POLITICAL NOTES.

THERE is naturally great commotion in political circles about the resignation of Lord Randolph Churchill, and speculations about the result; as far as we Socialists are concerned we need not trouble ourselves much about it. It emphasises the idiocy of our Parliamentary struggle, that the resignation of a man who is looked upon by every one as a mere trickster, who openly repudiates the folly of having principles to trouble himself with, should be a matter of such mighty importance. Further, it is an indication of the disintegration of parties which is caused by the shadow of advancing Socialism, and which has been going on at such a great rate recently.

But although it is really a sign of this decay of party government, it is probable enough that its first results will be the uniting of the Liberal party on the basis of the surrender of the Gladstonian Liberals. Mr. Chamberlain's speech at Birmingham had a tone of confident triumph about it which is somewhat justified by the situation. The Liberals are quite prepared for this act of ratting; indeed, Mr. Gladstone himself has given the signal for it by letting it be known that he too condemns the "Plan of Campaign." The Jonah of Home Rule once thrown over, nothing prevents the Union of the two sections of the Liberal Party, who can then set to work about the business which the more enlightened of them see to be their true function, of widening the basis of exploitation in these islands in various ways. The attempt at the creation of a new lower middle-class to stem the torrent of Socialism will be the serious business of this new party (for in spite of names it will really be new), of which the two brothers-in-arms, Churchill and Chamberlain, are such distinguished leaders.

Mr. Chamberlain's very clear statement on the necessity of turning the Irish tenants into owners of their holdings was very significant of this aim. As far as Ireland is concerned it must be said that dismal as is the prospect which the realisation of his views would put before that luckless country, the turning of the Irish tenants into peasant proprietors is only too likely to take place, whatever political party may get the upper hand. It is the new misery which Ireland is bound to go through, unless the new social order is realised in civilisation generally in time to prevent it. Nor is it by any means unlikely that the promise of such a change may break up the Irish Parliamentary Party, and leave the New Liberal Party free to do its work in Parliament. That party will be the then Intelligent Reactionary Party, the great enemy of progress expressed by Socialism. But so fast are things moving that its great men will not be the Hartingtons and Goschens, who were once called Liberals and are now mere Tories, but the Radicals old and new, among whom, I suppose, we must now rank Lord Randolph Churchill.

But meantime what is this ominous sound in the air? War is threatened again, and this time more determinedly and clearly than ever. On all sides one hears that this time it is certain, and that spring will see murder afield on the monstrous scale of modern times. How will our English parties deal with this horror if it comes? Will it afford a last chance to the old Tory party to do one more injury to the world before it departs for ever? Or will the Tories unite with the Intelligent Reactionary Party in one great flood of Jingoism?

At first sight, indeed, it would seem a mere act of madness for Bismark and Co. to provoke a hurly-burly which may very well make an end of his firm and its aspirations. But one must remember that they are hardly their own masters in the matter. The monster of Commercial Militarism which they have created must be found work for or it will destroy its creators; and there comes a time when all must be risked—even revolution behind the invading armies.

Meantime, if war really becomes imminent our duties as Socialists are clear enough, and do not differ from those we have to act on ordinarily. To further the spread of international feeling between the workers by all means possible; to point out to our own workmen that foreign competition and rivalry, or commercial war, culminating at last in open war, are necessities of the plundering classes, and that the race and commercial quarrels of these classes only concern us so far as we can use them as opportunities for fostering discontent and revolution; that the interests of the workmen are the same in all countries and they can never be really enemies of each other; that the men of our labouring classes, therefore, should turn a deaf ear to the recruiting sergeant, and refuse to allow themselves to be dressed up in red and be taught to form a part of the modern killing machine for the honour and glory of a country in which they have only the dog's share of many kicks and few halfpence,—all this we have to preach always, though in the event of imminent war we may have to preach it more emphatically. Also, since if any English government allows itself to be dragged into war it will as a matter of course be on that side the triumph of which would mean reaction—i.e., Bismark and Co. we may have to protest specially and definitely against such a proceeding, and probably we should have to put ourselves forward somewhat prominently in such a protest, from which respectability of all kinds would be very apt to hang back.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE WORKHOUSE; OR, JOHN POORMAN'S REST.

THE Science, industrialism, economic doctrine, and philanthropy of the 19th century find their architectural expression in the railway station, the gasometer, the factory, and the workhouse. The two latter as distinctly characteristic of our civilisation as the Pyramids of Egypt, the Parthenon of Greece, or the Cathedrals of mediæval times were of theirs. One tells the story of the marvellous increase of productive power which our age has received, the other shows the share of that increase the worker has obtained. The one is the place where the worker pays the master two-thirds of his hours of toil for permission to possess the results of the remaining third, the other is the refuge appointed for the close of life when there is no longer left to him strength from which "profit" can be wrung.

At present it is only of the workhouse, known in Chartist speech and Corn Law Rhymes as "the Bastile" (sic) that I can speak. To the close connection with the place of labour of this place of rest, I can only incidentally refer. Inside and out the place is wholly unlovely, and there is nothing of romance in its story to bewile your ears, and yet, for the sake of its many inmates, fellow countrymen and women of ours, I dare to ask you to give me all your attention as I try to explain what English State charity really is.

The workhouse and the Poor Law System, of which it is the expression, are quite modern things. They belong wholly to our country and are the outcome of its industrial conditions. Long ago there was a time in this England of ours when poverty, as we now understand the word, was unknown, when toil was wholesome, and life was glad and fair. So much ignorance prevails on this matter that I must ask leave to dwell a little on it so as to remove all doubt about the fact. If some Bible-wise man should quote against me the text ascribed to Solomon (Ecc. 7, 10): "Say not thou, What is the cause that former times were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this," I must remind him that the words are those of a voluptuous scoundrel who squandered in shameless debauchery the hard earnings of the Judean poor. The advice of such a counselor is to be followed by the rule of contrary.

In his just-published admirable 'Introduction to the History of the Factory System,' Mr. Cooke-Taylor says, speaking of the 15th century: "Paradoxical and almost unaccountable as it may at first sight appear, it is nevertheless just this period of English History that some recent and most competent writers have fixed upon as opening the brightest era throughout the whole of our country's annals; as being in fact 'the golden age' of England. The paradox is only an apparent one, and that view of things not so unaccountable as it seems, though the difficulty of reconciling such apparently contradictory facts is not to be denied. The seeming contradiction is in the aspect in which we choose to regard the political-economical conditions of these times; that is, whether from above or from below; whether in the interests of the ruling or of the working classes. Regarded purely in the former light, England was indeed in a bad way just then; the succession to the throne unsettled, the country involved in a cruel civil war, commerce nearly non-existent, population falling, wages high, profit small, and the lower orders ever trenching upon the traditional privileges of the higher. Regarded from the other point of view, that of these lower orders themselves, those very elements of political dissatisfaction wore the aspect of bright promise, and were the just foundations of their rising hope. The very lowness of profits and sparsity of population—political-economical evils to the employing and trading classes—were sources of wealth and therefore of unaccustomed comfort to labourers whose general condition was greatly raised in consequence. But further, when the political turmoils ceased at length, the popular advancement thus fostered began to tell with redoubled effect in face of the more happy position of things attained, and the impetus spread to higher strata of society. All classes began then to feel it, . . . Even the destruction of property caused by the Wars of the Roses was not able, it would seem, to prevent the English people at their close from being in the enjoyment of a condition of well-being which made them the envy of their neighbours, and to which the working classes long looked back with affectionate regret. Our country was then 'Merrie England,' a title conferred upon her by rival nations which she accepted and felt she deserved. It is only necessary to compare this estimate of us with that of any foreigner of to-day to add to the astonishment with which we must regard this fact. If there is one thing that invariably strikes every intelligent visitor here now, it is the exceeding gloom of our national life, the absolute incapacity for joyousness which the national character displays. Merriment is the very quality of which the modern Englishman seems to know least. Wealth has vastly increased since then; the standard of comfort has been immensely raised, political freedom is general, and yet at the end of a century of enormous prosperity the country which once was 'Merrie England' is now the gloomiest, weariest, least enjoying on the face of the earth."

Students of that golden age will find valuable information in 'Cobbett's History of the Reformation'—a book all Protestants ought to read—in 'Froude's History of England,' and in Professor Rogers' great work—'Six Centuries of Work and Wages.' Professor Rogers says:

"The 15th century and the first quarter of the 16th were the golden age of the English labourer, if we are to interpret the wages which he earned by the cost of the necessities of life. At no time were wages, relatively speaking, so high, and at no time was food so cheap."

The wages of ordinary labourers and artizans were 6s. a day the year through; agricultural labourers received 24s. a week. The working day was 8 hours. Day work was paid for at full rates, and at times even Sundays and festivals were paid for also. Women received the same wages as men. Wages were equal to twice or three times the cost of maintenance under contract. The common people were fed with great abundance of all sorts of fish and flesh, were clothed throughout in good woollens and were well provided with all sorts of household goods. On all things were the marks of beauty that tell of the workman's pleasure in his craft. Serious crime was almost unknown, the judges at the county assizes tried scarcely three prisoners in the year (Cobbett, 56) though at that time water was only drunk in England when men did penance!

Such cases of need as arose from old age, accident, and sickness, were relieved by those inns, hospitals, and schools of learning, called monasteries. The average number of these in each county was 50, or 2500 for the Kingdom. The medical service given was the best known to the time, and the dole received by the applicant was not dry bread and skimmed skilly, but a generous gift that made the heart stout and glad.

The decline in the prosperity of the English worker dates approximately from the suppression of the monasteries, and the distribution of their lands among his followers by the royal polygamist Henry VIII. Into the causes of that decline I cannot now enter, and must content myself in passing with quoting this suggestive sentence from William Cobbett:

"From the land all good things come. Somebody must own the land. Those who own it must have the distribution of its revenues. If these revenues be chiefly distributed among the people from whose labour they arise, and in such a way as to afford them a good maintenance on easy terms, the community must be happy. If the revenues be alienated in very great part; if they be carried away to a great distance and expended among those from whose labour no part of them arise the main body of the community must be miserable poor-houses, jails, and barracks must arise."

Having made men beggars the State proceeded to make them slaves. Severe laws enforced by terrible punishments were enacted. The reign of Henry VIII. is specially disgraced by such legislation. Some feeble attempts to provide alms for aged and sick people began to be made in 1536.

In the reign of Elizabeth a Poor Law System came into existence in 1601. The Act ordered the nomination yearly in every parish of overseers, who were empowered to raise money by taxation of the inhabitants for the relief of the poor. Children were to be apprenticed, persons able to work were to be set to work, and the impotent were to receive alms. Relief was to be given only in the birthplace of the recipient, and parents and grandparents were held liable for the support of their children. Vagrants were left to the harsh provisions of the criminal law. Ninety-six years later a workhouse was built in Bristol, and by an Act passed in the reign of George I. power was given to parishes, or unions of parishes, to provide houses for the poor, and it was ordered that "No poor who refused to be lodged and kept in such houses should be entitled to ask or receive parochial relief." These houses, says Sir Geo. Nichols, were established and mainly conducted with a view to deriving profit from the labour of the inmates, and not as a means of testing the reality of their destitution. The workhouse was, in truth, a kind of manufactory, carried on at the risk and the cost of the poor-rate, employing the worst description of the people, and helping to discourage and pauperise the best. The ultimate tendency of establishments so founded and so constructed was, in fact, to increase the burden of relief, to lead the entire labouring population to a dependence upon the rates, and to bring them down to the lowest level both individually and socially." The same author declares that in the reign of Geo. III. these places were misnamed workhouses, and had become "seats and sources of contagion, and a sort of pest-houses where diseases social, moral, and physical were generated and nurtured." Some curious experiments in the three acres and a cow direction mark this period. They throw instructive and discouraging light on Mr. Jesse Collings philanthropic scheme.

LITERARY NOTICES.

We have before us the prospectus of a projected reactionary journal, which is as refreshing in its frankness as (to make use of an inspired and original simile) an oasis in the desert to the thirsty traveller. "Le Cosmopolitain," anti-Socialist and anti-republican journal," to be published in London but written in French, will appear as soon as 1040 subscribers for a year of £1 each can be found to support it; and, if the fruit be as fair as its promise set forth in the prospectus, we recommend our Socialist friends who have gold to spare to pour the same before the feet of the journal's managers, for its existence will be a weekly boon and source of joy to Socialist editors. The authors of these edifying pages represent society as in a state of gibbering fear before the rapid and steady growth of Socialist feeling throughout the world, and cry that it is high time that "something" should be done to prevent a deluge. "Socialism has become everywhere a social danger, and it is to be feared that under its hurtful influence Europe will soon become prey to a formidable Jacquerie of international extent." This is a frank and encouraging admission. We quote the next piece of impudence, as interesting to the Strike Committee of the Socialist League, and we have done: "The Socialists cry aloud that above all, those on strike whose anger is not yet cooled must not be abandoned to the generous and beneficent influence of those who are even now trying to lead them back to the path of duty by showing them the dangerous trap which is opened before them in their confiding good faith." It is absolutely necessary to "defend by all legal means the existence of Conservative European governments." We congratulate our projected contemporary on the frankness of its sentiments, if not on the purity of their expression, and wish it a speedy appearance in this wicked and hypocritical world.—M. M.

FOR BOB INGERSOLL'S EYE.—"Understand me," said Col. Robert Ingersoll in a recent speech, "I am not an Anarchist, nor a Socialist, nor a Communist. I am an Individualist. I believe in the justice of man to man." Now, if the Colonel is not an Anarchistic individual, nor a Socialistic individual, nor a Communist individual, what other flag is there left for him to sail under? Answer: Pirates on the sea of Industry!—CLEGG, in John Swinton's Paper.

A lot of human beings pushing, crushing, gouging, cheating, and playing at a brutal game of cut-and-slash—that is what we are told is peace, law-and-order government and civilisation. A lot of human beings organised on a basis of unity of purpose and recognising that each and all are possessed of the same rights to a chance to develop their best inclinations, morally, physically, and intellectually—that, we are told, is war, destruction, chaos, anarchy and socialism.—Labor Enquirer.

"BLOODY-MINDED COMMUNISTS!"—Louis Blanc one day was discussing with Pierre Leroux, in the presence of several friends, the question of the moral lawfulness of war and physical resistance to oppression, and expressed the opinion that these were undoubtedly most deplorable evils, which it should be the greatest task of humanity to suppress, but to which it would be necessary to have recourse in extreme cases, so long as the causes of oppression and war are not removed. Whereupon Pierre Leroux contended that there were only two doctrines between which thoughtful men, friends of humanity, had to choose: that of Mahomet, which opposes evil by means derived, as the use of the sword, from evil itself; and that of Zoroaster, which opposes evil by good. Of these, he said, the latter was his doctrine, and the only effective one in the way of real progress. Blanc then put this case to him: "You think yourself, surely, useful to your fellow men by your writings, your ideas, your examples. Well, suppose you are in a position in which you must lose your life, or defend it against a murderous attack from some one you believe to be a monster, and whose very existence you are conscious is a curse to humanity; what would you do?" He unhesitatingly replied: "It being known that I die for my principles, I should suffer myself to be killed, thoroughly convinced that I should thus serve my cause better than in any other way." "Then your only means of opposing evil in such a case would be—" He interrupted: "Martyrdom!" Again and again these men gave earnest of their pacific nature, and yet there are no two men more vilified by the bourgeois press.—S.

A DREAM OF JOHN BALL.

"BROTHER," said John Ball, "how deemest thou of our adventure? I do not ask thee if you thinkest we are right to play the play like men, but whether playing like men we shall fail like men."

"Why dost thou ask me?" said I, "how much further than beyond this church can I see?"

"Far further," quoth he, "for I see that thou art a scholar and hast read books; and withal, in some way that I cannot name, thou knowest more than we; as though with thee the world had lived longer than with us. Hide not, therefore, what thou hast in thine heart, for I think after this night I shall see thee no more, until we meet in the heavenly fellowship."

"Friend," I said, "ask me what thou wilt; or rather ask thou the years to come to tell thee some little of their tale; and yet methinks thou thyself mayst have some deeming thereof."

He raised himself on the elbow of the stall and looked me full in the face, and said to me: "Is it so after all that thou art no man in the flesh, but art sent to me by the Master of the fellowship, and the king's son of heaven to tell me what shall be? If that be so tell me straight out, since I had some deeming hereof before, whereas thy speech is like ours and yet unlike; and thy face hath something in it which is not after the fashion of our day. And yet take heed if thou art such an one, I fear thee not, nay, nor him that sent thee; nor for thy bidding, nor for his, will I turn back from London Bridge but will press on, for I do what is meet and right."

"Nay," said I, "did I not tell thee e'en now that I knew life but not death? I am not dead; and as to who hath sent me, I say not that I am come by my own will; for I know not; yet also I know not the will that hath sent me hither; and this I say to thee, moreover, that if I know more than thou, I do far less; therefore, art thou my captain and I thy minstrel."

He sighed as one from whom a weight had been lifted, and said: "Well, then, since thou art alive on the earth and a man like myself, tell me how deemest thou of our adventure: shall we come to London and how shall we fare there?"

Said I, "What shall hinder you to come to London, and to fare there as ye will? For be sure that the fellowship in Essex shall not fail you; nor shall the Londoners who hate the king's uncles withstand you, nor hath the Court any great force to meet you in the field; ye shall cast fear and trembling into their hearts."

"Even so I thought," said he, "but afterwards what shall betide?"

Said I, "It grieves my heart to say that which I think. Yet hearken; many a man's son shall die who is now alive and happy, and if the soldiers be slain, and of them most not on the field, but by the lawyer, how shall the captains escape? Surely thou goest to thy death."

He smiled very sweetly, yet proudly, as he said: "Yea, the road is long, but the end cometh at last. Friend, many a day have I been dying; for my sister, with whom I have played and been merry in the autumn tide about the edges of the stubble fields; and we gathered the nuts and bramble-berries there, and started thence the missel-thrush, and wondered at his voice and thought him big; and the sparrow-hawk wheeled and turned over the hedges and the weasel ran across the path, and the sound of the sheep-bells came to us from the downs as we sat happy on the grass; and she is dead and gone from the earth, for she pined from famine after the years of the great sickness; and my brother was slain in the French wars, and none thanked him for dying save he that stripped him of his gear; and my unwedded wife with whom I dwelt in love after I had taken the tonsure, and all men said that she was good and fair, and true she was and lovely; she also is dead and gone from the earth, and why should I abide save for the deeds of the flesh which must be done? Truly, friend, this is but an old tale that men must die; and I will tell thee another, to wit, that they live; and I live now and shall live. Tell me then what shall befall."

I took less heed of him than I had done, and the voice that came from me was less of me as I answered: "These men are strong and valiant as any that have been or shall be, and good fellows also and kindly; but they are simple and see no great way before their own noses. The victory shall they have and shall not know what to do with it; they shall fight and overcome, because of their lack of knowledge; and because of their lack of knowledge shall they be cozened and betrayed when their captains are slain, and all shall come to nought by seeming; and the king's uncles shall prevail, that both they and the king may come to the shame that is appointed for them. And yet when the lords have vanquished, and all England lieth under them again, yet shall their victory be but fruitless; for the free men that hold unfree lands shall they not bring under the collar again, and villeinage shall slip from their hands, till there be, and not long after you are dead, but few unfree men in England; so that your lives and your deaths both shall bear fruit."

"Said I not," quoth John Ball, "that thou wert a sending from other times? Good is thy message, for the land shall be free. Tell on now."

He spoke eagerly, and I went on somewhat sadly: "The times shall better, though the king and lords shall worsen, the Gilds of Craft shall wax and become mightier; more recourse shall there be of foreign merchants. There shall be plenty in the land and not famine. Where a man now earneth two pennies he shall earn three."

"Yea," said he, "then shall those that labour become strong and stronger, and so soon shall it come about that all men shall work and none make to work, and so shall none be robbed, and at last shall men labour and live and be happy, and have the goods of the earth without money and without price."

"Yea," said I, "that shall indeed come to pass, but not yet for a while." And I sat for long without speaking, and the church grew darker as the moon waned yet more. Then I said: "Bethink thee that these men shall yet have masters over them, who have at hand many a law and custom for the behoof of masters, and being masters can make yet more laws in the same behoof; and they shall suffer poor people to thrive just so long as their thriving shall profit the mastership and no longer; and so shall it be in those days I tell of; for there shall be king and lords and knights and squires still, with servants to do their bidding, and make honest men afraid; and all these will make nothing and eat much as aforetime, and the more that is made in the land the more shall they crave."

"Yea," said he, "that wot I well, that these are of the kin of the daughters of the horse-leech; but how shall they slake their greed, seeing that as thou sayest villeinage shall be gone; belike their men shall pay them quit rents and do them service, as free men may, but all this according to law and not beyond it; so that though the workers shall be richer than they now be, the lords shall be no richer, and so all shall be on the road to being free and equal."

Said I, "Look you, friend, aforetime the lords, for the most part, held the land and all that was on it, and the men that were on it worked for them as their horses worked, and after they were fed and housed all was the lords; but in the time to come the lords shall see their men thriving on the land, and shall say once more, 'These men have more than they need, why have we not the surplus since we are their lords?' Moreover, in those days shall betide much chaffering for wares between man and man and country and country; and the lords shall note that if there were less corn and less men on their lands there would be more sheep, that is to say more wool for chaffer, and that thereof they should have abundantly more than aforetime, since all the land they own and it pays them quit-rent or service, save here and there a croft or a close of a yeoman; and all this might grow wool for them to sell to the Easterlings. Then shall England see a new thing, for whereas hitherto men have lived on the land and by it, the land shall no longer need them, but many sheep and a few shepherds shall make wool grow to be sold for money to the Easterlings, and that money shall the lords pouch; for, look you, they shall set the lawyers a-work and the strong hand moreover, and the land they shall take to themselves and their sheep, and except for these lords of land few shall be the free men that shall hold a rood of land when the word of their lord may not turn them adrift straightway."

"How mean you?" said John Ball, "shall all men be villeins again?"

"Nay," said I, "there shall be no villeins in England."

"Surely then," said he, "it shall be worse, and all men save a few shall be thralls to be bought and sold at the cross."

"Good friend," said I, "it shall not be so; all men shall be free even as ye would have it; yet, as I say, few indeed shall have so much land as they can stand upon save by buying such a grace of their masters."

"And now," said he, "I wot not what thou sayest. I know a thrall, and he is his master's every hour and never his own; and a villein I know, and whiles he is his own and whiles his lords; and I know a free man, and he is his own always; but how shall he be his own if he have nought whereby to make his livelihood? Or shall he be a thief and take from others? Then is he an outlaw. Wonderful is this thou tellest of a free man with nought whereby to live!"

"Yet so shall it be," said I, "and by such free men shall wares be made."

"Nay, that cannot be; thou art talking riddles," said he, "for how shall a wood-wright make a chest without the wood and the tools?"

Said I, "He must needs buy leave to labour of them that own all things except himself and such as himself."

"Yea, but wherewith shall he buy it?" said John Ball. "What hath he except himself?"

"With himself then shall he buy it," quoth I, "with his body and the power of labour that lieth therein; with the price of his labour shall he buy leave to labour."

"Riddles again!" said he, "how can he sell his labour for aught else but his daily bread? He must win by his labour meat and drink and clothing and housing! Can he sell his labour twice over?"

"Not so," said I, "but this shall he do belike; he shall sell himself, that is the labour that is in him, to the master that suffers him to work, and that master shall give to him from out of the wares he maketh enough to keep him alive, and to beget children and nourish them till they be old enough to be sold like himself, and the residue shall the rich man keep to himself."

John Ball laughed aloud, and said: "Well, I perceive we are not yet out of the land of riddles. The man may well do what thou sayest and live, but he may not do it and live a free man."

"Thou sayest sooth," said I.

EDITORIAL.

WITH this number there is begun a new volume of the Commonweal. For two years it has managed to appear regularly and keep before the public a consistent, unflinching exponent of International Revolutionary Socialism. Difficulties of many kinds have had to be surmounted, and in the future we may confidently look for a hardly less arduous endeavour as the price of a continued and useful existence.

During the two years that have elapsed since the Commonweal was founded the cause of Socialism has made great strides. In every country of the civilised world there is a definite, strong, and increasing Socialist party; while the influence of the untiring propaganda of its advocates is markedly shown in every popular political and social movement. From all directions come tidings of good cheer; everywhere and all the time commercialism, making desperate but futile efforts to regain its ground, contesting vainly every vantage point, is being beaten backward toward the precipice of final destruction.

In the warfare against class-rule and social wrong the Commonweal has borne and will bear its full part. Though there are signs of victory on all hands, and the end of the struggle approaches, yet no strain must be relaxed, no effort cease. Again and again have popular movements been wrecked, because at some period of promise their supporters failed in their vigilance or neglected their labour.

We call upon all men who desire to see the solution of the great problems that befront the labouring people to help us in our task. What we can do shall untiringly be done, but there exist a thousand places into which the light of Socialism has not penetrated, millions of men whom it has not reached. Everyone can help in some way to spread the light. Let each one do his best. Circulate the Commonweal, push Socialistic literature, speak a word in season and out of season for Socialism. Let pass no opportunity of helping on the overthrow of capitalism and the substitution for it of a system of united free labour and fraternal enjoyment.

COMMERCIAL COLONISATION.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE "CIVILISATION" OF JAMAICA.

WE frequently hear that emancipation, free trade, and sugar bounties have ruined Jamaica. It is affirmed, by the wolf against the lamb, that since emancipation labour is so uncertain that the estates cannot be worked to pay. To pay whom and what? An answer to that will explain matters. The estates, it is true, do not at present pay, but it is no fault of the labourers. They do not get the surplus; when they are honestly dealt with they can be depended on to work. Jamaica negroes make good navvies at Panama. The Jamaica Government experienced no difficulty in getting all the labour required for the railway and other public works, yet the planters have to get coolies imported for them from the East Indies. This pauper labour is a downright injustice to the blacks of Jamaica, and the more so because the Government levies a tax to carry on the immigration. If it were not for it the labour conditions of the island would soon undergo a change at the expense of some English capitalists. The estates are nearly all mortgaged to English capitalists and there are few resident proprietors. The management of the estates is, therefore, not what it should, or could be. It is neither vigorous nor prospective; it is always extravagant in details, and future crops are often sacrificed to a quick return policy in order to be up to time with payment to the mortgagees. The truck system in freights and estates' supplies prevails. The planters are forced to ship only in mortgagees' ships at excessive rates, and the estates' supplies purchased and shipped by the mortgagees are equally extravagant and expensive. The estates of Jamaica are like "a headless trunk bleeding at every pore." Strange, is it not, that in every country the labourer has to suffer for sins not his own? Those capitalists in England who endeavour to develop the industry of Jamaica to their own undue enrichment are doing so to the impoverishment of Jamaica and its people. These plunderers wanted the Jamaican to labour for starvation wages, and the latter was too much of a man to return to slavery; he preferred to starve or go to Colon even though he met a premature death in going. When the planters or plunderers failed to bring the Jamaican to his knees they called upon the Government to secure pauper labour and it was done. But danger again looms ahead. Twenty thousand labourers are shipped every year from Jamaica to Colon. Of this amount one-half must be deducted for those who return on friendly visits, but this stream will stop with the wind up of the Panama Canal works. These works were a God-send to the Administrators of Jamaica. But for it the labour revolution would have developed ere now into something which would have surpassed any rebellion of the past for far-reaching consequences.

The present Governor—Sir Henry Norman—recognises this, for he has had a Bill passed this year giving powers to suspend Coolie immigration at the expense of the Government. How does labour stand at present in Jamaica when so many thousands are drafted each year to Panama? At present the rate of wages, for skilled labour, per day is: bricklayers, 2s. 6d. to 3s.; blacksmiths, 3s.; joiners, 2s. to 2s. 9d.; painters, 2s.; and for unskilled labour: men, 1s. to 1s. 6d. per day; women, 9d. to 1s. per day. These figures sink much lower in value than the figures indicate, when we consider the cost of food and shoddy clothes. The price of bread is 3d. per lb.; sugar, 2d. per lb.; coffee, 5d. per quart; Indian meal, 2½d. per quart; oat meal, 6d. per lb.; butter, 1s. 6d. and 2s. per lb.; English cheese, 2s. per lb.; American cheese, 1s. 3d. per lb.; rice, 4½d. per quart; salt and fresh fish, 6d. per lb.; potatoes, 2½d. per lb.; yam, 1d. per lb. The Jamaica labourer gets two meals proper per day besides the mangos he picks up. For the first he takes yam and salt fish, and for the second for a change he takes salt fish and yam. This is an alarming fact if it be true what Mr. Espeut said in their legislative council last month. He declared, "I have noticed that people who live on roots are always lowest down in the mental and physical scale. Cereal food is what the people should produce and eat." Mr. Espeut would be a better legislator were he to inquire into the cause why the people eat roots, instead of trying to cure the effects. He is like our temperance reformers who mistake an effect for a cause. There is a more degrading thing than yams operating on the people of Jamaica, and that is the enslavement of its women. They are made to carry stones on their heads for ten or twelve hours under a tropical sun for a miserable pittance of 9d. They have to do it frequently when they are in a condition not favourable to the development of the coming race. The character of a race is the true reflex of the condition of its women. If they are degraded the result is branded on their offspring, and it is a well known fact that the poorest and most wretched countries are those in which women are made to labour most. The "ladies" and clergymen of England who advocate pit labour for women should study this phase of the question, and try to ascertain whether women's labour does not reduce men's pay so low that it compels the former to work unsuited to their strength and sex. The negroes of Jamaica are naturally not prone to discontent, and their whole disposition tends to fulfill the Scriptural injunction: "take no heed of to-morrow." The injustice and tyranny must, therefore, be great which goads them to rebellion. Even the destructive cyclone cannot for long subdue or keep them in a pessimistic vein, for they, like the Irishman, wish to "live all the days of their life," and they do not load one day with the sorrows of another.

Their climate helps to sustain this disposition, for they fear not the pinch of cold or the want of house-shelter. In fact it is very hard to get a black servant to stay in the house over night. They prefer to stay in large numbers in courts and yards where they enjoy their peculiar dances to the music of the "bashura." Quashie does not envy Buckra his wealth, but Quashie can distinguish between things that differ. He can spell Justice and Right, and he recognises that the administrators' actions do not spell the one nor the life and teachings of their clergy the other. The clergy of the English Church are, some of them, usurers and merchants besides being preachers. They trade on the poverty and ignorance of their flocks, and there are some of them who do not shrink from robbing their Lord. When the Church was disestablished the clergy had a clause inserted in the Bill to secure their salaries to the existing curates so long as they were engaged in the same occupation. This clause soon enabled many to draw double salaries, by leaving country charges—for which they continue to draw the salary although they fail to perform any service—in England. These go to the Treasury and sign receipts as curates of parishes which, so far as they are concerned, are spiritually destitute. But, with all the corruptions in the Church, the negroes have a tendency to be religious. I shall never forget the unselfishness and sympathy they infused into their hymns as they marched in hundreds on Sundays, at sunrise, singing "Ten thousand thousand are their tongues, but all their joys are one," on their way to immerse in the harbour the new members of their Church. But among these same people are the elements of a near revolution which will ere long be heard of, and whether it be a violent or peaceful one depends on the leader who may arise. The negroes of Jamaica recognise that they are really still slaves so long as the means of production are withheld from them, and although we may look upon them as benighted blacks, it is just possible we may get a lesson from them, in the immediate future when the Panama works stop, that will help to remove the chains which have so cunningly fallen on us. The coming labour dilemma in Jamaica will draw attention to an industrial system which, when the people comprehend it, they will abolish, and substitute for the reign of Imperialism and plunder the reign of justice and fraternity.

GEORGE M'LEAN.

MACHINERY AND THE WORKER.

(From a Lay Sermon by Colonel R. G. Ingersoll.)

Myriads of machines have been invented—every one of them to save labour. If these machines helped the labourer, what a blessing they would be! But the labourer does not own the machine; the machine owns him. That is the trouble. In the olden time, when I was a boy, even, you know how it was in the little towns. There was a shoemaker—two of them—a tailor or two, a blacksmith, a wheelwright. I remember just how the shops used to look. I used to go to the blacksmith shop at night, get up on the forge, and hear them talk about turning horse-shoes. Many a night have I seen the sparks fly and heard the stories that were told. There was a great deal of human nature in those days! Everybody was known. If times got hard, the poor little shoemakers made a living mending, half-soleing, straightening up the heels. The same with the blacksmith; the same with the tailor. They could get credit—they did not have to pay till the next January, and if they could not pay then they took another year, and they were happy enough. Now, one man is not a shoemaker. There is a great building—several hundred thousand dollars' worth of machinery, three or four thousand people—not a single mechanic in the whole building. One sews on straps, another greases the machines, cuts out soles, waxes threads. And what is the result? When the machines stop, three thousand men are out of employment. Credit goes. Then come want and famine, and if they happen to have a little child die, it would take them years to save enough of their earnings to pay the expense of putting away that little sacred piece of flesh. And yet, by this machinery we can produce enough to flood the world. By the inventions in agricultural machinery the United States can feed all the mouths upon the earth. There is not a thing that man uses that can not instantly be over-produced to such an extent as to become almost worthless; and yet, with all this production, with all this power to create, there are millions and millions in abject want. Granaries bursting, and famine looking into the doors of the poor! Millions of everything, and yet millions wanting everything and having substantially nothing!

Socialism welcomes all inventions, all machinery which properly tends to save labour in the production of the means of life; but they must save labour, and not merely increase competition, or give the exclusive right of wealth to profit by them.—Walter Crane.

SOME ADVICE TO BISHOPS.—Why do bishops, who won't go to theatres, accept invitations to public dinners? They had much better be seen at the representation of Lear or Macbeth than at a Lord Mayor's feast. It has an unseemly look at any time, especially in your fat bishop, and most especially when the reports of the feast in the newspapers are followed by accounts of the starving poor. If such tremendous inequalities in the social condition are not to be remedied, why mortify the sufferers? And if they are, why exasperate them? When bishops and their families grow rich, while the poor grow poorer, and when it is the rarest thing in the world to find them attending a public meeting but for selfish or corporate purposes, people naturally dislike to see them fat and feeding, especially when they come in a lump together, as at these Lord Mayor's feasts. Bishops should never appear in flocks, like vultures.—Leigh Hunt's Table-Talk.

"LAZARUS, COME FORTH!"

"LAZARUS, come forth!" Out from the gloom,
Haggard and gaunt and dazed, there came
He who had lain within the tomb
Until the Blessed One called his name;
But, in death's night, he heard the sound;
Forth to the shuddering gazers' sight
He staggered, in foul grave-clothes bound,
And breathed at last in life and light.

"Lazarus, come forth!" The people lies
With mind in bonds, with soul all dead;
Shall not Christ, through us, bid it rise?
Through us shall not His words be said?
Strong in His love—strong with the strength
He gives, shall we not, in His might,
Call forth our Lazarus at length
From its dark gloom to life and light?

TO ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

BEHOLD, four thousand years ago,
Beneath swart Egypt's sun,
Her Hebrew serfs, with want and woe,
Their bread of slavery won;
With days of scorn and scoffs and moans,
They toiled beside the Nile,
While vengeance marked their tears and groans,
Yet paused to strike awhile;
What recked their lords what Moses said?
They wisdom would not know,
Nor, till their homes were filled with dead,
Would let their bondsmen go.

Lord! Lord! to-day the millions live,
But lives as filled with pain,
And ask the rich relief to give,
And cry for help in vain;
They toil and die, for anguish born;
No help, no hope they know;
And will the high their misery scorn,
Nor sign of justice show?
How long, ye wealthy, will this last?
Wait ye, until ye know
God's time to smite comes, slow or fast,
To right the wronged and low!

W. C. BENNETT.

THE BATTLE OF TRAFALGAR SQUARE—CLASSES V. MASSES.

The shopkeepers of the West End are getting up a petition to Parliament praying for the stoppage of public meetings in Trafalgar Square. They protest that they have no designs on the right of free speech; but they protest too much. Trafalgar Square doesn't belong to the small-souled hucksters who keep shops in its neighbourhood. To this the Echo replies that all the West End shopkeepers are in favour of the petition, and that they have rights in the matter, whereas the ruffians and pickpockets have no rights. Why should ruffians and pickpockets be distinguished from shopkeepers in this fashion? It is a mere quibble; there is no distinction except the quality of their coats. And if the ill-dressed pickpockets have no right, all the more reason for their getting some. Anyhow the people of London can be trusted to insist on the right of meeting and free speech for all sorts of people and classes. Let the shopkeepers look out, however. This too-diplomatic move of theirs can be easily seen through as a first move. If meetings in Trafalgar Square can be stopped because they inconvenience the neighbouring middle-class, they will be put down elsewhere for the same bad reason. It is interesting to see how such "Radical" papers as the Echo go with the shopkeepers. The press of all shades of opinion are sure to turn against the people in these matters. The clique of toadies who have the London press under their thumb can be reckoned against the people in any struggle which involves a right worth getting or keeping. It is noteworthy also that the shopocracy have lost faith in the effectiveness of police protection. Evidently the employers of the blue-coats cannot entrust the guardians of law and order with any more arduous task than hunting poodles in Piccadilly.—J. L. M.

"Three copper-plate engravers" were regarded by Mr. George Sampson in Dickens's immortal work as "a large number." Two hundred and fifty "bankers and West-end tradesmen of influence" may also be looked upon as "a large number" of such cattle; but an ordinary citizen of no special influence may doubt whether the number is large enough to dictate to the whole of London terms on which it may express its political and social opinions, and whether or no it is preposterous impudence in them to meet for the purpose of egging on Government to attempt to close Trafalgar Square to public meetings; and an attempt in which they will undoubtedly fail.—W. M.

All men are equal: it is not birth, but virtue alone, that makes the difference. Voltaire.

The rich have no means of living but by the labour of others, as the landlord by the labour of his tenants (agricultural labourers) and the merchants and traders by the labour of the mechanics.—John Bullers.

The greatest question in the world is, how to give every man a man's share in what goes on in life. Not a pig's share, not a horse's share, not the share of a machine fed with oil, only to make it work and nothing else. It isn't a man's share just to mind your pin-making or your glass-blowing, and higgie about your own wages, and bring up your family to be ignorant sons of ignorant fathers, and no better prospect: that is a slave's share.—George Eliot.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

INTERNATIONAL UNION OF GLASS-BOTTLE MAKERS.

In connection with the strike at St. Helens, to put an end to which the employer was trying to get workmen from the Continent to replace those on strike, a deputation from the English workers has been to Denmark, Sweden, and Germany, and has succeeded in fraternally arranging matters with their Continental comrades, and the employer has been compelled to return in dudgeon from a bootless journey. As foreshadowed in the letter from there published last week, Mr. Lyon (the employer) failed completely to get any men from Gerresheim. Let those who still fail to see that it is the home competition and not the foreign workmen that is their enemy ponder well over the inducements held out by this employer to the German workers. Each of them, he said, upon arrival in Lancashire could have "anything he liked" up to £25, and be paid £2, 6s. per week for 400 bottles per day. Provisions, clothing, coals, and everything requisite for a working man's comfortable livelihood, were remarkably cheap. Best beef, mutton, etc., could be got at 6d. per pound! All they had to do was to come to England and be happy ever after! The delegates report that they met with a good reception wherever they went; that although there were a few individuals here and there who retained a tinge of national prejudice, the general impression upon their minds was that the international solidarity of the workers grows apace.

CLEVELAND IRONWORKERS.

Mr. W. Snow, secretary of the Cleveland Blast Furnacemen's Association has handed in, on behalf of the members of the association, notices signed by the men of a strike for an increase of wages. Some of the employers receiving these notices, including Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan, & Co., refused to accept the notices, on the ground that they were illegal, inasmuch as they were handed in by Mr. Snow instead of by the workmen individually.

COLLIERS' FEDERATION IN THE MIDLANDS.

On Monday a meeting of the new Colliers' Federation for the Midlands was held in Wolverhampton. Delegates attended representing ten thousand members in North and South Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and Shropshire. It was announced that the Federation was making good progress, particularly in Warwickshire and Shropshire, and confidence was expressed that it would prove of great advantage in the event of a wages agitation. Deputations were appointed to assist in settling disputes at the Pelsall Wood and Brereton collieries. It was resolved to take part in the National Conference of Miners in Birmingham on January 11.

SELF-EMPLOYMENT.

Amongst many cheering signs of a forward movement of the forces of organised labour, not the least significant is an item in the December monthly report of the Leicester Amalgamated Hosiery Union on the subject of self-employment. We commend the following words to the serious consideration of other unions:—"In conclusion, let us call your attention to an important subject, namely, self-employment. As a trade Society we ought to give this subject our best consideration; our temporary object is to keep up wages, and to make that object permanent we should endeavour to employ and work for ourselves instead of always allowing others to live out of our labour. The subject will be considered both by Executive and Council before it is brought before the Annual Meeting." If generally adopted and acted upon, such a policy would do much towards limiting the power of the capitalist, and to prepare the way for the abolition of the wage-system. It is lamentable to see the funds of the unions being doled out to the unemployed, or left in the hands of bankers to be used against the workers, instead of being utilised by the workers to enable them to become their own employers.

THE HOURS OF LABOUR IN TEXTILE FACTORIES.

On Tuesday evening, a meeting convened by the Hosiery Union was held at the Temperance Hall, Leicester, to protest against extending the hours of labour for women and children. Mr. Holmes, Secretary of Amalgamated Hosiery Union, moved the following resolution:—"That overtime for women and children is unnecessary, because the means of production and the surplus labour through the introduction of labour-saving machinery is sufficient to supply any growing demand if work is anything like fairly distributed. Secondly, the overtime asked for will not meet the objects the manufacturers have in view, because if orders are placed so late with men working overtime, they would be placed later still if women and children could work overtime too. Thirdly, it would be dangerous, because it would supersede male labour, lower wages, and bring down the standard of life. Therefore, in the opinion of the workpeople, it is unnecessary, useless, and dangerous for women and children to work overtime, and we earnestly raise our protest against the resolution passed by the Scotch and Leicester Chambers of Commerce and the Leicester Hosiery Manufacturers' Association asking for power for women and children to work overtime on any days in the year." Miss Ruth Wills seconded the resolution, which was supported by Miss Brown, from the Women's League, London, the delegate appointed in place of the late Mrs. Paterson. She spoke strongly against the proposal of the employers, and appealed earnestly to men and women to stand together in the matter, as their rights, duties, and claims were identical. The resolution was carried unanimously. A member of the Socialist League treated the question from the Socialist point of view, but his speech and presence was entirely ignored by the local press, which gave a very poor report of the meeting. The workers should refuse to support unfair and hostile papers.

FIFE MINERS.

The Glasgow Herald reports that the Fife and Clackmanan miners are pushing on a movement for the restriction of the output of coal. A delegate from them will attend the Birmingham Conference of Miners to support the movement for a seven hours' working-day or a week's holiday every quarter. This restriction of the working-day seems prompted, also, by a desire to decrease the supply of produce as much as to secure more leisure. It seems a pity that in revolutionary times a class of workers like the miners should still be shilly-shallying about terms with the capitalist. If the miners would take up the revolutionary movement they would find themselves at once on the road to a real change in their condition, and in a position to wrest better terms from the masters with less trouble. However, if the miners will thoroughly reason out their seven hour's movement they will find themselves thrust into the revolutionary path. Meanwhile, this Birmingham Conference should not be allowed to pass without getting a taste of thorough Socialist opinions.—J. L. M.

THE LONDON TRADES' COUNCIL AND GOVERNMENT RELIEF WORKS.

Now is the time for the Government and vestries to start temporary relief works if they really wish to do so or can do so. But just at the critical moment the impotence of the authorities is most glaringly shown. George Shipton, of the London Trades' Council, publishes a batch of letters in the Daily News. His own letter, a meek, mild, and roundabout effusion, laments that the Government officials have been delaying answers, answering indefinitely, and bringing all the powers of the slow torture of red-tape to shirk the question. The Government officials have, in fact, elaborately humbugged Mr. Shipton, and no one but a fool would have expected any other treatment from them. Mr. Plunkett, Lord Randolph Churchill, and Lord Rosebery ingeniously aided the humbugging process. Mr. Shipton puts forth a vague threat that the London Trades' Council is going to make it hot for the Members of Parliament who neglect the interests of the worker, and that they will no longer be ignored. But the stage thunder of the London Trades' Council is getting stale, and their valiant promises no more heeded. If they have any intention of "making it hot" for the authorities they had better sing dumb and do something.—J. L. M.

AMERICA.

NEW YORK, Dec. 23.—The employés on eleven tramway lines in Brooklyn struck to-day because the company controlling them refused to recognise the authority of the Knights of Labour in the settlement of their difficulties. Nearly 2000 men have left work. Thirty-five cars were running during the day with some old hands who refused to strike and some new men. All buildings of the company are protected by the police. There was no serious opposition by the strikers till the middle of the afternoon, when slight rioting occurred at several places. One man is reported to have been shot.

The Cooks and Pastrycooks (Acorn Association) are going to establish a free labour bureau in Sixth Avenue. It will be supported by the association, and the members will save money. The bureau will supply help of all kinds to hotels and restaurants free of charge. Only Union help will be supplied.

The question of the Ehret boycott has again been brought prominently before the working-men of this city, by the communication of Messrs. Redpath, Dr. McGlynn, and others, asking the Central Labour Union to remove it. The matter has been referred to the sections. It is doubtful whether the sections will vote to remove the boycott, and, if they did, it is a question whether any benefit would result to George Ehret. If the boycott is unjust, the working-men will see it in time; but it will be a slow process to recover what he has already lost. George Ehret is rich, and he is not suffering from hunger, nor is he going around barefooted this Christmas, nor does he see his children crying for bread,—like many a man who has been boycotted by such as him.—John Swinton's Paper.

A NATIONAL ORGANISATION OF CLOTHING CUTTERS.

The clothing cutters who have been in session in Cincinnati have completed a national organisation. Joseph H. Geis, of this city, has been elected National Secretary and Treasurer. The members of the Executive Board are: James L. Wright, Philadelphia; James Hughes, Chicago; R. M. Lovell, Cincinnati; John Lutz, Newark, N.J.; William Schroeder, Milwaukee.

THE NEW FEDERATION OF TRADES' UNIONS.

As a result of the Congress held at Columbus, Ohio, from the 7th to 10th December, twenty-five National and International Trades' Unions, with a membership of 316,782 well disciplined men, have solidified into one homogeneous body. One of the most active men in bringing about this movement was P. J. McGuire, Secretary of the Brotherhood of Carpenters. From an interesting interview with a reporter of John Swinton's Paper, we extract the following:—

Q. What is the necessity for any such organisation in view of the existence of the Order of the Knights of Labour?

McGuire. We are founded on a democratic basis, and are opposed to the centralisation of the labour movement, and its power in a few hands. We deem it safer, in view of the tremendous growth of the labour movement, to have large liberty of action for the multitudes engaged in it. No seven men, or seventy, however able, honest or experienced, are capable of directing these immense forces, in all details.

Q. What is the recognised title of the new organisation formed at Columbus?

McGuire. The American Federation of Labour.

Q. But surely you do not desire to antagonise the K. of L.?

McGuire. By no means. There is undoubtedly a necessity for the existence of that Order, inasmuch as it appeals to a large mass of men whom the Trades' Unions cannot reach. The feeling of the Convention at Columbus was that there is room for both the Knights of Labour and the Trades' Unions, as well as for a Federation of the latter; and instead of raising their hands in internecine war, they should co-operate in making united war upon their common enemies, the monopolists, the politicians, the usurers, and the legal sponges of society. There is nothing to be obtained by antagonism but damage for both parties, to the advantage of our mutual opponents.

Q. Are only Trades' Unions expected to join the Federation?

McGuire. We have made provisions for the organisation of mixed bodies of skilled and unskilled labour in localities where there are not sufficient men to form a district trade union. In the large centres, unskilled labour can also affiliate with us, and such organisations are to be known as "Federal Labour Unions," without having the forms or ceremonies of secret bodies.

In answer to other questions, McGuire stated that so far from their being any animosity towards the K. of L., most of the delegates were members of the Order, and the Committee of the K. of L. appointed to confer with the Federation parted on the most friendly terms. In conclusion, McGuire expressed his conviction that the Federation was destined to be a very powerful aggressive organisation which would put new life into the heretofore scattered unions, and furnish for them a general head through which to act in concert.

The clerks and book-keepers of Cincinnati propose forming themselves into an assembly of the Knights of Labour.

The Philadelphia cigar-makers have started a co-operative factory.

REVOLUTIONARY RUMBLINGS.

IRELAND.—Even in staid conservative Ulster the heaven works. Orange leaders are finding it necessary to disclaim any desire to take part against the tenants' movement. On the Marquis of Londonderry's Down estates, known as "the garden of Ireland," the tenants are demanding 30 per cent reduction and announce their intention of getting it. At Draperstown the tenants of the Drapers' and Skinners' companies have been discussing the Plan of Campaign and to some extent acting on it. In the other districts of Ireland the fight goes on apace, among others, it was stated by Mr. John O'Connor, M.P., that all the rents on the Kingston estate, less 20 per cent, have been paid in to trustees. The prosecution against Dillon was withdrawn on Thursday, but the money stolen by the police has not reappeared. In spite of the Government's stage thunder, the Irish party and people are undeterred in their work—rather has it stimulated them to fresh exertion. Every Socialist should watch the development in Ireland carefully.

THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE—PROPOSED PEOPLE'S MEMORIAL.

It seems certain that during the next twelve months large amounts of the wealth extracted from the brain and muscle of the useful classes of this nation will be wasted in various schemes for putting on record the gratitude of the servile classes of the community for the fifty years, culminating in widespread penury and starvation, during which Victoria Guelph has been the monarchical figure-head of the State. It has forcibly struck some of those who despise and abhor the loyalty which means servility to a costly and avaricious puppet, and the patriotism which consists in filling the pockets of the adulterating and exploiting traders of Great Britain at the expense of weaker "peoples rightly struggling to be free," that this opportunity ought not to be allowed to slip without a protest being made by the plundered head and hand workers throughout the empire. They have consequently requested John Morrison Davidson and Henry Hyde Champion to act as trustees for a fund to be raised for the purpose of establishing a permanent memorial of the opinion held by the subscribers regarding the present reign, its leading incidents and crimes, and the institution of royalty generally. Any person on forwarding two penny stamps with his or her name and address legibly written, to H. H. Champion, 13 Paternoster Row, London, E.C., will receive by return of post collecting cards and a printed envelope.

THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE AND THE "DANGEROUS CLASSES."

We are about to witness a grand rally of all the dangerous classes of the community on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee. Robber landlords, ravenous capitalists, knavish lawyers, slimy parsons, unprincipled journalists, title-hunting mayors, and working-men "leaders" (saving the mark!) of the royalty-worshipping Broadhurst-Howell-Arch-Potter-Shipton stamp, may all be expected to figure prominently in the approaching royal carnival.—Reynolds.

SOUTHPORT.—THE LATE LIFEBOAT DISASTER.

One of our Southport comrades has an eloquent letter in the Liverpool Evening Times of 21st, directed against the attempt now being made by the committee appointed to administer the fund subscribed for the families of the lifeboat men who perished lately in a heroic endeavour to do their duty. This most noble committee considers that the fund is too large to be all spent on working folk, so they mean to give only part to the rightful recipients and apply the rest to some public or charitable object. With scathing sarcasm our comrade lashes this wretched attempted job, pointing out in strong terms the injustice of it as well as the greater injustice under which these men and all their class have laboured all their lives. He incidentally quotes reliable authority to the effect that for the past twelve or eighteen months some of the toilers of the sea, who have given their lives for others, have eked out a miserable existence on 8s. or 9s. a-week, gained through very cold, laborious, and hard toil. It is stated that some of the crew in the St. Anne's boat were in such a state from privation as not to be fit to take their places in the lifeboat, and that one of them had for his food all day a basin of gruel! Yet it was these men, the hardly used and oppressed, who went out to almost certain death and met it bravely for others' sake; while the wealthy, who now grudge bread to these men's children, were cowering by their comfortable fires!—S.

"FREE" TRADE AND ADULTERATION.

The frequent accidents on scaffoldings and consequent loss of life are often due to the breaking or stretching of the tying cords of the erection. It is a fatal and reprehensible economy on the part of the contractors, who buy cheap machine-made rope of inferior hemp or jute, instead of good hemp woven by hand. Ropes are "adulterated" in many ways; to make a cheap rope of Indian or Russian hemp look like "the real thing" they are soaked in water and thus weighted to 20 per cent. When exposed to the air they heat and rot and snap. Thus are the lives of workers constantly exposed to quite unnecessary dangers.—Cri du Peuple.

SOCIALISTS IN BRUSSELS.

Dec. 27.—The Brussels Socialists, following the example of those of Ghent, have inaugurated a building for future meetings, which has been purchased by the Co-operative Bakers' Society. More than a thousand workmen marched with red flags to the building, which is styled the "People's House." It is in the Rue de Bavière, in the centre of the town, and was formerly a synagogue. The police were present in force, but there was no disturbance.

EXPULSION OF SOCIAL DEMOCRATS FROM FRANKFORT.

Dec. 26.—The Frankfurter Zeitung states that a number of Social Democrats, including Herr Sabor, a member of the Reichstag, were served with notices to-day expelling them from the district over which the minor state of siege was recently proclaimed. They are required to leave by Tuesday next.

DISCOVERY OF FRESH NIHILIST PLOTS IN RUSSIA.

The police have succeeded in discovering a largely ramified confederation of a Nihilist character amongst the workmen in the provinces of St. Petersburg, Moscow, and Vladimir, where the greatest Russian manufactories are to be found. The serious troubles which have occurred in three manufactories near St. Petersburg, and which made the intervention of considerable military forces necessary, were the first essay of that confederation. Fresh disturbances are expected in other manufactories. Numerous workmen have been arrested, but no leaders, the principal of whom seem to dwell abroad.

There have been thirteen deaths from destitution in and about London during the last few days according to the official returns. The actual number doubtless is considerably more, whilst the amount of misery which the children, the aged, and the sick poor must have suffered during such weather as there has been during the last fortnight is appalling to think of. How long will the people starve and perish miserably in the richest city of the greatest empire in the world?

Mr. Grant Allen in his "American Jottings" in the current Fortnightly, has incidentally the following direful forecast of what the tendencies of the present system will result in if left to themselves: "The whole earth will be one big dead level America, as like as two peas from end to end, dressed in the same stereotyped black coat and round felt hat, enjoying a single uniform civilisation, and looking out upon a single uniform landscape of assorted European, Asiatic, American, African, and Australian weeds, diversified here and there by the congenial architecture of railway arches, crematoriums, gasometers, Board schools, Salvation Army barracks, and main drainage works."—S.

Europe is now in a din with the rumblings of war preparations. In England the flunkey curs of the capitalist press bellow not quite so loudly as is their wont when a petty savage tribe is the enemy. Although we rule the waves, and know that one Briton is equal to so many dozen Frenchmen, or any other foreigners, we get somewhat awe-stricken at the tremendous forces being marshalled by the Continental States. Workmen should watch more closely the conduct of the middle-class. They are always furiously Jingoistic when some poor helpless barbarians object to our civilising process, but they become virtuously peaceful and diplomatically discreet when a big State like Russia crosses our path. All the time it is the hope of commercial gain or fear of similar loss that actuates them. They are never afraid of losing their skins because they never risk them. They are aware that no part of the fighting will fall to their lot. Fighting, like all other ill-paid hard work, is done by the working-men. We shall soon have a renewal of the Jingo fever, and no party to fight against it but the Socialists. The namby-pamby Peace Society will hide its meek little head, or only now and again gently urge some biblico-ethical reasons for peace and goodwill among nations. Perhaps the real antidote to the commercial war fever may turn out to be the revolutionary war-fever.—J. L. M.

"THE POSITION OF THE WORKING CLASSES."

In my article on "The Position of the Working-classes," paragraph 5, on the commercial classes, should have read as follows:—"The commercial classes numbered 980,128, from which the following will suffice. Merchants numbered in 1881, 15,936. Commercial clerks numbered 181,457, being an increase of 90 per cent. over 1871. Commercial travellers 35,478, an increase in the two years of 100 per cent. Bankers, bank clerks, etc., 16,055, increase 35 per cent. Brokers, etc., 31,208, and agents 15,068, an increase of 180 per cent. Accountants, 11,606, increase of 60 per cent. Musicians and actors, 43,896, increase of 37 per cent. Grocers, 134,397, increase 18.8 per cent. Tobacconists, 22,175, increase 34 per cent. Taking the above classes, the average increase is over 69 per cent. Here is work for the Malthusians. The increase of the whole population was only 14.5 per cent. in the ten years. Yet see the increase of the above classes, while the increase of the working-classes was only 7.3 per cent. The general increase of the population being 14.5, and the increase of the working-classes only 7.3 per cent., of itself shows an enormous increase of the non-producing classes." J. SKETCHLEY.

Notices to Members.

General Meeting.—The next General Meeting of London Members will be held on Tuesday January 4, 1887, at 8 p.m.

Library.—The librarians, May Morris and W. Chambers, attend on Mondays and Fridays from 7 to 9 p.m. A Catalogue has been printed and is now ready, price 2d. Country Branches can have parcels of books sent by paying cost of carriage.

Notice to Branches.

In future, publications not printed at the Socialist League Office will not be supplied on credit or entered in the Branch accounts with the Central Office. If such publications are ordered direct from and paid for direct to the firms which publish them, the parcels may be sent as an enclosure with the weekly parcel from the League Office, and thus save carriage.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.

Mile-end, to June 30. Birmingham, Clerkenwell, Hackney, Hull, Leeds, North London, to August 31. Croydon, Dublin, Marylebone, to September 30. Manchester, Merton, Norwich, to October 31. Bradford, to November 30. Bloomsbury, Hammersmith, Hoxton (Labour Emancipation League), Oxford, to December 31.

Children's Party and Social Gathering of Members and Friends.

A meeting as above was held at 13 Farringdon Road, on Monday 27th Dec. The children assembled at 3.30 and were entertained with tea, cake, etc. A distribution of toys from the hand of a "real live Father Christmas," magic lantern, singing of nursery rhymes, and other amusements, kept the budding Socialists merry until about 7 o'clock. After they had been safely dispatched homewards, an informal gathering of members and friends took place. Songs and readings were given by several comrades, and speeches reviewing the past and forecasting the future were made by Kropotkin and Morris. Great use was made of the opportunity for talking over matters connected with the movement by comrades whom on ordinary occasions the accursed system keeps asunder. An enjoyable evening was brought to a close by the singing of the "March of the Workers," and the "Marseillaise."

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

WORDS OF FORECAST FOR 1887.

THE war-rumours are solidifying and it cannot be denied that there is great probability of this year seeing the long-threatened war which will embrace all the nations of Europe. There have within the last few days been stories of alliance between Germany and Russia. This seems at first sight highly improbable, considering the strong race animosity between the Slav and the Teuton, and also the difficulties which dealing with Austria would offer to both the great reactionary states; because Austria, if not used as the tool of Germany against Russia, would probably in the case of a successful expedition of the two great robbers, have to submit to the doom of partition.

One thing may be noted in reference to this rumour about Russia, that it points the fact that there are two developments of the European struggle possible—the one springing from the forward impulse of Russian aggression in the East, the other from Bismarkian or German bourgeois aggression in the West.

As regards the effects of such an alliance on the popular movement. At first sight it would seem to be the most disastrous event that could cross the path of progress, meaning little less than crushing the various and often-disappointed aspirations of the nineteenth century with the weight of a new influx of the post-feudal absolutism which has survived into our epoch; but on the other hand it may be hoped that it would stir up a fresh force of resistance from all the elements which tend towards liberty, and that the struggle would develop in the proletariat a more definite consciousness of what real liberty means, so that the onrush of a mere reactionary current might be met with the rising flood of revolution, and the attempt, even if partially and temporarily successful, might inflict a mortal wound on the Bourgeois World.

In the other contingency of war beginning in the West, it is a matter of course that Germany, with what allies she can muster, would fall upon France. As was said in last week's issue, in that case Germany would probably hope for England as an ally; but obviously the best method for Germany to gain that advantage by would be to involve this country in a quarrel with Russia, which might possibly, although not necessarily, develop into direct hostility with France. It is absolutely necessary, therefore, for Socialists to watch the situation carefully and closely so as to avoid any possibility of their being dragged into a false position by the recrudescence of jingoism which is quite certain to be one result of even the advancing shadow of a European war.

It ought not be forgotten that for some time past there has been a steady attempt on the part of the bourgeois press to embitter public feeling in this country against France. If Germany attacks France, she will attack her not as the enemy who is plotting a war for the regaining of Alsace and Lorraine, but as the dangerous home of revolution—a country whose proletariat may at any moment unite actively with their brethren the German proletariat—which is the real danger to the monstrous absolutism bound together in slavery (for the time so successfully) by the ceaseless care and energy of the Prince of blood and iron.

Our readers must not think that in mentioning these matters we are merely smiting the air. It is true that a rumour published one day in the papers is discredited the next; but then as often as not it is reasserted on the day after that, and certainly the general tone of the news everywhere, joined to what Socialists must know of the economical necessities of the European states, betokens the coming of the great war, in spite of the fact that our English press has little time for the consideration of European affairs in face of the eagerness with which the public fall on tidings of the wretched intrigues and petty squabbles, party and personal, of the Tory, Unionist, and Gladstonian factions.

E. BELFORD BAX.
WILLIAM MORRIS.

PUBLIC WORKS UNDER SOCIALISM.

FOLK who do not understand Socialism, and who are therefore unable to recognise in its fulness the real significance of the economic and social revolution, sometimes imagine, and urge against the acceptance of our beliefs, that large works of public utility, such as railroads, canals, and so on, will have small or no chance of being constructed after the direct stimulus of personal and private profit has been removed. Still more impossible do they think it will be for such an enterprise to be undertaken as the embankment of a river or the building of a harbour where the immediate necessities of the men then living do not dictate it. Under Socialism all things necessary to the production of wealth will be held and possessed in common; there will be no special prerogative to one or to the other whereby he may take or claim for himself the benefit accruing from any work done for the community; private property will have perished, and with it the power of extorting a revenue from those desiring access to any of the means of life. Thus to those who are unable to project themselves in thought beyond the present system, or who, in other words, when thinking out the details of society in the future are unwittingly warped by considerations drawn wholly from that of to-day, it seems as though nothing beyond men's immediate daily, or at most monthly and yearly, necessities will be attended to when the work that should supply a want, to be pressingly felt only at some further future time, cannot be undertaken by men who may reckon upon exclusive and large profits arising from it to themselves. And again, they say, when no man possesses a large accumulated "capital" there will be none capable of entering upon any great work, even were the public conscience so fully developed that men undertook a work because it was good, and waited for no other reason. Further, it is claimed that when competition is abolished and rival contractors no longer bid in a devil's Dutch-auction for the privilege of exploiting the construction of a public work, it must of a necessity be done in an expensive, wasteful way, and the gain to the labourers engaged upon a work be a loss to the community at large.

These be objections worth considering, for that their putting forward shows at least that the objector has tried to think on the subject, sees nought repulsive in Socialism itself, and is endeavouring to reason out its ultimate effects.

To-day, when a tunnel, railroad, or canal is found to be required, a number of capitalists, large or small, are banded together to form a company—that is to say, to combine their resources and command enough money to pay for its construction. These men receive tenders from sundry contractors, each promising more work or a lesser price than his fellow. Then that one is selected who unites these two desiderata in the greatest degree, and the work is handed over to him. He, again, subdivides and contracts with other men for this and that portion of it. When it is completed and has been handed over to its "owners" they appoint a manager or superintendent, who, with a staff of employés of all kinds, does the real work of the concern, while the shareholders simply perform the helpful function of consuming its profits among them. The charges for the use of the railroad or what-not are regulated solely by what can be got out of the public without making the demand so exorbitant as to provoke competition by making it worth while for a rival shoal of sharks to struggle for the spoils.

When some part of the sea-coast is being eaten away, or a river overflows its banks frequently, causing a constant loss or inconvenience to the community, recourse is again had to the capitalist. Whatever public body it is that must see to the construction of the sea-wall or river-embankment, borrows money from whoso will lend it at interest, and therewith sets to work in the same way as above described. This money, with the interest agreed upon, is afterwards repaid to the lenders from the labour of the community.

Now what is done in all these cases is this: A certain thing, be it a building, railroad, canal, or sea-wall, is seen to be required by the community. It is estimated that so much labour will be required for its construction, such and such tools and plant to render the labour effective, and an ascertainable amount of food, clothing, housing, and so on for the labourers. The tools and plant are simply the embodiment of stored-up labour, and the food and so on produced while the work is proceeding, and furnished to those employed upon it, must be paid for from some other store of past labour. The "capital" then that is expended upon any public work or improvement is the past labour of the community, which has not been needed for present consumption, and has been stored in enduring form for future requirements. It is a mere accident, and belongs only to the present system, that this stored-up labour should rest in private hands, and be under individual control as to the direction in which it may be utilised. Accumulation of labour-products will not cease with commercialism. ~~That each man upon the average, working in association, and with the improved means of labour, produces far more than he consumes is quite certain. So much more does he produce that even with the enormous number of non-producers who consume without replacing, there is a greater and greater accumulation of the stored-up labour ready to be diverted in any direction where it is needed.~~ Under Socialism, where each would produce as well as consume, the accumulation would be enormously magnified, but the resultant mass of wealth would be held socially for common objects, and no longer individually for personal profit.

It is true that the capitalist is always on the alert to supply a need of the community as it arises, and this because it is his control over the supplying of social needs that gives him his power of profit-making, but it is hardly likely that the community, in the days when the interest of all is the interest of each, will be less alive to its own interests, rather more so, one would think, after it has been so aroused to them as to shake itself free from the incubus of class-rule and monopoly-restriction.

When it is the community itself which looks after its own service, it will most surely be better served than it is now. If our objecting friends will take the trouble to consider that what the capitalist cares for is not the satisfaction of a need, but the doing it so that he can make profit out of the transaction, they will readily see that the energy employed will be utilised more effectively toward the real end of work—the benefit of the community. Again, when a large work has been completed, the effect is a saving of labour or time. Whether it be an improvement in the means of production or distribution, it saves something to the community; under the present system this goes as increased revenue to the monopoly-class, and in no way helps the proletariat. Under Socialism the economised labour would go to the community's coffers, and be available to still further swell the resources always accumulating from its surplus production. When any special work was seen to be needed, Society would set aside an adequate amount of "capital" for the purpose of its completion. For its expenditure it would have an equivalent in the finished work, and all the "profit" from it, nor would it be compelled to pay tribute to any man for its use.

It is notorious that contract-performance does not mean any guarantee as to efficiency for the intended purpose of a work. It means only that enough efficiency for use is given it to ensure its profit-bearing capacities, and this at as small a cost as possible. It means that the proletariat is exploited in all directions, that everywhere the screw is given one more remorseless turn, in order to secure to the capitalists their pound of flesh. Society, managing its own affairs, recognising its own needs, will satisfy them with just the requisite expenditure of labour. It will be to the interest of every individual to try for the greatest return for least exertion; in order to do this it is not the mere economy of labour in the construction of a work that will be looked after, but also its most effective embodiment. In those days the pressure of circumstances will be against all bad or transitory work, because the people will quickly see that work well done is once done, but badly done is never finished, needing constant care and much waste of labour in mending and keeping up.

Nor need it be feared that the "enterprising capitalist," or rather he who would be that now, will be less enterprising although not a capitalist. To every one the outcome of moderate exertion will be a comfortable livelihood: everything that saves labour or time anywhere will benefit all. Each man finds it easier to work in the direction his special powers impel, and the good organiser will have a far more enjoyable berth when he is organising labour, and no longer only plunder or chicanery. Each man's energy devoted to his own welfare in that of Society; every precaution against waste and for utility; these things will follow the Revolution, and render life and work alike wholly pleasant and to be desired.

H. HALLIDAY SPARLING.

THE WORKHOUSE; OR, JOHN POORMAN'S REST.

In reading the sad annals of the poor you must always bear in mind the cardinal fact that the bread of life of the profit-making classes is an abundant supply of cheap labour. This explains the successful attempt made in 1662—only 61 years after the passage of the original Act—to reduce the workers to virtual slavery. The original Act made persons who became paupers chargeable on the parish in which they were born, the second required that persons removing to a new parish might be sent back to their own place of settlement unless they gave security against becoming chargeable. Mr. Fowle, in his hand-book on the Poor Law, says: "By this Act, it may with truth be said, that the iron of slavery entered into the soul of the English labourer and made him cling to his parish as a shipwrecked sailor to his raft. From the very first it was the fruitful parent of fraud, injustice, expenditure, ill-will, and endless litigation."

Having thus tied the labourer to their acres as securely as a Russian serf or a Virginian slave, the Solons of the State next hit on the device of making the ratepayers at large contribute his maintenance. "The public funds were regarded as a regular part of the maintenance of the labouring people engaged in agriculture." "The able bodied pauper was obliged to live where the law of settlement placed him, to receive the income which the neighbouring magistrate thought sufficient, to work for the master and in the way which the parish authorities prescribed, and very often to marry the wife they found for him."

The following figures exhibit the progress of the cost of pauper relief in England and Wales to the close of this period: In 1688, 2s. 6d. per head on the population; 1784, after end of American war, 5s.; 1803, 8s. 10d.; 1818, after Waterloo, 13s. 3d.; 1832, Reform Bill, 10s. The Reform Bill of 1832 was followed by the Reform of the Poor Law in 1834 when the scheme under which we live, pay, and die was adopted. There has been much fine writing about the willingness of the new Parliament to be guided by economic science. Much more light on the subject may be attained by careful consideration of the fact that the balance of power had passed from the agricultural to the manufacturing exploiters of labour, and that cheap workers were required in the towns rather than in the fields. Hence, for instance, the freedom to the migration of labourers given in the new law.

The effects and defects of the old system and the principles and objects of the new are set forth in the Poor Law Commissioners First Report of 1834, a document altogether the most valuable of all the many publications connected with Poor Law controversy, when the reader has independence enough to remember that what is written is not Scripture.

The new proposals were fiercely denounced by Fielden, Richard Oastler, the Rev. J. Stephens, and the Chartist leaders generally, but they were adopted by large majorities in both Houses of Parliament. What the law is, what it seeks to accomplish, and what are its effects upon the worker I can best tell you by relating the several stages that mark the life of the applicant for relief from the time of his first application to the relieving officer to the end when the workhouse hearse "rattles his bones over the stones," and he is laid in an unmarked grave in "sure and certain hope of a resurrection to eternal life."

Before doing so, however, I will first, in order to get them out of the way, give the statistics of pauperism and its cost in the last year. The total number of paupers in receipt of relief on January 1, 1886, in the 647 unions and parishes under separate boards of guardians in England and Wales, was 813,173; of this number 199,641 were indoor and 613,532 outdoor paupers. The population of England and Wales, as estimated by the Registrar General, was 27,499,041 in the middle of the year 1885. Taking this as the basis of the calculation, the paupers relieved on January 1, 1886, amounted to one out of every 34 persons, or 3.0 per cent. of the population. The various tables given in the returns show that there was an increase in the number of paupers relieved on January 1, 1886, as compared with the same day in 1885, in every division of England and Wales except the northern. The largest increase took place in the north-western division, comprising Cheshire and Lancashire, where it amounted to 11.2 per cent.

The following figures show the economic results of the new law and complete the statistics already given on the same subject. In 1835—first complete year of the new law—the cost of poor relief per head of the population was 7s. 7d.; in 1837 it fell to 5s. 5d.; in 1848 it rose to 7s. 2d.; in 1852 it fell to 5s. 5½d.; this year it is about 6s. 4d.

In considering these figures it should be born in mind that the high rates previously quoted refer to years when the price of all the necessities of life was very high, and when the allowance to the poor was very liberal; while to-day the necessities of life are very low, and the allowance given is very niggardly.

And now to my story. John Poorman, finding himself unable to get work, applies for relief. If he lives in East London he is promptly told that the economists and the philanthropic clergy have come to the conclusion that out-door relief is demoralising, and that he must come into the house. In that case it is possible that he may refuse to do so, and become the hero of a story like this—a story told a hundred times a-year of men and women in whom the sturdy spirit of England's golden age still lives:

"Mr. William Carter held an inquest yesterday at Bermondsey as to the death of Maria Osborne, aged 57, the wife of a labourer, and lately residing at 24 Maltby Street, Bermondsey, who died on Sunday last. John Osborne stated that deceased was his wife. He had been out of work for a long time, but had had occasional employment in the parish yard breaking stones, but he had been shut out of the yard for the past fortnight. He and his wife became in a starving condition, and on Monday last the deceased obtained employment at a pickle factory, for which she was paid 6d. or 7d. per day. She continued to work until the following Thursday, when she was taken ill, and came home, unable to work any longer. On Friday she kept to her bed, and appeared worse, and declined to have medical assistance. On that day they only had a small piece of fried fish and a piece of bread, and his wife could not eat hers. The next day she appeared weaker. There was not a particle of food in the room which they occupied, and witness, having purchased a halfpenny's worth of milk with his last coin, went for a doctor, and Mr. Wightwick came about two o'clock in the afternoon, and prescribed medicine for her, and gave an order for parish relief. It was too late to go to the relieving officer that day, and his wife died about eight o'clock on Sunday morning. In further reply to questions by the coroner and jury, the witness said that he and his wife had been in want of food for two years. He had tried lately to get work by breaking stones to get a loaf, but could not. He was 58 years old. He had not applied for relief, as, if he had, he would not have got it, for they (meaning the officials) would want them to go into the 'House,' and he and his wife had an objection to it. Mr. F. P. Wightwick, a surgeon in practice at Horselydown, gave evidence showing that the woman had died from actual starvation, that the immediate cause was exhaustion arising from the diseased condition of the kidneys and the continual want of sufficient and proper food. The jury returned a verdict in accordance with the medical gentleman's opinion."—Standard, Wednesday September 15, 1886.

If John Poorman lives in a district where some out-door relief is given, he is questioned minutely as to his circumstances. Unless he is really destitute—that is, has sold or pawned every article of furniture and apparel not absolutely necessary to existence—relief will be refused. Possibly John Poorman resolves to stay out a little longer, and goes on tramp to see if anything will turn up. Any day you may see two long processions on the road between Preston and Blackburn moving on in that Micawber hope—one going to Preston from Blackburn, the other from Preston to Blackburn, to seek work where no work is, because it would profit the worker only. The inevitable result of such a pilgrimage is that sooner or later the tramp and vagrant finds himself without the pence needed to pay for a night's lodging. If he knows the law—and the law supposes every Englishman to enjoy its acquaintance—he knows that the penalty of sleeping in any barn or outbuilding, under a haystack or hedgerow, or in a field or on a common—in which he might be thought to have some common-right—is imprisonment as a vagabond. He is thus driven to go to the tramp-ward of the nearest workhouse. On arrival there he finds that the old notion that an English worker sins when he moves out of his parish is still lively. The tramp is the black sheep the Poor Law especially detests and the Local Government Board seeks to exterminate. In 1881 the average number of this class was 6979, and Parliament passed the following brief Bill in the hope of extinguishing him:

"4. Section five of the Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871, is hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is hereby enacted as follows: A casual pauper shall not be entitled to discharge himself from a casual ward before nine o'clock in the morning of the second day following his admission, nor before he has performed the work prescribed for him as in the said Act mentioned; and where a casual pauper has been admitted on more than one occasion during one month into any casual ward of the same union, he shall not be entitled to discharge himself before nine o'clock in the morning of the fourth day after his admission, and he may at any time during that interval be removed by any officer of the guardians, or by a police constable, to the workhouse of the union, and be required to remain in such workhouse for the remainder of the period of his detention. Provided that in computing the number of days during which a casual pauper may be detained under this section Sunday shall not be included."

The effect of this Act has been to reduce the number of vagrants in 1884 to 4,096. Thus, if John Poorman goes in on Saturday night he is a prisoner until nine o'clock on Tuesday morning. His dietary is worse than that given to the vilest convicted criminal, and often he is required to do his work in solitary confinement.

Satisfied with three day's imprisonment, John Poorman returns to his own parish, again visits the relieving officer, and accepts an invitation to see the Guardians. As soon as he enjoys this high honour he discovers that they are mis-named Guardians of the Poor, and that their proper title is Custodians of the Rates. Various Boards adopt various rules as to outdoor relief. When given it amounts to from 2s. to 3s. per week mostly given in kind, that is in bread—often of poor quality and short weight—and groceries open to the same suspicion (I am now referring to no union or person in particular, but have in mind the complaints often reported in various newspapers. I have collected some of these, but have no space to quote them). The whole tendency of the system constantly fostered by the Local Government Board is towards the abolition of outdoor relief, the ideal of Sydney Smith and other promoters of the new poor law. This is fully shown by the fact that in 1874 the number of outdoor paupers was 683,739, falling in 1884 to 585,068, while the number of indoor paupers, which in 1874 was 143,707, rose in 1884 to 180,846. These figures show the real cause of the alleged diminution of pauperism to be the increased severity of the house test. On this point Mr. Hoyle's testimony given on page 151 of 'Our National Drink Bill,' deserves attention: "In 1871, a change took place in the system of giving relief. Orders were sent from the Central Board in London to apply more rigorously the workhouse test; and in regard to able-bodied paupers, both in the house and out of it, to apply the stone-breaking and other tests. The Poor Law inspectors visited Boards of Guardians to press these points upon them. County Conferences were held to ensure united action. I am not here writing off the book, for I was myself a Poor-law Guardian in Bury for the ten years from 1870 to 1880, and witnessed the whole of the proceedings, and on more than one occasion I felt compelled to raise my voice against the harshness of some of the proceedings." The Local Government Board, in its Annual Report for 1884-5, at page 17 says: "This decrease is wholly due to a falling off in the number of adult able-bodied persons receiving outdoor relief, the mean number of indoor paupers who were adult and able-bodied being larger in 1884 than in 1874."

The Pall Mall Gazette has been sending to Madame de Novikoff to ask whether it is true, as is generally supposed, that the Czar of all the Russias has been driven out of his senses by that very human but not very dignified passion, terror. Everybody outside the Pall Mall supposes Madame de Novikoff to be a Russian political agent. The Pall Mall's proceeding, therefore, is, to say the least of it, grotesque. It is much as if he had sent to the devil's varlet to ask the truth about those awkward rumours of hoofs and horns, and those rumoured strange views of his majesty's about the welfare of the human race. The varlet, as in duty bound, replies that it is all a foul lie; that his Satanic Majesty has ten toes like other people, and is a prince of well-known benevolence. Of course the public is satisfied with this answer!—W. M.

SELF-HELP.

(ANON. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

"HERE, Common Folk, a bone! Catch! Hold it tight,
And gnaw and worry it with all your might.
'Self-help' the thing is called; and, credit me,
'Tis that alone will your salvation be."

So cries a certain rascal knave to you;
Then straight make answer, "This thing I will do:
I'll gnaw—for your plan tallies with my own—
But you yourself, you hound, shall be the bone."

"I'll 'help myself' from you; but first I'll tear
From off your face the mask of lies you wear,
And keep the thing for ever for a show,
With whips and screws and instruments of woe."

"And next I'll hurl upon the rubbish-heap
The cradle that has lulled me long to sleep;
And warming to my work when I've begun,
I'll help myself in far more ways than one."

"For when I've set your tyranny aside,
I'll seek that monstrous monument of pride,
That makes the soul of free-born man its slave,
The high-throned Church, thought's thousand-year-old grave"

"One word is strong to lay its ramparts low,
Like trump that cracked the walls of Jericho:
Yea, Knowledge all its wonders shall contemn,
And work new wonders by o'erthrowing them."

"In righteous wrath with my resistless hand,
I grasp the pillars that to prop it stand;
And shake and snap them with a giant's strength,
Whose thousand-year-old bonds are loosed at length."

"And 'Hallelujah!' with a deafening din
I shout, as idols and their shrines crash in:
While through the crash a voice of jubilee
Cries, 'Reason, prisoned ages long, is free.'"

"The cross is made my weapon; from the shrine
I hunt the Priests with their own sacred sign:
Now since nigh nineteen centuries of pain
Is he that hangs there first made glad again."

"A surer sign of victory I bear,
A banner red—but 'Peace' is written there:
Peace is the sign that tyranny shall cease;
Yea, Revolution's self is nought but peace."

"The earth is rocked and shaken; marching come
Freedom's battalions to the tuck of drum,
And burst the barriers in her path that stood,
Break down all evil, and build up all good."

"The plough, that chain that bound me to my lord,
I'll forge afresh into a two-edged sword:
The means men's cruel craft has used so long
To crush me down shall yet avenge my wrong."

"On march the hosts with Freedom's flag unfurled,
Like storm, from pest that purifies the world;
Break Pride's defences; tread the traitors down;
Pluck off and trample on the tyrant's crown."

"The earth rejoices in the rising sun;
A gladdened world gives thanks for freedom won;
Oppression's yoke lies broken at our feet—
'Self-help' with ringing cheers we all will greet."

The party of Labour is not an outburst of passion; it is the result deep causes, working by and through social evolution.

Edward Atkinson, the economist of slops and scraps, is very much afflicted by the waste of food in cooking. We are a great deal more affected by the waste of life in production and want of justice in distribution.

England is vigorously prosecuting the work of building railroads in India. As usual, her enterprise is inspired by the highest considerations of philanthropy, and exclusively designed to prevent the recurrence of famine among the Hindoos. But it may, incidentally, enable Great Britain to obtain from the East all the wheat she needs at lower prices than she is paying to our farmers; in which case India may yet starve, notwithstanding the railways, as Ireland is occasionally doing, while philanthropic John Bull eats her potatoes.—The (N. Y.) Leader.

STRANGE INDEED!—The following extract is from an Essay of Montaigne (b. 1533), translated by Florio, chap. 30. Montaigne is writing about the North-American Indians:—"Three of that nation, ignorant how deare the knowledge of our corruptions will one day cost their repose, securitie, and happinesse, and how their ruine shall proceed from this commerce, were at Rouen in the time of our late king, Charles IX., who talked with them a great while. They were shewed our fashions, our pompe, and the forme of a faire citie; afterwards, some demanded their advice, and would needs know of them what things of note and admirable they had observed amongst us: they answered three things, the last of which I have forgotten, and am very sorie for it; the other two I yet remember. They said: 'First, they found it very strange that so many tall men, with long beards, strong and well armed as it were about the king's person, would submit themselves to obey a beardless childe, and that we did not rather chuse one amongst them to command the rest. Secondly, they had perceived there were men amongst us full-gorged with all sortes of commodities, and others which, hunger-starved and bare with neede and povertie, begged at their gates: and found it strange these men so needie could endure such an injustice, and that they took not the others by the throate, or set fire on their houses.'"

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

PROF. SIDGWICK AND POLITICAL ECONOMY.

AN article entitled "Economic Socialism" contributed by Professor Sidgwick to the Contemporary Review some time ago should not be allowed to pass without a little Socialistic criticism. It is satisfactory that in its orthodox "political economy" has been dealt a very severe blow. This portentous science has, in fact, been condemned out of its own mouth. If Professor Sidgwick's account of its aims is a trustworthy one, it appears to have no raison d'être as a science. Indeed, as far as the workers are concerned, it seems to be "good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men." The professor states explicitly that political economy is primarily concerned with the production of wealth; that it seeks to show that wealth tends to be produced most amply and economically in a society where government leaves industry alone; and that it subordinates conditions of physical or moral wellbeing to considerations of wealth. He says that political economy is only indirectly concerned with the distribution of wealth, and does not aim at showing that wealth tends to be distributed among the different individuals who have co-operated in producing it in strict accordance with their respective merits. He adds also that when Ricardo talked of "natural wages" he had no intention of stamping the share of produce so designated as divinely ordered and therefore just.

Now the question which naturally arises after reading this exposition is: Of what good to the people can a science be which treats only of the production of wealth and advocates that system in which wealth can be produced most amply and economically, no matter how wretched morally or physically the people, the wealth-producers, may be in consequence of it? A science like this, openly professing disregard of all moral considerations, can surely be of no earthly interest or benefit to any save the comparative few who control both the wealth and the wealth-producers, and who wield it as a merciless weapon against the disinherited. That it is antagonistic to the good of the people is borne out by the damaging statement made by the same writer that it is beyond the scope of political economy to protest against a needle-grinder being worked to death in a dozen years, if it paid, and that this science (to disobey whose "laws" it is, forsooth, regarded as in the highest degree impious by the "educated" classes) must necessarily have justified the action of those sugar-planters who worked their slaves to death in six or eight years, because it paid. What are we to think of the morality of those who walk by the light of "laws" which sanction such revolting brutalities as these?

But let us glance at "the vast fabric of modern industry" which charms the professor by its "very impressive approximation to the economic ideal," and see if its wealth is produced as amply and economically as might reasonably be expected from the transports of the students of the dismal science. In the Century Magazine a month or two ago Professor Ely wrote that "the needless waste of railway competition [in America] has been sufficient to provide good, comfortable houses—a whole house to a family—for that part of the entire population of the United States not already provided with such houses. The first item in the count is needless expenditure in railway construction. This has been estimated at one thousand million of dollars, and it is certainly a low estimate, for two needless railways, the West Shore and the Nickel Plate, alone count for one-fifth of this sum. It must be borne in mind that needless expenditure is waste of national resources which ought to have benefited the people. This is very simple, yet it is often necessary to repeat it. Now one thousand million of dollars is a sum sufficient to build houses for one million families or five million people." It is undeniable that, as Ely seems to maintain, this sum of one thousand million of dollars needlessly expended cannot be termed wealth in the true sense of the word, since every want of the American people which railways supply would have been met with no further expenditure of labour had this enormous sum been consigned to the depths of the sea. Consequently it seems reasonable to require that all waste, of which the above is an illustration, should be computed and deducted from the total wealth of a country as estimated by political economists, in order that the amount of its real wealth may be arrived at. Without doubt the result would show that in the existing order of things wealth proper is much less amply produced than a superficial observer would suppose and political economists would have us believe.

Moreover, we find on close examination that the vaunted economy in the production of wealth in the present system is also at variance with hard facts. We shall quote Professor Ely again, keeping in mind that railways are factors in the production of wealth just as much as workshops and factories: "Every needless train is a waste, and parallel and competing roads necessitate a vast number of them daily. Our railways have not been planned according to any intelligent scheme, so that they should become part of one grand system of means of communication and transportation, supplementing our natural and artificial water-ways and other highways. On the contrary they were often designed to injure other public highways and are still managed with that view. Railways run along by the side of canals and drive them out of existence. At times they buy the canal, and stop using it lest it should longer render service to anybody. The Richmond and Alleghany Railroad is an example. Here is a great waste of resources expended in canals. Railways prevent the use of natural water-ways. Thus the Pennsylvania railroad and the Pacific railways discriminate against those who use the Ohio River and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans respectively. These are examples of a waste of Nature's bounty. Freight rates are often so much cheaper between competing points than from an intermediate point, that freight frequently passes twice over the same track—a waste of labour and capital. Freight is thus sent from Pittsburgh to Philadelphia, New York, and then right back through Pittsburgh to a western point, so as to get the competition rate from one of the large cities. Freight has likewise been sent from Rochester, New York, to New York City, then back again over the same tracks through Rochester to the West. Last winter, freight was sent from Baltimore to New York, then back through Baltimore to the West. These examples might be multiplied indefinitely." But this long story of waste of wealth and want of economy in the production of it is devoted to one industry only, the carrying trade. Any person of average experience can point out numerous cases of shameful extravagance of a similar kind in nearly every branch of industry. No small item, too, is the waste of labour implied in the enforced idleness of the great army of unemployed and half-timers.

Political economists will, of course, retort that Government interference would only aggravate the evil. But this is sufficiently disproved by the striking fact that the control of the German railways lately acquired by the State has been entirely satisfactory. So much so, that according to Ely the Frankfort "Gazette" was able to state in 1885 that there was not one of the Manchester School to be found in Germany who desired a return to private railways, while business men were gratified by the stability, impartiality, and publicity of railway charges. To do Professor Sidgwick justice, however, the Government interference he refers to seems to partake only of the nature of paternal legislation or piece-meal Socialism, which is of course as far removed from Socialism proper as darkness is from light. If those of our opponents who give evidence of their inability to distinguish true modern Socialism from the quack remedies commonly called Socialistic, were to study the question, and if political economists were to take as much trouble to think themselves into the Socialistic ideal as into the "economic ideal," they would find that under Socialism the motives to "energetic self-help" would be less impaired than in existing Society, that private initiative would have even greater scope than at present, and that above all the production and distribution of wealth would be managed in the most efficient and economical manner with due regard to the moral and physical welfare of the people.

J. H. SMITH.

A DREAM OF JOHN BALL.

HE held his peace awhile, and then he said: "But no man selleth himself and his children into thralldom uncompeled; nor is any fool so great a fool as willingly to take the name of freeman and the life of a thrall as payment for the very life of a freeman. Now would I ask thee somewhat else; and I am the readier to do so since I perceive that thou art a wondrous seer; for surely no man could of his own wit have imagined a tale of such follies as thou hast told me. Now well I wot that men having once shaken themselves clear of the burden of villeinage, as thou sayest we shall do (and I bless thee for the word), shall never bow down to this worsen tyranny without sore strife in the world; and surely so sore shall it be, before our valiant sons give way, that maids and little lads shall take the sword and the spear, and in many a field men's blood and not water shall turn the grist mills of England. But when all this is over, and the tyranny is established, because there are but few men in the land after the great war, how shall it be with you then? Will there not be many soldiers and sergeants and few workers? Surely in every parish ye shall have the constables to see that the men work; and they shall be saying every day, 'Such an one, hast thou yet sold thyself for this day or this week or this year? Go to now, and get thy bargain done, or it shall be the worse for thee.' And wheresoever work is going on there shall be constables again, and those that labour shall labour under the whip like the Hebrews in the land of Egypt. And every man that may, will steal as a dog snatches at a bone; and there again shall ye need more soldiers and more constables till the land is eaten up by them; nor shall the lords and the masters even be able to bear the burden of it; nor will their gains be so great, since that which each man may do in a day is not right great when all is said."

"Friend," said I, "from thine own valiancy and high heart thou speakest, when thou sayest that they who fall under this tyranny shall fight to the death against it. Wars indeed there shall be in the world great and grievous, and yet few on this score; rather shall men fight as they have been fighting in France at the bidding of some lord of the manor, or some king, or at last at the bidding of some usurer and forestaller of the market. Valiant men, forsooth, shall arise in the beginning of these evil times, but though they shall die as ye shall, yet shall not their deaths be fruitful as yours shall be; because ye, forsooth, are fighting against villeinage which is waning, but they shall fight against usury which is waxing. And, moreover, I have been telling thee how it shall be when the measure of the time is full; and we, looking at these things from afar, can see them as they are indeed; but they who live at the beginning of those times and amidst them, shall not know what is doing around them; they shall indeed feel the plague and yet know not the remedy; by little and by little they shall fall from their better livelihood, and weak and helpless shall they grow, and have no might to withstand the evil of this tyranny; and then again when the times mend somewhat and they have but a little more ease, then shall it be to them like the kingdom of heaven, and they shall have no will to withstand any tyranny, but shall think themselves happy that they be pinched somewhat less. Also whereas thou sayest that there shall be for ever constables and sergeants going to and fro to drive men to work, and that they will not work save under the lash, thou art wrong and it shall not be so; for there shall ever be more workers than the masters may set to work, so that men shall strive eagerly for leave to work, and when one says I will sell my hours at such and such a price, then another will say, and I for so much less; so that never shall the lords lack slaves willing to work, but often the slaves shall lack lords to buy them."

"Thou tellest marvels indeed," said he; "but how then if all the churls work not, shall there not be famine and lack of wares?"

"Famine enough," said I, "yet not from lack of wares; it shall be clean contrary. What wilt thou say when I tell thee that in the latter days there shall be such traffic and such speedy travel across the seas that most wares shall be good cheap, and bread of all things the cheapest."

Quoth he: "I should say that then there would be better livelihood for men, for in times of plenty it is well; for then men eat that which their own hands have harvested, and need not to spend of their substance in buying of others. Truly, it is well for honest men, but not so well for forestallers and regraters¹; but who heeds what befalls such foul swine, who filch the money from people's purses, and do not one hair's turn of work to help them."

"Yea, friend," I said, "but in those latter days all power shall be in the hands of these foul swine, and they shall be the rulers of all; therefore, hearken, for I tell thee that times of plenty shall in those days be the times of famine, and all shall pray for the prices of wares to rise, so that the forestallers and regraters may thrive, and that some of their well-doing may overflow on to those on whom they live."

"I am weary of thy riddles," he said. "Yet at least I hope that there may be fewer and fewer folk in the land; as may well be, if life is then so foul and wretched."

"Alas, poor man!" I said; "nor mayst thou imagine how foul and wretched it may be for many of the folk: and yet I tell thee that men shall increase and multiply, till where there is one man in the land now there shall be twenty in those days—yea, in some places ten times twenty."

"I have but little heart to ask thee more questions," said he; "and when thou answerest, thy words are plain, but the things they tell of I may scarce understand. But tell me this: in those days will men deem that so it must be for ever, as great men even now tell us of our ills, or will they think of some remedy?"

I looked about me. There was but a glimmer of light in the church now but what there was, was no longer the strange light of the moon, but the first coming of the kindly day.

"Yea," said John Ball, "'tis the twilight of the dawn. God and St. Christopher send us a good day!"

"John Ball," said I, "I have told thee that thy death will bring about that which thy life has striven for: thinkest thou that the thing which thou strivest for is worth the labour? or dost thou believe in the tale I have told thee in the days to come?"

He said: "I tell thee once again that I trust thee for a seer; because no man could make up such a tale as thou; the things which thou tellest are too wonderful for a minstrel, the tale too grievous. And whereas thou askest as to whether I count my labour lost, I say nay, if so be in those latter times (and worsen than ours they will be) men yet seek a remedy: therefore again I ask thee is it so that they shall?"

"Yea," said I, "and their remedy shall be the same as thine, although the days be different: for if the folk be enthralled, what remedy save that they be set free? and if they have tried many roads towards freedom, and found that they led nowhither, then shall they try yet another. Yet in the days to come they shall be slothful to try it, because their masters shall be so much mightier than thine, that they shall not need to show the high hand, and until the days get to their evildest, men shall be cozened into thinking that it is of their own free will that they must needs buy leave to labour by pawning their labour that is to be. Moreover your lords and masters seem very mighty to you, each one of them, and so they are, but they are few; and the masters of the days to come shall not each one of them seem very mighty to the men of those days, but they shall be very many, and they shall be of one intent in these matters without knowing it; like as one sees the oars of a galley when the rowers are hidden, that rise and fall as it were with one will."

"And yet," he said, "shall it not be the same with those that these men devour; shall not they also have one will?"

"Friend," I said, "they shall have the will to live, as the wretchedest thing living has: therefore shall they sell themselves that they may live, as I told thee; and their hard need shall be their lord's easy livelihood, and because of it he shall sleep without fear, since their need compelleth them not to loiter by the way to lament with friend or brother that they are pinched in their servitude or to devise means for ending it. And yet indeed thou sayest it: they also shall have one will if they but knew it; and for a long while they shall have but a glimmer of knowledge of it: yet doubt it not that in the end they shall come to know it clearly, and then shall they bring about the remedy; and in those days shall it be seen that thou hast not wrought for nothing, because thou hast seen beforehand what the remedy should be, even as those of later days have seen it."

We both sat silent a little while. The twilight was gaining on the night, though slowly. I looked at the poppy which I still held in my hand, and bethought me of Will Green, and said: "Lo, how the light is spreading: now must I get back to Will Green's house as I promised."

"Go, then," said he, "if thou wilt. Yet meseems before long he shall come to us; and then mayst thou sleep among the trees on the green grass till the sun is high, for the host shall not be on foot very early; and sweet it is to sleep in shadow by the sun in the full morning when one has been awake and troubled through the night-tide."

"Yet I will go now," said I; "I bid thee good-night."

Therewith I half rose up; but as I did so the will to depart left me, as though I had never had it, and I sat down again, and heard the voice of John Ball, at first as one speaking from far away, but little by little growing nearer, more familiar to me, and as if once more it were coming from the man himself whom I had got to know.

The animus of the "class" press is plainly shown by the head lines they place over labour news, dispatches, and reports. They exhibit in this way also the real bent of their thinking, for they never fail to treat a labour item in any other way than as a thing apart from that which concerns them. The "class" newspapers have an attitude of their own, and it is always actively or negatively hostile to the interests of Labour.—The Leader.

In a fatuously futile editorial, the Artist, a "journal of home culture," reviews the past year, and gives gratuitous advice to all and sundry as to the good or evil they have done or may do to "Art" by this or that course of action. The advice is conveyed in platitudinous periods of studied ambiguity, and may mean or not mean all or anything as one's fancy dictates, but any hint of the real condition of art, or its true reason, is carefully avoided. Art is simply the expression of man's delight of life and pleasure in his labour embodied in the work of his hand. So long as the present system of wrong and misery endures there is no hope for a healthy art. Those folk who now repine bitterly over the decadence of Art should work toward the building of the only abode in which it may abide—a Society founded on justice and right, where all have enough and none over-much. For those who are stupidly content there is no word that will reach them; they, like the stolid pharisaic bourgeois, must wait for the rude awakening time holds in store for them.—S.

¹ Forestaller, one who buys up goods when they are cheap, and so raises the price for his own benefit; forestalls the due and real demand and supply; regrater, one who both buys and sells in the same market, or within five miles thereof, buys, say a ton of cheese at 10 a.m. and sells it at 5 p.m. a penny a pound dearer without moving from his chair. For us Socialists the word monopolist will cover both species of thief.—Ed.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

SHORT TIME AT RAILWAY WORKS.

The Metropolitan District Railway Company have posted notices up in their works at West Brompton, to the effect that on and after Saturday, January 8th, their employes will have to work short time, to the extent of nine hours per week, which amounts to one full working day. This will affect between two hundred and fifty and three hundred men.

NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.

A protracted meeting of delegates from all the Northumberland collieries was held at Newcastle Dec. 30, in reference to the demand of the colliery owners for a reduction of 15 per cent. in wages, to take effect on 1st. Jan. It was decided to ask the employers to suspend their notices for a week or two, with a view to arranging a compromise. This request will be considered by the employers at once, and it is now hoped a settlement will be effected.

NORTH OF ENGLAND SEAMEN.

A conference of delegates from branches of the North of England Seamen and Sea-going Firemen Society was held at South Shields Dec. 29, to consider the adoption of a uniform rate of wages for ports on the north-east coast. There were present representatives from various ports. It was resolved that wages be 30s. per week for weekly boats, £4 per month on deck and below for the Black Sea and Mediterranean, and £4 5s. monthly for the Baltic and Atlantic during the winter months.

THE EMPLOYMENT OF FEMALES AS COTTON SPINNERS.

There appears no signs whatever of the strike of mule spinners at Lostock Mill, near Bolton, coming to a close. The mule spinners, at the instigation of the operatives' union, struck work against Messrs. Heaton employing women as spinners on some short mules, and running very slow speeds. The objection raised against females being so employed, is upon moral grounds, and no one who knows what duties have to be performed by mule spinners will say that the grounds of objection are unreasonable. There is a wide difference between being employed in the spinning room and being employed in the weaving, winding, reeling, and card-room, as they have to dress so much different, and the nature of the work to be done is such that no woman should be asked to do the work. Thirty years ago, it was quite common for females to work as cotton piecers, but rarely as minders or spinners, but with the advance of education amongst the middle and lower classes, it has almost died out, owing to the growth of public opinion being against the system. It is very rare where a spinner takes his daughter in a spinning room with a view to teaching her to piece, and to follow the trade for a living. Those of the female sex who follow such employment are generally the daughters of careless and indifferent men, who have no thought or consideration for the future welfare of their offspring. In Oldham and districts no female is employed in a spinning room either as a piecer or spinner, and were there no strong objections from a moral point of view, we think females would find employment in that direction. We are surprised that an intelligent body of gentlemen like the committee of the Bolton Masters' Association should, through their secretary, Mr. A. Bailey, make it known to the public at large that they are in favour of females being employed as piecers and spinners in cotton mills. Such an admission speaks very little for their desire to improve the tone of society as at present existing in the cotton mills; but we understand their motives by their conclusions, and are not far wide of the mark when we say it is to keep down wages regardless of the characters of the females being injured by the nature of their employment. If employers won't dispense with the obnoxious system, spinners must in all cases refuse to teach any female to piece, and by so doing the evil will be sure to die out.—Cotton Factory Times.

THE NOTTINGHAM LACE TRADE.—The Board of Conciliation which for some time has had under consideration a proposal of the manufacturers for a 33 1-3 per cent. reduction of wages, have agreed upon a revision of the card prices which practically amounts to a reduction of 12 per cent all round.

STRIKE OF WEAVERS.—At a mass meeting of two thousand weavers, now on strike at Ashton-under-Lyne, it was resolved to abstain from work until their employers conceded the terms asked for—namely, to be paid the same rate of wages that is paid in Chorley, Preston, and other towns for similar work. This is the sixth week of the strike.

The strike of weavers at Ashton still goes on, but a few days ago some of the firms showed a tendency towards developing what we had thought to be a worn out system of getting hands. Some of the spinners were told that their own shops depended on their relatives returning to their looms. This method of doing business is, however, so un-English on the face of it that we are not surprised to find that those who resorted to it don't care to have it known.—Cotton Factory Times.

AMERICA.

SOCIALIST VICTORY.—CHICAGO, Jan. 3.—The election of officers to the Trades' Assembly in this city has resulted in a victory for the Socialist Party.

The men who took the places of the Chicago packing-house strikers have been turned out of their boarding houses and must seek other quarters.

The miners of Salisbury, Ala., have organised a co-operative coal company and are taking steps to open a mine on the property of the Keystone Coal Company.

Several new co-operative enterprises have been established in New York during the past few weeks. The United Tailors have established a shop, and the Shirt Ironers will start a co-operative laundry.

The Painters' and Decorators' Co-operative Association, organised recently at Minneapolis, Minn., has 5000 dols. capital in shares of 50 dols. each. Each member holds the same number of shares, and all share alike in the results.

"Ten dollars reward for a Knight of Labor found on the premises," is a placard pasted all over Whitely's works in Springfield, O. The time is coming when an equal reward can safely be offered for any American farmer who buys one of the Champion machines.—Industrial News.

GREENVILLE, PA.—A union has been formed here by domestic servants for the purpose of advancing their wages fifty cents a week. The girls are united in the movement, and so far have gained their point. The movement is looked upon with considerable amusement, but no one seems inclined to oppose the action of the girls.

FRANCE.

NANTES.—"The distress in our town is very great, but something different from a 'fine-art lottery' is needed to come in aid of the working class this winter weather." Certainly, philanthropy on a so-called business-like footing is bad enough, also the good-dinner-once-a-year style of charity so rampant at Christmas is bad enough, but playing at philanthropy and playing at art "for the benefit of the unemployed" is a double-barrelled insult, and should stir the blood of the greatest dullard to clamor and revolt.

VIERZON.—Last Wednesday the strikers held a general meeting, at which it was unanimously resolved to hold out and struggle on to the end in spite of all tentatives on the part of the Société Française. The strikers are resolved to maintain this course, sure of the fraternal help and encouragement of the whole of the proletariat of France.

HAVRE.—A general strike of tilers and slaters is announced here. The workers demand 75 c. the hour; the masters refuse, and are calling in workmen from elsewhere.

ITALY.

FINALE-EMILIA.—A strike of 500 labourers is announced at Finale Emilia. They were making 80 c. a-day. The employers refuse every demand, and threaten to call in foreign labour.

Como.—The servility and submission of some of the workers in Italy (as elsewhere) is shown up in the following letter from a correspondent of the Fascio. "Scarcely a week passes without my receiving threats and abuse from manufacturers or from the workmen. These latter either cannot understand my writings or else desire to maintain themselves in the good graces of the former." This, we venture to think, is a situation not at all difficult to understand, nor, if it comes to that, to be blamed at all heavily, being a natural development of to-day's system, which bears for its legend, "Grind, or be ground." As the writer adds, exploitation by the capitalists is not enough, but we must also be exploited by ourselves, every man against his brother.

MONZA.—Again, here we see the fear of outspokenness and of Socialist writings. In some of the factories the seller of the Fascio Operaio is sent about his business, with, "We don't want you here; the Fascio has been the ruin of us." Some of the firms here have been overproducing largely, which, especially considering the season, is a serious matter.

ASTI.—The journeyman-bakers of Asti, who some days back were all dismissed by the masters by reason of some dispute, have opened a bakehouse among themselves, thus forming the nucleus of a very useful co-operative society. The town authorities, finding the matter of importance, interfered and tried to bring the two parties to terms, but the bakers held out and would not be persuaded. Meantime the masters have called in a supply of "hands" to keep on business, which move has not proved successful, as the townsfolk prefer to patronise the co-operators.

For the third time the electors of Ravenna and Forli have given their votes to Amilcare Cipriani, having been summoned to elect a deputy in his place, as his two previous elections were annulled. At Ravenna he had 2680 out of 2764 votes; and at Forli, 3256 out of 3609 votes.

The beginning of the year is fertile in legal proceedings against Socialists. Early in January, at the session of the Court of Assize at Milano, six well-known members of the Labour Party will go up for trial. In February a process is being prepared in Alessandria against several "comrades" for the publication of the pamphlet 'Fra Contadini' and for that of the 'Chant of the Italian Labour Party.' By the by, we are rather curious to see this 'Inno del Partito Operaio Italiano.' Will any Italian comrade kindly take the hint and send us a copy?

AUSTRIA.

VIENNA, December 28, 1886.—Just now, in all workers' assemblies the projected labour-chambers are being discussed carefully. The project has been subjected to the Reichsrath by the Opposition, and the discussion is therefore not perilous to the State, and is consequently allowed by the Government. The workers have therefore the duty to profit by this opportunity, so seldom offered to them, especially as there is a very important matter influencing strongly the condition of our movement. You may imagine what parts the capitalists play when they wish to appear friends of the worker. Our comrade Dr. Victor Adler has shown us in his leaflet "Die Arbeiter-Kammern und die Arbeiter" (The Labour-Chambers and the Labourer) the motives of this party by citing Engels, who says that in the struggle between capital and landlordism there comes a moment when both parties apply to the proletariat for aid. The feudal lords tell the workers that they have the same interests against capitalists, and these latter assert that the capitalists and the labourers represent the new world against feudalism. Two bourgeois parties are inclined to concessions: the reactionary to economical, the liberal to political ones. In this moment the proletariat grows conscious that they form a special class with special interests. The same farce is being attempted in Austria now. The feudals have introduced some economic "reforms," although very platonic ones—as eleven-hour normal working day, insurance against sickness, restored guilds, and so on—and the liberals, nothing but liberal compulsory dissolution of associations and public assemblies, liberal suppression of the labour press, the liberal exception laws. Now on a sudden they are trying to become popular; as they are in the minority they will create labour-chambers, which they refused to create when in a majority of the Reichsrath; they will create them after the model of the chambers of commerce and trade; and it is very characteristic how they deviate even from this model. The labour-chambers are not to enter into mutual correspondence, allowed to commercial chambers; the labour-chambers can elect only their members, while the commercial ones may elect every Austrian who has the franchise, into the Reichsrath. This restriction is intended to prevent the election of an editor or other well-educated comrade. For the suffrage is restricted to such industrial workers who subscribe to a friendly society, who are 24 years of age (for the passive electoral right, 30 years), who are not under arrest or imprisonment. Now imagine: a labour-chamber chooses a Social-Democrat; on the morning of the electoral day he is arrested, charged, for instance, with high treason; by this arrest he cannot be elected. I do not speak of the determination that voting is to be public; I mention only the paragraph that only those workers can vote or be elected who have complied with the above regulations and who have lived two years before the election in the electoral place, by which the workers in many industries, as the building and metal trades, are excluded almost totally from the suffrage.

However oppressive these ridiculous regulations and restrictions may be, we will profit by them, in showing to our brethren who are not yet with us how impotent this system is to comply with the most modest wishes of the workers, by nourishing in everywise the consciousness of the class warfare. When our representatives will be admitted to the Reichsrath, their speeches (there they will have the liberty of speaking not allowed to us otherwise) will be good means of agitation and will furnish leaflets to be spread among the disinherited. This part of that project of law is therefore the most important, that the chambers have the right to return nine deputies. Abroad, men who do not know Austria will wonder and question: if the ruling classes will admit representatives of the workers to the legislation, why do they not grant universal suffrage? To these we answer, Austria is not yet developed enough. Besides the evils caused by the capitalistic mode of production we suffer from remainders of obsolete feudal institutions. In many parts of Austria there is no great industry; only agriculture based on corvée—legally abolished, indeed, but existing yet, only small, mediæval industry. In Austria there are districts modernly quite proletarian, but yet more districts where not even one capitalist can be found. And imagine now: these institutions, based on different systems of production and society, enter into mutual communication! Must there not arise strange situations, so that Austria may be truly be called the country of incongruities?—F. S.

INTERESTING ITEMS.

The party of Organised Labour is not a party of despair, but of hope and ideas.—The Leader.

Commercial enterprise allows no bar to its far-reaching developments. An artist's model in Paris, tired of doing all the work that earned his living, has opened an establishment for the letting out of his kind to artists at so much a-head. Albums containing photographs of the "stock-on-hand" are kept at the disposition of his customers, and he has also a room where his "goods" may be examined before hiring. Like all capitalists he is, perforce, an exploiter, and makes profit from the labour of his employés in the natural course of events.—S.

France is arming. Germany is arming. Eight millions of men, brothers in toil and suffering, may suddenly, at the word "Go," rush upon each other on murder bent. Was ever such a conflict seen in Titanic days? And what for, please? Surely, men brave enough to face death in such a mêlée should deem it easy to rid the earth of a few oppressors. And what a grand sight they would be when they meet on the Rhine, should they drop their leaders into the noble stream, and with one mighty shout proclaim the brotherhood of man!—The Leader.

Mr. John Dillon, M.P., speaking at Arklow in support of the Plan of Campaign, said he gave bail to be of good behaviour, and the best behaviour he knew was to carry out the Plan of Campaign. He intended to continue the behaviour which he had observed for the last two months; and if he could not carry out the good work by sunlight, he was perfectly prepared to carry it on by moonlight. Rent money gathered in the dark was just as good money as that collected in the day. The Plan of Campaign was legal, and, as one of the makers of the law, he refused to take his law from a policeman.

Mr. Hubert Herkomer has been speaking recently upon the advantages of a long careful training in any craft, and advocating the revival of the schools and apprenticeships of a bygone time. As to the benefits, let alone the absolute need, of apprenticeship and long training in steady careful craftsmanship, all Socialists would agree with Mr. Herkomer. They would, however, point out that, in these days of the grande industrie, of machine-production on a large scale, when men are rather the functional portions of machines than aught else, when it is deftness in doing some one monotonous thing instead of true skill that is required of the workmen, that it would be waste of labour to make a man, and afterward break him down into a factory-slave. When we have kicked out commercialism men will have room to grow, but not before.—S.

It is curious to note how the stand-point of the present system vitiates the view men take of human nature and life generally. In an otherwise by no means unintelligent review of the life of Henri Regnault, just published in Paris, for instance, it is said: "He possessed the revolutionary temperament, the rebellious spirit which is often a virtue in art and literature, but which is always a vice in a soldier—perhaps proof positive that highly-civilised beings are not fit to inhabit this nether world, where brute force and diplomacy, otherwise dishonesty, alone succeed and reign supreme." What more natural, one would think, when the case is thus presented, than for a man to conclude that there was something wrong either with civilisation or with this "nether" world—or, it mayhap, both? But most men have fixed in their minds the immutable stability of the present system, and if human nature cannot square with it so much the worse for man.—S.

We wish to give notice to persons who are occupying themselves with the "labour problem," that what we have asked them for is not more general discussion, but a definite description of those wrongs of the labourer which are capable of being remedied by legislation, and a sketch of the remedy in the shape of the draft of a statute bill. We say this because we are being deluged with letters of the old sort about the designs of the Creator in making the earth, and the "natural rights" of the inhabitants thereof. Among other answers to our demand for a bill of particulars, we have received a letter from Mr. Charles F. Wingate, the sanitary engineer, who figured prominently in the George movement, calling attention to the condition of the New York tenement houses, and enclosing the draft of a bill which certainly ought to be enacted, providing for their improvement as regards healthfulness. But a moment's reflection ought to show Mr. Wingate that the New York tenement houses might all be converted to abodes as wholesome and cheerful as the Navarro flats, without contributing anything to the solution of the labour problem. The wages of the labourer would still be what they are now, the rent of his dwelling as high or higher, his share in the amusements and luxuries of life just as small, and his dependence on his employer, the capitalist, just as great. Moreover, the condition of the New York tenement houses only affects a very small body of labourers in this city. What we are waiting for is some grand piece or pieces of legislation which will ameliorate the lot of labourers in general. Mr. Wingate offers nothing of this sort.—N. Y. Nation, capitalist organ.

England is inhabited by two nations, between whom there is no interest and no sympathy—the rich and the poor.—Lord Beaconsfield.

Why wilt thou defer thy good purpose from day to day? Arise and begin in this very instant and say, "Now is the time for doing, now is the time for striving."—Thomas a Kempis.

"DEFRAUDING A RAILWAY COMPANY."

In a case recently brought before him of the above nature, Mr. Chance, the luminous stipendiary at Lambeth, gave utterance to the, sapient conventionalism that "it was shocking to see people, in the position of the prisoner particularly, acting in such a disgraceful manner." He further stated that "the offence in his opinion was equal to picking pockets." If the latter is Mr. Chance's opinion, Mr. Chance is evidently capable of forming opinions without due consideration. Public sentiment may be muddled enough on the subject of ethics, but it has a sufficient glimmer of enlightenment left in it to discern instinctively the difference between depriving a concrete human being of money intended for his personal use and failing to surrender to an abstract "company" with neither "heart to feel, soul to save, or anything to kick," the tax it lays upon those who make use of the social function it performs in pursuit of the one end of its existence—profit-making, which means the plunder of its servants and the public. We do not consider Mr. Lomax acted in any way disgracefully, since no moral obligation, as we have already shown, can obtain between a living human being and an abstraction such as this. Were it possible, we could wish that a practice by which the heartless, bloodless vampires of latter-day civilisation called joint-stock companies were deprived of at least a portion of their ill-gotten gains might become much more common. The "company," under the cover of law, though without even a pretence of the moral responsibility which binds man to man, attaching to it, can practically do what it pleases, the individual man having no redress at law, "fighting" a "company" being about as possible for the ordinary man as fighting a sea-serpent. What Mr. Lomax did may have been illegal, and contrary to the rules of the commercial game, but it was certainly not immoral—it was no wrong to his neighbour.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"Jus; an organ of Individualism," is the name of a penny weekly paper which is to make its first appearance on Friday, Jan. 7th. To advocate the principle of laissez faire, to criticise over-legislation of a socialistic tendency, and to provide a register and compendium of strictly political information, are the chief objects of the journal. The publishers are Messrs. Foulger and Co., 13 Paternoster Row.

Time, is this month, as usual, full of sound readable matter, notably the articles by W. B. Robertson and Armine S. Kent, on the New Coinage, and Matthew Arnold's poetry respectively. The story of Amilcare Cipriani's life is written from an inimical standpoint by E. Strachan Morgan, who, however, fails utterly to shew our comrade as aught but the hero he is. The list of "best books" given at the end of each number of this magazine is a most valuable and important feature.

The Leader is an afternoon daily published under the auspices of the Central Labour Union of New York. It is a well-conducted, smart, readable paper and should make a hit. Our American comrades are go-ahead fellows who seem to beat us on this side hands down and not half try! The Leader is the only paper in New York that has kept its columns clean, while its contemporaries vied with one another as to which could cram most Campbell filth into its columns, and in other ways it has proved its superiority to the monopoly press. American workers should rally in thousands to its support. We most cordially welcome it as an exchange.

The Christian Socialist this month takes a long step upward, and will now rank, if it fulfils the promise of its present number, with the most useful of the Socialist monthlies. The Christian Socialist Society has now assumed its entire control, and it will no longer be the vehicle of the whims and fads of one man. The existence of bodies and organs of Socialist opinion that are dubbed with a prefix or suffix of some modificatory kind seems to assert a demand for such modification, and while not agreeing with the policy we can hardly blame those who consider their weaker brethren in that wise. Despite its temporising title, the Christian Socialist speaks the truth straitly, and under its new editor's is not likely to falter or fail from its duty. S.

NOTES ON NEWS.

WE can believe that our old acquaintance Mr. Phillips really was sorry that he could not help the unemployed men who applied to him to help them, and were waiting to see if they could get a job in clearing off the snow, because he seems to have some appreciation of the condition of the unemployed at present. He appeared to relish the job of blowing to pieces a lie that appeared in the respectable Times to the effect that "although a large number of persons were wanted to work to clear the snow from the streets on Boxing-day, only three applied, and they were under the influence of drink." Mr. Phillips said that the Town-hall was not open on that day, neither was any notice given that men were wanted on that day. Mr. Phillips, much to his credit, stigmatised this as a deliberate lie, and a libel on the working classes—"in fact a malicious libel." It is, however, the kind of lie which is very commonly accepted as gospel truth in these winter days, as anybody can bear witness who has an opportunity of listening to the conversation in a second-class carriage on the District Railway.

"Infamy" has different meanings to different minds, it would seem. To Mr. Mansfield, for instance, it appears to have meant the other day the extremity of poverty which forces a man to beg in the streets in order to get a little victuals for himself and three little children. "Your conduct is simply infamous," said the "worthy" magistrate. On the other hand, others (myself amongst them) might think the title of "infamy" fairly well earned by the magistrate who from his unanswerable position goes out of his way to insult a poor man, even supposing that he was compelled by a stupid and brutal law to send him to prison for what was no offence. W. M.

One of the "swell" kind of emigration-touts, Mr. David Buchanan of the New South Wales Parliament, had a rather stormy reception when, at St. James's Hall on Friday week, he started out to prove New South Wales a veritable heaven for working men. For twenty-five years a political trickster, his long experience served him in good stead when he came to solid, right-down lying as to the condition and resources of the colony. "Enormous tracts of alluvial land which could produce forty bushels of the finest wheat to the acre" laid promiscuously around and waited to be picked up. "Not one of the really industrious" was suffering or ever had suffered from distress there. John Norton, the N.S.W. workmen's delegate, G. Lansbury, and our comrade Somerville, opposed the lecture, and a very stormy scene followed, which was only terminated by turning out the gas.

A good illustration of the "ministerial meaning" of a political speech was given in the Northern police-court of Dublin during the examination of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach on the 7th in the case against John Dillon and his comrades. When "Mickey the Botch," as he is called in Ireland, was referred to the speech he made at Bristol on November 13, and asked what he meant by saying "the Government have brought what pressure they could within the law to bear upon those few landlords who would not follow the example of their more generous fellows," he would only respond, "Exactly what I said," and would give no clue as to what "pressure within the law" meant. Now, either the "pressure" was a mere figure of speech (and this after all is almost a certainty) or it was not. If it was a reality and "within the law," why hesitate to speak of it? If it was not "within the law," how comes it that a government which to curry popular favour and prolong a shaky existence will overstep the law, will yet seek to punish others for following its example?

The Irish papers last week were lively reading. What with the miserable floundering of perjured police witnesses under the searching cross-examination of Mr. Healy and the other counsel for the defence; the "fun of the (proclaimed) fair" at Gorey; John Dillon's meeting at Arklow, and W. O'Brien's at Fairymount, they overflowed with interest for any one not wholly dead to the cause of the people in its various phases.

The "majesty of the law" asserts itself in many ways. Mr. Bowler, counsel for the defence in the case against the chairman of the Waterford Tenants' Association, while the case was proceeding was twice threatened with violence. District Inspector Davis, provoked by an allusion made to him in the counsel's speech, shouted that "if I wasn't in court I'd wring the head off you," and was with difficulty restrained from attempting to carry his grotesque threat into execution. While struggling with those who interposed he shouted again that he "would pull the throttle out of him," and so on. Information against him was applied for and refused, the impartial magistrates apparently believing that any treatment was good enough for a Nationalist.

The Plan of Campaign has scored another triumph. Lord Dillon, who so stoutly refused 25 per cent. reduction, and "would die first," has now agreed to accept an abatement of 20 per cent. all round, re-instate all evicted tenants, and pay all costs incurred on either side in the whole affair. S.

LIBERTY AND PROPERTY DEFENCE LEAGUE REPORT FOR 1886.

WHOEVER has drawn up the above Report deserves credit for having concocted a most formidable and imposing document, which will doubtless comfort and gladden the hearts and brace up the nerves of the weaker brethren, as they read the record of the heroic resistance offered by the redoubtable knights, Wemyss, Pembroke, Fortescue, and Co., to the advance of the terrible Spectre Rouge.

Putting aside the ineffable disgust which every honest intelligent person must feel at the shameless pretence and gross hypocrisy of this league of monopolists posing as friends of freedom and champions of the oppressed, there is much in the Report to gratify and encourage all who work and hope for the Social Revolution. Allowing considerable discount for bombast, bunkum, and soft sawdow, there yet remains the solid fact that our Cause has grown so stout and strong as to tax the energies and resources of a wealthy and "influential" organisation like the L.P.D.L., with its 71 federated bodies, to cope with it.

By far the larger part of the Report is taken up with a record of Parliamentary Bills rejected or mutilated through the action of the League Parliamentary Committee. As, however, even the best of these Bills, emanating from the hopelessly corrupt bourgeois parliament at Westminster, are and could be nothing more than miserable make-believe make-shifts, anything that the League could do in regard to them is of comparatively little importance, except as showing the real spirit that governs its action. I do not propose, therefore, to occupy space and time in commenting on the forty odd Bills enumerated in the Report, but will confine my observations mainly to two—viz., The Shop Hours Regulation Bill and the Coal Mines Regulation Bill. With regard to the former, the precious committee of loafing landlords and landsharks showed their devotion to Liberty by contending for the right of greedy grasping shopkeepers to drudge their unfortunate youthful assistants, male and female, as many hours as they choose. There is, however, a curious admission in the Report, to the effect that "after consultation with the Shopkeepers' Defence Committee, your Committee concluded that it would not be practicable to oppose the Bill in toto with any certainty of success." They therefore confined their efforts to securing modification of the Bill, whilst their "agents attended meetings held by the promoters for the purpose of moving resolutions against the Bill; and the principle of the Bill was attacked by the League speakers on various occasions in workmen's clubs in different parts of the metropolis." What other interpretation can be put on this than that the evidence disclosed such a state of things that even the tough consciences of the middle-class M.P.'s felt a twinge? Yet these gentlemen of the L.P.D.L. did not scruple to take advantage of the need of some of the more cunning among the proletariat to use them as agents to delude their ignorant and simple fellow-men into supposing that in opposing the curtailment of the shopkeeper's power of exploiting his assistants, they were maintaining their own freedom.

Their action in regard to the other Bill—that of the Coal Mines Regulation—calls for somewhat fuller comment, inasmuch as it concerns the vexed question of female labour, the particular instance being that of the employment of women at the pit-brow. I quote a sentence from the Report which is pregnant with meaning and deserves the serious consideration of the workers for more reasons than one: "A miners' conference at Birmingham in January, under the presidency of Mr. Thomas Burt, M.P., having passed a resolution in favour of the legislative suppression of women's labour at the pit-bank, a member of the League specially experienced in the matter wrote a letter to the Manchester Examiner and Times, warning the pit-brow women of the impending danger, and appealing to the public to assist them in retaining their freedom of labour." Before dealing with the main question, it is worth while to note how freely the columns of even such Radical papers as the Echo, the Examiner, and others are placed at the disposal of the enemies of labour. And now observe the audacity of the attempt to divide the interest of working women from that of working men, and to divert attention from the real motive—i.e., to maintain freedom of trade in cheap labour, à la John Bright, under pretence of maintaining the personal freedom of the women. This was a particularly crafty move, in view of the fact that certain worthy people like the Rev. Stewart Headlam and certain advocates of advanced theories, whose sympathies with the cause of the people none can question, were thus secured as allies in an apparently righteous cause. The result of such action, however, by whatever motives prompted, must necessarily be to play into the hands of the exploiting classes, to intensify the labour struggle, and lower the standard of living amongst the workers. It is most essential to point out that fine phrases and exalted motives do not alter the character of the results which follow from a particular mode of action. And to use an apt if well-worn illustration, if black swans will consort with crows, they must not wonder if they be mistaken for them occasionally, with possibly very unpleasant consequences. The fact is, as Louis Blanc has well said, "as long as competition exists, freedom is impossible." The freedom of the mine-owner to employ these women because they are cheap, and the freedom of the women to sell their labour-power cheap (because only for that reason are they preferred to men), means necessarily a denial of the freedom of the husbands, fathers, and brothers of the women so employed. These are placed by the competition of the members of their own families still further at the mercy of the employers. To talk of the freedom of the women under such circumstances is outrageous humbug. The fact is that they are driven (in the vast majority of cases) to seek by their labour to augment the scanty wages which the men are receiving, and by so doing help to maintain a supply of cheap labour for the exploiters. The "impending danger" which the "experienced" member feared, the workers may feel assured, was as to the effect upon the rate of wages more than from any genuine concern in the freedom or wellbeing of the women. These latter were patronised and photographed, and their habits and habiliments became for a short time the fashionable theme of conversation amongst the ladies of the idle classes, many of whom doubtless were deriving a considerable portion of their wealth and luxury from the liberty to labour cheaply which they were so anxious to maintain—for their poorer sisters. The result of the agitation was that the clause was struck out before the introduction of the Bill into Parliament, and the pit-women, after being trotted out to suit the purposes of their exhibitors, were left to pursue their unwomanly occupation, and to live their hard and unlovely lives as best they may.

The Report makes considerable mention of the amount of lecturing done by their speakers in workmen's clubs and elsewhere. I should fancy this to be the most unsatisfactory item of the League's work as far as regards return for the outlay incurred. The ignorance and gullibility of the workers is, unfortunately, very great; still it is difficult to believe that the utterances of paid agitators—that is to say, agitators paid to preach what they do not believe, and therefore cannot put any heart into—can have any weight with the masses of the people. It is, doubtless, a degraded means of getting a livelihood; but the condition of Society compels all more or less to occupy false positions, and, after all, it may be that in taking the pay of the L.P.D.L., these men, or some of them at any rate, deserve our pity rather than our blame.

As a printer, I am naturally interested to read that on the day following the West-end riots on Feb. 8th, 3000 handbills were sent to the house-owners and shop-keepers in the West-end, and that 100,000 bills were distributed in connection with the Lord Mayor's Show demonstrations. It might be worth the while of my fellow-compositors to give the Socialists a lift, even from a business point of view.

There is just one other matter on which I cannot forbear to say a word or two. It is contained in a little paragraph which is so naively funny that I quote in full: "The foundation of a working-men's Individualist Club in London two years ago was an indication that the aggressiveness of the Socialist propaganda was beginning to produce a reaction. The recent opening of the club in more commodious premises in the City Road is a proof that this counter-movement has taken root and is spreading."

Conceive the ridiculousness of the proposition involved in the foregoing paragraph, that in order to avoid the presumption that they were Socialists it became necessary for certain working-men to distinctly label themselves Individualists. Now the only individualism possible to working-men, as such, is to hold themselves aloof from their fellows, and to make terms with the employers, each for himself, without any regard to the welfare of his neighbour; to be, in fact, a "rat" or "scab"—in plain language a traitor to his class, and an enemy to the common weal. It is quite in accord with the short-sighted selfish policy of such individualist working men that they should be constantly on the alert for any chance of plundering those who employ them to betray their comrades. Where the carrion is, there will the crows be gathered together. The L.P.D.L. and the 71 bodies federated with it must be simple indeed if they are deceived, or think to deceive any bona fide working-man, with such a silly story as that of the foundation and progress of their individualist club. The real danger against which the workers will need to be on guard is the unscrupulous hypocrisy of these wolves in sheep's clothing. The devil can quote Scripture for his own purposes; and even so, the L.P.D.L.

will, we may be sure, in the future as they have done in the past, make use of the noblest maxims to cloak their nefarious designs, and will seek in the name of Liberty to keep the people in bondage.

THE WORKHOUSE; OR, JOHN POORMAN'S REST.

How strict and cruel the enforcement of the house test often is, two instances cut from Truth, September 10, 1885, will prove:—

"In the first, the Rev. J. Swire, Rector of Newbury, brought under the notice of the Board of Guardians, Wantage Union, the case of a man named Thomas Bolton, who is over eighty years of age and lives with his old wife. The two receive, it appears, 3s. a-week, and three half-gallon loaves. This is all they have to live on. But the old man could occasionally obtain a little light work, which he is at all times most willing to do. Mr. Swire, therefore, thought that the Board might see their way to exercise a little discretion, and by slightly relaxing their rules, give the poor old fellow a chance of earning a little money, and ending his days in comparative comfort 'outside the house.' He was fortified in this hope by the knowledge that a similar request had met with the ready sanction and approval of the Guardians in a neighbouring union. But the only reply he received was a curt communication from Edward Ormond, clerk, to the effect that 'one of the great principles of the Poor Law is not to grant relief to any person in aid of wages, and that, therefore, they are unable to allow Thomas Bolton to work whilst he is in receipt of relief.' The second case, brought by the same gentleman before the same Board, is even still more astounding. In this instance one William Bolton, who is between seventy and eighty years of age, and quite incapable of work, is the happy possessor of a weekly allowance of three shillings and sixpence, the result of money he has paid into a club from his youth. He also receives from the Board two loaves per week. Believing that Bolton had been a hard-working man all his life, Mr. Swire thought that he was a worthy object for the consideration of the Guardians, so he asked them to supplement his limited means by a small allowance. Again Edward Ormond, clerk, wrote and informed Mr. Swire 'that the full allowance to William Bolton would be two shillings and two four-pound loaves weekly, and as he is provided with three shillings and sixpence weekly from a club, the Guardians have allowed him two four-pound loaves weekly, making his weekly income three shillings and sixpence and two loaves instead of two shillings and two.' In view of such a monstrous decision as this, how can we expect our working-classes to become thrifty? In fact, by saving sufficient to provide himself with an allowance in his old age of three shillings and sixpence a week, this unfortunate man Bolton has deprived himself of all chance of receiving any assistance from his parish."

To return to John Poorman. After waiting for an hour or two among a little crowd of applicants as wretched and hopeless as himself, he sees the guardians, and is given an order for the house, and with it a sentence to imprisonment and a decree of divorce from wife and children. In anti-black-slavery times piteous pictures were drawn of the grief of the "man and brother" at parting from wife and child, and an evangelical rhymist moved the hearts of English folk by the assurance that "affection dwells in white and black the same." The poet has yet to come who shall move us to sorrow for the white slave of the Poor Law, and show to us the dehumanising circumstances of poverty's dungeon. The stories known to workhouse visitors of mothers pining in dull-eyed grief for the embraces of their children—who are fretting into illness because denied sound of their voice and touch of their hand, are among the saddest told in the tear-blotted annals of the poor. Even the intercourse sanctioned by the regulations is often discouraged and sometimes virtually refused.

Mr. Towle describes the "spirit of the workhouse as one of cheerless comfort"—with the comfort, let me add, mostly absent. The character of the houses varies considerably. In some good fires are the rule, in others there is a severe economy of coal. In many the provisions for personal cleanliness are insufficient to a disgusting degree. A respectable, well educated, sober, godly man, who was for a time an inmate of a house in the west of England, said to me, "When I first went in I thought 'all these people are rotten.' When I had been in a week I found I was as foul as they were." The reason is plain to those who know what prison regulations are and what workhouse practices are not.

The aim of the Poor Law, as stated by the Commissioners, is to "subject the pauper inmate to such a system of labour, discipline, and restraint as shall be sufficient to outweigh in his estimation the bodily comforts which he enjoys." A favourite form of labour is oakum-picking, which is "chosen because it causes real suffering. The fingers become sore, and a painful sensation is produced at the tips of the fingers and thumbs, which is acute and peculiar to that occupation" (Dr. Nicaise, quoted in Standard, September 4, 1885). Life in the house is intentionally made dull and cheerless, and even in the case of the children the monotony of life is painful and benumbing. The atmosphere of the place is tainted with vice, and the moral contamination prevalent meets with but slight opposing influences. The want of moral classification in nearly all workhouses is a source of positive pain to clean-minded persons, and makes a prison far preferable to such.

The "bodily comforts" provided are about as kind as the tender mercies of the wicked. They consist of clothing which is a badge of social leprosy and of food which, though sufficient to maintain existence, frequently fails painfully to satisfy appetite. The dietary is calculated by science for the needs of the average man. Now the average man is a purely imaginary being. Real men sometimes come short of his stature, and others exceed it. If the food placed on the workhouse table were given to each according to his wants, there would be enough for all. The Poor Law, however, sternly forbids such communism. The man who cannot eat all that is set before him must leave it for the pigs; he who has more than the average appetite by law established must go hungry away. Many, especially in the early days of their residence, do go hungry, desiring a little more bread as vainly as the prodigal in the Syrian land desired the husks that the swine did eat. Now as then, there is more care for pigs than men. The story is part of the old, old story of man's inhumanity to man. Charles Dickens gave voice to the cry of the pauper for "a little more bread" years ago, but still it falls on ears that do not hear, because the cry comes from the ward of an English workhouse, and the Pharisees of Christian England believe that "the poor in the lump are bad."

Mr. John Bright, speaking at Birmingham Nov. 5, 1885, audaciously said: "The prayer that is taught us by the divine mouth, 'Give us this day our daily bread,' has been answered, and we have taken it from the New Testament and have placed it in a clause of an Act of Parliament, and there it remains for ever in the constitution of the country."

The cries from starving London and from the wynds of Glasgow, from Staffordshire chain-makers, and not least the cries for a little more bread from the workhouse ward, refute Mr. Bright's boast, and bid us prepare for a war against poverty more earnest and more radical than the struggle against the Corn Laws.

Meanwhile whenever you think of State charity, remember, again, to quote Charles Dickens, that "we have come to this absurd, this dangerous, this monstrous pass, that the dishonest felon is, in respect of cleanliness, order, diet, and accommodation, better provided for and taken care of than the honest pauper."

After his incarceration, John Poorman from time to time made attempts to obtain work outside his "voluntary" prison. These efforts were hampered by the fact that the officials always treated him as a person who desired to desert his wife and children, and were made fruitless by his utter inability to find the means of again furnishing even a home of one room. The outcome was that John resigned himself, as requested by the chaplain, to "the will of God."

One dolorous day in November John asked to see the doctor—an ill-paid official, much worried by the guardians of the public purse because of his tendency to ask for quinine, opium, port wine, and other medicines which heaven obviously intended only for the well-to-do. Being sent into the sick ward, John's dietary was greatly improved, and a temporary return of strength was the consequence. His surroundings in the ward were unpleasant, and the death of a man in the bed next his own, who died unsheltered from his gaze, greatly shocked him. The nurses were mainly paupers, quite unqualified for the work entrusted to them. While John was in the ward, a little child who was ordered a warm bath was scalded to death, and an old man who was ordered a cool bath was given one so cold that he died of congestion of the lungs. (This is no romance, no exaggeration. The documents that prove my statements are in my own possession.)

At last John died, and was buried in that pauper grave in which one in every fourteen of our brothers and sisters find their final rest.

I conclude with the words of Mr. T. Illingworth in a letter to the Manchester Guardian dated February 19, 1886:

"The thought that one in 14 of our fellow-countrymen die in a workhouse cannot be a pleasant one. It is nevertheless a fact that in wealthy England after 40 years unparalleled increase of wealth, and according to Mr. Giffen 40 years of unexampled progress of the working classes, one in every 14 freeborn Englishmen dies a pauper's death in the workhouse. How much suffering and wretchedness these facts reveal it is difficult to comprehend. Mr. McDougall, of the Manchester Board of Guardians, says that not more than 2 per cent of the pauperism of Manchester can be traced to hereditary taint. What is true of Manchester pauperism will be a good guide as to the pauperism, in respect of this feature of it, throughout the country. The knowledge that of those born in this country one in 14 will die a pauper is enough to stir up the feelings of the fathers and mothers to cry with lamentation over the possible future of the children they nurture so fondly and of whom they expect and hope such bright futures—alas! only to be disappointed. If the progress of civilisation can show no greater things than this, well may there be grave doubts as to the security of the principles on which it is based. Probably the results may be as we find them because it is based on no principles whatever but those of brutal selfishness and oppression; humanity and justice could never bring one in fourteen to a pauper's grave."

I will only add words of warning you will mock at until too late you find them true: Our civilisation is a sham; our Christianity is an hypocrisy. Unless we learn to do justly and love mercy, the earthquake and volcano of God will shake our social structure into ruin and consume it with flame.

WILLIAM SHARMAN.

At the meeting of the Trades Assembly, held at Chicago last Sunday, the Radical and Socialistic element secured complete control. The representatives of some organisations withdrew after the election of officers.

The sixth anniversary of the death of Blanqui was celebrated by the Socialists of Paris in the usual way by speeches over his tomb at Père-la-Chaise and wreaths deposited thereon, the crowd at the cemetery being more than usually numerous this year. Among the red wreaths, beneath which Dalou's bronze statue was soon completely hidden, were those deposited by the "Comité révolutionnaire central," the Cri du Peuple, the "Comité révolutionnaire du XIXe. arrondissement," L'Intransigeant, the "Comité ni Dieu ni Maître" of Lyons, etc. Most of the orators made allusion in their speeches to the probability of European war, urging all Socialists therefore to make the most of their opportunities and take advantage of the times in which they found themselves. Before leaving the cemetery most of those gathered together paid a visit to that scene which is among the last scenes of the drama of 1871—where those remaining of the defenders of the Commune were shot down unnumbered by the Versailles.

"Homo sum, nihil, a me alienum puto."

—SENECA.

I am a man; to me all men are dear;
So said the Roman Stoic; so say I;
So said the holiest One while He was here,
And lived for men and dared for men to die;
So let me strive for men, whate'er befall
Myself, still working for them all I can,
Still crying, "All for each and each for all!"
And aiding men because I am a man.

And, if my wages be their hate and scorn,
If they know not their brother, well, what then?
Shall I give hate for hate to any born
With me to share the brotherhood of men?
Let me still keep the truth clear in my soul,
And serve my brothers every way I can;
The whole for each and each one for the whole,
That be my faith because I am a man.

THE KELTIC LEAGUE.

We have received the following statement of the aims of the Keltic League:—

"To promote the Party union of the Scottish and of the Welsh Members of Parliament respectively, and to organise co-operation between the Scottish, Welsh, and Irish Parliamentary Parties, with respect not only to the common general objects of Home Rule, and thorough-going settlements of the Land Question, but with respect also to the special questions more urgently demanding solution in the Highlands, in Wales, and in Ireland respectively. With respect to the same common general objects, and special national questions, to organise co-operation also in the country between the Scotch, the Welsh, and the Irish; and thus to give such a lead to the divided English Liberal Party as will transform the better elements on both sides into a New Radical Party with a definite programme, economical, ecclesiastical, and political. To create a spirit of brotherhood and solidarity, not only between the different branches of the Keltic race in these islands, in the colonies, and in America, but also between the more Keltic and the more English sections of a population which is everywhere mixed, and Anglo-Keltic, rather than Anglo-Saxon."

With its platform, of course, we are not quite in sympathy; but in these times any union of peoples, apart from their governments, cannot fail of being revolutionary in its tendency. S.

The Unemployed.

THE unemployed question is again coming to the front. A gentleman connected with the Kensington Vestry wrote to the Daily Telegraph last week stating that in spite of the great deal of talk about the number of men out of work, it had no foundation in fact, as the vestry wanted five thousand men to clear the roads from the accumulated snow and could only get three hundred. The Stratford board of guardians complained that in answer to a similar request only three unemployed turned up, and they were drunk. Both these statements have been contradicted by facts. On Wednesday week the Kensington Vestry wanted some "unemployed," and they got them—more than they wanted. Over a thousand appeared, and they would not find work for them. The gentleman who writes these letters to the newspapers under various names had better confine himself to the truth in future, or lie within bounds in the leader columns. He had said they could find work for five thousand. The bumbles of Stratford have been equally unfortunate. Mr. Phillips, the West Ham police magistrate, has from the bench stigmatised the statement published in that upper middle-class paper the Times as "a deliberate falsehood." The distress hourly grows worse; thousands of families are starving for the want of the barest necessities; and meanwhile the gentlemen said to be appointed for their relief are employing themselves in inventing "deliberate falsehoods" about the unfortunates consigned to their tender mercies. Why don't the "unemployed" help themselves? That they will get no other help is evident.—D. N.

LITERARY NOTICES.

To-Day for January has a poem by our comrade Maguire, the continuation of "Eros or Erin," a somewhat weak presentation of an old problem that may be guessed from the title, and a calmly-stated but crushing reply to Mr. Marson's attack upon Socialism, by E. Belfort Bax. Edward Carpenter also contributes a good article on "Trade."

Articles in the January reviews likely to interest Socialists are:—Nineteenth Century: "The Government of Ireland; a reply," John Morley; "Rural Russia," Lady Verney. Contemporary: "Jubilee-Time in Ireland," T. M. Healy. Fortnightly: "The Iron and Steel Trade," Sir Lothian Bell; "Womanhood in old Greece," by E. Lynn Linton. S.

THE SOCIALISTS IN HOLLAND.—THE HAGUE, Jan. 10.—The Court of Cassation has affirmed the sentence of one year's solitary confinement which was passed in the Lower Court last June, and subsequently confirmed by the Court of Appeal, upon M. Domela Nieuwenhuis, the Socialist leader, for the publication of insulting expressions against the King. Jan. 11.—Domela Nieuwenhuis attended a meeting last night. He said that he would endure his penalty with resignation, being convinced that he had received it solely for deserting the ranks of the capitalists and espousing the cause of the people. M. Vanbeveren, of Ghent, stated that Socialism in Belgium had gained fresh strength since the condemnation. A resolution pledging the meeting to continue the propaganda was carried.

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. can only be returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers as they may appear.

THE POLITICAL CRISIS.

It is difficult to write about the "Political Crisis" seriously, except so far as contempt may be serious. The bespattering with flattery for their patriotism of those members of the Government who are wanted to take themselves off; the flutter among the lesser men lest they too should be pulled off their perch and be boiled down for gravy for the new coalition pie; the terror of some Conservatives, like the Standard, lest Mr. Chamberlain should climb half-way down the tree; Mr. Goschen's anxiety that his position should not be misunderstood, whereas all the while it is as plain as the nose on Mr. Goschen's face that he is a high Tory reactionist. All this is sufficiently grotesque, and once more illustrates happily enough the dignity and honesty of Parliamentary Government, but otherwise does not concern us in the least.

All this on the Tory side; the Liberal position is perhaps a little more noteworthy, but also considerably more discreditable. The confusion in the Tory camp has given them hopes of success once more, and it is quite clear that most of those who may be called the responsible men of the party do in consequence look upon "compromise" in quite a different light from that in which it showed a few weeks ago. There are rumours afloat that Mr. Gladstone is prepared to cut down his Home Rule Bill, feeble as it is already, so that it would amount to nothing but a perpetual English-Irish squabble in the Westminster Parliament. This rumour the Daily News denies with all official solemnity; but as it admits the almost plenary power of the "Conference" to be held presently, which will have only one sincere Home Ruler (Mr. Morley) in it, this denial is not of much significance. Mr. Labouchere put the matter on a reasonable footing in his Reading speech when he practically pointed out that no conference between those who were for Home Rule and those who were against it could mean anything but surrender on one side or the other.

Clearly whatever comes of it the Gladstonians are anxious to surrender, if only they can put a good face on it and hoodwink the rank and file of their party to the extreme baseness of the proceeding; otherwise they would have insisted on genuine Home Rule being made the basis of the Conference. It can scarcely be doubted that the Responsible Liberals will, if they dare, heave the Irish Jonah overboard; the only thing which will prevent them from doing so will be their fear of the consequences of their being accused of his murder when they reach the shore. Even if they do not they will have weakened themselves by their shilly-shally ways; if they do, no man with even the remains of wits in his head will take the trouble to distinguish them from their Tory competitors for loaves and fishes.

The moral to be drawn from these corrupt and degrading dodgings and shirkings is simple. Let the genuine Radicals turn from the collection of incompetent tricksters, and the battered and disgraced idols whom they hold up to our worship, and concern themselves with the serious questions of the day. Shall England make alliance with reactionary powers to crush out Revolution? Must we always have some piratical war on hand in order to conquer a fresh cheating-market for the harm of barbarous countries and our own unhappy population? Must we always have a mass of unemployed workmen hanging about, till to many of them, by the force of habit, work becomes impossible, and they are turned into mere loafers, a constant disgrace and a periodical terror to Society? Are we to be for ever satisfied with bestowing "mere subsistence livelihood" (i.e., semi-starvation) on the lower part of our labouring classes? Are the members of the artizan class for ever to be condemned to live poorly, without leisure or pleasure, in constant anxiety of falling into the gulf below them? Is the lower middle-class for ever to be stupid, vacant, and vulgar, and the upper middle-class to oscillate between blank Philistinism and simpering preciosity? In fine, why are these "classes," and what end do they serve? Let them face these questions unconventionally, and in the spirit of men who have abandoned the idea of finality in politics and social matters, and the old parties will soon be united in desperate opposition to the one Party of Progress, the Socialist Party.

A DREAM OF JOHN BALL.

HE said: "Many strange things hast thou told me that I could not understand; yea, some my wit so failed to compass, that I cannot so much as ask thee questions concerning them; but of some matters would I ask thee, and I must hasten, for in very sooth the night is worn old and grey. When thou sayest that in the days to come, when there shall be no labouring men who are not thralls after their new fashion, that their lords shall be many and very many, it seemeth to me that these same lords, if they be many, shall hardly be rich, or but very few of them, since they must verily feed and clothe and house their thralls, so that that which they take from them, since it will have to be dealt out amongst many, will not be enough to make many rich; since out of one man ye may get but one man's work; and pinch him never so sorely, still as aforesaid ye may not pinch him so sorely as not to feed him. Therefore, though the eyes of my mind may see a few lords and many slaves, yet can they not see many lords as well as many slaves; and if the slaves be many and the lords few, then some day shall the slaves make an end of that mastery by the force of their bodies. How then shall thy mastership of the latter days endure?"

"John Ball," said I, "mastership hath many shifts whereby it striveth to keep itself alive in the world. And now hear a marvel: whereas thou sayest these two times that out of one man ye may get but one man's work, in days to come one man shall do the work of a hundred men—yea, of a thousand or more: and this is the shift of mastership that shall make many masters and many rich men."

John Ball laughed. "Great is my harvest of riddles to-night," said he; "for even if a man sleep not, and eat and drink while he is a-working, ye shall but make two men or three at the most out of him."

Said I: "Sawest thou ever a weaver at his loom?"

"Yea," said he, "many a time." He was silent a little, and then said: "Yet I marvelled not at it; but now I marvel, because I know what thou wouldst say. Time was when the shuttle was thrust in and out of all the thousand threads of the warp, and it was long to do; but now the spring-staves go up and down as the man's feet move, and this and that leaf of the warp cometh forward and the shuttle goeth in one shot through all the thousand warps. Yea, so it is that this multiplieth a man many times. But look you, he is so multiplied already; and so hath he been, meseemeth, for many hundred years."

"Yea," said I, "but what hitherto needed the masters to multiply him more? For many hundred years the workman was a thrall bought and sold at the cross; and for other hundreds of years he hath been a villein—that is, a working-beast and a part of the stock of the manor on which he liveth; but then thou and the like of thee shall free him, and then is mastership put to its shifts; for what should avail the mastery then, when he no longer owneth the man by law as his chattel, nor any longer by law owneth him as stock of his land, if the master hath not that which he on whom he liveth may not lack and live withal, and cannot have without selling himself?"

He said nothing, but I saw his brow knitted and his lips pressed together as though in anger; and again I said: "Thou hast seen the weaver at his loom: think how it should be if he sit no longer before the web and cast the shuttle and draw home the sley, but if the shed open of itself and the shuttle of itself speed through it as swift as the eye can follow, and the sley come home of itself; and the weaver standing by and whistling The Hunt's up! the while, or looking to half-a-dozen looms and bidding them what to do. And as with the weaver so with the potter, and the smith, and every worker in metals, and all other crafts, that it shall be for them looking on and tending, as with the man that sitteth in the cart while the horse draws. Yea, at last so shall it be even with those who are mere husbandmen; and no longer shall the reaper fare afield in the morning with his hook over his shoulder, and smite and bind and smite again till the sun is down and the moon is up; but he shall draw a thing made by men into the field with one or two horses, and shall say the word and the horses shall go up and down, and the thing shall reap and gather and bind, and do the work of many men. Imagine all this in thy mind if thou canst, at least as ye may imagine a tale of enchantment told by a minstrel, and then tell me what shouldst thou deem that the life of men would be amidst all this, men such as these men of the township here, or the men of the Canterbury guilds."

"Yea," said he; "but before I tell thee my thoughts of thy tale of wonder, I would ask thee this: In those days when men work so easily, surely they shall make more wares than they can use in one country-side, or one good town, whereas in another, where things have not gone as well, they shall have less than they need; and even so it is with us now, and thereof cometh scarcity and famine; and if people may not come at each others' goods, it availeth the whole land little that one country-side hath more than enough while another hath less; for the goods shall abide there in the storehouses of the rich place till they perish. So if that be so in the days of wonder ye tell of (and I see not how it can be otherwise), then shall men be but little holpen by making all their wares so easily and with so little labour."

I smiled again and said: "Yea, but it shall not be so; not only shall men be multiplied a hundred and a thousand fold, but the distance of one place from another shall be as nothing, so that the wares which lie ready for market in Durham in the evening may be in London on the morrow morning; and the men of Wales may eat corn of Essex and the men of Essex wear wool of Wales; so that so far as the flitting of goods to market goes, all the land shall be as one parish. Nay, what say I? Not as to this land only shall it be so, but even the Indies, and far countries of which thou knowest not, shall be, so to say, at every man's door, and wares which now ye account precious and dear-bought, shall then be common things bought and sold for little price at every huckster's stall. Say then, John, shall not those days be merry, and plentiful of ease and contentment for all men?"

"Brother," said he, "meseemeth some doleful mockery lieth under these joyful tidings of thine; since thou hast already partly told me to my sad bewilderment what the life of man should be in those days. Yet will I now for a little set all that aside to consider thy strange tale as of a minstrel from over sea, even as thou biddest me. Therefore I say that if men still abide men as I have known them, and unless these folk of England change as the land changeth—and for sooth of the men, for good and for evil, I can think no other than I think now, or behold them other than I have known them and loved them—I say if the men be still men, what will happen except that there should be all plenty in the land, and not one poor man therein, unless of his own free will he chose to lack and be poor, as a man in religion or such like; for there would then be such abundance of all good things that as greedy as the lords might be, there would be enough to satisfy their greed and yet leave good living for all who laboured with their hands; so that these should labour far less than now, and they would have time to learn knowledge, so that there should soon be no learned and unlearned, for all should be learned; and they would have time also to learn how to order the matters of the parish and the hundred, and of the parliament of the realm, so that the king should take no more than his own; and to order the rule of the realm, so that all men, rich and unrich, should have therein; and so by undoing of evil laws and making of good ones, that fashion would come to an end whereof thou speakest, that rich men make laws for their own behoof; for they should no longer be able to do thus when all had part in making the laws; whereby it would soon come about that there would be no men rich and tyrannous, but all should have enough and to spare of the increase of the earth and the work of their own hands. Yea surely, brother, if ever it cometh about that men shall be able to make things, and not men, work for their superfluities and that the length of travel from one place to another be made of no account, and all the world be a market for all the world, then all shall live in health and wealth; and envy and grudging shall perish. For then shall we have conquered the earth and it shall be enough; and then shall the kingdom of heaven be come down to the earth in very deed. Why lookest thou so sad and sorry? what sayest thou?"

I said: "Hast thou forgotten already what I told thee, that in those latter days a man who hath nought save his own body (and such men shall be far the most of men) must needs pawn his labour for leave to labour? Can such a man be wealthy? Hast thou not called him a thrall?"

"Yea," he said; "but how could I deem that such things could be when those days should be come wherein men could make things work for them?"

CORRESPONDENCE.

JOIN HANDS ALL ROUND.

It is known to the readers of 'Josephus' that the cause of the Jewish defeat by the Romans was due to the differences which existed between their various sects, which, instead of uniting together to fight the enemy, exhausted their strength in fighting with each other. The above statement ought to serve as a lesson to us Socialists, Anarchists, Communists, etc. It is painful to see the discord between the various sects, how one attacks the other, and how each one pulls in a different direction. Can any one suppose that with such actions we will ever reach that for which we strive?

We find among us: State Socialists, Revolutionary Socialists, Christian Socialists, Anarchists, Communists, Communistic-Anarchists, Socialistic-Anarchists, and Collectivists; each one of these denounces the others. Yet we are all the children of the same parent, namely—The Present System, and we all aim to free humanity from its chains of slavery. But it may be said: "How can we unite together when we disagree in the means and in the ends?" Nonsense! There are no such differences between Socialism and Anarchism which should render their advocates so antagonistic. It is only owing to the ambition of idealists, who wish to show their ideas superior to those of others; it seems as though we all intended to spend our time, talents, and energy in discussing ideas and deserting the real work.

I will now endeavour to show the identity of Socialists and Anarchists in means and in ends. Socialists accuse Anarchists as preachers of violence, but Anarchists never preached unreasoned violence as the means of overthrowing the present system. They are as intelligent as Socialists, and they know that through riots we shall not gain our demands; they preach that violence should be met with violence, and who is justified in asserting the contrary? Anarchists attack Socialists as depriving them of individual liberty. What is individual liberty? Every individual should have liberty to live on this earth; every individual should have liberty to work; every individual should have the liberty to enjoy all the wealth he has produced; and every individual should have liberty to obtain education according to his or her talents. Does not Socialism grant all these liberties? What is the individual liberty which one would not be able to exercise under Socialism? Such individual liberties through which the liberties of others are injured of course would be denied, but this Anarchists admit.

Again, Anarchists are scared at the Socialistic laws, State, Government, but forget that although the same in name it will be different in nature. As regards laws. I do not see what they are afraid of; if they would only carefully consider the Socialistic plan they would realise that laws as they exist now shall cease. In fact, I do not see a necessity for any laws; when you examine the present laws you find the greatest part of them treating on private property; laws regulating capital and labour; laws of bankruptcy, strikes, boycotts, etc.; laws about armies and navies, and so forth. All these, and many others, could not exist under Socialism, and therefore laws will be out of place. The State will not be what it is now, it will merely be as a committee in a society to transact the business of the society. What can such a state do to oppress the people? Even according to the Anarchistic theory there must be some appointed to carry on the business of the group, I mean a medium who shall collect the products from the producers and distribute it to the consumers.

After all, let us not forget that the chains of oppression will be broken, and all will have liberty to live according to their pleasure. There will be no Russian despot or Bismark to prevent. Why should we quarrel about such details while the principal thing is yet so far off? Agitate the Social Revolution to the down-trodden workers and to all other people of sorrow; let us all unite, and thus be better able to fight the enemy. Having said so much, I venture to suggest that a Conference should take place of all the various bodies under the banner of revolution, also such as Trade Unionists, Knights of Labour, at which should be considered the best method for the emancipation of the workers, even the adoption, perhaps, of one common platform for which we could work, so that we may not be like scattered sheep, each going a different direction, but all united under one banner and one name we should march toward the Golden Future.

"THE PINCH OF POVERTY."

It is pleasant to see how, as soon as one sets to work seriously to consider the present condition of things, he is immediately led towards Socialism. Geo. R. Sims, who has floundered into the question of our present social system, in his article "The Pinch of Poverty" in the Daily News, after telling us that "We cannot get rid of poverty altogether," has contrived to discover "any one who wishes to invite the co-operation of the governing classes in attacking the causes of poverty must be hampered by the knowledge that he is inviting the men upon whose support he relies to smash, destroy, and pulverise some of their most cherished and venerated superstitions. Many of the altars upon which the poor are sacrificed are the altars of the very gods whom the rich regard as the presiding deities of their own prosperity;" that "the causes of a vast number of cases of distress among working people" are "too many children and too much rent," and that "one cannot be satisfied with the state of affairs as it now exists." Without entering on his ideas with regard to working folk having too many children, which seem to me to resolve themselves into the belief that working-men and women have no right to the physical constitution of human beings; or else, that there should be greater prostitution; it is well to observe that he has come, somewhat late perhaps, to the conclusion. "Directly we have found out how to give the poor three or four rooms for the price they are now paying for one or two we have commenced operations against one of the attackable causes of over-population." Moreover, "the conditions under which the poor are compelled to live cause them to be vicious, drunken, and improvident. They are housed in a condition favourable to vice, their surroundings are favourable to drunkenness, and the lack of protection given to their earnings and their savings is favourable to improvidence. The poor are systematically overcharged for lodging and for food, and there is little or no security for their savings." In an earlier portion of the same article he says, "Divide a given quantity of anything among a certain number of people, and, if some have considerably more than their share, then some must have considerably less." A truism, certainly, yet not obvious to all. This sort of writing is surely a mark of progress, coming as it does from one whose delight seems to be his, apparently self-assumed, office of Advertiser-in-Waiting to the Court. G. P.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

The Strike Committee.

The Committee during the past week have received correspondence from various centres of industry which has been acted on. A leaflet on "Strikes and the Labour Struggle," has been issued which the committee will be pleased to send to any one willing to distribute it at places where strikes are taking place. Arrangements have also been made for the distribution of literature at the miners' conference at Birmingham on Jan. 12. Mainwaring gave in a report of the work he had been able to do on behalf of the committee in South Wales. He stated that there was good ground for the propagation of our ideas, the workers having given up all hope of bettering their condition as the struggle is now carried on. H. A. Barker having been elected general secretary of the Socialist League, resigned from Strike Committee. J. Lane was appointed secretary in his place. The committee would urge all those in sympathy to give what financial aid they can that the work may be carried on effectively. J. LANE, Gen. Sec.

THE GLASS-BOTTLE MAKERS.

A lock-out which will affect between 4000 and 5000 men and boys has taken place in the Yorkshire glass-bottle trade. All the masters who are connected with the Yorkshire Glass-Bottle Manufacturers' Association have intimated to their men that from this week their wages will be reduced, the proposed reductions being 3s. per man per week, and 1s. per gross on the overwork. This reduction is declared on all wages irrespective of amount, so that the bottle-makers, who earn 30s. per week, the bottle-blowers, who earn 28s., and the gatherers, who earn 25s., will be equally affected.

At Mexborough, Swinton, Conisborough, and Kilmhurst, the glass-works have been stopped.

At Messrs. Redfern's, Old Mill Glass-Works; and Messrs. Wade and Dobson's, Oak Glass-Works, Barnsley, the men ceased work on Friday, having failed to come to any terms with their employers.

A conference of glass-blowers took place at Mexborough on Saturday afternoon. The proceedings were private, but it would seem that the men are almost unanimous in favour of "holding out"—for a few weeks at least. Some say that the masters will be ready enough to send for the workmen to return at the old rate of wages after the lapse of a few weeks, and those who thus speculate are desirous to exert their influence in preventing any concession being made by the glass-blowers. On the other hand, the manufacturers assert that they cannot continue operations unless the men meet them in a reasonable spirit, owing to the keen competition in Lancashire and elsewhere, where the wages are from 3s. to 4s. per week lower.

From 15 to 20 firms in different parts of the country will consequently suspend business to a great extent, although in many cases the "green-flint" hands will continue working. The men have been in the habit of working nine hours and a quarter per day per week of five days.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—Last Saturday, the Northumberland miners met the coal-owners, on the latter demanding 15 per cent. reduction. The men made a counter proposal, which was rejected, and the negotiations were broken off. The owners then held a consultation, and decided to issue on Thursday, Jan. 13, a fortnight's notice to the miners to terminate their contracts, as a result of their non-acceptance of the reduction demanded. Twenty thousand men are affected.

COLLIERS' STRIKE.—Fifteen hundred men and lads came out on strike on Monday at New Seaham Colliery, the property of the Marquis of Londonderry, owing to the dispute between union and non-union men. Last night the unionists held a meeting and decided to remain out until the masters undertook to see that the non-union men descended the pit apart from the union men.

SLATE QUARRYMEN.—At the Carnarvonshire quarries of Lord Penrhynn, the output for many months has been limited to four days; and in the Festiniog district short time is also being worked, many of the smaller quarries being altogether closed. The North Wales Quarrymen's Union is assisting its members to emigrate to the Welsh colony in Patagonia.

THE TINPLATE WORKERS.—An amicable arrangement has been arrived at in the settlement of the dispute between the Pontypool Tinplate Company and their workmen, the latter agreeing to make a slight concession. The works, which give employment to over 1000 hands, have been stopped for six weeks, and the consequence has been a large amount of distress and destitution. It has been arranged to re-open three large mills on Monday next.

THE LANCASHIRE WEAVERS.—At an important meeting of the Northern Counties Weavers' Associations, held at Blackburn last Saturday, a proposal was made that in consideration of the weavers' associations bringing out the weavers at the Burnley mills, where the overlookers are on strike, the overlookers' association should also bring out overlookers at Ashton, where the weavers have struck, the object being to stop all mills in Burnley and Ashton where strikes exist, with a view to ending these disputes. It was decided to test the feeling of the operatives before taking action.

CHEAP PRINTING.—In pursuing my inquiries into the system of working in offices where labour is so wretchedly underpaid, I almost invariably find that the character of most of the work done is "religious." Thus 90 per cent of Hazell, Watson, & Viney's printing consists of magazines with pious-sounding titles, and which doubtless do much to inculcate doctrines of the "do your duty in that state of life in which it shall please God to call you" order; and other of the goody-goody class of literature, such as The British Workman, which, while indulging in fanciful woodcuts of the model carpenter returning from a job with his basket of tools over his shoulder, holding out one hand in virtuous indignation on seeing a mate quenching his thirst with a modest half-pint of fourpenny, teaches the beautiful doctrine of "Knowing our proper stations, And blessing the Squire and his relations," and "being content, let come what may, With doing our work for four shillings a-day."—London Correspondent of Scottish Typographical Circular.

MR. BRIGHT AND THE TRADES UNIONISTS.—At a meeting of the Birmingham Trades Council last Saturday night, Councillor Granger presiding, a lively discussion took place respecting Mr. Bright's letter on the wages question in the Nottingham lace trade, in which he deprecated the unwise restrictions on labour resulting from the combinations of workmen. Several speakers condemned Mr. Bright as one of the bitterest enemies of trades unions, and it was eventually resolved, with only one dissentient, "That while recognising the very eminent political service rendered by the Right Hon. John Bright to the country, this meeting cannot but express its very deep regret that he should allow himself to be drawn into a correspondence condemnatory of the principle of trades unions, seeing that in his long public career he has had so many opportunities of measuring the enormous benefits these combinations have conferred upon the wealth-producing portion of the community wherever they exist." [Socialists found out long ago that Mr. J. Bright was a fraud, and they got roundly abused in consequence of mentioning the discovery. However, his own household are now awakening, and the above report is instructive. "Let him down gently, Shelve him with care, Fashioned so selfishly, Old and so rare."]

THE TYPOGRAPHICAL CONFERENCE.—The Report of the Conference of Typographical Societies of the United Kingdom, held in London at the end of October of last year, has just been issued to the members of the different unions. At this Conference several important trade matters were discussed, and resolutions adopted on the following subjects:—The gathering of non-unionists into the ranks; arbitration in the settlement of disputes; the unfair use of stereotype in newspapers; the employment only of bona fide machine men on newspapers; reciprocity between the various unions in the matter of the dispensing of society benefits to members; the formation of a national federation; against the systematic working of overtime; a guaranteed minimum number of hours in night work, and payment for standing time; the placing of female compositors on the same status as journeymen; the placing of restrictions on the employment of apprentices; inter-communication between British, Colonial, American, and Continental Societies; the establishment of a weekly trade newspaper (which I should very much like to see); and, of course, the never-failing votes of thanks all round. At the conclusion of the Conference, the delegates were entertained to a dinner by their London brethren, and passed a pleasant time in saying many complimentary things of each other in language usual on such occasions. I note with considerable disgust that the company preceded their after-dinner speeches by the stale, hackneyed toast of "The Queen and Royal Family." Surely the workers might be content with having to support the Queen and her large family, and could very well leave the toasting of her health to dukes, lords, and the Guildhall turtle-soup gentry. "The Cause of the Workers" would have been a toast more worthy; the idlers have always known how to take care of themselves.—W. B.

WAGES IN THE NOTTINGHAM LACE TRADE.—At a largely attended meeting of the Levers branch of the lace trade last Saturday night to hear reports from delegates to the Board of Conciliation as to their acceptance of a reduction of 12 per cent. in order to check the removal of machinery from Nottingham, and enable the manufacturers of the town to compete with those in outlying underpaid places, it was resolved to repudiate the action of the delegates, and to resist the reduction. The threatened strike or lock-out has, however, been averted. The majority of the men have accepted the ruling of the Board of Conciliation and the Lace Operatives' Council, and resumed work under protest.

The effects of competition are being felt by the Nottingham lace-makers in a severe fashion. Their report for 1886 shows that in the last week of November 334 were idle, and this had been the average for two months. The amount paid to the unemployed was very large. The local newspapers remark that in maintaining the unemployed the unions are doing good work by effecting a saving in the rates. This kind of congratulation will show why trade unions are becoming less unsavoury to the middle-class nostrils. As the unions became powerful and kept up wages in Nottingham the masters resorted to the dodge of removing their machinery to districts where cheap labour could be found. This movement has not been very great, but still great enough to cripple the unionists and bring them to terms. The conduct of the "board of conciliation" has evidently not been very satisfactory to the men, who are in favour of continuing the strike now going on. They can only resume work at a reduction of twelve per cent, which will bring them to low enough terms. Anyhow the effects of competition in this case were plain and cruel enough to force the men to look beyond merely making the best of the present conditions.—J. L. M.

AMERICA.

NEW YORK, Jan. 5.—The strike among the coal dock-labourers has extended to the men at Hoboken and Newburgh. The Reading, New Jersey Central, and Lackawanna Railways are affected by the movement. Various collieries in Pennsylvania which ship their coal over the New York Central Railway have stopped work, owing to a strike among their labourers. Eight hundred miners have thus been thrown out of work.

ALBANY, Jan. 5.—The Governor of New York in his annual message to the State Congress makes special reference to the labour question, and advocates shorter hours and better wages for the working classes.

The K. of L. in Elizabeth, N.J., are preparing to start a factory to manufacture overalls, etc. It will start with thirty girls who were discharged from the cordage works.

As a result of the stock-yard strike a license has been secured for a corporation to be known as the Chicago Co-operative Packing and Provision Company. The incorporators are all Knights of Labor.

The K. of L. will operate the Clarksville mines in Arkansas.

Street car employees of Philadelphia propose to buy and co-operative control a street car line.

The Boston Central Labour Union calls on the women to boycott garter made from web manufactured by Thomas Martin.

Messrs. Childs & Drexel, master-printers in the State of Mississippi, have made a splendid gift to the Typographical Union of North America. They have sent a cheque for 10,000 dollars, without condition of any kind, in full confidence that the executive of the Union will use it for the general good.

THE GREAT TROY BOYCOTT.—The firm of Fuller and Warren Co., the contract-breaking stove manufacturers, closed their entire works. The boycott has been too much for them, and at last they have been forced by organised Labour to close their doors. They have been taught the lesson that honest Labour has rights which capital is bound to respect.

FLORIDA.—A correspondent at Narcoossee says: "The signs of it (the Social Revolution) are very visible even here in the pine-woods of this remote corner of the world. Florida is overrun with young Britishers of the middle-class on the hunt for a soft job, and when that is not forthcoming you not unfrequently see them working at hard manual labour in competition with negroes at a dollar a-day." He speaks of the gradual absorption of the "waste" lands of the continent, and says they will not long be un-monopolised, "and then we shall see what we shall see."

THE NEW CAR STRIKE.—BROOKLYN, Dec. 26.—After doing all that was possible to be recognised as an organisation the 2000 men on the Brooklyn City Railroad's lines struck on Thursday morning. There were grievances which they desired to have rectified, but President Lewis would not listen to the Executive Board of the Knights of Labour. He said he would have nothing to do with them. The organisation, he said, had no standing. He snubbed the Board more than once. On Wednesday night the Local Assemblies K. of L. of all the eleven roads met, and after a stormy session in more than one local, it was finally agreed to give the Executive Board power to "tie up." Representatives of the locals met afterward, and were in session until four o'clock Thursday morning, when the result was reached, and the order went out. A bitter fight is in progress. The City Railroad has a large surplus of money, the president and directors are determined to break the power of the Order in Brooklyn, and boast that they can get all the men they want. The police are doing duty on the few cars running. The men know that if the organisation is not recognised they may as well throw up their charters. They know, also, that if they are defeated their positions will be made unbearable by petty bosses, their hours will be extended as of yore, their wages cut down to the starvation line, they will be hounded and harassed, and life itself be not worth living. Would that by a stroke of our pen we could bring all the roads under city and State control. It must come to it. The sooner the better.—John Swinton's Paper.

FRANCE.

SEINE-ET-OISE.—A group of persons of this department have formed a society for Union propaganda amongst the working classes. It will be called the "Union of the workers of Seine-et-Oise."

MARSEILLES.—The cigar-makers of Marseilles to the number of 1200 are on strike. Some dispute arising in the factory, delegates went to the director who refused to receive them. The women then declared themselves on strike and repaired with their grievances to the Prefect of the town, who received the three delegates and heard their claims. Nothing is yet settled.

MALAKOFF.—Ever since 15th June some 15 unfortunate "navvies" of this community have been trying to reclaim from the mayor wages due to them for work in the cemetery. The contractor had declared himself bankrupt, and these workmen were of course among the creditors; but although the mayor was liquidator in the affair, and although moreover he had 25,000 fr. of public money in his charge for the works in question, not a centime could these men get out of him. The man who makes the communication says that he has lately applied to the prefect of the Seine, but without response. What answer could he hope to get from the clerkery at the Prefecture about "such a trifle" and so long ago?

Winter—that is, cold in addition to hunger—has made no effect on the strikers of the "Société Française." The fireless hearth as well as the cupboard without bread finds them standing firm. It is for the whole of the working-class that they have been struggling for months, and of this they are aware. We must not let them wait for funds just at the decisive hour which is now approaching; for the month of January is the last delay possible for agricultural machines, which must be in readiness for the spring. Thus in about three weeks' time, either work will be resumed (not nominally but in reality this time)—and this means the capitulation of the masters and the triumph of our friends re-engaged—or else all's up with Arbel and Co., bankruptcy overtakes them, punishes them and avenges us.—Cri du Peuple.

The feverish activity which is caused in most of the Parisian trades by the provision for the frivolous purchases at the closing of the year is now over and past. The winter stoppage of work which is broken during the few weeks of December, becomes more severe than ever when January appears. The long days of 14, 16, 18 hours, the nights passed amid glaring lights tracing round the eyes circles of red, have given place to the hopeless idleness which empties the cupboard, exhausts credit, and extinguishes the fire on the hearth, killing with cold perhaps the latest born. For the artisan class all years begin again eternally, hopelessly alike. . . . Amidst all political commotions, diplomatic complications, while the low Parliamentary intrigues roll and unroll themselves, the condition of the worker remains the same. . . . On the other hand, in every stroke of speculation, of industrial invention, of war, or of famine, it is the worker, the worker alone who suffers. If cholera, smallpox, or any form of pest invades the country, it is again he who is most cruelly struck. There are no mistakes of the Government for which he is not punished, no national crime he does not expiate, no social evil which does not weigh him down! It is customary for us to be astonished at the patience and indifference of the people. Yet, if anything should surprise us, should it not be that the impulsive force of European nations is not stifled by discouragement and despair as it was stifled for centuries among the ancient races of Asia?—Cri du Peuple.

Here are a few extracts from one of the "Shops and Factories" series of articles in the Cri du Peuple which will assuredly interest our English readers. A man is giving his experience in an oil-mill in a letter written to the Cri: "In the N— oil-mills I was specially charged with the care of the machinery. The works are in action day and night, stopping three times a-day for oiling, and twenty-four hours every second Sunday. The work was done by two employés, myself and another, in spells of twelve hours alternately. . . . Having had bad coal for five weeks, and the shaft being broken off short in a storm, we had to force the fires, and very urgent reparations were necessary. I pointed this out to the director, laying stress on the fact that at the back of the boiler some fifteen men were at work in danger. He promised everything, but as at this season the least stoppage causes ten times more loss than in summer, he contented himself with promising." He goes on to say how he at last, alarmed at the dangerous state of the boiler, gives on his own responsibility the order to stop the machine. The case then appears before the "prud'hommes," the director refusing him his salary on the pretext that he was found wanting in his duty in stopping the works. The man simply demands seven days' wages at 6 fr. 50 c. The master demands, on the other hand, 275 fr. 50 c. for loss caused by his leaving. After hearing the for and against, the president asks the employé "How is it that your successor proceeds with the work if there was danger for you?" Shrugging his shoulders, the man answers by asking significantly, "For my words to be verified must one wait until a number of the men are killed?" Incredible as it may seem, the case ends by his being fined 5 fr. for leaving his post, and, it was added, "to establish a precedent." The master, too, is bidden to pay him his salary and expenses, which he leaves the court vowing he will not do, and promising to prosecute his employé. We must compliment the prud'hommes on the apparently limitless capacity for compromise in the sentences they pass on master and man. Here is a most obvious case of heartless carelessness on the part of the master, which yet goes not only without riprimand, but almost condoned!

BELGIUM.

GHEENT.—A considerable number of weavers have declared a strike at the Coster-Rousseau factory.

CHARLEROI.—Another strike is announced here, 200 workers employed in the mines have ceased work; some men in the mines of Vicoigne near Charleroi, have also stopped work.

AMERCEUR.—The miners of Amersœur are holding out firmly in spite of all tentatives on the part of the director. The miners claim 11 hours' work at 4 francs a-day; formerly they worked 16 hours, receiving only 2fr. 80c. The union of the miners of Gohysart-Jumet held a meeting last week, at which it was unanimously decided to continue the strike until the miners get what they demand. All the unions and societies of the Centre are helping their comrades of Amersœur to the best of their ability, sending what money they can afford, the co-operative bakehouse of Jolimont sending bread. The strikers have held out for two months as yet.

AUSTRIA.

VIENNA, Jan. 6.—The exceptional Court has condemned Otto Steidl to five and Joh. Ondricek and Jos. P. Schwarz to three years' imprisonment with hard labour, aggravated by one fasting in the month. These "Anarchists" have been accused because of forgery of coin they committed, in conjunction with Wilhelm Bachreht, an engraver, who apparently played the part of an agent provocateur, and afterwards came forth as a witness for the prosecution. The Public Prosecutor endeavoured indeed to prove that the accused were tools in the hands of an alleged Anarchist party, but he failed completely, not even the Court, which commonly is no great friend of the Anarchists, adhered to this opinion, on the contrary stating that the crime was committed by the accused with the police for their teachers. From a previous letter you will gather that among us a union can only be formed with the permission of the Government. The Socialists are being en masse and always persecuted, because they are suspected of forming secret unions without the knowledge of the authorities. And the proofs upon which these arbitrary prosecutions are based? When you subscribe to an organ of the party; when you possess in your room the image of an eminent comrade; you are in peril of being accused of being a member of a secret union, as learned to their sorrow ten comrades of the Politic Union in Prague, of whom two have been under arrest during five months, the other two during seven months, before the bill of indictment has been handed to them! After this long inquiry, two have been condemned to 14 days' imprisonment and expulsion, a third to 3 weeks', and a fourth to 3 days' arrest. A letter from Prague states that in that town we have never less than fifty to sixty Socialists under arrest—a fine charitable institution in the ruling depression and crisis! Notwithstanding these obstacles, the party exists and grows ever stronger, though this growth cannot be always perceived on the surface, owing to the situation so often described in this paper. That the Austrian workers may more and more unite and adhere to our party fighting for their welfare, is our "happy New Years" wish.—F. S.

SPAIN.

M.LDRID.—A goodly number of those soldiers who have been in prison since the insurrection in last September, have made their escape from the military prison at the San Franciscan convent in a simple and direct way, which does credit to the turnkeys of the prison, and makes one feel hopeful about the revolutionary sympathies of guard, sentries, etc. The simple, child-like method worked as follows: When the prisoners' friends, who are allowed to stay with them until the warders lock up at night, wanted to leave the prison in the evening, they found the inner door locked and no one near it. It was then discovered that turnkeys and gatekeepers had decamped, taking the seven revolutionaries with them, and thoughtfully locking the doors on the governor of the prison and the visitors, to release whom locksmiths had to be called in aid. "Singularly enough," as an English journal naively remarks, the military guard and sentries at the outer door noticed nothing unusual. "None so blind as those that won't see."

MR. HENRY GEORGE AND THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.—NEW YORK, Jan. 10.—Father McGlynn, who was summoned to Rome by the Pope to explain his advocacy of Mr. Henry George's land theories, has declined compliance with the request of his Holiness.

IRELAND.—On Friday week a process-server was on his way to serve some of the tenantry at Armagh, but the signal was given of his approach, and, as if by magic, about 300 women appeared and took possession of a bridge about a mile from the place. This was too much for the official, who fled incontinently. On the Saturday following nearly 500 people gathered near a bailiff's house on Lord Dillon's property, while many other groups gathered at given points, and their signal system was so perfect that the bailiffs could not evade them. A regular patrol system is kept up, and questionable individuals watched. At Fairmount, on the borders of Roscommon and Mayo, on Sunday week a great meeting took place, at which much money went into the hands of trustees. Meetings have been and are being still held all over the country, with the same result. During his examination on Friday 7, General Buller, in answer to the question whether certain correspondence had not passed between the Sub-Sheriff of Cork and Inspector Moriarty, said: "It is not correct to say that it passed, because, although that letter was written by Mr. Moriarty, it was apparently received by United Ireland, and not by the Sub-Sheriff of Cork." (Laughter.) "But it was sent?" "Oh, yes; and in due time it reached what many people believe to be the real centre of government!" In speaking of the evictions carried out at Cappagh, a wild and desolate district about eight miles from Killarney, the Daily News correspondent says: "Patrick O'Leary, who was first evicted, has nine children, most of them of tender years. His wife carried a young baby in her arms. The scene was of an exceptionally distressing character. The mother and children-cried piteously to be allowed in their homestead, but the bailiffs said they were instructed by the agent, Mr. S. M. Hussey, not to permit them in as caretakers. To add to the unpleasantness of the scene, the eviction was carried out under a heavy down-pour of rain, and the children, all of whom were barefooted, sought shelter by the side of the ditch. The next tenant evicted was a man named Timothy Looney, and here also a scene somewhat similar to the previous one was witnessed. Looney has seven children, his wife, and his father, an old man eighty years of age, who had to be assisted on crutches out of the house. As they also were not readmitted as caretakers they improvised shelter by the side of the ditch. Both tenants owed about three years' rent for a large tract of mountain land at £25 a-year."

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Friday, Jan. 7th, A. K. Donald discussed the 4th chapter of the 'Socialist Catechism.'—L. W.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, January 5, Edward Carpenter gave very interesting and instructive lecture on "Railway Companies." He pointed out very clearly that the misery and hardships of the railway employees is due to the system which allows the shareholders and bondholders to take £3 for doing nothing, for every £2 received as wages by those who do all the work. Good discussion followed. The meeting closed with the song, "The Starving Poor of Old England." On Sunday, January 9, C. J. Faulkner lectured on "Inhuman Arithmetic," brisk discussion ensued, and good reply. 48 Commonweals and several pamphlets sold. Members' Branch cards for 1887 are ready.—W. B. and T. E. W., joint-secs.

CROYDON.—Last Sunday evening, D. J. Nicoll gave an amusing address on "The Charms of Civilisation" as displayed in the manners and customs of our middle-classes. Pagan festivities and the weather still militate against anything like good audiences, but making due allowance for these disturbing elements our audience was very fair.—A. T., ast.-sec.

HAMMERSMITH.—On Sunday, Jan. 2, J. L. Mahon lecturing on "Political Economy," recommended Socialists to read our comrade Carruther's 'Communal and Commercial Economy' as an able refutation of Mill and other orthodox exponents of the "dismal science," who, the lecturer said, were in the habit of ignoring other social systems than the present profit grinding commercial one, to which their theories almost exclusively applied. On New Year's day the Branch entertained themselves and their friends at an "evening party." The room was decorated with hangings, tapestries, and pictures lent by comrades Morris and Crane. Comrade Scheu sang Morris's "All for the Cause" to the new music by E. Belfort Bax. On Sunday, Jan. 9th, E. Belfort Bax gave us an interesting philosophical discourse, entitled "The New Ethic." He said that both the theological theories of Plato, the elder Stoics, Christ, and Buddha, and the materialistic ethics of Epicurus, Spencer, Comte, Bentham, and Mill, were developing into and being superseded by a new social morality, of which we see germs in the working-class movement of today, and which, unlike the elder systems, has for its aim the creation of an ideal individual through ideal society, and not an ideal society through ideal individuals.—W.

HACKNEY.—On Saturday we held our concert in aid of the club funds, which went off very successfully. On Sunday evening, H. Davis lectured on "Trade Unions, their Weakness and Strength." A lively and interesting discussion followed.—H. MATTHEWS, sec.

MERTON.—Last Sunday, comrade Mahon lectured upon "Working-class Orthodox Movements," passing in review the co-operative and trades union movements. He said that they failed to solve the labour problem, and only raised a few working-men into a better position at the expense of the mass. It behaved us to watch narrowly the attempts now being made to set the aristocracy of labour against those comprising the fringe, and to preach persistently the solidarity of the workers. Comrades Curtis, Harman, and Kitz also spoke.—F. K., hon. sec.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday evening, comrades Glasier and Downie addressed a good open-air meeting on Jail's Square. No open-air meetings were held on Sunday owing to the cold weather, but leaflets were distributed. On Sunday evening, in the Hall, Carlton Place, Dr. Cecil Reddie gave an exceedingly interesting and suggestive lecture on "The Anatomy and Physiology of Society." The lecturer drew an analogy between the animal and social organisation, from which he deduced an admirable plea for Socialism. A number of questions and considerable discussion followed the lecture.

LANCASTER.—The foe is already hard at work amongst those we have not so far reached, teaching them the "real truth" about Socialism, viz., that it is mere jealousy of other men's goods, and that, saving such dreamers as those who dote over Socialist ideals poetically, H. W. Beecher's advice as to exterminating them as copperheads and rattlesnakes ought stringently to be followed. However, as revolutionaries we are not too pale with paralysed fear at what we must naturally expect, and are actually working yet. Meetings at the small room, Market Hall Coffee Tavern, every Friday night. Last meeting, comrade Simpson was chairman, and Wyatt and Leonard Hall spoke.—LEONARD HALL, sec.

NORWICH.—We held meetings on Sunday as follows: Waterloo Road at 11 a.m., Sun Lane at 11.30 a.m., and Mill Hill at 12, addressed by Henderson; St. Mary's Plain at 11, by Mowbray; Market Place at 3, by Mowbray and Henderson; and Agricultural Hall at 7, by Mowbray; Mowbray gave a lecture at 8, subject, "Political Economy and the Labourers." Our meeting on Monday, Jan. 3, of unemployed, was attended by upwards of 6000 people, and was a great success. We held another unemployed meeting on Monday morning, which had not been announced, but was attended by over 1500 people. Several of our members are out of employment. Our comrade who took the chair at our meeting last Sunday night, was discharged next morning. We have started a fund to commemorate the Jubilee Year by building a Socialist hall. Slaughter is treasurer, Crotch, Mills, and Houghton trustees.—C. W. M., sec.

OXFORD.—The Branch had a social gathering on Thursday, Jan. 6, when nearly sixty members and friends sat down to tea. Afterwards we had singing, in which the "Marseillaise," "March of the Workers," and "England Arise" figured prominently, dancing, and short Socialistic speeches.—F. M., sec.

Notice to Provincial Branches, Members, and Correspondents.

At the suggestion of several country Branches, comrade Mahon has set off on a provincial propagandist tour. The route will be by Oxford, Bedford, Birmingham, Leicester, Nottingham, and Sheffield. At Manchester a few days' stay will be made, to work up the neighbouring districts. Liverpool, Preston (perhaps), and Lancaster will be visited next, after which Leeds will be made a centre of stay, and visits made to the Branches at Bingley and Bradford, and the districts of Shipley, Castleford, Wakefield, etc. After this Mahon will go on to the Hull Branch, and from thence up to Newcastle and Shields, returning by Hull to the Norwich and Ipswich Branches, and from thence back to London. Any Socialists or sympathisers willing to get up meetings at any place convenient to this route are invited to communicate with Mahon. Letters addressed to 13 Farringdon Road, London, E.C., will be forwarded.

NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS.

PRINCE BISMARCK has made his speech, set all Europe guessing as to what it might mean, had his Army Bill thrown out, and dissolved the Reichstadt, and now he is to have another by March; energetic work enough, but what does it all mean? First, one may suppose that he knows he is not going to live much longer, as he said, and that he wants to leave the German army still the tremendous engine for the purpose of reaction which it has been for so long; which it cannot be unless it is systematically increased and perfected. As to his speeches, so plain-spoken and yet so capable of reading between the lines, doubtless a great deal of the threatening and ominously warning tone of them was due to the fact that he wanted to scare, not the present Reichstadt (for doubtless he expected the hostile majority), but the electors of the new House to assemble in March. Therefore, no doubt he was bound to make the most of the possibilities of a French war, of the prowess of the French army, and the terrible results of a French victory; and that all the more as he was also bound to parade the good understanding between Germany and Russia, so as at one blow to destroy the hopes of Austria for German help against the advance of Russia in her direction; and also to point out to the French that when the day for the advance of the German army came no attack on their rear from the Russians need be expected. Since it had to be made clear that no danger was to be apprehended from that quarter, the danger in the other quarter had to be made the most of.

Nevertheless, all deductions made, the speeches of Prince Bismark were ominous enough; let everything be ready they seemed to mean for the demand on the French of disarming under pain of invasion; and who shall say how long it will be before that demand will be made? Nor need any one think that Prince Bismark's defeat the other day means relief from imminent war; the army is to be duly augmented, vote or no vote; and the necessities of electioneering will force the Chancellor to appeal to the Jingo spirit in the forthcoming contest, so that we may expect an increase and not a decrease in the fever of German "patriotism"; as it is pretty certain that Prince Bismark will sweep the table clear in the coming elections and have a big majority at his back.

And what then? Will not this be the position? The German bourgeoisie will practically say, Germany as she is is too poor to bear this big army ever crying out for fresh steps towards perfection; in order to avoid its eating its head off, it must undertake some expedition, the result of which will be expansion for German commerce on the grand scale.

"Thou hast a fine sword, my son," says the father in an eastern tale, "but where is the head for the shearing?" "Doubt not, father," says the son, "but that I shall soon find a head for the shearing." No doubt the primary use of the German army is the upholding of "law and order" in its own land, but to find "a head for the shearing" is necessary for it as for all other such weapons in the hands of reactionary Governments.

The "great Liberal meeting" of January 12 was of course a regular caucus meeting. No doubt from that point of view it was a success, the present staggering of the Tory party being an encouraging sight for Liberals, as they are beginning to feel sanguine (rightly or wrongly) of having one more innings as a party—perhaps as a "united" party. All, however, was not unity at the meeting; a section of the Radicals perceiving that the fate of their party would be to be smothered under the incumbent weight of conventional Liberalism, moved an amendment, put forward by a prominent Chelsea Radical and Mr. Foote on behalf of the Metropolitan Radical Federation, which had the fate of Cassandra's warnings, as might have been foreseen. Mr. Bradlaugh, in a speech which gave the Daily News ecstasies of delight, took the side of respectability, and practically begged the Radicals to allow themselves to be smothered, lest the party organisation should be weakened before the Tories. So the London Liberals and Radicals are declared "united"—until next time.

There were some demonstrations in the hall, however, with which the more respectable part of the meeting could only have been half pleased. But it is a pity that those genuine Radicals who were there couldn't see that it will not advance things much to merely hiss

"God save the Queen" and cry out for the "Marseillaise." Strange that they don't understand that the changes which such demonstrations hint at will not be allowed to be furthered in the party of such respectable persons as Mr. Bradlaugh and Mr. Shaw-Lefevre! The Liberal Party is willing to use the Radicals to attack the Tories on the one hand and snub the Socialists on the other; but mighty little of their own way will they have, till at last they will look round and find the Liberal Party gone and themselves a weak army indeed before the united forces of Reaction, and weak not only from want of numbers or cohesion, but from what is worse, lack of definite principles.

The best advice one can give to Radicals at present is to stick tight to genuine Home Rule and the attack on landlordism in Ireland, and to see where that will lead them—it will not be into the arms of the "Respectable Party." Unless they make up their minds to give up all their aspirations towards freedom, and all attempt to look seriously into social questions, the Respectable Party will not want them long.

Meantime the Conference of Conciliation has met and—parted—till after Parliament meets, or the Greek Kalends, as the case may be. The idea still seems to hold that Jonah is to walk the plank with all decency, in the interest at once of the Unity of the British Empire and the Unity of the Liberal Party. Truly our recognised political parties are running an eager race towards the goal of Unlimited Shabbiness, and 'tis hard to say which will get there first.

Our comrade Mahon tried to get a hearing at the Mansion House meeting about the Colonial Institute, but of course was not allowed to speak to foregone conclusions. In fact the promoters of this scheme are quite right to do their best to prevent all discussion on the subject, as even the sheep-like general public are beginning to see that it is nothing but a barefaced job, bolstered up by servility and flunkeyism of the basest kind. However, since the money to float it will only be a part of the general robbery of labour, it would be scarcely worth while noticing it if it were not for the astounding impudence of it, and its connection with the humbug of Imperial Federation which is being so busily pushed forward by one of our Philistines. A scheme which, with much parade and volumes of clap-trap speeches from those who are paid to lie to the people in various ways, proposes to collect money and do with it something (not specified) for the honour and glory of the empire, is worth noting as a triumph of jobbery, even in these days.

W. MORRIS.

POET AND POLITICIAN.

Two men have spoken out their thought upon the affairs of to-day, two men much alike in many things, and both of them figures that fill a large space in the record of our time. Both old; both having negated in the chill of age the sentimental starting-points of their youth, diverse as they were; both steeped in bourgeois tradition and fulfilled of the spirit of the present system; Alfred "Lord" Tennyson has from the "wisdom" of his age answered the exuberance of his early manhood, and William Ewart Gladstone has criticised the performance, and given his version of the true verdict.

Wellnigh inexorably does fate avenge the proneness of youth to accept a belief from mere sentimental adhesion and without due thought. Thus, in either of these men, the poet and the politician, is a curious contrast between their earlier and their later selves. The one, democratic in sentiment—fiercely so—the writer of stirring democratic verse, who saw the labouring folk as "Men, my brothers, men the workers, ever reaping something new, That which they have done but earnest of the things that they shall do," this one now, in place of wearing only what Gladstone calls the "livery of the muse," is become the venal songster of a court and a member of the class of professional hereditary obstructors. The other who began as a Conservative from an emotional clinging to long-established usage, has attained the utmost limit of his possible development, and tentatively dabbles in the side-work of the revolutionary advance, timidly though it be and with much backward shrinking.

In their development, and in their thought-position now, are both of these men wholly formed and governed by the present system. Fervent revolt while young and ardent against conventional formality and unfairness; gradual regression before the opposing forces of established wrong; and at last a bitter outcry from so much of him as remains honest against the hopelessness of things that to him appear inevitable, these are the stages through which Tennyson has passed and through which all must pass, during the last days of a dying civilisation, who have the artistic temperament without a great and abiding strength and power of growth that is possessed by few. Gladstone, again, has grown and has not receded, but by his latest utterance, as by all that have gone before, he has rendered it manifest that though he is able and willing to advance upon the lines of his previous growth, those of old-time Liberalism, he cannot go beyond; he is alarmed and uncertain, knowing nothing of the real forces that are at work to-day nor having prevision of the gigantic change that is preparing. He feels, and is frightened by, the preliminary tremors that bespeak the coming earthquake, but knows not what it is nor what it will bring forth.

Criticism of the poem as a poem, and of the critical treatment accorded it by Mr. Gladstone, would be out of place in these columns, but it is interesting to note how the "old parliamentary hand" betrays even here that, like the dyer's, it has been "subdued to what it works in," and must temporise. In the beginning of his article Mr. Gladstone says, "Yet is his poetic eye not dimmed, nor his natural force abated," while, toward the end, he speaks of "the stunted vitality of his age" that he likens to "a spent cannon-ball."

Knowing its due place and meaning, Socialists may pass the new Locksley Hall unchallenged. It is the wail of one who sees the hellish iniquity of our civilisation, but has not strength to rise against it nor insight sufficient to discern the new birth and growth that are realising themselves, as the present system rots itself into oblivion and prepares to give place to them. It may be taken as the swan-song of the bourgeoisie.

Mr. Gladstone's vision of things demands another treatment. It puts, not unplausibly, the case for advance upon the old lines, and pleads that man be set free that he "may work out his vocation without wanton hindrance," meaning thereby the extension of "free contract" to its uttermost, with some illogical restrictions of exploitation here and there. Hopeless it is to look for further growth from Mr. Gladstone, but the vain wish arises that he were young again in order that he might follow out to its legitimate conclusion his query as to the right of being and cause of existence of the increased and increasing number of leisured men and idle men! He speaks of the improvement as he has seen it in the social conditions of the past half-century and while admitting many imperfections says, "the fair wage of to-day is far higher than it was then, and the unfair wage is assumably (!) not lower." This of the "fair wage" is true—a fair wage being the sum of one's production, and that in many ways has been magnified; but that fair wage is never paid! As to the "unfair wage," even though it were true—which it is not—that in mere amount it is higher, in relation to the increased production and heightened standard of comfort it is incalculably lower. For the truth or falsehood of Mr. Gladstone's assertion that "they work fewer hours" for "increased wages," and "purchase at diminished prices"—in other words that they have improved all round—let the people answer—what their answer is we know! Of what avail is it that the suffrage be widened so long as the voters yet remain slaves of those who own all whereby they must live? or that education is popularised and made compulsory if it be only for the making of monotonous toil more endurable and slave-labour more efficient? If it is "well to be reminded" of the children who "soak and blacken soul and sense in city slime," and of the maidens who are cast in thousands on the street, is it well also to lull oneself to sleep again with a hymn of praise for the tinkering attempts at palliation made by well-intentioned but quite helpless people—people, that is, who are helpless against the economic necessity that makes these things what they are? What benefit to the proletariat has resulted from the reform of "fiscal follies"? such reform having lessened the cost of their subsistence and allowed them to compete the amount saved into the pockets of their masters. Or what good has been gained by amendment of the game laws to a folk who possess no land, and of whom the great mass know "game" only as an appanage of wealth, while those who do know aught else of it, have seen it only in some rich man's covert or in the shop-window of some "purveyor to the aristocracy"? What is gained save temporary relief and a passing quietude by the legislative lessening of taxation, tithe, or rent, in answer to the demand that such exactions be abolished as fundamentally unjust? To sum up, what has the present system to say, even from the mouth of so earnest an apologist, to show cause why it should not be abolished—peaceably if it may; forcibly if it must?

Mr. Gladstone's great plea is that "No greater calamity can happen to a people than to break utterly with its past." To do that is impossible and beyond human power to achieve, and therefore beside the question; but were it possible, we retort, we do not seek it. The change we work for is the natural outcome of the social forces that have carried us thus far, and that, despite alarmist outcries or timid deprecation, will carry through the Social Revolution and replace the present system by one that will more than realise the fairest vision that ever poet spake.

H. HALLIDAY SPARLING.

"CHARITY" ROBBERIES.—We have got the regular batch of begging letters from "charity" institutions, which we get every year at this season. These institutions are mostly run by the men who create and are enriched by the poverty they ask us to palliate by sending them money for the salaries of their officers. Let the capitalists who are the "patrons" of these snabby concerns cease to swindle their hirelings by pocketing the proceeds of their labour, and there will be no need of asking us to give the poor children that food of which robbers have deprived them.—John Swinton's Paper.

WEALTH.

J. H. SMITH on p. 12 of the Commonweal asks: "Of what good to the people can a science be which treats only of wealth and advocates that system in which wealth can be produced most amply and economically, no matter how wretched morally or physically the people, the wealth-producers, may be in consequence of it?" The answer to these questions is: In the first place, that Political Economy advocates no system, the business of science is the discovery of truth; and in the second place that the science which "treats only of wealth" is of paramount importance to the people. To see how important a subject to the human race wealth is, we require to know what is wealth; and it is with a view to arriving at this knowledge that I offer the following fragment, written about two years ago, to the consideration of the readers of the Commonweal.

The subject-matter of political economy is designated by the word "Wealth." Respecting the meaning of this word many different opinions have prevailed and do prevail. Some of these we shall briefly consider.

In an early stage of society, when tribe fought with tribe, when the stronger attacked the weaker and appropriated whatever they wanted, it is easy to see that the community that numbered most would, ceteris paribus, be the wealthiest, for whatever such a community wanted it would take. It would take the best hunting grounds, the richest rivers—the best, in fact, of everything that there was to be had. To enable it to acquire and to retain these possessions, it would require to be sufficiently numerous to cope with hostile tribes, and the more numerous it was the more certain would it be of accomplishing this. Under circumstances like these public feeling would incline to favour the procreation of children and to regard the man that reared a large family as thereby contributing largely to the strength and to the wealth of the community. Here population was a source of wealth, and accordingly it was part of the public policy to stimulate population. This view of wealth and the policy founded upon it continued to infect the laws of this country down to 1834, when Malthus' essay began to take practical effect, as seen in the thorough alteration then made in our Poor Laws. Proof of its past influence still lingers, for at the present day, when a woman gives birth to more than two children at one time she receives from the sovereign a bounty of £1 per child—a custom that no doubt has its origin in the belief that to bear children is to contribute to the wealth of the State.

After a community is fairly established and trading transactions have been introduced, considerations of convenience soon suggest some medium of exchange—money. When money has been in use for a time, it is seen that whoever has money can obtain anything else he may have occasion for. The rich man, the man with money, is now the strong man; he can command the fat of the land. From this it is an easy inference that the rich country, the country with money, is the strong, the wealthy country. Money and wealth now become in public estimation synonymous, and thereupon laws are made with a view to favour those courses that are peculiarly adapted to increase the nation's treasure. "According to the doctrines then prevalent," says John Stuart Mill, "whatever tended to heap up money or bullion in a country added to its wealth; whatever sent the precious metals out of a country impoverished it. . . . Exportation of goods was favoured and encouraged because the exported goods being stipulated to be paid for in money, it was hoped that the returns would actually be made in gold and silver. Importation of anything other than the precious metals was regarded as a loss to the nation of the whole price of the things imported. . . . The commerce of the world was looked upon as a struggle among nations which could draw to itself the largest share of the gold and silver in existence."

This view of wealth persists a long time and makes a deep impression upon the mind and upon the laws of nations. Just as circumstances, however compel a relinquishment of the view already noticed, so do they compel a relinquishment of this. We have been compelled to relinquish the view that makes a large population synonymous with wealth by the dangers attending on overcrowding, and so forcibly have these dangers been brought home in modern times that many believe population to be a source of weakness and not of strength. The view that considers wealth to lie in money is not altogether abandoned yet. It certainly no longer influences the public policy to the extent of inspiring any legislative enactment. It is, however, the source of many a fallacious argument. If annually, for instance, the imports of a country be two millions and the exports only one million, it is often contended that such a country is losing a million every year, is living on its capital, because it must yearly send a million of money to other countries to pay for the additional million of imports. Suppose that to pay for the additional million of imports, a million of sovereigns, or bullion to that amount, is sent out of the country: what is the difference between this and sending out other commodities? The gold that is thus sent out has been previously brought into the country in exchange for goods—it would not be sent in for nothing; and if more gold be wanted to take its place, goods can be sent out for it. Another instance is furnished by landlord absenteeism from Ireland. These landlords are blamed for drawing their rents in Ireland and spending them in England. Suppose that an Irish landlord draws a thousand sterling a-year and spends it in England; all he takes from Ireland is a thousand pounds—a thousand sovereigns say. Suppose, on the other hand, that he remains in Ireland and spends the money there; in this case he consumes in one way and another a thousand pounds' worth. Now a thousand pounds' worth is surely as good as a thousand pounds itself. In either case all that the landlord consumes is a thousand pounds' worth, and in either case it is Ireland that supplies it to him. What difference does it make where he consumes it? None whatever, except on the hypothesis that to take gold from a country is to weaken in some special way, to lessen the wealth of, that country.

We come now to another view of wealth, the view that may be regarded as predominant to-day, the view also that is usually given in text-books on political economy. Wealth consists nowadays in whatever contributes to human gratification, all agreeable or useful things. To these statements is appended the modifying clause, "that possess exchange value." This is the widest view that has prevailed in any age, and it has given rise to a more generous public policy so far as it has prevailed. It was this view that swept away all the vexatious restraints that the mercantile system, or the system that was based upon regarding money as wealth, imposed upon commerce. It, too, would seem to be too narrow, however, for here we are with too many useful and agreeable things—suffering from a plethora of good things—for that is what the phrases "glutted market," "over-production," signify. Just as the two views already noticed led to disasters, so this. Just as the previous views affected public policy also, so has this; for it is this view that is at the bottom of Free Trade. If wealth be regarded as consisting in commodities, it is a natural consequence that men should say, let us throw open our ports, so that we may have access to as many commodities as possible.

These three meanings of the word "wealth" show how important it is that we should endeavour to have a right understanding as to what wealth really is. We see that whatever men consider it to be, so do they strive. In fact, it may be said that wealth has been the word used in any given period of a nation's history to indicate what in the prevailing opinion is good for that nation. Let the meaning attributed by any age to the word "wealth" be known and the aim of that age is also known.

It has never, so far as I am aware, been pointed out by economists that the word "wealth" is an abstract¹ name—that is to say, it is the name of no existing thing or things. It resembles such names as "height," "motion," "beauty," "roundness"; and differs from such names as "river," "horse," "cupboard," "star." No one ever saw height, or motion, or beauty, or roundness; we have all seen high things, moving things, beautiful things, and round things. In the same way no one ever saw wealth; we have seen only wealthy persons or wealthy countries. To define wealth, therefore, as the produce of the land and labour of a country or as all useful and agreeable things possessing exchange value, is as grave an error as it would be to define height as consisting of steeples, trees, chimney-stalks, mountains, etc., or to define motion as trains, hansom-cabs, etc., or roundness as balls, hoops, etc.

Height is what is common to high things, the one point in which all high things, no matter how different in other respects, agree; in the same way motion is what is common to moving things; so wealth is what is common to wealthy persons or wealthy nations. Now if we compare wealthy persons one with another, we find that the only point of resemblance between them all is the possession of power. A man on a desert island with all the gold that had ever been dug would not be a wealthy man. I might possess large estates in an uninhabited country and still be poor. The mere possession of money, of lands, of houses, or of any other material does not confer wealth; there must be present certain circumstances. A sovereign is of no use to me unless others want it and are willing to give me what I want in exchange. Large estates are no use to me unless I have men to work them and unless there are people willing to give me for the produce of these men's toil whatever I may want. Innumerable palaces are no use to me unless there are people willing to give me whatever I may want for the privilege of residing in them. Possessions confer wealth upon a man only when they at the same time confer power. It is the same with nations. Wealthy nations are powerful nations; poor nations are weak nations. Wealth, then, we shall, in the meantime, define as power.

W. B. R.

"After all, effect is what is wanted," says an "artistic" cotemporary. That is the teaching of commercialism summed up in a sentence; disregard truth, never mind about the means, think only of effect; good or bad workmanship does not matter a farthing so as it will sell!—S.

COMMERCE AND CHRISTIANITY.—The most interesting, and, so far as we knew, the first systematic union of missionary and mercantile enterprise, is in the mission of the Free Church of Scotland to Livingstonia. Suggested by Dr. J. Stewart of Lovedale, who had in his youth accompanied Livingstone on the Zambesi, it was taken up by the merchants of Glasgow, independent of, but in harmony with, the missions of the Free Church, and carried on with great liberality and wisdom. A mercantile company was started along with the mission, to show the natives the advantages of commerce by exchange of commodities over the exchange in slaves—a favourite idea of Livingstone's. The natives are learning the lesson, as is seen by the purchase of the soft goods of Manchester, the hardwares of Sheffield, twenty-five tons of beads to adorn their persons, and seven tons of soap. The late Mr. James White, one of the wisest and best of our merchant-princes, was the first chairman of the committee, and Mr. James Stevenson, one of its members, showed his foresight as well as his liberality by giving £4000 for the construction of a road to facilitate commerce and intercourse, besides his large donations to the mission and investments in the trading company. The sum of £18,000 has just been subscribed or promised for carrying on the work for the next five years.—The British Weekly. [The italics are ours. Comment is needless.]

'THE MYSTERY OF THE SHROUD,' AND THE MYSTERY OF CITY JOBBERY.

THAT wordy and dreary representative of book-making talent in the House of Hereditary Imbecility, known among his peers as Duke of Argyll, once had the cheek to move the House to issue as a State Paper one of his books. This attempt to increase circulation at public expense failed.

Public money has often been used that Literature should assist Jobbery; prime ministers have often called in able writers to help on some high-toned swindle of statecraft. Sometimes the minister has been satisfied at what he got for his money, but there have been times when the able author has turned on the initial employer, and a conscience quickened by special study to write up a swindle has done good service in writing the swindle down. Sometimes default in payment or a row in cutting up the spoil has brought about a similar exposure. Some of this old time work one is almost led to forgive, because it was the means by which some literary work was made possible that the world would be sorry to lose.

Powerful as this sort of work was at the beginning of the century, it was as nothing compared with to-day. Pen work tells more than ever; small good to do much without the printing press.

Socialism to-day is the subject of many pens—able and otherwise, for and against. Socialists are tolerably able to answer all that can be fairly brought against them; but a protest has to be made against expenditure of money extracted from Socialist pockets to be fraudulently used against Socialism.

The City of London authorities are old sinners in this sort of work. That foul-smelling abomination old Smithfield was persistently written up and defended, and a large portion of £6000 expended to maintain that plague-spot was spent for literary work. (See 'City of London Corporation Inquiry,' by Sergeant Pulling: Hatchards, 1854.)

Socialists who are ratepayers in the City may like to busy themselves in finding out who is paying for the issue to vestrymen of other parishes of 'The Mystery of the Shroud, a Tale of Socialism.' Arrowsmith's Bristol Library, given a big boom by Conway's 'Called Back,' has supplied the lovers of sensation with one or two fair samples of that article; but by thunder! the one who pays a shilling for the particular hundred and thirty-four small pages, less numerous blanks, under consideration seems to me to be entitled to pity. Fancy any sort of cause being supported by such unadulterated bosh as, "In the second place, the lapse of the coal dues had brought about a most extravagant use of coal, which had tended to saturate the air more completely than heretofore." This is directly in opposition to another and the general statement, that the amount of the tax is so slight that there cannot be any appreciable difference in price. Every sort of lighting, even the electric, was a failure; the police are rendered quite helpless in tracing crime, and therefore the criminals—the Socialists, of course—were more and more audacious; journalists and editors who write against Socialism are either kidnapped or murdered on their own door-steps; cabinet ministers ditto, ditto; London is under a reign of complete and absolute terror. "The Order of the Shroud" lays the rich under tribute to any extent, the levies being sent to unknown persons at untrackable places by means of pigeons (a new breed, evidently, made to go through the densest fogs). Kent and Sussex are worked as mining districts, and chimnies crowd the Thames thick as leaves in Vallambrosa, and the smoke and the fog helps the Socialists in their diabolical work. "The days of the millenium, too," says our sapient author, "appear to be still distant: men are not much better as a mass than they were." He perhaps means not much better for his writing, which is probable. "Socialism and a tendency to revolutionary disorder are undoubtedly on the increase; and there is every reason to fear that should the turbulent element of society ever be organised by abler hands, they would become even in broad daylight, to say nothing of in thick foggy weather, a positive and absorbing danger to the respectable portion of the community."

Under such considerations the coal dues must be at all hazards kept up; "nobody feels them but the owners." "From the coal dues the money can be ungrudgingly spent; from the rates it will always be given out with so stingy a hand that the great task of conserving open spaces would probably fall into abeyance before long."

This is a sample of the rotten logic used to bolster up a rotten case, distributed at some unknown person or body's expense. One can but pity a case which can be supported by such.

One of the "gods" in a theatre noted for blood and blue-fire one night shouted out, "We don't expect no grammar, and we don't expect no plot, but yer might jine yer flats." In shilling startlers we don't expect much grammar or much plot, but we do expect the stuff to sink or swim on its merits (?), and not to be floated into circulation at expense of compulsory taxation of those who suffer by unjust privilege and monopoly.

How much of force there is in the argument used is seen in the City accounts for 1884, which shows that the coal-tax produced £543,966; wine-tax £9396 (note the luxury as compared with the necessity); grain-tax £17,561. Of this the Thames Embankment eat up £307,861, Holborn Viaduct £106,999, the bulk of the balance being expenses.

In conclusion: there are some influential Socialists in the City; can they find out if they are finding the money to be bowled over in the fashion suggested here, and will they take action by way of protest, stop payment?

NOTES.

THE evictions at Glenbeigh and other places during the past week or so, carried out as they were with extreme brutality, have assisted in sapping the foundations of monopoly everywhere. Folk are beginning now to see what we so long have been explaining to them, that it does not condone the possession of an unjust privilege that it is upon the average exercised mildly; that because all landlords are not in the habit of emulating the money-lenders, who are skinning the (dis-)Honourable Roland Winn's estate, there is no guarantee against any of them doing so.

Control over the land, and thereby over all their means of life, gives into the hand of a landlord an enormous power, legal and actual, over his tenants, which is a continual temptation to its use.

When, as in the Glenbeigh case, the exercise of a landlord's power is deputed to a hired scoundrel, brutalised by his previous life, there is no limit to his exactions nor stay to his cruelty.

In Ireland, the homes of honest hard-workers are burnt above their heads, while they themselves are spurned into the bitter winter weather to perish, or be rescued by somebody or another as it may happen. In London, a woman, a type of many, is driven to seek refuge with her child in the workhouse, and in order to satisfy bourgeois justice and duly to protect bourgeois pockets, this woman and her babe are kept outside in the snow, left to moan their miserable lives away unaided, and would infallibly have died were it not for the accident that a humane heart beat in the bosom of a passing policeman, who succoured them. How long shall these things endure and the people die patiently?

"Self-preservation is the first law of life," says Jus. Why, then, do our "Individualist" enemies growl at our trying to get the working-classes to combine for "self-preservation" against monopoly?

Will somebody help to explain? Individualists are complaining through their organ that the municipalities have a way of leaving "their" work to individual action. But combined action on the part of the community must necessarily somewhere interfere with the freedom to "do as you darn please" that Individualists claim; and, if compromise be possible, how far should it go? S.

A DREAM OF JOHN BALL.

"Poor man!" said I. "Learn that in those very days when it shall be with the making of things as with the carter in the cart, that there he sitteth and shaketh the reins and the horse draweth and the cart goeth; in those days, I tell thee, many men shall be as poor and wretched always, year by year, as they are with thee when there is famine in the land; nor shall any have plenty and surety of livelihood save those that shall sit by and look on while others labour; and these, I tell thee, shall be a many, so that they shall see to the making of all laws, and in their hands shall be all power, and the labourers shall think that they cannot do without these men that live by robbing them, and shall praise them and wellnigh pray to them as ye pray to the saints, and the best worshipped man in the land shall be he who by forestalling and regrating hath gotten to him the most money."

"Yea," said he, "and shall they who see themselves robbed worship the robber? Then indeed shall men be changed from what they are now, and they shall be sluggards, dolts, and cowards beyond all the earth hath yet borne. Such are not the men I have known in my life-days, and that now I love in my death."

"Nay," I said, "but the robbery shall they not see; for have I not told thee that they shall hold themselves to be free men? And for why? I will tell thee: but first tell me how it fares with men now; may the labouring man become a lord?"

He said: "The thing hath been seen that churls have risen from the dortoir of the monastery to the abbot's chair and the bishop's throne; yet not often; and whiles hath a bold sergeant become a wise captain, and they have made him squire and knight; and yet but very seldom. And now I suppose thou wilt tell me that the Church will open her arms wider to this poor people, and that many through her shall rise into lordship. But what availeth that? Nought were it to me if the Abbot of St. Albans with his golden mitre sitting guarded by his knights and sergeants, or the Prior of Merton with his hawks and his hounds, had once been poor men, if they were now tyrants of poor men; nor would it better the matter if there were ten times as many Houses of Religion in the land than now are, and each with a churl's son for abbot or prior over it."

I smiled and said: "Comfort thyself; for in those days shall there be neither abbey nor priory in the land, nor monks nor friars, nor any religious." (He started as I spoke.) "But thou hast told me that hardly in those days may a poor man rise to be a lord: now I tell thee that in the days to come poor men shall be able to become lords and masters and do-nothings; and oft will it be seen that they shall do so; and it shall be even for that cause that their eyes shall be blinded to the robbing of themselves by others, because they shall hope in their souls that they may each live to rob others: and this shall be the very safeguard of all rule and law in those days."

"Now am I sorrier than thou hast yet made me," said he; "for when once this is established, how then can it be changed? Strong shall be the tyranny of thy latter days. And now meseems, if thou sayest sooth, this time of the conquest of the earth shall not bring heaven down to the earth, as erst I deemed it would, but rather that it shall bring hell up on to the earth. Woe's me, brother, for thy sad and weary foretelling! And yet said'st thou that the men of those days would seek a remedy. Canst thou yet tell me, brother, what that remedy shall be, lest the sun rise upon me made hopeless by thy tale of what is to be? And, lo you, soon shall she arise upon the earth."

In truth the dawn was widening now, and the colours coming into the pictures on wall and in window; and as well as I could see through the varied glazing of these last (and one window before me had as yet nothing but white glass 'n it), the ruddy glow, which had but so little a while quite died out in the west, was now beginning to gather in the east—the new day was beginning. I looked at the poppy that I still carried in my hand, and it seemed to me to have withered and dwindled. I felt anxious to speak to my companion and tell him much, and withal I felt that I must hasten, or for some reason or other I should be too late; so I spoke at last loud and hurriedly:

"John Ball, be of good cheer; for once more thou knowest as I know that the Fellowship of Men shall endure, however many tribulations it may have to wear through. Look you, a while ago was the light bright about us; but it was because of the moon, and the night was deep notwithstanding, and when the moonlight waned and died and there was but a little glimmer in place of the bright light, yet was the world glad because all things knew that the glimmer was of day and not of night. Lo you, an image of the times to betide the hope of the Fellowship of Men. Yet forsooth, it may well be that this bright day of summer which is now dawning upon us is no image of the beginning of the day that shall be; but rather shall that day-dawn be cold and grey and surly; and yet by its light shall men see things as they verily are, and no longer enchanted by the gleam of the moon and the glamour of the dream-tide. By such grey light shall wise men and valiant souls see the remedy, and deal with it, a real thing that may be touched and handled, and no glory of the heavens to be worshipped from afar off. And what shall it be, as I told thee before, save that men shall be determined to be free; yea, free as thou wouldst have them, when thine hope rises the highest, and thou art thinking not of the king's uncles, and poll-groat bailiffs, and the villainage of Essex, but of the end of all, when men shall have the fruits of the earth and the fruits of their toil thereon, without money and without price. The time shall come, John Ball, when that dream of thine that this shall one day be, shall be a thing that men shall talk of soberly, and as a thing soon to come about, as even with thee they talk of the villains becoming tenants paying their lord quit-rent; therefore, hast thou done well to hope it; and, if thou heedest this also, as I suppose thou heedest it little, thy name shall abide by thy hope in those days to come, and thou shalt not be forgotten."

I heard his voice come out of the twilight, scarcely seeing him though now the light was growing fast, as he said:

"Brother, thou givest me heart again; yet since now I wot well that thou art a sending from far-off times and far-off things; tell thou, if thou mayest, to a man who is going to his death how this shall come about."

"Only this may I tell thee," said I; "to thee, when thou didst try to conceive of them, the ways of the days to come seemed follies scarce to be thought of; yet shall they come to be familiar things, and an order by which every man liveth, ill as he liveth, so that men shall deem of them, that thus it hath been since the beginning of the world, and that thus it shall be while the world lasts; and in this wise so shall they be thought of a long while; and the complaint of the poor the rich man shall heed, even as much and no more as he who lieth in pleasure under the lime trees in the summer heedeth the murmur of his toiling bees. Yet in time shall this also grow old, and doubt shall creep in, because men shall scarce be able to live by that order, and the complaint of the poor shall be hearkened, no longer as a tale not utterly grievous, but as a threat of ruin, and a fear. Then shall those things, which to thee seemed follies, and to the men between thee and me mere wisdom and the bond of stability, seem follies once again; yet, whereas men have so long lived by them, they shall cling to them yet from blindness and from fear; and those that see, and that have thus much conquered fear that they are furthering the real time that cometh and not the dream that faileth, these men shall the blind and the fearful mock and mis-say, and torment and murder; and great and grievous shall be the strife in those days, and many the failures of the wise, and too oft sore shall be the despair of the valiant; and back-sliding, and doubt, and contest between friends and fellows lacking time in the hubbub to understand each other, shall grieve many hearts and hinder the Host of the Fellowship; yet shall all bring about the end, till thy deeming of folly and ours shall be one, and thy hope and our hope; and then—the Day will have come."

Once more I heard the voice of John Ball: "Now, brother, I say farewell; for now verily hath the Day of the Earth come, and thou and I are lonely of each other again; thou hast been a dream to me as I to thee, and sorry and glad have we made each other, as tales of old time and the longing of times to come shall ever make men to be. I go to life and to death, and leave thee; and scarce do I know whether to wish thee some dream of the days beyond thine to tell thee what shall be, as thou hast told me, for I know not if that shall help or hinder thee; but since we have been kind and very friends, I will not leave thee without a wish of good-will, so at least I wish thee what thou thyself wishest for thyself, and that is hopeful strife, and blameless peace, which is to say in one word, life. Farewell, friend."

For some little time, although I had known that the daylight was growing and what was around me, I had scarce seen the things I had before noted so keenly; but now in a flash I saw all—the east crimson with sunrise through the white window on my right hand; the richly-carved stalls, and gilded screen-work, the pictures on the walls, the loveliness of the faultless colour of the mosaic window lights, the altar and the red light over it looking strange in the daylight, and the biers with the hidden dead men upon them that lay before the high altar; a great pain filled my heart at the sight of all that beauty, and withal I heard quick steps coming up the paved church path to the porch, and the loud whistle of a sweet old tune therewith; then the footsteps stopped at the door; I heard the latch rattle, and knew that Will Green's hand was on the ring of it.

Then I strove to rise up, but fell back again; a white light, empty of all sights, broke upon me for a moment, and lo! behold, I was lying in my familiar bed, the south-westerly gale rattling the Venetian blinds and making their hold-fasts squeak. I got up presently, and going to the window looked out on the winter morning; the river ran before me broad between outer bank and bank, but it was nearly dead ebb, and there was a wide space of mud on each side of the hurrying stream, driven on the faster as it seemed by the push of the south-west wind. On the other side of the water the few willow-trees left us by the Thames Conservancy looked doubtfully alive against the bleak sky and the row of wretched-looking blue-slated houses, although, by the way, the latter were the backs of a sort of street of "villas" and not a slum; the road in front of the house was sooty and muddy at once, and in the air was that sense of dirty discomfort which one is never quit of in London. The morning was harsh too, and though the wind was from the south-west it was as cold as a north wind; and yet amidst it all, I thought of the corner of the next bight of the river which I could not quite see from where I was, but over which one can see clear of houses and into Richmond Park, looking like the open country; and dirty as the river was, and harsh as was the January wind, they seemed to woo me toward the country side, where away from the miseries of the "Great Wen" I might of my own will carry on a day-dream of the friends I had made in the dream of the night and against my will. But as I turned away shivering and down-hearted, on a sudden came the frightful noise of the "hooters," one after the other, that call the workmen to the factories, this one the after breakfast one, more by token. So I grinned surlily, and dressed and got ready for my day's "work" as I call it, but which many a man besides John Ruskin (though not many in his position) would call "play."

[THE END.]

CORRESPONDENCE.

T. LEMON AND THE S. D. F.

I see that our ex-comrade, T. Lemon, has met with a well-merited exposure at Poplar. No one deplores the apostasy of Lemon more than myself, for it has given a severe blow to our agitation in the East End, and caused hundreds of working men to look askance at every movement since made in that neighbourhood. But isn't it a little too much for the anonymous writer of the diverting pars. in the front page of your contemporary Justice to assert that Lemon used a reputation and influence that he "could" never have had without the Federation? My memory carries me back to some seven years ago when at Stratford a band of men were associated with Lemon under the name of the Stratford Radical Club, from the loins of which sprang the Labour Emancipation League, which, in conjunction with the West End Socialists, carried on a vigorous propaganda whilst those who now compose "the purely English party" were making up their minds or waiting to see which way the cat would jump. The attempts to destroy the autonomy of the L. E. L. and crush out its representatives upon the council of the S. D. F. are matters well known to the seceders from the august "council."

There is not a single attempt at agitation, from the anti-emigration agitation down to the Lord Mayor's Show business, but what are borrowed ideas from the men who leavened the masses with Socialistic literature and prepared the ground for the present Socialistic revival. And now we have in the field a body of men who, whilst denouncing all monopolies, strive to make a monopoly of Socialistic thought and effort, and allow an anonymous writer to declare that they "never forgive, and never forget" any man who tries to use the cause for his own benefit; and this from those with all the honours of the last general election fresh upon them. "Alas for the rarity of Christian charity." There may exist Socialist organisations who would, in the case of Lemon recanting and mending his ways, let him return to the fold, and thereby put in practice true Socialism. But those whose present prominence is largely due to the foundations he and his associates laid, they will "oh never, no never," forgive. If ever the ramifications of the S. D. F. extend so widely as to include the janitorship of the gates of Paradise, those awaiting beatitude may expect to be refused admission unless they have held a card of membership of the S. D. F. right up from its momentous inauguration and swallowed its programme, stepping-stones and all, and moreover can bring vouchers and witnesses to attest their "purely English Socialism."

I do not wish this letter to be construed as a defence of T. Lemon and his present tactics, but with the knowledge of the tactics that have been employed to destroy and undermine our Branches—notably in Marylebone and in the East End—I can say of Lemon that he is at all events an open enemy and not a sneaking friend professing the same aims as ourselves and yet seeking to injure us.—Yours fraternally,

F. KITZ.

MORE JUBILEE SUGGESTIONS!

OUR comrade, to whose letters in the Southport Visiter we have before referred, in the last issue criticises a discussion which took place among the Committee of the fund raised for the families of the men who lost their lives in the late lifeboat disaster, as to an expected surplus. He suggests that, even if a surplus be not fairly forthcoming, a large slice be cut off the fund, in the usual way, by the toad-eaters who administer it, that this slice be labelled "surplus," and sent to the Jubilee Fund, saying:—

"The progress, sir, that we have made during the past fifty years is, as you are doubtless aware, remarkable; by the rapid development of labour-saving, and therefore labour-starving, machinery, we have steadily increased the wealth of this great and free country till it stands at the appalling and enormous sum of nine thousand million pounds, and as steadily displaced the human machine, giving him or her of course the choice between starvation, emigration, crime, or the workhouse to obtain a living or die; but surely these 'hands,' as they are termed—pity 'tis God gave them anything but hands—will vote for my suggestion, and also contribute something handsome themselves? Waken up! waken up! ye thousands who sleep under railway arches, and ye who sleep on the Thames Embankment this pleasant weather wrapped in newspapers; waken up and rejoice, for the Jubilee Year is at hand. You are cold. Ah! warm your heart with the thought of the large fund which will be raised by a 'happy' and 'prosperous' community to celebrate this glorious year. Oh! you pick up one of your warm blankets, the London Times, and by the light of the cold frosty moon and a friendly lamp turn to the Local Government Board returns of pauperism. Well, what then? Year 1883, 88,618 paupers; 1884, 89,221; 1885, 90,143; 1886, 90,901. And you sigh. Be happy, man, and remember what glorious institutions we live under. Suicides. What? only 1800 per annum on an average sacrificed to the god of Mammon. 'Oh, don't bother about such trifles. Look at the peaceful and contented condition of Ireland. Look at the Welsh tithe payers, and the Scottish crofters, and again I say rejoice. Look at the morality of the aristocracy, and remember they have the majority of the livings of this glorious Established Church at their disposal, and throw up your battered hat and shout with joy when you hear the 'Lord's anointed' preach that you should not lay up for yourselves treasures in this world. Oh, you are doubtful and cynical, then I leave you to fly on the wings of joy to fresh scenes. Come forth ye dwellers in the slums and cellars of Manchester and Liverpool; get from off your beds of straw, reeking with filth, look at your cheerless grate, empty cupboard, and starving children, but come forth. Lift up your heads, ye everlasting fools, and prepare to join in the Jubilee hymn that no doubt Baron Tennyson is busy at. It may be to 'hold your own,' but do not forget the important point, 'you have a penny.' Ah, never mind the coffee-stall at the corner, or the sick child at home, but march straight to the local secretary of this great fund, if your shivering limbs will permit, and pay your coin, and be cheerful, for there will be no surplus arising from that fund. And you men of Southport, especially good Conservative working men, who, having served an apprenticeship to your trades for seven years, are now some of you receiving the price of three decent cigars per day from the tramp ward, on which to support, in 'happiness' and comfort, your families. You will surely vote for my suggestion, and also contribute something yourselves, but, on the other hand, if you think there is a strong tinge of irony running through my letter, it will not very much surprise

A SOCIALIST."

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

REDUCTION IN AGRICULTURAL WAGES.—In Worcestershire, where the wages of agricultural labourers average from 10s. to 12s. per week, the farmers declare their inability, in consequence of the low price of produce, to continue to pay that amount. A general reduction has already been made in some districts to 10s., and in the Stewponney (northern) division notice was given on Saturday of a reduction of 2s. per week.

THE LANARKSHIRE MINERS.—At a meeting of the Miners' Central Board at Hamilton last Saturday night, it was resolved to issue an appeal to every miner in the country to cease work on Thursday if an advance of wages was not granted before that date. The miners of Lanarkshire are resolved that if the system of reducing the output by means of short hours and "idle days" does not compel the masters to yield, a general strike must be resorted to.

THE ASHTON STRIKE.—There is no change to report in this dispute, though by all accounts the employers are becoming disheartened. There is a corresponding feeling of confidence on the part of the operatives that their cause will triumph, and they are exceedingly grateful for the ready response the weaving districts of Lancashire are making to the appeal of the Northern Counties' Amalgamation. According to present reports, there is no danger of any falling off in the subscriptions, and so long as reasonable support is forthcoming the operatives of Ashton will be true to the cause for which they are fighting, not only in their own interests, but the interests of every weaver throughout Lancashire.—Cotton Factory Times.

RAWTESTALL.—NOVEL WAY OF PAYING A FIREMAN'S WAGE.—At one of the mills in this district a notice has been posted up to the effect that the weavers will have to pay the sum of three halfpence per fortnight to the fireman for the privilege of warming their dinners. This is another mode of nibbling at the weavers' wages.—Cotton Factory Times.

NELSON.—THE COTTON TRADE.—Although all the looms are running here there is no end of complaints about bad work, and it has been difficult to keep the weavers, etc., at work, as it is stated that only about 14s. a-week off four looms can be earned at several firms. One six-loom weaver last week had 17s. to draw, and out of this he had his tenter to pay. At one firm about 30 weavers tendered their notices to leave; while one employer is paying weavers weekly wages of from £1 to £1.4s. per week until their bad work is out. A strike of winders at Mr. L. C. Evans's took place on Friday, but they returned to their work again on Monday. On Tuesday evening a meeting of Mr. F. S. Witham's weavers, winders, etc., was held in Allison's Market Hall, when it was resolved to come out on strike at dinner time on Wednesday if 5 per cent. were not allowed them until the present work is out. The operatives of Nelson are beginning to occupy an unenviable position. What with low wages and landlords raising rents on account of the scarcity of houses, owing to the influx of weavers, it would be wise before any one removes here to enquire whether there is a house to let or not, and work to get. Rates are also high, and the people are accommodated with dirty streets, etc., which are scarcely fit for cattle to cross.—Cotton Factory Times.

MANCHESTER.—THE BUILDING TRADES.—The operations in several branches of these trades are in a disorganised state, especially so since the joiners' strike of 1877. The only body of operatives able in any way to hold their own with the masters is the Stonemasons' union. In face of the fact that we have located in Manchester the headquarters of the wealthiest society of operative joiners (the Amalgamated Society), the men are generally disorganised, not half the workers of the craft are members of either the Amalgamated or General Union societies. Previous to 1878 employment was found in the Manchester district for upwards of 7000 operative joiners. Up to 1877 a standard rate of wages was paid by the masters, and the working rules signed by masters and men were strictly carried out on both sides generally. Since 1878 the masters have defiantly ignored the working rules in the joinering, plumbing, painting, and a few other branches. On many of the outside jobs the working rules are ignored by the masters, the rule binding employers to provide hot-water and shelter for the men at meal times being contemptuously treated, the men being put to great inconvenience and outlay in obtaining warm beverages to their food. The trade is overrun with improvers, who work for wages ranging from 4d. to 6½d. and 7d. per hour. The standard rate of wages is 8d. per hour, but only few masters pay it. I warned the operatives in the trades that the employers would in 1887 take steps to reduce wages, etc. The first blow has been struck at the bricklayers. Notices were last week posted up at the works of the Manchester "Royal" Jubilee Exhibition that in future bricklayers' wages would be reduced from 8½d. to 8d. per hour. In full time, 54 hours per week, this means a reduction of 2s. 2d. per week. Plumbers, painters, stonemasons, plasterers, bricklayers, joiners, and especially labourers, have suffered very severely through slackness of trade, not only this winter, but for the last three years. The Manchester bricklayers complain that men from London, members of the "London Order," have made terms with local employers to work at the "London" rate of wages, 8d. per hour, being ½d. less than the Manchester district rate. The bricklayers are totally disorganised here, and ought at once to take steps to reorganise the trade. File-Cutters.—In consequence of the competition forced on by Sheffield capitalists, the file-cutters at work in this district are working at prices 60 per cent less than those of a few years ago. In my next letter I will give you some statistics on this matter.—GLENER.

AMERICA.

Goodwin and Co., cigarette-makers, New York, have discharged all their hands and put in machines. No wonder there are 1,000,000 tramps on the roads of this country.

Organised Labour in Terre Haute, Ind., has scored a victory in the adoption by the city council of a resolution making eight hours a legal day's labour on municipal work. A committee was appointed to prepare an ordinance for its enforcement.

Typographical Union No. 6 has 3500 members, Pressmen's Union No. 7 has 900, the Franklin Association has 400, the stereotypers 350, bookbinders 2675, the photo-engravers 233. A union of all the printing interests in New York is probable.

CHICAGO, Jan. 5.—The Girls' Co-operative Clothing Manufactory, the incorporation of which was accomplished two weeks ago, began operations this morning at 145 Ontario Street. A large room has been fitted up with about thirty sewing machines, and sixty girls, who have heretofore worked for starvation wages for others, are now banded together to work for themselves. They will each draw moderate wages weekly, and the amount of work done by each will be kept account of, and a dividend declared accordingly at the end of the year. Miss McCormick is at the head of the concern, and nearly all of the sixty females are experienced in the work they are doing. They are engaged in the manufacture of men's clothing, and the wholesale houses of the city have contracted to take their goods. This is the first experiment of the kind tried in this country, and the women, who are all Knights of Labour, are very hopeful about their enterprise.

PHILADELPHIA, Jan. 17.—The Philadelphia Press states that a gigantic scheme of general reorganisation, by which all coal miners and mine labourers in the United States will be placed under one banner, is being accomplished by the Knights of Labour, in order to secure concerted action in their interests.

There were 1500 strikes in New York last year. The 18,000 car drivers in New York and Brooklyn gained a strike at a cost of 100,000 dols. which has added 2,000,000 dols. to their annual pay roll, and which has lessened the hours of labour twenty-three hours per week, besides creating additional employment for 3000 men.

The horse car employés of the city of Brooklyn scored a complete victory last week through a well organised and general strike, which was brought to a close in one day by the surrender of the bosses. The men get a rise in their pay as well as other advantages in the details of their work. Besides, and most important, the bosses recognise the jurisdiction of the organisation, the Empire Protective Association.

The most prominent female Knight is Mrs. Elizabeth Rogers, master workman of D. A. 24 of Chicago, Ill. She was one of the delegates at the Richmond convention. Mrs. Rogers' baby is the youngest Knight in the world. It was born Sept. 10, 1886, and carried to Richmond, October 1. It had to be a Knight before admission, and was numbered 800. Mrs. Rogers organised the first working woman's union in Chicago more than ten years ago, and has been a delegate to the State Trades Assembly of Illinois for seven years.

A recent letter from Atlantic, Iowa, states that a member of the local assembly of Knights of Labour there recently secured a patent on a heating stove, and has turned it over to the Assembly for their use. The right to manufacture the same will also be given to all K. of L. co-operative stove companies on certain conditions. Comrade Butler, for that is the inventor's name, has exhibited the true Socialistic spirit, and we wish there were more like him. When all men and women believe that their talents are given them to be used for humanity instead of self, they will fully comprehend the beauties of existence under a properly regulated system of Society.—The Avant-Courier.

FRANCE.

The deficit for the year 1886 in France is seventy million; while awaiting therefore the final destruction of the bourgeoisie in the ever more widely yawning chasm, let us expect fresh taxes and fresh foreign loans.—Cri du Peuple.

BOULOGNE.—A meeting was held here on Sunday, at which Jules Guesde addressed a large audience, who listened to his discourse with much interest, and received it with every sign of applause.

VIERZON.—At the recent municipal elections at Vierzon-Village, Baudin, Féline, and Rossignol were at the head of the Socialist list, in protest against the bourgeois magistracy, which had just made them undergo 93 days' imprisonment, after depriving them of their political rights. The electors of Vierzon-Village understood their duty, and the list of Socialists was passed entire.

CLERMONT-FERRAND.—The compositors of the Petit Clermontois, a journal founded by the Radical deputy Blatin, have suddenly ceased working this week, having heard that the administration of this paper was about to replace them by female workers. A meeting was held approving the action of the strikers, who, however, it appears to us, have only anticipated the move of the directors, and would have had more of a grievance had they stayed to be dismissed without notice, as was the kind intent of the administration.

MARSEILLES.—The strike of cigar-makers at Marseilles is by no means the slight unimportant incident that the directors of the factory took it to be at first. The women last Monday convened a special meeting to discuss the situation, to which the General Council of the department, the Council of the Arrondissement, and the Municipal Council sent ten or a dozen representatives. The strikers, whose demand is that a certain overseer named Roustan, who has made himself obnoxious to them, shall be dismissed, have for once the entire sympathy and support of the local authorities, as is shown in this meeting, where the official representatives urge the women to maintain their esprit de corps, and to persist in their demands. The Prefect also receives a delegation from the meeting, and promises to send a despatch to the Minister, asking for the denouement of the situation to be hastened, and vouching for the justice of the strikers' claims. The continuation of the strike was unanimously voted at the meeting. During the first days of the strike, the last words of the director to the delegation of strikers were frankly brutal, and commendably devoid of the embroidery of humbug: "You can leave this and suffer for it if that pleases you; as for me, I have goods in the warehouses to last six months, and 1200 applications for admission to the factory." The women, who are on piece-work, gain from 1f. 40c. to 2f. 50c. a-day, mostly having families, which they have to support on this salary. The latest news from Marseilles is that the strike is ended, the Minister announcing in a despatch to the Prefect that the demand for the removal of the obnoxious Roustan as overseer is accepted. The last thing we hear of the business is the cigar-makers marching in a body to the Prefecture with floral thanksgivings, a step which they might very well have spared their sensitive Socialist sympathisers!

BELGIUM.

The strike in the Poirier coal-mines in the Charleroi district is assuming a certain importance. The strikers marched in a body to the St. André coal-mine, at Montigny, and insisted on the men who worked in the furnaces to come up and leave off working. The place is full of gendarmes. A new strike is declared at Bayemont near Marchiennes, 170 men have refused to go down to the pits, demanding a rise of salary.

BRUSSELS, Jan. 16.—The Etoile Belge this evening states that a project is on foot for organising a general strike in the Charleroi district. The journal adds that the urban guard is being placed under arms.

New York, Jan. 16.—Father M'Glynn, the Catholic priest who advocated Mr. Henry George's land theories during the recent election for Mayor of New York, and refused to obey the summons to Rome to explain his action, has been inhibited and deprived by Archbishop Corrigan. Father M'Glynn's parishioners are stated to be much incensed against the archbishop.

The traitor slave in a workshop is easily "spotted." He seeks every opportunity to post the employer about everything done in his vicinity, brags how quickly he can do the work as compared with others in the shop. Self is his only study; for self he will injure his neighbour; he lives for himself. He is the rusher; he can make precedents for others to follow. He cannot afford to join his union. He is virtually a social plague.—Syracuse Laborer.

England has free trade. She also has thousands of working-men out of work and on the brink of starvation. The United States have protection. They also have thousands of working-men out of work and on the brink of starvation. A working-man was asked what difference free trade and protection had for him, and he said: "The same difference that it makes to me whether the king of the Cannibal Islands wears his breech-clout cut bias or with a ragged edge."—Labour Enquirer.

About two months ago the printers of Germany presented a new scale to their employers. It was submitted to a committee composed partly of workmen and partly of employers, and agreed to, but when it came to be applied, several masters refused to accept it. The result was, combination on the part of the masters in many of the towns, and a strike on the part of the men. In Berlin a master-printer requested the Minister of War to call up all the men on strike who were liable to military service. The order was given, and executed.

An English syndicate has just concluded the purchase of a tract of 638,000 acres of land in the territory of Idaho for an alleged cattle ranch. N. P. Kimball, of England, who conducted the negotiations, states that no attempt will yet be made to stock the land, but that a few Hereford cattle will be placed upon a 40,000 acre track of it next spring. Thus land-monopoly has taken another stride in the United States, and English landlordism has got hold of over half a million more acres of our most fertile soil.—John Swinton's Paper.

THE UNEMPLOYED IN SYDNEY (N.S.W.).—With reference to the unemployed, we have obtained the following particulars of the operations carried on at the Carrington Relief Depot, King Street, for some time past. From the 29th October up to yesterday 2193 single men and 731 married men have received relief, making a total of 2924, and 1525 persons have been found employment. From the 29th October to the 30th November 40,603 meals were given at the depot, and 17,657 rations have been issued to married people. 120 men are to go away this morning to Gordon, in addition to those already despatched to the locality; 20 more go to Subiaco, and 10 to Prospect. To-morrow morning 40 will start for the Jenolan Caves road, and 30 to Burragorang, and this will bring the total number to whom employment has been furnished up to 1745, this being exclusive of 350 who have received free passes. 340 men have been turned away from the gates as undeserving of assistance. The married peoples' rations have been contracted for at 9d. per ration, and the single men have been supplied with two meals per day at a cost of 11d., or 5½d. for each meal.—Sydney Herald, Dec. 8.

"ALCOHOLIC EXCESS."—The anti-alcohol fanaticism renders folk absolutely blind and incapable of distinguishing between cause and effect. Of this we stumble across numberless instances in our own happy land, but of course hold no unenviable monopoly of this style of reasoning from false premises. For instance, I find quoted in the Cri du Peuple passages from an article relative to the diseases of tanners and leather-dressers, the writer whereof (in the journal La Halle aux cuirs) is firmly and comfortably convinced that all the ills that tanners' flesh is heir to are bequeathed by "the demon, Drink," as our own penny-a-line scribes are wont to call it. It is noteworthy that all bourgeois writers who pen articles on the abuses and sufferings to which the labour-class is subject are quick enough in "owning up" to the abuses of the past, but they hasten to add, "All that is changed now; to-day we improve every way, thanks to the application of science to the things of every-day life." But the "application of science" cannot make healthy occupation of cleaning skins, constantly absorbing putrefying and diseased animal matter, standing with feet in water and bending over the stretching frames hour after hour, day after day. Our author affirms that the constantly evolving injurious gases have no effect to-day on the worker, though they may have had formerly! That which really affects him is "alcoholic excess," which renders him liable to disease, etc., etc. He proceeds after this assertion to enumerate and describe the various ills caused by this trade—diseases, like many others, "invented" by the nineteenth century and the advance of civilisation; a civilisation which invents machines to make its "art objects," but so far has invented nothing that will do its dirty work, but must needs set men toiling at that, inventing for them new disease, and diseased bodily wants to follow, the satisfaction of which is a disgrace and a crime according to the dishonest writers who make their living as apologists for the present rule of Capital.—M. M.

The Disturbances at Norwich.

THE Council of the League has received a letter from our comrade Mahon (who went down to speak at Norwich on Sunday) about the disturbance that took place there on the 14th. He tells us that the meeting at which this occurred was a spontaneous one of the unemployed, at which our comrades were asked to speak. The town is much excited, and the workmen entirely on the Socialist side. A meeting held in the Market Place on Sunday 16th was attended by over 5000 persons who were enthusiastically Socialist in feeling. The Council has deputed a member of the League to speak next Sunday (23rd) at Norwich, addressing the workers and exploiters generally, rather than the unemployed specially, since their cause cannot be separated from that of all the workers, nor can they be relieved under the present system of wage-slavery, except as a matter of charity or from the results of a passing panic, which will leave them in a short time in as bad or a worse condition than before. It is necessary for the present system of production that there should be an army of unemployed in order to keep down the wages of the employed. It is impossible for any government except a revolutionary one to "employ" this army on making goods for the market. All that they can do is to grant "out-door relief" on a large scale; nor can even that miserable expedient last long.

Two members of the Socialist League and two others who were arrested, are held for trial at the Assizes, which began on Tuesday 18th. They are probably on their trial as we go to press. We are glad to hear that several anonymous friends, men of means in the city, have guaranteed all the expenses of the defence. Subscriptions are also coming in for the same purpose from numbers of workmen sympathisers. Verdict and sentence are already practically rendered and passed, as may be seen from the accompanying remarks of Mr. Justice Grantham in charging the Grand Jury:

"He regretted to find that the working people of Norwich, who had always been well-known for their orderly character and conduct, should have allowed themselves to be led away by those who, although they might say so, could not have the welfare of the working classes at heart. The great difficulty with which we had to contend was to prevent the working classes being misled by those who told them that they were badly treated; that they ought to have money whether they worked for it or not; and that those who had should be made to give to those who had not. He was happy to know that there was no reason why any one should starve in England, as food must be provided by law for those who had not got it. Sometimes, no doubt, people were not able to get quite as much as they would like, and perhaps sometimes not so much as they ought to have. But on the whole provision was made for the subjects of the Queen, so that, whatever might be the case, they could keep body and soul together, and live until they could improve their position. It was right that the legislature should not provide what might be termed ample food for everybody, whether everybody liked to work or not, because unfortunately there were many men who would rather stand idle on a pittance than work hard to get good wages. It was the principle of English law that such people as these should not be supported in idleness, and that nothing should be done to induce them to continue this description of life. He hoped that the working men of Norwich would take warning from what had happened, as it was clear that they had nothing to gain by assembling together and acting in a tumultuous manner. The recent rioting in Norwich arose from the foolish and seditious language of one or two persons who wanted to make themselves notorious; and he hoped that when these persons had been tried nothing more would be heard of such disorders."

We are awaiting further information, and shall publish a more detailed report next week.

LITERARY NOTICES.

'Mining Rents and Royalties (Modern Press, 1d.) by J. Morrison Davidson, is a clever criticism upon one phase of modern exploitation and gives nationalisation of rent as the remedy.

The 'House of Commons' (Reeves, 4d.) by Herbert Courtney, is a well-grounded attack upon the present "representative" system and a plea for the author's favourite "proportional representation." His view of the House of Commons as it should be is hardly that of a Socialist, who is apt to believe that non-existence is "as it should be."

The current number of Time contains an article entitled "Convicts in Parliament," in which Cipriani's career as a revolutionist fighter is recounted not unably. But I cannot refrain from uttering a protest against the tone of contemptuous abuse which pervades the article. However distasteful Cipriani may have been to Italian politicians and Italian Respectability, a "vulgar murderer" he is not: the mere detailing of the career of this ardent revolutionist should guard against the use of such terms. It is well known—though of course no anti-Socialist writer would allow it—that the "crime" of Alexandria was merely an act of self-defence in a meeting planned to provoke Cipriani to some act of violence whereby he should incriminate himself, and that Santini was the aggressor in the quarrel. As to the sentence passed in 1881, all one can say of such a proceeding as comment on Mr. Strachan Morgan's remark that "it was only by a legal quibble that his lawyers had tried to get him off from the punishment which he so richly deserved," is that the law is made up of legal quibbles, and that this passing of sentence after a lapse of over 10 years which, according to law, annuls legal proceedings, is a violation of justice which can surprise none—not even the most devout believer in Human Nature or that "indulgence in sentimental humanitarianism" which Mr. Strachan Morgan considers "out of place in Italy."

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Friday, Jan. 14th, T. Binning lectured for this Branch.—L. W.

CROYDON.—On Sunday last, R. A. Beckett gave an interesting lecture on "Philoprogenitiveness." A good discussion followed.—A. T., ast.-sec.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, January 12, Mrs. Charlotte Wilson gave very interesting and instructive lecture on "The Revolt of the Workers in the Nineteenth Century;" a lively discussion followed. On Sunday, January 16, Geo. Bernard Shaw lectured on "Some Illusions of Individualism;" a lively discussion and good reply. Fair sale of Commonweal and pamphlets. Members are requested to take up Branch cards for 1887.—W. B. and T. E. W., joint-secs.

FULHAM.—On Sunday night, a meeting of members to discuss future arrangements was held at 34 May Street, and was adjourned till next Sunday at same address. The Branch is looking out for more suitable premises.—M. R.

HACKNEY.—On Sunday, S. Mainwaring lectured here on "Socialism." He said that the revolutionary Socialist never asks for palliative measures, either from local boards, or even Parliament itself. He showed that all movements of the people against abuse or monopoly, never succeeded except through the efforts of men who rebelled against the then existing "law and order." Good discussion. After the meeting the following resolution was carried unanimously: "That H. Graham be empowered to bring the question of the arrest of Mowbray, Henderson, Hall, and Murrell before the Council with a view of ascertaining its view on the matter."—H. MATTHEWS, sec.

HOXTON.—On Sunday evening, W. C. Wade lectured to a fair audience on "England in the Fifteenth Century." Good discussion followed. One new member made. The club in course of formation here is making satisfactory progress, and will shortly be opened, we being now in treaty for the premises for same.

GLASGOW.—The extremely cold weather still limits our efforts here. On Sunday afternoon, however, comrade Glasier addressed a large audience on Jail's Square. In the evening in Hall, Carlton Place, comrade Fisher McLaren gave an interesting history of the Scottish land system, in which he clearly showed the wholesale robbery by which private property in land has become so "deeply written" in our glorious constitution. A good discussion followed.—J. B. G.

HULL.—On Sunday last the meeting was opened with singing, the majority of those present joining heartily in "The March of the Workers." In future all our meetings will be opened in this way. Teesdale spoke briefly on "The Unemployed," showing the necessity of this class to the present "profit" system, and the impossibility of solving the problem except by Socialism. This was also taken by Sheckell, Sansom, Devlin, Smith, and Porter, whilst Muir, who agreed in theory with our views, was much exercised as to the method of attaining them, as well as on the absence of "law and authority" in a Socialistic community. He was replied to by Devlin, Smith, and Teesdale.—E. T.

LANCASTER.—Interesting gathering on Friday night at Market Hall Coffee Tavern, Hoyle presiding. Comrade Tarn read thoughtful and pungent paper on "Competition," remarking that the only excellence possessed by the existing competitive arrangement was its inherent element of self-destruction.—LEONARD HALL, sec.

LEEDS.—On Sunday afternoon, we held our usual open-air meeting in Vicar's Croft, and comrades Braithwaite, Hill, and Sollett addressed an attentive audience on the "Principles of Socialism." At the close of the meeting a number of Commonweals were sold. In the evening, comrade Maguire lectured at the Gardener's Arms, Domestic Street. A good discussion followed.—F. CORKWELL, sec.

INDIVIDUALIST CLUB.—One of our comrades attended the opening ceremony of this famous club. The meeting began about three-quarters of an hour after the advertised time. There were four speakers to explain its objects. The audience were scarcely as numerous as the speakers, and discussion was prohibited.

THE Rev. Albert Lazenby delivered the first of a course of lectures on "Socialism" in the Unitarian Church, Vincent Street, Glasgow, on Sunday evening last. The lecturer, without committing himself to the methods, expressed himself quite in sympathy with the aims of Socialism. The large audience that assembled to hear the lecture shows how wide spread the interest in Socialism has become in that city.

NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS.

MR. JUSTICE GRANTHAM, in charging the Grand Jury at Norwich, apropos of the events which so unhappily delivered two of our comrades to the tender mercies of that strange specimen of humanity, the Special Fool in a high place, sung a song of triumph over that glorious institution, the workhouse. Oddly enough, in the issue of the day before of the same paper that gave us the solemn wisdom of this genius, there is printed a paragraph which is a good commentary on that blessing of modern times—that refuge for the unlucky which, according to his lordship, affords such a firm and satisfactory stand-point from which to aim at the conquest of health and wealth—the workhouse. We give the passage in full:

“WANDSWORTH.—CASUALS AND THEIR FOOD.—James Harding and George Wright were placed in the dock charged with refusing to work while casual paupers in Wandsworth workhouse.—George Cheshire, the superintendent, said the prisoners were admitted on Saturday night, and that morning he set them to work. Both refused to work.—The prisoner Wright said he could not work on the food given to him. He had dry bread, and was put in a place where he was perishing with cold all night. He would not do it for the Queen of England.—The superintendent said the wards were heated. The food consisted of eight ounces of bread for breakfast, half-a-pound with 1½ ounces of cheese as dinner, and eight ounces of bread with hot water to drink for supper.—Mr. Bennett: Not any cocoa, nor anything of the kind?—No, sir.—The prisoner said he had a pail of hot water and dry bread. A pail of hot water was brought in as if to a horse.—The witness stated that the diet was given by direction of the Local Government Board.—Mr. Bennett said if the prisoner had any ground of complaint he must go to the Local Government Board.—The prisoner said he might as well go to Buckingham Palace, and knock at the door and ask for the Queen.—Mr. Bennett committed the prisoners for seven days.”

The only comment on this paragraph that is possible is to ask if there is not some mistake in the report that the prisoners were sent to prison for seven days?

Mr. Justice Nupkins (we ask pardon, Grantham), being in a jovial and joking humour apparently, was so pleasant as to say that certain persons who misled the people and told them they were badly treated—to be sure: badly treated when going to the workhouse they can get their water hot: hot water, the drink at present of the more refined among the “cultivated classes”—that these persons told the working-classes that they ought to have money whether they worked for it or not. Setting aside Mr. Justice Nupkins’ confusion of ideas about the working-classes who don’t work, which is of itself pretty to behold, his lordship has only to attend a few Socialist meetings (he might draw up his carriage at the edge of the crowd) to hear those who want to have money without working for it pretty sharply denounced by these very misleaders of the working-classes. He would there learn that the living on other people without working is the very thing we demand to be abolished, though it must be admitted that at present it is the very foundation of that society of which his lordship is so starting an ornament.

It was announced last week that the Government were going to make a new departure in coercion, and would bring forward a regular gagging Bill, which would serve for arranging Irish affairs at present, and would also be available for dealing with English, Scotch, or Welsh discontent, as it was to be made applicable to the whole of the United Kingdom. Socialist organisations, we were told, might expect to be particularly honoured by the notice of this new Act.

This news seemed from the first almost too good to be true; but it seems it was true for the time, and that the Tory Government, on the look out for something to damage their really strong position, had hit on this device as a satisfactory one. But unluckily it is almost impossible for them to go on with the gagging enterprise, as it would stir up the vigorous opposition of the Radicals, and even the Liberals would be shamed into voting against such a measure. Accordingly they are now backing down: are going to begin with the bill on procedure, and will only make their gag for Ireland, though even on these terms they have very little chance of getting it through Parliament.

Mr. Goschen is carrying on his candidature for Liverpool merrily, and in spite of the result of the last election, in which the Liberal candidate was successful, he will probably get in, owing to the servility of all parties towards “a distinguished official,” “a man of so much importance,” and so forth. Meantime this light of intellectual finance has introduced himself by making a long speech down there which was really remarkable for emptiness, dullness, and twaddle, even among election speeches.

Apropos of Members of Parliament, the following story told by Mr. Labouchere at Spalding on Thursday week is too good to be lost. He said:—

“The atmosphere of the House of Commons does not seem to agree with Radicals. They soon want to become fine gentlemen. He remembered a case in one of the divisions with regard to the admission of Mr. Bradlaugh. About ten minutes before the division a highly respectable gentleman on the Liberal side of the House came to me and said, ‘You know I have been thinking this over, and my conscience won’t allow me to vote for Bradlaugh.’ I replied, ‘I have not got time enough to talk about your conscience—what do you want?’ The Member said, ‘What do you mean? I am not that sort of person’; whereupon I said, ‘Do you want to be made a knight?’ and the gentleman replied, ‘No, you are entirely mistaken.’ I next asked him, ‘Have you got a wife?’ and he answered, ‘Yes.’ ‘Well, do you get asked to those crowds, those receptions, at the Foreign Office?’ The hon. Member admitted that he and his wife rather complained that they had not, and then I said, ‘You go in and vote, and I’ll see that you are asked to them in the future,’ and in about ten minutes afterwards I polled that patriot in.”

Walpole, in the good old bribing days, would have been happy if he could have bought his votes as cheap as that.

The Commission on the Depression of Trade has issued its report. It will be criticised hereafter in these columns in some detail, so that it may go for the present with a few words. It is a matter of course that the Commissioners try to put the best face possible on the state of things commercial, though they do not succeed very well in the attempt. They say, “There can be no question that the workman is in this country, when fully employed, in almost every respect in a better position than his competitors in foreign countries.” The italics are our own. Will the Commissioners pretend that they do not know that even in good years the great mass of working-men in and about London are unemployed for four months out of the twelve? that the workmen of the great industries have to “average” their wages, have to insure, so to say, against the months that they are “at play,” from strikes and lock-outs and the like? Will they say where in Europe or Asia they can find a workman more miserably pinched and resourceless than the south-west country labourer with his income of 10s. a-week when things are going well?

Or need one keep one’s patience any longer with those miserable fools and liars, paid to lie and paid to be dull by a blind society amidst its last corruption? It is true that they are not paid to be imaginative; but a little imagination is necessary to most men, if only to keep their bodies from stinking in default of salt. Let them, then, bring their imagination to bear upon facts, and try to picture their noble and cultivated selves reduced to the condition of those workmen whose lot they are so contented with. Let them think of themselves as living and keeping a home together on 10s. a-week in a Gloucestershire cottage, or worse still, on 16s. in a London slum; and if they have really tried to do so and have any honesty left in them, if they can do nothing else, at least let them hold their tongues and live silently on the proceeds of the perpetual robbery which habit has made them look upon as a holy right and the cement of society.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

MEN VERSUS CLASSES.

THE well-intentioned, kind-hearted gentleman who perspires philanthropy all over at the bare thought of the working-classes, is often shocked at the fact that modern Socialism starts from the idea of an irreconcilable class-struggle. “Look at me,” he says, “and others like me; we are middle-class men, and yet we have a profound sympathy with the people. It is surely unreasonable to attack a whole class in the way you do when it contains such excellent and noble-hearted representatives.” Now, irrespective of the genuineness of the particular person in question or his friends, there is undoubtedly a point touched on here which to the neophyte in Socialism requires elucidating.

Socialists attack the middle-class as the root of all evil. The neophyte knows that he daily comes in contact with middle-class men whom he respects, nay, who may themselves be working for Socialism. On the other hand, he finds that there are plenty of men belonging to the working-class whom he cannot respect. Now, here is a problem for the Socialist! What is the solution?

In the character of every human being, man or woman, in the present day, we shall be able to detect without much difficulty two sides, more or less distinct, more or less blended. On the one hand, you have the side of friendship, of devotion, of good-nature, of refinement, of the social qualities generally; on the other, that of acquisitiveness (greed), meanness, hypocrisy, coarseness, brutality—in fact, the anti-social qualities. Now, we maintain that in every civilised human being these two elements are present to a greater or less extent, it is only a question of degree. The anti-social qualities belong at bottom, to the anti-human, or pre-human nature, which human nature has inherited, and which were superseded by the specifically human nature or qualities which presided over the institution of tribal Society. But, in their present form, we contend they have taken on the forms and become crystallised into expressions of class-opposition. Some of them, indeed (e.g., vulgarity in its various forms, and hypocrisy), are entirely the offspring of the class-society of modern times. The social qualities, on the other hand, are inherited from the human nature which, as we have just said, superseded men's brute nature in the earliest forms of society. But these, again, have maintained themselves only in spite of the class system, and have disputed the ground with it inch by inch. It is evident, then, that every man in the present day, inasmuch as he belongs to one or other of the two great modern classes, the fleecers or the fleeced, the oppressors or the oppressed, the middle-class or the working-class, possesses, in addition to his manhood, a classhood. The classhood necessarily interpenetrates his whole system, although it may not be always obvious. His social qualities may gain the upper hand, and permanently repress the anti-social qualities and prejudices which he inherits from his class. Again, his class-character may completely eat away his human character. Like the cells and fibres of cancer in the human body, his class character may be latent, and only become active from some external cause. It may then break out in the most unexpected ways. In any case, the human or social character varies in an inverse proportion to the class or anti-social character of the man. This is an important fact. A mathematician might make a reputation by wrapping it up in curves and equations.

And it will be observed that I make no distinction here in favour of the working-class as such. All class character qua class character is bad. Were the working-man any more than the middle-class man a seraph, Socialism would be unnecessary. Socialists who recognise individual character to be the child of social condition, could not expect a class degraded materially to the condition of Proletarianism not to bear the mark of this degradation on the character of its members. We may observe, however, in passing, though it is immaterial to the point, that while the class-element alike in the character of Proletaire as of Bourgeois is bad in itself, yet it has probably in the former case been less generally successful in corrupting the human nature into which it has entered than in the latter. The particular class-qualities in the character of the modern capitalist may be roughly indicated by the definition, vulgarity in a solution of hypocrisy; the particular class-qualities in the character of the modern proletarian as brutality in a solution of servility.

How plainly both are the outcome of economic condition will be evident at a glance. Open your morning paper, and you will see both illustrated in its columns. They are the obverse and the reverse of the same medal—modern civilisation. But, we repeat, these class qualities may be reduced to the minimum in favour of the essentially human or social qualities in individual instances in either case; or they may on the other hand be so highly developed as to exclude the latter altogether. The last case may be best illustrated by types drawn from those concerned in class-politics. Almost any statesman—let us take as types a Harcourt or a Goschen—exhibit the class-element in its purest embodied form. Such men are lumps of class-feeling. A hypocritical vulgarity has in them absorbed humanity. The corresponding illustration of the mere proletarian class-element may be looked for in that section of the Anarchist party which pursues the tactics technically known as diebspolitik, and of which a Stellmacher is a type. Here also the class-element, a servile brutality, the mere bloodthirstiness and lust of gain of the slave, has eaten out humanity. Of course, these are extreme instances on both sides. Human life would be manifestly impossible were the whole male middle-class transformed into Harcourts or Goschens, no less than if the whole proletariat were transformed into Stellmachers. Between them lie the great mass of both classes, where human feeling struggles with class-feeling with varying success. In the centre a nucleus is beginning to form. It is the International Socialist Party. And just here the chief superiority of the working-class as a class over the middle-class comes into view. Among the working-classes there is a large section, especially on the Continent of Europe, among whom the mere class-qualities have to a large extent succumbed to human qualities, although they necessarily and properly (as we shall show directly) take a class-form. Such, in the nature of things, is not the case with the middle-classes. They, as classes, have material power and wealth bound up with their class-being; so that while with the working-man culture in the natural course of things is a direct avenue to the elevation of the class-feeling within him to a human feeling, with the middle-classes it too often only cements it with a thicker varnish of hypocrisy. The educated workman knows that human progress is bound up with the ascendancy of his class. The educated bourgeois knows that human progress is bound up with the decay and overthrow of his class; so that where we have among the working-classes whole sections that are Socialistic, we have among the middle-classes only isolated individuals.

How, then, it may be said, if we admit class-feeling to be that element in the modern character in which its worst and anti-social features are embodied, can we make the accentuation and exacerbation of class-feeling the starting-point for a social reconstruction in which classes shall be abolished? Is not the attitude of the benevolent old gentleman who says, let us ignore classes, let us regard each other as human beings, more consonant with what we have been saying? We answer no, if we are to deal with facts and not with phrases. Classes exist; you may ignore them, but they will exist still with the respective characters they engender. Though you ignore them they will not ignore you. The difference between the Socialist and the benevolent bourgeois Radical in their respective crusades against classes is, that while the one would affirm the form of class-distinction, knowing that thereby the reality of class-distinction will be negated, the other, though ostentatiously denying the form of class-distinction, would affirm the content or reality of class-distinction, inasmuch as he would leave it untouched. He thinks to get rid of class-instincts while maintaining classes. To be rid of classes, the possessing and expropriating class must be itself expropriated—expropriated of its power of expropriating, in other words—of that control of the instruments of production by which its class-character is maintained, when it will disappear together with its correlate, the possessed and expropriated classes. It is not true, as might at first sight be supposed, that the political class-feeling of the Socialist workman is the mere anti-social class-feeling of the ordinary proletarian (lumpen proletarian), or of the mere bloodthirsty Anarchist. It is human feeling in a class guise. The Socialist workman's conscious end and aspiration is the annihilation of classes, with the class-element in character. He knows well enough that his classhood places him at a disadvantage. He knows that the fact of his belonging to an oppressed class is an insuperable obstacle to the development of the best within him; just as the middle-class Socialist knows that the fact of his belonging to an oppressing class is equally an obstacle to the development of his nobler qualities. Mere class-instinct, which per se is necessarily anti-social, can never give us Socialism. That is why the most degraded section of the proletariat are, to a large extent, useless for the Cause of Socialism. Their lower class-instincts are incapable of being purified of their grosser elements, and transformed into that higher instinct which, though on its face it has the impress of a class, is in its essence above and beyond class; which sees in the immediate triumph of class merely a means to the ultimate realisation of a purely human Society, in which class has disappeared. With those who have attained to this instinct, classhood or class-interest has become identical with humanity or human interest. In the Socialist workman the class-instinct has become transformed into the conviction that, in the words of Lassalle, "he is called to raise the principle of his class into the principle of the age." He knows that in the moment of victory—of the realisation of the dominion of his class—the ugly head of class itself must fall, and Society emerge. Militant, his cause is identified with class; triumphant, with Humanity.

Meanwhile, we who live to-day, who are the offspring of a class Society, and who breathe the atmosphere of a class Society, bear ineradicably the mark of the class-demon upon us. It is engrained in our characters. Even among Socialists, where its grosser features are toned down or obliterated, it shows itself ever and anon. It is only a question of more or less. In no human being born in a class Society can the class element be altogether absent from his character. In the best working-class Socialist there is a strain of possible brutality. In the best middle-class Socialist there is a strain of possible snobbishness. Meanwhile, we know that these things endure but for a day. We may, therefore, take heart of grace. One more decisive affirmation of class-interest, and then the end of Classes (with their hypocritical vulgarity on the one side and their servile brutality on the other) and the beginning of Men.

WEALTH.

HAVING arrived at the conclusion that wealth is power, and we hope our arguments are sufficiently clear to carry the assent of the reader, we shall now endeavour to specialise our definition—that is, to indicate the kind of power that is meant. The way to do this will be to name the opposition, the forces, that wealth overcomes. These forces range themselves under two categories—one permanent, the other temporary. The permanent forces comprise those that under all circumstances are opposed to man in the struggle for existence—or instead of "under all circumstances," the natural forces that he has to overcome in seeking to supply his needs or to procure enjoyment. The temporary forces comprise those that man opposes to man: it is the conflict between these forces that has hitherto been the subject-matter of history. The history of the Roman Empire, for instance, is simply a series of struggles between the Romans and other nations, and, in the absence of such struggles, another series between different parties in the Empire itself.

As a consequence of the dual character of the human struggle for existence, we find two broadly distinct classes in human society. Soldiers, policemen, and other government officials are embraced in the class that contends with what we have called the temporary forces; while the industrial classes are those that contend with the permanent forces. Under no circumstances can the former class live except on the latter; under easily enough conceivable circumstances, however, the latter can do without the former. These two classes are pretty much the same as the productive and unproductive classes of the economists. This, however, by the way. Suffice to remember that the human struggle for existence is of a twofold character—the struggle of man with man, and the struggle of man with Nature. The struggle of man with man is per se a barren struggle; during its continuance nothing is produced, much is wasted. The struggle of man with Nature is the only struggle that is productive, and that results in progress.

In seeking to define wealth we do not require to take into consideration those temporary forces that it enables us to overcome. For every nation those forces are different; consequently the science of wealth would be different in every nation. The forces that we have called temporary are matters for the consideration of statesmen—not economists—and from such consideration is framed the public policy. These forces being temporary and fluctuating, the policy of a nation varies; being, moreover, as already pointed out, different in different nations, the policy of one nation differs from the policy of another.

It is from the permanent forces that man has to contend with that the meaning of wealth is to be got at. These forces we have also called natural forces; by them we mean the opposition that Nature offers to man's continued well-being. For instance, to live and to thrive man must have food and water, and must keep himself up to a certain temperature. Now these things are not attained without an effort; the want of food, of water, and of shelter is not satisfied without some opposition being overcome, and the power to overcome this opposition and to satisfy this want is wealth. Wealth, then, is power to satisfy desire, to attain ends. The wealthier man is, the greater is his power to satisfy desire, to attain his ends; while the poorer he is the less is this power.

That the definition of wealth just given is correct, may appear more clearly from a consideration of some of the definitions given by political economists. Take Adam Smith's: "The annual produce of the land and labour of the Society." Here, in addition to the error, already pointed out as common to all definitions yet given, of neglecting to consider wealth as an abstract noun, we have a misconception introduced by the word "annual." The wealth of England, for instance, at the end of a year, is not surely to be measured by what England has produced during that year. The roads, the railways, canals, docks, ships, warehouses, machinery that have been made in previous years in England, go as much towards contributing to the wealth of England as the produce of the year under consideration.

Besides, suppose a country where everything is free, where man has only to pluck and eat, where there is no necessity for toil; then, the produce of the labour of that country would amount to nothing and consequently its wealth, if wealth is to be regarded as the produce of the labour of a country, would amount to nothing. Such a country would, instead of being the richest, as we should ordinarily be inclined to regard it, be the poorest country in the world.

It may strike the reader that we have dealt with only part of Adam Smith's definition in the preceding paragraph, and that our strictures are not applicable to the whole of it—viz., that the wealth of a country is the produce of its land and labour, not of the produce of its labour only. We took this latter part by itself merely for convenience, and not with any evasive intention. Let us now consider the definition as given by Adam Smith himself, and let us suppose two countries instead of one where the fruits of the earth are to be had merely for the plucking. In respect of the produce of the land these two countries are equal in wealth; it is, however, necessary for one country to build fortifications and to keep itself provided with the instruments of war; for the other country no such necessity exists, it being made impregnable to foes by Nature, and it accordingly is not provided with any such things. Now if the wealth of a country is the produce of its land and labour, which of these two countries is the wealthiest? The one whose land and labour produce is greatest. Now that would be the one that had to be prepared against attack, because its land and labour produce would be greater than the produce of the other by the results of the labour imposed on it by its position. Here, then, would be a disadvantage leading to an increase of wealth, which is of course absurd.

With such a view of wealth as that laid down by Adam Smith, there is no inconvenience, no matter how great, that cannot be shown to be a source of wealth. For instance, if we suppose, as John Stuart Mill does, that from some revolution in Nature the atmosphere at the disposal of some community were to become too scanty for the consumption and had to be artificially supplied, then here would be additional labour imposed upon the community, and consequently additional wealth would ensue. Such are the erroneous conclusions that we are led to from regarding wealth as the produce of the land and labour of a country.

The preceding remarks on Adam Smith's definition of wealth apply with equal force to the definition, "all useful and agreeable things possessing exchange value." In the first place, this also overlooks the abstract nature of the name wealth. In the next place, if a community existed where all useful and agreeable things had no exchange value, in other words if they were as free as air is now, then such community would have no wealth at all. Ordinarily we should consider such a community to be extremely wealthy, inasmuch as its members enjoyed such facilities, such power, to satisfy their wants.

That wealth is power has frequently been remarked. Among others we find Hobbes calling wealth power. Adam Smith, however, denied this, adding that although a man may have a large fortune he may not rise to political power, the large fortune only enables him the more easily perhaps to secure that power. This criticism applies only to a large fortune and to political power, which are by no means synonymous with wealth and power. Mill also incidentally remarks that wealth is power. Nowhere, however, so far as the present writer is aware, is wealth formally defined to be power to satisfy desire, to attain ends.

W. B. R.

"POMARE."

(By HEINRICH HEINE. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

I.

ALL the Cupids in my breast,
All the little Love-gods there,
Cry aloud, and will not rest,
"Hail to our great Queen Pomare!"

Not the Queen of isles Pacific;
Nay, a Christian convert she;
Mine is turbulent, terrific,
Fierce, impetuous and free.

Twice in every week she prances,
Where her worshippers may view;
In the public gardens dances
Polkas, and the Cancan too.

Majesty in all her paces!
Every inch a Queen by right!
Bounteous glimpses of her graces
Dazzle each beholder's sight.

Let her dance—but in my breast
All the little Love-gods there
Cry aloud, and cannot rest,
"Hail to our great Queen Pomare!"

II.

She dances. How her body glides!
What grace her every movement guides!
Such raptures through the gazers thrill,
Their beating hearts they cannot still.

She dances. When she shows her charms
By whirling round with outstretched arms,
Then stands erect on pointed toe,
My sense and reason reeling go.

She dances. 'Tis the self-same dance
In Herod's sight did gleam and glance,
Before his fair niece paused for breath
With lightning in her eyes like death.

She'll dance me mad; my brain's on fire;
Speak, girl, what is't thou dost desire?
She smiles: 'ha! slaves, the doom is said;
Go smite me off John Baptist's head!

III.

Yesterday, to earn her food,
Danced she where thick mud was strewed;
But to-day in carriage proud
Rides she through the common crowd:
On the silken cushions there
Lies her raven length of hair.
Seated high she scorns to greet
Folk that trudge with weary feet.

Ah, when thus I see thee ride,
Pity needs must pardon pride.
Woe is me! another day
Thou wilt ride a drearier way
To the hospital, where death,
Foul of form, will stop thy breath.
Students then with greasy hand,
Fain thy fate to understand,
Thy fair body will inspect,
All thy lovely limbs dissect;
And thy steeds, for fate is hard,
Yet will tread the knacker's yard.

IV.

Nay, the plot has been amended;
Kind is Fate that seemed so dread;
God be thanked, thy life is ended;
God be thanked that thou art dead.

Yes, the attic was thy mother's,
Where thou lay'st in woeful wise;
Her kind hand, and not another's,
Was the hand that closed thine eyes;

Bought a shroud to deck thee duly,
And a pillow pure and clean;
Though thy train of mourners truly
Was a trifle poor and mean.

Not a priest his presence lent;
Not a bell for thee might stir;
By thy bier none other went,
But thy dog and hair-cutter.

"Often have I combed her hair," Sighed he, "hair that reached her knees,
As she sat before me there—
Black locks o'er her white chemise."

For the dog—with much misgiving
From the churchyard door he goes;
He will find a famous living
Later on with Mistress Rose.

Mistress Rose, who once for spleen,
When she first from Provence came,
Grudging thee thy name of Queen,
Did her best to blast thy fame.

Poor lost Queen, whose crown of clay Graced—as such crowns can—thy head,
By God's loving hand to-day
Thou art saved, for thou art dead.

As thy mother, so thy Father
Now takes pity on thy state;
This, methinks, he does the rather,
Since on earth thy love was great.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Our Commonwealth, Adelaide, South Australia, is an advanced, alert, and readable exponent of land nationalisation and tax reform. It is also an honest labour paper, a great desideratum in that part of the world.

The Pioneer is a new Radical paper, published at 1d. weekly at 42 Argyll Street, Glasgow. It is rather more advanced than the name "Radical" generally conveys, and if it keeps up to the lines laid down in its first issue, will do much to destroy the loathsome Whigism that masquerades under the more advanced name.

Articles of interest to Socialists. Scottish Review: "Byzantinism and Hellenism"; "Egypt on the Eve of the English Invasion." Statistical Society's Journal: "Economic Science and Statistics"; "Working-men's Co-operative Associations in Great Britain." Edinburgh Review: "English Land, Law, and Labour"; "The Ancient Laws of Wales." Quarterly: "Epidemics"; "The Coming Session." London Quarterly: "The Alternative of Socialism"; "Mr. Arnold's Report on Continental Education." Political Science Quarterly: "Scientific Socialism"; "Theories of Property."

George F. Rohrbach, one of the Labour representatives elected to the Illinois Legislature, received an annual pass from the Alton road and returned it, writing, "I must respectfully beg to decline it, being under no obligation to you whatever, nor wishing to put myself under any, and knowing no reason why this railroad pass should be sent, except it was for some purpose of your own or to further ends that are to the advantage of railroads and detrimental to the constituents I represent—namely the people."

Ghent, Jan. 25.—Disturbances occurred at the theatre here to-night during the performance of a Flemish piece, in which the occupation of Belgium by the French Republicans is represented in an unfavourable light. At a given moment a large number of workmen and Socialists among the audience interrupted the performance by hooting and hissing, and a scuffle thereupon ensued between the working men and the tradesmen and middle-class people among the audience. The police eventually intervened and effected a number of arrests. During the disturbance inside, a large number of Socialists collected at the entrance of the theatre singing the Marseillaise.

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW? FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

NOTES.

In its comments upon affairs in general the Spectator indulges in the following: "The taxes have not pressed perceptibly; bread has been abnormally cheap; wages have declined less than the fall in provisions, and the suffering has not fallen on the body of the people. The Haves have borne the brunt instead of the Have-nots."

As for the taxes, any taxpayer will answer that taxes have increased much beyond any asserted greater efficiency in the public service.

Bread has been cheap, but not so cheap as the tone of the Spectator would seem to imply; even if it were, what particular benefit would it work to the proletariat, seeing that the present system at once transfers all saved thereby to the pockets of their exploiters?

Wages can only be said to have declined less than the price of provisions, because other things, such as rent, have risen, and because the lessening of the cost of subsistence must necessarily go before the wage-lowering that it causes.

The man is to be envied for his consummate impudence, or despised for his falsity, who can look round upon the people to-day and assert that "the suffering has not fallen upon the body of the people."

"The Haves have borne the brunt." Of what? Of misery, anxiety, degradation? Have they been driven again and again to despair and suicide? If they, not we, are miserable, why do they not throw aside their hampering wealth and come out of "the House of Bondage"?

Accidents happen pretty impartially to rich and poor—that is to say, accidents not arising directly from the conditions of the lives of the poor. The notice taken of them varies, however, to an enormous degree. Seventeen people are crushed and trampled to death on Tuesday at Spitalfields, and it is not until Wednesday afternoon that any details reach the public, and not until Thursday that the full story is published. Had the seventeen been "swells," and the place a West End hall, what a noise would have been made!

One of the so-called comic journals in a late issue propounded a brilliant plan for relieving the present distress. "How would it do to engage one half of the unemployed as extra policemen, with the special mission of locking up the other?" Most probably, to the man who wrote and to the men who read this it would require a tremendous amount of explanation to show that this was much like what is continually being done to keep the system going—one half the working-class being uniformed and set aside to keep the other half "in its place."

A friend writes giving us the particulars of a case which came under his own observation. A young lady made application by letter to a draper for employment. She was quite inexperienced in such matters, and wrote a simple, plain statement of her qualifications and requirements, incidentally mentioning food and sleeping accommodation. She had no reply from the firm, but one of the assistants employed there saw her letter and wrote very kindly to give her advice to guide her in writing after another berth. The chief point in the advice was—"Never ask about sleeping accommodation or food: you will always find it resented." The friend who writes is quite astonished at all this, and says, "Service in shops and abject slavery are very much the same thing." The particulars given not long ago in these columns, as well as those that have appeared in many other places, go to show that among wage-slaves the shop-assistants are the most ill-treated; but all people dependent on an employer are liable to this kind of treatment, nor can it be wondered at that employers are touchy as to their dignity while their position confers such power.

This month a Warrington leather cutter died from having his arm crushed by machinery. The widow said he had several times complained of the danger and that he should be crippled. The manager admitted that others had been injured. After the coroner (W. F. Husband) said "there was no doubt risk attending the working of the machinery, but this must have been known to the deceased, who was at liberty to leave," the jury returned a verdict of accidental death, expressing the opinion that precautions should be taken. Of what value are our protective laws while men still work at dangerous and complicated machinery?

"Archdeacon Farrar denounced the luxurious habits of the present day, which gave 'the picture of wealth, a monster gorged, side by side with suffering and starving poverty.' He candidly confessed himself, however, unwilling to abandon the flesh-pots." (Quoted in Vegetarian Messenger.) The Archdeacon, speaking also of the "dribbles given away in charity," says we are at this moment stupendously and overwhelmingly wealthy, and we have in ten years invested and laid by for the enrichment of our families 120 millions of pounds. "There is money enough in the country to beautify every city and gladden every home." We are glad to find any one in such a position denouncing Mammon-worship, the love of selfish luxury, family aggrandisement, and personal display. May we not hope that the Archdeacon will go on to discover that our archbishops and bishops need converting to renounce the filthy lucre which they are now loth to lose, and that finally he will join the Socialists to sweep away the iniquitous system which in so many cases brings ugliness to our cities and sadness to our homes?

We understand that the Earl of Derby was lately the nameless donor of £5, 5s. to the Vegetarian Society. What a pleasing surprise there is in store for those who now provide for his lordship, when they learn that he has acquired the vegetarian's art of living on a shilling a-week! His tenants may then laugh at foreign competition; and the patient plodding labourer change from the long-suffering, despaired rustic into a free and light-hearted peasant; for the feast (and houses, horses, dogs, and all) Hodge now provides will be no longer required when his masters are taught by this beneficent society "How to Live in the Street called Straight."

John Smith, labourer, was indicted for having on the 31st ult. broken the window of Messrs. Austin's establishment, Westmorland Street, and stolen two silver bracelets value 35s. The evidence showed that the prisoner had in broad daylight smashed the large pane of plate glass with his hand and snatched up two bracelets. He was caught redhanded and brought off to the station. The Recorder directed a verdict of "Guilty." He asked the prisoner what he had to say for himself. Prisoner: It is a very hard case that some people should have their shop windows lined with jewellery while others should be going about without a shilling in their pockets. The Recorder said he could not treat this kind of ruffianism like an ordinary case: he must sentence the prisoner to twelve months' imprisonment with hard labour. (Dublin Daily Express, Jan. 15.) Which is the "ruffianism" that cannot be treated as an ordinary case—stealing the jewellery, or protesting against the system under which one displays his wealth whilst others starve? Would the quondam philanthropist who represents Law and Order in Green Street kindly say?

At Frankfurt on Saturday the great Socialist trial was finished. Thirty-one of the accused were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment.

The German Socialists in New York have held a mass meeting at which the dissolution of the Reichstag was denounced, and a resolution was passed to supply the working men of Germany with funds for the electoral campaign.

THE S. D. F. AND THE NORWICH SOCIALISTS.—The following resolution was unanimously passed at the meeting of the General Council of the Social-Democratic Federation, held on Monday Jan. 24: "That this meeting of the General Council of the Social-Democratic Federation expresses its deepest sympathy with their comrades of the Norwich Branch of the Socialist League, who have been so harshly dealt with by Mr. Justice Grantham in connection with the disturbances in that city, and strongly condemns the ferocious partisanship and indecent distortion of facts shown by a judge who gained his seat on the bench by doing the dirty work of the Tory Party."

THE NORWICH SOCIALISTS.

A TOWN IN TURMOIL.—SHAMEFUL SENTENCES ON COMRADES HENDERSON AND MOWBRAY.

THE news of rioting and amateur rebellion in Norwich on the 14th, took most people by surprise. It was thought that the "unemployed question" had been settled by the alleged revival of trade. The reports published by the London papers were very meagre, just large enough to get a string of lies in. They made the impression that a riot had been provoked by the Socialists, and was quickly quelled by the valiant police. But this turns out to be a totally wrong impression of what took place.

On Sunday, at 2 a.m., I arrived in Norwich from London, and found about a score of members of the Branch at the station. I soon set about getting at the real facts of the disturbance of the previous Friday. The Branch of the Socialist League has not been carrying on a special unemployed agitation, and had no part in calling the meeting at which the riot occurred. The unemployed took the move in the agitation themselves, and carried out the arrangements from first to last. After having arranged to hold the meeting they asked for a Socialist speaker to address it, and this request, of course, could not be refused. Mowbray agreed to speak at the meeting, and Henderson went with him. The meeting took place, and there were very few members of the Socialist League present. A stranger moved "that Mowbray take the chair," and this was carried by acclamation. A deputation was then appointed, in which Henderson was included, and it went to interview the mayor. This official did a good deal to exasperate the people by the indifference with which he treated their complaints. The meeting sent up a series of yells, which had the effect of reducing the dignitary to a civil mood. While the deputation was in the Guildhall, Mowbray kept the meeting together with a speech, which was certainly not of a very inflammatory character. After waiting one hour and a quarter, a message was brought to the meeting by the deputation that the mayor would put a notice in the paper calling a meeting of his friends, and would see what they could do, and that their decision would be conveyed through the press. This kind of reply was hardly likely to put hungry men into a good temper. They called aloud for Mowbray to lead them, and they would sack the shops. Mowbray answered that in laying their case before the mayor he had done all he could, and must now leave the matter in their hands. The meeting sang "The Starving Poor of Old England." Henderson addressed several short speeches to the crowd, and it is difficult to find out exactly what he said. Some say he told the men to go and take food, others that he told them the food was there, and that they would be criminals if they allowed their families to starve while it was there. After this the crowd moved down towards the Market Place. On coming to a street called "The Gentleman's Walk," the crowd got more turbulent, and arguments and other things were used. A solitary ham was all the food stolen. A banker's, a grocer's, a tea merchant's, and a confectioner's windows were smashed. About fourteen policemen then charged the crowd. They used their truncheons very freely, although no resistance was offered. Hall was taken first in the act of trying to smash a window. The whole fourteen policemen took one man and marched him off to the station. Mowbray was then taken. He made no resistance, and dissuaded the crowd from protecting him. One of the policemen went to strike him with his truncheon, but somehow Mowbray got hold of the weapon and pitched it away, and "stealing a truncheon, the property of the corporation," is among the other crimes laid at his door. Henderson, and afterwards Hurrell, were also arrested. The crowd soon dispersed, and things quietened down. Mowbray is known to have saved an old woman's nut-stall from being pillaged by someone, but this will not tell so much in his favour as if he had saved the banker's window.

Such is a true and fairly complete account of what happened. The speeches made, whether wild or not, were endorsed by the crowd and by half the workmen in the town. On Sunday I addressed four meetings, and in every case there seemed the utmost unanimity in supporting the imprisoned men. Hurrell and Hall are not members of the Branch, and are total strangers to the Socialists. At this moment it is impossible to say what the result will be. The four prisoners were committed on Saturday to the Assizes, and their case will come on for trial on Tuesday or Wednesday; the result will most likely be known as soon as this number of the Commonweal is published.

The meeting in the Market Place on Sunday, was attended by over 5000 people, and the greatest enthusiasm prevailed. Three stentorian cheers were given for the Social Revolution, and another three for the imprisoned men. A considerable sum was collected for the defence. In the evening at seven another very large meeting was held in the open-air. At eight, the Branch lecture-room and the street adjoining was packed with those anxious to hear the lecture, and testify their interest in Socialism.

Of course, the town authorities soon passed from a state of callous indifference to an absurd panic. Orders for bread and soup are being given out pretty lavishly, and the hungry and miserable have again been taught that where begging fails threats and disturbance will succeed.

J. L. MAHON.

Norwich, Monday Night, January 17th.

Since receiving our comrade Mahon's letter, the verdict and formal sentence have been given; the verdict, of course, Guilty, as seldom fails to be the case when the cats try the mice; as to the sentence, from Mr. Justice Nupkins-Grantham, it was not likely to be a light one, but most people who have noticed the case must have been rather startled when they saw that Mowbray was sentenced to nine months' hard labour, and Henderson to four. As to the trial it is clear that in the minds of the judge, and probably in those of the jurymen under his direction, the prisoners were not being tried for creating a riot, but for preaching Socialism in Norwich for the past six months. The judge's charge was worthy of the times of Peterloo, and was undisguised advocacy against the accused; and it was a mere farce to call the trial a trial by jury.

The judge stopped Mowbray in his statement before the sentence, and told him "to refer to what took place on the occasion, and not to make a speech," although in his charge he spoke chiefly of what had happened before the riot; so that he was clearly of opinion that there should be one law for the prosecution and another for the accused. The dwelling on the previous convictions of Mowbray for the terrible crime of creating a technical obstruction as an aggravation of his offence, was of a piece with the whole; and the judge ignored the fact that in those convictions the magistrate repeatedly asserted that he had nothing to do with the opinions of the open-air speakers, though he could scarcely fail to know that such was the case.

An unfair trial, a judge who was determined to get a conviction, and a vindictive sentence! Strong language will scarcely add to the impression of the violence, brutality, and baseness of "authority" frightened out of what it is pleased to call its wits, which reading the report of the trial in the local papers gives one. In short, our comrades are being punished not for rioting but for being Socialists; and our comrades generally may take note that they are at any time liable to the same fate even if the Government does not succeed in passing a Gagging Act. And what will it be in a year or two? What will become of our boasted tolerance of opinion as events threaten more and more the break-up of our system of robbery? If they do these things in the green tree what shall they do in the dry?

W. M.

On Sunday, Jan. 23, an indignation meeting of 6000 people was held in the Market Place. Strong resolutions were carried condemning the action of the judge and in favour of the Social Revolution. A petition to the Home Secretary to intervene and review the sentences is being extensively signed in the town. Nicoll, in reporting to the Council, says "the workmen are entirely with us." There has been some mistake about the guaranteeing of the expenses, which are very heavy. Subscriptions are flowing in, but very much remains to be done. Our comrade Mahon reports that at meetings held by him, subscriptions have been taken up to assist Mowbray's wife and family, at Oxford, 11s. 2d.; at Bedford, 7s.

A NEW BOOK ON THE DRINK QUESTION.

ONE of the first objections launched at Socialism in England is that the poor have mostly deserved their fate, that they are drunkards, &c. Some of the most obstinate opponents of our propaganda are temperance lecturers. They still make use of arguments long since refuted by modern science, as to the cause of poverty. For them the great factor of misery has always been drink, whilst we all know quite well that except in rare cases, mostly pathological, drink has not caused misery, but misery has caused drink and its consequences. Those gentlemen charge drink, besides, with all sorts of other vices, and with as much unreason, criminality, and suicide, diminishing the rate of births, and so on. We do not wish to go so far as the French savant Fournier de Flaix, who lately tried to prove that the more alcohol a country consumed the higher it stood with regard to civilisation, the strength of its people, rate of increase of its population, having a smaller number of crimes when compared with countries where alcoholism is rare, and as example opposing countries where alcoholism prevails, as England, Scotland, Holland, Sweden, with Italy, Spain, Greece, where drunkenness is rare, whilst crimes are numerous and ignorance is great.

I am far from agreeing with the conclusions of that savant. I know that drink is often a moral plague, but though myself a teetotaler for seventeen years, I cannot deny that as far as the economical influence of drink is concerned, the devil is not so black as he is painted. But how often in discussions do not we feel the want of thoroughly reliable and unbiased statistics on the subject of alcoholism, not of the sort concocted by various Giffens, Leone Levys, and their kidney, to refute at once the objections of the blue ribbon lecturers.

Our comrades who know Italian can now get all the information they may desire on this subject. Dr. Napoleone Colajanni (the author of a highly interesting book, 'Il Socialismo') has just published at Catania (Filippo Tropea, editore 1887) a small book replete with statistics. The book called 'L'Alcoholismo, sue conseguenze morale e sue cause,' is divided into two parts, the second especially being of importance to Socialists, as it treats of the causes of drunkenness and its cure by the transformation of the present state of society. Colajanni gives as the principal causes of intoxication, as physical cause, the climate; as economical cause, poverty; as psycho-social causes mostly allied with misery—ignorance, want of pleasure, sociableness, the condition of the homes of the poor classes, moral depression, idleness, the social organisation of the present day.

We must add Dr. Colajanni has made use of all the best works published on his subject, and that the tables relate to all the countries of Europe.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

DUNDEE.—The jute-spinners' wages have been increased five per cent.

Meetings of seamen were held at North and South Shields on the 20th inst., and a resolution was carried that it was desirable to again confer with the shipowners, with a view of obtaining the wages demanded by the men; or, if not, that they come out on strike on February 1.

Manloves and Elliott, Engineers and Machinists, Nottingham, have given notice of a reduction in wages. The union men, numbering about 30, will come out if the reduction is carried out.

At the Miners' Conference in Glasgow, a resolution was carried by 17 votes to 4, advising the miners of Scotland to cease working at once unless an advance of 6d. per day be conceded.

On Tuesday notices were posted at all the Welsh collieries under the "ocean sliding scale" that a reduction of 5 per cent. will be made in the miners' wages rate for the next three months. This reduction will affect several thousands of workmen.

The delegates of the Northumberland miners have decided that the men at the collieries who have not received notice of a reduction shall, if the ballot confirm the decision to strike, give in their notices, so that the stoppage shall be general.

A meeting of delegates from all the Northumberland collieries was held at Newcastle-on-Tyne on the 19th inst., to consider the ultimatum of the owners announcing a reduction of 12½ per cent. in wages and refusing to accept 10 per cent. as a compromise. Mr. T. Burt, M.P., attended. It was decided by an overwhelming majority that the miners of the county should strike, but that a ballot should be taken at the collieries before the strike commenced. Jan. 26.—The men have decided by 9,745 votes against 2,167 to strike. Altogether twenty-four thousand men and boys will come out.

The Monk Bretton miners have held a meeting, and decided unanimously that unless the manager (Mr. Marshall) agrees to meet the deputation they have chosen to represent them to discuss their grievances with him, they will send in their notices at once to leave their work. The resolution was proposed and carried by non-unionists, and a committee of non-union men was appointed to give effect to the arrangements for carrying out the resolution.

The demand of the South Staffordshire finished ironmasters for the abolition of certain extras now paid is creating a strong resistance amongst the men. A meeting has been held at West Bromwich to consider the masters' action. It was reported that at one works where the masters were already attempting the reduction the men had come out on strike. It was resolved to resist the demand as unjust in the face of a rising market, and it was further resolved to give notice for a ten per cent advance as a counter-claim.

CARLUKE MINERS.—On Wednesday evening, Jan. 20, the miners of Carlisle met in the Black Bull Hall. The meeting was large, consequent upon the important issues now before Lanarkshire miners. Comrade Small was present, and gave a résumé of the proceedings of the Birmingham Conference. The policy to be adopted to force an advance of wages was fully discussed, and at the conclusion the following motion was unanimously carried: "That no legislation on the coal or other royalties be accepted by the miners unless based upon nationalisation without compensation."

HAMILTON MINERS.—The miners of Hamilton district held a meeting in Scott's Hall on Jan. 20, Mr. Cochlan presiding. The chairman submitted as an alternative to the proposed general strike of the Miners' Union a "Plan of Campaign," which included the raising of a fund of £1000 and the taking out on strike of 1000 men if an advance of 1s. were not granted. The scheme further proposed the clearing of the pits on strike of all the officials, and the putting of the executive officials on a strike allowance. The chairman contended that under the plan they could, without any outside aid, hold out for three weeks, while no master, without his oncost men at work, could afford to allow his pits to stand three days. It was suggested that 6d. instead of 1s. should be named as the advance, but the chairman maintained that the latter amount was justified by the state of trade. The Plan was adopted and ordered to be submitted to the County Board for their consideration. Jan. 25.—At a largely attended meeting of the Bellshire and Bothwell miners, held at Airdrie to-day the men decided to come out on strike. Fully three thousand are now idle, and the masters are determined not to give the increase of one shilling a day demanded.

RISE IN STEEL-WORKERS WAGES.—Mr. Riley, the general manager of the Steel Company of Scotland, has called a meeting of the men employed at the Newton Works and at Blochairn, and intimated that on account of the prospects of the advance of prices during the spring the directors have resolved to grant a slight advance of wages, to date from last Monday. The advance will be the half of the last reduction, made about twelve months ago, and will be from 2½ to 3½ per cent, according to the grades of work done. This advance was given unsought, and came on the men as an "agreeable surprise." Mr. Riley spoke of the "good relations existing between the employer and the men." [The old proverb says one should not look a gift horse in the mouth. In the same way I am inclined to think the steel-workers will not need to scrutinise the motives too closely which prompted the above "agreeable surprise," with the accompanying tag about "good relations," etc. Good relations between the fox and the geese! Surely the workers will not be much longer duped with such goody-goody twaddle. They are beginning to understand that they themselves produce their own wages, big or little, and that no thanks are due to those who fleece them gently only that they may continue to fleece.]

RAWTENSTALL.—GLARING CASE OF OVERTIME.—There is a weaving shed in this district which is becoming notorious on account of the great amount of time which is cribbed. The engine only stops twenty minutes for breakfast, and sometimes less than that, and during that short space of time the weavers have to swallow their breakfast as best they can, and also take the waste and broken cops to be booked, and bring the weft to last them till the following breakfast time.—Cotton Factory Times.

FARNWORTH.—COERCION AT SPINNING MILLS.—Public attention is being drawn to the unjust rule enforced by some millowners at Farnworth, by which Catholic parents and others are deprived of their parental and legal right to choose the school at which their children shall be educated. For the last forty years one large firm has made it compulsory on children employed as half-timers that they should attend a particular school chosen by the firm.

Other millowners do the same, and in many cases, owing to poverty, the parents are obliged to submit.—Cotton Factory Times. [Mr. Bradlaugh objects to the term "wage-slaves." By what other term can he designate those poor because fleeced of the results of their labour and denied the control of their own will, as in the above instance?]

DUBLIN.—THE RECENT STRIKE OF BOTTLE-MAKERS.—The members of the Dublin Society of Bottlemakers have presented our comrade Schumann, with a testimonial in recognition of the invaluable services rendered by him to the bottlemakers during the late strike. The testimonial which consisted of a silver service of plate beautifully chased and a gold watch and Albert, was presented at a meeting presided over by Mr. Dawson, an old but retired member of the trade. Schumann, in returning thanks, congratulated the society on the successful termination of the strike. The Dublin bottlemakers had, as the outcome of the strike and the departure of the Swedes who had come to take their places, been the first society in Ireland to establish an International Society of Bottlemakers, the influence of which was considerable throughout the United Kingdom in advancing the cause of Trades' Unionism. He also spoke of the good work done by the Dublin Trades' Council on behalf of the bottlemakers. An illuminated address and purse of money was presented to Mr. Graham, Secretary of the Society.

FEMALE LABOUR IN SPINNING ROOMS.—The secretary of the Operative Cotton Spinners' Association has completely exposed the hypocritical sophistry of Colonel Bailey, the secretary of the Master Cotton Spinners' Association, who endeavoured to discredit the motives of the men in seeking to put a stop to the employment of female piecers. Mr. Fielding has himself been an operative spinner and employed female piecers as his assistants. He is therefore likely to have a fuller knowledge of the daily life of the spinners than Colonel Bailey and his committee, and he repels with indignation the insinuation that his assertion as to the dress and attitudes of the women are to be taken as insults. "They know me better," he writes. "I do, however, hope and believe that my efforts in their behalf have aroused in them a sense of the moral degradation to which they have long been subjected. If so, my object has been partially accomplished. My primary motive was to bring before our men the injury they were unconsciously inflicting upon their daughters; that I have succeeded is proved by their resolution of a month ago, and which was confirmed in silence at another meeting held last night. It redounds more to their credit when it is borne in mind that they, the parents, will have to suffer the loss of wages, if any, by the course they have decided upon. Personally I have the consoling reflection that, in opposition to all that Colonel Bailey and his committee may say, I have killed a system which ought never to have had an existence." The Dispatch appears to doubt the statements made by Mr. Fielding, and, as is not unusual, seems inclined to take the employers' view of the matter. It is a disgrace to the workers, especially those who are organised, that they continue to support such capitalist papers.

AMERICA.

Chicago laundry girls are organising an assembly of K. of L.

The store girls of Pittsburgh have organised a K. of L. assembly.

The K. of L. of Frankford, Pa., are building a co-operative textile factory. South Adams, Mass., K. of L. have started a co-operative meat market.

The cigarmakers of Weaverville, Pa., who were recently defeated in a strike, have started a co-operative cigar factory.

The Amalgamated Carpenters of Chicago have a contract to build three houses for 6000 dollars.

The boycotted firm of Fuller, Warren & Co., Troy, N.Y., have closed their entire establishment, there being no demand for their stoves.

The Chicago Trades Assembly have elected William Kliever, the Socialist candidate, for president, and F. W. Long, also a Socialist, as vice-president.

Two thousand five hundred persons employed at Messrs. Higgins' carpet factory, in New York, have struck work owing to a number of men having been discharged.

The employés of the breweries in Philadelphia, including brewers, drivers, coopers, engineers, firemen, and other hands, numbering in all over 2000 men, are on strike against a 20 per cent. reduction.

The vice-president of the Iron and Steel Association has expressed fears that the price of iron will reach the importing point, and that foreign iron will flood the market. He says that to his own knowledge 6000 tons of steel rails have been imported into New Orleans at two dollars per ton less than the Pennsylvania mills could supply them.

The San Francisco car strike is still on. The cars have been running to some extent in daylight but not at all in the evening. And they run empty, mostly. One of the strikers was asked to come back to work, and was promised three dollars a day, two detectives to escort him from his residence to his car, two more to escort him from his car to his residence, and two policemen to escort him on the car. Why it's a whole procession! And yet he wouldn't walk in it, adhering to the wise and good old rule, "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not." Whether the strike is hurting the men or not, it is hurting the companies terribly.—Weekly Star.

FRANCE.

AMIENS.—The Mayor of Amiens, through his skilful administration, has had the extreme kindness to fix the salary for communal works at 1 fr. 30 c. a-day, and that of the town sweepers and cleaners at 90 c. To raise the voice in expostulation against this "reward of labour" is only to bring on one's head a shower of official insolence and blinded arrogance.

IVRY.—The Socialists of Ivry are going to try to get up a "groupe" in this Commune, and issue an appeal to those "who have the heart to free themselves from the present situation, to come together to seek out the means of remedying the same."

MERY-SUR-OISE.—In this Commune also the Socialist propaganda and study of Socialism has been set on foot.

CIVRAY (VIENNE).—The navvies employed in the construction of the railway of Civray au Blanc, have declared themselves on strike, demanding a rise in wages.

VIÉRON.—A telegram to the Cri announces that at Vierzon village, Samson, a Socialist, has been elected mayor, and Baudin and Rossignol, two well-known Socialist names, first and second deputy-mayors.

MEUN (CHER).—The porcelain makers on strike here have had an interview with the Mayor, the delegates insisting with energy on their condition, which is the dismissal of an obnoxious director or overseer. The place continues to be absolutely quiet.

VIERZON-FORGES.—The strike of glass-workers still continues. The strike committee wishing, under the circumstances, to try every means of bringing about an understanding between the men and their employer, Sieur Aubriot, sent several delegates to discuss the matter with him, but he refused to receive them. In consequence of this unconciliatory attitude, it was decided at a meeting held by all the strikers to sustain the struggle to its end.

HAVRE.—The strike of tilers continues, the men demanding 75 c. the hour instead of 65 c. Some of the employers have given in, but twenty or thirty have protested through the press against the proceedings, threatening to leave the men "out in the cold," which matters the less, as they are by their own act already out in the cold.

ROUBAIX.—The weavers at the house of Couronble and Carrette have been on strike since the 4th inst., the motive of the strike being the persistent diminution in the price of labour. At the demand for a rise the employers have merely intimated that those who are not content can take up their "books" and go. Knowing that if they get their "livrets" and shake the dust off their feet, there are plenty of their fellows who will step into their places eagerly at whatever price almost, the strikers prefer to make a stand and attempt to arrive at some sort of a compromise, poor comfort as that may be!

The saddle-makers of the houses of Lecerf, Sarda, and Helbronner, in Paris, in consideration of the wages imposed upon them, have agreed to strike, and after holding a general meeting to discuss the situation have appointed a Committee and sent delegates to ask for an audience of the War Minister, so as to prevent these houses, who contract for the army, from obtaining a delay in the completion of their contracts. Reduction of wages has gone on here rapidly as elsewhere, for in two years alone the price of labour in the military equipment industry has fallen between 30 and 70 per cent. Of the quality of the goods served out to the French army it is almost superfluous to speak; one has but to call to mind the fearful rubbish which our soldiers have to wear and use, the tradition of shoes with paper soles being a type of the general excellence of the goods, and no exaggeration.

DECAZEVILLE.—For nearly two months the Company has only sold coal to the neighbouring country folk every two or three days. Every day it occurs that twenty and thirty of them are obliged to hang about with their animals for several days, waiting for the trucks to bring them some few sacks of coal. This is the Company's way of avenging itself. The directors prefer not to execute all their orders rather than take on again those dismissed in consequence of the strike, which they could not get on without if they worked all the boards, and did not wittingly and wilfully make the population of an entire district want for coal. This voluntary arrest of work paralyses circulation; the retailers on the roads have no longer their transitory clientèle, every one feels it and every one complains. The townsfolk are obliged to utilize the cinder-siftings while awaiting the good pleasure of the Company to deliver goods due a month ago. The coals delivered lately, moreover, have been nothing but stones. . . . One hears that over sixty families have left the country for America, others preparing to follow in the spring. . . . Bad as the present situation is, it is like to grow worse, for the new director entering into the views of the Company proposes to stop in March three-fourths of the furnaces and workshops.—Cri du Peuple.

SOCIALISM IN AMERICA.

EDWARD AVELING delivered in Farringdon Hall a partial account of his experiences in the States, last Wednesday, to a crowded audience. He found that Socialism was much more advanced in the States than at home. The workmen are to a greater extent than in this country the foremost men in its propaganda; not only are there more Socialists in America, but they are much better organised. They are a more compact body, and can more readily take combined action. In this we would do well to imitate them. By their exertions they have created an exceedingly good labour press, which has now great influence. Referring to the Knights of Labour, Dr. Aveling described their organisation as a very heterogeneous one, containing within it men who were very conservative, and others who were pronounced revolutionists. It is curious that though their declaration of principles states in effect that they desire to bring about the abolition of the wage-system, and the substitution of universal co-operation, yet many of them feel alarmed when they are told that that is Socialism. Dr. Aveling regards it as probable that in the near future there will be a schism in the Knights of Labour. The minority of active and intelligent men will come into the Socialist party, and the others remain on the old Conservative lines. At present, it is widely thought that Powderly—who is a Roman Catholic—is too much under the thumb of the priesthood, and that more than once recently the workmen have suffered through the intrigues of capitalists and priests who have used Mr. Powderly as their tool. Mr. Powderly says that there are very few Socialists in his organisation; but let some crucial labour question come to the front, and let Mr. Powderly shilly-shally or trim, and he will find his organisation split as nearly as possible in halves, the left wing declaring for the socialisation of land and capital. The researches of Edward Aveling and Eleanor Aveling have led them to conclude that the position of the workman in England is, on the average, the same as in America, and that those who hold out hopes of better wages to English workmen if they emigrate to the United States are spreading a pernicious fallacy, the facts being that the small increase in money wages is quite swallowed up by the expense of living, etc. Wise workmen will stay here in England to help forward the Social Revolution, and in doing so they will not be sacrificing any advantage. Dr. Aveling said that the feeling of the American public towards the condemned Anarchists in Chicago had undergone a complete change, and he regards it as very probable that a new trial will be granted, in which case, unless evidence of a less bogus and perjured character is forthcoming than was at first trial, they will be acquitted, and this change has been brought about to a very great extent by the persistent agitation of the Socialists. The lecturer will continue the subject next Wednesday (Feb. 2).

It is a pity the mass of the people in all climes and countries are so stupid, ignorant, or indolent, or all at the same time, to leave their fates in the hands of a few ambitious statesmen, whose sole aim is self-glorification, and who look upon the masses as so many sheep to be driven to the slaughter-house, whenever their hides are wanted. We read amongst the European telegrams that France intends to increase her armaments on account of Germany; and the latter is doing the same because of France! The true secret, however, is that in either country there are a few villains, who, in order to satisfy their ambitions, do not shrink to murder thousands of their dupes if necessary.—Our Commonwealth (Adelaide).

THE COMING CHANGE.

OWING to the severity of the weather, the depression of trade has heightened to an alarming extent; everywhere, in our midst and our surroundings, haggard faces are discernible, the harrowing cry for food may be heard; cases of death from starvation are revealed almost daily; yet the guardians of the different parishes throughout England seem powerless to act, and the Local Government Board leans a deaf ear to the voice of the people who ask only for a trifling endowment of that which they have been so heartlessly robbed. The charities that have been left for distribution to the poor in time of need, throughout England, have mostly been appropriated by the middle-class to their own use, and even these not being sufficient to satisfy their cravings, they tax the people exorbitantly to meet the demands which they (the people) do not incur. They have shirked the responsibility which rested on them, to alleviate the distress of the needy, they have bled the workmen to such an extent that there is little left for the nourishing of their bodies, and consequently they are dragged down under the pressure, to equal nothing better than the poor negro slave. Everywhere the torture rack is being used with undue severity by capitalists masters against the workers, so that those who are in work are very little better off than the unemployed. Long hours, hard work, and short pay, are the methods that are adopted for the endurance of British workmen, who in return for such kind considerations are quite willing to submit to eke out a miserable existence, whereby their days are shortened, their children are, in many instances, stunted and deformed, and life, instead of being bright and happy, is made a drudgery even worse than the beasts of burden have to endure. How long this struggle for bare existence will continue is more than philosophers have predicted; but even as Rome fell a victim to its own vices, so also must the crash come here, and England will no more be a mighty power governed as it now is, by a few crafty statesmen, for the eyes of the people will be opened, the political tricksters will deceive themselves, and like Napoleon, at the Franco-German war, will sink insignificantly into chaos. Swiftly as the birds fly the day dawns that will bring to mankind their deliverance. Each day brings news from abroad which is putting anxiety into the minds of Statesmen; the state of the whole British Empire is unsatisfactory to their interests; the tithe war in Wales, the land question in Ireland, and also in Scotland, coupled with the brutal evictions; the depression of trade in England, all tend to harass the minds of ministers; while Socialism is taking rapid strides in our dominions and will probably be a death blow to landlordism, jobbery, and corruption. Such is the state of affairs, and who shall predict what the next few years will bring forth. Time is the harbinger of strange events. What would not be listened to to-day may become a living monument on the morrow. And what is mocked at and scorned now, may be raised up and exalted at no very distant date. Every living being who takes a part in life's drama, cannot always personate the same character, and so it may be seen (I hope in my time), when Dives and Lazarus will change their positions and come on an equal footing with each other; and this can be accomplished by the federation of the workers, each one working mutually with another, casting aside all party prejudices; each one claiming that which is his due; and by rallying round the banner of freedom our emancipation will be achieved.

THE NORWICH PRISONERS' AID FUND.

Our comrade Mowbray, who has been sentenced to nine month's imprisonment, leaves his wife and five children totally unprovided for. Henderson's sentence is imprisonment for four months. His case is not so hard, he being a single man. The cost of the trial amounts to £50, this has to be repaid, and the wife and family of Mowbray provided for during his imprisonment. You are earnestly appealed to, to give all the assistance you can. Collection cards have been issued, and can be had on application to the Committee: Lane, Charles, and Barker, at 13, Farringdon Road, London, E.C. All monies received will be acknowledged in Commonweal. Money can be sent addressed to Committee, and those who cannot take cards are asked to respond liberally to this appeal.

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Friday, Jan. 21st, A. Donald discussed the 5th chapter of the 'Socialist Catechism.'—L. W.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Jan. 19, Edward Aveling spoke on "Socialism in America." (See report of lecture in another column). Edward Aveling will give continuation of this subject at the hall on Wednesday, Feb. 2, at 8.30 p.m., when trade unionists are especially invited. On Sunday, Jan. 23, Hubert Bland gave very interesting and instructive lecture on "Nihilism." The lecturer pointed out very vividly the cruelties, punishments, and terrible hardships which the Russian Nihilists have undergone for the Cause. Numerous questions followed, which were replied to by the lecturer. 71 Commonweals sold, and fair sale of pamphlets. Members are requested to take up Branch cards for 1887.—W. B. and T. E. W., joint-secs.

CROYDON.—On Wednesday, the 19th inst., we, in conjunction with the Mitcham and Merton Branches, attended a Self-help Emigration meeting at the Town Hall, Croydon, organised by the Croydon Charitable Society, and presided over by the Mayor, who was supported by the Vicar, Commander Cameron, and some local magnates. The Mayor elected to veto all discussion, and refused to allow a resolution sent in by our comrade Kitz to be put to the meeting, saying that they had not met to argue but to state facts. Thereupon the assembly became very lively, all the "facts" being so fiercely challenged that the lecturer had to admit the existence of large numbers of unemployed in the Colonies, the inadequacy of the proposed scheme for relieving the local distress, etc., and ended by giving a really good anti-emigration lecture. We were treated with great respect by the authorities, they providing us with a most powerful police escort gratis. They regard us rightly as public benefactors, for we were the only live element in an otherwise dull meeting, and we have furnished matter for more than three columns of local news. I don't think any more emigration meetings will be held here just yet. On Sunday, Sydney Olivier lectured on "A Social View of Wealth." He pointed out the difficulty of ascertaining the exact value of any one's work, and that it is impossible to discover what are the "full fruits" of any individual's labour. This line of thought led him to endorse the Communist dictum, "From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs." Fair discussion and good collection.—A. T., ast.-sec.

FULHAM.—Usual outdoor meeting held on Sunday morning at 11, moderate attendance. Members are invited to write the secretary for information and literature. It is confidently anticipated that rooms will be opened shortly.

HACKNEY.—On Sunday, Jan. 23, Mrs. C. Wilson lectured here on "The Revolt of the Workers in the Nineteenth Century." She clearly traced the causes which led to the revolt of workers against the exploitation of their masters. Referring to the Luddites she said that they were dimly conscious of the true cause of their misery, and contended that through middle-class influence they were deluded into adopting constitutional means to remedy their condition. The problem being economical, it could not be solved by any political changes but the possession of the land and instruments of production by the workers themselves. Good discussion and sale of literature.—H. M.

HOXTON.—On Sunday evening, H. A. Barker opened a discussion on "Socialism v. Individualism," which was well taken up by members present. At the close of the meeting the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "That this meeting expresses its sympathy with the Socialists of Norwich, and places on record its disgust at the mean, cowardly, and biased attitude assumed by Mr. Justice Grantham toward them on their trial."—E. POPE, sec.

BRADFORD.—On Sunday, January 23, F. W. Sowell gave a lecture on "Socialism and Reform" at the Exchange Discussion Club, City Road, which proved a thorough success, no opposition being offered, but signs of progress were shown towards a better understanding of Socialism and its necessity. Sale of literature good. On the same evening, P. Bland read a paper on "Our Indian Empire" at the Newmarket Hotel. The Sunday previous, G. A. Gaskell read a paper on "Individualism and Socialism" at the Royal Oak, Shipley.—C. H., sec.

DUBLIN.—On Monday evening, at the Coffee Palace, Townsend Street, before an audience of about 300, mostly labourers, a paper entitled "Trade Wants," was read by Mr. J. Charlton. The lecturer recommended to the workers the usual middle-class farrago—thrift, temperance, technical education, etc. Discussion having been invited, comrade T. Fitzpatrick mounted the platform, and forcibly pointed out that however good temperance and its kindred virtues may be in themselves, or might benefit isolated individuals, their general adoption under the present system of Society would not materially improve the position of the workers; while technical education would only make the worker a more skilful tool in the hands of the capitalist. What was wanted was the substitution of a co-operative form of that Society in place of the fratricidal strife that necessarily results from the present relations between capital and labour. The remarks of our comrade were well received.—O'G.

GLASGOW.—On Wednesday evening, comrade Geo. McLean delivered a lecture on Socialism in the Hall of the Unitarian Church, St. Vincent Street. The lecturer described the present industrial system in vigorous terms, and pleaded ably for a reorganisation of industry. A long discussion followed, in which several of our members joined. On Saturday evening, in the Southern Literary Institute, Arch McLaren delivered a lecture of unusual merit upon "Anarchism," in which, while expressing his belief that Socialism must precede Anarchism, he maintained that law and majority-rule were, and must be, oppressive, and that individuals and minorities must preserve their liberty by revolt. On Sunday evening, in our Hall, Carlton Place, comrade McLaren again lectured, his subject being, "The Gracchi, or Social Conflict in Ancient Rome."

HULL.—On Sunday, we opened the meeting with "No Master" and "March of the Workers." Devlin spoke on the "Condition of the Working-class," which he contended was little, if any better, than that of chattel-slaves. The slave-owners did see that their slaves were fed, but the modern employer cares not a straw whether his slaves starve or not. An earnest discussion followed, to which Devlin replied.

OXFORD.—Mahon lectured to a good audience on "The Paths to Socialism," and was very well received, the opposition being very weak; 14s. 3d. was collected at the meeting for the defence, etc., of our Norwich comrades.—T. M.

SOUTH HACKNEY WORKING-MEN'S CLUB, Brooksbys Walk, Homerton.—On Sunday, Jan. 23, Lane lectured on "The National Loaf, who earns and who eats it." No opposition was offered. The audience was quite in sympathy with the views of the speaker. 2s. 6d. was paid the lecturer, which has been handed over to the Propaganda Fund.

NOTES ON NEWS.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN waxed almost pathetic in his appeal for the gratitude of constituencies to their representatives for past services: a very convenient feeling to establish on behalf of "rats" and dishonest politicians, and I fear a feeling rather strong amongst voting working-men. I fear, because as a matter of fact such a feeling at best means a weak doubt of one's own principles, and at worst (and oftenest so, probably) means mere servility and stupidity. Gratitude to traitors and turncoats! Sham sentiment of the nineteenth century, you do indeed get into curious corners when politicians deal with you!

Mediæval sentiment was at least more logical than this. An old chronicler puts into the mouth of an orator pleading a cause some words like these: "Why do the heralds at the tournaments cry 'Honour to the sons of the valiant' (preux), and not 'Honour to the valiant'?" Because a man that has been valiant may do amiss, and spoil his valiancy, and then he is valiant no more; but when he is dead, and has not spoiled his valiancy in aught, then you may call him valiant indeed; and to think of this is great encouragement to younger men, so that they may endure to the end."

Certainly in politics "we have changed all that"; and the rule now is that when a man has once got a reputation as a leader he may indulge himself in almost any shabbiness and sneaking ways, and injure his reputation scarcely at all; always so long as he brazens it out, and keeps himself well before the public—advertises himself, in fact.

Mr. Chamberlain, for the rest, said very little worth noting. His scheme of peasant-proprietorship, which he has always before him, is really reducible to this: the creation of a class of small owners who would (somehow) have bought their holdings, and the driving those who could not (somehow) buy them into the class of day labourers. This would certainly be an advantage to both landlord and capitalist, but it would hardly turn Ireland into a heaven for the working man, whether he were a labourer or a small proprietor with a millstone of mortgage round his neck.

W. M.

Can the stupidity of "national" rivalry as engendered and fostered by commercialism go much further than in the Fisheries Dispute between England and America?

War is even talked of. Of course, it is not very likely to come off; but like two boys who say "Yah, who's afraid!" the two governments are trying to frighten one another into concession.

The policies proposed only differ as to the capitalists of which nation the profits shall go to, no thought is given to the people's benefit.

That men of any intelligence should become in anywise excited over the "Queen's Speech" is difficult for a Socialist to understand, the ponderous empty platitudes that convey nothing with great effort are so desperately trivial.

Dealing, even in the way it does, with "the affairs of the Empire," it has no word for the folk or for their interests. Some distant hint of peasant proprietorship is all that can even be twisted into a semblance of being projected on their behalf.

The way in which people leap into the fray and attack Socialism without in the least knowing what it is, both amuses and disgusts one.

Thus a journal whose only raison d'être is the combatting of Socialism speaks after this fashion: "Mr. Fyffe, formerly 'the candidate' for Oxford city, Mr. Rowlands, M.P., together with the Leasehold 'Enfranchisement' Association, and all other urban Socialists!"

Now, our contemporary is either under the delusion that all the named folk are of one kidney—and that Socialist—or else it is seeking simultaneously to enrage the Socialists and discredit the politicians by the conjunction of their names.

But it is almost certain that Jus does really regard any one who recoils from the unlimited license and boundless self-assertion of Individualism as, ipso facto, a Socialist.

In order that our friends the enemy may have a criterion whereby to judge of a man's Socialism, they should remember that a Socialist is one who believes in the destruction of the system which now obtains of individual property in the means for the production of wealth, and the substitution therefor of a system of social collective ownership and collective control.

Unless a man thus believes, he is not a Socialist, however honestly he may desire to limit the wrong and robbery of to-day.

Poor Mr. Bradlaugh! He was, once upon a time, quite an Ishmael among the respectabilities and proprieties, but now Jus is asking what is the exact amount of disagreement between him and the Liberty and Property Defence League. "It appears there is a difference, but it is so slight that it seems to us almost invisible to the naked eye." Quite so, as the quondam champion of the people is now pilot-fish to the association of sharks drawn together for the defence of the "liberty" to devour the folk.

It is surely enough degradation to fulfil the loathsome function, without having public attention thus insolently drawn to it.

Even as I write comes the Chicago Tribune of January 11, in a leader of which the following occurs:

"No man possessed of genuine American manhood can be found in the ranks of Socialism. No man speaking the English language, educated in our schools and having the American characteristics, is identified with it, except as he hopes to become a leader of one of its sections. None of the older Germans who have become Americanised and none of the younger Germans attending our schools and familiarising themselves with our institutions are to be found advocating it. Its followers are those who have come to this country indoctrinated with its foreign unrepublican principles. No American or Americanised working-man can subscribe to its doctrines without sacrificing his manhood, his personal dignity, and all his individual rights, and voluntarily declaring his willingness to become a pauper and live upon the workhouse system. Before taking such a step, before allowing these demagogues to fasten a system upon them which will pauperise them, would it not be wise and prudent for them to study it a little, and to read what Mr. Bradlaugh has to say about it, before they surrender to a clique of demagogues who are plotting to destroy organised labour and its rewards and substitute organised pauperism and its penalties?"

The Chicago Tribune is about the biggest "rat" paper in the States. "Like likes like." Still, it is very funny to be advised to read Mr. Bradlaugh as a corrective to demagogueism!

The Personal Rights Journal takes a long extract from the article upon the Liberty and Property Defence League that lately appeared in our columns. For this we thank it, as also for the ludicrously clear proof once more given, in its comment upon the extract, of the utter lack of knowledge of the economic position of the working class possessed by Individualists in general.

Jus pleads with us for "goodwill and fraternity" towards the Liberty and Property Defence League and all other opponents. Has it ever heard the historic advice "not to swap horses in the middle of the stream"?

It is not in the heat of battle that men can stay to analyse motive and give credit for intention. We are arrayed for the destruction of a wrong: all who are not with us are against us. The Liberty and Property Defence League is expressly and avowedly formed to combat us, and they must look for hard knocks. We fight with clean weapons—but relentlessly.

When the dust of battle has cleared away, and the victory has been made secure, it may be that we shall see—it is certain that we shall see—that there has been much good intention and pure motive behind these men's action.

To-day they stand as our declared foemen, honest or not, a bar in the way of the folk toward freedom. They must stand aside—or go down!

COMPETITION.

THE great stumbling-block which so many of the muddle-headed fossils of the present system of society find it impossible to surmount, is commercial competition and the blessings which are supposed to flow from it; and to conceive a state of society in which progress is without such competition is beyond their feeble comprehensions.

"Competition is necessary for progress," say our opponents, and we reply, "Agreed—under the present system." Indeed, our opponents continually cite instances of the wretched way in which railways and other big public concerns are administered under the present system, in cases where there is no competition. We, in reply, simply point out that all business at the present day is conducted in the interest of shareholders and employers of labour, whose one object in conducting these concerns is not to increase our comforts, but to obtain from these enterprises as much as possible of the wealth produced by the workers. Is it astonishing that under such a system there is no tendency to progress, except what is due to competition between the gamblers? And in how many cases does the competition produce improvement? In the majority of cases it results in lowering wages, in the replacement of human labour by machinery, or in the production of cheap and nasty goods.

Competition is of two kinds—viz., (1) that which prevails amongst the robbers for the chance of being able to rob their workmen, and (2) that which prevails amongst the workers for the privilege of being robbed. The first of these is the cause of the second. The competition between the robbers causes them to employ as few human machines as possible and to replace them as far as possible by iron machines, because the latter don't require clothing and houses, they are not encumbered with wives and families, and above all things they are not given to striking. Then as a number of human machines can't get work, there comes in that great and divine blessing to the human race, commonly known as the "struggle for existence." A great many of our opponents are pious people who believe in the six days' creation, Adam and Eve, etc., and look upon scientific men as a desperately wicked set; yet it is astonishing how eagerly they take to Darwinian theories as soon as they are confronted by Socialists.

Yes, the struggle for existence may have resulted in the "survival of the fittest" whilst our ancestors were hairy quadrupeds and the like; but we absolutely fail to see how it does so in the present position of the human race, when we are no longer the servants of Nature, but Nature herself is fast being brought into subjection to the human intellect.

Moral principles and intellectual faculties are the characteristics which should now distinguish the human race from the rest of creation, and the fittest to survive are those that possess these in the highest degree. Yet does the present struggle for existence bring about such a survival of the fittest? Absolutely nothing of the kind. It tends to develop all the basest tendencies of man—deceit, injustice, selfishness, the desire to rob one's fellow-men and succeed at their expense; and those who possess these in the highest degree succeed in surviving.

A nice prospect for the human race! A return to the condition of wild beasts or worse!

Grimy towns, filthy homes, dirt, squalor, starvation, such are the results of this devilish dishonesty; the human race, the masterpiece of Nature, diverted from its true destiny; and many of the inhabitants of this great Empire living under circumstances to which the condition of the least advanced races of mankind were infinitely preferable.

There is one bright feature about competition, and that is that it will bring about the ruin of the great gambling system called business. We see this in the case of gambling of a similar kind on a small scale. Consider, for instance, the word-competitions which are now all the rage. When one person found he could make a good thing out of the general idiocy of the middle-classes, plenty of others followed his example, and as more and more do so, profits will grow smaller owing to competition, until either the dupers will find it not worth while carrying on, or the duped will find they lose more than they gain and cease to patronise the sport. It is just so with the business of the world: either the gamblers will find it doesn't pay well enough and will drop the game, or the human dice they play with will see through it all and put a stop to it themselves. It is to be hoped that the latter course will be adopted; in fact, it is the aim of us Socialists to make the workers take matters unto their own hands.

Because they have rather more of the comforts of life than their ancestors of 100 years ago, many amongst the working-classes are contented. They are like a man who has a right to an estate and is contented to take one square yard of it, and let the rest fall into the hands of a robber-band, and not only that, but consent to become the slave of those who have stolen his property.

It must be remembered that all the greatest inventions and improvements have not been due to competition amongst the capitalists, nor have they issued from their brains, although some people seem to think they are the only people possessed of that commodity. They have come in great measure from the hands and heads of working-men, and the means by which capitalists have obtained the advantages of these inventions are characterised by injustice and dishonesty.

When we consider on the one hand all the beautiful things which man has produced; the cathedrals, the like of which our modern resources fail to reproduce; the works of the great masters, the thoughts and the literature of past ages, and even the most beautiful productions of the present age, our parks, public gardens, and boulevards, we find that in no case do we owe them to the competition between robbers and slaves, but to the freely-developed genius of man, encouraged by the demands of the community. Whilst on the other hand, when we contemplate the wretchedness, the filthy living, the starvation, the paucity of great thinkers in proportion to the population and to the advanced position to which some of the human race have attained, when we find also an almost total absence of any classical production in art, we perceive that all these evils are due to the competitive warfare of the present time and the hurry which is everywhere manifest in the education of the race, even the mighty human intellect which was fast conquering Nature becoming itself enslaved to the sordid and debasing thirst for gold.

Under an honest system of society, progress, due to the power man possesses over Nature, will take place far faster than now. Public opinion will see that necessary improvements are carried out, and there will be all the free scope for moral and intellectual development which is almost impossible in the present age of selfishness and hurry.

A. TARN.

SOCIALISM FROM THE ROOT UP.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE TRANSITION FROM THE UTOPISTS TO MODERN SOCIALISM.

OF the Socialist thinkers who serve as a kind of link between the Utopists and the school of the Socialism of historical evolution, or scientific Socialists, by far the most noteworthy figure is Proudhon who was born at Besançon in 1809. By birth he belonged to the working-class, his father being a brewer's cooper, and he himself as a youth followed the occupation of cowherding.

In 1838, however, he published an essay on general grammar, and in 1839 he gained a scholarship to be held for three years, a gift of one Madame Suard to his native town. The result of this advantage was his most important though far from his most voluminous work, published the same year, as the essay which the Madame Suard's scholars were bound to write: it bore the title of 'What is Property?' his answer being, Property is Robbery.

As may be imagined, this remarkable essay caused much stir and indignation, and Proudhon was censured by the Besançon Academy for this production, and narrowly escaped a prosecution. In 1841 he was tried at Besançon for a letter he wrote to Victor Considerant, the Fourierist, but was acquitted. In 1846 he wrote his 'Philosophie de la Misère' (Philosophy of Poverty), which received an elaborate reply and refutation from Karl Marx.

In 1847 he went to Paris. In the Revolution of 1848 he showed himself a vigorous controversialist, and was elected Deputy for the Seine; he wrote numerous articles in several journals, mostly criticisms of the progress of the revolution: in the Chamber he proposed a tax of one-third to be levied on all interest and rent, which was, as a matter of course, rejected. He also put forward a scheme for a mutual credit bank, by which he hoped to simplify exchange and reduce interest to a vanishing point: but this scheme was also rejected.

After the failure of the revolution of '48, Proudhon was imprisoned for three years, during which time he married a young woman of the working-class.

In 1858 he developed his system of 'Mutualism' fully in his last work, entitled 'Justice in the Revolution and the Church.' In consequence of the publication of this book he had to retire to Brussels, but was amnestied in 1860, came back to France, and died at Passy in 1865.

Proudhon's opinions and works may be broadly divided into two periods: In his 'What is Property?' his position is that of a Communist pure and simple; but after this one clear development of a definite thesis we meet in his works, and we must add, in his political actions also, with so much paradox that it is next to impossible to formulate in brief any definite Proudhonian doctrine. At one time a Communist, at another the vehement opponent of Communism; at one time professing Anarchy, at another lending himself to schemes of the crudest State Socialism; at one time an enthusiastic Theist, at another apparently as strong an Atheist; in one passage of his works giving his eager adhesion to Auguste Comte's worship of women, in another a decided contemner of the female sex,—it is with a sense of confusion that one rises from the perusal of his works.

His connection with the Revolution of '48 seems to have been the turning point in the history; in his address to the electors of the Seine, in which he put forward the scheme for a credit bank backed by a number of decrees of a State-Socialistic nature, and strongly smacking of Bismarck, he announces himself as the man who said Property is Robbery, says that he still maintains that opinion, and then goes on to defend the rights of property which he had so successfully annihilated in his first work.

But as to his political career, the element he had to work in was an impossible one for the success of a man holding definite Socialistic ideas. On the one hand were the Jacobins with their archæological restorations of the ideas and politics of 1789; on the other Socialism showing itself and taking hold of people's minds, but attempting to realise its doctrines by crude, dislocated and consequently hopeless schemes of action. Into all these affairs Proudhon looked shrewdly and with insight, and his bitter criticisms of the confusion of the period were shown by the event to have been well founded.

Proudhon defended the modern family and monogamy in its strictest sense, and does not seem to have troubled himself to study the history of those institutions even superficially: in short, he seems to have been singularly lacking in the historical sense, and had not formed any conception of the evolution of society. Those who read his works will find themselves forced to return to his first essay, 'What is Property?' if they are seeking in him for any consistent series of ideas. He was an eager and rough controversialist, and his style is brilliant and attractive in spite of its discursiveness.

We may now mention the names of two men of no great importance in themselves, but worth noting as forerunners of the sentimental Socialists and Christian Socialists of the present day. Hughes Felicité Robert de Lamennais (born 1782, died 1854), is the type of the Christian Socialist: he was intended for a priest from the first, and duly took orders. He began by efforts to reform the Catholic Church, so as to make it an effective instrument for happiness and social morality and reform. He expected to be helped and encouraged by the clergy in these efforts, and at first, before they perceived their real tendency, he received some acknowledgment from them. At last, in his paper L'Avenir (the future), he took so decidedly a democratic turn that he incurred the animosity of the whole Church, especially of the then Pope, Gregory XVI. The signal for his complete rupture with the Church, however, was the publication (in 1834) of his 'Paroles d'un Croyant' (words of a believer), which the Pope characterised as "small in size but immense in perversity." After that he became thoroughly democratic or even Communistic, as Communism was then understood. A series of political works and pamphlets followed, all in the sense of his new departure. He started, in 1848, two papers, one after another, which were suppressed. He sat in the Republican Constituent Chamber till the coup d'état; and while Deputy drew up for the Left a plan of Constitution which was rejected as too revolutionary. He was buried by his own direction without ecclesiastical rites.

Pierre le Roux (born 1798, died 1871) was originally a disciple of St. Simon. In 1840 he published his most important work, 'De L'Humanité,' whence the name of his school, the Humanitarians. He joined George Sand and Niardof in a literary review, and it was owing to this connexion that the humanitarian tendencies of some of her novels are to be traced. In 1843 he set on foot a co-operative printing association, and started a journal advocating co-operation, or as he termed it, "the pacific solution of the problem of the proletariat." He also sat in the Republican Chamber of 1848: was exiled in 1851 and lived in Jersey, not returning to France till 1869. He died in Paris under the Commune, who deputed two of its members to attend his funeral, in the words of the Official Journal, "not in honour of the partizan of the mystical ideas of which we now feel the evil, but of the politician who courageously undertook the defence of the vanquished after the days of June." This is an allusion to the unpractical and non-political tendency of his teaching, which undertook to reform society by the inculcation of morality blended with mysticism, the result of which was to be the gradual spread of voluntary co-operation.

We finish this series with the well-known name of Louis Blanc, a personage more important than the last-named, and more definitely Socialistic in principles than either he or Lamennais, though his political career finished in a way unworthy of those principles, even if we accept the excuse that he never grasped the great truth that only through the class struggle can the regeneration of society be accomplished. He was born in 1813, of a middle-class family which, on the maternal side, was Corsican, and an incident of the relations between him and his brother Charles is said to have suggested to Dumas his famous novelette and play of the 'Corsican Brothers.'

In 1840 he published his 'Organisation of Labour,' the ideas of which he attempted to realise in the famous "National Workshops," by which he is best known. In this work he put forward the genuine Socialistic maxim of "From each according to his capacity, to each according to his needs" as the basis of the production of a true society.

He took an active part in the Revolutionary Government of 1848, and got an edict passed abolishing the punishment of death for political offences. And we ought here to notice that the common impression that his National Workshops failed from inherent defects is wrong; they were suppressed as dangerous by the Government, and their suppression was largely instrumental in causing the June revolution. We must, however, also note that this scheme was not founded on purely Socialistic principles, dangerous as it was thought to be at the time. In consequence of the events of June Louis Blanc was compelled to flee from France to England, where he wrote his 'History of the French Revolution.'

He returned to France 1869, was elected to the legislative body, but played only a subordinate part in the stirring times that followed. It remains, indeed, an indelible stain on his character that he deserted the cause of the people in the days of March, leaving Paris to sit amongst the "Liberals" in the reactionary Chamber at Versailles.

He died in 1883, having outlived his reputation and his influence.

E. BELFORT BAX AND WILLIAM MORRIS.

The Prince Regent of Bavaria has given the order that each of his grandchildren shall learn some handicraft. The future king has chosen the trade of turner, and works every day in the shop of a Munich workman. Prince Franz wishes to be a house-painter, while Charles prefers to follow the calling of gardener. The Prince Regent of Bavaria appears to us to have a very good idea of the want of solidity of the foundations of thrones today. One never knows what may happen!—Cri du Peuple.

THE LITTLE VAGABOND.

(WILLIAM BLAKE: born 1757, died 1828.)

[William Blake was almost the first, if not the first, of those poets who drew English poetry from the slough of conventional twaddle in which the 18th century had sunk it; and visionary as he was, he was able to look at realities, and to make his words mean something; whereas it was an understood condition of the so-called "poetry" of the 18th century that they should mean nothing.—W. M.]

Dear mother, dear mother, the Church is cold,
But the Ale-house is healthy and pleasant and warm.
Besides I can tell where I am used well,
Such usage in heaven will never do well.

But if at the church they would give us some ale,
And a pleasant fire our souls to regale,
We'd sing and we'd pray all the livelong day,
Nor ever once wish from the church to stray.

Then the parson might preach and drink and sing,
And we'd be as happy as birds in the spring;
And modest Dame Lurch, who is always at church,
Would not have bandy children nor fasting nor birch.

And God like a Father rejoicing to see His children as pleasant and happy as He,
Would have no more quarrel with the Devil or the barrel,
But kiss him and give him both drink and apparel.

THE JUBILEE OF THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.

"It is not to die, or even to die of hunger, that makes a man wretched; many men have died; all men must die. But it is to live miserable we know not why; to work sore and yet gain nothing; to be heartworn, weary, yet isolated, unrelated."—CARLYLE.

ON Wednesday Jan. 26 the Northumberland miners resolved to strike against a reduction of 12½ per cent. The miners were asked to say "Yes" or "No" to the following: "Provided 12½ per cent. be conceded off the present wages of hard collieries and 7½ off soft coal collieries, the owners of Bedlington, Cramlington, and Seaton Delaval collieries consent to pay house-rent allowance under the arrangement of 1882, and the above apply to all to whom the house-rent allowances are paid at those collieries." The result of the ballot was declared on the 25th. The figures were: For accepting the masters' terms, 2167; strike, 9745. Altogether 24,000 men and boys are to come out. The owner of Walbottle Colliery, however, has withdrawn the notice of a reduction of wages, and the men accordingly return to work. The arrangement made is to the effect that no reduction take place during the next six months. The employers at Walker Colliery on Friday intimated to their men that as they did not desire the pits to be closed, as the cost of reopening them at the termination of a strike meant a great outlay, they wished them to continue work at the present rate of wages. The men sent a deputation asking the same conditions as those granted at the Walbottle Colliery. These were refused, and the strike commenced here also. Arrangements have been made for drawing the horses and ponies to bank, and there is every sign of a protracted struggle.

Many strikes have taken place among the Northumberland miners. In 1844 a strike for an advance took place, the men being defeated after several months' war. In 1839 at Seaton Delaval, in 1865 at the Cramlington Colliery, and many other minor strikes, all were gained by the employers. The last big strike was in May 1877, this time against a reduction of 10 and 15 per cent.; after arbitration, the men returned at the old wage. This lasted till November, when notice of a reduction of 12½ per cent. was made. After about three months' strike the employers obtained the full reduction demanded.

Efforts have been made by the miners' leaders to bring about an amicable arrangement with the employers, but have failed. It is said that overtures have been made to two M.P.'s to act as mediators. In an 'Address to Trades' Unions' published by the Socialist League appears the following: "The good-natured reformers would fain lull such antagonism to rest by palliatives, make of capital and labour a united happy family by smooth talk and practical measures. His efforts are vain. We tell you that these antagonisms will never sleep." Ever between wrong and right, capitalist and labourer, robber and robbed, must warfare exist; and it will only cease with the destruction of the present condition of things—the abolition of the individual ownership of capital. Determined warfare, then, is the only course open. In this conflict all workers ought to take part. The cause of the miners is equally the cause of all. The scenes of Charleroi may yet be repeated in England; but the lessons will be given by an organisation not quite so isolated, and the effect will be sooner seen. Public opinion is a strong force, and the sympathy of the workers will be with their more oppressed fellows.

The present is a fitting occasion for the celebration of the Jubilee by the workers. Subscription-sheets should be filled, and the proceeds ensure the first great victory of the miners.

FLUNKYISM REBUKED.—At a large and influential meeting of the members of the West End Branch of the Alliance Cabinet Makers' Association on Thursday, the 27th Jan., specially summoned for the purpose, it was resolved, with two dissentients, that "We withdraw our subscriptions from the London Trades Council, in consequence of the recent action of the self-elected deputation to Sandringham."

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

PEACE OR WAR?

IT must be of interest to all Socialists to review the relations of the different European nations to each other at the present time. The well-known phrase of the arch-murderer and titled bandit Count Moltke, "all Europe bristles with arms," must have startled from his slumber the most "benevolent" and honest-poor-supporting of all five per cent philanthropists, and this alarm has certainly not been lessened by "liquor" Bismarck's brutal and candid confession of his intention to leech France. Salisbury declares the outlook on the Continent to be very black, and the pinchbeck Gambetta of England, Lord Randolph, gives notice of his intention to pursue an honest foreign policy. How do affairs stand at the present moment? The middle-classes of France cannot forget the loss of two fair provinces; they cannot afford to hand over to Germany the commercial supremacy of the Continent, and they are humiliated that their prestige is vanishing fast. They are terribly afraid of the revolution which is preparing in France itself, and consequently to regain their former position and to escape the coming danger they are preparing for war. Germany—and if I speak of a nation I desire to speak of the ruling classes in contradistinction to the working-classes, who have no nationality, but are international—has at present but one object, to annihilate France. The annihilation of France means to Germany established commercial supremacy on the Continent, and would also enable Germany to annex Belgium and Holland. Bismarck—this fine specimen of the modern trinity, "statesman, landlord, and captain of industry"—comprehends very well the desires and ambitions of the German bourgeoisie. He knows that the possession of Antwerp by Germany would be the complete ruin of the glorious British Empire, the most formidable foe of German commercialism. A strong agitation is just now going on in Belgium, advocating the union of Belgium and Germany. The sinister schemer of Varzin has his eyes and agents everywhere, and I am not in the least astonished that Madame Adam believes him to know something more definite than the general public about the sudden disappearance from this world of Generals Chanzy and Skobelev and Revanche Gambetta.

Austria—this vile compilation of bourgeois interests, the pet child of the most noble Lord Salisbury—needs for its commercial expansion a good deal of the Balkan peninsula, but unfortunately cannot have it all its own way. Russia also desires to have a finger in that pie. Count Kalnoky and his men may talk big, but they know very well the emptiness of the imperial exchequer. They also know that while the imperial troops are engaged in opening up the roads to new markets, the revolutionists may take it in their heads to do something and to end the reign of the Hapsburg dynasty. Between the Jingos who desire a war with Russia, and the revolutionists, they resemble very much indeed the ass in the fable. But ere long they will have to choose, and it is my firm conviction they will choose war with Russia.

Italy, the latest creation of bourgeois evolution, and naturally the most lean and meagre, is like a hungry hyena, always on the look out for something. Whoever promises most to Italy may have Italy's most loyal support. Whenever she comes down from her position on the fence it will not be to help the weak but to slaughter the vanquished or plunder the slain.

England, poor soul—the British Empire, the ruler of the waves, the nation with the men, the ships, and the cash—is altogether out of the running. England in international policy has been degraded into "une quantité négligeable"—a nation not to be taken into account. Bismarck sneers at her, Russia snaps her fingers at her, and Austria is not silly enough to play at England's bidding "the sentinel on the rampart." Fancy the England of MacDermott down so low. But what else can be expected of a nation which is oldest in the vile game of industrial exploitation?

Last but not least I have to speak a word or two about Russia. Russia is ruled at the present moment by the Tsar and the Conservative party. The principles of the Conservative party are absolute authority. The foreign policy of this party is the foreign policy of the last hundred years, in fact since Frederick the Great of Prussia—viz., alliance with Prussia. A new party, however, is daily gaining strength. The Panslavist party, whose representative in London, Madame de Novikoff, is well known to readers of the Pall Mall Gazette. This party is the progressive party, and whenever they gain court supremacy a constitution will be presented to the Russian people. As the name already indicates, this party dreams of a large Slav empire, and they hate Germans far more bitterly than even the most outrageous French "revanchist." I might almost be tempted to say that the very day their rule is established in Russia war will be declared against Germany. Their hatred of Germany is a simple question of £ s. d. They know it is impossible for Russia to become strong commercially as long as German trade is all supreme, as long as the Baltic and the Black Sea are not Russian seas, and they know that on these issues they will have to fight the Germans.

My firm belief is that the next war will be an international war, and it is therefore the duty of all revolutionary Socialists to agree on a plan of campaign to make this universal war the last war. What, then, can we do?

We must go on with our present agitation, spreading the principles of international revolutionary Socialism, introducing Socialism into every city, town, and village. To tell the workers how they are robbed, how they are swindled, and how they are exploited. But this would not be sufficient. It is also our duty to call upon the workers to prepare themselves for the coming struggle. It is not sufficient for the worker to know the causes why he is robbed, he must also know the means how to get rid of all parasitic classes. These classes have at their command the police, the army and navy, and it would be foolish in the extreme were the workers to meet these foes with folded arms. Some practical knowledge of modern warfare is therefore highly advisable.

Our experience at Norwich and many other places is quite sufficient to enlighten even the most determined peacemonger as to what we may expect, and we must benefit by such teachings. The stronger our organisations are when the time comes and the better prepared for strong definite action, the more peaceable will be the revolution, but it would be a blunder, it would be criminal madness, to cry peace when no peace is possible.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

NUPKINS REDIVIVUS.

MORALISTS observe, perhaps a little too often, that there is no nobler sight than that of an honest man struggling with adversity. Noble sights then must be very common, or else honest men (the more likely hypothesis) very rare. Norwich has in historic times had the privilege of seeing the sufferings of two such men. Charles Dickens in one of his histories, more truth-telling than most of those used in schools, describes the agonised feelings of A. Nupkins, Esq., Mayor of Norwich: "What prevents me from detaining these men as rogues and imposters? It is a foolish mercy. What prevents me?" is the cry forced from the magistrate, torn by the agonising mixture of family considerations, and thirst for vengeance on the pretended Captain Fitz Marshall.

The magistrate has blossomed into one of Her Majesty's judges; but however deeply he may pity men for not knowing better than to speak their minds, no more shall he be led astray by foolish mercy towards rogues and agitators. No, the majesty of the law must be upheld; it needs it much. The judge's regret, his sadness, his sorrow, bedew with tears, as it were, the pages of the Eastern Evening News of Jan. 18. I quote from this journal some of his sayings, in condensed form, since like other good men he is somewhat long-winded. He became very sad over a secretary of a certain Oddfellows Friendly Society, who had "taken money that did not belong to him." He mourned that "people who had been comparatively speaking in a better position of life than those who were called the working-classes, should be led to commit 'educated crimes,' such as embezzlement." With what admirable and kindly skill does he just allude to the fact that working-men are only called so, and lashes those criminals who are of a class comparatively, just comparatively better off than the so-called workers, educated enough to commit embezzlement, but not so highly as to know how to do this in a legal and respectable fashion. "It was really very cruel and heartless, that people in such a position of life should rob other people in that position." Quite so; what is to become of Society if members of the same class begin to do to each other, what appears to be fair only between members of different classes? Heaven forbid that hawks should begin to peck out hawks' eyes!

Leaving the "educated criminal," Her Majesty's judge almost wept over his blasted hope that the respectability of Norwich would be eternal. "In previous years he was glad to know that in no other town had the working-men and people out of work"—those, that is, who call themselves working-men and say they are in want of work,—"in no other town had these people ordered themselves so decently and humbly towards the better-to-do," nor uttered so fervently the respectful prayer: Teach us to know our proper stations, God bless the squire and his relations. But now, in place of this, he was grieved at heart that he, sitting there in dignity, one of Her Majesty's judges, should have to beseech these starvelings "to show themselves ready to work when work was offered to them," to take whatever wages might be offered by employers, "who certainly had shown themselves desirous of being considerate to the distressed," not to carp nor complain if this consideration stopped at the stage of desire, but to recollect how often the church had urged upon them that the intention is better than the deed, and above all to bear in mind that "provisions are very cheap."

"He very much regretted to find, however, that even in Norwich, where the working-classes are much cared for"—(this very same issue of the Eastern Evening News contains a list amounting to at least £5 of contributions for the distressed, and another list of donations, coming to 30s., for penny dinners)—"even in Norwich the working-men have been got at by 'agitators,' who could not have the welfare of the working-classes at heart. He was happy to know that in this country there was no reason why anyone should starve. It was true, no doubt, that sometimes perhaps people did not get as much as they ought to have, particularly in winter time, though the law distinctly laid it down that they should have enough to keep body and soul together." His lordship (grieved as before) went on to say that "in most large towns there were always a certain number of loafers." It appears that these "sedition-mongers" had been talking on this very subject, and tickling "the fancy of the working-classes" by telling them that the loafers were highly paid, and that the law distinctly provided them with a great deal more than enough to keep their bodies and souls together, both summer and winter. In short, they sneered at the better-to-do, as being merely law-provided loafers, and actually went to the profane length of arguing that it was not "from want of work that people suffered" but from want of victuals.

"But," said his lordship, "the working-class gains nothing by it; on the contrary, the hearts of kindly people are hardened by this commotion raised without the slightest need or cause," nor will they again show the "foolish mercy" of subscribing £5 and 30s., even in the winter, to keep together the body and soul of any of those, who one way or another happen to miss the tender provision of the law. Still less will our Nupkins hesitate again to detain in durance vile these agitators and sedition-mongers, but rather get himself armed with a new Conspiracy Act, which will pop these rogues into the prison cell before, not after, they have had a chance of speaking. A HEBREW SOCIALIST PAPER.

SINCE December last, our contemporary The Worker's Friend has appeared as a weekly propagandist. This paper (which is published in the Hebrew-German dialect by the International Working-men's Educational Club, at 40 Berner Street, Commercial Road, E.) was started some eighteen months ago as a monthly, and since then it has worked with great effect in enlightening its readers on the question of Socialism. The first number of the weekly issue commenced with Victor Hugo's 'Les Misérables' as its feuilleton, which is considered to be a good "helping hand" in touching the feelings of the indifferent readers, and making them understand the meaning, and the cause, of being unfortunate. In the Editorial occurs the following: "Our only object in publishing the Worker's Friend is to enable the Hebrew-German speaking workers also to keep abreast in the great labour movement; to make them acquainted with all labour questions and the glorious teachings of Socialism. We shall do all in our power plainly and clearly to educate our readers in all matters that may be of interest to the workers; but at the same time we shall try to keep ourselves as impartial as possible to all the different sections of the Socialistic party. We consider that all Socialistic organisations that aim to realise their ideal by revolution are beneficial for the working classes. Social-Democrats, Anarchists, Communists, and Collectivists, are to us Socialists, and therefore our comrades. Our only contempt is against the capitalist class, against our present society of wholesale robbery—in short, we are wholly for the interest of the Proletariat and against the interest of the Bourgeoisie. Wherever we shall have the opportunity of defending the true friends of liberty and to protect the interest of the people, there shall we take our place. And when the day of deliverance of all the sufferers will arrive, and the mass of the people marches under the red flag, and fights in the streets for human rights and liberties—in short, when the social revolution will come, our place shall be among the revolutionists, and with them we shall raise cheers for the social revolution."

The size of the paper is the same as that of the Commonweal, but four pages, and its price is 1s. 6d. per quarter. It has our heartiest wishes for its success. W.

The Shop Hours Regulation Bill has been passed, but as there is no one to whom to apply to put it in force, it is practically a dead letter.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

On Tuesday, January 18th, I attended the Norwich Assizes, and listened to Judge Grantham's address to the grand jury. Before the accused men were tried the judge assumed that they were guilty, and even hinted that their sentence would be severe enough to give Socialist agitators a lesson in future. He entered into a long and very silly tirade against Socialism, and throughout his speech showed the meanest of petty middle-class prejudice. The peaceful and orderly sort of workman was beslobbered with praise; while the discontented were warned that law and order must be venerated, no matter what their misery might be. It is supposed to be a judge's duty to keep his mind free from prejudice against either side of a case, and to refer only to the charges included in the indictment; but Judge Grantham had evidently been influenced by the tittle-tattle of his middle-class friends, and the case was practically tried and the accused condemned over the tea-table of some of his acquaintances. It is certainly an outrage upon justice that men should be tried by a judge who, before hearing a scrap of evidence, displays the most rabid prejudice against them. Grantham is a young judge but he will soon be a notorious one.

On Wednesday, I left Norwich to begin the series of meetings announced in the Commonweal. At Oxford, the audience was fairly large and very appreciative. The only opposition was from a gentleman troubled with some ancient ideas on Free Trade, who entered into a glorification of Cobden. The Branch seems fairly active, and although not large its members are steady and reliable. Very few students attend the meetings, most of those with Socialist leanings prefer to work in the semi-Socialist societies, of which there are several in the Colleges. Oxford has no very large body of workmen, and a general spirit of flunkeyism pervades the poorer class; so that a very strong Socialist movement is well-nigh impossible there at present. Still the Branch is in a healthy condition, and will keep the Cause alive.

On Thursday, I went to Reading and got names and promises enough to form a corresponding group, which may soon develop into a Branch. The meeting arranged for the previous Tuesday fell through, as I had to stay at Norwich; but there was little difficulty in ascertaining that there is a strong Socialist feeling in the town, which is shared by many of the advanced Radicals. The place is most favourable for Socialist propaganda, and a good Branch should soon be established.

On Friday the 21st, I went to Bedford to give the first Socialist lecture in that town. Bedford is a rather quiet place, with only one large engineer shop to represent the factory system. The middle-class resort to it for the cheap education it affords their children. There is no great amount of misery among the working-class, and nothing more alarming than Radicalism has ever disturbed the peaceful little town. On the day before the lecture the Liberal paper had a very fair-minded leader claiming an impartial hearing for Socialism. The Tory paper had an ironical welcome suggesting a certain part of the town for Sunday morning rowdiness, and rejoicing that the Jubilee should be celebrated by the establishment of a Branch of the Socialist League. The meeting-hall was well filled, and it soon became evident that there was a rowdy element in the audience. They came expecting to see some kind of a wild animal, and to hear an invitation to indulge in wholesale looting and garotting. The interrupters were kept under, however, and nothing worse than a smashed window resulted. I made an attempt to reason out Socialism with them, much to their surprise. The opposition was not very serious, but I felt much hurt on being complimented for my moderation. The gist of what I said was that rent and interest were robbery, and that the upper class lived on the labour of the workers, that all the political parties were rotten, and the workmen who followed them ignorant of their own interests; in conclusion, I spoke of revolution, and expressed an ardent wish too see the British Empire smashed—and then they said I was moderate! Here, as at Reading, a group has been formed to study Socialism and arrange for a lecture by William Morris, after which it is hoped the group will become a Branch.

On Saturday, Jan. 22, I got to Leicester and met the members on Sunday morning to talk over Branch business matters. At Christmas time the propaganda went flat for a while, but as soon as the holidays were over the interest revived. The main topic of discussion in Leicester, and nearly every other manufacturing town, is Socialism, and it is quite surprising to find the wide-spread sympathy and interest shown in the Socialist movement. The prospects of the Branch are splendid, and before long it will be one of the largest in the country. On Sunday afternoon I lectured to a well-filled room on "The Opponents and Prospects of Socialism." I took up Father Rickaby and Mr. Bradlaugh, and we had a lively discussion on the arguments of the two Priests. It was soon apparent that Mr. Bradlaugh has lost popularity with the workmen through his opposition to the revolutionary movement. Even those workmen who do not call themselves Socialists, don't care to see a working-class leader so energetic in defence of the rights of property. The workmen's thoughts are now more than ever directed to the antagonism between the rights of property and the happiness of the people. In the evening I spoke at a meeting held in the Radical Club to denounce the Glenbeigh evictions. The meeting was very enthusiastic. On Monday night a good audience gathered in the Radical Club to hear a lecture on "The Path to Socialism," which went down very well and raised a useful discussion. The meetings held in Leicester were all very successful, and the audiences seemed very well acquainted with the Socialist aims.

On Tuesday, Jan. 25, I spoke to a small but appreciative audience in Nottingham, and on the following evening had a very friendly conference with the members of the various Socialist bodies. In Nottingham the feeling in favour of Socialism is very widespread.

On Thursday night I got to Sheffield, and lectured for the Sheffield Socialists on "The Meaning of Revolution." I illustrated the working of Socialist and commercial economy by reference to the actual conditions of labour in the Sheffield cutlery trade. Some of the points provoked a good deal of discussion, the most interesting feature in which was a speech by a workman, who upset an excitable critic by declaring that though he had never heard a Socialist speaker before he quite understood how Socialism would work on the principles explained. The speech could only be appreciated if rendered in the brogue in which it was spoken.

In a separate article I shall report half-an-hour's look through a Leicester stocking mill. Collections made for the Prisoners' Aid Fund during the week will be acknowledged by the treasurer of the Norwich Branch.

Everywhere Socialism seems to be making headway, and Branches might be formed in nearly every town in England if only some energetic organisers could be sent round to give things a start. J. L. MAHON.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

The Strike Committee.

The Strike Committee continues to receive from all parts of the country as well as in the States and on the Continent, most gratifying evidence of the interest taken in their work. They regret that their limited means as well as the small size of the Commonweal at present, seriously cripples their efforts, and can only urge upon their correspondents and the workers generally the necessity of strenuous and sustained exertion in order to overcome these difficulties. Several interesting communications are held over for want of space, including another report from Stafford. The attention of comrades and friends is called to the great opportunity now presented for our propaganda. Particularly it is desirable that a missionary should be sent to the Northumberland miners. A little pecuniary help would enable this to be done. "The harvest truly is great, but the labourers are few."

GLASS BOTTLE MAKERS—SPECIAL.

We are asked to intimate that Mr. Lyon has succeeded in getting about 30 men from the Continent, and that they will probably arrive in London. Our friends are asked to keep a sharp look-out and communicate any news at once to the Secretary of the Strike Committee, at the League Offices. J. LANE.

The bulk of the men at Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co's Steel Works in Cleveland have decided to stand out for an advance of ten per cent. in their wages.

At Ashton-under-Lyne the weavers' strike still runs on, and is likely to do so for some months to come, judging by the attitude of both sides at present. The dispute is costing the Operatives' Union £1000 per week in strike pay.

The chainmakers in the Midlands, who have been on strike for 25 weeks against low wages and the "truck system," seem at last likely to be successful, many of the employers having agreed to comply with their requests.

The Lanarkshire miners commenced their four days' idleness on the 25th Jan. At an early hour pickets were out at each colliery, and with a few solitary exceptions, the entire industry from Law to Glasgow was suspended.

In consequence of a section of the workmen employed in the Nottingham lace trade declining to appoint delegates to act upon the Board of Conciliation, that body has ceased to exist.

RISHTON.—STRIKE AT DAISY HILL MILL.—The whole of the weavers employed at Messrs. Smithson's, Daisy Hill Mill, recently came out on strike, owing to the extensive system of "bating." The association took the matter in hand and an arrangement was come to in favour of the weavers.

FARNWORTH.—THE EMPLOYMENT OF HALF-TIMERS AND ATTENDANCE AT SCHOOL.—The subject we broached last week about certain cotton manufacturers enforcing their half-timers to attend a given school is exciting considerable interest in the town and district, and there is a possibility of a public meeting being held to protest against employers using this form of coercion.

A meeting of the North and South Shields branches of the North of England Seamen's and Firemen's Society was held on Monday at North Shields, when it was decided to strike. The men demand a rise from 7s. to 30s. on weekly boats, and from £3 10s. to £4 on the monthly boats. A strike has been commenced at Sunderland for the same wages.

In the north of England the Ironworkers' Association is being considerably strengthened. Large numbers of the men had drifted off but are now rapidly joining. The National Conference will be held in Birmingham early next month. The men in the Cleveland and north of England district have almost unanimously resolved to join the Association, which appears likely to be placed on a wider and stronger basis than it has ever been before, especially should the Staffordshire workmen come in, as they appear desirous to do.

Clough Hall Ironworks, Kidsgrove, have been re-opened. It will be remembered that these works were closed some months back, owing to bad trade, throwing thousands of men out of work, and nearly ruining the town. The news of re-opening has been most joyfully received by the inhabitants of the district. The closing of these works has been referred to many times by Socialists as showing the power of the capitalist to starve a town. The reason for the closing was that the works did not "pay," i.e., produce sufficient profit to gratify the greed of the owner. A new owner having been found, the people may work again so long as he remains satisfied.

STAFFORD.—THE SHOE TRADE.—A serious dispute respecting the rate of wages paid in this town, which has been pending for some short time, has at length terminated in a strike. The cause of the dispute is the desire of a number of the employers to effect a general reduction of from 20 per cent. to 30 per cent. on the rate of wages, which since 1879 (when the wage statement was thoroughly revised by representatives of both employers and men) has been paid. The firm, of which the "worshipful mayor" of the town is the head, was the first to give notice of their intention to reduce the wages of their lasters 4s. 3d. per dozen, or considerably over 50 per cent. on the wages hitherto paid. The men who during the winter months, when the shoe industry is proverbially slack, have been earning but very small wages, naturally objected to this unreasonable reduction, especially when, as some of the masters who have declined to join the movement, say "there is a certain prospect of an improved spring and summer trade," and they, therefore, think it is the wrong time to disturb it now. The result was that the men struck work and were speedily followed by the operatives of other establishments. Since the year 1879, when the present wage list was mutually agreed upon by employers and workmen, numerous evasions of the list have been made by the masters, several of whom now declare that it is their intention to stamp out Trades' Unionism in the town. The mayor, whom I referred to above, has since his elevation to the mayoralty last November, been particularly noticeable for a lavish and ostentatious display of wealth, by providing luncheons, dinners, etc., to guzzling public officials, and in distributing relief to various "deserving applicants," while during the same time many of his own employés have been endeavouring to starve respectably on wages in many cases under 12s. per week. This "gentleman" who was the first to forego the proposed reduction, and apparently submit to the men, has placed a number of youths and men on standing wages of 24s. per week (who are now doing work which if paid for according to the statement, would amount to over 40s. per week) leaving the majority of those who struck work "out in the cold to think about it." No one has any reason to be surprised that the strike has occurred when one takes into consideration the fact that the average wage paid in London, Leicester, and other shoemaking centres is some 20 per cent. higher than it is in Stafford.

There seems to be every prospect, however, of the masters, at any rate for the present, withdrawing their demands and the men scoring a victory, but if the tactics of Mr. W. H. Peach (the mayor), who is a great enemy to trade unionism, should be adopted by the employers generally, I am afraid it will be only a nominal victory. As one of the strikers remarked through the medium of a local paper, "There is no wonder that men hanker after Socialism when they see men constantly growing richer while they are growing poorer." The men throughout have been supported by their two organisations, the National Union of Operative Boot Rivetters and the Amalgamated Society of Cordwainers.—C.

FEMALE LABOUR IN SPINNING ROOMS.—Much has been said and written of late respecting the propriety or otherwise of females being allowed to work in spinning-rooms in the capacity of piecers or minders, and were we only to judge of the question from a moral point of view, we should say by all means keep females out of the spinning-rooms, as our experience of cotton-mill life leads us to the conclusion that much injury is done by females working in the manner in which minders and piecers are compelled to do. There is also danger surrounding the circumstances of females in other departments of cotton-mills besides the spinning-rooms, and the disclosures which have come to light through a strike of some seventy to eighty cardroom workers, mostly composed of women and young girls, at a spinning company in Oldham, reveal a sad state of things; but what makes the case worse is the fact that these persons have had to sacrifice their situations rather than allow their moral characters to be blasted by working under those in whom they had lost all confidence. That the women and girls were forced, as it were, to take the action they did is a proof that they felt justified in acting in the summary manner which the directors felt aggrieved at and as the complaints had been pending for a considerable time, and no notice seemed to have been taken by the directors of what was communicated to them, we think they are to blame for the consequences of the strike, and not the women and girls, who acted from motives which should be encouraged rather than condemned; and those directors who will not support the women and young girls are surely assisting to encourage a state of morality in the cotton-mills which will prove to be most injurious from many points of view. Therefore we trust that those who are placed in authority will use their influence in having the management of cotton-mills so carried out that there need be no fear on the part of parents or their children of other than straightforward conduct being displayed towards those who require protection. We have often heard of the failure of individual strikes in cases of disputes about wages, prices, and bad work, through unprincipled men taking the places of those on strike, and who by their action have assisted the employers to defeat the just cause of the strikers; but we don't ever remember a strike undertaken on moral grounds, and that by women and young girls, in which the strikers have been defeated in such a manner as have those who struck work at a spinning company at Oldham. The cardroom workers, nearly eighty in number, struck work, and, strange to say, in less than two days their situations were all filled up, and that by their own sex, notwithstanding that the strike was entered upon solely on the grounds of morality. There is much to be learned from this, and we are afraid the result will act as a barrier to the progress which moralists are so anxious about. Certain it is that others will be deterred from acting in a similar way; thus encouragement will be given to evil-doers. Those females who lend their assistance in perpetuating a system which brought about the strike are real enemies to their own cause and sex, and surely are not aware of what injury they are doing. It ought to be the duty of all to make strikes of this nature successful; those who act otherwise must have cause for regret.—Cotton Factory Times.

AMERICA.

The men who went from New York City to Chicago, to take the places of the stock yard strikers, are now stranded as paupers in the latter city.

Baltimore printers have increased the price of composition on morning papers to 45 cents, and on evening papers to 40 cents.

NEW YORK, Jan. 16.—The street-car strike in San Francisco had not been settled at the date of the latest advices in daily papers. There are curious reports about the "sympathies" of the police, many of whom are said to belong to a certain labour organisation of which the strikers are members.

The Ohio Valley Trades and Labour Assembly, composed of Knights of Labour assemblies and trades unions of the cities of Wheeling, Bellaire, Martin's Ferry and neighbouring towns, will hold a grand fair and industrial exhibition, from Feb. 14 to Feb. 19, to procure means for leasing a hall for the use of organised labour.

The Paper Rulers of New York, although they do not number more than 200 men, are an important factor in the blank book trade. There are 95 per cent of them in the union. They fixed a price-list and an apprentice system, to both of which half the bosses in the city objected, and locked out their men. The Bookbinders are also associated with the rulers, and resolved not to bind any books ruled by "scabs." The men have resumed work on their own terms.

WESTERLY, R. I., Jan. 6.—Many of the strikers at the Moss Manufacturing Company's works are being turned out of the tenements owned by the company. W. C. King, a weaver who did not strike, has also been turned out of his tenement because, according to his story, he refused to turn his boy, who is a Knight of Labour, out of his home. He says he has spent much money and time beautifying the house, and has always been faithful to the interests of the company. There is a great deal of suffering among the evicted tenants. The Whipple family was turned out in the midst of a blinding snow-storm, and old Mr. Whipple, who is dying with consumption, was carried out to the wagon in a blanket.—Labor Enquirer.

NEW YORK, Jan. 27.—All the Union longshoremen employed by the various steamship lines have struck work, except in the case of one coast line. The strike now includes the coal and grain shovellers, the longshoremen, the bag sewers, tug-boatmen, and lightermen, numbering in the aggregate over thirty thousand men. The District Committee of the Knights of Labour has requested all dock labourers to suspend work for three days with a view to the settlement of the coal-handlers and longshoremen's strike. This action on the part of the Knights delays the departure of vessels belonging to the companies affected by the strike. A mass meeting is to be held to-night, and extra police have been called out, the situation being considered more serious. Jan. 29.—The Lehigh and Wilkesbarre Coal Company and the Pennsylvania Company report that a general strike of miners will probably be ordered on Monday next in response to an appeal from the coal handlers now on strike. Jan. 30.—The men on strike threaten that all the coal-labourers belonging to the Knights of Labour will strike this week at every place where coal, not handled by unionists, is used.

FRANCE.

TOULON.—There is great excitement among the workers at the arsenal here, 150 of them having been dismissed, this being it is said, but the beginning of a long series of dismissals which will affect a large number of the employés.

MEHUN (CHER).—The strike here still continues, the strikers receiving the support of their fellow-workers elsewhere, who have decided to leave their workshops rather than endanger the success of the movement here.

A Marseilles journal announces that Roustan, the "chef de section" at the tobacco factory, whose abuses were the cause of the women's strike there, has come to Paris to lay his case before the Minister of Finance, as he has no intention of giving up his position in the factory. If this is true, in spite of the announcement by the Prefect of his dismissal, the strikers will be on the qui-vive again, and will have learnt how much trust to put in the good faith of official gentlemen.

ROUBAIX (NORD).—The Labour Associations of Roubaix, having in view the formation of a Co-operative Society, publish in Le Travailleur an address to the people, pointing out that co-operative societies hitherto have always come to be supported by the capitalist, as they have been for his benefit, and that it is necessary to substitute those for the worker's benefit. They intend, they say, to form themselves on the model of the successful Co-operative Society of the Vooruit of Ghent, and call on all the workers of the department to bestir themselves, and support the project.

BELGIUM.

MARCHIENNES.—A large manifestation took place last week at Marchiennes, near Charleroi, composed of working-men's Leagues, which were represented to the number of 32. This cortège of some six or seven thousand persons marched along to the town with the burgomaster, accompanied by the police-commissary at its head, whether as an open sympathiser or with an idea of keeping order by his impressive presence, history sayeth not. After parading the streets the manifestants made a stand in the Grand Place, where citizen Jean Holder spoke on the programme of the Labour Party, and the labour organisation and universal suffrage. The Government apparently feared disturbances on the occasion, the garrisons of Charleroi and Namur being held in readiness to respond to an immediate summons.

The strike is spreading in the Charleroi district, and reaches now as far as Forchies-la-Marche. In the two last pits of Amerœur, which have been in activity till now, work was stopped last week. So far, writes a correspondent to L'Avenir, it is impossible to foresee what turn things may take, though it is generally believed that the strike will spread throughout the Centre. He remarks that the movement develops from day to day, Socialist ideas gaining ground surely.

Anseele, editor of the Vooruit, will be set at liberty on Sunday next, to celebrate which occasion the Socialists of Ghent are organising a "Democratic fete," to which they will invite all Belgian Socialists.

By the bye, how does a Socialist journal manage to worry along when its editor, its father and natural guardian, is not actually on the spot to protect it from invasion and the "whips and scorns of time"? If it were an ordinary commercial affair one would feel it irresistible to quote the sceptical Mark Twain on the subject, where he says of a provincial paper "That brand of paper gets on just as well with a sick editor as a well one, and better with a dead editor than either." But editing a Socialist paper is a very serious and tremendous affair, and never trifled with after so frivolous a fashion, so that the locking up of an editor is not to be lightly spoken of.

GHENT.—Some of the Socialists of this town have been much troubled in their minds by reason of the production of an anti-Socialist play, written by an official gentleman of Brussels, who does not apparently approach the "question of the day" in a friendly spirit, but rather amuses himself by dragging the "Holy Red" of the Revolution hither and thither in the mud, thereby lacerating sorely the hearts of our Socialist friends. It is dimly rumoured that the police had to interfere, and that the civic guard are on foot, but details thereanent are wanting, and whether to-day "peace reigns in Warsaw" or no we have not heard.

When we went to Egypt we were going to establish civil, moral, and Christian influences on the banks of the Nile. What we have done has been to establish an enormous number of grog-shops and brothels.—Mr. Cairne, M.P.

Three crofters from the Island of Tiree have been liberated from Edinburgh Prison by order of the Home Secretary a month before the expiration of their sentence, which was four months' imprisonment. There are about twenty others still in prison.

Boycotting has been carried to a grotesque extreme in Galveston, where a woman who worked as a union printer married a non-union printer and was put under the ban. As the husband would not join the union the wife left him at the command of her associates, and will sue for divorce.

A Bill was introduced in Congress in 1877 to nationalise the militia for the purpose of being used against working men in the case of strikes. It has been held over from session to session. It is now said that extraordinary efforts will be made this session to call up the Bill and have it passed.

Mr. Atkinson, professional statistician, compares the working man of to-day who is employed the whole year with one of twenty-five years ago, also employed the whole year, and concludes that he of to-day is much to be envied. When we consider that from one to two million workers are now out of work, such statistics make us smile.—Tax Reformer (N.Y.).

The "Man in the Corner Seat," in the Glasgow Weekly Mail says: "The Glasgow Tramway Co., who have paid 9 per cent dividend, are being severely criticised by their employés and others for the want of feeling and sympathy exhibited towards their workmen. Low wages, fines, long hours, and no meat hours seem to be the staple grievances. Dividends so earned are as immoral as—"

Lord Compton thinks that if the distress among the unemployed in London is allowed to go on much longer "without the Government doing something to alleviate it," the slightest spark may cause discontent and despair to break out into open rebellion. By which Lord Compton means that he is willing to give his share of what is required if everybody else is compelled to do the same. But we do not think the appeal to "funk" is the strongest appeal to Englishmen. Besides, we may, some of us, think that the starving will hold out a good deal longer before having recourse to violence, when it will be time enough for the "Government to do something." No; let Lord Compton put his hand into his own pocket—not other people's.—Jus. [Does this need any comment?]

CORRESPONDENCE.

"ABSENTEEISM."

We have hitherto considered that absenteeism increased the evils of landlordism to a very material extent, and if W. B. R. will keep his thinking cap on a little longer he will come to see that there are good grounds for the popular opinion. Let me try to help him. Suppose that the Irish tenants pay their landlords in kind, and that the landlords live amongst them, employing Irishmen and Irishwomen for all the services they need, it is evident that the Irish tenants are simply employing and supporting their own brothers and sisters through the landlords, who are a kind of middlemen. It is true the hard-working tenant might still consider it a misappropriation of the fruits of his toil to keep a coachman, groom, butler, and valet attending on a man; and a maid, governess, and nurse attending on a woman and her children, while the said man and woman would be best employed in doing for themselves what those menials do for them. Nevertheless, that system of living amongst the people who provide the rents reduces the evils of landlordism to their lowest degree.

Now, suppose instead of living amongst his tenantry the landlord lives in London or Paris, and his rent in the shape of a certain portion of the produce of the farms is sent to him there, and that he and his wife employ English or French people to attend to their wants, is it not patent that there is a perpetual drain on the Irish land for the support of foreigners, and that the landlord's rent is a dead loss to the Irish people? Landlordism is an evil whichever way you look at it, but absenteeism assuredly aggravates it.—Yours faithfully,
G. D. L.

"T. LEMON AND THE S.D.F."

Is the victory of Socialism in London so nearly won, that a good comrade and soldier for the Cause like Kitz can find time to leave the attack on the common enemy, in order to stand aside and squabble about the honour and glory of the victory? Or is his letter rather an instance of those words of Morris's, which, by a curious coincidence, are printed in the next column exactly opposite to the most uncalled-for part of comrade Kitz's attack on the S.D.F.?—"Backsliding, and doubt, and contest between friends and fellows lacking time in the hubbub to understand each other, shall grieve many hearts and hinder the Host of the Fellowship."

We Socialists in small towns or villages, who, from our isolated position feel especially the need of unity and good-feeling, cannot but deplore and feel ashamed of this bad-blooded rivalry, which makes the Cause look ridiculous, and gives occasion to the common enemy to laugh in his sleeve at us. For it must be comic, to one who does not care for the advancement of Socialism, to witness the complacent swagger of Justice, and the occasional mutter of the Commonweal, as of some sulky boy who has been teased by his fellows, and is too thin-skinned to take it in good part. Would it not be better to try to see the good (of which there is so much) in both associations, and to recognise how unlikely it is that any one should embrace all the tactics which the Democracy must employ for the development of the new Society?

And now a word to comrade Kitz. I never knew bad feeling removed, nor the bitterness of rivalry sweetened, by the use of sarcasm. It is easy to speak of a "sneaking friend"; and even the Daily Telegraph can give point to its irony by writing of the "Council" with quotation marks, as though it did not exist; but hard, hard it is, to overcome the sore feeling which such sarcasm produces, and harder still to gain our Cause with that sore feeling in our midst. And our comrade's letter is for that reason especially to be regretted, appearing as it does on the very day when those anonymous paragraphs in Justice begin to recognise the Socialist League in a more conciliatory spirit.

Is it not, in short, the duty of Socialists not only to be pulling down the old Society, but at the same time to be laying the foundation of the new Society of comradeship and fellow-feeling? And are such letters as this of comrade Kitz likely to help on the work?

In the firm belief that the direct opposite of that sort of thing is what is needed, I am, yours very truly,
Farham, January 24, 1887.
GEORGE STURT.

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Friday, Jan. 28th, W. B. Robertson gave a lecture.—L. W.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Jan. 26th, Eleanor Marx-Aveling lectured to a good audience on "The Relative Position of English and American Workmen." After the lecture a resolution expressing disgust and contempt at the inhuman sentences passed by Judge Grantham on our Norwich comrades, was carried unanimously, and 17s. 6d. collected for Mowbray's wife and family. On Sunday, Jan. 30th, Sidney Webb (Fabian) spoke on "The Law of Rent." The members of this Branch have attended two other meetings of other societies during the week, and two lectures have been given at other halls, with good results. Sale of Commonweal and pamphlets are increasing rapidly in Clerkenwell. Members are requested to take up Branch cards for 1887.

CROYDON.—On Sunday afternoon, we held a general meeting to elect officers, committee, etc. Various matters were discussed in regard to action in the event of Parliamentary election, the carrying on of open-air propaganda, the sale of the Commonweal, etc. The committee are to meet every Friday at 8 p.m. at Parkes Road. In the evening, at 7 p.m., G. B. Shaw gave a splendid lecture on "Some Illusions of Individualism," which was "reported" for Croydon Echo, in which paper it will occupy about half a column. Two new members made. Two letters which we sent to the Conservative Croydon Guardian, in answer to "Correspondence re Self-help Emigration and Socialism," have been inserted.—A. T., ast. sec.

HACKNEY.—On Sunday, Jan. 30, H. Charles lectured here on "Society in the Past," pointing out the inevitable corruption and breakdown of all Societies based upon slavery of any kind. 1s. 2½d. was collected for Henderson and Mowbray Defence Fund. Next Sunday at 11.30, we commence our open-air meeting at the Salmon and Ball. One new member. H. MATTHEWS, sec.

HOXTON.—We started our outdoor propaganda on Sunday with very successful meetings both morning and evening, Wade, Barker, and Pope taking part in them. Sale of Commonweal fair. In the evening, E. Pope lectured to a good audience on the "Curse of Machinery."—E. POPE, sec.

MARYLEBONE AND NORTH LONDON.—These two Branches decided to amalgamate for the winter propaganda. They have a good chance to engage in very active work at Cleveland Hall. The members met last Sunday, and appointed H. Charles, 34, Caversham Road, Kentish Town, N.W., as secretary of the two Branches.—C.

MERTON.—A fortnight since, we commenced an agitation amongst the unemployed. The first meeting was held on Mitcham Fair Green, from there we marched down to the club-room of the Mitcham Branch, where another enthusiastic meeting was held, a resolution was carried with acclamation declaring that until the Social Revolution swept away the monopolies of the means of life, now in the hands of capitalists and land thieves, there could be no peace nor hope for the workers. A temperance lecturer, who had hitherto been an antagonist, mounted the platform and declared his conversion to our principles. On the Thursday following we broke new ground in Wimbledon Broadway, hitherto the undisputed possession of the lugubrious apostles of cold water and damnation. We had been assured that it would be utterly impossible for us to hold our own upon this spot, but as a matter of fact some 300 people listened attentively, and passed the revolutionary resolution with more verve than the one that simply dealt with the administration of the Poor Law. The red flag and the speeches seemed to greatly exasperate a small knot of dealers in the strange items of Christian belief, but their leader, by name Mercer, was content to literally hide behind a woman, for he put forward a Mrs. Kingsley (a female guardian of the poor) to interrupt the speaking, and when forced to desist and address the crowd, she said, amidst much opposition, that the inmates of workhouses and jails were there chiefly through their own fault, and cited that shining Christian light, Rev. Horsley, in proof. These gentle feminine utterances were too much for the crowd, and she had to "shut up" herself. The local unemployed, whilst heartily endorsing our action, are forced to accept the doles of these Christian almoners because of the necessities of their families, and they assure us that the relief would be stopped did they actively support us. The local press belied the meeting by describing us as roughs, and stating falsely that we begged of passers by. The man Mercer, referred to above, has held a mother's meeting at a local coffee palace, where the tenets of Christianity are allied with the sale of pea-soup and mysteriously concocted beef steak puddings, and alleged that I incited the crowd to break windows, and the still more astonishing statement that the unemployed have only to believe in "his" God and all the necessities of life will be added. Meanwhile, the "respectable" church-going landlords of the neighbourhood are extracting their rents from the half-starved working-men by brokerage and threats of eviction. The smug cheating traders who compose the Board of "Guardians," have in the case of the Croydon Union, compelled starving men to trudge across snow-bound Mitcham Common, four miles to Croydon stoneyard, there to work without food until dusk, and receive in return merely bread and a ticket for meat, to obtain which another journey to the contractor is necessary, in all a distance of ten miles per day and laborious penal work upon empty stomachs. It will be a cold day for those who prey upon our vitals if ever we serve them as they serve us. At Morris's lecture on 23rd, at Merton, we had a full audience, and a resolution of sympathy with our Norwich comrades was passed with cheers for the Social Revolution. The men composing both Merton and Mitcham Branches are, after a long experience of want of work and its attendant sufferings, now entering upon better times that will enable them to give harder work in the movement, and we can assure the humbugs and parasites of this neighbourhood that their dominion of cant will be strenuously attacked, and will be in danger of being destroyed.—F. KIRZ.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday morning, Kitz addressed meeting on the Fair Green, afterwards good discussion was carried on in club room. In the evening, Harrison lectured on "Land Robbery in Ireland." A resolution of condolence with Mowbray and Henderson was carried with three hearty cheers. Two new members.—S. G., sec.

DUBLIN.—Our good comrade John A. Ryan died on Thursday, Jan. 27, and was buried on Sunday last at Glasnevin. He was treasurer of the Branch at its inception, and had been a member of the International during its short-lived existence in Dublin. He had been in poor health for the past four or five months. Nearly all the members of the Branch attended the funeral.—O'G.

EDINBURGH.—On Monday, Jan. 24, in Free Tron Hall, Dr. Reddie gave a lecture on "The Anatomy and Physiology of Society." He maintained that Communism was the ultimate ideal of Society, and that the various Socialisms were stepping stones towards that end. There was some criticism on minor points raised in the lecture, but in the main the audience was with him. In the course of the evening, Prof. Flint, who has been lecturing on Socialism, was subjected to some severe handling. In connection with Flint's lecture we mean to distribute a deal of our literature, and generally to push the Cause.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday afternoon, Glasier addressed a large meeting on Jail's Square. In the evening, in Hall, Carlton Place, James Mavor lectured in place of J. Shaw Maxwell, who was prevented by illness, on "Experiments in Providing Improved Dwellings for Artizans." The lecturer cited examples to show what might be done even under the existing economic system if the authorities were in earnest in the matter, or if the workers paid any attention to their own interests. Referring to the experiment in artisan's dwellings about to be made by the Glasgow City Improvement Trust, he pointed out that the propertied class who composed the committee were more interested in making the experiment a failure than a success. An interesting discussion followed. This Branch will subscribe 2s. weekly for Mowbray's family.

APPEAL TO LUKEWARM MEMBERS.

How hard the Secretary's work,
Tho' he the pick of men is,
When members all their duties shirk,
And never pay their pennies!
Some hoard their wits, some hoard their gains;
I don't know which the worse is:—
Why, those who cannot give their brains,
Might surely give their purses!

(If the Printer does not print these verses, the Secretary will resign!)—J. B. G.

HAMILTON.—A very successful meeting was held on Thursday, Jan. 20. A good many miners who are on strike, were present, and greatly appreciated the exposition of Socialism ably given by comrades Glasier and McLean, of Glasgow. There was slight opposition, which was effectively replied to.—W. M.

LANCASTER.—Good meeting on Friday night. We passed resolution of sympathy with our Norwich comrades, condemning the brutality and partiality of the "man" Grantham. Copies are forwarded to the Premier, Home Secretary, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Parnell, and Mr. Williamson (local M.P.)—L. H., sec.

NORWICH.—We held five outdoor meetings in various parts of the City on Sunday, which were well attended. We sold all our Commonweals, and a good deal of other literature. Lane was the principal speaker at St. Mary's Plain at 11, in the Market at 3, and on the Agricultural Hall Plain at 7. He also lectured in the Branch offices at 8, a hard day's work. We are not daunted because our comrades Mowbray and Henderson are in Norwich Castle, but intend to work on all the more. We are getting one or two more of our members as speakers, and are in hopes we shall soon be able to do good work in the Cause we all have at heart.—T. M., sec.

BIRMINGHAM (S.D.F.) Branch have passed the following resolution:—"That this meeting expresses its sympathy with the Norwich Socialists, and strongly condemns the bitter partisanship of Judge Grantham. That this resolution be sent to Commonweal, Justice, and the Norwich Socialists."

Our Comrade J. L. Mahon is doing much useful though unostentatious work in the provinces. Since we last noticed his peregrinations he has visited Bedford, Reading, Nottingham, and Manchester, and held most successful meetings. Mahon's engagements are: Feb. 4, 5, and 6, Lancaster; 8 and 9, Leeds; 10, Walsall; 12 and 13, Nottingham; 14, Sheffield; 15, Clay Cross (miners); 17 to 25, Leeds, Bradford, Bingley, etc.; 27 to end of month, Hull. Mahon will be glad to hear from any persons willing to arrange meetings at Burnley, York, or Middlesbro'.

NOTES ON NEWS.

PARLIAMENT has offered us a sort of stage-battle over the Egyptian rascality. No one, of course, thought that anything would come of it, though 97 members voted in favour of immediate withdrawal; some of whom perhaps would not have done so if they had thought that their vote would have had any influence in bringing about a withdrawal.

Some of the Radicals were, though they knew nothing would come of it, rather afraid of pledging themselves against our piracy wholly; and moved another amendment, substituting the Yankeeism "in the near future" for "immediate." This raised laughter from the Ministerial benches, as it well might; though probably it would be found that "immediate" would have the same meaning as "in the near future" in the mouth of any capitalistic government.

One of the mediæval Joe Millers tells of an inn which bore the following inscription: "Good wine given away for nothing to-morrow." Of course when the sanguine toper who had seen the promised blessing on Monday called for its fulfilment on Tuesday, he was told that to-morrow was still ahead. So it will be in Egypt till the bayonet of some other robber is applied to the rear of the British Christian.

A modern American traveller in Persia, after giving an account of the arbitrary and violent acts of the rulers of that strangely long-lived kingdom, which are of the sort with which students of ancient and mediæval history are familiar, and after saying of the peasant, "that if he produced upon land so rich that it easily produces enough to meet his humble wants, any more, it would be simply to render him the victim of extortion," goes on to say, "the people of Persia are as happy as the average of other people!"

This fact, which is borne out by the observation of travellers among peoples under similar conditions, is not so difficult of explanation as the bourgeois observer sometimes thinks it. The Persian labourer works lazily to supply his humble wants, and then stops, knowing that anything more he produces will be taken away from him. But we have got our labourers into better order than that. We make the English labourer work industriously after he has supplied his humble (very humble) wants, and thereby make him supply our own not so humble wants. The Persian labourer knows that everything that can be taken away from him will be taken away, and therefore doesn't vex the kind earth and his own body too much. The English labourer is in exactly the same position of being robbed of what he earns; but then he does not know it, and so he sweats away and tries to keep out of the workhouse. Fraud is out and out a better weapon than force, it does the cleaning-out job so much cleaner, let alone its being so much safer—till it is found out.

Among the advantages offered by emigration agents, a free passage to Davy Jones' Locker should figure prominently. Yet it will not be long before the horrible murder of the Kapunda will be forgotten by all classes just as dozens of other like cases have been. Nevertheless, while it is remembered (if it is still remembered by those not directly interested in it) let us ask what it was that drowned all those poor souls without remedy, and the answer must be Commercial Profit!

No one who thinks about the event can doubt that it was possible by spending more money to have contrived that the ship should not sink in a few minutes without any chance of getting her boats out; and if people will think a little more they will have to come to the conclusion that in these matters as in others the one thing sought after is "profit." Ships must be made safe enough not to frighten freight and passengers off them, and also not to make them uninsurable, or to risk too much loss if they are not insured. Outside these necessities "applied science" will not be applied to the making of people's lives as safe as it knows how, but to making of the owner's profits as safe as it knows how; and if you please, as those profits are made on the average of ships and voyages, the loss of a cargo of human beings now and then can be borne by the enterprising owners without their purses or capitalistic lives suffering much. But what fools we are to bear it!

In the first of the debates on the subject "Is Socialism Sound?" between Mrs. Besant and Mr. Foote, Mrs. Besant sustained her part well. Mr. Foote threw no new light on the objections to Socialism, and, as often happens with a clever anti-Socialist debater, he made too much use of the argumentum ad hominem, a very feeble weapon if applied to anything more important than a Parliamentary debate.

It was curious to see Mr. Foote in his quality of Land-nationaliser so very bitter against Socialism; in him the lower middle-class prejudices and shibboleths seemed to unite readily with the acceptance of Mr. George's nostrum. Mrs. Besant's exposition of the fallacy of detaching the land from the other means of the fructification of labour was very clear and satisfactory. She also made her position as to the relation between Socialism and Communism clearer than it is in her pamphlet, and I should say had advanced from that position. Mr. Foote, of course, twitted her with this, but not very fairly. Socialists will follow with much interest the progress of this debate.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

"Even Englishmen, in a factory or elsewhere, would be demoralised if their earnings and their status, their lives, in short, depended on the caprice of some employer who could be at one time coaxed and at another time coerced into concessions, and who by occasional cruelty provoked their wrath. What legislators, therefore, must aim at is the elimination of the personal element from the control of the soil. The right of raising rent indefinitely was too great a power to lodge in the hands of a man who might be driven to extortion by the pressure of his own debts; and when the addition was made because the tenant had been industrious the result was robbery, however legalised."—Daily Telegraph, Feb. 4, 1887.

The above extract does not look out of place as a note in a Socialist paper. Yet it is cut from one of the most rabid bourgeois journals, and is, therefore, significant as a sign of progress. S.

PROFESSOR FLINT ON SOCIALISM.

SOCIALISTS are entitled to congratulate themselves on the attention their creed is attracting among all classes of the community. The Cause has certainly passed through that period in the history of many another cause, when "few men heed it." Free discussion is before all things desired by the lovers of truth, and this is what Socialists seem to be in a fair way of getting. Confident of the final triumph of truth, we always welcome criticism, whether it be fair and intelligent, or the reverse. If our opponents are bitter and prejudiced against us, unwilling to present our views in any light but an unfavourable one, we gain by the reaction which most certainly sets in when a faithful and clear exposition of our principles is laid before the people. If on the other hand they are honest, impartial, and well-informed, but slow in perceiving the truth of our doctrines solely in consequence of their peculiar training, we reap the fruits of the good seed they are unwittingly sowing.

In this way good work is at present being done for us in Edinburgh. Dr. Flint, Professor of Divinity in the University, is delivering a series of five fortnightly lectures on Socialism to crowded congregations in the Tron Kirk, and a good space in the daily papers has been devoted to reports of the two already over. Taking, in the first one, a general view of Socialism in theory and history, he regarded it, as opposed to individualism, an exaggeration of the claims and rights of society. In his opinion its principal feature is the excessive intervention of the state, the private and personal being absorbed by the public and collective. The statement of a superficial view like this is likely to lead people to imagine that life under Socialism will closely resemble life in a huge, well-regulated prison. But any one who has studied Socialistic literature closely and sympathetically, must admit that such a state of things cannot possibly result if society is reconstructed in accordance with our principles, and that Socialists would be the first to rebel against such irksome and debasing conditions of life. We would build up the new society on the old principles which the Professor, I presume, himself believes in, that it is our duty to bear one another's burdens and to love our neighbour as ourselves. We are fully persuaded too, that not only is it possible to do this without encroaching on individuality or liberty, but that the masses will be enabled to enjoy such freedom and happiness, as they cannot have any conception of in the present age, crushed as they are by the despotic and merciless power of landlordism and capital. As we have often pointed out, the workers in these days are debarred by their economic circumstances from the possession of any individuality, and are merely human machines for producing wealth for their masters. All their interests are subordinated to this end. But even admitting that some of us would sacrifice unduly the interest of the individual to the good of society, it must not be forgotten that their influence is salutarily counteracted by the teaching of the Anarchist-Socialists, at least of the school represented by Freedom. That this is one of the functions of philosophical anarchism is, however, not perceived by Professor Flint, who can see it to be nothing but "individualism in a highly hydrophobic condition."

Hemaintained also, that under Socialism private property will be largely or entirely done away with, and each will have his work assigned to him, and its value determined for him. A statement of this kind is rather misleading to such as know little or nothing about Socialism, and is likely to cause the people to look askance at it. The fact is, we advocate the abolition of private property in land and capital in the certainty that this would lead to complete freedom of labour, and therefore to the extinction of property in the ordinary sense of the word, which implies the right of a private person to the use and abuse of all the wealth which the law allows him to call his own. It will be seen, therefore, we use the word "property" not quite in the ordinary accepted sense. All articles for consumption, wear and use will remain under the complete control of the individual who receives them in payment for services rendered to other members of the community. Even the instruments of production and distribution, viz., factories, mills, workshops, railways, ships, docks, etc., might remain private property in the sense that the owners of it, who will each possess sufficient to produce the wealth he consumes, might have the complete and entire enjoyment of it, minus the power of using it to extort interest or profits. As no rent will be charged for the land, it will form no constituent in the price of agricultural products as at present. The soil might be cultivated by skilled agriculturalists for the consumers, who would, of course, provide the necessary means of labour, the share contributed by each bearing the same ratio to the total wealth as the portion of the products he consumes to the whole out-turn. Mines and quarries might be similarly managed. Avoiding details, however, we may simply state that the so-called rights of property will be encroached upon only so far as to prevent rent, interest or profits being taken. It is difficult to understand why Professor Flint holds that each would have his work assigned to him without being consulted in the matter, when it is well known that one of our reasons for revolting against the present system is that the tastes, inclinations, and capacities of the individual receive so little attention. And again, I am sure it would be considered no hardship at all, if the value of the individual's work was determined for him in a just manner, and if each was remunerated on exactly the same principles. The Professor must know very well that just now the worker has very little say in the matter; he has surely heard of the "iron law of wages." The remuneration of labour must, of course, remain a matter of periodical social calculation, so long as the forces of Nature which co-operate with man in the production of wealth are inconstant, and so long as the invention, knowledge, and skill of man increase; so that it would be absurd to allow the individual to make an arbitrary estimate of the value of his own services.

In his second lecture Professor Flint denied, at great and quite unnecessary length, the truth of the proposition that "labour is the source of wealth." He treated it as a socialistic tenet, forgetful or ignorant of the fact that Karl Marx in his "ingenious and laborious book" of "verbal and logical juggleries," as the professor called it, says "labour is thus not the only source of the material wealth resulting from the use-values it produces. Labour is its father, as William Petty says, and the earth is its mother." He also asserted, what I submit is false, that we teach the doctrine that mental workers, scientific men, and organisers of labour, do not help in the production of wealth, that only the hand-labourers are the wealth-producers. We maintain, on the contrary, that often many of them do very, very important work for the community, for which they ought to be paid. What we feel is that the payment is too frequently out of all proportion to their deserts, and that anything in the shape of rent, interest, or profits drawn by the organizer of labour above his equitable remuneration, cannot be justified by any law of morality. The lecturer also took certain Socialists to task for teaching that the great end of life is material and physical enjoyment; a doctrine, he said, implying that man is all appetite—all stomach and belly. Those conversant with our literature will readily admit that it would be difficult to point out even one Socialist who takes such a low view of "man's chief end." Indeed, many non-socialists are impressed with the great moral beauty of the Socialistic ideal, and contend that, "human nature" being so depraved and base, our endeavours to realise it are hopeless. We are nevertheless often misunderstood on this point because we direct our attention specially to the alteration of the present economic conditions of society, convinced that as long as they prevail it is impossible to humanise the great multitude of the people. Dr. Flint then considered another view, which he held was advanced by us; that society should not only be organised for the production of wealth, but in the interest of the producers of wealth. He wasted a great deal of time pointing out the antagonism between buyer and seller, consumer and producer, in the present system. Apparently forgetting that such antagonism would not exist in a community conducted on co-operative principles, and unaware, perhaps, that we use the term "producer" in contradistinction to "idler," he rebuked us for advocating a "doctrine directly and inevitably anti-social and as unwise as unjust." Failing to see also that wages are merely a part returned to the worker of the total produce of his labour which is all rightfully due to him, and that only a creature devoid of any semblance of manly spirit would submit tamely to the robbery of any part of his own, he deprecated our describing wages as the badge of degradation and slavery. After ridiculing the various proposals of St. Simon, Louis Blanc, and Karl Marx as to the method of determining the remuneration of labour, he advocated, as the moral rights labour is entitled to, payment of due honour and esteem to it; suitable education for the working classes with opportunities of rising into the arts and professions; the right of combination to get as much as possible, limited only by the rights of private property; freedom of combination to establish collective partnerships, in every way but the socialistic. After dilating on his newly-discovered, hitherto-untried and infallible means of obtaining the workers' glorious "New Utopia," he hastened to defend the poor, suffering capitalist (whose justice or generosity, by the way, he did not think it would be safe to trust) from the charges trumped up by us against him, winding up by recommending the teaching of political economy to working-men as the antidote to our baneful influence. In the course of his lecture he sneered at our denouncing usury as immoral in these days of enlightenment, and laughed us to scorn for resuscitating what he calls a mediæval economic error. To expose his inconsistency in this matter as a follower of Christ and his immorality as a social being, must, however, be deferred owing to want of space. J. H. SMITH.

THE BIG BEER "BOOM."

I TAKE the following from 'Barker's Trade and Finance,' a fortnightly circular. It is a splendid illustration of the way in which the vast sums fleeced from the workers are utilised for their further enslavement. The article I refer to is headed "Guinness, Son, and Co.":

"From first to last more than ordinary interest has been taken by investors and the public generally in the floating of the enormous concern of Arthur Guinness, Son, and Co. as a limited liability company. The investment was regarded as a good one, and there was a great rush of applicants for shares, with the result that the amount required was offered many times over. This was sufficient to cause a few days' talk, but nothing more; and had no other special circumstances been connected with the launching of the concern, little would have been heard of it again. In one way or other, however, Messrs. Baring Bros. have contrived to keep the matter before the public, with results which they cannot deem satisfactory to themselves. Above everything, an Englishman does like impartiality, and the impression has been given that in this business a preference has been shown in the allotment of shares."

It is all very fine for the pious to throw up their eyes and say the cause of the misery of England is because the poor drink; but what are our noble and great doing to prevent it, the philanthropic Duchess of Teck included? The following list from the same circular, on the same subject, will show how far the wellbeing of the country is considered by those who have wealth. Why, they simply stick at nothing, as long as they acquire wealth for themselves without exertion on their part.

It appears from a list which has been published in Money that fifty persons, consisting of the promoters and others, have had allotted to them ordinary shares to the amount of £1,714,450, and Preference Stock to the amount of £1,044,500, or a total of £2,758,950, out of a total capital of £4,500,000 (excluding the Debenture Stock). The following are the fortunate fifty:—

Here we find that, including the 80,000 shares reserved for the vendor as part of the purchase payment, half a million more than half the ordinary and preference stock went to fifty persons. Amongst the fifty, Messrs. Baring themselves figure for £839,850, the Rothschilds have secured £350,000, Glyn, Mills, and Co. £250,000, C. J. Hambro and Son £110,000, and J. S. Morgan and Co. £100,000. Thus, five firms appear for £1,649,850, and they, together with the vendor and his family, have obtained £2,517,650 out of £4,500,000.

Then the stockbrokers have not done badly. A list is given of fifty who have secured amongst them £272,680 of ordinary and preference stock.

Amongst them are the following:—

	Preference Stock. £	Ordinary Stock. £		Preference Stock. £	Ordinary Stock. £

"What a miserable selection of small allotments! Yet, be it remembered, these are fortunate people. A very large proportion of general applicants got nothing at all. Their applications and deposits were returned to them."

The same paper goes on to state:

"What a plum these allotments have been to those who got them will be seen on reference to the price at which the shares are standing on the market. The ordinary shares are selling for rather more than 75 per cent. above par, and the Preference Stock at 25 per cent. premium. What that means to the large houses who have got the lion's share of the allotment, if they have held their shares and can sell them now, or have sold them at the present premium, can easily be calculated. Messrs. Baring's £839,850 fully paid up will now fetch £1,300,850, or a comfortable profit of £461,000!

Surely if the workers read over these figures carefully, with their considering-caps on, all further comment will be rendered unnecessary.

THE LATEST THING IN INTERNATIONAL BURGLARY.

So the harbinger of the gospel and shoddy goods, Stanley, of swash-bucklering memory, is again on the rampage, in the interest of his imperial extension and market-lusting clients. A neat little excuse is once more found (they are never wanting). A brother marauder, or philanthropist like the rest of them, with the single-minded desire of extirpating that dreadful curse of slavery—the very mention of which makes the modern capitalist's heart burn with righteous indignation, and long to take to himself the victims if possible, but at all events the natural produce of their lands,—this "worthy pioneer," then, has been for some time past keeping a corner of equatorial Africa warm for the establishment of a British protectorate. At length, after the necessary rôle has been played of giving out that he is surrounded and his valuable life in danger, his confederate Stanley is sent by the British Government on a marauding or relief expedition, amid the plaudits of the Bourgeois world, to comfort this heroic soul, and with a mitrailleuse of newest construction to correct the refractory African. If Continental complications do not arise meanwhile, we may expect, by the autumn, to see the comic papers resplendent with the well-known figures of their typical whore Britannia and her "fancy man" John Bull, both with holy indignation thirsting for the blood and lands of their barbaric victim. For it is quite possible the Central African may venture to remonstrate with Mr. Stanley before surrendering themselves, "body, soul, and estate," to him and the vampires whose agent he is. Meanwhile every true Socialist may "drink damnation" to Stanley, Emin Pacha, and all their fellow brigands. E. B. B.

FATHER MCGLYNN.—NEW YORK, Feb. 4.—Father McGlynn has issued a statement, in reply to Archbishop Corrigan's representations, in which he re-endorses the principles of Mr. Henry George's political faith, and re-affirms his declaration to the Archbishop that in becoming a priest he never surrendered his rights as a man and a citizen. Father McGlynn denies the right of his bishop, the Pope, or the Propaganda to punish his participation in the late municipal canvass, or in other political movements, and denies also the right of the Vatican to order him to Rome. He declares, in conclusion, that the vow of obedience taken by a priest is simply a promise to obey the Church in matters concerning his religious duties.—Reuter.

NEWS.

(By HOFFMANN VON FALLERSLEBEN. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

WHAT wonderful things the newspapers tell
Of the land that we live in and love so well!
What a budget of news we have this day read!
The Countess was yesterday brought to bed;
And to-morrow the Earl will be coming this way;
And the King will perhaps come home, they say;
And the Emperor soon will be going away;
But they all will meet on a future day—
What wonderful things the newspapers tell
Of the land that we live in and love so well!

What wonderful things the newspapers tell
Of the land that we live in and love so well!
Of the outlook they give us an excellent notion;
A titled young man has obtained his promotion;
The chaplain at Court has been given an order;
The lackeys have lace on their legs for a border;
Their Lordships are leaving the town altogether;
And we never have had such fine spring weather—
What wonderful news the newspapers tell!
God bless the land that we love so well!

SOCIALISM AND THE SEA.

WITH all the reek-less fire of a man who has made his Cause his religion, I chanced the other day to be holding forth to a brace of sun-reddened Jack-tars on the pros of Socialism. A slumbering indignation, the legacy of some small erstwhile experience of the delicacies of Yankee coasting, had been waked up by their retailing, in the grotesque vernacular traditionally peculiar to the sons of the brine, some by-the-by incidents in the log-book of brute slavery which sailor-men are hammered into on even bitterer lines than the agrarian serf of modern vegetation—for they cannot get out and walk! What a damning witness, spattered bloodily, will that log-book be against the Scarlet Whore, Commercialism, in the great Doomsday that is so near, when the shades of her million victims shall "clamour in chorus from the ocean"! Too much—enough—can never be written of the systematic doing to death of men by the notorious coffin-owners, a felicitous process which culminated in the Plimsollian crusade; but there is also this other side in the lives of subordinate mariners who go down to the sea in ships, slaving on maggots and chickory-water for months together on the moody sea, that the employers of their manhood may idle on the land, consuming the spices and tid-bits which the slaves must carry but never touch. And no Plimsoll has yet arisen to fix the enduring-point of the human craft. Any one who has any acquaintance with the commonplaces of a mercantile sea voyage will bear me out in saying that to recount a few sample facts would simply be to induce doubts of my veracity in the minds of the unsuspecting. Circumstance and habit necessarily, I allow, have a proportionable responsibility in the vulgar bullyism and brutality so liberally served out to the helpless 'fore-masters by those angels chartered for the purpose and specially protected by the law, but a little observation and knowledge of things suffices to convince that "commercial exigencies" and "long-shore bureaucracy" lie at the base of this evil and this shame. Some time ago I read an "objection" to Socialism founded on the stunning assumption that though the cut-and-dried mutations of terra firma existence might well be coped with under the New Régime, yet in this particular branch of industry the difficulties would be unsurmountable! For myself, I can't see it, and a detailed examination of the marine machinery in conjunction with the affably loquacious couple in mention has removed the faintest vestige of misgiving. From the standpoint of a propagandist I want to suggest that a (watery) field of labour hitherto not much experimented upon opens up with a prospect that is hopeful. Sea-men are generally manly men; their discontent with the economics and domestic injustice of their lot is waiting (amongst Britishers) for the proverbial spark; current rates of wages still further illustrate the Iron Law; and—their united power, politically and in relation to a social crisis, would be gigantic. Our friends in the seaports must recognise all this, and perhaps any suggestion from inlanders will be regarded in an ultra licitum light—but, cannot something be done in the way of amalgamating and fraternising the sailors with the international movement? I feel that we ought to have an interchange of sympathies, and that we must.

LEONARD HALL.

Yes, and to bow the head and bend the social knee to some dudelet, son of millionaire —, feeling all the while that the brainless whiffet is not worth the spittle you feel like whirling at him, and yet to know that you must cringe to get or keep a job. To meet the scornful pityingly-curved lip of a disdainful social miss, whose father's fortune could not buy for her brains enough to learn at school, and feel that you are morally and intellectually as far above her as the sun above the cloud-caps, and yet be forced to cringe and crawl to keep a job as family hostler, or get a job of sawing wood. These are social customs which endanger society as much as it is endangered by class laws. Social customs that array the many against the money are subversive of society itself. Too many caged lions in a circus are unsafe, as when one roars he may arouse so many that the keepers will be overpowered, the ringmaster even routed, and the public safety jeopardised.—Knights of L.

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

Subscribers in arrears are notified that the Commonweal will not be sent if subscription be not paid up within a fortnight from this date.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

"GOD SAVE THE QUEEN!"

GREAT BRITAIN, in the estimation of every true-born Englishman and Scotchman, is the most Christian of all nations. It has, according to the words repeated almost every Sunday in the pulpit, "been a peculiarly blessed land." God, it is alleged, has been pleased to vouchsafe to its public "the sincere milk of the word;" and every child is expected to know that the secret of Britain's greatness has been its earnest devotion to the teaching of the Bible. With a generosity, too, becoming its proud position, it has undertaken the mission of conveying the "secret" to all the barbarous tribes of the world; but unfortunately these benighted peoples do not seem to have appreciated its true value or the proper method of applying it, its failure to achieve "greatness" for them being of a very conspicuous character.

Well, in this Christian country of ours, we have what is termed a "National Anthem." Of its popularity there can be no question. It is the perfect expression of the patriotic fervour of every honest Christian Briton. When it is sung, it is sung with vigour and gusto, Tory and Liberal, pauper and peer, school-boy and professor, rising to their feet and uncovering their heads, and vying with each other in the force of lungs and earnestness of countenance with which they give utterance to its pious and patriotic sentiments. Not only indeed, do loyal people insist on standing uncovered during the singing of the anthem, but they reckon it rank blasphemy for anyone to presume to act otherwise. I have been once or twice myself mildly reminded of this fact, by having my hat crushed down upon my skull as a penalty for daring to exercise the right of private judgment upon the matter. However, being a good Scotchman, if a bad Briton, I have comforted myself with remembering that Robert Burns was once, for a similar act of impiety, bundled head and heels out of the theatre at Dumfries. Burns, however, almost deserved this treatment as a retribution for his writing in a moment of patriotic enthusiasm, stimulated by the threatened French invasion, the somewhat equivocal lines:

Who will not sing, "God save the King,"
Shall hang as high's the steeple;
But while we sing, "God save the King,"
We'll ne'er forget the People.

Our National Anthem is an indispensable institution. No theatrical performance, concert, or public entertainment; no civil or political demonstration can appropriately terminate without it. Children are taught to sing it in schools, and elephants to perform to its strains in menageries. It is alike in request in announcing the arrival of the village circus, and in celebrating the instalation of the Chancellor of a University. Nor is the sphere of its popularity confined to secular uses—it has even upon occasions displaced the venerable Psalms of David in our national and dissenting churches. Some time ago one of Her Majesty's chaplains was discoursing upon Socialism to a fashionable congregation. Towards the conclusion of his sermon he dwelt upon the dreadful state of things that would supervene if Socialism should prevail—the possibility of which so roused his indignation, and his indignation in turn so filled him with a fervour of commingled piety and loyalty, that—with the view I suppose of exorcising himself and his congregation from the pernicious effects of even the thought of Socialism transpiring—he called upon the people of God to join with him in singing "God save the Queen!" And the people of God did join with him, and sung the anthem with electrifying force and unsurpassed depth of devotion—clinging as fervently to the refrain as the crew of a sinking ship clings to a top-gallant spar.

There is one verse of this truly touching and beautiful hymn which deserves particular notice. It is always rendered with especial volume and spirit, and may be said to be the grand motif of the piece:

O Lord our God arise!
Scatter her enemies,
And make them fall!
Confound their politics,
Frustrate their knavish tricks,
On her our hearts we fix—
God save the Queen!

What quaint emphasis lies in the expression, "And make them fall!" Now, what I think must be evident to every impartial mind is, not only the ingenuous magnanimity of those lines, their excellent accordance with the history and spirit of our nation, but the Christian humility that pervades them, and especially the closeness with which they paraphrase the injunctions of the Scriptures: "Love your neighbours as yourself;" "Love your enemies;" and "Do good to those who revile you and spitefully use you." When, too, we remember that these lines (applied to George III. as "God save the King") were sung against our American brethren during the War of Independence, we cannot but discern how admirably Christian sentiment compounded with politics is adapted to make manifest "the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man."

It might be argued, Why ask God to save the Queen? If there is any lady in the land who knows how to take good care of herself, at other people's expense, it is surely Her Majesty. We give her several hundred thousand pounds a year to provide her with the decencies and comforts of life, supply her with palaces and yachts and keep them in repair, pay lords and ladies to attend upon her; we do all this and get nothing in return save insult and injury. Surely if any body in the world could get on without the special assistance of the Almighty, it is the Queen. Seeing we do all the "works" for her, we might reasonably leave her to do the "prayer" part of the business herself. If we asked God to save the poor old women who are starving in the slums of our cities, or cast out to die upon roadsides by ruffian landlords in Ireland and the highlands of Scotland, there might be some reason in our supplication; but to howl to the creator of the universe for his special protection to a self-satisfied, over-fed, greedy, scandal-mongering old relict of an effete despotism, is surely downright impertinence not to say patent blasphemy.

But let us be prepared. This is the Jubilee of Her Majesty's most beneficent reign, and "God save the Queen" with a forty million power of lungs and brass bands will soon re-echo through the kingdom. We will have probably more of "God save the Queen" in this one year than in all the last fifty years put together. A terrible thought! Let us hope the ordeal, even if it cracks our ears, will not crack our heads; and that if it does not bring judgment down from the skies it will waken the long-slumbering Demigorgon power in the hearts of the people, which will rise and drag despotism and plunder down into the void.

LITERARY NOTICES.

We have received the first three numbers of the Revista Italiana del Socialismo, a monthly review published at Imola. It is a welcome addition to Socialist publications, and contains articles of interest by Andrea Costa, Dott. N. Colajanni, P. Schiaperelli, and others.

We have received a very interesting pamphlet, 'The Land Scheme of the Eurasian and Anglo-Indian Association,' published by the Association at the Mint Street, Madras. It describes a scheme for industrial villages and peasant proprietorship to be carried into effect in the Mysore Province. Although his remedy is so inadequate, the writer explicitly recognises that the position of a working farmer under a proprietor or landlord is one of "subjection or slavery pure and simple."

Dr. W. C. Bennett, the veteran song-writer, who has on several occasions contributed to the Commonweal, has in the Liberal Home Ruler, of Jan. 22 and 29, a poem called 'Locksley Hall,' being an appeal from Tennyson's 'Locksley Hall Sixty Years After' to the original 'Locksley Hall.' It is a stirring poem with a true democratic ring, its keynote being

"Now, though Lords may mourn at changes that the wise years swiftly bring, Demos's shall be the future; his will be the hymns we sing."

Articles of interest to Socialists:—Fortnightly: "The State of our Trade," Geo. Howell, M.P.; "The Mir and the Police," Stepniak. Westminster: "State Education in America," "The Art of Government," "Plato's Moral Mission," "The Rent Question in Ireland." Scribner's: "Reminiscences of the Siege and Commune of Paris," E. B. Washburne. Century: "Relative Strength and Weakness of Nations," Edward Atkinson. Contemporary: "Ireland, 1782 and 1886," by Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice.

THE P. M. G. AND CAIRENE MORALITY.

THE Pall Mall has been at a loss for sensations lately; so much so that Sir William Thompson's prediction of the probable end of all things terrestrial in 30,000,000,000 years (we forget the exact figures, but from a practical point of view a cipher or two more or less doesn't matter much) had to be pressed into the service as though it were an imminent declaration of war between France and Germany. An extract from Mr. Cotter Morrison's new work on the probable future of Christianity was also made to do duty in default of a "latest telegram." But at last Mr. Caine has come home from Egypt to the rescue with a real genuine Pall Mall grievance, a sort of thing that ought to have a good run. The English Government has actually been so remiss in its duty, after four years' occupation, as not to have made any attempt to dragoon either natives or "occupiers" into teetotalism and sexual abstinence. Nay, it has even dared (not, it is true, from humane motives, but with a view to the "efficiency" of its best troops) to make some sort of attempt to check the spread of that divinely appointed pestilence, syphilis.

Now, all these things must be stopped, says Mr. Stead, as his hair rises. Temperance and stern morality must be enforced in the city of the Khedives. What? shall Egypt be evacuated? Oh dear no. The high-commercial and Christianising mission of England must be fulfilled. The empire must be extended, but in the interest of the factory and the clearing-house, not the grog-shop and the brothel. Of course, all Socialists know that these four great institutions are indissolubly connected, and that where you have the first two you are bound to have the last in some form or shape, law or no law, and so probably does Mr. Stead. But this will not prevent the ex-"Northumbrian boy" from continuing to puff imperial-extension schemes, or from affecting indignation at certain of their inevitable results, in the interest of the "great evening journal."

This last grog-shop business should help to fill up the time till the next aristocratic divorce case comes on. E. B. B.

CAPITAL AND LABOUR IN STAFFORDSHIRE.

AFFAIRS in Staffordshire are now in a very depressed state. Wages are being everywhere reduced, and the only refuge for the proletariat is the workhouse. At Stafford an extensive strike is anticipated in the boot trade. In some "shops" the Cutlan heeling machine is displacing labour, and in others reductions are being made. Fifty men are now out on strike against a reduction proposed by Messrs. Harris and Marson. Boots are made in four classes, for which of course a graduated scale of wages is paid, and the effect of the proposed changes will be that what will be still practically a second-class boot will be paid for at third-class wages, and the firm will profit the difference. All the extras previously allowed are also to be cut off, and the total reduction is estimated at from 20 to 30 per cent. The state of things in these modern factories has been well illustrated lately. At Stane Local Board the inspector of nuisances recently reported that a ventilator in Messrs. Bostock's factory there opened into a cow-shed. Of course nothing was done by the Board. Again, at Stafford police-court lately an apprentice was summoned for not doing his work. The employer, Mr. Riley, admitted that there was no coal that week (Jan. 3 to 10), and that the fire was fed with "patches," or shreds of leather. The reader can imagine for himself what heat is likely to be caused by smouldering leather. The employer's foreman also admitted that the stove was a bad one and smoked when lit, and that the shop was cold. The defendant further alleged that there was a broken window near where he worked, and that he was too cold to complete his allotted task. In the face of this the respectable Riley had the impudence to maintain that the "shop" was in a proper state. Where is the factory inspector? Another interesting case came before the same bench. A labourer was summoned for not providing his six children with adequate food and clothing, "he having the means and ability to do so." The children, it appeared, were half-starved and thinly clad; lived in two rooms in which there was hardly any furniture, and slept with their parents in one bed. On the other hand, the defendant said he could only earn 6s. or 7s. a-week at his work, and was unable to get them more food unless he stole something. Asked why he did not apply to the relieving officer, he said his wife did and was offered an order for the workhouse—that dreaded bastille of the working class. The prosecution was evidently so preposterous that even the capitalist magistrates had to adjourn the case in order that evidence might be procured as to the man's means. A specimen of the treatment this family would have met with in the workhouse was afforded at Walsall police-court about the same time, when several able-bodied paupers were charged with neglecting to pick 4 lb. of unbeaten oakum. It appeared that the poor wretches' fingers did not move fast enough for the task-master at the workhouse, but also that one of the defendants had done more work than any other able-bodied man in the house. The mayor said it seemed an extraordinary thing that the man who did most work should be prosecuted, and the case was dismissed.

The strike among the South Staffordshire chainmakers continues, and the men are still undergoing great privations to raise their starvation wages and to put a stop to the infamous "truck" system which flourishes there. Efforts are being made to start a co-operative chain-factory in the district. P.

Labour fighting for its rights in detachments has but a very slight chance of winning.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

LANCASHIRE is one of the best fields for Socialist propaganda in Britain. There the factory system is to be found in its most typical form. It is dotted all over with huge mills, which are nearly uniform in their aspect and methods of working. The people have a common experience, and look at questions in much the same light. The whole county in fact is one big manufactory, and the people live in that dull, rigid, and cheerless "equality" so much dreaded by the critics of Socialism. The people of Lancashire have gone through several generations under the capitalist system, and the result would form a curious and fruitful study for the economist. The death rate is the highest in England, the employment of women and children is very extensive. Of course, this employment of women has a frightful result as shown in the infant mortality. The relation between capitalist and labourer are not exceptionally bad, because where the whole family, father, mother, and children, can work in the mills, the family income is fairly large when all are employed, and even in times of distress it seldom happens things are so bad that the mother or some of the children cannot find something to do. The relations between the manufacturer and the small shareholders on one side, and the bankers and speculators on the other, would also form an interesting and profitable study. If some intelligent banking official could be converted to Socialism and induced to undertake such a piece of work, and do it thoroughly, he might earn immortal fame thereby.

The meetings I addressed in Manchester were not so successful as might be expected, chiefly for want of proper organisation. At Ashton there was a large gathering of people, who listened very carefully, and a Branch of the League can soon be formed there. At Hyde a successful open-air meeting was held, and was followed by an indoor lecture to a good audience. Enough names to form a Branch were taken, and the work of formally starting it and pushing the propaganda further was left to an energetic comrade who had just come to live in the place. On Sunday evening I spent a pleasant hour with the members of the Salford Branch of the S. D. F. On Tuesday afternoon I happened to be in the County Forum, a city temperance restaurant, where frequent discussions are held in the large room. On the previous Saturday night comrade Utley had opened a discussion, which led to an animated set-to between the Socialists and the Radicals. Tuesday was market day, and the place was well filled with a decidedly respectable audience. Some misconception of my views must have got abroad, for much to my surprise I was asked to open a discussion on "The Future of the Liberal Party." However, I accepted the invitation, and proceeded to explain how the Liberal Party was but the political expression of the capitalist class. That the interests of trade and commerce was all they concerned themselves with, and that these interests were at variance with the interests of the working-people; that in the near future the Liberal Party would go to the devil, pushing the Tories in front of them and dragging the middle-class Radicals behind, and that the sooner this happened the better. The speech was received with warmth but not enthusiasm.

On Tuesday night there was a good gathering at Blackburn. The meeting was held in the Market-place, and the attendance was about 500. Afterwards a meeting of Socialists was held to discuss various party matters.

On Wednesday I reached Preston, where no public meeting was held, but I spent the afternoon in talk with comrade William Sharman from whom I got a great deal of information. In Preston there is little chance of a Branch being formed at present, and the interests of the propaganda can best be served in other ways. Of Preston's 100,000 inhabitants, 45,000 belong to the Established Church, 35,000 are Roman Catholics, and only one-fifth of the population are Dissenters, while the mortality is abnormally large and the morality abnormally low. Still there is a good deal of Socialist opinion abroad, though the frightful respectability of the place makes it dangerous for anyone to hold unorthodox opinions upon any question—especially the Property Question. There is an Eclectic Society in connection with the Unitarian Chapel, in which Socialism is ably represented.

On Thursday, Feb. 3, I visited Darwen. No public meeting was held, but a few Socialists met to discuss the future of the propaganda in the town. A Socialist society had been in existence, but from various causes broke up a few weeks ago. It was agreed that another meeting of Socialists should be called in a day or two and a Branch of the Socialist League formed. From Darwen I went on to Lancaster, where a very successful campaign has just finished. A detailed account will be given next week.

Feb. 7.

J. L. MAHON.

A COCKROACH'S FUNERAL.—When Mahon addressed the meeting in the Market Place at Norwich, two middle-class people were standing on the verge of the crowd. One was a police inspector, the other a well-known tradesman. Quoth the police-inspector, "It's a lot of use trying to put down the Socialists, isn't it?" "Yes," said the tradesman, "it is like a cockroach's funeral. You kill one and a hundred appear in his place."

The tendency of trade schools has been, and always will be, to reduce wages. Jay Gould, with the operators "graduated" from his Missouri Pacific schools of telegraphy, not only broke the continental strike of operators in 1883, but has succeeded in greatly reducing the wages of these mechanics all over the South-west. As it is in the South-west, so it will be in New York. Every one of these "graduates" will be a menace to unionists in any demand for wages, hours, or fair treatment. They are taught the "good old principle of Ben. Franklin," that if you can't get a dollar a-day, work for fifty cents; if you can't get fifty, work for twenty-five.—John Swinton's Paper.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BIRNIE, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

About 450 men employed at the Silksworth Colliery, Sunderland, have received notice to cease their employment. Depression of trade is alleged as the reason for the stoppage.

The whole of the miners employed at the Treharris Collieries, Rhonda Valley, have struck work against proposed reductions amounting in some cases to about 30 per cent.

The miners employed at the Manvers Main Colliery (1,200 in number) have struck work, owing to several grievances which, it is alleged, they were unable to get settled. The men are in no association; but it is expected they will join the Barnsley Association.

After lasting 25 weeks there are at last good indications of a termination of the Staffordshire chainmakers' strike, several of the employers having agreed to grant the advance demanded.

The agitation amongst the seamen of the Tyne for an advance of wages is maintained. At meetings of the men held at North and South Shields, resolutions have been adopted pledging them to stand out for the advance.

At Sunderland, the result of a ballot amongst the seamen and firemen, showed that 21 were content with the present wage (28s. per week), and 301 were in favour of enforcing the demand for an increase to 30s. 4d. per week.

Great distress exists amongst the Lanarkshire miners. A report just received, too late, however, for this issue, discloses such a shocking state of things as might even provoke a "wicked" word from Mr. Bradlaugh.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—In reference to the compromise suggested by Mr. Morley, M.P., in the matter of the Northumberland miners' strikes, there have voted for the continuance of the strike 8238, and for the 10 per cent. reduction 1850. Several collieries refused to vote.

At Rowley, Staffordshire, a dispute has occurred in the nailmaking industry, some of the employers refusing to pay the recognised list of prices. The executive committee of the Nailworkers' Association have decided that the operatives shall be supported by levies made upon the surrounding districts.

The miners of Fife and Clackmannan, numbering upwards of six thousand, have voted, by an overwhelming majority, in favour of terminating the contracts with their employers, in order to compel the coalmasters to concede an advance of 15 per cent. The coalmasters have resolved to resist the action of the men to the utmost.

Last week an indignation meeting of the scavengers employed by the Corporation was held in Glasgow to protest against the recent reduction of wages accompanied with an increase of work. It was stated at the meeting that while 100 per cent. additional work had been imposed upon the men, their wages which previously ranged from 20s. to 30s. per week, had been reduced by 6s. to 10s., whilst the salaries of some of the officials ranging from £600 to £1200 had not been touched.

The Cleveland Steel-works at Eston, belonging to Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan, & Co., Middlesbrough, where some two thousand men are employed, have been closed, the notices which the men had given to the effect that they would cease work unless they obtained an advance of 10 per cent. having expired last Saturday. It is not expected that the strike will continue more than a week or two, as the men are not organised.—Later. The strike has practically ended, the men having accepted the 2½ per cent. advance offered by the masters for the next seven weeks, and then submit the further claims of the men to arbitration.

CONFERENCE OF TRADES' DELEGATES.—At the adjourned conference of trades' societies' delegates in Glasgow on Saturday, a resolution was adopted declaring that a reduction of the working hours to eight per day would tend to the absorption of the surplus labour in the market. The meeting also expressed approval of the Eight Hours' Bill as applicable to miners. Another subject discussed was systematic overtime, which it was agreed should be abolished or so minimised as to distribute labour amongst the largest number of hands. A resolution of sympathy with the miners in their present struggle for an advance was adopted with unanimity.

MINERS' CONFERENCE IN GLASGOW.—A conference of miners' delegates was held in Glasgow on Saturday. The proceedings were private, but at the close it was announced that it had unanimously decided that the men should remain out until a future conference—the date of which is not fixed—unless their demand was meanwhile conceded. The recommendation of the conference was almost universally adopted in Lanarkshire and Ayrshire. At Irvine, however, about 250 men went to work at Merry and Cunningham's pit. The pickets were out, but the firm placed their men under the protection of the police.

NATIONAL LABOUR FEDERATION.—A meeting of the executive council of this body was held on Saturday night at the Carlisle Hotel, Westgate Road, Newcastle. Communications have been sent to the different trades' union councils respecting the legality of their members joining the federation. Several replies were read, which were favourable to the federation, and will no doubt remove a cause that has prevented many unionists joining and co-operating in organising the working classes. It was decided to hold the delegates' meeting on March 26, to which each branch will send one delegate. Arrangements were made for opening five more branches.

DUBLIN.—At a meeting of the Amalgamated Tailors in their Hall, Fishamble Street, with reference to the "sweating" system, the case of the Southport Chronicle, which has been mulcted in law costs of nearly £170 by a local tailor for denouncing the system, was taken into consideration. The spacious hall was filled to overflowing. Mr. M'Mahon stated that sweating was carried on in Dublin to an even worse extent than in the large towns of England; all the large firms in Dublin employed sweaters. That day he had been in a sweaters' den, where a woman lay in childbed and where three females and two boys were working. A resolution to assist in indemnifying the Southport Chronicle, and thanking its editors, was carried without a dissentient.

THE STRIKE IN THE WELSH TIN-PLATE TRADE.—A demonstration of strikers in the Monmouthshire tin-plate trade was held at Abercarne on Saturday. The strikers formed a procession at the top of the valley and marched down to Abercarne, where they were joined by other strikers. A meeting was held, at the close of which a collision occurred between a number of the strikers and those who are idle through the strike of the tin-house and mill men. Many persons were roughly handled, the neighbourhood being in a state of riot for some hours. A disturbance having been anticipated, a large number of police had been drafted into the place, and they were able to cope with it, and succeeded in maintaining order. Delegates representing the Glamorganshire and Carmarthenshire works attended the meeting, and stated that they were prepared to afford support to the extent of 14s. per man per week. It was decided to continue the strike resisting the ten per cent. reduction.—Wednesday. Disturbances of a similar character occurred yesterday, and the neighbourhood was in a state of riot for some hours.

The weaving trade is so intensely unprofitable that capital is rushing into it like a flood. Scarcely a daily paper can be taken up without seeing that in one district or another extensions are going on. Some firms are extending their sheds, others are building new ones; fresh companies are starting, either to manufacture themselves or to supply room and power to tenants. It looks as though we are to have a repetition of a dozen years ago. We shall have looms put down without limit until the goose is killed that lays the golden eggs. We shall then have lengthy articles about foreign competition, and the employers will be asking for reduced wages. If the operatives are wise they will take time by the forelock. With the demand for weavers now existing, many of them are too apt to assume that because they are comparatively comfortable it will always last, and there is no need to prepare for a rainy day by organising this strength. What is occurring now has occurred before, and we shall as surely have a repetition of 1878 and 1883 as that night follows day. Capitalists want teaching that they have no business to rush their money in a trade till the profits are gone, and then come upon the workpeople to pay for their folly. Now is the time to prepare the lesson, and we shall be pleased to see that at the right time it can be effectively taught.—Cotton Factory Times.

THE LOCK-OUT OF GLASS-BOTTLE MAKERS AT ST. HELENS—SWEDES BROUGHT OVER TO TAKE THEIR PLACE—DEMONSTRATION AGAINST FOREIGN LABOUR.

On Saturday afternoon a demonstration to protest against the introduction of foreign labour was held at St. Helens. During the week Messrs. Lyon Brothers, glass-bottle manufacturers, have brought 39 Swedes and Norwegians to supersede workmen whom they had discharged. Of these, sixteen have declined to work when they found that there was a dispute, some not coming to St. Helens and five not working when they did arrive. On Saturday morning the other twenty-three Swedes commenced to work. Messrs. Lyon have arranged some rooms in Corporation Street, about half a mile from the works, for their accommodation, and they are conveyed to and from in a waggonette under a strong police escort. The popular feeling against Messrs. Lyon is very strong. On Saturday fully 6000 workmen joined in the procession, and about 10,000 persons were present at the meeting. Mr. Thomas Glover, secretary to the St. Helens Trades' Union Council, presided, and the meeting was addressed by Mr. Robert Hunter, president of the St. Helens Glass-Bottle Makers' Union; Mr. James Hunter, secretary; Mr. Robert Canning, a discharged foreman; Mr. George Hempinstall, president of the North of England Glass-Bottle Makers' Society; Mr. Edward Tankard, secretary of the Northern Society; Mr. Morgan, vice-president of the Liverpool Trades' Council; Mr. Schumann, Dublin Trades' Council; Mr. Charles Sweeting, Yorkshire Bottle-Makers' Society; and Mr. Graham, president of the Dublin Glass-Bottle Makers' Society. The following resolutions were carried unanimously: "That this meeting of the various trades of St. Helens and surrounding districts hereby expresses its greatest condemnation of Messrs. Lyon in introducing foreigners under false pretences, and thereby turning out their own workmen. (It was stated that the agent of Messrs. Lyon in Gothenburg had represented that there was no dispute in St. Helens.) "That this meeting use all its influence to support the bottle-makers during their dispute." A strong body of police had been drafted into the town and drawn up in position near the Swedish Barracks, but their services were not required. The Strike Committee of the Socialist League immediately on receipt of the news of the arrival of the Swedes, sent a delegate from the Swedish Section of the Socialists to assist the unionists by acting as interpreter between them and the Swedes.

A large open-air meeting was held at Lancaster Market Place, on Monday Feb. 7. J. L. Mahon (delegate from the Socialist League Strike Committee) explained the circumstances of the dispute between Messrs. Lyons of St. Helens and the International Union of Glass Bottle Makers. The following resolution was put and carried with cheers: "That this meeting protests against the mean action of Messrs. Lyons, the St. Helen's glass bottle makers, in enticing foreign workmen to compete against their English brethren; that we send our hearty sympathy to the workers and wish them success in their struggle; and we hope the Swedish workmen will not allow themselves to be used by the capitalist as a means of stirring up rivalry between the workers of different nations."

AMERICA.

Italians of Norway, Mich., have formed an assembly of K. of L.

A French assembly has been organised in Iron Mountain.

In Des Moines, Ia., two sisters are professional paper hangers, hanging paper at the regular rates charged by men in the same line.

The striking car men in San Francisco have established a line of 'busses on Sutter Street to accommodate the people who formerly used the street cars.

The Federation of Trades Unions includes 34,000 cigarmakers, 22,000 bricklayers, 40,000 coal-miners, 20,000 printers, 27,000 iron-moulders, and 30,000 carpenters and joiners.

Ottumwa, Ia., Knights will start a co-operative packing and provision company, employing 1,000 to 1,500 men upon the eight-hour plan, March 1. Capital stock 50,000 dols., shares 10 dols. each.

The gain of the street-car employes in this and other cities, through the strikes of last year, has been absolute. It includes more pay, more leisure, and more men at work. The effect of their combination in New York and Brooklyn was to take an average of three hours and nineteen minutes of work per day from the men employed, and to increase their pay by at least 25 cents per day. That is to say, the street-car employes now work seventy-seven hours per week and earn 2 dols. per day, against a hundred hours and 1 dol. 75 c., as per scale of January last year. They gained nearly two working days of twelve hours each per week, and 1 dol. 75 c. in pay. The cost of these efforts, in wage-loss and expenses, all told, to the wage-earners, was less than 100,000 dols. Over 2,000,000 dols. were added to the wages of this class, and 2000 more men are now employed.—John Swinton's Paper.

REVOLUTIONARY RUMBLINGS.

FRANCE.

MARSEILLES.—The women weavers of the La Palud factory at Marseilles, having demanded an augmentation of wages without any result, have now put themselves on strike. With the present tariff it is impossible for the most skilful to earn more than 2 fr. 25 c. a-day.

DECAZEVILLE.—The members of the workmen's Syndicate of the miners of Aveyron at a general meeting held at Decazeville on the 30th of January, nominated Citizen Basly to represent them at the Congress of French miners, which is to be held at St. Etienne from the 7th to the 13th of February.

In spite of all protests and representations, Sieur Lachaise, porcelain manufacturer, will insist on dismissing an employé whom he has found to be a member of the Porcelain Makers' Syndicate and of the Socialist Committee, signifying his intention moreover of reducing the wages of the moulders. His workmen, however, called a meeting and unanimously agreed to leave the workshops if he persists in his unreasonable conduct.

PRISON REVOLTS.—We hear of disturbances in the Central Prison of Alherville (Savoie) and also that of Embrun (Htes. Alpes), the cause in both places being the complaint at the lowness of the labour-tariff in some of the workshops. "Order is now re-established," say the papers, which is a very comfortable assurance to all parties, especially to those who have been reduced to "order" by cajolery, promises, or the prison-cell.

REUILLY.—A correspondent to the Cri writes of the farce of an "inspector's visit" which has taken place at the tobacco-factory of Reuilly. It seems that the same inspector who had charge of the inquiry into the Roustan affair at Marseilles was sent thither, and his detailed report arrived at the conclusion that an increase of the women's wage was necessary. This increase accordingly took place, but, we are told, only for the space of a fortnight, after which the former tariff was resumed! The writer adds that in the last ten years the mean of wages has fallen from 4 fr. 50 c. to 2 fr. 95 c., and that a strike is apprehended.

VIERZON.—Féline, lately released from his long-protracted imprisonment, writes a letter of greeting to the Cri, announcing his return to the ranks of the "revoltés," and his intention of resuming his work for that journal as correspondent for the department. It is well for revolutionary propagandists, of whatever colour, that the governing bodies do not perceive with what stimulated ardour all those who are active in mind and sincere in their convictions, return from long weeks and months of incarceration to their former posts, or finding those filled up by their long absence, proceed to make for themselves new places! Otherwise would they (our governors) rather seek to ignore the movement, and let the force spend itself prematurely aboveground. But in France at any rate, Repression v. Intimidation are the watchwords of the adversary, and the ferment works in darkness.

BELGIUM.

Strikes are multiplying in Ghent just now, some of them being accompanied by a certain amount of disturbance. Persecutions of Socialists are many and vigorous, the bourgeoisie here being particularly vindictive against the movement.

The military repression of last March in the district of Charleroi has cost the country two million francs (£80,000). All that to arrive at the massacring of some dozens of starvelings and the imprisonment of some hundreds of desperate men. Far otherwise would it have been useful and humane to have sent the money's worth in bread and meat to the workers of Charleroi! But that would be noways pleasing to General Vandersmissen—a butchery of men—well and good!—L'Avant Garde.

GHEENT.—At a second representation of the Petit Patriote at the theatre here, several Socialists allowed themselves the pleasure of hissing the anti-Socialist sentiments of the play, whereupon they were "chucked" and roughly handled by the police, their clothes torn, and so forth. In 1885, on we know not what occasion, the burgomaster of Ghent declared at a sitting of the Council that in buying a ticket of admission to the theatre a man also bought the right to hiss the performers. Dear burgomaster, we should think he did! At the same time, theatre-goers being proverbially good-hearted and lenient, the prerogative is seldom exercised by the gods (except, of course, when a favourite "villain" comes on the stage, who would not be content without this demonstration of disgust at the "wickedness of vice"). But a Socialist who goes to witness an anti-Socialist play does so as a religious duty, and certainly buys with his ticket the right to express his distaste for sentiments inimical to his views. Ungrateful Ghent! A handful of working-men break the monotony of your after-dinner theatrical amusement and add a relish of excitement thereto, and you reward them by opprobrium and abuse!

GERMANY.

The Social Democrats have recently issued an electoral manifesto to the people, in which they explain the position of the Socialist members of the Reichstag, who protested against the augmentation of the army which the Government asked for. Militarism is a serious danger for the peace of nations, the manifesto says; the present organisation of military force which allows of aggressive warfare must be replaced by popular armies, more numerous and efficacious for defence but useless for attack, thereby making an end of fratricidal warfare between nations. The manifesto goes on to explain afresh the programme of the party; annual vote on the budget, substitution of collective production for capitalist production, suppression of indirect taxation, to be replaced by progressive tax upon income, equal rights for all, etc. According to the manifesto, the Social Democrats consider that the electoral struggle opens under circumstances very favourable for them; the last Session having done nothing for the labouring class, it is for these to choose between the Socialists and the enemies of Socialists, who are likewise the enemies of the People.

AUSTRIA.

PRAGUE, February 4.—The speech made by Herr von Pleuer in the Reichsrath in support of his proposition to create labour-chambers is remarkable in many respects. He referred to the importance of the project of law relating to the solution of the social question, although there was a time when the friends of this gentlemen denied all existence of the social question. He spoke of the struggle between capital and labour, of the exploitation of labour by capital, of the necessity to found institutions by which the labourers should be enabled to withstand the great capitalists. And notwithstanding all this he is an adherent of "economic liberalism" as deputy for the Commercial Chamber at Eger in Bohemia, and he made a difference between Socialists and labourers and spoke of the necessity of combatting the Socialist aims which threaten to root up the present society. The proposition was referred to a committee ad hoc. How long it will stay in the committee's hands not even the committee knows.

In the year 1883 there was submitted to the Reichsrath a project of law relating to insurance against disease and accidents, which is still, as we write, only a project of law. More quickly a project of law creating a military levy in mass (Landsturm) became legally binding. The preceding month the respective ministerial executing ordinances were issued. According to that law the territorial militia will be convoked when a war breaks out, in order to maintain order at home, and in case of necessity also against the enemy. The first levy of the territorial army consists of all men of from 19 to 38 years of age who are not soldiers, not blind, deaf, dumb, lame, nor hunchbacked, etc.; the second body, of all men of from 38 to 42 years. According to the dates of the Insurance Society argues that we have in Austria, there are in the first levy 2,148,783, in the second class 518,988; altogether, 2,667,771 men; in Hungary, first levy 1,616,282, second levy 390,374 men; in Austria-Hungary, therefore, 4,674,427 men. That the territorial militia, consisting of men who have never worn a weapon, will avail anything to the Government when the regular army is beaten and dissolved, we may be allowed to doubt. If, after an unlucky battle, the armed people rise and shake off the yoke of absolutism and capitalism!—F.S.

BLANTYRE MINERS.—Feb. 9.—Serious miners' riots at Blantyre, shops sacked, military called out, 17 arrests. A report on the miners' agitation in Scotland will be printed in next week's Commonweal.

The trial at Posen of the Polish Socialists has just finished. The long-deferred sentence condemns one man to two years' imprisonment and a second to six months. The rest are acquitted.

SOCIALIST ARRESTS IN GERMANY.—BERLIN, Feb. 7.—A number of Socialist arrests, amounting, it is stated, to twenty-four, were made in Magdeburg and its environs yesterday. The prisoners are charged with being members of an illegal society.

The unemployed of Madrid have been parading the streets demanding "work" of their exploiters; the authorities busy themselves about preparing a sop for Cerberus in the shape of public works. Fancy making work for the people, when so much work remains undone in all directions? The impotency and helplessness of the answer is about paralleled by that of the cry.

PEACE OR WAR?—A crowded meeting of Socialists and sympathisers was held in Cleveland Hall on Tuesday, to protest against the stupid and fratricidal war about to be inaugurated by the bourgeois governments of Europe in order at once to extend their foreign markets and smother the revolutionary propaganda. Wm. Morris took the chair, and speeches were made in several languages by men of the different peoples. A strong resolution was unanimously carried.

"RIOT MONDAY."—On Tuesday evening a meeting was held on Clerkenwell Green, in spite of its having been "proclaimed" by Charles Warren, to commemorate the terrific fright Bourgeoisdom received a year ago. The police succeeded in thoroughly exasperating the people, so much so that some window-smashing and general "rioting" signalled the homeward way of part of the crowd. Some arrests were made. May we suggest Unjust Grantham as the fit and proper person to try the prisoners?

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGDON ROAD, E.C.

NOTICE.—All business matters relating to the Socialist League to be directed to the Secretary, H. A. Barker, 13 Farringdon Road, London, E.C.

Bazaar and Concert postponement.—Circumstances which have arisen since the committee of management announced the date of the Bazaar compel them to postpone the same from February 5 to Saturday March 5.

Paris Commune.

An International Celebration of the Paris Commune will be held at SOUTH PLACE CHAPEL on THURSDAY MARCH 17. All Revolutionists are invited to take part. Charles, Lane, and Cantwell have been appointed a committee to make arrangements.

A Provincial Propagandist Tour.

Comrade Mahon's engagements in the provinces are: Feb. 12 and 13, Nottingham; 14, Sheffield; 15, Clay Cross (miners); 17 to 25, Leeds, Bradford, Bingley, Shipley, etc.; 27, 28, and March 1, Hull; 2, Newcastle. Mahon will be glad to hear from any persons willing to arrange meetings at York, Middlesbro', Shields, or Yarmouth.

Branch (Capitation) Subscriptions.

The Treasurer would be glad if the Branches made every effort during the year to pay up their subscriptions at the end of each month, so that the advertisement of these subscriptions would show the united energy of the League.

Branch Subscriptions Paid.

Birmingham, Hackney, Hull, Leeds, North London, to August 31. Manchester, Merton, Norwich, to October 31. Bradford, to November 30. Croydon, Hammersmith, Lancaster, Leicester, Oxford, South London, to December 31, 1886. Bloomsbury, Clerkenwell, to January 31. Hoxton (Labour Emancipation League), to March 31, 1887.

STRIKE COMMITTEE.

THE NORWICH PRISONERS' AID FUND.

(It is suggested by the Committee that each Branch organised a Concert for the purpose of raising funds.)

Acknowledged last week, £6, 13s.; A. E., 5s.; W. R., 5s.; Webb, 1s.; Arthur, 1s.; Miller, 5s.; O'Fallon, 3s.; Morris, £1; collected in Hyde Park, 4s. 5d.; Regent's Park, 4s. 6d.; Hamilton Branch, 3s.; Leeds Branch (weekly), 2s.; collected by G. S. Farnham, 5s. Total, £9, 11s. 11d.—J. LANE, Treasurer.

BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Feb. 2, H. H. Sparling lectured on "Commercial Cannibalism;" good discussion followed. On Sunday, Feb. 6th, Dr. W. M. von Swartwout gave us a very interesting lecture. The ordinary monthly meeting of members was held as announced, at which important Branch business was transacted. The secretary gave out, among other good news, that after settling liabilities up to date, the treasurer had a balance in hand. Members are reminded that a monthly free concert will take place first Sunday in each month, and not to forget to bring their friends. The open-air propaganda in Clerkenwell will soon be started, and we hope members will rally round.—W. B. and T. E. W., secs.

CROYDON.—On Sunday last, Graham Wallas gave an exceedingly interesting lecture on "Education," in which he keenly criticised our present system of instruction; which he pointed out was merely preparatory to really useful education, and was very soon lost after leaving school. His statement, however, that schooling should last from 5 years up to 18 years of age to be really useful, rather startled some of the audience, and provoked a discussion. The Radical Association have passed a resolution expressing sympathy with Mowbray and Henderson, and condemning Grantham. At the West Croydon Liberal and Radical Club the Radical Association also proposed same resolution after a lecture on Lord Palmerston, but the chairman ruled it "out of order." Much sympathy is expressed, however, and we hope to carry similar resolutions in most of the local Liberal and Radical Clubs. Collecting cards now out.—A. T., ast.-sec.

HACKNEY.—On Sunday morning, we held our first open-air meeting at the "Salmon and Ball." Graham and Davis addressed a good audience; no opposition. In the evening, W. C. Wade lectured on "England in the 15th Century, and Now." An interesting discussion followed.—H. MATTHEWS, sec.

HAMMERSMITH AND FULHAM.—With the return of milder weather the attendances at our outdoor meetings, which we have persevered in holding throughout the winter, have much improved. On Sunday, Feb. 6th, we held successful meetings at Beadon Road and at Walham Green. At the latter place in the absence of expected speaker, Hunter Watts, of the S.D.F., who chanced to be in the neighbourhood, kindly delivered an address on our principles, taking for his text Ruskin's statement that there are only three ways of getting a living, viz., by working, begging, or stealing. Toohatti made an appeal for comrade Mowbray's family, and 6s. 2d. was collected. Our recent lectures have been by T. A. Manson on "Burns," Mrs. E. Bland on "Ancient Rome and Modern Babylon," on which occasion the Rev. C. L. Marson took the chair, and on the 6th inst. by H. H. Sparling, who lectured on the "Evolution of Cannibalism."—W.

MITCHAM.—We held an outdoor meeting on Sunday morning on Mitcham Fair Green. Comrade Kitz and other Merton comrades assisted. As usual we were well protected by police. Kitz read a letter received from the Croydon Board of Guardians, offering to receive a deputation of three unemployed workmen. The offer was accepted, and several men gave in their names to form deputation. In the evening in the club-room of the Branch, comrade Barker lectured to a large audience, the subject being "Socialist Morality." The speaker was listened to with rapt attention and sympathy. We sang Morris's chant, "No Master," after the lecture. We are working for the benefit of the wife and family of comrade Mowbray as well as can be expected, considering that our members have had rather a rough time of it lately; we intend to keep the fund open for three weeks, and shall then send the amount to the committee appointed to receive the same.—S. G., sec.

BRADFORD.—On Sunday, Feb. 6, comrade Maguire lectured to a crowded house at the "Exchange," City Road, on "Some Objections to Socialism." After a brief but lucid statement of our aims he reviewed most of the common objections urged by opponents, dealing first with the "Dirty Work" bogey, to the manifest satisfaction of those present. Referring to the "No Incentive" objection, he expressed surprise that such a thinker as Herbert Spencer should put forth such a weak argument, and showed the utter fallacy of the idea, and strongly opposed the inherent baseness of the prevalent notion that the incentive to money-getting was the motor-power of the world's progress. He pointed out that the really able and best men, scientists, thinkers, poets, and painters, did not as a rule seek to gain wealth, but did their work for the love of it and of humanity, and when they did happen to get too much into the pay of the counting-house their "genius" and the excellence of their work too often began to show signs of grievous deterioration. The millionaire, on the contrary, was generally an unscrupulous monster who accumulated his fortune by abusing the hard necessities and inventions of his fellows. The only notion of progress such an one had was the progress of his own banking account, to increase which he would work his fellow creatures—men, women, and children—to death and the devil. "Money incentive" inevitably developed monstrosity, and was really the greatest block to real progress. Against this he put the grand ideal of Socialism, harmonious association in all things, which would develop true manhood and womanhood, and secure comfort, leisure, culture, and happiness for all. Opposition speeches were made by Mr. Garside, an ancient Tory, and Mr. Wilson, who called himself a "go-between." The lecturer was ably supported by comrades Bland and Minty. A remarkable speech was also made by Mr. Robinson, a Conservative, who roundly condemned the twin curses, competition and capitalism, and acknowledged that Socialists, in contrast to Radicals and Tories, knew very clearly what they were talking about. Their ideal was a noble one, vastly superior to the dubious aims of rival political parties. Mr. Robinson is clearly not far from salvation. Maguire wound up with an eloquent and passionate appeal which quite "carried" the audience.

EDINBURGH.—On Monday, Jan. 31, in large Free Tron Hall, James Campbell lectured on "Social Utopias." In a lecture instinct with the finest feeling and the richest imagination, he passed in review various ideals cherished in the past. Though the lecture was one which it might have been thought tended more to give enjoyment than to provoke discussion, there was nevertheless an animated discussion at its close, in which our friend Mavor, from Glasgow, took part.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, at 1.30 p.m., Glasier addressed an audience of from 200 to 300 on Jail's Square. Afterwards a Socialist friend from England spoke for some time. Some opposition was replied to by Glasier with the manifest approval of the audience. At 5.30 Glasier addressed another large and sympathetic meeting. In the evening in our hall, David McLardy lectured on "The Claims of Labour."

HULL.—On Thursday, 3rd inst., Teesdale spoke at the Radical Club on "Socialism and Social Reform," and met with considerable opposition. On Sunday, Teesdale spoke at the club-room on the necessity of propagandists studying history and political economy, and suggested the formation of "groups" for this purpose. Devlin spoke on the aims of Socialism, which was followed by a brisk discussion, two Radicals opposing.—T.

LEEDS.—On Sunday, 11 a.m., we held an open-air meeting in Vicar's Croft, and Sollett and Maguire addressed an attentive audience of about 400 on "Passing Events." Commonweal sold well. In the evening, Maguire lectured on Socialism at the Exchange Discussion Club, City Road, Bradford.—F. CORKWELL, sec.

NORWICH.—We held four meetings on Sunday all well attended, which were addressed by Donald. We collected 15s. for the Prisoners' Aid Fund, and must call upon our well-wishers in Norwich and district to be a little more liberal. If we don't get larger collections it will be a couple of years before our debts are cleared. The meeting in the Market Place should have given at least £3. The propaganda is carried on vigorously with results that have astonished ourselves.—D.

NOTES ON NEWS.

SIR CHARLES WARREN (no doubt in self-defence and defence of the police) has given a blow to contemporary history as written by the daily press, by a sudden demolition of the very rapidly grown myth of the Wicked Socialist and the Heroic Butcher, which is, after all, perhaps the very latest example of the solar myth. The bright and ruddy hero dispelling the murky crowds of the cloudy night with the shooting forth of his bright rays must be, according to the solar theory, what is really typified by this apparently historical incident. Mr. Andrew Lang perhaps could tell us what it might signify according to the explanation of the "customary" theory of myths.

To one person it must have signified victuals and drink, temporarily at least; to wit, to the ingenious gentleman who produced the detailed and dramatic "Siege of a Butcher's Shop" in the Daily News. I hope I have all due professional sympathy with our injured contemporary, but I really cannot help saying with Mr. Bounderby in 'Hard Times,' "We are waiting to hear what apology you are going to offer us for going about the country express with no other luggage than a story of a cock and a bull!"

The Pall Mall Gazette gave us lately the account of interviews with various business men as to the present condition of trade. The views of these gentlemen were mostly what under the present circumstances may be called optimistic, that is they all seemed to think that things were mending a little. But, after all, what they said amounted to little more than that the public were getting rather eager for investments, which fact may mean nothing more than the beginning of a brief swindle-period.

Judging by the condition of production, which is indicated by the plain statement of facts given in the columns of our own paper under the heading "The Labour Struggle," this seems to be all that it does mean. The hunger-riots of the Scotch coal miners also do not point to our nearing a period of plain-sailing prosperity.

Mr. Bright "is at it again." He really does seem as if he were determined to show that his claim to have been a popular leader was mere moonshine; it would be difficult for any enemy of his to be as successful in this demonstration as Mr. Bright himself.

The Daily News the other day was righteously indignant with the sentence of a country magistrate on a labourer, convicted of the terrible offence of setting traps to catch wood-pigeons, for which in the upshot the poor man got two months' imprisonment. Probably, however, such sentences are as common as frosts in winter, and not nearly so much noticed. Our own experience has taught us that, since neither the Daily News nor any other bourgeois paper made any comment on Judge Nupkins-Grantham's sentence on Mowbray and Henderson; the Pall Mall Gazette joining in the conspiracy of silence, although when convenient it can say a good deal about the doings of one section of the Socialists.

The Chiswick poisoning mystery has been explained, say the daily papers: "the Government analyst has failed to detect any traces of irritant poison of the contents of the stomachs of the two children . . . having regard to the fact that the mother and six children slept in a single bed in a room only measuring 8 ft. by 9 ft., and that the cold and the scanty covering on the bed and the clothing generally in the house compelled them to huddle together to keep themselves warm, shutting out at the same time all ingress of fresh air into the room where for hours there had been a lamp burning, he has, it is reported, come to the conclusion that the cause of the death of the two children was vitiated atmosphere." Misery is a shorter word than vitiated atmosphere, and yet a more explanatory one. I suppose these victims of vitiated atmosphere will not be set among the record of those who were starved to death? (I have not patience to remember the euphemism for that), but starved to death they were.

In his first debate with Mrs. Besant Mr. Foote affected (surely it was affectation) scorn at those who distinguish between competition and emulation, and asked what was the difference between them. Mr. Foote knows well enough that competition, as we use the word in English, means seeking one's own advantage at the expense of one's neighbours (compare the French concurrence). As to emulation, judging by the tone of his attack on Socialism, it is probable that he does not understand what that means, as it is certainly a generous quality. To give the difference between the two shortly, emulation means making the best of one's own capacity; competition, making the worst of one's neighbour's.

Mr. Bradlaugh was enthusiastically cheered at a meeting held on behalf of the crofters for saying amongst other things "that we had no right to pauperise the crofters by law and then send them into other lands to die." Most true; but how strange that Mr. Bradlaugh should object to the substitution of the word "working-men" for crofters! He has been lately taking some trouble to attack those who are trying to show that we have no right to pauperise, not the crofters only, but all workers, by forcing them to yield to "capital" a tribute for leave to work—that is, to live. How utterly illogical it is in him to attack also a small section of the monopolists of the means of production!

They have exactly the same "rights of property" as every one else has, neither less nor more; and those rights leave them free to use or abuse their property according to their own will. If the abuse of their property should be interfered with, why not other abuses of property? And is it not an abuse of property to employ it as a mere means of compulsion to force other men to work for the compeller—or privileged thief? How can it matter whether the instrument of violent robbery is called "land" or "capital"? W. M.

One of the signs of the times is the manifestation of decadence in the superstitious reverence for "law" which was afforded several times during the debate on Mr. Parnell's amendment. Two lawyers, one the son of the Lord Chief Justice, led the attack upon "law-in-itself," and put very plainly and well the position that a "law" is an absurdity and a crime unless "approved by the moral sense of the community at large." Mr. Holmes, the Attorney-General for Ireland, was—and the Spectator laments it piteously—in despair over ever again getting people to obey laws in which they do not believe.

Mr. John Morley put into a phrase the other day the history of the people everywhere. It was much more than "the history of Ireland in a nutshell" that he called it. "Unredressed grievances, moral wrongs without a legal remedy, and then the resort to illegal acts to secure justice." S.

THE CRIMINAL CLASSES OF THE FUTURE.

A RETROSPECT AND A PROSPECT.

THE persistent preaching of Socialist principles had leavened men's minds with new ideas, and the old prejudices against the poorer inmates of our jails and convict establishments had given place to a feeling that they were more sinned against than sinning. Bad training amidst filth, squalor, and manifold temptations, were held as (outside the judicial bench) excuses and condonation of offences against property. There, on the contrary, as the feelings of the people became more liberal, the harshness of their decisions became more marked. Shameful sentences and gross partiality were the order of the day. Prison discipline bore the marks of the haters of the people, and the brutal tortures of the past were replaced with refined cruelties. That made a sentence of imprisonment, in many cases, a sentence of death. Pitiful cases of half-starved desperate men sent to jail for stealing food, with the brutal comments of the well-fed magistrate ringing in their ears, of paupers ill-treated with impunity by workhouse jailers, and of myriads preferring to lie and die by the roadside rather than accept the brutal charity of a corrupt Society, were the order of the day. The mass of unemployed workmen were insulted by the paid hirelings of the affrighted bourgeois with schemes of dietetic reforms, sterilisation, etc., etc. It seemed that the old saying that those whom the "Gods seek to destroy they first make mad" was having its illustration in Old England. Alternating with the insults as to raggedness, laziness, and depravity heaped upon the dispossessed, were demands for bludgeons and coercion; and the Russian legislation, hitherto confined to the sister island, was made applicable to the whole kingdom. The police, acting on the cue of their employers, changed their tactics of petty spydom for wholesale arrests, and plots smacking of the "Woolff and Bondurand" flavour were common discoveries.

It was during this social discord, and whilst the social contract was being challenged by simple and learned alike, that the European war-cloud, so long brooding over the Continent, burst. Two great nations, goaded on by vulture statesmen, were at each others throats, and wholesale carnage and desolation spread over their peaceful fields. England led by purblind rulers was insensibly drawn into conflict, but with another combatant. Her antagonist fitted out fleets of privateers who preyed upon her commerce. To transfer her freighting to foreign bottoms was tried and failed, for England had few friends. The American-Irish, with their burning memories of wrongs inflicted, effectually prevented the United States from rendering any indirect assistance. As a consequence her vast populations herded in the great centres divorced from the soil, and dependent mainly upon foreign supplies for food were famine-stricken, and although the propertied classes were preaching to them endurance on patriotic grounds, the spectacle was continuously before them of contractors defrauding the nation and furnishing the soldiers with rotten food and accoutrements, and even supplying the enemy with munitions of war. The trading hucksters waxed fat out of the famine prices extorted from their countrymen whose patriotism they relied on.

Alarmed by the condition of things, the wealthy classes betook themselves to the pleasure resorts yet out of the zone of foreign war. The case of the people was desperate, and in striving to suppress expression of discontent by arresting a Socialist speaker at a large meeting, the fires of insurrection were lit. The capital, denuded of troops for foreign service was only defended by a few regulars and volunteers. At the first a mass of the latter joined the people, whilst the snob clerk element brought about their speedy defeat and destruction by firing on the people. The towns and cities of the country fell one by one, sometimes without a struggle, into the hands of the people. Everywhere the Cause triumphed. Trusty messengers were despatched to Ireland, and at once the standard of revolt was raised. The thin garrisons were powerless against the onslaught, and at one fell swoop Ireland and England freed themselves from the curse of landlordism and capitalism. Strange things happened at the original seat of war, large masses of troops revolted on both sides and fraternised; the officers either fled or were destroyed, and the two peoples passed out of the valley of despair into the dawn of the Social Revolution. In the first flush of rage the English revolutionists desired to destroy the workhouse bastilles and prisons, after emptying them of their unfortunate occupants, but wiser councils prevailed and they were put to a better purpose. For the wealthy who still remained were using their money to overthrow the new regime, and they were aided by the fast returning money-mongers who had fled at the first noise of war. The people, however, through their chosen delegates, declared the old currency null and void, and issued a new one representative only of labour. Gold and silver, so long the curse of nations, were no longer used as coinage, but a base metal of no intrinsic value took their place. By a decree issued simultaneously the idlers, whose monetary wealth was thus rendered useless, were cited to appear before the local Assemblies and give account of themselves, and many haughty dames and distingué swells were charged with being without visible means of subsistence. The answers to this charge were many and curious. A local Assembly sitting was occupied with a batch of culprits who had been in their day the élite of Society.

Chairman (to first accused): What are you?

Accused: I am the eldest son of Lord Broadlands, now abroad for the benefit of his health.

Chairman: How have you got your living hitherto?

Accused: Oh, I had great expectations and an allowance.

Chairman: Ever done any work?

Accused: Boating, cricketing, lawn-tennis, and so forth.

Chairman: No trade?

Accused: Oh, dear no.

Chairman: You are allowed three weeks to choose an occupation, and as you are unskilled you will have to go the workhouse during this time. Next case!

Chairman (to second accused): What are you?

Accused: I am a stockbroker and shareholder in railways, mines, and so on.

Chairman: You have had a good education, I presume. Ever contributed anything to literature?

Accused: No.

Chairman: Do you know any trade, for your occupation is now gone?

Accused: Oh, dear no.

Chairman: I consider some punishment necessary in your case, for you are one of those who plunged the country into incessant wars in order to get your dividends; three month's hard labour. Next case!

Chairman (to third accused, an austere looking maiden lady): What are you?

Accused: I am the daughter of a colonel in the army, who died fighting for the honour of his country.

Chairman: Indeed! Where did it happen?

Accused: In Mandalay, Burmah.

Chairman: Humph! How do you get your living?

Accused: What impertinence! Well, if you must know, I have shares in some coal mines.

Chairman: Ever done anything useful yourself?

Accused: The idea of such questions. I am the greatest collector of used foreign stamps in England, and my cat has taken a prize at the last cat show.

Chairman: Anything else?

Accused: I have written articles to the Parish Magazine how to make vegetable soup for the poor on an economical basis.

Chairman: You must go to the workhouse laundry for a training. Next case!

Chairman (to fourth accused): What are you?

Accused: I am a ratepayer and guardian of the poor. Have been labour master in the union—

Chairman: Stop! Take him away and put him in the oakum shed on bread-and-water; give him his water hot!

IMPRESSIONS "ON THE ROAD."

II.

OUR carriage stops just alongside a signal-box, encased in which stands the over-worked and under-paid slave of the railway company, holding in his hand the lives of travellers. How careful many of us are lest we should be tyrannised over not only by princes and parliaments, by laws and institutions, but mayhap also by comrades and fellow-workers in the cause! And here we submit our fate to the goodwill or ill-disposition of a few fellow-slaves! One pull of his brawny hand—if he so wills it—and we run into death and destruction. Nor is it necessary to conceive the far-fetched notion of a British railway-hand bearing malice towards any one. If but his energies did flag, his watchful eye grow dim, and his hand leave untouched the lever which to pull so many times a-day is said to be his duty! Yet are there folk who cannot see how much, how everything depends on mutual goodwill and on the punctual work of public organisation!

How crowded these railroads are; how lightning-like are these vapouring monsters, chasing and shooting past one another, laden with human lives and crammed with dead and living values of exchange! Are not they right who abhor railways as abominations, prosaic and incorrigible? I am no lover of railways in their present nastiness; but I cannot help thinking that those who condemn them altogether and for all times are pouring away the child along with the bath. I find a great deal of good in them, and fancy that they could even be rendered beautiful and vastly enjoyable, if worked by enlightened spirits and for the people's benefit. What makes them so mean and detestable is their present purpose. It is because they are instruments of gain in the hands of commercial speculators that they lack beauty, comfort, and security. There will not be half the number of people travelling in socialistic communities as there are travelling now. If they do, they will mostly travel on foot, and have only their little luggage carried for them. Even now, most men and things on the railroads would not care to travel, if they were not made to; if it were not their business to hurry to and fro and change hands constantly. If goods were made for use instead of for profit, the craftsman could afford to stay at home and wait for their custom, as they did in the "good old times," where a master's brain and handiwork had only one ambition: to suit most fully and enjoyably the purposes for which they were needed.

To-day the makers of goods are seldom masters of their craft or of their tools or of their brains; they are mostly slaves of other people's money or machines. The honest, tailor of the age of chivalry would have as little dreamt of making garments for a man whose taste and whose proportions he knew nothing of as Æsop did of telling the traveller how long it would take him to reach the next village before he had seen him walking and could estimate the capacity of his step. Our modern operative seldom sees or knows whom he is working for, whom his labour is to fit or benefit; nay, the child may not yet be born whose baby-shoes are passing through his hands and through the mill at Leicester or Northampton. He helps in making shoes or clothes, not because there are people who need them (the needy are generally left without either) but because his master thought fit to invest his money in putting up machinery, which is calculated with the employment of some leather and human labour to turn out boots. These boots are supposed to find a market, and in the market a sale at a price which leaves the enterprising employer of labour a profit. As there are many who follow his example, and as each one produces without regard to his neighbour, there results a keen competition for the best position in the market. For the machines, once put in motion, cannot wait for customers, but run on without thinking and let the boots and clothes look out for themselves. These are poured in never-ceasing streams into the market, where they knock about, seeking whom they may fit in size and price, in style and quality.

With the poverty and vulgarity stricken crowd in the market-place quality and style are at a discount, and hence the biggest sizes and lowest prices are bound to fetch the gapers. To sell, then, means to be cheap, and to be cheap, production must be intensified and its means economised. This, again, means increased division of labour and the introduction of labour-saving machinery. Hence the wholesale fabrication of specialities, and the fostering of such specialities in certain towns and districts where once the machinery has been planted and the "hands" have been trained to its use. In this wise some towns are growing a population of boot-hands, others of cotton or woollen spinners, others of metal-workers, and others again of clerks and warehousemen, of bosses and speculators. This explains the restless bustle on the railroad; the ceaseless shifting of raw material from the spot of its growth to the "centres of industry"; thence in the shape of wares to the "centres of commerce"; and thence again through the agency of a host of hawkers and canvassers into the hands of the shopkeepers, the middlemen (the famous "backbone of the nation"), who retail them out to the thrice-cheated, patient and gullible consumer.

Whilst at the beginning of home industry men made things of use which they found themselves most adapted for, first for themselves and then for others who gave them their produce in return, either direct or through a medium of exchange, the workers now are the very last thought of in the distribution of the valuables they make. The object of production then was the thing of use, now it is the thing of profit. Things are of value only in so far as they are exchangeable, and are handled and bundled about from post to pillar not for the sake of the producer or consumer, but for the sake of the seller, the capitalist.

The hop which grows in Kent is not for the labourer's beer, but travels first to the broker, from whom the labourer must buy it by paying the retailer's keep and rates and taxes; and the brewery labourers in Burton-on-Trent taste little of their own brewing, but must put up with cheaper stuff brewed with polluted water. The fish caught off the South Coast, of course, runs up to London, whilst in Exeter and Weymouth you get the catch fresh from—Grimsby. The silk spinners of Macclesfield and Congleton, and the woollen weavers of the West of England, can hardly afford to buy the shoddy which their brothers at Batley and Dewsbury turn out for the toilers of this mighty Empire, whilst the shoddy-makers themselves go about in rags. The manufacture in this country of cotton for India has ceased to be profitable since the workers there need no wrappers at all, and are, therefore, most "fit to survive" the British factory-hand, and supply him with a shroud when dead.

The same principle is applied to food, which is not grown now to feed the hungry but to enrich those capitalists who force it down the throats of all and sundry who are able to pay for it. If the jolly old English roast beef had become a myth to the wage-workers of these islands only because they had converted themselves to the "eating of the green," nothing could be said; but they are treated to Australian carcasses, brought over in iced coffin-ships to prevent them from rotting and thereby losing their exchange-value. Food is kept from the starving poor and stored up air-tight, the better to bide the changing fortunes of the market. Thus the female factory-hand, who has no time for cooking, if she but owns the money, can get meals ready-made and preserved in "tins of family size, artistically shaped and labelled."

Of course, the right brand, "without which none are genuine," is of some importance (to the manufacturer); hence, you must "see that you get it." Nevertheless, although you have got it, I should advise you to make sure about your quality; it is just possible, in spite of Christian assurance and threatening hell-fire, that you have candle-grease instead of butter, and a solution of logwood in vinegar instead of wine. There is at least one place I know of out of a thousand (somewhere in the North-East of Great Britain) from where such grease is sent over to Holland, not indeed for sale, but for the sole purpose of being there branded as "Prime Dutch Estate" butter, and of being sent back again for sale all over the world as what it is not.

Thus men and wares are being hunted to and fro in burning haste with profit-making lies imprinted on their faces. And since Capitalistic Commerce is dirty, mean, and full of thievish trickery, how can its vehicle, the railroad, be clean and noble, and honestly beautiful?

ANDREAS SCHEU.

Labour is wronged and plundered in all countries. The labourer is subjected to the same economic subjection under the Czar of Russia or the Emperor of Germany as in the United States. Labour will be emancipated when the wage-labourers of the world have made common cause. The oppression of labour is international; to be successful the cause of labour must be international.—Paterson Labor Standard.

A curious proceeding is reported from Mitchelstown. It appears that there has for some time been some commotion amongst the children of the Christian Brothers and Nun Schools, because the children of an unpopular person in the town were allowed to attend the school. On the 10th inst. seven hundred children absented themselves and paraded the streets, cheering for the Plan of Campaign, and listening to a juvenile band which they had formed. Mr. Cullinan, Poor Law Guardian, addressed the children and advised them not to return to school until the children of their enemies were removed from it.

ARMIES, NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL.—The incarnation of the "patria" is in Bazaine Traitor, MacMahon Fool, Trochu Catholic, Ducrot Boaster, finally in Thiers Vampire, and Gallifet Assassin. Soldiers, "well-disciplined and obedient," drunk with brandy, gold in their pockets, march to the assault of Paris, who struggles for her emancipation, they take the barricades behind which stand their brother-workers, shoot down Flourens, Delescluze, Milliere, Ferré, and many others, and finish by killing out for a time the attempts of the proletariat. Poor gulls, not to perceive that they are killing themselves in massacring 35,000 men of the people, the people whence they too come! This is the "national army". . . See all these sleek men, well-dressed, rich, whose very coats resemble strong boxes, bankers, stockjobbers, swindlers, "bubble companies," organisers of distant expeditions, all coming and going, exchanging, intriguing to-day, governing to-morrow, commanding the slaves of the workshops while their accomplices command the slaves of the army, eating up all, monopolising, starving, stamping beneath their feet all traditions, familiar with every form of shame, trafficking with the daughters of the people, poisoning the world with their journals and writings as they poison it with their goods. This is the international army. When, oh peoples of the earth, will you realise it? When will you also have your international army? Have you not served long enough as playthings to these men who exploit your labour to-day and will cut your throats to-morrow? When shall we see the brotherly greeting and hand-grasp which will overturn all frontiers and barriers, and the abolition of all the privileges which destroy you? When shall come the Revolution which is to bring with it Social Equality?—Cri du Peuple.

DESPAIR.

Now, wife, let me out, I say!
I will strive with my fate no more.
I have travelled for scores of miles,
I have halted from door to door.

Work, work, give me work! I cried,
'Tis no matter what sort it be,
So the meed be a slice of bread
For the famishing babes and thee.

I have begged, I have sought in vain,
I have done all that mortal can;
So, wife, get thee out of the way
Of a hopeless and fearless man.

A whisper has come from the pool
That has told me how this may end
And the knife and the rope have looked Like the face of a faithful friend.

But first these oppressors shall know
That I value not limb nor life.
Let them bury their gold in their hearts—
I will dig out the hoard with my knife!

A curse on the cruel rich,
On the fat of the land o'erfed!
And a curse on all lords and laws
That stand between me and bread!

God! God! God!—nay, there is no God!
'Tis a Devil that rules on high,
For a beast may labour and live,
But a poor man must starve and die.

The dogs of the squire are gorged,
And his ox grows fat in the stall—
Thou God of the Rich I hate,
And I curse thee most of all!

BEN PRESTON.

Mr. Bright and Trades' Unionism.

FROM THE 'COTTON FACTORY TIMES.'

MR. JOHN BRIGHT has given offence to the members of the Birmingham Trades' Council, owing to the denouncing, in a recent letter to a gentleman of that town, the principles of Trades' Unionism, and averring that a workman would be better off without them than with them. Having been written to by the Council in reference to the contents of his letter, Mr. Bright says there is no condemnation of trades' unions in his letter, and that the criticism of the Trades' Council is not necessary and is not just. We read Mr. Bright's letter, and confess that we put the same interpretation upon it as the Birmingham Trades' Council seem to have done; and however much he may try to wriggle out of the real meaning of his letter, the working classes can only come to one conclusion, and that is that Mr. Bright is no friend to those who join in combination for their own improvement in the social scale, and that he judges the question merely from an employer's point of view. He was never popular with the working classes of Rochdale, and we don't know that he ever assisted the working classes in any great movement having for its object the amelioration of their condition as working men and women. We know that on one occasion when a deputation waited upon him at his mill in Rochdale respecting a dispute which his spinners had with him in respect to their wages, he took the two gentlemen who formed the deputation up a lobby, and opening a door told them to go down some steps. Having done so, he closed the door upon them, and left them in that strange place, surrounded by a high wall, over which they had to climb as best they could; and this was the only satisfaction the deputation received in regard to the spinners' grievances. This circumstance occurred many long years ago, but serves to show what kind of feelings he then entertained respecting trades' unions. We don't suppose he would treat a deputation in these days in such a cool fashion; still he would not be the individual we should expect to receive any favours from in any movement which the labouring classes got up for their mutual advancement. It is well that cotton operatives have not to rely upon men such as he to battle for their cause, and none know better than they the value of good trades' organisations; and whatever Mr. Bright may say to the contrary, his opinion on trades' unions will carry no influence with those who have to earn their bread by daily toil.

A Provincial Propagandist Tour.

Comrade Mahon's engagements in the provinces are: Feb. 17 to 25, Leeds, Bradford, Bingley, Shipley, etc.; 27, 28, and March 1, Hull; 2, Newcastle. Mahon will be glad to hear from any persons willing to arrange meetings at York, Middlesbrough, Shields, or Yarmouth.

WALSALL.—On Wednesday the 9th inst., J. L. Mahon delivered a lecture at the Radical Club, subject, "A Plea for Socialism." The audience was small but highly appreciative, and a Branch of the Socialist League has resulted. Mahon also addressed a meeting of chainmakers and others on Friday the 11th, and was well received.

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

All articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

Periodicals received during the week ending Wednesday February 16.

FACING THE WORST OF IT.

THOUGH we Socialists have full faith in the certainty of the great change coming about, it would be idle for any one of us to attempt to prophesy as to the date of the realisation of our hopes; and it is well for us not to be too sanguine, since overweening hope is apt to give birth to despair if it meets with check or disappointment. Although the oppression and robbery of the past and the present is preparing a certain revenge in the future, yet history has shown us over and over again that retribution is halt-foot; or perhaps, to put it with as little metaphor as language will allow of, great revolutions have to wait till the force which is to destroy the old order and create the new is so overwhelming that there is no chance of any real or serious reaction marring the effects of the hopes and necessities which make great revolutions.

There are two streams of the force which is creating the new order of things, and which, already visible to thoughtful persons, will one day rise into a great flood-tide of change visible to every one, and make a new world. On the one hand the system under which we now live and which is, we are firmly convinced, the last development of the oppression of privilege, is of its own weight pushing onwards towards its destruction. The energy and ceaseless activity which made its success so swift and startling are now hurrying it towards its end; there is no turning back possible, no pausing for the tide of that commerce which bears all life with it in the present; it is not only that its goal is ruin, but the goal is now within sight. Yet though the energy which is now sweeping onward to the sea of destruction cannot falter, yet it may itself create checks—eddies, to keep up the metaphor—in which we now living may whirl round and round a long time. So, that we may not be disappointed and be taken unawares, it is well to consider what these may be.

At the same time, although commercial ruin must be the main stream of the force for the bringing about revolution, we must not forget the other stream, which is the conscious hope of the oppressed classes, forced into union and antagonism by the very success of the commercial system which their hope now threatens with destruction. The commercial or capitalistic system is being eaten out by its own energy; but that energy may on the one hand create partially new conditions for it, yet, on the other hand, in doing so it will stimulate the energy which is consciously attacking it; and these attacks will be more powerful than its struggles to resist its coming fate, the eddies in the stream above said.

As for these, let us look a little closer to see what form they are likely to take.

First, the downward tendency of commerce may and probably will be checked by recoveries something of the nature of the rebounds from depression which were the rule for the last forty years before the depression of the six or seven years just passed set in, but far less complete and much shorter lived. We are threatened with such a recovery at present, and there may be some foundation for the threat. of course if it is realised we shall have plenty of discourses addressed to us of the "I told you so" kind, and the advocates of the capitalists who have any power of pen or tongue will be jubilant and noisy. We Socialists, however, need not trouble ourselves much about their joy; because such a period is sure to be fruitful of disputes between the trades-unionists and the capitalists; and it will be our business to stimulate and support the claim to a higher standard of livelihood which the brisker business and consequent bigger profits of the manufacturers will enable the workmen to make with success. The period of recovery will certainly be followed by another depression, and the discontent of the workmen will be much increased by their losing, or their dreading to lose, the advantages gained in the better times; so that after all even this apparent check to the progress of the disintegration of the present system will but lead us so much nearer to revolution by making clearer to the workers the antagonism which exists between them and the thief-class—the employers.

Such recovery as above mentioned would come in the ordinary condition of things, and would mean simply an emptying more or less of the shelves of the salesman. But recovery may come from another and more dramatic cause—to wit, the great European war with which we are now threatened. Such a war would give a great stimulus to trade while it lasted; just as if half London were burned down, the calamity would be of great service to those who were not burned out,—all this, of course, applying only to the idiotic system of rewarding labour under which we now suffer, and having nothing to do with a system in which work means production or service of some sort to the community.

But "good" as the war might be for trade, it could not last for ever; and quite apart from the more specially political results which might come of it, the time would come when some one would have to say, as Owen said after the end of the great war of the beginning of the century, "the war, our best customer, is dead."

Then would come the inevitable reaction, and what between falling prices, and crowds thrown out of employment, and the certain disappointment and disgust which would attend the exhaustion of the finish of the struggle, our present thief-society would receive a rude shake, which one might hope it would scarcely recover. But whether that were so or not, at least the inflation of the war-time would be far more than counterbalanced by the depression of the following peace. Only the most short-sighted of the capitalists can pray for war in the times we are now in, one would think, because behind the brilliant "respectable" war stands its shadow, revolution.

And yet though they may dread war, still that restless enemy of the commercial system, the demon which they have made, and is no longer their servant but their master, forces them into it in spite of them; because unless commerce can find new capacities for expansion it is all over, or will be in a very few years; the partial and brief recovery of trade before mentioned is too insignificant to be worth much notice; the one thing for which our thrice accursed civilisation craves, as the stifling man for fresh air, is new markets; fresh countries must be conquered by it which are not manufacturing and are producers of raw material, so that "civilised" manufactures can be forced on them. All wars now waged, under whatever pretences, are really wars for the great prizes in the world-market. And certainly if the countries, the chances for whose monopolisation (distant chances too) are now leading Europe into a war the end of which no one can foresee, can be opened up to commerce, and when opened up satisfy the expectations of the national pirates who are "on the account" in this matter, the dissolution of our present system may be somewhat checked. Yet, on the other hand, this very success would stimulate the cut-throat competition of the commerce-gamblers; and once more, since of their plunder they would only yield to the workers as much as the latter compelled them to yield, whatever "prosperity" might follow such enterprises, would, now that the idea of Socialism has taken root amongst the workmen of Europe, be accompanied by fresh demands on their part; and these demands again would necessarily act as a spur to the competition of the gamblers, and make the pace faster and more furious; so that perhaps even the glorious hope of flooding Central Africa and China with trade "goods" which nobody wants, will turn out when attained but Dead Sea apples to the capitalist.

These three chances of checking the onward course of capitalistic commerce to its annihilation, are the only visible ones I think:—1st. The lessening of stocks and consequent slight temporary recovery; 2nd, A great European war, perhaps lengthened out into a regular epoch of war; and 3rd, The realisation of the hopes of important new markets, which hopes are the real causes of hostility between nations. How far they might act as checks on Socialism it is not possible to foretell; but that they will not be unmixed advantages to Capitalism is, I think, certain, nor is there anything about the possibility of their happening, which need discourage us. Probably none of them would have much influence in checking the growing tendency towards the union of the workers in England. Certainly they would have no power to break that spirit of union which already exists among the great nations of the Continent.

Besides these obvious resources of the system we are attacking, there are less obvious possibilities about which one may speculate, perhaps with some profit; these more speculative possibilities point to attempts of Capitalism at avoiding its doom, which would lead to more ruin and suffering than are likely to be involved in even those above-mentioned. I have not space to call our reader's attention to them at present, so I will end by saying that our part as acknowledged and organised Socialists is, while we watch keenly the development of the causes which would lead to the destruction of the present system, even if there were no acknowledged Socialists at all, to do all we can to aid the conscious attacks on the system by all those who feel themselves wronged by it. It is possible that we may live to see times in which it will be easier than now for the labourer to live as a labourer and not as a man, and there is a kind of utilitarian sham Socialism which would be satisfied by such an outcome of times of prosperity. It is very much our business to meet this humbug by urging the workers to sustain steadily their due claim to that fullness and completeness of life which no class system can give them. The claims of non-Socialist workmen go little beyond the demand for a bigger ration, warmer coat, and better lodging for the slave; and even Socialist workmen, I think, are apt to put their claims too low, at least in this country; for, indeed, one must say with a sense of shame in one's own better luck not possible to express, that the conditions under which they live and work make it difficult for them even to conceive the sort of life that a man should live.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

MINERS AGITATION IN SCOTLAND.

GREAT DISTRESS IN LANARKSHIRE—SOCIALIST DEMONSTRATION IN GLASGOW.

REPORTS of the progress of the agitation amongst Scottish miners for an advance of wages have appeared pretty regularly in the Labour Column of Commonweal. Readers of that column are no doubt aware that about a month ago the Central Board of the Federation of Scottish Miners recommended the various districts to cease work for some four or five days with the view of bringing the struggle to a crisis and forcing the masters to concede the advance demanded. Acting upon this advice, the great majority of miners in the north and west of Scotland ceased work. As a result of this policy a considerable number of the masters yielded, and their men resumed work at advanced wages. The greater portion of the masters, however, absolutely refused to grant any increase of wages whatsoever. In consequence of this refusal the men in most districts prolonged their holiday. A fortnight ago the Board, fearing the holiday would become an actual strike, recommended the men to return to work in the meantime. This advice was rejected with indignation by the overwhelming body of the miners of the Hamilton, Motherwell, and Airdrie districts of Lanarkshire—the districts, I may say, where Socialist opinions have most deeply penetrated. The serious consequences of this resolution the men knew only too well. For many months now they had been working only five days per week, at a wage of 3s. per day—which, after deductions for doctor, powder, tools, etc., left only some 12s. 6d. per week on which to keep themselves and their families. It is obvious that on such an income the miners would have little or nothing saved to meet the present emergency. Indeed their families in many instances were at starvation's door before the strike began. Their present condition is distressing in the extreme.

Painful scenes have been witnessed in some of the mining villages. Women and children begging for food at their own doors. Little children wandering about the streets crying for bread. In some instances the shopkeepers, partly through sympathy and partly through fear of bread-riots taking place, have distributed loaves amongst the starving people. In one village a butcher distributed half a cow. The authorities, too, alarmed at the aspect of affairs, have advised the merchants to shut their shops early and barricade their windows. In anticipation of disturbance mounted police have been drafted to some of the districts.

And it is thus, in the nineteenth century in Christian Britain, that the workers must plead with their Christian masters for justice—their masters, who plunder them and toil them to death; who strip their little children and cast them naked and famishing out into the winter's cold!

J. B. G.

Since receiving the above the news has reached London of the hunger-riots at Blantyre and elsewhere in the district; but the bourgeois press is usually not anxious to give any real explanation of such occurrences, and has not done so on this occasion; therefore our communication has some interest even at this date.

On Sunday last, the Glasgow Branch of the Socialist League held a great demonstration on Glasgow Green, for the purpose of expressing sympathy with the miners on strike. The local press puts the number present at not less than 30,000. There were three platforms, at which the following resolutions were spoken to by members of the League, Wm. Small, the Secretary, and Mr. M'Munn, Chairman of the Lanarkshire Miners' Association, and other comrades and friends:—

"That this meeting of the workers of Glasgow hereby expresses its heartiest sympathy with the miners, their wives and children, in their present sufferings, and wishes full and speedy success to the resolute effort now being made to obtain an advance in wages; and that it condemns the attitude of the masters as grossly selfish and unjust."

"That this meeting is of opinion that the cause of all those who work for wages is one and the same, that the present struggle is only one incident in the world-wide conflict between the labourer and the capitalist, and that not until the land, mines, and machinery, and all means of production and distribution are held and used by the workers for the common benefit can that conflict cease, and a secure and happier social system be attained."

In supporting the second resolution, Mr. M'Munn said the present fight was not about 6d. a-day. The masters had made up their minds to fight Socialism, and he admitted that Socialistic opinions were spreading amongst the miners.

Our comrade Glasier writes:

From copies of newspapers sent you will see that our demonstration was a great success. We have allied the miners with Socialism definitely. The press reports give but a poor notion of the speeches. At the platform presided over by comrade McLaren, M.A., three cheers for the Social Revolution were given with great enthusiasm. Not a single hand at any of the platforms was held up against the second resolution, which you will observe was a purely Socialist one. Our meeting has created a profound impression, and has alarmed the bourgeoisie not a little. It is greatly to the credit of our comrades R. F. Muirhead, M.A., and Arch McLaren, M.A., that they bravely came forward and took the chairs at two platforms, as they are both well connected and run seriously the risk of damaging their academical careers. We have given our large room here up to the miners for the time being as a place of call, etc. They are in Glasgow in large numbers collecting subscriptions. We handed over to them as the result of collection £24. In great haste, yours fraternally,

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

84, John Street, Glasgow, Feb. 14.

The Scotsman states that the above sum of £24 was collected mostly in copper, which is gratifying evidence of the widely-felt sympathy with the object of the demonstration, notwithstanding the large discount which the capitalist press endeavour to make for "small, ragged, dirty boys," "loafers," and the "respectable people attracted by curiosity." The Branch also distributed 15,000 copies of a stirring, well-written manifesto, which cannot fail to do good in awakening the workers to a sense of the necessity of the Socialists' claim for a change in the basis of Society. Altogether the Branch deserves credit for the admirable manner in which the demonstration was got up and carried through. The news will comfort and encourage the Brotherhood throughout the world.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"T. LEMON AND THE S. D. F."

Our friend Sturt's letter should have been sent to Justice, as the provocation came in this instance from that quarter. If I had been less moderate and acted with less consideration for the Cause, and unsparingly exposed the "tactics" I only pointed at, it is probable that comrade Sturt's letter would not have been penned, or he might perhaps have shared in the "sore feelings" which in my case provoked the sarcasm, the use of which he deprecates. Removed as he is far from the "madding crowd," and with only partial knowledge of the case before him, he can easily perform the easy task of the candid friend.

F. KITZ.

"ABSENTEEISM."

I quite agree with G. D. L., and yet I hold by the view that if a man receive a thousand pounds or a thousand pounds' worth, it makes no difference where he consumes it. Take the first law of motion, as often expressed: "A body once set in motion will continue to move in the same straight line for ever." It is no contradiction to this law to point to bodies set in motion and then stopping. Again, the law of gravitation is not contradicted by the fact that balloons and other bodies ascend from the earth. Such occurrences merely demand further explanation, which goes towards confirming the general statement.

Suppose that an Irish landlord receives £1000 from his tenant and remains in Ireland. There he spends his £1000—returns it, so to speak, to the Irish; but he returns it for the worth of £1000—he consumes that much. Thus, instead of having a thousand sovereigns less, Ireland has so much less commodities. The landlord, by the hypothesis, does nothing; he simply consumes. How can that increase, by itself, the resources of Ireland? Suppose that instead of landlords we had bottomless pits, and that into these pits it was customary to throw rent (Ireland, however, has no pits of her own, so her rents come over to the pits of this country), would Ireland be under any disadvantage then, provided she had not the additional trouble of sending her rents a longer distance? I can see between a landlord and a bottomless pit no difference—except this: a bottomless pit may be harmless, an idle landlord cannot be.

Let us again suppose that Irish landowners remained in Ireland and spent their rents there. I am now going to speak of what would happen under existing circumstances. Ireland would then become quite a gay, prosperous looking place. Population would increase, and the increase would be of the well-to-do. All these well-to-do people, however, called into being by the needs of the landlords, would practically be creatures of the landlords. There would be just as much misery and suffering as there is now—yea, more, the voice of the suffering would never be heard, it could never penetrate the mass of toadyism that lay between it and the free air. I don't suppose Ireland is any worse off just now than England—I am sure she isn't. Perhaps the briefest way to bring this out is to imagine what the effect in England would be if our landlords were to become absentees—were to spend their rents somewhere else. One very marked effect, and about the first, would be an extraordinary diminution in the number of prostitutes (This just reminds me, by the way, of the high virtue ascribed to Irish women, which they doubtless owe to absenteeism.) Following on this diminution in the number of prostitutes would be the disappearance of all sorts of hells; then would go the oily shopkeepers—The reader, however, may be safely left to fill in the picture for himself. England would then assume its real appearance—a sepulchre; now it is a very much whitened sepulchre; so much so, indeed, that many think it a gay saloon, and exclaim—poor devils!—"Oh, what a happy place is England!"

Absenteeism is a good thing; it brings home to the commonest understanding the absurdity of landlordism; if practised more widely, would soon lead to its extinction. With all this I don't suppose any will more readily concur than G. D. L.

W. B. R.

It has been decided by the Council of the Social-Democratic Federation that there shall be a Church Parade of its members at St. Paul's Cathedral on Sunday afternoon, the 27th of the present month.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

The Strike Committee.

Since our last report the Committee have been busy in various directions. Immediately on receipt of news that Lyon had succeeded in inducing Swedish workmen to come over (by misrepresenting that there was no strike at his works) to take the place of the English glass-bottle makers at St. Helens, the Committee dispatched a Swedish comrade to meet his countrymen and explain the position to them and persuade them not to allow themselves to be used as tools by the capitalists against their English fellow-workmen, with the result that only about half of them started work.

Our comrade Mahon has also on behalf of the Committee been holding meetings and making propaganda among the chainmakers at Cradley Heath, with good results.

The strike of the Northumberland Miners has also claimed the attention of the Committee, and on Saturday a propagandist was dispatched to that district with a large supply of literature, and with instructions to remain at least a week. A report of work done will be given next week.

A supply of leaflets has also been dispatched to miners on strike at Abercane and other districts.

Funds are urgently needed to carry on this the most important of the League's work, as much more might be done if we had money to do it with.

J. LANE, Sec.

THE LANARKSHIRE MINERS.—Work has been resumed in a large number of the smaller collieries in Lanarkshire at an advance in wages, but the men at the Rosehall Collieries came out on strike on Monday. Owing to the scarcity of coal, Messrs. Baird's extensive iron works at Gartsherrie have been damped down, 1000 men being thereby thrown out of work. It is expected that the Langloan and Summerlee Iron-works will also have to damp down in the course of a day or two. (See special report.)

THE GLASS-BOTTLE MAKERS AT ST. HELENS.—The introduction of Swedish workmen into Messrs. Lyon's glass-bottle works has resulted in much local feeling. On one occasion they were roughly handled by a crowd of about a thousand men and women, and Mr. Lyon was stunned by a large glass bottle. A number of extra constables have been placed on duty to guard the Swedes, and a large force of county police has been drafted into the town.

Termination of the Strike—Capitulation of Masters.—Our Swedish delegate reports that the strike has terminated. The men have resumed work and the Swedes have been shipped back to their own country. This strike shows what the international solidarity of the workers can accomplish.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS' STRIKE.—Feb. 11.—The Northumberland miners continue out on strike, and the Union funds are about exhausted. The officials of the Union have resigned in consequence of votes of censure having been passed upon their conduct in the negotiations with the masters' executive, when they went so far as to mention a 10 per cent. reduction. The miners as a body contend that they are poorly paid, and are fully determined to remain out of the pits rather than succumb to the demand of the employers, which is a reduction of 12½ per cent. from the wages at hard or steam-coal collieries, and 7½ per cent. at soft or house-coal pits. The secretaries of the Union have issued an appeal for help. Meetings are daily held in the colliery villages.

UNITED SOCIETY OF SHOP-ASSISTANTS.—It is much to be regretted that those having charge of the administration of this society should by their flunkey demonstration in Trafalgar Square on Sunday have to a certain extent discredited the cause of their union. The shop-assistants, like the clerks, have the reputation of being a somewhat spineless class amongst the workers. Being brought into more direct contact with their employers, they seem to have acquired some of the habits of the small-souled bourgeois. But making due allowance for this, it was a little too ridiculous to proclaim their "respectability" by marching into the Square to the jingo-flunkey strains of "Rule Britannia" and "God save the Queen." This it was, and not the "roughs" as the capitalist press pretend, that damned the demonstration. The shop-assistants, if they want the support of earnest men, will have to quicken their paces and march to far different tunes.

STAFFORD—THE SHOE-TRADE.—Trade affairs are still in a very unsettled condition here. Since my last notes a fortnight ago, the lasters (excepting those engaged on weekly wages) employed by Messrs. Peach and Co. have again struck work and many of the men have left the town. The reduction which this firm wish to enforce should be 2s. 3d. per dozen, or about 25 per cent., and not 4s. 3d. per dozen or 50 per cent.; as, owing to the introduction of labour-saving, or profit-creating, machinery, the men will be "relieved" of a portion of the work they have hitherto performed. On Saturday last Messrs. Elley and Co. advertised in a local paper for a number of men to take the places of those on strike, offering from 20s. to 30s. per week. It is well worthy of notice that previous to the introduction of the machine alluded to the men could earn from 40s. to 50s. per week, and they are now "offered" the miserable pittance of 20s. This is a sample of the benefits machinery confers upon the working man. When will the wage-slaves of Stafford be prepared to say that the horrible and abominable capitalist system, which gives them the bare necessities of life while it enables their employers to live in luxury, shall be for ever swept away? How long will they be ere they apprehend "that there is no duty performed by capitalists to-day that cannot be performed equally as well by organised workmen"?—C.

Another Report.—The dispute at Harris and Marson's has been settled by the firm agreeing to withdraw the new statement, and the men have now gone to work on the old wages. It is stated that one of the "scabs" employed by the firm during the dispute is secretary of a (so-called) working-men's Conservative club in the town,—a pretty "working man"! This dispute having been settled, another occurred on Wednesday 9th at Messrs. Elley and Dudley's. These two gentlemen are splendid specimens of the unadulterated British bourgeois. The former, whose father was a workman, has set up for a country gentleman, and at his men's expense apes the territorial plunderers outside the borough. Mr. Dudley is heartily disliked by the great mass of the townspeople. His overbearing, dictatorial manners and his determination to get richer "somehow," have made his name a household word. His wife is now taking a prominent part in the beggarly sham known as the "Woman's Jubilee Offering" to "Her Majesty," and in order to increase his men's loyalty at this juncture, Mr. Dudley proposes to celebrate the jubilee by reducing their wages from 7s. 6d. per dozen pairs to 5s. and even 4s. It should also be stated that a deduction of 3s. per dozen pairs has already been agreed to by the men on account of the work done by the new heeling machine. About 50 men have decided to "come out," and though unfortunately they are nearly all non-unionists, it is hoped they will succeed. Many men now are not earning more than 5s., 6s., or 7s. per week, and in order to keep body and soul together their wives have to neglect their homes and ruin their health by working at that modern "rack" of capitalism, the "back-strapping" machine. And then the philanthropic Mr. Dudley, who a year or two ago gave a hundred guineas to the local infirmary, proposes to make a further reduction on the present pitiful wage!

BOLTON.—FEMALE LABOUR IN SPINNING ROOMS.—The strike at Lostock Spinning Mills still continues, and without much hope of an immediate settlement. Only one-third of the machinery is running.

HUDDERSFIELD.—WORK AND WAGES.—"Operative," writing to the Huddersfield Examiner, says:—In the annual report of the Huddersfield Chamber of Commerce I find it stated that "the operatives of this district have been blessed with good wages and continuous employment." As an operative, I fail to recognise either the blessings of the good wages or the continuous employment. I admit that more cloth has been produced than for a few years back, more cotton been made into warps and cops, and exported, but I deny that the operatives have received the blessings stated in the report. If we turn to our weaving sheds, we shall find considerable additions and extensions have been made during the past twelve months. Slow looms have been taken out and fast ones put in their places, but that has made no improvement in the wages or the employment of the weavers as a body. With the general introduction of fast looms a general and unjustifiable reduction of wages has taken place, for the fast loom statement for men is ignored, and only women's prices paid. At many places where they have been busy, where some have been working overtime, a considerable number of the work-people have not had above eight months' work out of the twelve. In some instances where they have had extensive orders and executed them, they have let out the work on commission, and their own looms have been standing idle. This sort of thing has been done in a very glaring manner at some places. I firmly believe that if the average wages of all weavers in this district could be got at, it would fall short of £1 per week. I say this after much careful thought and consideration. If we turn to the cotton trade, we find that almost all the firms have had slack times in greater or less degree during the past twelve months; and although through having higher speeded machinery they can turn out more weight in the same time than formerly, yet the workpeople take less wage home than before, owing to having been reduced considerably in scale price. The present piecework system, which becomes more general every year, is one of the best ever devised for grinding down the workers. Possibly and probably manufacturers have not felt the pinch like hundreds of our workers in the district have done. Their incomes have likely been as high as usual, and in the ecstasy of the moment they have inserted the above untruthful paragraph in their report. They should remember that their incomes have been wrung from the workpeople by paying small wages, and also by the iniquitous system of bating, which is very common in our mills and workshops.

FRANCE.

VIERZON. There is a new strike of porcelain-makers at Vierzon at the Lachaise establishment, owing to the threatened dismissal of one of the best workers on account of his Socialist opinions having been put into effect. On hearing of this move, all the workers agreed to strike and hold out until the "patron" gave in. There is among these men as great a feeling of solidarity as among their fellow-workers the metallurgists. At the same time, the Sieur Lachaise can hardly be said to be wrong from his point of view to attempt to bluster a little over his Socialist employés; he may well feel a little uneasy, a little suffocated in so revolutionary an atmosphere as that of Vierzon certainly is.

PORQUEROLLES.—It will be remembered that in the summer of last year a great scandal came to light concerning the treatment of the orphans employed in the "Industrial School" in this island. At present the trial of the infamous slave-drivers who direct it is taking place before the "Tribunal Correctionnel" of Toulon, and the details of maltreatment of these unfortunate boys, which come to light in the course of the trial, are, if correctly stated (which there is no reason to doubt) shocking and heart-rending in the extreme. We hear of the half-starved youngsters, too exhausted to get through their daily toil to the satisfaction of the overseer, undergoing as punishment for their "laziness," a sort of body-stretching torture under the burning southern sun, their sufferings pointed with the lash of a leather thong; or else rotting for weeks half-forgotten on the damp stones of the punishment-cells, choking in the pestilential atmosphere. The details in short read pretty much like a chapter of horrors out of one of Mrs. Radcliffe's romances, once the terror and delight of English youth. The organisation of the "Assistance Publique," which benevolently "let out" their stock of orphans to learn agriculture (with "morals" thrown in) of M. and Mme. de Roussen, is already much beloved by the Parisians for various misdeeds: to what height its scarcely enviable popularity will now attain after these disclosures of wholesale child-barter we scarcely know!

BELGIUM.

BRUSSELS.—The zinc-workers and plumbers of the Pierre establishment at Brussels have put themselves on strike owing to the directors attempting to prevent them from joining the workmen's syndicates.

CHATELAIN.—We are sorry to learn that the miners on strike in the Gouffue coal-mines have gone back to work on the same conditions as those under which they worked before the strike.

JOLIMONT (CENTRE).—A general congress of miners has been held at Jolimont on the premises of the co-operative bakers of "Le Progrès." At the afternoon sitting the important question of a general strike among the miners was brought forward and discussed. Although the delegates of the Centre opposed this proposition, a great majority of the other delegates pronounced in favour of a universal strike.

GHENT.—By an inadvertence we omitted to note last week the release of Ansele from prison, and the Socialist celebration of the same. There was considerable excitement in the town on the day of his release, the crowd gradually growing round all the approaches to the office of the Vooruit until it became almost impenetrable. The "drapeau rouge" hung from the houses in the streets, the sun came out merrily, the Marseillaise was sung (when shall we have a new revolutionary hymn, an international one, suited to the times?) Ansele and the "Social Revolution" were cheered incessantly, and the fête in short proceeded with great vivacity.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

THE Socialist movement at Lancaster is not very old yet, but it has thriven well. The first token of Socialism was a debate on the subject opened some few months ago at the "Reform Club" by the Unitarian minister of the town, our comrade E. P. Hall. Several Socialists turned up in the course of the discussion, and Hall's masterly rejoinder at the close of the debate won a few more. Some weeks ago a Branch of the League was formed, which is now doing splendid work and growing steadily. The Branch has the advantage of several good speakers among its members. I reached Lancaster on Friday Feb. 4, and on that night had a conference with the members, hearing how they were getting on with their local agitation and telling them all that would interest them about the other branches and the movement generally. A propagandist campaign had been arranged for the three following days, and large red placards posted announcing the series of meetings. The police took alarm, and made all sorts of absurd preparations. At every meeting there were several constables, a sergeant, and the chief of police. The first meeting was held on Saturday afternoon, just outside the town. There was a good and very attentive audience. Rev. E. P. Hall took the chair, and said a few words before and after the address. On Saturday night a successful meeting was held indoors. On Sunday three meetings were held: at the Quay Side, in one of the parks, and, at night, in the Market Square. Each meeting was bigger than the one before it, all of them were attended by quiet and earnest people, and, to the surprise of the police no doubt, it is generally said that the meetings were the best and most orderly that have been held in the town for some time. A meeting to express sympathy with the St. Helens bottle-makers in their struggle, and to protest against the brutal sentences on our Norwich comrades, was announced for Monday night in the Market Square. The police at last took to interfering. When the Sunday night meeting in the Square was advertised, the chief told one of our comrades that he was glad to see that we had chosen a time which would not clash with other meetings. On Sunday night, while the meeting was going on, another comrade was told by the police that we had no right to meet there without special permission from the mayor. On Monday morning the chief constable called upon me to state that the mayor's permission was needed before a meeting could be held. The chief (Mr. Ward) was very courteous, and reminded me that he was merely doing his duty, and that the town authorities were his masters. Having consulted some members of the Branch, I told Mr. Ward that we did not care about asking the mayor's permission unless it were a mere matter of etiquette, as his refusal would not deter us from holding the meeting, and that we would always choose a time which would not clash with other parties or impede the traffic; that the market places were really bits of common land, which any one had a right to use so long as they did not deter others from similarly using them. Our interview ended in the most pleasant manner—firmness and gentleness on both sides. At eight o'clock the meeting was begun. The chief constable was present with a nice little force. We were formally commanded to disperse: we formally refused. Half a dozen names were taken down, and then the police became part of the audience and listened with much attention to the address. I explained the fight which the International Bottle-Makers' Union have carried on against the importation of cheap foreign labour, and a resolution was passed which has already appeared in the Commonweal. I also gave an account of the Norwich affair, and a strong resolution was carried with enthusiasm. We then had three cheers for the social revolution, and the meeting quietly dispersed. The Lancaster campaign was thoroughly successful; the meetings were well organised, each one was larger than its predecessor, nearly four times the usual number of Commonweal were sold, and other literature went fairly well. The members of the Branch are very enthusiastic and business-like, and are sure to make the propaganda effective.

After calling at Leeds on the 8th to make some arrangements, I got to Walsall on the 9th, and lectured to an advanced Radical club. The members were very sympathetic towards Socialism; the discussion was short and sensible—as, alas! few discussions are—and the literature was taken up eagerly. I walked over to Birmingham on the 10th and attended a Jubilee meeting in the council chamber. A very foolish person who was unfortunately at one time connected with a Socialist agitation in the town got up and made a row over a proposal which no one could understand, embodied in a long document bristling with legal phraseology. This somewhat put me at a disadvantage in urging a peaceful and practical proposal which I afterwards submitted to the meeting in the following words: "As jubilees are eminently suitable times for analysing past progress and making way for future changes in a spirit of general forgiveness, this meeting suggests that a committee of five labourers, five capitalists, and five political economists be selected for the following purposes: (1) To find out why, in spite of our enormously increased power in producing wealth, the contrast between the luxurious idle class and the penurious working class still persists; (2) To find a means of abolishing these class distinctions and realising an economic system which will secure to every man a chance of earning his livelihood and prevent any man from getting a livelihood which he has not earned." This proposal was listened to with attention and suspicion, and, to the disgrace of the meeting, found no supporters. (The meeting was held at three in the afternoon, and consisted almost entirely of respectable professional people.)

BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Feb. 9, Dr. W. M. von Swartwout gave a continuation of "The Only Practical Solution of the Capital and Labour Question;" a very interesting discussion followed. On Sunday, Feb. 13th, Wm. Blundell lectured on "Starvation: Physical and Mental." He referred to the shocking conditions under which the children of the workers derive their scanty pittance of so-called "education," and maintained that the workers should combine to break down the system of commercialism and superstition with which this "education" is enmeshed. Good discussion followed. Other meetings have been attended by members of this Branch with great success. Literature has sold fairly well.—W. B. and T. E. W., secs.

CROYDON.—On Sunday, February 13th, H. H. Sparling gave an interesting lecture on the "Evolution of Cannibalism," in which he showed that the primitive man-eating still persists in the modern labour-theft of landlordism and capitalism. On Thursday, Feb. 10, a resolution expressing sympathy for Mowbray and Henderson, and condemning Grantham, was carried unanimously.—T.

GARRETT AND SUMMERSTOWN.—On Tuesday the 8th inst. our first meeting was held, when a lecture on "Socialism" was delivered by comrade Kitz. An Odd-fellows' demonstration close by, a smoking concert at a club in the village, and a certain amount of police intimidation all influenced our meeting unfavourably. In spite of it all the audience was a good one and the lecture was well received. The lecturer began by explaining the miserable fare and monotonous work that thousands must inevitably be born to with the prospect of the workhouse to die in; and showed that the only remedy was the collective ownership and control by the people of all the means of production, etc. Some questions were satisfactorily answered by the lecturer.—H. H.

HACKNEY.—On Sunday morning, the weather being bitter cold, we moved from our station at the "Salmon and Ball" to the church opposite, and there held what might be called a debate. Mr. Poulson, of the Christian Evidence Society, opened the meeting. After referring to Plato, Sparta, the Republic of Rome, the Paris Commune, and Robert Owen, stating that these had tried Socialism and found it would not work, he went on to say that the Socialism of to-day was "riot and disorder," and repeated all the ridiculous fallacies about dividing up the wealth, etc. By the time he had finished there were about 500 people present, and H. Graham replied to the evident satisfaction of the audience. H. Davis also answered some of the objections. In the evening, H. A. Barker gave a lecture on "Material and Spiritual Consolation." The "material" requirements of man, he explained, were good clothing, good housing, and good food. He showed how these things were unobtainable by the great bulk of the workers. As for "spiritual" consolation, it was too much of a flighty and unreasoning character to be of any material benefit to the workers. After the lecture we had a very lively discussion. Fair sale of Commonweal.—M.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday evening we had a good muster to hear comrade Charles, who gave a very interesting account of the "Rise and Progress of the League," showing how a few men united together in a noble Cause could in many ways assist the propaganda. Comrades Harrison and Hill also spoke, and altogether a pleasant evening was passed. We closed as usual with singing.—S. G., sec.

EDINBURGH.—On Monday Feb. 7th, in Free Tron Hall, J. A. Campbell gave a lecture on "Organism, Functions and Environment of Society," in lieu of R. W. Armour, who was to have given a lecture on "The Use of Banks." There was a fair audience.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—Owing to our great demonstration on behalf of the miners on Sunday (an account of which is given elsewhere), we had to abandon our other outdoor meetings. On Sunday evening, comrade McLaren, who had presided at one of the platforms, delivered a lecture on "Anarchism," in which he ably defined and justified the principles of Anarchy. He did not believe, however, that Anarchism could be realised until Socialism had modified the present unsocial habits of the people. In the discussion which followed, John Barlas, B.A., of the S.D.F.—who ably assisted us in getting up our demonstration—took part.

HULL.—On Sunday, at our club-room, comrade Shekell gave a lecture on "Equality," which was well received. Only one opposed, who wanted to know who would do all the dirty and disagreeable work when we were all equal. He was very ably replied to by Shekell and others. We are doing our best for the Henderson and Mowbray Defence Fund, and we have decided to keep the cards open for another two or three weeks longer.—J. D., sec.

LEEDS.—On Friday, February 11, Maguire delivered a lecture to the members of No. 7 Branch of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers on "Socialism and Trades Unions." There was no opposition, but several spoke in support. Among these was our comrade Braithwaite, who said it was urged that profit was the only incentive to production. If this be so, he was surprised that the workers did not give over producing, as it was very little profit they made out of the transaction. A number of Commonweals were sold at the close of the meeting. On Sunday afternoon we held our usual open-air meeting in Vicar's Croft. Maguire spoke on the "Work of the Socialist League." Next Sunday morning we shall have comrade Mahon to address an open-air meeting in Vicar's Croft at 11 a.m.—F. C.

NORWICH.—Good meetings were held last Sunday on Tombland in the morning and Market Place in the afternoon, which were addressed by F. Kitz, who also delivered a lecture on "The Russian Nihilists" in the evening, which was well received and discussed by the members. A good meeting was also addressed on Prince of Wales's Road by Morley and Darley. Literature sold well as usual, and 8s. was collected at one of the meetings for the Prisoners' Aid Fund. Next Sunday we commence our open-air meetings at St. Faith's and other country stations for the purpose of developing some of our latent speaking power.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE locus-pocus by which the debate on the gross jury-packing in the Irish State trials was set aside, seems to have pleased the Tory mind; and it ought to please us Socialists also, because so far as it goes it is a sign of the growing decrepitude of our great enemy, or rather the great instrument of our enemies, the middle-class Parliament. In short, the disgrace of such a scene as that of the 17th is so clear, that one is really driven to wonder that it could be cheered even by the greatest idiots of the idiotic party of the most idiotic assembly in the world.

The release of the 23,000 odd prisoners in India as a compliment to the Jubilee flunkeyism has a queer mediæval smack about it, and of itself disposes of our pretensions so often put forward to governing India on modern principles of "Justice." Indeed, to some people it will reveal depths of tyranny undreamed of before. Here is a dilemma for our Jubileeists: "If it was dangerous to the public that these men should be at large, why do you release them for the danger of the public? If you can safely release this host of poor miserable tortured people, why did you torture them with your infernal prison?" There is no answer but one: "Because we are unjust, tyrannical, muddling fools!"

The Lake railway scheme has scored a success at last, but one may hope that the bill will yet be thrown out, as such misfortunes must be averted by any means possible, as they are lasting and irremediable.

It would be hardly worth while noticing Mr. Labouchere's bad arguments in favour of the railway if they did not illustrate the anti-social temper of the ordinary bourgeois so-called Radical. Because, of course, Mr. Labouchere is always playing a part, and he is no more the brutal and stupid bagman which he posed as being the other night, than he is the virtuously indignant democrat which he plays on other occasions. He is a very smart and handy person, who has chosen the democratic side of the political game, and is determined to play his part thoroughly and without flinching. So that we can see that his conception of the democratic bourgeois involves a grovelling and sordid utilitarianism, and it is to be feared that he scarcely overdid his contemptible part in speaking as he did on the 17th.

Meanwhile, I would appeal to all Socialists to do their best to preserve the beauty and interest of the country. It is true that it is a part of that wealth in which the workers under our present system are not allowed to share. But when we have abolished the artificial famine caused by capital, we shall not be so pinched and poor that we cannot afford ourselves the pleasure of a beautiful landscape because it doesn't produce ironstone, or of a beautiful building because it won't do for a cotton-mill, and that pleasure will not then be confined to a few well-to-do people, but will be there to be enjoyed by all. Of course, as things go now, the Lake railway is not a question of the convenience of the Amblesiders, or the pleasure of the world in general, but the profit of a knot of persons leagued together against the public in general under the name of a railway company. W. M.

"Respectable" papers are exceeding lachrymose over the "incipient civil war" in Ireland and the beginnings of a rebellion that show themselves occasionally. It is so wrong of the bear to defend himself after his skin has been sold!

An emergency-man has met with his death at the hands of the enraged people against whom his loathsome services had been directed; whereupon the Spectator waxes wroth, and says: "Justice is dead in Ireland."

Justice never lived there save when it has been wrought by the people for themselves.

Dr. Croke, Archbishop of Cashel, has published a letter begging Irishmen no longer to pay their taxes:—"Payment is suicidal; and, in the presence of the actual state of things in Ireland just now, it is inconsistent besides. We run the 'Plan of Campaign' against bad landlords, and stop what they call their rent; and we make no move whatever against the Government that pays 'horse, foot, and dragoons' for protecting them and enforcing their outrageous exactions. Our money goes to fee and feed a gang of needy and voracious lawyers, to purchase bludgeons for policemen to be used in smashing the skulls of our people, and generally for the support of a foreign garrison or native slaves, who hate and despise everything Irish and every genuine Irishman."

"Who follows in his train?"

The presumptuous arrogance of the conventional bourgeois Christian came out well a little while ago at the consecration of All Saint's Church at Allahabad, when the Bishop of Calcutta quoted "Unto thy seed have I given this land," as applicable to the divine disposal of India as a British plunder-ground.

When prelates paint the deity as a glorified carpet-bagger, or missionaries couple their creed with Manchester cottons, it makes the unregenerate smile, and brings home to a Socialist how everything whether "carnal" or "spiritual," is the direct outcome of and moulded by the economic condition of society. NATIONAL BURDENS IN RELATION TO NATIONAL INCOMES.

To the thoughtful of every country the present state of Europe is most alarming. Everywhere there are rumours of wars, and everywhere there are preparations for war, and that, too, on the most gigantic scale. The European Continent is one vast military camp, adding every day to the heavy burdens the toiling millions have to bear. But there undoubtedly will be wars of the most terrible character. In all probability these will be followed by repudiations in many countries. They will also be followed by revolutions in most of the European States.

We complain in England of the enormous weight of our taxation. We complain, and very justly too, that more than two-thirds goes for war debts and war purposes. Nor can we be certain that our war expenditure will not increase. Indeed, an increase is certain to take place. But while we complain of our heavy taxation, we seldom think of the still heavier burdens that have to be borne by the peoples of the Continent. And here it must be observed that taxation must always be viewed in its relation to annual income. In 1840, it would have been impossible for England then to have borne £90,000,000 of taxation. Not only because the population was less than at present, but because our annual income was relatively still smaller as compared with the present day. It is quite true that taxation has increased faster than population, but our annual income has increased faster than both. It is true that many people think but little of the question of taxation, yet if we view the matter as we really should view it, as so much taken from labour, and from labour alone, we find it amount to a considerable sum. Thus in 1883 our total expenditure, national and local, amounted to £156,709,535, and dividing that among the working-classes, it was equal to £34 13s. 4d. for every working-class family.

But we must look at this question of taxation from another standpoint. In 1840, our taxation was only about forty-six millions, and at the present day about ninety millions. At the former period our annual income was only equal to about £19 per head of the population, while to-day it is over £35. The total at the former period being £514,000,000, and in 1883, £1,265,000,000. Our taxation, then is only about the thirteenth part of our annual income. Bearing this in mind, let us look at the case of the leading Continental States.

In 1882, France had an annual income of £965,000,000, and a Governmental expenditure of £142,000,000, being over one-seventh of her annual income. Germany in 1882 had an annual income of £851,000,000, with a total taxation of £103,753,000. Her taxation then was less than one-eighth of her yearly income. Her income was only equal to £18 7s. per head of population, her taxation £2 5s. 10d., leaving a balance per head of £16 1s. 2d. If we take Austria-Hungary, her total income the same year was only £602,000,000, equal to £16 3s. per head. Her expenditure was £76,478,000. As in the case of Germany, the taxation was nearly one-eighth of her total income. In 1882, the total income of Italy was only £292,000,000, equal to only £10 7s. per head of the population. But her taxation was over £61,480,000, being equal to £2 2s. per head, and more than one-fifth of the national income. What a condition for a country to be in, and especially Italy, for whose unity and independence so many thousands laid down their lives. If we take Russia her annual income is less in proportion to her population than of any of the European States. In 1882, her total income was £760,000,000, only equal to £9 9s. per head of population. But her taxation, £106,322,000, was nearly one-seventh of her income.

Let us take another view of the matter. In England, with an income equal to £35 2s. 6d. per head, and taxation £2 10s. 4d. per head, it leaves £32 11s. 8d. per head for all other purposes. But see how the matter stands in the other States referred to above. In France it is £21 16s. 10d., in Germany £16 1s. 2d., in Austria-Hungary £14 2s. 7d., in Italy £8 5s., and in Russia £8 6s. If taxation is heavy in England, what must it be in the States of the Continent?

Look, too, at the enormous increase of taxation as compared to the increase of population, taking the years 1840 to 1882. This is a matter that should always be kept in view. In England, the increase was from £2 to £2 10s. 4d.; in France, £1 14s. to £3 10s. 2d.; in Germany, 15s. to £2 5s. 10d.; in Austria, £1 to £2 0s. 5d.; in Russia, 10s. to £1 2s. 2d.; and in Italy, £1 to £2 2s. Taking the whole of the European States, the increase was from an average of from £1 to £2 0s. 6d.

Returning to the subject of the coming wars, and taking the five great Powers—Russia, Austria, Germany, France, and Italy, we find the total cost of their peace establishments in 1882 was £109,879,000. The annual average cost per soldier was, Russia, £35; Austria, £51; Germany, £43; France, £46; and Italy, £40. Placing their armies on a war footing, without the recent augmentations, and taking as the basis of expenditure the cost per man on a peace footing, it would raise the total cost to £312,000,000. To which must be added the cost of their fleets, also the destruction of stores, of fortifications, of property of almost every kind, the loss of trade and of commerce, to say nothing of the loss of men. We hear a great deal at times of the horrors and massacres during revolutionary periods, but while the revolutionary movements of 1848 only caused a loss of £10,000,000 and 60,000 lives, the wars between England and France, 1793 to 1815, cost £1,250,000,000, with the lives of 1,900,000 men. The Crimean War cost £305,000,000, and the slaughter of 485,000 men. And taking the thirteen wars from 1793 to 1878, we have a total cost of £3,037,000,000, and a loss of 4,410,000 men. These items represent only the direct cost and the direct slaughter. If we take the waste and the destruction of property of every kind, with the loss of trade and of production generally in those countries which were the seats of those wars, and if we add the loss to the nations by the slaughter of men in the prime of life, it is too fearful to contemplate.

Look, too, at the enormous increase of the war debts of the above Powers from 1852 to 1882. That of Russia rose from £95,000,000 to £553,000,000. That of Austria-Hungary from £118,000,000 to £458,000,000. German States from £82,000,000 to £271,000,000. The French debt rose from £221,000,000 to £912,000,000, and the Italian from £68,000,000 to £353,000,000. The debts of these five Powers rose in 31 years from £584,000,000 to £2,547,000,000. In 1882, the total European debts had risen to £4,223,416,000, with a yearly charge of £220,000,000. Add the cost of the peace establishments, £260,000,000, and the interest on capital sunk in fortifications, £50,000,000, and we have a total dead weight of £510,000,000 for war debts and war purposes. And since 1882 all these burdens have increased enormously. And what will they be at the end of the coming wars? For the people to bear these burdens will be impossible. From those burdens the people must be freed, and the revolution alone can accomplish that.

But cannot these wars be prevented? Cannot the peoples meet in their tens of thousands and protest? Yes, the peoples can meet in numbers as large as they please, and they can protest and protest again and again and as loud as they please, and still the wars will take place. Because the peoples are powerless,—powerless in every European State; powerless against a mere handful of princes and statesmen, because powerless against the organised legions of trained cut-throats; because the peoples are not yet freed from national prejudices and national hatreds; and because the peoples have yet to learn the principle of human solidarity, the brotherhood of the human race.

Yes, while the peoples tolerate princes, peers, and statesmen; while they are content to be divided into empires, kingdoms, and municipalities, they must ever remain powerless, the victims of a thousand tyrannies, crushed to the earth by a thousand oppressions. The wars we cannot prevent, but we can prepare for the revolutions which are sure to follow. We can prepare to aid them, not only by our words, but by our deeds. Let us remember the words of St. Just: "That those who make half revolutions but dig their own graves;" and let us remember also that if the revolution is to be successful it must be universal. We see the reaction everywhere triumphant, despotism everywhere in the ascendant, the tyrant exalted, the worker degraded, and this in the year of grace 1887. After more than eighteen hundred years of preaching and praying under the Christian dispensation, behold Christian Europe one vast military camp. In the midst of all our grand achievements in the arts and sciences, behold the degradation and pauperism of our toiling millions. Yes, the revolution must be universal. Neither Germany, France, or Russia can accomplish a successful revolution. A mere political change may be accomplished, but the revolution that shall ensure the supremacy of labour, that shall place the destinies of the people in the hands of the people; the revolution that shall sweep away both the Church and the State; that shall free Society from tyranny through all its ramifications, and man from oppression in all the relations of life,—that revolution must be universal if it is to be successful. Let emperors, kings, and princes have their wars, but let the peoples be prepared for the revolution that will follow.

SOCIALISM FROM THE ROOT UP.

CHAPTER XV.—SCIENTIFIC SOCIALISM—KARL MARX.

THE foregoing chapters on modern Socialists may be regarded as leading up to the full development of the complete Socialist theory, or as it is sometimes called, "scientific" Socialism. The great exponent of this theory, and the author of the most thorough criticism of the capitalistic system of production, is the late Dr. Karl Marx.

He was born in 1818 at Treves, his father being a baptised Jew holding an official position in that city. He studied for the law in the University of Bonn, passing his examination with high honours in 1840. In 1843 he married Jenny von Westphalen, sister of the well-known Prussian statesman of that name. Philosophy and political economy, with especial reference to the great social problems of the age, were his special studies on leaving the university. These studies led him towards Socialism, the result of which was that he felt compelled to decline the offer of an important government post. About this time he left Treves for Paris, where he became co-editor with Arnold Ruge of the Deutsch-Französische Jahrbücher; and he also edited the Socialist journal Vorwärts; but in less than a twelvemonth he was compelled to leave France for Brussels. In March 1848 he was driven from Belgium and fled to Cologne, where the revolutionary ferment was at its height. He at once undertook the editorship of the Rheinische Zeitung, the leading revolutionary journal, which was suppressed on the collapse of the revolutionary movement in 1849.

We should mention that in 1847, in conjunction with his life-long friend, Frederic Engels, he put forward the celebrated 'Communist Manifesto,' which subsequently served as the basis of the International Association.

After 1849 he went to Paris again, where he remained but a short time, and then left France for London, remaining there with brief intermissions till his death, which took place in the spring of 1883.

The principal part he took in political action during his sojourn in England was the organization of the International Association.

The most important among his works besides 'Das Kapital' are 'Die Heilige Familie,' written in conjunction with Frederic Engels; the 'Misere de la Philosophie,' the answer to Proudhon mentioned in our last article; '18 Brumaire,' an anti-Napoleonic pamphlet; and 'Zur Kritik der Politischen Economic,' which laid the foundation for his great work 'Das Kapital.'

The importance of this latter work makes it necessary for us to indicate the contents of the principal chapters, so as to form a brief sketch of the Socialist economy.¹

Part I. deals with Commodities and Money. The first chapter defines a commodity. A commodity according to Marx is briefly expressed as a socially useful product of labour which stands in relation to other similar useful products of labour. The value of such a commodity is primarily the amount of necessary social labour contained in it: that is to say, the average amount of labour carried through a certain portion of time necessary to its production in a given state of society. The young student must take special note that when Marx uses the word value by itself it is always used in this sense; i.e., to put it in a shorter form, as embodied average human labour. The term Use-value explains itself. Exchange-value means the relation of one commodity to another or to all others. The ultimate issue of the various expressions of Value is the money form: but in the words of Marx, the step to the money-form "consists in this alone, that the character of direct and universal exchangeability—in other words, that the universal equivalent form—has now by social custom become identified with the substance gold."

The second chapter deals with Exchange. Exchange, says Marx, presupposes guardians or owners of commodities, since these cannot go to market of themselves. A commodity possesses for the owner no use-value where he seeks to exchange it: if it did, he would not seek to exchange it. "All commodities," says Marx, "are non-use values for their owners and use values for their non-owners. Consequently they must all change hands. But this change of hands is what constitutes their exchange, and the latter puts them in relation with each other as values, and realises them as values. Hence commodities must be realised as values before they can be realised as use-values."

Commodities, then, find their universal value represented by one commodity from among them, which has in itself no use-value unless it be that of representing or of symbolising the abstract quality of value.

Chapter III. deals with the circulation of commodities under the money form. Here Marx very justly observes: "It is because all commodities as values are realised human labour, and therefore commensurable, that their values can be measured by one and the same special commodity, and the latter be converted into the common measure of their values—i.e., into money. Money as a measure of value is the phenomenal form that must of necessity be assumed by that measure of value which is immanent in commodities, labour time."

¹ We must remind the reader that we do not profess to offer more than some hints to the student of Marx. Anything approaching to an abstract of 'Das Kapital' would take up space far beyond the limits of the present little work.

This long and important chapter proceeds to discuss the theory of circulating money or of currency at considerable length and in great detail. The subject is one of such importance and with respect to which so many fallacies are afloat, that we propose to devote our next article to an exposition of its leading features.

THE CRIMINAL CLASSES OF THE FUTURE.

A RETROSPECT AND A PROSPECT.

It was ludicrous in the extreme to witness the impotent rage of the "respectables" as they were one after the other passed from the Court on to scenes of really useful labour or condemned to the same penal discipline that in the hour of their triumph they had inflicted upon their fellow-creatures. One or two languid swells whose speech had hitherto been made up of painfully aspirated "aitches," said that, "weally you know," it was quite a change. And in time they became Men instead of the rapid prigs they had previously been. It was also curious to see the unbounded indignation of titled and untitled persons whose precious dignity was infringed upon by the "low fellows" who had charge of them. Scandalous! infamous! they exclaimed. There was in truth wailing and weeping over the tasks they had sentenced others to but now had to perform themselves.

Outrageous as this treatment seemed to be to these handlers of other people's rights and possessions, yet it had been mercifully adopted as an alternative to a policy of extirpation advocated by the more enraged of the revolutionists.

The true spirit of the revolution was not displayed in these acts, but was a policy imposed upon it as a matter of self-preservation. It had however, the effect of softening many who with loud-mouthed persistency had under the old régime advocated these forms of punishment for the poor. The fellow-feeling which Shakspeare has said makes us wondrous kind, was born of the actual experience of the lot to which so many thousands of the now emancipated labourers had been condemned.

Many gave in their adhesion to the new order, and were at once set free to take part in the reorganisation going on outside. A large number were obliged to commence life de novo, for none of their previous nefarious occupations were left to them. All forms of usury and profit-mongering were abolished. The land had long since been declared common property, and was being cultivated by the free communities established in the smiling shires of old England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. These ci-devant stockjobbers, landlords, rent-mongers, and usurers, formed, in short, the army of useless mouths in the new order of things.

No recruits came from this quarter to the literary, cultured class; but from the ranks of labour, freed from the benumbing process of their rent and profit getting, were reverent students of the knowledge thrown free and open to all. The brain-worker, no longer forced to sell his work in a commercial market, met with full recognition at the hands of the communities to whose refinement and pleasure he contributed; and in no instance was there a desire shown to exact excessive tribute from the communes because of varied or singular capacity.

Inventions from practical workmen were also applied to the most laborious and repugnant tasks; and this class of labour, whilst being equally rewarded, was reduced to a minimum.

The marvellous changes wrought in the capital completely transformed it. Its hideous suburbs, the houses of the smug legal cheats, disappeared and gave place to pleasure resorts. In the centre, the monuments of cant and greed, the monstrous barracks erected by five-per-cent. philanthropists in which to herd a landless, rack-rented population, were levelled amid general acclamation. It is reported that an old, very old man, by name Alderman Lowwater, stood by and wrung his hands at the overthrow of his pet schemes for regenerating mankind and pocketing a profit as well.

The monuments of nonentities and scoundrels that obstructed and disfigured the public places were removed, with other road rubbish, and in their stead arose monuments to the heroes and heroines whose labours in science, art, and letters had liberalised thought and paved the way for the glorious and beneficial change. Applied mechanical science reduced the working day for necessities to the limit assigned it by Hoyle some years before—viz., 1½ hours per diem. Labour rendered attractive by free selection and pleasant environment, with utility as its sole impetus, produced marvellous results, that stood out in bold contrast to the shoddy goods thrown upon the markets by half-starved workers driven by the twin scourges of greed and fear to exhausting toil. No less remarkable was the change wrought in the features and comportment of the people. Freed from cankering care and the fear of starvation and punishment, their manners and looks became more in accord with their happy and free state, but the marks of the fell system so recently destroyed would take a long time to finally obliterate. And as time went on, the younger children came into the colleges and academies; they listened with wonder to the record of how in the past times idlers were rewarded with wealth and honours, whilst the producers endured cold, hunger, and insult; how they had rattled their own chains and been pleased with the music, and echoed the shibboleths of their masters; how wholesale butchers of their kind were belauded and decorated, whilst merit and invention served only to increase the gains of low cunning commercial gamblers, and moreover allowed that every additional power over the forces of nature tended but to increase their misery. With the aid of models and diagrams the filth, squalor, and crime of the past was illustrated to their amazed gaze; and whilst they uttered joyful thanks that their lot was cast on pleasant lines, where neither thief, pauper, idler, or prostitute existed, they gave a mental tribute of praise to the memories of those who had laboured for the Cause "ere the toil of strife and battle overthrew the curse of Gold."

LITERARY NOTICES.

'Anarchy' (Eau Claire Book Co., Eau Claire, Wis., U.S., post paid 25 cents) is an admirable pamphlet, by C. L. James, the "Socialist Alderman", son of C. P. R. James the novelist. It shows wide reading and intelligent appreciation of the subject, and is worth careful perusal.

In the Bombay Gazette of Jan. 21, our comrade D. Gostling has an admirable letter on "the growth of Socialism," with an account, also, of the Henry George contest in New York. This is a concession by an important journal to the growing interest taken in our cause in India.

Articles of interest to Socialists:—Nineteenth Century: "Notes and Queries on the Irish Question," W. E. Gladstone; "Scientific and Pseudo-Scientific Realism," Professor Huxley; "The Scientific Bases of Anarchy," Peter Kropotkin.

'The Irish National League Leaflets' (Irish Parliamentary Offices, Palace Chambers, S.W.; 4d. per 100, post free) are a well-written and instructive series, well worthy of circulation among people who are ignorant of the "reasoned enthusiasm" that animates the Irish people in their struggle for freedom.

'An Irish Judge on the Irish Question' (Irish Press Agency, 25, Parliament Street, 1d.) is a reprint of Mr. Baron Fletcher's charge to the County Wexford grand jury in 1814, with introduction by John J. Clancy, M.A., M.P. Coming from a judge of Baron Fletcher's standing, who, it is needless to say was neither a Catholic nor a Nationalist, the deliverance will be found to be one of the most remarkable exposures on record of the infamous oppression to which the mass of the people of Ireland have been subjected under the Union, by the propertied class and the partisans of "law and order." From the same Agency may be procured also the following pamphlets at 1d. each, all of which are worth perusal: 'The Home Rule Question,' by Mr. Sexton, M.P.; 'Facts for Mr. Parnell's Bill,' by John Dillon, M.P.; 'The Treatment of Minorities in Ireland,' by Charles Dawson, Ex-Lord Mayor of Dublin; 'The Orange Bogey,' by John J. Clancy, M.A., M.P.

'The Economic Problem of the Unemployed' is a pamphlet by William Westgarth, Member of the Council of the London Chamber of Commerce, which traces the whole of the evils, such as depression of trade and want of employment, to the "appreciation" of gold, and also lays down a plan of municipal improvements to be carried out with the wealth arising from "natural" or "unearned" increment. If Mr. Westgarth will examine the subject further he will find that, be the medium what it may, commercial competitive exchange can but fulfil its inevitable conditions, and that social use of "natural" increment would swiftly lead to social use of much else, were his suggestion capable of being carried out under the present system—which it is not!—S.

To those who read French and are interested in the genuine Anarchist view of the future Society, we should recommend a series of articles by Peter Kropotkin, which have appeared more or less regularly in the Révolution for the past year. These papers, which deal with questions which will arise after the Revolution, must be highly interesting to all Socialists, although many may not agree with the writer's point of view or his suggestions for meeting the economic difficulties which will face us (or our descendants) in the future. Still these suggestions, according to him, resolve themselves into a simple form enough, the revolutionists, namely, taking to themselves all goods, all dwellings, factories, and so forth, and taking care that no works for the manufacture of life-necessaries are suspended, and that circulation of goods is maintained throughout all countries. As he says, our adversaries will discuss these difficulties of the future, being much more fearful about them than we ourselves; we, standing so far without the threshold, can but inadequately deal with the same, and it is unwise therefore to enter too much into details, but that these difficulties will be met successfully in the time to come, there is no reason to doubt. As the writer says: "We are persuaded that when the people put themselves to the work, they will find out how to organise themselves infinitely better than we can now predict of them." Among the articles, I may mention especially those on "Les Prisons" and those on "Les Denrées" (Victuals). In short, we hope that these series will be re-published in pamphlet form (perhaps translated); for the discussion of the conduct of the Revolutionists "the day after" cannot fail to be interesting and useful.—M. M.

Bread-and-water Beecher auctioned off his church pews Sunday for 27,000 dols. Beecher hates an eight-hour man, and thinks the standing army should be brought back from the Indian frontier and used to shoot working-men who cannot buy pews in his church.—Knights of Labor.

In reply to a question in the House of Commons the other day as to whether the British Government had sent any expression of sympathy to the Italian Government on account of "the disaster which had fallen on the Italian arms at Massowah," Sir J. Fergusson said: "It would be unsuitable to offer to a great military Power an expression of sympathy on account of such an accident. We ourselves should not like, in similar circumstances, to have the loss of a detachment, which can easily be replaced, treated as a considerable disaster. The Italian Government, with whom we have so many interests in common, are well aware that they may count upon the friendly offices of her Majesty's Government." Mark the cold-blooded way in which Sir J. Fergusson speaks of the slaughter of 500 human beings. They can so easily be replaced by 500 more Italian slaves, and should these get their throats cut, or die of disease, they can as easily be replaced by 500 more. The only inconvenience to the Italian Government is the cost of transport and the loss of kit and war materials, as unfortunately, these poor devils who were killed, and who can so easily be replaced, had their uniforms and accoutrements on at the time of their death. It costs money to replace these. Compare the indifferent way that our politicians speak of the death of 500 men with the maudlin stuff that is spoken when they have to announce the death of one of their own political cronies.—H. S.

FIGHTING FOR PEACE.

OUR contemporary, the Cotton Factory Times, has an article on the Lanarkshire riots and the position of the men there which is worth noting, as showing the kind of prejudices and superstitions which will have to be removed from the minds of the workers before they can attain to that complete union and perception of the interests of labour by which alone they can meet the organization of capital on equal terms: and this is the more worth noting, as the Cotton Factory Times is an excellent paper, and really devoted, according to its lights, to the interests of labour.

Our contemporary does not seem to have understood the meaning of these riots, or the necessities of the men who made them. They were distinctly hunger-riots, that is to say the expression of the despair of men driven into a corner, dying by inches of starvation: and we may be sure that such events will, at the rate we are now going, become common and increase in misery and terror, unless the workers become conscious of their present position and its remedy: their position being to speak plainly that they have to pay the piper in the game of cut-throat competition played by their masters, who are themselves forced by the rules of the game to force their men to accept the very lowest wages possible. The result of this famine-test of wages (for that is what it is) must be such misery as we now see in Lanarkshire coupled from time to time with the incident of open revolt: the riots of the other day are a hint to the masters that the wages they now offer are impossible of acceptance.

Surely our contemporary if it had known all the circumstance would scarcely have blamed the miners for not making provision for a rainy day. Alas! it is always a rainy day with these poor people, unless when it is worse; a life of days like the three in the ballad:

"The first day it was wind and weet,
The nexten day it was fire and sleet;
The third day it was birley-banes,
Knocked the little birds' nebs against the stanes."

But what provision can be made against "birley-banes" when even the better days are so bitter?

Here are some questions for our contemporary: How much is it possible to save out of a (precarious) income of 12s. 6d. a week? If it be possible to save anything out of such a pittance without being actually starved to death, why should a man be put to such torture and degradation as this saving involves, when we all know that he actually produces more than enough to keep him in comfort, unless his labour be utterly wasted? Again, can the getting of coal be carried on gainfully in Lanarkshire? If it cannot, why is it carried on? And if there is a due gain in it, why are the getters starved?

These are the kind of questions which the working-men who profess to be organised must ask and have answered if their organisation is to be of any use: they must not fight against capitalism blindly, as they mostly do now, but be conscious of the nature of the fight, and especially must have a definite aim to end it. Our contemporary is very far from this. He says, e.g.: "A fair stand-up fight between capital and labour with no striking below the belt frightens no one. The best men win, after which both sides can be as friendly as before, with no bitter memories to cherish."

Well, well, if I had but 12s. 6d. a week as the "reward" of hard and repulsive labour, I think I might be bitter without drawing on the resources of "memory." But in fact the fight between capital and labour on the Lanarkshire terms i.e., the capitalist with his money resources to stand by on, and the miner with the three choices of 12s. 6d. a week, death, and the workhouse, is about as fair (if we are to keep up the metaphor of the ring) as the champion against a London errand boy. And again, the writer speaks cheerfully of these "fair" fights; can he possibly think that a condition of industry to which they are necessary (and frequent) incidents can be a stable one? These "fair fights" are but incidents, skirmishes, or battles in the continuous war on which all industrial society is founded at present. Like all other wars it must one day come to an end by the exhaustion of one or other of the combatants: either the workman must be subjugated into a hopeless slave, receiving such housing, clothing, and rations as it may be convenient for his master to give him (and for that matter it could not be less than the "reward" of a Lanarkshire miner), or the capitalist must disappear altogether, and his privilege of usury be a thing of the past; and that whether he be the boss of a big business, or a small shareholder in a "co-operative" store.

Now I will ask our trades' union friends which of the two results of the struggle they are fighting for? They have no choice, it must be one or the other, or indeed is there a choice even between those two results? Is not the final subjugation of the workman impossible? Even now, even when the strikers are least conscious of it, their limited and local fight is really, as I have said, a part of the great labour war: but when they do become conscious of what the end of that war is, to wit, the abolition of private property in the means of production, the inequality between the two combatants will be no longer against them, but against their masters, and the war will soon be over. On the other hand, although the end must come, yet if the workers remain unconscious of what they are striving for, it will probably be long delayed through a period fertile of misery and degradation to the workman, and terror and degradation to the master, and will be brought about at last by the mere break up and ruin of our capitalistic system involving inconceivable horrors of starvation, aimless violence, repression, and revenge.

The choice of these two alternatives gives the reason why sober, thoughtful, and peaceable men, even when they themselves are not pinched by the present system, when they have once learned the economic truths of Socialism are so eager in the Revolutionist propaganda: it is for peace they are working, not war.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

THE chainmakers of Walsall and Cradley Heath are about the hardest worked and the poorest paid slaves in this country. A strong man, working 10 to 12 hours a day, may average ten shillings a week, and out of this he must buy fuel for his little forge. The development of machinery has scarcely affected this trade at all. Chains are still made by hand, and it is unlikely that machinery will be introduced. When human machines are so cheap and so servile, it will not pay the capitalist to hire an inventor. The work is monotonous and disagreeable, and in a social system organised in the interests of the people, efforts would be made to design machinery, but as under the present system machines are brought out not to do away with disagreeable or degrading labour, but simply to cheapen the cost of production to the capitalists, there is no early likelihood of such attempts being made. Then women and children can help and compete in various ways, and hence the smallness of the husband and father's wage.

There was no time to call a large meeting, so a few of the leaders of the chainmakers got together and I explained Socialism to them. There was no difficulty in getting them to understand it. They were very quick-witted, and what was more surprising and satisfactory, very broad in their sympathies. They are now trying to start a co-operative productive society, which will be as near to genuine as can be under the present system. I advised them to carry out the project if it would better their position in the present society, but I also pointed out the difficulties which would crop up even after they had beaten the immediate employers. Their employers are really only agents or dealers. They furnish the iron, while the tools and coal are furnished by each worker. The employers in their case therefore are the smallest difficulty in the way. It is the innumerable rings of dealers through whose hands the wares pass before reaching the user that are the greatest burden to the chainmakers. It was very encouraging to see how readily these men (who might surely have been excused had they been narrow minded) grasped the truth that no one section trade of workers can gain much in struggling for its own particular interests, and that all must unite in the effort for their common emancipation.

At Nottingham the Socialist agitation is not in a very satisfactory condition. At one time there were three branches of a Socialist party there, with a heavy membership, and the town was spasmodically agitated for a few months. When this spirit of propaganda died away the place was quite neglected and the local organisations dwindled down in consequence. There is plenty of Socialist feeling in the town, but the disorganised and dilatory way in which the propaganda has been conducted, has estranged this feeling from the Socialist bodies. The cause of this state of affairs is, in my opinion, that from the first the movement had too much politics and too little Socialism in it. The social and economic aspect of the propaganda was over-shadowed by the political: the result being that a very superficial and spurious kind of Socialism was spread abroad, that died out when the election heat cooled off.

From Nottingham I went to Sheffield, where a crowded and successful meeting was held. Next week I shall give an account of the Sheffield Socialists, as it will come appropriately with a report of the opening of their new premises which takes place to-night.

Clay Cross is a slaves den of the most deplorable kind, and there, as to all the mining districts the message of Socialism is most needed. Mr. Haslam, Secretary of the Derbyshire Miners' Association, kindly arranged the meeting, which was addressed by Edward Carpenter and myself. The room was crowded with men whose appearance spoke plainly of hard working and poor faring. Although this was the first Socialist meeting held at Clay Cross the men were very attentive and eager, and seemed to grasp the points very quickly. After the meeting the general expression was that the Socialists had just been saying what they for a long time had been thinking. Arrangements have been made for carrying on a series of meetings at Clay Cross. Comrades Carpenter, Peach, and Besant, are expected to deliver Socialist lectures there in the course of the next few weeks.

What have I done to gain Mr. Bradlaugh's special good-will? He grants my sanity—a favour extended to few of the people from whom he differs. The extract which Mr. Bradlaugh quotes, and which seems to have aroused his patriotic ire, is a correct report of what I said, and is, after all, a well-known commonplace of the Socialist movement. Mr. Bradlaugh is a very careful man, and if he is going to defend the Empire as well as the "rights of property," I hope he will distinguish clearly between his Patriotism and Jingoism. Mr. Bradlaugh's habit of quoting part of what his opponents say leads to misunderstanding. I did not say merely that Mr. Bradlaugh was losing his popularity. I said that, in my opinion, he was losing popularity among the working-class. On the whole I should say Mr. Bradlaugh is getting more popular than ever, and that what he loses in the opinion of the working-class he gains ten times over in that of the middle-class. Since Mr. Bradlaugh became the capitalists' advocate, the bourgeois breast is filled with gratitude to him, and all manner of well-to-do-people—from shop-keepers to Whig Statesmen—yearn to do him honour. The English middle-class, well known for its meanness and want of backbone, is a bit surprised (as most people are) to find such a defender from among the Democrats, and is perhaps a little suspicious that he will not stick to them—let us hope there is reason for the suspicion. I don't, in the least, wish to say that Mr. Bradlaugh is consciously going against the people, but that his fierce and enthusiastic defence of the propertied class, which at present is overshadowing his work for the people, is rapidly getting him the reputation of a respectable Whig.

SOCIALISM IN SCOTLAND.

It is gratifying to be able to state that the adherents of Socialism are increasing even more rapidly in Scotland than in England. It has long been the custom of our journalists to praise the superior intelligence of the Scotch and their great caution, and in this I believe them right, and can see no stronger proof of the truth of the statement than in the striking progress of the Socialist movement there. Four years ago there existed a considerable number of Socialists in Edinburgh and Glasgow, but all of them isolated, not knowing one another, or even being aware that they had any comrades in their neighbourhood; now some of the strongest branches of the Socialist League and of the S. D. F. are to be found in Scotland.

In Edinburgh, which is the most bourgeois town perhaps in Britain, we are able to get our halls filled Sunday after Sunday by the very best class of workmen. You have simply to look at the faces of the audiences and it becomes apparent that these men are not to be trifled with. They mean business, and now that they are convinced of the necessity of expropriating their exploiters, no power on earth will turn them from their purpose. The rapid spread of our doctrines has resulted in a number of men being put up by the exploiters to defend their case. Mr. Flint, a professor in the faculty of Theology in Edinburgh, is the latest opponent of progressive ideas. Mr. Flint is a learned man, but unfortunately his studies do not seem to have quickened his apprehension. The ludicrous blunders he makes when describing what he supposes to be Socialism drive us to the conclusion that much learning has made him mad. Mr. Flint has still another lecture to deliver, and I would advise him to postpone its delivery for six months. He might take a month's holiday to draw his wits together, and devote the other five months to the study of Socialist literature. He might then be able to make a more intelligent appearance and so retrieve his position.

We learn that the Scotch branches are about to start a monthly journal to deal more effectively with local matters.

In Glasgow our branch has been particularly active. It has not confined itself to the city, but has gone into the country and distributed literature and delivered addresses. The adherents in the country districts around Glasgow are to be counted by the thousand. In the city the regular course of lectures is well attended by audiences composed of workmen and many of the middle-classes. Glasgow is not so prosperous now as it was a few years ago, and the middle-classes are beginning to see that there is truth in the statement that wealth is becoming more and more concentrated into the hands of the few. In Glasgow University we have many adherents to the cause. The intellectual proletariat is greater in Scotland than in any country outside of Germany, and they are becoming keenly alive to the fact that their position is practically identical with that of the artisans and labourers, and that therefore they should make common cause with them. At present the attention of the Scotch people is directed to the revolt of the miners; and it is satisfactory to know that the present agitation and revolt is due largely to the Socialist propaganda.

As will be seen from the reports under the head of "The Labour Struggle" in another column, the Scottish miner, after various deductions have been made, has only about 10s. a-week to feed and clothe himself and family. He gets on the average 9d. for each ton of cheap coal and 13d. per ton for best coal. Where does the difference go between the 13d. a ton the miner gets and the 16s. to 18s. the people pay in Glasgow for it? Allow 2s. per ton for cost of transport to the people's doors, and you still find about 13s. per ton of plunder to be divided amongst royalty owner, mining company, railway shareholders, commission-agents, etc. Is not the miner justified in doing all in his power to alter this state of affairs? Let us do all in our power to help them in their struggle. There are at present 41,000 miners idle in the west of Scotland alone. The east coast miners have also resolved to come out. The advance demanded is 6d. a day, a mere fleabite to the coal-owners; but these greedy vampires have pretty large stocks of rubbish on hand, which they want cleared out, and this they are now able to do at a handsome profit. The hunger-riots of the poor men and women, goaded into madness by the misery of their condition and the insult and oppression to which they have been subjected, are commented on elsewhere. What the police call "order" is now restored, which means that the miners are now starving quietly in the midst of plenty. This quiet starvation is liable at any moment to break into more riot, and so the military are still on the spot, with orders if necessary to shoot down those brave miners whose lives are daily risked in procuring the means by which their very swords and bayonets are fashioned, as well as the fire that cooks their daily rations. There is little doubt, however, that even the soldiers and police are beginning to see that the social question concerns them no less than their brothers in the field, the factory, and the mine. Meanwhile at any rate the workers throughout the country should sustain and encourage their comrades in Lanarkshire in their struggle. Their cause is our cause. An injury to one is the concern of all.

Scotch Miners' Fund.

Collected on Feb. 20, at Hyde Park, St. Pancras Arches, Hammersmith Club, and Regent's Park (per comrade Cantwell), £1 17s. 4d. Further subscriptions will be received by A. K. Donald, 122, Mercers Road, N., or J. Bruce Glasier, 84, John Street, Glasgow.

FROM THE HOUSE OF BONDAGE.

House of Commons, Feb. 18, 1877.

"Weep with me, all ye that read this little story, and know for those for whom I bleed death's self is sorry." That is to say, that after the able speech of Mr. Arthur O'Connor on the Amendment, that the condition of the Poor needed enquiry, the People's House of Commons promptly negatived the wicked proposal by two hundred and fifty or so to twenty. Surely it is time for Hob the miller to be getting his mill into order to "grind small, small." But in the meantime let every one throw his cap into the air and shout "Thank God we have a High Court of Parliament." M.P.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—There are no signs as yet of the termination of the miners' strike, the men being resolved upon holding out. The comrade who was sent down by the Strike Committee has interviewed most of the local secretaries and other prominent men in the labour movement. He reports a very cordial appreciation of the League's efforts on behalf of the workers and ready assistance in obtaining information. Several meetings have been addressed by him, and he has found a ready acceptance of our doctrines by the men. Much bitterness of feeling exists between the contending parties, as the men are becoming increasingly conscious of the injustice of their exploiters, who in their turn are enraged and alarmed at the growing insubordination of their "hands." Agitation both from without and within has produced an enormous effect, of which a curious proof has been furnished by Mr. Burt's recent action.

NOTTINGHAM—STRIKE OF ENGINEERS AND MOULDERS AT BLOOMSGROVE.—Two or three weeks ago Messrs. Manlove, Alliott, and Co., Nottingham, intimidated through their foremen to their men employed at the Blooms Grove Works that they desired them to accede to a reduction of 2s. on their weekly earning of 34s., the reason assigned being the depression in trade and keen competition. The committee of workmen met to consider the question, and sent a deputation to the head manager (Mr. Paton) for the purpose of talking the matter over with him. The deputation was courteously received, and the matter was fully discussed, but with the result that the firm could not see its way to make any concession, neither could the men accept any reduction, as the wage they were receiving was not more than the average wage paid throughout the district. As a result the firm did not enforce the reduction, but twenty-four men were discharged, all of them society men. The reason alleged for the dismissal was slackness of work. The men raised the question why, if the reduction of hands was only owing to slackness of work, only society men should have been selected for discharge. The executives of the trades' unions interested (the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, the Steam Engine Makers' Society, and the Moulders' Society) took the matter up, and after a full and careful inquiry into the whole matter, resolved to withdraw the remaining members of their societies from the workshops of the firm. A committee has been formed to look after the interests of the men, who have the sympathy and support of their fellow unionists. A hand-bill setting forth the circumstances of the case has been issued, and subscriptions can be sent to the committee at the "George and Dragon," Chapel Bar, where the committee will attend each Saturday from 6 to 8 p.m.

THE SCOTTISH MINERS' STRIKE.

The strike in Lanarkshire enters its fifth week, and there is every sign of its continuation. In some collieries the advance demanded has been conceded, the miners returning to work. These collieries are those not connected with the Mine Owners' Association. It has been resolved that the Fife and Ayrshire miners should come out and join issue with the Lanarkshire and Stirlingshire men. The miners of the Irvine district also intend to join the movement unless an advance is made. The utmost unanimity prevails.

At the Summary Court at Lanark, about a dozen men have been fined from £2 to £5 for breach of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act. The offence was "picketing."

Forty-nine men have been committed for trial for the riots at Blantyre.

The Glasgow Mail of the 19th says: "Again and again the coalmasters have been called upon to justify their refusal to give the moderate advance of sixpence a day, which the men demanded. This advance did not amount on an average to more than twopence a ton on the coal raised, and yet, short as has been the stoppage placed upon the output, the price of coal on the market has advanced six and seven shillings a ton."

The following shows what the miner goes underground for:—"Working five days in the week, at 3s. per day, his gross earnings amounted per week to 15s. From this the following deductions were made: Rent, 2s.; coal, 1s. 2d.; powder, 6d.; lamps, 5d.; pick sharpening, 3d.; check weighman, 3d.; doctor, 3d.; tools, 3d.; funeral society, 3d.; sick society, 3d.; school fees, 2d.; union, 2d.; total, 5s. 11d.; net earnings, 9s. 1d."

The Glasgow Mail is not a Socialist newspaper, and only asks in "common justice" that the demands of the miners shall be granted. It continues: "What is this pittance, we would ask, upon which a working-man is expected to maintain himself, and probably a wife and children? Granting that food is cheap, how can body and soul be kept together, and the men expected to toil in the bowels of the earth at one of the most laborious and dangerous of occupations? The mere statement of the case is sufficient to condemn the employers." Speaking of the shifts and tricks adopted by the masters to wring more profit out of the men, the editor says: "Some employers, for example, are in the habit of insisting upon 22½ cwt. of coal from their miners instead of 20 cwt. when reckoning their wages by the ton. . . . Again, scandalous injustice is sometimes dealt out to a miner under a system of forfeiture for dirt or foreign material sent up in a hutch. A man may work hard an entire day under this system, and at the end of it find that his labour has been nearly all forfeited." This rejected coal, which is absolutely stolen from the miners, is now being sold at a good price. Yet, while the coal-winners wear out their lives in the unwholesome mine for the miserable pittance of 12s. or 15s. per week, the Duke of Hamilton is permitted to levy black-mail in rents and royalties to the tune of £122,000. But the day of deliverance is drawing near. These men and women having once grasped the truths of Socialism will not be satisfied with a rise of 6d. a day on their wages, or even with the abolition of royalties, but will make common cause with all the workers in getting rid of all the idlers and extortionate so-called "organisers of labour."

The Fife and Clackmannan coalmasters and miners held a conference at Dunfermline last Saturday, the men having threatened to strike unless an advance of 15 per cent. was granted. The discussion lasted five hours, the masters first offering an advance of 7½ per cent., then of 10 per cent., and finally of 12 per cent., which the men accepted, it being further agreed that work should not be stopped on Monday as threatened. At two large collieries in the Hamilton district the men will to-day (Monday) start work on the understanding that 6d. is to be conceded, they in return giving way on the question of restricting their labour to ten days a fortnight instead of eleven. This is looked upon as likely to lead to the termination of the strike.

The news of this concession has raised the spirits of the Lanarkshire men, and it is certain that if they can hold out a little longer the advance will be given them also. Whatever the immediate result of the present conflict may be, one thing is evident, that the agitation has given quite a new complexion to the labour struggle in Lanarkshire. Subjoined is the substance of a speech delivered a few days ago by our comrade Small, at a mass meeting of the miners, which we feel sure will prove interesting to readers of the Commonweal:—"Mr. Small, in supporting the third resolution, said the struggle was not for a paltry 1s. or 6d. per day. It involved far higher and deeper considerations. It was a question as to the right of the men to live, and capital had got the military and police to combine to try to crush the new ideas of the miners. The rising thought of the generation was how did their forefathers work for years and years and died paupers in the workhouse, and yet the men they were working for stole millions and millions of money. The men before him thought their fathers were fools, and were not going to keep by their example. They were determined to share a part of the world's wealth as share for their labours. They had truth, righteousness, and justice on their side, and against these three all the powers of earth would not prevail. Let them continue the struggle, because without doubt before long the victory would be theirs, and instead of being run down by mounted soldiers and batoned by policemen, they would be able to take their position in the barracks and apprehend the employers and the landlords, and drive them off the face of the earth. He wanted to bring back to the miners of Scotland the law of Scotland, which was that the private owners of land were thieves and robbers. The Duke of Hamilton, with his £122,000 a year, was simply taking £11 a year from every miner in the Hamilton district. In the name of God, is that justice? Rise, men, in your strength, and demand that the country give justice to the men that make the wealth. Disperse quietly, men; but until you make up your mind courageously and determine to defy the law, the law will not make any respect for you. The law-makers were the first law-breakers. He was anxious to see the time when soldiers and policemen would obey the democracy of the country rather than the voices of the rotting aristocracy. Agitate, agitate; educate, educate, until they turn the tables of the country, and made the working-men rulers, and put those who robbed them in jail." The speeches of Mr. Small, miners' agent, have of themselves done incalculable good. No more vigorous and truly Socialistic speeches have ever yet emanated in this country from the official of a trades' society.

Socialism has taken root in the minds of thousands, and it will be strange if the Lanarkshire miners do not play an important part in the coming great battle between labour and capital, between the rich and the poor, the plunderers and the plundered.

AMERICA.

A union of hod carriers has been formed at Wichita, Kansas. It is reckoned the membership will be 500 strong by March 1.

The switchmen's strike in Chicago lasted ten hours, and was a complete victory for the men.

ST. LOUIS, Feb. 4.—The employés of Liggett and Myers', and Butler's tobacco factories are pushing the boycott against those firms vigorously. A large amount of their tobacco has already been returned to this city—boycotted.

NEWARK, N. J.—At a meeting of the jewellers' association here, it was decided to join the Knights of Labour in a body, forming a separate district assembly. It will be composed of jewellers, silversmiths and engravers, chain-smiths, watch case makers, and all workers in fancy metals. The association has a membership of about 6,000 persons in the United States.

LORILLARD and Co., tobacco manufacturers, of New Jersey, have thought it well to make terms with their employés. It is really a victory for the workers. There will be no reduction in wages in any department, a five per cent. increase in others, and certain minor grievances will be rectified. The 3,500 employés, 3,000 of whom are girls, stood well together for three weeks.

ATLANTA, GA.—The Knights of Labour here are rejoicing over the victory by the two Sisters Muller. They were saleswomen in Max Katz's dry-goods establishment, who, after being engaged for a year by Katz, were dismissed upon a false pretext. They sued for the year's wages, and their case was taken up by the Knights. The jury gave a verdict for their wages in full, with costs, against Katz. The Knights propose to present a testimonial to the two plucky young sisters, who have rendered a service to a thousand other saleswomen in Atlanta.

NEW YORK, Feb. 21.—An attempt to run the street cars in Cambridge, Massachusetts, yesterday resulted in a riot. A crowd of about two thousand men assembled along the track and wrecked several cars. The police, on attempting to restore order, were stoned and otherwise maltreated. Several arrests, however, were effected. It is stated that the roof of a tenement along the tramway line on the South Boston Road has been converted into a regular arsenal of stones with which the rioters will attack the cars should running by night be recommenced.

NEW YORK.—THE GREAT STRIKE.—Never in the history of industry, of labour organisations of whatever name they may bear, has there been a strike just like the present, and, whatever may be thought of some of the moves, no one, at least no unionist, can help admiring the fraternity which has prompted so many thousands of men to throw away their only chance of earning their daily bread in order that their fellow-labourers, whom they have never seen and of whom they know so little, should receive a few cents more and the organisation of which they are members be recognised. This grand spectacle, let it be remembered, is not participated in only by Knights of Labour. There are thousands who do not belong to that Order that have quit work, and there are hundreds, too, who belonged to no organisation. It may not be wise,—the end will solve that question (and whatever others say we believe it to have been a good thing), this sympathetic striking, which can have no end of possibilities, but it demonstrates to the world that the working-men are ready to sacrifice much for their fellows, that the obligation they have taken is binding and that money cannot induce them to forswear themselves.—John Swinton's Paper.

During the present miner's strike in the West of Scotland, and accompanying destitution, a request to come to the worker's terms as to wages was met with the reply, "You have not yet eaten your children." "Grass" for the workers, it will be remembered, was the advice of a certain Frenchman. But this other man is not a miserable vegetarian. On the contrary, he would have the workers increase their standard of comfort by the practice of a sort of new Malthusianism.—G.

TRAMPS.

(ANONYMOUS. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

WITH a child on her arm—and in rags—and the trace
Of her tears and her trouble deep-scored on her face—
A woman is standing to beg in the street ;
Sore-distressed is her heart, and sore-weary her feet.

She totters along to the rich man's door ;
He stands on his own soft-carpeted floor ;—
"See, lounging about, as they love to do,
The rascally, idle, beggarly crew !"

"Kind sir, have compassion, and give us bread ;
On a shutter my husband came home to me dead ;
For the terrible cog-wheel had caught him fast,
And his ribs were smashed, and he breathed his last.

"When still he was living, no happier life
Than our's could be found for a man and his wife.
O then we had clothes ; yes, and then we had bread ;
But the terrible cog-wheel—and now he is dead.

"Three little ones fatherless, helpless, forlorn,
And the fourth that ere long will an orphan be born,
All unfriended must struggle with hunger and woe,
And it may be with infamy—what can I know ?

"He was careless, the coroner's jurymen state ;
But the man in your factory met with his fate.
I am helpless and poor, and my husband is dead.
Have compassion, kind sir ; give his little ones bread.

"O think of the winter—'tis now at our door—
And pity the children. You surely have more Than millions of money, so rich must you be ;
O do not be angry ; take pity on me."

See, the heart of the rich man is touched by her woe ;
To the drawer where his cash-box he keeps does he go,
Gives the woe-begone woman—a guinea !—nay,
He gives her a farthing, and sends her away.

Free Speech in Danger—A Month's Imprisonment.

J. P. Allman, a member of the Socialist League, was charged on Monday before Mr. Hannay at Worship Street Police Court with causing an obstruction by placing a form on Sunday 20th inst. at 8 p.m., at the corner of Audrey Street, Goldsmith Row, Hackney, and addressing a meeting therefrom. The police-constable said that he saw the prisoner standing on a form addressing a "mob o' pipples" of about 150 or 200. Mr. Hannay: "He wasn't preaching from the Gospel?" P. C.: "No, your washup, he was talking Socialism." He went on to say that a neighbour, Mr. White, of the "Goldsmith Arms," had complained of the annoyance. Allman asked him whether he would swear that he was standing on a form on a small four legged stool. Mr. Hannay: "It does not matter what you were standing on. Do you admit standing on a stool in the roadway?" Allman: "Yes." Hannay: "That's sufficient; that was an obstruction." P. C. said he asked prisoner twice to get down and he refused to do so, saying that he intended to do his duty; he was then taken into custody. The road was twenty feet wide. Allman asked him if he saw any carts or passengers obstruct the way. P. C.: "There was no carts, but some passengers found it difficult to pass." Allman: "Are there any present?" P. C.: "None." Allman: "Why didn't you take some names? You failed to do your duty in not doing so." Mr. Hannay, interrupting Allman, who wanted to call witnesses: "There is a law which I can put into force to prevent you calling witnesses. I have the power to decide the case forthwith." Ultimately he allowed H. Graham to be called for the defence—the chairman of the meeting at which the obstruction was caused—who stated that he called on Allman to address the meeting previous to their usual indoor meeting, and that Allman had only spoken two or three minutes when he was arrested. The usher here told Graham that he had said enough. An inspector then interrupted: "This person [Graham] was selling the Freethinker." Mr. Hannay said he could not waste the time of the court, and was about to close the case, when Allman pleaded for permission to say a few words in defence. Mr. Hannay: "Oh, you can say what you like, so long as you don't waste the time of the court." Allman pointed out the injustice of the police attacking only Socialists and no one else; and that it was only when a few working men bound themselves together to point out to their fellows how they were robbed that the ruling class put this old law into force. There were hundreds of meetings held every evening, not by Socialists, that really did cause obstruction, that were never interfered with, which showed the partiality of the police. Meetings were held three times a-week by a ranter five yards from where he was arrested for speaking, but the police only looked on. Mr. Hannay, who had several times interrupted, said that he only had to deal with the case before him and not those of other persons who hold meetings, and that a person placing a birdcage on the pathway was causing an obstruction. He here asked the usher whether Allman had offended before. Usher: "Yes, your worship; he was fined 40s. at Dod Street and fined at Stratford—constables are in attendance from both places to prove the previous convictions." Mr. Hannay said under those circumstances he would inflict the full penalty of 40s. or a month. As our comrade Allman specially requested that the fine should not be paid, he is now in Holloway Jail expiating his heinous offence. Before being sent away, some members sent him in a good dinner; and the amount that would otherwise have been paid into the hands of the police will be given to him on his release. The Hackney Branch intend to hold a meeting on Sunday, probably in the Broadway, in order to call attention to this and other difficulties under which Socialists labour in carrying on their propaganda.

JULES VALLES.—The anniversary of the death of Jules Vallès was celebrated at Pere-Lachaise on the 17th inst. Séverine and all the staff and friends of the Cri du Peuple, together with representatives of other Socialist groups, assembling in considerable numbers round the tomb of the founder of that journal. Several addresses were delivered over his grave, which was covered with offerings of immortelles and natural flowers.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

Closing of Library.—All members of the Socialist League and others who have borrowed books prior to Monday, February 21st, are earnestly requested to return same to Librarians on or before Monday, March 7th. Members are notified that unless this be complied with, Rule III. (relating to fines) must be enforced, and defaulting members suspended from Library privileges. The Library will be re-opened on Monday, March 21st. (The Librarians will be pleased to acknowledge presents of Socialist books lately published).—LENA WARDLE and WM. BLUNDELL, Librarians.

Lessons in French.—It has been thought advisable to start a class in the French language. Comrade Victor Dave has kindly volunteered his services as teacher. The first lesson will be given on Tuesday, March 1, at 8 p.m. All those desirous of joining the class are requested to send their names to the secretary, H. A. Barker, 13, Farringdon Road, E.C.

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—At our business meeting on Friday, Feb. 18th, W. Utley was proposed and seconded to fill the vacant place on the Council caused by the resignation of W. Chambers. A new secretary will be appointed next business meeting.—L. W.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Feb. 16, Wm. Morris spoke on "Medieval England." He maintained that the feudal serf produced but little to his lord, whereas the modern workman produces for his master a state of luxury of which the old lord of the manor never even dreamed; that the coming change will mean the end of mastery and the triumph of fellowship. A very interesting discussion followed. On Sunday, Feb. 20th, D. Nicoll lectured on "The Charms of Civilisation." Other meetings have been attended during the week by members of this Branch. Literature has sold fairly well.—W. B. and T. E. W., secs.

CROYDON.—On Sunday, February 20th, J. Macdonald lectured on "Socialism from a Workman's Standpoint." He pointed out that although art, literature, music, etc., were good things in themselves, they all sprung from, and were secondary to material well-being. Socialism shows working-men why they are badly off, and indicates the only means whereby they can become better clothed, better housed, etc. For this reason alone, apart from any idealism, Socialism should obtain the allegiance of all workers. The speakers logical exposition and humour were greatly appreciated. Sale of literature and collection good.—A. T. GARRETT and SUMMERSTOWN.

On Tuesday the 15th inst., T. E. Wardle spoke on "Socialism" to a fairly good audience, and was well received. Several questions were satisfactorily answered. Harrison and Gregory carried on the discussion. Several members have been enrolled, but unfortunately we are at present homeless, the police having persistently threatened the publican till he has been forced to deny us meeting any more.—H. HILL, sec.

HACKNEY.—On Saturday last we had a social evening, a large number of members and comrades of the S.D.F. being present. On Sunday morning, at the "Salmon and Ball," H. Davis succeeded in keeping an interested audience together, inclement weather notwithstanding. The evening arrangements were upset by the arrest of our comrade Allman, reported in another column. Received with thanks 1s. 6d. from H. Charles for benefit of Club. The sale of Commonweal is increasing. On Wednesday next we open our station in the Broadway, London Fields, and should be glad of speakers to assist.—H. M., sec.

MITCHAM.—At an open-air meeting on Sunday morning at Mitcham Fair Green, comrade Harrison stated result of deputation to Croydon Board of Guardians. They have ordered soup and bread for the men forced by the system around them to pay the penalty of breaking stones, so we have done some good. In the evening in our club-room, comrade Morris lectured to a very large audience on "Monopoly," and met with an enthusiastic reception. Eden, Harrison, Gregory, and others took part in the discussion. We closed as usual with singing. Four new members made.—S. G., sec.

BRADFORD.—On Sunday evening, Feb. 20, J. Mitchell read a paper on "The Basis of Capitalism" at the Royal Oak, Shipley. Two Radical opponents were replied to by T. Maguire and the lecturer. Mahon, who came in from Bingley towards the close, also addressed the meeting.—C. H., sec.

EDINBURGH.—On Sunday morning, Robertson, Baillie, and Rodgers, of the S.D.F., and Tuke walked out to Niddrie. After distributing bills advertising the miners' demonstration to be held next Sunday, and some Socialistic literature, we held a meeting of miners and made a good impression, our audience promising that they would make every effort that the demonstration would be a success.—C. W. T.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday, with the assistance of Hamilton Branch, a meeting of miners was held at the Low Quarries, Hamilton. On Sunday evening, in our Hall, Carlton Place, Glasier lectured on "Socialism in Scottish Song." He showed that the conception of life reflected in our older lyrics was a truly social one, healthy and joyous, and that sentiments of social equality were frequently expressed in them.—J. B. G.

HAMILTON.—A very successful meeting was held on Feb. 17th, in Patons Hall, Chapel Street. Comrade Glasier and Mr. John Barlas, and McCulloch of the S.D.F., delivered stirring addresses, urging the miners present to stand firm and not to rest content with the trivial concession of a 6d. advance on their wages, but to organise for the complete emancipation of labour. On Saturday afternoon, an open-air meeting was held at Low Quarry, when about 1,000 miners were addressed by J. B. Glasier. Little groups of miners afterwards continued to discuss Socialism. A great many handbills have been distributed.—W. M.

HULL.—On Sunday, Feb. 20th, R. Muir lectured on "Land Nationalisation." In the discussion, Teesdale and other speakers showed that the lessening of taxation under the present system did not benefit the workers, but simply enabled the masters to compete more favourably with foreign countries. Nationalisation of the land without the machinery, etc., would still leave us slaves of the capitalists.—J. D., sec.

IPSWICH.—We took the opportunity of a visit from comrade Kitz to hold two outdoor meetings on Sunday, which were well attended. Our comrade gave two very interesting addresses, which were much appreciated. The secretary announced that Annie Besant would lecture in Ipswich on March 9th under the auspices of the Branch, the subject being, "What Socialism is." A lot of literature was distributed.—C. R.

NORWICH.—On Sunday, Tochatti delivered three addresses in the open. In the Market Place at 3, between 2,000 and 3,000 persons were present, and cheers were given for our comrades Mowbray and Henderson, also for Mr. Cunningham Graham, M.P., for his Socialistic speech in the House of Commons. 10s. was collected for the Defence Fund. At 8 p.m., Tochatti lectured at the Branch offices on "Radicalism and Socialism," and was listened to with marked attention. A good discussion followed, in which comrade Councillor Crotch took part. We intend during Tochatti's stay, to push our work forward in various directions. Tochatti will visit Lowestoft on Thursday. Three new members made.—T. M., sec.

THE COMMONWEAL

The Official Journal of the Socialist League.

VOL. 3.—No. 60.

SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1887.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

NOTES ON NEWS.

"It seems almost too monstrous to contend that self-defence is a crime; that organised resistance to organised exaction is an offence against the moral law." So says United Ireland in speaking of the Plan of Campaign.

But that contention, so fiercely made, has done great good. It has forced upon popular notice the question of "people v. privilege," and where that is debated who doubts the result?

The longer that the fight is carried on by the Government and their parasitic protégés against the people of Ireland, the further will it advance the revolution and the less battling will be left to be done "next time."

That the people are moving along may be seen by the reports of the Dublin unemployed demonstration. It is quite evident that the workmen who formed the deputation did not regard Home Rule as settling everything.

The only political event of the week worth any notice has been the Burnley election, which, although not so important as represented, is at least a good sign of the breaking-up of the unreasoning prejudice on which the Tories rode to victory at the last elections.

One of the worst parts of the modern commercial war-making for profit and the competition between nations, is the constant perversion of ingenuity in inventing new and still newer engines of destruction.

Every fresh rifle or heavy gun adopted by a nation means not only the enormous waste of labour in making the new arm, but also the absolute loss of all the labour once put into the older weapon.

Anyone of a speculative turn may profitably indulge it nowadays by trying to reckon out the exploitation represented by the expenditure upon re-arming the European armies.

The Spectator says: "A correspondent sends us the proposal of M. Albert Tachard for ensuring the safety of Egypt. It is to entrust the country to a Swedish, Belgian, or Swiss force, under the orders of an International Commission, which would keep back the Soudanese and put down internal rebellion, and then to retire. Our correspondent does not seem to detect the immorality of the proposal. It would arm the Pashas with the irresistible strength of civilisation. They could extort as they liked, secure that the European force would put down all resistance. Burke impeached Hastings for that very crime, and it is the one charge upon which he was entirely in the right. If we grant European strength to Asiatics, we must enforce obedience to European ideas." Would our contemporary or somebody explain what is the exact or approximate difference between the "morality" of European and Asiatic ideas?

I have seen more than once Mr. Jones, the manager of the London Co-operative Society, quoted as saying that capitalists will be glad to allow labour to use their money for nothing on the condition that the principal shall be secure. Here is another case (with a vengeance) of "Good wine given away for nothing—to-morrow"? Meantime will Mr. Jones explain how these too sanguine "capitalists" propose to live while they are neither buying victuals with their money or being paid for the use of it? Let us take, for instance, the poor-widow-small-shareholder of whom we have heard so much: will she send her money to a co-operative society and accompanied by a letter couched in such terms as these: "Kind gentlemen, I send you my little all, and trust that you may find it useful; to me it is no longer so, since I am told (and believe it) that people can now live without either working, begging, or stealing; therefore pray send me no dividend, but whatever profit you make of it by employing people to work and taking from them a part of what they produce, keep for yourselves with the blessing of the widow and the orphan." I wonder what her next letter would be like.

Levi Lawson's stockjobber sheet, the Daily Telegraph, had one of the most idiotic leading articles on Feb. 23rd, anent the German elections that was ever penned. Had Levi hired a street sponge pedlar to write it nothing more silly could have been the result. Berlin is said to be "a hot bed of anarchism" because it returns Socialists to represent it. This is much as if we were to say that Levi is an honest man because he puts quack advertisements in his paper. Some London workingmen will have something to say about "the atrocities of the Communists" on the 17th inst., which will make the enlightened editor, who has the cheek to pose as the mouthpiece of English sentiment, shiver.

Another of Levi's hirelings feels indignant because certain Socialists kept their hats on in St. Paul's last Sunday. Surely it is well known that the Lord commanded the children of Israel to appear covered in his tabernacle, and when Levi goes to the synagogue he keeps on his cylinder. Why, then, this abominable hypocritical rant about the wickedness of men keeping their hats on in church? Because such rant pays as well as the quack advertisements.

LAW AND ORDER IN GERMANY.

THE ELECTIONS.

For several days all eyes have been turned to Germany. Peace or war was supposed to depend on the results of the elections. The anger of Bismarck, the man of blood and iron, was to be appeased at the ballot boxes, and the press is jubilant at the triumph of the Government. True the Government is sure of a majority for the Septennate. It may be true, too, that the Government will be able to secure a majority for most of its measures. But its majority may not be a permanent one. And above all, the triumphs of the Government will not disperse the war clouds of either the West or the East. Those clouds will become more dense, till the almost countless legions are flying at each others' throats. In Germany, as in the other European States, the throne and the altar make war on the people. The principle of absolutism is there arrayed against the liberties of the people. In the councils of the empire the principle of despotism rules supreme. The heaven-anointed emperor with his heaven-born chancellor are more powerful than the forty-seven millions of the German population. Many people cannot understand why the Germans, with manhood suffrage, cannot break the tyranny of both emperor and chancellor; why they cannot destroy the tyranny which there prevails. It was a favourite though a foolish saying of O'Connor, during the Chartist movement, that he did not fear the Crown so long as the power behind the throne was greater than the throne itself. But the throne is always and everywhere a danger, and allied, as it invariably is, to the altar, its power becomes almost irresistible. In Germany the power of the Crown does not depend on the German people. The chancellor and the ministers do not depend on the Reichstag. They are appointed by the emperor, and are responsible only to the emperor. Under such a system there is war between the throne and the people. It is a war of principle, and can end only by the extinction of Imperialism or the subjugation and degradation of the people. The struggle will be a severe one, though it may not be a long one. In Germany there is no question of ministerial responsibility, the emperor declaring (Jan. 8, 1882) his determination "to personally direct the policy of the Government."

In Germany as in other States, there are of course the same political parties, based upon the same class distinctions and of class interests. Nay, the political parties there are so sub-divided that it is difficult to say where party lines begin or where they end. But taking the two extremes of imperialism on the one hand and social-democracy on the other, all that lies between is mere political cant, political expediency, and political humbug. The German National Liberals are very much like Liberals everywhere, moderately revolutionary in relation to imperialism, but decidedly reactionary in relation to the mass of the population. Their great strength lies in their pandering to the mere national or patriotic feeling, so easily aroused among the unthinking of every class. They have gained largely by the elections, while the New German or Free Trade Liberals have been nearly extinguished. The Socialists have also suffered, and no wonder. When we consider the warlike spirit evoked by the action of the Government, the language of Bismarck, of Moltke and others, with the campaign on the part of the official and semi-official press, the Government, in its desperation, accepting even the intervention of the Pope,—what wonder that the Government should have triumphed over all the more advanced sections of the population.

We must bear in mind, too, that Berlin and other great centres are subject to what is termed the minor state of siege, where the police rule with a rod of iron and almost with unlimited power and authority. That is a matter that must never be lost sight of. Then with regard to the Socialist party, all the force of the Government was brought to bear against them. And not only the Government, but all the imperialist or patriotic parties too. Six of the Socialists returned are in prison. But the action of the Government has been mean as well as tyrannical. We read, from Berlin, Feb. 20: "The Socialists are displaying great energy and activity, but their work is of necessity done in the dark, in consequence of the repressive measures which the Government and the authorities are employing so unsparingly against them. Their leaders have been expelled from many places where they have come forward as candidates, their meetings dissolved, and the literature they have endeavoured to spread abroad confiscated." And that is "law and order" in Germany. Again, we read: "The police have been closely watching the printing offices, and the moment the Socialist manifestoes appear they are seized upon, either at the time of issue or subsequently when they arrive, sometimes in large bales, at the different railway stations, for distribution." What an example of "law and order"! What a splendid display of imperialism! What a grand manifestation of despotism! What a glorious recognition of the sacred rights of property! Yet, notwithstanding all this tyranny, all this despotism, and all this plunder on the part of the authorities, the Socialist vote shows a very large increase. Taking Berlin, the vote has gone up surprisingly. In 1871 it was only from two to three thousand; in 1874, 31,522; in 1884, 68,582; and in 1887, over 95,000. The total number of voters on the register is 314,000; the Socialist vote is therefore a very disturbing element amid the triumphs of the reaction.

In Berlin, the Socialist vote shows an increase of over 26,000 over that of 1884; and in Saxony, although all the seats have been lost, the Socialist vote has increased about 22,000. As showing the spirit evoked by the action of the Government, the press, etc., there was a tremendous vote recorded for the Government by a combination of all the other parties, giving an increase for the Government over the vote of 1884, of over 240,000 votes. And this in Saxony alone. And it was the same in other parts of the empire. But 60 second ballots have to take place, and in from twelve to sixteen of these Socialists are sure to be returned.

The people of Alsace-Lorraine have shared the same fate as the Socialists, in so far as the tyranny and compression of the authorities have gone. Threats, domiciliary visits, expulsions, suppression of newspapers, and imprisonments, all have been resorted to by the government of blood and iron. Yet the population of the annexed provinces refuse to be Germanised. Like the people of Ireland the Alsace-Lorrainers prefer to struggle and wait, and are resolved to resist the process of German absorption.

The German semi-official press complains that the Germans in America have sent funds and words of encouragement to their Socialist brothers at home. Also that French Socialists have sent words of sympathy to their down-trodden brothers in Germany. On this it exclaims, Socialism is international! Undoubtedly, it could not be Socialism worth the name if it were not international. But so too is imperialism, so too is despotism, so too is priestcraft. And when Bismarck invokes the aid of the Pope to crush his political opponents, the Socialists have a right not only to receive, but to invoke the help of the people of every clime to enable them to fight and ere long to crush the crowned Rascality which now rules supreme over forty-seven millions of people.

While every one must rejoice at the progress of the Social Democrats, we must not shut our eyes to the facts of history. Manhood suffrage may not always exist in the German Empire. France won manhood suffrage in 1848 (not to go back further), and lost it when it became dangerous to the "classes." Rome won manhood suffrage in 1848-9, and lost it by the intervention of the "Catholic Powers." Look at German history too in 1848-9. What was then won was very soon lost. The same in other States. And in Germany to-day manhood suffrage may be swept away. "Put not your trust in princes" is an old saying, and the same may be said to-day with regard to Parliamentary majorities.

To Socialism belongs the future. All the imperial scoundrelism in the world cannot prevent it. All the mercenary legions to-day at the command of the despots cannot long preserve the reign of triumphant Wrong. From the icy regions of St. Petersburg to the sunny plains of the South, the tyrants, steeped in crime, are trembling on their blood-stained thrones. But for Socialism to conquer the future, to win the final triumph, it must become more and more revolutionary. Not only must it war against imperialism, but every ism that is opposed to the principle of eternal right, of eternal justice. It must war not only against the despot on his throne of blood, but the tyranny of majorities, whether elected or not. It must war against the tyranny of the State as well as the tyranny of the Church. It must recognise the rights of the individual as supreme above all other considerations.

Socialism must also be international. The principle of usurpation is universal in its application. It is international. The alliance of the despots is nothing new. It exists to-day, and can only be combatted by an alliance of the peoples. Our modern commercial system is also international. It is capable of universal application. Our modern financial system is international and organised, and supreme in all the States of Europe and America. And Labour too must become international, must be organised on an international basis ere it can triumph. It is, then, for the international Socialist revolution for which we must organise, for which we must struggle, and for which we must fight. The present is the age of Might, the age of Cant, the age of Plunder. Let us inaugurate the age of Right, the age of Truth, the age of Equity. Success to the Revolution, social and universal.

REFLECTIONS ON WINTER.

At this season well-fed indolence frequently finds excitement and pleasure, for when snow is on ground and ice o'er lake, in games and gambles it finds delight. But whether snow or ice be there, from its warm and comfortable drawing-room it can view with satisfaction its happy lot, and thank its stars for not being as other men are, cold, miserable, and hungry. The contrast is striking, even if it be not artistic between this picture and that of the miserable victims of landlord rapacity surveying the smouldered ruins of the mud-built hut they once called home—

"Ah! little think the gay licentious proud,
Whom pleasure, power, and affluence surround,
They who their thoughtless hours in giddy mirth,
And wanton, often cruel riot waste.
Ah! little think they, while they dance along,
How many feel this very moment death,
And all the sad variety of pain!
How many sink in the devouring flood,
Or more devouring flame! How many bleed
By shameful variance betwixt Man and Man!
How many pine in want, and dungeon glooms;
Shut from the common air, and common use
Of their own limbs! How many drink the cup
Of baleful grief, or eat the bitter bread
Of misery! Sore pierced by wintry winds
How many shrink into the sordid hut
Of cheerless poverty!"

These, the words of James Thomson, strikingly portray the selfish brutal indifference of the privileged class to the misery of the proletariat. The thousand joys with which luxury is surrounded render life one continuous whirl of pleasure; the thousand woes that are the workers make his life one unceasing round of hardship. How the keen wintry blast pierces through his thinly and oft ragged-clad body and strikes him cold and empty-stomached, and makes him wonder whether life be worth living! The snow-clad landscape, with ruddy-setting sun, hath to him no charms; he may burn in the sunshine and freeze in the cold, that hollow-headed pomp and pride may shield its gentle head. But 'tis the bloody sweat of the toiler, the slave of indolence, that smoothes its way. The lot of the toiler in winter is hard indeed, doubly hard, for then his misery intensifies, and work and food are harder to get than in the warmer seasons. Frozen out, no work, no bread. No matter how much he desires to work and to live by his labour, unless his masters allow him to, he cannot, must not, but must remain what he is, a starved and wretched being. Even when his masters do will that he shall work, he must do so that he may create for them more wealth and for himself only a little food. To what depths of degradation and misery does the inordinate greed and abominable selfishness of privilege consign the larger part of mankind! It has been asserted by some pious and reforming persons, that though privilege be greedy and selfish, the fact that it is so is a good thing for the workers, because it supplies millions of them with employment. To work hard and eat little of the good things of life is the lot of the most fortunate of the workers to-day; to work little, if at all, and eat much, that of privilege.

Winter to the poor is a veritable hell without the fire, and the wonder is that they do not oftener resort to acts of violence in order that they may satisfy their wants. Hungry men seldom, if ever, reason—it would be strange if they did; and to expect an unnatural law will check their desire to satisfy their natural wants, and make them view with equanimity their miserable condition, is foolish and ridiculously absurd. They want food, and in winter above all seasons, plenty of it. It is no use to tell them to wait for better times, till summer comes or trade revives; they must have food or die. Many a hungry-bellied, anxious father tramps the streets to-day in search of work, that he may feed the hope-gone and woe-become wife and children he has left behind in cold and miserable hovel. And this in a period of progress marked more than any other by man's triumph over the forces of nature; marked in that it gives or should give him greater comfort, and take from out of life much of its sting. But despite this increased power over nature, despite the comparative ease with which the wants of man may be satisfied, the struggle for existence has become harder and the means of subsistence scarcer, so far as the worker is concerned.

But he is growing discontented with society as it is, and the recent riots in Scotland and elsewhere show this in manner unmistakable. Coercive laws, the weapon of a corrupt and rotten society, may be used to crush out the discontent, but its spirit is ever burning, and burn it will and must with greater intensity as time passes on, though coercion be used to stifle it. There are some persons who think that it is possible to prevent the spreading of discontent by quoting statistics designed to prove that the position of the worker is a good one. Statistics can be concocted to prove anything, but they will never convince the starving worker that he is well fed, or that his patched garments are good clothes. They may, however, rid the minds of the comfortable classes of the uneasiness occasioned by the fear that their enjoyment would be curtailed were the proletariat so terribly hard up and ill-used. But figures cannot alter facts. Then let comfort and privilege open their eyes, or they may be painfully opened for them. The worker is opening his, and is beginning to see that neither anti-quoted political shibboleths or gradual and imperceptible reforms avail him anything. The erstwhile champions of the workers interests may not like the aspect things are assuming, but whether they do or no, their combined efforts to hoodwink the worker, to blind him to his real interests, will prove abortive.

Bleak, cold, and desolate is the outlook for thousands of our fellows to-day: would to wintry winds they could say with Tell, "Blow on, this is the land of liberty."

HENRY A. BARKER.

SOCIALISM IN THE PROVINCES.

THE "Sheffield Socialists" is an independent local society, which by steady work in the propaganda has achieved wonders. On Monday February 21 new premises were opened in Scotland Street, one of the busiest thoroughfares in the town. A large shop serves the double purpose of coffee-house (the Commonwealth Café) and lecture hall. The lecture hall holds about 200 people, and is comfortably fitted up. At the opening meeting Edward Carpenter presided, and reviewed the history of the Socialist agitation in Sheffield. I gave an account of the progress of Socialism in the provinces, and was followed by Maguire from Leeds, who gave a short exposition of Socialism. Comrade Furniss then spoke. He was the first preacher of Communist principles in Sheffield, and is held in high esteem. He is also one of a small Communist group which works and lives in community at a place near Sheffield. They have had a couple of quarries for some years, and have now also taken to agricultural work, their first attempts at farming being aided by a bit of land placed at their disposal by Ruskin. The little community works in the greatest harmony, and the members are not at all narrow in their views, Furniss especially working for the Cause on broad revolutionary lines as well as practising such part of its principles as is possible under the present system. The next speaker was the Rev. Chas. Peach, Unitarian minister. He roused a good deal of enthusiasm by his frank comments on a brother minister who had been attacking Socialism from his pulpit. It seems that a lecture on "The Path to Socialism" which I had given a week previously had roused the wrath of the Rev. Mr. Bland, and led him into making statements about Socialism which no doubt were more the result of ignorance than malice. Several Socialist songs were sung during the meeting. The room was crowded, and the people very enthusiastic. The Sheffield Socialists have now splendid opportunities of making headway with the propaganda, and in Sheffield there is certainly room for it. A more disfigured and disreputable looking town never existed. No wonder old Ruskin rails at it. Its ugliest features, too, are carefully arranged, just to impress the stranger, at the entrances to the town, particularly round the railway stations. The ugliest prospect in all the world is a view from a bridge in Leeds, but next to this stands grimy, sordid Sheffield, with its narrow, steep, slimy streets, abominable buildings, waste-ground spots glaring here and there like great sores, and endless infernal clatter and din of machinery. Heaven never smiles on Sheffield because it never gets a chance—a dense cloud of dirty smoke always intervening. Of course the inhabitants are proud of their town: let us hope their pride will lead them to revolutionise it.

The propaganda in Leeds, Bradford, and the surrounding districts goes on steadily and hopefully. The conditions make the work very difficult, and the pecuniary resources are very small; but in spite of these disadvantages a good deal of progress is being made. We had a very pleasant and business-like gathering of the members of the Leeds and Bradford Branches on Saturday February 19. On Sunday morning a meeting was held at Vicars Croft, in Leeds. This place is the customary resort of the town talkers, and like such places generally, is not very hopeful. In the afternoon a useful open-air meeting was held in Bradford, and at night I addressed a meeting of workmen at Bingley. The Bingley audience was very good, and it seems a hopeful place if it can be persistently worked. On Tuesday night a second open-air meeting was held at Bingley; and on Wednesday night a second open-air meeting at Bradford finished the series. The Branches in Yorkshire are doing excellent work with their limited means. In Leeds they are trying to secure premises for a permanent office and club-room, and it is to be hoped they will soon succeed. The members of the Branch, however, are all workmen, and many of them very ill off. Any of our friends who have a subscription to spare could not put it to a better propagandist use than to forward it to the secretary of the Leeds Branch.

J. L. MAHON.

February 28.

It is not true that capital and labour compete in fair and open field, any more than it is true that an iron-clad war vessel, with heavy ordnance, would compete in fair field with a wooden frigate, equipped with the material in use thirty years ago. Capital is gold-plated, and carries too many guns for unprotected labour. The intelligent capitalist makes the laws affecting master and servant, which the uneducated labourer must obey, but has no effective voice to alter. The capitalist does combine, and has combined, and the result of this combination has been an unfair appropriation of the divisible fund.—C. Bradlaugh, 'Labour's Prayer.'

WEALTH-CREATORS.—Wherefore is it, then, that the creators of all wealth are the poor? That poor man and labourer, which is wealth-creator, are synonymous terms? That those whose labour first causes the earth to yield its produce, and then converts that produce into every necessary, every comfort, every convenience, every luxury, and every means of enjoyment, and yet, though thus consuming next to nothing of all the riches they create, and still continuing to create riches, still continue to be, proverbially, the poor? . . . The distress of the labouring classes is a phrase so commonly in use that we hear it without surprise; yet, when translated into the language of literal truth, what a strange anomaly does it convey—the poverty of the creators of riches!—Mrs. London.

TO ARMS! TO ARMS!

THE cry be "War"; who talks of peace?
Be scorn and pity on his name
Who strikes not with us to release
His hearth from dread—his land from shame.
From spire to spire the shout be caught;
Clash back fierce peals of wild alarms;
What ho! a battle must be fought;
Up, all men, up! to arms! to arms!

Ha! where's the foe? And do you ask?
O blind and foolish! O thrice blind!
Awake! arise! not hard the task
A host in every street to find.
Hark! hear their murmurs! how my thought
Their muttered wrath—their hate alarms!
What ho! a battle must be fought;
Up, all men, up! to arms! to arms!

In brutish ignorance, squalid want,
In savage filth, in godless crime,
In cursings that for vengeance pant,
And hate and hate and bide their time,
We front a host that scares my thought
With boding fears and wild alarms.
What ho! a battle must be fought;
Up, all men, up! to arms! to arms!

Woe to the land whose cry is "peace",
When peace's hour is gone and past;
Woe! woe! in storm and wreck shall cease
The doting dreams that could not last;
"Too late—too late!" my trembling thought
That oft-heard cry, with dread, alarms;
What ho! a battle must be fought;
Up, all men, up! to arms! to arms!

Up, all men, to the true men's ranks,
To do the work that must be done;
To earn the eternal future's thanks,
Of all our ills, to leave not one!
Crime, ignorance, want, despair, no thought
Of sloth, while one our age alarms;
What ho! a battle must be fought;
Up, all men, up! to arms! to arms!

CHURCH PARADES.

THE "parade" at St. Paul's, on Sunday, was certainly a success from the point of view of the promoters. It was a demonstration, and an effective one in a sense. But the propriety of church parades is a question upon which divergent opinions may be, and are, held by Socialists. On the one hand, it is argued that any sort of "demonstration," irrespective of its importance or character, is productive of good. On the other hand, there are those who, like myself, fail to see the special gain in inducing a body of 100, or 150 men to waste a fine Sunday morning, on which useful Socialist meetings might be held, within the four walls of a church. Surely there should be either one of two things. If it is intended to "demonstrate" against the present organisation of society through that "religion" (so-called) which holds such a prominent place in it, then the only logical procedure would be to go in such force to the "place of worship" selected, as to be able to supplant the parson and convert the quondam "service" into a Socialist meeting. But to proceed to church with the determination to "sit out" the morning performance with all the air of devout worshippers, I must confess seems to me to be a somewhat aimless proceeding. I do not think the logical alternative referred to would be worth its "candle" of subsequent prosecution, at least at present, so my opinion of "church parades" is "don't!" E. BELFORT BAX.

PLUNDER AND POVERTY.—"BRYANT AND MAY LIMITED.—According to the report for the year 1886, the net profits added to the balance brought forward were £82,943. From this has to be deducted the interim dividend at the rate of 17½ per cent. per annum, leaving available for distribution £47,943. The directors recommend a dividend for the second six months at the rate of 22½ per cent. per annum, carrying forward £2943. January 1887." Think of the poor wretches out of whose blood, tears and sweat, this monstrous profit has been drained! Is it "survival of the fittest" that capitalist vampires should fatten on the misery of the poor? Surely savagery and cannibalism were preferable to the civilised commercialism of to-day.—B.

The Marquis of Salisbury justifies the coercive measures of his Government in Ireland, because—he says with amusing audacity—"the Irish National League is an organised system of embezzlement." What does the Marquis call the gang of individuals to whom he belongs himself? Whence and how does he get his enormous revenue? This reminds us of the burglar who called the policeman who took the stolen goods from him a thief. Let the most noble and august Marquis be informed that the Irish National League is trying to stop embezzlement; and if the people of Ireland, as well as other countries—including our own colony—had only sufficient common-sense, Salisbury and the like vermin would have less audacity. A man that toils not is a thief or a beggar. Lord Salisbury does neither toil nor beg; ergo—Our Commonwealth (Adelaide).

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

"SOCIAL EXPERIMENTS."

I WAS introduced a few months ago to a grey haired old man, as a "real live Socialist," whereupon he told me that he had been an ardent Socialist as a young man, and still admired the theory, but experience had taught him that however good it might be as a theory, it was made impossible in practice by the weaknesses of human nature. When questioned as to how he had become so certain of this he went on to tell me that, as a young man, he had joined Robert Owen and his company, who formed themselves into a Socialist Society, but that it eventually broke down owing to the selfishness of the people and to the growth of petty jealousies among them. What he saw in that experiment had convinced him of the impossibility of putting Socialism into practice until there should be a complete change in human nature. This is but a typical instance of an idea which is very widespread, that Socialism has been tried and has failed, and that if we have a new form we ought to try it, and not ask the people to believe in our idea till we have proved it to be a success. I therefore think that a few words on the question of Social experiments may be of some use.

It will be convenient to divide our experiments into two groups; those which aim at forming separate communities, chiefly self-supporting, and those which aim at merely introducing some form of co-operation into a single branch of industry. Let us take the first group and see what answer we can give to the question so often asked, "Why can't you make a small society succeed on Socialist principles?" First, then, we must notice that no small society can be completely Socialistic while it is surrounded by a large world of competitive life; unless it is to go in for a perfectly simple life with very rude implements and very poor methods of production, it must of necessity be dependent upon the outside competitive world for a very large quantity of the goods it requires, and hence must itself do a large amount of work for the competitive market. This reason alone has seemed to many quite enough to foredoom to failure any attempt to form a community, unless religious enthusiasm and celibacy should be brought in to help. The next point I would notice is, that in a Socialist community the sharp and clever men would not be able to raise themselves above their fellows by large acquisitions of material wealth. This would be a very good thing, and in a completely Socialistic state of society would not seem at all a hardship; if they desired special respect and consideration from others they would turn to the more worthy way of obtaining it, namely, by doing something to deserve it. But in a small community surrounded by competitive life they would be constantly made discontented by seeing how much distinction they could get in the world outside, not by doing something worthy of it, but by the much easier way of using their sharpness to get wealth. Now, although Socialists do believe that human nature on the whole is good enough to make a happy communal life possible, if unnecessary temptations are taken away, still we do not think that it can stand the strain of any great amount of temptation to better self easily at the expense of the community, and therefore the fact of a society such as Owen's breaking up on account of the weakness of human nature does not prove that a complete state of Socialism or even Communism is impossible.

One other remark is often made on this matter about which something may be said, it is this: "If you Socialists, a body of picked men, considering yourselves intelligent above the average, all believing in your theories, and many of you really enthusiastic about them, if you cannot make a Socialist society succeed, how can you expect anything but failure when you come to have to deal with a society the majority of whom never think for themselves on any subject, and have no enthusiasm for your belief?" In answer to this I would venture to submit that the very fact of the Socialists being to some extent a picked body makes them the least fitted to form a happy community. In what way are we Socialists picked? Well, to be a Socialist nowadays a man must first have enough discontent with his surroundings to look for something better, hence we are a discontented lot. Now, a number of discontented people are not likely to live very happily together. A certain proportion of them in a community is most valuable to prevent a dull contentment with evil surroundings. Discontented people, like all others, have their work for which they are specially suited, but it is not to form happy communities. Again a Socialist must have considerable originality in thought, sufficient strength of will, and a good deal of reliance on his own opinion to embrace new ideas and disregard the authority by which the old claim his allegiance. Finally, he must have the bump of pugnacity somewhat largely developed, to enter on a contest with all the forces which are arrayed against him. Again I repeat that such men are exceedingly useful to fight for a new idea, or a fresh reform, and to prevent a society from remaining where it is by the mere force of its own inertia, but I very much doubt whether they are fitted to live by themselves in a small community. We are often disheartened by the apathy of men, but a community of men who all had their ideas, and were all bent on converting their neighbours, would be only a little better than the Kilkenny cats! These reasons, I think, are enough to justify us in refusing to start a small sample society of Socialism.

We next come to the group experiments with a more confined aim, co-operative societies or associated homes. The more thorough-going co-operators have hoped that their efforts would lead on to a condition of universal co-operation or Socialism, but unfortunately too many of their rank and file value chiefly the advantages which they themselves get from their society at present. It has been hoped by some that they would be able to turn all manufactories into co-operative works, gradually, and then by a federation of all these works under some communal control to bring about Socialism. This is all very good if it can be done, but I fear it is hopeless. Co-operative production has shown already where its weakness lies. There does not seem to be any difficulty in producing good articles, it is only when they have to be sold in a competitive market that the difficulty arises; in other words, co-operative production setting out to destroy competition is prevented from getting a fair start by the effect of the competitive surrounding. I cannot here go exhaustively into the difficulties of co-operative production, but will hope in a future article to prove more fully my general statement that co-operative production shows no signs of succeeding in the attempt to make all industry co-operative instead of competitive. Hence we must not look to it to solve the social question. I now come to the last point upon which I want to say a few words. That is about the Socialists' attitude towards various kinds of social experiments. I have already expressed pretty strongly in the Commonweal my objection to wasting time on mere palliative measures, but these social experiments are rather a different question. In times of great movement in social matters, such as we are now passing through, there are sure to be many experiments tried. I think we are sometimes too ready to believe that anything which does not quite agree with us is set going on purpose to deceive the people. Now I am more inclined to look upon all these experiments as our valuable allies, and am sure they will help to prepare for a more complete change when we are in a position to make one. I do not mean that we out-and-out Socialists should leave our propaganda work to make experiments; by no means, our work is clear, we have to make people Socialists; but then there are many who do not see quite with us, and if they will only make experiments we ought to be very glad of such valuable allies. Most of us, of course, know that any system of communal work and enjoyment can only be practicable when the majority of the people wish for that sort of life; no system of Socialism can possibly work when a great number of the people prefer the excitement and gambling of a competitive life. Now, where it seems to me these experiments are of the greatest use, is in spreading abroad a spirit of community, in teaching, if only a few, how to work and live more on a co-operative basis. If these experiments can effect this much, they will be doing so great a work that we should be fools to throw cold water on them, even if we do not spare any time to help them.

Those who are teaching the working-women to combine and co-operate, though they are not likely to improve their lot materially or over a wide area, are still making it possible for Socialism to come in its due time by educating the people and spreading the sentiment of community amongst them. Another advantage of all co-operative societies in country districts is that they are about the only means of propaganda likely to do much good. If every country district had a small communist society, such as exists near one of the northern towns, there would soon be a body of opinion in the country to support us even greater than there is in the towns. Such a society not only educates the members and those who come in contact with it in communal work and life, but is a centre of propaganda more adapted to the needs of the country than a branch of a society would be. To convert country people, one must live with them and spend a good deal of time on the process, gradually educating them to new ideas by constant conversations and explanations, they are not so readily converted by a speech or two as the towns people.

To sum up I would say let all who are firmly convinced in their minds that nothing but Socialism will really confer lasting benefit on the people do their best in whatever ways are open to them to convince as many more as possible. But when we see others who are not so firmly convinced and who may still hope to do something by co-operative experiments, let us rejoice that they are really helping on the cause by educating the people and spreading the spirit of brotherhood abroad, and are making it easier for the great revolution which will realize our dream of a society based on mutual helpfulness.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

FOR OPINION'S SAKE.

Edward Leggatt, a carman, has been discharged from his employment because of his being a Socialist. His employer, J. Davis, bedding manufacturer of High Street, Whitechapel, had no fault whatsoever to find with him as to the way he discharged his duties, and until he discovered that Leggatt was a Socialist he was well satisfied with him. He now regards the man who holds views sympathetic with his class as an extraordinarily dangerous individual. Mr. Davis is prepared to give a good character to Leggatt, but he declines to employ a man who may stir up discontent among his fellow-workers.

We are constantly told to be moderate, not to preach the gospel of revenge, but it will be difficult indeed to persuade men to be moderate who not only have been robbed in the most abominable fashion, but who from the very moment that they hold opinions which might bring about a better state of society are persecuted and forced to join the ranks of the starvation army.

OUR IMPRISONED COMRADES.

C. W. Mowbray and Fred Henderson, of the Socialist League, sentenced at Norwich Assizes, Jan. 20, to nine and four months' imprisonment respectively.

Jas. Allman of the Socialist League, sentenced at Worship Street on Feb. 21, to one month for "obstruction."

During the week several meetings have been held in London and elsewhere on behalf of our Norwich comrades. Some of the London Branches of the S. D. F. have also waited upon their local M.P.'s to try and get questions asked in Parliament upon the case.

On Saturday a very successful concert took place at the Club Morgenröthe, Princes Square, in aid of the Prisoners Fund.

THE "THRIFT" DODGE.

Frances Willard says "the central idea of the labour question is, not so much how to obtain higher wages as to make the most of the wages already received." This profound assertion lets the disturbed Christian millionaire employer down very lightly again, after the digs and hits labour agitators, Knights of Labour, "ignorant discontented working-men," etc., have given him, and is very soothing to his troubled soul. After all, then it is a matter not worth mentioning, how great or how small a proportion of the results of labour the producer gets, the central idea; the key to the problem is how the labourer uses the pittance that is granted him. The "disturbed Christian millionaire employer" may grind wages down to microscopic proportions if the employé will but use his microscopic share properly and judiciously, the question is settled, there is no labour question. The troublesome fact, that over two million men earn no wages whatever, and thousands of children are being transformed into dwarfs, demons, and idiots at starvation wages, can be pushed to one side for the present, it is presumed. Only get rid of agitation by putting the working-man at his wits end how to live on less than he does now, and the trouble is over. And so the apologists go on, year after year, and find many followers. And every reason but the right one is eloquently urged as the cause of poverty. Anything that will throw the blame on the miserable victims themselves, and allow the easy-living to go placidly on in the old way that has always worked so well for them, is submitted to the people. Anything but to say outright, "the people are robbed, the privileged classes are stealing their wealth from the producers of it." What the poor man does with the little that is left him cuts very little figure in true economics. We want the stealing stopped!—LIZZIE M. SWANK in Knights of Labour.

A CRAVEN RULER.—Dispatches state that the Czar of Russia is exceedingly afraid of the Nihilists, and lives in constant dread. Now this is really too bad. The Nihilists should not be too severe in their persecution of this unfortunate man. What though he does send thousands of their friends and loved ones to the mines of Siberia and the dungeons of the Neva? What though he does tear fathers from their children, wives from their husbands, separate brothers and sisters, murder, pillage, and destroy? What though his minions maim, torture, and outrage helpless prisoners of either sex, and commit the foulest crimes in his name? He must not be annoyed. His nerves must not be disturbed. He must live the life of ease though all his subjects may bow their heads in agony and grief. The craven coward! Let him tremble in his luxury. The curses of his people should ring in his ears, mingling their harsh notes with the cries of his victims, until madness or reason gain the victory over his terror-stricken mind. He deserves no sympathy. Brutal in his life, he deserves the fate of a brute. Sentiment is wasted in such a cause as he represents. Let him but do justice, and our comrades will render justice unto him. Until he does, the struggle will go on to the bitter end, and history furnishes abundant facts from which to predict the inevitable result.—The Avant-Courier.

THE SCOTTISH MINERS—GREAT SOCIALIST DEMONSTRATION IN EDINBURGH.

ON Sunday afternoon a demonstration organised by the Edinburgh Branches of the Socialist League and the Social-Democratic Federation took place in the Queen's Park, to express sympathy with the Scottish Miners. The Scottish Leader, which gives an excellent report of over four columns, says: "Not for many a day have the green slopes of Arthur's Seat been so packed with people—certainly not since the memorable demonstration in 1885, when Scotland spoke its last decisive word for Reform, and so enfranchised the agricultural labourer. . . . There were some thousands of the best class of working men; crowds of miners from the Lothians, with close-cropped hair and faces washed as clean as a generation's encrustation of grime would permit. The rough element was entirely wanting." There were three platforms, at which stirring speeches were made by several comrades belonging to the League and the S. D. F., as well as by Mr. W. Small, secretary of the Lanark Miners' Association, Mr. Bulloch, President of the Mid and East Lothian Miners' Association, and others. A sympathetic telegram was received from Mr. Cunningham Graham, M.P., apologising for his absence. "At each platform there were two resolutions proposed, seconded, and adopted by acclamation. The first set forth, 'That this meeting of the workers of Edinburgh and district hereby expresses its hearty sympathy with the miners, their wives and children, in their present sufferings, and wishes full and speedy success to the resolute and determined effort now being made to obtain an advance in wages, shorter hours, and improved conditions; and that it condemns the attitude of the masters as unreasonable, grossly selfish, and unjust.' The next was: 'That this meeting is of opinion that the cause of all those who work for wages is one and the same, and that the present struggle is only one incident in the world-wide conflict between the labourer and the capitalist; and that not until the land, mines, and machinery, and all means of production and distribution, are held and used by the workers for the common benefit, can that conflict cease, and a secure and happier social system be attained.' In order fully to appreciate the meaning of these resolutions, it is to be borne in mind that in Scotland alone there are between 60,000 and 70,000 miners, of whom about 30,000 are located in Lanarkshire, the remainder hailing principally from Ayrshire, Fifeshire, and the Lothians. In Lanarkshire the men have returned to their work discontented, and in Ayrshire the 7000 miners on strike have been recommended to go back to the pit 'in the meantime,' and pending the result of the forthcoming Conference. It is more than hinted—and the tone of the speakers bore out the inference—that should that Conference fail, a national strike will ensue. In the west country wages have fallen as low as 3s. per day, while in the east the rate varies from 3s. 9d. to 3s. 11d., for eleven days' work in the fortnight. It was pointed out that a miner, while he got only 4d. or 6d. for raising a ton of coal, paid 6s. to his master for it at the pit-mouth if he wanted to give warmth to his family; that the fines and charges imposed upon him in a day were often more than the total amount of his earnings; and that the net result of all this was starvation to the men and unlimited wealth to the masters, who, in many cases, spent their ill-gotten gains abroad in gambling, or at home in luxury. 'In fact,' said one speaker from the west, 'unless the miners have their grievances redressed, they are determined to make a desperate movement which will shake Scotland from one end to the other.' This observation evoked general cheers. Another speaker—he was from the home counties—averred that there was 'not a stone in the houses of the master miners but had been sealed together by the blood and muscle of the slaving miners.' When the speaking came to an end shortly after four o'clock, the great crowd melted as quietly as it had formed. Before it dispersed, however, and throughout the afternoon, collection-boxes were carried round, into which sympathising persons dropped, chiefly in pence, nearly £12. This sum, it is understood, will be handed over to the Scottish Miners' Federation, whose headquarters are at Glasgow, to form the nucleus of a strike fund, in view of what may happen in a not distant future."

The Skye Crofters have been released and quietly smuggled back to their homes, so as to avoid a demonstration. They have several weeks of their two months' imprisonment yet to run.

THE BLANTYRE RIOTS.—Six more men have been arrested, charged with being concerned in the riots. They have all been committed to prison with the exception of one, who was liberated on account of his youth.

About 500 men engaged in Palmers' Shipbuilding Yard, Jarrow, turned out on strike against an obnoxious overseer—"a ninepenny Jack," as Henry George calls them. The men held a meeting; sent a deputation to the heads of the firm; and resumed work on the understanding that the obnoxious individual was to be removed.

Mr. Gosselin, the Secretary of Legation at Brussels, reports that "a scheme is now on foot for exporting to England the smokeless Charleroi coal, which, the promoters consider, may compete profitably with the Cardiff coal in the London market." It is also interesting to know that the Belgian colliers have resolved, or rather the Socialists of Ghent who lead them have resolved, to declare a general strike towards the end of March. Both sides are now busy preparing for the struggle.

Not among trades'-unionists alone is the pressure of "industrial depression" felt, but also in the ranks of unorganised labour the hunger-competition flourishes. Some idea of the dearth of employment at the present moment may be gathered from the fact that there are 1000 applicants for the post of head-porter to the Hon. Society of Lincoln's Inn. The salary is £150 per annum, with rooms in the historic gateway in Chancery Lane, and among the applicants are many former officers of the army and civil service, as also professional men.

The first Printer's Union of which any record can be found was formed in London in 1810, its object being "to correct irregularities and to bring the modes of charge from custom and precedent into one point of view, in order to their being better understood by all concerned."

Organised labour not only seeks to emancipate woman from wage slavery, but it aims to clothe her with the right of suffrage. The Knights of Labour so declared in their recent Convention at Richmond. A meeting of women suffragists the other day adopted the usual whereases and raised its plaintive voice against the oppression of the sex, but made no allusion to the action at Richmond. It must be inferred therefrom that the professional equal suffragist doesn't want to be "emancipated" unless it is handed to her on a silver platter by the kid gloved gentry.—Labour Signal, Indianapolis.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

The miners of Lanarkshire have been compelled through dire want to resume work on masters' terms, which are, that a Conference of masters and men take place in a few days. It is, however, almost certain that if the masters' terms are unfavourable the entire miners of Scotland will come out on strike simultaneously.

A mass meeting of miners of districts adjoining Glasgow was held on Glasgow Green on Wednesday afternoon last week. Some 500 miners were present. Cunningham Graham, M.P., Mr. Small, J. Bruce Glasier, and others, addressed the meeting. A resolution pledging the miners to maintain the struggle against the despotism of Capitalism was carried with great enthusiasm.

TO PRISON FOR "INTIMIDATING."—At Sunderland, on the 18th inst., thirteen men were charged with intimidation at the glassworks of Messrs. Greener and Sons. The firm had employed men from Gateshead, the local men having refused to work on the Monday. The works were invaded by the defendants and other men, and taken possession of, and the managers of the departments assaulted. Four of the defendants were sent to gaol for three months, four fined £5 and costs, or six months' imprisonment, and the remainder bound over to keep the peace for six calendar months.

At a Conference of the West Lancashire miners held at Wigan, the following resolution was passed:—"That this Conference views with much dissatisfaction the replies received from the employers as to an advance in wages. That in consequence of the refusal to grant the increase, and the employers' objection to the miners' scheme of restriction—viz., to commence winding coal at seven in the morning—this Conference hereby decides to recommend the miners of Lancashire to give fourteen days' notice to work five days per week, and eight hours per day, after the 14th of March, believing this to be the only way of improving trade."

WHY BE TRANSPORTED?—The chainmakers' strike in the Midlands still continues. Lieutenant Smith and Colonel Stewart (late of the Afghan Boundary Commission) have visited the district, and addressed the men on the importance of State-directed emigration by sending families to the Colonies, and supporting them for the first twelve months. It was decided to send a petition to Parliament in favour of such a movement. It was pointed out that if such a Bill were passed, hundreds of families would leave the Black Country for the Colonies. The chainmakers' grievances have been very clearly put before the public by the Sunday Chronicle, and the articles are reprinted in a small pamphlet, which can be had of Mr. R. Juggins, of Darlaston, the Secretary of the Nut and Bolt Makers' Association. To talk of State-aided emigration to these people is more than a crime.—K.

STAFFORD.—The strike at Messrs. Elley's has ended most disastrously, the men having gone in on the master's terms. They will have to "last" and prepare for the heeling-machine six dozen pairs of boots a-week in order to earn 27s. and 30s., and this amount of work cannot be done. Very few of the men were even trades-unionists; "scabs" were being brought from Northampton to fill their places; and reluctantly the fight had to be given up. It is by such hard lessons as this that the workers are being taught that Socialism alone can arm them against the oppression of the capitalist. Next week the Women's Jubilee Offering collection commences and the half-starved workman (or his wife) will be cajoled and intimidated into subscribing. An advertisement has appeared in a local paper, the Chronicle, advising the women to give nothing, and this has considerably roused the ire of some of our local magnates. A large number of leaflets of a similar character have also been circulated by several local Socialists in the various shoe-factories, and it is hoped that the number of names if not of subscriptions will be appreciably diminished by these efforts.—X.

DUBLIN UNEMPLOYED.—On Monday 21st Feb. a large demonstration of the unemployed took place here. About 12 o'clock, several hundred men assembled in Beresford Place, most of whom appeared to be furnished with copies of a proclamation issued by the Irish section of the Socialist League. No speeches were made, but after waiting half-an-hour, the word was passed "To the Mansion House," and the crowd started off to interview the Lord Mayor. Along the route the shopkeepers and other inhabitants of Sackville, Westmoreland, and other streets, were much astonished and alarmed at the unusual sight. Reaching the Mansion House, they found that the Lord Mayor was at a corporation meeting, and so followed him to the City Hall. When they found him, they got nothing for their pains but "soft words which butter no parsnips," and the very doubtful advice to visit the Castle. The crowd wandered helplessly about Cork Hill and Parliament Street for an hour or two groaning at the authorities and police, and then slunk away to their "homes." Some day, doubtless, the workers will learn the value of "self-help" and cease fooling around after mayors or magnates of any kind.

LABOUR STATISTICS.—It seems that the circulars issued from the Board of Trade to employers asking them to state particulars of the wages paid to workers is causing dissatisfaction. The masters object to giving particulars and would rather have the averages made up for employers' associations accepted. It is doubtful if the collection of wage statistics can be complete and reliable enough to repay the trouble; and it is beyond doubt that the masters will instinctively hinder every attempt to get together a fair statement. Many of the largest firms have point-blank refused to fill in the forms (see Industrial Review, Feb. 19). After all this matters little; it is impossible to estimate the amount of robbery of labour under the present system. The idea that the statistics would be useful in settling disputes was absurd from the first. Only a person of child-like ignorance of political economy can imagine that any statement of facts, figures, or arguments, will keep employers from screwing wages down to the lowest point. M.P.'s seem crazed on "inquiries" and the collection of information which they never make much use of. The passing of Mr. Bradlaugh's resolution, like the appointment of the Commission on the Dwellings of the Poor, was evidently only a party manoeuvre out of which no good is ever likely to come.—J. L. M.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—Votes of confidence in the miners' officials having been passed by the required number, the officers retain office. An appeal for funds has been made. As the expenses are very heavy and the fund not large, it is hoped that all workers will send subscriptions. Collecting cards are issued, and can be obtained at the offices of the Miners' Association, Ricton Place, Newcastle, where all subscriptions should be sent. It is necessary to inform the public that it is their duty, when they give, to see that the money is sent to the right quarter, as some persons are about collecting for themselves. At a public meeting of the working people of Alnwick the following resolution was carried unanimously:—"That this meeting, having heard Mr. Grocock's statement of the position of the miners in regard to the strike, hereby expresses its sympathy with them in their struggle against the reduction of wages, and agrees to the best of their ability to support the miners, so long as no fair and equitable settlement of the dispute can be obtained." At a largely attended meeting of the Washington Lodge of the Durham Miner's Association, on Wednesday week, it was unanimously carried to support the Northumberland miners by subscribing 6d. per man each fortnight as long as the strike continues. The enginemen and miners at Victoria Garesfield Colliery, we are informed, will subscribe 1s. a fortnight per man and 6d. each boy, to the Northumberland miners so long as their strike lasts. A circular has been issued by Mr. W. Crawford, M.P., on behalf of the Miners' National Union of Great Britain, appealing for aid for the miners on strike.

AUSTRALIA.

The Trades and Labour Council of Adelaide, South Australia are progressing. They have adopted Our Commonwealth as the "Official Gazette of the Trades and Labour Council and Affiliated Trades Unions," with the excellent motto: "They are slaves who will not dare, All wrongs to right, all rights to share." Mr. T. Kean has been appointed editor of the official part of the paper under the sub-title "The Trades Unionist." Unionists everywhere will cordially concur with our contemporary in hoping "that this union will be but the beginning of a stronger federation which by-and-by will embrace the whole working community, excepting only the mischief-workers."

"It cannot be too forcibly impressed upon all trades unionists that the simple fact of being a member of a trades union is not all that is required. That is but the beginning of our work; our ultimate aim, the goal which we are striving for is yet far away. To analyse some of our social troubles and to seek for the remedy will be the Trades Unionist's duty." So writes Mr. Kean in his introductory address. "Social troubles" in that paradise for the workers according to the emigration agents and their patrons! How our colonial brothers must envy us Londoners who have no "social troubles," so leaving the members of the Trades' Council free to attend luncheons, levees, jubilee celebrations, etc., in order to show to an admiring world that princes, peers, landlords, capitalists, bishops and workers, all form but one great united happy family in this great and glorious, etc., etc.

The Adelaide Trades and Labour Council are working hard to give practical shape to a resolution, agreed to unanimously at the Trades Congress, in regard to co-operation, not "as the end of all our desires"; but as "a step towards freeing the workers from the shackles that now enchain them." It appears that some coopers had been discharged because they refused to leave the Coopers' Society. It is therefore proposed to make the coopering trade a test case and funds are being subscribed for this purpose.

An anti-immigration demonstration, organised by the Trades and Labour Council of New South Wales, took place in Sydney on the 16th January. About thirty trade-societies marched with their banners through the main streets to the Domain, where several speakers addressed the crowd, and a resolution declaring the system of State Aid to immigration to be detrimental to the interest of the working classes, was carried.

STRIKES IN AUSTRALIA.—SYDNEY, Jan. 19.—The New South Wales miners are "out" at several places. At Illawarra the company tried to bring the strike to an end by importing "blacklegs," but the strikers "bailed-up" the train at Bulli, and their wives so worked upon the blacklegs' feelings that with one accord they refused to proceed, and returned whence they came.

There is no truth in the rumour that the Mount Keira men have resolved to resume work on the employers' terms; the men are confident of winning the day. Seven blacklegs who arrived by yesterday morning's boat were forcibly seized by the men and compelled to return to Sydney. There was great excitement at the colliery yesterday evening, and Mr. Turner, the police magistrate at Wollongong, went over to read the Riot Act, if necessary. Police have been summoned to Mount Keira from every part of the district.

The Mount Pleasant colliery knocked off work at 3 o'clock yesterday. One hundred and fifty blacklegs, armed with revolvers, marched, led by Mr. Lahiff, the manager at Mount Pleasant, over to Mount Keira, and are now posted on the high flat ground overlooking the colliery. The Keira men are resolved to resist the arrival of the blacklegs. The action of the manager, marching with armed men to Mount Keira yesterday, is strongly condemned. Many of the Mount Pleasant blacklegs are Italians, and it is alleged to be criminal in the extreme to allow such hot-blooded men revolvers and to take them to the scene of probable disorder.

A great meeting was held at the cross roads near Wollongong at 11 o'clock this morning, to consider the question of carrying firearms by blacklegs. It is thought that the matter should be brought under the notice of Parliament, as serious riots, and probably loss of life, are apprehended as a consequence of this foolish action.

A dispute has also arisen amongst the miners at Lambton owing to the Associated Masters having refused a demand of the men that the front shift should be worked. The men in the back shift did not respond to the call to work yesterday, and a letter was then sent to the miners' secretary at Lambton, dismissing them. About 700 men are thus thrown out of employment, and great excitement exists in the locality.

A great strike is also on at the Prospect Reservoir. Large numbers of police are on the spot, but apparently without being required. Labour matters are very bad all over these colonies.

FRANCE.

MARSEILLES.—About a hundred Italian workers in the "Mediterranean" sugar refineries have declared themselves on strike, having been dissatisfied with an overseer whose dismissal they demanded, and demanded in vain. There has been no disturbance.

BESSEGES.—Revolutionary placards are, we hear, posted up on the walls of Besseges, containing menaces of death against priests, bourgeois, bankers, and exploiters in general, and winding up with "Vive la Guillotine!" If these hysteric effusions are genuine, we can but pity the half-starved, hopeless creatures, driven to desperation by their state, their eyes seeing everything in the colour of blood, their minds capable of constructing no plan of release—nothing except a brute-like "revenge" on those who are their immediate or apparent oppressors, and have probably, in the intolerable network in which we are all alike entangled, become so involuntarily and through no "crime" of their own.

SAINT ETIENNE.—Last week was held here the National Congress of French Miners, a few days after that of the Belgian Miners. The scheme which is laid before Parliament on the regulation of work in the mines was discussed at length, the amendments of Basly being all carried, and finally a counter resolution passed. To end up with, a resolution was passed declaring the adherence of the Congress to the Labour Federation of French Syndicates lately established at the Congress of Lyons. When the Congress had finished sitting a large public meeting was held under the auspices of the Miners' Federation, among those there present being the Socialist members of Parliament Basly and Camelinat, besides numerous other members and political men.

ALGERIA.

For some time past the labour-organisation in Algeria has been gradually developing in a satisfactory manner; working-men's syndicates are being formed everywhere, and shortly there is to be held at Constantine a Labour Congress which will discuss social questions and social ills and their remedies.

ITALY.

FINALE EMILIA (Liguria).—The strike of labourers here is still proceeding, maintained by the esprit de corps and rigorous self-denial of the strikers. The contractors have tried to get hands from the neighbourhood, but find to their cost a strong sense of fraternity among the other workers.

ALESSANDRIA.—The employés at the "Borsalina" hat-factory here are on strike because the capitalist day by day decreases the salaries, so that while a few years back the men made 35 or 40 lire, they now find it difficult to make between 15 and 20 lire. The master holds out, and endeavours to shake the strikers by dismissing their wives and sisters from the establishment.

RAVENNA.—The electoral committees of Ravenna and Forli, as interpreters of the popular sentiment of Romagna have decided to present for the fourth time the candidature of Amilcare Cipriani, other candidates being withdrawn in his favour. It is of course melancholy to confess to an utter failure, involving as it does the prolonged imprisonment of this energetic revolutionist; but a failure it is, and naturally so; and surely at "the fourth time of asking" it is time to give up the struggle, however much it may irk Cipriani's friends to do so.

Italian revolutionary journals enjoy but a precarious existence, living, as it were, from hand to mouth. The fourth issue of Humanitas, an Anarchist publication of Naples, has been sequestered, "in consequence of its writings provocative of class-hatred in all countries," this being the second time already in its youthful existence. A long life and a merry one to this plucky little publication! At Ancona also, we hear, Nos. 4, 5, and 6 of the Paria have been seized upon. For all that, says Humanitas, this journal will still be maintained, and will continue its publications more busily than ever.

SPAIN.

MADRID.—The number of unemployed in this city is always increasing. The eight-hour movement is always and ever in agitation—whatever it may be worth.

VALENCIA.—The strike of "typos" here is still continued; subscriptions are opened to help them, and we are told there is every hope of success for the strikers.

GRANADA.—The tanners here have demanded of their master an eight hours' working day, considering the laborious and very unhealthy nature of the work. The demand, courteously—alas! humbly—worded, was carried to the office by four delegates, who were not courteously received. The men of the factory are on strike in consequence.

BARCELONA.—The weavers at D. Pablo Salvador's factory have struck, owing to his increasing the number of cloths without increasing the price thereof—a little piece of arithmetic which the ingenuous "master of men" is very apt to indulge in, openly or covertly. The little game "becomes monotonous," and the hands strike. (Some day this metaphorical image of industrial slang will cease to be an image merely, and the hand will strike, and the blow will be a very definite one, and fraught with meaning.)

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

NOTICE.—All business matters relating to the Socialist League to be directed to the Secretary, H. A. Barker, 13 Farringdon Road, London, E.C.

Bazaar and Concert.—Distribution of prizes will take place at 6 o'clock on Saturday March 5; Concert at 8 o'clock. All monies and tickets must be returned by first post on that date or will not participate. J. LANE.

Police Interference.—This matter will be under discussion by Council at its next meeting, Monday March 14. All members interested in the matter are requested to attend.

Outdoor Propaganda.—A meeting of out-door speakers will be held on Saturday March 12th at 13 Farringdon Road, at 7 p.m., for the purpose of arranging the outdoor propaganda for forthcoming season. Speakers are asked to attend.

Lessons in French.—It has been thought advisable to start a class in the French language. Comrade Victor Dave has kindly volunteered his services as teacher. The first lesson will be given on Tuesday, March 1, at 8 p.m. All those desirous of joining the class are requested to send their names to the secretary, H. A. Barker, 13, Farringdon Road, E.C.

Reports for "Commonweal."—Branch Secretaries are requested to make their reports as brief as possible, dealing with points of general interest as to the progress of the propaganda, rather than attempting to give the substance of the lectures, for which there is not space, even if it were otherwise desirable. Notices should be confined to purely business announcements and written separately. Reports and Notices should be addressed to the "Printer," and cannot be guaranteed insertion unless they reach the office by 2 p.m. on Tuesday.

Closing of Library.—All members of the Socialist League and others who have borrowed books prior to Monday, February 21st, are earnestly requested to return same to Librarians on or before Monday, March 7th. Members are notified that unless this be complied with, Rule III. (relating to fines) must be enforced, and defaulting members suspended from Library privileges. The Library will be re-opened on Monday, March 21st. (The Librarians will be pleased to acknowledge presents of Socialist books lately published).—LENA WARDLE and WM. BLUNDELL, Librarians.

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—A. K. Donald was elected secretary by this Branch at the business meeting on Friday, Feb. 25th. W. Utley was also elected for the vacant place on the Council, Chambers resigning.—L. W.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, Feb. 23, A. K. Donald addressed a good audience on the subject, "Scotch Miners." Good discussion followed, and the sum of 2s. 10d. collected for the Miners' Fund. On Sunday, Feb. 27th, W. B. Robertson lectured on "Production." Other meetings have been attended during the week by members of this Branch. Literature has sold fairly well. Branch members' meeting next Sunday, 7 p.m.—W. B. and T. E. W., secs.

CROYDON.—On Sunday, February 27th, H. Davis gave an address on "The Modern Trinity: Land, Labour, and Capital." Good audience and collection.—A. T., ast. sec.

FULHAM.—A large gathering of comrades and friends took place at Walham Green on Sunday morning, in the expectation of hearing a debate between Mr. Green, our usual courteous opponent here, and the Socialist speaker. In the enforced absence of the challenger, his place was supplied by a gentleman whose acquaintance with our views was quite as full and as accurate as, doubtless, Mr. Green's would have been. Sparring gave the Socialist position, and a brisk debate followed. We hope to meet Mr. Green here on another occasion.

HACKNEY.—On Sunday morning, we held a short meeting at the "Salmon and Ball," Flockton and Nicoll speaking. We then went to support Graham at the Broadway, London Fields. Graham and Nicoll spoke to the following resolution, which was carried unanimously: "That this meeting expresses its indignant protest against the unjust sentence passed on James Allman by Mr. Hannay for an alleged obstruction, and calls upon all workers to support the Socialists in their struggle for free speech." A large number of leaflets was distributed. In the evening, H. Graham lectured on "The Realisation of Socialism." Sale of literature increasing.—H. MATTHEWS, sec.

HAMMERSMITH.—On Sunday, Feb. 27th, Mrs. C. M. Wilson (Fabian) lectured on "Authority and Revolt." The Anarchist theory underlying an interesting discourse was criticised by comrades Beasley, Carruthers, Morris, and Radford, who were mainly concerned with the difficulty of finding how the every-day affairs of a community could be conducted without the rule of either majority or minority. It was decided to hold an annual meeting of members on Sunday, March 13th, at 6 p.m. Will members please note?

MARYLEBONE AND NORTH LONDON.—Comrades Brooks, Cantwell, and Charles addressed a good meeting in Regent's Park. Faulkner lectured to a rather small audience in Cleveland Hall on "Law and War." In the afternoon, Mainwaring and Charles spoke to a large audience in Hyde Park. Sir Charles Warren seems to have taken it into his head also to interfere with public rights in the park, and had instructed some of his bullies to hustle the people listening to our speakers. He shall, however, find it will be difficult for him to put down free speech in the parks. Collected in Hyde Park for Mowbray and Henderson Fund, 2s. 6½d.—H. CHARLES, sec.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday evening, comrade Lane lectured on "The Different Schools of Socialist Thought." The audience seemed to be highly interested. A good discussion followed. One new member made.—S. G., sec.

BRADFORD.—On Sunday morning, Feb. 27, some of us attended a morning lecture, "Liberty v. Socialism," by Mr. W. Nelson, an Individualist, who showed a sad want of knowledge of the economic conditions of the working-classes, and an entire misconception of the aims of Socialism. Like many of our individualist opponents, he prepared for his hearers a gigantic State-Socialism bogey in order to knock it down again. Comrade Mitchell opposed the lecturer in a very effective manner. In the evening, G. A. Gaskel lectured at the "Exchange," City Road, on "Socialism v. Individualism," before a good audience. A lively discussion followed.—C. H., sec.

EDINBURGH.—On Monday, Feb. 21, in Free Tron Hall, Patrick Geddes gave his second lecture on "The Theory and Practice of Social Reform" to a good audience. Some of the Socialists present seemed to think that "reform" might be brought about with somewhat more rapidly than the lecturer indicated.—G.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday evening, in the Southern Christian Institute, comrade Daniel M'Culloch gave a lecture on "Education," which he treated from a Socialist standpoint. The lecture was well received, and gave rise to a good discussion. On Sunday afternoon, J. C. McCutcheon, a friend from England, lectured to a large audience on the Jail Square on the "Duty of the People." In the evening in Hall, Carlton Place, McCutcheon took the place of Muirhead, and lectured on "England Arise," maintaining that the use of machinery was incompatible with a healthy and happy state of Society. The lecture excited much interest and discussion.—J. B. G.

LANCASTER.—Sharman lectured for us at the Athenæum on Tuesday night, on "Poverty, its Cause and its Cure." Cleverly criticised the accepted fables of teetotalism, Malthusianism, Christism, competitive co-operation, etc., and gave some telling statistics about wages in the country, concluding by showing that until the People rose against their Haters they'd stay where they are—in their sty. Good and quite sympathetic audience, over which E. P. Hall presided.—LEONARD HALL, sec.

LEEDS.—On Saturday evening, the members of Branch met the Bradford comrades at the Newmarket Hotel, Bradford, to hear an address from comrade Mahon on the "Prospects of Socialism in the Provinces," and to make arrangements for the coming summer, when the Leeds, Bradford, and Bingley Branches are going to co-operate to further the Cause in Yorkshire. On Sunday morning at 11 a.m., Mahon addressed an open-air meeting in Vicar's Croft.—F. C., sec.

NORWICH.—On Sunday morning, good meeting at St. Mary's Plain. Glorious meeting in the Market Place at 3, kept it up two hours, 6,000 there without doubt. Three cheers were given for Henderson and Mowbray, also three ringing cheers given for the Social Revolution.—J. TOCHATTI.

VOL. 3.—No. 61.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

POLITICAL NOTES.

THE "row" in the House of Commons of March 3 gives us an indication of what is coming, if we take it along with the hints as to what the Coercion Bill is likely to be. The Chief Secretary's insults and tall talk mean pretty much the lion lashing his tail just before his wrath (or hunger) takes the practical form of a spring and a blow. Or perhaps it may with greater accuracy be compared with the demeanour of the Highlanders, walking about and snorting to stimulate their warlike spirits before they pull out point-and-edge, as described by Walter Scott in 'Rob Roy.'

The Tory supporters of the Government have bidden them to get angry and act. They are trying to get angry so that they may act, since there is no way out of it; but no doubt their feelings are not very enviable at present. They must be full of dismal forebodings that their action will draw on a state of things which only strong men could deal with and avoid the mingled curses and laughter which accompany absurd failure in "strong"—i.e., tyrannical—measures.

The Irish nation have shown such admirable qualities through this struggle, such steadiness of purpose, and persistence in union, that they may be trusted to deal satisfactorily with this long expected crisis; all the more as they must be seeing clearly final victory drawing nearer and nearer to them. But what allies will they have among English parties outside the sympathy of the outcast Socialists?

As parties or sections what allies can they have? It would be absurd to appeal to the Liberal party to further those aspirations towards freedom which it is its very business to restrain. And as to the Radical party, where is it and what is it except the feeble tail of this same feebly reactionary Liberal party?

The only appeal that can be made is to those few Radicals who have any title to the name to break off from their Liberal party if it shows, as it certainly will show, the slightest sign of wavering in steady opposition to coercion without any great nicety as to the means. For in good truth, if the Government are going to put forward an effective Coercion Bill, as according to all reports they are, they will give the signal for civil war.

Here is the position in all its simplicity. On the one hand a people determined according to its lights to win freedom for itself. On the other hand a government which is determined that this people shall not be free, and after having exhausted all half measures of mingled chicanery and force, with a thin gloss of professed respect for "constitutionalism" (whatever that may mean), is now driven to throw off the mask, and to say there shall no longer be any semblance of freedom in Ireland, and the expression of opinion shall be considered, or even the implication of opinion shall be considered, as treasonable action in the egg and shall be suppressed and shut up in jail accordingly. What is to come out of this position? Who is to give way, Ireland or the reactionary party of Great Britain? If the former is to be crushed, the struggle will not be long before it reappears, not as civil war in Ireland, but as civil war in England. W. M.

CRIMINAL LAW UNDER SOCIALISM.

PROBABLY few persons realise the extent to which crime is reducible to the question of private property. There are few orders of crime which are not traceable directly or indirectly to possession and the desire of possession. In the first place we have the largest and most important section of offences recognised by law, those which may be comprehended under the phrase "unlawful appropriation," i.e., theft and robbery in all their forms. Here, of course, is a vast body of crime which would be practically impossible in a state of society in which the necessities and comforts of life were within the reach of all, and when the fact of possession did not carry with it the possibility of surplus-value. Then, again, there is the indecent class of crime. This is largely a consequence of the hypocritical sexual relations at present obtaining, resulting from the institution of monogamic marriage, which is in its form based on our existing property-relations—although here matters of pure pathology have properly to be taken into account. Thirdly, we have the description of crime coming under the head of brutal assaults, or malicious injuries (including murder). This last is usually associated with one or other of the two former departments, most frequently with crimes against property but not always. Fourthly, must be included perjury or false-witness in all its forms. We shall find that all serious crimes (as distinguished from mere misdemeanour, as it is termed, and from political offences) is comprised within these four categories, the first embracing all crimes primarily against property, the three last all crimes primarily against the person, it matters not whether the question of property enters secondarily into them or not.

Now, largely as the present condition of society is directly responsible for crime, and still more largely as it is so indirectly, we can hardly hope that a change of economic condition would do more immediately than efface the crimes directly connected with property. The gradual elimination of the remainder would be effected in the process of the development of the new order, but not entirely at once. We cannot, therefore, treat this question in the snakes-in-Iceland fashion we were able to do when dealing with civil law under Socialism in a previous article. But, nevertheless, I take it that the régime of a Socialist administration will involve an enormous change of attitude in dealing with crime. Firstly, it will without doubt reduce to the minimum the number of actions characterised by the law as crimes. Secondly, it will probably regard the greatest possible consideration for the criminal compatible with the maintenance of social existence at all, as its first duty in the matter. Thirdly, it will assuredly withdraw the right of prosecution from private individuals and vest it wholly and solely in the delegates of society.

The interest of the legal body, so influential in all modern legislatures, is to increase to the utmost the cognisance of the criminal law over actions. In this they are aided and abetted by a number of persons who entertain a pet hobby against particular vices (real or "so-called"), and are always prepared to agitate for their elevation to the rank of crimes. The legal luminaries who assist in this are quite indifferent to the fact, of which they must be well aware, that the wider the range of law-made crime, the greater the chance of innocent persons being, if not convicted at least accused, and their characters thereby blasted. And these, be it remembered, are the gentlemen who are so zealous in defending the law of libel as a necessary protection of character. It is monstrous, they pretend to think, that a man who has done an action deemed discreditable should have it proclaimed on the platform or in the press, but it is a "mere natural" misfortune incident to human affairs that an innocent person should be put to the annoyance and inconvenience of being hauled up before a police-court to answer a trumped-up charge, which it may nevertheless be very difficult to disprove to the satisfaction of the public.

Of course, all that these "legal gentlemen" care for, is to maintain and increase the business of the courts, civil and criminal. To such commercial principles are their zeal for the protection of character and the suppression of crime in the last resort reducible. A Socialist society, whose aim would be to reduce the machinery of law to the minimum, would rely for the preservation of public morals precisely on that publicity which the legal crime-manufacturer tries so energetically to suppress for the protection of character. And in the end, he would undoubtedly find this a more powerful agent for the repression of crime than the most elaborately comprehensive code, designed for laying direct hands on the persons of offenders. When there is no interest at stake in the maintenance of judicial machinery, the number of law-made crimes must inevitably diminish.

That a Socialist administration would treat delinquents with the utmost leniency consistent with the existence of society will, I take it, not be disputed. The failure of organised brutality as a correction to crime has been attested over and over again by experience. Were the brutal punishments of earlier phases of society effectual in repressing crime? The panegyrists of modern civilisation are never tired of impressing upon us the great advances made in respect of crime, both as to diminution and treatment. It has been shown constantly that a particular offence has actually diminished on the repeal of brutal enactments bearing on it. Yet, strange to say, these very panegyrists of modern civilisation are frequently the first to cry out for deterrent punishments and long sentences, and to dilate on the maintenance of prison "discipline" (the specious euphemism for the inhumanity practised in our gaols). To convince themselves of the needlessness of so-called "prison discipline," they have only to cast an eye on some of the Swiss cantons (notably Geneva), where imprisonment means little more than simple reclusion, and where they will find that even a bourgeois society holds together without any of the acts of brutality and petty tyranny dignified in most countries by the name of "prison discipline." A brutal officialism and red-tapeism which pays no attention to individual cases must of itself breed crime.

The bourgeois moralist should at least be consistent. The chief and, indeed, only real advantage (outweighed by its many disadvantages) which the society of to-day has over that of the middle ages, is its relative security from brutal violence, and the relative (I had almost said the co-relative) absence of the more brutal forms of punishment. And the panegyrist of bourgeois society knows this and makes use of it. Of how many a declamatory newspaper leader and platform speech is it not the theme? And yet this same penny-a-liner or platform spouter will often be the first to condemn as sentimentality any protest against the still-existing brutality of our criminal code. He will be anxious to minimise to the utmost one of the few points wherein modern civilisation can show any sort of real superiority to that of earlier ages. Such is the consistency of the advocates of class-society and its methods.

Once more, we have said that a social administration would remove the right of prosecution from the private individual. As to this also I should imagine there could be no doubt, since the right of private prosecution exists only to facilitate recourse to the tribunals in the interest of the legal profession and its offshoots. If an action is injurious to society, it is plainly the part of society to take the initiative in dealing with it, and not allow the individual from his mere lust for revenge to set its judicial machinery in motion. This is also the work of lawyers, whose interest it is to multiply the business of the courts. The individual right of prosecution is a premium on extortion in all its forms and personal malice. As things are at present, the only safeguard a man has against malicious prosecution is the clumsy device of in his turn instituting a prosecution for perjury, which he will probably fail in bringing home to the delinquent.

SOCIALISM FROM THE ROOT UP.

CHAPTER XVI.

SCIENTIFIC SOCIALISM—KARL MARX.—II. MONEY.

WE have now come to the point where it is necessary to consider the circulation of commodities; the first means to this circulation is the establishment of a tertium quid, or universal equivalent. And in order to have a really universal equivalent it is necessary that use-value should be eliminated from it, since such an equivalent is required to express not the diverse qualities of all the various commodities, but the relative quantity of embodied human labour which they severally contain.

Money as a mere measure of value is imaginary and ideal, but the bodily form of it must express quantitatively equivalent abstract value—i.e., labour—and takes the form of the precious metals, finally of gold.

Gold has come to be the bodily form taken by the universal measure of value, partly because of its natural qualities—portability, durability, etc., but chiefly because the course of history has invested it with this function; and also because its value, instead of changing from, say, week to week, as is the case with other commodities, changes rather from century to century, so that its value may be considered stable relatively to them, just as one speaks of indigo as a permanent dye, which it is relatively to other dyes, although none are absolutely permanent.¹

Paper money is promises to pay gold, which is directly exchangeable with all other commodities. Paper money, therefore, is merely a symbol of the exchange really effected by gold.

This universal equivalent takes the place of barter, which is the primitive and direct form of exchange,² and at which stage the distinction between buyer and seller has not arisen. It now gives place to the first form of indirect exchange, in which a third term is interposed between the articles which are to be parted with and acquired. Now for the first time the above distinction takes shape. The seller has a commodity which he does not propose to consume, and therefore he acquires with it money, with which money he buys in turn another commodity equal in quantity to that with which he has parted, but different from it in quality. Marx has formulated this transaction by the well-known and useful formula, Commodity, Money, Commodity: C—M—C.

The habit of hoarding which is common amongst ancient societies, and also among barbarous peoples, is a natural concomitant of this stage of exchange, and is the first germ of Capital. It is brought about by the arrest of the above process at its first phase thus, C—M—the seller of the commodity does not go on to buy. Under these conditions money becomes a social power; and being a commodity like other commodities, can be acquired by private persons, whom it invests with social power. Therefore in those states of society which had not outgrown their primitive social ethics, money was considered the embodiment of all evil.

This stage of exchange marks the pre-commercial use of money; after a while it tends to develop into another stage, which carries the exchange a step further. The holder of a commodity which he does not propose to consume exchanges it for money, which he again exchanges for a commodity to be used, not for his personal consumption but to be exchanged once more for money. He would have no object in doing this if his aim were merely that of the simple exchanger (C. M. C.), namely, to obtain an article of consumption different in kind to that which he has exchanged, since in money there is no inherent difference of quality and therefore whatever difference there may be must be one of quantity. Accordingly the object of the exchanger in this second stage is amount, not kind. In going through his process of exchange (the formula for which may be stated thus: the second quantum of money must be more than the first, or else he will have failed in his object; will have made a bad bargain, as the phrase goes. On the other hand, though this form of exchange differs essentially it nevertheless connects itself with the earlier form, in which money occurs only as the middle term between commodity and commodity, thus distinguishing it from simple barter, because even in the later form the result of the merchant's transaction is a commodity with which he intends to begin a fresh transaction—

$$C - M - C - M - C.$$

This is the form of exchange which was the practice of the developed classical world in its commercial operations. The break up of the Roman Empire, and the confusion that followed, dislocated this commerce, and largely brought exchange back again to its earlier and simple form of the exchange of a commodity for money with which to buy another commodity to be consumed, which was for the most part the character of the exchange of the Middle Ages.

This second form of exchange leads without a break into the third or modern form of Capitalistic Exchange, in which the exchanger, beginning with money, buys a commodity in order to exchange it for money; which money, as in the foregoing stage, must be more in quantity than that with which he began, or his transaction will be a failure. This process differs from that of the last-mentioned stage of exchange in that the result of the transaction is always money, and not a commodity (that is, a use-value), the latter in the long-run appearing only nominally in the transaction.

To make this clearer, we may give concrete examples of the three forms of exchange:

In the first stage, illustrated by the proceedings of the Craftsman of the time of Homer, which were pretty much those of the Mediæval Craftsman also, the village potter sold his pots and with the money he got for them, which, possible trickery apart, represented just the value or embodied labour of the pots, he bought meal, oil, wine, flesh, etc., for his own livelihood and consumed them.

The merchant of the later classical period shipped, say, purple cloth from Sidon to Alexandria, sold his cloth there, and with the money bought gum-Arabic (from the Soudan) and frankincense (from Arabia), which he sold at Athens, where again he shipped oil for another market. He always handled the actual goods he professed to trade in, and the wares which he thus exchanged against the universal equivalent, money, were of various kinds. Similar commerce went on in the Middle Ages, as with the merchants of Amalfi, Venice, etc., side by side with the primitive exchange of the feudal manor, and the market-town with its corporation and gilds.

The modern man of Commerce necessarily begins his transaction with money. He buys, say, indigo, which he never sees, receives for it more money than he gave for it, and goes on steadily in this process, dealing (unlike the ancient carrier-merchant) with one class of goods only; and all the goods in which he deals represent to him so much money: they are only present in his transactions nominally. Money is the be-all and end-all of his existence as a commercial man.

This is an example of the pure form of capitalistic exchange, wherein money is exchanged for commodities, and these again for money plus an increment; the formula for which, as given by Marx, is M—C—M.

The next question we have to consider is how the surplus, the increment above-mentioned, obtained by this process of exchange is realised,—or, in plain language, where it comes from.

E. BELFORT BAX AND WILLIAM MORRIS.

MAGDEBURG, March 3.—A large crowd assembled last night in the Kaiser Strasse in front of the office at which the result of the election for this city was announced, and by hissing and shouting gave expression to their displeasure at the defeat of the Social Democratic candidate. The police proving powerless to cope with the rioters, the authorities sent for the military. Many arrests were made.

It is the sheerest folly ever to suppose that lawyers can ever take any side but that of the vultures of society. They are but the too ready tools of all kinds of class trickery and fraud in legislation. The grossest villainy once finding its way to the Statute Book—and that is easy enough—is, in the eyes of the plundering classes, entitled to receive all the respect due to the Ten Commandments. Immorality, by the stroke of a pen, is transformed into morality.—Pioneer.

¹ As a deduction from this, we may say that while on the one hand there was no abstract necessity for the measure of value taking the form of gold, though there was a necessity for it to take a form embodying a certain definite amount of labour; on the other hand, since it has taken that form, labour notes, or mere promises to pay which are of no value in themselves, cannot as long as exchange lasts take the place of gold, which is a commodity having a value in itself and the particular commodity which has assumed that function through historical selection.

AFFAIRS IN AUSTRIA.

ZNAIM IN MORAVIA, Feb. 28.—In Trebitsch in Moravia, a Socialist prosecution has taken place. The Socialist Horak, expelled from Vienna, went to Trebitsch, where he obtained great influence over the workers. By this he attracted the attention of the police. He was arrested and charged with scattering seditious pamphlets and with breach of public quiet. Owing to this arrest there happened riotings, and even attempts to rescue. The police were in readiness, and prepared a very shocking story; in an inn a cake was sold by auction on behalf of Horak. That was a new sign that a plot was projected. The houses of the Trebitsch Socialists were searched. At Benesch's they found three copies of an Austrian labour paper, of songs, some writings, and a letter, in which the writer says: "Do you exercise since Horak is imprisoned?" At Krenek's they found some money orders to a labour leaf and to Horak, and in the dress of his wife a photograph of Horak; at Sankoss's seditious writings, eighteen cartridges, and a visiting-card of Horak! With this important booty the State Prosecutor sat down and wrote an indictment charging five Socialists with Socialistic intrigues and with being members of an illegal society, according to 285 sec. and 28 p. of the penal law. But he had made a great mistake. He had not charged the defendants before the Superior Heretic Court at Prague, and therefore they were discharged.

The Government has explained its position against the Labour Chamber Bill. The Marquis Bouquehem said the bill has a tendency to create an organ for guarding the special interests of the labourers. But already on the basis of existing laws, organisations can be founded for that purpose. He referred to the trade courts, to the arbitration courts, to the institution of the trade inspectors, to the commercial and trade chambers, to whoever had published judgments on the labour situation. All these corporations and institutions would be injured in their efficacy. Extreme elements would take possession of the labour chambers, which then would utter only wishes not to be fulfilled. The Premier, Count Taaffe (from an Irish landlord family, who emigrated at the time of the glorious revolution in 1689), spoke very evasively. He said the bill objects to the principle that the legislation consists of the representation of interested groups, not of classes of society, to the principle that only men paying a direct tax can have the suffrage, etc., etc. Such important principles being the matter in dispute the Government cannot give a decisive answer! According to these words of the two Ministers, the labourers find their best friends in the Government. But the facts of the feudal party speak a too distinct language to expect a conversion of the labourers by such hypocritical words. We never can trust in a Government which considers social reform as a reform of the poor law, and which has issued exception ordinances against the labour movement. In spite of having suppressed a true labour press, so that our organs must weigh every word before uttered, in spite of having dissolved legal unions, in spite of having forbidden assemblies, in spite of having incarcerated arbitrarily our comrades, in spite of having passed coercion laws against us, the Government has the impudence to speak of their labour friendliness, while everything protests loudly against these infamous lies! This kind of men will totally have deserved the fate destined for them.

The Low Austrian Peasant Union will present to the Emperor a memorandum describing the melancholy situation of the Austrian peasant. But it must be said that much of this peasant movement is not to be understood. First they fight against landlordism, and petition the Emperor, the upper landlord; they condemn Parliamentarism by showing that our Reichsrath is the representation of the exploiting classes, and are for absolute monarchy; on the other hand, their organ, Mittelstrasse, published in a late issue an article praising and sympathising with the Social Democrats. In short, the opinions of the party have not yet classified themselves, but it is remarkable how our peasants begin to feel their interest in the universal labour movement.

To-morrow the delegations will meet. They will debate a credit demanded by the Minister of War, amounting as it is supposed from 50 to 55 millions of florins. His ministerial Excellency will, as all Ministers of War of our times do, horribly brandish the sabre, with much babble about patriotism; and as the delegations compete to surpass each other in this patriotism (read servilism), the credit will be granted without delay. How long this "armed peace" will last not even the great Otto in Berlin knows according to his avowal, but what we know is that such a situation sharpens the present economic crisis, furthers the process of proletarianising of a part of the less well-to-do, and so promotes the revolutionary opinions of the great mass.

With the liveliest interest we here have followed the course of the hot fight of our brethren in Germany. The Gleichheit opened a subscription on behalf of the electoral fund, and sent 330 fl. to their aid, a sum small indeed, but proportional to the heart-rending situation of the Austrian workers, and given gladly as a sincere sign of the solidarity existing between us and our fellow-fighters, as a sign of the internationality connecting comrades in the common opposition against brutal oppressors, not hindered even by political boundaries. Even Slav labourers took part in the subscription, showing so their abhorrence of the national hatred of the corrupted bourgeoisie, to which they with joy leave degraded fanatical race division. The immense increase of the votes given for the Socialist candidates shows that our brethren will not for long suffer from the mean rule of united capitalism and landlordism, and from these elevating victories we take the hope that also for the other proletariat, especially for the Austrian workers, that hour will soon strike, the hour of the great social revolution, which will totally and for ever destroy the present infamous "order" of Society, and will bring to all down-trodden the dawn of the better and truer time.—F. S.

In the House of Commons last Friday, Mr. Matthews, in answer to Mr. Fisher, stated that the number of police employed at the Social Democratic Federation meeting in Trafalgar Square, on the 29th of August last, was 2,373. At the demonstration at St. Paul's the number was 3,094, of whom 746 were City policemen specially employed.

A released convict, imprisoned for dishonesty, stated that, while in durance vile, he was employed making pasteboard soles for solid leather boots and shoes! John Bright once declared adulteration of goods to be but another form of competition. This is quite consistent with the hypocritical policy of our class rulers. They set in motion machinery provided at the public expense to punish petty offences against property, even when sheer starvation is the impelling force, but they legalise for their own benefit crimes against life and property thousands of times greater in magnitude! Legality and morality are very often not synonymous.—Pioneer.

THE CASEMENT CROSS.

(FERDINAND FREILIGRATH. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

THE king a hunting-party gave within his royal castle hall,
The seats were crammed with noble guests, the court musicians lined the wall,
The servants with the foaming wine went hurrying round from side to side,
And in the sultry summer heat the windows all stood open wide.

The nobles leaning out for air, where those high windows open stood,
Saw stretching far and wide beneath the alleys of the cool green wood;
The wood wherein the king so oft mid sound of hoofs and hunters' horns
Would ride till he forgot the cares that made his crown a crown of thorns.

How stiff and stark those castle walls! How troublesome this Prussian land!
How confidently firm and proud upon her rights she still would stand!
And not her noblemen alone! Her towns were throwing off the yoke;
And those there were who fain would free from serfdom e'en her peasant folk.

Brave hearts that knew not how to yield! True heritage of precious things,
Thou sacred love of liberty so hateful to the soul of kings!
As emperors grow pale to-day to see thy flaunting flag unrolled,
So trembled and grew sick at heart the lords of Brandenburg of old.

The king sat feasting with his court mid steam of meat and foam of wine—
"What matters all this petty prate of Parliament to me and mine?"—
When lo, there hurried up the hall a booted rider faint with heat,
A messenger from Parliament with blood-stained spurs and dusty feet.

He gave his budget to the king—"What fresh impertinence is here?"—
The royal hunter glanced it o'er, and paled for anger or for fear.
Across his brow a fitful frown of wrath and indignation passed,—
"Oh foolish folk, your cup is full; this insolence shall be your last.

"As surely as this apple here"—and lo, he grasps with hasty hand
An apple ripe and ruddy-cheeked from out the basket where they stand—
"As surely as this apple now deep into yonder wood I send,
So sure will I of Prussia's pride and boundless insolence make end.

"So surely shall they own their lord, and on my royal pleasure wait;
So surely will I crush the pride of this too haughty subject State;
So surely."—And he raised his arm, and bent his body back to throw—
The nobles stretched their heads to see, and hardly dared to whisper low.

Forth flew the apple—to the wood?—Nay, not so fast! 'Twas wildly thrown;
It whistled through the crowded hall, and—hit the casement's mullioned stone,
Then tumbled on the floor.—Well done! 'Tis but to make a steady stand!
So let this mullioned casement's cross thy pattern be, my Fatherland.

SOCIALISM IN THE EASTERN COUNTIES.

On Sunday February 20 I addressed a meeting of three or four hundred in St. Mary's Plain, Norwich, at 11.30. Good sale of literature. At three in the afternoon I spoke in the Market Place. No opposition; meeting very attentive, and took up the points well. Cheers were given for Mowbray and Henderson, and also for Curningham Graham, M.P., for his Socialistic speech in the House of Commons. In the evening we had a meeting opposite the Agricultural Hall, and at 8 I lectured at St. Benedict's on "Radicalism and Socialism," a good discussion following. On Monday February 21 I spoke outside Colman's factory at 1.40 to about 400 work-people, and was well received; and at 7 we held a meeting outside Smith's shoe-factory of about 200, many of whom followed to hear the lecture on "Land and Rent," given at St. Benedict's, which again was very well received, and good discussion by Mills, Lestner, and other comrades. On Tuesday 22 E. Curson read a paper on "Socialism" at the Queen's Road Improvement Society, the members receiving us with great courtesy and allowing three Socialists to speak in support—Mills, Morley, and myself availing ourselves of the opportunity; and we were convinced that a very good impression was made, and we were invited to come again. On Wednesday we journeyed to Yarmouth, and held a good meeting on the Hall Quay from 3 o'clock to 4. About 500 gathered to listen. An elderly cad, "very much over-fed and under-educated," tried to create a disturbance, but was quickly shouldered out by a sturdy labouring man, and another who attempted to interrupt by asking how much I was paid for speaking, was in turn sent to the right-about, the audience being very sympathetic. A good number of leaflets were given away. On Thursday I again spoke at Colman's, this time to about 700, leaflets being freely distributed. Altogether we had a very good meeting; it could easily be seen they were deeply interested. On Friday we attended an anti-vaccination meeting at St. Faith's, comrade Crotch and myself speaking of the necessity for Socialism to about 400 villagers; and at night I addressed the members at St. Benedict's on Organisation, etc. On Sunday February 27 we had a good meeting at 11.30 at St. Mary's Plain, which was kept up about two hours. In the afternoon, at the Market Place, we had a splendid meeting—about 7000. Darling took the chair, and I addressed the meeting for about an hour and a half. A Christian Mission man named Adie opposed, with the Bible in one hand and Bradlaugh in the other. "Nice man," but his arguments had no hold on the audience, who listened to him with evident impatience. Comrade Crotch also spoke, and was well received. Our opponent's twaddle was easily replied to, and three cheers were given for the social revolution. 11s. 6d. collected, and all Commonweal sold. At 7 o'clock I again spoke opposite the Agricultural Hall to about 500, and at 8 lectured at St. Benedict's on "Human Nature and Socialism," the audience being very much interested. Comrade Slaughter announced that he had at last succeeded in securing "Gordon Hall" permanently, and the meeting broke up full of hope for the future success of the Branch. On Monday February 28 I lectured in the Gordon Hall on "Objections to Socialism" to good audience, followed by a good crop of questions. The meeting finished by singing "No Master" and the "Marseillaise." On Tuesday we mustered in strong force at St. Faith's, and had a very good meeting; the "White House" was packed. Comrade Curson took the chair, and I lectured on "Socialism: What it Means." Comrades Mulls, Darling, Shore, etc., strongly supported. On Wednesday March 2 we had a good meeting at Ipswich on the Cornhill; 500 or 600 assembled and showed their approval.

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

NOTES ON NEWS.

By some accident or other the people have been granted the wonderful boon of being allowed to boat in the London parks on Sundays—those who can pay for the privilege, be it understood.

That the folk are so miserably beaten down that an hour or two's amusement on some particular day is a great thing to be thought of even by the "comfortable artisan"; this is bad enough in all conscience, but that there are so many found willing to take even this one small streak of colour out of their leaden lives is beyond endurance.

The time is past when the people could be kept quiet by the forcible application of a crude ideal of ineptitude and sanctimonious self-mutilation, or bribed into inaction by the promise of celestial delights.

They want their heaven here and now.

Would it not be well for the present-day "rulers of men" to see what they can do toward a gradual approach to social justice? Lest when we deal with the matter our dealing be characterised by a decisive promptitude eminently subversive of their dignified serenity!

By this is not meant Sunday-boating or very much more extended applications of the panem et circenses policy. The people may be amused and so kept quiet for awhile, but the smile presently has rather a grim under-meaning to it, not of good augury for the amusers.

Once more has the City corporation identified itself with a gigantic piece of bribery, but it is quite vain to heap obloquy upon its members as is now being done.

Allow a gang of dacoits or brigands to entrench and arm themselves and store up a mass of plundered wealth; can you then wonder that they defend their position with what weapon comes to hand?

It does no good to stand around and complain to all the gods of their unfair fighting; what must be done is to come to handblows as soon as may be; to resolve on the final extinction of monopoly, upon which rests the power of them and all like them, and then to "fight it out on that line if it takes all summer"!

Meanwhile it is funny to see how impeccable philanthropists, and other self-advertisers—from the purest motives, wriggle and squirm when the foulness is exposed that lies behind the fair show they turn toward the world.

The report of the Committee of Enquiry into the accommodation for prisoners awaiting trial has been presented and reveals a state of things fondly supposed to have died out with the "Holy Inquisition."

An article dealing with the report will appear in these columns as soon as can be arranged; meanwhile may we suggest to the Government the advisability of instituting a companion enquiry—one into the nature and origin of the causes for there being prisoners to be tried?

The Spectator is exceeding wroth over those who look with lenient eye upon "disorder" among an oppressed people. A defender of reaction, it cannot see that émeutes in Ireland, Russia, Alsace-Lorraine, etc., are healthy signs in that they show that the healthy instinct of revolt against oppression has not been dragooned or "civilised" out of existence. H. H. S.

Our heavy contemporary Punch has lately had a cartoon a long way "after" Albert Durer's marvellous cut of the Knight and Death, illustrated by a "free adaptation" from Fouqué's Sintram, to commemorate Bismarck's victory (?) over the Socialists. Our wooden friend with a naïve stupidity quite characteristic of the professional bourgeois jester, has had the impudence to omit the not unimportant figure of Death from his cartoon, although if he had not been quite so dull or so impudently lazy he might have extracted something from Fouqué's romance which would have helped his lame allegory to totter on a step or two.

However we may leave Fouqué's gratuitous interpretation of Durer's immortal work to ask what Durer really did mean by it. For the imagination of the honest and serious craftsman of old Nuremberg, fertile as it was, and though it led him into wild and strange places, was free from any touch of the hysteria which disfigures Fouqué's elegant and even beautiful romances. Durer always meant something definite; and in this case modern historical research has found out what he did mean: his cut is a commemoration of a notable victory over a robber-knight who had long plagued the good town of Nuremberg, and implies a warning to those in high places who live by violence and robbery. The armed man on the war-horse is riding towards no victory, but a shameful death; he has come to "the net end of all his villainies"; and the awful thing that follows him is a tangible image of the crimes of his past life; his greed, rapine, cruelty, fraud, and reckless violence.

So that we may be well content after all to take Albert Durer's "Knight and Death" with his own meaning still cleaving to it, as a figurement of the doom of Blood and Iron of our own day; especially if we look not so much upon the man Bismarck, whom the course of circumstances has so curiously placed in his high position of infamy, but rather upon the type of the armed bourgeoisie, "the strong man keeping his house," which to-day owns all that is made and all that makes, and which after a long period of that confidence of living for ever, which is the natural gift of youth and manhood, is now entering the valley of the shadow of death, and has become conscious of its coming defeat, and of the companions it has made for itself, and so rides on warily and fearfully, Crime behind it, Death before it.

W. M.

THE TRADER'S INTERESTS v. THE PEOPLE'S INTERESTS.

MR. GEORGE HOWELL, M.P., writes in last month's Fortnightly on the "State of Trade," which shows how completely he has failed even to see the question, much less to grapple with it. After wading through pages of statistical calculations, he comes to the conclusion that trade is not alarmingly depressed after all. That we are only going through the usual slight depression after an unusually great expansion. Production has been continually expanding, while it is prices (not the volume of trade) that has fallen. Now, granting that Mr. Howell has proved what no one ever disputed, how much better are we for his investigations? Mr. Howell alleges that the merchants have suffered a large decrease of profits, and everybody else admits that the workers have suffered a large decrease of wages and suspension of work. What a magnificent system of society we live in; capitalists are getting worse off, and the people are getting worse off, yet "trade" is, on the whole, improving! Profits fall and wages fall, yet production is expanding! Then what are we producing, and what use is it in going on producing if nobody benefits by it? Who the devil cares for trade being prosperous if the people are getting worse off in consequence of its prosperity? For it seems, according to Mr. Howell, that it is competition only and not decline of trade that is doing all the harm. Orthodox political economy is getting into the last stages of idiocy in the process of its decline; and, like a certain poet now in his dotage, will go on babbling long after the time for silence has come. Of course, Mr. Howell cannot be regarded as an economist, but his application of orthodox notions to questions of the day forms an interesting though dismal study. The old fallacy—that the interests of commerce and the interests of the people are identical—has long since been shown up, but it still finds adherents here and there, and they are useful. By their advocacy they bring ridicule on the cause they champion, and thus ensure its complete defeat. Mr. Howell had better go on with his work of explaining the ways of the current economy, and he is certain to bring ridicule on it and himself. J. L. M.

SOCIALIST CAMPAIGN IN THE NORTH.

On March 2 I got to Newcastle, and lectured to the Socialistic Discussion Society in the Good Templars' Hall. This society was started some time ago by comrade Pease of the Fabian Society, and has been very useful in bringing Socialism before the public. The audience seemed in favour of the views I took of Socialism and the labour movement. On March 3 I went to Backworth in Northumberland, and addressed about 1000 of the miners now on strike. They received Socialism very well indeed, and were anxious to hear more about it. On Sunday March 6 I addressed two meetings, one at the Sandhill, a place where large numbers of men meet on Sunday mornings, and another in the Haymarket. Both were very successful.

The position of the mining population in Durham and Northumberland is very trying just now. In Northumberland 20,000 men are on strike against a reduction of 12½ per cent. on the wages of all who are earning more than 3s. per day. If the resistance to the reduction fails in Northumberland the Durham mine-owners will undoubtedly insist upon a similar reduction. The Northumberland men are very determined and hopeful, but it is far from certain that they will succeed. The combination against them is powerful and well organised. At the same time there is only too much reason to fear that the labour leaders are not unwilling that the strike should fail. This may seem a hard thing to say, but evidence is strongly in favour of it. The labour leaders are, to say the least, half-hearted. They know that the fight between capital and labour must, in the long-run, end in favour of the capitalists, if the antique methods of trades-unionism are to be the only weapons. Their reluctance to continue the fight is, from the orthodox point of view, justifiable. If the present system is unalterable, as they think, the future of the workers is quite hopeless. To struggle against reductions is only adding to their sufferings. These men, however, refuse to submit without a struggle; and even if they fail—as let us hope they won't—they will have shown that sturdiness of spirit which is only too scarce among the people to-day. The workmen have listened to counsels of moderation too long; they are sick and ashamed of submission to one after another of the slurs cast upon them. If they succeed in warding off the reduction they will still be discontented, and if they fail they will go back to the pits with sore hearts and bitter feeling.

The breach between the miners and their leaders is widening, and before long, I feel sure, the old system of organisation and the old lines of the movement will be radically altered. And there is much need for alteration. I was told by some of the leading men here that the miners were better off now than they had ever been before. If this were true it is a poor boast. There are plenty of miners (not coal-getters though) working for less than 3s. per day; and I was told that, after deducting cost of powder, lamps, and other like charges upon the wages received, the average amount taken home by the miners was from 10s. to 15s. per week. But whether the miners are a little better or a little worse is of little consequence. The main point, and the one ignored by the leaders, is that they are not nearly as well off as they should be. And it is very plain that the miners are ready for a thorough revolutionary movement. Next week I shall have a good deal more to say upon this aspect of the question.

I have now arranged for a thorough campaign amongst the men of Northumberland and Durham. On Friday last I issued a programme of meetings and a short address on a leaflet. I sent a paragraph to all the papers, which many of them inserted. I called upon the editor of the Newcastle Daily Chronicle and explained my object: was courteously received, and invited to state my views and plans in a special article. This I have done, and the article, which appeared in the issue of Monday March 7, seems to have made a good impression. John Williams, of the Social-Democratic Federation, had been here a week before I came, and H. Parker, sent by the Strike Committee of the Socialist League, about ten days earlier. At the end of last week J. Hunter Watts also turned up, so that there is now quite a force of Socialist speakers here. The talk is chiefly of Socialism, and it is easy to see there is a strong feeling in our favour. I have worked quite harmoniously with the S. D. F. members, and hope to continue to do so.

There is a splendid chance of pushing the Socialist propaganda here. The workers have got tired of the orthodox movement, and are ready to embrace Socialism. There is no part of the propaganda of such practical and pressing importance as the support of a vigorous missionary expedition among the miners and iron-workers of the north. I trust that friends of the propaganda will not fail to subscribe what they can to the expenses.

I shall write fully every week on the progress of the campaign.

RIOTOUS BEHAVIOUR OF POLICE IN HYDE PARK.

LAST Sunday, Hyde Park was made the scene of another scandalous attempt on the part of the police to create a riot. The usual meetings were being held near the Marble Arch by Socialists, Home Rulers, and Christians. Shortly after the speaking had begun about fifty police, led by an inspector, appeared on the scene, and began to hustle the people about who were standing on the pathways. It must be understood the way was quite open to all who desired to pass through, so it was an act of pure officiousness on the part of the police to interfere at all. If they wished the pathway to be kept clear, the proper way was to have asked the speakers to invite those who wished to listen to them to come inside the railings. Instead of acting in this common sense manner they hustled the people about in a most disgraceful fashion, which ultimately so exasperated the crowd that they formed themselves in tolerably compact masses and retaliated in like manner on the police. Some mounted police appeared on the scene, which was the signal for more pushing and rushing. Two men were arrested because they objected to be dragged by the police. This riotous behaviour completely spoilt our meetings. This game of the police is a very artful one. They wish to make these disorderly scenes Sunday after Sunday for a few weeks, and get lying newspapers to report "riotous scenes caused by Socialists in Hyde Park," and so endeavour to create an opinion in the public mind that a new rule must be issued prohibiting all meetings in the Park. We ask all friends of freedom to prevent this miserable little trick of the police being successful. In future it would be well to invite the people that listen at our meetings to keep within the railings, and so prevent the police having any pretext for hustling and creating disturbances. I ask the men who read this to consider whether they are prepared to pay police rates, not to get protection but to get assaulted. These policemen, who ought to be looking after preventing the burglaries and other crimes that are continually being perpetrated, are to be found bullying the citizens who feed and clothe them, who have met in their own park to discuss public affairs. This is not the thin end of the wedge that has been got in long ago, this is evidently a deliberate attempt of the police to suppress public discussion. We have yet to learn that Englishmen are prepared to tolerate such impertinence! One would have thought Sir C. Warren would have left the business of creating disturbances at public meetings in the hands of the Fowler, Kelly, and Kenny gang, but it seems not.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE AMBLESIDE RAILWAY BILL.

If you can spare sufficient space I would like to lay a few facts respecting the above project before your readers, so that they may judge whether the outcry raised against it (mostly by ignorant outsiders) has good cause or not.

It is proposed to project the Kendal line from Windermere to Ambleside, a distance of only six miles, and not through the "Lake District" but a trifling portion of it. The line will run through woods most of the way, and will thus be hidden from view. It will keep at a considerable distance from the margin of the adjacent lake, Windermere, which although the largest is also the least interesting.

As things stand at present tourists are landed at Windermere Station, an uninteresting place two miles from the Lake, and if, as is natural, they desire to go to Ambleside they must take the coach and pay 2s. or else walk, and this for persons who are only down for the day is a great inconvenience, and an unnecessary expense to those who like myself are not in such favoured circumstances as Ruskin or our friend W. Morris. Once arrived at Ambleside, no one objects to a mile or two of walking to Rydal and Grasmere, but it doesn't pay most folks if they have walked the other part of the way as well. In the Commonweal 'Notes' last week, we workers are enjoined to wait for the Socialist millennium before we enjoy the Promised Land even for a day. The Ambleside people will benefit greatly in cheaper coals and provisions, and the artisans of the North will benefit if the hindrances to a proper enjoyment of the neighbourhood are removed. We Cumberland and Westmoreland people yield to no one in our love and respect for the beauties of the district, but we are unanimous in favour of the Bill, and if we had local autonomy would pass it speedily.—Yours fraternally, Carlisle, Feb. 27.

TOM MUSE.

[It seems to me that our friend in his enthusiasm for railways is unconsciously playing into the hands of the capitalist robbers, who are the only persons who will be really benefitted by it as things go. In the first place this railway is meant to be the first step in the invasion of the Lake country, and will certainly not stop at Ambleside if the projectors can help it. The question is nothing less than this, Is the beauty of the Lake country, and the natural wish that people have to see it and enjoy it, to be handed over to be exploited without limitation by a company who looks upon the public as so much material for exploitation? If it is to be so, its beauty will soon be a thing of the past, and when you have taken the trouble to bring people into the once lovely and romantic country they will find that they have come indeed, but come to nothing, and might almost as well have stayed at home, and had far better have strolled into some country side less renowned for beauty, and therefore not so tempting to the runners of those horrible pests, the tourist railway and the tourist hotel. The intention of the capitalists in this matter is to make the Cumberland and Westmoreland "show-country" a mere appendage to their filth-heaps of Manchester and Liverpool, and they allege the necessities of their filth-heaps as a reason for this. But the rest of the country have a good right to say, The concoction of your filth-heaps is no valid reason for your destroying the wealth of the whole country, nay, the wealth of the world; something of the natural beauty of the face of the country has been left in spite of your foul greed and disregard of other people's rights, and that, wofully little as it now is, we are at last impelled to guard against your greed. For my part, while admitting that it is seen in queer places, I cannot help thinking that the spirit which takes this view is a part of the great wave of social feeling which will one day sweep away monopoly and enable every one to have his due share of the pleasures of the world; whereas the feeling of jealousy of local interests and prejudices, even when expressed by a Socialist, is but the remnant of the unsocial feeling forced upon him by the present conditions of life. One may say in passing that the presence of the railway in a new district is not a benefit to it; it brings more trade to it, more employment, and therewithal more competition for employment; it cheapens one thing and raises the price of another; or, if it cheapens things generally, it is clear that it will lower the wages of the labourers, though doubtless it will increase the incomes of those who live on them, which once more is its object. I entreat our friend not to help in killing the goose that lays the golden eggs; it is true that to the company which wishes to exploit us it is of no importance that the golden eggs should cease to come, since they will be other people's eggs; but to us the rest of the public, both that are and that are to come, it is of much importance. Short-sighted brutality wherever it is met with, and whoever and whatever its source may be, is unsocial, and should be attacked by all Socialists.]—ED.

'The Industrial Problem Solved,' by W. B. Robertson (Modern Press, 1d.) is a brief but forcible exposé of the current fallacies anent overpopulation and overproduction. It is worth reading.

The verbatim report of the debate on "Is Socialism Sound?" between Annie Besant and Mr. Foote, is announced as shortly ready, price one shilling. We hope that the "cheers" which followed Mr. Foote's melodramatic attitudinising, and other expressions of the audience, will be omitted. The "points" are generally lost when the matter is printed, and the average reader has little interest in the particular feelings—sometimes very partisan—of the audience.

TAKING HIM AT HIS WORD.—At a public meeting held at Enderby, in the Harborough division of Leicestershire, on Thursday evening, March 3, the following resolution was carried unanimously: "That this meeting, accepting in all good faith the statement made in the House of Commons on Monday Feb. 28 by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in reference to the wages of copyists employed by the Government, that 'men who are in the position of trustees of public money are bound to see that public money is not wasted beyond what is the market price of labour,' beg to call the attention of the Secretary to the fact that in the present condition of the labour market Secretaries to the Treasury might be obtained for less than £2000 each per annum; a Lord Steward of Her Majesty's Household, who would do something for his salary, at less than £2000 per annum; a Lord Chamberlain for less than £2000 per annum; a Master of the Horse, possessing some practical knowledge of horses, at considerably less than £2500 per annum; Grooms-in-Waiting for less than £334 each for a few weeks' waiting; and Lords-in-Waiting who would consent to bear her majesty company at dinner without being paid £702 each for about six weeks of such honourable duties."

CHARITY.—It is a mistake to suppose that the rich man maintains his servants, tradesmen, tenants, and labourers; the truth is, they maintain him. It is their industry which supplies his table, furnishes his wardrobe, builds his houses, adorns his equipage, provides his amusements. It is not his estate, but the labour employed upon it, that pays his rent; all that he does is to distribute what others produce, which is the least part of the business.—Dr. W. Paley, D.D.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

WEAVERS' STRIKE IN ABERDEEN.—The weavers in the employment of Messrs. Richards, Broadford Works, numbering 700, have struck for a five per cent rise in their wages.

THE AYRSHIRE MINERS.—The strike in Ayrshire is now at an end, the men having resumed work on the understanding that whatever settlement is come to in Lanarkshire will also apply to Ayrshire.

YARMOUTH.—The smackmen are about to strike against a "rearrangement of wages" dodge of Messrs. Hewitt & Co. It is expected that 3000 or 4000 men will be affected.

SOUTH STAFFORD.—The ironworkers of this district have given notice to the employers, through the secretary of the Wages Board, of a demand for an advance of 10 per cent. on the present rate of payment. The claim will be considered at the meeting of the board next month.

At a conference of miners representing 50,000 men of South Staffordshire and district, it was resolved to make a general collection in aid of the North of England miners now on strike.

At a meeting of the Hetton Branch of the Durham Miners' Association, it was decided to contribute £10 to the Strike Fund, and they recommend that a contribution of £1000 be at once sent the Northumberland men from the General Fund, the amount to be repaid by a levy of 6d. per member.

The Sleatburn Branch of the Durham Miners' Association have agreed to a levy of 6d. for men and 3d. for lads for the support of the Northumberland men as long as the strike lasts.

The Bolton branches of the amalgamated engineers, engine makers, and metal planers have demanded an increase of wages of 2s. per week, bringing them to the same rate as in the early part of 1886. The masters refuse, and a strike is expected.

The chainmakers strike still continues and there is little likelihood of its terminating. Funds are wanted; great distress prevails; trades' unionists should bring the matter before their respective societies. Next week will be reprinted from the St. James's Gazette an account of how chains are forged at Cradley heath.

THE SCOTTISH MINERS.—The miners have all returned to work pending the conference between the Lanarkshire men and their masters. Little hope is entertained of an agreement being arrived at. The men appear sanguine that if the conference fails a national strike will take place, in which case they are confident of victory.

BURNLEY—REDUCTION OF THE HOURS OF LABOUR.—The miners and all other classes of workmen in the employ of the executors of Colonel Hargreaves, many of whom had to work till 4 p.m. on a Saturday afternoon before they received their wages, have been ordered to cease work at 1 p.m. in the future, and all wages are to be paid by that time. This is a distinct gain to the men, who will have three hours of work less and can enjoy a full half holiday on Saturday like all other classes of workpeople.

LEICESTER.—A strike has occurred in the Cardigan branch of Messrs. Pool, Lorrimer, & Tabberer's, hosiery manufacturers, Leicester. Two years ago the men submitted to a reduction of 10 per cent rather than see the machines removed elsewhere. Within the past few days the firm has asked that each workman should take two or three girls to work under him, or submit to see the machines removed to Foleshill, near Coventry. The workmen have refused to entertain the proposal, inasmuch as it would in every instance substitute two or three girls for the same number of men.

At a conference of miners representing 50,000 men employed in East Worcestershire, South Staffordshire, and Cannock Chase, held at Walsall, to consider the propriety of giving notice for a 10 per cent advance of wages, a committee was appointed to draw up a notice to be presented to the employers on the 19th of March (providing the Cannock Chase miners agree to such a course), requiring an advance of 6d. per day in the wages of men engaged in the thick coal seams, and of 3d. per day in the wages of those employed in the thin coal seams.

MANCHESTER BUILDING TRADE.—There are no signs of activity in building work here. The only job of note is the Jubilee Exhibition employing about 1,000 hands, which will be entirely finished in two months, and a large number of hands will necessarily be thrown out of work. The overtime question has again been raised. The majority of employers will not pay extra for any overtime the men are forced to work. A slight attempt has recently been made by the men employed on the exhibition job to defend their interests. A shop meeting was held to discuss the overtime question. It shows up the disorganised state of the men when the "Amalgamated" and "General Union" Societies stand "tamely" by whilst every advantage won by the men in past years is swept away. Manchester building operatives from 1833 to 1877 were to the front in labour movements, at present they are in the rear. When will the "leaders of the unions" lead the men to organise their forces? The Birmingham men are fighting bravely. —GLENER.

THE ASHTON STRIKE.—This strike has now lasted ten weeks, and there is still no sign of settlement. The Northern Counties Amalgamation of Weavers seem fully able to carry on the struggle indefinitely. There has never been a strike in the weaving industry which has been so systematically supported. The funds come in steadily, and the "hands" have no need to be in a hurry. As to the reports that are being circulated in the employer's interest as to the number of looms running, the Cotton Factory Times says: "We have taken the trouble to ascertain the class of weavers that are at work in Ashton. The fact is, a great number of them are not weavers, nor likely to be for some time to come. Some of them are warehouse boys, and all sorts of odd hands who work about the mills. It would be nearer the mark if they would count heads instead of looms. We will give our readers a sample of what we mean. We saw an overlooker who was at work a short time since, and he told us that in his section he had fifteen weavers at work, counted by heads. But only two of these were his old weavers, and the other thirteen weavers were very successful in spoiling the work they wove. If the Ashton employers are thinking of being successful in the end by this means, they will find it very costly."

THE DISPUTE IN THE NOTTINGHAM ENGINEERING TRADE.—The fifty or sixty members of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, the Steam Engine Makers, and Moulders' Societies, who recently struck work at Messrs. Man-love, Alliot, Fryer, and Co., Bloomsgrave Works (owing to the dismissal of unionists by that firm on their declining to accede to a reduction of 2s. on their earnings of 34s. a week), still remain out, and there is no prospect of any immediate settlement. So well organised is the intelligence department of the unions that many of the best skilled workmen have already found employment in the town and neighbourhood, and places so far distant as Southampton have helped to absorb the men who would otherwise have been a burden upon the societies' strike funds. On the other hand, a considerable number of non-unionist workmen remain in at Bloomsgrave, and feeling runs high in Radford in consequence. A number of workmen, recently imported from London, returned on learning the true state of affairs. The monthly report of the amalgamated society just issued, records an improvement in trade generally, and the union officers are sanguine that they will shortly be able to find employment for the remainder of the men. The Strike Committee, which sits daily, is receiving every encouragement and assistance, not only from affiliated societies, but from trade union organisations generally.

LEEDS, March 7.—A strike is now in operation at Messrs. Fowler and Co., Steam Plough Works, Hunslet, against the attempt of the masters to introduce absolute piece-work amongst the turners, some 46 men and boys. They also complain of the actions of the manager, or the middleman, as they term him. It has been the custom so far in Fowler's that the men work for a weekly wage, but also get any balance they may have above the price laid down for the respective jobs. For the last three years there has been a gradual reduction of the prices, so that now, instead of the men making a balance, they are getting further into debt every week, and now the masters want to dock the deficiency out of their weekly wage. Some jobs for which they used to receive three shillings they now get eighteen-pence, and so on right through. There is a hope that the strike will be made general throughout the shop. The masters have been forcing other men in the shop to do the work of the strikers, but the union men say that if the same trick is done to-day (Monday) they will all put on their coats and leave the shop. The story of the men reveals such a system of robbery as would be hard to equal, instances having occurred where the prices have been reduced after the work has been done. On Sunday afternoon the strikers held an open-air meeting on Hunslet Moor. Two of the strikers gave a short address each, showing the terrible conditions under which the hands of Fowler's work. One of them named Bromley, a foreman, openly stated that the masters had offered him a bribe of four pounds weekly to introduce absolute piece-work among the turners, but he being an honest man, spurned the bribe, for which he was suspended. After these had spoken, T. Maguire of the Socialist League addressed the audience, and showed the necessity of the united action of the workers to defeat the masters. He was listened to with much interest, and lustily cheered. He is to speak again to-night at a mass meeting at Penny Hill. Further particulars later on.—F. C.

AMERICA.

The South Boston street railway employes, including track layers and car repairers, have struck for the ten hours' day.

Coopers of Chicago have organised a co-operative factory with 100,000 dollars capital. No one can hold more than twenty-five shares.

The Brotherhood of American Carpenters is the largest trades union in the United States. It now numbers 246 branches with 41,250 members.

NEW YORK, Feb. 20.—It is so rare that an architect, who thinks that he is boss and that mechanics are really machines, apologises to a walking delegate, that when one does so, it is really worthy of mention and record. Such a singular phenomenon occurred last Tuesday. The new walking delegate, Robert F. Farrell, of the United Order of Carpenters, entered a new building on Broadway, on a tour of inspection, in the course of which he ran foul of Architect Young, who ordered him off the building. He went. So did the carpenters. So also did the other workers, 250 in number all told. Then Architect Young saw his mistake, and after a conference with the Board of Walking Delegates, made the amende honorable. The delegates will not be ejected from that building during its construction.—John Swinton's Paper.

UNION OF CHINAMEN.—The universality of the labour movement is shown in the efforts of the Chinese of New York city to organise a labour union. Here is a despised race, lifted by contact with a higher civilisation than their own, preparing to assert their rights in common with their brothers of other nations. It is a pity our industrial system necessitates our prohibiting the immigration into this country of Chinamen, but so long as the present wages system lasts this prohibition is necessary to prevent our being dragged down to their level. It is not from the fact that those people are Chinamen that the workingmen object to them, but because they can be and are made instruments in the hands of unscrupulous employers to bring Caucasians down to the level of the wants and desires of these Mongolians. Those that are here now we can handle, but no more must be admitted to our shores. Meanwhile may the Chinese laundrymen of New York city be as successful as one could wish in their effort to organise.—Advance (Detroit).

COLLAPSE OF THE GREAT STRIKE.

Notwithstanding the heroic efforts of the labour army engaged in this great struggle since the beginning of the year, it has been forced to succumb to the overwhelming forces arrayed against it on behalf of the monopolists. The necessities of the enormous multitude of unemployed labourers thrown destitute upon the streets by the operation of the competitive system of production, have once again been utilised by the cannibal capitalists to defeat the claims of organised labour. But though defeated it is not dismayed. The workers have shown in this fight greater solidarity than was ever known before, and the effect of the present temporary check will doubtless be to bring about such a combination as shall at no distant date not only retrieve the present disaster, but do something towards overthrowing the accursed rule of the exploiters. The freight handlers have suffered the worst of any of those who struck for "sympathy." There are 3000 of them, and their places have been filled in the majority of cases. The weighers' labourers in the Williamsburg sugar refineries have also lost heavily, platform scales having been introduced, by which 150 out of 300 will be without work. The following from John Swinton's Paper, of Feb. 20th, shows that the fight was still going on in some quarters: The International Boatmen's Union is composed of about a thousand men, 600 of whom own their own boats. The members have refused to allow their boats to be loaded by "scabs." They say their insurance policies call for skilled labour, and until they are assured that those who load and trim their boats are skilful they will remain tied up. They are a jolly set of hardy fellows, and a visit to their headquarters the past week was refreshing, because one could see that although they had not earned anything since Jan. 1, they had sufficient to eat and were in good spirits. Many of them had been tempted with large offers of money to break away, but they have held fast. No one can tell how far the results of the strike will extend. Two weeks ago a committee called on the engineer at Jones' flour mills, Lewis and Bloom Streets, and asked him to strike. He refused. The committee threatened to "get even," and next morning the millers struck, 150 men being reduced to idleness. When the strike was declared off by 49, the men returned to work, but Mr. Jones said they must come back as individuals. Again they struck. The firm uses from 1,500 to 2,000 barrels a-day, and M. and E. Connolly, of New York and Brooklyn, had the contract to supply them. The millers induced Connolly's men to strike—160 in both cities. The coopers are well organised, and Connolly could not get men. The firm tried to get barrels from other sources. A. Briggs, of Cherry and Rutgers Streets, supplied some, and the hundred men there struck. Connolly got barrels from other cooperages, and before this reaches our readers there may be a general strike of the coopers.

FRANCE.

MEHUN-SUR-YEVRE.—A public meeting was organised last week by the Corporation of porcelain-makers in consideration of the still-continued strike here. Baudin came from Vierzon and addressed the meeting, which was well attended, and a resolution in favour of the continuance, by hook or by crook, of the strike was unanimously passed.

VIERZON.—The municipality of Vierzon has decided to divide between the strikers and those at work in their place at the Société Française the modest sum of 500 francs which had been voted by the General Council of the Seine in aid of the victims of the stoppage of work there. The strikers decidedly object to this arrangement, and refuse to touch a sou of the sum in question if the "renegades" go shares.

SAINT-ETIENNE.—A serious explosion here has caused much loss of life and trouble among the miners and their families. The scene of the disaster has been examined, and in the interior structure of the galleries some of the supports have been pronounced very insufficient and unsafe. Such catastrophes as explosions may be inevitable occasionally in such a dangerous occupation, but how gratuitous and easily prevented are the accidents arising from economy of material and economy of work necessary for safety of the miners down below!

A large meeting was held in Paris last week by the League for the Suppression of the "Bureaux de Placement" (agencies for procuring employment), at which the female sex, we are glad to note, was well represented. After a discussion concerning the rejection of the numerous signed petition for the suppression of the "Bureaux" which was presented to the Chambre, a resolution was passed directing the deputies Basly and Camélinat, etc., to present for discussion before the Chambre as soon as possible a bill for the official or municipal organisation of gratuitous "Bureaux de Placement" throughout the country.

The current price in Paris for making and finishing a pair of shoes, the Cri tells us, is 1 fr. 60 c., which price a certain firm manages to reduce to 95 centimes, with the help of that precious institution, "division of labour," one of the three factors of the product being feminine—and paid accordingly. The workmen at this establishment work on the average eleven hours a-day, and can make 4 or 5 francs, the women work fourteen and fifteen hours, and make with difficulty and rarely 4 francs at this laborious occupation, both being subjected also to all sorts of reductions and trivial expenses necessary for their work.

CETON (Orne).—There is a certain excitement among the population of this town owing to the strike of 300 women in the glove-factory. The director of the workshops had for a long time subtracted 50 centimes a-day from the wages entirely on his own responsibility, making a little supplement to his income of 400 francs a-day. The strikers are exerting themselves in making house-to-house visitations among the women employed at the works, to encourage them to resistance. We gather from the journals that the inhabitants of the district (apparently in want of excitement) joined heartily in the drama, and executed a sort of cheerful war-dance outside the dwelling of the director, and were even impolite enough to burn his woman-kind in effigy. Gendarmerie are in the town—and history goes no further.

A workman at the steel-works at the Quai de Grenelle took it into his head last week to put an end to the pleasures and pains of his "boss" by a pistol-shot, and thereafter to shoot himself through the head. No particular reason for the enactment of this drama has been discovered. That the director had lowered the salaries to a great extent in the last three years, and further had hired Italian labour to the detriment of the natives, can scarcely be looked upon as a reason sufficient nowadays, when such trifles are constantly occurring. The criminal, who thus wisely evaded the law of his country, had been, however, the only member who had ever ventured to remonstrate at any bit of injustice, and had shown himself much discouraged of late by the course of events. His principles may have been those of a "bold bad terrorist," or he may have been merely a discontented worker, at odds with the world and himself, and not quite crushed enough to go along through life licking the shoes of his master and owner uncomplainingly.

ITALY.

The Italian Government has undertaken the arduous task of crushing out of existence the young Socialist party, most of the 133 sections of which, especially those of upper Italy, are constantly dissolved, stifled in their birth, their funds, flags, libraries confiscated and the prominent members dispersed (witness the late trials, and Kerbs of the Fascio Operaio expelled from the country). Nevertheless the members of the party thus disintegrated have retained their activity and enthusiasm, and profess themselves as anxious as ever to "spread the word" individually, and we are certain they will do so, in the teeth of the police supervision and State repression which encompasses them.

GORDONA.—This little town becoming more and more impoverished, it was at last decided to refuse to pay the imports due, the result being an attempt at seizures of the farms and dwellings. But at the first farms the soldiers and officials were received by the country-folk with a shower of stones and were finally put to flight. There is a certain cheerful little process known as "trying to get blood from a stone" which the Italian manorial lord puts into practice with more brilliant success than most people. It is not, however, much satisfaction to hear of it failing now and then—it only means there is nothing to give up; the unselfish peasant would not be mean enough to keep goods for himself that were due to his lord and master!

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

Outdoor Propaganda.—The Council at their last meeting passed the following resolution:—"That the speakers at Hyde Park invite the audience to keep within the railings so as not to obstruct the foot-paths; and that all members of the League attending such meetings be careful not to obstruct the foot-ways on such occasions." Out-door speakers are requested to attend meeting to-night (Saturday) at 7 p.m., to consider question of outdoor propaganda.

Lessons in French.—Comrade Victor Dave has kindly volunteered to give lessons in French at the offices of the League on Tuesday evenings, at 8 o'clock. The names of those desiring to join the class should be sent to the secretary.

Reports for "Commonweal."—Branch Secretaries are requested to make their reports as brief as possible, dealing with points of general interest as to the progress of the propaganda, rather than attempting to give the substance of the lectures, for which there is not space, even if it were otherwise desirable. Notices should be confined to purely business announcements and written separately. Reports and Notices should be addressed to the "Printer," and cannot be guaranteed insertion unless they reach the office by 2 p.m. on Tuesday.

THE NORWICH PRISONERS' AID FUND.

Our comrade Mowbray, who has been sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, leaves his wife and five children totally unprovided for. The costs of the trial amounted to £60; this has to be paid and the wife and family of Mowbray provided for during his imprisonment. This means altogether at least £100. Henderson has received sentence of four months' imprisonment. You are earnestly appealed to, to give them all the assistance you can.

Already acknowledged, £25, 2s. 1d. J. Davis, 1s. Collected: Glasgow Branch S.D.F., 3s. 6d.; Blackburn do., 3s. 10d.; Leeds Branch S.L., 2s.; Lancaster do., 5s.; Hackney do., 4s. 10d.; At Cleveland Hall, by Traunke, 7s. 9d.; do., by Cantwell, 1s. 4d.; By Heric, 1s. 6d. Comrade Henderson on the Tread-Mill.

The brutality of the bourgeois prison regulations have been strikingly shown in the treatment of our comrade Henderson, a youth of delicate health. He was set on the tread-mill, with the result that he fainted. The prison doctor's attention was drawn to his condition, but this functionary saw no reason to interfere in the matter, and Henderson was accordingly ordered on the "mill" again. He fainted again, and again he was ordered on the "mill"; and not until he had fainted three times did the doctor consent to his removal. If this kind of treatment is continued, the sentence of four months will virtually mean, to a youth of Henderson's delicacy of constitution, a sentence of death, or at best broken health for life.

BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, March 2, Annie Besant lectured to a good audience on "Means for Staving off Revolution." She pointed out that the proprietary classes are busy in devising plausible schemes to enlist the aid of the workers in maintaining their monopoly, by the creation of large numbers of small holders of property, instancing the Allotment Scheme, Leasehold Enfranchisement, and Peasant Proprietary as measures which it behoved all Socialists most strenuously to oppose. Emigration was another matter that required particular attention, as it tended to denude the country of the most energetic workers, leaving those behind more and more at the mercy of the exploiters. Good discussion followed. On Sunday, March 6th, Laurence Gronlund gave a very interesting lecture on "Continental Socialism." Other Branches should secure the above lecturer for this subject. Several meetings have been attended during the week by members of this Branch. Literature has sold fairly well.

CROYDON.—On Sunday evening, G. Burcham lectured on "The Meaning of Socialism" in place of S. Mainwaring, who was summoned to Norwich. He dealt very ably and exhaustively with his subject, and pointed out the fallacy of supposing that the eight hours' movement or even land nationalisation were themselves Socialism, or that they were anything else at most than approaches to it. His remarks called forth much criticism, to which he replied. Collection good. Next Thursday, J. Fielding delivers a lecture at the West Croydon Liberal and Radical Club on "Malthusian Fallacies."—A. T., ast. sec.

GARRETT AND SUMMERSTOWN.—On Sunday morning last, the members of the Merton Branch mustered outside of the "Plough Inn," Garrett, from which we have been debarred indoor meetings through the action of the police, and we held a successful open-air meeting. A large amount of literature was distributed. We intend to meet the police intimidation by establishing a Branch in the neighbourhood.—F. KIRZ.

HACKNEY.—On Sunday evening, H. Davis lectured to a good audience on "The Modern Trinity: Land, Labour, and Capital." Good discussion. We will give at this Branch a free concert on Saturday, March 19th, to welcome our comrade James Allman, on his release from Holloway Prison. We hope all comrades and friends will attend. All members of the Socialist League and friends that can spare the time should be at Holloway Prison to welcome him on his release on Saturday, March 19th, at 8 a.m. Received Justice.—H. MATTHEWS, sec.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday evening, comrade Hill, a local member, lectured on "Co-operation v. Competition." The audience, though not very large, was sympathetic. A good discussion followed.—S. G., sec.

EDINBURGH.—We have begun March month well. On Monday, in Free Tron Hall, Edward Carpenter lectured on "The Morality of Interest." On Tuesday in Trinity Hall, Leith, he had a crowded audience. The lecture is well reported in a local paper. This is perhaps the first Socialist lecture delivered indoors in Leith. On Wednesday, in large Tron Hall, E. Carpenter again lectured, his subject being, "Justice before Charity."—G.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at midday, Glasier addressed a large and sympathetic audience on Jail's Square. In the afternoon, he delivered a lecture on "The Majesty of the Law" to Glasgow Branch of the Irish National League. The lecture, which was a wholesale condemnation of law and constitutionalism as the whips and fetters of landlords and capitalists, was well received by the meeting. At 5 o'clock, Edward Carpenter had an interesting conference with our members in our rooms. In the evening at 7, E. Carpenter delivered a lecture on "The Mammon of Five per Cent." to a good audience in the Assembly Rooms. The lecturer pointed out the immorality of the exaction of interest and profit, and made an impressive appeal for Socialism.—J. B. G.

HAMILTON.—On Thursday, under the auspices of the Lanarkshire Miners' Association, a mass meeting of miners was held in the Low Quarries. Cunningham Graham, M.P., delivered an address advising the abolition of royalties, and claiming for the miners a participation in the profits of their labour. J. R. McCutcheon, and comrades Small, McMunn, and Mavor also spoke. In the evening, the Branch held a good meeting in Paton's Hall, comrades McMunn and Glasier, of Glasgow, being the speakers. On Saturday, Edward Carpenter addressed an open-air meeting in the Low Quarries. The meeting, which was not large, owing to the announcement being insufficient, listened to the address with much interest. Comrades Muirhead, of Glasgow, and McMunn also addressed the meeting. Afterwards an open-air meeting was held at the New Cross, when Carpenter again spoke. McMunn and Glasier also delivered addresses.—J. B. G.

LEICESTER.—We held open-air meetings on Sunday, Feb. 27th, and again Sunday, March 6th, in Russell Square, at which Barclay, Robson, and Sullivan spoke to audiences about 200 strong. Had friendly discussion, and sold about thirty pamphlets; great interest shown.—T. B., sec.

LEEDS.—On Sunday afternoon, the members of this Branch attended a meeting held on behalf of the men on strike at Messrs. Fowler and Co., Steam Plough Works, Hunslet. After two of the men on strike had spoken, the chairman asked if any one would say a few words for them, upon which our comrade Maguire stood up and received a hearty welcome, and at the close of the proceedings he was invited to address another meeting to be held on Monday night at Penny Hill.—F. C., sec.

MANCHESTER.—Comrade Leonard Hall, of Lancaster, gave an address to the members in our club room on Saturday night. We held an open-air meeting on Sunday morning, at which comrade Prince and Hall spoke. In the afternoon, comrade Hall and Smart spoke at the Flat Iron Market, Salford. C. Hall gave a stirring address at the Crescent Inn, Salford, to the S. D. F. Branch.—F. H., sec.

NORWICH.—We held three outdoor meetings on Sunday, which were all well attended, the speakers being Mainwaring and Lane. The meeting in the Market Place lasted two hours, 6s. 7d. being collected for the Defence Fund. In the evening we had a good meeting at the Gordon Hall, where Mainwaring lectured to our members and a large number of visitors on "Parliamentary Action and Socialists," which resulted in opposition from one speaker, the others being in accord with the lecturer. We are keeping the ball rolling here, and mean to do so.—T. M., sec.

WALSALL.—On Friday, March 4, H. K. Austin lectured on "Socialism, the Why and How," in the place of the Rev. C. Peach, who was unable to be present. The audience was small but attentive.—J. T. D., sec.

DUBLIN.—A meeting of the unemployed, numbering about 3,000, was held on Sunday last at Harold's Cross Green. The chairman, J. B. Killen, B.L., Social Democrat, proclaimed the truth that the land and all the instruments of production ought to belong to the whole community, that the worker should enjoy the fruits of his industry, and that he was justified in using any means whatever in order to get rid of the idle class that fattened upon his misery. Other speeches, notably that of G. A. Apward, were very revolutionary in tone. A large quantity of Socialist leaflets were distributed.—D. K.

POLITICAL NOTES.

THE past few days have brought about a change in the political atmosphere, which may perhaps have startled some persons; but it is not difficult to explain. The Government placed between the devil and the deep sea, have been screwing up their hearts for a Coercion Bill. This seems at first sight a simple and natural proceeding for a Tory Government, a thing which everybody would expect from them. But to pass an effective measure of coercion against such a solid opposition as the Irish nation offer to it, and to carry it out when passed, is an adventure which needs the courage of the past ages or of the future—the aristocratic period or the revolutionary one. The age of political farce in which we are now living in England cannot deal consciously with tragedy, though the actors in it can sit and watch many a farce-born tragedy go on before their eyes calmly enough. In fact, the Government swaggers coercion boldly enough but doesn't mean it; all the more as it has no shadow of a Strafford to carry out the policy of "thorough."

Meantime, the "Liberal Unionists" are preparing for a "new departure." Mr. Trevelyan has practically declared himself reconverted to Gladstonian policy, and the greater portion of his party will follow him, since the course of events of late has convinced them the cat is going to jump in the Home Rule direction. Some of the most sanguine of the Liberal prophets are even speculating on the return of Lord Hartington, and have already discounted that of Mr. Chamberlain, whose position, if he does return, would be a rather curious one for a sensitive man, until the lapse of time—say three weeks—shall have reinstated him in his old position of an infallible leader of the democratic party.

The Tory Government then are beaten, and the only question is how they will take their beating, whether they will on the one hand judiciously determine to do nothing, in which case they may yet have a longish lease of life before them, as it is a matter of course that the Liberal party "united" or disunited can have no wish to come in again yet awhile, to accept the responsibility of making peace with the Irish by passing a compromise Home Rule Bill—a somewhat delicate operation.

Or possibly they will ride for a fall by bringing in a fierce Coercion Bill without any hope of passing it, and back this by the promise of a Land Bill to follow it, which the report of the Commission gives them an opportunity of doing. This would give them the chance of appealing to the country with law-and-order in one hand and "remedy" (of the well used delusive kind) in the other; and it is not all so sure, in spite of the Liberal rejoicings now on hand, that they would be beaten in a general election. Yet if they (the Tories) win, what next? And how would they deal with a still unpacified Ireland? And what would their Land Bill amount to? These are questions which they will have to answer if they succeed, although they will certainly forget them deliberately till the moment for answering them comes.

Nor if the United Liberal Party comes in again will its position be either an easy or a triumphant one. The Home Rule Bill must be a compromise, and as such will be accepted by the Irish only as a lever to bring about the full accomplishment of their aspirations. But even before the half measure of Home Rule is gained the underlying question of land and livelihood in Ireland will have to be faced; a question which involves that of the land and livelihood elsewhere. This fact does enlighten a little even the dastardly short-sightedness of Parliamentary politics, as may be noticed in Lord Salisbury's last speech, in which he had the impudence to impugn the patriotism of the Irish, because they have found out that they cannot separate the cause of self-government from that of the livelihood of the people.

Though perhaps he really was saying what he thought on this occasion; for naturally to a Tory the mere superstition of nationality is a more important matter than the reality of the necessity of dealing with the sufferings of an industrious and honest population.

This necessity will be the Nemesis that will presently overtake not only the Tories and the Whigs but the Liberals and Radicals also; unless those last named will face the real difficulty. When Home Rule has been gained and the party question has been laid, we shall then see if the sympathy now so widely expressed for the cottars of Glen-beigh and elsewhere in Ireland was genuine or not. If it is not extended to the dwellers in the Wiltshire village and the London slum, and if the same kind of remedies are not proposed for these latter as for the Irish cottars, it will be proved to have been a mere piece of party clap-trap got up for the occasion. We need not fear but that the occasion will be afforded for such practical sympathy: the Irish question will help to sow the seed of revolution throughout the British islands.

To be sure if the Whigs, Tories and Liberals had any foresight or any courage they would have united to stamp it out this time as they have done before. The Unionist Liberals were wise in their generation when they turned on Gladstone; they are now in coming under his wing again going to exhibit themselves as fools and cowards as well as reactionists.

Happily it always happens so in revolutions; the nearer the time comes for the defeat of reaction, the more pressing its necessities grow, the more the courage of the reactionists fails them, because they begin to be conscious that their cause has become a mere mass of found-out lies and helpless hypocrisies.

WHY WE CELEBRATE THE COMMUNE OF PARIS.

THE "moons and the days" have brought us round again to the anniversary of the greatest tragedy of modern times, the Commune of Paris of 1871, and with it the recurring duty for all Socialists of celebrating it both enthusiastically and intelligently. By this time the blatant slanders with which the temporarily unsuccessful cause was assailed when the event was yet fresh in men's minds have sunk into the dull gulf of lies, hypocritical concealments, and false deductions, which is called bourgeois history, or have become a dim but deeply rooted superstition in the minds of those who have information enough to have heard of the Commune, and ignorance enough to accept the bourgeois legend of it as history.

Once more it is our duty to raise the whole story out of this poisonous gloom and bring it to the light of day, so that on the one hand those who are not yet touched by Socialism may learn that there was a principle which animated those who defended revolutionary Paris against the mingled dregs of the woeful period of the Second Empire, and that that principle is still alive to-day in the hearts of many thousands of workers throughout civilisation, and year by year and day by day is growing in strength and in the hold it has of the disinherited masses of our false society; and on the other hand that we Socialists may soberly note what went on in this story, and may take both warning and encouragement from its events. I have heard it said, and by good Socialists too, that it is a mistake to commemorate a defeat; but it seems to me that this means looking not at this event only, but at all history in too narrow a way. The Commune of Paris is but one link in the struggle which has gone on through all history of the oppressed against the oppressors; and without all the defeats of past times we should now have no hope of the final victory. Neither are we yet sufficiently removed in time from the events to judge how far it was even possible to avoid the open conflict at the time, or to appreciate the question as to what would have become of the revolutionary cause if Paris had tamely yielded itself up to the perfidy of Thiers and his allies. One thing, on the other hand, we are sure of, that this great tragedy has definitely and irrevocably elevated the cause of Socialism to all those who are prepared to look on the cause seriously, and refuse to admit the possibility of ultimate defeat. For I say solemnly and deliberately that if it happens to those of us now living to take part in such another tragedy it will be rather well for them than ill for them. Truly it is harder to live for a cause than to die for it, and it injures a man's dignity and self-respect to be always making noisy professions of devotion to a cause before the field is stricken, on which he is to fight in the body. But with the chance of bodily sacrifice close a-head there come also times of trial which either raise a man to the due tragic pitch or cast him aside as a useless and empty vapourer. To use a transparent metaphor, on the march to the field of battle there are plenty of opportunities for the faint-hearted to fall out of the ranks, and many will do so whose courage and devotion were neither doubted by others nor by themselves while the day of actual battle was far distant. So such times of trial are good because they are times of trial; and we may well think that few indeed of those who fell sixteen years ago, who exposed themselves to death and wounds at all adventure, were mere accidental braggarts caught in the trap. Of those whose names are well known this was far from being the case, and who can doubt that the nameless multitude who died so heroically had sacrificed day by day other things than life, before it came to that?

Furthermore, it must surely be rather more than doubtful to all thoughtful men if the mere exercise of every-day and civil virtues, even when directed towards the social end, will suffice to draw the world out of its present misery and confusion. Consider the enormous mass of people so degraded by their circumstances that they can scarcely understand any hope for their redemption that can be put before them in peaceful and constitutional times. Yet these are the very people for whom we are working; and are they to have no hand in the work, then? is it to be once more according to the degrading Positivist motto, "everything for you, nothing by you?" Meanwhile in these people, unless we Socialists are all wrong, there are seeds of manly and social feeling, capable of large development; and surely when the time comes that their hope will be made manifest, as it was in the time of the Commune, and will lie before them for their hands to take, they will then have part in the work indeed, and by the act of doing so will at once raise themselves out of the slough of degradation into which our false society has cast them and in which it keeps them. The revolution itself will raise those for whom the revolution must be made. Their newborn hope translated into action will develop their human and social qualities, and the struggle itself will fit them to receive the benefits of the new life which revolution will make possible for them. It is for boldly seizing the opportunity offered for thus elevating the mass of the workers into heroism that we now celebrate the men of the Commune of Paris. True they failed in conquering immediate material freedom for the people, but they quickened and strengthened the ideas of freedom by their courageous action and made our hope of to-day possible; and if to-day any one doubts that they were fighting for the emancipation of labour, their enemies at the time had no doubt about the matter. They saw in them no mere political opponents, but "enemies of society," people who could not live in the same world with them, because the basis of their ideas of life was different—to wit, humanity, not property. This was why the fall of the Commune was celebrated by such hecatombs sacrificed to the bourgeois god, Mammon; by such a riot of blood and cruelty on the part of the conquerors as quite literally has no parallel in modern times. And it is by that same token that we honour them as the foundation-stone of the new world that is to be.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

CRIMINAL LAW UNDER SOCIALISM?

If we consider now the order of heinousness in the respective classes of crimes enumerated, we must admit that the first, those against property, since they spring directly from a rotten economic condition, must be regarded as (barring specially aggravating circumstances) the most entitled to consideration. It will be scarcely necessary, however, to controvert the absurd notion put forward by a certain section of Anarchists, that the mere individual appropriation of the property of other individuals, or in plain language theft (such as that practised by the Anarchist heroes, Stellmacher and Duval), has anything whatever to do with Socialism, and the expropriation it advocates. On the contrary, Socialism deprecates robbery in all its forms. The mere change of individual possession of property does not affect the matter in the least. One can very well exonerate the poor man who steals to satisfy his wants; but when a man who has merely satisfied a personal desire of his own at the expense of another person, seeks to cover this individual act with the mantle of principle, an element of hypocrisy enters into the case which tends considerably to exacerbate our opinion of him. Let him steal if he will, but not as an act of devotion to any cause. This, however, by the way. The fact remains that theft and its allied offences are the immediate result of current economic conditions. It is natural that men should seek to obtain the necessities and comforts of life, legitimately if economic conditions allow them, if not, illegitimately.

The second class of offences named, those connected with sexual matters, from rape downwards, may be viewed from two or three different sides, and are complicated in ways which render the subject difficult of discussion in a journal—well, not exactly intended for "family reading," for to that level I trust the Commonweal will never sink—but for promiscuous circulation between the sexes. Here, as in the last case, viz., of theft or robbery, we must be careful in considering such offences, to eliminate the element of brutality or personal injury which may sometimes accompany them, from the offence itself. For the rest I confine myself to remarking that this class also, though not so obviously as the last, springs from an instinct legitimate in itself, but which has been suppressed or distorted. The opinions of most, even enlightened people, on such matters are, however, so largely coloured by the unconscious survival in their minds of sentiment derived from old theological and theosophical views of the universe, that they are not of much value. This is partly the reason, I take it, why the ordinary good-natured bourgeois who can complacently pass by on the other side, after casting a careless look on the most fiendish and organised cruelty in satisfaction of the economic craving—gain, is galvanised into a frenzy of indignation at some sporadic case of real or supposed ill-usage perpetrated in satisfaction of some bizarre form of the animal craving—lust. Until people can be got to discuss this subject in the white light of physiological and pathological investigation, rather than the dim religious gloom of theosophical emotion, but little progress will be effected towards a due appreciation of the character of the offences referred to.¹

The two last orders of crime named differ from the preceding, in that they do not have even a basis in natural or social instinct as such. A brutal assault or malicious injury (i.e., one not inflicted in self-defence or under immediate and strong provocation) is purely and simply inhuman—criminal without having any direct palliation in the facts of economic conditions, like crimes against property, or in physiological and (possibly) economic conditions combined, like sexual crimes. Brutality and cruelty so far outweigh in enormity the two last as to seem almost to swallow them up. For instance, in cases of robbery or rape with violence, it is the personal violence accompanying the substantive crimes which naturally excites one's resentment most; and properly so, although it is the latter of which the bourgeois law primarily takes cognisance. Any crime causing bodily injury or suffering must surely, in the absence of specially palliative circumstances, be regarded as the most deserving of condemnation at the hands of society.

The same may be said of false accusation of crime, an offence which is now classed together with others much less serious, under the absurd name of Perjury, the idea being that its gravamen consists not in the injury done to the innocent but in its insult to the majesty of the law. The unperturbed sense could scarcely conceive of any crime more monstrous than this,² and yet it is one which is frequently passed over lightly, with the view possibly of not discouraging prosecutions and thereby injuring the legal interest. By being classed under the head of perjury, moreover, it sounds less infamous than it really is, mere perjury being a thing recognised and practised in the best social circles, where the co-respondent in a divorce case who has been committing adultery swears he hasn't, as a mere matter of form.

It seems to us that all the serious offences with which any society would have to deal at present may be grouped under the classes named. Of course there are special orders of offences (such as bigamy) which belong essentially to it and to it alone, and with which we have not dealt. According to one view of the matter, crime may properly be defined as an action proscribed by law, and hence may or may not be immoral, since many of the most laudable actions have been, and are, proscribed by law. But in the foregoing I have confined myself to such crime as would be universally admitted to be directly anti-social—for, of course, it is with such only that the administration of a Socialist commonwealth could be concerned.

What has been said, we should mention, touches only the new society, conceived as having already passed through the transitional period of revolutionary crisis, during which, the one aim of Socialism being the victory of the revolutionary principle, any means which would be conducive to that end would of necessity be adopted. For example, the death-penalty, the systematic maintenance of which as an institution is one of the most outwardly repulsive features of the criminal code of civilisation, would probably have to be held to, as the temporary measure of a revolutionary crisis.

And now a final word on the charge of sentimentalism commonly brought against those who object to the repression of crime by organised brutality. It is clear that the distinction between sentiment and sentimentalism in this connection (which has hitherto been conceived as one of degree merely) has been shifted progressively since the sense of horror at the infliction of pain first came prominently to the fore. What in the seventeenth century would have been complacently admitted as a necessity for the repression of crime would now be regarded with loathing (real or feigned) by the most determined supporter of "deterrent" punishments. The notion that there is any fixed point at which justifiable sentiment ends and sentimentalism begins is therefore plainly absurd. But that the distinction has a meaning I am not disposed to deny; although I do not believe it to consist in any question of degree. Sentimentalism is, as I take it, not excessive but illogical sentiment—that is, unequally distributed sentiment. Where there is a strong sensibility to the feelings of one class or body of persons and a comparative callousness to the feelings of other classes under like circumstances—there, I think, we have sentimentalism. And the tendency of the modern bourgeois treatment of crime is precisely in the direction of such sentimentalism.

In the Middle Ages "benefit of clergy" might be claimed by offenders who could read and write, such "benefit" consisting in exemption from the ordinary punishment for the offence. In the modern world all such wicked and unenlightened distinctions are abolished. The law nowadays makes no distinction of persons between men. True; but it makes distinctions between men and women; and where law draws no distinction, practice does. "Benefit of clergy" is superseded by "benefit of sex." Not only are all the more brutal features of "penal discipline" still practised on men abolished as regards women, but the chances of prosecution, of conviction, and if convicted, of heavy sentences, are at least a hundred to one in favour of women. Of course we know that the principle of equality between the sexes, as understood in the present day, demands this, and has been, and is, continually pushing legislation forward in this direction. Unless the social upheaval obliterates current lines of progress beforehand, we may yet live to see "equality between the sexes" realised in laws, whereby no female may be prosecuted for any offence whatever, the nearest male relation being substituted, and where the quiet London wayfarer in a lonely street will be in as dangerous a position as the "unprotected male" in the railway-carriage with a lone woman is now. Of course, any one that points this out is not treated seriously. The sentiment is still on the ascendant, and will have (as things go) to work out its own absurdity by its very excess before it begins to dawn upon the average British intellect that the distinction between the cohorts of Ormuzd and Ahriman is not invariably based on sex—and that persons who would legislate on this assumption are not quite fit to be at large. Meanwhile Ormiston Chant, Garrett Anderson, and Co., will probably have the opportunity of celebrating, in after-dinner speeches, new triumphs of the sexual inequality they have at heart.

In concluding these remarks, we would again point out the truth more than once alluded to in the course of them, that with the establishment of a classless society—a society based on labour for all, leisure for all, and culture for all, through the concentration of its whole productive and distributive capital in its own hands as embodied in its administration—that in such a society crime, and therefore the mode of dealing with crime, must tend to lose its present significance and to become "rudimentary." This is obvious as regards crimes against property and all such as are directly traceable to the present constitution of society. It is none the less true, in the long run, of the rest, which are only indirectly traceable to it. Given a class bred in squalor, and that class is bound to develop a certain number of individuals in whom the dead-level swamp of coarseness inseparable from squalor will overflow into criminal brutality. Given a community in which business capacity is identified with ability to beggar one's neighbour ruthlessly under the name of competition, and where temptation offers you will have (1) direct appropriation by individuals of the property of other individuals—or, theft; and (2) criminal law made use of to subserve private ends—or, briefly expressed, perjury.

But the best illustration of the truth in question is afforded by the relative preponderance of crime in the propertied and unpropertied classes of modern civilisation. From what section is the so-called criminal class recruited but from what Marx has termed the "reserve army of industry"? And is not this the class the precarious conditions of whose existence are continually driving its members to isolated criminal acts, until they become habituated to a life of crime? And yet this reserve army of industry is a necessity of capitalistic production. On the other hand, can crime (in the sense of this article) be said to be common among any section of the well-to-do classes? We have here and there sporadic instances which are commented upon as something remarkable, as showing the depravity of human nature, it is true, but no one can say it is common. If, then, we see an habitual absence of crime in one class, and its habitual presence in another class, both living in the same age and in local proximity, both breathing the pestilential moral atmosphere of the Christian civilisation of these latter days, and differing only in the material circumstances of their life, and the results immediately flowing from these, what stronger evidence can we have of the ultimate dependence of crime on economic condition,—and I may add in conclusion, what greater earnest of the complete disappearance of crime in that future when generations of social morality shall have created human beings, compared with whom the crimeless bourgeois of to-day is but as the brute beast?

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Revista Italiana for this month contains among other matters an able article on the "Two Utopias" by N. Colajanni, and some descriptive notes on the late Socialist trial at Milan by F. Turati.

We have received from Turin the first numbers of a little monthly publication called the "Workman's Propagandist Library," which from its form and price should be of some service in spreading ideas among the labouring class. The writings would, however, answer the end in view more effectively if the style were less florid. The March issue consists of an account of the Paris Commune of 1871.

'Ounces of Prevention.' By T. M. Coan, M.P. (Harper. New York. 25 cents.). This pamphlet would be of some use, doubtless, were not its advice so emphatically of the "take hold of a guinea-pig's tail" order. A large part of it is taken up with denunciation of the "devil of worry" which takes such firm hold of most men to-day. The mingled material anxiety and mental self-analysis which go toward making up this worry are not to be got rid of by argument or medicine. They are the inevitable outcome of the economic and social conditions of a bankrupt and decaying civilisation.

W. N. Armfield of Cairns Road, Battersea Rise, S.W., has issued a broadsheet which he styles "The Humanitarian Socialist Tribute to the year of Jubilee" and in which he advocates municipal reform and the establishment of a labour-note currency. These and kindred schemes require too many "buts" to be discussed profitably on the basis of the present system. Social evils are like the Deevs slain by the Persian hero. Kill the chief (monopoly) and all die, but cut down all the minor ones and they spring up again and again revived by their leader's power.

COAL STRIKE IN BELGIUM.—MONS, March 10.—A strike has broken out in the Borinage district affecting about 2,400 miners employed in the collieries at Quaregnon, Paturages, and Wasmes.

HOW CHAINS ARE FORGED AT CRADLEY HEATH.

Colonel C. E. Stewart, late Assistant-Commissioner in the Afghan Boundary Commission, writes to the St. James's Gazette as follows:

"On arrival at Cradley Heath, which is a poor-looking village in Staffordshire, we found at least 2000 chain-makers assembled in a large wooden building which had been lent by the Salvation Army for the meeting. On entering, the sight that met our view was a sad one. The greater portion of the assembly was composed of men; though some hundreds of women were present, many with babies in their arms. Such pale wan faces among the women and children! while even the men looked pinched, with hunger. In spite of the hungry look, they were cheerful, and tried to make the best of a very hard lot. While waiting for the proceedings to commence they sang several of Moody and Sankey's hymns in a very effective manner, under the leadership of a Salvationist. After the business connected with our association was finished, I asked for information about chain-making and the strike then going on, and was told by Mr. T. Homer, the Chain-makers' Secretary, and others, the following facts connected with their industry. The work is piecework, the men generally taking the iron to their homes to manufacture, though some masters have it made up on their own premises; but even then the work is paid by the piece. A man working sixty hours in the week, and taking no half-holiday on Saturday, can in that time make 7 cwt. of chain, of $\frac{1}{2}$ in. diameter, for which he receives at the rate of from 1s. 8d. to 1s. 10d. per cwt. Even at the higher figure of 1s. 10d. per hundredweight, this would amount to 12s. 10d. Out of this he has to pay a boy as blower 3s. a-week, also to pay 3s. 6d. for the small coal called 'breeze' necessarily used in working up this amount of iron, and 1s. has to be expended in carrying the materials to the master's place of business. This leaves 5s. 4d. as the full wages of a man for hard blacksmith's work for a week of sixty hours. If two men work together, a blower can be hired between them, to whom each man pays 2s.; and under these circumstances the net earnings of an able man would amount to 6s. 4d. a-week. If 8 cwt. of chain were made in the week the earnings would amount to a little more; but few men can make this quantity, and that not regularly every week, so 6s. 4d. may be considered the full wages that it is possible for an industrious and good workman to earn in a week.

"When the father of a family can by his utmost exertions only earn the above sum it becomes necessary that his wife and daughters, if he have any, should earn their own keep, and women work at the forge at chain-making in very large numbers. Working at a forge with men does not seem an occupation fitted for women and girls, and the evil effects of this work upon them, both morally and physically, are very evident. One woman showed me her hand, which was covered with immense hard corns produced by the constant use of the hammer during so many hours a day, and said should women do work that hurt them like that. The moral results of young men and young women working together at the hot forges often in the scantiest attire, is also lamentable. I have heard sad tales of women forging chains up to a very short period of their confinement. For sixty hours' hard work, only fit for a strong man, those poor women receive about 3s. 6d. clear, after paying for breeze and share of blower's wages. Imagine a wage of 3s. 6d. for a week of such toil.

"At last this state of affairs could be endured no longer, the chain-makers struck for an increase of wages. Several of the most important masters withdrew of the strike, and I understand some actually contribute money. Much help is being given by the Nut and Boltmakers' Association, whose secretary, Mr. Juggins, was present at the meeting. Other associations are also helping. As there are 2,000 chain-makers on strike, and these men and women have many depending on them, the whole number who have been rendered utterly destitute by this strike is about 8,000. They have no union of their own, so it is necessary to raise a considerable sum to give even a little help weekly. They say they worked hard and starved, and now they play and starve. This is the twenty-ninth week of the strike, and the sums that have been collected only allow of four quatern loaves, worth 1s. 4d., and 1s. being paid to each family weekly—making a total of 2s. 4d. per family, consisting of a man, his wife, and one child. If there are more children, a very small increase is given; but the whole sum in bread and money given to a family of ten persons is only 4s.

"These chain-makers ask that a hard-working and efficient man should be able to earn about 14s. a week and a woman 7s.; though they think if the man earned as much as 14s. he could keep his family decently and the women would not be obliged to work at the forges. I was shown a chain such as is used to put over the back of a cart-horse and hold up the shafts. The workmen are paid 1½d. for making these chains; cost of iron, galvanising, etc., about 5½d.; total cost, 7d. But they are sold in retail shops at about 5s. each. The chain-makers ask that out of this enormous profit a little more than 1½d. should go to them."

[The only "remedies" that can be thought of by the gallant Colonel, or the "influential journal" to which he writes, are voluntary almsgiving and State-directed emigration. But, why should cruel injustice have the offensiveness of "charity" superadded, and where in the wide world can chain-makers emigrate to and find employment?—Eds.]

On the 7th a meeting of chainmakers was held in the Salvation Army barracks, Cradley Heath. Mr. Thomas Homer, who presided, pointed out that they had completed the thirtieth week of the strike, and had entered upon the thirty-first. They had not yet gained the victory, and it required the operatives to manifest the greatest determination to have the list prices. On the 9th another meeting was held in the New Connexion Schools, Cradley Heath. Mr. T. Homer presided, and stated that those who were out on strike were very badly off; many of them hardly knew how to exist from one day to another. Poverty amongst them was increasing daily, but he hoped that the present state of things would not last long. The landlords had been very merciful towards them, and not a single case had come under his notice where they had levied a distraint for rent. It was stated that some of the masters were still practising the vile truck system, and refused to give the men orders without they agreed to buy gleads of them. He pointed out that they had played the summer out and the winter the same, and nearly played the summer in again, and he said if things did not alter they would be obliged to call the whole trade out again. It was resolved to continue the strike. On the 11th another meeting was held in the same place, Mr. Homer again presiding. The chairman laid stress on the fact that there was every indication of a better state of trade, and as the warehouses were entirely empty, it only remained for them to be firm in order to achieve a victory. It was decided to continue the strike.

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s., six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

CAPITALIST—May be pronounced either as cap-italist or ca-pit-alist. The former is the more correct etymologically, and the latter in accordance with the English custom of accentuating the antepenultimate.

A REVOLUTIONARY COMPANY.

I HAVE lying on my desk before me the prospectus of a new company which is about to be floated, bearing the title of the "Grant Envelope Machine Company." Since the pernicious doctrines circulated amongst the classes in this way, form a constantly increasing menace to society, it would be well if we were occasionally to look into them, in order that when the opportunity arrives we may be able to deal with the prime movers in the way that they deserve.

The prospectus in question, after stating the all important information as to amount of capital required, etc., and the names of the directors (amongst whom are Walter James Waterlow, and Sidney Austin Grant, of Hatton Garden), and other officers, makes the following statement of the objects of the company: "This company has been formed to acquire and develop for Great Britain, France, Germany, Austro-Hungary, etc., all the patent rights of the Grant Rotary Envelope Machine, an important and remarkable mechanical invention, and one which will certainly revolutionise the envelope trade." Of course, as no doubt the reader has often heard, no man proposes a revolution, unless he is likely to gain by it; and the prime movers in a revolutionary movement are always credited with being especially mercenary. This prospectus fully bears out that view. "The directors propose to sell the machine at remunerative profits with an annual royalty, and it is believed that the sales will be sufficient to enable this company within a comparatively short period to pay dividends of from fifteen to twenty per cent. to the shareholders, and to provide bonuses equal to the whole amount paid to the vendors." Fifteen per cent. on £75,000 (the capital of the company) or £11,250 per annum is what the shareholders hope to make by this nice little scheme for causing a revolution in the envelope trade. The Irish M.P.'s were not long ago accused of spending the money collected in support of their League in riot and debauchery in London; one would like to see how far such will be the case with the promoters of this company. But one could forgive them somewhat, if they proposed to do anything really practical and for the benefit of the people. That, however, is not what they want; they intend to be merely sitting at the receipt of custom, to tax the unfortunate dupes who get into their power, and to leave others to do all the work. "The company does not propose to have any manufactory of its own for making the machines, as they will be made on reasonable terms by the present manufacturers of that class of machinery." This shows plainly that instead of meaning any real good to the community at large, their real desire is to forestall the public in these "reasonable terms," and get a living out of the people by putting a tax on envelopes. For, though of course envelopes will be cheaper, the action of this company will merely prevent the people from getting them as cheap as they ought. We shall now get for a shilling envelopes that formerly cost fourteen pence, but were it not for these shareholders we should get them for tenpence instead of a shilling.

This will be the effect of this "revolution" on the buyers of envelopes. And now what about its effect on the makers of them, the actual workers? The new machine, we are told, will turn out as many envelopes per hour as three of the old form. The workers, therefore, ought not to have to work more than a third of their present hours, and this would indeed be a boon to them; but, unhappily, the revolutionist shareholders do not seem to have contemplated any such thing, for the prospectus naively remarks: "The daily capacity of one 'Grant Machine' of ten hours, at nominal speed, is 100,000." Of course, if the makers are to keep on three times as fast as before, one-third of their number will be able to do all the work, and this is what the shareholders anticipate in speaking of a ten hours' working-day. They mean, though they do not care to point it out in plain words, that two-thirds of the present work-people employed in this trade will be unnecessary, and they will expect the capitalist to pay them 20 per cent. more than the real value of his machine, in consideration of having enabled him to rob two-thirds of his employes of the means of life and pocket their wages for himself.

Suppose, then, that this takes place, and these people lose their employment! What, oh most excellent directors, are you going to do for these, whose means of self support you have assisted another to take, so that you may get your 20 per cent.? Your prospectus, I see, has made no provision for that. Do you begin to talk about competition, and supply and demand, and the struggle for existence? Remember, that two can play at that last game. You say that they can emigrate, or go to the workhouse, where the public may keep them? Yes, capitalist, they can do these things, no doubt; and they can do other things besides. Revolutions are not to be monopolised, like machines; and your revolution in the envelope trade may revolve too far, till you are crushed instead of raised aloft by fortune's wheel. You will take the risk of that, you think, for the sake of 20 per cent.? The odds, observe, are all against you, and we play for life or death.

However, it is little use arguing with swindlers and gamblers; they are never convinced. And so the thing will go on, and the men will lose their work; and as times get harder the unemployed will become more dangerous, and East-end landlords have increasing difficulty to get their 20 per cent. or so in the shape of rents. Whereupon these shareholders, and others like them, having brought about their "revolution," and being anxious to prevent the affair from revolving further, begin to think that it would be a good thing if the public would look to their duty, and help the poor whose wages these particular gentry have got in their pockets, so that they may keep quiet and pay their rent. It is not hard to get round the Lord Mayor, and a hireling bishop or two, and then a public meeting does the job. A Mansion House Fund, or Relief Works whereby public improvements can be done cheap is the result, and our shareholder in the envelope machine company subscribes a hundred pounds. It looks well in print; and doesn't his servant, the bishop, teach him in the words of the hymn:

"Whatever, Lord, we lend to thee,
Repaid a thousand times will be,
Therefore we gladly give to thee," etc.?

Who can tell but this may be the best investment of all? At any rate it is expedient and charitable.

And now, oh shareholder, let us see what your charity amounts to. You have perhaps invested £2,000 in this precious scheme (best not ask how you got it to invest), and you realise your 15 per cent.; that is to say £300 per annum, or enough to keep three families; nay, probably it did support as many again till your "revolution in the envelope trade" diverted it from their pockets into yours. And now you return to them £100 once, out of the £300 that you get every year. Is this what your bishop calls feeding the hungry, to starve three men for your own profit, and then toss back the share of one to divide between them and keep them quiet? Is this your notion of clothing the naked, to strip half-a-dozen and then give back to them enough to pay you again the rent you charge them for their home? Truly it is time the day of reckoning came, when it shall be said to you with authority, "Depart, all ye workers of iniquity!"

You hypocrites! And this is how you have thought to hedge between God and Mammon! You have solved the problem, have you, with the help of your bishops and pastors, and contrive now to make good investments for this world and better for the next? "Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can you escape the damnation of hell!"

On Friday, March 4, the House of Lords indulged in a pleasant little chat upon jury-packing, mention of which was, of course, carefully avoided by "intelligent editors" as much as possible. Lords Fitzgerald, Bramwell, and Ashbourne were agreed that jury-packing was not jury-packing, "but simply the due care which the authorities, who select the juries, are bound to take not to include men who are under prejudice or under any influence to decide otherwise than according to the evidence." Lord Bramwell showed that it was quite commonly done in England, and the whole course of the conversation went to prove the Socialist allegation that "law" is only an instrument in the hand of the robber-caste, and is duly administered to their benefit alone.—S.

THE CURSE OF SECRET DIPLOMACY.

IN dealing with the subject of secret diplomacy we must dismiss from our minds all bias in favour of the wisdom and integrity of English statesmen, or prejudice against those of other countries. We must endeavour "to see ourselves as others see us." We must remember, too, that neither laws nor institutions are too sacred for examination; that nothing is too holy for investigation; and that when the air is filled with rumours of coming wars and of alliances and combinations among European states, let us not forget that secret diplomacy is the rule with all the states of Europe—a system by which peoples are bought or sold like flocks of geese.

As in 1876, '77, and '78, England is supposed to be hostile to Russia. Let us not be deceived. The English aristocracy have never yet proved to be hostile to the government of that country. But as we may be drawn into hostile demonstrations, just as we have been in the past, let us see what lessons the past contains for our guidance in the present and future; and as we have to bear the curse and scourge of secret diplomacy, let us see a little of its doings in the last few years.

We all remember the diplomatic proceedings that preceded the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-8. During 1876-7 and the early part of 1878, most people believed the English were determined on fighting Russia and on saving Turkey. How the people were deceived let the following facts show. During the discussions among the Great Powers that preceded the war, the English Government agreed to accept the terms and conditions contained in the Andrassy Note, but refused to accept the Berlin Memorandum. That was in May 1876; and as the latter differed but very little from the Andrassy Note, the English Government were much blamed for that opposition. Of course the people of England knew nothing of what the English Government was doing, yet most people thought that having a Conservative Government in, all was going on well. Still there were some who wanted to know what was being done, and as the months rolled on it was necessary for the Government to say something. On the 20th September of that year the late Disraeli went and addressed his constituents at Aylesbury; and in speaking of the refusal of England to accept the Berlin Memorandum, and their supposed inactivity, he said: "Well, we did propose some measures on our own part. My noble friend, Lord Derby, lost no time in laying down principles upon which we thought that the tranquility of the East of Europe might be secured; that is, he laid down the principles on which we thought that the relations between the Porte and the Sultan's subjects could be established. These communications were occurring constantly between Her Majesty's Government and the other five Powers, from the moment we declined entering into the Berlin Memorandum, and gave our reasons for so declining. There were on the part of all the great Powers cordial attempts to act with us in every way which would bring about a satisfactory termination, but by no Power have we been met so cordially as by Russia." In the above the English premier stated distinctly that the English Government did not remain idle. That, through Lord Derby, they submitted to the Powers other propositions; that those propositions were frequently discussed by all the Powers interested; and that Russia gave them a most cordial consideration. Now would any one believe that the above account was not true; that there was not a word of truth in it? That the English Government did not put forth counter propositions, and that therefore no such discussions ever took place? Lord Derby knew nothing about the propositions he was said to have formulated. The Russian Government (Dispatch, Nov. 22) knew nothing either of the propositions or the discussion in reference to them; nor is there a word in the Blue Books respecting them. Then why was the speech made? To gull the English people. And they were gulled.

During the whole of 1876 and '77, the mass of the people believed the Government sincere in its professed hostility to Russia, and that England would never see Turkey crushed. The Russo-Turkish war began and continued month after month, but the English Government did not declare war against Russia. It is true millions of money were voted for war preparations, and we even brought black troops from India. But we did not go to war. Russia was gradually crushing Turkey; still the English did not help the Turk. The English people could not understand it. The Turkish Government at last became impatient, distrustful. But England did not fight Russia. Turkey became suspicious that all was not right; and on December 21, 1877, Musurus Pacha, Turkish Minister at London, called on Lord Derby at the Foreign Office to know whether the English Government meant to interfere on behalf of Turkey. At that time Turkey was straining every nerve to hold her own as far as possible, and in England people every day expected a declaration of war against Russia. Yet what was Lord Derby's reply to the Turkish Minister? In a Dispatch of Lord Derby's to Mr. Layard, our Minister at Constantinople, dated Foreign Office, Dec. 21, 1877, Lord Derby said (par. 2): "As his Excellency referred more than once to the possibility of English intervention, I thought it right to repeat the warning which I had frequently before given, namely, that no such intervention was to be expected, but that Her Majesty's Government would adhere to the conditions of neutrality which they had laid down." There was no mistaking this declaration of the English Government. Yet the Turkish Government could not believe that England had determined to abandon her to her fate. On Jan. 12, 1878, the Turkish Minister made a last effort. He again appealed to the English Government; and Lord Derby, in a dispatch of the same date, addressed to Mr. Layard (par. 2), said, in reply to the enquiry of the Turkish Minister whether the English Government would not assist the Porte: "I said that I feared not; that, as I had told him from the beginning, we were not prepared to give military assistance to Turkey." And all this time the people foolishly believed the Government were determined not to let Turkey be lost.

But worse remains to be told. Not only were the Government gulling the English people; not only were they deceiving the Turkish Government; but at the very moment they were spending millions in war preparations, they were hand and glove with Russia. Take the following as one piece of evidence. On Dec. 14, 1877, the Turkish Minister called on Lord Derby at the Foreign Office, and enquired if the English Government knew anything of the conditions of peace Russia intended to impose upon Turkey. Lord Derby declared they did not (dispatch to Mr. Layard, same date, par. 2). Mark well the above date. Now would any one for a moment believe, after Lord Derby's denial, that the English Government did know what those conditions were to be? Would any one think it possible that in the June previous the Russian Government, sure of the sympathy of the English Government, had communicated to them the very conditions to be imposed upon Turkey when peace did come? Yet such was actually the case. During the whole of the six months from June 1877, and at the very moment Lord Derby declared to Musurus Pacha that he knew nothing of the intended conditions of peace, the Russian Memorandum containing those conditions was in the Foreign Office. And not only in the Foreign Office, but in the possession of every one of her Majesty's Ministers. When Lord Derby left the Foreign Office and Lord Salisbury became Foreign Secretary, the Conservatives pretended that only Lord Derby knew of those conditions. Mr. J. Mundella wrote to Lord Derby on the subject, and this is Lord Derby's reply: "23 St. James's, London, April 12, 1878. Dear Sir,—I thank you for your note of yesterday. The story of the Memorandum of June last containing the proposed Russian terms of peace having been kept back from the Cabinet is a ridiculous fiction. It was in the hands of my colleagues within a few hours of its being placed in mine," etc. Nor was that Memorandum made public till Feb. 1878, and after we had given the Turkish Minister a final answer that we should not fight Russia.

When Turkey found how she had been deceived by England, she accepted the Russian terms of peace as contained in the Memorandum above referred to. These were embodied in the Treaty of San Stefano, March 26. On April 1, Lord Salisbury sent forth his flaming dispatch, that her Majesty's Government would never agree to the terms of that treaty, pointing out the various conditions one by one, all of which her Majesty's Government would resist. On May 30, the same Lord Salisbury signed a secret Agreement with Count Schouvaloff, Russian Minister at St. James's, agreeing, not only that Russia should have all she wanted, but that at the Congress (of Berlin) about to assemble the English plenipotentiaries should stand by and support those of Russia. That was followed by another secret agreement with Turkey, whom we were still deceiving, and by which we obtained Cyprus.

But it may be asked, did not the English plenipotentiaries at the Berlin Congress save the Turkish Empire? No. On the contrary, Turkey lost, through their action, far more than she would have lost by the Treaty of San Stefano. By the latter treaty she would have lost 78,550 square miles of territory and 4,539,000 of population. By the Treaty of Berlin she lost 95,588 square miles of territory and 5,382,000 of population. She therefore lost 17,038 square miles and 843,000 of population more than she would have lost by the former treaty. By the Treaty of San Stefano Austria would not have been aggrandised at the expense of Turkey. But by the direct action of the English plenipotentiaries Austria received no less than 28,125 square miles of territory and 1,061,000 of population. What a glorious peace with honour!

Take one other instance. During May 1876 there was a debate in the House of Commons on the Central Asian question, and on the 10th Disraeli said: "So far from being alarmed at the progress of Russia, he saw no reason why Russia should not conquer Tartary as England had conquered India." Two days later he received, through Lord Loftus, our ambassador at St. Petersburg, the thanks of the Russian Government for his candid defence of Russian interests in Asia.

Such is the work of secret diplomacy. A disgrace to the age and a curse to the world. Is it strange that England should be distrusted, and condemned as the hypocrite of nations? May the coming social revolution free us from this curse and scourge!

HOSTILITY TO THE JUBILEE CELEBRATION IN SOUTH WALES.—The movement in South Wales for celebrating the Queen's Jubilee is, says the Central News, in many directions meeting with absolute failure. The mention of her Majesty's name was received with groans and hisses at a public meeting at Llanelly on Saturday, and an amendment to the effect that no local celebration should be made was carried by a large majority. On Monday, a deputation waited upon the Neath Town Council, urging that body to carry out the wishes of a public meeting recently held with reference to the local celebration, but the corporation resolved to take no action in the matter, and refused to vote the requisite funds. The jubilee committee at Cardiff, on Monday evening, decided to proceed no further with the movement in that town unless the corporation consented to vote a larger sum of money for the purpose, and a letter was received from the Cardiff Trades' Council, which had been invited to co-operate, stating that it could not recommend the trades "to do anything in the shape of servile admiration of a well-paid servant of the State."

The best gifts of life—leisure and liberty—they are the twin genii that the poor can never see.—Ouida.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

A National Conference of Ironworkers is to take place at Manchester shortly. The conference will be thoroughly representative, and important questions affecting the iron industry will be discussed. Manchester Socialists ought to be on the alert.

THE MINERS RIOTS.—Several men, charged with theft at the Coatbridge riots, after having been in prison 28 days, were discharged with an "admonition." The sheriff remarked that there was now no chance of the riots being renewed, and the solicitor for the men gave them excellent characters.

THREATENED STRIKE OF WELSH MINERS.—Notices have been posted up by the miners at most of the Ruabon and Wrexham collieries, demanding an advance of 10 per cent. in wages, to commence by March 14. It is believed that the men will propose a reduction of their hours of labour to eight per day, and also a reduction in the price they pay for coal for their own use.

THE STRIKE AT ABERDEEN.—The strike at Broadford Linen Works, Aberdeen, terminated on the 10th, when the whole of the employes resumed work at the old rate of wages. The works were closed for a week, 2500 persons being thrown idle. The demand of the workers was that their pay be increased at the rate of 5 per cent.

REDUCTION OF WAGES.—Notice has been given of a reduction of wages at the Rother Vale Colliery Company. The men refuse to accept, and 220 men and boys will come out on strike at the expiration of the fourteen days' notice.—The whole of the men employed by the Clay Cross Colliery Company have also received notice of a reduction, which they will resist.—The building employes of Birmingham intend making a stand against a further reduction of wages. The books of the Society show a decrease in the number of men unemployed. A proposed reduction was successfully resisted at Gateshead and Newcastle-on-Tyne.

RAWTENSTALL.—CRIBBING TIME.—At a certain weaving shed in this district it is no uncommon thing to run thirty minutes per day over and above the time prescribed by law, and the extent to which this abominable practice is carried on in this district is making the law a dead letter. At the above mentioned shed, the engineer was remonstrated with by the owner for not running more overtime, whereupon the engineer replied that he thought that half an hour per day is sufficient. The weavers have also to take the waste and fetch the weft during the breakfast time, thus again curtailing the time allowed for meals.

WALSALL.—The committee appointed at the pit's-head conference at Walsall on the 20th ult., to draw up notices to present to the employers for an advance of miners' wages, met at Walsall on March 9. It was found that the necessity for the Carnock Chase miners to give notice had been obviated for the present at least by their employers having agreed to an interview with the representatives of the men at Birmingham on the 17th inst. Dissatisfaction was expressed at the course taken by the employers in the other parts of the district in refusing to meet deputations from the men officially, and it was decided that a circular should be sent to all the employers in the districts, asking them to meet deputations at as early a date as possible, with a view to an amicable settlement. It was also decided to appoint a deputation to wait upon such employers.

MINERS' WAGES.—A conference between the Lanarkshire coal-masters and miners has been held at Glasgow. The masters proposed a sliding scale, the pits to be open twelve days a fortnight, and no workman to interfere with others regarding the amount of work done. The delegates of the men replied they would rather starve than accept these conditions. They demanded an advance of sixpence unconditionally before considering a sliding scale. The conference thus terminated without result.—At a conference between the Airdrie, Slamannan, and Bathgate coal-masters and men, the masters offered the immediate advance of sixpence on condition that the men work eleven days per fortnight and eight hours daily; fourteen days notice mutually before strikes, lock-outs, and reduction or advance of wages, and a mutual arrangement of the sliding scale. The men accepted the conditions. Notices have been posted by the miners at most of the collieries in the Ruabon and Wrexham districts demanding an advance of 10 per cent. in wages, to commence by March 14. A general stand-out is feared.

It appears that the strike in the Northumberland coal trade is complicated by the dual nature of the coal in the county, pits being hard and soft, steam and household, on even the same collieries. At the Walker Colliery the men have sent a resolution to the miners' executive, asking that they try to secure an interview between the owners and miners of soft or house-coal collieries in the county, with a view of having the difference settled and work resumed in these pits. It is generally admitted that the rate of wages in Durham ought to govern those of the soft-coal collieries in Northumberland, seeing that the latter compete in the same market as the house-coal coals of Durham. It is understood that efforts will be made by the executive in the direction indicated by the men. Thus an important section of the industry in this vast district will be affected, and this may influence the duration of the whole strike. Steam collieries are much more numerous and extensive throughout Northumberland, and here the miners preserve an attitude of dogged determination, and the coalmasters have given no sign of further movement. Many of the men are in favour of referring the dispute to arbitration.

NOTTINGHAM.—STRIKE OF OMNIBUS CONDUCTORS.—The residents of Sherwood and Sherwood-Rise were last Saturday morning put to considerable inconvenience by the non-appearance of the late Nottingham General Omnibus Company's vehicles. Those who have patronised that company in preference to the Tramway Company were disappointed seriously. Their accustomed carriages were absent from the road during the first hours of running. The reason was discovered later on, when it appeared that the conductors had refused to work. They did this as a protest against the course the official liquidator of the company adopted towards them. He had recently prosecuted and convicted two of their number for stealing small sums of money they received as fares, and they considered it harsh and unreasonable, theirs being a very hard case, they having to work fourteen hours a day, without intermission, or any kind of relief for meal times, for 10s. per week. In the course of the day some of the conductors were induced to return to their work, and a few of the omnibuses were got on to the road. There was great excitement along the road, those who went to work being hooted. All the old hands were turned away two weeks ago, and the men on strike are a new lot. Starvation or 10s.: free contract.—J. P.

THE "SWEATING" SYSTEM.

A meeting convened by the London Tailors' Machinists' Society took place on Saturday night at the School-rooms, Brick Lane, Bethnal Green, for the purpose of "explaining and condemning the sweating system." Mr. W. Thompson occupied the chair. Mr. L. Lyons pointed out that the evils of "sweating," which caused the workers to labour from six or seven o'clock in the morning until ten or eleven o'clock at night, did not end there, because the neighbourhoods in which the system was carried on became crowded, and rents accordingly rose. One of the chief causes of the miseries produced by sweating was, he considered, the teaching of men only a divisional part of their trade, which left them, in consequence of their ignorance of its other details, victims to the sweater. Resolutions were eventually carried to the effect that the sweating system inflicted serious injury physically, morally, and socially upon the workers, and that the Government should appoint a Royal Commission to enquire into it; and that the present staff of factory-inspectors in East London was insufficient, and that six more, including two women, should be appointed to overlook the tailoring trade.

The Dublin Evening Telegraph of March 10 has a striking article on the subject of "sweating," giving details as to the manner in which it is carried on, and the extent to which it prevails in Dublin. It is stated that one-sixth of the whole tailoring work is performed by sweaters, that every Dublin tailor employs some, and in many cases where the work is said to be done on the premises a few men are kept only partially employed as a blind. As an instance of the way in which "the middleman 'sweats' gold-dust from his wretched underlings, just as the Jews used to 'sweat' gold-dust from the current gold coin of the realm," a case is cited where "one particular master sweater occupies a country house himself, and gives employment to fifteen or twenty sweaters in making trousers alone. The master sweater or middleman receives from the tailor so much more than the wages which he pays to the sweaters that he does not require to do any of the manual work himself." The Amalgamated Society of Tailors have done all they can to oppose the system, but the evil has now become too great for them to deal with; and as the writer of the article very pertinently observes, "when authorities on hygienic matters and some of our leading Dublin physicians have condemned the system as being a source of contagion to the public and of degradation to the workers, it is to the interest of society that some remedy should be devised, if not to remove the evil, at least to lessen the danger."

"TRUCKING."

The miners have long been complaining about infringements of the Truck Act, which it was alleged is still rampant in Scotland. In order that some authoritative statement on the subject might be obtained, the Home Department of the Government instructed Mr. Redgrave, chief inspector of factories, to visit the districts where "trucking" was alleged to be carried on, and make a report. His report has just been issued, and we are bound to say that it reveals a state of things of which we had no conception. Speaking of Scotland, and especially of Lanarkshire, it appears that whilst the men are commonly paid fortnightly, or monthly, there are still numerous cases where they are only paid eight, and in some cases four times a-year. We can well understand what an opening this system will give for trucking. The men want something to be going on with, and one way of granting it is by giving the men advances, or, as we call it, "sub," and charging interest for the money. Mr. Redgrave obtained the actual rates of seventeen collieries, at which it ranged from sixpence in the pound to one shilling for twelve. As the collieries generally pay fortnightly, this would be for about one week. One colliery manager was good enough to supply further particulars, from which it appeared that their average "sub" during the fortnight reached £40. This was all deducted from the hard-earned wages of the men each pay day, along with the interest. For a year this latter item came to £43, 6s. 8d. for the use of £40 for about a week in each fortnight, so that the colliery proprietor received over 200 per cent., to say nothing of the fact that the men had already earned the money on which interest was paid. Then deductions are made for rent, medical attendance, for sharpening tools (picks), and other matters. Some of the employers also have stores, which their men are not compelled (?) to deal at, but there is no objection to them doing so if they please. Perhaps the best view of this system is given by what is called a "pay line." This is a pay sheet, on one side of which is marked the quantity of coal got, the rate of pay, and the amount due. On the other is printed the heads of the various items which may have to be deducted, and the balance, if any, is then paid over to the workman. In order that we may not be accused of exaggeration, we give the list of possible deductions, which are grouped under the following heads: Rent, poor and other rates, gas, coal, store supplies, house repairs, surgeon, school, reading-room, cash advances, chimney-sweeping, under-hand. It will thus be seen that where this system is in force the collier is not supposed to be able to attend to any of the duties of civilised life. We question if the old Lanarkshire cotton lords ever did anything like this. The list we have given does not (as some others do) include anything for pick-sharpening; but it appears that in a colliery employing 400 men the profit to the employers on this business reaches £140, 4s. per annum.—Cotton Factory Times.

SCOTTISH MINERS AND THEIR MASTERS.

The much talked-of Conference between the Lanarkshire miners and their masters took place in Glasgow last week. As it had been rumoured that the masters intended to submit, as a condition of their granting an advance of 6d. per day, various rules and regulations of an objectionable character, the delegates were instructed to discuss only the question of wages, and to entertain no other proposals until the stipulated advance of 6d. per day was conceded.

On the first day of the Conference the men stated their demand. The masters replied that they could not grant any advance unless better arrangements as to future work were agreed to by the men. The delegates stated that until the advance was first granted they could not discuss other points. The meeting was therefore adjourned for three days to enable the delegates to consult with their constituents.

On Friday the conference was resumed, when it was ascertained that the miners had unanimously instructed their delegates to adhere to their original demand. The masters then put forward an ultimatum to the following effect: "That the men must keep the pits working six days a week instead of five days as at present, that they must agree to give a fortnight's notice of strikes or holidays, and that no workmen shall interfere with a fellow-workman regarding the amount of work done by him." The delegates expressed surprise at the despotic character of these rules. One of them stated that rather than accept any of these stipulations he would fight to the last drop of his blood. Robert Steele, Motherwell, in a ringing speech, condemned the proposals, and announced the determination of the delegates to withdraw.

The resolute and manly attitude taken up by the Lanarkshire miners' delegates, is one of the pleasantest incidents in the recent labour struggle. That they and their constituents should agree rather to lose the advance of 6d., to obtain which they recently suffered so much, than accept conditions that would destroy their union and place them under the heel of their masters, is a hopeful sign indeed. I cannot help saying that the Lanarkshire miners have in their present conflict with their masters shown a spirit of resolute resistance and determination to assert the claims of labour, that does them great credit and gives their Socialist sponsors some reason to feel proud of them.

A conference also took place on Friday between the Airdrie and Slamannan miners and their masters. The miners' delegates in this case did not display nearly so much manly independence as did their Lanarkshire brethren. They agreed to recommend their constituents to accept a modification of their masters' terms, namely, that they work eleven days a fortnight or give fourteen days notice of cessation of work, and adopt a sliding scale, on which conditions the masters were willing to grant an advance of 6d. per day.

At a meeting of the Scottish Federation of Miners held in Glasgow on Saturday, a resolution was passed approving the conduct of the Lanarkshire delegates, and recommending the men not to accept the master's terms. The conference also recommended that a national strike be organised to compel the masters to concede an advance of wages.

WITH THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.

THE miners of Northumberland are taking to Socialism in splendid style. Last week, with the co-operation of J. E. Williams and J. Hunter Watts, I addressed over a dozen meetings. Nearly all the centres of the colliery districts in Northumberland have been visited, and on every occasion the meetings have been most successful. The miners come in great crowds, and are very enthusiastic. The most encouraging and significant thing about the situation is that mere Radicalism and the ordinary lame-footed movement no longer satisfies the miners. They are ripe for a really revolutionary movement, and will soon be organised into one. The grumbling and general dissatisfaction with Burt and his like is very open and general. Of course no personal attack upon these gentlemen has been made by the Socialist speakers. The weakness of their principles and the folly of their present action gives plenty of ground for comment. Our strong and telling point has been, not that they have professed principles which they have not acted up to, but that their highest aims, if fully realised, would be of little, if any, use. The miners see this; they have learnt it by bitter experience; and they are anxious for new and more spirited methods and more definite and thorough-going plans.

For next week we have issued a plan of campaign with eleven meetings, several at towns adjoining Newcastle, but chiefly at the collieries. On Sunday last Williams and I went to South Shields and had a very good meeting. We have arranged to go to North and South Shields next Sunday. The change in the weather has been a drawback, as many collieries have nothing in the way of a decent-sized meeting-place. The co-operative halls are very convenient, but, as yet, not very plentiful. We generally take them when they are to be had if the weather is at all unfavourable. Our smallest meetings amongst the miners number 400 to 500, and we often have audiences of 1500 and 2000. Sometimes the village parson or the village doctor turns out to watch and criticise; but they are always civil, for Socialism is exceedingly popular now, and not to be treated with disrespect. Northumbrian parsons, on the whole, are rather nice fellows. They are a little more able and much more genial than most.

I cannot say much of the strike itself this week; but later on I shall have some very rough-edged things indeed to say about it, and things connected with it.

RELEASE OF CROFTERS.—At eight o'clock on Monday morning, six crofters from Kilmuir, Skye, who were sentenced by Lord Mure at the High Court of Justiciary, Edinburgh, last December, to three months' imprisonment for rioting and deforcing a sheriff's officer in Skye, were liberated. They were received at the Edinburgh prison gates by about 100 sympathisers, who marched in procession to an hotel, where the crofters were entertained at breakfast, and afterwards presented with £1 each to help them to make their journey home.

CIVILISED SAVAGERY.—In a private letter from a friend in Madagascar comes the following account of the methods adopted by the French Government to "extend civilisation" in that island:—"In the Madagascar Times there is a fearful account of the French in their treatment of some of the tribes on the south-west coast. They send commission agents (natives) into the interior to inform the Bara (name of a tribe who live in the south) that they buy slaves, and five kilogramme of gunpowder are paid to the commission natives for each man brought to Tolia and sold. The Bara go about and catch whom they can and put a rope round their necks, and with their hands tied behind them these captives are brought to Tolia in gangs of six or seven every day and taken to the French and sold at a price. I enclose a list: 2 to 20 kegs of gunpowder, £2; 2 flint muskets, £1 4s.; 2 pieces of French blue cloth, 12s.; 3 4-gallon cooley pots, 8s.; 100 bullets, 100 flints, 100 brass nails, 2 bowls, 2 jugs, 2 knives, and 2 mirrors, £1; total, £5 4s. These slaves on arrival are untied and put in irons, and if the poor wretches say a word they are ill-used in a most shameful way, and some even die from the effects of this ill-treatment. They are afterwards sent to Nosi-Vey to work, in irons, until a vessel leaves for Reunion, when they are shipped, in irons, to that French Colony. Only a few days ago some twenty natives came to Tolia to sell tobacco to the traders. The poor men had come a long way, and the natives here were encouraged by the French to catch them. Seven were caught and sold here. Slavery is carried on openly and to a very great extent. The schooner 'Venus' on her last trip took thirty-three men and women from Nosi-Vey, and now we have a British brig, the 'Town of Liverpool,' which will leave at the end of this month, and will it is reported take a lot of slaves for the Reunion market. I believe by what I am told they fetch £30 to £40 per head. Good profit!"

The reformer labours for the future. His ruling passion is duty. He is not perplexed with the corroding calculations of interest or popularity. The statesman is necessarily a trimmer and a temporiser. He labours for the present, and secures the honours and huzzas of the hour.—Joseph Cowen.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE AMBLESIDE RAILWAY BILL.

The Knoll, Ambleside, March 13.

May I add a few words to your note on Tom Muse's letter on this subject in yesterday's Commonweal, apropos of your statement that the proposed railway would lower wages?

By the introduction of thousands of men willing to work at fourpence per hour, into the district between Ambleside and Thirlmere, the Manchester Corporation Waterworks has already reduced the rate of wages paid to labouring men here by one halfpenny per hour. Of course the railway would reduce it further by bringing men seeking work from Kendal and the Lancashire towns, a result probably hoped for by those "employers of labour" who are so ardently desirous of "railway privileges."—Yours truly,

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

Lessons in French.—Comrade Victor Dave has kindly volunteered to give lessons in French at the offices of the League on Tuesday evenings, at 8 o'clock. The names of those desiring to join the class should be sent to the secretary.

Outdoor Propaganda.—The Council have passed the following resolution:—"That the speakers at Hyde Park invite the audience to keep within the railings so as not to obstruct the foot-paths; and that all members of the League attending such meetings be careful not to obstruct the foot-ways on such occasions."

Reports for "Commonweal."—Branch Secretaries are requested to make their reports as brief as possible, dealing with points of general interest as to the progress of the propaganda, rather than attempting to give the substance of the lectures, for which there is not space, even if it were otherwise desirable. Notices should be confined to purely business announcements and written separately. Reports and Notices should be addressed to the "Printer," and cannot be guaranteed insertion unless they reach the office by 2 p.m. on Tuesday.

Re-opening of Library.—On Monday, March 21st, the Library will be re-opened for the use of those members who are clear on the Library Record. It must be intimated that a large number of books are still out, and those members who are defaulters cannot use the Library until their books are returned. The Rule relating to a One Penny fine for each week for books kept over a fortnight must be enforced from March 21. A List of Books still out can be seen at 13, Farringdon Road. It is suggested by the Librarians that much confusion and delay will be prevented by each borrower purchasing the 'Library Catalogue,' price 2d. Subscriptions will be gladly acknowledged for the purchasing of new books, binding, etc., etc.

Received for Library Fund: G., 2d.; H. A. Barker, 3d.; E. Snelling, 1s.

THE NORWICH PRISONERS' AID FUND.

Our comrade Mowbray, who has been sentenced to nine months' imprisonment, leaves his wife and five children totally unprovided for. The costs of the trial amounted to £60; this has to be paid and the wife and family of Mowbray provided for during his imprisonment. This means altogether at least £100. Henderson has received sentence of four months' imprisonment. You are earnestly appealed to, to give them all the assistance you can.

Already acknowledged, £27, 9s. 4d. Baker, 6d. R. M., 5s. Arthur, 6d. Oxford Branch (per C. J. F.), 10s. Croydon Branch (per Thorington), 5s. 4d. BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, March 9, Thos. J. Dalziel lectured to a good audience on "The Happier Epoch," which was, in fact, Socialism as perfect as the lecturer could imagine it, although he did not suggest finality. After depicting the probable state of art, science, language, race, etc., that would be produced by the creation of less crude conditions, the lecturer wound up by answering a number of questions, but carefully avoided being drawn out as to the exact period which would elapse ere this "happier epoch" arrived. On Sunday, March 13th, a very interesting debate took place between T. E. Wardle and J. L. Lyons, L.P.D.L., the subject being "Has Socialism Caused the Present Distress?" Our friend Lyons maintained that it had, Wardle took the negative. After each had given their views on the question, the audience, which was a good one, certainly seemed in favour with the Socialist speaker. Literature has sold fairly well.—W. B. and T. E. W., secs.

CROYDON.—On Sunday evening, Thomas Shore delivered an address on "The Land Question according to the Poets." He read numerous extracts from Irish poetry, and from the poetry of Burns, Shelley, Byron, and others to show how great a part the question of landholding plays in much of our poetry.—A. T.

GARRETT AND SUMMERSTOWN.—Last Sunday, we held an open-air meeting at this station opposite the "Plough Inn." Attendance not so large as previous, owing to severe weather. Commonweal sold well. Comrades Eden, Harrison, and Kitz addressed the meeting. Three sergeants, one inspector, and one superintendent listened attentively to our exposition of Socialism, under which we gently explained to them they would be following the avocation they were evidently intended for, namely, cultivation of the soil, instead of stupidly gazing at a few people holding a meeting and trying to intimidate them.—F. Kitz.

HACKNEY.—Last Sunday, a very large meeting at the "Salmon and Ball" was addressed by Westwood, Sparling, and Davis. We also held a meeting in the Broadway, London Fields, Graham and Flockton speaking. In the evening, W. Morris gave a very interesting lecture on "Monopoly." There was slight opposition from a railway working-man. Good sale of Commonweal.—H. M., sec.

HAMMERSMITH.—On Sunday, March 13, W. Clarke, of the Fabian Society, lecturing on "Fallacies of Emigration," pointed out while exports and imports to British possessions had increased from £86,926,424 in 1860, to £189,820,426 in 1883, and to foreign countries from £375,520,224 to £732,328,649 during same period, or more than doubled, the population, which in 1860 was 29,000,000, in 1883 was only 36,000,000. From these figures it was evident that although the population is increasing, the production of wealth is augmented at a still more rapid rate. The lecturer said that the production of wealth goes on fastest in the most thickly populated countries, and he justly characterised as absurd the proposal to increase wealth by diminishing the number of wealth producers.—W.

HOXTON.—On Sunday, March 13, A. K. Donald lectured on "Socialism and Political Economy" to a good audience, followed by a lively discussion. Four new members made.—E. P.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday evening, in our club-room, comrade Gregory lectured on "Socialism as it was, is, and will be." Much interest was shown, and the speaker concluded with an earnest appeal for organisation. Good discussion.—S. G.

EDINBURGH.—On Monday, March 7th, in Free Tron Hall, Edward Carpenter lectured to a good audience on "Modern Commerce." He maintained that modern commercialism tended to destroy the human basis of our relationship one to another, and to substitute the cash connection. A most animated discussion followed. One person seemed to think that the capitalist might be moralised, but the sense of the meeting was that nothing less than a complete change of the system would be any cure. Fair sale of literature.—G.

GLASGOW.—On Thursday, comrade Muirhead lectured on Socialism to an audience of over 100 persons at Bridge of Weir, the Free Church minister occupying the chair. The lecture was very favourably received, and gave rise to a good discussion. On Sunday afternoon, Glasier gave a lecture on "The Queen's Jubilee" to the Irish Literary Society. The lecturer made the Jubilee fad a peg whereon he hung a deal of Socialism. In the discussion which followed, Socialism was favourably criticised. In the evening, in Hall, comrade Muirhead delivered a lecture on "Silly v. Sensible Socialism," which was a reply to Professor Flint's Edinburgh lectures. Muirhead pointed out that the Socialism which the professor attacked was a silly hypothesis of the professor's own imagination. He criticised the lectures in detail, and showed conclusively the professor's ignorance of the Socialist principles.—J. B. G.

HULL.—On 6th inst., a chapter on "Competition" from A. Besant's "Modern Socialism," was read and discussed. On 13th inst., the Besant-Foote debate was discussed. Mahon's short visit has been productive of much good, many persons having been led to give up their previous erroneous ideas about Socialism.—E. T.

LANCASTER.—Although, owing to prejudice, we are still without a meeting-place, we keep the ball of agitation rolling, and what is more, gathering. We applied for the occupation of the Oddfellows' Hall here, but certain trustees of the swag-belly order turned up at the committee meeting of the "authorities" thereof, after a prolonged absence from the same, and in spite of the vigorous protest of the sympathising working-men, who are evidently only executive when the aforesaid permit, the application of the Socialists was squelched. Several comrades are suffering already by boycott and discharge for having the courage of their convictions. We are holding meetings from this date forward, at 11 a.m., on the Quayside. On Sunday, Wyatt and Leonard Hall addressed a meeting.—L. H.

NORWICH.—Last Sunday, we had our comrade H. A. Barker with us from London. He held a very good meeting on St. Mary's Plain at 11, speaking to a sympathetic body of working-men on the Labour Question. In the Market Place at 3, our comrade addressed a large meeting, taking for his subject "Socialist Morality," which was listened to throughout with marked attention; 4s. 6d. was collected for Defence Fund. In the evening, comrade Barker lectured at the Gordon Hall on "Spiritual and Material Consolation" in a manner which gave great satisfaction. This week end we shall be celebrating the Paris Commune, several London comrades being expected to take part. We made five new members.—T. M.

DUBLIN.—On Saturday evening, at the Working-men's Club, Wellington Quay, before an audience of about 300, principally artisans, a debate took place on "Free Trade or Protection." One of the speakers, James Keegan, an American, pointed out that neither Free Trade nor Protection would bring any relief to the workers; that their condition could only be improved by the overthrow of the present system of Society. He was well received. On Sunday, about 4 o'clock, about 1500 mostly unemployed labourers assembled at Beresford, and marched thence to the Phoenix Park. From the base of the Wellington Monument stirring addresses, all of a Socialist nature, were delivered by Keegan, J. B. Killen, and Mr. Hall. Large quantities of Socialist leaflets were distributed. It is satisfactory to note that the Socialist propaganda is being favourably received by the workers here, and is making some progress at present, although carried on less ostentatiously than last year. This is partly due to the prevailing distress, and to the fact that the workers are beginning to see that their so-called leaders are unable and unwilling to do anything to better their condition.—O. K.

GRIMSBY.—On 6th inst., Blakelock and Teesdale (Hull) spoke to about 200 people in the Freeman Street, Market Place, for about an hour. Another meeting was afterwards held at the Hall of Science, when about 70 were present, and a number of names were given in for the formation of a Socialist Society.—E. T.

WARRINGTON.—At the weekly meeting of the Warrington Wesleyan Mutual Improvement Society on Wednesday last week, a paper was read by Mr. W. Chapman on "Poverty: Its Cause and Cure." Dealing with the subject from a Socialistic point of view, the essayist said that ignorance was the primary cause of pauperism, men being unable to understand even the first principles that should govern human society—viz., truth, justice, and love; and the bad social condition, causing disparaging inequalities, was the immediate and determining cause. He held that the remedy lies in first educating the human mind to enable mankind to perceive the causes of the evil, in the union of the workers in all lands, to confer with each other in order to decide upon a common course and a common object, and in their hearty co-operation to achieve the common good of all. This was followed by a somewhat animated discussion, the bulk of the members agreeing with the views of the essayist.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE press has of course busied itself over Mr. Gladstone's speech, and various meanings favourable to this or that hope in the present crisis have been drawn from it, with more or less ingenuity; which ingenuity, to say the truth, has not been less wasted than that which enables people to write the Lord's prayer on a threepenny piece. Any one of the guests at the dinner might have said, like Tennyson's Northern Farmer, "I thought he'd said wha a' ought to have said, and I comed awa." Mr. Gladstone had to say something, and make some show of seeing through a grindstone, and giving those not gifted as himself the advantage of his vision. It was a matter of course that he should accomplish this feat with his usual skill in such exercises.

What his speech really amounted to was party defiance to the Tories; civility to the wavering Unionist Liberals; and a statement that he was in favour of Home Rule, and was prepared to make some concessions. Since all this had to be said, let those of us who have read his speech be glad that we have not got to do so again, and forget it.

Speaking, after all, will not change the position of affairs, which quite simply is this. The feeling for Home Rule is spreading among the English democracy; everybody is noting that; therefore the Unionist Liberals are in terror for their seats, and in terror at the prospect of eating their bold words. The Tories, who vaguely hoped that they wouldn't have to bring in a Coercion Bill, find they have got to do so, and know that it will undo them; and all English political parties are shuffling about from one foot to the other in an anguish of doubt, because they know that the land question must be dealt with by one party after the other, each of whom will make a helpless mess of it.

Needless to dwell long on the fact that all this is accompanied by rather more than the usual amount of conventional twaddle and lies to conceal the fact that the mighty British Empire and its glorious Constitution is being pushed against its will into what, considering its circumstances, are revolutionary measures.

The new Irish Secretary is beginning about as well as possible for the Nationalist cause. The arrest of Father Keller will answer its purpose as far as the Irish are concerned. The setting the seal of Peterloo on the police murder at Youghal by open approval of it, the threats of violence and "thorough"—all this will help to bind the English democracy to the Irish cause. Certainly Mr. Balfour is turning out the very man that the Parnellites would have picked out if they had had to choose.

W. M. O'Connell

In contravention of the Corporation byelaws, a man at Newcastle sent two children into the streets to sell matches. He was prosecuted, the magistrates thought the byelaws invalid, but "stated a case." The case was heard the other day in the Queen's Bench and the byelaws were declared invalid.

Whereupon our Individualist contemporary, Jus, raises a shout of delight, and says that the judge "is entitled to the love and gratitude of all little boys and girls."

Anything which tends towards freedom—of exploitation!—is hailed by Individualists as a boon. But the unhappy victims of such freedom? Who looks after their liberty?

About the end of last month, Tantia Bheel, the celebrated robber-chief of Central India, was reported to be on the war-path, and to be plundering right and left. This is a crude uncivilised way of acquiring the product of other men's labour, and the Government is therefore anxiously seeking him out in order to duly impress upon him the folly of his behaviour.

He could so much the more profitably employ his "superior ability" in business, and amass ill-gotten wealth "by way of trade!"

Yet Socialists may be pardoned for hesitating ere they write down Tantia Bheel beside the exploiting Bourgeois. There is at least some manliness left, even amid brutal violence, in the man who takes and gives hard blows, and stakes his life upon the game.

But in the Bourgeois who, entrenched behind his money-bags, from the misery and helplessness of others makes wealth flow to him, his coward skin quite safe the while, we are constrained to recognise the abstracted dehumanised power of capital alone.

The one depends upon a clear head and strong arm. The other upon the class-monopoly of the means of life—a monstrosity begotten of ignorance and greed.

H. H. Spaulding

More talk about extension of the punishment of flogging. The benevolent cleric Horsley indeed expressly included this in his Pall-Mallian scheme of improved prison discipline. Thus can the brutal instinct, even in parsonic minds, "abide so fierce and fell." That the advocates of organised torture can proclaim their views without a blush at the end of the nineteenth century is interesting to the Socialist. But in spite of our antipathy to judicial torture as part of a system, we admit that there are cases where it might be useful. For instance there are certain administrators of the law, chairmen of Quarter Sessions, and at least one ex-Home-Secretary upon whom twenty-five lashes with the "cat" might have a "deterrent" effect. There are some natures you can only appeal to through their skins. We promise these gentlemen that should the revolutionary tribunal of the future commune of London decree them some such punishment, we will not interfere with any of the sentimental arguments they so much deprecate.

E. B. Bax.

SOCIALISM IN DENMARK IN 1886.

SOCIALISM was rather long in finding its way into Denmark, notwithstanding the close connexion between this country and Germany. It was not until 1871 that a real Socialistic movement arose, but it looked so trifling that at first it was rather disregarded, the red spectre might easily be exorcised. But the scattered seed came to a fine growth, new seed was disseminated, and the bourgeoisie became aware that its most dangerous enemy had been acclimatised in Denmark. A little newspaper, Socialisten, began to issue, and worked well to rouse the working men. As in all other countries, the International was outlawed in Denmark also, but instead of being suppressed Socialism by this even got a new lift.

On the 10th of May, 1874, the first number of the Social Demokraten appeared. The paper was a little daily, with but few subscribers. It soon got wind, however, and, notwithstanding the attacks of our adversaries, it succeeded in riding out the storm and clearing the most dangerous rocks and cliffs, so that on the 26th of July, 1885, it could issue a jubilee number with a map, showing the extension of Socialism in Denmark. In 1874, the paper had 3,300 subscribers; 26th of July, 1885, 20,000; now it has about 22,000 subscribers, and its size is augmented three-fold.

It was of the greatest importance for the working-men party to get political influence, and particularly to bring forth their demands in Parliament, and at last in 1884 it succeeded in getting two of the leaders, Holm and Hørdum, elected as members of the Folkething, and the honour thereof is due to Copenhagen.

The political situation here in Denmark:—Ministers governing in spite of Parliament through provisional laws and royal resolutions; the press of the opposition fettered in all ways; and a free word incurring the danger of strong punishments; has made it impossible to obtain anything for the working-men by way of legislation.

In respect of the economical situation the year 1886 began as it ended, with want of employment, and this want surpassed all former like experiences in extent, and made hunger a daily guest of thousands of our comrades. The summer brought a little better situation, but the want of employment did not cease completely, and when the rougher season returned misery seized her victims to a much larger extent even than in the beginning of the year. At least 12,000 men and women in Copenhagen are completely unemployed.

Of course both the political and the economical situation has in the past year had influence on the actions of the Social Democracy. The first thing that our party did in 1886 was to spread a summons for assistance to the unemployed, but out of this private assistance the party has tried to get help by way of politics.

At the end of 1885 the Folkething had voted a bill giving the unemployed direct assistance from the public exchequer, and a great many meetings about the country had declared their agreement with the bill, but the bill was rejected in the Landsting, according to the wish of the Government.

In Copenhagen the want of employment was hardest, and as this community is one of the greatest employers, it was but a consequence to try to get its magistrate to do something for the working-men. Five different entreaties were transmitted during the winter to the authorities, but these had only fine words, no help to give. Private subscription was the only thing left, and by the 1st of May there was collected 98,419 Kr. 42 Ore (£5,467 14s. 2d.), out of which the Working-men's Unions had collected 45,667 Kr. (£2,537 12s. 3d.).

In October, the Parliament assembled, and the Social Democratic members, together with three other Opposition members from Copenhagen, moved some bills, giving assistance to the unemployed from the public exchequer; a bill for the building of dwellings for working-men and regulation of the over-populated and noxious quarters of Copenhagen; restriction of working on Sundays and holidays; and that alms received from the public and not repaid shall not invalidate electoral franchise. But there is no hope for these bills being sanctioned by the Government, which only thinks of using the country's money and forces for totally destroying the country and the people by fortifying Copenhagen, the military expenses already devouring $4\frac{1}{2}$ times as much as education.

The Socialists tried to get members on the magistracy of Copenhagen. The members being elected by men of 25 years of age who in the past year have paid tribute on 1,000 Kr. (£55) income, most of the working-men are excluded from influence on communal affairs. In the month of March it was tried to get two men of the party elected, but though they got 2,320 and 2,270 votes, we did not succeed; but these numbers, however, give good hope for the future.

Several meetings held during the year also show how our party is increasing. Especially it was evidenced by the grand feast of the 5th of June. This feast in past years has been celebrated by the Socialists in a forest, five English miles from Copenhagen, but in 1886 the number of partakers was so great that the railway and the steamers could not transport them, and therefore it was celebrated on the plain for exercising soldiers outside the town. The show of the working-men through the town therefore was the greatest that Copenhagen ever saw. It numbered 30,000 partakers, divided in 137 unions, and it took one hour fifteen minutes for the show to pass a single point. In the place for the feast were gathered about 80,000 men and women, and order was in every respect perfect because the police let the working-men themselves keep order.

In the provinces, too, we get many fellows and comrades. Especially the meeting at Horsens, a borough in Jutland, on July 18, is remarkable. 16,000 comrades were gathered here and declared their adherence to Socialism. In 1885 there were branches of the Social-Democratic Federation in 24 of the 63 boroughs in the country. In 1886 three new branches have been formed in Kolding, Vejle, and Fredericia; branches also are found in several villages. In the whole country there are 50 Social-Democratic unions (having only political purposes), and in Copenhagen itself there are 60 working-men unions, besides a great number in the provinces.

In the past year the agitation has been carried on as usual; but one of the most effective agitators has for a long time been hindered from travelling about the country, having been kept in prison for his activity in the service of the party.

Of course our party has felt the effect of the ministerial methods of legislation. In order to crush the opposition and our party, the Government already in 1885 had issued their Provisional Penal Law and Press Law, and one of our comrades, piano-maker Holst, was imprisoned a few days after the law had been issued. On 9th January 1886 the editor of the Social-Demokraten, S. Olsen, was charged for some articles in that paper, and since then accusations and imprisonments have followed each other quickly, as far as the Provisional Law permitted. On February 20 Holst was charged again, and in July Olsen was imprisoned and condemned by the Court of First Instance to 13 times 5 days imprisonment with only bread and water. The highest court reduced these punishments, but Olsen was imprisoned in July 1886, and did not come out of prison before the 15th of January this year.

The Government also has tried to get Hørdum, M.P., condemned according to the Provisional Penal Law for some expressions of a meeting in Aarhus, the largest borough in Jutland. But though the two first courts absolved him, the judges have been cunning enough to condemn him in costs: a quite new invention this, to be obliged to pay money simply because Government takes a fancy to accuse a man of violating a law, and the judges declare the charge "not proved." Many other instances of prosecution we omit.

The branch-movement has tended to strengthen the organisation. More smaller strikes have been necessary to force the masters to perform their duty toward the workmen, not only in Copenhagen, but also in the boroughs, and some of them have brought a raising of wage. The most important strike in the year was that of the working women at Rubens weaving-factory. Having lasted for four weeks, it ended through mediation with a small increase of pay. This strike acquired importance through the attention it called forth in respect to the bad payment that the rich capitalists offer to working women.

The Danish workingmen-party partook through 14 representatives in the branch-congress at Goteborg in Sweden, August 27-29. Thereby was the band of fraternity tied more tightly between the workmen of the North.

At the end of the year a permanent commission for the working-men-unions' common action was established. In order to acquire the greatest advantages during the present capitalistic system, the "Workmen's Bakery" was also erected, and the purchasers of its bread are so many that the bakery must be enlarged.

On January 28 the elections for the Folkething took place, and our party proposed four candidates, the two former members of the Chamber, P. Holm and C. Hørdum, in the 5th and 9th wards of Copenhagen. Moreover were proposed the journalist A. C. Meyer for the 8th ward of Copenhagen and J. Jensen, principal leader of the Painters' Union, for Odense in Fyn; the former candidate for the 8th ward of Copenhagen only being released from prison the day after the elections. The result of the elections was not so successful as of the former ones, for we only succeeded in electing one of the candidates—P. Holm, in the 5th ward of Copenhagen. So we lost one of the representatives elected 1884, Mr. Hørdum. However, this was not occasioned by any relapse on the part of Socialists. On the contrary, our candidates got everywhere more votes than before. But our reactionary adversaries made use of the bad economical situation for rigorously squeezing the workmen and thus forcing part of them to vote for the reactionary candidates. The votes for the Social-Democratic candidates were: P. Holm was elected by 6757 votes (5385 in 1884); C. Hørdum got 975 (920 in 1884); A. C. Meyer 540 (Holst in the same ward got 500 in 1884); J. Jensen, the first Social-Democratic candidate, who has been proposed for Odense, 136 votes.

Thus we have no reason for looking upon the future as gloomy. By further elections we certainly shall not only recapture the lost, but gain new wards for our great cause.

For the General Council Social-Democratic Federation,

Copenhagen, March 7, 1887.

WHITE SLAVERY.

THE following letter, sent to the editor of Truth by a trustworthy correspondent, should be carefully read by folk who up to now have believed in the various "homes," etc., that drive a roaring trade in exporting orphans and other defenceless children:—

"I regret to learn that another batch of little waifs collected from our big cities is about to be sent to Canada. These poor little folks whose lot here is, indeed, hard enough, have at least in the land of their birth the sympathy and companionship of their kind. Transported to the backwoods of Canada, amid drear and strange surroundings, they are there doomed to pass their unhappy childhood and youth, chopping wood; in fact, doing the meanest work, clad in the coarsest raiment, and subsisting on the roughest fare, not always plentiful. The average Canadian rivals the Yankee in his eagerness for the dollar, and he spares neither himself nor others, painstaking, scraping, nor protracted toil. Although Canadian couples are usually blessed with large families, these orphaned waifs are readily 'adopted,' under Dominion law, into the poorer households. Any one who has visited the country districts of Canada cannot but have observed the daily drudgery to which these 'adopted' ones are subjected. Their lives are, indeed, sunless, and the bread given them that of charity. The so-called benevolent scheme for bettering their lives, in the majority of cases, seems to me a cruel sham.

"Let me briefly describe a scene of which I was an eye-witness, and which occurred a few years ago. A lady arrived in Woodville, North Ontario, with a number of little English children for 'adoption.' On the same day she gave a very touching and eloquent description of the way the children had been collected and shipped to Canada. The following morning the little boys and girls were placed 'on view' in the village schoolroom, ranged in a row, as slaves used to be down South, for inspection. The news had been passed about, and the farmers and tradespeople had gathered to make choice. Among the group of little ones were two little twin brothers, who did not seem to realise what was taking place. A farmer 'adopted' one of them, another farmer took the second, the homesteads of the two men being nearly a hundred miles apart. The hour had now come for them to be parted, perhaps for ever, and at any rate their very names to be changed and their identity lost. No one, save an eye-witness, can imagine the look of sorrowful amazement depicted on the little fellows' faces when they realised, in their babyish fashion, what it all meant. A mother, I think, would rather see her children taking the chances of the London streets, than doomed to the soul-starving existence of a Canadian homestead." M. B.

A "GODLY COMPANIE."—Several "noble-minded" gentlemen connected with the City Companies banqueted on the 18th inst., and curiously enough, though they were labelled as belonging to the various crafts—as, e.g., "Master of the Shipwrights' Company"—yet the names given were all those of persons well known as never having done a stroke of real work in their lives, and who would feel very much insulted if any simple-minded person, in his ignorance of "the ways of the world," were to suggest that they had. These fine fellows, having made themselves happy and comfortable by partaking of the good things—a process all the easier effected from their not having to pay for them—proceeded to smile complacently across the table at one another, and to say many good things of themselves and their friends, commencing with the "Jubilee Queen," and proceeding seriatim down to the "small fry." The Master of the Loriners' Company spoke in "cordial terms" of the Mayor, and the Mayor performed the same good office for the Master (or, "You scratch my back and I'll scratch yours," as they term it in Scotland). In fact, they were all "honourable, straightforward, and upright men." Sir Robert Fowler spoke in high praise of the "hospitality" of the City Companies—and he ought to know; and a M.P. whose name is not familiar—and whose speech afforded a very sufficing reason for the same—made some original remarks about "the greatest legislative assembly in the world," and ventured his opinion that the charge against the Corporation was "a great mistake." But the feature of the evening, perhaps, was the statement of a gallant gentleman, who said—'tis true it was late on in the evening's festivities—that the Corporation "was daily gaining in strength and in the admiration of Londoners." All which was made to rebound still more to the credit of the Corporation by being reported by at least one "daily" parallel with the enquiry into the charges of malversation against that honourable body.—W. B.

ROBERT BURTON.

THE sixteenth century was three-quarters gone; Sir Thomas More had been dead for forty years; Francis Bacon, a boy of 16, was still at Cambridge, where his dissent from the then orthodox philosophy was beginning to attract attention; Philemon Holland, "Translator-General of his Age," was in the height of his activity; Nic. Grimald was dead, but his translation of Cicero's 'De Officiis' was running through edition after edition; the "Judicious" Hooker was at Oxford, where the next year would see him Fellow of his College; when at Lindley, in Leicestershire, was born "of an ancient and genteel family" one who was destined to touch well-nigh the supreme point of the older learning and render mighty aid in the beginning of the new; one who should do more than but the rarest of them to draw together the threads spun after the fashion of a bygone time, and to further the weaving of a garment for the science that was growing.

A wondrous fermentation was going on in thought and life alike; the old forms of creed or practice were being broken up, to be recombined in a new Society. Still stiffened by the manner of the mediæval schoolmen, drawing the matter of their learning from mediæval and classic sources, the men of this time were yet quickened by the new discoveries of their day, and were fulfilled of the forward-looking, deep-searching spirit, that has produced since then so many marvellous extensions in our knowledge of the universe.

Eastward and westward wended a myriad explorers upon the quest of strange wealth. From all directions came continually tidings of new discoveries of lands unseen hitherto, and of peoples unheard of, or at most but dimly described in some ancient legend or half-mythical tale. Just as the foreign markets thus provided gave the essential stimulus to individual enterprise and the rise of the commercial system, so the increase of knowledge and consequent widening of ideas aroused the minds of men to an intense degree of activity in all conceivable directions.

Among the many books produced at this period that, written as they are while the very substructure of the present system was being built, look beyond it to that which shall succeed it, Robert Burton's 'Anatomy of Melancholy' is one of the most notable. Its author was possessed of encyclopædic learning, had read well and widely for thirty years, when he took paper and pen to analyse the melancholy from which he suffered, and in so doing analysed the weaknesses and failures of men and of Society. "Learning hath gained most," said Fuller, "by those books by which the printers have lost," but this book had falsified his dictum ere it was uttered, for it made its publisher's fortune, and were all its editions collected together, they would fill a fair-sized set of book-shelves. To justify his assumption of the pen-name "Democritus Junior," Burton in his preface described the society he saw around him, and asked: "Who would not laugh at such a mad world?"

"How would our Democritus have been affected to see a wicked caitiff, or fool, a very idiot, a fudge, a golden ass, a monster of men, to have many good men, wise men, learned men, to attend upon him with all submission, as an appendix to his riches, for that respect alone, because he hath more wealth and money, and to honour him with divine titles, and bombast epithets, to smother him with fumes and eulogies, whom they know to be a dizard, a fool, a covetous wretch, a beast, etc., because he is rich? . . . To see so many lawyers, advocates, so many tribunals, so little Justice; so many Magistrates, so little care of the common good; so many Laws, yet never more disorders. . . . To see a lamb executed, a wolf pronounce sentence; latro arraigned, and fur sit on the bench; the Judge severely punish others, and do worse himself. . . . Laws altered, misconstrued, interpreted pro and con, as the Judge is made by friends, bribed, or otherwise affected as a nose of wax—good to-day, none to-morrow; or firm in his opinion, cast in his. . . . Laws are made and not kept, or if put in execution, they be some silly ones that are punished."

"To see a poor fellow or an hired servant venture his life for his new master, that will scarce give him his wages at year's end; a country colone [clown] toil and moil, till and drudge, for a prodigal idle drone, that devours all the gain, or lasciviously consumes with phantastical expenses."

Since Burton's day we boast of our advance in "civilisation," of our enlightenment, regard for justice, and so on, but his bitter indictment remains true as when he wrote it:

"A poor sheep-stealer is hanged for stealing of victuals—compelled, peradventure, by necessity of that intollerable cold, hunger, and thirst, to save himself from starving: but a great man in office may securely rob whole provinces, undo thousands, pill and pole, oppress ad libitum, flea, grinde, tyrannize, enrich himself by the spoils of the commons, be uncontrollable in his actions, and after all be recompensed with turgent titles, honoured for all his good service, and no man dare to find fault, or mutter at it."

"Necessitas cogit ad turpia, poverty alone makes men thieves, rebels, murderers, traitors, assassins, because of poverty we have sinned, Eccl. xxvii. 1, swear and forswear, bear false witness, lie, dissemble, anything, as I say, to advantage themselves, and to relieve their necessities. Culpæ scelerisque magistra est, when a man is driven to his shifts what will he not do?"

"Many poor men, by reason of bad policie and idle education (for they are likely brought up in no calling), are compelled to beg or steal, and men hanged for theft; than which, what can be more ignominious—'tis the governours' fault. They had more need provide there should be no more thieves and beggars, as they ought with good policy, and take away the occasions, than let them run on, as they do to their own destruction."

"But whereas you shall see many discontents, common grievances, complaints, poverty, barbarism, beggary, plagues, wars, rebellions, seditions, mutinies, contentions, idleness, riot, epicurism, the land lie untilld, waste, full of bogs, fens, deserts, etc., cities decayed, base and poor towns, villages depopulated; that kingdom, that country, must needs be discontent, melancholy, hath a sick body, and had need to be reformed. Now that cannot be effected till the causes of these maladies be first removed."

Nor has the system of competitive trading in the fullness of its development at any time belied his description of it while yet green and growing:

"Either deceive or be deceived; tear others, or be torn in pieces themselves; like to many buckets in a well, as one riseth another falleth, one's empty, another's full; his ruine is a ladder to the third; such are one's ordinary proceedings. What's the market? A place, according to Anacharsis, wherein they cozen one another, a trap; nay, what's the world itself? A vast chaos, a confusion of manners, as fickle as the air, domicilium insanorum, a turbulent troop full of impurities, a mart of walking spirits, goblins, the theatre of hypocrisy, a shop of knavery, flattery, a nursery of villainy, the scene of babbling, the school of giddiness, the academy of vice; a warfare, in which kill or be killed; wherein every man is for himself, his private ends, and stands upon his own guard. . . . In a word, every man for his own ends. Our summum bonum is commodity, and the goddess we adore Dea Moneta, Queen Money, to whom we daily offer sacrifice, which steers our hearts, hands, affections, all: that most powerful goddess, by whom we are reared, depressed, elevated, esteemed the sole commandress of our actions, for which we pray, run, ride, go, come, labour, and contend as fishes do for a crum that falleth into the water. Its not worth, virtue (that's bonum theatrale), wisdom, valour, learning, honesty, religion, or any sufficiency for which we are respected, but money, greatness, office, honour, authority; honesty, is accounted folly; knavery, policy; men admired out of opinion, not as they are, but as they seem to be: such shifting, lying, cogging, plotting, counterplotting, temporising, flattering, cozening, dissembling, that of necessity one must highly offend God if he be conformable to the world, Cretizare cum Crete, or else live in contempt, disgrace, and misery."

He sketches briefly but with firm touch in his preface an utopia, in which all things shall be justly done. He will not have bourgeois benevolence in it; needed erections shall not be . . . "built precario, or by gouty benefactors, who, when by fraud and rapine they have extorted all their lives, oppressed whole provinces, societies, etc., give something to pious uses, build a satisfactory alms-house, school, or bridge, at their last end, or before perhaps, which is no otherwise than to steal a goose and stick down a feather, rob a thousand to relieve ten."

For our opponents of the "thrift" and "be content" school he has this reply, setting forth their case as though it were his own, and then turning upon himself with conclusive refutation:

"I say then, Non adice opes, sed minue cupiditates ('tis Epicurus' advice), add no more wealth, but diminish thy desires; and as Chrysostom well seconds him, Si vis ditari, contemne divitias; that's true plenty, not to have, but not to want riches, non habere, sed non indigere, vera abundantia: 'tis more glory to contemn than to possess; et nihil agere, est deorum, "and to want nothing is divine." How many deaf, dumb, halt, lame, blind, miserable persons could I reckon up that are poor, and withal distressed, in imprisonment, banishment, galley-slaves, condemned to the mines, quarries, to gyves, in dungeons, perpetual thralldom, than all which art thou richer, thou art more happy, to whom thou art able to give an alms, a lord, in respect, a petty prince: be contented then, I say, repine and mutter no more, 'for thou art not poor indeed but in opinion.'"

"Yea, but this is very good counsel, and rightly applied to such as have it, and will not use it, that have a competency, that are able to work and get their living by the sweat of their brows, by their trade, that have something yet; he that hath birds, may catch birds; but what shall we do that are slaves by nature, impotent, and unable to help ourselves, mere beggars, that languish and pine away, that have no means at all, no hope of means, no trust of delivery, or of better success? As those old Britons complained to their lords and masters, the Romans oppressed by the Picts, mare ad barbaros, barbari ad mare, the barbarians drove them to the sea, the sea drove them back to the barbarians; our present misery compels us to cry out and howl, to make our moan to rich men: they turn us back with a scornful answer to our misfortune again, and will take no pity of us; they commonly overlook their poor friends in adversity; if they chance to meet them, they voluntarily forget, and will take no notice of them; they will not, they cannot help us. Instead of comfort they threaten us, miscall, scoff at us, to aggravate our misery, give us bad language, or if they do give good words, what's that to relieve us? According to that of Thales, Facile est alius monere; who cannot give good counsel? 'Tis cheap, it costs them nothing. It is an easy matter when one's belly is full to declaim against feasting, Qui satur est pleno laudat jejunia ventre; 'Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass, or loweth the ox when he hath fodder?' Job vi. 5. Neque enim populo Romano quidquam potest esse laetius, no man living so jocund, so merry as the people of Rome when they had plenty; but when they came to want, to be hunger-starved, 'neither shame, nor laws, nor arms, nor magistrates, could keep them in obedience.' Seneca pleaded hard for poverty, and so did those lazy philosophers; but in the meantime he was rich, they had wherewithal to maintain themselves; but doth any poor man extol it? There "are those (saith Bernard) that approve of a mean estate, but on that condition they never want themselves; and some again are meek so long as they may say or do what they list; but it occasion be offered, how far are they from all patience?" I would to God (as he said), 'No man should commend poverty but he that is poor,' or he that so much admires it, would relieve, help, or ease others. But no man hears us, we are most miserably dejected, the scum of the world. Vix habet in nobis jam nova plaga locum (There is no space left on our bodies for a fresh stripe). We have tried all means, yet find no remedy; no man living can express the anguish and bitterness of our souls, but we that endure it; we are distressed, forsaken, in torture of body and mind, in another hell, and what shall we do? . . . The devil and the world persecute us, all good fortune hath forsaken us, we are left to the rage of beggary, cold, hunger, thirst, nastiness, sickness, irksomeness, to continue all torment, labour and pain, to derision and contempt, bitter enemies all, and far worse than any death; death alone we desire, death we seek, yet cannot have it, and what shall we do?"

Those who can find opportunity to delve in this mine of learning and good counsel, to them a never-ending store of delight is open, but its chief interest for us as Socialists, as that of the writings of More, Hall, Harrington, Earle, Feltham, Fuller, Browne, and Walton, and their kindred, lies in the germ-ideas it contains that have since brought forth such fruit, and in the eager insistence we find in it, as in all great writers of transition periods, upon the social side of human life, and the ideal of Society as a fellowship of men and not a medley of murderers. The international feeling of Burton especially is strongly manifested again and again, in one sentence he sums it:

"'Tis no disparagement to be a stranger, or so irksome to be an exile."

These men were the product of a time of stress; neither they nor those around quite saw what events were bringing forth, but we looking back upon what they were and what they did and what came after, noting also the strong likeness of our own time and the men of it to theirs and them, may well take heart of hope, and fervently work on for the new birth of society that shall supplant bourgeois domination as that supplanted feudalism.

THE SCHOOLMASTER ABROAD.

A PAPER entitled School has lately been started, as "a medium for the ventilation of all matters of educational interest." We are informed in the editorial column of the February number that the paper has met with most gratifying success, "not the least flattering, perhaps, of the letters received being some in which capitalists have proposed to become possessors of the journal." And certainly School seems determined to deserve well of the capitalists; for among the questions "ventilated" we find Socialism occupying a prominent place, it being the contention of the writer in School that teachers ought to take the earliest opportunity of impressing the minds of their pupils with detestation of the Socialist doctrines. "It is to be regretted," he says, "that while counter influences are daily acquiring greater strength, correct ideas of their moral and social obligations are seldom systematically instilled into the minds of the rising generation in our schools. Most boys are taught that particular acts of theft from their schoolfellows are wrong, and they are punished accordingly. They may still, however, grow up to have very erroneous ideas regarding their moral obligations to society in these respects, and not scruple in after life to advocate wholesale plunder." It will be observed that the writer of this passage quietly assumes that the Socialists, and not the capitalists, are the "plunderers," and thus begs the whole question which is at issue, thereby illustrating at the outset his profound ignorance of the subject which he essays to teach. He proceeds to urge that both churches and schools must do their utmost "to enforce those correct principles by which legitimate authority and just rights in property can be maintained, and without which the fabric of society would fall to pieces." The Times being quoted as a reliable exponent of the enormities of French Communism, principals of schools are earnestly exhorted to inculcate an abhorrence of such revolutionary ideas, and are warned against the peril of engaging French and German masters who may be Socialists in disguise and may thus insidiously corrupt the minds of the schoolboys with their dangerous doctrines. "Quite recently," adds the writer, "the police-reports contained an account of an ex-minister of the Commune who was sentenced for a brutal assault on a woman in this country." The relevance of this remark is not very obvious; for there is, unfortunately, no need to go across the Channel for instances of immoral conduct, which have sometimes been observed even in the case of capitalists and ex-ministers of her Majesty's Government. But we presume that the writer in School is of opinion that any stick is good enough to beat a dog with, and that in abusing Socialists the silliest and grossest statements may be usefully employed. All of his "Remarks on Socialism" are characterised by the same mixture of malignity and stupidity, and would be a disgrace to the dullest of the schoolboys whom he wishes to instruct.

Side by side with the misrepresentation of Socialist doctrines, it is the fashion nowadays in our public schools to establish what are known as "school missions" in the poorer quarters of London and other large towns, the object being to make the youthful capitalist take a philanthropic interest in the condition of the working classes. The movement is doubtless well meant, and some little good may possibly come of it indirectly. Nevertheless it is impossible not to feel a certain amount of impatience and indignation at such childish trifling with questions of paramount importance. What is the result of all the subscription-lists and parish visitings, and sermons in the school chapel descriptive of what has been done among the "poorer brethren" of the relieved district? Mainly this; that our pampered and luxurious schoolboys give back in "charity" to the working-classes a very small fragment of the immense sum which their parents annually extort. They establish a "mission" among the very people by whose life-long labour and suffering they are fed, clothed, housed, educated, and supported in every sort of comfort and affluence; and having done this, they naturally and inevitably feel a glow of honest satisfaction and pride; for, as we all know, it is more blessed to give than to receive. With consciences thus made easy, they can devote themselves more unreservedly to the real business of their lives—eating, drinking, sleeping, idling, and self-enjoyment. The position of these school-missions in relation to the working-classes may be aptly illustrated by the American story of the man who relieved the hunger of his dog by cutting off its tail and giving back the bone in "charity" to the original proprietor, after himself enjoying a dish of soup extracted therefrom.

After all, it may at least be said on behalf of our public schools that indirectly and unconsciously they are often powerful revolutionary agencies. The bigotry and intolerance of the tone that is prevalent in these educational centres, the wasteful luxury and gross idleness of the boys, and the rank commercialism of the spirit in which these schools are conducted, are quite sufficient to disgust any thoughtful person who happens to be brought into contact with them, and to set him wondering how and why it is possible that such shameful scandals can exist in this enlightened age. By drawing attention to the connection between Socialism and "matters of educational interest," the writer of the article in School may possibly be doing less service than he intended to the sacred cause of capitalism. 'AN UNSOCIAL SOCIALIST.'

ONE result of the spread of Socialist opinion, and the interest thus excited in Socialistic affairs, has been the development of the so-called "Socialist Novel," several works of fiction thus described having already been put before the public. For the most part they have been catch-penny impostures of the most shameless description, made for the market, and compiled by people whose knowledge of Socialism was limited to its name. Another variety, not so numerous, has been the would-be-propagandist novel, with interminable soliloquies and arguments, and innocent of interest in character or plot. It is therefore with very great pleasure that we are enabled to call our readers' attention to a novel, none the less instructive because it is humorous, and none the less interesting because it is intended to instruct.

In 'Cashel Byron's Profession,' Mr. George Bernard Shaw looked at Society as it is through the eyes of a healthy unsophisticated barbarian, and strange enough some familiar things looked when seen through that medium. In his present book the medium is an 'Unsocial Socialist,' a millionaire member of "the International" (which appears in a shape of Mr. Shaw's own invention), a self-dissector and cynic; a strange contradictory product of the "storm and stress" period between the decaying and the coming systems.

Those who already know Mr. Shaw and his work do not need to be advised to read "An Unsocial Socialist." Even those who have read it in periodical snippets should take the opportunity of perusing it as a whole. Those who have not read it should do so as soon as may be, whether they be Socialists or no. Mr. Shaw's view of life is essentially individual and fresh; not invariably of the widest, but still one worth close consideration and some study. Finally, to those whom ill fortune has compelled to read the average novel, into the composition of which the author's theory of political economy has been worked, we would say: Read this, if only to see that economics in fiction need not become stupidity, nor depth of intention be necessarily synonymous with didactic tediousness. The subscriptions in aid of the crofters sent to the Glasgow Weekly Mail now amount to £330.

I see that Baron de Worms fell back upon Macaulay in a speech that he made last week to a Primrose Habitation in Marylebone. He might, he observed, say of the Liberals, as Macaulay said, "The bigots pleaded in extenuation of persecution the vices that persecution had created." Might not the passage be better paraphrased thus, "The Tories pleaded in extenuation of coercion the vices which coercion had created"?—Truth.

A SOCIALIST BAKERY.—The Fulham Branch of the S.D.F. have passed the following resolution:—"That the Fulham S.D.F. having held two meetings respecting the subject of the Socialist Co-operation, do heartily agree and offer their support to all other Socialist Branches respecting the bakery scheme, and hopes that all other Socialist bodies will forward some practical measure that cannot fail to strengthen and further our Cause, and hopes that all Branches will try and do something toward establishing a Socialist bakery."—T. WHITE, Sec. Fulham S.D.F.

A GOOD HEALTHY WAR.—The following is the cheery way that the Natal Witness has of looking at things: Telegraphic advices from home indicate that rumours of war are prevalent, and that foreign bourses are depressed in consequence. A good healthy war just now would relieve the existing depression at home, by keeping down the population, stir up insurance companies, liven up things generally, besides giving journalists something to write about, and removing a few "specials" to other regions, allowing of occupation for other war correspondents.—The Cape Argus.

CHAPTER XVII.

SCIENTIFIC SOCIALISM—CONVERSION OF CAPITAL INTO MONEY.

SAYS Marx: "The circulation of commodities is the starting point of capital: the production of commodities, their circulation, and that more developed form of their circulation called commerce, these form the historical groundwork from which it rises. The modern history of capital dates from the creation in the 16th century of a world-embracing commerce and a world-embracing market."

The great representative of this circulation is money, which is the first form in which capital appears. In history, money presents itself to us as opposed to land: the merchant is opposed to the landowner; an antithesis which struck people so much at one period that they expressed it by means of a double proverb—"No land without a lord," and "Money has no master." This is, in fact, another way of stating the antithesis between the Mediæval basis of property, viz., status, a recognised position in the great feudal hierarchy, and contract, the commercial basis, on which is built the position of the modern exploiter.

We must now see how capital is born, and the manner in which it works after it has been born.

It is born out of the operation expressed by the formula $M - C - M$, which we had to take note of in our last chapter. The M in this operation, as we stated before, implies always quantity and not quality; the second M not representing merely the money the operation was begun with, but an increased sum, otherwise the operation would be meaningless. It remains to be seen how this increase has taken place.

It cannot have happened by the mere process of exchange; because that would mean that the whole capitalistic class was living by getting the better of the whole capitalistic class, which is impossible. The increase of money in the capitalistic process must come out of the labouring or productive class.

The modus operandi of this capital-making must now be noted. The labouring class is necessary to the production of capital, and the labouring class in a peculiar condition: the labourer, to be fitted for the purpose of the capitalist, must be submitted to the operation of the free competition of the capitalist in the market; that is, his labour-power must be; for with the man himself of course the capitalist has nothing whatever to do; neither will his own position as capitalist allow him to consider himself as a man; according to the well-known proverb "Business is business." This position of the labourer is what is understood by the phrase of a "free labourer": his labour-power must be bought and sold in the market on the same terms as any other commodity; there must be no interference with his selling it at the price which it will fetch, a high price when the competition among the capitalists is brisk, a low price when it is slack; and as he has no other commodity to sell except his labour-power, he is compelled so to sell it—to be a "free labourer."

It is clear that this relation between the capitalist and the labourer is a conventional and not a natural one; nature does not produce men who from the first are possessors of money which it is their business to turn into capital, nor on the other hand does she produce men who are possessors of labour-power which they are compelled to sell in the free and open market to other men. As a consequence this relation is not common to all historical periods; but has developed from many economical revolutions, which have successively extinguished prior forms of social production.

It will be seen, then, that in the fully developed commercial period the capitalist, the reason for whose existence is the turning of money into capital, and who is the owner and the organiser of the whole of production, cannot carry on his business without having ready to his hand a class who are an adjunct of the machinery necessary to his business, and who, on their side, have no other reason for existence, so long as they are duly obedient to the system under which they live, save acting as such portion of this machinery.

We have now come to the subject of surplus-value, from which is derived profit, rent, and interest. This will form the subject of our next chapter.

E. BELFORT BAX AND WILLIAM MORRIS.

I am convinced if anything is to be done for the great mass of the people—if you are to secure any reform of magnitude—it is to be done by the people resolving to secure it, and totally disregarding the convenience or the existence of political parties in the House of Commons.—Richard Cobden.

A MIDNIGHT WALK.

(By G. HERWEGH. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

I wander, when the world is all asleep,
At midnight through the quiet streets at will.
How loudly did these sleepers laugh or weep
A few short hours ago! Now all is still.
Their joy is like a poor plucked flower foredone;
Their fullest cups have ceased at last to foam;
Their troubles have departed with the sun;
The world is weary, let it dream of home.

How all my fretful anger fades away,
Now the loud tempest of the day is o'er;
The moon sheds softly her forgiving ray
On roses ruined by fierce suns before.
Swift as a sound, and silent as a star,
Lit by the pale moon's visionary gleam,
My spirit, conscious of no earthly bar,
Can see through sleep's most inly secret dream.

My shadow creeps behind me like a spy;
I pause before a dismal dungeon den;
In chains a patriot is doomed to lie;
Alas! he loved too well his fellow men.
He sleeps—and does he dream of happier things?
Of oak leaves waving o'er a woodland stream?
Dreams he that Victory folds him in her wings?
O God of Freedom, let him always dream!

Gigantic looms the palace of a lord;
My spirit sees behind its purple curtain,
How one in sleep is clutching at a sword
With look of guilty fear and grasp uncertain.
Pale is that face with fright and helpless wonder;
He harnesses for flight his swiftest team;
He falls to earth; the earth is burst asunder—
O God of Vengeance, let him always dream!

That cottage by the brook—small is its space;
Virtue and Hunger share the peasant's bed;
But God has granted to the poor man grace
To quench in dreams the cares that crowd his head.
He sees the fields through eyelids slumber-furled
Grow ripe and rich with harvest's golden gleam;
His narrow cottage widens to a world—
O God of Pity, let the poor man dream!

At this last house, upon the bench of stone,
One moment I must rest in earnest prayer;
I love thee true, my child—nor I alone—
My love with Freedom's shalt thou ever share.
A dove-drawn cradle bears thee to the skies;
For me wild coursers champ and foam and steam;
I dream of eagles, thou of butterflies—
O God of lovers, let my darling dream!

Thou star, that shinest through the cloudy haze,
Thou night in pall of deepest purple furled,
Too soon O let me not awake to gaze
On that sad face of the dawn-wakened world.
For fancy's dream to daylight's deed must yield;
On tear-drops sparkles the sun's earliest beam;
Freedom to Tyranny resigns the field—
O God of dreamers, let us always dream!

FRANCE.

CARCASSONE.—At the recent municipal election the Socialist list has been much more successful than the Opportunist one, nine Socialists having been elected.

PARIS.—Last week an "Extra-parliamentary Commission" was busy over the proposed national monument in commemoration of the Revolution. It is proposed to erect it on the grounds of the former palace of the Tuilleries; all latitude is left to the artists and architects, who may decide upon one single edifice or several, the principal monument may be either purely symbolic, or may consist in halls in which would be placed statues and bas-reliefs illustrative of the men and scenes of the Revolution. The Commission will ask for a grant of twelve millions for the execution of the plan. We confess to a cold shudder in reading of the "symbolic monument," from bitter knowledge, foreseeing what crime modern sculptural art can perpetrate when it strays from what it is fit for—i.e., executing a faithful and skilful likeness of a "social benefactor" or city alderman, frock-coat, trousers, and all, when it strays from this, the realm of everyday life, to that of false sentiment and humbug. Let us hope that the Government will refuse the grant, and waste the national money some other way, and that we may be spared the pain of a "symbolic monument" raised by hypocrisy and cant.

At the Chateau d'Eau Theatre in Paris a performance of Felix Pyat's "Chiffonnier de Paris" was organised last week by the Cri du Peuple, in aid of the families of those who suffered in the St. Etienne explosion. The theatre was crammed, and the performance successful. Several revolutionary songs were sung, and finally, amid great excitement, and the general uprising of the audience, the orchestra played the "Marseillaise." We English folk cannot quite realise without seeing it what an effect this song has on a large French crowd. For the "Marseillaise" sung in England, where we don't know the French words, and find it impossible to shove in all the translated ones in place and time, is a very different thing from the "Marseillaise" sung by a French choir, or played as orchestrated by H. Berlioz and listened to by an emotional crowd who join in with the refrain with a fervour and a precision which is indispensable to the dramatic effect of this fine tune. We should owe a good deal to an English Rouget de Lisle who would come forward with the discovery or invention of a tune as fine, and words more befitting the present period. He would be doing no inconsiderable service to the English revolutionary parties, for no one can deny the utility of appropriate music to any large congregation of folk.—M. M.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

The Lanarkshire miners are working upon the advance of 6d. per day demanded by the men.

The weavers strike at Ashton is still unsettled, but the Central Committee of the Northern Counties' Association are determined to carry it on until success is achieved.

The turners and throwers in the Alloa Pottery have struck work and will be supported by the Glasgow Association, as to a dispute regarding the size of certain pots made at Alloa.

At the quarterly meeting of the Boldon Co-operative Society, on Saturday, it was decided to send £100 to the Northumberland miners, and £25 to the deputies.

The miners on strike in Northumberland have voted by a decided majority against the arbitration proposals, notwithstanding that the third distribution of strike money only allowed of 2s. being given to each adult and 6d. to each child, and after this the funds will be practically nil. A special report on the Northumberland miners will be found in another column.

It has been decided by ballot to forward the sum of £1000 from the funds of the Durham Miners' Association to assist the Northumberland men on strike, and that each lodge shall make a special levy on its members, or a donation from the local funds. Lodges have previously contributed upwards of £200.

A large number of miners, who are unemployed through the flooding of the shaft at Exhall Colliery, Warwickshire, paraded the adjacent villages on the 11th inst. harnessed to a waggon, and soliciting funds for their subsistence. Their novel appeal was liberally responded to, the waggon being hung with joints of meat, loaves of bread, parcels of tea, coffee, sugar, etc. The proceeds were distributed at the close of the day.

The London Council of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers have instructed the members of the society that they cannot be members of the Labour Federation and retain their membership of the Engineers' Society. It is stated that the matter will not rest here, for notice of appeal will at once be given to the general council of the Engineers' Society, as a large number of the members of that society have already joined the National Labour Federation.

There is a strike at the Carnarvon Copper Works, Wales, and, owing to the manager importing fresh men to take the places of those out on strike, disturbances have occurred, the men demanding the immediate discharge of the new comers. It was with great difficulty that the new hands could escape from the works, and three of them suffered rather severely in endeavouring to reach the railway station. The workmen now demand that the remainder should leave the valley, and offer them a chance of going unmolested.

The ironworkers are making efforts to bring together their somewhat shattered organisations. We are not referring to such men as mechanics and ironfounders, or moulders, who already have strong unions. The classes we refer to are the puddlers, millmen, rollers, and others, who, with the exception of those in Darlington, have in recent years gone very much to pieces. They are purposing to form a national association. It is rumoured that the Knights of Labour are making efforts to establish English lodges amongst this class, but nothing definite appears as yet to have been accomplished. On all sides there appears to be a general stirring of dry bones towards unionism as a force for lifting up the workers.—Cotton Factory Times.

THE YORKSHIRE MINERS.—The report to the members of the Yorkshire Miners Association for the past two years, which is signed by Mr. Benjamin Pickard, Mr. John Frith, and Mr. William Parrott, says: "The condition of the miner, taking all things into consideration, is not much if any improved since the year 1871. At that time the men were as well fed and as well housed in the majority of cases as they are now. Their work and wages compared more favourably then than now. If a dispute was entered into then they had not the fear of eviction before their eyes, as they now have at a large number of collieries. The Denaby Main and those evictions in Durham have opened our eyes to the extremes to which colliery-owners will go in order to defeat and punish the men, if they dare to stand up for and defend their rights. Many attempts have been made, in almost every part of the country, to solve the labour and wages question. Sliding-scale, arbitration, conciliation, strikes, and lock-outs have figured conspicuously, and have as signally failed to secure the desired end. It was quite clear from the demand of the owners in Northumberland for a reduction of 15 per cent. in their men's wages, that in the very country where the men are the most ardent advocates of and the most loyal to its principles and results, that a sliding scale, even without a minimum or maximum, neither can nor does absolutely meet any condition of labour and wages where there is no check (or determining power) by such sliding scale on the selling price of coal. Here we have a sliding-scale which has been in operation for a considerable time. The owners have been in a position to go into the market and compete with other mining counties most keenly, and, as the sequel proves, most disastrously both for themselves and their employés." One would naturally think the foregoing doleful confession of the absolute failure of the orthodox nostrums to settle the labour question would be the prelude to the advocacy of a new departure. But no; the same feeble platitudes and foolish hopes for an impossible "good time coming," with which we are all too familiar, is all that these "blind leaders of the blind" have to offer. Sixteen years of wealth-production unparalleled in the history of mankind leaves the Yorkshire miners still as poor, as badly fed, clothed, and housed at their close as at their beginning, and yet the poor simpletons go on opening their mouths and shutting their eyes to see what God or the Devil will send them, instead of banding themselves together like men to get the reward of their labour and to send their exploiters to the right about.—T. B.

AMERICA.

In Paterson, N.J., 15,000 employés of the silk-works are still on strike for a reduction of 2½ hours, an increase of 1 dol. per week, and the employing of only union workers.

CHICAGO.—The new scale of wages for compositors has been established by joint agreement. Compositors will henceforth receive 46 cents per thousand "setts" on morning newspapers, and 41 cents on evening papers. Advertisements will be set by the week. No change was made in the hours.

MILWAUKEE, March 1.—This afternoon the compositors in all the newspaper and job offices in the city went out on a strike for an advance of five cents in the price of composition. The proprietors offered to compromise, but the offer was refused by the Typographical union. The scale demanded is 38 for day and 45 cents for night work. The job scale 16 dols. per week.

WORCESTER, Mass.—The labour situation among the shoemakers at Spencer is serious. New workmen are coming in slowly, but have to be guarded by the police and the manufacturers' agents from the station to the hotel.

WHEELING, March 4.—The Labour Fair in this city netted the Trades Assembly 1600 dols. The greater portion of this sum will be used to furnish a hall and reading-room. In three weeks the Trades' Assembly will meet in the finest hall in the Ohio Valley, worthy of the thirty-nine organisations which it represents.

At Cincinnati the contracting bricklayers' association has allowed the demands of the union, which are—50 cents an hour for nine hours work, 4.50 a-day. First-class hands will increase their wages 2.70 dols. per week. The boss stone-masons have allowed the rate asked, which is 45 cents per hour. Stone-cutters will work nine hours.

The 2000 miners along the lines of the Peoria and Pekin, Toledo, Peoria, Warsaw, and Central Iowa railways, who have been out on a strike for several weeks, have reached a settlement with their employers. The miners are to form a co-operative association. The mines will be worked by them, the mine-owners getting three-fourths of a cent per bushel as rental.

ST. LOUIS, March 2.—At the present time almost every trade here is agitating the question of better wages or shorter hours. The carpenters led off with a demand for an increase of 5 cents per hour. It was granted. Wages now, 35 cents per hour, 9 hours a-day. The bricklayers have asked for 50 cents per hour, or 4 dols. a-day for 8 hours. The stove-moulders have asked for an increase, but the chances are that a lockout will result. It is expected that every union in this vicinity will be represented in the St. Louis Trades and Labour Assembly by May 1.

BELGIUM.

A strike of miners, numbering about 2400 has occurred in the Borinage district.

QUAREGNON (Borinage).—At the recent explosion in the mines of Quaregnon nearly 150 men and women and children were killed. Many of them must have guessed at a coming catastrophe, owing to the intolerable and ever-growing heat felt just beforehand. And yet they stayed on, rather risking their lives than risk forfeiting a day's pay!

After the Commission of Enquiry formed last year at the conclusion of the murderous exploits of Van der Smissen, the average wages of women and children working in the pits were fixed at the following prices for an average day's work of twelve hours: Boys from 12 to 17 years, 1 franc 30; women from 17 to 25 years, 1 fr. 45; girls from 13 to 15 years, 1 fr. 15. Such is the wretched sum for which women and children, whose fitting place would be rather at school or in the household, go to risk their lives during twelve or fourteen hours of the day! The report of the Commission even speaks of certain cases where children of 12 have to be in pits for sixteen hours. And yet those who among the men revolting last year in their desperation escaped the balls of the soldiery to fall within the claws of the magistracy, were accused of attempting the destruction of religion, property, and—always the same cry—of the family. Can these folks be said to have familia? Misery or demoralisation—mostly the two together—such is the picture formed by these same families that modern society shows itself so touchingly eager to protect—with words.

FRANCE.

SAINT-ETIENNE.—The director of the "Compagnie Beaubrun," by way of showing the paternal care that he lavishes on the men working for the company, apparently thinks he can do so no better than by diminishing the salaries of the men in No. 2 Chatelus Pit by 25 centimes a-day. It is asserted also that he intends to impose on the pitmen a gratuitous day's work to rectify the damage caused in this pit by the late disastrous explosion in No. 1 Pit. Bad luck to him!

MARSEILLES.—Citizen Jean Stemann, on his way to attend the Algerian Working-men's Congress as French delegate, spoke well and ably at Marseilles on the labour question at a meeting there organised for him by the labour party. His discourse was followed by a discussion and asking of questions—a method of procedure more familiar to us in England than to our Continental friends. The interest of the meeting, which was numerous attended, was well-sustained, and the proceedings have produced a good impression in the town.

ITALY.

VERCELLI.—A button-factory here by Bona Bros. is quite a model "prison workshop," petty fines and Neronian orders succeeding each other day by day. Last week the "hands" were surprised by an order forbidding them to read the Fascio Operaio, all those discovered so doing to be instantly dismissed. A month back the women employed struck on account of a new rule which compelled them to pay 80 c. for thread to sew on the buttons, which thread could be procured in the shops for 40 c. Five mothers were dismissed in consequence of this manifestation of dissatisfaction, dismissed as "instigators of the strike."—Fascio Operaio.

ALESSANDRIA.—The hat-makers' strike here is terminated. The Cav. Borsalina refused to accede to the demands of the strikers, and these have in consequence, for the most part, gone off to other districts and have left the country rather than yield. There exist several labour societies belonging to the different trades in Alessandria, and as is seen in the result of the strike, a certain solidarity exists among the workers. Before the termination of the Borsalina strike (which was among the workers in black straw), the workers in white had paid each out of their weekly wage 75 c. in aid of their comrades. Last week they were assembled and warned that should they hereafter pay any sums to the society in aid of the strikers they would be dismissed. This is merely a sample of the treatment submitted to in Italian factories, where petty tyranny indeed reigns supreme and too often unquestioned.

You wise generations, who have made your god of a yelling steam-engine, and dwell in herds under a pall of soot, and call this—Progress! . . . There are two sides to the medal of Progress. Myself, I cannot see that New York is so much an improvement upon Athens, nor the Staffordshire potteries upon Etrurian Tarquinii. But then I am only an ignorant man, no doubt, who loves the happy laugh of the sun-fed children, and the unobscured smile of the azure skies.—Ouida: Crispin, in 'Ariadné.'

THE MINERS' STRIKE IN NORTHUMBERLAND.

PROGRESS OF THE SOCIALIST CAMPAIGN.

The importance of this struggle is being very much under-rated. It is now eight weeks since over 20,000 men went out on strike against a reduction of 12½ per cent. in their already miserably small wages. This reduction would affect all who earned over three shillings per day. It is nine years since the miners of Northumberland were on strike before, so that they cannot be charged with being quarrelsome. The failure or success of the strike may not be a matter of very great moment, but a study of the position altogether will be found very profitable, and a few frank words on the conduct of some of the people's friends will not be amiss.

At one time, and that only a few years ago, the miners were the best paid workmen in the country. From 12s. to 15s. per day was easily earned by an average man at hewing coal. They are now nearly down to the level of the English agricultural labourers or the Irish cottiers. For months past the average wage of the Northumbrian pit men has varied from 10s. to 15s. per week. If the deductions for powder, pick-sharpening, etc., were reckoned, it might fairly be said that 10s. to 12s. per week is the most that the pitmen have taken home to their wives. It is sometimes said that miners can earn 5s. 3d. per day, but this fact alone is misleading. Two or three days work a week is not uncommon, four days a week is a sort of godsend, and five days a week is what the miner may dream about but dare not hope to see. Besides, there are considerable deductions from the ordinarily stated wage. In some mines 6d. a-day for powder alone. I have asked a great number of men what was the average amount of money which they took home after paying sundry charges; the answers seldom varied a shilling, and I should say that 10s. per week is an excessive estimate.

A great deal of humbug has been talked about the "free houses" enjoyed by the Northumberland miners. These houses are mere huts; the outside of them look sadly dilapidated; the streets are shamefully neglected, no pretence of order or harmony in building the villages was ever thought of—in short, the general aspect of a colliery settlement is ugly, dirty, and depressing, chiefly on account of its gloominess and the evident lack of taste or pleasure in its arrangements. But for the co-operative movement hardly a hall could be found outside the town, and seldom even a reading room. The men have often to hold their meetings in publichouses, and this of course encourages drinking. Inside the houses a different picture is met with. The women of Northumberland are cleanly, industrious, and cheerful "beyond compare." Their thriftiness is beyond dispute, since, in spite of the small wage, the miners are as a whole a healthy and good-looking body of men.

Could anything be more disgraceful than an attempt to make these men poorer than they are now? The miners have suffered one reduction after another till they can suffer no longer, and now a bitter fight has begun against any further impoverishment. How the fight will end no one can say. There are plenty of evil prophets declaring that the men will have to give in at the end, and advising them to do so speedily. There are some "candid friends" of the miners who are doing them a great deal of harm by telling the public how poor the men's resources are, and how great the power of their masters is. It is very dangerous to be too ready with advice and help and revelations in a matter of this kind. It must be agreed that the miners know their own business best. It is certain that no one else can teach them much. Two gentlemen (formerly workmen, but now fallen) at Blyth, did a great deal of harm one day last week with their candid and uncalled-for advice. Their remarks included an extravagant denunciation of Socialism and the Socialist missionaries in the county. They were very frothy and very high-toned on the subject, so I sent one of them a civil challenge to make good his words in a public debate. However, he shirked the encounter, and said he was too busy in managing a soup-kitchen. Of course, a man who brags when his enemy is at a safe distance, and then takes shelter behind a soup-tureen when asked to fight, is not worth much notice. Then, the newspapers have set to work against the miners. They are overflowing with heart-rending accounts and sensationally written descriptions of the distress amongst the non-unionists. There is really no special distress amongst the people of Northumberland just now. There is always a great deal of poverty, and this is not generally noticed by the newspapers. But just at the critical time, when the success of the strike depended upon the firmness of the whole of the men, a great wailing is heard about their poverty, and shoals of letters full of the most silly advice, and all with the purpose of making out that the miners are unable or afraid to fight out the strike are readily inserted. This, however, will not effect its purpose. The miners are still determined to hold out and are likely to win.

The Labour M.P.'s are proving themselves a paltry spiritless set of creatures. Never a word in Parliament about the miner's condition, but all over the country is telegraphed the startling and important announcement that "Mr. Fenwick has got a cold" and Mr. Crawford's health has actually undergone a favourable change since his stay at Matlock! Strange days we live in! Hardly a word about the 20,000 men with families dependent upon them, who are being brought to Chinese level, while throat affections of their eminently respectable representatives are telegraphed all over the land as if they were royal princes. If Northumberland had had the good fortune to be situated in Ireland, the House of Commons and the country would be ringing with the tale of their wrongs. But alas! the workmen of England have only a few lisping weaklings to voice their demands. The people of the country do not fully know the condition of the miners, nor the nature of the struggle in which they are engaged. If Burt, Fenwick, Crawford and Co. had any spirit or go in them at all they would kick up a row in Parliament, and follow it up with a stumping campaign through the provinces, and by doing so they would raise enough money to keep the strike going for three months to come at least, and raise a torrent of public wrath against the mine-owners and coal-agents, which would soon bring victory to the strikers.

However the strike goes now, it has given an opportunity for starting a Socialist movement, which will give new hope to the miners. During the past month meetings have been held all over the county at the rate of 12 to 15 per week, and all have been largely attended. Already the popular feeling is in favour of Socialism, and the keenest interest is shown in the discussion of the question. At Bedlington, for instance, on Friday the 18th, the large Co-operative Hall was packed in every corner, and hundreds could not obtain admission. The audience listened attentively for three hours and a half to speeches for and against Socialism. My two opponents were the village doctor and the village curate, both popular men. The rev. gentleman had some very cute and telling points to put, and he put them well; and to the satisfaction of every one, a debate was arranged for the following week between him and myself. The medical gentleman was rather hazy and confused in his ideas, but he at least contributed to the amusement of the audience. The doctor has a genial way of saying the most ruffianly things, and a profound way of saying the most stupid things, which, in a way, make him rather an attractive speaker. He writes poetry. I have read some of it—not much—and I don't intend to read any more, though it is rather good on the whole, quite up to the artistic level of "Tommy make room for your uncle." The meeting altogether was a great success, and did a great deal for the Socialist cause.

A county demonstration in favour of Socialism is being arranged, and steps for founding an organisation in the northern counties are going rapidly forward, and I feel sure that before long the miners of the North of England will be in the vanguard of the revolutionary labour movement.

Newcastle, March 22.

J. L. MAHON.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

NOTICE.—All business matters relating to the Socialist League to be directed to the Secretary, H. A. Barker, 13 Farringdon Road, London, E.C.

Annual Conference.—The Third Annual Conference of the Socialist League will be held at 13 Farringdon Road on Whitsunday, May 29th. Branches are particularly requested to attend to the following arrangements, if they wish to be represented at the Conference: (1) To at once send a return of their membership to the General Secretary. The representation will be based on this return. (2) Branches cannot be represented unless all monthly subscriptions are paid up to March 31 by May 1st. (3) Notices of motion, amendment to Rules, etc., must be sent in six weeks before the Conference—i.e., not later than April 17th. (4) Agenda Paper will be forwarded on May 2nd to Branches complying with these arrangements.

Library.—The Library is now open to members of the Socialist League and affiliated bodies. Country Branches can have parcels of selected books by paying carriage to and fro. Rule III., relating to the renewal of books (each renewal representing fourteen days) must be rigidly adhered to. Books cannot be renewed more than twice. Members failing to comply with this Rule will be fined 1d. for every week that a volume is detained beyond the time at which its return is due. LIBRARY CATALOGUE, containing the Rules, 2d.

LENA WARDLE & WM. BLUNDELL, Librarians.

Lessons in French.—Comrade Victor Dave is now giving lessons in French at the offices of the League on Tuesday evenings, at 8 o'clock. The lessons are free to members, and those desirous of profiting by them should send their names at once to the secretary of the League.

Outdoor Propaganda.—The Council have passed the following resolution:—"That the speakers at Hyde Park invite the audience to keep within the railings so as not to obstruct the foot-paths; and that all members of the League attending such meetings be careful not to obstruct the foot-ways on such occasions."

Reports for "Commonweal."—Branch Secretaries are requested to make their reports as brief as possible, dealing with points of general interest as to the progress of the propaganda, rather than attempting to give the substance of the lectures, for which there is not space, even if it were otherwise desirable. Notices should be confined to purely business announcements and written separately. Reports and Notices should be addressed to the "Printer," and cannot be guaranteed insertion unless they reach the office by 2 p.m. on Tuesday.

BRANCH SUBSCRIPTIONS PAID.

THE NORWICH PRISONERS' AID FUND.

C. W. Mowbray and Fred Henderson, of the Socialist League, were sentenced at the Norwich Assizes on Jan. 20 to nine and four months' imprisonment respectively. The costs of the trial amounted to £50, and Mowbray's wife and five children must be provided for during his imprisonment, so that at least £100 will be required. The treasurer of this fund therefore appeals to every one to give all the assistance he can.

BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, March 16, A. K. Donald lectured on "The Paris Commune" to fair audience. Literature has sold well.—W. B.

HACKNEY.—On Saturday evening we held a free concert to welcome our comrade James Allman on his release from prison, he having served a month for an alleged obstruction. Our room was quite filled by members of the League, the S.D.F., and other societies. Some capital songs were sung by members and friends, and Allman gave us his experience of prison-life, which was listened to with much interest. A collection was made for him, amounting to 9s. 3d. While thanking the friends for it, he refused to take it, and gave one-half to the Commonweal Printing Fund and the other half to the Hackney Branch. The singing of "The March of the Workers," "No Master," and "The Marseillaise," concluded one of the pleasantest evenings we have had at this Branch.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday evening in our club-room, T. E. Wardle lectured on "The Fallacies of Society." He pointed out that no hope of better times could be expected until the workers made a Society of their own. Good discussion. The following resolution was passed:—"That this meeting of Mitcham workers expresses its deep sympathy with the workers of Paris who fought and died in the Paris Commune, and expresses its great abhorrence of the capitalist murderers who shot down the workers in cold blood."

BRADFORD.—On Monday March 14 comrade S. A. Gaskell lectured at the Temperance Hall on "Socialism v. Individualism"; Dr. Rabagliati took the chair. The audience listened attentively. An animated discussion followed, which gave the lecturer opportunity to go more into details on several points. We sold a good quantity of literature.—C. H.

EDINBURGH.—In the Free Tron Hall, on Monday, March 21, Dr. Reddie read Percival Chubb's lecture on "The Inner Spirit of Socialism." A good discussion followed. Fair sale of literature.—G.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, at one o'clock, Glasier addressed a good open-air meeting at Jail Square. No meeting at five o'clock owing to wet weather. In the evening in Hall, Carlton Place, James Mavor gave a lecture on "Miners' Wages and Living." The lecturer, who has been making a personal investigation into the economic condition of the miners, gave some interesting and useful information concerning the wages and subsistence of that class of workers. He showed that in some instances the gross earnings of the miners were so low that they had to subsist on a poorer fare than is given to convicted criminals in our prisons. A discussion followed.—J. B. G.

HULL.—On 21st we celebrated the Paris Commune, speeches being made by several of our members. We also had a short discussion with a sympathetic opponent of Socialism, who thought we could not expect to convert people to our views unless we had some detailed plan of the future Society, after the manner of More's 'Utopia,' and kindred ideal Commonwealths.—E. T.

LANCASTER.—On Sunday, March 20, comrade A. Tarn addressed a meeting on the subject of "Modern Commerce" to a good audience.—J. H.

NORWICH.—We celebrated the Commune and publicly opened our new hall on Saturday evening. After tea a public meeting was held, the chair being taken by comrade Lane, and a resolution in favour of the workers of Paris was moved by Tochatti, seconded and supported by comrades Sparling, Williams, and Crotch. On Sunday six outdoor meetings were held, addressed by Lane, Sparling, Tochatti, and Williams; all spoke on the Commune. In the evening, Sparling gave a lecture on "Evolution of Cannibalism" to a large audience, which was well received. Monday evening, lecture on Commune by Tochatti. Literature sold well. Last Tuesday, a meeting of the Branch was held and re-organised, new officers being appointed.—A. SUTTON.

GRIMSBY.—Last Sunday, several earnest men met at the Hall of Science and formed themselves into a society for Socialist propaganda. The question of affiliating with the Socialist League was held over until the members had studied carefully the 'Manifesto' of the League.—T.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—On Monday night, March 14, the Sheffield Socialists rallied together in the Commonwealth Cafe, to hear Charlotte M. Wilson lecture on "The Revolt of the Workers in the Nineteenth Century." The lecture was a clever one, and was listened to with great attention. Socialism is making headway in this town.

PARIS COMMUNE CELEBRATIONS.

On Thursday March 17 a gathering took place of the London Socialist bodies, English and foreign sections, for the purpose of celebrating the Paris Commune, at South Place Institute, Finsbury, E.C. The meeting was a large and most enthusiastic one. Speeches in English were delivered by Annie Besant, Mrs. Wilson, P. Krapotkin, W. Morris, J. Lane, A. K. Donald, J. R. Macdonald, and Frank Kitz. Speeches were also delivered in French, German, and Italian. The great number of Commune celebrations this year is a sure sign of the increasing strength of the Socialist party in this country. Even the would-be silent bourgeois press is compelled to note this; and despite its abortive attempts to belittle the success of the movement here in England, the record which it itself does make, clearly shows that it is no longer possible to treat with supercilious indifference its growing strength.—H. A. B.

Celebrations also took place at many of the Branches of the Socialist League and Social Democratic Federation. On Sunday afternoon last meetings of several thousands were held in Hyde Park. In the evening a large meeting was held in Cleveland Hall.

NOTTINGHAM.—The Nottingham Socialists gathered on the 18th of March in the Secular Hall to celebrate the Paris Commune by a tea-party and ball. After tea the chairman, T. Proctor, made a few remarks on the Commune, after which our French comrade Cou-teaux sang the Marseillaise. S. Whalley then gave a brief sketch of the history of the Commune. Mr. Dautrie, French comrade, and H. Cooper also addressed the meeting, interspersed with a few songs and recitations. At 9 p.m. dancing commenced, and was kept up till 1 a.m. next morning, when the company together sang the Marseillaise amid the waving of red flags. The hall was tastefully decorated, the names of Morris, Hyndman, and prominent Socialists on the Continent hung round the room between red flags and other decorations, across the hall being a large red banner with the words "Vive la Commune!" About 60 were present, and we had an enjoyable evening.—T. PROCTOR.

DUBLIN.—On Thursday March 17th an International Celebration of the Commune of Paris was held at 50 Dawson Street, the following nationalities being represented: English, Welsh, Scotch, Irish, French, Danish, Russian, and American. Addresses on the principles and aims of the Commune, the reason of its failure, etc., were delivered by Schumann and others. A telegram received during the evening from our London comrades was read amidst great applause. A most enjoyable evening was wound up by comrade Coulon singing the Marseillaise in French.—O. K.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Government have got through the first stage of this new coercion adventure with no very triumphant success, though only one Liberal Unionist voted for Mr. Morley's amendment; Mr. Bright in his new character of definite Tory voting for the government as a matter of course. There was nothing very remarkable in the debate that preceded the division. Mr. Gladstone spoke bold words enough as to the opposition which his party were prepared to make to the bill, and it is to be hoped that they will be made good; but one must see it done before one can be sure that it will be: meanwhile, of course, the Tories raise the cry of "obstruction"; as if it were not the business of any minority in the House of Commons to obstruct the passing of any measure that they thoroughly condemn.

A great part of Mr. Gladstone's elaborate speech was taken up with trying to prove that his coercion bill was quite a different thing, and put forward under quite different circumstances than this new measure; and the orthodox Liberal papers were in ecstasies over his success in this attempt. But a reasonable man would think this ingenuity wasted: the Coercion Act on one hand and the action of the National League on the other, are simply acts of war; and it was just the same thing when the Liberal Government passed their Coercion Act. To speak plainly, all this side of the debate pro and con was simple twaddle; the mere lawyer-like stupidity of never making an admission, which is a habit in Parliament, too. Really, Mr. Gladstone need not be ashamed of changing his mind with the example of Mr. Bright before him, who has become a Tory simply because he could not change his, when things were changing around him.

It would be refreshing to find somebody who would say, when challenged as to the relation of his present to his past opinion, "Yes; I did think that, but I have changed my opinion now," but that seems to be as rare a bird as the man that will say "Yes; I said so-and-so, and I meant it then and mean it now." And it would take a strong lantern to find a man in Parliament who could say either of those things.

As to Mr. Chamberlain, he seems determined to go deeper and deeper into the mire; and surely a man who had been away from the country for two years, and had not seen any newspapers during that time, if he happened on any of Mr. Chamberlain's present speeches, would be likely to say, "Pray what Chamberlain is that? Is it any relation to the Joseph Chamberlain who, when I left England, was going about the country making demi-semi-socialistic speeches?"

The thoughtful soul may, if it pleases, debate with itself whether the German or English people have scored in the game of flunkeydom by the last two exhibitions of that art, the celebration of the Kaiser's birthday, or the Queen's visit to Birmingham. Certainly, the German transaction was on the larger scale, and so more offensive, and there appears to have been an outpouring of sentiment on the occasion, not easy for a sane man to understand, if he chance not to belong to that parish; neither is the superannuated drill-sergeant who was worshipped by the German population—(What were all the Socialist voters about, by the way?)—a very worthy idol. Still, the man is a kind of a real king, and represents, at any rate, the memory of a set of desperate battles, and, 'tis said, does his joss-business of being seen with much assiduity, and his position altogether is not so preposterous as that of our own special joss, which does not do its business even of being seen (if that mattered at all), and cannot do anything else of a public kind without being called over the coals for it as an unconstitutional act.

Doubtless, also, a good deal of the enthusiasm at Berlin was of police creation, and it is to be thought that the Birmingham loyalty was more genuine of its kind, and at the bottom of it, probably, lay the hope of the quickening of business a little. Finally, when we take into consideration that Birmingham is a Radical town, I think the palm must be given to the English professors of flunkeydom; their faith is purer, and shines brighter through the wrappages of individual character, political creed, and other accidents than that of any other nation.

In the April number of Harper's Magazine is an article on "Wages in Europe and America," the outcome of which seems to be in agreement with our constant assertion that in all civilized countries, the workman is in much the same position. What slight differences there are between labour's position in different countries arise from an altered standard of living.

Everywhere the worker is pushed down as far as he can go, and kept down there as long as he will stay.

A letter in the Spectator well illustrates the unreasoning fatuity of the average bourgeois. The writer has been giving particulars of the terrible condition of the Austrian workers, and winds up by saying that we in London (Socialists) "have much to be thankful for."

Does he mean workmen when he says Socialists? And imply that so long as someone is worse off than ourselves, we should be unfailingly happy; as no doubt he would be did he lose an eye, another losing both!

Or, are his words to be literally taken? In that case, he is decidedly illogical, being a bourgeois; for the only feature in the evil case of the Austrian workmen that can please a Socialist is their restiveness under it, and the conviction forced upon us that the capitalists of Austria and elsewhere are serving the revolution well by making their workers' lives intolerable.

DESPOTISM AND NIHILISM IN RUSSIA.

THE world has once more been startled by another attempt at assassination. The despots are once more alarmed, and the press, as usual, calls for vengeance on the so-called miscreants who attempted to kill even an Emperor. That words of congratulation should be sent to the Emperor with lightning speed need not surprise any one. The same with regard to the blind fury of the hireling press of this and other countries. Yet, it would be best to look at the matter with greater calmness, and think well what the situation is. Let us deal first with the question on the ground of principle.

What is an Emperor? Simply a usurper. One who claims the right to rule in violation of the principle of equal liberty, in violation of the principle of eternal right, of eternal justice. Usurpation can never be the basis of legitimate authority. It can never command the respect of the thoughtful. It will never receive the respect of the free man or the free woman. Usurpation is the greatest of all crimes. Its very existence implies the assassination of the dignity, the liberty, and the independence of a whole people. It implies the degradation and slavery of millions of human beings. Usurpation is the basis of absolute despotism, of the most debasing tyranny. Where usurpation exists liberty is impossible. All the rights of the individual, the liberty of thought, of speech, of free association, are all sacrificed to the supremacy of the usurper. And what is a usurper? A despot, a tyrant, from principle. Behold him on his throne of blood, a rebel against the principle of eternal justice, a traitor to the principle of human brotherhood. He is at war with the people over whom he claims to rule. As a traitor to the holy principle of equal liberty, he is at war with humanity. As a traitor and a rebel he should be everywhere treated as an outlaw. Usurpation is despotism in all its naked deformity. None but slaves can tolerate it. None but sycophants can recognise it. None but courtiers can sing its praises. The glory of usurpation and the grandeur of its saturnalia depend on the plunder and the degradation of the people. And from the curse and scourge of usurpation the people are in duty bound, severally or collectively, to free themselves.

We read of the Imperialism of ancient Rome, and of the religious royalty of the middle ages; we have had the Imperialism of Napoleon the Great, and we have the Imperialism of the German Kaiser; but in the Imperialism of Russia we have the blasphemous claims of religious royalty and the naked rascality of political despotism. There the usurper rules supreme. His will is law. At his bidding ten thousand victims take their death march to Siberia. At his command a thousand men and women ascend the scaffold, martyrs for the holy principle of human liberty. Behold the Czar of all the Russians on his throne of blood and rapine, surrounded by his almost countless legions of mercenary cut-throats; behold him the traitor, the rebel, ever at war with the people over whom he claims to rule; at war with humanity, the only true sovereign. If the usurper be the annointed of heaven, let heaven protect him. As a rebel against the law of eternal right he deserves no protection from the law.

But the conspirators. Who and what are they? All the truest, the wisest, the bravest, of all classes of Russian society. In a dispatch from St. Petersburg, dated March 12, and quoted in the Standard of March 17, we read of the widespread dissatisfaction that exists amongst all classes in the Russian Empire—military, officials, nobles, workmen, and peasants. "These malcontents," it is said, "do not, strictly speaking, belong to the Nihilist or Terrorist party, but they almost involuntarily promote the objects of the active revolutionists, and their number is so great that the gaps caused by executions or arrests, are immediately filled up." We are also told "the number of officers, non-commissioned officers, and military pupils recently arrested for conspiracy, not only at St. Petersburg, but in many other garrisons, is very great, far greater than is generally known, but still greater is the number of those who are equally guilty but have accidentally escaped detection."

In the Standard of March 24, we read, "Nihilism, too, in its original form, has, as I have often remarked, died out long ago; but the social revolutionary agitation which it exploited, and which still bears its name, still exists, and will exist as long as the autocratic government, against which its misdeeds are so terrible a protest." The St. Petersburg correspondent of the Daily News, March 25, referring to the attempts to get up a show of loyalty in the universities, says: "Public opinion here and abroad is not, however, to be deceived by such artifices. It is really surprising to hear what is said about the state of the country in diplomatic circles. It might be supposed that the revolution so long dreaded is now on the eve of breaking out. I know that the foreign representatives have sent reports to their governments upon the actual state of Russia, and that these reports at all events are not of the brightest colours." On the same date we read that at Odessa, forty officers, some of high rank, had been arrested within a few days. March 26th we are told that ten more officers had been arrested at St. Petersburg. We read that Gatschina is like a regular fortress, with a powerful garrison and hundreds of spies and police. And this is holy Russia!

It may be said that these men are rebels, but they already embrace the best and the truest of every class. Call them rebels if you will; but such rebels are the salt of the earth and the glory of the human race. Place them by the side of the arch-rebel, the arch-usurper, on his blood-stained throne. Behold him, a usurper by birth, a despot from principle, a tyrant in the worst sense of the word, upholding all that is iniquitous, all that is villainous, all that is barbarous, brutal, and corrupt, the enemy of all that is pure and just, of all that tends to elevate the people, or that can raise them to dignity and liberty. Turn to the conspirators, so-called. Who are they? Men and women of all ranks and classes, from the highest noble to the artisans or the peasants. What is their aim? To free their country from the curse and scourge of a degrading despotism; from the tyranny and corruption which there prevail. To raise the great mass of the people, to free them from the thousand tyrannies and oppressions that degrade and enslave them; to make man and woman free—free as the air they breathe, free as the light of day.

But why do they not agitate in a legal manner; why do they not adopt legitimate means? No government, no authority that rests on usurpation can ever be legitimate. The decrees of tyrants can never be binding on a single human being. Nor can any authority be legitimate that does not rest on the freely expressed will of the great mass of the people. To enforce any decree against the will of the people is tyranny, and to impose a single tax without the consent of the people is an act of plunder. The usurper, then, is not only a rebel, but a criminal, a wholesale plunderer, and ought to be treated as such.

But how many men and women has the present Czar of all the Russias sent to Siberia, there to linger out a miserable existence? How many are rotting in Russian fortresses? How many has he sent to the scaffold, murdered in cold blood to prolong for a little while longer his reign as a despot and the slavery of the people? To combat such a system is the duty of every man, of every woman. When there is neither freedom of speech, nor of the press, nor free association, organisation on a large scale is impossible. Secret conspiracy is the only means, and to conspire the most sacred obligation. He who denies to the people their rights and liberties is a rebel against the people, and should be treated as such. And where the people are denied the right of free organisation, of free action, in the words of Suarez, "it is permitted to an individual to kill a tyrant, in virtue of the law of self-defence." And he adds, "For though the community does not command it, it is always to be understood that it wishes to be defended by every one of its citizens individually, and even by a stranger. Then, if no defence can be found excepting the death of the tyrant, it is permitted to every one to kill him." These words are clear and precise, and cannot be disputed. Take the following from our own Milton: "Since the king, or magistrate, holds his authority of the people, for their good, and not his own, then may the people, as oft as they shall judge it for the best, either choose him or reject him, retain him or depose him, though no tyrant, merely by the liberty and right of free born men, to be governed as seems to them best" (Prose Works). Let us not forget, too, that our own ancestors not only claimed the right to take up arms against a tyrant, in the person of Charles I., but to try him for treason and send him to the grave headless.

But the right of a people to free themselves from tyranny and oppression has always been recognised, by insurrection if practicable, by any other means if necessary. Blackstone (Ch. Royal Prerogative), in speaking of the expulsion of James II., and the right of the people to resort to insurrection when necessary, says: "Nor will they (the people) sacrifice their liberty by their adherence to those political maxims which were established to preserve it. In these or other circumstances, since law and history are silent, it becomes us to be silent also, leaving to future generations, whenever necessity or the safety of the whole may require it, the exertion of those inherent though latent powers of society, which no time, no constitution, no contract, can ever destroy or diminish." Many other English authorities might be given.

In dealing with the revolutionary movement in Russia, let us not forget the facts of our own history. Above all, let us take our stand on principle; and let us remember that it is the duty of every people to adopt any and every means, individually and collectively, to free themselves from the curse and scourge of a cruel and relentless despotism.

J. SKETCHLEY.

THE IMMORALITY OF INTEREST.

It is not probable that in modern times it has ever entered the head of one Christian in a thousand that to lend money at interest is intrinsically wrong, and denounced not only by the Socialists, but also most vigorously by the Christian Fathers, and condemned in no equivocal manner in the Bible. They know, of course, that usury was forbidden among the Jews, but ignorant of the meaning of the Scriptural term, imagine it has no modern counterpart, at least in this country.

It is written in Deuteronomy xxiii. 19, "Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of anything that is lent upon usury," and similar divine commands are given in Levit. xxv. 35, 36, 37, and in Exodus xxii. 25. With regard to the meaning of the term, St. Ambrose says, "Many persons, evading the precepts of the law, when they give money to merchants, require the usury not in money, but take some of their goods in payment of the usury. Therefore, let them know what says the law; You shall not, it says, receive the usury of food, nor of anything else. The victuals is usury, the cloth is usury; whatever is added to the principal is usury—whatever name you give it, it is usury." St. Augustine also, on Psalm xxxvii. 26, says, "If you lend your money to a man from whom you expect more than you gave, not money alone but anything else, whether it be wheat, wine, oil, or any other article, if you expect to receive any more than you gave, you are an usurer, and in that respect reprehensible, not praiseworthy." St. Jerome too, on Ezekiel xviii. 10, 17, says, "Some persons imagine that usury obtains only in money; but the Scriptures, foreseeing this, have exploded every increase, so that you cannot receive more than you gave. Others likewise have the habit of receiving gifts of various descriptions for the usurious loans, not understanding that the Scriptures call usury also increase whatever that be, if they receive any more than they had given." Usury seems then to signify any kind of payment made for the loan of anything, and is therefore the generic term for rent, interest, and profit.

It is objected that the Jews were forbidden to exact usury from their brethren only, but were at liberty to charge it to strangers. Regarding this St. Thomas says, "To receive usury from strangers was not permitted as a lawful thing, but rather tolerated for avoiding a greater evil. This dispensation is not extended to Christians who are bound to consider all mankind as brethren, especially under the New Law to which they are called."

That Jesus of Nazareth himself looked upon the practice as iniquitous the whole tenor of his teaching proves. He even forbids it expressly in Luke vi. 34, "And if ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again. But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend hoping for nothing again, and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be the children of the Highest: for he is kind unto the unthankful and to the evil." Nothing could be plainer, and the sincere, conscientious Christian, seeking to obey the precepts of his Master, and possessing sufficient independence and intellectual activity to impel him to examine the Scriptures for himself, can have no hesitation in denouncing the inconsistency and impiety of Christian interest-takers and profit-mongers. He would not dream, for a moment, of disregarding the whole spirit of Christ's teaching, by attempting to justify usury, and would be the first to point out the error of those who so eagerly seize on the parable of the talents as an excuse for the practice. The power of self-interest to blind men to all reason and truth is tremendous, and it is therefore not surprising that when self-interest is reinforced by a superstitious regard for custom, benevolent and ordinarily clear-sighted men should, in good faith, consider the parable as indisputable proof of the divine sanction. It is quite evident, however, that if the parable does sanction it, it belies the whole teaching and practice of Christ; but there can be no doubt it was only intended to picture in a striking manner the reward awaiting the believer who lays out his talents at spiritual usury, by feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, tending the sick and helpless, and caring for the widows and orphans.

So much for the argumentum ad hominem addressed to the professed Christian. But in the opinion of those of us who do not bow to the "authority" of the Biblical writers, and who are not inclined to admit their infallibility in ethical questions, the morality of the custom does not depend on the interpretation of Scripture. It can be shown that usury is an infringement of the law of justice, the result of the tyranny of the strong over the weak, and the great cause of poverty with its innumerable attendant evils. Whether usury be right or wrong, to it must be attributed the glaring social inequalities of the present time, for these are by no means commensurate with the difference in physical power, intellectual capacity, or moral quality of the members of the community. If usury be justifiable, our working millions must be abandoned to their hopeless struggle with poverty. If, on the other hand, they and their children are ever to have brighter or happier days, usury must be driven out of the world; that is the alternative. Fortunately we are provided by non-Socialists with an estimate of the burdens laid upon the workers by this ogre. According to Mundella the total annual income of the country, that is to say, the quantity of wealth produced each year is 1300 millions. This wealth is, of course, produced only by the workers, manual and mental, and what do these workers get? only 300 millions between them, at the highest estimate 500 millions! Making every allowance, for we have no need to exaggerate, more than one-half of the wealth produced by the workers is taken from them in the name of—usury. Facts like these surely point to usury as the principal cause of poverty. It is true that the poverty of some is due to personal vices, but it cannot be denied that the poverty of the great bulk of the population is caused by circumstances beyond the control of the individual, and by those circumstances mere tendencies in the individual are often developed into vices which would otherwise have lain dormant, so that some deduction again has to be made from the admission above stated as to personal vices. Certainly the individual lies helpless in the iron grip of usury.

We see at present the land and the capital without which the propertyless workers must starve, in the hands of a comparatively small number of the population. To gain access to this God's (sic) earth and to the instruments of production, to wit, the machinery, mills, factories, railways, etc., is of paramount importance to the workers, and accordingly they are obliged to apply to the holders of property for leave to use it. The workers have nothing (through no fault of their own, mind you); the capitalists and landowners everything. If, on being thus appealed to, the latter listened to the teaching of the great and noble minds of the past, and obeyed their generous and better nature prompting them to help their less fortunate brethren, they would hasten to share freely these necessities of life and work with the unlucky ones, or at the very least lend them interest-free on condition of receiving payment for them by easy instalments. Instead, however, of answering their altruistic impulses they allow themselves to be swayed by their selfish and anti-social inclinations, and stifling all sympathy for their disinherited fellows lay upon them the yoke of slavery by a process euphemistically called "free contract." Free undoubtedly the workers are, only however to accept the terms of the propertied classes or—starve.

The terms, too, are: that the workers keep in good order and well-conditioned their masters' land and instruments of work, renewing such of the latter as are worn out by use; that they give their masters all the wealth they produce over and above what is just necessary to maintain them efficient, machine-like toilers and enable them to bring up children to replace them when wrought out. On the one hand they have starvation staring them in the face and on the other that arch-fiend, Usury, standing sentry over the means of work, ready on behalf of his masters to call on the police and even the military to aid him in preventing the proletariat using these means except on the terms mentioned above. It seems as if the only moral law which can be appealed to in defence of usury is that one which declares that "might is right." Yet, after all, it is only the "force" of the superstitious notions the people themselves have about the rights of property which holds them enslaved thus. The moment they realise that they are being robbed daily and hourly in the name of private property, the police and military will be with them; for are not they too of the people?

"THE LAST DAYS OF THE COMMUNE."

The following extracts are taken from an article by an eye-witness, J. B. Marsh, in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' of July, 1871.

"THE atrocities perpetrated upon the Communists—men and women—captured in the neighbourhood of the Rue de Rivoli were shocking. Women were stabbed in the back by soldiers to make them walk more quickly to the places where they were to be shot; and men fated to die were maltreated by soldiers and civilians. The attitude and demeanour of the men was heroic. They bore the insults and the taunts of the soldiers unmoved, and walked defiantly, as though they were going to meet a martyr's death. All the members of the National Guard with whom I conversed were mechanics or clerks; I saw but few of those vagabonds with whose faces and figures the illustrated papers have made us familiar; nor did I see any of those women whose fierceness and cruelty have been so often detailed in English newspapers. On the three days when the insurgents held possession of the First Arrondissement, I frequently saw women armed with revolvers and rifles, marching at the head of companies of armed men; but they were well-dressed, good-looking females, who appeared to be animated by a sense of patriotism. The appearance of a few of these women on the ramparts gave rise to the most exaggerated rumours as to their number. . . . The number of arrests made by the troops was considerably augmented by the police, who followed in their train. House to house visitation was then carried out in the most systematic manner, and hundreds of men and women dragged forth from hiding places. Many of the leading sympathisers with Communism were thus unearthed, and all who were recognised met with immediate execution. The course pursued by the soldiers was to conduct the condemned person to the nearest barricades and there shoot them, but when one was not near the man or woman was led into the centre of the roadway and there put to death. In the Rue Richelieu was a barricade of formidable dimensions, which had a deep hole excavated in the front, the earth from which was used to face the barricade. At this spot upwards of forty men were put to death. In carrying out the executions, the soldiers in no single instance that I saw raised their rifles to their shoulders, but held them about the level of their knees and fired. The dead, both men and women, lay about the streets, in the squares, on the banks of the Seine, in every direction, until the insurrection was extinguished. Then they were collected in country carts and carried out of Paris, and what ultimately became of them I do not know. . . . But where are the innocent victims of these sad disasters? What has become of the children? The estimates of the number of dead and those made prisoners vary considerably, but according to some statements, there were 20,000 men and women killed in fight or executed between the 21st and 28th of May, and upwards of 40,000 men and women made prisoners. What has become of the thousands of little ones, suddenly deprived of one or both parents? The children were obtruded on the public gaze in every procession of prisoners during the days when fighting was going on in the streets of Paris. Among the sad sights of that terrible week, the saddest to my mind was the spectacle of whole families marching under an escort of soldiers to the nearest place of confinement. In scores of instances a little child too young to walk was carried by father or mother, and the innocent face contrasted strangely with the fierce countenances of the captors and captives. Nor was there anything more horrible than the torrent of oaths which the spectacle of a child carried in the arms drew forth from the people who were drawn together to see the prisoners pass. For the night following their capture the children were allowed to remain with their parents, but the following morning at daybreak they were separated."

WIMBLEDON AND MERTON NOTES.

IN this happy hunting ground of the jerry-builder, whose hideous and insecure handiwork abounds on every side, we are surrounded with a population composed of retired profit-mongers, the clerk and shop-keeping element, and over-worked artisans and labourers. A large proportion of the latter have been tempted by puff advertisements to come and "live a little way out" and rent "those desirable residences," in which roofs leak, ceilings and walls crack, and doors refuse to shut, and which, when "to let," have tumbled down of their own accord. The retired profit-mongers occupy the best and most salubrious portions of Wimbledon Hill, Park, and Common, many portions of which they have "conserved" to their own especial benefit. But the true spirit of selfishness is best shown by the hideous walls erected around their "private" property recently, thus excluding the general public from enjoying some of the most magnificent views in the county of Surrey.

The aforesaid profit-mongers are very solicitous about their final destination hereafter, where, I opine, they think to have some more private property and enjoy the "music and light" all to themselves. Hence parsons and lay spouters, church, chapels, and mission-halls, are nearly as plentiful as the beer-shops and public-houses wherein the tired workmen seek their recreation with publicans and sinners.

The lot of the workmen in these distant suburbs is extremely hard; rising at 4 or 4.30 a.m. in order to catch a workmen's train, he arrives back at night too tired to partake of intellectual pleasures, and must needs seek the "pub" for change.

There is, however, another type, dear to the "master" and after his own heart—viz., the converted working man. He never complains of long hours and short pay. As one said at a local meeting, he would work for 10s. per week, conscious that the "Lord" would supply the deficiency and meet his wants. He regales himself with a pennyworth of gingerette, and takes delight in listening to discourses of converted burglars, prize-fighters, etc., whose "thoughts on awful subjects dwell—damnation and the dead."

Sir John Lubbock, in opening the Free Library here, gave an address upon the pleasure to be derived from the perusal of sterling books; and the Jubileists—of whom more anon—ask £200 to purchase more books for the library. But workmen who "come home in the even too tired and weary to stand" are not likely to benefit unless the institution is open on Sundays—sacrilegious thought.

The Jubileists held a meeting at the Drill Hall on 24th March, to discuss the proposals as to the due celebration of Jubilee by the flunkeys and snobs of the neighbourhood. Amid a scene of the wildest disorder, comrade Harrison and myself put forward an amendment to the effect that the circumstances of the working classes does not warrant any jubilation because an old lady has received over £80,000,000 for fifty years of office. Comrades Eden and Dalchon also attempted to get a hearing, the audience energetically hooting and howling at both sides. "God save the Queen" as a finale was drowned in cat-calls, shouts, and hoarse bellowings. Thus have the loyal bigwigs squandered their money to provide the Socialists with an evening's entertainment. It was dimly understood that a resolution to provide almshouses was carried, but if so, as a local comrade said, the only recipients of such charity would be centenarians who had brought on confirmed curvature of the spine by continual kowtowing to the upholders of cant and hypocrisy.

NORTHUMBRIAN NOTES.

THE strike is coming to a very critical stage. There is now considerable distress amongst the non-unionists, and the strike-pay last week was so low that even the unionists are feeling the pinch. The newspapers, relief committees, and the innumerable public advisers of the "pro bono publico" stamp are all entreating the miners to give in. The newspapers raised the cry of famine at least a week before it came, and their heart-rending accounts of the sufferings of the people are all profusely interspersed with arguments on the hopelessness of the miners' struggle. Not a word against the mine-owners or their host of swindling dealers and agents, who get more by the useless process of buying the coal cheap and selling it dear than the miners do for hewing it out of the bowels of the earth.

The good-intentioned people who run charity and relief committees, have an incomparable knack of making themselves a nuisance. People may be qualified to run a soup kitchen, or discharge the useful duties of scullery-maid, and yet be unable to grasp all the difficulties of one of the largest strikes of the present decade. But it is impossible to drive this into some people's heads. A relief committee is formed at Blyth. Its first act is to issue a memorial lamenting its inability to do its work, and praying the strikers to give in at any cost. Unsigned letters appear daily from people who know all about everything, prophesying failure for the strikers, and urging them to yield before they are beaten. Thus every influence is at work to force the men to give way.

It is impossible yet to say how the strike will end, or when it will end. The miners are hopeful and determined enough, but the force against them is very strong. The masters show an unbroken front, the pits are said to have been working at a loss, and the trade is ebbing away. Even when work is resumed, on whatever terms, the lot of the miners will be a very poor one indeed. Their wages were at starvation point. They will certainly go back discontented and bitter, and even if they win, the fight they have had to keep their position will tell heavily upon them, and make them more ready to take up the revolutionary movement.

The Socialists here, of course, have not in any way interfered in the dispute. We have denounced others for interfering; and preached and acted upon the principle that the miners best understood their own business, and that outsiders should interfere when they are asked, and not before. When the strike has begun, every friend of labour should do all in their power to make it a success. The Socialist plan is to seize the advantage offered by the excitement of the strike and the leisure now enjoyed by the men, to spread our principles.

The miners are not getting the support from outside that they are entitled to. During the past week or fortnight things have greatly changed. The distress is now wide-spread and keen. There has been one or two disturbances on account of the black-legs going to work in the pits at one or two places. The women turned out and gave them a warm escort from the pit-mouths. No serious damage was done, however, and quietness has been restored.

The coal trade altogether is in a very bad condition, and likely to become worse. More pits are being worked than is at all necessary. Northumberland is one of the largest coal-producing places in the country, and yet if none of its pits were ever opened again, the coal trade would hardly feel the effect. When work is resumed, many pits will be working very short time indeed.

By the way, one statement in my letter last week was wrong. I had taken the figures from one place in stating the wages, instead of the average. The highest county average was 9s. 6d. (official statement, 9s.) in 1873. But a great many could get over the amount. In some cases 15s. could be taken, and I have spoken to a miner who remembers earning over £1; but this figure, of course, was rare.

During the last week the propaganda has gone on very well indeed. On Friday afternoon a large meeting was held in the Ashington Co-operative Hall. Addresses were given by Williams, Fielding, and myself. At night I had a debate with a clergyman at Bedlington Co-operative Hall. The place seats about 800 people, but over 1,200 were crammed into it. Every bit of standing ground was packed, and every available corner from the platform to the gallery was made use of. Several hundreds were unable to get in, and Fielding and Williams addressed them in the open air whilst the debate was going on. The feeling of the meeting was very decidedly in favour of Socialism.

Preparations for forming a North of England Socialist organisation are going forward. Next Saturday, a conference will be held in Newcastle, and miners from a number of the collieries and towns of Northumberland and Durham will attend. As members of the Socialist League and Social Democratic Federation have worked equally hard in the district, it would be unwise to force one organisation on to the exclusion of the other. At the same time, any rivalry would be fatal to both parties, and foolish on all grounds. Of course, the men who meet together must decide what is to be done. My own opinion is that a local society, say the North of England Socialist Federation should be formed and issue its own rules, etc. That both London parties and papers should be treated exactly alike, while no official connection should be formed with either. When the re-union and consolidation of the Socialist movement takes place, the local body could join the re-united forces. There might be a general gathering together before long, and in 1888 the United Socialists could hold their first conference in Newcastle-on-Tyne. 'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished, if no principle were lost in the transaction.

Newcastle, March 28th.

J. L. MAHON.

WORKERS AND SHIRKERS.

SOCIETY is divided into two sections, and into two sections only; the workers and the shirkers. The former by manual labour or as brain-workers provide all things needful to man's physical and intellectual well-being. The latter is a useless class, and, unless frivolity and vice can be said to adorn society, its existence cannot be excused on the ground that it is ornamental, though that they are the sole adornment of society is the idea firmly implanted in the minds of the shirkers. Strange to say, the shirkers are the minority, and it is marvellous that they are able to sponge on the majority for free board and lodgings, and to get them, too, not with scorn and contempt, but with the servile adulation and respect of the workers. Books have been written "in praise of folly" and "in praise of drunkenness." It has not been necessary to write a book in praise of cunning, for on every lip is praise of that supreme cunning which enables one man to live upon the labour of another. Yet it will not be amiss to unmask the cunning now it has got the length that the shirkers are not satisfied to remain idle themselves but enforce the workers to idleness when they cannot toil to their profit. The workers are homeless, but must not build houses for themselves; they are ragged, but must not weave for themselves; they are hungry, but must not win from the soil food for themselves and for their children.

How is it done? The three card trick, the confidence dodge, all the ruses by which the black-leg gets a livelihood are but shallow artifices compared with the fraud upon the workers constantly practised by the shirkers. Force, of course, is an element in the matter, but the force is concealed as much as possible for fear the majority may take lesson from the minority, and by organisation meet force with force. This is the lesson the workers have to learn, which happily they are learning, so we will content ourselves with examining the fraud upon which the system is based. Let us look at the hocus-pocus of the thing. The "class" dodge is the one which has most successfully deluded the workers. The result of generations of good living and of abstinence from toil is that the shirkers have delicate limbs and shapely bodies, while excessive toil and hard living has scarred the features of the workers or made them uncouth of figure. The workers have been defrauded of their share in the common inheritance, knowledge; schools, and universities founded for the people have been seized upon by the shirkers with the result that the minds, like the persons, of their sons and daughters have been adorned, while the workers have remained unlettered, or received only enough education to make them docile servants. Having in this way artificially created class, the shirkers point to the perfection, or what passes for it, of their own minds and persons and to the mental and physical grossness of the workers as a proof that these are pre-ordained hewers of wood, drawers of water, servitors to their class, and they blasphemously ascribe to the Deity these social inequalities, asserting that he has magnified the rich and set down the poor. Repeating the lie, the hirelings of the pulpit hurl damnation at any who shall dare revolt against that tyranny of the classes which they bless with a text. Grave lawyers, learned doctors, too, support the privileges of the classes. Awed by this show of wisdom, affrighted by these threats, the workers have bowed their heads to the yoke. Heavier and heavier it has grown, but the day draws near when it will be thrown off, and the absurd fiction of class forgotten in recognition of equality—

"Oldest of things, divine equality."

If the class trick has been successfully played off upon them, the workers have been gulled still more completely by the pretension of the shirkers to be the chosen inheritors of the earth. St. Peter may hold the keys of heaven and hell, but they pretend to hold the keys of earth, and will allow no one access to it unless first they pay to them the toll called rent. The notion of private property in land, upon which all of us must live, is as repugnant to common sense as individual proprietorship in the air, which all of us must breathe; but the production of a parchment sheet setting forth that certain acres of the common soil had been given or sold to A. B. and his descendants for ever by some one who had no right whatever either to give or to sell them, has been taken as sufficient title to ownership of that which no man can own—the land. One questions whether they are not sheep in men's guise who permit themselves to be huddled in towns and cities, starved in slums and alleys, that a whole county may be turned into deer-forests and grouse-moors, or that huge estates may rear pheasants and hares, providing sport for the shirkers instead of bread for the workers. Such submission is sheepish, it is not human. But the shirkers are not satisfied with laying claim to the land. Whatever wealth is produced by the workers in excess of subsistence wages, is seized upon by them as interest and profit, tolls which they levy for permission accorded the workers to use to-day the capital which they (the workers) created yesterday. And this pretension of the shirkers to the ownership of the land and the capital—capital the creation of the workers—has so imposed upon the latter that they grovel before the shirkers in gratitude for their kindness in allowing them to till their soil, increase their capital, employ their machinery, without which permission it seems to them they would not be able to get even that scanty fare for which they sweat out their lives. And this brings us to the flimsiest of all excuses for the existence of the shirkers—that they give work, that they encourage the arts and the sciences by consuming the wealth created by others, by purchasing the produce of other men's labour. This sophistry is too feeble for the insect mind, but man has accepted it. The bees with greater wisdom kill off the drones. "What is Jem doing?" "Nothing." "And what are you doing?" "Helping Jem." And so the busy shirkers, the lawyers, the bankers, the stockbrokers, the merchants, and all the flunkey class help the idle shirkers, all of them preying upon the workers, who must rid themselves of the whole pestilent horde. They must sweep the world clean of them before they can make of it once more a temple for man and God, instead of a den of thieves.

J. HUNTER WATTS.

THE CABMAN'S LOT IS NOT A HAPPY ONE.—A cab-driver in the employ of Mr. Knight was recently summoned for plying for hire off a licensed standing in Fleet Street. Police-Constable 450 gave evidence to seeing the defendant put up his hand to two gentlemen standing outside the Portugal Hotel, Fleet Street. Defendant said it was true he put up his hand, but he thought the two gentlemen hailed him, and he believed now that he was hailed. He could assure his worship that the cabman's lot in London was not a happy one. When he left home that morning there was no food in his house, and he was not able to leave his wife the means of getting any dinner for the children. Consequently, he was very anxious to get a fare, and seeing a gentleman hold up his hand he held up his, and drove to him as quickly as he could. Alderman Knill said he believed the constable's evidence, and fined defendant 2s. 6d. and costs.—A cabman in the service of Mr. Pearce was summoned for a similar offence. Constable Walton, 508, said he saw defendant at Chancery Lane hold up his hand to a lady, and at Middle Temple Lane hold up his hand to a gentleman. Defendant said he was a night cabman, and had been on the rank for nearly nine hours without a fare when this occurred. A boy came to him at a quarter to ten in the morning and said a gentleman was waiting by Middle Temple Lane for a cab. He drove up to the gentleman and found that he was waiting for an omnibus. He then drove away, but was stopped by the constable. He would swear that he did not hail a lady at all. Cabmen had great difficulty in earning a little money now, and in was very hard for them to be fined for trying to get a fare. Alderman Knill said as defendant had a clean license he would only order him to pay 2s. costs. Defendant: I have not 2s. in the world.—Cabmen may have children at home starving, or they may even be starving themselves; but the "law" will not allow them to "ply for hire," i.e., hold up one hand, within the "ancient precincts" of the City of London. This, too, is another instance of the honesty of our administrators of the law, and an illustration of the "order" produced by its application. Socialists are often asked by working men how, under Socialism, things would be arranged; as if, whatever arrangement obtained, things could be worse, or even as bad!

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOCIALIST SUPERSTITIONS.

SIR,—I wish to notify to all who may be concerned the existence in the mind of the British Socialist party of two superstitions which I venture to think might be eliminated without disadvantage to the cause. I am aware that they are both of them founded on reason, but the originally reasonable and laudable sentiment has unhappily degenerated until it can only be described as above.

Superstition No. 1. The fact that in France party differences among Socialists are often mixed up with personal squabbles, and these squabbles often occupy a ludicrously prominent place in the party press, has given rise to the superstition that it is "bad form" for one section of the English party to criticise even in the most cool and impartial way the doings of another section with whom they have ever had serious differences. "Oh no, we never mention him, his name is never heard" is the present style of conducting Socialist papers. One section of the party may be doing useful work, although there might be many points in it amenable to criticism, but the organ of the other section does not wish to fully endorse every action of its rival, so in the end the news is absolutely passed over or dismissed in a short paragraph. On the whole, the result is suggestive of the treatment by the hero in 'Great Expectations,' of his whilom friend and associate, the errand-boy—"Don't know yar." To my thinking, this sort of thing must look quite as silly to the independent outsider as the active recriminations of our Continental friends. Surely it is performing a useful function for one section of the party to criticise, in a friendly spirit, the tactics of another section. I maintain the continuance of this well-bred British humbug is a dereliction of the duty of a Socialist press, which ought to comment, favourably or adversely, on every event of party interest.

Superstition No. 2. Because Radicals and Secularists attach undue importance to the questions of the throne and the altar—otherwise expressed, the "monarchy" and "church and chapel"—there is an unwritten law that Socialists are to religiously taboo these subjects, as regards any direct attack. If a Socialist speaker in the course of his speech alludes in denunciatory language to the demoralising influence of a royal family and a court, he is frowned down by the "straiter" sort of his party as pandering to Radicalism. Now there is no one who would resent more than myself the wasting of too much energy in minor issues. But I really fail to see why we should not frankly join hands with Radicals or others when we can do so conscientiously as far as they go, at the same time pointing out to them the futility of attempting to destroy these subordinate evils while neglecting the basal economical question. The point here referred to is illustrated in the attitude of certain Puritanical Socialists who have looked askance at comrade Champion's anti-Jubilee fund, on the ground of its savouring of Radicalism. Now these people express their disgust in private at the Jubilee flunkies, and yet fancy that in public they must talk with bated breath on all that concerns the queen and royal family. Verily, brethren, this also is humbug. If we mean to destroy the present social order, while directing our principal efforts to undermining the foundation, do not let us grudge a few bomb-shells to the superstructure.—Yours fraternally,

"BIRDS OF A FEATHER."

SIR,—The following few lines from Boston Liberty may be useful to some of our friends who in their anxiety to be considered "advanced" are very much in danger of becoming reactionists. "A new paper has been started in England, entitled Jus, 'a weekly organ of Individualism.' It represents the Liberty and Property Defence League, an organisation consisting principally of British noblemen and formed to resist over-legislation, maintain freedom of contract, and combat Socialism—an organisation, in short, which the State Socialists and the Communists dismiss with a sneer as bourgeois. Bourgeois or not, I find much in it that commands my warm approval. In fact, if it shall prove true to its principles, and if its propaganda is to be conducted on the strict line of liberty without mental reservations, all Anarchists must, I think, consider it a more valuable paper than any of the four principle Socialistic journals of England—Justice, the Commonweal, the Anarchist, and Freedom." All the tall talk about Individual Liberty and Freedom simply means disunion, and tends to put off the real emancipation of Labour, which can only be accomplished by collective action as against the monopolists. It is not very easy to understand why the Anarchist is classed as a Socialist journal, except to discredit the others. By the way, only a few weeks ago some muddle-headed individual, writing to one of the American labour papers, actually grouped Liberty in a similar absurd fashion with some of the American Collectivist organs. I think it is time that a distinct issue was raised, so that there may be less danger of the unwary being led astray by "glittering generalities," meaning anything or nothing. The direct outcome of the Anarchist doctrine, however broad may be the sympathies of its advocates, at least under present conditions, must tell in favour of the monopolists. The workers, therefore, will do well to be very sceptical about this new-found fashionable rage for Freedom in certain quarters.

T. BINNING.

HENRY WARD BEECHER.

Once more the capitalist class has occasion to mourn the loss of one of its high priests. The man who so ably advocated the cause of the chattel-slave a quarter of a century ago, but who proved an enemy to the wage-slaves of the present generation, has passed away. We cannot even express that regret which might be accorded the memory of a high-minded and honest enemy. He had no personal interest in the perpetuation of negro slavery, while his fortunes were cast with the perpetuation of wage-slavery and exploiters of the wage-working people. Beecher is dead.—Workmen's Advocate.

He is the rascal who received 20,000 dollars per annum for preaching Christ's word to the poor, and he falsified his God by telling the people, not that no rich man should enter the kingdom of heaven, but that bread and water ought to content the poor. He stole the livery of heaven to serve the devil with. If there is any truth in the Christian religion, Henry Ward Beecher is now having brimstone and fire for breakfast, fire and brimstone for luncheon, and good brimstone and hot fire for supper. He would be glad of that water he urged upon the poor.—Labor Enquirer.

The female telegraphists in the General Post-office, Edinburgh, have very properly declined to subscribe to the Woman's Jubilee Offering.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

Apart from the miners' agitation, there is very little to record in regard to the Labour Struggle in Britain at present. There are, however, signs of the awakening of a new spirit amongst the workers; which will undoubtedly very materially alter the character of the labour movement in the near future. The following extract from a recent issue of the Newcastle Chronicle is very significant. A full report of the situation is given by our comrade Mahon in another column:

"INFLUENCE OF THE SOCIALIST AGITATION.—The other cause of the determination to hold out is the Socialist agitation in the district. The Socialist meetings afforded the advocates of the strike the very opportunity they wanted. Talk flowed freely there of the greed, dishonesty, and tyranny of the capitalists. The great object of the trading classes is to filch from the workers their earnings, and under the competitive system and with the aid of mechanical inventions, they succeed only too well. Who are the producers of wealth? The workers, of course. To whom should the wealth belong? To the workers, of course. Then what right have a lot of capitalists, who sit in their easy chairs, or walk about with their hands in their pockets all day, to demand a reduction of wages, or even to claim a share of the produce of any man's labour? They have no right, of course. Then the miners are not only engaged in a righteous struggle, but they are entitled to a much larger share of the good things of the world than they would receive even if no reduction in wages took place. Thus the sentiments of the miners found expression from public platforms, drooping spirits were revived, and the mass were inspired with a determination to wage war against that horrid creature, the capitalist. Should the Socialist organisation remain in existence it seems likely that in the future an agitation will accompany every great strike. Capitalists and trades' union leaders may therefore have to reckon in future with this new and awkward factor."

Notice for Newcastle and District.

After six weeks' propaganda in Northumberland and Durham by members of both London Socialist parties, it is felt that steps should be taken to form an organisation for Newcastle and district to carry on the good work already begun. There can be no doubt that the seeds of Socialism have fallen in fertile ground, and it only requires careful work and steady attention in forming a solid and harmonious Socialist party in the locality to make Socialism a power in the North. With a view to carrying out this idea, a Conference will be held on Saturday evening, April 2nd, at 7 o'clock prompt, at the North of England Café Co.'s Rooms, Mosley Street, Newcastle. All sympathisers with Socialism are invited to attend. The details of the arrangements for the county demonstration will be laid before the meeting, and all business will be ended in time to enable friends to catch the late trains from Newcastle.

AMERICA.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The great strike of the boot and shoe makers in Worcester, Spencer, Brookfield, and North Brookfield, which began with the posting of the "free shop" notices by the manufacturers, still continues. A striker who shouted "scab" at Heywood of Heywood's factory, was arrested and sentenced to three months in the House of Correction.

Some 1,200 Italians arrived at Castle Garden recently on the steamer 'Cheirbon.' This is the largest importation of cheap labourers made by one steamer for many years. With the Chinese on the West and foreign cheap labour generally on the East, honest labourers stand a mighty poor chance of maintaining living wages or anything else.—John Swinton's Paper.

PEORIA, ILL.—About 100 coloured coal miners arrived here to take the places of the strikers, who have now been out several weeks. They were waited upon by a committee of the strikers, who laid their side of the case before them. The new men had been deceived, as they were led to believe that there was no trouble here, but said their poverty would force them to work. Several white labourers went over to Wesley City, a big mining centre two miles from here, on the other side of the Illinois River, to go to work, but the strikers' wives got after them with broomsticks and kettles of hot water and drove them out of the place.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

SYDNEY, N.S.W., Feb. 3.—Nearly every trade in New South Wales has its union. The maritime bodies are the strongest both financially and numerically. Under this heading comes the Hunter River and Illawarra miners, Newcastle coal-trimmers, Sydney coal-lumpers, wharf labourers, seamen and firemen, cooks and stewards. Their past history can be but of little interest to you, but their present must be; and as a member of one of these unions it will be principally with them that I shall deal. The rest of the unions outside of those I have mentioned, with the exception of the brickmakers, are very small, and are affiliated to the Trades and Labour Council. Last year saw several large strikes. One was that of the Lambton miners, which lasted about six months and then ended in arbitration. They were well supported by the other societies, £1150 being paid out by the Seamen's Union alone. The next was that of the Brickmakers for the eight-hour day, and although not immediately successful, they were eventually, as it came into force on the first of January. The strike of to-day is that of the Illawarra Miners, four pits standing idle. It has now lasted about seven months, and the end seems as far off as ever. It is caused by a determined effort on the part of the colliery proprietors to reduce the wages by 2d. per ton. A party of 50 non-unionists went down in a steamer the other day to take the place of the men on strike. A train was in waiting on the jetty to take them up to the mines. They got aboard; the train started; but farther up the line they found some 500 women and children assembled across the tracks. The engine stopped, and then a scene took place that beggars all description. One woman with a child in her arms threw herself under the wheels, declaring that death was preferable to starvation. They begged, entreated, and coaxed these men not to go to work. They held up their children in their arms, and pleaded with these men not to take the place of their husbands and sons, and thus take the bread out of their infants' mouths. They succeeded in their efforts, for the whole of these men went over to the side of the unionists. But it did no good, for the next batch that came were walked up to the mines between two rows of troopers and constables. The masters took care they didn't lose this lot. The Mount Kembla mine, where the dispute commenced, is owned by British capitalists, and their first tactics was to order the men out of the company's houses, and to clear off the company's lands by a stipulated time or they would be prosecuted. The weather was not very propitious at the time, and the men with their wives and children had to camp out in the bush, under trees and rocks, in a vain endeavour to escape from the inclement weather. Many, if not all of them, at the present time are living either with their friends in the adjacent towns or in little "humpies" (temporary shelters) which they have run up; but these latter are necessarily of a fragile character, and as the floor consists of the bare earth, it is not very conducive to good health. This is the weapon which the landowning capitalist uses with such telling effect, turning his workmen with their families out of home into the bush and highways of the colony because they the workmen think they are justified in demanding an increase or resisting a reduction. I think nothing is more calculated to expose the co-operative delusion in this quarter of the globe than the following. Soon after the miners dispute commenced, some members of the Coal-Lumpers Association seceded from that body, formed a co-operative coal-discharging company in opposition to the stevedores. Nothing could be more pleasing to the capitalists. The Mount Kembla Co. immediately gave them a contract on condition that they gave a bond to work the coal from non-unionist ships. Previously the coal-lumpers would not discharge coal from ships unless manned by unionists. Neither would the Seamen's Union man ships destined to carry coal from mines worked by non-unionists. But the action of the co-operating seceders effectually crippled the other unions in their endeavour to assist the miners. Another event of great importance is the steadily increasing march of the British Indian Steamship Co. along the Australian coast. Your readers may think it matters but very little as to whether it is British or Australian capitalists that we have to contend against, but I can assure them it makes a great difference. By Australian capitalist I mean a person whose capital is centered wholly and solely in the colonies. In contention with such a person the workman may have a kind of a show; but in contention with the men who have only a portion of their money invested here, and who have concerns in other parts of the world bringing them in large dividends, and who can afford, therefore, to let their investments here realise nothing for an indefinite period. There is absolutely no chance for the workers. The British Indian, or Queensland Co., as it is called, has already bought out one colonial company, and I believe that in a very short time they will have a monopoly of the trade from Cape York to Cape Leeuwin. The capitalists are slowly but surely becoming consolidated; and this I take as a sign that in the near future they will make a determined stand and attempt to break the power of the unions; and if such a conflict should be waged with the old weapon, strikes and lock-outs alone, making it a test of endurance, the workmen, in my humble opinion, would go to the wall. That they must take a leaf from the book of their comrades in the old countries is the opinion of ANGLO-AUSTRALIAN.

FRANCE.

LYONS.—The Petavit firm has refused to keep to the tariff established by the Syndicate of Plumbers of Lyons, and has therefore been black-listed by the men. The Syndicate allows 4 francs per day for each man leaving the employment of the firm and who is without work. The principal items of the tariff which has been refused by the employer are—ten hours a-day at 65 centimes the hour; extra time, 80 c. the hour; night work, 1 fr. 30 the hour.

CHARLEVILLE (Ardennes).—The Labour Party in Ardennes is growing rapidly, and can count at the present time about fifteen groups of some importance. In the Meuse valley many of the workers are hard at it for 12 or 14 hours a-day, at a wage of 2 fr. 50 or 3 fr., and feel the pressure of the times most severely. It is time that Socialism took some hold on them, which it has done pretty strongly.

DUN-SUR-AURON (Cher).—The bakers of this town have struck, whereby the inhabitants are obliged to send carts off to Bourges for the bread necessary for their daily consumption. The excitement is caused greatly by the vote in the Chambre upon the corn-dues, which has made those here who are feeling the general pressure very indignant.

SAINT-ETIENNE.—Yet another explosion of fire-damp with fatal consequences is announced here in one of the pits belonging to the same company that owns the Chatelus pit. The accident is due to the use of blasting-powder, in spite of the well-known presence of fire-damp in large quantities. These economies of the mining companies, at the risk of such constantly recurring accidents, are really monstrous, and so apparent that even a ponderous state-legislation might feel itself bound to move in the matter.

VIERZON.—The strike of porcelain-makers came to an end this week, after lasting for about two months, and being characterised by the greatest determination, quiet and devoid of braggadocio on the part of the strikers. They finally came to an understanding—otherwise a compromise—with their exploiters. But we hear this truce has lasted but a short time; the masters have broken faith with them, and have coolly dismissed from their employment the principal members of the Syndicate or of the Strike Committee, after they had got the men back to work by promising not to "rake up bygones" nor punish the strikers in anywise. The men are extremely indignant, and have formally renewed the strike, their anger being this time louder and more threatening in tone. The Justice of the Peace has been expostulating with the masters, but uselessly; they declare they mean to intimidate the workmen, at any risk.

BELGIUM.

LIEGE.—The puddlers at the iron-works of Sclessin are on strike on the grounds of insufficient wages. This news has produced a great impression on the bourgeois circles at Liège.

HAINES ST. PIERRE (HAINAULT).—A revolt took place last week among the workers employed in the coal-mines of Cronfestu. It seems that for a long time past they had been complaining of the irregularity in the payment of wages, until at last, tired of promises and temporising, they proceeded to the dwelling of the director and besieged it. They were fired upon by him but no one was hurt, and the crowd dispersed after relieving their feelings by destroying whatever they came across in their short visit to the house.

BRUSSELS, March 27.—An imposing demonstration took place at the Alcazar to-day in favour of granting an amnesty to the men condemned for participation in the riots during the strikes in March last. M. Crocq, a member of the Senate, presided, and the hall was crowded by an enthusiastic but orderly audience, consisting chiefly of persons belonging to the commercial class. After several speeches had been delivered by M. Volders, a Socialist, and others, a resolution was unanimously passed in favour of granting the amnesty. The meeting then dispersed.

SOIGNIES (HAINAULT).—A wide-spread strike of quarrymen in the Hainault, which has been expected for some time past, has now come to pass. It is a serious strike, as it comprises most of the workers in the quarries of the district. Revolts are feared, and the masters have received the safeguard of a battalion of the 2nd Infantry, another being expected to come in aid if any disturbance should take place. The number of strikers at present 1600, and will be further increased it is expected. A year since the quarrymen had formed a Co-operative Association or League, and for some time past they have been trying to enter into negotiations with the masters for higher wages and fairer terms; but the latter refused point-blank to treat with the delegates, and declared, naturally enough, that they would never give way before an association formed to resist them. Hence the strike.

MINE INSPECTORS.—The Avant-Garde says: "After each catastrophe in the coal-pits, the workers have the right to choose from among themselves inspectors who will pursue their task of inspection at the same time as the State engineers. But—the next day everything remains as it was. It is well known that the engineers do not pay their visits to the mines often enough, and, indeed, they have not the time, being occupied several days in the week by giving lectures in the mining schools, industrial schools, and in the universities.

AUSTRIA.

BRUNN, March 15.—The following extract from the Wiener Abendpost, a semi-official paper, given in its issue of January 26, is very remarkable: "We are terrified by the great number of the poor that claimed public relief in Vienna in the year 1885. This metropolis, with a population of 754,000 inhabitants, had 276,000 poor—more than one-third of the population. The expenses for this relief amounted to 6,568,000 florins; thus each of the poor received on an average 24 florins, a ridiculously small amount." Indeed a ridiculously small amount in money, but what a sum of misery and also of indignation and hatred against a society tolerating such a heartrending situation. And especially as this situation grows worse from year to year, from day to day. What do our ruling classes do? Nothing; they dance on this volcano, not knowing, or not willing to know, that in this manner they breed up a revolutionary army, always ready to sweep off an infamous society, which endows the rich bandit with all they wish and which condemns the industrious worker, the great mass, to starvation and to be plundered by profit-greedy capitalists or brutal land-grabbers. But we certainly wrong our benevolent tyrants when we say that they do nothing. We have forgotten the newest sport they have applied themselves to, the pretentious quackery that is termed social reform; we have forgotten the labour-friendliness they manifest by their zealous hunts after Socialists. According to the report of the Prague State Procurator, in the year 1886 241 Socialists have been arrested in the province of Bohemia alone; all were brought to the Superior Heretic Court ad hoc in Prague, under the charge of being members of secret societies; 120 of them were condemned, the others acquitted. These ciphers speak more than large volumes on the mean system we must bear in this Central-European China, and justify at once the approaching political and social revolution, which among us will be without doubt more bloody than in other "civilised" countries.—F. S.

With such a despotism as that which Mr. Balfour proposes to make permanent in Ireland, no man fit to be free can hold any parley. He would be a slave at heart who, confronted by this devilish engine of injustice, had any other thought but one—How best can I destroy this tyranny, and overturn the despotism of the alien oppressor?—Pall Mall Gazette. "HEAR, HEAR!"

The Ipswich branch of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, having been invited to send delegates to consider, with representatives of the Odd Fellows and Foresters, the arrangements for a procession on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee, resolved that the subject should be "postponed till her Majesty's centenary."

MOTHERWELL AND THE ROYAL JUBILEE OFFERING.—The women's jubilee offering is not finding much favour in the Motherwell district. In one of the principal streets the collection amounted to 4½d., and in another the contribution was 9d. Considerable comment is being caused by the lady collectors calling at the houses of miners for subscriptions.

STRIKE OF TAILORS IN LIMERICK.—A number of tailors in the employment of the Limerick army clothing factory have struck work owing to a dispute with the managers of the factory. The strike has resulted in a lock-out on the part of the proprietors of the factory.

DUBLIN.—A Labour League has been started here for the purpose of organising the workers—skilled and unskilled—of the city, and for educating them so that they shall understand their social rights. The inaugural meeting, which was held on Thursday, March 24th, at 2, Bachelor's Walk, was very well attended, more than thirty being enrolled as members. John Cantwell was appointed secretary, and J. E. Masterson, treasurer.

FOREIGN COMPETITION.—On Friday, the 25th of March, the Wolverhampton Chamber of Commerce issued their annual report. They announce that in iron and metal goods competition is far keener than ever. Manufacturers give the palm to Germany, but Belgian and American competition is also severe, and to a lesser extent French likewise. American competition is particularly serious in locks in the colonial markets, and the German lock competition is exceedingly keen in England. The strain of this ever increasing foreign competition, added to competition at home, has now, it is declared, reduced iron and metal goods prices to an almost profitless level.

Free Speech Demonstration in Victoria Park.

A DEMONSTRATION was held in Victoria Park on Monday last, in the afternoon, under the auspices of the Hackney Branch of the Socialist League. The occasion of it was the release of James Allman, member of the Hackney Branch, from prison, after having undergone sentence of one month's imprisonment for causing a legal, i.e., technical obstruction at the corner of Audrey Street, Hackney Road, by causing persons to assemble for the purpose of hearing an address upon Socialism.

Morris, Scheu, Sparling, Barker, Lane, Manwaring, Davis, and James Allman addressed the meeting to emphatically uphold the right of Free Speech on grounds belonging to the public; and a motion protesting against police interference and legal chicanery directed against Socialists, on the false pretence of obstructing the highways, was carried unanimously. The meeting throughout was enthusiastic, and cheers of welcome were given our comrade Allman.

The proceedings closed with the singing of "The Starving Poor of Old England" by W. Blundell, the audience taking up chorus. H. A. B.

How the Rich provide the Poor with Work, and the Poor provide the Rich with Wealth.

In the Life of Robert Owen by A. J. Booth, his visit to Ireland in 1822 is described. At a great meeting the lord mayor of Dublin took the chair, and the Duke of Leinster, Archbishop Murray, and other great persons were present on the platform from which Owen explained his views. We seem to have gone backwards from those days, for it would be next to impossible now to find lords or bishops courageous enough to stand on the same platform with a Socialist, and to support by their presence any such views as those set forth by Owen at this Dublin meeting. The following are extracts partly from the speech made at this meeting by Owen, and partly from his Journal:

"It is a common mistake, arising from the confusion of ideas inseparable from the present erroneous system of society, to believe that the rich provide for the poor and working-classes; while, in fact, the poor and working-classes create all the wealth which the rich possess. The working-classes can provide abundance for themselves and be independent of any other class; but the rich, without the working-classes, would be the most helpless of human beings. The rich, so far from aiding the working-classes, actually prevent them from creating a supply of wealth that would be sufficient to preclude all from becoming poor: they prevent the working-classes from producing far more wealth for the rich than the rich now possess. And this they do in two ways: first, by withholding education from them, so that their intellectual and industrial powers remain undeveloped; and secondly, because they do not supply them with work. Now, it is a fact that cannot be gainsaid, that every man who is properly trained can raise from the ground far more than he requires for his own support; and the reason why the whole of the population is not thus productively employed is because the rich, who are in possession of the natural agents, will not turn them to use unless they can afterwards bring the goods they have produced to market, and there sell them for a profit. Thus at present the production of wealth is limited by the want of markets, and markets are limited by the want of a convenient circulating medium to represent the products of labour as soon as they are created, and to effect their ready exchange; or in other words, the industry of society is restrained by the existing artificial monied system. . . . Although few have money, all have labour-power; and it is labour, and not money, that produces wealth; constitute, therefore, labour the standard of exchange, and misery will cease for ever."

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

Members' Monthly Meeting will be held at 13 Farringdon Road, E.C., on Monday first, April 4, at 9 p.m.

Annual Conference.—The Third Annual Conference of the Socialist League will be held at 13 Farringdon Road on Whitsunday, May 29th. Branches are particularly requested to attend to the following arrangements, if they wish to be represented at the Conference: (1) To at once send a return of their membership to the General Secretary. The representation will be based on this return. (2) Branches cannot be represented unless all monthly subscriptions are paid up to March 31 by May 1st. (3) Notices of motion, amendment to Rules, etc., must be sent in six weeks before the Conference—i.e., not later than April 18th. (4) Agenda Paper will be forwarded on May 2nd to Branches complying with these arrangements.

Lessons in French.—Comrade Victor Dave is now giving lessons in French at the offices of the League on Tuesday evenings, at 8 o'clock. The lessons are free to members, and those desirous of profiting by them should send their names at once to the secretary of the League.

Reports for "Commonweal."—Branch Secretaries are requested to make their reports as brief as possible, dealing with points of general interest as to the progress of the propaganda, rather than attempting to give the substance of the lectures, for which there is not space, even if it were otherwise desirable. Notices should be confined to purely business announcements and written separately. Reports and Notices should be addressed to the "Printer," and cannot be guaranteed insertion unless they reach the office by 2 p.m. on Tuesday.

Library.—The Library is now open to members of the Socialist League and affiliated bodies. Country Branches can have parcels of selected books by paying carriage to and fro. Rule III., relating to the renewal of books (each renewal representing fourteen days) must be rigidly adhered to. Books cannot be renewed more than twice. Members failing to comply with this Rule will be fined 1d. for every week that a volume is detained beyond the time at which its return is due. LIBRARY CATALOGUE, containing the Rules, 2d.

LENA WARDLE & WM. BLUNDELL, Librarians.

BRANCH SUBSCRIPTIONS PAID.

Birmingham, Hackney, Hull, Leeds, North London, to August 31. Manchester, Merton, Norwich, to October 31. Bradford, to November 30. Croydon, Hammersmith, Leicester, South London, to Dec. 31, 1886. THE NORWICH PRISONERS' AID FUND.

C. W. Mowbray and Fred Henderson, of the Socialist League, were sentenced at the Norwich Assizes on Jan. 20 to nine and four months' imprisonment respectively. The costs of the trial amounted to £60, and Mowbray's wife and five children must be provided for during his imprisonment, so that at least £100 will be required. The treasurer of this fund therefore appeals to every one to give all the assistance he can.

Gleaner, 2s. 6d. D. Gostling, £9. Leeds Branch (two weeks), 4s. Edinburgh Branch, 10s. Marylebone Branch S.D.F., 5s. P. Webb, 1s. Lancaster Branch: A. J., 8s.; S. J. G., 2s. 6d. Arthur, 6d. For Mrs. Mowbray—A few Fabians, per Annie Besant (weekly), 10s. J. LANE, Treasurer.

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday March 24, W. H. Utley lectured on "Money" to a fair audience.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, March 23, Edward Aveling gave a continuation of the subject, "Socialism in America," to a large and attentive audience; good discussion followed. On Sunday, March 27, B. Somerville gave his experiences of "Emigration." Literature has sold well.—W. B. and T. E. W.

CROYDON.—Last Sunday, Sydney Olivier delivered an address on "The Law of the Land," Graham Wallas in the chair. He pointed out the influence of the Roman law upon the national development, and contrasted it with the laws of Alfred, Ina, etc., which were mainly customs reduced to writing and codified. The spirit of the Roman law remains to-day in the "majesty of the law" now about to be vindicated in Ireland. On April 6th, Mrs. Besant will lecture at the Victoria Hall, Tamworth Road, on "Workers and Idlers."—A. T.

HACKNEY.—On Wednesday, March 23, we held a meeting at the Broadway, London Fields, H. Graham speaking. Last Saturday evening we held a very large meeting on Mile End Waste, comrade Hobbs making an effective maiden speech. H. Graham also spoke. On Sunday morning, a meeting was held at the Broadway, London Fields, and in the afternoon we also held a short meeting at the same place, addressed by comrades John Allman and Graham, afterwards proceeding to Victoria Park. See separate report. In the evening, our comrade Brocher lectured at the club-room on "The Familistere at Guise." The lecture was illustrated by diagrams, and was very interesting. Several questions were satisfactorily answered, and an interesting discussion followed. Comrade Brocher, by request of the members, sang "La Carmagnole" in French in splendid style.—M.

HOXTON.—We had a very interesting and instructive lecture by T. Shore on the "Poetry of Revolt," which was highly appreciated by a large audience. The lecture was followed by an animated discussion on the work of poets in helping to rouse the people from their apathy to some effort to better their condition.—E. P.

MERTON.—Bartlett and Kitz held an open-air meeting at Plough Inn, Garrett, on Sunday last. We shall adjourn our open-air work until after Easter Sunday, on which date we shall visit in a brake some of the London branches and clubs.—F. K.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday evening in our club-room, F. Kitz lectured on the "Russian Revolutionary Party," to an attentive and sympathetic audience. Slight discussion followed. We are organising a committee of the Merton and Mitcham Branches to arrange for open-air propaganda on Mitcham Fair Green. We hope to have a good programme for the summer months, and also to further the sale of Commonweal. Our members are now most all at work, and we expect that they will now all work together to make up lost time.—S. G.

BRADFORD.—On Sunday, March 27th, P. Krapotkin delivered a lecture on "Socialism, its Growth and Modern Tendencies," at the Temperance Hall, before a crowded house, the number of those present were estimated to be about 1200, several hundred were unable to obtain admission. The lecture proved to be a thorough success, but want of space does not permit of details. After the lecture Krapotkin joined us at a tea, which we had provided for our Leeds and Bradford members and friends. In the evening we spent a couple of hours with comrade Krapotkin at the Newmarket Hotel, where a very interesting and instructive discussion took place, intermixed and finishing up with songs and recitations.—C. H.

GLASGOW.—Owing to the stormy weather no open-air meetings was held on Sunday at mid-day. In the afternoon comrade Glasier addressed a large and very attentive audience on Jail Square. In the evening in hall, Carlton Place, Daniel McCulloch lectured on "Education from a Socialist Standpoint." The lecturer in a vigorous style pointed out how entirely misdirected our present system of training the young was, and how they were pitchforked into trades without any regard to their inclination or ability. A discussion followed.

GRIMSBY.—Last Sunday, Blakelock and Eveleigh held an open-air meeting in the Freeman Street market place. Some opposition was offered and easily disposed of.—T.

HULL.—On Sunday, Shekell lectured on "Machinery and the Worker." A good discussion followed.—E. T.

LANCASTER.—On Sunday morning, Leonard Hall spoke to usual meeting on the quay about organisation and education. New club quarters at Sun Street. Always open, and revolutionary literature on the table.—L. Hall.

NORWICH.—We held a meeting in the Market Place on Sunday, addressed by comrades Crotch and Darley explaining the position of the workers. In the evening, comrade Slaughter gave a lecture on the subject, "Does the Worker get his fair share of the National Wealth?" which he explained in a very able manner. On Monday evening, a lecture on "India," by Slaughter. Collected for Defence Fund, 3s. 6d.

DUBLIN.—At the Working-men's Club, Wellington Quay, on Saturday evening, a debate was opened by Keegan on "The Social Position of the Working-classes during the last Fifty Years," in the course of which he showed that they had on the whole obtained but a very small share of the increased national wealth. An interesting discussion followed, Mullaby, Dublin Trades' Council, fairly bringing down the house by describing the Knights of Labour, the Nihilists, and the Social Democrats of Germany as being the champions of the workers and the hope of the oppressed in their respective countries. The debate was adjourned until next Saturday night, when two or three Socialists will speak.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—On Monday March 21st, at the Commonwealth Cafe, Scotland Street, T. Maguire addressed a very good audience, taking the "Current Objections to Socialism" for his subject. He dealt very clearly and forcibly with the many and varied objections, notably the dirty-work query, showing that the man who sweated large fortunes out of the lives of thousands of his fellows is the man who does the very dirtiest work, while the scavenger does the clean work and is really a benefactor. He dealt splendidly with the objection so often raised as to the incentive to improvement, showing how some men improve under almost insurmountable difficulties, how those difficulties would be removed, and how encouragement would take the place of obstacle. Finally he proved that only under a Socialist system can the fittest survive. A short discussion, after which a Socialist hymn was sung, and the meeting dispersed well pleased with the lecturer.—M. A. M.

LAW AND ORDER IN IRELAND.

THE Coercion Bill and the attempt to drive it through Parliament is really a matter of great simplicity, although the whirl of party politics has made it seem somewhat intricate. It is the mere "outward and visible sign of the inward and spiritual grace" of that Conservatism, Toryism, or Reactionism, whichever you please to call it, to which all the respectability of Parliamentary life gravitates, and which has engulfed not only the grave and portentous Philistinism of the once Tribune of the People, John Bright, but also the gathering ambition and vague aspiration to do something remarkable of Joseph Chamberlain; besides many other luminaries of a lesser order, some of whom have been set down as Radicals, and perhaps thought themselves to be so, but surely only because other people called them so.

However, even this outward and visible sign is a serious thing, not only for Ireland but for England also, and must at the outset be admitted to be far more serious than any other Coercion Bill, not because of any speciality in its provisions, nor even because it is to last permanently (which may mean perhaps as long as next year), but rather because it is to be enacted in the teeth of the disapproval of a great part of the English population. That is to say that the ordinary Englishman supposed that former measures of coercion were passed to restrain a band of plotters and miscreants in Ireland from injuring the ordinary peaceful law-abiding people there, who had no sympathy with their doings. Therefore, though some of the more advanced politicians might oppose such measures on principle, and others because they thought there was no special need for such strong measures, yet the greater part even of those who usually take some interest in politics would pass such matters by with the vague idea that it was a necessary step to take against Fenians and moonlighters, and other rebels, as unreasonable as only Irish can be. All that is changed now, and it is only in Parliament that any one pretends to think that the Coercion Bill is directed against a minority of the Irish people. It is, however vaguely by some persons, felt to be what the Pall Mall called it the other evening, a declaration of war against Ireland; to say to a part of the Empire: "We are going, not to suspend, but to abolish your civil rights by the strong hand, and let us see what you dare to do in resistance to this violence," is to admit that such people are in rebellion against the central authority, and are perfectly conscious of their solidarity as against it; and if they had, I will not say any chance of success, but any opportunity, they would make that manifest by rising in armed revolt against the central tyranny, and to a large part at least of the peoples of England, Scotland, and Wales, that rebellion seems a righteous one; to how large a portion no general election will make clear to us, but rather the march of events.

It is a pity indeed that agitation on a really large scale cannot be at once set on foot, so as to show the reactionists that they are rashly playing with fire; but though it can scarcely be doubted that a genuine poll of the country would give a large majority against landlord-magistrate law in Ireland, yet it is hopeless to expect a serious expression of opinion at all in proportion to the dissatisfaction that doubtless exists, still less any expression of opinion which would mean a serious threat of "Don't try that on again!" The politically minded part of the workers who can claim to have any approach to organisation, have unhappily been organised to be at the beck and call of their leaders at election time, and also to forbear even the mildest agitation unless the wire-pullers give the sign. They have been so debauched by allowing themselves to be treated as the mere machinery of a Parliamentary party, that now when the time comes that even that organised hypocrisy, their party, would be glad of their help they can do but little; at the best they can but show that they exist as dissatisfied persons in some numbers, which the reactionists know already, but any genuine strong and fierce outburst of feeling from them is scarcely to be expected when one thinks of the deep respectability of the gentlemen that lead them.

However, what can be done must be done, and that out of Parliament. The Bill will certainly be passed. The Radical Unionists, all but two or three, will have a sop thrown to them by the withdrawal of the clause for changing the venue of the bigger trials, which was probably put in to be withdrawn, as also perhaps was the "permanency" of the bill, which, however, these precious Democrats have swallowed so sweetly. And then the Reactionists will have their way in Parliament, as is but natural, and all one can hope is that the country will wake up after the bill is passed; though it is no use hoping that anything more will come of that but a dissolution and general election. Home Rule may follow that, though of course only a compromise Home Rule, and the ground will be cleared so far for the question of property in Ireland—and elsewhere. The day of the Tories proper has passed with this Coercion Bill. To-morrow the Liberals in the English Parliament will have to be dealt with, criticised, and resisted. The day after it will be the turn of the Dublin Parliament. Let us hope that true social feeling in Ireland will not have exhausted itself in combining to defeat the English landlords, but will rise with the new condition of affairs and demand freedom not only for the tenants but for all.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

LEGALITY.

THE respect for law as law is one of the most marked characteristics of the bourgeois mind. One is particularly struck with the strength of this superstition on occasions like the recent attempt at St. Petersburg. There are probably few middle-class Englishmen who would in so many words condone the atrocities and murders of the Russian Government. And yet there are probably few who would refuse the word crime to any act of self-defence initiated by its victims. Here is a case in which you have on the one side what every Englishman (bourgeois though he may be) that knows anything about the matter would in his heart admit to be an organisation of brigands, a mass of corrupt officials, seizing and secretly torturing or murdering, on the slightest pretext, any person they imagine to be obnoxious to them, tearing men away from their families at a moment's notice to serve in an army, not of defence, but of oppression—in short, establishing a reign of terror in all the towns of a vast territory. On the other, you have their victims, the population, who are endeavouring to defend themselves against this organised brigandage. There is a difference, however, a vast line of cleavage, between the two. The one operates under the name of "established government," and hence all its transactions, however criminal in themselves, are protected by the trade-mark "legality." The other does not operate under the name of established government, and hence all its hostile transactions, however justifiable in themselves, are contraband as not bearing the trade-mark "legality." For this reason the average bourgeois hesitates or refuses to denounce the one as criminal or to uphold the other as righteous. In this course he is insincere. It may be unhesitatingly affirmed that any sane man who says he believes it wrong to kill the Czar, lies. No man's conscience is so grotesquely twisted as to make him think thus. For it must be remembered this is not a case of Socialism v. anti-Socialism, but of the most elementary rights—liberty and life.

The Czar and his bureaucracy render life, even from the bourgeois point of view, all but impossible in Russia for any one outside their own body. The man, therefore, who hesitates to justify to the full any action that may be taken in self-defence is plainly dishonest. But his dishonesty has its explanation; "this defect defective comes by cause." And the explanation of his dishonesty is to be found in his unwillingness to violate that "blessed word," "legality." But whence the magic of this word? Thereby hangs the tale, of personal property, crime, and contract—in short, the tale of civilisation. Law, nowadays, is not usually identified as in Russia with direct personal violence. On the contrary, one of the great planks of the bourgeois in his struggle with Feudalism has ever been security of person and property from overt violence. To this was subsequently added liberty of conscience and the free expression of opinion. Now these principles are (with one partial exception) at least nominally upheld by bourgeois law throughout Western Europe. So that speaking generally the bourgeois can appeal to legality as embodying his notion of justice and the rights of liberty and property—the two things being in the main identical. In Russia, on the contrary, they are for the most part altogether opposed; the pet political nostrum of the middle-classes, constitutionalism, is unknown, all opinion is crushed out. Here, then, our worthy bourgeois finds himself on the horns of a dilemma. He cannot consistently with one side of his principles champion or even condone the Russian Government. On the other hand he cannot without endangering the basis of his social order openly pronounce in favour of conspirators against any established government, however bad even from his own point of view. To do so would be to take the side of lawlessness against law. And is not the sacredness of private property enshrined historically in the conception of "law" and "government"? This is awkward, very. The issue, however, is not long doubtful. Class-interest triumphs. With more or less of hesitation, and in violation of his conscience, he denounces as "assassins" the executioners of a murderous Czar, and as criminals the manufacturers of the munitions of war designed for self-defence against the most infamous band of oppressors the world has ever seen.

For the reason above given, the Socialist alone dare speak the naked truth in the matter of Nihilism v. Czarism. He has no obligation to respect "established government" or legality as such, inasmuch as the right of property it enshrines has for him no eternal sacredness. For him it is indifferent whether social and political ends are realised by lawful or lawless means. He has not the slightest objection (if he is sensible) to obtaining what he desires by legal and constitutional methods, but neither has he any moral objection to employing or seeing employed other methods where these fail. Not discerning any sacredness in the fact of legality, not recognising any patent right to criminality as vested in constitutional authorities or governments, he hesitates not to brand their ringleaders as miscreants when crimes are committed in their name. Just as little does he hesitate to recognise as agents of judicial retribution those who, always at the risk, and in some cases the certain sacrifice of their own lives, take upon themselves the social function of judge or executioner. The fact of wearing a particular garb, being paid a high salary, and propounding unctuous platitudes from a "bench," is not for him the sine qua non of an administrator of justice. The test of criminal conduct or of judicial functions with him lies in the actions themselves and in the circumstances giving rise to them, and not in the social status or character of those performing them.

The Socialist alone, then, can unreservedly speak what others only dare to think—can express his conviction plainly where others casuistically prevaricate. Even the Radical, inasmuch as he still clings in theory at least to the absolute sacredness of private property, can hardly, if he be consistent, help squirming at the notion of illicit justice. He may have given up many things, but at this he draws back. There is a story of an ancient Tartar prince who one day issued the order to his retinue to draw their bows at every object at which he let fly an arrow, on pain of instant decapitation. He first of all shot one of the royal game. Some of his men hesitating, lost their heads. He thereupon shot one of his best horses. Some of his train held back. Their heads fell immediately. After that he discharged an arrow into the body of his favourite wife. (N.B. It must not be supposed that this wife had done anything particular; but as she happened to be there the prince used her as an illustration, which, though it may seem to argue an inadequate sense of the respect due to woman, does not imply any malice on his part). But however, some of his men hesitated, with the same result as in the former case. Striking at higher game, he then proceeded to pierce with his arrow the finest steed of the reigning khan. On this occasion all the bows were drawn and all the arrows flew. Now for the first time the prince saw that he had got his men well in hand, and that henceforth they were ready for the final coup. So the next day, riding out with the khan to the chase, he "drew" upon him. The unhappy monarch, to employ the phraseology of historians, fell pierced with a thousand darts, and the prince was that day installed in his place. The moral of this story is evident. Before the working classes are prepared for the Revolution they must place the demands of the Revolution before everything else. The Radical, until he is prepared to transfix that leading steed in the stable of class society—bourgeois legality—is not ready to immolate that society itself and install a more virile one in its room.

But, says the bourgeois, to come back to the case in point, if you admit what is commonly called political assassination, where are you to draw the line? I will tell you. What is commonly but often incorrectly called political assassination may or may not be morally justifiable. In the opinion of the present writer, and that of most Socialists, it is morally justifiable when the right of discussion of social or political questions, either by speech or writing, is suppressed as against those who suppress it, and only then. The reason is that from the point of view of social progress such suppression being the strangulation by brute-force of social aspiration, the removal of its author or authors is a mere act of self-defence. So long as free discussion exists there can be no excuse for the use of terrorist methods, which are in this case at once a crime and a blunder. For in these circumstances, when the people are free to organise for this end, if they do not overthrow, either by constitutional or other means, a system whose rottenness has been exhibited to them on platform and in press, it is clear as the noonday that conditions are not as yet ripe for such a change. When this is so, no amount of terrorism will avail aught. Terrorism is only effective as the result of a strong but suppressed popular movement; never as the cause. "Rover's cross this morning and won't play," says the little girl to her brother; "what shall we do?" "I know," replies the latter, "wag his tail for him." The idea of the Anarchist to stimulate an unprepared proletariat to revolt by wagging the popular tail with dynamite is just as reasonable.

Applying these remarks, we may observe in conclusion that in Russia, where not only is opinion suppressed, but no man's life or liberty is safe from the autocrat or his myrmidons, terrorism must be pronounced unquestionably both morally justifiable and expedient; in Germany, where discussion is suppressed, though morally justifiable, for various reasons inexpedient; in this country at the present time, and wherever discussion is free, neither morally justifiable nor expedient.

E. BELFORT BAX.

THE IMMORALITY OF INTEREST.

ONE naturally expects remarkably good reasons to be advanced in justification of a practice so prejudicial to the interests of the people. This is not done, however, the arguments used being ridiculously feeble. Many indeed do not deign to discuss the morality of the custom, and merely sneer like Professor Flint at the inconceivable folly of resuscitating a "medieval economic error." The stock argument is the "abstinence" one. Our masters claim a reward for their meritorious conduct in abstaining to use their capital. The fact, of course, is that they would do anything rather than consume it, for they know the value of having a grip of the means of production. In this demand of theirs, there is a half-expressed truth which we Socialists recognise. It is that in conditions of equal freedom an able-bodied man has no right to expect another to supply him with the capital necessary for the production of the articles he uses. In my opinion this truth should be, and under Socialism would be, acted upon; the capital required to carry on any industry being supplied by the consumers of the products of that industry, each contributing in proportion to his consumption. As the order of things, in which the producer owned the tools or capital required in his trade, has been superseded by the present one in which the machinery or capital is supplied by people not necessarily either makers or users of the goods turned out with the help of their capital, so this again will be succeeded by a new order in which the consumers alone will contribute the capital. The existence of such a system would by no means imply the right of the consumers to determine the conditions of work for the producers. But to return to the argument, the paradox is that at present a capitalist may both eat his cake and keep it—may abstain from using his capital, and yet derive as much, nay more, enjoyment from it than if he did not abstain. The possessor of fifty thousand pounds invested here and there, not virtuous enough to "abstain," might live in a humble way on a thousand a year, and only after the lapse of fifty years get to the bottom of his purse. His philanthropic brother, however, owner of a similar sum, with a laudable desire to benefit the workers, might "abstain," claim and receive his reward in the shape of two thousand five hundred a year, and at the end of fifty years, when his brother had spent his fortune, would still possess his undiminished. My poor Socialistic brains are quite unable to discover that the latter would exercise greater abstinence than the former. In connection with this, too, there is a rather curious problem to be solved. Suppose the workers one fine day were to say to the capitalists, "We really cannot allow you to make such sacrifices for our sake, so pray do not abstain any longer." What would happen? It is evident the capitalists would require to realise their property, for they could not make a personal use of their farms, mines, factories, railways, or ships, of their cottons, woollens, coal, iron, or grain. But the only purchasers to be got would be the workers, who would then have at their disposal the sum up till then paid away as reward for abstinence, viz., the interest. This, or part of it, could be handed to the capitalists each year until the sum paid equalled the principal in value. This request of the workers would be quite a legitimate one, for surely the recipients of a service for which they pay are quite entitled to refuse such a service and keep the price of it. In connection with this argument it is often said by thoughtless people that there would be no inducement to save if no interest was received. Under Socialism, if people wished to accumulate wealth in various forms for personal enjoyment they would require to provide the capital necessary for the production of this wealth, and moreover, in order to entitle themselves to be supported by the community in sickness or old age, would require to help those already unfit for work by paying what may be called a premium to the Commonwealth—a form of saving too. In short, if they did not save, they would reap none of the benefits which flow from saving.

It is sometimes said that interest is merely a premium for insurance against risk. This is not so, however, for much more is paid as interest to capital than what is sufficient to cover insurance. The principal cannot be increased by premiums for insurance, as such, for these payments are merely sufficient to replace that part of the principal which may be lost. A capitalist would be virtually living on his principal were he to consume this payment.

But the most ingenious and far-fetched defence of usury is that of Henry George. He maintains that in certain branches of industry there accrues a natural interest which is due to the generative force of Nature. For instance, in agriculture labour is assisted to a very great extent by natural forces. Between seed-time and harvest the farmer does comparatively little in his fields, the growth of the crops depending chiefly on the seed, the soil, and the atmospheric conditions. He holds, therefore, that capital utilised in industries of this kind, in which it has the benefit of the co-operation of Nature, has a return which capital employed in such as the manufacturing industries has not. While the farmer rests from his labour, his flocks and herds and crops continue growing; but when the blacksmith or carpenter throws down his tools, no progress is made with the work he was busy with. So, George argues, it is only just that all capital should be put on the same footing, and consequently that which receives no natural increase or interest should receive an artificial increase. It seems to me that he misses the point altogether. Instead of demonstrating that interest of any kind should be allowed to capital, however employed, he merely asserts that there are two kinds of interest, one natural, the other artificial, and that it is right that capital debarred from getting the first should get the latter—which is not what was to be proved. We hold that private property in all natural powers (the sources of interest, according to Henry George) should be abolished, in such wise that no charge for their co-operation with labour would be made. The price of commodities should depend only on the labour engaged in their production. The price of wheat, for instance, should depend only on the quantity of labour required to produce it. Nothing should be charged for the part played by Nature.

Well, then, these are the principal arguments used in defence of usury, by no means such as are likely to convince an unbiassed mind. Every social instinct man is endowed with revolts against such a practice when the iniquity of it is laid bare; and the sense of injustice which I believe exists in greater or less degree in every man's breast condemns it in the most unhesitating manner when its full significance is grasped. Usury, that curse of humanity, is the outcome of greed and selfishness, of the anti-social qualities of human nature, and therefore we will work day and night, in season and out of season, to sweep it clean away.

THE REVIVAL OF TRADE (?).

THE promised revival of trade is long a-coming, apparently. Here are some cuttings from the Daily News of Monday 28th March, chiefly concerning the textile trades.

Cotton Goods, Manchester.—In the cloth market the week has been on the whole rather dull but firm; business for the larger eastern markets much restricted by the uncertainties of exchange. . . . The home trade is doing rather more. . . . "printers" quiet. . . . Business in yarns has fallen below an average in most departments.

Woollen Goods, Leeds.—The week's turnover, all kinds of cloth, has been far below the average, buyers being very cautious in their operations, and showing not the least disposition to speculate.

Wool and Worsted, Bradford.—The wool market has a rather more cheerful tone; but the business is still of a restricted character and to cover orders recently taken in yarns.

Leicester.—In the hosiery business as a whole is quiet. . . . Orders are scarce, and profits narrowed by the keenness of competition.

The Boot and Shoe Trade.—But the chief drawback is—not any despondency as to the outlook for the second quarter, which is cheerful—but the narrowness of profit owing to the activity of competition.

In elastic webs the recent revival has not been maintained, there being now a lull and dullness all round.

Nottingham.—Nothing very cheering can be said of the lace trade this week. Although the season is advancing, the business does not appreciably increase. Indeed, so far from business expanding, it is doubtful whether orders are coming to hand so freely as they did earlier in the year. The local manufacturers, as a rule, have little reason to congratulate themselves on the aspect of commercial affairs. . . . Accounts of the hosiery trade are somewhat discouraging.

Birmingham, Hardware Trade.— . . . New orders are not coming forward very freely, and prices are kept on an unremunerative level by the keenness of competition. . . . The shipping trade continues abnormally quiet. . . . Travelling-trunks of the cheaper kinds are in brisk request, though the profits are limited. The fender and fire-iron branch is rather dull.

Sheffield.—There is a decided check in the progress of the iron and steel trades. . . . Steel makers are experiencing a rather slack demand for the best qualities. The production of heaving steel castings is fully equal to the demand, which is less boyant than of late. . . . For bar and hoop iron there is a rather better demand than for some other kinds of manufactured iron; but business is not so brisk as it was hoped it would be.

The italics in the above cuttings are, of course, my own.

Professor Levi told the Wolverhampton Chamber of Commerce that he was not in the least disposed to say that there was any great reason for the trading community of the country to be seriously depressed. Of course the learned professor can see no reason for the depression; he is not supposed to. However, the depression of trade has had a serious effect upon trades' union funds. At the close of 1883 the United Society of Boilermakers and Shipbuilders had an accumulated fund of £108,545. It now stands at £21,895, as much as £1000 having been paid in some weeks to members out of work. The struggle to obtain employment gets keener every day, and when obtained the conditions are more burdensome. Last week the coroner had to hold an inquest on William Crocker, a painter in London. He said to his wife, "I can't stand this any longer. I shall go mad!" He had been all day in search of work, and had been unable to obtain any. Afterwards his body was found in Regent's Canal. Professor Levi must reckon all in, and not rely too much on his own figures.

MEETING OF WORKING MEN IN VIENNA.—On Monday a great meeting of working men was held here, at which very strong revolutionary opinions were expressed, so much so that almost every speaker was stopped in the middle of his speech by the police who were present. The congratulatory telegrams from the provincial associations were of so extreme a nature that they were not allowed to be read out.

AT THE QUEEN'S JUBILEE.

FELL fifty years o'er these fair isles
Plump lady Vic had held the sway,
And all the courtly lords had met
To celebrate the crowning day.
"For sure," said they, "it is but right
That loyal subjects every one
Should praise our queen for all the deeds
Her gracious royal hands have done."

So on a glorious day in June
A glittering pageant moved along,
And knights in gay attire were there,
And men in armour stout and strong;
And banners in the sunlight waved,
And trumpets filled the air with sound
While in the midst Victoria rode,
Her head with gaudy jewels crowned.

And far away to right and left
The great crowd stretches silently;
No sound of cheering rose from them
While all the pomp and pride swept by,
But mutterings from clenched teeth,
And angry murmurs rose and fell,
And as she passed, the men-at-arms
Had no light task to guard her well.

The good archbishop all the while
Thought of his goodly golden store,
And pondered deeply in his mind
How to increase it more and more;
And all the bishop friends of Christ
Thought of the very self-same thing;
While at the ropes in many a tower
Stout arms made all the church bells ring.

Far on the outskirts of the crowd
A tattered beggar viewed the pride,
And scorned and jostled by the throng,
Hugged his rags closer to his side,
And muttered underneath his breath,
While down the street the banners passed,
"How long shall earth go rolling on Ere idle pride shall breathe its last?"

How long before yon sun on high
Shall look upon the earth and see
Freedom's red banner borne aloft
By brave men struggling to be free?
Go on thy way, oh queen, awhile;
Enjoy thy little day of pride,
But all around thy pomp and show
Riseth red revolution's tide.

Go on thy way, the robes thou hast
Are woven out of sighs and tears,
And every hope thy proud heart knows
Is built upon the people's fears.
Hide from thine eyes the sight of those Whose lives, as mine, are full of woe,
Live out thy little day in peace
Till comes the day when thou shalt know—

That underneath thee all this while
Surges and boils a rising fire:
Whose flame of discontent each day
Grows ever fiercer, ever higher;
It undermines thy throne. E'en now
Methinks I see thy jewelled crown
And all thy pomp and rotten pride
Into the wild flame falling down.

The people waken. All too long
Their ignorance hath kept thee up,
But knowledge spreads with misery,
And while they drink deep sorrow's cup,
Fierce curses in their hearts arise
At thee and all thine idle show,
Thou puppet on a gilded throne
The time shall come when thou must go!

Defender of a useless faith
That tricks the people into prayer,
They find that all the gods are deaf,
And they are crying to the air.
Unconscious heaven will give us naught
Lo, we must up and act as men;
Vampires, who draw our blood to-day,
How we shall sweep you from us then!

I envy not thy pampered ease
Though with keen hunger I may cry,
My rags may flutter in the wind
And life may drag on wearily;
A little longer I can wait,
Nor shall the time be overlong,
Till thou and all thy lordly state
Learn how despair can make men strong!

Ours is the power to destroy
What by our toiling is upheld,
And out of ruin once again
A bright new world of hope to weld.
But thou and all thy crew must go,
Earth has no place for such as thou;
When men shall rise and strike the blow,
Would they were ripe for striking now!

FRED HENDERSON.

[The above verses which it is to be hoped will voice the sentiments of the workers far more faithfully than the fulsome Jubilee jingle of Baron Tennyson, acquire additional interest from the fact that the writer is now unjustly imprisoned in Norwich Castle for directing attention to the injustice of present society.]

LITERARY NOTICES.

We have received the first issues of Humanitas (Naples) organ of the Communist-Anarchists. It contains interesting articles each week by F. S. Merlino and others, is well filled up with foreign notes and so forth, and is, in short, a "good halfpennyworth."

In April Longman's E. Nesbit has "The Ballad of Ferencz Renyi" in which a revolutionary incident is well and strongly told.

In Our Corner Mrs. Besant has an admirable reply to Mr. Bradlaugh, and there is, as usual, a good selection of readable articles.

'The Labor Problem,' is a pamphlet by G. C. Clemens of Enterprise, Kan., U.S., in which the problem is fairly well "stated for the busy and the tired" without any attempt at a solution. No price is stated.

'Our Great Social Problem' is a reprint from the Southport Guardian of a most interesting correspondence between our comrade Walter Crane, and a Mr. C. H. Brown. The letters of the latter are chiefly of interest as showing the strange mental contortions an intelligent honest man may unconsciously indulge in.

'An Autobiographical Sketch of August Spies,' with notes, and reports of speeches, and portraits of himself and his noble young wife, has been published by the latter at 25 cents, and may be procured from Julius Bordollos, 104-106 E. 4th St., N.Y.

Articles of Interest to Socialists: Nineteenth Century: "Science and Pseudo-Science," Huxley; "An Act for the Suspension of Parliament," Trill; "On Well-meant Nonsense about Emigration," Osborne Morgan; "Liberal Unionists and Coercion," Reginald H. Brett and Earl Cowper. Blackwood's: "Free Trade and Depressed Trade," A. Williamson. Contemporary: "The Plan of Campaign," S. Laing. Fortnightly: "Fluctuations in Trade and Wages," Geo. Howell; "A Model Landlord," A. Williams, M.P. [N.B.—It must not be assumed that every article given in this list from time to time is thereby praised. Some are so included, but some for their foolishness and some for their dishonesty; but all in some way are of interest.] S.

AMERICAN SYMPATHY WITH IRELAND.—Both Houses of the New York Legislature have unanimously adopted resolutions expressing sympathy with Ireland, and protesting against the injustice of the new Coercion Bill. Six other States have adopted similar resolutions.

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW? FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s. six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

Periodicals received during the week ending Wednesday April 6.

"DOES EDUCATION DIMINISH INDUSTRY?"

THIS is a question often asked and answered by people, well-meaning enough in their way, but most usually unable to grasp anything like a true solution of the apparent enigma. The Daily News some time back, in its endeavour to support "technical training" in Board Schools, restated all the old pleas against educating the "common people," but, of course, in these democratic times with somewhat more of circumspect periphrasis and euphemistic expression than the ancient arguments were wont to masquerade in heretofore. The Spectator, commenting upon the Daily News article, utilised with great effect its long-practised art of sitting upon the fence, but leant as strongly as it dared in the same direction.

Education, runs the doleful song, is destroying the appetite and aptitude for work once possessed by the "lower classes"; "the boys make less trusty workmen, and the girls worse cooks, and housemaids, and laundrywomen"; they "are less handy and more conceited than a former generation, have less liking for work, and more notions." "Education is in itself inimical to continuous industry." "Education cannot be stopped, and if, therefore, education develops an aversion to hard work, humanity will stand in presence of a nearly insoluble problem."

Now, whatever be the impatience with which a Socialist must hearken to these and similar Jeremiads, there is yet some necessity for his answering them when they are put with plausibility and are like to deceive the folk. This terrible pothole about education when examined is found to arise from quite other causes than regard to the welfare of the people or the future of education. No, the fear is for the ending of the period in which the masses consent to be degraded and misused that a few may "devour all the gain, or lasciviously consume with phantastical expenses." But, stated plausibly, and backed by loud-sounding declamation, the pinchbeck philanthropy and assumed foresight of the self-appointed prophets of evil lend a superficial look of validity to their contention, and may confuse the unthinking or unreflective.

Education, so-called to-day, in so far as it is concerned with the working-class, is either a concealed attempt to "fit them for their station in life," to train them to a tame acceptance of their "natural" inferiority, or, more dishonestly inhuman, a pretence at their due development as men and women while it is known that, leaving school, they are to be beaten down again into factory slaves. What it should be is the careful, assiduous drawing out of each faculty possessed by an individual to the fullest extent, consistent with its healthy exercise.

There is only so much of true education as cannot be avoided in that accorded to the children of the workers to-day. But an educated man is a free man, and little of true education as it is that they receive, there is yet enough to make them discontented with their allotted slave-labour and subordinate position.

To define Education and Work is sufficient to explode the fallacy that they are inconsistent, the one with the other. Education, the preparing of human faculties for most effective exercise. Work, the exercise of human faculties toward desired ends. Under the present system, however, work is directed, not to the desired ends of the labourer, but to those of his employer, of the man to whom he has been compelled to sell himself, his power of labour. His labour-power is for a certain period the property of another, and to be exerted only as that other bids; he has sold it, and has no further interest in it than to receive the price agreed upon. Monotonous, intense, degrading toil, constant anxiety, and dread of enforced idleness, while he is "fortunate" enough to be employed; misery and helplessness when "unemployed"; these things are the appointed portion of a worker. If he be ignorant, undeveloped, brutish, indifferent of higher things, he may perchance endure it all with dull, stolid patience, "a poor servile drudge, a very slave"; but the more manhood he possesses, the more that his powers have been stimulated into life, the more bitterly will he resent his unjust subjection and chafe against his fetters.

It is not against work in itself that he revolts, but against its commercial accompaniments, its compulsoriness, monotony, intensity, and want of relation to his own benefit. Knowledge, even though it be of the "commercial" kind, furnished him now-a-days, enables him to see with ever-increasing clearness that his energy, exerted for an employer, bears little or no relation to his needs or to his sustenance. Nor can his aroused mind with its acquired knowledge, scant as that may be, find outlet in his work, save in the rarest instances, for he is becoming continually more absorbed into mere machine-minding; into the servitude of a machine, over which he has but slight control, and which he seldom understands. Even where it is not so, his employer cannot allow any latitude for thought, does he wish to win in the competition-struggle for commercial existence, but must compel him to produce goods "that will sell," with as little expenditure of his brain or body as may be.

But it is not only from its avowed enemies that the education of the working-class is made to suffer. Many a time could education with reason cry out for rescue from its "friends." To these, the Board School and the teaching therein given, is to make everybody healthy, wealthy, happy, and wise. Wage-slavery and learning have met together; profit-making and culture have kissed each other!

What was said of the pupil-teachers by one of H.M. Inspectors in 1880 remains true still and of children as well: "The minds are crowded with numbers of ill-digested facts, and there is no power rightly to appreciate or assimilate these facts." The whole system of teaching in Board Schools is radically wrong; none are readier to admit this than teachers whose heart is in their work. One most intelligent and enthusiastic man, head master of a large school in an important provincial town, admitted to me when showing me over his school, that it was one of his keenest regrets that the system forced upon him allowed no adequate scope for special abilities, but was based upon cut-and-dried competition and the passing of cast-iron standard. This is but part, of course, of the whole method of "education" in vogue at the universities, public schools, and so on; it is, nevertheless, of special import for evil to the working folk.

Children are turned into animated small hoppers; the names and dry bones of ever so many sciences and arts being crammed into them by means of cumbersome, expensive, and wasteful machinery. A multitude of bare facts and figures are forced into them willy-nilly, the meaning and application of said facts and figures being left to the chances of their future life. There are but few faculties called into play in a worker's daily task; fewer still of the things he has learned in school have any bearing thereupon; it is no wonder therefore that most of his faculties become atrophied from disuse, and that his brain rejects the unrelated "learning" got by rote. Thought, long-sustained, is absolutely essential to education, but which of us finds leisure for thought, either while we are at school eagerly preparing for examination upon examination, or in after-life amid the mad struggle we must keep up—or die?

To all but the Socialist, the Education question is a dilemma from which there is no escape, and either horn of which it is equally undesirable to be impaled upon. To maintain Society as it is the workers must remain in subjection; to so remain they must be ignorant. "Wise men are free; fools are slaves." To educate the workers is to rive Society asunder, for it is based upon robbery and buttressed with a lie. Justice and truth alone will satisfy an enlightened people. To a Socialist the dilemma is none, for he sees upon which horn of it Society must impale itself. Some learning is among the people, and as Burton well said: "So sweet is the delight of study, the more learning they have (as he that hath a dropsy, the more he drinks the thirstier he is) the more they covet to learn, the last day is prioris discipulus; harsh at first learning is, radices amaræ, but fructus dulces, bitter rooted but sweet fruited, according to that of Isocrates, pleasant at last; the longer they live the more they are enamoured of the Muses."

Man slowly but surely humanises himself, regulates his desires and directs his powers by a reasoned knowledge of his surroundings. As knowledge increases and the application of it is made sure, man sees not only how he lives but how he might live; and forms of faith or of society, however ancient and respectable, must give way before his will. Then, when men are leisured, unoppressed by anxiety for the morrow's food, or fear of what the week may bring, it will be possible to train men as never heretofore, and Education will at length have opportunity to show what it can do for man.

H. HALLIDAY SPARLING.

A DAY IN THE COUNTRY.

It was towards the close of a clear bright day in early spring that, leaving the quaint little village of West Wycombe behind, I found myself at the summit of the Chiltern Hills, that intersect the county of Buckingham. For some miles now the road ran along the lofty ridge, affording beautiful prospects of the country on either hand, and only at the rarest intervals varied by a clump of cottages or a solitary farmhouse with its deep-rutted cart-road skirting a sluggish duck-pond. Indeed the desolation seemed almost oppressive; and I felt vaguely that this was a true instinct. Here was proof-positive of the absurdity of "over-population." It is true, indeed, that Malthus dwelt amid the beautiful wilds of Surrey; but then, added to the sophistical training of his order, he had a strong turn for arithmetic: and after all, it is the perplexed dwellers in towns who chiefly support his theory, so true it is that one-half the world does not know how the other half lives. And so commerce desolates the country to crowd the cities, and persuades its imprisoned victims that they are miserable because there is not room enough. A Malthusian should be dropped in the middle of Salisbury Plain.

With such thoughts as these I pursued my way along the lonely heights; and, now that the sun touched the horizon and the air began to grow keen, welcomed the sign-post that showed me the way to the village of Bledlow; and following the winding road deep into the fresh green valley, reached at last the place I sought. I hastened at once to the "Glyde," for which it is celebrated in the guide-books, and found it a sort of leafy precipice, from whose sides innumerable springs trickle with a gentle noise into the pool below, where the cattle are driven down to drink. High above stands the old square-towered church, seemingly in great danger of fulfilling Mother Shipton's ancient prophecy by "falling into the Glyde." And now in the fading light the trees around it seemed to mingle with the glow of the western sky, and nothing but the voices of the birds and the lowing of kine disturbed the stillness of the evening air.

It was twilight when I reached the door of a little alehouse, and stepped, weary and hungry, into the dim parlour. As nothing was to be had but fiery cheese and sour ale, I took them cheerfully: had I been disposed to repine, I should have felt ashamed of it when two or three labouring fellows entered the darkening room and began to talk. The poor widow who kept the house had enough to do to live, they said; and in that little village alone there were twenty men born in those parts then without work. This may seem a slight matter; but if such a thing could be in that little unknown village on the borders of Oxfordshire, what must it be elsewhere? The farmers complained that the land would not "pay" to cultivate. These poor fellows needed no telling that something was wrong; the question was, what? One of them had a vague but rooted notion that the queen and royal family were at the bottom of it; and I fear that when I spoke of France and America I only helped to destroy the hope he had. Indeed I felt shamed into silence in the presence of these slow-witted peasants, who live and labour and suffer on the land. There was little said; and I looked out of the darkness into the glimmering landscape with a mind full of pity and misgiving.

That morning I had been in London, with all its crowds and noise: now I was in the heart of a beautiful country. With what result? Misery here, misery there. Commerce has done its work, and brought all to extremes. Just as it has created an unhappy rich class and an unhappy poor class, so it has made the towns fierce gambling hells of life and death, and the country an abomination of desolation and cold isolated poverty.

Sentimentalists and lovers of the picturesque should journey on foot among the lovely country districts, using their eyes and ears. It will be strange if they do not come back with the sham sentiment knocked out of them and something more real put in its place. If they really believe in country life, they will do their best to give the whole people a chance of enjoying it, together with real social life.

Perhaps on the whole my tour had not been profitless so far, I thought, as I sat late at night in the chimney-corner of the "Rising Sun" at Prince's Risborough; and that which I had heard and seen was with me as I fell asleep, and came to me again through the open casement with the twitterings of birds and the morning light.

REGINALD A. BECKETT.

Some villagers in Egypt have been flogged and their sheik imprisoned for six months because a party of British officers first wounded a villager and then on a disturbance arising shot another dead. Justice can scarcely go further than this; even flogging the whole population for having the rebellious impudence to exist, though it would be harder on them, would be a trifle more logical. It will now be a sacred social duty for the Arabs to avoid being shot by British officers, lest their recklessness should involve the whole of their village in a flogging. Bah! the man of modern civilisation is a sickening animal.

NORTHUMBRIAN NOTES.

No alteration has yet taken place in the situation. The mine-owners have been dumb, except that one of them threatens to close his pits unless the men surrender in a fortnight. But this is an old dodge, and the miners know the value of the threat. To have read the Newcastle papers a week ago one would have thought that the miners were just about to give up the fight. But on going amongst the men one finds something quite different. I put this to the test last week. The sensational articles on the distress were then appearing, expectations of the miners' surrender were rife, letters from anonymous wiseacres counselled them to fling up the sponge, impudent editorials and fussy relief-committee memorials demanded the immediate capitulation of the strikers. During three days I went to six or seven different parts of Northumberland and questioned scores of men. They all admitted the distress; some of them were very bitter at the thought of the suffering inflicted on their wives and children by the capitalist power, but none of them spoke of giving in.

I cannot say that the miners have much hope of preventing the reduction. It is a dreary fight for them. Victory not very likely, or barren if they gain it. They will have used up nearly all their resources in the endeavour to keep their position, and if the masters try again they will be much surer of success. Again, if the miners do lose, they will be getting less than enough to feed themselves. "Give up the strike," cry the relief committees; "take the masters' terms, we can't keep the soup-kitchens open any longer." But if the men take 12½ per cent. less than they have been getting, the soup-kitchen will have to be made a permanent institution.

The general feeling is that the miners will be beaten, though I think that with better tactics, and the help which they should, but do not, get, a victory might have been secured. But the capitalists will not get an easy victory. There is a dogged determination about the men which bodes no good to their masters. Already the loss of confidence in the ordinary useless labour leaders is very widespread; and it will be lack of ability or industry on the part of the Socialists only that will prevent the general acceptance of Socialism amongst the miners.

The miners have now made advances to the masters to end the dispute by referring it to arbitration. It is not very clear what the result will be, but it looks like the miners losing. However, it may be best for the strike to end. This at all events is clear. The miners have suffered keenly, and their bitterness against the wrongs inflicted on them is greater now than ever before. The mineowners have greatly hastened the spread of Socialism by their inhuman attempts to grind the men lower than they are. The miners feel, too, that it is time they went in for more thorough-going action than hitherto they have done.

The Socialist propaganda has gone on better than ever. Two meetings every day, and all the halls crowded with people. We now find organised opposition and this proves the efficacy of the work done. The opposition is bitter but not formidable and helps to give a zest to the proceedings. I shall send a fuller report next week. The matter of organisation has again been postponed for a fortnight.

Newcastle, April 5.

J. L. MAHON.

BREAKERS AHEAD!

THE present time is a favourable one in which to watch the governments of Europe tremblingly steering their course between their twin great dangers—the Scylla of foreign war and the Charybdis of internal revolution.

Watching one another and "their" peoples the "armed strong men" sit and none can tell what a day or week may bring.

The one thing certain in the uncertain business is that war and rapine—one almost might say also pestilence and famine—depend upon the great financiers, who at a nod can shake Europe.

Peace and war depend upon which the Moneybags can make most out of, by which particular method the blood of the peoples can most conveniently be transformed into the fortunes of financiers.

The Spectator says: "If we look below the surface, it is almost everywhere the governing classes who are heartily loyal, but the machine nevertheless rolls on." It explains the secret by the division among the governed peoples as well as the jealousy of nations.

The people are becoming more solidary every day, and day by day the distrust and hatred of "foreigners" decreases. How then for "the machine"?

In another place the same journal admits that "the strife between capital and labour rises black and menacing above the near horizon." How then for "the machine"?

THE ITALIAN ELECTIONS.—At Ravenna Cipriani has again been elected. This time the Socialist convict has been returned.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

Owing to the continued slackness in the North Wales slate trade several batches of men have been discharged from the South Carnarvonshire quarries in the Nantlle district. At Bethesda there is no prospect of full time being worked, and many of the younger quarrymen are emigrating.

At a delegate meeting of the branches of the National Labour Federation held at Newcastle, Mr. Judge, the president stated that within five months they numbered 10,000 members, and there was every prospect that the progress of the movement would continue.

SCOTTISH MINERS.—A settlement of the present dispute has been arrived at between the employers and the employes at Meiklehill Collieries and Sols-girth Colliery. The employers accept the men's proposal to work eight hours per day and eleven days per fortnight, a holiday being observed every alternate Thursday.

REDUCTION IN SEAMEN'S WAGES.—Last week a crew was shipped at Greenock for the ship Orissa, proceeding from Maryport to Townsville, Australia, at the rate of 40s. per month. This is the lowest rate paid to seamen for many years past.

MASONS.—On the 28th ultimo, at a meeting of the operative masons held in the Masons' Hall, Edinburgh, it was agreed to intimate to the employers that the operatives considered that the state of trade warranted an advance of wages from 6d. to 7d. per hour on and after 9th April, and a committee was appointed to notify this to the employers and the different squads in the town.

CHAINMAKERS.—The chainmakers strike in the Midlands still continues, having now lasted for nearly eight months. At a meeting just held at Cradley Heath, it was stated that the public sympathy had not died away, and never had the operatives of any trade met with such liberal support as the chainmakers now on strike. The men express their firm determination not to resume work at the old rate of pay.

BURNLEY—THE STRIKE OF WEAVERS.—The strike at Messrs. Jas. Walton and Sons, Bishop House and Elm Street Mills, still continues. The strike pay is at the rate of 1s. 6d. per loom, the weavers in the great bulk of cases receiving 13s. to 15s. per week from all sources. The prices in dispute are 3½d. to 4d. per cut under what is being paid at Nelson, and also what the Ashton employers are willing to pay. The weavers have entered on this struggle with a determination to win, and the Messrs. Walton are likely to find they have undertaken a tough job.

VIOLATION OF FACTORY ACTS.—In Oldham and its districts the Factory Acts are taken little notice of by mill managers, and are daily and openly violated in various ways. The chief department in London makes no effort to cope with the evil from which thousands of operatives suffer. It was only last week that the inspector for the district had to admit to the borough bench that he was not so sanguine as to suppose that any penalty they could impose would stop overtime in Oldham. Overtime will be resorted to so long as it is more profitable to practice it and run the risk of a small fine.

THE UNEMPLOYED AT BARROW.—The unemployed at Barrow have been holding a series of open-air meetings. The crowd assembled in front of the Town Hall asking to see the mayor, and threatened to break the windows. They also displayed a black flag, on which were a skull and cross-bones, and the words, "Bread or work." The mayor afterwards received a deputation, and said their case would be brought before the Council. He advised them to get out a list showing the number of unemployed, and to interview the Guardians. The list has already been signed by over 600 men. A deputation waited on the Guardians on the 30th ult., at which Mr. Henley, of the Local Government Board, was present. He pointed out that the Guardians were powerless to do anything except to offer the men the workhouse.

AN EIGHT HOURS' LABOUR BILL.—A public meeting of working-men, convened by the Trades' Unionists Eight Hours' Conference Committee, was held on Thursday, 31st ult., at the Feathers Tavern, Warren Street, Fitzroy Square, to consider the above questions, and the following resolution was passed:—"That this public meeting of workers is of opinion that the best means of obtaining permanent work for the vast number of persons at present unemployed is by a reduction of the hours of labour, and sees no other means of obtaining the same except by political action, and therefore pledges itself to endeavour to obtain the passing of an Eight Hours Labour Bill by all legitimate means in its power." Other meetings will be held in different parts of London as early as possible, due notice of which will be given.

HADFIELD—CAUGHT IN THE ACT.—One of the firms in the Hadfield district has been caught by two inspectors. It is the custom in that district to commence at 6.30 in the morning and stop at 6 o'clock at night, but the firm in question one Friday morning commenced before 6.30, and about thirty names were taken. Nearly all the mills in the Hadfield district work a great amount of overtime. At some of the mills the weavers get their meals before stopping time, and are pulling cuts off or picking them, or otherwise cleaning, all the meal hours, which causes the Factory Acts to be a dead letter. It is awkward for the inspector to catch them, as the overlookers have to be on the watch during the meal hours, and go to their meals afterwards, thus breaking the Act of Parliament with impunity.

"A DANIEL."—Mr. Raffles was rather wide of the mark when he said that he thought the South End Dock Labourers' Association was a most stupid and absurd society altogether. It seems that a labourer who was a member of the society was fined 10s. for working with non-society men. He refused to pay the fine, and because the society members refused to work with him he summoned three of them for intimidation, but the case was quashed on the ground that refusing to work with a man was not intimidation in the sense implied in the Act. Mr. Raffles seemed to find fault with the society for making rules of which he could not see the force, but which the labourers had been compelled to frame in their own interests to secure for themselves the terms which are found necessary in their employment. He stated that shipowners had told him that they could not get men to do their work owing to the rules of the society, and for this he condemned them and called it a stupid and absurd society. Dock-labourers have learned from bitter experience while following their laborious employment what is best calculated to serve their cause, and they are far better capable of judging what rules are requisite to harmony, as regards work and wages, than such as Mr. Raffles. —Cotton Factory Times.

THE ASHTON STRIKE.

The high-handed and unscrupulous behaviour of the capitalists towards the workpeople engaged in this struggle is severely commented upon by the Cotton Factory Times. We quote the concluding remarks of an article in that excellent paper, which are worthy of serious attention. It is, however, strange and regrettable that the writer should have thought it necessary to use such an utterly fallacious and ridiculous phrase as "socialistic robbery":

"We are no supporters of socialistic robbery, but we are hip and thigh opponents of employers having the whip hand. They have no more right to try to intimidate their workpeople than the buyer of a pound of butter has to menace the man who sells it. These matters are gradually finding their level. The working classes will not always allow themselves to be humbugged and divided by those whose interest it is to have it so. All over the world the feeling of solidarity is growing, and whatever be the result of the Ashton strike, it must advance the movement. We are slowly getting down to the point where employers will, like working men, be respected exactly as they deserve to be, irrespective of their wealth. If the chasm which has for many centuries divided one class from the other be widened instead of the reverse, no one will be to blame but employers themselves, and it is bound in the long run to bring a terrible reckoning. Our remarks will be sneered at, just as those were scouted who, fifty years ago, thought that working men should have the rights which they now enjoy. Whether they come true or not depends on the action of employers, but a few more strikes like those now going on in Northumberland, Staffordshire, and Lancashire will do much to make our words true. An incident has occurred in connection with the strike which ought to open the eyes of the workpeople at Hurst. It appears a considerable number of the cottages in the village belong to the firm, and some of the weavers on strike have lived in these houses for fifteen or sixteen years, and some a great deal longer. In consequence of the strike taking place, these people have received notice to leave their homes. The tenants have received an intimation that an application is to be made to the magistrates on the 6th of April for power to remove their goods by force. This is a nice spectacle in a Lancashire town. These people have worked for the firm, some of them, for more than thirty years, and have in no small degree helped to make it what it is, and now, because they refuse to surrender their just rights, the firm is prepared to cast them into the street. This sort of business may have been carried on in Ireland, but we very much question it being carried on in the heart of Lancashire. If there was any evidence wanted as to the way in which labour is respected by capitalists, surely these threatened evictions at Hurst will supply it, and if there is now anything wanted to convince the workpeople of the necessity of acting in a body in order to protect themselves, they are hard to convince indeed. We don't believe for a moment that the firm wishes to turn these people out of their houses; nothing of the kind. The firm want to strike terror into the hearts of the greater number who reside in the village; and if these people allow themselves to be terrified in this way, we think their fellow-workers in the cotton districts may sympathise with them, but unless they take a stand collectively against this conduct they cannot do much to emancipate them. It appears the firm are desirous of standing strictly on their legal rights, whatever the consequences may be. We sincerely hope the tenants will also stand on their legal rights, and that every working man and woman in Ashton will combine in lodging a protest sufficiently strong to put an end to this attempt on the part of capital to crush the very last spark of independence out of them."

FRANCE.

VICOIGNE (NORD).—A general strike of the miners here has taken place. Reports have been spread by the bourgeois press that it has ended by a compromise with the Company, but this is distinctly denied by the correspondents of the Socialist journals.

FIRE-DAMP IN THE MINES.—M. Laur, deputy for the Loire department, has intimated to the Minister of Public Works that he intends to take advantage of the general discussion on the law relative to the delegate miners, to demand the suppression of the use of explosives in mines containing fire-damp, and the institution of a prize of 50,000 fr. for the invention of an explosive or some other method of extracting the coal, which will not be dangerous in such mines. —Cri du Peuple.

A BANQUET OF EXPLOITERS.—A number of representatives of the exploiting class dined together last week at the Hôtel Continental; they harangued and mutually congratulated each other; one among them made it known that he had received the cross of the Legion of Honour, another that his last year's illness had left him, etc., etc. Having exhausted these soothing little personalities, they proceeded to deplore the deplorable state of industry. Yet they were not cast down, but with valiant hearts and hopeful minds looked forward to the impetus that they hope will be given to trade by the Exhibition of '89 and the works decided on by the Municipal Council. Let us imitate the spirit of these courageous men, and hope—with a different hope—for better times!

REGISTRY OFFICES.—The agitation against the Bureaux de Placement is still continuing in Paris, and will, we hope, finally lead to their total suppression, after the inevitable long and stupid resistance on the part of Law and Order and their servants. Law and Order distinguished themselves the other day at a manifestation held in Java for this very necessary reform. A numerous attended meeting was held at the Salle Favé. The meeting over, those taking part in it traversed the streets and "manifested" before the Bureaux de Placement. The said manifestation seems to have been of a moderately calm and orderly nature, but the end of the scene was rendered dramatic by the entrance of Law and Order personified by the police, who dispersed the would-be reformers with many blows and buffets, and arrested about a dozen of them. These, of course, have since been convicted of violence to the police and destruction of property, and some of them sentenced to one and two months' imprisonment and fines.

BELGIUM.

The emigration movement is increasing in the Charleroi district. The other day three families left for Anvers, where they embark for Texas. The hamlet of Sart-Allet contains several women, whose husbands emigrated several months back, awaiting impatiently the passage money that their husbands have promised to send from America. Several miners at Gilly set off, leaving wives and large families behind. . . . Several other families are preparing to leave for Brazil. Will they be better off over there than here? That is always the question. In answer we may recall the case of two brothers some time back who set off, and thought themselves lucky in being . . . outfits so as to make up the sum necessary to secure a . . . —L'Avant Garde.

"The Belgians have the right to combine together; this right may be subjected to no preventive measure whatever."—The Belgian Constitution, Act 20. "The Belgians have the right to meet together, peaceably, and without arms."—Id., Act 19, etc., etc. A goodly country is Belgium truly! Fifty-seven years of liberty have made of her a Land of Cocaigne where larks tumble ready roasted into the mouths of those who work not, while those who labour are plunged in the depths of misery. Liberty of association, religious liberty, liberty of the press, of opinion, of education, etc., etc., all liberties do we possess, to be found on every page of our Constitution—a very plethora of liberties! But these liberties resemble the collections in our museums; you may look but you must not touch.—L'Avant Garde.

AUSTRIA.

BRUNN, March 21st.—On March 13th, as on the anniversary of the March Revolution, garlands were laid on the graves of those noble men who shed their blood for liberty by the Social Democratic Union Wahrheit, by the editors of Gleichheit, and by two working-men in the name of the Radical Labour Party. In the afternoon at four o'clock, about 700 labourers assembled at the graves, and with uncovered heads saluted the fallen with thundering cheers. Then they returned to the town in a procession, but were harassed by the police, who as the bourgeois papers report, on horse "cleared" the streets. Two were arrested. Already two days ago some comrades were arrested and forced to sign a document pledging themselves to abstain from unlawful actions. It is to be remarked that the March revolution was a revolution undertaken by bourgeois and proletarians who were the extreme Democrats; but the bourgeoisie has now become, as in 1848, so cowardly as to deny the past, and shelter itself under the wings of Absolutism, fearing the proletariat who grow more and more conscious of the class warfare.

To-day the process began against the fifteen Anarchists who were arrested in the beginning of October, 1886. Six months already wasted. They are charged with having set, or attempted to set on fire, with fire-bottles, several wood magazines in Vienna, in order, as they themselves have confessed, "to excite terror and noise, and to terrorise the great capitalists into complying with the demands of the labourers;" with having attempted to extort money by disguising themselves as policemen searching for forged money. The indictment states further that in Vienna and suburbs secret unions have been formed, who, in order to promote Anarchist means, debated on plans for crimes, procured or prepared means to commit them, and partly also undertook their execution. In order to procure a greater amount of money for the party cash, and also type for an Anarchist printing office, it was resolved to chloroform a pawnbroker and steal his money, then to carry out a burglary at the printing-office of a Jos. Frostler. Shortly the same story, the same use of the known dynamite policy, practised by men thinking to improve their situation, but misled by agents-provateurs, à la Thring-Mahlow, who furnish them with dynamite for bombs, teaching them to use these against and rob innocent private individuals. That the police have concocted the story there is no doubt. It is not by chance that whatever these defendants undertook was prevented by policemen who passed by "accidentally." The process will last about eight days. The entrance into the room of the proceeding is allowed only to men provided with special tickets. The police will ensure a decent public, and therefore communications of bourgeois papers on the process must be accepted with great caution.—F. S.

It is to be regretted that all the notices served upon the North Wales coalowners, demanding an advance of wages of 10 per cent., have been withdrawn by the men, and work resumed on the old terms. This will have a bad effect on the strike in Northumberland; more organisation amongst the miners must take place before there will be any chance of a successful strike.

Constable Dorney, of Killeely, who threw down his arms and refused to take part in the arrest of Father Ryan, has been placed under arrest and conveyed in plain clothes to Bruff. The incident has caused great excitement, and already a movement is on foot to collect funds for a testimonial to the constable, who has 11 years' service, and has always borne a good character. The authorities are apprehensive that Dorney's example may be followed by other constables.

BOYCOTTING MR. CHAMBERLAIN.—The Crofters' Aid Committee met at headquarters in Glasgow on the 1st inst. to consider the question of Mr. Chamberlain's visit to the Highlands, and the attitude the crofters should adopt on the occasion. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"That this meeting calls upon the crofters and their friends to stand aloof from Mr. Chamberlain until he severs himself from the Tory coercionists of their struggling Irish brethren, and returns to the party of progress led by Mr. Gladstone." The secretary was ordered to send copies of the resolution to branches of the Highland Land League and kindred societies throughout Scotland. The action of the Crofter Aid Committee may prove effective in boycotting Mr. Chamberlain. It was this Committee which furnished the funds to support the families of the imprisoned crofters, and it consequently wields powerful influence amongst Highland agitators. A second resolution was passed inviting Mr. Davitt to address meetings in the Highlands about the time of Mr. Chamberlain's visit.

It would be interesting to know the history of the men who were at Biggleswade each sentenced to a month's hard labour for stealing potatoes, valued respectively at 9d. and 1s. One man said he was hard up; and the other, who has a wife and three children, said he was driven to the deed by starvation after having walked far in search of work. The cases appear to have been quite independent of each other. At assizes the judges generally make inquiries when such pleas are put in by prisoners, with the result, of course, of severer sentences when the plea is found to be false. We fear, however, that in too many cases the plea represents an amount of actual privation which it is exceedingly painful to think of. Among the destitute the poverty that is unavoidable and the poverty that results from idleness or lack of principle cannot always be distinctly separated; but it is the grossest injustice to judge with iron inflexibility those whom ignorance and starvation almost irresistibly thrust into crime.—Bedfordshire Times.

I see no reason why an epicure or idle drone, a rich glutton, a usurer, should live at ease and do nothing, live in honour, in all manner of pleasures, and oppress others, whereas in the meantime a poor labourer, a smith, a carpenter, an husbandman, that hath spent his time in continual labour, as an ass to carry burdens, to do the commonwealth good, and without whom we cannot live, shall be left in his old age to beg or starve, and lead a miserable life, worse than a beast of burden.—Sir Thomas More, 'Utopia.'

DAME USURY AND HER GEESE.

DID it ever occur to you how many chances we missed in our boyhood to become posted on sound principles of political economy? This is what rushed into my mind when I travelled back on the wings of memory, the other day, and thought of a fine flock of geese my mother used to have. What have geese got to do with political economy? did you ask? Why, a very great deal I should say, judging by the kind of gabble one hears from political economists. But that's not what I was going to say. This flock of geese, of which my mother was proprietor, used to be caught in the early summer and they had to submit to a process called plucking. It hurt considerably, I judge, as they used to squawk and struggle under the operation. I know now of a pretty large flock of geese who are owned by an old lady named Usury. She catches these geese not only in early summer but at all seasons of the year, and plucks every feather which they can live without, and continue to grow more. The geese miss the feathers, but just when or how they are pulled out they don't seem to be able to discover. Here and there a goose makes an outcry and declares that old dame Usury has no right to steal the feathers which the geese have raised, but the old dame always calls it a demagogue, and can always get enough other geese to hiss it down. I used to feel sorry for my mother's geese, for it wasn't their fault. They couldn't help themselves, and somehow I think that if they had possessed the power of successful resistance they had enough intelligence to have used it. The big flock I've been speaking of have the means of preventing the plucking operation, but they don't seem to have enough intelligence to use it. Indeed, they are always ready to hold the one whose turn it is to be plucked, and thus help old dame Usury to amass feathers. The old dame is cute; of late years she has grown fat and lazy, and to save herself the trouble of plucking the geese herself she sets them fighting and plucking each other—she calls it playing competition—and in that way she gets all the feathers with scarcely an effort.—Labour Reformer.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

Annual Conference.—The Third Annual Conference of the Socialist League will be held at 13 Farringdon Road on Whitsunday, May 29th. Branches are particularly requested to attend to the following arrangements, if they wish to be represented at the Conference: (1) To at once send a return of their membership to the General Secretary. The representation will be based on this return. (2) Branches cannot be represented unless all monthly subscriptions are paid up to March 31 by May 1st. (3) Notices of motion, amendment to Rules, etc., must be sent in six weeks before the Conference—i.e., not later than April 18th. (4) Agenda Paper will be forwarded on May 2nd to Branches complying with these arrangements.

Anti-Coercion Demonstrations.—Voluntary help is wanted for the purpose of selling the 'COMMONWEAL' at Clerkenwell Green on Easter Sunday and at Hyde Park on Easter Monday. All who are willing to give assistance are requested to communicate at once with the Secretary at the League Offices.

Lessons in French.—Comrade Victor Dave is now giving lessons in French at the offices of the League on Tuesday evenings, at 8 o'clock. The lessons are free to members, and those desirous of profiting by them should send their names at once to the secretary of the League.

FRENCH CLASS will not meet until Tuesday April 19, in consequence of holidays.

Library.—The Library is open to members of the Socialist League and affiliated bodies. LIBRARY CATALOGUE, containing the Rules, 2d. LENA WARDLE and W. BLUNDELL are the Librarians.

Bound Volumes of 'COMMONWEAL' for 1886 can now be had. Price 5s. 6d.

General Meeting of London members adjourned to Monday April 18th.

Reports for 'Commonweal.'—Branch Secretaries are requested to make their reports as brief as possible, dealing with points of general interest as to the progress of the propaganda, rather than attempting to give the substance of the lectures, for which there is not space, even if it were otherwise desirable. Notices should be confined to purely business announcements and written separately. Reports and Notices should be addressed to the "Printer," and cannot be guaranteed insertion unless they reach the office by 2 p.m. on Tuesday.

Resolutions of Council.

I.—J. L. MAHON: "The Executive Council of the Socialist League endorse the actions of their comrade Mahon in Northumberland, and express their fullest confidence in his personal integrity and discretion."

II.—IRELAND: "That this meeting desires to record its indignation at the attempt by the present Government to continue the infamous and effete policy of Coercion in Ireland."

The Council Meeting will be held on Tuesday 12th, instead of Monday.

BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, March 30, Frank Kitz lectured on "The Russian Nihilists" to a large and attentive audience; good discussion followed. On Sunday, April 3, the members of this branch held their usual monthly business meeting, after which a social concert, attended by members' friends and others, was held, songs and recitations being given by several well-known comrades. Literature has sold well.—W. B. and T. E. W.

HOXTON.—Comrades Allman, Barker, and Pope addressed a large meeting at Hoxton on Sunday morning. Geo. Bernard Shaw (Fabian) lectured in the evening on "Some Illusions of Individualism." In the discussion that followed, the violent language used by some who think they are preaching Socialism was strongly condemned. The lecturer in his reply endorsed this condemnation, and said that such language hindered the spread of Socialism; he also urged the workers to combine to benefit their immediate condition, whilst working towards the complete change in the basis of society. These remarks were highly appreciated by the audience.—E. P.

MITCHAM.—On Sunday evening in our club-room, Harrison lectured on "The Progress of Human Nature." He traced the development of Society through its various stages up till the present time, when the progress of man had so far advanced that it enabled one part of the world to live on the production of the other. A warm discussion followed, which finally ended with a challenge to debate, the question being, "Does Socialism advance the Progress of Human Nature?" Affirmative, C. Harrison; negative, T. Gullup; to be held on Sunday evening, April 17th, at 8.30 p.m.—S. G.

NORTH LONDON AND MARYLEBONE.—Cantwell, Arnold, and Walker (S.D.F.) addressed a meeting of about 200 in Regent's Park. A middle-class man offered some opposition, which was easily disposed of. Sale of Commonweal fair.—D. J. N.

NORWICH.—On Sunday, we held a meeting on St. Mary's Plain at 11, addressed by comrade Morley, upon the definition of Socialism; afternoon, at 3, a good meeting in the Market Place, addressed by Slaughter and Crotch on "Ireland or Hell." Crotch spoke strongly upon the grievances of the Irish people. A resolution was carried condemning the Coercion Act and the rent grabbers of Ireland. At 7, Morley and Slaughter spoke to a meeting on the Agricultural Hall Plain, and were listened to very attentively. At 8, comrade Crotch lectured in the Gordon Hall upon Ireland; opposition was given by Slaughter, who contended from a Socialist point of view we ought to keep to our own doctrines, and not bother about Coercion Acts and other Parliamentary machinery. A challenge was offered by the lecturer upon this question of Parliamentary business, and accepted by Slaughter. The debate is fixed for next Monday night week. Collected for Defence, 3s. A meeting was held at St. Faith's, addressed by comrades Mills, Houghton, and White.—A. S.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday at one o'clock we held an open-air meeting on Jail Square. After Glasier had spoken, comrade William Morris addressed the meeting, his concise and vigorous statement of the labour question being listened to with great attention and sympathy by the audience. Comrades Rae and Belbin also spoke. In the evening in the Waterloo Hall, Morris lectured on "True and False Society" to an audience of 800 persons, a large number, when it is remembered that the charge for admission was 3d., 6d., and 1s. The meeting was a unique one. For the first time in the history of Scotland a Scottish M.P. took part in a political meeting held on a Sunday, and for the first time in the history of Britain a British M.P. presided at a Socialist meeting. Although disclaiming the title of a Socialist, Cunningham Graham expressed himself deeply in sympathy with the aims of Socialists, and paid a high tribute to the genius and zeal of William Morris. Morris's lecture was received with great enthusiasm by the audience, and a resolution in favour of Socialism was carried unanimously.

HAMILTON.—On Thursday evening, comrades Muirhead, McLean, and Glasier visited our meeting. Arrangements were made for Morris's forthcoming lecture. On Saturday evening, Glasier, addressed an open-air meeting at the New Cross.

LANCASTER.—We have now opened a club-room in Sun Street, believing the idea of having a rendezvous on the "home" principle to be good. A meeting was held on the Quay on Sunday morning, followed by good discussion.—L. Hall.

BARROW.—The distress here is very keen just now, and there have been some unemployed demonstrations, with the equivocal result of getting a few pence in "relief." Leonard Hall, of Lancaster, accordingly went over there on Saturday, and having been rebuffed by the salaried Liberal official, who was till Saturday supposed to be the friendly mediator between the 1500 unemployed and the powers that be, and with whom he conferred as to the advisability of a little Socialist agitation, he went accompanied by several working-men, who eagerly caught what is quite a new idea in Barrow, to the Market Place. Here a crowd of 500 quickly assembled, and Hall proceeded to address it until turned off by the officials. The ever increasing meeting then unanimously adjourned to the "Monument," where a large quantity of literature was distributed, and the speaker held the unqualified sympathy of the crowd for nearly two hours. Another meeting was held at night, numbering at least a thousand, who cheered every point scored. A discussion of much value ensued.

ANTI-COERCION DEMONSTRATIONS.

THE Merton Abbey Branch of the Socialist League will hold a Demonstration on Clerkenwell Green on Easter Sunday morning at 11.30. The speakers will come in a brake from Merton.

Hyde Park.—The SOCIALIST LEAGUE will have a Platform at the Great Demonstration in Hyde Park on Monday. Procession will start from Clerkenwell Green at Two o'clock. The League Office will be open from 12 o'clock. All members rally. Committee: Barker, Mainwaring, Sparling, and Utley.

ANTI-COERCION.

A PUBLIC MEETING will be held at FARRINGTON HALL, 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.,

On WEDNESDAY April 13, at 8 p.m.,

To protest against Coercion for Ireland.

Several speakers will address the meeting, and the following Resolution will be put:

"That this meeting expresses its deep abhorrence of the Coercive Measures levelled against the Irish nation, and is of opinion that, the Land Question being at the root of the Irish troubles, no political change can have permanent value unless accompanied by, or be in the direction of, the abolition of Landlordism in Ireland; and is further of opinion that the Irish nation should be left free to settle with the landlords without any restriction whatever from the English Parliament."

See handbills for further particulars.

NOTES.

In another column will be found an account of the great Anti-Coercion Demonstration held last Monday. However the privileged may sneer at "the howl of the holiday mob," as they call it, it means a great deal.

When the people have lost enough reverence for social fetishes to enable them to "howl" with delight at the prospect of their downfall—those fetishes are in a parlous condition, palliate it however you may!

Nor is it a cheering sign for the exploiters that the Flag of the Revolution was by no means the least popular, and that the nearer a speech came to the uncompromising revolutionary tone, the more it was applauded.

None know better than we how little actual help a great deal of cheering may sometimes mean, but it is at least certain that folk do not cheer what they regard with aversion, and the ever-increasing numbers who show by their presence and applause that revolutionary speakers voice their aspirations, show the effect our propaganda is producing.

Not less so does the enormous trouble taken by the scribes, whom the bourgeois employs to tickle his ear, to explain it all away for his satisfaction. Melancholy performances the explanations are!

As Irish landlords are robbers with a high hand, and the men who aid them are the most loathsome of parasites, it is natural that the Liberty and Property Defence League should be on their side. Landlord and lurcher are each asserting their individual liberty to do as they like at other people's expense. But our L.P.D.L. instructors suddenly forget "individual liberty" when it is the dispossessed who kick.

Let but a "crime" be committed, i.e., let an Irishman resist any one of the laws that Jus denounces wholesale, and lo! and look ye! away goes "individual autonomy" and all the rest of it.

Jus says in last issue, "We confess that if by some miscarriage of law, half-a-dozen ruffians who had earned a lighter penalty, accidentally incurred the heavier, we should have no tears to shed for them!"

It has been well nigh proved that the Holy Inquisition was run by men whose distorted souls could reconcile the hellish brutalities they practised with the brotherly love they preached. It is no harder to believe this than to credit the honesty of those who under guise of Liberty preach the rightfulness of robbery and the law of the strong hand.

I quote with strongest approval the words of Mr. Michael Davitt, who said recently: "That if the Coercion Bill should pass, every man who has helped to pass it into law, every official who is employed to carry its provisions into operation in Ireland against the lives of the Irish people, will become the avowed enemy of human liberty; and any man, woman, or child in this country (Ireland) who holds conversation or intercourse with those enemies of human liberty will become the direst and bitterest of the assassins of freedom and justice."

When a man takes to heart the Gospel of Greed, and like the old-time Individualist, Ishmael, sets his hand against all men, if haply the other men hound him forth into the desert he cannot logically complain, it is but part of his accepted risk.

If men recognised how dire was the injury inflicted upon Society by even one man who fights only "for his own hand," they would straightway brand him as Cain was branded, to be henceforth an outcast and wanderer, an example to all time.

THE IRISH QUESTION: THE UNION.

YEAR by year and generation after generation we have the Irish question always to the front. It is the question of the day, it is the question of the hour. Ireland, the Poland of the West, the victim of centuries of tyranny and oppression, the sport and play and the field for plunder of royal and aristocratic land-thieves. After centuries of misrule, after years of extermination and artificial famines, destroying millions of men, women, and children, Ireland is to-day full of faith, full of hope, full of energy. Who to-day despairs of Ireland—her resurrection and her regeneration?

It is not necessary here to refer to the horrors of the past. That may be done, if necessary, further on. I propose here to deal with the question of the union of Ireland with Great Britain. All that need be here stated is that the Union was not the result of the proved incapacity of the Irish to govern themselves, but the result of the base intrigues, the bloodiest acts of rapine, of murder and treason, of the English party, aided, protected, and rewarded by the English Government. The Union was never the wish of the Irish people. When it was passed 27 counties declared against it. Petitions against were signed by 707,000 people, and the petitions for the Union by only three thousand. ~~The Irish people, therefore, never accepted the Union, nor have the subsequent generations ever recognised it.~~ The people of Ireland, then, owe no allegiance to the Act of Union, and no obedience to the laws of the Imperial Parliament. What treason there is, is on the part of the Parliament, not on the part of the people.

Passing over the so-called rebellion of 1798, the result of treason on the part of the English Government, and the most bloodthirsty deeds on the part of its agents, we come to the year 1799. The proposed union of Great Britain and Ireland was rejected by both the Lords and Commons of Ireland. The notorious Castlereagh introduced his Place Bill, to enable him to buy up the seats of those willing to sell; the said seats to be filled with his nominees, to carry the Union. His terms were: 1st, To every nobleman who had seats, for each seat £15,000; 2nd, Those who had purchased their seats (common both in England and Ireland at that time) to be repaid from the Irish Exchequer the full amount; 3rd, All others who might be losers by the Union to receive full compensation; and, 4th, To carry out the above, £1,500,000 to be raised by taxes from the Irish people. (Wade, p. 639.)

What are we to-day to think of such rascality? Here the people were plundered to furnish the means for their own enslavement, and to reward those for their treason who might turn traitors. Grattan, referring to the means resorted to to carry the Union, said: "The catiffs of corruption were everywhere—in the lobby, in the streets, on the steps and at the door of every Parliamentary leader—offering titles to some, offices to others, corruption to all." (Howett, p. 274.) Corruption did its work. The Union of Great Britain and Ireland was accomplished—on paper. And that is the Union of which the Tories are proud; the Union in which the Hartingtons and the Chamberlains glory. The Union to support which we have had 86 Coercion Acts, and are still going on with Coercion, as though we are blind to the facts of history—dead to the spirit of the age.

But let us look at a few of the traitors, and at their reward for their treason. Mr. J. Bingham became Lord Clanmorris, and received £45,000. Lord Loftus became Marquis of Ely, and received £45,000. Lord Shannon, £45,000; Lord Belvedere, £45,000; Sir H. Langnishe, £45,000; Lord Boyle (son of Lord Shannon), £15,000. Mr. C. H. Coote became Lord Castlecoote, with £7,500; Mr. Rich Hare became Lord Ellesmore; Sir J. C. Blackwood became Lord Dufferin; Mr. H. M. Sandford became Lord Mountsandford; Mr. H. F. Prittie took the alias of Lord Dunally; and so the game went on. But there is one honourable man (?) who must not be forgotten. There was a crack poet of the name of Handcock, who in 1779 wrote some songs, and sang them, against the Union. In 1800 he wrote some songs in favour of the Union—and became Lord Castlemaine. Altogether, 20 of the traitors were raised to the peerage, 10 were made bishops, and 7 made judges. £1,275,000 was thus spent in the promotion of treason.

In addition to lump sums paid many of the rascals thus steeped to the lips in treason, they received very lucrative offices. Thus the Hon. de Stafford got £7,500 and £7,500 a year as paymaster of the foreign troops. Others got pensions for life, as in the case of Mr. W. Fortescue, £3,000 a year; Colonel B. Heneker, £3,500 a year. The seven who were raised to the Bench got £3,300 a-year each. As samples of the compensation paid for treason, two barristers received each £5,000, eight got £3,300 each, one, £1,200, fifteen £600 each, two, £500 each, two £400 each, and three £300 each. This was compensation for loss of practice through all Parliamentary business being removed from Dublin to London. When the traitors were thus rewarded no wonder that treason flourished. And yet that old man now in his dotage, the Hon. John Bright, talks of the treason of the Irish to-day! In the House of Commons, June 23, referring to the Chicago Convention, he said: "The conduct of that Convention, in so far as any persons taking part in it were subjects of the Queen, shows that it was a Convention of traitors. No other accurate name can be given to men who took part in such a transaction, and who are subjects of the Queen, than that they are rebels to the English Crown." Poor Johnny Bright! The Irish leaders rebels to the English Crown! Yes, there is a treason, a treason greater than treason to the Crown, namely, treason to the rights and liberties of the people. And in relation to this latter treason, the Right Hon. John Bright has long been a traitor.

The Union having been accomplished by treason, by wholesale rapine and murder, and by wide-spread corruption with an organised terrorism, have we done justice to Ireland since that time? No. The Union was accomplished by corruption, treason, and terrorism, and it has been maintained by the same means.

At the date of the Union did we give to Ireland the same ratio of representation as England in the Imperial Parliament? No. In 1801, the population of England and Wales was 10,471,000, and the number of members 489, or 1 to 21,660 of the population. In Ireland, the population was 5,393,000, members 100, or 1 to 53,230 of the population. By the Reform Bill of 1832, with a population of 13,091,000, England and Wales had 471 members, being 1 to 27,790 of the population. In Ireland the population was 8,175,000, number of members 105, or 1 to 77,880 of the population. If we come to a later period, 1877, we find the ratio of voters to population equally unjust. In England there was 1 elector to $9\frac{2}{5}$ ths of the population, Wales 1 to $9\frac{1}{10}$ th, Scotland 1 to 11, and in Ireland 1 to $23\frac{3}{4}$ ths. But even with that limited suffrage the late Mr. Isaac Butt could always command a majority of Irish votes for his motion on Home Rule, as the following table shows:

	Irish Vote.		British Vote.
	For.	Against.	For.	Against.
1874—March 20	48	26	288
—July 2	53	37	421
1876—	53	33	257
1877—April 24.....	54	35	262

And, of course, after the Reform Bill of 1885, Ireland returned 85 out of 103 pledged to Home Rule.

What, then, is the lesson before us? What are the historical facts with which we have to do? That the Union was accomplished by corruption, treason, rapine, and murder. That it has been maintained, and is now maintained by the same means. That the so-called Imperial Parliament never has possessed, and does not now possess, any legitimate right or authority to rule or govern the people of Ireland. That every attempt to govern a people against the will of the people, is treason, is an act of rebellion against the people. It is not a question of majorities or of minorities, but of the principle of equal liberty for every people, of right, of justice, of independence.

AN UNENVIABLE DISTINCTION.—The treasurer of the Women's Jubilee offering in Sheffield has forwarded to the central treasurer £526, 19s. 10d., that being the amount received up to the present. The subscribers number 14,933. It is stated that the Sheffield contribution is the largest sum yet forwarded from any borough in the kingdom, and the central treasurer warmly congratulates Sheffield on the result.

Why do people think Mr. John Bright's opinion on any subject under the sun worth knowing? Every now and again some one asks him what he thinks about Ireland, and he writes a letter, which is duly published, denouncing the Nationalists for their "sedition" and "disloyalty," and praising the good folk of Ulster for their "loyalty." What wretched cant all this is! Supposing a man doesn't care two straws for the British Constitution, and is "disloyal" to it accordingly, what then? Is he any the worse man for that? We have yet to learn that this precious constitution of ours is so sacred, that to meddle with it is impious; or that the maintenance of the Union between Great Britain and Ireland is part of the Divine economy.—Christian Socialist.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND STRIKE.—We sincerely hope that the pitmen in the Northumberland district will be successful in their present resistance to a proposed reduction of $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent upon wages, which at present—after deductions and short time—don't average over 12s. per week. We fear, however, that the system of irregular skirmishes—Yorkshire at one time, Lanarkshire at another, and now Northumberland—will only result in the defeat of the miners. A national combination, which shall include all the districts in Scotland and England, is what is wanted; and this combination might with a little patience organise a general demand which dare not be resisted, or if it was, then a general cessation of the production of coal for one week would settle the matter. The so-called Labour representatives in Parliament are a poor, mealy-mouthed lot, and the miners, especially in this and other struggles, have no reason to be grateful to the representatives they subsidise.—Pioneer (Glasgow).

EARLY COMMUNAL LIFE AND WHAT IT TEACHES.

It will be well, before describing the various forms of early communal life of which we know, to fix their place in the general development of property, and the area over which they have been known to exist. This will best be done by giving a general account of the development of property, and then expanding the periods which are characterised by communal life. In order that we may get as complete an idea of the ancient customs as possible, we will examine various systems of common property which may be found existing in countries that are still passing through the earlier stages of development. The great variety in the laws and customs of different nations which we see around us is only due in a slight degree to their having struck out on differing lines of development, much more largely is it due to the varying rates at which they have progressed.

This has been strikingly brought out in late years by investigations in several directions, and we are now constantly finding that special features, which we have been accustomed to consider as belonging exclusively to certain races, are in reality only peculiar to a given stage of development through which most races have to pass at one time or another. Thus, for example, Druidic stones had long been considered as peculiar to Celtic tribes, but the discovery of them in Holland, in Germany, Asia, and America, has shown that they extend to many races. In the same way it was thought until recently that village communities such as exist in Russia were exclusively characteristic of the Slavs, but more careful research has shown that similar institutions have at some time existed in Germany and ancient Italy, in Peru and China, in Mexico and India, among the Scandinavians and the Arabs. It is to the works of Emile de Laveleye on this subject that I am indebted for most of the facts given here, and I shall follow pretty closely the accounts of the various forms of communal life as given by him, drawing my own conclusions and lessons therefrom.

So long as primitive man wandered in the forest or on the prairie, and lived by hunting, fishing, and gathering wild fruits, there was very little idea of property, unless it was in the simple weapons which each one used. Tribes would fight to avenge imagined encroachments on their hunting-grounds, but they can hardly be said to have had any idea of property in the soil itself. In the pastoral age, which generally succeeded the savage and formed the next step in development towards civilisation, the idea of property in the soil is only slightly more defined, and in no case assumes the form of private or individual property. Very much the same idea of property as was understood by the pastoral tribes is expressed by two children out in the lanes gathering blackberries when one tells the other to "Get away from my bush!"

It was not till the land was temporarily put under cultivation that any definite idea of ownership grew up; and in the early part of the agricultural age, which gradually succeeded the pastoral, the arable land, the pasture, and the forest, were all farmed in common, the land remaining the undivided property of the clan. Subsequently the land was divided into parcels and distributed by lot, a mere temporary right of occupation being allowed to the individual; the soil returned to the tribe or clan, whose undivided property it still remained, for a redivision at intervals of a few years. This is the system still practised in many of the Russian village communities, and which was once the custom in Germany, as we learn from the Latin writer Tacitus.

By a new step of development the parcels remain in the hands of a patriarchal group of families living under the same roof or within the same enclosure, and working the land for the common good of the family. Such groups were customary in France and Italy in the Middle Ages, and are common in Serbia at the present time. This family ownership seems to be a later development than the village community, where the land is divided, each individual worker getting his share and working to some extent on his own account, but it is not easy to find the place in the long series of developments where one passes into the other; nevertheless, the family community forms a distinct step in development, in which the family have all things in common and cultivate the common domain as one farm, all being ruled by the patriarch or head of the family. In either case the community forms the unit of the state, it is the communes which are taxed and not the individuals.

In many cases the development towards individual ownership seems to have gone on from the village community without passing through the stage of family communes. This seems to have been the case with England, as we shall see further on. In Rome, on the other hand, the family life was very marked, and the authority of the patriarch continued long after the custom of communal property had fallen into disuse.

From the stage of village or family communities to that of individual ownership is a long period marked by very gradual progress. The earlier forms of individual hereditary property were tied down by many fetters of seigniorial rights or compulsory systems of cultivation; nor is land in this country yet free from an aristocratic form of family ownership, I mean the custom of entail; while in theory at least our law declares that no man can own absolutely any land, but can only own an estate in it.

I think we shall be better able to understand these stages in development if we examine the customs of those countries which are still passing through them. Omitting the Barbaric and Pastoral ages, in which the ideas of property were very vague, and about which a very fairly correct idea seems to be general, we come to the stage at which village communities were formed. The best example of this stage is perhaps to be found in Russia.

Before the emancipation of the Russian serfs in the year 1861 the lords and the Crown between them claimed to own all the lands as well as the serfs, and it was customary to allow each serf the usufruct of a certain portion of land upon which to grow his subsistence. In return for this he had to work three or four days a-week on the farms of the lord. The serfs usually also had the right of pasture on common lands, and of cutting firewood in the forests. At the emancipation the lords managed to get possession of the common-lands and forests, for the use of which they now extract a rent. The measure secured to the peasants about as much land as they had had the usufruct of before, and freed them from the necessity of working for the lords, imposing some annual payment in redemption of the land. In giving the extensive meadow-pastures and the forests to the lords a great injustice was committed, for it was entirely contrary to the traditions of the Russian people, according to which they should have remained the undivided property of the communes.

Before the emancipation, the serfs did not cultivate each his own patch individually, but each village formed itself into a commune, and the land was farmed in common, the product being divided. Now, however, it is customary for the commune to allot a share of land to each, either annually or at longer periods, though there are parts in which the older custom of farming in common is still practised, mostly on lands used for growing hay, where it is evidently most easy to manage.

The Emancipation Acts did not destroy the communes, but rather strengthened them, though causing them to go through some modifications. The commune, or mir, as it is called, is the constitutional atom of the Russian State; it forms a civil person, and on it is levied taxation, not on the individual members.

One of the chief features of countries passing through the communal stage is the constitution of the State out of units which are communes, not individual men as is the case with modern countries: the individual has no relation to the State except as a member of a commune. This important distinction changes the character of all legislation. Taxes are levied on the communes, and they are left to collect the individual shares in any way they choose; the commune or mir collectively is responsible for them, as also for the finding of recruits for the army. It enjoys complete self-government, and has almost despotic power over individuals composing it, with the right of judging minor offences. It alone holds the land collectively, and is responsible for rent due for any land which it may need to occupy beyond its own domain. The family is the basis of the mir, and holds all its belongings in common—house, garden, implements, stock, and movables of all descriptions—just as the land is held in common by the families united in a commune; and as no one family thinks of claiming a share of the land as private property, so no one individual lays claim to the private ownership of a share of the common belongings of the family. Each of these families is under the rule or direction of the head, or "ancient," as he is called, who has great authority over its members. The heads of families form a communal council, presided over by a mayor, whom they elect: he is chief magistrate, and generally represents the commune. Several such communes usually unite and form a larger commune or district, which contains from 300 to 2000 inhabitants. The mayors of the smaller form a council, under another elected president, for administering district affairs. They have to regulate matters connected with the taxes, recruits for the army, the making and maintaining of roads, or any other general communal affairs.

Stepniak tells us that the mayor originally was not the ruler of the mir, but its trusted servant; in their own language, "the mir's man." But since the emancipation, the Government have made the mayors into officials more after their own heart. From the year 1868 the mir has been gradually passing more under the control of the local superintendent of police, who, with his subordinates, usually behaves in a very high-handed and oppressive manner towards the inhabitants.

GETTING READY FOR 1889.—The Prince Regent of Bavaria has given orders that each of his sons is to learn a manual trade, and Prince Rupprecht, the heir to the throne, has become a turner.

The Eureka, California, Western Watchman says that the Indians on the Puyallup reservation, Washington territory, will organise an assembly of the Knights of Labour.

THE GHOUL OF GOLD.—"Be content, poor men, you were made to be slaves." Mr. Jay Gould was interviewed on the first of March and had this to say: "After all, after all, what does any man get in this world except something to eat and something to wear and somewhere to live. The poor man ought to be the happiest man. Wealth brings cares without compensation. A man gets rich and then he's a slave. Very mistaken ideas exist on this subject." Yes,—that is all you get, sir, except horses and yachts, and special cars and wine and pictures, music and books, and such other little things. But do you know that the men and women who make all these things do not even get enough to eat? That they have nothing but rags to wear? That they have nowhere to sleep, but must always be moving on? And do you know that the reason they are thus horribly miserable is because you have THIEVED your wealth from them? This wretch that talks to us so flippantly, that affects to despise what he has wrung from our very bones and blood, this sly and scheming rascal whose hands are red with the blood of the poor that his hirelings shot down in St. Louis only a year ago, this hypocritical villain DARES to tell us how to be HAPPY.—Labor Enquirer.

"GOD FORGIVE THEE—I NEVER CAN!"

(ANONYMOUS. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

THREE shots ring out above the trench behind the frowning fortress wall,
And whoso cares to look may see another rebel's carcase fall;
The monks who wait on death draw near, and bow the head, and bend the knee,
And murmur low in earnest prayer their solemn-sentenced Litany,
"God have mercy upon him!"

"Sharp sudden death has surely shut a foul blaspheming mouth to-day,
Come ye and carry quick the corpse of this dead rebel hound away;
There where his widow weeping waits now make ye haste and carry him—
He should have hung on gallows high, and rotted slowly limb by limb,
But our Prince has had mercy."

So speaks the king's chief murderer.—The times are really not so bad,
A sword is at the scoundrel's side, the slave in uniform is clad;
All silently they take the corpse that throbbed but now with lusty life,
And carry that dead rebel down, and give him to his widowed wife.
God have mercy upon her!

Nay, woman, wherefore dost thou mourn? nay, why so sorely, wife, dost weep?
Two sturdy urchins at thy side, lo, here thou still hast leave to keep;
Lo, there thine aged father sits, the blood-hounds yet have left him free;
They might have stamped in ruins out thy whole rebellious house and thee,
But the Prince has had mercy.

Alas! on her dead husband's name his widow can do nought but call,
Though half-distraught with bitter woe on those two boys her eyes may fall
The father sitting at her side can only cry, "My son, my son!"
Then murmurs low, and grinds his teeth ere half the solemn words be done,
"God have mercy upon him!"

On whom should God his mercy show? He does not speak the words again,
And if of his dead son he thinks or of his Prince 'tis hardly plain.
Yet do we clench the fist in prayer, or do we gently fold the hands?
Meseemeth it, that eldest boy the old man's meaning understands.
God have mercy upon him!

A boy with curly head it is who scarce has seen his fourteenth year;
He puts his childish toys away, and stands beside his father's bier;
A child he stands beside the dead, but 'tis a Man that turns away;
He knows his grandsire's meaning well, and loud and clearly doth he say,
"God have mercy upon him!"

The quiet eve draws on, and shuts in lengthening shadow all the street;
Soft songs are heard; 'tis now the time when happy lovers love to meet;
Hark! through the softer sound of song there echoes wild a scream of pain,
And curious crowds from far and near come thronging through the streets amain—
"God have mercy upon him!"

Yes, "God have mercy!" is the cry on all men's lips; for bathed in blood
Lo, there the king's chief-murderer lies—the stroke was strong, the aim was good!
Ye waste your words, no questions now will him that did the deed reveal;
This mouth is dumb for evermore, 'tis death's pale hands his lips that seal.
God have mercy upon him!

But there beside his father's grave beneath the gathered gloom of night,
E'en now in prayer there kneels a boy whose voice is firm, whose cheeks are white,
"Dear father, I have ta'en revenge; sleep softly in thy quiet grave;
Three inches of my sharp steel knife clear through thy murderer's heart I drave;
God have mercy upon him!"

"My brother soon will bigger be; the time shall not be far away,
When we will serve the Master's self as I have served his slave to-day.
Dear father, when they struck thee down, the tyrant's blood-hounds little knew
That he, with one brave rebel slain, henceforth would have to deal with two.
God have mercy upon him!"

It is a plain fact that by hard labour no man is able to amass wealth; and it is no less a glaring fact that those who do amass wealth produce nothing at all; they simply appropriate the products of others. The question now to be solved is: How to readjust the laws of distribution so that every worker would get his due portion of the wealth he has helped to create. But does the capitalist party endeavour to honestly grapple with the difficulty? Do they inquire into it on the principles of right and wrong? Certainly not. Expediency is their guide. The problem they try to solve is how to blind the masses, how to pacify discontent, and how to so arrange matters that the wholesale robbery can be carried on in the future without incurring detection by those who are to be robbed.—Our Commonwealth.

THE SOCIALISTS AND THE POLICE.—On Sunday afternoon the Socialists assembled in great numbers in Hyde Park, near the Marble Arch. This demonstration was held in response to a handbill signed by John Williams, headed "Coercion in England," and at its close Mr. Frank Connolly suggested that the spectators should all leave by the Marble Arch, so that they might be witnesses of any unprovoked attack by the police. As soon as the crowd reached the outside, about a hundred police, who had been secreted inside the structure, rushed out and began an attack on all who came in their way. Williams was flung underneath an omnibus, and on his remonstrance was "throttled" and taken off to the police-station, surrounded by mounted constabulary, who rode upon the pavement a distance of nearly a quarter of a mile, throwing down several ladies and gentlemen who were walking by. In the meantime the police near the Marble Arch drew their truncheons and used them indiscriminately. Nine persons in all were arrested. Williams was charged and locked up, bail being refused.—Daily Chronicle.

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s. six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NOTICE TO ALL SOCIALISTIC NEWSPAPERS.—The Commonweal will be regularly sent to all Socialistic Contemporaries throughout the world, and it is hoped that they on their side will regularly provide the Socialist League with their papers.

GODWIN'S 'POLITICAL JUSTICE.'

AMONG those political philosophers of the eighteenth century whose speculations heralded the growth of Socialism, none, perhaps, was more remarkable than William Godwin, the husband of the famous Mary Wollstonecraft and the father-in-law of Shelley. His great work on 'Political Justice' was published in 1793 and created a marked sensation, "carrying," as De Quincy describes it, "one single shock into the bosom of English society, fearful but momentary." The whole book is still well worth reading; but the part which is of most interest at the present time is that which deals with the question of property, treated from a distinctly Communistic point of view, though the remedies suggested by Godwin are not such as commend themselves altogether to modern Socialists.

Premising that the distribution of comfort should be as far as possible equal, and that every man has a right to the means of improvement and pleasure, provided always that he respects the equal right of his neighbour, Godwin points out in clear and powerful language the terrible evils that result from the present system of social inequality. "However great and extensive," he says, "are the evils that are produced by monarchies and courts, by the imposture of priests, and the iniquity of criminal laws, all these are imbecile and impotent compared with the evils that arise out of the established administration of property." Foremost among the disastrous effects to which Godwin refers are the "servile and truckling spirit" which is brought home to every house in the nation by the contrast between wealth and poverty; the wide-spread demoralisation caused by the perpetual spectacle of injustice, and the pernicious love of money-making thus engendered in men's hearts; the immense amount of vice produced "by one man's possessing in abundance that of which another man is destitute"; the encouragement given by large accumulations of property to the warlike ambition of aggressive governments; and, above all, the loss of those intellectual enjoyments which might be shared by all mankind, but are now monopolised by the few. "Accumulated property treads the powers of thought in the dust, extinguishes the sparks of genius, and reduces the great mass of mankind to be immersed in sordid cares, beside depriving the rich of the most salubrious and effective motives to activity." Elsewhere in his 'Enquirer,' written a few years later than 'Political Justice,' Godwin insists strongly on the fact that the rich are in reality the pensioners and dependants of the poor. "It is a gross and ridiculous error," he says, "to suppose that the rich pay for anything. There is no wealth in the world except this—the labour of man.

What is misnamed wealth is merely a power, vested in certain individuals by the institutions of society, to compel others to labour for their benefit." Knowing this, Godwin could not fail to see the hypocrisy of that blatant system of "charity" which is one of the most unhealthy features of our modern pseudo-philanthropy; and he speaks with bitter irony of this "accommodating doctrine," which enables the rich "to make a show of generosity with what is not truly their own." This system he describes as one of clemency and charity, but not of justice. "It fills the rich with unreasonable pride by the spurious denominations with which it decorates their acts, and the poor with servility by leading them to regard the slender comforts they obtain, not as their incontrovertible due, but at the good pleasure and grace of their opulent neighbours."

In the course of his remarks on property Godwin anticipated some of the common and fallacious objections so often made to the possibility of a Socialistic State. He points out the folly of the talk of our "sinking into idleness" when the stimulus of gain is withdrawn, whereas, even now, the love of distinction is seen to be so powerful a motive, and would become still more so in a reformed society. He laughs at Malthus's warnings about the danger of excessive population, since "three-fourths of the habitable globe are now uncultivated," and the difficulty of a population-limit would not arise for many centuries to come. He is at one with modern Socialists not only in his impeachment of the cruelty and folly of the commercial and competitive system, but also in his desire to substitute a new and purer state. When, however, he proceeds to indicate the methods by which he would secure the desired reform, it will be found that his doctrines are no longer in accordance with the Socialist policy, but are rather precursory of the opinions held by Comte and the Positivist school.

In the first place, the system advocated by Godwin is essentially a voluntary one. He believes that there is but one mode of improving society, which consists in "rendering the cession by him that has to him that wants, an unrestrained and voluntary action." He is a thoroughgoing Individualist in his dislike of all government and all action of society in its corporate capacity, except for the suppression of bodily force. He believes that the rich can be induced to be unselfish by what he calls "illumination of the understanding and love of distinction," and to these two instruments he would accordingly entrust the whole process of regeneration. So great is his dread of all popular violence and the massacres which, as he says, are "the too possible attendant upon revolution," that he strongly deprecates the use of any kind of force, or of any agitation that could possibly lead to the adoption of forcible measures by the people. He seems entirely to have overlooked the consideration that there are more methods than one in which "force" can be applied, and that the wealthy classes, who have the policeman, the soldier, the gaoler and the hangman, at their beck and call, are in reality in their exploitation of the working-classes under cover of a legal form, employing the very force, ay, and the very massacre, which he considered, rightly or wrongly, to be the worst of all possible calamities.

But though Godwin thus failed to grasp the full significance of the problem with which Socialism has set itself to deal, all Socialists must honour him for his noble enthusiasm in the cause of humanity, and his unanswerable exposure of the folly and wickedness of the capitalist system. In the very choice of the word justice as the title of his philosophical treatise, he instinctively struck a true note, and showed that he had correctly divined that this principle of just dealing between the State and the individual, and between man and man, was destined to become the crucial question of nineteenth century politics.

SOCIALIST DEMONSTRATIONS.

THE fortieth anniversary of the great Chartist demonstration was signalled on Monday in London by the biggest meeting in Hyde Park ever held there, and in many parts of the country in a similar manner. All the meetings were held in support of kindred principles to those which animated the Chartists, and at each of them the Socialist League was prominently present.

HYDE PARK.

The Hyde Park meeting was called together to protest against the Coercion Bill (the 87th of its kind in 86 years!) now introduced by the Government. We have said that it was the largest ever held there, but this conveys no clear idea of its gigantic size; the reports of the bourgeois press of course vary and contradict one another in their usual stupid fashion, but even from them it is clear that over 150,000, probably near 200,000, persons were present in support of the meeting; while the lookers-on, all of whom seemed in sympathy, were quite beyond all hope of computation. All this in spite of its being Bank Holiday. In fact, the day was a distinct advantage, inasmuch as the rowdy and snob elements were conspicuous by their absence. There was absolutely no horseplay or levity of any kind; every one apparently felt the greatness of the occasion, and, if one may judge from scattered remarks, was deeply impressed by the vastness and earnestness of the assemblage. From one side of the park to the other there stretched a line of people, hundreds deep, intently listening to what was said, marking with frequent deep-toned cheers their approval of it all. One of the morning papers admits that of the seventeen platforms, that of the League was much the most numerously attended, while the Socialists who spoke at several other platforms proved by their reception that they were, at the very least, as much in sympathy with the audiences as the most favourite politician who spoke. Many members of the different Radical clubs wore the red conspicuously; while one, the North Camberwell, sent a strong Socialist Section with a distinct banner. Along the route of the procession the Socialist League banner was hailed with cheers, and in the park, as the late comers marched past, it was again and again saluted with hearty cheering. During the return, also, it was greeted as an evident favourite with the workers, one Irish band breaking off the tune it was playing, and starting the "Marseillaise" as it came by.

The proceedings at the Socialist League platform were opened by H. A. Barker, who said that of all the bodies represented there the Socialists had been the very first to uphold the cause of Ireland. Again and again they had met there and elsewhere to protest against the legalised wrong and robbery carried on in the name of the English people. Now the whole body of the people was waking up, and the Socialists came there to continue the agitation and assist with all their might in the work they had taken in hand. H. H. Sparling followed. He said the real thing that animated the resistance to Home Rule was that the parasite class felt their hold upon the people was being loosened, and they were making the last desperate stand in defence of monopoly. It had been said by one of the landlord crew that their "rights" were worth fighting for. If the "right" to be a thief was worth fighting for, was it not still more worth fighting and working for the people's freedom? W. C. Wade showed the falsity of the bourgeois parrot-cry of "law and order," and urged that no true order could be looked for till the law was wholly expressive of the people's will. S. Mainwaring spoke of the plain duty incumbent upon all working men to unite for their own freedom, irrespective of nationality or creed, and paying no attention to the ordinary political parties, who were all tarred with the same brush. Bernard Shaw said that if England had the right to rule the Irish against their will, any foreign nation had the same right to rule the English. D. J. Nicoll spoke of the lies told by the bourgeois press about both Irish and Socialists. The people were finding out these lies, and such meetings as this were the result. Eleanor Aveling, as the only woman speaker on this occasion, spoke of the grand work done for Ireland by its women. At home they helped to support the rent agitation, to resist the forces sent against them, and stand side by side with their men in all phases of the struggle. Abroad they worked unceasingly for Ireland, and from them came great part of the money that enabled the war against oppression to be so well carried on. There were thousands of women present in the park, and although they were not so loudly heard as the men, they were just as much in earnest. Edward Aveling said the battle was not merely between the landlord and tenant in Ireland, it was between the exploiter and his victim the world over. As international knowledge spread, national barriers were disappearing, and the workers were becoming solid and united in their effort to destroy monopoly. T. E. Wardle alluded to the close alliance between the Irish and English democracies, and the effect it must inevitably produce.

The following special resolution was passed at the League meeting, as also was that officially recognised and put forth by the promoters of the demonstration:

"That this meeting expresses its deep abhorrence of the coercive measures levelled against the Irish people, and is of opinion that, the Land Question being at the root of the Irish troubles, no political change can have permanent value unless accompanied by, or be in the direction of, the abolition of Landlordism in Ireland; and is further of opinion that the Irish people should be left free to settle with the landlords without any restriction whatever from the English Parliament."

It may be noted that over 1000 Commonweal were sold during the meeting, and many thousands of leaflets distributed there and on the route.

At the Social-Democratic Federation platform, where Michael Davitt, amongst others, spoke, a special resolution was also carried.

THE SOCIALISTS AND THE MINERS.—THE GREAT DEMONSTRATION IN NORTHUMBERLAND.

A MASS meeting of the Northumberland miners and other workmen was held on Easter Monday, at Horton, near Cramlington, for the purpose of forwarding the cause of Socialism.

The men attending the meeting were, for convenience sake, separated into two divisions. The first contingent assembled at Blyth, and included the men from the surrounding neighbourhood. They were addressed in the market place by Wm. Morris and J. L. Mahon, after which a move was made towards Horton. The second division congregated at Dudley Colliery, and was made up principally of miners from Burradon, Seaton Burn, and Dinnington. J. Fielding delivered a brief address, and the men then marched to Horton. Each division, during its progress, was increased by the addition of a number of miners from the villages through which it passed.

The demonstration was held in a spacious field in the parish of Horton, easy of access to people living in the large group of colliery villages that lie around. The place is within comfortable walking distance of Cramlington, Blyth, Bebside, Bedlington, Newsham, New Delaval, Dudley, Burradon, Seaton Burn, Dinnington, and numerous other localities. The commencement of the meeting was fixed for two o'clock, but long before that hour crowds of people began to find their way, singly and in groups, from all directions; and, before the arrival of the processions from Dudley and Blyth, the field was occupied by a considerable crowd of people. The division from Dudley and Annitsford, with its banner and band, was the first to arrive; and, twenty minutes later, the Blyth contingent, which also was preceded by a banner and band, came into the field. It had originally been intended that speeches should be delivered from two platforms, but the promoters decided to mass the people into one great meeting, over which J. Fielding presided. A rolley was provided, and when A. K. Donald, J. Fielding, H. M. Hyndman, J. L. Mahon, and William Morris took up their positions upon it, they were loudly cheered. When the proceedings began, there could not have been fewer than nine or ten thousand people standing and sitting around the extemporised platform. These included several women, who appeared to take no less interest in the proceedings than their husbands and brothers.

The Chairman, who was received with cheers, said he was glad to see such a gathering of sturdy North-Country men. It was quite evident that the workers in this part of the country thought that their only hope of getting the full reward of their labour was to combine so as to show the capitalists they had got the power, and would no longer be ground down as they had been in the past.

J. L. Mahon moved:—

"That we call the attention of the workers throughout the country to the infamous attempt of the capitalists to reduce the starvation wages we have been receiving for the past few years, and we demand the practical help of all workers in our present struggle."

He said people were not aware of the position and the fight in which the miners had been engaged. From the lying concoctions, compiled by Government statisticians, people were led to believe that the mining population were very well off indeed, and that there was no reason for discontent on their part. He complained of the indifference of the labour representatives in Parliament. They were all here when they had a picnic, but they were all away when they were wanted to do anything useful. (A Voice: "That's true," and cheers.) The great obstacles that stood in the way of the progress of the working-men were—first, the apathy, and very often downright duplicity, of those who pretended to be the leaders of labour; and, secondly, the want of education in the great economical questions. The Socialists are trying to make England a place where every man could get a living who worked for it, and where no man should be allowed to loaf about without doing any work at all. (Cheers.)

Comrade W. Morris seconded the resolution in a stirring speech, which roused the utmost enthusiasm. The resolution was carried unanimously, with three cheers for the strike.

H. M. Hyndman proposed the following resolution:

"That, seeing the hopelessness of getting the just reward of labour under the present system of competition, monopoly, and wage-slavery, we pledge ourselves to organise for a free labour system, in which the land, capital, and all industrial resources shall be owned by the community, and used in co-operation for the good of all."

This was seconded by A. K. Donald, and carried with one dissentient.

A resolution condemning the Coercion Bill was moved by J. L. Mahon and seconded by H. M. Hyndman, and carried unanimously. Another resolution was passed protesting against the clauses in the new Mines Regulation Bill with regard to the employment of women and girls above ground.

The meeting concluded with cheers for the Social Revolution.

A meeting was held in the evening at Ryton Willows, J. L. Mahon presiding, when addresses on Socialism were given by W. Morris and A. K. Donald. A resolution was unanimously passed condemning the Coercion Bill.

WILLIAM MORRIS AT GLASGOW, HAMILTON, PAISLEY, AND COATBRIDGE.

On Wednesday evening, April 6th, on his return from lecturing at Edinburgh and Dundee, William Morris met the members of the Glasgow Branch and a few friends at tea. Over fifty persons were present. After tea Morris read the speech of John Ball, after which the evening was spent in songs, recitations, and speeches. A short report was given by the secretary, and Morris made a brief speech.

On Thursday, Morris lectured at Hamilton, under the auspices of the Hamilton Branch, on "Socialism and the Labour Struggle," McMunn in the chair. The meeting was not so large as was expected, owing probably to the miners being so much dispirited with the result of their recent strike. Those present, however, were entirely sympathetic, and a resolution in favour of Socialism, moved and seconded by the Secretary and President of the Hamilton miners, was carried unanimously.

On Friday, Morris lectured on "Socialism, the Way and the Means," at Paisley, Provost Cochrane in the chair. There were about 300 present. The Provost introduced Morris in a very sympathetic speech. After the lecture a resolution in favour of Socialism was carried unanimously. Names were then given in with the view of forming a Branch of the League at Paisley. At an after meeting, which was of a very hearty description, arrangements were made for this purpose.

On Saturday afternoon, Morris, in company with several members of the Glasgow Branch, held an open-air meeting at the Cross, Coatbridge. Morris, Glasier, and Downie spoke to a crowd of about 200 persons. Some objections were offered in a very fair spirit by one of the audience, to which Morris replied.

On Sunday, Morris spoke to an audience of 1000 to 1200 on Glasgow Green, making a marked impression on the crowd. Glasier, Rae, Curran, and Stewart (S.D.F.) also spoke. A resolution in favour of Socialism was carried with only three dissentients, while one against coercion was carried unanimously. The meeting closed with three hearty cheers for the Social Revolution. Socialism is getting a strong hold in Scotland, and the local men are confident of the future harvest for their present work.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

THE ASHTON WEAVERS.—The majority of the Ashton-under-Lyne weavers, who have been on strike for eighteen weeks, have returned to work upon terms which give a slight advance in wages.

THE STRIKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—The coalowners of Northumberland having declined to accept the proposals for arbitration, the executive committee representing the men on Monday resolved to issue new ballot-papers, enabling the men to decide whether the committee be empowered to make the best terms for a settlement of the dispute, or whether the strike shall be continued.

STRIKE OF SCARBOROUGH FISHERMEN.—On smacks where donkey-engines are employed to raise the trawl beam and net, the men have been paying 5 per cent. on original cost of engine, the master finding oil, etc. The men are now required to pay 6½ and to provide oil. On Saturday last they refused to go to sea on these terms.

GLASGOW.—STRIKE OF POWER-LOOM WEAVERS.—A meeting of the weavers in the employment of Mr. John M'Pherson, power-loom cloth manufacturer, West Street, Calton, who are now on strike, took place on Monday forenoon in M'Keehnie Street Hall for the purpose of considering what action should be taken in the present dispute. The weavers, 150 in number, are on strike in consequence of the employer having increased the length of pieces of cloth without giving a corresponding increase of wages. The employes are now asked to weave 66 yards of cloth for the same amount of money as they were hitherto paid for pieces of 56 yards. "This," added one speaker, "was a fly way of reducing wages." It was stated that a deputation had waited on Mr. M'Pherson, but no agreement was made.

THE MINES REGULATION BILL.—A great demonstration of the miners of Nottinghamshire was held on Friday afternoon, 8th inst., on Bulwell Forest, on the outskirts of Nottingham. Alderman Cropper presided, and amongst the speakers were Mr. Broadhurst, M.P., and Mr. Flynn, M.P. More than 6000 persons were present. Mr. Broadhurst, speaking to a resolution urging all miners in the county to join the Nottingham Miners' Association, said they had had time to look into the Mines Regulation Bill of the Government, and to find many defects in it. The check-weighmen's clause would have to be absolutely altered before it would be satisfactory to the miners of the United Kingdom. The Bill would still leave in the hands of the manager of the mine the power to discharge the check-weighman for anything which he might be pleased to call bad conduct. The position of miners' families was not much altered by the Bill. Indeed, he was not sure whether it had not rather been weakened than strengthened. It was a crime against unborn children that women should be allowed to work at the heavy employment of collieries. They must also insist on an amendment raising the age of boys working in mines from ten to twelve. There were many other points in the Bill which would require the attention of miners' representatives.

"THE FOX AND THE GESE."—We have stated before that the convictions of employers for breaches of the Factories Acts have now become so common that we have ceased to take special notice of them. They are not, however, half so common as they ought to be, and last week we had another example of the reason why. A firm of manufacturers in business near Oswaldtwistle were summoned by Mr. Hamilton in twelve cases for working overtime on March 23. According to the inspector, the engine was not stopped until six minutes after the time for stopping for breakfast. The magistrates fined the firm £1 each in three cases, and costs in the rest. That means that in nine cases no conviction ensued further than what carried costs. We should like to know how many more cases could have been obtained at this firm and at this particular breakfast time. The inspector had only taken the names of twelve, so that we may reasonably assume he could have obtained more. In the face of this, nine out of twelve cases are practically dismissed. We don't particularly blame either the inspector or the firm. We can even to some extent excuse the magistrates, as some of them may be the next "on turn." What we blame most is the system which allows magistrates such a wide discretion. The penalties ought not only to be heavier, but ought to be inflicted in every case. A dozen cases brought forward out of perhaps a possible hundred or more, and then three fines out of a dozen is a travesty of justice which would not be tolerated for a moment if workmen were the defendants. The system will last just as long working people allow themselves to attach more importance to other people's business than their own.

"INDIVIDUALISTS."—Of all the disagreeable things connected with industrial strikes, that of having to contend with those who are ever ready to sell themselves for a temporary gain, and act the part of what is best described and understood among workmen as knobsticks, is the most distasteful to trades' union committees and officers of any they have to cope with. There are a numerous class of persons who are always on the look-out for securing subsistence without having to work for it, and as numbers of such persons are to be found in every town and country village, they are sure to put in an appearance when a labour dispute arises, and unless liberally dealt with in the shape of pecuniary grants, or put on strike pay along with the strikers, they are sure to cause trouble and assist the capitalist to defeat the cause of labour. The trades' unions are compelled to spend thousands of pounds annually in giving support to persons who never contributed a penny to their funds, and never will do, and this money has to be spent to buy over dishonest men, and stop them from injuring the cause for which true and good workmen have occasionally to strike. We know of several individual strikes now pending, and those connected with them are having to pay these persons to keep away from the place of the strike, and if no strike existed they would be far away from the locality, and that without any subsidising whatever, as such characters don't really want work, but only the money which they can make by threatening to go to work if it be denied them. Employers who are willing to put up with incompetent workmen during times of labour disputes, are only too ready to avail themselves of the services of unprincipled tramps to assist them in defeating their workmen. Hence it is that these men have to be arranged with, or the chances of the real strikers are greatly endangered. As the means to obtain employment become more restricted, and this is yearly taking place in most trades, the evil to which we allude will increase in intensity, and it will be most difficult to conduct an individual strike to a successful issue unless there be complete organisation in the branch of trade affected by the dispute.—Cotton Factory Times.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

SYDNEY, March 5.—THE SYDNEY UNEMPLOYED.—THREAT OF RIOT.—Claims for relief made upon the Government by the unemployed are increasing. To-day 235 tickets, from two to four meals each, were issued to married men, and 1,355 to single men. A representative of the unemployed waited upon the Immigration Officer to-day, and stated that he was deputed by 2,000 men out of work to say that they must have bread or work, and would not accept less than 6s. for a day's labour. If their requirements were not met the representative added that the Government must take the consequences. The Premier on being advised of the covert threat gave directions to the police to hold themselves in readiness to deal promptly with any act of riot on the part of the unemployed.

FRANCE.

MEHUN-SUR-YEVRE.—The strike of the porcelain-makers here still continues and subscription-lists are opened for the benefit of the families of those on strike.

At the Conseil des Prud'hommes last week, an employé in the service of a wine-merchant sued his master for damages on account of his being lamed in the hand in his service. He was of course made to pay. Too cheaply do the workers hold their bodies at; this young man was content to estimate the life-long damage to his hand at about £2, the fee of the doctor who attended him!

ITALY.

A correspondent of the Fascio Operaio, writing from Diano Marina, between which town and Mentone the late earthquake was principally disastrous, declares that the distributions of the Relief Committee were disgracefully partial, and in short here as elsewhere "the system of favouritism triumphed;" and while great numbers of the poor rendered utterly destitute received nothing, landowners and householders were favoured with money and goods, and had the face to accept these unfair gifts rightfully due to others whose state clamoured for help. The Relief Fund, was in fact, very badly managed, for Ventimiglia, which suffered but little, if at all, received abundant assistance. In one commune three-fourths destroyed by the shocks rice was sent in sufficient quantity to serve for one distribution; out of this the mayor and several others of "comfortable estate" did not blush to take their share! At Diano Marina the wood and materials sent for the erection of some sort of shelter for the houseless was voted for the use of the church instead, a grim piece of mockery of the consolations and comfort of religion!

SPAIN.

VALENCIA.—The strike of printers at Valencia still continues. They are receiving aid in money from the various labour-associations in the districts where the Labour Party or the Socialist Party hold their ground.

PORTUGAL.

PORTO.—An important strike is announced here among the workers at the tobacco factories. The "hands" number about three thousand. Numerous arrests have been made by the authorities, and it is said the progress of Socialism is somewhat marked in the town.

SOUTH PLACE DEBATES.

"E pur si mouvo"—or in other words, "We still gee"—would have been a fair comment by any one who attended the four debates just concluded. It is not every Sunday afternoon that the capacity of South Place Institute is taxed as it was in March. The ball was opened, as all balls should be, by one of each sex; Annie Besant and Corrie Grant debating on the proposition, "That the existence of classes who live upon unearned incomes is detrimental to the welfare of the community, and ought to be put an end to by legislation." Each debate was cut up into four speeches—twenty minutes to each speaker, and then ten minutes ditto.

Mrs. Besant opening, filled her twenty minutes in her usual logical-cum-emotional manner, cutting out the work for Corrie Grant in a style which noticeably knocked his logic completely out of his head. From his previous record as a somewhat go-ahead Radical, the leader of the last forlorn-hope attack on Woodstock, I had quite a high expectation of what he would be able to do; but the way he brought to mind the old chop-logic story about the horse-chestnut and the chestnut horse upset me. Mrs. Besant strongly insisted on the axiom that all wealth was the product of labour; Grant was bold enough to hazard an attempt to prove the reverse way of using the words was also correct. He was a poor exhibition while making the attempt, but when Mrs. Besant took his logic in hand it was a caution to snakes. Another droll exhibition was the Individualist trying to show what would be the result of any attempt upon the right to hoard up £10,000 in gold for the purpose of drawing upon later in life. "Would a man be committing a crime if he attempted to burgle some of the £10,000 in gold and would the saver-up be committing a crime if he killed the burglar who attempted to burgle what the saver-up had committed a crime in saving?" This may seem a somewhat involved sentence, especially as I purposely do not point it in any way, but it is not one whit more involved or muddled than the matter put before the audience as serious argument. This was immediately shown, by a few figures given by Mrs. Besant as to the total amount of what is called money existent, and by her asking whether it was seriously suggested that the wealth-owners proposed to store their railways and canals, etc., etc., in their back parlours so as to preserve their wealth to themselves; and if that were done, how much wealth would it really be?

Mrs. Besant handled her subject in her mingled fashion of hard logical argument and intense sympathy with the suffering she so emotionally painted once or twice, but she seemed sadly fatigued, or I am satisfied she would have handled her antagonist in the much severer fashion which he laid himself open to. I was completely disappointed in Grant, for I had somehow formed a very much higher opinion of his power than he exhibited. I should not feel very well satisfied with my counsel if in a tight case no better defence could be made for me by him than was made re Individualism.

The second of the series was between G. Bernard Shaw and Rev. F. W. Ford, on the proposition, "That the welfare of the community necessitates the transfer of the land and existing capital of the country from private owners to the State."

Not so exactly punctual as on the previous Sunday did the proceedings begin; but Shaw wasted no time when started in stating his case, which he did neatly and lucidly.

Mr. Ford, a small dark man, wearing glasses, rather long hair, a voice and mannerism of exaggerated distinctness, which recalls Allanson Picton, did not suggest a very go-ahead sort of debate, but if not the most capable debater he was certainly the most energetic and voluble. I am inclined to the opinion that as a debater he was much the strongest, he certainly shirked awkward places the least of any of his fellows; if he did not solve serious doubts he made a fairly bold attempt to grapple with some of them, which is very much more than any of the others did.

At the start he wasted some time in the usual complimentary gush as to Mr. Shaw and his friends "having only the interests of the workers at heart," etc., and so forth. This sort of talk may be all very well in the pulpit, but when a tolerably plain proposition, covering a wide amount of debatable matter, has to be dealt with by two speakers in sixty minutes, I make bold to suggest that the too often insincere gush which is poured out had better be taken as said, and that the points at issue had much better be attacked right away. I do not for one moment suggest that sentiment and emotion is to be banished with political economy to Saturn, but I am sure it is often introduced to lead off the scent and cover retreat.

Mr. Ford led off by asserting that the whole of Mr. Shaw's argument was based on a fallacy. Cela va sans dire, according to Individualists when replying to Socialists.

He scored one rather neat point when he argued that the skilled labourer is a capitalist as compared with the unskilled. The argument continued by his next point was rather pretty, but showed just a trifle of its initial weakness. He endeavoured to show an exact parallel between this capital "skill" or "education" with "capital" as generally understood. ("Hereditry" is a capital which it is quite outside the power of any individual to vary to any great extent.) "That greater skill of course fairly demanded greater remuneration, and that this is one of the great factors of present inequality."

It struck me that we were going to have a rather elevated train of argument now. There were one or two fairly strong points made, and I "put forth the tender leaves of hope," but "ma goodness," almost the next breath he came out with that awful bosh of piling up all the wealth in one heap, and then going equal shares. "He fell like Lucifer never to rise again."

Naturally he raised a storm when he said that £93 per annum was the average wage of the workers. He was in worse form still when he tried to paint the terrible chance of everybody having plenty of food, but none of the present spirit of emulation.

He argued that "Liberty" (O thou strangely invoked non-entity!) is an absolute necessity, without which all worth of life would die out, and then in a perfect whirl of words painted the terror of a gigantic State machine which would allow no liberty of action in any one detail, food, dress, marriage, everything by rule, even "commerce will rapidly decline." Fancy that, ye starvelings, who are doing so well by commerce.

G. B. Shaw began his reply by some well-deserved strictures on the noisy section who often break a chain of reasoning to pieces by rowdy interruptions of approval or disapproval as the case may be. As to Mr. Ford's argument re skill, exceptional skill, or no skill at all, it was not a matter of pressing moment to find out the exact rate of wages to be paid for each, but he might be allowed to ask whether a Duke has 5,000 times the ability of any labourer; he has 5,000 times the pay, but he was sceptical as to any man having 5,000 times the skill of any other man. He said according to Mr. Ford we are on the horns of a dilemma, and "Smash" was a positive dead certainty.

Mr. Ford, in the concluding speech, dealt with land tenure, and suggested the suppositious case of his great-great-grandfather having taken by strictly legal means land, from the g. g. f. of G. B. Shaw, "what should be done with the present owners?" When "Chuck 'em out" from one of the irrepressibles suggested the more than possible solution, and brought down the curtain.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

NOTICE.—All business matters relating to the Socialist League to be directed to the Secretary, H. A. Barker, 13 Farringdon Road, London, E.C.

Annual Conference.—The Third Annual Conference of the Socialist League will be held at 13 Farringdon Road on Whitsunday, May 29th. Branches are particularly requested to attend to the following arrangements, if they wish to be represented at the Conference: (1) To at once send a return of their membership to the General Secretary. The representation will be based on this return. (2) Branches cannot be represented unless all monthly subscriptions are paid up to March 31 by May 1st. (3) Notices of motion, amendment to Rules, etc., must be sent in six weeks before the Conference—i.e., not later than April 18th. (4) Agenda Paper will be forwarded on May 2nd to Branches complying with these arrangements.

Lessons in French.—Comrade Victor Dave is now giving lessons in French at the offices of the League on Tuesday evenings, at 8 o'clock. The lessons are free to members, and those desirous of profiting by them should send their names at once to the secretary of the League.

FRENCH CLASS will resume on Tuesday April 26.

Library.—The Library is open to members of the Socialist League and affiliated bodies. LIBRARY CATALOGUE, containing the Rules, 2d. LENA WARDLE and W. BLUNDELL are the Librarians.

Bound Volumes of 'COMMONWEAL' for 1886 can now be had. Price 5s. 6d.

General Meeting of London members adjourned to Monday April 18, at 8.

Reports for "Commonweal."—Branch Secretaries are requested to make their reports as brief as possible, dealing with points of general interest as to the progress of the propaganda, rather than attempting to give the substance of the lectures, for which there is not space, even if it were otherwise desirable. Notices should be confined to purely business announcements and written separately. Reports and Notices should be addressed to the "Printer," and cannot be guaranteed insertion unless they reach the office by 2 p.m. on Tuesday.

BRANCH SUBSCRIPTIONS PAID.

Birmingham, Hackney, Hull, Leeds, North London, to August 31. Manchester, Merton, Norwich, to October 31. Bradford, to November 30. Croydon, Hammersmith, Leicester, South London, to Dec. 31, 1886. Lancaster, to January 31. Bloomsbury, Walsall, to February 28. Clerkenwell, Hoxton (Labour Emancipation League), Oxford, to March 31, 1887.

THE NORWICH PRISONERS' AID FUND.

C. W. Mowbray and Fred Henderson, of the Socialist League, were sentenced at the Norwich Assizes on Jan. 20 to nine and four months' imprisonment respectively. The costs of the trial amounted to £60, and Mowbray's wife and five children must be provided for during his imprisonment, so that at least £100 will be required. The treasurer of this fund therefore appeals to every one to give all the assistance he can.

BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, April 6, Eleanor Marx-Aveling lectured on "Socialism in Europe and America." Good discussion followed. On Sunday morning, April 10, a very successful anti-Coercion meeting was held on Clerkenwell Green, being well-attended by local citizens. The Merton Branch and Clerkenwell Branch of the Socialist League amalgamated with the Clerkenwell Branch of the Social Democratic Federation, speeches being delivered by members of these sections. The following resolution was put and carried unanimously: "That this meeting expresses its deep abhorrence of the Coercive Measures levelled against the Irish nation, and is of opinion that, the Land Question being at the root of the Irish troubles, no political change can have permanent value unless accompanied by, or be in the direction of, the abolition of Landlordism in Ireland; and is further of opinion that the Irish nation should be left free to settle with the landlords without any restriction whatever from the English Parliament." Much enthusiasm prevailed, and the meeting closed with three hearty cheers for the Social Revolution. In the evening, at Farringdon Hall, L. Gronlund addressed good audience on "The Familistere of Guise," describing it as mere philanthropy. Literature has sold well.—W. B. and T. E. W.

HOXTON.—W. C. Wade lectured on "Radicalism from a Socialist Standpoint," taking as the base of his objections to Radicalism, that Radicalism is founded on expediency while Socialism is founded on principle. The discussion after the lecture was enlivened by the remarks of an employé of the Liberty and Property Defence League, a Mr. Lyons, who at the close of the discussion challenged us to debate the aims and objects of the L.P.D.L. The challenge was accepted, and notice of the same sent to the secretary of the L.P.D.L.—E. P.

EDINBURGH.—On Tuesday, April 5, Wm. Morris lectured in Free Tron Hall on "Monopoly." Spirited discussion at close, and Socialistic resolution carried. Good sale of literature.—G.

NORWICH.—Large and enthusiastic meetings were held on Sunday and Monday in various parts of the city, addressed by Joseph Lane and others of the Socialist League, in favour of Socialism and against Coercion.

BIRMINGHAM.—At a meeting in the Birmingham Forward Liberal Club last week, the debate on "Is Socialism sound?" which had been debated for four nights, the question was decided in the affirmative. Speakers belonging to the Club, the Fabian Society, the S. D. F., and the Socialist League, took part in the debate, which aroused great interest.

DUBLIN.—Our Dublin comrades are doing right good work, which is having effect. Discussions and meetings are being attended, and occasional lectures given. The leaflet issued by the Irish section is being widely circulated throughout Ireland, and is attracting attention to Socialism. The Labour League lately formed here has also been bestirring itself.

NOTTINGHAM.—On Sunday, April 3, a Conference of members of the Socialist Union, the International, and the Social Democratic Federation, was held to consider the desirability of combining the different bodies in one independent local organisation. I. Hamer was in the chair, and J. Winterton, J. Peacock, P. H. Knight, T. Proctor, H. Cooper (S.U.), and W. Winterton (S.D.F.) spoke in favour of the proposal. It was finally moved by J. Wane, seconded by J. Peacock, "That this meeting form itself into the Nottingham and District Socialist Brotherhood, and use all their united efforts to advance its propaganda, and make the local movement a success. The Brotherhood to be unconnected with any outside society." J. Winterton was unanimously elected secretary pro tem. The meetings are held at the Liberty Café, Alfred Street, Central. In the evening a meeting was held in the great Market Place, at which about 2,000 persons were present, and a resolution condemning the Tory Coercion Act for Ireland was unanimously carried. The propaganda among the miners of the Mansfield division was commenced on Thursday night by J. Peacock and T. Proctor; the literature given to them was gladly received, and the speeches made by the two Socialists were loudly cheered.

TO THE TAIL-LESS.—The name of the enterprising capitalist who "employs" apes to break and prepare his hemp for market is Mr. Parkes. He has a farm at Kingston, Kentucky. He has seven of them at present; they were sent to him by his brother in South Africa, and he has already ordered ten more. He says they do the work more rapidly and better than negroes, and at one fiftieth the cost. He cages them at night and feeds them on raw turnips, carrots, and potatoes. It only took him four months to train them. They don't need houses, books, pictures, baby-clothes, nor school-books for their children. It costs about 3 cents a day for their subsistence and when they die, planted in the furrows, they serve as excellent fertilizers. Skinned and tanned their hides make splendid leather, and its use will not be followed by any outcry of horror like that that saluted the utilisation of the Tewksbury pauper. Mr. Monkey also has no vote. Isn't it time for the long-eared, tail-less toilers to WAKE UP?—Labor Enquirer.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE agitation against the Coercion Bill is going on quite as briskly as might have been expected; but of course it is not the kind of opposition which will prevent a parliamentary majority from passing the Bill. Whether the Government will venture to put it in force when passed is another matter. The popular opposition, respectable as it is, does not seem to be of that volume and energy which implies a threat of consequences beyond the ballot-box; and as to the vote, the agitation is discounted by the Tories because they know that a very large proportion of the agitators have not got it, in spite of the assertion of our "light and leading" friend the Spectator that "every man has the vote or could have it if he would,"—an assertion, by the way, which those who do not know that estimable journal might suppose to be either a joke or a deliberate lie, but which I may assure our readers is made in good faith, and in the exercise of that curious fatuity which is the chief characteristic of that "official organ" of the Prigs.

This much may at least be said about the anti-coercion agitation (no doubt it has been said often already, but may well be said still oftener), that the wall which parted the Irish from the English democracy has been thrown down. Here at least, if no otherwise is, union—that kind of union which comes of men respecting each others' rights.

Nor should the Tories hug themselves too much on their majority. There are not lacking signs that the pendulum will swing Gladstone-wards at the next election. The defeat of the Unionists on the Birmingham Caucus, Mr. Trevelyan's anti-coercion letter, the "raising of Cain(e)" at Barrow, and so forth, are the kind of things that go before the fall of a big parliamentary majority. Of course it goes without saying that a great many Liberal M.P.'s—those chiefly who are not marked for office—will be bitterly disappointed at their success. If only the Irish would turn tail, and accept some "compromise," and then never be heard of again, how glad would these gentry be! Liberalism might then be purified of its last taint of reality.

The way in which the coercionist press tries to belittle the quite successful Easter Monday demonstration is a good example of the by-ways of party guidance. The Standard may be taken as the type of these optimists, or rather would-be optimists, whose fury betrays the fact that they are miserably disappointed with our success. One point is worth noting which is expressed in the following sentence in the Standard: "The preponderance in the huge crowd of the class which needs no oratory, honest or dishonest, to whet its animosity to law and order was a sinister symptom." Now not even amidst its foaming-at-the-mouth-disappointment can the Standard pretend to take exception to the behaviour of the very orderly crowd of Easter Monday: it is agreed on all hands that there was an entire absence of the horse-play which generally winds up these Hyde Park demonstrations. So what the Standard means is that the revolutionists and their sympathisers were in the majority there; and the whole coercionist press makes a handle of this fact against the Gladstonites.

Well, well! times are changed, it seems, since the last Hyde Park demonstration which I attended—the Franchise one—where the banner of the Labour Emancipation League was destroyed, and our comrade John Burns hustled by a Radical mob, because he had said a few words of blasphemy against Mr. John Bright. Would the Easter Monday crowd have hustled any one who had taken the trouble to call in question the infallibility of the Quaker pope?

It is much to be hoped that all friends of freedom will rally to our meeting in Hyde Park on the 24th, to sympathise with the Northumbrian Miners. A stronger case for sympathy and help could scarcely be put before the public, as the readers of Commonweal must already have noted. It would be shame to us in London indeed if working men here were to allow the political prize-fight to absorb all their attention, when such worthy men as these are suffering so unworthily, and struggling so hard against the tyranny of our idiotic system of sham society.

The Pall Mall Gazette, while it has done good service in some directions is certainly curiously inconsistent. It has most vigorously sustained the battle against coercion in Ireland, and apparently is prepared to go on doing so; nevertheless in the very same issue which contains an attack (most justly deserved) on Mr. Chamberlain for his newly-developed love of the fairly complete form of "freedom of contract" known as the Crimes Bill, contains also a letter, printed with all the honours and obviously with editorial approval, from Madame de Novikoff, the acknowledged agent for quite the completest form of coercion yet known in this world—the modern Government of Russia. This is really rather too grotesque.

On the other hand I read in the Daily News that the whole Russian press condemns the Coercion Act!!! It really is too quaint.

Mr. Baggallay asked Mr. Labouchere if he was prepared to repeat in the House his saying in Hyde Park that the policy of the Government was one of the ruffianism of Bill Sykes. "Beyond all question," quoth Mr. Labouchere. This is a pleasant hearing, after the usual explanations and eating of words which are the custom of the House. But then Mr. Labouchere has been always careful to show that he is not a fool; as careful as most M.P.'s are to show the contrary—though certainly they need not labour hard at that business.

Apropos of this subject, Mr. Conybeare should learn to understand that a man should not be too greedy of humble-pie if he wishes to retain any respect from those who in any way profess to be fighting the popular cause. Explanation on the top of apology is—Well, we really want Sam Weller to characterise this excess in the banquet of humility!

WILLIAM MORRIS.

SOCIALIST CAMPAIGN IN THE NORTH.

For some weeks the readers of the Commonweal have been informed of the progress of Socialism in Northumberland—how we have been holding large meetings in Newcastle and in the villages in the neighbourhood, and how eagerly the people have bought pamphlets and papers that they might study our doctrines at their leisure. In order to bring the agitation to a point it was resolved to hold a demonstration in the centre of the colliery district and to put resolutions to the meeting pledging the men to adopt the principles of Socialism. On the morning of Easter Monday the Socialist missionaries from London proceeded from Newcastle to the colliery villages, and addressed meetings and organised the processions. At every one of these places they were received in the most hearty manner. One thing was very striking—namely, that the strongest supporters of Socialism were usually the most respected men in the villages. It is usual for Cockney journalists to call our supporters a pack of lazy discontented ne'er-do-weels; but the press here admit that we have got hold of the very best of the people. After the local meetings were over, the processions were formed and the march began. In many cases from six to eight miles had to be travelled to reach the meeting-place. Fortunately the weather was of the most favourable kind, and the fresh air and bands prevented the marches being tedious. At the meeting-place, which was a field lent by a kindly farmer, Mr. Hardman, the Socialist League had a representative distributing broadcast the manifesto of their Strike Committee, which was eagerly read by the men. At about two o'clock the processions came in sight; from all points of the compass the banners were seen floating in the air, and the sound of the miners' bands greeted the ear. Some four or five constables put in an appearance, but they looked rather sheepish. They felt, no doubt, that they were a little out of place, as it was hard to see what five policemen could have done against ten thousand determined men. A large waggon was borrowed from a neighbouring farm, and this served as platform. It was immediately boarded by a troop of reporters, who pretty nigh took up all the room. Fielding was appointed chairman, and as soon as he stood up the meeting became quiet and attentive, in which state it remained until its close. An amusing incident however took place with regard to the reporters. The crowd did not know who the army of eminently respectably-dressed men were who were in the waggon beside the speakers. But the moment Fielding opened, out came the note-books, and the reporting business got under weigh. The crowd stopped the proceedings to turn the reporters out. On these gentlemen remonstrating, the spokesman of the crowd stated that the reason they wanted them out of it was because they gave in bogus reports; but he said if the reporters would faithfully promise to give a full and accurate report, or none at all, they would let them remain. This the reporters agreed to, but only in the case of the Newcastle Chronicle was it fairly kept. Fielding then read the resolutions. The first was expressing sympathy with the miners on strike; the second was pledging the men at the meeting to organise themselves to assume collective possession of the land and capital of the country; the last was an anti-coercion resolution.

Comrade Mahon told the men that the workers in other parts of England did not know of the brave struggle the miners of Northumberland were maintaining against the robbers of labour. If the same thing had been going on in Ireland, the country would have rung from one end to the other with the tale of the miners' wrongs. But, he said, the representatives of labour, instead of standing up for their electors, were merely obeying the orders of the wire-pullers, and never uttering one vigorous protest against the unjust demands of the employers. The meeting cheered most heartily when he said that no one need be afraid of Socialism who was willing to work. Only lazy, idle, thriftless drones need feel afraid.

Morris told the men that he did not consider the life they were leading to be life at all in the proper sense of the word. He wanted to see men really full of spirit and vigour, rejoicing in life and fearing death; whereas to-day most people are on the whole rather glad when their end comes. "Rebel you must, or you will die slaves, and your children will call you craven cowards for allowing them to be born into a world so full of tyranny and wrong!"

H. M. Hyndman, in advising the people to pledge themselves to the principle of Socialism, pointed out how impossible it was for any permanent benefit to result from a merely local strike. What would a strike of all miners in Britain mean? It would mean that the capitalist dogs would have to surrender, and that the people would arrange the terms; but now these local strikes merely crippled the funds of the trade organisations, and allowed the mine-owners to work off their surplus stock at increased prices.

A. K. Donald, as in a sense representing the Scottish miners, was very heartily received. In the course of a telling speech, delivered in stentorian tones that were heard by all the vast assemblage, he ridiculed the idea that they were to be satisfied with a few shillings increase in sixty years. They should insist on having the full fruits of their labour, and never rest till every honest worker was secured a decent livelihood. The misery endured by the workmen under the present system was a scandal to the community and a shame to themselves. The idle, wasteful, and vicious drones were exalted, while the hard-working and necessary part of society was degraded and ground into the mire. The mine-owners and landlords were amusing themselves in the gambling-hells of Paris, London, and Berlin on the stolen proceeds of the pitman's toil. The poverty of the poor was caused by the robbery of them carried on by the rich. The wives and daughters of the workers could hardly get sufficient food or decent clothing, while the frivolous and stupid ladies of high society were pampered and bedecked and loaded down with the costly apparel provided from the earnings of the working class. There must be no compromise with this infamous system. The workers must be organised for the overthrow of the tyrannical and thieving system. Cunning and craft and cultured blackguardism must be torn from the place of honour it now occupied, and skill, industry, and honest useful labour revered as the only qualities which should raise a man in the esteem of his fellows.

Loud and repeated cheers greeted the conclusion of Donald's speech. Mahon then moved a resolution condemning coercion. He said it was no use protesting or declaring indignation against this repeated attempt to put down freedom of speech and combination amongst the Irish workers. When the law tried to shut men's mouths and keep them from organising against tyranny, it was time to cry "down with the law, and damn the law." He hoped the Irish would rise in forcible rebellion against coercion.

Hyndman seconded the resolution, and pointed out that the Socialists were consistent in opposing Tory coercion, as they had also opposed Liberal coercion. The landlords and capitalists on both sides of the Channel supported each other, and the workers must combine in a similar manner.

After a resolution had been passed against the employment of women and girls about the mines, the proceedings ended.

In spite of the enormous size of the crowd, the utmost silence was maintained, and the speeches listened to with eager attention. While Morris was speaking he observed some policemen, whom he proceeded to chaff rather unmercifully. He also gave them some very sensible advice. The blue-coats beat an undignified retreat, amid the ironical applause of the meeting. It will surprise our London comrades, however, to know that at this enormous gathering five policemen, and an inspector in a comfortable gig, were the only representatives of law and order. The meeting lasted two hours. The resolutions were all carried with but one dissentient, and the meeting ended with three tremendous cheers for the Social Revolution.

Morris, Donald, and Mahon at once hurried off to the other side of the Tyne, where they addressed a large crowd at Ryton Willows. Comrade Field, once a member of the Hammersmith Branch of the Socialist League, turned up here and made an excellent speech.

This demonstration has now established the power of Socialism in the North. The papers have all had to admit the overwhelming success of the meeting and the great unanimity of the assent given to the Socialist doctrines. The organising arrangements were all planned and carried out by comrade Mahon, the cost being a few shillings under £3. A new victory for the Cause in a fresh part of the country.

SOUTH PLACE DEBATES.

SIDNEY WEBB and Dr. T. B. Napier were the third disputants, the proposition to wrestle with being: "That the main principles of Socialism are founded on, and in accordance with, modern economic science." Sidney Webb said the ground of debate would be principles and not places, and remarked that some Socialists will not care much about economic principles; which brought out some noisy "hear, hears," upon which he scored neatly by saying the "hear, hearers" are the very people who give themselves away,—which is true. He then ran over the names of some of those, from Robert Owen, who have been Socialists ex political economists. "Ran over," I may say, is here no mere mode of expression, for Webb is an exceedingly rapid speaker, but withal very clear. By his rapidity of speaking, closeness of argument, and ready and apt quotation, he covered more various ground and more completely filled his bill than any of the whole eight debaters. He avowed himself a Malthusian, but one who says that the question of population of itself will not in the long run affect the question of Rent. As to controlling all means of production, he claimed to have "all the economists with him, down to the ground." By quotations from Prof. Sidgwick, Cliffe, Leslie, Cairnes, and a particularly strong passage from Mill written in 1865, he claimed to have proved that the whole professors of political economy were on the side of Socialism, which is to-day "only making the principles known to the masses."

Dr. Napier began with the usual admission of being quite at one with Mr. Webb in his sympathy with the workers, and then rolled off a wonderful mixture about Stewart Headlam, General Booth, and Mr. Hyndman. I had noticed while Webb was speaking the Dr. had several times put his hand to his forehead and gazed across the table as if dazed by the job he had in front when his time to reply came. I am sure something happened to him while listening to Webb which drove out all he had intended to say and gave his mind a new direction. Dr. Napier positively never once dealt with the text put before him. I thought Corrie Grant quite enough off his base, but Dr. Napier, by devoting almost the whole of his first twenty minutes to an examination of the results of the introduction of a new machine into the boot trade, and the position of the man who has saved up £4000, quite surpassed all previous efforts in how not to debate a certain text. Dr. N. was quite dramatic in his representation of the cutting up of profits between the capitalist and the worker. There was an excess of interruption by the audience, but addressing so many of his remarks in the form of questions, the Dr. fairly laid himself open to interruption. He made much of frightening away capital, and also by excess of State interference weakening the self-reliance of the workers. He warned the workers against too many Trafalgar Square meetings and church parades, and strongly urged Mrs. Besant's 'Law of Population,' and technical education, free if possible. He made the somewhat bold assertion that Socialists hate statistics.

Webb, in his reply, mentioned that his antagonist seemed to have forgotten that there was a certain proposition to debate, for he had in no one point dealt with it. As to co-operation, of which slight mention had been made, he quoted from Cairnes to show how much that would do. "Individualists," said Webb, "must wake up from the delusion as to orthodox political economy being on their side—it is quite the reverse."

Napier began his second heat by admitting Rent to be a monopoly. He then flew off at a tangent, going into a tirade against the present mal-administration in high places. He admitted the existence of many glaring inequalities, but insisted we must deal with them as practical men, and not be led away by such halfpenny phrases as "all wealth being due to labour."

The last proposition to be discussed was, "That State interference with, and control of, industry is inevitable, and will be advantageous to the community." H. H. Champion to affirm; Wordsworth Donisthorpe, of the Liberty and Property Defence League, to deny. Champion began by an appeal for quiet attention; "he was there to advance and urge certain arguments, not to make any demonstration of force or suggest any such by the amount of noise which part of the audience might be able to make." As to first part of the proposition, there was little need to deal at any length with that. As to the next part, that it has done good and will do more, as abstract questions are best examined by concrete examples, he put the case of two farms belonging to one landlord; one farmer by offering higher rent drives out the other; the remaining farmer gets for himself a bigger income than he had before, the landlord gets a bigger income than he had before, but one farmer and some labourers are driven out of employ, and less food is produced to the community. He dealt with the Cobden Club free-trade fallacy, that cheapness of production is an unmixed good. Champion seemed to me to devote too much time to discussing what his opponent was going to say, which is decidedly a weak line.

Mr. Donisthorpe admitted that to some extent his antagonist was right in his historical sketch re growth of Socialism; but he said "Armies have grown immensely during the last ten years; is Mr. Champion prepared to admit that militarism is a growing feeling among the mass, or that it is any reason for satisfaction?" He raised a laugh by saying Adam was born just exactly five thousand nine hundred and sixty-five years and three weeks ago,—at least, three hundred years ago people had to believe this statement. That was Socialism! Men have been ordered as to how they should dress, eat, drink, sleep, wash, etc., etc.; and on some one putting a question for details, he promptly referred the enquirer to Leviticus and Deuteronomy. He had a droll cut at Test Acts and vaccination in saying that no one can enter the post-office or the army without accepting State disease at the point of the State lancet, and founded on the objection to this an argument that to add to such State interference would be only to add to present trouble. Tendency, he urged, was very much what the enquirer made it; the Socialist found the tendency to Socialism, the Individualist found the reverse; "each wish was father to the thought." Mr. Champion had mentioned that good had been done by the State interfering with house-farmers; he (Donisthorpe) would submit that the Torrens' Act being followed by six amending Acts proved something not as the Socialist suggested. Such enterprises as the Peabody proved private effort the better agent. Whereat some uproar and denial as to the working class being better housed than in the past. Mr. Champion had urged the case of the Factory and Mines Regulation Acts; he (Donisthorpe) did not believe that any body of men to-day would put children of tender years to such work—"if so, the sooner the country goes to the devil the better." He then gave a cleverly garbled examination of the growth of trades' unions, insisting that if the men had trusted wholly to themselves they would have been better off to-day; but they allowed, invited, accepted State interference, which spoilt the job. Some of which is true, but all of which wanted careful analysis, which I am sorry Champion did not give. Mr. Donisthorpe said he had worked in a mine (some naughty sceptics up-stairs smiled out quite loudly and sarcastically), and "that it was much better to work in a mine with all its much-talked-of dangers, so as to earn a good dinner, than stay at home and starve." He did not stay to examine the statement that the dangers have to be accepted too often with starvation. He dealt in the same fashion with seafaring and its dangers. He made very much of a certain deputation re the Mines Acts some years ago, when it was stated those Acts had saved sixty lives from accident and starved 60,000 by reason of want of employ.

Champion began his second speech by a sharp and well-deserved rebuke to those infernal nuisances the people who will carry on the supplementary debate which is the curse of almost all these meetings. Is chivalry quite dead? What would have been thought if in the olden days of the lists each champion (no pun meant) had been liable to assault from a lot of bystanders? H. H. scored one when he wondered what would have been the result to Mr. Donisthorpe had he been brought up as thousands of London children are, and had been compelled to constantly work in a mine. He seemed on rather weak ground when he drew an illustration from old Greek society with its chattel-slaves. As to Mr. D.'s argument that private effort has done and will do most good as to housing the workers, he showed that where a company desired to raise capital, but meant to keep the dividend down to five per cent., capital came in very slowly, while to float a new gun company, with a chance of twenty per cent., capital flowed in.

Mr. Donisthorpe, in the concluding speech, allowed that the motive-power behind individualism to be a refined species of selfishness, self-interest. According to Mr. D., "Socialism spreads as new classes come into power; it is a pandering for popularity on the part of each new body of rulers." But the principal reason for the spread of Socialism is, "that there is always a lazy lot of weaklings who believe they will have a better chance if things are better conditioned." I should have thought myself that to be better conditioned was simply giving all a better chance, and didn't want much debating. Labour, he concluded by saying, had really done what the old alchemists were always trying and talking about—turned everything into gold. Therefore "to labour" was the only thing to do. He forgot to say who was to enjoy the fruits of the labour, which was the point in dispute.

Just a few words to conclude. If this series has proved anything, it has proved Socialists have nothing to lose by constant discussion. I am anxious to be as impartial as one mind possibly can be—absolute impartiality is an absolute impossibility—but I feel forced to say that as defenders of a system of society the Individualists just dealt with made a very sorry show. I feel certain there are Socialists who, for purposes of debate, would be able to make a better defence of Individualism than was made by any one of its champions above named. Positively in listening to them—especially Grant and Napier—it seemed they were put up, not to show the strength of the position, but how ridiculous, how monstrous the attempt to defend the present social conditions really is. Then ever and anon this satisfaction is broken into by the recollection that these men have reason to say they have not been able to do their best, because of the noisy interruption they have to endure from possibly well-meaning but certainly ill-advised critics, friendly or the reverse; for there are some of both, and both debaters have to endure the annoyance—the Socialist least, no doubt. It is time to make a strong protest on this point. A debate is on a different footing to a lecture; even then interpolated remarks are very unfair. A debate is almost exactly paralleled as I have done above by the suggestion of two knights, and the field should be totally left to them for the time being. A long, carefully worked out chain of argument, each link well made and depending on its fellow, is just as badly spoilt by a burst of applause as by the reverse, when it prevents the speaker proceeding or the audience hearing. Again, thought is an exceedingly tricky sprite, and a speaker must be immensely strong in controlling his thoughts if in the midst of a sustained argument he have a new series of thought-pictures conjured up by some hasty interpolation and yet continue his first intended line; there are not many who can do this without weakening. Further, sixty minutes for two speakers allows no time to waste in gas, platitude, and noise. It is unfair to those who have to teach and those who wish to learn. "O! reform it."

THOMAS SHORE, jun.

"SOCIALISM OR MONOPOLY?"

WE have before us an Italian work on the general subject of Socialism ('Socialismo o Monopolio?'—3s., published by the author), by F. S. Merlino. There is not much latter-day Italian writing treating the subject from a historic standpoint, which lack should render this volume all the more welcome to those who are desirous of pursuing their study below the surface of flowery sentimentalism or street-corner rhetoric. The author of this work begins by giving a sketch of the growth of Monopoly, which is short but comprehensive, and very ably written. He glances at the primitive communities of ancient times, and the remains and traces of the same in the village-life of various countries—the Swiss allmends, the Russian mir, the townlands of the Hebrides. "The road," says the writer, "which has led the human family from community of goods to monopoly is paved through out with violence and rapine. With all peoples and at all epochs the great promoters of monopoly are conquest in the external relations of tribes and folks, and in their internal relations usurpation," instancing the success of Athenian commercial enterprise and the Roman conquest that followed on its ruin; their highest development and in their realisation their decay. He reviews shortly the growth of feudalism in England, the monopoly of land, which is followed "hard upon," and naturally, by monopoly of land-products and all goods; for, as he says, when at the usurpation of the barons, the general right survived to the disinherited people of enjoying the use of common lands and common woods, this right was supposed to remain to them at the time of the abolition of feudal property; "but the peasant lacking tools and other necessary means of cultivation, the ex-baron, now become absolute and irresponsible possessor of the soil, takes from him, for a mere nothing, his possession grown useless." Mentioning the gold-discoveries and the feverous and factitious impetus given to commerce thereby, the institution of national or popular banks in England, France, and Italy at the end of the seventeenth century, the writer describes the substitution of the "Grande Industrie" for the "Petite Industrie" in the beginning of this century, and says in closing his review of the past of Monopoly, "The machine and the wage-worker complete the chain of property and crown the edifice of monopoly, imparting to industry that movement whose intensity and rapidity weakens it to-day, and allow the capitalist to accumulate enormous gains in some few hours and then to suspend the process of production." After pointing out that "economic science had at its birth at the end of the last century the well defined aim of discovering means to obviate the evils of monopoly," its first high priests and students writing in all good faith and honesty, the writer proceeds to review modern economy, with its fallacies of free trade, free contract, and the like, private enterprise and monopoly in agriculture, means of transport, finance, and so forth. He likens society to-day to a beleaguered city, in which we are forced to buy all goods at three-fold, four-fold, ten-fold their cost. This is the case certainly with many things (as the necessities of life, house-shelter, and many foods), but with numerous goods—quasi-luxuries, the new-coined "necessaries" of a flash civilisation—there is a certain deceptive halo of cheapness which quite takes in the ignorant, who vaunt the "progress" of social life (a lamentable progress indeed!), and unfortunately are incapable of watching the progress that exists in truth. The short descriptive chapter on the "Theory of Monopolism" is plain and clear, though perhaps wanting in detail. It is summarised on the first page: "Monopoly is born, not of the simple appropriation of the products of nature, or of the difference of utility between goods, and of productivity of labour, but is born of the right which a man arrogates to himself to dispose of natural products, specified or otherwise, under the form of extracting by this means a profit on the labour of others." In one of the "Fallacies of the Economists," however, I am bound to say that I see no fallacy, but a truth—namely, in the definition of Rent. Rent is the difference in productivity between the best-yielding land and the worst, to put it shortly and roughly. But the difference between rent to-day and in a Socialist state of society is that whereas now the proprietor of the superior land gains from the greater productivity of his land, in a reasonably ordered community this surplus will go into the stores of the community, and thus maintain economic equilibrium. Rent of this sort, in countries where the quality of the soil varies, must always be—though, it may be, only implicitly. In giving us an outline of a possible Socialist organisation, he dwells upon the importance of immediate labour-combination the day after the fighting days of the Revolution, laying stress upon the influence for good or bad that the speedy or tardy reintegration of the factors of labour will have upon the character of the social change.

We regret that Signor Merlino has not touched upon the ethical side of Socialism, having given us so clear and able a general view in a much condensed form of its economics. The ethics of Socialism are too much ignored by most expounders of its doctrines. For all this omission, Signor Merlino has very successfully done his work of laying before his compatriots a clear and simple exposition of the ills of Capitalism and the benefits of Socialism; while we may add that there is nothing throughout his writing to ruffle the temper of the most rabid anti-Anarchist of us all.

AMSTERDAM, April 13.—Taking advantage of the festivities in celebration of the King of Holland's seventieth birthday, a deputation from the Universal Suffrage Union had an audience of King William, and presented a petition praying his Majesty to pardon M. Domela Nieuwenhuis, who was condemned in June last to a year's solitary confinement for insulting the king. The petition sets forth that M. Nieuwenhuis is seriously ill.

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

CONCERNING "JUSTICE."

PLATO and the ancients generally deemed the whole of morality to be summed up in the idea of Justice. And indeed, when looked at closely it will be seen that the notion of justice at least supplies the key-note of every ethical system. It is therefore on this notion of justice that the crucial question turns in debates between the advocates of modern Socialism and of modern Individualism respectively. The bourgeois idea of justice is crystallised in the notion of the absolute right of the individual to the possession and full control of such property as he has acquired without overt breach of the bourgeois law. To interfere with this right of his, to abolish his possession, is in bourgeois eyes the incarnation of injustice. The Socialist idea of justice is crystallised in the notion of the absolute right of the community to the possession and control (at least) of all wealth not intended for direct individual use. Hence the abolition of the individual possession and control of such property, or in other words, its confiscation, is the first expression of Socialist justice. Between possession and confiscation is a great gulf fixed, the gulf between the Bourgeois and the Socialist worlds. Well-meaning men seek to throw bridges over this gulf by schemes of compensation, abolition of inheritance, and the like. But the attempts, as we believe, even should they ever be carried out practically, will fall disastrously short of their mark, and be speedily engulfed between the precipitous shores they would unite. Nowhere can the phrase, "He that is not for us is against us," be more aptly applied than to the moral standpoint of modern Individualism and of modern Socialism. To the one individual possession is right and justice, and social confiscation is wrong and injustice; to the other, individual possession is wrong and injustice, and confiscation is right and justice. This is the real issue. Unless a man accept the last-named standpoint unreservedly, he has no right to call himself a Socialist. If he does accept it, he will seek the shortest and most direct road to the attainment of justice rather than any longer and more indirect ones, of which it is at best doubtful whether they will attain the end at all. For be it remembered the moment you tamper with the sacredness of private property, no matter how mildly, you surrender the conventional bourgeois principle of justice, while the moment you talk of compensation you surrender the Socialist principle of justice; for compensation can only be real if it is adequate, and can only be adequate if it counterbalances and thereby annuls the confiscation.

It is just, says the Individualist, for a man to do what he likes with his own. Good; but what is his own? The "own" of the Roman citizen of the republic included his slaves. These he could cut up to feed his lampreys if he liked, and he doubtless felt it "unjust" when the emperors limited his right to the control of his own property, in this and similar ways, by sundry enactments which (to employ a modern phrase) "savoured of State Socialism." Again, the donkey is the costermonger's "own." But if the costermonger stimulates that donkey's flagging energies with a two-pronged fork, the modern State interferes and limits the control of the costermonger over his property. The costermonger perhaps thinks it unjust—"State-Socialistic," and the like; the humanitarian thinks it just, and is so far untrue to bourgeois principles. But, says the bourgeois advocate, this does not touch us; we only refer to the things which are products of industry and which can be, and have been, lawfully acquired. Now the right to property in human flesh is not admitted in the present day in any sense, and therefore it cannot be lawfully acquired. The property in assinine or other flesh is admitted, only with certain restrictions. Have a care, O bourgeois! You concede, then, that the concepts of "right" and "justice" as regards property have changed, for it was not always so. But no matter. It is just, you say, for a man to possess the product of his industry, or what he has acquired in a lawful manner, and to have the entire control of it. Good. But the feudal baron would not have thought it just to have been deprived of his "dues" taken from the industry of his vassals, whom he had acquired with his lands, lands obtained not by industry but by violence. At the sack of a town the mediæval knight would have thought it unjust had his lord, in accordance with nineteenth century notions of equity, magnanimously compelled him to surrender his booty to its original lawful owner. And the rest of the world would have agreed with him, owner included. The Frank who broke the vase at Soissons would not have appreciated the justice of Chlodwig any better had he sought to make him surrender it to the Romano-Gaul who had previously possessed it, and had presumably acquired it in a lawful manner, than he did when he wished to appropriate it himself. But these were bad men, you will say. And it is true that the principle of your middle-class Individualist conception of "justice" is opposed to the "justice" of these men, therefore to you they are bad.

So now, having shown by these one or two examples that justice was conceived differently in the past, we will trace the logical working out of your own true bourgeois conception—that of the right of every man to the full possession and control of wealth acquired by the industry of himself, or of others who have voluntarily given or bequeathed it to him. This conception of right or "justice" you have inscribed on your banner throughout your struggle with the ancient feudal hierarchy—those bold bad men who robbed the honest merchant, oppressed the tiller of the soil, despised the receiver of interest, laid onerous imposts on wares, etc. It was this that lay at the root of your struggle with the old territorial ecclesiasticism in the sixteenth century, with the king and noble in the seventeenth, with the ancienne noblesse of France in the eighteenth. Security of property to the personal possessor against the remnants of the ancient tribal communism and against the exactions of the feudal head whose power directly or indirectly grew out of it, has ever been your watchword, and is so to-day, even when you demand compensation for improvements and denounce the "unearned increment."¹ And at first you were perfectly sincere; your demand seemed the cry of an eternal "justice," a justice that was absolute in its nature and unalterable in its manifestations. "Wealth" did to a large extent belong to its immediate producer or to those who had acquired it directly from him by gift or bequest. The means of production were within the reach of all. Most of those that were so minded could earn wealth by their labour. All that seriously hindered them seemed the fetters of feudalism and semi-feudalism. On the land the peasant cultivated his own plot with his own implements; in the town the handicraftsman laboured primarily at least on his own account. What the one craved was freedom from the unjust exactions of his lord, and from the tolls and local imposts which obstructed the exchange of his produce. What the other craved was freedom, first from aristocratic custom, laws, and ordinances, and secondly, from the rules and regulations of the guilds—the umbilical cord which still united the new-born social organisation with the feudal order and privilege which was its parent. Even later and till some way into the manufacture period—the first form of capitalism—in spite of the exploitation which went on, the possibility for the vast majority of earning a tolerable livelihood, masked the retreat of truth from within the bourgeois citadel of justice and its occupation by lies. Even the working-classes, for the most part, assumed the "enemy" still to be feudalism, and held that middle-class "justice" was their "justice," that the complete possession and control of the product of industry was involved in the freedom of industry from local custom, and of trade from undue impositions, and nothing more.

We have referred to the evacuation by truth of the middle-class notion of justice. This is the point the middle-class advocate invariably ignores. He assumes that his principle, the right of the individual possessor to the full control of his lawfully acquired property, means the same thing now, has the same application now, as when wealth meant the direct product of the labour of the individual possessor, or of those from whom he had received it by gift or bequest. It does not occur to him that wealth in the modern capitalist world means something very different from this, that neither has this man sinned nor his father in its production, but that on the contrary the modern possessor and his father are alike innocent of having had any share in the process. If it be alleged that the modern capitalist's ancestor in some golden age of the past created by his personal industry the wealth which was embodied in instruments of production, we may well call upon our bourgeois advocate to give us some chronological data on the subject, seeing that the most extended research has as yet failed to discover the primitive ancestral capitalist in question. Go back as we may, we discover nothing but essentially the self-same process as at present, though less in scope and intensity, the formation of capitals from unpaid labour, and their division by the scramble of competition, till we reach the feudal period, when status, serfdom, and forcible appropriation reign supreme. The old original capitalist who has rested from his labours, and whose works do follow him—creative, frugal, and laborious—he looms ever “backer and backer.” It is a beautiful conception this of the first capitalist, and only shows that poetry like hope springs eternal in the human breast—even the economical breast. Like Prester John and the Wandering Jew, he has a weird charm about him that almost makes one love him. But our reverence for an old legend must not blind us to historical fact. The real origin of modern capital is fully discussed by Marx in his chapter on the “so-called original accumulation.”

The contradiction between the assumption contained in his formula and the facts of modern life which he stupidly or designedly ignores, is proclaimed by the Socialist, who shows that the maintenance of private property in the means of production is in flagrant opposition to the concept of “Justice” with which he set out, since the former necessarily involves the workman’s deprivation of the greater part of the product of his labour, as otherwise such property would be of no value. The concept “Justice,” therefore, as meaning the right to the possession and control by the individual of the product of his labour has lost all meaning in modern times. But in the maintenance of the sham, of the assumption, that is, that the meaning remains what it was, lies the whole theoretical strength of the bourgeois position. The means of production are no longer in the hands of the producers, but in those of men or of syndicates who are usually entirely divorced from the process of production. Now the only use of means or instruments of production is to produce wealth and commodities. So that to the non-producers who possess them they are of no use whatever, except, and a very important except it is, in so far as they compel others to labour under conditions which allow them only a fractional part of the product of their labour. The only possible use of these means of production is, therefore, to violate the original bourgeois definition of “Justice.” This being so, that definition of “Justice” cannot be invoked as an excuse for gentle dealings with monopolists, whose retention of these instruments is a cause of injustice. For the removal of the cause of injustice cannot itself be unjust. But if it is not unjust it must be just. It is just, therefore, to confiscate all private property in the means of production, i.e., in land or capital. Q.E.D.

Now, Justice being henceforth identified with confiscation and injustice with the rights of property, there remains only the question of “ways and means.” Our bourgeois apologist admitting as he must that the present possessors of land and capital hold possession of them simply by right of superior force, can hardly refuse to admit the right of the proletariat organised to that end to take possession of them by right of superior force. The only question remaining is how? And the only answer is how you can. Get what you can that tends in the right direction, by parliamentary means or otherwise, bien entendu, the right direction meaning that which curtails the capitalist’s power of exploitation. If you choose to ask further how one would like it, the reply so far as the present writer is concerned, one would like it to come as drastically as possible, as the moral effect of sudden expropriation would be much greater than that of any gradual process. But the sudden expropriation, in other words the revolutionary crisis, will have to be led up to by a series of non-revolutionary political acts, if past experience has anything to say in the matter. When that crisis comes the great act of confiscation will be the seal of the new era; then and not till then will the knell of Civilisation, with its rights of property and its class-society, be sounded; then and not till then will Justice—the Justice not of Civilisation but of Socialism—become the corner-stone of the social arch.

LITERARY NOTICES.

‘A Plea for Socialism,’ by J. L. Mahon (Commonweal Office, 16 pp. 1d.) advertised in another column, is a well-written and comprehensive exposition of our principles and aims. It is the substance of the addresses delivered by our comrade during his tour among the Northumberland miners, and should meet with ready sale.

‘Is Socialism Sound?’ (Progressive Publishing Company, Stonecutter Street, paper covers, 1s.) is a neat book of 150 pages, containing a verbatim report, revised by both disputants, of the four night’s debate between Annie Besant and G. W. Foote, held at the Hall of Science on Feb. 2, 9, 16, 23, this year. We expressed the hope some weeks ago that all “(cheers)” and so on would be left out; but regrettably enough all the partisan cries of either side appear duly set forth and the pages are studded with parentheses enclosing ejaculations which break up and spoil the speeches in print as they did in the hearing. Of the debate itself we can but say that both causes were well supported. Mrs. Besant was in admirable form throughout, and successively smashed the arguments adduced against her position, opening and closing the series with speeches of rare power and much beauty. Mr. Foote fought well what he must have felt was a losing battle. Altogether it makes a very readable and useful book, one that cannot fail to be of service.

ARRESTS IN ODESSA.—An Odessa telegram states that 260 arrests took place in that city on Easter Sunday, and that in one cellar five men and women were surprised in the act of filling bombs. They were arrested.

CORRESPONDENCE.

“SOME MISTAKES OF MOSES.”

SIR,—Our ancient friend Moses M’Gibbon is, it appears, not dead, as some of our Glasgow friends supposed. This is gratifying. After all, Socialism could ill afford to lose a person of such unconventional method as Moses. Our friend, it seems, has suddenly emerged from the seclusion to which he retired after a brief and visionary appearance before the public as a parliamentary candidate for the Falkirk Burghs over a year ago. He was too earnest a Socialist to contest the seat against a Whig lawyer, so, gracefully commending that gentleman as a “true Liberal,” he disappeared into the isolation to which providence has predestinated him. This of course was a mistake on Moses’ part—not the retiring, but the coming forward at all. The place of Moses’ recent revivification was at Newcastle, where a meeting was held by the local Socialists to determine whether they should join the Socialist League or the Social-Democratic Federation, or form a separate organisation of their own. What induced Moses to go there? What induced him to advise the people to affiliate with a body from which he virtuously severed himself only a year ago? O Moses! be sure your virtues will find you out! Burning with intense anxiety to champion the cause of the oppressed workers, Moses saw that the backs of the miners, over-burdened with labour and sorrow, might become fitting stepping-stones to the high altitude of membership of the Imperial Parliament. Dreading, therefore, above all things the non-parliamentary programme of the League, he heroically and disinterestedly made himself the apologist of the Federation. Here it was that Moses, in his zeal, fell into another “mistake”—for nobody outside one or two of his old comrades in the Federation would think of using a harsher term. Moses informed his audience, as he tells us in last week’s Justice, “that the Glasgow Branch of the Socialist League consisted of some half a dozen persons who did no work in propaganda.” How Moses was aware that there existed such a body at all as the Socialist League in Glasgow—not to speak of the S. D. F.—is somewhat of a mystery. That he did not know that there were more than “half a dozen” members in it is not then certainly to be wondered at. That Moses should deem—if he has any knowledge of the matter of which he speaks at all—that the holding of something like 170 open-air Socialist meetings, including one the largest open-air Socialist meeting ever held in Scotland, 60 indoor meetings, including one the largest Socialist indoor meeting ever held in Scotland, as well as being the principal speakers at 40 other meetings—all in the course of one year,—as “no work in propaganda,” only shows what an inordinate notion Moses has of the work “half a dozen” members should undertake.

The only other mistake of Moses to which I shall refer, and it concerns himself solely, is his notion that because the miners of Lanarkshire—on whom he has fixed a kindly eye—returned to Parliament an honest Whig, they are therefore likely to return a sham Socialist. The jingle of money in a trouser’s pocket can frequently accomplish much; but not always, and not all.

Glasgow.

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

EDINBURGH SOCIALISTS AND COERCION.

On Wednesday evening, 13th inst., a meeting convened by the Edinburgh Socialists was held in the Good Templar Hall, High Street, to protest against the passing of the Coercion Bill. Mr. John Leslie occupied the chair, and there was a large attendance.

Mr. HENRY C. NOBLE intimated apologies from Mr. R. B. Cunningham Graham, M.P.; Mr. J. Shaw Maxwell; Mr. Wm. Simpson, of the Land Restoration League, Glasgow; and from Mr. John Fergusson, Glasgow. These gentlemen all expressed sympathy with the object of the meeting.

The CHAIRMAN said he thought that he could not better express the sentiment of every Socialist, and indeed every lover of freedom in the country, than by saying that they regarded the measure with a feeling of the utmost horror and detestation.

Mr. HENRY C. NOBLE moved—“That this meeting, being of opinion that the Coercion Bill is tyrannical, unjustifiable, and insulting to the Irish people, desires to record its solemn protest against the despotic action of the present Government, and it is further of opinion that the bill, if passed into law, will undoubtedly tend to widen the gulf between Great Britain and Ireland.” Speaking as a Radical, he thought the bill was not for the purpose of meeting but of making crimes, and its ultimate object was to strike a blow at freedom of speech, not merely in Ireland, but in Britain. The cause of Ireland was the cause of British democracy, and they could not too strongly resist the passing of such a violent Act. The time had arrived in the history of nations when any country that demanded power to govern itself had a perfect right to do so. What was legislative union compared with the wants and wishes of a nation? What was this superstition of empire compared with the aspirations and needs of a country?

Mr. THOMAS THOMSON seconded the motion. He said that the Socialists of Edinburgh had the hearty sympathy of the working-classes.

Mr. J. BRUCE GLASIER supported the motion. He said that “law and order” in Ireland had been created by landlords to protect their stolen property. He thought that the people of Ireland, who were suffering so greatly under the present system, were justified in using every means in their power to resist it.

Mr. JAMES ROBERTSON moved:—“That this meeting is of opinion force is no remedy for the state of Ireland, since its troubles spring to a large extent from the same economic causes the people are suffering from in Great Britain and elsewhere; but while, therefore, seeing no adequate cure for her wrongs in any merely political changes, we feel bound to assist Ireland in her present struggle against landlordism, as well as make common cause with her in resisting all attempts to interfere with the ordinary constitutional rights of British subjects in agitating for reform.”

Mr. WILLIAM BAILLIE seconded the motion.

The Rev. JOHN GLASSE said he supported this resolution not as a politician, but as a Socialist. In the past British rule in Ireland had been a complete failure, and what was wanted was Home Rule—not only for Ireland but for Scotland.

Mr. LAMOND moved: “That an expression of gratitude and sympathy be heartily accorded to the leaders of the Irish people for the ability and fidelity displayed by them in the cause of Ireland.”

Mr. MACMILLAN seconded the motion.

Mr. NOBLE then moved that a copy of the above resolutions be sent to Mr. Gladstone, M.P., Mr. Wallace, M.P., Mr. M’Ewan, M.P., and the secretaries of the Socialist League and Socialist Democratic Federation in London.

All the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The meeting, which was of an enthusiastic character, was brought to a close by a vote of thanks to the chairman.—(Abridged from Scottish Leader.)

the family are beginning to rebel against the despotic authority of the ancients, they do not care to be told whom and when to marry, and they like when they do marry to form a new home, living in a separate house. In many cases they are forcing a division of the land and other property, which the law allows when there is a majority of three-fourths in favour of it; so far this is generally found to be to the detriment of all.

Another very interesting example of the village commune system is to be found in Java. Rice is the staple food of the Javanese, and they cultivate it almost entirely on the communal principle; this is the more interesting as the cultivation of rice needs very extensive works of irrigation, canals and aqueducts have to be made to bring the water from the higher grounds to the rice fields, which must be surrounded by dykes to keep the requisite amount of water in. These works are carried out by the people under the instruction of the communal authorities, or of a surveyor of irrigations appointed by them, thus showing how extensive improvements can be carried out by communities without waiting to accumulate a large amount of capital, and having to pay interest on it perpetually afterwards. The rice fields are distributed each year much in the same way as was done in Russia; any one reclaiming waste land is allowed the exclusive use of it for a few years in addition to his share, it then passes to the community and is divided with the rest. The fields are usually made to yield a second crop of maize, tobacco, or some other quickly growing plant.

The same village communities have evidently existed all over India in ancient times, but are now only to be found in very remote districts, they have given way before European civilisation; community within the family still exists over the greater part of India, and important family meetings are often attended by relations as remote as fifth cousins.

Before leaving village communities and passing on to family communities, which form the next step in development, it will be well for us to look at our own country and see what evidence can be found here of these ancient customs. Those who live in towns have in that word the first piece of evidence we come to, for the word town means a hedge or fence, and was given at a time when the village alone was enclosed by a fence, each house with its orchard or garden being open to the neighbour's within the fence, and all the country outside being open for any one's cattle to graze upon. All the inhabitants had to assist at keeping up these fences, which were to protect the village and flax gardens from the cattle roaming at large without. The cultivated portion of the territory was divided into three parts, devoted to the same triennial rotation of crops as in Russia. Every proprietor had usually one or more lots in each of these divisions. These scattered lots evidently originated in the old periodic partition which we have seen elsewhere, but they had become private property before we can learn of them in history, though at the time we first begin to get authentic accounts they were still cultivated in the same way and devoted to the same crops.

In 'Doomsday Book' we find frequent mention of forests set apart to provide wood for the fences with which the two cultivated parts of land were temporarily surrounded. After the harvest had been gathered these fences were thrown down with great rejoicing on the feast of Lammas day, which was one of the chief festivals of the year, and was like a momentary return to primitive community. William Marshal, writing about the end of last century and the commencement of the present, says that very few centuries ago nearly the whole of the lands of England lay in an open and more or less commonable state. Each parish or township was considered as one large farm, though the tenantry were numerous. Round the village in which the tenants resided lay a few small enclosures or grass yards for rearing calves, and as baiting and nursery grounds for other farm stock. This was the common farmstead, which was placed as near the centre of the cultivable lands as water and shelter would allow. Round the homestead lay a suite of arable lands for raising corn and pulse, and fodder and litter for the winter and spring months, while pastures for the milk cows were laid out on the outskirts of the arable lands; the steep and rough parts were left for firewood and timber, and for a common pasture for the more ordinary stock of the township, without any further stint than the other lands gave, namely, each could send on as many cattle or sheep as he was able to keep during the winter. The private lands in the township were laid out in plots of different qualities and situations, so that each owner might have his share of each quality of land. The whole was divided into three fields, according to the triennial arrangement of crops. Such is the account given by Marshal of England's land system a few hundred years ago. Sir Henry Maine confirms that evidence, and says that he has found many traces even now remaining of these early village communities. The turf-grown ridges which once divided the three fields are still to be seen in some places. Whatever doubt there may be as to the extent to which community of property was practised, this at least seems certain, that the Anglo-Saxon had ample land to supply his food, while the extensive common pastures enabled him to keep large herds, and the forests found him in timber and firewood, so that his first wants were abundantly supplied. The development from that time to this is a history of the confiscation of the people's rights, and we shall do well to remember this history when we are asked to give compensation for the land. It is outside my present subject to deal with this confiscation more in detail, we can realise it by comparing the present monopolised condition of the land with the picture of open commons given above.

A CLOUD LIKE A MAN'S HAND.

A fierce drought wastes the land; no sign is given
To help the famine-stricken tribes that crowd
Round priests that cut themselves and cry aloud;
Sick unto death, men's weary eyes have striven
With scorching skies each morning, noon, and even:
Only the seer above with body bowed
Prays, and his servant sees a speck of cloud
Swim from the sea into the gaping heaven.

A strong wind stirs the stagnant air and hot,
And stormy music shakes the groves again;
The black cloud spreads, and spreads, and ceases not—
The lonely prophet has not prayed in vain.
O slavish king, prepare thy chariot—
There comes a sound of an abundant rain.

REGINALD A. BECKETT.

AUSTRALIAN INVESTMENTS.

In the Daily Chronicle of April 6th, under head of "Money Market," there appears the following paragraph:—"Inclusive of £17,949 brought forward the accounts of the Australian Mortgage Land and Finance Company, Limited, show an available balance of £119,376. From this sum a dividend of 20 per cent. is proposed, half which has already been distributed, leaving £27,376 undivided."

Perhaps this may only interest those folk who have "uninvested" capital, and are seeking 20 per cent., but we Socialists cannot pass it unnoticed. Here is great wealth created by the bone and sinew and brain of Australian workers being appropriated by the few persons who never, probably, earned one of the many meals they've eaten, calling themselves the Australian Mortgage Land and Finance Company, Limited. These people have "grabbed" the land, and now tax labour in Australia to the tune of £120,000 a year for the doubtful good they think they do as manipulators of credit. By legal chicanery and the fraud of interest they are enabled to absorb an amount of wealth which would keep 1,000 families in comfort.

Such facts as these may set intending emigrants thinking that they will escape few of the evils of the old country by settling in Australia, for the iron heel of capitalism grinds alike the factory slave, the Egyptian fellah, and the Australian workers.

No wonder some of our wealthy philanthropists of the Samuel Smith type are so anxious for emigration to be forwarded on a grand scale by the State; 20 per cent. explains a good many wonders, and 20 per cent. cannot be had unless population is planted out to make Australian land valuable.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

Annual Conference.—The Third Annual Conference of the Socialist League will be held at 13 Farringdon Road on Whitsunday, May 29th. Branches are particularly requested to attend to the following arrangements, if they wish to be represented at the Conference: (1) To at once send a return of their membership to the General Secretary. The representation will be based on this return. (2) Branches cannot be represented unless all monthly subscriptions are paid up to March 31 by May 1st.

Co-operative Store.—The Committee attend at the offices at 8.30 p.m. on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays. See advertisement on last page.

Lessons in French.—Comrade Victor Dave is now giving lessons in French at the offices of the League on Tuesday evenings, at 8 o'clock. The lessons are free to members, and those desirous of profiting by them should send their names at once to the secretary of the League.

Library.—The Library is open to members of the Socialist League and affiliated bodies. LIBRARY CATALOGUE, containing the Rules, 2d. LENA WARDLE and W. BLUNDELL are the Librarians.

Bound Volumes of 'COMMONWEAL' for 1886 can now be had. Price 5s. 6d.

BRANCH SUBSCRIPTIONS PAID.

Birmingham, Hackney, Hull, Leeds, North London, to August 31. Manchester, Merton, Norwich, to Oct. 31. Bradford, to November 30. Croydon, Leicester, South London, to December 31, 1886. Lancaster, to January 31. Bloomsbury, to February 28. Clerkenwell, Hammersmith, Hoxton (Labour Emancipation League), Oxford, Walsall, to March 31, 1887.

THE NORWICH PRISONERS' AID FUND.

C. W. Mowbray and Fred Henderson, of the Socialist League, were sentenced at the Norwich Assizes on Jan. 20 to nine and four months' imprisonment respectively. The costs of the trial amounted to £60, and Mowbray's wife and five children must be provided for during his imprisonment, so that at least £100 will be required. The treasurer of this fund therefore appeals to every one to give all the assistance he can.

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—Weiler gave a lecture last Thursday evening at the Communist Club. On Sunday at the Arches, 5s. was collected for the Provincial Fund, per T. E. W.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, April 13, a very successful anti-Coercion meeting was held by this Branch. J. Lane took the chair, and after a few preliminary remarks called upon Wm. Morris to propose resolution (which appeared in last week's Commonweal). This was seconded by H. A. Barker, and supported by T. E. Wardle, H. C. Doughty, Home Ruler; W. P. Walker and F. Baker, of the London Patriotic Club; and S. Mainwaring. The resolution was carried unanimously. Last Sunday evening, at 7.30, we held successful meeting on Clerkenwell Green, which was well-attended by local citizens. W. Blundell, T. Paylor (of the Leeds Branch), and T. Dalziel spoke. At the close we invited them to lecture-hall, at which an interesting paper was read by R. L. Allan, on "Men versus Money." Literature has sold well.—W. B. and T. E. W.

CROYDON.—Last Sunday, F. Verinder delivered an excellent lecture on "The Queen's Jubilee and the People's Jubilee." The difference between the old Hebrew "land nationalising" jubilee, and the present jubilee commemorating fifty years of monarchy and class government, was sharply defined, and a plea entered for keeping this jubilee something after the Jewish method. Mrs. Besant's lecture on the 6th inst. was a great success. She had the entire sympathy of her audience throughout. Over a quire of Commonweal sold, and a good collection made.—A. T.

HACKNEY.—Large and enthusiastic meeting was held at the Salmon and Ball on Sunday, Graham and Allman addressed the meeting. Fair sale of Commonweal.—G.

HOXTON.—Comrades Pope and Wade addressed large meetings Sunday morning and evening. At our hall, Eleanor Marx-Aveling lectured to a large audience on the "Working-classes of America." She specially urged the Socialists not to stand aloof from Radical clubs and other organisations, but to join them and fraternise with the members, and by these means induce them to enquire into Socialism.—E. P.

MERTON.—Last Sunday a good open-air meeting was held at the Plough Inn, Garrett, by comrades Bishop and Eden. Next Sunday at 11.30, same station, Hartison, Gregory, and Eden.

NORTH LONDON AND MARYLEBONE.—We held our usual meeting in Regent's Park on Sunday morning. Nicoll spoke to a good audience, and collected 1s. 3d. towards the Defence Fund. In Hyde Park in the afternoon, a tremendous crowd assembled, probably on the chance of seeing an affray with the police. Comrades Brooks and Wardle spoke. Police rather more orderly than last Sunday. Sale of literature good.—T. C.

EDINBURGH.—On Wednesday the 13th, a large meeting, convened by the Edinburgh Socialists, was held in Good Templars' Hall, to protest against the Coercion Bill. Fuller report given in another column. On Sunday, several members of the Socialist League and S.D.F. held a meeting with the miners of Rosewell, a village south of Edinburgh.—G.

GLASGOW.—On Friday evening an interesting meeting, organised by local friends of the League, was held at Lochwinnoch, a village about twenty miles from Glasgow, when Glasier lectured on "Socialism," Muirhead in the chair. The meeting was held in the Justice of Peace Hall, and there were over 100 present, a large number considering the size of the place. After the lecture an old man, the village Radical, tackled the lecturer on "how it was to be brought about," and a young man offered objections from the temperance standpoint. A good deal of literature was sold, and after the meeting the men were seen discussing the question in groups. On Sunday at midday, Glasier addressed a good audience at the Green; and in the evening in our rooms, arrangements were made for a forthcoming anti-Coercion meeting.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning, April 17th, we commenced our open-air propaganda on Hunslet Moor. A. K. Donald and T. Maguire addressed a large and very attentive audience. Donald appealed for help for the Northumberland miners on strike, and notwithstanding the short week 10s. 7½d. was collected. Braithwaite proposed and Hill seconded the resolution adopted by the Socialist League re Coercion and the land question, printed in last week's Commonweal. This was carried unanimously with acclamation. In the evening, Maguire lectured at Bingley on "Man and the Community."—F. C.

NORWICH.—Mainwaring addressed a large meeting in the Market Place on Sunday afternoon. 3s. 6d. was collected for the Defence Fund. At seven o'clock, a meeting was held on the Agricultural Hall Plain. Mainwaring lectured in the Gordon Hall at eight on "The Cause of the People." The hall was well filled. Mainwaring spoke at some length, showing the fallacies of governments, and how a better state of society might be brought about by the workers themselves. The lecture was well received, and supported by comrades Morley and Crotch. Comrade Darley visited Mowbray at Ipswich Gaol on Saturday. He reports that Mowbray was looking very well and seemed pretty cheerful considering. Henderson we cannot report upon, he being visited by relatives; we have not heard any tidings of him. We received 13s. proceeds of a collection by the Rev. J. J. Gurney, Church of England. He intends doing the same, I believe, next Sunday, on behalf of our propaganda fund, at his church, and is expected to preach on "Christian Socialism." A public debate was held at Gordon Hall on Monday evening, subject, "Ought Socialists to take part in Parliamentary Action?" Comrade Crotch led off in the affirmative, Slaughter took the negative.—A. S.

DUBLIN.—At the Working-men's Club, Wellington Quay, on Saturday evening, April 16th, in a discussion on the "Housing of the Working-classes," J. Loomey gave some interesting statistics with regard to the tenement house system in Dublin, and vigorously denounced the rapacity of the Artisans Dwellings Co., who pose as such philanthropic friends of the workers; J. Keegan described the condition of the dwellings of the poor in New York and other large American cities; Fitzpatrick repudiated all "tinkering reforms," and plainly showed that the root of the evil lay in the system of society that necessitated class distinctions. The speeches of all our comrades were well received. We are making a marked impression on the audiences at this club. On Sunday, April 17th, a meeting numbering over 5,000, was held at Harold's Cross Green. Speeches recommending the workers to combine were delivered by Hall, Killen, and Coffey. Fitzpatrick dealt unmercifully with the political fetish, and recommended international organisation. Thousands of Socialist leaflets distributed among the crowd were eagerly read.—O. K.

LECTURE DIARY.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE great event of the last few days has been the attempt on the part of the Times newspaper to climb a step higher towards the place of irresponsible dictator of the United Kingdom by dint of what can only be called a piece of cowardly slander; and the name will apply whether the "accusation" is true or false, since a print that could plot an anonymous accusation of this kind has no longer anything to lose as to character or honour.

As to its truth or falsity, it certainly seems out of character with Mr. Parnell's astucy that he should have written such a document at the time; and that all the more as the killing of Cavendish and Burke was obviously aimed at the very party of which Mr. Parnell is the leader, in order to break up the alliance which was being formed between the Irish Parliamentary Party and the Gladstonites: it was a sore blow to Mr. Parnell. But if it would have been stupid to write such a note then, what can one say of Mr. Parnell if his denial of it now is false? Simply that he is the stupidest man that ever pretended to lead a party; which is far from being a likely story.

As to the challenge thrown out to Mr. Parnell by the Tory party to attack the Times in the law-courts under penalty of being considered guilty, this is illustrating our friend Bax's view, expressed in these columns, on the necessity of abolishing the libel law, with a vengeance! So it comes to this, that the enemy of any man, public or private, can trump up an accusation against him, and if the injured man does not submit himself to all the chicanery and uncertainty of a law-court, he is to be held guilty, although nothing whatever is proved against him; and that though his slanderer may have at his back almost unlimited capital to carry on the battle with!

But perhaps the malignity and dirtiness of the Times' attack is scarcely equalled by its stupidity. What honest man not blinded by party feeling would think the worse of Mr. Parnell if he had written the letter? Was it not at least a common opinion even in England at the time that Burke had got but what he had long been asking for? And was not this opinion expressed by numbers of people who were shocked at the murder of Cavendish, and thoroughly disapproved of the whole affair; who thought it in fact a disastrous business? I say that this was an opinion often to be met with among persons of by no means extreme opinions at the time.

It must be repeated that the whole business is one of the basest party moves ever made. A baseness in which Lord Hartington must henceforth share after his shuffling with Mr. Dillon the other night: his Whig worshippers must now leave off putting him forward as the soul of honour, as it has been their fashion to do.

It is to be hoped at least that even this dastardly episode may do some good in helping to disgust people with the tyranny of the anonymous press; future ages will scarcely believe the story of our having submitted so long to it. And how puzzled they will be in trying to square the ethics preached throughout society with the conduct of our most respectable, most majestically successful journals.

It is pleasant to turn from these sickening intrigues to the humanity of the Irish police-constables, who have resigned rather than dragoon their fellow-countrymen; as far as it goes it carries out the hope so often expressed by Socialists, that when the uniformed instruments of capitalism come to understand what it really is that they are paid to do, they will refuse to do it. All honour to our Irish friends for showing the way in this matter!

As to the position of the two parties in Parliament since the second reading of the bill, there is not much to be said about it. In spite of his letter to the Pall Mall Gazette, Mr. Gladstone seems to be hanging back somewhat; as indeed he is wont to do in a crisis. He seems to think that the chapter of accidents may have something hidden in it which may turn out the Tories without his committing himself any more. The Tories have at least this advantage over their opponents, that they are in, and that the others are not very anxious to take their place. It will be curious to watch the lengths of cowardice that want of confidence in the principles which they profess will drive the Liberals to. Undoubtedly they need have no difficulty in bringing on a dissolution if they wish it; and if they shrink from doing what they can to deliver us from the disgrace of the Coercion Bill, they and their leader will earn a title to feebleness and cowardice which one may hope they would seek to avoid—though one cannot help fearing that they will not care much about it.

There may be some meaning in the arrest of the French Commissary on the frontier or there may be none. It scarcely seems possible that such a trifle can really be taken seriously in itself; but it may be a link in a chain of irritations which will lead directly to war. In any case the perturbation it has caused in Paris shows on what ticklish ground the peace of Europe stands. W. M.

Mr. Goschen has brought forth a budget. Such things are usually got up in a sneaking hypocritical way, but, as might have been—and was—expected, the Egyptian juggler has surpassed most of his predecessors in office.

His performance however is far too clumsy to conceal the fact that the British Empire, like all overgrown things is "gone at the knees."

The "poor man's pipe" is a delicious touch of Tory humour, but as a strategical move is rather too late. If the people were already enlisted on the Tory side it would have been a good stroke to have cemented their friendship with a Grecian gift.

But to exasperate the people and put clearly before them in what light they are regarded and then to proffer a pipe of tobacco as a bribe! A pipe is a great soother of the ruffled spirit, but even it will fail to efface the memory of Tory trickery and brutality.

The following figures show the agrarian evictions in Ireland during the past quarter: Ulster, 145 families, 619 persons; Leinster, 143 families, 590 persons; Connaught, 189 families, 953 persons; Munster, 531 families, 2,880 persons. Totals, 1,008 families, 5,042 persons. In Kerry alone 306 families, or 1,766 persons, were evicted. What are the figures for England?

Modern "artists" of the successful type, are never at a loss for a full supply of flunkeyism. They are going in for a grand "Jubilee" costume ball next month, at which they tell us "all artistic London is to be"! Including the Prince of Wales and Sir Frederic Leighton.

What profitable things murder-machines are! The Hotchkiss Gun Company's shares are at 5¼ premium. H. H. S.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS. DEMONSTRATION IN HYDE PARK.

(Abridged from London Daily Chronicle.)

A MEETING was held last Sunday afternoon in Hyde Park, under the auspices of the Socialist League, for the purpose of expressing sympathy with the Northumberland miners "in their resistance to the demands of their employers to further reduce their already starvation wage." The demonstration was fixed for three o'clock at the "Reformers' Tree," but a preliminary meeting was commenced near the Marble Arch entrance to the park, in order to attract a larger audience to the site announced for the demonstration. The promoters of the meeting carried a portable platform, and a red banner inscribed with the title of the League. This preliminary meeting, however, was interrupted by a terrific hailstorm that swept across the park, the banner being utilised as a shield, behind which a large number of persons took refuge from the violence of the elements. When the storm had abated, A. K. Donald, who has recently been on a lecturing tour amongst the Northumberland miners, asked those of the audience who had remained to follow the banner to the Reformers' Tree. At this point a fairly large crowd eventually assembled. The proceedings throughout were most orderly, and the attendance of about 40 or 45 constables, who stood in couples on the fringe of the gathering, seemed somewhat unnecessary.

H. A. BARKER, who presided, opened the meeting, which he said had been called to express deep sympathy with the Northumberland miners who were resisting the tyranny of their employers. The latter had combined to reduce the already starvation wage of the miners 12½ per cent. These incidents were common to the labour struggle throughout the world, and their duty was clear in a crisis like this. The miners were unable without assistance to present an uncompromising front to their, and the workers' generally, common enemy, and the reason was because the workers were in a disorganised state. It was their duty not only to give what they could to tide the miners over a time of difficulty, but to unite so that they might be prepared when the proper time came for sweeping away the common enemy. The Socialists were the only people who really had at heart the cause of the workers. The Socialist League had been formed for the purpose of federating the trade organisations and the workers throughout the world, so that when the real crisis came the struggle should not be alone in this country, but in France, Germany, Belgium, Italy, and in every other country where the iron heel of the oppressor was keeping down the workers. It was their duty to put an end to a state of society such as that which now prevailed. There was a delusion that it was necessary to have an idle class who performed no useful service to the community, and that a class of parasites should exist. The Socialists wished to convince them that such a class was not necessary. When the workers as a body realised this truth, they would sweep the class of parasites away. The present system of society, which allowed the oppression of the miners and other workers, would last so long as they were apathetic and indifferent.

WILLIAM MORRIS moved the first resolution, which was as follows :

"That this meeting of London citizens expresses its warmest sympathy with the miners of Northumberland in their struggle against the system of class monopoly and legalised robbery, by which they are deprived of the just reward of their labour and even of the means of labour."

He said he had recently come from the North and seen the friends on whose behalf they were appealing. All working-men were their friends; all exploiters of the working-man were their enemies. It might be thought that this dispute was a very small one, but it was an endeavour on the part of the miners to prevent themselves from being filched out of the miserable pittance they already received. When they heard of the large wages which miners got it was a lie from beginning to end. These men were earning not even a bare subsistence wage, but a starvation wage—13s. or 14s. per week for men spending their time in the bowels of the earth! Was that a due reward for labour? (Cries of "No.") At the same time, whilst the miners were so poor, were the employers poorer? No; they were riding in their carriages and having the best to eat and drink. He contended that they must get rid of the system. This strike was simply one of the incidents in the great warfare of labour against capital, which the present system rendered it imperative for the working man to carry on. The time would come when the worker will say, "We, who make everything, must own everything." They were there to sustain the revolution which would put an end to all strikes and the war between employers and employed. As long as there were employers and employed there would be war between them. They must be prepared to fight for peace, or they did not deserve to have it. The miners of the North were beginning to look at the matter from the Socialists' point of view, and as soon as the workers clearly understood that they must have their destiny in their own hands, it would not be difficult to get rid of the present system.

A. K. DONALD, in seconding the motion, alluded to the brave manner in which the Northumberland miners were bearing the hardships from which they were suffering. Although they were earning a little under 13s. a week, the mine owners formed a combination to reduce their wages 15 per cent., that being the first proposal. He alluded in strong terms of indignation to the tactics which had been adopted by the mine owners, who had threatened to evict the men from their huts, but they knew well they would not dare to evict the miners, who were determined that they would not die in a ditch. The miners were anxious to remain out a fortnight or so longer, because the Baltic ports were just opening and the mine owners were afraid of losing orders, and they would pocket their defeat rather than lose those orders.

FRANK KITZ also addressed the meeting, pointing out that they were pleading for men who were receiving errand boys' wages for risking their lives. What, he asked, was the glory and greatness of the British Empire to these men, or to those who were living in miserable rack-rented rooms? He complained of the police surveillance to which they were subjected, and which was not extended to other assemblies. He warmly denounced the men who degraded and debauched the class from whom they got their wealth, and said that boundary commissions were required at home to give back to the poor property from which they had been robbed.

T. E. WARDLE, referring to an incident which was distracting the attention of some of the audience, said, "It's only a policeman at the back trying to make a disturbance." It was said that the police were going to have a reduction of wages, and that Sir C. Warren proposed to create a fourth-class at £1 per week, instead of 24s. If the police would only be civil to the Socialists, they would try to benefit their position.

The resolution was then carried.

W. UTLEY next moved :

"That this meeting is of opinion that the only permanent remedy for the existing state of things among miners and amongst all other workers in the community is the collective ownership of the mines, the land, and all other means of production by the State, and their exploitation for the common weal."

J. LANE seconded the resolution.

S. MAINWARING gave a terrible picture of the condition of Welsh miners, and the resolution having been carried, it was announced that the total collection had reached the sum of £3 8s. 6½d.

Three cheers were then given for the Northumberland miners, the meeting was declared to be at an end, and the assemblage dispersed.

To the above report little requires to be added. There was a fair sprinkling amongst the more earnest men of middle-class respectabilities, attracted thither by curiosity, and it was noticeable that scarcely any of these contributed to the collection. One of the tall-tiled gentry on being requested to give, asserted, evidencing thereby both his ignorance and stupidity, that he had "no sympathy with the miners. Why didn't they work like other people?" Considering the state of the weather the demonstration must be esteemed a success. There can be no doubt that if the day had been fine a much larger number would have been present. Most of the speakers were drenched by the storm of hail and rain which fell at the beginning of the meeting, and spoke only with great discomfort and inconvenience. Little notice was taken of the demonstration by the newspapers. They are all too busy with Jubilee Jingoism and the squabbles of foreign states to pay attention to the wrongs of the workers at home. But the day is coming when the cry of the wronged for justice will silence all other sounds, when the miners of Northumberland and all other workers of the world will rise in their might to overturn the cursed society that denies them bread.

W. U.

NOTES FROM NEWCASTLE.

We are now entering the fourteenth week of the strike, and it seems as far from settlement as ever. In spite of the half-heartedness of their leaders, the power of the masters, and the poverty of their financial resources, the men have made a splendid stand. They have fought one of the longest strikes under the most depressing circumstances that has ever been recorded. The miners of Wales and Lanarkshire gave in in far less time.

Of course it is not wise for men to strike too long without a settlement in view; and every well-wisher of the miners would be glad to see an end—but an honourable end—of the dispute. So far, the miners are as dogged and determined as ever they were. The recent vote shows a sweeping majority for no surrender, although many large collieries declined to send in their ballot-papers. The reason for the complexity of the situation is that the miners are fighting their own leaders as well as their masters. The feeling against the leaders is very strong, and well founded,—but that subject is better left alone till after the strike.

Mr. Burt has been "explaining." His journey round the collieries has not been a pleasant one. Everywhere he has been met with a spirit of suspicion and antagonism, for which he has himself to thank. At Bebside most of the miners walked out of the meeting when a vote of thanks was proposed.

The fury of the caucus party against the Socialists is increasing every day. The Newcastle Leader lends its columns to all manner of silly attack and scurrilous abuse. The rage of the caucus dodgers is a compliment to the cuteness of our tactics and the success of our propaganda. The Newcastle Chronicle has been very fair indeed.

The Hyde Park meeting has made a very favourable impression on the miners here. The speeches of Morris and Donald were well reported in the next morning's Newcastle Chronicle. Altogether, the two months' work here has been very successful, and should stimulate our comrades all over the country.

J. L. MAHON.

EARLY COMMUNAL LIFE AND WHAT IT TEACHES.

WE have seen what the village communes were, and how they may even now be found in Russia and Java, and in the remote parts of India, while our own country shows the most unmistakable signs of having once been covered by similar associations. We must now pass on to examine the family communities which so often succeeded them in course of time, probably by the plots of land remaining in the hands of various families and not returning for repartition. In this way has grown up the family life of the Servians, which will, I think, afford us the best example of this system which is now in existence.

In Servia the land is held by family communes, consisting on the average of 20 to 25 people, though there are sometimes as many as 50 or 60; each commune cultivates a farm of about 37 to 45 acres. The buildings are all situated within an enclosure. There is the main building, including the large hall, in which all the members meet for meals and to spend the evenings in singing or telling stories. Round this hall are four or five bedrooms, inhabited by the chief's family, and often another couple and their family. The private rooms of the other members are dotted about the enclosure, often built on piles; within the enclosure are also built stables, barns, and other farm buildings. The chief is elected to manage the commune, and generally resigns when he gets old, being succeeded by the one who is deemed best able to manage the affairs. He is a much less despotic ruler than the head of a Russian commune, at least than modern ones. He is expected to consult the other members on all matters of importance. It is his business to buy what things are needed from outside; these are few, most of the necessities of life being produced at home. He has to sell any surplus produce they may have, and represents the community in any dealings with a third person or with the State. His power is very much the same as that of the manager of a joint stock company. The wife of the chief, or some other woman elected to take her place, has charge of all the domestic work and sees to the education of the children, she allots the work to the women and is supposed to be consulted in all marriages. A woman leaving the association to marry is allowed a dowry in proportion to the wealth of the community. Occasionally, if labour is needed, the husband is received into the wife's family, but generally the wife passes to the husband's. It is a general custom to allow a newly married couple the exclusive use of a field for one year, in which they grow flax, &c., so that the wife may spin and weave clothes for them and their children. Small home industries are often carried on by individual members, and anything they make by them is their individual property, they are even allowed sometimes to buy a cow with these earnings and to keep it on the common pasture. Members leaving to join the army or to go into the towns have always the right of returning under certain conditions.

The members of these communities are, as a rule, happy and contented, they are not over-worked, and live in rude comfort. Their affection for the family is fostered by the common meals and the evening gatherings, where the children play about their grandfather's knees and listen to stories of the struggles of their race against Turks or other invaders, the women spin or ornament their garments, which they do very beautifully with bright coloured embroidery, and the men are busy mending their tools or making some of the toys and nicknacks which they do so well; all take their turn at entertaining the company with music, singing, or the telling of stories. The social life of these families is a pleasant contrast to the joyless lives passed by so many peasants and agricultural labourers in our own and other countries. They have the further advantage of gaining leisure by the division of labour which they are enabled to practise. There is only one lot of cooking to be done for all the community, only one lot of poultry to feed, or one herd to be watched: the men go out and work for the common good under the leadership of the head man, and they can always summon all the members to help at specially busy times such as harvest. There is in these communities every facility for the introduction of any machinery or other improvements which might be found useful, and for a happy country life it will be difficult to find a better system.

Family communities, exactly similar to these, have existed in France, Italy, and Germany, in the Middle Ages. In France some of them lasted until the end of the last century. One hamlet called Pinon was formed of one of these societies, modified in constitution; it contained 19 persons and 13 servants in 1788. Some idea of its wealth will be gathered from the fact that it gave £600 dowry to any of its women marrying into another commune. Many of these French communities carried on other work in common as well as agriculture; there was a good deal of cutlery done by them. All through the statutes, registers, and documents of the Middle Ages there is undoubted proof of the existence over a very wide area of these family communes. It is only within the last few hundred years that the definite idea of individual ownership of land has grown up, and it is not much longer that the idea of individual ownership of the implements of production has been at all generally accepted.

These are not isolated cases which have been cited, but instances representative of a course of development which in its main features seems, from evidence already collected, to have been almost universal. There can no longer be any doubt that almost all nations have passed through a very long period, the characteristic feature of which was the common use and ownership of land and other means of production by associations based more or less on the family relationship.

Before passing from these examples, to consider what they teach us of the past course of development and of the future, it will be well for us to take a glance at the common lands of Switzerland, for here we find the modern form, if we may so call it, of their primitive customs. There has never been, in the history of the world, so far as we know, a more radical democracy than has existed in Switzerland for a thousand years. In six of the cantons, namely in Uri, Schwytz, Glaris, in the Appenzells, and in the two Unterwaldens, the people govern themselves directly without the intervention of any representative body. In the spring all the citizens of full age meet in the open air to pass laws and to appoint officers charged with the execution of them. Speaking of this ancient democratic government Laveleye says, "Nations did not start with a patriarchal royalty, as has too often been thought from a too exclusive study of heroic Greece, but rather with republican institutions." There is probably a good deal of truth in this, and it reminds us that the kings of Saxon England were elected by the Witan in old times.

But it is with the common property of Switzerland that we are now concerned. In the course of modern development much of the lands has got into the hands of private individuals, but there still remain large tracts of common lands, called Almends, which are in many cases enough to provide with the first necessities of life those who have a right to share in the benefits derived from them. The Almends may be divided into three chief kinds, the cultivated lands, the pasture, and the forest. On the cultivated land they can grow corn and vegetables, the Alp supplies them with pasture for sheep, cows, and goats, while from the forest they get timber to build and repair their houses, to make furniture, tools, &c., also firewood, dry leaves, and turf. In Stony every occupier is entitled to a little over an acre of cultivated land. In the Canton of St. Gall the village of Buchs allows each of the cultivators an acre and a quarter of good land, firewood for all the year, and Alp pasturage for a considerable head of cattle; in addition to which it derives from its common property a revenue sufficient to support the schoolmaster and pastor, and to meet all public expenses without imposing any tax. In the village of Wartow each received about two acres of land.

There are various ways of using these common lands, in some Cantons they are let out and the rent goes to defray all communal expenses, to pay for the church and the school. In one district they are chiefly used to provide common repasts, like the old common meals of Sparta, or the early love feasts of the Christians. But however their common property is used the result is always greatly beneficial to the people: their common forests make them the best housed peasantry in the world, and in many cases they are entirely guaranteed from starvation or absolute destitution by the produce they can get from their common lands.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

AN ARGUMENT.

A "gentleman" was vehemently denouncing the action of certain strikers for driving from work certain other men who had taken the places of the strikers at lower wages. "Why," said this gentleman, who, if he had been as noisy in defending the action of the strikers, would have been dubbed a loud-mouthed demagogue, "no man has any right to interfere with another in his honest work in any way. The man or men who would prevent by force or intimidation, or any other way, any other man from earning his daily wages, is a villain, an outlaw, and deserves to be shot. He—" "Hold on, friend," said I (and in spite of myself I was getting a little hot); "that won't do. You are too profuse with your hard names. Did you ever stop to think the thing over?" "Think!" he contemptuously repeated, gazing angrily around on the admiring crowd of honest labourers, "ain't the thing evident on the face of it? What right has one man to say to another that he shan't work, and then to drive him away by force if he persists in doing something for his family? If you don't like the wages you are getting, you are at liberty to quit. This is a free country, this is!" And he flashed a triumphant look over his admirers, as if there were no more to be said. But I was not enough to be thoroughly in earnest, and so proceeded to give him a new view of the matter. "Yes, this is a free country, and so it was before the war. A black slave had the same choice as me—he could work like a mule for his bare living, and if he didn't like it he could do the other thing. What does it matter how a man dies, so he ceases to live—whether by the cruel whip of the slave-owner or the more cruel method of starvation by the present class of slave managers? What right has a man, indeed, to interfere with me? If I deprive him of his place and wages, no matter how, then I'm an outlaw, am I? Just so;—what's the difference between getting his place away from him by means of a club or by means of an offer to work for lower wages? The effect is exactly the same." The contempt with which he turned and regarded me was amusing. The men around us, some of whom had not long before been supplanted by cheaper "hands," were too astonished to say anything. One meek-looking man on the outskirts of the little crowd ventured that "the feller was right, after all," but was frowned away by my now angry opponent. "Do you mean to say," he gasped at last, "that I haven't the right to hire a man to take another's place if I choose?" "To a certain extent," I replied; "if he is incompetent, or dishonest, or for any good and just cause, you have that right. But to offer your present employé lower wages, as a pretext for discharging him so that you may hire another in his place, you have no more right than he has to use every means in his power to thwart you. His daily labour has helped you to your present position far more than has your capital; for without his labour your capital would have let you starve to death." "But when I pay him he gets his share," he argued. "His share ends with his receiving his pay out of my capital." "He doesn't draw one cent of his wages from your capital," I answered. "The work he has performed more than increases your capital to the extent of his wages, or you would not hire him. More than that, his share does not end with the receipt of his daily wages. He has helped to build up your business,—he has given his time and best efforts in your behalf—and he is fully as much as you entitled to the resultant benefits of his application." Several of the listeners mustered up courage to nod their heads approvingly. "No he aint!" retorted my opponent, excitedly. "I don't hire him to—" He stopped. "To what?" I asked. But as he was about to turn away from the encounter in lofty disdain, I supplied the words he was about to say. "You don't hire him to help you! Then what do you hire him for? Just to give him employment? Quite philanthropic, truly," I added, not caring to let slip a good chance for a bit of sarcasm. He walked into a saloon not far away, followed, I am sorry to say, by a number of men who ought to have known better. Passing by on my way homeward, a moment later, I saw them all standing at the bar. That was an argument which I was wholly unable to dispute.—KNIGHT, in John Swinton's Paper.

THE CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY.—All societies and individuals who have been interfered with by this organisation are invited to write to Mr. F. Johnson of the National Refuge Harbours Society, 17 Parliament Street, S.W., with a view of meeting their charges in the most public way possible.

Persecuting imprisonments and rough police handling have had their effect on the health of J. E. Williams of the S. D. F. At the Marylebone police court on Friday his counsel had to hand in a medical certificate for his absence from the trial arising out of the last piece of petty tyranny on the part of the protectors of the citizens.

A TRUE BRITON.—Mrs. E. H. Britten gave her splendid limelight illustration of views in New Zealand, "The Paradise of the Southern Seas," at Pendleton Town Hall. A gentleman from the Emigration Society, handed Mrs. Britten a letter, asking her to speak in favour of emigration; but Mrs. Britten said she could not, neither would she until the land became the land of the people, which was now in the hands of a few.—The Medium and Day-break.

"Cornelius Vanderbilt is erecting a magnificent 80,000 dollar building, at his own expense, for the benefit of the employés of the Vanderbilt railroads centreing in New York. It will be complete with gymnasium, baths, swimming baths, bowling alley, class rooms, library, etc., and will be in charge of the Railroad Department of the Young Men's Christian Association."—Young Men's Magazine. It would be a good deal better if he paid his employés better, so that they could have more home comforts and make such buildings unnecessary.—S. S. G.

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HATED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

Periodicals received during the week ending Wednesday April 27.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

II.—THE LAND.

It is a true saying that the land question is at the bottom of the whole Irish difficulty. It is at the bottom of the whole Irish question. It is the same in England, it is the same in all the great States of Europe, of America, and throughout the civilised world. How to restore the land to the people is the question of the hour. To do so can never be confiscation, can never be robbery. The confiscation, the robbery, the plunder, exist to-day. That confiscation, that robbery, that plunder will cease only when the land is restored to the people, the public property of the whole people, not excepting one, even the feeblest, in mind or body.

"Before the time of the conquest," said the late John Stuart Mill, "the Irish people knew nothing of absolute property in land. The land belonged to the entire sept; the chief was little more than the managing member of the association. The feudal idea which came in with the conquest was associated with foreign dominion, and has never to this day been recognized by the moral sentiments of the people."

During the debates in the House of Lords on the Irish Land Act of 1870, the late Lord Clarendon described the landlord system of Ireland as legalised robbery. At the Town Hall, Birmingham, October 11, 1870, Mr. John Bright said, "Proprietary right in Ireland had its origin mainly in confiscation." Many other authorities might be referred to if necessary. In Ireland, as throughout the world, the possession of the land has ever been the grand aim of the conquerer, knowing that he who holds the land holds in his hands the lives and liberties of the people. The land once taken possession of by the conquerors, the subjugation and the slavery of the people is only a question of time.

In dealing with the land question in Ireland it is not necessary to go back beyond the middle of the 16th century. Queen Mary, although a Roman Catholic, seized a large tract of land in Leinster, known to-day as King's and Queen's Counties. But with the accession of the good Queen Bess, the work of plunder and extermination began in earnest. To destroy the Catholic religion by destroying the Catholic population was her great aim. In Ireland extermination was reduced to a system. To every English foot soldier who settled in Ireland she offered 120 acres of land, and to every horse soldier 200 acres. But in taking possession of the land they had got to kill off the Irish people, and to do so a war of extermination had to be undertaken. Hollingshead tells us that "the English killed in their advance all prisoners taken, putting to the sword old and young, not sparing the babies at their mothers' breasts. From Limerick in the South to Waterford in the East, a distance of 120 miles, not an Irishman was to be met with, nor a beast, or fruit of the earth. Those not slaughtered died of starvation." Hollingshead goes on to say that the famished people might be seen to creep forth "out of the woods on their hands, for their legs could not bear them; they looked like anatomies of death; they spoke like ghosts crying out of their graves. They were driven to eat, not only horses and dogs, but the carcasses of dead men." He adds, "the land up to then was populous and rich, plenty of corn and cattle, is now become so barren, both of man and beast, that whoever did travel from one end to the other of the one hundred and twenty miles, would not meet any man, woman or child, except in the towns and cities." Here is a picture of rapine and murder. Can any Englishman be proud of such doings? Can the Irish forget such deeds?

James the First of England, who claimed to be God-like in his attributes, but who could never believe in paying royal debts, carried on the work of plunder to a great extent, taking six whole counties, and other smaller districts. He owed large sums of money to many of the London city companies, and as he refused to pay them, he gave them lands in Ireland as compensation. Thus the Company of Drapers became possessed of 27,140 acres; the Company of Mercers, 21,170 acres; the Fishmongers, 20,451 acres; the Salters, 19,291 acres; the Ironmongers, 12,113 acres; the Grocers, 11,678 acres; the Clothiers, 10,267 acres; and the Skinners Company, 5,062 acres, giving a total of 127,770 acres, with a rental of close on £90,000 per annum in 1879. At the present time about £70,000 per annum. But look at the enormous rise in the rents of the above estates. In 1691 the rental is given at £6,000 a year; in 1782 at £8,000. Here was plunder on a grand scale. Why should not the Companies be proud of their so-called "Property?" It is calculated that not less than one hundred thousand families, or about half a million of men, women, and children, were driven from the richer lands of the north to the barren regions of the south and the west by these forcible clearances. But the most terrible period of Irish history was that of the Commonwealth. During that period over 7,700,000 acres of land were confiscated. Sir Eustace Maurice advised the Government to burn all the crops and put all the people to the sword. General Munroe, in a single day, near the town of Newry, killed seven hundred country people. In West Meath and Longford he massacred the whole population. The people of several villages having fled to the furze on the top of a hill, Sir Arthur Loftus surrounded the hill with his troops and burnt the whole to death. Sir William Cole, an English officer, in one of his dispatches to the Government, says, "Starved and famished of the vulgar sort, 7,000." Six hundred and sixteen thousand perished during this period. What a glorious period for poor Ireland.

But the restoration of the Stuarts brought no restitution to the people of Ireland. In every age from the time of the Conquest, whatever the Government, the plunder of the Irish people has still gone on. A change of government made no difference to the people of Ireland. For seven hundred years she has been the victim of royal and aristocratic plunderers.

In 1675 took place the great so-called Land Settlement in Ireland. Up to that time about eleven million acres had been surveyed. Of that about four million acres were held by Protestants, and in the "settlement" the following arrangement took place:—

	Acres.
To Soldiers who had served in Ireland.....	2,387,915
To 49 officers	450,380
To Adventurers (who had lent money).....	787,321
To Provisors (to whom lands had been promised) ...	477,873
To Duke of Ormond and Colonel Butler	257,516
To Duke of York	169,431
To Bishops (Protestant)	31,596

Total..... 4,599,032

Leaving to the Catholic population 2,328,859

This was divided as follows:

	Acres.
To those who were declared to be innocent	1,176,570
To Provisors—lands promised	497,001
Nominees in possession.....	68,360
Restitutions	45,398
To those transferred to Connought under James I. (above referred to)	541,530

And this was called the grand settlement of the land question in Ireland. But we shall have to see many other settlements in that country.

But after this grand settlement, William III. after the glorious revolution of 1688 confiscated over a million and a half of acres, of which he gave Lord Bentinck, 135,300 acres; Lord Albermarle, 103,603; Lord Conningsby, 59,667; Lord Romney, 49,517; Lord Galway, 36,142; Lord Athlow, 26,480; Lord Rockford, 39,512; Dr. Leslie, 16,000; Mr. F. Keighley, 12,000; Lord Mountjoy, 11,000; Sir T. Prendergast, 7,083; Colonel Hamilton, 5,966.

Here, again, was plunder on a grand scale, truly right royal and aristocratic in its dimensions.

But the people of Ireland have never recognised these robberies and never will. But who are the confiscators? Who are the plunderers? To whom is compensation due?

Many people cannot understand why the Irish people cannot forget these things, and why they do not recognise the claims of the landlords. The late J. S. Mill, in the House of Commons, May 17, 1866, said: "The Irish circumstances and the Irish ideas as to social and agricultural economy are the general ideas and circumstances of the human race. It is the English ideas and circumstances that are peculiar. Ireland is in the main stream of human existence and human feeling and opinion. It is England that is in one of the lateral channels." Now if Mill was right the Irish are right. And here it may be asked how many years, how many generations, how many centuries, must expire before plunder ceases to be plunder and becomes legitimate property?

Instead of the people of England condemning the people of Ireland, would it not be better for the people of Great Britain to look after the land-thieves at home, and, grasping hands with the people of Ireland, help onward the great social revolution, now so near at hand.

J. SKETCHLEY.

SOCIALISM FROM THE ROOT UP.

CHAPTER XVIII.

SCIENTIFIC SOCIALISM.—THE PRODUCTION OF SURPLUS VALUE—THAT IS, OF RENT, INTEREST, AND PROFIT.

THE problem to be resolved is as follows. The owner of money has to buy his commodities at their value, and to sell them at their value, and nevertheless at the end of the process to realise a surplus. This is the end and aim of his existence as a capitalist, and if he does not accomplish it, he is as a capitalist a mere failure. So that his development from the mere money owner to the full-blown capitalist has to take place at once within the sphere of circulation and without it: that is, he must follow the law of the exchange of commodities, and nevertheless must act in apparent contradiction to that law. This problem cannot be solved merely by means of the money which he owns, the value of which is, so to say, petrified. As Ricardo says, "In the form of money, capital has no profit." As money, it can only be hoarded.

Neither can the surplus originate in the mere re-sale of the commodity, "which does no more than transform the article from its bodily form back into its money form." The only alternative left is the change should originate in the use-value of the article bought with the money in the first instance and on which the capitalist has to operate.

"In order to be able to extract value from the consumption of a commodity, our friend Moneybags must be so lucky as to find within the sphere of circulation, in the market, a commodity whose use-value possesses the peculiar property of being a source of value, whose actual consumption therefore is itself an embodiment of labour, and, consequently, a creation of value. The possessor of money does find on the market such a special commodity in capacity for labour, or labour-power."

By labour-power or the capacity for labour Marx understands the whole of the mental and physical capacities in a human being which are brought into action in the production of commodities; in short, the man and all that is in him as a wealth-producing machine.

Now in order that the possessor of money should find this necessity to the accomplishment of his end and aim—viz., labour-power as a commodity of the market, various conditions are requisite.

The man who is to exercise the labour-power for the capitalists' benefit—the labourer—must be "free," that is, his labour must be at his own disposal, and also he must have nothing else to dispose of for his livelihood but his labour-power. On the other hand, any one who has to live by selling commodities other than labour-power must own the means of production, and also the means of subsistence while the commodities are being got ready for the market, and being converted into money.

As to the value of this article necessary to the life of the capitalist, this labour-power, is estimated like the value of every other commodity by the averagetime necessary for its production or reproduction; that is the averagetime necessary in a given state of society; and in plain language this production of labour-power means the maintenance of the labourer. "Given the individual, the production of labour-power consists in the reproduction of himself—or his maintenance."

Labour-power is realised only in action, that is, when it has become actual labour, and is producing a commodity; so that, "the value of labour-power resolves itself into the value of a definite quantity of the means of subsistence. It therefore varies with the value of those means, or with the quantity of labour requisite for their production."

The minimum limit of the value of labour-power is therefore determined by the value of these means. If the price of labour-power falls below that minimum it is destroyed: a higgling as to its price has to be gone through between the buyer and the seller, and the price is fixed by contract though it is not realised until the article is consumed. From what is stated above, it will be seen that this contract is made between two parties; on the one hand the workman, or machine for production, who has no means of producing, on the other the possessor of money who has all the means necessary for working the machine and has therefore become a capitalist. "He who was before the money-owner now strides in front as a capitalist: the possessor of labour-power follows as his labourer. The one with an air of importance, smirking, intent on business; the other timid and holding back, like one who is ringing his own hide to market, and has nothing to expect but—a fling."

The labour process necessary to Capitalism exhibits two characteristic phenomena: first the labourer works under the control of a capitalist, and secondly the product of the labourer is the property of a capitalist, and not of the labourer, its immediate producer. This product appropriated by the capitalist is a use-value, "as for example yarn, or boots"; says Marx with a grin, "but although boots are in one sense the basis of all social progress and our capitalist is a decided 'progressist,' the capitalist does not for his special purpose look upon them as boots, or any other use-value. He has primarily two objects in view: first he wants to produce a use-value, not, again, for the sake of its use, but in order that he may exchange it; and next, in order that his exchange may be fruitful to him, he wants to produce a commodity the value of which shall be greater than the sum of the values used in producing it—that is, the means of production and the labour-power."

This he is able to accomplish as follows. He buys the use of the labour-power of the workman for a day, while a certain duration of labour in the day is enough to reproduce the workman's expended labour-power—that is, to keep him alive. But the human machine is in all cases capable of labouring for more hours in the day than is necessary for this result, and the contract between the capitalist and the labourer as understood in the system under which those two classes exist implies that the exercise of the day's labour-power shall exceed this duration necessary for reproduction, and it is a matter of course that the buyer of the commodity labour-power should do as all buyers of commodities do—consume it altogether for his own advantage.¹

It is on this industry, the buying of labour-power in the market, and the consumption of all the results of its exercise beyond what is necessary for its reproduction, that the capitalist lives, just as the industry by which the workman lives is the production of commodities.

E. BELFORT BAX and WILLIAM MORRIS.

CHARLATAN CHAMBERLAIN.

THE Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, M.P., has published with Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co., at 1s., a collection of his speeches delivered between 1881 and 1887 under the title of "Home Rule and the Irish Question." The book is "issued under the auspices of the National Radical Union, Birmingham," a mighty body of the Three-Tailors-of-Tooley-Street type.

Not long since, when the quondam Radical was posing as a demi-semi-Socialist, we warned the workers against him. Those of them who get hold of this precious latest production of his will need no warning of ours to enable them to see how carefully he balances himself "upon the fence" and "kicks either which way suits him." From the ramping roaring "ransom"-demander to the prim preacher of law and order is an easy transition for this versatile actor, who does not, however, do justice to this great power of his in the volume before us, from which all that could either offend a Tory or rouse a Radical has been carefully eliminated, or still more carefully balanced against something else. This would seem to mean that the book was colourless—on the contrary it is, like a celebrated coat, of many colours. Of so many mingled hues is the garment of his thought that it is not easy to distinguish any clear colours except those of priggish hypocrisy and indomitable self-assertion. His only consistency is in favour of coercion, which he has defended all along; in all things he has tried to gratify the popular mood of the moment, on this point it is only the excuses that he has varied, the thing itself he has never changed. His hatred of the Irish members, or any one who crosses him, is instructive to behold. Whining out Pecksniffian commonplaces when himself is criticised, he uses every vile artifice to defame or discredit an opponent.

Just now the pseudo-democrat is stumping the country in search of his lost popularity, endeavouring to persuade the people that it was only by optical illusion they saw a wolf when his sheep-skin slipped off—it was their old familiar friend and watch-dog after all! Whether the sheep will listen and be charmed, who knows? If they listen carefully to the honeyed voice the raucous undertone is fully perceptible, but they seldom so listen, and the experienced practitioner upon their gullibility knows it well. However, one would think those at least into whose hands this volume falls, and it is being given away by tons by the "National Radical Union" to all who will receive, should be able to recognise the charlatan for what he is and make his words prophetic, that he was "not going to enter any cave" by leaving him no cave to enter.

H. H. S.

A Bombay native paper referring to the condition of affairs in Europe, says: "We cannot from a distance realise the intensity of the crisis, but it is certain that many crowned heads must be trembling in their shoes."

If you don't put a labour ballot in the box, the time will come when you will have to wrap it around a bullet and deliver it that way.—Labor Enquirer.

The "personal rights" people are of course much enraged at the popular support that measures get for shortening hours of labour, etc. It is too much interference with a worker's personal liberty to prevent his being exploited beyond a certain point. His individual liberty to be coerced by his poverty into working himself to death for a parasite's benefit should be left untouched! Liberty was once defined as "the right to do as you damn please with everybody, and not have nobody meddle with you." This is about the standard set up by anti-Socialists.—H. H. S.

¹ Says Mr. Boffin in Dickens's 'Mutual Friend, when he wants to make a show of striking a somewhat hard, but reasonable bargain: "When I buy a sheep I buy it out and out, and when I buy a secretary I expect to buy him out and out," or words to that effect; and the reasonableness of the conditions are accepted on all hands.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BIXING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

The strike of the fishermen at Scarborough is at an end. The men have assented to the more advantageous terms offered by the masters.

The strike in the building trade in Birmingham continues; but there is every possibility of an early settlement. Delegates have been appointed to meet the masters to arrange terms.

SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE IRON TRADE.—The Mayor of Birmingham (Sir Thomas Martineu) as arbitrator, has decided against any alteration of the rate of wages fixed in 1886. Isn't the arbitration farce nearly played out?

A singular trade dispute has occurred in Dumfries. The women employed in the tweed mills of Messrs. Charteris and Co. have ceased work owing to the introduction of new machinery, which, they say, will be the means of greatly reducing their wages.

The ironworkers employed at the Ruabon Works of the New British Iron Company, the largest ironworks in North Wales, have given their employers notice for an advance of 10 per cent. in wages. The notices have been given in consequence of the revival of the Welsh iron trade.

An important conference of miners' delegates has been opened at Manchester, fully 400,000 miners being represented. The Mines Regulation Bill and the employment of women at the pit bank have been the chief topics of discussion. Mr. T. Burt, M.P., presides over the conference.

Three men and a boy have been sentenced to three months for mobbing and rioting on the occasion of the Blantyre riots. They are not convicted of theft, and had been waiting two and a half months for their trial. Rather smart sentence, this.

The employees of the various shipbuilding establishments in Belfast have given notice to the effect that unless a satisfactory arrangement is arrived at with respect to the demand to have the wages paid weekly instead of fortnightly a general strike will take place on the 28th inst.

From the report of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, it appears that nearly £41,000 was expended in unemployed allowance, an amount which has only been once exceeded in the Society's history—viz., in the year 1879. This gives but a slight idea of the number of men in this particular trade unemployed, as the relief is given only for a few weeks; and the majority of carpenters and joiners do not belong to the union.

The brick-makers of Homerton, Cowley, and Slough, have struck for an advance of wages of 6d. per 1000 bricks. The agitation is extending, and is causing much excitement. At a meeting of master brick-makers, held at Paddington on the 22nd, it was unanimously resolved to resist the demand, and to close the fields for the next fortnight. Through this resolution, about 1000 "hands"—men, women, and boys—are thrown out of employment.

A meeting of the Board of Management of the Midland Counties Miners' Federation has been held at Walsall. Great dissatisfaction was expressed with the communications received by the secretary from the employers in reply to the circular sent out from the last meeting with reference to the wages question, and it was resolved that the Federation should be represented at the miners' conference at Manchester.

THE EMIGRATION FRAUD.—LABOUR IN CANADA.—Last week in this column we warned workers against the attempt now being made by the Master Builders' Association of Toronto to flood the labour-market in Canada and to break up the trades' unions there by advertising for men in this country. Writing to the Toronto Globe the secretary to the St. George's Society, Toronto, says: "The city is full of destitute, unemployed men. The numbers are greater than I have ever known before; not only are they discharged in the cities, but all over the country. . . . Many apply for a committal to prison, so that they may not starve. What to do with all the young men who ask for assistance at the offices of the St. George's Society I am at a loss to know." The Secretary to the Toronto Trades and Labour Council writes (March): "There is no outdoor work in progress yet, and, from a full knowledge of the amount of work in prospective, I have no hesitation in saying that we have five men in every calling ready to work, while it will be only sufficient for one." Other Canadian labour organisations have also sent warning to the trades in this country.

THE CHAINMAKERS' STRIKE.—About two thousand small chain makers in the Cradley Heath district turned out on the 25th, in consequence of the non-compliance of the employers with a demand for a four-shilling list. A large number of the operatives have been on strike during the last thirty-seven weeks, but owing to the unsatisfactory arrangements made with the employers by those who have returned to work, it has been decided that a general strike should be declared. The Glasgow Mail says: "The association might almost be said to have been instigated to take this course by her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Factories. Mr. Redgrave says in his report last year, just issued: 'In my report for the year ended 31st October 1879, I described the manner in which the enactments of the Truck Act were evaded in the chain and nail districts of Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and Worcestershire. There existed no 'giving of lines' and no direct compulsion, but it was well known that work would only be given to those who would silently accept work on the only terms upon which it would be given by the employers. I pointed out in my report that in no case during my enquiry would a workman acknowledge that he was in any way coerced to deal for gleeds or provisions in any particular shop or warehouse. Workmen out of work would condemn the system and acknowledge that they had suffered from it, but no direct evidence could be elicited of its actual existence. I regret to state that there has been no alteration since I wrote. It has been impressed upon workmen again and again that they have the remedy in their own hands, but the remedy is so severe, the result so certain to be detrimental, that individual action is powerless, and it would require an amount of courage in an individual which can hardly be expected from one man to fight single-handed the battle of hundreds. Mr. Redgrave quotes the opinion of several authorities on 'the vile system of trucking,' and concludes with this remark: 'It thus rests with the sufferers themselves to come to an agreement not to take work unless their hands are free, as the only means under the existing law of defeating the iniquitous system which prevails.' Meetings have been held during the week under the presidency of Mr. Homer, when it was decided to continue the strike. Subscriptions had been received from the Daily Post, Liverpool, amounting to £7, 2s. 6d.; Bookbinders' and Machine Rulers' Consolidated Union of Liverpool, £5, 5s.; Colonel Stewart, of London, £35.

AUSTRALIA.

SYDNEY, March 17.—After a long contest the miners of Illawarra have gone back to work at the master's terms. It was hardly to be expected that a battle fought on such unequal grounds could be won by the miners, for despite the able support they received from all parts of the colonies, the mines were slowly being filled with blacklegs, and the end was as I prognosticated, defeat. The employees in the large works of Messrs. Hudson Bros. have just had their wages reduced 5 per cent. Although wages in many trades and professions are still good, it is counterbalanced by the difficulty to secure employment when once out, and it is no trouble to find men who have been unemployed for four, five, and six months. The unemployed question has now a good grasp on the public mind, and it is not to be pooh-poohed out of existence. Several hundred are employed upon the relief works at the Field of Mars, and various other localities. A young man named McCormick marches his little army of unemployed through the public streets every night; speeches are delivered, and subscriptions consisting of hard cash, tea and sugar, bread, and beef or mutton from the butchers are collected. They have a house in Woolloomooloo, where the food is cooked and distributed, and a shake-down made for as many of the destitute as the house will hold. Rations were given by the former Government, but the present administration are pledged to a policy of retrenchment so they stopped the rations, and here I may say that Parliament will be asked to consider such measures as may be put before them for celebrating Her Majesty's Jubilee. Comment is unnecessary. A deputation from the unemployed waited on the Premier the other day; he pointed out that neither the English or American Governments found work for their destitute. I was rather surprised that the Englishmen on that deputation did not point out that there was no necessity for them to go to the head Government in England, since they had Local Government Boards to appeal to. McCormick was not on that deputation, as the Premier would not receive him, and he (the Premier) also gave the deputation a lecture on the folly of being led away by violent agitators like McCormick, and they obsequiously promised that they would not. The unemployed, to their honour be it said, afterwards stated that no more deputations should go unless McCormick formed part of it. I have heard McCormick speak two or three times, and I have found no trace of that violence which Sir Henry Parkes denounced. He is a quiet, plain spoken man, and the only one in my opinion capable of leading such an agitation. He told his hearers that the direct cause of the unemployed was bad government; that it was the duty of a good government to remove those conditions which allowed the few to roll in luxury, while the many were on the verge of starvation. The Government had poured thousands of destitute Britishers upon the already overstocked labour market of this colony on behalf of capital, and it was the duty of the Government to find them work, not at clearing scrub on such places as the Field of Mars, where they could only earn 2s. 6d. per day, but to settle them upon the vacant Crown lands of the colony; in short, create State farms, so that they would be engaged in reproductive works at rates which would support themselves and families in comfort. Too many of the workers who were in comfortable circumstances were indifferent to the cry of their unfortunate brothers, but if they did not come forward to help them, they should soon advertise themselves open to receive work at a decrease of 30 per cent. upon the ruling rates. The papers, he continued, have lately been holding forth on the advantages of low wages, maintaining that lower wages would release capital at present lying idle. We shall act on that suggestion if you do not come forward and assist us to gain a little more equitable distribution of wealth; the bees are starving while the drones thrive. This is the sum total of his speeches, and they call him a violent agitator. It is a pity that there is no one to assist him in his work, for should he get employment the cause will fall for want of exponents. I think now could be laid the foundation of a solid Labour Party. Nothing could be done without a paper, for there is none in existence that would countenance such a formation. Our elections are just over, the usual meaningless policy of reform and retrenchment. Another government formed to legislate not on behalf of a nation but of a class. Sir Henry Parkes, the Premier, was one of the old Chartist party, but the atmosphere of the colonies did not seem to agree with the progressive ideas of his young days, for he became a sycophant, a groveller, and has received his reward in a K.C.M.G.-ship. He is an ardent admirer of the Queen; he believes that payment of members is not the way to retrench, but celebration of the Queen's Jubilee would be a good step in the path to economy. The House is composed of the usual rich assortment of lawyers, usurers, land grabbers, and capital mongers. Several nominees have been added to the Upper House, notably old Ebenezer Vickery, one of the richest, man-grinding, canting hypocrites in the Southern hemisphere. It is nearly time Mammon was compelled to abdicate. What a satire upon progressive democracy when such as he are put forward to bolster up that rotten institution, the Upper House. True it was of Kenealy when he said, "Liars and lies deceive mankind and rule them, and make them sacrifice the God of Truth to bedlam nonsense."—ANGLO-AUSTRALIAN.

[Our correspondent has fallen into error in supposing that because there are Local Government Boards in England that the English people have local government. This in any real, true sense of the word, is utterly wanting. Beyond the providing of a little stone-breaking or road cleaning at the rate of 1s. or 2s. a-day, nothing so far has been done for the unemployed, who are even worse off here than in New South Wales. The evil is universal, and so must be the remedy.]

FRANCE.

The campaign against the Registry Agencies in Paris is proceeding lustily. It is said that the authorities think fit to place a guard of police round most of the Bureaux de Placement.

ALAIS.—Fifty women employed in the Saillens spinning factory at Alais have declared on strike. They ask for the reduction of the working-day from 12 to 10 hours with the same wages. M. Saillens has replied that he cannot accede to the demands.

MEHUN-SUR-YEVRE.—It appears that the exploiter Pilluwyt is climbing down and inclined to capitulate. At any rate he has written to eight workmen from among the strikers to take them on at the old rate, that is to say without the 10 per cent. reduction which was the cause of the strike.

ARNAY-LE-DUC (COTE D'OR).—In consequence of the strike of file-cutters here, the managers have posted up large notices about Dijon advertising for workmen to replace the strikers. To which the workmen of the same trade in Dijon have replied by a plain-spoken and haughty letter to the managers, every line breathing defiance to the exploiter, loyalty to their fellow-workers, and not a little of that harmless rhetoric and pomposity so dear to the French workman's heart.

The Vierzon strike has come to an end after an eight months' struggle. The working men's syndicate issues a manifesto, tendering their thanks for the help received throughout the country. "No longer hoping for victory," they say, "we have dissolved the strike and rendered to the strikers their freedom of action." This manifesto, simply and clearly written, explaining the defeat, is consistent with the whole character of the strike, which has been all along quiet, firm and persistent in ignoring provocation after provocation to revolt. A tribute of commendation and sympathy is due from all countries to our friends at Vierzon.

BOURGES (CHER).—The condemnation of Baudin on Oct. 5 to two months' imprisonment and the loss of his rights as a citizen, has been confirmed by the Tribunal of Appeal. Last week, being again elected to the General Council, he presented himself in the hall where the council was sitting, where after a warm discussion he was requested to absent himself. The Council was not unanimous in feeling as to how to act, and the president putting it to the vote, it was decided against Baudin by a slight majority. Being again requested to retire he replied by a few home truths, the scene ending dramatically by Baudin leaving the council-hall with the kind "assistance" of four or five officials.

ITALY.

MILAN.—The Tribune of Milan last week, condemned several labourers at Affori to various fines for taking part in a strike, attempting to better their condition.

TURIN.—The workers in the Royal Arms Factory at Turin make many and absurd demands of the management, supported therein by the League of Iron-workers of Turin. They maintain that the persistent reduction of wages brings many of the workers below the point of possible subsistence; that the working-day of 11 hours with 20 minutes rest is too much of a strain on them; that children are received too young into the works, gaining only 9d. a-day, etc. Among their demands is one that they the employés be treated with "common politeness and the civility that free citizens are accustomed to, and not as slaves." This is a modest demand, truly, from the unemancipated of nineteenth century Europe!

"The workman," says this correspondent, "who, in a district like ours without any industries, if he does not make up his mind to emigrate" (oh, the delusion of emigration!), "must stay on without work, or if he finds some, be content to earn the lira (10d.) or 1.50 a day, has to pay a rent equal to 150 lire a year," spending about a third or fourth of his "income" (so grandly to call it) on house room merely. With a view to bettering the housing of the poor—this has come to be a cant phrase to-day, carelessly used by kindly philanthropists—a Society for Economical Dwellings has been formed in one town, possibly by speculators; result as usual, moderately commodious and airy houses a world too costly for those for whom they were said to be built. This is a manifestation of one of the laws of the present economy, which the worthy people who honestly welcome any little reform as a "step in the right direction" will not recognise, though the whole operation goes on yearly under their noses.

A correspondent of the Emancipazione (organ of the Roman Labour Party) gives in the last issue a bitter description of the hopeless condition of the poor folk in Veneto, asserting that in the last few years the population has increased out of all proportion, while instead of their housing extending likewise, house demolition goes on largely. Possibly to reconstruct the same? By no means. Some bourgeois count with a long tail to his name wants to extend and beautify his villa, so down come whole streets of tenement houses to make way for "English grounds," carefully-tended wildernesses, mock ruins, cascades, and all the eighteenth century idiocies that delight the vulgar Italian bourgeois mind, for whom the grace and beauty of his native vine-gardens and fruit orchards are not good enough. The result is more of that hideous over-crowding, which, bad as it is in our large cities, makes the width and breadth of Italian country, which should be an earthly paradise, an earthly hell instead, brutalised out of any knowledge of or love for its own beauty.

For listening at a Socialist meeting held a few days ago at Rosewell, near Edinburgh, five miners have been dismissed from their employment. How long will workers hang back from the movement and thus make the few suffer for the benefit of the many? The more Socialists there are the more difficult it will be for the masters to make this mean use of their power. When all are Socialists the masters will not be dismissers, but the dismissed.

"NATIONAL HARBOURS."—The National Refuge Harbours Society sends us from time to time its reports and appeals. With any such work we have of course great sympathy, but can hardly advise Socialists to take much part in the raising of subscriptions for work of the kind. We believe that this and kindred undertakings should be public in the full sense, and not rest on the precarious "benevolence" of the "tender-hearted" bourgeois or the scant pence of the proletaire. They will never be so undertaken while commercialism lasts. The workers' bodies are so cheap that it costs less to spend them remorselessly, taking all risk of other loss also, than to guard against their wholesale drowning. The bourgeois gains his wealth by virtual murder, and his "charity" is but the salve for occasional twinges of conscience. Not until the people take all in hand will any workers' lives be looked after.—H. H. S.

CLASS INDIFFERENCE TO MISERY.—The London newspapers which report at great length the fashionable doings of the great metropolis, are scarcely able to find an inch of space to describe the terrible sufferings of the miners on strike in Northumberland. One cause of the present lowness of wages in the coal districts is the coal tax levied by the corrupt Corporation of the City of London. The struggle in Northumberland is only a forewarning of what is about to happen in other industries. The relations between capital and labour are everywhere breaking down, and their place must be supplied by some Co-operative Labour Commonwealth, in which the workers will be their own capitalists. Meanwhile, it is suggestive that the French workmen have adopted the successful American organisation, the Knights of Labour. Could not something be done in that direction in England? The Knights of Labour here would be a pure labour democracy, in which all who labour would stand on an equal footing.—Pioneer (Glasgow).

In our societies, established upon a very rigorous idea of property, the position of the poor is horrible; they have literally no place under the sun. There are no flowers, no grass, no shade, except for him who possesses the earth.—Rénan.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WORKERS JUDICIALLY MURDERED.

In the Commonweal for July 10 last year, under the heading of "Some Instructive Facts," the stoppage of Messrs. Marshall's flax-mills at Leeds was commented upon, and the probable disastrous result to the workers considered. The statements contained therein were denied in toto (with the exception of one paragraph) by one of the partners—Mr. John Marshall—and the article in question dismissed as false and untrustworthy. But unfortunately for this gentleman, the facts were collected by one who had spent many years in the service of the firm, and was in a position where access to all the information—utilised in the Commonweal—could be had. The fact that comrade Mahon challenged Mr. Marshall to a discussion in these pages of the points at issue is a substantial factor in determining the truth of the charges. The effect upon the workpeople of the time, by its appearance, was thoroughly satisfactory, but owing to their forced migration throughout the country in search of employment, no visible results were observed.

The disorganisation of the hands was taken into account by an exploiter, who upon the closing of the works made overtures to rent and carry on that part of the business devoted to the weaving of linens. This cormorant's first act was to lower wages all round, knowing that if any demur were made plenty of the unemployed were only too eager to step into the places of the discontented. But the great majority of the workers cast into the streets—what of them? A few hundreds are scattered about the country, or gone to America, in search of work. Those who have reached middle-age, or beyond that, with families dependent upon them, and knowing only the one trade to which they have been brought up—for these the outlook is dark indeed. A few are earning a precarious livelihood by hawking household commodities from door to door. The greater number are drifting aimlessly into beggary. Out-door relief is denied them, and from a sense of shame they are deterred from entering the portals of that English bastille, the poorhouse. One unfortunate fellow has taken such a gloomy view of his probable future that rather than face it, he preferred to drown himself. Some five others have literally died through excessive grief and despondency at their condition.

Released from the "cares and anxieties of business," the members of the erstwhile firm are enjoying that recreation and leisure which is the reward of the "fittest" in the race for wealth. One is disporting himself in the United States, another making heroic efforts on behalf of his country to maintain the Union. Solicitude for the nation's welfare and honour animates the whole batch, and the local Jubilee fund has been considerably augmented by their donations.

The story is one of daily occurrence. The stoppage of a firm; a thousand or two of workers thrown into the streets to become what they may; the lives of a few "hands" shortened; chaos and misery for a time; and then affairs begin to drift into the old state, only to see the same condition of things sooner or later re-enacted. Will the wealth-producers benefit by the lessons so forcibly brought home to them day by day? Or does it need the dumb victims of Capitalism to rise from their very graves and demand justice at the hands of their fellows? If experience—ripe in misery for the workers—is of any avail, they will read these lessons aright.

T. PAYLOR.

A correspondent writes us several suggestions as to the conduct of the co-operative grocery recently set on foot by the League. It may be well to state that it is by no means intended to let this business take such proportions as would overshadow our real work; "to leave the word of Socialism to serve tables": the idea is only that we should supply ourselves in such matters in which it can be easily done, and that all gain resulting therefrom instead of going into the pockets of indifferent persons, or even enemies, should go directly to the funds of the League: there will be no profit to any private member of the League.

BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, April 20, a very lively and humorous lecture was given by Dr. Drysdale on the subject, "Malthusians and Socialists." Numerous questions were asked and replied to. Discussion followed, Dr. Alice Vickery, Sidney Webb, Stewart Headlam, Herbert Burrows, T. E. Wardle, and others, taking part. W. Blundell was in the chair. The lecturer evidently "fenced" in his reply to the arguments put forward by those holding different views. Last Sunday evening, we held preliminary meeting on Clerkenwell Green, and invited those present to come to our lecture-hall, at which an interesting debate took place on the subject: "That individual ownership of private property should be maintained in its entirety." John Badcock, jun., of the "Party of Individual Liberty," took the affirmative; H. Davis, Socialist League, the negative. The audience, which was fairly representative, listened attentively, but it was soon apparent, judging by the applause the Socialist received, which way "the wind blew." The "Party" must try again, but with stronger proof of the correctness of their views. Literature has sold well.—W. B. and T. E. W.

CROYDON.—On Sunday last, W. H. Utley lectured on "Socialism and the Miners." He took a most hopeful view of the chances of the propaganda in Northumberland, and gave a sketch of the way in which the miners are fleeced by their employers.—A. T.

HACKNEY.—On Sunday morning, a meeting of about four hundred people was held at the Salmon and Ball. Graham and Allman spoke. In the evening, J. Lane lectured at the club on "Socialist Schools of Thought," his remarks being much appreciated.

HOXTON.—Last Sunday, F. Verinder, E.L.R.L., lectured on "The Queen's Jubilee and the People's Jubilee." The lecture was followed by an animated discussion.—E. P.

MERTON AND MITCHAM.—The two Branches held a meeting against the Crimes Bill on the Fair Green, Sunday morning last. The weather was against a large attendance. About 400 gathered around, and passed the following resolution unanimously: "That this meeting, whilst protesting against the Government Coercion Bill directed against the right of free speech and action in Ireland, and deeply sympathising with the heroic Irish race in their struggle against the landlords, asks the Irish people not to allow the present agitation to develop into means for creating another class of landlords from amidst its own ranks, but to boldly claim the soil of Ireland as the inalienable right of the whole Irish people, to be used for the benefit of all and not a class." The speakers were Kitz, Eden, and Dalchow.

NORTH LONDON AND MARYLEBONE.—On Sunday morning, Mainwaring spoke to a large audience in Regent's Park, and explained the miners' position at the present time in England and Wales from his own experience, and we collected 6s. 3d. for the Miners' Strike Fund. Members please observe Branch notice and attend to discuss important business.—T. C.

EDINBURGH.—On Sunday afternoon, we held a meeting in Queen's Park. The audience were evidently interested. Tuke, Smith, Bullock, and our secretary spoke. Fair sale of Commonweal. We expect a much larger meeting next Sunday.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—A male voice choir to sing revolutionary songs has been formed in connection with the Branch, comrade Moffat acting as leader. The first practice took place on Wednesday night, at which there was a good attendance. From the hearty spirit with which it has been supported, the choir promises to be a success. On Sunday, at noon, comrades Curran and Glasier addressed a good audience on Jail Square. In the evening, a meeting of members took place in our rooms.

HAMILTON.—A meeting of members took place in Paton's Hall, on Thursday. The subject of organising a vigorous summer propaganda was discussed. An open-air meeting, which was to be held on Saturday, had to be abandoned on account of the rain.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning at 11 a.m., we held our usual open-air meeting on Hunslet Moor. Braithwaite, Maguire, and Hill were the speakers. The audience listened very attentively. At the close of the meeting about thirty copies of the pamphlet entitled "A Plea for Socialism" were sold. In the evening, Maguire lectured at the Royal Oak Inn, Shipley, on "The Irish Question from the Socialist Standpoint."—F. C., sec.

NORWICH.—Interesting report received too late.

BOARD BRIGADE.—Last Saturday afternoon, a Commonweal Board Brigade (i.e., pro tem "sandwich-men") went out, and made a fairly successful beginning for this year, though this result cannot be said to be due to any response made to the appeal last week for volunteers. Lay members will do well to shake themselves up a bit, and not let such a useful institution flag this summer for want of volunteers. The work is pleasant, and as no special ability is required for its successful performance, none have any excuse for neglect.

SOCIALIST UNION (NOTTINGHAM SECTION).—At a meeting of the above last week, it was decided to commence a vigorous propaganda campaign in Nottingham and District, and to engage a room to hold meetings in and form a club in connection with the section. A room for this purpose has already been engaged 30 ft. by 14 ft., and we are now making an effort to raise funds to furnish and decorate the same, 5s. being collected on Saturday amongst friends, while several members have promised 6d. per week towards making it a success. A large open-air meeting, adressed by Proctor and Peacock, was held in Snewton Market on Sunday morning, when 3s. 2½d. was collected for our club room. In the evening, Peacock, Proctor, and Wane addressed a large meeting, about 3,000 being present, 5s. 6d. more being collected towards our movement, many inquiries being made respecting membership, and everything points towards a grand success of the movement in Nottingham. Some thousands of leaflets were distributed.—T. P.

A REVIEW OF EUROPEAN SOCIETY,
With an Exposition and Vindication of the Principles of SOCIAL DEMOCRACY.

By J. SKETCHLEY,

Author of 'The Irish Question,' 'The Funding System,'
'German Democracy,' etc., etc.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY WILLIAM MORRIS.

The Work treats of all the great questions of the day—political, social, and economical; of European thought during the present century; the revolutionary movements of 1848-49—why they failed; the Paris Commune of 1871; etc., etc.

"This book is a remarkable production."—Christian Socialist.

"Nowhere will be found so much important information in so short a space."—Justice.

"The book is admirable. It must be placed on the shelf of the library of every earnest student of Socialism."—Commonweal.

"A capital examination of civilised (?) society."—Anarchist.

NOTES ON NEWS.

MR. DE RUTZEN's sentence on the so-called rioters by the Marble Arch is a fitting pendant to the Norwich affair in which the members of the League suffered; and though no doubt Mr. De Rutzen can lay claim to be represented by Mr. Nupkins as well as Justice Grantham, one cannot help thinking that there is something behind that, and that the "worthy magistrate" has had a hint to do a little terrorism, and that the unfortunate persons who were not Socialists, who have found themselves in the same prison-van as the Socialists, must do their best to console themselves with the fable of the cranes who suffered for being found in the same net with the more game birds who were the hunters' real quarry: the members of the S. D. F. were of course the real persons aimed at.

One advantage the "rioters" have at all events, that the affair having happened in London, and chancing to coincide in time with the growing feeling against the Tory government, the press has been compelled to take it up in some way or other. The Pall Mall, for instance, has a leader on the subject, which does it much credit, while it had not one word to say about the equally monstrous sentence passed on our comrades at Norwich, prefaced as it was by Grantham's charge to the jury in which he coolly prejudged the case.

As for the disavowal by Government of its agents Poland, Matthews and De Rutzen, which the Pall Mall cries out for, that can hardly be expected, unless a general public outcry forces them to give way when the appeal is tried: they have done what they were told to do, and are in their places to exercise arbitrary violence whenever it seems advisable to do so; and the "respectable" mob that backs them is both too stupid and too truculent even to note the grim joke of De Rutzen kindly consenting not to send the accused to a jury, on which they might at least have had a chance of finding one or two honest and un servile persons who would have listened to the evidence and tried to find out what it was worth, instead of taking their opinion from that gross abuse, the summing-up of the judge: they would, I say, have had that chance, though it must be admitted that English juries are grown so servile, that it would be but a chance.

The reactionists are getting on, that must be allowed; to take advantage of a mere slight disturbance, provoked by what was admitted on all sides (except Poland & Co.) to have been the bad conduct of the police, to strike terror into the Socialists, is a considerable advance on their part. Their next step will probably be to drop all pretence of defending the rights of the public to the free use of the highway, or of supporting the police in quelling a disturbance, and to attack opinion directly. There is plenty of law for it, and they will have no difficulty in getting a conviction, if the unsupported evidence of policemen is to be accepted as good enough for the purpose.

The disturbance on Sunday at Kennington was the natural outcome of the police magistrate's decision of the week before not to defend a Socialist from violence. At the same time it may seem to some persons as the result of a deliberate plot on the part of the police to get rid of a Socialist preaching-stand without incurring the trouble and odium of a prosecution for obstruction. In that case it is a simple dodge and seems likely to be an effective one, since there can always be found handy a genuine collection of idiots under the name of a branch of the Primrose League, who, having nothing to say, don't want to hold meetings except amongst themselves, and so need not fear reprisals.

The Canadian Parliament by 135 votes to 47, and the Nova Scotian by a large majority, have voted a resolution against the Coercion Bill and in favour of Home Rule in Ireland. This is but a sample of the way "our" colonies regard "us." Imperial Federation may mean more to the Jingo than they will care for.

Some excitement is being caused by the proceedings of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh and the supposed Irishman who accompanies him. When a great power like England subjects any Indian prince, or other victim of its rapacity, to the usual "civilising influences" of robbery by force, the victim is denounced virulently if he seeks redress, and more so if revenge.

Even the purty Pall Mall joins in the outcry against the unfortunate Indian in question and calls out for his incarceration—if caught!

However bad the man may be, he is distinctly entitled to resist England with all his power, and the English Government has treated him and many of his fellows with such brutal treachery that it is hard to blame him if the means he adopts be modelled in too close imitation of the example set him.

Counsel applied in the Queen's Bench Division on 27th ult., for an order to compel the corporation of Birkenhead to grant a licence for a traction engine to Messrs. Fox. The Lord Chief Justice remarked that Birkenhead had not been made for Messrs. Fox and their traction engines, and refused the motion. We know nothing of the "merits of the case," but it is cheering to find that a capitalist may sometimes be prevented from doing just everything he wants to.

A theory quite opposite to that held by the Lord Chief Justice is usually held: That the whole world, and all that in it is, belongs to the bourgeois to do what he likes with.

At the Wimborne police-court lately two brothers were charged with unlawfully wounding their stepfather. Prosecutor had been beaten till he was unconscious, and left by the roadside. He was conveyed from the union workhouse to the police-court, and had his head bandaged and one arm in splints. Prisoners were fined 15s. 6d. each or fourteen days' in default! At the same court a man named Dyatt, against whom there was nothing previously, was charged with stealing four pennyworth of straw, and was sentenced to one month's imprisonment with hard labour, without the option of a fine!

Can it be wondered at that the workers are "becoming infected" with Socialism, when they see how lightly any injury wrought their limbs or lives is regarded as compared with any "infringement of the rights of property"? H. H. S.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

III.—LANDLORDISM.

In dealing with the Land Question in Ireland, and before coming to the economical part of the subject, it may be well to take a general view of the position and claims of at least a few of the great landholders. At p. 178, of Part III. of the 'New Doomsday Book' (for Ireland) published in 1876, we have the following summary.

There are 110, each holding 20,000 acres and upwards, dividing among them 4,151,142 acres, with a stated valuation of £1,512,594. No one must for a moment suppose that the valuation represents the rental. There are 192 holding from 10,000 to 20,000 acres each, making a total of 2,607,719, with a valuation of £1,174,223. There are 440 others holding from 5,000 to 10,000 acres each, giving a total of 3,071,471 acres, and a valuation of £1,453,697. We thus find that 742 persons hold, and claim as their own private property, 9,830,632 acres out of a total of 20,047,572 acres. That the valuation returned amounts to £4,140,514, out of a total of £10,182,681. At p. 186 it is stated that the non-residents only number 1,643, that is, those who very rarely or never reside in Ireland; that these hold 4,513,861 acres with a valuation of £2,139,143. Then there are one hundred and sixty-one companies or charitable institutions (including the London companies), who hold 582,327 acres with a valuation of £234,678. Also 1,350 landlords whose residence is not ascertained, yet who hold among them 615,308 acres, the valuation of which is £331,673. There is no doubt that the total rental taken from the country and spent elsewhere, amounts to at least £5,000,000 to £6,000,000 a year. Such a drain and from such a poor country as Ireland (under present conditions), must of itself produce widespread ruin amongst the population. A drain of five millions a year from Ireland is equal to at least one hundred millions a year from England.

In the county of Fermanagh there are seven great landlords. Of these men one of them, Sir Victor Brooks, writing in the Standard of November 24, 1880, in defence of their position as landlords, said: "The larger part of this county is held by the descendants of seven families planted there by the monarchs and statesmen of the last three hundred years." And Sir Victor Brookes thought that was enough as a justification of their claims to the land. Let us look at the holdings of these seven men.

First on the roll is the Marquis of Ely. It will be remembered that the Lord Loftus (formerly spelled Lofthouse) of 1880 was one of the Irish traitors who received £45,000 in money and was made Marquis of Ely for his treachery to Ireland. He holds in the county Fermanagh 34,416 acres; in two other counties 13,153 acres; total, 47,569; and a rental of £22,556. The Earl of Erne, in county Fermanagh 31,067 acres, in three other counties 9,751; total 40,820 acres with a rental of £23,867. The Earl of Enniskillen comes third with 30,146 acres and a rent roll of £13,833. The Earl of Lanesboro has a total of 15,499 acres, and a rental of £15,297; and the Earl of Belmore a total of 20,495, and rental £11,450. Then Mr. E. M. Archall has a total of 34,733 acres and a rental of £17,469. And last, though not least, comes Sir Victor Brookes with a total of 29,312 acres, and £15,630 a year as rental. Here are seven families placed there by the monarchs and statesmen of the last three centuries, and who claim as their own over 218,000 acres of land, and who have the cool impudence to plunder the people on those lands of more than one hundred and twenty thousand pounds a year. And that plunder by seven families is the basis of law and order in the county of Fermanagh.

Let us take a few others of these great land thieves, whose claims rest on the plunder and rascality of ages, and who to day are the representatives of law and order in Ireland.

The Marquis of Lansdowne, famous as a cruel and heartless evictor. He claims as his own, 11,149 acres in England, and in Ireland as follows: County Kerry, 94,554 acres; County Meath, 15,356; Queen's County, 8,311; Dublin, 2,139; King's County, 1,884; Limerick County, 1,606; and Kilkenny, 518 acres; giving a total of 135,517 acres and a rental of £53,465. The Marchioness, his mother, who holds the Barony of Nairne, has 9,070 acres in Perth and 134 acres in Kinross, with a rental of £8,881 per annum. No one will say but that the Fitzmaurices are well provided for.

Another descendant of the great land thieves of the Reformation era is the noble Duke of Devonshire, the head of the Cavendish family. The present Duke holds in the county of Derby, 83,829 acres; in York, W.R., 19,332; in Lancaster, 12,681; in Sussex, 11,062; in Somerset, 3,014; in Lincoln, 1,392; Cumberland, 983; Middlesex, 524; Notts, 125; Chester, 28; and Stafford, 26 acres. In Ireland: County Cork, 32,776; Waterford, 27,540; and Tipperary, 9 acres. Here is a man, a representative of the plundering classes, and who holds ashishshare of the plunder 193,381 acres and a yearly rent-roll of £172,099. The noble Marquis of Hartington also holds in the county of Derby 5,633 acres, with a rental of £6,257. The Hon. R. Cavendish holds in Bucks, 3,379 acres; in Stafford, 2,204; and in Denbigh, 1,444 acres, with a rental of £11,024. Here is one family holding lands, stolen from the people, amounting to 205,991 acres, and a yearly rental of £189,380. What a mass of plunder to be in the possession of one family. Why one years' plunder is enough, and more than enough, to send into penal servitude ten thousand ordinary criminals.

Take another of these noble land-stealing families, the Beresfords. This is another of those noble families on whose right to plunder the people, depends the reign of law and order in Ireland. As I have before explained, James I., of glorious memory and of God-like attributes, having made up his mind not to pay his debts, sent a young man of the name of Tristram Beresford to select lands in Ireland, as a right royal payment to the London Companies. Young Beresford was also to select lands as payment for his own services. Of course, King James was not going to pay him, so the young fellow had to plunder the Irish people. Well, he did so to his hearts content, and to the very happy content of his descendants. But let us see what is to-day the amount of plunder held by this noble family. The Marquis of Waterford holds in the county of Waterford 40,050 acres, and in six other counties in Ireland 69,184, making 109,234 acres, with a rental of £50,642. Other members of the family hold among them 60,783 acres, and a rental of £34,955. It has been calculated that from the time of young Tristram Beresford, this family have taken from the Irish people over thirty millions sterling. And the robbery still goes on.

As another instance, take the notorious King-Harman, the present Under-Secretary for Ireland. He holds in county Longford, 32,531 acres; in Roscommon, 29,242; in Sligo, 12,629; in West Meath, 1,415; and 1,024 acres in Queen's County; total, 76,841 acres, and a rental of £42,655. Even the Duke of Marlborough holds in Ireland 16,392 acres, and of course Lord Randy is interested in the Irish question. Of course the Noble Lord cannot be less than patriotic!

One other sample of Irish landlordism. Lord Kenmare, the brutal, heartless exterminator in County Kerry, holds 105,359 acres, with a rental of £26,591. In August last, this splendid specimen of Irish landlordism was protected by 38 policemen at a cost to the county of £3,800 a-year. Kerry is one of the poorest counties in Ireland, the assessment to the income tax being only £2, 18s. 11d. per head of the population, while in West Meath it is £12, 7s. 10d.

We must remember that as regards the great landlords there is no question of their claims resting on purchase. There is not one in ten that even pretends to such title. We have seen how the great mass of the land has been confiscated, and confiscation forms the basis of the whole landlord system in Ireland.

There is another consideration. As the late J. S. Mill pointed out, the average Irish landlord, instead of improving his estate, does not even put up the fences and farm buildings, which everywhere else it is the landlord's business to do; these are left to be done by the tenant. Even supposing the landlords to be entitled to the land, that it were absolutely theirs, they could have no moral claim whatever to the value of the improvements made by the tenants—houses, outbuildings, fences, roads, etc. Yet, not content with having robbed the people of the land; not content with having plundered them for centuries; not content with all that, by the Encumbered Estates Act, 1849, all the improvements, in roads, in fences, and the increased fertility of the soil; all the houses, and the out-buildings of every description became the property of the landlords wherever evictions took place, and in all cases the rents were raised in proportion to the value of the improvements made. Such a system of wholesale robbery in the name of law never took place in any other age or country. The extermination and plunder of the people is the great and leading trait in the character of the Irish landlords. As an instance of their propensity to rob and exterminate the people, the late J. S. Mill mentioned the following case, which is typical of Irish landlordism: "A number of tenants reclaimed a large tract of land on the sea-shore of Clare, and built the little watering-town of Kilkie. Their leases fell in. The Marquis of Conyngham raised their rents, in some cases 700 per cent., and reduced, by ejectments, the population from 1,879 to 950, driving them off the estate altogether."

Such are the deeds of Irish Landlordism. Too long have they cursed the land of the Sister Isle. Too long have they plundered and massacred the Irish people. And all this in the name of England, of law and order, of civilisation. The time has come when this curse to the Irish people, this shame and scourge of the United (?) Kingdom shall cease. It is for the people to take up the cry raised by Gladstone, it is a struggle of the masses against the classes. And the people, the workers, having right and justice on their side, hold in their hands all the elements of success. Let them carry it to a successful issue against the non-producing plundering classes.

J. SKETCHLEY.

WE have now got some idea of the state of society under the various developments by examining countries which are still passing through the different stages; it remains for us to see whether we can discover any consistent method or purpose in this long evolution of property in society. First we saw the savage living on the spontaneous produce of the earth. He lived on his own energy, depending on himself for everything. He did not co-operate with his fellows, or acknowledge any authority except leadership in war. The individualistic side of his character is brought out to the full extent. The struggle for existence is keen, the strongest surviving, the weakest going to the wall unhelped by any. Soon, owing to increase of population and decrease of the supply of game, it ceases to be possible to live by the chase alone, and men commence to keep herds of cattle, often held as the common property of a tribe, though often also the property of some patriarch such as we are familiar with in the Old Testament. This advance is only possible by the first development of the social side of man's character, that which makes him wish to live and co-operate with his fellows, to consider them and their interests as well as his own. So long as the savage individualistic element was the only one developed, no society was possible; circumstances forcing men to form societies, also compelled them to curb their strong individualist instincts, and so allow the growth of the social side of their nature. Gradually societies become more and more defined. Agriculture brought the nomadic tribes to a permanent halt, the social side of man developed, and communities of all sorts were formed, bound together by strong ties of mutual dependence amongst the members. The patriarchal family, governed by the head or elder, which the pastoral age had so much fostered, formed the basis. The further these family groups developed, the more the individualistic side of man was suppressed, until the time of the village communities was reached. These were associations of families holding the land they tilled in common. The unit of society had ceased to be the individual and had become the family. The heads, as representing the families, elected the governor and arranged all affairs of common interest. The common lands were divided amongst the families, the individual only shared as a member of a family in which all tools for cultivation and other property were held in common. The suppression of the individual reached its height in these communes; he was no longer master of his own body, and had to marry whomsoever the head considered it was for the common good that he should marry.

This extreme suppression of individual liberty and right resulted in the most perfect growth of the social side of man. These societies lived together in harmony, in security and peace. All had enough, and all shared in the common good to which the individual was subordinated. But man having been taught that he was a social animal, that only by co-operation and sympathy with his fellows could he live happily and prosperously, seemed to have forgotten some of the lessons which he learnt when wandering wild in the woods. He had forgotten that each man has a special individuality of his own, different to his fellows, made up of special energy, capacity, and temperament, and that the fullest development of this individuality is one of the greatest purposes of progress. So nature refused to allow mankind to rest in any form of society, however harmonious and beautiful, which did not acknowledge and cultivate the individual unit, did not give to every man and woman in it the chance of the fullest development. The result was Podsnappian type of bourgeois, who must in consequence perforce assume an appreciation of it, while with music he is under no such obligation. Here, then, we have cant in a double form.

Lastly, we come to the Socialist cant. Here we touch on delicate ground. But we must, nevertheless, face the truth that with the sentimental or semi-sentimental Socialism of the middle-classes there is mingled a good deal of half-unconscious cant. There is a sort of feeling that poverty, squalor, and coarseness are in themselves sacred, and the "good young man" who, instead of joining the Y.M.C.A. takes to studying "social questions," seems to think it incumbent on him to develop a taste for sordid habits and surroundings. A worthy person, with aspect of spotless cleanliness and refinement, was heard to exclaim recently in a moment of wild enthusiasm, that he had rather sleep in a bed infested by noisome insects than eat and drink the wedding-breakfast of a baronet. Now this sentiment, it seems to me, is more fitting in the mouth of a retired bacon-factor turned vestryman and presiding at a soup-kitchen, who wants to keep the poor contented with their lot, than in that of a Socialist. Beds, as above, are within the reach of all, even the poorest of our brethren, but baronet's breakfasts are certainly not within the reach of all. Now if the beds in question are better than the baronet's breakfast, wherefore are we Socialists?¹ The present system supplies even the "reserve army of industry" with beds of this description upon demand at the casual ward, and does not trouble them with Yorkshire hams, cold fowl, and champagne, but gives them rather meat and drink in keeping with the beds. So, on the whole, we live under the best possible of systems in the best possible of worlds. I had always thought Socialists wanted to bring the baronet's breakfast within the reach of all, and only leave enough frowsy beds to supply the wants of eccentric persons like our friend.

Again, I know of a young man who thinks it an act of Socialistic virtue (not an unfortunate necessity, mind) to live on 15s. a-week with wife and children. He started with the view of proving that after all money is rather an encumbrance than otherwise to noble aspirations. Now, I really think this young man ought to be "decorated" by Baron Rothschild or the Liberty and Property Defence League. If he could prove his thesis, no more crushing argument could be brought against those who doubt the perfection of the present system to satisfy all human requirements. Others, again, pretend to like dropping h's (a vile cockney corruption of language having only an incidental connection with distinctions between classes), dirty hands, and uncomfortable third-class carriages (such, presumably, as Sir Edward Watkin's line affords), and many other nasty things—and all because of Socialism. This is very silly, perhaps, but more or less harmless. When, however, middle-class young men take to virtuously entering an already overstocked labour-market, and thus "doing" the proletarian in more than one sense, the same cannot be said.

It is surprising that these essentially individualist and bourgeois notions of the superiority of poverty and squalor, and of the virtue of self-mortification for the mere sake of it, and without any ulterior social object (which are radically inconsistent with Socialism), could ever come to be regarded as having any part or lot with Socialism, the end and aim of which is to abolish all these things. It only shows the influence of old associations and habits of thought.

We have characterised "cant" as an eminently bourgeois vice, and it is certainly true that it is mainly confined to the middle-classes. The working-classes have many faults, as is only natural, but this is not characteristic of them as a class. No working-man, for example, would rather sleep in an insect-haunted bed than partake of cold turkey and champagne—unless, indeed, he were a vegetarian and teetotaller combined. We have only touched upon a few of the forms of cant which have more particularly struck us, but our whole bourgeois civilisation is saturated with it. Other ages have been brutal, but with none but our own has hypocrisy become part of its very nature. The whole subject of "cant" is an interesting one, and well merits a scientific analysis.

MEN WHO ARE NOT SOCIALISTS.

SOME PERSONAL REMARKS UPON MY NEIGHBOURS.

I.

O MINE enemy! how I might revenge myself upon thee had I the will!

There, over the street, just facing my window, Mr. Peebles has a licensed grocer shop. By the terms of his license he is strictly forbidden to sell drink for consumption on his premises. Yet his little back room is never empty of people who, disliking ostentation in all things, prefer to get their drams in a place where, should they be perceived entering, no one may suspect but they are purchasing an ounce of tobacco or half a pound of soap. Just now I know there are several such persons in his back room—amongst them a well-known magistrate and a local medical practitioner.

Mr. Peebles is a deacon in the Kirk; he is also a strong constitutionalist and a devout detestor of infidels and Socialists. Last Christmas he distributed pictorial calendars amongst his customers. There were two designs, which he had selected after much deliberation and a deal of consultation with his back parlour friends; one contained a portrait of the late Lord Beaconsfield, and the other a picture of what purported to be "the child's first prayer." I mention this apparently trifling fact because it illustrates the fine political instinct and simple piety with which Mr. Peebles retails his groceries and spirits. It is well known, too, that Mr. Peebles takes a deep interest in Sunday-schools and foreign missions.

Until recently, Mr. Peebles and I only knew each other by sight and reputation. He was aware that I was a Socialist; and often when I passed his shop while he was standing at the door keeping a vigilant lookout lest the police should pounce upon him unawares, he bestowed upon me a look of mingled rebuke and compassion that caused me to have serious misgivings as to the rectitude of the course I was pursuing.

I remember being at a political meeting one night. Mr. Peebles had shut his shop punctually at eight o'clock—washed his face and shaved his chin—combed his streaks of straight grey hair—and donned a clean shirt front—and had planted himself, shining like a new cut of bacon, in a front seat beside the parish minister. I was in the seat immediately behind. He and the parish minister appeared to be very warm friends, and from the manner of their conversation they evidently had a common interest in the proceedings. The candidate spoke at length on the political situation, but avoided any reference to the Church disestablishment question or the proposed suppression of the liquor traffic. My friends were obviously suspicious of this omission on the candidate's part; and when questions were invited Mr. Peebles at once rose and asked "if the candidate approved of the iniquitous attempt that was about to be made to disestablish the time-honoured national church, for which their forefathers fought and died, and for which—" He was unable to conclude the sentence, having well-nigh choked himself with excitement. The candidate replied in an ambiguous way that he would. Mr. Peebles and the parish minister gesticulated their disapproval. Mr. Peebles, I could observe, now wanted the minister to question the candidate on his views concerning the suppression of the liquor traffic; but the minister evidently disapproved of clerical interference in politics for the moment, for he soothingly declined. The grocer looked anxiously round the hall to see if any one else would rise to question the candidate upon the subject. All the spirit-merchants and licensed grocers present appeared, however, to be quite as modest as Mr. Peebles touching their own interests. At last, constrained by sympathy for Mr. Peebles, I rose and put the question. The candidate replied that "if a Local Option Bill was introduced by a responsible minister of the Crown, he would feel bound to vote in its favour." Mr. Peebles quivered with indignation, and turning round to me, hoarsely whispered, "I'm not a Socialist—but I'd rather vote fifty thousand times for a Socialist than give a vote to one of those sneaking Liberals, as they call themselves forsooth!"

After this incident Mr. Peebles manifested a kindly interest in my views; he even went the length of saying that if, as "God forbid," he should ever give up his Conservative opinions, he would, he was sure, become a Socialist. Despite the apparent rashness of this statement, it was an exceedingly safe one for Mr. Peebles to make.

The neighbourly feeling that existed between Mr. Peebles and myself was interrupted by a circumstance of a very simple character. One Sunday after church service I saw him enter his shop, Bible in hand, ostensibly for the purpose of feeding his dog. My window being high, I was able to see into his shop, even although the shutters were on the window, as they only reached half way up. No sooner was he inside than he laid down his Bible on a tea-canister and took off his coat. He then began to shift and fill his spirit-bottles with admirable diligence—taking care, however, to do so with as little noise as possible, as he well knew the scandal his proceedings, if known, would provoke in the Sabbatarian neighbourhood. Happening to look my way, however, he became aware of the fact that I saw him. He appeared much discomfited, and immediately drew down the window-blinds. Since then there is a chilly gulf between us. He is generally deeply interested in something across the way when I pass his shop now. Sometimes his glance meets mine, and I can see a peculiar meaning in his eyes. Perhaps he would like to make friends with me again, or wishes a Socialist riot would take place, when he might have an opportunity of picking me down unperceived in the tumult.

For my part, I have no ill feeling whatever towards Mr. Peebles. I would not harm a single one of the hairs that befringe his polished pate for the world. He is a mean man, it is true, and would sell his soul for a few farthings of profit—he violates his license every hour of the day—is a hypocrite in religion and a time-server in politics. But poor Mr. Peebles is not to be blamed for these things. He is no more responsible for these blotches on his character than a cat is for the colour of its skin, or a pool of water for the reflections upon its surface. The dodges to which he has recourse are conditions of life which our present system imposes upon him. When Mr. Peebles—now prematurely old, with bank-note wrinkles on his face—was a chubby little boy, laughing in his mother's lap, who shall say that he was not fitted for a higher destiny than the one meted out to him? Who shall say that if the sunshine of social justice, instead of the damp and darkness of social wrong, had shone upon his heart, that the fungoid growths of selfishness, hypocrisy, and deceit would have ever found a lodging-place in its recesses? No, Mr. Peebles; we cannot condemn, but we pity you. You are not a Socialist, and are never likely to become one—nor would your conversion be of much value in any case—still maybe you are not our worst enemy. If the fight were once over, I am sure you would gladly give up your little money-mongering with all its worrying and deceit, and sit down in the midst of our abundance and peace. And who knows but perhaps your son, despite the fact that he is a lawyer's clerk, and your daughter, despite the fact that her only vocation in life at present consists in banging the piano on week-days and reading Bible-texts to children on Sundays, may both perform honourable parts in the coming social revolution?

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

The melters and gas firemen at Consett Steel Works have struck—the former against Sunday labour, and the latter for an advance of wages. The strike threatens to become serious.

The chain-makers of Cradley Heath are sticking manfully to their colours, and should have assistance from all trades' unionists in the country. Never, perhaps, has a strike taken place which deserves more general support. This is the thirty-ninth week of the strike.

The weavers at the Old Mill and the Low Mill, Yeadon, are still out on strike, and there is no immediate prospect of their resuming work. The Long Lengths Committee have officially advised them to remain out until their demands are satisfied. Some of the other employés are thrown out of work by the action of the weavers.

The strike in the ship-building trade is making things merry in Belfast. The dispute, however, is only that the men want their wages weekly instead of fortnightly. Not much to get into a panic about, truly. There must be some capitalist dodge at the back of this system of payment, as fortnightly payment exists in many firms where large numbers of poorly-paid workers are employed, and also on most railways.

The first case decided in London under the Shop Hours Act of last year was a very bad one, and we are glad to see that the magistrate inflicted the full penalty. The shopkeeper in question had kept two of his girl hands at work for ninety-seven hours in a week—sixteen hours a day, that is, for six days running. This is a case of slave-driving with a vengeance. But the penalty is only a fine of twenty shillings. A little wholesome boycotting of all shops which are conducted like slave-plantations is what is really wanted. —Poll Mall Gazette.

Work has been suspended at the collieries in Fife and Clackmannan. Mass meetings were held on Thursday last, at which the following resolution was unanimously carried: "That this meeting, holding that the contract rules are prejudicial to the interests of the men, pledges itself to use every effort to terminate the present contracts, with the view of taking part in a national movement for restricting the working time to five days per week, and thereby secure more equitable conditions of employment." It was further agreed that notices to finish the contracts should be given on Monday.

UNION OF IRON AND STEEL WORKERS.—A three days' conference of iron and steel workers has been held at Manchester. There were delegates representing 40,000 workmen from all parts of England, Scotland, and Wales. It was decided to form a National Association to secure thorough organisation among the operatives in relation to wages' disputes, and to prevent the employers in any district taking undue advantage.

COLLIERY ENGINE-KEEPERS.—A large meeting of colliery engine-keepers has been held at Hamilton, to hear the answers for an advance of wages. The refusal of the employers caused a good deal of dissatisfaction, as the average wages in Scotland are but what they were twenty years ago, while pits are deeper, machinery more powerful, and boilers more numerous, all adding to engine-keepers' duties and responsibilities. They considered their demands both reasonable and just, the more so that the winding engine-keepers of Northumberland and Durham have more for an eight-hour day besides free house and coal than those here have for twelve hours.

THE CIGAR-MAKERS.—The position of cigar-makers is becoming desperate. Added to foreign competition, female labour is fast supplanting that of men, who may reckon in the near future on being entirely dispensed with. Another illustration of the curse of capitalism is to be found in the fact that in consequence of the proposed "boon" of a 4d. reduction in the tobacco duties, hundreds of men have been discharged, the employers declining to incur the risk of smaller profits for ever so short a time. It is to be hoped that the workers before long will recognise the hopelessness of bettering their condition under the commercial system and will declare solidly for the social revolution.—H. D.

NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—The ballot-papers sent in show that there is still a decided majority of the Northumberland miners in favour of continuing the strike. The masters have decided to reopen the pits at a reduction of 12½ cent., as stated already, but the voting shows that the men will not return to work even at a 10 per cent. reduction. The committee of the Miners' Union met on Saturday and decided to call a delegate meeting. Many of the miners are sustaining themselves by collections in Newcastle and other towns in the district. Last Saturday they had a number of singing parties for the purpose of evoking sympathy. In Newcastle they sang the hymns which they had been in the habit of singing at chapel, and many of them having really good voices they raised a considerable sum. In most cases they were accompanied by women and men who played either the violin or the concertina.

BOILER-MAKERS' AND IRON SHIPBUILDERS' SOCIETY.—The 52nd Annual Report says that "during the years 1884, 1885, and 1886 trade has been in a state of depression altogether without parallel, and the resulting strain upon all such organisations as theirs had been enormous. Their monthly list of unemployed members showed the terrible effect of the depression. During 1884 they had an average of 23½ per cent. unemployed members; and during 1886 the average had been about 28 per cent. They had now 214 branches; their approximate number of members at the close of 1885 was 27,695, but by the end of 1886 the members had fallen to 25,341. The expenditure had reached the large sum of £84,260, which was £16,421 in excess of their income; and out of this great sum the out-of-work benefit amounted to £38,967, and during the past three years this benefit alone had cost the society no less than £148,245. Sick benefit during the year had required £17,497, bad trade having a most prejudicial effect upon the health of the working classes. Other items of expenditure had been benevolent grants, £2403; accident benefit, £2400; and funeral benefit, £3441. At the close of the year their balance was £21,895." The same disconsolate tone pervades nearly all the trade-union reports, and must soon culminate. The original function being dead, a new programme must be formulated on the Socialist basis.

THE LONDON CAB-DRIVERS.—A movement has been initiated by the Amalgamated Cab-drivers' Society, having for its object the limitation of the issue in the metropolis of cab-drivers' licences, and meetings of members of the cab trade will shortly be held in support of the movement. It is reported that the distress now existing among metropolitan cabmen is very extensive, the streets being crowded with many more vehicles than can find employment; and it is suggested that the authorities at Scotland Yard should limit the issue of licences in times of depression, so as to afford the chance of earning a livelihood to old and experienced drivers. Further, it is urged that the unlimited issue of licenses is incompatible with "a stated rate of fares"; that it is "the unseen cause of discord between the drivers and the public, between the former and the police, and also between the drivers and the cab proprietors." Cabmen complain that they cannot refrain from crowding busy thoroughfares, while "the chances of earning a day's work are dead against them" if they remain patiently on the cab-rank. So great has been the distress among cabmen lately that it is said many have been reduced to the necessity of pledging their property in order to maintain themselves and families. James Rowlands, M.P., W. Thompson of the Middle Temple, and Dr. W. R. Gould, among others outside the trade, have consented to advocate the desired limitation of licences and address meetings called with this object in view.

AMERICA.

The coopers are trying to abolish piece-work so far as their trade is concerned.

The German printers of this city, New York, demand that eight hours constitute a day's work after May 1.

The American Federation of Labour comprises thirty-seven national and international trade unions representing a total membership of 550,000.

PITTSBURGH, PA.—The coal miners of the country are discussing the formation of one gigantic organisation by the amalgamation of the National Federation of Miners and the Miners' National Assembly of the K. of L. It is understood that the idea is to have the Federation still retains its organisation, with the understanding that all of its members shall also be Knights of Labour.

CLEVELAND, O., April 17.—All the plumbers in this city struck recently for eight hours, 3 dols. 50c. a day, and against certain rules adopted by employers in regard to apprentices. George S. Paine, President of the Master Plumbers' Association, went to New York and advertised for plumbers, and had 125 applications, but was able to induce only eleven to start for Cleveland. Those who arrived here refused to go to work when they learned the situation and joined the strikers.

Mark the words of a Chicago despatch: "The Union would not permit the men to return to work until the Employers' Association concluded to grant the Union's demands." Mark the phrase, "would not permit." Has the Union a chattel mortgage on the bodies of these mechanics? Men who cannot, or dare not work without asking or begging some other men's "permission" are not American freemen, but the most abject of slaves.—N. Y. Commercial Bulletin.—But, Mr. Bulletin! are they not still more abject slaves when the "other men" whose permission has to be asked happen to be employers instead of trade-unionists? You see the men of the Unions decide their own fate by their votes, while they have no voice in the decisions of the bosses.

CHICAGO, April 17.—The 8,000 carpenters have won their strike for 35c. per hour, eight hours per day. All the iron-moulders in the stove factories of Illinois, except those at Peoria and Bloomington, went on strike or were locked out last Monday. Three years ago, the wages were cut 25 per cent., and a restoration of 15 per cent. is now demanded. The St. Louis moulders refuse to touch the work sent there by the Illinois bosses, and strikes and lock-outs followed. The Stove Founders' National Defence Association is doing good service for the men. The stove-founders in Troy, N.Y., have been much agitated over the state of affairs. In Leavenworth and Milwaukee, there are strikes of the moulders. A strike of the trade all over the country against low wages is looked for.

A manufacturer once candidly said that the reason he employed women instead of men was that "woman, being always regarded as an inferior being, has acquired the character of docility and servility to a greater degree than her male competitor," and that "the labour of married women is altogether preferable. The married woman is more tractable and patient than man; she bears bad treatment better; she is more attentive and teachable than the single woman, as she is forced to exert her strength to the uttermost to provide the necessary means of livelihood." He also considers her "a useful trump to be played out against refractory workmen."—John Swinton's Paper.

BELGIUM.

BRUSSELS.—The Socialist women of Brussels inaugurated their union last Sunday, on which occasion delegations from Ghent and Louvain, besides several working-women's societies of the capital, arrived to take part in the procession which marched through the principal streets, a manifesto being distributed along the way, urging all women to unite in protesting against the social injustice the workers suffer, and to demand a general amnesty for those condemned at Charleroi.

CARNIERES.—The Working-men's League here has acquired a good-sized bit of land, on which they intend building a large hall, etc., to serve as a meeting-place. It would be well if English workers could here and there collect enough money to do something of the same kind, so that they might be freed from the everlasting hunting from pillar to post that causes so much worry and waste of time.

SOIGNIES.—"The strike of the quarrymen of Soignies," says L'Avenir, "is on the decrease. Up to the present time, many of the workers have gone back to work on the old terms. However, if most of them have given way, there yet remain about a thousand who have no intention to submit to the disgraceful extortions of their masters, which latter, indeed, tried to force the workmen to burn their cards of membership of the Workers' League. The town of Soignies is relieved of the presence of the military and police, except for one brigade which still remains on the spot. A manifestation is to be held on the 15th May at Braine-le-Comté in favour of the strikers."

We have often heard it said among the workmen in the Charleroi district that an enquiry into the events of March 1886 and into the ferocious repressive measures ordered by the governors is to be desired. Now the Amnesty Committee has decided to open such an enquiry. We wish it all success. All citizens who are in possession of any details relating to these events, and who were witness to the barbarous conduct of the swashbuckler Van der Smissen, are requested to communicate with the secretary.—L'Avant Garde.

Our political liberty is a lie, capital is now the tyrant of labour, and the labourer has to accept any terms from his employer or die of starvation.—Joseph Mazzini.

that an opposite course of progress set in, and, following the same method as before, brought out and gave play to the truer individualistic side of man by suppressing the social or opposing side. It is as if we could imagine two forces at work producing the growth of a tree, one tending to throw out long branches and twigs in all directions, the other tending to bind the branches together by strengthening the common root and trunk, and form the whole into a self-contained and graceful shape. These forces, instead of acting with equal strength and so neutralising each other, are alternately suppressed, giving full play to each in turn, and thus rendering growth possible. Such would appear to be the law of growth in human society, for ever since the days of village and family communities the social side of man has been dwindling to make room for a larger development of the energy and enterprise of the individual. But this has not been a backward movement. Like so many laws of growth, it is best represented by a spiral, in which advance represents a coming back to the same side, but on a higher level. The individual of to-day is not the individual of the savage ages; he does not merely wield individual forces, he wields social forces. The land is not left open for all to hunt upon, as in the savage days, but is still used socially, as in the days of communes, only the advantage of its social use, which was then common to all, is now possessed by the modern individual, who wields the power which this possession gives him in addition to his own individual force. Similarly in all forms of industry, associated labour, and the division of labour resulting therefrom, still exist as in the days of family communities, but the power and advantage which were then shared and enjoyed in common are now used by individuals. What is the result of this? The same struggle for existence which is to be found in the savage state returns again, the same uncertainty of life, the same crushing out of the weak. But there is this great difference, that the struggle now is for the possession of the social land and capital, which once possessed, enable its owners to live without work. It is not now free for every one to go and gather what nature offers, the keenest eye, the best shot, and the most industrious getting the best food. The getting of food and the producing of other necessities and comforts of life was made a social work in quite primitive times, and it is accomplished by many working for one object and one benefit. Formerly that benefit was common to all, now it is the great thing which all individuals struggle to get possession of. Those who are endowed with the particular capacity for getting the best in this struggle (i.e., "the fittest") get much greater benefits than were ever open to any in the old days of the communes, but those who are not successful have a much harder time of it, harder and more unpleasant work, and less enjoyment in life.

This is where the course of development has brought us now: the first growth of society having resulted in the almost entire suppression of the individual, and having made the production of wealth quite a social work, by the association of many working together, resulted in a reaction, which, while keeping the social form of production and greatly developing it, has given a great amount of freedom to the individual, including the freedom to take possession of this social production and use it for his own advantage and enjoyment.

The study of this past course of evolution will best help us in our attempt to foresee the direction of future progress; and as I believe it rests with man materially to guide and help the development of society, it will be well for us further to see what practical lessons the past has to teach us. The past development at which we have been looking may be said to a large extent to represent the growth of two great and valuable characteristics of man's nature—one the individualistic, the other the social side. These two are to some extent in opposition, and we find that the growth of each has been fostered by the temporary suppression of the other. It is in the society which shall give the fullest scope to what is best in both these sides, and maintain the best balance between them, that we must look to find the greatest happiness and the greatest goodness.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

(To be concluded).

THE REASON WHY.—During the trial of the Russian Nihilists, Ossipoff, on being asked by the President of the Tribunal how he as a student could take part in this horrible crime, replied, "I did so just because I am a student. I have learned that everybody must be ready to sacrifice his life for the common cause, and I would contribute my part to deliver my unfortunate people. I first decided to murder the Czar revolver in hand, but afterwards I thought it better to use bombs; their effect is more certain."

Here is a bloodthirsty paragraph from a "republican" newspaper, the Chicago Evening Post: "What Chicago needs is a mayor, or a sheriff, who is not afraid to use cold steel and powder and lead." If such sentiments were uttered by workingmen's papers there would be a howl about "anarchism" and "riot," but, coming from a capitalistic sheet, and the prospective victims of cold steel, etc., being workingmen, it passes as orthodox. Some of these fine days it may come to pass that the "republican" editor will be "hoist by his own petard."—Workmen's Advocate.

BREAD AND WATER.—A wealthy manufacturer donates 1000 dols. to pay off some church debt, and his pious act is published in all newspapers. The next day he reduces the wages of his mill operatives so that in a month his 1000 dollar donation is replaced three-fold. This is not published in the newspapers. So it goes throughout society. Whatever is given us direct we see, whatever is taken indirect is unnoticed. In the industrial world the advocate of mere trade unionism sees only the advance in his wages, and reckons on so much addition to the good things of life it measures, taking no account of the advance in the price of what he eats, wears and what shelters him, or the additional tax imposed for the advanced salary of the place-holder. So he plods along like the stupid animal turning the treadmill, always going but never advancing, and the greater the speed the faster flies the platform from beneath his feet.—Voice of the People.

THE TALE OF SILESIA.

(By GEORG WEERTH. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

[The starving Silesian weavers, having in their despair made insurrection against their taskmasters, were reduced to order by the rifle bullets of the Prussian troops.]

THEY sat upon the benches,
The table round about;
Each thirsty soul he quenches
In mighty ale his drought.
They knew nor care nor sorrow;
Their hearts were glad and gay;
No past and no to-morrow
Might trouble their to-day.

They sat till mild and mellow
The summer night drew near,
Full many a sturdy fellow
Of York and Lancashire.
The oak-tree's broad-branched glory
Deepened the growing gloom:
They let me tell them the story
Of the German weavers' doom.

Then while the shadow darkened,
The tale did I repeat;
Silent the strong men harkened;
Then sprang they to their feet.
They stared like men astounded,
With clenched fists every one;
Valley and hill resounded,
"Silesia, well done!"

'IL SOCIALISMO.'

WE have before us another Italian work on Socialism ('Il Socialismo,' by Dr. N. Colajanni, Catania), which is an interesting addition to the few Italian works of note on the subject. The author mentions in his opening, and with truth (and "pity 'tis 'tis true"), that sociological studies have not made the same progress in Italy as in other countries, and he certainly helps to fill up the blank pages of contemporary Italian literature by his very able critical study on the all-inclusive subject of Socialism. Indeed, to avoid any disappointment, we may at the outset warn him who would expect from the title a popular exposition of Socialist economy as opposed to the capitalist economy of to-day, that the book is essentially critical and principally interesting to the student of Socialism who has leisure for, or whose occupation it is to go economically and ethically far deeper into, the question than the ordinary enquiring reader ever has opportunity to do.

The author does not enter in detail into the history of the growth of Individualism, deducting thence the indisputable (though so-much-disputed) tendencies of human evolution towards Socialism, but that he is familiar with the same is evident throughout. He concerns himself in this book entirely with the thinkers of the present day, criticising sociology, and commenting on "the antagonism between the conception of the 'social organism' as understood by the sociologists, and the interpretation given to the laws of the 'struggle for existence' by the opponents of Socialism." He combats the quasi followers of Darwin, who, wilfully or unconsciously, be it either which, travestie their great master's concepts and twist and turn the truths of his teaching to witness against and condemn the future for humanity that we Socialists look forward to. He reviews at some length the writings of Malthus and his followers, showing the extreme importance of the population question on the one hand, and on the other pointing out its utter inefficacy alone to solve the problem of life, considering the close relations and interdependence that exists between nations in all their conditions of life. In the chapter on "Man and Nature" some of the big questions on man's struggle with Nature under a Socialist condition are raised, but the author does not allow himself space sufficient to do more than touch upon them. Certainly dissertations on this part of the subject can at best be but vague and speculative, but, we venture to think, productive of much useful speculation. Socialist preachers and writers, therefore, will do well, when they have time to spare from the necessary day-to-day work of propaganda, to project themselves and "him who would be admonished" into the future, raising discussions, not positively or arrogantly, but tentatively, carefully, on the probable development of the coming change. "The study of sociology will kill Socialism": this bold assertion of the laggard Italian press does Colajanni combat stoutly and ardently, pointing the finger of reproof at those who do not see, or feign not to see, the transformations constantly going on in the organisation of society in the direction of Socialism, asserting "that many institutions—slavery and feudalism among others—looked upon as everlasting by contemporaries who saw them in vigorous growth and uncontrasted action, have vanished like clouds blown by the wind." Everywhere, he shows, history witnesses against the permanency of any existing society, "crystallising and mummifying humanity." In his last chapter Dr. Colajanni concludes with a short and clear epitome of the position of revolutionary Socialists of whatever colour,—thus finishing a work which will assuredly find a place among the useful Socialist literature of to-day, and, though capitalism, surplus-value, labour-power, and all details of this "worn-out rotten thing the State," so familiar to our ears, find no exposition in its pages, Socialism finds a sincere advocate, and the sociologists and pseudo-evolutionists a sharp critic. ON SOME FORMS OF MODERN CANT.

A CONTRIBUTION TO THE PHENOMENOLOGY OF CANT.

It may be not uninteresting to trace the various forms in which the essentially bourgeois vice of "cant" pervades the whole world of to-day, and even creeps in among the Socialist harbingers of a new society. These forms are legion, but there are a few cases that may serve as typical. (1) There is the obvious and in this country at least most important "cant," the religious "cant." (2) There is the ordinary political "cant" of moderation. (3) There is the philanthropic cant; (4) the "purity" cant; (5) the commercial cant; (6) the literary cant; (7) the æsthetic cant; and (8) the Socialist cant. We must premise that by "cant" we understand the ostentatious assumption of a quality (a virtue or vice) that one has not got, or the "puffing" of a quality one happens to have got by nature as a virtue!

Of the general and most usual aspects of the religious cant it is unnecessary to say much, since it is unfortunately too widespread to escape the recognition of any moderately intelligent man. The form, however, which it takes in modern "cultured" circles and which unfortunately in this country is apt to spread outside them is very noteworthy. Repudiation of atheism is a favourite form of speculative cant with us. No matter what a man's belief or absence of belief may be, you may be quite sure in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred he will profess to have conscientious scruples as to calling himself an Atheist. The reason of this is not far to seek. The question of God or no God has very little to do with it. When the popular theory of the mounted policeman up above is discarded, all that remains is a highly subtle philosophical problem which it would be the rankest humbug in any ordinary man to pretend he felt the smallest interest in or even understood. The real point in the "not-an-atheist" cant lies in the fact that the word atheism is supposed in the popular mind to imply the rejection of the current bourgeois morality, the avowed sanctions of which rest on the abnormally developed policeman theory. It is bourgeois sentiment which is the well-spring of objection to the word atheism, and not suddenly evoked scruples on refined points of metaphysic. If we abstract from the latter and take words in their popular sense, we have a right to say that the man cannot be quite sincere who accepts the doctrine of development as opposed to supernatural interposition in human affairs and who kicks at the word "atheism."

The "cant" of the politician, like the cant of the "religious" man, is also protean in its guise, but its chief method is to explain away words. The politician can always show you that he doesn't mean what he says, but something rather different from what he says. Political cant consists in pretending to agreement with hearers, whoever they may be. This cant is part of the stock-in-trade of every politician, be he Tory, Whig, or Radical, and it is by its means that he tries to haul in stray votes.

The philanthropic cant is seen in its richest luxuriance when in combination with the religious cant, as for example at May meetings, when the one, so to speak, brings out the flavour of the other. The philanthropic cant has done yeoman's service to modern industrial and commercial enterprise by smoothing the way to new markets for it abroad and by hocussing the workman with sham nostrums at home. Its "anti-slavery," "missionary" (for there is a "philanthropic" side to "missions" to which all bourgeois, religious or not, do homage), temperance (teetotal), and thrift campaigns, have been godsend to the capitalist. On the one side they have constituted him in the eyes of his own middle-class public opinion a saint, and on the other side they have drowned the aspirations of the working-classes in a sea of delusion. No wonder, therefore, that the capitalist pours out his thousands freely for religio-philanthropic objects.

Akin to this is the "purity" cant which animates "Leagues of the White Cross," "Moral Reform Unions," et hoc genus omne. This form of humbug, which pretends to regard the fulfilling of a natural physiological function, except under one condition, as something like a crime, may either have at its root deliberate and conscious hypocrisy or else it may arise from the desire to make social capital out of a natural bodily defect or peculiarity—on the principle of the fox without a tail. Now it is a well-known fact that the instinct of sex varies in strength from 100, let us say, to 0. In those exceptional cases where it even approaches the zero it is obvious therefore that the social kudos attainable by zeal for the conventional morality must outweigh the natural impulse for "gratification." Here, then, we have the conditions of a highly successful prosecution of the cant of purity without any apparent insincerity that the most hostile eye could detect,—in short, we have the "honest fanatic" of "blameless life." And he or she is doubtless the nucleus of the movements in question, which become the rallying-points for conscious hypocrisy and respectability in the male, and the "sour grapes" of despised love and hope deferred in the female.

The special form of commercial "cant" here selected consists in the favourite pretence in the present day of "having a profession" or being in business. Money-making being the avowed end of life, a man of the middle-classes loses caste if he does not appear to be engaged in some occupation recognised as lucrative. He is like a knight without his spurs, a Roman senator without his toga. It is amusing to see the fortunes men will squander in keeping up bourgeois style by pretending to be following a profession or business. I have known a man who could ill afford it spend at the rate of £500 a-year in keeping a school. Another studies medicine, another the law, another engineering. It is well known, of course, that all these professions are overstocked, and that the average young man is about as likely to receive a "next-of-kin" windfall as to cover his expenses with any of them. But the young man of "means" must "have a profession" or business even though he die in the workhouse in consequence. So he goes through the course, spinning it out as long as possible, and when done takes chambers or offices as barrister or engineer. His expenses cost him two or three hundred per annum, and if his "profession" brings him in ten he is in most cases extremely lucky. When a young man with small means can't afford to go in for a profession, he has to content himself with a small office, where he has his letters addressed. This is sufficient to show he is "doing something." He goes up to town every day, lounges about, reads the papers, and endeavours to obtain the credit of being "a man of business" by, among other things, pretending always to be in a great hurry. In this way he perhaps manages to come off with no more than a loss of £80 to a £100 a-year.

This cant of "business" is peculiarly significant as marking the fully developed bourgeois era. Time was when the middle-class man was proud of posing as the "gentleman-at-large" (the remains of the feudal tradition). Now even when he has independent means, as in the cases supposed, he reckons it necessary to "good form" to pretend to be making money whether he is actually doing so or not, and is prepared to squander his substance in that pretence.

Then there is the literary or rather critical cant. One of its forms is affected hunting after blemishes in style and the pedantry allied thereto. The fact is, of course, that the modern reviewer's taste is not really shocked by half the things he sics or otherwise castigates, but he must find something to say and make above all a show of purism. A great deal of the pretended fuss made about confusion of metaphor, for example, is cant. All language is more or less metaphorical, and no one has shown the slightest rational ground why one should not pass from one metaphor to another even in the same sentence. That the sensibility of the ordinary callow critic on the subject is sham is proved by his admiration for Shakespeare's confusions of metaphor. When a man can stand taking "arms against a sea of troubles," he ought to be able to stand anything.¹

The æsthetic cant is a noteworthy product of modern culture. It is a subject about which so much has been said already that I confine myself to noticing one feature of it. Every man aspiring to culture in the present day professes an appreciation of painting. He deems it de rigueur that he should be able to maunder "some" on the technicalities of picture-criticism. On the other hand the same type of cultured English Philistine, when the conversation turns on the subject of music, will with an air of smug self-satisfaction (as if he had said a clever thing) tell you that he knows nothing of the subject. One wishes he would only say the same of the sister art, for it would be doubtless quite true. But, unfortunately, painting, or "art" as it is termed (as if there were no other art), is the fashion just now with the

NORTHUMBRIAN NOTES.

THE interest of the miners in Socialism is as strong as ever. The Hyde Park meeting had a splendid effect, and the arrival of Donald to assist in the work has been a great help. Last week I broke new ground, visiting Broomhill, Radcliff, and Inble at the extreme North of the country. The miners gave me a good welcome, and many names were given in to form Socialist branches.

The number of ballot papers issued to the miners is getting past all counting. At every vote taken the miners complain bitterly that the questions are put in a most unsatisfactory way. The worst feeling exists between the miners and their leaders. The Wages Committee has at last resigned. At the time of writing this note there is no definite ground for saying that the situation has at all changed. Both parties appear as determined as ever. But to judge from different little signs I should say that the strike cannot continue much longer. It is no use guessing at the terms of the settlement, but even if the miners should entirely surrender they have shown their pluck and determination, and shown it too in a quiet and manly way.

The Northumberland miners are the most thrifty, independent, and best organised set of men in the country. The non-unionists, too, have behaved splendidly, and have proved themselves just as staunch and manly as the members of the union. There is every reason to hope that the miners of Northumberland will be the first to take up Socialism as an active political cause, and they will set an example to the rest of the country by doing so.

We are holding three meetings a day, and at all the places are getting numerous adherents to our views. On Thursday, 28th ult., we had a good meeting at Ashington, and at the end of the lecture there was a little opposition. The speakers' contention was that the working-classes had been steadily progressing in recent years without the assistance of Socialists, and that Socialism would sap the foundations of morality, and in fact bring us back to a state of primitive barbarism! At North Seaton there was some opposition from a man who had left the principal Miners' Union to join another which did not restrict the number of shifts that a man could work. This man's cry was that the Socialists had come down to Northumberland to attempt to break up the Miner's Union altogether. He was what the miners call "a master's man," and yet he deliberately insinuated that the Socialists were paid by the masters to endeavour to smash the men's union. Surely even the Coal Owners' Association would think twice before they engaged in such a dangerous operation as getting Socialists down amongst their men! We have always told the men that they should stand by their Union, and that they should further carry out the principle of unionism by getting all the men in their trade throughout the country united in one society, and then a strike could be made that would speedily bring the masters to reason. The Socialist League has always supported the principle of trade unionism, and only has said harsh things about union men and union leaders when it has found them pursuing "the policy of masterly inactivity," which of recent years has only too frequently been the case. We have pointed out to trade unionists that it is time that they should bestir themselves to put an end to the necessity of strikes, and organise to secure continuity of employment and the whole of the results of their labour.

On Saturday, April 30th, the representatives of about a thousand miners met at Blyth, and formed the North of England Socialist Federation. This is the satisfactory result of our agitation. The movement bids fair to grow in this part of the country faster even than in London, and I am sure that all London comrades will be pleased to find that we have been able to prevent the split in the party extending throughout Northumberland. The only thing that damped the enthusiasm of the delegates was the fact of the division that existed in London and elsewhere, and the Northumberland men are evidently determined to use all their influence to unite the party.

"CHARITY ORGANISATION."

WE have received several papers relating to the so-called "Charity Organisation Society," an organisation of which we have often before heard evil reports on good authority. We are not, however, among those that are astonished at the degrading and degraded operations carried out by that society. It represents, perhaps in its basest form, the modern bourgeois ideal of what "charity" should be, a dole sufficient to keep the workers from dying quickly enough to breed a revolt, while participation in the receipt of the dole is guarded and attended by inhuman regulations that heat seven times and again the hell in which the poor sojourn always.

In any sensibly arranged community, a community, that is, in which none willing and able to labour need lack the work to do, having for that work the full fruit of it, being alike masters of their work and of their time, there would be no room for "charity." Each man in his working-years would repay to the community their outlay upon him in childhood and youth, and at the same time store in their hands enough to keep his declining years in comfort.

But, so long as all but a bare subsistence is filched from the worker, anything that happens, without waiting until he is old or sick, may render him helpless. Then it is that the bourgeois "philanthropist" bribes the toadies, bewilders and befools the ignorant, and drowns the cries of the starving with the clamour of committees and soup-kitchens. In all such work there are none more truculently active than the C.O.S. and its supporters.

But the workers must recognise that, vast as the burden of hatred is that this society has laid upon them, it is as naught compared to that imposed inevitably by the capitalist system. Nor can all the hellish brutality charged, with seeming truth, against the C.O.S., compare with that necessarily exercised from day to day upon the helpless people by their exploiting "employers." The Charity Record called in a recent number for "such a burst of popular indignation against this prying and persecuting inquisition as would speedily sweep it out of its callous and degraded existence." While this is being done we hope that the power behind it—Monopoly—will not be forgotten. Break the tool only and a new one may be made. Paralyse the arm that wields it and the tool is useless.

EXPIRATION OF TERM OF SENTENCE OF ONE OF THE NORWICH PRISONERS.

Our comrade Henderson will come out of prison on May 16th, having gone through the whole term of imprisonment to which he was condemned because he preached Socialism and because somebody else broke a plate-class window. Our comrade, who is a very young man, depends for his subsistence entirely on literary work. His attempts to get employment in that line of industry, as often happens with persons of his time of life, had not been successful when they were interrupted by the disgraceful tyranny to which he has been subjected: but he has considerable talent as a writer, and will certainly succeed in the long-run. Under these circumstances, we invite contributions from all lovers of freedom to tide our comrade over a very rough passage of his career. Subscriptions may be sent to the Treasurer, Socialist League, 13 Farringdon Road.

THE SCANDALOUS SENTENCES.

Arrangements are being made for the holding of a public demonstration to condemn the sentences passed by Mr. De Rutzen at the Marylebone police-court, on Wednesday April 27, upon certain persons alleged to have been engaged in riotous proceedings near the Marble Arch.

At the first meeting of the General Council of the Holborn Liberal and Radical Association held at the St. John's Schools, Kingsgate Street, Holborn, on Friday April 29, the following resolution was passed unanimously: "That this meeting regrets the severity of the sentences passed on the Socialists as being disproportionate to the offence, and calculated to afford colour to the idea that they were punished so severely because their opinions are unpopular among the monied classes."

Labour Emancipation League: "That this meeting of the Labour Emancipation League enters its indignant protest against the inhuman and Government-inspired sentence of six months' imprisonment passed on our comrade Williams by Mr. De Rutzen, and is of opinion that such tyranny merits the detestation of all true men and women."

Resolutions of a similar character to the above have been passed at a large number of meetings convened by the various Branches of the Socialist League and affiliated bodies.

In the House of Commons on Tuesday Mr. Graham asked if the Government intended to include London among the "proclaimed districts." Mr. Pickersgill and Mr. Conybeare also asked questions as to the convictions and the oppressive bail fixed. The usual shuffling answers were returned. One is almost tempted to wish for a sharp dose of coercion in order to sting the servile apathetic London workers into a more manly attitude towards their oppressors.

LITERARY NOTICES.

'Socialism from the Christian Point of View,' (Walter Scott, Newcastle) by the Rev. Moore Ede, Rector of Gateshead, is a sermon on Socialism called forth by the work of Socialist missionaries in Northumberland. It is written in a kindly strain and expresses emphatic agreement with the socialistic exposure of economic evils. The writer's point of disagreement with the Socialists is expressed in the sentence "Raise the individuals, and so raise society." The reverse of this would be nearer right. The author's fear about the "coercive" methods of Socialism is rather absurd. The following extract is given as a specimen of this excellent pamphlet: "That a few should have a life all leisure while the mass have a life of weary toil, is a condition of things which, stripped of legal sophisms, is essentially unjust. That a few should have wealth far in excess of man's power to enjoy, while many have barely enough to keep body and soul together, is not an expression of the Christian ideal of universal brotherhood. That young ladies should spend their days in playing lawn tennis, and their evenings at parties, while the sempstress who makes their dresses earns such a miserable pittance by long hours of weary toil, she is barely able to maintain life, and is terribly tempted to abandon the dreary labours of honest toil for the larger gains of vice, is not an expression of the Christian ideal of universal sisterhood." BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, April 27, T. E. Wardle lectured on "Ireland." Last Sunday evening good open-air meeting was held on Clerkenwell Green, addressed by Dalziel and Doughty (Home Ruler). In hall, after monthly business meeting, a very pleasant "social" was indulged in by members and friends. Literature has sold well.—W. B. and T. E. W.

CROYDON.—Last Sunday, Paul Campbell delivered a lecture on the "Demands of Justice." A good discussion followed.—A. T.

HOXTON.—On Sunday evening, we had a very full hall. A large number were attracted with the prospect of hearing the advocate of the L.P.D.L. severely criticised. The audience was indignant but not surprised on hearing the lame excuse used by the L.P.D.L. to break Mr. Lyons' engagement to lecture, "That their lecture season was over," especially when we were told by one of the audience that he was advertised to lecture at Barnsbury the same morning. Several of our members gave a thorough exposure of the work of the L.P.D.L., which was well received by those present. At the close of the meeting a large amount of literature bearing upon the work of the L.P.D.L. and its members was distributed.—E. P.

MERTON AND MITCHAM.—On Sunday last, we held a good meeting at Mitcham Fair Green, addressed by Kitz and Eden. At Plough Inn, Garratt, C. Harrison and Dalchow held good meeting. We are making headway. On Friday last, we gave the local Radicals help at a most successful anti-Coercion meeting at St. Georges' Hall.—F. K.

EDINBURGH.—On Saturday, April 30, Tuke and G. Hossack visited the miners of Loanhead and district, and disposed of a lot of literature. On Sunday afternoon, in Queen's Park, Tuke, Smith, sen. and jun., Davidson, and Gilray spoke to an audience considerably larger than that of the previous Sunday. Good sale of literature. In the evening, Thomson (S.D.F.) and Tuke held a meeting in the meadows. On Monday evening, Mahon spoke in the meadows to a large audience, and 11s. 6½d. was collected for the Northumberland miners.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—On Wednesday evening, comrade Arch McLaren gave a lecture on Socialism to the Cambuslang Miners' Association. The lecture was well received, and after the meeting was over quite a number of the miners demonstrated their approval by accompanying our comrades to the train. On Saturday evening, J. L. Mahon and Glasier addressed an open-air meeting at Paisley. The audience received our comrades' speeches with much approval. On Sunday evening, after returning from Hamilton, Mahon addressed a meeting of about 1000 people on Jail Square. Comrades Curran, Warrington, and Glasier also spoke.

HAMILTON.—On Thursday evening, Glasier, from Glasgow, addressed a meeting at the New Cross. On Sunday, J. L. Mahon addressed a meeting of the Hamilton miners at the Low Quarries. Unfortunately, owing to Mahon and Glasgow friends having arrived late, a portion of the miners had gone away. Mahon's description of the condition of the Northumberland miners, and his exposition of the labour question, made a marked impression on the audience. Comrades McMunn and Glasier also spoke. A collection on behalf of the Northumberland miners was taken.

NORWICH.—On Sunday morning, a meeting was held at Ber St. Fountain, addressed by comrade Crotch. In the afternoon a large meeting was held in the Market Place, and H. A. Barker, of London, spoke at some length. The following resolution was moved by Slaughter, "That this meeting of Norwich workers expresses its warmest sympathy with the miners of Northumberland in their struggle against the system of class monopoly and legalised robbery, by which they are deprived of the just reward of their labour, and even of the means of labour." Carried unanimously, and 10s. 6½d. was collected for the miners; a subscription list has been opened here for them by us. In the evening, Barker addressed a meeting on the Agricultural Hall Plain, and afterwards gave a very interesting lecture in the Gordon Hall to a good audience, on "Socialism as the Necessary Outcome of the Present System of Society." After the lecture a resolution of sympathy with comrades Williams and others now under sentence of various terms of imprisonment was moved by comrade Crotch, seconded by Barker, and carried unanimously. On Monday evening, Parker lectured upon Northumberland strike. Next Sunday we shall have a church parade, as the Rev. S. Headlam will be here. On Monday, May 9th, we have Kropotkin with us, on May 16th will be the release of our comrade Fred Henderson. We shall meet him in the morning, and in the evening a public welcome tea will be held.—A. S.

WALSALL.—Last Saturday, the Branch held its first open-air meeting in the Market-place. H. Sanders and Deakin spoke, and were listened to with great attention by a good audience. Literature sold well.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—On Saturday, April 30th, at the Working-men's Club, Wellington Quay, comrade Karpel, who made his debut as a public speaker in combating the theory that the development of the industrial resources of Ireland would necessarily benefit the whole people, instanced the case of Russia, where, although the government had provided the highest class of teachers to impart technical knowledge to the workers in certain trades, the people were in a more degraded and impoverished condition than in these islands. The only hope for the workers was, he contended, in the International Social Revolution. The chairman, Mr. Walker, in closing the discussion, knocked the sentimental protection theories "into a cocked hat." On Sunday, May 1st, at Dollymount Strand, a meeting numbering about 1,000 was held under the auspices of the Labour League. Resolutions calling on the workers to combine, and denouncing the conduct of the Corporation of Dublin in reducing the wages of the labourers in their employment whilst they advanced the salaries of the highly-paid officials, were spoken to by Upward, Hickey, Hall, and Toomey. Fitzpatrick expounded the doctrines of International Socialism, claiming for it an impartial examination, and condemned the rascality of the police magistrate De Rutzen in the case of the Hyde Park prisoners. At the close of the meeting nearly thirty names were given in to form a branch of the Labour League in the neighbourhood.

NEWCASTLE.—Successful meetings were held in Newcastle on Sunday at Sandhill and The Market. At the market the police ordered me to stop speaking, but as there was a Salvation Army meeting being held on the other side of the way, I pointed out to the policeman that he would have to stop their meeting as well as mine. "Oh, but," said he, "they are on another tack from you." "Quite so," I retorted, "but I shall continue my speech as long as the others are allowed to." My name and address was taken, but whether the police propose to give a free advertisement to our propaganda remains to be seen. Nothing is wanted at present in Newcastle except a little police interference to make our movement go with increased impetus. The lecture in the Temperance Hall in the Gallowgate was well attended. On Monday, we held successful meetings at Bedlington and at Hartley. Some pertinent questions were put by a Hartley man as to what would become, under Socialism, of a poor man's savings. I pointed out that every man under Socialism would be receiving the full reward of his labour, have his income increased 200 per cent., which would more than compensate him for losing interest on his trumpery investments.—A. K. D.

SOCIALIST UNION (NOTTINGHAM SECTION).—It is doubtful whether we shall be able to keep the room we have taken for a club-room, etc. The agent let it to us, but the landlord objects to it being used for a Socialist meeting-room. After comrade Peacock explained Socialism to him he said he would consider the matter for a week. We have supplied him with a quantity of Socialist literature, including copies of the Commonweal, to read in the meantime. This is not the first time we have been boycotted in trying to get a room. In trying to get another room recently we were met with the same difficulty. It looks as if they would sooner keep their places shut up than let them to Socialists. This is boycotting by the landlord class, and in England. Last Sunday, Peacock, Wane, and Proctor addressed large audiences in Sninton on market morning, and Great Market in the evening. Collection in morning 4s., evening 5s., towards furnishing a club-room. A resolution condemning the action of De Rutzen in suspending trial by jury at the bidding of Government official, and sentencing six respectable and peaceful citizens to six months' imprisonment with hard labour on the unsupported evidence of ignorant policemen, was passed unanimously.—T. P.

SOCIALISM AND THE MINERS.

J. L. Mahon is now addressing meetings in Scotland in furtherance of the Socialist propaganda in the interest of the Northumberland miners on strike. A full report will be given in these columns next week. In the meantime, the reports to hand show that Mahon arrived in Leith from Newcastle on Friday April 29, and spoke at Paisley on Saturday night. On the following Sunday afternoon he addressed a gathering of miners organised by the Hamilton Branch of the Socialist League, and on the same evening a large gathering in Glasgow at Jail Square. On Monday night a meeting was held in the East Meadows, Edinburgh. Meetings are also announced for Tuesday night in the Tron Hall, Edinburgh, and on Wednesday night at Leith Links. The announcements of other meetings are as follows:

Thursday May 5th.—Miners' National Federation (Scotland), Mass Meeting at Hamilton Palace Grounds at 3. Hamilton Branch, Socialist League, at 8 p.m.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Tory Government, it is generally said, has made a great mistake about the Privilege episode; even their own papers have blamed them for their conduct, and the whole country will endorse that blame. That may be, and certainly such are the tight places into which stupid lying leads most commonly. Yet after all the Tory Government is very strong against any mere constitutional attacks. It has a well-grounded confidence in the strength of party feeling, and the very common wish of the flunkey of all classes to vote for "the Gentlemanly Interest," like the innkeeper in 'Martin Chuzzlewit.' And the Liberal Unionists who hold the balance for it, are prepared to wade through any amount of dirt in defence of their "principles." The division on Mr. Gladstone's amendment moving the appointment of a select committee, and that in the teeth of the Standard's disapproval, shows that the Government has some reason for its recklessness, and that we shall have a Tory Government in for some time to come—a matter of small importance, since the alternative is a Liberal Government.

To return to the matter of questions in the House. Honourable members are more easily satisfied with the answers given than a believer in the benefits of Parliament would be likely to expect. Take for example Sir H. Holland's answer on May 7 about the flogging in the Hong Kong prison. Considering that we all know how little a Chinaman can live on, and also that of all scoundrelly oppressors the English colonial or crown-colony one is the vilest, does it not seem as if "the reduction of the diet, the existing scale of which was considered excessive"—prison diet excessive—O Lord!—meant an attempt to starve the prisoners to death? Yet the answer was accepted apparently as satisfactory—probably because the same thing is done here at home both in prison and out of it, and no one is called to account for it—not yet.

It doesn't, perhaps, much matter what a bishop says nowadays: yet if a bishop could have any moral sense at all, he might consider the extreme unfairness of telling lies in the pulpit, where he cannot be contradicted, as he might be at a public meeting. A bishop preaching at the Chapel Royal, Whitehall (not a bad place for lies, by the way), the other day, "urged that the logical conclusion of Socialist views would be the practical carrying out of the motto, 'I squeeze all things flat'"—in short, Mr. Bradlaugh's dull level of mediocrity. Now, there is plenty of Socialist literature for the bishop to read, and if he has read it he lied in his statement; if he has not he is an imposter for preaching on a subject of which he is ignorant. Let him take his choice of either horn of the dilemma.

Some of our Socialist friends may have noticed the attempt, which has already partially succeeded, to force the older universities to set up a new "Honour school"—i.e., a new school of competitive examination—in English literature, and may perhaps have wondered why it has been taken up so excitedly by part of the press. The reason is obvious to those who know something of the universities and the higher class of literary hacks: it means the pushing of a great new job for all the clan of the log-rollers in literature. The dishonest and conventional twaddle which has been poured on to the public on this subject is thus easily accounted for; as the professional and other hangers-on of capital have an innate sympathy for any one who is job-hunting. All the big-wigs who have written with such portentous solemnity on the neglect of English literature at the universities know perfectly well that English literature is a thing which can be learned but cannot be taught, as language and the sciences can be; but they will not interfere with a poor job-hunter who wishes to feather his nest out of those institutions which our forefathers founded for the education of the people, but which, like all other expensive things, are now monopolised by the rich classes.

W. M.

COERCION FOR LONDON.

It may be thought that the patriots who are so eager for the unity of the British empire that they want to use artificial means to make it more specially uncomfortable to live in one part of it than it is elsewhere, are taking unnecessary trouble; that the coercionists are such enthusiasts in the art of coercion that they are hunting it when they have already got it.

It is true that there is a pleasure in making a special and blatant demonstration of success, but it is a pleasure that has to be paid for by the opposition that the attempt to make it stirs up. The wise are contented with having the substance and letting the shadow take care of itself, especially if they have to fight for the shadow when they have got the substance peaceably and easily.

One is compelled by recent events to look on the subject from this point of view. Ireland is to have an extra dose of coercion, but London has already got enough for all practical purposes. A Bill is being put forward and opposed, with great fervour on each side, which, when it becomes law, will enable any two magistrates in Ireland to sentence any one who is brought before them and whose looks they don't like to six months' imprisonment. In London, any one magistrate has already got that power, and is on occasion not ashamed to exercise it.

It is perhaps worth while to tell over again a short story of the manner in which the coercion machine in London is set a-going, as it can be done in so much fewer words than the Langworthy case.

One Sunday there were, as usual, Socialist meetings going on in Hyde Park near the Marble Arch, during and after which various salesmen were proposing, as usual, to sell Socialist papers outside the park (selling inside being forbidden). The police had for some time past hustled and bullied, and even run in, these Socialist salesmen, although the sellers of other newspapers were not interfered with. On the occasion in question, after the Socialist meetings were over, the crowd, much increased by the news of the high-handed proceedings on former Sundays, poured out through the gate close by, being as a matter of course largely composed of mere Sunday strollers attracted to the Socialist platform—non-combatants, most of them, in the battle of opinion between Socialism and Bourgeoisdom. Well, these people, who would else have gone about their business quietly, were immediately set upon by the police à la Donnybrook, and a rough-and-tumble ensued, of the kind which the timid citizen of to-day looks at with pleasure—from a window, and in which you may find yourself half-throttled on the way to the police-station without being conscious of what has led you to that expedition, otherwise than that a policeman tried to knock you down and that you tried to stand upright: such an entertainment being obviously a good occasion for any one of an inventive turn to exercise his capacity for romance as a police-court witness.

The result of this police battue was a pretty good bag, although the police acted rather as the foreigner in Leech's woodcuts, who shoots the foxes and the owls instead of the pheasants, and got hold of more of the above-mentioned non-combatants than Socialists. These "rioters" being brought up before Mr. de Rutzen, were prosecuted by the Government jackal Mr. Poland, the farcical nature of whose opening speech no one, now Dickens is dead—more's the pity—need attempt to render.¹ The farce was continued by various policemen giving what is facetiously called "evidence," and more accurately "swearing the leg off an iron pot"; and Mr. Rutzen, in virtue of his position, wound up with the grand joke of the whole entertainment by saying that since Mr. Poland did not press the case as one of riot, he would treat it as a mere assault on the police, and would be so kind as not to send the accused for trial, but would—Fine them 10s. and caution them, thinks the unsuspecting "cultivated" person, rejoicing in the security of property and person in this civilised and "free" country. No—sentence them, two Socialists (one of whom had not been present in Hyde Park) and five non-Socialists, to six months' hard labour!

This was the end of the first act of the farce called "Justice" in this happy land: though such a finish of the Hyde Park Sunday saunter might well be looked on by the luckless persons who were rash enough to try it as a tolerable tragedy in its way.

¹ I don't know, though: the author of 'Cashed Byron,' though he wouldn't do it with the richness of Dickens, might deal with such a case—why doesn't he?

However, the farce is not done yet. The convicted persons may appeal to a bench of magistrates—if they can. That is, if they have money, or friends with money; otherwise they must bear the six months' torture of an English jail as well as they can: even if they have been convicted of assaulting the police when they were miles from the spot.

Two of the Socialists, our friends Williams and Pole (which last was the absent man), appealed at once and found bail; and two of the non-Socialists subsequently appealed, one of whom, at least, found bail. The other three must lie in prison for six months, unless Mr. Matthews extends his "mercy" to them—(a lawyer's mercy!)

"But why didn't they also appeal?" says the well-to-do inhabitant of a "free" country. Because they must find bail for their appearance at Westminster on July 16th. Not so difficult, you think? Yes, but the bail must be liable to the expenses of the appeal if it is rejected, which in plain terms means that if an ordinary working-man is arbitrarily convicted by a magistrate and sentenced to such a terrible punishment as six months' hard labour, no matter how preposterous the behaviour of the magistrate may be, the working-man cannot appeal. The rich man can defend himself, the poor man cannot.

This is the meaning of there being the same law for rich and poor, of justice never being sold in this country, and the like damned hypocritical twaddle. Justice is always sold in this country.

The answers to questions asked in Parliament have enriched the farce with other good jokes. Mr. Matthews had the boundless impudence to declare again (for he has done it before) that he did not know what part the Government had taken in the prosecution—he is a useful article at the price certainly!

Mr. Stuart Wortley refined on the Jorkins business in a manner that shows his fitness for office in the most satisfactory manner, and in short, the answers to questions on this matter illustrate the great leading farce of Parliament as well as need be.

It would be unfair also to leave off without complimenting the so-called labour representatives on their "masterly inactivity" in this matter. Years ago, before the possibility almost of labour representatives was thought of, what an advantage their presence in the House would have been considered! What a row one would have thought such men would have made about such treatment as De Rutzen's of men of their own order!—and now, mum is the word. A London middle-class member, Mr. Pickersgill, and a Scotch landowner, Mr. Cunninghame Graham, have taken upon them the duty of Messrs. the Labour Representatives, who should have made the row—such a row that they ought by this time to be all sitting in the Clock Tower.

Space fails me as to the progress of the affair at Kennington, but it is all a part of this same Coercion Campaign; and no doubt it is well thought of by the magistrates to refuse protection to harmless citizens against hired roughs, since all Socialists are not athletes, and there is a double danger in carrying deadly weapons. The preposterous charge against a physically weak man, like our comrade Blackwell, of attacking the police violently, is seemingly the sort of thing that Socialists must expect to meet with at present.

In conclusion, grieved as we must all be at the torture to which innocent men are being subjected, no Socialist can help reflecting that these fools, Matthews, Poland, Warren, and Co., are doing good propagandist work for us. People generally have some idea of fair play, and the spectacle of such blatant injustice as has been recently exhibited, has to my certain knowledge moved to indignation people not particularly favourable to Socialism. It is still more important that the working-classes should have a further instance of what law means under our system—a cunning instrument for the oppression of the poor by the rich.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

IV.—RENTS, ETC.

MANY people believe that the Land Act of 1881, to at least a great extent, solved the social problem of Ireland. And, indeed, it is difficult to convince them that such is not the case. It is generally thought that when a Bill becomes law that it must and does accomplish all the good predicted of it. But such is not the case. And this will be clearly seen when I come to deal with that measure and the decisions of the courts with regard to improvements.

Another difficulty arises with reference to valuations and rentals. Even Sir James Caird (p. 97) places the rental lower than the valuation. Whereas the rental is far above the valuation. Even King-Harman stated in the House of Commons a few days ago that the valuation settled in 1854 was 25 per cent. below the letting value of the land, the total valuation being stated at £10,182,681. Yet Sir James puts down the rental in 1857 at £8,747,000, and in 1875 at £9,293,000. At the latter date the rental was estimated at over £16,000,000, and in 1879-80 at over £17,000,000. In many cases the rents were more than three times the valuation. Take the following as an illustration, from county Kerry (Standard, Nov. 16, 1880):

Landlord.	Tenant.	Valuation.	Rental.
T. Taylor ...	Thomas Gain ...	£7 10 0	£27 0 0
	Phil. Foley ...	10 6 0	37 0 0
	M'Gowen & Sullivan ...	12 9 0	40 0 0
	Peter Leary ...	9 16 0	36 0 0
Four holdings ...		£40 1 0	£140 0 0

Take four more cases of the same date and same authority, Kerry county.

Landlord.	Tenant.	Valuation.	Rental.
E. H. Downing ...	F. Gain ...	£8 8 0	£27 0 0
Rev. G. Godfrey ...	J. Mansfield ...	53 0 0	130 0 0
R. Oldwell ...	P. Warren ...	7 10 0	22 0 0
" ...	T. Murphy ...	6 10 0	17 0 0
		£75 8 0	£196 0 0

The great rise in rents was from 1870 to 1879. In some cases the rents were more than doubled in seven or eight years. The following will illustrate this:

Parish.	Rental, 1872.	Rental, 1879.
East Ower ...	£57 7 6	£130 3 0
West Ower ...	57 7 6	133 5 0
Laragan ...	26 6 10	65 1 0
Warm Hole ...	28 7 5	62 0 0
Gurthmore ...	48 0 0	98 10 0
Five parishes	£219 9 3	£488 19 2

The Freeman's commissioner, in October 1879, gave a list of twelve holdings, the total of the old rent being £486, 15s., and the rents in 1879 being no less than £1158, 17s. 6d.—far above 100 per cent. increase.

But it will be said under the Land Act of 1881 all this has been altered. The evil has been modified, not removed. And when we come to the question of improvements this will be seen. Take also the following, from county Clare:

Clare Co.	Valuation.	Rent, 1879.
A ...	£32 0 0	£84 0 0
B ...	32 0 0	108 0 0
C ...	27 5 0	69 0 0
D ...	27 13 0	54 10 0
E ...	42 0 0	108 0 0
F ...	191 0 0	324 0 0
G ...	160 0 0	450 0 0
H ...	86 0 0	170 0 0
I ...	83 10 0	200 0 0
J ...	78 0 0	160 0 0
10	£759 8 0	£1727 10 0

In consequence of the severe depression in agriculture in 1879, and especially in Ireland, commissioners were sent out by almost every London daily paper, and from their reports samples of rack-renting might be given from every county of Ireland. As a rule, rents were high—double and treble the valuation in the south and the west, while in the north and the east they averaged from 30 to 40 per cent. above the valuation.

It is often contended that the judicial rents are the rents that really ought to be paid; but in most cases the rents as fixed are far above the valuation. Take the following eight cases on estates in Kerry:

Tenant.	Valuation.	Old Rent.	Judicial Rent.
T. O'Sullivan ...	£12 3 0	£20 0 0	£20 0 0
W. Potts ...	10 1 0	17 10 0	15 15 0
Eliza Sully ...	4 12 0	7 10 0	6 7 0
Catherine Coppey ...	16 10 0	30 12 0	25 15 0
John Coppey ...	10 15 0	17 4 0	17 4 0
Tim. Sugren ...	8 8 0	14 5 0	13 5 0

These are tenants of the noble Marquis of Lansdowne. In October 1884 forty-nine tenants of Lord Charles Beresford went to the court and had their rents judicially fixed, and the total reductions averaged 1s. each. We must bear in mind, too, that not one-third of the holdings have yet been dealt with. Taking the Parliamentary Return, 1881, of the different classes of holdings, we find the total 660,185 in number; and taking the return just issued, which brings up the operations of the Land Courts and Civil Bill Courts to March 31 of the present year, the total number of rents fixed was 90,088; the total number settled out of court, 90,134—total, 180,222, leaving over 479,000 yet to be dealt with. Again, out of a total number of applications to the courts, 137,810, 24,728 cases were dismissed, so that it is not every one who applies to the court that gets a judicial rent. Up to the close of 1885 it was calculated that the total reductions averaged about 12½ per cent.; and that the reductions last year averaged nearly 30 per cent.; and that the aggregate of reductions reached £600,000.

How is it then that the Act of 1881 has proved a failure? How is it that the hopes held out by Gladstone have not been realised, that the "Healy Clause" has proved a dead letter? Everything depended on the question of the ownership of the improvements. The Healy clause reads as follows (Sub-section 9 of Clause 8): "No rent shall be allowed or made payable in any proceedings under this Act in respect of improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title, and for which, in the opinion of the Court, the tenant or his predecessors in title shall not have been paid or otherwise compensated by the landlord or his predecessors in title." Gladstone, arguing on the great principle involved in the above sub-section in the House, Aug. 9, 1881, said: "The main ground on which I stand is that we do not recognise the principle of compensation by enjoyment for a certain length of time, either as respects the landlord or the tenant. It is much better that those who make the improvements should have the whole benefits of the improvements." A number of test cases were decided, and the decisions of the Courts finally gave the value of almost all the improvements to the landlords. From the Standard of October 14, 1881, I take the following as one of the test cases. The tenant claimed £710 as compensation for the following improvements:

For levelling 260 perches of fence, at 2s. per perch	26
For erecting 80 perches of fence at 4s. per perch	16
13 acres of land reclaimed at £12 per acre...	156
10 acres of waste land reclaimed at £5 per acre	50
50 perches of river filled in at 10s. per perch	25
50 perches of new river opened at 2s. per perch	5
Loads of sand per year, 50 years, at 2s. per load	300
Repairs of dwelling-house	40
Outhouses built, value...	80
Repairs of labourers' cottages	12
Total	£710

Here was a clear case on which the Court acted, and a case in which the value of the improvements could be tested. What did the Court do? It awarded to the tenant £46, leaving to the landlord the balance of £664. The result of the test cases was that the Courts held that the improvements belonged to the landlord—

1. Where the tenants held under a lease.
2. Improvements made before the lease began.
3. Improvements made during the lease, except lands reclaimed and permanent buildings.
4. All improvements made before the Act of 1870.
5. The improvable capability of the soil.
6. All other improvements where the tenant has received 5 per cent. per annum on the money invested in said improvements.

It might here be asked, What remains for the tenant? Very little indeed. And yet the renegade Chamberlain tells the world that the Land Act of 1881 has secured to the people of Ireland benefits unknown to the tenants of any other part of the world.

Now what is the position to-day? We will not take the rental of 1879 at £17,000,000, the general estimate at that time, but at £16,000,000, and see how the matter stands. Let us take the reductions at £700,000 instead of £600,000:—

Year.	Valuation.	Rental.	Value of Crops.
1855	£10,182,000	£11,200,000	£63,000,000
1881 (Jan.)	10,182,000	16,000,000	46,000,000
1885	10,182,000	15,400,000	35,000,000
1886	10,182,000	15,300,000	31,700,000

Here is the great economical problem. As rents have increased by millions the value of the crops has decreased by tens of millions. Take another view of the matter:—

Year.	Value of Crops.	Rental.	Proportion of Rent to Crops.
1855	£63,000,000	£11,200,000	17 per cent.
1881	46,000,000	16,000,000	38 per cent.
1885	35,000,000	15,400,000	46 per cent.
1886	31,700,000	15,300,000	47 per cent.

Take also the question of taxation. We must remember too that prior to the great famine of 1846-49, the population was over eight millions in Ireland:—

Year.	Population.	Taxation.	Taxation per head of Population.
1851	6,552,385	£4,006,711	£9 12 2
1861	5,798,564	6,420,378	1 2 1
1871	5,412,377	7,086,593	1 6 2
1885	4,962,693	7,755,000	1 11 3

Thus, as the population has decreased, and the value of the crops has decreased, partly through the fall of prices and partly through the lands being thrown out of cultivation, both rents and taxation have increased. As showing the extent to which lands are being thrown out of cultivation, it may be stated that, taking the agricultural returns, in 1877 over 294,000 acres were thrown out of cultivation and classed as waste land, and from 1876 to 1882 the total was 531,750 acres. And so it goes on from year to year.

No mere modification of tyranny can alter this state of things. Nothing but the entire destruction of landlordism will be of any use. Nothing but a thorough social revolution will accomplish that. The Irish difficulty hastens that revolution, and it is for the workers of England and Scotland, as well as of Ireland, to grasp hands and hasten that revolution, and to make it thorough, and, as far as possible, final.

J. SKETCHLEY.

We call attention to the atrocious sentence passed by the magistrate Bushby on the labourer Restell. The wife of the man flew at him "like a tiger," according to the evidence, and cut his lips open. Thereupon he struck her or pushed her away in self-defence. Penalty, six months' hard. It is stated that the sentence created great surprise in court, and the Daily News gives it a place apart among "severe sentences." We congratulate the "woman's rights" advocates on the progress they are making. Oppressed woman has the right of mutilation, it appears. The absolute power of life and death on the part of the wife is not yet perhaps formally acknowledged, but with "public sentiment" tending so strongly in that direction, it will doubtless come before long.—E. B. B.

MORE JUBILEE BOSH.—The Jubilee Committee of Nottingham, in their report to the Town Council, state that they have only been able to raise £453 as yet out of £1500 needed to carry out the arrangements for the 21st of June, and £200 of this have been given by the Race Committee. This is public money, as the racecourse belongs to the town and the Race Committee is appointed by the Town Council, and the £200 is profit from the course, etc. The committee state if more funds do not come in they cannot carry out all the arrangements, but they must have the demonstrations of children in the market place to sing loyal songs, etc., and band to play in different public places, and jubilee medals for the children; but if they cannot get enough money they will not be able to give the children their free meal or tea-party. How thoughtful for the children! This statement has done good, and disgusted many who would have sent their children but will not now.—T. P.

VIC MACHREE.

By T. HUGHES.

[THE following song, addressed to Queen Victoria on her accession, and embodying the arguments for repeal, was written by T. Hughes, one of the many brilliant journalists that Ireland has contributed to the London press. He was a member of the staff of the Morning Chronicle, and for some years its Spanish correspondent. He died in 1849. The song was for many years a great favourite, and will bear reprinting as part of the Jubilee poetry of the present year.]

O, the devil a wink I slept last night
For thinking of the Queen!
Sure a purtier by this blessed light
Was never seen.
'Twas Father Kearney from Killarney
Her pictur showed to me,—
My blessings on your purty face,
Vic Machree!

Her faytures all is like a doll,
So gentle and so nate,
If there's deception in her at all,
Faith, she's a chate.
She has such schoolin' in her rulin',
She holds bright larnin's key,—
My blessings on your purty face,
Vic Machree!

There's Melbourne, Peel, and Wellington
Is doin' all they can;
But troth there's not a mother's son
She loves like Dan,
That glory of the Emerald Gim:
O, if 'twas only free,
How it would grace your diadem,
Vic Machree!

Don't mind the thievin' Parliament,
Whatever they say,
But the Liberator's speeches
Read at your tay.
'Tis they will introduce to you
Our case without a fee,—
O, read them at your coffee too,
Vic Machree!

'Tis there our wrongs are tould in style,
And how we're fixed,
Since first they seized our own Green
Isle
With Tory tricks.
And how they won't concayde our rights,
Though Wellington and we Like naygroes fought to guard your throne,
Vic Machree.

Now would you like the king of France
To ax you for to wear
A dingy blanket while you dance,
An' you so fair?
Or would you like the King of Spain,
Who is, I hear, a she,
Should make you pay her tailor's bills,
Vic Machree?

In troth you'd kick up, if they did,
A rumpus and a row,
An' your army and your navy, faith,
Would make them bow.
Now we must pay the souls to save
Of every Rapparee,
O, to Ould Nick the rint charge send,
Vic Machree!

There's two bad Houses near your nose
In ould Westminster,
O, can't you then be done with those,
My royal spinster?
We'd scorn to ax them,—so should you;
Then grant us for to see
Our Parliament at home again,
Vic Machree.

SOCIALISM IN SCOTLAND.

On Friday, April 29th, I went from Newcastle for a few days propaganda in the lowlands of Scotland. The first meeting held was on the following day at Paisley, where a good audience assembled, and were addressed by Glasier, of the Glasgow Branch, and myself. One or two gentlemen in the crowd took offence at a disrespectful remark of mine in reference to the upper class. After grumbling out their dissatisfaction for a while, they took a practical turn and rushed Glasier off the platform. A slight confusion ensued, but Glasier being a wily orator at once launched off in the most recklessly irrelevant manner into an eloquent eulogy on the virtues of Bruce and Wallace, and quite turned away the wrath of the cantankerous Scotchmen. After this the crowd grew much larger, and listened with great attention and evident sympathy to our remarks.

On Sunday afternoon, a most successful gathering of miners was held in the Quarries at Hamilton, to which I related the chief incidents of the Northumberland strike, and repeated the criticism of the North of England labour leaders, which I had previously made in Northumberland. As the Scotch papers have boycotted nearly all mention of the strike, the miners were greatly interested in the particulars which came to them as news.

On Sunday night about 1000 gathered in Jail Square, in Glasgow, although no meeting had been announced, and received the statement of Socialism with the greatest interest.

On Monday night several hundred people gathered in the East Meadows, Edinburgh, and listened with sympathy for the miners and hearty approval of Socialism. A good collection was afterwards made. On Tuesday night to a good attendance at the Free Tron Hall, Edinburgh, I spoke on "Socialist and Political Economy." This lecture being a statement of the economic principles of a Socialist Society, gave rise to a good deal of useful discussion. The Rev. John Glasie joined in with a telling speech on the necessity for international action, and the futility of struggling for mere reforms such as the abolition of royalties. He pressed upon the audience that the real evil was the principle of competition in social life, and that the working-class, while helping on all good movements, should allow no specialist agitation to overshadow this vital question.

In Leith Links on the Giants Brea, we had a splendid meeting called by the Edinburgh Branch of the Socialist League. A good collection was made for the miners of Northumberland, and the meeting separated with three hearty cheers for the Social Revolution.

An old saying—"After the Lord Mayor's Show comes the dung-cart," has been about reversed in Skye. Mr. Chamberlain preceded Mr. Davitt.

SOCIALIST CONDEMNATION.—We hear that Baije, an active Socialist propagandist in Holland, has been condemned by bourgeois justice at The Hague to four months' imprisonment.

KNOWS ALL ABOUT IT.—The Pope is about to tell us all what he does not know about Socialism. Does any one suppose, for example, that the reverend father has ever read Karl Marx? Why no. No need to. God tells him personally all about it, don't he, Mr. P(owderly)?—Labor Enquirer.

HORDES OF IMMIGRANTS.—People enough to populate a small city have poured into New York from the steerages of the transatlantic steamers during the past week. Just 12,454 in exact numbers of big and little, old young, and middle-aged immigrants came to this port and the New World from Saturday night to Saturday night.—New York Herald, April 25.

VOLUNTARY CO-OPERATION.

In discussing Socialism one meets with a number of people who, while admitting the beauty of the Socialistic ideal, and even recognising the absolute justice of the confiscation that we advocate, yet look with horror on the confusion that will undoubtedly arise in the transition period, and turn for consolation to the tendency that is exhibiting itself towards profit-sharing and co-operation. "Let the new era develop in its own way," say they, "so that all this suffering which your sudden change would involve may be avoided." And in this way they hope to put off the evil day for their lives, and avoid the accusations of injustice and robbery that are hurled upon those who advocate confiscation of land and capital.

Such opponents are generally at least comfortably off themselves, and do not wish for any change except in a philanthropic way, so that they may ease their consciences and save their souls in their ideal paradise. They do considerable harm by preaching contentment, and hope in the progress that they say, and seem really to "think," the world is making on the old lines. It may safely be said of them that though they admit for argument's sake the beauty of Socialism, they have never really seen it, or they would not be content to wait whilst the way to the ideal was groped for by the people blindly struggling towards it under the bitter guidance of centuries of baffling experience.

Their notion for the evolution of democracy seems to be as follows. The working-classes must combine to demand from their employers some share (percentage, they suggest) of the net profits derived from their work, after their wages and all other expenses have been paid. Or better still, they must start businesses of their own, and work them on a co-operative system. How they are to get the necessary land or capital without confiscation is seldom suggested, unless it be by borrowing at interest. However, when they have in some mysterious way started their co-operative societies, they must go on to enlarge their scope—O wonderful!—by competition with the manufacturers who do not join them. In course of time (shall we say centuries?) the whole lump will be leavened, and the process will be complete without, argues your opponent, any of that misery and crime which a sudden confiscation of the means of production would be certain to cause, and without the injustice involved in the robbery of that property by which the landlord or man of business lives, and deprived of which he, being unable to labour, must either steal or starve.

Here at last we are distinctly at issue. For admitting even that it would be robbery to confiscate this private property which a few have got, and none can live without, does the individualist think to save his soul from the imputation of robbery because he suggests to the workers to get hold of the employer's capital by competition instead of confiscation? Is there not something which is called the goodwill of a business, which means the certainty of a minimum amount of custom, and which the master can sell for money? And if this amount of custom belongs to the master, and is part of his realisable property, is it anything but robbery to take it from him against his will, even if you do it by competition instead of confiscation? The former is quite as unjust as the latter, and the competitive plan has the disadvantage of being more underhand, being cloaked by a show of legality and justice.

This answer should suggest itself even to one who would admit that confiscation would be robbery. But we Socialists, who admit no such thing, would say that we had rather see the exploiting class reduced by confiscation of their property to getting a living by plain (and what might be called in comparison honest) stealing, than allowed by an unjust possession of property to confiscate thousands of times more of the worker's produce than they would be able to get of it by such stealing. Such, however, would be rather the effect of Competition, which means "Ours and not Yours," not of Confiscation, which means "Ours and Yours," or literally, one purse for all.

And then further with regard to the relative amount of crime and suffering, under the two methods, Co-operative Evolution and Revolution. The evolutionist looks to the suffering of the exploiting class alone, and hopes to save them by taxing their property gradually, by means of the competition of co-operative societies. I confess I would sooner have my property confiscated right off at once. It cannot be anything but intense suffering, whatever the co-operative evolutionist may say, for a business man to see his living slowly but surely going from him ("robbed," as it is already beginning to be said, by co-operative societies), to have the weary failure protracted through months and years, to see his children sinking (as he believes) to degradation, and himself with no prospect but to end his life in the workhouse. Worse could not befall him in any way, and such misfortunes have frequently driven men to madness, or the "crime" of suicide. Confiscation, on the other hand, might be accompanied by a provision for the maintenance of those helpless beings who, being deprived of the property which had enervated them, would be unable to take their share in the labour necessary to keep them from starvation.

"Ah! but the bloodshed, and savage passions that will be called forth by a sudden change such as you wish to make!" Well, bloodshed there will be, no doubt, but the crime of it will rest on the shoulders of those who begin it, as the exploiters will do by taking up arms against the Right. And as for passions, though some will doubtless be "savage" enough, who can tell but what in the enthusiasm of struggling and fighting side by side in a noble cause, there may be engendered in the workers that glorious comradeship and solidarity which must be the foundation of the reign of Socialism and equality?

And is there nothing worse in this world than bloodshed and savage passions? Dante put into the lowest pit of hell those who injured others in cold-blooded passionless indifference for their own gain. To Socialists, the shedding of blood is nothing as compared to the cruelty that the capitalists would have to resort to in their competition with co-operative societies. Here is a field of suffering which your advocate of co-operative evolution ignores in his sympathy with the unhappy masters. But can we, can the working-classes afford to wait, to submit to perhaps centuries more of injustice and misery and premature death by the legal murder of physical exhaustion, with all sorts of degradation and the terrible monotony of joyless lives; shall we ignore all this in order that co-operative production may, in the course of the dim future, effect a change without the shedding of a drop of capitalist blood? Rather than this there will be twenty revolutions.

But, after all, it is only our opponent's notion of the tendency of the time that is wrong. For the nations will not wait for this, but will (if we Socialists do our duty and join hands together) effect their nationalisation of land and capital before the co-operative societies have well begun to work. Then whatever good has been done by co-operation will show itself, and those who have taken part in it will be among the first to fall into their places in the complete organisation of Socialist Society.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The Ethics of Social Reform' (Reeves, 2d.) is a neatly-printed pamphlet by Maurice Adams, and is described as a paper read by him "at a meeting of the Fellowship of the New Life, London." It is thoughtful and well-written, full of matter, and states the moral and economic necessity for Socialism in a forcible manner. Its circulation among the unconverted cannot fail in having good results.

'Royal Paupers' (Progressive Publishing Co., 28 Stonecutter Street, E.C., 2d.) is the title of a vigorously-written pamphlet by G. W. Foote, being "a Radical's contribution to the Jubilee," and wherein is given many details of the cost of the queen and her large family, as well as other matter bearing upon royalty and flunkeyism. Here is a sentence from Mr. Foote's pamphlet: "Thousands of men who have worked hard in their younger days for scanty wages, who have paid rates and taxes to support the State burdens, have eluded the sombre end of their lives in the Union and have been buried in a parish egg-box. They were called paupers, and so they were, for there is no disputing the fact. But are not they worse paupers who have never worked at all, who live on other people from the cradle to the grave, who add impudence to their dependence, and glory in their degradation?"

'A Lay Sermon on the land,' by J. Morrison Davidson (Reeves, 185 Fleet Street, E.C., 1d.) is a little tract against land monopoly. In it we get some quotations from the Bible and some very outspoken sentences from half-a-dozen of the saints, which Sir Charles Warren and his agents won't allow we Socialists to re-echo in the streets unmolested. The 'Lay Sermon' very much resembles the clerical article (even to the capital letters), an exception being found in its brevity. The author concludes with an appeal to Mr. Spurgeon to aid him in his endeavour "to convert the clergy of all denominations to Christianity," by allowing him to address them in his (Mr. Spurgeon's) Tabernacle.

EARLY COMMUNAL LIFE AND WHAT IT TEACHES.

WE find the conflict between these two principles of Individualism and Socialism raging fiercely in our own time, and the reason is that we are living in one of those ages when the tendency which has been maintained for years is changing. For many generations in this country the individualistic element has been the rising one, and many very valuable results have come from its growth, which could have come in no other way so far as we know, but having risen at the expense of much that was good in the old communal customs, and having developed in itself many evils, the opposite tendency is already setting in. I need not spend time in proving this. Herbert Spencer has done so already, and has made a powerful and desperate effort to stem the rising tide. When we remember what the growth of society is, and how little man can do to influence the general tendencies of its development, one is inclined to wish that so able a man could have used his power in guiding the tendency, which he acknowledges to exist, into the path where it would do most good and least harm, for this it is within the power of man to do, instead of trying to turn back the torrent and make it run up hill, which is beyond the power of gods or men.

And after all if we have not faith enough in the guiding force of the universe, whatever we may call it, to believe that general tendency is for the best, it is little use our working at all!

However we will assume that general tendencies are on the whole for the best, and try to find out how we can modify or guide them for our good. We have seen that the development of individualism has allowed the social forces of production, which were first evolved in the communal ages, to be taken possession of by private men, and to be used for their good, according to the dictates of individual enterprise, regardless of the result to society in general. It is to this fact mainly, I think, that we must attribute the present change of general tendency, and this revival of social or communal influence will not have done its work until all the means of social production are again used, under the direction of society, for the common good, until the land becomes again the property of the people collectively, and is used to grow their food instead of finding rent for landlords, until all the other means of social production, whether machinery, buildings, or other forms of capital, are used to produce the goods which are necessary for the comfort, leisure, and happiness of all, instead of profits for a few.

Those who are afraid that this tendency will sweep away all that has been gained of freedom for the individual, will best prevent this by trying to guide it and guard against these dangers to oppose it, is simply to make the change more sudden and more sweeping when it does come. To try and stay the torrent by damming it back is but to prepare greater destruction when it throws down the obstacle; far wiser is it to prepare for it beforehand, and, leading it harmlessly along in channels made ready for it, to spread it over the fields to fertilise the ground.

There are some dangers in this revival of communal influence, and we will see how best they can be guarded against. In reviewing the old communal days, we were struck by the fact that the individual had no connection with the State to which he belonged, the unit of the large society, of the State, and even of the village community, was the family commune as represented by its head, the individual was in nearly all things subject to this head, and could not impress the least reflection of his own individuality on the society in which he lived. Here is one point in which there is little fear but that a great improvement will be made on the old communes, for whatever form society when organised will take it is pretty certain that it will be a society composed of individual units, in which we will hope each may be able to impress on the community his own individuality to the extent of its real power and value. This was impossible in the old days, because of the restraint under which the individual lived, it is impossible now because power and worth depend so much on the question of wealth.

There is one danger to the individual, and perhaps the greatest, arising out of the general unbelief and want of faith which characterises our times. We are too apt to think that things have been ordered badly, that necessary laws when obeyed still bring all sorts of evils upon us, and so we try to mend our evils by tinkering at them, and do not go to the cause and try to see whether there is not some law or general tendency which we are disregarding, and whether we are not accepting as laws evil customs which are purely of our own making. Had we more faith we should believe that if only the right laws of life and of society could be discovered and obeyed that we should not find them defective, but should find that a good and happy community would be the result. This habit of dealing only with effects is most strikingly illustrated by the way we deal with suffering and poverty. Had half the efforts which have been put forth to help the poor, cure the sick, and raise the fallen been directed against the causes of these evils, we should have seen a very different world around us. If our philanthropists would direct half as much energy towards removing the causes which are constantly creating poverty as they do towards helping the people after they have been crushed down into poverty, there would be some chance of permanently removing that stain on modern civilisation. If our doctors would insist upon the people being able to live in such conditions as to keep them healthy, instead of spending all their energy in curing them when they have become ill, we should need no such tyrannical laws as the Vaccination Acts. The same may be said of all or nearly all the remedies we try, and the chief danger to individual liberty arises from this tendency to patch up bad laws and customs by arbitrary regulation of actions which should be left to the individual. There are many things which are in themselves evils but which cannot be attacked directly by State intervention without producing evils almost worse; they can only be successfully dealt with by striking at their causes. Such, I think, is the question of women's labour on the pit-banks, for example. There will be very few who will defend this class of labour as suitable for women, and yet for the State to pass a law that no women shall be employed on pit-bank or on any work which is not suitable for them, would produce probably much more misery than it would prevent. This question can only be dealt with by taking away the causes which force women to take to work of any sort, however unsuitable it may be. Legislation which aims at merely patching up a bad system not only produces often as much misery as it prevents, but serves to postpone the real grappling with the causes which can alone be of permanent good. Perhaps one of the chief uses of misery and evil in the world is to serve the same purpose in actual life that the reductio ad absurdum argument performs in logic—namely, to force us to correct our premises. The man who tries to cure evil by tinkering at it, without looking back to its cause, is little wiser than a man who might think to put a reductio ad absurdum argument right by making it look a little less absurd.

We shall be the more able to guard against the danger of the undue coercion of the individual by such laws as those hinted at, which undoubtedly existed more or less in all revival of social or communal influence, if we remember that all interferences with individual action which are of the nature of tinkering with effects instead of attacking causes are in principle bad, and are only justifiable as a temporary expedient, until the cause can be dealt with, and that as commonly employed to enable the question of cause to be shelved they are utterly without justification.

There is one fact which may give us great hope for the future, and it is interesting in its bearing on the course of development given above; it is the considerable growth of Anarchist opinion and sentiment which may be noticed amongst those who advocate the most complete socialisation of the means of production. That such teaching should be spreading amongst the Socialists of to-day is a most hopeful sign, and makes it easier to look forward with the confidence that those who are working for society to take control of the means of production are fully aware of the importance of leaving the individual free to develop to the full. It is also interesting as showing that when the present development of the social side of man shall have done its work, the force is already gathering which will correct any evils arising from too great suppression of individualism.

In so far, then, as we may be able to guide the course of development, the chief thing we must strive for is that all social forces and means of production shall be managed by society, and all individual forces shall as far as possible be left to the individual. One thing more. We must not think that laws and systems can be planned which will work in spite of the inclinations of a large mass of the people. Social movements are very largely the result of sentiment; and while the sentiment which rules three out of every five is that of individual enterprise with a strong dash of gambling, while men prefer the excitement of a competitive life, while they would rather live in misery with the chance of making wealth, almost too late to enjoy it, than live in quiet happiness, free from the excitement, and secure alike from wealth and poverty,—while this is the prevailing sentiment with a large mass of the people, it is useless to try and impose upon them any other system than the present. Much may be done gradually to change the sentiments of people. New ideas have that effect, and in many other ways, by example and so forth, it may be done, as well by the more mysterious and rapid influence which often accompanies new movements and changes the ideals and sentiments of whole peoples. Unlike some Socialists, I hope for great results in this direction from individual efforts, from men who try to practise common interests and to do useful work, from small societies for working co-operatively in farming and other branches of industry—in short, from all who, by living, in spite of the conditions, as far as possible in accordance with their ideal of life and society, are helping to spread the ideals and sentiments which will make our life in the future happier than it has been in the past.

I hope this little study of primitive property in the communal ages will help us to see what sentiments and customs are helpful to a peaceful and happy social life. By trying to practise and spread these sentiments we shall be greatly helping to bring such a social life out of dreamland into reality.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

And I, too, love peace; but not the peace of slavery.—Danton.

Nihilism is the righteous and honourable resistance of a people crushed under an iron rule. When "order reigns in Warsaw" it is a spiritual death. Nihilism is the last weapon of victims choked and manacled beyond all other resistance. It is crushed Humanity's only means of making the oppressors tremble. God means that unjust power shall be insecure, and every move of the giant, prostrate in chains, whether it be to lift a single dagger or stir a city's revolt, is a lesson in Justice. One might well tremble for the future of a race if such a despotism did exist without provoking the bloodiest resistance. I honour Nihilism, since it redeems human nature from the suspicion of being utterly vile, made up of heartless oppressors and contented slaves. Every line in our history, every interest of civilisation, bids us rejoice when the tyrant grows pale and the slave rebellious.—Wendell Phillips.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

The Worcester and South Staffordshire nail-makers have submitted to a reduction on their wages of 20 per cent.

The Scottish railway servants of all branches have held a meeting to form a union of railway servants throughout Scotland.

The South Wales coal trade continues in a most depressed condition. In the Rhondda Valley, miners are being discharged every week owing to want of orders.

THE SCOTTISH MINERS' JUBILEE POLICY.—It is quite a treat to hear of a trade union with a "policy." The Scottish miners have a jubilee policy which is stated under 21 heads and includes: An eight hour day; one holiday a week; a fortnight's holiday during the summer; and better union among the miners.

CLOSE OF THE GLASGOW JOINERS' STRIKE.—At a mass meeting of the Glasgow joiners, it was reported that the strike in the trade was closed, all the employers having adopted the standard wage, and the 115 men who came out on Saturday having obtained work. The meeting unanimously adopted a resolution expressing satisfaction at the settlement arrived at, and pledging the joiners to use every legitimate means to maintain the standard wage.

THE CHAIN-MAKERS.—Some of the masters in the chain-making at Cradley Heath have capitulated and the men have returned to work. We have received a number of communications respecting the chainmakers which reveal a state of things simply horrifying. We intend to send a commissioner into the district in the course of a few days to see if it is not possible to infuse a little vigour into these wretched slaves and rescue them from the clutches of the "goody-goody" harpies who are now humbugging them in the interest of the exploiters.

NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—The strike has reached a culminating point. The masters have absolutely refused arbitration and insist on the "pound of flesh." The miner M.P.—now, with the rest of the officials on half-pay—headed the deputation, but the masters remained firm. At Blyth over 1000 miners have held a meeting and resolved to form a North of England Socialist Federation. There are a number of Socialists now at most of the collieries. The press generally attributes this to "the active Socialist propaganda that has been carried on during the strike." See "Northumbrian Notes," by our comrade Donald.

YORKSHIRE MINERS.—At a largely attended meeting of miners, held at Handsworth, near Sheffield, attended by the officials of the Yorkshire Miners' Association, to consider the strike at Fence Colliery, where the men have been on strike eight weeks, resisting a reduction of wages, it was unanimously resolved that the miners employed at Argreaves and Treeton Colliery (which together with Fence Colliery belongs to the Rother Vale Company) should, with the approval of the association, give notice to cease work. A thousand men and boys are affected.

THE STRIKE OF THE BELFAST SHIP-BUILDERS.—The dispute between the men employed in the local ship-building yards and the masters remain still unsettled, and there is not the slightest sign of an amicable arrangement being arrived at. The men are determined to hold out till a full concession of their rights has been made. At a mass meeting held in the Victoria Park, a strike committee was appointed, and several speakers spoke in the highest terms of praise of Mr. Sexton, M.P. for the West Division of Belfast, and his action in the House of Commons regarding the strike was eulogised by all. It is really a healthy sign, 6,000 Belfast ship-builders throwing old prejudices overboard, letting religion and politics take care of themselves, and sticking shoulder to shoulder for the rights of labour against capital.

A series of mass meetings of the Fife miners are being held for the purpose of considering the condition of the employed. At a meeting held at Hamilton, Mr. W. Small moved the following resolution: "As working miners, perceiving in the royalties on minerals and metals as exacted by private individuals a direct tax upon labour, robbing it of the reward of exertion, an obstacle to enterprise, injurious to native industry, and a violation of existing Scotch statute law, we would urge upon politicians and the Government to immediately introduce such measures as will secure the nationalisation of such resources, and thereby stimulate the expansion of trade, and relieve labour from the aggravation of an unjust impost and direct robbery." This was carried unanimously. A further resolution, urging that all miners' unions form a comprehensive federation to secure an amelioration and improvement amongst miners, was also adopted.

THE IRONWORKERS AND THE COERCION BILL.—About seventy delegates from all parts of the country where iron is manufactured have just held a conference in Manchester. It is ten years since a like national gathering was held. After the trade business was got through, and at the last day's sitting, a resolution was unanimously and enthusiastically passed against the Coercion Bill. Mr. Wm. Aucott (of Wednesbury) was in the chair, and the spokesmen of the men north and south (Messrs. James Capper, Walsall, and Edward Trow, Darlington) spoke warmly in favour of the following motion, which was ordered to be sent to the leaders of the Government, the Opposition, the Irish party, and the whip of the Labour party, by Mr. J. Graham Spencer, secretary of the conference: "That this conference of iron and steel-workers, representing 41,000 workmen of Great Britain, emphatically protests against the Crimes (Ireland) Bill now before Parliament, because it is unjust, unwarranted, and lamentably mischievous; and further, likely to be used against trades' unions in Great Britain."

THE LONDON POLICE.—Last Sunday afternoon, the police held a meeting in Hyde Park for the purpose of drawing public attention to their grievances. The meeting was of good size, and it was stated that it would have been much larger but for the fact that the bills convening it had been pulled down in the station-houses, and signs given that those who attended it would be marked men. A plucky cabman, who had been well supplied with facts, undertook the office of spokesman for the police, and in a racy speech exposed the chief grievances they labour under. Resolutions calling for reform were unanimously adopted. For some weeks past the police have been conducting a correspondence in the columns of the Weekly Dispatch, and some of the grievances ventilated there are almost beyond belief. Complaint is made of the mismanagement and the harsh military system of Sir Charles Warren, and "that there is a general feeling of discontent goes without saying." "Several are being continually reduced in rank (and pay) for periods varying from three months to eight years—simply for partaking of a slight refreshment whilst on duty"—tea or beer makes no difference. "An Old Policeman" complains that "useless orders are issued by old soldiers, who know more about 'saluting by numbers,' or giving lectures on Palestine, than they do about police duty." "There are no less than fifty different orders referring to public carriages, and nearly double that number referring to dogs." "Promotion is, and always was, gained by favouritism," and the administration of the pension system requires radical alteration. One policeman says that the gloomy outlook and the numerous instances of gross injustice before them, is driving the men to study their own personal safety rather than the interests of the public; and another writes that unless redress be forthcoming, "ere long our commissioners may have the pleasing duty to perform of swearing in special and auxiliary constables." We earnestly hope the men will persevere with their agitation, and use every means to make it successful. It should not be forgotten—as we are sometimes inclined to forget—that the police belong to the ranks of the workers, have common interests with them, and their present agitation forms part of that Labour Struggle against the power of Capitalism which every true worker should aid.—W. B.

THREATENED STRIKE OF THE CONSTABULARY IN BELFAST.—Since the appointment of Mr. Cameron to the Town Inspectorship of Belfast from one cause or another great dissatisfaction has crept in among the men. They complain of being hampered in the discharge of their duties in the Orange districts of the town, by orders issued by the Town Inspector to the effect that the constables on duty in these districts are not to interfere with drunk or disorderly characters on the streets lest such interference might rouse the ire of the loyalist inhabitants and lead to disturbance. Now it appears Mr. Cameron, following Mr. M'Hardy's recommendations as one of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the late riots, has intimated that in future each constable will be required to perform daily eight hours' regular duty. It must be understood that the constabulary stationed in Belfast, although not performing up to eight hours' daily of regular beat duty, are never free. When not on actual duty on the town they are as a rule confined to barracks, or obliged to do a variety of work such as the Irish constabulary in the ordinary sense are supposed to perform. In this way they have never what may be called a moment of their own. They are practically never off duty. The new system will impose upon them eight hours' beat duty instead of six, and when relieved in the ordinary course they will not yet be allowed to consider themselves at liberty. The men object to the new system as absolutely unjust. The constables are quite willing to perform eight hours' duty after the manner of the Dublin police, but they want to be paid as well as they are and to enjoy similar privileges. The Dublin constables when they have their number of hours performed are at liberty to dress in plain clothes and go where they will, and the Belfast men think they should be treated in the same way. Meetings of the men have already been held in protest against the new system, and if it is enforced without the privileges claimed being granted, it is probable there will be a general strike of the men, who declare it will be impossible to get constabulary to serve in Belfast on the terms proposed by the town inspector.

AMERICA.

A strike of 90,000 coalminers in Pennsylvania for an advance of ten per cent. in wages is said to be impending.

The machinists in all of the tube works in Western Pennsylvania have made a united demand for an advance of 50 per cent. for night-work, the increase to take effect from May 1. They wish to abolish night-work, so that more mechanics will be put on.

A convention will be held in Pittsburg on June 1, to complete the organisation of a National Machinists' Assembly of the Knights of Labour. Thirty local assemblies of machinists have voted to join the national organisation, and it will begin with over five thousand members.

NEW YORK.—The lock-out of the silversmiths still continues, with the Knights just as firm as ever. The chasers have discussed the opening of a co-operative factory, and a committee will report as to the outlay necessary. The reports sent broadcast that their places have been filled is untrue, as the firms are unable to obtain sufficient hands to take their places.

The great lock-out of stove-moulders is now enforced in nearly every city in the country in which the trade is prosecuted, and bears upon many thousands of men. It has reached Troy and Peekskill in this State, and it has also reached Philadelphia and other parts of Pennsylvania from the States farther west. The end of this vast struggle between capital and labour cannot be forecast.

FRANCE.

In view of the municipal elections at Paris, the Anarchist party have issued an abstentionist manifesto addressed to the workers of Paris, calling on them to reflect before going up to the voting-urns, maintaining that a workman's vote has for forty years been a very useless piece of possession to him, and will be to all eternity.

HISTORY OF THE "PRUD'HOMMES."—In the Middle Ages the term prud'hommes (wise, or prudent men) was used for those citizens charged with directing the affairs of their commune. It is at the end of the thirteenth century, under the reign of Philippe-le-Bel, that one first sees traces of the institution of this body. In 1296 the Council of the City of Paris nominated for election 24 councillors, among whose duties were to be those of passing judgment of the "master-piece" which a man had to execute if desirous of entering into the freedom of a guild, of protecting journeymen and apprentices, visiting the shops, etc., etc. Here one sees the germ of the existing jurisdiction in this decree. The law of the 16th August 1790 relative to the creation of justices of the peace makes a great step in the matter. This law sets forth that at the chief town of a canton, besides the justice of the peace, there shall be "prud'hommes assesseurs" who shall "overlook the payment of workmen's salaries and the fulfilment of engagements between masters and their workpeople." A decree of 1806 institutes at Lyons a first council of prud'hommes for textile trades. . . . It is in Paris 1844, and later 1847, that four councils are created—one for the textile industry, one for metal work, a third for the chemical trade, and the fourth for miscellaneous industries.—Cri du Peuple.

BELGIUM.

MARCHIENNE-AU-PONT.—At the commune of Marchienne last Sunday, the society of Socialist ironworkers held a meeting to discuss the organisation of the workers and the rôle of women under Socialism. The meeting was naturally well attended by the women, who were much interested in the speech of the delegate from Brussels on that portion of the evening's discussion. An immediate general strike in Belgium was then discussed for and against with much eagerness.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY.

SIR,—This C. O. S. issues "private and confidential" documents, defamations of people's characters. A specimen of which I have before me abounds in falsehoods. The Charity Record of Dec. 16 last, denounces it as "a snare to the rich, a curse to the poor, a disgrace to humanity and a mockery to religion." We some of us propose to hold some public meetings and invite the press to report them and this Charity Organisation Society to be present and show if it be a benefit to society and entitled to use the word "charity," or if they be base impostors as the Charity Record suggests. No doubt many of your readers know something about them and if they will write me a line in the first instance with some information, I shall be much obliged to them, either so that it may be read publicly or that notice of any meetings may be sent to them.

NORTHUMBRIAN NOTES.

On Friday, May 6th, very unpleasant news was circulated in the colliery district, to the effect that some men had broken off from the strike and had commenced work at the reduced terms. Whether this will be allowed to proceed without the strikers taking measures to give the traitors a lesson remains yet to be seen. It is the Doctor Pit, Bedlington, where this has occurred. The men are beginning to realise that had they had an organisation that included all colliery workers, engineers as well as hewers, the strike would probably not have been required, and even if it had, it would have been over in a week. The engineers have not behaved well; simply because they were afraid of their employment they declined to allow their brethren to win. Arrangements would have been made by the Miners' Union to prevent the mine-owners dismissing the engineers, had they struck, by making such action on the part of the owners a cause for a further strike. It has been suggested that the miners here should introduce the American system of boycotting. If the miners were to make up their minds to hold no communication with the masters' men, very soon these latter individuals would act with the majority of the workmen. If the workpeople are to have the victory this is the policy that must be adopted. In the case of mining there is invariably required several men to work incessantly at pumping the water out of the pits. If the owners knew that in the case of a dispute their engineers would stop working, they would think twice before engaging in a dispute with the men. No one can dare say that the mine owners in Northumberland could have anything too severe done to them; for on this occasion the men have struck work to prevent their wages being reduced below subsistence point, so they are justified in using any means in bringing their oppressors to terms.

The Socialist propaganda has continued to be carried on vigorously. The men are as interested as ever, and are joining the local organisation in large numbers. The most persistent opponents we meet are the teetotallers. They are very numerous about here, and are as bigoted as usual. It seems impossible for them to get into their heads that it is more important for the workers to prevent the monopolists of the means of labour taking two-thirds of their earnings every year, than to give up consuming a little alcohol, the value of which in a lifetime does not on the average amount to £50. They forget too that working-men teetotallers are seldom very well off, and that drunken capitalists very often are. It is a great pity that temperance advocates should calmly assume that every person is a drunkard that they are speaking to, spending the greater part of his earnings in alcohol; but in Northumberland as elsewhere they assume that as an axiom. The difference between normal and abnormal consumption of liquor cannot be discerned by them.

At the usual meeting of the Socialistic Discussion Society, I opened the evening with an address on "Socialism and Politics" according to request. The discussion was of an interesting character, and showed that Newcastle Socialists are without exception strongly in favour of political action. The only gentleman present who disapproved of political action was the chairman, an Individualist and ardent admirer of Herbert Spencer.

On Sunday, a good meeting was held on the Sandhill, Newcastle. In the afternoon, with the assistance of Mr. Stevens, a well-known local labour speaker, meetings were held in North Shields and South Shields. Mr. Hearne, of North Shields, told me that ever since comrade Chambers held meetings on the Quayside several months ago, Socialism has been the main topic of discussion. The Branch which was then started will be revived, and carried on in future more efficiently. The meeting at South Shields market-place was very satisfactory, and resulted in several members being made. Meetings have been arranged at both places for next Sunday.

A. K. DONALD.

THE DEPENDENCY OF THE WORKERS.—It is as sensible to say that a hen cannot herself lay enough eggs for a sitting, but is dependent upon her master who is daily taking them from her, as to say that the workers are dependent on the idlers for the means of livelihood. The workers are dependent so long they allow the idlers to take all the surplus of their work and no longer.

Socialism proposes that machinery shall do the world's work, and that the whole people shall own such machinery, and reap the full benefit thereof, individually and collectively, not as at present, when machinery is owned only by wealthy individuals and corporations and operated to the degradation of the human machines who attend them.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—A business meeting was held on Thursday evening, at which the agenda paper of the Conference was discussed, and comrades Eleanor Marx-Aveling and A. K. Donald were elected delegates for the branch.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, May 4, H. H. Sparling addressed a fair audience on "The Iron Law of Wages." On Sunday, May 8, J. Lane lectured on "Different Schools of Socialist Thought."—W. B. and T. E. W.

HOXTON.—Very successful outdoor meetings morning and evening, addressed by comrades Barker and Pope. Inside, Barker gave a very interesting lecture on "Socialism the Necessary Outcome of the Present System;" good discussion.

MERTON AND MITCHAM.—We held our usual open-air meetings on Sunday. Sale of Commonweal fair. The local Tory press is showing our growth by its virulent abuse. They display their "British love of fair play" by inserting scurrilous lying letters against us, and refusing replies. We are forming a committee to conduct the summer campaign all over the district.—F. K.

NORTH LONDON AND MARYLEBONE.—On Sunday morning, at Regents' Park, a good meeting was addressed by Cantwell, Brookes, and Wardle; some slight opposition was offered. At Hyde Park in the afternoon, the meeting was addressed by Brookes, Mainwaring, and Dalchow. The unusual phenomenon of a meeting of policemen to call attention to various grievances in regard to fines, pensions, reductions, etc., somewhat diminished our audience.—H. B.

EDINBURGH.—On Tuesday, May 3, J. L. Mahon lectured in the Free Tron Hall, and on the following evening he addressed a large meeting in Leith Links. On Thursday, Rev John Glasse addressed a meeting of miners in Dalkeith. On Saturday, several of our members, with Mahon as speaker, had a meeting with miners at Loanhead. On Sunday afternoon, Glasier, Tuke, and Gilray spoke in Queen's Park, and in the evening in East Meadows, Mahon and others addressed a large meeting. Mahon spoke at Dalkeith last Monday. Fair sale of literature.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, J. L. Mahon addressed a very large concourse of people on the Green. In his speech he gave an account of the Northumberland miners on strike. Muirhead, Curran, and Warrington also addressed the meeting, and 6s. 8d. was collected on behalf of the miners. At four o'clock, comrade Arch McLaren gave a lecture to the Home Government Branch of the National League on "Socialism," which was very favourably received. This, the largest branch of the National League in Britain, is deeply leavened with Socialism, many of the members being avowed Socialists. In the evening a meeting of members was held in our rooms, when the resolutions to be submitted at the forthcoming Conference were discussed, and the instructions to Glasgow delegate finally determined.

HAMILTON.—On Thursday evening, J. L. Mahon addressed a large audience, chiefly of miners, at the New Cross. Comrades McMunn and Glasier also spoke.

LEEDS.—Last Sunday morning this Branch held a very good open-air meeting on Hunslet Moor. Comrades Hill, Maguire, and Bland (Bradford Branch) were the speakers. At the close of the meeting a quire of Commonweal and twenty pamphlets were sold. In the afternoon we met the members of the Bradford and Bingley Branches at Parker's Temperance Hotel, Leeds, where we had tea together. After tea the business of the forthcoming Conference was discussed.

NORWICH.—On Sunday morning, members of this Branch went to hear the Rev. Stewart Headlam on "Socialism" at St. John's de Sepulchre Church. After the service a short meeting was held outside. We then marched to the prison where comrade Henderson is lying, singing outside the prison walls "No Master," then gave three hearty cheers for him. In the afternoon a very large meeting was held in the Market-place, chair taken by comrade Croth; the Rev. Stewart Headlam spoke for a considerable time upon the existing poverty of to-day, and advocating what the workers should do in order to remove this evil; the rev. gentleman was accorded a hearty welcome. A collection was made for the miners amounting to 5s. A meeting was held at 7 on the Agricultural Hall Plain. In the Gordon Hall, Slaughter gave various sketches of the Russian Revolutionary Party, especially commenting upon Kropotkin's career. Monday evening, Kropotkin lectured in the Victoria Hall. Meetings were held at Diss, addressed by Darley and Morley, and meeting at Wymondham by three comrades. On Monday next will be the release of comrade Fred Henderson, when we shall accord him a hearty welcome. In the evening a public welcome tea will be held in the Gordon Hall.—A. S.

WALSALL.—On Saturday, J. Richards and H. Sanders addressed a large audience in the Market-place. Literature eagerly taken up and inquiries made, which we hope will result in increased membership.

LECHLADE.—On Monday, May 2nd, H. H. Sparling addressed a meeting principally of agricultural labourers, at the Swan Inn, Lechlade, Oxfordshire, on "Socialism and Co-operation," showing how far the two movements were related to one another, and how hopeless it was by mere co-operation to attempt more than to make wages go farther for awhile, and thus temporarily ameliorate the worker's condition. The lecture was attentively listened to and much applauded, most of the audience taking literature for distribution, and pledging themselves to assist in the propaganda to the utmost of their ability.—M. M.

PAISLEY.—On Friday evening, comrades Mahon and Glasier proceeded to Paisley with the view of forming a Branch of the League there. An open-air meeting was held on County Square, and afterwards in the Dyers' Hall. Mahon gave a lecture on "The Aims and Methods of Socialism," which was listened to with great attention and evident sympathy. At the close several questions were asked. Comrades Glasier and McCulloch (S.D.F.) also addressed the meeting. Names were then given in to form a Branch.

SOCIALIST UNION (NOTTINGHAM SECTION).—The rooms we tried to get for club-room, etc., we have been unable to get. We could have one if we would not hold Sunday meetings. We are now on the track of other rooms, and hope to succeed in getting one during the week, we shall then be able to push the movement forward with better success. Meetings addressed by Peacock, Proctor, and Wane, were held in Sninton Market Sunday morning, and Great Market in the evening. Collection towards furnishing our club-room, morning 1s. 6d., evening 5s. 3d. Some slight opposition was shown at night, but was easily disposed of. The meeting was very attentive and enthusiastic. Next Sunday evening a collection will be made at our meeting on behalf of the Northumberland miners, when lectures will be delivered on the Labour Struggle.—T. P.

A WRITTEN DEBATE

BETWEEN MR. C. BRADLAUGH, M.P., AND E. BELFORT BAX.

SUBJECT:

WILL SOCIALISM BENEFIT THE ENGLISH PEOPLE?

I.—Affirmative: E. BELFORT BAX.

MODERN Socialism may be defined as a new view of life (i.e., of human relations) having an economic basis. Although its theory has been already many times expounded of recent years by myself and others, it may be deemed necessary on the present occasion for me to go over the ground once more. The economic goal of modern or scientific Socialism, no less than that of the Utopian Socialism of Owen, Fourier, St. Simon, etc., which preceded it, is the equal participation by all in the necessities, comforts, and enjoyments of life, and the equal duty of all to assist in the necessary work of the world. But while the Utopian Socialism believed this to be attainable by mere individual initiative and example without any special reference to the condition of the world as a whole, Modern Socialism finds the earnest of its ideal in the facts of social evolution¹—and it is on this rock of the ages, with its many-hued strata of economic-formation, that the modern Socialist builds his faith.

Society it is generally admitted in the present day, began to expand under the ægis of a limited, unconscious and crude tribal Socialism in which property was in common, and morality and religion consisted in devotion to the social unit. This in the course of progress lapsed, owing to its crudity and limitation in scope, and was gradually supplanted by Civilisation with its basis of Individualism in economics, morals, religion, etc.; the latter, in its turn, is as Socialists believe, now after many a century, in the moment of its completest realisation, destined to undergo a transformation in which its fundamental principle will be sacrificed and the old solidarity again assert itself, purged from its imperfections, and with the seal of completeness and universality upon it.

Such, in a few words, is the skeleton of the historical theory of Socialism. With what we may term the first transformation of society (from Tribal Communism to Civilisation) it would be beside the present question to deal further. I therefore, having stated the fact, pass on to consider in more detail the development of the completest form of Civilisation viz., modern Capitalism, with the nature of the process by which Socialists believe its transformation into a real social order will be effected; and lastly the reasons why such social order must benefit the English people no less than every other people.

Modern capitalism and the civilisation which is its expression, is the most extreme antithesis in every respect of tribal society. All the ties which formerly bound the individual to his group, are ruptured. Modern society is based on the nominal independence of the individual as unit. Let us briefly trace the development of this independence on its economic side from the Middle Ages downward. The earliest distinctive form of mediæval society, that of the feudal estate, was for the most part, an industrial whole, the links connecting it with the outer world being few, and seldom indispensable to its existence. Wellnigh everything produced on the estate came from its soil. The villein and his sons tilled the ground, reaped the harvest, hunted the wild animals, raised domestic stock, felled the trees, built the dwelling, etc.; his wife and daughters spun the flax and carded the wool, which they worked up into articles of clothing; brewed the mead, gathered the grapes, made the wine, etc. Division of labour and a system of exchange in a society on this plan were obviously unessential. This system, as every one knows, continued the dominant one throughout Europe for centuries. But in the course of time it gradually gave way before the growing town industrial organisation of the guilds. Each man here worked to maintain himself or his family at a particular handicraft, by exchanging or selling the product of his labour. In this way specialisation of labour and a more extended commerce arose. But the mediæval burgher was neither free nor a capitalist in the modern sense. Though only indirectly if at all, under the domination of a lord, he was under the very strict surveillance of his guild. The guild by regulating the number of his apprentices and the quality of his material and work, took good care that he should not develop his individualistic instincts. The burgher class of the Middle Ages was nevertheless the forerunner of the modern middle-class. As the mediæval system broke up, the guilds gradually declined. A floating class of journeymen wage-labourers came into existence and flooded the towns, while the burgher class became restive at the restrictions of their own guilds, of which wealthy cliques soon obtained the entire control, while a new middle-class established itself outside the chartered cities. This development, essentially the same throughout the progressive races, is typically represented in England. The symptoms of the dissolution of the economical conditions of the Middle Ages were, the uprooting of the people from the soil and the abolition of the old feudal and communal rights, the dissolution of the monasteries and the old feudal establishments, the opening up of a world-market, the new inventions, etc. Such was the soil out of which modern Capitalism grew as expounded by Marx in the second volume of 'Das Kapital' (English translation.) Modern Capitalism, and therewith the modern "middle-class," its embodiment, dates from the Sixteenth century. Its industrial course has been marked by three phases (1) simple co-operation of a number of handicraftsmen under the lead of a wealthy burgher; (2) the manufacture or workshop system; and (3) the "great machine industry" which arose at the end of the last century and has been expanding itself in scope and intensity ever since. With this, its last phase, production for use has given way completely before that production for profit which breeds to-day the commercial rottenness we see around us. Wares of all kinds are now produced for a forced sale, by means of their cheapness—"gluts" succeed to "booms"—till trade-depression becomes permanent. The small capitalist is continually being thrown upon the labour-market by inability to hold his own in the competitive arena. Capital tends thus to become concentrated in fewer and fewer hands, while the reserve army of labour tends steadily to augment. The result is increasing riches for the few and increasing poverty for the many. The "increase of national wealth" at the present day means increase of misery for the mass of the people.

The economical change toward complete Individualism, the issue of which is the modern capitalistic system, has been accompanied by political, moral and religious changes intimately connected with it, but which, important as they are, I can only notice very briefly here. (1) The break-up of the feudal estates helped to consolidate the power of the crown. This it was which completed that economical revolution in breaking down the local centres or feudal groups with their common lands, traditions, customs and jurisdictions, isolated the individual, and laid the foundation of the modern centralised national systems of Europe. (2) The economical backbone of the landed class as a class being broken, the political power passed both by gradual process and revolutionary crisis into the hands of the new capitalist or monied classes. This was partially effected in England by the "glorious Revolution" of 1689; in France more completely by the Great Revolution of 1789. From the sixteenth century downwards political history is the history of the middle or trading-classes in their efforts to free the individual from the fetters of feudalism and monarchy to the end that on the one side there might be a body of free and landless labourers, and on the other a body of moneybags free to exploit them. To effect the end in view, political power was necessary, and though obtained in this country in principle, in 1689 or even at the Commonwealth, was not finally and fully realised till the Reform Act of 1832.

(3) Then again, the individualistic tendencies of bourgeois economics is reflected in its religion and ethics. As I have elsewhere shown, Christianity is through and through individualistic. But during the Middle Ages its individualism was subordinated to the current communal and pagan tendencies it took on from the barbarians, and the form it assumed was largely coloured by these tendencies. Hence Catholicism has been in many respects the least objectionable form of Christianity, precisely because its spirit is the least Christian. Just as every member of the local community of peasants had a right as such to the common land, etc., so every member of the universal church or community of saints had a right as such to the heavenly pastures. The Reformation, the religious side of the rise of capitalistic individualism, affirmed salvation to be a matter solely of personal concern. It tore the individual away from his spiritual moorings, just as it had torn him away from his temporal moorings and left him to shift for himself. It pretended to be a restoration of primitive Christianity, and this was true as regards spirit if not as regards doctrine. For primitive Christianity was also the ideal expression of the dissolution of communal life—in this case the civic life of the classical world. Protestantism has always accentuated the doctrine of individual responsibility to the deity. Religion under Protestantism became personal and matter-of-fact, i.e., eminently bourgeois.

¹ We are so much accustomed to the idea of Evolution in the present day, that we can with difficulty understand its absence. Hence the fallacious antithesis made between Evolution and Revolution. The true antithesis to the notion of social Evolution is not that of Revolution but the idea of the possibility of isolated individuals or groups being able to change society, so to say, abstractly and of their own initiative, irrespective of the general current of human progress.

(4) With ethics proper it has been just the same. The highest Protestant conception of goodness is, not zeal for social ends but a ~~maundering~~ self-introspection, having personal holiness for its end.

The results of commercial Individualism we see at the present day on all hands, and nowhere in richer luxuriance than among the "English people," unless it be in the United States, where the economic development has gone further even than in this country. Let us only look around at the material aspect of things—the universal empire of shoddy goods, jerry-buildings, foulness and squalor. As one enters London or any other large city, what is it that greets the eye? A vast agglomeration of filth in every conceivable variety of form—railway works, factories, slums—indicative of human misery that no tongue or pen could adequately describe. Had Dante lived now and wanted material for his vision of hell, he would only have needed to take the South-Eastern train on landing at Dover, and depict the place he saw as he entered the English metropolis. And for what ostensibly is human nature, and for what are the vast majority of human lives ground down to being thus the slave of the mere process of production and distribution? Forsooth, in order that a relatively small class may live either without labour at all or with the labour of the gambler¹—which latter the literary flâneur glorifies under the name of the aleatory.

In my own eyes, statistics have no great value, experience showing that they can be made to prove any proposition in the hands of a clever manipulator. To my thinking, a day's journey through the slums of a great city proves more than tons of statistics. One fact outweighs a thousand figures. But since I am not writing altogether on my own account, but also on behalf of the Socialist League, and many persons like to see figures in an article of this kind, here are some. First you have H. M. Hyndman's figures: £1,300,000,000 annual revenue of the country, of which £300,000,000 only accrue to the working classes who produce it, the remaining 1,000,000,000 going in various proportions to the non-producing classes. I am not aware how Hyndman arrives at these figures, but I have never seen them seriously controverted, and they seem to me to express admirably the ratio one would expect to obtain, on a rough estimate, judging from the facts of modern social life. Then you have the statistics carefully compiled by G. B. Shaw in Fabian Tract No. 5. These give a similar total, but the proportions as £800,000,000 to the non-producers and £500,000,000 to the producers. In a footnote, however, to page 9 of the document in question, the amiable and witty author significantly remarks that these statistics assume regularity of employment and take no account of deductions for ground-rent, which being interpreted must mean that a sum not very much less than £200,000,000 has to be taken off the lesser and added on to the greater amount, so that after all we are brought back approximately to the Hyndman figures quoted above. But as I before said, such figures as these have no value to me except as a "cut-and-dried" statement of the fact obvious in itself without the aid of any figures at all—to wit, that society is composed of two fundamental classes, a relatively small class of monopolists that possesses the bulk of the wealth produced, and a very large class of producers that consumes only a fraction of that wealth. These classes, of course, shade off into one another, but the fact of their existence and of the antagonism of their interests still remains an indubitable truth.

It is this great curse of civilisation which Socialists would fain see abolished. Many would doubtless gladly have a wave of barbarism sweep this rottenness away as it swept away the effete classical civilisation. But the Socialist knows that this would only mean the martyrdom of nineteenth century progress, or something like it, having to be gone over again. There is no effective putting back the clock of human evolution. No, Civilisation can be only definitively overthrown by Socialism. The state-world, the civitas, can only become a social world, a societas, by a revolution generated in the fullness of its own development. The means of the present exploitation of labour, the cause of the present horrible state of things, is monopoly. Its modus operandi is the extraction of surplus value from the labourer by compelling him to work a whole day while receiving only so much of the results of his labour as is necessary to keep him in bare subsistence. Remove the monopoly from the hands of individuals, and you do away with the possibility of surplus value. The above revolution then consists in the assumption by the people themselves, organised to this end, of the means of production, distribution, and exchange (as explained in the Socialist manifestoes), and in the working of them in their own interest, that is, in the interest of the whole community. This would, of course, soon result in the extinction of that "private enterprise," whose exploits consist in destroying all the worth of life under pretence of enhancing it, but really in the interests of individual greed. That "stimulus of personal interest" which spreads like a cancer through artistic and literary productivity, flooding the world with cheap and nasty work, would be finally cut up by the roots. Industry would be regulated consciously with a view to the needs of Society so far as ascertainable. Wealth would be produced for use, and not for profit.

With the abolition of classes, consequent on the abolition of monopoly, national rivalries, at present mainly reduced to questions of commerce, would come to an end. The break-up of the present State-nationalities of Europe would be one of the first results of Socialism, which is nothing if not international. The sphere of politics would be gradually merged in that of industrial direction. With no independent nations there would be no national interests, as such; with no classes there would be no class interests, as such. Bourgeois civilisation at an end, there would be no longer any object in maintaining the sham of a creed to which the modern proletariat as a class has never attached itself, and in which nine-tenths of the educated middle-class have not only ceased to believe by their own confession, but for which even the sentimental attachment they may have had some decade and a half back is rapidly waning. Finally, with the consummation of individualism in Economics comes the destruction of individualism in Ethics, whether in its brutal form of (so-called) Utilitarianism or self-interest, or in its inverted and apotheosised form of introspective maunderings having "personal holiness" as an end. Both must give place to an Ethic in which social and individual interest have ceased to conflict, which has as its foundation the principle that the perfect individual is realised only in and through the perfect society, and which hence abandons the morbid striving after individual perfection for the healthy endeavour after social happiness. Politics will thus become ethical and ethics political. Personal will be no longer divorced from public character. Social order will supervene on anarchy.

Will Socialism benefit the English people? Will fresh air benefit the suffocating man? Will food benefit the starving man? Will rest benefit the weary man? If not, perhaps Socialism will not benefit the English people. Otherwise, the question "Would Socialism benefit the English people?" would seem to partake of the ironical.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

V.—AGRARIAN OUTRAGES AND EVICTIONS.

IN dealing with the question of agrarian crime, we have to bear in mind that the English connection for over seven hundred years has been one high crime against the Irish people; that the landlord system is, and from the middle of the sixteenth century has been, one great crime of rapine and murder—of legalised plunder on a national scale. For more than seven hundred years it has been a war of extermination against the Irish race. What wonder, then, that we should meet with little episodes of retaliation, or rather of self-defence. If the tyranny of a day is so odious, is it less so when practised for centuries? If the robbery of a coat or a watch deserves a severe punishment, how much greater punishment should be given to the great land-thieves who live from generation to generation on the plunder of the people. But while the great land-robbers, making the laws, are protected by the laws, the people who object to the plunder are condemned and punished as rebels.

A few weeks ago a Parliamentary Return was issued showing the number of outrages for each year from 1880 to 1886. It is not necessary to take every year; it will be enough to analyse the returns for one or two years. Take 1881. Crimes against—

	The Person.	Property.	The Peace.	Total.
Ulster ...	18	66	330	414
Leinster ...	39	105	687	833
Connaught ...	87	186	954	1235
Munster ...	153	317	1520	1957

It is true this list looks formidable enough. But they are not ordinary crimes, but are the natural outcome of the still greater crimes of the landlord system in that country. Most of these so-called crimes are only letters or notices which any police or landlord agent can write. Look at these returns again.

	Total.	Letters, etc.	All others.
Ulster ...	414	247	167
Leinster ...	833	587	246
Connaught ...	1235	710	525
Munster ...	1957	1062	895

It will be remembered that 1881 was a remarkable year, crime, as it is termed, being very heavy in the last three months, owing to the Compensation for Disturbance Bill being thrown out by the Lords. It will therefore be best to take a later year. In 1884 the outrages are given as follows:

Ulster.	Leinster.	Connaught.	Munster.	Total.

These are classified as—Crimes against the person, 7; against property, 201; letters, etc., 423; other petty offences, 62. These are the so-called outrages of which we hear so much, the very nature of which indicates at once the foundation of Irish society.

It is necessary now to take another class of agrarian crimes; not commonly so called, but which are of a more brutal kind than those to which we have just referred—namely, evictions. In speaking of the two classes of outrages, Gladstone (House of Commons, May 24, 1882) said: "Eviction is the exercise of a legal right which may be to the prejudice of your neighbour, which may involve the highest responsibility, nay, even deep moral guilt. There may be outrages which—all things considered, the persons and the facts—may be less guilty in the sight of God than evictions." Truer words were never spoken. Considering that the landlord system is nothing more than "legalised felony," and that evictions are the nineteenth-century war of extermination against the Irish people, there can be no doubt that evictions are far greater crimes than the so-called agrarian outrages—more brutal, more inhuman, and more monstrous,—crimes that can never be condoned. Nor do the landlords care to act according to the law even of their own making. In 1852 Sir Chas. Wood called the attention of the House to the wholesale evictions then going on. Large districts were depopulated, and at the Quarter Sessions of Ballina alone 6400 ejectment processes were taken out. Sir R. Peel in reply said: "It would appear from the evidence of Major M'Kie, who was employed by the Poor Law Commissioners, that the forcible ejectments were illegal; that previous notice had not been given; and that ejectments were perpetrated under circumstances of great cruelty. The time chosen for the most part was night, on the eve of the new year. The people were forced out of their houses with their helpless children, and left exposed to the cold on a bleak western shore on a stormy winter's night; that some of the children were ill; that the parents implored that they might not be exposed, that their houses might be left till morning; their prayers for mercy were in vain, and some of them have since died." Who in these cases were the criminals? who the murderers? who the rebels? Will the Right Hon. John Bright tell us? But take the returns for the four years ending Dec. 31, 1852. There were evicted—

	No. of Families.	No. of Persons.
1849	16,686	90,440
1850	19,949	104,163
1851	13,198	68,023
1852	8,591	43,494

Here we find these "merciful" landlords, these plundering miscreants, in four years evicting no less than fifty-eight thousand four hundred and twenty-four families, consisting of two hundred and twelve thousand one hundred and twenty men, women, and children. And that, too, in the middle of the nineteenth century, to preserve the supremacy of law and order, those grandest of gems in our English civilisation.

We have taken the so-called agrarian crimes for the years 1881-4, let us take the evictions for those two years. They were as follows:

Year.	Ulster.	Leinster.	Connaught.	Munster.	Total.
1881	1,219	692	750	784	3,445
1884	1,044	617	1,246	1,279	4,186

Now, where the claims of the landlords rest on no moral right, where these claims have never been recognised by the moral sentiments of the people, every one of those evictions was a crime against the individuals, a crime against the people, and a crime against humanity. The question again occurs: Who in these cases were the criminals? who the murderers? who the rebels? Will the Right Hon. John Bright tell us? Mr. Mulhall states that the total number of men, women, and children evicted during the fifty years ending 1886 was not less than three million six hundred and sixty-eight thousand. Think of that ye canting hypocrites who prate about law and order. What a glorious item to be remembered in this glorious Jubilee year! Will the white-throated black-bats of Westminster Abbey think of it? Will they lay the death-stained record at the feet of Her Most Gracious Majesty?

Let us turn again to Mulhall. During the same period there have died of famine, one million two hundred and twenty-five thousand men, women, and children. Pause and think of it. Famine in the midst of plenty, famine the result of landlord robbery, of landlord plunder. One million two hundred and twenty-five thousand landlord murders! Was there no crime, no murder here, Johnny Bright? Will the pious hypocrites of Westminster Abbey lay that record of blood before Her Most Gracious Majesty on the celebration of her Jubilee?

Mr. Mulhall also tells us that during the same fifty years four millions one hundred and eighty-six thousand have left the shores of Ireland to seek a home in distant climes. A number equal to nearly the present population of that country. No wonder that to day when the population ought to be thirteen or fourteen millions it is less than five millions. These millions and their sons and daughters form a large percentage of the population of America, where they are rich and powerful. They prosper in Canada, they flourish in our Australian Colonies. These millions are still Irish. They may be rebels to the British Crown, to British tyranny, to British oppression, but they love their country, they love those left behind, and they may yet help even more to free their mother-land from the curse and scourge of royal and aristocratic plunderers. To do it is a most sacred right, a most imperative duty. As an evidence of their devotion to their mother country, Mr. Mulhall states that during the last half century they have sent to those left behind them the enormous total of £24,500,000. And that during the single year of 1881 they sent £1,510,000. What a proof of self-sacrifice; what an evidence of devotion; what a guarantee for the future liberty and independence of old Ireland! Let Englishmen think of it, of what it means, and let them say if they are prepared to emulate such heroic devotion for their own redemption.

But there is another matter. Mr. Mulhall gives the value of the labour of the four millions and odd who have been driven from their native land by British tyranny at the enormous sum of £665,000,000. If Ireland had that wealth to day, what prosperity, what happiness, would not be the fate of her population! To insult her with charity and relief bills in face of these facts—facts that point to the domination of the English royal and aristocratic land-thieves as the one great cause of Ireland's ruin. See the natural, the inevitable result. Note the figures carefully. While it is the boast that pauperism in England is on the decrease, in Ireland the case is just the reverse. The returns tell their own sad tale:

Year.	Indoor.	Outdoor.	Total.
1859	114,594	39,112	153,706
1871	181,032	44,478	225,510
1884	253,342	46,621	299,963
1885	329,550	120,939	450,489
1886	357,621	348,205	705,826

And during those years the population has decreased by more than two millions. Connaught, with a population of rather over 800,000, has 247,134 paupers, or about 307 to every 1000 of its population. Is British tyranny, supported by British bayonets, never to cease? Is this war of extermination never to end? It is for the workers of England, the workers of Wales and of Scotland to answer the question. It is for the workers, victims of the same tyranny, plundered by the same classes, cursed and scourged by the same system, to say whether this shame to England, to Wales, and to Scotland, and this curse to Ireland shall cease, and WHEN!

J. SKETCHLEY.

NOTES.

"A CURIOUS meeting was held in Hyde Park, . . . to discuss the grievances of the police—whatever they may be" (sic!). This is how the Renegade Radical organ, the Echo, speaks of the policemen's protest against a fraudulent reduction of their wages.

What is the worth of a "Radical" paper which does not trouble to enquire into such affairs and which impudently proclaims its ignorance?

In the same issue of the same paper great surprise is expressed as to the "little interest shown in the Land Transfer Bill," and Welsh Home Rule is sneered at.

Apparently the Echo now circulates little among the workers, or it would hardly wonder at the lack of interest shown by its readers in which particular thief it is that gets the land; nor would it dare to sneer at any folk seeking to rule themselves.

Had not the Echo better drop its motto, "Be Just and Fear not"? The celebrated "statement of policy, Either which way at once," would suit it so much better.

Since our magistrates have shown how little the law troubles them it can be seen how gratuitously brutal was Mr. Cooke of the Marylebone police-court to the heroine of the "painful story" related there on the 9th of this month.

In a case which he might easily have dismissed, he went out of his way to fine, and heap costs upon her. And of such is English Justice!

Defending himself under a charge of perjury, a constable at Cardiff swore that lying on one another's behalf was common among the police—"they always stuck together." Any one who did not do so would "lead a dog's life."

When will the workers learn that they must "stick together," and that he who stands out deserves to "lead a dog's life"?

The Vegetarian Messenger makes a very foolish allusion to what it calls "a terrific onslaught against Vegetarianism" made in our columns last August. We have often pointed out that against this creed in itself we have no quarrel.

All that we attack is the claim made by the more ignorant vegetarians that the whole social problem can be solved by abolishing "kneophagy."

Our attitude is exactly the same toward teetotalism, anti-tobaccoism, and all the rest of them. Each one of these may be equally well true or false without affecting Socialism, but not one of them or all of them will solve the social question.

So little has Socialism to do with opposing these things that one of the brightest and best of our advocates is an adherent of all of them at once!

LITERARY NOTICES.

Comrade Van Doeslaer, a Dutch Socialist, has very ably translated for the Dutch paper De Werker, the Manifesto of the Socialist League.

El Productor, Socialist weekly journal of Barcelona, contains each week some well-written notes on passing politics, one or two interesting letters on the doings of the Socialist and Labour parties in Spain, miscellaneous notes, and in short has its columns well-filled with matter likely to interest the workers.

North and South (15 D'Olier Street, Dublin, weekly, 1d.) is a very well-got-up and apparently impartial Irish newspaper and review. A recent number contained a very good letter from our comrade M'Carthy.

May we venture to suggest to the People's Budget (Allahabad) that it is doing but small service to its workmen readers by the "evil speaking, lying and slandering" indulged in by its New York correspondent? A glance on any given week at the New York papers would expose this gentleman's persistent falsehood. He is apparently incapable of telling the truth upon any labour matter. Our attention was drawn to his vagaries some time ago and a detailed examination of his productions has not elicited one example of honest writing. The N. Y. Leader might look him up and expose him.

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

Communications invited on Social Questions. They should be written on one side of the paper, addressed to the Editors, 13 Farringdon Rd., E.C., and accompanied by the name and address of the writer, not necessarily for publication.

As all articles are signed, no special significance attaches to them because of their position in these pages. None to be taken as more than in a general manner expressing the views of the League as a body, except it be so explicitly declared by the Editors.

Rejected MSS. only returned if a stamped directed envelope is forwarded with them.

Subscriptions.—For Europe and United States, including postage, per year, 6s.; six months, 3s.; three months, 1s. 6d.

Business communications to be addressed to Manager of the COMMONWEAL, 13 Farringdon Road, E.C. Remittances in Postal Orders or halfpenny stamps.

Periodicals received during the week ending Wednesday May 18.

CIGAR-MAKING IN ENGLAND.

THIS trade, owing to its peculiar nature and comparative smallness, has received but little attention from those not actually engaged in it. Its importance, however, is by no means small, as will be seen by the account, necessarily incomplete, I intend to give respecting it. As a commencement, therefore, a word as to how a cigar is made may not be out of place. Cigar-making is a very light occupation; and were it not for the long hours one has to work at it—the average being eight per day, terribly long, when the nature of the craft is understood—and bad pay, it would be an exceedingly pleasant industry.

A cigar consists of pure tobacco, sometimes of one quality, sometimes of various qualities. The modus operandi is as follows: A "bunch"—i.e., basis—is first produced by rolling long dry strips of leaf-tobacco (these strips vary in length) in a leaf which is suitably moistened—this is called a "bunch-wrapper"—thus producing a basis of the shape required. Then another moist leaf, generally of finer texture and colour, is employed, which is cut into long strips and used as the outside "wrapper." Considerable experience is required to produce a "bunch" of suitable shape, and a good deal of economy in cutting the wrapper. The most peculiar and certainly the most skilful process in making a cigar is forming the point.

When made, the cigars are sorted according to colour, and then "bundled" or "boxed," then dried in a room fitted up with gas-stove, racks, etc. They are then ready for the market.

The price paid for labour in this trade is determined, both by the unions and trade generally, by three factors—namely, weight, shape, and quality of material. Cigars have to be made by weight, so many to the pound—which, by the way, is a fruitful source of dispute between the employers and the men, and a frequent cause of difficulty for the unions. The most difficult-shaped cigar is that which is known by the brand "Flor de Fuma," which now commands the highest price. The different kinds of tobacco now used in the manufacture of cigars in this country, are known by the following names, which also indicate their quality: Esmeralda, German, Giron, Japan, Java, Seed, Manilla, Sumatra, Mexican, Cuba, Yara, and Havana. There are other kinds of tobacco used besides those mentioned, but they are the principal.

Fifty years ago cigar-makers were considered highly skilled mechanics, and were paid accordingly; the rate of wages at that time was much higher than it is to-day. A cigar-maker often obtained from £2 to £3 per week; in fact, £2 seemed rather the average than a particularly high wage. The average wage to-day is difficult to arrive at; but from all I am able to learn, it would appear that £1 per week probably covers the average among union men. There is one very worthy feature in connection with the men in this trade, which I think deserves to be recorded: that as early as 1835 they were organised in unions.

In this trade as in every other the meanest shifts have been adopted by the employers in order to coerce the men; while on the other hand deeds of great merit have been performed by some of the workers. The lightness of the cigar industry has ever been a source of danger to the position of the men, and is especially the case to-day. Women and children, in consequence, have been attracted to it, and, thanks to the employers, who have not been slow to take every advantage of the position, the trade is fast slipping from our grasp. The firm of Copes, in Liverpool, were among the first to introduce female and child labour on a large scale, and still employ them in large numbers. As an illustration of the greed and cupidity of the employers, I think it right to mention here what took place in 1857. The employers proposed an immense reduction in the prices of work all round the trade, which was at once refused, and the men struck. The employers sent immediately to Holland for cigar-makers to take the place of the men here. The Hollanders responded, and large numbers of men were landed here at the docks daily. Our men were not to be done in that fashion; so they met the newcomers and in very many cases prevailed on them to leave the country, we bearing the expense of their return. A number of them, however, would not leave, and worked under the reduction, some of whom are now employers themselves. I feel confident that a similar dodge on the part of the masters would not succeed in the slightest degree to-day. We have made various grants to the cigar-makers of Holland since then, and there is every reason to believe that there is a much greater feeling of solidarity between us now than existed some years ago.

Machinery has made no great headway in cigar-making. True, there has been a mould introduced, which has pretty well succeeded; this mould is used to form the "bunch" and give it the shape by pressure, thus rendering it much easier for women and young persons to learn the trade. Of course, it will be at once seen that by this contrivance, although persons might learn to make a cigar with less labour, they would not possess the skill one would have under the old hand-style. There has also been a machine introduced which takes up the work where the mould leaves off, and finishes the cigar. One of these machines was exhibited in the Colonial Exhibition last year, by the firm of Wright's. There are two reasons for the comparative non-introduction of machinery in this branch of the tobacco trade—first, the very element which is the cause of success with machinery in other trades, is the cause of failure in ours.

Uniformity of action, uniformity of pressure, is the secret of success with machinery in other trades; while in the manufacture of cigars the very reverse—variation of action, variation of pressure—is required. The leaf to be rolled, even in itself, is of variable tenacity, and therefore requires to be manipulated with great delicacy, the pressure varying with the unevenness of texture; failing to obtain such conditions the leaf is broken and thus spoilt. Machinery in other trades lessen the cost of production, hence, its efficiency; while in the manufacture of cigars there is a tendency to increase the cost of production, a sufficiently strong reason, under the present system of competition, to prevent any very serious introduction of machinery in an industry of this character. It was found that the machine, which was the new and approved patent, was only of use when the leaf to be used was selected, and, in fact, was highly suitable to it in every respect; while most of the leaf could not be worked by it at all.

The speed of the machine also was by no means satisfactory; sixty cigars an hour being, I understand, the limit of its powers, a speed very often reached by the human hand. The second reason for the failure of machinery in the cigar industry is, that the capitalist soon discovered that he could obtain human machines as cheap, or cheaper, than iron ones. With the mould at his disposal, and women and children to boot, he could engage nimble human fingers, with all the requisite variations of pressure, a quality which, up to the present time, has been found wanting in the iron machine.

The workmen are paid by the hundred. The prices range from 1s. per 100, to 4s. union prices. There are some very fine work sometimes made at from 4s. 6d. to 6s. It will be seen at once that machinery is not needed when it is understood that the employers pay women and children about one-third or less what they would have to pay union men. There have been several attempts to organise the females into unions, but without success.

This trade affords the close observer a full view of the horrors of capitalism. The man who sits enjoying his cigar, scarcely ever knows under what conditions the "fragrant weed" has been produced.

In many factories the silent system reigns supreme. A man is in danger of losing his employment for uttering a word. The factories themselves are mute but eloquent appeals to the factory inspector, but that functionary is rendered proof against their mute eloquence by his eternal absence. The workers make the cigars, but they are scarcely ever allowed to smoke them. There are a few firms who treat their employes once every general holiday to a "smoke," but even then they only give what are of no earthly use to themselves. These cigars are the "off-colours" as they are called.

There are very few cigar-makers who can be called moderately healthy, as the unnecessarily long hours they have to sit in the factory causes them to contract all sorts of diseases. So well known is this morbid tendency amongst cigar-makers, that many benefit society doctors will not accept them as members. A cigar-maker may nearly always be known by his saffron complexion.

H. DAVIS.

(To be concluded).

At the commencement of the capitalistic era of production, workman was pitted against workman, now sex is pitted against sex, and, later on, age against age. Men must make way to women, and women to children. This is the "moral order" of industry.—August Bebel.

THE REWARD OF LABOUR.

A DIALOGUE.

Persons: AN EARNEST ENQUIRER, an EAST-END WEAVER, a WEST-END LANDOWNER.

Scene: Outside a philanthropical meeting on Social Science.

Earnest Enquirer. Excuse me, gentle—h'm, gentlemen! neither of you seem quite comfortable after the noble sentiments showing the harmony that should exist between the rich and the poor, and the inculcation of altruism, and self-sacrifice on both sides, which we have heard in there. You, sir (to the Weaver), whom I take to be a soldier in the noble army of industry, seem discontented; a little sour—sulky even, if I may say so. And you, sir (to the Landowner), you also (again a million apologies!) seem sulky: although, probably because of the restraint which the refinement of hereditary culture and habits of command makes easy to you, I can't think why.

Landowner (somewhat languidly). Not at all. I assure you I was much interested. The subject is a very interesting one; I heard much which I did not know before. (Lapses into thinking of something else.)

E. E. Were you puzzled?

L. No, I quite agreed with it all.

E. E. All? was it all alike then?

Weaver (with a grin). Pretty much.

E. E. Eh! what's that? Would you answer me a question or two, my friend?

W. Well, yes, so long as it's not chaff and you really want information. You began as if you were going to chaff me openly, and him slyly. Now, you know, you said I was sulky, and perhaps I am; anyhow I know I am irritable because of my liver (you'd know why if you was me); and being irritable, I can't stand chaff. So if you do chaff me, since I'm not big enough to hit you, I shall be off.

E. E. Well, thank you. I really didn't mean to chaff you; one must begin somehow, you know. (To L.) And you, sir, will you answer me a question or two?

L. Well—yes; though I have a suspicion of what you are driving at. Begin with this good man; I am curious to hear what he has to say; he looks thoughtful and intelligent. (Aside.) Might get something out of him; looks like an ultra-Radical—perhaps a Socialist; and we're all expected to be so damned original in the House now.

E. E. (To W.) You heard that gentleman who moved the vote of thanks just now, and who spoke so—well, so elegantly on the compensation which the working classes have for their apparently inferior position; and how necessary it was for the progress of civilisation that there should be this division of labour and life; and what a noble position it was for the workers to hold; and how the slight sacrifices they had to make they ought to make cheerfully and almost as a matter of religion, that new religion of Humanity, considering their position as the foundation of all the culture, thought, light and leading which is the glory of Humanity. What did you think of all that?

W. What's the use of asking me such questions as that? I shall go away at once if you haven't got something more than that to say to me.

L. (to W.) My dear sir, if you would but pay a little more attention to such speeches as that which this gentleman is speaking of, it would be a very good thing for you.

W. Think so? Do you know what he meant by it?

L. Yes, I think I do.

W. (to E. E.) Do you know what he meant by it?

E. E. No, I think I don't.

W. Well, I think I do. Besides, it ain't quite new to me, you see. But that's neither here nor there; don't waste your time by asking me what I think of a vote-of-thanks speech, but ask me something about my work and my earnings, and the sort of way I live in.

E. E. Well, well, I was going to, but allow me a little explanation, I want to find out something about that compensation which our altruistic friend in there did apparently think was due to you for your apparently inferior position; which, indeed, so far as I can see, is abundantly apparent to me. Your clothes are old, worn, and when they were new they were bad; you're not very clean, you don't speak like an educated man (though I perceive in you some of the intelligence which this educated man here spoke about so patronisingly) and worst of all you don't look properly grown or healthy; you are stunted, sallow, and ugly—there, don't bounce out at me! I cannot fail to see that some compensation is due to you, if all this, as I suppose, is the result of your being the foundation of the progress of civilisation, and a bearer of the palm branch of martyrdom for the behoof of the religion of Humanity. No, no, don't go! That vote-of-thanks speech will stick in my memory, as meaningless words often will, when they are spoken according to art. What I want to get at is how you get that compensation above spoken of. So here goes for my definite questions. What is your occupation?

W. I am a silk weaver.

E. E. Is that difficult? Does it take skill to do?

W. Well, you wouldn't ask that if you had seen a weaver at work, taking care that his pattern doesn't work out longer or shorter than it should; mending half-a-dozen of the fine silk threads of the warp, for instance.

E. E. As difficult as a barrister's work, for instance?

W. I'm sure I don't know—it's not so easy as lying, at any rate. But don't get off the subject.

E. E. Is it a useful occupation?

W. It seems so. People will have silk; and why not since they can? It is pretty stuff and clean, and wears well. Didn't you notice that lady at the back of the platform, the young and pretty one, who went to sleep during the lecture, and how nice she looked in her new silk gown. Well, I wove her gown.

E. E. Well, your work is useful and requires skill; let's see on what terms you carry it on. How many hours a day do you work?

W. As many as I can. That's none too many as things go I assure you!

E. E. You mean to say that you are sometimes out of work.

W. Sometimes!!

E. E. And you take all the work you can get? You're not one of those lazy ones of which I have heard a good deal?

W. Now I want to keep my temper, and I really think you don't believe that 'good deal' you have heard.

E. E. Well, no I don't. But tell me, would you work eight hours a day if you could?

W. Eight hours! I shouldn't get a job if I didn't put it through as quick as I could; ten at the very least.

E. E. Well, now as to payment. Suppose you worked ten hours a day all the year round except Sundays, how much would you earn?

W. From 35s. to 40s. a-week.

E. E. Say £90 a-year?

W. No, I won't say £90. Haven't I just told you that I've got to sit and look at my loom many and many a-day? I should think it a good years' work in which I got nine months full employment. I'll say £60 if you like—and don't I wish I may get it, year in and year out!

E. E. Have you got a family?

W. Wife and five children.

E. E. Do they make anything?

W. My wife gets a job now and then weaving plain silk or winding, and one of the lads is a half-timer in a shoe-shop; it don't come to much altogether; £75 a year, since we must put it in the grand style, will cover it all.

E. E. H'm, well (aside: Poor devil!) Rent's cheap, I suppose in the East-end, since you are all working-men there?

W. (in sudden wrath) No, it's not, I pay £26 a-year for my house; how much do you pay for yours?

E. E. Well, never mind.

W. Yes, I know; and then the whole of my house together isn't as big as your drawing-room.

E. E. Well what sort of a house is your house?

W. Good enough for me, I suppose; it's a weaver's house.

L. (with sudden interest) Dear me, I should like to see it; it must be quite curious.

W. Should you? Well I shouldn't like you to see it; it isn't fit for a gentleman.

E. E. (to L.) Excuse me, sir, let me have our friend to myself; think about the sort of questions I am likely to be asking you presently. (To W.) Well, certainly I haven't come to the compensation which we all think you have a right to claim as a representative of that noble army of labour which we all praise so highly—especially at election time.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

(To be concluded.)

AGRARIAN COMMUNITIES IN ITALY.

IN Italy, as in all other countries, one finds everywhere below the surface, so to speak, of the existing social organisation based on individual property and exploitation of labour, the community of the peasants, which is the natural form of the economy of equality. On traversing the south, one comes upon vast private lands, formerly possessed by the barons, and now by their descendants or by wealthy bourgeois, who are also members of Parliament, senators, or mayors—in short, the masters and factotums of the lands; and side by side with these immense stretches of country belonging either to the Government (such as Sila) or to the municipalities, by whom they are leased out to speculators, often to the councillors of the commune itself by the intermediary of their confederates and men of straw. . . . These last lands belong by right to the people, and properly to the poorest peasants, to whom the Acts of 1806, 1807, abolishing feudality, reserved these in compensation for the lost rights of cutting wood, pasturage, etc. . . . But while these rights were lost directly the Acts were passed, the parcelling out of the land to-day in spite of the 80 years that have passed, is still to do, and the poor peasants are obliged, whilst waiting, to work their own lands as common labourers for the profit of my lords the speculators and municipal councillors.

This situation being insupportable, there have occurred in the southern provinces of Italy these frequent revolts of peasants against the municipality and against the large usurping proprietors, which are at once the outcome of the past and forerunners of the future. While this agrarian community forms the historical substratum of the existing proprietary constitution in Italy, there are here and there places where it still exists in the light of day. In the province of Ancona alone, according to an official document (Atti della Giunta per l'Inchiesta Agraria, Vol. XI., tome ii., 384), this number reaches 351 spread over 37 communes. The character of these communities or universities or consortia is identical with that of all agrarian communities. The land is divided into three parts: Wood, pasturage, and arable. . . . In some communities, as that in the Vestignano territory, they even sow the grain in common and divide the produce.—Le Rivolte.

DEATHS FROM STARVATION IN THE METROPOLIS.—A return issued shows that the number of deaths from starvation or accelerated by privation during 1886 in the metropolitan area was 40. In the eastern division of Middlesex there were 16 deaths; in the central division, 15; and in the western division, 1. In the city and liberty of Westminster, the Greenwich division of Kent, and the city and borough of Southwark, 2 each; in the Newington division of Surrey and the liberty of the Duchy of Lancaster, 1 each.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

A meeting of female telegraphists has been held for the purpose of consulting as to how they may improve their position and get their grievances remedied. They want more pay, fewer hours of work, and longer holidays.

The Annual Report of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants of the United Kingdom has just been issued, from which it appears that some railway companies have effected reductions of wages during the year, while others have exacted more labour without additional payment.

The Darlaston nut and bolt makers have been successful in five prosecutions for violations of the Truck Act. One shopkeeper, who supplied groceries on an employer's order, used also to lend the men money at twopence per shilling per week, or 866 per cent. per annum.

Two thousand members of the body of amalgamated engineers, steam-engine makers, and metal planers are on strike at Bolton for an advance of 2s. per week. The dispute, which has assumed various phases, has extended over a year. A general lock-out appears probable, and 10,000 hands would be thereby affected. The masters are determined to resist the demands.

At a representative meeting of chainmakers at Cradley Heath it was stated that nearly all the leading employers had conceded an advance, but there were still about 2000 operatives out on strike owing to small employers refusing to concede the advance. It was reported that upwards of £100 had been expended in providing relief for starving families, and it was announced nearly £50 had been received from newspaper proprietors at Liverpool. It was resolved to continue the strike.

The whole of the miners employed at the New British Iron Company's Wynnstay Collieries, Ruabon, the most extensive mines in North Wales, struck work on Friday 13th, in consequence of a dispute with the manager. About 500 of the men marched up in a body to the residence of the general manager, and surrounded the house. Police were sent for, a riot being feared. The grievance having been settled, the men returned to work.

At a meeting of all classes of railway servants held at Bathgate last week, Mr. Henry Tait, general sec., referred to the advantages that had been and were to be derived from organisation among railway employés. He advocated a universality of hours of labour, and held that if there were half of the population going idle for want of work while the other half were working nine hours per day, no man should work more than his share, and this would give work for all.

RATTENING IN THE CHAIN TRADE.—During Sunday night the chain factories of Mr. Allen Beasley and Mr. Neale of Cradley were broken into, and 14 pairs of bellows were destroyed. A large number of workmen have been thrown out of employment in consequence. It is alleged that the workmen employed at these factories have been working under the required list of prices. The leaders of chainmakers' associations have publicly condemned the outrages.

AVERAGE DURATION OF LIFE OF THE WORKERS.—Dry grinders of forks, 29 years; razor-grinders, 31; edge-tool grinders, 32; spring-knife and file grinders, 35; saw and sickle-grinders, 38; workers in copper, lithographers, moulders, engravers, watch-makers, 48; "Every grindstone-maker is cut down with consumption at or soon after the age of 24—hardly one escapes"; flint-cutters, glass-polishers, under 30; stone-masons, 36; weavers (hackling, carding, sorting, and dressing), 44; workers in lead (lead-miners, painters, plumbers, compositors, type-founders), 48; carpenters, joiners, cabinet-makers, 49; flour-millers, 47; bread-bakers, 47. Consumption is in all cases the chief cause of death, brought about by irritating dust-particles (which is also, with exhaustion, responsible for intemperance). The following are some percentages of deaths from consumption: Needle-makers, 70 per cent.; file-makers, 62; steel-grinders generally, over 40; lithographers, 48; flint-cutters, glass-polishers, 80; flax-mill workers of Belfast, 60; cigar-makers and tobacco-workers, 36; brush-makers, 49; artificial-flower makers, 36. This is a vastly important subject, with far-reaching consequences, and receives but little attention. Those desiring to pursue it further, and in more detail, should consult 'Germs, Dust, and Disease,' by Andrew Smart, M.D., F.R.C.P.E., who tells us—as, indeed, we know well—that this great evil is capable, by proper arrangements, of being prevented.—W. B.

"SAVING" LABOUR.—By the prospectus of the "Universal Simplex Typewriter, Limited," we learn that "enormous fortunes have frequently been made out of small inventions. There is, in fact, a fortune to be acquired in the simplest article of utility which meets a universal demand," and evidently the company is on the right track. "For," says the prospectus, "it is estimated that 150,000 'Simplex' Typewriters will be sold in the first twelve months, but even this will show a nett profit sufficient to pay a dividend of 50 per cent. on the capital issued, after paying working expenses." The price of the Simplex is to be 10s. 6d. We are also told that "this wonderful invention will effect as complete a revolution in writing as that effected by the sewing machine in taking the place of hand-work with the needle." Tell it not in Gath! Whose benefit has the sewing-machine been? Not the sempstress; not the workers. There is now, spite of sewing machine, as much slavery as when the "Song of the Shirt" was written, in their lives. And type writers will do as little for copyist and clerk. All the advantage will be appropriated by these people of the "per cent." Per cent. is their god, and in their scheming worship they have not a thought for those whom their "labour-saving" machines have sent to the wall.—P. C. W.

AMERICA.

The Pennsylvania miners have withdrawn their demand for an advance in their wages and have asked for arbitration.

Strikes and lock-outs in the building trade are reported from Chicago. Six thousand men are out of work and still further suspensions of work are expected. There is some talk of trouble as the men are getting desperate.

The stove-moulders of Troy, N.Y., have refused to work on the "scab" patterns of Bridges and Beach, St. Louis, and a shut-down at the stove-foundries is the consequence.

The organised carpenters of Chicago have achieved a great victory. Eight hours and 35 cents per hour are positively established, and all union men are employed.

PITTSBURGH, May 4.—A general strike was begun in the Connellsville coke region to-day, and upward of 1200 ovens have shut down, and 13,000 men are idle. By the refusal of the strikers to draw the ovens at Connellsville a loss of between 50,000 and 75,000 dollars was suffered by the capitalists.

BELGIUM.

BRUSSELS, May 13.—The Peuple to-day announces that a strike has commenced among the miners of the Basin du Centre. Great excitement prevails throughout the affected district and a rapid spread of the movement is apprehended. The journal adds that the voting by the Chamber of the tax on the importation of meat has greatly excited the people.

CHATELET, May 16.—The strike is spreading here, and is assuming alarming symptoms. Troops have left Charleroi for the place. The whole of the Civic Guard in the neighbourhood of Charleroi is on foot.

TILLEUR, May 16.—At a meeting, attended by a large number of workmen, held here to-day, a general strike in the Liège Coal Basin was decided upon for Thursday next.

FRANCE.

MIRAMONT (Hte. Garonne).—The knitters of Miramont are on strike to the number of 310, declaring they cannot accept the last reduction of wages—i.e., down to one franc a-day for the men, and 50 centimes for the women.

RONCHAMP.—The syndicate of miners of Ronchamp have addressed to the mining company a vote demanding fortnightly payment of wages. To which the company has "replied by silence." And yet the claims of the syndicate are most moderate and carefully weighed and considered. "Does the company mean to push the workers to a strike? Does it mean to provoke manifestations which the syndicate will be the first to regret?" say the miners, giving in the Cri a sort of ultimatum to the company of Ronchamp.

ANGERS.—The beauties of the system of prison-industry as at present carried out are brought out day by day in some fashion or another. At Angers, for instance, where there is a gaol, in the basket-work industry there is a struggle going on between the "free" labour (so to call it) and the prison work. A certain contractor for the prison work, in spite of the many efforts made by the syndicate of the trade, has succeeded in throwing upon the market goods whose price is lower than that of the free-labour industry by 60 or 70 per cent., thus causing an inevitable standstill in the corporation. After months of warfare, this enterprising contractor revenged himself on the sturdy syndicate that had the folly to resist so long, by assembling the masters of the workshops in the town to talk over their own interests, and to come to the conclusion that their men were too well paid and in danger of getting fat: which conclusion being come to—hey, presto! down go the tariffs.

SAINT-QUENTIN.—At a little village near Saint-Quentin there exist looms for the manufacture of "imitation antique tapestries." About ten years ago the workman could earn 7 and 9 francs a-day at a hand-loom in his own house, whereas now at the same work, with much more toil, because the models are more difficult and the "points" more numerous, working 15 or 16 hours a-day, he earns 90 centimes! This almost incredible change in hand-work is due of course to the enemy, Mechanism, the hand-workers meanwhile dying of hunger. We must add that we think a mechanical loom plenty good enough for the perpetration of imitation-tapestry, the more so as the worthy Parisian bourgeois who buys cannot for the most part detect any difference between the machine-made and the hand-made atrocity, and certainly cannot detect the atrocity itself from the real old work—and if he did would delight far more in the misplaced skill and ingenuity of the imitation.

AGRICULTURAL NOTES.

Enclosed I send a copy of one of the many hideous advertisement circulars which confront one everywhere. It refers to the latest engine of destruction for that down-trodden being, the agricultural labourer. The self-binding reaper is doing a part, with Enclosure Acts, and landlords, in depopulating rural England. One might be inclined to suppose that persons interested would say as little as possible about it. R. Hornsby and Sons, however, deem it expedient, apparently, to add insult to injury in the exquisitely ugly and highly coloured lithograph headed the "Old Style and New Style." The master-man is represented under "Old Style" as sitting on a fence, with umbrella and cigar, watching thirty labourers getting his harvest. In "New Style" a Hornsby binder and two horses, with master-man as driver, does the work, while the thirty men sit on the fence—without either cigars or umbrellas. How very nice!

But our farmer master-men are having a rough time of it, spite of Hornsby binders that were to "save" labour, and a lot besides. At a meeting of Cambridgeshire farmers on April 23, met to consider the present depression one is reported to have said that 90 per cent. of farmers are unable to pay twenty shillings in the pound. The meeting was almost unanimous in supporting "fair"-trade speakers; and protection against the "foreigner" was the main cry. Another speaker said he should propose a poll-tax on foreigners arriving in England, as he felt "sure half the socialistic rubbish which was talked came over with 'foreigners.'" Poor man!

Not a word was spoken about the fleecings industry undergoes in the forms of rent, taxes, tithes, etc. The halo of the law rests about them, and the law is more sacred than religion with English farmers.

The majority of our farmers are most incompetent, and are themselves to blame (speaking from the bourgeois point of view) for a great deal of the fix they're now in. Many of their own labourers know far more of cultural direction and detail.

Probably no industry exists in which the instruments of production are so entirely in the workers' hands, and none could be more easily worked for the community's benefit. The men have many shrewd heads among them, and when they are more united will make their power felt. The great lacking is the want of solidarity, which must exist to a greater extent, though, in such a scattered life, than in our large towns.

Nothing has helped to make the labourer feel his dependency on the "master" so much as the enclosures that have been carried on within the last fifty years; and some of the older men remember with a shake of the head how it was all managed by landlord and money-bag for their own benefit. A history of enclosures has yet to be written, and a dismal record it will be.

Royston, Cambs.

P. C. WALKDEN.

Government in this country is not a union of the people to protect themselves, but an aristocratic contrivance to make the poor men keep the rich; to compel industry to maintain idleness; to make rich men richer, and poor men poorer.—'Black Book' of the Chartists.

THE COMING OF DEMOCRACY.

[Astronomers say that the "Star of Bethlehem" will be visible this year.—Vide Press.]

SPAKE the wise men of the nations, keeping watch at midnight stations,
"Lo! the hour is now at hand when, rising in the heavens afar,
Should the messenger be sighted, in a robe of glory lighted,
Bringing tidings of New Birth and shining out a beacon star.

"O! the days have travelled slowly and the nights were dark unholy,
But the Christ to men was promised, yea, his coming is foretold,
All too long the poor ill-fated in their weariness have waited,
And the hour is now upon us written by the seers of old.

"With the day-star onward guiding, we must seek his place of hiding,
Where the blasts of winter enter, whistling through the shaky door;
In abodes of want and sorrow we shall find him on the morrow,
And the star shall shed its halo o'er the hovels of the poor.

"His abiding place a stable! Ere his little limbs are able,
We shall find him in the mines and workshops labouring hard and long;
Cares and spurs and burdens bearing, in the woes of others sharing,
Ever battling for the weak against the haughty and the strong.

"Spite of sneers and high disdaining we shall find him growing, gaining Strength and wisdom, knowledge; gathering, garnering Truth's beloved store:

Ripening unto godlike kindness, kindling eyes gone out in blindness,
Breathing words of love to those that knew but bitter thoughts before.

"But he comes no more a dreamer! He shall smite the foul blasphemer;
Scribe and high-priest who have mocked him and have bartered him for gold.

Yea, he comes his house to straighten, warring with the wiles of satan,
And the hell-wolves long since loosened on the shepherd's slumbering fold.

"Even now the star appeareth, lo! the hour of triumph neareth,
Christ-Democracy ariseth, big the world is with New Birth;
Blessed now ye poor ill-fated! who have waited—wept and waited—
For the dawn of happier days is breaking o'er your nights of dearth."

T. MAGUIRE.

SOCIALISM IN SCOTLAND.

On Thursday, May 5, the Scottish Miners' Federation inaugurated a movement for restricting the working-time to eight hours per day and five days per week. Meetings were organised all over the mining districts, and the men instructed to come out on the 5th and make that the first holiday. Unfortunately, the Fifeshire miners hung back. They made a deal of delay and bother about giving in their notices, and finally put off for a fortnight. They have since then resolved to stand aside from the movement. More than half the collieries refused to come out when it was known how Fife had acted. The meetings were held, however, and great numbers of miners came together. I spoke at the Kirkintilloch demonstration in support of a resolution for the abolition of royalties, but was of course careful to point out the uselessness of striking at any special evils. The men seemed well inclined towards Socialism. The Rev. John Glassey spoke at Dalkeith, and was splendidly received by the miners. A bad impression was made, however, at the beginning of this meeting by a crankish imitator, in a feeble way, of Thoreau. This person gave a hour's dreary recital of some commonplace incidents in his career, while he carefully avoided anything which might be construed into a reference to the object of the meeting, and also inflicted some villainous original poetry on his hearers. However, Mr. Glassey happily did away with the bad impression made by the afore-mentioned gentleman. On the same night Glasier and I went to Glasgow and got an exceedingly good meeting in the open-air. The miners, however, are greatly depressed by their late defeat, and seem quite spiritless.

Next day several open-air meetings and a good indoor one were held at Paisley, where preparations for carrying on a regular propaganda and forming a branch of the League were carried out.

On Saturday, the Edinburgh members prepared a meeting at Loanhead in Midlothian. I tried hard to make a speech, but the surroundings would have discouraged the most adroit orator. Within two yards on my right was the Salvation Army, consisting of a dozen queer females of forbidding aspect and terrible vocal powers; a friendly bystander firmly interjected his shrill "hear, hear," at the wrong points; half-a-dozen policemen executed some mysterious manoeuvres in the rear of the crowd; and to add to all this a band of Scotch bag-pipers relentlessly chimed in. Now I am not afraid of ordinary interruptions. I despise a thunderstorm, and have even prevailed against the Salvation Army big drum; but the Highland bag-pipes with their mingled drone and screech and chirrup are enough to discourage a fog-horn. Presently the man in charge of the police came up officially and spake thus: "Now then, you must not block up the road with your Socialistic ideas!" This speech was well meant, but the crowd grinned and after some good-natured chaff the officer withdrew with considerable loss of dignity. In spite of these drawbacks the crowd was interested in Socialism, and a fairly large amount of literature was sold.

On Sunday at Glasgow Green, I gave an account of the miner's strike in Northumberland, and the same night I spoke to a very large audience in the meadows at Edinburgh. On Monday and Tuesday meetings were held at Dalkeith, and arrangements made for starting a branch and carrying on a regular series of meetings with the help of the Edinburgh branch. On all sides the Socialist movement in Scotland is progressing wonderfully well. The Edinburgh and Glasgow branches are very active, and becoming quite a power in their own districts. A good deal of work is done outside these two towns; this will be very much enlarged, and several new branches will soon be in good working order.

J. L. MAHON.

Peace, well-being, and order for all are the real aims of Socialism. To obtain these the one thing necessary is the combination of the workers; they, who create all wealth, must learn to understand that Socialism means the change from fighting each with each for life like beasts, to working together for life like men. They must get to know each other, and agree together that this change must be made, and then it will be made.

SOCIALISM IN NORWICH—RELEASE OF OUR COMRADE HENDERSON.

On Sunday morning a meeting was held at Trowse, addressed by comrades Crotch and Morley; in the afternoon a large meeting was held in the market-place, chair taken by comrade Darley; comrade Crotch spoke at some length; 4s. 8d. collected for the defence. In the evening Parker gave an address on the Northumberland miners' strike, giving a full explanation of the present desperate struggle of these poor fellows, and urging for help. Comrades Slaughter and Crotch also spoke. On Monday morning comrade Fred Henderson was released, after four months' imprisonment. He was released an hour before the usual time; a few comrades were waiting. Henderson waited till the usual time of releasing prisoners, when a large crowd assembled, cheering lustily for Henderson and the Cause. The crowd then followed him from the prison gates to the market-place; there he spoke a few words, telling the people that he was not reclaimed, but intended carrying on the work with more vigour than he had ever done before. He then proceeded to the Gordon Café, and had breakfast with a few friends. In the evening a large "Welcome" Tea was held in the Gordon Hall, the demand for tickets being far greater than could be supplied. After tea, a public social meeting was held, a band being in attendance; songs and recitations were given by comrades and friends. Fuller report next week. Fred Henderson will address Welcome meetings here on Sunday. A. S.

The North of England Socialist Federation is steadily increasing in membership. It is not expected that much can be done until after the strike is over. Meantime, however, a committee of miners is engaged in drawing up rules and formulating plans for carrying on the propaganda and extending the organisation. There are now twelve branches with over twelve hundred members, and this strength will be easily increased by one-half when the pits open again. Comrade Donald has now returned from his visit to Northumberland after addressing upwards of thirty meetings in three weeks. Mahon is back from Scotland and is at work again in Northumberland carrying on the propaganda.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

Annual Conference.—The Third Annual Conference of the Socialist League will be held at 13 Farringdon Road on Whitsunday, May 29th. The sum of £3, 17s. 0½d. has been paid to the miners' strike fund by J. L. Mahon. The sum was collected during his lecturing tour in Scotland. The items are as follows: Edinburgh—May 2nd, East Meadows, 11s. 6½d., 3rd, Tron Hall, 2s. 8d.; 4th, Leith Links, 12s.; 1st and 5th, Hamilton, 4s. 2d.; 8th, Glasgow Green, 6s. 8d.; 9th, R. M., Edin., £2.

BRANCH REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—A business meeting was held on Thursday, May 12, and arrangements were made for comrade Aveling's lecture on the 19th.—U.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, May 11, Stewart Headlam addressed a good audience on "The Sins that Cause Poverty." On Sunday, May 15, G. Bernard Shaw lectured to large and attentive audience on "The Rent of Ability." Lively discussion followed. It was unanimously carried that "heartly greetings" be sent to Henderson on his release from prison.—W. B. and T. E. W.

HACKNEY.—H. A. Barker delivered an instructive and interesting lecture on "Socialism the Necessary Outcome of the Present System;" good discussion.

HOXTON.—Very successful outdoor meetings morning and evening. Some opposition from a teetotaler, which was answered to the satisfaction of those standing round. In the evening, W. H. Campbell delivered a splendid lecture on "Justice before Charity," which was well received by the audience.—E. P.

NORTH LONDON AND MARYLEBONE.—On Sunday morning, at Regents' Park, a good meeting was addressed by Sparling on "Thieves, Large and Small." The audience showed their sympathy by donating 17s. for the Miners' Strike Fund. At Hyde Park in the afternoon, a large audience was addressed by Brookes and Davis. A number of questions were asked, evincing the interest of the hearers. These being disposed of, Nicoll followed and closed a successful meeting. Very good sale of literature. Members will be notified of next branch meeting in next issue.—H. B.

EDINBURGH.—On Sunday afternoon, in Queen's Park, Smith, Tuke, and Gilray spoke to a good audience, who seemed by their attention to be much interested. No opposition was offered. Good sale of literature.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, at two o'clock, Glasier addressed a good meeting at the Green. At five o'clock, Curran and Glasier spoke to a large audience on George's Square. In the evening in our rooms, Arch. McLaren gave an address on "How to Work for the Revolution." McLaren pointed out the numerous methods of propaganda which we can adopt without compromising our principles, and which will lead us directly and speedily to Socialism, and deprecated "parliamentary action" as being likely to obscure our aims and fritter away our efforts. Macfarlane led off on the parliamentary side, and contended strongly in favour of using parliamentary and every other means that would enlist the sympathy of the people on our side. Quite an animated discussion followed. Fisher, McLaren, Gilbert, and Glasier supported McLaren's view, and Warrington and Shaw Maxwell speaking in support of the views of Macfarlane.

HAMILTON.—On Thursday, Arch. McLaren and Bruce Glasier, of Glasgow, addressed a meeting in Paton's Hall.

PAISLEY.—Comrades Curran and Glasier, of Glasgow, addressed a large and very attentive meeting on the Causewayside. Several additional names were given in as members of the new branch.

SHIELDS (NORTH AND SOUTH).—This branch held three meetings last Sunday, Donald, Mahon, Hearne, and Stevens being the speakers. In the morning a large gathering at the Quay Side listened to animated speeches from the above. Considerable opposition was given by some local Liberals, but was fully answered by Mahon and Donald. One Radical was anxious to know what the Socialists would do if a Liberal or Tory candidate were before the constituency, to which Mahon replied that the workers should go to the ballot box and write on the papers, "Damn 'em both." In the afternoon, a meeting was held on the sands at South Shields, where Donald delivered a trenchant speech to a large crowd. At 6.30, a tremendous audience assembled in the Market Place at South Shields. This branch has been holding large meetings for the last six weeks, and is now considerably enlarged in membership.—J. H.

WALSALL.—On Saturday evening we held a meeting in the Market Place, addressed by H. Sanders, and a good impression was made upon the audience. Fair sale of literature.—J. T. D.

SOCIALIST UNION (NOTTINGHAM SECTION).—We have secured a neatly furnished room for our club over Bailey's tobacco shop, near the Mechanic's Hall, Milton Street, one of the best streets in the town, and shall now be able to collect our members together, increase our numbers, and do some sound work. On Sunday morning, Peacock and Proctor lectured in Sninton Market to a good audience; collection for local propaganda, 3s. 2d. In the evening we had a splendid and enthusiastic mass meeting. The Temperance Crusade Band, which had volunteered its services, played a selection after a few remarks from comrade Knight, who took the chair. Comrade Peacock then delivered a spirited address on the "Labor Struggle," chiefly referring to the struggle of the miners in Northumberland, and pointing out to the audience that the only way to finally solve the struggle will be to make the mines, railways, etc., the property of the people. A collection was then made on behalf of the Northumberland miners on strike while the band played another selection. Wane and Proctor also spoke. The collection amounted to 17s. Several names were taken to join our movement. Commonweal have all been sold out, and we have now doubled our order.—T. P.

A WRITTEN DEBATE

BETWEEN MR. C. BRADLAUGH, M.P., AND E. BELFORT BAX.

SUBJECT:

“Will Socialism Benefit the English People?”

II.—Negative: Mr. C. BRADLAUGH.

1. The question which ought to have been discussed between Mr. Bax and myself is, “Will Socialism benefit the English People?” Having carefully read the opening paper by Mr. Bax, on whom is now the duty of affirming the proposition that Socialism will benefit the English people, I am afraid that such a discussion is unlikely if conducted on the lines of that opening paper.

2. The first step should, I submit, have been to make clear precisely what it is that Mr. Bax means when he uses the word “Socialism”; and that then there should have been some attempt to show how such Socialism could be put in practice in this country; what were the beneficial results to the English people to be expected as the consequence of such Socialism in practice; and why any such benefits, if secured by the English people, were to be regarded as solely or mainly attributable to Socialism. In the first step Mr. Bax has, I think, failed, the other points he has not even touched, unless the very vague generalities I shall notice presently are considered by him sufficient.

3. Mr. Bax says that he defines “Modern Socialism” “as a new view of life (i.e. of human relations) having an economic basis,” and, he adds, that “the economic goal of modern or scientific Socialism” “is the equal participation by all in the necessities, comforts, and enjoyments of life, and the equal duty of all to assist in the necessary work of the world,” and he afterwards affirms that Socialism is to be realised “in the assumption by the people themselves, organised to this end, of the means of production, distribution, and exchange, and in the working of them in the interest of the whole community.”

4. But it is no definition to say that Socialism is a new view of human relations upon an economic basis unless the “view” and the “basis” are both clearly explained, and this explanation has certainly not been given by Mr. Bax in the paper to which I am now replying. He does speak of the “economic goal,” but can scarcely mean that the “goal” to be arrived at is with him the equivalent for the “economic basis” from which the Socialistic system starts.

5. Then Mr. Bax says that the economic goal of the Socialism which he ought to affirm, “no less than the Utopian Socialism of Owen, Fourier, St. Simon, etc.,” is—I will omit the “etc.” as much too vague for serious discussion, and will ask Mr. Bax does the “no less” mean that the Socialism he affirms is at least that of, or at least the equivalent of, those of Robert Owen, Charles Fourier, and Claude Henri St. Simon? That is, does he mean that the Socialism which he maintains includes and accepts the whole of what he calls the Utopian Socialism of these eminent persons, and in addition affirms something else (and if yes, what?) which makes it “modern or scientific” in lieu of being “Utopian”? I must not be understood as admitting that the theories of Robert Owen, Charles Fourier, and St. Simon are identical or even workable together.

6. Mr. Bax objects that Utopian Socialists, such as Owen, Fourier, and St. Simon, believed equal participation by all “to be attainable by mere individual initiative.” This seems to me inaccurate, but as it is scarcely relevant to the issue I only note the point as perhaps enabling me to distinguish the Socialism Mr. Bax now affirms. I understand Mr. Bax, in this, to maintain that Mr. Robert Owen and his friends were Utopian because they tried to reduce Socialism to actual practice in groups, and that Modern Socialism is practical in entirely avoiding any such experiments. If I am wrong in this interpretation perhaps Mr. Bax will state precisely what it is that he means, as I fear I do not quite know what he intends by the concluding sentence of his first paragraph.

7. If Mr. Bax attaches any importance to the words, “special reference to the condition of the world as a whole,” with regard to any attempt now or in future to establish Socialism in England, I shall be glad to have this explained, the more so as I see that he declares that Socialism “is nothing if not international.” Does this last phrase mean that no plan of Socialism could succeed in England unless that plan were also adopted by other European countries, or does the condition of the world, as a whole, involve that Socialism must be accepted in Africa before it can succeed here?

8. As I see that Mr. Bax is of opinion that “the break up of the present State nationalities of Europe would be one of the first results of Socialism,” I would ask him to state distinctly what other results, if any, of Socialism he anticipates in England as occurring prior to the expected break up of European State nationalities? I would further press him as to what he means by the break up, say, of the Swiss, Italian, French, and German nationalities? and what kind of governments, if any, he looks for, as likely to be existing, or which he may desire to exist, in each or any of these countries respectively after such break up? and whether he anticipates that such break up of State nationalities would be a slow and peaceful process? and if yes, why? or whether he regards such break up as in any case likely or desirable to be rapidly effected? and if yes, how? and whether if State nationality is to cease in England, as one of the earliest results of Socialism, he will briefly state the form of government, if any, which he hopes for in this country, and how he thinks it can exist without representing State nationality, or some federation of State nationalities.

9. If I rightly apprehend the note by Mr. Bax, he denies the possibility of any social change being effected by isolated individuals or groups. It is true he limits this denial by the words “abstractedly and of their own initiative, irrespective of the general current of human progress,” but the first word, “abstractedly,” is here meaningless, and to the last eight words it is only necessary to say that the general current of human progress has been made up of innumerable instances of isolated and individual effort ultimately co-operating and coalescing for the desired end, and thus ensuring the progress. To be told that the modern Socialist builds his faith on a “rock of ages” with “many-hued strata of economic formation” is marvellously pretty, but it has the disadvantage of not being necessarily clear in its meaning to the hearer or reader.

10. Not finding a definition of Socialism in these words of Mr. Bax, I will state my own view. I define Socialism either as affirming (1) that organised society should own all wealth, direct all labour, and compel the equal distribution of all produce, or as affirming (2) that organised society should take possession of land, capital, all means of production, distribution, and exchange, should control all labour, regulate all distribution, and conduct all exchange. That is, I understand a Socialistic State to be one in which everything would be in common as to its user, and in which all labour would be State-controlled. I therefore identify Socialism with Communism. Does Mr. Bax accept either of these definitions?

11. Mr. Bax says that there is to be “the assumption” (does this mean the taking away from the present owners? and if yes, by what means and on what conditions as regards the present owners?) of the “means of production, distribution, and exchange,” and that there is then to be “equal participation by all in the necessities, comforts, and enjoyments of life” (this, I suppose, means that under scientific Socialism every one is to have an equal share of everything), and that the people are to be “organised to this end.” I would ask Mr. Bax to tell me whether in so using those words he means that the organised people should take into their possession as a common stock and then own all wealth and equally participate in all produce, and if not, what distinction he draws? I would also ask him whether he includes all conceivable wealth under the words “means of production, distribution, and exchange, necessities, comforts, and enjoyments of life,” or whether he means to except any of the results of production? and if he makes any such exception, why?

12. In his third paragraph Mr. Bax promises to state “the nature of the process by which ‘the transformation of what he describes as capitalism’ into a real social order will be effected,” and further promises then to give “the reasons why such social order must benefit the English people.” I hope he will not think me rude in saying that I find no trace in his paper of any attempt to fulfil either promise.

13. There is one statement of Mr. Bax—i.e., that “civilisation can be only definitely overthrown by Socialism”—which if Socialism could widely prevail would very possibly be accurate. I am unable, however, to see that the definite overthrow of civilisation either in England or everywhere is shown by Mr. Bax to be probably, or even possibly, beneficial to the English people. Mr. Bax adds that the “State world” is to become a “social world” “by a revolution generated in the fulness of its own development.” I would respectfully ask Mr. Bax to explain to me how and when he thinks this English State is to become some other kind of English society other than a State? and in what way this is to be effected “by a revolution generated in the fulness of its own development”?

14. Mr. Bax affirms that Socialism “would of course soon result in the extinction of that private enterprise"—that is, in the extinction of some private enterprise he objects to. I venture to ask him whether Socialism, if realisable, would not certainly result in the complete extinction of all private enterprise, or what kinds of private enterprise he thinks would resist and survive? and why? If I pass almost without examination, and with but very slight contradiction, Mr. Bax's inexact presentment of history, it is because I believe it absolutely irrelevant to the question Will Socialism benefit the English people? and this is the only question I intend at present to discuss.

16. When Mr. Bax says that "Christianity is through and through Individualistic," I would ask him—if it be in any degree material to the issue between us—to explain how such a proposition is reconcilable with Acts ii. 44; iv. 32?

17. I see in Mr. Bax's paper occasional, but not precise, references to other works from his own pen and to the writings of others. I would respectfully ask him to requote here any words or statistics which he may think necessary to his argument. I have hardly the time for research outside my own bookshelves, and without exact reference might not light upon the intended passage, and our readers might some of them be in similar difficulty.

18. Mr. Bax makes the following statement with great confidence, and as if one of indisputable fact:

"The small capitalist is continually being thrown upon the labour-market by inability to hold his own in the competitive arena. Capital tends thus to become concentrated in fewer and fewer hands, while the reserve army of labour tends steadily to augment. The result is increasing riches for the few and increasing poverty for the many. The 'increase of national wealth' at the present day means increase of misery for the mass of the people."

I very much doubt whether any portion of the paragraph is true as to this country, except the one that the "army of labour tends steadily to augment". This I have always maintained, and have no doubt that the evils of society resulting from tendency of population to increase until positive checks operate are of a most serious nature. I would, as to the rest of the paragraph, ask Mr. Bax to refer me to the particular trades in which, during the last twenty years in England, the small capitalist has in any large numbers been so thrown upon the labour market. Also I would ask him whether the individual possessors of capital in England are not more numerous in proportion to population than they were forty years ago, and whether there is not now less pauperism in proportion to population in England than there was forty years ago? Mr. John Morley, speaking at Cobden Club dinner, said:

"In the years 1874-5 to 1884-5 the incomes between £200 and £1,000 per year have increased by 30 per cent., though the population has only increased by 10 per cent. Incomes over £5,000 a year have decreased by 10 per cent. You come to this as a general conclusion—that the lower the income the more rapid has been the rate of increase."

Does Mr. Bax dispute these figures? I admit that with the increasing education of the past thirty years there is an increasing consciousness of suffering and augmented discontent against unfair life conditions. I have done my best to increase this consciousness and discontent in order to compel ameliorating changes. I admit that with the increase of population in great centres you have limited areas of exceedingly acute misery, disease, and crime, which are probably in excess of what was possible in small centres of population, but I deny that there is increase of misery for the mass of the people, and assert on the contrary that the condition of the masses in England has certainly improved during the past fifty years. As the burden of proof is on Mr. Bax I invite him to give me the exact figures and references on which he relies to prove the allegations I traverse. I quite admit that it is true that there are unduly large landed estates and unduly large fortunes in too few hands. The land evil may, I think, be dealt with by legislation under existing institutions. The undue accumulations of capital are a little more difficult to check, but even this may be only a question of limiting power of bequest, of imposing cumulative tax on inherited personalty beyond a certain figure, or of higher and graduated income tax in excess of a certain amount. I would also submit that the large accumulations of our richest capitalists form only a small portion of the gross national wealth. Mr. Bax quotes, on the authority of Mr. Hyndman, some figures as to which he admits that he does not know how they have been arrived at, but which he says he has never seen "seriously controverted." I do not know whether Mr. Bax means that he does not regard objection from myself as serious, but he will see that in the debate with Mr. Hyndman, p. 30, I specifically challenged these very figures, and Mr. Hyndman, though alluding to this, p. 34, never disputed the returns I relied on. I have not seen the other statistics referred to by Mr. Bax. If they are material, I should be obliged by his giving them in detail in his next paper, as the lump totals given do not enable me—even if I understand them—to do more than challenge their accuracy. I say "even if I understand them," because Mr. Bax writes that money not earned by producers—that is, the estimated increased value—should be added to the income of the non-producer—that is, that something not brought into existence should be reckoned as part of the income of someone who cannot be benefitted by this non-existent quantity. Mr. Bax may mean something by this. Will he kindly explain.
