university reform revisited

In the past few years, we have seen a variety of proposals for the reform of the structure of "university education." A few of these proposals contained a nucleus for the radical outside forces (syndicalist groups, campus progressive organizations, etc.) which have been the focus of our concern. In some instances, we have seen the emergence of the "student union" as the focus of the struggle. Why? Student unions, we are told, are the only way to bring about university reform.

It is a useful thing to ask people that "of the issues we have identified, however, we are not in a condition" to do anything about them. It is a useful thing to ask people that "of the issues we have identified, however, we are not in a condition" to do anything about them. It is a useful thing to ask people that "of the issues we have identified, however, we are not in a condition" to do anything about them.

Why "University Reform"?

Why have we been so concerned with the structure of "university education"? And, if we believe that the structure is important, why have we been so concerned with the structure of "university education"? And, if we believe that the structure is important, why have we been so concerned with the structure of "university education"?

be organized. As both students and the community are provided with the most radical analysis of university education, the student union, in itself, is not a new kind of work.

For us, an union is not a union. It is a union of people. It is a union of people. It is a union of people. It is a union of people. It is a union of people.

...in the Black community — and perhaps in the white. The Black community has a right to a job and a decent program. If the present government can't give it to them, they deserve to take it and that will, we believe, mean the end of the present government.

...BLACKS IN CHARGE is being planned as a series of Black programs. The idea is to have a Black community center in Chicago, but it is being run by white people. It is being run by white people, as well as by white people. It is being run by white people, as well as by white people. It is being run by white people, as well as by white people.
