19. I exceedingly doubt whether Mr. Bax is right in saying that in England "the break-up of the feudal states helped to consolidate the power of the Crown." And if he did not mean this to apply to England, it is irrelevant to the issue we are discussing. Nor is it true that the history of this country from the sixteenth century to the present time "is the history of the middle or trading classes in their efforts to free the individual from the fetters of feudalism and monarchy, to the end that on the one side there might be a body of free and landless labourers, and on the other a body of moneybags free to exploit them." In any case Mr. Bax omits to show any connection between these alleged past sins of the English trading classes and the proposition he has undertaken to affirm.

20. Mr. Bax says:

"The means of the present exploitation of labour, the cause of the present horrible state of things, is monopoly. Its modus operandi is the extraction of surplus-value from the labourer by compelling him to work a whole day while receiving only so much of the results of his labour as is necessary to keep him in bare subsistence. Remove the monopoly from the hands of individuals, and you do away with the possibility of surplus-value."

This paragraph is an accumulation of inaccuracies. It assumes that at present some unnamed individuals have a monopoly either of all labour or of certain unspecified kinds of labour. Neither of these assumptions is true. It assumes that there is always or generally a surplus-value of considerable amount which the labourer has earned, to which he is morally entitled, but which he does not get. This is sometimes true, but seldom to the extent suggested by the form of the statement. The margin of profit over cost of production is usually very small. Then Mr. Bax says that by Socialism you "do away with surplus-value," but he does not explain how manufacture will be possible if no part of the result of labour is to go for plant, the expenses of conduct of the works, outlay for raw material, cost of exchange and distribution, which must necessarily be incurred, whether any particular industrial enterprise is exploited by an individual, by a corporation, or by a community.

CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

THE REWARD OF LABOUR.

A DIALOGUE.

Persons: AN EARNEST ENQUIRER, an EAST-END WEAVER, a WEST-END LANDOWNER.

SCENE: Outside a philanthropical meeting on Social Science.

E. E. (continuing to L.) But I am a stranger in London, and will you believe it, don't know what the East-end of London is like; but I have heard of so much being done for the benefit of the East-end, People's Palaces, Mosaic pictures, and the like, that I suppose by now it is quite a pleasant place; that small and squalid as your house is, you can get out of it at once into fresh air, pleasant gardens, roomy squares; and that it is well supplied with libraries, baths, and, in a word, all the benefits of civilisation—(aside) whatever that may mean.

W. Well, sir, you suppose a great deal. What's the use of building a People's Palace in Hell, or putting up a Mosaic picture on the walls of the devil's scullery. If the parsons are right about that job, and some of us do happen down there, we shall beat Old Scratch; for he will scarcely be able to make it so nasty that we shan't think we have got back again home. Excuse me, I told you that I was a bilious subject.

E. E. No excuse needed; I must get on, and indeed make an excuse to you for what I am going to say. Perhaps both I and this frock-coated, shiny-hatted gentleman here were after all wrong in thinking you intelligent; perhaps that's only a show—eh, Mr. Landowner?—to cover that dangerous discontent of the inferior part of the lower orders, which is getting to be so prevalent; and ain't you perhaps stupid, unable to seize hold of your advantages;—there, I don't want to hurt your feelings, I am only speaking of you as a type of a large body of men.

W. Never mind my feelings, I shan't get in a rage; I'm used to you now. Well, I'll answer as a type, and say I'm no stupider than other people, high as well as low; and at all events I am able to do my work—come!

E. E. (aside.) Well, the secret of the compensation to the working classes for their inferior position does rather elude my grasp, certainly; like trying to hold an eel when one hasn't sanded one's hand. Well, let's try once more, and try the moral side of things. (To W.) As I understand, we have got so far: you are a skilled workman, not stupid especially, you produce useful things, and yet you are poor; for that is the word we use, Mr. Landowner, to express a condition of life that you know nothing of, so that the word doesn't carry much meaning in it for you; nor as much as it should for you either, Mr. Weaver, because you don't know what being rich is, or what a soft and comfortable life it means, in spite of the moralists. However, I will just tell you both what being poor means, so that henceforth you, Mr. Landowner, may attach some meaning to the word, and you, Mr. Weaver, may understand partly what the word rich means. To be poor is to live in perpetual anxiety about satisfying the very simplest wants, and to have all kinds of wants besides which you have no chance of satisfying. Do you understand that, Mr. Landowner?—no, scarcely yet, I am afraid. Well, it can't be helped—he who lives will see. And now to my search for compensation again. You are, as it seems, skilful, industrious, useful—and poor. Yet, perhaps, you may be compensated even for that; for you know that according to the story, in ancient times the philosophers, whom you may look upon as a kind of reasonable parsons, were poor as well as useful, but they had their compensation in being much honoured and respected. Let us hope that it is the same with you, and that you are looked upon with a sort of reverence because you add so much to the wealth of the community and take so little from it.

[A faint smile is observed to play on the features of the Landowner, who has been listening a little lately].

W. Yes, I thought we should get to the chaff again, or else where have you been dug up from to ask such a question? A working-man honoured and respected! Yes, when he's a working-man representative. But look here, as to the respect I'm held in, I don't want to be vague, so I ask you to take the trouble to notice the way in which a policeman (a public servant, mind you) speaks to an East-ender and a West-ender; that will enlighten you as to the respect paid to me as a philosopher; and as to those of ancient days, 'tis hard to understand; and apart from it being, as the old woman said, "a long way off and a long time ago," I can't help suspecting that some of them were dodgers. Excuse me again, I am but a weaver, and therefore ill-bred.

E. E. Well, it comes to this, then, that you're skilful, industrious, useful, poor, and despised—one of the lower class?

W. Just so—a working-man.

E. E. Why?

W. Why? Because I'm a working-man.

E. E. Well, well, can't we get any further than that with our reason?

W. No, not yet. However, here is this gentleman, an educated man, an M.P., who has of course considered this sort of thing. Begin upon him now. And since he has stood by and listened to me, perhaps he won't object to my doing the same by him.

E. E. By all means stay, and if you can set him a-going when he sticks by a word in season, I shan't grudge you. (To L.) Well, sir, now for it! And I like the prospect of questioning you. You are burly and healthy looking; your step is firm, your eye bright, your features well cut. If it were still the old slave-times of the world, and our friend the weaver and you were by the fortune of war offered to me for sale, I think I should prefer speculating in you. You would last longer, for one thing.—Now, without further preamble, tell me what is your occupation?

L. I am a landowner.

E. E. Yes, I know that. What does that mean as to the work of it? What do you do?

L. Do? Well—why—well, I manage my estates.

E. E. You manage them? And pleasant work too, since they are yours. But is your statement quite accurate? Come now, on your honour, as an English gentleman.

L. Well, you understand; my lawyer does, and my steward, and my bailiff, and—

E. E. Yes, I see. Well, what else do you besides—not managing your estates?

L. (with hesitation) Well, you heard what the weaver said, I sit in Parliament.

W. (sotto voce) O Lord! That's what he does!

E. E. Well, I needn't follow up the enquiry further on that line, as it's clear that that trade, when successful, consists not of doing anything, but preventing things from being done. Do you do anything else?

L. Well, I suppose you won't call shooting doing anything?

E. E. Well, it doesn't do much service to others—not even the partridges.

L. Or horse-racing? At anyrate that's as useful as stock-jobbing.

E. E. I am happy to be able to agree with you.

W. And stock-jobbing isn't so bad as sweating.

E. E. Hilloa, my friend! That subject would lead us further, before we have done with it: let me stick to the honourable member's usefulness.

W. Like the breeches to the legless man!

E. E. (To L.). Well, all this—shooting, horse-racing, yachting, and the like—we had better not trouble ourselves as to its details; it can all be called by one generic name, can't it?

L. Yes; you mean amusement, I suppose.

E. E. You have said it. So that your work consists in your amusing yourself?

L. Yes (sadly)—or boring myself.

E. E. What are you paid for it?

L. Eh, what's that?—paid for it?

E. E. Yes, paid for it: you can't feed and clothe yourself on the game you shoot; it wouldn't pay powder and shot, I doubt. Shall I put it in another way? Who keeps you?

L. Keeps me? I keep myself, of course. My father used to keep me; he couldn't get a decent Government place for me.

E. E. Well, never mind your family history: we can guess at it. I must put my question another way, since you will be so obtuse. What do you get?

L. Oh, you mean my income? Well, my rent-roll is ten thousand a-year; but it doesn't come to much after all outgoings. First there's—

E. E. Excuse me; never mind those details, I am not a tax-gatherer. What's your income, all deductions made?

L. (blurted out). Six thousand a-year—there!

E. E. Well, and what do you think the reward for doing nothing ought to be?

W. (eagerly). Nothing.

E. E. Yes, but I didn't ask you. What do you say; Mr. Landowner?

L. Nothing.

E. E. Well, well, this is sad. You get £6000 a-year for doing nothing, for which our friend here thinks you ought to have nothing, and you have nothing to say to it. Your position is a strange one. Where does your £6000 a-year come from?

L. From my property, of course.

E. E. Where does that come from?

L. Come, come! you want to know too much. Suffice it, the property is mine, and that I came by it legally.

E. E. Well, I might press you on that point; but as I know that you are your father's son, as the saying goes, I had rather ask the questions I might ask you, as to where the property comes from, of a self-made man—that is, a man who has made money; which means he has "collected" it. But now, suppose me to be a man from another world, and answer me this: You live softly and comfortably, you can have everything you want, even to the point of the satisfaction of your desires boring you, and you do nothing useful.

L. (interrupting). Does any one?

E. E. What, not the men who supply you with food? Well, perhaps they don't, if that's all they do.

L. Well, you know what I mean.

E. E. No, I'm damned if I do—unless 'tis "nothing" once again. But you interrupted me with your meaningless pessimism. I say you do nothing, and for that you have and spend the livelihood of a hundred silk-weavers. You take a great deal out of the stock of wealth of the world, and put nothing into it. As an inhabitant of another world, allow me to ask, don't people look down upon you, jeer at you for this?

L. Certainly not; I am much respected, looked up to—liked even.

E. E. Why?

L. Well, I'm a good-natured sort of fellow.

E. E. You should be that at least, considering your easy life. But I wonder are you very clever? Perhaps a poet;—no, of course not: you would have let me know that long ago—but are you very clever?

L. Certainly not a poet, not even an inarticulate one; and not specially clever, I admit. But look here, if I were, I shouldn't be respected any more: I am respected because of my property, my position.

E. E. Well, I haven't much else to ask you; but tell me this: If you were employing two workmen, and one did his day's work well and straightforwardly and ate workman's victuals, and the other you had to feed on venison and champagne, and his day's work came to nothing, would you respect the second workman more than the first—as his employer, you know?

L. Of course not; but you see I'm not in the same position as the second workman. You see, my dear sir, the complexity of civilised society—in short, your question is quite wide of the mark.

W. Oh, oh!

E. E. I must put the case otherwise, then. Here is a man (pointing to Weaver) who works hard and usefully and is paid for it with £60 a-year and contempt; and here is another (pointing to L.) who does nothing at all and is paid for it with £6000 a-year and respect. As an earnest enquirer, I ask if you can tell me why?

L. These inequalities are necessary for the maintenance of society.

E. E. But it seems to me that it is an injustice, a gross one. Don't you really think so too? Come, try to throw away caste prejudices, and answer me like a man.

L. Well, perhaps it is—in the abstract.

E. E. Then injustice is necessary to the maintenance of society—why?

L. Because there must be rich and poor or there would be no society.

E. E. That is saying the same thing in other words. Again I ask, why?

L. I know it always will be so, that's all.

W. Then it's a bad look-out—that's all.

[While they have been talking, a small crowd has gathered about them, under the impression that an open-air meeting is going on. Enter to them a policeman, under the same impression, who pushes through the ring, and, seeing the Weaver, catches hold of him and gives him a rough shake, and says, "Come, you get out of this." Exit Weaver, hurriedly, glad to get off so lightly. Then policeman turns round to Landowner, who is very nicely dressed, touches his helmet, and says, "Shall I get you a cab, sir?" Landowner nods and moves off to meet the cab, and the small crowd disperses. Earnest Enquirer walks off slowly, soliloquising.]

E. E. I must try to find out why; for as the weaver said, 'tis a bad look-out. Society should mean something else than organised injustice; and somewhere there ought to be the germs of a society of which no one need ask the question, "Why does it exist?"

"DRIVEN TO MADNESS BY THE CRUELITIES OF CASTLE GOVERNMENT."—The N. Y. Herald of May 7 contains an account of the "arrival of thirteen late members of the Royal Irish Constabulary" who "resigned for conscience sake," from which it appears that one of them, Patrick M'Donough, "a fine-looking young fellow of thirty-six," had become insane. Shortly after embarking, he commenced raving about the horrible scenes he had witnessed, and imploring some imaginary persons to forgive him for doing his duty.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS IN PARIS.—The result of the recent municipal elections in Paris has been on the whole satisfactory, for the Socialist Labour Party have returned eleven representatives, while in the last municipal council they were but four, hence a gain of seven seats. L'Intransigeant gives a full list of the results of the ballot, from which we abstract for the interest of our readers the following details: The new Council consists of 56 "Autonomistes," of which 45 are Socialist Radicals (so to call them!) and 11 Revolutionary Socialists; 13 "Opportunists" (as against 27 in the last Council) and 11 "Reactionaries."

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE Coercion Bill is being slowly dragged through committee, and attacks are being made on its details with more or less success, so that there are not wanting genuine anti-coercionists who are beginning to feel elated at the prospect of the bill coming out of the mill something quite different from what was intended. I would remind these persons that it will in any case still be a coercion bill for Ireland; that is to say a bill for the manufacture of special crimes in that country, which do not exist in England, Scotland or Wales, and that the Tory Government and their Liberal allies will be quite satisfied with it in that form: a few words more or less, what do they matter?

In fact this struggle over the bill in committee illustrates very well the impotency of minorities in Parliament, even when they are important, respectable, and numerous, and the futility of attempting to use that body as a means of safeguarding the people from oppression. The bill becomes law after all this sifting out of parts of it that are any ways siftable; nor, as the division on Sir W. Harcourt's amendment shows, can the Opposition get rid of any of its principle; nevertheless anti-coercionists, and those as aforesaid, not of the mildest, are already beginning to look with a kind of complacency on the altered bill, are considering it to a certain extent as the work of their own hands, as indeed it is or will be; the effect of their guardianship of the liberties of the people will be visible in it, and will take the edge off the resistance of moderate opponents of the measure, or timid people, who will say, we have done all we can do in the matter—through our representatives in Parliament—and it isn't so bad after all: now let us go eat our dinners and forget the Irish question.

That is of course just what all Governments reckon on in such cases; they don't expect to carry a measure condemned by the democracy by the mere force of the accidental majority of that odd jumble of a body, the voters of the United Kingdom; they have always the fraud of Parliamentary representation to help that force, and can depend on the juggle of "determined opposition in committee" to do all they want for them and enable them to pose as persons who are carrying out the will of the people and are trying, so far as is possible, even to satisfy the perhaps not unreasonable prejudices of the minority.

How different a figure the bill would have cut if instead of going night after night to fight the air in committee, the real opponents of coercion had said after the second reading: Well, the force of the majority is yours and the bill is carried; we have opposed it as well as we could, and henceforth will have nothing to do with it, there is none of our handiwork in it; the whole measure is yours, face the public with it in your hands as the only persons responsible for it. If they had said that and then gone home till the business was over, would not anti-coercion have been by now in a better position than it is? Possibly in that case the Government might have put forward the bill in all its hideous nakedness and so have courted open revolt, thereby shocking the moderates into serious opposition: more probably they would have felt extremely nervous under their ill-omened freedom from opposition, and would not have ventured as far as they are venturing now under opposition; but in that case the public would have understood clearly enough that their forbearance was caused by cowardice, whereas they now suppose that they have yielded to reason as expressed by the Opposition. In either case the Coercion Bill would have been much more obvious for what it is, an impudent attack on the most elementary liberties of the country. The Parliamentary sham-fight of compromise and expediency has once more served the purpose it is sustained for, that is keeping the people down; and that in spite of the thoroughly organised and sincere opposition of the Irish members, who have done everything that they could have done—as a Parliamentary party. For the kind of abstention I have alluded to could not be done by a Parliamentary party.

Something has already been said in the Commonweal about the case of the pit-brow women; but owing to Mr. Burt's amendment to the Mines Regulation Bill the matter is again before the public, and is now put before them with sentimental and even theatrical embellishments which tend to obscure the real question at issue, which is briefly this: Are these women to be used for doing work which is unfit for women for the purpose of reducing the wages of working people? The capitalists very naturally answer "Yes," the working men as naturally answer "No." The public, confused as it well may be by the fact, amongst others, that the women engaged in this beastly work (also quite naturally under the present muddled slavery of labour) do not wish to lose their employment, doesn't know what to say. It may therefore be explained to them once more that the women would not be employed unless at lower wages than men would have to be paid, and that this is the case whenever women are employed on work which they are not especially fitted for. Whatever boon, therefore, may be conferred on the women by allowing them to work amidst filth for a small wage, it will be no boon to the working people in general.

A word may here be said to the "women's rights" group. They are far too apt to put women forward as competitors with men, and thereby injure the cause of the emancipation of women which every Socialist is bound to further. They are therefore blind to the fact that the capitalist employment of women for the general cheapening of labour is founded on that very dependence of women which they (and we) want to get rid of. Under reasonable conditions of society every woman will be free to earn her own livelihood as every man will be, but for that very reason there will be no competition between the sexes; and women will neither get nor seek employment in work which man can do better than they can. Capitalism forces them to accept such work now—at starvation wages; just as it forces males to accept work which is not fit for human beings. As long as men are slaves, women can be no better. Let the women's rights societies adopt that last sentence as a motto—and act on it.

The East-end people may be congratulated on the new "palace" they are getting, though the word is an unsavoury one in the mouth of the people. But what a number of East-ends there will be whose poverty will prevent them from using it! People too ragged, dirty, ignorant—in a word, too degraded to use it. And even those of the workers who can use it, can they do so with due pleasure and content? Surely not, when they contrast its magnificence with their own narrow, inconvenient, sordid dwellings and their wretched surroundings. Until their private houses are roomy, comfortable, and pleasant, they cannot really enjoy splendid public buildings; they have got to go back again to their narrow, shabby lodgings, and beastly workshops—and live there. Surely when true society takes the place of false, we shall raise beautiful and magnificent halls with their surroundings for the use of all. But the contrast will not then be between splendour and sordidness, but between splendour and special beauty and the due simplicity of the dwelling of a private person which is quite consistent with beauty and convenience.

SHORT DRAMA IN TWO SCENES.—First scene: Millionaire seated in an easy chair; by him stands a Poor Man in a supplicating attitude.

Millionaire: "Ahem! Very sorry, my young friend, that I can do nothing for you. But I can give you a word of good advice—economise!"

Poor Man: "But when a man has nothing to—"

Millionaire: "Nonsense! Under such circumstances a man must know how to save."

Second scene: The Millionaire is drowning in a pond; the Poor Man calmly regarding him from the shore.

Poor Man: "Sorry, my friend, that I can do nothing for you, but I can give you a word of good advice—swim!"

Millionaire (choking): "Bub-bub-but wh-when a man can't swim!"

Poor Man: "Nonsense! Under these circumstances a man must know how to swim."—Newcastle Chronicle.

THE MORROW OF THE REVOLUTION.

WE Socialists are often asked the question, what would you do if you found yourselves with power in your hands to-morrow? This question is not an unreasonable one, and I think it is one that Socialists should discuss before the day finds them unprepared. In Paris sixteen years ago the problem had to be faced in a practical manner, but the leaders of Paris were then unhappily in utter confusion as to its solution. It is true they performed the ordinary executive functions of an administration admirably; and it is sufficient to point to their example to confute those who affect to laugh at the notion of men unacquainted with official red-tape being put in responsible positions. But when it came to the question of any new departure to be made the council-room of the Commune was the battle-ground of rival propositions. Now it seems to me that it is not unprofitable for Socialists to enter upon the discussion of such points as these at once, and as far as may be to "thrash them out," before rather than after they are called upon to act.

The usual reply to the question referred to in opening is that we intend to nationalise or communise the means of production and distribution. This is undoubtedly strictly and literally correct, but from the questioner's point of view it may possibly be regarded as what a celebrated character of Dickens' would have called an "evasive answer." If further elucidation is required we proceed to explain that we mean to take over the big industries, railways, factories, banks—all, in short, that are sufficiently concentrated to admit of being worked by the State—and to proceed by the erection of communal or municipal workshops and stores on a large scale to undermine by competition the individualist-capitalist production and distribution. So far so good. But all this takes time to work itself out; "While the grass grows," says Hamlet, etc. An objection may be raised, therefore, that in a period of revolution it would be necessary to take certain immediate steps of an ad interim character to satisfy legitimate popular demands and to forestall the panem et circenses schemes of reactionary demagogues—Tory and Liberal "democrats," to wit. In other words, it may be insisted that the purely economic action of the organised Socialist administrative must be supplemented by legislative and judicial action for the former to have the chance of taking effect. That this is the case I am myself convinced. What action, then, would be the right one to be taken in addition to the orthodox economic readjustment above referred to, and which would of course be the mainspring of fundamental social reconstruction? In this instance, as in many others, I find the traditional three courses present themselves; with this difference, that here, as I take it, not one only, but all would have to be followed, since they are all more or less interconnected. To be brief, the first is the reduction of the working day to eight hours or less; the second, the all-important correlative of this action (without which I fear the limitation of hours would be merely illusory)—viz., the enactment of a law of maximum and minimum; and the third the abrogation of "civil" law, especially that largest department of it which is concerned with the enforcement of contract and the recovery of debt. As to the first of these provisions, it is unnecessary to say much, the reduction of the working day having become a plank in the working-class platform throughout the world. But the second and third may need a word of explanation. By a law of maximum and minimum, then, we mean the fixation of a maximum or compulsory price for all the necessary articles of everyday consumption—ordinary food, clothing, firing, etc.—and a minimum or lowest wage for the day's work in every industry, or at least in all the more important industries. This it seems is a necessary concomitant of a reduction of the working day, otherwise the price of necessities must tend to rise in proportion to the increased cost of production, or wages to fall, or perhaps both. Of the abolition of civil law I have elsewhere spoken, showing this law to be indeed the logical result of an individualist society and the indispensable corollary of such a society, but to have no reason of being in one based on collective possession of the means of production and distribution. The grounds of this are obvious. In an individualist society, where every man is fighting for his own hand in the mêlée of competition, he requires as the first condition that the laws of the war should be observed—that is, that plunder and murder should follow the prescribed rules, since if they are departed from his position as a combatant is prejudiced. In fact, without the enforcement of such rules the fight itself would be impossible, so that they are vital even to the very existence of competition or the commercial system.

On the other hand, under a Collectivist régime they are neither necessary for the system nor for the individual. The latter has his livelihood already assured by the constitution of society in return for his share of its needful work, and is no longer under the necessity of struggling as an individual with his fellows for his share of the produce of labour. Hence, he is not dependent for his subsistence upon any contract or agreement he may choose to make with other individuals. Any such agreement must therefore become a purely subsidiary and private matter, with which he has no right to expect Society to concern itself. Socialism implying that contract has ceased to be the cornerstone of economic conditions and social relations, it would be but natural that a revolutionary government should proclaim that fact in abolishing its legal sanctions. But there are additional reasons, and those of expediency, why this should be an immediate measure: (1) The abolition of enforcement of contract (including recovery of debt) would instantly put a stop to an enormous mass of swindling now carried on under the eyes of the law; (2) would effectually preclude the possibility of even temporary competition with the government or municipal industries; and (3) would as effectually prevent any evasion of the law of maximum and minimum.¹ In fact, the abolition of the courts taking cognisance of contract (including the recovery of debt) would of itself so dislocate the whole commercial system, as to render its resuscitation during any period of temporary reaction well-nigh impossible.

These three provisions, I take it, ought to be the immediate issue of the attainment of power by a Socialist government. For the rest it might be further asked by one desirous for light, what attitude would a Socialist administration adopt towards the existing criminal law? To this also, so far as I am personally concerned, I am prepared with an answer. The customary laws of Anglo-Saxon tribal society, which form the basis of the so-called common law of England, as they became inappropriate to the new conditions, have been gradually superseded by legislation or by statutes, and these form the main body of our modern criminal law. Westminster has dictated statutes which have taken the place of the local "common law." This is necessarily the case as primitive society merges into civilisation. Civilised law, which is based on the independence of the individual and on the personal possession and control of property, is necessarily opposed to "customary law," which presupposes the dependence of the individual on a group and the collective ownership of property by that group. The latter (viz., customary law) will stretch and may be modified, it is true (as evidenced by the English "common law"), up to a certain point in accordance with the changed conditions; but beyond this it has to be supplemented, and is finally superseded by legislative enactments or statutes. Now, as Socialists, we believe that civilisation is destined to pass into a new and higher communism, just as tribal communism has passed into civilisation, and that therewith the whole of modern legislation will become obsolete. But, meanwhile, and until the economic change has worked itself out in ethical change, it is clear that a criminal law must exist. The only question is whether its basis shall be a mass of anomalous statutes and precedents or a logical system. In the one case the sweeping changes which it would be necessary for a Socialist government to make, would be complicated and hampered in a thousand ways. In the other they could be effected with ease. Now the most perfectly logical and connected system of jurisprudence is admitted by all students of law to be the Roman or civil law, and in modern times the system founded upon it was prevalent over a part of the Continent, and known as the "Code Napoleon."

My answer then to those who would know the proper course for a revolutionary government to take in the matter of jurisprudence, is that in my view such a government should, in countries where the "Code Napoleon" does not obtain, immediately suspend the existing criminal law and replace it by this code, at the same time appointing a committee of urgency to expurgate and amend it in accordance with the new Socialist morality. Such expurgation, it is possible, might leave little of the original in the end, but that original would have acted as a working basis and so served its purpose. The crucial distinction, it must never be forgotten in all these matters, between the old Society and the new, is that the one is based on the absolute sacredness of personal property, the other recognises the welfare of the community alone as the one absolutely sacred claim, all other claims having validity only in so far as they are derived from this one.

NORTHUMBRIAN NOTES.

IN Northumberland we have had a visit from the harmless old gentleman who commands the British army. He was opening a big show which is making a stir here just now. It was very funny and very degrading to see how thousands of people flocked after and cheered this person. The shopkeepers, however, in the most disloyal manner, tell one that they are in favour of the Jubilee fuss if it brings them more trade, and against it if not. Their straightforwardness is refreshing, even if their motives are not of the highest.

Socialism in the North of England is now on a secure footing. The gratifying outcome of our agitation is the establishment of the North of England Socialist Federation—a solid labour organisation, chiefly miners, at present consisting of twelve branches and over 1200 enrolled members. Rules are being drafted by a committee, and everything is going on in the most satisfactory manner.

The strike is now practically settled. By a large majority the men have decided to give the Wage Committee power to settle on the best terms they can obtain. This means little short of surrender. But the men have no disgrace attaching to their defeat. For seventeen weeks they have stood out, living on a few pence a-day, maintaining a quiet and peaceful demeanour, but with a dogged determination that nothing could overcome. That they have suffered keenly no one who has seen them and known them can doubt. Their battle was rendered doubly hard by the bitter knowledge that their leaders, who ought to have cheered them on and fought for them, hung back, gloomily predicting defeat before they had made an effort for victory.

The men feel and say that they could have won this fight had their leaders fought with them; but from the first, defeat seemed certain, since the leaders not only predicted it, but did nothing, where they could have done much, to avert it. The strike has taught many lessons, but most of all the lesson that unity is essential to the miners cause and the cause of all the workers.

The men have fought splendidly. There is nothing in the annals of the last quarter of a century of the labour-struggle to surpass it. Perhaps the sturdy chainmakers of Cradley Heath should be excepted. But here the whole county have fought magnificently against their foes and against their generals too. By standing out they have shown the true grit they are made of. They have also given the masters a lesson that they had never expected but fully deserved.

J. L. MAHON.

¹ The reason of the inefficacy of the mediæval laws against usury, which has been the subject of so many homilies on the part of orthodox economists, was simply owing to the fact that concurrently with the anti-usury laws, there existed laws for the recovery of debts.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

This department is under the direction of the Strike Committee. Labour News and Contributions to the Fund should be sent to T. BINNING, at the Offices.

BRITAIN.

The members of the Hackney Radical Club have organised a subscription in aid of the pitmen who are on strike in Northumberland.

At Darlaston there is a partial strike of the nut and bolt trade, owing to the attempt of one of the firms to enforce a reduction of wages and the alleged resort in other cases to violation of the Truck Act.

Several delegates of the Knights of Labour have recently arrived in England from the United States, and are now engaged in constituting assemblies of that order. They are said to be meeting with some success, and already several have been formed in the North of England.

The strike in the coal trade at Hebburn is now at an end. The men at the "C" pit came out in December last. The dispute was eventually referred to arbitration, and a settlement was arrived at in Durham on the 18th. The miners recommenced work on Monday. Between 600 and 700 men have been "out" for five months.

Intimation has been given by the Gourock Rope-work Co. (N. B.) to the whole of their workpeople of a reduction in wages of from 7 to 15 per cent. This reduction comes into effect at once, and extends to both male and female workers. As the works have been running only four days per week for some time, the reduction will be severely felt.

As a consequence of Mr. Goschen's budget arrangements as to the duty on tobacco, a large number of men, it is reported, have been discharged for three weeks from the firm of Messrs. Levy Brothers, tobaccoists, Shoreditch. Many operatives have already been discharged from other firms, and the new arrangement is likely to cause the closing of at least two large factories in the East-end.

The chainmakers have the satisfaction of being able to report several firms conceding the advance. At these firms work has commenced. At a recent meeting, Mr. Homer, the chairman, said they intended to boycott those men who had been at work during the time they had been on strike. They were determined not to resume work till they had attained their object. It was unanimously resolved to continue the strike. This is the 42nd week. A. K. Donald is now in the district as a delegate from the Strike Committee of the Socialist League. His report will probably be given in this column next week.

STRIKE OF BOYS.—On the 16th, the boys to the number of 32, who perform the duties of "putters-up" and "takers-in" at the new gas tank house of Londonderry Bottleworks, Seaham Harbour, belonging to Messrs. Candlish and Sons, struck work, and men have had to be engaged in their places, so that the men employed in gathering, blowing, and finishing will not be stopped. The refusal of the boys to go in is said to be owing to the adoption of a new code of working rules by the firm, by which the former allege their wages are considerably reduced.

The Northumberland miners have now reached the last stage of orthodox strikes. At the meeting last Saturday the result of the vote on the terms of surrender was decided, and the Wages Committee are empowered to make the best terms. The M.P. and other "trimmers" of the miners' organisation, have gained a decided victory, and have assisted the masters to a great extent in bringing about a conclusion to the strike. This will probably be the last strike bossed by the "old gang" who, on the slightest pretext play into the capitalists' hands and leave the men to fight both enemies and quondam friends. It is to be hoped the next turn-out will be a Socialist movement. The terms of the settlement are reductions of 12½ and 6½ respectively on different classes of coal.

THE STRIKE IN THE BELFAST SHIPBUILDING TRADE.—The employers are acting in the most high-handed manner. A deputation of the Queen's Island workers waited on the heads of the firm and were told if the men were not willing to go back to work under the old conditions the employers were prepared to "let the grass grow on the yard." Messrs. Harland and Wolff have decided to close their yard for at least a month, and have discharged the apprentices and clerks. Notwithstanding that subscriptions are coming in very slowly, and that the men are beginning to feel pinched, they are still determined to hold out. At a recent mass meeting, on a show of hands being called for, not a dissident was to be seen in the entire assembly.

BOLTON.—The strike in the iron trade seemed likely to come to an end. The Mayor intervened—taking the tide in the affairs of the disputants which was thought might lead to a settlement. The ironworkers however rejected an offer by the masters, who suggested that the men should continue at work for three months, withdraw their objections to overtime, and then consent to the refereeship of the Mayor in the matter of wages. A counter-proposal was made to the masters, which was not divulged.—The spinners engaged at the Vernon mills, have struck against a reduction of wages.—It is satisfactory to see that Herbert Fletcher, owner and manager of the Lady Shore Colliery, was fined £20 and costs for refusing to comply with the award of an umpire to stop working the mine with naked lights. The award was backed by 300 men who were employed by the defendant.

BELGIUM.

GREAT STRIKE IN THE MINING DISTRICTS.—"La Grève noire" has been spreading through the mining districts with telegraphic rapidity. In the Centre work has been completely stopped at the forges at La Hestre, Haine-Saint-Pierre, Baume, the workshops and smelting factories at La Croyère, etc. Military assistance has been called into requisition, and in several places the military have come into contact with the enraged strikers at the mouth of the pits. At La Croyère, the gendarmes charged the strikers very indiscriminately and killed and wounded several among their number. In the Charleroi coal basin the spread of the strike has been less rapid, though at Gilly, where as at Châtelet it is principally accentuated, the collieries and several of the workshops are guarded by a squadron of lancers which arrived from Tournai. The strikers in the Centre number over 3000. In the Borinage the number of those on strike has been 6000, but has since considerably diminished. Several arrests have been made, among them being Looor and Coureur, editors of the Combat.

CHARLEROI, May 22.—Numerous meetings have been held here to-day, at which a general strike was decided upon for to-morrow. The Burgomaster has asked for a battery of artillery to be sent here this evening. The District Court is sitting uninterruptedly, and great anxiety prevails.

CIGAR-MAKING IN ENGLAND.

This trade is the only one, the raw material of which is heavily taxed by an excise duty. It is owing to this fact that in the early spring of the year the trade becomes "slack," and men are thrown out of employment. The employers are ever expectant of an alteration of duty, and await anxiously the introduction of the Budget in the House of Commons. In 1878, Sir S. Northcote, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, raised the duty on leaf tobacco from 3s. 2d. to 3s. 6d., an increase of 4d. on the pound. The employers at once commenced an agitation, in which they succeeded, to obtain an increased duty on foreign and Continental cigars, "to equalise the tariff and protect the home market." In the meantime, the employers took good care to well stock their warehouses with tobacco before the new and increased duty came into operation, thus gaining 4d. on every pound of leaf cleared. Not content with this, they also in many cases forced a reduction in the prices they were paying to their operatives, contending that the consumer would not pay the enhanced price for tobacco and cigars, and that they would be at an enormous loss to continue manufacturing at the old prices. We were obliged to give way.

The duties remained as above until the 21st of April, 1887, when Mr. Goschen, Chancellor of the Exchequer, introduced the Budget, and to the surprise of every one proposed to take off the 4d. Sir S. Northcote put on, this to come into operation on the 21st of May. As soon as this became known, the employers began to discharge their "hands" until that time. The unions at once decided to send deputations to the employers with a view of arresting the wholesale discharge of the men, and at the same time to seek the co-operation of the employers in requesting the Chancellor to either give a rebate of 4d. on all tobaccos cleared out of bond until the 21st of May, or bring the new tariff into operation as early as possible. They assured our deputation that they could rely on their support in what we were doing, and even promised to keep the men at work on short time rather than discharge them, a promise they forgot to keep in a large number of cases. Many of the employers offered a reduction as a condition to keep the men at work, and in the case of a very "respectable" firm in Long Acre, they offered a reduction of 6d. per hundred to the cigar-makers and 20 per cent. to weekly servants, which was persisted in until the news of the rebate granted by the Chancellor reached the firm.

I am glad to say that both in London and the country the female section of the trade have greatly aided us in resisting all offers of reduction in this crisis.

We have been repeatedly told that the interests of the employers and the men are identical, and yet, while the unions were endeavouring to bring the new tariff into operation as soon as possible (to the employer's benefit in the long run), the Masters' Association were in solemn conclave, and resolved "to strongly recommend the Chancellor to adhere to May 21st for the reduction of the tobacco duty in order that the manufacturers might have time to clear their stocks!" So much for identity of interests!

The Chancellor also proposes to make it illegal to sell tobacco containing more than 35 per cent. of water. The extent to which adulteration has been carried with smoking tobaccos since 1878, has attracted the attention of the novice as well as the expert. As much as 65 to 70 per cent. of adulteration has been discovered in the commoner kinds of tobacco, thus increasing the already enormous profits of the manufacturers.

It is not generally known that every large spinner of tobacco has his chemical laboratory, in which "scientific" experiments are carried on and applied to this industry—an example of stimulus to invention which Socialists hear so much about to-day. The employers, therefore, are quite angry with Goschen for tampering with it, and are loudly protesting against the interference with their genius.

In the Tobacco Trade Review for this month (the employers' journal) there are several letters of protest against the proposed alteration. The following is an extract from a letter by some one who signs himself "W. D.": "My impression is that the boon offered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the reduction of the tobacco duties is more than neutralised by the restriction of the amount of added moisture permitted. Doubtless the working man will get more tobacco for his 3d. and perhaps of better quality. The retail shopkeeper also will do better, because his roll and common shag will not shrink on his hands, but there will be much inconvenience caused by the extinction of the wholesale dealers, for whose profits and expenses no margin will be left." He concludes by asking: "Would it not be better to leave the question of added moisture to the operation of the natural law of trade competition? (The italics are mine.)"

The above is a good sample of the "cheek" of those "gentlemen" who fill the Review with "trade requests" and nostrums of doubtful utility. Another correspondent (a retailer) writes to ask a very "ticklish question," eminently useful as indicating the general efficiency of prohibitory enactments: "Sir, can you or any of your readers give me any idea how the authorities are going to carry out the clauses restricting the sale of tobacco containing over 35 per cent. of moisture? A roll of thick twist as a whole may be within the limit, but the outer laps will be very much so, and the inner core probably just as much over-weighted with increase. Will the Excise take the average of the roll, or the outer laps, or the inner ones, for the purpose of testing? And what are the penalties imposed for infractions?"

These letters are sufficiently suggestive to any one to show that there are always opportunities afforded manufacturers to adulterate their goods in spite of the Government regulations.

Before closing this review, a word as to the unions in existence among cigar-makers in England is necessary. There are two societies, the Cigar-makers' Mutual Association (to which I belong) and the Provident Society. The latter have about 250 members, and I believe their financial position is fair. A few facts and figures pertaining to the former association may be interesting and instructive. The figures I am about to give will illustrate the ravages made by the recent depression in trade on our financial position. The general fund on April 25th, 1885, was £1283, 4s. 5d. Up to Jan. 23, 1886, we paid to men out of work £1508, 4s.: there were 1003 members on the roll at that time. We were now, however, to experience a still heavier strain on our funds. In the following quarter, from Jan. 23, 1886, to April 24, we paid to men out of work £571, 2s., and £156, 2s. 6d. to men on the sick list, which ultimately brought our general fund to the small figure of £733, 1s. 3d., or a loss on the quarter of £390, 16s. 4d. In the next three months we paid to men out of work £414, 1s. 6d., and another £110, 8s. 6d. to men on the sick list, losing on the quarter, one way and another, £74, 16s. 10d., our funds standing at £658, 4s. 5d. We therefore paid in out-of-work benefit alone during the period from April 25, 1885, to Jan. 21, 1887, £2625, 9s., while our membership has decreased to 917; the funds standing at £913, 14s., a loss of over £370 in just on two years, showing we are rapidly losing ground as trades' unionists.¹

Socialism has made but little progress among cigar-makers up to the present time, but there is every indication that the men are every day becoming more willing to listen to anything pertaining to their position as workmen. They are for the most part a fairly intelligent body of men, many of whom have displayed in the past a self-sacrificing spirit for the general good; and I have no fear that, as time rolls on, and the great social change for which Socialists strive looms up in the distance, those engaged in the cigar industry will not be found wanting.

H. DAVIS.

SOCIALISM IN NORWICH—HENDERSON'S RELEASE.

On Sunday morning Morley gave a short address near Ber Street Fountain. In the afternoon a very large meeting assembled, notwithstanding the rain had been falling incessantly. Henderson was greeted with a hearty welcome, it being the first meeting since his release. He spoke for some time. The following resolution was carried unanimously: "That this meeting of Norwich workers considers that the imprisonment which Charles Wilfred Mowbray is now suffering is an unjust one, and calls for his speedy release." After the meeting, cheers were given for Henderson. Collected for defence, 7s. In the evening Henderson and Slaughter spoke on Agricultural Hall Plain. At the Gordon Hall, which was crowded, many being unable to get in, comrade Slaughter in the chair, Henderson lectured on "Civilisation of Prison Life," giving some experience of his recent imprisonment. He spoke of the many martyrs who had suffered for their opinions and still continued carrying on their mission, amidst frequent bursts of applause from the audience. Morley and another comrade also spoke. A good meeting was held at Wymondham, addressed by comrades Morley, Reux, and Stone. Literature has had a good sale; all Commonweal sold out. A. S.

The following additional particulars of the release of our comrade Henderson, taken from a report in a local paper, will no doubt be of interest to our readers. It has been known for some days past by Norwich Socialists that Fred Henderson would be released from the Castle yesterday morning at about seven o'clock. Arrangements were therefore made to give him a hearty welcome on his return to public life, and at that hour a goodly number of people had assembled in the vicinity of the Castle gates, amongst whom were comrades Crotch, Sutton, etc. But the object of their search had left the place of his temporary retirement an hour previously, having, we are told, been pressed to leave the prison even as early as five o'clock. However, Henderson was not far off, for presently putting in an appearance he was cordially greeted by his old friends, and a procession was formed for the Market Place, where a short meeting was held. The hero of the "demonstration" was cheered and received with manifestations of welcome. He thanked them for their kindness in thus meeting him, and said he hoped to be able to re-commence his work on behalf of Socialism in the city. An adjournment was then made by a select few to the Gordon Café, Duke Street, where a substantial breakfast was eaten, served by comrade Slaughter. In the evening there was a welcome home tea and social gathering at the Gordon Hall, the rendezvous of the local branch of the Socialist League. The tea was supplied by comrade Slaughter, and 150 persons sat down. After tea a social entertainment of a miscellaneous character was held, under the chairmanship of comrade Sutton, who was supported by comrades Slaughter, Crotch, and Henderson, the guest of the evening. The hall, which was densely crowded, was tastefully decorated with red baize, Socialist mottoes, cartoons, and portraits, among which were those of Henderson, Mowbray, Morris, Kropotkin, and others. Letters and telegrams were received during the evening from Annie Besant, giving "cordial congratulations and good wishes;" from Mahon, who is with the Northumberland miners, "with hearty greetings," and stating that they had in Newcastle just started a Socialist Federation there with 1200 members; from the Clerkenwell Branch, with "hearty greetings;" from the Social-Democratic Federation, giving "hearty congratulations;" etc. The programme consisted of songs, selections by a brass band under the direction of Crotch, recitations, readings, and short speeches. Comrade Slaughter gave in felicitous terms the toast of "The Prisoners for the Cause throughout the World," and it was responded to by Fred Henderson in an eloquent speech, in which he declared his intention of never faltering in his agitation. He regarded the Cause as the only thing worth living for. His remarks were listened to with deep attention, and applauded frequently. Comrade Crotch, on behalf of the local branch, presented Fred Henderson with Byron's Works, two volumes, and 'Tales of Revolution and Patriotism,' by the daughter of Joseph Cowen of Newcastle. In response to the toast of "The Visitors," Mr. E. Burgess, Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., and Mr. J. F. Thorn delivered short addresses. The assembly broke up at a late hour.

Powderly and the Labour Party.—A series of resolutions passed by the Portland (Oregon) Eureka Assembly K. of L. are in type, but unavoidably held over by press of matter.

¹ We pay 9s. per week to men out of work, for thirteen weeks, and 6s. per week for the next thirteen. The same to men on sick-list.

FOR THE CONFERENCE.

Whitsunday, 1887.

THOUGH Pentecost but faintly now recall
The rushing mighty wind and tongues of flame
Wherewith the universal spirit came Upon the faithful at the festival,
When all the startled strangers in the hall
Heard them in divers tongues one truth proclaim,
And in the concord of a common aim
They gave their goods each for the good of all;

Yet if like them we seek the highest good
In earnest union, and cast out to-day
The evil spirit of mistrust and strife,
Our tidings shall be told and understood
Through all the nations, and our hands shall lay
The new foundation of the house of life.

REGINALD A. BECKETT.

Anti-Coercion Demonstration in Victoria Park, on Saturday May 21st, 1887.

No. 10 was the platform occupied by the Socialist League, and although neither Liberal, Radical, nor pseudo-Socialist spoke therefrom, a large and enthusiastic audience assembled around it, despite the unpropitious nature of the weather, which on this occasion was enough to make the stoutest heart quail. The proceedings were opened by

H. A. BARKER, who stated that they were there that day to make their voice heard on behalf of freedom and against coercion, not because the coercion on this occasion emanated from the Tories. From whatever source it came—Liberal or Tory—they denounced it, and not in mere party fashion, but because they hated coercion and loved liberty. The history of both political parties showed that neither had scrupled to use this hateful weapon when the interests of the monopolists were threatened.

WILLIAM MORRIS moved the first resolution, which was as follows:

"That this meeting expresses its deep abhorrence of the Coercive Measures levelled against the Irish nation, and is of opinion that, the Land Question being at the root of the Irish troubles, no political change can have permanent value unless accompanied by, or be in the direction of the abolition of Landlordism in Ireland; and is further of opinion that the Irish nation should be left free to settle with the landlords without any restriction whatever from the English Parliament."

In moving it he declared that this question of coercion concerned the people of England, Scotland, and Wales equally as much as it did those of Ireland. That unholy trinity, Salisbury, Hartington, and Chamberlain were doing all in their power to maintain entire what were called "the indefeasible rights of property." He warned his hearers not to allow themselves to be hounded by this trinity, who, after all, were not concerned so much about Home Rule for Ireland as they were about the domination of the privileged class, a class which depended for its existence upon the robbery of the worker. They had all learnt that commandment which said, "Thou shalt not steal," let them learn another, viz., "Thou shalt not be stolen from."

G. BERNARD SHAW seconded, and in doing so asked his hearers to drop all pretence of special sympathy with the Irish people, the English people were as bad off and as hardly used as were the Irish. In most cases in Ireland the tenant was not evicted unless he owed at least six months' rent; such was not the case here, where folk were turned out without owing anything like that amount of rent. The fact was our hardships were just as great as those of the Irish, we were oppressed just the same, and the only difference between them and ourselves was that they protested, warred against their oppressors, while we bore in silence the very same oppression.

W. C. WADE, in supporting the resolution, declared that when the abolition of slavery was proposed all privilege stood up against it, and to-day as then privilege was up in defence of its rights, rights which could only be enforced at the expense and misery of the workers. To-day they were wage-slaves, formerly they were chattel-slaves, and until they freed themselves economically they must remain so.

The resolution was then put and carried unanimously.

H. DAVIS then moved:

"That this meeting firmly believes that the English, Scotch, Irish, and Welsh people are enslaved by the present capitalist system, which by means of the monopoly of the means of production robs every working-man of the results of his labour, and determines to do whatever is necessary to do away with the slavery of labour."

J. LANE seconded, and remarked that if they were to be free they must free themselves. The present capitalist system must result in bringing about a social revolution, and it was coming whether they wanted it or not, and it behoved them to so act that when the crisis came it would find them prepared and able to take possession of the land and the means of production, and to use them in the interest of the whole community.

S. MAINWARING, in supporting the resolution, descanted upon the hardships of the worker, and spoke with much animation. On some of his remarks being called in question by a man in the crowd, he concluded by enforcing upon his hearers the necessity for combination, without which the cause of the workers was hopeless.

The resolution was carried by a large majority, which, considering its nature and the mixed character of the meeting is most encouraging.

This concluded the meeting so far as the League was concerned; and wet and steaming the occupants of Platform 10 drove from the park, leaving behind it knots of people discussing what they had just heard of Socialism and seen of its advocates.

THE STRIKE IN THE BOLTON IRON TRADE.—IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN WORKMEN.—In connection with the strike in the Bolton iron trade, Messrs. Wood, a local firm of engineers, have imported a number of foreign workmen, whom they wished to provide with sleeping accommodation on the premises. The strike hands on Tuesday night intercepted a quantity of bedding and assailed the up-holsterers with stones and other missiles. Great excitement prevailed.

At Hyde Park in the afternoon, Brookes, Mainwaring, and Davis addressed a rather variable audience, but a good crowd gathered to hear comrade Morris. One individual ventured to suggest that Morris was a paid agitator. Fair sale of literature. Members please note branch meeting, place, and time.—H. B.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday afternoon, Glasier addressed a large meeting of the Legislative Independence Branch of the National League. In the evening, a most successful open-air meeting was held on George's Square, several hundred of the better-to-do class being present, who listened to comrade Glasier's exposition of Socialism with much attention. Commonweal sold well. A meeting of members was afterwards held in our rooms.

HAMILTON.—At a meeting of the Hamilton Branch of the Socialist League, held in Paton's Hall, Chapel Street, a very interesting paper was read by Michael Kelly, one of our local members, on "The Land Question."—J. M.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—J. H. Stevens made a short address on Sunday night at the Cattle Market, and sold a large number of the Commonweal. Thomas Mann and Laideler, and other members of the S.D.F. delivered speeches. Mann got a good hearing, and was very well received by the audience. Meetings have been held by the S.D.F. at Byker and Gateshead as well, and in spite of the inclement weather there were good attendances.—J. L. M.

PAISLEY.—Comrades Curran and Glasier, of Glasgow, addressed two open-air meetings, one at the County Square and one at the Causewayside, on Friday evening.

SHIELDS (NORTH AND SOUTH).—A debate was held on the Bury Side on Sunday morning last at 10.30, between W. Wallace (Socialist) and Mr. Leslie Stephens (nondescript, but supposed to be Individualist). The discussion was animated, the crowd very large, and on the show of hands the chairman declared a majority had voted for the Socialist. In the evening at 6.30, Mahon addressed a meeting in the Market Place at South Shields, Wood taking the chair. At 8 Mahon spoke again on the other side of the water, and a meeting of the branch was held at 9 in the Gladstone Hall. J. H. Stevens was unanimously elected delegate of the branch to the Conference. A further meeting was arranged for the following Thursday to complete arrangements for carrying on the propaganda, and for discussing the advisability of joining or co-operating with the North of England Socialist Federation.—J. H., sec.

WALSALL.—Comrade A. K. Donald arrived here on Friday night, and on Saturday afternoon visited Wednesbury and Darlaston, accompanied by H. Sanders and Deakin. Owing to the wretched weather we were unable to get up a meeting at Wednesbury, but had a fair gathering at Darlaston, which Donald and Sanders addressed. At night, Donald and Sanders spoke to a good number of people on the Bridge, Walsall, but owing to a heavy storm coming on were prevented from taking up our usual position in the Market-place. On Sunday morning, the Roman Catholic Church was attended to hear a sermon upon "Socialism" by the Rev. Dr. McCarten, on which comrade Donald will report. In the afternoon we journeyed to Willenhall and held a fair meeting, Donald, Sanders, and Deakin speaking, and returned to Walsall at night, where Sanders opened a meeting and was followed by Donald, who was listened to by an audience of several hundreds, who appeared greatly interested. At the close a number of questions were put to Donald and satisfactorily disposed of. A good quantity of literature has been sold, and the cause considerably helped forward here by Donald's visit. To-day (Monday) he goes to Cradley Heath to investigate the condition of the white slaves of the chain-making trade.—J. T. D.

BRISTOL.—After successful winter work in our meeting-room, 45, Old Market Street, we began our open-air work on Tuesday last. We had some thousands of leaflets distributed, and the result was a good meeting both in numbers and attention. The portions of the addresses most strongly condemning the present competitive system were loudly applauded, and the Socialist remedies for existing evils were warmly approved. There is no doubt that Socialism is making good progress in Bristol.—R. W.

DUBLIN.—At the Custom House Steps, Beresford Place, a meeting was held on Sunday, May 22nd, by the Labour League. Despite the inclemency of the weather more than 800 persons were present. Excellent speeches on the various phases of the Labour Question, all of a strong Socialistic character, were delivered by Hall, Brown, Cantwell, and Keegan, the last-named arguing forcibly against political agitation, and showing the necessity for international combination amongst the workers. The meeting was guarded by more than 20 policemen and 3 inspectors, each of whom was presented with a copy of the Socialist leaflet, "Ireland a Nation."

SOCIALIST UNION (NOTTINGHAM SECTION).—Peacock and Proctor lectured to an attentive audience on Sunday morning in Sninton Market; collection for propaganda, 3s. 0d. In the evening, Peacock lectured to a good audience in the Great Market Place on "Religion and Socialism." Wane and Proctor spoke on the events of the week, collection 4s. 3d. Good sale of literature and Commonweal sold out. A meeting in our club-room was held afterwards, and more names enrolled. Our club-room is being decorated and fitted up, and will be opened by a social evening and tea on June 1st.—T. P.

North of England Socialist Federation.

Rapid progress is being made with the organisation. There are now nineteen branches, and during the week Mahon will open several others in Durham. The committee for drafting principles and rules met on Saturday at Blyth, and agreed to a proposal which will be submitted to the branches. A further Conference of delegates from all the branches will be held on Saturday, June 12, in Blyth at 3 p.m.

HOW WE LIVE AND HOW WE MIGHT LIVE.¹

THE word Revolution which we Socialists are so often forced to use, has a terrible sound in most people's ears, even when we have explained to them that it does not necessarily mean a change accompanied by riot and all kinds of violence, and cannot mean a change made mechanically and in the teeth of opinion by a group of men who have somehow managed to seize on the executive power for the moment. Even when we explain that we use the word revolution in its etymological sense, and mean by it a change in the basis of society, people are scared at the idea of such a vast change, and beg that you will speak of reform and not revolution. As however we Socialists do not at all mean by our word revolution what these worthy people mean by their word reform, I can't help thinking that it would be a mistake to use it, whatever projects we might conceal beneath its harmless envelope. So we will stick to our word, which means a change of the basis of society; it may frighten people, but it will at least warn them that there is something to be frightened about, which will be no less dangerous for being ignored; and also it may encourage some people, and will mean to them at least not a fear but a hope. Fear and Hope—those are the two names of the two great passions which rule the race of man, and with which revolutionists have to deal; to give hope to the many oppressed and fear to the few oppressors, that is our business; if we do the first and give hope to the many, the few must be frightened by their hope; otherwise we do not want to frighten them; it is not revenge we want for poor people, but happiness; indeed what revenge can be taken for all the thousands of years of the sufferings of the poor?

However, many of the oppressors of the poor, most of them, we will say, are not conscious of their being oppressors (we shall see why, presently); they live in an orderly quiet way themselves, as far as possible removed from the feelings of a Roman slaveowner or a Legree; they know that the poor exist, but their sufferings do not present themselves to them in a trenchant and dramatic way; they themselves have troubles to bear, and they think doubtless that to bear trouble is the lot of humanity, nor have they any means of comparing the troubles of their lives with those of people lower in the social scale; and if ever the thought of those heavier troubles obtrudes itself upon them, they console themselves with the maxim that people do get used to the troubles they have to bear, whatever they may be.

Indeed, as far as regards individuals at least, that is but too true, so that we have as supporters of the present state of things, however bad it may be, first those comfortable unconscious oppressors who think that they have everything to fear from any change which would involve more than the softest and most gradual of reforms, and secondly those poor people who living hard and anxiously as they do, can hardly conceive of any change for the better happening to them, and dare not risk one tittle of their poor possessions in taking any action towards a possible bettering of their condition; so that while we can do little with the rich save inspire them with fear, it is hard indeed to give the poor any hope. It is then, no less than reasonable that those whom we try to involve in the great struggle for a better form of life than we now lead should call on us to give them at least some idea of what that life may be like: a reasonable request, but hard to satisfy, since we are living under a system that makes even conscious effort towards reconstruction almost impossible: it is not unreasonable on our part to answer, "There are certain definite obstacles to any real progress of man; we can tell you what these are; take them away and then you shall see."

However I propose now to offer myself as a victim for the satisfaction of those who consider that as things now go we have at least got something, and are terrified at the idea of losing their hold of that, lest they should find they are worse off than before and have nothing. Yet in the course of my endeavour to show how we might live, I must more or less deal in negatives. I mean to say I must point out where in my opinion we fall short in our present attempts at decent life. I must ask the rich and well-to-do what sort of a position it is which they are so anxious to preserve at any cost? and if after all it will be such a terrible loss to them to give it up? and I must point out to the poor that they, with capacities for living a dignified and generous life, are in a position which they cannot endure without continued degradation. How do we live then under our present system? Let us look at it a little.

And first, please to understand that our present system of Society is based on a state of perpetual war. Do any of you think that this is as it should be? I know that you have often been told that the competition, which is at present the rule of all production, is a good thing, and stimulates the progress of the race; but the people who tell you this should call competition by its shorter name of war if they wish to be honest, and you would then be free to consider whether or no war stimulates progress, otherwise than as a mad bull chasing you over your own garden may do. War or competition, whichever you please to call it, means at the best pursuing your own advantage at the cost of some one else's loss, and in the process of it you must not be sparing of destruction even of your own possessions, or you will certainly come by the worse in the struggle. You understand that perfectly as to the kind of war in which people go out to kill and be killed; that sort of war in which ships are commissioned, for instance, "to sink, burn, and destroy"; but it appears that you are not so conscious of this waste of goods when you are only carrying on that other war called commerce; observe, however, that the waste is there all the same.

Now let us look at this kind of war a little closer, run through some of the forms of it, that we may see how the "burn, sink, and destroy" is carried on in it. First, you have that form of it called national rivalry, which in good truth is now-a-days the cause of all gunpowder and bayonet wars which civilised nations wage. For years past we English have been rather shy of them, except on those happy occasions when we could carry them on at no sort of risk to ourselves, when the killing was all one side, or at all events when we hoped it would be. We have been shy of gunpowder war with a respectable enemy for a long while, and I will tell you why: It is because we have had the lion's share of the world-market; we didn't want to fight for it as a nation, for we had got it; but now this is changing in a most significant, and to a Socialist, a most cheering way; we are losing or have lost that lion's share; it is now a desperate "competition" between the great nations of civilisation for the world-market, and to-morrow it may be a desperate war for that end. As a result, the furthering of war (if it be not on too large a scale) is no longer confined to the honour-and-glory kind of old Tories, who if they meant anything at all by it meant that a Tory war would be a good occasion for damping down democracy; we have changed all that, and now it is quite another kind of politician that is wont to urge us on to "patriotism" as 'tis called. The leaders of the Progressive Radicals they would call themselves, long-headed persons who know well enough that social movements are going on, who are not blind to the fact that the world will move with their help or without it; these are the jingoes of to-day. I don't mean to say they know what they are doing: politicians, as you well know, take good care to shut their eyes to everything that may happen six months ahead; but what is being done is this, that the present system, which always must include national rivalry, is pushing us into a desperate scramble for the markets on more or less equal terms with other nations, because, once more, we have lost that command of them which we once had. Desperate is not too strong a word. We shall let this impulse to snatch markets carry us whither it will, whither it must. To-day it is successful burglary and disgrace, to-morrow it may be mere defeat and disgrace.

Now this is not a digression, although in saying this I am nearer to what is generally called politics than I shall be again. I only want to show you what commercial war comes to when it has to do with foreign nations, and that even the dullest can see how mere waste must go with it. That is how we live now with foreign nations, prepared to ruin them without war if possible, with it if necessary, let alone meantime the disgraceful exploiting of savage tribes and barbarous peoples, on whom we force at once our shoddy wares and our hypocrisy at the cannon's mouth.

Well, surely Socialism can offer you something in the place of all that; it can offer you peace and friendship instead of war. We might live utterly without national rivalries, acknowledging that while it is best for those who feel that they naturally form a community under one name to govern themselves, yet that no community in civilisation should feel that it had interests opposed to any other, their economical condition being at any rate similar; so that any citizen of one community could fall to work and live without disturbance of his life when he was in a foreign country, and would fit into his place quite naturally; so that all civilised nations would form one great community agreeing together as to the kind and amount of production and distribution needed; working at such and such production where it could be best produced; avoiding waste by all means. Please to think of the amount of waste which they would avoid, how much such a revolution would add to the wealth of the world! What creature on earth would be harmed by such a revolution? Nay, would not everybody be the better for it? And what hinders it? I will tell you presently.

Meantime let us pass from this "competition" between nations to that between "the organizers of labour," great firms, joint-stock and other capitalists in short, and see how competition "stimulates production" among them: indeed it does do that; but what kind of production? Well, production of something to sell at a profit, or say production of profits: and note how war commercial stimulates that: a certain market is demanding goods, there are say a hundred manufacturers who make that kind of goods, and every one of them would if he could keep that market to himself, and struggles desperately to get as much of it as he can, with the obvious result that presently the thing is overdone, and the market is glutted, and all that fury of manufacture has to sink into cold ashes. Doesn't that seem something like war to you? Can't you see the waste of it—waste of labour, skill, cunning, waste of life in short? Well, you may say, but it cheapens the goods. In a sense it does; and yet only apparently, as wages have a tendency to sink for the ordinary worker in proportion as prices sink; and at what a cost do we gain this appearance of cheapness! Plainly speaking, at the cost of cheating the consumer and starving the real producer for the benefit of the gambler, who uses both consumer and producer as his milch cows. I needn't go at length into the subject of adulteration, for everyone knows what kind of a part it plays in this sort of commerce; but remember that it is an absolutely necessary incident to the production of profit out of wares, which is the business of the so-called manufacturer; and this you must understand that, taking him in the lump, the consumer is perfectly helpless against the gambler; the goods are forced on him by their cheapness, and with them a certain kind of life which that energetic, that aggressive cheapness determines for him: for so far-reaching is this curse of commercial war that no country is safe from its ravages; the traditions of a thousand years fall before it in a month; it overruns a weak or semi-barbarous country, and whatever romance or pleasure or art existed there, is trodden down into a mire of sordidness and ugliness: the Indian or Javanese craftsman may no longer ply his craft leisurely, working a few hours a day, in producing a maze of strange beauty on a piece of cloth: a steam-engine is set agoing at Manchester, and that victory over nature and a thousand stubborn difficulties is used for the base work of producing a sort of plaster of china-clay and shoddy, and the Asiatic worker, if he is not starved to death outright, as plentifully happens, is driven himself into a factory to lower the wages of his Manchester brother worker, and nothing of character is left him except, most like, an accumulation of fear and hatred of that to him most unaccountable evil, his English master. The South Sea Islander must leave his canoe-carving, his sweet rest, and his graceful dances, and become the slave of a slave: trousers, shoddy, rum, missionary, and fatal disease,—he must swallow all this civilisation in the lump, and neither himself nor we can help him now till social order displaces the hideous tyranny of gambling that has ruined him.

CO-OPERATIVE PRACTICE IN AID OF SOCIALISM.

CO-OPERATION, the offspring and natural handmaid of Socialism, having been seduced and perverted by the sons of Capitalism, has too long been treated as a stranger by us. Signs are not wanting, however, of a permanent and mutually-beneficial rapprochement between these closely-related movements. Co-operators are beginning to learn that self-interest, apart from higher motives, must draw them on to Socialism. Socialists are recognising that, although true social co-operation is impossible without the previous destruction or automatic collapse (as the case may be) of the present social structure, they as a party, or in private groups, may profitably employ for the advancement of their cause the services of such co-operation as is now available. The co-operative Socialist bakeries and press in Belgium, the projected Social-Democratic bakeries in London, and the recently established grocery stores of the Socialist League, are so many indications of the way the wind blows.

Let us, then, review the field which lies before us, with a view to the intelligent and therefore successful organisation of this co-operative campaign.

In the first place, what are the objects to be gained by it? Let me commence by anticipating any charge of utopianism—I adopt the vulgar spelling along with the vulgar meaning of the word—by disclaiming any hope of creating at present the framework of the co-operative commonwealths of the future. Such co-operative or even communistic experiments as we may now inaugurate can only be regarded as means and not as ends. We shall be constructing upon healthy and enlightened principles the temporary habitations of the artificers of the new structure, but not (unless accidentally and incidentally) laying any part of its foundations. For the same reason we shall effect no monastic schism or separation of Socialists from the rest of the world; on the contrary, we shall aid each other to live and work to the best purpose in it.

The chief objects, I think, of such efforts as I refer to, are or should be the following: (1) Mutual benefit and insurance: making the profession of Socialism less dangerous to its actual disciples, less deterrent, if not entirely attractive, to its potential or would-be disciples by improving their material position—at the expense, bien entendu, of the trading and capitalist classes. (2) Having diverted from the pockets of private employers and taken much of the surplus returns or profits now contributed to them by Socialists, to employ them as "sinews of war" for the cause. (3) By such means also to accelerate (in a merciful spirit, of course), on the principle of "every little helps," that disintegration and decomposition of the Old Order which so few of us deplore. (4) To acquire during the same processes experimental data, by means of which a more conscious and therefore more rapid evolution of the New Order may be furthered, the aim and operations of the revolution rendered more scientific, and its immediate results more sure and abiding. To create meanwhile models and precedents for the imitation of municipalities, trades' unions, and other public bodies. (5) To provide a training in co-operative industries or services, and the administration thereof, to many Socialists now deficient in it, and a new sphere for many desirous of aiding the Socialist movement but unsuited or disinclined for agitation or other work connected with the direct propaganda. (6) Applying to communities only, and not to purely industrial co-operative enterprises: To provide as complete practical training¹ as possible for the work of the day after the revolution, while affording to contemporary workers in the cause recreative retreats and centres of social communion and mutual edification, missionary centres for country districts, and, last but not least, educational centres for the young.

Secondly, how are such objects to be attained through co-operative practice? That is to say, what forms of co-operative enterprises should be promoted, by whom should they be promoted respectively, and how should the necessary capital be obtained for starting them? I am not going to attempt in this article to answer all these points in order or in detail, although I hope hereafter to submit satisfactory answers to them. But I will conclude by indicating some of the means and forms through which I think the above objects may be attained.

I shall roughly divide all possible co-operative enterprises into two classes—(1) the Industrial Co-operative, including co-operation in production, distribution, and accessory or miscellaneous services separately and in combination, and (2) the Communistic, embracing community of use, service, and consumption, with or without socialised forms of production. This class, as Raymond Unwin has pointed out in the Commonweal of March 5th, is best adapted for country districts, but I think communistic constitutions might be devised of a sufficiently elastic character for application to colonies in the neighbourhood of London, Paris, Berlin, Glasgow, New York, and other large cities, where educational and missionary establishments are desirable, and where such establishments can only be well and economically conducted (as appears to me at least) in connection with a real community. Such colonies would have to acquire sufficient land, on suitable terms, both to render them self-supporting by communistic practice (i.e., by the socialisation of production, distribution, and consumption alike) as regards the usual necessities of life, and to enable them in addition to supply the outside public at competitive rates with market-garden produce or manufactured commodities in regular demand. All adult able-bodied members would be required to work their appointed time in the communal services, but that time would only be sufficient to supply the community directly or (in a few departments, such as tea and coffee) indirectly with the said necessities of life. Members not otherwise occupied in the neighbouring city would be expected to devote part of their surplus time to the co-operative industries selected by the colony, the greater part of the net returns from which might be devoted to the promotion and formation of other co-operative enterprises in the interest of Socialism, and to the propaganda funds of the respective societies to which members of the colony belonged, pro rata. In other towns communities might be established not owning land, and not necessarily producing any of their necessities, but associated on the club principle for co-operative house-keeping (so far as usual necessities are concerned) and for mutual service and social communion. Such communities might be catered for by co-operative societies promoted and organised by their own members. Other co-operative industries and services, depending for their revenue partly upon comrades but chiefly upon the outside world, would in time grow up from the same roots and prey upon the vitals of commercialism. In all these cases practical communism in the necessities of life is treated as the starting-point, the lever of success. Independence of the competitive labour-market is, barring trade and political organisation, the only weapon with which it is possible to defy the Ogre of Capitalism. It is the only true basis of mutual insurance.

As to purely industrial co-operative societies started without such communistic foundations, the most hopeful without doubt are those started on a large scale; and these require either a large initial outlay of capital, large credit such as could only be obtained by promoters well known for their technical experience and skill as managers, etc., of older concerns, or else the support of important public bodies. If the trades' unions were enabled to employ their funds in the promotion of co-operative enterprises within their respective trades, or still better in alternative but simple and necessary trades requiring but slight instruction, and to appoint joint committees for regulating the exchange between them, they could then provide a much more efficient and (to the capitalists) formidable relief for their members on strike than by "sotering" them away in allowances. But as the trades' unions are not yet educated up to this mark, there is no reason why the Socialist party should not show them the way. I should say that, mapping this "United Kingdom" out into natural provinces of from one to five million inhabitants in each, such as London District, South England, Wales, Lancashire District, Northumbria, Scotland, Ireland, etc., the Socialist groups in each might, as soon as they feel themselves strong enough, set an example to the world by uniting for the promotion of constructive enterprises of this character. If the skill and capital of a considerable number of the smaller employers could be attracted, as I think by judicious management it could, the initial expenses to be provided by the promoting syndicates or societies would be very small. I am confident that the smaller trading and manufacturing capitalists would prefer in many cases to become managers of local branches—with, say five years' certain tenure at a fair salary and re-eligibility after expiry of this term, together with proportional shares in profits during office and fixed interest on their capital during life—rather than maintain their present very precarious struggle against their bigger neighbours. I believe also that they would place at least as much confidence in the respectable and (financially) disinterested promoters of such co-operative societies as in the amalgamation company-mongers who have formed such prominent figures in the commercial and financial drama of the last few years. A certain percentage of the annual profits of such enterprises might be made payable to trustees for the provincial Socialist committee for the time being. The rest might be equitably apportioned between labour and capital (the latter terminable with the life of the investor). Wordsworth Donisthorpe, of the Liberty and Property Defence League, has indicated a method by which this apportionment could be effected in a little book entitled 'The Capitalisation of Labour'—intended, of course, to knock the bottom out of Socialism, but which may be turned by Socialists to better account.

But if the Socialist party at large is not here or anywhere strong and united enough for such constructive efforts, is not the time ripe for the foundation of a society for this special purpose? A few determined and unanimous persons will often succeed where a larger number would fail. The only advantage I can see in the multiplicity of societies and groups, is that they should each undertake special departments of propaganda on the division of labour principle. And if a new society cannot yet be formed for studying and promoting the organisation of such enterprises, is there no existing society competent for this purpose and in want of a job?

J. BRAILSFORD BRIGHT.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

VI.—CONCLUSION.

IN dealing with the question of Home Rule, it is often contended that the Union being an accomplished fact it ought to be held sacred and binding on the Irish people. To this it may be answered that, in the first place the Irish people never accepted the Union and have never recognised it. And in the second place, the rights of every generation being equal, it is the living, the people of to-day who have a right to determine their own destiny. Again, the rights of a people can never be alienated. They can never be abdicated. It is the living and not the dead to whom belongs the right of self-government. And by self-government I do not mean the supremacy of either kings, or princes, or priests, or peers, or of any representative assembly, or the supremacy of any majority however large. I mean the right of the people of every generation directly to determine the institutions they require, and the free selection of those deemed the best and the wisest for all the purposes of administration. As the rights of the individual are sacred, so are the rights of every people. Neither the one nor the other can ever be abdicated or alienated.

Then it is objected that the Irish have never shown any great aptitude for self-government. Have the English, or the Scotch, or the Welsh? We in England to-day are governed by Queen, Lords, and Commons. We tolerate a throne, we tolerate an aristocracy, and we tolerate a State Church. The workers recognise the supremacy of capital, although they are crushed to the earth by the very supremacy they recognise. The mass of the workers in Great Britain are not moved by the holy spirit of liberty, which ought to find a home in the bosom of every man and of every woman. In Ireland, at least the mass of the people aspire to be free, to be independent, to be a nation, to have the right to determine their own destiny. The workers of Great Britain should encourage their Irish brothers, should cherish the holy principle of liberty, and being greater in numbers if they are also greater in wisdom, let them guide, direct, and assist in the glorious work of political and social regeneration.

Then it is said that to grant Home Rule would be to place the loyal North at the mercy of the Catholic majority. But the North never has been loyal. It was the North that won the independence of the Irish Parliament in 1782. "The United Irishmen" was a military organisation of the North. Again, who has forgotten the great Orange Conspiracy of 1835-6, for the overthrow of William IV., and to prevent the accession of her present Majesty by placing the Duke of Cumberland on the throne. The North is not loyal to-day.

It is also argued that it is a question of religious supremacy. It is nothing of the sort. From 1782 to 1795 the United Irishmen struggled for the abolition of the penal laws, and for equal rights for their Catholic brothers against the English ascendancy party then supreme in the Irish Parliament. Then, in all the struggles of the Irish during the last one hundred years, the bulk of the leaders have been Protestants. How many of the leaders to-day are Protestants?

Nor is the North exclusively Protestant. The total number of Catholics in the North is only about seventy-seven thousand less than the Protestants. But Englishmen should not do anything whatever to rouse the spirit of religious intolerance, from which England, as well as Ireland, has suffered so terribly in the past.

Then it is stated that the North is the richest part of Ireland. It is nothing of the kind. It is generally assumed that because a majority of the population is Protestant, it must be the most intelligent and because the most intelligent it must be the most progressive, and therefore the most prosperous. Taking the returns to the income tax for 1879-80, and the population of 1881, the following is the state of the case:—

	Population	Assessment to Income Tax.	Per head of Population.
Leinster ...	1,282,881	£13,272,202	£10 6 6
Munster ...	1,323,910	7,980,276	8 0 7
Ulster ...	1,739,542	9,952,289	5 14 5
Connaught	813,506	2,995,438	3 13 7

Here we see Ulster is lowest but one, being lower than even Munster; and although her population is nearly half a million more than that of Leinster, her assessment to the Income Tax is over three millions less. Nor does it alter the matter if we omit all the parliamentary boroughs from the calculation. Ulster still remains third on the list, as the following table will show:

	Population	Assessment.	Per head.
Leinster ...	932,853	£7,378,105	£7 18 2
Munster ...	1,093,242	5,881,789	5 7 8
Ulster ...	1,437,690	7,104,002	4 18 10
Connaught ...	794,600	2,902,054	3 13 1

Thus the whole story about the loyal rich North falls to the ground. There is nothing in it; and most of those who raise the cry do so only for party purposes, to gull the public, and still longer to divide and hold in slavery the mass of the people.

We are told that to grant Home Rule would be to make the Nationalist party supreme, and who would expropriate the landlords without compensation. But the landlords are bound to go. Nothing can prevent it. Gladstone knew it, Salisbury knows it, the people know it, and the landlords know it. As for compensation, who is to compensate the millions for the loss of their liberty, their ease, their comforts, the fruits of their industry, and who have been driven from their native shores to seek a home in distant regions? Who can compensate, who can call from their graves the hundreds of thousands who died of want in the midst of the abundance produced by their labour? Talk of compensation! Shall we compensate the thief, the criminal, the rebel, the murderer? No, never—a thousand times never!

We are also told that to grant Home Rule would be to render separation possible. A simple absurdity. But suppose separation were possible—nay, suppose it were probable. What then? Shall we make the union secure by keeping the people in bondage? Shall we preserve the union by making it still more hateful to the Irish people? But assume for the sake of argument that the people of Ireland wish for entire separation. What then? Shall we English, we who applauded the Italians, who glorified Kossuth and the Hungarians, who have ever sympathised with Poland, who have rejoiced at every success of the French, and who hope ere long to see the whole Continent ablaze with the sacred fire of revolution,—shall we deny to the people of Ireland the liberty we claim for ourselves? Have we sympathy only for the peoples of distant regions and none for our brothers on the other side of the Channel?

And England's greatness, what is it? It depends neither on princes, priests, or peers; not on the slavery of the masses, either of Ireland or of Great Britain, but on the labour, the skill, the perseverance of the toiling millions, on the development, the triumph of the holy spirit of freedom, the sacred flame of liberty and love, the supremacy of the principle of eternal right, of eternal justice.

PROHIBITING "CORNERS."—ALBANY, N. Y., May 5.—The Assembly yesterday passed a bill defining conspiracy. The bill provides substantially that if any two or more persons, companies, corporations or individuals shall agree, directly or indirectly, to withhold from the public markets or the ordinary channels of trade in the State for any period any staple article, merchandise, food, etc., and shall agree to place on the market only a limited or specific quantity within a certain time, they shall be guilty of conspiracy.

THE REAL OBJECT OF EMIGRATION.—The following is an extract from a circular quoted in the N. Y. Leader, sent out by Henry Clews, a well-known Wall Street banker and broker: "The tide of emigration this way, the arrivals yesterday being at least 10,000, which is the largest on record for any one day, should be considered as a favourable feature, especially as the newcomers are largely from the Continent and bring funds with them for their immediate support. In the present disturbed condition of labour, this large flow of emigration comes at an opportune time. What this country needs more than anything else is the same competition in the labour-market as is found in all manufacturing and product markets. Competition will out-manœuvre in the end all the generals who are leading the Knights of Labour. Competition alone will prove the only pacifier of labour dissatisfaction and uprising. All American citizens, therefore, who want peace and prosperity should unite in encouraging the European surplus population to flock to our shores, to bring about the true remedy for our present labour evils, which is the only cloud now overhanging our at present prosperous country."

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN NEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

NOTES.

The Colonies and India is anxious for the extension of the Empire and the spread of civilisation. It says :

“It is inevitable that the search for gold will lead to the rapid extension of settlement northwards of the Limpopo until the Zambesi is reached, and it is very probable that, just as in the case of the Tati gold fields, the fresh discoveries which are being made further inland will prove of greater value than those which have preceded them.” “Steps should at once be taken to secure the ‘refusal’ of the control of Matabeleland and the whole of the territories which lie between the Transvaal and the Zambesi. If this is not done, it fears that, judging by the incessant activity of Germany, German influence and control will speedily prevail in Matabeleland, and shut the door to Central Africa in our faces. We have a just title to claim our natural line of extension (!) through that country, and we must not shrink from any responsibility, trouble, and expense which it may involve to secure our interests.” “The matter will not wait our leisure; the apparition of German travellers in the threatened region betokens trouble, as surely as flights of petrels at sea foretell a storm.”

What is the "just title" of the natives of the country? Or, have they none when they are confronted by the thievish propensities of the all-conquering race? Would it not be better to drop the hypocrisy that prosecutes and imprisons burglars, even when they go about in yachts, and at the same time organises plunder-expeditions on a large scale?

In connection with the emigration fraud and the thrift humbug the following news is interesting. The monthly report for March of the Savings Bank of South Australia shows that while the increase of depositors was 249, the present number of depositors being 56,317, the decrease in deposits £4,112, 19s. 1d. O, yes ; of course ! How jealous these rooks are as to which of them shall get first pluck at the pigeon !

A man who died recently leaving £161,300, was described as a "financier." Is this polite for "swindler," or what else does it mean?

Several friends are assisting the Editors very much by sending in news and comments upon labour matters from week to week. This must be much extended, however, if the paper is to continue its increase in efficiency. Every reader who is interested in the success of the paper and the cause should give all the aid he can. Branches might well become centres for the collection as well as diffusion of information. Every one willing to help but not quite knowing how to proceed should write to the Editors, who will give all requisite advice.

CHAINS AND SLAVERY.

A WEEK IN THE BLACK COUNTRY.

The Strike Committee of the Socialist League commissioned me to pay a visit to South Staffordshire for the purpose of getting accurate information about the chain-makers on strike, and to endeavour to start branches of the League there. The first meeting was held at Darlaston, a considerable-sized town near Walsall. We were well received, and made arrangements to visit Darlaston regularly in future. In the evening a meeting was held at the Sister Dora statue, Walsall. We had made arrangements to visit Wolverhampton on Sunday morning, but the rain prevented us; instead, we went to hear a Roman Catholic clergyman preach on Socialism. His sermon was quite a surprise to us and to many of his congregation. He said the principle at the bottom of all Socialist schemes was that property and privilege should be shared by all. This, he said, was the principle recognised by the founders of Christianity; and however inconvenient it might be to the rich, that principle still was and would remain a fundamental one. This good priest's special abhorrence was the man that entered a town with a shilling in his pocket and ultimately became its richest citizen, or the sour-faced gentlewoman that marches into poor folk's houses with a tract in one hand and a flower in the other, and no end of good advice on thrift, temperance, etc. Dr. M'Carten did not disapprove of Socialism; that he regarded as the best form of human society. It was the means that Socialists use to achieve their aim that he characterised as "unholy." This objection is very vague, and very difficult to deal with. When Dr. M'Carten makes specific charges, then it will be possible to deal with them; meantime I find it difficult to believe that arguing with the people and organising them into Socialist societies is in any way objectionable.

In the afternoon we held a meeting in Willenhall. The country-side is thoroughly permeated with Methodism, and it is difficult to get the people to listen to what they consider unimportant secular concerns on a Sunday. In spite of this, our addresses were listened to with attention by several of the people, and we were invited to come back to Willenhall some week-day. In the evening a very large meeting was held in Walsall, many of Dr. Mc'Carten's congregation coming. A good deal of discussion took place, and many of the listeners provided themselves with pamphlets to study the matter at their leisure.

On Monday morning I went to Cradley. In walking from the town of Dudley to Cradley you pass through a fairly typical part of the Black Country. Everywhere the ground is covered with enormous heaps of refuse from the mines and the blast-furnaces, and tall chimneys send forth huge volumes of smoke that help to blacken the atmosphere and the houses. For nearly a mile along the left-hand side of the highway from Netherton to Cradley the houses have become seriously damaged, and in many cases have fallen in completely, owing to sinkages of the ground caused by undermining. Some of the houses were built by workmen by the aid of building societies. All their saving has gone for nothing, as the Earl of Dudley gives them no compensation for having undermined them, and so causing their houses to tumble.

We arrived at the place of meeting in Cradley, the Salvation Army hall, a curious wooden structure that was formerly used as a theatre. The hall was filled with strikers, very nearly as many women as men. It was a painful sight. I have never before seen such a number of anxious, careworn, and pinched faces. They were willing away the time by singing a hymn. The meeting soon opened, and the people had the report of collections made in their behalf by Mr. Juggins and Mr. Homer. I had an opportunity of addressing them, and said that while as a hand-to-mouth move their present demand was perhaps the best thing they could do, they should make up their minds immediately to organise to free themselves entirely from the power of the masters. Not a small increase of wages, but the whole that they earned should be their demand. I found that the people, if their cheering could be taken as a guide, were in entire agreement with me. After I had spoken, Mr. Malcolm Guthrie, Liverpool, addressed the meeting, and said that there was one part of my speech that he approved of—viz., where I advocated that the people should endeavour to become their own employers. He thought that “co-operative production” was the first step they should take, and intimated that he would very likely be able to help them to get the required capital to start the undertaking. The meeting over, under the guidance of Mr. Henry Price, an old convert of Herbert Burrows’, I visited the people at work.

Chain-making is a home industry. There are one or two factories, but the great mass of the chains are made at home. The workshops are very ugly places, with bare brick walls, very often of a tumble-down character. The lighter chains—such as dog-chains—are made by women; but even that work is hard, and the muscles of the women's arms are strongly developed. First they have to work the big bellows to make the iron red-hot; then the end of the rod is bent on an anvil, the proper length for each link is cut, and the two ends welded. The speed at which the women work is surprising. Their faces are firmly set, and a look of intense worry everywhere prevails. Not only have they to wield the hammer, but also to stand all day long. This makes the work doubly hard. In hot weather the high temperature obliges them to work uncovered to the waist. The work is very monotonous—link after link, link after link, not a bit of change in the dull, dreary toil from one year's end to another. When girls get married they don't stop the work, but go on as usual working with their husbands, so that their homes are left entirely untended until after their day's toil, this, as can be easily imagined, leaves them very untidy. The place they spend most of their lives in is the very ugly hell of a workshop. No wonder that handsome women are few in Cradley, and that they prematurely age there. Very often they work at the forge until four or three days before confinement, and are at work again in three or four days afterwards. It is by no means an uncommon thing to see babies rolling about in the workshops, the mothers having nowhere else to leave the children and having no one to tend them; so they are compelled to have them in the workshop; as a result, accidents from burning very often happen.

The men perform the same kind of work only the chains are heavier. It is of a very exhausting character, and those chain-makers—a very small number—who manage to live to a decent age, hardly appear to belong to the same species as the fat old aldermen one can see any day about the Mansion House.

Chains at the net cost to the chain-master of 8½d., including labour and material, rent, and all charges, male work, what is known as rudder chains, for going over the saddles of heavy cart-horses, retail in London at from 3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. Dog chains, for keeping dogs in kennels, with swivel and everything complete, cost the chain-masters 3½d., labour and material included, and retail in London at 1s. 6d. each.¹ Allow, in the first case, 3½d., a large sum, for expenses between chain-master and retail purchaser, and you have 3s. 6d. profit to be divided amongst the different thieves—chain-masters, wholesale warehousemen, and retailers—no wonder the chain-makers are poor. The masters cheat the men by obliging them to truck, to buy gleeds (i.e., firing) from themselves or their Tommy-shop-keeping relatives, at double market price, and by sometimes getting steel palmed off on the men instead of iron, so getting steel chains made at the same price as iron. No lawyer, no Jew clothes peddler, could cheat worse than some of these chain-masters.

Before the strike began, forty-three weeks ago, fifty-six to sixty hours work a week enabled a woman to earn four shillings, and a man about double, or perhaps ten shillings. This is a high, not a low estimate. I carefully ascertained from several sources that this is correct, and no doubt some of my informants will say I have grossly exaggerated their earnings. Put it down at that sum, and consider how it is possible to procure food, clothes, and shelter with it. The poor toilers usually are in rags, and have to dine off bread and water. Weak people could not earn nearly so much as amounts given. Now the prices obtained from those masters who have acceded to the strikers' demands, are such that incessant toil will enable a woman to earn eight shillings a week, and a man sixteen to eighteen shillings. It is quite clear that if these chain-makers are to be true to themselves they will speedily have to strike again.

How is it that these people are so badly off? Because they were not organised. Their masters could deal with them one at a time, and so make them submit to any terms. The chain-makers have, in times gone by, not hung together, and consequently now they are reaping the results of disorganisation. Again the chain makers have not only to compete with one another, but they have outsiders such as colliers, who are engaged at their own work during the day, who have chain-makers for their wives, and when these men come home from their work, they help their wives chain-making for two or three hours, they often are willing to work for less than the proper list price. This conduct is disgraceful. How would the colliers like it, were the chain-makers, after having done a turn at their own work, to go to the pits and offer their services under the usual scale? Until the working-classes act together, and be honest to one another, the capitalists will be able to go on robbing them. The chain-makers now have an organisation, and under Mr. Homer's able management their strike has been fairly successful; but they must take care immediately to still further strengthen their society, so that they will be able to increase in the near future the starvation wage they have just won.

I held a large meeting at Cradley, numbering between two and three thousand persons, on Tuesday evening in the open air. H. Sanders, of the Walsall branch, also spoke. The people were evidently impressed by the addresses, the result was that we formed a branch of the League. A meeting was held in Dudley market which resulted in the names of some friends being given in towards a branch. Most of them were stray readers of Socialist literature and papers, who were anxious to organise, but who were unknown to one another. Staffordshire only requires systematic working to be the seat of a strong Socialist party.

A. K. DONALD.

Two miners were discussing Socialism, when the "human nature" argument cropped up. "It's no use," said one—an obdurate individualist—to a fresh convert, "you can't abolish the present system; it is the best that human nature is fit for." "Do you think," said the other cautiously, "that human nature makes my master rob me?" "Yes, of course," readily replied the other; "what more natural?" "But don't you also think that human nature should make me try to stop him?" Discomfiture of the enemy.

AN ENDLESS STORY.—We are half a mind to begin to write a story that may never end, founded on facts that are ever obvious. Hippodromus, taking his morning walk in the streets of Lucignano, comes upon Theodectes, a labourer, and says to him: "Why are you always at work?" Theodectes answers: "I am always at work to get money to buy food to give me strength to do more work that I may get more money to buy more food to get more strength to do more work to get more money to buy more food to get more strength to do more work to get more money to buy—" This is the beginning of the story without end, and the facts on which it is founded, they are without end also.—Winsted Press.

A PRAYER.

(By G. HERWEGH. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

BREATHE, O God, the breath of tempests through this stillness of the grave, Sound a deep Dead March for Freedom, no mere idyll of the slave;
Warm with throbbing blood the pulses of this poor old chilly world;
Rouse to battle her avenger, though his banners now be furled.

If our foes deny us freedom on our hearth and in our home,
Let us find, at least to die in, some green island o'er the foam,
There at least to die rejoicing in the free and open air,
Watering with our wounds the blood-red roses in the graveyard there.

Let us drink but once again from Freedom's sacramental cup;
Build a shrine where we our choicest gifts may gladly offer up;
Clear for us a place of meeting, one free space of open heath—
Prisoned close our trusty swords have long been weary of the sheath.

Out alas! for Freedom's storm has passed us by and left us slaves;
Lo, the golden ship of hope that like a cradle o'er the waves
Steered with sound of song to usward, and such ample treasures bore, Rots a wreck black-stoled and shrouded, like a coffin on the shore.

Must the People still surround this rotten wreck with useless cries?
Shall the force of all their fury fade away in empty sighs?
Sounds there never through their sorrow resolution's thunder-tone?—
Not so long do tyrants loiter ere they cross their Rubicon.

Think ye then that peace and quiet will ensure your happiness?
War at worst can only slay ye, peace will slay ye none the less.
What though in the wild war-struggle hearts may throb with fiercer heat,
On the frozen fields of Russia Freedom's pulses cease to beat.

If your plants ye do not water, they will die in choking dust,
If ye never draw your swords, their blades will ruined be by rust;
Now and then a vein to open all for Freedom's sake were good,
Lest your tyrants falsely swear that ye are weak for lack of blood.

But and if the men be cowards, earthward bending still their brows,
Hear our voice at least, ye women; wreath a sword in myrtle boughs;
Hide a sword in myrtle branches; since, meseemeth it, if ye
Fail to fight with us for Freedom, never will the world be free.

POWDERLEY AND THE LABOUR PARTY.

THE following is published by request of the Portland (Oregon) Eureka Assembly:

"Whereas, L. A. 8133 K. of L. has had its attention called to the recent public utterances of G. M. W. Powderly, in which he congratulates the workers on the defeat of the Labour Party in Chicago, thereby lending the support of his official position to the mis-statements of a venal press which has industriously represented that the labour vote in Chicago had fallen off through general disgust at the Socialistic tendencies of the party, although as a matter of fact it showed an increase of 6,269 over that of last fall, the vote of the Chicago Labour Party being then only 17,300 as against 23,579 on the 5th inst.; and

"Whereas, The G. M. W. knows well that this means a far greater victory than the mere gain of 6,269 votes, inasmuch as the 23,579 who voted on the 5th inst. voted knowingly for the overthrow of the competitive system, the issue being, for the first time in American politics, put in plain and absolutely unmistakable terms; and

"Whereas, An attempt has again been made to lead the people astray by representing that the Labour Party (though it bases all its teachings on the Declaration of Independence) is endeavouring to overthrow the American flag, because some of our members also reverence the red flag, as emblematical of the life-blood which flows alike in the veins of workers of every nationality, and knits them in the bonds of a common brotherhood; and

"Whereas, This antiquated attempt to divide our forces by playing upon old race antipathies, though regarded by all conscientious men as an unpardonable crime, has nevertheless commended itself to the pious Catholic spirit of Bro. Powderly, who has not hesitated to desecrate our country's flag by waving it in the cause of Know-Nothingism, and to plant himself squarely on the side of the capitalists who are labouring to build up what they call an 'American party,' hoping to discredit as 'foreign' those liberal ideas that the struggles of the oppressed in Europe are giving birth to, which, like all great ideas, are rapidly becoming the heritage of the whole world; and

"Whereas, This Assembly, having carefully watched the course of the G. M. W., has long since recognised that he has proved false to the noble principles of liberty, and equality of opportunity, for all of which he so assiduously professed during the years that he was a member of the Socialistic Labour Party; and

"Whereas, He has now given, in the opinion of this Assembly, final proof that he is using his official position to hinder the march of the workers on that journey, the goal of which is the final extinction of slavery by placing all the sources of production equally and unreservedly at the disposition of all workers, regardless of nationality.

"Resolved, That, in the first place, we congratulate our brother workers in Chicago on having forced the G. M. W. at last to show his hand, and thereby disillusionise those who have been hitherto blinded by admiration for a name and office; and that, in the second place, we urge them, and all other true Knights, to follow up the good work by taking such steps as shall result in the summary deposition of one who has been false to the trust reposed in him by over a million organised workers, who elected him to office believing him to be the uncompromising foe of that capitalistic monopoly which is to-day finding in him one of its most powerful allies."

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

The nut and bolt makers are suffering from reductions, and are meditating starting a co-operative factory.

At Cradley Heath the masters that trucked the "gleads" (i.e., small coke used as firing) charged 11d. for the same quantity the workers can now get for 6½d. from outsiders—thus making a profit out of the men of 4½d. a sack.

Over 1000 Staffordshire rivet-makers have given notice that they will strike unless an advance is conceded. Hard work at present prices enables a man to earn about 18s. a-week on an average.

The employés of the Great Eastern Railway at Stratford have received notice that they are to work one day and a-half (Monday and Saturday) for the benefit of the People's Palace. It is necessary to add that this is not Coercion, but those who disobey orders will be dismissed.—T. C.

In consequence of the operatives in the rivet trade, in the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire district, having been called upon to submit to a series of reductions in wages during the last twelve months, they state that they cannot get a living at present prices, and on Saturday they gave a fortnight's notice for a substantial advance. If the employers do not concede the required advance a general strike will be declared. About 1000 have given notice.

The Cradley Heath chainmakers have been so far successful in their strike. Only 700 people now remain out. Most of the masters have conceded the advanced list, and trucking is nearly abolished, only one master named Bannister persisting. A Liverpool magistrate has promised to endeavour to provide funds to start a co-operative factory. This is a trade in which very little capital is required, and so steps might immediately be taken by the people to employ themselves.

Wm. McKeown, ship-yard artisan, was at Belfast, on Tuesday, returned for trial on a charge of entering the yard of Messrs. Macilwaine and Lewis, Queen's Island, from which he had been discharged, and destroying all the principal belting in the place, in consequence of which several hundred men were thrown idle. A mass meeting of the men on strike, after an interview with the delegates from the English Shipbuilders' Society, almost unanimously decided to continue on strike. Five thousand artisans were present.

HALF-TIME IN THE COTTON TRADE.—At a meeting of master cotton-spinners held last week, the following resolution was unanimously carried:—"That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is most desirable, in the interests of the trade, that all spinners shall at once resort to short time; that such short time shall consist of a reduction of the working hours equal to half-time, for a period of eight weeks from the 30th May, and may be carried out either by closing three days a week, by alternate weeks, or by continuous stoppage; the resolution to take effect only in the event of spinners representing two-thirds of the spindles sending in to the Cotton Spinners' Association an undertaking to carry out such resolution."

A singular scene was witnessed at Bolton on Monday night in connection with the strike in the engineering trades. Messrs. Wood, Victoria Foundry, imported eight or nine Scotchmen, who arrived on Monday. Lodgings could not be obtained for them, there appearing to be a general boycott, so the men were taken to the foundry, followed by a large demonstrative crowd. Beds and bedding were ordered from a local furnisher, but he had the utmost difficulty to land the goods, stones being thrown freely. When the gates were opened at six o'clock on Wednesday morning the imported men made their escape, and being joined by some of the Strike Committee, were furnished with funds to take them back to Scotland. They expressed themselves glad to go, and said they had been brought under a misapprehension. With the departure of the importations the excitement was at an end. The men's counter-proposals to that of the employers, forwarded through the Mayor (Ald. Fletcher), are under consideration.

STRIKE OF QUARRYMEN AT POLLOCKSHAW AND BANNOCKBURN.—For about a couple of weeks past the quarrymen in the employment of Messrs. Stevenson, at Pollockshaw, near Glasgow, have been on strike to resist a reduction of wages. The men are at present very poorly paid, while the nature of their work is toilsome, dangerous, and unhealthy in the extreme. As the quarry is tunnelled, the men have to work in very confined spaces, breathing sand dust and the fumes of naphtha lamps. The quarrymen are consequently very short lived. The Messrs. Stephenson—who are thus, for their own selfish gain, attempting to make the lives of these poor slaves still more miserable—are reputed to be very wealthy, and one of the members of the firm was elected some time ago by the workers of Glasgow to represent their interests in the Town Council! The quarrymen, who are now attempting to form a union with the quarrymen in other parts of the country, were addressed last week by William Small of the Hamilton branch of the Socialist League, and J. Bruce Glasier, of the Glasgow branch—no other political or trade society taking any interest in their struggle. Some of the men stated that they had been previously thinking about Socialism, and had come to the conclusion that it was their only hope of redress. A strike of quarrymen has also taken place at Bannockburn—for ever glorious in Scottish memory as the place where Bruce overthrew the power of Edward in Scotland. "Bruce's address to his troops at Bannockburn," better known as "Scots wha hae," is Scotland's battle song of Freedom. Whether the poor quarrymen who, having recently submitted to two reductions in wages, now desire an advance, will obtain much consolation from singing the patriotic ode, or contemplating the glorious heritage of freedom, which they can enjoy while walking over the famous battlefield with empty pockets and empty stomachs, is rather doubtful.

MANCHESTER.—Building operations at the Jubilee Exhibition here are now at an end, and large numbers of joiners, bricklayers, painters, and labourers of all grades are now to be seen wearily wandering about the streets vainly searching for a permit of the employing classes to exist a little longer. During the construction of the exhibition buildings, Manchester was overcrowded with operatives in the building trades from all parts of the country. The enterprising caterer for the refreshment department of the show is now paying the extraordinary price of 6½d. per hour to joiners, whom he employs erecting extra dining rooms, etc., and he can get men at the price, in spite of the fact that the headquarters of the Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners is located in this city. This society boasts of its capital of over £50,000. To this add that some of its members are grumbling at paying 1s. per week contributions, and also periodically heavy levies to keep up the funds, etc., and yet see so little done by the executive in a progressive sense for the interests of the society. The waitresses employed at the Jubilee Exhibition are paid the "Jubilee" sum of 5s. per week with their day's food each day, their lodgings cost them in some instances 5s. per week, and in other cases a larger sum. How these young women manage to pay for their food on Sunday's, also for their clothing, is an open question, yet how many of the "mashers" and other visitors to the show give a thought to this unfortunate sisterhood I cannot discover. These young women are employed each day out of the six from about 9 a.m. to 10 p.m., and from what I have seen scarcely get an hour's rest the whole of the day. On the very practical executive Committee, there are editors of local newspapers, Radicals of great notoriety, also Liberal and Tory philanthropists and political leaders of local fame. The waitresses have no friends who will take up their cause. The "ladies" of the "women's suffrage" movement have no time it seems to help their exploited sisters. The above facts I have from the women who suffer. There is not a single trade union leader with the back-bone of a red herring in him, or we should hear these grievances of oppressed womanhood exposed.—GLENER.

AMERICA.

The Central Labour Party in Denver, Colorado, have resolved in consequence of a threatened 20 per cent. rise in rents, to organise a No-Rent Campaign. It is proposed to camp out in tents, and a committee has been appointed to make arrangements. Enthusiastic meetings have been held, and great determination shown.

BELGIUM.

BRUSSELS, May 25.—A strike commenced to-day among the engineers employed in the factories in the Brussels district, and several important workshops, including those of Deville, Chalet, Van Goethem, Reallier, Bollinck, Dejaer, Cail, and Halot, are at a standstill. The Burgomaster of Molenbeek has "taken every precaution for the maintenance of order." May 26.—An order has been issued by the Public Prosecutor to enforce the law against the sale of arms.

LIEGE, May 35.—Troops have left here for Seraing. The strike has become general at the Cockerill works. May 26.—The state of affairs in the Seraing coal basin has this morning become more serious. There are now 1759 men on strike, comprising colliers and ironworkers. A detachment of troops is stationed at Seraing, in readiness for any emergency. Considerable agitation prevails along the left bank of the Meuse.

CHARLEROI, May 25.—The strike assumed larger proportions in the Charleroi coal-district this morning, and there are now 7000 men idle. Fears are entertained that the movement will spread still further.

The strike in the Hainault and the Liege province is becoming more and more serious and widespread, although the Central Committee of the Labour Party have up to the present held aloof from declaring for a general strike, believing that unless backed by a strong labour organisation it would be virtually inefficacious. Nevertheless, in the face of present events, it is possible that the committee will feel bound to march with the rest, and in the various meeting-places of the different towns the question of a general strike is being vigorously discussed. In the meantime the strike is proceeding and gaining fresh adherents every day. A mass meeting was held on Sunday at Liege, which passed resolutions in favour of universal suffrage, amnesty for the prisoners, etc. The current number of L'Avenir (Liege) fills its front page with an address to the "Workers of the Liege Coal-basin," headed 'The Forerunner to a Revolution,' calling upon all workers to assist the movement "by all legal means in their power," which phrase we confess to considering a very feeble one to use towards serious men engaged in a serious struggle, whether that struggle be the preface to the Revolution, or merely, as we consider, one of these thousand and one expressions of revolt against the chains of toil which we watch with so much interest and sympathy, and which end in a concession here and concession there from the industrial masters, in short, a sop to Cerberus to stay his many-voiced howling for another while. At the same time this spontaneous movement of the mining population—with or without the sanction of Central Committees and the like—is somewhat encouraging, and of the greatest interest to workers in other countries.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SIR,—In your last number I am spoken of as the author of 'Facts for Socialists,' recently issued by the Fabian Society. Will you allow me to state that the tract twice underwent careful scrutiny, discussion, and amendment in committee of the whole society, and must not therefore be taken as the unaided and unchecked work of an individual member. But the "amiable and witty author" of the draft upon which the committee worked, and which they substantially adopted, is Mr. Sidney Webb, and not your obedient servant,
G. BERNARD SHAW.

"THE IMMORALITY OF INTEREST."

SIR,—I have just read an article in the Commonweal under the above title. Were it not that this article is written by a man of marked ability, I should not have troubled you with the following question. But, as the matter stands, I should like to ask him whether it is through inadvertence or design that, while enumerating sundry absurd arguments in favour of "usury," he omits to notice the most important of those upon which political economists rely? This argument is that money is itself of the nature of a "commodity," for the use of which it is both reasonable and right that usury should be required. The price of this commodity, like the price of every other commodity, is determined by the ratio between demand and supply: thus the rate of interest varies, not in an ordinary way, but in accordance with this demand and supply. Therefore, until it can be shown that in some way or another the commodity called capital differs from all other commodities—including even that of manual labour—it must be merely illogical to single it out as exceptionally deserving of abuse, or to represent that there is any peculiar injustice attaching to hire of it.—I am, yours, etc.,
A PROFESSOR OF SCIENCE.

[It will be seen that the writer of the above is not a professor of the science of political economy. It is true that money is a commodity, and that we must pay for its use. It is also true that chairs are commodities and that we must pay for their use. But what has either of these facts to do with that other fact that every year a sum of £250,000,000, called interest, is paid by those who earn it by labour in various departments of industry to those who do not? Our professor suggests that the 250 millions is the price or hire of the money used by the nation. But how does he know that it is not the hire or price of the chairs used by the nation? Both, he says rightly, are commodities; and he protests against money being "singled out." Why then does he single it out to account for interest? The interest-receiving class have no more a monopoly of money than they have of chairs. The production of money is a State industry, the profits of which go into the Treasury and have nothing whatever to do with the 250 millions. When money is scarce, it can be made to do more work by the fall in prices; and if it became so scarce as to hamper exchange, the result would be a national dead loss, which hardly explains the payment of 250 millions to a class not specially connected with the scarcity. Any economist will tell the professor as much; for he is mistaken in supposing his defence of interest an accepted one. Orthodoxy is more ingenious than that. Interest is held to be the reward of abstinence, that is, the consideration by which a man is induced to refrain from immediately consuming his wealth—to postpone enjoyment of it to a future date—to save it, in short, and to permit others to use it in the meantime. His interest is paid out of the "increase" due to its employment as capital. This is a more plausible explanation than the other; and I leave the professor to exercise his skill in discovering the fallacy in it.—G. B. S.]

A PLAN OF CAMPAIGN.

THE increasing strength of the Socialist party in these islands, and the activity of our revolutionary propaganda, is bearing fruit amongst the masses of our industrial population, and, as a consequence, the hostility or indifference of a few years back is now changed for a sympathetic and attentive attitude.

Our missionaries, however, have no light task in striving to awaken in the minds of the workers a true sense of the magnitude of the evils of our present society, and the necessity of a thorough revolutionary change. As a capitalistic writer has said recently in answer to a labour question: "If the work was unfitted for them, they have become fitted for the work." And this "survival by fitness;" or, in other words, moral degradation, has been achieved by middle-class supremacy in production and the great industry—"the Press."

When grasping dimly the ideas preached by our advocates, the anxious enquirer puts the query, "How will you bring it about?" or, "We must have some one at top." If a stage further advanced, the querist asks, "How are we to bring it about?" and that, in short, is the question in the minds of teachers and listeners alike. We have to raise the moral tone of a class who have always looked for amelioration, or indeed emancipation, at the hands of their masters acting as legislators, and deluded by political catchwords, have joined the party strife going on between manufacturer and land thief. The non-political policy of abstention from voting inculcated by the Socialist League simply opens up to the workman the possible alternative of bloodshed, and whilst he sanctions the hideous butcheries, perpetrated to extend the Empire, and even offers up himself and kin as victims, to be slain and maimed in bondholders' wars, he shrinks with horror and dismay from the prospect of having to shed blood to free his own country from the domestic enemies who have made it a hell upon earth to the workers.

Confronted with this state of feeling, it is not surprising that some should try to reach the mass by the usual means, and talking down to their hearers, seek in Parliamentary agitation an easier way of rousing the people.

In their heart of hearts the advocates of Parliamentary action do not believe that any real good will ever come to the people from such action, and they confessedly only seek this line of action from policy and not principle. I hold it is highly immoral to tell the mass that their emancipation can be achieved by means which must fail. When one looks at the incidents of Parliamentary strife, the huxtering, the pestering lobbyists, the traps and pitfalls laid by the legal crew who have shipping and railway enterprises to promote, it may be asked, "Can an honest man preserve his integrity in such an atmosphere?" When Bradlaugh pleaded at the Bar of the House against his exclusion therefrom, he covered the House with praise as an honourable assembly with time honoured traditions. The revolutionary Socialists whom the "gentleman" styles fools or worse, judging the House both by its past tradition and present pretensions, will say that it is a monstrous anomaly, a swallower up of public liberties, an aggregation of the most sinister interests in the country, a legislative assembly, whose legislative capacity is based upon the most fraudulent pretence of representation, even majority rule, for a majority in the House, as most division lists show, represents the minority outside. An assembly moreover whose Acts have caused wholesale misery and bloodshed, the spoliation of peoples abroad, and preservation of domestic abuses and monopolies at home. An appeal to such a body is but the hope deferred that maketh the heart sick, and will lead to the bitterest disappointment.

In our local and municipal elections, however, I see an opportunity for Socialistic work without, I think, loss of principle. In nearly all our local and civil bodies the bourgeois reigns supreme, and this is mainly due to the apathy of the working-class, who allow cliques of selfish, cheating traders to monopolise what power of local government is left to the people. Ancient liberties, vast sums of money, and public estates are maladministered by these gradgrinds and market riggers. Is it not possible to arouse enthusiasm on matters that lie at our doors, without incurring the charge of being reactionary? The revolution is inevitable, and it is possible to hasten its advent, and give it shape and form, by contesting every inch of ground now occupied in local bodies by the bourgeois. The Socialist who, in every locality, would ransack the archives in search for records of ancient public rights, lapsed through ignorance and apathy, or, of robbed trusts, would unearth such a mass of middle-class rascality as would bring the class war near its culmination. The foul records of our city and its guilds has shown that enough wealth is wasted in its corrupt hands to supply the educational and material wants of the greater portion of the Metropolitan poor.

Let the Socialist enter these coteries as the champion of ancient liberties, and with a mandate from his constituents to widen their scope, until they include the control over land, and means of production, instead of now merely to determine the site of a dust-bin or lamp-post, or sell contracts. Let him also violate, on every possible occasion, the legal claim of the central authority to control local liberty of action, and strive, with his associates, to break down the monstrous pretensions of the Imperial power, and bring every municipality and local authority where the Socialist element prevails, into defiant collision with the huge overgrown monster of Imperial centralisation, and the first attempt to coerce by imprisonment or violence will be the signal for the revolution.

Where the local circumstances exclude the mass from representation upon these bodies, let their councils be disturbed by irruptions of the unenfranchised "outsiders." In making these suggestions I am guided by a desire first, to give our party something to whet its appetite with work that will hold it together, with a distinct aim wherein no loss of principle is needed. The early history of the French communes and mercantile cities of Italy and Flanders shows that of old the middle-class in their insurrections against feudalism won their civic enfranchisement from prince and knight with artisan help and blood; and our own municipal institutions have been won from a titled aristocracy by a mercantile one; the working-class have ever been the pawns in the game, the bourgeois has triumphed over the aristocrat, and is already on the downward incline, let us hasten his downfall and use the institutions he has won with the help of our class, as the thin end of a wedge that will split up modern society, and lead to the establishment of free federated communes in the place of the life suffocating criminal centralisation of to-day.

THE SOCIALIST LEAGUE.

OFFICES: 13 FARRINGTON ROAD, E.C.

The Third Annual Conference of the League met at 13 Farringdon Road on Sunday last, May 29, 1887, when twenty-four Branches were represented. The following resolution was passed: "Whereas the primary duty of the Socialist party is to educate the people in the principles of Socialism, and to organise them to overthrow the capitalist system: this Conference endorses the policy of abstention from parliamentary action hitherto pursued by the League, and sees no sufficient reason for altering it." Minutes of proceedings will be issued to the Branches shortly. The following were elected to form the Council for the ensuing year: James Allman, W. Blundell, Burcham, Cantwell, Davis, Graham, F. Kitz, J. Lane, S. Mainwaring, W. Morris, May Morris, D. Nicoll, H. H. Sparling, Tarleton, and Ph. Webb. W. Morris and H. H. Sparling were appointed Editor and Sub-Editor of the Commonweal. Further particulars will be given next week.

Executive.—At the first meeting of the Council, Tuesday May 31, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: H. A. Barker, General Secretary; Philip Webb, Treasurer; T. Cantwell, Lecture Secretary; and W. Turner, Financial Secretary.

London Members.—The first meeting of London Members will be held on Monday the 4th of July.

BRANCH REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, May 25, H. H. Sparling gave very interesting lecture on "English Guilds." Good audience and discussion. No lecture on Sunday, May 29th, the hall being used for the purposes of the Socialist League Conference.—W. B. and T. E. W.

NORTH LONDON AND MARYLEBONE.—On Sunday morning, Cantwell, Brookes, and Nicoll spoke at Regents' Park, and had good sale of literature. 2s. 2d. collected for Strike Committee.

GLASGOW.—On Friday evening, Glasier addressed a meeting of 200 quarrymen, now on strike at Pollockshaws. In addition to the quarrymen, a large number of other working-people were present. Glasier gave a full exposition of the labour problem, and pointed out that the only remedy for the grievances of quarrymen and all other workers was the abolition of private property in means of production and distribution. His address was received with great approval. Comrade Small, of the Hamilton Branch, gave an address to the quarrymen on the preceding Monday. On Sunday at one o'clock, comrade Curran addressed a capital meeting on Jail's Square, Glasgow, when nine names were received as members of the League. In the afternoon, comrade Arch McLaren gave a lecture on Socialism to the Legislative Independence Branch of the National League. There was a large audience, and the lecture was very well received, one member declaring that when Home Rule was obtained they would transform the Branch into a Branch of the Socialist League. In the evening, comrades Carmichael, Curran, and Glasier addressed a large meeting on George's Square. Afterwards a meeting of members was held in our rooms.

EDINBURGH.—On Wednesday, May 25, Smith, sen., Tuke, and Gilray addressed a meeting in Scientific Hall, Dalkeith. On Sunday, Smith, jun., Davidson, and Gilray spoke in Queen's Park. A somewhat violent wind blowing interfered with our having a very satisfactory meeting, and threatened to undertake a gratuitous distribution of our literature, and thus to waft the story of Socialism through a benighted world. In the evening in the Meadows, a good number of Commonweal were disposed of.—J. G.

BOLTON (LANCS).—On Sunday afternoon, Joseph Waddington, of Manchester, lectured at the Town Hall Square, on "The Conflicts of Capital and Labour." In the evening, an audience numbering several hundreds were addressed by same speaker, on "Our Homes, What they Are and What they Might Be." The lecturer asked those present why the worker was debarred from enjoying the comforts and luxuries of a home furnished with art furniture, beautiful pictures, and tasteful decorations? The answer was, The rich held possession of the land and the means of production, and until the workers discovered and recognised the necessity of taking their own from the exploiters, so long would they be debarred from comfortable homes, decent lives, and those arts and pleasures which make life worth living. Good collections were made at both meetings for the propaganda fund of the local branch of the S.D.F. Re the engineer's strike, there is a grand opportunity for a good Socialist propaganda and organisation.—J. W.

DUBLIN.—On Thursday, May 26, at the Labour League, 2, Bachelor's Walk, Fitzpatrick delivered an address on "The Housing of the Poor." Seven members were elected to serve on the committee, five of them being Socialists, Fitzpatrick, Karpel, McCarthy, Olgoman, and Swords. During the summer, meetings will be held in all the towns near Dublin, and Branches of the Labour League formed wherever practicable.

SOCIALIST UNION (NOTTINGHAM SECTION).—Last Sunday, Proctor lectured to an attentive audience in Sninton Market in the morning. In the evening, Proctor took the chair, and Wane addressed a good audience, Peacock following with a spirited address. Collection for propaganda, including morning meeting, 4s. 1d. Commonweal, which order we had again increased, all sold out. Three young men joined the Section and Club after the meeting. Several members had an enjoyable tea at the club on Monday. Our club is now getting into working order.—T. P.

Branch Reports must be addressed to Sub-Editor, and cannot be inserted if they reach the Office later than first post on Tuesday Morning.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

A WRITTEN DEBATE

BETWEEN MR. C. BRADLAUGH, M.P., AND E. BELFORT BAX.

SUBJECT:

"Will Socialism Benefit the English People?"

III.—Affirmative: E. BELFORT BAX.

I AM sorry that Mr. Bradlaugh is dissatisfied with my opening statement of the Socialist position, wherein I sought to show the historic evolution of the present system of society, more especially with reference to England, and thence to deduce the Socialistic as the only issue possible to benefit the English people. But Mr. Bradlaugh, I am sure, is aware of the disadvantage under which the opener of a debate on a subject like the present labours. As it is, I had to trespass on his courtesy by taking up more space than was originally agreed upon for my still necessarily incomplete survey. To judge from Mr. Bradlaugh's remarks, he would have had me eliminate holus bolus the historical side of the question. This I could under no circumstances have done. The Socialism I am defending is indissolubly bound up with the past as well as the present of human society, and is incomprehensible except as the result of an historical development. I must therefore respectfully urge upon Mr. Bradlaugh to deal with the historical side of my article, as upon this the theory of modern Socialism largely hinges. I am quite willing for him to confine his attention to England, since this country may quite well be taken as typical; but I must protest against one of the most important parts of my argument being waived aside with the epithet "inexact," or with mere bald denials of the facts contained in it.

I will now proceed to deal with Mr. Bradlaugh's paragraphs seriatim. Nos. 1 and 2 I have animadverted upon in opening these remarks. (3 and 4) I contend that my definition of Socialism is perfectly clear—i.e., as clear as any definition can be which does not assume the proportions of an exposition. I do not see that Mr. Bradlaugh's definitions are as definitions any clearer than mine, but with them I will deal in the proper place.

No 4 consists of a play upon the words "goal" and "basis"—this at least is all that I can make out of it. The economic "basis," I thought I made tolerably evident, was that historic development of industry up to modern capitalism, which Mr. Bradlaugh objects to discuss; the "goal" is of course the Socialism which we contend is its outcome. My whole article consisted in an endeavour to state the "basis" and the "goal." The statement of the "basis" Mr. Bradlaugh has ignored; the statement of the "goal" he has understood variously, but never, I think, according to the ordinary sense of the words used by me.

(5, 6, 7) The relation between utopian and scientific Socialist theory is that they are both products of the same intellectual movement at different stages, just as astrology and astronomy, alchemy and chemistry are alike products of the scientific spirit, the one of its infancy, the other of its maturity. The attempt to reform the world by founding model communities or otherwise by groups of individuals is analogous to the attempt of Goethe's Wagner to "distil" a human being out of a retort. Mr. Bradlaugh is right in taking me to imply that this quasi-practicality is at least one distinctive feature of Utopianism.

(7, 8, 9) By Socialism being "nothing if not international," I certainly meant that there is no possibility of the definite establishment of Socialism anywhere without a concurrent movement among the proletariat of the whole civilised world. I cannot regard England or any other western country as isolated from the general movement of civilisation. The condition of the civilised world as a whole is the immediate basis on which modern Socialism founds. This basis is the capitalistic system, the growth and nature of which I have already sketched. By the "break up of nationalities" I refer to the existing centralised State-systems of Europe. At present, although for obvious reasons each nationality has to work out its own Socialist movement more or less independently, yet this independence is recognised by all Socialists to be only provisional—that the centralised State of to-day will eventually be merged in a federation of all socialised communities. The centre of the larger (as opposed to the smaller or communal) social organisation will be shifted from the nation to the group of nations constituting the socialised world. But, says Mr. Bradlaugh, how long after the first establishment of Socialism will this political readjustment take place? Will a period of six weeks and three days elapse, or seven weeks, or how long? I am very sorry, but I really cannot inform him. The two events may be simultaneous or they may not, according to the circumstances under which the crisis of the social revolution accomplishes itself. I can only affirm the fact of the logical connection of these events, and that the one must follow sooner or later upon the other. Would the "break up" be a slow and peaceful process? asks Mr. Bradlaugh. Possibly yes, but probably no.

(9) Mr. Bradlaugh rightly conceives that I deny the possibility of any social change being effected by isolated individuals or groups. The word "abstractedly" which he alleges, however, to be meaningless, contains the gist of the whole note, which affirms the impotence of individual effort abstracted from social condition. In answer to Mr. Bradlaugh's strictures I may say that "isolated and individual effort" has never been (and never can be) effective save as the expression and outcome of an underlying social movement. It is the social circumstances and intellectual atmosphere of his age which makes the individual what he is. The mere aggregate of individuals existing at a particular moment does not constitute society, any more than 'the mere aggregate of cell and tissue here and now constitutes the man—in both cases, it is the structural synthesis, the organic form, which determines the reality of the thing. I am sure if Mr. Bradlaugh considers the matter he will see that his "innumerable instances" of individual initiative, as contributing to progress, simply resolve themselves into cases of individuals having given voice and definiteness to tendencies already born of that social and more particularly economic development which maintains itself as one movement irrespective of the individuals, generations, and even races, through which it is manifested. My contention is that if people cut themselves off from the main stream of this development their action is futile.

(10, 11) I submit that Mr. Bradlaugh's first definition of a "Socialistic State" (which he would substitute for my own) is much too vague to be of any use for purposes of discussion. As it stands certainly no modern Socialist would accept it. His second is open to less objection, and taking the words in their ordinary meaning, I should not be indisposed to adopt it¹ as it is little more than a blurred re-statement of my own definition. The explanatory rider is of course indefensible. "Everything common as to its user" forsooth!—that's just what it wouldn't be. Mr. Bradlaugh really seems to credit Socialists with the fatuous absurdity of advocating a general scramble for hats and coats. The use of a thing as to its being "individual" or "common," must be entirely determined by the nature of the thing itself—whether it is a palace or a pair of boots, for example. It is quite true that Socialism by implication affirms that personal possession shall be limited to objects of personal use, but certainly does not imply that every pocket-handkerchief, coat, hat, stocking, petticoat, chemise, "shall be common as to their user." The remark, however, is obviously only one of those touches of playful humour which for those who can appreciate them, lend a charm to so many of Mr. Bradlaugh's speeches and articles; and I should not have essayed to refute it but for the fact that the British public is so dense at seeing a joke. Again, as to all labour being State-controlled, it is only necessary to say that after Mr. Bradlaugh had performed his share of the work necessary to the maintenance of the community of which he was a member, he could labour as uncontrolledly as he pleased under a Socialistic régime. With regard to Socialism and Communism I may say that the words Socialism, Communism and Collectivism are with me interchangeable, and mean economically the communisation of the means necessary to production, distribution, and exchange—and nothing else. You may of course affirm if you like that this would eventuate in the communisation of the product to a very large extent, but this would be an after and indirect and not an immediate and direct result of Socialism.

(11) By the "assumption of, etc.," I mean the taking away from the present owners by any means constitutional or otherwise, as circumstances may dictate, of the means of production, etc., now in the hands of private persons or syndicates. Socialism only proposes to confiscate wealth used for production on a large scale, i.e., as capital, in the fullest sense of the word.

(12) How the new social order is to be inaugurated, to wit, by the taking over of capital in the above sense, I certainly thought had been sufficiently indicated by me in more than one place. As to the benefits thence resulting to the English people, I also thought I made sufficiently clear that since the capitalist system with its results as described, is so fully developed in England that ergo the English people must especially benefit by its abolition.

(13) Civilisation means primarily the domination of property as held privately, with the corresponding distinction of a propertied, dominating class and a propertyless, dominated class. It is seen fullest developed in the modern capitalist world—with its empire of profit-mongering. Hence the abolition of capitalism implies the abolition of the last phase of the civilised or State-world which is based on the above class-antagonism.

(14) The private enterprise I referred to is that which has material personal gain for its end. I see no reason why under Socialism any other form of private enterprise should be extinguished.

(15) I must again ask Mr. Bradlaugh to deal with the historical side of my paper.

(16) That the early Christians as a matter of temporary convenience believing the end of the world to be at hand, chose to form a mutual benefit society does not affect in the least the principles and ultimate tendencies of Christianity. That its principles were not communistic would be, for that matter sufficiently proved by Acts v. 4, if Mr. Bradlaugh regards the book of 'Acts' as having any special historical value. As our friend William Morris remarked to me the other day, the vaunted communism of the primitive Christians is essentially the same as the donation of a thousand pounds by a Birmingham manufacturer to a cause he takes an interest in. The self-sacrifice might have been greater in the former than in the latter case, but the transaction is identical in kind.

No 17 I will bear in mind, though as regards the statistical Fabian Tract I have seen it in a place I should have thought not altogether inaccessible to Mr. Bradlaugh.

(18) I must confess I was somewhat staggered by Mr. Bradlaugh's challenging my statement that the large capitalist swallows up the small one. This everyday occurrence seemed so incontrovertible, and has never to my knowledge been questioned by any one. Probably Mr. Bradlaugh's own constituents at Northampton could tell him something about this in connection with the boot-making industry. I will, however, endeavour to satisfy his passion for figures by procuring some on the subject in my next article. Meanwhile, surely Mr. Bradlaugh will admit that goods can be thrown on to the competitive market cheaper and more rapidly when produced with large capital than with small, and if he admits this he admits that the result described must ensue. Is there not now less pauperism in proportion to population than forty years ago? Very possibly less pauperism, but certainly more poverty. The middle-classes have taken care to suppress pauperism and reduce the rates at the same time by wellnigh abolishing out-door relief and making the workhouses worse than prisons. What has Mr. Bradlaugh to say about the perennial unemployed question?

Space presses, but I shall revert to No. 18 in my next unless Mr. Bradlaugh should prefer to restate the points there raised by him in his reply to this.

(19) Mr. Bradlaugh "doubts" but does not criticise certain historical truisms put forward by me. He also alleges that I have failed to show their connection with the subject in dispute. But surely before one can judge whether Socialism will benefit the English people it is desirable to show why its antithesis, capitalistic individualism, hasn't and won't benefit the English people.

(20) Mr. Bradlaugh further characterises a paragraph of mine as "an accumulation of inaccuracies." I can only say I am prepared to stand by it to the very letter. I never said anything about "monopoly of labour." The "unnamed individuals" constituting the capitalist class have a monopoly of the means by which alone labour can become economically productive, which of course gives them a command over those who possess nothing but their labour-power. The margin of the final profit may, as Mr. Bradlaugh says, be very small or nil, and yet the rate of exploitation or of the production of surplus-value may be a hundred per cent., as Marx has conclusively shown ('Capital,' vol. I. c. ix. p. 201 et seq.). I am surprised to find this confusion between the concepts surplus-value and profit in a person of Mr. Bradlaugh's acuteness. However, there it is. Then, again, the final sentence. On the hypothesis that the whole community owns and works the means of production, etc., for its own behoof, to whom, I would ask, are the "expenses" named to be incurred? Surely there is here also some confusion of ideas.

In conclusion, if I might do so without giving offence, I should like to ask Mr. Bradlaugh to formulate his objections in a more comprehensive and less detached fashion. It is easy to fire off thirty or forty questions in two columns, which it would take thirty or forty to answer properly. With fair play given me to reply to a series of such articles as Mr. Bradlaugh's last, I have my misgivings lest the English people might have established Socialism before I had succeeded in convincing Mr. Bradlaugh that it would benefit them.

E. BELFORT BAX.

The McGlynn and George party becomes more turbulent and Socialistic daily.—Daily News Correspondent.

FATHER M'GLYNN ON MR. O'BRIEN.—NEW YORK, June 6.—Mr. O'Brien's refusal to attend the labour demonstration here on Saturday night is the subject of general discussion to-day. The members of the Labour Union are outspoken in their opinions, and consider themselves affronted. The matter was debated at a largely-attended meeting of the Anti-Poverty Society yesterday, at which Mr. Mackin, chairman of the Labour Demonstration, and Father M'Glynn, spoke in condemnatory terms of Mr. O'Brien. Father M'Glynn said: "O'Brien is himself a landlord at heart. It is only a question of 10 or 25 per cent. between O'Brien and Lord Lansdowne. They are birds of a feather. Mr. O'Brien blackguards Lord Lansdowne because he cannot jew him down 25 per cent. O'Brien admits that the land belongs to Lord Lansdowne. We say it does not belong to him. We therefore intend to take it from him."

HOW WE LIVE AND HOW WE MIGHT LIVE.

LET those be types of the consumer: but now for the producer; I mean the real producer, the worker; how does this scramble for the plunder of the market affect him? The manufacturer, in the eagerness of his war, has had to collect into one neighbourhood a vast army of workers, he has drilled them till they are as fit as may be for his special branch of production, that is, for making a profit out of it, and with the result of their being fit for nothing else; well, when the glut comes in that market he is supplying, what happens to this army, every one of whom has been depending on the steady demand in that market, and acting, as they could not choose but act, as if it were to go on for ever? You know well what happens to them; the factory door is shut on them; on a very large part of them often, and at the best on the reserve army of labour, so busily employed in the time of inflation. What becomes of them? Nay, we know that well enough just now. But what we don't know, or don't choose to know is, that this reserve army of labour is an absolute necessity for commercial war: if our manufacturers had not got these poor devils whom they could draft on to their machines when the demand swelled, other manufacturers in France or Germany, or America, would step in and take the market from them; so you see, as we live now, it is necessary that a vast part of the industrial population should be exposed to the danger of periodical semi-starvation, and that not for the advantage of the people in another part of the world, but for their degradation and enslavement. Just let your minds run for a moment on the kind of waste which this means, this opening up of new markets among savage and barbarous countries which is the extreme type of the force of the profit-market on the world, and you will surely see what a hideous nightmare that profit-market is: it keeps us sweating and terrified for our livelihood, unable to read a book or look at a picture, or have pleasant fields to walk in, or to lie in the sun, or to share in the knowledge of our time, to have in short either animal or intellectual pleasure, and for what? that we may go on living the same slavish life till we die, in order to provide for a rich man what is called a life of ease and luxury; that is to say, a life so empty, unwholesome, and degraded that, perhaps on the whole, he is worse off than we the workers are: and as to the result of all this suffering it is luckiest when it is nothing at all, when you can say that the wares have done nobody any good; for oftentimes they have done many people harm, and we have toiled and groaned and died in making poison and destruction for our fellow men.

Well, I say all this is war, and the results of war, the war this time not of competing nations, but of competing firms or capitalist units: and it is this war of the firms which hinders the peace between nations which you surely have agreed with me in thinking is so necessary; for you must know that war is the very breath of the nostrils of these fighting firms, and they have now, in our times, got into their hands nearly all the political power, and they band together in each country in order to make their respective governments fulfill just two functions; the first is at home to act as a strong police force, to keep the ring in which the strong are beating down the weak; the second is to act as a piratical body-guard abroad, a petard to explode the doors which lead to the markets of the world: markets at any price abroad, uninterfered with privilege at any price at home, to provide these is the sole business of a government such as our industrial captains have been able to conceive of. I must now try to show you the reason of all this, and what it rests on, by trying to answer the question, Why have the profit-makers got all this power, or at least why are they able to keep it?

That takes us to the third form of war commercial: the last and the one which all the rest is founded on. We have spoken first of the war of rival nations; next of that of rival firms; we have now to speak of rival men. As nations under the present system are driven to compete with one another for the markets of the world, and as firms or the captains of industry have to scramble for their share of the profits of the markets, so also have the workers to compete with each other—for livelihood; and it is this constant competition or war amongst them which enables the profit-grinders to make their profits, and by means of them to take all the executive power of the country into their hands. But here is the difference between the position of the workers and the profit-makers: to the latter, the profit-grinders, war is necessary; you cannot have profit making without competition, individual, corporate, and national; but you may work for a livelihood without competing; you may combine instead of competing. I have said war was the life-breath of the profit-makers; in like manner, combination is the life of the workers. The working-classes or proletariat cannot even exist as a class without combination of some sort. The necessity which forced the profit-grinders to collect their men first into workshops working by the division of labour, and next into great factories worked by machinery, and so gradually to draw them into the great towns and centres of civilisation, gave birth to a distinct working class or proletariat: and this it was which gave them their mechanical existence, so to say. But note, that they are indeed combined into social groups for the production of wares, but only as yet mechanically; they do not know what they are working at, nor whom they are working for, because they are combining to produce wares of which the profit of a master forms an essential part, instead of goods for their own use: as long as they do this, and compete with each other for leave to do it, they will be and will feel themselves to be simply a part of those competing firms I have been speaking of; they will be in fact just a part of the machinery for the production of profit; and so long as this lasts it will be the aim of the masters or profit-makers to decrease the market value of this human part of the machinery; that is to say, since they already hold in their hands the labour of dead men in the form of capital and machinery, it is their interest, or we will say their necessity, to pay as little as they can help for the labour of living men which they have to buy from day to day: and since the workmen they employ have nothing but their labour-power, they are compelled to underbid one another for employment and wages, and so enable the capitalist to play his game.

I have said that as things go, the workers are a part of the competing firms, an adjunct of capital. Nevertheless, they are only so by compulsion; and even without their being conscious of it, they struggle against that compulsion and its immediate results, the lowering of their wages, of their standard of life; and this they do and must do, both as a class and individually: just as the slave of the great Roman lord, though he distinctly felt himself to be a part of the household, yet collectively was a force in reserve for its destruction, and individually stole from his lord whenever he could safely do so. So here, you see, is another form of war necessary to the way we live now, the war of class against class, which, when it rises to its height, and it seems to be rising at present, will destroy those other forms of war we have been speaking of; will make the position of the profit-makers, of perpetual commercial war, untenable; will destroy the present system of competitive privilege, or commercial war.

Now observe, I said that to the existence of the workers it was combination, not competition, that was necessary, while to that of the profit-makers combination was impossible, and war necessary. The present position of the workers is that of the machinery of commerce, or in plainer words its slaves; when they change that position and become free, the class of profit-makers must cease to exist; and what will then be the position of the workers? Even as it is they are the one necessary part of society, the life-giving part; the other classes are but hangers-on who live on them. But what should they be, what will they be, when they once for all come to know their real power and cease competing with one another for livelihood? I will tell you: they will be society, they will be the community. And being society—that is, there being no class outside them to contend with—they can then regulate their labour in accordance with their own real needs. You have heard of supply and demand, but the supply and demand usually meant is under the sway of the gambling market; the demand is forced, as I hinted above, before it is supplied; nor, as each producer is working against all the rest, can the producers hold their hands, till the market is glutted and the workers, thrown out on the streets, hear that there has been over-production, amidst which over-plus of unsaleable goods they go ill-supplied with even necessities, because the wealth which they themselves have created is “ill-distributed,” as we call it—that is, unjustly taken away from them. Well, I say when the workers are society they will regulate their labour, so that the supply and demand shall be genuine, not gambling; the two will then be commensurate, for it is the same society which demands that also supplies; there will be no more artificial famines then, no more poverty amidst over-production, amidst too great a stock of the very things which should supply poverty and turn it into wellbeing. In short, there would be no waste and therefore no tyranny.

LITERARY NOTICES.

‘The Life of Ernest Jones,’ by Fred. Leary (Democrat office, New Bridge Street, 1s.), is about to be published, if enough copies are subscribed for to ensure the writer against loss. It is surely time that an account of the life and deeds of this great man should be published, and everybody should help to that end who can.

‘The Irish Question’ (3d.), by our comrade Sketchley, has been revised and reissued, and any one hitherto unable to obtain it may now do so from the author, at 8 Arthur Place Parade, Birmingham. A large part of the pamphlet is taken up with statistics very ably handled.

‘Confessions of an Anarchist’ (Clarke, High Street, Chelmsford) is a small paper-covered volume of forty-three sonnets, most of which give token of some power, the third being really fine. Some of the sonnets are of the kind that raise the question as to their reason of being, and we advise the writer to be more sparing in production and more lavish in workmanship. Forty-three sonnets in nine months is “over-production.”

‘Our Christianity tested by the Irish Question,’ by Josephine E. Butler (Fisher Unwin, 6d.), is an admirable exposé of the hypocrisy, cruelty, and fraud perpetrated upon the Irish people in the revered names of law and order and Christian charity. In reading such pamphlets as this, or indeed anything bearing upon the same question, the wonder seizes one that one folk should possibly be able to inflict and one to endure such hellish misery.

John Mitchell’s ‘History of Ireland’ is too well known to need much comment at this time, but the enterprise of Messrs. James Duffy and Sons (15 Wellington Quay, Dublin), calls for a word of praise. They are advertising an edition of Mitchell’s ‘History’ at 5s. complete. For those who can better afford to buy it in parts, it may be had in sixteen numbers at 3d. or four parts at 1s. Any one desirous of reading up Irish affairs during the most important period could very easily do worse than invest in Mitchell.

‘Edward III. and His Wars,’ by J. H. Ashley, M.A., and ‘The Misrule of Henry III.,’ by Rev. W. H. Hutton, M.A., are part of a series called ‘English History from Contemporary Writers,’ edited by F. York Powell, M.A., and published by David Nutt (207 Strand) at 1s. per vol. The series aims at presenting the happenings of each period as they appeared to the living onlookers. The extracts are from good writers, references to authorities are numerous and complete, great impartiality is shown, salient events are illustrated. The books are well printed and bound, and altogether this forms one of the best series yet submitted to the public. S.

SONNET.

Woe to you rich who eat but will not toil;
Whose hands with plunder of the poor are filled,
Alms-givers in the sight of men, who build
High churches with a portion of the spoil,
Whose greedy souls not deepest Hell could soil
Blacker than their own hue: the life blood spilled
Has cried aloud for vengeance, and has thrilled
The heart of Justice, whom ye shall not foil.

Lo, from the ocean of the worker’s tears
Riseth the tempest cloud of discontent,
Darkening the sun of your false lives with fears,
Anger and sorrow in its frowning blent,
Hiding within its midmost heart of gloom
The lightning of the people’s wrath, your doom.

THE UDSTON DISASTER.

THE Udston Colliery disaster brings home to the workers, in terrible reality, the price they have to pay for liberty to exist under present competitive capitalist conditions. The mines, it is said, could be worked in safety with electric light, but competition has cut the profits so low that it would not pay the capitalist to furnish such security, and these disasters help to clear off that surplus labour which, Mr. Bradlaugh affirms, has a tendency to outgrow the needs of society. The capitalist, of course, loses something by the damage and stoppage of his works, but he looks upon it as an insurance premium, for he gets a compensation in the increased security he derives from the workers not becoming too numerous for his purposes. His purposes are best served with just enough workers to enable him to get his work done for the lowest subsistence wages, but not enough to drive them desperate and goad them to the resolve of “if we cannot share your heaven, you shall share our hell.”

A glance at the ages of the victims caught in this disaster should strike a warning note both to the capitalists and the workers. It tells us that the contented workers of the uneducated past are now almost killed out, and the young on whose shoulders the burden of this important fundamental industry now rests can read and think for themselves. Already they are asking, “Our fathers! where are they?” They see that length of days is not theirs, neither are the products of Nature, and they want to know the reason why. They recognise that a ton of coals firmly embedded in the bowels of the earth is of little value to society until their labour is expended on it, and they are quite sure the Duke of Hamilton has no right to receive a larger share than they while he renders no assistance and runs no risks in securing the prize. The Duke of Hamilton’s income is “the lives of men and boys,” and so are the incomes of all who take from society that for which they render no equivalent service. The collier receives less for digging, filling, and hauling a ton of coals in the bowels of the earth in this dangerous part of Scotland, than a coal heaver gets in Glasgow for carrying, free of danger, the same quantity to a cellar from the street.

It is very suggestive that none of the victims of this disaster had reached over 60 years of age, and that only one-third was over 30 years. The list as published in the capitalists’ organ shows 50 killed under 30 years, and 25 between the ages of 30 and 60 years. The injured numbered 40 under 30 years, and 20 between the ages of 30 and 60 years. It is also very suggestive to read that the majority of the young victims were “the only support of a widowed mother.” A study of these points will suggest where and how their fathers are gone, and reveal conditions of existence not altogether worthy of praise in the Jubilee year.

We read that wee Jamie Gaw, aged 13 years, had escaped the pursuit of the School Board officer, who was searching for him. His widowed mother having need of the wages had sanctioned his going to the pit. Poor fellow! he has now escaped the officer’s grasp, and his widowed mother has to lament the loss of her help and hope. A collier’s widow always needs help, for his wages are calculated in snug and well-furnished offices in proportion to the price of provisions. His wages are calculated in the same manner as the upkeep of a machine. A large colliery manager told his men lately that 14s. per week according to the present price of provisions was sufficient to keep a collier and his family. Economists put the labourer and what he produces on the same footing—supply and demand—but, they forget, the product cannot revolt and the man can. Man is not a commodity to be thus disposed of. He is the being for whom all other commodities exist.

It is worth while putting on record some words of a magistrate in Hull. The Hull German Communist Club has been the victim of a police plot, by which two detectives obtained drink from the steward at a dance held on the premises. The steward and secretary were summoned for a breach of the licensing laws, but were eventually discharged, Mr. Twiss, the magistrate, saying that those belonging to the club had taken very great pains to keep it as a club. In his opinion it was not a bogus club at all, and he had nothing to do with their principles or politics. Rather rough on the promoters of the prosecution, who have tried this game on several times, hitherto without success. Unfortunately, however, they have succeeded in breaking up the club for the present.—E. T.

NOTES ON NEWS.

SPEECHES of Mr. Chamberlain; letter of Mr. Bright; Birmingham meeting, and solemn sermon by the Birmingham organ of Coercion Joe; Glasgow anti-coercion meeting; progress of Mr. Gladstone, once the Liberal King, now a kind of rebel leader, striving rather for a glorious end than for his lost crown. These are the preparations for the Liberal reunion, the hope of which some persons cling to so fondly. It does not directly concern us Socialists much, as after all it only forecasts the formal inauguration of the reactionary party which has been in working order some time already. But indirectly it will, one may hope, add to the confusion and ineffectiveness of Parliament, and so tend to disgust the people, and at the last disgust them so much that they will relegate it to its due place as a mere rowdy debating society, that sensible persons will give a wide berth to, till the happy day comes when one can squelch out its noisome existence.

"Over the whole plain of labour and trade you saw society in conflict. No arms were used, and yet men were struck down; no blood was spilled, and yet men died. Neither giant nor feudal lord was any longer there; a new tyrant reigned in their stead, more omnipresent and pitiless than they, whose name was Capital."

So says Mr. G. J. Holyoake in his prose poem on co-operation; nor is the picture overdrawn. But will not his words serve to describe the present as well as the past? Surely our own Labour Struggle column is enough to answer that question. It is true that the rule of the "tyrant" is now questioned, but no longer by the co-operationists but by the Socialist. The former seem to have a veil cast over their eyes which makes them see their old tyrant in very different colours to what they used to; for they can scarcely deny that he is there still.

✧ The fact is, the very success of co-operation shows how very far it is from being a solution of the labour question. Let us admit that they have exploded the superstition that workmen could not combine in production and distribution, that the autocratic one-man capitalist was a necessity for carrying on a business successfully: but with all their success, what else have they done? They have shown us that co-operation is desirable; but they are not allowed to co-operate: they must borrow money and pay interest, they must hire premises and pay rent to an individual or a company, they must buy the land that is theirs and the factories that they have made; they must pay a profit on every thing they buy outside their own association, either to consume or to transform into other wares. In short, not being allowed to co-operate, they have acted as all people must do under our present system—pay tribute to the owners of property for being allowed to live. And meantime they have established a form of joint stockery differing slightly (scarcely at all in most cases) from that already established; which to some of us cannot but seem a rather pitiful outcome of those perfectly genuine hopes for the regeneration of society which they began with earlier in the century, and all the energy developed from those hopes. Let them now, without casting aside the individual advantages they have gained, turn their eyes to Socialism, the real movement of labour, which will make the workers the arbiters of their own destinies.

The Engineer says, apropos of the Belgian strikes:

"Capital does not receive the common interest of the country when laid out in the coal mines, the workmen and their families cannot possibly subsist on a pittance of 1s. 6d. to 2s. 6d. at most a-day for ten hours' work in a deep mine, and the price of coal cannot be raised if it is to be disposed of. If economy in plant and working is no further possible, the look-out is a dreary one indeed."

Just so; and if "economy in plant and working" can be carried further than at present by squeezing the ingenuity of the capitalist and the terrible dull patience of the workman to the utmost, how long will the new improvement in the prospects of the coal capitalist last? Just as long as the increased competition which will immediately spring up will allow it. The look-out is dreary indeed—to the capitalist. But to the Socialist, even when viewed through all the suffering of low wages and strikes, and riots consequent on the tyranny of the last squeeze of despairing capitalism, it is not so dreary—because he can see the end drawing near: the capitalist, finding his profits cut down by competition, while the workman, growing more and more enlightened, claims more and more.

Mr. Haigh, of Barnsley, in speaking to a large number of miners and the officials of the Yorkshire Miners' Association, complains bitterly of the bad effect on trade of the high mining rents and royalties in Great Britain. He explains the depressed state of the coal trade by the depressed state of the iron trade, and he uses the following remarkable words:

"Whilst as a nation we were almost the sole makers of iron and steel, and had no foreign competitors, we could supply our home trade and other countries without feeling the effect of these royalties and charges quite so much; but the moment we are face to face with a foreigner in the markets of the world, who has very small rents and royalty charges to pay—and even these charges go into the national exchequer to assist in meeting the expenses of the State—we are run out of the foreign markets, and even driven from our own."

The readers of the Commonweal are pretty familiar with this view of the state of trade and the prospects of capitalism in Great Britain; but as an utterance from the capitalist side it is worth noting. And what is to be done, pray, Mr. Capitalist?

For why should we take the profit from the poor land-owner, who is already moaning dejectedly in another corner of the field about the pining away of his rents? Some of our non-Socialist working-men friends will say and think that the British working-man will get something out of it. Will he? To do justice to the paper who reports Mr. Haigh's speech, The Engineer, it can see through the flimsiness of that hope: "The speaker did not explain how it was that in spite of all this, the Belgian workman works for starvation wages."

Yes, indeed, that is what it must come to in one way or other as long as we work for the profit of a master. At the best, one group of workmen thriving somewhat at the expense of another, that is what has been in this country, and what the "patriots" of all countries put before them as an ideal to be striven for, blind fools as they are! What most certainly will be, and before very long too, if the Social Revolution does not intervene, is that all workmen throughout the world will be reduced to a "dead level," not of "mediocrity," but of starvation for the satisfaction of the tyrant, Capitalistic Competition.

International Capitalism and the workman a hungry machine; International Socialism and the workman a free man and the master of his own destiny—it must be one or other of these two. All the feeble compromises that aim at checking the power of the capitalists, and yet allowed them to keep their position, will be speedily found out, one after another, by the monster which the Age of Commerce has made by dint of such mighty effort and cleverness, and which it must now feed by anything that may be handy. Honour, justice, beauty, pleasure, hope, all must be cast into that insatiable maw to stave off the end awhile; and yet at last the end must come, and the sooner it comes the less of a desert the world will be after the storm which is inevitable.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

WHAT THE WORD "HIRE" MEANS.—"The labourer is worthy of his hire. Yes, but the word 'hire' means not what he usually gets for his labour, but what he really should get for his labour. It is the violation of this simple law that has ruined several nations and is now breeding barbarians in our midst. No man should give his labour to any one for one penny less than it is worth. And all working-men should strive to abolish the present system of competition, which makes it impossible for them to demand the real value of their labour. Remember Christ's teaching. Take up the cross of the new crusade, and in a little while you will see that the old monks were right when they taught that 'laborare est orare'—to labour is to pray."—Dr. McGlynn.

THE REAL IRISH QUESTION.

LITTLE as the Irish may think it, it is not coercion that makes them worse off than slaves, nor being governed by a foreign nation. Nor is it on the other hand, as some affirm, obedience to the pope or to political agitators. The origin of their slavery is neither religious nor political, it is social. Here is the latest symptom of social slavery amongst the Irish. It refers to an attempt to benefit Ireland by philanthropy, instead of justice; an attempt which, though probably well meant, is practically nothing but an offer of gall and vinegar to the tortured nation, to ease somewhat the otherwise unbearable oppression. I copy from the Daily News of May 19th:

"One of the drawing-room dresses has a special patriotic interest apart from its artistic beauty. It is the work of the Irish embroiderers employed by the Donegal Industrial Fund, 43 Wigmore Street, in whom the Queen and the Princess of Wales have taken a warm personal interest. The train was of hand-spun linen, wholly covered with Kells embroidery. . . . This is a new form of lace, called the "Kells," introduced by the Donegal Industrial Fund with the object of founding a new Irish industry, for which workers are being trained under the auspices of Mrs. Ernest Hart in order to rival the Austrian laces now so much worn."

How "patriotic," truly! How kind of the Queen and Princess of Wales to take such warm interest in the poor Irish, and how charitable of the lady who wore the dress (doubtless too busy to make her own dress) to permit the Irish embroiderers to earn a little money so that they need not starve! Is it not a merciful dispensation which enables a woman to combine charity with the convenience of getting other women to do her a service? Perhaps some one who "takes a warm interest" in industrial matters will answer me this question: Why should not Irish women and girls,—all with immortal souls in them, and with possibilities for looking quite as pretty and behaving quite as becomingly as any English ladies—why, I ask, should not they be making lace for themselves to look nice in; if indeed it should be really necessary to take so much trouble about it? Or at least why, since no one will attempt to argue that they do it from anything but sheer necessity, why should there be any necessity for Irish women to toil in poverty to make other women look becoming? You cannot lay this to coercion, nor to foreign rule, nor yet to the pope and political agitators. No; the cause is social injustice, of which all political grievances are only the outside shell.

An unbiassed man, not up to the doctrine of "Rewards for abstinence" and the rest of it, would be inclined to say (in his ignorance) that it was a monstrous thing for one woman to be able to persuade many more (by terror of possible starvation if they did not comply) to make finery for her, while they had scarcely clothes enough to cover them. Probably if any should expostulate with him and tell him about the rights of landlords, he would ask, How the devil the landlords got such rights? And then they would have to refer him to the devil for an answer, for I am sure no other authority knows at all why one man should grow potatoes, and instead of satisfying his hunger with them in a reasonable manner sell them and give the money to another man; going hungry himself unless his wife can earn some of that money back again by making lace for the other man's wife; or his daughter by cooking the other man's dinner for him. I doubt if the devil himself could persuade an unbiassed man that such a position for the workers was aught but slavery and injustice, and it is high time our Irish friends recognised that, as Coercion and Castle Government have not caused it, neither will Home Rule cure it. It is true that English Government is favourable to it, and seeks to perpetuate it by means of Coercion, and consequently that Government must be replaced by Home Rule. But it will then be time for the Irish people, having cracked the political shell, to deal with the social kernel of the question, and they will discover that misery like theirs is not to be met by any tinkering philanthropy, however well meant;—that, in fact, it is no good to "make work" for them;—the cultivation of their land and beautifying of their homes will be plenty for them to do; and what they need is to have the produce of their labour for themselves, so that their wives and daughters may adorn their own persons and cook their own dinners; leaving their whilom employers to go and do likewise, if they want dinner and clothes. This problem, which is already before England, will face Ireland too as soon as she has got Home Rule; and it is our duty to educate, agitate, and organise, so that when the time comes the democracies of the two countries may unite in one sufficient effort to shake themselves free of this slavery, and institute the reign of freedom and social equality.

Then will it be seen with perfect clearness how much assistance the working-classes will owe to that "warm" (very warm) "personal interest" which not only the Queen and the Princess of Wales, but the whole of the "upper" classes are sure to acquire in the cause of the suffering workers.

GEORGE STURT.

Mr. John Roland Phillips, the West Ham magistrate, is dead. He was one of the few, the very few, honest and impartial men upon the bench. Even Socialists when they came before him received fair and courteous treatment, and he never followed the dishonest lead of those who made themselves counsel for the prosecution and forget their judicial functions.—S.

It is but seldom that a member of the wealthy class lets out anything tending to cast a doubt on the purity of motive which leads his class to take up charity-work, but this is what Mr. F. B. Grotian, M.P. for East Hull, did the other day at the annual meeting of an orphanage in Hull. He expressed the opinion "that the philanthropic spirit of the present generation was the effort of the rich and cultured classes to escape from the dull inanities and the purposelessness of an idle life." A Socialist could not have put the thing straighter than did this Tory M.P.—E. T.

'THE SERVICE OF MAN.'

SOCIALISTS must sometimes supply themselves with fugitive literature, however much against their will, as all modern writing contains references more or less direct to our propaganda and principles. This book is chiefly a summary of the argument against Christianity, but is chiefly interesting as embodying the views of an ordinary educated man on social matters. It is one of those numerous modern essays which conceal all manner of confusion of thought under a semblance of logical method, and is characterised by imperfect application of other men's science.

The chief aim of the book is to show how theologies have sacrificed the welfare of men to the service of gods, and that the tendency is now to reverse the process. This is a good positive idea, and is capable of great and suggestive application, which however it does not here receive. The negative critique of Christianity, which is the greater part of the book, is thin of its kind; many of the points are neatly put and several scientific analogies well worked out, but the basis of it is a repetition of old scandals of monks and nuns, and the popular theological slang of "heaven" and "hell." The author's mental confusion here is great. In some places he tries to show that religion discourages morality in favour of "salvation" (whatever that antithesis may mean), so that "penitence is everything and morality nothing"; and in others that the Christian standard of morality is too high,—expects people to be too moral, in fact!

It must be said that Christianity will not suffer much from attacks of this sort, its essential thought has not been touched; it is as if one were to combat Darwinism in the persons of those who profess to understand Darwin, but don't. Perhaps it would be fair in this connection to apply to himself the author's remark on people like Napoleon, who regard Friendship and Love as a snare and delusion; they are out of court, never having felt in themselves the emotions they despise. I think it unlikely that much enthusiasm will be aroused by the invitation to bow down to an inscrutable Something, "the impersonal and unknowable reality behind phenomena, which the last word of recent philosophy propounds as the only rational object of worship."

To come now to the surer and more familiar ground of sociology, our author states in his preface that he has been unable from illness to complete the work as he had intended, but shows pretty clearly the line he would have taken. He sees well enough the rottenness of the present industrial system, recognises the meaning of national competition for the world-market, but suggests this view with all the diffidence of an unsupported discoverer of truth. His complaint against the modern system is "not that it is ugly and destroys rural beauty (the artistic view); not that it makes a few capitalists very rich and many workmen very poor (the current Socialist view); but that it cannot continue upon its own line; it will be destroyed by its own inherent vices, for which there is no remedy." This is practically all that Marx has to say; yet Mr. Morison is not a Socialist; he says indeed that there is a Socialism of love and mutual helpfulness as well as a Socialism of hate and spoliation; but he does not show how we can realise the one without the other, nor does he even define their differences. His notions of the question appear to be derived from a study of the later literature of the Federation, such as letters in the Times, suggesting construction of artisan's dwellings, provision of meals in Board Schools, etc.; with reference to which proposals and similar ones he asks, Why not supply the working-classes with boots, corduroys, and, in fact, all other necessities or even luxuries at the expense of the well-to-do? Why not, indeed?

But in truth, the author's Socialism is but a name. What are we to think of a "scientific" man, who first talks about over-production of goods, and then of the rapid increase of population? The work is freely bespattered with the usual pseudo-scientific cant about "the survival of the unfittest"; and the writer has absolutely no suspicion that these "unfittest" have been rendered unfit by centuries of social wrong, or that a return to right and justice might stamp the brand of unfitness upon the class to which Positivist philosophers mostly belong.

After reading this book carefully the conclusion is that social evils have been laid bare rather well for a non-Socialist, but that, beyond vague talk of "the better distribution and moralisation of wealth," no remedy has been proposed. But to be exact, there is a suggestion that habitual criminals (nobody else at present) should be locked up, not as a punishment, but to prevent the propagation of their species. Great systems, like great men, often utter quite a series of last words before finally departing; and we may well hope that this is not the very last word of Positivist philosophy. If, however, this modern application of the ancient fable of Danaë should come to pass, doubtless Jove will still find means of deliverance.

INGERSOLL'S LOGIC.—Says Colonel Ingersoll in North American Review:—"In a world filled with millions and millions of acres of land waiting to be tilled, where one man can raise the food for scores, millions are on the edge of famine. Who can comprehend the stupidity at the bottom of this truth?" The same article contains also the following: "Will they (workers) ever feel and know that they have no right to bring children into the world that they cannot support?" Unless the average family of the working-men is over forty children at least, the fame of Colonel Ingersoll will hardly be perpetuated by such logic as this.—Labor Enquirer.

'The Service of Man.' By JAMES COTTER MORISON. (Kegan Paul and Co.).

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

A strike of rivetters affecting about 900 men has taken place in the Rowley and Halesowen districts. The men want an increase of 30 to 40 per cent. on the present rates.

The annual report of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers states that the amount paid to unemployed members amounted to over £84,000, and the expenditure during the past year exceeded the income by £3,451 13s. 0½d.

The rivet workers in the Rowley, Blackheath, and Old Hill districts have given notice for a return to the old 4s. list of wages. It is declared by the operatives that rivets which used to be paid for at the 4s. list prices are being made as low as 2s. 6d. per cwt., showing a reduction of about 37½ per cent.

At a largely attended meeting of the West Lancashire Coalowners' Association, held on the 31st ult. at the North-Western Hotel, Liverpool, Mr. Alfred Hewlett in the chair, it was resolved that a reduction in the wages of the colliers was absolutely necessary; and a committee of the masters was appointed to meet the men's representatives on the subject.

FURTHER DIFFICULTIES IN THE CHAIN TRADE.—At a large meeting of chain-makers at Cradley Heath the other day, it was stated that in consequence of a section of the employers refusing to pay their workmen the recognised wages, it had been decided to institute legal proceedings, and that it had been found necessary to send the town-crier throughout the district requesting the operatives not to take out more iron until the four-shillings list of prices was conceded. It was resolved to continue the strike at several factories.

The Executive Committee of the Operative Spinners of Lancashire, Cheshire, Yorkshire, and Derbyshire on Saturday discussed the cotton corner in Liverpool, and the proposal to run short time to defeat it. A resolution was passed expressing sympathy with the master spinners of the four counties in the difficulties in which the position of the cotton market places them, and recommending the appointment of a committee to co-operate with the Masters' Association in carrying out any movement that may be decided upon.

The 59th Annual Report of the General Union of Carpenters and Joiners lies before us. In it occur statements which bear out the assertions we have so often made as to trades' unions. It says that a retrograde movement has been going on for ten years, and contrasts the state of the craft then with what it is now under the more strongly competitive system. It condemns piece-work as carried on at present, but looks forward to the "better times" always delusively dangled before working-men. Expenditure exceeded income during the year by over £450! How long is it that this kind of thing is to go on before trades' unions take the matter up in sterner fashion than hitherto?

THE TELEGRAPH CLERKS' GRIEVANCES.—The first-class telegraph clerks engaged at the Central Telegraph Office, having memorialised the Postmaster-General on the subject of their present unfavourable prospects in the service, have just received the following, in reply to their petition:—"I am directed to convey to you the Postmaster-General's decision, that after very carefully considering your claims, and while fully recognising the good service which you render to the department, he regrets that he does not see his way to recommend to the Treasury that any alteration should be made in your scale of pay.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant (signed), H. C. FISCHER, Controller."

THREATENED STRIKE OF MINERS.—A largely-attended and very unanimous meeting of miners employed at Monk Bretton Collieries, near Barnsley, was held last week at Barnsley, to receive the report of the deputation which had waited on the manager respecting certain grievances which have been the subject of discussion at several meetings. The deputation reported that the manager declined to remedy their grievances. It was therefore resolved that all the men, numbering five or six hundred, should give fourteen days' notice to leave work on the 15th June; further, that the grievances be laid before a meeting of the executive of the Yorkshire Miners' Association to be held shortly.

With regard to the strike in the Bolton engineering trade, there are some negotiations in progress with a view to a settlement of the dispute, but it is very doubtful whether in their present shape they will lead to any satisfactory issue. The employers are in no mood to depart to any material extent from the position they have taken up. During Tuesday night a number of windows were broken at Messrs. Wood's foundry, and it was found necessary to station a detachment of police on the premises. A number of Scotchmen who have been brought over by Messrs. Wood to take the place of the men on strike have very properly been boycotted by sympathisers with the strike hands, and they have found the greatest difficulty in obtaining lodgings.

STRIKERS AT BRISTOL.—In order to expedite the discharge of the grain cargo of the steamship Worcester, just arrived at Avonmouth from New York, the stevedores, Messrs. King and Sons, with the concurrence of the Bristol Docks officials, placed on board a steam elevator. The result of this was that a large number of men struck work, and caused the others on board to cease having anything to do with the elevator. Disorderly scenes and excitement ensued; the local police were called, and had to be strengthened by thirty others, who still remain near the ship to prevent breaches of the peace. Men from Liverpool to discharge the vessel were telegraphed for, but the strike was settled before their arrival by the firm agreeing not to use the elevator unless there is insufficient manual labour.

THE FORTH BRIDGE WORKMEN ON STRIKE.—The men employed at the Forth Bridge Works struck work on the 3rd inst., demanding an advance of wages to the extent of a penny per hour. They hold that owing to the dangerous nature of their occupation they ought to be better remunerated. The present rate of pay is—for carpenters, 7d. per hour; engineers, 6½d.; and labourers, 4½d. to 5d. The sudden action of the men took the managers of the various departments completely by surprise. An informal meeting of a number of the men was held at noon on Saturday at South Queensferry, and a deputation waited upon Mr. Scott, the manager of the works, to endeavour to arrange terms. The result was that the deputation were informed that the contractors will pay extra wages, on the recommendation of the foreman, to men engaged in difficult and dangerous work.

Last week a meeting of the workmen employed at Broomhill Colliery was held at Broomhill, to take into consideration the rent question, which is the cause of the stoppage at this colliery. It appears that, previous to the strike, the owners were paying to their workmen living in rented houses the sum of 2s. per week. At the termination of the strike, they intimated that they would no longer pay 2s., but 1s. 6d. per week. There was a crowded attendance at the meeting. Mr. R. Robinson presided, and in opening the meeting said that as he was informed there were reporters present, he would ask them to leave the room, as the proceedings were of a private character. The reporters accordingly withdrew from the room. It is understood, however, that after a long and animated discussion, in which every point was fully dealt with, a resolution was passed that the men start work at 1s. 6d. per week rent, and arbitrate regarding the other sixpence.

AMERICA.

EIGHT HOURS IN BROOKLYN.—MAY 28.—Mayor Whitney yesterday notified the Brooklyn Park Commissioners that the employes of that department are entitled, under the law, to the benefits of the Eight Hour law. "Contracts between the municipality and its employes may provide for a term of daily labour not exceeding eight hours," writes the Mayor, "but overwork for an extra compensation, by agreement, is permitted. The rule should be made universal in all the departments, wherever practicable."

CHICAGO (ILL.)—Serious trouble is expected here. A gigantic conspiracy is going on, which is likely to lead to strange complications. Sometime since the carpenters, to the number of 8,000, struck for shorter hours and higher pay. They were successful, and their example was followed by the painters and afterwards by the bricklayers. At last the bosses formed an offensive alliance and declared a general lock-out, to include all building trades. Not being successful (principally on account of the friendship for the men of the small contractors) they were joined by the real-estate men, the architects, and later by the manufacturers of and dealers in building material. It now looks as if united capital had made up its mind to strangle organised labour, and the struggle, which is exceedingly bitter, is rapidly extending to other cities. No man knows where it will end or what the outcome will be, and both sides are preparing for serious work.

NAUGATUCK, May 18.—A few days ago the boys employed in the card-room of the Dunham Hosiery Company went in a body to the manager and asked him to raise their pay ten cents a-day. They were receiving seventy-five cents. This he positively declined to do, and informed the boys that he could get all the boys he wanted to take their places for fifty cents a-day. The boys put on their coats and left in a body, and so far it has been found impracticable to replace them. The strike, of course, affects other departments in the factory, and interferes seriously with running the works. A man had been hired by the manager to work in another part of the mill, but was ordered to take the place left by the boys. This he refused to do, though earnestly besought by the manager, who finally offered three dollars a-day and two policemen to protect him; but even this would not prevail, and the man left the mill to seek employment elsewhere. The work for which he was offered three dollars was the same work the boys got seventy-five cents for.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

The New South Wales Government are making special efforts to dispose of the unemployed difficulty. Great distress is said to prevail among the unemployed at Bourke, and, in response to an urgent appeal by the mayor of that town, the Premier has authorised an expenditure of £500 for providing the men with food. With a view of finding work for about six hundred men who are now out of work in the metropolis, the Government have entered into communication with twenty-six municipalities, asking them to find employment on any works of improvement, and offering to pay 2s. 6d. a-day towards the wages of each man employed by the municipal bodies. Nearly 2300 men are now employed on the various relief works, the average wages earned amounting to 3s. 10d. per day, the expenditure on relief work thus being at the rate of about £140,000 a-year.

A UNION MAN.—A union man is one who insists that it takes two to make a bargain, and who combines with his fellows in order to maintain the equal right of the men with the bosses to fix the rate of wages and other conditions of work. The non-union man believes that it only takes one to make a bargain—and that the boss is that one.—Grand Rapids Workman.

Strikes are bad, as a rule, because they don't settle anything—that is, if the men strike with the intention of going back to work for the same parties again. All that is determined by such a strike is, which of the two parties is the stronger at that time and the better able to endure the fight. But if a trades' union have quietly laid up funds for the purpose of striking for keeps; if they have thus prepared to set themselves to work when they strike, and strike with the intention of hereafter working for themselves; if they take the capitalists at their word and let them "invest their capital in other business," as has been threatened, meanwhile producing co-operatively—as they can if they have the mind—all that the market needs; that were a strike well worth the while.—Cleveland Workman.

In the distant State of New Mexico there is a certain breed of mules that, when one of them is attacked, place themselves in a circle, with their heads to the centre, and kick at their enemies; then the air is thick with hoofs. Working-men do about the opposite. If one of them gets a slap in the face, he holds out his other cheek for more; and when they do kick they kick each other. That's just what the capitalists want. While the Irish, English, and German working-men are dividing on national issues, the capitalists are uniting, and always seek to create division among the workers in order to more easily conquer them. The French and German "governments" are doing their best to foment national hatred among the people, so that the blinded dupes of soldiers may distribute bullets among themselves while their masters divide the gold. There has been much nonsense told by the capitalist press about Socialists, and yet those "bloody" agitators—those "bloodthirsty" Socialists—are the only ones in Europe that have protested energetically against wars and massacres. They tried it in this country also, when they endeavoured to foment strife between this country and Canada on the fishery question, but they didn't succeed, and they won't. All that we want is that the labourer shall receive the full value of his labour, and still there are some who come with their courts of arbitration. Courts of arbitration are nonsense. I don't want any. Of what use are they when the commissioners are paid and bribed by the capitalists to decide against us? Away with them! Do business with the devil and you'll be swindled. The nationalisation of railroads and land cannot alone help us. We want the full value of our labour—that's all.—WALTER VROOMAN in Workmen's Advocate.

THE CO-OPERATIVE CONGRESS AT CARLISLE.

THE nineteenth Annual Co-operative Congress was inaugurated on May 28 by a reception concert to the delegates in the County Hall, Carlisle. Speeches were afterwards delivered by George Howard, Sir Wilfred Lawson, and Sedley Taylor of Cambridge. The latter stated that "Co-operation has a great goal, and it is no other than what is now called the emancipation of labour, the freeing of the working man from the kind of industrial bondage in which he now stands towards his private employer and labour."

On the same day an exhibition of co-operative manufactures was opened in the Drill Hall by Judge Hughes. The products shown embraced boots and shoes, cotton and woollen goods, cutlery, printing specimens, and furniture and household requisites. The latter goods were from the Strawberry Works, Newcastle, which was represented at the exhibition by Edward Pease (Fabian Society). The whole of the goods shown were of first-class character: just such as we may expect to see when production for use takes the place of production for profit only.

On Sunday 29th two Congress sermons were listened to by the delegates. The Rev. W. Labrum, Wesleyan, preaching on "Filthy Lucre," severely denounced various unclean modes of getting a living, such as by stock-jobbing, jerry-building, bread-adulterating, etc. At the cathedral, in the afternoon, the Bishop of Carlisle preached from Acts ii. 44, 45. As became a Galileean in receipt of £4500 a-year, he, of course, totally ignored his text, and said he felt quite sure that equality amongst men could never be brought about by an alteration of "the social basis of mankind." He finally recommended the co-operators present (Holyoake and Co.) to receive the Holy Ghost, as "co-operation would be dangerous unless inspired by" that shadowy particle. By the way, the "Holy Ghost" is a long time in moving the rev. bishop to part with his substance as his predecessors did.

On Monday morning the inaugural address was delivered by G. J. Holyoake in the Victoria Theatre. The pit was occupied by over 500 delegates from co-operative distributive and productive societies. The president in his opening remarks pointed out that "over the whole plain of labour you saw society in conflict. No arms were used, and yet men were struck down; no blood was spilt, and yet men died. Neither giant nor feudal lord was any longer there; a new tyrant reigned in their stead—more omnipresent and pitiless than they—whose name was Capital. It held in its hand the food of the people and the means of labour. In a population of thirty million persons equally invited to Nature's table, one million of fortunate persons commanded all the seats and thirty millions sat wistfully looking on, and the waiters never came their way. All that fell to them were crumbs from the trenchers of Dives."

This was a promising beginning, but when he wound up with the usual clap-trap glorification of "divi"—"oh, what a falling off was there!"

An agreeable change awaited us in the next speaker—Mrs. Failes, president of the Sociologic Society of America. In a paper on "the condition of the industrial classes of America," she remarked that "the competition which had produced good in the past was now reversing its action and militating directly against the progress of society, and its nature, as it worked itself out through advancing civilisation, was to break down and destroy weaker industries, and finally to concentrate wealth to such an extent as to injuriously affect the entire industrial and social system, and necessitate the re-organisation of society upon a co-operative basis."

M. de Boyve, of Nismes, a French delegate, followed next. His speech was somewhat reactionary after his fair predecessor. He remarked that "Revolutionary Socialism is increasing every day in the number of its disciples, gathered from all who were discontented and all who had nothing to do. To that they opposed the International Co-operative Union, which would be the enemy of disturbance," etc., etc.

The second day's sitting was presided over by Sir W. Lawson, who considered himself unfitted to preside at a working-men's gathering such as this one. Firstly, because he was a "country gentleman"—i.e., one who never did any work—and secondly, because he was a landlord, "and landlords at present were looked upon with distaste and suspicion throughout the whole civilised world."

In a discussion which followed on "Co-operative Production," a Leeds delegate gave some interesting particulars as to how about 200 Jewish tailors in Leeds had tried to start a co-operative workshop in order to free themselves from the yoke of the sweaters, but had failed through lack of funds. The Productive Committee intends to advance to them the requisite sum as a loan, so it is to be hoped they will have better success next time.

On the last day of the Congress "Co-operation and Agriculture" came in for a good share of discussion. A Darlington delegate declared himself strongly opposed to the principle of buying land for co-operative purposes. He advocated the principle that the land belonged to the people, and that private property in land was an injustice. Some reactionists tried to stop him here, but the chairman interposed in his behalf, so he had his say. Another delegate stated that landlords always asked an exorbitant price when co-operators wanted land.

The proceedings throughout were fairly harmonious. This might be due to a strong protest which was uttered early on. From it I gathered that a split was feared. That struggle I believe will be fought out sooner or later. It will be between the "butter and cheese" co-operator who would be content with distribution merely, and the "co-operator of ideas" who advocates profit-sharing production as a means, and the emancipation of labour as the end.

T. MUSE.

A section of the Indian native press is against the extension of railways, on the ground that they only benefit British capitalists. The Bangabasi says:—"The English merchants wish the Government to extend railways on its own responsibility, and borrow money from British capitalists. Their desire would be satisfied if the Government would borrow forty crores of rupees. They have raised the question of the welfare of both England and India. They wish to prove that the natives of India will be benefitted by the extension of railways, and that the English people will also be benefitted by it. We have already shown that the English people only will be benefitted. We wonder at the argument set forth with a view to betray the natives of India and the Indian Government. The extension of railways will increase the sale of English goods. There is no necessity for raising the question of the welfare of the natives of India. Our Government will not do any good to the natives, even if it has the desire to do so. It must undertake work which will do good to the English people. So the railways will be extended. It is idle to talk of the welfare of the natives of India."—Engineer.—True, doubtless, but for one correction; it is not for the benefit of the people of England, but for the governing classes of England that all this is done.—W. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"THE IMMORALITY OF INTEREST."

SIR,—It is hardly necessary to say anything in reply to the letter from "A Professor of Science," after G. B. S.'s admirably lucid note; but as I am asked a direct question, I should like to answer it.

It could be neither through inadvertence nor design that I omitted to notice the defence of usury referred to, simply because I was unaware before reading the professor's letter that there was such a defence. Even yet, I am unable to see that it is worthy of serious consideration. His argument is, in effect, this: Usury of commodities is reasonable and right (the very proposition he ought to prove); money is a commodity; therefore, usury of money (I notice the professor uses "money" and "capital" as identical terms) is reasonable and right. Now I did not single out usury of money as specially deserving of disapprobation, but condemned usury of every kind as being morally indefensible, and criticised the stock arguments in its favour—the absurdity of which I am glad the professor recognises and admits. The matter standing thus, there is no call to discuss the laws of the variation of the rate of interest, or any minor point on which I may differ with him.

J. HALDANE SMITH.

MARX'S THEORY OF VALUE.

SIR,—Mr. Mallock in the current number of the Fortnightly Review attempts to disprove the theory of Marx and Ricardo, that the exchange-value of all commodities is measured by the amount of average human labour embodied in them. His strongest argument is derived from the statement of Mr. Laurence Gronlund (The Co-operative Commonwealth, p. 35) that "the whole agricultural class in the United States, consisting of 7,600,000 persons, did not create more wealth in 1880 than our manufacturing operatives alone, 2,700,000 in number." Here, says Mr. Mallock, we have two aggregates of "common human labour measured by time," each embodying itself in a corresponding aggregate of commodities; and yet, though the labour embodied in one set is nearly three times as great as that embodied in the other set, the two sets of commodities are in value nearly equal. The Socialists, therefore, are evidently mistaken as to that primary fact of existing industrial life, on the analysis of which their whole system is founded.

I am myself a believer in the theory of Marx and Ricardo, but I must confess that the above appears to be a strong argument against it. Can you or any of your contributors show its fallacy?—I am, your obedient servant, May 31.

"THE WESTERN AVERNUS."

SIR,—A book just published, entitled, "The Western Avernus; or, Toil and Travel in Further North America," constitutes a very clear exposure of the emigration fraud. The author—a man of education and culture, and of physical strength and pluck withal—tired of the soul-choking atmosphere of London life, resolved to seek for a freer, wider, and manlier one in America. He became a shepherd on the plains of Texas, farm labourer, contractor's labourer, and railroad navvy in Iowa and Minnesota, glad when by the hardest work he could gain a bare living, and quite elated when he had a dollar to share with a companion. In St. Paul, Minnesota, he got hired with about 100 more to go to the Rocky Mountain Section of the Canadian Pacific Railroad as a navvy. Amongst the magnificent scenery of the Rockies he worked for two months and then left, partly because he wanted to get further West and partly because of the domineering spirit of one of the "bosses." With a companion named Fritz he tramped across the Selkirk range of the Rockies to Kamloops, in British Columbia. For nearly two years he lived in British Columbia, Oregon, and California, working with farmers, in saw-mills, on railroads, in vineyards when he could find work, and half starving when he could get none. In the famous city of San Francisco he met with his bitterest experiences, loafing about with 20,000 other unemployed men vainly seeking for leave to toil. Then an avenue opened for him to get back to England and civilisation, and the companionship of uneducated men became intolerable to him. And so he swiftly returned to England, satisfied, I presume, that the commercial spirit rules as completely in America as in England, and that it is as difficult to live nobly there as here. The author is evidently a just and noble-minded man, whose right post is in the camp of the Socialists helping to establish an industrial and economic system in which honest men can lead honest lives. Young Socialists who have an eye towards America or the Colonies as a refuge from the depressing conditions of life here, should read "The Western Avernus," it may save them much pain and disappointment.

REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday, June 2, a business meeting was held at which the Conference delegates gave in their report, after which the Branch considered its position with regard to the decision of the Conference. The Committee of Management, consisting of the following officers, was then elected:—General Secretary: W. H. Utley; Lecture Secretary: T. E. Wardle; Lecture Committee: A. K. Donald and Shirley; Treasurer: Lena Wardle; Steward: Harnett; News-vendor: Shirley. The speakers of the branch held large open-air meetings on Saturday in Hyde Park; on Sunday, in Regent's Park, Hyde Park, and at St. Pancras Arches; and on Sunday night comrade Donald addressed an attentive and enthusiastic audience at the Peckham Reform Club. A resolution was passed authorising the speakers of the Branch to make collections for the Propagandist Missionary Fund started some time ago, of which Lena Wardle is the treasurer.—U.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, June 1, William Morris lectured on "True and False Society." Good discussion followed. On Sunday, June 5, a business meeting was held, at which our Conference delegate presented report. Annie Taylor was appointed secretary in place of T. E. Wardle retired; W. Blundell re-elected treasurer; and T. E. Wardle, lecture secretary. After business meeting, members and friends attended a very successful concert held by the Branch. Literature has steady sale.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—Lyons, H. Graham, and James Allman addressed an attentive audience at the Salmon and Ball, on Sunday morning. At the club in the evening, H. Sparling spoke on "Irish National Poetry," in the course of which he pointed out that some of the best poetry ever written has been composed by working-men. By special request of the audience this lecture will be repeated here in a few weeks time.

HOXTON.—On Sunday evening, a very interesting lecture was given by J. R. Macdonald on "The Signs of the Times." Good discussion after the lecture.

MARYLEBONE.—On Sunday afternoon, we held a very good meeting in Hyde Park, addressed by Mainwaring and Donald. Good sale of literature.—T. C.

MERTON AND MITCHAM.—Kitz and Eden spoke on Mitcham Fair Green last Sunday. Good attendance in our club-room. At night, a full meeting of members of both branches was held to discuss the situation of the branches, and agitation for the district.—F. Kitz.

NORTH LONDON.—On Sunday morning, at Regent's Park, a large audience listened very attentively to Donald's account of the miners' and chainmakers' circumstances; Cantwell and Brookes also spoke. 10s. 3d. was collected for the Propaganda Fund. Good sale of literature.—H. B.

EDINBURGH.—On Wednesday, June 1, in Scientific Hall, Dalkeith, Gilray read an essay on "Socialism," Tuke in the chair. Considerable interest was aroused on the subject. On Saturday, Tuke spoke at Lornhead, and disposed of about a quire of Commonweal. On Sunday afternoon, in Queen's Park, Smith, sen. and jun., Tuke, and Gilray spoke. Some opposition was offered at the close by a man who thought that the parable of the talents told against Socialism. This mistake pointed out, it was shown to the satisfaction of the audience that it was rather a dangerous thing for one to go to the Bible for arguments against Socialism. In the evening, Tuke spoke in the Meadows. Good sale of Commonweal.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday, comrades Pollock and Glasier went to Motherwell—an important industrial town some 14 miles south-west of Glasgow—and addressed a meeting of some 400 working-men, who received their exposition of the labour question with great approval. On Sunday, at 1 o'clock, Curran addressed a good meeting on Jail Square. In the afternoon, Adams gave a lecture on "The Commune of Paris" to the Legislative Independence Branch of the National League, while Glasier gave a lecture on "The Majesty of Law" to Coatbridge Branch of the National League. No meeting was held on Georges' Square on Sunday evening, owing to the police having forbidden meetings of any kind being held there in future.

LEEDS.—This Branch held an open-air meeting on Hunslet Moor last Sunday morning. Comrades Paylor, Maguire, and Braithwaite addressed a very attentive audience. At the close of the meeting, 1s. was collected to help us furnish our new rooms. One quire of Commonweal sold. In the evening, comrade Paylor addressed a large and attentive audience in Vicar's Croft, on the attitude of the London police towards the Socialists. Comrades Maguire and Sollitt also addressed the meeting. At the close 1s. 8d. was collected to help us furnish our room.—F. C.

WALSALL.—On Thursday, several members of the Branch visited Cradley, and addressed the chain-makers on strike. We had a good meeting, and at the close a further list of names were given in towards forming a Branch there. On Saturday, H. Sanders spoke in the Market Place, Walsall. Fair sale of literature.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—On Sunday, June 5, a meeting was held by the Labour League at Howth, a fishing village about nine miles from Dublin. A special excursion steamer was run for the convenience of those attending the meeting. The principles of the League were ably expounded by Hall, Cantwell, Brown, Fitzpatrick, and others. At the close of the meeting more than fifty names were given in to form a Branch in the neighbourhood. Thousands of Socialist leaflets were distributed among the crowd.

THE SOCIALIST UNION.

BRISTOL SECTION.—A meeting was held in the large room of Stephen's Coffee Tavern, 45, Old Market Street, on Thursday, Mr. Blackmore being in the chair. After preliminary business the meeting considered "The Progress of the Socialist Idea for the last Fifty Years." It was shown that the "right" of man to own man was an inevitable outcome of the primitive state of society. Civilisation was an improvement on the old system; but a state of society founded on a competitive basis was not so great a step from the primitive as at first might appear, for although in the former man cannot possess man as property, and, may be, eat him, man does possess man in another way, and in such a manner not all in favour of those possessed. The slave under the old system had the care such as a master would pay to his horse. He would be brought up, and fed sufficiently to keep up his strength, whereas at the present time the worker was often starved out, and more often led a life of semi-starvation. Under the competitive system masters had found it cheaper to hire slaves than to buy them. Competitive civilisation was a state of warfare, and was an improvement on the old more in the freedom which must be the immediate result from it than in what it was in itself. The evils resulting from it had become so patent: just before the passing of the first Factory Acts, the fatality of children was so frightful under it, that the Legislature was bound to take cognisance of it, and in doing so made an onslaught on the so-called "freedom of contract," a precedent which had been repeatedly followed since, and which would be rapidly followed in the future. It was beginning to be seen that the antipodes of the primitive state lay in the direction that the weak should not be oppressed by the strong, which was a recognition of the truth of the Socialist idea, and of the necessity of progressive society travelling in that direction.

NOTTINGHAM SECTION.—Peacock and Proctor addressed a good audience in Sninton Market on Sunday morning. In the evening, Wane, Peacock, and Proctor lectured to a large audience in the Great Market. Commonweal sold well. Collection for propaganda, including morning meeting, 5s. 11d.—T. P.

NORTH ENGLAND SOCIALIST FEDERATION.

I have never known, through the whole course of my experience, any movement that has taken hold of the people with such earnestness as Socialism has done here. Whether it is that the working-men are becoming more intelligent, or that bitter experience has taught them that some change is necessary and that change will have to be brought about by their own action through some definite organisation, and which must put an end to all capitalists and profit-mongers, but certainly the people are taking to Socialism with astonishing rapidity. I spoke at Byker Bridge end last Sunday morning, and when I came to speak of the chain-makers, when I told them of the chains I had seen in the Socialist League office, they listened with marked attention. When I told them the conditions under which those poor wretches have to work, and the price they get for making the chains, several cried "Shame! shame!" I sold at this meeting a good many Commonweal; Donald's article on "Chains and Slavery" took well. I then went to the Sandhill, and had a good sale there. After that, I took the boat to Shields, where I met comrades Brown, Chorton, Wood, and a whole host of others, and nothing would satisfy them but a meeting in the "General Gordon," and a large and enthusiastic meeting we had. I held another meeting in the Market Place at night, where I spoke at some length, and sold all the papers, Donald's article again receiving a considerable amount of praise. Some disappointment was felt at the absence of Mahon in North Shields, but it has been arranged to meet there next Sunday for the purpose of fixing a date for his debate with Johnstone, the secretary of the Shields caucus. I hear they are doing all they can to pack the meeting when it takes place, but the North Shields comrades will not be slow to prevent such work as this. I believe that this debate will do a great deal of good to the Socialist movement.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE O'Brien incident in New York is worth noting. It must be admitted at once that Mr. O'Brien would have injured the present prospects of the cause of Home Rule—that is, more explicitly, the establishment of a semi-independent Irish parliament at Dublin—if he had identified himself with the Land Nationalisers and semi-Socialists of New York. But on the other hand, his refusal has also injured the cause of Irish independence, looking at it from a broader point of view. The Land Nationalisers and other more advanced politicians may well say, Is it a foregone conclusion, then, that all the Irish Parliamentary Party look forward to is an imperfect form of peasant-proprietorship—i.e., the creating of a number of small landlords in place of the few big landlords already existing?

Well, as a matter of fact that is the idea of the parliamentary Irishman; and if he went further than that he would be ahead of the ordinary Irishman—in Ireland, at all events. Nor need we wonder at that. The land question is the side of the question of exploitation which naturally thrusts itself forward in Ireland; and the share that the cottar tenant has in it is a war between his industry on one side and a poor soil and a coarse form of robbery on the other; and any alleviation of his lot will for the time put him in heaven, so to say, and make him a very conservative and property-loving character. All this, of course, is what the parliamentary Irish politician is reckoning on, and consequently he won't trouble himself to even consider the landless labourer who will still remain after the advent of peasant proprietorship, or indeed the future of the peasant proprietor himself, which will, in two words, be ultimate ruin.

Perhaps sometimes we Socialists have been tempted to envy the simplicity of the one-plank platform of the Irish agitator, but such an incident as this of Father M'Glynn versus Mr. O'Brien shows the dull side of it. In fact revolutionists cannot evade the duty of keeping their true aim clearly before them, and asking themselves if it is worth the trouble, and they must accept as a necessary consequence of the carrying out of that duty all the unpopularity and lack of support and jeers at their want of practicality which they are sure to encounter if they go straight to their object.

Meantime a Socialist can hardly help chuckling when he thinks that Father M'Glynn, who has really made a straight revolutionary hit at that terrible revolutionist Mr. O'Brien, may in his turn find himself denounced as a capitalist-saver one of these days: may, or certainly will, unless he moves forward with the times. To-day there can be found respectable people who are moved to indignation by the spectacle of a certain class of landlords exercising their undoubted legal rights to the full; though the greater part of landlords, since they are not driven to act so dramatically, are allowed to do as they please without comment. At some future time not far distant there will be found probably respectable persons who will wish to take away this legal power from all landlords. There, however, the respectable people will stay their advance, for the next step will be the attack on all capital—that is, really, property; and all respectable people have capital in some form or other. Well, so it goes—he that endureth to the end shall be saved.

The triumphant Tories are determined to show us how feeble a barrier Parliament is between any faction that may have crept into power and the liberties of the people. By the time of the date on this number of Commonweal the parliamentary resistance to the Coercion Bill will be at an end, and for all practical purposes it might as well have never been begun. As to Mr. Smith's urgency resolution it was taken sheepishly enough by the House, and was clearly looked upon as a matter of little consequence. And indeed it is not of much consequence, considering what Parliament is.

It may well be hoped that one day the people will take possession for their own use of the noble buildings which their forefathers built in the days when they were striving to break the bonds of feudal tyranny, and had not yet foreseen the straiter bonds of capitalism. All Socialists therefore should join in the protest which Mr. Frederick Harrison made at the meeting of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings against the destructive tomfoolery now going on at Westminster Abbey. It is an easily read token of the sincerity of the conservatism of the bourgeois, when a building, which is still perhaps, in spite of all the degradations it has suffered the most beautiful in Great Britain, is to be subjected to the risk of total destruction, and the certainty of great damage for an idiotic piece of Court humbug that nobody, not even the very flunkies themselves, cares a rush for.

Apropos of this grievous nonsense our readers may have noticed some of them perhaps with disapproval, that there has not much been said about the Jubilee (one is really ashamed to write the word) in the pages of the Commonweal. That is to be explained, I suppose, by the mere contempt with which Socialists look upon the whole subject. But the "great event" of it is so near that one may perhaps say as much as this, that the powers that be are determined to use the opportunity to show what a nuisance the monarchy and court can be as a centre of hypocrisy and corruption, and the densest form of stupidity.

FREE COMPETITION.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

In an article on "Social Experiments" published in the Commonweal of March 5th, I promised to give at some future time a more full account of the difficulties which the competitive form of industry places in the way of co-operative production. The present seems a good time to fulfil my engagement, as the question of co-operation and our attitude as Socialists towards it has been brought up in the issue for June 4. I will start, then, by trying to answer the question, Is co-operative production likely to upset the present system?—I mean, of course, what is generally understood by the term co-operative production. Now, from the societies which already exist or have existed for the purpose of co-operative production I think we may learn that the difficulty does not lie in the producing of goods. It is quite possible and comparatively easy for a body of working men, having the requisite amount of capital, to hire competent men and start a factory for the production of some articles of general use. They can get workmen as skilful as any one else can, and foremen as well able to look after the work and see that it is done properly. But unfortunately the production of good articles is not the chief difficulty about a modern concern; it is the buying of raw material and selling the finished article which requires the special "business faculty" of which so much is made and which gets paid so highly. The result of competition is to render trading very much like gambling. The constant fluctuations in prices, the careful watching and successful foreseeing of which is very often the chief cause of a man's financial success, make it almost impossible to carry on business with any certainty of being able to make both ends meet.

Another great cause of difficulty is the rapidity with which fashions will change. A firm settle down to make a certain class of goods, and behold, by next month nobody will buy them! Some one else has brought out something newer and managed to get it into fashion, and the success for the present is his. The following month, perhaps, he is cut out by a third man; and so it goes on, the element of gambling being uppermost again. Now the faculty which can always see the way things are going to turn and always manage to be on the paying side of these changes, is a comparatively rare one, and consequently can command a high price. Now it seems to me that co-operative productive societies are likely to fail chiefly through want of this faculty in their managers. As a rule they do not start with very large capitals, and cannot afford to give a very high salary to tempt a first-class business man to take the management. And the first-class business man can always get credit and do so well on his own account, that he will only take the management of another concern on condition of receiving a high salary.

It is found sufficiently difficult to keep old established businesses going without some special competitive faculty, and the difficulties are enormously increased with anything just starting. Many readers of the Commonweal will have heard that Mr. Thompson of Halifax has turned his cloth-factory into a co-operative concern. He was lecturing in Oxford last term on his scheme, and I asked him whether he thought there would be any chance of success for a concern started by working men. He said that any business started afresh would have scarcely any chance at all. His business is an old and well-established one, and he is still to remain as manager. If he is right, the only hope for co-operative production would be for a large number of successful employers to voluntarily turn their places into co-operative concerns. Now this is hardly likely to happen, because the nature which as a rule makes a successful business man is not the nature which would give up for the good of the workers generally.

For collective management to be successful there must be some system which can be followed and which only needs revising occasionally. While the present confusion exists in trade it must be managed by individual heads, either as owners or managers, who are not much hampered by a committee.

Take the grocery trade, and let us look at a few forms which competition assumes there. Now sugar is a commodity the price of which is regulated a good deal by chance. Supposing there is a small fall in the wholesale price of sugar amounting to less than a halfpenny per pound. Now it is entirely a question of the strength of competition whether the retail price will be maintained and the additional profit go into the pockets of the grocers, or whether the retail price will come down a halfpenny and so leave perhaps a slight loss for the grocers. Any one of the chief competitors in the town has it in his power to bring down the price and do all the trade out of that extra amount of profit. We have only to remember that all the chief articles of commerce are constantly hanging in the balance, as it were, like the sugar, to realise into what a condition of confusion our industry has got.

This instance shows us that the individual is not free under this system of competition, but that he is practically bound by the actions of his neighbours; if they adulterate an article in order to sell cheaper, he must either do so too or sell at a loss. And if we follow the details of working still further, we see such a display of evil motives, selfishness and meanness that it is fairly astonishing that any one in business should uphold the system. Supposing our grocer has an assistant with good business faculty, he will be constantly afraid lest this man should set up in opposition, consequently he will give him fair wages to keep him in his place. But he will not stay many years; he saves up a little capital, borrows some more, and starts an opposition shop. Henceforward he and his late employer are the greatest of enemies; he will use the meanest tricks in many cases to get customers away from the old shop into his, he will sell some leading article at less than cost price to attract them, and make it up on little things the values of which are not so well known to his customers. All this is justified as good business faculty—"all is fair in love and war," and this is war sure enough.

Let us take another instance of the freedom (?) which exists under this system. In many provincial towns of late years there has been a movement set on foot to close the shops for a half-day's holiday each week, but when it has been tried, generally a few shops refuse to close. What is the result? Why, in most cases the movement fails because the shopkeepers who might be willing to close if every one would, when consequently they could lose no custom by it, are not willing to allow an afternoon's custom to go to their enemies. So we see that the freedom which exists is the freedom of two or three to force all the rest against their wills.

Let us take another example of the spirit of competition, this time in the wholesale trade; here prices are more flexible, more beating down is done, the keen customer beats the merchant down, the less keen has to pay for it. In an iron merchant's business, say he will supply iron to large iron-works or collieries, and also to little blacksmiths. The large works are keen, they know what iron costs, and but for the convenience of being able to get in smaller quantities from the merchant just what sort they want, they would buy from the makers, hence the merchant puts on a small profit to them, but the small blacksmiths in the country are not up to this, they deal always with one merchant and pay pretty much what he asks, always beating him down half a sovereign or so to satisfy their opinion of their own business faculty, the merchant of course putting the same amount on for that purpose. Thus the poorer man who gives the merchant credit for dealing honestly with him has to pay for the wealthier one who trusts no one's honesty, on the principle of serving worst the one who gives him credit for most honesty! This and similar processes lead to what is called the survival of the fittest, which is often another word for the greatest knave.

I think it will be pretty evident by this what the "business faculty" consists in, and also it will be clear that a body of workers trying to start a productive concern and trying to buy and sell in this competitive market is pretty likely to come to grief, unless by a great stroke of luck they happen to get hold of a manager with the aforesaid business faculty, who is willing to give them the benefit of it at a comparatively low figure. Therefore, it seems to me that it will be necessary to be to a large extent independent of the competitive market if co-operative production is to succeed.

I do not wish in any way to throw cold water on to such schemes as are proposed by our comrade J. B. Bright, on the contrary I think with him that very much good, both in helping the propaganda and in general experience and education, will result from the practice of co-operation either in distribution or production, and if the attempts fail they will at least help to convince co-operators that this awful rage of competition must be put a stop to, before any real good can be done.

And now a word to those who always want to know how we are going to obtain and reward this business faculty in a state of Socialism. The answer is simple enough, so simple that the business part of the community will be a long time before they take it in. We shall neither attain it nor reward it at all, for the very good reason that it will be perfectly useless! When competition shall have passed away the relative values of things will be established on a rational principle based on the amount of labour, and possibly partly on the kind of labour needed to produce them, these relative values will be fixed and only revised at intervals. The managing of trade under this system will be so easy that there will be no scarcity of men able to do it, and so no need to reward them outrageously.

I spoke of the kind of labour having an influence in the prices of articles. I meant the pleasantness or otherwise; things the manufacture or obtaining of which necessitate unpleasant or unhealthy employments, would probably be relatively higher priced than now, as probably the workers employed in these trades would work less time for the same reward. I have only touched upon a few of the evils of competition, the great question of over-production would require an article by itself, but I think we must all feel the degrading character of the whole business, and wish to see some better and more noble system established in its place.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

HOW WE LIVE AND HOW WE MIGHT LIVE.

WELL now, what Socialism offers you in place of these artificial famines with their so-called over-production, is, once more, regulation of the markets; supply and demand commensurate; no gambling, and consequently (once more) no waste; not overwork and weariness for the worker one month, and the next no work and terror of starvation, but steady work and plenty of leisure every month; not cheap market-wares, that is to say, adulterated wares, with scarcely any good in them, mere scaffold-poles for building up profits; no labour would be spent on such things as these, which people would cease to want when they ceased to be slaves. Not these, but such goods as best fulfilled the real uses of the consumers would labour be set to make; for profit being abolished, people could have what they wanted, instead of what the profit-grinders at home and abroad forced them to take.

For what I want you to understand is this: that in every civilised country at least, there is plenty for all,—is, or at any rate might be. Even with labour so misdirected as it is at present, an equitable distribution of the wealth we have would make all people comparatively comfortable; but that is nothing to the wealth we might have if labour were not misdirected.

Observe in the early days of the history of man, he was the slave of his most immediate necessities; nature was mighty and he was feeble, and he had to wage constant war with her for his daily food and such shelter as he could get. His life was bound down and limited by this constant struggle; all his morals, laws, religion, are in fact the outcome and the reflexion of this ceaseless toil of earning his livelihood. Time passed, and little by little he grew stronger, every step serving him as a lever to mount the next, till now after all these ages he has almost completely conquered nature, and one would think should now have leisure to turn his thoughts towards higher things than procuring to-morrow's dinner. But, alas! his progress has been broken and halting; and though he has indeed conquered nature and has her forces under his control to do what he will with, he still has himself to conquer, he still has to think how he will best use those forces which he has mastered. At present he uses them blindly, foolishly, as one driven by mere fate. It would almost seem as if some phantom of the ceaseless pursuit of food which was once the master of the savage was still hunting the civilised man; who toils in a dream, as it were, haunted by mere dim unreal hopes, born of vague recollections of the days gone by. Out of that dream we must wake, and face things as they really are. The conquest of nature is complete, may we not say, and now our business is and has for long been the organisation of man, who wields the forces of nature. Nor till this is attempted at least shall we ever be free of that terrible phantom of fear of starvation which, with its brother devil, desire of domination, drives us into injustice, cruelty and dastardliness of all kinds: to cease to fear our fellows and learn to depend on them, to do away with competition and build up co-operation, is our one necessity.

Now, to get closer to details, you probably know that every man in civilisation is worth, so to say, more than his skin; working, as he must work, socially, he can produce more than will keep himself alive and in fair condition; and this has been so for many centuries, from the time, in fact, when warring tribes began to make their conquered enemies slaves instead of killing them; and of course his capacity of producing these extras has gone on increasing faster and faster, till to-day one man will weave, for instance, as much cloth in a week as will clothe a whole village for years: and the real question of civilisation has always been what are we to do with this extra produce of labour—a question which the phantom, fear of starvation, and its fellow, desire of domination, has driven men to answer pretty badly always, and worst of all perhaps in these present days, when the extra produce has grown with such prodigious speed. The practical answer has always been for man to struggle with his fellow for private possession of undue shares of these extras, and all kinds of devices have been employed by those who found themselves in possession of the power of taking them from others to keep those whom they had robbed in perpetual subjection, and these latter, as I have already hinted, had no chance of resisting this fleecing as long as they were few and scattered, and consequently could have little sense of their common oppression. But now that, owing to the very pursuit of these undue shares of profit, or extra earnings, men have become more dependent on each other for production, and have been driven, as I said before, to combine together for that end more completely, the power of the workers, that is to say of the robbed or fleeced class, has enormously increased, and it only remains for them to understand that they have this power. When they do that they will be able to give the right answer to the question what is to be done with the extra products of labour over and above what will keep the labourer alive to labour: which answer is, that the worker will have all that he produces and not be fleeced at all: and remember that he produces collectively, and therefore he will do effectively what work is required of him according to his capacity, and of the produce of that work he will have what he needs; because, you see, he cannot use more than he needs, he can only waste it.

If this arrangement seems to you preposterously ideal, as it well may, looking at our present condition, I must back it up by saying that when men are organised so that their labour is not wasted, they will be relieved from the fear of starvation and the desire of domination, and will have freedom and leisure to look round and see what they really do need. Now something of that I can conceive for my own self, and I will lay my ideas before you, so that you may compare them with your own, asking you always to remember that the very differences in men's capacities and desires, after the common need of food and shelter is satisfied, will make it easier to deal with their desires in a communal state of things. What is it that I need, therefore, which my surrounding circumstances can give me—my dealings with my fellow men—setting aside inevitable accidents which co-operation and forethought cannot control, if there be such?

Well, first of all I claim good health; and I say that a vast proportion of people in civilisation scarcely even know what that means. To feel mere life a pleasure; to enjoy the moving one's limbs and exercising one's bodily powers; to play, as it were, with sun and wind and rain; to rejoice in satisfying the due bodily appetites of a human animal without fear of degradation or sense of wrong-doing: yes, and therewithal to be well-formed, straight-limbed, strongly-knit, expressive of countenance—to be, in a word, beautiful,—that also I claim. If we cannot have this claim satisfied we are but poor creatures after all; and I claim it in the teeth of those terrible doctrines of asceticism, which, born of the despair of the oppressed and degraded, have been for so many ages used as instruments for the continuance of that oppression and degradation.

And I believe that this claim for a healthy body for all of us carries with it all other due claims: for who knows where the seeds of disease which even rich people suffer from were first sown: from the luxury of an ancestor, perhaps; yet often, I suspect, from his poverty. And for the poor: I have heard a distinguished surgeon say that the poor suffer always from one disease—hunger; and at least I know this, that if a man is overworked in any degree he cannot enjoy the sort of health I am speaking of; nor can he if he is continually chained to one dull round of mechanical work, with no hope at the other end of it; nor if he lives in continual sordid anxiety for his livelihood, nor if he is ill-housed, nor if he is deprived of all enjoyment of the natural beauty of the world, nor if he has no amusement to quicken the flow of his spirits from time to time: all these things, which touch more or less directly on his bodily condition, are born of the claim I make to live in good health; indeed, I suspect that these good conditions must have been in force for several generations before a population in general will be really healthy, as I have hinted above; but also I doubt not that in the course of time they would, joined to other conditions, of which more hereafter, gradually breed such a population, living in enjoyment of animal life at least, happy therefore, and beautiful according to the beauty of their race; though you must remember that the very variations in the races of men are caused by the conditions under which they live, and though in these rougher parts of the world we lack some of the advantages of climate and surroundings, yet if we were working for livelihood and not for profit we might easily neutralise many of the disadvantages of our climate, at least enough to give due scope to the full development of our race.

PAUPER EMIGRANTS TO AMERICA.—NEW YORK.—The Commissioners of Immigration have decided to send back to Ireland sixteen families, comprising nearly 100 persons, assisted hither by Mr. Wynne, secretary of the Killarney Emigration Society, arriving on an Inman steamer a few days ago. The agent had paid the passage, and given each family from 15 to 20 dollars besides. In deciding, the Commissioners had before them the recent correspondence between the British Minister, Sir L. S. West, and Mr. Bayard. The former called upon Mr. Bayard for information whether emigrants assisted hither by public funds, with the assurance of support by friends in this country, would be permitted to enter. The Secretary replied that so far as permission to land was concerned the law was clear, and the officers charged with its execution were required to examine each case, and with them rested the decision whether the person seeking entrance into the United States should be permitted to land. No general assurance could be given covering the point raised. In view of this policy and these laws, concluded Mr. Bayard, the United States Government could not fail to look with disfavour and concern upon the sending to this country by foreign governmental agencies and at the public cost persons not only unlikely to develop the qualities of thrift and self-support, but sent here because it was assumed that they would have friends here able to support them. On the strength of this letter, the Commissioners decided that the families should be sent back to Ireland. Then the families were examined one by one, and it was proved that they all were pauper immigrants. They will be put on board the steamer on Saturday unless the question of the Board's authority be tested in the Courts.

SONNET.

Who would live on in such a world as this,
Where gilded shams usurp the place of Truth;
Where wrong is robed in purple, and men hiss
At scorned Justice as a thing uncouth;
Where poison cells of lust are delved deep,
And Love's clear stream defiled with foulest spite;
Where Selfishness on softest down doth sleep,
And generous hearts bankrupt their owners quite;
Where Honesty, a beggar, hugs his rags,
Splashed with the mud from Fraud's rich carriage wheels;
Where Law, the cunning harlot, daily brags
That crime can buy, if gold the bargain seals;
Who would live on that sorrow did not sway
To strive towards changing this dark night to day?

GRASE THE FAT SOW.

An' not a bit more ta tha people I mix wi',
An' keeps all tha rest for ta grase tha fat sow, etc.

But while I were prayin' they stole all our common,
Because it were wanted ta grase tha fat sow, etc.

Lawyers, merchants and such folk, who properly and originally earn nothing for the public, being only a kind of gamblers who play with one another for the labours of the poor.—Sir Wm. Petty.

While the past fifty years have been such an uncommonly happy time for the rich, it is impossible to say so much for the poor. Out of the thirty-six millions, or thereabouts, forming the population of the United Kingdom, six-sevenths, or thirty millions, have so narrow a margin between income and the necessities of bare sustenance that they cannot pay the annual cost of their children's education, and are obliged to have it spread through all their lives by means of rates and taxes.—J. A. Picton.

An equal distribution of riches through any country ever constitutes its happiness. Great wealth in the possession of one stagnates, and extreme poverty with another keeps him in unambitious indigence; but the moderately rich are generally active: not too far removed from poverty to fear its calamities, nor too near extreme wealth to slacken the nerve of labour, they remain still between both in a state of continual fluctuation. How impolitic, therefore, are the laws which promote the accumulation of wealth among the rich; more impolitic still in attempting to increase the depression of poverty.—Oliver Goldsmith.

ECONOMY.—Universal economy would kill the goose that lays the golden egg. Men can "retrench" until a mud hut, a wooden bench, a cup of corn meal and a pan to bake a hoe-cake in, is all he needs. But what becomes of all the trades and occupations which furnished people with the "needless" luxuries of life? What becomes of progress, refinement, education? Individual economy is only successful when it exceeds the economy of those surrounding the economiser. If he can live on less than the worker's usual pittance, in time he gains an advantage over his fellow-toilers; but if they all economise the next successful man must starve himself just a little more than the first one has done. Economy is a fraud; it is a species of robbery. The brain, heart, mind and body are defrauded of their natural rights and chances for development, that a few individuals may revel in excess of enjoyments. The world's resources are limitless; the skill and strength of men and the wonders of science are inexhaustible. Why should we go without a single article that would add to our comfort, enlightenment or enjoyment?—Lizzie M. Swank.

NOTES.

SAID Mr. Champion, the barbarians are within and not without the so-called pale of modern civilised society. They have been engendered by it. Let the cultured and leisured classes look to it, before these barbarians rise in all the might and misery of their wrongs and with avenging hands bring red ruin and destruction to that society that has fed and fattened on their sufferings.

It may be, as was asserted, that there is much Socialism among the educated classes, but so long as it remains hidden it is of small value. Let the educated classes make their Socialism manifest in unmistakable manner, let them labour with all their might for its realisation.

To-day it is the despised street-preaching Socialist that bears the brunt of the battle, who endures persecution and suffers imprisonment for the advocacy of its cause.

If there is so much Socialism among the cultured and leisured, let them come from behind the "screen" and show it to the world. Let them take up its cross and bear it.

Socialism has too few advocates, but would soon have many did the cultured and leisured get to work and teach its principles.

Socialists are rebels against society as it is to-day; they rebel not in silence, wherever they go they declaim against it.

A cultured, leisured and silent rebel runs no risk of persecution or imprisonment; but did all the silent rebels proclaim themselves rebels, the social revolution would be nearer. H. A. B.

C A writer (anonymous) in our contemporary Justice, has found out a new definition of Anarchism. According to our friend Anarchism means abstention (for whatever reason) from parliamentary action. I fear this new definition is scarcely exact enough to satisfy either Anarchist or Collectivist.

Our friend also writes as if the Socialist League had made some new departure at the late Conference. He had better read again the resolution of the Conference as printed in the Commonweal, which will set him right in this matter, since it asserts the indisputable fact that the policy hitherto pursued by the League has been one of abstention from parliamentary action.

I must venture to call the end of his note as to the constitution of the Council of the League impertinent, since the domestic concerns of a body with which he has nothing to do, do not concern the writer. However, it may be as well to remind our friends that while our Council sits in London we have Branches in various parts of Britain; who cannot possibly send up one of their members to sit on the Council once a-week. A real delegate Council would be impossible under such conditions, and a bogus one would not be desired by a body like the Socialist League, which has always shown what I must consider a very laudable objection to "bossing." The Albert Medal founded 25 years ago by the Society of Arts, and presented to such men as Rowland Hill, Wheatstone, Whitworth, Siemens, Bessemer, Armstrong, Liebig, Hofman, Lesseps, Holker, Doulton, and Pasteur, is proposed to be given to the Queen in this Jubilee year. If ever there were any good object served in providing the men above-named with a circular plate of metal called a medal, that good object will be entirely eclipsed by the bestowal of that which is awarded for "distinguished merit in promoting arts, manufactures, and commerce," on an old woman who has done nothing to deserve the insane, debasing, and unnecessary flattery with which she is inundated.

Personally we regard her much the same as many other women, and we have no doubt she is well informed of the Socialist movement in Germany,—she, as many a hundred of the trained men and women (with brains) who compose the thieving classes, or to put it a little milder, the predatory classes, must estimate the twaddle and fuss now made at its true value.

We know many of these people who live upon unearned profit and increment, who acknowledge that the people who provide them the means by which they live are mostly fools, and as long as they are allowed to gather in profits will do so, for the very good reason that until the workers show by united action that they will allow this system to exist no longer, it would be absurd to change the condition in which we now live, that is until an organisation of honest and true workers come forward and claim their own.

The best effort we can make, therefore, is to educate and prove our position to the masses. Labour should unite as it has never yet united to withstand the common enemy, the profit-thief. Strikes should be made no more possible, but a strike far-reaching and universal should be made on behalf of any section or separate trade by the whole of the workers throughout our country. When this is made possible, then the battle we are now fighting will be half won. A.

SOCIALISM FROM THE ROOT UP.

CHAPTER XIX.

SCIENTIFIC SOCIALISM.—CONSTANT AND VARIABLE CAPITAL.

MARX goes on to develop further the process by which the capitalist exploits the labourer under the present system of wages and capital.

We now come to the two instruments which the capitalist uses in his exploitation of labour, and which are named constant and variable capital; constant capital being the raw material and instruments of production, and variable the labour power to be employed in producing on and by means of the former.

The labourer, as we have seen, adds a value to the raw material upon which he works; but by the very act of adding a new value he preserves the old; in one character he adds new value, in another he merely preserves what already existed. He affects this by working in a particular way, e.g., by spinning, weaving, or forging, that is, he transforms things which are already utilities into new utilities proportionately greater than they were before.

"It is thus," says Marx, "that the cotton and spindle, the yarn and the loom, the iron and the anvil become constituent elements of a new use-value."

That is, in order to acquire this new value, the labour must be directed to a socially useful end, to a general end, that is, to which the general labour of society is directed, and the value added is to be measured by the average amount of labour power expended; i.e., by the duration of the average time of labour.

Marx says: "We have seen that the means of production transfer value to the new product so far only as during the labour-process they lose value in the shape of their old use-value. The maximum loss of value that they can suffer in the process is plainly limited by the amount of the original value with which they came into the process, or in other words by the labour-time necessary for their production. Therefore, the means of production can never add more value to the product than they themselves possess independently of the process in which they assist. However useful a given kind of raw material, or a machine, or other means of production may be, though it may cost £150, or say 500 days labour, yet it cannot under any circumstances add to the value of the product more than £150. Its value is determined not by the labour process into which it enters as a means of production, but by that out of which it has issued as a product. In the labour process it only serves as a mere use-value, a thing with useful properties, and could not therefore transfer any value to the product unless it possessed such value previously."

The matter is succinctly put as follows: "The means of production on the one hand, labour-power on the other, are merely the different modes of existence which the value of the original capital assumed when from being money it was transformed into the various factors of the labour process. That part of capital which is represented by the means of production, by the raw material, auxiliary material, and the instruments of labour, does not in the process of production undergo any quantitative alteration of value. I therefore call it the constant part of capital, or more shortly constant capital."

At first sight it might be thought that the wear and tear of the machinery, and the seeming disappearance of part of the auxiliary material (as e.g., the mordants used in dyeing cloth or yarn, or the gums, etc., used in textile printing) contradict this statement as to the alteration of value; but on closer view it will be seen that the above wear and tear and apparent consumption enter into the new product just as much as the visible raw material does; neither are really consumed, but transformed.

In the following chapters Marx enters into an elaborate and exhaustive analysis of the rate of surplus value, i.e., of the rate at which the creation of surplus value takes place; and he also deals with the important subject of the duration of the working-day. But as this is after all a matter of detail, in spite of its very great interest and importance we must omit it, as it would carry us beyond the scope of these articles.

Marx distinguishes between absolute and relative "surplus value;" the absolute being the product of a day's labour over and above the necessary subsistence of the workman, whatever the time necessary for the production of a definite amount of product may be. The relative "surplus-value" on the other hand is determined by the increased productivity of labour caused by new inventions, machinery, increased skill, either in manipulation, or the organisation of labour, by which the time necessary for the production of the labourer's means of subsistence may be indefinitely shortened.

It will be seen once again by all this, that whatever instruments may be put into the hands of the labourer to bring about a result from his labour, in spite of all pretences to the contrary, the one instrument necessary to the capitalist is the labourer himself living under such conditions that he can be used as a mere instrument for the production of profit. The tools, machinery, factories, means of exchange, etc., are only intermediate aids for putting the living machine into operation.

E. BELFORT BAX and WILLIAM MORRIS.

'COMMON-SENSE SOCIALISM.'

THE first word of the above title is usually a sort of danger signal to the wary reader to avoid boredom and confusion. "Common-sense" as applied to knotty questions usually meaning the ignoring of the main issue, or the putting forward of a remedy difficult to apply and useless when applied. This is so well understood by persons with not more than the average amount of time for throwing away on futile and foolish literature, that the title of this book will probably prevent many people from looking into it at all. This is a pity, although before the end of the book the author justifies this well-grounded fear—a pity, because two-thirds of it or more, which is devoted to the criticism of the present state of things, and the remedies proposed by non-Socialists and semi-Socialists, is on the whole clearly put and well reasoned. The author points out the growing discontent, the insufficiency of the reward of labour; the futility as remedies of thrift and temperance, of preaching Malthusianism, of land nationalisation, peasant proprietorship, etc. But then having condemned capitalism by showing its inevitable results, and having condemned all the "tinkering" methods of reform which we Socialists know so bitterly well, he puts forward his own nostrum, which, after all this labouring of the mountain, turns out to be one of the smallest and feeblest of mice ever brought forth. The competition, which he sees very clearly to be producing a condition of industrial production which will end in a dead-lock, is to be checked artificially; and how? By regulating the hours of labour in factories where machinery is used!

For he expressly excepts field labour, the building trades, etc., which etc., by-the-by, must include at present at least, the labour of the coal-brewers and our hapless friends the chain-makers.

It is true he adds to this "remedy" some sort of semi-Georgeite land-tax (having argued well and clearly against Mr. George in an earlier chapter), and the restriction on heritage usually advocated by those who take up that form of tinkering, as also a tax on speculation; but he does not seem to set any great store by these latter remedies, his great invention being the limitation of the day's work in machine-using factories and workshops.

What lies at the bottom of this curious aberration seems to be an ingrained tendency in the author to utopianism. Mr. Kempner seems incapable of conceiving of the class-struggle, or the historical evolution of industrialism, or of understanding that the real point at issue is when and how the workers shall emerge from their condition of pupillage and be masters of their own destinies.

In spite of all this the book may be recommended to young Socialists, as the destructive part of it is, once more, clear and well reasoned, and the would-be constructive part so feeble that it is scarcely possible that anybody could be misled by it, or attracted to it.

It is worth while to note apropos of the attempt some persons make to draw a hard and fast line between Socialism and Communism, that Mr. Kempner uses the latter word in the sense that it is used in the 'Manifesto' of Marx and Engels, of 1847. A Communist is with him one who advocates the communisation or nationalisation of the raw material and instruments of labour and distribution. W. M.

SOCIALISM IN THE WEST END.

On Saturday afternoon, at the French Hall, St. James's Restaurant, Piccadilly, H. H. Champion lectured on Socialism to a middle-class audience, Stepniak in the chair. The room was crowded to excess, and the address was listened to with interest. Mr. Champion stated that he was speaking solely on his own responsibility, though he believed that many, if not all, Socialists would agree with what he had to say. The first step was to realise the amount of suffering that existed. When a man of sincerity understood the foundation of misery on which modern civilisation was built he was unable to prevent himself becoming a Socialist. The returns of the Registrar-General show that the material conditions in which the poorer classes have to live are such that their lives are shortened, in some cases to such an extent that the rich live twice as long as the poor. The children of the poor are to an alarming extent insufficiently fed; and as the result of careful enquiry last winter it was found that in the poorer Board Schools one-third of the children were insufficiently clad and shod. In winter in the East-end and other poor districts in London half the males are out of work. In spite of all this poverty, the poor have to pay rent at a higher rate per cubic foot than the rich in the West-end. It is not uncommon for a poor family to have to pay a quarter of its total income to the landlord, while one-fifth or one-sixth is the usual proportion. The sanitary condition of these exorbitantly rented houses was shown to be abominable by the commissioners appointed by Lord Salisbury for enquiring into the housing of the poor, and yet all that was done was to pass an Act giving the tenant of the unsanitary den, with an income of perhaps fifteen shillings a-week, the power to raise a civil action against the landlord, the initial expenses of which would cost him perhaps a month's income. No such action has yet been raised; one might venture to foretell that no such action ever will be raised. The position of working women especially calls for comment. Samuel Morley, of chapel-building renown, bought hosiery from middlemen who paid their women workers at the rate of nine shillings a-week. Deduct half-a-crown or three shillings for rent, and you leave tenpence a-day for the women to supply themselves with food and clothing. How can it be done? Bryant and May, Limited, paid last half year twenty per cent. dividend on their capital, and earned this profit, among other ways, by making women make match-boxes at 2½d. per gross, the women having to find their own work-room, firing, and paste. In London three thousand shopwomen are killed yearly by diseases brought on by the long hours they have to stand and run about.

These are some of the miseries to which the poor must submit. Under such material conditions who can wonder that some of the poor are drunken and vicious. The wonder is not that they are so bad as they are, but that they are as good as they are. The gin-shop is the poor man's drawing-room, and hence it is that he so often goes there. The rich are able to save now £250,000,000 per annum, in spite of the bad times. What are the middle classes going to do under the circumstances? One thing is certain—this state of things cannot last. Left alone, the poor will become poorer and poorer; those who have nothing to lose will form an overwhelming portion of the population, and a revolt may be expected of such an extent that the world's history cannot parallel. On the other hand, there may be yet time for the middle classes to enter the field of battle and help the workers to a peaceful transformation of society. It is not only to the sense of fear that Socialists appeal when they address the propertied classes; they believe that there is no nobler career for a middle-class man than for him to aid in the peaceful transformation of our present society into a co-operative commonwealth. If any one thought that Socialism was not the remedy, they should come and explain what they conceived to be the remedy.

At the close of the lecture a few questions were asked. A somewhat excited person—a clergyman, I thought—championed Samuel Morley the chapel-builder. The audience seemed to be bored by the reverend gentleman. A. K. D.

In his new book on 'State Purchase of Railways,' Mr. Waring says:—"Government activity in the acquisition of railways has increased very much in quite recent years. In 1875 there were on the Continent 69,246 miles of railway, of which 14,268 miles, or about 20 per cent., belonged to Government. Seven years later the mileage had risen to 88,782, of which 32,663 miles, or about 36 per cent., were in the hands of the Government. Further acquisitions since 1882 have placed about 50 per cent. of the continental lines under the management of the State. In Germany the transfer of the entire railway system to the Government is nearly complete, and in Belgium it is only a question of time. Out of sixteen continental Governments twelve are proprietors of railways."

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

A sliding scale for the regulation of wages has been signed between the representatives of Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan & Co. and the men employed at their Cleveland Steel Works. The sliding scale is to be in operation for two years.

The strike in the iron shipbuilding trade in Belfast continues. About 6000 persons have now been upwards of six weeks idle and a large proportion of them are in a most destitute condition. Several efforts at an agreement by arbitration have failed, and the men still firmly declare they must receive their wages weekly else they will not return to the shipyards.

The General Committee of the Iron Trades Employers' Association have decided to place the funds of the Association at the disposal of the Executive Committee to expend as they may see fit for the assistance of the employers in connection with the strike at Bolton. When will the workers make common cause in like manner, recognising that an injury to one is the concern of all?

A local auctioneer, who had occasion to clear some premises the other day, came upon a mass of interesting papers in reference to foreign-made articles, chiefly scissors, brought to Sheffield to the order of Sheffield houses. These were mainly invoices of goods, and they proved—some two dozen of them shown to me—that the business in foreign scissors and other kinds of cutlery was very considerable indeed, and engaged in by merchants and manufacturers who were not supposed to encourage foreign work.—The Engineer.

FORTH BRIDGE.—The men at the Forth Bridge, owing to the great number of accidents that have recently taken place, have made a demand for one penny an hour more wages. The dispute has been going on for some days and a strike is threatened, though the masters state that they will bring surplus labour from the Tay Bridge, which is now nearly completed. The contractors want to deal with each workman separately, but it is to be hoped the men will hold together and not allow the bosses to manipulate them.

The award in the wages dispute in the West Cumberland coal trade was issued last week. The umpire finds that the wages for the quarter preceding April 1st were after the rate of 6½ per cent. above the fixed standard, and as this was an advance on the previous quarter, the men are entitled to receive wages at the same rate, because there is no fall in the price of coal of a full 1½d. per ton below the point which caused the advance. The wages, therefore, remain at 6½ per cent. above the standard.

THE STRIKE OF CHAIN-MAKERS.—A meeting of chain-makers was held on June 10 in the Salvation Army Barracks, Cradley Heath, under the presidency of Mr. Thomas Homer. The chairman said that certain masters had not been paying the list price for work executed. He believed that, let them work at whatever price they might, the masters would not be satisfied, but would still try and force reductions upon them. The following subscriptions were announced: from Bristol, £2; Colonel Stewart, £15; Mrs. Jope, 15s. It was resolved to continue the strike.

The Preston Operative Spinners' Association have issued an address in which they say:—"The ring of New York and Liverpool are cornering cotton to such an extent that the master cotton spinners of Lancashire and adjoining counties are earnestly engaged in agitating the trade to run short time, their object being to crush out of existence the gambling cotton speculators, who hamper and worry the trade to such a ruinous degree that the margin between cotton and yarn is approaching a miserably low figure. We feel it our duty to fight on the side of the employer shoulder to shoulder, against the common enemy of our trade, the gambling speculators."

On Saturday afternoon a delegate meeting of Mid and East Lothian miners was held in the Scientific Hall, Dalkeith, Mr. W. Holman, Niddrie, presiding, to consider the claim of the miners employed by the Clippens Oil Co. for remuneration for the carrying of propwood, consequent upon a change in the internal working of the mine known as the "long wall system," which is alleged to involve more labour and an extra risk of accident. After a long discussion the meeting agreed to recommend that the Clippens' miners adopt the five days a-week system with a view to arriving at a satisfactory settlement of the dispute, failing which that the County Board support the men should circumstances necessitate the extreme measure of a strike.

At Wood Green there is a large sweet-factory known as Barrett's Factory, at which a large number of persons are employed. Besides those working in the factory, women are supplied with work at their own homes, in making up and packing sweets. They are obliged to fetch the materials and goods from the factory, and carry back the finished packages themselves. For this work the pay is from 1½d. to 2½d. per gross of small packets. By the most attentive toil this cannot be earned under at least an hour. This is a parallel case with that of the match-box makers. It is not known whether the proprietors make 22½ per cent. on their capital as Bryant and May, Limited, are reported to do, but they are doing a "tremendous" trade. I could not ascertain the wages paid to those working in the factory, but one can form an idea from the above of what it might be.—P. C. W.

NEW TREDEGAR, MONMOUTH.—There is a serious misunderstanding about the price of cutting the 3-feet seam in Elliott's pit, New Tredegar, which it is considered must now be determined. The vein is only three feet thick with a bottom of fourteen inches, which makes it much more difficult for the miner. The price paid is only the same as in the old pit, which the workmen say is very unfair. A first-class workman can only earn 17s. 6d. per week, out of which he has to pay for blasting powder. Mr. P. Jones, the overseer, has visited the place several times, and when he brought the matter before the Sliding Scale Board, he was told that it was not understood that there was any misunderstanding. The workmen are determined to have a settlement. They are willing to submit to arbitration, but if that is not accepted, then a notice of termination of contract will be handed in. Later.—It has been determined by the workmen that a month's notice be given for the completion of all contracts, to end the 30th June.—Tarlan-y-Gweithawr.

THE STRIKE IN THE BOLTON IRON TRADE.—On Monday the ironworkers of Bolton entered upon the fifth week of the strike, which has been begun with a view to getting a return of the reduction made in wages 16 months ago to the extent of about 7½ per cent. As a consequence of the strike some hundreds of non-society hands are now idle, and it is estimated that altogether nearly 2000 men are out of employment. The society men state that assistance is coming in from near and far, and that they will be in a position for some weeks to keep up the full rate of strike pay. The mayor of Bolton (Mr. Ald. Fletcher) was much disappointed at the failure of the conference brought about by him between employers and employed, and will try to bring representatives of the contending parties together again, with a view to an agreement or understanding being arrived at by which the men may resume work.

THREATENED STRIKE OF MINERS IN SOUTH YORKSHIRE.—At a meeting of the Executive of the Yorkshire Miners' Association, held at the Miners' Hall, Barnsley, on Saturday, under the presidency of Mr. Cowey, the dispute at Monk Bretton Colliery, one of the largest in South Yorkshire, and the decision of the men to give in their notices was considered at some length. A deputation from the men employed at the colliery attended before the executive, and the following resolution was passed:—"That the Monk Bretton case be left in the hands of the officials of the association to arrive at an amicable settlement, if that is at all possible, between now and next Council meeting. That Mr. B. Pickard write to Mr. Pepper, sen., stating the facts of the case, and that the matter go before the district for their consideration and decision as to whether the men go out on strike or not." Mr. B. Pickard, M.P., states that the officials are opposed to a strike, but the men are very determined and declare they will send in their notices.

The North Yorkshire and Cleveland Miners' Association held their sixteenth annual demonstration and gala on Wednesday week. Addresses were delivered from a platform to an appreciative assembly. Mr. Joseph Toyn, agent and president of the Cleveland Miners' Association, presided. Mr. Joseph Arch was one of the speakers, and the following resolution was passed:—"This meeting, believing (1) that the present system of land tenure is detrimental to the interests of the nation, and (2) that decentralisation of government is necessary to enable Parliament to deal with this and other questions of national importance, is of opinion that the reform of the land laws and the question of local self-government should receive the earnest and speedy attention of the Government, and calls upon them to introduce into Parliament at the earliest possible moment Bills dealing in a comprehensive manner with these most important subjects." A resolution condemning the Crimes Bill was also passed.

The short time project in cotton spinning is being strongly supported in Oldham, Ashton, and surrounding districts. In Rochdale all the limited spinning companies have signed in favour of the proposal of the Manchester Cotton Spinners' Association. It is now stated that the mills in Darwen will soon close entirely. At Church and Accrington it is understood the mills have agreed to support the united movement. In several directions lessened production on a free scale has already commenced. In addition to a long stoppage at Whitsuntide, the following companies will close entirely the whole of next week:—Prince of Wales, 68,500 spindles; Tonge Vale, 55,392 spindles; Abbey, 45,100 spindles. The Star Company (103,536 spindles) is still closed. The large spinning mills of Messrs. H. Whittaker and Sons, Royton, have begun to work three days a-week. The Oldham Twist Company, Hollinwood, have stopped for an indefinite period eight pairs of mules. At Church, Messrs. Watson have begun to run half time, and Messrs. B. and R. Walmsley have closed one mill. Short time in spinning and weaving is reported from Smallbridge, near Rochdale.

A meeting of the Heckmondwike Auxiliary of the English and Scotch Carpet-Weavers' Association was held at the Mechanics' Institute and Club, Heckmondwike, on June 8th, Mr. F. Fisher being elected to the chair. There was a fairly good attendance of weavers—one of the best that has been held for some time. The deputation to the joint meeting of masters and men, held at Carlisle last Friday, gave their report, the first speaker being Mr. Joseph Lodge. He mentioned that the proposition upon the masters' programme of a reduction of 10 per cent., and also of a lowering in the price of tying on short lengths in broad looms, had been abandoned on the ground of informality, no intimation of such reductions having been previously given to the Weavers' Association. The only propositions of the weavers granted were to pay for half yards, and that the 1d. to the shilling for winding be paid 2d. per yard extra. Mr. Goodall, the other delegate, having spoken, the report was eventually adopted, and several suggestions were made for the better government of shop committees, etc., also to offer different facilities to the weavers for weighing off at Messrs. Kelley's.

FRANCE.

At the Hotel de Ville on Wednesday last week the Socialist Municipal Councillors of Paris placed before the sitting a motion "inviting the Director of Works to proceed immediately to the opening of the greatest possible number of work-yards, to take all possible hygienic measures to assure the health of the population and those employed in the works," etc. This motion has not yet received full consideration and discussion at the Hotel de Ville; when it does, the discussion will assuredly be a lively one.

MARSEILLES.—L'Intransigeant says, "This evening (June 9th) at the meeting-place of the Union of Labour Syndicates, a preliminary meeting relative to the formation of a labour-fund has taken place, the municipality and the General Councillors representing the canton of Marseilles, taking part in the same. The formation of a labour-fund was agreed upon, and the mayor has promised the moral and financial support of the town. A committee will be named for the elaboration of the scheme, the members to be composed of Municipal Councillors and those belonging to the Syndicates."

LE CREUSOT (SAONE-ET-LOIRE).—The Cri gives in one of its latest issues some information concerning the situation of the miners at Le Creusot. At present, it seems, the mines only employ below ground 150 workers at the most, under the pretext that there is scarcely any coal to be extracted now. These 150 slaves are bound to extract more than 580 tonnes of coal in the twenty-four hours; their work comes to one-third beyond what they were accustomed to some time before, and their wages from 75 to 50 centimes less per day, the pay averaging formerly 4 fr. 75 c. and the maximum now being 4 fr. 25 c. per day. In some branches of the work the wages from 3 fr. 50 c. are lowered to 2 fr. 50 c. These miners, it seems, are in happy possession of a Watrin for an overseer, to use a word coined by the foreign Socialist journals since the execution of that hero.

MEHUN-SUR-YEVRE.—The syndicate of porcelain-workers of Mehun thank the syndicates of fellow-workers who have kindly sent subscriptions to the strikers. The strike, finishing in a demi-victory, leaves on the street some five-and-twenty men with families absolutely without resources.

BELGIUM.

In the Charleroi coal basin most of the strikers have gone back to work, with many a fair promise of reform and attention to their needs from the Liberals ringing in their ears. Wherever they return to their former work, the most intelligent, the most active among them being considered as the "leaders," have been dismissed pitilessly. So much for the "good faith" of the capitalist—and so much for the "universal strike" that was to bring great things with it. "Thanks to the good sense of the Belgian workers, work has recommenced," says one of the bourgeois journals, rubbing its hands with sleek satisfaction.

"The Belgian coal industry is a question of life and death. Its existence depends upon cheap production. It has keen competitors in German collieries on one side and French on the other, though it has itself been organising an opposition to the English trade in the direction of exports. The nature of the mines renders the extraction of coal costly in the way of machinery and waste, so that a low price can only be maintained by cheap labour. Belgium has a dense population, and though the people are intelligent enough, they have yet to become acquainted with correct ideas on the subject of their own industry. In their ignorance they give too much heed to the doctrines of Socialists and Anarchists."—M. André in the 'Colliery Guardian'.—Ignorant truly! Not to see the overwhelming importance of an industry that in order to keep itself going must reduce them to mere starvation! But, Messieurs the Belgian Capitalists, what is to be done? You can it seems work your mines with half-dead men, a fact which surely redounds to your ingenuity, and your usefulness as Captains of Industry; but not even your ingenuity can work them with men wholly dead. Don't you wish it could? Surely in that case the governments would issue game licenses to kill for that purpose, not partridges, but men. O you damned scoundrels!—W. M.

[Branches, members, and readers might easily do a great deal to assist in rendering more complete this weekly record of the Labour Struggle. Every one should send any information in their possession to the SUB-EDITOR at this Office, by Tuesday in each week, marking envelope "Labour Struggle".]

NORTHUMBRIAN NOTES.

THE strike being now a thing of the past, the affairs in Northumberland are resuming their usual aspect. Many of the pits are not at work yet, but there is little reason to fear that any of the trade of the district was lost during the strike. Amongst the men, however, there is a bitter feeling that their agents (as they call the leading officials of the Union) are very much to blame for the failure. At some collieries the men are threatening to leave the Miners' Union, so much are they disgusted with it. This, however, would be a terrible mistake. They should stick to their union, make it stronger than ever, and above all make their officials servants—not masters as they are now and have been.

During the past 16 years the miners' wages in Northumberland have been reduced fully 45 per cent. The miners get 15s. 9d. now for the same work that brought 30s. in 1874. This gives a better indication of the "National Progress" than Messrs. Giffen and Mulhall's figures. These are the dry unquestioned facts about one of the largest and most important trades in the country.

Some miners want to know why Mr. Burt's salary should not be reduced at the same rate as their wages. At the annual meeting of the union delegates a motion was made to this effect, and only lost by a narrow majority.

At Burradon (Northumberland) last week, four miners worked seven shifts and got 27s. for the whole of the work. A shift is seven hours from the time of leaving the pit bank till the returning. These men working hard got less than one shilling for seven hours' work. This may seem incredible to many people, but I have it on unimpeachable authority.

The Northumberland miners' gala will be held on July 30th at Blyth Links. The ballot for the election of speakers is now going on. The nominations at present include the Bishop of Newcastle, C. Bradlaugh, William Morris, John Morley, A. K. Donald, C. V. Conybeare, H. M. Hyndman, J. L. Mahon, etc. Generally Mr. C. Bradlaugh heads the poll in the ballot, the speaking being in the open-air, and Mr. Bradlaugh being the most effective open-air orator in the country. The newspapers carefully conceal that any Socialists have been nominated at all.

St. James's Gazette has a very ill-informed article on the strike. The usual silly application of the profit and loss test of the usefulness of the strike is put forward. In most strikes the amount lost in wages exceeds what is gained by the advance on the averted reduction. In this strike the loss has been both ways, for the reduction has not been averted. But it is ridiculous to think that therefore the strike was an error and a failure. The great value of such strikes as that just ended is that they are an active protest on the part of the workmen against the injustice inflicted on them. If the strikes are a dead loss it makes the protest all the more significant. It would be well if some of these journalists would really consider the full meaning of a strike like that just ended. It has many lessons which they do not see, and which are full of the gravest warning. J. L. MAHON.

FACTORY ACT PROSECUTION.—At Walsall, on Friday last, Ralph Richman, draper, was summoned for having, contrary to the Factory Act, had six young persons at work in his dressmaking department at ten to eleven at night. The defence was that he personally knew nothing about it. He was ordered to pay four fines of 20s. and costs, making £6 19s.

MR. DAVITT AND IRISH EMIGRATION.—Mr. Davitt has sent a telegram to Mr. Fitzgerald, president of the Irish National League in America, suggesting that the friends of the Irish cause and the Knights of Labour should visit President Cleveland, "with the object of calling his attention to the fact that England is driving thousands weekly from Ireland to the United States. The workers of America should protest against pauper labour being forced on their market."

Mr. Samuel Smith has been addressing his constituents. He referred to the tithe question, and said "the tithe seemed to be levied on principles which appeared very inequitable, and that complaint seemed to hold in England as well as in Wales. But the main objection which the Welsh people had to paying the tithe was that it went to support a church with which the bulk of them were not connected. He exhorted the people of Wales, however, to be patient until the Liberals were again in power." Wales can remember the Liberals being in power several times, and has not forgotten the advice which she received on those occasions. Wales was always told to be patient. When the Liberals are in Opposition, Wales has to be patient until they come into power. When the Liberals are in power Wales has to be patient to keep them there. Wales is not going to be patient any more, but is going to have the reforms she wants by sheer force. Wales has tried centuries of patience and got nothing. She is now going to try a strong dose of coercion. Wales has never lacked advisers like Mr. Smith. What she wants is somebody who will fight without knowing when he is beaten, and who will persevere until the necessary reforms have been obtained.—Cambrian News.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MARX'S THEORY OF VALUE.

The Mallock fallacy is absurdly obvious. "Our manufacturing operatives," were working during the year on materials and with machinery which already contained a vast amount of "crystallised labour," which of course is reckoned into the final product.

The agriculturalists of the United States were working on the bare earth and except perhaps in the case of the Bonanza farms, with the usual simple implements in use in small agriculture. Hinc ille lachrymæ.

E. BELFORT BAX.

CHRISTIANITY, POSITIVISM, AND SOCIALISM.

COMRADE,—Our friend Beckett, in his criticism of Cotter Morison's book, has, I think, missed the real point of the inconsistency in the Positivist's attitude with regard to Christianity. The "essential thought" of Christianity lies in the notion of "holiness"—i.e., a special relation between the individual soul and "God." This has as its correlate what is sometimes known as the "ethics of inwardness"—that is, a morality which centres in the personality and the attainment of this quasi-mystical relation with the divinity—or in other words, "Salvation." As a consequence, Christianity, though retaining elements of barbaric ferocity in its theology, in its moral sentiment invariably tends to become maudlin, and its practice commonly to hypocrisy.

Now Positivism, while abandoning the theological side of Christianity, retains its introspective and individualistic attitude in Ethics. The ethical aim of Positivism, like that of Christianity, is the perfecting of the individual character, and according to what is virtually the same standard, as is proved by the retention of so many Christian forms in the Comtean cultus, and still more in the adoption of the introspective and mystical Imitatio Christi of Thomas à Kempis as a text-book of life and conduct.

Socialism alone, in effect, definitively abandons this old ethical standard, and the code of morality growing out of it, by proclaiming the great modern truth, that Social Happiness, in its plain sense, is the one object of all moral conduct, and in refusing to be turned aside from this principle by specious attempts to reintroduce the rags and tags of a theological morality under another name. Morison is evidently sensible in a vague way of the distinction between Christian or personal morality (with "Salvation" for its end) and Social Morality, but he is apparently oblivious of the fact that Positivism has sucked in the former wholesale while rejecting the basis with which it is both logically and historically connected.—Yours fraternally,

E. BELFORT BAX.

REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday, June 9, Rev. Stewart D. Headlam lectured on "Christian Socialism" to a large audience. There was considerable discussion. After the lecture a business meeting of members was held. On Sunday, an open-air meeting was held at St. Pancras Arches, 1s. 10d. being collected for the Missionary Fund.—U.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, June 8, W. W. Bartlett lectured on "The Meaning of the Social Revolution." Lively discussion followed. On Sunday, June 12, we held excellent meeting on Clerkenwell Green, addressed by Blundell and Wardle, and Doughty (H.K.) A resolution protesting against the Irish evictions was carried unanimously. Sold all literature we had with us, including 21 United Ireland. We want assistance at this station for Sunday mornings. In our hall, after the outdoor meeting, a large audience had gathered to hear A. K. Donald on "The Chain-makers of Cradley Heath." A very successful week taken altogether.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—The monthly meeting of members of the Branch was held at the club on Tuesday, June 7. The following officers were elected for the ensuing month:—Treasurer: J. R. Cooper; Secretary: G. Cores; Librarian: J. J. Smith; Lecture Secretary and Managing Steward: H. Graham; Auditing Committee: James Allman, W. Wess, and C. Hobbs. Good attendance of members. A good meeting was addressed by Graham and J. Lane at the Broadway, London Fields, on Wednesday. Fair sale of literature.—G. C.

MARYLEBONE.—On Sunday afternoon, we held a good meeting in Hyde Park, addressed by Cantwell and Mainwaring, the latter speaking upon the attitude of the Irish Parliamentary party to the Labour question, followed by Nicoll, Turner, and John Williams, who spoke on the same lines. Sale of literature good.—T. C.

NORTH LONDON.—On Tuesday evening last, we re-opened our station at Ossulton Street. Meeting was addressed by Cantwell, Brooks, and Nicoll. Good discussion followed. On Sunday morning, at Regents' Park, Cantwell, Brooks, and Mainwaring spoke. Some questions were answered satisfactorily by Mainwaring. 4s. was collected for the Propaganda Fund. Good sale of literature.—H. B.

EDINBURGH.—On Wednesday, June 8, in Scientific Hall, Dalkeith, Tuke spoke on "How we are Poor." Gilray in the chair. On Saturday, a good meeting was held at Loanhead, with Tuke and G. Hossack as speakers. The latter must surely be one of the youngest speakers in the whole movement. Good sale of Commonweal at Loanhead meeting, and an agent got to take it on sale. On Sunday afternoon, Smith, Davidson, Paterson, and Gilray had a most attentive audience in the Queen's Park. No opposition. Fair sale of Commonweal at this meeting, and in the evening in the Meadows.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—On Friday evening, Paterson and Ward had a good open-air meeting at Paisley. On Saturday, Glasier, Paterson, Anderson, and Carmichael had a large meeting in Cambuslang. On Sunday, the branch had a successful meeting in Jail Square. On the same day, three branches of the Irish National League were addressed by various members of our Branch. Glasier spoke to the Parkhead Branch, McLaren to the Coatbridge Branch, and Brown to the Legislative Independence Branch. All were excellently received, and it looks as if the Irishmen will soon be prominent in the Socialist movement.

LANCASTER.—At weekly meeting of members at our club, Sun Street (on Friday nights), E. P. Hall read extracts from Shelley's notes to poems, followed by hot discussions on marriage and the "Political Situation." The handling of the former subject evinced much intelligent appreciation of the moral aims of Revolutionism.—L. H.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning, Maguire and Braithwaite addressed an open-air meeting at Hunslet Moor. In the evening, Hill, Paylor, and Maguire spoke in Vicar's Croft. Sale of Commonweal for the day two quires.—F. C.

NORWICH.—On Thursday, 9th inst., we held a meeting at Dereham, addressed by Henderson and Slaughter. On Sunday morning last, Henderson and another addressed a meeting at Wynondham. In the afternoon we held our usual meeting in the Market-place, Henderson speaking at some length on Socialism generally, Morley in the chair. In the evening at 7 o'clock, we held our usual meeting on the Agricultural Hall Plain, addressed by Slaughter and Morley. At 8 o'clock in the Gordon Hall, Henderson gave a lecture on "Co-operation." All meetings well attended. During coming week we intend to visit Aylsham, North Walsham, Dereham, and Yarmouth.—J. S.

WALSALL.—On Saturday, H. Sanders held a meeting in the Market-place, Walsall. The meeting, which was large, was several times interfered with by drunken persons, who had evidently been put on for such purpose, but no disturbance ensued. On Sunday evening, Sanders and Deakin addressed an audience at Wednesday, where we hope to form a Branch in a short time.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—On Thursday, June 9, at the weekly meeting of the Labour League, Swords moved a resolution that steps be taken to bring public opinion to bear upon the Corporation for its neglect in enforcing the sanitary laws; that the compulsory demolition of unsanitary tenements and the erection in their stead of healthy dwellings be demanded. After a lengthened discussion, in which Karpel, Coffey, Coulon, and others took part, the proposal was adopted. It was also decided to appeal to the Knights of Labour and the Labour Union in America for funds to carry on the labour agitation in Ireland.

WOOLWICH.—On Sunday evening, R. Banner and A. K. Donald held a meeting at the Arsenal Gates. The audience was large, and purchased 6s. worth of literature. A few questions were put and satisfactorily disposed of. 5s. 4d. collected for propaganda.—R. B.

THE SOCIALIST UNION.

NOTTINGHAM SECTION.—On Sunday morning, Proctor and Wane addressed an interested audience in Sninton Market. In the evening, a large meeting was held in the Great Market-place, addressed by Peacock and Proctor. A little opposition was shown, but was soon disposed of. Some thousands of leaflets were distributed, and were eagerly received. Collection for club and propaganda 4s. 6d., after which a friend gave 1s. making 5s. 6d. Commonweal sold out. A meeting was held at the club afterwards, and another member enrolled.—T. P.

A WRITTEN DEBATE

BETWEEN MR. C. BRADLAUGH, M.P., AND E. BELFORT BAX.

SUBJECT:

“Will Socialism Benefit the English People?”

IV.—Negative: MR. C. BRADLAUGH.

(1) MR. BAX says that I have ignored the “basis” of Socialism; but, having again referred to the first paragraph of his first paper, I find that, though he speaks of “an economic basis,” he nowhere in that paragraph, or as far as I can see elsewhere, explains what he means by these words. He says his whole article is an endeavour to afford such an explanation. I, after a careful re-reading, am unable to gather the supposed explanation from either of his papers, and therefore will ask him to kindly state briefly, and as clearly as he can, what it is that he holds to be the “new view of life (i.e., of human relations), having an economic basis.” As he puts these words as affording his definition of the Socialism which he affirms is to benefit the English people, it is absolutely necessary—especially as various schools of Socialists differently define the word—that I should know precisely what he means, if I am to discuss the probable effects of the Socialism intended by him, and the making clear our meaning will certainly be for the advantage of our readers.

(2) It is true that Mr. Bax says that “the condition of the civilised world as a whole is the immediate basis on which Socialism founds.” But here, again, I do not understand what he means. If he means that there is sameness of condition for the working classes in any two civilised peoples, I must traverse this. Type, temperament, climate, soil, general life conditions, political conditions, social conditions, transmitted predispositions, vary considerably in every nation, and you cannot usefully lump these into a whole in order to propound a political or social theory for the English people. The wants, the miseries, the comforts, the means in possession, the facilities for gaining a livelihood, the legal hindrances, the amount of liberty enjoyed, differ in almost every country. So also there is an enormous difference as to the available means of reform and amelioration at the disposal, or within probable command, of various peoples.

(3) Nor am I quite sure how much of the world Mr. Bax intends by “the civilised world,” for he elsewhere explains “civilisation” to mean the existence in the same country “of a propertied dominating class and a propertyless dominated class.” This curious definition is wide enough to include nearly every country in the world, so far as I have any information.

(4) It is the more necessary that I should press Mr. Bax for a clear and concise definition of what he means by Socialism, because his objections to the definitions put forward by me in par. 9 of my last paper hardly render his own view more clear. I gave two definitions—

(1) “that organised society should own all wealth, direct all labour, and compel the equal distribution of all produce.” This, says Mr. Bax, is “much too vague.” While I can understand that it may not be the definition Mr. Bax thinks accurate, I avow it seems to me tolerably clear and explicit. He adds that “as it stands no modern Socialist would accept it.” But is this last declaration quite true? The definition is divided into three sub-heads: That organised society should (a) own all wealth; (b) direct all labour; (c) compel the equal distribution of all produce. I shall be obliged if Mr. Bax will state as against each sub-head the respects in which he thinks it vague and inaccurate.

(5) As to my second statement of Socialism—i.e., “that organised society should take possession of land, capital, all means of production, distribution, and exchange, should control all labour, regulate all distribution, and conduct all exchange”—I understand Mr. Bax to accept these words with the qualification that “‘all labour’ means all social labour, not the labour an individual might perform for his own amusement.” I do not quite appreciate the qualification, and should be glad if Mr. Bax would state some instances of the labour a man or woman might perform, and the raw material on which he might work, in a Socialistic state without being under the control which Mr. Bax says is to be applied to “all (other) labour.” The acceptance of the definition involves the advocacy of the possible dispossession by force, that is, after a civil war, in which those who at present have possession of land and capital and of the means of production, distribution, and exchange, would resist the dispossession.

(6) Though accepting the words just quoted, Mr. Bax objects to the “explanatory rider” that “everything would be common as to their user,” but I understand him to say that “personal possession” would be limited under Socialism “to objects of personal use.” Does he regard, say, an eight-roomed house and a one-acre garden attached as an object of personal use? or would a four-wheeled cab and the horse and equipments be objects of personal use? Can Mr. Bax state any formula which he thinks may distinguish the objects of which the user would be common from those of which the user would be personal and private? If everything is not to be common as to its user, how can there possibly be the “equal participation by all in the necessities, comforts, and enjoyments of life”? Does Mr. Bax think that a man wearing Lancashire wooden clogs can equally participate in the enjoyment of my long and supple leather fishing-boots?

(7) Mr. Bax frankly enough says that “the words Socialism, Communism, and Collectivism are interchangeable, and mean economically the communisation of the means necessary to production, distribution, and exchange,” and he concedes “that this would eventuate in the communisation of the product to a very large extent.” That is, he agrees with me that to a large extent Socialism would mean Communism as to the products, as well as to the means of production. I would ask him to explain how he thinks this communisation of products would operate to a large extent, and how the operation would be stopped at any point?

(8) To par. 5 of my paper Mr. Bax offers no real answer. In his first paper he affirmed that the “economic goal of modern or scientific Socialism, no less than that of the Utopian Socialism of Owen, Fourier, St. Simon,” “is the equal participation by all in the necessities and comforts of life.” Questioned by me specifically as to this (par. 5), he gives an answer which, if it means what it says, declares that the Socialism of Robert Owen, Fourier, and St. Simon, stands to the Socialism of Mr. Bax as astrology does to astronomy. If this be true, it is difficult to characterise Mr. Bax’s first statement without being rude.

(9) More than once Mr. Bax challenges me to deal with what he describes as the historical side of his opening paper. So far as his paper does not purport to state the history of the English people, I decline to do so, as being outside the question I have agreed to debate. For the rest, I am unable to find that Mr. Bax has furnished any historical statement which I can identify with English history. He has presented a very ably-written romance, sometimes consonant with fact, sometimes utterly conflicting; the whole is put in language often exceedingly poetic; but I prefer to break up what he beautifully describes as “this rock of the ages, with its many-hued strata of economic formation” into plain and prosaic statements of fact which may be identified as to meaning, and which if material to the issue may be challenged or verified. Mr. Bax objects to “being waved aside with the epithet ‘inexact,’ or with mere bald denials,” but I answer that the affirmer of a proposition is bound in such a debate as this to put forward at least some evidence in support of the statements challenged. To answer that what I consider his romances are “historical truisms” is scarcely convincing.

10. In answer to paragraphs 7, 8, and 9 of my reply to Mr. Bax’s first paper, he states “that there is no possibility of the definite establishment of Socialism anywhere without a concurrent movement amongst the proletariat of the whole civilised world.” If those words really mean anything more than a vague expression of opinion, they would mean that “the definite establishment of Socialism” cannot be possible in England until there is a concurrent movement (whatever that may mean) amongst the peoples of all Europe, of the greater part of America, of some parts of Asia and of Africa, and of some parts of America. This makes the possibilities of the definite establishment of Socialism in England so extremely remote as to considerably diminish the usefulness of our discussion. I desire to discuss here the probable influences of Socialism on the happiness of the English people during the present and immediately succeeding generations. I do not desire to waste time in this debate in arguing as to remote possibilities of what may or may not happen some centuries hence.

(11) Mr. Bax says that by the “break-up of nationalities,” which he alleged in his opening paper “would be one of the first results of Socialism,” he means “that the centralised state of to-day will be eventually merged in a federation of all socialised communities.” He very fairly says that he cannot say when this is likely to happen. But as this is to be one of the “first results of Socialism,” it is surely a little unpractical to discuss the conjectural happiness of the English people, if it is admittedly contingent on the happening of an event in any case improbable—perhaps impossible—and as to the time of the happening of which Mr. Bax cannot even hazard a conjecture, except that it is to be "one of the first results" of the establishment of Socialism in this country. As the break-up of nationalities, which Mr. Bax affirms is to be one of the first results of the establishment of Socialism in England, is declared by him to be probably not a peaceful process, it seems to me therefore clear that in this respect, at any rate, whenever it happens, Socialism is not likely to benefit the English people. All violent changes result in great immediate misery to the poorer classes affected by and taking part in such changes. All violent changes have hitherto been followed by periods of reaction, and have often, in consequence of the demoralisation attending armed conflict, temporarily placed the masses under the control of a military dictator.

(12) Mr. Bax says that "assumption, etc.," does mean the taking away from the present owners "of the means of production, etc.," and that this taking away is to be "by any means, constitutional or otherwise, as circumstances may dictate." This is so very large that it includes the violent taking, at the mere discretion of the takers, and Mr. Bax is requested to explain who is to judge what it is that circumstances are likely to dictate in relation to property in the hands of others to those who as yet have it not. I cannot conceive that the encouragement of assumption of property by violence is likely to improve the general happiness of those so taught to acquire. I can conceive that it may totally demoralise the public mind. Mr. Bax does not answer any of the other questions in paragraph 10, and yet a clear understanding on those points is most vital to the issue between us.

(13) Mr. Bax does say that "Socialism only proposes to confiscate wealth used for production on a large scale." Does he really mean by this that Socialism will allow private wealth to be used for production on a small or on a moderate scale? Does he mean that under Socialism there may be small employers paying wage to those they employ? Unless he means this, his limitation of the confiscation proposal is absurd.

(14) Mr. Bax says that the only private enterprise Socialism sees reason for extinguishing is "the private enterprise which has material personal gain for its end." Will he please give me some illustration of personal enterprise in labour upon raw material which does not come within this definition.

(15) Mr. Bax originally said that Christianity was through and through Individualistic. When I in par. 16 showed him that as to property this was not all true, he does not attempt to in any way explain the positive words of Acts ii., 44: "And all that believed were together, and had all things common;" or of Acts iv., 32: "And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul: neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common;" except by the bold declaration that these words "do not affect in the least." He says that the principles of Christianity were not communistic is proved by the fact stated in chap. v., verse 4, that Ananias might have kept his property if he had not joined the Christian community and had not professed to give up to that community all his possessions. I cannot see the force of this as a reply. Mr. Bax apparently forgets that he introduced into this debate the principles of Christianity as affecting the ownership of goods. My only course was to point out that his statement was inaccurate and misleading. It is no part of my duty in this discussion to express any opinion on the special historical value of any of the Christian books.

Instead of expressing surprise that I challenge his statements as to the increase of the number of small employers and owners of small accumulations, Mr. Bax should remember that the onus is upon him to prove the whole of the statements he makes, and I especially wait for him to do this on the facts and figures alleged by him and challenged by me in paragraph 18. The vague reference to "the boot-making industry" here clearly marks Mr. Bax's absolute unacquaintance with the subject. I ask him to take on this Kettering, Leicester, London, Northampton, including the country villages, Norwich, and Stafford, and compare these with their condition forty years ago.

Mr. Bax admits that there is very possibly less pauperism in proportion to population than there was forty years ago, but he alleges that there is more poverty. I ask him to prove his allegation not by loose statements, but by giving precise and detailed facts relating to the counties, towns, and cities, with names of each, in 1847 and 1887. Mr. Bax asks me what it is that I have "to say about the perennial unemployed question." Unless Mr. Bax can show that Socialism will provide employment in England for the unemployed of this country, the answer would not be relevant to this debate, and in any event should be given by Mr. Bax as part of his case. My general views on the unemployed population are fully stated in the volume containing the verbatim report of the defence of myself and co-defendant in the case of Reg. v. Bradlaugh and Besant. I do not see that they make in any way in favour of the proposition which Mr. Bax undertook to affirm.

This paper is already so long that I reserve until my next my rejoinder on surplus-value.

HOW WE LIVE AND HOW WE MIGHT LIVE.

Now the next thing I claim is education. And you must not say that every English child is educated now; that sort of education will not answer my claim, though I cheerfully admit it is something: something, and yet after all only class education. What I claim is liberal education; opportunity, that is, to have my share of whatever knowledge there is in the world according to my capacity or bent of mind, historical or scientific; and also to have my share of skill of hand which is about in the world, either in the industrial handicrafts, or in the fine arts; picture-painting, sculpture, music, acting, or the like: I claim to be taught, if I can be taught, more than one craft to exercise for the benefit of the community. You may think this a large claim, but I am clear it is not too large a claim if the community is to have any gain out of my special capacities, if we are not all to be beaten down to a dull level of mediocrity as we are now, all but the very strongest and toughest of us.

But also I know that this claim for education involves one for public advantages in the shape of public libraries, schools, and the like, such as no private person, not even the richest, could command: but these I claim very confidently, being sure that no reasonable community could bear to be without such helps to a decent life.

Again, the claim for education involves a claim for abundant leisure, which once more I make with confidence; because when once we have shaken off the slavery of profit, labour would be organised so unwastefully that no heavy burden would be laid on the individual citizens; every one of whom, as a matter of course, would have to pay his toll of some obviously useful work. At present you must note all the amazing machinery which we have invented has served only to increase the amount of profit-bearing wares; in other words to increase the amount of profit pouched by individuals for their own advantage, part of which profit they use as capital for the production of more profit, with ever the same waste attached to it; and part as private riches or means for luxurious living, which again is sheer waste,—is in fact to be looked on as a kind of bonfire on which rich men burn up the product of the labour they have fleeced from the workers beyond what they themselves can use. So I say that in spite of our inventions, no worker works under the present system an hour the less on account of those labour-saving machines, so-called. But under a happier state of things they would be used simply for saving labour, with the result of a vast amount of leisure gained for the community to be added to that gained by the avoidance of the waste of useless luxury, and the abolition of the service of commercial war.

And I may say that as to that leisure, as I should in no case do any harm to any one with it, so I should often do some direct good to the community with it, by practising arts or occupations for my hands or brain which would give pleasure to many of the citizens; in other words, a great deal of the best work done would be done in the leisure time of men relieved from any anxiety as to their livelihood and eager to exercise their special talent, as all men, nay, all animals are.

Now again, this leisure would enable me to please myself and expand my mind by travelling if I had a mind to it: because, say for instance that I were a shoemaker; if due social order were established, it by no means follows that I should always be obliged to make shoes in one place; a due amount of easily conceivable arrangement would enable me to make shoes in Rome, say, for three months, and to come back with new ideas of building amongst other things which would perhaps be of service in London.

But now in order that my leisure might not degenerate into idleness and aimlessness, I must set up a claim for due work to do. Nothing to my mind is more important than this demand, and I must ask your leave to say a good deal about it. I have mentioned that I should probably use my leisure for doing a good deal of what is now called work; but it is clear that if I am a member of a Socialist State I must do my due share of rougher work than this—my due share of what my capacity enables me to do, that is: no fitting of me to a Procrustean bed: but even that share of work necessary to the existence of the simplest social life. In the first place, whatever else it is, it must be reasonable work; that is, it must be such work as a good citizen can see the necessity for; as a member of the community, I must have agreed to do it. To take two strong instances of the contrary, I won't submit to be dressed up in red and marched off to shoot at my French or German or Arab friend in a quarrel that I don't understand: I will rebel sooner than do that. Nor will I submit to waste my time and energies in making some trifling toy which I know only a fool can desire: I will rebel sooner than do that. However, you may be sure that in a state of social order I shall have no need to rebel against any such pieces of unreason; only I am forced to speak from the way we live to the way we might live. Again, if the necessary reasonable work be of a mechanical kind, I must be helped to do it by a machine, not to cheapen my labour, but so that as little time as possible may be spent upon it, and that I may be able to think of other things while I am tending the machine. And if the work be specially rough or exhausting, you will, I am sure, agree with me in saying that I must take turns in doing it with other people: I mean I mustn't, for instance, be expected to spend my working hours always at the bottom of a coal pit. I think such work as that ought to be largely volunteer work, and done as I say in spells. And what I say of very rough work I say also of nasty work. On the other hand, I should think very little of the manhood of a stout and healthy man who did not feel a pleasure in doing rough work; always supposing him to work under the conditions I have been speaking of—namely, feeling that it was useful (and consequently honoured), and that it was not continuous or hopeless, and that he was really doing it of his own free will.

"If every man did his share of labour, and wasted effort were stopped, four hours' labour a-day would give to everybody all the wealth they could use." Thus said Benjamin Franklin over a hundred years ago, and how much truer is it now, with the then inconceivable improvements in the means of production which have been made since he wrote.—E. T.

The last claim I make for my work is that the places I worked in, factories or workshops, should be pleasant, just as the fields where our most necessary work is done are pleasant. Believe me there is nothing in the world to prevent this being done, save the necessity of making profits on all wares; in other words, the wares are cheapened at the expense of people being forced to work in crowded, unwholesome, squalid, noisy dens: that is to say they are cheapened at the expense of the workman's life.

Well, so much for my claims as to my necessary work, my tribute to the state. I believe people would find as they advanced in their capacity for carrying on social order, that life so lived was much less expensive than we now can have any idea of, and that after a little people would rather be anxious to seek work than avoid it; that our working hours would rather be merry parties of men and maids, young men and old, enjoying themselves over their work, than the grumpy weariness it mostly is now. Then would come the time for the new birth of art, so much talked of so long deferred; people couldn't help showing their mirth and pleasure in their work, and would be always wishing to express it in a tangible and more or less enduring form, and the workshop would once more be a school of art, whose influence no one could escape from.

And, again, that word art leads me to my last claim, which is that the material surroundings of my life should be pleasant, generous, and beautiful; that I know is a large claim, but this I will say about it, that if it cannot be satisfied, if every civilised community cannot provide such surroundings for all its members, I do not want the world to go on; it is a mere misery that man has ever existed. I don't think it possible under the present circumstances to speak too strongly on this point. I feel sure that the time will come when people will find it difficult to believe that a rich community, having such command over external nature, could have submitted to live such a mean, shabby, dirty life as we do.

And once for all, there is nothing in our circumstances save the hunting of profit that drives us into it. It is profit which draws men into enormous unmanageable aggregations called towns for instance; profit which crowds them up when they are there into quarters without gardens or open spaces; profit which won't take the most ordinary precautions against wrapping a whole district in a cloud of sulphurous smoke; which turns beautiful rivers into filthy sewers; which condemns all but the rich to live in houses idiotically cramped and confined at the best, and at the worst in houses for whose wretchedness there is no name. I say it is almost incredible that we should bear such crass stupidity as this; nor should we if we could help it. We shall not bear it when the workers get out of their heads that they are but an appendage to profit-grinding, that the more profits that are made the more employment at high wages there will be for them, and that therefore all the incredible filth, disorder, and degradation of modern civilisation are signs of their prosperity. So far from that, they are signs of their slavery. When they are no longer slaves they will claim as a matter of course that every man and every family should be generously lodged, that every child should be able to play in a garden close to the place his parents lived in; that the houses should by their obvious decency and order be ornaments to nature, not disfigurements of it; for the decency and order when carried to the due pitch would most assuredly lead to beauty in building. All this, of course, would mean the state, which as I have told you should mean all society duly organised, the state having in its hands the means of production, and can only be done on those terms; on any other terms people will be driven to accumulate private wealth for themselves, and thus, as we have seen, to waste the goods of the community and perpetuate the division into classes, which means continual war and waste.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

(To be concluded.)

BRISTOL—ANTI-JUBILEE MEETING.—An extraordinary incident occurred here this morning (21st inst.). An open-air meeting was held in the centre of the city at 9 o'clock in the morning, at which there was a large attendance, consisting chiefly of working men. Several prominent working men spoke to the assembly, and the following resolutions were carried in the most enthusiastic manner: 1. "That, having regard to the immense cost of monarchy, and the fact that it is maintained exclusively in the interest of the privileged classes, of which it is the centre, and seeing that the progress of the last fifty years has been greatly retarded by these classes, this meeting recognises no further cause for rejoicing at this period of the Queen's reign than the grand fact that the working-class organisations of this city decline to participate in the so-called Jubilee, notwithstanding an enforced holiday; and this meeting protests against such enforced holiday, and the use of public money and the national forces, as a despicable attempt to promote sham sentiment on which to bolster up a useless institution." 2. "That in view of the want, misery, and absolutely hopeless lives of the workers of this country (to say nothing of poor Ireland), this meeting earnestly protests against the continuance of this state of things in the face of the immense wealth of the nation, produced by the workers, as not only evidence that the working classes have no cause for joy at this time of so-called Jubilee, but as a disgrace to civilisation and opposed to all true ideas of justice and humanity."

One of the regiments taking part in the procession pro-Jubilee, coming in the vicinity of this meeting and somewhat interrupting the business, as it was thought designedly, was loudly hooted and hissed at. The "city's" procession in celebration of the Jubilee was nearly wholly composed of soldiers, and the proceedings were absolutely wanting in enthusiasm—not a single cheer along the whole route; and the affair only required the Dead March in "Saul" from one of the bands to make its funereal character complete.—R. G.

THE CONVICT.

(By L. WITTIG. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

WITH iron chains on neck and feet,
And forehead earthward sunken low,
Brown coat and uniform complete—
'Tis thus the convict plies his hoe.
He once, like him who walks beside
With rifle ready in his hand,
Wore coat in brighter colours dyed,
And served his native land.

For times were bad, and corn was dear,
And hope in every heart was dead;
And all around there smote the ear
The poor man's bitter cry for bread.
"O spare a crust, that we may eat;
In vain we've looked for work to-day,
And still must loiter in the street,
And lounge the time away."

But when indeed they knew the worst,
And prayers for bread were wasted breath,
Beneath the rich men's feet there burst
The mine whose womb was big with death.

Hark, "Work or Death," is now the cry
Through all the limits of the land;
Sedition's flames are raging high,
By Famine's fury fanned.

And now the thunder of the drum
Is heard the angry cries between;
The grenadiers in order come,
Their aim is sure, their swords are keen.

As though for sport on measured ground,
Where marksmen strive but to excel,
Are rifle-bullets handed round,
Sharp hunger to reel.

And hark, a cry! On either hand
Dense crowds in narrow streets are pent;
Lo, face to face two armies stand,
The starving and the well-content.

See there! that yet the People's flag
May soar aloft and flaunt the sky,
They hoist a torn and tattered rag,
Defiantly on high.

"Bread," cry they, "brothers, give us bread!
Nor let your answer be a stone;
That we to-night no more may dread
To hear our starving children wail.
Put by your lead; a single pound
Of bread will still our sharp desire."
Hark! through the serried ranks re-sound
The words "Make ready! Fire!"

The volley cracks; the people run;
Five only in their blood remain;
Their hunger with their life is done;
An end is put to all their pain.
The colonel's eye was on his men;
Its glance was keen their aim to see;
And woe betide the culprit then,
If any such there be.

Yes, one there was who would not do
That murder; what though he had worn
A soldier's uniform, he knew
He too was of the People born.
His heart was beating fast for shame,
And trembling sore his every limb;
The foes on whom his eyes took aim
Were brothers unto him.

Before court-martial is he brought,
Because, despite the soldier's creed,
He fearlessly has felt and thought
As though he were a man indeed.
The doom of death is quickly said;
What sentence else could meet the case?
To prison packs him off instead
The king's especial grace.

THE SAME OLD BOGIE!

READERS of newspapers have become so sated with the high-spiced Jubilee fare provided for them, and the monotonous imbecility of the "arguments" brought forth against the Irish people, that a new move is necessary. The sea-serpent is played out, and the green gooseberry not marvellous enough. Editors are in despair for "items," and the "Authorities" for something to stiffen the British Lion's courage to coercion pitch.

Here, then, is a difficulty; but the Able Editors and Law-upholding Authorities are much too good stage-managers to allow their drama to drag so pitifully for long. The desperate dynamitard and the conspirator who is "known to the police" are brought out once more from the theatrical property-room; they are carefully dusted, the requisite shade of ferocity imparted to their appearance, and they are "produced with great applause"!

The police refuse information they do not possess; the "leading journals" have a passing fit of scolding and good advice; the public buy the papers and shake their sapient heads over the evil spirit shown by "those horrid rebels"; and law and order, loyalty, and several things else, are greatly strengthened.

Meantime all that can be done is being done to exasperate the oppressed—English and Irish—and to show them the uselessness of legal and constitutional means. Can it be wondered at if mayhap some embittered exile or hunted "felon" should learn the lesson that the press is preaching so loudly? S.

THE TITHE WAR IN WALES.—The utmost excitement prevails throughout the disturbed districts of North Wales, where the military and police are again expected to enforce the sales on the distrained stock for tithes. Immense bonfires are erected on the various mountain ranges, and will be at once set ablaze on the approach of the authorities. Cannon are fixed on the hill slopes, and horns, 6 ft. long, are held in readiness at the farmsteads. The local magistrates have received instructions to hold themselves in readiness to proceed with the military for the purpose of reading the Riot Act. The future movements of the military and constabulary are, however, kept a profound secret. Concerning the proceedings at Colwyn Bay, and the alleged attack by the police on the crowd, a correspondent telegraphs:—The wounds produced were not mere scratches, but were deep cuts, and in some cases serious results may follow. The number of very old men thus wounded was remarkable, though the majority were of course able-bodied labourers. Another feature of the affray was that kicking was freely resorted to, and several complained of severe bruises about the legs.—Daily News, June 18.

AN OLD SUPERSTITION—A NEW DISGRACE.

As was said last week, the contempt with which all Socialists must necessarily look on the idiotic court ceremony of the week has prevented anything more than a mere hint being given in the Commonweal about the Jubilee. And besides this, Socialists feel of course that the mere abolition of the monarchy would help them little if it only gave place to a middle-class republic; such an one, for example, as that which butchered so many thousands of citizens at Paris in 1871 and now in 1887 grown respectable and liberal, still blocks the way to all progress in France, and holds out a hand to the corruption of society there. Nevertheless, now the monstrous stupidity is on us (for I am necessarily writing before the event), one's indignation swells pretty much to the bursting-point, and I really must take advantage of my position to relieve my feelings, even at the expense of being considered somewhat old-fashioned. And we must not after all forget what the hideous, revolting, and vulgar tomfoolery in question really means nowadays, or how truly its hideousness and vulgarity of upholstery symbolises the innate spirit which has forced the skinny twaddle on a nation that is in the habit of boasting (how vainly!) of its practicality. Such a ceremony would once have meant something very different to what it does now. Time was when the central figure in the procession from palace to Abbey would have been a man or woman whose personality would have been felt, though acting according to the ethics and maxims of feudality. The central figure in the procession would at the worst have been also in the centre of the feudal warriors gathered for the battle, and not seldom in the centre of the enemy's host. The administration of affairs, the balancing of the various claims of the groups of the feudal hierarchy, the assertion of the due rights of the great manor (scarcely yet a country)—all these would have been the duties of the central figure of a great royal procession; and no monarch of England, not even the worst of the Angevines or the most faineant of the Plantagenets could altogether neglect such duties; they had to do the deeds of men and women, however faulty or perverse, and not the deeds of a gilt gibbie-stick; they were each of them a part of the public, and an active part too.

All that is as dead as King Harold now. The nucleus of that grievous mass of flunkeyism which has been a disgrace even to disgraceful

London (although the coolness with which her duties are neglected is from time to time noticed by the public and the press) is on the whole considered as a satisfactory representative of what she does represent; so satisfactory that we are called upon to take part in a set of antics in her honour compared with which a corrobbery of Australian black-fellows is a decent and dignified performance.

What is it then that this central figure does represent? Not the feudal hierarchy, dead centuries ago; not the queer pedantic divine-right-of-kings, whose struggle with the bourgeois divine-right of parliamentary majority played such an important part in developing the supremacy of that bourgeoisie. No, it does not represent these extinct superstitions, but, superstition as it is itself, it represents commercial realities rather: to wit, jobbery official and commercial, and its foundation the Privilege of Capital, set on a background of the due performance of the conventional domestic duties; in short, the representation of the anti-social spirit in its fulness is what is required of it.

That is the reason why the career of the present representative is, in spite of those few grumblings aforesaid, so eminently satisfactory. It has been the life of a respectable official who has always been careful to give the minimum of work for the maximum of pay, to keep the public well at arm's length, and to abstain from any fantastic act of generosity, which might have been taken as a precedent in the future. All this has been expected of it and it has performed it in a way which has duly earned the shouts of the holiday-makers, the upholsterers, fire-work makers, gasfitters and others who may gain some temporary advantage from the Royal (but shabby) Jubilee Circus, as well as the deeper-seated applause of those whose be-all and end-all is the continuance of respectable robbery. For us Revolutionists it is clear that the gibbie-stick line of conduct is better than one with some show of human interest in it would have been; so that we have nothing to complain of. The more reaction is stripped of sentiment the better for us.

One word before this loathsome subject of the Jubilee is consigned to its due dust-heap. Fifty years ago the country was yet in the throes of that unorganised but formidable insurrection which followed on the industrial revolution, and the reckless greed of those benefitted by it—the capitalists, to wit. That insurrection was damped down by the commercial successes which so much increased the numbers and power of the definitely middle classes, so that twenty-five years ago a survivor of the discontent of 1837 might well have thought that all was over. But unbridled competition has forced the pace more than any one could have guessed it would; fifty years is gone, and once more we have "discontent" amongst us, if not wider spread than before, yet at least deeper seated, and with no apparent staving-off remedy before it except Mr. Chamberlain's feeble attempts at peasant-proprietorship. And even this vulgar Royal Upholstery procession, trumpery as it is, may deepen the discontent a little, when the newspapers are once more empty of it, and when people wake up, as on the morrow of a disgraceful orgie, to find dull trade all the duller for it, and have to face according to their position the wearisome struggle for riches, for place, for respectability, for decent livelihood, for bare subsistence, in the teeth of growing competition in a society now at last showing its rottenness openly.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

The labour movement is a world wide movement. It is limited neither by oceans, races, nor creeds. It is not one organisation, or two or ten; it is a combination of all organisations, Knights of Labour and Trades' Unionists who are seeking the economic emancipation of the wage-slave. The man whose view of the labour movement is limited by any one organisation is a victim of prejudice, ignorance, and intolerance. The amelioration in the condition of all men will be brought about not by overbearing insolence on the part of one side or the other, not by bullying or tall talk, not by the isolated action of any organisation be it ever so powerful, but by the combined strength, wisdom, and fraternal efforts of all organisations of wage labourers throughout this country and throughout the world of modern industry.—Paterson (N.J.) Labour Standard.

TOADYING TO ROYALTY.—At a meeting of the American Section of the Socialist Labour Party of America, of Providence, R. I., held Sunday evening, June 5, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—"Whereas, The celebration of the anniversary of the coronation of Queen Victoria is to be held June 21 in this country, we, the American Section of the Socialist Labour Party of America, hereby declare that, Whereas, The idea of upholding or otherwise celebrating the anniversary of any monarch is repugnant to any and all liberty-loving people, especially to citizens of a republic like ours; and, Whereas, The worship of a figurehead who receives an income of estate and salary combined of 15,000 dols. per day, while subjects and citizens of Great Britain and Ireland are suffering from the want of the mere necessities of life; and also the sending out of beggars to solicit money from the working people for the benefit of royalty, which is nothing but a name for a method of keeping people in wage-slavery and poverty, are wrong; therefore be it, Resolved, That the Providence Section of the Socialist Labour Party of America hereby condemn the action of toadies to English royalty and English capital as an insult to all free people."

A FREE-TRADER'S VIEW OF THE LABOUR QUESTION.

I.

WHAT a blessing it must be to have a clear head, unclouded by any Socialist nonsense! Here have I been for the last seven or eight years looking with increasing attention at the great Labour Question, sometimes one side and sometimes another, under the impression that it was a sort of polygon or many-sided figure, if not rather an innumerable number of radii, each leading to Socialism as a centre, with many lines drawn across, like a mysterious but beautiful cobweb. But it seems all that is to be changed now, for a thinker has come forward in the person of Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Boston, U.S.A., and (thanks to an article about him in the Pall Mall Gazette) we have at last seen that after all there is no real ground for any labour difficulty, it being merely a question of comparisons to be solved by measuring two or three straight lines (drawn parallel, as if typical of how they will never bring you to the point), one long one to represent the share the workers get of the proceeds of a business, and one little short one for the profit of the capitalists, with a few others to make it look pretty and even and business-like. All that you want besides is a rule to measure and compare the lines with, and having done that the result will be the answer required, namely, that "the present division of profits between labour and capital is just," Q.E.D., and so we need not trouble ourselves further about it. What could be more simple? Truly Mr. Atkinson deserves to be boss of the Hub of the Universe for this discovery! If only he would settle religious questions in the same way, how many poor souls might be saved from eternal perdition!

Nevertheless, I can't all at once clear the Socialist cobwebs out of my brain, and should like to trace two or three of the most important radii that seem to me to run across these beautiful parallels from Boston, like trees across a railway. I must first, however, give a few more details about Mr. Atkinson's argument.

The whole case is founded on an imaginary example, chosen probably for convenience of reckoning and measuring. Mr. Atkinson imagines three capitalists owning a cotton-mill built at a cost of 1,000,000 dols. They would employ 950 hands, who would produce in a year 17,500,000 yards of cotton cloth, which would sell for 1,100,000 dols. A diagram, drawn out to scale, shows how this sum is divided. I will take the three most important items, viz., 575,000 dols. paid for raw material, 285,000 dols. for mill-labour, and 60,000 dols. for the final profit of the capitalists, or 6 per cent. on the cost of the mill. Three other diagrams with descriptive letter-press deal respectively with the other expenses, the "spending of the profits," and with what is "consumed and saved" by capitalists and labourers. It is with the first, however, that we have most to do.

To begin with: to my prejudiced Socialist judgment a doubt occurs whether this 60,000 dols. can accurately represent the share of the produce which the capitalists would receive. For this amounts (as is pointed out to us) to 6 per cent. on the cost of the mill, and Mr. Atkinson's case therefore imagines that the three capitalists will invest nearly three-quarters of a million dollars in raw material, etc., and not require any interest on it—a thing quite against the nature of capitalists to do. Wherefore I think it just possible that the whole thing is founded on a false hypothesis. However, not being in the cotton trade myself, I will try to believe that the supposed case is a true example of facts as far as cotton-spinning is concerned. But if so, I must demur to its being taken as an example of "the present division of profits between capital and labour." 60,000 dols. is about $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the total 1,100,000 dols. proceeding from the business, which is by no means the average percentage of proceeds which is taken by the exploiters of labour. For instance, Mr. Atkinson's second diagram shows that the total profit made by the exploiting classes out of the manufacture of 17,500,000 yards of cotton is, for farmers, merchants, mill-owners, and all, 145,000 dols. out of the 1,100,000 dols., or $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; whilst we have only to turn to the accounts of English railways to find dividends of 50 per cent. of the gross receipts. Five and a-half per cent. is therefore far below the average share taken by the capitalists.

Not that I mean to admit that the capitalists have the least right to even $5\frac{1}{2}$ or any percentage whatever of the proceeds, merely as interest on capital. It is plain that the shares of the capitalists and labourers consist of the value added to the raw material in the mill. To create this value, capital was necessary and labour was necessary, and if any one likes to amuse himself guessing how much is due to capital and how much to labour, I don't much object, provided he does not go on to confuse the labourer with his labour, and the capital with the capitalist, as Mr. Atkinson has done. For I beg to submit that capital and capitalist are not synonymous, and that when it is said that such and such a share of the proceeds of business should go to capital, it by no means follows that that share belongs to a capitalist, even though he is said to be the owner of the capital. In the first place I should question his means of acquiring the capital, and his right to retain it; and even supposing that could be established, it should be asked what part the capitalist took in producing the proceeds of which he claims a share, though it was other men's labour which called forth the uses of his capital. If he managed the business, he deserves wages for what necessary or useful work he has done in that capacity; but it is not necessary to suppose that a capitalist takes any share in production, for though we cannot have labour without a labourer, we can (and will) have capital without a capitalist.

Again, Mr. Atkinson's black lines make it look as if the three mill-owners were very moderate in their demands, and the labourers in the mill had the best of the bargain; 285,000 dols. amongst 950 workmen is 300 dols. (about £60) each. But 60,000 dols. amongst three capitalists is 20,000 dols., or £4,000 each. A considerable difference here! considering that the whole of the extra value (60,000 dols. included) was added by the labourers, and that the only part the capitalists took in the production was the easy task of lending to the labourers capital they could not if they would have used themselves. Clearly the 60,000 dols. belongs to the labourers who produced it just as much as it would do if there were no capitalists to levy taxes on the use of the capital. Mr. Atkinson's simple diagram might be improved and still further simplified by eliminating altogether the share of the proceeds which the capitalist claims, since he, being useless, should receive no share of the gains.

It is probable that in opposition to this, Mr. Atkinson would argue that even if what I have said is true, the 60,000 dols. divided between 950 men would only give them a paltry 62 dols. (or about £12) extra all round, and that by driving away the capitalists this is all we should gain, instead of all the advantages promised by Socialism. We are told, "The poor are not poor because capital takes a bigger share than it ought. The poor are a great deal less poor . . . than they would be except for the service of capital, of which they enjoy the greater part of the benefit." (Please observe how the writer dare not put "capitalist," though he means us to understand it.) Therefore, since capitalists are not the cause of poverty, the nationalisation of capital would do us little or no good, and some other remedy must be found. Such I take to be the train of thought which Mr. Atkinson's article is intended to suggest, and his pretty parallels seem to be the lines he has prepared for the train of our thoughts to run upon.

(To be concluded).

THE NORTH OF ENGLAND SOCIALIST FEDERATION.

WE have received the following Principles and Programme of the North of England Socialist Federation:

PRINCIPLES.

The North of England Socialist Federation has been formed to educate and organise the people to achieve the economic emancipation of labour.

While fully sympathising with and helping every effort of the wage-earners to win better conditions of life under the present system, the Socialist Federation aims at abolishing the Capitalist and Landlord class and forming the workers of society into a Co-operative Commonwealth.

An employing class monopolising all the means of getting and making wealth, and a wage-earning class compelled to work primarily for the profit of these employers, is a system of tyranny and slavery.

The antagonism of these two classes brings about fierce competition—for employment amongst the workers and for markets amongst the capitalists. This gives rise to class hatred and class strife, and destroys real independence, liberty, and happiness.

The present system gives ease and luxury to the idlers, toil and poverty to the workers, and degradation to all; it is essentially unjust and should be abolished.

Our aim is to bring about a Socialist System which will give healthy and useful labour to all, ample wealth and leisure to all, and the truest and fullest freedom to all.

All are invited to help the Socialist Federation in this great cause. Adherents shall acknowledge truth, justice, and morality as the basis of their conduct towards each other and towards all men. They shall acknowledge NO RIGHTS WITHOUT DUTIES: NO DUTIES WITHOUT RIGHTS.

PROGRAMME.

The Socialist Federation seeks to gain its ends by working on the following lines:—

- (1) Forming and helping other Socialist bodies to form a National and International Socialist Labour Party.
- (2) Striving to conquer political power by promoting the election of Socialists to Parliament, Local governments, School Boards, and other administrative bodies.
- (3) Helping Trade Unionism, Co-operation, and every genuine movement for the good of the workers.
- (4) Promoting a scheme for the National and International Federation of Labour.

All Socialists will wish the new society success; to which wishes I must add for my part the hope that our friends will find out the futility of sending (or trying to send) Socialists or any one else to Parliament before they have learned it by long and bitter experience. They will find their work cut out for them in carrying out Nos. 3 and 4 of their programme, and useful and necessary work it will be. At the same time I heartily congratulate them on not holding out the bait of a long string of "stepping-stones"; measures which no bourgeois Parliament would pass, and which yet would be out of date in the very first days of a Revolution; promises not capable of fulfilment, nor worth fulfilment.

W. M.

Socialism proposes scientific, intelligent, enlightened government, or free co-operation on the basis of liberty, equality, fraternity, and solidarity.

Socialism would perfect the educational system by entirely abolishing the present lack of system. The state would educate every child thoroughly, and, as they advanced, give them an opportunity to master any science, art or mechanical pursuit for which their tastes or abilities adapted them. Hence there would be no uncongenial pursuits or employments, as each would choose that in which he would be most likely to excel. Hence there would be very few bad mechanics, unskilled workers, or quacks at anything.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

THE STRIKE IN THE BELFAST SHIPBUILDING TRADE.—The dispute which has existed for nearly seven weeks has at last been amicably settled. The works of Harland and Wolff were opened last Friday and the system of weekly wages will be established.

THE ENGINEERS' STRIKE AT BOLTON.—It is stated that the executive of the Ironmasters' Association has decided to vote the Bolton employers £25,000 to support their action in the present dispute; and if that sum be expended, and the men are still out, notices will be issued to all members of the association for a general lock-out, as in 1851.

TOBACCO TRADE.—Although the Budget agitation may be said to be settled, there are still hundreds of cigar-makers out of employment. The union has just lost another shop, which has been given over to female labour. In this the Jubilee year the tobacco trade in general is in a depressed state, which is likely to continue.—H. D.

THE CHAIN-MAKING TRADE.—In the House of Commons, last Friday, Mr. Matthews, replying to Mr. Curzon, said the wages in the chain-making trade at Cradley Heath, Staffordshire, were probably not more on the average than 7s. per week. The truck system prevailed to this extent that the middlemen who gave out the work only gave it to those who bought goods at their shops. This did not bring them within the law, but the right hon. gentleman invited evidence of any violation of the statute. He had great sympathy with the workmen in their privations, but it was impossible for the Government to interfere between employers and employed.

INDIVIDUAL CAPITALISM, JOINT-STOCKISM, MONOPOLY.—Ten years ago there were fifty firms engaged in the production of burning oil in Scotland; now there is less than a dozen. This diminution in the number of companies has taken place conjointly with an increased output. Finding that competition among themselves injuriously affected their dividends, a conference was held in Glasgow last week to consider a scheme for amalgamating the Scottish Mineral Oil Companies into one, and some progress was made. The first resolution agreed to by the conference was a reduction in wages all round, from 1s. 6d. per week on miners, 2s. on underground oncost men, 10 per cent. on retort men, and a like reduction on coopers. These reductions are to take place immediately, and some of the men are agitating for a general strike.—J. S.

THE CHAIN-MAKERS' STRIKE.—At a meeting of chain-makers in the Salvation Army Barracks, Cradley Heath, Thomas Homer, who presided, said they had some gentlemen down from Southport urging them to establish a co-operative society. He had received a promise that assistance would be rendered them in disposing of the chain they manufactured at Manchester, which was the centre of the co-operative movement. He was strongly in favour of starting such a society. When the society was established there would be no working one under the other, but they would all have the same price; consequently there would be no strikes. The advocates of the scheme had handed him over a cheque for £50. The masters had again been resorting to some of their bad ways. The had won the four-shillings list several times, but had let it slip through their hands. Consequently he considered the whole of the trade would have to turn out again. It was resolved to continue the strike.

THE DORSET AGRICULTURAL LABOURER.—A farm labourers wages are now 11s. per week and a house valued at 1s. per week free of rent. He is also allowed from 15 to 20 lug (perches) of ground for potatoes; this potato ground is an allowance for extra work during the hay-making, for which he is not otherwise paid. During the summer he will probably have six or eight weeks piece-work, turnip hoeing and wheat tying, at which he will earn from a £1 to £1 5s. a-week, but it must be remembered that when he is working at piece-work he often works from 4 o'clock in the morning till dark, and also that he requires ale to quench his thirst and extra food to enable him to do the extra work. Hedgers are paid from 6d. to 8d. a lug (perch). I may say that lug is the local name for a rod, pole, or perch of ground. Shepherds get about 13s. or 14s. a-week and house rent free, and an allowance of faggots, potato ground, and sometimes ten hundred of coals per year, also about a £1 or £1 10s. extra called harvest money. They also have a small allowance for each lamb they succeed in rearing. It is difficult to calculate the exact income of a shepherd, but probably it is not much less than 17s. or 18s. a-week. I am of opinion that the earnings of a carter are about the same as the shepherd. I know one farm on which the carters are paid 11s. per week and house rent free, 20 lug of potato ground free, and £4 per year instead of faggots, coal, or ale. A carter, however, has the hardest place on a farm; he goes to the stable at 4 o'clock in the morning, to work in the field in all weathers at 6 o'clock, at 2 o'clock he returns with the horses to the stable, at 3 he goes to dinner, at 4 he is in the stable again till 6 o'clock, and at 8 o'clock he is again in the stable to serve the horses for the night, and this is the slavish state of the poor carter at the present time. Of course the position of the labourer, bad as it is now, was much worse 50 and even 30 years ago. Fifty years ago the farm labourer was only paid 7s. per week; at that time he had little besides barley cake, potatoes, and swedes stolen from the farmer's fields. They also stole all the wood for cooking, and who can blame them? I don't. In fact they were obliged to steal or starve. The farm labourers wages rose about a shilling a-week in every ten years till it reached 10s. per week, and at the formation of the Labourer's Union the wages rose to 13s., 14s., and in one case to 15s. per week, but the farmers gradually lowered the wages till it declined to 11s. per week, and in some villages it is as low as 10s. a-week.—John Smith, Whitechurch.

FRANCE.

ARMENTIERES.—The weavers of the firm of Louis Dulac have declared themselves on strike to the number of 250, having suffered a long time from many petty tyrannies and numberless fines. The head of the firm thinks fit to guard his weaving-sheds by a small troop of gendarmerie, which makes up in self-importance and pomposity for what it lacks in number—consisting of four men commanded by their brigadier. It is touching to picture this brave and devoted little band "rallying round" M. Dulac, and defending his sacred person against the encroachments of the "bold, bad striker" who endeavours vainly to seek an interview with his master, daring to think of discussing with him the conditions of work and wages of himself and his fellow-workers!

A representative of the Cri du Peuple has been wandering about the Champs de Mars among the works progressing for the construction of the Eissel tower and the military school not far off. The navvies labour ceaselessly under the sun in the stifling and airless trenches. "What do you earn?" is the first question asked them. "Only 45 centimes an hour (less than 4½d). They deduct one centime an hour to ensure the master against the accidents that may happen to us. The regular price is 60 centimes, but—well, one must live!" For 45 c. an hour these men have to get through a task which one would not venture to impose on convicts. Facing the military school are the sheds of one Jonclard, the forges de Franche-Comte. Same price, same deduction, the regular tariff again being ignored. Gloomy and desolate is the aspect of the Champs de Mars; from 150 to 200 labourers at most in all these immense works. Not a song, not a burst of laughter breaks the monotony of this desert, nothing but an occasional hammer-stroke to be heard. So much for these works so derisively promised the Parisian workers; people saying to them for several years, "Have patience a little longer."

AMERICA.

BOSTON, June 9.—There is no longer any doubt that the great struggle between employers and employés in the building trades will begin at once. The demand of the master builders that their union employés shall work with non-union men, if required, will be met with absolute refusal. Leading men in the Amalgamated Building Trades Union say emphatically that the point will never be yielded while their union exists. Members of the Building Trades Council expect that strikes and lock-outs will now begin, and within two weeks will become widespread. The union men credit the master builders with a determination to make a decisive fight on the issue raised. The address of the Master Builders' Association to the Amalgamated Building Trades' Council, insists on the right of employing non-unionists as well as unionists. It also quibbles upon other points. It is practically a breach of agreement. Their action is part of the great national scheme of Master Builders which took shape when the Chicago lock-out was declared a few weeks ago.

CHICAGO.—The master masons who started the great lock-out are getting but few recruits under the new rules, and these are set to work upon the most urgent jobs. The offer of compromise made by a few of the contractors was rejected by the men. Many of the masons are at work for the smaller employers, and many others have got jobs out of town. It looks to-day (June 9th) as though the carpenters, at the end of this week, would again lay down their tools unless the employers go back on their determination to re-establish the nine-hour working day. The association of the master carpenters includes over 300 contractors, who employ nearly four-fifths of all the carpenters in Chicago; and they have endorsed the working rules of the master masons, including the nine-hour rule, and fixed wages at a minimum of 30 cents per hour. The men demand the eight-hour rule, at 35 cents per hour. General Secretary McGuire, of the Brotherhood, is in Chicago, and though he is a very moderate man, he advised the journeymen to adhere to their terms.

"THE IMMORALITY OF INTEREST."

Sir,—I send you the following, suggested on reading the letter of a professor of science on "The Immorality of Interest." The relationship of capitalist, employer, and workman may, I think, be exhibited in the following manner:—At every engagement of wage labour, the employers, seeing an opportunity to production, and seeing a number of workmen, usually more than is wanted, with nothing in the world to sell but their labour, say, being by law and by custom enabled to do so, "Now, you compete among yourselves for work, and we, employers, will compete (!) among ourselves for your labour." The workmen submit, that is, they do so every time they accept wages. But this system of production, it was observed, afforded so large a return to the employers, that it was seen to be possible and of sufficient advantage to the parties concerned for the mere capitalists to unite with the would-be employers in the work of production, and then to share between them the returns which before went to the employers only. This being done, and the market for capital being thrown open to all, the "reward of abstinence" became determined by the ratio between the supply of and demand for capital. If this be a correct statement, not of the actual origin of interest perhaps but of the manner in which it might have originated under present conditions, it will be seen that the payment of interest depends on the possibility of making the wages contract. It is then, I take it, not a question of the morality of the payment of interest by employer to capitalist, which is a mere question of the division of the spoil, but it is the morality of the wages contract which must come under consideration, the capitalist being considered a party to it on the side of the employer.

This question of the morality of the wages contract I do not myself feel competent to deal with, yet I cannot fail to see that the present competitive system is a mere struggle for the benefits and advantages of wealth, wherein employer competes with employer, workman with workman, and the working-class competes with the employing class for the product of industry. More especially ought the working-class to realise the true nature of this last phase of the competition, that war, as I believe, is the true name for it, that in this strife, no more than in war, does any moral consideration whatever exist to prevent them demanding for themselves the whole of the product of their labour. It is this struggle for the product of industry which I, a workman, should like to see carried out to its only possible conclusion. Let once the workmen recognise the true nature of this competition, that in spite of all our boasted law and order it is nothing but a fight for wealth; let them but realise that it is individual ownership of the means of production, involving competition and the wage-labour system, which is the cause of the most of our poverty, ignorance, and crime, and they will at once, unless human nature fail in the very important element of selfishness, take action to secure the overthrow of the present competitive system, and the abolition of our present barbarous industrial relationships.—Yours truly,

A WORKMAN.

Indirect slavery—nominally the least odious, practically the worst of its forms—is now enthroned high and unquestioned. Disinherited man! you ask through your trades' unions and labour conventions only a modification of the inferior condition that has been forced on you, and which you accept.—The Odd Book.

NORTHUMBERIAN NOTES.

THERE is a remarkable leading article in the Newcastle Chronicle for June 13, on "Dwellings for the Poor," in which the following passage occurs:

"In schemes for the 'elevation of the masses,' the mistake is too often made of including under the head of 'the masses' the intelligent skilled artisan and the unskilled and casual labour class—and the schemes proposed are usually such as will further improve and develop the intelligence and artistic tastes of the former—but leave the lowest and poorest class untouched. There are hundreds of thousands of the latter so deadened by abject poverty, so steeped in misery, so absorbed in the passionate struggle for the morsel of daily bread, so densely herded together, that the little smattering of education they may once have possessed has been lost in the fight for existence, and they have neither the desire nor the power to avail themselves of the higher culture agencies provided."

The great mistake the average middle-class person makes is to assume that the difference between rich and poor is not getting bigger because the "working class" gets so-and-so much wages on the average. This is just a case where averages only conceal the truth. One of the rotten elements in "reforms" of this kind is that the benefit (if there ever is any) goes to those who need it least, and those who needed it most are left as poor, and getting poorer than before.

There is some fear of the strike breaking out again. The men are very bitter at having to resume work at such a miserable rate of wages, and they are, again, dissatisfied with the action of their agents in the way they are settling the new sliding-scale. The talk about the men going back "joyfully" to work is all bosh.

The spread of co-operation in the north of England has been enormous. The concentration of the work of distribution of course bears hard upon the small shopkeepers. The feeling of the traders against the co-operative stores is getting very bitter, and they are preparing to express it. A shopkeepers' agitation will soon be started against the co-operators, and we shall have a lively fight between them.

The men at Sir William Armstrong's Elswick works had a meeting and decided to work on Jubilee day. They think that the race-week holidays are much more important or more interesting than the Jubilee tomfoolery.

I held a most successful meeting at Consett last week. The condition of the men at these famous iron and steel works is such that they must soon become Socialists. Steel is gradually superseding iron for most purposes. The making of steel only requires about half the number of men and a less quantity of steel serves in the place of iron. Thus the men are thrown out of work and kept out. Plainly, the disturbance caused here will smash the trade union, unless it becomes a Socialistic body. The men are beginning to see this, and get more eager to hear the Socialist speakers.

The North of England Socialist Federation is making good progress. During the past week over a dozen thoroughly successful meetings have been held and several new branches organised. The miners are taking up the work of organisation very energetically, and the propaganda goes on as effectively as ever. There has been none of the waning in enthusiasm so confidently foretold by the enemies of Socialism down here. Since going back to work the miners have shown as much resolution as ever, and seem to be fully conscious of the great and pressing need for pushing on the spread of Socialism. Great good was done by Mrs. Besant's spirited and convincing lecture to the miners at Seaton Delaval last Saturday. Donald's return to help in the work is looked forward to with interest, and arrangements are being made with the Rev. Stewart D. Headlam for a series of meetings.

REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, June 15, D. J. Nicoll lectured on "Our Political Parties." Lively discussion followed. On Sunday, June 19, we held good meeting on Clerkenwell Green. In our hall, after the outdoor meeting, a large audience had gathered to hear "The Jubilee Recognition." The proceedings commenced by singing "The March of the Workers," every one standing up and joining in heartily. Then followed the reading of some lessons, by T. E. Wardle, from Joynes's 'Socialist Catechism.' After this, "No Master" was sung lustily by the audience, and then T. Dalziel gave short treatise to the "Goddess of Truth." W. Blundell followed, taking as his text, "Do unto others as you would be done by." He pointed out the fearful misery existing in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, and yet the people were asked to throw up their caps and rend the air with shouts because of the completion of a fifty years reign by Mrs. Guelph. He had no hesitation in describing it as only fit (especially the latter part) to be classed with the barbaric age. The meeting closed with the "Marseillaise." A large number of 'Chants for Socialists' were sold. Annie Taylor rendered valuable assistance at the piano.—A. T. and W. B.

HOKT N.—Sunday morning very successful outdoor meeting. Sunday evening W. C. Wade gave a very interesting historical lecture—"Henry VIII's Legacy."

HACKNEY.—Graham addressed a very successful meeting at the Broadway on Wednesday evening. Hobbs and Allman spoke to a good meeting at the Salmon and Ball on Sunday morning. An interesting lecture on "Liberty" was delivered by S. Mainwaring at the Club on Sunday evening. The lecturer clearly showed the evils of parliamentarianism, and exposed the fallacies of government, etc. This subject will be enlarged upon by Mainwaring at the Club on July 24. We recommend all members of the Socialist League to hear this lecture.

MARYLEBON.—A rather lengthy meeting was held at Hyde Park Sunday afternoon, addressed by Cantwell, Doughty, Mrs. Taylor, Mainwaring, Samuels, and Turner. One opponent endeavoured to show the utility of a monarch in modern society. Sale of literature fair.—T. C.

MILE-END.—Good meeting on the Waste on Sunday. Good work may be done here. Those willing to co-operate in forming a Bethnal Green and Mile-end Branch are requested to correspond with H. Davis, 12 Florida Street, Harts Lane, Bethnal Green. A meeting will take place for the above object at 95 Boston St., Hackney Road, on Tuesday June 28. All those interested are requested to attend.—H. DAVIS.

NORTH LONDON.—We held a very good meeting at Ossulton Street on Tuesday. Comrades Sparling and Blundell spoke, and we sang the "Starving Poor of Old England" amid considerable enthusiasm. Commonweal sold well. On Sunday morning Mainwaring and Brooks spoke to a variable audience. Sale of literature fair.—H. BARTLETT.

DALKEITH.—On Wednesday June 15 J. H. Smith of Edinburgh, read a capital paper on "Socialism," Tuke in the chair. Gilray also spoke. Persons wishing to join the Branch here please communicate with John Thomson, secretary, 146 High Street.

EDINBURGH.—On Thursday June 16, in place of our usual study of 'Das Capital,' we read and discussed certain portions of the article "Socialism" in the present issue of the 'Encyclopedia Britannica.' The article is exceedingly able and very sympathetic; but Mr. Kirkup (the writer) completely misrepresents Marx in saying that he (Marx) taught that manual labour was the sole source of value. On Saturday evening, at Loanhead, Jno. Smith and C. W. Tuke spoke to a good meeting. On Sunday evening we were successful in having a meeting larger than any we have lately had in the afternoon. We will meet in future in the evening. Jno. Smith and Gilray spoke. One question was put—as to how work would be rewarded in a Socialist State. Tuke spoke in the Meadows. Average sale of Commonweal kept up.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday Paterson and Carmichael proceeded to Motherwell and explained the principles of Socialism to a fairly large audience. They afterwards went to Hamilton and met Glasier. Here they found a religious meeting on the ground before them, but in spite of this disadvantage our comrades succeeded in securing a satisfactory audience. On Sunday in Jail Square some hundreds of people listened with appreciation to addresses from Glasier, Carmichael, and Belbin. On the evening of the same day M'Kechin and Belbin addressed a meeting in Stobcross Street.—A. M.

LEEDS.—On Sunday morning, we held our usual open-air meeting on Hunslet Moor. Comrades Maguire and Hill addressed the audience on "Passing Events." In the afternoon we met the Bradford comrades at Cleckheaton, where we had tea together. After tea we held an open-air meeting in the Market-place. The bulk of the audience were very attentive, and were addressed by comrades Maguire, Paylor (Leeds), Mitchell and Minty (Bradford). A good many back numbers of the Commonweal were given away. At the close of the meeting we went to Liversedge and held another open-air meeting. Comrades Bland (Bradford), Maguire, Hill, and Braithwaite (Leeds) addressed the audience on the "Principles of Socialism." The audiences at these two meetings had apparently never heard a Socialist speaker before, but we think that with a little work a good branch may be started in that quarter.—F. C., sec.

NORWICH.—On Thursday last we held a large meeting at Dereham, addressed by Henderson and Morley. On Sunday morning a large meeting was held at Diss, addressed by Lane, Slaughter, Morley, and Houghton. Two meetings were also held at Lyng, addressed by several comrades. At Norwich in the afternoon, we held our usual meeting in the Market-place, where a large concourse of people were assembled, and carried a resolution calling for the release of our comrade Mowbray on the Jubilee day. Henderson, speaking at some length, gave a case that had been drawn to his notice of a young man dying of destitution earning 6s. a week, and had to keep a blind mother and pay 1s. 6d. per week rent. Some opposition was given by Mr. Scurbes, which was replied to by Henderson to the satisfaction of all, 5s. being collected for Propaganda Fund. In the evening, Henderson addressed a meeting on the Agricultural Hall Plain. At 8 o'clock, Henderson lectured in the Gordon Hall on "Fifty Years National Progress," which was listened to with great attention.—J. S.

WALSALL.—On Monday evening, H. Sanders addressed a good open-air meeting of chain-makers at Cradley Heath. About 700 men are still on strike, and recognising that there is no likelihood of their obtaining the advance asked for, so long as portion of the trade are at work and masters thereby able to execute orders, have decided to have a general turn out again and establishing a co-operative society as a means of bettering their condition. The Commonweal, containing comrade Donald's report of his visit to the district, was well distributed and much satisfaction expressed with it. On Saturday, Sanders spoke in the Market-place, Walsall, to large and most attentive audiences on "The Jubilee" and "The Cause of Poverty." Fair sale of pamphlets and Commonweal.—J. T. D.

On Sunday morning, H. A. Barker lectured on Kingsland Green under the auspices of the Ball's Pond Branch of the N.S.S., to a good audience.

NOTTINGHAM SECTION SOCIALIST UNION.—On Thursday, June 16, at the club, a tea and social evening was held, which was well attended. On Sunday morning in Sneinton Market, Peacock and Proctor addressed a good audience, and 2s. 3d. was collected. In the evening, the same speakers addressed a large and interested meeting in the great market-place; 5s. 1½d. collected, making for the day 7s. 4½d. for club and propaganda work. Commonweal sold out, and a great demand for more which we were unable to supply. A meeting was afterwards held at the club, and seven members enrolled.—A. C.

WOOLWICH.—On Sunday evening Banner and Donald held good meeting at Arsenal Gates. Literature sold well. 4s. 3d. collected for propaganda.—R. B.

A LEGAL VIEW OF SOCIALISM.

WHEN good old Burton attacked the generality of lawyers and wrote them down as "a purse-milking nation, a clamorous company, gowned vultures," as "irreligious harpies, scraping, griping catch-poles," he wellnigh forgot to except the "worthy lawyers that are so many oracles and pilots of a well-governed commonwealth." To-day men are quite as prone to overlook the presence of good honest men among lawyers, and write them down as being equal with the worst. E. B. Bax has proved to his own satisfaction, and that of some others, that a judge cannot think, or honestly hold his position. An advocate is writ down a mercenary bravo, and a judge as an inhuman weighing machine or partisan trickster.

It is unhappily true that the majority of the legal profession is hopelessly corrupt; that there is no cause too foul and no wrong too hideous for lawyers to espouse for pay or promotion; that in the whole course of history there has been no cause too noble to be opposed or betrayed from the same high motives. Laden with no conscience and impeded by no principle, there have always been found men to do the dirty work of tyranny, legal or commercial. Yet there have been innumerable instances, on the other side, of men who at the Bar defended or upon the Bench upheld the majesty of Justice; who, disregarding bribery and the applause of the powerful, dared to think for the people and speak truth. Such men we shall see again in the fitting time of stress and trial. Meanwhile we may hail with pleasure the spectacle of the Lord Chief Justice of England daring to denounce the ghastly mockery of "free contract." We may also in great measure count him heroic when we consider his position and surroundings, and find him questioning the "sacred rights of property" and reasserting the grand old axiom, Salus populi suprema lex.

To the annual meeting of the Glasgow Juridical Society, a few weeks ago, Lord Coleridge delivered an address which he called "Thoughts on the value of clear views upon the laws regulating the enjoyment of property." It is the most searching criticism of one special subject that has been made for a very long time, and should be printed and circulated widely. He began by adjuring his hearers in all controversies to begin by clearly understanding each other's meaning, and by ascertaining whether the difference between them were one of principle or no. It remains as true as it was in the days of Bishop Butler that "few persons exercise their judgment upon what comes before them in the way of determining whether it be conclusive or holds"; and again, "arguments are often wanted for some accidental purpose, but proof as such is what some persons never want." To clear the mind, to see things as they really are, to deal with an opponent's statement as he makes it, and either admit or deny it, these are the first necessities of fruitful controversy; without them the argument degenerates into an endless and unprofitable wrangle. Yet generally the first step is to mistake the proposition impugned, and the commonest argument is consciously or unconsciously to misrepresent it. Controversy is not perhaps the best intellectual atmosphere for a man to dwell in; yet honest controversy has a bracing effect upon a healthy mind, and the effect is lost if we dispute for triumph rather than truth; and although we do not clear our own mind, succeed perhaps in darkening another. And surely if clear views and lucid statements are important in any sort of intellectual pursuit, they are of special importance in things connected with law, the science of the rules of life, of order, of conduct; ignorance of which is grave misfortune; fallacies in which are followed by cruel evils to those who fall into them, more cruel still to those who are the subjects of them. Yet there is no more common confusion than that which is so habitually made between the principles which underlie all law, which are indeed its virtual elements, and the applications of those principles to states and circumstances that rise and pass away, changing with the generations of men, and, as man himself, never continuing in one stage. Yet a present application or illustration of a principle is constantly mistaken for the principle itself, and those who demur to the application of the principle or go about to reform it, are assailed as though they denied the principle itself or desired its destruction. Many examples were cited in proof of the position maintained, that men confound forms with the substance of which they are the outward manifestations, and deal with those who differ with them in point of form as if they were denying the existence of that of which the various forms are but the various clothings.

In the present day there is perhaps nothing as to which this confusion is greater or more mischievous than as to property itself—the idea or principle of property, and as to the laws of property—the rules by which the practical enjoyment of property is regulated in these islands. The distinction is so obvious that one would think it impossible to be disputed. Perhaps none dispute it in words, but though it undoubtedly exists it is as undoubtedly often utterly forgotten, and that not only by men who cannot grasp a clear thought, and who purposely pass it by, but by men of reflection and cultivation, who seem to lose in their dealings with this question the judgment and temper which education ought to create or to improve.

The right of property, that is the right to possess peaceably what you have yourself acquired, underlies all society. Some sort of right is taken for granted in all communities, even the most savage; without some such right no society could exist. Now what is that right? It is very well put by Sir W. Blackstone in his second book, It is still better put in the 'Treatise on the Law of Forfeiture,' which remains the sole evidence to these times of the brilliant but unhappy Charles Yorke. The end of property, he says, is subsistence, by which end nature has branded our pretensions to it. Hence in a state of nature we cannot assume more than we use, nor hold it longer than we have it, longer than we live and are capable of using it. The manner of acquiring property in a state of nature is by occupancy, an act of the body not of the mind, which last would give a title to property too precarious and disputable. In transferring property the consent expressed gives a right to the alienee against the alienor, and occupancy confirms that right against everyone else. But after death there can be no such expression. All other modes of transmission or acquiring are acts of positive and civil law which prevents the property of the dead from reverting, as it would do in a state of nature, to the common stock; and no such modes are manners of acquiring property necessary for the subsistence of mankind or to support the purposes of nature. You may find the same thing elaborately described by Blackstone in the beginning of his second book, and by the writers whom Blackstone himself quotes from and adopts. You will also find it very clearly shown in these and other writers of authority, on grounds of reason and by the distinct evidence of history, that all the complicated and conflicting systems, by which in various civilised countries the powers of the possessors of property have been in various ways now narrowed, now enlarged, are systems of positive law, and that the right of property, as Mr. Austen has shown, has never existed even in its most absolute form without some restriction.

Many laws, among them those dealing with primogeniture, entail, and mortmain, made it clear that the English State claimed to prescribe the conditions on which its citizens should deal with property. It seems also to be reasonably clear that the power which prescribes rules can alter them; that plain absurdities would follow if this were not so, and that the consent of nations and the practice of ages has long since established this simple truth. But the consequences that follow from it are not always apprehended or recognised by those whom they concern. You will hear men talk as if a rule, once laid down, were laid down for ever; as if the rules of enjoyment became part of the thing enjoyed; and as if everyone who presumed to question the wisdom of the rules questioned the existence of that which is the subject of the rules, and that he who dares to propose an alteration should propose it, as in the old Greek Republic, with a halter round his neck. This seems absurd enough, but I put it to anyone of common fairness of mind, and the most ordinary knowledge of history, whether it is not now too much the fact, and whether it was not in times not quite gone by awfully and disgracefully the fact. The terrible penal laws which even so lately made capital crimes of insignificant offences, were defended by men of great power and high character, who always based their resistance to reform on the ground that to abrogate those laws was to attack property, and that to attack property was to subvert society itself. It is necessary to examine these examples of a state of feeling long since passed away, as old-world as the curfew or the sale of a ward's marriage. Necessary for this reason, that the feeling is not dead; the confusion of thought which is supposed to qualify the feeling is as prevalent as ever, though these particular examples may exist no longer.

It has been shown that the institution of property rests upon the general advantage. The particular rules by which the enjoyment of property is regulated, differing in every country of the world, must rest at last upon one and the same foundation—the general advantage. In this respect the laws of property resemble all other laws. The defence of any law must ultimately rest on this, that it ensues to the general advantage. Despots, if they condescend to a defence of their despotism, base it on this ground. In free countries one cannot conceive of a law resting on any other. It seems an elementary proposition that a free people can deal as it thinks fit with its common stock, and can prescribe to its citizens rules for its enjoyment, alienation, and transmission. That 50 or 100 gentlemen, or even 1,000, should have a right, by agreeing to shut the coal mines, to stop the manufactures of Great Britain, and to paralyse her commerce, seems unspeakably absurd. And again, as to perpetuities, no man can give what he did not receive, and as no man can himself have a perpetuity, so he cannot give it to anyone else. It would indeed be difficult, in the face of bills passed by the hundred every year through both Houses of Parliament, to deny that private property may be rightly interfered with for the public good. But then it is said you have no right to do it except on proper compensation. What is the exact meaning of these words, especially "right" and "proper?" Is the absolute right—right, not power, for that no man questions—is the absolute right of the State intended to be denied to deal with the common stock with or without compensation? And by "proper compensation," is it meant that the compensation is to be proper in the opinion of the person compensated, or the person compensating, or whom? Men to whose personal loss the law is altered are, as matter of common fairness, to be considered in every way, and nothing should be done to their detriment that it is possible to avoid, but it has been decided for centuries that they most certainly have no claim—no legal right—to compensation. All the laws of property must stand upon the footing of general advantage: a country belongs to the inhabitants: in what proportion and by what rules its inhabitants are to own it must be settled by the law, and the moment that a fragment of the people sets up rights inherent in themselves, and not founded on the public good, "plain absurdities" follow. Property is not inherently in this class or in that, or in this man or in that, but laws of property are, like all other laws, made by the State for the State, and are the expression of what is from time to time the judgment of that cultivated intelligence which in a free country controls and leads the opinion of the State upon the various subjects of the laws. Every change should be made with care and tenderness, without unnecessary disturbance, with compensation satisfactory, if it may be, even to the persons unfavourably affected by the change, and doing no violence to the great principle that right must not be compassed by wrong, nor evil done that good may come of it; but, it is not wrong to change the law on good reason of fair terms; it is not evil to vindicate the supremacy of the State over that which is being employed for its destruction. It would be well that all owners of property, from the largest to the smallest, should recognise distinctly that their title to the enjoyment of it must rest upon the same foundation—law, whether positive or presumptive; law, which is practical and intelligible; not upon anything sacred or mystical and transcendental, and that the mode and measure of their enjoyment of the common stock of the State, if it injures the State, can no more be defended, and will no more endure, than can any other public mischief or nuisance, be it criminal or be it civil. It is no doubt often said that to change laws of property involves, as a rule, an interference with free contract; but freedom of contract implies that both parties to it are really and not nominally free. There can be no free contract between a slave and his owner; none with a little child; none where one party to a so-called contract can impose, and the other party to it must accept, its terms, however burdensome, however inherently unjust. Let those who idolise freedom of contract remember what they generally forget, that they must, in consistency, denounce every statute which allows of and regulates bankruptcy, from James VI. of Scotland to Mr. Chamberlain.

Those who rabidly attack Socialists should ponder these utterances of one of the greatest lawyers of the age. To him who reads aright it can but be evident that here a great mind has been weighing the subject without bias, and has spoken upon it as one anxious to aid in its being understood, though he is no partisan of a particular interpretation.

To the Socialist it shows that the ideas for which he fights are making way not alone in the street and in the study, but in every place in which the minds of men are formed or their energies put forth.

H. HALLIDAY SPARLING.

FATHER M'GLYNN AND THE VATICAN—NEW YORK, June 23.—The officers of the Organised Labour party, after the mass meeting held in Union Square on the night of the 18th inst. to do honour to Father M'Glynn, sent a cablegram to Cardinal Simeoni declaring that 100,000 Catholics denounce the threat to excommunicate Father M'Glynn, and protest against ecclesiastical interference with the rights of Americans.—ROME, June 24.—A few days have still to elapse before the term of 40 days assigned to Father M'Glynn for submission to the Papal See expires. It is not believed in clerical circles that he will now obey the Pope's summons to Rome; and if he continues recalcitrant, the sentence of formal excommunication will be pronounced.

HOW IT IS DONE NOW, AND WHAT MAY BE THE FUTURE.—First Year:—Labourers (humbly): "Please, Mr. Capitalist, give us a little better wages; our homes are little better than dog-kennels, our families are starving, our—" Capitalist (sternly): "Oh, get out! You people are always whining! Do you want the earth?" Second Year:—Labourers (respectfully): "We cannot work longer for such small wages; we must live and have decent houses for our families." Capitalist (ironically): "You needn't work for me if the wages don't suit you. This is a free country, and you are at perfect liberty to leave and go somewhere else." Third Year:—Labourers (angrily): "We cannot and will not stand this oppression any longer. We produce the wealth and we propose to have it." Capitalist (terrified): "What is this? Police! Socialists! Anarchists! Communists!" Fourth Year:—Labourers: Boom!!! No capitalists henceforth heard from.—Cato, in Denver Labour Enquirer.

HOW WE LIVE AND HOW WE MIGHT LIVE.

To what extent it may be necessary or desirable for people under social order to live in common, we may differ pretty much according to our tendencies towards social life. For my part I can't see why we should think it a hardship to eat with the people we work with; I am sure that as to many things, such as valuable books, pictures, and splendour of surroundings, we shall find it better to club our means together; and I must say that often when I have been sickened by the stupidity of the mean idiotic rabbit warrens that rich men build for themselves in Bayswater and elsewhere, I console myself with visions of the noble communal hall of the future, unsparing of materials, generous in worthy ornament, alive with the noblest thoughts of our time, and the past embodied in the best art which free and manly people could produce; such an abode of man as no private enterprise could come anywhere near for beauty and fitness, because only collective thought and collective life could cherish the aspirations which would give birth to its beauty, or have the skill and leisure to carry them out. I for my part should think it much the reverse of a hardship if I had to read my books and meet my friends in such a place; nor do I think I am better off to live in a vulgar stuccoed house crowded with upholstery that I despise, in all respects degrading to the mind and enervating to the body to live in, simply because I call it my own, or my house. It is not an original remark, but I make it here, that my home is where I meet people with whom I sympathise, whom I love. Well, that is my opinion as a middle-class man. Whether a working-class man would think his family possession of his wretched little room better than his share of the palace of which I have spoken I must leave to his opinion, and to the imaginations of the middle class, who perhaps may sometimes conceive the fact that the said worker is cramped for space and comfort—say on washing day.

Before I leave this matter of the surroundings of life, I wish to meet a possible objection. I have spoken of machinery being used freely for releasing people from the more mechanical and repulsive part of necessary labour; and I know that to some cultivated people, people of the artistic turn of mind, machinery is particularly distasteful, and they will be apt to say you will never get your surroundings pleasant so long as you are surrounded by machinery. I don't quite admit that; it is the allowing machines to be our masters and not our servants that so injures the beauty of life nowadays. In other words, it is the token of the terrible crime we have fallen into of using our control of the powers of nature for the purpose of enslaving people, we careless meantime of how much happiness we rob their lives of.

Yet for the consolation of the artists I will say that I believe indeed that a state of social order would probably lead at first to a great development of machinery for really useful purposes, because people will still be anxious about getting through the work necessary to holding society together; but that after a while they will find that there is not so much work to do as they expected, and that then they will have leisure to reconsider the whole subject; and if it seems to them that a certain industry would be carried on more pleasantly as regards the worker, and more effectually as regards the goods by using hand-work rather than machinery, they will certainly get rid of their machinery, because it will be possible for them to do so. It isn't possible now; we are not at liberty to do so; we are slaves to the monsters which we have created. And I have a kind of hope that the very elaboration of machinery in a society whose purpose is not the multiplication of labour, as it now is, but the carrying on of a pleasant life as it would be under social order; that the elaboration of machinery, I say, will lead to the simplification of life, and so once more to the limitation of machinery.

Well, I will now let my claims for decent life stand as I have made them. To sum them up in brief, they are: First, a healthy body; second, an active mind in sympathy with the past, the present, and the future; thirdly, occupation fit for a healthy body and an active mind; and fourth, a beautiful world to live in. These are the conditions of life which the refined man of all ages has set before him as the thing above all others to be attained. Too often he has been so foiled in their pursuit that he has turned longing eyes backward to the days before civilisation, when man's sole business was getting himself food from day to day, and hope was dormant in him, or at least could not be expressed by him.

Indeed, if civilisation (as many think) forbids the realisation of the hope to attain such conditions of life, then civilisation forbids mankind to be happy; and if that is the case, then let us stifle all aspirations towards progress—nay, all feelings of mutual goodwill and affection between men—and snatch each one of us what we can from the heap of wealth that fools create for rogues to grow fat on; or better still, let us as speedily as possible find some means of dying like men, since we are forbidden to live like men.

Rather, however, take courage, and believe that we of this age, in spite of all its torment and disorder, have been born to a wonderful heritage fashioned of the work of those that have gone before us; and that the day of the organisation of man is dawning. It is not we who can build up the new social order; the past ages have done that for us; but we can clear our eyes to the signs of the times, and we shall then see that the attainment of a good condition of life is being made possible for us, and that it is now our business to stretch out our hands to take it. And how? Chiefly, I think, by educating people to a sense of their real capacities as men, so that they may be able to use to their own good the political power which is rapidly being thrust upon them; to get them to see that the old system of organising labour for individual profit is becoming unmanageable, and that the whole people have now got to choose between the confusion resulting from the break up of that system and the determination to take in hand the labour now organised for profit, and use its organisation for the livelihood of the community: to get people to see that individual profit-makers are not a necessity for labour but an obstruction to it, and that not only or chiefly because they are the perpetual pensioners of labour, as they are, but rather because of the waste which their existence as a class necessitates. All this we have to teach people, when we have taught ourselves, and I admit that the work is long and burdensome; as I began by saying, people have been made so timorous of change by the terror of starvation that even the unluckiest of them are stolid and hard to move. Hard as the work is, however, its reward is not doubtful. The mere fact that a body of men, however small, are banded together as Socialist missionaries shows that the change is going on. As the working class, the real organic part of society, takes in these ideas, hope will arise in them, and they will claim changes in society, many of which doubtless will not tend directly towards their emancipation, because they will be claimed without due knowledge of the one thing necessary to claim, equality of condition; but which indirectly will help to break up our rotten sham society, while that claim for equality of condition will be made constantly and with growing loudness till it must be listened to, and then at last it will only be a step over the border and the civilised world will be socialised; and looking back on what has been, we shall be astonished to think of how long we submitted to live as we live now.

SOCIALIST FEAST IN COPENHAGEN.

DURING all the years in which the political conflict has been going on in Denmark, the 5th of June has been a field-day for the parties. The Social Democratic workmen party also has made that day a feast, not exactly in memory of the charter of the constitution (for to this the working-men are not very much indebted), but a feast which gives us an opportunity for encouraging ourselves to fight for our rights. Year after year the partakers in the feast have grown in number. Last year it was evident that the feast-place was too small; therefore, this year it was enlarged from 21 to 35 acres of land. As in 1886 it was a part of the place for exercising soldiers.

The show was arranged at 1 o'clock in "Norre-Boulevard." 135 unions with their (mostly red) ensigns and banners were present, and 18 bands of music were distributed throughout the procession. All the partakers wore red ribands on the breast; many of them had a red paper, with the words "liberty, equality, brotherhood" in white, on their hats; some carried little red banners with the same words in gold. Foremost in the show walked the Council of the Social Democratic Federation and the Redaction of the Social Democrat; after them followed the members of the Federation with the old ensign of "Internationale," which the Hussars in vain tried to capture at the first great workmen's meeting in Copenhagen. At 2 o'clock the show proceeded from the rendezvous through the main streets; along the road were large masses of people standing to see it pass, and from most houses it was saluted with cheers and flowers. The show was greater than last year, and especially should be noticed 500 women, who with their own ensigns formed a separate division. About 30,000 men and women took part in the show, and it had a length of two English miles, the ranks marching very near each other. It lasted more than two hours before the foremost reached the festival place, the entrance to which was marked with flags and the inscriptions, "Liberty, equality, brotherhood;" "The people's will is the supreme law." The place was enclosed by green branches, and from the enclosure waved the flags of all nations. Upon a hill was raised a decoration of flags, and on a pole 70 ft. high, from which an electric light at night enlightened the place, was hoisted a red flag with the inscription, "Welcome!" As a union arrived at its platform, it stopped and planted there its ensigns and banners. It was a magnificent appearance that of the large show with its many, and for the most part valuable, silken banners, among which red was the prevailing colour, entering the place.

Before the procession arrived, about 20,000 men and women were gathered in the feast-place, and more entered with it, so that at 6.15 o'clock about 70,000 people were assembled around the platforms. At a given sign all the bands played, and the partakers in the feast sang a song glorifying Liberty, and then the speeches began.

The smith Hurop, the joiner Berg, and the cigarmaker Olsen were in the three chairs, while the painter J. Jensen, the secretary Hordum, and P. Holm, M.P., spoke courageously and stoutly about liberty; and after a song for Socialism, the secretary of the Federation, P. Knudsen, the joiner C. C. Andersen, and the treasurer of the Federation G. C. Olsen, spoke about Socialism. At last a song, "To the worker," was sung, and then the partakers, who had enthusiastically cheered the speakers, spread to the different refreshment-tents, while dancing began upon the places set apart for it, which were illuminated by coloured lamps. At midnight the feast ended, and it was again made evident that the working-men themselves keep the best order, and that the constables had nothing else to do beside listening to the speeches, and seeing how the working-men succeeded in celebrating their annual liberty-feast. To the feast telegrams of congratulation arrived from 24 Social Democratic Unions in the country. In most of the towns the workmen party also held liberty-feasts. Especially should be mentioned the feast in Aarhus, the second town in Denmark. Fourteen unions and about 8,000 men and women were present there, and the speeches of Marott, editor of the Demokraten, of Harald Jensen, and the typographer Nielsen, were highly applauded.—With Socialistic greeting, Copenhagen, June 11, 1887.

NORTHUMBRIAN NOTES.

THE masters in some cases are preparing to boycott the Socialist Federation branches. At Broomhill the notices stuck up at the pit heap were taken down by order of the managers, although all kinds of notices are usually placed there. The men, however, are not easily cowed, and a little of this kind of action will be useful to the movement.

The dissatisfaction of the men at the action of the Miners' Union agents is getting stronger, and there is a growing settled conviction that a thorough reorganisation of the union is necessary. It is rather discouraging to hear that many miners intend to leave the union. This action is decidedly wrong, and if persisted in will mean the practical smash up of the union. The men have certainly been shamefully used by their leaders, whose action cannot be excused and should not be tolerated, but there is another way of looking at the matter.

In the past the miners, just like all trades' unionists, have been very regardless of the business of their organisation. As long as things went with seeming smoothness they were quite careless of what the officers did. Now when a crisis is at hand it would be cowardly as well as foolish to desert the union. The men have the power to make their society what they wish, and the fault is very much their own that hitherto they have had no definite ideas as to how things should be done, and what aim should be kept in view.

The discussion on the Mines Regulation Bill is a fine example of the uselessness of the present labour M.P.'s. The excessively moderate proposal to reduce the working hours for boys from 54 to 48 per week, was spoken to by Mr. Burt in a way that put an excuse for pitching it out into Mr. W. H. Smith's hand. "I shall vote for this as a matter of policy, but I hope it won't be carried," was the very apparent meaning of what Mr. Burt said, and Mr. Smith, of course, pointed out that as the chief labour M.P. did not care for the amendment the Government would not accept it.

Mr. Bradlaugh fairly outdid himself when he opposed the attempt to put a stop to women working about the pits. As a matter of principle Mr. Bradlaugh objects to interfering with what he calls the "freedom" of labour. Under the present system women are set to do this and other degrading kinds of work because their labour is cheaper than men's; the present organisation of industry forces them to compete against their husbands and brothers, and the capitalists do all they can to encourage it. To ignore the fact that the women are forced into this work, and then to proclaim the wickedness of interfering with their freedom, is really too absurd.

There is a very able article by George Julian Harney (U.S.A.) in the Jubilee supplement to the Newcastle Chronicle for June 22nd, giving a sketch of the Chartist movement, and a useful reminder that the extended political liberty of the last fifty years has simply given more power to the capitalist as against the landlord, and not to the worker as against the employing class.

J. L. MAHON.

One of the coalowners that insisted most firmly on the reduction—Potter—has just died. Curiously enough, Potter's father died immediately after a strike which terminated adversely to the men some years ago. Superstitious people might say that this was another solemn warning to the Potter family against grinding down the wages of the workers.

In an article in the Co-operative News G. J. Holyoake says that J. Brailsford Bright's article in the Commonweal is the first sign of a disposition on the part of Socialists to regard co-operation with a friendly eye. It is a pity that a representative man like Mr. Holyoake should know so little of the present Socialist movement and its relation to other progressive movements. In spite of the fact that some Socialists, by no means of a representative standing, have railed against co-operation, the party generally is in sympathy with the aims of co-operators. Sometimes unfortunately mere dividend-hunting arrogates to itself the title of co-operation, and then it deserves condemnation not because under present conditions it is wrong for workmen to get dividends when they can, but because they put forward their dividend-hunting as a remedy for the present system of exploitation.

"O'Brien is a MAN. Honour and praise to that courage that refuses the protection of the capitalist troops, even when his life is menaced.—Denver Labor Enquirer. Well, "you can't most always sometimes tell." This same O'Brien sought the protection of the "saviours of society" in New York, June 4, and he successfully escaped being publicly worshipped by the hero-worshipping workmen. He was horrified to think that the "mudsills" want to abolish private property in land. He wants none of that, and yet he has been lauded as an Irish patriot! D'ye call that a man?—Workmen's Advocate.

NOTES.

The Pall Mall is sanguine enough to see a hope of Liberal reunion in Lord Hartington's speech; a less sanguine supporter of Liberalism would see in it the ordinary utterance of a Tory in Whig's clothing (which is the wolf and which the sheep?). But really to take any serious notice of such people as this lazy Whig-Tory lord would be beneath the part of the mere journalist even, if it were not for the worship of Parliament which is such a curious part of the modern Englishman's creed. Meanwhile there is one comfort, not all the Queen's horses (even with artificial tails and stuffed ears) and all the Queen's men can put the Liberal party together again. There is an end of that piece of humbug at any rate.

It is said in the daily papers: "An illuminated address of congratulation on the event of the Jubilee will be presented to her Majesty to-day by Sir James D. Linton and Mr. Alfred Everill on behalf of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours. It is bound in the form of an album in crimson plush," etc. Only by a printers' error, I suppose, the statement is omitted that the plush was cut from the seat of a pair of breeches of that material hitherto reserved for the wear of the President of the illustrious society—the loss will be supplied.

The amendment to the Mines Regulation Bill designed to put an end to the work of the pit-brow women was thrown out. This was a foregone conclusion, considering the amount of ignorance of economy shown on both sides of the question, mingled with the determination to do nothing likely to put a spoke in the wheel of capitalism, which is the natural atmosphere of the House of Commons. Mr. M'Laren, apparently quite innocently, gave the key-note to the whole debate when he said, "No objection had been urged against the employment of women on the pit-bank that could not be urged with as much force against the whole factory system of this country."

To Mr. M'Laren that seemed a conclusive argument;—and to us it seems so also. It would not be worth while attacking here and there a special abuse, a special horror of the present labour system, unless through it we were attacking the whole capitalistic system; we don't want to improve the system which Mr. M'Laren obviously thinks as necessary to the production of commodities as the sun is to the production of plants, but to sweep it away.

The case of the pit-brow women has been put more than once in the Commonweal, but as not everybody who may get hold of this number will be a subscriber to the paper, it may shortly be stated again thus:

that these women are employed on work unfit for women in order to reduce the wages of men in the coal industry. That is the whole matter in a nutshell.

A letter on "The Labour Struggle," signed "Oswald Birchall," and dated "Buscot Rectory, Lechlade, Jubilee Day," appears in the Co-operative News, in the course of which the writer says, "I am glad to learn from the News that co-operation is to be started at Cradley Heath, but for such news I am generally obliged to turn to 'The Labour Struggle' in the Commonweal, of which I send you the current number. I do not know how far the picture made up by the various items there may be accurate or not; but surely it is as dreadfully startling as ever, and ought to be looked into by all co-operative associations, with a view to productive experiments, without waiting for any other objects." I am sure I may venture to inform our friend that, if there be any inaccuracy in the "dreadfully startling" account presented in the "Labour Struggle," it is certainly not in the direction of overstating the case.

T. B.

A FREE-TRADER'S VIEW OF THE LABOUR QUESTION.

II.

This, then, is the second proposition that presents itself in considering Mr. Atkinson's view of the relations of labour and capital: That the nationalisation of capital, attended as it would be by the division of the profits of the capitalists amongst the working classes, would give such slight additional advantage to the latter as to render it, even if just, not worth the trouble of doing.

As I have already pointed out, most capitalists get far more than 5½ per cent. of the total proceeds of their business; railway shareholders, for instance, taking more than one-half, or over 50 per cent. In such cases there can be no question whether it is worth while for the labourers to claim their rights. I must leave it to the men who live on £60 a-year to determine whether an extra £12 is worth striving for. All I know is, that it is not worth their while to work as they do for what they can buy with £60 a-year.

Let us, however, suppose, for the sake of argument, that Mr. Atkinson's figures represent truly the "present division of profits," and that, divided all round, the capitalists' share would not make five pounds a-year difference. Ought not the workers, then, to be satisfied, and Socialist agitators shut their mouths, and settle down in peace? Surely nothing more could be desired?

Well, as I said before, the labour question does not to my mind run on one line only; it is a figure of many sides, of which this of wages and the division of profits is perhaps the least important. We Socialists believe that the day will come when there will be no more profit-making, nor working for wages or money at all, but all will work for one common aim, as may sometimes be seen amongst the brothers and sisters of one family.

But before that blessed time arrives other things besides wages must be readjusted. For there are far more important relations between capital and labour than those which affect wages. Here, for instance, is something connected with another side of the question: "A general meeting of the cotton-spinners of Lancashire, Cheshire, and the neighbouring districts was held in Manchester yesterday, when it was resolved to run the mills upon half-time for eight weeks. This step is attributed to the adverse effect upon the spinners of the speculations of cotton-brokers at Liverpool" (Standard, May 28). I will not now go into the effect of this decision on the wages of the working people; but it is a fair example of "the service which capital does to labour in assisting it to economise time." The main thing, however, to be noticed in this extract is the proof it affords of the almost absolute power which the capitalist has over the labourers so long as he has control of the capital. It is possible for him to compel them to work themselves to death, or to stand idle and starve, according as it pays him best.

Still worse even than this is the misdirection and waste of labour which goes on when the working classes are at the mercy of the holders of capital; for the latter have absolute power to employ the labourers at whatever they may please—useful, useless, or absolutely harmful, as it suits their fancy. This it is which is the real, or at any rate by far the most fruitful cause of overwork. Every labourer who is taken away from the production of what he or his class needs, becomes a drag on those who are left. They have to produce the food he eats, the clothes he wears, and everything that he uses; and he does nothing for them in return, but is "employed" by some capitalist or master to do unnecessary work for him. And yet Mr. Atkinson tries to make believe that it is a blessing to the labourers to have a capitalist to "give further employment to labour," and thus prevent the working classes from enjoying that leisure which the introduction of machinery should have afforded them. If all the flunkies and domestic servants, all the makers of articles of luxury and builders of large mansions and churches, all the carriage-builders picture-painters, tailors, advertisers, and innumerable others whose work is now absolutely wasted on those who are utterly useless but whose possession of capital enables them as a class to compel the labour of all these producers,—if all these said producers or hangers-on were to leave off working for another class and merely toil for the needs of their own class, even without the help of modern inventions they would by working very short hours be able to produce all that they needed; and with "capital" in the form of machinery they might reduce almost to nothing the time occupied in the production of their necessities, though it must not be forgotten that the manufacture of this machinery would take some of them away from more healthy and happier work.

This would be the advantage of capital to the labourer, if it were not for the capitalist; so that it is entirely wrong to talk of capital and capitalist as if they were one and the same thing; the former being a blessing to mankind, were it not for the curse imposed on us in the person of the latter.

Surely this is a most important side of the labour question, and yet Mr. Atkinson's straight lines don't lead us to it at all. One begins to suspect that after all his view of the affair is only easy because so extremely narrow, and the simple look it has is the sham simplicity put on to hide dishonesty of thought. What other opinion can one hold of such expressions as these: "Every capitalist who puts his money into useful work—into cloth, food, fuel, metals, and the like—saves every workman a deal more than he takes from him"; "For every cent that almost every great capitalist receives, the workmen are saved ten cents somehow or other"?

But it is weary work to dwell so long on such stuff as this, and I will pass on to the last paragraph, where we learn that "forty or fifty years ago the men and women in the cotton-mills worked thirteen or fourteen hours a-day, while they only earned half as much wages. . . . It was just the same in every other kind of work. . . . Where it took thirteen or fourteen hours then it now takes but ten hours. By and by it will take less. Very likely the next generation will be able to get just as good a living, and perhaps a better one than the present by working eight hours a-day; but they won't get it by Acts of Legislature."

I commend this, especially the last sentence, to the consideration of all. The evident idea is to show that the capitalist is the benefactor to whom the workers owe the shorter hours of labour which we are told they enjoy. Whereas the fact is that in every instance the capitalists have as a body resisted every concession in the way of shortening the hours of labour that has hitherto been requested. What little advantage has been gained has been rendered more possible by machinery and the increase of capital, but has been all but spoilt by the capitalists; and all benefits the workers enjoy are due almost wholly to their own determined agitation. Bearing this fact in mind, we must toil on, recognising that one truth of Mr. Atkinson's, that we shall not get anything by Acts of the Legislature, and organise ourselves in such a way that ere long we may experience the blessing of capital, without its present attendant curse.

Meanwhile, I shall feel amply rewarded for what trouble I have had in following Mr. Atkinson's dreary lines if I have succeeded in tearing up any of them, so as to bring those who have been travelling along them to the final break-down of the train of thought which must precede their walking in the better paths of Socialism.

GEORGE STURT.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Our Corner for July is an excellent number. John Robertson's article on "Culture and Reaction. A Chapter in Political Science," is scholarly and thorough. The second and concluding instalment will appear next month and will be looked for with great interest. Annie Besant has a good article on "The Future of the Workers in England," that the "If not, why?" style of argument would have some difficulty in meeting. There are several other readable and interesting contributions, including poems by E. Nesbit and Fred. Henderson, the sonnet by the latter written in prison.

'Socialism: For and Against,' by Annie Besant and Charles Bradlaugh (Freethought Publishing Co., 4d.), is a written debate upon Socialism, which does not bring any new point very strongly forward, but once more restates the old objections and ably answers them.

'The Socialist Movement,' by Annie Besant (Freethought Publishing Co., 6d. Fleet Street, 3d.), is a reprint of an article in the Westminster Review. It is a calm, clear statement of Socialism and its aims; an eloquent exposition of the forces that work toward its realisation. A temperate and impartial explanation is given of the attitude of differing schools of Socialists on the most important points; and altogether this is a most valuable pamphlet for students of the subject.

'Radicalism and Socialism' (same writer, publisher, and price) is an endeavour to show Radicals that their political principles rightly held and applied should make them Socialists, and that the whole tendency of modern legislation is socialistic, a tendency so developed as to be beyond successful interested resistance. Mrs. Besant says truly, "The main difference between Radicals and Socialists . . . is that Radicals take the steps towards Socialism without recognising whither they are going; while the Socialists see the goal as well as the separate Acts of Parliament." There are those of us, of whom the talented authoress is not one, would say that one of the lessons she taught in this pamphlet is that Radicals are perfectly competent to do all that can be done on parliamentary lines, and that for Socialists the rôle of teacher and agitator was the one most open. S.

THE CONCENTRATION OF CAPITAL.—From 1863 to 1869 there were 4,782 new limited companies, from 1870 to 1876 there were 6,905; from 1877 to 1883 there were 8,643; and in 1883, 1,634, the largest number of new companies ever started in one year. These figures show rapid and enormous concentration. A large proportion of these fail, but that is simply the survival of the fittest companies. This shows the growth of large capitals. Here is the smashing up of the small. Bankruptcies and composition with creditors from 1870 to 1875 rose gradually from 5,002 to 7,899; by 1879 they reached 13,132. Since then they have gradually decreased, the slaughter of the superfluous being fairly well accomplished for a time. The great increase of large fortunes is also a proof of the concentration of capital. The co-operative stores have smashed up hundreds of shopkeepers.—J. L. M.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE MARGIN OF PROFIT.

Owing either to their extraordinary dulness or to their impudent dishonesty, several of our opponents persist in using "profit" and "surplus-value" as identical terms, and in maintaining that if the margin of profit is proved to be small, it necessarily follows that the workers would not be benefitted to an appreciable extent were they to receive in addition to their wages all the surplus-value they create. Over and over again it has been pointed out to these people (manifestly without effect) that even when little or no profit is being made there may still be produced an enormous amount of surplus-value.

To prove this once more, I append the balance-sheet for 1886 of an Ayrshire farmer, which appears in a report on 'Farm Rents in Scotland,' drawn up by Mr. Lucien J. Walker, United States commercial agent in Dunfermline. I choose this balance-sheet out of several at hand, of various industrial concerns, because agriculture, it is frequently asserted, is the most unprofitable industry in the country, and is therefore likely (if all that our opponents say be true) to be the industry in which the least surplus-value is produced. We are led to expect that the rate of exploitation is very small indeed—so small that farm labourers would receive only a few pence in addition to their present wage were they to get the full fruits of their labour. Contrary to expectation, however, we find in the case of this farm that although the profit is nil, the rate of the production of surplus-value is over 200 per cent. In plain English, for every £100 paid out of the net produce as wages to labour, £200 is paid as rent and interest to capital. It is evident that if the exploitation of labour were put an end to, the wages of labour on this particular farm might be trebled, as the workers on it are at present robbed of £2 out of every £3 the net produce of their labour brings in the market!

"CHRISTIANITY, POSITIVISM, AND SOCIALISM."

FRIEND,—That Christian or any other morality may easily be, and is, distorted to suit selfish individual ends is not only credible, but undoubtedly true; yet it is difficult in the light of early Christian teaching to altogether accept Mr. Bax's views.

The "notion of Holiness," while conveying the sense of the relation of the individual soul with God, equally necessitates the highest social morality; and this double teaching—generalised in the words "Love the Lord thy God and thy neighbour as thyself"—is amplified throughout the whole of the New Testament. The writer who said "What doth it profit though a man say he hath faith and have not works? Can faith save him?" certainly had not the notion that the requirements of the Christian faith ceased at an introspective holiness; while the works implied have no connection with introspection. Again, the general and, to a modern individualist, meaningless denunciations of the rich are but examples of social teaching which, we may take it, had their partial result in the semi-communism lately mentioned. This teaching, well set forth in the epistle quoted, is also apparent throughout the whole of the Testament, and is entirely inseparable from the introspective which apparently gives such offence.

It were perhaps unjust to apply Mr. Morison's Napoleonic quotation to Mr. Bax, yet this ignoring of the twofold nature of Christian teaching would certainly seem in some measure to warrant it.

While recognising the present social condition to be the result of a purely human disease—selfishness—to which social evolution is applying a divine remedy—brotherhood—is it just to attribute either directly or indirectly such condition to a religion which, in its primitive teaching at least, while asserting individual responsibility severely condemned individual selfishness?—Yours sincerely,

CHARLES J. GLADWELL.

McGlynn has set New York in a roar by saying that O'Brien is only Landed with twenty-five per cent off! This hit harder and truer than the Canadian brick.—Denver Labour Enquirer.

"I am for Ireland and Ireland alone. I will touch nothing else."—WILLIAM O'BRIEN. Then what are you doing here? We, organised workmen, are men of all nationalities, and contend for the workers of the world, including the Irish. William, you're a disgrace to humanity.—Workmen's Advocate.

"BRAIN" WORK.—Jay Gould: "Want a yacht, eh? Well, you've got to make the money to buy it. I'll take a walk down street." Son George: "Yes, father." "I'll slip on the pavement." "Yes, father." "And have myself brought back in an ambulance." "Yes, father." "Then stocks will drop and you buy." "Yes, father." "Then I'll go out on the front pavement and dance a jig." "Yes, father." "Then stocks will go up and you sell."—Denver Labour Enquirer.

That the labourers are entitled to life and the means of life; that they are entitled to the full benefit resulting from their labour; that in order to secure these, they must control the means; and that any system which makes it possible for individuals to enslave others is wrong and must be abolished—these are the principles that animate the real labour movement. Carry on the agitation for principles; be as radical as you please, but don't make idols of men and worship them.—Workmen's Advocate.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

The Dundee masons came out on strike on Saturday, for an advance of a halfpenny on their present wages of 7d. per hour.

At a meeting of cotton spinners in Heywood, on the 24th, representing 250,000 spindles, it was decided unanimously to run short time.

Meetings of joiners have been held in Dundee to consider the wages question, with a view of enforcing the standard rate in all the workshops in Dundee.

The strike of masons, which took place in Dundee last Saturday, has been partially settled by several of the employers conceding the advance of a halfpenny per hour on the standard rate of wages, 7d. per hour.

The whole of the limited spinning companies in the Ashton and Stalybridge district have agreed to commence three days a week for two months. At Oldham, short time has started at Sun Mill, Gladstone, and other companies.

India mills, which are the largest in the Darwen district, have now been closed for about six weeks, and are not expected to recommence work until after the Darwen fair holidays, which commence in about a month. Cotton Hall Spinning Mill and Darwen Spinning Company's Mill are also closed owing to the state of trade.

The weavers employed at the Lower Darwen and by Messrs. Thomas and Richard Eccles are out on strike. The weavers allege as their reason bad material, contending that it cannot be worked properly. The mill is closed, and is not likely to be again opened for some time unless, it is said, the workpeople make a special request to the employers.

BLACKHEATH STUD AND PEG TRADE.—On Saturday the operatives in the stud and peg trade in the Blackheath and Rowley Regis districts gave their employers 14 days notice for a return to the 1881 list of prices.

COLLIERY ENGINEERS' WAGES AT BRIERLEY HILL.—Fourteen days' notice was given on Friday last at the Earl of Dudley's collieries in the Brierley Hill district for a reduction of 4d. a day in the wages of colliery engineers—from 3s. 8d. to 3s. 4d. a day.

The London Trades Council Annual Report is to hand, eight pages, of which four and a half are devoted to the proceedings connected with the visit to Sandringham, and eight lines to strike movements. There is a good deal of implied abuse of Socialists which will be dealt with next week.

The Edinburgh Trades' Council at a special meeting resolved, by a majority of 14 to 12, to refuse the ticket of admission to the Westminster Jubilee service, which had been forwarded to the President by the Secretary of the National Union of Conservative Associations. In consequence of certain expressions used towards him by one of the members, Mr. George Mackay intimated his intention of sending in his resignation as President.

On Monday morning, three chain shops at Dudley Wood and New Town, near Cradley Heath, were blown up by gunpowder. The shops are said to have been used by workmen who have been working under price, and an inspection of the buildings shows that they have been destroyed by canisters of gunpowder being dropped down the chimneys to which fuses were attached. The hearths and buildings are completely destroyed.

On Friday the 24th ult. a deputation of about 100 workers residing at Bloomfield, Tipton, waited upon the Poor Law Guardians, and applied for relief. It was stated that about 400 ironworkers and their families were starving, through the stoppage of the ironworks, some of the men not having broken their fast for several days. The Chairman and other Guardians sympathised with the men, and stated that the only relief they could give was to send them into the workhouse.

At a representative meeting of chainmakers on the 24th ult. at Cradley Heath, it was stated that at meetings of the operatives held throughout the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire districts, they had unanimously decided to cease work on the 1st July, in consequence of a number of employers having disregarded the recognised list of prices. The result will be that upwards of 3000 operatives will turn out on strike. Arrangements are being made to provide co-operative works on an extensive scale, which, it is contended, will deprive the obnoxious middlemen of their occupation.

BROXBURN—SHALE-WORKERS' WAGES.—Notices have been posted up at Newliston and Holmes intimating that, in accordance with an agreement come to by the whole of the oil companies, the miners and oncost men will have their wages reduced by one-sixth after next pay day. It is expected that a similar notice will be posted at Broxburn Oil Works in a few days.

END OF A STRIKE.—Some few days ago the colliers working in Wester Gartshore Pit, W. Scotland, struck work owing to the attempted imposition of a scale of deductions for "dirt" sent up in the hutches, which the men regarded as unreasonable. A meeting between the masters, the men, and the miners' agent for the district has resulted in the scale being withdrawn, and the men have resumed work.

GLASGOW BAKERS.—A meeting of the operative bakers of Glasgow was held last week for the purpose of considering their hours of labour; Mr. David Fortune presided. It was moved by one of the bakers, "That this meeting is of opinion that the present state of trade demands the gravest consideration, inasmuch as the position of the operatives has become such that it is simply impossible that they can in any adequate measure fulfil the duties devolving on them as citizens of the commonwealth." This resolution was seconded by Mr. H. Tait, general secretary of the Scottish Railway Servants, and supported by Mr. Drummond, secretary of the Scottish Typographical Society (the latter of whom remarked that, in his opinion, twenty-four hours would settle any dispute if the men chose to stop supplies), and was unanimously passed.

GLASGOW TRADES' COUNCIL.—This Council met on the 22nd, Mr. R. C. Grant, president, in the chair. Mr. Hunter reported on behalf of the bakers that they had held a meeting on the preceding night to take steps to improve their trade. He went on to state how things were now managed in the Co-operative Society. Until recently the men working there had not started work before four o'clock, although they were confessedly straitened for room; but, strange to say, now that they had opened splendid premises, with plenty of room and all the latest improvements, they had found out that they required to begin work at 1 o'clock with the prospect of being advanced to 11 o'clock. This, he thought, was not creditable to the co-operators, who were many of them working-men, and many of them trades' unionists. He had also heard that other little pleasant surprises were expected to be in store for them, notwithstanding that at the present time more work was screwed out of them than in any shop in the city. A considerable number of men in the Council who are co-operators said they would take the earliest opportunity of inquiring into the matter.

THE LOTHIAN SHALE MINERS.—A mass meeting of the shale miners of Broxburn, Uphall, Holmes, Newliston, etc., was held on Thursday night at Broxburn, to consider the proposed reduction of their wages. Mr. Wilson, agent, pointed out that there had been no change in the oil trade during the past twelve months to warrant this reduction. He denounced the Broxburn Company—a company which could pay 15 per cent., and had £25,000 undivided profits—for proposing to reduce the men's wages, many of whom, he said, were not earning as much, after paying deductions, as it would require to keep them and their families in the poor's house. With the exception of four men, who held that they should not begin work on the reduction at all, all present (about 1,000 men) agreed to resort to a four-days-a-week policy, the onus thus falling on the employers if they were locked out. The reduction of wages is to the extent of one-sixth. Workers, miners especially, ought to see the need for "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together," to put an end to this monstrous capitalistic system with its under-payment and over-work for the many and its leisure and luxury for the few. Petty local strikes can have little or no effect. Workers in all industries must combine and quietly but determinedly set aside all landowners, shareholders, dividend-drawers of all kinds, and other drones; and work the land, the mines, and the capital of the country for behoof of the industrious only. To organise and educate the workers to this end is what the Socialist League sets before it, and therefore all intelligent working-men ought to enrol themselves as members.

LONDON APPRENTICES.—At the instigation of Sir E. Currie, on behalf of the trustees of the People's Palace, the London Trades' Council has through its secretary, Mr. George Shipton, issued an invitation to the trades to attend a meeting of workmen to be held in the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, and by the time this is in print the meeting will have been held. The trustees of the People's Palace, with the assistance of the Trades' Council, propose "to establish an extensive scheme under which apprentices in all trades of the metropolis should be asked to compete for various prizes in their respective industries with a view, if possible, of showing that the charges sometimes made against English workmen that they are inferior to their foreign rivals cannot be sustained." The object of calling the meeting is "to formulate a plan for reaching the apprentices in all trades throughout the metropolis, and inducing them to exhibit specimens of their individual work of the particular industry in which they may be serving their time." An exhibition of the works is to take place in the Queen's Hall of the People's Palace, and prizes of considerable value are to be given. The Executive of the Trades' Council adds: "The question of apprenticeship is one of vital moment to England's workpeople and their industrial future." There is a sort of pseudo-mediævalistic smack about all this nonsensical twaddle. The apprentices of the metropolis, compared to the number of youths engaged in the various forms of industry, how many of them are apprentices in the old English sense of the word? Few indeed, very few. Besides, the present-day method of producing goods has done away with the necessity for apprenticeship in the proper sense and meaning of the term. Ever since the rise of the industrial system, ever since the invention of labour-saving machinery, the processes of production have become more and more divided. Even in industries that machinery has not directly affected, subdivision of craft has been made. To-day the boot-maker is only in part a boot-maker; he is either laster, rivetter, finisher, clicker, or something in the leather line. In other trades it is much the same, and there are very few trades to-day in which may be found the entire workman, the maker or doer of the craft right out. As the capitalistic method of production has developed, so gradually has been wrought an entire change in the character of the industries of the country. Of course, all this is obvious to the most superficial observer. The point to note about this ostentatious business, is the attempts that are being made from time to time by the various City Companies to make the workers believe that they have an ever-watchful eye for their interests. The Plumber's Company has lately been bestirring itself. The Master of the Draper's Company, the newly-made knight along with a number of others, are now a-fussing about and talking, if even they be in earnest, about matters they know little or nothing about. The words London apprentices have about them an old-fashioned charm, and this probably accounts for the action of the London Trades' Council in the matter. To-day I simply draw attention to the meeting, and refrain from discussing in detail its object. I hope to be able to do this after the meeting has been held.—H. A. BARKER.

FRANCE.

It appears that a new period of expulsions is likely to go on. Comrade Luigi Parmeggiani has received last week orders to leave France, because he is a Socialist, and only therefore, for he has done nothing whatever against the so-called "law and authority." He at once declared that he refused to go, having the right, as an international Socialist, to live anywhere he likes. The Cri du Peuple says that the same measure will be applied to several other "foreigners," and gives them the good advice to do the same as Parmeggiani.

At Montluçon, 1500 glassbottle-makers are on strike. They have decided not to resume work until their "masters" have accepted their proposals—8 hours of work for each 24 hours, and all bottles thrown aside to become the property of the workers. This last condition is a very important one, because the exploiters throw aside a great quantity of bottles, which in reality they afterwards sell at the same price as the well-finished bottles, without paying any salary for them. To this swindle the workers intend to put an end. We are invited by the Chambre Syndicale (Trades Union) of the glassbottle makers of Montluçon to warn English glassbottle makers not to cross the Channel and accept work there.

BELGIUM.

Agitation is going on amongst the unfortunate workers of this country. At Mons, at Charleroi, at La Louvière, at Liège, Seraing, in all the miners districts, the general impression is that in a very short time a general strike will again break out, and it is said that the Executive Council of the Parti Ouvrier is intending this time to take the head of the movement. The Socialists of Ghent also are said to prepare themselves to join in the struggle. Everywhere, in order to make the next outbreak a success, the workers are endeavouring by all means to secure a good and strong organisation, and, as matters stand now, they hope that the final result of their efforts will be beneficial to them.

GERMANY.

Twenty-two new arrests have been made in Magdeburg, and the accused have been ordered to Leipzig for high treason. Eighteen other Socialists have been expelled. Perquisitions are made every day. It is in Magdeburg that resides the omnipotent M. Krieter, police councillor, who recently published a book entitled "The Secret Organisation of Socialism in Germany."

The State of Siege for Leipzig and district has been prolonged for the term of one year. Never mind! Socialism is spreading all over Saxony all the same.

According to the laws against the Socialists, the police director of Berlin has prohibited the circulation of the pamphlets of the International Revolutionary Library edited in New York. Since that prohibition was issued, several thousand copies have been distributed throughout Germany. The best answer indeed!

The Socialist paper Leipziger Volksblatt has been suppressed, and Albert Seebach, the publisher, and Albert Schmidt, the chief editor of the paper, have been expelled from Saxony.

In Elberfeld and Barmen the Socialists have distributed secretly during the last week 10,000 copies of a large size pamphlet entitled 'Address to the German Voters.' The business as a whole was performed very successfully, two Socialists only having been arrested, and we know that two out of a dozen is not much in the police-blessed land of Germany.

At Hamburg, the police "authorities" have lately made several perquisitions in all the streets which are in the vicinity of the Lake Binnen-Alster, and they have discovered immense quantities of pamphlets, leaflets, Socialist papers, mostly published at New York and at Berlin, but they have made no arrest, "because," says a Hamburg bourgeois paper, "they ought to have arrested all the inhabitants of that part of the town, all being Socialists." Right so!

ITALY.

CARRARA.—A correspondent to the Emancipazione (Rome) writes very warmly in a late journal of the miserable condition of the day-labourers and navvies at work in the town. Of late some drainage-work, enlargement of the cemetery, etc., were put up to auction by the municipality—Italian officials are more impudently frank and open in their doings than others—and were of course knocked down to some conscienceless speculators who kindly offered to do the work for an impossible price; whereafter the curious observer might watch the mushroom growth of a slave-driving organisation "in little," in which the slaves work some 14 hours a-day with as little respite as may be for the necessary stowage of food, ruled with the rod of iron of petty despotism, cursing their fate and bearing with it out of sheer force of habit.

WAGES OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.—The wages of railway employés in Italy are regulated by the different companies on the basis of the strictest economy. I will give one or two examples that may be interesting to those whom "work and wages" concern. The clerks of the Roman-Provincial line, after working several months on day-wages, enter into a monthly salary of 100 lire (£4) or less than £1 a week; after 10 or 12 years they can rise to between 130 lire and 175 lire (£4 to £7). On the Southern line the monthly rise is only from 5 to 15 lire in such long periods that the life of Noah himself would scarcely suffice for a hard-working clerk to touch the princely salary of 18 lire monthly. The pay of the rest of the "personale" is meted out in like proportion. There is perhaps nothing out of the common in these figures for Italian wages, and with one more instance I will have done, that of the pointsman who has to be, or should be a man of trust, and whose obviously important duties should be proportionately paid—this man on the Roman-Provincial receives a wage of 1s. 2d. per day!

GRAVE DANGER.—"Dr. McGlynn in grave danger," says a headline in the Kansas City Times. And what do you suppose is the nature of this "danger?" Why, the senile Mr. Pecci, of Rome, is said to threaten to excommunicate him if he does not present himself before the ecclesiastical tribunal in that city within a certain specified time! What terrors such a prospect must have for a healthy mind!—Lucifer.

SENTENCE ON RUSSIAN NIHILISTS.—The verdict has been pronounced in the trial of the persons charged with murdering Colonel Soudeikin, chief of the St. Petersburg secret police, in December last. Seven of the accused were sentenced to death, fourteen to terms of hard labour, and two were acquitted. It seems to be the first time that a Russian court-martial has ever acquitted political criminals.

THE BLACK FLAG IN CORK.—In consequence of the action of the Mayor of Cork in hoisting a black flag on the municipal offices on Jubilee Day, and also what the authorities regard as a prejudiced disposition to deal leniently with offenders of a certain class, Captain Plunkett, divisional magistrate, has taken magisterial charge of the city. He has issued instructions to the police to permit no prisoner to be discharged on the mayor's order, and to have all prisoners tried by a resident magistrate.

THE FAMINE YEARS IN IRELAND.—We are often asked to give the statistics of the exportation of food from Ireland during the famine there. Here are some. The first figures are taken from two returns made to the House of Commons of the exports from Ireland into Great Britain for the quarter ending July 5, 1846. Of the first account: wheat, 59,478 quarters; barley, 18,417 do.; oats, 245,067 do.; flour, 242,257 cwts.; oatmeal, 138,241 do. Of the second: oxen, bulls, and cows, 33,850; calves, 1293; sheep and lambs, 56,669; swine, 124,762. 14,369 barrels of oats were exported from Limerick to London and Glasgow the third week of November, at the same time that £210 duty was paid on the importation of Indian corn. From the same port 47,000 firkins of butter were shipped from 1st May. From other returns we find that the total export of provisions from the ports of Waterford, Cork, Limerick, and Belfast, from the 1st of August 1846 to the 1st of January 1847 was: pork, barrels, 37,123; bacon, flitches, 222,608; butter, firkins, 388,455; hams, hgsds., 1971; Beef, tierces, 2555; wheat, barrels, 48,526; oats, barrels, 448,232; barley, barrels, 12,029; oatmeal, cwts., 7210; flour, cwts., 144,185; pigs, 44,659; cows, 9007; sheep, 10,288. A careful census of the agricultural produce of Ireland for the year 1847, made by Captain Larcom, as a Government Commissioner, gives the total value of that produce as £44,958,120 sterling, which would have amply sustained double the entire people of the island. If all the figures of the famine years, of which these few are a fair sample, were gathered together, it would be found that there was no necessity for a famine at all, were it not for "law and order" and the "rights of property"; and that English rule and landlordism are to be credited with a million and a half deaths of hunger.—S.

Pelsall, a mining village four miles from here, was visited on Wednesday, Sanders speaking on the Green or common. We were well received, and at the close asked to come again. On Saturday evening, in the Market-place, Walsall, Sanders spoke to large audiences. Fair sale of literature.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—At the Labour League on Thursday, June 23, I. Cantwell delivered a highly instructive address on "Organisation" in the course of which he pointed out that the condition of the labourers would never be improved so long as they looked up to the middle-class for leadership, that they should rely entirely upon themselves. An interesting discussion followed, in which Coffey, McGuinness, a popular temperance reformer, and others took part. A letter from comrade Kitz, Merton, anent the Jubilee celebrations, was read amidst great applause.—O. K.

NOTTINGHAM SECTION, SOCIALIST UNION.—On Tuesday, June 21, the members, to escape the tomfoolery connected with the Jubilee, held a picnic at Gotham, a village seven miles from Nottingham, where no public celebration was held. On Sunday morning, in Sneinton Market, Peacock addressed a very good meeting. At night, in the Great Market-place, Waine and Peacock spoke. There was some opposition, which was easily disposed of by Peacock. Collections for the day, 5s. 8½d. Commonweal eagerly bought and soon sold out.—A. C.

NORTH OF ENGLAND SOCIALIST FEDERATION.—The propaganda this week has been very successful. Donald and I went to Jarrow-on-Tyne, and to Seaton Delaval on Wednesday and Friday last. On Saturday, Donald spoke at Seaton Sluice, East Holywell, and Blyth, while I addressed good meetings further North at Chevington, Broomhill, and Amble. On Sunday, Donald spoke to large meetings at North and South Shields and enrolled several members, while I went to Sunderland and Monkwearmouth, and after a squabble with the police and a few wrangles with some roughs and a clergyman, got two large meetings and sold a good deal of literature. On Monday night Donald lectured to the miners and ironworkers of Consett, in Durham, while I went to New Delaval. On Tuesday night successful meetings were held at Bebside and Throckley.—J. L. M.

NOTES ON NEWS.

The Irish members the other night abstained from voting on the Coercion Bill, and thus took the step at last which they ought to have taken at first; but the ugly words "too late" will pursue them; the mischief is done, the time for a great demonstration is lost, and at the cost of great trouble and expenditure of energy, they have been playing into the hands of the Tories all this time. Once more the moral: when you are in Parliament you must play the parliamentary game, even if you know you are throwing away your hand by doing so.

The Federation of Radical Clubs having met and discussed the advisability of holding another great demonstration against the Coercion Bill, has decided to forego it. This sounds disappointing enough; but they were probably right; at the best such a demonstration would not have come up to the Easter Monday show; and even if it had surpassed it, it would have been little use unless the agitation could have been kept up and gone on increasing, and developed into threatenings of something more serious than Hyde Park and Trafalgar Square meetings. For all this the Radicals are not prepared; so they must take the Tory rule quietly, and will probably have plenty of opportunities for the exercise of the useful virtue of patience.

The Unionist chuckers-out at the Kensington Town Hall, who like the honest bravo of past times who insisted on killing his man when paid for it, even when his employer had changed his mind, thought that they were bound to give value for the money received, and chucked out chiefly the wrong persons, have had a narrow escape from gratis lodging in a public building, but are quit for the fright. One of them in his account of his secondary use of a brass curtain rod, embellished the story unnecessarily; but it must be admitted that it is not easy to get clear evidence of what has happened at "a rough and tumble." At the same time one can't help thinking that if they had been Socialists accused of rioting, much clearer evidence would have been forthcoming in all due abundance, and the jury would not have been so scrupulous as to the identity of the rioters.

The frightful sea-tragedy that has just come before the public is miserable and depressing to hear tell of; an under-manned ship and overworked men were probably at the bottom of the slaying of the Malay. But from the first I couldn't help asking myself if the crew would have treated in the same way an English shipmate who from drink-madness or other madness had become dangerous to them? Isn't the jingo spirit which has given us much bigger horrors, from blowing mutineers from guns down to flogging a whole village because one of the villagers has foolishly allowed himself to be shot by a British officer, responsible for this last wretched piece of sordid misery on the high seas?

The tribe of Nupkins seems to be increasing, and the last specimen brought forward (by himself) for exhibition is certainly not a pretty one. One can judge by the behaviour of Nupkins-Newton in this "mistake" which he has made, what his usual conduct is to poor girls who are not "respectable," and who are guilty of the crime which under various names is almost the only one punished by our robber-society—poverty to wit.

It is a curious characteristic of the present day that the stiffest defence of the rights of private property is blended with attempts towards crude State Socialism not merely in the same society, or in the same assembly, but even in the same man. Here is Mr. Bradlaugh, for instance, the doughty champion of the rights of monopoly in one form of the means of production, bringing in a Bill to force people to use their land in the way which he thinks that it ought to be used, or else give them up and be "compensated" for it. It doesn't matter that such a Bill is not likely to pass and would not be effective if it were passed; the intention at any rate is to compel people to give up something which they call their property and don't want to give up. It seems not unlikely that Mr. Bradlaugh and Mr. Henry George will presently be running in the same coach. After that we shall see.

The improvement in trade that many persons were so cock-sure of a few months ago, has gone to join the majority of prophecies now it seems. As gauged by the railway returns we are pretty much where we were last year. Most of those who have anything to do with business, either as employers or employed, will make rather a worse tale of it than that. We were promised a miracle and it hasn't happened. There will be plenty more of that before we have done. W. M.

THE "LIBERTY-TO-PLUNDER DEFENCE LEAGUE."

THAT the above title befits the L.P.D.L. far better than their own, few can doubt who read the record of their work issued by themselves, or the circular sent by them to M.P.'s and others, asking for opposition to sundry Parliamentary measures. The L.P.D.L. is on the side of "personal liberty;" the "autonomy of the individual" is much too sacred to be interfered with even for the defence of the whole community; Liberty (and property) should not be touched by legislative enactment, or anything else indeed; and the L.P.D.L. is just the most enlightened, just, magnanimous, and civilised body of people on the face of the earth. Hence the L.P.D.L. feels itself bound to remove as much of the strain as it can from legislative brains, and so steps forward with a tabulated alphabetical scheme of rejection, generously free of charge, that will enable any lawmaker, to the satisfaction of all concerned, without any trouble of argument not to make laws. This is very nice for the M.P., who can ask, "Is it on the list?" and so record his vote dumbly; but it may be that in their laudable ambition to "stay the tide of revolution," the L.P.D.L. have unwittingly told the truth too plainly, and thus their curses after all may be blessings in disguise? Suppose even that they may have betrayed themselves as unscrupulous and sordid advocates of legalised plunder and chicanery?

"Your opposition" is "earnestly requested" to a Bill, the object of which is to prevent the payment of any portion of his wages to a farm-labourer in beer, cider, or other alcoholic drinks. Other proposed enactments as to wages that rouse their wrath are: That which amongst other things provides that miners' wages in Devon and Cornwall shall not be withheld from them longer than 14 days; that they shall be paid by weight and have power to appoint their own check-weigher; and that which forbids coal-miners being paid in public-houses. Does not such opposition imply that "liberty" is wanted for employers to pay wages when and how they like, and "liberty" for the workers to take them or—?

"Your opposition" is also asked to two Bills which would render penal the fraud of passing off oleomargarine on the public as butter; fixing penalties, and appointing inspectors. These wicked Bills provide that butter shall be labelled butter, and oleomargarine so marked, and that tyrannical officials shall look to see that it is done. Another proposed measure would compel quarry-owners, lessees, or occupiers, to fence in all quarries, in use or abandoned, for the public safety. To the unregenerate mind the question rises: Does Liberty (and property) interfere in the interests of a people frantically desirous of eating oily-margarine for butter, and of dashing itself down quarries? Or, is the sacred name of Liberty (and property) invoked on behalf of those who desire to have their hands freed for the reckless and brutal spoliation of all who by ignorance, poverty, or accident are delivered into their hands?

"Your opposition" is of course asked to a measure which enjoins the providing fit and proper means for raising and lowering miners; for supervision of mine ventilation; for precautions in the use of explosives; for covers to cages in the shafts and flanges to the drums; for fencing machinery and fitting boilers with safety-valves and water-gauges; for the keeping of stretchers and bandages. "Your opposition" is requested to the enactment that railroad companies shall adopt the block system; provide for interlocking points and signals; furnish passenger trains with continuous, and goods and mineral engines with powerful brakes; affix to all vehicles such couplings as shall render it unnecessary for men to go between them; provide efficient communication between passenger and guard; adopt a safe standard height for passenger platforms; make monthly returns to the Board of Trade of all men who have been on duty for more than 12 hours at a time or without an interval of 9 hours rest. "Your opposition" is asked to a Bill for the sanitation of London; to provide for the building of healthy houses and the prevention of unhealthy ones; to look after house-drains and sewers; and generally to guard the public from epidemics and preventible diseases. All these things you should oppose in the holy name of Liberty (and property). Let miners be slain, their wives widowed, and their children orphaned; let railway passengers and servants be smashed and mangled one by one, or by hundreds at a time; let pestilence and plague stalk rampant or glide slowly through the crowded streets; precautions for common safety would cost money and diminish profits; wherefore let us have none of them. Liberty (and property) forbids them!

"Your opposition" is implored with special fervour, an asterisk directing you to a note saying that engrossed petitions against it, ready for signing (a la Bidmead?) may be had from the secretary "free of cost on application." And this fearful Bill, which will no doubt shake Society to its foundations, is only "to give the public unrestricted access along the banks (except riparian gardens not exceeding 10 acres) of all rivers, streams, and natural lochs in Scotland for the purpose of fishing for fresh water fish (other than salmon species, except in Crown salmon fishing waters): unless owner has provided a pathway along such banks he shall have no claim for compensation for damage to crops or fences." At first sight not a revolutionary measure; even, apparently, an over-mild one; but, then, think of the possible consequences! Some Wynans or Argyle, as man of Liberty (and property), while strolling over his land, by his river, under his sky, might perhaps come near or even run against poor little Steenie or Sandie, representing "liberty" without property, with cotton and bent pin inveigling his valuable minnow or well-preserved stickleback to an untimely fate; having most probably stolen his worms for bait. "Your opposition;" can you refuse it? Of course it is not sordid greed that prompts the resistance to this "threatened invasion of their rights;" nor can it be that the Men of Money, having already reserved salmon, trout, and all big fish from the common herd, are now resolved that there shall no minnow move or eel wriggle for any but themselves!

There is little fear that the L.P.D.L. will ever have much support from the masses of the people; strong support it should and will have from all interested in buttressing wrong and upholding monopoly; for wherever there is an attempt to ease the folk of some burden, or to restrict some robbery practised upon them, there is the L.P.D.L. fighting on the side of privilege against the people. In their own statement of work done during five years they boast of crippling or damaging Bills for Inspection of Dwelling Houses; for Security of Corporate Property; for dealing with Bengal Tenants; Irish Labourers; Housing of English Working Classes; Factories and Workshops; Early Closing; Employers' Liability; Continuous Brakes and Better Ventilation on Railways; Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats); and many others; not one stroke for the people, but all for the Liberty to plunder. Individualism seeks to buy "your opposition" with its fine phrases of personal autonomy, individual liberty, and whatnot; but it requites the capitalist more solidly for his subscriptions, in that it fights on his side for his unlimited license to make money as he will. In other words, these are the priests and prophets of the Moloch of Capitalism, some honest in their professions of belief, some not; but all equally harmful and dangerous to the people whom they try to keep quiet in passive submission while thousands upon thousands with their wives and children are iniquitously sacrificed before the monstrous idol, into whose hands they are delivered bound. We seek to cut the people's bonds, and rouse them from their slumber of submission. Their bonds are falling in all lands, and they are stirring as they wake. Can the L.P.D.L., or a myriad societies like it, now rebind the bonds or bring back the fatal slumber? H. HALLIDAY SPARLING.

THRIFT.

SUPPOSE that all the men in the United States should swear off smoking, for instance, and decide to save the money they spent for tobacco. Of course, this action would result in closing cigar and tobacco factories all over the country, and their employes would be thrown on the labour market to compete with other men in work for employment. The farmers in Wisconsin, Virginia and elsewhere would not find a market for the tobacco raised. And then suppose every one turned teetotaler, so that society could save the 900,000,000 dols. spent in liquor every year. Of course, all the distilleries and breweries and saloons would close, and their employes would join the cigar makers in the search for employment. And then every one could say that the theatre was vicious and should be avoided, and the money spent should be saved. Of course, all actors and theatre attachés would look for something else to do. And then people could say that reading costs too much money. Lots of people have lived till they were 80 to 100 years old and could not read, so we will save that money, and the result would be that type stickers, paper makers, printers, binders, and others in that class would join the army of brewers, cigar makers, and actors. Of course, every one could do as our friend the capitalist says he did, "live two-thirds of the time on bread and water." Of course, the butchers and men at the stock yards, with teamsters, etc., could join the rest that are "out" of work. And if by this time the labour market was not overstocked with men willing to sell their labour at starvation prices, those who were fortunate enough to still have employment could take to wearing cast-off clothing and going barefoot in summer, so as to "save" a little more. Woollen, cotton, and linen factory operatives, and shoemakers, leather makers, etc., could quit work with the various clerks, salesmen, etc., and when the railroads discharged a half or three-fourths of their force on account of dull business, our friend the capitalist could join the rest of the capitalists in urging the governor of the state to call out the militia to put down the "mob," who would be parading the streets shouting for "Bread or Work."—A WAGE-WORKER, in Chicago Labour Enquirer.

Since the essential principle on which private property is based is to assure to all persons what they have produced by their labour, it cannot apply to what is not labour product.—John Stuart Mill.

NORFOLK NOTES.

THE Dean of Norwich has been preaching against Socialism. The idiocy shown in his sermon has given an idea of our opponent's weakness, even to our foes themselves. "Honour thy father and thy mother" was his text, and this, he argued, was synonymous with "Honour the powers that are over you." His argument was that as the existing authorities were ordained by God, "it is as profane as it is vain to attempt to subvert them."

But it was not until he tried to deal with the position of the people to-day that he showed how deep his insanity is, and how splendidly he is fitted for his post of priestly boot-licker to the privileged classes. The present division of men into classes, he said, was of divine ordination, and "riches and poverty formed one great means in the hand of God whereby the rich could show their generosity and kindness, and the poor might be trained in the no less beautiful virtues of thrift, industry, and submission to their lot."

"Submission to his lot" is a virtue easily displayed by a dean with £3,000 a-year.

The dean deplored that a great amount of discontent was abroad, and that men were becoming dissatisfied with their position and envying what was above them. Why the deuce did he give grounds for an idea like that by giving up his position as a teacher and taking a deanery at £3,000 a-year?

One part of his sermon was comical enough. He believed that the Queen's Jubilee had roused up the English loyalty to such an extent that Socialism had been practically killed. Strangely enough from the dean's point of view, I was neither stoned nor mobbed on the following Sunday when I spoke in Norwich Market-place. The men whose feelings of loyalty ought to have been roused by the Jubilee to such a pitch that they would never give ear to the "pernicious doctrines" again, listened with enthusiastic approval, and cheered for the Social Revolution most heartily. The prospect of displacing the dean, and giving him a chance to show the "beautiful virtue of submission to his lot," did not seem to arouse their anger in the least.

The feeling of loyalty aroused by the Jubilee is being followed by its reaction of disgust at the whole thing; and society, awaking from its feverish dream of loyal excitement, is beginning to say, Titania-like, "Methought I was enamoured of an ass."

Last week I visited a wretched little court in the heart of Norwich to enquire into a case there. A young man, nineteen years old, had been out of work during the winter, and that meant out of food too. At the beginning of spring he got work as a striker at 6s. a week. Out of this he had to pay 1s. 6d. a week rent for the hole he lived in (a hole not fit for an animal to crawl into) and keep his blind mother. Growing weaker through privation, he went to his work as usual on Monday morning at 6 o'clock, and at 8 dropped dead at his task. "Submission to their lot," says the Dean. And this is their lot!

On Sunday morning I held a meeting at Wymondham, and the previous Sunday at Diss. There is a charm in speaking at these country towns and villages, which seem so far away from the ordinary civilised life of to-day. On a glorious summer morning, with the breath of hay new cut around one, and the men lying in rows upon the grass, taking in the sun and Socialism at the same time, there is an inspiration to dream of the coming day, and half imagine it realised, were it not for the faces and clothes of the men, and the homes of them seen here and there.

Might I suggest to other Branches the worth of a plan we have adopted here? One of our great wants is more speaking power. To meet this we have started a Speakers' Class, where we study the economy of the subject and practise speaking. Our country meetings then form fitting starting places for our developing orators, who gradually gain more power and confidence in themselves.

FRED HENDERSON.

When he was in Canada O'Brien looked like a whale, but his recent splash in New York shows him to be but a minnow after all. It is not consistent to fight for the rights of the Irish in Ireland and to stand in with the landlords and bosses who oppress them in America.—Denver Labour Enquirer.

In charging the grand jury at Norwich Quarter Sessions, the Recorder "thought it was a matter for great rejoicing that such good feeling existed between the rich and the poor, and they might depend upon it that the kindness of the rich went home to the hearts of the poor, who were thus kept from turning to crime." As a comment on this lie, came, amongst other cases, one in which a labourer aged 52 was indicted on the charge of stealing one calico shirt, value 9d., the property of the Guardians of the Mitford and Launditch Union. Sentence: six months' hard labour. In the same court, John Carr (66) labourer, was charged with stealing a hen, value 2s. Prisoner said he had been out of work and had nothing to eat; he stole the fowl for food. In passing sentence of two months' imprisonment, the chairman said prisoner was "old enough to know better than talk such stupid nonsense." Perhaps his honour intended his kind words to go home to the heart of this poor man, and thus keep him from turning again to crime.—F. H.

NORTHUMBRIAN NOTES.

A CONTRIBUTOR to the Newcastle Chronicle, who signs himself "Coal Hower," argues that the proposal to shorten the hours of labour of boys in mines would, if carried, result in a lowering of the men's wages, the stoppage of the double shift system, and the abandonment of the thin seams, the working of which would become unprofitable. This string of calamities is surely exaggerated. A slight increase in the cost of production, and a little trouble in the rearrangement of the hours of work, would really be all that would ensue.

The miners, however, are beginning to lose interest in the reform of mines regulations. They see that every penny spent by the masters for their safety is soon taken from wages. No one, of course, would belittle the importance of saving life and health even under the present system and at a loss of wages; but these reforms have not the great political importance which the Labour M.P.'s wish to attach to them.

No wonder Positivists get a poor name from those who wish a thorough-going social change. Nothing more lame and scatter-brained could be imagined than Mr. Malcolm Quin's letter on the "freedom" of labour for women. The "free contract" nonsense is still held as a great economic truth by many people. The forces that drive women to unsuitable work, and compels them to offer their labour cheaper than men's, are entirely ignored by or unknown to many who assume a profound knowledge of the working of our social system.

The putter boys in Northumberland can scarcely live on the wages they now get. A movement amongst them to demand an increase of wages has failed. At Seghill, Ashington, and other places the movement has collapsed.

On Saturday July 2 I left Northumberland after four months of steady and successful propaganda, leaving the foundation of a Socialist organisation which will soon be as strong in itself as any of the older Socialist bodies. The miners of Northumberland have taken a firm grip of the Socialist doctrines and they are not the men to let them slip again. Donald is carrying on the work of propaganda and organisation in the district. J. L. MAHON.

EXCOMMUNICATE THE POPE.—There is a needless amount of ill-feeling over the threatened excommunication of Dr. McGlynn. A simple way out of the impending collision of interests, and an effectual quietus on all attempts to interfere with the liberty of individuals in this age of enlightenment is this: Let the Catholics excommunicate the Pope.—N. Y. Standard.

Little Isaac Moses, whose grandfather began life as an errand-boy and finished as a millionaire, was paid by his mother a penny a-dozen for pins picked up from the carpet, to keep the baby from getting them. "Nurse," said little Isaac, as his stock of pennies increased, "do you know what I am going to do when I have sixpence?" "No," answered nurse. "I am going to buy a paper of pins, and scatter them all over the floor, and then pick them up," replied the young financier, who was barely six years old.—Co-operative News.

BAD TIMES WITH THE WEALTHY.—In the Graphic for June 18 is an article on Yachts, from which I take the following instructive figures, showing the number of yachts possessed by the wealthy in this country in several years, together with their tonnage:

Year.	No. of Yachts.	Tonnage.
1864	895	39,485
1878	1883	89,020
1887	2867	130,912

It is instructive to notice that bad times have no effect on the increase. The rest of the world owns 1211 yachts as against our 2867.—R. U.

I KNOW WHEREOF I SPEAK.—You call yourselves men, contemptible shams that you are. You call yourselves men, and you cringe before the masters who rob you, you sneak away from meetings frowned on by the police, you shake in your boots at an adverse criticism of a blackmailing capitalist press, you keep your jaw shut when your liberties are boldly and openly stolen, and you go to the polls like cattle to vote a continuance of your own slavery. If my husband were as great a coward as you I would disown him; if my baby boy grows up to be such a sneak I would deny him a mother's love and give him but the contempt of a thinking woman. Are there no MEN in these degenerate days? Are there no souls who dare to even speak for Liberty? Where are the students, where are the youths, where are the brave and earnest young souls, where are the stalwart farmers, and the courageous mechanics of our Early Republic? Where, oh God, are the MEN that dare to speak and to do for Liberty, for Justice, and Truth? Point me not out this coward's spawn and call them the sons of the sires who did deeds that made them worthy of woman's love,—and of places in the Capitol. Their dead mothers blush for them, and their fathers disown them even in the grave. If there be none but these to act as the sentinels of liberty, then, alas! for the Republic, and alas for the helpless women who starve beneath its stars.—ANNA HASKELL, in Denver Labour Enquirer.

A civilisation which not only permits but actually encourages the dwarfing of its future citizens, both in mind and body, cannot be said to have reached a desirable stage. In no State in the Union are the deplorable effects of this vicious system more apparent than in this State of New York. I claim that one reason why there are so many idle adults is because there are so many employed children of both sexes. If the system of child labour were abolished to-morrow, idleness would be a thing of the past, crime would be diminished, debauched girls would become fewer, and the country would be healthier and happier every way. It is a grievous fact that children are stunted and degraded in our mills and factories. It is not alone in New York City and other large cities, but in greater degree in the country towns and villages. I believe the factory inspectors of other States have observed a similar condition of things.—Inspector Connolly.

TO A BOY.

MAN of the Future, what shall be
The life of Earth that you shall see?
What strange new facts the years will show?
What wonders rare your eyes shall know?
To what new realms of marvel, say,
Will conquering science war its way?
Your sight, as years shall pass, shall scan
New knowledge-gifts, new powers to man.
Man of the Future, men shall be Mightier in act and thought than we.

Ah, yes, but will their knowledge bring
To fruit the hope to which we cling?
Will gladness come? will all men call
A common good the right of all?
Will knowledge, one with wisdom, dare
To make all men all comfort share?
Will want and woe and ignorance cease,
And war and hate be lost in peace?
The brotherhood of man to be,
Will you behold, more blest than me?

See, what the souls Thou mak'st endure!
O God, have mercy on Thy poor!
Put in this human heart a thirst
To cure of human ills the worst!
But his work of life to give
All men should have to all that live;
To pamper self let him not lust,
But, Christ-like, to be gladly just;
And may all men be even as he,
That heaven at last on earth may be.

REPLY TO A PHILANTHROPIC APPEAL.

THE following pertinent reply to a philanthropic appeal has been sent to us by a friend; and as it is general and public in character, we print it as given.

SIR,—I have read your circular with interest, having a sympathy for all educational work and being the father of a family. Moreover, I am convinced that the originators of the movement in which you work were sincere persons and were not actuated by selfish aims. I regret, however, to say that it is in my knowledge that the cause of teetotalism is now supported very largely for sinister motives. I personally know teetotalers who aspire to reduce their men's wages by "temperance," and to get their rents increased as well. As to your special branch of the movement, it is, on the face of it, good, so far as it is an educational movement; but the fact remains (and a strong physiological fact it is) that no young people ought to be allowed to have intoxicating drink or intoxicating food. And certainly 200 innocent boys and girls ought not to be paraded before a large audience in an ill-ventilated room till 9.30 on a winter's night, and then turned out into such weather as there chanced to be—which I was greatly pained to see in this village a few months ago. I felt it to be nothing less than a crime, although not premeditated as to results, to have the number of young children cooped up in a hot "pen" and then turned out into the cold at half-past nine o'clock. You presume to treat drink as the cause of all misery (or nearly so). I presume you do so in ignorance of the true cause of misery; and as you are now acting in a public capacity, I beg to submit to your consideration a wider view of the case.

Misery is the result of poverty and ignorance acting and reacting each to produce the other and misery. Ignorance and poverty are produced by slavery, the workers in this country and other so-called civilised countries being in fact slaves, and having the results of their labour as completely taken from them as had the negroes in New Orleans before the Harriet Beecher-Stowe war. Indeed the negroes had the enjoyment of a larger share of the products of their labour than the agricultural labourers of Hertfordshire do. If you will take the trouble to observe, you will find that the present basis of "civilisation" is to give the workers a bare subsistence, just enough to "keep body and soul together" and reproduce the former in the shape of children for the posterity of the robbers (for they are nothing else) to carry on the iniquitous game with. The remainder of the produce of these workers' labour is absorbed by tithes, rents, profits, and dividends, and squandered in a profligacy worse than that of ancient Rome by loungers whose very existence seeks relief in an "effort to escape from the dull inanities and the purposelessness of an idle life" by collecting charities in a so-called philanthropic spirit.

I have not the honour of any acquaintanceship with you; I am merely writing to you as to a person in a public position. I write bitterly, you may say. I am bitter. There have been ten millions of premature deaths during the last fifty years in this much-united kingdom. I am within 300 yards of thirty horses with no back door. I have one child dangerously ill and three recovering from highly infectious though preventable diseases brought into my house by the constant circulation of fever-stricken air from a condemned parish containing 1500 persons and not a drop of pure water unless fetched by those who consume it (in small pails), often by aged and infirm women, and more often by young children not fit to lift half the weight, much less walk with it. With no sewer worth the name, and an abundance of cesspools that have not been emptied in living memory, with the light and air measured and sold, and with water polluted and all but denied; with a simple people carried to the poll under threat of dismissal if they do not vote for a dull aristocrat whose only sincere promise to them is that they shall have pure beer—if he can get it. With these for your gods, you ask us to believe we live in a land which can be improved by Bands of Hope!

The battle against poverty is not to be decided by the blare of trumpets and the beating of bass drums. It is not to be decided either by torchlight processions, thronged arenas, flowery rostrums, and pathetic diatribes against capital. It is to be settled in accordance with the distinctively co-operative principles of modern finance, enlarged and extended so as to cover the entire community. The organisation of trades' unions is a step in the right direction. Those bodies have done many things which they ought not to have done, and have left undone things they ought to have done; but they are founded upon the true principle, and only need to have a more practical direction.—Nelson Black.

THE MORROW OF THE REVOLUTION.

[Our friend, Citizen Paul Lafargue, has communicated the following interesting article to us, which is surely well worth our attention; it is probable that his view of the question will be nearer to that taken by most of us in the League than that of our comrade Bax.—Ed.]

OUR friend Bax has treated this question, which we are very full of in France, the country of revolutions above all others; where, since the beginning of the century, with the regularity of a sidereal movement a revolution breaks out every eighteen or twenty years. Permit me to put before you our way of looking at this question.

In 1871, the power fell into the hands of the people when they were not prepared to receive it. In a revolutionary period to take the power is a thing relatively easy; to keep it, and above all to make use of it, is a thing far more difficult. The Commune when master of Paris was not able to take any really Socialist measures; there are numerous causes which explain this helplessness towards Socialism, but which it is not worth while going into at present. However, the bourgeois may be sure, that if ever events should bring the Socialists into power again, the immediate measures which they will take will strike so much at the root of things, that even if the reaction should triumph, it would not be able to bring back matters to the state in which they were before the revolution.

The morrow of the revolution the Socialists will have, 1st., To organise the revolutionary power and provide for its defence; 2nd., To satisfy the immediate needs of the people; and 3rd., To upset the capitalist order of things, and to lay the foundation of the Socialist order.

In France the revolutionary party will find itself face to face with three classes, having different, and even opposing interests; the workman class belonging to the great industries; the peasant class, and the capitalist class with its hangers-on, the little bourgeoisie, industrial and commercial.

In the industrial towns the working-class will be master; they will become so many revolutionary centres, which will have to federate in order to gain the country for the revolution, and to overcome the resistance which may spring up in the commercial and maritime towns.

In the industrial towns the Socialists will have to get hold of the local governments, to arm and give military organisation to the workmen (said Blanqui, "He who has gunshot has bread!"), to open the prisons to let out the petty thieves, and put under lock and key the big ones, such as bankers, financiers, big manufacturers, land-owners, etc. Not that one would do them any harm, but to treat them as hostages responsible for the good behaviour of their class.

The revolutionary government would constitute itself by simply taking possession, and it would not be till it was master of the situation that it would think of ratifying its acts by so-called universal suffrage. The bourgeois have so long kept the non-possessing classes out of the suffrage, that they must not be over astonished if all ex-capitalists are disenfranchised until the revolutionary party is absolutely victorious.

Up till now in France it has been Paris which has given the word of command, and has made the revolution for all France. This concentration of the revolutionary movement has only been possible because the revolutions of the epoch have not been real revolutions, but ministerial crises accompanied by barricades and musket-shot, and pompous declamations on the great principles of liberty and justice, and other twaddle.

The French are fond of melo-dramatic stage-plays, and the new politicians give them their fill of these to their heart's content. But while the drama is being played out in the streets, these politicians slip into the yet warm places of their forerunners, and economic matters go on their usual road. But since the next revolution must be an economic one, and not a mere change of governors, it will not have just merely to spring up in Paris, but must break out in all the industrial centres, which as soon as the local revolutionary government is constituted, must organise by means of delegations or otherwise the central government charged with the function of taking general measures in the interest of the revolution, and of preventing the formation of a reactionary party.

But in order that the revolutionary government may be supported by the mass of the working class, and in order that even if conquered it may leave behind it a work which no reaction can destroy, it is necessary that it should immediately satisfy the needs of the workers in town and country, and that it should begin the transformation of capitalist property.

It would have to return to the primitive idea of society, and consider all its members as members of an immense family, which would have to provide for the first needs of their lives, until a redistribution of all products could be made on a basis of equality. The revolutionary government would in each city have to house, clothe, and feed all its inhabitants. To that end it would decree all house-property national, and would undertake the arrangement of lodging. It would drive the idle rich from their mansions to install the workers in them, reserving those best situated for families having many children. In Paris, while it would lodge women with child on the first floor, it would relegate to the fifth and sixth floors the big-bellied capitalists, so as to thin them down by staircase exercise. The unwholesome hutches of the poor would be demolished and their sites cleansed by fire.

The revolutionary government would nationalise the big shops of the Peter Robinson and Moses kind, and would treat their proprietors as thieves if they dared to embezzle so much as a single reel of cotton. Commissions would be organised by streets and quarters to distribute the contents amongst the workers, who for the first time in their lives would be clad in the good and handsome stuffs which they themselves have made.

But before lodging and clothing the working population it would be necessary to think about their food. The revolutionary government would set up great common restaurants in the various quarters, where a minimum of substantial nourishment would be given to the inhabitants every day. The cooking would be done in common, and those who wished to eat their meals at home could take away their food: but it would be good to encourage meals in common, so as to develop fraternity and equality. During the revolution of the last century, the Commune of Paris organised fraternal meals; tables were spread in the middle of the streets, and each inhabitant brought his own food there, which was eaten in common.

In order to feed the population, the revolutionary government would take over the provision-stores, wine-vaults, breweries, etc., and would at once organise a municipal catering service, which would put itself into communication with the market-gardeners and small peasants of the suburban country. This service, which would suppress the middlemen between the buyer and the consumer, would allow the peasant to obtain a better price for his products. To gain the peasant over to the revolutionary cause is one of the first duties of the Socialist party, and for that purpose, besides general measures (such as abolition of interest, of debts of all kinds, of taxes and the conscription, etc.) we must not hesitate to increase his gains, and make his labour easier by advancing to him seed and manure of the best quality and the most improved agricultural machines.

The workers of 1848, to allow Louis Blanc, Garnier Pagès, Lamartine, and the other bourgeois of the Provisional Government, to found their Republic, "put three months of poverty at their disposal." When at the dissolution of June the people came to claim the fulfilment of their promise, the bourgeois reaction answered them with grape-shot. The Socialist revolution will begin the foundation of the social-republic by putting three months of comfort at the disposal of the workers.

The party which will take these measures on the morrow of the revolution will be invincible; it will be supported by the mass of the workers, full both of enthusiasm and astonishment at finding a government which is occupying itself with their needs.

PAUL LAFARGUE.

WIMBLEDON AND MERTON NOTES.

We have survived the Jubilee here. The local toadies got up their jubilation in secret, for fear that after what took place at the Drill Hall the dreaded Socialists would mar their plans. The Mitcham celebrators provided a tough dinner to persons over 68, mostly toothless; and their Merton congeners expressed their thankfulness to the Queen for being born by taking, an extra dose of preaching and letting off some squibs. We Socialists enlivened the enforced tedium of the day by inundating the neighbourhood with Socialist leaflets. In this wise we met a procession of schoolboys on jubilee parade, and before their teachers were aware of our purpose we had given to every lad a leaflet. "Give them up," shouted the irate pedagogue, when he discovered the nature of the bills, "or I will stop all your medals." These said medals being a bit of tin impressed with the puffy features of Evictoria. But the boys refused, and risked their medals. With insinuating manners and, I grieve to say, false speech on our tongues as to the real nature of the "goods" we were disposing of—such as "Take a tract, mum," etc.—we "worked"—to use the expressive but inelegant language of one of our colporteurs—a quantity of leaflets into hands that would otherwise have refused them. Their disgust and horror when they discovered their mistake was laughable, but they nevertheless kept the bills and read them, and so we were rewarded.

Some curious instances occur in the course of this propagandist work, and are, I think, worth noting here. When alone on tram or railway journeys, I take the opportunity of placing the leaflets with which I am always provided on seats of waiting-rooms and vehicles, or where a workman's face is an index of its owner's receptivity, a leaflet is bestowed with a casual remark. "H'm," said a weary-looking young railway servant to me on giving him a bill, "that's what we want in this country, is Socialism." "So," I ventured to rejoin, "you are not afraid of the Socialists?" "Why should I be?" said he; "all my waking hours are spent in watching and working, and I have to submit to tyranny of officials and the insults of these sort of passengers," pointing to a trainload of city men and some members of the "demi monde" intermixed. "Do you think them a useful class?" said I. "I don't know," he answered; "any road, they take it easy—ten till four—and some don't look as if they troubled much." "It is possible," said I, "that they in their shareholding and stockjobbing way are living upon and causing the overwork of your railway men, and under Socialism you would be men, instead of a source solely of profit to those who despise you." "Hear," he said, "and the sooner they are swept away the better." I may supplement the railway-servant's observation by saying that the manners of these hucksters and quill-drivers towards working men in the trains is insufferably contemptuous. It is an interesting sight, and one that is a strange commentary upon the statement that there is no class antagonism except what is stirred up by the Socialist, to see these popinjays and their bedizened upstart women shrink from possible contact or speech with the tired workmen who may chance into the same carriages when they are on the way to and fro their city "operations" and their paltry villas. Snobbery is contagious, and every wretched overworked clerk or shopman imitates it, instead of fraternising with their fellow-workers, the artisan and labourer.

Before entering my train I gave a Jubilee bill to a burly engineer. After reading a few lines only, he said: "Whoever wrote that ought to be locked up." Being the writer a guilty feeling overcame me. I took stock of him. "Here is an amiable specimen," thought I; "whoever writes what this man disagrees with must be imprisoned. What a fossil!" He probably ekes out his wages with the miserable profits of a chandlers' shop, and because he is satisfied in the sense that donkeys are when oats abound, no one else must protest. It is these curmudgeons who comprise what it pleases the scribes of the press to style the bulwark of divinely ordered society. England might wash her hands in the blood of all nations, and tramps and paupers increase, but he has got work, continued work, and with work he is satisfied. "Briton's never shall be slaves."

Leaving this "survival by fitness" I entered the train, into which I had already thrown my leaflets. Presently a number of workmen entered and the train started. The leaflets caught their eye and they speedily read them. Said an elderly man: "It's all very fine for them 'ere Socialists to talk, and what they say is right, but it will never come about. It always was so, rich and poor. We must have a head, and if we was to share out to-morrow we should all be back again next week worse off than before; them 'ere lazy chaps as won't work would collar the lot." I looked fixedly out of the window while a fierce controversy raged betwixt the speaker and the younger men, who, by the way, although they showed the glaring illogic of what is called common sense, in their converse yet were sympathetic to the new idea. I now mildly joined in, saying that I knew something about those Socialists, and had even been in the company of one that very day, who had been my personal acquaintance since he was a child. I asked the first speaker if he had ever heard or read of a Socialist who advocated the sharing out principle, and if he further didn't think that the idle and dissolute had already "collared the lot." Perhaps I diffidently suggested the Socialist might want the mines whence comes the fuel that warms, and the fields where grows the produce that feeds mankind, so as to be the property of the miners and peasants who worked them, instead of the property of the Lonsdales and Fitzwilliams, who neither delve nor dig, but live upon the sweat of other's bodies. If rich and poor, moreover, were as he alleged always to be, did he think it right that the rich should be those who didn't work or produce, and the poor the producers of the riches. The way of the world, I humbly remarked, was a little changed, for the vehicle we were riding in proved it, and would it not be better for the mass of the people to be educated physically and mentally into self-governing men and women than to cling to the selfish slavish idea that there must always be a head, and that head perchance belonging to a rogue or idiot made, in short, of the same material that British hearts are alleged to be made of, viz., tough timber? I asked him, in conclusion, whether he was assured of ending his days free from want, and he sorrowfully shook his head, but he added, "You'll never alter it." The younger men combated this notion, and I made an earnest appeal to them to work in the cause of labour emancipation, and as they left the train they cordially wished me "Good-speed!" and promised me help, and so ended another effort in the favour of the Cause.

In a public-house, where the same cause led to a heated debate, one vituperative antagonist said triumphantly, "Is not the landlord worthy his hire?" but when I asked what reward the landlord of rack-rented fever dens was justly entitled to, deponent said nothing.

F. KIRZ.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"CHRISTIANITY, POSITIVISM, AND SOCIALISM."

I must thank comrade Bax for his valuable remarks on the above subject, and ask leave to state my own view clearly.

In the earliest records of Christianity the notion of "holiness" (which is the key-note of many other religions) is subordinate to that of "love," that is, the impulse to do right out of mere regard for others which "saves" men from the anti-social vices. This is the principle expressed in Paul's "All things are yours," John's "Perfect love casteth out fear," and James's "Perfect law of liberty," down to the arch-individualist Luther's

"Wer liebt nicht Weib, Wein und Gesang
Bleibt ein Narr sein Lebenlang;

(Who loves not wine, woman, and song, Abides a fool his whole life long).

and to this principle the gigantic blunder of asceticism is totally opposed.

Positivism is primarily a philosophical generalisation of the sciences; but whether owing to the personal vanity of Comte, or the genuine necessity for a religious side to the system, an attempt to elevate it into a religion was made. Comte himself, I believe, philosophically forgetful that the feminine nature itself is exceptionally religious, proposed the worship of women, a notion too childish and exaggerated even for modern tendencies of thought. At all events it was, I think, not as a logical necessity but as an empirical expedient that the current and superficial sides of Christianity were absorbed into Positivism. The 'Imitatio Christi' of course went with them; but anything further than that book from the spirit of the early Christian writings can hardly be imagined; as for example, "True quietness of heart is gotten by resisting our passions, not by obeying them."

Socialism among all the great systems of the world, is not alone in aiming at social happiness, but in making it economically possible; in removing the obstacles to the fulfilment of the religious aspirations. It may indeed be necessary and right to accentuate the new half-truth of the perfect man through the perfect society; but if the old half-truth of the perfect society through the perfect man be wholly lost sight of, it will have to be re-asserted some day with unnecessary emphasis.

REGINALD A. BECKETT.

Extracts from a "Sermon to Parsons," by Henry Broadhurst, M.P.

FROM THE 'CHURCH REFORMER.'

Vast numbers of the people are impressed with the idea that the pulpits of the religious communities, and especially those of the church as established by law, are being used as platforms from which the rights of property are defended and advocated with great force and persistency; while the unjust privileges of the classes, the wrongs done to labour, the neglect of the poor, and the general law of might as against right, are seldom denounced.

In the long struggle for political emancipation and social advancement, I am not aware of any one occasion on which the church has espoused the popular cause and the rights of the poor. By the cause of the poor I do not mean aiding them by the distribution of soup and the loan of blankets. I mean causes and policies that are calculated to enable the workers to provide themselves with the necessities of life, or, in other words, to secure an adequate reward for their industry.

Ministers must read up and expound the real Christian principle, which insists that we are all members of one family, and that the industrious members of that family have the right to lawfully remove all man-made impediments that stand between them and the necessities of life. They must also recognise the fact that men were made before laws, and laws should only be made to assist and protect honesty against fraud, and the weak from the oppression and injustice of the strong. That any law which upholds or in any way facilitates extortion, enabling men to reap where they have not sown, is a licence to rob, and should be so endorsed, and treated accordingly. That they who for the sake of economy patronise and avail themselves of cheapness that is only rendered possible by starvation wages, are participants in wrong and oppression.

I think the ministers of our churches would be much aided in getting a firmer grip of the old faith if they had opportunities of fully realising the hardships of a life of labour. This could be done by adding two experiences to their present studies. 1st. Six months as working miners in one of the worst ventilated and worst managed coal mines. 2nd. Six winter months before the mast on the Dogger Bank on board a fishing smack. If an explosion in the mine, or a gale of wind, or some other of the many causes of loss of life in connection with these industries, did not bring their studies to a sudden and final termination, the men that went through these experiences would enter the ministry equipped for their work in a form calculated to give much earnestness and force to the cause which always commanded the special sympathy and aid of their Master.

It is even now not too late for the churches to enter into competition with the secular champions of democracy; but to be successful the competitors must offer the same earnest and honest counsel and practical help in fighting the battles of life as is given to the people by their more secular friends. So far as my limited and personal experience goes, I have but little hesitation in saying that Trades' unionism has kept burning in this country a purer and more practical Christian light than almost any other institution or corporation of men.

Trades' unionists daily practice some of the leading injunctions of the New Testament. 1st. They subordinate personal aggrandisement to the general welfare of their fellow members. 2nd. When any of their members are out of employment they render them substantial and prolonged assistance. 3rd. They provide relief for their sick members and visit them during illness. Some of the unions have for many years, long before Hospital Saturdays and Sundays were heard of, contributed to hospitals and kindred institutions, thus enabling their members to obtain admission by right and not by charity. 4th. When their members are injured too seriously to again live by their usual calling, the unions provide a substantial sum to assist the sufferers to gain a livelihood in some other manner. When accidents are immediately fatal, similar assistance is given to the widow. 5th. Superannuation provision is made for old age. This, if not a sufficient sum for sole maintenance, at least affords considerable help. Other material provision is also made for members and their families.

Now if these are not religious acts they at least embody some of the great principles of Christianity that cannot be properly left out of any religious code.

I ask, what is the record of the church in relation to these associations? I do not of course mean in its individual action, but in its corporate capacity. Have the unions been aided, encouraged, or defended by the church? No; not a word or look has been given to aid them in their prolonged struggle for freedom and just laws. But I fear it would be easy to produce evidence of the contrary position of the church towards these bodies; and not be very difficult to multiply instances similar of what many people consider to be anti-Christianity on its part.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

A strike has taken place in the boot trade at Northampton, caused, it is said, by workmen objecting to deficient ventilation in the workshops.

The railway spike and gimp nail-makers at Halesowen have decided to give their employers notice for an increase of wages.

THE LANARKSHIRE COLLIERIES.—The coalmasters last week posted notices at their collieries intimating a reduction of wages by $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. This represents from 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. to 4 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. of a reduction per day.

The mill-furnacemen and bolters at Messrs. Willcock and Henry Jones, Rotherham, have been given fourteen days' notice for a reduction of 10 per cent. in their wages. The notice expires to-day (Saturday).

Ironworks in the neighbourhood of Skipton have been stopped, owing to "depression of trade" (i.e., do not produce enough profit), and great distress prevails. Appeals for help have been made on behalf of the ironworkers and their families.

At a large meeting of the workmen—chiefly retort-men—employed at Uppall Oil Works on June 30 it was unanimously resolved to cease work on 7th July, the date that the reduction comes in force, unless the reduction be withdrawn.

THE CHAIN-MAKERS.—The majority of the operatives in the chain trade at Cradley Heath and adjoining districts have again ceased work at the various workshops. On Saturday Mr. Homer and other members of the Chainmakers' Association attended a Conference at Manchester with respect to the co-operative movement.

Last week the retort-men employed by the Broxburn Oil Company held a meeting in a field near the works. The deputation appointed at last meeting to wait on Mr. Henderson, manager, not having received any definite reply that the reduction would be withdrawn, the meeting unanimously resolved that unless the notice was withdrawn before the reduction came into effect they would strike work.

The agitation in the bedstead stud and peg trade was shown at a meeting of operatives at Blackheath, when complaints were made that during the past few years enormous reductions in wages had been enforced, amounting in some instances to as much as 40 per cent. It was resolved to come out on strike Saturday July 9 in the event of the employers refusing to concede the 1881 list.

WAGES IN THE NAIL TRADE.—A few days ago Mr. John Price, of Rowley, received a communication from an employer at Halesowen, calling his attention to the fact that some of the masters were paying at the rate of 40 to 50 per cent. below the list framed in 1879. Mr. Price at once laid the matter before the officials of the Nailmakers' Association, but it was felt that it would be useless to call a meeting of trade delegates at present.

STRIKE AT WEST CALDER.—A meeting of miners and retort-men, numbering nearly 200, was held on July 1 to discuss the proposed reduction of wages. Mr. Alexander Leitch in the chair. After a long discussion, the meeting passed a resolution that a strike take place should the reduction be persisted in by the masters. A deputation was appointed to wait on the manager and inform him of the decision.

THE CARLUKE MINERS.—The miners employed in the coal-pits belonging to Shotts Iron Company in the Carlisle district have received notice that a reduction of wages will take place, amounting to about $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Some of the colliers employed at Carlisle and Law collieries for a short time past have been working on broken time. On July 1 an open-air meeting of miners was held in the Market Place, Carlisle. Mr. Bernard Tracey presided. Mr. Small addressed the meeting, and it was agreed to follow the policy of eight hours a-day and five days a-week, if the miners of Hamilton district should agree to this restrictive policy.

WAGES IN THE MALLEABLE NAIL TRADE.—Notice has been given by the masters of the malleable nail trade of Birmingham for a reduction of 10 per cent. in the wages of the operatives. It is said that there is a difference of 20 per cent. in the rates of wages paid in Birmingham and the trade in other centres, and the reduction is asked for to prevent other districts from taking away the trade of the Birmingham employers by underselling. The workmen held a meeting on Tuesday June 28, and unanimously resolved not to accept any reduction, but to do all in their power to bring about the equalisation of the wage prices in the trade throughout the country towards which end, we are informed, the men are prepared to spend £500.

THE STRIKE OF DUNDEE MASONS.—This strike still continues, and at present there is no likelihood of a settlement. A number of the employers have given the halfpenny per hour of an increase asked, and work is proceeding at their jobs; but the majority of the masters are still holding out, and their employes decline to resume work at the old rate of wages. Men are now becoming scarce in Dundee, and several employers who have large contracts on hand are anxious for a settlement. Work in other towns is plentiful at present, and a considerable number of men have left Dundee and got employment elsewhere. A number of the quarry-masters in the district have taken a curious action, and a notice which savours somewhat of boycotting those employers who have granted the increase has been issued to the Dundee Master Builders' Association as follows: "Dundee, 1st July 1887.—We, the undersigned quarrymasters in meeting assembled, this day resolved as follows: 'Until the existing dispute in the building trade is settled we shall not supply you with any more material.'"

MR. BRADLAUGH AND THE SHOE-MAKING INDUSTRY.—Apropos of the debate on the question "Will Socialism benefit the English people?" now going on in the Commonweal between Mr. Bradlaugh and our comrade Bax, several communications have been received from workers in various industries as to the optimistic statements of Mr. Bradlaugh. The shoemaking business has been specially mentioned, and the following remarks are from the letter of a Nottingham workman: "I started in life as hand-stitch workman, or as we term it, a woman's man; as such worked for some of the best shops in country—London, Northampton, and Stafford. I am now a finisher of rivet or machine-sown work; have been employed on half-time this last year or two. The goods that sell in this town are manufactured in the low-wage districts of Kettering, Northampton, and Leicester; Norwich and Bristol are low-wage towns. Now, forty years ago trade may have been bad in those districts or indeed all through the country, but boots and shoes were more generally manufactured in every town or village throughout the kingdom; a workman could tramp from town to town and get work; now he's got to tramp till he gets to the big shoe centres before he gets work. I have sent you your trade report for May, which is issued to us in June; you will observe that trade is only good in those large manufacturing districts where cheap goods are produced, which proves that big manufacturers are crushing out of existence lesser ones. You will see that the London trade is going to Northampton for cheapness. I might say that, considering the riveting and finishing is a young industry, wages have gone down rather rapidly."

"MR. BRADLAUGH AND THE TRADE UNIONIST RING.—The debate in Committee on the Coal Mines Regulation Bill has been chiefly remarkable for the rebuke received by the Trade-unionist M.P.'s at the hands of Mr. Bradlaugh. Messrs. Burt, Broadhurst, and their "tail" in the House have been making every endeavour inside and outside Parliament, to strike a blow at the freedom of women's labour at the pit bank. This attack is being sustained under cover of a thick coating of unctuous philanthropy. It is pretended that the pit-brow women are undergoing a process of degradation, and that they must be saved from themselves and their taskmasters, the colliery proprietors. The lamentations of these Chadbands are of course meant to be misleading. Their benevolence is purely self-regarding. The prime object of trade-unionism, so it is held, is to raise wages. As the presence of these weak women tend to lower rates, they must be cleared out of the way—entirely for their own good and salvation, of course. Mr. Bradlaugh has stripped the parliamentary trade unionist ring of their white chokers and black gloves, and has treated them to a little social philosophy with no humbug in it."—Jus, July 1. No man can serve two masters. He cannot be at the same time the advocate of the monopolists and the champion of the workers. There is practically little difference between Mr. Bradlaugh and his ardent admirers of the Liberty and Property Defence League, except that he is to use a mild term, somewhat more illogical. Under these circumstances it seems to me that in selecting such a pronounced antagonist of collectivism to speak at their annual gala, the Northumberland miners are unwittingly endorsing the foregoing insult to the whole body of trades unionists.—T. B.

THE BOLTON ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—June 30.—The engineers' strike at Bolton is putting the town into a state of great ferment. The importation of foreign workmen is greatly exciting the men, and last night the streets near the works where it is known that the strangers are located were besieged by great crowds. Near the works of Messrs. Hicks, Hargreaves, and Co., in Crook Street, an immense crowd gathered, and stones were thrown in profusion. Two arrests were made, and a third apprehension took place, but the third man escaped. A rush was then made to the building in a back street where the beds put up for the accommodation of the strangers were situated, and more stones were thrown. The police for a time were powerless, but their number was augmented, and the crowd kept in check.—July 1.—There was a renewal of disturbances at Bolton last evening, which culminated in a serious conflict between the police and the populace, by which a number of persons were injured, including an inspector of the borough force. The introduction of two hundred county constables appears to have aroused public feeling, and about six o'clock, in the vicinity of one of the works affected by the strike, a large crowd assembled. Stones and bolts were thrown freely, and a considerable number of windows were smashed. The police drew batons and repeatedly charged the mob, which had got more demonstrative. The conflict lasted over an hour, and many were hurt. Half-a-dozen arrests were made, and the greatest excitement prevails. July 2.—There was a renewal of disturbances at Bolton last evening, and sixty more constables were early drafted to the scene of Thursday night's disorder, making a force there of over one hundred strong. The crowd, numbering quite eight thousand, became very demonstrative at dusk. Walls in the vicinity were pulled down, and the materials used as weapons. The police endeavoured to clear the streets, but failing, the military were summoned from their billets, and on arrival were received with hootings and a fusillade of stones. Order was obtained by keeping the main streets clear, but the greatest excitement prevailed. The public-houses in the neighbourhood of the works affected were closed by order of magistrates. A later account:—The crowd has increased twofold. Hundreds of windows are being wrecked by stones and other missiles. The policemen are powerless. The Mayor and other magistrates, accompanied by the town clerk and magistrates' clerk, have just proceeded to the scene of disturbance, being escorted by the Hussars. The excitement increases, and an outbreak of a serious nature is feared, threats being made to burn the works down. The military are now engaged clearing the thoroughfares amidst showers of brickbats, stones, blocks of wood, and other materials lying handy. The riot was ultimately quelled by the military which charged the mob repeatedly, during which a large number of persons were injured, and one Hussar was thrown to the ground, his ankle being broken. The police tried to effect several arrests, but this was not persisted in owing to a shower of stones. The Mayor and other magistrates remained on the scene until midnight, when the crowd began to disperse. During the struggle at one point fifty persons were knocked down and trodden upon. July 5.—By latest accounts the excitement still continues and the military are camping near the town to be ready for emergencies.

FRANCE.

The Cri du Peuple announces that in a few days (the date is not as yet known) a mass meeting will be held at Paris, under the auspices of the Watchmen Committee of the XIII. district (Comité de Vigilance du XIII. arrondissement) in order to publicly denounce a series of inhuman and barbarous practices perpetrated at the sugar refinery, Say and Co., who employ over 4,000 workers. Mind you, that Say is the learned member of the French Academy, the former Minister of Finance of the French Republic, and the most distinguished representative of bourgeois political economy in our nineteenth century! It is impossible to give a description of this hell, where human beings are obliged to work completely naked during fifteen and often seventeen consecutive hours, in holes heated at from 60 to 80 deg., and where they suddenly pass into backcourts, where the temperature is at 15 deg. below zero. The least mistake in the work is invariably punished by immediate discharge! We need not say that these poor refiners, even if they were strong and robust men, soon become weakened and sickly, and die an untimely death. A few days ago a general diminution of one franc has been imposed on all salaries, and so 4,000 slaves are reduced to starvation wages, whereas that abominable Say makes a gross profit of one franc per sugar loaf, and 40,000 sugar-loafs are produced daily! And whilst these miserable slaves have their wages reduced from day to day, and live a life of pain and starvation, that M. Say writes books, voluminous and pedantic, on the accord between capital and labour, and receives the warmest congratulations of the Academy of moral and political science!

At the iron works of Le Creusot, where reigns and governs M. Schneider, the blacksmiths, whose salary has been reduced from 5 fr. to 4 fr., have stopped their work and are now on strike. Of course, M. Schneider is an archi-millionaire!—D.

GERMANY.

At Breslau, several perquisitions have been made and proved unsuccessful. But comrade Bruno Geiser, chief editor of the Neue Welt, and formerly member of the Reichstag, has been arrested. Nobody knows, not even the police, for what reason.

The deputy Lalance, who represents Alsace in the Reichstag, has been expelled from the very district of which he is the chosen representative. So he sits in Parliament for a province which he is not allowed to visit, and that is one of the "beauties" of the representative system.

Another member of the German Reichstag, the Socialist deputy Kräker, of Breslau, has been arrested on leaving, at the close of the Session, the Parliament. He was taken away by the police on the very steps of the House in which he was sent to represent his fellow countrymen,—and that is another of the "beauties" of the representative system!

From the fifty Socialists who have been tried at Magdeburg, thirty-one have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment varying from nine months to fourteen days.

At Danzig, a dozen Socialists are now on their trial, and although their condemnation has not yet been pronounced, we may fairly say that they will be sent to prison. Their acquittal would be a wonder, and Germany does not work wonders—at least of that kind.—D.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian papers announce that the king of that unfortunate country has presented his son-in-law, the heir presumptive of the Austrian crown, with a splendid estate, situated in Hungary, which he has recently bought for the trifling sum of twenty-eight millions of francs! This enormous sum of money has been stolen away from the wretched workers, who receive for twelve, fourteen, and often sixteen hours of labour, a salary varying between 5 fr. (four shillings) and 1 fr. (tenpence) a-day.

As our readers are aware, the members of the Belgian Worker's Party (parti ouvrier belge) have made it a part of their programme to try by all means to enter in the town councils, in the provincial councils, and even in the House of Parliament. Although they have succeeded in getting some of their friends in various of these councils, they have of course not obtained anything whatever of all the reforms they aimed at. The same electioneering propaganda is going to commence for the communal elections of the next month of October. However, we are glad to say that the strongest part of the Belgian organisation, the Socialist Federation of Ghent, represented by the Vooruit and by the daily paper, the Toekomst, have seen at last the fallacies of that representative humbug system, and they declare to the Socialist Federations of Brussels and Liege their intention not to proceed to the ballot boxes in company with the Radicals. As it appears, the Federation of Antwerp is likely to follow the same line as our friends in Ghent.—D.

HOLLAND.

It will be well for Socialists to remember the name of C. G. Bergér van Hengst, the director of the Penitentiary of Utrecht, where our comrade Domela Nieuwenhuys is imprisoned for not having written an article which appeared in Recht voor Allen. The tormentor of the Utrecht jail seems to be of the same sort as the chief jailer of the hard labour prison of Halle, in Prussia, he uses the same methods. Domela Nieuwenhuys, who has been very ill and was ordered to have the food of the prisoners at the infirmary, has again been deprived of this "favour." All letters addressed to him are now destroyed. Our comrade Croll, who has power of attorney for Domela, has been refused further permission to communicate with him on behalf of the prisoner's children. In the beginning of his imprisonment he had leave to have books in his cell; all books have now been removed and his detention is in the full sense of the word a most brutal and infamous solitary confinement.

In answer to the growing persecution of Socialists in Holland, our friends have decided to issue their organ Recht voor Allen instead of twice three times weekly, from the 1st of July, and without any change in the subscription price. Bravo!—D.

OUT OF THE MOUTHS OF CHILDREN.—Nellie: "Let you and I play inventor." Fanny: "How shall we do it?" Nellie: "Why you, the inventor, go in and get some cakes out of the cupboard, and I, the capitalist, come along and eat them all. You'll get all the fame; I'll tell mamma it was you who took the cakes, and she will tell papa."—Newcastle Chronicle.

SYDNEY, May 21.—SOCIALISM.—A public debate on "Socialism" was held at the Royal Standard Theatre (upstairs), on Wednesday evening. The debate was opened by Mr. A. M. Pilter, of the London Socialist League. He treated the question from an historical standpoint, and dealt very ably with the conflict between labour and capital. Messrs. Flower, Howard, and others led the opposition. Mr. M'Namara spoke in favour of Socialism. Another speaker relied mainly on land nationalisation.—Sydney Evening News.

The number of persons employed in connection with mines in this country was 600,000, and the quantity of minerals raised annually was between 150 and 200 millions of tons. Every 150,000 tons of that enormous quantity represented a human life lost, very often by causes which were preventable. The juggernaut of selfish mismanagement exacted a tribute of life and limb at a rate which exceeded 25 for every week the whole year round. These accidents were not the result of sudden and therefore presumably unavoidable explosions, but generally of carelessness and selfishness on the part of colliery-owners. Inasmuch as colliers were not in a position to enter into contracts with their employers upon equal terms, the State was bound to interfere for their protection.—A. O'Connor, M.P.: Speech on the Mines Regulation Bill.

SHIPBUILDING ON THE CLYDE.—There is no hope of a speedy revival of this trade. There is an over-production of ships at present; the carrying power is far in excess of the demand. The average tonnage of ships built on the Clyde half-yearly since 1878 has been 126,953 tons, the past half-year only 86,780 tons were built, about two-thirds less than the average amount. The orders on hand give no hope of better times. In a well organised state, instead of masses of workmen hanging about Govan and other places on the Clyde waiting for orders to build ships that never will be given, these men would be drafted up to Glasgow to aid in demolishing Glasgow slums, and in building houses for those families that are at present living in one-roomed houses. Perhaps the Lord Provost and Town Council of Glasgow might consider this suggestion. Where the welfare of the State is at stake, his lordship and councillors should not allow themselves to be terrorised by the holders of "vested interests."—A. K. D.

REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday evening last, an important business meeting was held, which was well attended.—U.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, June 29, H. H. Sparling gave very interesting discourse on "Rebel Songs of Ireland." The meeting closed with "God Save Ireland." On Sunday, July 3, we held a good meeting on Clerkenwell Green, addressed by Blundell, Sparling, Mainwaring, and Wardle. Literature sold well. The usual monthly "social evening" of members and friends was very successful.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—H. A. Barker spoke to an attentive audience at the Broadway, London Fields, on Wednesday evening. Graham and Westwood addressed the meeting at the Salmon and Ball on Sunday morning. At the club, on Sunday evening, J. Lane lectured on "The National Loaf, who earns and who eats it." Members are requested to attend these meetings as often as possible.—G. C.

MERTON AND MITCHAM.—Last Sunday morning, Kitz and Eden addressed good meeting on the Fair Green. Collection, 1s. 1d. From Mitcham in the evening, Kitz and Buteux visited Battersea to push Commonweal, and distributed a large amount of literature.—F. KITZ.

EDINBURGH.—On Saturday, Donaldson and G. Hossack addressed a meeting at Loanhead. On Sunday, Davidson, John Smith, and J. H. Smith had a large and very attentive audience in the Queen's Park. Commonweal sold well.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday afternoon, a very successful meeting was held at Blantyre. Addresses were delivered by Small, Glasier, Gilray, Carmichael, and Paterson. On the same day Gilray, Glasier, and Paterson spoke to a large audience at Cambuslang. They had a good reception. On Sunday forenoon, Glasier and Gilray addressed a meeting in Jail Square. In the afternoon, we held our usual meeting at Paisley Road Toll, Glasier and Gilray speaking. There was a large audience. The police have interfered with our meeting here, and as we intend testing the right of free speech, all friends interested in Socialist propaganda are earnestly requested to turn up there next Sunday at five o'clock.—J. M. B.

LANCASTER.—Are spreading the gospel as usual, in ways most expedient in such a camp of the Philistines as this, and have distributed a number of Jubilee leaflets. Two more of our active members are leaving the place through the practical stoppage of one of our largest and most tyrannical workshops. The always vast procession of unemployed on the main roads between Barrow, Lancaster, and Preston is on the increase. On Friday, at our club-house, had usual gathering, when Leonard Hall read chapters from E. B. Bax's 'Religion,' and we had a genial farewell to our departing comrades.—L. H.

LEEDS.—On Wednesday evening, at new open-air station in Meadow Lane, Hill, Maguire, and Paylor addressed a fair audience. On Sunday morning, Braithwaite, Hill, Maguire, and Paylor held a meeting; and at night in Vicar's Croft a large crowd listened attentively to Maguire, Paylor, and Braithwaite. The quarterly election of Branch officers took place on Friday.—T. P.

NORWICH.—On Wednesday evening last, we held a splendid meeting at Yarmouth, a large audience listening attentively to Henderson and another comrade. On Sunday morning a meeting was held at Diss, and in the afternoon in Norwich Market-place, Henderson speaking at both places. Morley in the chair. In the evening, Slaughter spoke on the Agricultural Hall Plain, Sutton in the chair. At 8 o'clock, the Gordon Hall was well filled. Henderson lectured on the "Marriage Question," brisk discussion; Moore in the chair.—J. S.

WALSALL.—Pelsall was again visited on Wednesday, June 29, and a good meeting on the Green was addressed by H. Sanders, Weaver, and Deakin. At the close there was a little opposition from a teetotal friend, who was ably replied to by Weaver and Sanders to the entire satisfaction of the audience. On Saturday evening, Sanders addressed large audiences in the Market-place, Walsall. During the week the teetotallers have been carrying on open-air meetings with the help of special lecturers, but although publicly challenged by Sanders to debate the point as to whether teetotalism would solve the problem of low or insufficient wages and the difficulty of getting employment, they have not taken it up.

HULL AND GRIMSBY.—On Sunday, June 3, I addressed a series of meetings at Grimsby, where a Socialist body had been started some months ago. I addressed a meeting there in February last, and a number of men met afterwards to form an organisation. They then determined amongst themselves to work locally. They have since held regular meetings, and got together a band of very earnest and energetic comrades. The meetings were well arranged, and the audiences good and sympathetic. The morning lecture was in the open-air, and dealt with the case of the miners of the North of England. The afternoon address dealt with the attitude of Socialists towards co-operators and trade unionists. A brisk discussion followed. In the evening a large audience gathered at the Hall of Science to hear a discourse on "How Socialism Might be Realised." The scheme seemed satisfactory to the audience, and an interesting discussion ensued. Several new members were enrolled afterwards, and preparations were discussed for extending the work of the society and having more speakers down. Altogether the prospects of Socialism in Grimsby are decidedly hopeful. —J. L. M.

PECKHAM.—On Sunday evening W. H. Utley lectured at the Peckham Reform Club on "Socialist Politics." The lecture was well received and a large quantity of literature was sold.

SOCIALIST UNION (NOTTINGHAM SECTION).—On Sunday morning in Sneinton Market Proctor and Peacock spoke to a good audience, 2s. 2d. collected. In the Great Market Place at night a large meeting to hear Waine, Proctor and Peacock speak on Socialism; 5s. 6d. collected. At the meeting at the Club four members enrolled. —A. C.

WOOLWICH.—Last Sunday R. Banner spoke to a large gathering at the Arsenal gates. Literature as usual sold well. £1 2s. 6d. collected for propaganda.

North of England Socialist Federation.

Seghill meeting addressed by J. L. Mahon on Friday. Backworth.—Good meeting, addressed by A. K. Donald. Fair sale of literature.

Blyth.—A large meeting was addressed in Blyth Market-place by A. K. Donald on Saturday evening. Branches of the Socialist Federation will please remember delegate meeting at Grey Mare Inn, Blyth, at 3 p.m., on July 9.

Newcastle.—Thomas Mann, S.D.F., has held a number of meetings in the town in the course of the week, which have been well attended. An effort is being made by the branches of the S.D.F. to raise sufficient funds to have a speaker permanently in Northumberland.

North Shields.—A. K. Donald lectured on Quayside on Sunday morning to a large audience. Arrangements are being made to give an indoor lecture next week, at which ample opportunity will be given to opponents of Socialism to state their views. Mr. Leslie Johnstone has intimated that he wishes the debate adjourned some weeks.

Sunderland.—A meeting was addressed by Donald and Wood on Sunday afternoon. A teetotal employee of the N.E.R., in receipt of 30s. a-week, was indignant at Donald's exposition of the N.E.R. balance-sheet. He thought the shareholders fully entitled to their plunder.

South Shields.—An address was delivered by Donald in the market-place on Sunday evening to a good audience. Several new members were made. Friends desiring to join the Socialist party please communicate with J. Wood, 105 Bath Street.

Consett.—A. K. Donald lectured at the pump on Monday evening.

A WRITTEN DEBATE

BETWEEN MR. C. BRADLAUGH, M.P., AND E. BELFORT BAX.

SUBJECT:

“Will Socialism Benefit the English People?”

V.—Affirmative: E. BELFORT BAX.

I REGRET that Mr. Bradlaugh's second paper should not have contained a more distinct criticism of the modern Socialism set forth in my opening article than it does. Mr. Bradlaugh in his last complained that I had not made myself clear to him on certain points. These I endeavoured to explain in a few sentences. He now again says he does not understand what I mean. Briefly then, once more, the “economic basis” of modern society is production for profit, through the monopoly of the means of production by the named and unnamed individuals constituting the capitalist class, in its various sections. The “economic basis” of Socialism is the collective ownership of these means of production by society as a whole, and their working not for the profit of individuals or classes but for the use of society as a whole, both collectively and individually. I believe, as I before said, that the tendency under Socialism would be increasingly towards a collectivisation of the product, but when, how, and the precise proportions in which this would take place I do not pretend to prophesy. In fact, when Mr. Bradlaugh pursues me with four wheeled cabs, wooden clogs, and his long and supple leather fishing-boots, and says, what of these? who shall ride in this cab? who shall wear these boots? how do you know that he who wears the boots will like the boots he wears? there is only one truthful answer I can make him, and that is, “I don't know, and I don't care”; and in saying this I am sure I express the sentiments of the immense majority of modern Socialists. Such conundrums have not the slightest practical interest at the present time; and if Socialism pretended to answer them it would thereby proclaim its own absurdity and worthlessness. If Mr. Bradlaugh wants to discuss such interesting details as these, I commend him to the Positivists, who will further inform him how many times a man is to tap his forehead or scratch his left ear (I forget which) before going to bed in the society of the future.

And this brings me to the point where, with due respect to Mr. Bradlaugh, I should like to signalise what I think is the cause of Mr. Bradlaugh's failure (as I cannot but deem it) even so much as to touch the question at the root of the issue between us. Mr. Bradlaugh seems to be looking out in my exposition for something he doesn't find, and he is disconcerted because he doesn't find it. Hence his unwillingness to deal with the historical and other points put forward by me, and his anxiety to waive aside so many things as “irrelevant to the issue between us.” This latter practice or proceeding reaches its acme of eccentricity, if I may so call it, when Mr. Bradlaugh intimates his opinion that the question of the unemployed has nothing to do with Socialism, and challenges me to prove that Socialism would benefit the unemployed! Now I submit that though human nature can stand a great deal in controversy, yet there is a limit to all things under the sun. And I do think that Mr. Bradlaugh might have borne in mind the elementary fact that Socialism by its very definition excludes the possibility of there being any “unemployed” to benefit. The “unemployed” belong to present society, and it clearly devolves upon Mr. Bradlaugh as the champion of present society as against Socialism to deal with this great problem of modern times. He may say, of course, that Socialism is wrong and impracticable; but granted Socialism and ex hypothesi there is no such thing as an “unemployed” class. However, I will not press this point.

The question then arises, what is this “something” Mr. Bradlaugh is trying to find in modern Socialism, and can't? I think I am not far wrong in saying that what Mr. Bradlaugh is looking for is (1) a handy and portable conspectus of future society, which, when found, he might proceed to pull to pieces at his leisure; and (2) an attempted application of such a scheme to the English people as English—i.e., considered as an isolated whole and without reference to the rest of civilisation. Unfortunately, in neither of these respects can modern Socialism oblige Mr. Bradlaugh. The Socialist of to-day does not profess to carry in his pocket any ready-made detailed scheme for the future of human society. Such schemes he regards as mere quackery nowadays. All he professes to do is to proclaim a law, or a system of laws, if you like, of social evolution. He shows the development of society in the past, exhibits the logical tendency immanent in that development, and deduces therefrom the main principle of the next stage of social progress. For this reason an international Socialism, with the means of production and distribution concentrated in the hands of society, as advocated by modern Socialists, could not have taken place in any previous period of the world's history. As to the details of the arrangement, whether immediate or ultimate, these no human being can see. All we say is, let the working classes, organised to this end, take over the means of production, distribution, and exchange; first the land, railways, mines, factories, credit establishments, and the larger warehouses and retail stores, which stand ready organised to their hand; at the same time let the executive proceed to establish new workshops, warehouses, and stores on a large scale in those trades where they do not already exist, and so undermine the smaller establishments possessed and worked by individuals, and which might for that matter remain unmolested until this happy consummation. Beyond this we do not profess to make any definitive proposal as to production or distribution. The rest must be left to time and circumstances to work itself out. (The above is, I think, in itself a sufficient answer to Mr. Bradlaugh's paragraph 7. It will be seen from this why I regard Mr. Bradlaugh's first definition as inadmissible on all the three sub-heads he mentions.) Before leaving this question of “detail,” I should like to illustrate the common absurdity of requiring a detailed plan of the new society in its completed form, of its pioneers to-day, by asking Mr. Bradlaugh if it would have been very reasonable to have expected a member of the Long Parliament (let us say) to give a detailed exposition of the political and social relations of the modern commercial world? The Puritan townsman of the seventeenth century undeniably represented the principle of the supremacy of the middle classes as against Feudalism, and yet we know how little he could have pictured to himself the ultimate issue of this principle as presented in nineteenth-century England. Yet the parallel is feeble, seeing that his principle had already made some practical headway, and the change from the social life of the seventeenth to that of the nineteenth century is immeasurably less in scope than that from a fully-developed capitalistic civilisation to a fully-developed Socialism.

To come to the other point. Modern Socialism is unable to deduce the social change it deems imminent, from the idiosyncracies of a particular people, or to conceive Socialism as applied exclusively to any one people. The modern European States (with the various colonies which are their offshoots) had their origin in loose feudal confederacies with little or no national cohesion. (I should not have insulted Mr. Bradlaugh with references for this elementary historical fact but for certain remarks in his last paper; as it is, I refer him, as regards England, to almost any page of Green, Freeman, or Stubbs.) We regard the modern national stage as merely transitional; Mr. Bradlaugh, on the contrary, seems to regard it as a sort of thing that was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be. Already we see the nationality idea becoming a mere cover for financing operations, market-hunting, and capitalist competition generally. The “differences” of type, temperament, etc., are but surface-differences compared with the fundamental laws governing the development of all human society. The most diverse nationalities were once united under the very inelastic civilisation of Roman antiquity. Western Europe, irrespective of race, was, again, dominated by the feudal system; the whole civilised world is now alike under the iron heel of modern capitalism—i.e., profit-mongering and wage-slavery. Mere racial differences may be quite well left out of account in dealing with the deeper problems of social development. If Mr. Bradlaugh would deign to notice my brief historical sketch, he would find the essential identity, irrespective of nationality, of Western development from Feudalism to capitalism there indicated. Nay, even the Socialist movement has already taken hold in greater or less degree of the workers of the whole of modern civilisation from the Pacific to the Volga. A few years ago there was no Socialist movement either in England or America; it is now daily advancing by giant's strides. Mr. Bradlaugh makes a difficulty as to what I mean by the well-known phrase modern or western civilisation. I mean of course the economic, political, social, and intellectual life of Europe and its colonies, including the greater part of America. In economics this means modern capitalism, with its railways and great machine-industry; in politics, middle-class “constitutional” government (monarchical or republican); in social relations, the particular compound of vulgarity veneered with culture sometimes termed Philistinism; in religion, the organised hypocrisy which assents to, or does not reject, a body of dogmas, rites, and ceremonies the plain meaning of which is obsolete or no longer believed in by the educated classes. But, says Mr. Bradlaugh, how about Russia, there is no constitutional government there? No, and every one recognises the Russian despotism as an anachronism—that is, as something out of place in nineteenth-century Europe. There are, of course, “backward” countries in Europe that fail as yet to reach the standard of completed bourgeois perfection, as realised in England and the other important Western nations. The attainment of this, however, as we have often seen, is only a matter of a few years. But modern capitalistic civilisation, I may observe, re par, is not the only form of civilisation. There have been other and more immature forms of civilisation, the “economic basis” of which has been serfdom or chattel-slavery. Some of these survive still in a stationary or decaying state—notably in Asia, and here and there in Africa. These (with the barbaric and savage populations of the globe) may be left temporarily out of account. They are outside the main stream of modern social development.¹

As regards Mr. Bradlaugh’s paragraph 3, I would like to ask him in what purely barbaric or savage community he finds a dominant class of exploiters and a dominated class of exploited within the community, it being understood that we are not talking of cases here and there of rapacity on the part of individual chieftains; or what is more to the point, I would ask him to explain how my definition of civilisation can be made to apply to the internal economy of those primitive tribal communities, by the gradual consolidation of which all centralised nations were formed, and the last remaining survivals of which may be seen in the Russian Mir, the Swiss Alllemen, the Hindoo “village,” etc., etc.² (cf. Maine’s ‘Village Communities’ and other works, Laveleye’s ‘La Propriété Primitive,’ Maurer’s ‘Deutsche Markverfassung,’ also Mommsen’s ‘Römische Studien,’ and first volume of ‘Roman History,’ etc., etc.). Appropos of this I might quote Emerson’s words with one alteration: “Society is civilised (Emerson said barbarous) until every industrious man can get his living without dishonest customs.” When this latter is the case we shall have Socialism.

Mr. Bradlaugh’s paragraph 8 evidently implies more than it says. I am sure Mr. Bradlaugh would not feel inclined to be rude without thinking he had some very good cause. Notwithstanding, as I really cannot see the terrible lapsus I am supposed to have made, I must still adhere to both my statements as to Owen, Fourier, and Co., to wit, that though the end of modern Socialism is, broadly speaking, similar to that of Utopian Socialism, as I understand it, yet that as a science or theory of Society it stands in much the same relation to the latter as modern chemistry does to alchemy, or astronomy to astrology.

In paragraph 9, Mr. Bradlaugh again discredits the historical side of my opening paper without discussing it. He says I ought to bring forward some evidence in support of the statements challenged. This I should have been most happy to do, if I had known what were the statements challenged. But seeing that Mr. Bradlaugh admits my account to be “sometimes consonant with fact,” I had surely a right to expect that he would name the points where, in his opinion, it was “utterly conflicting” therewith, and briefly state his reasons for so thinking. It seems to me this would have been more germane to the issue (seeing the importance modern Socialism attaches to its “historical basis”), than propounding impossible riddles as to the precise point where communisation of the product will begin and end in future Society, problems which obviously can only be solved by experience, and upon which modern Socialism does not profess to dogmatise.

One last word on the point about Christianity incidentally raised in my first article. What I meant was that the essential principle of Christianity, that upon which its whole theory of life and conduct is based, is an assumed relation between the individual soul, and the divinity directly revealed in it and to it. The end of the individual’s being and conduct is his union with this divinity, all moral action is in the last resort subservient to this as its supreme source and object. My aim was to place this morality in contrast at once with the old tribal morality of the early world and with that of modern Socialism, the object of which was and is, not the perfection and apotheosis of the individual soul but the welfare of the social body. I still contend that isolated passages in the Acts (which, bien entendu, may or may not represent historical facts) do not “in the least affect” my position. A policy pursued under special circumstances as a matter of convenience cannot be taken as affirming a principle. I may say, however, before leaving the subject, that I can find not the slightest justification in the text for the gloss Mr. Bradlaugh has put upon the Ananias incident in his last paper.

And now then for the promised facts and figures relative to Mr. Bradlaugh’s paragraph 18 in first paper, and the progressive concentration of capital in fewer hands. Does Mr. Bradlaugh know that (1) in the bakery trade a complete transformation has taken place within the last few years; that whereas every baker used to bake his own bread, now there are hundreds of bakers in London who sell but do not bake bread? (The reason of this is that large firms like Neville are able to bake bread and deliver it cheaper than retailers can bake it.) (2) In the fancy bakery trade I am told the same fact is still more noticeable, where firms like “Huntley and Palmer,” and the “National Bakery Company,” are ousting the small capitalist completely out of the field. Moreover, in this as in other departments, it is becoming general for large grocers to supply cakes and biscuits made by the firms in question, thereby completely crushing the small specialist retailers. (3) Take, again, the refreshment trade, and the same process will be found to hold good, as evidenced by the success of the “Aerated Bread Company,” “Lockhart,” etc. (4) I am informed by a correspondent of large experience in the glass bottle trade, that he is convinced that the whole of the smaller makers must before long “go to the wall.” One of the largest glass-bottle makers in England has absorbed, to his personal knowledge, eight small factories within a few years, and no new ones have sprung up to take their places, or are likely to do so. (5) Again, Joseph Chamberlain’s (or rather Nettlefold’s) screw-making business has, it is well known, very nearly crushed all other screw-makers out of existence. Lipton’s is also a case in point. (6) The business of transportation shows precisely the same phenomenon, large men crushing small men, and large companies crushing small companies. An immeasurably larger amount of the carrying trade, as every one knows, passes into the hands of the few large shipping companies than into that of all the small firms combined. The instances pointed out, I think, fully bear out my friend, Alexander Donald (who has for two or three years passed been specially investigating this matter at first hand and in detail) in writing: “The facts (relative to this subject), which have not been reduced to tabular form by any one, simply because the bourgeoisie don’t want information on the subject, leave no doubt as to the truth of your statement.”

I will not weary the reader by running through the gamut of the various trades and industries, which, so far as I am aware, all without exception tell the same tale; but here are a few official statistics:—From 1863 to 1869, there were 4,782 new limited companies started; from 1870 to 1876 there were 6,905; from 1877 to 1883 there were 8,643; and in 1883 alone there were 1,634, the largest number ever started in one year. Of course, a considerable proportion of these fail; in the sharp competition there is among them it is the fittest to cope with existing conditions only, which survive. But here again the main element of success is practically unlimited capital, wherewith to “hold on” and to “push.” I would ask Mr. Bradlaugh to consider the amount of concentration of capital all this means, for statistics in this case where every company is officially registered must obviously be rigidly accurate. The same remark applies to the figures respecting bankruptcies and compositions with creditors, which form part of the obverse of the same medal. Here are a few taken haphazard:—The bankruptcies and “compositions,” which in 1870 were 5,002, in 1875 realised 7,899, and in 1879 attained the enormous total of 13,132.

Of course, I must accept Mr. Bradlaugh’s statement that the boot-making districts are better off to-day than forty years ago. I must only call Mr. Bradlaugh’s attention to the fact that forty years ago the industry of the country was only beginning to settle down from the acute crisis caused by the introduction of the great machine industry. Now no one denies that the sudden and severe misery caused by this subsided for a time, during the flourishing period of British manufactures and trade, otherwise the Cobden-Bright school of politicians could never have got the ear of the English working-classes as they did. It may well be that the after-glow of this period of “leaps and bounds” lingers still in some industries and in some districts. Our contention is that, taking things all round, and setting aside this as well as temporary trade “booms,” etc., the tendency toward a polarisation of wealth and poverty is making itself apparent in a yearly accelerating ratio. When Mr. Bradlaugh asks me to furnish statistics of every important town in Great Britain in 1847 and in 1887, he is, I respectfully submit, making a somewhat unreasonable and unnecessary demand upon me. My opinion of the value of such statistics considered per se is not such as would induce me to undertake elaborate researches on that head. On this point I am entirely of Carlyle’s way of thinking. Figures which appear so orderly and beautiful and convincing, are but abstractions; they are only serviceable as a shorthand registration of a conclusion arrived at by other means. The, in most cases insuperable, difficulty of initial verification, the difficulty of finding out the precise data on which they are based, the facts they suppress and the facts they express, render them practically valueless. Statistics have a fraudulent appearance of an accuracy which they can only possibly possess in a very few special cases. Hence the superstitious belief in figures on the part of the modern mind. For my own part, no number of statistics would have ever made me a Socialist, and no number of them would unmake me one; so Mr. Bradlaugh must pardon my declining to treat the statistical side of this question as possessing any but a purely secondary and formal interest.

In concluding my share of this debate, I must again apologise for the length of this paper, only pleading the largeness and importance of the subject in excuse. At the same time I should like to express my sense of the uniform courtesy of Mr. Bradlaugh in the conduct of his side. The subject, “Will Socialism benefit the English People?” as I believe, is necessarily decided in the affirmative by an understanding of what Socialism (in its modern sense) means, and can only be profitably discussed on this issue. Hence the direction I have endeavoured to give to the debate.

E. BELFORT BAX.

¹ To mention one point only, as regards nationalism. Under nationalism the capitalist can play off the imported foreign workman against the native, or can transport his capital to other lands, where he will find a crowd of starvelings to do his bidding. This could not happen were the national barrier broken down. When Mr. Bradlaugh looks at the interconnection of modern industry and commerce throughout the modern world-market, he must surely see that the establishment of Socialism in England implies the immediate co-operation of at least the nations constituting the van of civilisation.

² The not unfrequent existence of slavery in its cruder form in barbaric societies, while apparently contradicting my contention, does not really do so. The captive taken in war is reckoned a chattel precisely because he is not in the tribal society, within the limits of which alone social life is as yet recognised. There is no exploitation of tribesman by tribesman.

THE MORROW OF THE REVOLUTION.

ONE great idea which dominates all others has taken firm hold of the brains of all Socialists, the suppression of individual property. The Anarchists themselves, who are, without knowing it, the representatives of the "laissez faire, laissez passer" of property, are drawn into its current. The idea of the suppression of individual property is not one which has sprung up spontaneously in the human skull; it is the intellectual reflexion of the economical phenomenon which is evolving in the capitalist world.

What is the true characteristic of individual property. It is that the owner should work on his own property: this is so true that the peasant, the propertied animal above all others, when he grows too old to cultivate his land, rather than see it worked by hirelings divides it between his children, although this surrender of his land, his only love, is as torturing to him as the tearing out of his entrails. The old French proverb, "Property is the fruit of labour," expresses this fact. Consequently the only true property-owner in the old sense of the word is the peasant who cultivates his own land, the landlord who inhabits and repairs his own cottage, the shopkeeper who buys and sells merchandise in his own shop, the carpenter who himself uses his own saw and plane. All that these property-owners possess belongs to them in all justice, it is the fruit of their labour and not of that of others, for no wage-earner has worked on "their property."

But is it the case that capitalist property presents this character? Are the owners of mines, of railways, of great warehouses, the landlords who own hundreds and thousands of acres, and whole quarters of towns, really property owners? Have they ever worked on their "property"? They only know it by the rent it brings them in; it is the wage-earners and not the owners who work on their property. In the capitalist world we must correct the ancient proverb, and say, Property is the fruit of labour, and the reward of idleness."

The capitalists by not working on their property, but by using it to lay hold of the fruit of the labour of others, have destroyed the essential character of individual property.

The capitalist property-owner is a being absolutely useless in the scheme of property; all the shareholders and bondholders of the railways might be drowned in the Channel, and yet the railways of Europe would go on carrying passengers and merchandise. The capitalist property-owner is a useless mouth which consumes a terrible quantity.

Everything that is eaten by a rich man, and the domestics and other folk who serve and satisfy his tastes and needs, is consumed in pure loss. It is as if instead of burning coal in a machine to transform its heat into force, one were to burn it in the open. The capitalist being useless therefore ought to be suppressed to lessen the expense of social production. The Socialist revolution will be bound to accomplish this economical operation; it will not destroy property, it will free it from its parasites.

The very day of the revolution the first decree of the revolutionary government will be the confiscation of capitalist property (mines, spinning-mills, foundries, railways, etc.), and its transformation into social property.

Bax and the English Socialists think that the State will take the place of the capitalist property-owners, and continue the exploitation of the great instruments of labour as in the past, but at the same time bringing in certain ameliorations in the lot of the worker, such as shorter hours and higher wages, etc. Their ideal is the capitalist public service (post-office, telegraphs, police, etc.), brought to perfection.¹ But for us, we believe that as a consequence of the very fact of the establishment of the revolutionary government, the State with its public offices (post-office, national debt, police, magistracy, army, etc.), will disappear. The State is a machine cunningly organised to serve the interests of the capitalists, and to keep the proletarian mass in slavery. The revolutionary government which will temporarily replace it, will have to disorganise the bourgeois machine and to draw all its power from the proletarian mass, and so to lay the foundations of the new order.

Instead of its being the State which will be the manager of the post-office, and telegraphs, the minter of money, and director of the railways, as it is now in nearly all capitalist countries, instead of its being the State which will be the manager of spinning, and weaving, and director of the mines, etc., as Lassalle wished, and as the English Socialists now wish, the revolutionary government will have to act in such a way that it will be the workers themselves who will become their own employers and their own directors.

The revolutionary government will not have to impose on the workmen, their directors, the rules of their labour, or rate of wages on the workmen, the telegraphists, the employés of the railways, or the miners, foundrymen, etc. On the contrary, the workmen will come to an understanding among themselves as to choosing their engineers and foremen, and on the sharing of the gains of their business. The nation will put at their service the instruments of labour; special commissions will be charged with drawing up a table of charges; that is to say, a rate of wages which can be claimed for services rendered, the sum which it will be necessary to set aside for the repairing and improving of the machinery, and the sum to be paid into the public treasury to assure to each member of society victuals, lodging, and clothing.

On the morrow of the revolution, the work to be done will be so colossal, that it must not be increased still more by turning the revolutionary government into a director of spinning mills, or a shoe manufacturer; on the contrary, it must hasten in the masses themselves, the development of all the organisers and directors of social labour. Capacities towards direction exist, since it is the wage-earners only who direct all production, and it is only a matter of grouping them to find those commissions which will be charged with regulating scientifically the production and equitable distribution of products.

For the end of the social revolution is to work as little as possible, and to enjoy as much as possible, and that can only be attained by a continuous improvement of machinery and a scientific division of labour amongst all the members of Society, and by ensuring a just proportion of production to the needs of Society.

But before arriving at this Communist Society, in which labour and pleasure will be free and in common, we must pass through a transitional period, in which it will be necessary to maintain wages and to keep the due proportion between them and the service rendered and the effort given. For our part we believe that the workers themselves have more qualities to enable them to distribute the hours of labour and the gains, than the functionaries of any State would have.

For the rest we only formulate here the desiderata; events will force us on the road to be followed; and it is more than probable that the two systems will be combined in various proportions.

The Morrow of the Revolution the revolutionists will have to arm the wage-earners and organise them as soldiers; to lodge, feed, and clothe them gratuitously; and to confiscate and nationalise capitalist property. The nation which has once tasted this Socialist regime, even if it were but for a month, will be gained for ever for the Social Revolution.

SCOTTISH NOTES.

A statue of Sir William Wallace, the greatest hero in Scottish history, was recently unveiled at Abbey Craig, Stirlingshire, and the one man in all Scotland deemed worthy of performing the ceremony was—the Marquis of Bute!

Scotchmen are Liberal in politics, Presbyterians in religion, they adore Wallace and worship Burns, but they would not for the world permit the statues of their dead heroes and poets to be unveiled by a mere man if anything bearing a human shape with the title of lord could be found within the four quarters of the earth.

Wallace was no patriotic fanatic or bully. He was the arch-agitator, conspirator and traitor—the Socialist of his day. His army was filled with the victims of poverty and oppression—les misérables. Rogues and vagabonds of every description followed him, and fought and bled like heroes under his banner. Probably it is as a representative of these latter that Lord Bute was asked to unveil the statue of the warrior hero, but in that case a great injustice is done to the memory alike of Wallace and the companions of his toil.

Lord Bute it is true is a plunderer—a most colossal one; but he plunders the poor because he is rich, not the rich because he is poor. So far from being a representative of the poor oppressed and outlawed soldiery who strove manfully against the oppressors of their time, he is a lineal descendant and representative of those very oppressors whose law was their swords and whose swords were law. Were Wallace alive to-day, his enemies, instead of being foreign hirelings or predatory aliens, would be the titled and untitled knaves of his own country who rob the people of their land and every means of sustenance and happiness; and Scotchmen if they had anything of the spirit of their "glorious ancestors who wi' Wallace bled," would be leagued together—gathering with them the unfortunate, the ragged and torn from the highways and the byways—to wage war against their common oppressors, who make their lives miserable and scourge the land with a more terrible devastation than the fire and sword of Edward's feudal hordes.

At a meeting of the Trades Council held here last week one of the members, a comrade of ours, Mr. Carson, brought forward a resolution declaring that inasmuch as the policy hitherto pursued by trades unions had achieved practically nothing for the workers, it was necessary that the workers adopt a more advanced programme, demanding the full fruits of their labour. The motion was lost by 17 votes to 4. Had our friend moved a resolution that a testimonial be presented to Lord Rosebery or Mr. Andrew Carnegie, or anything that might testify the Council's appreciation and respect for the interests and rights of anybody but the people for whose weal they profess to confer together—it would no doubt have been carried with acclamation.

The Scottish Leader calls the attention of those virtuously indignant against the practice of boycotting by the Irish tenant-farmers, to the fact that in Aberdeen where the masons had succeeded by a strike in compelling a number of employers to grant an advance of wages, the principal quarrymasters of the district have signed an agreement with the masters who held out against the men, to supply no material to any master mason who has conceded the advance!

The miners' union in Scotland, except in one or two districts, has practically collapsed. In Lanarkshire, where the union did brave work some time ago, the men have become quite disorganised and demoralised, and have submitted to a reduction of 7½ per cent. without protest. Still it would be unwise not to recognise the fact that the men are submitting to the iron law of capitalism merely because of their present helplessness, and that the feeling against their oppressors is bitter and deep, and may very soon become dangerous.

NOTES ON NEWS.

WHEN one has said that the Coercion Bill has passed its third reading, there seems little more to be said on the subject at this stage of the proceedings, except perhaps to express wonder at the meaning of all the fine phrases about the civilisation of the times, the freedom under which we live, the progress we have made in the toleration of the expression of opinion, the power of rational minorities, and the like. It is as well to descend to earth after all those fine flights, and to remember what the whole event means. Simply that political changes which are purely political and seem to lead nowhere, are accepted with little struggle as mere shifting in the rules of an amusing game, in which there must be a certain amount of give and take; while on the other hand changes that threaten ever so little the sacred "rights of property" are to be defended by any means, fair and foul.

And these means are really only manifestations and forms of one when once the possibilities of fraud are exhausted, and that one is mere brute-force. That really lies behind all the junketing and gentilities of modern society, all its philanthropy and cant, and self-satisfied priggism. Brute-force is the foundation of all that, neither more nor less than it was of the devastations of Atilla or Timur: neither is it any more forgiven than in the days of the older brutalities, when once it is known for what it is. From that point of view we owe some thanks to the Tory Government and its steady majority of nobodies; in this instance of Ireland they have stripped the veil of pretence off their actions, and they say to the Irish, "Dog, do this because it is profitable to us!" It will be a good day for the Social Revolution when the masters of society generally are forced into the same course, and dropping all pretence, to say openly to their slaves, "Work for me (mostly gratis) or die."

The Liberal successes at Spalding and Coventry, and the reduction of the Tory vote at North Paddington, are no doubt promising to the "outs" in the game of "ins and outs" as it is now being played. But hear the Daily News as to the spirit abroad among the working men at North Paddington:

"A number of working men who possessed the vote could not be got to use it, being swayed by an overmastering impression that in regard to the two parties in the State it was 'six of one and half-a-dozen of the other,' and that neither cared a straw for the interests of the working man. 'Why should I trouble about voting? What is it to you or me who gets in? They're both a set of humbugs, promising you anything and everything to get in, and doing nothing when they get there.'"

Yes that is why the Tories are able to keep their places, and why their party is being continually helped by persons once called Liberals and Radicals: because the working-men voters have got hold of one truth at least, that Parliament, with its parties, auxiliary newspapers, and the like, is not kept going for them but for their masters. This is encouraging to Socialists and other honest men—who will all be Socialists presently.

The Government has sustained a sharp defeat, owing to their own inconsiderate folly and want of foresight in not seeing how probable it was that the Cass incident would be taken up by the shop-keeping group, and what dangerous enemies they are. On the other hand, so good-natured and easily-pleased (and one must add so stupid) the general English public is, that the House of Commons has considerably reinstated itself in public opinion by voting, by a very narrow majority, that it may be wrong for a policeman and a magistrate to commit an act which is at once (for a wonder) illegal and unjust, and for a great official to decline to consider such a proceeding.

Again wonders will never cease! The martinet Sir Charles Warren has issued instructions to the police not to go beyond the law in persecuting poor girls in the streets, who are doing what our present society insists that some women shall do; that is, to serving as a safeguard to the chastity, or a veil to the respectability, of their richer sisters.

As to Mr. Newton, what can one say but that he has acted after his kind? What he did in the case of Miss Cass he does, no doubt, every day: only this time to injustice, brutality, and cruelty he added a mistake. He thought he was dealing with a defenceless person, and lo! the shopkeeping class spring up behind her like a jack-in-the-box. No doubt he will take care not to do it again;—that is the mistake, not the injustice, brutality, and cruelty. W. M.

Some idea of how landlords plunder the unhappy devils in their clutches may be gathered from the figures that appear now and then in the press. The Daily News of July 8 said, in commenting on a return of judicial rents in Ireland, then just published: "We have it on the authority of the Land Commissioners that seven tenants whose aggregate rental was £372 ought not in equity to be required to pay more than £157; that one man has been paying fifteen guineas for land not worth more than five pounds; another £54 for land not worth more than £20; a third £107 for land not worth more than £50."

Knowing what "in equity" and "not worth" mean when used in a capitalist organ, this reads as a strong condemnation of the landlord system.

The Saturday Review has been lucubrating upon modern society and its evil condition. In the course of its remarks it says: "There are several great influences that influence the destiny of nations: one of these is the social condition of a people; the fountain-head and mainspring of which in this country is London society. It is composed of the wealthiest, richest, and best-born in the land!"

It is difficult to see how those whose social function is consumption only can be the "fountain-head" of anything, nor, supposing that a "social condition" is furnished with a "mainspring," is it easier to understand how those who "toil not, neither do they spin," can supply that useful portion of machinery.

I am not acquainted with the difference there is intended to be made between the "wealthiest" and "richest"; nor, after the disclosures so often made, with what may make men the "best-born"; but I would suggest that when even a "respectable paper" like the Saturday can talk of the "rottenness and degradation" of those who form the "fountain-head and mainspring," that it is time something was done toward making a new "fountain-head and mainspring."

Of course the old series of dread examples is duly trotted out to show that great wealth brings luxury and deterioration upon a people and has wrecked all great empires hitherto; but, from lack of logic or otherwise, it is carefully kept out of view that these results have ensued upon great wealth in the hands of a class.

The experiment of a people free from class-rule and monopoly, holding wealth as a social possession, has not yet been tried. But the time comes, and that right soon, when it shall be, and succeed! S.

CONCERNING USURY.

THE new Socialistic economy is rapidly taking root in the popular mind and conscience, but there are points connected with it still involved in considerable obscurity and doubt. Take, for example, the subject of "Interest," as it is called. Henry George, in his great epoch-making work, 'Progress and Poverty,' sanctions a form of that dreadful social cancer which, to my mind, is a deplorable blemish. Why? Because it leaves a door still open for a section of the community to live in idle luxury on the produce of other men's toil. "The produce of labour," said Adam Smith, with wonderful penetration, "is the natural reward or wages of labour." The converse of this proposition is obviously: Idleness produces nothing, and is therefore entitled to nothing.

Those economists who maintain the validity of "interest" do not in so many words deny that idleness should go without any reward. What they contend is that idleness which has once been industrious and produced something, should be entitled to live happily ever after—wards on the product of that product. In a word, they affirm the justice of what the Bible calls "increase," in despite of the Hebrew Lawgiver, who, in my opinion, saw very much further into this milestone than any one or all of them combined. All interest and increase are unjust in principle, and calamitous in their effects, and should simply be stigmatised generally as "usury."

Permit me to recall a few historical facts relating to usury. The Saxon laws in restraint of usury were sufficiently severe. Edward the Confessor forbade usurers to remain in any part of the kingdom, outlawed their persons and confiscated their property. A clergyman convicted of usury had his goods distributed for pious uses. Usury was thus defined: "Est usura suus si quisquis tradit mihi nummos spe lucri. Fenus duplex usura vocatur"—"It is usury if any man lend me his money in the hope of gain. Compound usury is called fenus."

"For the honour of God and the good of this realm," Edward I. inflicted the heaviest penalties on usurers. In the City of London alone he hanged two hundred and eighty Hebrews of the Rothschild and Goschen stamp pour encourager les autres. Coke, in his 'Institutes,' expressly declares that "all usury is directly against the law of God." Indeed, it is not till the time of Henry VIII., and what Cobbett not unjustly calls the Protestant "devastation," that we find the scourge of usury sanctioned by Act of Parliament. By 37th Henry VIII. the rate of interest was fixed at ten per cent. The first "Defender of the Faith" is remembered chiefly for his matrimonial exploits; but these were of small importance compared with his heretical innovation in the matter of usury. In less than seven years, however, our Bluebeard's Act was repealed by Edward VI., who enacted that "No person should lend on usury or increase to be hoped or received beyond the sum lent." This statute was in turn repealed fourteen years later by that dreadful person "Good Queen Bess." The "Jezebel of England," as John Knox appreciatively called her, revived her father's ten per cent. statute, declaring at the same time, with inimitable hypocrisy, that "all usury is against the law of God, sinful and detestable!" In 1625 James I., "the British Solomon," in his wisdom reduced the rate to eight per cent., his statute concluding, "Provided that no words in this law contained shall be construed or expounded to allow the practice of usury in point of religion or conscience." Oliver Cromwell brought down the rate from eight to six per cent., and Queen Anne reduced it to five.

Holy Writ is one unbroken testimony against usury, which it aptly compares to "the bite of a serpent." All the early Fathers of the Church vehemently denounced it. Let me instance first some of the sacred texts bearing on the matter.

"If thy brother be waxen poor and fallen in decay with thee, then thou shalt relieve him; yea, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner, that he may live with thee. Take thou no usury of him or increase, but fear thy God, that thy brother may live with thee. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals upon increase."—Leviticus xxv., 35-37.

"Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of anything that is lent upon usury."—Deuteronomy xxiii., 19.

"If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury."—Exodus xxii., 25.

"He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent; He that doeth these things shall never be moved."—Psalms xv., 5.

"He that hath not given forth upon usury neither taken any increase, . . . he is just, he shall surely live, saith the Lord God."—Ezekiel xviii., 8, 9.

"Thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord.

"Therefore have I poured out mine indignation upon them; I have consumed them with the fire of my wrath: their own way have I recompensed upon their heads, saith the Lord God."—Ezekiel xxii., 12, 31.

Christ the Son of Man, the Heir of all the Ages—He of the perfectly-blended head, heart, and will—went even further:

"Give him that asketh of thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not away."—Matthew v., 42.

"If ye lend to them of whom ye hope to receive, what thank have ye? for sinners also lend to sinners, to receive as much again.

"But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again; and your reward shall be great, and ye shall be children of the Highest."—Luke vi., 34, 35.

Christ taught no formal system of politics or economics, but every system that does not square with His profound ethical doctrines is assuredly founded in error, and can lead to nothing but injustice and misery.

On the subject of usury the consensus of opinion of the Fathers of the Church is complete, but only one or two sentences from them need be given. Says St. Augustine:

"If you lend your money to a man from whom you expect more than you gave, not money alone, but anything else, whether it be wheat, wine, oil, or any other article, if you expect to receive any more than you gave you are an usurer, and in that respect reprehensible, not praiseworthy."

St. Jerome:

"Some persons imagine that usury obtains only in money; but the Scriptures, foreseeing this, have exploded every increase, so that you cannot receive more than you give."

St. Ambrose:

"Many persons, evading the precepts of the law when they give money to merchants, require the usury not in money, but take some of their goods in payment of the usury. Therefore let them hear what says the law: You shall not receive the usury of food, nor of anything else. The victuals are usury, the cloth is usury, whatever is added to the principal is usury—whatever name you give it is usury."

Is it not, then, with such a cloud of witnesses testifying to the truth, something astounding that in a professedly Christian country, all ranks and orders of men should practise this abomination of usury not merely without compunction, but as if it were positively meritorious? You never hear usury even named. The vile thing gets disguised in a complete mask of cunning, delusive, heathenish terms—to wit, interest, consols, omniums, funds, debentures, securities, and God knows what not. The clergy and the Government encourage the workers to put their surplus earnings, if they have any, into savings banks, so as that they may join the ranks of the great army of fleecers, and exploit the labour of their fellow-workmen. A savings bank is, in reality, one of the most dangerous institutions in the country, because it teaches one class of workmen to prey upon the industry of their less fortunate fellows, and thus perpetuates the horrible social system under which the masses groan. Like insurance offices these banks are simply symptomatic of deep-seated social disease.

Of the effects of usury what need to speak? The great Unnational Debt we have already paid four times over, and, like the farmer with the squire's claret, we are "no forarder." It hangs like a millstone about the nation's neck.

"Usury," writes Tacitus, "was an early canker of the Commonwealth, the frequent cause of tumult and sedition. Laws were made to repress the mischief while yet the manners were pure and uncorrupted. . . . By a law of the Twelve Tables it (interest) was reduced to one per cent. More was declared illegal. In process of time a new regulation proposed by the Tribunes, lowered it to one-half; and finally it was abolished altogether." It unfortunately reappeared with the Empire, and eventually ruined the State.

"Usury," says Rollin ('Ancient History'), "has always caused the ruin of States where it has been tolerated, and it was this disorder which contributed very much to subvert the constitution of the Roman Commonwealth, and gave birth to the greatest calamities in all the provinces."

Says Gregory, of Nyssa:

"The usurer's life is both indolent and insatiable; the pen is his plough; the paper his field; the ink his seed, his rain and season for to luxuriate his money crops; he has barns and granaries to hoard up and thrash the property of the wretched; looks upon all men's property as his own; prays adversity to his neighbours, that they may have recourse to his refuge; he hates the affluent, and considers those his enemies that will not enter his books. He is for ever in quest of gain, yet always insatiable; he accommodates all borrowers, not through motives of charity, but excessive avarice. Let not gain be the mainspring of your good works, and God will repay you with interest."

Says Professor W. J. Beal, of New York:

"No blister draws sharper than does the interest. Of all industries, none is comparable to that of interest. It works all day and night, in fair weather and in foul. It has no sound in its footsteps, but travels fast. It gnaws at a man's substance with invisible teeth. It binds industry with its filth, as a fly is bound in the spider's web. Debts roll a man over and over, binding him hand and foot, and letting him hang upon the mesh until the long-legged interest devours him. There is but one thing on a farm like it, and that is the Canadian thistle, which swarms with new plants every time you break its roots, whose blossoms are prolific, and every flower the father of a million seeds. Every leaf is an awl, and every branch a spear, and every plant like a platoon of bayonets, and a field of them like an armed host. The whole plant is a torment, and a vegetable curse. And yet the farmer had better made his bed of Canadian thistles than be at ease upon interest."

Usury, Aristotle pronounced abhorrent to nature; and so it is. It is at best the product of a product; the further fruit of labour already remunerated. It simply means that labour must both toil for its products and pay for their use, the payment in this country amounting to a total drain on industry of £250,000,000 per annum! Mr. Henry George, if I apprehend him correctly, holds that the lender has a right to share with the borrower in the increase towards which his capital in combination with nature's reproductive forces has contributed, but in no other case. Thus A lends B £2,000, with which B purchases a flock of sheep. At the end of two years the flock has increased fifty per cent. How many fleeces and lambs, or their equivalent in money ought B to give A, in addition to returning the £2,000 borrowed? The answer is obviously, "Neither fleece nor lamb," otherwise "the produce of labour is not the natural reward or wages of labour," inasmuch as B has had all the trouble of tending the flock.

Were the whole flock to die of the rot before the end of the second year, B would lose all his labour and still be responsible to A for the £2,000 which A would have wholly lost (his labour included) had he personally invested in the sheep. A's position is virtually that of a "sleeping partner" who makes money in his sleep, sharing profits but repudiating losses, in defiance not merely of justice but, in a measure, of law. By 28 & 29 Vict. c. 86, § 5, the man who lends to a partnership, the interest varying according to profit, in event of the firm's failure, can recover no portion of principal or interest until the claims of all the other creditors have been satisfied.

But A is not without his natural reward. B has acted as the custodian of his money,—no small service inasmuch as decrease not increase is the characteristic of all so-called capital,—and A has benefited along with the rest of the community in cheaper wool and mutton. The power of increase, animal or vegetable, is, in point of fact, a property of the land, and is, in justice, inseparable from the rent which Mr. George has so triumphantly demonstrated belongs inalienably to the whole people.

How, then, are we to crush this monster usury, or render him innocuous? The reply is—Repeal all laws that guarantee the collection of usury in whatever form. Put all such debts precisely in the position of gambling debts—"debts of honour," as they are called—and the fangs of the serpent will be effectually drawn. He may die hard, but he will die, and the world will profit a hundredfold by his decease.

J. MORRISON DAVIDSON.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

The furnaces of the New British Ironworks at Ruabon, the largest iron-works in North Wales, have been blown out in consequence of the continued depression in the Welsh iron trade. A large number of "hands" are thus thrown out of employment.

Following the example of the operatives in the small trades in the surrounding district, the jump-plate and spike-nail makers at Halesowen have commenced an agitation for a higher rate of wages. The operatives in this branch of the nail trade complain that their wages have recently been reduced to a miserably low point, and there being no organisation amongst them, they have not been able to withstand the repeated reductions enforced.

STRIKES OF OIL WORKERS.—The proposed reduction of oil workers' wages not having been withdrawn, the men employed at Uphall and Holmes are now on strike. It is expected that the men at these works will join the Miners' Union. At Holmes the miners have been ordered by the contractors to clear their places, a lock-out being expected. The Deans Oil Company having given notice that a reduction of 10 per cent. was to take place, the men have unanimously agreed not to resume work, and to resist the above reduction. In accordance with the resolution come to by the Oil-Works Association, a reduction has been announced in the wages at the Burntisland Oil-Works, the men to the number of 700 have consequently struck work.

LANARKSHIRE MINERS.—The reduction of miners' wages is only partial, being confined to the employers who are in the Masters' Association. The collieries affected, though extensive, do not include such wide-spreading concerns as are owned by Mr. Archibald Russell, Messrs. Colin Dunlop and Co., and several others. The men affected by the reduction are expected to resume work as usual; but, as a start to reopening of the late agitation, the Lanarkshire Miners' Central Board have resolved to ask the districts to send representatives to a conference to reconsider the advisability of starting anew the old restrictive policy.

CLOSING OF IRONSTONE PITS.—Kilbirnie and Dalry parishes, in the West of Scotland, are suffering severely from the depression in the iron trade. The Eglinton Iron Company have abandoned their clayband ironstone workings on the lands of Todhills, Kersland, and Brownhill, and are now removing their machinery from these pits, while Messrs. Merry and Cunningham, who a year ago abandoned Ryesholm Pit, have just given notice to their workmen that Highfield Pit will be closed in a fortnight. It is also stated that they intend closing their offices at the villages of Mossend and Birkip; and altogether it looks as if they were about to sever their connection with the district.

The Daily Telegraph of July 6 contains the following advertisement:

FOUR FEMALE SORTERS WANTED at once. Salary 6s. per week.—Apply at 112, Southampton Row, W.C.

This kind of advertisements completely answer the queries of hypocritical Chadbands who want to know why so many women are "on the streets." The Regent Street tradesmen perhaps know this; and want the ugly fact removed from their street. When these pure-minded tradesmen hold their next meeting, will they be good enough to state which particular street the women are to perambulate? The recent stir about "women" of a particular class is one of the most glaring pieces of hypocrisy conceivable in this age of shams.

A short time ago a signalman was found dead in his box on the Carnforth line. A correspondent to the Manchester Weekly Times, signing himself "Signalman," says: "I am surprised there are not more cases of sudden deaths in signal-boxes, considering the long hours and mental strain a signalman has to contend with. I am a signalman in the employment of the Cheshire Lines Railway. I am stationed at a junction box, and have to work 12 hours a-day without a single minute to call my own out of the 12. At the week's end I have 18 hours to work, from 6 p.m. on Saturday night to 12 at noon on Sunday. There are about 60 men on the same line that work 90 hours a-week, year in year out, without a Sunday to themselves, and nearly 200 trains pass the boxes on the main line in 24 hours. I would ask you if you think this sort of slavery is right and just!"

BIRMINGHAM NAILMAKERS.—A meeting of operatives in the local malleable nail trade has been held in Birmingham, to consider the following notice from their employers: "The masters find that the difference between the rate of wages paid in Birmingham and the rate paid at some other places mentioned at the meeting is fully 20 per cent.; in some cases the difference is found to be even more. To equalise this the masters therefore propose that the rate of wages now paid in Birmingham be at once reduced 10 per cent., and that the club at the same time use its influence to get the rate of wages paid at the other places advanced 10 per cent., thus bringing the whole of the yards to very nearly a level rate of wages. As soon as this is accomplished, the Birmingham masters will be willing, if the other yards go with them, to advance the general wage rate 10 per cent., bringing it back to the present level, and thus securing a uniform rate of wages throughout the trade." The men unanimously resolved not to accept any reduction, but to do all in their power to bring about the equalisation of the wage prices in the trade throughout the country, towards which end the men are prepared to spend £500.

STRIKE AT THE MANCHESTER JUBILEE EXHIBITION.—At one o'clock on the 5th a number of the attendants at the Exhibition gathered beneath the central dome preparatory to marching out of the Exhibition grounds, the object of the demonstration being to express the feeling of the attendants with regard to the charges made for refreshments. The attendants have for some time been agitating for a reduction in the refreshment tariff, but hitherto without success; and they determined that on Tuesday they would leave the place in a body and get their meals outside. In consequence of the dispute with the Committee the attendants struck work and the machines in the Machinery Section were, with one or two exceptions, at a standstill from the opening in the morning to the close of the Exhibition on the 6th. The machinery at the Exhibition was stopped throughout the whole of Thursday, in consequence of the absence of the attendants as the result of the dispute between them and the Executive Committee in connection with the supply of refreshments. This state of things is now, however, likely to be put an end to, for the committee of the Machinery Section met and decided to meet the wishes of the attendants to the extent of providing them with a building in which they can take their meals, and supplying them with hot water for tea and other purposes. The tickets of a number of the men who had taken an active part in the agitation had been stopped, but these, we understand, will be returned, and it is expected that the machinery will now be run as usual.

GLASGOW UNITED TRADES' COUNCIL.—This Council met on July 6th, Mr. R. C. Grant in the chair. Discussion was resumed of the debate adjourned at a previous meeting on a motion by Mr. Carson: "That the present methods of maintaining and advancing the rights of labour by strikes, arbitration, and conciliation practised by the Trades' Unions of this country having failed practically to accomplish this object, this council is therefore of opinion that some other method better calculated to attain this result is necessary in the interests of labour, and for the due maintenance and advancement of its just and natural rights." Mr. Carson argued that no plan could be said to have done what was needed that did not secure a far greater share to the producer of the wealth produced, and showed how vastly capital had increased of late years, and as yet the working-man had got no advantage from it, for although they might get a rise of wages, that had at once been neutralised by a rise of rents and provisions. Trades unions, he maintained, had not been aggressive enough. Mr. M'Pherson, in seconding the motion, said that as a rule trades' societies had occupied too much of a negative position. Mr. Wilkie moved as an amendment: "That trades' societies had done as much for the object they professed to have in view as could be expected, when the number who did not connect themselves with them was taken into consideration. He thought Mr. Carson should have pointed out what would better effect the objects we had in view. Mr. Howie, in seconding, said he would have liked something more definite than the motion, and thought that were tradesmen better united and did more to raise up those lower than themselves great good would result. Mr. Hodge said it was not the unions that were at fault, but the men who did not give them a fair chance. After further discussion the motion and amendment were put to the meeting, when 17 voted for the amendment and 4 for the motion. The Council then adjourned till the 27th inst.

SHORT TIME IN THE COTTON TRADE.

A large number of firms in all parts of Lancashire, Cheshire, and on the borders of Yorkshire are now running short time, with the object of defeating the cotton corner. The workers have volunteered to assist the producing capitalist to defeat the exploiting "corner" capitalist. This action simply means semi-starvation to thousands.

In the Yorkshire doubling trade are several mills running short time. At Bolton a partial stoppage of machinery at several mills is reported. At Oldham, Bamford, Baglsate, and Bury are many fustian sheds running short time.

Nearly all the mills in the Whitworth Valley are working short time.

Three of the largest mills in Blackburn, and in which there are about 16,000 looms and 40,000 spindles, have been stopped for an indefinite period, and several hundred people are thrown temporarily out of employment. Messrs. Harrison and Sons have also stopped their three mills for an indefinite period, in order to defeat the cotton "corner." The mills contain some 1700 looms and about 35,000 spindles. Several other large mills in the town and district are running short time, and it is not improbable that others may follow the example set and close altogether.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.

A great number of the men arrested in connection with the recent rioting have been sentenced. Considering the gravity of the charges—far more serious than the charge against comrades Henderson and Mowbray—the penalties are very light. "Bound over," 14 days with the option of a fine, and for a month's imprisonment a policeman was nearly killed. Very few of the persons arrested were strikers.

Last Saturday, all the imported hands in the employ of Messrs. Dobson and Barlow, about twenty-two in number, left the works and returned to their own homes. Messrs. Dobson and Barlow decided to close the works for a week, to afford an opportunity for the necessary repairs to be carried out. This decision will throw a large number of workmen out of employment.

The money voted by the Masters' Union is not exhausted, so the conflict goes on merrily.

A large number of additional importations are expected in Bolton daily, notwithstanding the recent outburst of popular feeling against the admission of "strangers" to the iron foundries. Every precaution is taken by the police against the recurrence of rioting, as many as thirty policemen being stationed in each of the four large works where provision has been made for "knobsticks." To relieve the monotony of the life of the importations at Messrs. Hicks and Co.'s Soho foundry, a smoking concert was recently given upon the premises. A piano had previously been standing in the works for the benefit of the men.

On their side the strike hands remain in capital spirits, placing their reliance in what they term the justice of their case. They have support from every hand. So healthy, indeed, is the state of their funds that the Strike Committee are taking a census of the children under ten years of age of the men on strike (society and non-society alike) with a view to granting a weekly sum per child, in addition to the ordinary strike pay.

The Strike Committee have issued a manifesto, in which they say:—"We wish to draw attention to the unscrupulous manner in which our employers, who are all magistrates, with one exception, have done their best to implicate our men in the various disturbances which have taken place in the town through their own action in importing knobsticks. They have also closed our public houses, and for what reason. Simply because they find that the publicans have thought fit to do as they like with their money—namely, support the men. Our public park has been changed into a military camp, just to please the employers, to the inconvenience of our townspeople and their children. The town has also been packed with county police and private detectives, who so far have done their best to implicate some of our men, but without avail. Up to the present our action in this justifiable strike has commanded the respect of all parties save the employers."

FRANCE.

The glass bottle makers at Montluçon are still on strike and they seem well determined to hold out to the utmost of their power. Last week, James Hunter, General Secretary of the Glass Bottle-makers' International Association, sent to the strikers in the name of the General Council, a letter expressing their warmest sympathy and best wishes for success in their struggle, and a hearty invitation to join the International Union. At the same time comrade Hunter asked his fellow-workers to forward an account of their financial position. We are not yet in possession of the answer of the Montluçon strikers. We are very glad to see that the International Union makes every effort to develop its organisation, and we may rest confident that the union will become one of the strongest associations in the British Isles.—D.

BELGIUM.

The Socialist printer, Joseph Hubez, who in January last was sentenced at Frankfort-on-Main to four months' imprisonment because he belonged to a prohibited association, and who went afterwards to Belgium, has been expelled from that country. The Catholic Minister of Justice, M. de Volder, becomes more and more the servant-of-all-work of M. von Bismark, and, in fact, for fifty-seven years Belgium has not had so miserable a Minister as this de Volder. It is the same scoundrel who has allowed comrades Neve and Gross to be extradited to Germany without any legal form at all. As our readers know, only one of them, Gross, has been released.

The General Council of the Parti Ouvrier has issued a manifesto to all worker's associations in Belgium, inviting them to an extraordinary Conference to be held at Mons on the 14th and 15th of August next. The order of the day will be: General Strike, discussion and organisation. It is apprehended that the debate will bear a very acute character, and that the Conference might come to some important resolutions both for the Parti Ouvrier itself and for the special question of the black strike.—D.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

At Villach, a new Socialist paper has been issued since the 3rd of June, under the title The Labour (die Arbeit). The first number was allowed to pass unmolested, the second has had three different issues, the first and the second were confiscated by the police; the third issue was permitted to circulate. It is a very good paper, and we wish it every success.

Comrade Bleicher who was sentenced to eight years' hard labour in one of the former Austrian trials, died in the prison of Stein, where one of his friends of the same trial, F. Schreiblechner, died also some weeks ago.—D.

GERMANY.

The Hamburg police have succeeded in confiscating a considerable amount of literature which our comrades intended to send to Berlin. The trunks contained 100 copies of Bebel's 'Woman in the Past, Present, and Future'; 800 copies of a text-book of German Socialistic songs, and several thousand copies of the paper Sozial Democrat.

At Weimar, the cabinet makers' trades' union (Fachverein der Tischler) has been dissolved by the police. The reason was that the chairman of the union is a Socialist, hence, all the members of the union cannot but be Socialists! That is the logic of the police in the ancient city of Goethe!

The ghost of Lieske has returned on earth and visited last week M. Frohsee, the imperial attorney who asked so bitterly for the head of the Anarchist, although he was obliged to admit afterwards that he was not quite convinced of his guilt,—and, in fact, all those who are somewhat acquainted with the affair of police-councillor Rumpff, know for certain that Lieske was not the man who dragged Rumpff to death! M. Frohsee has been confined in an asylum, the execution of Lieske "having worked like madness in his brain." Nemesis! goddess of the vanquished, soon may thy reign arrive, for innumerable are those who all over the world have committed the same crime as M. Frohsee!

Eight Socialists who assisted at the secret Conference held recently at Haidhausen, near Augsburg, have been arrested. At Nuremberg, five Socialists have also been imprisoned on a charge of "anarchical conspiracy!" What does that mean? Surely some police joke!—D.

ITALY.

The Italian democrats are working up a popular agitation in that country, manifested at present by a series of deliberative meetings in Rome, Naples, Perugia and elsewhere, to discuss the condition of the working-class and its possible amelioration, the various working-men's associations sending delegates, and the working-class generally being invited more especially to take part in the "popular congress" of their district.

That the workers should be taxed for their holidays and festivals, which they can scarcely be said to enjoy, as well as for every conceivable necessary of life (directly or indirectly) is a refinement on the noble art of taxation indeed. A certain "maritime captain" of Marsala on being subjected to such a grievance writes to the Nuova Età of that town to proclaim the same, which was that when having occasion to pass through the dazio (local taxation) a quantity of wine, beyond the official tax of the tariff an extra tax of two centesimi the litre was imposed for the festival of St. Giovanni, which was about to take place. This taking advantage of a public holiday to extort money when more poor folk are on the move than usual, reminds one of the conduct of most of the omnibus and tram companies in the Jubilee week here in London (may I be forgiven for "raking up old bygones," as Mark Twain says!) when the workman out in holiday attire, bodily and mentally, found that all fares were raised and that any journey in tram or bus would involve an extra expenditure he had not counted on.—M.

SPAIN.

The congress of workers in metal held at Madrid in June has issued a manifesto addressed "to the exploited classes," stating at some length the position of the workers and calling upon them to rise in the cause of their own emancipation and replace Authority, Property and Religion by Anarchy, Collectivism and Science. I may say in passing that Collectivism in Spain has a different meaning from that which we give it, the Anarchists maintaining that they retain the original meaning of the word, which has, they say, since been usurped by the "authoritarian" Socialists. Yet the modern Collectivist says "organise," and the Anarchist says "organise," so that in one important point at least they are at one.

A serious riot broke out at Aloira on the 10th, against the octroi duties. The rioters attempted to set fire to the doors of the barracks, whereupon the Civic Guard fired upon the crowd, killing four persons. Reinforcements were despatched to restore order.—M.

A Newcastle correspondent says: "In a letter just received from my brother, who is a large employer of labour in Canada, the following remark on the scarcity of hands occurs... He says: 'I wish some of you good, poor people would come out here. My sister cannot get a woman to work for less than a dollar (4s. 2d.) a day,' etc.—Reynolds." Everyone must feel sorry for the sister; but if the emigration of good poor people means the reduction of the wages of the Canadian workwoman, the good poor people had better stay at home.

WHAT ARE "AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS"?

I AM sending this across the ocean, to seek information I cannot gain in my own native land. I have enquired of leading journals and been quietly ignored; I have asked eminent literary people and received only looks that questioned my sanity and civilised citizenship; I have interrogated working-men, and they simply become terrified. I have decided to enquire of a "blasted furriner." I only want to know—what are "American institutions"? Or rather, what are the characteristics of American institutions which distinguish them from English, Russian, German, or French institutions? So much seems to depend on a proper attitude toward these revered mysteries, that I am anxious to be informed.

"If we would preserve the integrity of our American institutions, we must put a stop to all this anarchistic talk from the labouring classes," shrieks the great American press. "If we would preserve, etc., etc., we must prevent the foreigners from crowding to our shores," scream the lesser lights of journalism in grand responsive chorus. "If we would p. t. i. o. o. A. i.," yells the Citizens' Association, "we must hang the men who find any fault with them." And then the solos and duets come in from the states: "Kansas cries, 'Imprison those who marry themselves without a priest, and guard the morals of our people by laws—Sunday laws, prohibitory laws, plenty of laws of all sorts.'" Pennsylvania and Ohio sing together, "Arrest the agitators—let no anarchists be heard." Virginia cries, "Shut up that earnest old woman who is shocking society with unwelcome truths"; and Illinois, bolder than all the rest, disarms her citizens, forbids the discontented to murmur, makes it a crime to tell of the people's wrongs, passes "conspiracy," "boycott," and "strike" bills, forbids the singing of the song that thrills all Europe with its liberty tones, disperses meetings of citizens at her pleasure, and enforces her commands with an army of Pinkerton brutes, regiments of State militia, the most powerful police system in the world, and the dark shadow of the gallows in the background; growling in the meantime continually, "We are preserving the integrity of our American institutions."

During the great trial and since, somebody is always saying "Spies, Schwab, Engel, Fischer, and Ling, coming from a foreign land, and seeing poverty existed here as elsewhere, and not understanding our American institutions, became anarchists and iconoclasts—wanting to destroy society merely because they could not comprehend its organisation!"

I am as American as a person can be who is not a full-blooded, copper-coloured Indian. My forefathers were here before we had any "institutions," and helped to fight a foreign institution that we might have some of our own. I am as near civilised as my fellow-workers, and have average intelligence, and yet at this date I do not understand our "American institutions." I once thought I did; I believed the ballot was one of them. I have seen working-men carried to the polls and voted like so many cattle by their employers, when they knew and cared nothing about the two candidates offered them. I have seen a struggling labour party beaten again and again by fraud and trickery; and I have been told that in England and Germany popular suffrage is really a power and the people make themselves felt through it. So that the privilege of ballot is not peculiar to America surely.

One time I believed equality was one of them. But when I see a nabob drawing an income of seven dollars a minute, living on the greatest luxuries of earth and holding at his beck and call the services of ten thousand men, and know that because of him there are a thousand paupers in the land, I must give up that idea. "Free homes" figured in my imagination as one. But it costs the best years of one man and woman's life and banishment from all they have held dear to win a home, at best; and usually it costs years of toil and deprivation just to try; while the mortgage-holder and usurer gets the "home" in the end.

But to the last I fondly dreamed that free thought, free speech, and free press were certainly American institutions. My experience as a citizen of Chicago has dispelled that illusion. In the whole world outside of Russia there is not a more oppressed, authority-ridden city than Chicago. The police are feared as though they were demons. Meetings are broken up, Anarchists are forbidden to sit or stand in groups of two or three, the "Marseillaise" is forbidden, men can be hung without proof for what somebody else did, and working men have no rights which a capitalist is bound to respect. All this for the "preservation of American institutions." What are they? Our free school system? They have better schools in other countries for all the children. Our old chattel-slavery institution? That perhaps was peculiar to America. Our land-owning, "big-rent," speculating institutions? They are common as civilisation itself. Our wage-slavery system? Our "peasantry" works as cheaply and obediently as any in the world. Our "profit" system? Men can roll up bigger fortunes through unlimited profit when once they get the upper hand by vested rights, and this perhaps is particularly American?

Can our English friends inform us what American institutions are?

Chicago, June 18th.

REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday last, F. Verinder lectured on "The Bible and the Land Question." There was a fair audience, and a slight discussion followed.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, July 6, Edward Aveling lectured on "Methods of Propaganda," and on Sunday, July 10, George Bernard Shaw on "Socialism and Radicalism." Excellent discussions followed each lecture.—A. T. and W. B.

EDINBURGH.—On Sunday evening, in the Queen's Park, Smith, Paterson, and Gilray addressed a large meeting. Commonweal and pamphlets were selling well, when we were informed by a park officer that no selling was allowed to go on within the park. It is even said that it is not permissible to present a tract to any one within the Queen's Park. We sold some more of our literature "without the gates," but the rain coming down rather heavily prevented us doing any more in this way for the rest of the evening.—J. G.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday afternoon, Paterson addressed a good meeting at Cambuslang. On Sunday forenoon, Glasier lectured on Socialism to the Cambuslang Branch of the Irish National League. There was a good audience, and our comrade had a hearty reception. In the afternoon at Paisley Road Toll, Glasier had a very large audience, and although the police were there in force no interference took place. In consequence of the Fair holidays, there will be no out-door meetings this week.—J. M. B.

LEEDS.—On Wednesday evening, a meeting in Meadow Lane was addressed by Maguire, Paylor, and Hill. On Sunday, Mahon delivered three lectures in the open-air, and was assisted by Mitchell (Bradford), Corkwell, Hill, Braithwaite, and Maguire. The evening lecture was attended by about 500 people, and the result was most satisfactory. We expect an acquisition of members as a result of the day's work. Sale of literature good.—T. P.

NORWICH.—On Wednesday evening last, Henderson and another spoke at Yarmouth. On Thursday, Henderson spoke at Dereham. Sunday morning Henderson and Rose spoke at Wymondham. A meeting was also held at Long Stratton by Morley and Houghton. In the afternoon Henderson spoke in Norwich Market-place. During the afternoon a meeting was also held at Lyng by this branch. All meetings even more successful than usual. Good sale of Commonweal.

WALSALL.—On Monday, July 2, several members of the Branch visited Dudley, and H. Sanders and Deakin addressed a meeting of about 500 persons in the Market-place. Another visit to the same town was made on July 9, Sanders speaking to a large gathering on the "White Knobs." On Wednesday, Sanders, Weaver, and Deakin spoke at Pelsall to a well-attended meeting, and on Saturday, Sanders spoke to large audiences in the Market-place, Walsall. On Sunday, July 10, we went on a propaganda tour to West Bromwich, Smethwick, and Oldbury, holding good meetings at each town, and disposing of a fair quantity of literature.—J. T. D.

BOLTON.—After having a pleasant chat with the comrades of the Lancaster Branch last Friday night, I took the train on Saturday to Bolton, to see how affairs were going on there after the late riots. I was supplied with a large bundle of Commonweal for free distribution. I spoke twice on Sunday, afternoon and evening, along with the comrades of the S.D.F. Two good collections were made for the strikers. Although it was raining at one time pretty heavily, our audience of between three and four hundred listened very attentively. Comrade Walkden made a splendid speech, his references to local affairs being heartily applauded. Judging from the impression made, I have not the least doubt that very soon Bolton will be a Socialist stronghold. After the meeting we retired to the club-room, where I said a few words in reference to working together and intending to do so. I then left, but not until three hearty cheers were given for the coming Revolution. I hope this week to be able to do some work in Derbyshire and Leicestershire, etc., on my walking tour to London.—CHARLES W. TUKE, Edinburgh Branch.

NOTTINGHAM SECTION, SOCIALIST UNION.—On Sunday, Waine and Proctor addressed meetings which were somewhat spoilt by the rain, in the morning in Sninton Market, and in the evening in the Great Market-place. 2s. 8½d. was collected and some leaflets were disposed of.—A. C.

North of England Socialist Federation.

Blyth.—The delegate-meeting, owing to the amount of business that came before it, adjourned till next Saturday, when it is hoped all the delegates will be present. There is important business remaining to be considered.

Consett.—A meeting was addressed by E. R. Pease and Donald on Monday. After the meeting, the men who desired to form a branch held a private business meeting. It was arranged to take a hall in the course of the week for the purpose of an indoor lecture.

East Holywell.—A large meeting was addressed on Saturday by A. K. Donald. One or two speakers who appeared to oppose the Socialists previously have come round, and are now prepared to support the cause.

Middlesboro'.—A branch of the Labour Federation has just been started. Our comrade who is working in the north is making arrangements to give a lecture there next week.

Newcastle.—The local branch of the S.D.F. have now got T. Mann back. He is energetically pushing the cause forward in Newcastle and district. A very successful meeting was addressed by him on Sunday night at the Cattle Market. John Hall, Donald, and several local men addressed the meeting, which lasted till 10.30 p.m. Steady progress is being made here.

North Shields.—A successful meeting was addressed on Sunday morning by A. K. Donald. The Labour Federation, profiting by the vigorous example of the Socialist party here, propose to hold a series of open-air meetings on Sundays during the summer. In view of that, he advised all members of the Labour Federation to study Thomas Binning's valuable pamphlet addressed to "Organised Labour," and disposed of a large number that he happened to have with him.

Seaton Delaval.—A. K. Donald addressed a meeting at Harpers on Friday; a good deal of questions and discussion. Branch progressing favourably.

South Shields.—A large meeting was addressed by Donald in the Market Place on Sunday evening. An excellent speech in support of Donald was delivered by an advanced local Radical, Mr. Derby. Good sale of literature. Friends desiring to join the Society please address J. Wood, 105 Wood Street.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The Labour Federation are getting their branch into working order.

Sunderland.—Two meetings were addressed on July 6th and one on Sunday by Donald. Several members were made, and good quantity of literature was disposed of.

Throckley.—A meeting was addressed on Tuesday by A. K. Donald. Good lot of miners turned out to hear his address.

A WRITTEN DEBATE

BETWEEN MR. C. BRADLAUGH, M.P., AND E. BELFORT BAX.

SUBJECT:

“Will Socialism Benefit the English People?”

VI.—Negative: MR. C. BRADLAUGH.

ALTHOUGH I can hardly think that in these letters there has been any real debate of the question, “Will Socialism benefit the English people?” yet, as my opponent has been throughout courteous and credits me with showing like courtesy, it is possible to hope that our good-tempered exchange of phrases may not have been as wholly useless to others as I am afraid it has been to myself. In this last reply it would, of course, be unfair for me to open out any other issues than those already within the purview of this correspondence.

In his second paper Mr. Bax referred me to Karl Marx on capitalist production and the rate of surplus-value (Capital, vol. I., chap. ix., p. 201, et seq.), as if in some way showing error on my part. Having carefully re-read the words of Mr. Marx, I do not see that the contention as to surplus-value—a contention which I cannot accept as there stated—helps Mr. Bax at all. His assertion in his first letter, that in consequence of monopoly a surplus-value was unfairly extracted from the labourer, I answered in paragraph 20 of my first letter. Mr. Bax rejoined that he did not say “anything about monopoly of labour”; that his use of the word “monopoly” was not intended to include monopoly of labour, and only referred to the monopoly of the means of production; but as he says that this monopoly gives the command, i.e., control, that is, the monopoly of the control of labour, I scarcely appreciate the correction. Mr. Bax writes as if, under community enterprise, no expenses would be incurred in production; but this is surely not arguable, and can hardly be seriously meant. He says the surplus-value may be 100 per cent. and the profit nil. This is impossible unless you regard the labour as the only necessary element in realising value, and treat the other matters necessary to efficient production, and stated by me in paragraph 20 of my first letter, as being purely imaginary. “Surplus-value” is a mere phrase jingle unless it means value added in the production over and above all the cost of production.

Mr. Bax says that

“the ‘economic basis’ of modern society is production for profit, through the monopoly of the means of production by the named and unnamed individuals constituting the capitalist class in its various sections.”

And that the “‘Economic basis’ of Socialism is the collective ownership of these means of production by society as a whole, and their working not for the profit of individuals or classes but for the use of society as a whole, both collectively and individually.”

It is worth noting on this (1) that while it is true that the artificially created land laws of this country have given in England a practical monopoly of metal and mineral raw material to the comparatively limited number who have the control of the bulk of the land, and while it is also true that of wealth, other than landed, the distribution has in a few instances thrown enormous accumulations into individual hands, it is not true that there is otherwise any “monopoly by any distinct class of the means of production as against all workers”; and (2) that it is not quite easy to understand how the English people could work say cotton, wool, coal, and iron, and their results, for foreign consumption otherwise than by manufacturing for profit. The land monopoly created by law may be broken down by law. The unfair distribution may be gradually corrected without destroying present society as proposed by Mr. Bax.

Mr. Bax jests with the questions stated for his consideration in paragraph 6 of my last paper, and his serious answer to me is that having at the outset declared his Socialism to mean “the equal participation by all in the necessities, comforts, and enjoyments of life,” he neither knows nor cares what the expression means or how it would work itself out. This may be enough for Socialists, but it is hardly useful to an enquirer or satisfactory to a critic. Robert Owen—whom Mr. Bax names as agreeing with modern Socialists in teaching “equal participation,” but whom he has here never verbally quoted—held, as Mr. Bax holds, that in a Socialistic State all things should be in common; but Robert Owen held this in the ordinary meaning of words, and never pretended that such doctrine was not the absolute negation of private property.

When Mr. Bax affirms that “Socialism by its very definition excludes the possibility of there being any ‘unemployed’ to benefit,”

it is not very easy to consider him serious. I at once concede that if writing in a decree, or formulating in a constitution, that no men, women, or children should ever be hungry would avoid the necessity for procuring by labour the means of subsistence, Mr. Bax would have a strong case, but even Mr. Bax cannot mean this. If Mr. Bax merely means that as he proposes to abolish employers there would be no unemployed, this is more ingenious than ingenuous. In the programme of the Social Democratic Federation, formally accepted by Mr. Bax for the purposes of this debate, I find as one of the proposals of that Socialist body, and I do not gather how or why the Socialistic State in England is to be presumed always to be able to employ in productive work the whole of the population; or how, without such productive work, it is to be always in position to provide the whole of the population with the necessities of life. Mr. Bax says:

“organisation of agricultural and industrial armies under State control on co-operative principles,”

“The Socialist of to-day does not profess to carry in his pocket any ready-made detailed scheme for the future of human society.”

But as Mr. Bax advocates the destruction of the present state of society, even by force, in order that the Socialistic scheme may be worked out in practice, he ought to have been ready to at least outline some probable or possible working scheme, especially as he undertook to affirm that this scheme would in its actual working benefit the English people.

If the Socialist has no detailed scheme for the future, why did Mr. Bax, as one of the preliminaries of this debate, explicitly, and without reserve accept the following declarations of the Social Democratic Federation:

“The land, with all the mines, railways, and other means of transit, to be declared and treated as collective or common property.”

“The production of wealth to be regulated by society in the common interest of all its members.”

“The means of production, distribution, and exchange to be declared and treated as collective or common property.”

If there is no plan of treatment what becomes of clauses 1 and 3? If there is no plan of the regulation of the produce of labour, what is the meaning of clause 2? If Mr. Bax has no detailed Socialistic scheme for the future of the English people, how is it possible even to guess whether or not Socialism will in its attempted practice prove beneficial to the English people? His latest explanation of the assumption of wealth and the then conduct of enterprise, in reply to paragraphs 12, 13, and 14 of my second letter, deserves examination:

“All we say is, let the working-classes, organised to this end, take over the means of production, distribution, and exchange; first the land, railways, mines, factories, credit establishments, and the larger warehouses and retail stores, which stand ready organised to their hand; at the same time let the executive proceed to establish new workshops, warehouses, and stores on a large scale in those trades where they do not already exist, and so undermine the smaller establishments possessed and worked by individuals, and which might for that matter remain unmolested until this happy consummation. Beyond this we do not profess to make any definitive proposal as to production or distribution.”

Large properties and industrial enterprises are to be taken over, that is, are to be taken away, from those who have them, and this whether the owners are single individuals or hundreds, or associated small owners or shareholders. Nothing is said of any compensation on this taking over. In the programme of the Social Democratic Federation, railways are proposed to be taken “with or without compensation.” The smaller manufacturers and tradesmen are to be “undermined,” that is, gradually ruined, and Mr. Bax gravely argues that this will—either in the process of ruining or as an ultimate result—benefit the English people. To do him justice, really Mr. Bax does nothing of the kind. Although in his debate he undertook to prove that Socialism would benefit the English people, he now says:

“Modern Socialism is unable to deduce the social change it deems imminent, from the idiosyncracies of a particular people, or to conceive Socialism as applied exclusively to any one people.”

But was it not a pity then to engage to debate the question, limited to the English people, as it expressly was by its wording? Mr. Bax now explicitly admits, that is, that Socialism must be world-wide or non-existent, and he has no suggestions as to how many centuries must elapse before world-wide Socialism may be feasible.

On statistics, Mr. Bax is simply marvellous; he introduced statistics in his first paper, he gives more statistics in his last; challenged upon the accuracy of his figures, and utterly unable to verify them, he boldly and blandly writes:

"The, in most cases, insuperable difficulty of initial verification the difficulty of finding out the precise data on which they are based, the facts they suppress and the facts they express, render them practically valueless. Statistics have a fraudulent appearance of an accuracy which they can only possess in a very few special cases. Hence the superstitious belief in figures on the part of the modern mind. For my own part, no number of statistics would have ever made me a Socialist, and no number of them would unmake me one."

It, of course, simplifies discussions on Socialism, when the Socialist states facts and figures, but refuses to verify them, and per contra denies the right of his antagonist to go into details in any of these matters.

In his first paper Mr. Bax said:

"The small capitalist is continually being thrown upon the labour-market by inability to hold his own in the competitive arena. Capital tends thus to become concentrated in fewer and fewer hands."

In paragraph 18 of my first paper I challenged this, and at last Mr. Bax gives a statement which he considers proof: (1) There are fewer bakers who bake as well as sell; (2) that in glass-bottle manufacturing a few large manufacturers swallow up the small ones; (3) that Nettlefold's have nearly crushed out all other screw-makers; (4) that the carrying trade passes into the hands of large companies; (5) that a friend of Mr. Bax says that the facts (admittedly not reduced to tabular form by anyone) leave no doubt as to the truth of Mr. Bax's assertion; (6) that limited companies are on the increase.

1. If Mr. Bax's statement as to bakers were true, it would not show that there were not as many or more vending bakers with small capital, or that the sale of bread-foods by others than the actual bakers had on balance thrown small capitalists back on the labour-market. It might show that there had been economy in the manufacture of some bread-foods. Mr. Bax gives no figures, and perhaps limits his remarks to London. The Census for 1881 (General Report, p. 42) alleges an increase in the purveyors of bread and vegetables of 12.5 per cent. since 1871. These include the fancy bakers and pastry-cooks.

2. Mr. Bax gives nothing beyond his mere statement, and therefore furnishes no means of testing it. The Census for 1881 (General Report, p. 41) says that glass manufacture has increased 10 per cent. since 1871. It is, however, a small manufacture, only employing 19,338 men and 1,692 women.

"Of the 21,630 persons engaged in it, 5,984 were enumerated in Lancashire, 3,591 in the West Riding, 2,884 in Durham, 2,769 in London, 2,089 in Worcestershire, 1,752 in Warwickshire, 1,151 in Staffordshire, and only 1,410 in all the other counties."

3. I am unable to test this statement, of which Mr. Bax offers no evidence, and which, if true as to one small industry, would have very little weight. The Census (General Report, p. 49) says that in 1881: "The makers of bolts, nuts, rivets, screws, and staples numbered 8017, and had also increased very greatly, the uncorrected total in 1871 having been 5726."

So far as it goes, this is directly the opposite of Mr. Bax's assertion.

4. The Census 1881 shows an enormous increase of persons engaged in the carrying trade, and as a railway or steamship company is made up of very many shareholders of unequal holdings, Mr. Bax's present statement in nowise helps as evidence of his original assertion that "small capitalists are being thrown on the labour market."

5. I do not know anything of the investigations of Mr. Alexander Donald. I do know that a gentleman of that name did attend some lectures delivered by me, and advanced as if facts some most extraordinary statements, which clashed with all accessible statistics. Whether or not this is the same gentleman, his statement is vague, and his animus against the bourgeoisie (a class to which he and Mr. Bax belong) weaken the value of his too general corroboration.

6. The increase of bona fide limited liability companies for manufacturing purposes is direct evidence against Mr. Bax. It proves the existence of a large number of persons with small capital clubbed together for enterprise too large to be usefully undertaken except by such association.

To roughly sum up the argument. The definition of a Socialistic state now advanced by Mr. Bax in his three letters, is that state in which the working classes organised to that end [the manner and method of the organisation, and the character, duties, and responsibilities of the organisers being unstated] shall take over [that is seize and appropriate, and probably by force] the means of production, distribution, and exchange [nothing being said as to what is to happen to the present possessors in case they should not agree to or should resist this transfer]. There is then to be "collective ownership of these means of production by society as a whole" [all details as to the manner of the exercise of this ownership being positively refused], and all working is to be "not for profit of individuals or classes, but for the use of society as a whole, both collectively and individually" all the matters specified are to be common property, but there is still to be private property in some wealth, not specified. There is to be "the equal participation by all in the necessities, comforts, and enjoyments of life," the production of wealth is to be regulated, and industrial armies are to be controlled. But, according to Mr. Bax, the foregoing does not mean, and no modern Socialist would admit that it means, that organised society should own all wealth, direct all labour, and compel the equal distribution of all produce. Mr. Bax must pardon me if I can only construe words in their ordinary everyday meaning, and to express my regret that he should have been party to signing Socialistic manifestoes, which, as read in their natural sense, mean one thing without adding a caution that the Socialist declaration were intended in a non-natural sense.

Mr. Bax has no scheme either for the taking possession or for the common owning, or for the equal participation, and he frankly says that he neither knows nor cares what will be the detailed results. Yet he contends that this Socialism will benefit the English people.

There are very many points of interrogation, and of traverse, in my first and second letters, which Mr. Bax has passed in silence. These are so numerous that I content myself with recalling the fact which I leave to the judgment of the readers.

SOCIALISM FROM THE ROOT UP.

CHAPTER XX.

MARX'S DEDUCTION OF THE HISTORICAL EVOLUTION OF MODERN INDUSTRY.

CAPITALISM cannot be said even to begin before a number of individual owners of money employ simultaneously a number of workmen on the same terms, that is to say before the development of a concert of action towards profit among the employers, and a concert of action towards production for the profit of the employers among the employed.

"A greater number of labourers working together at the same time in one place (or if you will, in the same field of labour) in order to produce the same sort of commodity under the mastership of one capitalist, constitutes, both historically and logically the starting-point of capitalist production."

It differs from the mediæval system, that of the guilds and their craftsmen only by the greater number of the workmen employed; but this change to a new form of organisation made at once considerable difference in the rate and manner of production: there was less comparative expense of the means of production, i.e., buildings, tools, warehouses, etc.¹ A consequence of this concentration of workmen under one roof was the development of the function of direction in the master as independent of his qualities as a craftsman, and the forcing on the system of this function as a necessary part of production. The master of the guild craftsman period held his place because he was a better workman and more experienced than his fellows; he did not differ from them in kind but in degree only; if he fell sick, for instance, his place would be taken by the next best workman without any disturbance in the organisation of the workshop; but the master of even the earliest period of capitalism was from the beginning unimportant as a workman (even when he worked, as he often did at first) but all-important as a director of work.

"Simple co-operation," says Marx, "is always the prevailing form, in those branches of production in which capital acts on a large scale, and division of labour and machinery play but a subordinate part." This sentence leads to the next development of capitalism, that of the division of labour, which brings us into the system of manufacture, as the word is generally understood; though it has a final development, that of machinery and the factory. This period of the division of labour, more or less pure, extends from the middle of the 16th to the end of the 18th centuries, when it was brought to perfection; but it must be understood that these systems overlapped one another considerably.

The division-of-labour or manufacturing system starts under two conditions.

The first is where the employer collects into one workshop workmen of various crafts, the results of whose labours are finally combined into one article, as e.g., a carriage-maker's in which wheel-wright, coach-builder, upholsterer, painter, etc., work each at his own occupation, and their products are combined into the one article, a finished carriage.

The other is the system in which the employer collects his workmen under one roof, and employs the whole of them as one machine in the simultaneous production of one article which has to go through various processes, these processes being apportioned to various parts of the workman-machine. This system affords a distinct example of evolution by means of survival of the fittest; sudden increase of production seems to have been called for, and the work accordingly had to be reorganised by being apportioned to different workmen in order to save time. Thus this system is the reverse of that illustrated by the carriage-making, in which a number of crafts had to be combined into the manufacture of one article; whereas in this (pin or needle-making may be taken as an illustration) a number of processes which once formed portions of one craft, now become each of them a separate craft in itself.

From this follows the complete interdependence of each human being forming a part of the workman machine, no one of whom can produce anything by himself. The unit of labour is now no longer an individual, but a group.

But all these processes, however sub-divided, and however combined, were still acts of handicraft; the same necessities which forced the simple co-operation of the first capitalistic period into division of labour, now forced the latter system to yet further development; though, indeed, other causes besides merely economic ones were at work, such as the growing aggregation of people into towns and the consequent increasing division of labour in Society itself as to the occupations of its members. This final development was the substitution of the machine and the complete factory-system for the division of labour and workshop-system. Under the new system the group of workmen, every member of which by the performance of a special piece of handicraft turns out some special part of the article made, gives place to a machine which produces the results of all these manœuvres combined together; or to an association of machines acting in a group, as the workmen acted. The workman is no longer the principal factor in the work, the tools which he handled are now worked by a mechanism connected by another mechanism with the power, whatever it may be, which puts the whole in motion. This is the true machine of modern times, as contrasted with the mere tool-machine of the earlier period, which was an aid to the workman and not a substitute for him. Furthermore, the workshop gives place to the factory which is not a mere assemblage of machines under one roof, but rather a great machine itself, of which the machines are parts; as Marx says: "An organised system of machines to which motion is communicated by the transmitting mechanism from a central automaton is the most developed form of production by machinery. Here we have in place of the isolated machine a mechanical monster whose body fills whole factories, and whose demon power, at first veiled under the slow and measured motion of his giant limbs, at last breaks out into the fast and furious whirl of his countless working organs."

This is the machine which has produced the great revolution in production of our epoch. The workman once a craftsman, having all control over the article he produced, next became a part of a human machine, and finally has become the servant and tender of a machine; and by means of all this the fully developed modern capitalist has come into existence.

E. BELFORT BAX and WILLIAM MORRIS.

POSITIVISM AND SOCIALISM.

ALTHOUGH the number of those who profess Positivism as a social creed is not very large, still there are many who oppose Socialism much on the same ground, and who look for improvement in the condition of the workers to the spread of humane ideas amongst the employers, so that it will be well to deal with this larger class of opponents at the same time as the smaller section, who have a more complete system of their own to propose. We will first then build up our straw man Positivism, and I will try and make him as much like the original as I can, then we will proceed to the pulling down process. The entire value of such argument, of course, depends upon whether the straw man resembles in essential points the real thing for which it stands. If I mis-state Positivism I shall be very glad to be corrected.

Comte's Positive Philosophy, as I understand it, is an attempt to bring the whole field of man's knowledge and research within the range of a single system; this to some extent Science had done, and Comte claims originality chiefly in that he first brings Sociology under the same system. It is with his statements and proposals about Sociology that we shall have to deal chiefly. The use of the word Positive I take to indicate the elimination out of the whole field of man's research of what Comte calls the theological element, and which I take to mean any spiritual influence outside the laws of Nature. He does not absolutely deny the existence of any spirit, but having come to the conclusion that we can know nothing about it, he ignores it, and only deals with the relations of phenomena as they can be known and investigated by the intellect.

He arranges the sciences in order, beginning with the one he considers to be the least complex, and about which he thinks we know most, and ending with the most complex about which we know the least. Thus Astronomy comes as one of the first and Sociology the last. He argues that Astronomy is the most simple, and that its phenomena are the most general; the laws which govern the movements of the heavenly bodies which are investigated by astronomy, are fewer and more simple than those which are dealt with by any other science, therefore it is that we know most about astronomy and that it is the most exact of the sciences. Physics comes next as being more complex than astronomy and less complex than chemistry, and so he ascends the scale through physiology which deals with the individual animal, up to sociology which treats of organisations of individuals. This last, dealing as it does with the most complex organisations of the most complex animals, is the science about which he maintains least is known.

I have been obliged to give this short sketch of Comte's positive philosophy, as otherwise we should not have been able to understand where some of his ideas as to the practical organisation of society come from, particularly his great division of power into the spiritual and temporal.

Starting with his scale of sciences he says that in astronomy, the simplest and most easily understood of them all, the general public do not assume that they can know anything about it without special study, but accept the teaching of the specialists and believe it; how much more when the science is Sociology, the most difficult and complex of them all, ought they to distrust their own uneducated opinions, and follow the teaching of those who have made the science their special study! Thus he seeks to demonstrate the fallacy of democratic government, and in his system erects what he calls a spiritual authority, to consist of the wise and learned, of what he calls the speculative classes, or those who deal with abstract knowledge as opposed to those who put it in practice. In the Positivist state the speculative is to be the highest class, and to have charge of education, and supply the theories of sociology, etc., which the next class or the temporal authority is to carry out.

The temporal authority is to consist of those who have the most abstract and most extensive scope in the industrial world, the bankers, merchants, and manufacturers, in order as given. The spiritual authority is to educate the temporal authority, and show it what to do, also to see to the education of all individuals in morals as well as intellectual knowledge, and it is upon the efficacy of this education that the proper working of the system is to depend. The manufacturer and merchant are to be educated to use their positions and wealth for the good of their workpeople and society generally, and public opinion is to be educated to make them do it. The modern Positivists follow this system, though perhaps wording things rather differently. They argue that wealth is a social product, and that the wealthy must hold it in trust for the rest of the community, using it not for their own exclusive benefit but for the good of all; and they wish to educate public opinion to such a pitch that it shall force men so to use their wealth by means, if necessary, of a social boycott. They say that modern industrial enterprises are best managed by individuals, and that the workers must be subordinate to these. Moreover, the industrial questions being the chief affairs now-a-days, these leaders in industry are the best people to have political power, their experience is the widest, and they are most accustomed to deal with complicated relations.

As Professor Beesley put it in a lecture at Oxford last term on the subject of this article, "Government must be vested in the hands of the wealthy, not as the Socialists say, wealth must be vested in the hands of Government," the whole to be directed and instructed by a priesthood without any religious or theological functions.

That is the theory of the Positivists so far as I have been able to gather it. That larger class which I spoke of above, while not going in for any "government by the wealthy" or "spiritual authority," still thinks that the manufacturers will become more humane to their employees through the influence of education, Christianity, and public opinion. It remains for us now to examine this theory critically, and compare it with Socialism as a solution of modern social problems.

As Comte bases what I may call the aristocratic tendency of his government, using the word in its best sense, upon his order of the sciences, we must first deal with that. For a complete refutation of the pretension of science that its so-called laws of nature are representations of the absolute facts of nature, see 'Modern Science,' by Edward Carpenter. He there shows very clearly that what science is fond of calling laws of nature are nothing more than hypotheses, made to fit our present extent of observation, which have to be revised as our field of observation widens. It is not necessary for our argument to go further into that question than to give the criticism on the order of the sciences, which may be found more ably put in the pamphlet I allude to.

Now we saw that Comte maintains that we know most about such sciences as astronomy and least about such as sociology.

But is this not rather an assumption which on the face of it is surprising? When we consider the comparatively few people who even make observations of the stars and their movements, and that every single person makes innumerable observations on physiology, or the things relating to individual organisation and growth, and still more on the relations of different individuals, the way they influence each other and the way they are influenced by different causes. When, moreover, we consider the little we can possibly know about bodies millions of miles away, and also the infinitesimal portion of time during which observations have been recorded, compared with the ages which form the life of one of the least of the heavenly bodies, are we not likely to know much more about man and society than about astronomy, seeing that we have recorded histories in many cases of the entire progress of societies from barbarism up to our present time, and that we have geological evidence forming almost a continuous revelation of the ways of man from the very first? Is it not rather that because we know so very much more of men and society that we find it more difficult to frame hypotheses which shall fit so wide an extent of observed phenomena? And is it not more likely that the exactness which we boast of in astronomy is due to the comparative ease with which we can frame hypotheses to fit the few motions which we have been able to observe, whereas the real life of the universe of stars may be infinitely more complex than our social system, had we the power and the requisite time to make observations? It is as though an observer when planted for one day on a ship, he sees the men go to work for eight hours and then rest for eight hours, and proceeds to make a law that men work eight hours and rest eight hours, and he predicts their actions for the next day or two; the observer dies, and the next generation of observers dies the following day, all convinced of the truth of his law about the actions of these bodies, but on the seventh day the ship gets to port and all work is stopped for some days, where is their law of nature then? Similarly, what can science tell us of the movements of the stars on the seventh day of their lives?

NOTES ON NEWS.

The Government Land Bill does not need much comment from a Socialist; it is all that might be expected of it, and is in fact so bad that it will at least injure the Tory party, and may turn out a bigish nail in the coffin of the Government, though perhaps hardly so big a one as the Cass case, because the average English politician will not take the trouble to go into its details; nor indeed has he any occasion to do so: it simply means trying to do nothing under the guise of doing something.

The mountains are now in labour with a new (!) National Party, which, if it ever comes to the birth will, as a novelty, be a ridiculous mouse indeed. But setting aside the novelty, and the absurdity of making that which is already made, the party is a formidable one, and Joe Chamberlain and Co. are wise in their generation to take care to belong to it. It has long governed England under various names, and for convenience sake one must call it by the one under which it has hitherto been most respectable, the Whig Party. It may after all be worth the while of the reactionists to sacrifice such an empty thing as a name to it, and to admit, what is obvious, that the whole of the Tory party that has any power or capacity belongs to it. Ye shall know them by their fruits.

The charge against our comrade Williams has been quashed at the appeal, a fact of which every honest person, Socialist or not, will be glad; but it is doubtful, if it had not been for Mr. Newton's good deed in the guise of a bad one, and his rashness in meddling with a person who had the shop-keeping class behind her, whether the bench would have considered the evidence so carefully. I must also call attention to the fact (and all papers that do not aim at being considered supporters of injustice should do the same) that there are still two men in prison working out their sentence who were convicted on similar evidence to that on which the "learned" magistrate convicted our friend Williams. And lastly, I must once more call attention to the EQUAL LAWS under which we free people live, which condemn these innocent men to a cruel punishment simply because they have no friends rich enough to be responsible for paying the expenses of the appeal if it chances to fail. Nor must we forget even if these poor men are released now, they will have been in prison for many weeks; the injustice remains in any case. Well, it is but what must be looked for; for a society founded on robbery must be sustained by violence and wrong.

W. M.

Another piece of Jubilee tomfoolery has been combined with as bold a piece of mendacity as can very readily be found. An Address to the Queen has been presented, signed on behalf of Welsh mineowners by Sir W. T. Lewis, and "on behalf of the miners" by Mr. W. Abrahams, Labour M.P. for Rhondda Valley. Among other "jubilations," one is indulged in on account of the improved position of the men!

"There was never any other period in the history of this country in which your workmen were so much taken care of, nor more prosperous. They never had better housing; they never had such good clothing, nor such good food; and the past has never shown such an example of pleasure and happiness. We are indebted for these blessings to the reign of your Most Gracious Majesty!"

These lies, for they are nothing less, are signed by a man supposed to "represent" the miners and who was an honest man before he went into parliament. How they are viewed by his constituents may be judged by one meeting out of many that have considered them.

A meeting of the house-coal colliers of Rhondda and other districts of Glamorgan was held at the Nelson Inn, on Saturday 9th, Mr. Joan Llwyd, chairman, Mr. Isaac Evans, secretary. There were present 37 delegates, representing between 5000 and 6000 miners. A motion was passed nem. con. utterly repudiating that portion of the loyal address which is given above and strongly condemning the misuse of their names to it.

As for the "care" taken of them, the annual average of accidents will show that; for their "prosperity" twenty-five years ago they could wear broadcloth on a Sunday and now put up with shoddy. Their houses have stood unchanged for over fifty years except in the matter of rent, which has advanced. "Her Majesty's" reign may therefore have caused them to be "indebted," but not in a way to increase "pleasure and happiness."

"Good food"! In 1878, when they were even better off than at this present happy time, it was not uncommon for a miner to go down to ten hours' work on a lump of dry bread, with perhaps another for supper, and a meat dinner Sundays!

A good workman thinks himself lucky to get 18s. every third or fourth week, and 10s. or 12s. meanwhile. These wages are nett and rent, coals, and all else must be paid for.

These men who toil unremittingly, are maimed and bruised, and cast aside to die unrewarded, must be made by a time-serving sycophant his catspaw in pandering to a silly superstition! Verily, so long as they are content with "labour representation," who can wonder?

The Pall Mall has had another attack of hysteria; no uncommon event, but this time it is a bad one. A clerk in a department of the Metropolitan Board of Works is said to have used his position to help his relatives in their competition with other traders. Of course, if this has been done it is an abuse of trust and should be punished, but it savours of dishonesty to have on one page an interview with the accused, in which he promises proofs of innocence, and on another page an article full of virulent attack and damaging insinuation—"New Journalism"?

We all know that this kind of thing is done. The Pall Mall, when it was booming J. G. Blaine the other day, knew that he was the most renowned lobbyist of modern times, and that he lost the last presidential election on that account. There is a "lack of cohesion" somewhere.

Herr Krupp is dead. Not a bad man in himself, but the biggest maker of murder-machines of his time. He was very free from national prejudice and sold his wares to any government with cash to pay for them. So long as the workers allow themselves to be used as pawns in the imperial game, such a trade as Krupp's will prosper. So long as they allow it their lives will be spent in paying for his game. Whoever will take the cost of one of his big man-smashers, and reckon how many workers its price would support for a year, will be surprised.

LEADERS OF THE PEOPLE.

THERE are so many men to-day in the political arena that are looked on as the champions of the people, that one is puzzled at times to discover what claim, judging them by their acts, they have to be so regarded. Many of these leaders of the people are leaders, not because they are the chosen of the workers, but because they have asserted themselves to be so.

The utterances of some of these self-styled leaders are of a character that can only be designated as humbug. Although associated with and professedly belonging to the most advanced school of political thought, they are, despite their protestations to the contrary, really the disguised friends of the workers' enemies. Here is a typical specimen of the blatant orator. Just listen to him.

"Fellow-workers,—No one will charge me with sympathy with and regard for the rights of monopolists; all my life I have fought on the side of the people. I have been instrumental in bringing about much improvement in their condition. (Oh, oh!) The persons who cry oh, oh! are no doubt in the pay of the Tories. (Cheers.) Beware of them. (Cheers.) Don't associate with them; they are your enemies and mine. (Loud cheers.) To-day, the food you eat is wholesome, and there is an abundance of it. We import twelve times as much bacon and ham per head of the population as we imported thirty years ago. Royal Commissions have sat and made enquiry into the housing accommodation of the people, and have reported thereon. The clothes you wear are woollen; they were cotton formerly. (Cries of "Question.") That dirty ragged-looking person who cried "Question" is evidently too lazy to work, or he would enjoy the same comforts as his fellows. Resuming: The wealth of the country has increased 124 per cent. during the last fifty years. Wages are 25 per cent. higher, rent is lower, and so are taxes. (Interruption.) It is quite evident, friends, that the Tories are here to-day in full force; they wish to create a disturbance; I shall therefore refrain from addressing you further, or the peace may be broken and some of you arrested and taken to prison—a place where no honest workman would be seen."

This is not an exaggerated specimen, but is taken from life. The arguments used by this befooler of the people form part of the stock-in-trade of numbers of the advanced school of political reformers. Just analyse them, and what do they prove? That the workers eat twelve times as much bacon as they did thirty years ago? That because the national wealth has increased from £4,100,000,000 to £9,210,000,000 the masses have been advantaged in a ratio corresponding to this enormous increase of wealth? That because wages are 25 per cent. higher they have benefited in proportion to the increase? That because Royal Commissions have enquired into the housing accommodation of the workers slums do not exist?

Mulhall, who is responsible for these figures, after having built up a huge edifice of them for the purpose of showing the enormous progress made by this country during the last fifty years, answers these questions in the most satisfactory manner. He says (pp. 99, 100 'Fifty Years of National Progress'): "After making all deductions, we find the working man earns 20 or 25 per cent. more than in 1840, and the prices of necessities have mostly fallen. These advantages are counter-balanced by the rise in rent, for whereas house-property averaged a value of £30 per inhabitant, it now stands for £75—a proof that rents have risen exactly 150 per cent." Further, on pp. 101, 102 he quotes with approval Professor Huxley's statement that "the inhabitants of the poorer quarters of London and other large towns are condemned to a mode of life far more degraded and uncivilised than that of any tribe of Western Africa." From these statements we are able to estimate the enormous gain brought the workers by the progress of the last half-century. An enormous gain, truly! Wages have risen 25 per cent., but the increase of rent and taxes has more than counterbalanced the increase of wage. It is on this rise in wage and increase of national wealth that the sophistical tribune of the people dilates; everything which shows that the rise is only nominal, and not real, he takes no account of. If perchance he should do so, it is by deliberately ignoring those circumstances which, if they were taken account of, would show the fallacious—to use no stronger term—nature of his argument. For example, in dealing with the rise in rent he will dispose of the question in this manner: "It is asserted that rents have risen greatly during the past fifty years. I question it. The large renters of land (i.e., farmers) pay little if any more rent than they did fifty years ago. In Ireland rents have decreased. In England most landlords have made reductions of 20 per cent.," etc.

We have here an example of the professional hoodwinker at his best. With the aid of Mr. Mulhall, let us examine his argument. Since the tremendous rise of the manufacturing industries, agriculture has greatly declined, so much so that the number of persons engaged in it to-day are only 2,420,000 as compared to 3,820,000 in 1841, the prices of produce have greatly fallen, and although there is more land under cultivation to-day than in 1840 in proportion to population it is much less. "The combined value of grain and meat produced yearly is less now than it was forty years ago, but rent and taxes have increased 36 per cent. This increase in rental value we are told is only nominal, the actual rental not exceeding 52 millions, the same as fifty years ago. If agricultural rent has not greatly increased, taxes and tithes have more than doubled. In the period 1841-50 the amount paid was £10,200,000; in 1886, £25,400,000. The balance in favour of the farmer after payment of rent, taxes, and tithes in the first-mentioned period was £54,300,000; in 1886 it had diminished to £27,000,000. But although profits have decreased, wages have risen from 9s. per week to 15s.; but the labour of three persons now produces as much value as that of four persons in the decade ending 1870, or five persons in the years 1841-50. The rise of wage here, I suppose, is real, not nominal, as in the case of rents. These facts reveal a most pleasant state of things so far as the agricultural population is concerned; nor are those engaged in the manufacturing industries in a better condition, as I shall show presently. "Ah," says the wily apologist of the agricultural landed interests, "we want a protective duty on food imports. Free trade has ruined the agricultural industry; before the corn laws were abolished the price of corn was nearly 30 per cent. higher, and farming was a profitable undertaking." Now there is no doubt that if a protective duty was imposed on food imports a great impetus would be given to agriculture; land would increase in value, rents would rise in proportion to the increased value of farming land, the result of which would be that food would be greatly increased in price, and the advantage to the workers would be nothing, but to the landlords increased rent. "We want the people back on the land." Yes, and what for? their benefit, or the landlords'?

The free-trader, the advocate of unrestricted competition and the free breakfast table, stumps up and down the country anathematising and denouncing the wickedness of the protectionist. This party will dilate on the cheapness of food and the enormous increase of trade which has resulted from the adoption of free trade, and then by inference from this assume that because food is cheaper and trade greater that the workers have been materially benefitted in consequence. This free-trade argument takes no account of the enormous increase of labour-saving machinery and the lessened demand for hand and skilled labour, and the many devices resorted to for cheapening the cost of production, which, so far from benefitting the worker, have made employment more scarce and uncertain.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LAFARGUE V. BAX.

I really do not think there is a tittle of real difference between my friend Paul Lafargue and myself. I entirely agree with his paper, which is, as he describes it, a formulation of "desiderata." My article was, on the other hand, an attempt to formulate a plan for getting at these desiderata. He says himself that before "arriving at this Communist society, in which labour and pleasure will be free and in common, we must pass through a transitional period, in which it will be necessary to maintain wages and to keep the due proportion between them and the service rendered and the effort given." Now, it was of the initial stage of this transitional period that I was speaking. My subject was the morrow of the revolution, not the next generation or even for that matter the next decade.

Lafargue goes on to say, "For our part, we believe that the workers themselves have more qualities to enable them to distribute the hours of labour and the gains than the functionaries of any State would have." In this sentence the very opposite is assumed to what I assumed—namely, that the "workers themselves" would not be the functionaries. Now of course I took for granted that the revolutionary executive would be largely composed of really "representative workers." A new industrial organisation doesn't fall like Lucifer from heaven upon the "workers" beneath. When time is ripe for its birth, it has to be delivered somehow. It was of the process of accouchment that I was speaking. The result of the social revolution will of course be the disappearance of the State, but as I believe, this result will be brought about by the turning of it and its machinery against itself rather than by a policy of mere destruction.

LITERARY NOTICES.

We have received Nos. 1 and 2 of the 'Biblioteca Humanitas,' being little pamphlets issued by the journal Humanitas. 'La Fine del Parlamentarismo,' by F. S. Merlino, is a brief history of and critique on Parliamentaryism, the writer drawing his illustration nearly entirely from English Parliamentary history. Merlino lays bare the defects (and crimes) of this system of administration, but either space does not permit, or he does not deem it necessary to "point the moral" and discourse on the question of Socialists in Parliament. 'Alleanza Anarchica Internazionale,' by the same author, constitutes a kind of manifesto or declaration of Italian Anarchism, and is interesting as such. Under the heading of "Organisation," Merlino insists strongly on the necessity of the same both at the time of revolutionary crises and in settled times for the pursuit of all the arts of life, organisation, he holds rightly, not being authority of one over another. Now, far ahead, when the knowledge of men and women is widened, and they will work into each other's hands for mutual convenience, association and organisation will be looked for; but I put it to Anarchists to-day, whether at the time of a crisis (unless between now and then propaganda on all sides moves not considerably faster than at present) the distinction may not have to be put aside for a while with a frank confession of our many imperfections?

El Productor (Barcelona) is a very useful weekly journal representative of Spanish Socialism; it contains diversified matter, good articles, and is well filled up with notes and news on home and foreign subjects. M.

STATISTICS.—A witty statesman said you might prove anything by figures. . . . Tables are like cobwebs, like the sieve of the Danaides; beautifully reticulated, orderly to look upon, but which will hold no conclusion. Tables are abstractions, and the object a most concrete one, so difficult to read the essence of. . . . With what serene conclusiveness a member of some Useful Knowledge Society stops your mouth with a figure of arithmetic! To him it seems he has there extracted the elixir of the matter, on which now nothing more can be said. It is needful that you look into his said extracted elixir; and ascertain, alas, too probably and without a sigh, that it is wash and vapidity, good only for the gutters.—Carlyle.

STATISTICAL QUACKERY.—Some years ago it was quite popular to "go in" for bureaus of Labour statistics. It was hoped by the working-men that the publication of facts concerning the relative positions of employers and employes, the relative value of production, and the reward of the producer, might in some way be placed before the public for consideration. Well, we have had pages of figures "piled up," and volumes of opinions upon this or that phase of labour, volumes of sentiment, and clouds of dust. Even the sophistical Edward Atkinson, in a paper read before the third annual session of Labour Commissioners at Boston, had the sense to remark that statistics could become a snare and deductions from them might be untrue. Later at a meeting held in New Era Hall in Boston, he declared that the statistics "gathered up" by the National and State Bureaus of Labour were of no value whatever and that those which he used were compiled from sources over which they had no control. The miserable toilers who spend their waking hours in monotonous activity within factory walls need no statistics to tell them that they are miserable. Those of them who are sufficiently educated to seek information in statistical reports are also well informed as to the relative advantages enjoyed by capitalists and labourers.—New Haven Workmen's Advocate.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF ENGINE-TENTERS' WAGES.—The colliery engine-tenters in the employ of Lord Dudley have received notice for the reduction of 4d. per day in their wages.

MINERS' WAGES.—The miners working for the firm of James Gardner and Sons, Limited, Meiklehill, Kirkintilloch, Scotland, began work Monday 11 on a reduction of 6d. per day. We understand notice of a similar reduction has been posted at Wester Gartshore Colliery.

BELFAST CARTERS.—The dispute between Messrs. Mecrea and M'Farland and their carters, which threatened to end in a strike, has been settled. The majority of the men have hitherto had only 16s. a week, but now the employers have acceded to the demand to have 18s. per week paid to all hands.

The dispute in the malleable iron trade may yet terminate in a strike. Notices were posted at several of the Birmingham works intimating that the yards would be closed on Saturday July 16th, unless the men accept a reduction of 10 per cent. At the works where the notices have been posted there are about 300 men employed.

BRICKSETTERS' LABOURERS' WAGES.—At Stockport, the bricksetters' labourers are agitating for an increase of wages from 5d. to 5½d. per hour, and threaten to come out on strike if their request is not granted. The members of the Master Bricksetters' Association are not willing to give the advance, on the grounds that 5d. per hour is what is paid in other towns.

THE EIGHT-HOUR DAY.—At the half-yearly meeting of the Cleveland Blast Furnacemen's Association, just held at Middlesboro', it was resolved to give a hearty support to the proposal which will be brought before the forthcoming Congress of Ironworkers, with the object of getting the hours of labour reduced to eight per day. The general secretary (Mr. W. Trow) was appointed to represent the Association at the Congress, and to cordially support the resolution.

The Scotch Miners' Federation announce that they intend contesting several seats at the first general election. Labour candidates have already been adopted by them for North Ayrshire and Stirlingshire. The men will be independent of party. It is expected that the Liberal associations in the two constituencies named will adopt the miners' nominees. The Federation state that it is their intention to form a new Labour Party in the House of Commons, the present Labour Members having in their opinion failed in the performance of their duties.

THE STRIKE IN THE CHAIN TRADE.—At a mass meeting of chainmakers at Cradley Heath, the president of the Chainworkers' Association stated that, in consequence of a number of employers having broken faith with the operatives, the majority of the operatives had turned out on strike, and he believed that in a few days the whole of the workmen would have ceased to work. It was announced that a number of gentlemen at Stourport had sent cheques for the relief of the chainmakers amounting to £82. Additional policemen have been drafted into the district.

STRIKE OF MINERS AT CRADLEY.—The miners in the employ of Messrs. King at the Netherend Colliery have turned out on strike in consequence of a dispute. The men state that about a fortnight ago the allowance for ripping down rock was taken from them without any notice being given of the change. They were, it is said, formerly paid at the rate of 1s. 2d. per yard for this kind of work. Other complaints are made by the men, who appear determined to resist encroachments upon their rate of wage. The men have made an appeal to their fellow workers to support them in their struggle.

PUMPHERSTON (LINLITHGOW) OIL-WORKERS.—Last week a mass meeting of shale miners and retort men of Pumpherstons Oil-works was held in the sports field. A deputation to the manager reported that he was willing to concede 2d. of the reduction, the men losing 3d., and that this offer was final. The retort men reported that Mr. Fraser would give them no concession at all. The miners and retort men being now in one union, it was agreed to cease work forthwith until the miners got at least 3d. back, and the retort men half the reduction. The works were consequently closed.

UPHALL AND HOLMES OIL-WORKERS.—Last week a meeting of the men on strike at Uphall Oil-works was held near the village. Mr. Wilson, miners' agent, addressed the meeting, advising them to offer to resume work on half the reduction, or on condition that any settlement which applied to the miners would apply to them. He held that it was injudicious to strike at the present time, and urged them to get into union and be prepared to strike two months hence if necessary. On the motion of a workman, however, who declared the majority were prepared to stand to the new year, the meeting resolved to remain on strike till they got the full reduction back, only three men voting for the proposal to start on half the reduction.

A Clyde correspondent to an evening paper writes: "The result of a survey of the past six months' labour proves that matters in the shipbuilding and engineering industries of the Clyde are decidedly worse than they have ever been during this protracted period of depression. There is every reason to fear that the total output for 1887 will prove a sad falling off from even its immediate predecessors, bad as they have been. As regards prospects, really nothing of an encouraging nature presents itself. The only scrap of comfort for the hungry unemployed thousands who populate the districts on each bank of the Clyde is the somewhat negative one of this dreadful depression having reached its height in a season of exceptional sunshine and genial warmth."

In a letter to the Manchester Weekly Times, a signalman says: "As I have spent about eight years in a signal-box as a signalman, you will perhaps kindly allow me to say a word or two on the subject. I am stationed in a box on a main line, and I work 12 hours a-day, for which I receive 3s. per day, i.e., 3d. per hour. Now such hours and wages are not exceptional. Our railway companies employ thousands of 12-hour signalmen. I am sorry to say there are but few 8-hour boxes. A large number of signalmen have not time to get a meal while on duty, yet if any of us commit a slight error, the company will surely visit the erring one with merciless severity, forgetting, of course, that the best of men can make mistakes. Signalmen ought to receive more consideration at the hands of the companies than they do, in view of the fact that our responsibility for the safe working of railways is very considerable. If the companies will not remedy the state of things I have described, we should help ourselves, and to do so we must combine. If this power, which is within the reach of all railway men, be called into requisition with sufficient force, we should have a safeguard for our labour. Unfortunately we are now disunited, and our disunion constitutes a serious drawback to us. What is needed is united action to lead us on to a better state."

BOLTON ENGINEERS.—The strike in the Bolton engineering and iron trades has now entered its eleventh week. There are no indications of either side giving way. The men, at any rate, do not think of yielding, and it is taken for granted that the employers are equally determined. The men continue to receive promises of support. The Executive Committee of the Operative Cotton Spinners' Association have voted the sum of £50 to the strike fund, £30 is expected from the Weavers' Association, and on Saturday a large sum was realised by a band contest held on the Bolton Wanderers' Football Ground. Last week was paid, for the first time, a sum of 1s. for each child under ten years of age belonging to the men on strike. The grant will be made weekly. There are at present about 30 police in each of the four foundries where importations are lodged or are expected, and on Sunday religious services were held for their benefit. It is stated that two ministers who had conducted services were hooted in the street, and that a musician who was suspected of having attended the smoking concert at the Soho Works has been similarly treated. On Monday, Messrs. Dobson and Barlow re-opened their Kay Street Machine Works, which were closed all last week for repairs. Nearly all the men not previously on strike presented themselves, and work was recommenced. The importations, it will be remembered, left the premises on Saturday week, but it is said that some of them are prepared to return. There was a renewal of excitement in Bolton last week in connection with the strike. About fourteen men arrived at the Trinity Street railway station, presumably from Scotland, to take the places of the men on strike. The importation, on alighting, were conducted by a strong body of police to an omnibus which was in waiting. Guarded by ten mounted constables, and with as many more policemen seated upon the outside of the vehicle, the men were driven off to the Soho foundry of Messrs. Hick, Hargreaves, and Co., where they had evidently been expected. In a short time, however, the omnibus came out from the foundry with twelve strangers in it, and, with the same escort, was driven through the town to Messrs. Dobson and Barlow's, Kay Street works. The vehicle was followed by a large and excited crowd, and there was some hooting. After the lapse of a few minutes from the men being taken into Messrs. Dobson and Barlow's premises, the omnibus reappeared with the police guard, and it was then seen that four importations remained inside. These were taken to the spindle works of Messrs. Ryder Brothers, in Folds Road, and lodged in a part of the works specially provided for them. Other importations have arrived singly, and a larger number than has yet come is expected. It is stated that the moulders of Bolton contemplate leaving work as a protest against the importation of strangers. Only one or two of the branches have as yet held meetings, but there is a very strong feeling among the workmen that they should take some practical step in support of their brethren in kindred branches of the iron trade. Another batch of imported men arrived at Bolton on the 18th for one of the works, and proceeded to their destinations in a cab closely guarded by mounted police and ordinary constables, followed by a demonstrative mob. Great excitement prevailed, but beyond the throwing of a few stones and hooting, the crowd did no damage. All the apprentices at Kay Street works, numbering 180, have given notice to leave in a week.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

THE UNEMPLOYED.—SYDNEY, May 18.—The extent of the distress among the working classes of New South Wales may be imagined by an answer given last night to the member for Queanbeyan by the Premier. The latter was asked the number of men now employed on the relief works, and if applications were still being made for employment. From this it will be seen that though over four thousand men have been provided for by the Government, we have by no means touched bottom in the movement. Every day men are coming in from the country districts, while hundreds of skilled artisans, who have held out as long as they could, are now asking for pick and shovel work at the hands of the Government.

BRISBANE, May 18.—The Trades and Labour Council last night drew attention to the statements in the circulars of the Imperial Emigration Bureau that there is a demand for brickmakers here. The representative of the Brickmakers' Society stated that 100 were without work, and that there was no sign of improvement.

FRANCE.

The eighth annual Conference of the Federative Union of the Centre of France (section of the Universal Federation of the French Socialists) will be held from the 7th to the 15th August next, at Paris, Salle du Commerce, 94 Faubourg du Temple.

The Montluçon glass-bottle makers are being well-supported in their strike. The French Socialist papers have opened subscription lists in their columns in aid of their comrades who are carrying on the struggle with good prospects of success. It is worth noting that the bourgeoisie of Montluçon is strongly sympathising with the strikers, the reason for this is that they know that the glass-bottle makers have only gone on strike after having exhausted all conciliatory means with their employers.

L'Avenir du Travailleur, of Lille, has been obliged to stop its publication, owing to the numerous prosecutions it has lately undergone.

A new paper, the Cri du Travailleur, will be soon started at Roubaix.

At Alger, the Socialists intend to issue in a few weeks a revolutionary paper L'Action Révolutionnaire, which will have two editions, one in French and the other in Spanish.—D.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian workers are very fond of co-operative stores, and are of opinion that such institutions are helping them in the solution of the social question. Now, the co-operative society, La Populaire at Liège has just issued the balance-sheet of the three first months of their operations, and what do we notice therein? The 1st week they received for drinks 1577 f.; the 2nd week, 1521 f. 3 c.; the 3rd, 1093 f. 63 c.; the 4th, 1077 f. 30 c.; the 5th, 884 f. 10 c.; the 6th, 756 f. 41 c.; the 7th, 988 f. 15 c.; the 8th, 1227 f. 12 c.; the 9th, 1620 f. 92 c.; the 10th, 891 f. 85 c.; the 11th, 898 f. 20 c.; the 12th, 891 f. 75 c.; and the 13th week (only 4 days) 603 f. 98 c. They reckon that on these sales, mind you, drinks, they have made a profit of 2135 f. 67 c., that is to say, more than 700 francs profit per month. On the other hand, they have received during the same three months, for the sake of Socialist propaganda, the enormous sum of 10 f. 22 c. (say eight shillings)! A rather curious way of promoting the solution of the social question!—D.

GERMANY.

At Magdeburg, 400 cabinet-makers are on strike for higher wages. During the last fifteen months they have earned from 12 to 15 shillings a week.

At Leipzig the strike of the masons and bricklayers has proved successful, the workers having had their claims granted by the exploiters.

Louis Cohn, editor of the Breslauer Volkszeitung, was tried last week for an article written by him five years ago, and was condemned to one year's imprisonment.

At Leipzig, six Socialists have been arrested, because they had participated in a secret conference, held in the month of March at Heidhausen, near Munich. Their lodgings were searched by the police, who found more than 40,000 pamphlets which were intended to be distributed among the soldiers.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

At Prague, after an interruption of several years, the Socialist paper Věk Svobody (the Way to Freedom) has again made its appearance. The editors of the paper are comrades T. Burstial and W. Korber.—D.

OUR FOOLS' PARADISE OF CHEAPNESS.

We hear a great deal about the blessings of cheapness. Mr. Edward Atkinson, particularly, seems to measure all mundane good in terms of cheapness. If a yard of cotton cloth or a barrel of flour costs less money now than formerly, why look we for a millennium to come? Unfortunately there are facts about cheapness that writers like Mr. Atkinson never take the trouble to see. Goods, indeed, are cheap, but why and how and with what results? One of those great railroad corporations that are bringing flour from the northwest so cheaply that Mr. Atkinson is lost in wonder, is disabling 800 men a year. The superintendent was asked why he did not provide a protection that some of them asked for. "Men are cheaper than shingles," was his frankly brutal answer.

That is the blunt, hard truth. That is what half our cheapness means. Men are cheaper than shingles, and women are cheaper than edging and thread; "and as one woman selects, well pleased, garment after garment, daintily tucked and trimmed and finished beyond any capacity of ordinary home sewing, marvelling a little that a few dollars can give such a lavish return, there arises, from narrow attic and dark, foul basement, and crowded factory, the cry of the women whose life blood is on these garments." What wonder is it that year by year the tenement house population becomes more hopeless and incapable. Is it strange that children are born without the physical vigour and the mental and moral qualities that make up efficiency and thrift? Need we feel any surprise that such unfortunates, finding themselves literally cheaper than shingles and thread, are easily worsted in the struggle with fate—that they fall easy victims to vice, and that the permanently pauperised class becomes year by year a heavier social burden?

These evil implications of cheapness raise issues of practical economy and personal duty. Ought we to resist, as far as we are able, the tendency to excessive cheapness? Ought we to buy goods that we know have been made by reasonably well paid labour in preference to cheaper "bargains?" Should we accomplish any good by such a course, or should we do unintended mischief?

Those political economists who see one side of a subject so clearly that they are cock-sure that they see it all, have a ready reply to these questions. It is very pitiful, they admit, that free competition does, in some cases, cause such distress. But we should only make the evil greater, they tell us, if we virtuously resolved to buy only the dearer goods made by labour that was well rewarded. "You see," they explain, "your incomes are not unlimited. If you buy dear goods when cheap ones would answer as well, you necessarily curtail your savings. If a great many people do the same thing, there will be a serious loss of capital. Not so many new enterprises can be undertaken. Fewer farms will be improved, fewer new railroads will be commenced, the multiplication of mills and shops will not keep pace with the growth of population. Wages will be reduced below the lowest present limit; and the distress you have tried, in your mistaken, sentimental way, to relieve, will be increased tenfold."

This is plausible, but it is a fallacy that convicts a good many self-satisfied economists of very superficial thinking. The capital that seems to be saved by cheapness is not saved in fact, if the cheapness is produced at a ruinous expenditure of physical and moral vitality. If, in making the cheap articles, human life has been degraded, if health and mind and morals have been injured, then, not only has the productive power of working-men and women been cut down, but a positive burden of pauperism and crime has been thrown on the community. The losses and expenses so entailed may more than use up all the capital that seemed to have been saved. The ability of industrial society to extend its operations and demand for labour, instead of being increased, may be seriously impaired.

As in so many other matters, so here, the instinct of those right feeling men and women who question the morality of buying at the bargain counter is truer than the precepts of a one-sided science. The more comprehensive political economy of the younger thinkers, which is rapidly supplanting the old dogmas, reaches conclusions in accordance with our highest instincts of humanity and justice. It is economic wisdom, as it is a philanthropic duty, to set our faces against the craze for cheapness. It is thrift as well as humanity to refuse to buy the goods that there is reason to believe have been made cheap by the degradation of labour. We are living in a fools' paradise.—Work and Wages.

The Montlucon Glass-Bottle Makers.

The glass-bottle makers have always worked throughout eight months of the year in two shifts of 12 hours each; in the hot season, the four summer months, in three shifts of 8 hours. In 1886 this was changed by the masters to two shifts working 5½ hours and resting 5½, making 11 hours work to 5½ hours rest. During the first fortnight in June the heat was so excessive that not a single workman was able to work regularly. On the 15th of June at 10 p.m. the men on going to work had the door of the yard shut in their faces, and their delegates next day were threatened and insulted. The men have resolved on the following as the only terms of return:—(1) Re-establishment of eight hours working-day in summer. (2) Guaranteed salary, as heretofore, of 3 f. 55 c. (2s. 11½d.) per working day. (3) All bottles sold by the masters to be paid for to the men; bottles thrown aside to be broken in the presence of the men and men to have the right of breaking them. (4) No striker to be dismissed. Anyone able and willing to aid should send contributions to Charles Mazelier, Rue du Canal, Montluçon.

WISHES AND WISHES.

(By FRANCIS DAVIS. Reprinted from The Nation.)

[Francis Davis was a weaver of Belfast, who wrote his poems while working at his trade.]

O, know ye the wish of the true, the true?
O, know ye the wish of the true?
'Tis to see the slave's hand
Whirling liberty's brand,
As its toil nurtured muscles could do,
And the wide-world oppressors in view;
God ripen the wish of the true!

Then hurrah for the wish of the true, the true!
Hurrah for the wish of the true!
And another hurrah
For the fast-coming day
When the many shall preach to the few
A gospel as pure as the dew!
O, there's hope in that wish of the true!

O, know ye the wish of the proud, the proud?
O, know ye the wish of the proud?
'Tis to empty their veins,
'Mid the clashing of chains,—
Ay, the veins of their heart if allowed,
So the neck of oppression be bowed.
What a holy wish that of the proud!

Then hurrah for the wish of the brave, the brave!
Hurrah for the wish of the brave!
And hurrah for the hand,
And the casque-cleaving brand,
That the rights of a nation can save,
Or redeem by its world-lightening wave:
Heaven bless the broad brand of the brave!

THE SATISFIED CLASS.

Capital has always claimed, and still claims the right to combine. Manufacturers meet and determine prices, even in spite of the great law of supply and demand. Have the labourers the same right to consult and combine? The rich meet in the bank, the club-house, or the parlour. Workingmen, when they combine, gather in the street. All the organised forces of society are against them. Capital has the army and the navy, the legislative, the judicial and the executive departments. When the rich combine, it is for the purpose of "exchanging ideas." When the poor combine, it is a "conspiracy." If they act in concert, if they really do something, it is a "mob." If they defend themselves, it is "treason." How is it that the rich control the departments of government? In this country the political power is equally divided among men. There are certainly more poor than there are rich. Why should the rich control? Why should not the labourers combine for the purpose of controlling the executive, legislative, and judicial departments?—will they ever find how powerful they are?

In every country there is a satisfied class—too satisfied to care. They are too happy to be generous. This satisfied class asks no questions and answers none. They believe the world is as it should be. All reformers are simply disturbers of the peace—when they talk low, they should not be listened to; when they talk loud, they should be suppressed.

The truth is to-day what it always will be, those who feel are the only ones who think. A cry comes from the oppressed, from the hungry, from the down-trodden, from the unfortunate, from men who despair, and from women who weep. There are times when mendicants become revolutionists—when a rag becomes a banner under which the noblest and bravest battle for the right.

It is impossible for any man with a good heart to be satisfied with this world as it now is. No one can truly enjoy even what he earns—what he knows to be his own—knowing that millions of his fellow-men are in misery and want. When we think of the famished we feel that it is almost heartless to eat. To meet the ragged and shivering makes one almost ashamed to be well dressed and warm—one feels as though his heart was as cold as their bodies.—Colonel Ingersoll.

A meeting was held on the Agricultural Hall Plain by comrades Morley, Darley, and Slaughter. Henderson lectured to a good audience in the Gordon Hall, on the "Aims of Socialism." The lecturer made an earnest appeal for men to join our movement, and he frequently received outbursts of applause from the audience. Three new members made. Next Sunday, Henderson will, by special request, repeat the lecture he gave a fortnight since, which was severely attacked and misrepresented by a local weekly paper.—A. S.

WOOLWICH.—Last Sunday, Mahon addressed a large gathering at the Arsenal Gates. We sold as usual a large amount of literature, and collected 6s. 1½d. for propaganda. Friends desirous of assisting at carrying on these meetings are requested to give in their names next Sunday to the chairman.

Our comrade Mahon has just finished another journey round some of the important towns in Yorkshire and the Midlands. There is only room this week for a brief notice of the meetings.

Goole.—New ground was opened at this large and busy town. The meeting was very large, and the audience deeply interested. Two hours' discussion ensued after the lecture.

Leeds.—On Sunday, July 10, three meetings were held in different parts of the town. The meeting at night at Vicar's Croft was exceptionally large, and the audience quite favourable. The Leeds Branch will shortly open a course of meetings at its new branch club-rooms.

Sheffield.—Under the auspices of the Sheffield Socialists a large meeting (chiefly of miners) was held in the open-air on July 11th. The audience listened with great attention, and thoroughly endorsed the Socialist position. A good sale of literature and some slight discussion ensued.

Clay Cross.—A large meeting of the Derbyshire miners was held. Raymond Unwin and Mr. James Haslem also spoke. Mahon explained the lines on which the Socialist organisation of the Northumberland miners had been formed, and sixty names were at once given to form a similar society.

Nottingham.—Mahon gave an address at the Socialist Club on July 13, on "The Progress of Socialism," which greatly interested the members.

Before leaving Birmingham, Mahon made arrangements for the more systematic carrying on of the propaganda there and in the district, and has now proceeded to Scotland to fulfil some engagement with the Scottish Land and Labour League.

North of England Socialist Federation.

We are informed that the branches in district are going to retain the services of T. Mann for vigorous propagandist work for some time to come. It is to be hoped that the No. of Eng. S.F. and the S.D.F. branches may come to an arrangement whereby they can co-operate with one another.

North Shields.—Usual meeting on Sunday morning. McDonald replied to certain objections and difficulties that have been discussed during the week. We would like very much if our opponents would come forward at our meetings, and not bring out their difficulties in private. Persons desirous to join, address J. Isbister, at Mr. Foster, 33 Clive Street.

South Shields.—On Tuesday evening A. K. Donald addressed the largest meeting we have yet had in South Shields. A gentleman opposed, but as the lecture progressed Allen began to find that Socialism was very reasonable, and procured some pamphlets to study the question. Mr. Darby supported the lecturer with a good speech. J. Wood, 105 Bath Street.

Sunderland.—Donald addressed a good meeting at the Garrison Field on Sunday afternoon. The meeting was much better attended than on previous Sunday. Large sale of literature. Next Sunday we shall hold the meeting in the east end of the town.

Throckley.—A branch was formed here at the close of Donald's lecture. We have had a number of supporters for some months at Throckley, and have now got our men together. Friends desiring to join, communicate with John Irving, Double Row.

SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1887.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

THE BOY-FARMS AT FAULT.

THE silly season in the newspapers is beginning briskly with a rain of letters from distressed parents concerning their troubles in dealing with their male children home for the holidays. This is a kind of twaddle which is always recurring: this well-fed, well-housed bourgeois on the hunt for some artificial trouble or another, some sham grievance, since he has no real ones, except his own inherent stupidity and vacancy; but on this occasion there is, if the said bourgeois only knew it, a moral to be drawn. I can imagine the "boy," "the enemy of the human race," as Dickens called him, retorting on his injured parent somewhat in this style:

Father. Well my lad, haven't you nearly had enough of it?

Son. Enough of what, Pa?

F. The holidays, my lad, the holidays.

S. No, Pa.

F. Because if you haven't, I have. No answer? Now you're sulking.

S. Well what am I to say? You're always badgering me.

F. There, there! Say something that isn't mere peevishness. I can see that you are sick of the holidays or else you wouldn't be like that.

S. Very well; I will then. Why do you want me back at the boy-farm? What have I been doing that's wrong?

F. Boy-farm! What do you mean by that impudence? As to what have you been doing; that's just it. You've been doing nothing, while here I am feeding, clothing and housing you, and having you expensively educated (not that I suppose you learn anything) and then you come home and kick your heels about, and do nothing but gorge and make a noise.

S. (with a grin) What do you do, Pa, when you're not having a holiday?

F. (seeming to swallow something and turning very red) Why, I do business and make money for you.

S. (rudely) O ah! I know what that means; precious hard work that is, isn't it?

F. (with dignity) Yes it is; as you'll know when you grow up and have to face the troubles of life.

S. (with increased rudeness). Come, I say, Pa, how much will you take to don't? I remember you taking me to your office last Christmas holidays when I was to be measured for a suit of clothes; and there I sat all the morning, and as I hadn't a book to read I fidgetted, and you nagged me; so I said to myself now I'll just take notice of what the governor does. Well, first you read the newspaper and warmed your front at the fire; and then you didn't read the paper and warmed your back; and then you were crusty with me; and then one of the junior clerks came in to ask you a question and you were beastly rude to him and I wonder he didn't punch your head for you (I heard him say he should like to as he passed me). And then you went and talked to the senior clerk, that little dry grey old chap; and you were civil enough to him, and I could see that you were rather afraid of him and that he did all your business; and then that chap came in that dines at home sometimes, and he was deuced smartly dressed, and he asked you to come to lunch at two o'clock; and you said you couldn't, and hitched your head over your shoulder at me; and he said, "Oh, never mind! bring the shaver along." And you were sulky, but you said "All right," and he said, "Well, I must go and order lunch." And then you sat down and wrote a letter, and that took you a quarter of an hour; and then you were crusty and told me not to sniff, and you stood and warmed your back again; and all the time the clerks were scribbling away as hard as they could, and chaps kept coming into the office and talking to the head clerk about business; and the head clerk came to you with some papers and a gentleman, and I heard you say "damn it" to yourself; but you were mighty politeful to him; and you went away with him and were away for half-an-hour; and then you came back and said "Come along and don't sniff." And then you went with me to an awfully swell place to lunch where there were lots of flunkies in blue coats and orange-coloured plush breeches, and then we had lunch with that other chap and another chap; and it was a mortal gorge and very jolly; only you and the other chaps would talk about Russia and France and Austria; awful rot, don't you know, like Mr. Toots and the other fellow in 'Dombey.' So that took till four o'clock, and the other fellows asked you to come and play at whist with another fellow, and you couldn't because you had to take me to the tailor's; and then you took me back to the office and the head-clerk said something to you, and you didn't pay much attention to him; and then you said to me "Come along and don't sniff," and so we went home and you couldn't eat much for dinner, and Ma said, "I'm afraid you're not well dear." And you said "I've had a very tiring and anxious day in the city, my dear." So I suppose that sometimes you have a less tiring day than that; and if that's the case I think you are soon tired.

F. Well what do you mean by all that rigmarole I should like to know? Are you qualifying yourself to write a realistic novel, pray?

S. Bosh! You know what I mean. You're always bullying me about the holidays and say I do nothing in them; and all the time you do nothing in the days that ain't your holidays.

F. You're a young fool and don't understand these things.

S. And then you are always saying that you are spending money on me. Well, I should like to know who spends money on you, since you don't do anything to earn it?—not even Latin prose.

F. Ah, well, you will be wiser one of these days when you have sons of your own.

S. (grinning). Come, Pa, turn to and make me wiser now by telling me how it is that you can't stand me doing nothing and boring people through the holidays, and you keeping me gratis all the while; and there you are all the while doing the same thing, and being kept gratis; and you would be very much surprised if they were to send you off to a man-farm and try to get something out of you in the way of work—a big strong chap like you.

F. Come, I'm not going to stand this any more.

S. Very well, then, why did you begin bullying me? You may think yourself very lucky to have such jolly long holidays. Why, the other day when you came on that chap who was carpentering upstairs, and he was having a nap after his dinner—my! how you did bullyrag him for resting twenty minutes! and he looked sheepish as though he had been caught doing wrong. I say, I wonder why you don't look sheepish.

F. Just take yourself and your wonder out of the room. I never heard such a parcel of impudent rubbish as you've been talking now you have found your tongue.

S. Very well, then, why did you begin bullying me? [Exit.

F. Really! I wonder what will happen to that boy. Suppose he should turn Socialist when he grows up!!! WILLIAM MORRIS.

INHUMAN ARITHMETIC.

Most words have in the course of human development changed greatly in meaning. Our lords and ladies, our art and commerce, are not more distant from their prototypes than is the arithmetic of to-day from that orderly arrangement to which it originally referred. If, for example, in ancient times a certain number of sheep had to be put up for the night into two sheep-folds of different sizes, the number of sheep put into each would have been accommodated to the size of the fold; if a number of men, women, and children had to occupy tents or houses, they would have been distributed among these with due consideration, not only for the mere number of persons in a tent, but also for the natural fitness to each other of the persons set to occupy the same abode, whether of men or of women or of children. The sheep and people, when so distributed in natural or convenient order, were arithmetized, in the ancient sense of this word. We still deal with sheep in that natural way, but we arithmetize our fellow-creatures in very inhuman style.

Our modern arithmetic has about it a kind of arrangement, a kind of symmetry, at least in words. We take say fifty people, and put forty of them into a house with ten small rooms, and ten of them into a palace with forty large rooms. Here the ten people are counted as of more consideration than the forty; they are reckoned as being in a better position, and all things about them are in accord with this idea; their palaces are also in a better position, are better lighted, more open and airy. The remote invention of the Hindoos of an Arithmetic of Position is thus applied in quite a surprising way.

Consider the number 10. There is the unit-digit 1, but this is raised into importance by its position, by being placed on the back of the other zero-digit 0. The "one" is taken to mean ten times as much as it ordinarily means, being thrust into a high position by something which has no value of itself, but is only of use in supporting this "one" in its "elevated position." In the same way 1000, 10,000, or even 1,000,000 may be taken to mean individuals supported in still higher posts, even as princes or millionaires, on the shoulders of a thousand, ten thousand, or a million zero persons, who are of no consideration except for the purpose of bearing up these elevated persons. And it is no light labour to bear them up and to save them from falling. In the treadmill of society it is weight alone, common coarse weight alone, that turns the wheel; the myriads that are ever striving upwards, but so as never to raise themselves higher, go on with dull content; they even seem delighted that it should take so much trouble to grind the rough material of an ordinary baby into a polished bishop or a millionaire. The People of Position look down with beneficence on their supporters, as may be seen in the lately issued 'Report of the Royal Commission on Trade Depression.' These Royal Tradesmen say something like this: "We should regret, on social as well as economical grounds"—they have not time to tell us the difference between these two grounds—"we should regret to see our myriads curtailed of the portion of leisure and freedom from the treadmill which they now enjoy; but we must point out to them that a failure in regular work is sure to lead to the distressing result, that there will be fewer jewels, less polish, a smaller number of the imperial, episcopal, and military adornments of life." People of position, then, have some pity on the thousand or million of their fellow-creatures on whose shoulders they stand; they would regret that these myriads should be reduced to absolute zeroes. To avoid this, and at the same time to avoid disturbing their own position, they have gone into the study of inhuman arithmetic.

Giffen, Mulhall, Gladstone, and other great professors of this science have created a strange monster called an Average—a horrid being, without human pleasures or hopes, free from passions, virtues, and vices, but ready, as the beasts are, to grind ever at the mill; satisfied with less than a beast's reward, with narrow allowances of air and water, more or less stinking, and scanty shares of corn, enough to keep it going.

Thus men are reduced to arithmetical terms, and can be labelled 1, 2, 3, 4 and so on to hundreds of thousands, as if they were sheep or wheelbarrows. Under the names of hands or operatives, they are counted along with spinning-machines, ploughs, or railway-engines.

The invention of the monster Average is due to the desire on the part of our professors to put a pleasant face on the realities of our system. It is a natural sequence from the base mode of measuring men by their money. Has one man £1000 a-year and another man nothing? Never mind, say our professors, if a very good farm produces 1000 tons of grain, while a piece of bog gives us nothing, this is just the same—for us the professors—as two farms of average fertility. Let us then dismiss from our minds the luxurious thousand-pounder, and not trouble ourselves about the starving beggar, but think rather of the two average substitutes, each with his comfortable £500.

There are in the United Kingdom about 7 millions of country people, i.e. about 1½ millions of agricultural men, with women and children. Now 5000 dukes, lords, millionaires etc., own some 36 million acres, or about half of the whole. But, say our professors, this is an average of about 20 acres apiece, and they put before us 1½ million male agricultural monsters as fairly representing our land system, each of them with a little farm of 20 acres.

Our professors, in their capacity of Royal Twaddlers on Trade Depression, tell us that in 1885 "property and profits assessed to the Income-Tax" came to about a thousand million pounds a-year. This does not include the scanty incomes of the wage-earning class, and besides this we know that many fish both great and small slip through the Income-Tax net. The professors on other occasions have set down the total annual income of the nation at twelve or thirteen hundreds of millions. But even a poor thousand millions, as they point out, is an average of some £25 per head, not per family, but per head, man, woman, and child. The happy mudlark, the delighted seamstress, might go off with the somewhat surprised bourgeois shopkeeper, with £25 each, and live cleanly and content. But let us look more closely into what our Royal Twaddlers call "a better distribution of profits." They discuss the increase in the "incomes of £200, £1000, and £5000 a-year," and point out that the £200 incomes have increased in number more than the higher ones. They put down the total number of persons drawing incomes of over £200 a-year at somewhat less than a quarter of a million. This would correspond to a population of about one and a quarter millions. But our professors do not know or do not choose to tell us the total of what may be called the shopkeepers' incomes, of incomes, that is, of £200 and upwards. It would not do for them to go too much into details, or they might tell us what portion of their thousand millions a-year is swallowed up by the shopkeepers' "£200 a-year and upwards" before we can begin to calculate how much those get whose incomes fall below £200 a-year. The professors, perhaps, do not know, but such evidence as there is on the subject all points in the same direction, and indicates that one and a quarter or one and a half millions, men, women, and children, of the shopkeeper class, including landlords, bankers, and money-lenders, manufacturers, merchants and salesmen of every kind, take at least two-thirds of the whole, and leave one-third for the remaining 33 million heads of the population. Thus the members of the shopkeeping class get out of the thousand millions a yearly average of £450 per head, while the rest have an average of £10 a-head.

This is a come-down from the delusive £25 per head of the Royal Twaddlers; and if we go on farther we only fare worse. We come to the dirty mudlark, the starved seamstress, the careworn land or factory slave; and find that by the time the shopkeepers have taken their huge slice out of the national cake, and the skilled hands of the well-to-do artizan have picked out all the plums from the rest, there is left for the great mass of the population, for at the least nine-tenths of our whole body, a very scanty and tasteless fare: a fare so poor, so scanty (and this is not the worst part of it) that it sinks below an average of £5 a-head. At this level, however, it is supplemented in various ways. "When toy-makers pay their girls 2s. 6d. a-week, when binders pay their folders 5s. a-week, when brush-makers pay their drawers 4s. 6d.

a-week, . . . these women make up the necessary sum for rent, food, and clothes by the sale of their bodies" (Pall Mall Gazette, July 1—"Women of the Pit-brow and Elsewhere," by a Woman). By the easy process of averages these numbers can be reconciled with Giffen's statement that at Bradford in 1884 children earned 11s. 6d. a-week by spinning. But in the wilderness of figures we find nothing to reconcile our consciences to such things.

Even if we confine ourselves to so base a conception of society as to think of it merely as an arrangement for the distribution of food, what can be said of its professors who continually din into our ears that there is £25 a-year for each head of us to spend on food and shelter, but omit to say that a small minority of less than one in ten take so much of the whole as to leave to each head of the great majority less than £5 a-year on which to feed, clothe, and house itself? But any one with human feeling would protest on higher grounds than these against an Inhuman Arithmetic which tells us that one very rich man and nine hundred and ninety-nine beggars make a good society; and against professors of averages who regard an army of Lilliputians ordered about and domineered over by a few Brobignagian officers as a good substitute for a natural society of men of manly stature both in mind and body. I protest against the substitution of averages for men. Such calculations are meant to delude, and to draw us away from the real question, which is surely not one merely of sufficient food and shelter, but whether all have such chances for the whole enjoyment of life, for the full development of their faculties, as the physical surroundings of nature admit of.

There are certain very simple beings having animal life, without eyes or ears, without smell, taste, or feeling, and so far as we can see, fitted only to grind simple food in a rudimentary stomach or bag, and to produce in an unconscious way, according to their several kinds, it may be a puff ball or an oak-gall, it may be the mould suited for cultivation, or the beautiful coral which we prize so highly. These molluscs are unconscious of the beauty, or worthlessness, of what they produce; but they can scarcely be more unconscious than our average "hand" or "operative" is of the worth, or uselessness, or waste of the work to which he is set. He cannot be called animated; but under the guidance of our professors, acts as a kind of digestive bag, and turns out in a dull, machine-like way, it may be butterine, or shoddy coats, or even the glory of a jerry-built palace. Our professors congratulate themselves on having "reduced the cost of production," without troubling themselves as to the worth of the product, so long as it will just hang together till it can be sold. They point out that the Adult Male Digestive Bag can turn out stuff which can be sold for £150 a year, and more, while they need only stoke him at the rate of 3d. or at most 6d. a-day, i.e. £5 or £10 a year. Something can even be made out of women and children; so they continue their calculations, and turn the whole human population, man, woman, and child, into mere averages and digestive bags.

In carrying out their scheme they apologise for the very incomplete arrangements made by an inefficient deity. They appoint a large body of bishops, judges, teachers of theology, political economy, and benevolence, together with organisers of People's Palaces and so forth, and they bid them amend matters. The teachers of political economy proceed to show how cheaply a man can satisfy hunger. He can do it for much less than 6d. a-day on brown bread and porridge; excellent food doubtless, but, without some other form of amusement, likely in the long run to prove monotonous. The teachers of benevolence go even beyond the economists, and are likely to revolutionise society with penny dinners. Then come the bishops, ministers and theologians in general, and urge the populace to aim at becoming good contented machines, not to exercise their minds nor care whether they are stoked with oats and water or with beef and champagne, but rather to put before themselves the cultivation of thrift, and the strict limitation or even reduction of the quantity of brown bread and porridge which they consume. By telling them that thrift here will lay up treasures for them somewhere else, and by threatening them with hell-fire if they ask questions and do not do as they are told, they have been very successful, and vast numbers of poor zero Average Machines content themselves on even so little as three pennyworth a-day of bread and porridge, or of more tasteful food.

The deaths from mining explosions in the course of the first half-year of 1887, contrasts most unfavourably with those which took place during the same period of 1886. In the first six months of the present year there were seven fatal explosions, resulting in the loss of 124 lives, against four explosions with a loss of 13 lives in the same period of 1886. From the evidence adduced at the various enquiries which succeeded each catastrophe, it appears that almost every one of the explosions of the present year were preventable.—Labour Tribune.

THE POLICE AND THE SOCIALISTS.—Our friend Pole of the S. D. F. has had his appeal against the sentence of Mr. De Rutzen rejected, though the magistrates have reduced his term of imprisonment from six months to two. The public who know nothing about the case will think that the bench of magistrates have acted with clemency and have administered a snub to Mr. De Rutzen. But it is perfectly well known that Pole was not at the Park at all, and that Messrs. Nupkins have (to say the least of it) blundered again. It would be instructive to see what the evidence was that was brought before these good people; who, it is to be feared, having let our comrade Williams go, thought it necessary not to go too far in acknowledging facts. Meantime it is also instructive, and far more so, to note that innocence is no particular protection to any person who is so unfortunate as to be brought before the Middlesex magistrates—or to say the truth right out, before any civilised court of "justice."

I am inclined to think that Comte's reason for attacking democracy will not hold, and that we might reverse his line of argument, and say: As men who know little about astronomy, yet feel themselves competent to judge between the conflicting theories of the professors, so much the more ought they to feel competent to judge between the conflicting theories of the teachers of sociology, seeing that they have themselves nearly as large opportunities of making observations. In all probability the common-sense of the community generally will have quite as correct an idea upon many political and social questions as the professors. For sociology is a science in which it does not do to ignore spiritual influences which are beyond the ken of science. A knowledge based on hypotheses may be very good for predicting eclipses or making steam engines, but it does not follow that it will be the best for organising men, where that which most acknowledge to be behind phenomena, call it spirit or what you will, exercises a most marked influence.

So much for the principle of authority for which Comte contends; now for the details. It seems to me that he has chosen the form of society in which the temptations to corruption are greatest, and trusts to being able to breed a continuous race of men so far above the average in morality as to be able to stand against the very strongest temptations and not fall.

I should have thought that if history teaches anything, government by the wealthy is proved to be one of the most corrupt, and to the mass of the people, most degrading forms of government. Rather by far have government by the strong, for the strong have generally some magnanimity, and are above trampling on the very helpless! Rather have government by one man, for you may get a king better than his compeers, out where was ever a wealthy class better than the average of the people? Moreover, if the one is very bad he is only one to be removed. Government by the wealthy has been practically what we have had for some time, and the only redeeming places in it are where something has been forced on them against their wills by the non-wealthy. I will not say much about the spiritual authority. True wisdom and knowledge will always get a hearing in due time, and to erect the learned into a superior caste is only to put in their way temptations to which they are bound to fall victims. The maintaining of their class will become of more consequence to them than the maintenance and teaching of truth. Has that not been so with all priest castes? Remember the Jewish, the Roman Catholic, and the English priest-hood, which of them has been open to receive any truth which went against their own influence?

But even in Comte's description of these classes the cloven hoof shows through. He is careful to show how nicely they will balance each other; how the spiritual authority is to befriend the working portion against the employers, the temporal authority, because its only chance of being able to defend itself is in the support of the same working class! What have we here but a repetition of the little game which has been going on in this country for some time? The landed interest siding with labour against capital lest capital should do too much harm to it. And what would it result in? Why just what it has resulted in now, both land and capital find the game is a bad one, and the losses are too heavy, so they form a mutual alliance; land won't hurt capital if capital won't hurt land, and they'll both squeeze labour for their mutual advantage. It would in all probability be much the same with the spiritual and temporal authorities. But we have got past this sort of thing, people will no longer look for a society to be held together by mutual fear; society must have some organic principle, mutual fear can hardly be called such; mutual helpfulness is likely to form a much firmer and more harmonious principle upon which to base society.

Professor Beesley, in the lecture above referred to, complained very much of our views of human nature; in fact, strange to say, at one part of the lecture we trusted too much to it, and at another we were blamed for trying to make some arrangements which would render any improvement in the aforesaid human nature unnecessary. He said that we did not take enough account of the self-interest there is in man, and that our Socialist state could not exist because of human selfishness; that was the first charge he made against us on this head. Let us compare our view with the Positivist's. We say, given that any man and every man can get his living, surely and with a reasonable amount of work under conditions as pleasant as possible, there will be in all a sufficiently high morality and a sufficiently great regard for the common good for them to do their share of the work, and do it well, and that they will be content to receive their fair share of the result of the common work; human nature, even as we know it, I think warrants us in this assertion. The Positivist, on the other hand, does not depend on a general average of human nature being better under better conditions, but depends upon one class of the community having an enormously large share of disinterestedness and love for the common good, so large indeed that it shall be willing at all times to go quite against its own interests for the sake of all. Moreover this class is to be composed of the wealthy, who are peculiarly open to the temptation to selfishness owing to their greater opportunities of gratifying their own whims, and who are also to be trusted with temporal power, thus having another temptation put in their way. And we must remember that this wealthy class, by the very nature of the way in which money is obtained, is to some extent a selection of the more selfish members of the community. For it is certain that in a competitive system a man must love himself and his belongings very considerably if he is going to exert all the energy and stoop to all the meanness which are needful to amass wealth for himself.

From a class selected thus, and put under these temptations, Positivists expect heroic devotion to the common good, and then find fault with us because we hope that when the temptations of competition, and the spur of uncertainty are taken away, men will be a little less selfish and have a little more regard to the common good. I leave any one to judge which party has the most reasonable expectation. But the Professor, not content with charging us with having too high an opinion of human nature, went on to object that we tried to make such arrangements in society as would render any great amount of unselfishness unnecessary. I cannot help feeling that there is something rather inconsistent in these two charges. For if we are all as selfish as the first would lead us to suppose, surely it would be a good thing to arrange society in such a way as to render our selfish propensities as little harmful as possible. But I do not think the Positivists need fear that we are going to render public spirit and unselfishness quite useless. No system will work happily if every one seeks his own advantage regardless of others; but whereas in the present system, and largely under a Positivist system also, the competition forces each to look after his own interests exclusively, and even makes it appear that that selfishness is for the general good, under Socialism it will be apparent to all that selfishness is not for the good of all but just the reverse.

Another of the Positivist doctrines seems to me inconsistent; they acknowledge that wealth is a social product and belongs of right to the community, but yet they uphold private ownership of wealth, merely calling the owners trustees. Now a trustee is a person who manages the money, etc., of some other person who is either unable or unwilling to manage it himself; he has no right to use a penny of it for his own purposes, being paid for his work at a fixed rate; and moreover when the person for whom he is trustee is old enough he is bound to consult him in what he does. He is appointed by the owner either past or present to carry out his wishes. The resemblance between this trustee and a Positivist one is very faint, the latter owns the wealth he is trustee of; he is self-appointed; he does with it what he thinks is best for the rightful owner (that is, assuming of course, that their trustees would do so much); and he pays himself out of the property according as he thinks right! The only regulation which the rightful owner has over him is by a vague public opinion about which he may not care much. I think the Socialist plan would be much more in keeping with their doctrine that wealth is a social product; the Socialist proposes that the community shall elect trustees to manage its wealth for it, that it shall pay them for their work, and be consulted by them as to the purposes to which such wealth shall be put. Professor Beesley also objected on behalf of the Positivists to our mode of distributing the produce, he maintained that the right to equality could not be demonstrated, as it is quite impossible to make comparisons between different kinds of labour, and that Positivism was superior to Socialism, because it did not attempt to reduce the share of each to anything like an equality. If, as Professor Beesley says, and I quite think he is right, it is impossible to estimate the comparative amounts of skill required in the different occupations; if it is quite impossible to compare an organiser of labour, a doctor, and a labourer, and to decide the relative skill required by each, and in this way to estimate their several shares in the general produce, then it seems to me that the Positivists are more at sea than we are; for I cannot find that they have any ground of estimate at all, but must leave it to competition just as it is now, so that their system would leave things pretty much where they are; which most parties agree is not to be desired. For if it is going to be left to the individual capitalist to divide the produce of his business as he chooses, how is he to know what will be a fair reward to keep for himself? In all probability he would have to fall back upon the plan now adopted, the more so as it would in most cases suit his taste best, and would keep as much as he could. Now, although this is a point about which there is a good deal of difference of opinion amongst Socialists, still we all have an ideal towards which we are working, and it depends chiefly upon our estimate of human nature and of the general state of education as to how near the ideal we each think it would be wise to go at first.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

(To be concluded).

C THE SOCIALISTS AT DURHAM.—The North of England Socialist Federation was represented at the Durham Miners' Gala by Mr. A. K. Donald. He addressed meetings in the Market Place, and from each of the platforms after the official programme was finished. The speaker insisted on the necessity of a more vigorous action on the part of trade union leaders. He said that a large part of the union funds were handed over practically as a voluntary contribution to the poor-rates, in the shape of out-door relief to the unemployed, and to aged workmen, and that it was because of this way of using their funds that the capitalists occasionally patted the unionists on their backs. A national federation of miners was advocated for offensive and defensive purposes, and the men advised never to be satisfied with their position until they were their own masters, and the present idle classes earned their own living. The following resolution was put at both platforms, and carried unanimously at one, and with one dissentient at the other: "That the miners of Durham see the necessity of organising, along with their fellow workers of all ranks, for the purpose of realising a society where all shall work and all shall enjoy the fruits of their labour." Meetings were addressed by Mr. Donald yesterday at North Shields, Sunderland, and South Shields. —Newcastle Chronicle, July 25.

HENRY GEORGE AND SOCIALISM.

FROM New York come tidings of an interesting intellectual struggle between the followers of Henry George and the Socialists or disciples of Gronlund. The occasion was the calling of a meeting of a convention of the United Labour Party of New York State, in a manifesto which ignores the evil effects of the wage system at the same time that it lays almost exclusive stress on the land theories and "remedy" of Henry George. Gronlund, deeming this a most unfortunate retrograde step from even the modestly-revolutionary constitution of the party, appears with a pamphlet entitled, 'The Insufficiency of Henry George's Theories,' in which he endeavours to convince the members of the error of their ways. His criticism attempts to prove that George's doctrines are altogether too narrow and one-sided, and his "remedy" impracticable and inadequate, opposing to them the teachings of modern Socialism.

George, he says, is stone-blind in one eye. He starts the inquiry in 'Progress and Poverty,' with a foregone conclusion in his mind, in accordance with which he distorts every subject he touches. His great first discovery is that "the cause which gives to the landholder is the cause which denies to the labourer and capitalist." Again, he eliminates the element of "profit" altogether from his enquiry, as being too loose and unscientific a term, when, as a matter of fact, it is the foundation of the modern industrial system. George's attempt by abstract deductive reasoning to distinguish land from the other means of production is easily exposed.

Gronlund then calculates that the enormous surplus revenues which George expects as the result of his "remedy" will probably not be realised; and next demolishes the notion that mere land nationalisation would benefit any but the capitalists. He further remarks: "In Great Britain land is the first means of labour to revolutionise. This is the most remarkable thing about George, that he, an American, should have hatched such a British idea, and one at the same time so un-American." The pamphlet is concluded by a brief but clear statement of the aims of Socialism, which though sufficiently exhaustive, recommends making a beginning by nationalising telegraphs, railroads, etc., and appeals to the party to stick to the whole programme.

The New York Herald of June 25 has a characteristically flippant leader on the whole controversy, from which, however, it appears that "the Gronlund split in the United Labour Party is somewhat formidable." George, according to this paper, seems to be at fault. He is reported by the Sun as saying, "If I am wrong, and the changes I advocate do not effect the reforms I desire, then I shall not hesitate to seek those reforms by further changes, perhaps in the direction which the Socialists insist to be the right one, perhaps in some other direction." The Herald rightly calls this "a mighty odd statement and admission," and adds, "The general public is listening to the controversy and will be edified by it. The wage earners are also listening, and in the end they will have very definite convictions, not based on George's theories, or Gronlund's theories, or anybody else's theories, but on their own tough, sinewy, common-sense." With this last sentiment we can but heartily agree.

REGINALD A. BECKETT.

LEADERS OF THE PEOPLE.

THE argument advanced by the free-trader, that the impetus given to trade by the repeal of the corn-laws has placed the labourer in a more advantageous position than he was before their repeal, is answered by Mill, who says, "When by improvements in agriculture, the repeal of the corn-laws, or other causes, the necessities of life are cheapened, . . . wages will fall at last, so as to leave the labourers no better off than before." Here we have Mill endorsing what Socialists are always asserting, that the removal of those restrictions which were supposed to hamper industry—i.e., protective duties—has not improved the condition of the workers.

It is quite obvious, even to the most superficial observer, that the development of labour-saving machinery must with each new development throw out of employment numbers of workers engaged in those industries in which the newly-invented labour-saving appliance is used. Here is an example (Pall Mall Gazette, July 13) "of labour-saving appliances which must create a revolution in the industries in which they are used. The machines, which are the invention of Mr. Myers, practically make the manufacture of packing-cases and dry bulged barrels an automatic operation. The wood for the packing-cases is cut, planed, and nailed together with a rapidity that is remarkable. In the same way the staves for the barrels are cut and rounded off, and, without any manual labour, they are put together and the barrel is trussed and set on end ready for the head and hoops. The head is also rounded off mechanically, and the finished barrel is turned out at a rate which would astonish any one who has ever been in a cooperage and watched the laborious hand process. With a set of machines, 5000 packing-boxes can be turned out in a day, at a labour-cost of £1, as compared with £21 by the old method; while in the case of the barrels they can be turned out at the rate of 800 to 1000 per day, at a labour cost of £1, as against £13 for hand labour." The result which will follow from the use of these inventions will be the same as that produced by the supersession of hand-labour by machine-labour in other trades. The majority of those engaged in it will be driven into the ranks of the unskilled labourers, or take their chance of picking up an odd job now and then at their old calling.

The revolution wrought in production by machinery has not only cheapened its cost, but has made it possible to create wealth at a most rapid rate. But despite the comparative ease with which wealth can be created, the labourer is in a far worse position than he was before the beginning of the modern industrial system; and while it obtains it is absurd to expect it to be otherwise.

That we may be enabled to fully appreciate the change wrought in industry by the use of steam and machinery, Mr. Mulhall has prepared for us the following table, which he premises thus: "Hand-labour, as a rule, cost ten times dearer than what is done by horse, and steam is three times cheaper than horse, so that one million foot-tons of energy by hand costs as much as thirty millions by steam. The proportions in which the work of the United Kingdom has been done at different dates were as follows:

Hand	14.5	8.5	4.7
Horse	57.3	35.8	17.5
Steam	28.2	55.7	77.8
	100.0	100.0	100.0

Further on, he says, "An Englishman of to-day can do as much work in three hours as would have taken nine hours in the year 1840, or reckoning on the basis of the latter year, we should require now a population of 107 millions to do our work."

With these forces at its control, labour should indeed be strong. I said at its (labour's) control, but alas! it slumbers in ignorance, unconscious of its power.

With the growth of trade and manufacture, industry has become more and more concentrated, and this concentration has caused the workers to fly to its centres. The effects of this has been to centralise and over-people them, and there where industry is concentrated most, slums most abound.

"But let us," says the Malthusian, "remedy this evil by the practise-ment of conjugal prudence, and limit the number of workers to the available means of subsistence. The fact of the matter is, there are too many of us, we are over populated. And besides, no man has the right to recklessly satisfy his carnal appetites, and thereby to put upon the community the responsibility of discharging obligations which, but for his thoughtlessness, it would not be weighted with."

Now let it be clearly understood that it is not denied that there is much to be said in favour of Malthusianism. But what is asserted is, that the acceptance of the teaching of the modern Malthusians will not abolish poverty. And when they assert, as the majority of them do, that the miserable condition of the workers is self-inflicted, is caused by their ignorance of their teaching, they state that which facts do not justify. A great cry has lately gone up at the spectacle presented by the revealment of the long-concealed misery of the workers, and the tender hearts of the well-to-do and governing classes have been throbbing with emotion in consequence. "What's to be done to remedy this state of things?" they have been asking. "Benevolence is no good, it only fosters habits of thriftlessness." And in high excitement, they asked again, "What's to be done?" And lo and behold, the Malthusian came forth and answered, "Verily I say unto you, there are too many mouths to eat and stomachs to fill for the food that is in our stores to satisfy, therefore many are hungry and wretched. And the homes that the people dwell in are foul and unclean because they herd together like swine and pay no heed to the laws of health." But is it true that the mass are poor and miserable because of the greatness of their number? Let us see. The population of the United Kingdom has increased during the last fifty years from "26 to 37 millions, an increase of 42 per cent.," but wealth in the same period has increased 124 per cent.—i.e., from "4100 to 9210 millions," which is "almost £250 per inhabitant, or £100 more than in 1840."

In the face of these facts, is it not idle to assert that the reason why the workers are half-starved is because they are too numerous? There are undoubtedly too many of them crowded together in the large centres of industry to enable them to live healthy lives, and it is possible that at some remote period of history we may be over-populated. This eventuality, however, can be dealt with after the monster Capitalism has been conquered and slain; to-day it is not a matter of the first importance. What the workers have to recognise is that their acceptance of the doctrines of the Malthusians, or of those of the temperance and thrift parties, cannot of themselves permanently improve their condition. They are only half-truths. The whole truth is only to be found in the principles of Socialism, therefore, workers, embrace them, for only by their acceptance can you ever be freed from the curse of capitalism.

Henceforth let your ears be deaf and your eyes blind to the seductive allurements of those who claim to be your leaders. Be on your guard, lest in the name of Liberty they rivet the chains of slavery tighter to you.

A VICTIM.

(WHOSE NAME IS LEGION.)

O! I am tired of factory toil,
Of starveling virtue, tired am I;
It is so hard to be poor and good,
It is so hard by degrees to die;
Easier it were to take heart and drown
In the river that winds the factory town.

The factory air is choking close:
Without in the streets it's cool and sweet—
And the factory bully, that comes and goes,
Has never a word—save a curse—to greet.
It is not so in the streets without,
Where all are free to go gaily about.

My cheeks are pallid, they once were red;
My eyes are saddened, they once were bright;
And weary, and faint, the steps I tread,
Though once I carried me firm and light;
The breath of the grave has damped my brow,
But the world seemed never so fair as now.

O what in return does Virtue give?
She has stolen my hopes away;
She has stolen (and sore I grieve)
The laugh from my lips and the light from my day!
And nought in return does Virtue give
But a tomb—and toil while her votaries live.

If toil and the tomb be Virtue's lot,
If Vice be ever the world's elect,
They may be chaste who are tempted not,
Or have the means to be circumspect;
But let them not of temptation tell,
Till they look at the streets from a factory hell!

'Tis but a step from the factory door
To the streets—to laughter and song and wine,
To the sullen river but one step more,
And there is an end to this life of mine.
Through one or the other must I, one day,
Pass from this with my shadow away!

CORRESPONDENCE.

CONCERNING USURY.

May I make a few additional remarks on this subject? Mr. Davidson in his excellent article on the subject in the Commonweal (p. 229) somewhat magnifies the power of Parliament to remedy the evils of interest. He says, "Repeal all laws that guarantee the collection of usury . . . and the fangs of the serpent will be effectually drawn." Would they? I think not. In States where society is based on monopoly, competition, individualism, and capitalism, history shows that laws are as powerless against usury as against any other product of such society—prostitution, for example. And for the very simple reason that the modern capitalist system creates the demand for money-lending, and hence for usury, its necessary accompaniment.

Suppose a law were passed to-morrow rendering interest incapable of recovery by law—that is, on all future loans—what would be the result? The demand for money by the needy on the one hand, and the desire to make profit on accumulations by the rich on the other hand, still continuing, future loans would be conducted in a way so as to evade the law. A man with a hoard, on being asked for a loan free of all interest, would naturally reply, "Why should I risk losing my money for nothing? No; if you will pay me half a year's interest in advance I will lend you the sum; and so long as you pay me the interest regularly every six months, so long may you use my money. But if you get into arrears in paying the interest I shall be obliged to sue you for the whole capital, as I cannot now sue you for the interest." That is very much the practice even now of many money-lenders. The interest is paid for a certain time in advance, the money is lent for that time, and secured by a bill of exchange. When the bill falls due, it may be renewed on payment of another period of interest—otherwise the capital has to be returned and the transaction closed.

I fear usury will never be abolished so long as there are rich men wishing to lend for profit and poor men desiring to borrow.

Interest is a species of rent. Ordinary rent is money paid for the use of another person's land or house. Weekly or monthly payments for the hire of a sewing-machine or of a piano, is another kind of rent. And interest is simply the rent for using another person's money. And these and all other kinds of rent are inseparably connected with the present system of society, and will never disappear until it is exchanged for that of Socialism.

TO SOCIALIST CYCLISTS.

While the summer is still with us, I should like to call the attention of those of our comrades who may come under the above designation—and they must be many—to a "plan of campaign," whereby they may take their cycling pleasure and advance the Socialist cause at the same time. The plan is this: Let them in their future "runs" into the rural districts carry with them a stock of pamphlets and leaflets for judicious distribution on the road and at the villages and other likely places they pass en route. The surrounding districts within the limits of an accomplishable run should be mapped out into routes, and named No. 1, 2, 3, and so on. The routes should all be gone over once in their order with one pamphlet, and then over again with another. In order to obviate the useless expenditure of time and money in "papering" a route twice with the same literature, only one kind of pamphlet, etc., should be carried on each journey, and a note taken of what is left on each route. A good plan (advocated some time ago in Justice) is to stitch the pamphlets in brown paper covers, and leaving them "to be called for" on the next journey, others being then exchanged for them. Of course, in selecting the literature, regard should be paid to the locality in which it is intended to distribute it. Thus, a tractate dealing with the land question would hardly be the best obtainable for leaving in a manufacturing district, or vice versa. (Of course, too, it need not be pointed out that the "plan of campaign" now advocated can be adopted not only by the owners of cycles, but also by the possessors of any other special means of locomotion.)

Those who try this plan for the first time will be as surprised as delighted to note the gratitude with which Socialist literature is accepted, and the eagerness with which it is perused; while after a time they will find themselves amply rewarded by the interest and pleasure with which their periodical visits are looked forward to. An effort might then fairly be made to extend the circulation of the Commonweal; and very many will easily be found who, after learning what Socialism is from pamphlets gratis, will gladly avail themselves of the opportunity of studying its progress from its organs in the press. Meanwhile, the Socialist cyclists are wanted before the Socialist converts can be made. May they not be "wanted" long! Literature suitable for this kind of propagandist work can be had at so low a figure (a few pence will purchase thousands of copies), that a splendid opportunity of doing a little practical good in their day and generation is now open—where, perhaps, it was before denied them—to all who have a "wheeler" and a will.

ÆGZATCE.

SAUCE.—The will of Mr. Perrins, the Worcestershire sauce-maker, has been sworn at £665,000. The "inventor" of the sauce was a Mrs. Grey, friend of Sir Chas. Grey, who brought it from India. Mrs. Grey fell into poverty, but never got a farthing from the firm. Lea and Perrins were at first a small firm of chemists.—J. L. M.

The present state of the refined-sugar market is very critical. The cessation of a prominent refiner announced last week throws the London manufacture into the hands of five firms, and yet, although the numbers are so small, the quantity made is nearly as large as when there was a greater number of manufacturers. Happily grocers need fear no adverse "combination," for the ever-increasing imports of Continental granulated—a form of sugar that suits the public taste, but which our refiners do not turn out to any great extent—will, in any event, effectually prevent exaggerated prices of home-manufactured goods.

There is such a thing as having the gospel preached at too high a price. Take for instance what is going on in connection with the Bolton strike. Boycotting on an extensive scale and in peculiar ways is taking place. The vicar of Holy Trinity Church has found it necessary to give spiritual courage, and he last Sunday preached to the "knobsticks" at the affected foundry. Afterwards, to show their parson that they were not sympathisers with non-unionists, if he was, the ringers refused to ring the bells. Nearly all the food and drink for the men lodged at the foundries has had to be fetched from Manchester.—Labour Tribune.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

STRIKE OF WEAVERS.—Unless some agreement can be come to between the manufacturers and their workpeople at Barnoldswick, a general strike is expected to take place in a few days, which will seriously affect the whole town. The weavers allege that they are underpaid, and demand the Burnley list.

At a mass meeting of the chainmakers at Cradley Heath last week, a resolution was proposed to ask the employers for a still further advance in wages; but it was rejected. It was, however, resolved not to resume work at the 4s. list of prices until the employers unanimously agreed to send for the operatives. Upwards of 3,000 operatives are now on strike, some of whom are undergoing great privations.

At a mass meeting of spike nailmakers belonging to the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire districts, at Halesowen, it was unanimously resolved to declare a general strike, in consequence of the employers having enforced a reduction in wages ranging from forty to eighty per cent. It was stated that the operatives were undergoing the greatest privations at the present rate of wages.

A large meeting of men engaged in the malleable nail trade has been held at Birmingham, to concert measures for resisting the reduction of 10 per cent. in wages proposed by some of the employers. The feeling of the men was unanimously in favour of determined resistance to the reduction. In the course of the discussion, it was remarked that if the men could remain out for 20 weeks, as they had done before they had a society, they were prepared to remain out at least as long now that they were fully organised.

The Midland Railway Company have just announced an alteration in the mode of payment to their drivers and firemen. Instead of guaranteeing six days' pay they propose only to pay the men by the trip. This is objected to, and an indignation meeting of the men employed in the district was held at Wellingborough on Sunday evening last, when the various districts proposed to take means of laying their views before the directors as early as possible.

THE SHORT TIME IN THE COTTON TRADE.—At a directors' meeting of the Cavendish Spinning Company, Ashton, held on Wednesday, it was decided to continue short time. The Heywood mills are continuing short time. At Todmorden there is no change in the condition of the short time movement. The same may be said of the Rossendale and Whitworth Valleys, and also of Preston. The Bridge Mills, Whitworth, has a small gain for the past six months. In Oldham the short time movement has practically collapsed.

NORTHAMPTON.—STRIKE IN THE SHOE TRADE.—Last Friday afternoon all the shoe-lasters employed by Messrs Cove and West, Northampton, came out on strike. The men complain that the prices for various kinds of work had been systematically cut down, and they accordingly appealed to the Shoe Rivetters and Finishers' Association, by whom a price list for work was prepared. After several conferences it was submitted to the masters. At the end of the week allowed for consideration the employers refused to treat with the men, who accordingly packed up their kits and left. The strike will probably affect a large number of men.

BOLTON ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—The eleventh week of the struggle between employers and employed in the Bolton engineering trades has passed without any settlement being arrived at, although further efforts in that direction have been made by the mayor, whose suggestions are still the subject of consideration. Meanwhile the force of military and county mounted constabulary remains at its full strength. There have been several importations of workmen during the week, but these have not been on the extensive scale anticipated, and have not been attended by disturbances. A batch of men from Scotland, on realising the state of affairs, refused to remain in the town. A number of the apprentices employed by Messrs. Dobson and Barlow gave a week's notice to leave, but this action was not inspired by the Strike Committee, who have in fact rather discouraged it. On Saturday 16th a special meeting of magistrates, at which there were 23 present, after discussion resolved to retain the hussars and other military in the town as "their presence was required for the public safety." On the following Thursday night a meeting of ratepayers was held at the Coffee Tavern, Bradshawgate, "to arrange for an indignation meeting against the employment of the county police and military for the purposes they are being used." The large room was crowded to excess, many being unable to obtain admittance. The speakers said Capitalists had regarded working men too much as serfs and slaves, but labour was equally valuable with the capital that employed it. No one could agree with the way in which the authorities were using their power by employing the police and military to escort men who were taking the bread from the mouths of their own people. The police and military had been brought into the town, not to preserve order but to assist a few employers to fill their works with imported labour at the public expense. The bringing of the military was the act of an interested party. The introduction of the county police was not conducive to the peace of the town. It was a menace and an act of tyranny. On the night of the so-called riot their conduct was scandalous—hitting people without regard to age, position, sex, or mercy. The question was whether ratepayers should be called upon to pay for the support of the large body of police and military for that purpose? There was neither justice nor reason in it. There was a plot between the employers and the magistrates, for whenever imported men were expected word was sent to the Town Hall, and at once the mounted police were in readiness, the platform was cleared, and the pickets were prevented from laying before the strangers the true facts of the case. The authorities placed all the advantages on the side of the masters and all the disadvantages on that of the men. One firm in the town though they did not give way to the demands of the men had acted in a fair and honourable manner, and not one pane of glass had been broken, not one policeman needed to protect the works. There had been riots before in Bolton, when the working men of the town had been called to assist the authorities in the protection of life and property. In his opinion the reason why the magistrates did not adopt this course was that they knew there were not a hundred men in Bolton who would support them in their unfair conduct.—Mr. Holt, 60, Higher Bridge Street, was appointed secretary, and a committee was elected to organise a requisition to the Mayor, calling upon him to hold a town's meeting at the earliest possible date in the Albert Hall.—A subscription list was opened; and liberally responded to for the payment of preliminary expenses.

The masons in Dundee are still on strike. Many have left the town, and men are scarce, so much so that the employers are getting anxious for a settlement.

The agitation begun at Aberdeen and Peterhead by the fishermen for higher prices for herrings has spread to the women of the Banffshire coast, as far west as Burghead. The fishwomen have resolved to strike for higher wages, and to flog and boycott all women who work at old rates.

LOCK-OUT OF MINERS.—The trade in Fife and Clackmannan is at present particularly dull at all the collieries, and large bodies of men have been dismissed within the last few weeks. At Lochore and Capletrae Colliery, notices have been posted up enforcing a reduction of 11 per cent. The result is that about one half of the men at the colliery have been paid off, as the men are determined to resist the reduction. Those men who occupy the colliery dwelling-houses are allowed to remain in the meantime, but the reduction is understood to effect the general body of the workmen.

A serious crisis has been reached in the North British oil trade. The tremendous firm of Young's Mineral Oil Company cannot pay a dividend this year. The shares of four companies, the Broxburn, Clippens, Burnt Island, and Young have fallen in value £1,423,000. The estimated loss over all the oil companies is three millions (Mercantile Age). American competition and the growth of the Russian industry is the immediate cause of this. The Scotch oil companies make no pretence of being able to cope with this competition. The American companies, especially the Standard, have resolved to smash all rivals in the trade. The only makeshift which the Scotch companies can resort to in their helplessness is to restrict the output.—J. L. M.

AIRDRIE MINERS.—A mass meeting of the miners of Airdrie was held on Thursday on the Daudie Hill, Rawyards. There was a large attendance. Mr. Gibb presided. Reports from the various collieries showed that the majority were idle, while others were working wholly and partially, but all working on the reduction. A motion was made that "We accept the reduction in the meantime, and organise ourselves to be in a position to resist." An amendment to take a fortnight's holiday finding no support, the motion was carried unanimously. It was also agreed that "We return to the five days a week and eight hours a day," and "That we protest against the present reduction, and that a return of it be demanded as soon as possible." Strong strictures were made in regard to the fourteen days' notice, but no action was taken in the meantime.

BELGIUM.

Last week three Belgian Socialists, Moreau, Kats, and Seconde were tried before the Court of Assizes for having, in public meetings held at Brussels, incited people to refuse to obey the laws, and specially the laws on military conscription. Moreau gives to the magistrates of his native country a great proof of his confidence—namely, by absconding. Kats and Seconde are present, and their attitude is very worthy. Kats says to the magistrate: "I am a Republican, a Socialist, and an Atheist. I have attacked the laws, it is true, but the laws are unjust. I have told the young soldiers not to fire on their fellow-brothers on strike, and I am proud to have said so!" Seconde made a brilliant speech to the same effect, and then, of course, they were convicted and sentenced, Kats to four months', Seconde to three months', and Moreau, the lucky absconder, to one year's imprisonment. And so it stands nowadays in free Belgium!

In our issue of last week we have told our readers that the attorney-general who caused Lieske to be executed at Francfort for a "crime" not perpetrated by him has become a madman and is now in an asylum. At Brussels another attorney-general, the odious Demaret, who has acted as prosecutor in a great number of charges made against the strikers of the miners districts (strikes of 1886 and 1887) and who obtained against them condemnations up to twenty years' hard labour, as in the cases of Schmidt and Falleur, has been ignominiously chased out of the ranks of the court. That monster, who in his speeches against the workers always invoked law, authority, and morality, has been found guilty of the most abominable vice which can dishonour a man—sodomy. That scandalous wretch was one of the most energetic and brutal prosecutors of Socialists who for the last ten years have made their appearance in Belgian courts.

In the Werker of July 24 the Antwerp Socialists, by the organ of their Executive Committee, publish a resolution declaring that the emancipation of the workers can only be brought about, after due organisation, by forcible means; they further declare that they repudiate all kinds of compromise with radical bourgeois parties to effect electioneering purposes, and that they only can approve of political action in as far as such action, in certain given circumstances, would be able to penetrate the people with the spirit of revolution. Certainly this resolution will not meet with the approval of the executive of the Parti ouvrier at Brussels! Bravo, Antwerp!

The revolutionary paper Le Combat made its re-appearance on the 17th of this month at Brussels. Our readers are aware that this paper was obliged to stop its publication, owing to the fact that its editors, Loor and Conreur, had been arrested at the time of the last strikes in the province of Hainault. Le Combat declares that the editors intend to start a new party—the Socialist Republican Workers Party—in opposition to the Parti ouvrier, with a view of preparing the general black strike.

Comrades Loor and Conreur have now been released from jail—without trial!

HOLLAND.

A group of Socialists of Amsterdam is about to publish the posthumous works of one of the bravest forerunners of the social revolution in Holland, the tailor H. Gerhardt. At the time of the foundation of the International Workingmen's Association, he was the first Dutchman to incite his fellow brethren to join the movement, and he has been one of the most energetic organisers of labour in his country. He was also one of the creators of the workers' press in Holland. The posthumous works of our much regretted friend will make three volumes, and F. Domela Nieuwenhuis has written a biography for this edition of our clever and noble Gerhardt.

Last Friday the Court of Appeal at the Hague confirmed the condemnation to one month's imprisonment previously pronounced by the police magistrate against comrade Boei, chairman of the Hague section of the Dutch Social-Democratic party.

We recommend those of our friends who understand the Dutch tongue to read a very remarkable series of articles, written by S. E. W. Roorda van Eysinga, in Recht voor Allen, and explaining in the most striking manner the fallacies of the parliamentary humbug.—D.

FRANCE.

Last Thursday the Anarchists Deherme, Moreau, and Niquet were tried before the Court of Assizes of Paris for having, on the 22nd of February last, addressed a manifesto to the young soldiers, giving them the very good advice to let capitalists in future themselves defend their capital, and landowners their land—the same prosecution as in Belgium. All three were assisted by the Anarchist Thevenin, who is not a solicitor nor a lawyer of any kind, but who proved to be as able as any one of the bar to say what there was to be said for the sake of his friends. Moreau and Niquet got two months; Deherme, who apparently had no time to attend the magisterial farce, got one year's imprisonment. Vive la République, comrades! D.

GERMANY.

At Berlin seven Socialists, forming the Central Executive Committee of the party, have been arrested, on the denunciation, it is said, of the former cashier of the Committee, who informed the Police Councillor Krieger of all the details of the secret organisation of the Berlin Socialists.

At Hamburg, eight more Socialists were arrested Wednesday last, in consequence of the perquisitions which were made lately at Magdeburg.

On an order from the Berlin central police authorities, the police of Breslau have made enquiries in several houses of the suburb Schweinitz. They have found a considerable deal of pamphlets and leaflets, addressed to the workers and to the soldiers.

At Mayence we will have in a few days a new trial for secret conspiracy. Eight Socialists are charged with that abominable crime: Franz Tost, member of the Landtag; Carl Konrad, shoemaker; F. Pfeiffer, clerk; A. Zimmermann, merchant; E. Stoll, carpenter; J. Loos, tailor; T. Romberg, cabinetmaker; and M. Anderhub, member of the municipal council.

At Altona also a new trial is going on for distribution of considerable quantities of prohibited literature. D.

LITERARY NOTICES.

'English as She is Taught' (Fisher Unwin, 2nd ed., 2s.), by Caroline B. Le Row, is a delightful book. Before it the stern professional frown relaxes and the jest of it has to be enjoyed to the full before a properly critical attitude can be resumed and a "moral drawn." Such "definitions" as "Republican—a sinner mentioned in the Bible"; "Demagogue—a vessel containing beer and other liquids"; "Franchise—anything belonging to the French," are sufficient to shake the straitest composure. But then there comes afterward a cooler moment, when there is apparent a cruel undermeaning to the whole thing. This book is compiled by a school teacher from the answers given in a large school to examination questions, and, rightly read, is a scathing condemnation of the whole modern system of education; and as that is an essential part of the present system of life, it is of a necessity an equal condemnation of capitalism. Mark Twain has written an introduction to the little book, in the course of which he says: "A large part of the pupil's 'instruction' consists in cramming him with obscure and wordy 'rules,' which he does not understand, and has no time to understand. It would be as useful to cram him with brickbats; they would at least stay." A curious light is thrown upon the little thought that is given in these days to thinking. So many facts for so many marks, so many marks for so much money—that is the trade of school; just like the trade of after life, with its sordid greed and restricted vision. Some of the youngsters in their poor little endeavours at thinking with brains untaught how, hit upon some wonderful discoveries that "take one in a sudden and unexpected way." Here are a few:

"The men engaged by the gas company go round and speculate the meter."

"There are a good many donkeys in theological gardens."

"The imports of a country are the things that are paid for; the exports are the things that are not."

"John Bright is noted for an incurable disease."

"The Constitution of the United States is that part of the book at the end that nobody reads."

"Beneficence—a state of insanity."

"If you listen closely you can vibrate a pitchfork."

"A simple pendulum is an imaginary point hung on a thread."

Our open-air speakers should note:

"Distinct articulation cannot be made unless we have a tongue, our lips, and our teeth."

"It is a very important thing to breathe."

"Vowel sounds are made by keeping the mouth wide open, and consonant sounds by keeping it shut."

And this is a cruel hit at—somebody:

"Prose tells things that are true right along just as they are, and poetry makes it up as you go along."

'Arcady: For Better, for Worse,' by Rev. Dr. Jessop (Fisher Unwin, 7s. 6d.). A kindly, cheerful man, and one whose acquaintance would be worth the cultivation; one of keen insight and great sympathy. Without any special axe to grind, he observes closely and describes well. Those of us who are fiercely in earnest over our ideal of life and the mode of realising it; who are battling strenuously for our own hand and, as we think, for humanity, may revolt now and then at an apparent cynicism or seeming levity. But it is only apparent; under it all the while there is a strong man who feels and sees even as we see; but, not seeing any remedy very clearly, he is impelled to put the problem as fully as he can, with as little fuss as may be, and leave it for solution. Of course, we poor Socialists come in for a little scolding: we are violent, and too much in a hurry, and so on; but this kind of thing we take as a matter of course, and keep on. Against his "abuse"—that is much too strong a term for it—we can set his defence of village communities, his attack upon peasant proprietorship, and much else. It is a desolate picture that he gives of the condition of agricultural labourers and their prospects; in one part of it that appals him we cannot help seeing our chief hope. The discontent, and insubordination of the labourers is but part of the growing dissatisfaction of the workers with their degraded position. And even the feeling, of which, because it is old, he cannot but speak respectfully—the feeling that makes men of near parishes "foreigners" to one another—is becoming hardly more antiquated than the same feeling as between nations; and the workers in many lands are learning the same lesson, that it is not a question of large or small farms, or large or small men, that faces them. The question is: how to secure to the producer the fruit of his labour, and how to secure that no non-producer have power to extort any share of it. In spite of Dr. Jessop's dislike to such procedure, there is no doubt that appreciable strides are being made, year by year, toward the answering of the question. Meanwhile, so long as it does not interfere with our work, we are always glad to welcome such a pleasant talker as Dr. Jessop, even though, like Coleridge, he "start from no premisses and come to no conclusion."

REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, July 20, H. A. Barker lectured on "Evolution and Socialism;" good discussion followed. On Sunday, July 24, a good open-air meeting was held on the Green, addressed by Wardle, after which T. E. Wardle lectured in the hall on "The Franchise Fraud." Literature has steady sale.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—On Wednesday, July 20, we held our usual meeting at the Broadway, London Fields, which was addressed by H. Sparling. We had a good audience, and some opposition from a Christian. On Sunday evening, Wm. Blundell lectured on "Property Qualification," which was opposed by J. Lane, he taking the Parliamentary side of the question, to the great surprise of the audience.—J. F.

Hoxton.—On Thursday evening, a large and enthusiastic open-air meeting was held opposite Hoxton church. Comrade Allman spoke well, carrying the sympathy of the audience with him. A member of the S.D.F. also addressed the meeting. Fair sale of literature. On Sunday evening, D. Nicoll, of the Socialist League, lectured on "Reform or Revolution." A lively and interesting discussion followed. Comrades Pope, Allman, Binning, and our venerable old friend Burnham taking part.—C. J. Y.

MARYLEBONE.—We held our usual meeting in Hyde Park on Sunday afternoon, addressed by Cantwell, Sparling, Mainwaring, and Samuels; the audience was very appreciative. We collected 3s. 5d. for the Strike Committee.—T. C.

MERTON AND MITCHAM.—During the week we have visited Wimbledon Camp, distributing literature. On Saturday, comrades Hill, Kitz, and Eden attended a meeting convened by Liberal League on Garrett Green; 23 Commonweal sold, and large amount of leaflets distributed. Comrades Eden, S.L., and Heatford, S.D.F., spoke on Mitcham Fair Green on Sunday. Sale of Commonweal for Mitcham and Merton, 30; total, 53.

MILE END.—On Sunday, William Morris addressed a large and sympathetic audience in Victoria Park on "Monopoly and Socialism." Some opposition was offered by a person who began by stating he was a workman, and speaking at the close of his remarks as an employer of labour. He also stated that he was a Radical. His objections were satisfactorily answered. Davis also spoke. Altogether this was one of the most enthusiastic meetings held in the park this season. Commonweal sold well.—H. M.

NORTH LONDON.—On Tuesday evening, July 19, we held a very good meeting at Ossulton Street, addressed by Cantwell, Brooks, Nicoll, and Deaghty. A Conservative opponent undertook to debate here on Tuesday the 26th, on "The Agricultural Depression." On Sunday morning we held a meeting at Regent's Park; Cantwell, Brooks, and Mainwaring spoke; some interesting discussion followed. Collected 3s. for the Strike Committee.—H. BARTLETT.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday, Glasier held a very successful meeting in Jail Square. He received a good deal of opposition; but the objections were ably answered by our comrade, assisted by friend Muir. At our new station, Paisley Road Toll, a large and attentive audience listened to the expositions of the same comrade. At both meetings Commonweal sold well.—A. M'K.

IPSWICH.—On Sunday, H. A. Barker, of London, gave two vigorous addresses to good audiences here. Arriving rather late, a camp meeting of religionists had taken up our old accustomed place. We, however, soon obtained a large gathering. Literature sold fairly well.—J. READ.

LEEDS.—Large meeting in Vicar's Croft on Sunday evening, addressed by Hill, Paylor, and Sellitt. A growing sympathy with Socialism is perceptible in this town, and there is no doubt we shall soon increase our numbers.—T. P.

NORWICH.—During the week, good meetings have been held at Yarmouth, Dereham, and St. Faiths, addressed by Henderson. On Sunday morning last, one was held at North Walsham by Henderson and Darley; at Wymondham, by Morley and Slaughter. In the afternoon, Henderson spoke in Norwich Market-place, Reux in the chair. In the evening, Henderson, by special request, repeated his lecture on the "Marriage Question," Sutton in the chair, when the misrepresentations published in Daylight were disposed of to the satisfaction of the audience. Collected for propaganda, 8s. 6d. Reux left us on Monday for France.—J. S.

PELSALL.—Wednesday evening, Weaver and Deakin spoke to a good meeting here.—J. T. D.

WALSALL.—Monday, July 18, Sanders addressed a large audience in the Market-place, Dudley. At close of meeting good number of names given in to form branch. A most successful open-air meeting was held at Wednesbury on Thursday, Sanders and Weaver speaking. Good discussion at the close. On Saturday, Sanders spoke in the Market-place, Walsall.—J. T. D.

DUBLIN.—At the weekly meeting of the Labour League, on Thursday, July 21st, comrade I. E. McCarthy was unanimously elected secretary for the ensuing quarter. Five other Socialists were elected on the committee—we now have a majority of the whole committee. Fitzpatrick, who was in the chair, called the attention of the meeting to a report in the public press of an interview between Mr. I. Foley, President of the Irish Industrial League, and the manager of the Ringsend Bottle Company, in which the former recommended the company to dispense as far as possible with manual labour and employ machinery, so that combination of the workmen might not interfere with the development of the company's trade. If this, contended our comrade, was the kind of protection advocated by the Industrial League for the working people of Ireland, the sooner the hollow mockery was exposed the better. J. S. Hall and McCarthy, who took part in the discussion, forcibly repudiated the pretensions of the Industrial League to represent the working-people of Ireland.

WOOLWICH.—Wade and Banner spoke at the Arsenal Gates, last Sunday, to a very large gathering. Sold out all our literature, and collected for propaganda, 4s. 9d.—R. BANNER.

North of England Socialist Federation.

Blackhill.—We held our first meeting at Blackhill on Monday evening. We purpose endeavouring to work up this part, where we have even now a good many supporters.

Blyth.—We had our usual lecture in the Market Place on Saturday. A very unseemly interruption was made by a member of the S.D.F. regarding the position of our society. M. Mack, 4 Back Marlow Street, secretary.

Burradon.—A meeting was held in the Schoolroom at Burradon on Wednesday. A. K. Donald addressed the meeting on behalf of the S.F. An excellent speech in support of lecture was given by Mr. Whitefield.

Consett.—A. K. Donald lectured at the fountain on Monday evening. Persons wishing to join the branch, address J. Walton, Medonsby Road, sec.

Durham.—At the Market Place on the Miners' Gala day, A. K. Donald addressed a meeting. He also, supported by Mr. Bell of Chester-le-Street, addressed large meetings from the platforms in the ground, at which this resolution was carried by acclamation: "That the miners of Durham see the necessity of organising, along with their fellow workers of all ranks, for the purpose of realising a society where all shall work and all shall enjoy the fruits of their labour."

North Shields.—regular meeting on Sunday morning was addressed by A. K. Donald. In spite of the rain the attendance was good. Collection made. J. Isbister, 3 Cockerill's Cottages, secretary.

Newcastle.—The local branch of the S.D.F. held its usual meeting at the Cattle Market on Sunday evening, which was well attended. A number of meetings have been held by Thomas Mann in the district during the week. A. K. Donald addressed the employees of Armstrong Mitchell and Co. at the work-gates on Tuesday.

Sunderland.—The branch was addressed in the Station Coffee Tavern on Friday by Donald, comrade Black in the chair. Open-air meetings were addressed on Friday night and Sunday afternoon at the Garrison Field. John Armstrong, 6 Westberry St., sec. pro. tem.

South Shields.—A lecture was delivered on Tuesday last in Lockhart's Cocoa Room by Donald. A good deal of discussion followed. Open-air meetings were addressed in the Market Place on Tuesday and Sunday nights. Mr. Darley also addressed the Sunday meetings. Collection made. Mrs. Besant lectured on behalf of the Secular Society on Sunday morning on "Why I preach Socialism." J. Wood, 105 Bath St.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

Arrangements have been made for carrying on an extensive and vigorous propaganda in the eastern counties and forming branches. Mahon began the campaign on Saturday at Loanhead, where a good and attentive crowd of miners gathered to hear our views. There were some interruptions, which were stopped by several of the audience voluntarily ejecting the disturbers. Take also addressed the meeting.

Edinburgh.—On Sunday three very successful meetings were held—in the afternoon on the Calton Hill, at 6.30 in the Queen's Park, at 7.30 at the Mound. The new station at the Mound has proved a great success, nearly 900 people gathering at the first meeting. A good collection for the propaganda fund was made in the Queen's Park. Report of the Freshire meetings next week.—JOHN GILRAY, secretary.

NOTES.

MR. WALTER BESANT, as hon. treasurer of the Working Women's Conference, is appealing to people in general to give him information as to the wages and conditions of life of working women. The result of this may be useful, or it may not be. In the first place it will be useless if the information is not thoroughly genuine, if it is allowed to be influenced by the spirit that often creeps into such collections of "information": the spirit that tries to create the impression that things are not very bad, and that even if they are bad they can easily be altered for the better a little, and that—there, that will do.

But supposing a great deal of genuine information gathered and published; what will be the use of it, and to whom will it be useful? It will be absolutely no use unless it is used, so far as it goes, for the purpose of putting both sexes of workpeople into a totally different position from their present one. And under those circumstances it is hard to see how it can be useful to any but those who are striving to change the basis of society, to make all women working-women, and not force either marriage or prostitution on any of them as a profession—in other words, to free labour from the tyranny of monopoly. Those people who are trying to do this are usually called Socialists, and I fear that Mr. Besant can hardly be classed as one of these, in spite of his apparently genuine sympathy with the joys and troubles of working people.

Apart from those middle-class persons who have had the good luck to be convinced of the truths of Socialism and are actually working for it, I have met with two kinds amongst persons of good will to the popular cause: first, persons of very strong and marked advanced opinions who are so far from thinking that the holding of such opinions involves any sort of action on their part, that they rather (or indeed very much) plume themselves on their superiority over those who act on their opinions, whatever they may be;—of course, such persons are desperate pessimists. The other kind are persons whose opinions are not very advanced, but have a sort of idea that they should act upon them, such as they are, and will undertake cheerfully any little job that may turn up, from total abstinence to electioneering, with a cheerful confidence in the usefulness of their work: but all the while they have not even faced the question as to the necessity of changing the basis of society; they suppose that the present system contains in itself everything that is necessary to cure the evils which they are to some extent conscious of; and indeed some of them are very anxious to stave off the radical change which Socialism proposes by exhibiting the said evils in course of being cured by—well, I must say it—rose-water.

I know this latter group of well-disposed middle-class people exists, and I rather think Mr. Walter Besant belongs to it. If I wrong him by so thinking I shall be glad to be convinced to the contrary. And meantime this group of people may yield converts to Socialism when they have found out by practical experience that the evils they are good-temperedly attacking are not accidents of the present system but essential to it. Then they may make up their minds to attack the system itself.

☞ Till within the last few years St. Alban's Abbey used to be one of the most interesting of the historical monuments of England; not because it was the longest church in the world, nor even altogether because it comprised some of the most beautiful work of the most perfect period of architecture, but also because all kinds of varied historical interest centred in its site and building. Partly built of materials from Verulam, it became in the early part of the Middle Ages the refuge and home of the chroniclers of the time. Some of the most interesting and heart-stirring passages in the Peasants' War, that outburst of Mediaeval Communism, took place around it. It witnessed two of the battles of the Wars of the Roses, the second of which was the bloodiest of all; and till within the last few years, though it had suffered some indignities, was still the stout and beautiful old building that had seen so many dramas played round about it. It is not too much to say that it stood in the homely Hertfordshire fields one of the wonders of the world.

☞ Well, to-day it has been deprived of most of its beauty and two-thirds of its historical interest. How and why? Insurrections, battles, changes of religion, had left it pretty much unhurt; but the damage they couldn't do has been done quite lately by such a thing as a common parliamentary lawyer, a cleverish vulgar man, once called Sir Edmund Becket, now Lord Grimsthorpe, who coveted the glory of "restoring" this ancient monument; and although the ruin he proposed to make of it was disapproved of by most of those who had the guardianship of this piece of public property, all opposition went down before the shaking of his money-bag, and 'tis all done, or on the point of being all done; and the whim of a parliamentary lawyer has proved to be more destructive than miller Grindecobbe's bills and bows, than Henry the Eighth's greedy barons, or Cromwell's lobster-tails! Truly the money-bag has more to answer for than the destruction of works of art and monuments of history; yet the wantonness and irremediable character of this kind of destruction, joined with the preposterous vulgarity of the instrument of it, makes it hard to bear.

WM. MORRIS.

LABOUR FEDERATION.

ONE of the best indications of the progress of the labour movement is the growing feeling amongst trades-unionists for a federation of all workers. This feeling is vague and unsettled just now, but it is very widespread and it is growing stronger. The trades-union leaders who occasionally speak in favour of it do nothing to carry it out; indeed it is plain that with their narrow spirit and inability to move out of the accustomed rut, they are really afraid of it and want to see it smothered. But in spite of this the mass of the workmen feel more and more strongly that a closer bond of union should exist amongst them, and that the interests of the workers in all trades and in all lands are much the same.

This means a good deal to the Socialists. Everything that shows a growing feeling of solidarity amongst the wage-slaves is in the right direction. The labour struggle has always been weakened by petty jealousies, splits, and contradictions amongst the workmen. In the past it has been difficult to get the men of one trade to agree to act together against the capitalist and impossible to get several trades to co-operate. This is passing away. The miners see one district after another go on strike and get beaten. While the miners of Northumberland were being starved into submission, the miners of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Derbyshire, Durham, Wales, and Scotland, were producing extra coal to supply the market. The capitalists are a helpless lot in themselves, a mere nothing against the workmen; but they generally get the best of it, because they play off one part of the working-men against the other. It was not the mine-owners who beat the miners of Northumberland in the late struggle. It was their fellow-miners elsewhere. The miners see this now and so far as Northumberland is concerned, they will leave no stone unturned in preparing to present a solid and organised front to their employers in the next fight. Coal is essential to every other industry in the country, and were the men thoroughly combined they could compel society to render up their rights or dislocate the whole system by temporarily stopping production.

The great benefit of labour federation must be apparent to every workman who knows anything of the present crisis in the labour organisations. The Socialists have preached it for a long time. The efforts of Karl Marx to weld the working-men of all countries into an international union though unsuccessful (chiefly because the times were not ripe) are full of interesting lessons which no friend of labour can afford to neglect. But as the trades-unionists got their first lesson in labour federation from the Socialists they would do well to learn it thoroughly. A federation of all workers merely to force a rise of wages would be useless. If that were its only object it could only appeal to one section of the working-class, it would never raise the universal enthusiasm and fervid devotion that a great popular cause must have behind it, and for these two reasons it would be easily smashed up by the capitalists and their catspaw the Government. Even if it conquered all these difficulties, however, it would still be cheated out of its object. If the capitalists could not resist a rise of wages they could force a rise of prices and get back in one way what they were compelled to yield in another. Let us say that to-day the average wage is 20s. per week and the average cost of living 17s. In three years a Labour Federation well enough organised to stop production in a few industries (say coal, iron and cotton) for one week, might force a general rise of 50 per cent in wages. The average wage would then be 30s. per week. But the traders could immediately raise prices 50 per cent, and then the cost of living would be 27s. The benefit therefore would be a bogus one.

Labour Federation to be effective must mean Socialism—that is, the abolition of the capitalist class. The miners, engineers, fishermen, weavers, etc., must train themselves for the purpose of actually seizing upon the mines, factories, shipping, railways, etc., and carrying on production for the common benefit of all the people. This must become the declared object of the labour movement. This means labour emancipation. Everything in the direction of it is in the right. Everything that stops short of it is a delusion and a waste of effort.

By thoroughly educating the workmen on this subject and pushing forward the laggard leaders of trades-unionism, Socialists will be at once forwarding their own cause and winning the gratitude of the workers for the practical help they are rendering in the labour struggle.

INHUMAN ARITHMETIC.

It must however be allowed that the arrangements of the deity are very faulty, by which society is burdened with three or four useless women and children for every male machine who works. Bungling as his system is, yet society by the use of faculties which cannot have been given by so bad a political economist as he obviously is, has seen how to amend it. If these useless beings can live on 3d. a-day, it is criminal to allow them 6d. a-day. It only enables them to indulge the fancies planted in them by the aforesaid bad political economist, and it is a direct temptation to luxury and waste: it leads indeed to riot and debauchery very unbecoming in well-conducted Monsters and Digestive Bags. If, then, the whole population, man, woman, and child, are thus transformed, and if society allows each of them 6d. a-day, they are being dealt with most generously; they have more than sufficient to support life comfortably. The difference between the 6d. allowance and the truly necessary 3d. will by proper thrift suffice to give them some of the highest pleasures and most ennobling relaxations in life; can they not often view our magnificent commerce from the deck of a penny steamer? or spend a holiday in greeting their most gracious Queen and Empress as she comes to open the Stock Exchange or a new Palace? or if they wish for quiet enjoyment, can they not take a penny dose of Liberal or Tory sentiment on Parliament and the divorce courts, and glow with pleasure at the missionary energy which shows itself as readily in the evangelisation of two or three blacks, as in the sending of three or four thousand of them at one bang to the next world? But it must be allowed that thrift is by no means their strong point, and that, as McCulloch says, they are more given to tobacco than to tea, and are only too apt to turn aside to pleasures of a lower kind. As to their thrift, do they not marry in a reckless way, without first enquiring of the professors whether their calculations show that it is possible to make any more sixpenny, or even threepenny, allowances to wasteful children and porridge-eaters. And the way they haunt the gin-shops, instead of building coffee-palaces for themselves, is dreadful. A careful study leads us to the hope that by reducing the allowance to 3d. a-day, and by closing both museums and gin shops on Sundays, they may be induced to go where bishops and other society prophets may impress upon them the salutary tale, which can never be too often repeated, of the hell-fire which awaits the thriftless, and all mutinous Monsters who show discontent with the allowance thought sufficient by the Professors of Inhuman Arithmetic.

The great majority of people are, I think, naturally benevolent—Socialists in heart, if they only knew it, but with minds cramped by the petty teachings of the cliques into which we are divided. Charity, that is sympathy, is not to be expressed in money. There is no more horrible characteristic of the times than the fetishes, shibboleths and formalities, which keep class penned apart from class, and put the sham of money-subscriptions in the place of that mutual rendering of help which it is as natural for man to give, as it is for man to need. When once a class is started on the path of pretence, they are lost to all sense of shame. It is only in this way that we can excuse the noise and self-glorification of the People of Position over what they call their charity. This money-charity of theirs comes to very little. Take the Mansion House Fund of the year 1886. It was intended to relieve the dire distress of London in the winter of 1885-86. When the Registrar General reports, as he often does, that 30 or 40 people more than the average have died in London, in some unusually cold and rainy winter week, he says it comes from "diseases of the respiratory organs." True, and that means destitution, half-starvation, wet feet and scanty clothing, endured not for a week, or month, or year, but from childhood to the end. For this distress, after an immense stir and clamour, there was collected by the middle of 1886 the sum of about £80,000. After this, to quote the newspapers, "the money ceased to come in." There was no evidence that the distress had ceased to exist. But the novelty had worn off, and the temporary excitement had vanished like that of a worked-out bazaar.

It is difficult to estimate in London the genuine workers, the place being crammed with the flunkies, servants, and hangers-on of every description, who wait upon the Loafers and Wasters of society. But the poor zero Machines and their incumbrances cannot be under a million. Even 3d. a-day for each of these would mount to £12,500. So that the fund would, even at this rate, be exhausted in rather less than a week. What a picture of charity! Here are the orthodox wasters and guzzlers, lolling in idleness, gorged with meat and wine every day of their lives; and under their eyes are the despair and misery of the millions, whose ceaseless toil provides those luxuries. They mock at the despair, they grumble at the nuisance that the misery of others is to them, and they subscribe enough to give three-penny-worth of starvation relief for about a week to each of "the poor devils."

Again, the classified 'Directory of Metropolitan Charities' puts the income in 1885 of bible societies and missions, of hospitals, orphanages and reformatory institutions of every kind in the metropolitan circle, at four and a half million pounds. The population of the circle is about five and a half millions. It is very doubtful how many of these institutions can be called charitable; a large portion of the total income, moreover, comes from the rent of land and similar sources, and can in no sense be considered as due to the charity of the present generation. Taking the total, however, as it stands, and allowing that the same rate of contributions for similar purposes goes on all over these islands, where we have a population of thirty-five millions, we should arrive at a total of thirty million pounds as the national contribution under the name of charity. This is probably far beyond the actual sum; and whatever that actual sum may be, all evidence goes to show that very large portions of it go towards comfortable stipends to secretaries and other officials.

And what does this money-charity come to? The rich idlers and wasters, and the comfortable shopkeeper class in general, draw a thousand millions a year, and the above most liberal calculation gives thirty millions as the sum total of their charity. Out of every £100 which the poor zero machines grind out for the idlers, these return less than £3—not in charity—no, but in mending their damaged machines, in oiling and greasing them, to the end that they may go on again with their grinding.

It is not the genuine feeling of human sympathy, it is not charity that can be satisfied by that which lies before our eyes, as the result of all this ceaseless toil. The adult male average machine produces each year stuff which can be sold for £150, and has to be stoked at 6d. a day, or about £10 a year! Three women and children to each adult monster, mere encumbrances on his usefulness, and continually distracting his attention from his proper work, cannot justly claim more than 3d. a day each. But as they are idle and improvident, this necessary allowance is increased under the name of charity to the same figure, 6d. a-day, as the adult monster gets. These burdens on Society, therefore, raise the total annual allowance to £40, which has to be made out of the £150 produced by each adult machine. Instead, therefore, of the full sum, our professors can only reckon on £110 from one out of four of the whole population of the United Kingdom, i.e., on £110 from each of about 9,000,000 persons.

And what becomes of this vast sum of £1,000,000,000? It belongs to the orthodox wasters, to the professors of inhuman arithmetic, and to their assistants, the bishops, the managers of orthodox starvation-benevolence, and of money-charity in general. It is a reward for their skill in improving the commonplace arithmetic of position, as invented by the poor Hindoos and other ancient peoples, who were content to live with their wealth in common, and who used their art to count bags of wheat or flocks of sheep. A splendid reward is due to professors, who have shown that the art could easily be adapted to conditions however extraordinary, and, indeed, that by it a delightful society of castes and classes might be arranged, wherein a man, though no doubt in one sense a unit, a mere figure 1, may yet be raised by the change of his position, and by the labour of a number of mere zero average machines, to the higher level of a ten, a thousand, or a million. In this improved system a man is born or steps into a high position, by having below him a number of the mere zero class; he is counted as being of a higher position, the more of this worthless class that are under him.

(To be concluded?).

POSITIVISM AND SOCIALISM.

(Concluded from p. 243.)

The Socialist would argue that all men come into the world endowed with certain faculties, and that they are all equally useful to society, each in his place. If it is said that many come only capable of mere hand labour, and only a few capable of being good engineers, doctors, or scientific investigators, we may reply that society needs them in that proportion, needs many bricklayers for one architect, many labourers all through to one doctor or scientist, and if we had to do without either class, we should be least able to spare the hand labourer. If society see to the education of these, each for what he seems best fitted, we do not see that there is any just reason why the rarer abilities should get paid more highly; we say that they each fill their place and are each entitled to their share of the general result of the community's labour. If there is any difference it should be in favour of the most unpleasant occupations. Probably these could best be recompensed by letting them work for shorter hours. If any, by reason of their occupation, require greater sustenance or more expensive surroundings in any way, this should be taken into account, in short the ideal towards which the Socialist works is "From each according to his ability, to each according to his needs"; let each help the community as he best can, and as there will be enough for all we hope that each will be able to take what he needs. This is the ideal towards which we work, and I maintain that in working towards this we have a much more rational system than the Positivist who leaves it to be settled partly by each getting what he can and partly by each keeping what his conscience will let him.

We now come to the ground which is common to the Positivists and a large section of outsiders, namely, the general belief that the employers are able and will soon be willing to give better terms to their working people. I have alluded above to the probability of the employers coming to be content with less, I will only here remind people who build up hopes in this direction that apart from direct action of self interest there is the indirect action which makes us see things from our point of view only, and this often in spite of the very best intentions; how many Socialists or others who happen to hold a middle position, having an employer over them and perhaps servants under them, look at things with the same feelings in both relations! The employer refuses a holiday, we will say, and we think what a mean set these employers are, they care nothing for their men; next week the servant asks us for a night out, which is not quite convenient, and we refuse, how unreasonable these servants are, they always want to go out just when it is inconvenient. The employer cannot see the real side of the worker, he exaggerates the worker's carelessness, indolence, and all the rest of it, and thinks he gets what he is worth; and this no good intentions and no love for the common good can quite get over.

But for the sake of argument let us grant that the Positivists and others have persuaded all the employers that they ought to think of their men first, that they ought to receive a small share themselves in order that they would be able to pay higher wages; even if we grant all this Positivism would still be far from having solved the social question. Competition would spoil it all. Here is a capitalist who is only just making ends meet, sometimes he is losing, and there are numbers in that fix now; how is he to raise the wages of his men? But if he does not raise his wages and his more successful rival does, his men will strike and he will have to shut up. Competition will simply rage more keenly, bringing even more confusion than at present. For the smaller the margin left for profit the greater the tendency to cut out the less successful men and add to the success of the most successful. If there is a profit of 20 per cent. for the successful, the less successful can still do if he makes 5. But if the most successful only keeps for himself 1 per cent. how can the less successful pay the same wages and exist? It would result in greater concentration into few hands, and those would be constantly shifting, causing no end of confusion and misery to the workers, who are starving, while things are righting themselves after each upset. Nor can it be urged that there would certainly be a gain in putting more work into the hands of the most successful, for it by no means follows that it is the inferior qualities of goods which pay least, or that the most successful man produces the best article. The difference often merely consists in a greater or less competitive faculty, a greater or less ability to take advantage of every one and be taken advantage of by none.

I maintain that with the best intentions in the world it would be absolutely impossible for the employers to do well for their men while they are engaged in warfare with all their competitors. Nothing but the organisation of industry on a basis of co-operation, and the entire abolition of the competitive system, could enable employers to do fairly by their men, and if any Positivists seek to organise industry and to give to the workers the full share they are entitled to, they are seeking Socialism and not Positivism.

To organise industry on a co-operative basis is not a light task, none know this better than the Socialists; but if it can be shown, as I think it can, that while we keep the present basis of competition no alteration, no reform, and no amount of good intentions can save society from an inevitable break up sooner or later, brought on by the necessary results of the system—if this, I say, can be shown, then surely it is no answer to the only proposition which deals with the root of the question, to say that it is difficult to see how we can put it in practice. It was difficult, in ancient days, to see how society could be made to exist without slaves, so difficult that the wisest of ancients thought it impossible, but it has been done. And so will organisation of industry be done, and if we fail to do it we shall be wiped out from the face of the earth, as many ancient civilisations were which could not solve the social problems of their day. Let us rather face all difficulties bravely, having faith to believe that there is always a way to put justice and truth into practice, if we can only find it. If we face the difficulties manfully many will vanish, and we shall look back and wonder how wise men in the nineteenth century held that it was impossible for a community to live except by internal strife.

RAYMOND UNWIN.

WHY WE ORGANISE.—Many men joining labour organisations ask themselves the question: "What good is it to me? Can I make anything out of it?" To all such the answer is "No." If you enter it in that spirit, you will be disappointed, and you had better remain outside. The proper spirit in which to enter a labour organisation is with these questions on the lips: "Of what good can I be to it? Of what good is it to humanity?" If you have a desire of personal advancement, pecuniary benefit, or a vain ambition to achieve, you are not fitted to join the ranks of the workers who are labouring for the best interests of their fellows. Anyone who expects to receive a financial benefit as soon as they join a labour organisation is ignorant of the purpose for which labour is organised, and needs educating. Labour is organised not to confer direct benefits upon the individual members of the organisations only, but to elevate and benefit the working classes as a body, and this result has been largely attained during the last few years. Organisation is the only power that will lead to the emancipation of the toilers. Concentration of wealth is the power of the capitalists; the organisation of labour the force of the workingmen.—(Quoted from the Commonwealth.)

LEIPSIC, 1845.

BY FERDINAND FREILIGRATH WHEN AN EXILE IN SWITZERLAND.

TRANSLATED BY J. L. JOYNES.

SHE came across the lake in widow's weed
Of folded crape, as is her wont, like death:
The willow bowed before her, and the reed
Was shaken at the passing of her breath.
I saw her come through mist and gathered gloom,
And at my desk I sat me down to write;
Her shadowy form was present in the room,
And darkly loomed upon my awe-struck sight.

"I am the Night of St. Bartholomew;
My feet are blood-stained, veiled in cloud my head:
Again at bidding of a princely crew
Fresh victims have been added to my dead.

"Ha! how the roofs were rolled in murky cloud
That night of blood three centuries ago,
When from his window firing on the crowd
The famous Charles had leant him forward low!
Yea thence—most Christian king that e'er was crowned—
He hounded on the scoundrels in his pay,
Till foully murdered on the reeking ground
The noblest Huguenots in their hundreds lay.

I am the Night, etc.

"Less blood to-day than then the slayer sheds;
'Yet' screamed the grape-shot hurtling o'er the scene,
'The victims fall—what matters counting heads?
All's one if thirteen hundred or thirteen.'
The triggers snapped when princes gave the word;
A cry of ruth went up from all mankind;
The people shrieking fled; the hirelings heard,
And shot them down like cowards from behind.

I am the Night, etc.

"Their foes forsooth have said, 'It served them right!
What reason had the rascals to rebel?
How dared the knaves resist us in our might,
And smash the royal chandeliers as well?
All honest folk to righteous wrath were stirred:
What! the glass rattled on the ground like rain!
It may be. But I never yet have heard
That men must mend with blood a broken pane!

I am the Night, etc.

"They had already fled! Yet though they fly,
The grape-shot overtakes them as they go.
Yes, flying folk and helpless passers-by
The royal troops with royal lead lay low.
Face downward there a woman and a child
Lie dead—O sight to make the heart-strings ache!
Why clench thy fist in helpless fury wild,
Thou homeless poet by the fair Swiss lake?

I am the Night, etc.

"What should I tell thee of the funeral weeds?
The Dead March sounds; its deep-toned notes complain;
Slowly from every house of woe proceeds
A coffin'd corpse, dark banners in its train.
Black-robed the mourners follow like a flood;
In every eye the starting tears are seen;
No more shall Leipsic lose the stain of blood,
Nor aught avail to wash her pavement clean!

I am the Night, etc.

"Man hath a voice: the midnight should be dumb!
And yet I cry aloud, Shall nought atone?
Upon man's head the ancient curses come;
The fault is with the faith of kings alone.
O German land, wilt always hug thy chain?
What cruel wrong thy faiths and kings have done!
And wilt thou still a helpless child remain,
Nor let one link be loosed from thee—not one?

I am the Night, etc.

"Yet here no scoff beside the up-turned sod!
Quench thy soul's thirst at thine own sacred spring.
Hew out as best thou may'st thy way to God—
Yet if to God, what wilt thou with a king?
Nay, wake! Bethink thee of that royal wight
Who shot his subjects down in ancient time!
Farewell! I go to haunt the Priests to-night,
Fit heirs of those who fathered first my crime!

I am the Night of St. Bartholomew;
My feet are blood-stained, veiled in cloud my head:
Again at bidding of a princely crew
Fresh victims have been added to my dead."

A SOCIALIST PARLIAMENT.—In the Charing Cross Parliamentary Debating Society the Socialists are so numerous that they have had to form a ministry. H. H. Champion is prime minister, Mrs. Annie Besant home secretary, George Bernard Shaw president of the Local Government Board, Sidney Webb chancellor of the exchequer, Hubert Bland secretary for foreign affairs, and Stewart Headlam secretary for Ireland. The other ministers are F. Podmore, Graham Wallas, G. W. Allen, E. Fanning Gye, Sidney Olivier, and Harold Cox. Mrs. Wardle and W. H. Utley are secretaries to the treasury, and from them any further information may be obtained.

BOURGEOIS VERSUS SOCIALIST.

WITHOUT wishing to carry on the debate any further which has been going on in the Commonweal between comrade Bax and Mr. Bradlaugh, it is natural that we should print a few words on it, as it is clear that there must have been a good many words said on the subject.

In the last paper, Mr. Bradlaugh complains that there has been no real debate on the question Will Socialism benefit the English people? Perhaps after all this is likely to be the case in all so-called debates where the disputants differ as to principle: clearly they must take some things for granted or they would stick fast from the first. This debate is now the third I have noticed carefully, and in all the three the disputants on either side, though in all cases very able persons, seemed, so to say, to find it hard to get at each other and strike the big stroke. However, one thing they can do and should do, if they are to claim any success; each may at least state what his position is; and though this is specially incumbent on the one who takes the affirmative or positive side, yet even the one who takes the negative side must not be so wholly negative as not to show the basis of his objections: he must not be a mere objector, but must object on principle.

Now it seems to me that in this debate our friend Bax has stated his position quite clearly, and to every one not prepared from the first to pick holes in his statement, quite unmistakably. Mr. Bradlaugh, on the other hand, has done nothing but make objections, some of them merely verbal and frivolous, others rather what I should call debaters' objections—the sort of thing which catches cheers in an oral debate; and some, no doubt, the objections of the kind which naturally occur to a person prejudiced against a change in the basis of society. Bax has been under the disadvantage of having in his second paper to follow Mr. Bradlaugh through the whole string of questions which he thought proper to put, so that his restatement of his position had to be deferred to his last paper, which was somewhat languidly replied to by Mr. Bradlaugh; of whom in truth I fear it must be said that he does not take much interest in the whole subject. In fact throughout he has not really been attacking Socialism, but rather has been desperately defending a statement which he stumbled on in his anxiety to be considered "practical," that there may be or is an essential difference in the economic basis of life between the various countries that make up civilisation; and he has also been fighting against the admission that modern production compels the aggregation of capital. It is hardly worth while arguing seriously against either of these queer pieces of perversity; but it is really strange to find a man of ability who has not been struck by the international character of modern capitalism, and who cannot grasp the argument that if capitalism is international, the foe that threatens it, the system which is put forward to take its place, must be international also. As to the other point, which, though not an essential one for the general argument, Mr. Bradlaugh defends very stoutly and returns to more than once, the denial of the tendency toward the aggregation of capital under our present system, what can one say but that it is one of the commonplaces of the day that competition forces people to produce cheaply, and that you can only produce cheaply by producing on a large scale? Anybody who doubts this and has money to throw away had better try it in practice—as I have done. Mr. Bradlaugh in his last paper taunts Bax with not being able to bring more instances of this generally admitted fact; I may perhaps be allowed to give another, as coming under my own notice. Textile printing used to be done wholly by means of blocks on long tables, and there used to be a great many small businesses of this kind, employing down to as few as ten or a dozen men; but when the cylinder machine was perfected, and a man and two boys at one machine could do the work of 200 blockers and their attendant "tearers," these businesses had to shut up, as they could not find work for even one machine. Again, in my small business I am obliged to refrain from doing certain kinds of weaving I should like to do because my capital can't compass a power-loom. But really there is no need to multiply examples to prove what is patent: one can only stand aghast at Mr. Bradlaugh's hardihood in denial.

In short, Mr. Bradlaugh thinks Socialism an unpractical matter, and therefore cannot bring his mind to bear upon it sufficiently to conceive of it. He has not even tried to understand what Socialists mean by monopoly, and says, though rather guardedly, that he sees no class in the country which has the monopoly of the means of production. Again, one can only say that if he were a manual workman he would soon find out whether he could work for his livelihood without paying the tribute demanded by the monopolist; nor would he be long in doubt as to the fact that his master was not an individual but a class, when he sets to work to try how much more reward he could get for his labour from Peter than he could from Paul.

It is a pity that Mr. Bradlaugh will not try to understand his Socialist opponents, but in this matter he acts pretty much as the ordinary bourgeois does, and shows the usual persistency in reading incidents characteristic of the present condition of things into the future. At the bottom of all this lies, not, it may be, a want of information as to the mere facts of history, but an entire incapacity of understanding their significance and their continuity; in short, a practical denial of the doctrine of evolution. To persons of this turn of mind the class struggle in the past is nothing more than a confused contest, with no steady, though often unconscious, aim in it; to such persons at some arbitrary point determined by the interest, prejudice, or taste of the individual, all that contest comes to an end, and Society, which has been ever changing through so many thousands of years, is at last stable, though it lacks no element of revolution which the last epoch of change had, but holds them all, possibly changed in form but certainly not in essence. To such persons it is a kind of theological proposition that the status of Society consists of a great middle-class with an unnecessary encumbrance above it in the shape of the aristocracy, and a necessary encumbrance below it in the shape of a proletariat. The presence of the workers cannot be wholly denied, because they are there before our eyes, weaving, metal-working, building, and the rest of it; but they are not looked upon as a class with common interests, which force them to act together even against their wills, but as a series of accidents; they are a mere collection of potential middle-class persons, or failures from the middle-class.

And what is to be done with these abnormal persons? That is not a question which presses for solution, think our friends who sustain the orthodox holiness of bourgeoisdom. To reduce the numbers of the successive generations of them, and to raise the wages of those that would be left—that were good if it could be done, but it doesn't much matter, because, whether or no, Society is stable on its present basis (established by the Reform Bill of 1832).

It is true that some glorious but dim vision floats before the eyes of these "practical" persons of a time when the whole of these accidental misfortunes in a human form shall, by the exercise of thrift and Malthusianism, be absorbed into the great middle-class, cleared by that time of its upper encumbrance, and a bourgeois paradise will supervene, in which every one will be free to exploit—but there will be no one to exploit. How the great middle-class will then live, deponents say not; but the setters forth of this doctrine are happy in the fact that their Socialist opponents are not in the habit of asking them many questions as to their Society of the future. On the whole, one must suppose that the type of it would be that town (surely in America and in the neighbourhood of Mark Twain) that I have heard of, whose inhabitants lived by taking in each other's washing.

SOCIALISM FROM THE ROOT UP.

CHAPTER XXI.

SCIENTIFIC SOCIALISM: CONCLUSION.

MARX now goes on to trace the development of the capitalist in the present epoch, indicating the latest phase of the class-struggle; he points out the strife of the workman with the machine, the intensification of labour due to the constant improvement of machinery, etc. He then gives what may be called a history and analysis of the Factory Acts, the legislation to which the employing class found themselves compelled, in order to make it possible for the "free" workman to live under his new conditions of competition; in order, in short, to keep the industrial society founded by the machine revolution from falling to pieces almost as soon as it was established.

The point of the intensification of labour is so important that it demands a word or two in passing; the gist of the matter as put forward by Marx resolves itself into this: As the organisation of production progresses towards perfection, the wear and tear of the workman in a given space of labour-time is increased; and this is true of the organisation of the division of labour period, only it is limited by the fact that the man himself is the machine, and no such limitation exists in the period of fully developed machinery, in which the workman is an adjunct of the machine, which latter dictates to its supplement, the workman, in its constant craving for increasing productivity, the amount of wear and tear of his body in each hour's work. This emphasizes as plainly as possible the subjection of the man to the machine.

Marx also deals with theory of compensation to the workman displaced by machinery; that is, the common view, that by the labour-saving of machinery, which at first sight would seem to tend to the lessening of the number of men employed, more capital is set free for employment.

But, says Marx: "Suppose a capitalist to employ 100 workmen at £30 a-year each in a carpet factory. The variable capital annually laid out amounts therefore to £3,000. Suppose also that he discharges 50 of his workmen, and employs the remaining 50 with machinery that costs him £1,500. To simplify matters we take no account of buildings, coal, etc. Further, suppose that the raw material annually consumed costs £3,000 both before and after the change. Is any capital set free by this metamorphosis? Before the change the total sum of £6,000 consisted half of constant, half of variable, capital. The variable capital, instead of being one-half is only one-quarter of the total capital. Instead of being set free a part of the capital is here locked up in such a way as to cease to be employed in labour-power; variable has been changed into constant capital. Other things remaining unchanged, the capital of £6,000 can in future employ no more than 50 men. With each improvement in machinery, it will employ fewer."¹

And again: "The labourers when driven out of the workshop by the machinery, are thrown upon the labour-market, and there add to the number of workmen at the disposal of the capitalists. In Part VII. of this book it will be seen that this effect of machinery, which as we have seen, is represented to be a compensation to the working-class, is on the contrary a most frightful scourge. For the present, I will only say this: The labourers that are thrown out of work in any branch of industry, can no doubt seek for employment in some other branch. If they find it, and thus renew the bond between them and the means of subsistence, this takes place only by the intermediary of a new and additional capital that is seeking investment; not at all by the intermediary of the capital that formerly employed them, and was afterwards converted into machinery."

The remainder of this Part V. of Marx deals with various questions connected with the great industry, and the changes produced by it on Society. Part VI. deals with the transformation of the value or price of labour-power into wages; with time wages, price wages, and the national difference of wages. Part VII. deals with the important subject of the accumulation of capital: First, with its simple reproduction, afterwards with the conversion of surplus value itself back into capital, and with the transition of the laws of property, that characterise the production of commodities into the laws of capitalistic appropriation. This part also contains a sarcastic refutation of the now exploded stupidity (scarcely to be called a theory) of "abstinence" as the source of capital; it also deals with the old wages-fund theory and other fallacies of bourgeois economy. This part concludes with a long and elaborate chapter on the general law of capitalistic accumulation in its various aspects. The last Part (XIII.) treats of the so-called primitive accumulation, of which Marx says: "This primitive accumulation plays in political economy about the same part as original sin in theology. Adam bit the apple, and thereupon sin fell upon the human race. Its origin is supposed to be explained when it is told as an anecdote of the past. In times long gone by there were two sorts of people, one, the diligent, intelligent, and, above all, frugal élite; the other, lazy rascals, spending their substance and more in riotous living. The legend of theological original sin tells us certainly how man is to be condemned to eat his bread in the sweat of his brow; but the history of economic original sin reveals to us that there are people to whom this is by no means essential. Never mind! Thus it came to pass that the former sort accumulated wealth, and the latter sort had at last nothing to sell except their own skins. And from this original sin dates the poverty of the great majority, that, despite all its labour, has up to now nothing to sell but itself, and the wealth of the few that increases constantly although they have long ceased to work. . . . In actual history it is notorious that conquest, enslavement, robbery, murder, briefly force, play the great part. In the tender annals of Political Economy, the idyllic reigns from time immemorial. Right and "labour" were from all time the sole means of enrichment, the present year of course always excepted. As a matter of fact, the methods of primitive accumulation are anything but idyllic."

Marx then proceeds to give an instance of one important form of "Primitive Accumulation," the expropriation of the peasants from the land, taking affairs in England as a type of this idyllic proceeding; as also the legislation at the close of the Middle Ages against vagrants, etc., that is, those who had been expropriated; and, besides, the enactments for the forcing down of wages. He then describes the birth of the capitalist farmer of modern times, and the reaction of the agricultural revolution on the town industry; the creation of the home-market for industrial capital, etc. A chapter follows on the historical tendency of capitalistic accumulation to work out its own contradiction; it becomes necessary to quote a passage here as it bears reference to the future of Society: "The capitalist mode of appropriation, the result of the capitalist mode of production, produces capitalist private property. This is the first negation of individual private property, as founded on the labour of the proprietor. But capitalistic production begets with the inexorability of a law of Nature its own negation. It is the negation of negation. This does not re-establish private property for the producer, but gives him individual property based on the acquisitions of the capitalistic era; i.e., on co-operation, and the possession in common of the land and of the means of production. The transformation of scattered private property, arising from individual labour,¹ into capitalistic private property, is naturally a procession comparably more protracted violent, and difficult, than the transformation of capitalistic private property, already practically resting on socialised production, into socialised property. In the former case we had the expropriation of the mass of the people by a few usurpers; in the latter, we have the expropriation of a few usurpers by the mass of the people."

A chapter on the modern theory of colonisation concludes the book, which it must always be remembered is but the first volume (in the original German issue) of a book intended to cover three volumes, but which, nevertheless, as a criticism of capitalistic production may be treated in most respects as an independent whole.

E. BELFORT BAX and WILLIAM MORRIS.

Arrest of Fred Henderson at Norwich.

On Wednesday 27th July Lord Salisbury visited Norwich and held a large meeting on the Agricultural Hall Plain. As a counter demonstration, a meeting was held in the Market-place to protest against the policy of coercion. At this meeting Michael McCarten, M.P. for South Down, spoke at some length. Seeing that the resolutions were purely condemnatory of coercion and did not put forward a merely political alternative to the Tory policy, our comrades resolved to support them, and Fred Henderson spoke. The meeting, a very large one indeed, was intensely Socialistic in feeling, and, except as to the Irish member, gave our comrade by far the heartiest greeting of the evening. Again when another speaker wished the meeting to show "their enemies that Norwich workmen were Radical," he was at once interrupted by cries of "Socialist," and when he asked what it was that Socialists wanted that Radicalism could not give, received a storm of answers.

The meeting concluded with three tremendous cheers for the social revolution, called for by Henderson, who asked the audience to go to the Agricultural Hall Plain, right in front of where Salisbury was indulging in coercion ravings. The crowd went down London Street cheering, and reached the Plain (a recognised open-air station). Henderson took up a stand under the lamp, intending to hold a meeting, when the mounted policemen on duty rode through the crowd at the speaker and ordered him to desist or he would ride him down. Seeing that this unwarrantable interference with the right of public meeting was exciting the anger of the crowd, Henderson called out, "No violence. Give three groans for Salisbury." Right heartily the crowd responded to this appeal, and then the mounted police, driving to and fro amongst the people, created a disturbance, and tried to excite the people to riot. One constable, No. 40, named Mills, excelled in brutality all the others, and seemed to be animated with a desire to show the public what a miserable ruffian he was. He galloped his horse at full speed along the crowded path, knocking several people down, and, with his fellows, tried to separate Henderson from the rest. They succeeded in this at last, and arrested our comrade in most brutal fashion, Mills striking him severely about the head. Having secured him between their horses they galloped to the station, and Henderson had to pass the night in the cells, charged with riotous conduct. Needless to say, the charge utterly fell through, and the magistrates next morning discharged our comrade without hearing a witness on our side, recognising at once the insufficiency of the police evidence. We are glad to hear that the matter is being taken up, and an inquiry into the conduct of the police will be instituted.

"Of all the instruments of the farmer's trade, the labour of man . . . is that on which he is most to rely for the repayment of his capital. The other two—the working stock of the cattle, and the . . . carts, ploughs, spades, and so forth—without a given portion of the first, are nothing at all."—Burke.

¹ It is important not to misunderstand this phrase as used here. The labour of the Middle Ages, though individual from its mechanical side, was from its moral side quite definitely dominated by the principle of association: as we have seen, the "master" of that period was but a delegate of the Gild.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

Humber & Co., Beeston, near Nottingham, discharged fifty workmen last Saturday, slackness of orders being reason given.

The joiners in the Middlesborough shipyards have struck for an advance in wages.

BOLTON—FORTHCOMING TRADES' DEMONSTRATION.—The strike committee of the men now on strike in the engineering trades are organising a monster trade demonstration to take place on the 13th August. All trade societies in the district, as well as neighbouring towns, will be invited to join, and the proceedings will be on an elaborate scale.

Considering there has been no strike or lock-out of any magnitude or duration in the Midlands for several years, the position of the workers is such as to call for the gravest consideration. In both the coal and iron trades scarcely a week passes but some works are closed. There are thousands of men who have no employment whatever, and those who have situations are not doing more than half time, the rule being considerably less than that, and with constantly diminishing wages to boot. Such are the conditions under which Midland coal and iron workers are trying to establish strong unions, with a view to remedying some of their grievances.—Labour Tribune.

THE CHAINMAKERS' STRIKE.—An evening paper thus reports:—"The long strike of the chainmakers at Cradley Heath still drags on, and this week—being the fifty-second week of the strike—it has lasted just one year. The men seem as united and determined as ever, but, unfortunately, also, the masters seem equally determined to withstand the demands of the men. The sad condition under which the work is carried on, and the employment of women and children in this rough trade, surrounds this strike with peculiar circumstances, and makes it all the more pitiable that it should drag on to such a length. At one of the last meetings of the men it was, however, determined to carry on the strike still further." Since the above, news comes to hand that the operatives in the employ of twelve firms have resumed work at the advanced rates.

IRON AND STEEL WORKERS' CONFERENCE.—A conference of the Associated Iron and Steel Workers of Great Britain opened its sittings on Monday. Delegates were present from Bilston, Wolverhampton, West Bromwich, Walsall, Wigan, Bolton, Parkgate, and other centres of the iron trade in Staffordshire, South Yorkshire, Lancashire, and the North of England. The organisation is a new one, which aims at uniting the whole of the iron-workers of the country in one union, and it was practically constituted at a conference held at Manchester in April last. Since that conference draft rules have been considered in the various branches, and proposals concerning them will be submitted. The districts which have formed branches represent about 40,000 iron-workers, and already from 7000 to 8000 actual members have been enrolled.

STRIKE OF WEAVERS.—A strike of the weavers employed at Messrs. Newsome, West, and Co.'s, Staincliffe, near Dewsbury, has taken place, and over 200 of them are out. It is alleged that the fine imposed upon the workpeople for bad workmanship is the cause of the dispute. No settlement has taken place between Messrs. Bracewell and Sons, Barnoldswick, and their weavers, who are still out on strike from Butts and Wellhouse Sheds, nor does there seem to be any probability of the dispute being settled as yet. The majority of the weavers employed by the other firms in the town have signed the "round robin," and their notices may be served upon the masters at any time if they do not pay the Burnley list. All the masters have received a letter from the secretary of the Northern Counties Weavers' Association, stating that a deputation from the association was quite willing to meet the masters in order to discuss the present state of wages, but no meeting has taken place.

MIDLAND RAILWAY LOCOMOTIVE SERVANTS.—MEETING IN NOTTINGHAM.—THREATENED STRIKE.—A circular was recently issued by the directors of the Midland Railway giving notice to the enginemen and firemen of the locomotive department of their intention to change the basis of payment for time off duty. At present the men, whether called on duty or not, are paid their week's wages, but by the proposed new rule the directors do not guarantee a full week's wage unless the man has been on duty the whole of the week, and this notwithstanding that they require him to be in readiness at any moment to go on duty. With the new regulations and conditions the men are extremely dissatisfied, and both in London and the provinces meetings have been held to consider what steps shall be taken. They feel that, as the company require them to be at their call fifteen hours out of the twenty-four daily, their ordinary week's wages should in fairness continue to be guaranteed to them as now, because during those hours they are practically in the company's service, and dare not undertake any other employment. In Nottingham, not less than in other towns, there has been great excitement amongst the men, and a strong determination to resist the new rules. On Sunday, a meeting of the men was held at the Assembly Rooms, Low-pavement, to consider their course of action. There was a very large attendance, upwards of 200 being present. A long discussion took place on the new rules, the speakers being unanimous in their desire that stern resistance should be offered to the company's proposals. Ultimately a resolution was submitted that they stand out against the rules, and that if the notices which had been issued were not withdrawn, to cease work at midnight on the 4th inst. This resolution was unanimously adopted. About three-fourths of the men are unionists, and if they come out on strike will be supported by the funds of their society. The non-unionists, however, are not less hearty in the decisive step which has been taken than the rest of their fellow-servants, and at all costs are determined to withstand their employers. A great deal of sympathy is felt for the men in their struggle, and we are informed that one or two of the directors are strongly opposed to the changes which the directors propose. It is believed, however, among the men that if they stand firm the directors will withdraw the notices. We understand that under the new rules the men will be paid as follows:—Engine-drivers: First six months, 5s. 6d. per day; second six months, 6s. 6d. per day; next four years, 7s.; full pay, 7s. 6d. per day. Firemen: First twelve months, 3s. 6d. per day; afterwards, 4s.; when passed, 4s. 6d. per day.

BOLTON ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—On Wednesday 27th ult. great excitement prevailed in Bolton owing to the arrival from Birmingham of nineteen men to take the places of those on strike from Messrs. Dobson and Barlow's Kay Street Machine Works. The new men were conducted to an omnibus in waiting, in the presence of a great crowd, and were escorted by mounted and foot police to their destination. Many persons followed the party, and on the return of the vehicle some stones were thrown, one of which smashed a bus window. Shortly before midnight on Tuesday, four imported workmen arrived in Bolton, and were conveyed in a cab, guarded by police, to Messrs. Wood's Victoria Foundry. There was no disturbance. On Wednesday one of the men left the works, it is said, and appeared before the strike committee. Four of the imported men appeared before the strike committee on Thursday, and returned home. One man, who had entered the town the previous day only, said he had done very well out of it, having had 1½ lb. of steak, four pints of beer, and some tobacco. It is estimated that over 200 imported hands are at present lodged and fed in the foundries, in addition to nearly an equal number of policemen. A number of fussy individuals are trying to humbug the men into arbitration, which so far they have very properly declined. Some disappointment has been created in the town, owing to the mayor having refused to call, in answer to a requisition signed by over a thousand ratepayers, a town's meeting to consider the advisability of dispensing with the services of the county police and the military at present in the borough. He would not promise that the military and police should be sent away nor would he do anything in this direction till he could see a different state of things in Bolton. In spite of the mayor's refusal, a public meeting of ratepayers will be held. A meeting of magistrates was held on Thursday, when it was resolved by a large majority that the police and military be kept in the town for the present. It is understood that the mayor refused to answer for the peace of the borough if the precautions against disturbances were in any way relaxed. On Thursday five persons were charged at the Town Hall with offences arising from the existing strike. Three women were summoned for creating a breach of the peace on Sunday by hooting at the vicar of Holy Trinity Church (the Rev. C. Lowe) while he was leaving the Soho Ironworks after conducting divine worship for the "rats" and the police there. The reverend gentleman was followed by a crowd of about 800 persons, and had to have police protection. Defendants were called upon to find two sureties for three months or go to jail for one month. Two men were charged with a similar offence during the arrival of imported hands, and were ordered to find sureties for six months, with the alternative of a month in prison. The funds of the strike hands continue to swell, there being a larger balance this week end than at any time since the dispute commenced.

STRIKE OF DOCK-LABOURERS IN LIMERICK.—Thursday, 28th ult.—The great excitement which prevailed this evening when it became known that a body of men had come from Waterford to assist in the discharging of the Clyde and Limerick and Liverpool boats has just (10.45 p.m.) resulted in a riot, attended with bloodshed. The labourers on strike, accompanied by some three or four thousand persons, and bearing a lighted tar-barrel, the playing of a band drawing contingents from all directions, proceeded down the quays. Passing the Arranmore, one of the Clyde vessels, there was tremendous hissing and groaning at the men engaged in discharging the boat. The police, with loaded rifles, kept the people back. A volley of stones was then thrown, the police being hit with several of the missiles. It was feared that the constabulary would retaliate by firing on the crowd, as they were too few in number to charge the dense mass. District Inspector Jennings, however, kept his men well under control, and after a while the people moved on towards the dock where the Ardnault, belonging to the Limerick and Liverpool Company, on which the strike commenced, was being unloaded. The police followed in their wake, and when the near end of the docks had been reached Mr. Jennings placed a number of armed constables in charge of the entrance. By this time the multitude of people had gone round to the south side of the dock, so as to get as close as possible to the Ardnault. When opposite the vessel excitement rose to fever heat, and stone-throwing commenced immediately. But for the intervening wall the crowd would have burst in on the vessel, but, being unable to do this, they poured stones in large quantities on the boat. The noise of the falling missiles, the smashing of the glass roof of the shed near the vessel, and the general confusion tended to increase the fury of the mob. After the stone-throwing had continued for fully half an hour the police rushed out and charged. Several men were instantly placed hors de combat, and blood besmeared the ground. Two labourers had their skulls fractured and were carried off in an insensible condition. Mr. Jennings, head-constable Wall, and sergeant Whelan were struck, and constable White received such injuries that he had to be conveyed to hospital. The main body fled, and for a time there was general consternation. When the police dispersed the people they withdrew, but the crowd reassembled, and further stones were thrown. Friday evening.—The mayor and Mr. J. B. Irwin, R.M., were sent for, and arrived about half-past eleven with a strong force of police, and dispersed the people. The Waterford men worked at the ship all through the night, but struck work at ten this morning, alleging that they had been brought from Waterford under misrepresentations. They demand to be sent back at once. The city magistrates, the mayor presiding, held a meeting this afternoon, and agreed, by a majority, to ask for a force of one hundred extra constables to be drafted into the borough until the present strike has been settled. Bands are also to be warned against playing in the city at night, and this prohibition is to be strictly enforced, and notices sent to the different bands that it will apply until revoked by the magistrate. Some labourers brought from Tralee to-day to replace the others on strike refused to work, and the Ardnault steamship is now lying at the quays without any one to discharge her cargo.

If it is a crime to be in earnest, then I am a criminal. If it is villainy to esteem the lives and welfare of human beings at a higher value than lifeless property, then I am a villain. If it is treason to despise, denounce, and oppose the systems by which the workers are subjected to and robbed by the idlers and extortioners, then I am a traitor.—RADICAL JACK in Chicago Labour Enquirer.

There are many men who join labour organisations merely to have the name of being members and who have not the remotest notion of fulfilling any duties, who, once initiated, never go near the organisation. Such men are worse than "scabs"; they desire to have the credit of being members and any advantages that may accrue, and yet are unwilling to take their part in securing those advantages. No man is in any proper sense of the word a member of a labour organisation unless he takes some interest in it and some part in the business of it. A man who keeps out altogether is bad enough, yet he can at least claim an honest purpose, but the man who hypocritically joins, that he may secure the benefits, and is yet unwilling to share any of the work is beneath contempt. Such men are traitors to their fellows and traitors to the cause.—Canadian Workman.

"CONCERNING USURY."

Mr. T. S. Barrett fears that "the repeal of all laws guaranteeing the collection of usury" would not "abolish usury so long as there are rich men wishing to lend for profit and poor men desiring to borrow."

Possibly he is right. Theft is penal yet there are thieves. Still the experiment is obviously well worth trying and, should it prove to be inefficacious for the reason assigned by Mr. Barrett—viz., that usurers would evade the law by exacting interest in advance and then suing for the principal, the next step to take would be to render loans themselves irrecoverable by legal process.

I have long held that it is contrary to the public interest that a lender should enjoy any other security than the simple good faith of the borrower. If you don't like this, don't lend.

J. MORRISON DAVIDSON.

LITERARY NOTICES.

'English Misrule in Ireland' (Swan Sonnenschein, 1s.), by A. J. Dadson is called "a short sketch," and a very short one it is. Indeed, it could not be otherwise in less than 150 8vo pages of large type, and that loaded. It is correctly done, "so far as it goes," but the unfortunate need of covering so much ground in so small a space gives rise to a general impression of scamper and skip. There is really a very great deal of information in it, but (to use an Irish expression) it is rather the makeings of a book than one in itself.

'England's Ideal' (Swan Sonnenschein, 1s.), by Edward Carpenter, takes its title from the first of the nine papers on social subjects of which it is a collection. Some of them have already been noticed in these columns; all of them deserve notice; it would be hard to speak too well of them. For those, and they are many in these days, who feel ill at ease; their material prosperity failing to satisfy their demand for a fuller life; their vague unsatisfied longings turning in many vain directions; there could scarce be healthier reading than these papers. We that are Socialists already may read them with a great deal of pleasure; everything is put so freshly, soberly, and, not least, neatly.

'Jottings from Jail,' by the Rev. J. W. Horsley, late and last chaplain of H.M. prison, Clerkenwell (Fisher Unwin, 2nd ed., 3s. 6d.). This book is a collection of articles that have appeared in many places, upon the manifold experiences of a ten-years prison chaplaincy. Good-hearted always, wrong-headed sometimes, but even then with an earnestness and honesty that are propitiative. So few folk are ever in so favourable a position for examining the human wastes of our delightful system, that even so scrappy and sketchy a book as this is a boon. Were the time or other requisites not wanting to Mr. Horsley for the working out of the subject in due fulness, the book might be one to make its mark. Even now, as is proved by a second edition being necessary, it is being read; but most of the really terrible indictments of modern procedure lose great part of their effect from the way in which they are told. Take for instance the damning fact as to the effects of work-house training upon girls. It is enough, well put, one would think, to blow the present arrangements to the four winds; but as it is, it will be passed by the vast majority of readers without its full significance being seen.

'How the Classes Rule the Masses,' by T. R. Threlfall, the ex-president of Trades Union Congress (Heywood, 1d.), is an excellent and readable addition to the list of Socialist pamphlets. It is a successful endeavour to show that the belief extensively prevailing among the masses is well founded, that the "classes" have monopolised law-making as all things else, and have looked to their own profit exclusively. The various interests are gone through, and in each the same process shown at work. Our comrade is right in calling for a labour party to set the matter right, but opinions differ very much as to the wisdom of encumbering the new party with the antiquated paraphernalia of Parliamentarism.—S.

'WEALTH AND POVERTY.'—Socialists who are familiar with French should look up a series of articles in the Revolte, entitled 'La Richesse et la Misère,' of which the article in the current number (continued from recent issues) contains a good description of the situation of the peasantry in the agricultural parts of different countries. Dealing with the South of Europe chiefly, the writer points out the bitter contrast between the luxuriance and fertility of the richest Italian provinces and the degradation and misery of their inhabitants; remarking truly that bad as the condition of the workers on the soil is in the malaria-stricken districts, it is far worse in the healthy regions such as Lombardy. An account of the method of exploiting the rural population of the southern districts is quoted from F. Lenormant, who has penetrated South Italy in every part, in his 'La Grande Grèce.' He describes the districts in which, in the cleaning out of the ditches of the marshy fields, women, girls, and children are employed instead of beasts to carry on their heads the baskets of mud which has thus laboriously to be cleared out of the fosses. These "beasts of burthen" are literally soaked beneath the mud that oozes forth from the ill-joined osiers on to their heads and garments. Looking upon womenkind merely as a thing of a certain utility in the economy of nature (which it is the affectation of many "advanced thinkers" to do), what a race of stalwart, deep-chested men we may hope to see reared by these misery-stricken creatures!

AN ERROR CORRECTED.—Our friends of the Humanitas office have kindly called our attention to an erroneous statement in the literary notices of the number of the Commonweal issued July 23rd. In a note on the publications of Humanitas we said that F. S. Merlino was the author of a pamphlet called the 'Alleanza Anarchica Internazionale,' whereas the authorship is attributable to several writers on the staff of Humanitas and not to our comrade Merlino.—M.

A hundred years ago the world as we know it was scarcely dreamt of. At that date Marat was a veterinary surgeon at the royal mews in Versailles, Danton and Robespierre were obscure provincial lawyers, Murat was about to enter a religious order, Ney was eking out a scanty existence as a copyist, and Bonaparte himself was only second lieutenant of bombardiers of Autun in Regiment de la Père. France lay basking in security, expecting that to-morrow would be as this day and even more abundant. But that to-morrow brought with it a social thunderstorm, and when the war-clouds rolled away, as they did not until about the time when our Queen Victoria was born, Europe as we know it had begun to think and live.—Christian Million.

REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday, July 28th, the monthly business meeting was held, and was adjourned to the following Thursday. Afterwards the deputation from the Council was received.—U.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, July 27, Eleanor Marx-Aveling lectured on "The Woman Question." Brisk discussion followed. On Sunday, July 31, a good open-air meeting was held on the Green, addressed by Somerville, Blundell, Dalziel, and Brooks. In our hall, a successful "social" was held by Blundell and friends, after open-air meeting. T. E. Wardle lectured on "The Franchise Fraud," at the "Three Kings," Clerkenwell, on same evening. Altogether very good work is being done in this district by a small knot of active workers; will others come forward and assist? Literature has steady sale.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—A good meeting on Wednesday, July 27, at the Broadway, London Fields, addressed by H. A. Barker and James Allman. Fair sale of Commonweal. On Sunday evening, in our club-room, we had a free concert, which was largely attended by members of the local Radical clubs.—J. F.

HOXTON.—Last Sunday evening, H. A. Barker addressed an outdoor meeting opposite Hoxton church, and was attentively listened to by a good audience, who warmly applauded at the finish. In the morning a large meeting was also held, addressed by H. A. Barker and J. Pope. Literature sold well.—C. J. Y.

MARYLEBONE.—We held our usual meeting in Hyde Park on Sunday afternoon, addressed by Bartlett, Brooks, and Mainwaring. The audience seemed well in accord with what our comrades had to say. Good sale of Commonweal.

MILE END.—On Sunday, very good meeting in Victoria Park, addressed by Davis and Westwood. Commonweal sold well.—W. M.

NORTH LONDON.—On Tuesday evening, July 26, a discussion was held at Ossulton Street, between Wardle and a well-known Conservative, on "Agricultural Depression." As the proceedings were interrupted by a heavy shower of rain, it was decided to resume the discussion on the following Tuesday. The usual meeting took place in Regent's Park last Sunday, addressed by Brookes and Nicoll. Collected 5s. 5½d. for the Strike Fund.—H. B.

IRSWICH.—On Sunday, two large and interesting meetings were addressed by H. H. Sparling, of London, both of which appeared to make an unusually good impression. At the one in the afternoon some questioning and a lively discussion followed, the principal opposition coming from an editor, who admitted the social evils but despaired of any remedy for them. He had lived long enough to grow thoroughly disgusted with the political tomfoolery of parties, and he thought on the ground of sociology, as expounded by Spencer, we had a hopeless task before us. He was well answered by Sparling, much to the satisfaction of the audience.—J. R.

NORWICH.—Saturday good meeting at Yarmouth, Henderson and another speaking; Sunday large meeting was held in Norwich Market Place, Turner (of London) in chair, Henderson and Cantwell spoke; in evening a much larger meeting than usual was held on the Agricultural Hall Plain, owing to our insisting upon the right of holding our usual meeting, in spite of the arrest of Henderson for the very same thing on Wednesday last, meeting addressed by Cantwell, Henderson, and Turner; at the Gordon Hall, Cantwell lectured to a large audience, subject "No Master," which was well received and frequently applauded; Turner, who was chairman, took part, also Henderson. Literature sold well. Collected for Propaganda Fund, 15s. 3d.—A. S.

WALSALL.—On Monday evening last, H. Sanders opened meeting in the Market Place, Dudley, but was at once requested by the police to desist, as they had orders to prevent any further meetings being held. On enquiry we found that this new regulation had already been visited on the Salvation Army and Church Army, and we therefore moved on to "Porter's Field," where Sanders and Weaver addressed a fair audience, and at the close several new members were enrolled. On Thursday night we had a large gathering in the Market Place, Wednesbury, addressed by A. K. Donald, Weaver, and Sanders. Good progress was made, and a number of questions put at close of the meeting were satisfactorily disposed of by Donald. On Saturday, we had a large audience at Walsall, Sanders spoke.—J. T. D.

CLAY CROSS.—A good meeting was held on Tuesday evening, July 26th, at the Angel Inn, addressed by Haslam, Cree, and Unwin. A motion approving the purpose of forming a local Socialist Society was carried unanimously. Lester was appointed secretary; a treasurer and committee were also elected. A meeting will be held next week to draw up rules and adopt a programme; it is probable that the programme of the Durham miners will be chosen. The miners at Clay Cross have been for some time in a bad way, and have recently been subjected to additional reductions and injustices. They are getting fully alive to the necessity of abolishing private property in the means of production.—R. U.

DUBLIN.—At the weekly meeting of the Labour League, on Thursday, July 28th, Fitzpatrick delivered the first of a series of lectures on the "Rights of Labour" before a very good audience, the bourgeoisie element being fairly represented. He traced the condition of the labourers from the time of Henry VIII. to the present; sketched the rise and progress of trades' unionism, showing the causes of its comparative success in the past, and of its inability to hold its own at present, and completely demolished the nostrums of the temperance and thrift advocates, and of the political reformers. Keegan and Hall also spoke. This was the most successful indoor meeting that has been held here for a long time.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—On Sunday, July 24, a meeting was held at Rotherham, sympathising with the men on strike against a reduction of wages. We had a very good and successful meeting. On Monday, a very good meeting in Bramhall Lane, Sheffield. During the summer months we have several times been to this place, where there is no doubt we are making many study the question of Socialism.—M. A. M.

SOCIALIST UNION (NOTTINGHAM SECTION).—On Thursday, July 28, Proctor lectured in our club-room, subject "What is Socialism?" A short and interesting discussion followed. These lectures are to continue every Thursday evening, with a view of educating our members and friends, and bringing out new speakers for propaganda. Peacock, who has not been well for some time, is away recruiting his health in Scotland. His return home as a valuable and active worker in the cause is anxiously looked for at the end of this week.—T. P.

WOOLWICH.—At the Arsenal Gates, last Sunday, R. Banner addressed a large gathering of people, and at the close of the meeting collected 6s., which will be handed over to the Metropolitan Radical Federation as a contribution towards the expenses of their Irish delegation. Literature again sold out.—R. B.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

A meeting of the Edinburgh branch was held on Thursday, at which the officers of the branch were rearranged, preparations made for opening up new ground at Broxburn and district, and resuming the work at Leith. J. L. Mahon was appointed Organising Secretary of the League. Meetings held during the week as follows:

Hawick.—New ground was opened here last week. A very large audience of workmen attended Mahon's meeting and heartily sympathised with the speech. A good collection and sale of literature was made, and a number of names given in to form a branch. There was no opposition.

Galashiels.—The meeting announced for last Tuesday could not be held in consequence of the rain. It was agreed amongst those who did come out in spite of the rain to adjourn till next Tuesday. A few friends were consulted, and arrangements for a good meeting for the following week were made.

Dunfermline.—On Wednesday July 27 a very large and successful meeting was held in the public park. After Mahon's address comrade Peacock of Nottingham, who was on a bicycling tour, also spoke, and being a native of the locality was well received. No opposition and sale of literature and collection satisfactory. A large number of men from the Forth Bridge works attended.

Cowdenbeath.—This is the largest mining village in Fifeshire, and the first Socialist meeting was regarded with some interest. The miners turned out in good force, and listened with close attention to Mahon's exposition of the aims of Socialism. They all seemed well impressed, and arranged another meeting for the following week. There was some slight opposition. Collection and sale of literature good.

Kirkcaldy.—The town bellman boycotted the Socialists and nearly spoiled the meeting. This impudent official, with the conceit of a lord and the impudence of a footman, insolently refused to announce the meeting. However, a few people were got together, who listened with interest to a short address, bought some literature, and promised to help to make the next meeting a thorough success. A miner from Dysart also attended the meeting and arranged for Mahon to address his fellow-workmen on the following Monday.

Loanhead.—No meeting held, on account of Trades' Holidays.

Burntisland.—A meeting of the shale-miners now on strike was held in the football field on Saturday afternoon last. A great number of the men had left the district, but all who had not done so attended and seemed in thorough agreement with the Socialist principles and policy as laid down in the speeches of Mahon, Davidson, and Donaldson. No collection was made, as the men were on strike, but there was a good sale of literature.

Broxburn.—Tuke and Smith went out on Saturday night, addressed a sympathetic meeting, and arranged for Mahon's visit. A good quantity of literature was given away.

Leith.—Hossack and Mahon addressed a meeting on Sunday morning, and arranged for regular meetings to be held in future.

Edinburgh.—Meetings on Carlton Hill and Mound had to be abandoned owing to the rain. A fairly large meeting was held in Queen's Park, at which Smith, Mahon, and Tuke spoke. Good collection made at the close. CHAS. WM. TUKE, sec.

NOTES.

The hot words and straightforward quarrelling which took place at the miners' gala on July 31st at Blyth Links, were not more than might have been expected from our downright brethren of the north. Some people will be lamenting the appearance of disunion amongst a most important body of workers after a defeat in an ordinary labour struggle. But it is rather a matter of certainty than of hope that there is more at the bottom of it than that. That the indignation of the more thoughtful of the men at the "soft-fighting" of their leaders shows a gathering determination for real union founded on a complete sense of the fact that the interests of all workers are the same, and that workers, organisations cannot stop short at merely fighting a matter of wages in the passing day; but must aim at the one thing worth aiming at, a condition of things in which the workers should control their own affairs, and not as now pay the heavy price of slavery to the employers for managing matters for them.

Mr. Fenwick who (very naturally certainly) seems to have got very angry at the attacks made on him, and who attacked our comrade Mahon in turn, got much mixed up in talking on Socialism. He seemed to feel that a defence of the capitalists as masters was not likely to be well-received by such an audience, so he attempted the defence of capital by enrolling the workers also in the capitalist army on the grounds of their invested savings. This sort of thing catches those who do not understand (as probably Mr. Fenwick himself doesn't) that it is the individualistic capital itself and not the holders of it, that is the enemy we are fighting against. The working classes by the practice of "thrift," which to a man who knows what the life of an honest man, duly contributing his share of labour to the world should be, is horrible even to think of, manage to save a little money, which under the present system they are compelled to "invest," that is, to hand over to be used by the very monopoly which prevents them from managing their own affairs.

The capital earned by the labour of the working-classes will not be taken away from them; on the contrary, it will be resumed by them. Each man will not have a special portion of it to call his own, i.e., to have the power of preventing other people from using it; but each person will have the full share that he needs for developing his powers of producing wealth in concert with his fellows—that is, he will have as much of the means of production as he can use. Which means in other words that not only he need no longer have a scanty livelihood won by over-toil, but also that his livelihood will be no longer precarious. "Thrift" in the sense in which that much abused word is used, meaning saving, will be transferred from the individual to the community.

In short, instead of the chance which Mr. Fenwick offers to the workers as bait to them to hook themselves on to capitalism—the chance, viz., of becoming owners of a very very small share of the privilege to make people pay for the right of working, Socialism offers to every one of them his full share of all that he needs in order to work like a man and live like a man.

There is an interesting article in the current number of the Contemporary on the Great Depression in Trade, by Mr. Wells, which is well worth the attention of a Socialist. Beginning by pointing out what a serious blow the opening of the Suez Canal was to the warehousing business of England, he goes on to show the great "displacement" of human labour which has taken place during the last ten or twelve years, owing to the rapid strides towards the perfecting of machinery which has been forced on civilisation by the competition of the world-market. The facts he gives tend to show that the last decade has introduced a new revolution in industry (a new phase in its evolution, to speak more correctly) approaching in importance to that of the introduction of modern machinery itself, the phase of the perfecting of machinery and the acquirement of the knowledge of its full commercial use.

Mr. Wells is a cheerful specimen of the commercial optimist, and does not trouble himself with the consequences of this new phase, except to sing in an undertone, as it were, a quiet hymn on the enormous cheapening of wares that is resulting from it. But a Socialist will be inclined to ask him, "How long do you think you can prevent those that do work and those that could work if you would allow them, from sharing in these advantages? For if you the monopolist owners of the civilised world are so incapable of organising the labour whose fruits you are so jubilant over, that there are vast numbers of unemployed and starving people in civilised countries, and a far vaster number much below anything approaching to a reasonable standard of well-being, amidst all this so easily created wealth, then the facts condemn you as incapable to carry affairs on much longer, and you and your monopoly are hastening to an end."

One other Socialist deduction from such facts. The pace of the march towards the change in the basis of society is increasing decade by decade; if we are not prepared to deal with the crisis when it comes, we shall make but a sorry job of "the morrow of the revolution." Surely we ought to make no delay in doing our very utmost in getting the workers to see their real position, and as a consequence uniting together in a great and inclusive federation of labour which should form a new society under the old dying one with its parliaments and artificial "laws"—a new society which would form habits of thought and action that would be "laws" indeed without being called so, and which would take the place of the old society of monopoly and usurpation naturally and surely, whether that takes place with or without a dramatically obvious crisis.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

MEN WHO ARE NOT SOCIALISTS.

II.

MR. JOHN HOPE occupied an office next door to the one in which I served my apprenticeship. He was a man of some 45 or 50 years, of a robust and somewhat intellectual appearance; and although, at the time referred to, his business—that of a commission agent—was apparently not of a very lucrative order, yet he was esteemed in the neighbourhood as being a man of some ability.

I observed that he generally invited his customers to a restaurant over the way, and that he invariably issued therefrom engaged in what appeared to be a political or religious discussion, as he seldom liberated his friends' hands with a final hearty wring until he had imparted half an hour's speech to them on the pavement. I learnt that he devoted some attention to spiritualism, and that he was a devout believer in phrenology.

I frequently met him on the stair, and although I was but a lad he always gave me a friendly nod as he passed. This circumstance induced me to form a favourable opinion of Mr. Hope, for I esteemed his taking notice of me as due to his detecting in my youthful physiognomy indications of that early genius which, I was then secretly convinced, I possessed in a marked degree.

My esteem for Mr. Hope was greatly increased by an incident that occurred. One day, coming into the office in which I was employed, to borrow a measuring tape, and my master happening to be out, he asked permission to "read my bumps." My heart fluttered, and I tremulously wondered whether he would pronounce me to be a coming great poet or the future founder of a new school of philosophy—my mind at that time not being quite made up as to which of those high intellectual altitudes my genius was most gifted to ascend; although, having read the life of Shelley, I had a humble confidence that I might achieve equal distinction in either or in both.

After a lengthened topographical survey of my cranium with his fingers, he said: "Well, my laddie, you've rather a strange kind of a head; its not like anybody else's that I've felt before, and I'm somewhat puzzled with it. Some parts are like my son James', and he's a young man of great promise. You're high in the crown—the bump of veneration—a grand sign in young folks; you've a capital crop of hair too, and the outside thatch is often not a bad indication of the folk you'll meet with inside the house." This deliverance pleased me; for although he did not tell me point-blank that I was a prodigy, I set the omission down either to his imperfect skill or his fear of ministering to my youthful vanity.

Some time afterwards, Mr. Hope removed his place of business, and I heard little of him for several years. One day, however, I noticed in the newspapers that he had successfully sued a railway company for some £1,500 as compensation for injuries received in a collision on the company's lines. I subsequently learnt that his injuries had in no way interfered with his ability (after the suit was settled) to perform his commercial duties. Indeed, the railway collision appeared to be but a rude method which fortune had taken of apprising him of her favour, for soon afterwards he started several sons in business, purchased a villa in a suburban village, and became known as a successful City man.

I renewed my acquaintance with Mr. Hope about the beginning of the present year, a friend introducing me to him in a restaurant. My friend, who knew him well through business intercourse, informed me that he was very popular in the little town where he resided. He was chairman of the local literary society, and a member of the School Board. Mr. Hope, together with two lawyers, a doctor, a butcher, a retired publican, and an M.P. clergyman, had constituted themselves a kind of non-official committee of public safety in the village. Their meetings—at which they sat in judgment upon local scandals, and swayed as with an unseen sceptre the destinies of all local appointments and institutions—were held in a tavern; and when it was found necessary to prolong their deliberations beyond the authorised hours the sergeant of police was invited to form one of quorum, and thus fortified with the visible presence of law and order by their side, they continued their conferences without fear of reproach till an early hour in the morning.

Mr Hope did not recognise me on my being introduced to him, and when my friend informed him that I was a Socialist, he exclaimed, "Ah! I was once a Socialist myself,—but I found Socialism a dream—a mere dream!" "Is he a bit of a poet?" he musingly enquired of my friend. My friend replied that he did not think I was guilty in that respect. (My friend has only a superficial acquaintance with my literary habits; besides, he is rather a dull sort of fellow.) "Not a poet?" Mr. Hope replied. "Hem! Mr. Bradlaugh, you know, has divided Socialists into two classes—poets and fools—and your friend I am sure does not belong to the latter category." Here Mr. Hope laughed cheerily. "Explain," he said, addressing me, "what you mean by Socialism." I did so in a brief way. "It will never do—never, I assure you!" he exclaimed. "You don't understand the world—you don't know human nature as I do." Then he added, "Don't misunderstand me; I am a Socialist myself—a true Socialist. I have every sympathy with your ideal, but I don't believe in equality, I believe in the survival of the fittest. Have you ever read Darwin?" I replied that I had, and that I accepted his theory. "You have not understood him, then. Listen." And here Mr. Hope entered into a lengthy history of his own career. He had been a miner, had turned mechanic, had worked abroad, had managed by native talent and industry to acquire a little fortune, had set up his sons in business, married two of his daughters well. "And now," he demanded, triumphantly, after bringing his career up to date (omitting, however, any reference to the railway accident affair), "what about your equality now? how does your Socialism apply to my case?" I replied that genius and special ability on the one hand, and stupidity and indolence on the other, were the product of conditions anterior to and outside the individual, and that an equality of such conditions, which Socialism would certainly do much to attain, would tend to make men much more equal, physically and mentally, than they now were. "You have mentioned genius," he interrupted, "speak to me about that; what have you to say about some men having genius and others none? I am interested on the point; I have a son— But never mind—go on." I went on, and favoured him with some deep ethnological, physiological, sociological views on the subject (I rather pride myself upon my ability in this respect) while he listened with impatience,—which, I regret to say, even some of my Socialist friends exhibit when I get "under way" on this subject.

Before I had concluded, Mr. Hope, who, with manifest bad taste had been glancing at an evening newspaper, which had just been brought in, rose suddenly from his seat, and bringing his clenched fist down on the table with a bang, exclaimed, "The damned scoundrels!" "Who? what?" my friend and I asked at once. "Who?" he shouted in quite a wonderful passion, "those lazy, drunken, good-for-nothing miners! Why, I gave £5 to their Strike Committee, and it appears, forsooth! they were threatening to strike the villas on the hill in my village last night!—injure their best friends, the people who have maintained them for weeks! Bah! don't talk to me of Socialism, sir! That is Socialism—robbery, outrage, murder! Socialism, ha! ha!" Here Mr. Hope sat down and laughed derisively. I told Mr. Hope that I thought he was too excited to discuss Socialism calmly—a very obvious statement of fact—and I suggested that we might have another round of toddy (another is a very serviceable adjective!). "No, sir!" he cried, "I would not take whiskey from you, if you are a Socialist! I would not drink with a Socialist! I am going away!" My friend here interposed. He asked Mr. Hope to remember that everybody was not as able as Mr. Hope to grasp the subtleties of such questions. Men, as Mr. Hope himself had remarked, had different mental capacities: was it any wonder, then, that they came to different conclusions? He was quite sure that if his friend had the advantage of a few further discussions with Mr. Hope he would no doubt modify some of his opinions. The wrath disappeared from Mr. Hope's countenance like mists before a mid-day sun, and he insisted on being allowed to pay for the next round himself. He then told a few funny stories, the telling of which still further improved his humour; and on bidding me good-bye he shook my hand heartily, saying, "After all, I like to meet a young man with strange notions; it shows he has some brains. I had strange notions myself when I was young. Good-bye; I hope I shall meet you again."

"At the barricades?"

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

INHUMAN ARITHMETIC.

THE Professors, to avoid long phrases, state it briefly that according to his position, a man has the right to the work, i.e., a right to the £110 a year produced by each one of it may be 10, or 100, or 1,000 of these zeroes. In other words the man of position is a moneyed man with the right to £1,000, £10,000, or £1,000,000 a-year, and he is esteemed accordingly. It is his position which settles the amount of money to which the professors give him the right, so that money is a convenient measure of his position. Our motto is "Money makes the man," that is the men of position; the rest are Average Machines and mere Digestive Bags, not entitled to be called men at all; nor on this system can their women and children claim to be human beings.

This surely cannot be the aim of the toil of the people. Such a result cannot be consciously aimed at. It is a mere mechanical result, most mean and scanty, miserable for all, both rich and poor. It is scanty because the system degrades us to machines, of which one half undoes what the other half puts together. It is miserable for all because men are not machines, though chained to act like machines, and more miserable still because the thing is all out of joint and distorted.

The great fault of our Inhuman Arithmetic is that it thus counts men as parts of machines, and as influencing each other like the wheels of a clock, but not otherwise. It assumes that in everything one and one make two, or that twice one is two, propositions axiomatically true if the elements taken together do not affect each other, but very misleading if applied in other cases. We can scarcely deal with the most elementary kinds of matter without seeing this. Salt, for example, taken in a moderate quantity is an important article of food, but if ten times as much is taken it ceases to be food and becomes a violent poison.

A man at work by himself does a certain amount. If we take two men they will not do twice as much, the amount will depend upon whether they are friendly together, and whether their capacities are properly related. Otherwise, they may do together less than either separately, half their time being wasted in attempts to damage each other, or in using tools unfit for the work. One man or one horse dragging at a waggon may not be able to move it at all. If there are two men or horses, there may be and will be more wasted toil but no more result, unless they pull together. Then, indeed, they may move the waggon and do useful work. One rainy day may do good, while two would make a disastrous flood. The fact is that twice a thing may be infinitely more or infinitely less than a single unit, so far as its effects are concerned. It is so in life universally. In the most important thing of all, more important than food and shelter, the single unit can do nothing, nothing I mean in deriving happiness from his work. It is the fellowship of society, even of two, the working together and in union, which produces infinitely more than mere material wealth, and brings that without which the material results are almost worthless.

Inhuman Arithmetic, however, continues to reckon that the man of position, who gets £1,000 a-year out of the labourer is twice as good as one who only gets £500. It never asks itself the question, Why is he better? or, Why is he better off? £1,000 will not buy twice as much happiness for a man as £500. It is true that in our system the ideas are very base, and are mostly limited to the purchase of frippery, and to eating and drinking. But a man with £1,000 cannot eat twice as much as one with £500, and even if he could he would not get twice as much happiness. Nor is he likely to do twice as much good. Quite the contrary, for Inhuman Arithmetic shows his fellow-men to him as mere machines, who are fully satisfied (or ought to be so) with their 6d. a-day. The man, therefore, in the higher position has nothing else to do but to lay field to field, and house to house, and gold to gold. He spends his time in guarding these from trespass; he condemns himself, so to speak, to solitary confinement. Poor wretch; but even he is human, for he thinks to do a good to others when he leaves the rest of his substance to his babes. He does as he is told, and is ignorant of the legends of Midas and Scrooge.

As the rich men count their money and their houses and have no joy in them, so they count the poor zero workers as beings incapable of pleasure, and as mere machines fitted to turn out as much stuff as possible with the least consumption of fuel, and "when past work" to be thrown aside as so many leaky kettles. Machines have no rights, fuel being only supplied to them while actually working for the benefit of the people of position. But these latter are counted according to their money-bags, and are entitled to take a corresponding proportion of the produce. From long continued custom they are held to have acquired rights proportioned to their money-bags, but not involving any duties. Such rights in the orthodox wasters begin with life and continue up to the very day of death. The work of their hands or of their head has nothing to do with it. They do quite as much work as sucklings, or when they are at their last gasp as they do in the day of their full vigour. But they say that by custom they have an everlasting right to the productions of their machines, independently of the kind of exertion or idleness which they may indulge in, equally whether they lie in bed or follow the hounds, or dawdle in one or other of the ordinary aristocratic frivolities.

Occasionally (I wonder it is not more often) the poor zeroes resent being treated as machines. The Irish landlords are persons in very high positions, and live on the produce of 10 or 100 or 500 zero workers. These have turned out produce with more or less regularity during five or six hundred years. Just now, however, they are beginning to think like men, and instead of leaving a half or two-thirds or three-quarters of their produce to the people of position, they are looking into the justice of the case. It makes one smile to see the members of other privileged classes running to the rescue of the Irish landlord, and bringing to bear the doctrines of Inhuman Arithmetic. Mr. Giffen, one of the greatest Arithmeticians, points out that his friends have as much right to their rents as ever. This is true. He goes on to argue that they ought to be compensated for the failure in their zero machines to work according to contract: he suggests that the compensation should be 20 times the year's rent. Having got this, they could use another method of managing their machines, called taking 5 per cent. interest, and would receive, with a glow of benevolent satisfaction, as large an annual product as before, to be continued for ever, or at all events as long as usury continues. How ingenious is Giffen, thus with a little shuffling of figures, in the usual Inhuman Arithmetic way, to persuade the very easily persuaded self-interested people that they are at one and the same time keeping all they had before, and also acting with generosity towards their slaves. But if we put on one side this money-juggle, with all its unclean accompaniments and diplomacies, and look for any practical product in the way of justice between man and man, there is just nothing at all.

Justice is not estimated in the processes of Inhuman Arithmetic. All that is ever brought into account there is the interest, the money-bag interest of these all-devouring people of position. No argument can be given why they should have twenty or ten or five years' purchase of their rents, except that this latter kind of usury has been paid to them and their ancestors for a great many years. That may be in form an argument, but it is not reason, and the unhappy workers, not only in Ireland, but all over the world, are beginning to ask for reason and justice. The cry of the privileged, "Give, give," is unjust, and to yield to it is unreason. Even the privileged would see this, if it were not that the unholy jumble of the Law, cursed with the curse of the Roman Empire, has been forced on us in the place of Justice. It is the people of position who have done this, and thus bind both themselves and others to try all things by the measure of Inhuman Arithmetic. At every point the Law deals out compensation, not to men, but to their accidental belongings. The person of position gets much if his money-bags are touched; the poor zeroes get nothing even when the life is all but crushed out of them. One of these works till he can work no longer and is then turned into the gutter. Do the rich consumers who have fed on his work all their lives club together to keep him, even in such poor luxury as he has lived in? Yes, at a cheap rate; they raise him from the gutter into a hospital,—is it a rise? It is all we can expect when men are treated as machines, and we see the evil effect over all parts of society. The rich cease to have any human feeling, and as they stupidly pile up riches they become wasting machines, even in a more real sense than their slaves become working machines. This is inevitable; nothing in the long run can prevent a clique of men from becoming like these among whom they live. The zero machine is poor indeed in all his surroundings: he lives in the midst of filth, and his thoughts have to be turned ever to the question whether he and his wife and children will have enough for their next meal. His toil is unremitting, and he has no time to read. But though all this keeps him down, it is not directly degrading, nor does it stifle kindness, and the natural social impulse to aid his neighbours in their need.

The people of position, on the contrary, by their very conditions, are impelled towards the selfish object of preserving their riches. Their thoughts naturally centre on this, as unremittingly as necessity drives the poor to labour. Selfishness is more degrading than any labour, and thus the rich cannot raise their ideas above frippery and ugly luxury, or sports, sometimes brutal, sometimes silly.

Such are the results of the application to the affairs of life of the Inhuman Arithmetic of Position and Averages, or as it is sometimes called, Political Economy. It would seem, however, that to be political it should not leave out of sight altogether the social instincts of man. This it does when it sets before him competition as the best element in society. Before it can claim to be economy, its processes must be made less wasteful than those of the internecine war of competition. The fact, however, is that it does not really pretend, except as a matter of respectable form, to advance a scheme for the improvement of mankind or for the management of human affairs in a good way, but merely states how men will act if they act under the motive of their basest desires.

The Economy which all should try to establish has for aim "the multiplication of human life at its highest standard"; and to effect this we must first "determine the noblest type of man, and aim simply at maintaining the largest number of persons of that class" (J. Ruskin). But we cannot have this result till we have conquered for ourselves some of the wisdom of which a letter of Carlyle's published a short time since in the newspapers said, "it is evermore the highest of conquests to every son of Adam, nay, in a large sense, the one conquest: and the precept to every one of us is ever,—Above all thy gettings, get understanding. . . . In this pursuit the greatest help is one's own earnest reflections and meditations, and to begin with, a candid, just and sincere mind in oneself." The one difficulty to be surmounted in our progress toward real Political Economy is, then, the getting of understanding, and the greatest help to this is a candid, just and sincere mind. The getting here spoken of, and the candid and just temper of mind suitable thereto, cannot have a greater contrast than the getting of money, and the grovelling inhumanity which is fitted to it.

POST MORTEM.

Made in the image of God,
The author of Genesis saith—
Formed by his hands from a clod,
Brought into life by his breath:
Yet here is the crown of creation struck down in the stupor of death.

Lo, thus are all secrets revealed—
In Love, and in Death, its eclipse:
The motionless form unconcealed
Is akin to the lover who strips
For the blissful embrace of the body and the passionate pressure of lips.

Naked here lying at length,
Two corpses—a man and a boy;
One seeming shorn of his strength
By a world that is strong to destroy,
The other with infantile limbs that can hardly have tasted of joy.

What little their lives were worth
The world has cruelly wrecked;
Here Pity in vain stepped forth
And the doom has taken effect.
Who cares for their bodies, unclaimed, unknown?—they will do to dissect.

Brain, be thou steady and still,
Heart, be thou hard as a stone;
Grasp in the vice of the will
The sickness and sorrow unknown;
Forget that the blood in those veins is the same that is bursting thine own.

The surgeon draws with his knife
A long line carefully planned
In the late habitation of life,
And deep in it plunges his hand;
Then calmly explains the disease that the students may understand.

So strange a phenomenon still Seems Death, that I watch with surprise
For the dead man handled so ill
To turn in his torment and rise
With scorn on those motionless lips and wrath in those lustreless eyes.

Do I deem that he should not have died?
Nay, I doubt not that death is a boon;
And life may not ever abide
In the splendour of morning and noon;
But here was a life without sunshine, and the darkness has fallen too soon.

Doctor, what do you expect?
Do you call that a man lying there?
A man walks free and erect,
With a countenance open and fair.
Your knife is at fault—there is tissue and blood—but the spirit is—where?

'Tis the mission of Science to heal,
And to slay is the mission of war—
The commonest cant; yet I feel
That Science is bloodier far:—
So calm in pursuit of its object of seeing all things as they are.

Full many a soldier who stood
Half dead with abhorrence and fright
Has looked on the shedding of blood
Till he suffered no pain at the sight,
And at length with a bloodthirsty madness has plunged in the thick of the fight.

But the raw scientific recruits
And dexterous doctors derive
Much wisdom from innocent brutes
Stretched out and unable to strive,
That are tortured and flayed and cut open and poisoned and roasted alive.

This butchery benefits us?
I will die in a gutter instead!
Is humanity happier thus
For the ocean of blood that is shed?
And still you demand living victims, and scratch at the bones of the dead.

When myriads daily endure
An existence with pestilence rife
That nothing but Nature can cure,
And you mock them with poison and knife,—
This is but a science of death—I will teach you a science of life.

To live is to labour and rest,
To swim and to ride and to run,
To delight whom delighteth us best,
To rejoice in the wind and the sun,
To learn all the lessons of Nature that body and soul may be one.

There are forests and uplands of grass,
Sweet orchards and valleys of wheat,
Still pools, and swift rivers that pass
The unruly green billows to meet,
Where the days and the nights and the varying seasons are wholesome and sweet.

And sometimes in Nature I scan
A shadow of longing and pain,
As if she were waiting for man
And feared that she waited in vain;
As a bride well adorned for her husband who knoweth not yet he is slain.

And what is it holds them apart?
Make answer, thou hideous foe
That drainest the blood from the heart
Of the people of earth lying low,
Thou vampire of Civilisation, thou worker of ruin and woe.

But at thee in the pride of thy strength
Shall a fearless defiance be hurled
From the people made ready at length
With the banner of Freedom unfurled,
And the wrath of a just retribution shall smite and destroy thee, O World.

And sages, when thou art destroyed,
Shall scan thee, but they shall be few;
For the people of earth, overjoyed
At the vision of ages come true,
Shall forget all the shame of the old in the fulness of life in the new.

DUBLIN PAWNBROKERS.—Nearly all the pawnbrokers of Dublin, acting in conjunction with the police, have decided to curtail the long hours during which the pawn offices are open for taking in pledges. Hitherto these pawn offices have been kept open on Sunday mornings until two or three o'clock, doing no doubt a brisk, but at the same time a wretched class of business. In fact the hours tended to public demoralisation and the new regulation will be hailed with satisfaction.

"The Labour Tribune is very wroth with the miners of Scotland for saying anything against the labour party now in Parliament. I daresay this fact will not affect the Scotch miners very seriously, since the fickleness of that journal on labour questions has prevented it from ever gaining any real hold on the miners here. Its whole raison d'être seems to be to bepraise the labour members, and denounce employers and Tories. A little hearty denunciation is all very well in its way. So too is praise when deserved, but indiscriminate praise is as bad as undeserved denunciation. Mr. Bradlaugh, for example, is continually being lauded to the skies, just because he happens to be Mr. Bradlaugh. By their fruits ye shall know them, is a very good rule of judgment, and Mr. Bradlaugh's recent conduct in connection with the Truck Bill is worthy of the Toryism of fifty years ago."—Cummock News. Well said! The features here complained of have been too prominent to escape notice, and we thoroughly endorse the writer's comment, particularly the latter portion of it. We should indeed think poorly of the Scottish miners if they were altogether satisfied with the so-called labour party now in Parliament, or with the Labour Tribune as their advocate. The labour party of the near future, we may hope, will be much more sturdy, and less "respectable," than our present meek and mild members; and the Labour Tribune will have to improve considerably, and not bury its head so much to the obvious tendencies of the times, if it is to continue to hold any position among the labour press.

LOG-ROLLING.

OUR outspoken kinsmen in America have invented an expressive phrase to characterise the trade of politics. Neighbours in the uncivilised west help each other to roll the logs of which their houses are to be built. So the civilised Political Tradesmen say to each other, "Help me to roll my coercion log for the repair of Castle Rackrent; I'll lend a hand in bringing chicory-logs when you are building a Coffee Palace." Neither side is troubled by the character of this kind of mutual payment for services rendered. For as De Foe says, when speaking "of telling unavoidable trading lies," "there is some difference between an honest man and an honest tradesman," and "there are some latitudes, like poetical licences in other cases, which a Tradesman is and must be allowed, and which by the custom and usage of trade he may give himself a liberty in, which cannot be allowed in other cases to any man, no, nor to the Tradesman himself out of his business; I say, he may take some liberties, but within bounds; and whatever some pretenders to strict living may say, yet that Tradesman shall pass with me for a very honest man, notwithstanding the liberty which he gives himself of this kind, if he does not take those liberties in an exorbitant manner."

The Political Tradesman takes liberties, but within Parliamentary bounds, such liberties as, let us hope, he would not attempt to take "out of his business." So long as the log which he may roll for a friend is not exorbitantly dirty, that Tradesman shall pass for a very honest man in the bosom of his family or at church. There is a letter about TEMPERANCE AND POLITICS, dated July 12, from a Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., who is both Teetotaler and Unionist, and a star distinguishable from the general Milky Whey of Parliamentary Nonentities. His letter puts neatly, or at least in a short space, the log-rolling idea or rather mixture of notions. Says Mr. Russell, "It is none of our business if they choose to import politics into a non-political movement," but it is not clear which of the two, Teetotalism and Unionism, should not be mixed with the other, as being one or both or neither political or non-political. When this honest Political Tradesman, as he says, "resigned his membership of the United Kingdom Alliance," apparently he thought that he could resign too his beliefs on the subject of temperance. "Too many who call themselves honest tradesman, and would take it very ill to have any one tax their integrity" (De Foe), yet seem to slip these beliefs on and off without much mental exertion. The distilling of spirits is spoken of in awful terms from temperance platforms, and the whole system of alcoholic drinks is denounced as the cause of untold misery in this world and in the next.

But when the Political Tradesman has ceased to deal in those denunciatory wares, he takes quite easily to the drink business. As Mr. T. W. Russell, the quondam member of the United Kingdom Alliance, quite naively puts it, "he does not ask whether the candidate he supports is a distiller." I suppose such men do not think, when they roll on the barrel filled as they say with untold misery, whether this is an exorbitant price to pay for getting rolled forward their own particular log.

THE LOCK-OUT OF THE SCOTCH SHALE-MINERS.

ON August 3rd I paid a visit to the shale-miners locked-out at Broxburn, and a short account of their condition and struggle will be useful to our comrades generally, and in particular to our miner comrades.

When the lock-out began, about 2200 men were thrown idle. The places affected were Burntisland, Broxburn, Linlithgow, Niddry, Newliston, Pumpherston, and Philipstoun. Since then the Pumpherston men—300—have gone in at half the reduction, by consent of the Miners' Association. In the other places the lock-out still goes on, and at present there is little prospect of its ending. The men work nine hours per day, and get from 1s. 8d. to 2s. per ton—which means that they can earn from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. per day. At one time in some places the price was as high as 7s. 6d. per ton. Although the price per ton is as high now as it has been for some years, the amount earned is always getting less. This is because the pits get more and more difficult to work as the seams are followed further down. The men live in the employers' houses and are charged higher rents than other houses in the town. A "double" house, two small rooms, costs 2s. 6d. per week and 3d. for water-rates, and is often inhabited by a family, a lodger, or even two families. A "single" house, one room, costs 1s. 9d. per week, and is sometimes inhabited by as many as six and seven people in some exceptional cases by as many as twelve or thirteen. The rent is kept out of the men's wages, so that no arrears are allowed to gather. While in this condition the masters demand that the men should all submit to a reduction of one-sixth, and abandon their policy of restricting their output. It was, however, openly stated by several managers that the chief aim of the masters is to break up the miners' newly formed union. The men stuck to their restrictive policy and refused to work more than four days per week. The masters then locked them out and are waiting till the men are starved into submission. Here is a statement of second last pay received before the lock-out:

GROSS WAGE PER DAY.		DEDUCTIONS PER DAY.
1 ton 19 cwt., at 2s. ...	£0 3 11	Gunpowder ...	£0 0 4
		Pick-sharping ...	0 0 0½
		Wear and tear of tools ...	0 0 1
		Oil and cotton ...	0 0 2
		Doctor and school fees ...	0 0 0½
		Check-weighman ...	0 0 0½
		Coal ...	0 0 2½
		Rent and water-rates ...	0 0 5
		Total deductions per day	£0 1 4½
		Nett wage ...	0 2 6½

This 3s. 11d. is an exceedingly good wage, the average being not more than 3s. 6d. If the reduction of one-sixth be enforced, the men will have a gross wage of 2s. 11d. or a real wage of 1s. 6½d. per day on which to provide food and clothing and luxuries for themselves, wives and families. Five days work a-week is the average, giving a nett wage of 7s. 8½d. With this must not be reckoned the loss of time by holidays, sickness, and moving from one working to another, amounting to from two to three months per year. This gives an idea of the condition of the wage-slaves of the mines in Scotland; and be it remembered that the shale-workers have harder work, and are generally supposed to be better off, than the Scotch coal-miners.

It will be as well to say here where the fruits of these men's labour goes to, not by way of making a charge or raising animosity against any particular person or body, but just to show the bare facts of the case. Lord Cardross draws the royalties for the Broxburn district. The rate of royalty is 1s. per ton, or in other words this useless lord gets half as much for doing nothing as the miners gets for producing the shale. In fairly good times the total royalties paid to Lord Cardross amounts to £300 per week. The Broxburn Oil Company has been formed about eight or nine years. In the first six months that work began they paid at the rate of nine per cent.; from then till last year the dividend was 25 per cent., and last year it was 15 per cent. The total profits for the year 1885-6 was £89,000, and of this £49,000 was paid in dividends.

The men have now formed a union, and are standing nobly together for their interests. The bitter feeling between Irish Catholics and Orangemen, national rivalries and all sorts of national feeling and prejudices, are being swamped to promote harmony and unity in the labour movement. The condition of the men is so low, and the force of their employers so formidable on every hand, that this recognition of the solidarity of labour is being thrust upon them by sheer pressure of circumstances. The meetings held by the Scottish Section of the Socialist League in the district have been thoroughly successful, and a large adherence of new members is certain as soon as the strike is over. Every help is being given to the men by the Scotch Socialists, and their case will soon be brought prominently before the public by means of a mass meeting.

So far, my experience amongst the Scotch miners confirms the impressions made by the north of England and midland miners—that these men will be the advanced guard of the Socialist labour movement.

J. L. MAHON.

Mr. Fenwick's very "mixed" reception by the Northumberland miners was just what might have been expected. The English democracy are getting tired of half-hearted men and half-hearted measures. They want men in the House of Commons who will fight the classes, whether Tory or Liberal, and who will not be put off with smooth promises and deceitful phrases. It is nearly time that the working-class constituencies took this matter in hand. They have tolerated too much; they have been patient too long. Nothing will be obtained by anybody from any English government unless you make yourself unpleasant, and a man who is not prepared to do this has no business in the House of Commons.—Reynolds.

A LETTER FROM AMERICA.

Perhaps no country in the world affords such opportunities for social experiments, for the quick and rapid development of new ideas and for putting into practice mentally well-matured schemes as the United States of America.

For the last fifty years the bourgeois people in Europe closely watched with immense admiration and intense satisfaction the marvellous growth of a State constituted on the principles advocated and expounded by their most renowned and able philosophers. Towns sprang up where but a short time previous the buffaloes were calmly grazing or the Red Indian was carrying on the life of a savage. Stimulated by fabulous land-grants, endless railroads were built and before long the locomotive whistled along the whole continent. Industry, trade and commerce leaped onward with gigantic steps and the wealth of the nation increased a hundredfold.

"The social problem solved," cried the politician, the journalist, and all the other hired slaves of the capitalist classes throughout Europe. "Emigrate, emigrate, emigrate," became the watchword wherever the social class-antagonism produced bubbles. "Go to the land of the free, the rich and independent" and you will be happy. Many a wretched fool believed and many a fool suffered bitterly, and even now immigration in the States increases yearly. These tales of wealth, of luxury, of independence, blinded for some time the well-wishers to humanity, till at last a more correct version has become known to the people of Europe.

They have learned that pauperism, crime, and trampism are well represented in the States and that within a very short period the Government at Washington would be confronted by the same problem as all other nations based on possession of property in severalty. However, little as yet was known of so-called labour troubles. Marvellous as the development of capitalist industry may have been to the respectable citizens of England, still more marvellous must have appeared to the English toilers the Minerva-like birth of a well-shaped, strong and healthy labour movement in the States.

Up to 1879 such a thing as a labour-organisation of any importance was a myth in the eyes of an American captain of industry. But alas! how things have changed since then. To-day the exploiting class has to meet face to face a foe more than worthy to be called a foe. Not one but a hundred organisations, labour combinations, groups, etc., hold the field, and wherever labour and capital openly clash it is not always for the immediate benefit of capital. The labour-forces as arranged to-day may perhaps—nay, unquestionably do—give good reasons to a Socialist, especially a Socialist belonging to an advanced school, for a grumble, but it is to be remembered that not even God Almighty could create the world in less than six days. If all labour-movements were in such healthy, strong, enduring and energetic condition as the movement over here the look-out for a speedy hand-to-hand battle with capital might be more cheery.

Some timid people, on the other hand, complain about the effect of that Chicago bomb. It is to be admitted that the affair created in the minds of a good many workers a prejudice against Socialism; but ever since that, Socialism has been talked about, studied, analysed, and argued over nearly everywhere and anywhere. The prejudice will duly vanish, the interest in Socialism as the only remedy will remain and increase.

The all-absorbing topic at present is the excommunication of the Rev. Dr. E. M'Glynn. Edward M'Glynn became conspicuous during the Hewitt-George campaign for his stout advocacy of the principle of land nationalisation in spite of all threats. The Roman Catholic Church organisation of course could not afford to appear to side with the rag tag and bobtail against the property owners and promptly instructed its New York chief, Archbishop Corrigan, to suspend from his pulpit the rebellious chief. M'Glynn, however, refused to retract one single word of any of his utterances, and continued to advocate the doctrines of his so-called twin-brother Henry George. Most of his parishioners took the part of their late sky-pilot and Rome did not desire to lose at once so many sheep. Rome played as usual the waiting game; the rebel was told to come to Rome, to explain, perhaps to convert the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda. M'Glynn knew better. He comprehends the inner working of that sinister organisation; he was well aware he could go, but whether he would ever return—well that's another point. He refused to go and persisted in his refusal. Another month or two of waiting on the part of Rome. M'Glynn did not move. Then he was told to present himself at the Vatican within forty days, that is before the beginning of July, under penalty of excommunication. M'Glynn not only did not go, but in an interview with a newspaper reporter called the Pope, Propaganda, and the Cardinals some pretty names and gave the people some valuable information about the construction and principles of the Roman Catholic Hierarchy. The Pope, of course, could no longer hesitate without appearing ridiculous in the eyes of the Faithful; the cable carried the necessary instructions to his obedient servant Archbishop Corrigan, which were promptly acted upon. The excommunication was pronounced and Edward M'Glynn is to-day a religious outcast. This is in short a history of the M'Glynn affair.

M'Glynn is, like Henry George, to all intents and purposes, an upholder and defender of individual private property. It is needless to go here into the details of Georgism as 'Progress and Poverty' is well known to every reader of the Commonweal. M'Glynn is, without doubt, honest, a man of burning eloquence and passionately devoted to every cause he believes to be just. He is sometimes compared to Martin Luther; but this comparison is highly absurd. Luther was only, and never pretended to be anything else but, a reformer of religious dogmas. M'Glynn, on the contrary, declares he is and will remain to death a Catholic, and only desires to bring about social reforms. A comparison with Jesus Christ would be more to the point.

I have dwelt so long on the M'Glynn business because I know it to be of immense importance. It is well known that revolutions never go backward, and in this theory is involved the opinion that whatever does not go forward to the logical end goes backward. Therefore any political party that does not tend in the direction of the development of a revolutionary programme, that hesitates under the inspiration of a conservative spirit, is more or less reactionary in its tendencies. The coming revolution in its economical aspect logically interpreted, aims at the destruction of individual private property in ALL the means of production. The abolition of landownership simply would consequently be a reactionary step. I do not believe George-M'Glynn will be powerful enough to achieve a lasting success; however, the real revolutionists will have a hard fight.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO SOCIALIST CYCLISTS AND OTHERS.

Your correspondent Ægzyæ has started a very useful propagand for Socialist cyclists, that is, to deliver tracts and leaflets on their tours. As a walker I thought of doing something in this sort of work myself.

In the St. James's Gazette for June 6 the editor was kind enough to print some very good and useful Socialistic literature in an article entitled "Some East-end Readings." One was "The Thirteen Articles of Faith," written in the style of some Hebrew prayer, and circulated amongst the Jews of the East-end. I have shortened this somewhat and made it into ten paragraphs, and if you, sir, would print this in leaflet form, I should be happy to take 2000 of them for distribution during my coming holidays and Sunday walks.

D.

[Below are the Articles of Faith, which will be reprinted in large type as a leaflet, as suggested by our correspondent:]

- I. All able-bodied adults who derive wealth from the labour of others, they themselves not working, are plunderers.
- II. Poverty will never cease until all able-bodied adults be compelled to work according to their strength, and receive of their labour according to their needs.
- III. The working-classes will remain slaves, as they are now, so long as one individual is suffered to rule over others, and a few are allowed to make laws for the many.
- IV. War, and all its consequences, will exist, and thousands will be slaughtered upon the battle-field, so long as "force" prevails and one country can derive temporary financial advantage from the ruin of another.
- V. Women will be the slaves and playthings of men so long as they are dependent upon them and do not enjoy the fruits of their own labour.
- VI. Labour which supplies all the needs of man, will be despised in the eyes of all, so long as the working-classes toil to fill the pockets of those who sit still and idle.
- VII. Murderers, thieves, prostitutes, and all kinds of criminals, will not cease so long as poverty remains to give birth to them.
- VIII. Things will get to such a pass that men will figuratively devour each other alive, unless a new light soon dawn upon humanity, and working men rise as one to throw off the yoke of capital, and put on terms of equality those who now oppress them.
- IX. The moral and intellectual faculties of mankind can achieve all, the time for reflection has come, action must soon follow, after that men will live as a band of brothers, and all civilised nations form one united family.
- X. It is those who are now despised and robbed, the workers and consequently the wealth-producing class, who will have to decide how long the present state of things shall last.

"LEADERS OF THE PEOPLE."

Mr. Barker says wages have risen 25 per cent., rents 150 per cent. Why? Well, I don't know the average per head of the population for England or Ireland, but I would very much like to know, and also for the large cities and towns; but the average for Glasgow is over £6 per head—probably near £7, as a considerable portion of the population sleep on stairs and in parks, not to mention the thousands, if not tens of thousands, who sleep in model and other foul lodgings. What is the cause of the Scotch being highest rented and taxed, and Glasgow the worst housed? The cause is, the land laws of Scotland afford a better security for invested capital than those of England. If you wish to spot exactly where the shoe pinches, you have got to compare the powers possessed by the landlords of the three kingdoms under the laws of hypothec and distraint respectively, and you will get at the root of the matter. One indication of the difference in the value of these is this: in England any tenant can borrow on a bill of sale over his furniture. It is not so in Scotland. The Scotchman's household gods are "his landlord's hypothec," and for financial purposes count as the landlord's; and woe to the man who dares to lay a finger on the landlord's hypothec.—Yours,

J. M'G.

Moral: Abolish hypothec and distraint. But who will you get to undertake to propose such sacrilege?

LABOUR FEDERATION.—Comrade Mahon has asked us to point out an arithmetical error in the article on "Labour Federation" in our last issue. 10s. added to 17s. is obviously an increase of more than 50 per cent. This in no way affects the argument, but is worth correcting.

When Hercules cleaned out the Augean stable he was not scared from his task by the stink of the muck he was moving, nor should we be scared by the stink of the rotten press that is being disturbed by our shovels and brooms.—RADICAL JACK in Chicago Labour Enquirer.

A curious argument appeared in a curious leader in the Labour Tribune last week. It is there stated that the adverse result of the recent strike of Northumberland miners had justified the opposition to it on the part of Mr. Burt and his colleagues! This line of argument might pass if used on behalf of the capitalists, but coming from a labour paper it sounds "mighty queer."

THE MINERAL WATER SOCIETY.—In the House of Commons last Friday, Mr. Matthews, in reply to Mr. Bradlaugh, said that he had ascertained that by the articles of association of the Mineral Water Bottle Exchange Society, with 179 members as manufacturers, the employers agreed not to re-engage for two years any servant who had left the employment of any member except with the consent of the late employer. He had observed that in a case heard before Mr. Justice Chitty it was held that the rule was an unreasonable restraint on trade, and a motion to enforce it was refused with costs. The case was now pending before the Court of Appeal, and if the decision of Mr. Justice Chitty was upheld the rule would be inoperative.

A movement is on foot in Bolton for the establishment of a co-operative ironworks, based on the principle of partnership of labour, in consequence of the prolongation of the strike and the knowledge amongst the men that when a settlement is arrived at a large number of those who have taken a prominent part in the dispute will be weeded out. The movement for the establishment of such works, which finds much favour with the leaders of the men, has been taken up by the Bolton Co-operative Society, one of the wealthiest of its kind in the country, and the directors of that organisation have made arrangements for the holding of a meeting, to which the strike hands have been specially invited. There is every probability of the scheme being taken up and carried out.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

The Trades Council of Ashton-under-Lyne, have been discussing the practicability and advisability of forming a federation of trades unions in the United Kingdom.

BRICKLAYERS' LABOURERS' WAGES.—At Stockport the agitation for an increase of wages from 5d. to 5½d. per hour, before referred to, is still going on. The labourers have formed an association, and threaten to strike if their wages are not increased.

THE SPINDLE AND LOOM.—The outlook in the cotton spinning and manufacturing industry of Lancashire is very gloomy. In the district of Bury and Eton at the present time out of 40 large mills three are closed (and one has lately been unsuccessfully offered for sale). About half-a-dozen others are working short time, and one large firm, in consequence of the bad state of trade, is on the point of closing their premises after finishing the orders at present in hand. In addition to this several other mills are compelled to work for stock.

GOUROCK MASONS' STRIKE.—The masons in the employment of Messrs. Watt and Wilson, contractors for the Greenock section of Gourrock Railway have struck work against a proposal of the contractors to pay the hewers piece-work rates in place of weekly wages, paid since the work commenced. The builders have taken the side of the hewers, and consequently the work at the new Greenock Station has been stopped.

NORTHAMPTON SHOE TRADE.—The strike still continues, and Messrs. Cove and West, who possess one of the largest factories in the town, have closed for eight days. The men maintain that they are insufficiently paid, and assert that best work is done for the price of seconds. The lasters assert that their average wages for the past twelve months come to but little over 18s. a-week. It is not long since Mr. Bradlaugh cited the staple trade of Northampton as an instance against the Socialist assertion that the workers were unemployed and badly paid.

THE RIVET TRADE.—A meeting of the operatives was held on Monday at Black Heath; a workman presiding. It was stated that all the masters, with the exception of one in the Old Hill district, had resumed work at the list demanded. The master referred to had declined to give the advance; at the same time he wished his men to return to their employment at a lower rate. The operatives in his employ are out on strike, and are being supported by levies from their fellow-workmen.

SCOTCH MINERS.—The Airdrie, Motherwell, and Lanarkshire miners have decided to work five days a-week and eight hours a-day. Every endeavour is being made to get all the Scotch miners to adopt the same policy. At a mass meeting held at Hamilton it was unanimously agreed "that, inasmuch as the great majority of the mineowners in Lanarkshire have reduced wages by 7½ per cent., combined with the depreciation in the value of coal, and the enormous increase of stocks, we deem it advisable and strongly urge all the county immediately to return to their former policy of eight hours a-day and five days a-week, to avert further reductions and enhance the value of coal."

An organisation known as the Associated Iron and Steel Workers of Great Britain was formed at Manchester in April, and the first general conference of delegates in connection with the society was held this week, at the Queen's Head Hotel, Attercliffe, Sheffield, but the proceedings were private. Some years ago there was a difference in the National Association with regard to a proposal for a centralised fund, and since that time the operations of the National Association have been chiefly confined to the north of England, while the Midland districts have been governed by the Conciliation Board. There has been a feeling that the formation of one body for the whole of the country, including the Scotch ironworkers, would strengthen the position of the men, and with that object the new association was formed. A communication was favourably received from Mr. Threlfall, of Southport, as to the direct representation of the operative ironworkers in Parliament, following up their resolution at the Manchester conference.

THE STRIKE OF WEAVERS.—Matters at Barnoldswick in connection with the trade dispute have assumed an acute phase. The police force has been increased, and more officers are to be sent there. Messrs. Bracewell are placing all available "odd hands" at the vacant looms, and those thus employed are being boycotted by the weavers on strike. One night an effigy, supposed to represent a "knobstick," was carried shoulder-high along the streets, which were lined with people, and the police had difficulty in keeping order. Over 30 summonses have been taken out on charges of intimidation, etc. A strike at the large works of Messrs. Newsome, West, and Co., Staincliffe, well-known manufacturers, is attracting some attention. In consequence of bad work done, the firm have made stoppages in the wages of the weavers, this being for "shady" pieces, and the earnings of some of the hands have in consequence been much reduced; but Messrs. Newsome, West, and Co. have been compelled to take this step to ensure more careful workmanship. It is expected a conference will take place between a deputation of the weavers and the heads of the firm, in order to arrive at a settlement if possible.

THE CRADLEY HEATH CHAINMAKERS.—The men and women engaged in this struggle deserve to win, for seldom has a strike been carried on so energetically. The strike has lasted just a twelvemonth, and great privations have been undergone. It was announced at meetings held at Cradley Heath, that upwards of twenty-five employers in the South Staffordshire nail trade had conceded a substantial advance in wages, and work would be resumed forthwith at these factories. Upwards of twenty employers have conceded advances in the chain trade, and there was a partial resumption of work. On August 4th, a meeting of chainmakers was held in the Salvation Army Barracks, Cradley Heath; Mr. J. Edmunds presiding. The Chairman pointed out that they had completed the fifty-second week of the strike, and during that time he considered the trade had been greatly improved. Messrs. T. Price, of Spinners End, and Messrs. Underwood, of Old Hill, had requested the society to allow their men to resume work. It was decided to allow the men to do so at once. The following subscriptions were announced:—From the Railway Servants' Society of London, £10; Tailors' Society of London, £7; Weavers and Hatters of Manchester, £3; Colonel Stewart, £2 11s.; Manchester Newspaper, £13 19s. 8d. Other smaller sums were announced, amounting to £40.

NAIL TRADE.—STRIKE RIOTS.—On Wednesday, August 3, a number of cast-nail makers, who have been on strike against a reduction in wages, marched to the works of Messrs. H. and F. Shaw, in Glover Street, Birmingham, and because the firm refused to allow them to return to work, except at the reduced price, they began throwing stones and breaking the windows. The police, however, arrived before much damage was done. There are only four cast-nail making firms in Birmingham, and three of them had given notice of reduction on the ground that wages in Birmingham are 20 per cent. higher than at Bristol and Shrewsbury. The nail makers appear to be incensed because Messrs. Shaw have engaged a number of unskilled workmen, under two skilled men, to take the place of those on strike. On Saturday the 6th, a number of men from Cradley, Halesowen, and Bilston, assembled opposite the manufactory of Messrs. Shaw and Sons, Glover Street, where some men are still working, and demanded that they should come out. Some of the men obeyed, but the remainder kept at work, and the difficulty was to smuggle them out of the place, which was surrounded by an excited crowd of strikers. It was found necessary for the safety of the men to pack them in sacks, and send them out of the works in vans as bags of nails. When the men outside found they had been duped, they commenced an onslaught on the factory, smashed all the windows, and did great damage. One of the employers had to be escorted home by the police.

THE LIMERICK DOCK LABOURERS' STRIKE.—Friday, Aug. 6th.—The dock labourers' strike against the Limerick and Clyde Steamship Companies still continues, nor is there any apparent sign of a settlement. The Clyde Company are working their boats with their own crew hands, but the crew of the Ardnamult (the Limerick Steamship Company's boat) has struck, and 28 men brought down from Waterford last evening struck work at ten this morning. Some men were also brought up from Tralee, but they also refused to work on learning the facts of the dispute. A house to house collection was made during the day, and the men from Waterford and from Tralee were all sent back this afternoon. As matters at present stand there seems no likelihood of the Ardnamult, which is timed to leave for Liverpool on Sunday, being discharged within the next fortnight unless a settlement is arrived at. Much sympathy is expressed with the dock labourers.

STRIKE OF THE MIDLAND ENGINE-DRIVERS.—On the 15th July the directors of the Midland Railway gave notice of a new method of working and pay for engine-drivers and firemen—the substitution of precarious piecework for weekly wage. The new scheme aroused great opposition all over the line and efforts were made to induce the directors to postpone the alteration. This they declined to do and a strike is the consequence. There is little or no prospect of success, as the men have not all turned out and many have gone back. Great assistance has been given the Midland by other companies, and as the number of unemployed is great, men have been readily obtained to fill the places of the strikers. The depression of trade has seriously affected railway incomes, and to make the dividend the workers generally suffer. Strikes to be successful must be wider in their scope. Why have not the signalmen been induced to co-operate? Every Midland man knows why the guards failed some years ago; it is a pity that another strike should have been entered upon to court the same fate. That the engine-men will fail there is little doubt, though their cause deserves the sympathy of every worker. The leaders, too, have shown a want of boldness and decision, and to this must be partly attributed the failure of the present strike. What is wanted is a federation of all workers, embracing all branches of trade and industry; until this is accomplished this column must continue to chronicle disastrous strikes, reductions of wages, and the inability of the trades' unions to perform the function for which they were founded. A nominal subscription could meet this demand, and the friendly society benefits might well be left to the option of the members. Workers must learn to know that the injury to one is the concern of all; when this is recognised success will attend labour in its struggle against capital, and the future will be open to the workers. A particularly noticeable feature in the present struggle is the unscrupulous hostility and hypocrisy of the press in regard to the strikers. The virtues of the directors of the Midland Railway Company have been extolled ad nauseam, and lying statements by the column were inserted as to the collapse of the strike almost before it had begun. This and the sickly cant of "moderation" and respect for so-called "public opinion," as manufactured by the organs of the exploiting classes, has paralysed the cause of the men, who, until they learn to stick together, and fight shoulder to shoulder, will neither win nor deserve to win.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—The great strike in the engineering trade at Bolton has now entered into its thirteenth week. The Mayor is making another effort to bring the dispute to an end, having written to both the employers and the joint committee of the men, suggesting that the whole question of radius from Manchester, whether 12 miles as suggested by the employers, or three miles as claimed by the men, should be left to the Recorder of Bolton to decide. Meanwhile the employers are, it is said, making every effort to import labour into the town. The report is that one large firm are erecting an additional building for the convenience of men lodged upon the premises, and that provision will be made for religious worship and for concerts. On the other hand, the men are being encouraged by subscriptions and counsel to continue the struggle. In issuing the eleventh weekly report, the Strike Committee state that they have a splendid balance of over £1,100, an increase of £200 on the week. London contributes £40, Manchester district £60, Blackburn £25, Bury £30, Rochdale £12, Oldham £40, Preston £6, and Liverpool £6. The Bolton Co-operative Society have forwarded a fourth weekly contribution of £25. The Vigilance Committee has cost £21 and £160 has been distributed in relief. On Saturday, nine of the imported men left the town after appearing before the Strike Committee, by whom they were assisted home. There was hooting at one of the employers on Saturday, and two "knobsticks" recognised in the streets came in for like attention. Thirteen men were imported into Bolton on Wednesday to take the places of men on strike. The strangers entered a 'bus in waiting, and were guarded by police. A number of cases arising out of recent disorders were dealt with by the borough magistrates on Monday. The offences were hooting, principally, and one woman was charged with breaking the window of an omnibus in which some importations were seated. It is understood that copies of resolutions passed at the ratepayers' indignation meeting on Monday, protesting against the bringing of Hussars and county constabulary to the town, have been forwarded to the Home Secretary. Imported men arrived in Bolton from Leeds on Wednesday. They were guarded by sixty policemen, mounted and on foot, and speedily landed into an omnibus in waiting. They were delivered at Messrs. Dobson and Barlow's works, Kay Street. Trinity Street was blocked by strong cordons of police during the arrival of the men. A gentleman aged 86 years, called at the headquarters of the Bolton Strike Committee on Sunday, and made a donation of £20. He refused to give his name, but said he lived on the outskirts of the town, and had been a member of a trade society for 65 years.

CONTINENTAL NOTES

BELGIUM.

The Parti ouvrier (workman's party) of Belgium will hold its annual congress at Mons on the 15th inst. The labour troubles of Belgium, as Dispatch observes truly, are only momentarily in abeyance, but they have in no way ceased. Our readers are aware of what happened in 1886 in the coal districts of Charleroi, Borinage, Mons, etc. This year a new attempt was made to organise a general strike—the so-called black strike. The fact that the Executive Council of the Workman's Party did not support this wholesale strike has been the subject of much dispute among the Socialists of Belgium. The forthcoming Congress will now have to decide whether the effort shall be renewed, and, this time, with the united support of every labour organisation in the country. As a general strike in Belgium, supported by the whole Parti ouvrier, would deeply affect the political and the social interests of the country, we are anxious to know what will be the result of the Mons Congress. We are, however, not of opinion that the Executive Council of the Parti, or the delegates of the Congress to come, or any body of men, can organise a general strike,—for a strike of that description means no more and no less than revolution, and a revolution cannot be fixed for to-day or for to-morrow, but comes forward, irresistibly, with or without the sanction of parties, as soon as times are ripe for it. Therefore we may suggest to our friends in Belgium to carry on their local organisations as well as they possibly can, and not to let them be used for mere political purposes, as it is done at Brussels, and then, as soon as they think the time has come, not to wait a watchword for going forward. Certainly, the support of the whole Party may be morally useful, but the command of an executive would most decidedly be disastrous.

A few days ago some liberal members of the Belgian miniature-Parliament, MM. Guillery, Houzeau, and others, have again brought in a bill for the revision of the Constitution, a necessary preparation for another bill establishing universal suffrage. After three or four hours chit-chat and nonsense retailed by the law-makers, the clerical majority of the Chamber has refused even to take the bill into consideration, so that it will not be discussed, but at once thrown away in the waste-paper basket. A good job too! For, if it had been otherwise, the workers would have been abused further on by these political dodgers and those in the workers' party who patronise them. Perhaps they now at last will open their eyes and listen no longer to those who preach, as remedies for all social evils, parliamentarianism, universal suffrage, and economical pea-soup kitchens!

The 25th of last month was the day appointed for the trial of comrade Jahn, a young Anarchist who, at the time of the last Belgian strikes, had pronounced several "most incendiary" speeches, and, we are told, "dynamited" a little bit "against a window." Now, the trial has been postponed for three months, because the public prosecutor was to be the scandalous Demaret, who, of course, is now prevented. But just look at the justice of the matter: Jahn will have to undergo three months further imprisonment, because Demaret has done—what you know! D.

FRANCE.

The French "Republican" journalists are nice fellows indeed! Katkoff died last week—what he ought to have done at least twenty years ago—and at once these Republican scribblers feel it their duty to send wreaths of laurels and letters of condolence to the family of one of the most atrocious scoundrels of the nineteenth century! Why? Because Katkoff was a hater of the Germans and has become, in his latter days, a friend of the French. He was all-powerful in Russia, and promised to support France against Germany in the next gigantic bloodshed which the European diplomats are now preparing. And the French Republicans call that patriotism, cleverness! And the sempiternal clown of patriotism, the ridiculous Derouledé, is dispatched to Petersburg, in the name of the Association of Republican and so-called Socialist journalists! Have they forgotten that Katkoff was a renegade of the liberal ideas of his youth, the most energetic supporter of the most absolute despotism, the enemy of reform and progress, of liberty and justice, the councillor and friend of Alexander the Hanger? Have they even the right to forget that Katkoff encouraged by all means the brutal and ferocious resistance of Russia against the movement towards freedom and independence which threw thousands of heroic men in the mines of Siberia and in the steppes of Arkangel? that he was one of the vanquished Poles? and that he stimulated Alexander the Third, as he had done Alexander the Second, to maintain under his iron claws, in oppression and misery, an immense nation of one hundred million men? We cannot help thinking that the "French Republican journalists" have acted scandalously by honouring the memory of that arch-scoundrel Katkoff!

Our readers will remember that in the great Anarchist trial at Lyons, in January 1883, where Krépotkine, Bérdat, and others were sentenced to several years of imprisonment, a miserable wretch, the pseudo-Anarchist Georges Garou, alias Valadier acted as a police spy. This villain has now received the just reward of his infamous action: some ten or twelve Socialists have thrown him in the lake of Zürich, where his corpse has been found in a state of putrefaction. D.

GERMANY.

On the 5th of this month a new Socialistic paper has made its appearance at Berlin, Berliner Volks Tribune, under the editorship of Max Schippel. This is certainly a courageous attempt, and we wish every success to our weekly colleague. The editor says in his first number that he is fully aware of the fact, that in publishing a journal for the workers under the circumstances under which Germany lingers nowadays, politically and socially, is a most dangerous enterprise, but nevertheless he will try it and do his best. At any rate a trial is worth while.

Socialism is spreading rapidly in the German army. Last week, at Augsburg, a staff-officer and two soldiers have been arrested, because they had attempted to introduce in the barracks several hundred pamphlets for distribution among the soldiers. At Munich, two officers have been arrested because they have distributed among the men under their command invitations to assist in an open-air meeting to be held in a forest near the town.

In the same city of Munich, there are no less than 150 Socialists now awaiting their trial for various "Socialistic" offences, most of them for distributing prohibited literature. Socialism is growing fast!

At Ludwigshaven, where several thousands of the pamphlet, 'An Appeal to the Voter,' have been thrown in the streets, F. Ehrhardt, an upholsterer, the leader of the Socialists in that town and a candidate for the Reichstag, has been arrested under the suspicion of having introduced the pamphlets there. Ehrhardt is well known among the Paris and London workers.

At Königsberg, we will have shortly a trial for conspiracy, where for the first time in Germany, Socialist students and women will be tried.

At Darmstadt, the paper Freie Presse, has been suppressed in accordance with the laws against Socialism.

At Altona, twelve Socialists will be tried next week, among whom is the well-known contributor to the paper Bürgerzeitung, L. W. Molkenbuhr.

At Mannheim, six Socialists were sentenced last Saturday for distribution of Socialist literature, to terms of imprisonment varying from three weeks to ten months.

The German Socialists, both Social Democrats and Anarchists, are spreading in considerable quantities their pamphlet literature all over Germany in spite of Bismark and his blood-hounds. We recommend the lecture of these pamphlets to all those who understand the language, and we suggest that the translation of most of them into English would be an excellent enterprise. Up to date, the Anarchist series includes: 1, 'Appeal to the Proletariat'; 2, 'The Hell of Blackwell's Island'; 3, 'The Plague of the God-idea'; 4, 'The Descent of Man.' The Social Democrat series comprises the following: 1, 'Communitistic and Private Property'; 2, 'The Trial of K. Marx at the Court of Assizes of Cologne'; 3, 'The Future of Socialism'; 4, 'Marx's Revelations on the Communist Trial at Cologne'; 5, 'Our Aims'; 6, 'The Thousand Million of Silesia'; 7, 'Socialistic Lectures'; 8, 'The Dead Schulze against the Living Lassalle'; 9, 'Materialism in Political Economy'; 10, 'The Programme of the Workers'; 11, 'William Weitling'; 12, 'Christianity and Socialism'; 13, 'The Lodging Question'; 14, 'Babouf and his Conspiracy'; 15, 'The Science and the Workers'; 16, 'The Chartist Movement.'

In one of our next issues, we intend to analyse at some length these pamphlets, the first series of which are issued at New York, and the second at Zurich. D.

HOLLAND.

On the 1st of this month, a mass meeting was held at Amsterdam, organised by the Union Society for the promotion of social science, with a view of obtaining the liberation of F. Domela Nieuwenhuis, imprisoned at Utrecht since the 17th of January past. The president of the Union, M. G. Ribbink, was in the chair. After he had stated that a great number of petitions, asking for Nieuwenhuis' release, had already been sent to the government, that twenty professors of law at the various universities of Holland, had sent in a legal memoir proving that the prisoner was not sentenced in accordance with the laws, that every organised body of workmen in the country had passed resolutions in favour of their friend (although Domela Nieuwenhuis himself had never condescended to write one single line on his own behalf) the chairman called on Prof. Dr. A. Pierson who moved that "the committee of the Union on behalf of the people gathered in the Hall Stroucken at Amsterdam, should be instructed to call on the Minister of Justice and demand the immediate release of the prisoner." This resolution was seconded and supported by Dr. Benjamins, Prof. Kemman, Dr. van der Goes, and comrades van der Stadt, Fortuyn, Kooper, and Simons. All the speakers protested against the idea of asking the king's pardon for Nieuwenhuis; they asked only for immediate and unconditional release.

Recht voor Allen has adhered, in the name of the Dutch worker's organisations, to the resolutions put forward by the Socialist organisation of Antwerp relating to the political interference of the workers in the parliamentarian and radical humbug. They strongly contend against having anything whatever to do with Radical or non-Radical bourgeoisdom. In the long run, all fallacies will vanish and be swept away! D.

SWEDEN.

Comrades Palm, Nordman, and Danielson have just returned from a long propaganda campaign in the provinces, and their report states that they were exceedingly successful. They have noticed almost everywhere a good spirit of solidarity among the workers and a strong desire to check the evils of commercialism. They intend now to set forth their work of propaganda by issuing at regular periods pamphlets of a theoretical character. As comrade Palm, who has been until now the editor of the paper Social Demokrat, at Stockholm, has been sentenced to one month's imprisonment and has further on to answer two other charges for contempt of the legislative chambers, the editorship of the paper will in the future rest on comrade Hjalmar Branting. REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, August 3, T. Dalziel lectured on "Communist Art." Good discussion followed. On Sunday, August 7, an open-air meeting was held on the Green, addressed by Blundell. In our hall, a successful "social" was held by Blundell and friends, after open-air meeting. Literature has steady sale.—A. T. and W. B.

HOXTON.—On Thursday evening last, the usual outdoor meeting was held opposite Hoxton church, comrades Pope and Allman addressing a good audience. On Sunday morning, the outdoor meeting was a very large one. H. A. Barker, who addressed the meeting, met with a most hearty and enthusiastic reception. Good sale of literature. In the evening, at our new place of meeting, Geo. Bernard Shaw gave a very interesting lecture on the subject, "Why Socialists don't act up to their Principles," followed by a good discussion, in which comrades Jas. Allman, J. J. Allman, Ackland, Larner, Pope, Turner, and H. Barker joined.—C. J. Y.

MERTON AND MITCHAM.—On Sunday last, comrades Fitzgerald (Socialist Union), Sparling, Kitz, and Eden (Socialist League), addressed an attentive audience on the Fair Green, Mitcham. In the evening at Merton club-room, comrades Morris and Lane met the members of the Mitcham, Merton, and Croydon branches, and an interesting discussion took place as to the best plan of agitation for the district. The following proposals were adopted: A speakers' class be formed, whereat the most difficult points of Socialism should be threshed out, and the speakers' class should be also a literary circle, purchasing what books of reference are needed, and thus increase the library at the disposal of these branches; further, that we take steps to form a co-operative community in the immediate vicinity of London, and with that end in view issue shares to purchase one of the many estates which are now going begging to the jerry builders. We opine that such a community would have a ready sale for its farm produce in London, and would also afford a pleasant rendezvous to Radical and Socialist clubs for outings. Sale of Commonweal this week, 52. Collection, 2s 6d.—F. K.

NORTH LONDON.—The adjourned debate was resumed between comrade Wardle and Morley on Tuesday last. Brookes and Doughty also addressed an attentive audience. At Regent's Park, Brookes, Mainwaring, and Beckett spoke. A debate is arranged for Sunday next, subject: "Will Parliamentary Action further the interests of Socialism?" Collection, 5s. At Hyde Park, the largest audience we have as yet had, listened to our speakers last Sunday. Brookes, Turner, Nicoll, Mainwaring, Sampson, and Murphy spoke. Collection, 2s. 10½d.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday forenoon, Glasier, and Lamont (S.D.F.) addressed a good audience on Jail Square. In the afternoon, meetings were held at Paisley Road Toll and Jail Square, Glasier, Downie, and Warrington being the speakers. In the evening in our room a business meeting was held. There was good sale of Commonweal at all the meetings.

LEEDS.—Taking advantage of the fine weather during the holidays, a few of us determined upon a little propaganda into the outlying districts of Leeds, and selected Rothwell—a mining district—for our first experiment. We distributed a quantity of literature, and created an unusual stir, and in making the acquaintance of four sympathetic men on the way home, who promised to help us in our future propagandist arrangements in Rothwell, and with whom we are now in correspondence. On the Tuesday we visited Churwell and Morley, and distributed five goodly-sized parcels of literature. At the latter place we got a meeting together, and Braithwaite, Hill, and myself addressed them for about an hour. The affair was a success, and will, I believe, result in the formation of a branch.—T. PAYLOR.

NORWICH.—On Monday, the 8th inst., we held a meeting at Coltishall, being our first visit, which was very successful. On Thursday, Henderson and Cantwell addressed a large meeting at Yarmouth. On Sunday morning, a meeting was held at Diss and also at Coltishall, at which latter place we sold a good stock of Commonweal. In the afternoon a large crowd assembled in the Norwich Market-place. At the close of Henderson's lecture, opposition was called for but was not forthcoming. In the evening on the Agricultural Hall Plain, Slaughter and Morley spoke. At eight o'clock in the Gordon Hall, Henderson lectured on "Emigration."—J. S.

PELSALL.—On Wednesday, comrade Weaver, of Walsall, addressed an outdoor meeting here, and was attentively listened to by a good audience. Meetings will be held here every Wednesday outdoor, so long as weather permits. This branch has every appearance of being a powerful centre of ironworkers and miners. On Sunday last, comrades Weaver and Russell visited several outlying towns for the purpose of arranging for lectures and distributing literature.

WALSALL.—On Tuesday last we broke new ground at Great Bridge, a small town five miles from here, right in the heart of the Black Country. Hundreds of skilled workmen are on the verge of starvation, and the people generally and their homes show clearly the rottenness of the present system. The men seemed to fully realise the hopeless position in which they are placed, for they applauded our speaker's references to the delusive dogmas of Liberals, Tories, and Radicals. Deakin and Sanders were the speakers.

WEDNESBURY.—This branch will very soon be in thorough working order. Up to the present a great difficulty has been experienced in getting a suitable meeting-room. On Thursday evening, comrades Deakin, Weaver, and Sanders, of the Walsall Branch, spoke for them in the Market-place. The audience numbered several hundreds, and listened attentively. Several questions were put at the close, of the usual block type. A good sale of literature, and several more names to the branch closed a good meeting.

WOOLWICH.—At the Arsenal Gates, last Sunday, Hennessy spoke to a large audience, and was supported by Thornton, Macdonald, and Banner. Literature again sold well, and 7s. 1d. collected towards defraying expenses of Irish delegation.—R. B.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

Galashiels.—A very large meeting—the first in the town—was held on Tuesday last in the market square. Mahon challenged a temperance speaker who was abusing Socialism, but this went unheeded. After the Socialist meeting had closed, Mahon was called upon by the audience and went to the temperance platform, and an animated discussion ensued, which went on till after ten o'clock. A large amount of literature was sold.

Broxburn.—Mahon spent two days amongst the shale-miners locked-out in Broxburn and the surrounding districts. Two very large meetings were held, and Socialist principles met with hearty acceptance. The first meeting was presided over by one of the checkweighmen and the second by Mr. John Wilson, the popular and energetic secretary of the Shale-Miners in Scotland. A full report will be found in another column.

Cowdenbeath.—The second Socialist meeting was held here last Friday afternoon. A large attendance of miners gave a most sympathetic hearing to the speaker. Mahon, in passing, severely criticised the Labour M.P.'s, and condemned the action of the Five miners who voted £100 to the salaries of Burt and Fenwick, M.P.'s. The men did not seem to know that this had been done and were unanimously against doing it. A good collection was made; fair sale of literature and 24 names taken to form a branch.

Dunfermline.—On Friday night a meeting was held in the public park. The address dealt chiefly with trade depression and labour federation. The inhuman conduct of the responsible officials at the Forth Bridge works was severely commented on. Some questions were asked, and answered to the satisfaction of the audience. Mr. M'Allister, chairman of the "Glasgow and West of Scotland Vigilance Association," made a general attack upon Socialism, and was answered in lively and effective manner. It was arranged later on that a two nights' set debate should be held in Dunfermline.

Leith.—A splendid meeting was held at the Quay-side on Sunday morning at ten o'clock. Tuke and Mahon spoke. The police interfered with us for obstructing the street, but ten yards off the ground belonged to the Dock Company, and here the meeting was continued. There were some very interesting questions and some discussion also. Good collection and sale of literature, and some names taken for membership. Some seamen were present, and one of them spoke to the members after the lecture. In a few weeks we will have some special meetings of seamen and get them or, anised if possible.

Edinburgh.—On Thursday evening at our weekly discussion class we had a visit from some fifteen or sixteen German Socialists, who are at present working as glassblowers at Portobello, a place about three miles from Edinburgh. We got a very interesting account of how the cause is progressing in Germany from one of them. They kindly consented to our request to hear a revolutionary German song, and sang the Marseillaise in splendid style. Before parting, we all joined in giving three cheers for the coming social revolution.

Calton Hill.—A meeting of railway men in connection with the strike on the Midland Railway was announced for last Sunday afternoon, and Mahon and Smith went there with the expectation of addressing them; but for some reason or other none turned up. A good meeting was held all the same, and a fair collection got and a good quantity of literature disposed of. Queen's Park.—In the evening Smith, Mahon, Gilray, and Tuke spoke to an audience of over four hundred. Two names taken for membership. Good collection and fair sale of literature made.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

NOTES ON NEWS.

"My losses," said Universal Provider Whiteley referring to the fire at his establishment, "amount to £525,000"; and a few months back a poor carter was sentenced to imprisonment for taking a few articles of paltry value, his defence being that his wages, about 11s. per week, were too small to support himself and family. Does "my gross losses" include some unpaid labour?

It is a moot point whether it is fair of us to kill and eat our fellow-lodgers on this earth—sheep, pigs and oxen. Archdeacon Farrar likes meat, so does his family; but, says his Reverence, "grave social problems are before mankind for solution," and hence he attends a vegetarian feed and says in fact that the solution will be arrived at by the "poor" consuming raw and cooked vegetables; and the vegetarian establishment for whom he delivered this advertisement, proceeds to solve this great social problem by selling tea and coffee at 3d. per cup, and draw attention to their "special rooms for ladies."

Such are the saviours of society. There are places in London neither infested with Archdeacons nor troubled with grave social problems, where for the same sum a working man could get a breakfast or tea (four slices of bread and cup of tea or coffee) and be thanked for his custom.

Whilst old and infirm human beings are working their aged limbs in pain to procure food, or being driven to the workhouse torture, our humane "upper" classes are stricken with sorrow for the sufferings of aged and infirm horses. Mr. S. Sutherland Safford and Miss Linde have established a home for aged and sick equines and the supporters are highly influential people. It would be interesting to know how many human beings are being worked to death to keep these idlers and their horses. The chief result of their efforts as yet is seen in the depressed condition of the cats'-meat trade and the ruined position of many vendors of pussy's meat, the supply of which is restricted owing to the society's interference with the law of supply and demand.

F. K.

The Midland strike has failed ignominiously, if appearances can be trusted. This was to have been expected from the first, inasmuch as there was little or no organisation, no mutual trust, and no safeguard against "rats." When the strike took place against a change, grasping and cynical as could well be conceived, there was a large number of men who did not come out. No efficient measures were taken to convince these of their error in acting treacherously to their comrades. A vigilance committee of strikers should have at once endeavoured strenuously to bring these "men" to a sense of their position.

Even now a little gentle expostulation might bring them to repentance!

All through the affair the men have shown a praiseworthy regard for the rights of property which forbid them to earn a reasonable livelihood: they did not use all the power they had to paralyse the whole Midland system. By their "self-restrained demeanour" they have earned the Thanks of the Directors and the Admiration of Law-abiding Citizens.

TIME: a few months hence. SCENE: a driver's cottage. PERSONS: Driver and Wife.—Wife: "Well, I wish you fellows had had the pluck of them Yankees, and shown the directors you were in earnest and that you wern't the white-livered, whining curs they took you for; and then I shouldn't have to slave my life out to keep the kids clean, and take in washing besides to make ends meet!" Driver: "Oh, but then we should have broken the law!"

Over at Elton, co. Limerick, there has been little heed paid to the law this last week. By long and dire experience the Irish people have found that it does not pay to win landlords' praises and rent-collectors' compliments. An ounce of rent retained by a tenant is worth a ton of soft-sawder laid out by a landlord.

But how many of the English workers are not tickled to death when an exploiter compliments them on their "law-abiding" ways? Even those who have courage enough to equal the Limerick labourers, and face rifle and bayonet armed with a pitchfork, would succumb forthwith to the syren voice of Law and Order if it called them "Law-abiding British Citizens."

Meanwhile it is easy to see how rapidly grows the power of Socialism in this country. Only last week Reynolds—a paper which, however disinterested it may be, dare not go "beyond its market"—came out with a displayed leader calling in plain terms for the communalisation of the means of production without compensation. S.

The Government are taking credit to themselves for their Allotment Bill; and Mr. Jesse Collings, ex-Radical and now coercionist, has been buttering them all over for this "popular" piece of legislation. Sir William Harcourt has nothing better to say about it than to twit his political opponents with inconsistency, reminding them that when a similar measure was talked of before, its furtherers were called Socialists. "But now," says he, "it seems we are all Socialists." Really this is very poor stuff; it will not be the last time by a great many that the Government, Liberal or Tory, will bait their hook with similar pieces of "Socialistic" legislation. All one can hope is that those whom they are fishing for will learn to suck the bait off the hook without touching the latter, like wily old carp, if it is any use to them.

But as to this allotment scheme, J. S. Mill said all that was necessary when he said it was simply allowing the labourers to work to pay their own poor-rates. The bill is really in the interests of the employing farmers and the rack-renting landlords.

Mr. Bradlaugh, lecturing at the Fulham Liberal Association on "National Economy," is reported to have said "that working-men were quarrelling about a small percentage on wages while they allowed this monstrous war-expenditure to eat up the bread-and-cheese that should be in their cupboards." Yes, doubtless, the war expenditure is monstrous. Don't let workmen believe that supposing it were put an end to they would be any better off while labour and its earnings is forbidden to any one who cannot find a capitalist who can employ him. If the war-expenditure were stopped it would be necessary to find some other means of wasting the working-man's labour that would put money into the capitalists' pocket; and meantime, until that other means was found, trade would be the duller for it. Under the idiotic system which oppresses us, all destruction of wares, all consumption of them, however consumed, is temporarily "good for trade," advantageous to the actual producer in the lump.

But, after all, it is impossible to get rid of war expenditure or of war as long as all Society is based on war, commercial war; it is the struggle for the market that arrays the battalions in the field; the necessities of the capitalist is what brings on war now-a-days.

As to "the working-man quarrelling over a small percentage of wages," if he did not do so, if he had not been doing so ever since the birth of commercialism, bread, or rather skilly without the cheese would have been his roast meat by this time. Commercial war compels the capitalist to cheapen production to the utmost, the method of cheapening it is to reduce the amount of human labour to the utmost; the ensuring competition among the workmen for employment (for since they are slaves they cannot employ themselves) keeps down wages. Any combination among the workmen checks this tendency, and is good as far as it goes; but the partial combination of trades' unions and the like must develop into general combination, which will at last assuredly destroy the war of classes which is the foundation of our Society of waste, strife, and robbery—at last—might the workers but see it at once and set on foot that great combination before the pinch of utter misery which will come of the breakdown of our short-sighted system of commercial war, a war which Mr. Bradlaugh looks on with complacency, although, as aforesaid, it is the parent of the open war which he has (very rightly) been denouncing.

The Daily News, commenting on the meeting of the S.D.F., which demanded the release of Pole, is really a trifle too absurd even for a bourgeois print on a Monday morning. It admits the strong case of the Socialist, but says, alluding to the hanging of Endacott in effigy: "If they had asked for it in another way, the appeal must have commanded wide-spread attention." In other words, according to the Daily News, the justice or injustice of the sentence on a citizen de-depends on the good or ill manners of certain other citizens who demand his release, and not on his own conduct. Really, is the Daily News then to be made responsible for Lord Salisbury's Coercion Act? or are we to be made responsible for the Monday morning fatuities of the Daily News? Here is solidarity with a vengeance!

WILLIAM MORRIS.

WOODEN LEGS.

WE have had our Bank Holiday; the clerk is back to his bank or shop stool, the factory hand and seamstress to their machines, the hodmen and labourers all over our happy islands to their general drudgery. They think, perhaps, of the advantages of the single day's festivity, of cheap trains and omnibuses to carry them into towns, or out of them, into such country as is left.

The other day I was in the drinking bar of a village near to the Canadian Backwoods. There was sitting there a sturdy-looking man with his back leaning against one end of a bench; he had a rough cloth lying across his knees, and all that I could see of his legs as they lay extended along the bench, was that they were very short and ended in wooden stumps. I began to express sympathy for the calamity from which he had suffered. "Calamity is a strong word," said he, "I hardly think they were worth so much." I admired the bravery with which he looked on his loss, and asked him how it had happened. "Why," said he, "I had been working all alone at clearing a place out in the forest, and at sunset just as I was about to leave work a tree toppled over, and one of its branches catching me unawares knocked me down and the trunk fell across one of my legs." "How horrible!" said I. "Horrible is a strong word," said he, "I was not so bad off as that, for I had my axe with me. So seeing there was no chance of help in that out of the way place and at that time of night, I just chopped off the leg that was held fast by the tree-trunk." "Brave, bold man!" said I. "Bold is a strong word," said he, "it did not need much of that, but only a straight chop with the axe." I sat in amazement, but said nothing. "I got up," he continued, "and tried to walk, but found it awkward work with one short and one long leg. So I just put the long one across a log, and my axe soon made it as short as the other. I got on famously after that. It shows what an advantage it is always to have your axe by you." I grasped his hand and cried, "Heroic man! Scaevola was nothing to you; he put one hand into the fire, but you smile at the sacrifice of both legs." He stared and said, "Well, captain, I don't know what you are at with your bold men, and the fellow who burnt his hand, but if chopping through a bit of stick is thought so much of in your country I shall stop here." Slightly abashed, I said, "What an advantage to have wooden legs for trees to fall across!" "Ah!" said he, "they told me what an advantage it was to me that my legs and not my head were in the way of the cannon-ball at Gettysburg. I don't think much of that, but I'd rather have my natural feet to stand on, and to help me out of the way of danger."

The advantages which we now enjoy seem to be of the wooden leg kind. The Sewer Railway, and the other stuffy means of locomotion in and about London, are an advantage perhaps in so widespread a desert; but it would be better that our towns should only be so large that we might easily get from end to end of them on our own legs.

The labourer is said to be now in a more advantageous position. He can ease himself by means of the "free breakfast table" and of the free trade supply of margarine for butter. If, however, he had his own natural powers of mind to help him, instead of the artificial substitute of prejudice and custom, whereby he is caught under the heavy hand of the master, he would be still better off. His reason would tell him that free interchange between all peoples should be an instrument to increase the general good, and not merely a weapon to cut one class free from the oppression of another.

The most wooden-legged of our advantages is our system of instruction, and in particular of technical instruction. The barbarian as he makes a drinking-bowl, a sword, or a temple, puts his fancy into his work, and may be young in heart when grey in head. The Christian child has the thirty-nine articles of usury, ten per cent. profits, and national envy rubbed into his very marrow at a College or a Board School. Under this influence he grows old before he is a boy, and is in a fit state to receive technical knowledge, to learn the art of making things in such a way as to get the better of the foreigner. Well, if the freshness of the heart and mind is to be crushed under the war of competition, it is an advantage of a kind to be instructed in the use of the weapons. But that is the very degradation of education; this should give us an instrument, not of war against our fellows, but to make a clearing in the dense thicket of ignorance and sectarian jealousies.

C. J. F.

PROGRESS?—In addressing the British Medical Association, Sir Thomas Crawford argued that in spite of the boasted improvements in sanitary arrangements, there is an unmistakable deterioration in the physique of the "lower" class. The evidence adduced seems to fully bear out this view. From 1860 to 1864 32,324 men wishing to join the army, were examined by the army surgeons and out of this number the rejections were 371.67 per 1000. From 1882 to 1886 132,583 men were similarly examined, and the proportion of rejections had risen to 415.8 per 1000. Sir Thomas maintained this was good proof that during the last twenty-five years the general physical vigour of the people had very much fallen. A peculiar eye disease due to vitiated atmosphere resulting from overcrowding is very common although quite preventible. The recruits drawn from the towns gave the largest number of rejections.—J. L. M.

FEUDAL ENGLAND.

THE Norman Conquest found a certain kind of feudality in existence in England; a feudality which was developed from the customs of the tribes with little or no admixture of Roman law; and also even before the Conquest, this country was slowly beginning to be mixed up with the affairs of the Continent of Europe, and that not only with the kindred nations of Scandinavia, but with the Romanised countries also. But the Conquest of Duke William did introduce the complete or Romanised Feudal system into the country; and it also connected it by strong bonds to the Romanised countries, but thereby laid the first foundations of national feeling in England. The English felt their kinship with the Norsemen or the Danes, and did not feel their conquests when they had become complete, and consequently mere immediate violence had disappeared from them; their feeling was tribal rather than national; but they could have no sense of co-nationality with the varied populations of the provinces which mere dynastical events had strung together into the dominion, the manor, one may say, of the foreign princes of Normandy and Anjou; and as the kings who ruled them gradually got pushed out of their French possessions, England became conscious of her separate nationality, though still only in a fashion, as the manor of an English lord.

It is beyond the scope of this article to give anything like a connected story, even of the slightest, of the course of events between the conquest of Duke William and the fully developed mediæval period of the 14th century, which is the England that I have before my eyes as Mediæval. That period of the 14th century united the developments of the elements which had been stirring in Europe since the final fall of the Roman Empire, and England shared in the general feeling and spirit of the age, although from its position the course of its history, and to a certain extent the lives of its people was different. It is to this period, therefore, that I wish in the long run to call your attention, and I will only say so much about the earlier period as may be necessary to explain how the people of England got into the position in which they were found by the statute of labourers enacted by Edward III., and the Peasant's Rebellion in the time of his grandson and successor Richard II.

Undoubtedly, then, the Norman Conquest made a complete break in the continuity of the history of England. When the Londoners after the Battle of Hastings accepted Duke William for their king, no doubt they thought of him as being much in the same position that the newly slain Harold had been; or at any rate such a king as Knut the Dane, who had also conquered England; and probably William himself thought no otherwise, but the event was quite different, for on the one hand not only was he a man of great character, able, masterful, and a great soldier in the modern sense of the word, but he had at his back his wealthy dukedom of Normandy, which he had himself reduced to obedience and organised; and, on the other hand, England lay before him, unorganised, yet stubbornly rebellious to him; its very disorganisation and want of a centre making it more difficult to deal with by merely over-running it with an army levied for that purpose, and backed by a body of house-carles or guards, which would have been the method of a Scandinavian or native king in dealing with his rebellious subjects. Duke William's necessities and instincts combined led him into a very different course of action, which determined the future destiny of the country. What he did was to quarter upon England an army of feudal vassals drawn from his obedient dukedom, and to hand over to them the lordship of the land of England in return for their military service to him, the suzerain of them all. Thenceforward, it was under the rule of these foreign landlords that the people of England had to develop.

The development of the country as a Teutonic people was checked and turned aside by this event. Duke William brought, in fact, his Normandy into England, which was thereby changed from a Teutonic people (theod) with the old tribal customary law still in use among them, into a province of Romanised Feudal Europe, a piece of France in short; and though in time she did grow into another England again, she missed for ever in her language, her literature, and her laws, the chance of developing into a great homogeneous Teutonic people infused usefully with a mixture of Celtic blood.

However, this step which Duke William was forced to take, further influenced the future of the country by creating the great order of the baronage, and the history of the early period of England is pretty much that of the struggle of the king with the baronage and the church. For William fixed the type of the successful English mediæval king, of whom Henry II. and Edward I. were also notable examples. It was, in fact, with him that the struggle towards monarchical bureaucracy began, which was checked by the barons, who extorted Magna Charta from King John, and afterwards by the revolt headed by Simon de Montfort in Henry III.'s reign; was carried on vigorously by Edward I., and finally successfully finished by Henry VII. after the long faction-fight of the Wars of the Roses, had weakened the feudal lords so much that they could no longer assert themselves against the monarchy.

As to the contest between the Crown and the Church, two things are to be noted: first, that at least in the earlier period the Church was on the popular side. Thomas Beckett was canonised, it is true, formally and by regular decree; but his memory was held so dear by the people that he would probably have been canonized informally by them if the holy seat at Rome had refused to do so. The second thing to be noted about the dispute is this, that it was no contest of principle. According to the mediæval theory of life and religion, the Church and the State were one: separate manifestations of the Kingdom of God upon earth which was part of the Kingdom of God in heaven; the king was an officer of that realm and a liegeman of God. The doctor of laws and the doctor of physic partook in a degree of the priestly character. On the other hand the Church was not withdrawn from the everyday life of men; the division into a worldly and spiritual life neither of which had much to do with the other, was a creation of the protestantism of the Reformation, and had no place in the practice at least of the mediæval Church, which we cannot too carefully remember is little more represented by modern Catholicism than by modern Protestantism. The contest, therefore, between the Crown and the Church was a mere bickering between two bodies, without any essential antagonism between them as to how far the administration of either reached: neither dreamed of subordinating one to the other, far less of extinguishing one by the other.

The history of the Crusades, by the way, illustrates very emphatically this position of the Church in the Middle Ages. The foundation of that strange feudal kingdom of Jerusalem, whose king had precedence in virtue of his place as lord of the centre of Christianity over all other kings and princes; the orders of men-at-arms vowed to poverty and chastity, like the Templars and Knights of St. John; and above all the unquestioning sense of duty that urged men of all classes and kinds into the holy war, show how strongly the idea of God's kingdom on the earth had taken hold of all men's minds in the early Middle Ages. As to the result of the Crusades, they certainly had their influence on the solidification of Europe and the great feudal system, at the head of which, in theory at least, were the Pope and the Kaiser. Doubtless, also, the intercourse with the East gave Europe an opportunity of sharing in the mechanical civilisation of the peoples originally dominated by the Arabs, and infused by the art of Byzantium and Persia, not without some tincture of the cultivation of the later classical period.

The stir and movement also of the Crusades, and the necessities in which they involved the princes and their barons, furthered the upward movement of the classes that lay below the feudal vassals, great and little; the principal opportunity for which movement, however, in England, was given by the continuous struggle between the Crown and the Church and Baronage.

The early Norman kings, even immediately after the death of the Conqueror, found themselves involved in this struggle, and were forced to avail themselves of the help of what had now become the inferior tribe—the native English, to wit. Henry I., an able and ambitious man, understood this so clearly that he made a distinct bid for the favour of the inferior tribe by marrying an English princess; and it was by means of the help of his English subjects that he conquered his Norman subjects, and the field of Tenchebray, which put the coping-stone on his success, was felt by the English people as an English victory over the oppressing tribe with which Duke William had overwhelmed the English people. It was during this king's reign and under these influences that the trading and industrial classes began to rise somewhat. The merchant guilds (of which subject of guilds more hereafter) were now in their period of greatest power, and had hardly begun, as they did later, to develop into the corporations of the towns; but the towns themselves were beginning to gain their freedom and to become an important element in the society of the time, as little by little they asserted themselves against the arbitrary rule of the feudal lords, lay or ecclesiastical: for as to the latter, it must be remembered that the Church included in herself the orders or classes into which lay society was divided, and while by its lower clergy of the parishes and (afterwards) by the friars it touched the people, its upper clergy were simply feudal lords; and as the religious fervour of the "cultivated clergy," which was marked enough in the earlier period of the Middle Ages (in Anselm, for example), faded out, they became more and more mere landlords, although from the conditions of their landlordism, living as they did on their land and amidst of their tenants, less oppressive than the lay landlords.

We cannot help thinking that there is something wanting in the moral make-up of a Reformer who is less anxious that the right shall triumph, than that his share in the winning of a victory shall be duly recognised.—Canada Labor Reformer.

The Midland strike has collapsed. The last hope of the men was extinguished when the shareholders declared their approbation of the conduct of the directors. It was clear that the Chairman knew he had the whip hand when he politely told the memorialising members of Parliament who addressed his board, with a view to a settlement of the dispute through mediation or further conference, to mind their own business. The strike, which was doomed from the first by the men's want of courage and of union, may be useful in reading the men a severe lesson in the necessity for organisation and extended union. It is not yet apparent why the company seized the height of the excursion season to drive their engine-men to revolt—unless it was to demonstrate both to their servants and to the public how easily they can afford to be autocratic. The mere money loss it will take them a generation or two to recoup from the saving effected by the new arrangement. But the moral injustice of requiring the men to hold themselves at the call of the company from week's end to week's end, and yet paying them only by the piece as they happen to be employed—that the company will not get over at all; it will stand recorded against them for ever. The moral support that the men have received from those engaged on other railways, as well as from the public sense of fairness, may yet prove effective in ways that the Midland does not now think it necessary to include in its calculations. Moral principles live long, and they have shrewd ways of avenging their violation.—Weekly Dispatch.

"AWKWARD FOR THE COO."

STEPHENSON, before the Board, questioned by a noble lord:—
"But suppose a cow should stray in the locomotive's way?" answered with a twinkling eye, chuckled, too, with humour sly;
"Yes," said he, "that's very true, 'twill be awkward for the coo."

Pompous dull capitalist, see the moral be not missed;
resolute and undismay'd forward goes the New Crusade, seeks instead of care and strife fellowship and joy of life.
Awkward it will be for you if you choose to play the "coo."

ON THE IRISH EVICTIONS.

As when a haunting sense of personal shame
Broods, a grim night-hag, on a sleeper's soul,
Who sees and hears, yet vainly would control
Some monstrous deed enacted in his name,
Albeit he loathes it—till with heart aflame
He bursts the hideous bondage of his sleep;
So feel we now, who sit at home and weep
At this dark blot on our fair England's fame.
Shall they who for their outraged homes have fought,
As Englishmen would fight, ay, nobly and well,
Be flung like felons into prison-cell?
Shall these curst deeds month after month be wrought
By English hands? Speak, England! Let us break
The spell of this foul dream. Arise, awake!

An Open Letter.—To Scab Carpenters and Renegades from a Boss.

BELOVED SCABS,—I am glad to know you are with us, i.e., that you favour the combination of your employers. We are organised for the purpose of saving men like you from yourselves. We will protect you from the tyranny of the trades' unions. We will restore you your ten-hour day as soon as we can crush out (and with your aid we will soon accomplish our object) those societies which are continually clamouring for what they foolishly call working-men's rights. We are glad that you know your rights as freemen. These labour organisations would deprive you of your individual liberty, to choose for yourselves. What right have these organisations to compel you to pay dues to support walking delegates in idleness? We are pleased to know that you have taken a stand against such extortions. We are with you all the time. There is no telling to what condition we all may be reduced if this labour agitation is kept up. If it is not sat down upon, capital will build no more houses, and then we'd all be in a nice box, wouldn't we? We learn with much satisfaction that quite a number of carpenters have been suspended for non-payment of dues: Sensible men are they! We are gratified to know that in Baltimore, at least, there is no such thing as moral sympathy among the building trades. Why should the painters on a job quit work because the tin-roofers on the building are scabs? To do so has a tendency to strengthen organised labour upon the whole, and that is what you and I don't want. If you are willing to work for starvation wages, who shall attempt to prevent you? Your skill and labour is your own, and you should be let alone, too. We will reduce wages as soon as we have broken up these labour organisations, that want to put a price on labour. They should be content to take what we offer. The time is coming, if you scabs do your duty to us and yourselves, when there will be perfect harmony in the building trades, no strikes then, you know. You may all work then on the go-as-you-please plan, every one for himself, as it were. No one will be called a "scab" when we all get there. And we will get there if you will persuade those organised fellows that the Knights of Labour and trade unions are no good. The good old days of piece-work, long hours, and low wages will then have been restored, and strikes, lock-outs, and all that sort of rubbish be heard of no more. To the suspended members of the carpenters' organisations, I would say that we are ready to reduce wages and go back to the ten-hour system as soon as you are able to burst up those nonsensical labour societies. You can aid us, if you will, and you are certainly pursuing the right course in refusing to pay your dues and pronouncing the organisation N.G. Keep up the good work, scabs and renegades, for we are with you—until you have succeeded in wiping out the last vestige of an organisation in your trade, and then—you will be able to take care of yourselves.—Baltimore Free Press.

Now and then we see some smart twaddler talking about the community of interest which there is between Capital and Labour, and nine times in ten he don't know there is any difference between the assisting of labour by capital, and the plundering of labour by capitalists.—Canada Labour Reformer.

The Socialists have been accused of "warring against the family." But you, comrades, should know that all well-conducted families are governed on communistic principles. Each member is expected to work according to his or her ability, and each receives from the household stock according to his or her needs. Therefore it is not we who oppose the family arrangement, but our calumniators and antagonists. We wish to extend the family arrangement, not to destroy it. So much for one of the everlasting lies.—RADICAL JACK in Chicago Labour Enquirer.

RAILWAY ROBBERY.

THE following facts regarding railways and the way the receipts are divided will be of interest:

Cost of building railways.

ITEMS.	Cost per mile.	Per cent.
Legal and Parliamentary expenses	2,000	5½
Land and compensation	7,000	19½
Works of construction and stations	18,000	50
Locomotive and carrying stock	3,000	8
Interest on stock, discounts, bonuses, dividends from capital during construction, contingencies, etc.	6,000	17

(AUTHORITY—'Encyclopædia Britannica,' art. "Railways," last edition.)

- Note—(1) That 42 per cent. of the nominal cost of railway construction is paid to lawyers, landlords, company promoters, etc., etc., etc.
(2) That under the item "works of construction" is included the plunder seized by landlords under heading of MINING ROYALTIES and WAXLEAVE RENTS on the coal and iron used in the works.
(3) It is stated by Mr. Morrison Davidson that £50,000,000 over the market-value of the land have been paid to landlords for the land used by railways.

The nominal value of the railways of this country is £800,000,000—employing 400,000 men and boys, each employé using a capital of £2000. Allowing 50 per cent as over-statement in valuation, still £1000 per head of capital is worked by the employés. This fact should show advocates of co-operative production how impossible it is for the working population to create by thrift sufficient capital to free themselves from the control of the privileged class.

Division of the Earnings of Railway Companies.

	Per cent.
Total working expenditure, including wages and material for renewing plant ¹	52.6 of gross earning.
Payments to shareholders and bondholders, amounting in all to £33,000,000 per ann. ¹	47.4 do.
On the average, each railway man earns £50 a-year for himself and £80 for the usurers. ²

AUTHORITY {¹ 'Encyclopædia Britannica,' article "Railways."
² Edward Carpenter's researches.

Examples of the division of NET earnings on English and foreign railway companies, taken from their balance-sheets.

RAILWAY.	Interest for half a year.	Wages for half a year.
North Eastern Railway Co.	1,380,000	920,000
Midland Railway Co.	1,680,000	1,160,000
London and North Western Railway Co. ...	2,535,000	1,479,000
India Scinde and Punjab Railway	302,000	147,000
Brazil San Paulo Railway	159,000	42,000

These figures are about eighteen months old, but the proportion of interest to wages remains the same, so that the figures are as valuable as later ones.

Note—When the net earnings are divided in this fashion, it is not at all surprising that railway men grumble at their bad wages. THE RANK AND FILE ARE WORKING FIVE MONTHS IN THE YEAR FOR THEMSELVES AND SEVEN MONTHS FOR THE SHAREHOLDERS AND BONDHOLDERS. It must not be supposed that all railway men get starvation wages. Pompous old autocrats like Sir E. Watkin, and other chairmen and directors, receive their £5000, and sometimes more, a-year for doing work of practically no value to the community, Treatment of the Public by the Shareholders.

The safety and convenience of the public, the trade of the country, and the health and comfort of the employés, are all made subservient to increasing their dividends a half per cent. Heavy inland rates are charged on minerals, bricks, fish, fruit, etc., to such an extent as often to swallow up in freight-charges the value of the commodities carried, thus preventing useful and cheap food-stuffs being put on the markets in large towns. In other cases commodities for export have to pay such high tolls that English goods are prevented making their way on the markets of the world. Again, cheap rates are quoted to foreigners which are denied to English manufacturers, the difference in favour of the foreigner being practically a bounty offered to foreign manufacturers to export to England. Railway companies sometimes make up their minds to develop a district, at others to destroy one, according to their caprice, or as it pays them. A notable example of railway boycotting is that of the North Eastern at Sunderland, where it is stated by inhabitants of that town, that because Sunderland would not sell her docks to the North Eastern Railway, the company has used every means to injure the docks, by high freight, bad service, etc.

The summary of the matter is that these railway corporations own the principal highways of England, and use them simply and solely to make the most money out of their monopoly, no matter at what cost to the community. The question is, are we going to let them boss the country in their own interests? or are we going to insist on these highways being controlled in the interest of all?

"CONCERNING USURY."

Perhaps I may be allowed to ask Mr. Morrison Davidson what ground he has for believing that the economical condition of the workers would be improved by "the repeal of all laws guaranteeing the collection of usury." His remedy is, I think, identical with that advocated by adherents of the anti-usury school represented by W. C. Sillar, and one is therefore forced reluctantly to conclude that Mr. Davidson, like these good people, uses the term usury in its narrow sense. He seems to forget that the workers are not recognised by law as the borrowers of the capital they use (or in current phrase, they are employed with), although they are in reality the borrowers, seeing that it is ultimately from them alone usury, or payment for the use of capital, is extracted in the shape of rent, interest, and profit. Borrowing and lending transactions, recognised as such, are for the most part concluded between members of the exploiting class, and consequently, legislation concerning these transactions would only affect the division of the spoil between the members of that class.

To put the question in a concrete form: Can Mr. Davidson demonstrate that the workers, say, in the woollen trade, would receive equitable remuneration for their labour, were the capital employed in that department of industry the property of the managing owners alone, instead of the joint property of managing owners and sleeping partners as at present? Can he show that the wages of, say, railway servants would be raised, were the shareholders relieved by Act of Parliament of the obligation to pay interest on the capital they borrow from the debenture holders? In short, can he hold out a reasonable prospect that capitalists would, on the repeal of the laws referred to, cease to appropriate the surplus-value created by labour?

It might be easy for him to do this, if the workers received legal recognition as borrowers of the land, mines, factories, railways, etc., etc., and if payment of rent, interest, and profit to the capitalist were forced from labour by the aid of certain laws. But, as far as I can see, there are no laws to repeal, regulating the transactions between the capitalists and the workers, the real borrowers. The price of labour-power is not regulated by law, but is determined by free competition.

The abolition of usury can only be accomplished, as T. S. Barrett says, by Socialism pure and simple. The land and the means of production must be taken out of private hands and managed for the good of the whole community, instead of for the benefit of the few as at present. And to effect this, the workers need not think that all they have to do is to send up representatives to Parliament to sit and repeal laws—or even to enact them. Parliament helps those that help themselves. The emancipation of labour can only be wrought out by the people themselves, for even if Parliament were willing to do everything in its power for Socialism, the great task of bringing social order out of the present chaos, of organising industry on the basis of justice, must from the very nature of the case be done out of Parliament, in every trade and occupation, in every corner of the land.

J. HALDANE SMITH.

LENDING MONEY.

Mr. Davidson recommends an Act of Parliament to make interest irrecoverable at law, and if it should be found that such an Act failed to suppress the exaction of interest, he would make the principal likewise irrecoverable by legal process.

Is not all this "putting the cart before the horse"? Such Acts as he proposes no Parliament could make whilst the majority of the nation is unconverted to Socialism. When we are all Socialists, on the other hand, such Acts would no longer be needed. Nay more, an Act virtually forbidding the loan of money even free of interest would be positively mischievous. For it is quite possible to imagine men clubbing together in order to raise a sufficient sum for some public object, for which money might be required temporarily. It would not be right if such public-spirited subscribers to the undertaking were liable to the forfeiture of the money lent.

Things borrowed should be returned to the owners. Money borrowed is no exception. Giving is one thing; lending is another.

The evil of interest lies where the lender is lending for the purpose of making a profit. Hence we get a large number of persons living on money which no one has earned. In the present state of society this cannot be avoided. For why is money borrowed usually? In order that the borrower may trade with it and get a profit out of it himself. The lender merely claims a portion of the profit made by the borrower.

But if we had a Socialist state of society, there would no longer, I presume, be businesses carried on for profit—at any rate, no businesses where the workers are wage-receivers. Hence, the greatest source of borrowed capital (and consequently of usury) would be dried up.

Another great evil of interest lies in its continuance ad infinitum. This produces national debts, and families living for generations on the labour of others. A Socialist community might perhaps prevent this by declaring that every periodical payment from borrower to lender shall be deemed, not interest, but part of the principal returned. The debt would thus be repaid in instalments, instead of remaining undiminished at the end of many years. If this plan had been adopted, the National Debt would long ago have been wiped out.

T. S. BARRETT.

"LEADERS OF THE PEOPLE."

The statement as to the rise of rent and wages attributed to me by "J. M. G." in the last number of the Commonweal, is, as he will see by reference to the article on which he writes, a quotation from Mr. Mulhall.

"But why have rents so risen?" I am asked. They have risen because the propertied class has exercised its legal right to rob the labouring portion of the community in proportion to the productiveness of its labour.

From the labour of the workers in the United Kingdom each year £200,000,000 is taken per force, by the landlord class as rent. This huge sum divided among the 37,000,000 of its inhabitants amounts to a trifle more than £5 8s. per head. In England and Wales the gross rental is £172,653,906, the rateable value is £145,527,944, and this latter amount divided among the twenty-seven and a-half millions inhabitants comes to about £5 5s. per head. There is no reason which can be justified on moral grounds why this should be paid at all.

The abolition of the laws of hypothec and distraint might slightly lower rents, but this gain would only be temporary. Permanent gain can only be obtained by the community becoming its own landowner and lord. Both of these it can be when private ownership in the necessities of life is no longer possible. This is where the shoe pinches; "spot" it.

Moral: Nationalise the land and means of production.

H. A. BARKER.

A NOTE FROM JAPAN.

THE following is taken from an interesting note from a member of the Hammersmith Branch now in Japan:

"The social arrangements here are most interesting. The people are at a stage somewhat representing that of England three hundred years ago. The first impression is that the whole people are a race of retail shop keepers, and one wonders how they live by distribution of wealth alone; but now one perceives that the retail shops are also the work shops. The goods sold in the shops are also made in them by the whole of the members of the family, who also live in the place. The consequences are very well worthy of note. There is no competitive system; no cutting of profits. The family works away easily and quietly—smoking and sleeping, and indeed, as we would call it idling a good deal; but working for no master, and not working in competition with machinery, consequently quite certain of a subsistence, except in the case of too great idleness. Note also that the peculiar feature of Japanese goods, that they are artistic, so that the whole of Europe is going mad about them, is due to this fact, that they are made by hand, each by an individual who stamps the mark of his individuality on the article. It is due to this much more than to any innate artistic capacity on the part of the Japanese. I now quite understand, for the first time, the hatred that Ruskin and Morris have for machinery. There can be no doubt that could the benefit be ensured for the people, machinery might be introduced with advantage in many cases. For example, one sees the grinding of corn done by revolving, by hand, one small millstone on the top of another, and many other such like things which could undoubtedly be done better by machinery than by hand; but I have little doubt that a 'manufacturing system' here would do, on the whole, much more harm than good. Think of Tokio as it is at present, a city of over 1,000,000 inhabitants, and so far as can be seen, no squalid poverty anywhere, and filled with a gay laughing people who seem to live, not to vegetate, as the London 'people' do.

W. K. BURTON.

Antiquity, what is it else but man's authority born some ages before us? Now, for the truth of things, time makes no alteration; things are still the same as they are, let the time be past, present, or to come. Those things which we reverence for antiquity, what were they at their first birth? Were they false?—time cannot make them true. Were they true?—time cannot make them more true. The circumstance, therefore, of time, in respect of truth and error is merely impertinent.—John Hales (the "ever-memorable.")

A LETTER FROM AUSTRALIA.

THE defeat of the Illawarri miners was a severe blow to the labouring community, and already in one branch of maritime industry a reduction of from 10 to 20 per cent. has been enforced. Scores of men who made themselves prominent during the strike found themselves practically boycotted by the colliery proprietors from gaining employment. Some idea of the condition of the labouring classes in New South Wales at the present time may be obtained from this short extract from the Melbourne Age of June 4th: "Every little township has its band of unemployed, while gangs of destitute have their passage paid across the southern border." John Norton, the Labour delegate, has returned. When interviewed by an Adelaide reporter, he said, "English trade unions are to-day mere benefit societies; their power for material good is nil. The Radical clubs and Socialist organisations are rapidly taking their place." Since his arrival in Sydney he has been asked to stand for South Sydney, but he declined. Several hundred men are receiving a free meal every day from a restaurant-keeper in Bourke Street, Melbourne. When I was there, there was a dispute with the Huddart and Parker Steamship Co. It appears the men had to work till 11 p.m. to finish loading. The stevedore heard from the clerk that the men would not be paid that week. This he told to the hands, who refused to work any longer unless promised pay. At dinner-time they interviewed the manager, and the stevedore spoke on their behalf, emphasising the fact that it was Saturday and the men wanted their money at 5 p.m. that their wives might purchase the provisions for Sunday. After a deal of discussion, half their wages was promised, and they returned to work; but the man who had spoken on their behalf was told his services would be no longer required. This is the method which employers use to prevent any workman speaking on behalf of his fellows. This is no exceptional case, it is only one of many.

I had a letter the other day from a friend of mine in Palmerston, Northern Territory. He tells me there is nearly 200 "unemployed" working in Bennett Street. He also enclosed a copy of the N. T. Times, from which it appears some of these men were given employment by Smith, manager for Miller Bros.' contract for the Pine Creek Railway. They excavated 120 yards of earth, for which they were offered the price of 80. They put their case into the hands of Louis Solomon, the editor of the N. T. Times, who interviewed Smith, telling him he should take the case into court on behalf of the men. Smith then paid the men for the 120, saying he only did it by way of a joke. As Mr. Solomon remarks, it was a doubtful joke, for if they had found no person to take up their cause they would have had to accept Smith's terms for want of funds to carry on their case.

An Anarchist club has lately been started in Melbourne, with Honesty as its organ. I do not think Our Commonwealth, an Adelaide advanced print, is a very successful venture. It is not written in that vigorous manner which I think is absolutely necessary for the success of a paper whose object is the implanting of a great doctrine in the heart of the masses. They do not require educating up to their grievances, but rather to the remedy.

Several followers of Henry George were returned for the S. A. Parliament at the last election, and in New Zealand a Bill is to be brought in next session to nationalise the land, but it will be a matter of surprise to thousands of those who wish it success if it should be passed.

The average wage around Gippsland is from 30s. to 35s. per week, and I have seen mechanics in Sale working for 6s. 6d. per day.

A meeting was convened in Sydney Town Hall, presided over by the mayor, to consider the best method of celebrating the Queen's Jubilee. An amendment was moved by Fred Jones, seconded by John Norton, to the effect that it was undesirable to celebrate the Queen's Jubilee, as it would be antagonistic to the democratic feeling of the colony. The amendment was put, and carried almost unanimously, and when the mayor called for three cheers for the Queen the response came in hearty groans. Sydney, I have always considered, would be the most prolific soil for Socialist propaganda. Within sixty miles are the thousands employed in the mining industry of the Illawarri and Newcastle districts. Here lies the material, requiring only a few energetic men, possessed of the energy and force to infuse life into any paper they may issue as an exponent of working-class views. Men having a solid belief in the doctrine they advocate, not mere stump-orators clamouring for a passing breath of popular applause, would in my humble opinion receive a gratifying return.

Gippsland, Victoria.

ANGLO-AUSTRALIAN.

Sir Edward Watkin sits in Parliament because working-men vote for him as an employer of labour. We hope those who elect him are proud of their representative. The servants of the Midland Railway go on strike. The officials of their union issue the usual circular requesting other railway servants not to play the dastardly part of "blacklegs," and come between them and their masters, whom they are fighting for a decent wage. They threaten blacklegs with the usual boycotting if they do; and forthwith Sir Edward Watkin has the impudence to get up in the House of Commons and demand that the authors of the circular be prosecuted criminally by the Government! Sir Edward Watkin owes everything he possesses to the toll he has been able to take of other men's brains, ideas, and manual work. And yet the creature seems to swell with rage—such rage as used to animate the planter against his slave—if the men who made him, and make him, even dare to exhibit the slightest sign of vindicating the rights of their toil-worn class. Still, so long as working-men vote for people who despise them, so long shall we have Watkins legislating for them.—Weekly Dispatch.

At the Forth Bridge works the waste of life is enormous. Every week two or three accidents. Over 100 killed since the building of the bridge was begun, and there is still two and a half years' work and the most dangerous part of the work is still to do. The law steps in to prevent theatre and circus managers from neglecting any possible precaution for the safety of the performers. If an enterprising damsel exhibiting her limbs is in the least danger a net is spread for her safety. These men who are working like slaves and are being driven to the utmost to get the work done, are being slaughtered by dozens, but no restraint is put on the carelessness of the managers. All the accidents are preventable if a little more were spent in safeguards and the men allowed to work with more leisure; but in the hurry and bustle and greed of modern commerce no time or money can be spared over the mere matter of a few workmen's lives. The same thing may be said of every large work. After a few dozen more have been killed or a score taken off at a time, it will pay some journalist to make a sensation over the affair, and then a little temporary caution will be shown.—J. L. M.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

Although Oldham is said to have abandoned the short time movement, still there are many mills either working short time or the workpeople are only partially employed.

An order has been received at Chatham Dockyard from the Admiralty, directing that in future all expenses incurred through workmen's or draughtsmen's mistakes in carrying out work will be deducted from their pay.

COLLIERS' WAGES.—It was anticipated that further reduction of wages would take place in Wales. Notices have however been posted at the collieries throughout the Rhondda Valley that, as a result of the auditors' award, the wages rate will remain unaltered for the ensuing three months.

The owners of the extensive coal fields in the Forest of Dean, finding it impossible to go on any longer under the present conditions, owing to the severe competition between them and the Welsh colliery owners, invited the men's representatives to see the list of actual prices, with the result that a reduction of 2½ per cent. will take immediate effect.

EDINBURGH JOINERS.—A meeting of the operative joiners has been held in Edinburgh, to consider the masters' offer of 6½d. per hour, the present wage being 6¼d. The men considered that the state of trade warranted their request of 7d. per hour being granted, and unanimously resolved that in the event of this not being agreed upon to come out on strike.

BOLTON.—ELECTION OF A LABOUR CANDIDATE TO THE TOWN COUNCIL.—Mr. Michael Battle, who had been unanimously selected in the labour interest by the Trades Council was elected a representative in the Town Council for Derby Ward, on the 11th inst. Great interest was taken in the contest, the labour candidate being nominated as a protest against the conduct of the authorities in regard to the engineers' strike. Wm. Cunliffe (Liberal) joiner and builder, opposed, but was beaten by a vote of nearly five to one.

STRIKE OF MATCHWORKERS AT GOVAN.—The female workers in the filling department of Messrs. Mitchell and Co., Clyde matchmakers, Govan, have come out on strike in consequence of their employers refusing to advance their wages. The girls, who number about 70, are on piecework, and earn from 8s. to 12s. a-week. They allege that they were not being paid equal to those in the other departments, and asked for a slight advance in the rates, equal to a rise of from 1s. 6d. to 2s. a week.

Notice of discharge has been given to 310 more men, comprising 150 shipwrights, 40 joiners, 60 blacksmiths and hammermen, and 60 labourers, at Chatham dockyard, bringing the total number discharged up to the present time to between 1,000 and 1,100 men. During the next two or three weeks 400 more men will probably be discharged. The same is occurring at all the Government dockyards, and the coming winter will witness great distress among shipwright artisans.

THE MIDLAND RAILWAY STRIKE.—The decision of the shareholders—the last hope of the strikers—having been given in favour of the action of the directors, the strike has collapsed all along the line. It appears that the number of men who actually struck work was 2713, comprising 980 drivers, 1090 firemen, 401 passed cleaners, and 142 cleaners. The Times, referring to the strike, advocates special legislation to prevent railway men striking in future; discussing the great public inconvenience should a strike prove successful.

WEAVERS' STRIKE AT PRESTON.—The weavers employed at the Manchester and Castle-street Mills of Messrs. H. C. Owtram and Company, Preston, have decided to strike against the prices paid by the firm for velvet, which are said to be 15 per cent below trade prices. There are 1200 looms. The workers will be supported from the funds of the Weavers' Association, and their case has been taken up by the Council of the Northern Counties, who will make an appeal to the members of the Weavers' Unions in the Northern districts on their behalf. The strike threatens to be prolonged.

The twentieth annual Trades Union Congress will be held at Swansea on September 5th and five following days. Amongst the subjects for discussion are—Employers' Liability Act, 1880; certificates of competency for men in charge of steam engines and boilers; the desirability of increasing the number of factory and workshop inspectors; the right of the relatives of deceased miners to be represented at Coroners' inquests; co-operation, and its relation to trades-unionism; representation of labour in Parliament; reform in the land laws; international trades unionism; sudden and accidental deaths in Scotland; and "Shall the State be asked to pass an Eight Hours' Labour Bill?"

A deputation from the Cleveland Miners' Association, consisting of Messrs. Toyn, Rowlands, Stevens, Reeder, Strong, and Turnbull, met the Cleveland mineowners, at their offices, Middlesbrough, on Aug. 10, to further discuss the question of a new sliding-scale. The men renewed their request that the district tonnage rate should be made the minimum for broken work; and as to deputies' wages, they asked that the reference to arbitration should be merely on the question of whether the present rate should be increased. Various other points were mentioned, but the owners pointed out the impossibility of listening to proposals that entailed greater cost. Finally the proceedings were adjourned until the 2nd of September, when a further meeting will take place between the two sides.

UPHALL.—THE SHALE MINERS' STRIKE.—The strike of the miners and oil workers at the majority of the oil companies' works still continues, and there is no immediate prospect of a settlement. The men at Clippens, Oakbank, and Holmes are working at the old rate of wages, no attempt having been made to enforce any reduction at these places, Clippens' employees stating that their men had been reduced indirectly in another way; Oakbank was a new work, and were not prepared for a stand, while Holmes had to keep working on account of their contract with Pumpherson to supply crude oil. Of those who struck work, Pumpherson is the only place where a settlement has been made, and it is believed that that company has incurred the displeasure of the other companies connected with the Mineral Oil Association for settling with their men at a twelfth off their wages instead of a sixth as agreed upon. Those still out are Broxburn, Young's, Philipstoun, Champfeurie, Dalmeny, and Burntisland, and, as already indicated, both employes and men seem determined to continue the struggle for some time.

BREACHES OF CONTRACT AT CONGLETON.—A number of poor fustian-cutters were summoned to the Congleton police court a few days ago for leaving their work in an unfinished condition, and in every case were mulcted in damages and costs. The result is very different when it is the workers who are robbed and oppressed by breaches of the Factory Acts, as will be seen from another paragraph. The following case is one more illustration of the miserable lot of the wage-slave to-day: Two fustian-cutters, named Thomas Kennedy and Patrick Kennedy, brothers, were summoned by Mr. G. H. Chatwin, fustian master, Moor Lane, for leaving their pieces in an unfinished state. Mr. Chatwin claimed 5s. from each defendant for damages for their breach of contract. Mr. Chatwin stated the facts of the case, saying that the defendants left their work in an unfinished state, and without giving the required notice. Defendants said they were not able to earn above 5s. a-week after a hard week's work, and having a mother who was ill, and required nourishment, they were obliged to leave and get work where they could earn more money. They asked that the case might be adjourned, as their mother had died that morning. Mr. Chatwin said he did not press for the full amount claimed as damages under the circumstances, but he wished it to be understood that cutters could not do as they liked with their work. The Bench make an order for the defendants to return and complete their work and pay costs, or in default to pay 2s. 6d. each as damages, and the costs.

THE BOLTON ENGINEERS' STRIKE.—The men are holding out firmly and are well supported. Last Saturday a great open-air trades' demonstration was held at Bolton in support of the men on strike. A gathering numbering several thousands assembled on the wholesale Market, and, headed by seven bands, marched to a field where three platforms had been erected, and speeches were delivered. Mr. James Swift, general secretary of the Steam-Engine Makers' Society; Mr. Charles Hough, chairman of the Bolton joint-committee; and councillor Threlfall, chairman of the Southport Trades' Council, presided at the several platforms. Resolutions were passed unanimously sympathising with the Bolton engineers in their struggle for an advance, pledging those assembled to continue pecuniary and moral support, and thanking the inhabitants of Bolton for the fraternal manner in which they had supported the men on strike. The general tone of the speeches was to the effect that the men of Bolton were fighting the battle for the whole of the country. A meeting of the strike committee has been held, at which an alternative scheme of arbitration was decided upon and forwarded to the mayor. The conditions are that the rate of wages paid within twelve miles of Manchester prior to January 1886 should be taken as a basis, otherwise the wages paid in Manchester and Salford at the present time. The balance in the hands of the strike committee was over £1200, of which Manchester contributes £50, Oldham, £20, Liverpool £10, London £25, and Bolton £160. The whole of the society men went on short donation, according to the rules of the society, which means that their pay is reduced from 15s. to 12s. per week; but the allowance has been made up from the strike fund to 17s. 6d. per week. Thirteen men have left Dobson and Barlow's works, eight of whom have been discharged for incompetency.

BREACHES OF THE FACTORY ACTS.—The Cotton Factory Times commenting upon some scandalous cases which have recently been brought before the courts, says: "For years we have been struggling to obtain inspectors worthy of the name, and, when obtained, to get for them some encouragement to do the work to which they are appointed. Now when we have got a moderate proportion of decent men, we find to our intense disgust that we are confronted by a new danger. This danger lies in the fact that the magistrates, who sit and adjudicate upon the cases brought before them by inspectors, appear to be allying themselves with the law breakers to defeat the enactments made by Parliament for the protection of women and children." This indictment is supported by reference to a batch of cases tried before the Stockport magistrates in which the firm of R. McClure & Sons, of Heaton Norris, were summoned by Mr. Jones for allowing a woman to clean her machinery at seventeen minutes past one on Saturday July 2; and to a batch of cases brought forward by Mr. Prior, and tried at the Halifax Borough Court. In the first case Mr. Prior found the works of S. Whitely & Co. running six minutes after the time for stopping. He took the names of twelve women, and afterwards went with the manager into the engine-house to compare his watch with the clock. They found that they only differed a few seconds. At the trial, however, the firm asserted that there was a second clock which governed the engine, and that according to this they were only running one or two minutes overtime. The manager did not deny that according to their own "time o' day" clock and the inspector's watch they had run six minutes overtime, but on the flimsy evidence of the person who said he had taken the indications the case was actually dismissed. It should be noted that, as in the Stockport case, one of the heads of this firm is a magistrate, and that when the case commenced Mr. E. Crossley, M.P., Mr. L. J. Crossley, and Mr. E. M. Wavell joined the bench, and left immediately after it had been adjudicated upon. Two other cases were also dismissed in spite of the evidence. Our contemporary concludes: "What are we to understand by this? Are the capitalist class concocting a course of action for the purpose of rendering the Factory Acts non-effective? It was the cry that we wanted inspectors who would do their work. We have now got some who are doing their duty, but if the system we have referred to is to be continued they might as well go back on the old lines. Employers may, however, rest assured that the last has not been heard of these cases. It is well that in all cases justice should be tempered with mercy, but the sort of decision which gives all the mercy to capitalists and the justice to workmen, is one that is far from commending itself to our taste, and the sooner working-class voters make this clear to their Parliamentary representatives, the better it will be for all concerned."

A DILEMMA.—Worker: I desire labour, sir.

Capitalist: I cannot give it to you until the goods that you produced last year are sold. You are not only the producer but the consumer. The goods you made last year you must consume before I can afford to set you to work producing more. There is an over-production.

Worker: I am willing enough to consume the goods if you will let me. I am ragged, hungry, and my house is dilapidated. This over-production problem is easily solved. I will take the goods at once. (Starts to make off with them.)

Capitalist: Hi! Hullo! Police! Here, what are you doing? You pay for those goods, you rascal, or drop 'em!

Worker: But I have no money left, sir. I produced them all, it is true, and you say that the value of my production last year was 1,000 dols.; you paid me for it, however, but 346 dols.; I have spent that as you know for some of the goods, but there is still 654 dols. worth left unsold on your hands. I can't buy those back unless you set me to work so I can earn the necessary wages to do it. And yet you won't let me go to work until the goods are sold. This is a queer world. You are one of the intellectual classes; won't you therefore explain me the reason for this dilemma?

Capitalist: My opinion of you is that you are a d—d Anarchist. Be off!—Denver Labour Enquirer.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The eighth annual conference of the confederated workers of the centre of France has been held from the 7th until the 14th inst., in the Commercial Hall, 92 faubourg du Temple, at Paris. Four hundred and fifteen delegates were present, representing together sixty-one various societies of social science (Cercles d'Etudes sociales) and seventy-eight various trades' unions (chambres syndicates). Toffrin acted as chairman, assisted by Picans, Collas, Haupais, Regnier, and Delaporte, secretaries. Five committees were appointed for the examination and classification of the reports sent in to the Congress: (1) committee of class war; (2) committee of public services; (3) committee of progressive income-tax; (4) committee of organisation of labour, sanitary questions, professional schools; (5) committee of public relief, assistance, etc. The first question, that of the struggle of the workers against all other classes of society, was certainly the most important of all, as affecting directly the policy to be pursued in future by the proletariat, and we are glad to state that it has been resolved in the most revolutionary way, that is to say, every connection of the workers with any other class has been strongly opposed and totally condemned, and further, that the workers, being internationally oppressed by the bourgeoisie, must more and more become internationally organised themselves, all sense of nationalism, patriotism, jingoism, etc., being a hindrance to their final emancipation.

At Laon, the trial of our comrades has ended in a most draconian manner: Devertus has been sentenced to four years' imprisonment and a fine of 1000 francs; Massey to one year and 100 francs. They had pronounced "inflammatory" speeches at a public meeting—that is all! Things are going on downwards in "republican" France.

At Dijon, the Anarchists Naudet and Monod have been acquitted from the charge of threatening to kill the State prosecutor. The charge, we must say, was a mere farcical one.

BELGIUM.

Small Belgium, once so proud of its "political liberties," becomes more and more the vassal of Germany. Bismarck already governs it as if it were a mere province annexed to the German empire, and we must say that the Belgians seem to be ready for slavery, for they accept with resignation all that Bismarck commands their legislators to do. Last week the Minister of Justice, M. Devolder, brought in a bill completely sweeping away the freedom of press and the freedom of speech. Not only henceforth will the provocation to commit a crime, followed by its actual commission, be punished, but the mere provocation, without any consequence whatever, shall entail for the writer or for the speaker a condemnation varying from six months' to three years' imprisonment, with a fine ranging from 50 to 3000 francs. More even than that: a design, a caricature, either printed or penned, and showing a tendency to ridicule the institutions of the bourgeoisie, will be dealt with on the same rigorous line. The government there is in the power of the clerical-ultramontane party, and we know that the respect of these people for liberty has always been very small; but the "liberal" party in Belgium is exactly as rotten as the first-named, for none of its members has thought it convenient to protest against this scandalous bill, which was carried through in the twinkling of an eye!

But, fortunately enough, this bill, directed against the Socialists, will do no harm to Socialism, for it is not so much the Socialist press which make revolutionists as the institutions of the bourgeoisie that force every man who has a sense of righteousness and justice to become a Socialist.

In our next issue we will give the result of the Working-men's Congress at Mons. We can only tell our readers to-day that the transactions were far from being orderly and quiet, that there were two camps—that of the followers of Defuisseaux, and those who hold with the Executive Council—and that finally each of the parties met in a separate conference.

GERMANY.

From January 1st to July 31st, 57,181 German wage-slaves have left their country and its police-blessings, emigrating mostly to America. Last year, in the same period, 40,597 turned their back on their "motherland."

At Leipzig, two compositors of the firm of Seebach, comrades Ch. Frey and Ed. Bauer, have been expelled from Saxony because they are Socialists, or rather because they worked at Seebach's, where anti-Socialist work is performed, and they ought not to know it beforehand!

On the 14th of this month August Bebel will be released from prison, where he has been since the 15th of November last. Auer will be released on the 15th. The other comrades convicted at the Freiburg trial, Vollmar, Frohme, and Viereck, will be set free a few days afterwards, and Ulrich at the beginning of October.

SWEDEN.

We have received this week the first number of a new weekly Socialist paper, entitled Arbetet (The Worker), published at Malmö, under the editorship of Axel Danielsson, formerly one of the chief contributors to the Social Demokraten, of Stockholm. Socialism makes great progress in the northern countries of Europe, especially during the last two years. We wish every success to our new colleague of Malmö.

DENMARK.

During September, the Danish Socialists will hold an International Exhibition of Socialist newspapers, reviews, pamphlets, and magazines of the whole world. Besides, a considerable number of Socialists from Germany, Holland, Italy, France, and other countries have promised to come over to Copenhagen, so that there will be an interesting international fête too. Socialism is very strong in Denmark; Copenhagen is the centre from whence the revolutionary ideas are spreading all over the country. The paper, Social Demokraten, which is published at Copenhagen, was the first Socialist organ in the country. It was started in 1871 as a weekly journal. In 1872 it became a daily organ of great size. In its weekly career, from June, 1871, to March, 1872, its circulation was about 709,150. Since it has been a daily paper, the average number of copies printed per week has been as follows:—From April 1872 to May 1874, 55,200 copies; from May 1874 to June 1875, 69,535; from June 1875 to March 1876, 77,280; from March 1876 to October 1877, 90,382; from October 1877 to April 1879, 62,524; from April 1879 to June 1882, 79,120; from June 1882 to November 1882, 82,726; from November 1882 to September 1883, 120,560; from September 1883 to March 1885, 149,760; from April 1885 to July 1887, 168,168 copies.

The whole island in which Copenhagen is situated is filled with Socialists. The east coast of Jutland is almost wholly Socialistic. Viborg, Alborg, and Nikolnig, are strong fortresses of the coming revolution. In Tionsø and Staalund, excellent organisations exist at Rodby, Maribo (Laaland), Diclum, Swendborg, and Faaborg (Fionia). D.

Fair sale of literature.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—On Tuesday last the monthly meeting was held, and the following officers were elected for ensuing month: A. Barker, treasurer; T. R. Cooper, secretary; H. Graham, steward; and E. Lefevre, librarian. A deputation from S.L. was introduced, and a discussion took place upon the position of our club and branch, the Commonweal, and the League generally. A good meeting was addressed by H. Graham and J. Allman, at Broadway, London Fields, on Wednesday. On Sunday evening in our club-room, a discussion was held upon "Will Socialism benefit the English People?"

HOXTON.—On Thursday evening, a well-attended meeting was held opposite Hoxton church, comrades Jas. Allman and J. Pope who spoke getting a good reception. On Sunday morning, a very large outdoor meeting opposite the church assembled. Comrades Wade and Pope addressed the meeting. Large sale of Commonweal. On Sunday evening in the hall, H. A. Barker lectured, subject, "Evolution and Socialism." At the close questions were asked, and a lively discussion followed.—C. J. Y.

MILE END AND BETHNAL GREEN.—Sunday last, H. Davis addressed a large meeting in Victoria Park. Two members enrolled. Fair sale of Commonweal. All willing to work in the formation of a Branch in this district are requested to communicate with H. NORTH LONDON.—At Ossulston Street on Tuesday, usual meeting addressed by Cantwell, Allman, Brooks, and Turner. On Sunday morning, the meeting in Regent's Park was devoted to the Midland strike, Cantwell, Brooks, Nicoll, and Lane speakers. 4s. 6½d. for the strikers.—T. C.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday, Ward and Pollock were very successful with their meeting in Cambuslang, great sympathy and attention being shown by the audience. Another good meeting was held in Jail Square, Glasgow, on Sunday; Pollock and Warrington were the speakers, and were received with the usual good-will accorded to our comrades. In the evening a number of our members attended to distribute leaflets and Commonweal at a meeting of railway employees.—A. M.K.

NORWICH.—On Thursday last, we held a meeting at Great Yarmouth, addressed by Henderson, and Curl in chair. On Sunday morning, good meetings were held at North Walsham by Darley and Morley, and at Wymondham by Henderson and Houghton. In the afternoon at Lowestoft, by Slaughter, Moore, and Morley. In Norwich Market-place, Henderson spoke, and a resolution was passed without dissent condemning the action of the police and calling for the release of our comrade Pole, now undergoing sentence because police-constable Endacott owed him a grudge. In the evening Henderson lectured in the Gordon Hall on "Civilised Nations."

MIDLAND STRIKE MEETINGS.—Meetings were held by the Socialist League on Sunday last in support of the strikers against the oppressive action taken by the directors of the Midland Railway Company. At St. Pancras Arches, Bartlett, Lane, Hart, and Turner spoke, Dalziel in the chair. At Regent's Park, Lane, Cantwell, Brooks, and Nicoll spoke, and in Hyde Park in the afternoon Lane and Brooks spoke. Collections were taken up at each meeting, the amount of which has been forwarded to the Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants. At each meeting a resolution was passed sympathising with the strikers, and condemning the greed of the Company. No dissent was manifested at any time, and in every case the speakers were listened to with applause.

WOOLWICH.—On Sunday evening, Scheu spoke to a good audience at the Arsenal Gates, and made a marked impression on his hearers. A Radical, who is a mad Bradlaughist, objected to Scheu preaching Socialism in England, but approved of the chairman, a wandering Scot, doing it, which gave great amusement to all present. 3s. 7d. collected for propaganda. A large amount of literature sold.—R. B.

CLAY CROSS AND DISTRICT SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—A meeting was held on Tuesday August 2nd, comrade Smith in the chair. Several new members joined, and addresses were given by the chairman, Haslam, and Unwin. A meeting was also held on Tuesday August 9th, when it was decided to ask the Council of the Socialist League to allow us to affiliate. Several questions arising out of former addresses were asked, and some discussion followed. The next meeting will be on Tuesday August 23.—R. U.

DUBLIN.—On Sunday August 7th comrades Keegan and Coulon took advantage of a large crowd at a band promenade in the Phoenix Park, and got up a good meeting. Keegan fully explained the aims and principles of International Socialism. Towards the close of the meeting there was a good deal of horse-play carried on by some well-dressed rowdies in the crowd.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

A business meeting was held at the office, 4 Park Street, on Thursday. Arrangements for Dundee propaganda made. Demonstration for Shale-miners locked out was postponed for a week in consequence of miners' speakers being engaged in London about the Mines Bill. A committee to carry out the arrangements was appointed. Organising secretary's report given and approved. Formation of new branches sanctioned at Hawick and Cowdenbeath. Full powers given Mahon to form a branch in Dundee. It was agreed to send for Glasier to address several meetings on Saturday and Sunday. The meetings held this week were as follows:—

Hawick.—Monday Mahon lectured at the Tower Knowe to a good audience. Collection and sale of literature good, and new member enrolled.

Galashiels.—Second meeting held Tuesday last. Questions and discussion followed the address, and the meeting was a thorough success. The first collection was very good, and several names given in to form a branch.

West Calder.—On Wednesday last Mahon addressed a large meeting of the shale-miners on strike and other workers. A local miner presided, and the address was listened to with attention. Arrangements for another meeting were made and a branch will soon be formed. Good sale of literature.

Cowdenbeath.—A meeting of the Branch was held in the Gardener's Hall. There was a good attendance. Mahon gave a short address on organisation. The cards of membership were then given out and a secretary appointed. Some new names enrolled. This branch, consisting chiefly of miners, is now in good working order.

Dunfermline.—Meeting had to be given up in consequence of the bad weather. Meetings will be held in future in the Co-operative Hall. The Dunfermline Journal has given fair reports of our meetings.

Edinburgh.—On Sunday morning Bruce Glasier and Smith held good meeting on the Quayside, Leith. Good sale of Commonweal. In afternoon Glasier and Tuke spoke to about 100 in the Grassmarket. This was the first Socialist meeting ever held in the Grassmarket, and judging from the attentive hearing we received, we shall be able to make our principles popular. In the evening in Queen's Park, Smith, Glasier, Gilray, and Tuke addressed over 500. Fair sale of Commonweal at the Park Gate. At 8 o'clock Glasier addressed a good meeting on the Mound. Smith, Gilray, and Tuke spoke here also. Good meeting, with exception of some slight interruptions by Princes Street fops. Good sale of literature. Very fair collections made at all our meetings.

Dundee.—Mahon's mission to Dundee proved a great success. Large audiences attended all the meetings, a good number of names were given in to form a branch, and good collections were made. Comrades Carr and Cameron rendered valuable assistance. An indoor meeting will also have been held before this number of the Commonweal is published, and the branch will have been got into working order. The meetings held were four—on Saturday night at the Green Market and on Sunday at the Green Market, West Port, and foot of Hilltown. Arrangements for continuing a vigorous propaganda in Dundee are now being made. Some friends from Lochee attended the Dundee meeting, and arrangements for holding meetings there also were made.

NOTES ON NEWS.

Mr. Thompson has been able to lay before the public in the columns of the Echo the evidence in the case of our comrade Pole of the S. D. F., and it must be said that if the magistrates who sentenced him to two months' hard labour have nothing to say in contradiction of the facts as there stated, they cannot clear themselves of the crime of sending an innocent man to prison, whom they must have known to be innocent.

The public can scarcely fail to see this, and another blow will be struck at this monstrous abuse of the magistrates' court with its body-guard of professional witnesses, who, like all policemen, consider, and are bound to consider, that it is their business, if there is any breach of the peace, to get hold of a prisoner and to convict him when they have got hold of him, at whatever expense to truth and justice may be necessary.

The stupidity of the police in the case of Mdle. Drouin is only what might be expected of these gentry, and no doubt many dynamite scares have had about as good a foundation as this one; but how are honest citizens to guard themselves against it? Are we to have an artist and a chemist attached to every police centre to inform the guardians of law and order what modelling clay is, and to assure them that the only danger it is fraught with is that it may be worked up into futile and ugly images?

Among other cases of legal oppression comes the hideous tale of Mr. Justice Field and the luckless Welsh girl; concerning which what can words do to express due indignation against such a sentence? But one thing we must remember: these and similar cases of the injustice of the law are being brought to light plentifully now; but we must not suppose that they are uncommon, and that there is only by some accident a passing shower of them at present. It cannot be doubted that they are of constant occurrence. Nay more, bad as they are, they are only extreme examples of the ordinary deeds of the law; it works in this way habitually and can work no otherwise; it is a machine constructed for the production of injustice; that is the sober truth.

Whatever may be thought about the guilt or innocence of Lipski, the whole circumstances of the trial call for a remark on one point in criminal trials which jurymen should remember, and which they are too apt to forget, that it is they who are the judges; they, not persons educated by professional experience and—cant, into callousness and disregard of everything but the rules of the game; but citizens and neighbours discharging part of their daily responsibility for the good of the community, and judging the matter by the rules of common sense and the experience of ordinary daily life. This is still the theory of the jury, and before centralised bureaucracy had quite overlaid the customs of the freemen of the tribes it was the practice also; but as things go now, the judge oftenest usurps the function of the jury, and his summing up is the real verdict. Let any one who sits on a jury, especially in a criminal case, take this to heart, and, as far as he is personally concerned, redress it.

Meantime it is a good thing that the public are having their attention turned to its worst abuses; they will soon see that they are helpless to cure them, if only they begin to try; for their conception of the law is that it is an impartial power that enforces respect to the due rights of the citizens, that it arranges personal differences between man and man. This is just their mistake, its real business is to defend property at the expense of personal rights.

Mr. Bradlaugh has received what may be called a new title at the hands of Lord Wemyss; he has been dubbed the "defender of the faith," so to say; protector of the sanctities of "free contract" (i.e., the leave to whack one's own nigger) against the original sin, which is now discovered to be a part of nineteenth century human nature, of paying some attention to the general welfare of the community. It may be doubtful as to how much Mr. Bradlaugh relishes this distinction, in spite of his anti-Socialist proclivities; it is not doubtful that the whirligig of time brings about curious revenges. Who are to be the next allies, I wonder?—Chamberlain and Salisbury, Wemyss and Bradlaugh! It is no use hazarding a guess; yet strange things may happen to Socialists if ever they get into the House of Commons, and they may have queer distinctions thrust upon them; they had better keep out of it altogether.

W. M.

A LABOUR POLICY.

WHEREVER there is oppression there is rebellion—if there be any vitality in the people at all. The form this rebellion takes almost entirely depends on the stage which the oppression has reached. If the oppression be in the growth of its power the rebellion will simply mean resistance to each fresh development, but if the oppression has reached its height and its power begins to wane, the rebellion assumes a definite and aggressive shape—it becomes revolution; that is, it not only resists the wrong, it prepares to stop it and to replace it by a just system. This has been illustrated by English history. Since the tyranny of the capitalists began, rebellion against it began. At first the workers could only protest by riots, insurrections, machinery-breaking and strikes against the wrongs under which they had to labour. As time went on their rebellion became more systematic. Now the time is at hand when the working-class must no longer be satisfied with protests against their misery; they must prepare to end it and to organise a happier state of society. Socialism is simply this most advanced stage of the labour movement. It aims at changing the present system of society in which the rich idlers live by plundering the poor workers, and the poor live only on the sufferance of the rich, into a system where both are merged in one body, all doing their meet share of the world's work, and enjoying a like share of its wealth.

The Socialist party has no interests in antagonism to other labour organisations. It only differs from them in this, that they fight for the interests of a part of the people, while Socialism aims at the good of all; they try to cure part of the economic evils, to stop some of the plundering, while Socialism aims at preventing the evils and bringing about an honest system. For instance, trades' unionism means securing to the workers a larger share of the fruits of their labour; Socialism means securing to the workers the full fruits of their labour. Co-operation means checking the shopkeeping section of the traders from cheating the people; Socialism means stopping all sections of traders from cheating the people. Therefore, there cannot be any antagonism between these movements and the Socialist movement. Socialism embraces all other Labour movements, and the very gist of the Socialist policy is to combine all sectional Labour movements into one solid array with a clearly defined aim; to focus the energies of the societies which are struggling here and there, and direct the whole united force to the achievement of the economic emancipation of Labour.

This task is a heavy one, and not to be hastily dismissed. There will be a good deal of jarring before the different sections agree and get into their right places. But it is now the urgent duty of all who seriously wish to advance the cause of labour to consider how the different movements having practically the same interests will regard each other. There has been too much sneering and gibing between Reformers and Revolutionists, and too little useful discussion. It is because reform is useless that revolution is necessary. The people must have justice. If justice cannot be gained by reforming the present system that shows the inherent badness of the system, and the only thing to do is to abolish it and replace it by another system.

It is now clear that as foreign competition and the development of machinery increases, the lot of the labourer is becoming more precarious. During the last fourteen years the condition of the workers in all the great industries has been steadily getting worse; wages have gone down, and employment is less secure. The employers allege that they are also getting worse off, which is true to a large extent. The simple and sensible explanation of our chronic trade depression is the production of goods beyond the power of our markets, both at home and abroad, to sell at a profit for the investors or capitalists. For profit-making purposes, there is a glut of goods and a glut of the means of production. Not only are our warehouses overflowing, but the land is lying waste, the machinery is going to rust, and the army of unemployed is regularly growing larger and larger. The capitalist and the working-class are alike helpless in this position of affairs. So long as both maintain the present system of production for profit this state of things can only go from bad to worse until the system is changed.

In future papers I shall try to lay down the Socialist attitude towards Trades' Unionism and Co-operation, and to sketch a line of action by which Socialists who are in these movements may work them on to the right lines of action. In thus trying to conciliate other working-class organisations, let it be understood that I am not in the least wishful to compromise the Socialist aim. I don't wish Socialists to turn mere reformers, but to make reformers Socialists by showing them that they can only retain and develop in the future the good they have done in the past by coming right about of the advanced guard of the labour movement of to-day.

J. L. MASON.

THE order and progress of Henry I.'s reign, which marks the transition from the mere military camp of the Conqueror to the Mediæval England I have to dwell upon, was followed by the period of mere confusion and misery which accompanied the accession of the princes of Anjou to the throne of England. In this period the barons widely became mere violent and illegal robbers; and the castles with which the land was dotted, and which were begun under the auspices of the Conqueror as military posts, became mere dens of strong thieves. No doubt this made the business of the next able king, Henry II., the easier. He was a staunch man of business, and turned himself with his whole soul towards the establishment of order and the consolidation of the monarchy, which accordingly took a great stride under him towards its ultimate goal of bureaucracy. He would probably have carried the business still further, since in his contest with the Church, in spite of the canonisation of Beckett and the king's formal penance at his tomb, he had really gained a victory for the Crown, which it never really lost again; but in his days England was only a part of the vast dominion of his house, which included more than half of France, and his struggle with his feudatories and the French king, which sowed the seed of the loss of that dominion to the English Crown, took up much of his life and finally beat him. His two immediate successors, Richard I. and John, were good specimens of the chiefs of their line, almost all of whom were very able men, having even a touch of genius in them, but therewithal were such wanton blackguards and scoundrels that one is almost forced to apply the theological word "wickedness" to them. Such characters belong specially to their times, fertile as they were both of great qualities and of scoundrelism, and in which our own special vice of hypocrisy was entirely lacking. John, the second of these two pests, put the coping-stone on the villainy of his family, and lost his French dominion in the lump. Under such rascals as these came the turn of the baronage, and they, led by Stephen Langton, the archbishop who had been forced on the unwilling king by the Pope, united together and forced from him his assent to Magna-charta, the great, thoroughly well-considered deed, which is conventionally called the foundation of English Liberty, but which can only claim to be so on the ground that it was the confirmation and seal of the complete feudal system in England, and put the relations between the vassals, the great feudatories, and the king, on a stable basis, since it created or at least confirmed order among these privileged classes, among whom indeed it recognised the towns to a certain extent as part of the great feudal hierarchy: they had begun to acquire status in that hierarchy.

So John passed away, and became not long after an almost mythical personage, the type of the bad king. There are still ballads and prose stories of these in existence, which tell the tale of this strange monster as the English people imagined it. As they belong to the fourteenth century, the period I have undertaken to tell you about specially, I will give you one of the latter of these concerning the death of King John, for whom the people imagined a more dramatic cause of death than mere indigestion, of which in all probability he really died; and you may take it for a specimen of popular literature of the fourteenth century. I can make bold to quote from memory, since the quaint wording of the original, and the spirit of bold and blunt heroism which it breathes, have fixed it in my mind for ever. The King, you must remember, had halted at Swinestead Abbey in Lincolnshire in his retreat from the hostile barons and their French allies, and had lost all his baggage by the surprise of the advancing tide in the Wash; so that he might well be in a somewhat sour mood. Says the tale: "So the King went to meat in the hall, and before him was a loaf, and he looked grimly on it and said, 'For how much is such a loaf sold in this realm?' 'Sir, for one penny,' said they. Then the King smote the board with his fist and said, 'By God, if I live for one year such a loaf shall be sold for twelve pence!' That heard one of the monks who stood thereby, and he thought and considered that his hour and time to die was come, and that it would be a good deed to slay so cruel a king and so evil a lord. So he went into the garden and plucked plums and took out of them the steles [stalks], and did venom in them each one; and he came before the King and sat on his knee, and said: 'Sir, by St Austin, this is the fruit of our garden.' Then the King looked evilly on him and said, 'Assay them, monk!' So the monk took and ate thereof, nor changed countenance any whit: so the King ate thereafter. But presently afterwards the monk swelled and turned blue, and fell down and died before the King: then waxed the King sick at heart, and he also swelled and died, and so he ended his days."

For a while after the death of John and accession of Henry III. the baronage, strengthened by the great Charter and with a weak and wayward king on the throne, made their step forward in power and popularity, and the first serious check to the tendency to monarchical bureaucracy, a kind of elementary aristocratic constitution, was imposed upon the weakness of Henry III. Under this movement of the barons, who in their turn had to seek for the support of the people, the towns made a fresh step in advance, and Simon de Montfort, the leader of what for want of a better word must be called the popular party, was forced by his circumstances to summon to his parliament citizens from the boroughs. Earl Simon was one of those men that come to the front in violent times, and he added real nobility of character to strength of will and persistence. He became the hero of the people, who went near to canonising him after his death. But the monarchy was too strong for him and his really advanced projects, which by no means squared with the hopes of the baronage in general: and when Prince Edward, afterwards Edward I., grown to his full mental stature, came to the help of the Crown with his unscrupulous business ability, the struggle was soon over; and with Evesham field the monarchy began to take a new stride, and the longest yet taken, towards bureaucracy.

Edward I. is remembered by us chiefly for the struggle he carried on with the Scotch baronage for the feudal suzerainty of that kingdom, and the centuries of animosity between the two kingdoms which that struggle drew on. But he has other claims to our attention besides this. At first, and remembering the ruthlessness of many of his acts, especially in the Scotch war, one is apt to look upon him as a somewhat pedantic tyrant and a good soldier, with something like a dash of hypocrisy beyond his time added. But, like the Angevine Kings I was speaking of just now, he was a completely characteristic product of his time. He was not a hypocrite probably, after all, in spite of his tears shed after he had irretrievably lost a game, or won one by stern cruelty. There was a dash of real romance in him, which mingled curiously with certain lawyer-like qualities. He was, perhaps, the man of all men who represented most completely the finished feudal system, and who took it most to heart. His law, his romance, and his religion, his self-command, and his terrible fury were all a part of this innate feudalism, and exercised within its limits; and we must suppose that he thoroughly felt his responsibility as the chief of his feudatories, while at the same time he had no idea of his having any responsibilities towards the lower part of his subjects. Such a man was specially suited to carrying on the tendency to bureaucratic centralisation, which culminated in the Tudor monarchy. He had his struggle with the baronage, but hard as it was he was sure not to carry it beyond the due limits of feudalism; to that he was always loyal. He had slain Earl Simon before he was king, while he was but his father's general; but Earl Simon's work did not die with him, and henceforward while the Middle Ages and their feudal hierarchy lasted, it was impossible for either king or barons to do anything which would seriously injure each other's position; the struggle ended in his reign in a balance of power in England which, on the one hand, prevented any great feudatory becoming a rival of the king, as happened in several instances in France, and on the other hand prevented the king lapsing into a mere despotic monarch. I have said that bureaucracy took a great stride in Edward's reign, but it reached its limits under feudalism as far as the nobles were concerned. Peace and order was established between the different powers of the governing classes; henceforward, the struggle is between them and the governed; that struggle was now to become obvious; the lower tribe was rising in importance, becoming richer for fleecing, but also it was beginning to have some power; this led the king first, and afterward the barons, to attack it definitely; it was rich enough to pay for the trouble of being robbed, and not yet strong enough to defend itself with open success, although the slower and less showy success of growth did not fail it. The instrument of attack in the hands of the barons was the ordinary feudal privilege, the logical carrying out of serfdom; but this attack took place two reigns later. We shall come to that further on. The attack on the lower tribe now growing into importance in this reign was made by the king; and his instrument was—Parliament.

I have told you that Simon de Montfort made some attempt to get the burgesses to sit in his Parliament, but it was left to Edward I. to lay the foundations firmly of Parliamentary representation, which he used for the purpose of augmenting the power of the Crown and crushing the rising liberty of the towns, though of course his direct aim was simply at—money.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

PAINFUL SEQUEL TO THE MIDLAND STRIKE.—An ex-Midland Railway driver, named Ling, drowned his three children and committed suicide near Derby last Friday. He was a leader of the recent strike and depressed by not being able to obtain employment.

METROPOLITAN AND CITY SECTION OF SHOEMAKERS.—A meeting was held at the "Cherry Tree," Kingsland Road, on Monday Aug. 22, to consider ways and means of supporting the men on strike of Cove and West's, Northampton. Two delegates from that town attended and explained the position, and a resolution pledging the meeting to support the strikers was carried unanimously.

ONLY TWO PARTIES.—Speaking at Liverpool last Sunday, Mr. Bradlaugh, after severely castigating Mr. Chamberlain and the Dissident Liberals, remarked that "as to the future there would soon only be two distinct parties, the party of the aristocracy and the party of labour and manufacturing industry." The statement might be amended by omitting the three concluding words, which if they mean anything, seem intended to cover the employing class; and the preposterous idea that the interests of Labour and Capital are identical, finds few believers nowadays. However, it remains to be seen on which side of the fence Mr. Bradlaugh intends to alight and under which flag he intends to serve. The people are preparing for a great, and it is to be hoped final struggle with their oppressors, and must needs treat as their enemies all those who stand aloof. The man whom Earl Wemyss delights to honour can hardly be a fit and proper person to look after the interests of the workers.—T. B.

SOCIALIST CAMPAIGN IN SOUTH WALES.

On Saturday 13th inst., laden with literature, we left London for Cardiff, in a train overcrowded with Welsh folk returning from the Eistedfodd. We passed the night in Cardiff, and started the next morning by first train to Pontypridd. We experienced many delays and misdirections before meeting the friends expecting us there, and found our luggage, consisting of an enormous sack filled with literature and bag ditto, terrible encumbrances. After receiving a hearty Welsh welcome from friends met at last, we proceeded to our business by holding the first meeting on the Rocking Stone. This stone stands in the centre of a depression in the soil, and is surrounded with a circle of other smaller unhewn stones fixed in the ground. They are evidently Druidical remains. The oscillatory motion of the centre stone gives it its name. From this bold situation, overlooking the whole of the valley and town beneath, and in the midst of mountains, we began our work—a work, we believe, that will be crowned with lasting success—in these valleys. Our audience poured towards us from all points. They listened attentively to our exposition of Socialism, and cheered us to the echo. The only opposition came from a local schoolmaster, a dogmatic sort of pedagogue, whose ire was aroused by Mainwaring's outspoken way of calling thieves thieves. The audience would not tolerate his interruptions, and at the conclusion of the meeting a workman stepped forward and suggested that we should call for a show of hands as to whether the workers present agreed with us or not. The show of hands was unanimously in our favour.

At the afternoon meeting the stone and its vicinity was alive with people awaiting us. A splendid meeting was held, our pedagogue again interrupting with no success, the meeting enthusiastically in our favour. The Western Daily Mail showed the importance of the gathering by a virulent and scurrilous report of the proceedings.

We left Pontypridd amidst expressions of goodwill and promises of help, and trudged along the Rhondda Valley to Tylors Town, calling at Coedcae and other collieries on our road to distribute leaflets. At Tylors Town we held a good meeting amongst the colliers, only marred by the interference of a burly boss contractor who stuck up for his queen, he did. We now know that he has recently had a house built for himself, at an expense of some £2000, which explains his loyalty.

From Tylors Town up and over the mountains by narrow and precipitous paths, where a false step meant a fall of fifty or sixty feet, with the pulsing gasps of the engines and whirring of the windlasses of the collieries in the valleys below resounding around us, and past colliers' homes that we shall describe later on, we walked into Aberdare. Here we abandoned the projected meeting in order to look over the ground and secure the names and assistance of local men towards forming a branch. We got a hearty reception and promises of help, and agreed to hold our meeting on our return from Merthyr, where we went the same evening. We spent Wednesday in going over the Welsh Inferno, Dowlais Iron Works, now partially closed through want of water. This gigantic place employs some 9000 "hands," men, boys, and girls. Iron and coal mining, engineering, and brickmaking constituted the chief industries carried on. In gloomy dens, deprived of daylight, men were washing coal by a Belgian process to fit it for use. Truly, if noise, grime, filth, steam, smoke, and mountains of rubbish are marks of progress, then is Dowlais a progressive place. There is a plentiful crop of cripples made by all this progress, and they are kindly allowed to work as labourers about the works at wages varying from 15s. to 18s. per week. Shorn of a leg or an arm, they were painfully fulfilling their part in "progress."

In Merthyr at night we held a splendid meeting, a forest of hands being held up in our favour; and having secured a meeting-place for a branch, we held a second meeting on Thursday. A large crowd was present, amongst which were some local bigwigs, a magistrate and justice of the peace, but no opposition was offered at the meeting indoors. We secured some names for a branch, and have made agents for Commonweal.

On Friday we returned to Aberdare, and held a great meeting in the Boot Square. Having secured agents for Commonweal and distributed a vast amount of literature, we proceeded to Pontypridd on our way home. On Sunday morning at eleven o'clock we had a good meeting at the Rocking Stone, and another at two o'clock. This last was an immense gathering. At its conclusion a branch was formed and steps taken towards securing a meeting-place and forwarding the movement in the neighbourhood. In our next report we will give an account of the workers of South Wales and the conditions under which they live.

SLAVERY IS THE WORD.—Our attention has been called to a terribly hard case tried at the Guildhall a few days ago, in which certain things were divulged that at first sight appear incredible. A carpet-weaver named Wm. Wilson, fifty-nine years of age, was accused of being in unlawful possession of a small bundle of wool-yarn, the property of his employers. One of those employers stated in court that the prisoner had been in their service for twenty-nine or thirty years, and had always held responsible positions, and enjoyed their confidence! After this statement it might be supposed that the prisoner's salary was a handsome one. As a matter of fact, his wages at the time of his arrest was SEVEN SHILLINGS PER WEEK!! His employer and prosecutor was not ashamed to acknowledge that this was the average remuneration the man had received for some years past. At the time he was found in possession of the yarn, his children were actually without bread. It seems monstrous that Englishmen should be so hard pressed as to occupy "responsible positions" for such scandalous wages as seven shillings a-week. Slavery is the only word that adequately represents such unremunerative toil.—London Evening News.

A SONG OF 'DEATH.

(Written in 1848 by FERDINAND FREILIGRATH. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

On the hills he stands in the dawning red,
With his sharp sword drawn in his sinewy hand—
I am Death who enfranchise the heroes, he said,
When they die for mankind and their own dear land:
Not he who comes gently at dead of the night,
And the weary at rest for eternity lays;
Nay, but he that stalks fierce through the thick of the fight,
And the youth in his triumph triumphantly slays.

'Neath the glorious tent of the clouds as I pass
I make thin with my shadow the warriors' ranks,
When I hurl them down headlong to die in the grass,
On the pavements of stone or on moss-covered banks.
O 'tis grand in the battle to welcome its brunt,
And 'tis brave in the frenzy of fighting to die!
How they lie with their scars and their wounds in the front,
And their blood-besmeared faces a-stare on the sky!

Thus they lay o'er the land from the North to the South,
Where the dark forest waves or the fair river flows,
Staining all the pure streams from their source to their mouth,
The defenders of Freedom shot down by her foes.
Thus they lay who in April had followed their fate,
Far and wide o'er the land in their hundreds they lay:
Now beneath the long grasses they peacefully wait,
Till their graves be made bright by the roses of May.

Is it roses alone that May brings for her boon?
Is it song that she breathes on her balmier breath?
Nay, 'tis hurdling of shot, and the trumpeter's tune,
Din of battle, and Me, the enfranchiser, Death!
For from tyranny's chain ye must shake yourselves free,
Lest the gold on your banner that loftily waves
A mere badge of your shame and your servitude be,
Yea, the gilt that disfigures the trappings of slaves.

For the year forty-eight has arrived and is here,
And ye cannot postpone it, do all that ye may;
And the lightning and thunder and storm that ye fear
Even now are approaching to sweep you away.
See, flash upon flash out of cloud upon cloud,
As in thunder the bolts of God's anger are hurled!
By the breath of his mouth the dark heavens are bowed,
As he clears of corruption this rotten old world!

He has sent me himself. Yes, I came in the spring,
And with turmoil and tumult and terror I ride,
As I chill the brave hearts with the shade of my wing,
Bring to nothing their triumph and trample their pride.
Thus I ride o'er the ranks of the fighters and slay,
With the incense of anguish and joy in my breath,
Till the sunrise make perfect the dawn of the day—
I must on! Ye have seen the enfranchiser Death!

Address by the "Associated Iron and Steel Workers of Great Britain" to the Workmen connected with the above Trades.

"Fellow-workmen,—The Executive of the above newly-formed Association desire to appeal to every workman in the iron and steel trades who has not taken advantage of the opportunity to become a member of the Association, to carefully consider their own and fellow-workmen's position owing to their present disorganised condition. Let them remember that when united they are strong and powerful to protect; disorganised they are weak and helpless against the action of capital. Think, men, of your wives and little ones, and the hard struggle to obtain even the common necessities of life for them; and remember it is your duty to them, to your fellow-workmen, and yourself, to assist in defending their and your joint interests. Look around you on every side, and the fact is forced upon you that every other class recognises the necessity of organisation. See how the rich landowners, manufacturers, and men of all professions—whether in landed interests, trade, politics, or religion—combine together to extend their influence, defend their interest, possess more power over those they have to treat with or employ, and increase their incomes. When this is made clear to your comprehension, ask yourselves the question, if, with all the advantages of power and wealth combination is necessary for these classes, how much more so is it necessary to the working-classes, whose bread depends upon their labour and whose earnings are under present conditions so small as to prevent any provisions for the future being made.

"Is it not by the skill of your hands and the application of your strength that the wealth is produced and capital increased; and can you, in your present disorganised condition, obtain a fair share of the results of your skill and labour? Is it not true while the wealth of manufacturers increases and larger fortunes are accumulated through the result of your labour, that when you are overtaken with sickness, or old age creeps upon you, and your strength begins to wane, unless by combination with your fellow-workmen you have made provision for your support, you are entirely dependent upon charity for your daily bread? Do you wish for this state of things to continue, or do you desire a better state of things? If no change is required, then continue in your present helpless and apathetic condition; but be honest and declare it, and not mislead those who desire to fight your battles and improve your position.

"If you desire improvement, remember 'United we Stand, Divided we Fall,'—that he who helps others helps himself, and the assistance of every man is needed if success is to be attained. All prejudices must be sunk, and one and all work for the common good. The interests of all men in the trade are identical, and the produce of their labour enters into competition in the same market; and that which affects one branch, one works, or one district must eventually affect all branches and works, and all districts. The experience of the past proves that no branch of trade or any district associations can successfully compete with capital. To do this a powerful National Association is needed, embracing all districts and all branches of the trade. We therefore appeal with confidence to all districts and all workmen engaged in the trade to be in earnest and organise themselves, or honestly and candidly declare they would rather remain in their present slavery than make an effort to be free."

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

A NOTE ON PASSING POLITICS.

THE Gladstonians are very naturally triumphant at the Northwich election, and the Tories as naturally have been attempting to explain away their defeat; which, however, taken in conjunction with the other bye-elections, does seem to an onlooker to mean the extinction of the Chamberlain party, the absorption into definite Toryism of Lord Hartington and a few other nobodies, and in short, the defeat of the revolt in the Liberal party against Mr. Gladstone, who seems destined to have one more triumph before he dies. To some ardent Liberals the way seems so direct to Liberal victory that the Pall Mall Gazette urges the Gladstonians to force on a dissolution by means of obstruction at once. That no doubt would be good tactics for them if the party were really what the writer of the article in the Pall Mall seems to think it—a party with principles and a steady aim. As it is, one may be quite sure that they will attempt nothing so revolutionary or anti-respectable as that: their advent to power will come by a longer road, with many more turns in it. For the respectable part of them have no very burning desire to pass a real Home Rule measure, and indeed don't think much about that or anything else except the mere party triumph. However, doubtless in the course of time we shall see a Liberal ministry in power again, with somewhat more pretensions to Radicalism than a ministry has had yet, and with the mandate to pass a Home Rule Bill. The said Bill will also, of course, be one of compromise; but we may suppose that it will do something to give the Irish question a little rest, though with its accompanying Land Bill it will not be so easily settled, even temporarily, as some people seem to suppose. But a truce once made with the Irish troubles, what will the new Gladstonian government do next? That is the rub. It will be expected to do something, and if it values its life must try hard not even to appear to do anything. To appear, I say, because, except as regards the franchise, the instrument of parliamentary democracy, there is no longer anything for that democracy to do. There may, and probably will be, a sharp fight in Parliament over the franchise, which will split up the party once more and give the Whig-Tories another innings; but when that is over and the democratic sword sharpened duly, where will be the enemy to be smitten by it? Doubtless there will be a new Allotments Acts, a Leasehold Enfranchisement Act, and other devices for dividing the power of our landlord masters without lessening it; and also doubtless some rubbish about perpetual pensions and the cultivation of grouse-moors and the like. But all this will be but using the newly-whetted democratic sword for cleaving a pat of butter instead of a helmeted head: it will be doing nothing. Nevertheless it will have an appearance of doing something and will lead to the death of more than one "Liberal" ministry, if constitutionalism lasts as long; so that what between disgusting real democrats with really doing nothing, and terrifying respectability with seeming to do something, the Gladstonian party is likely to have a rough time of it, and may well pray for a continuance of the Irish quarrel, in which they have managed, after a deal of standing on alternate feet, to take up a position apparently not (to their thinking) too dangerous to constitutionalism.

Meantime, after all the Tory Government is not going to die tamely; they have plucked up heart to pass the Lords' amendments to the Land Bill and proclaim the National League, and seem to be going to put their foot down; probably because they perceive that their Chamberlainist friends are of no value to them, and that they must play their last card of attempting to drive the Irish people into violent action, which might turn the respectability of the Liberal party against Home Rule again. Fortunately they are probably too late once more; the mind of the ordinary person not pledged to the cause of reaction is getting used to the idea of Home Rule, and any outbreak on the part of the Irish that is not systematic will be looked on as a mere incident in the struggle.

Some measure of Home Rule is now certain; and all we Socialists can hope is that it will not be too long in coming; for what we want now is a professedly popular government in power, which, face to face with the real question of the day—whether labour is to be free or the slave of monopoly—will not be able to deal with that question, because it and the parliament which has produced it are and must be essentially the guardians of that very monopoly.

IS LIPSKI'S CONFESSION GENUINE?

So Lipski has confessed and all is right, "he has been brought to a frame of mind that has enabled him to make the reparation," says the Daily News. Bourgeois justice and the Home Secretary are triumphantly vindicated. Thus, doubtless, thought the "respectable" world on Monday morning.

There is nothing to be surprised at in Lipski's confession. Indeed, it was just what was to be expected; those who have never believed in his guilt have no need to do so now, the evidence is entirely against such an hypothesis; but that under the circumstances the world should be given to understand that he has confessed, and "admitted the justice of his sentence," was absolutely essential to the stability of the government, of the system of capital punishment, and to the credit of our judicial machinery generally. What goes on within the walls of a prison is known only to those in the swim of the bureaucratic trade, and we do not pretend to decide dogmatically with respect to the origin of the document. We need only call the reader's attention to the fact that the bureaucrat is by the necessities of his profession a liar, skilful or unskilful; the value of official disclaimers is proverbial.

Who knows what kind of cajolery or even threats might not have been employed, since the occasion was so urgent and so much was at stake?

In connection with this it is well to remember that the witches who were burnt in the seventeenth century almost always confessed their guilt, and "admitted the justice of their sentence"—or were said to have done so. It must not be forgotten, moreover, that Lipski, who came from Russian Poland, remembering that in his own country a confession of guilt is necessary before a condemned criminal can be executed, and that there torture is admitted to be used on occasion to extract such a confession, might have a confused idea that the same thing might happen here, and seeing his case was hopeless and that he had to die, submitted to what he might think was a general formula for the sake of dying without unnecessary worry.

Anyhow the document bears upon it the stamp of unguineness. Lipski says that he had not begun to search for money before Miriam awoke and alarmed him. Does it seem likely that a man not being a maniac would murder a woman for fear of discovery, simply because she had found him in her room, and before he had committed any crime?

He says the aquafortis he swallowed had no effect on him. Is this probable?

He didn't know how his arms were abraded, and did not feel it at the time. Is this probable if the statement next above is true?

These objections lie on the surface of the confession, but no doubt other discrepancies will occur to other searchers into the document. Under any circumstances the main point to be remembered is that the evidence on the trial was insufficient for a jury to convict upon if un-directed by the judge, and bearing in mind the maxim so often put forward by those who boast of the immaculate nature of English law, that a doubt should be interpreted in favour of the accused.

E. BELFORT BAX and WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE SCOTCH PLOUGHMEN.—Some hopes were entertained that the Scotch Ploughmen's Union would develop into a thoroughgoing labour organisation; but at the last annual conference one of the officials stated that the union was strictly a benefit society, and not in the least way connected with trade union or political purposes. It is certainly a pity to see such a large and important class of workmen, who might wield a great power in the labour movement busying themselves with a mere benefit society. If they are determined to rigidly exclude themselves from all interference with the great social problem that confronts the working class, they need not expect that their flourishing financial condition will interest anyone but themselves. A working-class body which deliberately refuses to have anything to do with the great economic question, and repudiates any connection with even trades' unionism and politics had better call itself a "slate club" and drop such a title as the "Ploughman's International Union."—J. CONTINENTAL NOTES.

ITALY.

VENICE.—In the general strike of bakers at Venice lately, the men have been holding out for a slightly increased rate of wage, and a 12 hours' day instead of one of 16 hours. The Syndic and Prefect of the town have stood by the masters with a beautiful fidelity, sending to other towns so that the once great Lady of the Adriatic should not go breadless.

The gondoliers of Venice are also on strike, this move being caused by the result of the late deliberations of the Common Council, which was to give orders that the small steamers of the Finella Company should run by night as well as by day. The Syndic has had a notice posted up, threatening the gondoliers and boatmen with the suppression of their licences if they do not give in immediately. This is good-bye to the picturesque and jovial "cabbies" of Venice. Well, as wrathful lovers of the city have often exclaimed on beholding the zeal with which the Venetians hasten and disfigure its decay, the sooner the Grand Canal is filled in and fitted up, a la boulevard, with toy trees and tram lines the better; then no more need be said or thought about the place, the gondoliers transforming themselves into tram-car conductors, good luck to them.

SANT ELENA (VENICE).—In what was once, and not many years since, one of the pleasantest of the outlying Venetian islands now hideous with coal and smoke, a little incident occurred a week or two back which, as descriptive of the pretty little ways of Italian foremen, I reproduce. In the pursuit of his work one of the men met with an accident, which the doctor pronounced mortal, bidding him be conveyed to an hospital. A gondola was procured, and two of his fellow-workmen prepared to accompany him to do their best to comfort his last minutes of life, when the foreman interfered with an absolute refusal to let the men go. What! because one of their companions took the liberty to become fatally entangled in machinery did it follow that they might slack work for a few hours on a sentimental plea of cameraderie?

CATANIA.—When some "cheap kitchens" were opened here lately, the Fascio Operaio says that thousands of starving folk took the place by storm. The carabinieri were obliged to oppose the rush of the crowd, and in the struggle some people were hurt. The distress in Sicily is great, augmented by the spreading cholera.

BELGIUM.

As we said last week, the transactions at the Workers' Congress at Mols were far from being orderly and quiet, and the delegates divided into two camps, each of them holding a separate conference. Now, the split is complete among the Belgian labourers, and the first cause of it is certainly to be found in the strong desire for centralisation continually shown by the Executive Council of Brussels. The Parti ouvrier (workmen's party) has been shortened a good deal by the disaffiliation of several federations, which have formed themselves into a new body, to be called the "Belgian Republican Socialist Party" (a strange title, indeed: are there now in Belgium royalist-Socialists?). This new body will hold their first congress at Liège. The old Parti ouvrier, with a newly elected executive at its head, has refused to adopt the idea of an immediate general black strike. It seems to me that this resolution will matter little on the very day when the workers will resume their struggle against their oppressors. The following corporations have left the Parti ouvrier: the Labour League of La Louvière, the Socialist Union of Fontaine-l'Évêque, the co-operative societies of Wasmes, Paturages, Frameries, and Dampremy, the Miners' Unions of Jumet-Gohyssart and Courcelles, the Labour Leagues of Dampremy, Bouffloux, and Chatelet, the Co-operative Union of Trieu-Ormon, the Bee-Hive of Chateleineau, the Working-men's Federation of Gilly, and Co-operative Union of Montceau-sur-Sombre. A delegate from the S.D.F., Headingley, who, of course, was on the side of the Executive Council of Brussels, has been expelled from Belgium.

As we gave two weeks ago a list of the pamphlet literature of the German Socialists and Anarchists, we give now the list of the series of pamphlets issued by our Belgian workers. They publish once or twice a month a brochure of no less than 120 pages, and often even of 180 pages, at the very low price of 25 centimes—i.e., 2½d. But I am not inclined to say that the quality of these pamphlets is always adequate to their quantity; nevertheless, as a whole, they are worth noticing and recommending. 1. 'Dead for the People,' by Anseele (social-novel, 3 vols.); 2. 'Social Evolution in Belgium,' by Arnould; 3. 'The Parti ouvrier and its Programme,' by Bertrand; 4. 'Belgium in the year 1866,' by the same (2 vols.); 5. 'Democratic Letters,' by Adelson Castiau; 6. 'The Lace-women in Belgium,' by De Greef; 7. 'The Abbé Delacollonge,' by Enne (novel, 2 vols.); 8. 'A Nook of the Pauper's Life,' by Heusy; 9. 'The Right of Idleness,' by P. Lafargue; 10. 'Religion of Capital,' by the same; 11. 'My Uncle the Lawyer,' by Picard; 12. 'The Quintessence of Socialism,' by Schaeffle; 13. 'The Vicar of Noirval,' by Pergameni (a novel); 14. 'The Radical Programme,' by Arnould; 15. 'The Venality of Journalism,' by Chirac.

Comrade Bracekelaere, who has undergone five months of imprisonment, as publisher of the Socialist paper Vooruit of Ghent, was released last week.

FRANCE.

GLASS-BOTTLE MAKERS' STRIKE AT MONTLUÇON.—We are glad to announce that the International Glass-bottle Makers' Association, on the intervention of the Strike Committee of the Socialist League, has sent to the secretary of the strikers the sum of £50 (the Lancashire Union has given £25, the Yorkshire Union £20, and the Dublin Union £5). Comrade James Hunter, General Secretary of the International Union, left St. Helens last Thursday, the 18th inst., en route for Canada, where we hope he may do the same good work as he did among the glass-bottle makers in this country.

At Montataire 1200 ironworkers are now on strike. Their wages have been reduced by 15 per cent., and are paid monthly instead of fortnightly. They ask the withdrawal of this reduction and the usual former mode of payment.

SPAIN.

The Socialists in Spain are divided in three or four different fractions, of which the two principal are, the Collectivist-Anarchist Federation, with its centre at Barcelona, and the Social-Democratic Federation, centralised at Madrid. The Collectivist-Anarchist Federation proceeds from the former International Working-men's Association, who acted under the inspiration of Bakounine. Their Anarchism is somewhat different of that of the other countries, as its comprises in its ranks the organised trades' unions, encourages the various strikes occurring in the Peninsula, and aims at the economical federation of all the workers.

The second organisation is established on the same footing as the Social-Democratic parties of Germany, Holland, Denmark, Belgium, etc. Last year this organisation was only composed of the four groups of Madrid, Barcelona, Malaga, and Guadalajara, but actually some twenty associations have joined the central body. A third fraction, composed of corporations of skilled and unskilled artisans, works between the two former fractions, with a view of arriving at a complete amalgamation of the various existing bodies. The fourth fraction is that of the Communist-Anarchists, which is progressing favourably, but in small groups, all over the country.

All these organisations have their organs. The Collectivist-Anarchist Federation recognises as its official paper, La Cronica de los Trabajadores, mostly devoted to statistics, and as propaganda papers, El Socialismo at Cadiz, El Cuadro Estado at Orense, Acracia and El Productor at Barcelona.

The Social-Democratic Party is represented in the press by El Socialista, published at Madrid.

The third fraction, which is the most moderate, publishes El Obrero at Barcelona, and the Communist-Anarchist groups, after having had the paper Unahoja, are now represented by El Productor of Barcelona.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A SOCIALIST SONG-BOOK.

As I am preparing a Socialist Song-book (words and music) for the press, I should be glad if any of your readers would send me contributions towards the same. What I want is good words matched to good tunes—or if only the names of verses and tunes which will match each other be supplied, it will be a help. Of course I don't engage to accept all that are sent, but rather want a good number to select from. Songs that are in actual use among Socialist bodies will be specially welcome.

EDWARD CARPENTER.

"FREE" LABOUR.

Sir,—I am a carpenter and joiner by trade, and I should be glad if you could find space in your paper to allow me to call attention to an act of gross injustice perpetrated by Messrs. Temple and Graham, builders, of Holcrofts Estate, Fulham, on about thirty of their men.

The men employed by Messrs. Temple and Graham have an annual outing, which, by the bye, is promoted and used by the firm rather as an advertisement than for any benefit it may confer upon the men. Let me give some facts about this year's beanfeast.

Saturday, the 13th of August, was the day fixed for the "treat," and those who intended going subscribed so much per week for the six weeks previous to this date, in order to make up the 8s. necessary for the expenses. About 50 men took part in the outing.

On the Holcrofts Estate, Messrs. Temple and Graham employed about 30 carpenters and joiners, and these men, much to their surprise, were informed on Friday, the 12th August, that they would no longer be required, and on asking the reason were told by the foreman that it was on account of their not joining the beanfeast.

Was there ever a greater piece of injustice? Many of these men had only been engaged on work for the firm two or three weeks, and had previously been out of employment for some considerable time, which, of course, meant back rent to be paid, and many other things known only too well to workmen in our days. I for one deny the right of any man to dictate to me the manner in which I shall spend my earnings, and sincerely hope (and I fancy I see signs of it coming) that my fellow-workers, be they skilled or unskilled, will join together in one great party, and then, and only then, will a stop be put to such dirty work as that which I have described.—Yours, etc.,

"A VICTIM."

"CONCERNING USURY."

I have read with attention, in last week's Commonweal, the letters of Mr. J. Haldane Smith and Mr. T. S. Barrett on this subject, but must respectfully decline to entangle myself in the mere metaphysics of Socialism. Life is too short to indulge in such unprofitable exercises.

At the same time if—as would appear to be the case—it is of any consequence to these gentlemen or to others to know, I may say frankly that I am perfectly ready to supplement the wages of the workers not merely by the rent (interest) of money, but by the rent of land and the rent (profit) of machinery as well. If, as seems to be the drift of Messrs. Smith and Barrett's contention, the abolished usurer should take refuge in profit-mongering, why then the profit-monger's turn for suppression must come next.

But better far one thing at a time and in order. The average Briton's mental digestion is weak at the best, and it would never do to surfeit him with novel ideas. In truth, I have a doubt whether it is altogether wise to lay sacrilegious hands on the usurer before we have finally disposed of his elder brother the landlord. The machine-lord or profit-monger is the residuary legatee of both, and his immolation will naturally come last. Why Socialists should strive to push this particular malefactor to the front is, from the strategic point of view, entirely beyond my comprehension.

J. MORRISON DAVIDSON.

P.S.—May I be permitted to add that, thanks doubtless to the effective medium of the Commonweal, and the intrinsic interest of the subject, my trifling contribution to this vastly important question has, according to evidence before me, been surprisingly successful in arresting attention in altogether unexpected quarters.—J. M. D.

THE ANT AND THE BUTTERFLY.—A Busy Ant was carrying a grain of Wheat down a Garden Path. When asked to stop by a gaudy Butterfly, the Ant replied that it must carry its load to the Storehouse. "But," said the Butterfly, "what does a single grain amount to?" "Ah," replied the Ant, "you forget that others are bringing more. It is by Union Labour that we fill our Storehouses." The Butterfly rose disdainfully in the sunshine, and was seized by a Hungry Bird, while the Ant proceeded gaily with its grain.—Moral: It is not Individual Effort that accomplishes the great things, but the Concerted Labour of the Multitude.—John Swinton's Paper.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

SCAVENGERS' WAGES.—At Belfast the scavengers are paid 12s. a week, and the men recently struck for an advance of 2s. per week, and this the City Council refused to give, and the men had to submit or be idle.

In consequence of an unprecedented falling off in demand, the proprietors of the leading hem-stitching firms in Lurgan have put the operatives of their factories on three-quarter time. The depression, which will affect thousands, is attributed to a falling off in the production of cambric goods.

GLASGOW TRADES' COUNCIL.—At the meeting of council on the 17th inst. the delegates from the pump, boot, and slipper makers reported that they were still on strike, and that at a full meeting of the men they had resolved still to hold out.

The Midland Railway Company have put a number of the men engaged in their large locomotive shops at Derby on short time this week, owing to scarcity of work. The men principally affected are those of the erecting, repairing and paint shops. Instead of six days they have only worked four.

At the monthly meeting of the Bolton Trades' Council the question was discussed as to forming a labour association to assist workmen to Parliament, Town Councils, and other representative bodies, and to educate the workers by lectures, public meetings, and distribution of literature relative to all labour questions.

The employes of Messrs. Martin and Taylor, padlock manufacturers, Sandwell Road, West Bromwich, have received notice of a 10 per cent. reduction in the price of work. The workmen employed at these works are already receiving less wages than are paid by the trade generally, and to ask for an additional 10 per cent. reduction is outrageous.

THE RIVETERS' STRIKE AT CLYDEBANK.—The strike of riveters of James and George Thomson, shipbuilders continues, and there are no signs of a settlement on either side. The carpenters and joiners who are at present employed will in all likelihood soon be suspended unless the riveters and employers come to a speedy settlement.

THE DALMENY OILWORKS STRIKE.—A few days ago the men on strike at Dalmeny Oilworks made an offer to their employers to resume work at half the amount of the reduction intimated—namely 2d. per day. The employers now decline to comply with the request. The men are suffering great hardships, and it is likely that an appeal will be made for support to trades' unions and the public generally.

STRIKE RIOT NEAR BIRMINGHAM.—The strike in the Birmingham nail trade has resulted in another serious disturbance. A party of about twenty strikers went out in a brake to Bromsgrove, where they encountered a number of men who were put on in place of the old hands. A desperate fight followed. Three men sustained dangerous injuries, several had minor injuries, and a number of bystanders were badly hurt with missiles.

BOLTON—ANOTHER STRIKE.—On Monday morning, August 15, the local members of the Packing-Case Makers' Society left work for an advance in wages. They have been in receipt of 31s. 6d. per week, but the Manchester employers have conceded a demand for about 1s. 6d. advance. There are not many of the trade in Bolton, Messrs. Horrocks and Sons being the chief employers, with about 20 hands.

NORTHAMPTON.—The strike of shoe operatives at Northampton threatens to assume alarming proportions. The masters have endeavoured to overcome the difficulty by sending work to adjacent towns, but the men, discovering the source from which the work came, have refused to execute it. The boot-lasters and finishers of Mr. J. R. Marks came out on strike on the 19th, demanding higher wages. The sympathy in the town appears to be in favour of the men, and public subscriptions have been opened.

Consternation is the word used to state the condition of the various Government dockyard towns. Sheerness, Chatham, Portsmouth, Davenport, are adding thousands to the army of unemployed. The winter of 1887 promises to be a memorable one in the annals of distress. The men of Chatham are appealing to their member of Parliament, who is also a member of the Government. Bitter irony!

EDINBURGH JOINERS STRIKE.—The joiners held a meeting last week, when it was announced that the strike was practically at an end, as nearly sixty of the biggest employers had conceded the demand of the operatives. Work is now resumed by those who were actually out, and the men expect that, under a threat of stoppage of work, those of the employers who are still persistent in refusing the increase will withdraw their opposition, the trade being at present very busy in the city. The men chose the right time, stuck together well, and success is the result.

MANCHESTER AND SALFORD TRADES' COUNCIL.—An important meeting was held on the 19th inst., to discuss the question of a better arrangement as to the class of subjects to be brought forward at the next annual Trades' Union Congress. A resolution was ultimately arrived at, appointing a committee of five members, to whom the whole business of the Congress is to be remitted. Their duties will be to see that all questions upon which resolutions have been passed by the various trade organisations throughout the kingdom are brought under notice, and that henceforth the precedence of subjects on the agenda-paper of the Congress shall be decided by ballot. This resolution is to be submitted to the forthcoming meeting which assembles at Swansea.

LANARKSHIRE MINERS.—On the 18th a large proportion of the miners of Lanarkshire were idle. In the forenoon a meeting of the Central Board was held at Hamilton, when the delegates reported that, except as regards the collieries where the last reductions had not been enforced, the men were idle in the district of Rutherglen, Cambuslang, Blantyre, Burnbank, Hamilton, Motherwell, Holytown, Tannochside, Nackerty, and Airdrie. A mass meeting was afterwards held, Mr. Harley presiding. Mr. Small moved, seconded by Mr. Colvin—"This mass meeting of miners, being thoroughly convinced that the former policy of restriction—five days, eight hours, with a restricted output—is, meanwhile, the only alternative to secure an improvement, would strongly urge all districts immediately to revert to it." Mr. Bulloch moved, seconded by Mr. Furie—"Recognising that no progress is possible without union and amalgamation, this meeting would earnestly urge all collieries to appoint collectors to collect contributions and enroll members, with the view of securing unity of action." Both resolutions were adopted.

ROYSTON, CAMBS.—The outlook hereabouts in agricultural matters is becoming black. A severe drought and consequent sparseness of yield has been the last straw, following on low prices and foreign competition, to break up many of the farmers. The masters are at their small wits' end, and have mostly given up the idea that "times" will ever improve. It is noticeable that this year fewer odd hands are employed on harvest work. On one large farm near there are fewer men at work by nine than last year. This is due greatly to the use of self-binding reapers and the impoverished resources of many of the masters. Those who are more wealthy take every opportunity of cutting down wages and reducing their staff, meanwhile complaining vastly of the "badness" and stupidity of the men. The winter promises to be worse for the labourers than last; many will be thrown out after harvest, with no prospect of regular work for three or four months at least.—P. C. W.

ATHERTON—STRIKE OF WINDERS.—The cop-winders employed by the Lee Spinning Company are on strike against a proposed reduction of wages. The company employ between 400 and 500 hands, and fresh lists showing the prices to be paid to winders, clearers, reelers, and gassers have been posted up, in consequence of the profits not realising 5 per cent., the firm say. The operatives objected to the fresh lists, alleging that they would mean a reduction in their wages from 10 to 20 per cent. The cop-winders who are out number from 120 to 130, and it is expected the clearers will turn out next week, and if so the reelers will have to suspend operations. This is the second reduction this year the firm are trying to impose, the former being one of 10 per cent. Of late the operatives say they have not earned more than would procure them a bare existence.

THE CHAINMAKERS' AGITATION.—At a meeting of chainmakers held on Thursday 18th inst., in the Salvation Army Barracks, Cradley Heath, Mr. Thomas Homer, who presided, stated that there were still about two-thirds of the operatives partially employed at the 4s. list of prices, and one-third were unable to obtain employment. This was owing to the fact that there was not a great demand for chain, and a small number of the employers still refused to concede the 4s. list of prices. Owing to the hearty support of the press and the determination of the operatives, he believed the prospects of the chainmakers were now brighter than they had been for years. It might not be generally known that a chainmaker now earned as much for making 3cwt. of half-inch chain as he did for 10cwt. before the strike, but such was the case. During the week 500 loaves of bread and £17 in money had been distributed amongst those still out on strike or unable to obtain employment.

THE BOLTON ENGINEERS.—The fifteenth week of the strike shows no sign of a settlement. The trades and the public are supporting the men with funds, and the utmost unanimity prevails. An indignation meeting was held on the 17th, protesting against the extra police in the town; and in a letter from the military authorities it was pointed out that if the masters require the services of the military again, they must provide proper accommodation, as camping out had injured the horses. The Town Council met, decided to get ready a disused warehouse, and have now converted it into a temporary barracks, notwithstanding the protests of the ratepayers. Thousands of men have been allured into the town to take the place of the strikers, but only about 200 are working. Great efforts are being made by "disinterested parties" to get the men to submit to arbitration. It is to be hoped they will not fall into the trap. Never was a better conducted struggle, never better chances of success.

THE SPINDLE AND LOOM—THE STATE OF TRADE.—Bury and Elton.—The greater portion of the large mills in the Bury district are, in consequence of the indifferent state of trade, working short time. Among these may be mentioned the Barn Brook Spinning and Manufacturing Company, who are working four days a-week; John Openshaw, Son, and Company, Pimhole, who are working from Tuesday morning till Friday night, and have been doing so for the last three or four months; William and George Openshaw, Pimhole, working four days a-week; and Wrigley and Schofield, Chesham, who have had a portion of their looms stopped for some considerable time. Castleton.—At Westbrooke Mill, Messrs. William Yates and Sons, a notice announcing that the workpeople will cease work on Saturdays and Mondays has been posted. The stoppage is said to be due to the warehouses being overstocked. The concern has weaving and spinning. Whitworth.—The spinners at Messrs. Smithson Bros. are only working four days a-week. Heywood.—Messrs. Norris Brothers' top and bottom shops are working short time. The weavers are making about three and a half days and the spinners four days a-week. The short time is being worked in consequence of the warehouse being overstocked with fustian cloths.

BRADFORD AND DISTRICT TRADES' COUNCIL.—A public meeting was held last week for the purpose of stating the case for the Midland strikers and the engineers on strike at Bolton. There was a large attendance. The president of the council, Mr. John Hollings, took the chair, and said: "In times like these, when some men had so much wealth, means were placed in their hands by which other men were crushed down to a condition of abject slavery, and were regarded as mere machines, to be treated as machines were treated." Going on to speak of the condition of the working classes, he said: "Labour created capital; but those who had the wealth spoke very little indeed of the labourer. The chairman of the Midland Railway Company had said that the leaders of the strikers were agitators; but was he himself not an agitator for the company and the shareholders?" Mr. Stevens (delegate from the Bradford strikers) said that only three out of ninety men in Bradford had been reinstated, consequently the rest were left to do the best they could. A resolution was carried, condemning the Midland directors and shareholders, and also one expressing sympathy with the Bolton strikers. A collection was made at the close for the Bolton men.

BRUXBURN SHALE-MINERS DISPUTE.—The delegates of the men on strike had an interview with the managing director to discuss their differences of opinion, with a view to a settlement. One of the miners having stated the case for the men, the director said he could hold out no hope of the company conceding any part of the reduction, and even should they accept the full reduction, they would have to consult the Mineral Oil Association before opening the mines. The men would also have to be more "loyal" to the company, and abide by the rules of the works. He did not, however, state what he meant by "loyal." The works manager, Mr. Henderson, then said that in future they would have no interference by third parties, and took the deputation to task for letters inserted in a local paper by their agent. Instead of having their grievances brought up in public meetings and in letters to the press, he thought they should first complain to the managers. The men explained that they had always appealed to the "tender mercies" of the managers, and always without success. After the conference a meeting of the men was held in the Public Hall, which was crowded. The meeting unanimously agreed not to accept the employers' terms, but would take a few days to consider the matter before coming to a final decision.

THE MIDLAND RAILWAY STRIKE.—The Cotton Factory Times has the following excellent observations on the late strike:—"The strike of the drivers and firemen on the Midland Railway system has collapsed. There is no use beating about the bush. It is the most complete failure of any strike of modern times. Those of our readers who perused our remarks of last week on the subject would see that we indicated this in the last few lines, when we said that 'if the dispute convinced the railway servants of the necessity of greater unity than had characterised their action in the past the lesson, though dearly bought, would not have cost too much.' It was not at that time politic to speak plainer, seeing that the dispute was undecided, and that we were anxious that the men should have every encouragement, of which they stood sorely in need. Now, however, that the affair is settled by the unconditional surrender of those who came out there can be no harm in applying the lessons taught. The first of these is that no strike of such magnitude, or for the matter of that no strike at all, should be undertaken unless there is a practical unanimity amongst all the workers involved. In this case it appears that 74 per cent. of the drivers and firemen employed by the company remained at or returned to their posts within a day or two after the strike commenced. In no occupation, even with poor employers, could a strike be successful under such circumstances, let alone against a wealthy and influential corporation. Further than this, however, if we take into consideration the signalmen, porters, guards, and the thousands of workmen employed in miscellaneous work about a large railway system like the Midland, all of whom know more or less of the road and the general work, the number of those who came out on strike becomes infinitesimal by comparison. To make such a strike successful, it is absolutely necessary that the work of the company attacked must be brought to a complete standstill. To do this, at least three-fourths of the whole of the employes—drivers, firemen, signalmen, porters, etc.—should all come out. It may be that only one section are affected by some new proposals, but in the long run it is found that they are all in the same boat. In the present state of railway organisation this is, however, impossible. The only real trade union amongst railway servants is the Amalgamated Society. This, though one of the wealthiest in the kingdom, only numbers about 10,000 members, or less than one in twenty of those eligible to join. Whether it be railway servants, or any other class of workers, their position is exactly what they choose to make it. Never had men a better case than the drivers and firemen of the Midland. In no occupation could men strike with such force if united, and yet the company managed to carry on their business and defeat the men in a week for want (in the men's case) of that unity which is strength. There are now being bandied round recriminations about being betrayed, and the officials of the union not doing their duty. This is worse than useless. Let the railway servants put all this on one side, and make their union one not only in name but in reality, and we should soon find that to all reasonable demands, the companies would be as amenable as they are now the reverse."

THE WEAVERS' STRIKE AT PRESTON.—On Wednesday evening, Aug. 17, a mass meeting of the weavers, winders, and warpers of Preston was held at the Weavers' Institute in that town, for the purpose of hearing an explanation of the state of affairs in connection with the strike at Messrs. H. C. Owtram and Co.'s Manchester and Castle Street Mills. Mr. John Marshall occupied the chair, and was supported by Mr. J. Barrows (Padiham), Mr. A. Buckley (Oldham), and Mr. Luke Park, secretary of the Preston Weavers' Association. There was a large attendance. The chairman, explaining how the strike was brought about, said that for months and months the velvet weavers of this firm had been very dissatisfied with the prices paid for the goods they were weaving. A little over two years ago they were paid 18s. a cut, while now they received only 15s., and the employer did not intend to stop at that.—Mr. A. Buckley said the fact was that velvet goods were being woven at this place for less than plain calico pieces. They wanted to have peace and quietness with the employers if possible, but when a man paid 6s. or 7s. a cut under other people, and could not be quietly persuaded he was in the wrong, they were bound to try what a little pressure would do. In Oldham the weavers got a lot more money for the same work. Here was one sort: 52 in. loom, 41 in. yarn, 64 picks, 74 reed, 60's double twist, 56's weft, 137 yards long. For that they were paid at Messrs. Owtram's 15s., while in Oldham they were paid 20s. 7d. For another cloth of the same pick, reed, counts, and length, but 48 in. wide, the Oldham price was 21s. 4½d. Naturally Oldham employers would not stand this sort of thing, and but for the action of the Preston weavers notices would have been placed in the Oldham mills last Saturday or Saturday week of a reduction of 10 or 15 per cent. At their two mills Messrs. Owtram had something like twelve hundred looms. In Oldham they had almost as many thousands of looms on velvets, and if this strike had not taken place all those in Oldham would have been stopped. He had even been told by an Oldham employer that if they had submitted to the prices paid in Preston, it was the intention of the Oldham velvet manufacturers to bring their weavers down to Preston prices. This would have meant a reduction of 5s. or 6s. a cut, a very serious matter indeed. It was for that meeting to say what the result should be. If they showed a good example, other towns would be encouraged to subscribe liberally, while if they let this reduction be made, they might depend on it that it would not end there. The employers would say that if they could beat the operatives at this one point, they could beat them at others, and the consequences might be very serious.—Mr. Barrows, who was enthusiastically received, said he did not want to quarrel with Mr. Edelston or any other employer. If there was any one to blame in this matter, it was the weavers for allowing him too much latitude. They had been told that three years ago he was paying 18s. for a cut, and was now only paying 15s. for just the same work; but they were not told that the 18s. was 3s. less than the proper price. In the last four years Mr. Edelston had been keeping from his velvet weavers that which did not belong to him. If he had taken it out of their pockets it would have been a robbery, but as he had only prevented it going into their pockets of course it was not. What would they do in Preston to help these weavers? He confessed he had more faith in districts outside, which had never seen a velvet and never wanted to see one, than he had in those of Preston. They wanted there very different organisation than they had now, and until they got it they would have men like Mr. Edelston to deal with. His was not the only place in Preston where the employers were not paying what they ought, and until the operatives were better organised, and roused themselves to a defence of each other, they would always have this sort of thing going on. If they once gave Mr. Edelston a good thrashing he would be better to deal with in future.—The chairman stated that mill collections were started last week, and they expected that this week the majority of the mills would have collections inside.—Mr. Barrows said that if they paid 4d. a loom they could beat Mr. Edelston into fits.—A female weaver moved that the contribution be 1½d. per loom, and this was seconded. A male operative proposed that it be 1d. per loom, which, he said, would be sufficient if every one paid to give those on strike 2s. 6d. per loom. It was no use one paying 1½d. and the next weaver nothing.—The original motion was withdrawn in favour of the amendment, which was carried unanimously, and the meeting ended.

REPORTS.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, August 17, Sydney Webb lectured on "The Political Duty of Socialists." The lecturer maintained that it was the duty of Socialists to get their names on the register, and so become a part of the voting power of the country. Considerable difference of opinion was expressed as to the utility of this by several members. On Sunday, August 21, an open-air meeting was held on the Green, addressed by Turner and others. In hall, Thos. Shore lectured on "Land Nationalisation." Good discussion followed. Fair sale of literature.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—No meeting was held at the Broadway on Wednesday owing to the thunderstorm. A short meeting was addressed by Turner at the Salmon and Ball, on Sunday morning. A good discussion followed. A discussion on "Socialism" was held at the club on Sunday evening.—T. R. C.

HOXTON.—On Thursday evening, comrades Jas. Allman and Turner addressed a good outdoor meeting opposite Hoxton Church. On Sunday morning a very successful meeting was held at same place, comrades Wade and J. Pope speaking. Commonweal sold well. On Saturday, the members and friends of the League held a successful concert. On Sunday evening in the hall, Wm. Morris gave a lecture on "Monopoly" to a good audience, followed by a good discussion.—C. J. Y.

KINGSLAND GREEN.—On Sunday morning, we held our first meeting on Kingsland Green, which was addressed by John Allman, Flockton, and Nicoll. A large and attentive audience assembled. At the close of the meeting we had some opposition from Freund, who has been several times charged at the Mansion House for preaching in and out of St. Paul's Cathedral of the doom of the Great City. Commonweal sold well. Two names were taken towards the formation of a branch.—J. F.

MARYLEBONE.—We held our usual meeting in Hyde Park on Sunday afternoon. Cantwell, Nicoll, and Bartlett spoke. No discussion.—T. C.

MERTON.—On Sunday morning at 11.30, Eden, Bull, and Harman opened fresh ground in Haydon Road, near Recreation Ground. On Sunday evening at 6.30, an enthusiastic meeting of between four and five hundred people, addressed by Eden, Hardesty, and Harrison. Good sale of Commonweal.—W. G. E.

MILE END AND BETHNAL GREEN.—On Tuesday, the 16th inst., a large meeting was held on the Waste, Turner, Ailman, and Davis speaking. Good sale of paper. On Sunday, 21st inst., a very enthusiastic meeting was held in Victoria Park by Morris and Davis. Some opposition was offered by an Individualist, whose remarks were replied to amidst cheers. Commonweal sold well.—H. M.

MITCHAM.—We held good meeting, addressed by Sparling, who dwelt chiefly on the Midland strike. The speaker was listened to with great attention. 3s. 9d. collected for propaganda. Commonweal sold well.—R. C.

NORTH LONDON.—Our meeting at Ossulston Street on Tuesday night was very successful. Cantwell, Graham, Flockton, and Brooks spoke. Some questions were replied to satisfactorily.—T. C.

STAMFORD HILL.—On Sunday afternoon, a most successful meeting was held at Stamford Hill, which was addressed by James and John Allman, Turner, and Brooks.—J. F.

BIRMINGHAM.—Donald addressed a meeting in the Bull Ring on Sunday, and one at Spring Hill. At Spring Hill the police again interfered.

BLOXWICH.—Sanders addressed a meeting on the Green. The bad weather made our meeting less than last week, when we had above three thousand.

DUDLEY.—A meeting of huge dimensions was addressed by Sanders on Tuesday in the Market Place. The police have persistently attempted to suppress us here, but in spite of their animus we held our meeting, a Tory town councillor taking part in the discussion. They have suppressed the meetings of Church and the Salvation Army in order with more face to suppress us. However, we go to the market as vendors of books, and intend to insist on having the same right to puff our wares as any other merchant. We sent a letter to the Town Council asking permission to hold our meetings, but have been refused.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday afternoon, Paterson and Downie addressed a good meeting at Cambuslang. At Jail Square on Sunday forenoon, Glasier and Bullock spoke to a large audience. In the afternoon, our usual meeting was held at Paisley Road Toll, Glasier and Bullock being the speakers. The meeting was a large one, and listened with great attention to our comrades. In the evening another meeting was held in Jail Square, and Glasier, Bullock, and D. Stewart (S.D.F.) delivered stirring speeches to an audience of 1,000 persons with a fair sprinkling of policemen. At each of our meetings on Sunday, collections were taken on behalf of the locked out shale miners of Broxburn. The amount collected was £1 0s. 4½d. Commonweal sold well at all the meetings.—A. M.K.

GREAT BRIDGE.—On Tuesday, Donald and Weaver lectured here in the Market Place. The audience of 500 or so listened with marked attention and frequently applauded.

HANDSWORTH.—Meetings were held at Tangyes Works on Friday and Saturday, addressed by Donald. Good sale of literature both times. Men likely to aid the cause have turned up.

LEEDS.—Three good open-air meetings held since last report.—T. P.

PELSALL.—Weaver addressed a meeting of miners and ironworkers on the Common, on Wednesday. There is every prospect of a strong branch being developed, and our Pelsall comrades intend to increase their efforts to attain same.—J. T. D.

WALSALL.—We addressed a large meeting at the Sister Dora Statue on Saturday. Our speakers were well listened to.—J. T. D.

WEDNESBURY.—Large meeting in Market Place was addressed by Donald, Weaver, and Sanders, on August 18th. Good sale of literature.—J. M.

DUBLIN.—At the Labour League on Thursday, August 18, I. O'Gorman lectured to a small but attentive audience on the "Demands of Organised Labour."

He traced the gradual evolution of the wages slavery of to-day from the chattel slavery of old, showing in what respects "the free labourer" of the Christian nineteenth century was worse off than the chattel slave of benighted heathendom, and advocated Socialism as the only remedy for the industrial depression. An interesting discussion followed, in which I. B. Killen, B.L., J. S. Hall, Keegan, Gabriel, and King took part. Mr. Raftann, Scottish Land Restoration League, in criticising the lecture, appealed to Socialists to take political action, and assist Radicals, Land Nationalisers, et hoc genus omne, in advocating reforms on which all could unite. He was ably answered by Fitzpatrick, who pointed out the futility of such a course.—K.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—On Sunday, August 14, the Sheffield Socialists mustered in strong force at their usual meeting-place for open-air propaganda. Messrs. Garbut, Drury, and Bullas addressed the meeting. On Monday the 15th, we had a somewhat lively meeting; comrades Story, Bullas, and Mrs. Usher were the speakers. There was some noisy but weak opposition, which was easily and effectively answered, the people evidently thinking the message of Socialism is worthy of their consideration.—M.

WOOLWICH.—G. B. Shaw spoke here last Sunday evening to a crowd numbering several hundreds, on "Radicalism and Socialism." The way he handled his subject won the sympathies of all our former opponents, and at the close of his address one of our Radical friends made an appeal to the audience to support us in our work by subscribing to the Propaganda Fund. 7s. was collected, and long before the meeting closed our literature was sold out.—R. B.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

The usual meeting of the Edinburgh Branch was held on Thursday evening. Arrangement for the meetings in aid of the Shale Miners were completed. A good many members have joined during the last few weeks. On all hands the propaganda is going on satisfactorily.

Carnoustie.—Mahon visited this town on August 15, distributed some literature, and arranged for a meeting a fortnight later.

Arbroath.—A very successful meeting was held at Brothock Bridge on the 16th, addressed by Mahon. The utmost interest was evinced by the audience, and a good branch was formed at the close of the meeting. Sale of literature and collection satisfactory.

Forfar.—Owing to the heavy rain it was impossible to hold the meeting as announced. Arrangements for an indoor meeting a fortnight later were made.

Dundee.—An indoor meeting was held on Thursday the 18th, to organise the newly formed branch. The hall of the Educational Institute was crowded. Mahon delivered a short address. A meeting of members was held afterwards for election of officers, and arranging for another series of meetings.

THE SHALE MINERS' MEETINGS.

The meetings on Saturday afternoon in aid of the Shale Miners were only partially successful. Both meetings were fairly large and the people very much interested, but the attendance was nothing to what it should have been. The Shale miners have suffered in silence; they have been meek and mild and law-abiding, and public indifference to their wrongs is the reward of their good behaviour. Some very able speeches were made by Mr. Wilson, secretary of the Shale Miners, Bullock of the Scottish Miners' Federation, Small of the Lanarkshire Miners, and Tuke, Mahon, and Smith of the Socialist League. The collection amounted to £1 5s. 4½d. Another meeting will probably be held.

Leith.—Last Sunday's meeting on the Quay side was well attended. May and Mahon were the speakers. Satisfactory collection and sale of literature.

Edinburgh.—Afternoon meeting in the Grass Market was very lively. One or two opponents turned up and caused a very good discussion. The sympathy of the meeting was entirely with the Socialists. The Queen's Park meeting was larger than usual. Smith, Tuke, and Mahon spoke. In the evening a meeting at the Mound was held, Mahon delivered a short address, and then for over an hour a series of questions were put by some three or four gentlemen, who seemed deeply interested in the subject. Most of the questions were very intelligent. The meeting was adjourned at ten minutes to ten. Several of the enquirers promised to return on the following Sunday.

NOTES ON NEWS.

A newspaper correspondent, on a visit to the City dust-bin, seems to have been a good deal filled up by the boss there, who vaunted the superior attractions of the occupation of—well, dirt-shifting and stink-smelling. So that it seems we are all wrong together in our attempts at sanitation; or perhaps the dust boss was a liar, which seems on the whole the simpler explanation. Anyhow this job of dust-shifting is one of those concerning which one gets asked after lectures as to who is to do such and such things under Socialism. Well, however hard the question might be to answer as to the future, it seems to me that at present M.P.'s might work at it between the squalls. It would teach them the difference between metaphor and fact for one thing, and probably they would prefer their old habitual way of eating dirt after all. To be serious, the real job is not fit for anybody else—except the lawyers.

Mr. Bradlaugh is in luck; after being canonized by Lord Wemyss, he has received a still more important testimonial from the Daily News, which classes him amongst "thoroughly sound and moderate politicians"! After this it will be strange indeed if he is not a member of the coming Gladstonian Government. Some persons will think indeed that it must be rather a strain to keep up a reputation for "soundness and moderation;" and whatever has been in the past, that will probably be true in the future, and even before very long, when when there will only be two parties—the party of the people and the party of reaction. You can only be moderate when it is possible to say "perhaps" instead of "yes" or "no." Which of these two latter will Mr. Bradlaugh say?

Meantime, on this Irish matter there are Gladstonians with greater claims to moderation than Mr. Bradlaugh. The meeting Liberals held recently to discuss the help to be given to the Irish in the present stress was in its moderation worthy of the study of a Molière. Even allowing for the disclaimer of the accuracy of the report in the Daily News, the general tone of it must have been pretty accurately given in the report, and it is curious how anxious certain members were—especially Mr. Howell—not to commit themselves to anything definite. One need hardly warn the Irish party not to trust too much to the Gladstonian M.P.'s, they will have reckoned them up long ago; but the English democracy, which is sincere in its conversion to the cause of Irish independence, should look a little sharper after its "representatives."

The delusion as to the recovery of trade which was spreading, or rather, perhaps, being industriously spread, a little time ago, probably as a part of the Jubilee decorations, is vanishing with the brilliant memory of those decorations; and it has now to be confessed for one thing that the falling off in the railway receipts is serious. The coming winter will bring home the fact of the failure of expansion in English trade very sharply to the millions of the slaves of commerce. And the trading class also will be feeling more and more the result of the revolution which is going on, though neither class will know what is the real cause of the pinch, but will put it down to "free trade," the immigration of foreigners, and other sticks and straws that are floating on the vast current of fully-developed commercialism.

It is Socialism only that can explain the conundrum offered to us by the capitalists, "Livelihood is so cheap that it is hard indeed to live." Truly even when thieves are disreputable persons they are inconvenient members of society; but when successful stealing is the aim of all respectable persons, and thieves have got to be looked upon as benefactors of society; when legalised theft is so gloriously organised, and the art has reached such a pitch of refinement that the thieves steal their slaves ready-made, instead of buying them honestly in the market, or boldly risking their lives in battle to conquer them; then indeed the less successful of us may well find it hard to live.

Indeed even the stealing is accomplished vicariously by these full-blown geniuses in the art, for, as Mr. G. B. Shaw was explaining to us the other night, the slaves themselves are forced to offer themselves as unbought property to their masters. Ancient society, with its brutal chattel slavery, did its business with discreditable want of economy compared with capitalist civilization.

The captive Salvationists are being championed by mightier prints and persons than we can bring forward. So, little need be said about their case, though it cannot fail to be interesting to us who have been in the same trouble and shall be again. The crime for which they are punished—of speaking in public on ground that belongs to the public—is familiar enough to us, and the cause for the attack on them is one of the causes for which we were attacked—lack of respectability, to wit. We can only hope that those who are defending freedom of speech in this case will do so again when our turn comes round.

W. M.

"THE" TEXT.

As is only fitting in a great industrial country, our government has made a collection of the finest of the products of the labours of every race of man. In this manner it means to preach to us a silent sermon, and point the way to a more "profitable" national life; and, not to be otherwise than strictly orthodox in its method, it points the moral of its teaching in a scriptural quotation, which is at once its text and "application." This text, which is emphatically "the" text, being given forth by "authority" for all engaged in productive labour, is:

"The wisdom of a learned man cometh by opportunity of leisure: and he that hath little business shall become wise. How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plough, and that glorieth in the goad, that driveth oxen, and is occupied in their labours, and whose talk is of bullocks? He giveth his mind to make furrows, and is diligent to give the kine fodder.

"So every carpenter and work master that laboureth night and day: and they that cut and grave seals, and are diligent to make great variety, and give themselves to counterfeit imagery, and watch to finish a work: the smith also sitting by the anvil, and considering the ironwork, the vapour of the fire wasteth his flesh, and he fighteth with the heat of the furnace: the noise of the hammer and the anvil is ever in his ears, and his eyes look still upon the pattern of the thing he maketh; he setteth his mind to finish his work, and watcheth to polish it perfectly; so does the potter sitting at his work, and turning the wheel about with his feet; who is always carefully set at his work, and maketh all his work by number; all these trust to their hands, and every one is wise in his work. Without these cannot a city be inhabited: and they shall not dwell where they will, nor go up and down; but they will maintain the state of the world, and their desire is in the work of their craft."

These words are to be found, then, written in large letters around the principal Court of the South Kensington Museum, and they are also to be seen on the large window of the great staircase of the same building.

Really this text seems to have been expressly devised and set up to serve as a peg on which to hang a revolutionary dissertation; and its society tone, which admits that, after all, "without these a city cannot be inhabited," but consoles itself with the determination that "they shall not dwell where they will, nor go up and down," is truly nineteenth century, as also is the forgetfulness that the artist who gives himself to counterfeit imagery; the inventor who is diligent to make great variety; the foreman who watches to finish a work, and all the actual producers, happen to be the city itself; while the leisurely fed are but parasites, without whom a city could indeed be well inhabited.

Nothing could be more significant of the real aims of the ruling classes in this country than this inscription placed on an institution ostensibly for the advancement of the industrious mass of the community; nor could anything more openly betray the hypocrisy of the movements which have been made for the so-called benefit of the working-man. The South Kensington Museum, nominally erected for the training of art-workmen, by the very fact of it being the "South Kensington" Museum, proves the hollowness of all its professions of utility to the workers themselves; for the site of the building, miles from the industrial districts, and in the midst of an aristocratic quarter, shows that its real intention is for the convenience of those who have the greatest facilities for using it—the rich. And it is here that their class-hatreds are inflamed, their pride of caste flattered by having placed before their eyes this precious text telling them it is their right to control the men whose brains and lives produced the masterpieces of art surrounding them: that they, the men of leisure, the whore-master and the pigeon-shooter, are the divinely authorised disposers of the lives and productions of the potters and the smiths—the Palissys and Cellinis; and it is here that both genius and plodder, not to speak of the millions of the toilers, when by chance any such being wanders from his habitation to this far-off palace, are insulted by these words, which, however true and forcible to the pride of those who placed them there, are a threat and a challenge to every man and woman in any manner engaged in productive labour who may enter the building—their especial building—the national museum of industrial arts.

The selection and use of this text is a circumstance which fairly indicates the true state of feeling on the part of the idle and other ruling classes towards the industrious population. In itself it is but a slight thing; but, however small it may be intrinsically, it is the keynote of the strain of caste superstition by which we are mastered, and the fact of its being put forward as a kind of governmental shibboleth in the manner it is makes it, I consider, a most valuable text for Socialists and all democrats. One may be able to mention a thousand things more characteristic of the relative positions of the industrious and the idle in this country, or bring to mind thoughts of the condition of mines and ships; remembrances of tragical intensity before which a merely written defiance is all emptiness; nevertheless the text should be regarded, for it is the official expression of the relations the "leisurely" governors intend to maintain towards the over-wrought millions of the country.

G. P.

FEUDAL ENGLAND.

THE Great Council of the Realm was purely feudal; it was composed of the feudatories of the king, theoretically of all of them, practically of the great ones only. It was, in fact, the council of the conquering tribe with their chief at their head; the matters of the due feudal tribute, aids, reliefs, fines, sentage, and the like—in short, the king's revenue due from his men—were settled in this council at once and in the lump. But the inferior tribe, though not represented there, existed, and, as aforesaid, was growing rich, and the king had to get their money out of their purses directly; which as they were not represented at the Council, he had to do by means of his officers (the sheriffs) dealing with them one after another, which was a troublesome job; for the men were stiff-necked and quite disinclined to part with their money; and the robbery having to be done on the spot, so to say, encountered all sorts of opposition, and, in fact, it was the money needs both of baron, bishop, and king which had been the chief instrument in furthering the progress of the towns. The towns would be pressed by their lords, king, or baron, or bishop, as it might be, and they would see their advantage and strike a bargain. For you are not to imagine that because there was a deal of violence going on in those times there was no respect for law; on the contrary, there was a quite exaggerated respect for it if it came within the four corners of the feudal feeling, and the result of this feeling of respect was the constant struggle for status on the part of the townships and other associations throughout the Middle Ages. Well, the burghers would say, "Tis hard to pay this money, but we will put ourselves out to pay it if you will do something for us in return; let, for example, our men be tried in our own court, and the verdict be of one of compurgation instead of wager of battle," and so forth, and so forth. Well, all this sort of detailed bargaining was, in fact, a safeguard for the local liberties, so far as they went, of the towns and shires, and did not suit the king's views of law and order at all; and so began the custom of the sheriff (the king's officer, who had taken the place of the earl of the Anglo-Saxon period) summoning the burgesses to the council, which burgesses you must understand were not elected at the folk-motes of the town, or hundred (of which more hereafter), but in a sort of hole-and-corner way by a few of the bigger men of the place. What the king practically said was this: "I want your money, and I cannot be for ever wrangling with you stubborn churles at home there, and listening to all your stories of how poor you are and what you want; no, I want you to be represented. Send me up from each one of your communes a man or two whom I can bully or cajole or bribe to sign away your substance for you."

Under these circumstances it is no wonder that the towns were not very eager in the cause of representation. It was no easy job to get them to come up to London merely to consult as to the kind of sauce with which they were to be eaten. However, they did come in some numbers, and by the year 1295 something like a shadow of our present Parliament was on foot. Nor need there be much more said about this institution; as time went on its functions got gradually extended by the petition for the redress of grievances accompanying the granting of money, but it was generally to be reckoned on as subservient to the will of the king, who down to the later Tudor period played some very queer tunes on this constitutional instrument.

Edward I. gave place to his son, who again was of the type of king who had hitherto given the opportunity to the barons for their turn of advancement in the constitutional struggle; and in earlier times no doubt they would have taken full advantage of the circumstances; as it was they had little to gain. The king did his best to throw off the restraint of the feudal constitution, and to govern simply as an absolute monarch. After a time of apparent success he failed, of course, and only succeeded in confirming the legal rights of feudalism by bringing about his own formal deposition at the hands of the baronage, as a chief who, having broken the compact with his feudatories, had necessarily forfeited his right. If we compare his case with that of Charles I. we shall find this difference in it, besides the obvious one that Edward was held responsible to his feudatories and Charles towards the upper middle classes, the squirearchy, as represented by Parliament: that Charles was condemned by a law created for the purpose, so to say, and evolved from the principle of the representation of the propertied classes, while Edward's deposition was the real logical outcome of the confirmed feudal system, and was practically legal and regular.

The successor of the deposed king, the Third Edward, ushers in the complete and central period of the Middle Ages in England. The feudal system is complete; the life and spirit of the country has developed into a condition if not quite independent, yet quite forgetful, on the one hand of the ideas and customs of the Celtic and Teutonic tribes, and on the other of the authority of the Roman Empire. The Middle Ages have grown into manhood; that manhood has an art of its own, which, though developed step by step from that of Old Rome and New Rome, and embracing the strange mysticism and dreamy beauty of the East, has forgotten both its father and its mother, and stands alone triumphant, the loveliest, brightest, and gayest of all the creations of the human mind and hand. It has a literature of its own too, somewhat akin to its art, yet inferior to it, and lacking its unity, since there is a double stream in it. On the one hand, the Court poet, the gentleman, Chaucer, with his Italianising metre, and his formal recognition of the classical stories; on which, indeed, he builds a superstructure of the quaintest and most unadulterated mediævalism, as gay and bright as the architecture which his eyes beheld and his pen pictured for us, so clear, defined, and elegant; a sunny world even amidst its violence and passing troubles, like those of a happy child, the worst of them an amusement rather than a grief to the onlookers; a world that scarcely needed hope in its eager life of adventure and love, amidst the sunlit blossoming meadows, and green woods, and white begilded manor houses. A kindly and human muse is Chaucer's, nevertheless, interested in and amused by all life, but of her very nature devoid of strong aspirations for the future; and that all the more, since, though the strong devotion and fierce piety of the ruder Middle Ages had by this time waned, and the Church was more often lightly mocked than either feared or loved, still the habit of looking on this life as part of another yet remained: the world is fair and full of adventure; kind men and true and noble are in it to make one happy; fools also to laugh at, and rascals to be resisted, yet not wholly condemned; and when this world is over we shall still go on living in another which is a part of this picture. Note all, and be as merry as you may, never forgetting that you are alive and that it is good to live.

That is the spirit of Chaucer's poetry; but alongside of it existed yet the ballad poetry of the people, wholly untouched by courtly elegance and classical pedantry; rude in art but never coarse, true to the back-bone; instinct with indignation against wrong, and thereby expressing the hope that was in it; a protest of the poor against the rich, especially in those songs of the Foresters, which have been called the mediæval epic of revolt; no more gloomy than the gentleman's poetry, yet cheerful from courage, and not content. Half-a-dozen stanzas of it are worth a cart-load of the whining introspective lyrics of to-day; and he who, when he has mastered the slight differences of language from our own daily speech, is not moved by it, does not understand what true poetry means nor what its aim is.

There is a third element in the literature of this time which you may call Lollard poetry, the great example of which is William Langland's 'Piers Plowman.' It is no bad corrective to Chaucer, and in form at least belongs wholly to the popular side; but it seems to me to show symptoms of the spirit of the rising middle class, and casts before it the shadow of the new master that was coming forward for the workman's oppression. But I must leave what more I have to say on this subject of the art and literature of the fourteenth century for another occasion. In what I have just said, I only wanted to point out to you that the Middle Ages had by this time come to the fullest growth; and that they could give expression, which was all their own, to the ideas and life of the time. That time was in a sense brilliant and progressive, and the life of the worker was better than it ever had been, and might compare with advantage with what it became in after periods and with what it is now; and indeed, looking back upon it, there are some minds and some moods that cannot help regretting it, and are not particularly scared by the idea of its violence and lack of accurate knowledge of scientific details; but, however, one thing is clear to us now, the kind of thing which never is clear to most people living in such periods, namely, that whatever it was, it could not last but must change into something else.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

(To be concluded.)

Who would have thought that Mr. Bradlaugh would ever become popular with the Tories. Yet Earl Weymouth, who looks upon even Lord Salisbury as a dangerous Revolutionist, holds Mr. Bradlaugh up as an example to those who wantonly attack the right of property. The hon. member for Northampton thinks that £10,000 is not too much for a Lord Chancellor, and he was very indignant at the wickedness of his esteemed colleague, Mr. Labouchere, who wanted to reduce it to £8,000. Mr. Bradlaugh is so enamoured of the principle of competition as applied to workmen's wages, that one wonders he does not propose to put the post of Lord Chancellor up to competition. In these times of trade depression, even among the legal profession, we could surely get the work done at a cheaper rate than £10,000 a-year. But is it not strange that the head of the Liberty and Property Defence League, a body renowned for its championship of the rights of the classes to plunder the masses, should find occasion to praise so highly such an advanced Democrat as the hon. member for Northampton? A few years ago the Tories literally thirsted for Iconoclast's blood; now they laud him to the skies, "He is such a nice man, so different from those rude Irish members, and that insufferable Labouchere." Mr. Bradlaugh is doubtless proud of his popularity. A Radical member (?) whom the Tories are fond of is a curiosity that cannot be enough admired.—DIOGENES, in Norwich Daylight.

CHANGING THE DISHES.

Two parliamentary Select Committees have lately reported in favour of certain small changes, and perhaps have brought us within sight of the changes being made. One of these, referring to Sunday work in the post office, even if carried out, would be of the dignity of the proverbial half-loaf, which is all that our legislators, in their wildest excitement, ever dream of. The Post-office Committee recommend that letter-carriers and sorters and other employes (not the Postmaster-General and the big-wigs) should be off duty on alternate Sundays, should in fact have to keep one day holy in a fortnight, unlike the poor hard-driven postmasters, M.P.'s, bishops, etc., who have to keep one such day each week. It is unfair. As I see these last-named people toiling about in frock-coats, chimney-pot hats, and episcopal gaiters on a hot Sunday, their suffering must be dreadful, and they surely ought to have the first claim to be let off duty on alternate Sundays. Indeed for my own part I am almost in favour of letting them off altogether, and the postmen too. The question of their stipends, when so let off, presents a good deal of difficulty. It would hardly do to pay them the same after as before the relaxation. Perhaps some of the released postmasters, M.P.'s, bishops, etc., not having much to do on weekdays, might try to turn an honest penny by sorting and delivering letters on a Sunday. They could report at the end of a few years whether their change of fare was satisfactory to them.

The other Select Committee has issued a report on Perpetual Pensions, and suggests alterations which remind one of the Change of Dishes at the Barmecide Feast.¹ The Barmecide's first dish, or clause 1, seems very satisfying. It is called "A solution of iniquities," or "The cessation of payments to those who have rendered no service." The second and third dishes are called in like manner "Salaries and duties," and "Inheritance clipped and trimmed." The Barmecide calls to his attendants to put on such viands in plenty, and bids his hungry constituents "Eat, O my guests, for ye are hungry, vehemently so, and in absolute want of food." And his constituents twist their mouths about as though they were eating, saying within themselves, "Verily this is a man who loveth to jest with others." And the Barmecide orders different kinds of viands and commutes the first dishes for others, with provisions of a different sort called Annuities for Lives, Twenty years' purchase, etc. He "proceeds to enumerate the various different kinds of viands, and to describe their several excellencies," and how they will ensure a real and substantial satisfaction to the appetite of his guests. And "all this time the constituents move their heads and mouths, and roll tongues between their cheeks, as if they were enjoying themselves." They exclaim, "O master, we have had enough," though in fact "their hunger is such that they long for a cake of barley-bread."

Suppose, however, that the guests reflect upon the situation, and upon the manner in which this man has jested with them, and say within themselves, "By Allah, I will do to him a deed that shall make him repent before God of these actions!" and that they follow this up "by taking the host unawares, and striking him such a slap upon his neck that the chamber shall ring at the blow." The Barmecide will perhaps begin with "What is this, ye vilest of the creation?" But surely he will then "utter a loud laugh, and say to his guests, Verily, for a long time have I made game of men. My dishes were empty and did not really contain the meat heretofore paid over to those who have rendered no service. That change would destroy both House of Lords and House of Commons; and Barmecides desire reform not abolition, and wish to keep these houses for those who have sagacity enough to conform to all their ideas. My dish of clipped inheritances only contained the filigree-work of Marshals, Grand Falconers, and High Stewards, and took nothing from the real Grand Pensioners, who are settled on the National Debt, and on the hereditary offices of dividend-receivers. The fact is that when I speak of a real and substantial saving, which will accrue to the benefit of my guests at this feast of ours, what is meant is that the published total of imperial taxation will be diminished. There is no real reduction, for I do not propose to interfere with the skilful man of business getting as many as possible to work the corvée for him, and so increasing in a quiet, private way the amount of the unpublished taxation of the people. This is my jest, and I see labour representatives among you, who fall in with the trick; they shall be my companions in reality, and shall never relinquish me, and we will leave the empty dishes over which we have joked for the well-filled ones which the Sons of the Parliamentary Barmecides have always ready in their palace." C. J. F.

MORE EVICTION OUTRAGES.—Omaha Philanthropist: "I've been in Ireland and seen some hard things, but—" Politician: "Sit right down, sir, and use this house as your own. What can I do for you?" "I have called, sir, to secure your influence in behalf of some fifteen or twenty families who—" More evictions! I'll call a mass meeting at once—this very week, sir." "They are now living in miserable tents, and—" "Put me down for a hundred dollars, sir, for their relief. I want to head the biggest kind of a popular subscription. Did you get the news in a private letter, or did it come by cable?" "The families I refer to are right here in Omaha, and I have just been talking with them." "Glorious! We'll have them on the stage at the mass meeting. How did they get across the ocean?" "Oh, they were born in this country, you know, and were evicted from Omaha shanties for not paying their rent." "Oh, them? See here, you meddling milk-sop, those were my shanties, and if you don't attend to your own business I'll make daylight shine through ye!"—Syracuse Labourer.

IT IS THE DAY.

O thou long-suffering Son of Man,
awake, lift up thy voice, and cry;
for, lo, the fulness of the plan of thy redemption draweth nigh;
soon shall thine eyes behold the smart of them that keep thy soul in thrall;
already, rotten at the heart,
their kingdom totters to its fall.

O thou long-suffering Son of Man,
what strife, what struggle has been thine, urged ever, since thy race began,
by force of discontent divine!
How keen a conflict didst thou wage, what slavery still dost undergo!
long has been tamed fierce Nature's rage,
thy fellow yet remains thy foe.

O thou long-suffering Son of Man, rejected, crucified, betrayed,
break through the bondage and the ban,
shake off the shame upon thee laid.
See how thine old oppressors quake,
the idle fool, the busy knave;
now, now thy righteous vengeance take,
and dig for both a speedy grave.

O Son of Man, at last, at last, over the wide and waiting earth
the herald beams are spreading fast, glad earnest of the daylight's birth.
The night is spent, the stars are wan, rose are the peaks that late were grey;
lift up thyself, O Son of Man, arise, awake, it is the day!

A LABOUR CONFERENCE.

WE have much pleasure in giving further publicity to the following appeal, which has been forwarded to all Trades Unions and kindred bodies throughout Norfolk:

Norfolk Labour Conference Committee
5 Duke Street, Norwich.

FELLOW WORKERS,—During the last few years you have doubtless often thought about the present relations between Labour and Capital; and often wondered, in face of the growing seriousness of the position, what kind of future we should be able to hand on to the generation that will follow us; and where and how this unceasing struggle between the worker class and the master class would end. No one at all acquainted with the facts of the case can now deny that everywhere Labour Organisations, Trades Unions, etc., are not only failing to hold their own, but are distinctly losing ground; that the number of male adults employed in several of our most important manufacturing industries is decreasing, being displaced to an alarming extent by improved methods of working, better machinery, and by the cheaper labour of women and juveniles; that all labour is becoming to a larger and larger extent precarious and uncertain; that trade depressions seem to come more and more frequently and intensely; and that we now seem to be in a period of declining wages all round with no brighter future outlook in any direction.

We as workers, feeling that this serious statement only too truly expresses the real position to-day, after all the boasted progress of this wonderful 19th century, would earnestly urge the extreme importance of at once consulting together as to whether some other line of action cannot now be taken which will promise us a better position than it seems possible to achieve with the existing isolated organisations; and also to discuss before it is again quite upon us what can be done in connection with the question of the unemployed which is now become of such great and capital importance each winter.

It is proposed to call a Norfolk Labour Conference to meet in Norwich during the third week in September; and to invite delegates from all the labour organisations existing in the county; and if possible to arrange in some way for the attendance of unskilled or non-union workers. The Gordon Hall has been placed at our disposal for this purpose. One point amongst others which is suggested for consideration is some scheme of federating all existing labour societies throughout the county. We should be glad if you would kindly consider this matter at your next meeting and let us have your opinions and suggestions upon this subject as early as possible.

A. SUTTON, Secretary pro tem.

Statistics in support of the statements made in the appeal are given, compiled from the reports of eight of the largest trades. This is a good move in the right direction. Who will follow? We should like to hear of every county in the "three kingdoms" following this example and then combining their local organisations into one great body. S.

TEA COOPERS AND GENERAL LABOURERS' ASSOCIATION.—At a mass meeting of the members of this association, held in the Pilgrim's Hall, New Kent Road, on Aug. 26, the following resolution was unanimously adopted: "This meeting of dock and wharf labourers expresses its unmeasured indignation at the reductions being made all round the trade, and calls upon all friends of the working classes to assist those whose only property is their labour." Representations as to the hardship of the existing state of things were made, and the meeting was a very enthusiastic one throughout.

SOCIALIST CAMPAIGN IN SOUTH WALES.

THE Pontypridd Herald, in commenting upon our advent, says that for the first time in its history the district has been invaded by the advance guard of Socialism, and in the course of a very fair article upon our doctrines, the same journal significantly says: "A State cannot be governed in accordance with the eternal principles of equity which permits Lazarus, repulsive from dirt, disease, and starvation, to sit daily at the gate of Dives, clothed in purple and fine linen, whatever the sequel of the history may be," and further:—

"Looking at our social arrangements as they now stand one cannot fail to perceive how utterly at variance they are with any system that has for its object 'each for the other and God for us all.' In fact the genius of society as at present constituted seems to find its fitting expression in the formula 'each for himself and the devil take the hindmost.' Were it not for the cohesive influence of the human virtues which ever and anon have play the social fabric would verily fly into pieces. It certainly does seem cruelly unjust that a workman, steady, industrious, aiming at the highest standard in the character of the work he turns out, and in every respect a kind husband, a tender father, and an intelligent citizen, should, as a producer of wealth, simply get a small percentage of the profit on the work he does, while the larger percentage of profit enriches the man who employs him. The consequence is that should Labour be stricken down with a heavy reverse of fortune, sickness, and what not, in a few weeks his family become pauperised. Capital, however, is exempt from such an affliction."

If the only result of our first visit is to cause an ordinary bourgeois journal to write in this strain, what may be possible if another descent is made?

The vitality of the Welsh language and the depth of national feeling is strikingly evident throughout these valleys, where one scarcely hears a word of English, but when spoken it is spoken with a purity surprising to a sojourner from Cockaigne. The recrudescence of national feeling shows itself in two aspects, the commercial and the Celtic. The first received adequate expression in the remarkable speech of Henry Richards, M.P., at the Eistedfodd, wherein he advised the Welsh to learn English in order "to struggle with them and fight the battle of life" on equal terms, and although the remainder of the speech was devoted to the praise of Wales and everything Welsh, and hopes for their preservation as such, yet the cloven hoof was shown. It is this bastard nationalism which allows unquestioned the colossal robberies of Scotch Bute, who, claiming to own nearly the whole of Glamorgan and its vast mineral resources, exacts a toll of 1s. per ton from the labours of the underpaid and overworked collier, and hands over the finest portion of the country to be disfigured and despoiled by Jew and Gentile land thieves and labour robbers of any nationality. It is a nationalism that lends everything to gain and is fittingly expressed in the six letters composing the word P-r-o-f-i-t, something akin to the feeling which prompted the pedagogue mentioned in previous letter to tell Kitz he had no business in Wales because of his German origin, and yet he would lick the boots of a man of exactly the same breed, because, forsooth, he is the "Prince of Wales."

The Celtic feeling, however, is that which causes "grave disquiet" to the friends of "law and order," and which antagonises at every step the progress of Anglo-Saxon commercialism. In Wales it is opposition to tithes and mining royalties, and I am glad to be able to add now, landlordism. In Ireland and Skye it is the land war. It has a trinity of tribunes in Davitt, Pan Jones, and Macdonald. It harks back to the historical times when the Celtic tribes were free from the curse of landlordism; and whilst, of course, it would not revive the cruelties of those olden days, it yet clings to the old tongue that has no equivalents wherewith to give expression to the modern profit-grinding which has blighted the land of their fathers.

Your ordinary beef-necked shop-keeping capitalist sneers at the sentimentalism which mourns over the spoliation of a whole country side, in order to build up the fortunes of the Butes, Crawshays, Windsors, and Dowlais directors, but deep down in the warm, generous hearts of the South Welsh workers is a feeling which we found easy to stir, which asks the question, What is the good of it all to us? A writer in the South Wales Echo, speaking only of comparatively recent times, says of the Rhondda Valley:—

"Business called me to the Rhondda Valley, which I had not visited for a good many years; and I found an enormous development and a striking change. It is little more than twenty years ago that there were game birds to be found on the mountains above Treherbert, and now the slopes are scarred with colliery works or deformed by mining refuse. In a more recent time I remember when trout still haunted the pools of the river, and along its banks there were long reaches of pasture land from which cattle grazed upwards towards heathery meadows; while men and boys would bathe in waters scarcely yet defiled. Now I see an almost continuous series of towns from the higher water of the Rhondda, and its junction with the Taff at 'Newbridge,' as the railway had endeavoured to have it named; the pastures have almost entirely disappeared on the low lands; and low lines of decidedly ugly cottages have taken their place; while, as regards the river, never was a sight more pitiable to behold. For the lovely Rhondda, of which friends spoke to me years ago, and the beauties of which I could still discover traces, there has been substituted a stony track of boulder stones and debris, through which a foul stream you could step across slowly dribbled, and defamed as it dribbled the memories of not so long ago. Much of that which I saw may be traced to the extraordinary drought of the present spring and summer. I was assured at Treorky that within a year or two there has been a good flow of water in the river; but what kind of water I did not care to ask. But, blame Nature as you like, you will generally find that what are called her deformities are due to man's own wilfulness or want of knowledge.

"The Vale of the Rhondda Vechan, which is now better known as Fenn-dale, presented a similar transformation to one who remembers it at the time of the first of the great explosions at what were then known as the Blaenllechau collieries. A curiously sequestered and picturesque valley, it could only be approached from the Aberdare side by a pony-ride, or a stiff walk from Cwmaman over moorland and morass. There was, of course, a mineral railway, but it could only be used by passengers by favour. It was a small community, as self-contained, and, to the best of my remembrance, as well ordered as those which sober English settlers are putting up in the American western plains, or under the shadow of the Canadian half of the Rocky Mountains. There was, probably, an inn, and of that I am not sure; but there was only one store which could supply to a tired and agonised enquirer on an memorable melancholy occasion nothing more than 'British wine' and a ginger cake. These people were remote; but they were not 'melancholy, slow.' They thought nothing of a twenty-mile walk to setting out for a Cymanfa, nor did the length of the walk deter them from attending a funeral away beyond a double range of mountains. Their amusements were chiefly of the domestic order, though some of the younger spirits would smuggle a few bottles of whiskey up from Porth, or over from Aberdare:—thus, singing contests, and 'pies' and provision had been made by the thoughtful proprietors for Sunday worship; but for the rest it was out of the world. I wonder whether it would be right to say that they were the happier for not being in it?"

Truly an "enormous development." The same writer, after describing the heaps of filth which cover the banks of the once beautiful Taff, speaks of the whole business as indicative of thriving prosperity. Such is the ingrained perversity and mental obliquity begotten of commercial instincts. The hideous "tips," mountains high, composed of rubbish from the mines and blast works, meet one on every hand. Where they abut on the residences of my lord Aberdare or other prigs they are planted over with shrubs to hide their ugliness; elsewhere they disfigure and block the landscape with their hideous deformity. If ever Macaulay's New Zealander should in future ages visit these scenes, he will wonder at the stupidity of people who manufactured mountains. Along the sides of the natural hills, where the narrow roads are lined with the wretched cottages inhabited by colliers and quarry men, heaps of cinders, rags, paper, bones, and a dead cat or two beautify nature's handiwork.

In Miskin and Mountain Ash typhoid fever is raging, and as one result of enquiries into the cause of this devastating epidemic, the authorities find that the people are living upon the barest necessities of life. No wonder they fall ready victims to the disease. In one case a miner was found who, after paying—at the master's office bear in mind—3s. for rent, and 1s. 3d. for coals, had but 2s. 6d. left for food for a family of four children and himself and wife. Food and rent is relatively as dear as in London.

And the wages for which these men risk their lives range from 15s.

to £1 and £1 4s. per week. The average is below £1. The better paid class of workmen manage to have cleanly homes, and will dress well on Sundays; but an accident—and they are common—a spell out of work, and all comfort disappears. The conspicuous failure of their members, including Abraham, M.P. ("Mabon"), to affect any beneficial alteration in the Mines Regulation Bill, and the general neglect and even hostility shown by the Parliamentary hacks to their claims, caused them to lend a ready ear to the preaching of non-Parliamentary Revolutionary Socialism, and the thirty-six millions royalties paid to those who never dug a shovelful of coals in their lives is also a powerful ally. The other allies are the Marquis of Bute, 116,000 acres, rental £231,931, without coal royalties; Windsor, 37,454 acres, £63,778 rental, quarry-owner; the robbery of about 30,000 acres of common lands in Glamorgan alone; and the helpless dependency of the population upon the greedy grasping capitalists.

S. MAINWARING and F. KITZ.

THE DANGEROUS CLASS.

WHICH is the dangerous class? This question is answered by each from his own standpoint. Every antagonism is dangerous to its opposite, and as society in its present anarchical state is one vast agglomeration of antagonisms, we all belong in this sense to a dangerous class. Nay, if we take the Individualist at his word, and reduce the classes to their component parts, we are all dangerous individuals, since under a competitive system every individual interest clashes with every other interest, and so becomes dangerous. Pure individualism, however, does not exist; man sees that he has interests in common with other men, hence the evolution of classes and class interests, finally to end, judging from present tendencies, in the elimination of all economic antagonisms and the growth of one homogeneous class—society.

But whence arises the term "dangerous class" as understood by the bourgeois society of to-day? In the depths of the middle-class mind there looms up a consciousness full of bodeful misgivings that its pre-eminence as a class rests upon a rotten foundation, viz., upon the negation of the class below; that is to say, the bourgeoisie owes its monopoly of knowledge, power, and wealth to the lack of these qualities in the proletariat, or as Victor Hugo tersely puts it, "the paradise of the rich is made from the hell of the poor;" but once let the workers know and feel this clearly, once let the many know how and why they starve while the few live in superabundant plenty, and the foundations of class supremacy will crumble into dust. Knowledge precedes power, and cannot co-exist with wage-slavery. Thus, to the mind of the bourgeoisie the workers so enlightened become a "dangerous class," and we see why certain ideas are labelled "dangerous."

But there is another and in a far more fatal sense dangerous class. Hitherto the barons, the bourgeoisie, and lastly, the proletariat, have each in turn been dangerous to the powers that be, only because they acted in obedience to that natural instinct which is the law of social growth, and which has everywhere and always burst all bonds of restraint in its struggle upward to larger liberty and wider knowledge. But what shall be said for the class which now arrogantly places itself and its pretensions athwart the stream of progress, and madly seeks to dam back the waters and stay their natural flow, until they accumulate and grow ever stronger and stronger in their pent up fury, finally to burst their banks and sweep away everything in their lawless, aimless rush? What shall be said about a class grown so wise in its self-conceit that it takes to making laws which contravene the laws of nature, and thinks it can enforce them by its horse-hair justice against the fiat of the eternal powers themselves?

How shall we name this class which by its sacred commercialism has brought the workers of the world to such a pass, that the more wealth they create the poorer they become, and which even then adds insult to injury by coolly telling us that the wage-workers are better off now than ever before, whilst thousands are dying by the torture of slow starvation?

What shall we think of a set of men of a governing class, with minds so warped and twisted that they invert the natural and moral order of things so far as to place expediency above justice, policy above principle, and idleness above industry?

Then, too, there is this wonderful commercial system of ours, this Moloch of the nineteenth century, with its competition, supply and demand, and production for profit, entailing as it does the degradation and misery of the masses, the robbery of the poor, and the consecration of fraud, all carried on under the guise of honesty and respectability at the behest and for the benefit of this same bourgeoisie, which worships in the name of the Nazareth carpenter whilst it prays for the perpetuation of such a system. Can we say that such a class is a safe repository of power and an enlightened user thereof? No; the bourgeoisie is the dangerous class. It is infinitely more dangerous to-day, and in quite another and more fatal sense, than when it carried the banner of political and social progress against the barons. Then it was giving expression to the evolution of the race at an important stage of its development. Now it is seeking to strangle a similar expression by another class. Then it was in the path of progress, now it is in the rut of retrogression. Then it was warring against a class only, now it is blindly combating the very necessity of things, and foolishly trying to turn the stars from their courses. Power so used becomes dangerous indeed—how dangerous let the fate of the old French regime testify

Clearly the time has come when the bourgeoisie must pass on the fiery cross of progress to other hands, which will carry it to the issue above referred to,—the abolition of all classes by the fusion of the whole mass into one humane and truly civilised Society. In the meantime the proletariat will continue to grow more and more dangerous to the bourgeoisie as it is reinforced by the spread of knowledge and the development of events, while the bourgeoisie will continue to grow more and more dangerous to itself and the whole world as it seeks to repress the natural process of evolution, and thus make itself another example of the axiom, "Whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad."

W. T. HORN.

"BE YOUR OWN MASTERS."

UNDER this heading the Flint Glass Makers' Magazine of May contains a most interesting article, signed "Cato," from which we extract the following:—

"Glass workers, like workers in every trade of the present day, suffer from the rapacity and voracious greed of employers, who pile up profits by any and every means, not the least of which is the enslavement of those under them, which, sooner or latter, produces starvation wages, want of employment, strikes, and all the evils attending them. The real makers of the wealth of a country are its millions of workers, and to them alone is due its wealth. Why are they robbed of their due? Because they have not believed in their own strength sufficiently, but have cringed, bowed, and not held themselves up as men in face of their employers—well called their "masters"—who still openly, or covertly, despise them for it. Glass makers know this to their cost. These same masters, as a rule, cannot take hand or part in the formation and bringing forth of the articles out of which they make their profits. The very thought of this should be enough to inspire workmen with confidence to conduct their own business, and reap the full benefit of their labours.

"The world's markets are open to the workmen who firmly and intelligently combine in their own interests, who say that they do not mean to go on for all time slaving for covetous, unfeeling, unimaginative, and ignorant masters, who absorb all the surplus profits of labour. What are the surplus profits? They represent fifteen shillings for the employer out of every pound sterling earned by the workers in the course of the year. If two hundred workers in a factory have among them a weekly wage of £300, the employer—taking one week with another all the year round—pockets £900 over and above this sum. His money, as a rule, comes in quarterly, and, at this rate, each quarter would bring him alone £10,800—the sum paid to the two hundred hands for the whole year's labour. Some manufacturers make more than this per head, some less. At the lowest calculation, according to official statistics, we find the annual income of this country is £1,250,000,000, of which sum the masses receive £450,000,000; therefore, the classes, composed of our lazy nobility, gentry, and snobs, take between them the small amount of £800,000,000.

"I say the world's markets are open to the makers of the produce sold in them. It is the prerogative of workmen acting in combination to out-do all masters in the quality of their work, and workmen alone can best govern its supply. What could masters do against such a combination? Nothing. The spirit of internationalism is enlarging every day, workmen of each country, despite the power of capital—which they created and foolishly allowed to be used against themselves—are now becoming aware of their value, and the necessity of combining for their common good."

The Executive of the Glass Makers' Society of Great Britain and Ireland strongly advises its members to consider the recommendations of "Cato," and in doing so pertinently asks:—

"What is the relationship at the present time between capital and labour? Nothing more than one continual heart burning—the employer ever seeking to reduce the producer lower in the social scale of modern civilization. It therefore remains for the producer, as it were, with a great moral revolution to throw off the cringing attitude he has assumed, and to stand out as a bold man, and declare his independence and his right to receive the profits of his labour in spite of the capitalistic civilization of the nineteenth century. Unless he does this he will be assuredly thrust lower down than he is at the present time. This is a great and noble work, and can be accomplished with ease if only the little word unity is observed. This mode of working is sure to come, and, in our opinion, is the only means of preserving the commerce of the world. Time and circumstances must be left to perfect the work, but we would advise our readers to think out the matter, and then act. Let a working man picture to himself how different his social life would be working for himself, instead of for one who has no sympathies in common with him.

"We do heartily advise our readers to work out this great problem. It must come, and, in these modern times, it will be the regeneration of the working class. Unless co-operation is accomplished, the capitalists will not cease to tyrannize until the producer is brought down to slavery. We ask our readers can it be said how many of the working class go down to a premature grave, simply for want of proper nourishment to keep up their strength, in order to carry out their labourious labour? Had they received the profits due upon their labour, there is not the slightest doubt but thousands would have been alive to-day; but they have had to succumb to the inevitable—a prey to the circumstances of the times. Time, however, has wound his way on, and the eyes of the working classes are now beginning to dawn on a new era. Laws have been made only to be broken when the rich and powerful did not like them. Coke, the great lawyer, in his Institutes, expressly declares that 'all usury is directly against the law of God, indeed it was not till the time of Henry VIII., and what Cobbett not unjustly calls the Protestant devastation, that we find the great scourge of usury sanctioned by Act of Parliament. By 37 Henry VIII., the rate of interest was fixed at 10 per cent., not more.' Here is a law which has not been repealed, yet it is broken hourly. But, if a working man breaks the law, it matters not how old the act may be, even to the reign of Edward III., it is brought against him."

That so important a society as the Flint Glass Makers should be considering the advisability of starting business on their own account, of working for themselves, shows that the efforts made by the Socialist League to permeate the workers with Socialist principles have not been in vain, but are bearing fruit in good earnest.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

A STRIKE AT GLASGOW SETTLED.—The strike amongst the harbour labourers at Glasgow has been settled, the stevedores having conceded the 7d. per hour demanded by the men.

STRIKE OF STEEL WORKERS.—The steel workers of the Monway works of the Patent Shaft and Axletree Company, Limited, Wednesbury, are on strike against a reduction of 10 per cent. in their wages. The men have issued a handbill appealing for help to enable them to resist this unjust reduction.

The smiths and hammermen employed at the well-known signal works of Messrs. Saxby and Farmer, at Kilburn, London, have struck work against a proposed reduction of 10 per cent. in their wages. The men are firm in their action.

THE CHAIN MAKERS' STRIKE.—Mr. Thomas Homer, the president of the Chain Makers' Association, to whose energy the success attending this agitation is due, was last week fined £5 and costs for alleged intimidation. At the same time two chain makers were fined £2 each. Notice of appeal was given.

SETTLEMENT OF THE DISPUTE IN THE PADLOCK TRADE.—The operatives at Messrs. Martin and Taylor's, padlock manufacturers, West Bromwich, have agreed to resume work, the notice of 10 per cent. reduction having been withdrawn. The prices previously paid remain as before, except in the common work, which is to be paid for at the same price as given by the Walsall employers, and to be made under the same conditions.

DEPRESSION IN THE LACE TRADE.—The continued depression in the lace trade at Long Eaton has rendered it necessary for many of the masters to close their establishments for a fortnight. The wakes commence on Sunday, after which it is hoped there will be a move. Such a condition of things as exists in Long Eaton has never before been experienced. Many of the hands have not done any work for three months.

THE DISPUTE AT BICKERSHAW COLLIERY.—The dispute between the colliers and the proprietors of the Bickershaw Colliery, Plank Lane, West-leigh, continues. The notice given by the men in the four foot mine to come out in support of those on strike has expired, but it has been deemed advisable to postpone the notice another week in the hope that an amicable settlement may be arrived at. From the second report issued by the strike committee it appears that the sum of £51 4s. 8d. has been contributed towards the support of those who are affected by the dispute.

THREATENED STRIKE IN THE WROUGHT IRON NAIL TRADE.—At a meeting of delegates in the wrought iron nail trade, held at Halesowen on Saturday, a deputation was appointed to wait upon all the nailmakers in the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire districts, calling upon them to pay far all nails at rates 10 per cent. less than the list framed in 1879, which means an advance on present prices. The deputation were instructed to inform the employers that unless they agreed to this the men would strike on the 10th of September. It was stated at the meeting that the wages had been reduced from 55 to 65 per cent. below the lowest price paid under the 1875 list.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—A meeting of delegates of the Northumberland miners was held at Newcastle on Thursday, Aug. 25, when, after considering the rules, it was decided that the stoppage, relief, and labour departments be amalgamated, and that there should be only one fund. The effect is that instead of men out of employ being paid 10s. a week, with 1s. a week for children under 12 years of age, they will be paid at the rate of 8s. per week, and nothing for children or rent. It was also decided with respect to Parliamentary representation that a vote should be taken throughout the county as to whether or not money should be paid out of the funds for political purposes.

THE DOCKYARD REDUCTIONS.—Notices were issued last Saturday for a further discharge of men from the boiler department of Sheerness Dockyard, making the second reduction within a month. An order was received from the Admiralty in the afternoon, directing a fortnight's notice to be given the men instead of the week's notice which has hitherto been the custom. Some of the men have served over twenty years under the Government, and will be granted a gratuity of a week's pay for every year of service.—About 300 more of the hired mechanics and labourers were discharged from the dockyard last Saturday. Those of the number who had been working for seven years and upwards received a gratuity of four week's pay.

LIMERICK—THE DOCK LABOURERS' STRIKE.—The dock labourers' strike against the use of steam winches in outputting coal still continues against the Clyde and the Limerick SS. Company. Their boats now bring on board each trip the number of hands for unloading, in addition to their permanent staff there. Last Saturday night one of these latter, a man named Shaughnessy, was attacked by a party of men, and stones were thrown at the windows of his house. The police dispersed the crowd and arrested two men named Naughton and McCarthy, who were taken before the magistrate and remanded.

THE WEAVERS' STRIKE.—The bulk of the weavers of Messrs. Owtram and Co.'s Castle-street and Manchester mills remain out on strike. The Manchester Mill shed is altogether stopped, but it is stated that a few of the Castle-street hands went to work on the 25th. Up to the present there is no indication of a settlement of the dispute. The whole of the weavers at Fir Trees shed, Higham, near Burnley, tendered a fortnight's notice on the 25th to cease work at the end of 14 days, through not being paid the Blackburn standard list of prices. The masters have given 14 days' notice to other persons employed in the mill. At a public meeting of Burnley weavers, held in the Literary Institute, it was decided to institute collections at the rate of a penny a loom for the maintenance of the weavers now on strike at Barnoldswick and Preston, against reductions in their wages. Mr. David Holmes, president of the Weavers' Amalgamated Association, said the committee were compelled to fight for an improvement in the prices at Preston, or have to meet a general reduction in the velvet trade.

SCOTTISH MINERS FEDERATION.—At a meeting held last week, Mr. R. Chisholm Robertson in the chair, Mr. J. Keir Hardie gave in the report of the deputation which had been in London in connection with the Mines Bill, and pointed out the amendments which had been carried. He believed that by another session, when they introduced an eight hour bill for Scotland, that it would meet with a widely different reception from that given to the amendment moved by Mr. Williamson, as there was not less than 150 members of the House prepared to vote for such a measure. Other business having been transacted, it was agreed that the Federation should be represented at the forthcoming Trades' Union Congress at Swansea. A motion expressing sympathy with the shale workers in their struggle and recommending their fellows to give them every possible support was also unanimously agreed to.

THE STRIKE AT THE LEE SPINNING COMPANY'S MILL.—The whole of the hands employed by this company, in consequence of the strike of cop winders, clearers, and reelers, ceased work on Friday night. On Tuesday the jenny spinners recommenced, and the following morning the manager sent round to the homes of the doublers asking them to begin work at noon. A number of them put in an appearance, and were requested to go on the clearing frames, but they declined and left the factory at two o'clock. The expedient of employing the scavengers as reelers and clearers was then tried, but did not answer satisfactorily. On Thursday morning the clearers and reelers had an interview with the manager, and after some discussion a compromise was effected. The clearers are to be reduced five per cent. on fine work, and have the old prices for coarse, and the reelers will also be reduced five per cent., but will have assistance in carrying up their bundles and sets down. Afterwards the cop-winders had an interview, and the dispute may now be regarded as settled, the men returning to work at the reduction.

The fifteenth week of the labour dispute in Bolton has terminated without further approach to a settlement. The joint committee of the men are very deliberate in their actions, and have not, as yet, taken decided action upon the Mayor's amended, or alternative, arbitration. A meeting of the joint committee was held on Aug. 28th, for the purpose of submitting to the men lately employed at the machine works of Mr. Richard Threlfall, Salop Street, an offer which had been made by the firm for the settlement of the strike. The offer was in effect that one shilling advance per week should be given to about one-third of the society men now out on strike. The firm had received a deputation from the joint committee, and the offer was reduced to writing. The deputation promised that in the consideration of the offer only the men affected at these particular works would be allowed to take part. The whole of the men—between 30 and 40 in number—were present at the meeting, and the settlement of the matter was left entirely in their hands, the members of the joint committee taking no part. After full discussion a vote was taken by ballot, which resulted in the unanimous rejection of the offer. Several cases of intimidation arising out of the strike have been before the magistrate, and sentence of a month's imprisonment passed in some cases. Importations of workmen continue, but many leave when the condition of affairs become known to them. The strike fund is well supported.

THE SHALE-MINERS' STRIKE. — PROPOSED DEMONSTRATION IN EDINBURGH.—The Edinburgh Trades' Council, at their meeting on Tuesday, August 23, had before them a letter from John Wilson, the Secretary of the Mid and West Lothian Miners' Association, asking whether the Council could see their way to give their assistance in organising a demonstration of the working-men of Edinburgh in support of the shale-miners on strike. The following is an extract:—"No greater struggle has been waged by workmen during the present century. Previous to the formation of their Association twelve months ago, the men were working from 10½ to 11½ hours in the mine. Through its action the hours were reduced to 9 hours from bank to bank. Against this change the companies have always rebelled. The men were enabled to appoint check weighmen, resist indirect partial reduction, and, through their meetings and the press, expose the conduct of the companies' officials. This has been gall and wormwood to them, and now, during the two and a half months of their slack season, they mean to destroy and root out, if possible, each and all of these changes and the organisation that gave them birth. Freedom of speech is a nonentity. The man who speaks in behalf of his fellow-workmen is indirectly edged out of their employment as soon as they can manage it. Besides the extinction of these rights, they mean to enforce a reduction of three shillings and fourpence in the £1, or about 17 per cent., in their wages. The men hitherto have struggled on without disorder of any kind, but one of the leading companies, the Broxburn Oil Company, are taking steps to evict them from their houses. It is their last resource. The men offered to accept half of the reduction. It was refused, and the men were coolly informed that it was the destruction of their combination that was the thing required. This struggle affects a national industry, and all the shale miners of Scotland, and the working-men of Edinburgh, by giving it publicity and material assistance, can and will confer a blessing upon mankind." Mr. Wilson stated that the men were not in the best condition. The money they had been able to raise among themselves and the public had been distributed amongst the most destitute cases. The condition of getting assistance was that it was required. A large portion of the men had been content to stand back, and give whatever assistance was going to their more needy fellows. The proposal was adopted unanimously, and a committee appointed. The intended evictions at Broxburn were strongly condemned, a member remarking that they required badly some Parnells or Healys in Scotland to prevent these taking place.

THE MIDLAND RAILWAY STRIKE.—In 1874 the directors of the Midland Railway conceded a six-days' wages guarantee to the goods guards, but they withdrew the concession in 1876 on the plea of "the interests of discipline." What has followed to the guards? Reductions in wages and increased hours of duty, equivalent in all to a 25 per cent. decrease of earnings, and the introduction of the abominated trip system. These facts leave little doubt as to the real objects for which the guarantee was cancelled. The guards struck work in 1876, and again in 1879, against the encroachments on their earnings; and those periods, curiously, mark the beginning of the continuous decline in the dividends of the company. In the 1879 strike the directors were apprehensive that the enginemmen would make common cause with the guards, whereupon Mr. S. Johnson was commissioned to solemnly promise the drivers that their agreement of 1867 should never be tampered with. How honourably has the promise been kept! . . . Let the truth be told, even though directors hide it. The Midland contemplate reducing the average cost of locomotive labour on their line to the same level as that of the London and North-Western Railway, and other competing railways; and the abolition of the six-days' wages guarantee is, as in the case of the guards, an absolutely necessary preliminary step to this end. Other railways have long egged the Midland on to this step, because the conditions enjoyed by the Midland enginemmen encouraged worse paid employes to demand a levelling up. Hence, it came about that several companies joined hands to assist the Midland over the recent strike difficulties, regarding the conflict, in fact, as partly their own. They have done more—taught all railway men that in labour disputes they will have to fight, not one, but all the companies.—EX-SECRETARY OF THE AMALGAMATED SOCIETY OF RAILWAY SERVANTS, in Pall Mall Gazette.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

The French "Republican" Government has expelled comrade Angel Diaz, a Spanish Socialist living at Dijon. The only reason for his expulsion was that he received Socialist papers from his country! Mind you, Angel Diaz doesn't know the French language! How dangerous he must have been to that "Republican" Government with Monarchical institutions!

We regret to announce that Valadier-Garreau, who acted as a government spy in the trial of the Lyons Anarchists, is still alive. The news of his having been drowned in the lake of Zurich has proved to be without foundation.

The Cri du Peuple has reproduced the article of comrades Bax and Morris in the Commonweal, last issue, referring to the confession of Lipski, and thoroughly agrees with its views.

GERMANY.

Week after week, and all over Germany, we have only to report of trials, imprisonment, and vexations of all kinds which Socialists have to endure there. We must really wonder at the magnanimity and patience of the German workers, and we are strongly of opinion that if such tyranny prevailed in other countries, Socialists certainly would have long ago made up their minds and appealed to more forcible means. Life in Germany under such miserable conditions seems no longer to be worth living, and it would not astonish us in the least if they became over night all Anarchists! Not only are the Socialists in every nook of the land thrown into prison, but inside the jails they are tortured to death. Breuder died in the House of Force (Zuchthaus) of Halle; Christupeit, after several years of ill-treatment, died a fortnight after his release; the brave Lichtensteiger, bodily one of the strongest men I ever saw, succumbed in the same way; another went mad after having undergone several corporal "punishments." Last week a new victim of the ferocious brutality of the prison warders, comrade Schuman, condemned to four years' hard labour, met his death at the Waldheimer prison. It is no longer the police who are everywhere in search of Socialists; the officers of the army have their share in watching their soldiers; the functionaries of the civil services are spies and detectives; and now even the rotten bourgeoisie, as in the case at Ludwigshaven, volunteer to render police services and denounce the Socialists to the so-called authorities!

The trial at Cassel ended with the condemnation of ten Socialists to several months of imprisonment.

The Volks Tribune, of Berlin, announces that from the 1st of October next it will appear three times a week.

BELGIUM.

Last week the Belgian government once more acted in its usual brutal manner, by ordering a massacre of poor helpless working-men at Ostend. A quarrel arose between English and Belgian fishermen, the former overloading the Ostend fish market with their produce, thus considerably lowering the prices of fish. The Belgian fishermen have to work very hard for mere starvation wages, and seeing that they could no longer maintain their wives and children, they decided to force their English competitors to go back from where they came and sell their fish in England. I will not say that the way in which they acted was a very fair one; but, on the other hand, it must be understood that their action was only the symptomatic effect of a terrible situation, the profound gravity of which can no longer be overlooked, and that the exasperation of the Ostend fishermen against their English competitors has a more serious and sadder cause than a mere trade-rivalry, to wit, misery, hunger, starvation! The Belgian government, certainly the most perfidious and miserable that has been in power since 1830, at once sent its soldiers on the spot in order to settle that question of hunger by means of powder and lead. Two poor fishermen were shot dead, five others have died since from their wounds, and several others are lying in the hospitals waiting to be relieved from their sufferings! How long shall this situation continue to exist?

AUSTRIA.

The Londoner Arbeiter-Zeitung, the journal of the Communist Club, Tottenham Street, has been prohibited here. This certainly will not matter much! The strike at Falkenau has come to an end, the workers having obtained weekly payment, as they wished, and the promise that no striker shall lose his work.

RUSSIA.

The Russian Government disposes of a yearly total sum of 1,800,000 roubles (£360,000), as stated by several papers last week, in order to buy the support of Western Europe. The papers who are in the pay of the Autocrat are divided into three categories: 1. Those who print all that is sent to them; these journals receive yearly 5,000 roubles and upwards, according to their importance. 2. Those who are only requested to speak in good terms of the autocratic government; this sort of scribblers are paid the total sum of 200,000 to 300,000 roubles a-year. 3. Those who insert from time to time an article sent in by the Russian diplomatic agent; such an article, according to its importance, is paid from 6,000 to 10,000 roubles. There are in Western Europe 89 papers in the pay of Russia: 16 in France, 4 in England, 28 in Germany, 20 in Austria, 18 in Italy, Hungary, Servia, Roumania, etc., 3 in Poland. Out of the total amount granted for that object, 900,000 roubles are still to be distributed. We are sure they will not remain "unproductive" for a long time: a bourgeois paper to be sold is a very common merchandise indeed!

D.

EJECTING COLLIERS ON STRIKE.—At the Linlithgow County Court, on Wednesday, the Broxburn Oil Company presented 121 petitions before Sheriff-substitute Melville for warrants to eject the total number of families from their houses in the vicinity of the company's shale mines at Broxburn. The dispute between the employers and the men, which has now lasted seven weeks, seems as far as ever from being settled, and the company, in order to clear the men out of the district and to make room for others, issued summonses against a number of men occupying the company's houses. Since the summonses were issued 30 of the men have cleared out, and are now located in the neighbourhood, some in temporary huts and others in tents, and others are being sheltered by their friends. Sheriff Melville granted the decrees of ejectment, with 10s. costs against each of the respondents who had not quitted their houses.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"HONOURS."

Several advertisements of Messrs. Sonnenschein having recently been issued in which the initials "M.A." are appended to my name, I should like to state, as I am not an M.A. nor can lay claim to any academical honours, that I am in no way responsible for the above ascription of such honours to myself. The occurrence is doubtless a pure accident, due to inadvertence on the part of the publishers or their agent.

REPORTS.

[Note.—Senders of Reports would greatly help if they would avoid unnecessary wordiness. Our space is limited.]

BLOOMSBURY.—The monthly general meeting of members was held on Thursday last, at which it was decided to start a new open-air station at Clarendon Square, Ossulton Street, Euston Road, on Monday evenings. The first meeting was held here on Monday last, and in spite of a slight rain a large crowd listened to comrades Dalziel and Bartlett. There was a large meeting at St. Pancras Arches on Sunday morning, addressed by Dalziel, Bartlett, and Porter. There is evidence that the persistent efforts of the Bloomsbury Branch have resulted in awakening the workers of the district to a sense of their position.—U.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, August 24, William Morris lectured on "The Policy of Abstention from Parliamentary Action." The hall was crowded, and a lively discussion followed. On Sunday, August 28, H. Samuels lectured on "Socialism and Parliamentary Action." Brisk debate followed. Commonweal and other literature has steady sale.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—Last Sunday we opened a new station at Warner Place; meeting addressed by Graham. There were about 300 present, and we distributed about 70 Commonweal.

HOXTON.—The usual outdoor meetings on Thursday evening at 8, and Sunday morning at 11 o'clock, were held opposite Hoxton church, several members of the branch attending and speaking. Good sale of Commonweal. On Sunday, in the hall, Thos. Shore, jun., lectured on "Land Nationalisation," followed by an interesting discussion.—C. J. Y.

KINGSLAND GREEN.—On Sunday morning, a good meeting was held here, addressed by John Allman and Turner.—J. F.

MILE END AND BETHNAL GREEN.—On Tuesday last, a good meeting was held on Mile End Waste, addressed by Davis and Brooks. On Sunday, J. Pope, Davis, and Lane spoke at usual meeting in Victoria Park. Some questions were asked and satisfactorily answered. Fair sale of Commonweal.—H. M.

MITCHAM.—We held good meetings last Sunday on Mitcham Fair Green in the morning and evening. We met with some opposition from the Salvation Army in the morning, but a resolution was carried by a large majority that we should strongly resist their attempt at our suppression. The meeting was addressed by Kitz and Wardle in the morning, in the evening by Kitz, Eden, Bull, and Wardle. Collected 1s. Commonweal sold out.—R. C.

STAMFORD HILL.—On Sunday, at 6.30, Flockton, Brooks, and Parker addressed a good meeting. Four names given in for branch.—J. F.

CLAY CROSS.—A good open-air meeting was held on Tuesday evening, August 23rd. Our comrade John Furniss spoke on "Socialism, and must we always remain Poor?" G. Smith was in the chair. A few words were also addressed by Turner and Unwin. Furniss urged the workers to unite against the common enemy, and not fight amongst themselves in isolated groups; showing what a much better life was open to us when we learn to form ourselves into a united brotherhood. He also spoke of the successful attempt that a few of them were making, in spite of the evil conditions, to live as Communists.—R. U.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday afternoon, Paterson and Downie addressed a good meeting at Cambuslang. Audience very sympathetic, and at the close of the speeches cheers for the social revolution given. Meetings will shortly be held with the view to the formation of a branch of the League. On Sunday forenoon, Glasier, Downie, and Paterson spoke on Jail Square, and in the afternoon Glasier, Bullock, and Paterson spoke at Paisley Road Toll. In the evening a large and enthusiastic audience assembled to hear Glasier, Bullock, and Paterson. Questions were invited, and an Orange missionary named Long (a friendly opponent of Mr. Bradlaugh's) entered the ring, and an exciting discussion was carried on for more than an hour. The immense audience was entirely with Glasier, and his clear exposition of the principles of Socialism was loudly applauded. Commonweal sold well at all the meetings, and 4s. 6d. collected for the Broxburn miners.—J. M. B.

IPSWICH.—On Sunday, Darley and Morley, of Norwich, spoke here. A wet morning interfered somewhat with our first meeting. We, however, did well. A fine afternoon made altogether a different affair of it, several hundreds listening to the speakers. Literature sold well. Three new members made.—J. R.

NORTH SHIELDS.—A meeting on the New Quay on Sunday morning, at 11, was addressed by Pease (of Newcastle) and John Comb (of Seghill Colliery), and they were very closely listened to by all present.—J. J.

NORWICH.—We had our comrade Sparling with us on Sunday. A good meeting was held in the Market-place, addressed by Sparling, who gave great satisfaction. Papers sold well. A good meeting was held on the Agricultural Hall Plain at 7. Sparling addressed a crowded meeting at the Gordon Hall at 8, on "The Old English Guilds," which pleased all present. Two comrades went to Ipswich and held two meetings with the comrades there. Collection was made for the Propaganda Fund.—T. M.

WEDNESBURY.—Sanders and Weaver, of Walsall Branch, addressed a large and animated meeting in the Market Place, on Thursday. There is great promise of success here.—J. M.

BILSTON.—Sanders opened up new ground at Bilston. He had to pay the market toll, 3d., and was attentively listened to by a very large crowd.

BIRCHILLS, WALSALL.—Sanders held a meeting for the first time at Birchills, on the outskirts of Walsall. Meeting very satisfactory.—J. T. D.

BIRMINGHAM.—Large meeting held on evening of August 28th by Donald at Council House, while Sanders and Weaver at same time addressed meeting at Bull Ring. Good sale of literature.—J. B.

DARLSTON.—Sanders addressed meeting on Saturday. We have been here once or twice before, always well received.

DUBLIN.—At the Labour League on Thursday, August 25, J. S. Hall lectured on the "Wrongs of the Working-classes and their Remedies," advocating most of the platform of the S.D.F. The views of the lecturer were opposed by Gabriel, Keegan, and Fitzpatrick, and supported by Killen and Karpel.

DUDLEY.—Our meeting here is thus reported in the Evening Express and Star for August 24:—"WALSALL SOCIALISTS AT DUDLEY.—Messrs. Sanders and Webb, agents of the Socialist League, from Walsall, commenced to address a meeting of working-men on Tuesday evening, in the Dudley Market-place. Police-sergeant Sansome ordered them to move on, the holding of such meetings being contrary to the regulations. Mr. Sanders defended his right to sell the League publications and speak in the Market-place, and offered to pay the customary toll if that was what was required. The toll collector, however, was not present, and the officer contented himself with taking Mr. Sander's name and address, for the purpose of reporting the matter to Mr. Chief-superintendent Burton. The meeting then proceeded, Mr. Sanders contending that he who came to speak to working-men about their rights and wrongs had an equal right to the use of the Market-place as Church and Salvation Armies, jugglers, and mountebanks. After offering for sale the Commonweal and other Socialistic publications, he delivered a few remarks on capital and labour, which were earnestly listened to by a large gathering."

GREAT BRIDGE.—Donald held usual meeting in Market-place; good crowd listened. Several of Mr. Bradlaugh's disciples were on the scene, one of whom was firmly convinced that Mr. Bradlaugh is a Land Nationaliser. Donald invited the man to write to the celebrated M.P. on the subject and bring the letter down to the next meeting.

NORWICH.—On Friday, good meeting held by Henderson at the gate of Colman's works, Carrow. Many of the great mustard monopolist's employes are already Socialists, while many others are "not far off from grace." A most attentive hearing was given; meeting is to be held weekly in future. Saturday evening, Henderson spoke in Haymarket. Rain somewhat spoiled Sunday morning's Market-place meeting, but in evening Henderson addressed a great gathering there. Commonweal sold out.

OLDBURY.—Deakin addressed meeting on Friday. The people are exceedingly poor, but were much interested in the address.—J. T. D.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—On Sunday, August 21st, we held an open-air meeting at 3 o'clock, John Furnace, J. Bullas, and Mrs. Usher were the speakers. On Monday evening, Bullas and Story addressed a large meeting at Bramhall Lane. A great many questions were asked and answered.—M. A. M.

TIPTON.—Large meeting addressed by Donald at Tipton, on Wednesday. This is the first Socialist meeting that has been held there. A little interruption from a Tory corn-dealer was quickly stopped on the crowd threatening to bonnet the offender.

WEST BROMWICH.—Donald opened up new ground at this town on Monday. Large meeting, and address attentively listened to.

WILLENHALL.—Donald addressed a meeting of lockmakers on Saturday afternoon near the Market-place.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—Saturday evening, Weaver and Donald held a meeting at the Prince Consort Statue. It was decidedly the best meeting that has been held in the district. The crowd was enormous. A number of objectors and interrupters attempted to break up the meeting, but the men very soon learnt these worthies how to behave. As Donald got off the chair a sergeant of police ordered him off. On Donald remonstrating the constable drew his baton, and was going to give every one a lesson, but a little firmness made the bully hold his hand. A serious riot might have occurred owing to the behaviour of this nuisance. The crowd told us to be sure and come back.

WOOLWICH.—Sunday evening, Burns, S.D.F., spoke at the Arsenal Gates to at least 700, on "Trades' Unionism," and completely carried his hearers with him. No opposition was offered, and at the close of the meeting we collected for the Bolton strike 11s. 4½d. Large quantity of literature sold.—R. B.

YARMOUTH.—Best meeting yet held at Yarmouth addressed by Henderson on Quay, Thursday last. Commonweal sale good.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

Galashiels.—Meeting held on Tuesday, 23rd, very large and attentive. Branch being organised here.

Cowdenbrath.—On Friday a meeting was held at the Old Toll House. In spite of the rain the audience listened with great attention. Six new members enrolled, and a good number of Commonweal sold. This branch is doing well. The miners take considerable interest in the business, and are eager to hear Socialist speakers.

Dysart and Dumfermline.—Meetings postponed.

Lochie.—First meeting held here was addressed by Mahon and Gilray, of Edinburgh. The audience, though not large, was very attentive. Literature sold well. Several names taken for a branch, and arrangements for another meeting made.

Dundee.—Mahon's second visit to this town resulted in a very large increase of members, the holding of a series of most successful meetings, and a good impetus to the movement generally. On Saturday night a good meeting was held, and an address delivered in front of the Bank. On Sunday three lectures at different places were given on "Objections to Socialism refuted," "The Irish Question, economical and political," and "The Means of Realising the Results of Socialism." Plenty of questions and discussion, and good sale of literature. All Socialists in Dundee are requested to send their names and addresses to A. Simpson, 10, Ford-lane.

Edinburgh.—Sunday afternoon Smith and Tuke spoke in the Grassmarket. It was made evident that we are making some impression on the people there, by our old ground being occupied by six or seven gospel temperance speakers, who were loudly denouncing the Socialists. Smith ably explained the true cause poverty, viz., robbery, and not drunkenness. The same two speakers spoke in the Queen's Park in the evening to an audience numbering about 500. A good collection was made at the close of the meeting.

THE BLOOMSBURY BRANCH of the Socialist League desires to appeal to readers of the Commonweal for help for the wife and family of comrade English, who has recently died. English was one of the originators of the Bloomsbury Branch, and for many years was an ardent and energetic worker for the Cause. After a long and painful illness he at last succumbed, leaving his family destitute. Contributions will be gladly received and acknowledged by the secretary of the Branch at the Communist Club, 49 Tottenham St., W., or by comrade Lessner.

NOTES ON NEWS.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT is very anxious to extinguish all chances of open war between England and America. To many people it seems strange that he is not equally anxious to put an end to the war which has been so long going on between England and Ireland; or rather that the only way in which he would allow it to be done would be by crushing Ireland into sullen subjection to her slavery. This is strange to many, but not to Socialists, who understand that Mr. Bright's Internationalism is, and always has been, a very one-sided matter, as one-sided as his love of peace. The Internationalism of bourgeois interests is what he is enthusiastic for, and in that cause he would try to join all the nations in the world, ignoring the fact that each nation is composed of two other nations, the nation of the poor and the nation of the rich; and the peace that he would have between these two nations is just that which he would have England give to Ireland—the peace which the master is always willing to give to his submissive slave. Mr. John Bright is a thoroughly consistent person.

The miserable optimistic twaddle of Mr. Gladstone's Jubilee speech (what, another of them?), which would have disgraced a Sunday-school teacher, is sickening enough to read for those even who have thought of the condition of the workers without the knowledge that it is caused just as much and as little by "the infliction of the Providence of God" as the corn-laws; even when they don't know that the "follies of men" which produced the window-tax or the corn-laws, are just as much responsible for the "unemployed" of our present winters (of our summers, too, if well to-do people only knew it); even to such people there seems little occasion for an optimistic hymn.

Not much of a triumph for fifty years of reform are the results of all the progress told of to his henchmen by this Conservative gentleman who has been too busy with politics to follow the struggle between capital and labour which has been going on all the time. The time remembered and contrasted with our times by the model contented old workman that he spoke of, was of the darkest days which the workmen of this country have ever known; the country had just passed through a frightful war; the robber class had begun to use the new and terrible instruments of robbery, which had recently been invented, with the utmost recklessness, and without the checks which the governing classes were terrified into applying to them afterwards; and as a consequence of the unchecked competition which Mr. Gladstone regards as "providential" and opposes to "the follies of man," the whole working-class was miserable, starving, and rebellious.

Such a state of things could not last; it must either have come to a break-up or some improvement, and the improvement came through the conquering of the world-market by Great Britain, which produced such a prodigious amount of wealth for the country in general, that even the workers profited by it and became "contented"; since the contrast between their present and the immediate past was really considerable, and their past misery so great, that they felt the same kind of happiness which the tortured man does when he is allowed some little rest. Breathing-time was thus gained for the two combatants, Capital and Labour, and the proprietary classes on their side began to see the necessity of palliation if the game were to last, and hence all those reforms of which Mr. Gladstone boasts.

But these reforms were not the cause of the "prosperity" of the last forty years, but the prosperity was the cause of the legislation. The governing classes were frightened at first, careless afterwards since they were so rich. Like the pirates in Defoe, who had fought like devils when they were poor, they did not care to show fight when they had such a glorious cargo aboard.

Thus we came to the period of the advance of wealth "by leaps and bounds," which made Mr. Gladstone so joyous a little time ago; and the question one would think even for a politician to study is not so much whence we have come, as where we are now, and whither we are going. Would not the story of the last seven years furnish Mr. Gladstone with some thoughts on that point? It needs no man risen from the dead, and no half-dead old man to teach him something if he will contrast his "leaps and bounds" year with this present Jubilee year and its blessings.

At any rate, very little consideration will teach him that the nation (of the rich) came out unscathed from the disorder of the first years of the great machine-industry revolution, because of the expansion of its profitable trade, which was then so huge that most people could see no end to it. They can now both see and feel the end to it. That ally to the exploitation of labour by the capitalists is dead. Prosperity can indeed be regained, and go on once more by leaps and bounds; but only on terms which Mr. Gladstone has not even thought of, viz., that the workers should employ themselves, or in other words, form a new society in which monopoly would be not a crime but an impossibility.

What does Mr. Gladstone, and the middle classes which he leads, think of the "propriety" which forces people to accept the position of tramcar drivers and conductors, or servants in their yards under such conditions of slavery, and such insulting and degrading regulations that one would think that nobody but those in the very last stage of destitution would accept such an occupation? And yet we are told that free citizens of our free and improved country crowd into it, partly because it is a respectable occupation! Still more respectable, and as complete in slavery and insult, is the position of assistant in the establishment of the Universal Provider; and for this position it is necessary to share the blessings of education, and, in fact, to belong in some sense to that triumphant middle class which has improved the world into its present condition. Isn't it worth while for that class itself to look about it, and notice that it too is making a new proletariat out of itself, which at its worst degradation is worse than the fringe of labour deduced from the artisan and labouring class.

W. M.

The "Incorporated Society of Mean Men," of which Mark Twain once wrote, has apparently taken up its abode in England. Mr. Halley Stewart, M.P., speaking recently in Hunts, was reported to have said he had seen at one time 415 boys, girls, and women passing the night in Trafalgar-square without even a sack to hide their nakedness. This statement having become known in his own division, an empty common sack was subscribed for by some of his constituents, and forwarded by Parcels Post to the House of Commons. On the reverse side of the address was a printed extract from the speech in question by Mr. Stewart, and on the address side was the following: "A penny subscription sack from some of his constituents to hide the nakedness of Trafalgar-square"

The small-souled, sneaking curs who can find "fun" in deriding the poverty and distress of the unhappy waifs whom no roof may cover but the sky, are indescribable from lack of language that will convey their despicable character. They are of the type that, well fed and cared for, gloat over the misery of others for amusement and take delight in torture; who trip up blind cripples and broil cats alive.

"Why are ninety-nine out of a hundred people to be annoyed and inconvenienced in order that the infinitesimal residuum may lie snug in the pride of exclusiveness and to the glory of feudality?"

The above question closes a leading article in the Daily Telegraph of Aug. 31. It is only asked about the gates and barriers that close certain London streets. Of course we can answer it, push it further, and answer it again; but we advise our "esteemed contemporary" not to do so if it would retain the circulation it boasts of. Truth-speaking is perilous. A successful "organ of public opinion" gets on by suppressing half the truth and diluting the other, with an imaginative embellishment to finish off with.

We are confident that our advice will be taken!

In the Pall Mall of the 2nd inst. was recorded one of the most awful cases of utter misery it has ever been my lot to read of. The sickening details were enough, one would fancy, to shake the most thoughtless from their apathy. On the same day were recorded brilliant receptions and the "heavy bags" of wealthy sportsmen. Yet, with the two extremes of our miserable "society" thus given saliently before their eyes, there are men who placidly ignore the evil, and speak of the "mad restlessness" of those who seek a remedy.

Can it be marvelled at, then, if haply some of them, so speaking, be writ down dishonest or heartless? From the recreant Iconoclast to the hereditary image-keeper there is not one who may not be honest in his belief that monopoly and competition are the twin pillars that sustain the world: but it is no time in the heat of battle, in the very face of danger, with the dying round us in their agony, to weigh motives finely, and discriminate between the ignorant and vicious.

All those against us are against us; to none of average intellect is the way to knowledge closed, and they dare not plead ignorance. There are men who hearing will not hear, and seeing will not see; are we asked for "mercy" to these men? It is not our business to go out of our way to attack them; but if they place themselves in our path they must know what they are to look for.

Upon our side it is not the mere opinions of men that rule, but the irrefutable facts of nature. Each of us in his place fulfilling these laws in fighting for the progress of mankind, if on any plea he falter or swerve aside he is a traitor to humanity and false to himself. He must go forward, and that against all resistance and over all obstacles; not least over the "convictions," real or feigned, of the apostles of plunder and legalised rapine. S.

"Oh, the happy time, my brethren," says the corner preacher, with upturned eye-balls and clasped hands, "when we shall all meet up above"—this last in a deep bass. But don't get into the same 'bus or compartment of railway carriage down here below if you happen to be dressed in working garb. Defer the meeting until you get "up above." It's first, second, and third class down here, as the case of Hunt v. Glover has recently shown. It's quite enough for third class to have the pleasure of working to keep first and second, without disturbing the equanimity of Christians like the two "gentlemen" witnesses for the 'bus conductor by rubbing up against them. Wait till we all meet up above, dear brethren, and twang the eternal harp; but keep your distance down here, or we'll call the guard.

"It is not too much to say that if the poor would eat horse or donkey enormous social dangers that now seem inevitable would disappear." Thus writes the Standard, in commenting upon the "great and happy news" to the persons who belong to the class to whom the matter is so vitally interesting, viz., that cat's meat is being foisted upon the poor at the price of butcher's meat. Thus at one side we have a school of vegetarians, whose hopes of saving society are based upon the hope of persuading working folk to subsist on horse beans and the outside leaves of cabbages; and on the other we find the organ that represents the class who guzzle and gorge what their hands never earned, advising us to make our insides receptacles for diseased jackasses, in order that their wine-bibbing and feasting shall continue undisturbed. FEUDAL ENGLAND.

THE complete feudalism of the fourteenth century fell, as systems always fall, by its own corruption, by development of the seeds of change, some which indeed had lain asleep during centuries, to wake up into activity long after the events which had created them were forgotten.

The feudal system was naturally one of open war; and the alliances, marriages, and other dealings family with family, made by the kings and potentates, were always leading them into war by giving them legal claims, or at least claims that could be legally pleaded, to the domains of other lords, who took advantage of their being on the spot, of their strength in men or money, or their popularity with the baronage, to give immediate effect to their claims. Such a war was that by which Edward I. drew on England the enmity of the Scotch; and such again was the great war which Edward III. entered into with France. You must not suppose that there was anything in this war of a national, far less of a race character. The last series of wars before this time I am now speaking of in which race feeling counted for much was the Crusades. This French war, I say, was neither national, racial, or tribal; it was the private business of a lord of the manor claiming what he considered his legal rights of another lord who had, as he thought, usurped them; and this claim his loyal feudatories were bound to take up for him; loyalty to a feudal superior, not patriotism to a country, was the virtue which Edward III.'s soldiers had to offer if they had any call to be virtuous in that respect. This war once started was hard to drop, partly because of the success that Edward had, falling as he did on France with the force of a country so much more homogeneous than it; and no doubt it was a war very disastrous to both countries, and so may be reckoned as amongst the causes which broke up the feudal system. But the real causes lay much deeper than that. The system was not capable of expansion in production; it was, in fact, as long as its integrity remained untouched, an army fed by slaves, who could not be properly and closely exploited; its free men proper might do something else in their leisure, and so produce art and literature, but their true business as members of a conquering tribe, their concerted business, was to fight. There was, indeed, a fringe of people between the serf and the free noble who produced the matters of handicraft which were needed for the latter, but deliberately, and as we should now think, wastefully; and as these craftsmen and traders began to grow into importance and to push themselves, as they could not help doing, into the feudal hierarchy, as they acquired status, so the sickness of the feudal system increased on it, and the shadow of the coming commercialism fell upon it. That any set of people who could claim to be other than the property of free men should not have definite rights differentiated sharply from those of other groups, was an idea that did not occur to the Middle Ages; therefore, as soon as men came into existence that were not serfs and were not nobles, they had to struggle for status by organising themselves into associations that should come to be acknowledged members of the great feudal hierarchy; for indefinite and negative freedom was not allowed to any person in those days; if you had not status you did not exist except as an outlaw. This is, briefly speaking, the motive power of necessity that lay behind the struggle of the town corporations and craft guilds to be free, a struggle which, though it was to result in the breaking up of the mediæval hierarchy, began by an appearance of strengthening it by adding to its members, increasing its power of production, and so making it more stable. About this struggle, and the kind of life which accompanied it, I may have to write another time, and so will not say more about it here. Except this, that it was much furthered by the change that gradually took place between the landlords and the class on whom all society rested, the serfs. These at first were men who had no more rights than chattel-slaves had, except that mostly, as part of the stock of the manor, they could not be sold off it; they had to do all the work of the manor, and to earn their own livelihood off it as they best could. But as the power of production increased, owing to better methods of working, and as the country got to be more settled, their task-work became easier of performance and their own land more productive to them; and that tendency to the definition and differentiation of rights, moreover, was at work for their benefit, and the custom of the manor defined what their services were, and they began to acquire rights. From that time they ceased to be pure serfs, and began to tend towards becoming tenants, at first paying purely and simply service for their holdings, but gradually commuting that service for fines and money payment—for rent, in short.

Towards the close of the fourteenth century, after the country had been depopulated by the Black Death, and impoverished by the long war, the feudal lords of these copyholders and tenants began to regret the slackness with which their predecessors had exploited their property, the serfs, and to consider that under the new commercial light which had begun to dawn upon them they could do it much better if they only had their property a little more in hand; but it was too late, for their property had acquired rights, and therewithal had got strange visions into their heads of a time much better than that in which they lived, when even those rights should be supplanted by a condition of things in which the assertion of rights for any one set of men should no longer be needed, since all men should be free to enjoy the fruits of their own labour. Of that came the great episode of the Peasants' War, led by men like Wat Tyler, Jack Straw, and John Ball, who indeed, with those they led, suffered for daring to be before their time, for the revolt was put down with cruelty worthy of an Irish landlord or a sweating capitalist of the present day; but, nevertheless, serfdom came to an end in England, if not because of the revolt, yet because of the events that made it, and thereby a death-wound was inflicted on the feudal system. From that time onward the country, passing through the various troubles of a new French war of Henry Vth's time, and the War of the Roses, did not heed these faction fights much. The workmen grew in prosperity, but also they began to rise into a new class, and form a class underneath the old working men, and to lay the foundations of capitalistic production. England got carried into the rising current of commercialism, and the rich men and landlords to turn their attention to the production of profit instead of the production of livelihood; the gildless journeyman and the landless labourer slowly came into existence; the landlord got rid of his tenants all he could, turned tillage into pasture, and sweated the pastures to death in his eagerness for wool, which for him meant money and the breeding of money; till at last the place of the serf, which had stood empty, as it were, during a certain transition period, during which the non-capitalistic production was expanding up to its utmost limit, was filled by the proletarian working for the service of a master in a new fashion, a fashion which exploited and (woe worth the while!) exploits him very much more completely than the customs of the manor of the feudal period. I hope to be able hereafter to go into the question of the life and production of the workman of the earlier period. At present I will make an end by saying that the feudal serf worked hard, and lived poorly, and produced a rough livelihood for his master; whereas the modern workman, working harder still, and living little if any better than the serf, produces for his master a state of luxury of which the old lord of the manor never dreamed. The workman's powers of production are multiplied a thousand-fold; his own livelihood remains pretty much where it was. The balance goes to his master and the crowd of useless, draggle-tailed knaves and fools who pander to his idiotic sham desires, and who, under the pretentious title of the intellectual part of the middle classes, have in their turn taken the place of the mediæval jester. Truly, if the Positivist motto, "Live for others," be taken in stark literality, the modern workman should be a good and wise man, since he has no chance of living for himself! And yet, I wish he were wiser still; wise enough to make an end of the preaching of "Live on others," which is the motto set forth by commercialism to her favoured children.

Yet in one thing the modern proletarian has an advantage over the mediæval serf, and that advantage is a world in itself. Many a century lay between the serf and successful revolt, and though he tried it many a time and never lost heart, yet the coming change which his martyrdom helped on was not to be for him yet, but for the new masters of his successors. With us it is different. A few years of wearisome struggle against apathy and ignorance; a year or two of growing hope—and then who knows? Perhaps a few months, or perhaps a few days of the open struggle with brute force, with the mask off its face, and the sword in its hand, and then we are over the bar. Who knows, I say? Yet this we know, that ahead of us, with nothing betwixt except such incidents as are necessary to its development, lies the inevitable social revolution, which will bring about the end of mastery and the triumph of fellowship.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

ARTIST AND ARTISAN.

AS A WORKMAN SEES IT.

To be a labourer, and to earn by dint of bodily or mental exertion that subsistence which predominating capitalism at present condemns the worker to receive, is considered by our snobbish plutocratic society of to-day to be something very contemptible and vulgar. But, on the other hand, the man who is an artist—that is to say, the man who obtains very often a very comfortable living by deft skill of hand and grandeur of conception, is looked upon by the idlers of society as an extraordinary being, and received everywhere with adulation and respect. This opinion unfortunately is shared by many working men. They look up to the artist with something more than the veneration which is due to them as individuals who certainly do a good deal towards making life more beautiful and happy. In short, while the artisan is despised as an unthinking drudge—as one of the common toiling millions—the artist is regarded as a darling of society and a great man. Let us devote a short time in endeavouring to discover who is the most necessary, the most useful and essential to the well-being of society. We will assume to elucidate this point, a man placed upon an uninhabited island, totally devoid of both the necessities and luxuries of life. Suppose such a man approached by a person who offers upon the one hand a number of priceless artistic treasures: statues by Canova, Michael Angelo; paintings by Rembrandt, Rubens, and Vandyck; or poems by Byron and Shelley, and on the other hand offers a loaf of bread, a homely garment, a spade, etc., some of the simple products of the toil of the ordinary artisan, and see which he will choose. A man so circumstanced would at once turn to the latter. Why so? Because they are the primary necessities of existence, and without them he cannot live. It will at once be seen, therefore, that the artisan is of much more service to the community in which he dwells, inasmuch as he provides the necessities of life; whereas the artist is simply of secondary importance, he simply producing articles of luxury.

Without labour men could not live. Without art life would be possible, although I confess that life without any of that pleasure and delight which is caused by artistic effort would be very unpleasant, and in fact almost unbearable. The artisan makes life possible; the artist makes it enjoyable. Hence I contend on these grounds that the artisan should be regarded with the same amount of honour as the artist; for while the artisan makes things, the artist beautifies them. Both being equally useful to society both should be socially equal. Until this conclusion is arrived at, and as long as men will despise the labourer and the products of his labour, meanwhile worshipping the artist and art, the achievement of a state of social equality—that great object which all Socialists are endeavouring to obtain will remain unaccomplished.

JIM ALLMAN.

AS AN ARTIST SEES IT.

I have nothing to object to in our comrade's remarks, but a word or two may be pardoned in explanation of the fact that an artist is looked upon as a gentleman (a sort of one), and sometimes receives a certain portion of the respect accorded to that class, which, however, is dealt out so much more liberally to the mere money-maker in other trades; to the landowner, manufacturer, contractor, stockjobber, or what not; in short, it is dealt out to members of the proprietary class exactly in proportion to the obviousness of their living by owning wealth and not creating it. In other words the less pretence they make to be more than mere thieves, the more they are honoured.

However, let that pass, as it must be admitted that the artists when they gain the point at which they receive any recognition from the public at all, do as hangers-on share in the plunder won by the class to which, if our workmen friends knew it, they are admitted somewhat grudgingly. Now, it must be admitted by all thoughtful people that the conventional flattery of the intellect, which is conventionally supposed as a separate and specially worshipful quality, to be the main-spring of the artist's capacity, is both stupid and harmful. But, like all the rest of our conventionalities, it is founded on history; it is a birth of the individualist commercial system which we are at work combatting to-day, with good hope of seeing it disappear. It is that system which has divided the old craftsman into two, artist and artisan. For, before the rise of capitalism in the sixteenth century, the artisan did not differ in kind from the artist; all craftsmen who made anything were artists of some kind, they only differed in degree, and only a few of those who had very special gifts of hand and brain have so much as left their names behind them. No one knows, e.g., the name of the man who designed Westminster Abbey, although it rose up amongst the King's Court, and doubtless was talked about enough in its time; and meantime every joiner or mason or blacksmith was doing his share of work towards the pleasure which our comrade feels is necessary to the life of man, and never dreaming of receiving any special reward for the beauty or invention in his work; although doubtless he did receive the unconventional and genuine praise and thanks of his neighbours for it, just as he gave it to his neighbour craftsmen. With the growth of the historic sense which is a gain of the present century, with the knowledge of the continuity of history which we have now learned, we have come to a conscious knowledge that the intellect of man works co-operatively and collectively; but although the workmen of the Middle Ages were not conscious of this fact, they were happier than we are in this respect, that they practised that co-operation in their production of beauty; whereas we, as long as we are under the domination of the profit-grinders, cannot do so; and the result follows which I have so often spoken of, that art is a skinny drowsy skeleton amidst the stir and enormous riches of modern civilisation; and that too in an age, which as I have just said, has discovered that it was the collective people, and not a few miraculous individuals who have produced all worthy, that is all genuine, art in the past. I say when art is hopeful and progressive there is plenty of it for every one, and every one is in some sense an artist, and those who produce beauty are not demi-gods but men, and all can understand them; it is only when beauty produced by man becomes rare that we take to deifying its producers. There is little that is mysterious about the plagiarists and compilers of the Augustan age of Rome; the authors of that mass of platitudinous rubbish, that fresh flowing well-spring of stupidity, are well known and amply ticketed. But modern research has made Homer a dim and doubtful shadow to us, while it has added clearness to our vision of the life of the people of that time, who were the real authors of the Homeric poems. Beowulf, the first and the best poem of the English race, which they bore hither across the seas with them, has no author but the people. No other authors has the splendid literature of our Scandinavian kinsmen, the best tale-tellers the world has seen, through whom we can to-day live with the people of Northern Europe in the tenth century, and know them, not as puppets of chivalry romance, but good fellows such as our living friends are to-day. Again, along with William Cobbett, contrast the dungeon-like propriety of St. Paul's, the work of a "famous" architect, with the free imagination and delicate beauty of the people-built Gothic churches, that were raised by masons who had no architect over them, and who did their work for the reward of a free life, and needed no fame as an extra; and then consider how the people build. In short, our comrade will understand me when I say that what we want is to extinguish not the artist, but the mere artisan, by destroying the flattery-craving flunkey in the one, and the brutal toil-worn slave in the other, so that they may both be men; in which case they must be artists in one way or other, that is, they must take an interest in life.

Meanwhile, I cannot see that any extra reward should be given to a man for following an "intellectual" calling. If he does his work in it well, it is more pleasurable to him than a "non-intellectual" one, and why should he be paid twice over? If he does it ill, let him be pulled out of it in the gentlest way possible, and learn to do what he can do. A poet doesn't need paying for his poetry (he is not paid much now), because he will write better poetry and not worse if he has an ordinary occupation to follow. As for the other mere artists, a painter for instance, I admit that he will probably have to stick to his painting if he has to do it well; but then he should be paid not for the "intellectual" part of his work, but for the workman's part of it; finishing up everything properly, doing everything as well as it can be done in all respects. This will take something out of him. But the exercise of his "intellect" will take nothing; it is mere play.

The long and short of it is this, a decent life, a share in the common life of all is the only "reward" that any man can honestly take for his work, whatever it is; if he asks for more, that means that he intends to play the master over somebody. When the workers have made up their minds to be free, he won't get that, so he may make himself easy, and get amusement out of his work as he can, if he is a "superior person." Well, I end as our comrade, with the word "equality," which will one day become a real thing and no mere word, and so cure all our troubles.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

The following advertisement appeared in a London daily this week:

ENGINEERS' Tool Makers (thoroughly first-class experienced) wanted; only those need apply who can bring satisfactory references from former employment, where they have worked for a number of years as tool-makers; all such references will be most strictly inquired into before any man is started. All applicants must be sober, good timekeepers, thoroughly respectable, and able to work any kind of lathe or machine usually found in an engineer's factory; their work will have to stand the test of quantity as well as quality; a week will not be allowed for an hour's job. Handy-men, engine-drivers, very old or very young men, don't apply; the Company, desiring to engage only the very best of men, will in return pay the very best of wages. Apply between 9 and 12 to the Managing Director, etc.

We refrain from giving the firm to which the pure-souled perfect applicants must address themselves; there must already have been such a crowd anxious to enrol themselves under such a brilliant banner! But we should like to learn what "the very best of wages" are that the Admirable Crichtons earn; what hours they have to work; and how they like it! After all, is not this nauseous rubbish only an adroit puff for "the Company" itself?—S.

“IS THE MINERS’ UNION A FAILURE?”

UNDER this heading, in the Daily Telegraph of September 2nd, an extraordinary composition appears, bearing the signatures of six persons, presumably miners, resident in Barnsley, Yorkshire. The document opens with the statement that the views expressed by its signatories are shared by "tens of thousands" of persons employed on the Yorkshire coal-fields. If this be so, the miners of Yorkshire are marvellously dense and shortsighted.

The first paragraph of this remarkable and unique production is devoted to an exposition of the terribly hard life led by the miners; the perilous nature of their work, and the miserable fate that awaits them should any of them by chance live beyond the average miner's life. This is followed up by a rail over the almost insolvent state of the various pit-clubs, and a charge against the leaders of the Union of being responsible for the present condition of the miners. These are charged with having "ruinously invested the Union's funds," of counselling "impotent and useless strikes," "plunging madly into politics," and of sending a man to Parliament (Benjamin Pickard) "who would have been better at home."

However, all these evils are to be put an end to by the formation of "a Union which shall avoid strikes, secure a fair wage by amicable means, give confidence to capital, bring about good relations between themselves (the miners) and their employers, and establish a scheme in concert with employers by which they shall be provided for in sickness and old age, especially the latter." This proposition is worthy the peaceful mind of Mr. Auberon Herbert.

It is scarcely credible that a body of men who have engaged in so many hard-fought battles against capitalism have not yet discovered that it and they are enemies, and that their reconciliation is impossible. The recent strikes in Northumberland and Lanarkshire, and the almost never-ending struggle of the Cradley Heath chainmakers, are convincing proof enough, one would think, of the impossibility of securing even a fair wage by amicable means. The truth is Capital and Labour must war with each other until the former has ceased to be a monopoly. The craven-hearted, cap-in-hand-to-master policy will secure the workers nothing, except the prolongation of their slavery. Giving confidence to capital means securing its holders the power to fearlessly tax labour. The idea of intelligent men "earnestly appealing to coal-owners and colliery proprietors" to form a small committee for the purpose of doing this, and assuring them that "happy results" will ensue, and that they "will have done a service in the promotion of social peace and goodwill," of "the reconciliation of Labour and Capital, and the happiness and comfort of their workpeople, that will ever be most gratefully remembered" !

Oh! what snivelling imbecility! If the "Miners' Union" consists of men who think in this way, no wonder if it is a "miserable failure." But, after all, the whole thing may be only a dodge on the part of our old friend the capitalist, who, having managed to cajole a few simple men into signing their names to an artfully prepared document, has foisted it upon the public as the opinion of the heretofore sturdy miners of Yorkshire.

It is hard indeed to believe that they have thrown up the sponge, have become faint-hearted because of the failure of a few isolated strikes, and have become traitors to the cause of Labour and arrayed themselves on the side of its enemy.

From what we know of them we prefer to believe that they are at the present time engaged in uniting their scattered forces into one great Labour Federation, and that they recognise this to be the necessary preliminary to their complete emancipation from the bondage of capitalism.

Although the capitalist, being the owner of the means of subsistence, can starve the workers into submission, thereby foredooming almost every sectional and isolated strike to failure, the revolts against monopoly have taught the workers that their salvation depends on their general combination. If, instead of 600,000 loosely organised trades' unionists, the whole industrial army, or even nine-tenths of it, was welded together into one compact body, it could at will completely paralyse the power of the whole capitalist system. There would be no need for the workers to wave the flag of truce, to sue for peace, as they are being advised to do by the authors of the manifesto we are criticising; that miserable rag would soon be hoisted from their enemies' camp.

Then let him who loves liberty labour for this glorious consummation with fearless heart, and in the near future he will stand, not a slave, but lord of himself—a free man. H. A. BARKER.

H. A. BARKER.

THE CURSE OF CIVILISATION.

It is or was a favourite practice of the historical school of Buckle, Spencer, etc., to dwell upon the fact that the attention and speculation of primitive man is more occupied with exceptional than with ordinary phenomena—with comets, meteors and eclipses, rather than with the facts and sequences of everyday Nature. Many a generation has passed since this has ceased to apply to progressive man. He is now perfectly alive to the saliency of the common phenomena and operations of Nature (in its narrower sense) and to the comparative unimportance of those exceptional events which so much excited the terror and wonder of his remote ancestor. But in spite of this change of mental attitude as regards inorganic nature, there is one department of phenomena, that of social life and history, in which the old attitude is unconsciously maintained. It seems to have entirely escaped the notice of students that the current view of history—strange to say, even of modern social life—when we reflect upon it and formulate our reflections, is based mainly on the exceptions of life—battles, murder and pestilence—and that the rule—the everyday routine—is, for the most part, left entirely out of the account. This, conjoined with the still widespread assumption of the eighteenth-century fallacy that progress is in a straight line, has led to the conviction in most, even candid minds, amounting to the strength of an axiom, that the advance of civilisation has augmented the sum of human happiness, that life under earlier conditions must have been intolerable, and hence that the Socialist contention that the modern world is not only not the best possible, but not the best up to date, is merely a whimsical paradox.

In discussing this subject, two or three points have to be considered. Firstly, we must distinguish between what I may term the dynamic and the static estimation of history. In the first any particular historical period is regarded as part of the general evolution of history, as a moment merely of that evolution ; it is viewed solely in its relation to what preceded and what followed it. In the second a period is regarded abstractly, in itself and not as the element of a whole ; it is treated as an independent whole and compared with other periods also regarded as independent wholes. It is also to be borne in mind that, the individual being the product of his period and its conditions, it is no answer to the comparative merits of one period over another to point out the impossibility or evil results of suddenly transplanting an individual brought up under the first set of conditions into the second.

On the dynamic view mentioned the proposition, "whatever is, is best," has a certain truth. Every historical period has its meaning or significance for historical progress, considered dynamically, however meaningless considered in itself; the stage following would have been impossible without it. Thus, speaking broadly, without the decay and dissolution of tribal society and its issue in civilised individualism, a higher universal communism would have been impossible. More narrowly, without the particular development of civilisation as represented by nineteenth century capitalism with its "great industry," the higher, more universal, more complex communism, which is the ideal of the modern Socialist, would have been inconceivable. Even for the Socialist, therefore, civilisation in its worst forms is good. The progress from tribal society to civilisation is thus a progress indeed; every step is a triumph and brings us nearer to the realisation of human hopes. In this sense the Socialist is at one with the Whig historian. But here he joins issue with him. No sooner does he change his standpoint and consider history statically, than he finds that every step toward modern civilisation is a step for the worse. Considered by itself, every historical advance has meant a positive loss to human happiness in the essentials of life, immeasurably outweighing any positive gain in the details. The Socialist is bound, therefore, when viewing civilisation statically, to pronounce it unreservedly an unmitigated evil.

The ordinary historian, who considers only the exceptional incidents of life and ignores its essential aspects, finds everywhere signs of progress as he understands it—that is, signs that the present is better than the past. In the Middle Ages he finds a state of society in which life was relatively insecure from violence, when flagrant acts of cruelty and injustice were often perpetrated, where terrible plagues every now and then devastated considerable areas of population, where open war was a common occurrence. This in the first place. In the second, he finds a complete absence not only of all the modern comforts and luxuries of life, but of many things he is accustomed to regard as necessities. He finds locomotion difficult and dangerous, and all means of communication of the most rudimentary description. In modern life, of course, he finds exactly the reverse of all this. The positive evils mentioned are reduced to a minimum or removed altogether. Life has become a mass of little wants with the means of satisfying them ready to hand for those who can purchase them. More excitement is required, and can be had for money; tours round the world replace journeys into the next county.

I think I cannot be accused of having stated the case unfairly for modern civilisation; but after all, what does the difference amount to? In the view of many persons, the mediæval famine, pestilence, war, and host of other evils, are conceived as occurring all in the same place in the same week. Were this popular view of mediæval society correct, it is manifest that no flesh could have survived. But as a matter of fact "flesh" did survive; and so far as can be gathered, the average length of human life was not inferior then to what it is now, but rather the reverse. For if, as is sometimes contended, great age is more frequently reached now than then, this is more than counterbalanced by the fact, confirmed by all accounts, that premature death (properly so called) from organic disease was of comparatively rare occurrence. Now, although a fringe of well-to-do people may attain a greater average age than a corresponding set of people in the Middle Ages, in the nineteenth century whole sections of our ever-increasing town population are doomed by the conditions of their life to a premature grave. The difference is this, as I take it: the well-to-do middle and upper classes have the chance of an average year or two's longer life than the wealthy classes of former ages, but the mass of the population, although relieved of fear of famine, sword, and, to a great extent, even of decimating epidemics and other sensational incursions of the grizzly skeleton on their front, are relieved only to find him stolidly clinging on at the rear, in the shape of anxiety for daily bread, overwork, bad and insufficient food, squalor, insanitary housing, etc. The ordinary historian sees the exceptional and horrific evils of sword, violence, and famine incidental to the life of past ages; he passes over the commonplace evils essential to modern life. Yet under the one set of conditions early death is certain; under the other at most only probable.

Now let us compare two cases—the ancient and the modern—in which the result is the same, and note the difference between them otherwise. Say the modern town artisan dies at forty; the mediæval guildsman is killed at forty. But the modern town artisan has been qualifying for death from infancy, every step in his life has been dogged by that death—literally, in the midst of life he has been in death. If actual disease be not upon him, potential disease is, in the form of low bodily condition, rendering him absolutely incapable of any enjoyment other than "boozing." His tendencies, inherited and acquired, all converge to the one end. He is throughout life decaying. Now take the mediæval guildsman. What is his life? He also works at his trade, but under what conditions? With plenty of air, food, leisure, work in which he takes an interest and a pride, and in healthy emulation with companions similarly circumstanced to himself. His life is a healthy and a happy one. Suddenly news comes that a hostile lord is advancing upon the town with his retainers, and that all must arm in its defence. The excitement is a not altogether unwelcome interruption to the peaceful daily life of burghers possessed of nerves begotten of generations of life under healthy conditions. With much merry chaff the citizens sally forth and the walls are manned. Our forty-year-old workman takes his place. The fight begins; bolts, arrows, and javelins fly. In the thick of it all our burgher is struck and falls moaning; he is carried home, and after a few hours of pain, dies. Now here you have your choice: death by the exceptional thunderbolt of mediæval society; death by the undying worm of modern civilisation. Which do you prefer? In the one case you have unsettled conditions, life and property insecure—in short, all the bogies of the Whig historian; in the other you have settled conditions, law and order reigning over the whole land, and all the blessings of civilisation. I think few can honestly hesitate with regard to the answer they give.

A GREETING IN HEAVEN.

ON THE DEATH OF THE DAUGHTER OF JORDAN WHEN SEPARATED FROM HER FATHER BY HIS IMPRISONMENT.

(By FERDINAND FREILIGRATH. Translated by J. L. JOYNES.)

Heavenward flew the spirit of a maiden,
Gently wafted on the wings of fate,
Still a child, nor sin, nor sorrow-laden—
Entered shyly through the golden gate—

"Lo, see there! Who comes? The patriot's daughter!"
Up rose all the noble German dead:
Countless glorious faces turned and sought her,
Countless lips their gracious greeting said.

Came that freedom-loving soul sedately,
Seumè, bay-crowned with poetic fame;
Schiller came with words of welcome stately;
Hutten, Schubart—all to greet her came:

Looked on her with half-concealed compassion;
Welcomed her with words of tender grace;
Earnest gazed in silent questioning fashion
On the smile that lit her tearful face.

Downward then she bent her eyelids trembling,
Trembling stood, till sudden, ere she wist,
Tears of anguish, spite of all dissembling,
Filled the eyes her father—had not kissed.

Seumè clenched his hand with stern decision;
Schubart's soul with fierce regrets was torn;
"What is freedom but a dreamer's vision?"
Muttered Schiller full of bitter scorn.

Then spake Seumè, "Maiden, calm thy passion;
Death, thou knowest it, can make him free:
Let them rivets, let them fetters fashion—
Free with free men shall thy father be.

"Free with us, a guest but not a stranger,
One more martyr for our fatherland,
Yea, a beacon light that those in danger
Hail with eager heart and lifted hand.

"Proudly shall he rest who well hath striven,
When death cometh. Pray that he may die.
Nay, my child, no rest but death is given
Those brave souls who strive with tyranny.

"Him to dungeons, me to a far Edom,
Hunted erst the self-same tyrant crew.
Heard'st thou not how, seeking only freedom,
Seumè once to foreign shores withdrew?

"Pray thou therefore that his life's sad story
'Neath the grass-grown grave at last may cease.
His shall be the martyr's meed of glory—
Jordan's daughter, pray and be at peace."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Our Corner this month "blossoms like the rose" in a new cover, designed by our facile friend Walter Crane, from whose pencil seems to flow an inexhaustible stream of beauty. The dainty surroundings of the comfortable window-seat, with its interested reader and her drowsy cat, should in itself make a powerful agent in arousing discontent. We of the unlucky class can hope for no such comfort, while the "lucky" few are so saturated with their over-wealth that they cannot apprise it at its worth. So much for the cover; its contents are of the usual excellence. Bernard Shaw is at home "Concerning Interest," and makes that unattractive subject sparkle passing well. He deserves to become the great economic authority; everything he writes is at least readable and clear, which is not the strong point of his elder brethren. Mrs. Besant has an effective and useful article on the "Unemployed." "Hylö-idealism" and "The Bible and Sexual morals" are treated "just in the same old way."

'State Interference in the Vaccination Controversy,' J. H. Levy. (Allen, Ave Maria Lane, 3d. a dozen). With the medical side of the question we have nothing to do in these columns, and happily, or unhappily, the writer of this brochure has little more. The whole key-note of his lucubration is "State interference with parental authority." Of course, a good deal of talk about "individual liberty" comes in, but "parental authority" is the great thing that must not be touched. It is rather strange that men who talk so loudly and so much of individual liberty should still have such unquestioning reverence for the old superstition of "parental rights." Why two chance people should possess "rights" over the person of a citizen, even during nonage, which the community does not possess, is puzzling to anyone who tries to be logical.

'The Moral Basis of Socialism,' by Karl Pearson (Reeves, 2d.), is at once eminently readable, and the product of deep, careful thought. Very fully and closely it examines the feelings and forces that mould men's actions; discriminating with great clearness the anti-social from the merely un-social; and showing forcibly that the true social spirit is that which would give offenders against the community, those acting against its welfare, "a short shrift and the nearest lamp-post." "You must either be working for the community or leave it," is the ultimatum of the Socialistic moral code to each and to all. No amount of conscience-money spent on the most 'philanthropic object' can atone for individual idleness. The progress and welfare of society demand for common use not only the stored labour of the past, but the labour-power of each existing individual.

'Stories for the People,' by W. Thompson (Dicks, 313 Strand, 6d.). These well-constructed and truthful studies of the social condition of the people of to-day are now reprinted, "complete with portrait," from the columns of Reynolds, where they have already attracted wide attention. Clear insight and deep feeling are proved on every page, and we cannot doubt of the great success which will attend this issue.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

The Socialists of Glasgow are busy organising the quay-labourers there (whose successful strike we chronicled last week) into a trade union.

A resolution was passed in favour of the eight hours' movement at Mountain Ash, Wales, last week.

THE LIMERICK DOCK LABOURERS' STRIKE.—The strike of the dock labourers against the two steam shipping companies still continues, and small hope is entertained of a settlement being arrived at.

STRIKE OF WOMEN.—Two or three hundred women at Cockhedge Mills, Warrington, struck on Monday morning in consequence of an overlooker having been discharged. The women excitedly patrolled the streets during the day.

The miners at Elliot Colliery, New Tredegar, are on strike against encroachments. The men have shown great forbearance and tried all peaceful means to settle the dispute, but to no purpose. The employers seem determined to reach starvation point.

NOTTINGHAM.—The strike of engineers in the firm of Manlove and Elliott's, which has lasted for months, has practically collapsed. The staff has been filled with "knobsticks," and most of the old hands have taken employment elsewhere. A handful are still on the funds of the society.

MASTER ENGINEERS.—A private meeting of master engineers was held at the George Hotel, Nottingham, last week. Delegates from Bolton attended. They were endeavouring to make arrangements for the general lock-out that they are trying to organise to squash the strike. No details of the meeting have transpired.

The miners locked out at Netherend Colliery, Cradley, have issued an appeal for support. They say their wages were already at starvation point when their employers sought to effect a reduction. They rebelled against it, and have been locked out since the beginning of July. Subscriptions will be received by B. Winwood, miners' agent, Blackheath, Dudley.

SWANSEA.—An improved furnace has been built at Landore which turns out more steel in a given time than the old one. The employers as usual want to grab all the gain and make it a cause for a revision (which always means, when employers use the word, a reduction) of payments to men. A strike is threatened, and it is to be hoped the Welshmen will be firm. The Birmingham Steel Smelters' Association is backing them up.

CHEAP LABOUR.—An engineering firm in the East-end of London, who manufacture machines for making beer barrels, are working 59 hours per week, and are paying fitters, turners, and machiners 24s. to 30s. per week, being 4½d. and 6d. per hour respectively. This entirely demolishes the bogey of the skilled artisans who exclaim "You Socialists want to reduce all men to one dead level by paying labourers and mechanics equal wages."

On Thursday Sept. 1, a strike occurred in the Bolton cotton trade which affects about 100 hands. The spinners employed at Messrs. Joshua Crook and Son's mills, Blackburn Street, gave notice of their intention to leave work in consequence of the wages earned being below the average. The matter was not remedied, and the workpeople accordingly left, with the sanction of their association.

In the Cleveland district the furnacemen engaged at the Skinningrove Ironworks have struck work. The dispute has arisen through four gautry-men having received unjust notice of dismissal. The men employed at the works, including those discharged, are members of the Blast-Furnacemen's Association, and because the firm would not re-instate the four gautry-men they all left the works.

At the well-known ship-yard of Messrs. Armstrong, Mitchell, and Co., at Elswick, a dispute has occurred between the company and their joiners. It appears that it is usual for carpenters to place the heavy wood-work of ships in position, and for joiners to finish it off. The latter complain that owing to iron being now largely used in ship-building, they have less work than formerly, and that carpenters are given joiners' work. As the company declined to alter the existing arrangements, 200 joiners at once ceased work.

THE THREATENED STRIKE OF NAILMAKERS.—A deputation representing more than ten thousand wrought nailmakers waited upon the employers of the South Staffordshire and Worcestershire districts on September 2, with a view of obtaining a substantial advance in wages. The operatives have of late been subjected to great reductions in their wages, and are at the present time in an impoverished state. Last Saturday the operatives at the majority of the warehouses gave notice to their employers that they would cease work on Saturday next unless an advance in wages be conceded. It is believed many employers are in favour of conceding an advance.

THE DOCKYARD REDUCTIONS.—An order reached Portsmouth Dockyard on Monday morning for the discharge of 450 hired workmen, but as this had been daily expected it caused little surprise. A largely-attended meeting of tradesmen, dockyard men, and others was held at Portsmouth on Wednesday to consider what steps should be taken in connection with the dockyard discharges. The meeting appointed a committee to arrange for a large mass meeting, at which a relief fund will be opened, and steps taken to prevent if possible any further discharges.

GRIEVANCES OF LONDON POSTMEN.—London and suburban postmen are agitating for an amelioration of their condition. Nineteen hundred of them signed a petition which was presented on Monday by Mr. H. W. Lawson to the Postmaster-General. They suggest, among other things, that their duties shall be limited to twelve hours daily, that the maximum wages after twelve years' service shall be forty shillings, that stripes should be abolished, and that the wages of second-class postmen should be raised from sixteen to eighteen shillings per week. They also ask an increase of the holidays allowed from twelve to eighteen days, and for certain changes in regard to promotion, to the uniform provided, and to the rules of superannuation.

THE LATE MIDLAND STRIKE.—1,066 men have been refused re-engagements. One servant who has been 47 years slaving for the swindlers is left on the streets. 140 men from a Midland station near Nottingham, who have been refused work, have emigrated to Tasmania. The vindictive directors have inserted a clause in the characters given to the men discharged, calculated to prevent them obtaining re-engagements. One driver has his notice of discharge solely on the ground of his being a Socialist and an agitator among the men. The men have not been able to obtain the paper which is devoted to their interests, and it is suspected the Company may have had a hand in stopping it.—A. K. D.

THE CRADLEY HEATH CHAINMAKERS.—At a meeting of the chainmakers last week Mr. Thomas Homer stated that unless there was a change in the mode of carrying on trade it would, he was sorry to say, be necessary to declare a general strike again, for there were a number of employers who boasted they would never pay the increased prices. Referring to the proceedings instituted against him for intimidation, the speaker said he regretted the magistrates thought it advisable to fine him, for by so doing they had done him a great injustice. He was as innocent as a new-born child, and several of the witnesses had committed gross perjury. Was it reasonable that he, occupying the position he did, should instruct a man before a number of other persons to fetch a mob? He had many offers of assistance, and he had decided to appeal against the decision at the Quarter Sessions for the county of Stafford. Mr. Homer has received several subscriptions on behalf of the chainmakers who are unable to obtain employment at the advanced rate of wages, amongst which was one for £20 from the National Society of Tailors.

The belt-sewers of John Tullis and Company's leather works, John Street, Bridgeton, Glasgow, struck work on Tuesday August 30, owing to an intimation that 20 per cent. more labour was to be imposed on them, with no corresponding advance of wages. The men objected, and the result was five of the men were suspended. This brought the rest of the workers out; and their demand is now for 10 per cent. advance on present wages. The workers of this firm (of which those at present on strike only form a department, numbering from ninety to a hundred men) are exceptionally low paid, in fact the meanness of this firm is almost "proverbial." The wages range from 12s. to 21s. per week, 21s. being the maximum, and is only reached after ten or twelve years' service. The average wage for the trade in Scotland is from 18s. to 26s., for England 28s. to 32s. The disparity of their condition as compared with their fellow-workers in England is startlingly obvious, and is only another instance of the despicable rapacity of capitalism. The tyrannical conditions under which they work compels them not only to sell their labour, but also their souls. Any one found conversing with his neighbour while at work is summarily dealt with in the shape of a fine, which generally amounts to a 1s. The indulgence of the worker as well as his labour is thus made to yield its quota of profit.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—The 18th week of the strike in the Bolton engineering trades began on Monday without any apparent prospect of settlement. The employers have issued an ultimatum offering to refer dispute to open arbitration on wages question only, details to be settled afterwards, and reply to be received before September 14. This is the first offer of arbitration emanating directly from the employers, all previous suggestions having come from the Mayor, generally accompanied by restrictive conditions. It is anticipated that unless the men accede to this last proposal the masters' association will adopt more stringent measures; but they have not further considered the arbitration proposals, and appear determined to stand out for the full concession of 2s. Fifty of the county constabulary have left the town, but 150 still remain. A further reduction is ordered. In a letter to the local press the employers state that since the engineers' strike commenced, work has actually gone to foreign competitors which would have otherwise come to Bolton, involving a loss of £30,000 in wages alone to Bolton workmen. They therefore ask tradesmen and property owners who sympathise with and support the men to reflect on what the action of the men is doing. This mean-souled attempt has failed, as it deserved to do, the tradesmen seeing with whom their interest lies. On Wednesday another batch of men from the Midlands landed in Bolton, and, claiming police protection, were conveyed to Dobson and Barlow's works, followed by a large crowd. This firm have now considerably over 200 men lodged in the works, and more coming. Hick, Hargreaves, and Co. have about 160, and are making preparations for more. One of the outcomes of the strike is the proposed formation of the "Bolton Co-operative Ironworks Society, Limited," with a capital of £15,000, in £1 shares. The provisional committee, together with delegates from Bolton Trades Council, Strike Committee, and Co-operative Society, met on Wednesday night, at which meeting a scheme was propounded and favourably received. Meeting adjourned for appointment of provisional directors. All the shareholders will be working men actually engaged in the iron trades.

THE WEAVERS.—The disputes at Barnoldswick and Preston still remain unsettled. The report of mill collections in Burnley last week says:—"At Barnoldswick, the weavers have been locked out over eleven weeks, and all because they formed a deputation to see the employer and ask him to pay the Burnley list. He gave them no answer but stopped the firm at once, though he was paying 2d., 4d., and one sort 8d. per cut under list prices. At Preston we have an attempt to reduce the wages of velvet weavers from 3s. to 5s. per piece. Can we, as operatives, shut our eyes to this? We say no, and we call on every weaver and winder to see to it that their fellow-operatives are not crushed down by the action of such employers. We are confident that the cause of the workers is a just one and that they have justice on their side. Let us, therefore, do our utmost to give them such assistance as shall prove to the employers that we are not going to allow them to rule as they think proper, with an iron hand, but that the workers are going to have something to say about what they shall receive for their labour." The total collections amount to £34 11s. 9d., of which £5 was sent to Preston and £15 to Barnoldswick. It is stated that the employers are collecting all the tramp-weavers that can be found. Another cause of complaint is that members of unions of other trades, such as the card-room workers, are going to work to try and defeat the weavers. In another case a member of the Amalgamated Engineers is trying to fill the place of a tackler, and has sent his children to "knobstick." This is the old game over again, getting one class of workpeople to defeat another. We hope the officials of the above trades will pay some little attention to this complaint. Three other disputes have occurred during the week. At Blackburn nearly a thousand weavers employed at Messrs. D. and W. Taylor's mills have "turned out," owing to the dismissal of some of their number for turning off steam in the weaving shed without permission. The operatives allege that the firm have not acted fairly by them, as they promised to let the weavers turn off the steam when they liked. They have expressed their determination to remain "out" until the question is settled, as they cannot bear the amount of steam which is turned into the weaving shed. At Higham, near Burnley, the weavers engaged at the Fir Trees Shed have given notice to cease work in consequence of the employers not paying the Blackburn standard list of prices. A dispute has also occurred at Messrs. Ormerod Bros., Mills, at Walsden, Yorkshire, the piecers having struck work owing to the employers not complying with a request to advance their wages a halfpenny per thousand hanks.

THE SCOTCH SHALE MINERS.—On Tuesday last week the miners and retortmen on strike at Broxburn held a meeting in the Public Hall. The Chairman, in introducing Mr. Wilson, agent, to address the meeting, hoped, now that they had struggled successfully for about eight weeks, they would not be such fools as to rescind any of their previous resolutions. Mr. Wilson said that if the men maintained their present firm and united policy, they would show to their employers that they did not mean to work at rates insufficient to maintain them, or to be denied the right of combination. He then referred to the eviction of the men from the company's houses, and after consideration it was remitted to the committee to take offers for the erecting of wooden houses, and to procure a suitable site. Regarding the time they should remove from their houses, a motion was put to be cleared out by 12 o'clock on Thursday, and an amendment to remain in possession till evicted. On a vote being taken, the amendment was carried by a majority. On Wednesday Mr. Haldane, M.P., had interviews both with Mr. Henderson, the manager, and with representatives of the men, and stated conditions which he had reason to hope would be accepted, and so end the dispute: 1. The day not to exceed nine hours from bank to bank, and the Miners' Association to be free to enforce this rule. 2. The Miners' Association, in the event of the men lying off work otherwise than from sickness or other extraordinary sufficient reason to undertake not to interfere with employer's right of dismissal. General holidays to be taken periodically according to agreement, otherwise mines to be open six days a week. 3. All men to be taken back into company's employment, and it is not to be an offence to take part in constitutional agitation in connection with Miners' Association. 4. Men agree to accept work upon a reduction of 2d. per ton. In reply to a vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. Wilson, Mr. Haldane said he would like to see big trade unions all over the country. He hoped for the time when working men would have a greater say in the conditions and profits of labour and work themselves into a more independent position. On Thursday several of the mines at Bloxburn were open for the men to resume work, but pending an agreement through the intervention of Mr. Haldane, M.P., none turned up to work on the full reduction, seeing that the terms proposed stipulated that the men get 2d. back. A number of men are hopeful that the terms drawn out will be accepted, but others do not believe that they will, seeing they are practically what have already been refused by the employers. No more evictions have been carried out, nor is it expected there will be any until it is seen what reply is given to the proposals submitted by Mr. Haldane. The men have also delayed the erection of the proposed wooden structure for those who had no houses to go to in case of eviction, but the wood is in readiness to begin at any moment. Some particulars of the Edinburgh Trades' Council demonstration will be found in our Reports column.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

HOLLAND.

F. Domela Nieuwenhuys was released on the 1st inst., after having undergone a term of imprisonment of seven months. He was condemned to one year, so that five months have been given to him in consequence of the manifestations, petitions, meetings, etc., got up by the Dutch workers and by a considerable portion of the bourgeoisie. Nieuwenhuys went at once to The Hague, where he met several hundred friends assembled in the Walhalla Hall to congratulate him. A mass meeting has immediately been arranged for Friday, 9th inst., where the released prisoner has promised to speak. Nieuwenhuys will be a candidate for Parliament at the next general elections at Groningen. Although we wish him every success in his Socialistic propaganda in Holland, we are inclined to desire his defeat at the poll, because experience teaches us that Socialists in Parliaments are unable to do any good for the cause. To say the least, they are wasting their time, and that is nowadays too much. Socialism is growing fast all over the country, the workers of The Hague, Amsterdam, and Rotterdam being specially busy in arranging meetings in the provinces, where until now the Socialistic ideas had not penetrated. They sell and distribute every week a large amount of Dutch literature. The small pamphlets of our Dutch comrades are generally well written, and easy to be understood.

The first volume of the posthumous works of our regretted friend, H. Gerhard, one of the founders of the International Working Men's Association in Holland, has just been issued. It is a handsome little book of 70 pages, well worth reading. Its contents are:—1. Biography of Gerhard, by Dom. Nieuwenhuys; 2. Future society; 3. Discussion on social topics; 4. Sketch of a Communistic society. Two more volumes will follow.

P.S.—The Socialist candidate, Domela Nieuwenhuys, has been defeated. All is well that ends well.

FRANCE.

As we have told our readers a fortnight ago, the French Anarchists, Monod and Naudet, were acquitted by the Court of Assizes, of Dijon, but as it was thoroughly impossible for the "advanced" French Republic to leave things in that state they had to pass immediately afterwards through a new prosecution farce before another tribunal, and Monod got there three years and Naudet three months' imprisonment,—convicted as they were for the same offence of which the jury had already acquitted them.

The Municipal Council of St. Ouen, a suburb of Paris, has thought it advisable to distribute, as prizes to the children of the communal schools, some very good books, as for instance, 'The Child' and 'The Bachelor,' by Jules Vallés; 'Memoirs' and 'Tales and Legends,' by Louise Michel; 'Woman and Revolution,' by Stackelberg; 'Popular Poems,' by Chatelain, etc. The Prefect of the Seine Department has at once suspended the mayor, Dr. Basset, and at the same time has asked the government to dismiss him from the mayorship. Of course, Republican books ought not to be distributed in a Republican country such as France!

GERMANY.

The Social Democratic party of Germany intends to convene a Congress in the coming autumn, and, of course, far away from their police-blessed country. Among other subjects to be discussed, there will be a proposal by Rabel, to the effect of organising next year an International Socialist Congress where a scheme of international work regulations will come on for discussion; and another by Liebknecht, stating definitely the position which the Social Democratic party ought in future to hold towards the Anarchists.

The trials at Munich, Frankfurt, Altona, Magdeburg, and Dantzic, are scarcely come to an end, and with the condemnation, of course, of the prosecuted Socialists, a new series is going to commence at Hamburg, Altona, Berlin, Breslau, Mainz, Leipzig, and Halle. Between the 1st of January and the 31st of July of the present year, 654 Socialists have been tried and convicted in all parts of Germany. Besides, more than 200 are now in the jails awaiting their turn.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GENTLEMEN,—As I see you have the Credit Foncier, published at Hammon, N.J., U.S.A., on your exchange-list, can you kindly give me any information as to the satisfactory standing and progress of it and the colony at Topolobampo, Mexico, which it represents? I subscribed for the paper last April, ordering the back numbers for the year, and all I have been able to obtain so far is one odd number a few days back, though having written the publishers and the founder of the colony several times.

Also can you tell me if there is any similar institution to that and Monsieur Godin's Familistère at Guise, France, in this country, or any prospect of such being started? It seems to me, so far as I have learned, a very good solution of the labour trouble.

J. H. EDWARDS.

55 Minford Gardens, Shepherd's Bush Road.

[We know nothing of the colony you name except from its organ, which reports it as getting on well. We have no information as to an English imitation of Godin's experiment now in existence; perhaps some of our readers may be able to help you. Such a thing is good for those immediately concerned in it—especially the proprietor!—but is no "solution of the labour trouble," as has been often demonstrated in our columns.—Eds. Commonweal.]

REPORTS.

[Note.—Senders of Reports would greatly help if they would avoid unnecessary wordiness. Our space is limited.]

BLOOMSBURY.—We held our usual meeting at St. Pancras Arches on Sunday, when Bartlett and Dalziel addressed the audience on the subject of "Landlordism." A good meeting was also held at the Polygon on Monday last, the speakers Bartlett, Dalziel, and Turner being attentively listened to.—W. W. B.

CLERKENWELL.—On Wednesday, August 31, Blundell read Edward Carpenter's pamphlet, entitled "England's Ideal," to very attentive audience. An interesting discussion followed. On Sunday, Sept. 4, the usual monthly "social" was held by Blundell and friends, a large muster of talent obliging on this occasion, including Socialist songs, readings from Mark Twain and others, and pianoforte recitals. We closed a very pleasant evening with the "Marseillaise." Commonweal and pamphlets have steady sale.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—Last Wednesday evening, at Broadway, London Fields, good meeting addressed by James Allman and H. Graham. A concert was held at the club on Saturday evening, Barker, Gray, Turner, Lefevre, and others contributed to the entertainment, and the evening passed off very pleasantly.—G. C.

HOXTON.—Very successful outdoor meetings on Thursday evening and Sunday morning. Good sale of literature. Sunday evening in hall, C. Fitzgerald lectured on "Ancient and Modern Robbers;" an interesting discussion followed.—C. J. Y.

KINGSLAND GREEN.—Sunday last, usual meeting on Kingsland Green, addressed by Brooks, Flockton, and Turner; good audience. Fair sale of Commonweal.—J. F.

MERTON.—Sunday last, Eden against great odds collected a crowd to listen to us in Haydon's Road. We held good meeting, and sold paper well. A boss builder in opposition instanced a "friend who had earned thousands by his own industry." I suggested that he might further earn money by exhibiting himself as the first man who had ever possessed thousands earned by unaided effort—and then it was confessed he had employed others! A member of the Blue Ribbon Army stepped forward and said a few encouraging words of sympathy with our work, and so closed a successful meeting. In evening, in Wimbleton Broadway, we enlivened a religious meeting as a return for their interference with us on the previous Sunday at Mitcham. The "brethren" gave us an assurance that they would not interfere again, and after having had a good hearing for our views we left them.—F. KITZ.

MILE END AND BETHNAL GREEN.—No meeting on Waste last Tuesday, owing to rain. Sunday last, usual meeting in Victoria Park, addressed by Brooks. Vigorous opposition was offered by a Mr. Smith, temperance advocate, who was replied to by Brooks and Lathan to satisfaction of audience.—H. M.

MITCHAM.—Good meeting on Fair Green, about 400 present, addressed by Allman. No meeting in the evening owing to wet. Commonweal sold well.—R. C.

NORTH LONDON.—We held a very good meeting in Regent's Park on Sunday morning, addressed by Cantwell and Nicoll. Good sale of literature.

STAMFORD HILL.—Sunday last, at 6, good meeting addressed by T. Wardle, John Allman, and W. B. Parker. Commonweal sold out.—J. F.

WALTHAM GREEN.—There was a good meeting held here on Sunday last, Tochatti speaking for upwards of an hour to an audience of about 300. He was listened to with marked attention, and had the entire sympathy of the audience. No opposition and 43 Commonweal sold. There is every chance of making this branch a strong one.—S. B. G.

BIRMINGHAM.—Weaver held meetings at Bull Ring and Council House last Sunday. Donald also addressed an audience in Bull Ring.

BLOXWICH.—On Friday, Weaver held a meeting here, but owing to wet weather audience was less than usual. Much interest, however, was evinced by them.

DARLSTON AND BILSTON.—Although the weather was very stormy, Weaver got good audiences last Saturday. Fair sale of literature.

DUDLEY.—Tuesday usual meeting in Market-place. The evening was very wet, yet Donald got a good audience. The police turned up, but immediately retired.

GLASGOW.—On Sunday forenoon, Burns and Glasier addressed a good meeting in Jail Square. In the evening at the same place, Bullock, Glasier, and Paterson spoke to a very large and sympathetic audience. Good sale of Commonweal, and 3s. 8d. collected for the Broxburn miners.—A. M'K.

GREAT BRIDGE.—Weaver and Deakin addressed meeting on Tuesday; well received.

HANDSWORTH.—A. K. Donald addressed a meeting at Boulton Arms, principally of members of district assembly of the Knights of Labour. Meeting was well attended and very successful, the men desiring that another lecture should be given for the purpose of dealing more fully with some of the points. Good sale of literature.

IPSWICH.—Slaughter, Mills, and Bird, of Norwich, visited us on Sunday. Meeting in morning good, but that in the afternoon was excellent. Various questions asked and answered by Slaughter, apparently to the satisfaction of our opponent and the attentive and unusually large audience. Commonweal sold fairly well.—J. R.

LEEDS.—Good meeting on Sunday, addressed by Paylor and Maguire.—T. P.

NORWICH BRANCH.—We did good work in Norwich on Sunday. Davis, of London, addressed good meeting in Ber Street at 11 a.m.; also large meeting in Market Place, at 3 p.m.; and again at 7 p.m. on Agricultural Hall plain, finishing with lecturing in Gordon Hall, at 8 p.m., on "the Modern Trinity." Darley and Morley went to Wymondham in the morning and held meeting there. Several comrades went to Lowestoft and held three meetings, being well received. Papers sold well.—T. M.

TIPTON.—Sanders held a most successful meeting on August 31.

WEDNESBURY.—The branch is continuing to make good progress.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The weather was so bad in Wolverhampton that we were unable to hold our meeting. A very civil letter has been received from the chief of police regarding the conduct of the sergeant referred to in last report. The custom in Wolverhampton, he explains, is to interfere with no meetings unless an obstruction (not an imaginary one) is caused.

WALSALL.—We held a good meeting on Sunday in a fresh position. The inside lecture given by Austin, from Birmingham, resulted in ten new members, mostly miners.—J. T. D.

WEST BROMWICH.—H. Sanders addressed meeting at the Fountain, High Street, on Aug. 29, and afterwards near The Beeches. Good audiences.

WILLENHALL.—A large meeting was held by Weaver on Wednesday, and Sanders on Saturday.

NOTTINGHAM SECTION (SOCIALIST UNION).—On Saturday we received a visit from Donald and Austin. A very interested meeting was held at night on the Low Pavement, addressed by Donald and Proctor. On Sunday night, a discussion was held in the club room, on "Should we join the Socialist League?" Discussion adjourned.—A. M. C.

WOOLWICH.—Last Sunday, Wade and Banner spoke at the Arsenal Gates, and for nearly two hours kept together an audience between 400 and 500 during a heavy fall of rain. We sold 5s. worth of literature, and collected 4s. 8d. for the propaganda.—R. B.

Scottish Land and Labour League.

Usual executive meeting held last Thursday. After business disposed of, and several new branches incorporated, an interesting discussion was held.

Carnoustie (Forfarshire).—First meeting held here was a thorough success. A very large crowd assembled at the Cross and listened very attentively to Mahon's address. Some literature was sold at end of meeting, and after a little discussion a branch was formed. This is a most promising place. A large number of ploughmen attended the meeting.

Arbroath.—Owing to the zeal and activity of several young men who joined this branch a few weeks ago most favourable progress is being made. On Tuesday, at Brothock Bridge, Mahon spoke on Socialism. Audience large and fully in agreement. A gathering of members held afterwards, and business transacted.

Forfar.—Propaganda here was opened last week by two meetings—Wednesday and Friday. Mahon lectured on the aims of Socialism. Second meeting somewhat spoiled by weather, but first meeting was decided success. Some literature was sold, collection made, and several names taken for forming a branch.

Lochie.—Second meeting held Thursday in High Street; larger and more enthusiastic than previous one. Several names added to branch.

Dundee.—Business meeting held at Granite Hall, Overgate, Thursday night, at which some matters of organization were discussed.

Edinburgh: The Shale Miners.—Following up meetings held by Land and Labour League a fortnight previously another demonstration was held in the Queen's Park on Saturday afternoon, under the auspices of the Trades Council. This body, with the hankering after respectability which usually discredits it, enjoined upon their speakers that nothing but the most gingerly moderation would be allowed. Indeed, the chairman went so far as to caution the speakers that nothing must be said that might be distasteful to the employers. Mr. Haldane, M.P., spoke with evident anxiety to see the dispute settled, and insisted that the right of the men to combine must be upheld. Mr. John Wilson, the shale miners' secretary, laid the case of the men clearly and eloquently before the meeting. A detachment of the Land and Labour League watched the proceedings, and, deeming the speeches unsatisfactory, determined to hold another meeting. As soon as the speaking of the trades councillors ended Mahon began to address the crowd from the hill-side. An enormous crowd soon gathered and loudly cheered the statement of the Socialist position. After criticising the speech of Mr. Haldane, and pointing out the folly of merely limiting, instead of stopping, the robbery of labour, Mahon was followed by Smith, who explained the real nature of the struggle between capital and labour. John Gilray then moved, "That this meeting regards the present struggle only as an incident of the war between the labour and capitalist classes; it refuses to be content with the mere limitation of the robbery of labour, and declares that the abolition of wages-slavery is the real aim of the working class movement." The resolution was carried with loud cheers. A second collection for the miners was made, and the meeting separated with three hearty cheers for "the Social Revolution" and "the success of the Shale Miners."

Leith.—Very successful meeting held at foot of Leith Walk Sunday morning. Mahon was listened to with great attention.

Edinburgh.—Grassmarket meeting was very lively. A comfortable mission hall, with a preacher in operation, had only five for an audience in it; while the Socialists had some hundreds standing round them in the open air during a drenching rain. Out came the preacher furiously denouncing Socialism as the cause of all evils, from the French Revolution to the Sunday steamboats. After working himself into a fit of passion that threatened to end in apoplexy, Mr. Fairbairn ran away before the reply was given. The Queen's Park meeting was smaller than usual owing to heavy rain. Smith opened, and Mahon followed. An interesting discussion sprung up afterwards. The mound meeting had to be abandoned owing to weather. CHAS. WM. TUKE, sec.

SOUTH WALES PROPAGANDA.

Readers of the Commonweal have noticed a few weeks back the extremely interesting and promising report given in these columns of the work done by Kitz and Mainwaring. It is imperative, if the work is to be of permanent benefit, that other speakers be sent at once. The Strike Committee has exhausted its funds in the carrying on of the extra work necessitated by the late strikes, etc., and now appeals urgently for the necessary "sinews of war." Those upon the spot who wish speakers to come down, and all those anywhere who are willing to help, are asked to send in contributions to the Treasurer of the Strike Committee, 13, Farringdon Road, E.C.

COMRADES.—I wish to support the appeal of the Bloomsbury Branch on behalf of the family of William English, who was not only one of the originators of that branch, but a worker in the movement before the League or S.D.F. was thought of, but has not done the active work that some comrades have of late. Owing to bad health he has been unable to work for ten months past, and been bedridden for five months. He leaves a wife and eight children unprovided for.—JOSEPH LANE.

NOTES ON NEWS.

THE affair at Mitchelstown is bad enough, but just what must be expected; quite apart from any design, from any intention on either side, such wretched murders are sure to spring out of the present state of affairs in Ireland. The people will meet together in spite of the Coercion Act, or even because of it; the police have orders to disperse them on some excuse or other. You can't disperse a gathering of excited men (and women) by mere politeness, and policemen, under the circumstances, knowing their position, don't waste any time in trying to do so, but throw themselves on the crowd, and hustle and hit and knock about in a way that would irritate a crowd of Jobs to resistance; and patient and over-patient Irishmen have shown themselves, the Irish peasant is a traditional hard hitter, and understands hand-play. So the police get their share of knocks, and get driven off perhaps, as on this occasion; and then comes the next act, which is more likely to turn the affair into a tragedy in Ireland than would be the case in a similar affair in England.

For in England, if the police were beaten off the red-coats would come on the stage, if sharp shot and cold steel were to be used or threatened; and as they would be fresh men unexcited by a preliminary contest of dry blows, they would feel their responsibility of firing on an unarmed crowd far more than men who had already come out of a rough and tumble, in which their official pride and esprit du corps had been humbled. In Ireland, on the other hand, the event is likely to happen which happened at Mitchelstown; the beaten police come back as soldiers, armed with deadly weapons, to take their revenge on the people, who for their part, unarmed and unorganised, feel the full force of the fierce words of the Gothic King before Rome, when he was warned of the huge mass of people he had to deal with, "The thicker the hay the easier to mow."

And that all the more, by the by, if the police shoot from behind the shelter of their walls, as they did at Mitchelstown.

As to the government that allows this sort of thing to go on, bystanders can see, if they cannot, that they are not strong enough to go in for a series of new Peterloos. Probably the Irish will stand it without breaking out into open insurrection, because, as has often been said before, they have no opportunity of setting a serious rising on foot. But general public opinion in England is not in favour of government by massacre, whatever the passions of a few landowners and their backers may urge them on to. It is not difficult for an English Radical to conceive of himself in a similar position to that of the Irishmen at the Mitchelstown meeting; and he would at least be ashamed of himself if in such a case he had not gone about as far as the Irishmen did in resisting the first attacks of the police; and under the orders which the constabulary now have in Ireland from the government, it seems that murder may be expected to follow the exercise by peaceably assembled citizens of a little manliness in resisting outrage.

But the Government may say: "Did we not pass a Coercion Bill? And does not Coercion mean killing in the long run? What are we to do?" One is driven to answer the last question by saying: "Well, gentlemen, I must say it is difficult to point out to you any course of action which would at once satisfy your desires and ours. Perhaps the least harmful thing you could do would be to hang yourselves. But even then there would still be so many fools left in this country that there would still be a government; and that government, after having performed the deeds of the new broom with applause for some time, would presently be in much the same mess as you are in, or indeed, maybe worse; for it perhaps would not have the Irish Question conveniently at hand to take people's attention off the affairs of the whole working population of these islands."

Meantime, once more the Tory Government will soon find out that a Peterloo policy can only be carried out by the thoroughest of the thorough.

The terrible calamity at Exeter, which has taken up so much of public attention lately, is simply the outcome of the commercial system as applied to the construction of theatres: it is just of a piece with the wreck of a ship sent to sea for profits' sake unseaworthy and underhanded, or with an explosion in a mine ill-ventilated for the same reason. Profit-grinding has murdered all those unfortunates, just as certainly as it murders thousands every day by the slower death that at every step besets the life of wage-slaves, of those who allow masters to muddle away their lives for them, who allow the hurry and heedlessness of irresponsible gamblers to settle for them how they shall live and how they shall die.

The orthodox Liberal Daily News has been rather amusing in its utterances on the Trades Union Congress. It began by an article in which it made what was no doubt intended to be a serious hit at the Socialists: told us that the theory that we hold of the rank and file of the trades' unionists looking doubtfully at their leaders, and beginning to consider their real position, was a delusion; that they were all of the orthodox faith,—and in short, the usual good-boy patronising exhortation. But then came the resolution of the Congress to set on foot a Labour Electoral Committee, and the Daily News' good boys had to have a little lecture read to them on their foolishness, in taking this very mild step towards choosing their own "representatives," of separating themselves from "the two great parties."

Not very wonderful if the workmen are at last beginning to find out that the "two great parties" are like "the two great parties" that form up in a field before a football match—to play the game! The only pity is that they do not let them play their game all by themselves, and form their Labour Party without reference to the football-field called Parliament.

Meantime it may be said for the benefit of those readers of the Daily News who may also read the Commonweal and who do not know much of Socialism, that Socialists are not hostile to trades' unions, but to those who wish to prevent the trades' unions developing with the times. Their real enemies are those who would crystallise them into mere societies for the guaranteeing of the privilege of capitalism, and recruiting grounds for "the great Liberal party"—that is, Whig vote-preservers. This would be an ignominious end to such an important association of workers; but it need not be dreaded. The trades' unions will develop, even if in doing so they have to change their old form and be no longer recognisable by their once enemies, now their anxious allies, the Whig politicians.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

THE TRADES' UNION CONGRESS.

I.

THE twentieth annual Trades' Union Congress met at Swansea on Monday September 5, and continued its sittings daily during the week. 156 delegates were announced as being present, and the number of members of the various societies represented was given as 674,034. This Congress was looked forward to with perhaps greater expectation than on any previous occasion, not only on account of the unstable condition of some of the unions themselves, but also from the severe criticism directed against trades' unionism, both from within and without, as to its inability, in its present form, to adequately cope with the labour problem; and also the hope on the part of many of its friends of seeing some indication of a new departure. Two years ago, the president in his address declared the present to be a critical period for English trades' unions, and that the time had come when they must either lead or follow—they must form the nucleus of the Labour Party of the future, or they must sink into insignificance; and to this those who have been watching the development of the labour struggle must give in their adhesion.

To those who hoped to see any great change the results of the Congress just concluded will probably bring disappointment; but nevertheless, comparing it with previous meetings, there is evidence of considerable advancement, and that the workers are daily becoming better acquainted with the causes of their degradation and are bringing a greater amount of intelligence to bear in their removal.

The first day's proceedings commenced with the now customary welcome by a local dignitary, who in this case was Mr. Yeo, M.P., mayor of Swansea. The only noteworthy points in his speech was his hope that the future choice of men who in the House of Commons shall especially be leaders and representatives of the working classes would be men of the same type and calibre as the present ones—a hope we do not reciprocate—and his opinion that the future prosperity of this country hinges upon technical education: if this indeed be so, we may consider ourselves damned. The chairman (J. M. Jack) followed with a short speech, declaring the Congress open. He alluded to the trade depression, saying it was still the same cry, "trade depressed, and thousands of working men in the streets, with the words ringing in their ears, 'No hands required!'" but nevertheless this fact has not prompted him to ponder deeply on the causes at work producing this, for his programme of remedies was a ridiculously meagre one. He concluded by expressing his hope that there might go forth from that Congress a movement that would tend to remove many of the evils from which they now suffered, and "in God's good time" bring "comfort and happiness to many of the homes of the inhabitants of these islands." The election of officers followed, W. Bevan, chairman of the Swansea Trades' Council, being appointed chairman; and that matter concluded, F. Maddison, the president of last year, raised the question of the South Wales Daily News (with the view, we must suppose, of excluding its reporter), which he described as a "rat shop," paying less than union prices. However, the Congress had not pluck enough to take the matter in hand; and C. J. Drummond, secretary of the Standing Orders Committee, wrote something very like an apology to the News for the action of the delegates; but this unexpectedly getting into print the next morning, he had to make an endeavour to square matters.

Then came the Parliamentary Committee's report. This report, although a feature of the Congress, is always mainly of a humdrum character, dealing as it does with matters of detail; and this year the Committee's remarks are weaker, and exhibit less signs of a real grip of the situation, even than last year. They refer to the lack of employment, but "so far as they are aware," say they, "there has been no general attempt to reduce the rate of wages in any part of the country." I do not know what construction the committee may put on the word "general," but it seems to me that even by referring to the limited space the Commonweal is able to give to the "Labour Struggle" every week they might find sufficient evidence to "give them pause." "One of the chief causes of the want of employment," they declare, "is the tremendous development of the power of production," without seeming to know that they have thereby furnished a text which, logically investigated, would point to the break up of the monopoly in the means of production and distribution as the only remedy for a state of affairs in which want of bread goes hand in hand with increased power of production. No; "it has a tendency to produce lessened profits," is all they see. Finally, the report tells us that there is quite a scrimmage nowadays in Parliament as to who shall ask a question in the interests of labour. We were not aware of this, but we see in it a possible explanation of the reason why the Labour M.P.'s are so often silent when they should be alive, and for which, indeed, they were taken to task at the Hull Congress. At the conclusion of the report, the Congress passed a vigorous resolution against the Government for suppressing the Ennis meeting. C. J. Drummond opposed this,—hard to say why; not on account of its interrupting the proceedings, for a few minutes afterwards he went off "as quiet as a lamb" to the mayor's luncheon, notwithstanding two Scotch delegates proposed they should proceed with the business.

The president's address began the second day's sitting, and proved to be at least equal to its predecessors—a thoughtful, wide-viewed, and withal a fighting address, which should give much hope to the Socialist. Mr. Bevan began by a reference to the depressed condition of labour, and speaking of the report of the Royal Commission on the depression, he said: "While clearly perceiving the contradiction of poorly-paid labour and ever-increasing wealth, it is afraid to speak out and condemn the present system of society, which gives the riches of toil to those who do not produce." After a reference to the disorganisation of labour brought about by improved machinery, and a remark that shoddy goods and jerry building have been too much appreciated of late years, he went on to advocate the formation of a powerful and distinct labour party; "organised and unorganised labour unite in the belief that the ordinary political parties are useless to secure the industrial emancipation"; "everywhere is heard expressions showing how the faith of the people in the present governing classes has utterly failed"; and he declared that the labour electoral associations had struck the right chord in throwing open their membership to unionist and non-unionist, skilled and unskilled—"if the labour movement is divided into hostile camps, skilled labour on the one side and unskilled on the other, then assuredly the labour cause is irreparably damaged, and energy and time are but thrown away." He sees that it is a critical period for trades' unions—"year by year they are being more keenly pressed upon by the increasing ranks of the unemployed"—and that they must take a prominent part in making a national labour party; "this labour movement is the inevitable outcome of the present condition of labour and capital." The emigration cry, which found favour with a few at the Hull Congress, got no sympathy from him, and he echoed the Socialist when he said "those who should emigrate should be those who 'toil not, neither do they spin,' and who have accumulated large fortunes and look on with comparative ease on the misery of those around them." English and Continental workmen must co-operate; "the march of commerce and the discoveries of science are fast breaking down the barriers of mountains and seas; and through misunderstandings and divisions the workmen of Great Britain and the Continent are used as instruments wherewith to injure each other."

"The forces of capital never sleep; they know no nationality, and are devoid of humanitarian sympathies. It is to its interests to divide the forces of labour, to bring about estrangement, and hence we have those bogey press pictures of Continental Socialism, and that profusion of interested advice from capitalist sources to eschew the foreigner and all his snares. Gentlemen, Socialism has lost its terrors for us. We recognise our most serious evils in the unrestrained, unscrupulous, and remorseless forces of capital."

Referring to the eight hours movement, he declared "we must have it"; and discussing the means of getting it, and the extent to which it should apply, he said:

"It is natural that trades' unionists should look back with pride as they think of the victories won; but the glories of the past do not solve the difficulties of the future. The relative strength of trades' unions to the population was much greater when the nine hours were obtained than it is to-day. The growth of the population, the increasing power of labour-saving machinery, and the greater pressure of foreign competition, with the stagnation of trade, are all elements working for capital and against organised labour. Outside our trades' unions there are vast masses of humanity who would be compelled by the want of food to slip into the places vacated by the unionists who might strike for eight hours. Nay, take any given trade organisation during the most prosperous times, and we find a large number on the out-of-work fund. But if we take years of depression, the number of unemployed in the trade societies is an alarming and dangerous fact. So great is the financial strain upon the unions from out-of-work payments alone that it is now impossible for our organisations to obtain the funds to successfully fight for an eight hours working day. But even if they succeed, it would be a long and costly and wearying struggle, at the end of which large masses of workpeople would be left outside its operations. An eight hours' movement must apply to all, must be national. By this means alone can the hordes of unemployed find work. Our duties as citizens are too great for us to fight this question with a single eye to benefit trades' unions. We are bound by sympathy, by duty, and by a desire to avert impending social catastrophes to get an eight hours' day for all. Parliament must pass an Eight Hours Bill."

Of course the stock cry of "individual liberty" and "freedom of contract" would be hurled at them, but "if individual liberty means allowing a man to starve, or men, women, and children to work under miserable, unhealthy, and degrading conditions, or means the using of the toilers as parts of machinery, to be thrown in the timber-yard when worn out, then 'individual liberty' and 'freedom of contract' are of little benefit to the majority of the people." Finally, he appealed to the delegates "to step forward boldly and fearlessly in the path which is before us, and make it that toil shall not be a hardship, but a working out of national greatness, and of individual elevation, and to bring about such a state of things as to obtain the fulfilment of that grand old prophetic injunction, 'He that will not work neither shall he eat.' Our national greatness has been created by the indomitable energy of the people, and that energy is unexhausted. It must be turned from foreign conquests, from class domination and useless enterprises, to the grave dangers surrounding us."

And thus ended an address which, despite its drawbacks here and there, affords gratifying evidence of the growth of the Socialistic spirit in the ranks of organised labour.

After the president's address the Congress took up the discussion on the Parliamentary Committee's report, which brought forth nothing of general interest, and then resolved on the necessity of all persons in charge of steam engines and boilers holding certificates of fitness. The appointment of working men and women as government inspectors was the next subject, and the present system was severely handled and many interesting facts given; a London delegate, speaking of the sweating-system in Spitalfields and Whitechapel, described it as "damnable." The next matter of any importance was a resolution proposing the formation of labour electoral associations all over the country, with the object of returning to Parliament and local government bodies working men who shall directly represent the interests of labour. On this a very long discussion took place, which extended into the third day. Some good speeches were made, notably by Messrs. Threlfall and Maddison, and the scant chance of getting any great benefit from the two orthodox parties was pretty generally recognised. One or two, including Mr. Fenwick, M.P., doubted the possibility of forming a labour party independent of Whig and Tory, but the feeling of Congress was all in favour of it. Then came a scene between Mr. Hardie and Mr. Broadhurst, which concluded the day's proceedings. Mr. Hardie is a pugnacious Scot, who gives token of being a useful factor at these congresses, and he made some reference to Broadhurst and the Labour M.P.'s supporting Mr. Jas. Hill's candidature at Brixton and Mr. Brunner at Northwich,—both capitalists with an evil reputation. This irreverent way of treating their saint roused one or two to white-heat, and then Mr. Broadhurst gathered himself together to "crush" his opponent. Who was Mr. Hardie? how long had he sacrificed his life to trades' unionism? he did not remember him taking part in the great struggle fifty years back; and when Mr. Hardie informed him that he (Hardie) was not born then, in order to exhibit his talent in buffoonery Mr. Broadhurst commuted the fifty to ten, and remarked that Mr. Hardie was an exceedingly forward individual at that age. And so it went on, until Mr. Broadhurst had exhausted his vocabulary and cooled down. "Irascible," one newspaper styles his speech. Yea, verily!

When a physical bully tyrannises and assails the personal rights of a weak and sickly person, sympathy condemns the action, but when an intellectual giant, trained in the knowledge of business and the law, takes advantage of the humble, inexperienced, and frequently far more honest person, it is called a shrewd business transaction or business sagacity.—Colorado Farmer.

JAPAN.—Consular reports just issued tell us that the industrial revolution is very rapidly taking place in Japan. The "Grande Industrie" may be said now to be fairly established. The Japanese have 21 spinning factories, and are supplying the home demand to a great extent; native capitalists are beginning to look for new markets, and probably within the next ten years China will be buying as much cotton from Japan as from Lancashire. Several other industries are being developed in the same manner, so that in the near future we will have to find a new place to shoot our shoddy—or have a new battalion added to the unemployed army.—A. THE AMERICAN LABOUR PARTIES.

I.—THE SYRACUSE CONVENTION.

A CONVENTION of labour associations in New York State met at Syracuse on August 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th, which certainly marked an important point in the development of the American labour movement. That movement grows with a rapidity, and changes from one phase to another with such ease and swiftness, that it would be very difficult to give anything like its history. The Knights of Labour was accepted for a time as the best of labour organisations; but no distinction of trades being recognised in that body, and the labour struggles showing the need for such distinction, there was a speedy change. Federated trades' unions became the next move, and in one year 400,000 members seceded from the Knights of Labour in favour of the new method of organisation. The enormous mass of workmen in America, their readiness to organise, and their habit of rushing at new things, makes it impossible to in any way control or mould their movements. The best policy for the Socialists is to go with the labour party through its different phases, steadily preaching the right ideas, but without trying to shape things according to their own ideas too soon. This policy has been pursued, and with great effect.

One hundred and seventy delegates assembled at Syracuse on the 16th.¹ After electing the usual officers and committees, the first matter of importance came to the front. From the outset it was plain that Henry George, Dr. McGlynn, and John McMackin were wire-pulling the affair. A good deal of heat and anger existed among the delegates, and the probable expulsion of the Socialists was the chief matter of conversation. The report of the majority of the Committee on Credentials recommended that the Socialist delegates, in contested seats, should not be allowed to sit. The minority also presented a report sustaining their right to sit, and rebutting the objections raised by the majority. The point against the Socialists was that they were ineligible because they belonged to the Socialistic Labour Party, which was held by the majority to be a political party, and one of the rules of the convention was that no one belonging to any other political party should take part in it. The minority showed that the Socialistic Labour Party was not a political body, and referred to Mr. McMackin, who a short time previously had publicly commended the good work done by the Socialists in the labour movement, and distinctly stated that they were not a political body. The George clique had things all cut and dried, and it was a foregone conclusion that the Socialists would be expelled. George had been only too glad of the Socialist vote and help in his contest for the mayoralty of New York city. At the time of that contest it was understood that George was practically the Socialist nominee; but now George found that Socialists, or Socialist principles rather, were an encumbrance, and he determined to repudiate them. The Socialists were allowed five minutes each to speak in defence of their seats, and very able and eloquent speeches they made—Richard J. Hinton, Block, Hugo Voight, Vrooman, Shevitch, W. H. Autenreith, and Laurence Gronlund. Shevitch was the most notable Socialist orator, but the speech delivered by Gronlund was certainly the most appropriate and effective. As reported in the New York Herald, Gronlund's remarks were very relevant, pointed, and have a tone of dignified combativeness that fully suited the occasion. The speakers pointed out that the Socialists had done their full share of the hard work of the labour movement, that their services in support of George's candidature were considerable, and that in spite of this they had no design to turn the convention entirely their own way. Henry George got some uncomfortably candid remarks thrown at his head. T. B. Wakeman proposed as a compromise that the Socialist delegates be allowed their seats and a half vote. McMackin answered some charges made against him by Wakeman. E. D. Murray spoke up manfully on behalf of the Socialists. By this time the general body of the delegates were regarding the Socialists with much greater favour than before, so George found it necessary to take part in the discussion. He acknowledged—not very generously—the work done by the Socialists, but emphatically insisted that they were an incongruous element, and must be expelled. The platform on which he had formerly united with the Socialists was equal rights and the abolition of monopolies. Now the Socialists wanted to achieve this by a different way to himself (and this constituted their heresy). "Socialists want to take for the use of the State all the instruments of production and machinery of capital, and to regulate the distribution and exchange. I believe that we are working in different ways for the same ultimate end; but so far as they want to go one way and I another, then it is far better that each body should act for itself than remain united in a party in which there will be mutual wrangling and recriminations that will bring weakness." This is very good, but it gives no more reason for the Socialists leaving the convention than for the Georgites leaving it. George says that both parties were working for the same end, and working peaceably together until a dispute arose as to the practical way of achieving that end. It became evident that two distinct parties were forming, and the duty of the convention was to discuss these two positions, and decide which was right, or the best for the time. Instead of such a discussion taking place, and Socialism as a political policy being contrasted with George's views, George organises a clique and expels the people he differs from. Of course if Socialism itself, instead of the expulsion of the Socialists, had been discussed, the Socialists would have been a minority all the same, and they would have had to split the party and retire; but then the proceedings would have been fairly conducted, and the mass of the delegates would have known what they were about. Many of them did not understand Socialism, and wanted to hear it debated. Others did not understand, and denounced it off-hand in their ignorance; as, for instance, one delegate was indignant because he thought that under Socialism his coat would be given to the general community for common use. Dr. McGlynn was equally intelligent on the subject, and argued that the convention was bound by the circular calling it. The gross absurdity of this contention must be clear to everybody. Here is the case: a labour candidate (H. George) is put forward for office; his election contest is conducted by Socialists and general Labour Party men; a good fight is made, and it is determined to summon a labour convention and form a great political party; a circular is issued in which the platform of the candidate is mentioned, and the convention comes together. Such a convention when called should surely have power to do what it likes; instead of that up gets George and McGlynn, and they inform the delegates that the circular or postcard is the law and all the commandments, and woe betide them if they presume to question the statement. On a division 54 voted for retaining the Socialists, and 94 against. Several of the George men thought the announcement of the result a fitting time to indulge in sneers and insults against the Socialist delegates. The discussion was as disgraceful as the decision was unwarranted. Several of those who abused Socialism were in the most profound ignorance of its principles. Whatever George said was loudly cheered, and when Dr. McGlynn got up, as he invariably did, and said the same thing over again, he was cheered louder.

After the expulsion of the Socialist delegates the remainder of the convention became a mere machine. There was considerable wrangling over the election of officers, but when the resolutions and statement of principles were brought in from the committee they were passed without a word of discussion. A good deal of downright rowdiness prevailed, and the most pointed insults were taken in the quietest fashion. Here is an example. "Several delegates sprang to their feet, and one said, 'I tuk the flure fust.' . . . Chairman (recognizing this delegate): 'Gentleman from New York has the floor.' . . . Delegate: 'I'm not from New York. I'm from Albany.' . . . A Voice: 'You are a cushion! Sit down!'" The cushion from Albany collapsed after this dignified rebuke, and was no more heard of. It seems that some American working men are as low as British members of Parliament.

The worst feature of the speeches was the petty nationalism. Every delegate who wanted to make a speech, and knew nothing worth saying, had only to pompously declare "I come here as an American," and was at once greeted with loud and prolonged cheers. Even the chairman, McMackin, in patting the Socialists on the back (after helping to kick them down stairs), said, "In order to emancipate the working class in America we must do it as Americans, and on American principles." It is discouraging to find that American working men indulge in the debasing jingo sentiment that was supposed to belong exclusively to monarchies and empires.

In my next I shall deal with the principles and policy of the George party.

NORFOLK NOTES.

THE agricultural labourers of Norfolk have to suffer a further reduction in wages. A wife and family can be but barely kept alive on 11s. a-week, but even this sum is considered too much, and is being reduced to 10s. The harvest wage has also fallen from £7 to £5, 15s.

The prices realised by grain crops are lower than ever. A farmer reckons that prices averaging from 40s. to 45s. for two comb (one of wheat and one of barley) will enable him to live. This year the prices only average 14s. the comb; and so the labourer must suffer.

A meeting was held in Norwich a few days ago to form a branch of the National Association for the Preservation of Agriculture. A few well-paid middle-class men, speculating as to how their profits may be kept up, is always a humorous scene, nor was this any exception. The cool impudence with which such men always try to persuade themselves of their own philanthropic motives, and to persuade the workers that their interests are identical with those of their plunderers, was finely shown. "If you destroy the landlord you will crush the labourer too," said one of them. "Therefore," was the inference we might draw from this, "in looking after our own profits we are saving the labourer from ruin. Therefore we are genuine and disinterested philanthropists, Let the ignorant workers thank heaven that we are providentially here to save them from the schemes of Socialists and such designing men, who only seek their own interest. Of course, our interest only comes in accidentally, and we only seek it because it is bound up in our wider aim, the good of the workers." Good Lord, what humbug!

Is it not rather the existence of the landlord and such thieves that crushes the labourer?

Some of our best meetings here are those we hold at the factory gates as the men come out. Will other branches follow suit? Local examples that appeal more personally to the men than any others can be more easily drawn and applied.

Our comrade Mowbray is to be released from Ipswich prison this day (Saturday) four weeks.

THE CURSE OF CIVILISATION.

Now we have just been supposing a case of an individual with whom the specific evils of mediæval society were actually operative. But it must be borne in mind that the balance of probabilities against any particular individual being affected by any of them was probably almost, if not quite, as great as against any given individual in the present day being killed in a railway accident, blown up in an explosion, drowned in an over-insured unseaworthy ship, run over on a London crossing, crushed in a panic at a public building, thrown on the streets to starve by reason of a new invention, etc., etc. One or other of these disasters peculiar to modern life is chronicled every day in the newspapers, and often several the same day, yet the apprehension of them (with the exception of the last-mentioned) does not seriously affect the happiness of the modern man, with all his instability of nerve. How much less, then, must the fear of being killed in battle or by robbers or by pestilence have disturbed the equanimity of the mediæval baron, peasant, or citizen, with his iron nerves and powerful frame?

By far the most powerful popular indictment of mediæval society in favour of civilisation is that of Mr. Owen Polke. In his 'History of Crime in England' Mr. Polke has taken a single year—1349—and carefully and laboriously collected all the cases of private wars, forcible entry, highway robbery, etc., etc., he could find in the official records as having taken place throughout England in that year. He has certainly done his best to paint the Middle Ages as black as possible; yet after reading his catalogue of crime, spread over a whole year and distributed over the whole of England, one rises with the feeling of an anti-climax. The chief thing that strikes one about mediæval crime is not so much its amount as the brutal frankness, the undisguised straightforwardness, of it. On the whole, the most unfavourable presentment of mediæval conditions will, we think, confirm what we have just said, in the mind of every candid reader—namely, that the chances of their evils affecting any given person or even locality was, to say the least, not so very much greater than the chances of any given person or locality being affected by the other and often quite as great, if more commonplace, evils peculiar to modern life. Men were at least robust and healthy for the most part until they were cut off by famine, war, or pestilence. They were not harassed by the dread of loss of employment and starvation, or by the horror of their children being left without means of subsistence. If no one else did, the Church would always care for them. But here again, the sensational, exceptional evils of mediæval life are so much more dramatic, appeal to the imagination so much more than the commonplaces of stunted growth, deficiency of vital power, trade depressions, strikes and lock-outs, that in a general estimate of the respective periods the one is taken prominently, perhaps exaggeratedly, into account, while the other is left altogether unnoticed.

Let us now take that portion of the indictment of more primitive society—again taking the Middle Ages as its type—which refers to the absence of change, variety, comfort in life; and in this we will take as an example the subject of locomotion. "Steam" is pre-eminently the material symbol of modern civilisation, and its advocate invariably adduces the blessings of free intercourse and locomotion as against the restricted communication of earlier ages as a convincing argument, not merely of the greater capacity of acquiring wealth, but of the greater possibilities of happiness for the individual by the facilities for change, intercourse, and education which modern times afford. Now there can be no doubt that "steam" has afforded the means of travelling longer distances for a vastly greater number of persons than have ever been able to travel before. But have our tours round the world or to the most distant countries for the comparatively well-to-do persons who have a few weeks, or even in some cases a few days, to spare, or our day-trips to distant parts of the same country for the less well-to-do who have only a few hours,—have these things really or only apparently increased the possibilities of change of scene and ideas and the education thence resulting, as against those supplied by the restricted communication of former days? I am convinced the distinction is merely in appearance, and that the change of ideas derived from a visit to a foreign country to-day is very little more than would have been derived from a visit to another county in the Middle Ages.

The reason is obvious. Where the steam-engine has penetrated, the bourgeois civilisation which it represents, with the uniformity of condition which specially characterises that civilisation, has penetrated also. Everywhere that the steam-engine carries you, it carries along with it the world you intended to leave behind you; the same architecture—the big hotel, the railway station, the cheaply-built house as you find them in London, Paris, or Berlin; the same costume—the shoddy cloth of the "world-market," the Parisian "cut," the "top" or "bowler" hat; the country, as at home, cut up by the railway itself, with its long rows of telegraph posts, its shunting yards, and hideous erections,—in short, everything as like as possible to what it is at home in the heart and centre of civilisation. You open up a conversation with the natives; the old local dialect, with the old local dress, customs, and traditions, have long since fled, and in the quondam peasant you find a clumsy approach to the getting-on townsman.

This is your change, your variety in life, which "steam" has brought you. For none can deny that a railway sooner or later brings all these things in its wake. Is, then, the variety in life, the change of scene, the freshness of intercourse, so much greater here than when every district had its special features; its own hills and dales unscarred by the ubiquitous "navvy"; its own manufactures; its own characteristic architecture; its own homespun costume; its own dialect and mode of expressing its ideas; its own local laws and customs; and its own traditions and legends? Has the modern London bourgeois who occasionally, by the help of Cook, strives to get away from the routine world in which he lives, by a desperate effort and at a considerable expenditure—has he, I ask, so great an advantage over his ancestor of the thirteenth century, who by a stroll into Kent or Surrey on any Church holiday could find himself in a district with an individuality in many respects quite distinct from the one he left? With a great price the modern bourgeois obtains (or tries to obtain) his freedom from the dull monotony of his life; but the mediæval guildsman of London was freeborn. After his day's work he could probably obtain more real change and amusement than the modern "city man" during the whole of his autumn outing.

But if we must confess thus much of the privileged man, the man of means, how does it stand with the poor mechanic, who on his every holiday has to pay the tax of the railway company, and to be stived up in its cattle-boxes, perhaps for three or four hours, to get a breath of fresh air and a glimpse of country, which in earlier ages he could have had, even though he lived in the heart of London, within an hour's walk of his own door? When rurality and variety were comparatively close at hand, there was no need or desire to travel far afield. Now people travel much and have little change; in former ages they travelled less and had more change.

It is clear, therefore, that the pseudo-advantages of civilisation (such as they are) refer, in this case at least, not only to the exceptions of life rather than to its ordinary round, but also to the man of exceptional social advantage, and by no means to the ordinary man,—in other words to the "classes," and not to the "masses." What applies in this case is only typical of the great truth that modern civilisation not only accrues solely to the advantage of a propertied and privileged class, but that that advantage has been gained by an untold loss for the mass of the people.

I have selected locomotion as the type of modern progress, but it would be easy to show that the telegraph, a "cheap" press, etc., although they have changed human life, have been no positive benefit—that as much pleasure was to be had out of the mediæval ballad-singer's version of Robin Hood as out of the modern newspaper or the penny or shilling dreadful.

That the exceptionally circumstanced man, the man of the middle and upper classes, and not the ordinary man, the man of the people, is the chief beneficiary also by many of the reforms whose praises are sung so loudly, is curiously illustrated by the case of the sacredness of the modern statesman or bureaucrat. Time was when a statesman, if he misbehaved himself, ran some risk of losing his head, or if not that, of imprisonment or exile, accompanied by confiscation of property. Now the plutocracy have succeeded in making statecraft a perfectly safe trade for themselves and their satellites, the worst evil that can befall a "man of position" in the country being temporary loss of office. Of course it was altogether barbarous when a member of the leading governmental ring who was suspected of having striven to aggrandise himself (whether in reputation, influence, or material wealth) at the expense of justice and the public he was professing to serve could be arraigned as a criminal! Nowadays, even Opposition journals of the most pronounced character would deprecate with polite horror the bare suggestion of the "honourable gentleman" having been actuated by any but the highest of motives, or being guilty of anything more heinous than an error of judgment. Nevertheless, satisfactory as this arrangement may be in the interests of the governmental industry, and to the wealthy classes who have such a large stake in it, there can be no question that it is both reasonable and just that delegates in whose hand vast powers for weal or woe are vested should be criminally responsible for their "errors of judgment." No man is obliged to accept a position of such responsibility, and no age but the present would have thought of allowing him, having done so, to slink out of the consequences of his misdeeds under the cover of their being due to "error of judgment." But under our present bourgeois régime a statesman is a sacred animal.

What shall we say, then? If the real benefits of modern life, considered in themselves, concern mainly its exceptions and not its ordinary round, and have been for the most part achieved at the expense of its ordinary round; if they further mainly benefit an exceptional or privileged class and not the ordinary man, and have been achieved at the expense of the ordinary man,—are we, like Mr. Ruskin, to call ourselves conservatives and to hark back upon an impossible past, while renouncing the present as hopelessly bad? A thousand times No! But let us make no mistake, or confound two distinct standpoints. The fact that, dynamically viewed, modern capitalism, with all that it entails—railways, machinery, squalor—is a good (nay, might be better were it intensified to the fourth power), since it is the necessary condition of the higher social life to follow, must not blind us to the fact that, statically viewed, modern life is in no sense an improvement on the life of past ages. For instance, don't let us delude ourselves with thinking that railways have in themselves contributed an iota to human happiness. In themselves, as I have endeavoured to show, they are an unmitigated evil, without a shred of compensating advantage. Again, the acute evils of earlier ages have indeed gone, but they have gone only to be supplanted by chronic evils in the present. Do not let us make any mistake as to that. In this static sense I call civilisation a curse. I say, let us clearly recognise it as such. And in doing this, one thing there is which will give us cause to take heart of grace: there has been no evil of which mankind has once become conscious as such that mankind has not already half vanquished. The acute dramatic evils of the Middle Ages—insecurity of life and property, feudal trammels and imposts, ecclesiastical abuses—three centuries ago filled the field of human vision. Thinking, forward-looking men saw in the vanquishment of the evils of their upas-tree—effete feudalism, the goal of all human hopes. It steadily and surely withered, and now it is long since first its place knew it no more. The evils they saw were vanquished, with what results we now know. We in our turn see a fatal upas-tree, blasting all human aspiration and happiness. The fact that we see it as it is, is an earnest that its destruction is nigh. We need not be discouraged by the immensity or the solidity of the fabric we see standing. How little could it have seemed to the man of the sixth century, with all the outer forms of Roman life around him, that the Roman empire was a thing of the past and that a new world was on the point of growing up to take its place; how little to the careless man of the sixteenth, with all the superficial signs of a mediæval civilisation standing, that the era of lord and vassal, knight and squire, was past and a world in which the time-honoured symbols, relations, and conceptions of the Middle Ages would be meaningless was fast arising. Much as he might have desired this, it must have seemed impossible to him. So with the Socialist to-day. He sees the great curse, bourgeois civilisation, around him on all sides. The one hope which fills the whole horizon of his vision is the destruction of that curse. The strength of that hope within him is the streak of light denoting the coming of the day.

E. BELFORD BAX.

"The noblest fruit that the earth holds up to her Maker is a man," says the Talmud. But what kind of a man should he be? Surely not one with pinched frame and ill-developed intellect. Surely not such men as our hell-invented, supply and demand, industrial system is calculated to produce. Surely not men whose lives have been an "unceasing agony for bread," and who have never found time to do anything but only keep themselves alive and reproduce their kind. Surely these men should be something more than worn out machines for producing wealth, for which the lords of creation have no further use.—Canada Labour Reformer.

SOCIALIST CO-OPERATION.

[TO THE EDITOR.]

SIR,—Socialism has been thought about and very much talked about for some good while. It has yet to be brought about. Practice is the test of theory. The time is ripe to apply the test to Socialism. We have only to begin. Society is being permeated with the idea of Co-operation as the antidote to the poison of Capitalistic competitive production and distribution. Co-operation is rapidly becoming a power, and Socialists least of all can afford to ignore it. It will either bring about Socialism or sweep it back for generations. Some progress has been made on the Continent, especially in Belgium, in harnessing Co-operative distribution and production to the chariot of Socialism. In this country, the birth-place of Co-operation, and where it is making the greatest advances, Socialism has done nothing really practical. The Rochdale Pioneers began with 28 members and £28 capital. A vast and profitable enterprise has grown from that small beginning. Surely there are enough Socialists now in this country who by putting their shoulders to the wheel could start a sound Co-operative Society under better auspices than the 28 poor working men of Rochdale, when they began without experience and with such a minimum of capital! At all events some Socialists mean to try.

It is intended to make, if possible, a start this winter on a small but well-considered scale in the direction of Co-operation on Socialist lines. With this view a scheme will be brought forward on the 21st of the present month. Mr. E. C. Varley, who is not only a Socialist but has had special experience of Co-operative work, will lecture on "Co-operation," on Wednesday the 21st inst., at 8.30 p.m., at Farringdon Hall, 13, Farringdon Road, E.C. It is earnestly desired that Socialists, to whatever body they belong, should attend at the time stated. There is nothing in Co-operation on Socialist lines which should divide Socialists. On the contrary, as both political and non-political Socialists require to be fed and clothed and housed and luxuriated, they have ground for common action. Co-operation is a necessity of Socialism. By this I mean Co-operation in its widest sense.

Let us now consider wherein Socialist Co-operation differs from Capitalistic Co-operation. This latter is becoming a power, which will undoubtedly prove as great, indeed a greater, danger to Socialism by the creation of a large number of small capitalists doing no work but living on interest and dividends, than even by the creation of a peasant proprietary in regard to the land question. And that would be no slight danger.

Now the bed-rock of Socialism is equity. On this rock will be built the great Church of Humanity, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. The fundamental difference, therefore, between Socialist and Capitalistic Co-operation stands firm. Interest and dividends to non-workers are unjust exactions from the workers. We have thus a sure test to enable us to decide whether the present Co-operative movement is really Socialistic. It has a semblance of equity when compared with the monstrous iniquities of Competitive Individualism. But its real tendency, unless controlled by true Socialism, will be to lead us back to the flesh-pots of Egypt—and bondage. The tendency of the present Co-operative movement, whether carried on under the Rochdale system or that adopted by the Civil Service Stores, is to create a multitude of small individual capitalists exploiting their fellows, and sometimes tyrannising over them. Now the root-evil in these two systems is the same, viz., that capital is considered to be entitled to interest. But interest is only usury writ large—payment for use. In an article in the Practical Socialist, entitled "Rent, Interest, and Profit," written some time back, I showed that interest for use of money might be practically abolished by passing an enactment making it non-recoverable at law, treating it as gambling debts and such misnamed debts of honour. All that capital is entitled to is replacement and maintenance where necessary. Socialists, therefore, could not consistently allow interest to be taken by those who advanced the capital for co-operative work. The shareholders who did no work beyond advancing the capital would be entitled to the best security which could be had according to the circumstances, that their capital would be returned to them. This is a business detail which all non-takers of interest have to settle quite as much as those who take interest. The only thing is that under Socialism the greater the risk, the greater must be, not the interest, but the security.

D. C. DALLAS.

(To be concluded.)

[Note.—Socialism of course includes real co-operation. As to the partial co-operation which alone is possible while the present monopolist system lasts, it may well be used by Socialists for subsistence purposes as other forms of joint-stockery might be, but it ought to be well understood that it is not real co-operation, which is only possible as a part of Socialism.—EDITOR.]

MY AIM.

I LIVE for those who love me,
For those who know me true,
For the heavens that bend above me,
And the good that I can do;
For the cause that needs assistance,
For the wrongs that lack resistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that I can do.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

The fustian cutters' trade at Warrington is in a worse state than it has been for three years. This week several shops are closed.

The miners employed by the Elswick Colliery Co., Newcastle, have struck against the reduction of 6½ per cent. in their wages.

The boiler-makers and iron ship-builders employed by Messrs. R. Hal and Co., Aberdeen, have come out on strike in consequence of being refused 1s. extra per day above time wages for repair work. In the meantime only a limited number of men are affected by the strike.

A conference of miners of England, Wales and Scotland is to be held in Edinburgh on the second Tuesday in October to consider the question of restricting the output and the expediency of federating the various Unions in the three countries.

In the Rhondda Valley, the whole of the miners engaged at the Tredegar collieries have struck work in consequence of a dispute with the employers in reference to tonnage and price of coal. A board of arbitration has been appointed, but no settlement has been arrived at. The steel workers in the adjoining valley have received notices of a reduction in wages, which they have decided to oppose. An extensive strike is therefore not improbable.

The nail-makers of the South Staffordshire and East Worcestershire districts came out on strike on Monday. The men state that they are not asking for a wage which will enable them to lay money by, or provide for the future, but only for enough to keep body and soul together. Several employers are of opinion that an advance should be conceded, and efforts will be made to avert a prolonged strike. About 15,000 operatives are affected.

The chain-makers of Cradley Heath are still making great efforts to better their condition. At a great meeting held during the week, a resolution was passed, protesting against the employment of females in the chain-trade. The Trades Union Congress was also requested to petition the House of Commons to appoint a Commission to visit the district. Great distress still exists in the locality owing to the want of employment, and the low rate of wages paid when work is obtained.

AUXILIARY POSTMEN'S GRIEVANCES.—Mr. Raikes, the Postmaster-General, has replied to the memorial of the auxiliary postmen of the metropolitan district, asking for better pay and longer holidays without deduction of wages. He states that it is his intention to discontinue the employment of auxiliaries on full time, and to offer the men fresh engagements on different terms. As to those who were not on full time, he could hold out no hope that the privileges of the permanent service men would be extended to them.

With reference to the recent strike on the Midland Railway, it is reported that the places of the strikers being now filled up, the company are discharging those men who took an active part in the agitation which led up to the strike. This action of the company is being much commented on, many of the men having returned to work in perfect good faith that their services would be retained permanently. The Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants is, however, quite powerless, large numbers of competent men being available who are not members of it.

The joiners, who last week turned out on strike from the Elswick shipyard of Sir W. G. Armstrong, Mitchell & Co., have resolved to hold out until a satisfactory solution of the question is arrived at. The men are congratulating themselves on the fact that there never was such unanimity of feeling among the members of their association upon any point as in the present case. The cause of this dispute is that for some time past it has been usual for carpenters to place the heavy woodwork of ships in position, and for joiners to finish it off. The latter complain that, owing to iron being now largely used in shipbuilding, they have less work than formerly, and that carpenters are given joiner's work. As the company declined to interfere in the matter, the whole of the joiners at once turned out.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—On the recommendation of the General Committee of Management of the Iron Trades Employers' Association the Bolton masters have made the men a final offer of "open arbitration upon the wages question only." The employers propose that each side should prepare a list of four names from which the other should select an arbitrator, the two arbitrators to appoint an umpire, and with him to decide on the nature of the evidence to be admitted. It is reported that the men will refuse any terms of settlement which do not include the discharge of the men now occupying their places, as otherwise, even if they gained their point, a large number of them would be permanently thrown out of employment. On the other hand it is stated that this is a final offer on the part of the employers, and that if it is not accepted vigorous measures will be taken to dispense altogether with the services of the men on strike. At a mass meeting, after a prolonged discussion, it was decided to accept the employers' proposal, the majority in favour being 185.

COTTON OPERATIVES' DISPUTES.—The strike at Nott Street Mill, Blackburn, continues. The majority of the weavers who struck work some time ago at Messrs. Bracewell's sheds, Barnoldswick, still remain out, but their places are gradually being taken by new hands. The engines of the new weaving shed at Grindstonehurst, near Colne, were "christened" on Saturday last. The shed will contain 1,040 looms, 700 of which have been let to Messrs. R. Riley and Co.—The spinners employed by Messrs. Joshua Crook and Sons, Bolton, have resumed work after being on strike a week. The cause of complaint, namely, the rate of wages to be paid for certain counts, is to be left unreservedly in the hands of a committee from the Operatives' Association and a committee from the Employers' Association. The men will work for four weeks at the present rate of wages, pending the decision of the committees.—At Blackburn, the weavers, who recently struck work at Messrs. D. and W. Taylor's mills, have gone back to their employment, the employers having promised to abate the amount of steam sent into the shed—the cause of the strike. As complaints on this score are stated to be pretty general in other mills the result of this strike will no doubt affect them.—On Thursday, the spinners employed at the Hippings Vale Mill, Oswaldtwistle, struck work through a wages dispute, and the mill is now closed. The spinners wish to be paid by the indicator system, and the company want to pay by weight. The mill contains 80,000 spindles, and about 200 hands are now idle.—The notices of the hands to leave work at Fir Trees Mill, Higham, expired on Thursday, and the weavers left the premises as they finished their beams. The weavers propose to accept 4 per cent. off the Blackburn list, and the masters propose to accept 2½ per cent. off the Burnley list. The matter is still unsettled.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

ITALY.

L'Emancipazione (Rome), in a recent number, expresses much indignation at the fête-giving mania which has taken possession of most Italian municipalities, very rightly complaining of the costly waste of all the "welcomes" given to cousins, uncles, aunts of royalty, or local celebrities which make so sorry contrast with the poverty and almost famine that afflicts most of the provinces of the kingdom. Exhibitions, festivals, and inaugurations are good in a jovial and flourishing land, but to those who stand trembling with hunger and disease glancing up at newly-built palaces, or watching electric lights and spurning fireworks, certain thoughts will at last rise in their minds; mild thoughts perhaps of spacious buildings utilised differently, angry thoughts perhaps of artificial fire put to another purpose, and thus it will be found that the time-honoured move of "bread and circuses" is at last out of date and no longer works successfully.

SICILY.—A mining crisis in Sicily has been imminent for several months past, says the Fascio; the cholera troubles still to the fore, things must be pleasant for the Sicilians. Some 400 men of the sulphur mines are in a state of tumult, and demand bread for their families. The Syndic and sleek bourgeoisie that infest the country-side reply that they don't know what to do for them, but they will endeavour to help them with a little alms-giving. A charity-monger is a desolation and a thing of dread indeed!

L'Emancipazione publishes a programme for a Provisional Government for the "transitional period," the principal points of which are a Representative Assembly for general legislation and municipalities for communal administration. We seem to be "where we were before" when we have got this novelty.

Il Lavoratore (an Anarchist-Communist Society) sends us the prospectus of their organ, Il Demolitore, the first number of which be shortly forthcoming. To judge from the manifesto, the style of this new weekly will be sombre and earnest in the extreme; to criticise social sores and sound the trumpet of rebellion being "all" it proposes to do. While wishing all success to any new revolutionary journal, we cannot help thinking that the energy well spent in bringing so many forth, would be yet better spent on sustaining and strengthening those already in the field. M. M.

La Lotta (The Struggle), which had been obliged to stop its publication, has made its re-appearance. It is an Anarchist paper, very ably written by young artisans, who well deserve to be supported because they work under very hard circumstances.

At Naples, a new Communist-Anarchist organ, Il Demolitore (The Destroyer), will be issued on the 15th inst. We hope that it will be of the same standard as Humanitas, also published in that town.

GERMANY.

At Dortmund, fifty Socialists have been arrested last Sunday, in consequence of a small riot arising from provocation on the part of the police. Last week, there was scarcely one town of middling importance in Germany where at least one Socialist was not arrested. It would be quite impossible for us to even mention all these captures of "dangerous" people.

Frohme, the Socialist deputy in the Reichstag, has been expelled from Frankfurt. He has taken up his residence at Hanover, where he was born.

One of the forerunners of Communism in Germany and Switzerland, W. Weitling, born at Magdeburg in 1803, died lately at his farmhouse in America (Illinois). He was one of the founders of the "Communist Working-men's Club" of London, together with Marx, Engels, and others. After having undergone a term of fifteen months' imprisonment at Zurich, for the publication of his book, 'The Gospel of the Poor Sinner,' he was expelled from Switzerland and extradited to Germany, where he was again sent to prison. He lived afterwards at Brussels and London, and finally went to America, where he became a farmer. His influence amongst the workers has been very powerful between the years 1840 and 1850.

FRANCE.

The Révolte announces in its last issue that it ceases its publication. We regret exceedingly this resolution of our Parisian friends, the Révolte having been, during eight years and a-half, the best and the most earnest paper among all Anarchist publications. It may be fairly said that the Révolte has been a model of revolutionary journalism, putting far aside all personal questions, which only weaken the strength of parties, and devoting all its efforts to the elucidation of theoretical questions of the most vital importance to the coming social revolution. Men of science, like Elisée Reclus and Kropotkin, not to speak of the other contributors who had also their fair share in the common work, brought the Révolte to a very high standard. But it is to be hoped that another paper, La Révolte, which is to be started at Paris, will follow the traditions of the now extinct organ, and render to the Cause the same services. We wish every success to our new colleague in the hard work of bringing about that social revolution which we are aiming at, and which we hope will be the sublime coronation of our nineteenth century.

At Nizza, a new Anarchist paper has come to light, Lo Schiavo (The Slave), and at Havre another one, entitled L'Idee Ouvrière (The Worker's Idea). Both are weeklies, and we wish them good luck and long life.

AUSTRIA.

The police have suppressed the last issue of the Gleichheit, and of the Brunner Arbeiter Zeitung, two Socialist papers published at Vienna and at Brunn. This kind of police vexation happens regularly once a month, and costs a good deal of money, because the editors have to issue at once a second edition of their paper.

Lectures on the situation of the workers in the ancient and the medieval ages have been prohibited in Vienna! What about the position of the workers in present times, then? Silly men they are, these Viennese magistrates!

HOLLAND.

The Socialists have made several manifestations at the Hague, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, etc., to welcome their friend Domela Nieuwenhuys, on his release from prison. At Amsterdam, the manifestation was of a striking character, more than twenty thousand people covering the immense area of the Plein. All went on in a very quiet and orderly manner. But the bourgeoisie and the mob decided to have their revenge at Rotterdam. On the 7th inst., Nieuwenhuys and several of his Socialist friends arrived in that town in order to attend a reception which had been organised by the workers at the People's Coffee House, their usual place of gathering. A large crowd collected in front of the establishment and prevented our comrades from entering the place, so that the police were compelled to form a cordon in order to enable them to penetrate in the People's House. The rascals, encouraged by the "gentlemen" in the crowd, then commenced throwing stones at the windows and tore down the red flag displayed over the door, afterwards burning it in the square before the police-station. The mob next attempted to force an entrance into the People's Place, and the police had to charge the crowd. But a large number of people succeeded in getting inside the coffee-house, where they behaved like wild beasts, tearing down the Socialist emblems and flags, breaking all the furniture in a word, and doing considerable damage. The Socialists had to defend themselves, as the police "authorities" did very little indeed to protect them. The Dutch papers accuse the police of having rather played the game of the rascals, and we have good reasons to believe that they did there as in fact they are in the habit of doing everywhere. Police, rascality, and gentry in a kindred alliance against Socialists—so it is nearly always, and it has nothing in it to astonish us!

SPAIN.

The Anarchist groups of Barcelona, Gracia, Gervaiso, and Martin de Provençals have commenced the publication of small pamphlets to be sold at twopence. It is a good undertaking, of which we will speak at some length in another issue.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOCIALISTIC LITERATURE.

SIR,—I should like to suggest how the sale of Commonweal and other Socialist literature might be considerably increased. When passing through the various market-places of London on Friday and Saturday evenings (the two nights when the workers have money in their pockets, having received their wages on either of these days), I have often thought that it would be a good plan to have a barrow and board such as costermongers use, with a naphtha lamp to light it up, and to place on it copies of the Commonweal and pamphlets which have been published by the League and other publications propagating Socialist views. In the course of the evening two or three of our comrades would get on a stool at the back of the barrow and introduce the books to the audience, first of all reading a little and then explaining the article or chapter in pamphlet or newspaper. There are hundreds of women out on these evenings who would make purchases and would take them home to their husbands, who would thus have Socialistic truths brought to them in a manner which no other agency could effect. When we consider how much has been done in this way by the Bible-stall people and "cheap-jacks" with light literature, I do not think for a moment that Socialists, who have something far better than either of the above-mentioned vendors to offer the people, need fear the result. On the contrary, I believe that much good might come of it; and I will gladly volunteer to make one of the vendors myself.

W. B. PARKER.

HIS RIGHT PLACE.

In a recent issue, you quote from the Norwich Daylight, "Who would have thought that Mr. Bradlaugh would ever become popular with the Tories!" I must quote the words of Mr. Cunningham Graham (when addressing a meeting at the West Ham Town-hall), who turned round and asked the chairman whether a certain M.P. was a Liberal or Tory, as he, Mr. Cunningham Graham, did not know the difference between them. Now that is really getting the case with myself, what is the difference between a Radical and a Tory? Mr. Bradlaugh is a great advocate for Individuality, or, in other words, an advocate for men to take as much from production as they can possibly get hold of without breaking the law, whether those laws are bad or not does not matter. Does not the Tories advocate the same? The only difference between Tories and Radicals that I can see is, that the Tory's individuality is a little stronger than the Radical's. The Tory says, "Take all you can get; who are the people?" and the Radical says, "Come, come, now don't be too hard; let us make things a little easier, or you will have all these people dying for the want of the goods they produce." "Never mind," says the Tory, "stick to your colours, Individuality!" "Hear! hear!" says the Radical, "but you must not let the people know."

Now I maintain, Mr. Editor, that Tories and Liberals and Radicals are all one, the only difference being that the first is an Individualist who is not ashamed to own it; the second is an Individualist who is almost ashamed to own it; and the third is an Individualist, who by certain little tricks enumerated in the Radical programme, tries to blind us from the fact that he is one of the party. Therefore, the Tories should embrace Charles Bradlaugh as one of their own.

ERNEST RANGER.

SIR,—Mr. Robert Giffen in his recent address to the British Association admitted that it was "highly probable" that the trade of this country during the last ten years had decreased. This he did in a very gruesome fashion, but he was forced to confess that our great industries on all hands supported that view. But says he, "the utmost caution must be used in forming final conclusions." Mr. Giffen seems very unwilling to accept the conclusions which his own figures would seem to warrant when they militate against the rosy views of British society which he champions, and as a last chance he cites the growth of taxation and of population as evident signs of prosperity. It does not seem to occur to the learned professor that he makes his case worse by these latter statements, and that if, as he states, it is "highly probable" that British trade is on the decrease, and population and taxation are on the increase, the latter tendencies only serve to aggravate and heighten the ill-effects of the former; the nett result being that our income is less and our expenses more. Methinks an artizan would think himself scarcely compensated for a lower wage by an addition to his family.

Would you kindly give me the postal address of the Knights of Labour Assembly in Birmingham, and oblige,

ON ATLAS' TOP.

ON Atlas' top how rests this round
Of pride and glitter gold enwound?
How, borne aloft with toil and tears,
Doth ride the world that still outwears
The hands and feet of Labour bound?

With dust of summer highways ground,
Or lost in wintry snows, and found
In chains that frozen custom bears
On Atlas' top.

For you, earth's children, earth-disowned,
With hands of might, but heads uncrowned,
For you, through smoke of toiling years,
Deliverance breaks, in hope new-found,
On Atlas' top!

WALTER CRANE.

THE VOW OF TIPPERARY.

BY THOMAS DAVIS.

(AIR—"The Men of Tipperary.")

FROM Carrick streets to Shannon shore—
From Slabh na m-Ban¹ to Ballindeary—
From Longford Pass to Gaillte Mor—
Come hear the vow of Tipperary.

Too long we fought for Britain's cause,
And of our blood were never chary;
She paid us back with tyrant laws,
And thinned the homes of Tipperary.

Too long with rash and single arm,
The peasant strove to guard his eyrie,
Till Irish blood bedewed each farm,
And Ireland wept for Tipperary.

But never more we'll lift a hand—
We swear by God and Virgin Mary!—
Except in war for native land;
And that's the Vow of Tipperary!

[The events of last Friday lend renewed interest to the above poem, reprinted from the Nation.—H. H. S.]

REPORTS.

BLOOMSBURY.—On Thursday last, G. Bernard Shaw gave an interesting lecture on "Wages," which provoked some inquiry but little discussion. On Sunday, at St. Pancras Arches, very good meeting. Resolution moved Bartlett, seconded Dalziel, supported Wardle and Donald: "That this meeting protests against the manner in which the Irish people are being treated by the British government, and considers that the two deaths which occurred at Mitchelstown are judicial murders perpetrated by the Government." Resolution carried with acclamation. Good sale of Commonweal. At the Polygon, most attentive audience listened on Monday last with great interest to the speakers Wardle, Bartlett, and Dalziel.

CLERKENWELL.—Wednesday and Sunday meetings held as notified in last weeks paper. Commonweal and pamphlets have steady sale.—A. T. and W. B.

HACKNEY.—James Allman and H. Graham spoke at the Broadway, London Fields, last Wednesday evening. On Sunday evening, an excellent meeting at Warner Place, Hackney Road, addressed by H. Graham.—G. C.

NORTH LONDON.—Meeting at Ossulton Street on Tuesday. Speakers, Cantwell, Dalziel, and Turner. Annoyed by emissaries of the Primrose League, but well supported by audience. Regent's Park on Sunday morning, good meeting addressed by J. J. Allman. Turner replied to criticism, evoking applause. Collected 5s. 6d. for propaganda.—C.

GLASGOW.—On Saturday afternoon, Glasier and Downie spoke to a good audience on Jail Square. On Sunday forenoon another good meeting was held at the same place, Glasier and Paterson being the speakers. In the afternoon, very successful meetings were held at Paisley Road Toll and Jail Square, Glasier, Downie, Bullock, and Torley (S.D.F.) being the speakers. Good sale of Commonweal, and 7s. 8d. collected for the Broxburn miners.—A. M.K.

We had good meetings in the City, finishing up with a lecture in the Gordon Hall by Wade, on the "Religion of Socialism." NOTTINGHAM SECTION (SOCIALIST UNION).—At the meeting on Sunday in the club room, a resolution was passed unanimously that we form a branch of the Socialist League.—A. M. C.

WOOLWICH.—Last Sunday, Donald and Banner spoke at Arsenal Gates to splendid audience, which stood through a heavy fall of rain, and for nearly two hours listened to addresses on "Socialism and the Irish Question." Donald moved a resolution "condemning the policy of the government in Ireland and the miscreants responsible for the massacres at Mitchelstown," which was seconded by one of our Radical friends, who delivered a telling speech, and appealed to those in the crowd who were Socialists to join the Socialist League which is being organised in Woolwich. When we put the resolution to the meeting every hand in the crowd, some 700 or 800, was held up, and not a single opponent could be got to protest against the motion. At the close of the meeting 16 names were given in to form a branch, 5s. 1d. was collected for propaganda, and nearly 12s. worth of literature sold.—R. B.

SOUTH WALES PROPAGANDA.

Readers of the Commonweal have noticed a few weeks back the extremely interesting and promising report given in these columns of the work done by Kitz and Mainwaring. It is imperative, if the work is to be of permanent benefit, that other speakers be sent at once. The Strike Committee has exhausted its funds in the carrying on of the extra work necessitated by the late strikes, etc., and now appeals urgently for the necessary "sinews of war." Those upon the spot who wish speakers to come down, and all those anywhere who are willing to help, are asked to send in contributions to the Treasurer of the Strike Committee, 13, Farringdon Road, E.C.

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

NOTES ON NEWS.

The present example of the sickening conventionality, called a Queen's Speech, is a fine specimen of its loathsome kind, but there is nothing in it to surprise anyone. Its framers are, of course, bound to praise themselves, whatever crimes or blunders they may have committed, but that people should tamely bear such a ridiculous and preposterous piece of nonsense is a sign, if but a small one, of the rottenness of the society we live in, and a token of the baleful officialism of our dead-dog constitutional monarchy, that finds it useful to have a cloak behind which to shelter its misdeeds; even when it is a cloak that would be openly laughed at but for the cant that guards English bourgeoisdom from every breath of common sense.

Mr. Balfour's speech on the Mitchelstown massacre is accepted as meaning an endorsement of the murderous conduct of the police; that was all that we wanted to know of him. His tu quoque to Sir William Harcourt was as effective as you please in the atmosphere of the House of Commons, but has nothing whatever to do with the question which all honest men are asking: Are you going to govern Ireland by Peterloos? Mr. Balfour answers "Yes, if my colleagues' courage does not collapse." A very big "if" is that. If the age of miracles does not come back on us, the responsibility of Ireland will presently be shifted from the Tories to the Gladstonites, though perhaps the very confidence that most people have in the rapid approach of Home Rule, acting on the habitual laziness of the English people, will yet delay it somewhat.

The feeble forcible government has made another step in Coercion by specially proclaiming the Clare branches of the National League. This will make no difference to the work that body has been doing (except to keep its name before the public), since it will be taken up in another form.

Mr. Cunninghame Graham is to be congratulated on his suspension at the hands of the pantomimic actor who serves the House for Speaker at present; it is the only honour which an honest man who has strayed into that assembly can receive from it.

That political prisoners should be treated in our jails on the same footing as ordinary criminals, is certainly a-piece of English brutality; but I think it is so principally because it is intended for an insult against freedom on the part of the coarse blackguards who govern us. On the other hand, if the political prisoners protest against prison-torture applied to themselves only on the ground that they are high-minded and superior persons, they show their unfitness for citizens, and their fitness for governors. To treat any set of men in the brutality-plus-science manner that prisoners in English jails are treated, degrades the whole nation; not merely the poor devils of warders, jailers, and the semi-military fools of governors, but the whole of society, that in its indomitable cant takes it for granted that here as in other matters England is ahead of the rest of the world, is thoroughly respectable.

Indeed what words can express the baseness of the vicarious cruelty that sets a body of poor wretches of the "lower classes" to do the prison-torture for the behoof of the respectable; and these all the while know perfectly well, if they know nothing else, that their prisons are breeding-places of crime and slaughter-houses of the hope of a return to decent life; and if they choose can know that our English prisons are about the worst in Europe, and a disgrace to humanity. "Am I my brother's keeper?" quoth Cain, and the same sneer is practically the answer which our vile respectability makes to any doubts that may be suggested to it on this matter.

The appeal of the Chicago Anarchists has been rejected; but they have a further appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Our friends, it may be hoped, will remember that the evidence on which they were convicted of the bomb-throwing or complicity with it, was quite worthless; and that the conduct of the police on the occasion was simply an exaggeration of that of the police in the first act of the Mitchelstown tragedy; only the American police used deadly weapons from the first. In spite of all this, it is only too probable that these men who have dared to speak of freedom to the republican people of America, will be sacrificed to that spirit of cold cruelty, heartless and careless at once, which is one of the most noticeable characteristics of American commercialism. W. M.

Jus, the "organ of Individualism," has naturally a fling or two at the Trades' Union Congress because of the "manual labourers" daring to meddle with the concerns of better educated people. "Knowledge is a pre-requisite of sound practical politics"; and all the old truisms are trotted out for the occasion, that are tossed aside when they tell against our ingenuous friends. That workmen should endeavour to combine, and not accept the advice of Individualists and be beaten in detail, is gall and wormwood to the sensitive friends of "individual liberty."

"A crushing and overwhelming blow for the Socialists" administered by Mr. Broadhurst, however, is found by Jus in his dictum that "one of the chief causes of the want of employment is the tremendous development of the power of production"! Both the speaker of this portentous phrase and the commentator thereupon might have heard and read the same truth uttered from many a Socialist paper and platform without seriously harming the Socialists.

"This increase," says Jus, "must be set down to invention and organisation. The significance of this will be apparent to those who reflect. Ay, truly! Socialists wish to carry higher the "invention and organisation" that has produced the increase of wealth, minus the Individualistic exploitation that has produced the un-employment. "Hence these tears!" S.

THE AMERICAN LABOUR PARTIES.

II.—THE GEORGE PARTY.

In stating the "platform" of the George party it will be necessary to boil it down. Among the sins of some American Labour leaders is that they are as roundabout and long-winded as British lawyers. A reprint of the platform of the "United" Labour Party would fill three columns of this paper; but here is the gist of it:—Platform: (1) Abolition of all laws which give judicial, industrial, financial, or political advantages to one class that are not shared by all; (2) repudiate Socialism and land nationalisation; (3) tax all land-values which arise from the growth of society as distinguished from individual exertion; (4) municipalities to supply water, light, and heat; government to issue all money and start a postal telegraph and savings-bank and take over the railways; (5) reduction of the hours of labour, stop employment of children, stop competition of convict with "honest" labour, secure sanitary inspection of houses, factories, and mines, and stop abuse of the conspiracy laws; (6) simplify legal procedure, secret ballot, relieve candidates from election expenses. Resolutions: (1) Calling national labour conference (of those who accept this platform only); (2) widening and deepening the State canals; eight-hour day for letter-carriers; (4) compulsory education of children from 14 to 16, and establishment of free libraries; (4) denouncing the public press and demanding a fair examination of their principles from "the people, the pulpit, and the press"; (5) establishment of a State printing-office; (6) no companies or individuals to employ armed men; (7) no class-legislation; (8) no public grants to private schools, charities, or other institutions; (9) equal civil and political rights to women as to men; (10) Home Rule and the destruction of landlordism in Ireland.

This platform was framed by a small committee, presented by George, and "swallowed" by the convention without the least discussion. The first features that will strike any one who knows George's works will be that free trade is not mentioned and land nationalisation is repudiated. George has not abandoned free trade; he has merely put it up his sleeve. It lurks, but not unseen, in the principle that all taxes are to be abrogated except a land tax, or rather "a tax on land-values." The Irish World, a true and free-minded friend of labour, has already ferreted out this, and predicts that the coming national conference will split on this point. Very likely, and little pity! A party which accepts such a platform as this will only hold together till it finds out the meaning of it—"which is nothing."

Those who thought that Mr. George was preaching the doctrine of the land for the people will now see their mistake a little more clearly. It is no use to turn upon George, as plenty will do, and abuse him for abandoning his principles. He never advocated land nationalisation. He used Socialist sentiment and arguments, he even talked about the land being the property of the community, but his proposition never meant anything more than State appropriation of rent. The land for the people is a Socialist doctrine that can only be put in practice by Socialist methods. The rent for the State is an entirely different thing, and would never put the land to the service of the people at all. Let there be any doubt about this, here are the words of the new platform introduced by George at the Syracuse convention: "What we propose is not the disturbing of any man in his holding or title [!], but . . . to devote to the common use and benefit those values which, arising not from the exertion of the individual but from the growth of society, belong to the community as a whole." This is plain enough. It means the land for the people—who can pay for it. George has found out by experience that an agitation on the land question alone will never make much lasting effect in an industrial country. In England and Scotland a few years ago George made a great stir, raised a storm of enthusiasm and enrolled tens of thousands of members in his Land Restoration League. But in a few months the League collapsed. The really advanced men in it became Socialists, the reactionaries went back to the mere Land Law Reform movement from which they had so timidly emerged. So long as George used Socialist sentiment and semi-Socialist arguments, he was simply recruiting for the Socialist movement. The people, once convinced of the wrong of landlordism, were soon further convinced of the greater wrong of capitalism. Once they got to understand how competition for land enabled the landlord to tax the farmer until all the produce of the soil, except a subsistence for those who worked it and other essential expenses, was stolen in the name of rent, they still more easily understood how competition for employment enabled the capitalist to reduce wages until the wealth-makers had but a bare subsistence also. And when the competition for plots of ground was shown to be caused by the monopoly of land, it was clear also that the competition for work was caused by the monopoly of factories, mines, railways—capital, in short, it was all very fine to argue that the land belonged to the people because God made it and gave it to them; but the Socialist, without questioning any part of this statement, could point out that the capital belonged to the people for a far better reason—because they made it themselves and didn't get it from anybody. "No man made the land." Very good: but no particular man made the capital. It is the result of the labour agencies of generations of men. Capital, at least in its modern form, and really in any form, is only possible where men work in co-operation, and the result of co-operative effort should not be used for private gain. George was never on a clearly-defined basis with his proposals. His profusion (and confusion) of arguments sent some of his disciples further forward than himself, and frightened the rest further back. In his recent change of position he is more muddled than ever. Bits like this occur in his new platform: "The advantages arising from social growth belong to society at large; we aim at the abolition of a system which makes such beneficent inventions as the railroad and telegraph a means for the oppression of the people and the aggrandisement of power"; "the opportunity to employ his labour and the security that he shall enjoy its fruits" is claimed for everybody; "do such things for all as can be better done by organised society than by individuals"; "Municipalities should supply their inhabitants with water, light, and heat,"—and similar statements. But surely a mine shaft, a dock, a line of steamships, a dwelling-house, a bridge, a museum, etc., are just as beneficent inventions as a railroad or a telegraph? If the municipalities are to "supply" (what George means, of course, is that municipal bodies are to organise the production and distribution of these things; he is aware that under all systems of society the working people "supply" everything) water, light, and heat, why not also supply houses, furniture, bread, beer, bibles, and shin-plaster as well? If the municipality is to own and control water and gas works, why not also engineering works, stocking-factories, mines, quarries, churches, and public houses? Once again George's proposal includes only a few things and his argument embraces nearly everything, and once again the people will take his arguments and make their own proposals.

There is some instructive points of resemblance between the American Georgeites and the English Cobdenites, though there is little between George and Cobden. Both movements are, though generally progressive, for the immediate benefit of the capitalist class; both are based on the fallacy that the interests of trade and commerce are the same as the interests of the people; both are looked at with favour by the far-seeing part of the middle class (note how the New York Herald butters up the George party); and both are threatened with a genuine though not maturely developed working-class movement. But Cobden was a man who thoroughly understood his one idea, and was quite conscious of its exclusiveness and relied upon the self-interest of the manufacturing class to carry it through. Though he agitated the people, he did so with middle-class money, and so far from trusting in the people he even scolded John Bright for advocating extension of the franchise. George, on the other hand, states general principles with a recklessness that will one day ruin his party and drive his followers to Socialism. He still further appeals to the people, relies on the people, and wants to put more power in their hands. Further, while Cobden won the support of the middle class for the sake of his proposal itself, George will only get that support, if he gets it at all, for the sake of making his party a shield against the Socialists.

But there is still one point, and the most important one. What Chartism in Britain was to the Free Trade party, so the Socialists of America are to the George party; but with this difference—that the times and surrounding circumstances are changed. It was not the Free Traders that crushed the Chartists, though they tried hard. Chartistism was unable to live because the movement was premature and capitalism had to enter on another phase of its development. However willing George may be, neither he nor any other power can crush Socialism in America now. It is not only that the present Socialists are an able, well-organised, and powerful set of men, but that the vigour of capitalism in America is spent as it is in every country; the times and the conditions demand a change, and the only possible change is to Socialism. If all the Socialists in America were expelled from the continent instead of from the convention, there would be another and a bigger crop spring from the native soil in a few months.

On another occasion, as soon as some expected communications come to hand, I shall deal with the future action of the American Socialist party.

J. L. MAHON.

RIVAL CREEDS.

"BELIEVE or be damned," squealed out an excited street-preacher the other evening as I sauntered homewards. The vehement manner in which this comforting phrase was uttered caused me to slacken pace and pull up to "take stock" of the preacher and the congregation standing around him.

The preacher I discovered to be a local mechanic, whom the wiles of the Salvation Army had recently converted. Before his conversion he had not (according to his own account) comported himself with that moral rectitude he should; but now—thanks to the Salvationists—he was a changed man. He was happy, for he had renounced "the world, the flesh, and the devil," and was exhorting his hearers to do the same.

"Turn thine eyes unto me," he exclaimed, just as I came to a standstill. I did turn "mine eyes"—not "unto" him, however, but on his congregation. A glance round convinced me that I was among a body of people to whom nature had not been kind in any respect. A poor, miserable set of starvelings they were; all possessed of a vacant sort of stare, as though they had been looking all their lives for something they could not find. They did not notice my presence or the intense look I gave them, for the converted painter (for such he was) had so completely fixed their attention that they stood unmindful of all else, drinking in every word he uttered.

The painter pleaded his cause most powerfully; he went delirious and tearful by turns, and thumped and jumped by way of illustrating the change wrought in him since he had received the "truth."

"Here," he exclaimed, all of a sudden, holding out a book, "is eternal life; take it!" The suddenness with which he did this rather startled his audience, who didn't know exactly what he meant for the moment; but it managed to puzzle it out, I suppose, after he had explained the matter by telling it something about faith and souls and spirits.

The character of the gathering quite interested me, and I stood gazing and listening to all going on quite intently. I daresay I should have "stuck" the meeting out, had not an unlooked-for event happened which completely distracted my attention from it, and fixed it on a short, thick-set man, perched on a tall stool about twenty yards off, who was shouting at the top of his voice, and waving his arms about most furiously.

This little man soon drew a large audience, among it the larger part of the painter's; myself, of course, included. The few that remained at the painter's meeting gradually dwindled away, and at last left the painter and the glorious company of his apostles all alone, looking skywards, with hands clasped in pious agony.

But to return to the little man on the tall stool, who from his high perch continued to orate in the most vigorous manner.

"Why," exclaimed he, "in a land overflowing with riches do the people starve? Why do those that labour enjoy not the fruits of their labour? I will tell you," said he, violently shaking his fist; "it is because society is organised solely in the interests of a class of idle loafers, who rob—"

"What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world——" interjected the painter; who, since his audience had become absorbed in that of the man's of small stature, had been hovering about the outskirts of the meeting, interjecting remarks from time to time.

"Yes, that's the sort of blarney we're asked to swallow," said the man on the stool, without allowing the painter to finish his text; and in an exasperated tone he proceeded with his discourse, pointing out how the workers were robbed of the wealth their labours produced. "Look," said he, "at the effect of the depredations of this class upon those that form the bulk of the community! It has condemned them to a life of slavish toil, herded them together in miserable hovels——"

"In my Father's house there are many mansions," called out the painter.

"The person who is continually interrupting me," said the orator, "has completely lost his mental balance; pay no heed to him. The aerial mansions he talks of are but poor substitutes for those built here below by human hands. I know he doesn't think so, but those who are responsible for his present state of mind do; for although they prate of a 'despised Nazarine, who had not where to lay his head,' they take good care to rest their own on the softest pillows."

"For there are none righteous; no, not one," the painter threw in.

"What fools we are to allow these oily-mouthed, canting hypocrites to bamboozle us," went on the orator, regardless of his interrupter; "that they may revel in luxurious idleness, we are compelled to tug incessantly at the oar of labour, and yet, despite it, are hard pressed at times to know where to obtain the morrow's meal—"

"Take no thought for the morrow," exclaimed the painter.

This last utterance of the painter's quite overcame the orator. Red with rage, he screamed out to his interrupter, "Look here; if you've got anything to say, come and say it here. I want opposition!" So saying he rapidly descended from the stool on which he stood.

This challenge to debate was received by the audience with demonstrations of approval, and cries of "Now, then, 'Skibo,'" "Sankey," etc., rent the air.

The painter would have backed out of the challenge if he could, but being detected "hedging" off, he was hustled to the front of the stool, which, after much hesitation, he timidly mounted. Cheers greeted him as he did so. A meek, affecting smile overspread his face, as with bared head and elevated eyes he began to speak. He told his hearers "to hearken not to the voice of the devil, but to bear with fortitude the misery of their lives, for they would surely be recompensed for their sufferings hereafter. That it had been wisely ordained that many should be poor and few rich"; and gradually warming up, he gave vent to a number of disjointed texts, and finally, in a state of nervous perspiration and excitement, quitted the stool with the threat of hell to all unbelievers.

The orator having taken his stand on the stool again, began his reply by saying "That though he differed in every way from the views just expressed by his opponent, yet he believed him, although a mistaken man, to be an earnest one." This, however, was all the sympathy he showed him, for he at once began to ridicule and mercilessly criticise his arguments.

Having finished the task the painter had set him to his own satisfaction, he was proceeding to exhort his hearers to combine together for the purpose of freeing themselves from their oppressors, when, to the great surprise and indignation of everybody, a policeman appeared on the scene and ordered him down.

"I have a duty to perform, and I will do it!" exclaimed the orator.

Loud cheers greeted this utterance, and the constable, noting the hostile attitude of the meeting, at once blew his whistle for assistance, and in a few minutes several of his comrades made their appearance, and drawing their staves charged the crowd indiscriminately. A general fight ensued, during which the orator was knocked off his stool, trod on, and ultimately carried face downwards to the police-station, as were several others—the painter among them—the crowd following the procession hooting and cheering.

Under the heading "Rival Creeds," I learned from the evening paper of the next day that a Salvationist and a Socialist had been charged at the police-court with "riotous conduct," and for this offence had been fined 40s. each, with the alternative of a month's imprisonment.

Both went to prison; and until their term expires the public will hear no more from them of the merits of their respective creeds.

SOCIALIST CO-OPERATION.

(Concluded from p. 301.)

THEN as regards dividends. The taking of these by idle shareholders in Co-operative Societies is opposed to Socialist principles root and branch. A Socialist Co-operative Society would not allow shareholders to receive dividends, that is, any portion of net profit for which they had not worked. As the great object of Co-operation on Socialist lines is to benefit in the first instance the workers, and next those who deal at the store, the surplus which remains after payment of all charges will be divided between the workers and the customers of the society. Under the item "charges," provision would be made for a reserve fund to cover risk, and a fund for extending the operations of the society in such directions as might be deemed advisable. Out of this last fund would come return of capital to shareholders when considered necessary. But all shareholders would be entitled to claim return after a fixed date. The security to shareholders would be all the property of the society, including of course the reserve fund. Into further details I need not now enter.

The next great differences between Socialistic Co-operation and that carried on at present, would be in the status of the workers and the hours of work. As regards status of the employés in the Rochdale and Civil Service Societies, they are exploited at the market rate of wages. And the aim being to obtain for capital 5 per cent. interest, and as high a dividend as possible to members consistent with low prices, the workers have to suffer. Socialist Co-operation will just reverse this. The workers will receive the first consideration. From general to drummer-boy in the great army of workers the pay will be according to the value of the work of each as nearly as it can be estimated in practice. And here I distinguish Socialistic from Communistic Co-operation. This last, a grand ideal when each will work according to his ability, and take according to his need from the common stock, cannot yet be realised. Until the time comes (if it ever does)—and it must be universal throughout the world if it is to be carried to its logical conclusion—we shall have to recognise differences. But under Socialist Co-operation all shall have a fair field and no favour, each finding the work best suited to capacity.

As regards hours of work. The aim of capitalistic Co-operative Societies is identical with that of capitalism generally, viz., to get as much out of the workers as possible. And therefore the shortening of the hours of labour is not a plank in Co-operation as now carried on. There is also the same tendency as in capitalism, to work at high pressure. In Socialist Co-operation, lessening the hours of labour will be a sine qua non, and no workers will be required to work with the unnecessary and unnatural intensity which the demon of greed forces them to toil under capitalistic conditions. The grand principle that production for use and not profit-mongering is the end and aim of Socialist Co-operation, will be kept steadily in view.

I could enlarge on a further difference between Capitalistic Co-operation and Socialist Co-operation, viz., that under Socialist Co-operation there will not be the slightest temptation to adulteration. But space here is limited. I would simply say that it is true this exemption is also held out to those who now deal at Co-operative stores. They sell pure goods at present. But these are young days in Co-operation. The evil leaven of profit-making, whether in the form of interest or dividends to idle shareholders, will bring about corruption. There will be no security against adulteration except what now exists, viz., laws difficult to enforce.

There are other points of difference which I have not space to enter upon. I finish with a little bit of allegory.

Here are three roads, and here stands a sign-post. One arm points to "Individualism;" another to "Co-operation;" the third to "Socialism." We know well where "Individualism" will land us. We have already travelled the road, and weary and footsore we are at the sign-post again. We have, it is true, come upon many bright little spots and seen some fair prospects. But the net result of our experience has been that the further we travelled the greater became the misery and desolation. We therefore retraced our steps, and are back at the sign-post. Now we start upon the road "Co-operation." We are charmed at every step. By and bye, however, we come upon a parting of the ways, or rather a sudden turning out of the main road. No sign-post here. We prefer to keep straight ahead. It seems straight; but there is an imperceptible twist. This gradually increases. Things do not look quite so pleasant as when we started. At length, suddenly, we find ourselves once again in the old road, "Individualism." Disappointed but not disheartened we get back to the sign-post by the road "Co-operation," as that was decidedly more pleasant than "Individualism." This time we start on the road "Socialism." We find it very uphill to begin with. Still, we brace ourselves for the task and push on with a will. Every step takes us higher and increases our enjoyment. There is a freshness about the air that invigorates us, and instead of feeling fatigue we are stronger than when we started. At last we reach the mountain-top, and what a prospect spreads out before us, far as the eye can reach! Desolation there is none. The valleys laugh with corn, and happy voices swell forth in joyous song. We see a land fairer far than Moses beheld from Pisgah's height. We turn around to look back on the way we have come. Yonder is the sign-post. We see a bit of the road "Individualism." The rest is blotted out by a huge spur of the mountain. The road "Co-operation" is in view all the way to the point where it parted in two. We soon lose sight of the road which led back to "Individualism," while we note that the other, had we followed it, would have led us very soon into the pleasant land we see from the mountain-top. We find we shall get soonest to our journey's end if we descend the mountain and take the road at the foot which leads direct into that which turned out of the road "Co-operation." Thus we reach the haven where we would be. Socialism is Co-operation in its widest sense.

D. C. DALLAS.

We count every useful member of society, whether he works with brain or hand, as a labourer. Against this class stands the capitalist or cormorant class, who live upon the earnings of invested wealth, speculation, commercial gambling and monopoly. Every dollar made by the latter is taken without compensation from the former. Between these two classes there is an irrepressible conflict which can never be settled until men are made absolutely secure against either robber or robber-laws in possession of all that they honestly earn.—Union Printer.

A PROTEST AGAINST THE DOMINANCE OF MACHINERY.—Man, in his laboratory, has formed a creature that now has the mastery over him, that enslaves and uses him as a tyrant from which there is apparently no hope of escape. A machine is a working contrivance, with no insides—neither heart, lungs, nor liver. They who have fallen well in with the spirit of the age even maintain that the whole creation is just such a contrivance, without an inside, without a contriver, without heart or soul—and apparently they are pleased with the thought. And there are other philosophies and forces than the economic asserting themselves in the unrest which characterises the times; and this may be due, in part, to the fact that "there is a spirit in man," a something that refuses to be absorbed in the economics of the machine, and which cries out for better privileges than mere wealth or material benefit. One of the forms of protest against this dominance of the machine is a revival of handicraft. The plea for the revival of handicraft is a plea for the moral improvement of no inconsiderable portion of the people; for if we contrast the moral effect of work sweetened by a pleasurable exercise of inventive skill with labour that is simply a monotonous toil for wages, it is apparent that there must result therefrom a marked distinction in the character that is formed under the two systems. For work that affords pleasurable exercise to the faculties in its performance tends naturally to contentment, the very nature of the work is profitable in its mental and moral effects, and this constitutes no small part of the reward—perhaps the greater part. But work that is mere drudgery, an unending grind of toil in which mind and body are automatically engaged, is naturally productive of discontent, for there is no interest in it but the wage, and where money is the sole object of labour—notwithstanding its representative value as a commodity of exchange—there can be no contentment; and this prevalent spirit of discontent may be said to be largely due to that system of labour which the machine has engendered.—Scribner's Magazine for August.

FROM BUMBLE TO BALFOUR.

ALAS, for these poor officials, chief secretaries of Ireland, with captain-magistrates and police, and all the rest of the parliamentary Bumbles. "It is certain that either wise bearing or ignorant carriage is caught, as men take diseases, one of another; therefore let me take heed of their company." Official ideas are caught in the debating-room at St. Stephen's coterie, as scarlet fever is, down in the slum foundation on which their palace is built. We may pity the respectables, for that some of their lesser myrmidons, having gone off their heads through the violence of the disease, should have run a-muck, as they did at Mitchelstown on Sept. 9. It is a most trying disorder, very prevalent now; patients suffering from it are subject to hallucinations, and see their sheepskin-law, justice, false witness, official information, truth, mercy, all mixed together as in a dream.

When the half-starved Oliver Twist, not content with the dietary of the Board, asked for "some more," the officials only threatened him with hanging in the distant future. When Irishmen, not duly reverencing the sacred rights of property, ask for "some more," our latter-day parliamentary Bumbles shoot some of them straight off, and then ask "what moved these unfortunates to bring upon themselves this unhappy and melancholy retribution?"¹

We all know how official information is obtained and what it is worth. Our law-courts, both high and low, show the process in daily action. The judges and lawyers strive to get and mostly succeed in getting independent witnesses to answer in a way that fits in with some preconceived official theory, based on the tales of interested employés. The officials "have a great respect for these employés, who do their best under very difficult circumstances."² And this respect, it must be recollected, is not of that cold kind, which leaves those towards whom it is expressed to end their days in the workhouse, but offers "a lump sum of £150 and a pension of £40 a-year," with various other comfortable allowances.³ An understrapper, before whose eyes is dangled a prize like this either for himself or for his widow after him, will naturally say under examination, "I will not answer, except I am instructed by my authorities;"⁴ he will certainly not find it difficult to adapt his accounts to the wishes of his superiors. In this way "cowardly, wanton brutality" becomes officially "a melancholy retribution," or "a lamentable affray," or "a tragic occurrence which we all deplore."¹ It is of course true that the official account "differs in every vital and substantial particular" from that of an eye-witness with eyes. Official statements always do differ in that way, since they are accounts made up according to the Government pattern, with all the life left out. The pattern report is based on a simple formula—If a policeman shoots a citizen, so much the worse for the citizen: if a peasant threatens a policeman, so much the worse for the peasant. As one of the chief Bumbles explains, "anyone who resists an official and does not submit to be shot quietly, is engaged in resistance to the law."¹

Circumstances alter cases to the official mind. I seem to recollect that a few years since "buckshot Forster" was a term of abuse. But the other set of officials being now in power, it is convenient to forget that, and to praise the reduction in the Irish constable's rifle-charge from bullets to buckshot, as "a merciful change, since, while buckshot strikes terror, it does not kill."¹ An ordinary enquirer might ask, why any one should wish to strike terror, and whether the killing of a few people is not as cheap a way of doing that as any other. But that is not the official's way of looking at it; it is one of his formulas that people should not be hurried into the presence of their maker. Buckshot, however, which only wounds, the evictor's tool which turn impecunious old men and women from their chimney corners out into the snow and slush, the sweater's screw, the crushing rules of the great shop, the unhealthy toil of the factory, the noisome air and dismal sights in which the workers have to live, these inflictions, it is true, do not hurry a few into the next world (except by official accidents), but in a quiet way they push all out of this life, when a mere half or third or even less of their natural days are gone. The official tongue will wag out formal laments and formal excuses, but the reasoning mind will see more mercy in the occasional Irish rifle-bullet, than in the everlasting torture of the English workshop.

We find in the newspapers a few expressions, which show that some even of those who sail under official colours, are shaking their minds free from the official uniform. Mr. Michael Davitt, alluding more particularly to the troubles of Ireland, has said, "The rent-evil was the beginning of it all."³ That is it; the exaction of rent, of usury, of profit, the compelling of men to pay for nothing, is the beginning and the cause of all our troubles. Is that what Mr. Davitt means, or are his words to be read in connection with Mr. H. Labouchere's, who protests that the "Irish have never sought to escape from payment of rent," but that they want to know "what rent will be fair?"³ If that is so, we do not get beyond the worn-out picture of the sturdy peasantry and skilful artisan, officially certified as prosperous.

Signs are clear to others, if not to our official newsmongers, that the Oliver Twists of civilisation will shortly ask not merely for more, not merely for an improvement in the dietary which their Bumbles think sufficient. They will demand all, all that nature allows, and will ask what need there is for the interference of officials between nature and themselves, and whether there is anything beyond nature and their own exertions, which goes to settle men's lives. They are beginning to see that all this official talk about fair rent and reasonable profit is but dust in the mouth, and will abandon elaborate calculations as to how much of nature's gifts they may throw away under these names, before the remainder will be reduced to the level of a livelihood officially certified as sufficient; and they will be assured that all such arithmetic has but the same relation to justice, that the cold and dreary existence in the workhouse under the tyranny of a Bumble, has to the full human life, warmed by the imagination and guided by reason.

C. J. FAULKNER.

THE TRADES' UNION CONGRESS.

II.

ON Wednesday the discussion on the formation of labour electoral associations was continued and concluded, State payment of members being added to the resolution, which was then adopted. Mr. Fenwick, M.P., still smarting under recent criticism, thought it a fitting time to follow in the same strain as his chief on the previous evening, and accordingly favoured his audience with a smirking, "cockey" speech, that reminded one of the attitude of a cheeky little boy after his "big brother" has cowed the enemy; crying out on the way, apropos of nothing, that the policy of the working classes had been a policy of reform and not of revolution—evidently having a very limited notion of the meaning of that latter word. It might perhaps improve Mr. Fenwick's education if I pointed out to him that "revolution" does not signify a fighting in the streets; and it would also be to his advantage if he recognised that the choice is not between "mildness" or violence. The decision of the Northumberland miners may perhaps help him to realise this.

Mr. Shipton followed with an ambiguous resolution in favour of land reform, and backed it up with a speech far more advanced than his resolution. This latter did not satisfy many of the delegates, and F. Maddison proposed as an amendment land nationalisation, and the imposition of a land-tax at once, which was ultimately carried unanimously—this being a distinct advance on preceding congresses. May the unionists quickly come to see that there is no logical halting-place between the nationalising of the land and that of capital, and that their emancipation from the thralldom of wage-slavery is inevitably bound up with its accomplishment.

⁴ Inquest, Sept. 14, on the Mitchelstown martyrs.

A discussion on the eight hours' movement was initiated by a resolution favouring "a further reduction in the working hours," and expressing the opinion that this could be accomplished "by increased combination, assisted by the Government in reducing the hours of labour in all Government works to eight hours a-day"; and a clear issue was speedily raised by Mr. Parnell (London) moving an amendment declaring that the only effectual means of obtaining the same is by the passing of an eight hours' labour bill. A long discussion took place over this item, which was split up between the third and fourth days. The speeches were for the most part very weak, and there were but few who took into account the vast masses of workers outside the pale of the unions. T. R. Threlfall spoke vigorously, doubting the possibility of unionists accomplishing the work themselves, and favouring a bill; and he was followed by Mr. Broadhurst, who began by saying that Congress had never in its history had a subject more important to the trades' unions of the country, to the very foundation, than the one they were discussing, and then proceeded to throw the weight of his influence against any departure from the old ways. It was grievous to see him frittering away his time in detailing the trifling advantages his own union had been able to obtain in forty-five years, when the question, whatever its worth, was one affecting the whole proletariat class. W. Abraham, M.P., opened Thursday's sitting with a speech exhibiting a wider appreciation of the matter in hand, and favouring the amendment; and after him a Liverpool delegate supported the same view, remarking that the majority of the trades' unions were being driven into benefit societies and required reorganising on sounder principles, and suggesting that if Mr. Broadhurst mixed more with the toilers of the country he would recognise that the eight hours a-day must be accomplished by the most speedy means—i.e., by going to Parliament. After some more speeches a division was taken, when 29 voted for Mr. Parnell's amendment and 76 against; and ultimately it was resolved that a plebiscite should be taken of the members of the various trades' unions for or against an eight hour day and a full Saturday holiday, and whether this should be sought to be brought about by the unions themselves or by means of an eight hour labour bill.

Co-operation—one of the "annuals"—was then introduced, two delegates from the Co-operative Union attending and speaking. The Congress discussed this matter from the point of view of the co-operators' treatment of their employes, and complaint was made that in many instances co-operation encouraged "sweating" and the lowest form of cheap labour, and was merging more and more into joint-stock companies. Altogether, the deputation got some good advice. The resolution adopted was one expressing "strong sympathy with all well-conducted movements having for their object the securing to the worker a larger share of the product of his industry." After a growl of "indignation" at the Lords over the Truck Bill, it was resolved by a unanimous vote to call an international congress of the workers, to be held in London next year; Mr. Parnell pointing out that they were all fighting against the one class, and F. Maddison predicting a time when the workers of this country would be as closely associated with those of the Continent as they themselves now were through the medium of their Congress.

On Friday the Congress again fell foul of the Lords, this time over the Mines Bill; and after relieving their feelings by the despatch of sundry telegrams, the delegates passed to the subject of Overtime. This was denounced all round as an unmitigated evil, but the speeches did not suggest to one that any progress would be made in its correction. Some unpleasant information on the state of underground bake-houses was then given, and afterwards it was voted that the Factory Acts should be so amended as to prohibit the employment of females in chain and nail works; as also were some other amendments, including one enabling inspectors to enter the "sweater's" den. At this stage the president read a three-and-ninepenny telegram from Messrs. Kelly and Peters, having relation to their demonstration on the question of foreign bounties, and complaining that the Congress had not treated them with the consideration their merits deserved. This was promptly and properly consigned to the "waste-paper basket." Unimportant subjects filled up the rest of the day: labour federation only need be mentioned.

The concluding meeting opened with some remarks by W. R. Cremer, M.P., in which he complained bitterly of the treatment from Mr. Bradlaugh, who plainly told him he (Cremer) knew nothing about the Bill. He spoke of Mr. Bradlaugh's "imperiousness," and the obsequiousness with which his mandate was obeyed by the Tories. After this came a resolution in favour of Sunday opening of museums and art galleries, which this year the Congress adopted; and then the necessity for "a truly national system of free education" was voted unanimously. A Scotch delegate rose to repudiate the attack Mr. Broadhurst made on J. Keir Hardie, saying no one had done more for the Scotch miners than he, and no one was more respected by them; and then came a full dozen of items, which were knocked down with a rapidity appertaining to an auction sale, but which, indeed, got about as much attention as they were worth. And thus ends the summary of the business of the "Twentieth Annual Congress,"—a miserable enough record, truly, if it is to be taken as expressing the aims and hopes of seven hundred thousand of the workers. But indeed it does not; and to the careful student, watching closely the progress made in the last few years—watching especially the tenor of the addresses of the presidents—there is evidence that the increasing knowledge of the toilers as to the causes of their degradation, combined with the forces at work intensifying their struggle for existence, will materially alter the nature and treatment of the subjects discussed at these gatherings in the future, and push forward the struggle for a better life with an ever accelerating speed.

The Eight Hour Labour Bill I consider by far the most important subject discussed at the Congress, and indeed it involves the "parting of the ways" in the history of the trades' union movement. It is not alone the intrinsic advantages the shortening of the hours of labour would bring to the workers—and a reduction of hours is a more positive benefit than an increase of wage—but the mere discussion and the struggle that would be involved in obtaining this would contribute immensely to lift trades' unionism out of the rut of stagnation in which it now is, and carry the unionists far onward in the path to Socialism; and it would be the especial duty of Socialists to take advantage of this activity to press home the truths of their principles, and see to it that the movement was recognised as but a stage onward towards the realisation of their ideal.

One thing which has signalled this Congress is the beginning of the revolt against Broadhurst and Co., for Hardie was not the only one who spoke out against the tactics of the labour M.P.'s. If trades' unionism is to make any progress it is clear that Broadhurst must go, and such men as Threlfall, Maddison, Bevan, and Hardie take up the work where he stops short. It may be very fine for him to declare in reports that the unionists have but cleared the brambles from the path to obtain freedom for striking out a policy; but the evidence is conclusive that he has gone as far as his narrow sympathies will carry him, and he puts his veto on everything which makes for an aggressive policy. It will not do for him to rest his claim for consideration on his past "sacrifices for trades' unionism," seeking to stifle the onward movement of organised labour, that he may gain popularity with the privileged classes and at the same time keep the secretaryship snug as something he may fall back upon when the Liberals are in Opposition; the labour movement is a serious business, with an idea in it, and those who endeavour to stay its progress must be sternly thrust aside.

In a last word I say to my fellow-unionists that it is time that they declared what is their aim—whether it be to free themselves from the slavery of working for a miserable wage and supporting the idle classes in luxury and extravagance, or whether their highest hope is the securing to themselves a shilling or two more or two or three hours less a-week. They must make their demands, and not beg a trimming here and there because their masters would object to grant them any more. They must get to know that they have not to beg but to take, and that nothing will be yielded up to him who humbly sues. Have unionists ever given heed to the words of Professor Cairnes and the verdict of Political Economy, that unless the workers can free themselves from their subjection to Capital the problem of their elevation is hopeless, and against the forces opposed to them trades' unions must dash themselves in vain? I say there is no compromise we can make with those who live on our toil; and the lesson the workers have before them is "to know their own, to know how to take their own, and to know how to use their own."

"FREE LABOUR" IN MANCHESTER.

A Manchester friend sends us the following statement of facts illustrative of the working of the present system:

"There is a toffee-boiler in New Allen Street, Oldham Road, where the workmen are stopped twopenny per week for the use of the w.c. If they work any overtime, and there happens to be any odd pence in the wage, this is struck off and kept from them. If they happen to have a day off, there is two days' pay stopped. A large grey cloth firm and shippers in Strangeways gave all the hookers notice a fortnight ago, that in future they would have to do double the quantity of work in the same time as before without any increase in wages. This, of course, means that the men have to almost kill themselves to earn just as much as will keep themselves alive. The majority left, but their places were soon filled. Where there are so many starving you will no doubt not understand how it is that they could do as much work again in the same time, but I will try to explain. In all our warehouses the hookers have a certain amount of work to do in the hour, which they can do in half-an-hour if they are at all smart, which has been the rule for half a century, although some take a little more time to do it in. Then there is what is called gaining, that is, when they are busy the men are given the opportunity of making double time, that is keeping continually at the hooking frame all day. This is very exhausting, and they deserve what they get. There is a firm in Hall Street, City, who employ jobbing packers at 4d. per hour, while the Packers' Society rules are that none shall work under 8d. These craven-hearted men, for this is what I call them, are non-society men who stand at the corners outside the clubs, and I have known these men to stand at a street corner in winter three days, eight hours per day, in the bitter cold and then take a job for three or four hours at 4d. per hour. These do not include all corner men, as having been one myself for three years I know plenty who would sooner starve to death, which we almost do sometimes, than work under 8d. and help against our fellows. You perhaps would like to know how it is I am not a society man. The societies are the Packers', Hookers', Stitchers', and Makers'-up. I am a grey cloth carrier, for which occupation there is no society. The packers', etc., have to serve their time to the trade, but amongst grey cloth carriers there are all kinds of tradesmen who cannot get a job at their own trade, and this is easily learned. I was jobbing at a firm in Fountain Street three weeks ago, and one of the employes in the grey department was going on his holidays, for which they are allowed ten days. The salesman, who is a captain of volunteers, very near-sighted, and with an inaudible voice, told him it was too long for a worker to have. He himself has a month, and for the rest of the year does not come to "business" before 10.30 and goes home at 4, and I don't know what he does when he is there, as he has a manager under him who conducts the business. These things illustrate our lot; I don't know whether the few words I tell them in are fit for publication or not, being uneducated myself, but seeing you depend on the workers for information I thought it my duty to let you know what little I have gathered, being, as I am, one who is slowly being crushed in the struggle for existence.

ONE OF THE CORNER MEN.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

THE STRIKE OF WELSH COLLIERS.—The strike at New Tredegar, by which 400 men were idle, has been settled by a compromise, and any further dispute which may arise is to be referred to the sliding-scale committee.

For many years shipbuilding on the Clyde has not been so slack as at present. In the four ship-building yards in Whiteinch, a suburb of Glasgow, there is not a single ship on stocks. This has not occurred for twenty-seven years.

COLLAPSE OF THE MINERS' STRIKE AT LINLITHGOW.—After extending over ten weeks the strike of the shale miners at Champfleurie, near Linlithgow, has now collapsed. When the strike commenced, about 200 miners were employed in the mines of the Linlithgow Oil Co., and 160 miners have resumed work on the masters' terms.

At a public meeting of weavers at Padiham, it was decided to make weekly collections on behalf of the operatives now on strike at Higham. It was stated that the employers were paying 10 per cent below the Blackburn list before the strike, and they had refused over and over again to recognise the Blackburn rate of wages.

THE STRIKE IN THE WROUGHT NAIL TRADE.—On Thursday 15th a large open-air meeting of nail-makers who are out on strike for an advance in wages was held at Halesowen. Mr. J. Price presided. A resolution was passed to remain on strike until the whole of the masters agree to pay the 1879 list.

DURHAM COLLIERS.—Owing to the committal to prison by the Gateshead County Magistrates of six miners for non-payment of damages and costs in connection with a recent dispute, the men employed at Felling, Wardley, and Asworth collieries, numbering 1730, came out on strike. The imprisoned men having been liberated, work was resumed at two of the collieries on Monday.

The action of the Midland Company has been, it appears, as a bugle-call to other companies to follow suit in a retrograde policy. The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire is evidently preparing to follow. No one knows which will be next, therefore let all railwaymen take a timely warning and attend to that all-important and indispensable factor—Organisation.—Railway Review.

THE CHATHAM DOCKYARD DISCHARGES.—Sir John Gorst writes to inform his constituents at Chatham, on the authority of Mr. Forwood, Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty, that the discharges en masse from the dockyard are now probably at an end, and that any further reduction which may be required will be allowed to effect itself gradually through deaths and age retirement. The information has caused great satisfaction in Chatham.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS.—The voting on the question of continuing to maintain Messrs. Burt and Fenwick as Labour representatives has been concluded. The numbers are: For the present system, 3,300; against, 4,800. The resolution will not come into effect until next November, when Messrs. Burt and Fenwick will retire unless arrangements are made outside the Miners' Union for their continuance in political life.

BLACKBURN—STRIKE OF COTTON OPERATIVES.—On Thursday morning the loomers employed at Messrs. Hopwood and Sons, Nova Scotia Mills, Blackburn came out on strike through the employers refusing to give increased remuneration for a certain "sort" of work. The employers consider it not a "sort" entitling loomers to extra pay.—A strike of operatives also took place at Messrs. Thompson and Sons, Hollin Bank Mills. Four hundred operatives are out, and 700 looms stopped.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—A conference of masters and representatives of the engineers on strike was held on Saturday afternoon, the result of which will be the submission of a communication to the men by the employers, which is expected to at once settle the points in dispute preparatory to arbitration on the wages question. Wednesday.—At a mass meeting last night the men decided, on a vote by ballot, to reject the employers' proposal. Large crowds awaited the result of the vote, which was ten to one. This is gratifying news, indeed.

SHORT TIME IN CREWE.—Last week notices were posted up in the locomotive-works of the London and North-Western Railway Company at Crewe, announcing that short time will be instituted there to the extent of seven and a half hours a-week. The hours of labour will be reduced on each Saturday and Monday to effect this economy. Between six and seven thousand employes are engaged in the Crewe Works. Full time was resumed on March last, before which the men had been on short time for the preceding eighteen months.

YORKSHIRE MINERS AND PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION.—On Thursday 15th inst. a largely-attended meeting was held to denounce the issue of the circular lately published suggesting the formation of a new miners' union. In various addresses it was declared that the circular was the production of a paid Tory agent, and was issued with a view of preventing Liberal members being returned for Yorkshire mining constituencies. It was added that the last two elections did not cost the Miners' Association a penny, and that the money the miners subscribed was in hand ready to fight the next election. A resolution denouncing the circular was passed unanimously.

A touching incident occurred a few days ago, when a group of Midland strike men from Toton were making their way through the streets of London towards the East-end, where they were to embark for Australia. One of the men suddenly stopped and picked up a withering flower which had dropped from his button-hole, when one of his companions good-humouredly laughed at him for treasuring so much a faded flower. "Ah!" said he, with a deep sigh, followed by a tear, "that flower came out of my little garden." The effect was so great upon the emigrants, who had all left neat and trim gardens behind, that they were quite overcome for some considerable time.—Railway Review.

STRIKE IN THE BIRMINGHAM ENGINEERING TRADE—DAYWORK v. PIECEWORK.—A portion of the men in the employ of Messrs. G. E. Bellis and Co., engineers, of Ledsam Street, Birmingham, have turned out on strike against a proposal on the part of the employers to extend the piecework system. The firm employ nearly 200 hands, but as yet only the society men have turned out. They affirm that the system on which they worked was unfair, inasmuch as a comparatively few hands were allowed the best work at "piece" rates, whilst the others with a full week's work were not able to earn what they consider a fair wage. They are supported in their action by the trade society to which they belong.

WAGE DISPUTE AT THE HORWICH RAILWAY WORKS.—The first contingent of smiths brought from Miles Platting commenced work at the new railway works at Horwich last week. Shortly after commencing, the smiths, about 16 in number, were informed that a reduction of 2s. per week would be made in their wages. The men demurred and left their work, most of them returning to Manchester to lay their case before the various branches of their trade society. About 12 smiths have since been engaged by the company, and they are working at the reduction.

THE SCOTCH SHALE MINERS.—The report that these men are about to give in is quite untrue. The men held a large meeting on Monday and determined to hold out till the masters submitted fair terms, and in the meantime to call no further meetings. The lock-out has now lasted eleven weeks, but the men are as steadfast as ever. Some days ago the masters made an indefinite offer to settle. The men agreed to go in, but put the proposed concession into plain terms. Then the manager of the Broxburn Co. refused to entertain the acceptance, on the excuse that it was made out in the handwriting of Mr. J. Wilson, the trades-union secretary. All throughout the conduct of the companies has been shameful. The men have struggled gallantly and deserve to succeed.—J. L. M.

WAGES IN THE LONDON DOCKS.—A meeting convened by the Tea Coopers and General Labourers' Association was held on the 15th at St. Mary's Church Schools, Whitechapel, "to protest against the reduction of wages throughout the trade, and to point out the best means of protecting themselves against the pressure brought to bear upon them." The chair was taken by S. Montagu, M.P., who in opening the proceedings spoke of the advantages to the workers of trades-unionism. Mr. Tillett, the organising secretary, spoke at length of the necessity of forming a General Labourers' Association, embracing all the various grades of working men employed at the docks, and moved "That this meeting of tea operatives and dock and wharf labourers hereby expresses its unmeasured indignation at the reduction being made in the price of labour, and condemns as a source of impoverishment and shortness of work the sweating system of sub-contracts." This was seconded by Mr. Prentice, and adopted unanimously with cheers. A resolution in favour of the general character of the Association was also passed.

THE CONDITION OF THE AGRICULTURAL LABOURER.—Since the collapse of the Agricultural Labourers' Union in the Cambridgeshire districts wages have been gradually falling. The maximum price paid for "regular" hands is 10s. per week of seven days; occasional or casual hands are paid 11s. The harvest this year has been worked at the lowest wage known for years; and the number of men unemployed at this season of the year is unprecedented. In many parts of the county nearly one-third of the labourers had no harvest work at all. Now that the harvest is finished the casual hands are out of work, and starvation is staring hundreds of families in the face. The "casual farm-hand" is a product of the strike some years back, and the increased use of machinery. There is little work for this description of labourer during the winter. In the fields the ripe corn is stacked; in the cottages the labourer is in abject poverty. A feeling of discontent is prevalent among most of the men, and revolt against their miserable condition is eagerly looked forward to. The coming winter for those who plough and sow will indeed be a hard one, worse even than the phantomed "morrow of the revolution," the dreaded spectre of "advanced" politicians.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND MINERS AND POLITICS.—The action of the miners in refusing to support Messrs. Burt and Fenwick out of the Union funds is a decided advance. The very first thing that working men have to do in organising a Socialist Labour Party is to clear out of the way the false friends of labour who so persistently truckle to the Liberal party. Messrs. Burt, Fenwick, Pickard, Arch, and the rest of the Labour M.P.'s have shown themselves mere bootblacks to the Whig whips, and have never had the courage to take an independent stand for even the paltry principles they profess. They deserve to be ignominiously pitched out of public life, and the only pity is that they ever entered it. Working men needn't care for all their foes if they only know rightly who their real friends are. The miners in the Northumberland Union cannot forget how these two men sat dumb in the House of Commons while 20,000 of their constituents were starving for eighteen weeks. They would be more than human if they could forget or forgive it. The very essence of the future of the real Labour Party must be its complete separation from Liberal or Tory political parties. These parties represent respectively the landlord and capitalist interest; their good favour can only be won by the desertion of the cause of labour.—J. L. M.

AMERICA.

LABOUR DAY.—A general public holiday was held on the 5th of September and great parades of labour were held in the big towns of the States. In New York 30,000 men paraded, making a procession 10 miles long, with flags, emblems, etc. All sections of the labour party united harmoniously for this purpose. The demonstration made a great impression in the States.

GEORGE AND THE SOCIALISTS.—Great disaffection is being expressed amongst the American trade unionists at the treatment of the Socialist party by the Georgites at the late convention. A powerful Socialist convention has been held and full reports are expected shortly.

The Central Labour Union suspended a Musical Union because an orchestra in a theatre would not strike in support of the builders employed at the theatre.—Two hundred and sixty-five persons applied for an assistant book-keeper's situation advertised in the New York Herald.—At a meeting of the American Federation of Labour (which is supplanting the Knights of Labour) it was stated that 10,000 new members had joined since June 13th, and that the total strength was now 600,000.—The salesmen of Pittsburgh are forming a National Trade District of the Knights of Labour.—A great strike is impending on the Reading Railroad, the largest coal carrier, in America. Seventy thousand men are concerned.—No. 3 division of the Ancient Order of Hibernians has been expelled from that Order for inviting the excommunicated Dr. McGlynn to lecture for them.—J. L. M.

When you hear a man say he has got through with the labour movement and that in future he will work for himself, depend upon it he never did anything else but work for "number one."—Model Commonwealth.

The Socialists know how to write, talk, and fight.—Union Printer. And what is of more importance, they use their knowledge to defend sound principles. But, after all, we think the Socialists are greatly overrated in respect to their abilities. It doesn't require near as much ability, from a logical point of view, to tell the truth and defend it, as it does to defend sophistry and falsehood. It is not the ability of Socialists, but the science of Socialism that appeals to men's reason.—Workmen's Advocate.

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

HOLLAND.

The scandalous bourgeois riot at Rotterdam has scarcely come to an end when we have to mention another, which happened at Utrecht on the 12th inst. The Socialists in that town had secured a new place of gathering, and on the above-named date they intended to inaugurate their premises. At mid-day a gang of rascals rushed into the house, and in a few minutes they had spoiled and destroyed all the furniture. The Socialists resisted, and a serious fight went on, with the result that the "rascality" was thrown into the street. At three o'clock they came back with re-enforced numbers, and a fresh attack was made on our friends, who again succeeded in repulsing the gang. Although there were several hundred men gathered there and fighting, the police did not put in an appearance until all was over. The police in Holland seems deliberately to encourage these attacks, but our friends intend on their side to resist by all means these scandalous provocations, and certainly they do very well.

Three Socialists of Amsterdam, having tried to introduce into the prison of Utrecht one or two copies of Recht voor Allen, to be handed over to Nieuwenhuys, have been sentenced to two months' imprisonment. They have been denounced, of course, by the prison warder. An appeal against the sentence has been brought in, and the decision of the Court of Appeal will be known next week.

Another Socialist, comrade De Ruyter, having thought it fit to congratulate Nieuwenhuys on his release in a piece of poetry, which, by the bye, is very well written, has been sent for trial on the ground of having slandered the Minister of Justice. In order that our readers may know what is meant in Holland by slanderous publication, we quote here the four incriminated lines:

"Die Tour van Belinckhave
Die lage Koningsknecht
Moest eindlyk buigen voor den wil
Van 't volk, dat vroegom recht!"

(Du Tour van Belinckhave, this low-lived king's lackey, had finally to bow before the will of the people, claiming its right!)

All these bourgeois vexations and police prosecutions are far from doing any harm whatever to the spread of Socialism in Holland. On the contrary, every week we can mention several new sections in the remotest parts of the land, and a fact well worth noticing is that the Dutch women take their fair share in the propaganda business. In the principal towns, groups of Socialist women are at work. At Amsterdam, their section counts over two hundred members, and is chiefly busy in distributing literature amongst the landworkers.

GERMANY.

Last week, the tribunal of Mülhausen, in Alsace, has sentenced two young Frenchmen in a most barbarous way, for less than nothing. The two young fellows, aged 19 and 20 years respectively, living at St. Maurice, in the Vosges department, having paid a visit to some friends at Wesserling, Alsace, returned home singing on their way the 'Marseillaise.' They were at once arrested by a Prussian gendarme and condemned by the "patriotic" magistrates, the first to 15 months' imprisonment and a fine of 500 marks (£25), or 100 days more imprisonment; and the second to 18 months and 1000 marks (£50) fine, or 200 days in addition. "God" may bless Germany!

On the 1st of October a great number of Socialists, including two deputies in the Reichstag, Grillenberger and Singer, are to be tried at Stuttgart.

Eight Socialists have been arrested at Halle-on-the-Saale, and expelled from the Prussian province of Saxony. Several workers of the Barfusserstrasse factory at Augsburg, have been arrested for having copies of the Freiheit in their possession. A real avalanche of trials are announced at Breslau, Posen, Dantzig, Cassel, Mannheim, Leipzig, in fact, everywhere, for the next month of October. As the magistrates cannot possibly find the necessary time for investigating each case separately, a comrade suggests that they should have their sentences (of condemnation naturally) made up beforehand in order to save the "culprits" the trouble of passing through the prosecution farce. We think our comrade comes too late with his suggestion. Surely, the German judges are in the habit of bearing their sentences in their pockets. Why shouldn't they? Time is money, in Germany as well as elsewhere.

SWITZERLAND.

The cabinet-makers of Berne, who have been on strike for over two months, have issued a manifesto explaining the motives of their struggle, and appealing for help from their fellow-workers. Their claims are:—1. Abolition of task work; 2. Minimum salary of 4 fr. a-day instead of 3 fr.; 3. Suppression of job-work; 4. Nine hours work a-day; 5. None of the strikers to be dismissed after the struggle is over. The Swiss workers strongly support their comrades. The compositors, the tailors, and all the Grütli associations have sent important contributions to the strike fund. The Chambre Syndicate (Trade Union) of the cabinet makers of Paris have subscribed a large sum; Hamburg has sent 125 marks, Stuttgart 150, Mülhausen 50, and so forth.

A general strike of glaziers is also pending in several towns of Switzerland, if the "masters" do not accept the claims of their workers, who have given them a respite of a fortnight to consider matters.

The government of the Bâle canton have enacted a law regulating the work of women in factories. The maximum is eleven hours work a-day, and ten hours on Saturday! No work to be done on Sunday! One whole hour per day to be given free for meals! And, mind you, the Bâle government is a Radical one. What would it have done if it had not been so Radical as it is? One wonders really at the shamelessness of these Radical bourgeois.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Last week the police at Vienna made a perquisition at Karl Herman's lodgings, in order to find the correspondence which had passed between himself and a Socialist now in prison at Leipzig, who is to be tried for high treason. In spite of the advice given over and over again to Socialists, specially in countries where the police seem to have no other business than to watch Socialists, to destroy all their political correspondence, a considerable number of letters were found at comrade Herman's house, with the result of his being arrested and conveyed to the House of Detention at Prague. Comrade Herman had been expelled from Berlin, and it is the Prussian police who gave directions to that effect to their Viennese colleagues. Friends, once more, destroy your correspondence!

FRANCE.

At Montluçon the glass-bottle makers are still on strike, with the exception of six workers who have abandoned their colleagues and hold with M. Duchet the exploiter. The strikers are well supported, and it seems likely that they will at last be victorious.

At Romans (Isere) twenty-one factories of hat-makers are closed, 2,000 workers being on strike. They claim an addition of one penny per hat to their wages. The hat-makers of Bourg-le-Péage, near Romans, are going to follow the example of their comrades, and then the whole trade will stand still.

We have received the first number of La Révolte, the new Communist. Anarchist paper of our Parisian friends. If we judge the new organ by its leader, entitled Notrebut (Our Aim), we may rest assured that it will follow the traditions of its predecessor Le Révolte, and we wish it good success. La Révolte announces that it will publish every fortnight a literary supplement, which will be a sort of continuation of Le Glaneur Anarchiste (the Anarchist Gleaner), a very useful undertaking which was obliged to stop some time ago. This literary part of the journal can do a great deal of good for the general propaganda, and we hope that it will be well supported by the workers.

A veteran of the revolutionary struggles of this century, Ferdinand Gambon, has just died in a little village of the Nièvre department. He was born at Bourges the 19th of March, 1820. His whole career has been one of abnegation and devotion to the interests of the proletariat. After the revolution of 1848, in which he took a prominent part, he was elected by the Nièvre department in the Constituante and afterwards in the Legislative Assembly. Sentenced to deportation by the High Court of Versailles, for having signed an appeal to arms, he was sent to the State dungeon of Belle Isle, and after the coup d'état of Napoleon, to the prison of Corte, in Corsica, where he remained until the amnesty of 1859. He was one of the most energetic opponents of the Third Empire, and on the 8th of February, 1871, more than 150,000 electors of the Seine department sent him to the National Chamber of Bordeaux from which he soon retired with disgust, after the insult flung by that assembly against Garibaldi. On the 26th of March, 1871, he entered the Commune of Paris, and our readers know that he was one of the last men who desisted from the battle, after having fought on the barricade of the Fontaine-au-roi Street. A long proscription followed, and as soon as the general amnesty opened again his country to him, he was elected a deputy by his fellow-citizens of the Nièvre. For a long time, he was almost the only Socialist in that gathering of reactionaries. Always, everywhere, in all circumstances, he has been on the side of the people, making boldly and generously the sacrifice of his fortune, of his health, and we may even say of his life, for he died from the consequences of the ill-treatment to which he was subdued during his various imprisonments. Born among the rich, he lived with the poor and remained with them, affirming his solidarity in their defeats as well as rejoicing in their triumphs. The memory of Gambon will everlastingly remain in the hearts of the proletariat.

ITALY.

The advanced branch of the Italian Workers' Party, the Collectivist Federation, represented in Parliament by Andrea Costa, will hold a Congress at Milano in a few weeks.

A third Congress is to convene on the 9th, 10th, and 11th of October at Milano, viz., that of the Co-operative Societies. They will discuss, among other questions, that of an international federation of all similar societies.

Yet another Anarchist publication in Italy (Lo Schiavo, Nice) has sprung up this month. It is rather original in one way, for the editors do not commit themselves to its daily, weekly, or monthly publication as we other humdrum folk find ourselves pledged to do (by base superstition or the force of public opinion); they briefly announce that the paper will come out "when possible." This is "liberty of the press" with a vengeance, we cannot help exclaiming! A close column is devoted to an attack on Humanitas, vastly unentertaining per se, though some amusement may be derived from it for readers of 'Pickwick' by a certain resemblance to the Eatanswill style of journalism. Petty carplings and scoffings against other "groups" of one revolutionary body cannot be too strongly criticised as undignified in the extreme, and unworthy the serious aim towards which our thoughts and efforts turn.—M. M.

A Workman's Congress has been held lately at Rome, Monte Citorio, in spite of the hostility of the government. It was the most moderate of the two federations of Italian working-men, that which inspires itself with the traditions of Mazzini and Garibaldi, and which is composed rather of political reformers and co-operators than of revolutionary Socialists. Nine hundred and ten societies were represented at the Congress, which, among others, passed the following resolution:—"The Congress condemns all privileges as being the direct cause of the moral decay and material impoverishment of the nation; claims the immediate recall of the Italian soldiers sent out on a culpable enterprise (the expedition on the Red Sea); sends their fraternal greetings to the French people, which has become the point aimed at by the European reaction; and, while despising henceforth all vain and unfruitful protestations, invites the Italians to manly action, in order to obtain by all possible means popular sovereignty in all political and social matters."

WEEKLY; ONE PENNY.

NOTES.

The Pall Mall the other night contained, as indeed most papers do wellnigh every day, some striking examples of the working of the present system. "Immorality," "cruelty," "self-seeking," are terms in themselves vague and meaning little beyond what we are compelled to recognise as the inevitable result of a "society" such as that we are compelled to form part of. Does it never strike anyone as curious that, of the thousand wrongs every day endured by millions, none but the most violent examples find comment, and those only as to the effect, while the causes are left to Socialists to talk of? Even the "New (!) Journalism" is discreetly reticent as to the reason of drowning sailors being regarded as indifferently as "a litter of puppies"—that they are cheap, and easily replaced.

The perennial "copyright" question has been to the fore again, and much rhetorical mud has been flung at certain publishers—English and American—for "piracy" of books. What have they done, other than modern morality allows? So long as you can keep within or evade the law, there is no limit to the rascality which may be included within the limits of "business enterprise." It is only because authors have more chance to "squeal" than most men that one hears so much of copyright. Every craft has its own way of increasing the profit at other folks' expense; and publishers, while certainly no better, are no worse than other tradesmen.

At Bolton there has been much discussion by the Sanitary Congress of the many and various evils that "civilised" human flesh is heir to, but so far as we have noticed there has been no word as to the real why and wherefore. Many papers and speeches have elaborately shown what should be done and could be done—is it not about time for some of these learned men to get up and speak the truth, the whole of it? They could explain all over again what they have been explaining, and then go on with what will be done and why. By the time they got through with it they would find out many interesting truths, and would accomplish more good in a week than they do now in a decade.

We Socialists are so often met with the boast of "British freedom," and the rest of it, that it is almost with a chuckle of malicious pleasure that we look on at the row there is being made over the application to ordinary political meetings of the methods long reserved for our especial behoof. A little of the sneaking brutality that is called "vigilant performance of duty" when employed against us by the police, will make the "advanced politician" consider whether "law and order" is not rather dear at the price, and whether, in order to be rid of it, the overthrow of the system of monopoly-plus-exploitation does not appear to be necessary? Such questions are being now asked—and will one day be answered.

Reading of the great success which has attended the parcels post one is irresistibly led to think of the ease with which a similar plan could be arranged and set going for the transfer of folk. Why could I not go and buy a stamp and be taken where I please? There is nought in the way but—private property!

Imperial Federation—or Jingo writ large—is a fascinating subject for the Briton who believes in "his" empire. It has been made, according to a late number of the Journal of the Imperial Federation League, a theme for essays, poems, and discussions at many public and other schools in the past year. "Train up a (bourgeois) child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it"—unless he becomes a Socialist, which is getting increasingly probable.

One important fact that has come out in the evidence at the Exeter inquest is that the architect, with the expressed consent of the inspecting magistrates, sacrificed an important, even necessary, exit in order to gain the rent of another shop. Coffin-ships, race-week trains, death-trap theatres, all run on the principle of getting a constant profit and "taking the risk"—only the risk and the profit pertain to different people. The Daily News for cure wants "a more compulsory law"; Jus wants the opportunity for "enterprise" enlarged; but it seems to a Socialist, irrational being that he is, only possible to ensure care for public safety when the public are the caretakers, when theatres and all else are in the hands of the people and by them administered. S.

THE TRADES CONGRESS AND A LABOUR PARTY.

W. EVANS

THE Trades' Congress just closed has done some useful work. It is, however, to the address of the president, Sept. 6, to which I beg to refer. The president calls for the formation of a labour party—a party distinct from the two great political parties of to-day. The proposition is condemned as tending to create class strife and as still further complicating the political question—as being altogether impracticable. The Daily News assures the Congress that the proposition stands condemned by history, and is therefore impossible. Other Liberal organs tell the delegates that such a proposition does not come within their legitimate sphere of action, and that the Congress must lose the confidence of the respectable classes.

The formation of a labour party was sure to be condemned by the commercial even more than by the Tory press. It was sure to be condemned by the representatives of class interests, both in the House, in the press, and on the platform.

The formation of a labour party is a revolutionary measure. It is a declaration of war against the non-producing classes of the community; against the present institutions of society. It is a declaration of war against the dominance of the classes, against the supremacy of class interests. No doubt the Right Hon. John Bright will condemn it as fostering class interests, and therefore to be deprecated. But the words of the right hon. gentleman have lost much of their weight with the masses of the population. And if the workers are to succeed they must look to themselves. If the labour party is to be a genuine one it must be based on principle, not on expediency. It must be revolutionary in its nature, and seek the supremacy of the toiling millions, of the wealth-producing masses, and the extinction of all class privileges, of all monopolies, of all mere class interests.

The president condemned the monopoly of the land as the primary cause of trade depression. No doubt the president is right. The monopoly of the land is a most fruitful source of trade depression, and will ultimately lead to national decay. When we take into consideration the fact that from 1871 to 1881 in England and Wales alone the number of farmers decreased over 25,000, of market-gardeners over 32,000, and of agricultural labourers over 90,000, while the general population increased over 14 per cent., it is time to enquire into the monopoly of the land. And when practical men like the late Mr. Mechi declare that our agricultural produce can be increased to nearly three times its present amount, it is time this monstrous monopoly ceased. It is not the money loss only that we have to take into account, but the loss of labour and our dependence on foreign supplies for the very bread that we eat. The president condemned rents, royalties etc., and was quite right in so doing; and if we add to the £180,000,000 in rents, royalties, etc., etc., the £400,000,000 we get less from the land than we might (Mr. Mechi), making not far from £600,000,000 per annum, we may well condemn the monopoly of the land as the primary cause of trade depression.

But there are other monopolies equally monstrous. There is the monopoly of the currency, which is also very largely responsible for periodical trade depressions. This is a question very seldom discussed and very little understood; yet it is a question of the most vital importance, and ought to be well considered by those who seek the regeneration of society by and through the supremacy of labour. The monopoly of the instruments of labour is also a matter of the highest importance. When the president referred to the extensive use of labour-saving machinery, he dealt with the effects only of that monopoly. The monopoly of the land, the currency, and the instruments of production are the three great curses that crush to the earth the wealth-producing classes. It is on these monopolies that our modern system of production rests, by which the plunder of the masses takes place, and on which their slavery depends. Labour-saving machinery is not of itself a curse, but it is its monopoly, its use for the aggrandisement of the capitalist classes, that makes it a curse to the masses. Let the trades learn that it is not machinery as such, but the abuse of that machinery, its use against instead of for the workers, that makes it an apparent curse instead of a real blessing.

The president also condemned foreign competition, foreign bounties, piece-work, etc., all of which are mere effects, and are inseparable from, our modern commercial system.

The president declared there is no hope for the workers from the present House of Commons. He was quite right. There is not, and cannot be, any hope from a House composed of land-thieves, of stock-exchange gamblers, money-lenders, railway directors, lawyers, and military adventurers, all living, and intending to live, on the plunder of the people. The president said "the salvation of the masses could only be secured by a distinct, a robust, and an outspoken labour party." If the new party is to be distinct, it must organise the masses against the classes; on no question whatever must there be any compromise. If it is to be robust, it must raise the standard of revolt against all class privileges and class interests. It must take its stand on principle. It must war against royalty as an institution; against the principle and spirit of aristocracy, through all the ramifications of society; against the claims and the pretensions of capital, and proclaiming to the world the supremacy of labour, on which depends not only the wellbeing but the very existence of society; it must organise and prepare the workers for the one great struggle of the masses against the classes.

The president also declared in favour of international action as far as the European States go; "When the workmen of Europe united on a common line of action they would be all-powerful, and their lives would thenceforth be brightened." These words are true. Will the workers accept them, accept the principle involved therein? The words are true; let the workers embrace them. The words are important to-day; let the workers think of them and be guided by them. Liberty, dignity, and independence can spring only from the supremacy of labour, from the triumph of eternal right, of eternal justice; and the brotherhood of the human race can spring only from the organisation and supremacy of the wealth-producing millions throughout the civilised world.

Let the trades, then, organise the new labour party. Practically it will be a national party. It will embrace all that are necessary for the essential operations of society. The workers are more than two-thirds of the population. The labour party must be revolutionary from principle. It will embrace neither princes, priests, nor peers; neither stockjobbers nor capitalists—none who seek to perpetuate the robbery of the masses by the classes. It will war against the monopoly of the soil, and proclaim the land for the people. It will declare in favour of a national currency and the national organisation of currency. It will proclaim to the world that as labour is the only source of wealth, the instruments of labour belong to the workers, and should be national property. Then will machinery—labour-saving machinery—become a blessing to all, because working for the benefit of all,—increasing the nation's riches while decreasing the hours of labour. And then will be possible the reconstruction of society on the principle of equal liberty, of equal social advantages to each and all in all the relations of life and through all the ramifications of society. And then will be possible the holy alliance of the peoples, and the brotherhood of the human race.

Will the trades form the new Labour Party—"distinct, robust, and outspoken"—revolutionary in spirit and in principle? We shall see.

J. SKETCHLEY.

MEN WHO ARE NOT SOCIALISTS.

III.

"POOR old Weaver! who would have thought he would have come to this bad end? There he was—once a Radical of Radicals—the ancient enemy of the House of Lords, perpetual pensions, monarchy, faggot votes, game laws, and church establishment,—right on the front platform seat of a Tory meeting! a Tory fop on one hand, and an Orange clergyman on the other; Tories to the right, left, front, and behind him, volleying and thundering!" This was my mental exclamation as I entered a Tory meeting during the last general election, with the view of studying "human nature," so as to meet the accusation of opponents of Socialism.

Yes, there old Mr. Weaver—the life-long reformer, Radical, and Republican—sat, stuck like a thistle among dockens, supporting the candidature of a Tory landlord. He did not seem altogether quite at his ease in his new environment, and when he applauded he was apt to do so before the speaker's sentence was completed, thereby frequently signifying approval of what the succeeding words of the speaker meant to disapprove. This awkward habit, I observed, brought suspicious glances upon him from his neighbours, particularly from the chairman, a florid-looking old gentleman with a powerful presence and a weak voice.

Mr. Weaver, who has only recently retired on a small trades' society aliment from hard daily toil, is a man of over sixty years of age. He has keen-cut Calvinistic features, and is of slight but very wiry frame. He always carries a thick blackthorn stick about with him, which has become quite as much a part of his anatomy as his arm or his leg. When speaking he emphasizes his remarks by thumping it vigorously upon the floor, and when walking he puts it to the ground in a way that indicates how distinctly his mental habit of disputation has impressed itself upon his bodily character.

Mr. Weaver may be said to have been a Radical from birth. His father was a Chartist, and when only six years of age his boy marched side by side with him at the great Reform Demonstration of 1832, carrying a small banneret bearing the words, "The Tories are more knaves than fools!" From that time onward Mr. Weaver boldly held aloft the banner of his political creed. Regarding his vote as a solemn trust, he faithfully recorded it at every election. Had the Radical party been called upon at any time to vindicate their principles by an appeal to arms, Mr. Weaver would have been amongst the first to march to the field. Methinks I can see him sally forth early in the morning, with his clothes carefully brushed and his boots neatly polished, with his pike or musket over his shoulder, his lips sternly pressed together and his eyes peering anxiously ahead. Why it is, I don't know, but I cannot imagine Mr. Weaver returning from the conflict. No, I am perfectly certain he would not have returned; there is something about Mr. Weaver that tells me he would have been amongst the first to get popped down. I never knew of men of Mr. Weaver's type returning from the wars; they always get killed at the very outset. They never turn up as old pensioners. Had a Radical riot taken place and half-a-dozen persons been shot, I am sure those persons would have been two infants in arms, a small boy, a young woman, an old woman, and Mr. Weaver. Had only one person been killed, Mr. Weaver would inevitably have been that one. There is a something, I don't know if it is a divinity, that doth edge men like Mr. Weaver right into the track of spent bullets and falling brick-bats.

Mr. Weaver, besides being a Radical, is a strict teetotaler and a staunch Freethinker. As a Freethinker he attends secularist meetings every Sunday with a regularity that savours of piety. There is another point in his behaviour that almost entitles Mr. Weaver to be regarded as a religious man, despite his Atheism—his frequent presence at Freethinkers' funerals. He never misses one within a radius of ten miles. Christians will note with regret, probably tinged with a pious satisfaction however, that the number of these funerals have increased much of late years. So often indeed is Mr. Weaver to be seen plodding forth with craped hat and white-cuffed sleeves, that many of his neighbours who know not his evil reputation as an infidel cherish the idea that he is a Free Church elder or a city missionary of some sort. It is not to be imagined that this characteristic of Mr. Weaver's springs from his having any peculiar fondness for funerals, Freethinker or otherwise, but from a perfectly amiable desire to testify, as he himself puts it, "that men may respect their dead friends even though they are not morally certain that their souls have gone to roast in hell-fire."

The story of Mr. Weaver's political apostacy is a pathetic one, and has a high moral for political partisans. Mr. Weaver, like Radicals in general, had a supreme admiration for Mr. Gladstone. When a few years ago Mr. Gladstone denounced the Irish as rebels and robbers, Mr. Weaver did so likewise.

Some of Mr. Weaver's secularist friends, who were then Land Leaguers, and who subsequently became Socialists, denounced both Mr. Weaver and Mr. Gladstone. Mr. Weaver vindicated himself and his political chief by standing up righteously for "law and order," and protesting his belief that the Irish were utterly bad in all their ways!

I remember the Sunday morning after it was announced that Mr. Gladstone intended bringing forward a Home Rule measure for Ireland. There was a political discussion on in the secularist hall. Mr. Weaver was at his post, looking anxious, and, I thought, somewhat older than usual.

I am sure he had not slept much for several nights previously, thinking over the terrible news of his chief's conversion to the side of the "assassins." Of course Mr. Weaver was twitted by his opponents about his chief's turn round. Mr. Weaver professed entire disbelief in the news, and in his indignation at some of the sallies against himself, defiantly asserted that even if it were true that Mr. Gladstone had changed his mind, he at least had not, and even his respect for that great and venerable statesman would never constrain him to grant concessions to traitors and assassins who were marching through public plunder to the disintegration of the empire. Mr. Weaver, who is usually very circumspect in debate, became very angry and even rude that day, and had to be admonished several times from the chair.

This was the turning-point in Mr. Weaver's political career. He went all wrong after that. He modified his views upon manhood suffrage, because he could not admit that Irishmen had a right to political freedom; he discarded his land nationalisation principles, because the Irish people were leagued against landlordism; and he had even a good word to say for the House of Lords, because he perceived that the lords were likely to prove a powerful obstacle to "rash and treasonable legislation."

He had previously affected a kind of tolerant sympathy for Socialism, but now, seeing Socialists were all for Home Rule, he diligently studied Mr. Bradlaugh's 'Objections to Socialism,' and vigorously declaimed them upon all suitable and even upon unsuitable occasions.

Nature was eagerly waiting some such opportunity to give Mr. Weaver's mind a halting-place. She hadn't intended him from the beginning for a pioneer; she didn't expect that he would have gone even so far as he did. She had endowed him with but a limited amount of initial velocity freedomwards; but Mr. Weaver had contrived to make the most of it, all honour to him, and external circumstances had tended to give it additional impulsion. When it did come to a stop, it is no wonder then that its thin-worn mechanism easily yielded to the force of reaction and ran rickety down-hill.

After the Tory meeting, to which I referred at the outset, was over, I could not help, from a feeling of kindly sympathy, going forward to speak to Mr. Weaver—for who could but pity him now, forced by an unkind fate to associate with those whom he could not but still despise and who secretly detested him. He met me with some self-consciousness of disgrace in his face, but took my hand warmly as one who meets a friend in a foreign land. I didn't wish to jeer him, but rather wished to cheer him up a bit, poor soul!

"You've had a good meeting," I said.

"Yes," he replied, with a faint smile; "you see everybody has given up his own judgment in politics."

"Come, now, Mr. Weaver," I said, "don't slide on to an argument on politics. You'll be sure to fall if you do!"

"Ah!" he exclaimed, "I am not ashamed of my opinions, nor afraid to discuss them, now, any more than I was when I advocated true Radical principles—the same principles that I maintain to-day—before you were born."

"Tell me, Mr. Weaver," I said, "did you creep backward when you were a child?"

Mr. Weaver was called away at this juncture by a member of committee, and did not answer me. No doubt he thought I was joking with him, but, if the editor will allow me, I will show that there is a deal of philosophy underlying the question. Like all social philosophers—Plato and Rousseau, for example—I take a deep interest in the early uprearing of the race.

When I first alarmed my family connections by exhibiting a propensity for Land League and Socialistic principles, I remember my mother in admonishing me, said: "When you were a bairn, Johnny, you always crept backwards, and I aye mind an auld beggar woman at the door ance said on seeing ye stick fust against the wa', 'Weel fa' the callant! he gangs backward the noo, but, fegs! ye'll find he'll gang weel furett when he grows up!'" I reflected upon this remark, and perceived there was sound philosophy in it. There is a period of reaction, or creeping backward, I reasoned, inevitable in all men's lives, and it is well that it should take place in youth—it is a bad case when it overtakes the individual half-way or towards the end of his life. Recognising the intimate relation between physical and mental habit, I concluded that it is a good sign to see children creep backwards; they are sure then to go, as the old woman said, right ahead when they grow up. I even reasoned that it would be a wise plan to purposely train children to creep backwards, just as we now vaccinate them against small-pox. Besides, there is another advantage in children creeping backwards. Children who creep forward are continually cracking their little heads against chair-legs and bed-posts, whereby the youthful cerebrum suffers considerable cellular modification—a fact which, seeing most British children creep forward, probably accounts for the prevalence of lunacy and conservatism in this country. Children, on the other hand, who creep backwards, by a wise dispensation of providence suffer the concussions upon a part of their body upon which, according to the wisdom of the ages, repeated concussions, so far from proving harmful in any way, exercise quite a wholesome influence in determining the mental habit of youth in the straight and forward path of rectitude.

It is my firm conviction, therefore, that if due enquiry were made it would be found that all true champions of freedom who have gone on unswervingly to the end, started in life by creeping backwards, thus forestalling the inevitable law of reaction. Mr. Weaver, I am certain sure, began by creeping forward in the conventional way; consequently he had to make amends to fate later on. He is now doing so. And if truth were at all admissible in epitaphs, and if to me were appointed the task of writing Mr. Weaver's when he is dead (and far distant may that time be!), I would—in the light of the new philosophy of creeping which I have just endeavoured to elucidate—simply inscribe the words: "He died creeping backwards."

A CONSUMER'S COMPLAINT.—"Coal has gone up." "Is that so; coal-beds run out?" "No." "Miners struck?" "No." "Coal barons going to pay higher wages?" "No." "Seventy-five cents per ton duty taken off coal?" "No; that would make it cheaper, not dearer." "Extraordinary demand for coal?" "No." "Dealers looking for bigger profits?" "Well, no, not to speak of. Corner on Nature's bounty to all, that's what's the matter. The octopus, the coal barons, have been in consultation." Conspiracy and result! Have not the coal barons got their tentacles on all the coal lands; on all the means of transportation from the mines; on the representatives in legislatures and in congress; on the judges of the courts, and on the titles and deeds that they will sustain them in holding and claiming that which they never created? Have they not got the miners so starved into submission that they dare not call their souls their own (and they doubt very much if miners have any souls); and have they not got a hand in every consumer's pocket? Yes, and the Lord be praised!—The Advance.

Every man in this country is born a member of a great and powerful society; and we never hesitate to act towards him on the supposition that his being so born gives that society rights to be enforced against him. Equally true is it that he has a birthright by being born a member of society. . . . In the words of the greatest of political philosophers, he has "a right to all that society, with all its combinations of skill and capital, can do in his favour." In the words of one greater than man—the words in which is recorded the primeval sentence of our race—a sentence which contains at once the hard lot of the labouring man and the great charter of his rights, a charter prior to the authority of states or the rights of property—he has a right "in the sweat of his brow to eat bread." That society has forgotten its duties in which such a claim as this is not answered; in the social or economic system of that country in which men are willing to work and cannot eat their bread there is something radically wrong. The right of every man in the land is, to the utmost of all the power of the society that claims him as a member, to have the power of earning a livelihood secured to him. This is the first, the elder duty of society. It is vain to speak of the blessings of increasing national wealth, if to this you sacrifice the comforts of the poor. Better, far better for the country, would be the state of things which would give to every working-man in the country the assurance that his industry would command, for its reasonable exertion, the means of livelihood, than the most brilliant prospects which could be opened of wealth to our merchants, of magnificence to our nobles, or aggrandisement to our manufacturers.—Isaac Butt, LL.D.: Lectures on Political Economy, delivered at Dublin University January 1846.

THE UNION OF THE DEMOCRACIES.

(From the French of BERANGER. Translated by CHARLES J. GLADWELL.)

There came to me a vision as of Peace,
A Goddess bright, descending to the earth;
Hushed were the sounds of war, and in their place
Spread gladsome joy, and merriment and mirth.
"Arise," the Goddess cried, "in love fraternal,
French, German, English, peoples of all lands!
Form now in unity a bond eternal,
And grasp each other's hands."

"Unhappy men! E'en ye who seek to quell
The springs of hatred take but troubled rest;
Learn from your sorrows now in peace to dwell;
Enjoy the good with which your earth is blest.
While fastened to the Juggernaut of Power
Ye ne'er can learn what happiness demands;
Then free yourselves henceforth from this hour,
And grasp each other's hands."

"Against your neighbours now ye bear the sword,
With flames devour their cottages and homes;
And e'er the sun lights up the scene abhorred
O'er the sad field grim death in silence roams.
At your frontiers the blood of your own race
Upon each tuft of green your hatred brands;
Cease then this strife, these passions foul and base,
And grasp each other's hands."

"In insolence your rulers and your kings—
While burning cities desolate the plains,
And the still air with groans of dying riugs—
Yet callously recount their bloody gains.
Weak, simple herds! How helplessly ye leave
Your heavy yokes for martial chains and bands.
Now quit your bonds, past errors now retrieve,
And grasp each other's hands."

"And since your rulers cease not war to wage,
Ye must among yourselves your peace secure.
Shed not your blood, nor in fell strife engage
For thankless kings or heroes of the hour.
By men of genius be not led astray,
The truly great iniquity withstands;
Then turn your thoughts towards a brighter day,
And grasp each other's hands."

"For ever, then, the happy peace prolong,
Casting o'er the past a heavy veil;
Pursue your toil to sounds of gladsome song,
Let victories of peaceful art prevail.
Hope smiling in the bosom of rich plenty,
You'll welcome the sweet fruits of marriage bands;
All nations dwell henceforth in loving bounty,
And grasp each other's hands."

We have received from Napoleone Colajanni a pamphlet on 'Collective Property' (Di Alcieni Studii recenti sulla Proprietà Collettiva), which students of Socialism will find of use to them. There are several careless and unnecessary printing errors in English words quoted in it.

"The labourer is worthy of his hire." Yes, but the word "hire" means not what he usually gets for his labour, but what he should really get for his labour. It is the violation of this simple law that has ruined several nations and is now breeding barbarians in our midst.—Dr. McGlynn.

Henry George first preached "the land for the people"; then he recanted so far as to claim "the land-tax for the people"; now he fully crawfishes and swears that he will disturb "no right of property nor change the titles by which land is held." This is terrible rough on Galileo.—Denver Labour Enquirer.

'LONDONER ARBEITER ZEITUNG.'—This paper, like our own, is making heroic efforts to cope with great difficulties. Society as it exists to-day will not continue. As instruction gradually descends to the lower classes, they discover the secret sore which has been gnawing at the heart of social order since the beginning of the world; a sore which is the cause of all popular agitations. The excessive inequality of conditions and fortunes could be endured as long as it was hidden on the one hand by ignorance, on the other by factitious civil organisation. But as soon as this inequality becomes generally recognised, its death-blow has been struck.

Recompose, if you can, those fictions of aristocracy; try to persuade the poor when they can read, when light is borne to them every day by the press, from town to town and village to village; try to persuade them when they possess the same knowledge and understanding as you, that they ought to submit to every privation, while neighbour so-and-so has, without working, a thousand times the wherewithal to live. Your efforts will be in vain. Expect not of the crowd impossible virtues.

When financial and commercial barriers shall have been abolished between different states, as they have already been between provinces of the same states; when wages, which are but a prolonged slavery, shall have become emancipated by the help of the equality established between producer and consumer; when the different countries, interchanging manners, abandoning national prejudices, abandoning the old ideas of supremacy or conquest, shall draw close to the union of peoples,—by what means will you then force society to return to worn-out principles? Even Bonaparte could not.

Before reaching this goal of a union of peoples, this goal of a natural democracy, we shall have to pass through a period of social decomposition, a period of anarchy, perhaps of blood, assuredly of weakness. This decomposition has begun; but has not yet advanced far enough to be ready to reproduce the new society.—The end of Chateaubriand's 'Essai sur la littérature Anglaise et considérations sur le génie des hommes, des temps et des révolutions.'

'LABOUR, LEISURE, AND LUXURY.'

A BOOK on economic subjects, that modestly displays within its boards twelve closely printed pages of laudation from the capitalist press, and opens with the statement that "the teaching of the most erroneous and subversive doctrines regarding property has been increasing and bearing fruit to an alarming extent," is sure to be regarded by a Socialist with suspicion, and likely to be read by him with rather a critical eye. Such a book is 'Labour, Leisure, and Luxury,' of which a popular edition has been issued recently. The author, a Mr. Alexander Wylie, who is said to be himself a large employer of labour, naturally enough approaches the labour question with not a few of the prejudices of his class, and arrives at conclusions likely to afford the greatest satisfaction to his capitalist friends.

He maintains that the rule of "that great commercial dictator, the capitalist," is necessitated by "the luxurious indulgence and consequent immorality of an industrial population," and that popular luxuriousness is a great cause of the concentration of property into few hands. He says a great cause, but all through his book an observant reader will notice he manipulates his subject and his words in such a manner that the unwary will not fail to conclude that it is THE great cause, if not the ONLY cause. Thus he states in the conclusion of his book that the whole question of economic progress is bound up in the question of the acquisition by the working-classes of property, which must be acquired by saving that which is now expended upon vicious luxuries. Seeing that Mr. Wylie has taken into consideration only one of the causes (if cause it be) of the appropriation by the few of the surplus labour and value gained by union, which, as he says truly, should have gone to the civilising of the whole mass, it is evident that his attempt to solve the labour problem must necessarily be an utter failure.

How far wrong he has gone is shown by his advocacy of thrift as the panacea for the ills we bear. Abstinence by the workers from vicious luxuries is, according to him, the only means by which the emancipation of labour can be achieved. Now, thrift is all very well in its proper place, but as a cure for poverty it is simply out of the question. One is tempted to doubt the sanity of the man that would preach such a gospel for the poor, even to workers that are far better off than the many placed in the same economic conditions as the Dorsetshire labourer mentioned by Mr. Wylie—a worker whose rate of wages "on the average is rather less than ten shillings per week, including every perquisite in the shape of extra food, beer, money, firing, and extra pay at hay-time and harvest," of which miserable sum "one-sixth has to be paid for rent of house," so that "it is only by feeding on coarse bread, potatoes, cabbage, and rice in scant allowance, with occasionally a bit of pork, that he can contrive to keep himself, wife, and two or three children in life." Just imagine the diseased mental and moral state of the man who would advise poor, half-starved wretches like these to spend less on vicious luxuries, and to procure with their savings "respectable Sunday suits" (even "at the cost of considerable privation in their food supplies and other things"), then furniture, then houses, and lastly, "the tools, machinery, workshops, factories, lands, ships, etc., requisite for carrying on their daily avocations"! Is it astonishing that "the subversive doctrines regarding property" should be eagerly accepted in preference to doctrines that, like Mr. Wylie's, but mock the people and bring nothing but despair to hundreds of thousands of families?

Mr. Wylie's main idea is that "that moral condition of society which encourages abnormal accumulation of wealth by the few is the unfitness of the many for the use of larger means of life than the residuum left by their wealthier fellows," who are, however, as he candidly admits, "often men of much the same moral calibre as themselves." This ridiculous theory is best met by simply showing how false is the historical statement upon which it seems to be based. Mr. Wylie says: "The higher wages which followed the introduction of steam-power, and the countless mechanical inventions which turned it to account, in Lancashire especially, where it has been most taken advantage of, instead of enriching, strengthening, and educating, in the ignorant and immoral hands of the workmen positively helped to make them poorer, feebler, more sensual and ignorant; and well was it for the nation, themselves included, that the superior men amongst them were, partly by this very improvidence and ignorance, raised into such a position of power as capitalists that they could take from them, with the strong and stern hand that which, while being wasted, would have wasted their own souls, and though devoting it generally to the maintenance of a huge system of refined luxury, rescue it from the tenfold worse abuse of gluttony, debauchery, and idleness." Compare that with the following account of the condition of the worker at the very same period, given in 'Six Centuries of Work and Wages,' by Professor Thorold Rogers, who is surely more worthy of credence as a historian than Mr. Wylie: "The factory hand was even worse off than the labourer, and, as machinery was gradually being introduced into the manufacture of textile fabrics, the handloom weaver was worst off of all. Great as was the demand for labour under the new system, it was, unfortunately, not counterbalanced by an increase of real wages, hardly of nominal wages, for the demand was for both sexes and nearly all ages. But the severest penury fell on those who had been, in the older days of manufacture, the specially skilled artisans in textile fabrics." Again he says: "That the patents of Arkwright and Peel secured enormous fortunes for these inventors or purchasers of inventions we all know; that they ultimately cheapened production is equally clear; that they gave England wellnigh a monopoly in the supply of textile fabrics is as manifest; but it does not strictly follow that the English workman was better paid. The handloom weaver was undoubtedly impoverished, but I do not find that the machine weaver bettered his position. His wages remained low, his means were even straitened, and the misery of the manufacturing districts was even greater than that of the agricultural." So much for our author's knowledge of history and his application of it to the solution of the labour problem.

Having detected such a glaring misrepresentation of a historical fact, we cannot be expected to place much confidence in the other statements Mr. Wylie makes in proof of the gross immorality of the working people, even if we have no other reasons for believing them inaccurate. According to his account, Dumbarton, which he does not say is worse than other places, appears to have been a regular pandemonium in prosperous times. The great majority of the riveters there, earning during these times from five to ten pounds a-week of 51 hours, spent all their fabulous wages in riot and debauchery, often swallowing up, in addition, the smaller gains of their wives, whom they sent without scruple to do their 56½ hours in Mr. Wylie's own works. Without enquiring why the latter—believing strongly that the immense majority of the working people require "the strong guidance of the capitalist, or to use the good old-fashioned word, 'the master,'" whilst disapproving of men making slaves of their wives, and holding that the true sphere of the woman is in her own house attending to her children and the domestic comfort of her husband—did not refuse employment to them, we cannot but think that our friend is apt to be carried away by excess of zeal into the domains of fiction. It is certainly true that many of the working-class (and quite as large a proportion of the other classes) indulge in what are called vicious luxuries, among which drink occupies the first place, but it is not true that the great majority do so. Moreover, the greater number of these so-called "immoral" workers are driven to drink by their economic condition.

This was shown clearly in an able article on "Consumption," which appeared recently in the Scotsman. It was stated on the authority of Dr. Andrew Smart that in this country there are 850,000 souls engaged in manual labour that causes a startling abbreviation of life—consumption being the test disease, that by which is gauged the comparative unhealthiness of the work engaged in by a tenth part of our industrial population. "Consumption is not like cholera, it does not kill in a night. It may be feeding on its victim three, six, or even twelve months, before finally destroying him. Let us suppose the case of a workman engaged in one of these unhealthy trades. At first he does not feel anything amiss; but, by and bye, the poisonous nature of the atmosphere surrounding him, or the constraint of the bodily position in which he has to work, or the keen-edged dust he is forced to breathe, or any of the other causes that suffice to make work unhealthy, begins to tell upon him. The human frame is good for resistance up to a certain point; but pass that point, and the recuperative power is gone, and the strength of the man runs down like a clock with the weights off. Within a period of time then, varying, of course, with the constitution of the workman, he finds that he is not so apt for labour as he used to be. Why, perhaps, he cannot tell. A depression of spirits steals over him. His labours become a burden, not a pleasure. This lassitude growing not lessening, he in time finds his strength not sufficient for his day's work. But the man must work or he will starve. It will not do for him to be ill. Strength must be got somehow. How? Now, as we do not wish to be suspected even of a temporary lapse into the cant of teetotalism, we will try, in stating the case, to err, if at all, on the side of moderation. But look at the question fairly. Let us put ourselves in the workman's shoes, and then say where we would go for stimulus. It is all very well for men who have never been tempted (note this, Mr. Alexander Wylie) to preach against the "sin" of tasting ardent spirits. Let us suppose, however, a case in which the man does not resort to drink after he begins to feel the budding of the germs of consumption that have been sown so plentifully by the work he is engaged in. If he still keeps to his work, and does not use alcoholic stimulants, one of these two things must necessarily happen. He will either work less or work worse. His labour will be inferior either in point of quantity or in point of quality. In either case his wages will be reduced, while his home expenses increase, and thus the hope, much less the act, of saving rapidly becomes a thing of the past. Not being able to save while he is at work, it necessarily follows that when the disease grows upon him to such an extent as to disable him for work altogether, he must become a burden either to the parish or to his friends." Now, the 850,000 workmen referred to, leave on a very moderate estimate 212,500 descendants who will, in the course of time, develop the hereditary disease, and require to use "the same means as their fathers to stave it off. Then the number of drinkers is reinforced by those whose daily work incapacitates them for enjoying any but the coarsest pleasures during their brief period of cessation from toil. If temperance reformers took a reasonable view of the case, they would readily admit that in most cases drunkenness is not the cause of poverty, but poverty of drunkenness. It is strange Mr. Wylie does not see this, the more so that he makes the following statement. "Drunkenness is the delusive refuge into which, in the Anglo-Saxon race especially, human nature, working below its proper healthy, moral, and consequently happy tone, almost inevitably rushes."

On the assumption, then, that the working classes have a bigger share of original sin than their "superiors," and are therefore unfit to make a proper use of the wealth they create, the author of 'Labour, Leisure, and Luxury' justifies the appropriation of as much of that wealth as possible by the upper classes, and the expenditure of it on themselves—a doctrine that makes short work of the eighth commandment, and is, therefore, above all others pernicious and immoral. While it is undoubtedly true that too little attention has hitherto been paid to the subject of what wealth it is most beneficial to produce for consumption by the race, there is every reason to believe that ignorance on this point is as prevalent among the wealthy as among the working classes. Be that as it may, Mr. Wylie rejoices that his class has the power of abstracting from the workers the greater part of the wealth the latter produce. To his credit, however, he believes that property has its duties, and insists that it is the first duty of his propertied friends (after those which they owe to themselves) "to strive as much as lies in their power to ameliorate the condition of the toiling millions whose industry enables their capital to fructify." Unfortunately the effect of such wholesome teaching will likely be nullified by the saving clause, for the leisured classes have rather inordinate notions as to what they owe to themselves. Still, Mr. Wylie tries to remove every obstacle self-interest may lay in the path of duty. In case they may be afraid of undermining their present position of privilege by attending to the duties of property, he informs them that when the working classes have with the help of their "masters" realised Mr. Wylie's ideal social state, when the working classes have "by higher intelligence and morality" acquired a larger share of property, the numbers of those enabled to lead the lives of luxurious sinecurists through the present concentration of wealth will not be curtailed. Philanthropy with no worse result than this is by no means "dangerous," and ought to be rather popular among the classes. The masses, however, will understand what sort of friend they have in Mr. Wylie, on learning that he looks forward with equanimity to their being saddled for all time with the annual payment of the £550,000,000, which as he himself shows is at present secured for the entire and special luxury of about 750,000 families.

Taken all in all this book will certainly not help in the very least to stem the tide of Socialism. Its author hopes, it is true, that it will "help to dispel those Communistic ideas so prevalent in neighbouring countries from the minds of our working classes," but how can he expect this result when he has not taken the slightest trouble to learn what those ideas are? He not only neglects to examine Socialism and criticise it, but carefully avoids considering the pressing economic problems of the day; indeed he is to be condemned not so much for what he says, as for what he leaves unsaid. He does not show how dull trade, scarcity of work, starvation wages, adulteration, and similar evils are to be remedied. Fearful of exposing the weakness of his position he ignores these problems—problems which the working people feel must be settled without delay, and which Socialism alone boldly grapples with and successfully solves. J. HALDANE SMITH.

NOTES BY A TRADES'-UNIONIST.

THE Labour Tribune has a more than ordinarily stupid leader on the recent vote of the Northumberland miners re Messrs. Burt and Fenwick. It is gravely argued that, because the men refuse longer to support these political jelly-fish, therefore all progress is to be stayed and the workers to be left helpless in the hands of their enemies. "Who will fight the battle of the poor man in Northumberland if the withdrawals take place? What will prevent the middle-class man from being chosen and returned?"

As if as far as fighting goes, middle-class men like Graham and Labouchere have not shown far more pluck and energy than any of the so-called labour M.P.'s, who misrepresent the workers at present.

It is strange that our contemporary should remain so blind and deaf to the ferment of the "new wine" of Socialism that is quickening the impulses and aspirations of "organised labour," in whose name it claims to speak. Here is a sentence which one might expect to find in the Daily Telegraph, or other plunderer's paper, but which seems oddly out of place in a Labour Tribune:—"It will be a bad day for England when feeling runs so high against capitalists as it is doing now in America, in connection with the condemned Chicago Socialists." Will the editor in his great wisdom please to "enlighten our darkness" in regard to this?

Mr. Pickard, M.P., has been delivering himself before a meeting of Yorkshire miners, in regard to Mr. Burt, the Socialists, and direct labour representation. He appears to have been suffering under an acute attack of spleen that still further muddled his not over brilliant brains. Yorkshiremen are generally credited with being pretty 'cute, and they must have sadly deteriorated since I lived amongst them if they listened without laughing at the ludicrous assertions of Mr. Pickard, viz., that the aims and interests of Socialists and Tories were identical, and that they were striving to form a labour party for the purpose of destroying the power and influence of the trades' unions.

Instead of making these senseless, blundering statements, it would be better for Mr. Pickard and his colleagues, if they expect or desire to remain "leaders," to make some enquiry into the doctrines they denounce and into the character of its exponents. It might surprise them to find that a large proportion of Socialists are as active and earnest trades' unionists even as themselves, and considerably less entitled to be classed as Tories, or at least the friends of Tories.

How fallacious are the charges made by Mr. Pickard may easily be seen by any one who will take the trouble to send to Mr. Mack, 4 Back Marlow Street, Blyth, secretary of the North of England Socialist Federation, for a copy of the constitution and rules of that association, which was founded as the result of the agitation during the late strike. Here are two items of the programme:

- "(3) Helping Trades'-unionism, Co-operation, and every genuine movement for the good of the workers.
- (4) Promoting a scheme for the National and International Federation of Labour."

An M.P., writing in the Pall Mall Gazette on the vote of the Northumberland miners, pays fair tribute to the influence of the Socialist propaganda, and in an "occasional note" in the same paper, commenting on the subject and on Mr. Pickard's speech, the following pertinent observation occurs, which I commend to all those whom it may concern:—"Mr. Pickard, indeed, went on to abuse them [the Socialists] soundly, and even to ridicule them; but a cause which, in the opinion of its opponents, is strong enough already to effect a revolution in the relations between the miners and their representatives, can afford to bear a good deal of ridicule."

The following almost incredible act of folly is recorded in the Pall Mall of Tuesday:

"About three hundred men, employed by the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, met at Mexborough on Sunday, and resolved to forego one week's wages with the object of assisting the company to pay the claims arising out of the Hexthorpe collision."

One's astonishment to find in these hard times a body of workers who can afford to be so munificent, is overcome by indignation as to the object of the outlay. Surely these men might have found amongst their own class more needy and more deserving recipients of their bounty. They might, for instance, have given a thought to their fellow-workers victimised by the rascality and rapacity of the Midland Railway Co. instead of wasting their charity on the dividend drones of the M. S. & L. R. C. It will be well for these "generous" workmen if the directors, perceiving that the employés have more money than wit to use it wisely, do not take an early opportunity to reduce their wages. Should such be the case, I for one, should almost be inclined to say, "Serve them right!" T. BINNING.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

THE OLDHAM DISTRICT COTTON INDUSTRY.—The operatives' strikes in many of the mills have been settled by compromise. The mills at Castleton are running short time. The operatives at Messrs. Hopwood and Sons continue on strike.

MORE MISERY.—Considerable dismay has been caused at Portsmouth by two hundred additional men receiving notice of discharge from the dockyard. It was hoped, from Lord George Hamilton's recent statement, that all discharges had ceased.

THE SHIP-JOINERS' STRIKE AT ELSWICK.—There is no change in the attitude of the joiners at present on strike owing to a dispute in the sharing of the work at Armstrong, Mitchell, and Co.'s works at Elswick. The men are still waiting a reply from the firm, whom they have approached with a view to negotiations for a settlement.

SHIPBUILDING ON THE CLYDE.—About 200 workmen employed in the shipbuilding yard of Messrs. Caird and Co., Greenock, were discharged on Saturday. A fortnight ago the same firm paid off 120 men, and further discharges are expected when the new P. and O. steamer Britannia is fitted out. Messrs. Caird and Co. have at present nothing in the stocks and no order on hand. The outlook for the Clyde workers in connection with shipbuilding during the coming winter is of a dismal nature.

SOUTH WALES COLLIERS.—The announcement that the representatives of about sixty thousand colliers in South Wales have given notice to their employers to terminate the existing sliding-scale arrangements causes apprehension. The men urge that upon the existing basis they do not obtain fair remuneration. The agreement is of no effect in cases of dispute, because no provision is made for the adjustment of differences relating to matters not specified in the agreement. Moreover, the workmen receive no advance whatever unless the price of coal rises 4d. per ton, whereas, if the market fall to the extent of the smallest decimal, a reduction of 2½ per cent. is immediately effected in their wages.

STRIKE OF TAILORS IN DROGHEDA.—The tailors in the employment of Thomas Brady, Nationalist, T.C., Drogheda, having demanded an equal wage to that paid by other houses in the town, were locked out. An indignation meeting, in which all the local trade and labour bodies took part, was held, and for the first time in an Irish provincial town, the Socialistic view of the labour question was expounded. The strike will probably be a prolonged one, as both sides are resolved on holding out to the last.

THE PROPOSED CO-OPERATIVE GLASS-MANUFACTURING SOCIETY.—The suggested starting of this society has caused some little excitement at Stourbridge. The recent difficulty between masters and men has been practically settled, and the proposed starting of a co-operative glass-manufactory has come as a surprise upon the masters. The men, as is well known, have considerable funds in their trade society—as much as £10,000—and if the committee decided to apply any important part of it in a manufacturing concern the thing could be begun, as a matter of course. The promoters of the scheme are, however, looking beyond this to a large number of shares being taken up by the glassmakers themselves, and many of the men have promised to take shares.

MINERS AND THE EIGHT HOURS MOVEMENT.—The Welsh coal miners' delegates, having met to consider a report of the Trade Union Congress, passed the following resolution: "That this meeting is convinced, by practical experience, that eight hours is quite sufficient for miners to be in any mine in every twenty-four hours when working single shift, and seven hours when working double shift; and that we are of opinion that the produced wealth of the country is ample to permit the miners a moderate living for the said amount of labour: therefore we urge upon the miners of the whole country to organise and agitate for an Eight Hours' Labour Act."

NORTHAMPTON STRIKE—"ROUGH ON 'RATS'."—Serious rioting has taken place in Northampton over the boot strike, which has now been in existence ten weeks, and at present shows no sign of abatement. Last week one of the men who is at work contrary to the women's union was so frightened at the demonstrations of hostility to him that he dropped down dead in the factory. He was surrounded by policemen at the time. The jury returned a verdict that death was accelerated by the menacing attitude of the crowd. On Tuesday night a crowd of about a thousand workpeople surrounded the factory of Messrs. Cove and West, and hooted and hissed the "accommodating" workmen as they left. Some were chased along the streets in different directions, followed by showers of mud. One man took refuge in a tailor's shop, and was some time afterwards found hiding in the cellar. He was escorted to his home by two policemen. Later in the evening, stone-throwing was commenced, and the windows of the factory, the house where the employers have been boarding some men, and the homes of some of the workmen, were shattered. Considerable excitement prevails, and a renewal of the stone-throwing and intimidation is expected every night.

THE STRIKE IN THE NAIL TRADE.—At a meeting of nailers on strike, held at Broomsgrove, there was a good attendance. Mr. Roberts presided, and in the course of an address said the present was the best strike they ever had in the nail trade, both at Broomsgrove and in the up-country districts. Mr. Powell advised the nailers not to be discouraged at anything they heard. He believed they would not be out long, for they had the public sympathy on their side. In explaining the low state to which they were reduced, he said they now received 13s. for work which a few years ago they had 30s. for, and at that time trade was not a bit better than other trades, so that the public could judge of the extent to which they had been reduced. Mr. Collins wished it particularly to be known that the master by whom he had been employed had, since the strike began, been going about and buying up all the nails he could get at 10 per cent. less than the 1879 list—the price which the nailers asked for before the strike. The men were encouraged to continue firm, and the meeting adjourned.—At an open-air mass meeting of nailers at Halesowen, Mr. Price, president of the association, stated that the strike was the most general he had ever known in the trade, very few of the operatives being at work. None of the masters had agreed to pay the advance. A resolution was adopted deciding to continue the strike until all the masters had conceded the increase. Later.—At mass meetings on the 26th it was decided to submit the dispute to arbitration, provided the employers consent.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—Although the masters announce that as far as they are concerned the dispute is at an end, the position of the men on strike is in no way altered, except that whereas last week the door of compromise was open, it is now closed. The twentieth week of the strike will be entered upon with prospects of an amicable settlement even more distant than at first. The men have refused to accept arbitration, and the employers are taking measures to fill their workshops with imported labour. The arguments urged by the men as justifying their action in refusing arbitration on the terms offered are various. Of course, had they resumed work the subscriptions which have hitherto flowed in so liberally would have at once ceased. There are now, roughly estimated, 300 imported men in the various works. These the masters would not undertake to discharge. Consequently a large number of Bolton workmen would have remained in the streets chargeable upon the funds of their organisations at a time when no outside aid was forthcoming. The words "as required" in the masters' proposal might be construed into tens, fifties, or hundreds, according to the will of the employers. Further, the men entertain the opinion that the masters would do all in their power to cripple the society's funds by forcing them to maintain a large number of out-of-work members. It is also urged that the men having come out on strike in a body, if they agree to arbitration, should have the privilege, win or lose, of resuming work. The last notice of the employers appears to close the doors to any further negotiations, and so far as they are concerned the strike hands have no choice but to resume work on the present terms or remain out. The employers do not now hesitate to assert that they confidently believe if the men had consented to resort to arbitration pure and simple on the wages question, the umpire would have had no alternative but to decree a further reduction. The men have decided on local practical measures, and at a full meeting of the Bolton United Trades' Council on the 21st, it was resolved to contest every ward in the borough at the forthcoming municipal elections, as a protest against the action of the authorities in connection with the existing strike in the iron trades, that is the bringing into the town of a large force of extra police and military, and retaining them despite the decided opinions of the ratepayers to the contrary.

ITALY.

The Labor Party of Italy held its third Congress at Pavia on Sept. 18th and 19th. Among the subjects for discussion on the programme were the re-organisation of the Labour Party itself; the practical means for securing Parliamentary representation; abolition of political struggle; the establishment of a centre for oratorical instruction for propaganda; the propagandist press, etc. We have received no details of the sittings as yet. The programme is of interest, and the discussion upon it should be fruitful.

SOCIALIST CO-OPERATION.

ONE of the largest and most successful meetings ever held at the hall of the Socialist League, 13, Farringdon Road, took place on Wednesday, Sept. 21, when A. C. Varley delivered his lecture on the above important subject. The following resolution was passed by a large majority:—"That in the opinion of this meeting it is desirable to start a Co-operative Society on Socialist lines." In accordance with this resolution a Provisional Committee has been formed to draw up the scheme to be submitted for acceptance at another meeting, which will be duly announced. Several persons who think well of the proposal, have already promised to contribute towards the necessary capital, receiving neither interest nor dividend, but secured by debenture bonds on the property of the Society. The Provisional Committee consists of the following:—H. A. Barker, T. Binning, W. Binning, D. C. Dallas, E. C. Fox, Mrs. S. Gostling, F. Kitz, J. F. Murray, J. Turner, A. C. Varley, and T. E. Wardle, with power to add to their number. The Committee will meet at 13, Farringdon Road, at 7.30 p.m., next Tuesday, Oct. 4. It is earnestly requested that the whole Committee be present on that occasion. A. C. Varley will deliver his lecture at the Bloomsbury Branch of the League at the German Communist Club, in Tottenham Street, Tottenham Court Road, on Thursday, October 13th, at 8.30 p.m. An opportunity will thus be given for further discussion. D. C. D.

The "Chambre Syndicale Ouvrière de la Cordonnerie de France" recently opened a subscription-list for the benefit of the shoemakers on strike at Northampton, and voted a sum of money from its own funds, "as evidence of the international solidarity of the workers."—E. T.

We hear that our comrade John Neave who has suffered in the German prisons before for his activity in the propagation of Socialism, will be brought up on October 3, to go through the farce of a trial on the charge of high treason.

CITY OF LONDON COLLEGE, WHITE STREET, MOORFIELDS, E.C.—POLITICAL ECONOMY.—We are glad to learn that the Council of this College, recognising the value of this subject to their students and young men generally, have established a course of lectures in political economy, which will be free to all the students connected with the college. Mr. Sidney Webb, L.L.B., barrister-at-law, the distinguished Professor of Political Economy at the College will, it is expected, attract a large number of members to his class. The first lecture will be delivered on Monday, October 10, at 8 p.m.

MORE ENCOURAGEMENT TO "THRIFT."—An extraordinary scene was witnessed on Monday evening at a meeting of creditors and depositors of the Sheffield and South Yorkshire Building Society now in liquidation. The members largely belong to the working classes, and have lost their savings in the society's collapse. The liquidators called a meeting to present their report of the first year's working. While a director was addressing the meeting a member, who declared that he had lost the savings of a lifetime, rushed from the body of the hall to the platform, and made towards the director to assault him. Several people seized the man, but he struggled violently, and it was with the utmost difficulty that he was restrained.—When next Messrs. Bradlaugh and Foote sing the Song of the Savings Bank—if the theme isn't about worn to rags now—perhaps they will give this scene a corner in the rosy picture. We are all weary of hearing of the losses of the poor unfortunate exploiter: suppose the losses of the wealthy wage-slave have a turn?—W. B.

Murder by Law.

A PUBLIC MEETING will be held in CLEVELAND HALL, CLEVELAND STREET (near Portland Road Station), on Friday October 7th, at Eight o'clock, to protest against the proposed murder of the seven Chicago Anarchists upon the false and unsupported testimony of the police. A larger meeting, specially of English workers, is being arranged. Details next week.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE SCOTTISH PLOUGHMAN.

DEAR SIR,—Having been handed one of the issues of your very interesting and excellent paper, bearing date August 27th, I am surprised to see a paragraph signed "J. L. M.," criticising our benefit society. This Unity was never meant for anything else but a benefit society. It was started about 22 years ago, when such grand doctrines as those of Socialism had not been planted except with few seeds, and these, though growing, had not any fibres of grit amongst Scottish or English people, either rural or urban, at that time. No hopes were ever entertained that the "International Ploughmen's Society of Scotland" would ever develop into a thoroughgoing labour organisation. Personally, although I have done as much if not more than any other ploughman to assist the branching-out of that society, I had nothing to do with the baptising of it. In 1872 I thought, and think still, that the Scottish ploughmen, though scattered hither and thither over the land, could be united into one general combination, and at the same time I began to stir the minds of my bretheren of wage-slavedom, but have never succeeded in getting more than a few to help in pushing any kind of unity.

It was in the autumn of 1872 that this society began to sprout its branches. Now seeing that a few have been paying their contributions for 22 years, and with numbers additional from 1872, with membership slowly increasing, and although none of the officials has shown any tendency to Socialism as yet, it is not to be wondered at if those funds of the "International Ploughmen's Society of Scotland" are not allowed either by members or their office-bearers to be spent upon any propaganda of general emancipation or amelioration. My brethren have had no spyglass to see anything but wage-slavedom and their ever-increasing heavy burden of capitalist farmers, landlords, etc., with all their male and female flunkies stuck on, always fixing themselves tighter upon the shoulders of us as a class of workmen. By and by we will begin and think out ways and means for the purpose of being allowed to till the soil under an honest system. This society is not in a very great financial condition; and J. L. M. is at liberty to title this society "International Union" or "slate union"; and at same time I thank J. L. M.—I am, etc.,

R. DEMPSTER.

THE "SWEATER."

It is supposed by many that the sweater is only to be found in the East-end, and that he necessarily lives in a filthy slum, down a dark dirty alley, or at the top of a dilapidated building, or over a stable. This is the description that is given by our novelists and sensation-mongers. But the above description is only a rare exception. Then again there is a misapprehension as to what a sweater really is. The editor of the Anti-Sweater, in answer to a correspondent who wrote asking for a definition of the word, said that a sweater was a person who lived on the sweat of his workers, and that the worker was the sweatee. I thought at the time that this was rather a peculiar answer, considering that there are many trades and occupations where the workers sweat a great deal more than a tailor, presser, or machinist under equally unhealthy conditions, and their employers are not called sweaters. Now what is a sweater, and how did the word come to be used? About thirty years ago nearly all the good tailors worked inside the various West-end shops. When some of the shopkeepers found that it was too expensive or inconvenient to keep their journeymen on the premises, they offered to give the men the work at home to make. By this means they reduced the cost of manufacture, as the men had to buy their own fuel, light, machine, etc. So long as these men made only as much as before, they were not reproached, but when, through some reason or other (and these are too numerous to mention), they got more garments to make, they employed male or female help (principally female, for obvious reasons), then they were called sweaters, that being the name that was given to such persons who originally started in the East-end, where most of the Government contracts were executed. Now it is easily seen that there is actually no difference at all between a sweater and any other exploiter of labour. Consequently all persons, in any trade, that employ others for profit are sweaters. Messrs. Maple, or Crosse and Blackwell, for instance, are just as big sweaters as Rich. Phillip in Whitechapel; and more so, because they employ a hundred times as many women and girls, whose average weekly wages are less, and who suffer from all kinds of chest-diseases through inhaling copper and other minerals that are used in the manufacture of pickles, potted meats, etc. I know of many places in the West-end that are quite as filthy and insanitary, etc., etc., as any "sweater's den" in the East-end. When one considers that there is often only one room, and there he works, with a blazing coke fire, a rattling machine, etc., and with two men and three women, and there his wife cooks the "food," keeps the children, washes, and sleeps, etc., it is not to be wondered at that these victims of the capitalist system look like so many unwashed corpses. And these single-breasted masters, as they are called, are increasing in the West-end with alarming rapidity, and competing with each other to such an extent that they have forced down the prices for making coats 40 per cent. in the last few years, and the sweater himself has to work day and night to be able to "live" and pay the extortionate rents that is exacted from him by the landlord. Of course his miserable employés are just as bad off, and perhaps worse, than other "hands." What is the remedy for this state of things? Put a tax on the foreigner? Combine to get a twelve-hour working day (as Mr. Lewis Lyons says), or get an eight-hour bill passed, or make these masters take out licences and not employ less than a dozen hands? What good would these be, when they can earn such miserable wage now, working sixteen hours a-day? How much could they earn in twelve or eight, working as they do on task or piece-work? These are not remedies; they could only tend to aggravate the present state of affairs. The only remedy and the only hope for the workers is Socialism, when the land and the machinery and the capital are in the hands of the whole community, and every one does what he can and gets what he needs. Then away with all such quack remedies, and let us teach the workers, who are all exploited, sweated, and slowly murdered, that as long as this infernal competitive system lasts, so long will we be sweated. That will only be impossible when the majority of the workers are educated as to their moral and social condition, and make up their minds to live and work for their own class, leaving the idle and useless classes to shift for themselves.

On Sunday evening also, we had a first-rate meeting at the same place, when addresses were given by Glasier, Downie, and Bullock. On Sunday afternoon, Glasier lectured to a branch of the Irish National League. The members of this branch always show great interest in our doctrines, and we believe that a large number of them will become active workers with us.—A. M'K.

NORWICH.—Last Thursday evening, a good meeting was held on St. Mary's Plain, addressed by Reynolds. Nicoll, of London, addressed a very large meeting in the Market-place on Sunday at 3, speaking for an hour and a half, also on the Agricultural Hall Plain at 7, then lecturing in the Gordon Hall at 8 on the "Political Parties." Mills and White went to North Walsham, Houghton and Morley to Ipswich, Slaughter, Turner, and another to Lowestoft, where two good meetings were held. The evening meeting was interrupted by the police. We intend to defend the right of free speech whatever comes of it, as there is no question of obstruction, the place of meeting being the old market.—T. M.

NOTTINGHAM.—On Thursday, Proctor addressed enthusiastic meeting of Clifton miners on "Labour Organisation." On Sunday in the club-room, a debate was held on the Trades' Union Congress. We are this week moving to larger and more convenient premises in Tokenhouse Yard, Bridlesmith Gate.—A. M. C.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—An audience of 800 or 900 people was addressed by Weaver in Queen's Square on Saturday. There was considerable interruption, and several questions asked, which were replied to and opposition vigorously dealt with.

SHEFFIELD SOCIALISTS.—On Monday, Sept. 12th, we commenced our winter sessions with a tea and entertainment. About 40 sat down to a good tea, and after seemed thoroughly to enjoy the evening's entertainment. On Monday the 19th, Mr. Story opened a discussion on "Socialism," Mr. J. Fox replying, after which others took part, causing much interest. Adjourned till the 26th, when "The best means of Nationalising the Land" will be the opening question.—M. Woolwich.—Last Sunday Utley failed to put in an appearance, but B. road and Banner held a very good meeting. Broad delivered his first Socialist speech, which was a good one, and gave evidence that he will be of good service to us. Literature sold very well, and collection made for propaganda. We are going to start a political economy class with a paid teacher. Any one in the neighbourhood who is desirous of joining the class is requested to send his name to R. Banner, 8A, Milward Street, Woolwich. We have received the free use of a school-room to hold our meetings in. Fee for class will be very small.—R. B.

BIRMINGHAM.—Usual meetings were held in the Bull Ring and at the Council House on Sunday evening. The Bull Ring meeting was largely attended, and was quiet and orderly; a very large crowd was waiting at the Council House for the speaker (A. K. Donald). In the course of the address reference was made to Chamberlain and Matthews, the local M.P.'s, which caused their partisans to endeavour unsuccessfully to interrupt the meeting. Feeble cheers for Chamberlain were replied to with three hearty cheers for the social revolution. An indescribable scene of confusion took place after the meeting, the police vainly endeavouring to stop the excited yelling and hooting crowd. As the speaker drove off the Chamberlainites hooted, but their hoots were drowned amid the cheers of sympathisers of the Cause.

GREAT BRIDGE.—Donald addressed the best meeting we have had here on Tuesday, and for the first time something like a good discussion followed the address. A man that keeps a draper's shop made a lengthy speech in support of shopkeepers, and promised the crowd that he would distribute a number of articles the following day to show how sincerely he was devoted to the interests of the workers.

STOURBRIDGE.—Morrison Davidson lectured in the theatre on Monday (Mr. Pageter, Chairman of the Board of Guardians, presiding), on "Rent, Profit, and Interest." One or two local political luminaries rather dissented from Mr. Davidson's view that a hunger revolt loomed in the not very far off, unless some immediate measures were adopted for ameliorating the lot of the masses.

A PERSONAL MATTER.

To the Editor of the COMMONWEAL.

SIR,—Mr. Herbert Burrows, in two Conservative and one Liberal evening paper, accuses me of intrigues, double-dealing, trying to "sell" the Social Democratic Federation, and a variety of incidental pieces of dishonesty, and states that for these misdemeanours the organisation has "dropped" me.

Will you allow me to state that I have at once invited Mr. Burrows to substantiate or withdraw these allegations at a meeting of such members of the S.D.F. as may be enough interested to attend.—I am, yours,

H. H. CHAMPION.

NOTES.

Mr. Chamberlain's meeting at Birmingham went off as well as might be expected; the malcontents were few, although the meeting was a free open one (according to Mr. Chamberlain, although admission was by ticket) and it was scarcely to be expected there would be no malcontents. As to Mr. Chamberlain himself he chiefly dwelt on the blocking the way by the Irish question, though he gave no sign of recurring to his demi-semi Socialism of two years ago.

The truth is, all that is a mere pretence for carrying on a private and personal war, and it must be once more said of the Chamberlain section as of their allies, the Tories and Whigs, and of a great part of their enemies, the Gladstonians, for the matter of that, that the Irish Question is a godsend to them simply because it blocks the way to the consideration of English matters.

If English matters are at some future time to be dealt with, to judge by one part of Mr. Chamberlain's speech, he is anxious that they should be dealt with "sweetly as to manner" at least, however strongly as to matter. Since, perhaps somewhat stimulated by the frankness of the wording of the interruptions, he expressed himself anxious for fresh and thorough gagging arrangements in the House itself.

He did not suggest any improvement in the office of Speaker in that august assembly, no doubt because he felt that from his point of view an improvement was scarcely possible. After all in this matter Mr. Chamberlain is logical; if coercion is good for those who differ from Mr. Chamberlain in Ireland, it must also be good for those who differ from Mr. Chamberlain in the House of Commons. His weak point is that to insist on good manners in the House will hardly suit his Tory friends.

Michael Lane and his brother-in-law O'Grady, not forgetting his wife, are champions after the heart of the old Norse story-tellers, whose matchless talent in that line is much needed in the tale of these Irish matters; and the kind of fighting courage of the opened door and the charge on the police explains the story of many a desperately won victory of the English army in which Irishmen were the main actors; but doubtless strong faith in the goodness of the cause must have been at the back of such courage, which could drive a man on to have at least one blow at his oppressors, even when he knew that if he escaped alive from the mauling he was sure to get, the prison was to follow.

How very queer our English has come to be in the penny-a-liner's hand by the way; the newspaper report of the affair told us that Lane beat the police mercilessly about the head. Spirit of Defoe, teach us some other word for the charge of two men on two hundred!

The Lord Mayor of Dublin and Mr. O'Brien are to be prosecuted for publishing reports of suppressed branches of the Land League in their respective papers, 'United Ireland' and the 'Nation.' This is as it should be; this is to understand coercion as far as it goes. When shall we see a Lord Mayor of London in the dock for resistance to arbitrary authority?

In our debate on Socialism, Mr. Bradlaugh took exception to Bax's statement of the tendency of manufacturing capital to aggregation; and our friend Bax, when challenged to produce examples of this process, did not go much out of his way to do so; probably because he did not think it worth while to defend a statement which he might well think that nobody but the Pope (or Mr. Bradlaugh) would be bold enough to attempt to controvert. But since some persons are staggered by the use of a distinguished name, however reckless or foolish the bearer of the said name may be, I venture (once more) to supplement my friend Bax in this matter, and quote again from Mr. David A Wells' article in the Contemporary Review.

Says he: "The now well ascertained and accepted fact (not accepted by Mr. Bradlaugh it seems) that power is most economically applied when applied on the largest possible scale, is rapidly and inevitably leading to the concentration of manufacturing in the largest establishments and the gradual extinction of those which are small. A cotton mill which with a profit (formerly not unusual) of a half-penny a yard could easily pay 10 per cent. per annum on a given capital, with a reduction of profit to a quarter of a cent. per yard would have to make and sell four times the number of yards to earn the same gross profits; which even then would fall very far short of paying the former rate of per-centage on the increased capital, machinery, buildings, etc., necessary to effect the increased production."

He goes on to show that this concentration is forced on the manufacturers, and takes sugar as an example, pointing out that the turnover which some time ago would have made a decent business would not now enable it to live. "The successful refiner of sugar to-day in place of being, as formerly, a manufacturer exclusively, must now as a condition of full success, be his own importer, do his own lightering, own his own wharfs and warehouses, make his own barrels and boxes, prepare his own bone-block, etc. etc. . . . It is not therefore to be wondered at that under the advent of these new conditions, one half of the sugar refineries that were in operation in the sea-board cities of the United States in 1875 have since failed or discontinued operations."

He quotes the Statist: "It is a characteristic and noteworthy feature of banking in Germany, that the bulk of the business is gradually shifting from the small bankers, who used to do a thriving business, to the great banking companies, leaving quite a number of small customer almost without any chance to prosper in legitimate operations—concentration of capital and business in the hands of a limited number of powerful customers being the rule of the day."

Small ships, he tells, are no longer built, owing, amongst other things, to the economy in manning, brought about by the use of large ones. "The Directory of American Millers for 1886 shows a decrease in the number of flour mills in the United States for that year as compared with 1884 of 6,812 out of a total in the latter year of 25,079, but an increase at the same time in capacity for flour production. The legitimate inference from these statistics therefore is that the small flour-mills of the United States are being crushed, or forced into consolidation with larger companies."

He says that it was hoped and thought that one result of the war that ended in 1865 would be the substitution of small yeoman farmers for big plantations in cotton cultivation; but that it has been found by experience that the small cultivator cannot live at all. I could go on multiplying these examples, but I have perhaps said enough to prove that water does not naturally run up hill, even though it may be necessary for the theories of Mr. Bradlaugh that it should. Both these two articles by Mr. David A. Wells are well worth studying by a Socialist.

PHILANTHROPIC MANIA: ITS DIAGNOSIS AND TREATMENT.

(ACCORDING TO THE SYSTEM OF DR. WORLDLY WISEMAN).

IN spite of the great progress recently made in the pathology of madness, there is one class of mania which has not received the attention it deserves at the hands of medical men in particular and the public in general. Philanthropic mania (for so, in the absence of any specific title, I will venture to designate it) is not only much more common than is usually supposed, but is largely on the increase in the present age; and as the malady is the cause of much suffering and discomfort both to the individuals affected and to the families and societies in which they reside, it is obvious that a determined effort ought to be made to remedy and counteract it.

The symptoms of this deplorable and, as there is reason to fear, contagious malady, are fortunately not difficult to detect. The patient betrays a meddling restlessness, and discontent with the existing order of society; he is haunted by an insane idea that this or that person, or class of persons, is the victim of some old-established grievance which needs abatement or redress; and acting under this hallucination he declares himself the enemy of all kinds of privilege and monopoly, recklessly espousing the cause of the masses against that of the classes, and calling for a system of strict and impartial justice without the slightest consideration for the higher interests and more delicate susceptibilities at stake. When a man or woman is observed to be affected in the manner described, a careful watch should be kept by the relatives of the patient; and if the symptoms do not presently pass off, it may be concluded that it is a case of philanthropic mania which must be treated without delay. It has been noticed by those physicians who have specially studied the various phases of this insidious disease, that it is very partial and unequal in its manifestations; men of a thoughtful or emotional temperament being far more liable to attack than those of a contrary nature; while in a similar manner some professions suffer more severely than others. Thus it is found that students, artists, poets, philosophers, and literary men in general are accountable for a large proportion of the ascertained cases of philanthropic mania, while for some reason at present inscrutable, but perhaps hereafter to be discovered by fuller scientific inquiry, lawyers, economists, stock-jobbers, statisticians, landlords, country gentlemen, and government officials are happily and conspicuously exempt.

The remedies and course of treatment for cases of philanthropic mania must vary according to the age, character, and constitution of the person afflicted. If he be a young man, and the disease show itself only in a slight form, it is generally sufficient to trust to the beneficent and recuperative power of nature, which, after a short period of mental aberration, will often bring the disillusioned wanderer back to the fold of comfort and propriety. But if the attack be a sharp one, an attempt should at once be made to draw away the sufferer's mind from the painful subjects that engross it, and to occupy it in various kinds of social recreations and personal indulgences, giving him at the same time as generous a diet as possible. If the patient is young, a course of wild oats is often found to be a most efficacious remedy, and if, after the acute crisis is over, it be thought desirable to find a convalescent home where the air is bracing and salubrious, the well-known establishment at Vanity Fair may be confidently recommended. In dangerous cases, where the feverishness (often misnamed "enthusiasm") is virulent and inveterate, it is sometimes necessary to adopt more stringent remedies, both for the sake of insuring the patient's recovery and in order to protect the interests of those persons or classes to which he may, if unchecked, do some deplorable and irreparable injury. The complete isolation of the sufferer is the first important point; this effected, it will be well to snub and ridicule him as much as possible, with the object of expelling from his mind the perilous conceits with which it is preoccupied. The wet blanket is a valuable auxiliary in this method of treatment; and in desperate cases, when the patient's sanity is despaired of, there is nothing better than the old-fashioned prescription of a Saturday application of caustic and a quarterly bleeding. But it should be our endeavour not to allow matters to arrive at so serious a state as this, but to arrest the malady in its earlier stages by tact and delicate handling. Mental alleviations should by no means be overlooked, and there are some books which have been found especially useful in giving a more wholesome direction to the patient's thoughts and meditations. Among the writings specially worthy of commendation are those of the German pessimists and the political economists, who have done much service in checking the modern tendency to philanthropic mania; Machiavelli's 'Prince,' which is invaluable in cases where the mania takes a political turn; and such admirable works as Lord Chesterfield's 'Letters to his Son,' Malthus's 'Treatise on Population,' and Giffen's 'Tables of Statistics,' all of which have a cooling and moderating effect when the mischief is caused by a sentimental excitement concerning the sufferings of the poor and the unequal distribution of social comforts.

The antiquity of the malady, to which I have given the name of philanthropic mania, is proved by the fact that St. Paul was discovered by Festus to have a slight touch of it in the year 61 A.D. There have been many other notable victims in succeeding ages down to the present time, when we see sad instances of the malignant energy of the disease in Mr. Ruskin's demented protest against our nineteenth century civilisation, in the madness of the Socialist propaganda, and in the extraordinary hallucination regarding the right of Ireland to manage its own affairs. But, apart from these salient examples, there is no doubt that many people are suffering in various degrees from the same form of insanity; and it is for their sake, or perhaps I should say for the sake of the polite society whose interests they endanger, that it seems advisable to draw attention to the subject. H. S. S.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Our Corner for current month concludes Mr. George Bernard Shaw's lucid article, "Concerning Interest"; gives a new version of some of Turgeneff's prose-poems; and has the usual other matters represented in good style.

'Socialism, the Religion of Humanity,' by John Ward, is published for the Wandsworth Branch of the S.D.F. by Rogers, 36, York Road, Battersea; price 1d., per dozen for distribution, 8d. It is a very good indictment of the present system, and plea for that which must take its place.

The speeches of the Chicago Anarchists in Court, when asked if they had anything to say why sentence should not be passed upon them, have been reprinted in book form, and should be widely read, in view of the agitation on their behalf now being carried on. Copies may be had from this office at 8d., post free 10d. They are really excellent speeches, attaining a high level of eloquence; the keynote of all being found in the closing words of August Spies:—

"Now, these are my ideas. They constitute a part of myself. I cannot divest myself of them, nor would I if I could. And if you think that you can crush out these ideas that are gaining ground more and more every day, if you think you can crush them out by sending us to the gallows—if you would once more have people suffer the penalty of death because they have dared to tell the truth—and I defy you to show us where we have told a lie—I say, if death is the penalty for proclaiming the truth, then I will proudly and defiantly pay the costly price! Call your hangman! Truth crucified in Socrates, in Christ, in Giordano Bruno, in Huss, Galileo, still lives—they and others whose number is legion have preceded us on this path. We are ready to follow!"

BREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

In this age of sham and shoddy, one is sick and tired of the cry that is being continually raised of the freedom with which the labourer can work or even play when he chooses. Our Liberal politician never tires of telling the labourer that he is free to contract as to the price at which he will sell his labour, and therefore everything rests with himself as to his condition in life.

"If you do not like your job you are free to leave it," is the sentiment one is met with when complaining of his hard lot, as if the condition of the labourer were materially improved by a mere change of employers. In the first place it is not true that the labourers, as a body, can change their employers at will. This can only be true of those who are scarce in the market, and there is scarcely a branch of industry to-day in which the supply of labourers does not exceed the demand.

But even supposing it true, the notion that this relieves the worker of his slavery is a fallacy though believed in by nearly all classes of society. The ordinary mind is thoroughly incapable of understanding any other form of slavery than that of chattel.

In order to understand how this confusion arises, we must determine what constitutes slavery.

Now there are conceivable conditions under almost any system of society, which might render one individual a slave to another; but when we speak of slavery as applied to the labourers of a nation, we necessarily mean, not the slavery of one individual to another, but the slavery of one class in society to another class.

Slavery, then, consists in one class of the community being compelled to work for another class, and at their bidding, without possessing any right of control or ownership of the product. We are as much slaves to-day as were the chattel slaves of early history, while we retain all their disadvantages and responsibilities, and lose all their rights and advantages, as will be seen presently. The free contract dogma has been preached both from pulpit and platform, until the workers have imbibed all the nourishment from it that it is possible to get. In his Lessons on Socialism, delivered at South-place Chapel, Finsbury, and afterwards appearing in Vol. I. Commonweal, comrade Aveling thoroughly exposed the trick by his ingenious form of rendering Marx's analysis of the contract fallacy, which it may be well to reproduce.

Economic slavery = Hidden by (1) number of sales, (2) number of masters, (3) fiction of free-contract.

The number of times a man may "sell" his labour-power during his life may be quite considerable; the number of masters he may serve no less so; and to make the series complete, the preachment of the doctrine of free contract, as an effectual blinding of the workers to their true position.

In what, then, does our condition differ from that of the chattel-slave? Now although it is true that a man was owned "body and soul" when a chattel-slave and was as much the property of his lord and master as the land he tilled, the tree he cut, or the horse he rode, we shall find on examination, that with all our struggles for freedom we have never got out of slavery; we have only changed its form.

Mr. Bradlaugh, when addressing the Northampton branch of the National Union of Operative Shoe Rivetters and Finishers, on the 7th January, 1886, on "Capital and Labour," delighted his hearers with the following—"In old times the labourer was not reckoned at all, except, perhaps, as a sort of superior animal—a kind of conscious machine. He was never treated as a human being to be reasoned with," and "In connection with all kinds of labour, the man who directed the labour was called master, the man who performed the labour was called servant; the servant or serf, or slave, or bondsman, was owned by his lord and master, owned as to life, as to liberty—as to brain it was never considered."

It is quite true that a man was owned then, just as a horse or any other cattle is owned to-day. The slave owner bought his slave in the market for a stated price, and then he lived on the fare provided for him by his master; he was sheltered by the house, barn, or whatever he was bade to dwell in, just because he was considered "a sort of superior animal." Everyone knows that a horse, for instance, must be properly fed and cared for, or it will soon become diseased and unfit for work, and if it should die the owner loses the price of the animal; the chattel slave of early history occupied an analogous position to the horse to-day, and precisely because he was owned as to life.

The workers are terribly "free" to-day, they are free to die of starvation, to prowl about in filthy rags, live in hovels not fit for pigs, and in fact do many other things which a slave owner of ancient society would not inflict on the worst of his slaves, not perhaps because he loved him but because he "owned him as to life." The wages of the chattel slave was determined by a natural standard, namely, the requirements of a healthy life. As much of his master's possessions as would suffice to keep the slave in health and vigour so that he might perform his daily labour efficiently, was given as wages. Now by what standard is wages measured to-day? Is the labourer reasoned with before he gets his wages, as Mr. Bradlaugh implies? Is he even reckoned with as a "superior animal?" nay, more, is he even considered a "conscious machine?" let us see.

With the introduction and development of labour-saving machinery the "market value" of the labour power of the individual has progressively lessened, until it has almost reached zero in the industrial thermometer.

Our economists tell us that the labourer's power to work is nothing more than a commodity, and as such is bought and sold on the market quite irrespective of the possessor, and its price is governed by the same law as the price of a table, chair, or box of matches.

Now as Mr. Bradlaugh frequently quoted Sir Thomas Brassey during his speech, until he felt obliged to apologise for doing so, so often, I will also quote him, "We shall find, as we examine the industrial situation, that the labour market is sensitive to every fluctuation of trade, that the price of labour rises with the demand, and falls when the competition among the employers for the services of workmen becomes less keen." (Mark and Wages, p. 78.)

The labourer, then, is no longer reckoned with even as a slave; but is now the creature of an iron law on the market—demand and supply. Hence it is that the labourer is often found in open rebellion against a reduction of wages; that is, trying to force his side of the "contract" which he is told he is free to do; but he is speedily brought back to an obedient state of mind by the police or military whom the Government send to aid the employers to enforce their side of the contract.

"Strikes," says Gronlund, "are the efforts of wares to become men," and indeed such they will remain so long as present conditions of capital and labour continue.

(To be concluded).

A LABOUR POLICY.

II.—IN RELATION TO TRADE UNIONISM

THE relations between the Socialist and Trade Union movements will soon be the subject of a great controversy amongst the various sections of the Labour party (if one may speak of such a thing just now). Trade Unionism is on its trial, and a very few years will decide whether it shall go forward to socialism or backward to oblivion; it is already decided that it cannot much longer remain where it is. And Socialism also is on its trial! the Socialists generally must soon choose between broadening the lines of their movement so as to include the practical aspirations of the working class, or becoming a mere group of factions, preaching, it may be, pure enough principles, but preaching them to the winds and exercising no real influence with the masses. My view of the matter is this (of course I speak only for myself) that the method of Socialist propaganda must not be merely, or mainly, preaching rigidly pure principles which the masses of the people cannot grasp, but taking hold of the working class movement as it exists at present, and gently and gradually moulding it into a socialist shape. The working class, and indeed all sensible men, must become Socialists if they only knew what it meant. The very essence of our movement and the basis of our hope is that Socialism is not a scheme or an invention which may be outdone by some better scheme or invention, but a state of society growing out of the present or the past and coming in the future as inevitably as the sunrise to-morrow.

How then shall we set about our work with regard to the trade union movement? In the first place let us be clear about what that movement means, and wherein it fails to meet the requirements of the day. As long as our foreign trade was growing at a certain rate, capitalism was all powerful; that is, while the capacity of our foreign markets grew as fast as our power of production it was premature to expect a Socialist movement to take firm and general hold of the workers. They dare not think of abolishing the system, they could only struggle for an easy corner in it. They could not stop the robbery, it was hard enough work to merely limit it; to limit the robbery of labour, to get better terms from the capitalist; to increase wages, any of these fully express the aim of trade unionism. As long as this expansion was going on the unions were able to wrest a little more from the employers. Now that expansion has ceased and even the contraction has begun. Foreign competition is really so strong that anything like a general rise of wages would cripple the British capitalists. Capitalism could be as easily killed as crippled, and the advantage would be much greater. The situation is this: just as Socialism was formerly impracticable because there was some hope of better terms from the present system so now orthodox trade unionism is becoming impracticable because such hope is vanishing, and Socialism is the next possible change. Whether Socialism is near or far need not influence us much, for this is certain that however far away, it is the nearest and the only social change that will really alter the life of the workers. Trade unionism, therefore, has but two prospects, it must develop into revolution or decay into reaction: it must choose between Socialism or suicide.

Socialists must now be alive and stirring in this matter. They should struggle to get Socialists elected to various trades' councils, they should send more Socialists to the Trade Congress, they should organise a distinct section there, and make war upon the Burt and Broadhurst gang who now use trade unionism as a tool for the Liberal party, and they should as soon as possible hasten the open struggle between the forces of progress and the stick-in-the-mud policy of the present bogus labour leaders.

It may be said, "Do you mean to say that we are to try to win the trade unionists by going in and raising the devil amongst them?" I answer no, not exactly that, but we are going in the good old fashioned way to save them by casting the devils out of them.

J. L. MAHON.

A LETTER FROM AMERICA.

THE Supreme Court of Illinois has confirmed the sentence passed on the seven Anarchists, and the 11th November has been selected as the day for the execution. The 11th November happens on a Friday: will it be the Good Friday of the coming society?

The Opinion was written by Judge Magruder, who was helped in his infamous work by the other six judges. The judges were unanimous in their decision with the exception of Judge Muekey, who wished it to be understood that he did not believe the Record to be free from errors; but none of the errors, in his opinion, were of such a serious character as to require a reversal of the judgment.

As regards the legal points in the case, not a shadow of evidence could be brought forward that any one of the seven condemned men ever threw the bomb or induced anybody else to do so. This has been admitted by the judge as well as by the prosecution, and also reaffirmed by the Supreme Court.

Why, then, are seven men to be murdered and one condemned to spend his life in jail? Simply because they advocated the emancipation of the wage-slaves in the States and belonged to an association styling itself "The International." The word "international" seems to have the same effect on an average capitalist as a piece of red cloth has on a bull. Not only did these men advocate a more rational system of society, but also, being men gifted with logical reasoning power, they ridiculed the idea of freeing Labour by constitutional means. They consequently directed their energies to the practical organisation of the people and called upon the down-trodden unfortunates to prepare themselves in time.

It seems that the fear of coming events has paralysed Capital's last remnant of logic, or the lessons of history would have prevented the judges in their capacity as servile servants of the hideous monster from pronouncing this atrocious sentence. Whatever evil effect the famous Chicago bomb may have had upon the minds of some timid people, it will be more than counterbalanced by the proposed cold-blooded assassination of Aug. Spies and his comrades. Already from every quarter—from north and south, from west and east—resolutions are pouring forth, condemning in no uncertain voice this latest violent eruption of class-hatred. Knights of Labour, Trades-unionists, Federated Labour, United Labour, etc., etc.—all are protesting unanimously against this decision of the Court, which, if carried out, would demonstrate plainly to all the world that if their interests are threatened seriously American capitalists are much lower and certainly more ferocious than cannibals. The Labour press daily publishes resolutions from every direction which prove most conclusively—even to the most sceptic—that Organised Labour is determined to make a firm stand, and tells Capital in plain words, "Thus far, and no further."

Capital, of course, like all clumsy brutes, maddened by the enormous progress Labour is daily making, tries to crush an idea by crushing men! It is my opinion—and the same opinion is growing like a superstition in labour circles—that these men never will be hung. But should this opinion, against all expectations, turn out to be erroneous, the blood of these martyrs will cement the now politically disunited labour elements, and hasten the settling day to come.

There are but two men prominent in the Labour movement who are well known for their antipathies against the seven men, and who almost wish they might be hung. These are Henry George and T. V. Powderly. The former has already turned his back on the men who were silly enough to lift him into power, and has pendulumed over to the petty bourgeoisie. The latter, if he does not himself resign at the coming conference of the Knights of Labour at Minneapolis, will be candidly told to shift. They are no longer factors in a real Labour movement, and their opinion in consequence is worthless.

No stone will be left unturned to prevent the execution; but should the powers that are happen to be so idiotic as to strangle seven men who loved mankind better than themselves, they and no one else will be responsible for the consequences. It will be they who will give a deadly wound to their much-beloved Constitution, which gives so much liberty to the strong to exploit the weak. Let them beware.

So mad is Capital at present that the authorities refused the citizenship to John Most, trying to induce people to believe that if ever Most should have the honour (a dubious one) to be a citizen, he would play pitch-farthing with all the just (sic!) arrangements in the Land of the Free.

In conclusion, to show how well money, land, and religion are at present united, permit me to quote the words of one who professes to follow the doctrines of him who, 1900 years ago, was hung—beg pardon, crucified—for having conspired against the laws of the land. Said the Rev. N. B. Thompson, of the Free Baptist Church, last Sunday: "I thank God for the judicial decision by which the action of the Lower Court was confirmed in passing sentence of death upon the seven Anarchists of Chicago. Hang these men? Yes, and every man who dare dispute the very divine mechanism of government by which this great nation lives. Woe to the men who aim at our overthrow. . . . Hang these Anarchists? Yes, every one of them." If this is Christianity, I am sincerely glad I am not a Christian; and I wonder whether in time to come revolutionists will ever remember all these pretty utterances of class-hatred?—Yours fraternally,

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 20, 1887.

HENRY F. CHARLES.

MINERS AND THEIR HOMES.—On Thursday the 29th ult., at the Northumberland miners' meeting, Mr. C. Bradlaugh, M.P. lost his temper over the severe opposition he met with, and this may account for his strange assertion that the miners' houses were as good as his own. The following is an extract from a letter in the Newcastle Daily Leader:—"At the colliery in which I live there are what we call seven rows, divided into several sections, and in each row there are double and single houses. The single house contains a kitchen and a garret; the double house a kitchen and two rooms. The double houses are supposed to be for the use of big families, and the single ones, I suppose, for the smaller families. In addition to these two classes of houses there is another special class reserved for privileged individuals—whether they have big families or not. These are fitted with gas, water, and other domestic conveniences, which are withheld from the ordinary miner. There is not one of those rows that is not more or less morally corrupted in consequence of this state of things. The single house probably contains a family of say four daughters and two sons, and their only bedroom is a small garret, which is gained by a ladder, while washing and dressing, etc., has to be performed openly in the kitchen. The double houses are almost as bad, because their are generally more people living in them."—Poor Mr. Bradlaugh! after so many years to be so badly off!

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CORRESPONDENTS are asked to remember one or two things that most of them forget. The Editors and the Manager are separate and distinct people, with differing functions. Letters intended for one should not be addressed to the other. MSS., reports, notices, etc., are for the Editor; business communications and cash for the Manager. Letters addressed to any other person or sent to any other address are so at writer's own risk. Reports, notices, etc., should not all be mixed up together on one piece of paper and on both sides of that; this entails the labour of re-writing the whole thing, and we cannot afford the necessary time.

ENQUIRER.—We are trying to arrange for an exhaustive article upon the French National Workshops, of which you speak. You are right, they were never given a half-chance of success, but were ruined by bourgeois violence and intrigue.

FREE SPEECH IN AMERICA.

OUR readers will see that meetings to protest against the cold-blooded judicial murder of the seven Chicago prisoners are to be held within the next fortnight. Since this number of the Commonweal may come into the hands of persons who have not read other numbers and who have but a vague idea of the bearings of the whole case, or as is most likely, have been prejudiced by the misrepresentations of the press—the stark lies of the American capitalistic press, the careless lies of the English—it may be well to state briefly what the real crime of these men is in order that it may be determined whether their execution would be an act of justice or a crime.

These seven men are condemned to death for being present at a meeting called to protest against the murderous attack on a demonstration of workmen on strike by the police and the hired swashbucklers of the capitalists. At that meeting a bomb was thrown which killed and wounded several policemen. The police fired on the meeting, and the workmen defended themselves, and the capitalist government took this opportunity of hatching an accusation against our comrades, brought them to trial and condemned them in the teeth of the evidence. On their appeal they have been kept in prison for more than a year and re-condemned by a court which is practically the same as the first one. These men are really condemned for supporting the workmen in their strike and for speaking out their opinions on the vile, mis-called "Society" of America and civilisation generally. They are persecuted for holding and expressing the opinions which we hold and express whether we call ourselves Anarchists or Socialists, and for applying those opinions to the events of the passing day and the oppression of the American workmen going on under their eyes. Their persecution is an in terrorem measure directed against freedom of speech in America; and it will be a disgrace to the British workmen, whatever their politics may be, if they do not express themselves clearly and emphatically on this attack on the liberties which the United States have been supposed to guard so jealously, but which it would seem are but a one-sided affair after all. We appeal, above all, to our Radical and Democratic friends who are now trying to destroy the base anti-Irish prejudice once so current in this country, not to consider men outside the pale of fair-dealing because they express revolutionary ideas; and to remember that whether they may think our Socialist theories right or wrong, we claim at least equal liberty for all, and that amidst the present welter of politics in which reaction is struggling so hard to lift up its head, if we do not guard the liberties we have won with the utmost care and jealousy we shall find them encroached on day by day till at last Radicals will have no more doubt than Socialists that they are the slaves of the rich and powerful in all senses.

WILLIAM MORRIS.

CONDITION OF WORKERS.

FARINGDON, BERKS, AND NEIGHBOURHOOD.

THIS is a fair example of a farming neighbourhood in Berkshire or Oxfordshire. Population of town 3,139.

Wages mostly 10s. weekly in summer, 9s. in winter half of year for farm workers; least wages of men 8s., boys less. Extra money in harvest, or at Michaelmas, but much less than formerly. More for some kinds of work. Usual time of hiring, old Michaelmas Day, for the year, but sometimes half year. Some landowners keep on their labourers without lowering the wages agreed upon in more prosperous times, and only dismiss for "misconduct." At Coleshill, the Earl of Radnor also gives a pension of 7s. weekly to men who in his service have become too old or infirm to work. In the town of Faringdon live many whose wages are no higher as a rule, but who go out as extra hands in summer, and are out of work in the winter. Houses and small gardens in the villages sometimes free in addition to wages. Before the equalisation of poor rates within each union, many cottages were pulled down to drive the people into the towns, from which they have not returned to the country. At Coleshill, an example of a "model village," a house which probably cost £300 to build, and a good sized garden, are provided for each family, at a rent of five guineas a year. In Oxfordshire those landowners have done best who have improved the old picturesque grey stone and stone slated cottages, instead of building new ones. In Faringdon the rent of a cottage with a small garden is in most cases 2s. 6d. a week, and no allowance in wages is made to meet the rent.

Allotments can generally be rented at the same rate per acre as the farms, which is from 10s. per annum upwards, with great differences for different land, and various arrangements as to parochial rates and tithe, £2 an acre free is not unusual. It is usual for the employer in the Wantage district to plough the labourer's potato or corn allotment gratis, but sometimes he changes the ground allotted from year to year. In the town of Faringdon are some cheap allotments called The Sands, belonging to a "charity"; but the rest are let at the rate of £10 and some even £16 per acre yearly.

Remarks.—The workers dare not take any steps to help themselves without the protection of some great patron like Lord Wantage, or of the shopkeepers, to which last both farmers and workers are much in debt. The small shopkeepers are almost ruined by the large ones, and a further lowering of wages would surely stop them from recovering debts from labourers.

Witney, Oxfordshire.—Blanket making is still carried on here. The machinery is driven chiefly by water power. Wages 10s. weekly for women, one loom each; no men employed except the foremen.

Connorville in Minster Lovel parish, near Witney, founded by Feargus O'Connor. In spite of former mismanagement and present heavy burdens, the allotment holders, having security of tenure, are able to plant fruit trees, and know how to farm better than the original colonists, but have to seek further employment outside their "small holdings," or take several holdings.

Lechlade, pop. 1,176, and Buscot, pop. 371. Wages.—Eight years ago labourers got 15s. weekly. There has been much piece work also, and contract work. Steam ploughmen by piecework might make 30s. weekly. In farming work this has for the most part come to an end, and there is more dairy work by regular labourers. Weekly wages now 12s. with many exceptions, better or worse; a few still get as much as 15s. Boys, 6s. or 7s.; old women, for half time, about 4s., extra money in harvest balanced by deductions in winter. Mechanics may still earn as much as 30s. weekly, but generally less. There is an iron foundry in Lechlade; the ordinary trades are much combined, many small employers working with their men, and carrying on more than one trade assisted by the same men. Most men can also work on the land, they are thus more than usually independent.

Houses with gardens in Buscot, 1s., in Lechlade, 2s. weekly; sometimes given in addition to wages from 11s. to 14s.

Allotments in Buscot at rate of £3 4s. per acre yearly with parochial rates in addition, but not tithe, this rent being 4s. per acre more than the rest of the farm under the same landowners. In Lechlade, a large allotment field belonging to a public trust is let at the rate of £2 per acre per annum in small portions. Other allotments and small holdings let by private landholders from £3 to £6 per acre. Some small landowners or "peasant proprietors." Lechlade is called a "free town."

Remarks.—Dairy farming is the chief industry, and much produce sent to London and further; "separated milk" may be had for one halfpenny a quart, good for childrens' bones. The labourers prefer pig keeping to cow keeping for themselves.

Lechlade and Buscot are in Faringdon Union; but friendly societies, such as the Labourers' Union at Fairford, to which only a few belong, and the Foresters', to which many belong, provide largely for the sick, and the aged poor are often kept at home without help from the rates. The guardians, unlike those in Lancashire, refuse to pay school fees in any case, except as part of outdoor pauper relief, which is more required in Faringdon.

Newbury, Berks, pop. about 10,000, is no more prosperous than Faringdon, except for traders; but there are many commons in the neighbourhood, and labourers keeping cows on them are going to form a co-operative dairy, having already co-operative stores. Wages, even the lowest, are not paid with regularity.

Hours of work, and numbers employed.—Farm workers are of course under no Factory Acts limiting hours of work, which are often from sunrise to sunset for field workers, and longer for milkers and cattle feeders, who work on Sunday almost as much as other days. There is an old tradition, confirmed by experience, that there ought to be one milker for every nine cows; but more and more employers keep reducing the number of people employed. Reversing the rule of manufacturers, they employ men rather than women as milkers, because the men work faster though more roughly than women.

Commons and wayside strips.—There must have been what we must call "a great robbery" of commons, if we are in harmony with the rhyme whose origin I should like to know:

"It is a sin in man or woman,
To steal a goose from off a common;
But who shall plead that man's excuse
Who steals a common from a goose?"

The Faringdon Highway Board claim the wayside grass, and sometimes sell the sods, to relieve the rates, to the adjoining farmers. In some other districts the adjoining landowners or farmers claim the grass, illegally I believe, except that they may unfortunately enclose it by law to some extent when making a new fence.

Relations of employers and employed.—The older workers regret the time when they used to have board and lodging in the farm houses, at least before they were married, and the farmers though sparing, as always, of money payments, were generous in everything else they had to give. The old men say that the "bad work" of the present generation arises from the change of customs, and not, as the masters say, from the "spread of education," which is after all very slight.

The general condition is not easy to get at, owing to variations arising in great measure from the circumstances or spirit of various landowners; but examples are well known. I avoid "averages" as misleading.

OSWALD BIRCHALL.

RUSSIAN FACTORIES.

A BRIEF notice occurs in Le Socialiste of the recently issued report of the Inspectors of Factories in Russia, and a few specimen facts are given which show the need for a thorough revolution in a system of society which can permit (nay, which exists by the help of) such barbarities.

For example, the inspector of the Vladimir district declares that the conditions of work in the shops are such as to render observance of hygienic principles impossible. The workers are in constant danger of being killed or disabled for life. The shops are destitute of ventilation, and of all means for preventing accidents; they are full of a fine coal-dust which penetrates the body and covers the workers in thick layers. "I, myself," says the inspector, "could not stay more than ten minutes in a shop; I swallowed a mass of this coal-dust and was covered with a layer of fine floury material." This was in the spinning factories.

In the tobacco factories the air of the shops is saturated with nicotine, which produces when one enters contraction of the larynx and smarting of the eyes, and if one remains long in this atmosphere, vertigo.

In the refineries of Kiev the work is done under most barbarous conditions. Thus the workers who are engaged in pressing are always up to the knees in a warm mass, and have no shelter against either rain or frost—and this day and night.

Nor are the conditions any less horrible of their life away from work. Their habitations resemble stables. Indeed, the stables of a good breeder are far better than the dwellings of these workers, who are lodged in barracks, where they rest after work on the bare and dirty floor, without undressing, in a promiscuous heap, regardless of age or sex. Returning from their weary and weakening toil, each throws himself down in his place, which is still humid with the exhalations of his predecessor.

And should the worker fall sick or be injured, as often happens under the conditions indicated in these reports, it is impossible for him to get medical aid in the first few days, even in a case of urgency. Thus in the district of Kazan, says the inspector, there are only sixteen infirmaries for 353 factories. (The word "infirmary" bears a somewhat wider meaning than in this country, which makes the deficiency all the worse.) In the Kharkov district there are in all 658 different factories, and of these 631, employing 20,085 persons, possess not a single medical resource. It may here be remarked that in Russia, where medical assistance is unobtainable, so to speak, except in large towns, the large factories ought to possess their proper infirmaries, i.e., one or two rooms, with beds.

In conclusion, Le Socialiste points out that Russia is the only country besides Belgium without labour legislation, and that in it the adult worker finds himself at the sole mercy of the factory owners and masters. A similar remark might with truth be made of our own land, but there is the difference that in England the same state of slavery as exists in Russia, is veiled under "freedom of contract" and other specious phrases.

EUGENE TEESDALE.

SOCIALISM IN THE MIDLANDS.

As in other parts of England, bad trade has pinched all grades of society. The working classes have of course been the first to suffer, and have suffered most severely; but many middle-class people find that the course of free competition has ruined them. There has been a very large number of labour disputes during the past half year. The hand-made nail trade has almost entirely suspended operations. The nailers, not being able to earn a livelihood, ceased working some weeks ago. The masters, as usual, are likely to have the best of the struggle, as the large stocks they have on hand are sufficient to enable them to supply their orders for a good while to come, while the nailers have nothing to fall back on. The chainmakers' dispute has now continued for a twelvemonth at Cradley without a satisfactory settlement having been arrived at. In this trade workmen at Cradley have had to slave for 60 or 70 hours weekly to earn 9s., and the women who make the lighter chains have only been able to earn 4s. In this trade the profits are enormous, and no foreign competition has to be encountered, the fact being that the German chainmakers are more highly paid than the English. In the cast-nail trade a dispute is at present in progress, the serious rioting that occurred in Birmingham some weeks back being in connection with this strike. Several mining disputes are taking place just now, which render a large number of miners idle. In Birmingham a firm—Geo. E. Bellis and Co.—that does work for the Admiralty has lowered their piecework price-list, though they are making very high profits. The men have struck, but black-legs in large numbers have been found to carry on the works as usual. Thus, look at the worker's position in any trade and you find it insecure, the success of one reduction being generally made the ground for another by the employers. Commercial failures amounting in the gross to half a million in three months show the shaky condition of the capitalist class. One of the leading firms, if not the leading firm, in the sheet-iron trade—Morewood and Co.—failed a week or two ago, and were reduced so low as not to be able to pay the wages of their workmen. Another firm—Dawes, Oldbury—became bankrupt recently, leaving 1200 men in the lurch, who quite frightened the Oldbury Board of Guardians by their going in large numbers to the poor-house. Ultimately a large number were put on the highly productive employment of stone breaking. Another serious failure is Greenway's Bank. The amount of money that the depositors have lost is not yet known; traders, old women, and the Corporation of Warwick have all lost their money, which the bankers used for speculating in foreign tramways. The only towns that are in any way busy are Birmingham and Wolverhampton. In South Staffordshire the coal and iron trades are at a standstill, hundreds being out of employment, and of those that are at work a large number are on short time. It is the opinion of competent authorities that good times will never come again to Stafford under free competition. The excessively heavy freights charged by the railway companies, in their anxiety to earn high dividends, and the old-fashioned machinery in use, place the district at a great disadvantage in competing with northern towns on the coast, who have the most modern plant and have little or no railway freight to pay on export orders.

All these features render the district a good field for Socialist propaganda. The Socialist League branches at Birmingham and Walsall have carried on a vigorous propaganda during the past three months, and towns that knew nothing of Socialist proposals are now informed on the subject. One great drawback in the Black Country is the surprisingly large number of men who are unable to read. The poor fellows have been sent to work in early boyhood, and what little that they were taught at school has been forgotten. Trades' unionism is feebly developed; in some places, as at Willenhall, among the lockmakers, they had fairly good societies which have collapsed. In the smaller towns our speakers are generally enthusiastically received, notably at West Bromwich, Tipton, and Wolverhampton. The local politicians are jealous of our presence, and have in some places organised disturbances. The Tories at Wolverhampton have been peculiarly active in endeavouring to disturb our meetings, but have always been kept in order by the crowd, until last Saturday at our evening meeting there. When I arrived at the speaking place in Queen's Square, I found a sergeant of police with a brace of constables in waiting to prevent the meeting being held; so I took up a position in the Market-place instead, and had an enormous crowd who listened attentively for about twenty minutes, when a contingent of well-dressed rowdies came from the Conservative club and managed to create a disturbance by their hustling, hooting, and singing. The meeting was closed in the regular way, and arrangements were made after it was over for effectively dealing with the rowdies when they appear again. In Birmingham the cause is making satisfactory progress, and the meetings are rapidly increasing in numbers. Last Sunday week, the scene caused by the Chamberlainite mob, which was grossly misrepresented in the local press, caused a much larger attendance at our meeting at the Council House. The police, headed by an inspector, were present in force, and no doubt their presence awed the disturbers of the week before into silence. The local branch of the S.D.F. hold meetings on Sundays in Birmingham, and one of their members, Haddon, has put up as a candidate for the Town Council, with fair chances of success. While our speeches are listened to eagerly, and our views very widely approved of, it must be confessed one would think the men would be more ready to organise than they are, and it is to be hoped that the Birmingham readers of the Commonweal will without delay make up their minds to join our organisation. They must know that the mere sympathising with the Cause will never realise it, and surely with the forces that Labour has arranged against itself, there can be no doubt of the necessity of organisation.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—One firm of ironmasters have conceded one shilling advance, and on the understanding that the other shilling is to be given as soon as trade improves, the men have accepted the offer. The other four firms still hold fast in refusing any advance and continue to import men.

DOCKYARD DISCHARGES.—Orders have been received at Portsmouth for the discharge of 50 shipwrights and 30 smiths; and it is believed that further dismissals will be rendered necessary owing to the alleged determination of the Admiralty to send no further work to that port until the close of the present financial year.

On Saturday last the chief constable of Norwich applied to the magistrates for leave to swear in 200 special constables to look after the unemployed. The cause of this exhibition of fright was a bill posted over the city during the week by unknown hands. It read thus:—"NOTICE TO ALL CONCERNED.—The unemployed do not intend to starve any longer. If employment is not found for them, they will soon make some."

THE NORTHAMPTON SHOE STRIKE.—After lasting ten weeks the great strike in the boot trade at Northampton is now in a fair way of settlement. The dispute is to be submitted to the Arbitration Board, a local organisation on which employers and employed are equally represented. In consequence, however, of repeated disturbances, one of which has resulted in a fatality, about thirty men have been sworn in as special constables, several of them being men on strike.

DOCK LABOURERS.—During the week the dock-labourers have held several meetings in the East-end in order to strengthen and support the societies. About 900 members are now on the roll of the recently formed Association of Tea Operatives and General Labourers. A subscription of only 2d. per week, with an extra 3d. at the end of each quarter, entitles them to 10s. a week strike money. There never was a time when it was more desirable that the labourers should combine.

STRIKE OF MINERS.—On Thursday, a meeting of miners on strike at Nether-end, Cradley Heath, was held at the Hope and Anchor Inn. Mr. B. Winwood presided. It was reported that the employers were willing to pay the old price for ripping down the rock providing the men would submit to a reduction of 3d. per ton. It was unanimously decided to reject the offer, and to continue the strike until the masters agree to pay the old list of prices.

PROPOSED RESTRICTION OF COAL OUTPUT.—At a meeting held on Saturday of the Fife and Clackmannan Miners' Association it was resolved that there should be a national and simultaneous stoppage of work for one week or a fortnight, with a view of restricting the output, and that the representatives of the association should support this policy at the International Conference of Miners to be held in Edinburgh on the 11th inst.

FOUR THOUSAND WELSH COLLIERS ON STRIKE.—A very serious dispute has arisen between the Dowlais Iron Company and their colliers, in consequence of which not less than eleven collieries on Tuesday suspended operations. About 4,000 men and boys are idle. The colliery proprietors of South Wales have declined to entertain the proposals of the men for a reform of the sliding scale agreement, and a very serious crisis is threatened.

THE DERBYSHIRE MINERS.—A conference of Derbyshire miners' delegates was held at Chesterfield on Saturday afternoon. Resolutions were passed thanking the miners' representatives for their services in connection with the Mines Regulation Bill, urging the limitation of the output, expressing the desirableness of making each Saturday a "play day," recommending a general federation of miners, and deciding to petition Parliament to pass an Eight Hours Bill.

PRESTON COTTON-WEAVERS.—Last week the weavers of the Castle Street Mill, Preston, presented themselves to resume work, but as the manager refused to accept those whose places had been filled during the strike, the whole body of weavers refused to start in pursuance of a resolution passed on Saturday. They assembled at the Weavers' Institute at 10 o'clock, and were joined at 11 by weavers from the Manchester Mill, who had also refused to resume work because of the rejections at the Castle Street Mill.

NEWCASTLE JOINERS.—The joiners out on strike at the Elswick shipbuilding yard, forwarded about a fortnight ago, a communication to the employers from the United Trade Committee with respect to the strike. The men are still waiting for some intimation from the directors in reply, as to what they propose doing. Should no answer be received, the men will consider the propriety of adopting other methods of hastening a settlement of the dispute between the carpenters and themselves.

The workers at Dingle's shoe factory, Norwich, have just won in a dispute with their employer. The indoor hands were charged 6d. a week shop rent, and were being paid 3d. a dozen less than the outside workers. A fortnight ago about forty came out on strike, and after a week of it the master yielded. But during the next week it was found, in order to yield to the demands of the indoor men, he had taken the extra money off the outside workers. Both then united and the master gave in without making a strike necessary.

THE LIVERPOOL TRAMWAY COMPANY AND THEIR MEN.—On the 30th ult. the wages of the drivers in the employ of the Liverpool United Tramways and Omnibus Company, which has almost a monopoly of the traffic of the city, were reduced by 3s. per week, and the hours increased by 12. A strong feeling was manifested by the men against the change, and opposition was expected, but up to the present the traffic has not been interrupted. The men have no organisation. Their wages are now 32s. a week for 16 hours daily.

NAILMAKERS.—In the Midlands, the great strike of nailmakers for an increase of wages continues. All the operatives in the trade are on strike with the exception of a few women in Gornal and Sedgley districts. At a recent meeting Mr. J. Price said it was a most painful duty for him to conduct the strike, as the operatives were in such a deplorable condition that they did not know where to get a meal from. He considered there was not a class of workers in existence that were more poverty-stricken than nailmakers. If a nailer worked a full week he could not earn 9s., and they were determined now to better their condition.

YORKSHIRE COAL TRADE.—A leading member of the Employers' Association intends to bring before the council a proposal of considerable importance. To counteract the effect of the severe competition among the employers in lowering the price of coal, it is proposed to intensify the work of the miners by giving bonuses to those men who send out the largest quantity in any given period. This is a somewhat bold suggestion, especially at a time when the leaders of the Miners' Associations in various parts of the country are discussing the question of restricting the output of coal. Whether the men will fall into the trap remains to be seen.

KIRKINTILLOCH MINERS.—At a meeting of the Kirkintilloch Miners' Association, Mr. John Sneddon in the chair, it was agreed to fall in with the policy adopted at the Scottish Federation Conference—namely, ten days per fortnight and eight hours per day, the policy to be adopted as soon as practicable. Deputations were then appointed to wait on the employers for the purpose of asking back the 6d. taken off the men last summer. Mr. John Torrance was appointed to represent the district at the approaching National Conference to be held at Edinburgh. It was agreed to admit the Campsie and Milton men into the district association.

LONDON COSTERMONGERS.—A demonstration of costermongers took place in St. Luke's last Friday night, against the imposition of a toll of 1s. per week on each stall in Whitecross Street. It was stated by one speaker that Whitecross Street had been a market-place for over two hundred years. The resolution of the vestry was characterised as iniquitous, as the stall-keepers have a hard struggle even now to gain a livelihood.—On Tuesday afternoon an extraordinary scene took place at the meeting of the Vestry, a crowd of costermongers, male and female, attending to ask the Vestry to rescind the order. An old man named Eden acted as spokesman. In the end, after a prolonged and heated discussion, a motion to rescind the order was carried by a majority of twenty, amidst loud and prolonged cheering from the occupants of the gallery, which was crowded.

THE NATIONAL LABOUR FEDERATION.—At a meeting to promote the objects of the above, held last week in Newcastle, the Rev. W. Moore Ede, who presided, said: "Anyone who had followed the labour question, however, could not have failed to notice how frequently the system of trades unionism had shown itself to be unequal to extended and prolonged contests when trades unionism was broken up into small and independent bodies. He had long felt that if only some plan could be devised whereby the skilled and unskilled workmen could be taught to act together in their own interests and to help those who were too weak to resist when needed, it would be a great advance. This labour federation did include all sections of labour; it emphasised the principle that in great labour questions it would be an advantage for all those resisting a reduction of wages to act together."

LONDON TAILORING.—A correspondent sends the following: "At the firm of Messrs. J. R. Bousfield, wholesale and retail clothiers of Houndsditch, they pay the cutters, etc., what they call "log"—namely, so much per month besides the ordinary weekly wage. This "log" varies from 4s. to 15s. per month. Now, if the master finds the least fault with an employé, he can stop the whole or part of this "log," the master alleging that it is given as a present and that he can therefore stop paying it whenever he pleases. The idea of its being given as "a present" is absurd, because every man's "log" is reckoned from his book, so much being paid per garment for cutting and trimming; and woe betide the man who has not made enough profit for his master! A few of the prices paid for making clothing will no doubt also interest your readers. For making a pair of corduroy knickerbockers (lined through) the "hands" are paid the handsome sum of 3½d. A juvenile knickerbocker suit, lined all through, bound edges, and fancy trimming on jacket, is made for 6d. The same style of suit, only without the fancy trimming, for 5d. Boys' corduroy trousers are made for prices varying from 4½d. to 8d. Men's ditto, from 6d. up, 1s. being reckoned a good price. The prices paid for making men's unlined tweed trousers vary from 7d. to 14d. Most of the common trousers are sent to large firms of sweaters in the country to make, who employ a quantity of "hands" indoors, the masters of course getting a large profit out of them; so that in the case of common trousers they get about 4½d. or 5d. for making them. If they lose a ticket they are fined a farthing. For making a blue pilot reefer they get the large sum of 1s. Men's jackets are made for 8d. and 9d.—Now I want to know how people can live honestly on such pay as that? They cannot even earn enough in a week by slaving day and night to keep body and soul together, so what wonder if the women sell their bodies in order to get a crust for the children? Under the present system, a workhand gets the smallest pay for making the hardest garment, and the highest pay for making the easiest one. Under Socialism, I hope, this will all be changed, the worker receiving the luxuries and comforts, and the idler nothing.—W. H."

BROXBURN MINERS.—At a largely attended meeting of the Scottish Mineral Oil Association, held on Wednesday in the Chamber of Commerce, it was reported that the miners on strike in the oil trade had arranged to resume work at the full reduction, excepting those of the Broxburn Company. The object of their men being kept out was fully explained, viz., that the Broxburn Company are to be "boycotted," and should they be beaten by these tactics, then the other companies are to be attacked singly. The Mineral Oil Association, in pursuance of former resolutions, have now definitely arranged to support the Broxburn Company and give them every assistance. At a special meeting, on Wednesday, of the Broxburn Oil Company, after some discussion, a motion was agreed to that the directors take steps to have the men who refused to work ejected from the company's houses. With a view to giving some stimulus to the men in their struggle, a demonstration was held on Thursday afternoon in the Broxburn Town Hall, which was crowded. The local instrumental bands paraded the streets for some time before the meeting. Large numbers of men from the surrounding district, where work has been resumed, were also present. Mr. John Wilson, secretary of the Union, occupied the chair. Mr. Blaikie and Mr. Mallinson, of Edinburgh Trades Council, next addressed the meeting. The former said he brought with him £25, and the latter said they would be the greatest fools under heaven if they allowed the union to be broken up. Mr. Cunningham-Graham, M.P., who was received with cheers, several times renewed, said that the way he could most serve them was not only to give them his own sympathy, but outside this country many others were employed like them, whose eyes were on them. He would tell them of their case to secure their sympathy. He advised them to go on till they were successful; but that would not be unless every man in the hall thought that on him and him alone did the success of their struggle rest. A ballot vote was then taken as to whether they would resume work. Only one voted for working.

The measure of a man's wages is what a majority in the same occupation can live on, for the simple reason that if he tries to get more some other fellow who is out of a job will come forward and work for just the sum that will enable him to live without saving anything. The slave gets his food and clothing, and house room, and an allowance for beer and whiskey. If all the slaves should stop drinking beer and whiskey they would simply get no allowance.—Toronto Labor Reformer.

MY AIM.

I LIVE for those who love me, whose hearts are kind and true,
For the Heaven that smiles above me, and awaits my spirit too ;
For all human ties that bind me, for the task by God assigned me ;
For the bright hopes yet to find me, and the good that I can do.

I live to learn their story, who suffered for my sake ;
To emulate their glory and follow in their wake ;
Bards, patriots, martyrs, sages, the heroic of all ages,
Whose deeds crowd History's pages, and Time's great volume make.

I live to hold communion with all that is divine.
To feel there is a union 'twixt Nature's heart and mine ;
To profit by affliction, reap truth from fields of fiction,
Grow wiser from conviction, and fulfil God's grand design.

I live to hail the season, by gifted ones foretold ;
When man shall live by reason, and not alone by gold ;
When man to man united, and every wrong thing righted,
The whole world shall be lighted, as Eden was of old.

I live for those who love me, for those who know me true ;
For the heaven that smiles above me, and awaits my spirit too ;
For the cause that lacks assistance, for the wrong that needs resistance,
For the future in the distance, and the good that I can do.

G. LINNÆUS BANKS.

[The last stanza of above was printed in No. 88 as a poem in itself, signed "Thomas Guthrie." It is so given in 'The Humbler Poets,' by Slason Thompson, Chicago, 1886, 8vo, but I regret its ascription to the well-known cleric was allowed to pass without scrutiny. Comrade N. W. Smee (with others) pointed out the error and forwarded a copy which (after comparison with that given at p. 21 of 'Daisies in the Grass,' poems by Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Banks, London, 1865) is here reproduced.—H. H. S.]

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

SPAIN.

Last Sunday, a mass meeting was held at Linares, where over seven thousand Socialists met in order to denounce the various political parties who try to over-reach the workers' organisations, and strong resolutions were passed condemning participation by Socialists in party politics. The Spanish artisans have been so often cheated by politicians of all sorts that they have at last become tired of playing the game of these humbug democrats.

Another enthusiastic meeting was held a few days ago at Valencia, where comrades Iglesias and Caparo, from Madrid and Barcelona respectively, developed the revolutionary Socialist ideas of the workers in direct opposition to the recent manifesto of Pi y Margall, the chief of the Republican Federalists, and the former head of the Executive of the Spanish Republic of 1873. The Socialists are more and more severing their cause from that of the Spanish Republican party, whose various shades are headed by men like Pi y Margall, Zorilla, Castelar, Salmeron, who are, in spite of their affirmations, at the bottom of their hearts the worst enemies of Socialism.

BELGIUM.

At Ghent, the strongest fortress of the Belgian Social Democratic party, an Anarchist paper has just been started, De Opstand (the Rebellion), under the editorship of comrade Lootens. It is in reality the third series of the same paper, the first having been issued at Brussels by comrade De Roy, which was obliged to stop its publication owing to several prosecutions and condemnations ; the second series, edited at Amsterdam by comrade Van Ommeren, who was sentenced to one year of solitary confinement, met with the same sad fate. We wish our new Dutch colleague good success and a long life.

On September 24, a Congress of the Co-operative Societies of Ghent, Brussels, Antwerp, Louvain, Tolimont, Menin, Liege, Verviers, Ougrée, Warquegnies, and Dison, was held at Brussels in the local of the Workmen's Party. Italy was represented by Ugo Rabeno, Holland by Otten and Velthuyzen. And these nice fellows, who have at all times their mouths full of progress and democracy, accepted a resolution declaring that the co-operators ought to abstain themselves from all Socialistic propaganda ! M. Anseele, the leader of the Socialists of Ghent, was also the deus ex machina of that Co-operative Congress !

After all, Belgian Socialism is becoming more and more water and milk, and I mean much more water even than milk. In a few days municipal elections are to be held in one half of the country, and the Parti Ouvrier (Workmen's Party) has nearly everywhere amalgamated with the corrupt Liberal party in order to enter the municipal councils. The Liberals, having to elect ten, twelve, or fifteen councillors in a town, allow the workers to have one, two, and in rare instances three candidates on their list ! And in the preparatory meetings of these elections, one would notice such disgusting scenes as the following one :—" Bourgeois : You are a candidate of the workers. You are a Socialist. Candidate : I am a worker, sir, not an Anarchist or a Communist. Bourgeois : But a Socialist you are ? Candidate : Well, I am a member of the Worker's party. The Chairman : Pray let that man with the Socialist ideas be, he knows very well, as we do, that Socialism cannot be realised before three or four thousand years. Don't bother him for that. Isn't it so, sir ? Candidate : Right you are, sir !"—(Extract from La Nation, Brussels). Now, mind you, that very candidate was, twenty years ago, a member of the General Council of the International Workingmen's Association ! Time moves on, and Belgian Socialism also,—but backwards !

At Louvain, we can at least notice the starting of a new paper, somewhat more Radical than the above-mentioned candidate, Le Forçat (the Galley-Slave). We wish it good luck.

The wages of agricultural labourers in Norfolk, recently reduced from 11s. to 10s., are in many cases being further reduced to 9s. per week.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SOCIALIST CO-OPERATION.

SIR,—As one of those who voted for comrade Davis's amendment at the co-operative meeting on Wednesday 21st Sept., I should be glad if you would give me the opportunity of explaining the position of the minority. No one can, of course, object to a group of people starting a co-operative store for their own benefit ; and I have no doubt that if the Socialists start such a store it will bring in the pecuniary benefit they need, and may lead to an extensive business. What I must protest against is the tone of comrade Varley's arguments and of those who supported him, who represented that such a business could be carried on on Socialistic principles and could be the means of accomplishing the change in society which we desire. I must say I was as much surprised as the postman who wandered into the meeting expecting to hear Socialism at the style of argument used by comrade Varley and his supporters. The way in which the business is to succeed is by no other means than by competition ; and comrade Varley pointed out that by paying no interest on capital they would thereby be able to undersell even the "sweaters" ! Comrade Varley and his supporters talked quite coolly about "killing out" the shopkeepers. Well, if they do want to kill this class of beings out, I would ask them to have the manliness to do the killing in a straightforward way, and not by the sneaking method of competing them out of existence. And if by this new method of shopkeeping they merely compete other shopkeepers out of their profession, I would remind them that these ruined men must either join the army of paupers or enter the ranks of the workers and increase competition amongst them ; so that this process of killing out the shopkeepers would amount to either increasing the army of the paupers or intensifying competition in other callings. Besides that, Socialistic co-operation should begin with productive labour, whereas this scheme is to begin with distribution ; and why ? In order to make profits by trading, and thereby get capital for a productive enterprise. Well, I don't consider this either a Socialistic or a straightforward way of getting capital.

The advocates of co-operation said that it would be an answer to those enemies who complain that the Socialists are all principle and no practice. I was surprised at such twaddle from professing Socialists. Surely the League has a good record of practical work done in promoting the union of the workers, and its practical work must ever consist in promoting international union, and not in starting enterprises to compete in the world's market. If comrade Varley and his supporters are not content with this, there is plenty of good Socialistic work that can be done within the party. Let those who have been blessed with a good education do all they can to brighten the lives of their poorer comrades by free concerts and free instruction in the various branches of knowledge. Such practical work is of the first importance ; for if we cannot persuade men to cast out of them the selfishness which the present system of society engenders, the new system which we seek to establish will not prosper. And I am sure that the cultivation of the spirit of fraternity will do more than any competitive co-operative profit-making store towards preparing men for that state of society in which we shall live "each for all and all for each."—Yours fraternally,

NOTES.

Mr. CHAMPION's address at the Church Congress was as well received as could be expected, although very naturally a meeting largely composed of officials, was much disturbed at his attack on the head official, the Queen. A more or less friendly critic remarked that Socialism proposed to give plenty and wealth to everybody, but neglected their spiritual condition. To a non-ecclesiastical mind a good foundation for a sound spiritual condition would appear to be the common-place virtue called honesty, and, unless the Church Congress is much belied by the reporters, that virtue seems to be too common-place to be noticed by these providers for the spiritual life of the nation. The spirit of the meeting, especially during the discussion of that most spiritual question of tithes, was decidedly in accordance with the ancient motto, Get all you can, and keep what you get.

A Mr. Grier said, however, with much truth, that the English people, from the days of Hengist and Horsa to those of Lord Randolph Churchill and Burmah, was always ready to take everything they could lay their hands on. Well, the proverb, "Like people, like priest," is a good one, but Mr. Grier must remember it has two edges; and I must come back to my text and say that the most spiritual persons ought to be the most honest—though they seldom are.

One genius said that he feared that behind the apparently-innocent appearance of Socialism the livid spectre of Communism lay hid. This reminds me of an agreeable scene enacted at a rather stormy open-air meeting at which I was present, when a furious opponent said, "Why, at this rate you will be approving of the deeds of the Paris Commune." Whereat a reverend and much respected comrade sprang forward and addressed this retailer of stale news much as follows: "Sir, you have made a most remarkable discovery, a most remarkable discovery! Sir, I beg to congratulate you on your remarkable discovery! Sir, you are a fool!"

Mr. Arch, in addressing a great meeting of field-labourers, has been lamenting the sacking of Messrs. Fenwick and Burt, and, taking his cue from the respectable Liberal papers, has been telling them that it is probably a piece of treachery—the work of Tory intrigue and so forth. Why does Mr. Arch talk such nonsense, when he either knows the real facts or can easily find them out if he does not? He need not profess fear of the Northumbrian miners turning Tories; but if he thinks it a misfortune that they should turn Socialists he has considerable cause for fear.

Perhaps no Government ever took so little by an attack on freedom as the present Tory Government have taken in prosecuting Lord Mayor Sullivan; the defeat was so overwhelming that the only excuse the Government prints could find was in the stupidity of their own officials. It has given the Nationalists an opportunity for a most successful demonstration at the cheapest possible price. For the rest, though one finds it hard to help smiling at the spectacle of the Lord Mayor, attended by mace and sword, a prisoner in the police court, yet it is a good augury of the time when local bodies shall find themselves in formal opposition to the stupid centralisation, which a little time ago seemed to be all triumphant.

The news of the "Socialist Disturbance" in New York demands explanation. That the American police should break up a Socialist meeting with the most brutal violence is nothing remarkable, unfortunately, even setting aside their exploits at Chicago, for they are on the whole the most brutal of all the defenders of law and order. But what explanation can there be of Mr. Henry George's followers attacking the Socialists except that that gentleman has rattled and joined the Capitalist camp? Definitely as we Socialists differ from Mr. George, this would be a great disappointment to some of us, since he has always been put forward as a specially honest man and a lover of progress in all forms.

W. M.

During the enquiry into the death of Head-Constable Whelehan this past week, nothing has been so plain as that it was a hatched-up affair arranged by the police. Whether by Governmental instructions, in order to get an "efficient cause" for the coercion policy, or whether it was on their own account, to gain credit, has not been made clear; but what is clear is that unless the informer Callinan had worked up the business nothing would have happened.

In England, police intimidation and domiciliary visits; in Ireland, treachery and stupid official brutality; in "Hail Columbia, happy land!" the same as in Ireland—persecution for opinion and judicial murder; all these things are the bourgeois employing against the great movement which is growing so rapidly everywhere.

But their tools fail them sometimes. Last week a constable at Gweedore refused to fire upon the people; an inspector at Mitchelstown dared to tell the truth and shame—his superiors; many others are leaving or preparing to leave "the force;" even a hardened policeman has some humanity left in him sometimes, and recognises that it is to the oppressed people that he belongs.

Careful propaganda should be made, by all can do so, among soldiers and policemen, and that speedily, for nothing so effectually frightens a government as to find the "strong hand" weakening on which it relies, and the force which rests upon slipping away from it.

It cannot be too much insisted upon that there is inevitable war between "the classes and the masses," and that the army, navy, and police are, by the necessity of their position, against the latter. But they are drawn from the "masses," and may be made to realise that when these gain their end, the extinction of class, there will be more honourable and pleasanter work for them than the Quilp-cum-Judas employment they now follow.

The East London Waterworks Company, which issued its annual report on 14th inst., has earned some notoriety in the past year by reason of the eels in its mains and its intermittent supply, but can show an increase in its revenue of nearly £2,000 for the half-year and a decrease in its expenditure. Thus the company has been prospering while the people whom it serves have had to endure the inconvenience and risks of a short supply during the past summer.

The unfortunate customers of the company have suffered by the drought, but it has rolled in the shekels for the shareholders. The chairman boldly defended the intermittent supply, and threw all the blame on those "who had unadvisedly removed their cisterns, and who neglected to fill a receptacle during the day;" but the collectors of the company apparently have not "neglected" to collect the rates, whether a supply of water was obtained or not.

Instances of this kind of thing are always recurring, and all that can be said is that, so long as the people allow monopoly to control the necessities of life, they must expect to be fleeced. That they should be so patient while profit is made out of their mishaps is not one of the least surprising circumstances of the case.

Those who speak so readily and constantly of the "improved position" of the workers should read the report of the discussion between the Vestry of St. Luke's and the costers of Whitecross Street upon a poll-tax that the former proposed to levy upon the latter. One of the costers said:—

"There is not one of us who don't pay double the rent we did years ago. I pay treble. I have paid for the same accommodation 2s., 4s., 6s., and 9s. 6d. I am not in a position to pay what I am paying now, and ought not to have to pay it. The parish has gone down very much through the pulling down of the houses, and the building of the 'models' has not made it better."

S.

AN APPEAL TO THE MINERS.

ADDRESSED TO THEIR DELEGATES IN CONFERENCE
AT EDINBURGH, OCTOBER 11TH, 1887.

FELLOW WORKMEN,—

Though not a miner, I feel that no apology is needed in addressing you on the Labour Question. You are now too fully convinced of the identity of the interests of all workmen to refuse an impartial consideration to arguments, because advanced by one who is not of your own calling. The following words are addressed to you in the hope that they may be the means of inducing you and the half million of mining operatives whom you represent to look deeper into the labour problem than you have been accustomed to do.

The very holding of this Conference, whatever its immediate results may be, is a step in the right direction. The interests of the 520,000 men, women, and children who toil in and about our mines are the same. Their sufferings are borne in common, the wrongs of each are known to and felt by all; they are the victims of the same system of oppression, and their deliverance can only be achieved by the solid combination of the whole mass into one great Federation. But, still further, remember that the whole of the miners are but part of the working class; that your interests are just as nearly related to the operatives in the factories, the labourers in the field, and the seamen on the main as to your neighbours in the pit; and that to gain your own rights you must unite with the rest of the workers and help in the great struggle for the universal emancipation of labour.

The object of your Conference is to discuss (1) the best means of limiting the output of coal; (2) a fortnightly holiday; (3) National Federation; (4) an eight hours day enforced by law. The object of your 1st, 2nd, and 4th proposals is to wring better terms from your employers. You hope, by restricting the supply of coal, to raise prices, and, by raising prices, to raise wages. You hope also in doing this to lessen the shamefully long hours per day which most of you are compelled to work at present. A word of criticism from a Socialist point of view may be useful to you on these points.

In every attempt to better your hard lot the thorough sympathy of all Socialists is with you. But do not be too moderate in your demands. Whatever relief you get, if indeed you get any under the present system, will be got, not from the generosity, but from the fears of your masters. The less you ask the less you will get. Moderate rebellion against such immoderate wrongs is at least bad policy, and even looks like cowardice. To appeal for such paltry concessions is but a waste of time. If you got all you ask for, you would find in a very short time that you had only a bogus benefit. Your policy is based on the assumption that you can regulate competition—and that is utterly beyond your power. With increasing markets, you can just manage to raise wages a very little; but with decreasing markets, with appliances for the saving of coal in manufactures in eager demand, with the attempts to save labour in the getting of coal, and with the enormous strides that are being made in the application of electricity, it is sheer madness to think that you can succeed. The advantages of the capitalists are too great for you ever to dream of winning if this policy is to be your only way of fighting. You are too weak, even if ever so well organised, to force a rise of prices. The employers, also, are unable, as well as unwilling, to grant any great advance. Home and foreign competition is pressing upon them harder and harder. Although there is practically no importation of coal into this country, and no danger of there being much, foreign competition has still to be dealt with. The price of coal has a direct and powerful influence on the price of iron and steel, and an indirect, though less powerful, influence on the price of all manufactures. If you carefully and fully measure the strength of the forces against you in this policy, you will surely see that it is sheer folly to depend upon it alone.

An eight hours day and a fortnightly holiday is becoming a popular workman's programme. It is welcome as a slight advance; but it is a superficial proposal if intended as a means of permanently bettering your condition. Do not disregard the lesson that Free Trade presents to you! It was right in principle, as the movement for shortening the hours of labour is. It put a few pence into one of your pockets, and took just about the same amount out of the other. The eight hours bill will be just the same story over again. Miners, of all men, ought to know that their long hours is a less evil than the intensity with which they have to labour. The piece-work system which they have been unable to get rid of compels them to strain every nerve and work like slaves in order to earn even the average wage; and shorter hours means either smaller wages or harder work, or, at the best, a judicious mixture of both.

Do not think that these criticisms are made in an unfriendly way for the purpose of chilling your hopes of amelioration. It is not from want of sympathy nor interest in seeing your lot bettered, but from fear that you are about to waste energy and raise false hopes by going about it in the wrong way. The advantages you have are few, and the chance of winning further advantages very small. By all means stick to what you have, and try to get as much more in the same way as you can; but let your ultimate aim be a thorough and real change which will end the petty and continual squabble between capitalist and labourers.

The third point in your list of subjects for discussion is really the most important of all. The Federation of the Miners of the whole county is a most important step. You have already a Miners' National Union, which is, however, unknown to fame except as a means of collecting money to pay part of the election expenses of your labour M.P.'s (of whom more anon). Let us hope no more abortions of the same kind will come to light. What is wanted now is a real Federation of the Miners' Unions for the purpose (1) of bringing the strength of the whole body to the support of each district in times of labour disputes; (2) to extend and strengthen the unions where they are now weak; (3) to promote a great federation of all trades—a gigantic union which will include the whole working-class; and (4) to consider the ways and means of effecting such a change as will secure to the working-class not merely bigger wages but the full fruits of their labour.

The first three points will be accepted by all the advanced spirits of the labour movement, and it is surely unnecessary to urge them here. The fourth is the one which most needs discussion. You must now see that a mere struggle for higher wages and shorter hours is not enough. The cause of the whole evil is that capital and land are monopolised by a class which uses them as instruments for the robbery of labour. Limiting and regulating this robbery is most unsatisfactory even when successful. You must stop the system of robbery altogether. The labour problem is (1) That useful work is not provided for all; (2) That even when work is got the return to the labourers is less than the value of the work done; (3) That the work is done under unhealthy and slavish conditions. All these evils spring from the competitive system which Socialists wish you to unite in breaking down. Sooner or later you must take this as your aim. If you choose you can waste a few more years in trying to get justice out of capitalists—but you might as well try to get blood out of a stone. As long as your labour is organised by masters for their own profit, they must grind you down and take everything from you but the price of some bread and butter. Whenever you take the means of production into your own control, and organise your own labour in your own interests, all the fuss and war about wages, prices, gluts, depressions, etc., will be at an end.

The only purpose of this address is to put forward certain principles and to gain your adhesion to them. It would be out of place to lay down the details of the movement by which you are to gain these ends. The methods of propaganda and the practical work of putting these principles into operation are for you to decide. The essential thing is that instead of higgling and bargaining about the price at which you will sell yourselves to masters in the labour-market, you should now become your own masters and get the full fruits of your labour.

Whatever step you take towards organising the workers, begin by severing yourselves from Tory and Liberal politicians. However you may shape your politics you must clearly reckon on the opposition of Liberals and Tories alike. To-day the cause of labour is degraded by men who, under the name of "labour representatives," drag you after the Liberal party. Tories and Liberals alike are the defenders of the rights of property as against the rights of labour. Both parties have humbugged the working-class all through, and it is time now that you made it clearly understood by those who claim to be your leaders that they must make no compromise with the defenders of monopoly. In future the workers must rely upon themselves, they must keep their organisation clear of middle-class influence, and they must go to the root of this question instead of merely nibbling at the fringes of it.

Edinburgh, October 1887.

J. L. MAHON.

FREEDOM OF CONTRACT.

For all practical purposes, then, we may conclude that the labourer is considered not, as Mr. Bradlaugh asserts, as the slave of old was considered—"a kind of conscious machine"—but a mere machine carrying its own motive force, the price of which is determined by the price of the restoration of that force. All this Mr. Bradlaugh seems to deny, as will be seen by the following extract from the speech I have been commenting on: "I take it, then, that to-day, by all reasonable men, the labourer is reckoned with, not as a man who is a servant, not as a man who is a serf, not as a man who is a slave, but as a person who has his labour to sell, and who is entitled to make a fair bargain for that labour before the world."

Perhaps the best refutation of this astounding piece of nonsense is in Mr. Bradlaugh's own words, written some time before the delivery of the speech at Northampton.

"It is warmly contended," writes Mr. B. ('Labour's Prayer,' p. 4) "that the capitalist and labourer contend for the division of the fund appropriable in fair and open field; that the capitalist has his money to employ, the man his labour to sell; that if workmen are in excess of the capitalist's requirements, so that the labourer has to supplicate for employment, wages cannot rise, and will probably fall; but that if, on the contrary, capital has need to invite additional labourers, then wages must rise. That is the law of supply and demand brought prominently forward."

"In great part this is true, but it is not true that capital and labour compete in fair and open field, any more than it is true that an ironclad war-vessel, with heavy ordnance, would compete in fair field with a wooden frigate equipped with the matériel in use thirty years ago. Capital is gold-plated, and carries too many guns for unprotected labour."

"The intelligent capitalist makes the laws affecting master and servant which the uneducated labourer must obey, but has no effective voice to alter. The capitalist forms the government of the country, which in turn protects capital against labour; this government the labourer must sustain, and dares not modify. The capitalist does combine, and has combined, and the result of this combination has been an unfair appropriation of the divisible fund." Exactly.

It is evident Mr. Bradlaugh has altered his opinions lately, for when the same contention has been made by Socialists he has stoutly denied it. "What are the rights of capital?" asked Mr. B., at Northampton, "for capital has rights," he assured his audience. I was certainly under the impression that only human beings had rights; I have never for one moment dreamed that things inanimate had rights until Mr. B. said so. Rights imply duties, and are, therefore, the attributes of the human race.

"There are people who talk absolute nonsense," continued Mr. B., "who say that capital should be given without interest and used without profit, and who talk of making revolution against the capitalist class. Those men are either enemies of the people, or they are idiots: they are either traitors to the people, or they are madmen. If you want to dig a field and you have no spade, if you can earn something by digging, and some other one has that spade, you must pay for the loan and use of that spade. It is impossible that capital will enterprise itself to make you live more easily unless capital has some inducement."

I willingly grant that you pay for the use of the spade, but to whom is the pay due? Mr. B. tells us it is due to the capitalist. The pay is due to the labourer who produced it, and not the capitalist who possesses it. The word "capital" is used here as something that will not enterprise itself to make you live more easily unless it has some inducement. This can only be understood by the substitution of the word capitalist for capital, and then, read through the spectacles of Mr. B. when he wrote 'Labour's Prayer,' it becomes as clear as daylight, and despite the denunciation of Socialists indulged in by Mr. B. as "traitors" and "idiots," this very slight alteration of his proposition will render the true position, and make the Socialists right and Mr. B. wrong.

It is interesting to note that the two individuals—the one who made the spade and the one who wishes to use it—are both producers, while the one who owns the spade, the capitalist, is an idler; and it is he who stands between the two labourers and prevents the one from using the product of the other unless he can make a profit by the process. "What is capital?" asked Mr. B. Sir Thomas Brassey, speaking at the Industrial Remuneration Conference (and, by the way, I think that was a good sign—rich men and poor men, men with millions and men with nothing—met together in Piccadilly, London, last year to discuss if it were possible to improve the relations between Capital and Labour. It was the first time that that was ever done in England; it should be done again and again)—Sir Thomas Brassey, speaking as a representative of Capital, used these three phrases: "(1) Abstinence from enjoyment is the only source of Capital; (2) it is upon the increase of Capital that the advance of wages depends; (3) while Labour is the vivifying principle which preserves Capital from decay."

Abstinence the only source of capital! Abstinence is a passive, not an active, quality; nothing is produced by it; the wealth of the country is in no way increased by it.

Capital is created by Labour. Now, Labour is an active quality. Besides, even supposing that abstinence is a creative virtue, who is it abstains? Sir Thomas Brassey? The only thing that Sir Thomas Brassey abstains from doing is useful work; and if we are to take into account abstinence from enjoyment at all, how about the workers of the country, who are almost total abstainers from any kind of enjoyment? They do all the work of the country, and consume the smallest share of what they produce; while those who look on and never do a hand's turn take and consume the largest share of any. The labourers build sumptuous palaces, and live in hovels; weave broadcloth, and wear shoddy; cut beautiful roads, and live in slums. Who abstains, then? It needs no answer; the thing answers itself. Therefore, if abstinence is the source of capital, the workers are the source from which it flows, even on this showing.

(To be concluded.)

ANOTHER LETTER FROM AMERICA.

"TRUE as steel are the friends of the seven men whom the courts of Illinois have doomed to death in atonement for the tragedy in the Haymarket. They know no discouragement; they disdain despair. No toil is too irksome, no sacrifice too great in the task they have taken upon themselves." These are words not written by papers sympathetic to the cause of labour, but by capitalistic sheets, and they tell of devotion which has only been approached by the early Christian martyrs.

The case will be carried before the Supreme Court of the United States. This is the latest news I can report to the readers of the Commonweal. Captain Black, the legal assistant of the condemned men during their trial, arrived last Friday in New York from Chicago and at once went to see General Roger A. Pryor, one of the greatest experts in legal matters. The two men were closeted in the strictest privacy for two hours, but when Captain Black came out of the office he looked joyful. "I have won him to our side," the Captain said. "He is satisfied that both justice and law lie with us; that we are certain to win our object." "I have not the least doubt that our application for a writ of error will be granted," explained General Pryor to the reporters. "Indeed, the records show so many errors in the ruling and in the trial that I cannot see how our application can be denied." Most of the prominent lawyers express the opinion that no difficulty would be met with in securing the writ of error. Of course a writ of error is not equivalent to a reversal of the judgment of the Illinois Supreme Court, but it allows a delay in the execution until the case is finally disposed of by U.S. Supreme Court. The state of affairs in Chicago appears to be highly critical. Mrs. Black, the wife of Captain Black, gives the following graphic description:

"The town is torn by a tornado of conflicting passions—hate, pity, rage, sorrow—each with tense violence struggling for mastery. God knows where it will end. A very panic has seized the community. Our homes, our lives are near to destruction. Men speak of the danger that overhangs us all in accents of fear and horror. Women turn pale and tremble at the very mention of the momentous crisis that is at hand. In the presence of our little ones we are silent of the dismal hour that threatens to darken the memory of their childhood days. We are dealing with men made desperate by weight of woe. They see their friends on the brink of an abyss over which wild, unreasoning passion works to hurl them to disgraceful death. Heaven help us if the worst comes. The story of their revenge will be written in solemn colours in the annals of the age. Frankly, we fear them."

"Captain Black's position is indeed no pleasant one in this unhappy affair. He is upbraided by the one side for the moderation which he has urged and demanded; he is denounced by the enemies of the Anarchists for the part he has taken in their defence. He is striving, though, merely to play the part of the peacemaker. He has come here on a mission of mercy. He wants to save the Anarchists that he may save the capitalists. The destruction of the former means the ruin of the money kings. The labouring masses of Chicago are in no spirit to be trifled with. They see the families of the condemned men utterly undone with unutterable and pity, and their prayers go not unheeded into every cottage in Chicago. We have come to this great city for aid. We say to the good people of this great and cultured community, 'Come, let us reason together.' If they deny us their kindly help we know not where to turn. We must then nerve ourselves for the worst, and God knows what that will be."

Dr. Giffen seems to be again on the stump. The capitalist papers report in full a paper which he must have read before some scientific institution or other. Naturally, as it becomes the flunkey of bourgeoisdom, the report he makes of British progress, especially of the labouring man's progress, is satisfactory indeed. We are told savings increase, paupers decrease, and working men are earning comfortable wages. A sceptic once defined statistics to be the science of lying in figures. Probably Dr. Giffen acts up to this definition, as the impression amongst the peoples themselves is very different to Dr. Giffen's tell-tales. Ah, if we had but once the occasion, time, etc., to investigate at proper quarters these figures, to examine into the ways of workhouses, charitable institutions, etc., we might be enabled to tell a tale forcing even Mr. Broadhurst to admit there is something radically wrong. However, now and then we stumble across a case which explains to us the way to decrease workhouse expenses. Here is one. The steamer "Warwick" arrived here a few days ago from Bristol, England, having on board Katie and Minnie Peters, consigned to the Children's Aid Society of New York. The Board of Public Charities, acting under the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, decided that the children were amenable to the Act of Congress prohibiting the landing of foreigners liable to become public charges, and instructed the captain of the "Warwick" to return them to England. The children were sent by Mark Whitehall, a justice of the peace and superintendent of the poor in Bristol. The captain of the "Warwick," when told to take the children back, expressed much surprise, and said that Mr. Whitehall had frequently sent destitute children to New York and that the authorities of that port never objected to the landing of the children!

There has been no change in the situation in the Lehigh Valley (Pa.), miners being still out. Those in the Schuylkill and the Wyoming Valleys are at work, the former at the advance of 8 per cent. The threatened strike of 8000 Connellsville coke operatives has been postponed until October 2.

TORY BLACKGUARDS AT LOWESTOFT.

Last Sunday, Houghton and Nicoll tried to hold the usual meeting. For some time past the local Tories have set hired roughs upon our speakers, and they hardly expected to get much further than the railway station. They had been warned that they would not be allowed to set foot in the place. On their arrival they found a crowd of crimps, long-shore loafers, and others, waiting but subdued by the presence of two policemen. At the meeting-place Nicoll had hardly opened the meeting, by appealing to the crowd to act as Englishmen and give fair play, when a rush was made which swept down the hill towards the station. He was knocked down several times, but a soldier came to the rescue and told the mob to behave like men. This appeal would have been useless, however, had not the policemen suddenly appeared on the scene. They surrounded our men, and held the crowd back. Then was witnessed the unwonted spectacle of two Socialists protected by policemen against violence. To plainly prove the ignoble cowardice of the ruffianly crowd, it may be mentioned that about seven kept at least a thousand easily at bay! Just as the yard of the railway station was entered, the mob charged again, and for a few minutes overpowered the police. These rallied, however, and got our men into the station, where a special train was prepared, and took them off to a little village just out of the town. The mob avenged itself on two harmless onlookers unjustly suspected of Socialism! Our comrades were but slightly injured. Nicoll's face was scratched by a Conservative hero!

At a large open-air meeting on the Market Square, Northampton, on Sunday morning, on the motion of the chairman, Mr. Robert Reed, it was decided unanimously to make a public demonstration on the occasion of Prince Albert Victor's visit to the town next week to lay the foundation-stone of the Jubilee enlargements at Northampton General Infirmary. It was determined to have a procession, headed by a band which should play the Dead March in "Saul." The meeting subscribed for a large black flag it was resolved to procure, with the following inscription: "Put not your trust in princes." The chairman said it was an insult to the people of Northampton to bring down a stripling like the prince, and he warned those making the arrangements for the visit to tell Prince Albert Victor even now not to come. The visit, he declared, would be an historical one, and probably it would be the last time that a prince in England would leave his home.

LOW WAGES AND THE PARSON.—A "Country Rector" has written to the Daily News "How to Live on 5s. a-week." He himself undertook the experiment, and gives the result with a detailed account of the expenses. The amount allowed for rent is 9d., and for that useful article soap, only 3d. Most of the other items appear at about market price. The rector says he was able to perform his work as well as ever! He does not state, however, whether he is continuing the experiment. That the food recommended by this well-intentioned Christian is sufficient for the work performed by him is quite possible, but should not his letter have been addressed to those of his calling? How would a dinner of two ounces of cold bacon suit, say, a collier or an ironworker? Letters of this description are welcomed by callous employers striving to reduce wages, and ill become a follower of the Nazarene. The experiment, however, loses much of its value when it is recollected that

"HAVE YOU NOT HEARD HOW IT HAS GONE WITH MANY A CAUSE BEFORE NOW: FIRST, FEW MEN HEED IT; NEXT, MOST MEN CONTEMN IT; LASTLY, ALL MEN ACCEPT IT—AND THE CAUSE IS WON!"

SOCIALISM AT THE CHURCH CONGRESS.

NOTHING could show better the progress of the Socialist movement than the fact that that most conservative of institutions the Church of England, has begun to consider the movement. Last Thursday evening was devoted by the Church Congress to hearing three papers on Socialism; from the Bishop of Derry, H. H. Champion, and Stanley Leighton, M.P. The meeting was held in the Drill Hall, Wolverhampton, and was attended by about 2,500 people. About one half of the audience was composed of clergymen. The Bishop of Derry was unable to attend, so his paper was read by the Rector of Wolverhampton. The Bishop's paper showed an entire want of knowledge of the subject. A few trite remarks on the good intentions of many Socialists, followed by a few platitudes on the superiority of Christianity to Socialism, was all the Bishop had to say. He strongly advised the clergy not to play with Socialism and so assist "in spreading the germs of social zymotic disease." No criticism on the Bishop's paper can be made, for the simple reason that there was nothing in it.

Mr. Champion delivered an excellent speech, in which he briefly gave the Socialist explanation of the present perilous position. He summed up this in four propositions (1) private ownership of land and capital (2) giving unlimited power to the owners over the propertyless class (3) who use that power to confiscate enormous quantities of the labour of the landless workers (4) these by the whip of hunger being obliged to accept the cost price of their labour, viz., starvation wages, for producing all the wealth of England. The remedy was to set firmly about limiting the power of the monopolists, and so render it possible for honest people to get a living. "The cause of the unmeasured vehemence of some of the language used by Socialists was the cowardly conduct of practical politicians. If governments had to choose between holding London in a state of siege and of grappling seriously with the labour question, practical politicians would soon find the problem ripe for solution." The speech was on the whole received very favourably; only once was there any serious interruption. When Mr. Champion was commenting on the wasteful extravagance of spending £17,000 on upholstering Westminster Abbey for a woman to pray in, loud shouts of "Withdraw!" were heard, met with a few stentorian "No, noes!" One royalist shouted in the tone you sometimes hear in a provincial cathedral, "God save the Queen!"

Stanley Leighton, the Tory M.P., spoke after Champion. The Bishop of Derry was bad enough, but this fiery layman was clever enough to crowd about half-a-dozen misrepresentations of Socialism into every sentence. He characterised Socialism as an attack on common sense, and referring to the indignant demand of the Socialist, "Why should society allow one man to waste thousands in utter selfishness, and allow another to die of starvation?" he said, "We are as much dissatisfied with such a state of things as the Socialist." It is curious that notwithstanding this Tory landlord's dissatisfaction with things as they are, he taboos the only effective remedy—Socialism. Mr. Leighton wants to find a way for the rich remaining rich without working, and by which the worker can be plundered, without being impoverished by the process. Such simple-minded nonsense is worthy of a Tory landlord. He does not know that the riches of the rich are built on the poverty of the masses, and their continual exploitation by the monopolists, of whom Mr. Stanley Leighton is one. A sarcastic person might remark that Mr. Leighton is either an ignoramus or a hypocrite, and I should not vehemently contradict him. Mr. Leighton looks to penny banks, coffee taverns, building societies, and emigration, for the solution of the labour problem. We may inform him that he is looking in the wrong direction, and may point out to him that instead of congratulating the Church on the miserable schemes referred to, he should rather grieve that in the rich land of England, the producers have to scrape pennies together; have become so demoralised by the grinding of landlords and other exploiters, that they fly to the grog shop for a little relief from their monotonous lives; and that to counteract this, "5 per cent per ann." members of the Church of Christ have started Gospel Coffee Taverns, where bad coffee is sold at double its cost. It is not in miserable schemes of this kind, which are all very well as makeshifts, that the labour question is to be solved; but in practically applying the Heathen and Christian maxim, "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you." When landlords realise what that means, they will understand Socialism, and when they act upon it, they will be Socialists.

The discussion on the papers was limited, only one layman taking part. Canon Grier desired to see co-operation substituted for competition, and was anxious for the suppression of the liquor traffic. An Irish Churchman, the Dean of Armagh, made a virulent attack on Socialism, composed of blarney and ignorance. He supported the wasting of £17,000 on upholstery for Westminster Abbey; he did not believe we could get along without capital [who wants to?]; he did not desire to see people reduced to a dull dead level, and society made into a swamp and morass (!); and was anxious that the eighth and tenth commandments should not be forgotten.

Stewart Headlam vigorously replied, and said that he endorsed Ruskin's division of men into workers, beggars, and robbers; and urged that Socialism was a movement for endeavouring to turn the robbers and beggars into the ranks of the workers. To the landlord and to the capitalist he said, "Rob no more!" and he urged the priests and especially the bishops of the Church to follow the example of the Guild of St. Matthew, in exhorting the idle rich to cease their dishonest practices, and to learn to live by their own labour.

The concluding speaker was the Bishop of Bedford, who said the contrast between the rich and the poor was so appalling, that he was prepared to consider carefully any scheme, no matter how revolutionary, that promised relief. It is to be hoped that the Bishop will remember to carry out what he has undertaken, and if after investigation he concludes that the monopolists have ruined England, that he will boldly stand in the ranks of the Socialists, and help them to make it possible for honest men to live.

At the close the chairman, the Bishop of Lichfield, asked the assembly if the committee was right in asking Mr. Champion to read a paper. Loud cries of "Yes," were given in response. A large quantity of Socialist literature was distributed to the clergy who attended the sitting.

LITERARY NOTICES.

'A Political Essay, showing the Necessity of having Money, Land, and all Manufacturing Industries National,' by R. Crawford (author, 55, College Place, Camden Town, 6d.) is a very temperate, plainly worded treatment of the theme its title indicates. Many, indeed most, of the author's illustrations are drawn from South Africa, a part of the world he evidently knows well. It is easier for men to appreciate the true relations of circumstances not those of their immediate surroundings, and this alone would have made the pamphlet a valuable one.

The Gazzetta Operaia, Turin, "an independent journal of no political party," contains some sensible vigorous writing on current social questions. We note especially in a recent issue an article pointing out the illusive nature of the good done by the ordinary partial, spasmodic trade-strikes, their very doubtful victories, and not at all doubtful defeats in the unequal combat; recognising too that the individualist capitalist is often as helpless in the crisis-development as the men he employs.

SOCIALISM IN ABERDEEN.

ARREST OF J. L. MAHON.

THE baton of Aberdeen officialism has been raised against Socialism and dropped again in deference to popular indignation. The guardians of "the law," property, and orthodoxy were startled to learn that a Socialist intended to visit the city on Saturday, October 1st. The Radical had proved himself a "thorn in the flesh" of smug authority, and so the advent of a Socialist was a positive terror. And there had been a midnight robbery of a jeweller's window, and the police were on the outlook for suspicious persons. Possibly they expected Mr. Mahon to wear one of the best of the stolen gold watches. When, on Saturday, at seven o'clock, he stood up on the Castlegate, a large market square, to address the numerous audience quietly assembled to hear him, they had to confess to each other that he was, as the superintendent said, "a reasonable looking person," who certainly had no jewellery flaunted on his breast. Beyond showing a little brief authority by asking him to remove to another spot, out of the way of the meeting usually held where he was standing, they did not interfere with him. He finished his address in quietness, and evidently made a favourable impression.

But on Sunday the baton quivered with zeal for the Sabbath and conventional religion. The superintendent was eager to do battle for the Pharisees, the Kirk, and "the Lord's Day." But it was not till evening that he grew valiant. Perhaps he dined with some of the "elders," and got inspirited at the sumptuous table. Mr. Mahon's three o'clock meeting at the Duthie Park, situated at the southern outskirts of the city, was not interfered with. The "bobby" on duty there listened quietly with his baton in its sheath and his white gloves on his folded hands. The sunshine of the glorious autumn day abashed the owls of Conventionalism, and the gospel of Socialism was proclaimed in peace to the large and attentive congregation.

But as evening approached the baton became restless, and authority determined that a blow should be struck against the strange and dangerous propaganda. No doubt there had been excited consultations among the Pharisees in vestries and elsewhere, and the police were coached. When Mr. Mahon took his stand at the entrance to Correction Wynd (a recess opening out of a busy thoroughfare), about six o'clock to begin his address, a policeman requested him to move on as he would disturb a congregation then worshipping in an adjoining church. Mr. Mahon immediately left the spot and went to Castle-gate, followed by a large number of persons. He resumed his address there, but had not spoken many minutes when a policeman came up to him and informed him that he could not be allowed to hold his meeting without the superintendent's permission. Mr. Mahon pointed out that other meetings were being held in the square at the moment, and declined to stop his address. The official endeavoured to persuade Mr. Mahon that a political meeting was very improper on the Sabbath, but found that he was not open to such persuasion. Thereupon the argumentative bobby required Mr. Mahon to go with him to the police office. The lecturer, after telling the immense crowd that he was virtually under arrest, went with some friends to the office. They found the superintendent in a very wrathful mood. Instead of coolly explaining to Mr. Mahon what offence he was committing, he expostulated with him on the sin of lecturing on politics on "the Lord's Day." He said nothing whatever about obstruction, or disorder, or anything but the horrible profanity of the "like of him" breaking the Sabbath. After listening to the lecture of the baton, and being told he was at liberty, Mr. Mahon returned to his former stand and continued his address. The crowd was swollen to a great size, but there was not the slightest disorder. Finding its lecture on Sabbatarian propriety disregarded, the baton marched in state to the Castlegate, arrested Mahon and broke up the crowd. At the office Mahon was charged in a vague way with a breach of "the law," and was required to appear at the police-court on Tuesday at eleven, a bail of 40s. being paid as the security of his appearance. The streets were full of people, and when Mahon reappeared a large crowd followed him calling for a speech. He found means of slipping away from the crowd, and soon quietness prevailed. It may be explained here that, though Sunday meetings on the Castle Gate were summarily suppressed about twenty years ago, all sorts of meetings have for years been permitted there.

On Monday evening Mahon held a meeting on Castlegate, at the same spot where he spoke on Sunday. There was a large and orderly audience, and the meeting was not stopped. After it, a meeting was held in the Northern Friendly Society's Hall, which was crowded in every part. Mr. Geo. Bisset, President of the Trades' Council, took the chair, and protested strongly against the action of the police. The following resolutions were proposed and passed enthusiastically: Proposed by Mr. Jas. Leatham, and seconded by Mr. P. Barron:—

"That the arrest of Mr. J. L. Mahon, organising secretary of the Scottish Land and Labour League, while engaged in stating the objects and principles of the League in an orderly manner in Castle Street last night, was invidious, unjust, and tyrannous; an unwarranted interference with the right of free speech and the privilege of public assemblage; an insult to Mr. Mahon, and a presumptuous condemnation of the Scottish Land and Labour League."

Proposed by the Rev. Alexander Webster, and seconded by Mr. H. H. Duncan:—

"That we, as citizens of Aberdeen, claim, and, if necessary will defend the right to hold public meetings in any suitable place in the city, on any day, to discuss any subject in an orderly way, provided no obstruction of traffic or any annoyance to the lieges is caused."

Mahon delivered an address on "The Aims of the Socialist Party," which was frequently applauded.

On Tuesday, at 11, the farce of the baton began. The court-room was crowded, and behind the bench the wings were occupied by clusters of bailiffs, councillors, and other representatives of the law. The trial of a Socialist was evidently a sensation. The charge was as follows:—

"John Lincoln Mahon, designating himself as organising secretary for the Scottish Land and Labour League, and presently residing in Watson Street of Aberdeen, at No. 51, has contravened the Police and Waterworks Act, 1862, the Aberdeen Police and Waterworks Amendment Act, 1867, and the Aberdeen Municipality Extension Act, 1871, or one or more of them, actor or art and part, in so far as on the 2nd day of October current, 1887, being Sunday, and between the hours of 7 and 9 o'clock on the evening of that day, the said John Lincoln Mahon did wilfully obstruct or incommode, hinder or prevent, the free passage of Castle Street, a public place within the Royal Burgh and City of Aberdeen, by placing a chair or platform thereon, and haranguing the passers-by therefrom, whereby a large crowd was collected, to the obstruction, annoyance, or danger of the residents and passengers, and this after he had been warned by an officer of police to refrain or desist from so doing, in contravention of the Act of 1862 above referred to, section 134, and of the Act of 1871 above referred to, section 147, whereby the said John Lincoln Mahon is liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s., or in the discretion of the Magistrate to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 14 days."

Mahon pleaded not guilty, and Superintendent Wyness went into the witness-box. Under the dexterous manipulation of Mr. Mahon he shuffled, turned somersaults, sunk into his boots, and performed all sorts of intellectual antics. There followed him several witnesses for the baton, but their evidence turned out to be more against than for it.

The witnesses for Mahon declared that there was no obstruction whatever, and after consultation the presiding magistrates announced that obstruction had not been proved. The baton was most ignominiously floored, and the Superintendent, by common consent, was written down "an ass." There can be no doubt that his rash and invidious act was intended as a crushing blow to Socialistic work here, but it has had the reverse effect. By the prompt and determined action at Monday's meeting the defence of free speech was laid upon the masses, and they took it up heartily—all the more so because it concerned the agitation for their interests so closely. A very large number have been deeply interested in Socialism, and a strong society is certain to be established.

Mahon's conduct throughout the ordeal is worthy of high praise. He kept his head and his place well—yielded no principle or privilege, but spoke not a rash or regrettable word.

On Tuesday evening he addressed a large meeting at the place of his arrest, and on Wednesday (the Autumn Fast-day) he spoke twice at Woodside (a populous suburb), and also on the Castlegate.

It is quite evident that the right of free speech will be maintained on behalf of Socialist speakers, for it is plain that Socialism, even by the help of the baton, has made a deep impression on the mental granite of Bon-accord.

BOREAS.

FREEDOM IN AMERICA.

WHERE is thy home, O Freedom? Have they set
Thine image up upon a rock to greet
All comers shaking from their wandering feet
The dust of the old world bondage, to forget
The tyrannies of fraud and force, nor fret,
Where men are equal, slavish chain unmeet;
Nor bitter bread of discontent to eat,
Here, where all races of the earth are met?

America! beneath thy banded flag
Of old it was thy boast that men were free,
To think, to speak, to meet, to come, to go.
What meaneth then the gibbet and the gag
Held up to Labour's sons who would not see Fair Freedom but a mask—a hollow show?

WALTER CRANE.

THE CONDEMNED ANARCHISTS.

On Friday 6th inst. the meeting announced for Cleveland Hall was held at the Communist Club, 49 Tottenham Street, as the advertised place of meeting was closed and in the hands of the police. Although there was little or no time to make the change known, there was a crowded meeting, which listened with much enthusiasm, and passed with applause the following resolution: "That this meeting enters its protest against the outrageous sentence passed upon the Chicago Anarchists for free speech, though ostensibly for conspiracy, based upon the unsupported and hatched-up testimony of the police; and strongly condemns the partial attitude of the Supreme Court of Illinois in refusing a new trial and the hearing of evidence which was admittedly suppressed by the prosecution. We furthermore declare our solidarity with our Chicago comrades who are condemned to death for their efforts for the emancipation of the proletariat." The speaking was thoroughly international, almost every speaker represented a different nationality. In English the speakers were Morris (chair), Bartlett, Sparling, and Allman, of the Socialist League, and Seymour and Withrington of the Anarchist; in German, Daubenspeck and Trunk; in French, Borde; in Italian, Droskia.

The Political Council of the North Camberwell Radical Club, 57 Gloucester Road, Camberwell, at a meeting held on Sept. 30, resolved: "That the members of this Council emphatically protest against the recent sentences passed on the Chicago Anarchists, being of opinion that, if carried into effect, judicial murder will be perpetrated."

Several other meetings have been held by League branches and other bodies at which similar resolutions have been passed.

Let it not be forgotten that the jury that condemned the Anarchists to death was a packed jury, selected from the capitalistic class, and that when it had done its murderous work a subscription was gotten up to pay each member his proportion of the blood-money he had earned. The Chicago Tribune said that at least the capitalists could afford to divide 100,000 dollars among the precious twelve.—N. Y. Leader.

THE LABOUR STRUGGLE.

BRITAIN.

The unfortunate nailmakers of the Midland districts are still holding out for the amelioration of their condition.

THE MINERS' STRIKE AT ROWLEY.—At a meeting of miners at Rowley (Mr. B. Winwood, miners' agent, presiding), a resolution was passed rejecting the masters' offer and pledging the men to remain out on strike until the old rates were paid. Another resolution was passed in favour of steps being taken to secure a general advance of the miners' wages.

THE CHAINMAKERS' STRIKE.—Following resolutions passed at a meeting held some time since, a society has been registered called the "Walsall Co-operative Cart-gear, Chain, and Hame Manufacturing Society, Limited." The capital is to be raised in £1 shares, sufficient of which have been taken up to enable the promoters to commence operations.

A settlement has been effected of the strike of joiners connected with the shipyard of Messrs. Armstrong, Mitchell & Co., at Elswick, and the men, who, to the number of 200, came out about five weeks ago, on the allegation that the carpenters got more than their share of work, returned to their places on Monday.

WEST CALDER SHALE-MINERS.—Although the strike here has been formally announced as settled, very few of the men have yet returned to their work. About forty may be reckoned as the average number, and the largest half of these are employed as oncost-men, or company's men, in putting the pits into repair, one of which (No. 11) had suffered severely during the twelve weeks' strike.

DISCHARGE OF CLERKS FOR CHEAPER LABOUR.—Last week 51 of the clerks employed at the head offices of the Royal Liver Friendly Society, Prescott Street, London, were discharged. The reason for this step is said to be a desire on the part of the committee of management to economise so as to meet the £5,000 expenditure incurred in the recent agitation. The clerks discharged include some of the oldest employés of the society, and many of them are married men with families. The places of the clerks discharged have been filled up by the employment of girls and boys.

THE PRESTON WEAVERS' DISPUTE.—At a meeting held last week at Manchester, the Executive Committee of the North and North-east Cotton Spinners and Manufacturers' Association had under consideration the weavers' dispute at Messrs. Owtram's mill, Preston. The wages question connected with the dispute was settled last week, but all the operatives on strike now claim to have their places back. This Messrs. Owtram decline to agree to. From a report issued by the weavers' union it appears that if the employers' terms are accepted, not more than one in five of the late employés will be allowed to start work.

THE SOUTH WALES COLLIERS.—Last week there was a meeting of workmen's representatives, at which it was resolved to call a general delegate meeting at Merthyr for both house and steam coal workmen of South Wales and Monmouthshire to consider the position of affairs. Among the points for discussion will be the necessity of forming a general federation for colliers and for workmen in connection with all collieries of South Wales, and the eight hours' movement. From sixty to seventy thousand men are affected, and upon the forthcoming proceedings undoubtedly a great deal will depend as to the welfare of all the Welsh districts.

MINERS' CONFERENCE AT EDINBURGH.—A four days' conference of representatives of the miners of England, Scotland, and Wales, was opened on Tuesday, in the Oddfellows Hall, Edinburgh. Mr. Thomas Burt presided, and thirty-nine delegates attended, representing 252,450 miners. The President, in his address, intimated that the subjects to be discussed at the conference would be the limitation of the output of coal, the advisability of all men being idle a certain portion of time each fortnight, the formation of a national federation, the eight hours' labour question, and the House of Lords' amendments to the Mines Bill.

STRIKE OF NORFOLK AGRICULTURAL LABOURERS.—In consequence of the reduction of labourer's wages to 10s., a meeting was held on the Green, St. Faith's, near Norwich, on Tuesday of last week, and a strike was decided on. The men came off on Saturday morning, not one staying on the farms. As a stoppage of work just now means the ruin of next year's grain crops, the farmers were forced to give in, and sent for the men on Saturday afternoon, asking them to resume work at their former wages. The men are now considering the advisability of a further strike for an advance of 2s. a week. A union has been started, and as soon as it is strong enough, the men will in all likelihood claim the advance.

DISPUTE IN THE BOOT TRADE.—The men on Mr. John Cooper's firm (late Sir William Pallasier), London, have been informed that the firm can no longer pay the London Statement, and the men are asked to work at a considerable reduction. Mr. Cooper met the London members of the Rivetters and Finishers' Union last Tuesday night at the Banner Street Hall. He advised the men to accept the reduction and so keep the work in London, or else he would shut up his factory. The meeting decided unanimously to keep to the London Statement. Now this man has got large factories at Croydon and Leicester, and a large mansion of his own, and boasts of rising from a working man. It was gratifying to see the Jewish workmen attend the meeting. The members of the Rivetters and Finishers' Union passed a vote of thanks to the members of the Jewish society for standing by them during the dispute.

COMPOSITORS' DISPUTE.—Mr. Railton, one of the partners of the firm of King, Sell & Railton, having decided that the employment of society hands interfered with his ideas of "freedom of contract," notified that in future he intended to employ only non-society men. Railton, late of Brighton, offered to keep on the old hands if they would leave the society. This was refused, and the men, about thirty, left work at the expiration of their notices. The premises are picketed, and being close to Fleet Street, numbers of the unemployed assemble and demonstrate when the "rats" appear. The services of six policemen have been requisitioned to "keep the peace." One day last week Railton was too venturesome, and got severely hustled in leaving the premises. At the present time there are about 700 society men partially or wholly unemployed, and the number of non-society applicants to fill the places of those on strike, exceeded 300. Railton the apostle of "freedom of contract," mentioned that he could get plenty of men at 8s. less per week; and he has got them. In the face of these facts, it is to be hoped the costly and ineffective tactics employed during the Waterlow strike will not be repeated.

THE BROXBURNE MINERS.—The shale miners are holding out very determinedly. The Company with great difficulty have got together 27 "black-nebs," several of whom, it is said, have never dug shale before. They are having a lively time, as hostile demonstrations take place daily. The Pall Mall Gazette of Tuesday, thus writes of the heartless evictions which took place on the preceding day: "The 'hard case' of the Broxburn miners entered upon the hardest stage of all, so far as forty-three of them are concerned, yesterday, when they, their families, and their 'household gods' were cast out of their homes on to the highway. The company is unquestionably within its strict legal rights; but it will be difficult for them or their friends to prove that they are playing a just and Christian part. Thanks to the competition of the capitalists in oil, the dividend of the company has suddenly run down from 22 to 15 per cent., and to save themselves from the stark, staring ruin of only 15 per cent., they are insisting that their miners shall suffer a reduction amounting as regards one class to 10 per cent., and as regards another class to 17 per cent. Perhaps the directors of the company—Messrs. R. Bell (chairman), J. Steel, J. Hurl, W. Weir, and W. Kennedy (managing director)—will kindly enlighten the world as to the substantial grounds for a step apparently so extraordinary and inhuman. Their conduct assuredly stands in need of explanation."

THE BOLTON STRIKE.—The only fresh development in connection with this strike has been the conclusion of negotiations by which Messrs. Threlfall's men should resume work, and the rupture of those negotiations. The firm were willing to restore 1s. out of the 2s. claimed, and to give a general promise to restore the other 1s. when the state of trade warrants it; and it was agreed that the men should accept these terms, subject to confirmation from London, and return to work. It afterwards transpired that the men required the firm to name a date when they would restore the second shilling, which the firm decline to do, and the men were not allowed to resume employment. The refusal of arbitration on the issue in dispute—viz., the restoration of the 2s. taken off last year—after a strike of nearly five months' duration, is a fact almost without precedent in the history of wars between capital and labour. At a meeting of workmen engaged in the iron trade, held in the Temperance Hall, Rochdale, on Wednesday evening, for the purpose of further considering the strike at Bolton, a member of the Rochdale Trades Council moved a resolution to the effect that continuance of the strike was justified, and that the men had acted honourably in refusing arbitration; and taking this into consideration, the ironworkers of Rochdale would give those on strike their pecuniary and other support. This resolution was carried unanimously.

The municipal elections at Bolton promise an interesting contest. There are Conservative, Liberal, Labour and Social-Democrat candidates. The Labour candidates are run as a protest against the employment of extra police by the employers, who possess the control of the Council.

MORE ECONOMY.—The workmen at Portsmouth Dockyard had their last Admiralty holiday last Saturday. As these holidays cost the country £2,500 each, they are to be discontinued. This action is mean enough, truly; but do the higher officials have their holidays stopped? Dockyard economy has affected one class of workers only: that which can the least afford it, the weekly wage-earners.

INCREASE OF PAUPERISM IN LANCASHIRE.—The President of the Poor Law Conference held in Manchester, stated that in Lancashire he had to regret a very considerable increase of pauperism within the past ten years. He also said that the large sums collected and distributed by trades unions accounted in a large measure for the diminution of pauperism in other parts of the country.

SOCIALISM IN THE UNITED STATES.—NEW YORK, Oct. 10.—Indignation meetings were held here yesterday by the Labour Party and the Socialists to denounce the conduct of the police in charging the crowd in Union Square on Saturday evening, when the Socialists and the followers of Mr. Henry George were batoned indiscriminately. Resolutions were adopted demanding the punishment of the offenders.—Reuter.

"OUR" HOME SECRETARY CONSIDERS.—A letter has been received by the secretary of the Bolton Ratepayers' Association from Mr. Matthews, the Home Secretary, in which he replies to the contentions laid before him by the deputation who recently saw him in London and complained of the action of the authorities in taking extra police into the town to guard the importations of "rats." The Home Secretary, "having given the fullest consideration," says he "sees no reason whatever" to complain of the action of the authorities, and "does not consider" any enquiry necessary.

LORD RIPON'S ADVICE TO WORKING MEN.—The Marquis of Ripon, speaking at a gathering of working men at Bradford on Saturday, said the working classes must look for immediate leaders and guides in their political conduct to the most intelligent and best educated in their own ranks, because it was only those who could thoroughly understand the problems which specially concerned working men. Personally, he hoped for a large increase in the number of labour representatives in Parliament. The working classes must be determined to uphold the right of free speech and discharge the great duties to which they had been called.

MR. CHANNING, M.P., ON COMBINATION.—Mr. Channing, M.P., writing to the Kettering Bootmakers' Union, says nothing has contributed so much to the elevation of the working classes as trades-unionism. Combination means not only strength, but wisdom and success. Thorough and rational combination will not aggravate the inevitable struggle between capital and labour, but will be a sure road to the peaceful and harmonious readjustment of all forces and interests involved in the production and distribution of wealth, which would be the best guarantee of the prosperity and happiness of the whole community. Combination is the key of society.

DEMONSTRATION BY UNEMPLOYED MEN AND BOYS.—A number of men and boys assembled again on Tuesday in the West-end and organised a parade with the object of demonstrating their claim that "Something must be done" for them. Leaving Trafalgar Square, they passed westward in procession, whistling the "Marseillaise," and hissing at several of the clubs. In St. James's Street, where a portion of the road is up for repairs, a body of police guarded the heaps of stones that lay in the roadway. Throughout the route a detachment of mounted police followed the crowd. The procession eventually returned by St. Martin's Lane to Trafalgar Square, where a large crowd was assembled. Speeches were then made by some of the men, revealing a terrible state of misery and destitution, and at the close of the proceedings it was announced that another parade would take place to-day (Wednesday).

CONTINENTAL NOTES.

FRANCE.

At Cholet, in the Maine-et-Loire department, ten thousand weavers are on strike. Two thousand workers were occupied in the town itself, and earned daily wages of thirteen pence for twelve hours' work; the number of "hands" in the same industry, in a radius of ten or twelve miles around the town, is ten or twelve thousand; these poor slaves, for the same number of hours, got nine pence a day! The weavers ask only for one hour reduction per day, and 20 per cent. augmentation of their starvation wages. We are glad to say that a good deal of the bourgeoisie of Cholet are very sympathetic to the strikers.

The out-of-town weavers have already gained their victory. The "masters" have surrendered to the conditions of their "slaves." These, with an admirable sense of solidarity, have decided not to resume work until their comrades of Cholet have won the battle.

The municipal council of Paris has granted a sum of ten thousand francs, to be sent to Cholet for the relief of the strikers. But the government has refused to sanction the vote of the Paris councillors. The municipal council of Cholet, in its turn, has granted a sum of three thousand francs, but on the condition that this sum should only be distributed to the strikers if they resumed work. The weavers, however, have indignantly refused to accept any relief whatever on such terms.

GERMANY.

Johann Christoph Neve, one of the most devoted and intelligent members of the Anarchist movement in Europe, has been tried, within closed doors, by the so-called Imperial Court of Justice at Leipsic, and sentenced by that body of malignant judges to fifteen years' hard labour. Our readers are aware that our courageous comrade was denounced at Liege, in Belgium, by a pair of scoundrels who brought about his extradition to Germany, where he was "wanted" for several years by the Prussian police bloodhounds. All those who have known him personally can bear witness to his noble-minded spirit, his indomitable trustiness, his fondness for the ideas he had embraced as being just and righteous and true. His devotion to the cause of the Social Revolution was really inexhaustible: from his earliest youth down to the day on which treason and wickedness gave him up to his mortal foes, he assiduously worked and toiled, regardless of personal pains and sorrows, for the promotion of Socialism: In America, in France, in Switzerland, in Austria, in Belgium and Germany—everywhere, in fact, where he lived, he was the right man in the right place and at once gained the sympathies of the masses. The proletariat, for whom he has so long struggled and for whom he is now undergoing such a dreadful term of imprisonment, will never forget him, for he always has been one of its best and most faithful friends.

In the latter part of this month of October, we shall have the trial for secret conspiracy of 38 Socialists, now under arrest at Breslau, and 67 witnesses will support the evidence for the prosecution.

Next week, sixteen Socialists will stand their trial at Posen. The principal accused is comrade Kurowski, a compositor.

There are apparently no more Socialist papers to suppress in Germany, for the police now commences to prohibit the merely democratic journals; the Hamburg Burger-Zeitung was killed last week by an ukase of Bismark. And as this deed was not sufficient, he also expelled its editor, Johann Wedde, from Hamburg.

The Elmshorner-Zeitung, another democratic but not Socialist paper, of Elmshorn, in Silesia, has also been suppressed. After the suppression of the Progressivist papers, Bismark will apparently lay hands on the Liberal press, so as to have at last the "whole" public opinion on his side. In the next session of the Reichstag, he is also going to add some new paragraphs to the Anti-Socialist Laws, which, in his opinion have not been made "brutal" enough!

BELGIUM.

On the 20th inst., the young Anarchist Jahn, arrested in March at La Louviere, will be tried on account of his "inflammatory speeches" by the Court of Assizes of Mons,—and condemned of course.

Last week, the Court of Assizes at Brussels condemned to two years' imprisonment the Anarchist Moreau, who had delivered two or three "incendiary" speeches. But our comrade, who knows that freedom of speech is gone from "happy little Belgium," went away before the sentence was pronounced and reached Holland in due time.

The 2nd of this month, a new daily paper has appeared in Antwerp, De Socialist (The Socialist), organ of the Antwerp Federation of the various workmen's associations. The paper costs 2 centimes, viz., less than one farthing, per copy. This is the third daily Socialist paper which is issued in Belgium, the others being Vooruit (A-head) of Ghent, and Le Peuple (The People) of Brussels.

SPAIN.

SEVILLE.—A strike among the sombrero-makers is going on here, the strikers hold out firmly, and hope to obtain victory—such as it is.

CASTELVEIL Y VILLAR.—We hear that the situation of the workers in this industrial centre grows worse and worse, and that the outlook for the winter is gloomy indeed. By way of preparing for an inevitable crisis, the manufacturers mostly have lowered their wage-tariff considerably. At one spinning factory, where formerly the hands could make from 30 to 34 pesetas, they now only make from 20 to 22. And so forth—the tale is endless.

MADRID.—There has been considerable excitement among the cigar-makers in Madrid; the women employed in one of the factories numbering several thousand, took possession of the place, barricading doors and windows. After a good while they desisted from their "demonstration" and left. An intended reduction of wages is said to have been the origin of the proceedings.

ITALY.

PAVIA.—At the Conference of the Italian Labour Party, held at Pavia on the 18th and 19th September, it was announced when the reading of the year's report of the central committee was due, that it could not take place owing to the confiscation of the committee's books and registers by the Court of Assizes during the late trials in Milan. It was agreed that Alessandria should be the seat of the central committee for the year, though Venice had been proposed, seeing that the Venetian provinces are the most oppressed and worst off, and that propaganda there is of much importance. Parliamentarianism in the party was discussed at some length, and it was finally resolved that liberty of action thereon be allowed to all sections of the party. A vote of sympathy with the masons on strike in Milan (reported to number about 2,000) was passed, and a collection made in aid of the same.

MILAN.—The masons at Milan have been on strike for about a month, the strike being pretty well general now. They declare that the 3 lire a-day, which is the highest pay for the most experienced mason, is insufficient to maintain their families, and demand an increase of the lira. Says the Gazzetta Operaia, "deducting wet days, frosts, and feast-days, the masons only manage to get 200 working-days in the year, thus making 600 lire (about £24) a-year." Some of the masters and contractors, thus shorn of their hands, went to the country to collect new ones, assuring them that the strike was finished. These on arriving in Milan became aware of the deception, and irritated at the constant supervision of soldiers and carabinieri, left the work and returned whence they came. The contractors will by no means treat, and have issued a manifesto to the men which is a wail of alarmed self-interest piteous to peruse. The strikers are encamped under the sky awaiting what may come.
