—morally—not at present; because, till you have heard all I have to say and thought about it, you know no better. But it does seem to me that your very respectable business of manufacturing soap really means stealing soap and selling it, and sticking to the plunder. I admit by the circuitous process of robbing the people who make it.

B. Yes, I thought we should come to it again. However, go on.

E. Well, in for a penny in for a pound. This morning you called stealing the worst kind of war—a beastly miserable destructive vice. Isn't your account of what business is coming to proof positive of that? See what a market you are bringing your pigs to! You have achieved complete success in producing wares marvellously cheap, and the result is, if it stops there, that the workmen, take them all round, are none the better for it; and as for yourselves, the employers, you are threatening to give up employing, because that war which forces you to crush out the life and individuality of your workmen bids fair to ruin yourselves—the conquered conquered and the conquerors undone. All that comes of stealing.

B. Well, Evans, I see I was wrong to think that you were not in earnest. But since you acquit me of the moral guilt of theft—and you must remember, by the way, that here I am in my position, and even supposing I wanted to get out of it, how can I—since you admit what you do admit, why do you use such hard words?

E. Why, in the first place, though I acquit you personally of moral theft, I don't acquit your class: that upas-tree of Cant which overshadows the whole middle-class in this country, and, for aught I know, throughout all civilisation, and poisons every action of our lives, and makes our pleasures, our art, our literature, our would-be aspirations even, sickening to any one who can think of an honest world,—is not this a symptom of our guilt? Year by year we of the middle classes, as we are getting more and more conscious of what ought to be, are getting more and more hateful and contemptible to ourselves and others—building up wrath against the day of wrath. How will the change come? What horrors may you and I live to see! Yes, that is the reason why I use hard words—or plain words—or bitter words, if you will: because I feel them and cannot help it. But, apart from the moral side of things, as to the material "inconvenience," there—

B. There, I admit at once that if you are right in condemning the system as dishonest the "inconvenience" of it—that is, the necessary disturbance and misery—is of course much worse than that which results from what we call stealing now, we respectables. Spasmodic stealing disapproved of by society in general we could almost afford to pass over without notice (when our gardens had not been just spoilt by it); but continuous stealing, approved of by respectability, authority, and religion,—well, if that really is the basis of our classes to-day, I must as an honest man who tries not to be a fool admit that no price would be too high for ridding ourselves of that: riot, ruin, civil war, revolution, would all be a cheap bargain. But you must convince me class society is so founded.

E. I will try to do so. Meantime I can't tell you how glad I am that we have got as far as we have done. When a man can see that the occasional theft of the product of labour is a joke to the theft in one lump of the whole of the raw material and instruments which alone allow labour to be, it is not difficult to argue with him.—Well, old fellow, it's too late now to begin on that "Birth of the Bruce"; so have another glass of grog, and then we'll say good-night in peace and quietness: though it did seem rather like a quarrel at one time.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

TORY LAW-BREAKING.

After the disturbance at Yarmouth reported in our last issue, it was feared that serious violence might be used against the next speaker who went there. However, as the meeting was arranged to be held weekly, our comrades determined to continue it. The following cutting from the Eastern Daily Press of last Friday contains an account of the meeting, and proves the complete defeat of the Tory roughs: "Last night, in accordance with his promise, Fred Henderson, the Socialist lecturer of Norwich, visited Yarmouth for the purpose of addressing a working-class meeting. He arrived by the 6.20 train, and punctually at 7.30 took up his stand in front of the Star Hotel on the Quay. There were several hundred people present awaiting his arrival, and as soon as he appeared a general rush was made to the spot, and a ring was formed round him. Henderson said that during the week he had received various anonymous messages containing threats against him if he ventured to revisit Yarmouth, but he wished them to understand that he should not on any account be deterred from carrying out his intentions. The address was heard throughout with great attention, no attempt being made at disturbance. Special police arrangements had been made in view of a possible emergency."

A. K. Donald also writes: Following up the tactics reported from Lowestoft and Yarmouth, the Birmingham Tories have endeavoured to prevent our meetings here. Finding hustling and the usual kinds of rowdyism of no avail, on Sunday a more serious and deliberate attempt was made to break up one of our meetings. Tarn had held a meeting in the morning at Springhill; I held a successful one in the afternoon at the Bull Ring, and again in the evening a second meeting along with Tarn at the same place; after which at eight o'clock we adjourned to the Council House to hold our usual meeting. I had spoken for twenty minutes when suddenly a bag of flour came smash against my face, then another and another—about a dozen in all. I got off my chair and addressed myself to one of a gang of constables to protect the meeting. The constable, with the usual red-tapeishness of officialdom, referred me to an inspector; so instead of wasting time on the police, I told three friends—Tarn, Shorter, and Barr—to keep a bright look-out, and the moment they saw another bag come to seize the man and hold him at any cost. I then mounted the chair again. By this time the crowd numbered four or five thousand, and I endeavoured to obtain silence. For a few seconds I obtained order, and got my address under way, when a half-full flour-bag came again in my direction. This time the man was noticed, and Shorter, Tarn, and Barr rushed forward to seize him. His name was Price, and he turned out to be a well-known "bruiser," hired by the Conservatives, and used by them as chief of their gang of "chuckers-out." The police moved forward, and a general scrimmage resulted; policemen and their inspector lay on their backs; two of our friends were knocked down and badly mauled by the Tory hired roughs. At last the man was secured between two constables and marched to the lock-up. When I arrived there, almost immediately Farnedale the chief of the Birmingham police appeared on the scene. The upshot was that I was told I should have to summon the Tory bruiser Price, although he was caught red-handed in the act of creating a disturbance and assaulting our comrades. It is rather a mystery to me why I should be at the expense of prosecuting the smasher. It looks uncommonly like an attempt on the part of Mr. Farnedale to put us Socialists to as much trouble as possible.

AMERICAN JUSTICE.—Mr. George S. Turner, a "wealthy cotton-mill owner," of Columbia, South Carolina, has been sentenced to five years' imprisonment for murdering one of his workmen who had asked for more wages. The prisoner was (of course) released on bail pending an appeal. The New York Tribune heads its report of the case "A light verdict for a rich murderer." This employer was an Anarchist; an Anarchist of the L.P.D.L. school, quite a different individual from the workman Anarchist.

BRITAIN.

NAILERS' STRIKE.—The strike in South Staffordshire, which has lasted two months has terminated, the employers having conceded an advance in wages of from 10 to 15 per cent. Many of the operatives have resumed work.

THE LATE STRIKE AT BOLTON.—At the end of the first week after the settlement of the Bolton strike there are still about a thousand men idle, the various firms being unable as yet to find them work. Many will never recover their situations, as over 300 imported men express a determination to remain in the town. Bolton finds employment for over 4000 men in the engineering trades, of whom 1700 were out at the strike.

DOCK LABOURERS.—A well-attended meeting was held last Friday evening at St. Stephen's Schools, Borough, for the purpose of forming a Southwark branch of the Tea Operatives and General Labourers' Association. Addresses expressing sympathy with the movement were delivered, and the proposal to form a branch was adopted with enthusiasm.

LOOKING FOR WORK.—Large numbers of unemployed are pouring into Cheshire in expectation of finding work in cutting the Manchester Ship Canal. Preparations for the actual cutting are being pushed forward between Eastham and Ellesmere Port, Cheshire, but at least another month or two must elapse before the works at the Cheshire end will be in full operation. The canal works will employ several thousands of men.

WELSH MINERS' WAGES.—Notices have been posted at all the Welsh collieries, under the South Wales and Monmouthshire Collieries Association sliding-scale, employing upwards of 20,000 miners, that, as a result of the audit of the coal-owners' books for four months past, the wages payable to the workmen will continue as hitherto.

END OF MINERS' STRIKE.—After enduring the hardships of a two months' strike, the miners in the employ of Messrs. Gilmour and Co., Goatfoot and Burnbank Collieries, resumed work on the old footing last week. The men came out on strike at the request of the union, and were promised hearty support from the members of that body. Funds, however, fell short, and the strike collapsed.

THE DOWLAIS IRONWORKS.—Some consternation was caused in Dowlais on Monday morning on its becoming known that Lord Wimborne, chief proprietor of the Dowlais Iron and Steel Works, had taken a large tract of land in the vicinity of Cardiff Docks whereon to erect steel works of the most advanced type, preparatory to removing the Dowlais works. Almost the entire population of Dowlais (35,000) are dependent on the works.

At a general meeting of the miners of Fife and Clackmannan, held at Dunfermline on Monday, it was unanimously agreed to approve heartily of a national scheme of restriction of out-put by working not more than eight hours per day, taking a holiday each week in districts and one week's holiday simultaneously all over the United Kingdom.

The London and North-Western Company are gradually reducing their hands, small parties of men receiving notice every week. Over 200 men employed in the forges have been thrown idle this week, owing to the rebuilding of the boilers and furnaces. Workers are advised to be thrifty, so that when King Capital requires them to cease work for a time, he will not be called upon for extra poor-rate.

THE CROFTERS.—Some extraordinary revelations were made before the Crofters Commission at Wick last week. The cases under consideration were from the Clyth estate, and from the evidence given it appeared that the landlord gave no receipt for the money paid unless the rent was paid in full. The tenant received a blank bill, to which he had to sign his name on pain of removal. It was then forwarded to the proprietor, who filled it up. The blank bills were not returned to the tenants, but remained in the bank, where they were discounted.

WELSH TINPLATE WORKERS.—In consequence of what is known as a "corner," i.e., a recognised legal mode of swindling, in tin, the Nantyglo, Blaenau, Abertillery, and Pontyminster Tinworks, have closed. This stoppage will affect some 4000 men. The Abercarn Works has also partially stopped for the same reason. The "corner" has so adversely affected the Welsh tin plate trade, that several large works have had to close, and as a consequence more than 20,000 men are thrown out of work. The employers hold out but scanty hope of reopening the works at an early date; and, although they express sympathy for the men, seem also to consider that their own case is a very hard one. The masters will lose their profit: the workers will starve.

REDUCTION OF AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS' WAGES.—In West Somerset an organised attempt is being made to reduce the wages of agricultural labourers; and as they do not belong to the Labourers' Union, there is every probability that the employers will be successful. This is easily accounted for when the number of acres under cultivation—owing to the private ownership of land—is rapidly diminishing. Labourers must either accept smaller wages or flock to the towns. A Cumberland newspaper publishes a list of 133 farms in Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Dumfriesshire which have been advertised to be let during a single week. Some of these farms are of enormous size, especially those on the Dumfries estates of the Duke of Buccleuch; the average size is about 300 acres. Altogether, in these three counties, the whole agricultural acreage of which is but slightly over a million, nearly 40,000 acres are either on the landlord's hands already or are about to be surrendered into them by the tenant.

DOCKYARD DISTRESS.—The Woolwich Board of Guardians have decided to erect a temporary building in rear of the receiving-wards, for the accommodation during the winter of the able-bodied poor who are expected to throw themselves upon the workhouse.—At Chatham the ranks of the unemployed have been much swollen through the heavy discharges which recently took place in the Royal Dockyard; and the prospect for the coming winter is the most gloomy one ever known in this district. The majority of those who have received their discharge from the upper dock-yards and the lower extension works resided in the Bromptons, where there are whole streets well-nigh empty, and sturdy mechanics and labourers are now going round the country in search of work, with their families left at home in a state of destitution. The Medway Union guardians have decided to allow out-relief in these cases.

In the society of the future, when the antagonism of the classes have ceased—when there are no more classes—wages will no longer be determined by the minimum time of production, but the time of production devoted to an article will be determined by its utility.—Karl Marx.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

GERMANY.

On the 24th of the present month the Reichstag will re-open its session, and its first work will be to reaffirm the laws against the Socialists, and most probably to add thereto some new and more despotic paragraphs.

The unemployed of Berlin are relatively as numerous as those here. The position of caretaker at one of the Berlin public meat-markets being vacant, no less than seven thousand candidates applied for the same!

On the 12th inst., the trial of the famous "Central Committee" of the Socialist party, detected at Berlin last July, will commence before the magistrates of the Landgericht. The police hoped to find a great deal of secret documents, and the bourgeois papers at the time spoke in a somewhat mysterious tone about the discovery, but now it appears that they found nothing whatever of a compromising character, and that the whole affair will be a mere farce—nevertheless followed, as is usual in that scandalous land, with a more or less great number of months of prison.

Thirty-eight Socialists are now on their trial at Breslau on a charge of secret conspiracy. In the same town a Socialistic paper has been suppressed, the Breslauer Volksstimme (the Voice of the People). It is impossible for us to notice all the prosecutions against Socialists and Anarchists, which are incessantly reported by the papers. Germany has even surpassed Russia in that respect.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The 27th of last month the first number of a new Socialist paper, Arbeit (Labour), was issued at Vienna, under the editorship of comrade R. Hanser. It is not, exactly speaking, a new paper, although it appears for the first time at Vienna, but rather the continuation of that active and persevering organ of our Austrian comrades which appeared successively at Gratz, Villach, and at Linz, and was everywhere forced to stop its publication by police prosecutions of all kinds. We hope that it now may have a better chance; but we must say our hope is not a very sanguine one. Nevertheless, our comrades deserve the more acknowledgement and encouragement because they have to work under such hard circumstances.

That these circumstances are really intolerable is proved by the fact that comrade Aug. Kreal, the editor of the co-operative paper Bäcker-Zeitung (Baker Journal), the appearance of which we announced in our last Austrian notes, was arrested last Monday week at Vienna. Mind you, that paper is by no means devoted to mere Socialistic propaganda; it is in fact a trade paper, in the narrowest sense of the word.

The German police is not only at home in Germany, but also in Austria—as in fact they are at home everywhere. The Berlin police gave directions to cause the arrest of comrade Franz Süss, an Austrian sculptor, who was apprehended at Vienna because he had distributed Socialistic literature in Austria!

At Frankenthal, comrades Schenk and Betch were sentenced to several months imprisonment for the same "offence."

SWEDEN.

Happy little Sweden is struck with consternation: its two greatest authors, the illustrious poet Bjornsen and the celebrated drama-writer Ibsen have publicly declared themselves Socialists! Ibsen, who had lately come to Stockholm, had been enthusiastically received by the Court, the ministers, the scientists, the professors of the university—in one word, by all the grand monde of the bourgeoisie. He was entertained at dinner by all these magnates, and in answering a toast, in which the orator had spoken of the untold blessings of present society, he said calmly but firmly, "No, no, my friends, don't tell me any longer that we are living in the happiest possible world. On the contrary, our time is only a transient period, out of which a new society will grow. I am convinced that the actual political and social institutions soon will give place to other institutions, which will answer in a far better way the needs of the future. I can't tell you now what that future will be, but one thing is certain, it is to be more just than the present state of things. Socialism only shall make us a happy, worthy and, prosperous mankind." Tableau! His friend Bjornsen has made a similar declaration in one of the greatest Scandinavian papers. The so-called high-classes of Sweden are "ashamed" of the shocking transformation of their best adulated literary men.

BELGIUM.

At Ghent the Socialist party "Vooruit" have issued their yearly 'Socialist Almanack.' It is well worth reading, the best article in it being a biography of Domela Nieuwenhuis, by Croll, editor of Recht voor Allen (Right for All).

The Brussels Federation of the Parti ouvrier (Working-men's Party) intends to do a very good thing indeed—namely, the revision of its statutes. Nine sections will be established: 1. trade associations; 2. co-operative societies; 3. universal suffrage; 4. statistics of work and wages; 5. universal legislation of work; 6. Socialistic presswork; 7. general propaganda; 8. collection of funds; 9. library. We wish our Belgian comrades good success in the fulfilling of their work of reorganisation, and we may add that we are of opinion that they only will succeed if a larger and brighter sense of true revolutionary Socialism penetrates and saturates their labour. A completely new portion of their work will be the creation of a large Socialistic library; and we should like to make here to our Belgian friends a suggestion which perhaps might deserve their consideration. Should it not be possible to institute at Brussels a general Record Office (archives générales) of international Socialistic literature? We feel assured that the existing literature in all tongues would be speedily acquired through the instrumentality of the various Socialistic bodies in every country, and the forthcoming publications would certainly be presented by their publishers or their authors to such a record office, if it were well conducted and of course accessible to all those who wish to study the various branches of political history, social economy, labour statistics, revolutionary class struggles, etc. We need hardly point out the manifold advantages of such an institution, and we think our Belgian friends are in a good position to undertake a work of that kind.

A large and crowded meeting was convened last Sunday at the Navalorama Hall, at Brussels, to protest against the judicial murder which is about to be perpetrated at Chicago. The meeting unanimously passed a resolution, worded in the strongest possible terms, condemning the action of the American judges.

ITALY.

ALESSANDRIA.—The establishment of a new metal-working company has been inaugurated here with a great flourish of trumpets, and much boasting on the philanthropic aspect of the speculation, employment of labour, and all the rest of it. Yet these philanthropists will make a very good thing of it—if they follow all the accumulated traditions of their class, which there is little doubt they will do—for trade is very bad in the neighbourhood, and wages consequently low, and they will get labour at very easy terms; for instance, for a 12 hour's working-day paying 1.50 or 2 lire.

MILAN.—The second Co-operative Congress will take place in Milan, on the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th of November, when the working and management of Co-operative Societies will be discussed.

A good many of the Italian Revolutionary Societies have at their late meetings passed resolutions sympathising with the Chicago Anarchists, whose fate unfortunately is so very near being decided, and expressing indignation at the criminal sentence of death passed against them by American capitalism.

SPAIN.

BILBAO.—A new society is being formed here among the iron and metal-workers; they will have for an organ a paper called the Proletariato.

VILLANUEVA-Y-GELTRU.—A considerable demonstration of working-men and women took place here a little time back. They marched before the municipal buildings and demanded bread and work. The mayor addressed them from a balcony, and advising them to respect "law-and-order," recommended them to retire quietly to their dwellings. Our informant remarks that they obeyed. . . . What a delightful little non sequitur of a manifestation!

BARCELONA.—There is talk of having a Labour Congress in this capital at some time not yet fixed, and the Central Committee has sent out a circular to the different societies to consult with them about the organisation of the same. M. M.

LETTER FROM AMERICA.

THOMAS B. BARRY, of the General Executive Board of the Knights of Labour, has had a hard fight with Powderley, who desired to freeze him out of the order. His views are not popular with men who, like Powderley, are playing a very, very fishy rôle in the Labour movement. Interviewed, he made the following statement:—

"How will the order fare for the next year? Will there be an increase or falling off in the membership?"

"That will depend on the course the general officers will pursue. There is too much tendency to follow in the wake of Red Men and Odd Fellows. The order was organised for a different purpose. If this course continues it will certainly prove disastrous to the best interests of the organisation.

"The Knights of Labour were brought into existence to relieve the social and political miseries complained of by the labouring people. The organisation must not be conducted from the basis of charity, but from the standpoint of justice, for all mankind.

"The masses who compose the organisation must be educated to understand that the success or failure of the order depends upon their individual as well as collective efforts, and that the success of this organisation does not rest with the officials of a local, district, or general assembly, but with themselves. What they are the movement will be. There has been too much agitation, directing the masses to depend on others to do for them what they can best do for themselves. Hero worship has been the curse of the labour movement in Ireland more than once, and it will destroy the labour movement in America if allowed to grow."

The split in the Knights of Labour has happened this week. The action of the official gang of late has been too much for the intelligent honest faction, and they were forced to the alternative of either belonging to an organisation which is rapidly going to the dogs, or to secede speedily. They chose, as it well becomes sincere advocates of labour emancipation, the latter course. If anything will urge the ruling classes to pursue their mad course in hanging the seven Chicago men, it is the criminal action of Powderley and his clique in Minneapolis.

On returning from the Congress, about 35 delegates representing 13 States, stopped in Chicago and drafted a circular, which is addressed to the rank and file of the order. They charge the administration with usurpation of power, gross violation of the laws, with having organised a conspiracy to hold the salaried offices, illegal expenditure of many thousands of dollars, the alteration of the constitution in an illegal manner, etc. They further maintain that nearly every important strike or lock-out in which the general officers interfered was lost.

The development of this business is highly interesting. However, it will be utopian to expect as yet any radical change in the minds of even the seceders. They will continue, in spite of all bitter experience, to build constitutions for organisations to enable them to gain a paltry few more cents. in wages, instead of turning revolutionists to end the present horrible system.

S. E. Shevitch debated with Henry George last Sunday, October 23rd, at Eighth Avenue Theatre, the latter's scheme to substitute a single land-tax for all other methods of taxation as a means to solve the social question. George got worsted beyond description; not even his well-known sophisms could help him out of the dilemma. Shevitch, in summing up, did not even use all the time allotted to him, and confessed his inability to debate with a Rip van Winkle in social economies.

Patrick Ford, of the Irish World, who enabled George to gain an international reputation by sending him over as correspondent of his paper to Europe, on the other hand, declares he cannot support George any longer on account of this gentleman's antagonism to the Pope. This is the coup de grace to the would-be Secretary of State. He has denounced the honest labour element, the Socialists, and is now in turn denounced by the Moderates. George is a dead man. Peace be with his ashes.

What can be done, what will be done, to save our Chicago comrades, I do not know, but strange to say the conviction "They will not be hung" is still gaining more supporters in labour circles.

A mass meeting to protest against the intended brutal assassination of the seven men will be organised to-morrow night, by the New York Knights of Labour at Cooper's Union.

Krapotkin's letter to the French papers is published to-day verbatim by the New York papers.

THE CONDEMNED ANARCHISTS.

Last Thursday, Nov. 3, the news reached London that the Supreme Court of the United States refused to allow the eight condemned Chicago Anarchists a fresh trial. With a thrill of indignation and horror we learned that in one week (on Friday Nov. 11) seven of our comrades were to be hanged. Nothing remained between these men whose only crime is their devotion to the cause of labour, but a forcible rescue or the interference of the Governor of Illinois. Unhappily London workmen are powerless to effect a rescue; they can only during the few days that remain add their weight to the pressure which is being exercised by the workers of America upon the smug middle-class democrat who holds our comrades' lives in his hands, to compel him to do justice and save these innocent men from judicial murder, and the London workmen have set to the task with a will which illustrates the enormous recent growth of the International Labour Movement.

By the combined efforts of Socialists and Radicals, over 16,000 votes of protest have been collected in one day. The following cablegram has been sent from the London Patriotic Club to Governor Oglesby, Springfield, Illinois. "At 49 meetings, Sunday last, 16,405 London working men and women voted protest against execution of sentence on Chicago Anarchists."

The London Patriotic, Haggerston, Borough of Hackney, Hoxton, and East Finsbury Liberal and Radical Clubs have summoned a public meeting in South Place Chapel on Wednesday Nov. 8, at 8 p.m., from which a like resolution of protest will be cabled to Governor Oglesby.

The delegates of several Radical Clubs and of the Labour Emancipation League called upon the American Minister with the same object, on Monday; but with the insolence of your true Middle-class Republican, he refused to see them.

Further, a petition calling upon the Governor of Illinois not to sadden the Centenary of the Republic with the execution of men "who have already endured a death-agony of more than a year," is being signed by humane men and women of all classes whose names may carry some weight in America. It is to be cabled on Wednesday night. The only dissentient voices are the politicians and the Positivists. The M.P.'s are afraid of offending their propertied constituents, and the priests of Humanity are—lawyers.

The quick sympathy shown by London workmen for the Chicago martyrs, is a most significant sign of the increase of both solidarity and revolutionary feeling amongst the proletariat. C. WILSON.

SOCIALIST DEFENCE ASSOCIATION.

An Association has now been formed of Socialists who are willing to stand by their poorer comrades, now so unjustly persecuted by the police authorities, and to secure them at least a fair hearing before they are thrown into prison.

This Association consists of householders willing to offer bail for persons arrested for taking part in public meetings, and of members who guarantee costs to the amount of £2 2s. each.

The Association will only pledge itself to bail members of Socialist organisations, as these may fairly be supposed to act upon principle, and are not likely to endeavour to escape trial.

If any bail should be forfeited, the amount will be shared among the members of the Association, but care will be taken that no risk shall be incurred by the bailing of unknown persons.

As poor men are brought up, condemned upon police evidence, and sentenced without chance of defence, the Association desires, by offering bail, to obtain time for defence, and, by instructing a solicitor, to prevent the infliction of unjust punishment on undefended men.

Six cases have already been attended to by the Association, but it is sorely in need of funds, and of an increased number of bail.

Socialists are earnestly begged to help the work of this Association in whatever way they can. The police tyranny is becoming intolerable, and Socialists who do not risk their persons are bound to help with their purses.

News of any arrest should be at once communicated to Annie Besant, 63, Fleet Street, E.C., and exact details should be sent as to the place to which the prisoner has been conveyed.

Donations may be sent to the Secretary, or to the Rev. S. D. Headlam, 31, Upper Bedford Place, W.C. Persons willing to serve as bail, or to become members, should communicate with the Secretary. ANNIE BESANT, Secretary.

IN presence of the doom that has befallen our comrades, of the cowardly vengeance wreaked upon them by the bourgeois of Illinois for the fear felt before treachery gave them into their hands, words fail; it is hard even to speak a tithe of the thought and feeling that seek expression. Every Socialist in all the world has before his eyes the image of the gallows whereon the four have died, and the shadow of the prison wherein their comrades are to linger out a death in life. To the resolute a new edge added to their stern hatred of class-rule and its evil fruits; to the half-hearted a clear warning of the risk they run, a call for them to choose between unhonoured safety and the dangers of truth; to the dullard or dilettante a rude awakening to the harsh reality of the war we wage and the penalty that must be paid for taking part therein.

The four men who have been done to death have died for their belief; those who in Rome were flung to the lions, who in Smithfield were burned alive for a similar offence, that they taught the overthrow of legalised wrong, are counted saints and held sacred in men's memories. So also will be these men of Chicago. From their birth was the record of their doings, alike of those that are dead and those who live, searched minutely for aught that might discredit them—and searched in vain. They were men of honest and clean lives, against whom none could cast a stone—and they have died for their belief. Whenever men have tried to stay the march of Truth by slaying her servants the attempt has failed; the cause for which men died martyrs has inevitably won; the stake, the whip, the scaffold have had no power over thought, but making men speak under their breath and laying up a tenfold woe for that state in which the folk dared but whisper their discontent.

Be it noted also that in times past mere death has not been deemed enough to deter men from the holding "dangerous" opinions; torture of one kind or another has been brought in to heighten the terror of dissolution and strike dismay into unruly minds. To-day, under a thin coat of polished hypocrisy, the bourgeois are as full of sordid cruelty as was ever the worst of all the Inquisitors they execrate. With a myriad means at hand for insuring a sharp and sudden death, the vindicators of law and order in Chicago designedly prolonged the death-agony of our four comrades for a quarter of an hour less one minute. For fourteen minutes did the "respectables" of Chicago stand gloating over the spectacle of four men struggling in the throes of gradual death; pluming themselves, no doubt, that now at least their property was safe and the revolution crushed. Nor did they see what it was they were doing; how by their own act they were preparing a Red Terror that shall be with them night and day, that shall be an unspoken fear at all their feasts, a spectre of dread beside their couches, and a final ruin pending over their profit-hunting enterprises. How shall it be wondered at if those who knew the four and loved them take into their own hands the blood-atonement of their murder? Will not the remembered horror of those fourteen minutes freeze any word of "moderation" upon the lips of those who would speak it? Will not it also strike away from under capitalism one of its trustiest supports, the respect for law among the masses, the belief in its embodiment of justice? Will it not prove a striking lesson to the workers of all lands in the hollow mockery of bourgeois morality, bourgeois freedom, bourgeois civilisation?

When courage wanes for awhile and hope is shaken, the memory of those who died so bravely and the thought of those in prison who would gladly have died also, will hearten us to fresh effort and renew our faith in the only cause for which men can now be heroes and martyrs like those of old. Far above the petty game of politics, or the squabbling of rival creeds, these men stand out on a nobler height, a sublimer level; their heroism has lifted them out of the world in which men bargain and get rich, into the purer air in which stand Huss and Bruno and all those great souls whose lives were spent that Man might live. S.

LONDON IN A STATE OF SIEGE.

SIR CHARLES WARREN has kept his promise and prevented the meeting organised by the Radical Clubs. From the military point of view he has been eminently successful, and deserved to be so, and it is now proper that we should make him a peer of the realm and Commander-in-Chief of the British forces, if he will kindly consent to waive the title of Emperor or three-tailed Bashaw or whatever else is the proper nick-name of a supreme and irresponsible ruler. Sir Charles, I repeat, made his military dispositions admirably, and revolutionists should study them, since they have had a little piece of real war suddenly brought to their notice. The "Square," i.e., the sunken space, was guarded by foot-policemen four deep, whose business was simply to guard it and who had orders not to stir from their posts; outside these were strong bodies of horse-police who took careful note of any incipient gathering and at once scattered it.

This defence was ample against anything except an organised attack from determined persons acting in concert and able to depend on one another. In order that no such body should be formed and no such attack be possible, the careful general had posted strong bodies of police, with due supports to fall back on if necessary, about a radius of about a quarter of a mile of the Square, so that nothing could escape falling into the meshes of this net.

Into this net then we marched. The column in which the comrades of the League were, started from Clerkenwell Green in company with the Patriotic Club and some of the East-end clubs, including a Branch of the S. D. F. I see the correspondent of the Daily News estimates this column at 6000, but I think that is an exaggeration. Anyhow, we marched in good order through Theobalds' Road, and up Hart Street, crossing Oxford Street and Shaftesbury Avenue without attack from the police, but we had no sooner crossed the latter street and were about to enter the Seven Dials streets to make our way to St. Martin's Lane, than the attack came, and it was clearly the best possible place for it. The divergence of the streets would confuse any procession which had lost its rallying point; the side streets and the width of the thoroughfare at the spot gave a good opportunity for a flank charge, and at our rear was the open space of Shaftesbury Avenue to allow a charge in that quarter to finish us up after the attack on front and flank. It was all over in a few minutes: our comrades fought valiantly, but they had not learned how to stand and turn their column into a line, or to march on to the front. Those in front turned and faced their rear, not to run away, but to join in the fray if opportunity served. The police struck right and left like what they were, soldiers attacking an enemy, amidst wild shrieks of hatred from the women who came from the slums on our left. The band instruments were captured, the banners and flags destroyed, there was no rallying point and no possibility of rallying, and all that the people composing our once strong column could do was to straggle into the Square as helpless units. I confess I was astounded at the rapidity of the thing and the ease with which military organisation got its victory. I could see that numbers were of no avail unless led by a band of men acting in concert and each knowing his own part.

What happened to us happened, as I hear, to the other processions with more or less fighting. An eye-witness who marched up with the western column told me that they were suddenly attacked as they came opposite the Haymarket Theatre, by the police rushing out on them from the side streets and immediately batoning everybody they could reach, whether they resisted or not. The column, he said, was destroyed in two minutes, though certainly not quite without fighting; one brave man wrapping his banner torn from the pole round his arm and facing the police till he was hammered down with repeated blows.

Once in the Square we were, as I said, helpless units, especially as there were undoubtedly a good many mere spectators, many of them club gentlemen and other members of the class which employs Warren. Undoubtedly if two or three hundred men could have been got to make a rush on the cordon of the police, especially at the south-east corner the crowd could have swarmed into the Square, and if the weakest of the columns could have reached the Square in order this could easily have been done. But the result would probably have been a far bloodier massacre than Peterloo; for the people, once in the Square, would have found themselves in a mere penfold at the mercy of the police and soldiers. It is true that as matters went, there seemed very little need for the appearance of the latter, so completely were the police, horse and foot, masters of the situation; and the great mass of the people also round the Square was composed of Radicals, very angry it is true at the horrible brutality with which they had been treated by Warren's men, but by no means strung up to fighting pitch. So that I was fairly surprised, the crowd being then quite quiet, to see the Life Guards form at the south of the Square and march up towards St. Martin's Church with the magistrate at their head (a sort of country-gentleman-looking imbecile) to read the Riot Act. The soldiers were cheered as well as hooted by the crowd, I think under the impression that they would not act as brutally against the people as the police: a mistaken impression, I think, as these gorgeous gentry are just the helmeted flunkies of the rich and would act on their orders just as their butlers or footmen would. A little after this a regiment of the foot-guards made their appearance with fixed bayonets, and completed the triumph of law and order.

Sir Charles Warren has thus given us a lesson in street fighting, the first point of which is that mere numbers without organisation or drill are useless; the second, which ought also to be noted, is the proper way to defend a position in a large town by a due system of scouts, outposts, and supports.

We Socialists should thank our master for his lesson, and so pass on from considering the military aspect of the case to its civil aspect. Warren has won a victory, but on what terms! It is clear from what is above printed that he would not have been thoroughly successful if he had not had a free hand given him: if he had not attacked citizens marching peaceably through the streets in just such a way as banditti might do, destroying and stealing their property, they would have been able to claim their right of meeting in Trafalgar Square in such a way that nothing but sharp shot and cold steel could have dealt with them. London has been put under martial law, nominally for behoof of a party, but really on behoof of a class, and war (for it is no less, whatever the consequences may be) has been forced upon us. The mask is off now, and the real meaning of all the petty persecution of our open-air meetings is as clear as may be. No more humbug need be talked about obstruction and the convenience of the public: it is obvious that those meetings were attacked because we displeased the dominant class and were weak. Last Sunday explains all, and the bourgeois now goes about boasting that he is the master and will do what he likes with his slaves. Again, the humbug is exposed of the political condemnation of coercion by Act of Parliament in Ireland, when here in London we have coercion without Act of Parliament; and the feeble twittings of the Daily News will be received with jeers by the triumphant Tories.

And the greatest humbug which Sunday's events have laid bare is "the protection afforded by law to the humblest citizen." Some simple people will be thinking that Warren can be attacked legally for his murderous and cowardly assaults of Sunday. I say Warren, because 'tis no use beating the stick that beats you. Some perhaps will think that there may be a chance of his getting a few years penal servitude for inciting to riot and murder. But these persons forget that he has been ordered to act as he did just as he ordered his brigands, and that Salisbury and Co. who ordered him have done so at the orders of the class which they represent. They have made the laws, but have never intended to keep them when inconvenient. It has now become inconvenient to keep them—and in consequence we must think ourselves lucky to be only beaten by the policeman's baton if the bourgeois don't like us—lucky to get off the six months' or twelve months' imprisonment which is likely to accompany such an accident. In short, the very Radicals have now been taught that slaves have no rights. The lesson is a painful one, but surely useful to us boastful Englishmen: nay, in the long run it is necessary.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

HOW DIFFERENT FROM LONDON!!—The following extract from a letter by the Jaggayyapeta correspondent of the Madras People's Friend has a familiar ring about it: "The police here, as elsewhere, are more a curse than a boon to the people, and are indulging themselves in every kind of mischief. Village officials and shopkeepers form the chief objects of their prey. Innumerable are the false charges got up by them, and many are the persons suffering from their oppression. No mention need be made here of the bribery in this line, as everyone knows full well about it." Of course in London civilisation and Christianity together have guarded us against all this.

If capital insists on hanging men for political utterances, as it does in Chicago, what will it crave as punishment for political acts? Will it institute the stake, the rack, the thumbscrew and other Christian modes of convincing workmen that they had better lie still in the frying pan? But consistency is not a jewel in the crown of Pluto. The devil heats his furnace as hot for infants not a span long as for sinners old in iniquity, and a man might as well die for a sheep as a lamb. But suppression of free speech by hanging a few speakers will only close the valve through which extra pressure of discontent finds vent. Men cannot be convinced that they are wrong by hanging their friends for telling them they are right.—Winsted Press.

It was not Endacott alone who was on his trial the other day. It was Mr. Newton, and to some extent, Mr. Matthews also. A mere policeman might easily have been sacrificed to popular wrath, but alas, our rulers could not throw Endacott over and spare the others. They would have all hung together, hence the judicial joke of Mr. Justice Stephens' decision. We have gained something by the whole affair; a new word has been added to the English language. We all know what "boycotted" means, though the word is of recent origin. In future, when anyone finds himself in gaol through the stupidity or the hard swearing of a police constable, we shall say he has been "Endacotted."—Norwich Daylight.

"BROKEN CISTERNS."

WE Socialists are often asked to justify our revolutionary position; we are urged to show cause why we should seek to remodel society on a different basis instead of going on improving that which has grown up on the present one. Our questioner dilates upon all the improvements that have been made, especially in the last 50 years. He points to the spread of education and educational facilities, to the repeal of the laws against trades' unions, and their consequent spread, which resulted in raising the wages of most skilled trades, the amount of rise being variously stated at from 25 to 50 per cent. Then they point to the laws passed to prevent the overwork of children, to enforce sanitary arrangements, and to ensure the safety of the workers in mines and on the sea. They point triumphantly to the reduction of pauperism, and they try to persuade us that things are on the mend, and that we have only to go on in the same direction to put things as right as they ever can be in this world. They would have us believe that all action in the future must be a carrying on of the policies of the present political parties; they call us impractical dreamers and all the rest of it, and finally go off to the caucus meeting to do their share in carrying on things as they have been going. While our friends are thus engaged, let us see how it is that Socialists are such unreasonable fellows that they are discontented with all these methods of improvement, and declare that nothing short of a complete change in the basis of society will avail. The best order, I think, will be to begin by examining the various agencies, political and social, through which it is hoped that improvement will be brought about; trying to see what ground there is for hope in each case, and why each and all must fail to produce the amelioration hoped for.

We will begin with the political agencies, and here we have two main parties, Conservative and Liberal, with a third, Radical, which is practically the advanced part of the Liberal. Now what is the aim of each of these parties, what is the theory of society on which they base their action? The first thing which strikes us is that their actions are not based on any consistent theory of society at all, but form a series of empirical or experimental laws passed under temporary pressure, with only a small amount of thought given to the all important question of what consistent form of society is aimed at. Opportunism best expresses the moving principle of our legislation; this is largely the result of our basis of party government by which it becomes the chief duty of a party when in office to keep there, when out of office to get there; the legislation is planned chiefly to this end, and only secondarily for the good of the community. There are, of course, individual exceptions who look more to the good of the community than to party, but they can only exert any telling influence when their advice does not happen to make much against party interests.

The Conservative party, in so far as it is more than a mere drag on progress, has or had some definite theory of society; it is not content with a society which consists of a mere assembly of unconnected units, but looks for some organisation. Looking back it finds that in olden times society consisted of various grades and classes, all depending one on another, having mutual duties and fixed relations; the lower classes depended upon the higher for protection and guidance, and in return gave them homage and wealth. In those good old days a man knew his place and did not aspire to be as good as his master, but was content to do as he was told. The thinking part of the Conservative party sees some such theory of social organisation in the past, and hopes to establish a similar system again rather modified to suit modern times. The rich and noble will govern the land, and will look after the poor, teach them to respect their betters, and generally take a paternal interest in them, for which services the poor are to work for them and show them respect, and all the rest of it. Have we anything to hope from this? Not much, I think; surely when a system has been tried in the past and society has outgrown it, there is little use in wishing to try it again. The coat which a boy outgrows he can never wear again; so with society, it will not return to an outgrown system, and if it should the result would be anything but happy. Society may take the discarded principles of some old system and come back to them again on a higher level. So society may take the principle of organisation which there was in the old times, and coming back to that we may again have an organised society instead of a concourse of atoms, but it will be on quite a higher level. Conservatism in so far as it has an ideal of organised society is superior to the other parties, but, unfortunately, its ideal is borrowed from the past and only suitable for the past. Hence it is that Conservatives in office are forced by the irresistible pressure of social development to pass laws in direct opposition to their ideal.

We next come to the Liberal party. Now if we come to consider the matter we can imagine a society such as the Conservative would wish for, we can imagine a society such as the Socialist would wish for; the ideal society of the Individualist or Anarchist can be to some extent imagined, the same with the ideal of the Positivist; but what is the ideal of the Liberal party? We are stumped. All we can think of is our own country after two or three reforms which the Liberal party are talking about shall have passed. The Liberal party is a party without an ideal or consistent aim, there are sections in it holding each of the ideals named above, hence its actions are empirical; it does a bit here, a bit there, according as pressure is put on it or circumstances dictate; it lives from hand to mouth trying to make the present system do by rushing wildly to any point where there is unusual friction, passing at odd times some good and useful measures, but failing to see any future ideal to which all shall be made to tend, and failing to make its measures consistent one with another. At one time it coerces those who seek for something, at another it grants the request; at one time it favours individual enterprise and competition, at another it starts a government department to lessen the same. All this applies to the Radical as to the Liberal; the Radical has no consistent ideal before him, unless it be a political one. He may be a Republican and call that his ideal, but that has little to do with the social question; his ideal is realised in America, and there is the same social question to be solved there. What have we then to hope from this party without an ideal? Evidently nothing but what we can make them do to improve details of society as it at present exists. They may be convenient as a squeezable party, but the point I wish to urge is that their work is done without any definite aim for the final improvement of society. The organisation of society can only be accomplished by a body of men who know what is needed, and are bent on getting that and nothing else, making any intermediate measures preparatory to their purpose. The Liberal party has originated as a destructive agent to pull down the ancient form of society; it has done its work, and has no constructive ideal to place before us. What does its programme at present consist of? A few more reforms in the constitution, a little more responsibility thrown on to an employer for the lives of his men, some economies in the national expenditure, and some decentralisation of power. Well, some of them are good, let us take them if they come in our way; but when we have them all how much nearer shall we be to proceeding with the organisation of society unless we have found some consistent ideal to aim at? How much nearer is America, with all its Republican institutions, to solving its social problems than we are? And if the majority were convinced of the advantage of any definite form of society and wished to establish it, do you think they would let our political institutions stand three months in the way? And yet some would urge that we should spend our time for years to come in getting hold of the power without being able to decide what we should then do with it. If the people can once be shown how they can organise society in a way that shall be better for all, they will not be slow to seize the power; until then they will not trouble much about it. Probably one of the chief reasons why the people are content to leave political power in the hands of the landlords and capitalists, although they expect little from them, is that they do not see how they could use it to much purpose if they had it.

We see that there is no solution of our social problems to be hoped for from the existing political parties; true one party offers us greater political power, well we have no objection to that, only it is not much good to us till we have found out how to use it in such a manner as to do away with the misery of modern society!

We must next turn to social agencies, and see what hope is offered us there. The professors of the science of political economy claim our attention first. Strictly, they have not much to do with our question, because they start on the assumption that the present basis of society is right, and they seek to find the laws which in this system govern the production and distribution of wealth, but practically they have been obliged to extend their scope and to mingle with the scientific investigation of phenomena, as they exist under our system, a certain amount of discussion about the basis of that system, whether it is the best and most just one. I think this has been to some extent unfortunate, as their reasoning has been more a defence of the system which their science explains, put forward to make their science a little more popular, than an honest search for the best form of society. We do well to study what they have to tell us about our present system, and also their defence of it, but I fear we have not much to hope from them in the way of improvement. Modern economists are more and more going towards Socialism, and any improvement they have to offer in the future comes from Socialism rather than their own science. I think the course of events since the science was started shows that it has been useful as a means of clearing away many old and noxious customs and laws, but that it is useless as a constructive science. It was well qualified to make the present system as perfect as it is capable of becoming, but it is not suitable to clear away evils inherent in the system or to suggest a better. It did good service in exploding the idea that money was the only form of wealth worth having, and in clearing away foolish restrictions on trade. But when the commencement of the present century saw the vast revolution in industry caused by the rapid introduction of machinery, when men were thrown out of work and in their desperation destroyed the machines, when huge fortunes were made by the few out of the machines which plunged many into destitution, what had the economists to suggest then? All they could say was, "Let alone, let them be; it will all come right in time, our system is a wonderful system, is a beautiful system, it accommodates everything to its wants, those who are useless to it are crushed out, and only those whom it wants survive; this misery is only just the necessary part of changes, it will all come right in time." Such was the answer of the economists, and the ruling powers believed it, the more easily because it paid them best to follow the advice. The system has gone on crushing out those it does not require, for the time when things come right never arrives; as fast as one thing rights itself there is another change come which has to be righted. It is like the promise of "Jam, to-morrow!" but never jam to-day! And now we are beginning to see that man was not made for a system, to be fostered or crushed out according as that system needs or does not need him, but that systems are made for men, and that a system is good if it fosters all men and tends to raise and improve them, not good because it happens to be able to crush out those who do not fit it.

THE DAY AFTER.

It lashed me like the scourge of Fate,
I could not work, I could not rest,
So fierce a flood of wrath and hate
Was raging in my breast;
I could not rest, and turning north
From the huge town, I hastened forth
To tire my restless limbs, and then
Think calmly of those murdered men.

By meadow-green and coppice bare
And homely brook I sped my way;
It seemed that Nature did not care
To mourn for yesterday.
Nor down each grassy village street,
Or windy common, did I meet
One son of toil who had desied.
It was for him our comrades died.

Not Nature's carelessness I chide,
But the dull apathy of men,
Contented meekly to abide
Mewed in a hopeless pen.
Because their fathers wore a chain,
They bow the head and bear the pain,
And rot, unknowing of their worth,
Whilst Labour is true lord of earth.

Yet not in vain ye died, I know,
In witness of the world to come;
Sure your reward, if haply slow;
Your deed shall not be dumb.
Though slighted now, a crown of glory
Shall yet, ere long, bedeck your story,
And ye, with many a one, shall stand
Transfigured in the martyr-band.

See, with his foot upon the prey,
In seeming triumph Mammon stands,
And wipes contemptuously away
The crimson from his hands.
But ten times precious is the blood
That is poured out for brotherhood,
And when the hour at last is here,
This deed shall cost the monster dear.

But yonder, lo, far hence withdrawn
Through miles of night, fast stealing on,
That hideous mockery of the dawn,
The glare of Babylon,—
Our battlefield, whereon, at length,
Spoilers and spoiled shall measure strength;
Even now they gird them for the fray,
Fearing and hoping for the day.

C. W. BECKETT.

"A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT!"

MR. CREMER, M.P., one of the "Carnegie crew" at present in America crying "Peace, peace, when there is no peace," has been interviewed by a New York Herald reporter. After polishing off "the State of Europe," and delivering himself of the usual Peace Association twaddle, he proceeded to "write" himself "down an ass" in the following fashion:—

"What is the extent of the Anarchist, Communistic, and 'black flag' movement in Great Britain?"

"The Social Democracy has a following of course, arising out of the large number of unemployed in Great Britain and the distress consequently existing throughout the country. The distress is more extended and more acute than I have ever known it to be. In fact our commercial prosperity is a thing of the past, and I doubt if it will ever be revived."

"But what is the character of the 'black flag' demonstrations recently held in Trafalgar Square?"

"I have no doubt that these movements are promoted by the Social Democrats, but my impression is that the majority of the people who take part in such disturbances have not only 'got no work to do,' but 'want no work to do.' I have made it a point to mix with them in Trafalgar Square, and I think that the majority of them were loafers, though there are certainly some decent fellows among them."

The reporter calling upon Mr. Cremer nearly mistook the "big" man for "a cow-boy on a tour," and thus describes his "get-up":—"Dressed peculiarly—a soft white hat, coloured flannel shirt without a collar, heavy light overcoat, with pale fur collar and cuffs; a business suit of coarse material, yellow leather shoes."

I fancy, however, that an average cow-boy who had spent three weeks in London would have been able to give a more intelligent answer than the foregoing. But then the cow-boy would probably give the result of his own unbiassed observation; he would not have to "square" his views to meet the wishes of the "upper crust" people who patronise the "washy-washy" workingmen who hire themselves out for deputations.

What should a "respectable" working-man Member of Parliament, and confere of such eminent individuals as Andrew Carnegie, Lord Kinnaird, Lord Herschell, Sir Lyon Playfair, etc., have to do with such vulgar wretches as Socialists and lower class loafers? "Oh! 'Respectability,' what fantastic tricks are committed in thy name!"

THE BETTER WAY.—Mr. William Hurman, the new Mayor of Bridgwater, has expressed his disapproval of the customary banquet given to the corporation, and intimated that he intends, instead of giving the usual dinner in the town hall, to give a dinner between this time and Christmas to all recipients of outdoor relief in Bridgwater. He hopes that the town councillors, who are never in want of a good dinner, will attend and assist as carvers.

NOTES ON NEWS.

"Who drives fat oxen" need not "himself be fat," but assuredly "who preaches wisdom should himself be wise." Poor Professor Tyndall has been making a spectacle of himself again. Some wonder and many laugh. He is a standing illustration of the adage which warns a cobbler against wandering from his last, but is so little conscious of it that his latest project is one of such wandering on an extended scale: all "scientific" men are to give their opinion of Home Rule, etc.

As men their opinion is worth pretty near as much as that of any others; as scientists, their opinion is worth having on their own subjects but of no account on political matters. That they may know all about some department of nature does not show them capable of judging men. Indeed it is notorious that they are specially out of place in the workaday affairs of the world: "They will measure ground by geometry, set down limits, divide and subdivide, but cannot yet prescribe quantum homini satis (how much is enough for man) or keep within compass of reason and discretion."

The Lord Mayor's tomfoolery has passed off as usual, except that the curses and hisses were louder and sharper, and the cheers fewer than ever before. The rain and cold kept the unemployed from holding a meeting, and so the police had no chance of hatching up a riot. As one looked at the sorry spectacle and thought upon what it meant, and the bitter contrast it emphasised, the question rose again and again to the onlooker's lips, "How long will it last?"

"Law and order" is getting along merrily. During the past week there has again and again been recorded some stupidity on the part of the authorities, or of brutality on the part of the police. Tuesday's papers had the story of the mishaps which befell Mr. Walter Arter, timber merchant and prominent Conservative. Because he consented, when appealed to, to go to the police-station as a witness for a man he saw arrested, he himself was captured, tried, imprisoned, stripped, bathed, dressed in convict attire, etc. Of course, he has no remedy, although he has been able to expose the perjury of the police!

Wednesday we read of the arrest of Mr. Bennet Burleigh, the well-known war correspondent, who, for no other reason that can be seen than that the police were even exceeding their average behaviour, was hauled off to King Street police-station, where the assembled constables greeted him with yells of "Bloody German" (!) and the like. We go to press before the result of this "little affair" is known, as Mr. Burleigh quite rightly refused to be shuffled out of Court, and comes up again on Thursday.

Mr. Winkes, another journalist arrested with Mr. Burleigh, but who had been speaking, was credited by the police evidence with having said that "in France they understand organisation," and "they should organise as the French did," and that "they had had revolutions there in recent years; and, my God, if it were not sedition, I would say it is time we had one here." But it was carefully suppressed that he immediately afterwards went on to say (as reported in the Daily News) that "a peaceable and commercial revolution might be brought about by combination." The notorious Superintendent Shepherd's explanation of his failure to report the last sentence was that he regarded it as another subject immaterial to the matter which had preceded it!

John Oldland, indicted for having, on the 18th of October, riotously disturbed the peace, and also for assaulting two constables "in the execution of their duty," was accorded at the Middlesex Sessions on Thursday the 10th, by Judge Edlin, what even the ordinary press admits is a "vindictive sentence." The prosecution withdrew the first count with regard to rioting, and relied on the counts charging the assaults. The jury found the prisoner guilty, and the Assistant Judge sentenced him to six months' imprisonment with hard labour for each assault, making twelve months in all. He was also ordered to find two sureties in £25 each and enter into his own recognisances in £50 to be of good behaviour for a subsequent term of twelve months, in default of finding such sureties to be imprisoned as a second-class misdemeanant for two months.

The notorious procuress and bawd, Mrs. Jeffries, was brought up at the same place and before the same judge as Oldland, next day (Friday), but met with very different treatment. Her friend, Mr. Edlin, could not screw up his courage to sentence her, though she had been duly found guilty. She is to remain in custody till next Sessions and then be sentenced. Can this mean that she is held back until forgotten a bit, so that she may be let off the more easily?

Sir Charles Warren's attempt to apply his methods of order-keeping in Cairo to London, was handicapped from the beginning by his inability to flog and fling in prison and hang men, women, and children without trial, as he was wont to do; wherefore he has been borrowing leaves from the books of Mitchelstown and Chicago—with what result is known!

I commend to Sir Charles Warren the perusal of the Illinois Conspiracy Law given on another page; it will simplify matters considerably for him if he can get it passed by the English Legislature; it assuredly will aid him in the cold-blooded and brutal work in which he is engaged, which is his function.

The way in which the press has treated the Irish and Free Speech Questions is very instructive, the Pall Mall being the only paper that has even tried to be consistent. The Daily News endorses Free Speech in Ireland, but calls for Coercion in London; the Daily Chronicle broke down for a moment in its dishonest career, and admitted that Coercion was wrong—out of Ireland! Of the whole ruck of daily papers there is but one which has not pandered and truckled to law-breaking authority, either in London or Ireland. Among the weeklies of course Reynolds speaks out well; the rest hobble along gracefully, as near the hedge as may be.

A DREAM OF QUEER FISHES.

(A MODERN PROSE-IDYLL.)

"As the sleeping hound dreams of the chase, so the fisherman dreams of fishes." Thus says the old Greek poet Theocritus; and that the same thing is true even to the present day may be seen from the strange dream dreamed by Joe, the Commissioner of Fisheries, as he was on his way to America to manage the fishy business of the firm of Salisbury and Co., whose service he had lately entered. Now Joe was thoroughly familiar with every kind of bait and fishing-tackle, having been apprenticed as a youth to a grand old fisherman, a regular old piscatorial hand, who carried on certain deep-sea fisheries, in which Joe soon became very expert, and was regarded by his master as his right-hand man. But unfortunately Joe had been always on the look-out for bettering himself, until at last he and the old man had words, and Joe rashly gave a month's notice and left the service in which he was doing so well. After this Joe had set up service on his own account, but finding it did not prosper, and being still very bitter against his old employer, he had become commercial traveller to the rival firm above-mentioned—a post for which he was specially qualified, through his proficiency in the piscatorial language usually known as "Billingsgate."

So Joe was now in mid-voyage for America; and it happened that one night, after thinking a great deal by day of the fishy business on which he was embarked, he dreamed that he had fallen overboard and was surrounded by a vast multitude of fishes. Herring, mackerel, mullet, whiting, turbot, cod, haddock, soles, eels, oysters—every fish, great and small, was there, from a whale to a sprat. It was, in fact, a Public Meeting of sea-fish into which Joe had suddenly entered—and just at that very moment the chair (a relic of a sunken vessel) was being taken by the Old Man of the Sea. It was a great annoyance to Joe in his dream to find that there was an Old Man even in this submarine assembly, especially as he seemed to detect in his features a lurking resemblance to his old employer; but what alarmed him still more was the hostile feeling which evidently animated the scaly meeting against himself. Each fish as he sailed round to his seat rolled a glassy eye on Joe with a very sinister expression; but Joe, smart fellow that he was, cocked his eyeglass in return and did his best to stare them out of countenance. Now fish, as we all know, are dumb; so in this Public Meeting there could not, on their part at least, be any delivery of speeches; yet, strange to say, Joe's conscience told him clearly enough what was the object of the meeting and how he himself was concerned with it. These fish were met for the purpose of demanding Home Rule, which he, as Commissioner of Fisheries, had the power of giving them—nay, more, which he had formerly pledged himself to give them (such was the extraordinary conviction by which he was possessed in his nightmare) and had since broken his promise.

Every eye was now turned on Joe, and there was a twinkle on the features of the Old Man of the Sea as he invited him by a courteous gesture to reply to the complaints which, though unspoken, were plainly understood. What was Joe to say, and in what language could he address a company of fishes? Suddenly the happy thought occurred to him that he might address them in Billingsgate; so, leaping on an old fragment of a wreck, he poured out one of his vigorous harangues. The upshot of his speech, as far as it could afterwards be remembered—for, as is the way in dreams, it was rather vague and illogical—was that the Home rule he had once promised them was not what they now demanded, but Canadian Home Rule, and that as they were a shoal of rascally, gaping, cold-blooded conspirators, he was now determined not to give them any Home Rule at all. He further managed to recommend them, in choicest Billingsgate, one and all to go about their business—the herrings to be cured, the mackerel to be pickled, the oysters to be scalloped, the cod to be crimped, the lobsters to be potted, and the eels to be skinned alive. Such was Joe's spirited oration; but, if the truth be told, he soon repented of it, for he quickly found that he had got a pretty kettle of fish on his hands. So far from knocking under to Joe's bluster, the fish had one and all got their backs—or rather, their dorsal fins—up, and came round him in vast numbers, with the evident intent of making him food for fishes. In vain poor Joe, who now inwardly cursed himself for his temerity, entreated them to shake fins and be friends again, promising to use his influence with his new employer to obtain for each one of them three acres of good submarine pasturage and a sea-cow. For they would have none of it—nothing but Home Rule would satisfy them, and it seemed even that was now to be preceded by the execution of Joe. For at a signal from the Old Man of the Sea, whose face wore a stern yet half-amused expression, a sword-fish appeared on the scene, while two large eels, even more slippery than Joe himself, began to pinch Joe and lead him towards a block of water-logged timber which lay on the ocean floor. It was a fearful moment; for, as is usual in nightmares, Joe could stir neither hand nor foot, and even his voice failed him as he tried to call aloud to his old pals to come to his assistance. However, just as the sword-fish was about to strike, Joe woke with a cry and found himself once more in his comfortable cabin.

Such was Joe's dream, which he remembered for a long time afterwards, the thing which dwelt longest in his memory being perhaps the sort of pitying half-smile on the face of the Old Man of the Sea when poor Joe, in the extremity of his despair, offered the three acres and a sea-cow as a substitute for the Home Rule which he had first promised and afterwards refused.

STRIKES.

THROUGHOUT the United Kingdom, and in fact throughout the whole civilised world, in all trades and occupations, there occur at certain indefinite periods what we call strikes. At the present time in many large towns in Great Britain, in some industry or other, master and workmen are at war with each other; while in the United States and on the Continent strikes are of alarming frequency. Mines, manufactories, railways, etc., are at a standstill, and thousands of men are idle. The machinery is in perfect working order, the materials are all at hand for producing wealth, yet owing to these disputes mines and factories are closed, and machinery stands idle, until one side yields to the demands of the other.

Let us look for a moment at the real cause of so much ill-feeling existing between the capitalist and his workmen; how it is that strikes with their accompanying destruction and distress are brought about. In the first place, we are aware that Labour is the source of all wealth, that the class who perform the work of the world are those who produce all luxuries and comforts. One would naturally suppose that those who produce all wealth and all luxuries ought at least to enjoy what they create. Such, however, is by no means the case. All the good things of life are in the hands of another class—a class who perform no useful labour themselves, who do nothing in the interests of the community at large, yet whose whole life is one long round of pleasure, one continual season of idleness and ease. This latter class we find have appropriated to themselves the mines, factories, machinery, shipping, and all the means to which the labour of man can be applied to produce wealth. Now, having got possession of the means of production, they set the workers to labour at them, paying them so much weekly or monthly for their toil. What is returned to them in the shape of wages only realises about a quarter of the full produce of their toil, the surplus going into the pockets of the employers, as the idle class are termed. Let us suppose that trade is at its very best, the workers are all employed, and in receipt of fairly good wage, there being a great demand for goods of various kinds. All these employers who are engaged in making those articles that are selling so rapidly will naturally endeavour to turn out as much as possible, so as to dispose of them at a profit—to make hay while the sun shines, to use a popular phrase. The consequence is they overstep the mark. So eager are they to take advantage of the revival of trade that they fail to see the catastrophe that awaits them. They find in course of time that the demand decreases, and when their warehouses are full they find they cannot sell at a profit what previously obtained a ready sale in the market. This is termed over-production. Rather than submit to smaller profits, or lose anything by the result of their own folly, they endeavour to make up this deficit by discharging the extra hands engaged during the period of prosperity and by threatening to reduce the wages of the ordinary workers. The workers, of course, sooner than submit to this reduction in their wages, refuse to work at all, and come out on strike, thus giving the employer the opportunity he desired of disposing of his stored-up goods without having to pay wages. It is doubtful, however, whether the employers gain anything in the long-run, because while the workers of various trades are on strike they cannot buy the same quantity of food or clothing they did while in employment, and they being also the consumers as well as the producers, the goods are only disposed of very slowly. When the warehouses are full the employer has little to lose by a strike, but as soon as the goods which fill them are disposed of, then he also begins to feel their effects, but being in no danger of starvation, having capital at his back and still enjoying the ease and luxury he has been accustomed to, he resolutely refuses to take the workers on again at the old rate of wages, waiting patiently until such time as they see fit to accede to his demands. The workers during a strike have to endure great privation and misery, and in most cases stern necessity compels them to give in. True, they are assisted in their struggle by the trade union to which they belong; but owing to the frequency of strikes and the want of a thorough organisation amongst the workers of all trades (each supporting the other against the common enemy), the funds are speedily exhausted if a strike is at all a protracted one. Then they have to rely on the charity of the outside public.

When trade is prosperous the workers often strike for an increase of wages, naturally assuming that as the profits of the employer are far above the average, they as the wealth-producers have a right to a share in them. Even when this is the case in very few instances do the employers give way. However large profits the employing class may be making, we never find that the wages of the workers show a corresponding increase. Employers do, and will so long as they have the power, make it their sole business to get as much work as possible out of their slaves and to give as little as possible in return.

In conclusion, let me sum up the evils that are the cause of strikes, and endeavour to point out a remedy for the poverty and vice prevailing at the present day. The present misery of the workers is due to the existence of a class who have the monopoly of the means of production and who use that monopoly in their own selfish interests at the expense of the workers. Cunning and selfishness are seated over a pinnacle of wealth, while honest labour is rewarded with a crust. Shall this state of affairs continue? All right-minded men answer No, and use their influence to bring about a change for the better. Education is the first duty, however, and that education must be pushed with the greatest vigour and the most unflinching enthusiasm. The workers must be taught that their emancipation can only be brought about by a social revolution—peaceable if possible, forcible if necessary. A revolution that shall institute in the place of capitalism that universal co-operation, where the whole people shall collectively own the land and natural resources—mines, manufactories, shipping, etc.—and shall use them for the common good. Where the whole people shall be the sole producer and distributor, and where all shall work and all receive equal remuneration for their labour.

The prospect before the governing classes at the present moment is not a pleasant one. The winter is almost upon us, and the army of the destitute and unemployed is ever increasing. Who knows but that before the winter is over thousands of men facing starvation will rise desperately, madly, striking aimlessly for bread or vengeance? We see the sturdy miner, working deep down in the bowels of the earth for twelve or fourteen shillings a-week, and we see the evicted tenant-farmer of Ireland standing with bitter curse on his lips gazing on the ruins of his homestead. We see the brutal police, striking down the miserable wretches who meet to ask for work and to parade their misery and wretchedness before the denizens of the West-end. We see the hangman's rope dangling over the heads of our doomed comrades in Chicago; while on the Continent we see the dungeon, the bullet, and the scaffold all at work to kill and torture the heroes of the proletariat. Everywhere the governing classes are with the strong hand trying to stem the rising tide of revolt. We note the brutal laugh and the sneer of respectability, and we discover that already the revolution is upon us: even now the battle of the wage-slaves is begun. Shall this great contest be one of undisciplined revolt, of frightful carnage and fearful vengeance? It is for the governing classes to decide. Let them be wise in time. Let them by the passing of wise and just laws, which shall improve the condition of the people, take away all class distinctions, and granting leisure and opportunity for their physical and intellectual advancement, lead the way to a calm and peaceable revolution in which reason and intellect will show the way to victory.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

BLACKBURN ENGINEERS.—The Society of Engineers have issued a manifesto appealing to those on strike for funds to continue the strike.

OVER-PRODUCTION.—It is stated that over 80,000 miners are out of employment in Derbyshire, owing to the over-production of coal.

The Northumberland miners in many cases are only getting three days work a fortnight while seven is a good average.

A movement has been set on foot amongst the drapery assistants in Dublin to bring about the closing of the establishments at an early hour on Saturday.

LEEDS PUDDLERS.—Owing to the depression of trade, a large number of puddlers have been thrown out of employment. As the trade is slack generally, there is every prospect of a hard winter for puddlers in Leeds.

THREATENED STRIKE OF PLASTERERS.—At Edinburgh and Leith the plasterers have made a demand for an advance in wages of 3d. per hour. The employers have unanimously resolved not to grant the advance, and the men are considering the advisability of striking.

THE WEST CUMBERLAND IRON TRADE.—A meeting of the ironmasters of West Cumberland has been held at Whitehaven, at which it was unanimously resolved to reduce the output of the district by blowing out a number of furnaces, and also to make a reduction of 10 per cent. in furnace-men's wages.

STRIKE OF IRONWORKERS.—The workmen employed at the Norfolk Ironworks, Ecclesfield, recently decided to strike against a proposed reduction of 10 per cent. A deputation waited upon the senior partner, and offered to submit to a reduction of 5 per cent. That gentleman, however, said his firm were obliged to press for the full 10 per cent. reduction. These terms the men refused, and shortly after they returned home.

Trade is very bad in Nottingham, and thousands of people are out of work. At the firm of Hill and Company last week, about 150 hands were discharged, mostly girls. Large numbers of men have also been discharged from the different machine works, and most of remainder put on short time. Building and other trades also in bad condition.

NOTTINGHAM CIGAR-MAKERS.—Notice have been given to the women and girls employed at cigar-making at a firm on Derby Road, Nottingham, of 25 per cent. reduction in their wages. A meeting has been held at which deputations from other towns were present, representing the Cigar-maker's Union. The women and girls all joined the union, and declared they would resist the reduction, support being promised from other towns.

THE CHAINMAKERS' STRIKE.—In these times of rabid coercion it is pleasant to note that at the Staffordshire adjourned quarter sessions the Court quashed the conviction of Thomas Homer, president of the Chainmakers' Association, who was recently charged with aiding and abetting in the intimidation of a female operative during the chainmakers' strike at Cradley-heat, near Dudley. The only penalty left was the imposition of the costs, which Mr. Horner can ill afford to pay. The strike still continues.

SELF-HELP SOCIETIES.—The principle of self-help is taking hold of operative weavers in Burnley to a large extent. Already there are two societies in the town working two sheds, and another is in progress of formation. It appears that no operative can be employed by these companies who is not a shareholder, but outsiders can be shareholders too. The Haggate Company is not an industrial partnership like the Healey Royd and Trinity Societies, but most of the hands at Harle Syke (Haggate Company) are shareholders in the place.

COLLIERY STRIKE.—The men employed underground in Wollaston Colliery, near Nottingham, numbering about five hundred, have struck work. In summer the men submitted to a reduction of 10 per cent., consequent upon a fall in the price of coal, and a fortnight ago they gave notice for an increase of threepence per ton on soft and twopence per ton on hard coal, contending that there had been a return to the old prices. The notice expired on Wednesday, and, the company declining to accede to the demand, the men left work, taking their tools. The strike was settled on Saturday by a compromise, most of the men getting an advance and a promise of a further advance all round on the next rise in the price of coal. About 700 took part in the strike.

MINERS' MEETING AT QUARRY BANK.—On Wednesday 9th inst. a meeting of the miners locked out at the Netherend Colliery was held at the Hope and Anchor Inn, Quarry Bank. Mr. B. Winwood, who presided, said the present severe struggle of 19 weeks for the right to live by their labour proved conclusively the great necessity of closer combination among the miners of these districts than existed at the present time, and he hoped this dispute would serve as a lesson in future for the better organisation for the whole of the miners of South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire districts. Resolutions were carried unanimously in favour of continuing the strike, and appealing to fellow miners to assist them in the struggle.

IMPENDING STRIKE OF WEAVERS.—At a large and enthusiastic meeting of Colne weavers, held to consider the best steps to be pursued in the impending strike at Mr. Catlow's Garden Vale Shed, Mr. E. Riddihough, who presided, stated that every effort to get this employer to adhere to the Burnley standard list had hitherto failed, and the North-East Lancashire Weavers' Association felt compelled, in the interest of other firms, to take the matter up and compel conformity to the list. In his district, for the same class of goods they were receiving 3s. a week more, and Mr. Catlow was upwards of 15 per cent. under the list. Unless that firm was taken in hand, a general reduction all round would shortly take place. Mr. Holmes said that notices in the shape of a "round robin" had been sent in, which represented 900 looms out of a total of 1,100. Those weavers were practically working six weeks per annum for nothing, compared with the other part of the district, and it was unfair to other manufacturers. Colne generally was behind the list, but it would have to be brought up shortly, and everything depended upon that firm. A resolution was then passed, that to show this employer that they were determined to have the Burnley standard list adhered to, the first payment to the weavers out on strike be made one week in advance, and that each weaver contribute 2d. per loom per week.

NEW PHASE IN SCOTCH IRON TRADE.—RUSSIAN POLES AT GLENGARNOCK.

The North British Mail of Nov. 11 contains a report by its special commissioner on this latest phase of the Labour Struggle in Britain, from which the following is extracted:—"Much excitement has been recently created in the iron manufacturing districts of the West of Scotland by a serious reduction in the wages of the labourers employed, and by the introduction by Messrs. Merry and Cunningham, at the Glengarnock Steel Works in Ayrshire, of a number of Russian Poles as labourers. Hitherto, notwithstanding the long and serious depression in trade, the current rate of wages has not been seriously tampered with by employers. The difficulty on the part of the men has been to find employment. Of course under such circumstances the general law of supply and demand has, as was to have been expected, exercised its influence, and wages have long since ceased to range at what might be termed the top rate. The most competent men have been constrained to accept the lowest current rates, and the less competent have been left out in the cold. The movement recently made at the Glengarnock Works, however, seems to indicate something much more serious than this. A considerable number of Russian Poles have been introduced into the district and employment found for them at the works, and this has been followed by a general reduction of the labourers wages to the very low figure of 2s. a day. When trade was brisk in the West of Scotland, 3s. and 3s. 6d. a day was the recognised standard wage for a labourer at such works as the Glengarnock Iron Works, and in West Cumberland, which is the newest iron district, these are the current wages even at the present time. Even now the average wage throughout Lanarkshire is not less than 2s. 6d. per day; but this is the first time that we have heard of such low wages as "two shillings a-day" being paid to men employed in such heavy and laborious work, and this is a wage even that we are sorry to think men should be constrained to accept. Food, no doubt, is cheap, and the cost of living perhaps is as low, and it may be even lower, than it has ever been known to be during the present generation. But let our readers but think what twelve shillings a week means to a man who has a wife and a family and a home to keep up. What will be left out of such a pittance after rent and rates and schooling for the children and other outside expenses are provided for. Let any one make the calculation for himself, and see how he would like to be placed in such a predicament. We certainly do not envy the employers who are constrained to pay such wages, and our necessities would indeed be great before we would stoop to call in the aid of the foreigner to impose them upon our fellow-countrymen. No doubt the work which these men have to do requires but little skill or previous training, but it is exhausting work, which necessarily implies that the man who does it must be well fed. As we recently overheard an employer remark in a cynical way: 'It is a strong back and a weak brain that we want,' and possibly the Russian Pole at Glengarnock is an ideal in this respect.

"Surely Messrs. Merry and Cunningham might have found cheap enough labour at this time in Scotland without troubling the Russian consul in this city to find it for them. From their own standpoint of view their conduct cannot be consistently defended. They are Tories in politics, and ardent supporters of all that Toryism implies. They would most cordially support any measure that might be proposed to impose a tax upon the product of foreign labour, even although it increased the cost of the bread which their workpeople earn by the sweat of their brow; but they claim for themselves the right to import that labour free so that they may maintain wages at starvation point here. The consistency of such a position will not stand discussion, but we would ask is it just? is it honest? should it be tolerated?"

"There is more than the pecuniary profits of Messrs. Merry and Cunningham at issue. The health and general interests of the whole community are involved, and the question is, are they to be reckoned of no weight in the balance as against the saving of a shilling a-day which this firm will effect, perhaps, on two or three score of men? The danger of infection from such a class of people as these Russian Poles unfortunately is no illusion, and, so far as we have been able to ascertain, Messrs. Merry and Cunningham have done nothing to protect the people of Kilbirnie against it. Then, in the event of these men breaking down in health or being discharged from their employment, who, then, is to bear the burden? The ratepayers have a right to ask this question, for, failing Messrs. Merry and Cunningham, it will undoubtedly fall upon them.

"It is hard to see what motive this firm can have in resorting to a step of this kind, unless it be that of pure greed. There has been no dispute with their workpeople, and there has been no unreasonable demand made by the latter which would have served as an excuse for the importation of foreign labour of this low class. The public certainly will expect some explanation from Messrs. Merry and Cunningham respecting this matter, and we think they have a right to it."

AMERICA.

On Saturday October 29 the New York Knights of Labour assembled in thousands in Union Square to show, as the call declared, "that there is still manhood enough left in the industrial heart of the nation to enter a vigorous protest against the execution of the seven men in Chicago whose only crime was love for their fellow men." James E. Quinn of District Assembly 49 touched the keynote of the meeting by saying, "that while in the past we working men have relied upon our ballots to protect our liberties, we find to-day that the ballot-box cannot be relied upon to protect us." The proceedings were most enthusiastic, and this was as yet the most radical utterance of Organised Labour. Chairman Kelly adjourned the meeting with the words, "If necessary we must fight in defence of our principles."

How cowardly and base the police are acting may be seen from the following extract from the New York Herald: "Mrs. Parsons (the wife of one of the seven) was selling to-day in the streets of Chicago General Trumbull's speech to Governor Oglesby on behalf of the Anarchists. She appeared thin and haggard, and extended the pamphlet, which she sold for 5 cents, to passers-by with pleading eyes and an eager manner. A crowd quickly collected and the sale went on rapidly until a big policeman came along and told her to move on. There was none of the old defiance, not a sign of the wild, untamed lioness about the faithful wife of the man now standing beneath the shadow of death. A year ago Mrs. Parsons would have turned on the blue-coated minister of despotism, she would have castigated him with fierce invective. To-day she obeyed the by no means courteous order to 'move on,' and hastened to a stairway, which she ascended and sank exhausted from the rapidity of her flight. 'Of course they must keep the streets clear,' she explained; 'I wish to aid them all I can'; and then the wretched woman, who firmly believes she will be a widow next Friday, smiled in a ghastly way."

THE CONSPIRACY LAW OF ILLINOIS.

ENCLOSED is a copy of the present Conspiracy Law of Illinois, in which State is the city of Chicago, where the seven Anarchists are condemned to be hanged. It was passed after the Haymarket affair—indeed, if it had been in existence then there would not have been so much legal delay possible—but it illustrates the unreasoning panic in Chicago better than would the Act under which they were condemned, as public excitement was at its height when the present law was introduced and passed. Use it if you can in the cause of liberty. Study will show its atrocity.

JOHN BEVERLEY ROBINSON.

New York, October 29.

An Act entitled "An Act to further define Conspiracy and to Punish the same, and Crimes committed in pursuance thereof, and relating to the Rule of Evidence."

Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the people of the State of Illinois, represented in the General Assembly: That if two or more persons shall conspire to do an unlawful act, dangerous in its character to human life or to person or property, or if its accomplishment will necessarily or probably require the use of force and violence, which may result in the taking of human life or injury to person or property, every party to such conspiracy shall be held criminally liable for whatever offence any one or more of his co-conspirators shall commit in furtherance of the common design.

Sec. 2. If any person shall, by speaking to any public or private assemblage of people, or in any public place, or shall by writing, printing, or publishing, or by causing to be written, printed, published, or circulated, any written or printed matter, advise, encourage, aid, abet, or incite a local revolution, or the overthrowing or destruction of the existing order of society by force or violence, or the resistance to and destruction of the lawful power and authority of the legal authorities of this State, or of any of the towns, cities or counties of this State, or resistance to the same, by force and violence, or by any of the means aforesaid shall advise, abet, encourage or incite the disturbance of the public peace, and by such disturbance attempt at revolution or destruction of public order shall thereafter ensue, and human life is taken or any person is injured, or property is destroyed by any person or by any of the means employed to carry into effect the purposes so advised, encouraged, aided, abetted or incited as aforesaid, every person so aiding, advising, encouraging, abetting or inciting the same shall be deemed as having conspired with the person or persons who actually commit the crime, and shall be deemed a principal in the perpetration of the same and be punished accordingly: and it shall not be necessary for the prosecution to show that the speaking was heard or the written or printed matter aforesaid was read or communicated to the person or persons actually committing the crime, if such speaking, writing, printing or publishing is shown to have been done in a public manner within this State.

Sec. 3. If two or more persons conspire to overthrow the existing order of society by force or violence, or to bring about a local revolution by force, or to destroy or resist and overcome the legal authorities of the State or of any county, city or town thereof, and a human being is killed or person injured, or property destroyed, by any of the persons engaged in such conspiracy, or by any one who may participate with them in the unlawful design and purpose, in furtherance of the object of such conspiracy, then all persons who may have conspired together as aforesaid, together with all persons who may actively participate in carrying into effect their common design, shall be deemed guilty of the crime committed by any one or more of such persons so conspiring or acting with such conspirators in the common design, and shall be punished accordingly; notwithstanding the time and place for the bringing about such revolution or overthrowing of public order, or the destruction or overcoming of such authorities, had not been definitely agreed upon by such conspirators, but was left to the exigencies of the time, or the judgment of co-conspirators or some one or more of them.

Sec. 4. Hereafter it shall not be necessary in order to establish a conspiracy as aforesaid to prove that the parties charged ever came together and entered into any agreement, combination or arrangement to accomplish a criminal or unlawful purpose, but it shall be sufficient if it appears that the parties charged were actually pursuing, in concert, the unlawful purpose, whether acting separately or together, at the same or different times, by the same or different means, providing that the acts of each were knowingly tending to the same unlawful result.

Sec. 5. Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed as repealing by implication or otherwise any law now in force in this State.

Approved June 15, 1887.

The Bermondsey Radical who wrote to Mr. Gladstone was doubtless disappointed with the answer, but it was very simple of him to be so. The question of the rights of the people is not a party matter, and therefore Mr. Gladstone can pay no attention to it. Nevertheless, the answer is useful; and there is even a glimmer of honesty about it, since Mr. Gladstone really says in it that if he were in the same position as the present Government is, he would do pretty much the same, i.e., put down public meetings when they were inconvenient to "Society." Radicals might take note of this!—W. M.

A comrade forwards us an anonymous postcard received by him, with a request that we should notice it. The sneaking cad who writes it has revealed himself more clearly than we could paint him. After abusing one of the unemployed speakers, whom he calls "a rascally thief," he says: "That is just the sort of man who becomes 'unemployed' and a hero of the Socialist worship; and it is to allow him and those like him to preach theft and rapine and incendiarism and murder, and the destruction of all law and order and decency, in the hope of reducing society to the old barbarian level of Troglodyte Man, that we are to give up our parks, our squares, our streets, our comfort and our safety. That is your gospel; it is not that of nous autres. I would give such ruffians the benefit of the Nordenfolt gun; and if a few stray bullets knocked about the inside of 2 Northumberland Street, Strand, I should not cry my eyes out." The editor of the P. M. G. will doubtless be as proud as is our comrade to have incurred such gentlemanly wrath.—S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

Will you kindly answer the subjoined questions in the next issue of your paper? I am preparing a paper on "Socialism Practically Considered," as you will see by enclosed card. An answer to my inquiries will materially assist me in the formation of a correct judgment on the issues involved:—

1. What is Socialism?
2. Its aim and object?
3. How to be attained?

[The above is a genuine example of a class of letter we are constantly receiving. We do not wish to discourage any enquirer, hostile or otherwise, but must point out that it is hopeless to attempt to master a subject like Socialism in a few days, and then to get up and explain it all! Those of us who have spent years in the study of the social problem, and who find every day new fields for study and research, are aghast sometimes at the unreasoning audacity of those who expect to deal with Socialism as lightly as a juggler with a handkerchief, and who expect the whole matter to be pressed into three small pills to be swallowed at a gulp! Knowledge, even on Socialism, must be learned to be of use, and not taken ready-made. Grönlund's 'Co-operative Commonwealth' (Sonnenschein, 2s.), and Mrs. Besant's 'Essays on Socialism' (Freethought Publishing Company, 2s. 6d.) may be recommended to a beginner.—ED.]

THE CHICAGO MARTYRS.

The Glasgow Branch passed unanimously on Sunday evening a resolution recording admiration of the noble and heroic behaviour of their Chicago comrades, Spies, Parsons, Engels, and Fischer, in the face of death; their detestation of the brutal legal system by which they and their comrades were most unjustly condemned, and expressing the deepest sympathy with the relatives and friends of these brave martyrs in the Cause of the People. Resolutions of a similar nature were also carried at a great number of other meetings in all parts of the country.

General W. H. Parsons, a brother of our murdered comrade, gave the following facts concerning him to a reporter of an American paper recently:

"My brother was born in Montgomery county, Alabama, June 20, 1848, and therefore in his fortieth year. His grandfather was a major-general in the Revolutionary war, and his grand-uncle lost an arm at the battle of Bunker Hill. At twelve years of age my brother entered the Galveston News office, but on the breaking out of the war, at the age of thirteen, he joined a Confederate company, the Lone Star Grays, participating in many actions, and assisting in the capture of General Twiggs. He later became a member of my brigade and an excellent cavalry scout, serving under me till the war ended, when he was seventeen years of age. He edited the Waco, Texas, Spectator in 1868, and was married to a talented and beautiful Mexican lady in 1872, at Austin, Texas. Two children are the result of their union. In 1876 he was elected secretary of the Texas Senate, and the following year was appointed deputy collector of internal revenue. Going to Chicago in 1883, he resumed his trade as compositor on the Times, and in 1886 joined the Socialists. He has been nominated for alderman three times, for Congress twice and for sheriff and county clerk once each."

This is one of the "wretches" over whose untimely fate the cruel cowardly London Chronicle and its capitalist contemporaries are now gloating. B.

Resolutions of Council.

(1) "That this meeting of the Council of the Socialist League condemns the action of Sir Charles Warren in ordering the police to prevent peaceable citizens from meeting in a public place in every way suited for meetings, and for ordering them to attack the said citizens while passing through the streets in a peaceable errand as if they were in an enemy's country, and also for calling out the military, and in all ways behaving as if London were in a state of siege."

(2) "That this meeting of the Council of the Socialist League expresses deep sympathy with the relatives of the Chicago martyrs in their bereavement, and pledges itself to do all in its power to make a substantial sign of that sympathy."

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Nov. 9th, no meeting. Sunday evening, an indignation meeting was held on Green, when speeches were made protesting against the murderous and brutal action of the "guinea-a-week bullies" on unarmed and peaceable men and women. In hall (Annie Besant in chair) George Bernard Shaw lectured to large audience on "Practical Socialism." Good discussion and reply from lecturer followed.—B.

FULHAM.—On Sunday, Nov. 13th, large meeting addressed by Graham Wallas, Mahony, and Tochatti. Fair sale of Commonweal. 5s. 2d. collected and another member made.—S. B. G.

HOXTON.—Meetings well attended Thursday evening and Sunday morning. On Sunday evening, H. H. Sparling lectured on "Socialism, its Probable Effect on Life." Interesting discussion. A vote of condolence with the families of the murdered heroes of Chicago carried with enthusiasm at close, and 4s. collected for Chicago Fund.—C. J. Y.

MITCHAM.—Meeting on Fair Green addressed by Eden and Kitz. Our meetings (despite the inclement weather) still increase, as does also the attendance of police. A special meeting will shortly be convened with supper for these worthies to regale themselves upon, as a reward for their exertions in protecting law and order.—R. C.

GLASGOW.—On Thursday evening, the first meeting of the discussion class was held. Comrade Adams opened a debate on the "Eight Hours' Working-day," and demonstrated that no reduction of the hours of labour would permanently benefit the wage-earners. On Saturday, a good meeting was held at Cambuslang. Glasier and Downie were the speakers, and were received with the good-will that is always accorded to our comrades here. Sunday at 2 p.m., Glasier, Pollock, and Gilbert addressed a large and attentive audience in Infirmary Square. Our usual meeting at Paisley Road Toll was very successful, Glasier and Pollock being the speakers, and were listened to with great attention. At 7 p.m., in our hall, at 8, Watson Street, Mavor delivered an interesting lecture on the "Working of the Commercial System." Good discussion followed. Good sale of Commonweal.—H.

LEICESTER.—Nov. 4th, a lecture on "Malthusianism," given by Robson. Several new members joined. At the Y. M. Institute in connection with the Victoria Road Church, a paper read on 8th, "Is the Socialistic Tendency of Modern Legislation likely to prove beneficial to the English Nation." Discussion followed, remarkable for the advanced opinions expressed. Mr. Daniells nobly vindicated the justice of our propaganda. Amongst the speakers were the Rev. Greenough, LL.D., M.A., Mr. Alderman Bennett, and many of the "hupper ten."—J. F.

LEEDS.—Sunday morning, Braithwaite, Paylor, Maguire, and Sollitt addressed meeting in Vicar's Croft. In evening question of "Technical Education" discussed at our rooms.—T. P.

NORWICH.—Meeting at Cawston, a village about 12 miles from Norwich, by Mowbray and Houghton; also in Market Place and Agricultural Hall Plain, Mowbray and Darley speakers; our banners draped in black as a token of respect for Chicago comrades. Papers sold well, and good collections made at all our meetings. On Monday 7th, social gathering held in Gordon Hall to present Mowbray with a purse of seven guineas to enable him to start at his trade in Norwich. Very enjoyable evening spent. A string band is forming in connection with our branch; five members already joined. First rehearsal of 'Nupkins' on Tuesday next, Nov. 14th. Parker lectured, assisted by Mowbray, in Gordon Hall on "The Murder of Anarchists in Chicago, and the Lessons of it."—M.

NOTTINGHAM.—At club Saturday night, visit received from Rev. S. D. Headlam, who held a general conversation with members on the unemployed. Sunday morning he lectured in Secular Hall to crowded audience on "Christian Socialism." Lecture well received, slight opposition sufficiently answered by lecturer. Collection made for the Socialist Defence Fund, £1 6s. 11d. At a late meeting of the branch on Sunday night, on receiving the news of the Trafalgar Square conflict, the following resolutions were passed unanimously:—(1) "This meeting strongly condemns the suppression of public meetings in Trafalgar Square, and is of opinion that the Home Secretary and the Chief Commissioner of Police are responsible for the injuries inflicted upon peaceful citizens by the police, and demands their immediate resignation of the offices they have proved themselves to be incompetent to fill." (2) "This meeting expresses its full concurrence with the efforts that have been made to maintain the rights of public meeting in Trafalgar Square, a place which is national property, and trusts that these efforts will be repeated until successful, and that if necessary deputations will be summoned from all parts of the country to support the citizens of London in their opposition to tyranny and oppression."—A. M'C.

WALSALL.—Donald spoke here Saturday evening to large audience. Meetings also held Sunday and Monday by Sanders.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—At the Saturday Club, Nov. 12th, the relative merits of "Free or Fair Trade" from a Socialistic standpoint were discussed by J. B. Killen, Brown, and Fitzpatrick, who also delivered a powerful condemnation of the judicial murder of the four Anarchists in Chicago.

NORWICH ANARCHIST GROUP.—Henderson spoke during week at Carrow, Yarmouth; Norwich, on St. George's Plain and Haymarket, on Saturday. Two good meetings held in Market Sunday, and one at Ber Street. At Yarmouth the meeting assumed the proportions of a demonstration, and most effectually silenced the Tory roughs who raised the late disturbances.—A.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

EDINBURGH.—Sunday evening, Tuke read paper on "Individualism" at usual meeting-place. As paper was short, J. N. Smith read translation of debate held at New York between Henry George and Schevitch.

Larger audience than usual listened with great attention to both papers. Good collection.—C. W. T.

ABERDEEN.—Further meetings addressed by Mahon. On Monday night business meeting held, and a programme for six weeks arranged.

WOODSIDE.—Mahon addressed three meetings here on Tuesday. At Grandholm Works dinner-hour, in the open-air 7 p.m., and in St. Katherine's Hall at 8. Barrow and Leatham spoke at night. Enough names given in to form branch.

MONTROSE.—Mahon addressed a second meeting here in the Temperance Hall on 9th. Audience very sympathetic and attentive. Some names for branch given; good deal of literature sold.

ARBROATH.—Mahon spoke at Tower Nook on 10th, and to crowded indoor meeting same evening. Several added to branch.

CARNOUSTIE.—Mahon lectured on "How to Realise Socialism" on 11th. Good sale of literature, collection, and several new members.

DUNDEE.—Branch is now progressing favourably. Saturday and Sunday four meetings held, at which Mahon, Duncan, Weksleder, Carr, Simpson, and Grainger spoke. Sunday night, Mahon's lecture on "The Rise and Progress of Socialism" was well attended. Number of new members enrolled, and good sale of literature effected. Next Sunday our members class begins.—J. C.

NOTES ON NEWS.

The swearing-in of the Specials will recall to some of the older amongst us the similar panic caused by the last great demonstration of waning Chartism in 1848. But the rush into the ranks of the amateur police was much more energetic then. A certain amount of fun was poked at these heroes by the Punch of the period, which though bourgeois enough was both funnier and less completely flunky than it is now. E.g., one drawing of Leech's exhibited an unhappy little Special about to enter into conflict with a brawny and contemptuous drayman, and fortifying his courage by saying to him: "Now, you know, if I kill you it's nothing; but if you kill me, by George, it's murder!"

It is much to be hoped, by the way, that the real police, who, as we have abundance of reason to know, are in a very bad temper, will not vent any of it on their amateur brethren; that they won't look upon them as "knob-sticks" and interlopers; that they won't in consequence hit them a knock on the sly when their badges are not very visible; that they won't detail them for warm corners amongst Socialists and Irishmen, and let them take care of themselves there, to find out by experience that "the policeman's life is not a happy lot." This would be spiteful and unpleasant of them, but so natural, that we are bound to hope that it won't take place.

On the other hand are the special constables all prepared to imitate the conduct of the police, now become so flagrant to all honest people? Is Sir Frederick Leighton going to knock down a woman; to scalp a tottering old man, some relic of '48 perhaps; to beat a man on the ground wherever the baton can be got in when he is held by three or four other defenders of law and order; to thrash a defenceless prisoner in the midst of his fcemen; to insult a high-spirited and brave man in the police-cell, and to beat him into senselessness if he retorts by word or look? Because all this is Sir Charles Warren's view of the duties of the English policemen at present, and as long as they have to deal with unarmed men.

I can suggest another course of action which really might come well within the four corners of the oath which these British Lions have to take before they can be trusted with the baton and the badge. How would it be if they were to translate "keeping the Queen's peace" in this way?

"If I see the police attacking a procession of unarmed men going on their lawful errands, even if I don't agree with their political opinions, I shall feel it my duty to take their side and help to defend them from the police."

"If I see a policeman knock down a peaceful defenceless person I shall feel it my duty to arrest him and call on all citizens to help me."

"If any such horrors of cowardice come to my notice as beating and insulting prisoners, either when just taken or (still worse) in the police cell, I will pursue the wretches who practice such shameful atrocities to the utmost."

"If I am told off to prevent the people from making use of their own property, I will not prevent them, but will do all in my power to help them to keep the meeting orderly."

"In short I will do my best to keep the peace and to hinder peace-breakers even if they wear blue coats and numbers."

I offer these suggestions to Sir Frederick Leighton and the other military bourgeois now invested with the badge. But I confess I am afraid that they understand that the Government has called on them to break the peace and not to keep it. Yet even so I do still call upon them to act according to some of the hints above given. At least let them determine not to strike non-combatants, and not to maul men on the ground or insult helpless prisoners, and so be honourable enemies if they must be enemies. I admit that even if they go so far as this they will run some risk of finding themselves prisoners; for they will be expected to do the worst of all these things. Indeed it is for their own sakes and not for ours that I make this appeal to them; for I cannot think that they will be a very dangerous army. I wish them to spare themselves the dishonour of going down to posterity as the most shameful set of fools and poltroons that have ever disgraced English history—scoundrels as bad as the whores and pimps of Versailles in '71, or the cold and bloodthirsty cheats of Chicago to-day.

As to the professional police, what are we to liken them to? There is a story of the Wars of the Jews, I think in the book of Maccabees, of King Antiochus their great persecutor, and how he made his elephants drunk and then set them on a defenceless crowd. Just so has the Woman-queller Warren made his elephant, the police, drunk, opened the door of its cage, and bid it run amuck; and no doubt, being a religious man, as I hear, thanks God for the victory thus won. So I think it is not so much the unhappy drunken elephant we can hate, though we must certainly defend ourselves against him, as the king who has set him on—if indeed we can hate even him, a lump of wood and pipeclay, inspired with military duty, so-called, to take the place of intelligence and conscience. How long are we to be forced to bear the dominion of the class which in its turn has made him?

Concerning the sentences of Ingham and Vaughan at their drum-head court-martial—their stupid iniquity; the gross flunkeyism which drew from Mr. Poland an elaborate apology to Mr. Burleigh for the same offence for which Oldland had a year's imprisonment allotted to him; the collapse of the prosecution against Mr. Saunders, and its idiotic comicality—what are we to say of all this, except that it reveals even to the simple and unsuspecting the foundation on which "Society" (so-called) is built—to wit, fraud and brute-force.

Cunninghame Graham has done his utmost to wipe off the reproach of the Radical M.P.'s. His conduct will be long remembered, one would hope, by lovers of freedom; but he must expect for some time to come to be a pariah among M.P.'s. To do him justice he is not likely to care much about that. W. M.

INSURANCE AGAINST MAGISTRATES.

THE meeting held in the Memorial Hall on November 18th will do good service if the protective League inaugurated by it keeps to its promise (as I see no reason for doubting that it will) of helping all persons without distinction of opinion who "get into trouble" in their endeavours to defend freedom of speech. Stewart Headlam in his speech on that occasion said nothing less than the bare truth when he said that no poor man had any chance of obtaining justice in a magistrate's court,—in which, by the way, he would doubtless have included the Middlesex Sessions if he had had any experience of Judge Edlin. No better instance of the necessity of some corporate protection for the victims of the law could be given than what happened on the morning of the meeting, when nine prisoners convicted by Ingham's drum-head court-martial were able to appeal against the unjust and malignant sentences pronounced against them by an ancient piece of incompetence, no doubt inspired by orders from headquarters. I believe none of these poor men would have been able to appeal but for the responsible bail provided for them chiefly through the efforts of Mrs. Besant, whose untiring energy and devotion throughout the whole affair will surely win her a place in the hearts of all working men. It has been stated in these columns before, but may as well be stated again, that no one can appeal from a magistrate's decision unless he can find two sureties who will bind themselves to pay the costs of the appeal if rejected;—where can a poor man find such sureties, who may have to pay £50 in case of failure?

The struggle for mere freedom of speech (whatever it may lead to) will certainly be a long and arduous one. Even the present idiotic Tory Government will not be easy to get rid of; and though it is possible that a Liberal Government would treat us better, at least for a while, because the Liberals may be forced to take the matter up and come in on it, yet such a trifle as a mere change of ministry will not cure the gangrene of the law-courts; nor will it have much influence on the reaction which is obviously setting in and which is the necessary accompaniment to the no less obvious progress of revolutionary ideas. The struggle will be a long one, and must be carried on by us in a manner which will mean steadily and pertinaciously harassing the apparently all-powerful executive on all sides. The League which the Pall Mall Gazette has set on foot will, if it performs its functions duly, take up one side of the attack, and will assuredly do good service. All Socialists will be glad to see Mrs. Besant's name on the committee as an earnest of due fulfilment of its promises; and although "votes of thanks" are not in favour amongst us, it would be unfair and ungenerous not to acknowledge the great services which the Pall Mall Gazette has done to the popular cause throughout this agitation. Well-to-do people especially should join this League, and help it both with their money, for a good deal of that will be necessary, and also by sending in their names as persons to be relied on for bail and sureties of the prisoners taken in the war for Freedom of Speech.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE ordinary routine of prison life is very dull, and to any one in weak health would be very injurious, more especially to such an one who has been used to a luxurious home and living. For myself, I have during my lifetime had to "rough" it; I have known what it is to sleep in the open-air and be without food, I have experienced the treatment of the workhouse and casual ward, and have no hesitation in saying that I personally give the preference to the prison. The food is at least good, though coarse. It may be as well just to give a scale of the diet received by each adult male prisoner for the first four months of his term if over six months:—

BREAKFAST.

Gruel 1 pint, and bread 8 ounces.

SUPPER.

Gruel 1 pint, and bread 6 ounces.

DINNER.

Mondays	{	9 ounces of haricot beans and 1 ounce of fat bacon, with 8 ounces of bread and 12 ounces of potatoes.
Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays.	{	Soup 1 pint, and potatoes 8 ounces, with bread 8 ounces.
Fridays.	{	4 ounces of Australian beef, 12 ounces of potatoes, and 8 ounces of bread.
Wednesdays and Sundays.	{	Suet pudding (alias bran mash), with 8 ounces of potatoes, and 4 ounces of bread.

After four months, porridge made of barley meal or oatmeal will be given instead of gruel. I submit to any reasonable being if the above scale is not better than many (if not most) of the working-men of this country get. I may be asked why do some men look so ill on their discharge? To my mind it is simply fretting; I cannot account for it any other way. For myself I made up my mind that the officials should not hurt or break me down, and I succeeded, for I was in good health and weighed 12st. 7lb. the morning of my release, having only lost 4lb. during the nine months.

I will try and show the Commonweal readers what kind of personage they will have to deal with if ever they need the assistance of the medical officer. It was my misfortune to have to report myself sick once, owing to my bruising my back by knocking it against the cell table when scrubbing my floor. I was asked by the doctor what ailed me, and having described my ailment, a bruise, received a dose of "salts." I think you will agree with me that this was rather a curious medicine for a bruised back. Every prisoner on admission goes before the doctor to see what labour he is fit for, and he must be very ill indeed if he is excused the "wheel." Every Monday morning the doctor passes by the open cell-door of each prisoner to see if he is all right. I may also say that if a man is really ill (that is very near dead) the doctor will order his removal to the prison infirmary, where he will get an entirely different diet, consisting of rice pudding, etc., and chops or steaks, according to his condition. I have heard a prisoner, who was returned from the hospital to his cell again, and he told me he had never been so well off in his life as when in the hospital. As a rule, however, the medical officer is (at least was with me) both harsh and insulting, for on one occasion he asked me, when I complained of my back, if I would like a bottle of champagne, a free discharge, and £300 per year. My answer being to this insult that he was a coward to speak to me in that manner when I dared not retaliate. It is one more chalk, however, to wipe out from "his" class when the Revolution comes.

The work which I had to perform was making the officers' clothing. I had to work in what was known as the "condemned cell." I did not care, however, because I had a fire to heat my irons. I was ultimately moved (in April) to an association cell. I had a fire here also, and here it was in A. 3, 33, that I got my first punishment. I had been in my spare time making a pair of slipper tops for my wife, thinking possibly that I should be able to get them out of the prison, and I had got them nicely embroidered with "No Master" and "All for the Cause" done in the cloth with silk thread, when I was caught by one of the officers, who reported me, and I was brought before the governor, who put me back to oakum-picking and plank bed for 14 days.

Nothing particular occurred for a time after this until the 21st of June, when I was awakened by the church bells pealing forth their half-cracked notes to commemorate the Jubilee of Victoria Guelph, the proprietress of the gaol in which I was confined so I'm told. The duties of the prison were in no way interfered with, but at 8.30 a.m., we had to go to listen to a "Jubile service," when we were told that it was owing to the fact of our having such a good (sic) Queen we were enabled to boast of having advanced education, extension of the franchise, advanced wages, and goodness knows what other good things which we are supposed to have received at the hands of this person. It was a very hard struggle to sit and listen to such frightful misstatements and perversions of the truth; but the worst was to come when a special prayer was offered up for the celebrated hero of the Cole, Mordaunt, and Pimlico exposures, A. E. G., otherwise known as Prince of Wales and coming K—.

LET us study political economy by all means; it will teach us what our present system is and how it works, and we shall be the better able to compare it with any one proposed to supersede it, and be the better qualified to answer the defenders of the present system, supposing we should be amongst those who want to change it for a better. But evidently, if we are not content to accept the present system and be ground to fit it, we must seek elsewhere for help.

Another agency which is trusted by many to bring better times is the moral elevation of the people; and here two things suggest themselves for our consideration—how far the moral improvement of the individual can go without first improving the system which is doing its best to grind him till he fits it, and how far the individual, supposing he can be morally elevated, could help evils which are brought on by changes and laws of the system under which he lives.

First, then, how far can the individual be raised morally under the present system. We are told that honesty is the best policy, and that therefore the system tends to make people honest: the church or chapel magnate who has made a fortune dilates upon this to the youthful members of the mutual improvement class. But what is this honesty which is said to be the best policy? If we come to examine it we shall find it is a mere following of some conventional rules which society takes for morality. It says you must not steal your neighbour's watch or rob his till, or gamble at cards or on the turf; it says in some cases you must pay your debts; you must, if poor, save money and not be extravagant, and feel too honourable to ask for relief if in distress; it says you must not steal turnips or leave a house without paying your rent, etc., etc. These and many suchlike conventional honesty requires; but we shall be able to form a more exact opinion of it if we look at a few things which it does not require. First, then, it does not say you shall not steal common land from the people or houses that others have built, nor does it say that you shall not take 10s. worth of labour and give 5s. for it. Nor does it say that your articles shall be as good as you say they are, or that when you sell cotton and the like that you shall not sell water with it to make up the weight, or clay or size to make up the look. It does not say that you shall not tell lies at street corners or in public newspapers about your own goods or those of others; it does not say that you shall treat those poorer than yourself with greater generosity and respect because of their harder lot; nor does it say that if a man trusts you in business you should treat him if anything better than one who looks upon you as a scamp and tries to get as much out of you as possible. These and many suchlike things conventional morality does not include; and I think we may safely say that modern trade tends to develop not honesty, but dishonesty, skilfully clothed in the appearance of goodness and legality.

But there is something behind morality which many think to be the only true basis of it, and which all agree to be essential to the truest morality, and that is disinterestedness, unselfishness, in its negative aspect, love of others, love of the common good in its more positive form. This love it is which forms the genuine part of all goodness, which declares many a man and woman, judged by society as vicious, to be good, and many a one praised by society as righteous and pious, to be anything but good.

What chance is there of fostering this spirit under our present competitive system? A child is taught that it's duty is to get on, to climb up the social ladder, to make a name greater than his fellows, to get more wealth and honour than his fellows, to look after number one first and if when he has raised himself into a high position he has still to spare then let him look round for some others for him to love—if indeed it be love which gives but that which is not wanted or missed! The man with his thousands of acres gives a bit here for a park and a bit there for a church or museum, and perhaps steals a piece of common-land twice the size of all put together, and the local papers speak of his philanthropy, which used once upon a time to mean the love of men. There is little deeper unselfishness than this taught by modern society; and if we come to industry and the production of wealth—and after all, modern society is based on wealth—things are still worse. If a man has shares which he finds out to be worthless, he seeks to pass them off on his neighbour as soon as he can, lest his neighbour should find out their true value too: perhaps by this a wealthy man ruins some poor widow or aged couple dependent on their savings for a living. This is the "honesty" which is "the best policy;" this is "good business faculty;" and this is the morality taught by our industry. Instead of teaching love of the good of others, it not only teaches love of self, but it crushes out all who will not learn its lesson. The greater need a man is in, the more is got out of him. The more a man needs to sell the less is given him for his goods; the more need he has to buy the more he is charged for what he wants. Stripped of all garnish, society represents a huge struggle or scramble for wealth and position, in which a few clambering over the bodies of the fallen and on the shoulders of the less fortunate, get to the top and have an easy time of it, while the majority have to continue to struggle for very life all their days. I am well aware that there are mitigating circumstances; custom still holds out to some extent against the inroads of competition, and human nature is not yet degraded enough to allow the scramble to go on quite unchecked; but I maintain that the present system is such a scramble, and the more completely it is developed the greater must be the struggle; for those who will not take the advantage will be taken advantage of, and all must be forced more and more to fight for their own hand regardless of others.

In the midst of such a system as this, how is the moral tone of the individual to be raised? Every step he takes in the upward course makes it harder for him to hold his own. One is constantly being astonished at the utterly selfish and inconsiderate acts in business matters done by men who in private life are of the most unselfish dispositions: the system is too strong for them. And to the people who trust to improving the individual as a remedy of our social evils we must reply that if we want men to become less selfish and more considerate of others' welfare, we must change that system which is forcing them in the other direction.

The second point we had to consider was whether the individual, supposing he could be raised morally, could prevent the evils of our present system. We have seen already that men whose natures are most unselfish in private life have nevertheless to act most selfishly in business, and we must conclude that they are unable to help themselves in the latter case. And in fact it is so; the individual has very little power when face to face with a system.

I have shown in an article before how in a town the whole of one trade can be coerced by any one or two firms selling cheaper or adulterating or refusing to close for a holiday, and in numerous other ways. But our friends will not so easily give up their theory about honesty being the best policy. They will say that you can always find one or two shops or manufactories where none but good articles are made or sold and no advertising is done, and that these often do very well. This is true to a great extent, but does not disprove what I have said. I think it is one of those numerous cases where it is assumed that because one or two can raise themselves by a certain course of action, therefore all could. Like the question of temperance, a few teetotallers among a lot of drinking men may get higher wages because compared to the general set of men they are more valuable; but if all turned teetotallers they would lose their advantage over their neighbours and with it their higher rate of pay. It is in a similar way that the shops above-named get on. They have an advantage over their neighbours, and are to that extent lifted above competition. There are generally enough people who understand something about an article and can judge when it is pure to support one shop selling a good article, even at a higher price than it is sold elsewhere; but the public generally can never be good judges of all articles, and must in the majority of cases go by price and trust to the word of the tradesman. We must remember that had it been possible to do without all these dodges and tricks of trade probably we should have had much less of them, for there was a time when things were done honestly. All this has arisen with the system, and the individual is powerless to prevent it.

The system of competition allows to all freedom to go with the stream and to go at what rate they can in that direction, but if any tries to go against it he is swiftly overwhelmed. Mr. Thompson, of Halifax, said in a lecture that he had found it harder and harder to carry on business without using shoddy, but he had managed it, and he doubted if any other firm in the district could say as he could that they had never used it.

SOCIALISTS AT CHURCH IN SCOTLAND.—Last Sunday the Dundee Socialists held large meetings in Hilltown, Barrack Park, and High Street, and several addresses were delivered by members. After the High Street meeting in the afternoon about 200 marched to East Parish Church and attended service, which was conducted by Rev. Mr. Mitchell, assistant to Rev. Colin Campbell. Their behaviour throughout was very orderly.

"SPOILING THE EGYPTIANS."—A general meeting of the shareholders of the Anglo-Egyptian Bank was held on the 16th, when it was stated that the profits for the past six months amounted to £27,862, 9s. 6d., of which the directors proposed to take £24,000 to pay a dividend of 6 per cent. this time. The average rate of interest for loans to the fellahs had been reduced from 18 per cent. to 6 per cent.; the robbery under which they suffer is less by two-thirds than before, and yet the total of the spoil makes a "respectable" sum.

COERCION IN NORWICH.—The Norwich Corporation is applying to Parliament for new powers with respect to public meetings in the city. Amongst other clauses is one asking for authority to prohibit processions in the streets and meetings in public places. This is undoubtedly due in a large degree to the dislike with which most of the "respectables" of the city view the Socialist meeting in Norwich. Every week there are nearly a dozen open-air meetings in the city, all well attended and enthusiastic. The middle-class humbugs who drew up the Bill for Parliament are simply showing their own fright at the way in which workmen respond to Socialist ideas at these meetings.—F. H.

COMMITTAL OF MR. DOUGHTY—EXTRAORDINARY SCENE.—At Ennis Court-house on Friday 18th inst. Henry B. Doughty, the London working-men's delegate to Ireland, was sentenced to a month's imprisonment under the Crimes Act. An extraordinary scene followed, and one which has not been witnessed in an Irish court of justice for some considerable time. Mr. Doughty, who sat beside his solicitor, was directed to be taken into custody. Standing up suddenly, he raised his hat in the air and called out "God save Ireland!" There was a wild response from the crowded audience in the court, and the soldiers of the Leinster Regiment who filled the gallery were the most demonstrative in cheerily answering the prisoner's appeal. About seventy of this regiment had been marched over from Clare Castle in the morning to do duty at the court-house, and having piled their arms in front of the building, a guard was placed and the rest of the men allowed to enter the court and listen to the proceedings. The military, in full marching order, occupied the gallery fronting the magisterial bench, and when the cheers arose from the people in answer to Mr. Doughty's challenge, the military seized their helmets and waved them frantically, while shout after shout went up for Ireland.

DE LUNATICO.

RAVINGS OF A PRESS CENSOR IN PRISON.

(By FERDINAND FREILIGRATH. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

ONE chamber has not yet been shown;
A single grating gives it light;
Stiff like a statue carved in stone
Its inmate stands, a woeful sight.
Nought haps to rouse his fury here;
He struggles face to face with death;
His glassy eyes are fixed in fear;
So gazed on Banquo's ghost Macbeth.

There!—What was ice is turned instead
To flame. He starts.—What is't he sees?

Whence comes and why the vision dread,
That stirs his hair and shakes his knees?

He clasps his hands against his face,
To shut from sight avenging swords;
He hides his head and begs for grace,
And groans and grovels on the boards.

And hark! he cries, "Was mine the knife

That stabbed ye? Mine the noose that caught?

Who hounds ye on to hunt my life,
Ye pale blood-boltered ghosts of Thought?

Who bade ye bridge the backward way
That leads from limbo up to light,
Old scores at last in full to pay,
And with ill visions vex my sight?

"I mowed ye down by legions; dumb
Ye fell like ears of garnered grain:
I little thought the time would come
When your pale ghosts would rise again,

To haunt with horror this abode,
Wherein it likes me else to dwell—
By Royal favour 'twas bestowed
For service wisely done and well.

"No finer place the country boasts,
And yet 'tis cursed, as all may see—
Avaunt, ye swarms of angry ghosts,
Athirst for blood, why haunt ye me?"

Your knitted brows are pale and bleed,
Yet courage lights your eyes in sooth;
Two noble forms your forces lead,
'Tis Freedom, as I think, and Truth.

"'Tis they indeed! For them have ye
Sprung forth full-armed from teeming brains,

To haunt and hunt and torture me
Despite of penalties and pains.
Full at my heart ye aim your blow,
As if 'twere murder ye would do;
Off, off, ye scoundrels, let me go,
And I will come to terms with you.

"Fair terms—but how?—the devil knows!
Hold—have not I the knaves for-bidden?"

Ye hem me round in ranks and rows—
I thought the dead in hell were hidden.

Bow down to earth beneath my tread,
That I may crush ye where ye lie:
Alas! ye only shake the head,
And say 'The Spirit cannot die.'

"Ye mock me, knaves? I bid ye fall
And bite the dust, or turn and flee.
God's cruel curse upon them all!

The scoundrels are too strong for me.
Truth strikes me sternly in the face,
And Freedom clenches hard her fist;
Swift subtle Thoughts press on apace;
God curse them all! they still resist.

"Have mercy! Sure 'tis truly said
That scores of Censors farther stretch
The law than I"—He strikes his head—

A warder grasps the raving wretch.
Stout straps and cords his fury cool;
He trembles, see! in every limb.
The man was nothing but a tool!
We do not damn, but pity him.

TRAMWAY STIKE IN CINCINNATI.—NEW YORK, Nov. 18.—Intelligence from Cincinnati states that the drivers and conductors of the Consolidated Street Tramways Company, in that city, have struck work, demanding the discharge of the manager. Traffic is thus temporarily stopped on one hundred miles of tramway, and six hundred men are idle.

The poets have always spoken of panic as diverse, many-sided, and the like. One sees the truth of this in the very different forms it takes at different times in our midst. The bitter cry of outcast London is the standing terror of us all. We try to stifle it, as we try to stifle other forms of evil conscience. Last time the panic took the form of a Lord Mayor's fund; this time it is to be embodied in special constables. The one remedy will be as futile as the other. A diseased society can no more lay its spectres by special constables than by special charity.—Pall Mall Gazette.

LANDLORDISM IN LONDON.—At the Thames Police Court last Thursday, a poorly-dressed woman applied to Mr. Lushington for advice. She said that she owed 12s. rent and the landlady put in the brokers, who distrained on her goods. On Wednesday evening a man came to her and said he had an order from that court to take out the door and windows from her room. She told him that her children were very poorly. He, however, took out the windows, but left the door. The children had been in the room all night with the windows out and the fog coming in.—In answer to the magistrate, the applicant said the man in question was employed by the landlady.—Mr. Lushington said an officer of the court would go with applicant to the landlady and tell her that it was a monstrous act, and that if an action were brought against her she would have to pay heavy damages.

GOOD ENOUGH FOR THE READERS OF THE 'GLOBE.'—This is a sample of a leader which filled a column of the Globe of the 17th inst.: "The mobs who have gathered near Charing Cross are protean. One day they call themselves the 'unemployed'; when that does not serve they masquerade as Radicals seeking to affirm a common right; and then they turn out as Socialists, braying for the Millennium. But the true character of the whole body of disturbers is that they are nothing more nor less than Communards and Anarchists. They belong not only to the 'rebel and obstructive conspiracy,' but they are next of kin to the hordes who murdered the 'hostages' and burnt down so much of Paris in 1871. It is neither liberty of public meeting nor freedom of speech which they want; it is a reign of terror and liberty to plunder and destroy." Seventy or a hundred thousand "Communards and Anarchists" for London alone is by no means bad.

JUSTICE'S INJUSTICE!—Mr. "Justice" Day is a good specimen of his inhuman class. At Liverpool Assizes on the 16th he sentenced a solicitor to twelve years' penal servitude for forging a cheque for £1000 and obtaining goods by false pretences. The judge denounced the heartless frauds of the prisoner, especially in reference to the cruel way in which he had victimised poor clients. On the same day a woman aged 69 was sentenced by him to seven years' penal servitude for stealing a pair of drawers. The prisoner, who presented a melancholy picture in the dock, and kept her hands in the attitude of prayer, dropped down like a person shot, and was carried away by two warders. He also sentenced a man to five years' penal servitude for fraudulently obtaining a shilling under the pretence that it was for a charitable object! Compare these sentences and then ask, if any one of them be just, what are the others?

THE LIBERAL PARTY DIGGING ITS OWN GRAVE.

For months past the Gladstonian Liberals have been protesting loudly against Coercion in Ireland, and the speeches of the "distinguished" amongst them have been filling columns on columns of the papers. They have just had a splendid opportunity of striking a great blow against Coercion in Ireland by coming forward to protest against Coercion in London. We need not ask how they have used that opportunity, that would be a joke; but it may be profitable to point out some possible consequences of their gross stupidity in throwing it away. It is their business as political Liberals to get the working-classes to believe that if they come in again some benefit will result to the workers above what the Tories have to offer them. They have, in fact, to win the vote of the ordinary working-men, not only those who professedly take interest in politics, but especially those who stand aloof from them, and that in Britain rather than in Ireland (since Ireland through its native leaders is theirs already), and especially in London, where there is so much to win. Now as long as the meeting in Trafalgar Square was "a genuinely political meeting," that is a mere home rule affair, their presence and support was of little importance, since their good-will towards it might have been taken for granted. But when it became, as it did some days before the meeting, a protest against the repression of free speech, and was, whatever may be said to the contrary, a protest also on the part of the "respectable" working-men of London against the maltreatment of their unemployed brethren, their support became of very great importance, at any rate to the future of the Liberal Party. It would have been accepted as a token of their sympathy with the popular cause, and would have gained them many thousands of votes which will now either be cast in favour of some Conservative of the "dishing" kind, or will never be cast at all. In short, they would have won whatever of London could be won by them under any circumstances, and they would have lost nothing at all; for they may be quite sure that they have no chance of the votes of the shopocracy big or little; they have done enough to lose that, while they have done nothing to win what was to be won.

Their conduct gives a good measure of the utter political incapacity of the Liberal Party. It is quite likely that they may plead that their "great and noble leader" is hard to move, that is, quite devoid of any perception of a dramatic situation; that at every crisis he has done all he could to discourage his friends and encourage his foes, but that is no excuse worth putting forward. The oracle of the Great Panjandrum was not needed to speak; even the next greatest panjandrum might have been dispensed with, i.e., Morley and Harcourt, and such like. If some dozen of Liberal M.P.'s of the more respectable kind had given by some means their open support to the business, it would have been enough, and the assent of the "leaders" would have been inferred, and the trick would have been done.

All this is now a thing of the past, and as a first consequence all people who can think at all must clearly see that the political Liberals look upon the Irish question simply as a mechanical matter to get them into office again. It is equally clear that freedom of speech for the people in general is no concern of theirs, except so far as they are afraid of the consequences of it if they were in power. No less clear that they do not care a button for the unemployed so long as they can be kept quiet; and finally, that they have no foresight or plan for the future and determined to shut their eyes resolutely to it. The result of all which will probably be, unless some blessed accident turns up to help them, that they will be exposed at the next election as the mere dregs of a beaten political party, a set of men afraid to proclaim themselves either Radicals or Reactionists; afraid of revolution, and (perhaps) ashamed of open reaction.

"Well, but what does all this matter to us?" a Socialist may say. Well, it is a matter of importance that the people should learn to know their friends from their foes; the people whom we still have to win over to our side—nay, whom to a great extent we still have to get to listen to us. Those Liberal members who have been crying out so loud about the wrongs of the Irish peasants and are so wholly blind to those of the London workmen, which are no less than those of their Irish brethren, have been teaching the lesson in question to the people sharply this time. They will understand that these champions of liberty are really saying, "There is no political capital to be made of you, so we don't heed you: nay, since you are at our very doors, and are beginning to look dangerous, we are at heart glad that the muzzle is being clapped on to you."

This is the meaning of the Liberal members standing aloof from the struggle for free speech in London; and used as people are to official poltroonery, they must see something of this meaning in it, and a heavy blow will be struck at the hope which some simple people still have in a change of ministry—it is called a change of parties, but it hardly amounts even to that. The people will in consequence begin to cry out for a party which does at least aim at being a popular one; which, however partially and ignorantly, does admit that the welfare and progress of the workers is the one necessary thing to be aimed at. In short, the orthodox Liberal party will visibly melt into the great reactionary party, and that very soon now in all probability; and though there will scarcely be a solid democratic party, yet at least there will be a great mass of ever-growing discontent. Both that of people who are increasingly suffering in their own persons from the progress of economical events and also of people of honest democratic instincts to whom all oppression is hateful when they see it, under whatever name it goes. This body of discontent it will not be difficult to penetrate with Socialist ideas, since it will no longer be able to hope anything from the vague bundle of makeshifts and evasions that passes under the name of a Liberal policy.

The gain, therefore, of the renunciation of the defence of freedom of speech by the Liberal leaders and their henchmen is all ours and the loss is theirs. The only possible reason for wanting a Liberal ministry in again is that the Irish question might be settled for the time. Against that possible gain is to be put the certainty that the longer the question is delayed the more revolutionary the change will be. Nor is it so sure either that the Liberals would do much to settle it if they were in office, on the one hand, or on the other that the Tories may not dish them at last by doing pretty much the same as their opponents would do.

Anyhow the education of the Radicals ought to go on pretty fast, now that a strong Liberal minority pledged up to the eyes to resistance to coercion, and looking forward, rightly or wrongly, to winning at the next election, has stood by and looked on with half-approving eyes while the Tories were taking away from the people the right of meeting in open spaces in London with a high-handed violence worthy of the times of Castlereagh.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

The efforts of the people to overthrow the system, doomed and cursed as it is, of wage-slavery are called "anarchy" by the powers that be, and they foolishly, blindly seek to strangle those efforts by dropping from a scaffold the bodies of seven preachers of an idea. Vain hope! stupendous delusion! The shock of the descending bodies of our seven martyrs will jar the world and shake the props from under wage-slavery in every land.—Denver Labour Enquirer.

It is as well to be frank, and those of our friends who are attempting, with great display of ingenuity, to draw many elaborate distinctions between Mitchelstown and Trafalgar Square are wasting their time. Of course no one pretends that the circumstances are identical. The Daily News points out, for instance, that at Mitchelstown the police tried to thrust their reporter through a public meeting, whereas in Trafalgar Square they merely bludgeoned every man who tried to make his way through the Square. Our sapient cotemporary might also have pointed out that the people shot at Mitchelstown spoke with a brogue, whereas those ridden down in Northumberland Avenue had a cockney accent. But notwithstanding all these minor details, the fact remains that in approving as "admirable" the bludgeoning of the people who came to meet in Trafalgar Square as has been their wont ever since the Square existed, and after the Home Secretary expressly declared political meetings would be permitted, our leaders have spiked their most effective Irish artillery. We regret this as much as any one. But the fact is there, and there is no blinking it.—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE UNEMPLOYED.

BY ONE OF THEM.

DURING the last three or four weeks the neighbourhood of Trafalgar Square has been in a state of continual turmoil. The police have daily assembled there on horse, on foot, and in private clothes. Sansculottism has met in multitudinous numbers there to demand work or bread, and the Patrollotic myrmidons of law and order—i.e., lawlessness and disorder—have also thronged thither with the object of either aweing the workless many into quiescence, or in default of that, belabouring them from the streets with their batons. Sir Charles Warren has far exceeded his duties as Chief Commissioner of Police to silence the cry of the unemployed; and finding brutality ineffective to achieve his purpose, has begun to try benevolence and usurping the functions of a commissioner of the Poor Law, doled out free tickets for food and lodging to starving outcasts. An alderman has—most remarkable to relate—turned political economist,—or rather, attempted it; and a certain parson, the Rev. Mr. Kitto, has surprised the world with a new phase of Christian charity by distributing refreshments to the barbarous limbs of the law tired out with bludgeoning wretched men whose only crime was that they had cried out for work. Meanwhile the shutters of the large West-end emporiums of shopocratic sweating and swindling have been hurriedly closed daily, and Timidas Plutus has stood shivering in the cellar while the demonstrations of the unemployed have surged tumultuously along the streets in the wake of banners black and red.

The motives of the men who formed these demonstrations have been so often misrepresented of late, and the honesty of the speakers at them so often questioned, by the scurrilous sheets of lies, nonsense, and advertisement called daily papers, that I feel myself compelled to pen this, with the intention of laying before the public, or at least the Socialist public, the truth anent the unemployed.

Returning from a meeting held early in October to protest against the murder of our Chicago comrades, four Socialists had occasion to pass through Trafalgar Square; and one of them, moved to indignation by the presence of so much misery and so many squalid homeless wretched on "the finest site in Europe," suggested that meetings should be at once started and conducted by those in our ranks who happened to be out of work. The suggestion was at once taken up, and the first meeting was held next morning, the speeches being delivered from one of the seats and beneath the shadow of a black banner upon which the words "We will have work or bread" were inscribed in large white letters. The result of this meeting was a series of daily assemblages in the same place to ventilate the same grievance. Day by day the sansculotic workless multitude met, marched, and spoke, and daily their numbers increased and their cry became more clamorous. The press, which at first had ignored us, at length began to notice the meetings, but it noticed them only with sneers and sarcasm. We were styled loafers, vagabonds, and paid agitators by the foul-mouthed and abusive Thersites who dwells beside the filthy Fleet Ditch. The abuse of the press was seconded by the ruffianism of the police, who, acting under the instructions of that bloody-minded arch cut-throat Sir Charles Warren, whose only reply to the vehement demand of Sansculotism for bread is that he instructs Patrollotism to apply the baton, frequently dispersed the demonstrations in a most savage and barbarous manner.

Upon the occasion of the first of those unwarrantable interferences a significant incident occurred, symbolical in its way of the manner in which the demands of the lower orders are always met by authority. The processionists were proceeding towards Stepney Green via Strand and City when, opposite Charing Cross Station, the police suddenly pounced upon them, seized and smashed up their black banner, and dispersed the procession. Strange to say, though, the red flag remained, and from that day till quite recently was borne before the procession. The black banner, representing the dark prospects of unemployed workmen, and borne in our parades as an appeal to the commiseration of the wealthy and a symbol of despair, was torn from us, broken, and thrown away. They would not be appealed to, refused to pity, and contemptuously rejected our peaceable pleading. But the red flag, the emblem of sturdy revolt, remained with us, and henceforth we marched in the wake of the flame-coloured flag.

The deputations appointed to wait upon the different responsible governmental officials met with much the same treatment as the demonstration which paraded the streets. Some refused to receive them altogether; others received them simply to either return in answer to their complaints the usual sempiternal official non possumus, or, to avoid returning answer to them by telling what turned out upon investigation to be the most deliberate and barefaced falsehoods. A good example of the former was the reply returned by the official at the Home Office who represented Mr. Matthews in his absence to the deputation which waited upon him. This official, with a lengthy title which reminds one of Dickens's "Circumlocution Office"—viz., the Under Secretary to the Chief Secretary of the Secretary of State—told the representatives of the unemployed, in the usual official sorry-to-disoblige-you manner, that he could do nothing for them. The reply vouchsafed by the Metropolitan Board of Works, on the other hand, turned out to be, when enquired into, nothing more or less than a lie. They stated that the Board was already employing a large number of men, and that one of their undertakings alone was employing 2000 men. When we enquired into the truth of these statements, it transpired that the latter "fact" was untrue. The extensive undertaking was found to mean certain works in connection with Barking Dockyard, which was in the hands of a private firm—that of Mowlem and Co.—and not directly undertaken by the Board of Works.

Besides being lied to and put off with non possumus in this manner, these deputations were sometimes referred to the union or treated to long and nonsensical dissertations anent Socialism and political economy by persons who evidently knew little or nothing about either. Sir Henry Knight—that cross-breed between a Dombey and a Bumble, with all the failings of both and none of the redeeming features of either—told an unemployed deputation the astounding lie that the luxury of the few tends to the enrichment of the many—a theory by far too absurd even to come from an alderman. A certain journal, erroneously thinking it possible for an alderman to study the elementary principles of political economy, recommended to this incarnation of capitalistic cupidity and stupidity the perusal of Mrs. Fawcett's 'Political Economy for Beginners.' Strange that the Pall Mall Gazette should offer such advice to such a person, in the face of the admitted fact that an alderman's discretionary powers are centred in his belly. Aldermen are undoubtedly authentic authorities upon the respective qualities of turtle soups and expensive wines; but anything in the shape of sensible science is entirely out of their province.

The brutality of policemen towards the unemployed, and the sneers of pressmen at them, have, however, been ameliorated by a most benign and heavenly manifestation of Christian benevolence and charity on the part of Rev. Mr. Kitto. A certain individual once compared the condition of the working classes at present to the parable of the Good Samaritan with the good Samaritan left out. This may be considered by some an exaggeration; but for my part, after recent experiences in the Square, I am rather inclined to think that not only was the comparison appropriate, but that it understated the attitude adopted by wealthy hypocritical ecclesiastics towards their more unfortunate humble brethren. The brutal vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields not only, like the Levite in the parable, passes by his prostrate neighbour, but he refreshes with coffee and sandwiches the ruffians who have succeeded in batoning his neighbour into senselessness. The Good Samaritan does appear upon the scene, but instead of assisting the poor and wretched outcasts who long have found a bed upon the cold hard stone, and who have nightly slept exposed to all the bitter inclemencies of the weather, with the grey chill sky for a roof and a stone for a pillow; but when, determined to starve no longer, they came forth to demonstrate, he then doles out food and good cheer to scoundrels worn out in the performance of a duty which he should be the first to condemn. Nothing was given from the over-filled larder of this well-paid parson to starving homeless men, but Christian charity at once prompted him to feed the heartless and willing tools of authority gone mad. This is Christianity according to capitalistic interpretation. The gospel of the Lord according to Mr. Kitto.

There are many I know among Socialists who disagree, and very rightly too, I think, with the claim of the unemployed as being insufficient to permanently improve the condition of the workers. This I admit is the case; but still I submit to people who entertain such opinions that workmen who demand work from responsible officials and are told by such officials that they can do nothing, are doing good in exposing the absurdity of a state of society under which expensive ministers are maintained who frankly confess in the event of important social emergencies like the present that they are powerless. By so acting they bring the authority of the predominating classes into contempt, and prove to the satisfaction of all thinking men who participate in such agitations the necessity not only of the commencement of relief works for the unemployed to enable them to tide over temporary trouble, but also the urgent requirement for a readjustment of social affairs on a more manly and sensible basis.

LITERARY NOTICES.

'Remember Trafalgar Square!' (Pall Mall Office, 1d.) is a concise and striking account of the civilising influences brought to bear upon the crowds of the 13th. Copies may be obtained for distribution at 100, 6s.; 500, 30s., carriage free.

No. 4 of the Humanitas pamphlets, 'Vittime e Pregiudisi' (Victims and Prejudices) contains observations on bourgeois life, the family as it is and should be, prostitution, and similar social questions, written in simple and direct language, which will render it a very useful little work for propaganda.

'La Vendetta Sociale,' by Paolo Valera, is a collection of a few articles rather sensational on prisons and corporal punishment in England. It will give a good deal of information to Italian readers of a somewhat slight description. English slang terms are profusely scattered over the articles, well translated in the text and mostly correctly printed.

Only by making the ruling few uneasy can the oppressed many obtain a particle of relief.—Bentham.

The white men drove the Indians towards the setting sun and dispossessed them of their land because they had more than they could use. Civilisation demanded more room. Now that humanity demands more room, are land monopolists to be permitted to hold millions of acres which they will not and can not use?—Craftsman.

"PROGRESS."—Here are the figures of ten years progress in New Zealand:

Year.	Population.	Revenue.	Shipping.	Railways. Miles.	Telegraphs. Miles.
1875	375,856	2,813,928	783,050	542	3,156
1885	575,226	4,096,996	1,032,700	1,654	4,163

During the same period there has grown up a large "unemployed question"; "labour and capital" behave as in other countries; and all the well-known conditions are repeated. Yet the resources of the country are not nearly exhausted. Is there a possible explanation of it all outside Socialism?

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

At every colliery in Leicestershire, with the exception of one, the men are handing in their notices for an advance in wages, this week, and have every prospect of being successful.

STRIKE ON CARTERS.—Last week about 50 carters in the employment of Alexander Scott, contractor, Mearns Street, Greenock, struck work against a reduction of wages. It was sought to reduce their wages by 1s. per week.

The directors of the new British Iron and Steel Company, Congreve, Staffordshire, and owners of collieries and works at Swansea and Ruabon, have decided to wind up the company, owing to the badness of trade. This will cause from 4,000 to 5,000 hands to be out of work.

THE YORKSHIRE MINERS.—At a conference of miners held on Saturday at Barnsley, on the question of restriction of working hours, a majority were in favour of the resolution, and the delegates were empowered to attend the Newcastle conference and vote accordingly.

SCOTTISH MINERS AND LONDON POLICE RIOTS.—At a meeting of the Scotch Miners National Federation held in Glasgow on the 21st, it was agreed that if Mr. Cunningham Graham is imprisoned the working classes should proclaim a great strike until he was released. The meeting considered that he had been brutally ill-treated by the London police.

NOTTINGHAM CIGAR-MAKERS.—The dispute in the firm of Robinson and Barnsdale has been settled. The women and girls who have formed a branch of the union, offered to work short time until stock was reduced, but would not accept reduction. A deputation waited upon the firm, and after discussion, these terms were agreed to. Branch now numbers 280.

REDUCTION OF WAGES.—A notice has been posted at the Newton Works of the Steel Company of Scotland, intimating that on Saturday week all existing contracts with workmen will terminate. Formerly such notices have always preceded a rearrangement and reduction of wages, and the present one, the workmen believe, will be no exception. The intimation has come as a great surprise. Already the men in several departments are speaking of resistance. They consider that a reduction is unwarranted.

THE LATE MIDLAND STRIKE.—The Central Committee thankfully acknowledge the receipt of £40 for general distribution. The men still find it very difficult to obtain employment, consequently the number out reduces very slowly. The returns to hand this week show the number out to be about 260. The committee are glad to note that men going abroad are now able to obtain a clear character, minus the term "Left on strike."—Railway Review.

PROPOSED LIMITATION OF THE OUTPUT OF COAL.—During the week the miners in nearly all parts of the kingdom have been supplied with ballot-papers to vote on the question as to whether they shall limit their production of coal by working only five days a week or not. This course appears to have been adopted so as to secure the co-operation as far as possible of the non-unionists, who outnumber the members of the various associations by four or five to one.

AN EARLY CLOSING CONGRESS.—The board of management of the Early Closing Association have determined to hold an Early Closing Congress; to consider the provisions of the bill introduced in Parliament by Sir John Lubbock, and to receive amendments and resolutions in respect thereto. Important proposals will be made respecting the machinery for promoting the bill. The Congress will be held in London on Wednesday the 8th and Thursday the 9th of February next. Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Cameron Corbett, and other parliamentary supporters of the bill, will be present.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—At a delegate meeting of the Northumberland miners on Saturday it was announced that a motion in favour of the adoption of the restriction of the output of coal had been arrived at, and that it was intended that the subject should be fully discussed at the adjourned conference of the Association in Newcastle on Tuesday. The question of the payment of the salaries of Messrs. Burt and Fenwick it was after much discussion resolved to submit again to the miners for their consideration.

NAILMAKERS.—At a meeting of nailmakers at Bromsgrove, Mr. Roberts, who presided, said they had now got the advance, and must do all they could to keep it. For his part, he would willingly pay 6d. a-week rather than have 1s. reduction from his wages.—Mr. Powell (secretary) said some men at Catshill were still on strike, as their employers refused to pay the price agreed to by the others. He thought it would be better to let those men work, and buy the work from them, rather than pay them to play, and that would start a joint-stock warehouse at once.

OVERTIME IN THE ENGINEERING TRADE.—On Saturday night a meeting of workmen connected with the engineering trade of Tyneside was held in the Lecture Room, Newcastle, to consider the best means of minimising the overtime worked in that trade. Mr. Howitt presided, and there was a large attendance. A resolution was adopted that in the opinion of the meeting systematic overtime is detrimental to the workers, and that meetings of the men of the various workshops in the district be held to appoint delegates who could be instructed to arrange a meeting with the employers, with the view of restricting overtime and of giving employment to some of the unemployed.

LONDON TRADES' COUNCIL AND THE UNEMPLOYED.—The Tories, Toadies, and Tricksters who do the wire-pulling for the London Trades' Council, met on Monday night to consider the question of the unemployed. Needless to say, the proceedings were of the prosiest and paltriest character. Mr. George Shipton maintained the reputation he has acquired as Flunkey-in-Chief by proposing to "approach" the Lord Mayor (on his belly I presume) to ask him to be treasurer of a fund to be dispensed by the Council to the "deserving distressed population." He also made some drivelling remarks about the recent agitation of the unemployed, and appears to be very much shocked at their partiality for the Phrygian cap, etc., and their want of reverence for the "Glorious Constitution" (including the Prince of Wales and the Peelers).

INDIGNATION MEETING OF MINERS.—At a meeting of miners held at Irvine last week Mr. Robert Smillie, Larkhall, referring to the importation of Russian Poles by Messrs. Merry and Cuninghame, said the system was a secret to the miners of Lanarkshire until exposed in the Daily Mail. There were far too many men idle in Scotland without sending to Russia for Poles, and if Merry and Cuninghame were to be allowed to continue their evil ways for the purpose of bringing down the wages to 12s. per week, he did not know what it would come to. The following resolution was carried unanimously: "That this meeting views with indignation the importation of Russians to the district, and calls on the authorities to have them removed at once, as their presence is a menace to the health and morality of the place, and is besides being used to reduce the already too low wages earned by the workmen."

THE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL.—Work has now seriously commenced on the ship canal at Eastham, and the excavations are proceeding, a staff of some 350 men being at present employed. The principal work now going on is that of preparation for future operations. At the works on Thursday a large number of persons assembled who had come from all parts of the country to seek work. Only five men could be taken on. It was a bitterly cold day, and some of the men had walked twenty miles to arrive at the works by nine o'clock in the morning. On an average a thousand men a-week are personally applying for work on the canal. The huts for the accommodation of the navvies are not yet constructed, and the cottages of Eastham and the neighbourhood are crowded with lodgers—so much so that in some cases the nuisance inspector has had to turn men out of houses that were overcrowded.

LONDON COMPOSITORS.—It is indeed a painful sight to turn out of busy Fleet Street at noonday and encounter the crowd of anxious faces of the men who assemble daily to sign the unemployed book. Dreary, weary, and demoralising is this waiting at the gates of the vineyard for a "call," and some of these labourers never, I am afraid, recover the self-respect and independence they lose while thus hanging listlessly about for the chance of a casual job. Yet what can they do? To seek for employment by walking from office to office is almost a farce; besides it is appetising, and men out of work must not get very hungry. There are some hundreds of compositors belonging to the London Society in this position to-day. They have been similarly circumstanced for weeks. There seems no prospect of a speedy revival of trade that will re-employ one-half of them. What's to be done?—Scottish Typographical Circular.

NORTHAMPTON SHOEMAKERS.—The Northampton Shoe Manufacturers' Association have determined on a lock-out of all their boot and shoe rivetters and finishers, and notices to that effect have been posted in the factories. This decision will affect five to six thousand hands, and if the lock-out is persisted in for any length of time the whole of the shoe operatives of the town—eight or nine thousand more—will be necessarily thrown out of employment. The manufacturers have resolved upon this step in consequence of their inability to settle a dispute, which led to the men employed at Messrs. Cove and West's factory coming out on strike last July. The men objected to alleged reductions in prices paid for making and finishing boots. After the strike had existed for some months the matter was referred to arbitration, but the Arbitration Board broke up on the refusal of the manufacturers to refer an important question to a referee. Subsequently the employers compiled a statement of wages for the whole of the town, but the Trades' Union refused to accept it.—On Tuesday riveters and finishers in over 200 factories commenced a strike. Several large manufacturers withdrew notices. Meeting 4000 operatives determine to enforce their terms.

THE GLASGOW TRADES COUNCIL.—At a meeting held last week strong resolutions were passed protesting against the action of the Government in attempting to suppress the right of free speech. Mr. R. C. Grant, in seconding the resolution, said it was certainly his duty to protest against the attempt presently being made to curtail freedom of speech. If allowed to go, we cannot know how soon trades meetings might be interfered with. He felt sure that farmers in Ireland had as much right to meet to try to get fair rents as we had to seek fair wages; and it was only because it was opposed to the interests of the landlord class that they were determined to put down free speech both in Ireland and now in London. Mr. Tait, in supporting the motion, said the Council was quite consistent in this matter, seeing that they protested against the passing of the Crimes Bill because it made such things possible. He said that the present system of espionage in London would be a disgrace to the most despotic government in the world, and he thought it to be the duty of every man to raise his voice against it.

RURAL LABOUR NOTES.—In many villages in Hertfordshire and Cambs the wages of agricultural labourers are not more than 10s. per week, and I have heard of some cases of 8s. How our workmen's wives do as much as they do with such sums is a marvel in the way of finance. In one village near there are 26 men out of work and in great distress. This parish (Steeple Morden, Cambs) contains 3,767 acres, and is rated at about £6,000 yearly value. This extent of land should produce abundance for the population of 1,000, but yet there is want. Lord Hardwicke is the largest landholder, and his creditors yearly take thousands of pounds value from this and neighbouring villages. How long will the men who produce this wealth stand by and starve while their subsistence is absorbed by idlers? Other villages are in much the same condition, here 20 men out, there 30 and more, and so on. A fruitful and pleasant country, but held back as by magic from the people's enjoyment. At St. Neots (Hunts) a large paper manufactory has lately been closed. When in full work this factory employed nearly 400 people, mostly women. The business has been sold to another paper maker, who says he can supply all the paper for the St. Neots business with his present plant and hands. Four hundred more added to the "margin." A good many may find work elsewhere, but to most of them this is well nigh impossible.—P. C. W.

THE UNEMPLOYED.—What's to be done? This is the social problem that, let what may stand in the way, will have to be solved. It is a question that grave men are asking day by day, for the depression is general and widespread, and meanwhile disaffection is growing apace. It is folly for our newspapers to ignore it, useless for them to point to a great cheering crowd at a royal progress or civic procession and try to delude their readers by telling them that the heart of the people is loyal and contented to the core, and that only a handful of advanced Radicals and mad Socialists are at the bottom of the discontent. Working men could convince them otherwise if they were open to conviction; but the dignity of the press will not allow leader-writers to seek information where it is best to be obtained. So our great dailies continue to talk of "idlers" and "loafers," and profess to believe that the distress cannot be very widespread, because the tens of thousands of unfortunates have not joined the less discreet contingent which has been rendering itself so obnoxious to West-end and City respectability lately. Yet doubtless this advanced guard—despite the ruffian element which is common to all large gatherings—somewhat represents the horny-handed sons of toil" whose "honest, upturned faces" and "hearty British cheers" the newspapers are so fond of picturing on occasions when they are invited to "assemble in their thousands" to support a popular politician in "potting" a political opponent. But they must not "demonstrate" on their own account. That is wrong, and constitutes them sansculottes at once.—Scottish Typographical Circular.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

! On the 10th of this month, Eugene Pottier, member of the Paris Commune, and one of the best poets of the Social Revolution, was buried by his colleagues of the Commune, the various Socialistic organisations of Paris, and a great mass of people. As soon as the red colours were displayed the police, under the command of one Honorat, made a rush on the assembled people and succeeded in stealing the banner away. They charged the crowd, knocking down every one they could get hold of, severely wounding women and children, in one word, behaving themselves in a most brutal manner, recalling to mind the most sinister days of the Empire. Municipal councillors, our friends Vaillant and Lavy, were trampled down, the deputy Clovis Hugues was very much hurt, and Joffrin, the Paris councillor, was even arrested. Since the affair at Pêre la Chaise, no such scandal has been witnessed by the people of the revolutionary city. But on the following day the Paris Municipal Council made a sharp interpellation to the Prefect of Police, the same Gragnon who has now been superseded on account of the Caffarel-Wilson scandals, and as his answer was as bad as possible the council passed a resolution condemning the action of the police, urging the dismissal of Honorat, and of all those agents who acted in the same dastardly way, and further deciding that until the administration of the police has been made by the Government responsible for its doings before the Municipal Council, they cease to have anything whatever to do with that administration, and refuse to deal with any matter in which the police are concerned.

HOLLAND.

One of the ablest contributors to the Dutch organ of Social Democracy, Recht voor Allen (Right for All), S. W. Roorda van Eysinga, has come to an untimely end lately at Clarens, in Switzerland, where he lived as an exile from his native country. He had been a high official in the service of Holland, in Dutch India, where he could witness the frauds, the injustice, the rapine which are incessantly committed there by Dutchmen against the poor Indians. He publicly denounced this system of enriching Holland at the cost of India, and was obliged to resign. Afterwards, no more than Buen Husket, than Multatuli, he could remain in his "dear Fatherland" and went to Clarens, where he died. He was also a contributor to the Revolte.

Last week our comrade Cohen was on his trial at the Hague, on a very "serious" charge indeed. On the 16th of September last, the King of Holland, William III. (and we hope the last) came back from Amsterdam to his well-beloved Hague, and defendant cried out: "Hurrah for Domela Nieuwenhuis! Hurrah for Socialism! Down with the Gorilla!" Now, the charge against him is one of insulting the king by giving him names. The Public Prosecutor made a most dreadful statement, saying that Gorilla must absolutely mean his Majesty the king, because of the fact that really his glorious master has unmistakably, although unfortunately, the face of an ape! I am afraid that honourable Public Prosecutor has for ever broken his career. The tribunal will deliver judgment next week.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

At Innsbruck, in Tyrol, a new Socialist paper will be started on the 1st of next January, to be called Volksstimme (Voice of the People). It intends to deal specially with the Catholic population of ultramontane Tyrol, and to convert them to Socialism. We wish good luck to our new colleague; Catholicism is a mortal plague, and must before all other things be eradicated out of man's mind.

At Vienna, the new Arbeiter Kalender (Almanack of the Workers) for the year 1888 has just been issued, and contains some very interesting matter, as for instance, a biographical sketch of Frederic Engels, with a bibliography of his writings, a short history of the social and political events of the year 1887, a clever article from Andreas Scheu, a good deal of poetry, notes, statistics, etc.

The workers of Hungary have done the same as their Austrian comrades. Their annual Allgemeiner Arbeiter Kalender (General Almanack of the Workers), which has just appeared, is very interesting. It contains among other articles, a thoroughly well-written biography of Johann Philip Becker, who recently died at Geneva, and who has been all his life through a valiant revolutionist; the history of the Pesth high treason process of 1871-72; several Socialistic novelettes, etc.

SWITZERLAND.

Our readers are aware that the chairman of the Social Democratic Congress, recently held at St. Gall, has been murdered, and that it was at first thought that party politics had somewhat to do in the ugly business. Now it appears that a clown of the Circus Wulf, of Berlin, has been arrested by the St. Gall police as being one of the murderers of comrade Saluz. Afterwards, it was ascertained that this miserable clown is an international secret police agent in the pay of Prussia.

RUSSIA.

A few days ago an extensive house search was ordered by General Gresser, the actual governor of St. Petersburg. The police ransacked over four hundred houses, and arrested one hundred and forty persons. A secret printing press was found, also an immense lot of revolutionary proclamations. Amidst the written documents possessed by a group of Socialists, were some bearing witness to the relations of some of the members of that group with the German secret police. Unfortunately, these documents are now lost. As I said a fortnight ago, the German police penetrates everywhere: In Austria, Belgium, Switzerland, France, England, and Russia. Bismarck has done his work well enough indeed, but we sincerely hope that, after him, it won't last long. The Germans will not everlastingly be so patient as they have been until now; such a kind of patience bears, in the long run, quite a different name. Go ahead! Get up, Lazarus!

BELGIUM.

On the 16th inst., Octave Jahn, who was arrested at La Louvière some months ago on account of the disturbances which occurred there during the coal miner's strikes, was tried by the Court of Assizes at Mons, and sentenced to two and a-half years of imprisonment. He was accused of having maliciously and publicly attacked the laws of the country and provoked people to disobey them; further, of having by means of an inflammatory speech in a public meeting, caused the hotel called Hotel du Commerce to be blown up by dynamite; and lastly, of having had in his possession prohibited arms, such as a dagger and a revolver. Octave Jahn is only eighteen years of age, being born in 1869 at Cherbourg, France. He was for four years a telegraph boy at Paris, but resigned on account of an injustice done to him by his chiefs. Then he organised the famous strike of all the telegraph boys of Paris, which was so much talked of at the time. He also was the founder of the French League of the Anti-patriots, which in a very few month's time succeeded in getting several thousand members all over the country, and made an extensive work of propaganda among the younger workers and the soldiers of the French army. V. D.

ITALY.

We have received a communication from the editors of Humanitas, from which we learn that their offices have been lately visited by the censor of Naples and the last number of the paper confiscated while yet in proof:—"To the censor of Naples and his police we present our hearty thanks for having publicly belied what he in his cowardice affirmed in private, i.e., that Humanitas was not worth his notice, and in our turn we assure him that we shall abide by our promise that Humanitas, published and distributed in the dark, shall yet disturb the monotony of the careless lives of him and his kind. To these gentlemen our greeting is 'Au revoir!' . . . A few words to our friends: Humanitas in its 25th number is forced by official command to stop its publication, but intends to appear all the same though sub rosa. Next January will see it again lively as ever. . . . There are debts of 1500 fr. owing to the paper by its retailers; as for the subscribers it is better not to speak of them, as unluckily not all are able to pay a subscription, but he who takes upon himself the sale of papers and keeps the money for his private wants, we know not what name he merits. It is beyond doubt that many Socialist periodicals have died by means of these 'parasites of Socialism.' But we trust that honest subscribers will pay their accounts and continue their aid. . . . Forward, then, in the name of the Social Revolution!—For the editors of Humanitas, Emilio Zuccarini, Alfredo Cantiello." M. M.

SOCIALIST DEFENCE ASSOCIATION.

A BRIEF account of the work of this Association is due to the readers of the Commonweal.

The Association was formed in consequence of poor men, concerned in the unemployed agitation, being condemned, unheard and undefended, on police evidence alone. The first case defended was that of Alfred Oldland, who was prosecuted for "assaulting the police," i.e., for defending himself against unprovoked attack. He was committed for trial, and despite overwhelming evidence that he only struck in self-defence and was brutally beaten by the police, Mr. Edlin, at the Middlesex Sessions, sentenced him to twelve months' hard labour, six months for each blow. The next case taken up was that of J. Allman, prosecuted for seditious language; bail was refused, but the Secretary of the Association visited Mr. Allman in Holloway Gaol, and arranged that he should be defended; on the second hearing of the case bail was granted, and on a third hearing the case was further remanded for lack of evidence. If there had been no defence, our truthful police would have sent our comrade to gaol; as it is, he will apparently get off scot free. Next, J. Knight was incarcerated; we offered bail, but it was refused; on hearing, Mr. Thompson, by much pertinacity, forced the magistrate to accept bail, but it was fixed at the monstrous figure of £400. The bail was given, Mr. Knight was freed, and, on hearing, the charge against him was dismissed, overwhelming evidence having been collected of the falsity of Inspector Shepherd's sworn statement against him.

The members of the Association have come forward to give bail in the most admirable way. Bail for nine men was wanted last Friday, and a crowd of good Socialists presented themselves at 10 a.m. at Bow Street, having received their summonses only by the first post that morning. As Secretary, I do not offer grateful thanks to all these good men and women who came so promptly to the aid of the helpless, because the service is its own reward. But I must venture to say one word of special homage to the Rev. S. D. Headlam and Thomas Bolas, who, during the last three weeks, have shown an absolutely selfless devotion, and have sacrificed time and taken trouble without ever courting personal cost. Thanks to the Association, thirteen men have been released on bail, in addition to the cases previously cited. When I say that in three of the cases in which appeals have been lodged, witnesses for the defence were kept out of court by police violence, it will be understood how useful has been the work of freeing the men for appeal. I say nothing of the touching gratitude of poor men unexpectedly rescued, that has been the one bright thing in these sad days. Thanks to Mr. Stead, who gave us the money, eleven men have been released on payment of fines.

Now as to funds. I do not want any more subscriptions at present. Subscriptions had better be sent to Mr. Stead. But I want some more people who will serve as bail, and I want another fifty who will guarantee to respond to calls up to £2 2s. 0d., if the money is wanted. The Law and Liberty Defence League is now paying all costs of defence, and I ask only for guarantees from Socialists in case of need.

North of England Socialist Federation.

On Monday evening, the Rev. John Glasse, of Edinburgh, opened a week's campaign in Northumberland by addressing a meeting of about 900 in the Nelson Street Hall, Newcastle. Tom Mann occupied the chair, and in a vigorous speech, with special reference to the unemployed, introduced the lecturer. Mr. Glasse spoke for about an hour and a quarter on "Poverty, its Cause and Cure," and after considering the causes brought forward by the abstainers and the Malthusians, showed their insufficiency to account for the present condition of our industrial classes. The reason of their poverty, notwithstanding the growing wealth of the nation, he found on the contrary in the monopoly of the means of production and distribution in the hands of the capitalists. After dealing with the cures professed by the church, with its mission-halls and regenerated humanity; by trades' unionism, with its recognition of the essential justice of capitalism, and by co-operation, with its maimed doctrine of self-help, the lecturer concluded they were mere, if not miserable, palliatives, and declared that nothing short of Socialism was an adequate remedy for the necessities of the case. The various points of the lecture were well taken up by the audience and heartily appreciated. The questions were of the usual order, and the only opposition came from some teetotallers, partly because they misunderstood the drift of the remarks made upon the drink question, and partly because they were annoyed that so little commendation was given to their paltry panacea. A most successful meeting was brought to a close by a call from the chair to give a ringing cheer for the Social Revolution.

On Tuesday evening, Mr. Glasse went to Blyth, and in spite of very disagreeable weather an audience of nearly 300 came together to hear an address on "Christian Socialism." The lecture was simply an exposition of ordinary doctrines, enforced not merely by illustrations drawn from our social condition, but also by the teaching and practice of the Christian Church.

The schoolroom was crowded on Wednesday evening at Seghill, and the concluding meeting among the miners was held at Seaton Terrace. The lectures were everywhere listened to with interest and sympathy. The circumstances of the miners in Northumberland are extremely favourable to the spread of Socialism, and the most sanguine hopes may be entertained of their almost unanimous adhesion to our principles at no very remote future. There is much privation from irregular employment, and little is needed to commend our cure to their superior intelligence.

A meeting at North Shields on Friday night brought the engagement of Mr. Glasse to a close. Here the same friendly reception was given to Socialist doctrines by a good audience. This town seems also a promising place for our work. The members of this branch are distinctly enthusiastic, but complain about a want of speakers. The best results might be expected from a propaganda carried on for a protracted period in Northumberland.

NOTES ON NEWS.

ONE lesson, and a very valuable one, the authorities have been giving us by their recent conduct. They have, so to say, preached us a practical sermon on the value of the vague something called "moral force." This time surely the "moral force" was on our side, and it was natural that many should have thought that the affair of Dod Street would be repeated, and that the Government, glad enough to harry and bludgeon a small band of poor unemployed voteless men here and there, would draw back when the Radical clubs entered the arena. Well, on this occasion they did not draw back, and many people are astonished at it. But they must remember that it was convenient for the then Government to draw back at Dod Street, while it was inconvenient for the present Government to draw back at Trafalgar Square. That is just as far as "moral force" can push Governments who have in their hands physical force.

The Government with their big majority in Parliament felt perfectly safe against any mere talk, even though Mr. Gladstone himself and the United (?) Liberal Party were the talkers; therefore they thought that the opportunity was good for striking a blow which should encourage their friends and cow their enemies, and so far from drawing back they have been acting as an "agent provocateur," and would have been only too glad if they could have had an opportunity for shooting as well as bludgeoning the people. They believe themselves safe behind their bludgeons and bayonets against any "moral force" that can be brought against them; and so they are until the "moral force" arrayed against them means a corresponding amount of physical force, until apathy is turned into determination, timidity into despair, and organisation grows out of necessity.

Meanwhile, there is nothing to discourage Socialists in all this; we have known our present physical weakness all along; and the action of the Government has at least shown us that the classes are afraid of something, that they are beginning to forecast the inevitable trouble which the approaching break-up of wage-slavery is brewing; that forecast will almost certainly as it grows lead us into a period of persecution, and that again to a general knowledge among the workers of what Socialism aims at, and the threat of physical force (or let us say at once of force) which that knowledge will imply, will either make the oppressors waver, lose counsel and conduct, and so at last give way; or the oppression will become so unbearable that it will force the revolution to break all bounds and sweep it away.

A writer in the Daily News is sorely grieved at Sir C. Warren being called a martinet, a mere official soldier, in short, a lump of pipe-clay, and sets forth at length his amiable and humanitarian qualities. Surely this is either a day too late or too early. The innocent Arabs who were slaughtered because their tribesmen slew the briber Palmer may be forgotten, and at any rate they can tell no tales; but how about our kind-hearted friend on the 13th and the 20th of November, 1887? Really Sir C. Warren's love for humanity took a strange form on those days; we have not yet forgotten all that so cleanly that we do not also remember that passage from an old book: "By their fruits ye shall know them. Do men gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles?"

The police, as we know too well, are, to put it mildly, very much irritated against the people in the streets, whether they are unemployed, or processionists, or what-not short of respectability. Naturally irritated, say some people, since they have been hustled about from pillar to post, overworked, kept without their meals (except when fed by the shopkeepers and the Prince of Wales). Well, you see, since they are "naturally irritated," they can be depended upon. I was talking about these matters to the son of an old chartist the other day, and he said that in the '48 time the soldiers were kept at extra drill for some time before the Kennington Green meeting, and in consequence were "naturally irritated" against the people. There are more ways than one of killing a cat.

The Liberal leaders are in a terrible fright of being involved in a contest against law and order. Harcourt, Morley, and others have been speaking about the country, and not a word have they to say about the state of things in London. The Tories are not so reticent: they are naturally crowing over the victory of force over reason. The clever cartoon in Punch, which is really the illustrated Times in a political sense, puts the point to Mr. Gladstone in an unanswerable way. Only he won't answer it, or indeed think of the matter as long as he thinks it can be safely disregarded from the political or vote-catching point of view.

The "unemployed" agitation has got as far as the setting on foot of a census of them; which to my mind does not seem very far; but if they themselves want it done, as it appears they do, all one can do is to hope that something, however little, for their benefit will come of it. But how shall a census be made of men (and women and children) working for the wretchedest of wages? The wages now being offered to men on the ship canal works now beginning in Lancashire are 4½d. an hour, and I hear that thousands of men are eager to accept this "reward of labour." There is employment for you! I want to know also if a man who is an artisan, a carpenter, cabinet-maker, weaver, or what not, is set to do navvy's work, whether he can properly be said to be "employed"? Once again, it means but one thing—out-a-door relief. This is what the Captains of Industry and their governing committees, parliament and the rest of it, have to offer to the people they lead. That is their way of organising industry.

It is curious to see the eagerness with which well-to-do people accept any scheme short of the one obvious remedy for dealing with the "unemployed" business. You would think, to see the high spirits of some of them over this census business, that the men were by now not only numbered but also set to well-paid remunerative labour. Again the "beggar colonies" scheme, here called politely "home colonisation," has been received with a kind of enthusiasm in some quarters. Mr. Herbert Mills set the ball a-rolling with his scheme, which was to be an imitation of the Dutch beggar colonies; and then there was an account of a similar scheme in work at Berlin, whereby people by dint of working eleven hours a-day and a strong dose of church to boot, all under strict discipline, were to earn a splendid livelihood of 6½d. per diem. That such schemes of slavery can be received as "palliatives," that they are not received with universal horror and disgust, shows how miserable our condition is, and what a tremendous upheaval it will take to amend it.

The Liberty and Property Defence League cannot be congratulated on the result of the "big name" they got to lecture for them. Mr. Froude, almost of course, showed complete ignorance of Socialism and its aims, and quite of course violent prejudice in favour of reaction; and in short his address was a queer performance for a man with a reputation. And yet he gave his friends a hint or two worth their remembrance, when he told them, e.g., that the rich had in these latter days surrendered political power in the hopes of preserving property, and that in all probability they would as a consequence temporarily lose their property. Some of their faces must have fallen at this temporary prospect. What Mr. Froude really meant was that liberty and private property are incompatible,—who shall say him nay?

W. M.

A great lady and seigneur of the ancien regime were speaking about what was likely to happen to a certain old rake, lately of their acquaintance, but whose life and debaucheries had been cut short with very little notice. "It is to be regretted," said he, "that his Highness was not more careful in securing the good offices of the Church." "No doubt," said she; "but depend upon it, sir, God will think twice before he damns a man of that consideration." Kindly people flatter themselves that such notions belong to a time that has passed away; they will, then, be shocked to hear that at the great Tory gathering at Oxford on November 23rd, Monseigneur Salisbury said, when for once in a way he spoke the truth, "One of my Ministry is worth all the eighty-six Irish M.P.'s." These are but brutal ways of stating what to the speakers is the truth. But they are shocking more for the underlying truth on which all such ideas are based, than for the mode of putting them forth. It is not true that one man is worth more than another, but it is true that the whole of our society is arranged on the assumption that one set of men, selected by the merest chance, are better than the rest. The ideas expressed in "the claims of capital," or "the rights of property," and similar ones, all assume that men who happen to be chained to certain material surroundings are more worthy than if they were free from such encumbrances. Those who hold such ideas do not hesitate any more than the great lady of the ancien regime to take God into partnership when they quote "Dieu et mon droit" against others.

A LEAKY OLD TUB.

THE good British ship "Constitution," with its fleet of colonial consorts, no longer bounds over rippling waves of commerce under favourable tradé winds, but for many years past has been labouring in the stormy sea of competition. As it sinks into the trough or rises to the swell, it rolls heavily to the Tory or Whig side and plunges slowly forward. Admiral King and Vice-Admiral Chancellor have had Captains Laud and Walpole and Pitt, Lieutenant Dizzy, Purser Gladstone, and their able-bodied tradesmen to guide and steer. But somehow the old ship no longer answers her helm. Indeed, the officers do not seem to be sure whether the tiller-ropes are not altogether broken away from the rudder. There used to be during the voyage from Feudalism to Whiggery a very serviceable tiller-ropé in the Church. The officers had only to grease the ropes and wheels liberally with tithes and church-rates, and our bishops with the merry song, "Why do the heathen so furiously rage together and the peoples imagine a vain thing?" guided us out of the stormy waves of foreign competition. Let the idolatrous Don vapour as he might, let the Mounseers vainly fancy that they could raise the wind or disturb our waters with their South Sea bubbles; even if the chopping seas did rise a little high, our clerical guides blessed and even pointed the noisy salvos of artillery, which in these cases at all events, soon brought down the waves to a more endurable level.

Ah! if it could only have gone on so; if our good ship could but have lengthened its halcyon course just for our time, with its gallant crew of Raleighs, Clives, roast beef farmers, Squire Westerns, rich burghers, petty traffickers, merchant princes, and ducal rent-rollers. . . . But where to? There's the rub. The world is limited in size, and has the unfortunate peculiarity that the more successful a voyager is in pushing forward and opening up new fields of enterprise, the sooner he meets face to face the heathen and the foreigners, whom he kicked off but a short time since and turned backwards on their way. Our ship got round the world about 1770 along with Captain Cook's, and seems now as if it might suffer the same fate as his. His ship was caulked and tarred and painted; the timbers of the leaky old tub were strengthened to fit it for the carrying of coal, which does not suffer from damp, and finally, nearly a hundred years after its celebrated voyage, it went down in the narrow seas with all hands and coals on board.

The halcyon days then are done, when we could be astonished at our own unforced moderation in dealing with Hindoos and Negroes. Our Captains under Queen Bess or the Sacred Majesty of the Stuarts found it pleasant enough exchanging knives and guns, linen and cloth for Javan spices or Guinea gold-dust; or better still, as De Foe puts it, a few toys and trifles for Guinea Negroes. These last, it is true, were of no use at home; on the contrary, the Captains' friends there had white slaves on their hands, whom they willingly sent out as "servants under bond for a period of years" to help in winning Brazilian Sugar and Rum, or Virginian Tobacco. But the world is limited, and has, it is said, progressed; so the happy hunting-grounds of those times contain now plenty of slaves of their own, and the people are as busy in making frippery as ever we were. They do not want our wares of either kind, but we and they are engaged in the not very hopeful attempt to become rich by exchanging toys and trifles with each other. We are all hard put to it to get rid of our cargoes, while the back-wave from the continual struggles and collisions with our own kith and kin, heathen and foreign, on the other side of the world, seriously troubles our home waters. Our poor officers call out and perhaps try to believe, that we are still on our old track; but the old ship is driven hither and thither, and knows not where it is nor what people it faces. Its crew rush on as of old, but the world is shrunk, and our comrades, equally with those against whom our leaders guide the attack, are just as likely to be foreigners and heathens as fellow-citizens and neighbours.

Our old "Constitution" was framed originally for true Britons only. The Commercial Adventurer and Free Trader in adapting it to foreign elements, however worthy and desirable, have strained it much, and made its timbers to gape terribly, besides cutting new entrance-ports for convenience in its sides. Even a philosopher, however, finds it difficult to make a hole to admit a cat, but which will keep out a kitten; and if heathens of every kind capable of earning a living are to be welcome, it would require the wits or the brass of a London magistrate to frame a test of visible means of subsistence, which shall admit Giuglini but exclude the organ-grinders.

We still do a vast business with each other and with foreigners in toys and trifles, but take now by way of exchange not rum and tobacco for the amusement of men, but mostly butter and meat for his necessity, or at least what stands for these. For if we had been sailing in a butter-tub on a sea of melted butter, our lower decks could not have been worse flooded with various forms of grease. Captain Salisbury has rightly received credit for his recent ingenious stoppage of one offensive kind. Butterine or oleomargarine (I forget which of these two) cannot now leak in from Holland, but our ship-mates will have a free choice, as free as the circumstances admit of, between articles labelled "Pure Devonshire" or "Pure Irish," or "Pure Manchester oleo-butyrio-margarino-grease, extracted from the best coal-tar, and warranted to contain all the elements of nutrition." The educated mind trained in the purest doctrines of British Free Trade sees the difference—he doesn't generally try it by tasting—sees as clearly the difference between oleo-butyrio-margarino-grease and oleo-margarine, as that a cod-fish from one side of a parallel of latitude differs from one caught on the other side. And so our most active British Free Trade mate has gone over the seas to point out to our Canadian Consorts, that there is a difference, and to advise them against taking in their supplies indifferently from both sides of the line, but to leave the fish from the inferior foreign side for the American market. It is quite good enough for them; and if these inexperienced Colonials and untrained Americans cannot see the difference, why they must accept the doctrine on the authority of the Free Trade Pope of British Interests. The Pope has said that British interests shall not suffer in his hands; he will bring his political hocus-pocus to bear, and enforce the view that there is a difference between two apparently identically similar fishes. Orthodoxy has before been successful, where sight and hearing, touch and taste and smell, all failed.

Active, however, as are our Admirals and Captains, they do not seem able to come at one most serious leak in our "Victory." There is the Emigration Pump, the Congested Districts Pump, the Allotments Pump, and many others. "All hands to the pumps" is a standing order, morning, noon, and night, while the pauper-bilge-water increases ever in the hold. The officers groan that pump as they may, they cannot touch it, and complain that though vast quantities are poured into and enrich foreign lands, yet the inrush of foreign dregs through the gaping sides baffles all their labour. None of them knows what to suggest, and the crew are about to strike work; for they begin to see that they will all go to the bottom together in the leaky old tub, unless they get out of her on to some temporary raft, till they can build for themselves an entirely new craft. C. J. F.

THE next two movements we have to deal with are those of trades unions and co-operation; these both touch the industrial question, and have both been able to improve the condition of certain sections of the people to some extent. Before we shall be in a position to judge of their power to find a permanent solution of the difficulties which modern society has to face it will be necessary for us to get as clear an idea as possible of those difficulties and fix upon the causes of them as far as we can; we shall then be able to judge what these two great movements can do towards the removal of these causes. I shall not here restate the oft-told tale about the poverty and misery of the workers or the luxury of the idlers, but shall assume that readers of the Commonweal have at least had their eyes opened enough to see the disgraceful contrast and are wishful to mend it if possible; but we will take some of the phrases commonly used both by employers and employed to explain poverty, bad times, etc., and see if we can find how they originate and what they really mean. First, then, the capitalists talk a lot about over-production and take measures to restrict the output of various kinds of goods. To the man of an unsophisticated mind over-production sounds a very queer word to explain our evils by. Surely it is rather odd to explain poverty by saying that it is caused by our having too much of everything, or in other words the want of things is caused by the great abundance of them! If this is really so there must be something very wrong somewhere; evidently to try and cure poverty by reducing the stock of wealth is, to say the least of it, a left-handed way of setting about it.

Now how does this over-production arise? Let us take an example of a simple society on a small scale. We will suppose it to consist of a farmer, a tailor, a shoemaker, a tool-maker, and a builder and furnisher of houses. Each one of these would work at his trade and exchange the result with his neighbour. Thus the farmer would give corn, etc., to the tailor for clothes, to the shoemaker for boots, and so on; or the tool-maker would give tools for boots or corn or whatever he wanted. Now it is quite evident that there can be no general over-production here unless there is so much produced of all sorts of goods that all the wants of each member are satisfied; and it is further evident that such over-production if it did exist, far from causing poverty, would make every one wealthy and provide them with additional leisure, so that it might be a great blessing to them. Of course there might be too many of any one article produced. For instance, the builder might fit them all up with houses to their liking, and then if he went on building they would not give him of the results of their labour in exchange for a second house. But that is quite a different thing; it merely refers to an increase of one article proportionally greater than that of any other, and would be righted by the builder doing something more needed, perhaps draining the farmer's land or taking to ordinary joiner's work, but there would be no general over-production such as we are now discussing; that could only happen when all were satisfied. How is it, then, that this general over-production, which would be a blessing to such a society as we have sketched, is such a curse to us? The reason must lie in some difference between this society and ours, and that difference will not be far to seek. In this society we have assumed that each brings into the market of exchange all that he produces; but in society as it now exists this is not the case: a man brings into the exchange money which represents only a portion of his production. A woman is making shirts all week: she will only bring power to purchase one-twelfth of the number she has produced. And taking the workers generally, they don't bring more than enough to purchase one-third of what they produce; the employers or some other members of the non-working class take the two-thirds. We will, then, introduce an employer into our little society, and see what the result will be.

The farmer (or agricultural labourer, as he will now be), the builder (or mason), the tailor, the shoemaker, and the tool-maker, will now all be working for an employer, who takes all they produce and gives them back as wages purchasing-power equal to one-third of what they have made. Now the first result of course will be that they will either have to live on one-third of what they did before or work longer to make up for what the employer takes. The second result will be this same over-production, for it is evident that the employer cannot eat three-times as much corn, wear three-times as many clothes, boots, etc., as all the others, therefore he will soon accumulate a large stock of goods of all sorts which it will take him years to use up. Of course he will try and set the workers to other work—making cigars for him to smoke, or growing wine, or working up jewellery—and so prolong the process; but even here he takes two-thirds of everything and leaves the workers one-third, so that each article becomes a drug on his hands and over-production will ensue. He does not want any more himself, and won't allow the workers to use the tools, etc., to produce for themselves, hence over-production results in poverty for the workers. The time might be staved off if there were other societies near which did not know how to make the things produced in this society and which had such things as jewels, ivory, skins, etc., to give in exchange, or such things as tea, coffee, sugar, etc. Then the employer could get rid of his goods for things which he would like to make his life happier. But the time comes when these neighbouring societies learn to make for themselves, and they will no longer buy at prices which the employer thinks worth while to sell at, and over-production comes on again and misery results, relieved occasionally by the introduction of a new market or by the invention of something which the employer would like, or his daughter perhaps: the fashion of wearing a bussle improves the steel-trade for a while, or a fancy for a certain sort of clothing briskens up that branch, but nothing except new foreign markets can brisen up the whole community.

Hence we see that in our simple community the introduction of an employer and the unequal distribution of wealth is the direct cause of so-called over-production. The remedy of course would be to revert to the old system of fair division of produce. We may take it as a truth worth remembering, that if we are to do away with trade crises and gluts each must have a purchasing power equal to his productive power, or at least approaching to such equality; for if we have to trust to a small section of the community consuming two-thirds of the produce, there is sure to come a time of over-production,—in other words, there comes a time when the manufacturers of most staple articles are producing much more than the wealthy class need, and are giving the workers such a small share of purchasing power that although they need the goods they cannot buy them. Then we get the most disgraceful spectacle of modern times—rows of warehouses full of all sorts of useful things, food, clothing, furniture, etc., which cannot be sold, and in many cases are going to rot for want of using, and at the same time thousands of people going about with empty stomachs, their naked bodies showing through their ragged clothing, even in the depth of winter, living in houses not fit for dogs, with perhaps an old box or two as sole furniture or a few broken sticks which have not gone to the pawn-shop.

The fault lies not in any law of nature which decrees that every ten years or so there should be a season of glut or bad times, but lies in the violation of a law of nature which says that if a small section of the community take from the rest the greater portion of what they produce, that such robbery shall work the destruction of society unless it be stopped.

I have here dealt only with the increased amount of misery brought on the workers and some of the employers by these times of glut, and have said little of the evident injustice of taking two-thirds of the produce from the workers and giving it to the idlers. My object was rather to show that these successions of good and bad times are caused directly by this bad distribution, and that therefore if we are to do away with this evil we must do away with the bad distribution. Competition greatly aggravates the evil; as soon as there is the least sign of an improvement, every factory starts and makes about twice as much as is needed, trying to get a larger and larger share of the general market, the only regard each man has is to the share of the market he can get. A fierce struggle ensues; they cut each other in price; the workers are driven like slaves; and the result is that some make vast fortunes which put them quite outside the influence of bad times, the rest who are not so fortunate in getting a large share of the market are left with tons of stuff which they cannot sell. Then it is that we hear capitalists wishing there might be a good war to liven things up a bit—really to consume some of the surplus wealth a bonfire would do as well; in fact each fire is looked upon by the workers as on the whole rather a good thing, being good for trade and finding extra work. Each is right from his point of view. A war finds the employers profit because the nation makes a demand non-existent before, and a good deal of the purchasing power comes from sources which would not have given an effective demand. A fire finds work, and so wages, for the workers to build up again and re-stock the place burnt down: again the money comes largely from sources where it would not have been used to pay wages.

Men are educated and the State uplifted by allowing all—every one—to broach all their mistakes and advocate their errors. NEW FORM FOR THE SWEARING-IN OF CONSTABLES.

(A SUGGESTION FOR SIR CHARLES WARREN.)

"Dost thou accept the old creed of Coercion
In England, as in Ireland, tried and true?
Dost thou regard all freedom with aversion,
And hate her name?" "I do."

"Wilt thou respect, court, venerate the classes,
Whate'er they seek to compass—good or ill?
Wilt thou molest and vilify the masses
In word and deed?" "I will."

"Swear'st thou to wield thy truncheon for the Tory;
To smite, and curse, and wound, and overbear?
Then seize and prosecute with lying story
Some injured wretch?" "I swear."

"Wilt thou perform thy duty in this station,
And tread the path that Endacott has trod?
What is thine oath of solemn adjuration?"
"I will—so help me God!"

PODSNAPPERY.

"Mr Podsnap was well to do, and stood very high in Mr. Podsnap's opinion. Beginning with a good inheritance, he had married a good inheritance, and had thriven exceedingly in the Marine Insurance way, and was quite satisfied. He never could make out why everybody was not quite satisfied, and he felt conscious that he set a brilliant social example in being particularly well satisfied with most things, and, above all other things, with himself.

"Thus happily acquainted with his own merit and importance, Mr. Podsnap settled that whatever he put behind him he put out of existence. There was a dignified conclusiveness—not to add a grand convenience—in this way of getting rid of disagreeables which had done much toward establishing Mr. Podsnap in his lofty place in Mr. Podsnap's satisfaction. "I don't want to know about it; I don't choose to discuss it; I don't admit it!" Mr. Podsnap had even acquired a peculiar flourish of his right arm in often clearing the world of its most difficult problems, by sweeping them behind him (and consequently sheer away) with those words and a flushed face. For they affronted him.

"Mr. Podsnap's world was not a very large world, morally; no, nor even geographically,—seeing that although his business was sustained upon commerce with other countries, he considered other countries, with that important reservation, a mistake, and of their manners and customs would conclusively observe, 'Not English!' when Presto! with a flourish of the arm and a flush of the face they were swept away. Elsewise, the world got up at eight, shaved close at a quarter past, breakfasted at nine, went to the City at ten, came home at half-past five, and dined at seven. Mr. Podsnap's notions of the Arts in their integrity might have been stated thus. Literature: large print, respectfully descriptive of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Painting and Sculpture: models and portraits representing Professors of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Music: a respectable performance (without variations) on stringed and wind instruments, sedately expressive of getting up at eight, shaving close at a quarter past, breakfasting at nine, going to the City at ten, coming home at half past five, and dining at seven. Nothing else to be permitted to those same vagrants the Arts, on pain of excommunication. Nothing else To Be—anywhere!

"As a so eminently respectable man, Mr. Podsnap was sensible of its being required of him to take Providence under his protection. Consequently he always knew exactly what Providence meant. Inferior and less respectable men might fall short of that mark, but Mr. Podsnap was always up to it. And it was very remarkable (and must have been very comfortable) that what Providence meant was invariably what Mr. Podsnap meant.

"These may be said to have been the articles of a faith and school which the present chapter takes the liberty of calling, after its representative man, Podsnappery. They were confined within close bounds, as Mr. Podsnap's own head was confined by his shirt-collar; and they were enunciated with a sounding pomp that smacked of the creaking of Mr. Podsnap's own boots."—From 'Our Mutual Friend,' by Charles Dickens.

CHILD LABOUR IN GERMAN FACTORIES.—One of the demands made by the German Socialist party is that child labour in factories shall be abolished. In view of this it is not uninteresting to note the steady increase in the employment of children, which is testified to by the reports of the German Inspectors of Factories. In 1881 the number was 9,347; in 1882 it was 14,600; in 1883, 18,395; in 1884, 18,865; and last year (for 1885 no statistics are available) the number was 21,053, or far more than twice the number in 1881. So much for official statistics; but there is every reason to believe that these figures do not represent the actual state of things, the employment of children in industry being carried on to a much greater extent than the factory inspectors are able to learn. Thus the Inspector for the Düsseldorf district says he has "often found in grinding-works, small weaving works, and turning works, children of from four to twelve years, who were said not to be working, but only to be under the care of their parents or brothers and sisters. Only in a few cases did I succeed in proving their employment, notwithstanding that the untruth of the representations made was demonstrated by the fact that the children's hands were soiled by working material." The German Gewerbeordnung forbids the employment of children under twelve years of age, but the inspectors state that this prohibition is often disregarded, and especially is this the case in the so-called "house industry," which it is, from the nature of the case, impossible to subject to perfect supervision. Thus, an inspector writes respecting Plauen, in Saxony, that he has found many cases in which children of seven years have been made to work ten hours daily, besides attending school. Saxony, indeed, seems to be especially guilty of infraction of the law respecting the employment of children. In 1883 the number of offences reported was 613, in 1884 it was 577; in 1885, 1,088; and last year, 1,499. In Germany there is a growing opinion in favour of an increase of the minimum age at which children can be put to work; that the age of fourteen is not too high.

'THE CONDITION OF THE WORKING-CLASSES.'

I.

THE wise of the world have declared that labour is honourable, that "work is the only noble thing," and although civilised society—sham that it is—says so too, the nobleman to-day is not the labourer—was he ever?—but the idler. The ideal man of the Christian faith was a workman, and though for centuries his deeds have been glorified, to-day, as when he lived, the worker sheds his blood that the shirker may lap it and live. But the feeling that the game of gammon would soon be up has induced some considerable section of the shirkers, in hope, perchance, that it might stave off the evil day of the workers' emancipation, to manifest a dilettante interest in the welfare of the workers, to fool about in matters pertaining to art and science, to "rusticate" in summer-time among agricultural folk, in short, potter about, pretending to work but taking care not to do so. And following in their wake is a class of persons which not being able to live entirely without labouring has, through the kindly offices of its more fortunate friends, been secured some comfortable and lucrative position, where the work may be said to be "put out" for somebody else to do. And so we come down by gentle gradations to those whom the disease of indolence has not wholly contaminated, but which would soon succumb did its olfactory organs in the course of its labours greet anything less pleasant than eau de cologne.

We may divide off the whole of those alluded to up till now from the working-classes proper, and although perhaps, if we were to analyse them thoroughly, we might find 1 per cent. performing some useful service to society, the other 99 per cent., we venture to assert, would be found to be so much human dross. And if it were inanimate society would not be much encumbered by its existence, but being corporeal and omnivorous it eats out its very heart.

But this is all mere generalisation, and that we may ascertain what is and what has been the condition of the working-classes, we must descend to detail.

Beginning at the latter half of last century, let us examine their condition from that time to the present. Before the invention of the "Jenny" by James Hargreaves in 1767, the condition of the working-classes was as compared to their present, one of affluence and comfort, then the handicraftsman supplied the community with those commodities which machinery plus the machine-tender does to-day:

"Wife and daughter spun the yarn that the father wove or that they sold, if he did not work himself. These weaver families lived in the country in the neighbourhood of the towns, and got on fairly well with their wages, because the home market was almost the only one, and the crushing power of competition that came later with the conquest of foreign markets and the extension of trade, did not yet press upon wages. There was further a constant increase in the demand of the home market, keeping pace with the slow increase in population and employing all the workers; and there was also the impossibility of vigorous competition of the workers among themselves, consequent upon the rural dispersion of their homes. So it was that the weaver was usually in a position to lay by something, and rent a little piece of land that he cultivated in his leisure hours, of which he had as many as he chose to take, since he could weave whenever and as long as he pleased. True he was a bad farmer, and managed his land inefficiently; nevertheless, he was no proletarian, he had a stake in the country, and stood one step higher in society than the English workmen of to-day."

What was true of the weaver was true of the workers generally, and although so far as their material needs were concerned they were fairly satisfied, intellectually they were dead.

The effect of the invention of Hargreaves, and those of Arkwright, Crompton, Cartwright, Watt, and others, and the improvements effected upon them from year to year, was that a "complete victory of machine work over hand-work was won in the chief branches of English industry, and from that time forward history simply relates how the hand-workers have been driven from one position after another." From the use of these numerous labour-saving appliances, the manufacturing system grew and developed, and with it also that class—the Proletariat—which, before what is known as the industrial system began to develop, had practically no existence in this country. "Hitherto, the worker had always had the prospect of establishing himself somewhere as a master artificer, perhaps employing journeymen and apprentices; but now, when large capital had become necessary for carrying on work independently, the working-class became for the first time, an integral, permanent class of the population." "Now the worker was born to toil, and had no other prospect than that of remaining a toiler all his life."

By the year 1844 the capitalistic system of production had so developed itself, that it had reduced the workers to a propertyless labour-vending class; it found them concentrated, or rather herded together in the great towns, which had by this time become veritable cesspools of human filth. In Manchester, from 40,000 to 50,000 persons were living in cellars; in London, Liverpool, Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Birmingham, the dwellings were so abominably foul and unsanitary as to be almost past describing. Overcrowding was general throughout the working-class quarters of all the large towns. Here is a sample taken at random from Engel's book: "In the parishes of St. John and St. Margaret, London, there lived in 1840, 5,366 working-men's families in 5,294 'dwellings' (if they deserve the name), men, women, and children thrown together without distinction of age or sex, 26,830 persons all told; and of these families three-fourths possessed but one room." These together paid a joint rental of £40,000 per year. Hundreds of thousands crowded together in common lodging-houses, and all the horrors of disease and misery brought to light by the recent "Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working-classes" abounded, but in a more intense form. It is a sickening picture to dwell on, these poisoning, soul-killing holes into which the workers—from whose ingenuity all the wonderful contrivances which have revolutionised production have been evolved, and the immense wealth which has resulted from their use has been acquired—are forced to creep.

The "manner in which the need of a shelter is satisfied furnishes a standard for the manner in which all the other necessities are supplied." Offal and rags supplying the place of life-sustaining and weather-protecting food and clothing. This is the reward of society to the workers, to whom it owes everything—its very existence.

The lot of the serf was an enviable one as compared to that of the free labourer, he at any rate had secured him the means of life, which the competitive system, "the battle of all against all," denies to the free-labourer. "Left to himself he cannot live a single day." The bourgeois has a monopoly of all the means of subsistence. Work for him the labourer must, when, where, and how he pleases, he must compete with his fellows for the opportunity to hire himself out—for there is always a surplus of labour in the market—and the result of the struggle to obtain employment is that the successful obtain work, and to the unsuccessful is left the choice of starving, stealing, or the workhouse. And those, the "fortunate," what is their lot?—the great pleasure of slavery for a bare subsistence wage. But the struggle for supremacy goes on among the monopolists as well as among the labourers; the possessor of the best "wage-saving machinery, i.e., the means of producing goods the cheapest, drives remorselessly the weaker monopolist, the small capitalist, out of the market and even sometimes bodily out of existence. And not within the nation does the struggle end, right throughout the civilised world the battle rages, nation fights nation, thousands of proletarians dye the fields with human gore, that the monopolist may find a "shoot" for his shoddy wares.

Thus competition goes blindly and ruthlessly on, dividing mankind into warring atoms, destroying its social instincts and making all men foes. And so it must go on until it is dead and mutual interest draws men together in holy brotherhood.

An article on "The Unemployed" by Bennet Burleigh is announced for the next number of the Contemporary.

HER MAJESTY'S GUESTS.

BEING one of those arrested in Trafalgar Square on Sunday the 13th, I think that my experience will be of interest, and may be of some use to those who are likely to find themselves in the same position.

Immediately on my arrest two policemen searched all my pockets, under the pretext of finding revolvers, knives, or dynamite bombs, and then I was marched to Scotland Yard under an escort of five foot and three mounted men, one being deputed to take charge of my right hand, and on no account to let go of it. On arrival I was placed in a room with ten policemen and their prisoners. From the remarks which fell from some of the police, I came to the conclusion that several of them had taken prisoners in order to escape from the mêlée and get a rest and a quiet booze, as several of them had provided themselves with bottles of spirits which were stowed away in a sort of secret pocket in their coat-tails. One of them started a discussion on Socialism with me, which we carried on for about half an hour. Another who sat close by, feeling himself aggrieved by having to do some amount of extra duty, kept interjecting, putting his wrongs down to the vicious activity of myself and comrades, generally concluding with, "If I had my way, I'd chuck the lot of you into the river."

We were detained at Scotland Yard until about 7.30, when we were removed to King Street, Westminster, police-station—fifteen prisoners, under an escort of forty-five foot police and ten mounted men—where we were charged and placed nine in a cell; and although ordinary prisoners can obtain an evening meal by paying for it, we were kept without food until 7.30 a.m., having had nothing to eat since dinner except one or two whose friends had seen their arrest and brought them some food. I found that those of my fellow prisoners who were not dressed "respectably" had received a good cudgelling on their arrest and were kicked and punched unmercifully while going through the station yards, which were full of police. One was so bruised and sore that he was unable to lie down all night.

About ten o'clock a number of prisoners were removed in cabs to the various stations in the neighbourhood, leaving three in our cell. A policeman pushed a rug through the wicket, informing us surlily that was all we should get; and as the rug would only cover one, we took it in turns, when we could get to sleep, which was not till the police had finished hurrahing over the day's achievements, and inviting Britannia to continue ruling the waves, for Britons never, never, never would be slaves.

The following morning, after having a pint of coffee and two slices at the expense of the country, and not being allowed to wash, we were removed in the "Queen's omnibus" to Bow Street at 9 a.m. On the evidence of a policeman, without corroboration, being fined forty shillings or twenty-one days, I was put back into a cell without being allowed to send to my friends for the amount of the fine, or to obtain any food even by paying for it; and at 5 p.m. I was removed to Millbank prison, my requests to be allowed to send a note or telegram to a friend being referred to the governor of Millbank.

When we arrived we were ushered into a long corridor with cells all along the left-hand side, and near the entrance a room which we were invited to enter and be seated. This room was half paved and half board floor, with a fire in the corner. A warder was seated on the board half in front of a desk, a standard of height, and a weighing machine. We were seated on the paved half directly in line with the door by which we entered, and another door opening into a room in which we were undressed, our clothes being made up into a bundle by one of the long-term convicts, who took to himself all the airs of a warder. Beyond this room was the bath-room, in which were three small concrete baths partitioned off from each other, containing about ten gallons of warm water each, in which eighteen of us had to bathe, the water being unchanged! Marvellous ingenuity had been lavished upon the sanitary arrangements of this palatial residence. The ventilation especially attracted my attention. A perfect hurricane swept through the corridor, and through the open door, through us and the rooms where we were stripping and bathing; and in order that our constitutions might not be too severely tried by feeling at once the extremes of heat and cold, the warmth of the fire was carefully kept from us by a screen which served the double purpose of keeping at the same time the draught from the warder and preserving to him the full heat of the fire. An inventory was taken of our names, ages, religions, occupations, heights, weights, and clothes. We bathed and were then furnished with a suit of prison clothes by one of the aforesaid convicts. On getting into mine, I found them to be an ingenious muddle, one sock just fitted me, the heel of the other reached the middle of my foot; and when I drew the attention of the clothier to it, he wanted to know whether I wished him to go to Regent Street and buy a pair (I presumed he would welcome the chance). I found the shoes ditto, but he soothed me with a promise to change them in the morning. Finally we were served with a ½-lb. loaf of bread each and sent to our cells, where we found some water to moisten it with. This was the first food we had since 7 a.m.

The following morning we were served with another loaf of bread about 7 a.m., and about 8 a warder came round with another convict carrying a basketful of hymn and prayer books and bibles, but as I had saved my soul from that everlasting hypocrisy I refused them. He then took the name and address of the friend to whom I wished to send for the amount of my fine, and departed. At 10.30 I was called out and informed that my fine had been paid, and at 11 a.m. I was released, having been confined 42 hours.

Now what I want to call attention to is the barbarity with which prisoners who from their appearance were assumed to be poor, and therefore friendless, were treated. After having a good clubbing before arrest, they were kicked and punched in the station-yard. Then we were all indiscriminately starved for two days. Several of my fellow-prisoners who were in work were deliberately detained until past mid-day on Tuesday, in order that even the majority who were able to obtain the payment of their fine would lose their work; for though an employer might excuse one day's absence, two would be beyond his patience. In the present state of the labour-market, what privation will they and their families suffer before obtaining work again! Not only were we prevented from communicating with our friends, but our friends were debarred all knowledge of where we were or what our sentences amounted to; whereas on ordinary occasions the information is readily obtained. I received my sentence before 12 noon, and between 2 and 6 o'clock my friends come four times to Bow Street to see what they could do for me, and all their enquiries elicited was "Don't know; wait; come again." Working men who read this should do their best to help in providing against this new method of terrorising even "constitutional agitation."

T. CANTWELL.

WHAT I LIVE FOR.

(See "My Aim," in Commonweal, October 8.)

I LIVE for those above me, who rob me of my due,
Who feign, good lack! to love me—but love my labour too;
I live, all meek and lowly, while want consumes me slowly,
For the end and object solely of the work that I can do.

I live to serve my master, to wait his beck and call,
And woful's the disaster which rids me of his thrall;
I cling to those who use me, who scorn, despise, abuse me,—
I labour for their needs alone and not mine own at all.

I live—and that suffices! I live as lives the swine,
No historic page entices, I nothing may divine
Of Nature and her beauties, of manhood and its duties,—
Already damned and mute is the soul that should be mine.

I live for those above me—myself a traitor to!
To god and man and neighbour consistently untrue.
A man in shape and stature, a "hand" in nomenclature,
A coward slave by nature, who, if he dared, might do.

A WORKER.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor's halfpenny evening paper will be called the Evening Star, and will appear early in next January. It cannot be published sooner than it is wanted.

'Coercion without Crime,' by J. A. Fox (Nat. Press Agency, Whitefriars, 1d.), contains a summary of the charges of H.M. judges to the various grand juries throughout Ireland at the Summer Assizes of this year, held while the Coercion Bill was passing, and most effectually crushes the contentions made in support of that measure.

'Paris and London: a bundle of contrasts,' by Jules Magny (Standing, Finsbury Pavement, 1d.), is a pamphlet principally translated from the preface to an as-yet-unpublished work of M. Félix Pyat entitled 'Angleterre et France.' The contrasts between Parisians and Londoners are amusingly and pointedly put, though a few are rather strained for antithesis' sake.

'Rhyme and Reason,' by H. S. Salt (Modern Press, 1d.) is a collection of verses reprinted from Justice, with the "Modern Guy Fawkes" from the Commonweal of November 5. The writer is too well known to need introduction to our readers, who are pretty familiar by this time with his witty and striking productions both in verse and prose.

Mr. Thomas Kirkup, writer of the admirable article on Socialism in the present edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica, is about to issue a volume entitled 'An Enquiry into Socialism.' Those who have read his historical article will look with great interest for the appearance of his book, which is designed to explain the root-ideas of Socialism, both in contrast with those of the present system and those of certain theories usually mistaken for Socialism. Messrs. Longman will be the publishers.

Articles of interest to Socialists in November magazines:—Murray's: "Irish Secret Societies," Capt. Ross of Bladensburg. Antiquary: "Open-air Assemblies," G. L. Gomme, F.S.A. Blackwood's: "Self-government v. Home Rule." Women's World: "The Fallacy of the Superiority of Man," Mrs. Chas. McLaren. Century: "Prison Life of the Russian Revolutionists," Geo. Kennan. Fortnightly: "Count Leo Tolstoi," Matthew Arnold; "The Sweating System," David F. Schloss; "Our National Expenditure," Prof. Leone Levi; "Labour Organisation," Canon Leigh.

'The Politics of Labour,' by Phillips Thompson (Bedford, Clarke, and Co., New York and Chicago), is a well-written and useful addition to the growing library which is being provided for the studious worker. It is written to suit American conditions, and its instances and applications are also transatlantic, but it is well worth perusal by men of other nations who are not Socialists; the full-fledged Socialist will read it with interest and pleasure but glean little new learning from it. It is a book of the kind that a few years ago would have been ushered into the world amid "excursions and alarms," but is now becoming part of the expected and therefore unalarming fruit of the press. In sending review copy all mention of the price at which it is sold has been omitted.

'A Dock Labourer's Bitter cry,' by Benjamin Tillet (Author, 19 Hunslet Street, Bethnal Green, E., 1d.), is an address delivered by the writer to his fellow "Dockers" at a meeting held in support of the union they have formed and is an admirable statement of the ills from which they suffer. We quote from his prefatory note:

"'Horrible London' is painfully and acutely realised by our 'class' in all its agonising torment and debasement. We, the 'Dockers,' are among the 'Lazaruses' that starve upon the crumbs from the rich man's table. An endeavour is being made to shorten our supply even of them. At present, under a thin film of civilisation, there is a mass of corruption, stagnant and putrid, the rotten fruit of poverty. I cannot wonder that men lose the dignity of their manhood, when they are driven helter-skelter to the gutter by a system that degrades and imbrutes on the one hand, in proportion as it profits and enriches on the other. There can be nothing ennobling in an atmosphere where we are huddled and herded together like cattle; there is nothing refining in the thought that to obtain employment we are driven into a shed, iron-barred from end to end, outside of which a foreman or contractor walks up and down with the air of a dealer in a cattle-market, picking and choosing from a crowd of men, who in their eagerness to obtain employment, trample each other under-foot, and where like beasts they fight for the chances of a day's work."

WRONG FOR ONCE.—A FACT.—Scene, private bar of the "Drones" public-house; customers drinking and smoking. Landlord enters and in the most insinuating manner thus addresses a small ring of his own specially-selected confidants: "Well, gentlemen, I suppose you have sworn yourselves in as special constables! At least, I—er—hope so." One of the Select: "No, I haven't. I should have been on the wrong side if I had; I saw the abominable outrage which the police committed upon the people the other Sunday." Speedy exit of the landlord, who didn't "show up" any more that evening and the public wondered why.—H. A. B.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

YORKSHIRE FARM SERVANTS.—A great many farm servants are out of work in Yorkshire since the termination of the Martinmas contracts. The wages have fallen from £1 to £1, 10s. per head, and farmers seem determined to retrench as much as possible in the matter of hand labour.

WORK ON THE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL.—The contractor of the Manchester Ship Canal hopes to get the steam navvies or excavators at work, within a week. The engagement of labourers would then begin. The 400 men now at work are receiving some 4½d. and others 4¼d. per hour. About 2000 labourers will be required on the first section.

STARVING LABOURERS IN TIPPERARY.—Last Wednesday a body of unemployed labourers attended the meeting of the Tipperary board of guardians, seeking employment and outdoor relief. They stated that their wives and children were starving. After some discussion the labourers left to interview the parish priest, Rev. Canon Cahill, with a view to organising a fund for their relief.

THE GLASGOW TRADES COUNCIL AND THE RUSSIAN POLES.—At the meeting of the Council last week Mr. Hodge gave notice of the following motion: "That the action of Messrs. Merry and Cuninghame, who pose as patriots and constitutionalists, in importing Russian Poles, and keeping them huddled together in such numbers so that from their filthy condition they are a source of danger to the general community, calls for public indignation; that it is the duty of the authorities to take action, so that they shall not become a source of danger to and a burden on the community."

WEST CUMBERLAND IRONWORKERS.—An important conference of the ironmasters of West Cumberland with their workmen and furnacemen about the proposed reduction of 10 per cent. in wages is likely to stave off a strike or lock-out. The masters explain that it is impossible for them to pay the current rates at present prices, and they are therefore obliged to ask for this reduction, and if this were not granted some of the works would be obliged to stop. It is the condition of trade which forces the masters to ask the men to accept less wages. The men have not as yet given their answer to the proposals, but it is likely they will make the concession and afterwards adopt a sliding scale.

G. W. GOODS GUARDS.—There are few men who have more unsatisfactory conditions of service than the G. W. goods guards, who, though only supposed to work sixty-six hours for a week's pay, are not paid for their overwork unless the total number of hours worked in a fortnight exceed 144, and then only at the rate of twelve hours per day. It will thus be seen that a guard might work, say, eighty-four hours one week and sixty the next without receiving a farthing extra; also that to receive a quarter day's overtime, 147 hours would have to be worked in a fortnight. Some years ago the G. W. guards acted as if they meant to have this unfair system changed, but they seem to have abandoned the agitation raised against it.—Railway Review.

MOTHERWELL (SCOTLAND) MINERS.—The colliers employed at the Camp Works, occupied by Mr. Williams, have not resumed work in consequence of a grievance with regard to deductions of weights which they allege are unjust. In consequence of this dispute the whole of the miners of the district held an idle day on the 24th. A mass meeting was held in the Dalzell hall to hear the complaints of the men. Mr. John Donnelly presided. The result of the meeting was that it was unanimously agreed that the Camp men come out on strike and remain idle till their grievances are removed. It was also agreed that the district contribute so much per man weekly to support the Camp men. By this action about 150 men will remain idle.

THE UNEMPLOYED IN NORWICH.—Frightened by the attitude of the starving men of last winter, the authorities here determined to open some relief works. Several hundred tons of unbroken granite have been ordered, and men employed to break it. The applicants for the work must first provide themselves with a character from their last employer. They are paid the princely wage of five farthings a bushel, and men unused to such work cannot break, in many instances, more than two bushels a day. They begin at seven in the morning and work till dark. Some poor fellows have come to me after a day's work with swollen wrists and blistered fingers, totally unfitted for a second day's experience.—F. H.

THE BROXBURN STRIKE.—This strike has lasted twenty weeks, and it is evident that there is no immediate prospect of a settlement, the relations between the employers and the strikers being more embittered than ever. Last week six miners called at the Miners' Union Office, stating that they had come from Auchinleck, Ayrshire, intending to begin work, being informed that the strike was practically over. They declared they had been misled and were going to return home. A number of their comrades from Ayrshire had also agreed to come, but they had telegraphed them to stay at home. They also handed over to the Union executive several letters they had received from Mr. N. M. Henderson, works manager, in which they were offered 4s. 6d. a shift or tonnage or fathomage. Letters also flow in to the Union office from various parts of the country stating how agents or contractors of the company are treating men with a view to inducing them to go to Broxburn, but who, after getting as much beer as possible, refuse to go. The executive have again issued a revised list and description of the blacklegs, and call on all miners to keep away from Broxburn during the dispute.

THE CROFTERS' RAID ON THE DEER FOREST.—Military, marines and police have now arrived in the district but are inactive, as the men engaged in the recent raid are surrendering themselves voluntarily. In one case sixty crofters marched in a body to the nearest police-station to answer the charges against them. Mr. Donald Macrae, teacher, and Mr. Roderick Mackenzie, merchant, both of Balallan, were brought before Sheriff Fraser on Monday and remanded, on a charge of inciting a large number of persons to combine together for the purpose of participating in the raid. There seems to have been a satisfactory amount of sport and a large number of "common" people enjoyed the somewhat unusual treat of a good "tuck in" of venison. It is to be hoped that the crofters will not allow their comrades to be victimised.—Mr. D. H. Macfarlane, of Portman Square, W. (ex-M.P. for Argyllshire, and president of the Highland Land League, has communicated to Mr. M. Macleod, Stornoway, his sympathy with the crofters and cottars who were driven through the desperation of poverty to make a raid on Park Forest, and his willingness to become bail for all who may be arrested in connection with the proceedings. A fund is being raised in London on behalf of the raiders and others, and Dr. Macdonald, M.P., Palace Chambers, Westminster, S.W., is acting as hon. treasurer.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

HOLLAND.

Comrade Cohen, who committed the offence of crying aloud in the street: "Away with Gorilla" on the passage of the ape-faced King William III., has got six months' imprisonment for it. Our comrade, who defended himself, delivered one of the wittiest speeches ever heard in a law court. Recht voor Allen (Justice for All) reproduces the entire address as a masterly little bit of propaganda.

It is believed that Recht voor Allen, which now appears three times a week, will ere long become a daily paper.

A new organ of the Dutch Socialists is about to be started at Amsterdam. His title will be Excelsior (Further Ahead!).

GERMANY.

The Federal Council of the German Empire is going to bring about a new scheme of law, which assuredly will be agreed upon by the legislature, to the effect of trying all political cases throughout Germany within closed doors! That's the very thing which remains to be done by that gang of criminal reactionaries who style themselves legislators. In that way the German Nupkins, low and high, will be enabled to suppress Socialists with much more ease even than they have done hitherto. How long that scandalous system will last is quite another thing altogether; many symptoms show that our German friends are at last becoming out of patience, and such miserable laws will only help them to lose their temper.

In a few days a great trial of Socialists will be held at Posen, when a large number of our comrades will be sentenced, as the bourgeois papers tell us beforehand. The bill of indictment is a large octavo-sized volume of no less than four hundred and forty-one pages! How many pages of magisterial nonsense that volume contains is not stated, but surely we may say four hundred.

The Socialist trial at Breslau has come to an end. Eight of the accused have been acquitted, twenty-nine others sentenced to various terms of imprisonment varying from four weeks to one year. Eight men got off scot free! But once does not make a habit.

The German papers announced a few days ago that William Hasenclever had suddenly become insane, and been conveyed to a lunatic asylum at Berlin. He has rendered to the Socialist cause in Germany valuable services, and his loss will be heavily felt by his fellow-workers in the revolutionary struggle. He was born on the 19th of April, 1837, at Arnsberg, in Westphalia, where he visited the local schools. As a handworker, he travelled all through Germany and Northern Italy. In 1862-63, he became editor of the Westphälische Volkszeitung at Hagen, then contributor to the first Sozial Demokrat and to the Agitator, and afterwards director of the Neue Sozial Demokrat and publisher of the Sozial Politische Blätter. In the year 1868 he was elected general cashier of the General German Workmen's Association, 1870-71 secretary of the same, and from July 1st, 1871 to 1875 chairman of that body. He presided over the general Congresses of the party at Gotha in 1875, 1876, and 1877. In the autumn of 1875 he became the chief editor of the Hamburg Altonaer Volksblatt, and in 1876 was chosen with Liebknecht as one of the editors of Vorwärts, the central organ of the Socialist party of Germany. He was expelled in 1881 from Leipzig, and lived since that time at Würzen and at Halle. From 1869-70 he was a member of the North German Reichstag, and from 1874 until 1886 member of the new Reichstag, successively for Altona, Breslau, and Berlin.

At Breslau, the police have suppressed the Socialist paper Volksstimme (Voice of the People). These silly folk think that by suppressing papers they will at last suppress Socialism, when their stupid tyranny is the very thing to create new revolutionists.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

At Haschendorf, near Vienna, an Anarchist named Benedict Stark has been arrested, after having been for a long time wanted by the police. He was a prominent member of the party, well known in Switzerland and among London Anarchists. It is said that he has been betrayed by some scoundrel who has lived in London, and was known as an extra-clever Anarchist. The trial of comrade Stark will perhaps bring us some more disclosures about the personage we are alluding to.

A week ago a Russian Socialist, Leo Jassiewicz, was extradited from Vienna and given up to the Russian police under very cruel circumstances. His extradition was demanded on account of his having been an accomplice to the execution of the late Czar. After two months' imprisonment, which he underwent in the prison infirmary of Vienna (our friend came to Austria in a dying condition), he was happy enough to disprove the charges brought against him. But the Russian police did not intend to lose their prey and brought a new charge forward, that of having been concerned in a "robbery" at a post-office. He was able to show that at the time of that "robbery" he was several hundred miles away from the spot, then being in fact in Siberia, where he had been transported by administrative order as a Socialist. The Austrian magistrates declared themselves satisfied that he had provisoriely disqualified the new indictment, but resolved at the same time to send him to Russia, in order that he might disprove the accusation definitively. The Austrian beasts send an innocent man to his mortal enemies, knowing very well that he will be done to death for some reason or other. These judges are worthy of their fellow-brethren, the monstrous German Reichsgerichts scoundrels.

ITALY.

Il Demolitore (The Destroyer) has been obliged to stop its publication, owing to police prosecutions. But our Neapolitan friends will, as soon as they possibly can, start it anew. At Marsala a new Socialist paper, Fiaccola (The Torch), has been issued. At the offices of the Gazzetta Operaia (Worker's Paper) at Torino, our Italian friends will publish this week a volume of one hundred pages, entitled, 'The Trial of the Chicago Anarchists.' It will contain a brief account of that scandalous class trial, and the speeches of the revolutionary martyrs. All over the country, and specially among the peasants or landworkers, Socialism is spreading in a most remarkable and vigorous way. All the attempts of the police to check the movement are vain; as soon as a paper is forced to disappear, half-a-dozen others are ready to replace the fallen combatant; as soon as one comrade is imprisoned, several others are at hand filling the ranks and taking their share in the struggle. The Italian youth specially are admirable; their enthusiasm for the Cause of Revolution goes beyond all description.

LETTER FROM AMERICA.

THE minute description of all the ghastly details of the Chicago crime has had an effect entirely unexpected by the capitalistic press in their rush for pennies. It has inflamed every Socialist with a spirit of revenge, and even the mildest and those who up to now only hated the system, cannot help after the events of last Friday feeling bitterly, very bitterly against some persons prominently connected with this affair. There is no loud talk—this might not be very dangerous—but quiet is all the more significant, and the determination seen on many faces forebodes evil for capitalism. When the bodies were handed over to their families, Mrs. Parsons received the body of her husband in person. She lifted the lid of the casket, mechanically she untied the strings of the cap and took it off. Then she took a long, intense view at the remains of her murdered husband, bending over and passionately kissing the cold lips. "The grief of this woman which knows no tears is more terrible to our law and order people than a thousand rioters," said a policeman, and he is right!

The wives of Fischer, Engel, and Spies are completely broken down. Lingg has no family in Chicago, but his poor old mother in Germany must suffer terribly. She is as noble as the mother of the Gracchi. "Do not show these people any fear; step firmly on the gallows. You die for a just cause," are some of the words she wrote to her son but a few days before his death. Saturday the bodies lay in state at their homes, and were visited by nearly all Chicago. Yesterday (Sunday) was the day of the burial. It was a grand funeral, and the capitalistic press is perfectly terror-stricken. "We thought we had killed Anarchism!" they exclaim, "it seems, however, we have made propaganda for it, and have made those who are already Anarchists more determined." Verily they speak the truth.

The remains of the men rested in plain black coffins. Each of the four martyrs had a red sash round his chest. About 20,000 persons composed the funeral cortege, and 250,000 more witnessed the procession. The procession marched most solemnly through the streets of Chicago to the railway station, where an express train conducted the mourners to Waldheim cemetery. Captain Black made the funeral oration. It was a splendid discourse. "It is said that these men were of no religion. That is a libel. Their religion was the best of all creeds—love of fellow-men—and it filled their whole lives with deeds of devotion and tenderness. Their creed would have to do with the to-morrow of the coming revolution, and the whole of their philosophy as Anarchists was the establishment of an order of things that should be symbolised in the words, 'Order without force.'" He was followed by Thomas J. Morgan, whose speech is to-day compared in effectiveness and beauty of language to Marc Antony's famous oration over Caesar's body. After his speech the people took each other's hands in token of sworn brotherhood. The proceedings finished soon after, and the mourners returned to town.

If capitalists but knew the feelings sincere revolutionists experienced during the last few days, the joy paraded to-day might perhaps not be so great.

LABOUR MOVEMENTS.

The compositor's and pressmen's strike at New York has ended in the return of the men to work. The fight for the "card office" rule was lost, but the men claim that they have won a partial victory because of the advance in wages conceded and the adoption of the apprentice system. The bosses assert that over 200 printers are out of work by reason of the strike.

About 800 men out on strike in Davies's County, Indiana, have gone back to work. It is expected that the strike will end shortly. In all about 3,000 men are involved. The result of the strike is slightly in favour of the bosses.

The strike of sugar hands in Louisiana is general in Iberia, Lafamche, Terrebonne, and St. Mary parishes, and affects about 200 plantations large and small. The average number employed on a plantation is fifty persons. The strikers are all negroes. The strike was ordered by the Knights of Labour for an advance of 25 cents per day. The general estimate of persons affected by the strike is 10,000. The governor has sent troops to the scene of the strike.

The brass-workers' lock-out in New York and Brooklyn has ended in the defeat of the men, who have nearly all gone back to work.

It is estimated that 1,000 textile workers are out of work in Philadelphia owing to slackness of trade.

The glass manufacturers have decided that every glass factory in the East will be shut down in case the strike of the Western glass-workers takes place on November 27. It is claimed that 7,000 hands will be involved.

The dispute between the miners and operators in Southern Illinois has been settled by a compromise. The miners get about half the advance they demanded.

Late advices indicate that the reported settlement of the coal strike in Davies's County, Indiana, was premature. The action of the President of the Federation in settling the strike on such a basis has been condemned by the men, and he has been deposed from his office. The coal miners in the neighbourhood of Evansville who returned to work, have again gone out.

The latest despatch from New Orleans says: "The strike among the sugar labourers is over, but the military is still kept in the district."

SONGS OF LABOUR.

In one of your "Notes" you might perhaps give a hint that would be taken up by some one of your readers whereby fame if not fortune might be secured, to say nothing of the service rendered to the cause. There are no good practical English words to the "Marseillaise." Anyone who has noted the inspiring effect of the glorious song even when merely played, can readily imagine that, with words, we may yet see the day when it will be prohibited in the streets of London.

Highgate, Nov. 21.

[There are several other good tunes to which the same thing might be done. We shall be glad to receive the songs when written.]

A GOOD PROPOSAL.

I am desirous of forming a Junior Socialist Improvement Society, the object of which will be to educate each other's friends in the principles by evening fireside talks. If any young Socialist would like to communicate with me on the subject, I should be glad of his or her assistance.

"GLASS-HOUSE" RHETORIC.—The following is taken from the speech delivered by Lord Salisbury at Oxford on the 23rd inst., and irresistibly reminds one of the danger attributed to stone-throwing under certain conditions:—"Sir George Trevelyan seems to think that when a man has a party, and when a man has convictions—if his convictions and his party go together all is for the best, but if his convictions are on one side and his party on the other so much the worse for the convictions. Now that seems to me to be an entire distortion of the idea of party, which, if it is not to become a positive evil in the State, must always be the union of men honestly wishing the same objects, and struggling for it on that account. Directly it becomes the union of men who have conflicting opinions and wish politically for different objects, and is only maintained in order that a certain party may retain all its vigour, and that certain politicians may resume their places in Downing Street, then it becomes, instead of a beneficent and honourable institution, a mere joint-stock company for the maintenance of place and power."

NOTES ON NEWS.

A CERTAIN Mr. Pynes offered a petition to Lord Hartington as he made his triumphal entry into Dublin the other day, and his lordship declining in a royal way to accept it, Mr. Pynes adventurously threw it into the carriage, whereupon the police arrested him and he was brought before a magistrate next day; but luckily for him he was in Dublin and not in London (where there is no Coercion Act), so the magistrate dismissed the charge.

"The police, excited by the hooting, behaved like ruffians, and dealt blows with clenched fists to utterly harmless individuals who had remained within arm's length."—Daily News.

What! is the Daily News coming round, then? Why, we shall have Mr. Gladstone next taking some notice of the bludgeoning of "harmless individuals" by our "admirable police"—Nay, stop a little! This report is from Paris, not London!

For the information of our comrades and other readers in the country I should mention that, however incredible the account of the behaviour of the police to the prisoners of Bloody Sunday, as published by the Pall Mall, may seem to them, there is no doubt that it is true, and they must believe in it. Indeed, after all, is there anything to wonder at in it? Such brutality is the blossom of the slum-life enforced on the "lower classes" by our civilisation. Enlist that brutality in the service of a class whose one business is to uphold the oppression on which it lives; when occasion demands it, harass your enlisted brutality by sending it fools' errands up and down, and down and up; make it clear to the servants of law and order that in such service they can only commit one fault—to wit, behaving civilly and decently; promote men like Mr. Superintendent Shepherd, to show your "admirable police" what model they should follow; and then sit down quietly and without fear, enwrapped in your respectability, and you may be quite sure of the results.

The preliminary trial of Cunninghame Graham and Burns in Bow Street was curious to witness and sufficiently damaging to the Government and its tool Wooden Warren—i.e., it would have been if the evidence for the defence had not been suppressed by the daily papers. Of course if Mr. Vaughan had not been practically under orders he must have dismissed the case, but equally of course it was more than his place was worth to do. The police gave their evidence in the usual way, and if there is any truth in an old saw, there must be few pots in the neighbourhood which have kept their legs, especially after Shepherd had done his duty. He was well "sorted" by Mr. Asquith in cross-examination: the latter, by the way, was a brilliant contrast to that Knight of the Doleful Countenance, Mr. Poland, and I am really sorry that he is a lawyer.

The evidence for the defence was so clear and unanswerable that Poland had nothing for it but the regular traditional brow-beating, which served his turn very poorly, not only, as was to be expected, with such an old stager as Mr. Bradlaugh, or with Mr. Hyndman (who he had the impudence to ask to give the names of the others who formed the group about Mr. Graham and Burns), but even with the ordinary witnesses. In short, Poland tried hard to establish that the Government had with great difficulty quelled a dangerous riot headed by the defendants, and only succeeded in showing that the police attacked Graham and Burns as they attacked other citizens on that day.

Of course, unless the jury is very well packed, our friends will be acquitted; but one can't help asking, supposing Burns had been by himself, what would have happened? And again, how about the victims of the drum-head court-martial, with no clever Mr. Asquith (he is clearly very clever) to defend them, and no respectable witnesses like Sir E. J. Reid and Mr. Bradlaugh on their side? We shall have to ask, as we asked before, if these men are acquitted or only have a formal sentence, what is to be done to compensate the defenceless men who have been sentenced, and what ignominious punishment is to be meted out to their sentencers?

I came in for a quaint little piece of coercion last Friday. I had been invited to lecture on Socialism and the "disturbances" in London in the parish school-room at Buscott, a little village high up the Thames, by the rector, our friend Mr. Oswald Birchall. It had been agreed some little time back by the squire and other village magnates, who at the time wanted the said school-room for Primrose League purposes, that it should be free to speakers of all parties; so I went down expecting the usual quiet meeting; but at the last minute the said magnates forbade the meeting, I believe on the grounds that they expected a riot if I showed there. Then they stole a march on Mr. Birchall by locking up the room and taking the key away and "picketing" the room to send away anyone who might come to the meeting. We tried to get the publican to let us have a room, which, however, he declined to do, fearing, not without reason, the wrath of the squire and farmers. However, things went pretty well, as, in spite of all precautions, a few of the right sort had gathered round the school-room and with these we adjourned to the rectory, where we had a very useful meeting, the men listening very attentively and sympathetically. The true story of the "riots" was clearly quite new to them, the Pall Mall (not to speak of the Commonweal) being of course tabooed in the neighbourhood; but they were clearly much impressed by it, and will spread it about wherever they go. I may say that men like this are not slow to learn the facts of their present position, their slavery to the farmers being so direct that it presses on them every day. A good distribution of leaflets would be fruitful among such men: though many of them cannot read, they would get them read to them.

Mr. Thompson did his best to get a mandamus to compel Mr. Vaughan to hear evidence about the police attack on November 20th on a band of harmless processionists. It was a matter of course that the two "Justices" stuck close to their brother Nupkins of Bow Street, but it is not a very cheering prospect for those who believe that the law will do anything to protect "discontented" people; whether they are "discontented" at having the results of their labour stolen in the lump, or at having their musical instruments stolen every now and then directly to the tune of "Wigs on the Green."

A show of pet dogs opened at St. Stephen's Hall is a good example of the way in which labour is organised amongst us at present, to produce luxuries and to stint the people of necessities, to say nothing of comforts. Perhaps Alderman Knight will suggest that some of the unemployed should have the job of combing the dogs.

Meantime, poor Linnell lies dead, slain by what I suppose the bourgeois press, when they are forced to say something about it, will call a "lamentable accident." It is, however, the kind of "accident" which is likely to become common enough as, on the one hand, the workers become conscious of the fact that they are robbed of the greater part of their earnings, and become less and less inclined to put up with it, and as on the other hand those who live by the robbery get more and more frightened and therefore more and more repressive.

The Lord Mayor of Dublin is sent to prison, in spite of all his state in a sort of mediæval fashion: but the authorities have been afraid of sending him as a proper prisoner, and so have spoilt their joke in a very contemptible manner. I remember when I was a boy I used to hear a good deal about "gentlemen-farmers" (a profession which I suppose has now ceased to exist, what between agricultural depression and the elevation of all farmers to the rank of gentlemen). It seems as if a similar addition must be made in these cases also, and that some people must serve their time as gentlemen-prisoners. The Lord Mayor deserves and has our condolence in having to submit to this insult of gentlemanliness.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

A VOICE FROM AMERICA.

[The following brief account of the events which led to the murder of five working-men and the living death of three others, shows how seriously this terrible and shameful event has stirred people in America in contrast with the interested lying silence of our bourgeois press and the lamentable apathy (the result of ignorance one would fain hope) of our working-classes.—Ed.]

THE EIGHT HOURS' MOVEMENT.

In October, 1884, the Federation of Trade and Labour Unions of the United States and Canada, then in Session in Chicago, resolved that on and after the first day of May, 1886, eight hours should constitute a day's work, and determined to use every endeavour to make the movement a success. In November, 1885, a few individuals in Chicago met and organised the "Eight Hour Association of Chicago." They issued a manifesto, and concluded with the following words, to-day full of significance: "Do you think that capitalists are justified in using all the powers of the Government and Society to reduce the working people to wage-slavery, and to accumulate all the results of societary work in the hands of a small number of millionaires and soulless corporations, and in case of a general movement for eight hours' daily work among the people of the United States, would you demand the interference of the army, police, and sheriff's posse, and employ Pinkerton's hirelings and other mercenaries to coerce the people into submission, and would not such course if adopted inevitably lead to bloodshed, chaos, destruction, and social death?"

Owing to the activity of this Association the movement became general in Chicago, and other cities aimed at emulating it by their co-operation. During the beginning of the agitation our now murdered and imprisoned comrades held aloof from it, not because they were opposed to a reduction of the hours of labour, but because the movement did not strike at the root of the evil. But eventually they were carried away by the overwhelming enthusiasm, and gave it their full support. Possessing the confidence of the great body of wage-workers, whose cause they had for years espoused, they naturally became the champions of the movement owing to their recognised ability, intelligence, and sincerity. Both sides were preparing themselves actively for the great conflict on the coming 1st of May. On the 16th of February, 1886, McCormick's Harvester factory was closed down, and 1200 men were locked out. The dispute arose over a demand on the part of the men that a guarantee should be given that no man in the factory or any one serving on an eight hour committee should be discharged for having acted as a representative of his comrades. This was absolutely refused. On the 2nd of March the locked out men assembled in mass meeting, and were addressed at length by A. R. Parsons and Michel Schwab. The meeting had been called not only for the purpose of stating their grievances, but to protest against the armed force which had been enlisted against them—four hundred uniformed police and three hundred Pinkerton detectives, all armed to the teeth. To beseech an employé not to take the place of another became an attack on the State, and the armed men employed by the State came forth at the behest of capitalists, struck down the peaceable citizens, clubbed and searched them, and cast them into the patrol wagons and hustled them off to prison. The banditti of "law and order" maintained the legal right of capital to do what it pleased with labour, and the authorised "pickpockets" searched every workman for weapons of defence. These stormy scenes but intensified the general feeling of resistance and determination to unite in making the strike of May 1st universal.

THE CHICAGO RIOTS.

The eventful day at last arrived. Fully 25,000 men laid down their tools, and by the 4th of May this number was doubled.

On the 1st of May, the Chicago Daily Mail used the following sentence in an editorial: "These two fellows, Parsons and Spies, have been at work fomenting disorder for the last ten years. . . . Mark them to-day. Keep them in view. Hold them personally responsible for any trouble that occurs. Make an example of them if trouble does occur!"

On the 3rd of May the strike had become general. On that day a riot occurred near the McCormick works, arising out of an attack by the strikers on the "scabs" who had taken their places. Police and Pinkertonians were quickly hurried to the spot, and opening a murderous fire soon cleared the field. It was to protest against the growing tendency to shoot workmen on slight provocation that the now famous meeting at the Haymarket was called. Six men were killed and many wounded by the murderous attack of the order bandits on the McCormick men.

On the 4th of May the following handbill was scattered broadcast through the streets of Chicago:—

"Attention, working-men! Great mass meeting to-night at 7.30 o'clock at the Haymarket, Randolph Street, between Desplaines and Halsted. Good speakers will be present to denounce the latest atrocious acts of the police—the shooting of our fellow-workmen yesterday afternoon.—The Executive Committee."

An immense mass meeting assembled in the Haymarket. Spies spoke first for about twenty minutes. Then Parsons spoke. The audience was very quiet and attentive. Parsons confined himself to the eight hour question. Fielden began to speak at about 10 o'clock. Soon after a dark and threatening cloud moved up from the north. Two-thirds of the people fearing it would rain left the meeting. Mayor Harrison, of Chicago, inspected the meeting. On leaving, he called at Desplaine's police-station, told Captain Bonfield that the speeches were tame, the meeting peaceable, and that he might order the reserves to go home.

When the people left the meeting in swarms, Fielden, who was then on the stand, said: "Stay just a minute longer; I will conclude presently." One minute later 200 policemen formed into line at the intersection of Randolph Street, and marched upon the little crowd in double-quick step. Raising his club in an authoritative way, Captain Ward, addressing his words to Fielden, said: "In the name of the people of the State of Illinois, I command this meeting to disperse." "Captain, this is a peaceable meeting," retorted Fielden, while the Captain turned around to his men and gave the command, "Charge upon them." At this juncture a terrible detonation occurred. A bomb exploded in the lines of the policemen. In an instant the fusillade of the police began. Everybody was running. All this was unexpected, as if suddenly a cloud had burst. Immediately after the explosion the police pulled their revolvers and fired on the crowd. An incessant fire was kept up for nearly two minutes, and at least 250 shots were fired. The air was filled with bullets. The crowd ran up the streets and alleys, and were fired on by the now thoroughly infuriated police. Many of the crowd had taken refuge in the halls or entrances of halls and saloons. As the firing ceased they ventured forth, and were instantly fired upon by the police. At half-past eleven, curiosity and a desire to find friends drew a large number to the spot, and another charge was made and two volleys were fired, which dispersed the crowd. The capitalistic Tribune confesses in plain words: "Goaded to madness the police were in that state of mind which permitted of no resistance, and in a measure they were as dangerous as any mob of Communists, for they were blinded by passion." Eight police were killed or died in consequence of wounds received; sixty-six police were disabled. About seventy working-men were wounded; how many were killed and wounded could never be truly ascertained, as they were mostly picked up by friends and relatives and carried home.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

THIS brings us to the examination of such phrases used by the workers as "There are too many of us," "There is not work enough for us all"; and the ideas which give rise to these expressions also give rise to many of the doings of workers which are so much objected to. Why does the plumber make a hole in the gas-pipe just where it will be hardest to get at? It will find work when the leak is discovered and has to be set right. Why does he rejoice in a frost? For the same reason; it bursts pipes and finds work. Why do men in making and repairing machinery not like to make too good a job of it? It would last too long; they want to see it back again to find them work. What is the foundation for this idea which underlies so much of the action of working men? It is that they are wage-workers; they get no wage except they get work, therefore they desire work. The political economists try to show them and others that if a fire reduces the amount of wealth it must reduce the amount of wages, that bad work which needs doing again leaves so much less to pay wages in another direction. But here they lose sight of the fact that wages are a share of a much larger whole—namely, the produce of the country. Now any increase of that share is a gain to the workers. If by the destruction of a certain portion of wealth in the larger share the workers have more wages it matters not to them whether the total wealth is reduced thereby. The same applies to the introduction of machinery. It is always said that though it throws out of work men in that line it creates a greater demand in another line; but this is not always so, for we must remember that the workers only get one-third of the amount saved—only one-third goes in wages, two-thirds is consumed by non-producers.

Another great source of such actions as I have described above by the plumber, is the competition between different trades for their share of the general purchasing power. This is a branch of competition which has not received as much attention as some others. It is not only that grocer competes against grocer, plumber against plumber, but grocer competes against draper and plumber against confectioner. The frost which is a harvest to the plumber, or the hole he puts in the pipe which finds him another job, takes so much from others; for if a man has an income of two pounds a-week, if ten shillings has to go to the plumber there is ten shillings less to go to grocer, draper, etc. This competition helps the general glut, for not only is each competitor trying to get a large share of the effective demand, but each trade as a whole is trying for a larger share. It is also the cause of partial gluts; each trade tries to persuade the public that it wants a larger proportion of its goods, and offers constant temptations in the form of novelties. After the issue of each successful novelty there is a rush on that trade for a while, but the public are soon satisfied, and go off on another trade, leaving the former one with heaps of stuff for which there is no demand. This constant fluctuation of the amount of work, and so of employment, required in each trade causes a vast amount of uncertainty and misery to the workers. Even in times of general prosperity some freak of fashion will often throw a whole district into poverty, and while the capitalists lose their profits the workers starve. These freaks of fashion are of course sometimes started by the public themselves, but are often the result of competition between firms or trades.

Surely in a rational society demand should come before and be the gauge of supply; now, supply seeks to force demand. Let the people choose what they want, and want things before they are thrust at them, instead of having a thousand trades shouting in their ears "Spend your shilling in this," and this, and this. Tons of rubbish would never be produced but for this forced demand; the proportion between trades would be fairly constant but for this; and the amount of useless work and of misery saved would be simply enormous.

Competition between nations is another form which tends always to reduce the wages of all competing countries down to the level of the lowest amongst them. The employers are constantly pointing to some other country and saying to the workers, "See, their labourers work so many hours longer each day for so many shillings less wages; how can I compete with them?" Then down comes their wages.

This brings us to another root-cause of much of the evil which we want to set right—namely, the opposition of interest between the employers and employed. The economists try to show that their interests are one and the same; they say that good times are good for both and bad times bad for both; that high wages and high profits go together. This may all be true, but it does not show that their interests are the same. Two animals fighting for a carcase are in the same fix, the larger the carcase the better for both, the larger the share of the stronger the more he is likely to allow the weaker to get. Yet, are their interests the same? Each wants the whole, and they fight for it. Why are wages highest when profits are, and lowest when profits are lowest? Why, because the employer takes care to have fifty per cent. profit before he gives twenty per cent. rise in wages. But wages are a share, and when two are fighting for the larger share their interests are hardly identical. The master wants to get as much work as he can for as little pay, and he wants to produce his goods with as little labour as possible; on the other hand, the men want to get as much pay as possible for the smallest amount of labour, and they want to put as much labour as possible into the goods, for the more labour the more men are provided with wages. This opposition is at the root of most of the disputes between men and masters; it is the reason why the State has had to step in and compel the employers not to push their interest further than a certain point; to make them responsible to some extent for any accident happening to their men; to make them take precautions against accident; or to force them not to make contracts with women and children which shall keep them at work more than a certain number of hours a-day. This opposition of interest is at the root of a very great deal of the evil we are seeking to remedy, and no reform which leaves this opposition will bring a satisfactory issue.

We may then sum up this search for the causes of our evils into three main heads, first, bad distribution or unjust division of the produce of labour; second, competition in all its different forms, some of which only have been touched on here, others were referred to in a former article. The forms dealt with in this were competition between manufacturers causing or hastening gluts, competition between different trades, and competition between nations tending to lower wages to the level of the lowest standard. One result of competition I have not named is the enormous waste of labour there is in the armies of men whose sole business is to carry on this competition, such as many business managers, all commercial travellers, agents, advertisers, with all the attendant adjuncts of each; it is sufficient here to name this, we all realise it in our every day experience. The third cause is the opposition of interest between employers and employed. This might be called another form of competition, but I think is better kept separate, as it is of a rather different nature to ordinary competition, though ordinary competition gives rise to opposition of interest, in fact our whole system consists of warfare more or less veiled, every man is fighting against his neighbours and every association against every other.

Having traced our evils somewhat to their sources, we shall now be in a better position to judge whether trades unions and co-operation can either or both go to the root of the evils and remove the three main causes we have seen. The real aim of trades unions is to raise wages in one way or other, either by increasing the money wage, reducing the hours worked, or improving the conditions under which work is done. It assumes that the workers are always going to be wage workers and therefore that their interests will always be opposed to those of the masters. This being the case it seeks to organise the workers in such a way that they shall be in a position to dictate terms to their masters. We saw that this opposition of interest was one of the causes which will have to be removed and trades unions as at present organised offer no chance of settling that part of the question. Nor do they touch competition, which is another cause of the evils. The only cause which they touch at all is the bad distribution. So far as they are successful in raising wages, they improve the distribution of wealth; but even here their power is very limited. Supposing the workers were much better organised than they are now, so that they could compel the capitalists to pay as high wages as they could afford, they could still only get a share of the produce, and that probably not more than half. For the individual capitalist will not work or allow them to use his capital unless he can make some substantial profit. That point wages can never pass which takes away the profit from the average employer. But the wages which will allow the average employer to make a profit will leave some employers making vast fortunes. For these having greater business faculty—in other words, more cunning, more gambling ability—will be able to get to themselves the best of the trade and make most profits, even when the average employer is only just living. The trades union could never get any of this. Then again, as I said, competition is not touched, therefore all the waste of competition would still go on; and in short, trades unions could do but little on their present basis to improve the condition of the poor. The time of their success was in the time of enormous increase of our foreign trade; and their success amounted to this, that when the profits of employers increased fifty per cent. wages were with difficulty increased ten or twenty per cent. That great increase of foreign markets, humanly speaking, can never come again, and it is already evident that much of the power of the unions has gone with the narrowing of foreign markets. We must go nearer to the root of the matter than trades unions do if we are to solve the problem.

Owing to a wages dispute in the Havannah cigar trade, ninety-five factories have been closed, throwing 12,000 workpeople out of employment.

A SOCIALIST MARCHING SONG.

(To the tune of "GARRYOWEN.")

COME all brave lads and loudly sing,
The Red Flag to the sky we fling,
We care no rap for priest or king,
The People's day is coming;
Too long the wolves of capital
Have drunk our blood and filched our all,
But from their power they'll have to fall,
The People's day is coming.

Chorus—Above all colours exalt the red,
It fills a tyrant heart with dread,
And while it proudly floats o'erhead,
Advance the Men of Labour.

We've had the husks and they the grain,
They the pleasure and we the pain,
We'll toil no longer for their gain—
But make them earn a living;
The idler fat and the worker lean,
This is the way that things have been,
But from the beggar unto the queen,
All soon must earn their living.

Chorus—Above, etc.

No more shall men with arms arrayed
Against their fellow-men parade,
We'll stop the soldiers dreadful trade,
And men shall be as brothers;
As soon as freedom has been won,
Away shall go the sword and gun,
There's nothing with them to be done,
When men shall be all brothers.

Chorus—Above, etc.

We'll hear the wise and help the fool,
And put the idlers all to school,
Until they learn the golden rule,
To do as they'd be done by.
With stern resolve into the fray,
We go to sweep the wrong away,
To bring the brighter better day,
And do as we'd be done by.

Chorus—Above, etc.

H. HALLIDAY SPARLING.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO LANDLORDS.

THE following letter from a Donegal landlord, named Nixon, to the parish priest of his tenants was published by the Dublin Conservative papers as if the tone were commendable, and the threatened action worthy of imitation. It is an instructive example of telling the truth as it is seen, and is an almost perfect specimen of the true spirit of landlordism:—

"Yacht 'Finola,' Nov. 11. . . . Now, in as few words as possible, I will answer your letter. Owing to the very offensive wording of the resolutions and speeches, which show me plainly that it is useless to deal kindly any longer with those tenants, I may tell you that I would not now accept 99 per cent. of all rents and costs due to me, as I am going to clear the two townlands of Brinlack and Glassagh, and it is my land I want now. Remember they are merely living on my land as long as I let them, and I will not regard costs in carrying out my plans: I have ample private means, and will set aside a certain sum yearly until all are out of that. In doing this I am only following out the Scriptural precept that 'a man may do what he likes with his own.' I am determined on this, and in five, or, at the most, ten years' time there will probably not be a single family left there. It will be no hardship to the people to have to go elsewhere, as, according to you, they are in such circumstances they can hardly live, and besides, according to you, each one, as they are evicted, will be supplied with a house with three chimneys. In fact, I think, according to your showing, I will deserve their hearty thanks for evicting them, and, of course, I will level each house as I proceed, so you may look around for some sites for your three-chimneyed houses somewhere clear of my property. . . . I need hardly tell a man of your shrewdness, or rather cunning, that resistance will be utterly useless, as it is only a question of time and money, of both of which I have plenty."

"They [the inhabitants of Bleeding Heart Yard] believed that foreigners were always badly off; and though they were as ill off themselves as they could be, that did not diminish the force of the objection. They believed that foreigners were dragooned and bayoneted; and though they certainly got their own skulls promptly fractured if they showed any ill-humour, still it was with a blunt instrument, and that didn't count."—Dickens, in 'Little Dorrit.'

Rest easy, capitalists and politicians; the working-men are in no hurry to break their chains. Have they not enough to satisfy the wants of slaves? Mayhap they can do with less—try them!—Workmen's Advocate.

HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!

COMMERCIALISM AND EDUCATION.

At last it seems that the question of the reform of education in our schools is to receive public attention. The disinterested pleadings of larger-minded educationists for a revision of old methods have had little effect; but the traders have discovered that the question is one which has “practical” bearings, and the fact is to be impressed upon the public. It is found that not only are Englishmen, through lack of training, getting worsted in their competition with the more tutored craftsmen and manufacturers of foreign lands, but that they are actually being driven out of the offices and counting-houses in their own country by the better instructed foreigner. So that the problem of educational reform is forced upon us by the sheer exigencies of competitive commerce. This fact lends special interest for Socialists to the proceedings at the meeting held in the city last week, at the instance of the London Chamber of Commerce, to consider what should be done to raise the standard of commercial education in England, so as to fit English youths for places now held by more competent Germans, and others.

Now although there is great need for the reform of school education in this country, it will obviously be a great pity if this reform is to be carried out merely to meet the requirements of the traders; and we must be on our guard against their recommendations. They want cheap and competent native clerks, efficient wage-servers, and would wish to bend education to meet their “practical” requirements.

We must, however, protest against any attempt to narrow the scope and objects of education to suit the profit-makers. The object of school training is not simply to turn out good clerks, or good mechanics, or good artisans, but also and chiefly to help the making of well-developed men and women and good citizens. And indeed the superiority of the young Germans as clerks is not due to specialised training in commercial technicalities, but to their superior all-round education, or, as Dr. Percival (one of our very best educationists) said at the conference, “to the habits of industry and method they had acquired through having their intellectual tastes systematically cultivated.” It is really absurd to suppose that a special course of instruction is needed to enable a boy to become a clerk. Any intelligent and well-informed lad will pick up the details of mercantile procedure in a very short time; and his true training for the superior work, such as book-keeping, should be got in the office, as the young artisan (who needs a very much longer apprenticeship) gets his training in the workshop.

The truth is that the spirit of competitive commercialism cannot but be antagonistic to true educational interests, and it is to Socialism that we must look for the rescue of education from its fatal clutches. Under our present system everything has more and more to subserve bread-winning and mammonite interests. The struggle for existence becomes more and more an intellectual contest, and necessitates increasing specialisation of human function, thwarting the full development of our manhood. The first care of parents must be how to equip their children for life’s hard battle; a career has to be early decided upon for each boy and girl, and to secure success in it, even at the cost of everything else, is the main purpose of education. Nor does the struggle cease with the adult. Men and women can often only maintain a position, or at any rate advance their position, in business by an exclusiveness of attention to business affairs which leaves neither leisure nor inclination for the pursuits of a thoroughly human life. (What a common thing it is to find a man who leaves his office at night only to continue his business work at home!) The evil has already attained alarming proportions, and must increase with the growing stress of competition; bread-winning, which should be a means to living, and to the education of our human powers and aptitudes, becomes the absorbing aim of life.

Under such a condition of things, what can we expect but the debasement of education? Instead of becoming the leisurely and natural development of our capacities, and the culture of mind and heart to rejoice in the beauty and wonder of the world, it becomes a hurried and sordid training to enable each to outrun his brother in the severe race for subsistence. It is for Socialists to emphasise this fact, and to show the incompatibility of our present ruinous system with the higher aims of human life. And meantime, whilst supporting any wise reform in educational methods, let us keep an eye upon the designs of those who, although they may profess a desire to advance the interests of their countrymen, may nevertheless be injuring the great cause of education, which is the cause of human progress.

THE general feeling among the prisoners, so far as I could judge, was one of very great disgust at hearing a special prayer offered up for one whom they cursed (as loud as they durst, for fear of being punished); and many were the bitter oaths taken against the system which made them commit crime in order to live. I risked punishment many times in order to drive as much Socialism as I could into my next door neighbours, but I am sorry to confess that it seemed a very hard task; but a few crumbs of bread cast upon the waters will undoubtedly turn up after many days. I was greatly amused whilst at exercise on the Jubilee day to hear a voice from behind me call for three cheers for the Socialist and damn the royal family. Of course this caused a commotion amongst the warders—who are generally known as “screws”—but though they blamed several, they failed to catch the right party; but nevertheless they punished a poor fellow named Stone, who is doing two years; and for the instruction of the busy “screws,” I may inform them he was in A. 2, 10. Of course these “screws” could not stand by and hear their beloved royal family “damned” without someone being punished, hence an innocent man must suffer when the guilty one cannot be caught. I may say that talking was very prevalent, in spite of the activity of the “screws.” I should say here that I do not wish to assert that all these unfortunate “screws” are bad; on the contrary, were it not for the parson, who is a “screw” in clerical garb, and the governor and doctor, who are “screws” of the higher grade, always dodging about to see if they can catch any of the lower “screws” sympathising or pitying any of the prisoners, the ordinary warders would be a great deal more humane. But they dare not; the alternative to being a brute is, vulgarly speaking, the “sack.” I will pass over a few weeks, as nothing particular occurred, and endeavour to describe what occurred to me toward the latter end of August. I had for some considerable time been passing notes to another prisoner, whom I was trying to convert to Socialism, and strange to say I made the warders my corresponding medium. Of course they did not know what they were doing. It happened this way. The other prisoner was a tailor, and I pressed his work for him, as he had no fire; and when sending in his work to him I put a note inside the garment by prearrangement. We never were caught whilst the warders carried our messages, but I fancy we were suspected, for one Sunday I passed a message to the other prisoner in chapel, and gave another to one of the cleaners to drop in his cell; the schoolmaster, however, caught us, and the result was three days bread and water with solitary confinement—1 lb. of bread and as much water as you wish. In solitary confinement you are not allowed outside your cell for any purpose whatever (short of being buried), and you have a plank bed. You must also put your clothes, boots, books, etc., outside your cell door every night, and all books are taken away except the Bible. The note which was intercepted in transmission contained among many other things a wish for the Social Revolution to break out, and that all prisons should be put an end to. In return I got the above punishment, together with fourteen days' plank bed and oakum-picking. I was also removed from A. 3, 33, where I had a fire, and put back in A. 2, 6, and here I finished my time. I, however, endeavoured to pass my time in as lively a manner as I could, and arranged with my next-door neighbour a set of rapping signals, using one for A, two for B, and so on, with a short pause between the words and a series of loud raps at the end of a sentence. This enabled me to teach my neighbour a few Socialist rhymes and songs, and every Sunday at four o'clock we gave three series of loud raps as cheers for the Revolution. Of course rapping was not allowed, and we had to be very careful that the "screws" did not catch us. We managed, however, to evade their vigilance, and passed many a pleasant hour in exchanging messages, using our slates and pencils for taking them down. I always had a Socialist song on my slate for the instruction of the warders who used to inspect the cells when the prisoners are at exercise. I may in passing say that the prisoners when at exercise are supposed to keep about four yards apart, but as the prisons are worked on the short-handed system (like most factories now are), we used to get a little closer in order to talk, having to separate when the warders caught sight of or suspected us.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

It is all over, once more, in political France. The bourgeois people have a new President, and it is not Ferry the Tonkinese. So France has escaped a revolution. We don't care after all, for the social revolution will not be kept away from there, and that's the only one we are looking for. If our readers are desirous to know the fresh master the bourgeois have given themselves, we may tell them in a few lines who is M. Marie François Sadi Carnot. He was born at Limoges, on August 11, 1837. He is a grandson of Carnot, the member of the Committee of Public Safety and of the National Convention. His father is a Senator, and was Minister of Public Instruction in 1848. M. Sadi Carnot, who is an engineer by profession, entered the Polytechnical School, where he attained the highest position. His first appointment was as government engineer at Annecy, and he remained in that position until the collapse of the Empire. In January, 1871, he was appointed Prefect of the Seine Inférieure and Commissioner of National Defence for that department, the Eure and the Calvados. He first entered Parliament as member for the Côte d'Or, which he represented until now. He was in turn Under Secretary and Minister of Public Works, and Minister of Finance. To tell the truth, we must say that he displayed a good deal of firmness all along in opposing the Elysee favouritism of Grevy and Wilson. But, absit omen, Sadi Carnot also has a son-in-law!

Now let us look at some more interesting facts. Our colleague, La Révolte, has kept its promise to give its readers a literary supplement. Two have already been issued, and the various matters which they bring forward are of the most attractive character. We feel sure that these supplements will greatly contribute to the growing success of this excellent Parisian organ.

A new Socialist paper has been started at Sidi-ali-Azons (Algeria) under the title L'Operaio (The Worker). This weekly is also supported by the Anarchist groups of Tunis. In the last named town, the Socialists are about to publish another paper entitled Tunisia.

On the 1st of January next, a new Socialist paper will be started at Lyons, wherein the different schools of Socialism will be at home. L'Egalité Sociale (Social Equality) will be an organ of revolutionary union, conducted by Bessy, Deschamps, Farjat, Labrosse, Perrin, of the Parti Ouvrier (Workers' Party); by Bernard, Blonde, Burnichon, Monier, Sibylat, and Rivet, of the Lyon Anarchist groups; by Bonard, Delanges, Durniat, and Etienne, of the Central Revolutionary Committee; and by Claverola, Drevet, Mathieu, Péronnat, Roussel, and Watier, of the Independent Socialist groups. We hope that the representatives of these various schools of Socialist thought will agree together, and at all events, we wish them good luck and success in their new experiment.

HOLLAND.

Whereas Socialism is spreading too rapidly in Holland, the Dutch Parliament intends to bring in a bill to the effect of considerably reducing the right of public and private meeting, which has existed there without restriction up to the present time. The Dutch bourgeoisie begin to fear for the maintenance of their privileges, and the best thing they can do, as they fancy, is to muzzle the workers. Happily, that won't do. The answer of our Dutch comrades will be the daily issuing of their organ, Recht voor Allen, which now appears three times a week.

BELGIUM.

A fact worth noticing. Vooruit, the Almanack for 1888 of the Socialists of Ghent, has been published four or five weeks, and in that short time the whole edition, 10,000 copies, has been sold out. A second edition of 10,000 copies is in preparation.

In the same town, the society of compositors and printers has started a monthly trade paper, called The Printing Press, which will represent the interests of the compositors of Flemish Belgium and of Holland. The compositors of the French part of Belgium have a French trade paper, entitled, Gutenberg.

Some of our Belgian comrades, who had been sentenced in the month of July, 1886, in connection with the great miners' strikes of last year, have at last seen their sentences reduced to a certain extent. Comrades Poty and Bourgogne, condemned to imprisonment for life, have their terms reduced to twenty years. We hope that this reduction is only a first instalment. Comrades Schmidt and Falleur, sentenced to twenty years, are reduced to seven years; comrades Klaus and Pierard, sentenced to fifteen years, are reduced to five; comrades Defrane, Collet, Baudoux, Hulet, and Vincent, sentenced to twelve years, reduced to four; comrade Priels and Taton, sentenced to ten years, are reduced to three. But we again express confidence that they soon may be set free altogether, for we know very well that all these monstrous sentences have been dictated by mere class-justice, that is to say in spite of all justice.

Comrade Lootens, editor of Opstand, who was tried at the Court of Assizes of Ghent for having fired a revolver on his assailants, has been acquitted by the jury. But he declares at the same time that the Opstand stops its publication.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

The Austrian police are as silly as the German. Paul Lafargue's pamphlet, 'The Right of Idleness,' has been forbidden there; and so has another book entitled, 'The Condition of the Working-classes in Bavaria,' by B. Schönlank. This last work is a very remarkable one; the dreadful facts therein stated are all of indisputable truth, as they have been gathered from the most reliable sources.

At Brunn, the Volksfreund (The Worker's Friend) has also commenced the publication of a Socialist library. The first pamphlet, entitled 'What exists and what we want,' has been confiscated by the police. A second edition, expurgated, has now been issued. It is a handsome brochure of 32 pages, popularly written on the general principles of modern Socialism.

ITALY.

We may recommend to our comrades who understand Italian, the pamphlets of the Bibliotheca Humanitas. Six have already been issued, which are entitled: 1. 'The End of Parliamentarism'; 2. 'The International Anarchical Alliance'; 3. 'The New Religion'; 4. 'Victims and Prejudices'; 5. 'The Apostles of Socialism in Russia'; 6. 'Pisacane, and the Modern Socialism.'

On the 1st of January, a new Socialist paper, L'Operaio (The Worker) will be started at Reggio Calabre.

Free Speech Demonstration in Glasgow.

On Sunday, December 4th, one of the largest and finest meetings ever held, assembled on Glasgow Green. The demonstration was promoted by a committee of men from the Irish National League, Socialist League, Social Democratic Federation, Land Restoration League, and other bodies. On reaching the Green the speakers found an enormous mass of people stretching several hundred yards from the four sides of the monument at which the four platforms were placed. The resolution affirmed the principle of free speech, protested against the growing despotism of the police and called for the punishment of those responsible for the outrages at Trafalgar Square, Mitchelstown, and other places, and pledged the people to back up Graham and Burns in their defence of public rights. Graham was unable to attend owing to the serious illness of his wife. Burns and Saunders were the chief speakers, but a large number of others including Shaw Maxwell, Murphy, Mahon, Murdoch, Hutcheson, Glasier, Stewart, Macmillan, Curran, and M'Farlane, also addressed the meeting. Mr. Wm. Saunders spoke in a very eloquent and effective style, and was exceedingly well received. Burns, who spoke with great force, roused the audience to an extraordinary pitch of enthusiasm. The demonstration was a complete success. The occasion was made use of to move resolutions in regard to the unemployed, which were heartily carried. A good meeting was held at night in the Albion Hall, at which the same speakers attended. Saunders gave a pithy and amusing account of his experiences in London, and Burns delivered a masterly exposition of the doctrines of Socialism.—J. L. M.

The Government are adding to the list of Irish martyrs at a rapid rate. Lord Mayor T. D. Sullivan lies in Richmond Gaol, the editor of United Ireland in Tullamore; Mr. Timothy Harrington, the soul and centre of the National League, was arrested last week, and a warrant is said to be out for Mr. Timothy Healy. There can be little doubt that Mr. Dillon will share the fate of his colleagues as soon as he returns to Ireland. In England the same Government is doing the same work; and those who read history can see that in days to come it will be known as the Government of Suicides. The wrathful sense of wrong spreading among the workers; the swift sorting of reactionaries from the men of the advance,—these things are hastening the revolution more even than all our propaganda.—S.

NEW WORDS.—It will be a thousand pities, by the way, if the present discontents do not enrich the vocabulary of the English language. Various suggestions for new coinages have been made with reference to Irish matters. The St. James's Gazette, for instance, has proposed, not unhappily, when, or if ever, Mr. Gladstone falls into another inaccuracy, to say, "Mr. Gladstone has dopping again." Several correspondents have written here, on the other hand, pointing out various uses for a verb "to balfour." But the termination of one already accepted neologism—namely, boycott—at once suggests a word that ought to be imported from the ways of the London police. "To bear false witness which is yet not legal perjury," that is terrible mouthful, and yet in these days the expression is constantly wanted. One word, of course, will do it: to endacott. When the police reformation comes, "Thou shalt not endacott thy neighbour," will appear in every table of the law.—Pall Mall Gazette, Dec. 3.

RAILWAY "ENTERPRISE."—There was a rocky valley between Buxton and Bakewell, once upon a time, divine as the Vale of Tempe; you might have seen the Gods there, morning and evening, Apollo, and all the sweet Muses of the Light. . . . The valley is gone and the Gods with it; and now, every fool in Buxton can be at Bakewell in half an hour, and every fool in Bakewell at Buxton; which you think a lucrative process of exchange—you Fools every where!—J. Ruskin, 'Fors Clavigera.'

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

A demonstration of the unemployed took place at Dundee on Monday. About 400 gathered, and after being addressed by a Socialist lecturer, they marched the streets. Six of their number waited upon the provost and magistrates, and submitted their case to them. The authorities agreed to keep a register of the names of the men for investigation, and stated that work would soon be provided at the extension of the esplanade and water-works.

Under the auspices of Mr. Dunkerley, an effort commenced on Monday morning of taking the census of the unemployed in every constituency of London. Sixty offices opened at noon, and will open each day during the present month from twelve till nine o'clock to register the names of the unemployed, and their various capacities for work. The committee trust that employers of labour will second their efforts in finding a great number employment. No district is without an office for registration, and working men can always find the address by applying to their nearest police-station.

THE RUSH FOR WORK.—On Monday morning nearly a thousand men attended at High Street, Islington, in response to an advertisement for 100 assistants at a new "Home and Colonial stores" there. The great crowd about the doors considerably impeded both vehicular and pedestrian traffic, and the services of the police had to be obtained to restrain the eager assembly. The greater portion of the applicants were of a very respectable order.

THE YORKSHIRE MINERS' ASSOCIATION.—An adjourned County Conference was held on Saturday at Barnsley in connection with the Yorkshire Miners' Association. Mr. Pickard, M.P., was present, and it was decided to demand a 10 per cent. advance on the present rate of wages. It was likewise suggested that a Board of Conciliation should be established for the district, which would regulate the payment of wages. Most of those present were in favour of restricting the output. A deputation was appointed to wait upon the colliery owners in the district.

BERMONDSEY—TIN-PLATE WORKERS.—For the last seven weeks a struggle has been going on between Messrs. Harding and Sons of Long Lane and their employes, owing to a threatened reduction in wages varying from 20 to 50 per cent., which has not as yet been put into force because of the contracts the firm have now on hand, and which they are compelled to execute within a specified time. The men, however, seeing danger ahead, sought protection by joining the East London Tin-plate Workers' Society. Messrs. Harding and Sons, while "allowing full freedom to their men to do as they please," refuse to keep in their employ those who have joined the Union, and are endeavouring to weed them out of the firm individually, seeking by that means to avoid an impending strike.

WEST CUMBERLAND IRONWORKERS.—On Saturday notices were posted by the masters at most of the ironworks in the West Cumberland district stating that all engagements between themselves and their workmen will terminate in fourteen days from date. The ironmasters have taken this step in consequence of the determination of the blast furnacemen not to accept a reduction of five per cent. in wages. At a conference between delegates and ironmasters, held on the previous afternoon, the chairman, Mr. Baird, of the Lonsdale Ironworks, Whitehaven, said the masters had been too long in asking for a reduction. He suggested a reduction of 2½ per cent., and the adoption of a sliding scale. If iron went below 44s. 6d. per ton, the men would have to submit to 2½ per cent. reduction, but for each 2s. 6d. advance above 44s. 6d., an advance of 2½ per cent. in wages would be given. These terms were declined by the men, who asked for further time. The masters refused to wait longer, hence the posting of the notices. Should the threatened lock-out be proceeded with, about six thousand men will be affected.

YOUNG WOMAN CLERK WANTED. Neat writer, correct at figures. Must give three months. Salary commencing at 10s. weekly after. Hours 8.30 to 7 p.m.; Saturday 2 p.m. Close to Westbourne Park Station. Letter stating age, to—&c.

"Is it possible that any human being could offer such remuneration for ten and a half hours' work a-day?" asks an esteemed correspondent. Not only possible, but he will think himself a good man to give so much! Dozens of such advertisements could be gathered daily; for instance, here is a submissive angel wanted who is required to be "cheerful" under trying circumstances:

LADY HELP (quite young) WANTED, not afraid of work. Must be good-tempered, cheerful, early riser, strictly clean, and especially refined. Very good, cheerful home, no children, but only £6 or £8 a-year to commence.

SCOTCH COTTARS.—A Correspondent writes to the Daily News: I have the most absolute proof that in Lochs parish, Balallan, in some families as many as three and four invalid children are lying on lairs of straw on the damp floors of mud-hovels, without any bed-clothing to cover them. The medical officer prescribed a meal poultice for some, and there was not enough meal in the house to make it, nor had the neighbours any to give. In one instance of this kind one of the children died last Saturday, and several are beyond recovery. I sent a boll of meal last Wednesday to that township, and it was divided between twenty families. On Saturday I ascertained that in that township as many as five, six, and seven children are lying under measles, without as much meal in the house as would make a drink for the patients; yet the authorities have done nothing to meet their cases beyond that a few met at Stornoway, fifteen miles away, and passed a resolution asking the Scottish Secretary to appoint a commission to enquire whether the alleged destitution is a fact. At a large meeting of delegates from the various townships of Lochs, held in Balallan School last Friday, Mr. Donald Macrae, was appointed secretary and treasurer of the Relief Fund for Lochs, the parish in which the deer-hunt took place. Mr. Macrae has already distributed over twenty bolls of meal; in fact, he has done all that has been done in this direction. Funds are urgently required, and it is impossible to forecast what will next happen.

NORTHAMPTON.—STRIKE IN THE SHOE TRADE.—Dec. 2.—Rioting over the shoe trade dispute has commenced in Northampton, and, it is feared, will assume alarming proportions, as at the end of this week twenty thousand workpeople will be out of employment through the lock-out of the manufacturers. Considerable irritation is felt at the action of the police, who on Wednesday night attended a perfectly orderly meeting of four or five thousand workmen. Bodies of police have been drafted into the town during this week, and others at Leicester and neighbouring towns are awaiting telegraphic instructions to proceed immediately to Northampton. At Sheffield a hundred soldiers are awaiting similar orders. The police nightly escort to their homes workmen employed at Messrs. Cove and West's factory where occurred the dispute which was the cause of the rupture. The police and men are followed by crowds hooting and throwing stones. Last night severe struggles took place between the people and police. The latter were roughly handled, and some few were struck by stones and other missiles. Three arrests were made. Eight police were injured. The magistrates have forbidden any assembly of persons in the vicinity of the factory of Messrs. Cove and West, and police guard it night and day. Dec. 5.—A renewal of rioting is feared by the authorities, who, in addition to large bodies of police from Leicester, Wellingborough, Kettering, and other places, on Saturday brought a force of 111 rank and file of the Lancashire and Yorkshire Regiment by special train from Sheffield. Arrangements have also been made for drafting a cavalry regiment into the town. The magistrates have passed some severe sentences on rioters. On Saturday morning Frank White, a shoe rivetter, was sentenced to three months' hard labour; Walter Brown, another rivetter, was sentenced to five months' hard labour; and a third participant in Thursday evening's disturbances was sentenced to two months' hard labour. A fourth man was fined £5, or one month, for window-breaking. To-day the factories belonging to the members of the Northampton Boot Manufacturers' Association will be closed in accordance with a resolution of a general lock-out. These factories include nearly all the largest in the town; and nearly 20,000 workpeople are affected. A public appeal for funds on behalf of these operatives has already been made, and is being generously responded to.—A special meeting of the School Board was held on Saturday to take into consideration the feeding of children sent to school without having had breakfast or dinner. Dec. 6.—Last night a mass meeting of the locked-out operatives at Northampton sent a deputation to the Town Council then sitting, asking for relief works. The destitution through the boot trade lock-out is making itself felt in Northampton. On Tuesday, 200 Board School children were found to have gone to school without having received any food since the previous day. A hot meal was immediately prepared for them at neighbouring cafés. The clergy and licensed victuallers are organising relief arrangements. On Tuesday afternoon a conference of masters and men sat two hours discussing the terms of re-opening the factories, but broke up without coming to a decision.

Socialists, Trades Unionists, and others, are earnestly urged to send regularly reports of all matters in connection with the "Labour Struggle" that come under their notice. Members of the various trade societies should endeavour to make the Commonweal a recognised medium for announcing meetings in connection with their respective trades, and should send notice of disputes, number of unemployed, etc. Cuttings from local papers, with name and date of issue, are useful, and copies of trade journals, trade reports, etc., are also much wanted.

It is disheartening to find how little support those who sacrifice health, time, and money in running a Labour Paper receive from those in whose interests entirely it is that such a paper as the Commonweal is published. It is discreditable to British workmen, that while they indirectly, if not directly, help largely to support their most deadly enemy, the corrupt capitalist press, which spreads broadcast its poisonous calumnies against the advocates of Labour, the papers which espouse the cause of the workers are left to struggle for existence against almost overwhelming odds, thus tending to delay the emancipation of labour, which can only be accomplished by the combined energy and self-sacrifice of the workers themselves.

T. BINNING.

PREPARING FOR THE UNEMPLOYED.—There arrived at Liverpool on the 29th ult. from New York, by the Cunard steamer Aurania, two cases of rifles and cartridges, addressed to the Marquis of Salisbury. The goods were forwarded to his lordship's address. He is said to be arming his household.

THE RED.—If Labour's banner were never before dyed crimson by the blood of her martyrs—if it had been white as snow it is red now. America has re-dyed the crimson flag, making it more truly the flag of the working-men of all countries. Let the enemies of labour not complain of the colour their cruelty has indelibly dyed the flag of all nations.—Workmen's Advocate.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the Scotch-American millionaire, is writing fancy letters to the American papers. In his last epistle he declares that the masses of the people of Britain were never as well off as they are at present, and he also asserts that there is very little if any destitution in Scotland for which the destitute themselves are not to blame. I hope my Scotch friends will remember this.—H. F. C.

THE WORKING OF THE ALLOTMENTS ACT.—In South Lincolnshire the demand for allotments under the new Act is assuming gigantic proportions, and it is feared it will not be met without considerable difficulty. Up to Saturday night requisitions had been signed by labourers in the Spalding Division for over a thousand acres of land from three central towns. Seven hundred applications had been made. The majority of labourers ask for the maximum quantity of land allowed under the Act. None of the applications have yet been granted, the authorities declining to set the Act in motion, not being convinced that allotments cannot be obtained voluntarily.

PARSONIC OPPOSITION.—The following facts are of interest in view of the general opposition on the part of the clergy to Socialism or anything else that tends to the elevation of the masses. The Earl of Lonsdale (holy man!) has 43 livings in the Church of England in his gift; the Marquis of Aylesbury (the blackleg who was expelled from racing circles) holds 11; while among the comparatively respectable peers the Duke of Beaufort appears to have in his gift 24 livings; the Duke of Bedford, 25; the Duke of Devonshire, 38; and the Duke of Rutland, 25—112 livings in the hands of four dukes. More than 200 peers present to about 1,300 livings; can it be expected that their creatures and nominees will speak against them and the system which enables them to live as they do?

BRAZILIAN SLAVES IN REVOLT.—From Rio de Janeiro we hear of a great rising of slaves on the plantations near St. Paulo and conflict with the troops and police. The slaves on two plantations in the municipality struck work, and, seizing all the horses and mules they could find, made off with their wives and children. As they made for the forest, they were joined by all the slaves on the plantations on the way. Fifty well-armed policemen were sent in pursuit, but had to beat a rapid retreat. They returned to Amaro demoralised, and did not interfere with another band of slaves, who marched through the town shouting "Hurrah for freedom! We prefer death to recapture." The planters were in great fear, and the troops were stated to be unwilling to hunt the slaves. Slavery was already on the decrease in the country.

LETTER FROM AMERICA.

A TERRIBLE tale comes again from Chicago. Your readers will remember that during the strangulation of her husband, Mrs. Parsons was locked up in Cook County Jail, Chicago, with Mrs. Holmes. But this was not sufficient for the police. No sooner did they have Mrs. Parsons completely in their clutches than they began at once to search her for bombs! Three or four policemen overpowered the poor woman and began undressing her till she was exposed in a nude state to the vulgar eyes of the policemen! Of course they never found a bomb. Directly after release Mrs. Parsons accused the police of this infamy, and was corroborated in her accusation by Mrs. Holmes. The police now admit the searching and disrobing—after first denying everything—but assert that it was done by the prison matron. The police already stand convicted by their half admittance of the accusation, even had Mrs. Holmes not witnessed the affair.

Here is another police outrage, taken from the Morning Journal, a paper which constantly denounces in strong terms all Social Democrats and Anarchists:—"Lingg was in the agonies of a death a hundred-fold more painful in a physical sense than strangulation when I stood in the vestibule of the Cook County Jail, and heard the remarks of a cluster of police-officers. 'Damn that coward,' ejaculated one. 'He promised he would die game, and now he cheats us out of the fun to-morrow' (the execution). The assistant of one of the surgeons was hurrying by with some anaesthetics when a police-sergeant caught him by the arm exclaiming: 'Say, fix that up in shape so that he can get the rope to-morrow.' " Again, I say the above is taken from a capitalistic paper and not from a labour paper. One paper a few days ago declared that if Socialists and Anarchists did not abstain from spreading their pernicious doctrines they might expect a second St. Bartholomew's night. This is written in the land of freedom, in America! The government of the police by the police is more and more perfecting itself. A movement has been started to induce the legislature to give the police power to arrest any man who utters so-called treasonable and seditious language, to avoid writing until a grand jury has found an indictment against him.

John Most is again on trial. The police and the World, a newspaper which is principally responsible for the Chicago tragedy, will not be quiet till he is hung. On the day of the Chicago execution, the men engaged in the Freiheit office bounced a reporter of the World who came spying round. He resolved to revenge himself. The next day Most spoke in his club. The New York comrades were so depressed and paralysed by the events in Chicago, that the suggestion of a plan of revenge would have fallen very flat indeed. In fact, Most's oration that evening sounded more like a funeral sermon than anything else. He spoke very touchingly of the life and death of our martyrs. Three days later he is arrested for having incited the people to murder Grinnell, Gary, etc.: not that I should deplore the removal of this infamous gang, but it is cowardly to charge a person with something he never uttered. The low sneak from the World, in company with two detectives, had concocted a speech which for absurd nonsense stands unequalled. In fact, if Most had ever given utterance to such hideous idiocy he deserved hanging twice. The three conspirators allege that they attended the meeting and took down Most's speech in shorthand. Most has about fifty witnesses to prove that nobody took any notes, that no reporter was present, and that he never spoke one word about removing Gary and Co. The whole thing is so absurd that even the New York Herald is obliged to say to-day:—"This matter of free speech ought to be a very tender point with Americans. We prize it rather highly, and even when somebody shoots off his mouth or puts his foot in it we should be a little slow to interfere." . . . The trial began yesterday; four of the jury are already chosen; the first has no occupation, the second a dealer in liquors, the third a pawnbroker, and the fourth a tobacco manufacturer. The case must be weak indeed if the prosecution is obliged to select so intelligent a jury.

The deliberations of both branches of the South Carolina Legislature are conducted with all the tomfoolery of the British Houses of Parliament. The two presiding officers are attired in gaudy and costly gowns of the finest blue and royal purple silk velvet. The clerks wear long flowing gowns of plain black silk, while the sergeant-at-arms open and close the daily sessions with the ancient mace and the sword of State—relics of colonial days. In the House of Representatives a member when in his own seat may wear his hat during the entire Session, as in the English House of Commons. The most important measures to be considered at present are propositions to punish organised interference with labour and wages (Anti-Knights of Labour Bill), and to pension disabled ex-confederate soldiers.

LABOUR MOVEMENTS.

The Miners' Federation and National District Assembly Knights of Labour have united forces. The 250,000 miners will present a united front in all action they may take hereafter.

At the Convention of the United Labour Party of Wisconsin, a resolution condemning the execution of our Chicago comrades as a curtailment of the constitutional rights of mere social reformers, was almost unanimously tabled.

The Knights of Labour have ordered a vigorous boycott of the Lehigh Coal and Railway Companies and other operators, with the object of aiding the striking miners in the Lehigh region.

At a meeting of the Point Arbitration Board of National Federation of Miners and Mine Operators, on November 14th, it was decided to pay 5 cents. (2½d.) per ton for mining. The advance is to date from Nov. 1st, 1887, and continue to May 1st, 1888.

Negro miners at Pocahontas, Va., refused to allow the Hungarian miners there to work. About 110 Hungarians have joined the strikers in consequence. The negro miners number about 600.

A Knight of Labour co-operative store at Paterson has declared a dividend of 10 per cent. after an existence of three months.

Reports are circulating to the effect that the surface railroad workmen and employés of Brooklyn will demand a ten-hour instead of a twelve-hour day after January 1st. Last January the men agreed to work for one year without making any new demands.

The Journal of United Labour recently advised working-men who receive requests from statisticians for information relative to their employment, compensation, living expenses, and other points, to give the information freely.

Reports of an additional strike in the Louisiana sugar-field come this week. The labourers on eight plantations near Shriever, La., quit work on Tuesday, owing to a refusal to grant increased pay.

The real war in Europe, of which the fighting in Paris was the inauguration, is between the capitalists and the workmen, such as these have made him. They have kept him poor, ignorant, and sinful, that they might, without his knowledge, gather for themselves the produce of his toil. At last a dim insight into the fact of this dawn on him, and such as they have made him he meets them, and will meet.—J. Ruskin, 'Fors Clavigera.'

Freemen, indeed! You are slaves, not to masters of any strength and honour, but to the idlest talkers at that floral end of Westminster Bridge. Nay, to countless meaner masters than they. For, though indeed, as early as the year 1102, it was decreed in a council at St. Peter's, Westminster, "that no man for the future should presume to carry on the wicked trade of selling men in the markets, like brute beasts, which hitherto has been the common custom of England," the no less wicked trade of underselling men in markets has lasted to this day, producing conditions of slavery differing from the ancient ones only in being starved instead of well-fed, and besides this a state of slavery unheard of among the nations till now, has arisen with us. In all former slaveries, Egyptian, Algerine, Saxon, and American, the slaves complaint has been of compulsory work. But the modern Politico-economic slave is a new and far more injured species, condemned to compulsory ill-health, for fear he should spoil other peoples' trade.—J. Ruskin, 'Fors Clavigera.'

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday, December 1, W. Morris lectured at the Athenaeum Hall, Tottenham Court Road, on "The Coming Society." Fair audience and good discussion. On Sunday morning, December 4, meeting was considered an open one, platform and members of the branch not turning up till late.—D.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Nov. 30th, H. H. Sparling lectured on "Podsnappery." Good discussion. Sunday evening, members and friends held "social." Turner addressed large meeting at Clerkenwell Green. Commonweal sold out.—B.

FULHAM.—Excellent meeting addressed by C. Smith, Mrs. Taylor, and Besley. Fair sale of Commonweal. In the evening we had a meeting in Dawes Road, and considering it is a new station, it was well attended. C. Smith, Tochatti, Groser, and Mahony spoke.—S. B. G.

HAMMERSMITH.—Usual meeting Sunday morning at Starch Green, Broadway, speakers were Mahony, Tochatti, and Tarleton. 16 Commonweal sold. All comrades turn up next Sunday. In the evening, G. Bernard Shaw lectured in hall.

NORTH LONDON.—A very good meeting at Regent's Park, Sunday morning, was addressed by Cantwell and Graham, who made an appeal on behalf of some strikers at Messrs. Hardings, for whom 4s. 6½d. was collected; Mrs. Schack and Mainwaring followed, and 4s. 4½d. was collected for propaganda.—T. C.

LEEDS.—Sunday morning, Maguire, Paylor, and Sollitt addressed meeting at Vicar's Croft. In evening, Bland, of Bradford, spoke on "The National Debt."

NORWICH.—Good meeting held in Market Place, addressed by Mowbray, who also lectured in the Gordon Hall at 8 p.m. to a crowded audience, subject "Wage Labour and Capital." Good collections at both meetings. A discussion class is held every Thursday night in our hall at 8 p.m.; comrade Parker read a very good paper last week on "Socialism and the Unemployed." A very lively discussion followed. A free concert is given every Monday night. Our orchestra, which is under the leadership of Mr. A. Rumsby, late R.H.A. band, is progressing very well, and will soon be a very useful addition to our means of propaganda.—C. W. M.

WALSALL.—On Wednesday evening last, P. Kropotkin lectured for Walsall Literary Institute on "The Moral Effects of Prisons on Prisoners." Large attendance and lecture well received. Thursday morning, Kropotkin spoke at our meeting-room to members of the branch, giving a most interesting address on the "Socialist Movement in America, and on the Continent and England." At Monday weekly meeting, H. Sanders spoke on "The Principles of Socialism." Saturday large meeting held on the bridge, and a good impression made.—D.

WEDNESBURY.—Donald addressed the usual meeting in the Market-place, but was rather interrupted. This would be obviated if the branch members were to attend regular and remove disturbers. Donald addresses a large meeting in the Town Hall on Wednesday on "Fair Trade."

BIRMINGHAM.—We continue to hold the usual meetings. Tarn addressed some people at West Bromwich and Swan village, and Donald in Birmingham.

STAFFORD.—Comrade Pengell arranged a meeting at the Stafford Liberal Club, which was addressed by Donald on Tuesday. There was a very good attendance of club members, who were very interested in the address, and invited the lecturer to visit Stafford again to further explain Socialism to them.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—Last Thursday week, the first of a series of meetings of the unemployed of Sheffield and outlying districts was held at the Commonwealth Cafe. Out of over 200 present only eight were in employment. A deputation waited upon the mayor next morning, who promised to confer with the Corporation; he could hold out no hope of employment, but they had a right to the workhouse. A mass meeting at West Bar at 12 o'clock on Monday, sent another deputation with no better result, the mayor again advising workhouse relief. A second mass meeting on Wednesday, which was so large that they had to adjourn to Paradise Square, sent more delegates, who after waiting some considerable time, were allowed to see some members of the Corporation, and were informed then that they would make their decision known to them on Friday at 3 o'clock. On Friday they were told there was no work for them nor money to pay for work. The Friday evening meeting at the Cafe was very crowded, hundreds could not get in. A resolution was carried "that mass meetings be held in different parts of the town, and that the men out of employment come with their names and addresses and trade written on a slip of paper." Several meetings have been arranged for.—M.

DUBLIN.—At the Saturday Club, Dec. 3rd, Mr. J. Hutchinson lectured to a large audience on "Co-operation," advocating the establishment of co-operative societies on the Rochdale system. The Socialist view of the question was ably supported by Coulon, O'German, and Fitzpatrick, who were well received.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

EDINBURGH.—During the last ten days, Mahon has been lecturing amongst the miners of the West of Scotland on behalf of the Glasgow Branch of the Socialist League, and organising the free speech demonstration. A full report will be given next week.

ANTI-STATIST COMMUNIST MANIFESTO

"There is a sad lack of Anarchist pamphlets in England, and we gladly welcome our comrade Joseph Lane's contribution of 'An Anti-Statist Communist Manifesto,' which is an energetic and earnest exposition of Anarchist Socialism from a worker's standpoint. The second portion, which deals with practical politics, is specially interesting. We hope the tract will have a wide circulation."—FREEDOM.

"There is a great lack of literature from this standpoint. We do not agree with all the points, but at the same time recommend it to all our friends and also its translation into the French and German language."—FREHEIT.

"The State in every form is denounced as the abomination of desolation. Mr. Lane is extravagant in many of his statements, but his pamphlet is quite worth reading."—OUR CORNER.

NOTES ON NEWS.

The Liberal Unionists had a great field-day at Westminster on the 9th. They seem to have been very cheerful about their prospects, and if they will but admit that they are a part of the Tory party, we on our part must admit in all honesty that they have some reason to be so—for the present—now that the Gladstonite Liberals have shown that there is no fight in them.

Lord Hartington made a long speech, as a leader must in spite of the torture he may inflict on his audience, of which torture his lordship is a master. The reporter makes the unfortunate Jesse Collings say that "the great minority of the people of Ireland were loyalists." And really since it was Mr. Collings, perhaps he did say so. Lord Selborne in attacking the worship of Mr. Gladstone as a pope (with which attack I cordially agree) held up Lord Hartington as a counter pope. Mr. Richard Chamberlain, in the absence of that illustrious humbug his brother, proposed "extended organisation among the constituencies, not so much by holding meetings, as by private agency among the electors." This latter phrase seems indiscreet. Might I as an interested person (possessed of six votes) ask Mr. R. Chamberlain, How much a vote?

Lord Derby's speech deserves more respect than these weary fatuities, although there was a hole or two in his logic even granting his premises; but at least it had meaning in it, and the moderates would find some of his taunts hard to answer. Yet one may remind him that if the Southern States put up (after a terrible war) with the coercion of the North, their struggle was for the continuance of chattel-slavery, which was doomed both by the ethical and economical circumstances, whereas the Irish are struggling for federalism, the feeling for which is obviously on the increase; it is not the form which a contest takes, but the reason for it which is important.

Lord Derby seemed conscious indeed that the tide was setting towards federation: "Whatever was done for Ireland might be demanded for Scotland, certainly for Wales." "Were they prepared for four local parliaments with perhaps a federal council over all? it would be suicidal. Home Rule would lead to the absolute power of the Crown!" Well I don't see why, comparing it with what is, we should be terrified at the picture. The absolute power of the Crown would certainly lead to the abolition of the Crown, which would be a blessing, though a small one.

"Coercion in some form," says Lord Derby, "is only another name for civilisation." I think he is right; civilisation means turning the whole world into a vast prison; the destruction of all manly ideals; the attempt to substitute "comfort" so called, for happiness—the contented prisoner's ideal of life. I daresay Lord Derby would agree to that and say, "Well, what would you have?" But then, you see, he and those like him are withdrawn from the struggle like the popular gods of Epicurus. They are dull, but they don't suffer; they leave that to others.

After the Conference came the banquet at which Mr. Goschen made the conscious, and the Duke of Argyll the unconscious joke of the evening. A certain Mr. Sinclair had gone on his knees before the Unionist triumvirate—Hartington, Goschen and Chamberlain; so the midmost of those gods made the remarkable joke of picturing the feelings of those in the hall if they had the prospect of being governed by Hyndman, Conybeare and Cunninghame Graham, which to the audience of worshippers of the first trinity, seemed very funny; why, our readers can find out perhaps better than I can: I can only say that the Standard enjoyed it hugely, which is not much in its favour.

The Duke of Argyll's joke was better, much better. "God save Ireland! to be for many years" (how many, your Grace?) "an integral part of that Constitution which promises perfect freedom to all." Apart from a country being an integral part of a Constitution a conception which people below the degree of a duke might find it difficult to master, this is a rich joke indeed. "The promise of perfect freedom" is kept by enacting a stiffish Coercion Act in Ireland, and by doing without it in London and getting on pretty well by dint of open assault and robbery on the highway, backed up by drum-head court-martial afterwards.

By the way where is the Constitution and what is it? We hear a great deal of talk about it as a thing well known to all; but to most of us it keeps about as much out of the way as the sea-serpent. Perhaps the Commonweal might offer a prize for the solution of the above question—if we could only find judges to decide it.

Another of the infamous sentences of the courts of "justice" has fallen on Coleman—12 months' hard labour for asserting the freedom of the highway—the jury giving Edlin the opportunity by not appreciating at its due value the official evidence of the police, which has to be bolstered up by signs passing between the witness in the box and the coming witness. Unluckily, quite apart from the prejudice of a "respectable" jury, it has become the practice of juries simply to allow their ears to be tickled by the judges' summing-up, instead of carefully weighing the evidence themselves.

Trade is reviving—once more—perhaps. Or perhaps a ring or two are at work. Also, some person or persons interested, are working up the periodical war scare again; which is far enough advanced to have the honour of maps in the morning-papers with the position of the Russian troops marked in them. Meantime the revival has not reached everybody; "trade never so bad," is the usual answer of retailers to any questions on the subject.

The attack on M. Ferry is a droll affair—hit by three bullets and never a hole in him—what does it mean? Is he like Claverse and others in seventeenth century story, who had made a compact with the Devil and couldn't be pierced by any baser metal than silver? This would be rather suitable to his stockjobbing antecedents too.

Linnell's death is called, as one foresaw it would be, an "accident" by the bourgeois press. Just so accidents happen when a hundred men pull the triggers of a hundred rifles loaded with ball cartridge, and other men happen to be standing opposite to them. The general attitude of the press on this business is best characterised by the word shabby. The shabby dodge of reclaiming the body to prevent the funeral on the 11th! The shabby attempt to prove that Linnell drank, poor man! And again, in the case of Joseph Ellis, the harmless partyless man, the exultation of getting hold of a "Socialist leader!" Shabby! Shabby!! Shabby!!! One is ashamed of having such enemies.

They are terribly powerful, though, in spite of—or rather, because of—their shabbiness. As witness the above case of Joseph Ellis: that such a piece of malignant injustice could have been perpetrated without an outcry even from the shabby classes shows how strong they feel themselves. To pass by other matters in the case—e.g., the swearing through a brick wall, so familiar to us by now—let it be remembered that Ellis was charged with hurting Livingstone, and that he was obviously hurt with a weapon. Well, the jury, cowed and confused let us hope, by the style in which "justice" is administered in that court, bring in a verdict of guilty; but the muddled Britons say at the same time that he did not strike Livingstone with an instrument, but with his fist: which, since Livingstone was not struck with a fist but with a weapon, is tantamount to an acquittal. After which, Edlin (I regret to have to soil these pages with his name) sentences him to 'eight months' hard labour. This is what Palmerston's once famous "Civis Romanus sum" has come to! This is the protection of the law! Let us add as a crowning piece of shabbiness that the LIBERAL Daily News omitted in its report of the trial this quasi-acquittal of the jury.

Mr. Bradlaugh has been defending his conduct in Parliament before his constituents, who, it must be said, did not appreciate his reasons for voting against his colleague in the matter of cutting down the preposterous salaries of the successful lawyers called judges. He was in favour of women working at the pit brow, and thereby reducing the wages of the men of their own households; he is shocked at women being driven on the streets, but seemingly not so shocked at men knocking about the streets workless, which clearly must result in the women supplementing their scanty pay by street-walking. He objected to Land Nationalisation on the grounds that it must either be bought or stolen! Would he object to taking his fishing-boots back from a thief on the same grounds?

CO-OPERATION next claims our attention. Here we have an attempt to reduce the evil of bad distribution and to some extent the evil of competition. In the distributive store they do undoubtedly succeed in both to a large extent. But when things get into shops it is too late to save the bulk of what the worker is robbed of. Co-operative production has been tried, but not often on a truly co-operative basis, in which those who work own all the capital. Mostly it is a system of joint-stock companies with small shares owned by working men instead of capitalists; others are simply factories owned by a co-operative society, in which the worker is in exactly the same position as in any other factory. The first form, in which the workers in any factory own all the capital and so get what profits there are, is the only one which can really solve any part of our social problem, and the chance of this form doing so is very small. The amount of capital required in many trades is so great per man that there is no chance of a sufficient number of working men being able to find it. And then comes even a greater difficulty; the competition prevents them getting a fair start.

I will not go over all the reasons why co-operative productive societies cannot compete with others, as they were given recently in this paper.

The only way in which we could imagine co-operation solving the problem would be in becoming in fact national co-operation or Socialism. Supposing co-operative production by some means yet to be discovered should be able to compete and drive out private firms, they would then compete amongst themselves, bringing many of the same evils that we have now. To do away with this, each trade would have to organise itself; all the workshops or factories in that trade would have to federate; but then each trade would become a monopoly, and there would still be the waste of the competition between the various trades which we saw above. To do away with these two evils the different trades would have to be federated, and the whole placed under the control of the people. Then we have Socialism, or at least a form of it. Hence we see that co-operation can only solve the difficulties for which we are seeking a cure by going on and becoming Socialism, and in this it differs from all the other means of improvement we have seen, that there is in co-operation a germ which it is possible to conceive might develop into a complete solution. But in co-operation with its present limited scope and tendency to profit-mongering, there is very little ground for hope that it will so develop; and even if the movement should be widened, the way of its development is barred by competition. It is a remedy which would be good if most of the evil could be cured before this was tried. If we could abolish some of the evils of competition then there might be a chance for it, but it has not the force to fight all the evils with which we are beset.

We have now reviewed all the chief remedies which are proposed and trusted in by the majority. There are a few minor ones, such as temperance and thrift, which, even if they produced the utmost effect hoped by their advocates, could only make poverty rather less severe; they do not touch at all the industrial evils; they are powerless to influence the growing uncertainty of employment, or the crises produced by so-called over-production.

This survey of the gods to which the modern world is trusting for deliverance calls to one's mind the words of the Old Book: "For my people have committed two evils: they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water."

Truly we have forsaken the only principles upon which a happy society can be based—the principles of justice, freedom, and brotherhood—and having founded our system upon competition, injustice, selfishness, and theft, we in vain try to hew out such institutions as shall enable a happy society to exist upon such a basis.

I think it has been abundantly shown that nothing but a complete change of the basis of society will avail, and that those who continue to try and prop up society on its present basis without seeking entirely to change it, are, as it were, simply hewing broken cisterns which can hold no water. The Socialist, much abused for his unpractical views, stands forth, then, as alone proclaiming the absolute necessity for the complete change of basis, and it behoves all to examine carefully the change which he proposes, to see whether it will cure the present evils and also fulfil the needs of mankind. Now what are these needs?

First, probably, both in order of development and importance, is the need of social life and intercourse, which drew men together long before they had learnt that they could satisfy their other wants better when united. We need, then, a society in which there shall be the least possible hindrance to social intercourse, in which there shall be no artificial barriers raised to prevent men from sharing the love and intercourse of the spirits most congenial to their nature. Opposing interests must not divide men into antagonistic cliques and classes, thus very often separating those who could have enjoyed a wealth of social intercourse. Then a substantial equality of conditions is a requisite of all free and easy social intercourse. So much is this so, that even the love of lovers which is strong enough to brave social ostracism, to face the hardships of a comparatively poorer way of living, is seldom strong enough to overcome the insidious influence of the different conditions to which the two lovers have been accustomed. The number of tragedies which one sees resulting from the intermarriage of those who belong to classes whose wealth is greatly unequal, testifies at once to the power of inequality of conditions to break down sympathy even where it has formed strongest, and also to the frequency with which such inequality separates those who would otherwise have been suited for mutual friendship or love. We saw in an earlier part of this article that substantial equality was necessary for the full development of the first want of man, the want of social intercourse with his fellows.

Man next needs from society an easier way of satisfying his material wants than he could use as an isolated individual. This to a large extent present society has found, but at present does not know how wisely to use. Then he needs that his portion of necessary work shall be as pleasant as possible to him, and this even if the time should have to be lengthened to allow it, for surely it were better to work five hours a-day at an occupation in such a way that they might be five hours of pleasure, than to work four hours under conditions which make them four hours of pain. To this end there must be the greatest freedom allowed to each individual in the choice of his work, so that he may choose the kind in which he can take most pleasure, and if this should result in the overcrowding of certain trades, there must be as far as possible compensation offered in those trades which by their nature cannot be made pleasant. Then there should be freedom to each to judge to some extent of the relative value of leisure and material wealth, so that one who might wish to live sparingly and have much leisure could do so, and one who might wish to have less leisure and more material wealth could also do so.

These are some of the needs of mankind; and we must first test the great change which the Socialists propose to make, by seeing if it promises to satisfy those needs better than the present system.

The change which the Socialist proposes is, in a few words, the abolition of private property in the means of production; and he thinks that upon the new basis of common ownership of the means of production, a society will arise whose guiding principles shall be, as the old popular cry has it, "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Freedom for the individual to develop his individuality to the greatest extent consistent with the same freedom to others. Equality of condition for all; equal chance for all to find the position in the economy of society unto which he was destined and for which he is best fitted. Brotherhood fostered by common interests, by work and consultation shared in by all, by hardships faced and pleasures enjoyed by all in common.

PLAIN SPEAKING.

(To the Editor of the Adelaide Commonwealth.)

SIR,—I do not know you; I do not want to know you. I simply wish to point out to you how absurd it is your wasting your time and ability in advocating the rights of the whole community to the land in which they live. I am not going to discuss whether your views are right or wrong; that has nothing to do with the matter. You must remember that we, who have the money at our command, own not only the land but also all the other means of production and exchange. We have the daily press in our pay; the leading lawyers are retained in our favour the banks are our staunch supporters, in fact our fortresses. Through them we control the majority of the workers, even those who fondly imagine themselves to be independent and fairly well off. Independent! Why you, sir, must know how interdependent all of us are. And so long as we as a class can command possession of the soil, the mines, the water, and the greater part of the machinery and the money; which is, after all, simply a machine to facilitate the exchange of goods; so long we are the masters of the situation and the workers simply our slaves; slaves whom we keep to produce wealth for us. If it were not so the workers could daily in a very few hours produce all the wealth they want, and a long way more than they now get, or are likely to get. But you see they do not produce for themselves, but for us. So the longer they work and the more they produce, the more we take from them as rents, interest, or profits. This is a very good thing for us, and we shall maintain it as long as we can. And really, sir, you are quite helpless; you and your fellows can do nothing. You want a good substantial land tax, as you call it, but you won't get it. Why, all your politicians are opposed to it. Of course they are; those who do not yet belong to our class hope sooner or later to do so, and in the meantime we can put some good things in their way which enlists them on our side. A good substantial land tax, if imposed at once, would, indeed, weaken our power; it would lessen our hold of the soil, of the mines, etc.; and I know it is their possession which enables us to own and profitably manage for our benefit all other means of production. Do you think we are going to give up that which gives us our strength? Honesty, justice, and truth are very good expressions, and we often use them—on Sundays; but give me good commercial principles for our everyday life. We have the power, and intend sticking to it; we can invoke all the forces of the British Empire to assist us. We always stick together, you know, and we are good patriots. Must we fight? Oh, no! We can get plenty of men to do so for us at about one shilling a-day. So you see you can do nothing. We are the respectable classes; our politicians and our lawyers will always manage to deceive the majority of those you wish to help. Take my advice, my dear Mr. Editor, and don't bother about other people. Save all the money you can. Get it honestly, at all events legally. Invest it carefully and you will soon have plenty free slaves of your own working for you. You will not be called a slaveowner, but

A CAPITALIST.

There is no physical crime at this day so far beyond pardon, so without parallel in its untempted guilt as the making of war-machinery and invention of mischievous substance. We are so humane, forsooth, and so wise; and our ancestors had tar barrels for witches, we will have them for everybody else, and drive the witches' trade ourselves by daylight; we will have our cauldrons, please Hecate, cooled (according to the Darwinian theory) with baboon's blood, and enough of it, and sell hell-fire in the open streets.—J. Ruskin, 'Pers Clavigera.'

THE TRIAL.

ON May 18th, the grand jury began the examination of witnesses. On the 25th, they indicted August Spies, Michel Schwab, the editors of the Chicago Arbeiter Zeitung, Albert R. Parsons, editor of the Alarm, Adolph Fischer, Samuel Fielden, George Engel, Louis Lingg, Oscar Neebe, Rudolph Schnaubelt, and Wilhelm Seliger for the murder of Mathias J. Degan and others, for conspiracy, riot, and unlawful assembly. Schnaubelt left the city and never returned. Parsons also left the town. Seliger turned informer, and was not included with the others. The trial was commenced before Judge Gary in the Criminal Court, June 21st, and the sensation of the day was the return and surrender of A. R. Parsons, who walked quietly into court and took his seat beside his indicted comrades. Twenty-one days were consumed in the effort to secure twelve men for the jury. The right of trial by an "impartial jury" is a constitutional provision. How "impartial" the jury was may be seen from the following status of juror No. 1:—

"In answer to questions which were permitted, he stated that he was prejudiced against Socialists, Anarchists, and Communists as a class. The rulings of the court, however, prevented inquiries as to whether that prejudice would influence his verdict, or the weight he would give to the testimony of the defendants, if they should be sworn, and to their witnesses, in his determination of the cause." Nine others admitted similar prejudices.

It is impossible to enter here into all the details of the trial, but no stone was left unturned to secure all possible evidence against the men. An informer piled up the agony to save his neck; police perjured themselves; witnesses were terrorised to speak against the men, etc., etc. One thing, however, is certain; that it has amply been proved during the trial that none of the accused either threw the deadly bomb or induced anybody to do so. In fact, who threw the bomb is to-day as much a mystery as it was on the 4th of May.

Judge Gary presiding at the trial, and Attorney Grinnell, competed with each other in their efforts to secure a verdict detrimental to the men. The sentence of death against seven, and imprisonment for fifteen years against Neebe, was passed on October 10th, 1886. The date fixed for execution was December 3. The same date on which John Brown was hanged twenty-seven years ago for trying to liberate the slaves. Efforts were made to obtain a stay of execution. This was granted on November 25th. An appeal was then made to the Supreme Court of Illinois. They gave judgment on Sept. 14th, 1887. Then an effort was made to secure a writ of error from the Supreme Court of the United States at Washington. On November 2nd, 1887, this Court declined to grant a writ of error. The day for the execution was fixed for November 11th, upholding the Chicago Court decision.

Nothing could save the men now but the Governor of Illinois. The capitalistic press and the police throughout the States howled for the blood of the men. From all parts of the country appeals were made to induce the Governor to pardon the men. The President of the Federation of Trades' Unions, and the Master Workman of the principal Districts of Knights of Labour went in person to the Governor; but all in vain. He commuted the sentence of Fielden and Schwab, but refused to do anything for the other five. They were doomed to swing. Oscar Neebe had already been taken to Joliet Prison to do his fifteen years.

SCENES IN PRISON.

The seven men were imprisoned in Cook County Jail, Chicago, a large gloomy brick structure, surmounted by a cupola. The office of the jailer opens by an iron-grated door into a large area enclosed in a strongly built iron frame, covered with closely woven heavy wire. This structure is called the "cage," and it is here that the visitors of the seven men came to see them. The prisoners were kept, however, in the jail proper, and communication had to be made through the narrow meshes of wire. The cells of the men were situated in the so-called "murderer's row" on the ground floor. The seven cells are in a line, and can be seen distinctly from the office. The wives and children spent the visiting hours every day with the husbands and fathers. They were admitted to the huge "cage" that rises into the air and covers the yard space, and through the wires of this screen they talked with the prisoners.

The following description was given in the press shortly before the murder was consummated:—

"Mrs. Fischer is a daily visitor. She is only twenty-seven years of age, and looks much younger. She knows nothing whatever outside of her three children and her household duties, and is at a loss to understand how her husband got into his present difficulty. The youngest child was born on the day after the sentence of death was passed upon his father.

"Schwab's wife is a tall, handsome woman, of good presence and commanding demeanour. She has two children. They accompany her to the "cage" to see their father, and console him. Mrs. Schwab has maintained a stoical air until the last few days. She has been unremitting in her attention to her husband, and has made every effort in her power to help the movements in his favour. The children are bright and pretty, and have always been well dressed. They are great favourites with the keepers, and have frequently been allowed to go within the jail itself. This is an unusual privilege, but has been accorded them because of their winning manners and intense love of their fathers. That love is well returned. No man in this broad land is more attached to his children than Michael Schwab, the Anarchist.

"Mrs. Parsons is the other half of her husband. She shares his opinions, and has always taken part in his proceedings. She has two children. She spends little time in the prison, having business outside, but she is a good and attentive wife for all that. She sends the children to see the father, and has them kept with him during the permissible hours. Mrs. Parson's notion is that she can best serve her husband by continuing the work he had at heart, and when he has gone she will be solaced with the thought that she is doing as he would have wished.

"The very opposite to Mrs. Parsons is the wife of Fielden. She is a small woman, with a shy manner, and a nervous shrinking way. She is an English woman and very domestic. She has been brought up in an atmosphere of the strictest respect of law and order, and knows no more of the teachings of Anarchism than an unborn babe. It is thought that the hanging of her husband will be fatal to her. Her eldest child, Alice, is five years old, and very attractive, and when allowed to go behind the bars invariably goes up to her father's cell and ransacks his clothes for candy. Previous to his imprisonment, he was in the habit when returning from work of taking her candy or fruits and permitting her to hunt for it in his pockets. She still remembers it, and of course is too young to comprehend the change that has come. He is very fond of her, as well as his little boy, who bears his name, and who first saw the light on the day before Judge Gary pronounced sentence of death upon him.

"Engel has more callers than any of the others. This is due to his numerous family. He has a good many children, but they are grown up and mostly married. He has one single daughter, and she is at the jail every day. Engel is devotedly fond of her, and would do anything to escape for her sake. She is quite pretty and an immense favourite. It is whispered that she was engaged to be married, and that the match was broken off on account of her father's arrest. The young fellow belonged to a good family in Indiana, and they would not hear of his taking the Anarchist's daughter. The family are church-goers, and the man himself is said to be a type of his home. He was shocked at the notion of the arrest, but the sentence of death and the rest of it drove him completely off. The girl was very much in love with him, and the affair has completely ruined her life. She has no hope now but in her father's pardon, and at this hour that is the dimmest kind of a ray."

Louis Lingg was not married, but engaged to a young German girl who visited him daily.

August Spies at the time of the trial was also a single man. Nina van Zandt made his acquaintance while he was in jail; she learned to love him and married him by proxy. Nothing can be truer than that love levels all obstacles and lays the shepherd's crook beside the sceptre. There was not a more determined Anarchist than August Spies on the face of the globe a short year ago. He held his life like a feather, and had no other thought than the welfare of his kind. Heart and soul he went into the movement, and his energy and ability were devoted to it. His history in connection with the labour movement in Chicago is well known; his courage, his daring, his connection in the line of conduct he had marked out for himself, and yet this man so wrapped in a single thought signed a request for a pardon. Was that conviction? No. Was it a change of view? No. Was it because he feared death? No, a thousand times. It was because a woman's face had crept into his heart and taken possession of it. It was because that woman's face, that woman's love had banished every other resident from the citadel in which she had made her home, and henceforth she should rule supreme in that seat of love. Spies held back until the last moment. He would not even listen to those who begged him to try and help his case. He held that he was sacrificing himself in a good cause, and it was worth dying for the benefits that would accrue to others. When the sad fair face of Nina looked at him through the wires and her sweet voice pleaded for their happiness he capitulated, nor can we blame him, despite the apparent weakening it showed. Since then Spies has died like a true hero. He met his death as unflinching, as calm, as any of the other four.

CLERICAL BIGOTRY AT LOWESTOFT.—Lowestoft is distinguishing itself by the uncompromising opposition of its local Tories to the Socialist propaganda, or even to discussing Socialism. The latest phase is as follows: The local branch of the Y. M. C. A. has a literary class, which was at one of its meetings to debate the question, "Would the adoption of Socialism benefit the working classes?" On hearing of this the Rev. T. A. Nash, president of the society, hastily called together the committee, for the purpose of taking prompt steps for stopping such a horrible design. All the parsons attended in force, full of pious lies about the unholy character of the subject, and of assertions that it was opposed to the teaching of the Bible, and was not at all fit for debate in a Christian association. After the experience which comrades Nicoll and Henderson had at this parson-and-tory-ridden town, it is no matter for surprise that the subject was not discussed in the Y.M.C.A. rooms. Perhaps the surprise might be shown on learning that the persons interested were able to hire a suitable room and hold their debate at all; but such was luckily the case. The Hull Express comments severely on the attitude of the parsons, and says, "It is interesting to reflect that the clergymen who thought Socialism an unfit subject of debate professed the faith whose earliest professors 'had all things in common.' Socialism, no doubt, may mean a great many things, which may or may not be for the good of mankind, but the term itself implies nothing more than that human society should be based more on the common good and less on private interest. We may call this a dream, but it is certainly not an ugly nor a bad dream."

THE CONSCIENCE OF THE UPPER CLASSES.

It seems to be universally admitted that the conference held on December 5th in the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, on the prevailing distress in London was the direct outcome of the unemployed agitation, for joining in which so many poor men have been sentenced with a spite at once so malignant and so petty that it fairly sickens an honest man to think of it. These rich and well-to-do persons were driven to meet together by a fear which I do not say they all felt in their own persons, but which is certainly permeating their class, a fear so easily aroused that a few hundred destitute, unarmed, peaceably behaved persons parading London streets could strike terror into the hearts of the well-to-do of the richest city of the most powerful empire in the world.

It is scarcely worth while to criticise the various schemes and opinions of the speakers at the meeting. In plain terms, the one person who said anything worth listening to was Cardinal Manning, and it is a curious sign of the times that a high official of the Catholic Church should give a lesson in sociology to Liberal and Radical politicians, humanitarian dissenting ministers, and professional philanthropists—the latter represented by Mr. Arnold White, who, one might think, would be glad, if he dared, to advocate a battue of the useless foreigners and quick-breeding Britons of London, after the fashion of the Spartan Helot-hunts.

Of the Cardinal it must be said that he showed none of that base and cowardly hatred of the degraded poor (the poor whose degradation is caused by the exclusive "refinement" of the rich) which is the ordinary feeling of the cultured classes, whether openly expressed or veiled under the pretext of poor-law-philanthropy. Said he: "Thirty years ago I went into places where it was said the police dared not go, and found them very harmless."

Again, as a Catholic prelate he was not concerned to support the cheerful commercial optimism (about other people's troubles) which is the lining, so to speak, of the moral pessimism of the well-to-do; and he exposed their miserable evasion of setting down the greater part of the unemployed demonstrators as criminals and loafers, and roundly accused "society" of being responsible for their existence. Lastly he attacked, however mildly, the ferocity of the philanthropists about out-door relief. In fact it is clear that he could see nothing else for dealing with the present distress but that very out-door relief in some form or other, the horror of which a few years ago had established itself firmly in the hearts of all philanthropists as a kind of holy dogma not to be questioned; a piece of altruistic piety invented to take the place of the now obsolete "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you." There is a great deal of virtue in the Latinisation of an English word: A Gods' name (or the Other One's) don't "pauperise" people! But you may carefully keep them poor and feel none the worse for it!

The Cardinal wound up with what may be regarded as an official tag, about "voluntary agencies," and the necessity of "visiting the homes of the poor." This was what his office compelled him to say and need not be noticed, if it were not of value as showing that we must not reckon on real help from the Catholic clergy. All that can be expected of them is the administration of charity in its less insulting and kindlier form, and the occasional startling of smug respectability from its after-dinner doze by the enunciation of some obvious social truth, which the genuine Catholic, with his contempt of human life on the earth except as a preparation for another, non-human life, finds it easy to see; but which is quite strange to the commercial religionist engaged in saving his own soul in this world and the next at everybody else's expense.

For the rest nothing was proposed except a mere bundle of evasions of the fact that our system of production is breaking down into ruin through its own triumph. Whatever middle-class rule has put before itself as an aim it has won; but the well-being of the worker was never its aim and could not be; his endurance and quietude only has been aimed at. But since the middle-class ideal is that there should be widely-spread comfort for those living wholly or partly on the labour of others, while those others should not be so sorely pinched as to rebel or refuse to work, the safeguards against the ruin of the system of wage-slavery have been disregarded; especially the chief safeguard, the organisation of labour; the widening of the basis of spoliation by making it as easy as may be for the worker to pinch and screw himself out of his class into that of the robbers of labour, has been thought safeguard enough in this direction; but this safeguard is now yielding to the increase in the pace of competition; and we are face to face with the consequences of the wholesale waste of labour which is sure to happen in a society composed of rich and poor in an epoch well equipped with mechanical resources.

We have been forcing the great mass of the workers to make things of no use to the workers (or to any one else for that matter), and we have assumed that we shall always be able to find people willing to take these pieces of manufacture from us in exchange for food and other necessities which are produced by the workers, and not by the buyers of the useless things. When we come to think of the fact, that these buyers of inutilities have nothing to buy them with except the necessities which they steal from the workers, part of which they must dole out to them again as slave-rations under the modern name of "wages," one need be no longer astonished that the scanty and seemingly harmless gatherings of the unemployed should have frightened the class that owns "Society," and made them ask "What's to be done now?" They will not find an answer, though the answer will come; because any attempt they may make to limit the waste of labour will but act as a lever for the destruction of the Society which they are so eager to save.

Jottings from the Bylaws of the Coast Seamen's Union of the Pacific Coast.

1. Be truthful and honest, generous and courageous. It is for these objects, also, that the Union is formed. Try and make yourselves MEN in every sense of the word.
2. Educate yourself on the Labour question, and try to become thoroughly acquainted with all the details of your occupation.
3. When on board, try to do your work well—first, because the better workman you are, the better man; second, because to be a Union man should be synonymous with being an able and ready seaman.
4. Avoid backbiting and jealousy of each other as the supremest curse. Nothing so quickly breeds discontent and division as these low vices. Either speak well of your brother or be silent.
5. Consider it an honour to be a Union man, and a dishonour to be a liar, gambler, scandal-monger and mischief breeder.
6. Do not permit any member of the Union in your hearing to prophesy evil or defeat of the Union, outside of the meetings.

SOCIALISM IN NEW SOUTH WALES.

SOME time ago we chronicled the formation of the Australian Socialist League; we are glad to be able to report now that much progress is being made, and that the movement promises well. The hon. sec. of the League is W. H. McNamara, 109 Castlereagh Street, Sydney, from whom its Manifesto and publications may be obtained. The following extract from the Manifesto shows its character:

"Labour being the creator of all wealth and civilisation, it rightfully follows that those who labour and create all wealth should enjoy the full results of their toil. . . . A just and equitable distribution of the fruits of labour is utterly impossible under the present system of society. This fact is abundantly illustrated by the deplorable condition of the working classes, which are in a state of destitution and degrading dependence in the midst of their own productions. While the hardest and most disagreeable work brings to the worker only the bare necessities of life, others who labour not riot in labour's production. The present industrial system of competition, based on rent, profit-takings, speculation, and interest, causes and intensifies this inequality, concentrating into the hands of a few all means of production, distribution, and the results of labour, thus creating gigantic monopolies dangerous to the people's liberties."

A leaflet of "Platform and Principles" has also been issued, which is calculated to do great good by its plain speaking.

"2. To uphold and maintain the principle of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity. By liberty we mean 'the equal liberty of each, limited alone by the equal liberty of all.' By Equality we mean 'the equality of opportunity for each individual.' And by Fraternity we mean that principle which denies national and class distinctions, asserts the brotherhood of man, and says 'the world is my country.'"

"3. To endeavour to alter from its foundation the prevailing system of production and distribution; to seek to overturn the reign of Capitalism and Land-monopoly. The land, capital, machinery, factories, workshops, stores, means of transit, mines, banking, all means of production and distribution of wealth, must be declared and treated as the common property of all. Every man will then receive the full value of his labour, without deduction for the profit of a master, and as all will have to work, and the waste now incurred by the pursuit of profit will be at an end, the amount of labour necessary for every individual to perform in order to carry on the essential work of the world will be reduced to something like two or three hours daily; so that each person will have abundant leisure for following intellectual or other pursuits congenial to his nature."

"4. The regulation of all commercial transactions between individuals upon the just and equitable principle of making the cost to the seller the measure of price, or consideration, to the buyer or receiver; and not as at present making price dependant upon the incidental value of the commodity or service. In other words, to make all exchanges of wealth or service on the principle of equal labour for equal labour—time for time—cost for cost—burden for burden."

"5. To foster mutual confidence and fraternity amongst the working people of all ranks. To remove the elements of war; distrust and discord caused by competition for profits, and class exploitation of the workers. To abolish standing armies and all vestiges of militarism and coercive laws; the people themselves being the best defenders of their own rights, they therefore can decide on peace or war."

In Hamilton (N.S.W.) there is published a weekly paper called the Radical, which is much more worthy of the name than its London namesake, as it stays for no prejudice in advocating all-round social freedom. Its editor, W. R. Winspear, is manifestly not only an advanced politician, who is not afraid of the name of Socialist, but is also a well-read man and a smart writer. His paper should be a great power for good in Australian politics, where it is as much wanted as at home here, even if not more. It is cheering to note that the Radical and the Socialist League are doing all they can to help each other, and while the following statement of what the paper opposes remains true, we do not see that the League can do much better, until it has an organ of its own:

"The Radical opposes Imperial Federation; imperial titles and distinctions; all expenditure for war purposes, the maintenance of standing armies or navies for providing royal or aristocratic sinecures; all pensions to previously well paid officials, or grants of large sums of money to played out politicians; all expenditure for a second chamber composed of foolish old men chosen by foolish old premiers; all expenditure of public monies upon the property of private individuals, to the detriment of public property; all expenditure of public money for the aggrandisement of any sect or creed; all compensation for land resumption, unless in cases where the improvements of the owner are involved; the present system of election on different days, because we believe the elections should all take place on one day; the present distribution of power among merchants, squatters, and lawyers, because labour should have the bulk of legislative power; we are opposed to the protection which is now afforded the capitalist, for we believe the transgressor should be met with the strong arm of Justice, whether he be manager, miner, or councillor."

Now that Australia has the unemployed, a real Radical paper, and the "damned Socialists," it will begin to be probable that it will not be so much praised as a paradise for workers, in which milk and honey flows all day and discontent is unknown. The privileged classes there are viewing the progress of affairs with alarm, and ominous mutterings are heard every other while from what our American comrades call the "reptile press," that are pleasant-sounding to Socialist ears. A Reuter's telegram from Berlin dated December 7th states that private advices from Moscow report that during the last few days a large number of pupils of the high schools have been arrested on a charge of being concerned in revolutionary plots.

CIGAR-MAKING MACHINE.—For years the employers in the cigar trade have endeavoured to supplant manual labour, but notwithstanding the many attempts, they have, up to the present time, failed. Now, however, a machine has just been introduced into a union shop in Tottenham Court Road, which promises to be successful in the manufacture of cigars.—H. D.

CARDINAL MANNING AND THE UNEMPLOYED.—By the directions of Cardinal Manning a circular letter appealing for alms on behalf of the poor was on Sunday read in all the Catholic churches in the Archdiocese of Westminster, and a collection for the same purpose was made at the different services. At the Pro-Cathedral, Kensington, his Eminence supplemented this appeal by a personal entreaty.

"DO" OR BE "DONE"!

It was a young capitalist,
From Oxford fresh he came;
To start himself in business,
And gain an honest name;
He took a conscience with him, which
He should have left at home—
He would not do as Rome did,
And yet he went to Rome.

It was a weary bankrupt
That trudged from Rome one day,
But what to Rome is a broken heart—
He passed unseen away;
He left his cash behind him,
His conscience he took home—
He would not do as Rome did—
So he was "done" at Rome.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Chapman and Hall announce the issue of some of the most popular of Carlyle's works, in volumes of 1s. each, bound in red cloth, crown 8vo., to begin with the 'French Revolution' (3 vols.) and 'Sartor Resartus,' which will be followed by 'Heroes and Hero Worship' and 'Past and Present.'

'Tory and Socialist' (Shrimpton, Oxford, 3d.) is a neatly-written pamphlet "by an Oxford Undergraduate," the keynote of which is in its closing words: "Is it not possible that Socialists may find in Tories their best friends, and that in aiding Socialists, Tories will be holding out the right hand of fellowship to men who are willing and eager to preserve the ancient greatness of our country as resolutely as themselves?"

'The Road to National Prosperity' (H. Campkin, 272, St. Ann's Well Road, Nottingham; 6d., by post, 7½d.) is a really admirable pamphlet addressed by a workman to working-men. The author is not a "full-blown" Socialist, but is not far off. It is well worth reading, and should command a large sale. S.

AUGUST VINCENT T. SPIES.

AUGUST VINCENT THEODORE SPIES was born December 10, 1855, at Friedewald, Kurhessen (Province Hesse-Nassau since 1866), Germany. His father was a forester (government official). He received his early education from private tutors, who prepared him for the Polytechnicum, which he attended for one year. He then began to study forestry, having chosen his father's profession. He was unusually bright, and made quite a reputation for himself among his schoolmates. When but fourteen years old he had read the great German classics, and even parts of Kant's and Hegel's philosophy; before that he had already become a religious sceptic. His philosophical disposition was so manifest that his father named him "the dreamer." At the age of seventeen, owing to the sudden death of his father, he abandoned his studies, they being too expensive to continue, and went to America, where a number of wealthy relatives were living. So far from being a Socialist at this time, he was an enthusiastic admirer of Bismarck and "Old William." He knew nothing about Socialism, except what he had read about it in the newspapers during the Paris Commune—namely, that it meant an equal distribution of property: too preposterous a thing, as a matter of course, to be deserving of the least consideration. His relatives in New York advised the youth to learn a trade, and he chose the furniture business (upholstery). He did not remain in New York very long, but went to Chicago, where he lived since October 1872. One year of this time, however, he spent in the country, working on a farm, with the intention of becoming a farmer. Finding that the small farmers, and particularly the renters, were systematically robbed of their labour by the mortgage fiend, railroad and other sharks, and that they were made homeless and driven from the soil, which they had by hard labour transformed from prairie into cultivated acres, he returned to the city and engaged in the furniture business for himself. Prior to this, however, he travelled through the northern and southern States to see and study land and people. He first became acquainted with Socialistic literature in 1876; the events of 1877 made him an avowed Socialist. He studied the great German, French, and English writers and thinkers upon the subject (among them Marx and the social historians Buckle and Morgan), and in 1878 he became connected with the Socialistic Labour Party. In 1880 he was called to take the management of the daily Arbeiter Zeitung, then on the verge of bankruptcy. He succeeded in saving the paper, and a year later was entrusted with the editorial management, in which position he remained until arrested after the Haymarket occurrence. In 1879 and '80 he was a candidate on the Socialistic ticket. But later his views regarding the practicability of "political action" changed. He believed that only on the economic battlefield could the great issue between the producer and the product-monger, between the wage-slave and his fleecer be settled. He became an Anarchist. For further particulars we would refer the reader to 'August Spies' Autobiography' (price 25c.), published by Nina Van Zandt-Spies, Chicago, Ill.

THE LONDON TRADES' COUNCIL AND THE PRINCE OF WALES.—The report has been contradicted that at the meeting of Mr. George Shipton and the Prince of Wales in the East End, overtures were made to the Prince of Wales to preside at a meeting of the "genuine" unemployed to be held in Trafalgar Square. What the conversation turned on was the representative character of the London Trades Council, which it was explained embraces 61 societies representing 25,615 members. The Council feels itself able to deal with the unemployed question without appealing direct to the Prince of Wales. Full particulars of the action of the Council and the unemployed will appear in the next annual report.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

DURHAM MINERS.—Troubles have arisen between masters and men at Ryhope and Wingate Collieries, concerning the imposition of tub-loading on Sundays at the first-named, and an extra night shift at the other. The men have ceased work, and nearly 4,000 hands have been thrown idle.

DOCKYARD WORKMEN.—The reductions which were being made wholesale some time ago, and which were stopped owing to the pressure brought to bear by the constituencies on the local members, are being revived, and it is reported that the staff at the Sheerness Dockyard will be largely reduced. Two hundred men are to be shortly discharged.

LEEDS TAILORING TRADE.—On Saturday last, a meeting of the unionist and non-unionist Jewish machinists took place for the purpose of inducing the non-unionists to become members of the Machinist Society. About 600 persons attended, and there seems every likelihood of a sound organisation resulting from it. The question of a Federation of Machinists, Tailors, and Pressers was also discussed.

WEST CUMBERLAND IRONWORKERS.—The ironmasters of the West Cumberland district held a meeting at Workington last Friday, and decided, in consequence of the advance in the price of iron to 46s. 9d. per ton, to withdraw the notice of a reduction of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in the blast furnacemen's wages. This will prevent the expected lock-out of several thousand men, and has given general satisfaction.

AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.—The agricultural labour market in Yorkshire continues much depressed, and it is many years since there was such a large number of yearly servants disengaged. The country market places are crowded each market day with men and youths seeking situations, but the supply is greatly in excess of the demand. Many of these farm hands will be idle, it is said, until about February.

An Essex rector calls attention to the very low wages for agricultural labour paid in his district. The wages do not exceed 10s. a-week, and on wet days the labourer has nothing. One man, who had been idle two days on account of the inclemency of the weather, went home on Saturday with 6s. 8d. in his pocket for his wife and family.

REDUCTION OF CATHEDRAL OFFICIALS' WAGES.—Owing to the falling off in their revenues by reason of the depression in agriculture, the Dean and Chapter of Peterborough have reduced the salaries of the cathedral officials. The reduction is at the rate of 10 per cent., and applies to all the officials, from the minor canons down to the vergers. The salaries of the dean and the canons had been previously reduced. The ecclesiastical employes will find some consolation in the figures of Goschen and Co., which prove that as prices have fallen and the commodities are cheaper, it is possible to manage with much less wage, if not without wage at all. The depression has not yet affected the "moderate stipend" of the Archbishop of Canterbury and other "big guns."

GLASGOW UNITED TRADES COUNCIL.—This council met last week, when a subscription from the Glassmakers Society for Broxburn miners was acknowledged. The delegate from the steel-smelters stated that the late attempted reduction had been a failure, that in some classes of work a rise had been obtained, and he was happy to say that the result had been much to the benefit of the society as regarded numbers. It was agreed to issue a circular to all the trades councils in the kingdom in connection with the importation of labour, as resolved on by the council at its last meeting, as it was thought to be a much wider question, affecting other districts as much as it did at the works of Messrs. Merry and Cuninghame.

MINERS' MEETING AT HEDNESFORD.—On Thursday evening, a mass meeting of miners was held in the Market Hall, Hednesford. The chair was occupied by Mr. P. F. O'Kelly. Mr. A. Stanley, miners' agent for the district, proposed, "That in the opinion of this meeting it is essentially necessary that all men employed in and about mines should become thoroughly organised in order to obtain fair wages, just weights, better legislative protection, and further by combined action, to help on reform so much needed by a radical reform of the land laws, the abolition of royalty rents, the reduction of railway rates and the amendment of the Employers' Liability Act; and to secure these and kindred objects we pledge ourselves to join the Cannock Chase Miners' Association." Mr. W. Kibble seconded the resolution, and Mr. W. E. Harvey, miners' agent for Derbyshire, supported the resolution in a vigorous address urging the necessity of organisation. The resolution was carried unanimously.

PLUMBERS' STRIKE IN HULL.—The local branch of the Operative Plumbers' Association objected to the employment by a Mr. Wells of a non-society man, and he was requested to dismiss him, which he refused to do. The whole of the society hands in Mr. Wells' employ thereupon "turned out," and left him with only the one non-society man referred to. Mr. Wells then brought the matter under the notice of the master plumbers of the town, and after due consideration of the matter they decided to formally notify to the Operatives' Society that unless they withdrew their action in regard to Mr. Wells, no society man would be employed in any of their shops. One week's notice was given to the society, and the week having elapsed without any reply being received, the whole of the employers, acting in combination, discharged the society hands in their employ, and are now engaging non-society men in their place.

THE THAMES SHIPBUILDERS.—Mr. R. Knight, the general secretary of the Boilermakers and Shipbuilders Society, in his monthly Report, says: "The report from our Hull district is not very cheering, but our members may soon be agreeably surprised to find that there are orders in the office. The Thames district is just now passing through a period of deep and exceptional depression, and consequently great distress exists amongst the workmen, many of whom are, without exaggeration, on the verge of starvation. Winter is upon us, and unless matters improve very shortly the outlook will indeed be a gloomy one. The East India Docks, which are usually scenes of great activity, are almost bare. Blackwall is also in a similar condition, this generally busy neighbourhood being now quite silent. At Messrs. Samuda's yard, which formally gave employment to between 2,000 and 3,000 men, there are hardly 20 men at work. The Blackwall yard is closed."

NOTTINGHAM COLLIERS.—The colliers of Nottinghamshire are practically agreed as to demanding an increase of wages equal to 10 per cent. all round. About 650 men employed at Clifton Colliery, Nottingham, on Tuesday night determined to strike unless the increase be conceded. They also demand an extra 25 per cent. yardage. On Thursday before the Nottingham Borough Bench, Mr. Marriott, solicitor, applied on behalf of the colliery company for summonses against John Price and sixty other men, for leaving work without notice, damages being claimed. Friday December 9th, being pay-day at the colliery, the men went as usual to draw their wages in the afternoon. They found the office guarded by a strong body of police, and a notice displayed in the window to the effect that certain of the men would not be paid pending the decision of the magistrates with regard to the summonses issued for leaving work without notice. The odd men, top men, and lads were paid as usual, but the coal-getters, that is, the stallmen and holers, were disappointed and received no pay. The miners displayed no ill-feeling at this unexpected treatment, but a committee meeting was held during the evening and the men confirmed their previous resolution to remain firm.

THE SCOTCH CROFTERS.—The Crofters' Commission in Caithness has been cutting down rents with an unsparing hand. In many cases the rents have been reduced 50 per cent., and in some 65 per cent. The arrears cancelled in some cases go up to 72 per cent., and even 82 per cent. of the whole. An evening paper pertinently enquires: "What becomes now of the professions of the Highland landlords that they treated their small tenants with such generosity and kindness that no Crofters Act was required?" A correspondent of the Glasgow Weekly Mail gives an account of the condition of the crofters of the Lewis, where measles and starvation are now prevalent. He says: "In twenty houses there was not sufficient meal to make gruel for persons suffering from the measles! And this on an estate yielding a rental close on £20,000 a year to the Matheson family! Should I not also add—and this in a Christian land!" It is said that the Secretary for Scotland has written that it is his intention to introduce into Parliament next Session a Bill for the purpose of enabling the Government to assist the Highland crofters to emigrate. This generous offer to revive the Botany Bay trade is not likely to be accepted. At the last meeting of the crofters it was resolved to defend the inalienable rights of the Highland race to live and thrive in the land of their birth.

NORTHAMPTON.—STRIKE IN THE SHOE TRADE.—Dec. 8.—The distress in Northampton in consequence of the shoe strike is becoming great. Yesterday morning between 400 and 500 children were breakfasted at two cafés by an anonymous gentleman, and Mr. William Cooper, a local fishmonger, distributed gratis to women 2 tons 3 cwt. of fish, thus providing a meal for 1000 families. The scene on the Market Square was extraordinary—women fainting and children shrieking. The Mayor has opened a public subscription fund. On the 9th inst., at the adjourned conference, an arrangement was proposed to be submitted for confirmation to the general body of unionists. The masters' statement of wages were to be temporarily accepted, subject to revision where proved unfair. The proposal for a standard case of boots was abandoned, and all disputes were referred to reorganised arbitration. On the 12th, the strike which was expected to speedily terminate, was intensified by the collapse of the conference between the representatives of the masters and men, the masters refusing 5½d. on youths. The men decided to leave the masters to determine whether arbitration shall be resorted to. The distress is getting great. Kettering and other towns are sending supplies, and the appeal for subscriptions and support is being liberally responded to. Dec. 14.—Last night the Northampton Boot and Shoe Manufacturers' Association passed a resolution to the effect that all men may return to work immediately, and that the disputed question of wage prices for different boots shall be referred to arbitration.

FREE COMPETITION WITH THE LEICESTERSHIRE MINERS.

The issue of the Commonweal for Nov. 26th contained a paragraph that "at every colliery in Leicestershire, with the exception of one, the men are handing in their notices for an advance in wages." This was not quite correct, as only at four collieries were notices given; the recalcitrants being Ibstock, Bagworth, and Ellistown. On the 24th ult., the masters met the representatives of the men at the South Leicestershire Hotel, with a view of coming to some settlement. The chairman, Mr. J. P. White, a coal proprietor, of course indulged in the well-worn arguments about supply and demand, smoothed over with expressions of sympathy for the men, and ended with the usual crowning absurdity that the interests of the masters and men are identical. All this, however, is so commonplace as to be unworthy of notice. The men based their claim for increased wages on the fact that the price of house coal had been recently advanced, but all the coal owners present were pretty unanimous in their assurances that no such advance had taken place. The meeting broke up without any decision being arrived at, and it was adjourned to the following Monday. Meantime, a letter, signed "Coal Merchant," appeared in the local press, directly giving the lie to the coal-owner's statements, and deliberately affirming that house coal had recently been advanced from 6d. per ton on common sorts to 1s. per ton on better sorts. No answer was made by the coal-owners to this letter, and at the adjourned meeting the report merely stated that the chairman "dealt with the letter." At the second meeting, another argument used by the chairman was, that if the collieries advanced prices all their London trade would leave them. Now at other times, when the men have been asking for an advance on the ground that London prices had risen, the same chairman has replied that London trade affected them in no way as they sent so small a quantity there. The men were so influenced by these tactics, and by other considerations, that they eventually consented to withdraw their notices, and the movement ended in a collapse, although there was little doubt that the masters would have yielded sooner than have had a strike.

Let us consider the reasons for the surrender by the men. First and foremost comes their utter lack of effective organisation, as instanced by their waiting till the winter was well on instead of agitating in October. The miserable wage they have so long been receiving has prevented them from accumulating the smallest fund in hand. Then their difficulties are increased by the fact that at one of the largest collieries in the district, Ellistown, the coal is easier to win, and also that this colliery, for numerous reasons, manages to sell its coal better than its neighbours, thus giving the men employed there more regular work and rendering them unwilling to join their more unfortunate brethren. This, no doubt, was a main cause of the collapse. Then, too, there are a great many more men than can find regular employment, and as it answers a colliery's end better to work say two and a-half days per week with 500 men than five days per week with 250 men, it follows that the whole 500 are employed half-time on the barest subsistence wages. Amongst so many there must be always black sheep, and the masters find no difficulty in bribing some to attend the men's meetings and to report to them afterwards—the reward being that no matter what happens the spies are always safe from discharge and the best stalls are kept open for them. Thus the masters being few are able to keep their intentions secret, whilst those of the men are always known to the masters. The masters have another little game, and one which is now being played in Nottinghamshire. If an agitation for better wages is going on, the output of coal is limited by the masters notwithstanding a good demand. Then, when the day comes for the meeting between masters and men, the latter are told that, as they can see for themselves, trade is very bad and does not warrant any increase in wages.

The above simple statement of facts will suffice to show how the men are juggled into living a fearful life of slow starvation. On the one hand there are the few, unscrupulous, wealthy, cunning, and combined; on the other there are the many, simple, poor, ignorant, and disorganised; and thus, according to Mazzini, goes on "war between individuals in economy, under the name of free competition—FREE competition between those who have nothing and who work for their livelihood, and those who have much and seek a superfluity!"

AMERICA.

The eviction cases brought by the Stout Coal Company, of Milnesville, Pa., against their striking miners, were decided in favour of the latter this morning. Judge Woodward granted a rule to strike off all judgments entered by the company for dispossessing the striking tenants. The men will, under these rulings, hold possession of their houses during the remaining time of the strike, and cannot be evicted. There is great rejoicing throughout the valley over this victory.

Contributions are coming in freely into the Lehigh Valley coal region, and the strikers are feeling consequently stronger.

The strike and lock-out of 5,000 shoemakers at Philadelphia, which began October 18th, practically ended November 21st, when a large number of the hands went back to work as individuals. The bosses were entirely successful.

The new scale of wages for the steel-workers, adopted this week and to be shortly presented to the manufacturers to be signed, provides for an advance of about 10 per cent. in wages all round.

The low stage of water in the Monongahela Valley has affected mining in that section. As coal mining is the leading industry of the valley and this is checked by the low water, the outlook is said to be very bad. Not one coal boat has left Pittsburgh since June 20th. There are between 7,000 and 8,000 miners in the Monongahela Valley, and a large number of these are and have been for some time, practically without work.

The Rochester printer's strike was officially declared off on November 19. It was a failure.

The printer's strike at Chicago practically ended on November 18, a victory for the bosses.

The Worcester Bessemer Steel Works shut down on November 18, owing to a refusal of the men to accept 10 per cent. reduction in wages.

About 3,000 brewery hands are expected to strike next week.

The coal-miners' strike in Alabama is expected to extend to very large dimensions.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

ITALY.

La Nuova Eta says: "Thanks to the new penal code the Cipriani question seems finally to be reaching its solution. It is indeed time, for every one knows the injustice from which the convict of Porto Longone has suffered, and his transformation into a free citizen is imperatively demanded by all honest men. Well-known jurisconsults of the Italian forum have given their favourable decision; Professor Lucchini, of the Bolognese Athenæum, who is in the first ranks of legal specialists, in the Revista Penale of the present year speaking of a little pamphlet by the Advocate Augusto Santini in defence of the rights of Cipriani, says that 'the said pamphlet renders easy the solution of the Cipriani difficulty, placing it in a practical and legal light, of which until now the public had been unaware.' Thus it is to be hoped that truth and justice will triumph."

The busy speculation of Roman builders has created a crisis in the building trade in this city. Newly erected houses stand empty, folk being too poor almost to pay for the hatches they already crowd together in, much less to move into new ones; there is a lull in work, and some thousands of men thrown on the street. Costa, Maffi, and Armirotti presented a note to the Camera on the building crisis and raised the question, which, after a certain amount of discussion, was on a motion of the On. Crispi, "adjourned for six months." One admires the charming indifference of our rulers and legislators and representatives to the well-being of those whom they profess to represent and for whom they profess to legislate.—M. M.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE will take part in the funeral of Linnell on Sunday next, starting (preceded by a brake) from Clerkenwell Green, and proceeding direct to the Thames Embankment and there falling in with the general procession

REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday, December 8, at 8.30, Spencer Howell lectured to the branch on "Educate, Agitate, Organise." It was decided to send a deputation of women members to place a wreath on Linnell's coffin.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Dec. 7th, Edward Aveling lectured on "Despotism from a Socialist Standpoint." On Sunday, H. A. Barker on "The Condition of the Working-classes." Good discussions and audiences.—B.

FULHAM.—In spite of weather usual meeting held at Walham Green, Tochatti speaking. In evening at new station in Dawes Road, good meeting addressed by C. Smith, Tochatti, and Groser. Some opposition easily disposed of. Two new members made.—G.

GLASGOW.—General meeting of members held on Sunday. Arrangements made for putting the finances of the branch on more satisfactory basis. Weather prevented outdoor propaganda. In evening our members went to hear comrade Rev. John Glassey on "The Ethics of Socialism."—J. A.

LEEDS.—Paylor and Hill spoke in Vicar's Croft on Sunday morning. In evening, Braithwaite lectured on "Socialism and Co-operation." Two new members.—T. P.

SOUTH SUSSEX.—Weekly meeting was held at a member's house on Sunday night at Bexhill-on-Sea. League 'Manifesto' discussed, and question of local education in Socialist principles considered. The present members are deeply interested in the movement, and it is hereby asked that detached comrades in this neighbourhood will join us at once, or help in cost of distribution of literature, which will necessarily be our principal method of propaganda for the present.—LEONARD HALL, Wratten House, Bexhill.

WALSALL.—Monday, Donald addressed meeting on the Bridge, and afterwards lectured indoors on "What Socialists Want" to a good audience, his remarks meeting with entire approval; Lamsdale in the chair. Good meeting addressed by Sanders Saturday evening.—J. T. D.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—On Monday evening, December 5th, at 8 o'clock, at the Commonwealth Café, Scotland Street, M. A. Maloy lectured on "Force no Remedy" to a rather large and very intelligent audience, who listened with close attention for 40 minutes, after which Messrs. Story, Daniels, Godley, Palfriman, and others took part in the discussion, which was both interesting and instructive.—M.

JUNIOR SOCIALIST EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY.—Preliminary meeting held last Saturday evening to consider formation of this society. There was a fair attendance, mostly of young members of the League. Business of evening was drawing up of rules; as opinion was divided with regard to one rule in particular, a full report delayed until after next meeting, at which the rule in question will be brought forward for further discussion. As I am under notice to quit this address—rather sudden notice—owing to its being used for Socialist purposes, my friend, at whose rooms the meeting takes place, desires me to withhold the address. Therefore, I should be only too pleased to send a post-card with particulars to any desirous of attending our meeting next Saturday evening. The business will, I think, be opened by comrade T. Wardle, who will read a paper on "Value." It is earnestly hoped that as many young Socialists who can make it convenient to attend will endeavour to do so.—W. H. SPENCER-HOWELL, 42, Howland Street, Fitzroy Square, W.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

EDINBURGH.—Gilray lectured on 4th and Mahon on 11th in Trades' Hall. On 8th, C. W. Tuke resigned the secretaryship on account of pressure of private business. J. H. Smith elected in his place.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE tremendous mares' nest of the Times, big enough for the hatching of a division of cavalry, about the New York Dynamiters, is at first sight only a cause for laughter. One need not suppose that the wonderful and mysterious correspondent mentioned by that veracious journal manufactured the lie himself. He was (if he existed) probably some egregious fool on the hunt for something to please his employers, and glad enough to accept the wildest yarn of a Yankee joker. That is all very funny: but when one remembers that there are men on their trial for suspicion of plotting dynamite this idiotic lie wears another garb, let alone the convenience of pretending to believe anything that may be used as a weapon against the Irish party. However, it may be hoped that this time the story is too preposterous to have much effect.

The war scare is not subsiding—indeed, is rather on the increase; but perhaps, as was said last week, Bismarck's army bill will account for it. It is not easy to believe that the absolutist governments are really inclined to court the dangers of foreign war, with the ever increasing discontent which their armies must leave behind them when they march to the frontier; nor is it easy to see at present anything to force them into war.

But besides his army bill the German dictator has another bill on hand, a bill to make the anti-Socialist law still more stringent; amongst other matters in it is a provision for the International Congress of working men which is being organised for next year: it will be a penal offence involving loss of citizenship to take part in any Socialist congress. Perhaps some of our German friends can tell us what is likely to come of this. Meantime our own government is requested to take note and to learn something new from this passed master in it.

The police are to have a medal for their services in last summer's Jubilee ræe-show. Here is a chance for the Government: why don't they strike a medal and present it to the force for their services on November 13th? It would be quite according to precedent: the Treasury honouring the first Commissioner of Police; two such dignified powers as that. In like manner the Pope struck a medal in honour of the French King after the massacre of St. Bartholomew. If the medal is struck (and by the way, King Warren's face should be on the obverse), the poor specials also ought to be decorated with it.

Mr. Justice Stephen's sentence on Harrison, convicted on police evidence of attacking and wounding the police, is the most infamous deed yet done in the infamous chain of injustice and cruelty of the present Tory Terror. The cold and cruel pedant Stephen has at last earned a title to distinction. It is true he is well known to a limited circle as a specimen of legal shoddy yarn, and I believe has enthusiastic admirers of his very commonplace feats in that line; but these fools, who are but few, will die presently and their hero will be forgotten as a pettifogging writer: as a cold and cruel pedant and enemy of truth and reason he may yet be remembered.

Yet if one could forget his existence it would be happier for us: so let us consider one or two things this soulless pedant said as spoken by the chair he sat on, and then say a word about them with less disgrace than if we spoke of him. The Thing laid down the doctrine that the "law of England undoubtedly was that if the police or any other authority gave notice that any particular proceeding would not be permitted to take place it was the duty of the parties concerned to obey the notice and then to take any remedy which the law might give them if the notice was illegal." Might I ask the Thing what remedy it advises Alfred Linnell to take?

It is well that we know the law, however, and that we understand how far we have drifted from the rough days of our forefathers, who with all their shortcomings never meant this, which simply implies that persons in authority by reason of their authority are free from the responsibilities of citizenship. The hide-bound pedant above-mentioned does us some service in stating this so clearly.

The coercionist rag the Daily News, with all the fervour of a new convert, very naturally highly approves of the law-grinder's sentence; which doesn't look well for the attempt which is to be made in Parliament to call attention to these shameful pieces of legal tyranny. Cannot we turn from such sneaks and try to find an enemy with some spark of generosity in him. Is there not some stout Tory hard-hitter to say, "Stop that, you legal fools! The man held principles that I loathe, and if I had come across him in the row I would have given him one for his knob; but after all he did what I would have done, struck a good stroke or two in a shindy in which he was excited by seeing all sorts of violence going on. Don't be fools and call it a crime: say you have got him and mean to serve him out—though I should let him go since he got out of the scrimmage unhurt." That's what a generous enemy lighted by the light of reason would say. Is there nobody to come forward and say it?

c The bourgeois press is very naturally spiteful over the great success of Linnell's funeral, and of course the procession and the spectators are called roughs, rowdies, thieves, and the like. What a lie this is those know best who were eye-witnesses of this great demonstration, and saw the quiet but sympathetic behaviour of the crowd, incalculable as to number. However, let us not trouble as to the lie, for if all that crowd were rowdies and roughs, the Times supporters should be shaking in their shoes—as one hopes they may one day have to do with better reason. Meantime the words rowdy, rough, and thief are clearly changing their meaning, and are coming to signify an honest and hard-working man, as opposed to a useless person who lives on other people's labour; for such worthless rags who are our present rulers it is not worth while finding a name. W. M.

Last week, the Pall Mall in a spirited rough sketch contrasted the position at the present time of the two Sullivans—one, the bully and bruiser, an honoured equal of the future king of England—the other, poet and patriot, within four walls for having published reports of "suppressed" branches of the National League in his paper. By the idlers 50 guineas are paid readily to see the illegal prize-fight which will gratify their degraded lust, and on which the vigilant police will keep a blind eye steadily—two years' amount of an agricultural labourer's wages given by those who did not produce it to see this brutal exhibition!

Not that boxing is necessarily brutal, or fighting to be condemned. But when it is done for pay it becomes debasing both for those that hire and those that are hired. Informers, policemen, and prizefighters are not only themselves lowered by being the mercenary tools of others, but those others in their turn are injured far more by the vicarious gratification of their blood-lust, than if they themselves "defended law'n' order" or pounded one another in the ring.

The working-men of Prague held a meeting on Sunday, the 11th, when a resolution was passed to the effect that the Czech working-men will show their superior culture by holding aloof from all national squabbles, and by refusing to become the tools of selfish persons who trade on the Home Rule movement in the country. They may not be Socialists, but this looks on the surface as if there were a strong infusion of international feeling among them.

Moscow University has been closed, in consequence of the recent "riotous" conduct of the students, who beat an inspector, and insulted their rector. The papers have been strictly forbidden to mention the occurrence, and are obeying, of course. The fact is, as Prince Bismarck long ago advised, that all the Russian Universities should be abolished; they are institutions incompatible with autocratic rule, and must either be ended by despotism or they will end it.

It was very funny to read of the conference of landlords in Dublin on the 13th, and their declaring that compensation was due them "on various grounds." They decided to await awhile before deciding what form it should take. That men so crassly stupid should exist is rather depressing than amusing, but one cannot help a smile when looking at the colossal impudence of their demand. If they put off the decision as to the form they would have it take for very long, it may be decided sharply for them!

The Globe was deeply exercised over the announcement that William Morris, Malcolm Lawson, and Walter Crane had joined in the commemoration of poor Linnell's fate. But it was easy to see from whence the sorrow arose. If only all men of recognised standing would keep aloof from such movements, it would be easier for the Globe to sneer them down; even the besotted readers of that "respectable" paper cannot fail to see through its hollow pretences when they are given the lie by so many men whose reputation compels a hearing. S.

THE RATIONALE OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.¹

Our comrade Laurence Gronlund has made a distinctly valuable contribution to Socialist literature in the publication of this work; though the name of Socialism is hardly once mentioned in it: for the great French Revolution is looked upon from the Socialist standpoint as a link in the chain of events of which the social revolution of the future will be the final consummation. "All historians," says Gronlund, "in the English language at least, have presented the Revolution as a panorama of kaleidoscopic pictures, and thereby made it simply a perplexing and puzzling subject. Such pictures are altogether unprofitable to us in our generation, since they necessarily leave the crisis an incomprehensible, unexplained phenomenon. . . . Mere history or simple story-telling cannot possibly explain it: historic philosophy is indispensable to that."

The historic philosophy which the author brings to bear upon his subject is that of Hegel, which regards all historic phenomena simply as the product of the forces of the past and as the preparation for further developments in the future; in brief, the theory of evolution as applied to history, which, thanks mainly to the lucid and careful expositions of our comrade Bax, is or should be now the common property of all who profess to call themselves Socialists. Where the author differs from most modern evolutionists is at that point where they leave off, while he prefers to go on; in his faith in what he is fond of calling "the Power behind Evolution"—God, if you will; a kind of Providence, which is more concerned with the progress of the race and the development of social conditions than with the adjustment of relations between individuals. Believing that the inevitable outcome of all social struggles will be the new-birth of social happiness, he holds that this is the work of a supreme intelligence. To me this belief seems not only helpful and inspiring, but a logically necessary consequence of the complete evolutionist hypothesis; and as a matter of policy it may well be doubted whether such a theory would not be a far greater help than hindrance to our propaganda, seeing that it runs parallel, though on a far higher level, to our general habits of thought. But whether this belief of the author's, which I resolutely share with him, be true or false, accepted or rejected, can make no difference to the argument of evolution in history, since it is only put forward as an aberglaube or additional belief when that argument has been fully accepted.

Having now briefly indicated the points in which not all Socialists are likely to agree with the author, I will try and give a summary of his conception of the French Revolution, with which all Socialists who know upon what ground they are standing will be at one with him.

Looking backward and forward over the whole field of history and the new society which is silently preparing, Gronlund says: "Our race was to be raised to a far higher level than it occupied during the Middle Ages"; and the supremacy of the middle-class was intended to bring about such an increase of production and productivity as to render the transfer of social power into the hands of the entire community not only feasible but imperatively necessary. Far, therefore, from holding with the orthodox historian that the French Revolution was a failure, he calls it a "splendid success"; regarding it as a dramatically forcible assumption by the bourgeoisie from the noblesse of the social and political power which the English aristocracy, wise enough to agree with their adversary quickly, were content to share. Historically considered, it is parallel with the English revolution of a century and a half earlier. "Besides the essential correspondences," says Gronlund, "between these two periods, there are many curious coincidences. Naseby of 1645 coincides with 'Aug. 10'; Pride's Purge, applauded by Sir Harry [Vane], with what I shall call the suspension of the Girondins, contributed to by Danton. In both revolutions the reigning kings were executed; and by the way, it is almost comical, when we think of the fate of their own royal family, to recall the reproaches and contumely which Frenchmen of the age of Louis XIV. heaped on the English for their 'brutality' and disloyalty in their treatment of Charles and James. Both crises ended in the supremacy of successful selfish soldiers; in both countries this supremacy was followed by a restoration; in one, as in the other, the restored monarch was followed by his brother; and lastly, in one as in the other, this brother was exiled, and gave way to a middle-class king. . . . It is, however, in the region of ideas that the connecting-link between the two revolutions is to be found."

Thus holding to the idea that the French Revolution as a whole was to bring about bourgeois supremacy, unrestricted private enterprise, competition, et hoc genus omne, the author traces in outline the leading events of that fascinating period, and shows how even with the best intentions and whole decalogues of lofty general principles, men were unable to see or get beyond the establishment of a free commercial system, based upon wages and profits, simply because nothing further was then possible. He makes a sharp distinction between the Revolution and the Counter-Revolution, or the powers working for the needed social change and those of the old régime seeking to re-establish themselves by force. Speaking of the time after the constitution of the National Assembly in June 1789 he says: "The people cried, 'The Revolution is finished; it is the work of the philosophers, and it has not cost a drop of blood.' Our historians have pitied these people for their near-sightedness. Yet it is the historians that are near-sighted. The people were right. The Revolution was accomplished, and not a blow had been struck, not a particle of violence committed, so far. . . . But what about the violence, the massacres, the terror? Ah, they do not belong to the Revolution; they are, indeed, diametrically opposed to the Revolution, however much historians persist in including them, and in even making the French Revolution principally consist in them." But the freedom gained by the Revolution "benefited only the middle-classes; that is to say, only those who owned raw materials and means of production. But the workers, the poor, the masses who possessed nothing but their labour? They, whether in town or country, were not benefited at all. True, they now became free as to their persons and their actions; as far as the bourgeoisie had secured that much of liberty for them it represented the whole people, and raised the masses with itself. But was this done from sympathy with the masses? Not at all. The plutocrats had done it because it was absolutely essential to themselves as a class; because the new mode of industry and agriculture required that workmen and labourers should be able to migrate from places where their labour was not wanted to places where it was. How far the interests of the masses were from the minds of the bourgeoisie is shown by the fact that when, during the sitting of Aug. 4, Malonet, moved by an inspiration that should honour his memory, entreated his colleagues to consider the lot of the labouring classes, and establish workshops for those who were out of work, a general murmur arose, and they passed on to other matters."

The immediate object of the Revolution being to place the middle classes in supreme power for the purpose of increasing production, no shortcomings on their part can affect the issue so long as this main object is attained, as it has undoubtedly been. Gronlund, therefore, emphasises without hesitation the unblushing rascality of the French bourgeoisie, which he says is without parallel in any other country, and many of the most glaring instances of which have only just come to light. Principal among these he names the nefarious speculations in land, which the people were repeatedly promised and cheated of wholesale, until finally led away by the bait of "glory" so astutely held out before their national vanity by Bonaparte.

It will be seen from the above that the book is by no means a mere biography of Danton; yet all the charm of a biography is present. The author holds with Carlyle that Danton was the Atlas of the Revolution, who supported it on his own shoulders; and while by no means its "maker," was certainly its saviour, on three distinct occasions at least. While speaking of him as "my hero, Danton," and following his career throughout with an affectionate interest, the author insists upon it that he was not a "saint," but simply a "whole man"; and unsparingly points out what he thinks his errors, even when these have been upheld by less discriminating admirers. His great fault is held to have been a "total lack of ambition"; and though his lofty exclamation, "Let my name be accursed, if but the cause be saved!" must ever win him honour, it is possible to conceive that much subsequent failure might have been avoided had Danton been more ambitious than he was. For while it is undoubtedly true that many of the greatest practical exponents of the wants of the people have been slow to perceive when their work was done, Danton was rather one of those rarer spirits who are ready to give place to their inferiors sometimes at critical moments. But "Danton the monster, Danton as nearly all our historians paint him, is purely a creation of the imagination; the cloud of obloquy which has hitherto enshrouded his memory having been successfully dispersed by the efforts of a few French Positivists whose works and authorities have not yet been translated into English."

"The principal lesson," the author says, "which this volume will draw from the French Revolution, in the way of example and warning, are, that Danton was a true instrument in the hands of the Power behind Evolution [or to put it in another way, the man who saw what the time demanded, and did it], and just the kind of leader we in our day should encourage; that on the other hand good intentions alone avail nothing in popular leaders, and that therefore we should with all our might repress our Robespierres, Héberts, and Marats."

Our comrade, as a native of Denmark, may really be congratulated on his mastery of English style, which is distinctly in advance of that of his former work. The book abounds in good passages, and is thoroughly readable throughout. The artistic unity is somewhat destroyed by the insertion of a disquisition on the whole history of the bourgeoisie up to the present at the end of the second chapter, "The Middle-Class Régime"; this would have been better at the beginning of the last chapter, "The Present Transition State." But as a whole the method of arrangement is excellent. The volume is clearly and correctly printed, and is supplied with an excellent index. We hope soon to see an English edition.

GREAT INCREASE IN METROPOLITAN PAUPERISM.—The weekly return of metropolitan pauperism shows that the total number of paupers relieved in the first week of the current month was 102,559, of whom 59,099 were indoor and 43,460 outdoor paupers. The total number relieved shows an increase of 6,481 over the corresponding week of last year, 8,314 over 1885, and 9,069 over 1884. The total number of vagrants relieved on the last day of the week was 1,208, of whom 1,059 were men, 124 women, and 25 children under sixteen. These figures are exclusive of the patients in the fever and small-pox hospitals, which on the last day of the week numbered 2,732.

REVENGE.

When the workers have their own again,
And Labour rules the roast,
And we've really won the freedom
Which to-day we only boast,
How shall we treat our masters
Who treated us so ill?
We'll make it pretty warm for them,
By Jupiter, we will.

In field or pleasant work-room
Each one shall do his spell,
And, whether coats or cabbages,
We'll see he does it well.
Two hours' good useful work a-day,
Although it needn't kill,
Will touch the gentry up a bit,
By Jupiter, it will.

And when the work is over,
Quite early in the day,
Unless they'd rather sit and sulk,
We'll fetch 'em out to play;
Of song and sport and laughter
Each one shall have his fill;
And won't that be a sweet revenge,
By Jupiter, it will.

By mirth of hopeful labour,
And beauty born of mirth,
We'll gradually educate
The loafers of the earth
To see the good of brotherhood
And industry and skill;
We'll hail them then our fellow-men,
By Jupiter, we will.

THE common ownership of the means of production, of the land and capital of the country, would at once put a stop to all chance of individuals or classes living by lending these to the working part of the community for an annual payment. Every one would have to take to some sort of work before he could earn anything wherewith to procure his living. This would abolish the worst features we saw arising from bad distribution. No one could become extremely wealthy if he had only his wages to depend upon. On the other hand, if all the tribute which is now paid by the workers for the use of land and capital was put a stop to, the reward of labour would be vastly increased; probably it could be doubled at the first start, and the hours worked much reduced; for it would become the duty of the community, organised for that purpose in local communes federated under some large central direction, to see that work was shared as well as pay. The complaint we hear so much of now, about there not being work enough for all, would soon be met by a reduction of hours. At present the private ownership of the means of production prevents this, for it is to the advantage of private owners to pay wages to as few men as possible and to get as long a day's work for the wage as they can, but if the community owned the means of production it would immediately become apparent that the best way for all would be to share the work and share the product. The people would at once see that they do not want more work, but less, what they would want would be to produce the greatest amount of wealth with the least amount of labour consistent with that labour remaining to some extent pleasurable. The opposition of interest between capital and labour would for ever cease. Wherever the increase of capital could reduce the amount of labour needed to produce a certain quantity of goods it would be to the interest of the workers to save that much capital—a very simple process, and one which would probably be carried on continuously. After all expenses of management, all payments to useful people who are not absolute producers, and all deductions for the maintenance of capital had been made, it would be very easy to deduct a small percentage of the produce to go towards the increase of the stock of capital; the rest would then go to the workers, each according to his share. Gluts and trade crises would be things of the past, their cause would be removed, for the more wealth there was produced the greater would be the wages or share each could consume. Over-production could only happen when all were satisfied, and then they could proclaim a month's holiday in which to consume the surplus stock.

The waste of competition in all its forms would be done away with; there would be no individual employers or merchants to compete; one shop would no more compete against another than one post office does against another now; one factory would not compete against another any more than one Government factory does against another now. All the incentive to competition would be gone; each place would have a fixed quantity to produce and a fixed quality, and its interest would be to produce it as easily and pleasantly as possible, and of as good a quality as possible, so that it might last and their work be lighter in the future. All the waste of competition would be gone; there would be no need to advertise or send an army of travellers or agents all over the country; these would be set to useful work, and so help to lighten the toil of the rest. All interest in bad work would be gone, the better the work was done the less would have to be done in the future for the same reward; the longer the peoples' clothes and boots lasted the less work it would take to clothe and shoe them; and this would come home to each worker, and it would be apparent to him at every stitch or blow that the better the quality the easier his labour would become in the future. Under the present system it is just the opposite. Every workman knows that the better job he makes of his work the less work there will be in the future; but then under present circumstances less work means less wages; and he must have wages, hence he seeks to make work. And the employer, too, is often influenced in the same way. If he can make ten shillings profit on the best quality of cloth and only five shillings on a poorer quality, it still pays him to sell the poorer quality if the people will wear out three of it to one of the better; the greater number of articles worn out, the greater number of profits: hence the success of the cheap ready-made clothes shops.

Then we come to the question of foreign competition; and here again I think we shall find that the proposal of the Socialists will take away the evils of this branch of the universal warfare which is going on. Many Socialists hold that Socialism will only be possible when all the civilised world become socialised. To me this seems to be one of those cases where a statement is accepted from the weight with which it comes, without examining it. I have seen very few arguments brought forward in defence of it, and for myself am inclined to dispute it. Thus far one must acknowledge the truth of it, that a small country becoming prematurely Socialistic might be liable to invasion by a united army of all other capitalistic countries, and in that way might be crushed. But it is not likely that any country will adopt Socialism until there is at least such a body of opinion in other civilised countries as would render such a united attack impossible. Moreover, a people who had tasted of the real freedom of Socialism would probably defend it in a manner not very easy to subdue. But military invasion apart, I see no reason in the industrial relations of nations to prevent Socialism developing in one nation some considerable time before it does so in others. England is often said to depend entirely upon foreign trade. To some extent, no doubt, this is true; there are many things which we use which we either cannot produce or don't produce enough of, such as corn, tea, sugar, silk, fruits, etc.; but then if the country became Socialistic there would be no real difficulty in persuading the American farmer or the French silk-merchant to sell to our government, nor would he refuse to be paid in the same articles as now because they were made in communal workshops. There is a deal of superstition hanging about our foreign trade; a great deal of it is no use to any one but the merchant who makes a profit out of it. It is very likely that we might, supposing we became a Socialist country before the rest of the world, have to pay a little higher price for the things we needed to buy from abroad than we should if all the other countries were Socialistic too; but that would be a small matter, for we should not then be depending upon a small margin of profit for our existence, but should be depending upon the product. It is this dependence upon a small margin of profit which frightens people about our foreign trade; if that margin goes now through foreign competition the whole comes to a stand and thousands are ruined; but when the goods we buy become our aim, and not the profit on them, it will be a small thing comparatively whether we have to give 3½d. a pound for our sugar instead of 3d., or 40s. a quarter for our corn instead of 35s. True we might have to work a little longer than might otherwise be necessary—say half an hour extra all round—but there is nothing that I can see in that to ruin the chance of a Socialist community.

I think now we have shown that the change of basis proposed by the Socialist would cure the evils of society, would take away the bad distribution and the opposition of interest, would put a stop to industrial crises with all the misery they entail, would do away with all the waste of competition and all the selfishness produced by it—would, in fact, lay the only sort of foundation upon which a society might rise, guided by the principles of freedom, equality, and brotherhood. But our opponent, when unable to answer us on this ground, has one more argument to fall back upon. He says it is all very nice, but it can't be done. How are you going to abolish private ownership in the means of production, and how are you going to organise your society? One thing mainly is needed, that is to get the useful classes to wish that it should be done. Nothing but the definite desire of the workers as a whole can bring it about, nothing else but a clear understanding on their part of the better society which is to be formed can keep reactionary forces in check during the time of partial confusion which must elapse before the new society can be completely organised. All Socialists at present believe that their chief duty is to lay this picture of a better society before the public, that they may get to long for it; and we have faith enough to believe that when a people long for a more just and a happier form of society that the hour will come for its realisation, and will bring with it the right man and the right plan for carrying it out. What that plan will be we do not profess to know, nor can we foresee the details of the society which shall arise upon the new basis, therefore all schemes and all pictures of details are only useful as they may help to show people that there are ways in which it might be done. Of one thing we are convinced, that unless the people see the danger and commence to reorganise society quietly and peaceably, that the economical progress of the present system will inevitably bring things to a deadlock before so very long, and then they will be forced to do violently and in a hurry what would have been better done peaceably and more carefully.

THE LAND OF GOSCHEN.

"AND Israel dwelt in the land of Goshen." Throughout the whole of their strange, eventful history the Israelites have shown a marked capacity for settling in the land of Goshen; and there is little wonder that when Moses, in the pursuit of a mirage, led them away across the wilderness, they rather remembered with longing the fertile pastures their forefathers had enjoyed than with sorrow their own hard times.

The Right Honourable George Joachim is almost another Joseph. At the Statistical Society of which he is president, on last Tuesday week, he endeavoured to show his brethren that the land towards which we are tending will be a land flowing with milk and honey for them, the middlemen, and that Socialism in fact means nothing more than a Paradise for the middle-class, where every one will be more or less wealthy—except, of course, the workers. How the new Joseph regards these poor despised Egyptians is evident from his own words: "Despite," he said, "the complaints of bad business and no profits, of want of work, and of irregularity of employment among even those who had work, the great central body of society was strengthening its economic position." Truly the middle-class is the central body of society by virtue of its position. So is the stomach in the human body. Whether it is so by virtue of its importance is a somewhat different matter. But mark the grim hardihood of Mr. Goschen's statement. Wages are bad, employment is precarious and scarce; but no matter. "The great central body is strengthening its economic position." That is, the small fry and the large fry of the middle class are accumulating more wealth every year. This is the "silent kind of Socialism" which Mr. Goschen says is actually in progress. The new land of Goschen is to be peopled by the possessors of moderate fortunes; surplus-value is to be distributed over a larger area; aristocrats and very rich people will no longer exist; large businesses will all be limited liability companies; in short there will be nothing but a bourgeoisie and a proletari-tariat. This will be very nice for the bourgeoisie, but, as George Stephenson remarked, "very bad for the coo,"—which is, after all, the animal which gives the milk, and in this case the honey too.

Nevertheless Mr. Goschen's figures are interesting to Socialists. Figures are unmanageable beasts; and although a clever financier like Mr. Goschen can marshal them much as he pleases, a quick eye can detect the disingenuousness of their manipulator. Our Joseph of the parti-coloured coat succeeds completely in proving that moderate fortunes are on the increase, but he does not equally well demonstrate that large fortunes are decreasing or that wealth is becoming at all equally distributed. He confesses, indeed, though "with much embroidery of language," that the workers do not participate in the general dividing-up that he believes is going on among the proprietary classes. The amount per head invested in post-office and other savings banks was £20, 15s. in 1875, whereas in 1886 it had decreased to £18, 7s. per head. Mr. Goschen points out that the number of dwelling houses of from £10 to £15 rental has largely increased since 1875, and argues that this is because the working class can afford to live in better houses, though everyone knows that it is because rents have risen enormously since 1875. The savings banks returns show sufficiently well that the workers are not more prosperous.

But is it the case that large fortunes are on the decrease? It is of course quite possible for very large fortunes to diminish in number without the working classes being one penny the better for it. It is only that there are more to share in the plunder. Mr. Goschen gives the following table of estates which paid probate duty in 1885 and 1887, which I have slightly abbreviated:

Estates not exceeding £1000	45,950	46,903
Between £1000 and £5000	8,782	9,093
" £5000 and £20,000	3,155	3,272
Above £20,000	1,097	1,181

From which it appears that in every case the number of fortunes which paid probate duty in 1887 was greater than in 1885. It is not at all evident therefore that large fortunes are decreasing, and one is at a loss to know how the great financier could suppose such to be the case with the above table before him, especially when we further learn that the number of fortunes above £20,000 which paid probate duty in 1887 was larger than in 1877.

These legacy returns, however, add further strength to Mr. Goschen's third contention, that moderate fortunes are on the increase. The number of fortunes below £4000 which paid probate duty was in 1877 26,751, but in 1887 it had risen to 46,903. The Income-Tax returns show that under Schedule D the number of incomes between £150 and £1000 rose 19.26 per cent. from 1877 to 1886. The capital of registered companies has risen in the last ten years 92 per cent., or from £307,108,466 to 597,508,692. This is where the money goes. The wealth of the country increases every year, but the workers get poorer. The middleman is everywhere—letting, sub-letting, contracting, sub-contracting—but always fulfilling his function of sweating to the last penny the man who really does the work.

And this is the silent Socialism towards which we are now progressing; this is the land of Goschen, flowing with the milk of dividends and the honey of salaries, where the great central body of society will be so strongly entrenched in its economic position that nothing can overthrow it; this is the promised land! Sir William Harcourt says we are all Socialists now, but probably his idea of Socialism is as great a burlesque of the truth as Mr. Goschen's. For both of them Time will some day have a rude awakening, and Joseph and his brethren will have to seek another land.

A VOICE FROM AMERICA.

THE LAST LETTERS OF THE PRISONERS.

A. R. PARSONS wrote to the editor of the Alarm, and concluded his letter with the words:

"And now to all I say: Falter not. Lay bare the iniquities of capitalism; expose the slavery of law; proclaim the tyranny of governments; denounce the greed, cruelty, and abominations of the privileged class, who riot and revel on the labour of their wage-slaves. Farewell!"

In a letter to George A. Shilling, a friend, he closed with the words:

"Thus, over a very extensive region of country, among cotton, corn, and sugar plantations, I became somewhat famous as a champion of political liberty. Beloved by the blacks, I was hated and scorned by the whites. I then believed that the coloured people were truly free-men, and that they only needed courage to assert it. But I did not then understand or know that economic dependence—i.e., industrial servitude—made political liberty impossible. I did not know, nor did the blacks, that they had been merely emancipated from chattel to wage servitude. I did not then know that economic freedom must be the basis for political liberty, and that the wage-labour system created classes, antagonisms, and class servitude. And now, as the helots of old, the so-called 'free' blacks, in common with their white brethren, work and die like beasts in the unceasing treadmill of wage slavery."

Lingg, Parsons, Engel, and Fischer wrote to the Governor saying they were innocent of the charge brought against them by State-Attorney Grinnell; they did not desire commutation, but demanded their liberty, being unconscious of having committed a crime.

Schwab, Fielden, and after long persuasion, Spies, signed an appeal for clemency to the Governor of Illinois, R. Oglesby. August Spies two days later wrote to the Governor:

"If a sacrifice of life there must be, will not my life suffice? The State-Attorney of Cook County asked for my life, declaring I am the arch conspirator. He asked originally for no more. Take this, then; take my life. I offer it to you that you may satisfy the fury of a semi-barbaric mob and save those of my comrades."

Lingg wrote to the editor of the Alarm on the Sunday before his death, concluding:

"Now with a last and earnest farewell to all friends and comrades, and with final wishes for their prosperity, I close; in view of the certainty that I shall never have the chance of seeing you again, my beloved comrade, with an earnest and hearty wish for your future success in life. Long live Anarchism!"

THE SUICIDE OF LINGG.

Tuesday morning the whole population of the United States were startled with the news that four bombs had been found in Lingg's cell. The report said that Engel had tried to commit suicide by taking laudanum; the warder heard him moan and rushed to his cell. Within an hour they brought him again to his senses, miraculous to say. In consequence they searched all the cells, and found the above alleged four bombs. The finding of the bombs was a miserable police plot to make sure of hanging Lingg, whom they hated most. The fact of the matter was a petition to pardon the men circulated in Chicago, and was largely signed by the inhabitants of the city. The police got mad through this action, and declared that the capitalists could do their dirty work in future themselves. Two days later on, Wednesday, the lawyers for the defence tried a new plan. They attempted to get a stay of the execution by having poor Lingg declared an idiot, and they seemed to have a chance of succeeding. This was too much for our brave comrade. He did not mind dying a martyr for the people's cause, he did not mind sacrificing his young life on the altar of freedom, but in full possession of his mental faculties through lawyer's cunning trickery to be declared a lunatic; this was too much for him. He resolved to prevent this insult. The man had an iron nerve, and no heart ever did more sincerely beat for the suffering toiling class than the heart of Louis Lingg, a youth of 22 years. Thursday morning at about nine o'clock, Lingg was observed putting a light to his mouth as if attempting to light a cigar. Soon afterwards a noise was heard similar to the sound produced by the explosion of powder in a stone quarry. The guards who were on guard in front of Lingg's cell instantly rushed to the door grating. They witnessed a horrible spectacle. Lingg was laying on his bed with the blood running out of his wounds, writhing and whirling his arms and legs with frightful contortions. His face was one mass of blood and torn flesh; the upper and lower jaws had been battered and forced apart by the explosion of the deadly missile in his mouth. The base of the mouth was torn out, including a part of the tongue, and allowed the remainder of the tongue to fall back, thus threatening suffocation. The surgeons, however, passed a ligature through the tongue and drew the organ forward so that breathing could be carried on without difficulty. There was a double fracture of the left thumb, caused by a portion of the missile striking it as Lingg lit the fuse of the bomb held between his teeth. How Lingg got the bomb is as yet not known, but it must have been of very small proportions. Very probably it was concealed in a candle. Lingg, poor fellow, remained conscious for several hours, and did not die till 2.50 p.m. At 11 o'clock he was so far sensible in spite of his terrible wounds that he moved his hand as if he wished to write. A reporter placed a pencil in his hand and paper before him, and he wrote quite legibly the words "Head high," meaning his head to be raised. Captain Black, the attorney of the men, came in shortly after. Lingg recognised him, and greeted him with his eyes. At 12 o'clock, the surgeons performed an operation, but in spite of the terrible pains and despite the frequent injections of morphia, he remained conscious throughout the time. He again took the pencil from the hand of one who was holding him, and wrote on a piece of paper, "I cannot breathe lying down. I would rather sit up." At 2.50 our poor, brave, heroic comrade breathed his last.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

(To be concluded).

THE CAUSES OF WAR.—The first reason for all wars and for the necessity of national defences, is that the majority of persons, high and low, in all European nations are thieves, and in their hearts greedy of their neighbour's goods, land, and fame. . . . And the guilty Thieves of Europe, the real source of all deadly war in it, are the Capitalists—that is to say, people who live by percentages on the labour of others, instead of by fair wages for their own. —John Ruskin.

In what length of time could Society by the utmost industry and frugality accumulate supplies to maintain all succeeding generations free from toil? Obviously, never. Each season brings its share of toil; and each year we consume the bulk of the product. Wonderful as have been the applications of steam and electricity, we have no indication that humanity will ever be exempted from toil. The physical law is inexorable. "By the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread." But a portion of the race now enjoy incomes which exempt them from toil and with every guarantee, so far as our laws and customs can guarantee anything, that such exemption shall continue to the end of time. What are the inevitable conclusions from these two considerations? 1st, Since no man or number of men can produce sufficient supplies to maintain them for all time without further toil, therefore that part of society which enjoys everlasting incomes that require no toil from their recipients for their maintenance, possesses the power of appropriating an amount of wealth that could not by any possibility be the result of its own productive effort. 2nd, All society cannot possibly live for all time without toil; some now possess that power. Therefore some enjoy a privilege from which others by an inexorable physical law must be forever excluded. —Antagonism of Social Forces (by W. A. Douglas, B.A.), in the 'Proceedings of the Canadian Institute' for Oct., 1887.

FUNERAL OF LINNELL.

On Sunday last, 18th inst., the public funeral accorded by the L. L. L. to the first victim of police brutality in connection with the recent Trafalgar Square meetings, was duly held. As Warren who had the man slain would not allow his coffin to pass near the spot on which he fell, and was bent on doing all in his power to mar the impressiveness of the ceremonial, the committee decided on Saturday night upon a different route from that proposed before, and gave notice to Warren of the streets they intended to pass through. The usual large force of police held the Square valiantly against no comers, and patrols and specials were conspicuously present in different parts of the West-end. The body lay at an undertaker's (Mr. Dawes) in Lexington Street (formerly Great Windmill Street) Golden Square, and there the committee, the relatives, pall-bearers, stewards, etc., assembled between one and two o'clock. An open hearse with four horses was used; on top of it was a shield painted black, with large white letters "Killed in Trafalgar Square" on it; behind the shield were three flags, green, yellow, and red, for the Irish, Radicals, and Socialists. A little after two the coffin was placed in the hearse, the pall-bearers being Cunningham Graham, Mrs. Besant, Mr. Stead, Herbert Burrows, Mr. Smith and William Morris. Two mourning coaches and a wagonette containing the choir followed, a band preceded, playing the "Dead March," and the procession made its way to Wellington Street, Strand, passing on the way, appropriately enough, the butcher-shop of Bow Street. Despite the fact that the committee had kept the route so far a secret, and had asked Warren to do the same, considerable crowds were assembled and showed great sympathy. At Wellington Street an attempt was made by the police to turn to account in breaking up the procession the natural momentary confusion caused by large bodies of men meeting from different directions; here the Radicals and Socialists of South-West London joined the procession and there was also a dense crowd filling the Strand both ways; but the tender care of the E. division was made fruitless by the serious and self-restrained behaviour of the crowd. At Ludgate Circus there fell in some South-East London clubs, the Patriotic and East Finsbury, the Clerkenwell and Bloomsbury branches of the Socialist League, and the Clerkenwell branch of the S. D. F. At several points along the route the line was lengthened by the joining of branches of the Irish National League, S. L., S. D. F., and many Radical Clubs. When Mile-End Road was reached the sight was an imposing one, as the train stretched in an unbroken length for nearly a mile, with a large number of banners, mostly red, and several bands playing slow marches. Enormous masses of people lined the waysides the whole distance from the city to the cemetery and at many places there were lines of police to keep the road clear. These the onlookers usually greeted as the coffin went by with "That's your work!" and similar cries.

Bow Cemetery was reached after half-past four, when it was already dark and rain beginning to fall. Linnell's grave is situated in Square No. 73, close to the entrance on the right as one enters the cemetery. The walls of the grave were ornamented with holly and evergreens, and as much as could be done to render the interment decent and respectable had been accomplished. The coffin, covered with black cloth, was conveyed to within a few yards of the grave. It was covered with wreaths sent by the Radical clubs and Socialist organisations, including one from "the Women of the Bloomsbury Branch of the S.L." and one from "A Woman of the Clerkenwell Branch of the S.L." By the aid of a lantern, the Rev. Stewart Headlam read the Church of England Burial Service, the rain meanwhile descending rather heavily. When the service was concluded and the coffin lowered into the grave, Mr. Tims, of Battersea (Liberal and Radical Federation), tendered, in the name of the Radical clubs of the metropolis, to the relatives of the deceased their sincere regret at the early death which had overtaken Linnell. He entered his most indignant protest against the scandalous brutality and astounding cruelty of the police. Let them never rest until they had got these men under their own control, instead of allowing them to control the people. It was certain that Englishmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen, and Welshmen would not submit to the conduct of this autocracy. Let Scotland Yard and the Home Office take warning. They were putting in prison the leaders of the people who guided, controlled, and kept them back; but the authorities did not seem to know that, and if they continued in their blind course they must not be surprised if things should be much worse.

William Morris said they all wished to show their condolence with the relatives of the deceased. There lay a man of no particular party—a man who until a week or two ago was perfectly obscure, and probably was only known to a few. Through this strange occurrence—(A Voice: "Murder")—Linnell had become a person to be remembered by them. Their brother lay there—let them remember for all time this man as their brother and their friend. If the police knocked them about and treated them ill it was to a certain extent their own fault, because they had given the management of their own affairs to other classes. Their friend who lay there had had a hard life and met with a hard death; and if society had been differently constituted from what it was, that man's life might have been a delightful, a beautiful one, and a happy one to him. It was their business to try and make this earth a very beautiful and happy place. They were engaged in a most holy war, trying to prevent their rulers—people who did not understand them—making this great town of London nothing more than a prison. He could not help thinking the immense procession in which they had walked that day would have the effect of teaching a great lesson. He begged them to do their best to preserve order in getting back to their homes, because their enemies would be only too glad to throw a blot upon that most successful celebration; and they should begin to-morrow to organise for the purpose of seeing that such things should not happen again.

Mr. Dowling (London organiser of the Irish National League) invited Englishmen to imitate the men of Ireland and organise. Linnell fell in the same cause in Trafalgar Square that they in Ireland had fought for in Mitchelstown. Let them organise their own National League in England, which would soon establish such an influence in the country as would make the ruling classes tremble in their shoes.

Mr. Quelch (Social Democratic Federation) denounced Sir Charles Warren and his orders, and said that it was not the men in uniform who murdered members of the working classes, but the men who paid them. These men they should regard as their enemies.

The Choir then sang "A Death Song" by W. Morris and Malcolm Lawson. The rain, which came down very heavily, had by this time considerably thinned the part of the cemetery where the interment took place, and as soon as the "Death Song" was finished, all present at and about the grave took their departure, passing readily along the thoroughfare beyond the gates, as there too the rain had dispersed the crowds. It was just upon half-past five when the ceremony was concluded.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

ROCHDALE WOOLLEN TRADE.—The Rochdale woollen trade is reported to be in a depressed state. Stocks are heavy, and curtailment of production is increasing. A large number of firms are working short time.

EDINBURGH JOINERS.—At a largely attended meeting it was reported that in every case where notice of reduction had been given and the men had resisted the notice had been withdrawn. One or two of the employers were reported as having reduced only a few of their hands, but were busy urging upon other employers the advisability of a reduction all round. A resolution strongly condemning these tactics was unanimously passed. It was further resolved to continue the moral and material support of the trade to any who may yet be threatened.

SHOP SLAVERY IN DUBLIN.—Perhaps in no part of the three kingdoms are the unfortunates of what Mr. Stead has called "white slave plantations" so overworked as in Dublin; here the cheap advertising "popular" draperies are open from 8 a.m. to 9 p.m., and on Saturdays till 11 p.m.; till Christmas they will be open an hour or two later. Many are the unfortunate girls who will be slung out to swell the ranks of the unemployed after the employers' annual harvest is over. Every effort is being made by the money-grubbers to secure uniformity in keeping open on Boxing Day, thus cheating their drudges out of their hard-earned holiday.

The colliers of Tipton and West Bromwich held a meeting recently, when a resolution was unanimously passed: "That in the opinion of this meeting the working of overtime in the mines is an evil to those who work, an injustice to the unemployed, and a serious prevention to the more equal distribution of the means of life; and this meeting urgently calls upon all miners to use all legitimate means to prevent working overtime in the mines." It was also agreed that the men present should do what they could to raise funds for the Netherseal men, who have been on strike for six months.

SCOTCH MINERS.—A mass meeting of miners of Larkhall was held on the 15th, Mr. D. Cunningham in the chair. The day was held as a holiday in the district, and a large company assembled. The meeting was addressed by Mr. Stephen Mason, M.P.; Messrs. John Fergusson, Glasgow; John Wilson, Broxburn; Wm. Small, and others. The resolution passed was as follows: "We, the miners of Larkhall district, express our hearty sympathy with the people of Ireland in their present struggle for legislative freedom, and we further express our heartfelt thanks to Mr. Cunningham Graham, M.P., for the noble stand that he has made in the interests of the working classes of this country; and further, it is our opinion that it is the duty of every free man to stand up for the right of free speech."

THE IMPORTATION OF RUSSIAN POLES.—Last week, at a meeting of the Edinburgh Trades Council, a letter was read from the secretary of the Glasgow Trades Council as follows: "Dec. 14.—Dear Sir,—You will have seen from the papers about the importation of Russian Poles by Merry and Cunningham. It was before the Council last night, and as the result explains itself, I send you a cutting from the Mail, as also an article from Tuesday's Mail. Trusting your Council will move in the matter," etc. It was unanimously agreed to endorse the resolution of the Glasgow Trades Council, asking the other councils to join in urging on the Parliamentary Bills Committee of the Trades Union Congress the necessity of having the matter brought before Parliament at the earliest possible moment.

PLUMBERS' DISPUTE AT HULL.—A dispute in the plumbing trade has arisen through the refusal of society men to work with those not members of the society. For some time past a man in the employ of Mr. Wells has been pressed to join the society and has given evasive answers. In consequence it was decided to take action in the matter, and after a final warning to the man, a deputation waited on the employer. Mr. Wells, on being told that all the society men were going to withdraw from his shop, immediately did his best to induce the other masters in the town to join with him in a lock-out of society men. In this he has only partially succeeded, most of the masters preferring good workmen (the Hull Society has all the plumbers belonging to it who are worth having, and the masters know this) to damaging their business by the employment of lads and incompetent men. The consequence is that several masters who had joined in the lock-out have re-treated, and it is confidently expected that the dispute will be settled in the men's favour before Christmas.—E. T.

NORTHAMPTON SHOEMAKERS.—Dec. 16.—In reply to the resolutions of the manufacturers, a mass meeting of 5000 operatives yesterday morning offered to refer all disputes to arbitration, and this was conveyed to the employers. The Manufacturers' Association replied last night that the resolution of the men could not be accepted as any answer to their conditions. An extemporised meeting on the Market Square was immediately held, and the decision of the manufacturers was received with intense indignation. Some of a deputation of non-unionist workmen who had been appointed to wait on the association for the reply to their request to resume work refused to go to the manufacturers on account of the manner in which the combined deputation of unionist and non-unionist workmen had been received. Subsequently, however, two or three of the deputation went to the manufacturers, and were then told that by agreeing to help the union they had placed themselves beyond the sympathy of the manufacturers. Another outdoor meeting was held to inform the people of this reply, and again great indignation was expressed. Dec. 21.—A long procession, headed by the union banner and accompanied by two bands, paraded the principal streets yesterday afternoon and afterwards went to the Market Square, where a resolution to abide by arbitration was carried.

THE LONDON UNEMPLOYED.—At a meeting of the Clerkenwell Vestry on the 15th inst., the clerk read a letter from the Metropolitan Board, in reply to a letter of the Vestry asking the immediate completion of the new spur street between the Angel and Holborn. The Board of Works pointed to the necessity for providing dwellings for the people displaced before completing the street. Mr. Kelly moved: "That a memorial be presented to the Home Secretary, pointing out the delay which has occurred in carrying out the proposed new street, and asking Mr. Matthews to modify the restrictions placed upon the Metropolitan Board of Works with respect to the Housing of the working classes, as such relaxation of the law by the Secretary of State, who is armed with full discretionary powers, would result in the immediate carrying out of a much-needed public improvement, and lead to the employment of a large number of artisans and labourers now out of work." There was no necessity for the new buildings mentioned by the Board of Works, because there were at the end of the September quarter 292 empty houses and nearly 1000 rooms to let in the parish, whilst at the same time there were large industrial dwellings sanctioned, and shortly to be erected near the Holborn Town Hall and on the site of Coldbath Square. The Home Secretary had now a chance of showing his sympathy with the unemployed, for with one stroke of his pen he could give a great number of the unemployed work.—Mr. Bonney seconded the motion, and it was adopted.

RAILWAY OVERWORK.—Other two cases of long hours came to public view this week through the medium of the Board of Trade reports on accidents. The one is the case of the driver of the pilot engine at Plymouth, whose duty it was to back his engine against passenger trains and push them into the station. Great care is required to be exercised in performing this kind of work, as there are two dangers to contend against. The first is to avoid coming into violent collision with the train when setting against it, and the other is the risk of striking the buffer stops with the carriages that are being propelled. For this kind of work the Great Western Railway Company do not consider fourteen and a-half hours a day too much, as that is the number Driver Cleaver—who had the above work entrusted to him—usually worked. The other case of long hours occurred on the Cambrian Railway at a station called Ellesmere on a single line where a train ran off the rails through a pair of points standing partially open. It appears that it was part of the porter's duty to see that the points in question closed, after each train passed through them in an outward direction, but there appears to be some doubt as to whether he did so in this case. Seeing, however, that he had been on duty sixteen hours and a-half at the time when the points should have been examined (he had been nineteen when the accident occurred) there are some grounds for the suggestion that he, feeling somewhat worn out, could not resist the temptation of trusting to luck and saving himself a walk. If he was to blame, surely those who arranged his day's work are more so. It appears that long hours on the North-Eastern Railway are not confined to any particular district of that line, nor to any special class of traffic. According to the letter of a correspondent, passenger trains running to and from Starbeck are worked by men who stand shifts varying from fourteen to sixteen and a-half hours. What has Sir Joseph Pease to say about this state of things?—Railway Review.

LINEN-SPINNERS.—Linen-spinners are a class of female workers whose condition is very little understood by the outside world, yet there is no class of operatives more deserving of sympathy. To those unacquainted with this industry, it may be necessary to state that in a spinning frame, the roving, in passing from the creel to the spindle, goes through a trough of water heated to almost boiling point by steam. The heat of such a room may be imagined when we take into consideration the number of steam pipes and troughs which it contains. There is a trough for each side of the frame, which extends the whole length of same, and a separate steam pipe for each trough. When these troughs, which are constructed of wood, get out of order, or the water boils over—which it very often does—the water falls on the bands which drive the spindles underneath, and is thrown out with considerable force, so that when the spinner is piecing up she is being continually rained on as it were, and by evening is very often drenched to the skin. Through the excessive heat of the room these people may very frequently be observed lifting their knife up, and with the back of it dashing away the great beads of sweat from their face. In the condition of these workers is fully illustrated the glaring and heartless oppression of the poor, perpetrated by avaricious employers in those departments of labour where no organisation exists for their protection. Here are females confined in a heated and unhealthy room for about 60 hours per week for nine or ten shillings. A superficial glance at their condition is sufficient to convince any person of the necessity of trade societies for the proper protection of the workers against reductions of wages to the very lowest margin of possible existence. No society has ever been established for the protection of the above class of operatives, hence their present deplorable condition. Perhaps this may be accounted for by the fact of them all being females, and not having sufficient confidence in themselves. If this explains the reason, then we say organise on the lines of the cotton operatives. We find that the majority of the weavers and cardroom societies are females, but that their business is principally conducted by men, and we feel confident that there are many young men employed in these linen mills who would be most anxious and willing to assist the weaker sex in any movement that they may inaugurate for the betterment of their condition.—Cotton Factory Times.

BLACKBURN ENGINEERS AND OVERTIME.—The Cotton Factory Times thus scathingly comments on the scandalous behaviour of the Bolton and Blackburn engineers in regard to the question of overtime:—"Next to the settlement of the Bolton engineers' strike, one of the most deplorable events that has happened, from a workman's point of view, is an arrangement which has been come to by the engineers and smiths in Blackburn. The iron trade in that town has been in an unsettled state for some time. At one of the principal firms in the district a settlement was arrived at a week ago, under which the mechanics are to receive an advance of 2s. per week in wages, to commence with the New Year. So far so good, but when we come to examine the price the men are to pay for this advance we are simply disgusted. In order to obtain it the men have agreed to start working overtime at once. What do the engineers mean? At Bolton they agreed to work overtime as part of the terms of settlement, and in Blackburn they have followed suit. Are the unions a fraud and a sham, or what are they? Their leaders march up to the Annual Trades' Congresses and make speeches and propose resolutions in favour of eight hours' movements whilst their members are deliberately agreeing to exceed the present limit. At the last Congress held in Swansea, Mr. Swift, of the Steam Engine Makers, proposed a resolution on the lines indicated, which was supported by Mr. Austin, of the Amalgamated Engineers, and other representatives of the iron trades. In the teeth of this, two disputes have been settled by members of the unions of which the two gentlemen named are general secretaries, in which a special clause has been put in the agreement authorising overtime working. So far as the two gentlemen named are concerned we acquit them of any blame, but what are we to think of the unions that allow it? It is time that working-men spoke out on these matters. The canting hypocrisy which speaks one way and acts the reverse deserves exposure. With the exception of repairs the reason given by employers in the iron trade in favour of working overtime would equally apply to every occupation in the kingdom. Let the engineers speak the truth and say plainly that they work overtime because it puts a little money in their pockets. They can talk glibly about the thousands of working-men who are starving for want of work, but the business ends with talking. Their avowed principles and any feeling they profess to have for their fellow-workmen, are sent to the winds in presence of a paltry shilling or two per week. The iron trade representatives assist in instructing Congress to send out manifestoes in favour of reducing the hours of labour and to ascertain whether workmen are in favour of an eight hours working day. Let us stop this hypocritical tinkering with an important question. Let the organised workmen of the country first make up their minds on the nine hours' question, and then, and then only, will they put themselves in a fair position to go a step further. Amongst organised workmen the iron trades are in this respect the greatest sinners. In Bolton we hoped against hope that rather than allow the hours of labour to be tampered with, the wages question would have been allowed to go to the wall. We were disappointed, but now that the Blackburn ironworkers have followed suit, we can only say that it is time the reformers reformed themselves."

AMERICA.

There will be two representative gatherings of working men at Albany on January 17 and 18. Delegates from various organisations will meet on January 17 to form a State branch of the American Federation of Labour similar to that organised in Connecticut about a year ago; and on January 18 the Working-men's Assembly of the State of New York will hold its annual Convention.

The organised workers of this city will watch the proceedings of these bodies with a great deal of interest, as it is claimed that the Federation is to be organised in opposition to the Working-men's Assembly. The Assembly claims to believe in rewarding friends and punishing enemies of Labour, no matter in which political party they are found, and to have secured some very important legislation in the interest of organised labour. Through its efforts some years ago nearly 200,000 votes were rolled up as a protest against contract convict labour.

Those who favour the State branch of the American Federation of Labour claim that the Working-men's Assembly is gradually being made a political machine, and that the various interests of working men demand that a State branch be formed. One of the peculiar features of the two conventions is that Samuel Gompers, who spoke up for our murdered Chicago friends, is president of both organisations. There may be a lively time among the delegates.

The organised tram-car employes of New York and vicinity have succeeded in getting the local assemblies of car employes in New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Michigan, and Pennsylvania to agree to form a national district of the Knights of Labour.

The new national district will be organised in local sections. Each section will control its own affairs, and the National Executive Board can only interfere in the business of a section when called upon by such section. No strike or tie-up can take place without the consent of three-fourths of the locals in the district. It is the intention of those interested in the new district to push it along until it has all the important cities of the United States under its banner. If this can be accomplished it will be a most powerful body.

Speaking of the serving-women establishments in the United States, a Central Labour Union prominent official said, "they are all beehives of industry and bonanzas for undertakers."

A delegation of union engineers employed in the Lehigh Valley coalmines will try to induce the coal barons to agree to arbitration. If they are not successful in this they propose to strike and allow the mines to be flooded with water.

The seceders from the Knights of Labour have issued a circular which is addressed to the local assemblies of the Knights of Labour, requesting these bodies to co-operate in reorganising the order on an honest and substantial basis. The plan of action is that each assembly shall refuse to pay further tribute to the General Assembly unless an itemised account of the receipts and expenditures of the General Assembly be presented to the local assemblies.

It will be a long time before the Chicago Georgeites invite Henry George to that city again. The two recent lectures were not attended by 300 people, and left in consequence a large deficit, and futile efforts were made by the society to raise the necessary amounts. Lawsuits will probably ensue.

The American Federation of Labour will meet on the 13th inst. in Baltimore to shape its policy for the next year.

The strike of 500 miners near Scranton last week has ended satisfactorily. The men returned to work yesterday.

The strike and lock-out of 450 ship-building hands at Buffalo has ended. About 12,000 men were thrown out of work by the shut-down of all the cigar-factories at Havana, Cuba. The shut-down was precipitated by a demand of the cigar-makers for increased wages.

The threatened strike of 7,400 coal-miners in the Yonghiogeny and Monongahela Valleys has not yet taken place. The men demand an advance in wages and the adoption of arbitration in settling disputes.

Several furnaces at Easton, Pa., have been compelled to shut-down, owing to the scarcity of good coal caused by the Lehigh strike.

GERMANY.

During the month of November, 11,474 Germans have left their native country in order to go to America. Since the beginning of this year, the number of emigrants has been 99,556, whereas the corresponding figures for last year are 78,841. A symptom of increasing prosperity!

The police of Breslau arrested last week three Socialists in an hotel of the suburb Nicolai. They were searched, and a considerable number of proclamations addressed to the soldiers and leaflets to the peasants were found in their possession.

Bismarck has at last found the right way to get rid of the Socialists and of Socialism as well. It appears that he is going to enforce the Anti-Socialist laws by the addition of one single paragraph, but a masterly one; instead of expelling our comrades from town to town, it is contemplated to banish them at once out of the country. The chasing of Socialists from one town into another has not proved successful enough, exiling them from Germany will do better. So, at least, he thinks of it; but our friends are of another opinion altogether; who is right and who is wrong? Besides, the legendary Reichsgericht, the Supreme German Court of Law, interpret the existing Anti-Socialist laws in a most tyrannical way. Until now it was allowed to be a subscriber to a prohibited paper, say Freiheit or Sozial Demokrat, and as long as the paper remained in the subscriber's possession he was not liable to prosecution. Now the Reichsgericht has decided that the fact of being a subscriber to such a paper amounts to propagating Socialism, because the few marks one has to pay in order to get the paper sent to him is a financial help towards the general fund of Revolution! Lastly, a Socialist had to answer a charge of being a subscriber of a forbidden paper, and he was about to be convicted on that ground, when he had (so at least he thought) a good inspiration. He denied that he was a subscriber, and proved that he received a free copy. Well, said the Court, then it is even a more serious charge, only influential persons in the party receiving free copies; you deserve on that account to be convicted much more severely!

The special organ of the shoemaker trade at Gotha, Das Schuhmacher-Fachblatt, which never made an attempt of propagating revolutionary doctrines, has nevertheless been prohibited and suppressed by the police there. But the Imperial Revision Committee has found that suppression too ridiculous and too funny indeed, even for Germany, and has decided that the shoemakers may start their trade paper again.

The "authorities" have added two new volumes to their list of prohibited works on Socialism:—1. 'The Record of the last Social Democratic Congress of St. Gall, in Switzerland'; 2. 'The Second Edition of F. Engel's Critical Analysis (and Burial!) of Düring's Works' (Düring's 'Umwälzung der Wissenschaft'). The very best way of soon making new editions necessary.

In Berlin, a number of Socialists have been arrested and their houses searched. Some papers and pamphlets were found, and that will suffice to charge them with the most dreadful crimes: secret conspiracy, attempt to overthrow the existing order, and so forth. Afterwards, a certain number of town councillors, also Socialists, were honoured with a thorough house visitation. As nothing was found they were allowed to go—for the time being.

At Hamburg, the police have seized 6,000 copies of the 'Record of the St. Gall Congress,' and fourteen comrades in consequence thereof were sent to prison. At Stettin, in a few weeks, there will be a new trial for conspiracy.

At Breslau, a new Socialist paper has been started under the title of Schlesische Nachrichten (News from Silesia).

At least, one good thing has of late been done in Germany, and I will not overlook it (although I, personally, am not in the least a partisan of the rotten Parliamentarism), namely, the eloquent and powerful speech of August Bebel in the Reichstag. For more than two hours the rulers of that land had a very impressive flogging indeed; Bebel denounced in the most vigorous terms both the home and foreign politics of Bismarck, and he deserves to be congratulated for his courage. I should like to see Bebel's speech translated and spread as widely as possible.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Another sensational trial took place at Vienna on the 10th inst., with the result of four "genuine" Anarchists and one police-spy, who called himself an Anarchist, being sentenced from one to five years' hard labour. In this case, however, the pseudo-Anarchist, who apparently played his game too badly, was sent to prison with his victims. I only notice this new plot, because I am struck with the fact that in Austria for years past, there has been hardly a single "Anarchist" trial without some scoundrel having been mixed up in the matter from the very beginning. This certainly proves first, that most of these things are merely arranged and concocted by the police; and second, that there must be a considerable deal of imprudence in the ways and means of our Austrian comrades. They seem to gather without in the least knowing each other, and are extremely surprised to be arrested without having arrived at any result whatever. The contrary course rather would surprise me. The scoundrel who denounced his comrades in this case is one Anton Schröger, who was in 1884 editor of the Radical, at Budapest, and in the pay of Police-councillor Frankel, at Vienna, since 1885. SPAIN.

MADRID.—A very serious agitation is spreading among the workmen in Catalonia, where much suffering exists owing to the depression in trade which has obliged many manufacturers to close their mills. In consequence many thousand operatives have been thrown out of employment, and have enrolled themselves in powerful trades unions, the members of which for the most part are Federal Republicans. About a fortnight ago in the works which are being completed for the approaching Barcelona Exhibition, the workmen and contractors quarrelled about wages. The men struck and began a series of street manifestations of a pacific nature and an active canvass to induce the other classes of workmen to join the strike. Their efforts met with such success that since the 16th inst. matters have taken a serious aspect in Barcelona. Carpenters, masons, locksmiths, have struck, and are expecting to be joined by the bakers and tramway men. They have taken to parading the Boulevards at the busiest hours of the afternoon. 2,000 men last Saturday marched to the official residence of the Governor, and sent a deputation to ask him to mediate between the employers and the men, who are greatly in want of work. The Governor promised to do so, but intimated that he could not tolerate the street manifestations, or the attempts to force other operatives to join the strike. Military and police precautions on a large scale have been taken, and cavalry patrols follow the workmen's processions. El Emparcial says that if the strikes spread a state of siege will be proclaimed.

GLASGOW.—No meeting Saturday owing to rain. Sunday, Glasier and Gilbert held good meeting in Jail Square, where Commonweal sold well. In evening at Waterloo Rooms, H. H. Champion lectured on "What Socialists want," and was well received.

HULL.—But little in the way of direct propaganda has been done of late, our efforts chiefly being made through medium of meetings promoted by Hull Radical Club and other like societies. We expect a visit from Mahon shortly, and have challenged Councillor Maddison, President of Trades' Council, to debate with him, as yet have had no reply. Debate between Mahon and Mr. Wing, of Radical club, has been postponed owing to the latter's many engagements.

DUBLIN.—At Saturday Club, December 17th, J. Murray, T.C., lectured on "Law and Order" from a bourgeois standpoint. The international aspect of the question was well expounded by Fitzpatrick. H. H. Johnson, B.A., late Parliamentary for Trinity College, also spoke.

That at each meeting the time and place of the following meeting be determined; 4. That discussions be held in the rooms of the members, or elsewhere if necessary; 5. That all necessary expenses be met by an equal levy upon the members; 6. That the mode of discussion be: That members be invited to read a paper on a Socialistic subject, such subject not to exceed twenty minutes in delivery, and to be announced at the previous meeting; 7. In the event of any subject not being debated to the satisfaction of the members present, the right of adjourning the same for further discussion to be vested in a majority of at least three-fourths. Wardle vacated chair (which was taken by H. Fry) and read a paper on "Value." After the usual questioning a spirited discussion took place, in which McGill, Cross, Cooper, Fisher, Fry, Mrs. Gostling (visitor), and Spencer-Howell took part. Next meeting on Jan. 21st next, at No. 12, Fitzroy Street, at 7.30 p.m., when Fisher will read paper on "Socialism and Private Life." EDINBURGH.—In Free Tron Hall large meeting was addressed on 5th by Rev. John Glasie, and another on 12th by H. H. Champion. Lecturers listened to with the closest attention and enthusiastically applauded. These meetings conclude first series of our winter week-day lectures. Socialism has made great headway in Edinburgh this year. On the 18th John Smith lectured on "Equality." Mahon has resigned the organisership and has left for Northumberland.

ARBROATH.—Champion spoke in public hall here; the audience seemed to agree with all he said. Sale of literature good. At weekly meeting Friday, the secretary resigned as he was leaving the town in search of work.—W. S.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

EMIGRATION AND COLONISATION.

THE minds of the upper classes are still more and more turned towards emigration. It is true that they have not any wish to emigrate themselves, as one might suppose they would have, since they are always talking about their diminished incomes, and are never tired of dinning into people's ears the splendid career that lies before the emigrant. They are after all tolerably contented to live in the British Islands (Ireland excepted, where there are extra risks). But they have at last got to understand that there is a great mass of "our poorer brethren" who have abundant reasons for not being contented with life in Great Britain and Ireland. The upper classes would dearly like to see the backs of these; for even in these early days they are sick of them and their troubles.

Enlightenment is, however, growing. Lord Salisbury at Derby had something to say on this emigration subject which, as coming from a Tory minister, was new. He would like to send a few more people out of Ireland, conveniently forgetting for the moment that the condition of the five millions now inhabiting Ireland was not so much better than that of the eight millions who once inhabited it. He said Mr. Tuke the Quaker Liberal told him that in large tracts of Ireland the people could not live upon the land. Exactly; because other large tracts have been stolen by the landlords and rack-rented to the tenants by them, just as the starveling larger tracts are.

However, this is not my lord's new idea. It is true that he seemed chiefly thinking about Ireland, because the Irish are better rebels than the English, but he was speaking of emigration in general; and thereon he said what certainly was remarkable for him. Quoth he: "I am aware that emigration . . . happens not to be popular. . . . You will hear people say, Why should not emigration come from the upper classes? Well, I entirely agree with the people who make that contention. my idea of emigration is that it should involve all classes of the community." And he went on to say that he thought it would be disastrous if only the unsuccessful and desperate took to emigration. It must be noted that these are the groups that the philanthropists of all kinds want to send away, and then we can give Lord Salisbury credit for a certain amount of enlightenment—for, in fact, recurring for the occasion to the older and more human Tory ideas of paternal government, which are assuredly far better than the new commercial absolutist ideas that have taken their place, whether their supporters be called Tory, Whig-Liberal, or philanthropist.

However, it must be pointed out that Lord Salisbury didn't understand the popular cry he quoted, "Why don't the upper classes emigrate?" or rather, didn't choose to understand it. His idea presupposes the sacredness of the present three-class society—nobles, tradesmen, and workmen—just as the Roman idea of colonisation did. The popular cry means "Why don't the upper classes turn workmen?" And the answer clearly is, "Because you, the workmen, don't make them do so."

After all, the difference between Lord Salisbury's grandiose, old Tory idea of the natural leaders of the people leading out a colony like the Romans of old, would mean in practice (if it could be put in practice, which it cannot) going out with ready-made somewhat old British bosses instead of stumbling on new-made colonial ones, or gradually evolving them from the rough and tumble of the early colonial gambling struggle for riches and position. There is little to choose between the two methods—the happy-go-lucky, and the paternal: all the more as the dignified paternal bosses would soon lose their dignity in the general scramble above-said. As things go, emigration must be a miserable, degraded scramble, a mess and a muddle that makes one sick to think of.

But our younger Socialist readers must not suppose that Socialists object to persons or groups changing their country, or fertilising the waste places of the earth. Granted that society really were the sacred thing that it should be, instead of the mass of anomalies and wrongs that it is, the Roman idea of leading a colony is right and good, and it will surely be one of the solemn duties of the society of the future for a community to send out some band of its best and hardiest people to socialise some hitherto neglected spot of earth for the service of man. At present that cannot be done; all we can now do when pushed by our necessities is to waste and spoil some land which should be kept unwasted for the better days. As things go, we are as great a curse to the lands we overrun as were the Mogul hordes of the early Middle Ages—or worse, may be.

Meantime the "remedy" of emigration is receiving rude blows. Lord Salisbury says the rich (perhaps the House of Lords) should lead our colonies. Others looking about them on the waste of the land in England itself, ask very naturally why it should not be cultivated. To set aside the direct answer which Socialists have to make, here is a scheme for Home Colonisation about which a few words should be said. It has been set on foot by Mr. Herbert V. Mills; who has noted with interest the Beggar Colonies of Holland, and being himself both by nature and profession an ascetic, has not been shocked at the slavishness and despair of the future of humanity which such schemes involve. The essentials of his scheme come to this: that charitable persons should subscribe a vast sum of money to buy land, which can be had cheap in England to-day and apparently will be cheap in times to come (unless Mr. Mills's scheme grows vastly and so raises the price), and that on this land certain families and persons are to be planted, having been chosen by the Charity Organisation Society (!). This community will feed, clothe, and house itself, consuming its own productions, and only sell to the outside world the surplus of what it produces. The colonists will be bound to work three hours a-day in return for subsistence (as I gather, at a low standard), and will also be allowed each to cultivate a plot of land for his own benefit. The first experiment is to be made on 500 persons, and £25,000 will have to be collected in order to set it on foot.

Now with all respect to Mr. Mills, who is undoubtedly a kind, disinterested, and devoted man, it must be pointed out, that while his idea of getting the people back on the land is a right one, and while it must be admitted that the members of such a community will be infinitely better off than their workhouse or slum-dwelling brethren, yet his scheme will not lead to any solution of the question between capital and labour. Not to make any carping objections, let it be admitted that the experiment gets over the natural difficulties and succeeds, i.e., that granted the land given by charity, the community supports itself; yet the colonists after all are slaves unless they succeed in producing more than a bare subsistence; and if they do so they then become capitalists also; and furthermore it must be asked what is the number of persons to be so benefited, and if that number is what it should be, where is the "charity" to come from?

Clearly the answer must be that the "charity" must be universal, in other words that all the land in the country must be given up to gain the end Mr. Mills aims at, due livelihood for the people, and along with the land all the other means of production. If "charity" will do this, well and good; but it is not a matter of fear but of certainty that if Mr. Mill's scheme is taken up, it will be as an evasion of the demand of the Socialists that monopoly in the means of production should cease. And it is quite as certain, as has been said over and over again, in these columns, that this demand will only be yielded on compulsion. A proprietary class neither will nor can yield its privileges voluntarily.

A word with Lord Salisbury again; I must quote him. He says, apropos of emigration: "Every year between three and four hundred thousand souls are added to your community. Do you believe that the means of supplying them grows, increasing as rapidly?" The answer is "Certainly not, so long as labour is organised first to make profits for the idle rich, and next to supply them with luxuries, so long as it is organised wastefully: if labour were not so organised, or disorganised, then we should see."

Meantime Lord Salisbury makes one admission of importance enough, and which if statesmen ever think, which is doubtful, must have made him feel how empty and hollow his suggestions of remedies were. Said he: "We are in the most perplexing and anomalous condition—we are ruined because everything is cheaper than it was before—but of course you could at first sight imagine that when everything is cheaper everybody ought to be better off. Somehow everybody is not: everybody feels that his industry is checked and his income straightened, and we look round in vain to see some solution for our difficulties, some mitigation for our sufferings."

In vain indeed, my lord! Possibly because when you speak about our sufferings, you are using rather an extravagant figure of speech. Oh, if only those whose sufferings are but too real would only "look round" them, surely it would not be in vain!

WILLIAM MORRIS.

On the last night the relatives of Fischer, Engel, and Spies took leave of these men. Mrs. Parsons was, however, refused even this last favour. "But I must go to see my husband!" she exclaimed. "You cannot," was the cruel reply. She fell down fainting, and had eventually to be carried away. Next morning she again tried to get admittance, but was simply locked up by the authorities during the strangulation of her husband.

On the day of execution the excitement in the States was at fever heat. New York had the appearance a city bears on the day of a great battle. Specials were issued every minute; the people were mobbing the newspaper boys. In fact the headings of the newspapers, the thirst of the populace for sensational news, indicate that they were not to be content short of gladiator scenes. The capitalist class recognise they have to meet a most determined foe, and the working-men see clearly how brutally they are treated. It cannot last long, but the struggle will be severe. No quarter will be given either side.

The Socialists, 10,000 strong, marched through the streets of New York with black flags and muffled drums, as if attending a funeral. Few of us could sleep, eat, or even think. A spirit of restlessness had overpowered us completely. To think that four of our best men were going to be done to death; to think this and also to think of the inability to do something to prevent it was horrible and unspeakable!

THE LAST NIGHT.

All hope was lost now. The Governor absolutely refused to interfere, and the men had but little time to prepare themselves.

The men passed the night quietly. At 4 a.m. one of the reporters made a tour of the lower corridor, where Spies, Parsons, Fischer, and Engel were confined. Spies lay on one side, his head on his arm, and slept as peacefully as a babe. Fischer had turned over on his back; Engel lay motionless, as did Parsons, except that at times the latter started uneasily as if dreaming.

Between 1 and 2 o'clock the Sheriff and his assistants tested the gallows. Heavy bags of sand were attached to the ropes, and the traps were sprung. The horrible machine worked but too well. A few minutes after 2 o'clock Spies stood at the door of his cell smoking and talking through the bars with his guard. The rumble of wheels was heard outside about 4 a.m., and a wagon drove up and unloaded four coffins. At about 7 o'clock the men awoke and dressed themselves. They stepped over to the plain iron sink and took a good wash.

Breakfast was served in the jail at 7.30. The men ate heartily. They bore up well. At 8 o'clock the Rev. Dr. Bolton arrived, but was plainly told he was not wanted. Spies exclaimed, "Pray for yourself, you need it more than I."

THE LAST HOURS.

Then all was quiet again in the jail. Suddenly the voice of a man was heard in song. He began in low sweet tones. Gradually the voice rose higher and higher; each note was clear. It was Parsons; he sang the last greetings to his wife. He was standing in his cell with his head up and shoulders thrown back, singing as if he were a lark in the meadows instead of a man upon whom the black cap was to be placed in a few hours. This was the song:—

"Maxwelton braes are bonnie, where early fa's the dew;
And it's there that Annie Laurie gie'd me her promise true,
Gie'd me her promise true,
Which ne'er forgot will be;
And for bonnie Annie Laurie I'd lay me down and dee."

It was a sweet pure voice, and the singer sang as if he were the happiest man in the world.

At the very moment that Parsons was singing, Mrs. Parsons was at the jail door pleading to see her husband but once more. This was refused and she rebelled. The cowardly law-outragers arrested her and put her in a cell.

The hour of death is nigh. All are waiting for the moment when the sheriff shall lead the way to the gallows. Then all at once another voice is heard. A more familiar air; an air that makes the heart beat faster. It is the "Marsellaise." This time Fischer is singing. All join in the chorus, and for the second time the jail is filled with music. The death warrant was read first to Spies, then Fischer, then Engel, and at 11.43 a.m. the Sheriff read it for the last time to Parsons. White shrouds were then adjusted upon each of the prisoners, and they were led out upon the scaffold. The caps, also of white, were at once placed upon their heads and the nooses slipped over them.

THE STRANGULATION.

They were then put on the trap. The great drop swung back, four bodies swayed free, turned half around, and then shot down. Fischer died very hard, as did Spies and Parsons, the last struggling and kicking fearfully. But it was soon all over. All of the men died of strangulation, none of their necks were broken.

The last words of each were as follows:

Spies: "There will come a time when our silence will be more powerful than the voices they are strangling to death now."

Engel: Long live Anarchism."

Fischer: Long live Anarchism. This is the happiest moment of my life."

Parsons: "May I be allowed to speak? Will you let me speak, Sheriff Matson? Let the voice of the people be heard."

During the last hour or two before the hanging, the nerves of every person in the jail were at their greatest tension, and the police themselves shared the subdued but intense feeling of excitement which pervaded the building; the four men alone were quiet and collected.

The Mail and Express, one of the vilest capitalistic sheets, which has constantly clamoured for the blood of the men, said the same night:

"It is all over. The Anarchists are dead. The drop fell at 11.50 o'clock. There was no trouble anywhere. The men met their fate bravely. They seemed to have hearts like lions."

The strangulation was witnessed by nearly 250 reporters, deputy sheriffs, and local politicians.

Such is the fate of the teachers of humanity.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

But there is one feature about such a change which we must not lose sight of, and that is, that of its very nature it cannot be done gradually. A change of basis must be a sudden change. But it makes all the difference whether this sudden change has been prepared for or whether it is hurried on by violent revolution, and change and preparation have to go on simultaneously. Many Socialists aim at getting a parliamentary party to force on the gradual change. Personally, I think they are mistaken. A parliamentary party might be useful for propaganda purposes; but the kind of preparation which could alone be of much good can only be made by a substantial majority elected for the definite purpose of making preparations for the complete change of basis. I prefer to hope that the change may thus come through the conversion of the majority to our views—instead of coming violently—and I will therefore indicate what I mean by preparatory measures for such a peaceable transformation, leaving to others more able than myself the more difficult task of dealing with a sudden change. Assuming, then, that we have appointed a government backed by a strong majority to definitely prepare for the change, I imagine they would first set about raising a national store by taking the larger part of all rents and all incomes over a fixed amount. They would then organise a system of local self management, which would have to begin by organising in each locality a system of communal distribution of the chief goods in common use. They would for this purpose have the right to appropriate any shops, buildings, etc., which were suitable for the purpose, retaining as far as possible the present owners, managers, and assistants to manage and work the affairs at fixed salaries. They would also have to organise a commission in each district to hear any cases of hardship or actual want caused by the disturbance of relations necessary during the transitional period; and this commission would have to use the national store above referred to for the purpose of compensating such people, not on a basis of property lost, but simply on a basis of providing them reasonably with the means of living, those compensated, of course, being liable to be called upon to do some work as soon as suitable work was found. Having got an organisation for the distribution of all products, it would become easy to take over gradually all productive enterprises, keeping them working and paying wages in some form of money which would be acknowledged at the government store. The hours of labour would be gradually reduced until all were found employment; and as experience told what the amount of produce would allow, wages would be raised, always keeping a large balance in hand for emergencies. Very much of the details of organisation might then be left to the local communes, the federal management only having a right to supervise and veto anything which would endanger the harmony of the whole. A very short time would be enough to show the people the advantages of the system, and they would soon come to see that every improvement they made, either in the quality of their products or in the method of producing them, would directly tend to lighten their labour or increase their wealth, which they liked. Gradually as things settled down and men became accustomed to common work and common interests, restrictions on the individual could be removed. During the transitional period each would have to do, to some extent, what he was told; the idlers would have to do the work they were set to, and all would have to work a fixed number of hours. Many restrictions of this sort might be necessary during the transitional period, which could be easily dropped as things settled down and the people began to intelligently enter into the work and appreciate its advantages. For instance, in many cases it would be quite easy to let each man work as long as he liked, rewarding him according to the time worked, so that if he liked to work hard one week and play the next he might be free to do so. Similarly it might gradually be allowed to any one to change his work, if he liked to take the trouble to learn a new trade. This would to a large extent influence the reward of labour; for if all men began to crowd to one trade, thus showing it to be an extra pleasant one, as for instance if a large number wanted to be cab-drivers, the reward of cab-driving would have to be to some extent reduced, either by increasing the work expected, or directly reducing the wage. Similarly if there was a difficulty in getting men to do certain work—mining, for example—the reward in that case would have to be increased or the hours shortened. In this way it would become possible for men to develop their individuality to an extent utterly unknown now. Freedom would have a real meaning: it would mean not the freedom to be crushed out by others or to try and crush others out, but freedom to develop in any direction and to the largest extent which the resources of society could allow.

The substantial equality would be maintained, because one advantage would balance another; one man would have slightly more wealth than another, but then the other would have pleasanter work and more leisure. As it is now, all the advantages are piled on to one and all the disadvantages on to another. The greatest wealth goes with the pleasantest work and the greatest amount of leisure; the greatest poverty goes with the worst work and least leisure. There would be equality without the dead level so much dreaded by many. Brotherhood would form the very foundation of the system; all the dividing interests arising from the private ownership of capital and the working of it for private gain would vanish in the common ownership of it. All the class interests and all the scrambling of competition which give rise to "envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness" would be cut away from the root. One common property owned by all and shared by all would give common interests to all, and the growth of new divisions and separate interests would be prevented by a system of federation, where each interest was subject to the management of a body representing all other interests of the same kind. The abolition of all conflicting interests would leave the more social side of man's character free to expand, and human nature under the new conditions would be found to be something nobler than it gets credited with being now, when men are forced into strife with one another through their conflicting interests. The results of such a brotherhood who can foresee? When we gaze upon the marvellous beauty of the creations of men, the sudden bursts of enthusiasm in art and work which have marked the times when men hoped that freedom was dawning upon them, we are dazed at the thought of what would result if mankind were indeed freed from the degrading struggle and the benumbing serfdom under which they groan! Let the thought of it inspire us; and forsaking the broken cisterns to which we have so long trusted, let us struggle with all our might for the one and only change of basis which will allow a nobler society to arise, guided by the three great principles round which have centred the hopes of ages—Freedom, Equality, and Brotherhood.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

"Everyone has a right to live. We will suppose this granted. But no one has a right to bring creatures into life, to be supported by other people. Whoever means to stand upon the first of these rights, must renounce all pretensions to the last."—Mill's 'Principles of Political Economy,' Book II. chap. vii. This, originally written in condemnation of the propagation of the extreme poor, seems peculiarly applicable also, to our "nobility and gentry," the majority of whom are "supported by other people" under the present system.—J. S.

A YOUNG ANARCHIST.—It sounds a little bit irreverent, but as it was told by a highly esteemed clergyman, and in Sunday-school, too, it is presumably tellable in print. A little girl, walking in the public garden on Sunday with her mother, began to play upon the grass, and was instantly restrained, to her chagrin. "Why can't I run on the grass, mamma?" she exclaimed. "Because the policeman will make you go off if you do. Don't you see the policeman over there? Besides, it is Sunday, and God doesn't want you to play." "Oh, dear," said the little girl, "if it wasn't for the policemen and God, what nice times we could have!"—Boston Transcript.

ALBERT R. PARSONS.

ALBERT PARSONS was born June 24, 1848, in Montgomery, Ala. He has nine brothers and sisters. His father, Samuel Parsons, had a shoe and leather factory. He was noted as a public-spirited philanthropic man. He was an Universalist in religion, and an active, prominent temperance advocate. Albert's mother died when he was two years old, and his father died three years later. His eldest brother, General W. H. Parsons, who was married and living at Tyler, Texas, became his guardian. Two years later the family moved to the Texas frontier, where Albert became an expert in the use of fire-arms, riding, and hunting. In 1859, he went to Waco, Texas, where he lived one year with his sister (wife of Major Boyd). In 1860 he was apprenticed to learn the printer's trade in the Galveston News office. When the rebellion broke out in 1861, though but thirteen years old, he joined a local volunteer company called the "Lone Star Greys." He wanted to enlist in the rebel army, but his employer and guardian ridiculed the idea on account of his age and size, and told him that it was all bluster anyway, and the war would be over in sixty days. Albert therefore took "French leave" and joined a local artillery company. His military enlistment expired in a year, and he then joined Parsons' Texas cavalry brigade. His brother, Major-General W. H. Parsons, was at that time in command of the entire cavalry outposts on the west bank of the Mississippi River from Helena to the Red River. Albert was afterward a member of the renowned McMoly scouts. He returned to Waco, Texas, at the close of the war, and for a short time attended the University at that place. This was followed by learning the trade of type-setting. In 1868 he founded and edited a weekly newspaper, the Spectator, in Waco. In it he advocated the acceptance, in good faith, of the terms of surrender, and supported the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth constitutional amendments, and the reconstruction measures. He became a Republican, and consequently incurred the hatred of many former army comrades, neighbours, and the Ku Klux Klan, as well as the love of the enfranchised slaves. Of course the Spectator could not live in such an atmosphere. In 1869 he was appointed travelling correspondent and agent for the Houston Daily Telegraph. It was during a trip through Johnson county that he first met the charming young Spanish-Indian maiden, who, three years later, became his wife. She lived in a most beautiful region of country, on her uncle's ranch near Buffalo Creek. He lingered in this neighbourhood as long as he could, and then pursued his journey with fair success. In 1870, at twenty-one years of age, he was appointed Assistant Assessor of the United States Internal Revenue, under General Grant's administration. About a year later he was elected one of the secretaries of the Texas State Senate, and was soon after appointed Chief Deputy Collector of the United States Internal Revenue, at Austin, Texas, which position he held, accounting satisfactorily for large sums of money, until 1873, when he resigned the position. In August, 1873, he accompanied an editorial excursion, as the representative of the Texas Agriculturist at Austin, Texas, and in company with a large delegation of Texas editors, made an extended tour through Texas, Indian Nation, Missouri; Iowa, Illinois, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, as guests of the Missouri, Kansas, and Texas Railway. He decided to settle in Chicago. He had married in Austin, Texas, in the fall of 1872, and his wife joining him at Philadelphia they came to Chicago together, where they have since lived. He became interested in the Labour Question in 1874, through the efforts of the Chicago working people to compel the "Relief and Aid Society" to render an account of the several millions of dollars contributed by the whole world to relieve the distress occasioned by the Chicago fire of 1871. It was claimed by the working people that rings of speculators were corruptly using the money, while the distressed and impoverished people for whom it was contributed, were denied its use. The newspapers defended the "Relief and Aid Society," which denounced the dissatisfied working-men as "communists, robbers, loafers," etc. It has since been established that the working people were right in their accusations. In 1876, Parsons joined the "Working-men's Party," and soon became one of its most trusted leaders. In 1876, July 4th, he became a member of the Knights of Labour. In 1877, he received as candidate for County Clerk, on the working-men's ticket, 7,963 votes, running over 400 ahead of his ticket. He has been nominated by the working-men of Chicago three times for Alderman, twice for County Clerk, and once for Congress. In 1878, he was a delegate to the National Convention of the working-men's party. In 1879, he was a delegate to the National Convention of the Socialistic Labour Party, and was there nominated as the labour candidate for President of the United States. He declined the honour, not being of the constitutional age (thirty-five years old). When in 1876 an English weekly, entitled The Socialist, was first published, Mr. Parsons was chosen assistant editor. Meanwhile he kept a vigilant watch upon the progress of labour organisations in America. So formidable became the plans of labour at this date, that the Legislature of Illinois in 1878 passed a law disarming the wage-workers. This law was tested and confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. No sooner had this policy become effectual and dissensions in consequence had followed throughout the ranks of the whole Socialistic organisation, than Parsons saw the almost hopeless task of accomplishing political reformation. When in 1878, '79, and '80, ballot-box stuffing and other outrages upon the liberties of the people became the order of the day, all faith in the potency of moral means to insure justice, left the minds and failed to touch the hearts of working-men. To Parsons it appeared for the last time that the functions of government were practically intended to subjugate labourers' interests to the needs of corrupt power and ill-gotten wealth. In other words, the fact obtained that wealth controlled the political machines. In 1880, he withdrew from active participation in the labour struggle. The conviction gained upon him, that long hours and low wages practically disfranchised the masses of so-called voters. This experience, he says, had taught him "that bribery, intimidation, duplicity, corruption, and bulldozing grew out of the conditions, which made the working people poor and the idle rich." On this account he subsequently turned his efforts toward reducing the hours of labour. The National Conference of Labour Reformers held in Washington, D. C., in 1880, adopted a resolution forwarded by Parsons, which called attention to the fact that the United States Congress, while it neglected to enforce the Eight Hour Law passed years ago, and applicable to Government departments, found it easy enough to pass and enforce all the capitalistic legislation demanded. On October 1st, 1884, the International founded in Chicago a weekly newspaper called The Alarm, on which he was elected to the position of editor, a post held by him down to the date of the paper's suppression in May, 1886. From this date, the history of Albert R. Parsons, his trial, conviction, and execution has passed into a thousand and one periodicals and journals.

THE "MARSEILLAISE."

WE have again been asked for information regarding this fine song, and assume that it will interest other readers than our querist, and so give a brief statement of its history.

The words and music are both composed by Claude Joseph Rouget de Lisle, a Captain of Engineers, who was stationed at Strasburg when the volunteers of the Bas Rhin received orders to join Luckner's army during the excitement caused by the declaration of war against France by the King of Bohemia and Hungary. Dietrich, mayor of Strasburg, in conversation expressed regret that the young soldiers had no song to sing and march to. Rouget de Lisle, who heard him, returned to his lodgings (Maison Böchel, No. 12 Grand Rue) and composed the words and music during the night of April 24, 1792. With his violin he picked out the first strains of the inspiring melody; but being only an amateur he unfortunately added a symphony, which jars strangely with the hymn itself, and has since been suppressed. The original edition was printed (on a half-sheet, oblong 4to) by Dannbach of Strasburg, under the title of 'Chant de guerre de l'armée du Rhin, dédié au Maréchal Lukner' (sic). The 'Chant de Guerre' was sung in Dietrich's house on April 25, copied and arranged next day, and performed by the band of the National Guard at a review on Sunday the 29th. On June 25 a singer named Mirens sang it at a civic banquet at Marseilles with so much effect that it was immediately printed and distributed among the volunteers of the battalion just starting for Paris. They entered Paris on July 30 singing their new hymn; and with it on their lips they marched to the attack on the Tuilleries on Aug. 10, 1792. From that day the song lost its old name and was henceforth the 'Chanson' or 'Chant des Marseillais,' and finally 'La Marseillaise.' Shouting it in the streets the people altered it a note or two; the musicians, Edelmann, Grétry, and most of all Gossec, in their accompaniments for pianoforte and orchestra, greatly enriched the harmonies, and soon the Marseillaise in the form we have it now was known from one end of France to the other. The original song had only six verses; the seventh ('Nous entrerons dans la carrière', etc.) was added by Louis Dubois for the fete of the Federation. During the revolution a vast number of ephemeral versions appeared, but the first has never been superseded.

That De Lisle wrote the words has never been disputed, but many attempts have been unsuccessfully made to prove the prior existence of the tune. All dispute was definitely closed by A. Rouget de Lisle, a nephew of the composer, who in his pamphlet 'La vérité sur la paternité de la Marseillaise' (Paris, 1865) gives precise information and documentary evidence which place his uncle's claim beyond a doubt. The controversy is examined at length by Roquin in 'Les Mélodies populaires de la France' (Paris, 1879).

De Lisle was cashiered for expressing disapproval of the events of 10th August, and was in prison when his chant was dramatised and given at the Fête of Oct. 14, 1792. He was released on July 28, 1794, after the fall of Robespierre. Louis Philippe gave him a pension on Aug. 6, 1830, which he received till his death. He was born at Montaign, Lons-le-Saunier, May 10, 1760; died at Choisy-le-Roi, near Paris, June 27, 1836. Besides the Marseillaise, he wrote 'Essais en vers et prose' (Paris, 1796); 'Cinquante Chants Français' (Paris, 1825); the librettos of 'Jacquot, ou l'Ecole des Mères,' comic opera by Dellamaria, 1790, and 'Macbeth,' opera by Chelard, 1827; and many battle-songs in the style of the Marseillaise, none of which attained more than local fame.

PRISON LIFE IN ENGLAND.

TALKING was very prevalent among the prisoners, who did not seem to care for the punishment which they would get if brought before the governor, who is by the bye a very great official, holding almost unlimited power to flog or starve a prisoner to the extent that his evil passions bid him, short of killing the man, though very often the result is the crippling of a prisoner for life. If brought before this petty domineering official he will always ask you what you have to say for yourself, but woe betide you if you dare to answer; it is much better to say nothing than to try and clear yourself, as I myself found out from experience. The most trivial and paltry crimes (if they must be so-called) are brought against a marked man, in other words, a prisoner who has dared to show the least spirit or spark of manhood. As to paltry crimes I will give an illustration of what I mean by them. It was my unfortunate lot to have to sit and listen to as large a number of lies on a certain Sunday morning as ever I had listened to in my life before. Our clerical friend, the very Rev. Grenville Smith, was preaching upon the great reforms which had received the sanction of the Queen and Church of England; amongst which he mentioned in particular the Franchise Bills, Employers' Liability Act, Education Acts, increased comforts amongst the people, model prisons as against the old system (the only thing on which he was right), and he particularly mentioned the assistance the Church had given to those movements. Of course you can guess my feelings, knowing as I did (and he must also) that they were a tissue of the most damnable lies ever uttered by a clerical parrot, since whatever might have been the value of the above reforms they were all opposed by the Church. Of course I could not sit still under this; to listen to it was more than Job ever had to put up with, so I scratched my head and was brought before the Governor, who cautioned me as to my conduct, which he said was likely to cause a tumult in the prison; and he also bade me to remember that the truth must be spoken, whether I was pleased or offended at it. Did ever any one hear such a speech before! the "Truth" mark you. Truth, what strange things this sacred name is made to cover.

Now, in concluding my few remarks on English prisons, I should like to mention how the day is made up. The time of rising is 5.45 a.m.; the bell at that time rings, and you must at once rise, make up your bed, wash, and clean yourself. At 6 o'clock the warders open the cell doors, when each prisoner must be ready to empty all dirt and slops, then return to his cell close his door and work until 7.30 o'clock, when the bell rings for breakfast; at 8.15 the bell rings for chapel, which is over by 9, after which the governor visits all the cells to administer punishment (not justice) to those whom the warders have hatched up, in most cases, a yarn against. At 10 o'clock exercise commences until 11, after which you must resume work until 12, when the bell rings for dinner, then you commence operations upon your oakum again until 3 o'clock, at which time the oakum officer pays you a visit with a pair of scales to weigh up, and woe betide the unlucky prisoner who has been unfortunate enough to court the ill will of this officer if the task of oakum is not done. A fresh supply is then given out and work resumed until 5 p.m., when the bell rings for supper. And now commences the brutal system of espionage by the night officers, who every few minutes pay a visit to the peep-hole in the cell-door to see if each prisoner is going on with his work all right. If any are idle or reading, and they have not got their task completed, then they are brought before the governor and punished. At 8 p.m. the bell rings for bed; no beds must be touched before this bell rings, or punishment is the alternative. After the beds are made each prisoner must undress and carefully fold up his clothes, put them on a stool, and stand facing his door until the night watchman and one officer visits him and receives his empty supper-tin, after which he is at liberty to go to bed, when all lights are put out and silence reigns supreme, to be broken only by the getting-up bell, followed by the same routine day after day.

As a last word, I should like to advise any of my comrades who may get into prison not to be at all downhearted, but to make up their minds to bear their sentence whatever it may be without fretting; for that will not do them any good. So they had better stand the punishment like men, and grin and bear it as the saying goes, for if they are careful and obey the rules they need have no fear; let them take things easy and cool, and imprisonment will not hurt them. Speaking for myself, I may say the time slipped away quick and easy, and I hope when duty calls me to the front again, that I shall show by answering to the call "forward" that Prison Life has no terrors for

EMPIRICAL SOCIALISM.

COMRADE LANE'S 'Anti-Statist Communist Manifesto' is certainly interesting reading, and contains much that is well put, clear, and forcible. As for instance, the following: "The economic equilibrium realised, there will be no need of force to maintain it; war by its nature being a huge parasite, could only disturb and not consolidate it. Peace is the necessary resultant and sublime crowning of the social forces directed towards labour. The latter being essentially a peace-maker, the people being emancipated by the revolution will endeavour to guarantee the fruits of their labour, and consequently the fruits of the labour of all; instead of creating, as must inevitably occur now-a-days, new monopolies for the benefit of the few, it will extend, on the contrary, these guarantees, and confederate from town to town, from country to country, internationally. It makes all working-men unite together, and creates what is called the life of relationship in the economical order. Is it conceivable that politics and war could find room, be it ever so small, in a Society so transformed? No; and when the constitution of labour shall have definitely replaced the constitution of the old world, the advent of the working-classes will be realised with a character so imperious and fateful that the most severe justice must acknowledge its legitimacy."

As a comparatively raw recruit in the service of Socialism, I feel great diffidence in pointing out what I conceive to be the errors of an honoured veteran of the Cause; especially of one whose name appears in a responsible position in every issue of this paper. Yet we are all concerned with nothing else than to find out and proclaim the truth, and errors are apt to be the more dangerous when coming from a quarter whence they are least expected. For this reason, though it is abundantly clear that our comrade's aim and ideal is really that of all Socialists, at least in its negative form of the destruction of wage-slavery, I feel bound to point out, though cordially hating controversy, that his method of stating the case is an unscientific and erroneous one.

The 'Manifesto' begins in the approved style of French proclamations and the American Declaration of Independence, with a statement of general principles: "Human Society can only be organised upon the basis of one or the other of the two principles of authority or of liberty. From these two principles are derived two political systems, equally broad and far-reaching, though diametrically opposite in their effect, that of the one being the happiness, and that of the other the misery of mankind." So far as it is possible, to be sure that one has grasped what is meant by such "general principles," I believe this to be incorrect. Has not almost all human society been organised, not upon either of these principles pure and simple, but upon a more or less imperfect adjustment of the two? Again, may not a greater degree of real liberty exist under a severer form of authority (such as negro-slavery or a feudal system in which reciprocal duties are recognised) than under a sham democracy? Is it true that the two political systems are derived from the two principles? And why, if no intermediate system is at any time possible, is it only "in this nineteenth century of ours" that "no other political system is capable of contending for mastery"?

The 'Manifesto' states that "authority affirms that the world proceeds from God . . . who has delegated to his representative on earth, priest or monarch (both are kings), a portion of his might and power. . . . God, King, and Nationalism, is the cry and motto of the most formidable re-action. It believes in God, without whom it would not exist itself; in the King, who is an emanation from God; and in Nationalism, which is a mere Jingo sentiment, belonging to the God-idea." So that God is established by authority, and authority (or king-ship) by God; which is reasoning in a circle; and to say that Nationalism, representing an immense phase of social development, and covering nearly the whole field of written history, including the main work of philosophers, heroes, and poets, "is a mere Jingo sentiment," is hardly exact enough for a philosophical work.

Again, I find: "Be it what it may, religion teaches the renunciation of earthly possessions, and a love for the heavenly beatitudes." The Jews were the most distinctively religious people that ever lived, and if comrade Lane will take the trouble to consult a copy of their ancient literature, he will find his loose statement overwhelmingly contradicted. If he means that religion teaches that the nearest good is not always the greatest, that morbid self-seeking is anti-social, that self-sacrifice is a social duty, he is right, and every Socialist knows that this is so, else where is Bax's 'Religion of Socialism,' and where will it be in that future state which Lane parenthetically describes as "religion annihilated"? "We," says our comrade, "can therefore only consider as true revolutionary Socialists, conscious of the object they pursue, those who, like ourselves, declare themselves Atheists, and do whatever in their power lies to destroy this corrupting notion of a God in the minds of the masses. The struggle, therefore, is against every kind of religion, and the propagation of Atheism must form a part of every Socialistic programme that pretends to give a logical exposition to the ideas, the aspirations, and the objects of the adepts of the Social Revolution." It is kind of our comrade to visit religious Socialists with the mild reproof of being "unconscious of the object they pursue," and for my part I should not cease from taking part in the propaganda because comrade Lane considered me insufficiently "logical." But every religious Socialist would agree that comrade Lane's God deserves all his efforts at destruction. Nevertheless, we shall have to wait a long time for the accomplishment of our aims if we are first to see God annihilated as a philosophical preliminary; and to one who thinks that the idea of God will be absent from the minds of the men of the future, I will not say that he has studied history in vain, but simply that I think he is mistaken.

Still putting the cart before the horse, our comrade proceeds: "We decline to recognise a divine absolutism, because it can only give rise to the slavery of reason and intelligence. Why then should we recognise a human absolutism that can only engender the material exploitation of the ruled by the rulers?" All government is bad, including parliamentary democracy. Therefore "we aim at the abolition of the state," "we are anti-statists." It is not clear whether our comrade uses the word "state" in its popular sense of a class-government, which all Socialists wish to abolish; or in its true etymological sense, as the standing or permanent part of society, the corporate community. The latter it will always be impossible to abolish, for it is inconceivable that a society should exist without some common means of expressing itself. But as "in the elaboration of all our conceptions we always start from the principle of liberty," so, in deference to that principle, we are to ignore evolution. For the development of nationalism must be worked out before internationalism can be possible; and it is against all reason to suppose that all the past and present struggles for national unity can mean absolutely nothing. The Irish, for example, are entirely unfit for Socialism until their national life has had free play; and it is easy to believe that the patience of the Germans under military tyranny is partly due to the unconscious feeling that it is a necessary process that is being gone through. To the Socialist it would seem natural to believe that the centralisation which is everywhere hastening to its culmination is a preparatory step that will both necessitate and facilitate the assumption of power by the people; that production and distribution on an increasingly gigantic scale, the undertaking of works of public utility by the State, and so forth, should make our way easier for us, and point out the path to follow in the future. But no; it seems we are to watch our opportunity to arrest the progress of evolution, and introduce an arbitrary decentralisation, instead of waiting for it to take place naturally when the time is ripe.

I am not at all sure that I understand what is meant by "free communism"; it seems clear that any association of individuals must have some kind of arrangement among themselves; if it is a question of the extent of such association, the matter is greatly simplified. Our comrade prefers that society shall consist of a number of communes, towns, or villages; I think that it will probably consist of a number of peoples. "Internationalism" as an aim means nothing to me if not a number of peoples freed from economical servitude freely federating and communicating with one another through corporate media: if it simply means the sentiment that every man of another race is my brother, it is true and noble enough, but hardly a new discovery or a tangible benefit.

The second part of the treatise, dealing with various aspects of practical politics, seems to me by far the more valuable of the two, and less open to objection. Indeed, one is not likely to quarrel with our comrade for being a Socialist, or for dealing with opponents from that point of view. What is contended is, that Socialism, instead of being considered as the outcome of an inductive investigation of the evolution of society, is bolstered up with general principles, conceptions of liberty, etc.; and the past history and thought of mankind, instead of being scientifically studied for a solution of the mysteries of the future, is subjected to an irregular deductive process in accordance with these previously-adopted principles and conceptions. No wonder that the world appears to our comrade as a "lottery of events," a phrase which he accidentally lets drop.

One returns with renewed satisfaction to the perusal of our own Manifesto; so logical and convincing as it is, after reading that in which our comrade's conception stands forth naked and unsupported. His notion seems to be that man has arbitrarily saddled himself with the burden of authority, that theological slavery produces political, and political economical. Compare with this the succinct summary contained in Gronlund's recent work: Social revolutions "always start in the region of ideas, and first of all in those ideas that have the most powerful dominion over men—their religious conceptions, their views of the universe and their own place in it. Naturally this change first shows itself in the form of scepticism, religious anarchy; then the anarchy filters down to those ideas that relate to our fellow-men, to society, to our moral and political notions; finally the anarchy reaches economics, the basis of society. There the real revolution, the real change takes place; and there, on the new basis, our new political, moral and religious ideas are reconstructed."

Nobody has felt more strongly than I have done the fascination of a priori principles and primary conceptions such as those now put forward: but I am all the more fully convinced that to be of any service they must be intelligibly obtained by scientific research. Not that I have any alternative scheme to offer to our comrade Lane's; I am simply pleading for a sound and trustworthy method. Socialism, happily, is greater than the private conceits of any one of us, or than the profoundest conceptions of the greatest thinker that ever lived; and we should all lay to heart the words of our comrade: "Let us mature our ideas and our aspirations!" REGINALD A. BECKETT.

[I note here that the word "religion" is often used very loosely; the ancient Jewish religion was not one of the "religious" religions as Bax calls them. Also I cannot see how "Internationalism" can fail to bring about the extinction of nations, and so give us the free communes of Lane's manifesto: the federal idea as opposed to the national is clearly growing even now. The centralisation of production and distribution is no doubt hastening the advent of Socialism; but it is in itself an evil, just as the class war is which is doing the same thing; true society once realised, we should get rid of such evils.—Ed.]

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

The extensive engineering works of Messrs. Sharp, Stewart and Co., of Manchester, are about to be removed to Glasgow.

NOTTINGHAM.—A strike has occurred in the hosiery trade, the hands employed by Messrs. Eden and Son having turned out against a reduction in their wages.

CLOSING OF IRONWORKS IN NORTH WALES.—The large ironworks of the New British Iron Company, at Ruabon, which are the most extensive works in North Wales, were closed on Saturday, and all the furnaces are blown out. A large number of men are thus thrown out of employment. The company, which is one of the oldest in the principality, is in voluntary liquidation.

SHIP-BUILDING IN SCOTLAND.—It is currently reported in Glasgow that Sir William Pearce, M.P., has secured for his firm, the Fairfield Ship-building Company, an order to build three steel steamers, with a fourth in prospect, for the Vancouver and Japan services of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Each steamer is to be of 3,000 tons.

END OF THE NORTHAMPTON BOOT STRIKE.—Through the mediation of the Rev. Fleming Williams, of London, the prolonged dispute in the Northampton boot trade ended on Saturday night, the conditions of agreement being then signed by the chairman of the masters' association and the union officials. The terms are on the same lines as those offered by the masters last week, excepting that a standard case of goods will now be formed. The men resume work early this week.

NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS' AGITATION.—The Northumberland miners have taken action on the resolutions passed at the recent Miners' National Conference at Newcastle. They have requested the colliery owners to meet a deputation from the men to discuss the proposals for 10 per cent. advance in wages, seven hours per day work, and a general holiday at stated periods, in view of restricting the output. No reply has yet been received.

THE DOWLAIS IRON WORKS.—Arrangements are now completed for the permanent removal of the Dowlais Iron Works to Cardiff. The operations will be commenced at once, and three blast furnaces of the largest type are to be completed within three years, the work involving an expenditure of a quarter of a million sterling. At a future period the works are to be extended to include Siemens' furnaces. It is estimated that before the expiration of ten years the whole of the Dowlais undertaking will be established in Cardiff, where the works will be the largest of the kind in the kingdom, employing over 10,000 men.

THE COTTON TRADE.—In the Lancashire cotton trade the New Year is beginning with no improvement or sign of better times. There are several wages disputes on hand. A strike is threatened at Higham, near Burnley, while the dispute at Colne still continues. Last week the Weavers' Committee were unable to raise the strike pay, but they expect to be able to do so this week, and they have appealed to other East Lancashire districts for increased support.

COTTARS DEMANDING LAND.—At a meeting of Lews crofters and cottars recently held at Garrabost, it was resolved: "That this meeting demands restoration of the crofters' ancient holdings now wasting under deer and sheep throughout Lews, so as to provide new crofts for the landless cottars who are famishing through want of land." Three hundred cottars from Borge, Shader, and Barvas marched upon Galson sheep-farm, and surveyed the lands, and warned the tenant to leave when his lease expires next March. The contingents were headed by pipers and flags in military order.

LOW WAGES OF RAILWAYMEN.—A correspondent of the Railway Review writes from the North Eastern Railway as follows:—"I have been collecting an account of the wages paid to signalmen and porters on this line, and to give your readers a slight idea of the condition of affairs, I give a list of one or two cases. If needed I can send the names of the stations where these men are employed: porter, 20 years of age, 15s. a week of seven days; porter, 18 years of age, 13s. I find I have a clerk, too, on my list, 21 years of age, who has 17s. 6d. a week; and a signalsman, in a 12 hours cabin working 72 hours a week for 20s. 6d. I have three cabins worked by five men, two of them have 22s. 6d. and three 21s. They all discharge the same duties and stand the same hours.

LANARKSHIRE MINERS.—At a meeting of the delegates in conference last week, the following resolutions were passed:—This conference, learning that conditions of employment under the Truck Act are being presented to the miners of the county for signature, would desire to protest and express disapprobation of the illegal pressure brought to bear upon men to compel acceptance, and would urge all miners to amalgamate and prepare for joint resistance to such arbitrary and tyrannical proceedings, and secure, as in the case of quarrymen and ploughmen, that tools be supplied. In considering wages, the delegates unanimously agreed, in consequence of the reported advance in coal, and the fact that many employers had not yet reduced their workmen, that the associated masters be asked to withdraw the reduction of 7½ per cent. enforced during the summer months. Arrangements were made to have a series of demonstrations throughout the country early in January, it being left in the hands of the secretary to convene conferences and secure speakers.

AMERICA.

The Havana cigarmakers have signified their willingness to submit the matters in dispute between themselves and their employés to the arbitration of government, and it is expected that the operatives will consent to abide by the government's decision.

The employés of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad shipped on the 9th inst. a carload of provisions from Philadelphia to the striking miners of the Lehigh coal regions. The same day the Building Trades Council appointed a committee of five to get up an entertainment for the benefit of the Lehigh miners.

The "Provisional Committee" of the Knights of Labour who are dissatisfied with the methods of the present general officers are themselves surprised at the support they are receiving from all sections of the country. An assembly to formulate a plan of action will soon be called.

The National Convention of Moulders is in session at Cleveland, making arrangements to get all the men employed in foundries into the Knights of Labour.

The strike of the table-glassware workers at Pittsburgh, Pa., affects 1,400 men directly and 2,100 indirectly. Secretary Dillon of the Glassworkers' Association stated that their union had ample funds to conduct a long strike.

At present they have 150,000 dollars, and they expect 75,000 more before next year. The manufacturerers are equally firm, and a protracted struggle may be expected.

At the meeting of the Central Labour Union, New York, a communication was read from the journeymen brewers and malsters of Milwaukee. They state that there is trouble with the bosses, who have broken with the men, and the men are locked out. It was resolved to boycott Milwaukee beer until the trouble is settled.

The strike of the shoe-cutters in Rochester, N.Y., is approaching a crisis. 300 shoe-cutters on November 1 threw down their tools because the manufacturerers refused to give them an increase of wages amounting to 1 dol. 50 c. a-week. The action caused the stoppage of the factories, as over 3,000 persons, including many women and children, joined them. Most of the firms have acceded since last week to the demands of the strikers, and it is expected in labour circles that all the employers will grant the demanded increase in wages.

Most has been sentenced to one year's imprisonment. His lawyer, Howe, has been able, however, to obtain a stay of proceedings pending an appeal to the higher courts. The hearing before the Criminal Term of the case will not be before about five or six months. In the meantime Most is out on bail for 5000 dollars.

Capitalists are very joyful just at present; they point to the gallows of Chicago, to the disintegration of the Knights of Labour, to the small vote cast last fall for labour candidates. They really believe by corrupting leaders and hanging devotees they have broken the back of the Labour movement!

Congressman Adams, from Chicago, will propose in the fiftieth Congress the following law:

Whereas aliens residing in the United States have lately menaced the public peace by advising and encouraging the destruction of property and the murder of officers of the law; and whereas such acts are offences against the sovereignty of the United States; therefore, when any District Attorney of the United States shall have information in writing from no less than three reputable citizens that any alien has aided, advised, or encouraged the destruction of property or murder of any officer of the law, or has attempted to overthrow the laws, or to excite domestic violence in any State, such information shall be transmitted at once to the President of the United States. The President shall then issue an order in writing requiring such alien to depart from the territory of the United States within a given time, and this order shall be served by the United States Marshal upon the person to whom it is directed. The President shall have power to revoke such order or extend the time within which such alien is required to leave the country for good cause. If the offender shall refuse to obey such order, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of State to cause him to be arrested and conveyed out of the territory of the United States, and if he shall return again to this country he shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than three years, and at the expiration of his term of imprisonment shall again be conveyed out of the country, and not be permitted to return until the order expelling him shall be revoked. Section 8 of the bill provides "That whenever, in the judgment of the President of the United States, the public safety shall require, it shall be lawful for the President to cause any such alien to be arrested without notice and conveyed out of the United States."

Reports that come from Philadelphia concerning an approaching crisis in the affairs of the Knights of Labour that may lead to its complete disintegration are fully confirmed by New York Knights of Labour. James E. Quinn, Master Workman of D. A. 49, has cut loose completely from T. V. Powderly, and in the last issue of Solidarity declares war on him. In one of the passages he says: "Through the action of the General Assembly at Minneapolis the Order will in the near future be held responsible before the world for the lives of five of the most noble champions of humanity that this planet has ever yet been blessed with thus far." Quinn does not agree with the seceders; he says they do not act wisely; they should imitate the leaders of D. A. 49 in 1882 when they differed with Powderly. These organised the "Home Club" and fought the general officers until they brought them to terms. Powderly, it is said, hopes to compromise with all his opponents. The new labour organisation which was formed in Chicago after the Minneapolis convention by the seceders will accept nothing but the positive, and not the "bismarckian" resignation of Powderly and his lieutenants. The new organisation will be styled "Brotherhood of Labour." If Powderly persists in his course he will ruin the Order.

Revolutionary Calendar and Book of Days.

All other people but English Socialists have their several calendars to keep them in mind of the tidings of past years as the days go by. Now, however, this omission on the part of the English revolutionary party is about to be rectified. Our comrade Tom Muse, of Carlisle, sent to the Editors of this paper a calendar of revolutionary dates compiled by himself, with a request that we should find a publisher for it if we deemed it worth. We did so consider it, but found that it was too late for hope of getting it published by the end of this month. Thereupon we resolved, with comrade Muse's permission, to print each week in the Commonweal the week's instalment, after carefully revising and adding to it; with explanatory notes and comments on the week's events. In the next number this will be begun. At the end of the year we intend to issue the completed work in one volume; meanwhile we cannot but think our readers will be pleased with the new feature.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

BELGIUM.

On Christmas-day, a Congress of all the Belgian Freethinkers' Association was held at Brussels. I only notice the fact because I should like to point out that in all Roman lands Freethinkers are Socialists also, and consequently their meetings are Socialistic and revolutionary, whereas in England and other Anglo-Saxon countries, it is often found that the freest thinkers in point of philosophy are most reactionary in politics and economics, and the Socialists in these lands are not always Freethinkers.

Our comrades in Belgium, of course, are not satisfied with the scanty measure of pardon granted to the miners of Charleroi and Mons, and they are going to set on foot an agitation in order to have their fellow-workers completely amnestied. Let us hope that they will ere long succeed in their re-vindication.

Our readers will perhaps remember what was said about the fishermen of Ostend, at the time when they were quarrelling with their English trade comrades. How just the case of the poor Ostend wage-slaves was, may easily be deduced from the following facts. The whole fishery trade at Ostend is monopolised in the hands of fifteen ship-owners. Each of them owns on an average a dozen of fishing-boats. After five or six days' fishing, each boat comes back with a cargo of fish; the value of which can be reckoned at an average of 500 frs., or £20. Out of this sum, the shipowner first deducts for the sinking and interest of his capital and the redeeming of some other expenses 55 per cent., that is to say, 275 frs., or £11 of the above £20. The remainder, i.e., 225 frs., or £9, is considered as nett profit; on this sum each man of the crew gets 5 per cent., or 12f. 50c. (10s.) a-week. If we suppose that he has the same amount of wages during forty weeks in the year, which is a very fair supposition indeed, his yearly earnings will amount to the "enormous" sum of 500 frs., or £20. Now what is the share of his master, the shipowner? If he gives 12f. 50c. to each sea-slave, that will be for the six men of each boat a total sum of 75f. or £3; deducting the £3 from the gross produce he will have a profit of 425 frs., or £17 per boat and per week, and reckoning for him forty weeks fishing as well, his yearly income for one boat amounts to 17,000 frs., or £680! I don't know the proper value of the boat nor the sum total of his expenses, but I imagine that the investment of his capital fairly gets him 200 per cent. Each shipowner having on an average twelve boats, his yearly income will reach 200,000 frs., or £8,000, and he earns it not by his work, but by remaining all day long at the fireside doing nothing, if he likes that kind of idleness. He gets four hundred times more than the poor fisherman, who toils night and day, and always exposes his life and the welfare of his family by the most dangerous of all trades. How could this dreadful position of the starving fishermen be ameliorated? Simply by their being themselves in possession of the boats. Instead of their earning 10s. a-week they would have, on the basis of the above mentioned figures, 80 frs., or £3, 4s. weekly. But that would be Socialism and not Commercialism, as it is nowadays; commercialism or capitalistic accumulation of wealth being the appropriation of the work of others by mischievous, superfluous, and parasitical monopolisers.

FRANCE.

As a New Year's gift, President Carnot is going to grant full amnesty to all political offenders now in the prisons of the French Republic.

On Tuesday 20th inst., comrade Kropotkin lectured at Paris, in the Salle de Rivoli, before a crowded and enthusiastic audience, on a very interesting subject—the moral influence of prisons on the prisoners. After having examined how prisons could be organised, as long as prisons exist at all, he comes to the conclusion that, even if it were reorganised, the penitentiary régime would remain absolutely immoral, because it kills all noble and human feelings and fatally develops all the instincts of the brute—lust, covetousness, servility. He pronounces that the only way to ameliorate prisons is to suppress them altogether.

Up to the present moment there have not been different fractions enough in the French Parliament; a new one, the Group of the Socialist Deputies, has lately been formed. It may be interesting to our readers to know the parliamentary programme of this group, numbering some twenty-five members. It runs as follows: 1. Individual freedom and communal autonomy; 2. International federation of all nations; 3. Solution of all differences and variances between nations and between individuals, by way of arbitration; 4. Transformation, as far as possible, of all standing armies into national guards, all adults being obliged to serve; 5. Abolition of capital punishment; 6. Sovereignty of the people guaranteed by universal suffrage, organised so as to recognise the right of minorities; 7. Progressive emancipation of woman; equal civil rights for legitimate and so-called illegitimate children; 8. Integral, scientific, professional and military instruction gratuitous to all and in all standards; 9. Separation of all churches from public administrations, schools, charitable institutions, etc.; suppression of the budget for religious purposes; 10. Absolute freedom of thought, speech, press, meeting, contract and work regulations; 11. Transformation of all monopolies into public services, conducted by their respective trades' associations, under direct control of the public administration; 12. Progressive nationalisation of private property; 13. Abolition of all town-dues and indirect taxes; establishment of progressive taxes on personal income and on successions; abolition of successions by collateral line; 14. Public institutions for charitable and benevolent purposes, infant-asylums, schools, retreats for old persons, etc., to be provided for by the community.

GERMANY.

Comrade Steinfatz, formerly editor of the Burger-Zeitung, which was lately suppressed by the German police-censure, has been expelled from Hamburg. He had only just been released from prison.

One of the scoundrels who played the rôle of Crown witness or informer at the trial of our Chicago comrades, Godfrey Waller, now lives at Hamburg under the name of Karl Miller. Our friends there should keep their eyes open and be warned against that wretch.

During the last fortnight active perquisitions have been made on all the barracks of the German army, on a special order issued by the Minister of War, who is anxious to ascertain the enormous progress of Socialist ideas among the soldiery. At Posen, Berlin, Breslau, Frankfurt, Mainz, etc., the inquirers have found out that they were not searching in vain and that our "detestable" doctrines really have had a good hearing. Of course, many a soldier friend who had in his possession pamphlets or papers or leaflets, will be sent to prison for a while, but a firm and convinced man doesn't care a fig for that nowadays: the tables soon will be turned.

V. D.

[WITH APOLOGIES TO MR. W. S. GILBERT.]

As it seems to be conceded that a clearance must be made,

I've got a little list, I've got a little list

Of certain individuals who, if they should get mislaid,

I'm sure would not be missed, they never would be missed.

The patriotic gentlemen I speak of, it is clear,

(With a slight amount of pressure) would consent to disappear;

And the emigration-mongers should support me to a man,

For, notwithstanding consistency and beauty of the plan,

They've picked enough to please a rabid emigrationist,

They've none of them be missed, they'd none of them be missed.

Chorus: We'll put 'em on the list, though it's likely they'll resist;

For they'll none of 'em be missed, they'll none of 'em be missed.

First the bourgeois statistician of the Levi-Giffen type,

With his curious mental twist, I've got him on the list;

Then the military Bobby who has London in his grips,

He never would be missed, oh, no, he'd not be missed;

The cunning devils who would fain put off the Labour pack

By trailing semi-decomposed red herrings on the track,

And the frothy fools who bawl that Britons never will be slaves,

When they're that and nothing better from their cradles to their graves;

The blue-ribbonite fanatic, and the smug evangelist,

They never would be missed, they never would be missed.

The jolly jerry-builder, whom I own a strong desire

To pummel with my fist, I've got him on the list;

The advertising agent whose productions we admire!

He never would be missed, he never would be missed;

The brassy rent-collectors, and the sweating middlemen,

Who fleece the happy worker when they get him in their den;

The respectable debenture-holding profit-hunting thieves;

And the nugatory landlord who unblushingly receives

A premium for graciously consenting to exist;

He never will be missed, I'm sure he'll not be missed.

Then the money-lord without whose aid our labour could not thrive,

The boss capitalist, that consummate humorist,

Who claims to clothe and house and feed and keep us all alive,

We've got him on the list, we've got him on the list;

And the rascal who to muffle up his income makes a shift

With the "Dignity of Labour" or "Advantages of Thrift";

And along with him his brother-shark, the crafty business man,

Who combines a sound percentage with a charitable plan,

And poses as the worker's friend, the pure philanthropist,

He never would be missed, he never would be missed.

C. W. BECKETT.

'The Redemption of Labour,' by Cecil Balfour Phipson (Swan Sonnenschein, 12s.), is a large and imposing-looking work in two volumes; which, however, before it is well open proclaims what it is. On the title-page it asserts by way of motto: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." The preface informs us that: "The end he seeks may be reached by man, but only when he acknowledges his dependence upon and humbly follows the guidance of his God." A list of twenty errata, numbering among them such as "for 'blue' read 'pink,'" "for 'blue' read 'red,'" "for 'Diagram of Table No. V.' read 'Ratios of Table No. IV.,'" makes one's brain reel with the endless vistas of perverted meaning it opens up. Mr. Phipson has succeeded after great labour in producing a book for which there is no strong reason of being; which has little chance of obtaining a wide circle of readers; and has for the few who will read it nothing to offer beyond that which they will have already received from a hundred less pretentious and more workmanlike productions. A certain reluctance must always be felt in condemning any honest attempt at solving the labour problem; and that feeling is intensified when, as in the present case, the attempt is transparently painstaking and well-intentioned; but writers (and readers) of books must remember that what would have been a striking book a few years ago, say when 'Progress and Poverty' appeared, is now a very ordinary thing indeed, and that to be worth writing or reading, a book must bear a new message or put the old in a better shape; neither of these requirements does the present book fulfil.

'Liberty and Law,' by George Lacy (Sonnenschein, 12s.), is just the reverse of the above-named in the impression it produces when opened; on the title-page it offers itself as: "An attempt at the refutation of the Individualism of Mr. Herbert Spencer and the political economists; an exposition of natural rights, and of the principles of justice, and of Socialism; and a demonstration of the worthlessness of the supposed dogmas of orthodox political economy;" the preface explains that "this is not a work written by a thinker especially for thinkers; it is a work written for the people by one of themselves," and proceeds to attack with cheery impartiality all and sundry of the great thinkers that men bow to nowadays. A glance through the book shows the author's wide reading; copious extracts from all modern books of note on ethics, law, morality, etc., are given as foot-notes, each with a clear reference to where it may be found; and its whole appearance lulls the reader into a belief that his road has been made smooth for him, that here at last is a man who, freeing himself from cant and prejudice, has had a workmanlike try at making clear a complex question. Alas for the perishing of human hope! A few pages on we come with a jerk upon statements like "to say that the race is always ahead of its laws is clearly absurd," and on reaching the last chapter we are treated to a tirade against freedom of the press, of public meeting, of open-air speaking, and of many other things we fondly imagine that we have a right to enjoy. "There is something in the book," for the quotations are valuable, but a mass of undigested material does not form a book any more than untiring industry and unquestioning self-belief makes up for lack of reasoning power and capability of expression.

ANTI-STATIST COMMUNIST MANIFESTO

"There is a sad lack of Anarchist pamphlets in England, and we gladly welcome our comrade Joseph Lane's contribution of 'An Anti-Statist Communist Manifesto,' which is an energetic and earnest exposition of Anarchist Socialism from a worker's standpoint. The second portion, which deals with practical politics is specially interesting. We hope the tract will have a wide circulation."—FREEDOM.

"There is a great lack of literature from this standpoint. We do not agree with all the points, but at the same time recommend it to all our friends and also its translation into the French and German language."—FREIHEIT.

"The State in every form is denounced as the abomination of desolation. Mr. Lane is extravagant in many of his statements, but his pamphlet is quite worth reading."—OUR CORNER.

PRICE ONE PENNY, or 9d. per dozen.
