Bandit Bargain

or "A Place in the Sun"

by HARRY SINCLAIR DRAGO

(author of "Shadow Mountain")

Brand New Book - Length Novel
Complete in This Issue
UNDER A cloudless sky, Boulder City drowsed in the noon-day sun of this July day. In front of Clem Early's saddlery, flea-bitten dog lay sleeping on the sidewalk, its legs twitching fitfully in some canine dream. Out on the sage-brush plain to the south of town, a giant buzzard wheeled nigh.

The three horsemen, concealed in the willow brake that followed Squaw Creek almost to the town limits, were not interested in buzzards or sleeping dogs. They did have some interest in the Wyoming and Western's branchline accommodation train that had just puffed into the depot from Keeley and half-a-dozen cow-towns to the north. Its arrival always caused a little flurry of activity, no matter how few passengers aligned. It was due at 11.56, and was only four minutes late today.

“That takes care of that,” said the youngest of the three men. “It might have gummed things up for us if she'd been thirty, forty minutes late.

The other two nodded. Their faces were hard-bitten, and there was an air of efficiency about them, which was not strange; they were old hands at this business. And yet it was the young man who was the leader. He had brains; a priceless commodity outside the law as well as in.

He called himself Rocky Williams, which was not his true name but served well enough for the circumstances in which he found himself. His attire was shabby, scuffed boots, frayed Stetson and faded overalls. He might easily have been mistaken for a cowboy, a calling with which had but slight acquaintance. But the more a man resembled a cowboy, the less attention he attracted in this part of Wyoming, which was good and sufficient reason for Williams' dress and that of his companions.

The bank president fired a shot gun in the air.

Something was peculiar, Rocky Williams and his pards decided when the haul from the Boulder City Bank came to around seven thousand dollars. Then, when the papers reported Charles Oatman's estimate of the losses at many times that figure, Rocky had the answer figured. And the sudden break with his outlaw friends, due to their violent death in an attempted hold-up, had left him at the crossroads. Now he could quit the out-trails, And Rocky had more than just a hunch that Charles Oatman would be willing to stake him...
His battered garb could not conceal the grace of the man nor a suggestion of tigerish strength that was to be found even in the lifting of an arm. There was a mark of good horsemanship in the way he sat in the saddle, easy and relaxed.

These were trivial things and in no way responsible for the allegiance he had won from Haze Bender and Pat Heeney, the two who waited with him in the willow brake on the outskirts of Boulder City this noon. In the past year, he had shown them an intelligence and nerveless audacity that they admired; but there was something more, something so vague and obscure that they could not comprehend it that drew them to him. It was the force of the man, lurking behind a wall of detachment that was calculated to impress women as well as men.

"Hadn't we oughta be stirrin', Rocky?" Haze inquired.

Rocky glanced at his watch. "We'll wait up a bit yet," said he. "We can be there in five minutes. I timed it last night."

He kept his watch in his hand and focused his attention again on the main street of Boulder City. If he missed being on the handsome side, it was only because his level, gray eyes were too intense and demanding for comfort. But he had a crooked, engaging smile to go with them that dulled some of their sting. That hardness about the mouth which is supposed to identify men who lead reckless lives had not yet touched his. Of course, he was young for it; twenty-seven, at most.

PAT HEENEY, a thin little man with the innocent face of a child, stood up in his stirrups. "Not a soul on the street," he observed, with satisfaction. "Been that way every noon since we bin lookin' this thing over."

Rocky and Haze nodded. It was remarkable how much they had learned about Boulder City in a few days. For instance, they knew that, due to the overlapping lunch hours, Charles Oatman, president of the First National and the owner of the Oatman Building and other enterprises, was alone in the bank between twelve-thirty and twelve-forty-five. Also, that the sheriff, Ty Roberts, was home having his noon-day dinner; that Pop Singer, the town marshal, was around at the jail, which the town shared with the county, taking over there until the sheriff returned.

These were vitally important bits of information, and they had many others to go with them. They had talked everything over, made their plans accordingly. It left little to be said now.

Rocky glanced at his watch and put it away. "Let's go, and take it easy. If we have any luck, we can go in this side road and reach the bank corner without running into a soul. No shooting if it can be avoided, you understand?"

"'Shorel!" Haze responded. He was big and rough and tough. "Yo're right; nobody gits excited about havin' a bank hoisted unless yuh leave a couple innocent dead men behind yuh."

"The only shootin' we'll have to do is blastin' the air to discourage any gents who may be inclined to take up the chase when we're fannin' it out of town. We won't be in there more'n ten minutes."

The side road ran past several warehouses; they were deserted at this hour. The three men jogged by them, riding closely bunched. A blacksmith shop stood between them and the hitchrack at the side of the bank. Ad Hoskins, the smith, was home, too.

"Okay," Rocky muttered, as he and Haze swung down at the rack. Pat was to stay with the horses.

A few steps took them to the corner. The bank entrance was only ten feet away. A man drove past as they were about to step in. He noticed that they were armed, but went on, unsuspicious of what was happening.

The fault was not altogether his. Boulder City liked to think it had grown up. It had started out as a cowtown. It had other interests now. The railroad had long since made it a division point, and with the building of the branch line to Keeley, Boulder City had really come into its own. It had the new four-story Oatman Building, two blocks of paved street, a Chamber of Commerce and even a club for the elite at Cottonwood Lake, two miles west of town. But for all of its airs, men still wore weapons on their hip, when so moved, and you could eat in your shirt sleeves at the Boulder Inn.

Once Rocky and Haze had the street at their back, they raised neckerchiefs to their eyes, and when they pushed through the screen doors, their faces were safely masked.

They had had to run the risk of finding a customer or two in the bank. But luck was still riding with them; Oatman was there alone, studying some hastily scribbled figures, and so engrossed that he didn’t look up as they entered. His preoccupation was not something born of the minute; it had been growing on him for over a month, and though no one in town had as yet any reason to suspect it, Charlie Oatman, Boulder City’s leading citizen, was a desperate man, tottering on the brink of the abyss he had dug for himself with his speculations and misuse of the bank’s funds.

He had managed to cover up for weeks, staving off disaster from day to day, but getting ever deeper into the mire, with exposure certain and not to be long delayed now.

He had not meant to loot the First National; he was proud of the bank and had built it up from nothing until it was the throbbing heart of the community. More than any other man, he was responsible for the solid prosperity of Boulder City. He liked to think of it as his town, and his pride in it ran second only to his pride in the bank. He was unfortunate; that was all. Of late, everything had gone wrong for him. At first, it had been easy to manipulate certain accounts. He had a board of directors—active and retired stockmen—but its members thought so highly of him that they accepted any figures he presented without question.

Having engaged in a genteel form of banditry, euphoniously called embezzlement, against the bank, nothing could have been further from his mind than that other men—masked, armed men, in particular—could have any designs against the First Nation-al. If his mouth popped open and his knees buckled, when he looked up and found the business end of Rocky’s gun levelled at him, it was surprise, more than fear, that agitated him.

“Turn around and walk to the back of the cage and get your hands up,” Rocky told him. “This won’t be messy unless you want it that way.”

Oatman, his face bloodless, stood there for a moment unable to escape from his trance. His office was located at the front and separated from the rest of the floor by a wooden railing and swinging gate. Fascinated, he saw one of the two bandits—it was Haze Bender—hurry across the private office and reach the passageway at the rear of the cashier’s cage which led to the vault.

Suddenly Charlie Oatman’s brain began to function again. There was a sawed-off shotgun reposing on a shelf a few inches from his hand, kept there against just such an emergency as this. Also, the bank had installed a burglar alarm within the past year. The foot button that controlled it was within reach. He made no move toward either, for in one sharp flash, he realized that these bandits were anything but a calamity; they meant escape for him from all his worries—salvation, complete and miraculous and beyond anything his scheming could have contrived.

He wanted to embrace them, help them to scoop up whatever they found in the vault and cage. His hands went up and he flattened himself in the corner, silently beseeching them to hurry.

It didn’t take them long. While Rocky kept Oatman covered, Haze entered the cage and swept paper currency and gold coin into a canvas bag. Darting into the vault he busied himself there in similar manner for several minutes. When he came out, they were ready to leave.

There was a small yard at the rear of the bank, surrounded by a high board fence. A locked door in the fence gave upon an alley. Knowing what they would find in back, the bandits ran that way. The lock was quickly shattered. It was out of the alley to the horses, then, and it was accomplished in a matter of seconds.
Little Pat was waiting for them, neckerchief pulled up to his eyes. He looked the question he did not ask. Rocky nodded; it was answer enough. The way before them was open, and they fled swiftly and quietly, having no reason to fire a fusillade to discourage pursuit.
Oatman heard them gallop off. A fit of trembling seized him, now that they were gone, and he had to reach for the sawed-off shotgun twice before he had it in his hands. He ran through the bank and out into Bridger Street, the main thoroughfare of Boulder City. Down the side road, he could see the three bandits disappearing in a cloud of dust. That they could be overtaken now seemed altogether unlikely; this being so, Oatman felt it was safe to sound the alarm. He raised the shotgun and fired both barrels.
“Stop them!” he yelled. “The bank’s been held up! Stop ‘em! Help!”
It was surprising how quickly Boulder City awakened from its dozing. Men came running from every direction and started hurling questions at him. Oatman’s excitement was such by now that his answers were almost incoherent, and purposely so. It was acting of a rather high order. Every time he spoke he pointed to the rapidly disappearing dustcloud, now moving to the north on the Slate Hills road.
The Slate Hills had the Dry Creek Mountains behind them, and then other ranges and eventually Idaho and escape on the broad plains of the Snake River.

T
HE EXCITED group gathered around the president of the First National grew and grew. Men put two and two together and were able to gather that the bank had just been held up and that the bandits were headed for the north.
“Something’s got to be done to stop them!” Oatman cried. “Where’s Ty Roberts? Does a man have to go looking for the sheriff at a time like this? Where is he?”
“I’m right here,” a solid man, with a flowing white mustache and hooded brows answered, as he pushed through the crowd. “Take it easy, Charlie, and let’s git the facts.”
This was the first daylight bank robbery that old Ty had had to contend with in over twenty years. He found no reason to get excited on that account. It was his proudest boast that he had brought the law to Boulder City in the long ago. He was no longer young, but he had served the county well and faithfully and his flinty courage and acumen were not open to question. Under his prodding Oatman’s talk began to make sense.
“You were alone in the bank, I reckon,” said Ty.
“Yes, curse the luck! There wasn’t a thing I could do; two of them had me covered before I knew what was happening. A third man stayed outside with the horses...You’ve got to do something in a hurry, Ty. You can use the telegraph and warn the authorities in Keeley to be out to grab them.”
The sheriff shook his head. “The telegraph won’t help none. Those boys will be swingin’ off to the west long before they git near Keeley...You got any idea how much they got away with?”
“No. They took everything in sight except the silver; thirty thousand—maybe more.”
Ty asked him to describe the men. “I don’t know what they look like,” was the exasperated answer. “They were masked. What difference does it make how they look? Capture them, get the money back; that’s the important thing! Too bad, with a sheriff and a town marshal on the job, that a thing like this could occur right here in broad daylight!”
Ty felt this was unfair, but he brushed it aside and picked half-a-dozen men out of the crowd. “We’ll git down to the railroad yard and commandeer an engine to run us to the Spanish Ranch. We can git horses there. If we git a move on us, we’ll be in time to cut those boys off before they lose themselves in the mountains.”
The wisdom of this was readily apparent; the Keeley branch of the Wyoming and Western paralleled the Slate Hills road all the way to the Spanish Ranch, and never at a distance of more than a mile.

"Git yore rifles and meet me at the depot," Ty told his men. "And you want to step on it!"

The old three-wheeler that had just brought in the Keeley local was on the turntable, being swung around for the return journey north that afternoon. She had steam up, and the engine crew was still in the cab.

"Sure, Ty!" the agent assured Roberts. "We'll do anything we can to help. Come on!"

They hurried out, and Ed Gallagher, the engineer, was told what was wanted.

Ty fumed as he waited for his men. "Start tootin' the whistle, Ed," he rapped impatiently. "Mebbe it'll hurry 'em up. What's eatin' Pete and the rest of 'em?"

The possemen began arriving, but ten minutes and more passed before the last of them had climbed aboard the tender. Roberts got up in the cab with the crew.

"Git this old boiler perkin'," he told Ed. "We've lost a lot of time. Be lucky if we don't git there too late."

With her whistle blasting, Number 12 rolled out of town and began to gather speed. By the time Boulder City dropped behind, Gallagher had the throttle wide open and the light engine began to bob and sway over the uncertain roadbed.

It was less than five miles to the Spanish Ranch, a show place and the home of Hamilcar and other famous thoroughbreds. The ranch buildings were visible in the distance before the sheriff caught his first glimpse of the three horsemen toiling over the road, their horses held at a driving gallop.

The speeding engine drew abreast of them rapidly. The men on the tender raised their rifles and let go with a scattering blast. It was noisy and it relieved the tension of the possemen; otherwise, at a distance of a mile, all it accomplished was to warn the fleeing bandits that pursuit was close and from an unexpected direction.

"You're goin' to be too late!" Gallagher shouted to Ty.

"I dunno!" the latter growled. "It's goin' to be close! If we had ranch telephones in this country, like they got around Cheyenne and Laramie, I coulda called Mrs. Warren and had hosses saddled and waitin' for me. I reckon we'll git some of them improvements after I'm dead and gone."

He ordered the fireman to pull the whistle cord and hold it down. "It'll save some time if we let 'em know at the ranch there's somethin' wrong."

They drew ahead of the bandits, only to lose speed a few moments later, as Gallagher slapped on the air. He brought the engine to a grinding stop a few yards short of the crossroad that led out to the highway, still a mile away.

Ty and his men leaped to the ground and dashed across a field of alfalfa to the ranch yard. Rita Warren, the owner of the Spanish Ranch since the death of her husband, and most of her help, sensing that something was amiss, ran up to meet them. In clipped sentences, Ty told her what had happened and what he wanted.

With her usual efficiency Mrs. Warren did her best to outfit them quickly; but there were only three horses in the corral. Others had to be brought up from the pasture.

Ty, keeping an eye on the intersection of the crossroad and the main thoroughfare to the north, saw the three men, bobbing specks at that distance, sweep past.

Helpless to do anything about it, he ground out an oath as he stood there and saw them go. Several minutes passed before he was able to take up the chase. With characteristic determination, he flashed out of the yard at the head of the posse, determined to overhaul the quarry.

They were in the hills in a few minutes after reaching the highway, and drove on without catching sight of the bandits. The road began to pitch higher and higher. To get over the crest of the Slate Hills, it doubled back in several places. On the third of these switchbacks, rifles crashed without warning and the slugs kicked up the dust on front of the posse. The firing came from above and was unanswerable.

Ty got his men through it unscathed, but they had suddenly begun to remind themselves that it wasn’t their bank that had been robbed. It had a noticeably discouraging effect on their enthusiasm for the business in hand.

Being an experienced man, Ty Roberts sensed it. He tried to drive them on.

“No need to be reckless about this, Ty,” Pete Van Buskirk complained. “Stop one of them slugs and a man could be a long time gittin’ over it.”

By the middle of the afternoon Ty called a halt; he was convinced that further pursuit was useless.

High in the Dry Creek Mountains by now, Rocky and his companions eased up, confident that they had nothing to fear immediately. They had reached Boulder City by the same route they were travelling now and had had the foresight to leave three horses at a small hay ranch well down the western slope of the range. They found the animals waiting for them. With fresh brones under them, they rode the rest of that afternoon and well into the night. When morning came, they were across the line, in Idaho, with no telegraph wires to carry evil tidings ahead of them.

Haze Bender still carried the canvas sack that contained the proceeds of the foray at Boulder City. They had food, and they were ravenously hungry, but before breaking their fast, they had a look at the contents of the sack.

Haze counted it out.

“Hell!” he growled, his disappointment immediately reflected on the faces of his companions. “It scarce totes up to seven thousand!”

“Seven thousand?” Rocky’s tone was icy and incredible.

Little Pat swore softly. “Why, that ain’t nuthin’ for a bank as solid as that! The two of yuh musta missed sunthin’!”

“Yeh,” Rocky agreed, “we sure must have!”

ROCKY and his two companions were keenly aware of the fact that the law had a long arm and could reach into Idaho for them. Since three men were known to have robbed the Boulder City bank, it became the first order of business with them to separate as soon as practicable, each going his own way until they rendezvoused in Denver.

They had the Oregon Short Line Railroad less than a hundred miles ahead of them. Each reached it on his own in the next several days. Rocky went north to Butte and arrived in Denver by that round-about route; Haze Bender boarded a train at Idaho Falls, went only as far as Pocatello and there took the Union Pacific and travelled boldly across the width of Wyoming; little Pat Heeney went into Ogden and caught a Rio Grande train through Colorado. Long before the horses they had abandoned wandered into an Idaho ranch on the South Fork of the Snake, the three wanted men were taking things easy in Denver, but not living together, since Rocky still held that to be dangerous. They remained in daily contact.

A third-class hovel, on lower Sixteenth Street and within a block of the Union Depot, became Rocky’s headquarters. He had long since shed the range garb he had worn at Boulder City. He was a conservative dresser, and whenever he went up town in the evening to dine alone at the Albany or Brown Palace, he had the look of a cultured and seemingly prosperous man of the world.

He had no cronies in Denver and wanted none. While Haze and Pat were tossing their money away and enjoying themselves, he began casting around in his mind for the next venture. The lean pickings at Boulder City had been a bitter disappointment to him, considering the risk involved.

With stockmen and mining men having business in Denver the year around, there was a demand for out-of-town newspapers. A stand near the Albany displayed journals from all over the Rocky Mountain States. Rocky became one of its best customers. Armed with half-a-dozen newspapers, he would return to his room and spend the greater part of the day pouring over them, hoping, as he put it, "to spot something that looked good."

It was in this way that a copy of the Boulder City Mercury came into his hands. He started to read it carefully, expecting to find some reference to the recent robbery. But the robbery was old news by now, and all he found was a brief statement to the effect that the auditors for the bonding company that had insured the First National against loss by theft had just completed their work and it could be stated officially now that the bandits had got away with $34,109.00.

It pulled Rocky to the edge of his chair, and he read and reread the startling figures. There was no mistake about it; there they were in bold type—$34,109.00. And as the Mercury said, they were official.

"Thirty-four thousand!" He couldn't get over it. "I'll say we missed something!"

METHODICALLY he went over every moment of the few tense minutes Haze and he had spent in the First National. He could see the layout with photographic clearness; recalled every move Oatman had made; dwelt at length over the fact that the man had offered no opposition, not by word nor even by facial expression.

Little things stuck in his mind, and he put them together painstakingly. When Haze and little Pat dropped in that evening, he was prepared to give them what he was convinced was the only logical answer to the riddle.

"There must be a mistake somewhere, Rocky," Haze protested. "We couldn't have missed that much."

"We didn't miss anything," was the flat answer. "The dough wasn't there for us to miss. There was something screwy with that bank. That guy was the president of it; we did him a favor in knocking it off."

He saw doubt in the eyes of the two men and it tended to infuriate him. "Why don't you use your brains?" he rapped. "Somebody had helped himself to all that jack before we showed up. It wasn't the janitor or some twenty-five-dollar a week teller. His name was Oatman, and you can bet your life on it; you didn't see him even start to make a move, did you?"

"But you had him covered," Haze argued. "He'd have been a sucker to go for the gong or the shotgun I saw on the shelf."

"Yeh!" Rocky burst out hotly. "And maybe you can tell me why he waited so long to sound the alarm after we pulled away. We were damned near out of town before we heard that shotgun go off... The two of you can think what you please about it, but I ain't forgetting it. Maybe I'll do something about it some day."

"That's water over the dam," said Pat. "Why worry yourself? Besides, we got other fish to fry. And the sooner the better, Rocky."

He gave them a long glance and said, "What do you mean?"

"Haze and me are broke," Rocky's laugh was disinterested. "So soon?" he inquired. "I told you to take it easy... What was it this time, dice?"

"Yeh," Pat admitted ruefully. "It went faster 'n usual. But we got sunthin' lined up. Not big, but she's okay."

It concerned a sugar beet refinery, a few miles out of Denver, and a payroll. Rocky shook his head. "Not for me. It's too close to our home base, for one thing; and that stake ain't big enough for the gamble we'd have to take. If the two of you need money, I'll stand for a touch."

"We don't want to make a touch," Haze told him. "This job will take care of that. Mebbe it won't amount to more than thirty-five hundred, but it's a natural. We can knock it off and be back before the wolves start yelpin'. We had a guy in town last night who works out there in the office. We poured some likker into him and got him to talkin'. We went out today and looked things over. The way it works is like this, Rocky: the cashier gits the money at the bank in Denver Saturday mornin' and takes the ten o'clock Burlington local out to this little station near the mill. He gits in his rig and has about two miles to drive. It's jest open prairie; no house, no nothin'. The road crosses a little crick. That's the place to give him the business."

"We can tie him up and toss him back in his rig and lead the hoss off in the brush where it won't be found till they start lookin' for him," Haze continued. "It's jest a short hike back to the railroad. We can grab a freight and be back in town in no time. That's all there'll be to it."

Rocky said no. He was adamant. "That's not my dish. But don't let me stop you; if you like it so much, go it alone."

"Wal, we will!" Pat snapped, angered by his refusal. "Tomorrow's Saturday. We ain't waitin' till next week."

"Okay," Rocky told them. "Just stay away from me for a few days. I don't want these Denver dicks picking me up for questioning."

He regretted their passing, but without feeling any great sense of personal loss; chance had thrown them together, and because it suited their purpose, they had gone into partnership. Now—just as casually—chance had intervened again, severing all threads.

Rocky knew that if the police had discovered anything connecting him with the slain men, he could best avoid detection by sitting tight. For several days, he wandered about the statehouse grounds, watching the house in which he had his room as he pretended to be engrossed in a newspaper or book. There was a small restaurant around the corner. He took his meals there. Behind his affable smile, he regarded all men with a deep suspicion.

But no one came to question his landlady. When a week had passed, he began to breathe easier.

"I'm okay," he told himself. "If they had anything on me, they'd have been here by now."

THE TENSION that had so sorely tried his detachment began to fade. He went back to his reading, only to find that it no longer interested him. A new kind of uneasiness had come to him. He couldn't understand it; peace of mind had always been his. Finally he realized that it was his own indecision that was troubling him. He stood at the crossroads now; he could go on as he had been doing for the past year or set his sights in another direction. He had little to fear from the past; fate having obligingly removed the only two men who could bear witness against him. Somewhere, and without too much searching, he could find new accomplices who would serve him as well as Haze and Pat had, if that was the way he wanted to go.

He made his decision, and it was not dictated by any twinge of regret for the past or the moral values involved. "I'm through with it," he told himself. "I've been pressing my luck a long time."

Rocky wasn't thinking of turning over a new leaf; what he proposed to do was find some less dangerous means of turning an easy dollar. “I’ve got a comfortable stake,” he thought. “I don’t have to be in a hurry; something will shape up.”

He continued to buy the Boulder City Mercury. It was a slovenly little sheet, sprinkled with typographical errors and a misplaced head or two. The latter carelessness sometimes proved to be amusing. As for instance, when what Rocky was led to believe to be an item of mining news, headlined “Old Reliable Desert Queen In Production Again,” proceeded to inform the startled reader that Mrs. Sam Orlando, of Pumpernickle Valley, had just presented her husband with still another set of twins. On the back page, he found the missing story of the Desert Queen hiding under a caption that said “Rich Dividend For Ranch Couple.”

Rocky enjoyed every line of it. Though the Mercury was always a week old when it came into his hands, he perused it with far greater interest than the latest Denver newspaper held for him. It was indicative of what was on his mind; he was wedded to the idea of returning to Boulder City. Subconsciously, his plans had been taking shape for days.

He was moving freely about Denver once more, apparently just killing time. Actually, his mind had never been busier. It was his way to explore his plans negatively, experience having taught him that if they had a weakness, that was the way to find it. But no reason, compelling enough to dissuade him, came of all his cogitation.

From reading the Mercury, he was becoming intimately acquainted with Boulder City. He knew that the Bon Ton Department Store was having a summer furniture sale, everything marked down twenty-five per cent; that the new lights were being installed on Markey Street; that Dr. Amos Galloway, the chiropractor, would be in town at the Boulder Inn for three days, beginning on the 19th and would be pleased to see old patients and new; that Frank Grimwood, the attorney, (and evidently something of a geologist and amateur wildcatter) had discovered some interesting fossils on the Blue Rock desert and was more convinced than ever that oil would be found when a test well was put down.

Rocky often saw Charlie Oatman’s name in the Mercury. In fact, that was the first thing he looked for. One day he read that Mr. and Mrs. Charles Oatman had left for the West Coast to join their daughter Antoinette at Monterey, for a brief vacation.

It was Rocky’s opinion that Oatman needed a vacation.

THERE WAS word about the Spanish Ranch. He knew it by sight, if not by name. Mrs. Warren had just shipped a string of horses down to the Emeryville track, outside of San Francisco, for the late summer meeting.

Rocky had once been a rabid racing fan and was familiar with most Western tracks. He knew the Warren silks, maize and green, and had seen Hamilton run at El Paso and Tia Juana. Otherwise, Rita Warren was just a name to him. According to the Mercury, she was confident that one of the horses she was shipping to California, Hannibal, by name and the son of Hamilton, would do better as a three-year old than his famous sire.

“I wonder if this could be the ticket off for me,” Rocky mused lightly. When he went out for dinner, he bought a racing sheet. Looking over the entries for the following day at Emeryville, he found Hannibal was entered in the third race, at an attractive price.

In those days it was easy to place a bet on a horse in Denver. He put ten dollars on Hannibal to win. Two dollars would have done as well as ten or a thousand, for what Rocky wanted from the race was an omen, not money.

Due to the difference in time, it was after five o’clock the following afternoon before the results were available in Denver. Hannibal had won easily.

“That does it!” Rocky assured himself. “That’s the old hunch I’ve been waiting for. I’ll have a tailor make me a couple new suits. When they’re ready, I'm buying a ticket for Boulder City."

HERE was one thing Boulder City liked about Tony Oatman; she had had, as they put it, "all the advantages" but she had never felt herself too good for Boulder City and Wyoming. Other girls, daughters of wealthy stockmen mostly, had gone off to distant universities and the outside world to return with their pretty noses held disdainfully high.

Rocky noticed her the moment she walked into the dining room at the Boulder Inn. He had been in town three days, waiting, "Class," he told himself, not surmising who she was. "I could go for that, red hair and all."

He began to take a long time over his lunch, watching her as she ordered. Her voice reached him faintly across the room, from the table for two near a window. It had tones that stirred something in him.

"Steel in her," he mused, "and sharp claws to go with it."

In his words, he "never went overboard for any dame." But he was interested, and he had not been interested in that way for a long time.

Tony pretended to be unaware of him, without making it obvious. Several times she glanced in his direction, wondering who he might be. Rocky wasn't fooled. Boulder City was small; they'd meet again, and it would be different the next time, he assured himself.

When he sauntered out, he passed close to her table and overheard the waitress address her as Miss Oatman. In his surprise, his pulse skipped a beat and he almost bumped into a chair at a nearby table.

"So that's the way it is!" he thought, as he reached the door. "I might have known!"

He sat down and smoked a contemplative cigarette. When Tony came out, his glance followed her down the street until she turned into the Bon Ton. Rocky smiled inscrutably. He felt he could congratulate himself on having returned to Boulder City, and doubly so now.

He took it for granted that Tony had not come home alone. "I'll walk into the bank and have a little talk with her old man about three o'clock," he promised himself. "He'll see it my way."

Rocky was confident now; Oatman wouldn't risk exposure for his daughter's sake, if not for his own.

HE HAD been in the bank every day since his arrival, using one excuse or another for his presence. It had enabled him to overcome the slightest trace of uneasiness at being back in the First National. When he walked in that afternoon, he was confident and perfectly at ease. Oatman was at his desk. Their eyes met, and Rocky bowed to him. Leaning over the rail, he said: "My name is William Jeanette, Mr. Oatman. I've been in town for several days, waiting for you to return from the Coast. I have a little business I want to discuss with you."

Oatman found nothing familiar about this affable young stranger with the crooked smile and level gray eyes. He got to his feet and opened the gate. "Come in," he invited and went so far as to offer Rocky his hand. "I presume you are a stock buyer from the East."

Rocky's smile broadened. "I hate to disappoint you, Mr. Oatman, but I'm not in Boulder City to buy cattle. I'm here to go into business for myself."

"That's interesting, indeed!" Oatman beamed on him in his best Chamber of Commerce manner. "We've got the finest town of its size in Wyoming, Mr. Jeanette. And it's going to get better; it's going to grow." He checked himself rather abruptly. "What type of business are you thinking of?"

"Insurance and real estate."

The president of the First National shook his head dubiously. "I don't want to throw cold water on your plans, Mr. Jeanette, but that field is pretty well covered."

"I know," Rocky admitted, unperturbed. "I've made some inquiries. I can buy the Morrell business at a reasonable figure. I'll do all right," he continued, lowering his voice against the chance of being overheard. "I have some details to lay before you of very private nature. I suggest that I come back after the bank closes, when we can be alone and speak freely."

It rang an alarm in Oatman's brain. He sat up, bristling.

"That's a very unusual request," he declared brusquely. "I sit here all day and discuss matters of a personal nature during banking hours. I... What do the details you mention concern?"

Rocky had risen. Bending over, he said: "They concern the discrepancy between the $34,109.00 the bonding company found missing after this bank was held up a few weeks ago and the less than $7,000.00 the bandits got."

He saw Oatman wilt and for a moment he thought the man was going to have a stroke. "You'll see me at the door, when I drop back," he said. "Just let me in and we'll arrive at an understanding that will be satisfactory to both of us."

ROCKY sauntered out, completely satisfied with the beginning he had made. He was going to enjoy settling down to respectability; he'd find ways to make it pay.

Rocky kept Oatman waiting an hour. It was deliberate on his part; his way of breaking the man down. The latter attempted to put up a bold front when he admitted him.

When they sat down at Oatman's desk the middle drawer was half open, exposing a .44. This was deliberate, too; Oatman's way of informing Rocky that he didn't intend to be pushed around. "Go ahead and speak your piece, Jeanette," he said, coldly hostile.

Rocky smiled. "We don't have to start off as unfriendly as that, Mr. Oatman; I'm not here to shake you down."

"That's decent of you," was the cuttingly sarcastic response. "I've never done anything to make me afraid of being blackmailed. Where do you get the preposterous information that the men who robbed this bank got away with only seven thousand dollars?"

"I counted the money, Mr. Oatman."

Rocky spoke so casually that the full significance of the surprising statement did not register on Oatman for a moment. When it did, he sat there transfixed.

Ty Roberts, the sheriff, passed the bank. Looking in through the window and seeing Oatman at his desk he raised his hand in a friendly salute. Oatman saw him, but he was too preoccupied to respond. Finally, he said: "I'm beginning to remember you. You're one of the three men who robbed this institution. It was you who shoved the gun in my face."

Rocky spread his hands in a deprecatory gesture. "Why go into that, Mr. Oatman. You don't hear me accusing you of getting away with better than twenty-five thousand. All I'm saying is that there was a discrepancy. I'm not interested in who got it or where it went. Maybe you can explain; perhaps it would be mighty embarrassing if you were called on to try. I know it would embarrass me if I had to explain how I happen to know so much about it."

Oatman glared at him in scornful silence for a moment. "You've got brass, Jeanette—too much brass for your own good! You've overplayed your hand this time. I'll turn you over to the sheriff if it's the last thing I do on this earth."

Rocky shook his head, completely undisturbed. "I'm sure you'll do nothing of the sort—not when you've thought it over. You know my secret, Mr. Oatman, and I know yours; we'll do well to leave it that way."

"Who else knows it?" Oatman demanded tensely.

"No one."

"There were three—"

"Two of them are dead. No brains, Mr. Oatman. They tried a little job on their own and were killed. It makes everything airtight for us. We'll never have to worry about them."

CHARLIE OATMAN thought long and hard. "What's your price, Jeanette? How much do you want to clear out of Boulder City and never come back?"

"You don't get me at all, Mr. Oatman," Rocky protested, with a mild show of impatience. "I've got a few thousand; I'm not after your money. Nor am I interested in leaving town. I spent a lot of time thinking things out before I made a move. I figure I can do all right here."

"Not in the real estate and insurance business; you'll be lucky to make a living."

"After I get set, perhaps I can branch out."

Oatman nodded. "That's what I'm afraid of. It was cool in the bank, but his thinning reddish hair was damp with perspiration."

"You needn't be afraid of that—not the way you mean it," Rocky told him. "I'll make myself a credit to Boulder City. The law will never have any occasion to put a finger on me, and not because I'm so honest all of a sudden. There's a better reason; I know the other way doesn't pay off."

Oatman had aged ten years in the past few minutes. He took out a handlechief and mopped his face and polished his glasses. Desperate, his head throbbing so violently he could not think clearly, he could find no way to escape from his dilemma. He wasn't underestimating Rocky. Up to now the man had used a velvet paw; but the claws were there, concealed and ready to be used if he were defied.

The gun in the open drawer mocked Oatman with its nearness. He doubted that his trembling fingers could pick it up cleanly and use it quickly enough to count. Without doubt Rocky was armed and no novice with a gun. Then, too, killing him would leave some ugly questions to be answered.

Rocky followed his train of thought perfectly. "I'm glad you see it that way, Mr. Oatman," he said quietly. "Neither one of us could afford anything like that."

He reached out and closed the drawer. "Give me the same break I'm giving you," he went on. "That's all I want."

Oatman regarded him with a vast and bitter distrust. "Be done with your fiendish cat and mouse game!" he whipped out thinly. "You've got your price, and you expect me to pay it! Why sit there and tell me you're giving me a break?"

"I'll tell you why," said Rocky. "If a fellow walks into a bank with a gun in his fist, he's there to take whatever he can grab, and he doesn't intend to return it. There's no excuse for him unless he changes his ways. It's different with an honorable man who has done everything he could for his community. If things suddenly go wrong for him and he gets caught in a financial jam, maybe he takes a chance to save himself, figuring he can make good if he can buy a little time. Usually it works out all right. Sometimes it goes the other way. That doesn't make an honorable man a crook, in my eyes...After all, Mr. Oatman, what's twenty-five, thirty thousand dollars to you?"

Rocky spread his hands eloquently. "You're a rich man. Let the market come back a little and the price of beef go up. Why, you'll be sitting pretty again. I'm sure you'll find some way of reimbursing the bonding company—and without anyone being the wiser; but that's your business."

Rocky was all steel now, his gray eyes cold and purposeful. "I don't want to know what you do about it, but I can tell you that I don't propose ever to refer to it again. That's what I mean when I say give me the same break I'm giving you; I want you to take me as I am and forget the past."

They fenced with their eyes for a long moment and Oatman unconsciously moistened his parched lips with his tongue. "Jeanette, you don't mean a word of it. You're too smooth and too hard for that. What you propose to do is grind me down—keep me under your heel. I won't know from one hour to the next where I stand. Whenever it pleases your purpose, you'll turn the screws. You'll enjoy seeing me squirm. If I don't dance to your tune, you'll threaten me with exposure and disgrace."

"No, Oatman, I'm too smart to risk anything like that. To put it bluntly, you've got as much on me as I have on you. I figure that's your guarantee and mine that neither of us will start rocking the boat."

Oatman shook his head hopelessly. "You've got the whip hand on me from the start. Exposure and disgrace would mean little to you; I've got my family to think of—my wife and daughter—and my position in Boulder City.... You've got something definite in mind, Jeanette. What is it? What do you want me to do for you?"

"I want you to set me in with the right people. I'll buy out Morrell. The bank controls a lot of insurance business through the mortgages it holds. You can shove it my way. Anybody who is anybody in Boulder City belongs to the Business Men's Club. When you get around to it, I'd appreciate it if you took me to one of the weekly luncheons and put me up for membership."

Oatman winced. Rocky's demands were modest, but he told himself this was only the beginning. "All right," he muttered soberly, "I've got to knuckle under to you. But I'm warning you: watch your step carefully. There's a limit beyond which I won't go, no matter what it does to me."

As they sat talking, someone tapped on the window. It was Tony. She beckoned for her father to let her in. Oatman stifled a groan.

"This is my daughter," he snapped. "I'll have to ask you to leave, Jeanette."

"Certainly," Rocky agreed, though he intended to force an introduction if necessary. "We've finished our business. I'll open a modest account with the bank tomorrow. Some papers will have to be drawn up between Morrell and me. I'll need a lawyer. Can you suggest a good one?"

"Frank Grimwood is the attorney for the bank. His offices are across the street in the Oatman Building."

They walked to the door together. Tony was standing there when it was opened.

Oatman intended that Rocky should step out and be on his way. The situation grew more awkward by the second when he stood his ground. It forced the banker's hand.

"Tony, this is Mr. Jeanette; my daughter," he said. Rocky bowed. "This is a pleasure, Miss Oatman."

Tony had a smile for him. "Your first visit to Boulder City, Mr. Jeanette?"

"No, I've been here before," he said, with the slightest hesitation. "This time, I'm here to stay."

Tony glanced at her father for an explanation.

"Mr. Jeanette is taking over Carl Morrell's business," the latter explained.

"Then we'll be seeing each other often, Mr. Jeanette," said Tony. "Mr.—"

"William Jeanette. My friends call me Rocky."

"Rocky." Tony tried the sound of it on her lips. "After you get settled, you must come up to the house for dinner some evening."

An apoplectic hue swept over Oatman's face. Tony didn't notice; Rocky had her attention. "That's kind of you," he said. He thanked her again, and saying good afternoon, took his leave.

Tony's eyes followed him as he crossed the street.

"What an attractive man," she murmured. "He has a very engaging way about him, Father."

"Very!" Oatman muttered grimly.
CHARLES, I simply can't understand your attitude toward Mr. Jeanette," Celia Oatman said one evening as she and her husband sat out on the porch after dinner. They were alone at the time. "Tony and I never mention his name but what you manage to let us know you disapprove of him. It's not like you to be two-faced about anything."

Oatman glanced up from his newspaper. The past three weeks had been trying ones for him. He had held himself in and thought he had handled the unbearable situation rather well.

"What do you mean by that, Ceel?" he inquired.

"Why, away from this house, you can't do enough for William Jeanette. You sponsored him at the club and have introduced him around among your friends and business acquaintances. I don't believe it's any secret that you are sending every bit of business you can to him."

"I wouldn't worry about it," he advised rather brusquely. "A stranger shows up in town who may be acceptable in a business way; that doesn't mean you have to take him into your home. He's been here for dinner two or three times already. I've noticed how you and Tony go out of your way to be nice to him. If Frank Grimwood is lucky enough to be asked up, he's treated to pot luck with us. Not Jeanette; there has to be fussing and fixings."

"That's unfair," Mrs. Oatman protested. "You know how much I admire Frank. He's always welcome. When he first came to town, two years ago, I fussed, as you put it, for him, but you don't keep that up after you get to be old friends. I always say you never really know anyone until you can eat in the kitchen with them without feeling embarrassed."

"That's my point exactly," he observed. "We don't know anything about Jeanette. And you needn't ask me what I've got against him; I haven't anything against him."

"He's being invited everywhere," Celia Oatman smiled to herself. "I wonder, Charles, if you're not a bit jealous of him."

"Jealous?" Oatman's tone was crisp with amazement.

"Over that deal he made for the vacant corner lot next to the Bon Ton. I know you've had your eye on it for a long time. I remember you told me you were sure you could turn it over to Louie Abramson at a nice profit if you could get your hands on it."

"So I could have," Oatman admitted. "Jeanette made a nice thing out of it. He went down to Rawlins and caught Mrs. Chapin in the right mood and talked her into selling. I don't begrudge him his profit. Louie's going to build right away, a two-story brick to match the rest of the Bon Ton. That'll make Bridger Street look better; that vacant corner has always been an eye-sore to me."

HE TURNED back to his newspaper, or pretended to. It was his way of indicating that he had nothing further to say. The situation held a measure of bitter irony for him, too; the securities market had begun to recover and beef prices were climbing higher than anyone had reason to expect. Rocky's prediction was coming to pass; in a few weeks, he would be back on solid ground, financially.

Charlie Oatman found little comfort in his returning prosperity; it came too late. Two months back, it would have made everything right for him. But no longer could money make him a free man; he was chained to Rocky. Making full restitution to the bonding company would not break those shackles. It would loosen their grip on him, however, and make it possible for him to fight back; but even that was denied him.

Oatman had given it a lot of thought. He had even considered ways as absurd as finding a sack of money that the bandits had dropped in their haste. It always brought him up against a stone wall; the State Bank Examiner had gone over the carefully doctored books and found nothing amiss. So had the auditors for the bonding company. Those figures had to stand now. They were his figures; question them, and the roof would fall in on him.

The strain he was under had begun to affect his health; but there was no one, his wife and daughter least of all, to whom he could unburden himself. Fearing and loathing Rocky, he had scrutinized every move the man made. He was forced to acknowledge, however grudgingly, that, up to now, Rocky had conducted himself in an exemplary manner; it only served to deepen his conviction that, sooner or later, the crookedness and larceny that were in the self-confessed young blackleg would come to the surface.

Celia Oatman regarded her husband in silence, over the top of his newspaper. "Charles, why don't you drop in and see Dr. Wingaard and let him look you over," she said, without warning. Oatman brought his newspaper down promptly.

"What's the reason for that?" he demanded irritably. "There's nothing wrong with me. I don't need any of Wingaard's pills."

"There's something wrong with you," she insisted. "I can't imagine what it is. Is it possible you're worrying over Tony? I mean about her and Rocky Jeanette."

"Of course I'm worried!" he blurted out, exasperation getting the better of him. "I don't like it a little bit, I can tell you! She's getting entirely too thick with him to suit me. She knows she can paint; she doesn't need Jeanette to tell her so. But she seems to eat up everything he has to say. Tossing Charlie Russell's name at her, and a couple other Western painters who have hit the top, as though he was on intimate terms with them! Tony's always been so level-headed, you'd think she'd see through his cheap flattery....And what about Frank Grimwood? I understand she was in love with him."

Celia Oatman believed she at last had the answer to the riddle that had perplexed her for days, and there was a note of relief in her soft laughter.

"You are distressing yourself needlessly, Charles. There's nothing romantic about Tony's interest in Rocky. I know," Celia pressed her lips together firmly. She could be very positive when occasion required. "He's entertaining; he's been everywhere. Naturally, she enjoys his company. I'm glad she's found someone here who understands her viewpoint. Getting upset over anything as innocent as this is ridiculous. Certainly Frank Grimwood doesn't object; if he felt he was in any danger of playing second fiddle to Rocky, they wouldn't be so friendly."

"Hunh!" was Oatman's caustic comment. "I hope you're right!" Not trying to hide his annoyance, he got up and put on his hat. "I'm going downtown for a few minutes."

TONY HAD driven out this evening with Frank and Rocky; they had become a familiar threesome at the lake. Without any encouragement from her, several town girls had tried unsuccessfully to make it a foursome. Rocky hadn't given them any encouragement, either. With ingratiating diplomacy, however, he had avoided turning his admirers into enemies. Furthermore, he wasn't permitting his interest in Tony to get out of hand; she wasn't making it easy for him. He knew Frank was devoted to her. It was not because he had become genuinely fond of the young lawyer that he held off; Grimwood could help him to get on; and that came first with Rocky.

He wasn't underestimating Frank Grimwood, with his plain face and quiet, self-effacing manner, the least bit; beneath the mild surface, he saw a man of stern, fighting character who wasn't likely to be betrayed by his emotions nor turned aside from any goal he set for himself. These were characteristics of great virtue in Rocky's eyes. He was convinced that he, himself, was cut along those lines. Accordingly, he respected Grimwood and never forgot to be careful with him.

Dancing with Tony, Rocky caught a glimpse of Grimwood standing in the veranda doorway, an amused smile on his face. Rocky swung that way and asked him if he wanted to cut in.

"No," Frank answered. "Buck's going too strong for me right now. I'll wait till he cools off a bit."

Rocky and Tony danced away. "You're very pretty tonight, Tony," he murmured.

"Thank you," she said, acknowledging the compliment with a pleased smile. "Nothing special. I'm beginning to feel thoroughly rested for the first time since I got back. I understand you and Frank are pulling out at daylight for the desert."

Rocky nodded.

"You'll enjoy it if the wind doesn't kick up. I've been over parts of the Blue Rock many times. I love its moods. Perhaps that's why I always find it a bit scary... Frank's going to show you what he's found out there, of course."

"Yeh," Rocky grinned. "He says he'll convince me that there's oil there."

"Do you know anything about oil?"

"Not a thing. No one seems to think Frank knows anything about it, either. But I don't know why there shouldn't be oil in Wyoming. Come up with a new idea, or try to do something different, and the usual run of people will say it's nonsense."

Tony nodded. "Don't I know? When I said I was going to paint, everyone said I was crazy. The only encouragement I got was from Mom. It used to shock Father almost to death to have me walk into the bank in Levis and a cotton shirt to tell him I was going out on the range alone for a day or two with my easel. To this day, Joe Evans doesn't think it seemsly for me to be hanging around cow camps and Indian Reservations. But I guess he's gradually coming around to thinking I may amount to something. I caught him in the bank yesterday, sitting there studying that painting of mine. He had a far-away look in his eyes, as though it had rolled back the years for him."

Rocky's mood was suddenly sober. "You're having a good time, Tony—doing what you want to do. A person can make a mistake or two but if he believes in himself that won't stop him; he can get about what he wants out of life."

SHE LOOKED up at him, wondering what lay behind his words. His gray eyes were unreadable. In his face, however, she found something that she had never seen there before. It was as though something deep within him had momentarily come to the surface, touching him with a vague and obscure regret.

Tony felt the tug of it. She didn't ask herself why; Rocky smiled then, and the moment was gone.

"Frank should know something about oil," she said quickly, looking away. "His father was an oil man back in Wood County, Ohio. Frank worked in the field with him every summer while he was going through law school. He's studied geology and petrology, so he isn't going altogether by guess or by gosh... I don't suppose I'm telling you anything you don't already know."

"No," Rocky admitted. "He's talked my arm off."

"Don't discourage him, Rocky." It was her turn to be serious. "Frank's the salt of the earth; he's very fond of you."

HEN Grimwood arrived at the hotel at four the next morning, with a saddled horse for Rocky, he found the latter waiting. "I swear you look like a dude in those togs," he declared laughingly. "Everything brand new from boots to hat."

"And they feel like it," Rocky told him. "I didn't have any range clothes; I had to outfit myself. This is a good-looking bronc you've got for me."

"One of the sheriff's horses. Ky keeps a good string."

Rocky swung up easily.

"No need to ask if you can ride," Grimwood observed, "The way you climbed into that saddle is the tip-off."

"I've done a little riding," said Rocky, and immediately changed the subject. "What about breakfast? There doesn't seem to be anything open."

"There's an all-night Chink restaurant down by the depot that isn't too bad. I've got some grub for this noon. Rita's invited us to stop for supper on our way back, this evening. Remember?"

Rocky nodded. It was an invitation he had promptly accepted.

A quick breakfast, and they were on their way. The sun was just getting up.

"Prettiest time of the day in this Western country, said Rocky, as they began to put Boulder City behind them. To the north, the Dry Creek Mountains appeared to have the color and texture of puffs of pink and lavender cotton. The air was redolent with the tang of sage-brush.

"It is," Grimwood agreed. "Tony's gotten me out early enough on two or three occasions to reach the crest of Round Butte in time to witness the whole show." He indicated Round Butte, five miles to the east, with a jerk of his head. "The sunrise takes your breath away, when you're up there."

"And it's different every morning," remarked Rocky, his guard down. "You might not think it, but that's so; the colors are never quite the same. It gets to a man."

Grimwood regarded him with a puzzled light in his eyes. Rocky caught him shaking his head and was wary at once.

"What is it?" he asked, with deceiving carelessness.

Grimwood chuckled.

"I swear, you knock me off my pins ever so often by saying something that I'd never expect to hear from a city-bred stranger to Wyoming... You sure you're a tenderfoot?" he added facetiously.

"I'm beginning to wonder," was Rocky's bantering response. He knew he had slipped up; he was too wise to walk away from it without covering himself. The truth seemed to be the best and handiest weapon. "I've been around some. I don't know where you get that city-bred stuff; western Missouri was my home range, and when I pulled away from the town where I was born it was still just a wide spot in the road. The only time anyone ever heard anything about that neck of the woods was when Frank and Jesse James were on the loose."

"Good thing you didn't take a leaf out of their book," said Grimwood. "You wouldn't be selling insurance in Boulder City today if you had."

Rocky shrugged and said, "You never can tell about things like that... Let's push those broncs a little, Frank. We got a long way to go, and it's going to be hot later."

The Spanish Ranch was not yet astir when they passed. This was the first time Rocky had seen it at close range. It was obvious at a glance that money had been poured into it with a lavish hand. The main house was a rambling structure of stone and stucco, with a tile roof. Between it and the cluster of buildings around the stables and barns stood an old, comfortable-looking two-story frame house.

"That's the old Warren ranchhouse that stood here when this was a cow ranch," Grimwood explained. "That was before old Mark Warren, Ted's father, pulled up stakes and went to Montana and made a million dollars in copper. It's an attractive-looking house today. A lot of work's been done on it. I've heard Rita say that when she first saw it it was just a wooden box with a roof on it. Jim Fitzpatrick, her trainer, and his family live there. He's had the Warren horses from the beginning. Those bungalows down by the stables are for the riders and exercise boys and the crew that works the ranch."

"Took money to do all that," said Rocky.

"Rita has plenty left," It answered Rocky's unasked question. "She doesn't throw it away like Ted. He was a crazy man with money."

"What happened to him. An accident?"
“Yeh, hunting accident. Nobody knows exactly what occurred. He was up in the Tetons, hunting elk with a couple friends from the East. He didn’t come into camp one evening. The guide found him next morning, shot through the head. That was a few months after I landed in Boulder City. It was the general opinion that Rita was well rid of him; he’d been living on whiskey for a year or more.”

Over night Rocky had canvassed his mind regarding Rita Warren. She was not only tailored to his liking but she could be the brake that would stop him from getting over his head with Tony Oatman.

He thought it over again this morn- in, as Grimwood and he skirted the eastern fringe of the Slate Hills. Stripped of all else, attaching himself to Rita held a promise of safety for him, and not only because it would help him to maintain the status quo with Tony and Grimwood.

“She’s no kid,” he mused. “In the back of her head, she’ll question everything I do. That’ll make me careful on her account as well as my own. I might be sucker enough to toss away the chance I’ve got in this town if I didn’t have somebody to slow me up.”

The country began to change soon after they struck away from the hills. By nine o’clock, they had open desert ahead of them.

“The place we’re heading for is called Mustard Valley,” Grimwood turned in his saddle to remark. “Just sand, alkali flats and a little dwarf sage. There’s a big dry wash down the middle of it. I don’t know why they call it a valley. It’s really a big desert coulee—a mile-wide depression surrounded by ragged hills that were leveled off by glacial action. Look ahead, far down on the horizon, and you can see the flat-tops I mean. You know that rock-formations have been classified into age groups.”

Rocky nodded but didn’t appear too sure.

“You find crude petroleum only in the higher strata, never in metamorphic or crystalline formations. All the other geological systems have produced it. Competent authorities say that if oil is found in this part of the United States it will be in the creta-} ceous strata. That’s what we’ve got here.”

He grinned as he saw the puzzled look on Rocky’s face.

“Does all that scare you?” he queried.

“Sounds pretty bad, Frank.”

“Well, don’t worry; I won’t snow you under with scientific junk. I’ll convince you without going into that. A

OTHER hour’s riding brought them to the barrier reef of slashed-off hills, or buttes, that encircled Mustard Valley. Grimwood pulled up when they had the valley spread out below them.

“And a tough-looking spot she is!” Rocky declared with bitter emphasis. “Doesn’t look as though even a coyote could scratch a living down there.”

“It’s no bower of roses,” Grimwood admitted. “Most—maybe all—of the Blue Rock Desert was under water at one time. It must have been a big salt lake. I’ve found traces of a shoreline in these hills and away over in the Dry Creek Mountains. No trick to find salt water fossils.”

“And that’s good?”

“Well, it ain’t bad, Rocky. There’s two or three schools of thought on the origin of petroleum. The gray-beard used to think it was an inorganic substance, distilled from coal, at great pressure. The majority opinion today is that it’s the result of the decomposition of marine organisms, animal and vegetable. But let’s get down there and poke around a little. I want to give out something more substantial than theory.”

They picked their way down and ground-tied the ponies. Rocky looked around, trying to locate the wide dry wash Grimwood had mentioned. Its banks were so shallow, in relation to the rest of the depression that he had to ask Frank to point it out to him.

“I can see it now,” Rocky said. “It hasn’t carried any water to speak of in a good many years. A little, I suppose, in the spring, when the snow’s going off.”

Grimwood agreed with him.

“It’s only value to me has been to indicate the direction of the natural drainage and the surface flow in centuries past. Following that line, it wasn’t difficult to find the lowest point in the depression. I knew if there was any oil seepage—and I’d been told there was—it would be there.”

“Was there?” Rocky was beginning to be interested.

“I’ll say there was. Chances are you never heard anyone mention Matt Bell. He passed away last Winter. He was an old-time prospector. There wasn’t much about the Blue Rock he didn’t know. It was Matt who first got me interested in looking for oil out here. He swore he had often seen a little pool of black gumbo that smelled like tar, in Mustard Valley. But you have a look, Rocky, and see what you make of it. I cached a testing stick by this sandstone outcropping. I’ll get it, and we’ll go on.”

He dug out of the stand a stick the size and shape of a billiard cue. Fitted to the small end was a pointed iron shoe.

They had only several hundred yards to go. Rocky led the way. He noticed numerous footprints in the sand and pointed them out to Grimwood.

“Have you had company in here, Frank?”

“No, they’re mine. I’ve been looking them over. No one been here since I was in last.”

ROCKY caught the tangy smell of coal tar a few seconds before he caught sight of the pool, which was only four and a half to five feet wide and very hollow. A gummy, iridescent film covered it.

“You mean to tell me that’s crude oil?” he asked, the last trace of boredom gone.

“It’s water. Only that film floating on the surface is oil, and I’ll prove to you that it is oil and not iron oxides or some similar substance. Here, take the stick and stir it around in the pool till you’ve broken up the film. Then watch it reunite.”

Rocky did as directed. The iridescent film separated for a split second and then showed an unbroken surface.

“If that slick was due to an iron oxide, you’d be able to break it up into little flakes that you could move around,” Grimwood told him. “Pull your stick out now and look at the iron shoe. You’ll see drops of water adhering to it like you will on any greasy or fatty substance.”

Rocky repeated the test a number of times and always got the same result. “I’m a greenhorn about this, but you’re making me see it your way,” he declared, unmistakably impressed and not trying to conceal the fact. “You may have your fingers on a million dollars, Frank!”

Grimwood shook his head skeptically. “I don’t doubt but what there’s millions here for someone. I’m afraid it’s as far as the moon for me. It’s going to cost a small fortune to put down a test well—twice as much as it would cost back in Ohio or Pennsylvania, where wells are being put down every day. You couldn’t raise the money in Boulder City. Money for a ranch, or a gold mine, but not for an oil well. Go to Charlie Oatman, or Hank Taylor, or the Bonfils and they’d walk away from you as though you had the smallpox.”

“Maybe something can be done about that.” Rocky spoke with a mysterious confidence. “We can talk about it later. You’re sure there’s oil here, Frank?”

“As sure as I could be about anything.”

“Then tell me this—remember. I’m an absolute greenhorn—if this little pool has been here for years, and its seepage, why hasn’t it got any bigger?”

“There’s porous sandstone just below the surface. You can see the outcroppings. But go down any place and you’ll strike it in a few feet. The oil has been drifting across it. I’ve chipped off pieces all around here and given them the so-called water-test. You place the piece of rock in a pan of water and expose it to the sun. If there’s oil in it, iridescent colors will appear on the surface almost at once. I’ve never failed to get them. I’ll get a pick and make a fresh fracture for you; we can spare water enough for the test."

The fragment he chipped off was darker than sandstone usually is, indicating that it was impregnated with oil. Placed in water, it im-mmediately gave off streaks of rainbow-like colors.

"My dad used to be fond of saying that an oil deposit wasn't unlike a leaky pot with a good strong lid," said Grimwood. "What he meant was that you need a stratum porous rock for your reservoir and an impervious rock lid to hold the oil there.
If you get a little seepage like this it's because of the gas pressure behind it. I could tell you a lot about tectonic arches and the past structural conditions play and how water and oil divide, owing to the difference in their density, with the oil filling the antclines and water the synclines, but I'd get so involved you'd yell murder."

"You don't have to say any more," Rocky's imagination had caught fire and he was deadly serious now. "I'm convinced you've got something. It's a good thing no one in town is taking you seriously, or some smart gent would be cutting under you."

Grimwood laughed at the suggestion, and said, "No danger of that."

"Don't be too sure," Rocky said thinly. "You wouldn't be the first party who'd talked himself out of a fortune."

He turned his back on a whirling spiral of dust and watched it go dancing up the wash.

"Let's move into the base of that hill and try to find some shade and get out of this dust. It's time to eat, anyhow."

"Okay," Grimwood agreed. "I'll get my pack. You pick up a little dead sage for a fire and we'll boil some coffee."

NOONING under an overhang-cliff proved to be a pleasant interlude. This was the first time in several months that Rocky had been out in the open. It was good to have the pungent aroma of burning sage biting his nostrils again. Grimwood heated a panful of beans and fried some bacon.

They talked as they ate. Afterwards, Rocky was thoughtful as he smoked. He had journeyed into the desert with Grimwood with no other purpose in mind than to humor him and enjoy the day. Had it occurred to him, he would have ridiculed the thought that he was to become seriously interested in a wildcat oil prospect. That was all changed now; his eyes had been opened and he saw an opportunity beckoning to him that was so rich it dwarfed his modest business into insignificance. If the optimism he expressed sounded lukewarm, it was intentional, for he was in the throes of asking himself why he shouldn't go it alone. Why bother with Grimwood? He could deal Frank out and have it all to himself.

Such a course appealed to his instincts. In the past, that had been the compelling consideration with him; strangely, he hesitated about embracing it now. He couldn't understand why he questioned it. He found his answer by devious reasoning and had it all settled in his mind before he realized it. He'd play fair with Frank Grimwood. That was the sensible thing to do; he'd need Frank.

Staring out across the wastes of Mustard Valley and beyond, Rocky conjured up a picture of a forest of oil derricks and toiling men.

"Can you imagine the changes a producing oil field will make around here?" he mused. "It'll change every-th ing. Boulder City will be a town of fifty thousand in a year or two."

"I've dreamed about it," Grim-wood acknowledged.

"Suppose you stop dreaming and do something," Rocky in feigned detachment had fled. "Who owns this land?"

"It's State land."

"Can it be purchased?"

"Sure, and for a song."

"With all mineral rights?"

"Naturally."

"Then go ahead and buy five hundred acres."

"Wait a minute!" Grimwood protested. "I'm a young lawyer, just getting started. I haven't any amount of loose money laying around."

"I'll put up the dough," said Rocky. Grimwood gazed at him with mingled surprise and incredulity. "I didn't bring you out here to sell you a bill of goods, Rocky. . . . You can't mean you're ready to throw in with me."

"You got a pardner," Rocky answered. "Buy this land, and keep what you're doing under your hat till we've got the deed. We're in this fifty-fifty. It'll be up to me to raise the money for the well. I'll get it somewhere. How much is it going to take?"

"Thirty-three-five, maybe fifty thousand dollars. You can't name a figure and keep it. What oil there is here can't be too deep. Twenty-seven hundred to three thousand feet. But a contractor may lose a string of tools and have to spend weeks fishing for them. If he can't get them out, he'll have to begin all over."

THE FIGURE was higher than Rocky had expected, to say nothing of being surrounded with uncertainties. In his ignorance, he had believed that uncertainty in drilling an oil well was restricted to whether or not you struck oil.

Grimwood saw other difficulties that would have to be overcome in putting down a test well in a new field.

"Timbers for a seventy-foot derrick will have to be freighted out. That goes for casing, tools, boiler and the rest of the rig. There isn't any road. Most of the way is level desert that won't give a heavy freighting-outfit any trouble. One or two places will take some work. I don't know of any water nearer than the Spanish Ranch, and water will be needed for the boiler and the crew. We'll have to keep a water-wagon on the go every day. There'll be the matter of getting grub out here, too, and feed for the teams."

Grimwood saw Rocky's frown deepen.

"We better be realistic about these things and realize what we'll be up against," he pointed out.

"Sure," Rocky muttered. "You haven't mentioned anything that figures to stop us. How about the drilling? Will you have any trouble getting someone to come out to Wyoming to handle the job?"

"I won't have any trouble finding a contractor, but we'll have to pay him his price. In an established field, ninety cents to a dollar a foot is the average rate. We can't expect to get it done for anything like that. The contractor will find the tools and be responsible for accidents. It'll be up to us to build the derrick and supply the rig."

"Does the contractor have his own men?"

"He usually has his own crew—two drillers and a couple tool-dressers. That'll be the best deal for us. If we go through with it, I'll have to take a trip back East to make the arrangements."

"Don't worry; we'll go through with it," Rocky said flatly. You draw up some papers tomorrow that'll cover the deal between us, and then you get busy seeing what you can do about buying this land."

Grimwood started to nod approvingly, checked himself abruptly and was suddenly enormously sober.

"What's the matter?" Rocky demanded, a bit nettled and not concealing the fact. "Anything wrong with that?"

"No, I was just thinking, Rocky. You intend to raise the money locally?"

"Sure!"

Grimwood's mouth tightened perceptibly. "If the well comes in dry, we'll have to leave town, Rocky. There wouldn't be anything left for us in Boulder City. It's something to think about."

"I've thought about it," was the flinty response. "I know you're on the level. That's good enough for me. If this thing backfires and somebody has to leave town, it won't be you."
OCKY and Grimwood had talked themselves out by the time they left Mustard Valley. With the westering sun in their eyes, they turned back over the way they had come, exchanging only an occasional word and leaving it to the horses to make the pace.

They were supposed to be examining the terrain with the idea of finding a feasible route for a makeshift road. Grimwood gave it his complete attention, and such conversation as ensued between them was confined to the subject. Rocky's frowning engagement was genuine enough, but it was not wholly concerned with finding a road; he was beginning to wonder if he hadn't been a little rash in committing himself so unreservedly to the oil well venture. It was not his way, as a rule, to back and fill about anything, and yet the thought kept returning to him that he was running counter to his sworn determination to play every card cautiously. What he was doing now was to put all his eggs in one basket, and it was a basket with a very weak handle. If he hit the jack pot, the rewards would be great. But that was a very large if.

"It'll take a couple weeks to make the deal for the land," he thought. "I can't back out of that, but even if I'm stuck for it, I'll have a little time to think things over before I go any further."

Up ahead, Grimwood had reined in.

"This is one of the bad spots I had in mind, Rocky. The sand's so deep I don't believe a heavy freighter could get through even if we put down two or three feet of sagebrush. The brush would be ground out of sight a day or two after we got it laid.

Rocky stood up in his stirrups to see the better and surveyed the sand, trying to find a route around it. It stretched away on either hand as far as he could see.

"There's a lot of it," he said. "It looks even worse, off to the north. Suppose we swing the other way and see what we can find."

They rode for more than a mile before they found good going. They continued on to the southwest, instead of turning back to the course they had taken that morning. They encountered several more stretches of bad sand but were able to get around them rather easily. A mean dry wash, narrow and deep, presented a more formidable obstacle.

"No laughing this off," Rocky commented. "Looks like it runs through here for a couple miles."

They moved along it, first in one direction and then in the other, without finding a favorable crossing.

"One spot is as bad as another," said Grimwood. "This wash isn't the result of a cloudburst; it carries a heavy run-off every Spring, by the looks of it. The way to lick it is to put in a good-sized culvert and then break down the banks for fill. We're not more than five miles from the Slate Hills now. There's good, hard surface all the way around them to the county road that we came over this morning, when we passed the Spanish Ranch. So, maybe this is the only real headache we'll have to worry about."

Rocky nodded and said, "I hope you're right. We can put those broncs across. Suppose we do and be on our way. It's getting late."

RITA STEPPED out on the verandah and waved a greeting, when they rode up to the house. She was fresh and lovely, which Rocky and Grimwood, in their dusty condition, doubly appreciated. Knowing they would be in rough range clothes, and wanting them to be at ease, she had dressed simply, tweed skirt and white silk blouse, open at the neck to reveal the symmetry of her throat.

"I'm glad to see the two of you," he said, glancing approvingly at Rocky. "I like you in that rig. The only thing that's missing is a gun-belt and .45." She turned to Grimwood for corroboration. "He looks like an honest-to-goodness cow dog, doesn't he, Frank?"

Grimwood's eyes kindled with a merry twinkle. "I've been telling him he's got a lot of savvy for a tender-foot."

Rocky joined in on the laughter at his expense. "Kid me if you want to," he told them, his bantering tone all innocence. "Maybe I could give a pretty good account of myself at that—if the chips were down and there was gunsmoke at the end of it."

"I bet you could!" Rita agreed, mimicking him perfectly. "You boys use the room at the end of the hall; I know you want to freshen up a bit."

They showered and scrubbed, and as Rocky ran a comb through his hair, he gazed at his reflection in the mirror with a keen appreciation of his good fortune. Once again, he could tell himself that he was doing all right; that he hadn't made any mistake in returning to Boulder City.

Grimwood and Rocky had foreseen that there would be some talk of oil and their day on the Blue Rock. They had agreed that, for the present, the only thing they wanted to hold back was their decision to buy the land.

"I'm all ears to hear what you found," said Rita. Heretofore, she had never encouraged Frank to expound on the subject. This evening, however, her tone suggested a lively interest in it. "I'm not asking you, Frank; I know you see gushers spouting all over the Blue Rock... How did it strike you, Mr. Jeanette?"

"I was favorably impressed," Rocky replied. "Of course, I had to look at it through Frank's eyes; all I know about an oil well is that it looks like a windmill without a wheel. In anything like this, I figure it's the man you've got to put your confidence in; if you're sure he's right, go ahead. If I had forty to fifty thousand dollars to spare, I'd take a gamble."

"I must say you sound enthusiastic," Rita declared. "With an endorsement like that, Frank, we may have to take you seriously, after all. I used to think you were just amusing yourself, running off into the desert to pick up shells and old bones and what not, every time you got the chance. Do the two of you actually mean to tell me there may be oil in the Blue Rock?"

Presented with such an opening, Grimwood could not resist making the most of it. Warming to his subject, he argued that there was oil in the Blue Rock, just waiting for man to bring it to the surface. The known facts, all the visible evidence, said so, and he presented scientific logic to back it up. It was the same argument that had won Rocky over. When Grimwood wanted to drive home a point, he turned to his silent partner for verification.

Rocky didn't hesitate to confirm the statements that were referred to him. He felt he could do so honestly. But that was not all that was on his mind, for though Frank had no ulterior purpose in trying to convince Rita, she was wealthy, and Rocky wasn't losing sight of the fact. If he went through with the deal, money would be needed. How better to start the ball rolling than to induce Rita Warren, with her prestige, to purchase a block of stock?

AFTER dinner, Rita joined her guests in smoking a cigarette. In that day, women, good women, especially in Wyoming, didn't smoke. She ignored that inhibition and made an alluring and effective weapon of it.

The horses Rocky and Grimwood had left at the rack had been taken down to the barns and fed. When it came time to leave, Rita said she would have the animals brought up.

"Don't bother," Grimwood told her. "I'll go down. I'd like to stop in and say hello to Mr. Fitz."

On the ranch, Jim Fitzpatrick was seldom referred to or addressed as other than Mr. Fitz.

Grimwood's going gave Rocky and Rita a minute alone.

"I don't know when I've enjoyed myself so much," he told her. "It's been a very pleasant evening."

"Don't let it be the last," she murmured. "You know the way now. Some time, I'm going to have you tell me why you decided to cast your lot in Boulder City."

Rocky grinned.

"I'll tell you now. I was in Denver, looking around for something to try my hand at. I didn't know which way to jump. I happened to pick up a week-old copy of the Mercury. I was getting ready to toss it aside, when I read that you were shipping your horses to California. I bought a racing sheet and saw that Hannibal was starting that afternoon at Emeryville. I put ten dollars on him to win. If he came in, I figured it would be the hunch I'd been looking for and I'd head for Boulder City. You know the rest. I've always been glad I came, but never so glad as right now. Knowing you makes it perfect."

"That's a very pretty compliment, Rocky. I appreciate it." Rita's smile was warm and inviting. "It's going to be nice, having you around."

She looked away and grew thoughtful. "Why don't you get behind this proposition of Frank's? It's a gamble, but it sounds good to me. You could give it the push that would put it over. Left to himself, he won't do anything with it."

"What do you mean?" Rocky asked, though he understood her perfectly.

"Promote it. Organize a stock company and sell shares. I'm used to taking chances; I'll come in for a thousand or two."

"I've given it some thought," Rocky acknowledged. "But you know how such things kick back on you, especially in a small town, if your deal turns out to be a dud. You can't take money from your neighbors and expect them to forgive you if they lose. It would be my finish. I'm speaking confidentially: I wouldn't care to have Frank, or anyone else, hear what I'm saying."

"I understand," said Rita. "I'm speaking in confidence to you, too. It would be easy to overstep yourself and promise too much. But you needn't make that mistake. Sell it as an outright gamble; don't promise anything. If you strike oil, the reward will be terrific. That's the argument to use. If it were me, I'd go to men like Charlie Oatman and Joe Evans and dare them to stay out... You're smiling. Does it sound so ridiculous?"

"Not at all!" Rocky was very emphatic; she had given him an idea, and doubt was gone from his mind. "Naturally, Frank and I haven't talked anything but oil all day," he continued. "I was so sold on the idea that I let my enthusiasm run away with me. I didn't say anything to Frank, but on the way in, I began to back down. You've put me on the right track, Rita. I'll get together with him tomorrow and work out something. By the time you come home from Texas, I'll be ready to shoot."

GRIMWOOD came to Rocky's office the following afternoon with an agreement that proved to be satisfactory to both. They signed it and Rocky turned over a thousand dollars in cash.

"I won't need that much," Grimwood protested. "I don't expect to pay over two dollars an acre for the land."

"You'll need something for expenses. If you have to grease somebody's palm, do it. You're not busy in court right now. Why don't you grab a train in the morning and run down to Cheyenne and close the deal as quickly as you can? That'll beat exchanging letters and wasting a month."

"All right," Grimwood agreed. "I shouldn't be gone more than three or four days." Grinning, he added, “When you get interested, you move fast, don’t you?”
“I’ll try not to trip myself,” Rocky observed, and he wasn’t thinking only of the business in hand.
Grimwood left the next morning. With both Frank and Tony away, Rocky found himself at a loose end. He went out to the lake on Tuesday evening but found no one there who interested him, and after a swim, returned to town. He considered going to the Spanish Ranch, only to decide that it was too soon.
On Thursday, as he was on his way to the weekly luncheon of the Business Men’s Club, he ran into Tony on Bridger Street. He hadn’t expected her back for another day or two.
“This is a surprise,” he told her. “I wasn’t looking for you until Friday.”
“Then, you were looking for me?” she asked, banteringly.
“Naturally,” he said, and both laughed. It gave Rocky a lift to see her again. “But why back so soon?”
“Oh, things went my way. I found a bandy-legged puncher by the name of Shorty Hicks, at the ranch. He was exactly what I wanted and proved to be an excellent model. He has an old, bald-faced roan in his string that I couldn’t have improved on for the picture. The weather was fine—not too hot and very little wind. We left for the Blue Rock late on Monday and didn’t get back to Taylor’s until last evening. Shorty was a jewel. He did the cooking and babied me scandalously.”
Rocky wasn’t interested in hearing her sing Shorty’s praises.
That was shading the truth considerably. Her curiosity (that’s what she chose to call it) regarding what was transpiring in Boulder City, as it pertained to Rita Warren, had become so disturbing that it had driven her home ahead of time.
“What have you been doing, Rocky?”

“Not much of anything since Sunday. Frank’s in Cheyenne. We had an interesting day in the desert. On the way back, we stopped at the Spanish Ranch and had dinner with Rita.”
“Rita?” Tony echoed, and her chin went up an inch or two. “She’s very hospitable—and charming.”
Rocky nodded. He had no alternative. Without half trying, Tony had got under his guard and trapped him.
“It was a very enjoyable evening,” he responded lamely. And then, with sudden resolve: “I’m looking forward to seeing the ranch. She promised to show me over it the next time.”
“You mustn’t wait until she’s gone. Rita won’t be home for long.”
Tony’s solicitude was sweet and cutting. Rocky pretended not to notice its sharp edge.
“I’m anxious to see what you’ve done,” he said. “I wish I could ask you to lunch, but this is club day.”
“This is Thursday,” she said, as though just recollecting the fact. “I won’t keep you, Rocky. I hope you have an interesting speaker. I’ll be seeing you around.”
She was gone then. He had expected her to ask him up to the house that evening. He was both glad and sorry that she hadn’t.
“She’s quick on the trigger,” he thought, continuing on to the hotel.
“All I had to do was open my mouth and she had me figured out.”

THE CLUB meetings were always well attended. The chair was a revolving office, which provided a new chairman every week. His chief responsibility was to provide an interesting speaker. Usually, there was someone in Boulder City for a day or two who could be induced to address the club. The high water mark was reached when the chairman came up with a U.S. Senator or a Congressman. When no visitor was available, some local character reluctantly offered himself as a sacrifice. Rock bottom had been struck when Chet Purdy, the town's leading mortician had filled in. Not only was Chet's trade on the grim side, but he had an impediment in his speech that was annoying even when he quoted the price on a funeral. He spoke at length on the history of embalming. Though the members had suffered through it without listening, no one had ever forgotten it.

Sheriff Ty Roberts was the chairman today. He and the other members were already at the table when Rocky slipped in and took his accustomed seat. Ty had a guest, a middle-aged man of rather serious mien, who, obviously, was to address the club. Rocky had never seen him before.

"Who have we got with us today?" he inquired of Louie Abramson, the proprietor of the Bon Ton Department Store, who sat at his right.

"An old friend of Ty's," Louie replied. "His name is Conlan. He's from Denver."

"Denver, eh?" Rocky was only mildly interested.

"Yeh, Denver Police Department. He's a lieutenant of detectives."

Rocky was all interest now. His glance ran around the long table and came to rest on Charlie Oatman. The latter did not look his way. He was carrying on a conversation across the table with Doc Wingaard and gave no indication that he had anything of a sinister nature on his mind.

It didn't satisfy Rocky. His gray eyes beckoned with suspicion as the feeling grew on him that bringing a lieutenant of detectives from Denver had no other purpose than to unmask him. The rest of it was just a cleverly arranged trick.

His appetite gone, he toyed with his food as he waited, his guard up but not knowing just what was to come.

HALF AN hour passed before Ty got to his feet and banged his first on the table for quiet.

"We're lucky today, gentlemen," he began. "I've got an old friend of mine here to talk to you. He's on his way to the Coast to address a conference of police chiefs. He stopped off between trains to see me, and I promptly hogtied him and got him up here. You've all heard somethin' about fingerprintin'. In the big cities, all the police departments are usin' it. In Washington, the Department of Justice is goin' all out on it. It's the best thing that has ever been discovered for identifying criminals. It's sure-fire. You can fingerprint known crooks and send the information all over the country. But that's only half of it; if it's murder or robbery, the guilty party may think he's left no clues behind. If his fingerprints are there, the police find them, and they're the best clue they could have. But I'm going to let Mike go into that. He's the fingerprint expert for the Denver police... Gentlemen, Lieutenant Mike Conlan."

Ty's introductory remarks rubbed none of the suspicion out of Rocky's mind. He had never been arrested, never fingerprinted. Undoubtedly he had left his prints around. They could have been found. But if that was what he had to face, why this elaborate build-up? Roberts could have found him at his office and taken him down to the jail without all this beating around the bush.

In spite of his preoccupation Rocky found the lieutenant's remarks of great interest. So did the other members of the club. When he concluded, he received a long round of enthusiastic applause. He was still on his feet, and when he got their attention, he said:

"I happened to mention to Ty that I had an ink pad and dusting powder with me. He thought you boys would get a kick out of it if you stepped up, one at a time, and had me fingerprint you. I'll be able to tell you which one of the four categories you belong in. But that's about all; I can't guarantee you that you'll go straight or end up behind the bars."

The majority voiced their approval; it was a lark, and they were for it.

"This is it," thought Rocky. "If I refuse to be printed, it’ll be a dead give-away. If I go through with it, they’ll compare the prints with some they’ve got and I’ll be tabbed.”

He didn’t doubt for a moment but what this was Oatman’s work.

“I didn’t think he’d take a chance. He knows I can pull him down, too. I don’t get it”

To his surprise, when it came Oatman’s turn to be fingerprinted, the president of the First National hung back.

“I don’t approve of this at all,” he declared nervously. “We shouldn’t be doing it. Fingerprinting is a serious business. We’re making a joke of it.”

“What are you afraid of, Charlie?”

Joe Evans demanded, with a raucous laugh.

Others began to twit him, and Ty joined in.

“You got a skeleton in your closet, Charlie?”

“No, I haven’t!” Oatman snapped. He put out his hands and was printed, though he continued to protest.

A scornful smile touched Rocky’s face.

“Figured at the last moment that they might have found his prints, too,” he told himself. “If he had any sense, he’d have kept his mouth shut; his prints are all over the bank, and he’s got a perfect alibi for them.”

Rocky didn’t hold back when it became his turn to walk up to the ink pad. He caught Oatman watching him intently. The actor in Rocky came to the surface and he grinned back impudently.

IT WAS OVER and done with then. The members gathered around Conlan to hear what he had to tell them. Rocky waited; but nothing happened. In a few minutes, the meeting broke up and he went back to his office.

There was no lessening of tension in him. Every time he heard footsteps in the hall, he expected to have them stop at his door. Sitting at his desk, smoking cigarette after cigarette, he heard the mainline train for the west pull out at 3.05. If Lieutenant Conlan had lived up to his announced intention, he was on it.

Rocky began watching the clock. When another twenty minutes had passed, he clapped on his hat and went directly to the sheriff’s office. He found Roberts there. Ty had just come back from seeing his friend off.

“That was a fine meeting, Rocky. Everybody had a good time.” Ty checked himself on noticing Rocky’s serious demeanor. “What’s on your mind?”

“Ty, what was the purpose behind that fingerprinting? Was it aimed at me?”

“At you? Of course not; It wasn’t aimed at nobody. What gave you that idea?”

Rocky dissembled his relief.

“I don’t know,” he said. “I’m the only new member of the club. Been here just a few weeks. I thought maybe Oatman was behind it, figuring it would embarrass me.”

“No!” Ty snorted. “How could it embarrass you? You ain’t a crook. Charlie Oatman was the one who was embarrassed.”

“I’m glad to hear it,” Rocky told him. “What did Conlan do with the prints?”

“He threw ’em in the waste basket, here. You want ’em?”

“No,” Rocky remarked coolly. “They don’t mean anything to me.”

He hung on, making talk that was calculated to cover up what had gone before. He and Ty had always got on well together. He knew the sheriff’s fondness for a good story. It wasn’t long before he had Ty holding his sides with laughter.

DADE HOLLISTER, Ty’s deputy, came in as they sat there. Dade drew up a chair and had just begun to trade stories with them, when a smallish Negro brought a lathered horse to a slithering stop at the door and ran in excitedly. He was Press Totter, one of Crissy’s sons, from the Spanish Ranch.

“Mistah Sheriff, you gotta come quick to the ranch! An’ you gotta fetch the doctor!”
"Take it easy, Press," Ty counselled. He was on his feet at once. "What's happened?"

Press had to catch his breath before he could continue.

"Mistah Roberts, you know that Indian, Jim Bucktoe, who works for Miz Warren. He's been actin' funny for a long time. He got a knife somewhere this afternoon and went after a couple exercise boys. Lonnie and Stub didn't have no trouble with him before. Jim didn't have no reason to use a knife on 'em. I reckon he's just gone plumb crazy. Stub's cut up awful bad."

"Is that all?" Ty snapped.

"No suh. Mustah Fitz and his wife is away. Jim got into their house and stole a rifle and a bagful of cartridges. He fired a lot of shots that didn't hit nobody. We could hear him yellin' that he'd kill anyone that got in his way. The last we saw of him, he was headin' in the direction of the Slate Hills. Miz Warren's afraid he'll come back tonight and none of us will be safe."

"We'll go after him," said Ty. "You find Pete Hoffman, Dade. Tell him I want him to go with us. How about you, Rocky?"

"I'll be glad to go, Ty. You can fix me up with a rifle?"

"Sure! You locate Doc Wingard and have him here inside of ten minutes. We'll have the hosses saddled and be ready to ride by the time you get back. Try Doc's house first; he's usually home nappin', this time of the afternoon."

Rocky left on the double-quick.

"This is good, me riding with the Law," he muttered.

He thought of Rita, menaced by a madman, and it squeezed all the humor out of him.

"Be a hell of a note having some dumb Injun go crazy and ruin everything I've lined up!" He broke into a run, growling. "Too damn bad Roberts hasn't got a railroad engine handy so he could go after this bird the way he chased me!"

ITA SAW them coming and ran out, when they dashed into the yard. Rocky hit the ground before the others and rushed up to her.

"Are you all right?" he demanded anxiously.

"Yes, I'm all right, or will be as soon as I can pull myself together," she replied, with a sigh of relief. "It's been a terrible experience."

Rocky squeezed her hand and said, "Take it easy, Rita."

Though badly shaken, she managed a smile for him. Ty reached her, then. She thanked him for coming so promptly and had a nod for Wingard and the others.

"Has he been back, Mrs. Warren?" the sheriff asked.

"No, thank heaven! I felt so helpless with Mr. Fitz away. All of Tod's guns are in the case. I loaded one. I was afraid to pass out the others. I thought if that maniac did come back, the sight of a gun would send him on another rampage. It isn't as though I had a bunch of cowboys here who could handle a situation like this."

Ty asked Press to point out the direction the Indian had taken. "Last I saw of him, Mistah Roberts, he was dog-trottin' through the brush on that slope ovah there."

"He wasn't workin' west a bit, as though he was goin' to cross the tracks?"

"No, suh."

"Wal, I dunno," Ty muttered, thinking aloud. "He's most likely figgerin' to skirt around the hills and git across the Dry Crick range and down to the Reservation. An Injun will hate the Reservation, but nine times out of ten, when he gits in trouble, he'll head for it. We'll fan out of here and see if we can't pick him up. Doc will stay till we git back, Mrs. Warren.... What shape are those two boys in?"

"I'm sure Lonnie will make it. I don't know about Stub.

"Let me have a look at them—and the sooner the better," said Wingaard. Roberts nodded. "Can we git through that upper fence?" he inquired.

"Yes, there's a gate," Rita told him. "Okay!" Ty grumbled. "Let's go!" Rocky had a word with Rita before he swung up.

"You'll be perfectly safe with Wingaard here," he declared reassuringly. "Doc knows how to use a gun."

"Of course," she murmured, and her eyes lingering on his. "Thanks for being so thoughtful, Rocky."

He looked back as he rode away and saw her hurrying down the yard with Wingaard and Press. He was the last man through the gate. The others had held up to get Ty's instructions.

"We'll swing through the lower hills," Roberts told them. "If Joe's kept on the move, he's a long ways ahead of us by now. George Twigg has a little hay ranch on Stony Crick. We'll stop there and find out if they've seen anythin' of him. And another thing," he added, as they were about to pull away. "We're dealin' with a madman. Don't take no chances with him; he won't throw down his gun if we git him surrounded."

"We'll be lucky if we see him first," Pete Hoffman remarked. "He'll lay out in the brush or behind a clump of rocks and pick us off if he can."

"Yeh," Ty agreed, "That's what we got to look out for."

They spread out as they moved away from the fence, riding slowly and scrutinizing every outcropping and likely-looking spot for an ambush, before they approached it.

OFF TO his right, Rocky could see the Blue Rock stretching away to the horizon. A blanket of hot air lay over it, shimmering in the glare of the sun and rising and falling sluggishly, like an oily sea on a calm afternoon.

He jerked his attention away from it quickly and riveted it on the slope ahead. With his rifle resting lightly in the crook of his left arm, he touched his horse with his heels and drew abreast of the others.

They covered three miles or more in that fashion, uphill and down without seeing anything of Indian Joe. Another low crest intervened. They topped it, and at the bottom came to a narrow, dusty hill-road. Ty held up his hand and they stopped.

"We better have a little parley," he declared. "We've come quite a piece. That Injun may still be ahead of us, or he may have been cute enough to turn back to the railroad, after all, and he's hoofing it up the tracks.... What do you think, Dade?"

"I thought your first guess was the right one, Ty. I believe Joe's heading for the Reservation. He wouldn't wander out into the desert."

Pete Hoffman nodded his agreement with this. Rocky had no opinion to offer. "But this road," he said. "Where does it go?"

"In the direction yo're lookin', it runs into the Spanish Ranch road," Roberts informed him.

"I didn't see it cutting in, when Frank and I went out to the Blue Rock last Sunday."

"Wal, it does—bout a mile east of the house. It's faint in places. Hardpan. It's what we call Twigg's road. He's the only one uses it." Ty was studying the road as he spoke. "A team and wagon passed along here since sunup. Twigg, or young George, must have lit out early for town."

He got down heavily.

"You boys wait up here a bit and I'll walk ahead a few yards. If Joe's usin' the road, he's left some sign."

He was gone only a few minutes.

"Couldn't find a thing," he announced, on his return. "We'll stick to the road as far as Twigg's place. Keep yore eyes peeled; that Injun may have cut across, somewheres ahead."

They went on, but for less than half-a-mile, when Dade Hollister reined up sharpy and pointed to the dust.
“What do you make of that?” he asked Ty.

“They’re fresh prints, boys!” Roberts was elated. “We guessed right this time!”

Swinging around a bend, a comparatively long stretch of road opened before them. Over it came a wildly driven horse. A woman was in the saddle, riding astride, her skirts flapping about her knees. In her arms, she clutched a child of eight or nine.

Though it could hardly have been anyone else, Roberts waited until he recognized her.

“Good Lord!” he groaned. “That’s Elvira Twigg! She wouldn’t be ridin’ that way if there wasn’t somethin’ wrong!”

The others exchanged a glance and were of one mind as to what had happened. Rocky put it into words.

“Injun Joe!” he said, his voice hard and flat.

“It wasn’t necessary to say any more.

In A matter of seconds, Ty was questioning the frantic woman. He found her so distraught she could barely speak.

“Joe, Bucktoe, Vira?” he inquired, trying to help her out.

“Ts,” she sobbed. “He killed George, Mr. Roberts, right before my eyes! How could he have done it? How could he? We never did anything but befriend Joe. Even after he quit working for us, he was always welcome. The only reason we let him go was because we just couldn’t afford to keep him on any longer. We thought he understood, and now he’s come and killed George.”

Her grief overcame her and she couldn’t go on. The little girl in her arms was crying wildly. Ty tried to comfort the child, but she drew away from him and clutched her mother all the tighter.

“Vira—when did this happen?” If Ty sounded stern it was because he knew no better way to proceed.

“’Bout forty minutes ago,” Mrs. Twigg got out chokingly. “No more’n that, Mr. Roberts.... You mustn’t carry on like that Phoebe,” she told the little girl. “This is Mr. Roberts, the sheriff. He’ll take Joe away.”

“Now, if you’ll tell me just what happened, Vira, I’ll be able to proceed,” Ty declared brusquely. “I don’t want to hear down on you, but you’ve got to pull yourself together for a minute.”

It had the desired effect.

“Why, that Joe crept up behind the woodpile,” Mrs. Twigg explained. “I was in the kitchen, peeling potatoes. Through the window, I could see George coming up from the barn. There was a shot, and he went down. Joe straightened up, holding a rifle. Not a word had passed between them. No quarrel, no nothing; it was just murder.”

The wretched woman had to pause and steel herself before she could continue.

“Joe saw me at the window and started to run to the house. We’ve always kept a loaded shotgun in the kitchen. I got it and emptied both barrels at him. I stung him, but I couldn’t have hurt him much, ’cause he turned and hustled back to the woodpile. He began shooting at me. A couple bullets came through the window. I made the baby lay on the floor. Ever so often I’d shove the shotgun over the sill and pull the trigger. I knew I couldn’t hold him off with a shotgun for long, but I had to do something.”

The courage of this thin, sharp-featured woman, with her scrappy blonde hair and the marks of hard work stamped on her roughened hands and bony shoulders, won Rocky’s admiration. He knew something about the hopelessness and grinding poverty that tell to the lot of a woman on a small, back country hay ranch. Money was so hard to come by, that to make a precious dollar, it was no wonder they often fed a hard-pressed stranger and then forgot to tell the sheriff.

HOW MRS. Twigg had managed to reach a horse and escape unharmed puzzled Rocky. Ty got around to asking her, presently “George’s horse was standing at the hitch rack at the side of the house,” she replied. “It was out of the line of fire from the woodpile. I thought if I could get through an open window on that side, with the baby, I could mount and make a run for it. That’s what I did. I stuck the shotgun out again and fired. Joe began banging away once more. Quick as I could, I crawled through a window and got in the saddle. I pulled Phoebe up with me and lit out fast.”

Ty complimented her on using her head. And then: “Young George is in town, I take it.”

“He left home about four o’clock this morning. And that’s another thing; I was afraid he’d drive up this evening, not knowing anything was wrong, and Joe would kill him, too.”

“You don’t have to worry about that now, Vira,” said Ty. “We’ll stop him at the Spanish Ranch. I want you to go to the ranch. Mrs. Warren will take you in. Stay there till we show up. Understand?”

“Yes—”

“Then git movin’, Vira. We’ll take care of Joe Bucktoe,” he promised.

Rocky swung up alongside of Ty as Mrs. Twigg drew away.

“You figure that Injun is still at her place?”

“Most likely. He was hired man there; he’s boss now. That’ll hold him a while. When he gits through pickin’ up what he wants, he may burn the house. We’ll know directly. It ain’t over a couple miles to Twiggs’. What wind there is is blowin’ in the other direction, or we’d have heard the shootin’.”

He held them back a moment while he considered what course to pursue with Bucktoe.

“That’ll be best,” he muttered, confirming the decision he had reached. “Stony Crick flows across the road. There ain’t more’n a trickle of water in it, this time of the year. But the crick bed is there. We’ll go up it. That’ll put us a hundred yards or so behind the barn. When we git that far, we’ll figure our next move.”

They reached the creek without incident and found it so low that what water there was had settled in the deeper pools, leaving stretches of dry sand in between. Through the fringe of willows that screened the stream, they could see the forlorn-looking little house and the small barn, the latter even more down-at-the-heel than the house, a side board or two missing and the warped, sun-baked shingles seemingly ready to be scattered by the first severe storm that struck them.

Ty led the way, moving cautiously and repeatedly warning the others to do the same. Rocky saw him raise a hand and point to the rear of the house. The woodpile could be seen now. Something lay on the ground between it and the barn. Knowing what to look for, there was no mistaking it for what it was, even at that distance.

Rocky heard Dade Hollister say, “That’s him.” And Pete Hoffman said, “His old woman won’t have to sew no more patches on his pants.”

HEY continued up the creek until they were behind the barn.

“He ain’t spotted us yet,” said Ty; “we’d have drawn a shot before this if he had.”

“If he’s still here, you mean,” Pete observed.

“He’s awful quiet if he’s in there,” said Dade. “I don’t know whether George kept a bottle in the house or not. If he did, it’s a cinch Joe found it; he may be stretched out on the floor, dead drunk.

Roberts shook his head. “No bottle ever held whisky enough to lay him out.”

Rocky was silent. The sheriff glanced at him inquiringly. “You’re doing the dealing, Ty.”

Roberts nodded appreciatively. “We’ll settle this in a hurry.”

Raising his rifle, he fired a shot in the air. It brought a vicious response; inside the house a rifle cracked on one side and then the other. A third shot came from the rear kitchen window. A growl of satisfaction escaped Ty.

"He's hoppin' around in there like a jack-rabbit! All we got to do now is dig him out of his hole."

"No trick to that," Pete Hoffman declared rashly, "We can leave the broncs here and walk right up to the barn. If we get down on our bellies, we can crawl the rest of the way to the woodpile."

Ty shook his head. Rocky didn't wait for him to voice an objection; he had something of his own to say now. "That doesn't make sense to me, Pete. Suppose we get as close in as the woodpile. We'll be hung up there, without so much as a blade of grass between us and the house, while the fourth man forted up in the barn and covered the rear, we'd gradually wear him down; he couldn't be in four places at once."

"That's as safe a way as any," Rocky conceded, "but it'll be slow work." He shaded his eyes and glanced at the sun. "We haven't too much daylight left. If we didn't wind it up before night our gun-flashes would give him something to shoot at."

"You got somethin' better to suggest?" Ty demanded, a little crusty now.

"Not better but quicker," said Rocky. "If the three of you get into the barn and throw lead into the kitchen, I'll go back down the creek and get around in front of the place. It must be three hundred yards from the creek bottom to the front door: That'll give me room enough to throw the prod into my horse and really get moving. When I flash past the house, I'll leap off and try to hit the door. There's no porch or steps to get in my way. If you keep the Injun busy, it'll give me a few seconds to pull myself together before I burst in on him."

"No, no, I won't let you take that chance!" Ty objected. "But I admire yore guts in offerin' to play it that way, Rocky."

Dade and Pete nodded, and Dade said, "Reckon you've got the nerve to get away with it, at that."

Rocky smiled grimly. "If I didn't think I could get away with it, I wouldn't mention it."

"Maybe Joe will be obliging enough to make a run for it and save us the trouble of going in to get him," Dade remarked. He wasn't speaking facetiously but his tone indicated how little hope he entertained that Bucktoe would try to break away.

ANOTHER shot came from the house, from the front this time, and then several more from a window that overlooked the creek.

"Still tryin' to locate us," Ty growled. "I'm goin' up to the barn; you wait here."

The three men watched him as he moved away with a determined stride and saw him reach the barn and try to squeeze through an opening a missing board had left.

Ty couldn't make it and had to pry off another board before he got through. Once inside, he walked across the dirt floor and studied the house briefly through a crack. At greater length, he carefully scanned the flat, hoping to find a shallow ditch or other break in the flinty surface that would offer a man at least some cover.

He found nothing that would serve the purpose. " Ain't even a gopher hole out there!" he muttered.

His eyes narrowed grimly as they came back to the stiff, grotesque shape of George Twigg. "Too bad!" thought Ty. "Thank Gawd, Elvira's got young George to look out for her and the little girl."

He glanced around him at the contents of the barn. There were the usual odds and ends of harness and tools, the parts of a mowing machine that Trigg had been repairing, and the wheels and running gear of a wagon, on which a rack could be placed, when hay was being harvested. Ty tried to find a box for the wagon, and failed. Once, in Quinn Valley, he and a posse had loaded a wagon with bagged sand and pushed it up against a cabin, in which a killer was making his stand, and taken the man out without firing a shot.
Ty took a minute to think things over; he didn't often reverse himself, but this situation left him no choice. By the time he reached the creek, his mind was made up. Without preamble, he said, "Rocky, you still ready to go after that Injun?"
"Sure," Rocky answered, without hesitation.
"Wal, you know the chances yo're takin', I ain't askin' you to put yerself on the spot, you understand; if I wasn't stumped; I wouldn't even consider lettin' you go. That flat's as smooth as a billiard table; not a crack in it." The sheriff shook his head soberly. "There's one dead man out there already; I don't have to tell you to be careful."
Rocky nodded and said, "I'll be all right. Give me about fifteen minutes to get down the creek. In the meantime, the three of you get inside the barn and throw a shot or two at the back window. When I hear you open up full blast, I'll make my break. A rifle won't be any use to me; let me have your .44."
"Just a minute," Pete Hoffman protested. "No reason why you should take this on yourself. Suppose we draw straws. Whoever gets the short one will be the man to go."
Ty promptly vetoed the suggestion. "I thought of that. It's got to be Rocky, or no-one; I'm too old to git away with it, and so are you and Dade. I didn't use to think anything of leapin' off a runnin' hoss. If I saw I wasn't goin' to land on my feet, I'd throw myself into a roll and come up with nothin' worse than a skinned shoul-der... You don't do those things after you've passed fifty."
That ended it. Ty handed Rocky his gun; the latter broke it open and tried the trigger action. After taking up another notch on the cinch straps, he mounted and began picking his way down the creek bed.
He was on his own now. When rifles cracked in the barn, he didn't tighten up.
"This won't be too tough," he told himself. "If I hit that door just right, I'll be inside and have it over with in a hurry."

WHEN HE had gone far enough to gain an angle on which to race across the flat without exposing himself unnecessarily to gurfire from the side of the house, he began looking for a break in the 'ringle of willows. He found such a spot. Screened there, he waited there several minutes. The cracking of rifles in the barn began to swell to a steady tattoo. Answering shots came from the kitchen.

This was the moment. Heeling his horse, Rocky broke into the open and lifted it into a driving gallop. Flattened out on the animal's neck, he reached the front of the house without drawing a shot. His timing was perfect, and when he leaped he landed on his feet, only to crash against the door with impact enough to snap the latch. He tried to save himself, but he was only pawing the air, and when he hit the floor, he was halfway across the front room.

In the moment that he lay there, he knew he was hurt. There was agony in his left shoulder, and a knifing pain in his ribs.
The connecting door to the rear stood ajar. It was flung open with a bang. Joe Bucktoe stood there, Gobbling like a turkey, he half-raised his rifle and fired.
Rocky was on his knees. The slug screamed past his head and ploughed into the wall. He squeezed the trigger of the .44 again and again. The rifle slipped from the Indian's fingers and he tried to keep himself erect by clutching the door frame. Life had gone out of him, however, and he crumpled to the floor.
Rocky was still on his knees, when Ty burst in. The sheriff's quick glance ran from the riddled body of the Indian to Rocky.
"You fetched him!" he exclaimed. "I knew you would! And you—you all right?"
"I'm still all in one piece, but I suspect I cracked a rib. My left shoulder is all fouled up, too; I hit the door so hard the bolt snapped and I busted in here like I was shot out of a cannon... Help me to get up, Ty. Don't touch that left side!"
Dade and Pete came in in time to hear his story of what had happened. He was in great pain and couldn’t conceal the fact.

“It wouldn’t do any good for me to have a look at your shoulder,” said Ty. “The thing to do is to git you back to the Spanish Ranch and let Doc Wingaard go over you. Do you think you can ride?”

“I can ride, if you boys will set me in the saddle.”

“We’ll do that.” Ty turned to Dade. “You and Pete catch up his bronc, and I’ll git started back with him. I want the two of you to stick around until I can git the coroner and Chet Purdy out here. That ought to be about midnight. Locate a blanket and cover up George.” He jerked his head to indicate Joe Bucktoe. “You can leave this fellow right where he is. Thanks to Rocky, we’re all breathin’ regular. We can count ourselves lucky, I reckon.”

“I should think so,” said Rita. “We’ll keep him here tonight, of course.”

Wingaard advised against it. He explained why. “I fought for years for a county hospital. Now that we have one, I want my patients to have the benefit of its advantages—not that I’ll keep this boy there long. If you’ll supply a rig, I’ll get him into town.”

“Gladly,” Rita assured him. “I’ll have Press hitch the surrey.” She smiled at Rocky. “We’ll send you in state.”

After doing what he could for Stub and Lonnie, the two Negro lads, who had been attacked by the Indian, Wingaard had them taken to Boulder City.

“I know you’re anxious about Stub, Mrs. Warren,” he said. “I’ll send word back by Press. But don’t expect too much; he’s got a fighting chance; that’s all.”

Old Posie came to the door and spoke to the sheriff. Young George Twigg had just been stopped as he was passing the house.

“I’ll talk to him,” said Ty. He turned to Rita. Mrs. Warren, is it going to inconvenience you to take the three of ‘em in for the night?”

“Not at all,” she told him. “I’m more than willing to do all I can. I don’t suppose they have any money for the funeral.”

“They ain’t likely to have. Of course, there’s alway the County—” Rita shook her head. “I don’t want that. You tell young George I’ll help them out. In a way, I feel responsible.”

“No reason why you should,” said Ty. “But it’s decent of you—awful decent, Mrs. Warren, to offer to help them.”

When he stepped out, Wingaard left with him.

RITA WALKED over to Rocky and sat down on the bed. “You were as good as your word,” she said tenderly, her hand cool on his forehead.

He gazed at her for a long moment, his pains and aches temporarily forgotten. “I don’t get you,” he murmured.
“The other evening—what you said to Frank, and me. You remember about giving a good account of yourself if the chips were down and there was gunsmoke at the end of it. I believe I’m quoting you.”

Rocky grinned. “I say a lot of things, Rita. You can believe me, when I say I admire the way you handled yourself today. No going to pieces, for you.”

“You don’t know how close I was to it,” she said. “I looked up the road a thousand times this afternoon, when I thought it was time for you to be returning, and you didn’t come…I didn’t want anything to happen to you.”

She bent down suddenly and brushed his cheek with her lips. His good right arm caught her and held her close.

“Please—” she whispered. “I shouldn’t have done that. I—I’m still bewildered, I guess.”

“So am I,” he said, with sudden fire. “I can’t believe this has happened to me.”

He turned her face and his lips found her mouth.

EXT morni ng, propped up in his hospital bed and resting comfortably, Rocky was promptly made aware of the new esteem in which he was held. Don Pierce, the editor of the Mercury, was his first visitor. In the course of his interview, he said that everyone in Boulder City was singing Rocky’s praises.

This was a slight overstatement, for across town at the moment, as he sat at breakfast with Tony and his wife, Charlie Oatman was registering a demurrer.

“You can’t deny that he’s got nerve, Father,” Tony insisted.

“Oh, sure, he’s got nerve,” Oatman conceded. “No question about that. Roberts was there, on the spot; he could have handled the situation. Jeanette saw his chance to make a grandstand play, and he took advantage of it. I suppose you women will be falling all over him now.”

Celia Oatman laughed. “Charles, you give up hard. Rocky can have anything he wants in a business way, in this town now. If you’re half as shrewd as I’ve always believed you to be, you won’t try to hold out against him.”

Scowling to himself, Oatman went down to the bank. Why hadn’t Indian Joe Bucktoe taken careful aim? According to the story being told of what had happened at the Twiggs’, he had had Rocky at his mercy for a moment. A shot in the right place would have done the trick.

It would have made everything all right for me, was Charlie’s brooding thought. Now, he’s on top of the heap and I’ll never be rid of him.

Tony went to the hospital, just before eleven. She had convinced herself that it was foolish to be piqued with Rocky; after all, they had never been anything more than good friends.

I won’t be juvenile about it, she thought. It isn’t as though I were in love with him.

Rocky was happy to see her. He couldn’t understand why he always got a lift out of her and found himself regretting certain things he had done and which were now long past any undoing.

Tony had been there only a few minutes, when Mrs. Warren arrived. Rocky caught the icy sweetness with which they greeted each other. Rita’s attitude toward him was possessive, and intentionally so; he listened as they talked and could feel Tony drawing back into her shell.

Beneath his smiling mask Rocky regarded them with the same keen interest with which a gambler studies his cards. Tony had a drag for him that he couldn’t deny. But Rita, wealthy, beautiful and willing, had everything a man could want in a woman. There wasn’t any doubt in his mind as to the course he would take. Rita was his golden opportunity; she would solve all his problems. He was eager to embrace it, and reluctant, too. It puzzled him. He gave up trying to understand it; for once, he'd play it smart.

"I'll make sure of it now, he thought. This is where the road forks. It'll be better if Tony understands it."

He didn't want to hurt her. With what he thought was great subtlety, he began turning a conversation over to Rita, first about Stub's condition and then on to her horses and Hannibal's chances at Denver. Rita obliged with a neat assist.

On the matter of her horses, she had a great deal to say. "When you see the Warren colors go to the post, you can be sure the stable is betting. Rocky. I know what Hannibal will have to face in Denver. I expect him to have a rather easy time of it. Why don't you come down? You can spare a few days."

"I'm going to be busy—"

"So you are," she cut in. "I forgot."

Tony knew she was being left out, and not by accident; she was infuriated but dissembled it perfectly. "I'm afraid I can't talk thoroughbreds with you—having had so little experience with them," she spoke up.

"You're not going already," Rita inquired, as Tony arose.

"I hate to tear myself away, but I have some work laid out for today," Tony gave Rocky an enigmatic smile. "I'm sure you won't be neglected."

"I'll see you again, Tony?"

"Naturally—if I can crowd in," she said lightly.

She was gone, then, and he only half-heard the compliment Rita paid her.

I don't know what I'm worrying about, he thought. This is the way I wanted it—exactly what I asked for.

THE ROUTINE of the day set a pattern for those that followed. Rita came every day. On Sunday, Tony visited him. To make sure he wouldn't construe it as anything personal, she came with Jinnie Evans and another girl.

Sunday evening brought Grimwood back to Boulder City. The Mercury had gone its best by Rocky and the late and un lamented Joe Bucktoe. Frank had read every line, while in Cheyenne. As a result, he went directly from the train to the hospital.

"I knew I'd find you here," he declared as he shook Rocky's hand. "According to what I've been reading, you had a close call."

"Not too close, Frank. Doc's going to let me get out of here on Tuesday. How did things go in Cheyenne?"

"Fine! I had to take a quarter-section—a hundred and sixty acres but I got it for two-and-a-half an acre."

"That's swell," Rocky told him. "I was getting worried; it was taking you so long... What's the next step?"

"The land will have to be surveyed. That's going to let the cat out of the bag, I'm afraid. Everybody will put two and two together."

"Well, let 'em," said Rocky. "You've got the deal sewed up. Nothing could go wrong with the deed, eh?"

"Not now. The money's been passed. The State Land Office will have a surveyor up here this coming week. I can have the incorporation papers ready for filing before then. I'll have to make another quick trip to Cheyenne."

"That end of it is up to you," Rocky declared. "Instead of waiting for the story to leak out, we'll touch it off ourselves, and with a bang. What's happened while you were away, Frank, hasn't hurt us a bit; it'll sell some stock for us."

Grimwood frowned. "I don't like to look at it that way, but I imagine it's true... Have you seen Tony?"

"Yeh, she's dropped in a couple times. She told me this afternoon that she'd just put the finishing touches on that painting she went out to the Taylors to do. You know, the one she's going to call The Cross Pull? I'm anxious to see it."

"So am I," said Frank. "I haven't had anything to eat. I didn't even stop to clean up before I came over. I'll get some supper. I want to see Tony for a few minutes. If it's all right with you, I'll come back then and we can talk business as late as you please... Those two colored boys still in the hospital?"

"Stub's still here. Doc says he's out of danger. Rita took the other boy back to the ranch yesterday. It'll be all right for us to sit here and talk tonight."

TONY WAS on the porch with her mother, when Frank came up the walk.

"You're back, finally, she said. "How are things in Cheyenne?"

She was hoping to keep the conversation from centering around Rocky, but before Grimwood had time to speak at any length of his trip, Mrs. Oatman broke in.

"We've had some excitement at home, while you were away, Frank. Rocky—"

"I know," he informed her. "I read all about it in Cheyenne. When I got off the train, I went over to the hospital at once and had a chat with him. I gather that he's getting a little weary of talking about it."

"I imagine he is," said Tony. "I know I'm getting fed up with just listening to the story. We haven't had anything else to talk about since last Thursday."

Grimwood didn't stay long. He mentioned that he had promised to return to the hospital and spend an hour with Rocky.

Tony walked to the gate with him, her hand in his. "I missed you," he said, enormously sober. "Of course, that isn't news. But I'll have some news for you in a day or two. Big news. I know it will please you."

She looked up and searched his eyes in the moonlight, trying to find a clue. "Am I permitted to guess, Frank?"

"No, I don't want you to guess, Tony; I want it to come as a surprise. If it goes my way it'll mean a great deal to the two of us."

BACK AT the hospital, he found Rocky busy with paper and pencil. Several sheets from the pad had been torn off and were spread over the bed.

"What are you up to now?" Frank asked. "Not computing profits already, I hope."

"I'm trying to find a name for the company. How does this one sound? The Blue Rock Oil and Development Company... Here, take a look at it."

He handed Grimwood the sheet of paper on which he had printed the words. The latter tried the name aloud.

"Sounds all right," he said. "but the 'development' part of it takes in a lot of territory. It sort of has a get-rich-quick ring. It might scare somebody off; just the Blue Rock Oil Company would be more solid."

"May be you're right," Rocky agreed, after thinking it over. "We don't want to bite off more than we can chew."

He was unfamiliar with the legal details of incorporating the company. He knew officers had to be named. When that matter came up he insisted that Grimwood put himself down for president.

"This was your baby from the start, Frank, and you can front for it better than I can. Being vice-president will satisfy me. What are we going to do about a secretary and treasurer?"

"I did some thinking about it, while I was away," Grimwood replied. "The combination office has to be held by a stockholder. If necessary, I could arrange to have my stenographer put up money enough to buy a share or two. That would comply with the law, but what we really need. Rocky, is a third man to come in with us. I mean someone whose name and cooperation would help us to put the proposition over. If he didn't come in for more than five hundred or a thousand dollars it would be enough. To get him interested, we could afford to give him some stock as a bonus."

"I don't know," Rocky demurred. "We don't want to split this up so we'll lose control of the company."

"We'll vote ourselves enough stock to make sure that doesn't happen. Don't forget that we've got to raise fifty thousand."

"You've got somebody in mind?"

"Louie Abramson... Don't laugh, Rocky. Louie's shrewd and knows how to squeeze a dollar, but he's a born gambler. I know; I've been taken care of his legal work for over a year. I believe if we get him over here tomorrow morning, we can do business with him. The addition he's going to build for the store won't tie him up; Louie's got plenty money."

Rocky began to like the idea. "Louie's a smart cookie," he observed. "Nobody's ever seen him throwing his money away. His name on our letterheads ought to convince people that the Blue Rock Oil Company is a good investment...You get Louie over here in the morning. We'll be spending hundreds of dollars for grub, when we get going. We can throw that business to his grocery department."

"That'll sound good to Louie," said Frank.

They talked for over an hour. The only reference Rocky made to his real estate and insurance business was to suggest that his office wouldn't do as the headquarters of the oil company.

"There's plenty of space, but we need something on the ground floor. We better rent that vacant storeroom across from the Bon Ton. We'll have some signs made to put in the window, with a display of specimens of rock and fossils from Mustard Valley. You'll know what to put in. We'll make this the biggest thing that ever hit Boulder. City." He nodded approvingly at the picture he had conjured up in his mind. "It won't be long before the money will be rolling in."

Grimwood smiled at his partner's enthusiasm, but when he spoke it was to utter a word of caution.

"We want to be careful not to get ahead of ourselves. Commitments are all we can take for the present; no money. Rocky, until the incorporation papers have been granted."

It was the first warning he had ever given Rocky. The latter shrugged it off and said, "Sure!"

NEXT MORNING, Rita had come and gone before Grimwood arrived at the hospital with Louie. It was almost noon. Louie was apologetic. "I couldn't get away any sooner, Rocky. You know how it is on Monday, at the store...I don't know why I'm here. What you fellas got up your sleeve?"

That opened the doors, and Rocky and Grimwood proceeded to lay their proposition before him. Selling him the idea was not too difficult. Louie's father had come to Boulder City with a pack on his back and had tramped the roads from ranch to ranch for several years, selling notions and jewelry, before his little business warranted the purchase of a horse and wagon. A little store in town had followed. Long before Louie was out of short pants, his father had him behind the counter; Louie had come a long way since those days, and so had the little frame store.

"I'll kick in for a thousand bucks," he told Rocky and Grimwood. "How can I lose? We'll have a crew of freighters and oil well men out there, eating their heads off and wearing out gloves and overalls, all bought at the Bon Ton. Grain will be needed for the horses, and rough timber and dressed lumber for the shacks and the derrick." Louie laughed heartily.

"That means more business for me. I'll be even up if all we get out of the well is a little wind."

Though he laughed oftener than most men, he knew how to be serious. He proved it as the conference continued.

"Mrs. Warren is right," he said, commenting on what Rita had told Rocky about selling the venture as a gamble. "Don't try to sell anybody that it's a sure thing; if a man can't afford to lose, tell him to stay out. There'll be plenty who'll take a chance. If the well comes in, a few hundred invested will make a man rich. I don't know why there shouldn't be oil in Wyoming. There's everything else."

"I know we won't bring in a dry well," Grimwood said confidently. "Of course, you never know about oil until you've got it. That'll have to be our story."

"How are you going to break the news?" Louie inquired. "You going to call Don Pierce in and let him play it up in the paper?"

"We may have to handle it that way," said Rocky. "That's if this surveyor shows up before Thursday. Otherwise, I'm for springing it at the club luncheon. Everybody will be there, and it'll get a great send-off. Don will have time to make his Thursday evening edition with the story."

"That sounds swell to me," Louie declared, with hearty approval. "Charlie Oatman is this week's chairman. He cuts a lot of ice in this town, and especially with Joe Evans and Hank Taylor and that crowd. Get Oatman interested and the rest will be easy.

Grimwood registered an emphatic no. "You're barking up the wrong tree," he said flatly. "You can forget about Charlie Oatman right now. He'll turn thumbs down on this proposition the moment he hears about it."

"Oh, I don't know about that," Rocky countered.

"Well, I know," Frank insisted. "Just to tell him there may be oil on the Blue Rock makes him see red. He's had me in a couple times and begged me to forget about what he calls 'my oil nonsense'. The last time he had me in, he hinted that he might have to take the bank's business away from me if I didn't give up my rainbow chasing. That's very likely to happen now."

He saw Rocky scowling. "I told you a long time ago that Charlie Oatman would walk away from this thing, didn't I?"

"You did," Rocky admitted. "I still believe he can be persuaded to change his mind. I'm certainly going to have a talk with him. As far as your losing the bank's legal work, Frank, don't worry about it; I'll guarantee you won't lose it. I'll be out of here tomorrow. In the meantime, you get busy with the papers. And you keep everything under your hat for the present, Louie. If anything comes up and we want to get together in a hurry, we can meet in my office or in Frank's."

SOMETHING came up on Tuesday, only it didn't originate with them. Oscar Biberman, the Assemblyman for the Boulder City district, was in Cheyenne, and with an eye on his re-election, made it a practice to send out letters to his prominent constituents. Having found out that Grimwood was purchasing a quarter-section of State land, in Mustard Valley, he had sat down and conveyed the information to Charlie Oatman, writing that he was glad to hear there was to be some activity out there. Charlie knew exactly what it meant, and he sent for Frank at once and confronted him with what he had learned.

"I've told you several times, Frank, to forget this nonsense, but evidently you don't propose to take my advice." Oatman made no effort to conceal his perturbation. "Why you, a brilliant young lawyer, just getting yourself established, should endanger your practice by such folly is beyond me. Before people go to a lawyer, the one thing they want to know is that he's got his feet on the ground and not inclined to go off half-cocked on such stuff as this. Before you took this step, why didn't you come to me?"

"Frankly, because I knew how you felt about what you call my nonsense. There's oil out there, Charlie; I know it." Grimwood was trying to be patient with him. He didn't intend to back down however. "It could be the making of Boulder City and all of us."

"Hunh!" Oatman snorted sarcastically. "Just try to get people to believe it."

In his anger, he longed to tell Grimwood that he could forget this oil well business once and for all or consider himself no longer the First National's legal counsel. But he had only to think of Tony to realize that he didn't dare to issue such an ultimatum as that. Where she was concerned, Frank Grimwood was his best defense against Rocky Jeanette; break with Frank, and there was no telling what might happen.

"Somebody's been encouraging you, Frank," he snapped. "Who is it? Jeanette?"

"Rocky's interested," Frank acknowledged.

"I knew it!" Oatman banged his desk with his fist for greater emphasis. "I suppose he's filled you full of hot air about organizing a company to put down a well! Is that it?"

His tone suggested that he had caught a small boy with his finger in the jam pot. Grimwood met it with a mirthless smile.

"I prefer," he said pointedly, "to have Rocky answer that question for himself. But I can tell you, Charlie: I'm not dropping this oil matter. I'm indebted to you for many favors; I hope never to forget it. On the other hand, I have too much faith in Mustard Valley to turn my back on it. I know I'd always regret it if I did."

Oatman nodded. "If that's the way you feel, it doesn't leave anything further to be said."

On leaving the bank Grimwood went to Rocky's office at once and acquainted him with the situation. Rocky refused to get excited. "I'll drop in and have a talk with him," he said. "The sooner the better, I guess. The bank's closed but he'll be there."

Frank shook his head pessimistically. "You might just as well save your breath. Our guns are spiked as far as he's concerned."

"Not my guns," said Rocky. His gray eyes were frosty as he reached for his hat. "Charlie Oatman will listen to me."

NWARDLY seething, Charlie Oatman sat alone in the bank, his thoughts running in circles. Not knowing how far Frank and Rocky had gone with their plans, he imagined the worst. What he could do about it, he didn't know; his hands were tied as far as Frank Grimwood was concerned; and when it came to Rocky, his sense of frustration was so complete that he could only wince and shake his head at the hopelessness of what he saw before him.

"It was a long time coming," he told himself, "but I knew the crook in him would show up. He's just using Frank; the whole thing is a trick so he can get his hands on some easy money."

A cold chill ran down his spine, when it occurred to him that, sooner or later, he would be asked to contribute to this swindle.

"I won't have any choice about it, he thought. He'll tighten the screws and force me to buy his worthless stock. When he's got me loaded up, he'll publicize it and use it as his best argument to get a hundred others to hand over their money."

He was at the point of leaving the bank for Rocky's office, when he saw the latter approaching the door. He let him in at once.

"I figured we better have a little talk," said Rocky. "I just left Frank; he told me what you'd had to say."

"Then it won't be necessary for me to repeat it to you," Oatman snapped, leading the way to his desk. "I knew you were a crook, Jeanette, and I expected you to pull something like this. Take it from me, you won't get away with this swindle."

"That's pretty strong talk," Rocky returned easily, making himself comfortable in a chair. "Call this oil well proposition a gamble, and I'll agree with you; but there's no swindle about it."

"Don't try to tell me anything of the sort," Charlie whipped out. "Frank Grimwood trusts you implicitly; you can null the wool over his eyes, but you can't do it with me. You'll get your hands on the money that's in for stock and fly the coop."

Rocky's laugh had a distinctly unpleasant edge. "You're putting ideas in my head, Charlie. If I played it that way it would be right up your alley, wouldn't it?"

"No," Oatman replied, shaking his head slowly, "I've had that out with myself. As much as I'd like to see the last of you, I'm not helping you to get away with this scheme. You're not so smart I can't keep a step ahead of you. It isn't only the stock you hope to shove off on me that you're counting on; I'm to be the decoy to bring the other suckers in. I won't stand for it, Jeanette, no matter what it costs me. You crack your whip, and I’ll crack mine.”

Rocky began to realize that swinging him into line was going to be more difficult than he had anticipated. “You can upset the apple-cart if you don’t mind paying the price. It’ll be stiff. This deal is on the level. You like to talk about what you’ve done for this town. If we bring in oil, Boulder City will really be put on the map. It’ll make millionaires of you and me and a lot of others. Louie Abramson is in with us, and so is Mrs. Warren. They’re not crazy. From the first time Frank mentioned it, you’ve taken the pig-headed stand that there couldn’t be oil in the Blue Rock. You don’t know anything about it; it may turn out to be one of the richest fields in the country.”

He paused to regard Oatman with a pitying glance. “I got my heart set on this proposition,” he said thinly. “Believe me, Charlie, if you do anything to kill it, I’ll go to the mat with you. If you figure it’s worth your while to throw everything away, just to stop me, go to it.”

OATMAN sat there, his face drawn and his eyes never still. Throwing the names of Louie Abramson and Rita Warren at him had had a very sobering effect. They were two of the First National’s biggest depositors.

“What do you mean, telling me Louie and Mrs. Warren are in this thing with you?”

“Just that. Louie is the secretary and treasurer of the company. Mrs. Warren is taking a couple thousand dollars worth of stock. They know it’s a gamble. That’s the way we’re going to sell the deal; no big promises. Whoever comes in, comes in with his eyes open.”

Without being interrupted, he talked for fifteen minutes. Gradually, he saw Charlie Oatman’s stubborn resistance fade. Louie Abramson was to handle the money. That fact weighed heavily with Oatman; Louie could be trusted.

“Am I to understand that nothing is to be said about this business until the meeting, Thursday noon?” he asked.

“Unless this surveyor and his rodman show up before then, and it isn’t likely they will.” Rocky’s grin was working again. “I thought you’d appreciate the honor of being the one to break the news. You’re a good speaker. Whatever remarks you care to make will be all right with us. Naturally, we’d like to set things off with a bang.”

Oatman nodded woodenly. “I imagine I know what is required... How much do you expect me to put into the company?”

Rocky spread his hands and said, “That’s up to you.” He felt he could afford to be generous.

“Not over three or four thousand,” said Oatman. “That’s as strong as I can go.”

“Fine,” Rocky told him. “We’ll put this thing over the top in a couple weeks. I know this is your town, Charlie, and it’s mine, too. If we can pull together a little, it won’t be any flag-stop when we get through.”

Grimwood was waiting for him, when he got back to the office. Rocky was in high spirits.

“Everything’s okay. Oatman’s coming into three or four thousand, and he’s going to make the announcement and give us a boost at the club on Thursday.”

“You don’t mean it!” It was incredible to Grimwood. “How in heaven did you work it?”

Rocky answered with a characteristic shrug.

“I talked fast,” he said. “Charlie Oatman likes to huff and puff but if you stay with him, he can be handled. If that surveyor shows up before Thursday, I’ll run him out of town!”

IT HAPPENED that when Thursday noon came the formation of the Blue Rock Oil Company was still a closely guarded secret.

“No guest speaker today,” Louie Abramson informed Rocky, just before they sat down. "Ty asked Charlie how come, and Charlie told him he had an important announcement to make that was of such great local interest that he thought there wouldn't be time for a speaker. Sounds good, eh?"

"Sure does," Rocky agreed. "I'll pass the word along to Frank."

After the coffee was served, Oatman rapped for attention. "I believe that in the years to come, we'll look back on this meeting as a memorable occasion," he began. "Not so long ago, there wasn't a foot of paved street in Boulder City. There was a plank sidewalk on one side of Bridger Street, and it was the only one in town. The only street lights were at the bank corner. It was the regular thing for a bunch of cowboys to shoot them out every Saturday night. I'm not accusing anyone present of engaging in the practice."

He meant this to win a laugh and he was not disappointed. "The bank stood where it's located now," he continued. "It was a small sheet iron building, with a brick front, in those days. There wasn't a two-story building in town. Boulder City has come a long way since then. The changes have been great. There's no need to recount them; you are as familiar with them as I. But in view of the news I have for you today, I think I am justified in saying that what has been accomplished is only the beginning."

He went on to point out that if Boulder City was to continue to grow and its prosperity increase, they could not look to the cattle business to accomplish it. The range would not support more cattle than were on it now. The mines in the Dry Creek Mountains could not be expected to supply the added increment. Having pointed out those pertinent facts, he was ready to give his listeners the magic word "oil". Oil on the Blue Rock! In Mustard Valley!

A company was being formed. He named those behind it. The stock was to be offered at a dollar a share. Fifty thousand dollars had to be subscribed. He mentioned his own commitment for three thousand, and Rita Warren's subscription. After stressing the fact that the venture was a pure gamble, that no guarantees or glittering promises could be made, he proceeded to paint a glowing picture of what the discovery of oil would mean to each and everyone present. He urged them to get behind the company, to support it in every way possible.

"Not only as a matter of civic pride," said he. "If the company strikes oil, the returns will be tremendous. If they bring in a dry well, we won't get a penny back; it's win or lose all. Frank Grimwood is convinced there's oil in Mustard Valley. When a man will stick to his convictions the way he has, and not turned aside by the doubting Thomases—and I was one of them—and then finds evidence to support his claims, you've got to believe him. I want Frank to address you."

Grimwood told them what he found in the valley and used a scientific yardstick to substantiate his argument. His unquestionable sincerity carried conviction.

Rocky made a few remarks, but it was little Louie Abramson who got the laughter and the cheers. Before he sat down, Louie said: "Nobody's ever been able to follow me around by the money I've thrown away. If this thing is good enough for me, it oughta be good enough for you. I'm in for a thousand bucks. That speaks for itself, don't it? You boys get ready; I'll be around to see you."

Before the meeting adjourned, over half of fifty thousand had been subscribed.

I N THE MORNING, the partners rented the vacant storeroom for a month; Frank had lost no time in telling Tony the news. After the windows had been washed and the place cleaned up, they moved in a desk and chairs. Louie sent over the young man who made his display cards. Rocky told him what was wanted.

Don Pierce, the publisher of the Mercury, came in. "I see you're going right ahead," he observed. "When are you opening up for business?"

"We're open right now," Rocky replied. "We ain't turning down noone; officially, I guess it will be Monday before we open shop. We want about fifty copies of yesterday's paper, Don. We're going to put a display in the window. It won't hurt to paste yesterday's front-page on the glass."

During the day, a stream of well-wishers, many of them members of the Business Men's Club, dropped in. When five o'clock came, Grimwood suggested that they lock up.

"We're due at Tony's at seven. I've talked so much I'm hoarse."

He was the first of her guests to arrive. Rita and Rocky came together, in one of her carriages.

Mr. and Mrs. Oatman had gone to the hotel, leaving the house to Tony and her quests. Tony had herself well in hand and more than held her own with Rita.

Grimwood had never known her to be so vivacious; during the day another ten thousand had been subscribed, and she was delighted. Rocky noticed, too, and all through dinner he was aware of how often Frank got her attention. Nor did he miss the adroitness with which she managed to couple him with Rita. His ego was such that he refused to believe it was anything other than a game to make him understand how little he meant to her.

After dinner, they went back to Tony's comfortable log studio, at the rear of the spacious yard. Without ceremony she invited them to view The Cross Pull, Grimwood called it the best thing she had ever done. Rita was full of praise. It was Rocky, however, who was most impressed.

"It's wonderful," he declared, as he sat studying it. He shook his head at some secret thought. "The whole story's there, Tony. I'd like to own that picture; and I will some day if this oil thing comes through."

When the party broke up, Rocky left with Rita. Frank lingered for a few minutes with Tony.

"It was a grand evening," he said, proudly. "Rita really went for it. As for Rocky, I'm sure he enjoyed it."

Tony, rearranging the chairs, had her back to him. "I hope so," she said, her smile inscrutable.

A SURVEYOR arrived from Cheyenne on Saturday morning. Grimwood left for the desert with them within the hour. It was after midnight when they returned to town, and the partners did not get together until Sunday breakfast.

"Everything went all right," Frank replied to Rocky's question about what had been done. "I brought in a lot of junk for the window display. I'll go down to the store this morning and fix things up. You're going out to the ranch, I understand."

"Rita's expecting me," said Rocky. "She's leaving for Denver on the morning train."

"I don't know why I don't go with her," Frank spoke up. "We'll be company for each other as far as Cheyenne, I can make it. Marion will come down and finish typing the papers today if I ask her. About an hour's work."

"Do it, by all means," Rocky urged. "It's a long ride to Cheyenne. Rita will be glad to have you for company."

They talked as they ate. After breakfast Rocky walked around the corner to the livery barn to hire a team and rig and set off for the Spanish Ranch, where he arrived in time to catch the Sunday morning work-outs. Seated on the rail with Rita, they clocked the younger Warren horses as the exercise boys put them through their paces.

It was the beginning of a pleasant and exciting day for him. After touring the stables and visiting old Hamilcar, the sire of most of the Warren string, they returned to the house for lunch.

Rita was glad to learn that Frank would be on the train with her as far as Cheyenne. It occurred to her, however, that with the two of them away Rocky would be left with Tony. Though she realized that with the oil company in its formative stage his answer would have to be no, she urged him again to run down to Denver.

"There's nothing I'd like better," he told her, "but I can't get away now. We'll make it some other time."

She had to be content with that.
Rocky was at the depot to see her and Frank off, next morning. Early as it was, he went to the store as soon as the train had pulled out.

The promotion signs and the specimens Frank had brought in were in the window, attractively arranged.

Judge Bonfils was the first to drop in. He told Rocky to put him down for a modest five hundred dollars. He mentioned his brothers and asked if they had come in.

“We hooked Sam, Judge,” Rocky told him. “We’ll go after Lee and Bert if they ever hit town.”

The Judge laughed. “Maybe they’re staying away on purpose. About fifteen years ago, they let a lightning rod salesman sell them a set of rods for one of the barns. It burned down the next week, and they haven’t taken a chance on anything since.”

There were other visitors as the morning wore on, and there was an ever-changing group examining the display in the window. The subscription list continued to grow. Whether the request was for a few shares or many, Rocky was happy to receive it. The excitement of it took charge of him and he forgot all about his insurance business.

Louie Abramson popped in to see how things were going. Rocky showed him the list.

“We’re doing all right,” Louie declared. “I got a couple fellas lined up. I’ll bring them in later.”

He’d been gone only a few minutes, when Tony passed. She waved to him and would have gone on had he not called her in.

“You’re busy, Rocky. I can just feel the excitement in here. You haven’t any time for me, this morning.”

“I’ve always got time for you, Tony.” And then, quickly, “You seldom get down-town in the morning. How come this morning?”

“I’ve had wonderful news, Rocky. I’ve been commissioned to do two historical things for the Wyoming exhibit at the World’s Fair. I submitted the sketches months ago and just got word this morning. I rushed down to get off a letter of acceptance. Isn’t it grand?”

“It’s no more than you deserve.” His tone was sober; he meant what he was saying, for once. “A hundred years from now folks can look at your paintings and see what things were like around here in our time.”

Pop Singer, the town marshal, strolled in and sat down. He had been in once before. He continued to sit around after Tony left. He loved to talk, and he was apparently just killing time. Somehow, Rocky got the feeling that Pop was watching the door. Certainly his glance strayed that way every few seconds.

Rocky got busy and Pop walked out. He hadn’t been gone long before Ty Roberts came in. He sat around, too. He had a gun on his hip, and he usually didn’t, when he was in town.

Rocky began to tighten up. He could feel the alertness that lurked beneath Ty’s calm demeanor. Finally, Rocky couldn’t stand it any longer.

“What’s up?” he demanded. “Pop’s been in here a couple times, and now you show up. If you’ve got anything on your mind, let’s have it.”

“Say, yo’re a little jittery, ain’t you?” Ty demanded, surprised at Rocky’s tone. “Calm down; ain’t nothin’ wrong so far.”

“What do you mean?” Rocky was still puzzled.

“Jim Bucktoe, Joe’s brother, hit town this mornin’. He ain’t likkerin’ up and he ain’t blowin’ off his mouth, but Pop and I got the idea that mebbe he came in lookin’ to square accounts with you. You killed his brother. We figgered we’d hang around, just in case. If Jim was makin’ any war talk, we’d lock him up. But he ain’t sayin’ a thing . . . . You keep yore eyes open, Rocky. I’ll just walk across the street and hang around till Pop gits back.”

Rocky thanked him. For once, he forgot to grin. He wasn’t taking the warning lightly. Being unarmed, he began looking for something that he could use for a weapon with which to defend himself. A small hammer was the best thing he could find. He tossed it aside in disgust.
"A lot of good that would be," he thought. "Everything going swell, and this has got to come up!"

He could see Ty across the street. Fifteen minutes later the sheriff was still there. Rocky's tension began to fade. A prospective stockholder came in. The usual questions and answers followed. It was another sale. Only fifty shares this time. With the man's departure, Rocky looked up to find a short, chunky Indian gazing at the display in the window. Their eyes met, through the glass. The Indian moved to the door, then, and when he stepped inside, his right hand was in his pocket.

Rocky backed away and put a desk between them.

The Indian took another hesitant step and stopped, a hollow grin of embarrassment on his round face. The next moment, Ty's broad shoulders filled the doorway.

"All right, Jim!" he ground out. "What is it?"

The Indian turned to him. "Oil," he said. His hand came out of his pocket clutching a crumpled five-dollar bill. "Me buy oil."

"You mean you want to buy stock in the company?" Ty demanded, his amazement choking him.

"Yeh. Plenty time I see oil in Mustard Valley."

Ty expelled the air from his lungs with a noisy whoosh.

"Wal, I'll be damned!" he exploded. "That takes the cake! Pop and me was gittin' all spooked up for nothin'!"

Tony had been out several times. Rita was there oftener.

A barn, with a galvanized iron roof, and still open at the sides, as well as half a dozen small cabins, had been erected on the property. Grimwood used one of the cabins for the company's field headquarters and the personal accommodation of Rocky and himself.

Frank had turned over his law practice to Gene Robbins temporarily, so that he might spend all his time in camp. The storeroom in town, from which the company had been promoted, had become the permanent office, with Rocky in charge of the business at that end and shuttling back and forth between town and the valley three and four times a week.

Organizing the freighting had been an arduous chore. Rocky had supervised it from the first and managed to keep supplies and material rolling. The worst of that was over. He still had two carloads of thirty-foot lengths of five and five-eighths inch casing on a siding in the Wyoming and Western yard, but he was so far ahead of the drillers that he began to spend more and more of his time in the field. The bit was biting ever deeper into the surface strata and once he got on the platform and heard it thudding into the rock, the creaking of the walking-beam and the groaning of the bull-wheel filling his ears, he couldn't tear himself away.

Every Sunday brought Louis Abramson out from town. It was the only day he could get away from the store. He had come into the company believing he would do well to break even. When Charlie Oatman had given it his enthusiastic endorsement, Louis had thought better of his investment. But even then he regarded it as no more than a good gamble that wasn't going to hurt anyone very much if it ended in failure. Of late, however, oil fever began to grip him, too. He had never had any great interest in anything that didn't begin and end with the store. Now, he complained to Frank and Rocky over the fact that Sunday was the only day he had free.

Y THE Ist. of October, the sixteen-mule teams and the freighting wagons had ground out a passable road to Mustard Valley. Of a Sunday, it had become quite the thing for the townspeople, most of them stockholders, to drive out to watch the drilling.
“This thing gets into your blood,” he confessed. “I’m getting so I can’t sleep. Getty tells me everything still looks good. No sign of trouble ahead, eh?”

“Not according to what the bailer brings up,” said Grimwood. “We ought to be about through the shale and getting into sandstone. If we strike any real trouble, it won’t be for a couple weeks. We’re not down far enough for that.”

“They’re bringing the bailer up now,” Rocky reported from the doorway. “Let’s see what they’ve got.”

The bailer was swung around to the waste-trench and emptied itself when it struck bottom. Grimwood and John Getty, the contractor, examined the detritus carefully.

“Shale, nothing else,” said Getty. He found a piece containing a small fossil. After wiping it off on his overalls, he handed it to Frank, saying, “Souvenir for you.” With his hand, he stirred the mixture of muck and oily water that had just been brought up and then tested its viscosity by rubbing thumb and forefinger together. “Getting heavier. Not a bad sign. Of course, only the bit will show if there’s oil.”

It was one of his favorite sayings. He and Frank’s father had been close friends for years. That alone had made it possible to persuade him to come to Wyoming. A better man for the job couldn’t have been found. He was critical in his judgments and not given to loose optimism. On being shown over the property for the first time and having the pool of seepage and the oil-impregnated sandstone outcroppings shown him, he had declared the prospects decidedly favorable, only to add his now familiar, “But only the bit will show if there’s oil.” But he was impressed, and had continued to be. Coming from a man who knew his business, and guarded his enthusiasm so carefully, it had further encouraged the partners.

This Sunday passed, as the others preceeding it had, without one of the Blue Rock Oil Company’s most important stockholders putting in an appearance. Frank and Louie couldn’t understand why Charlie Oatman never found time to come out. It wasn’t any mystery to Rocky.

“Oatman ain’t too busy,” he told himself. “He’d like to see what we’re doing, but he’s staying away because he’s sure the well is going to be a bust.”

If he had included Oatman’s bitter hatred of himself, he would have been close to the truth. Like the proverbial horse of the familiar adage, Oatman had been led to the water, but he wasn’t going to be made to drink. He kept himself informed on how the work was progressing. Almost every day, someone who had just returned from Mustard Valley, came into the bank and supplied him with the latest details.

Considering his position, the keen interest he expressed in the operations was understandable. For him to have done otherwise would have excited suspicion. Forestalling the inevitable question, he was always ready with a plausible excuse for his own non-appearance.

Like a condemned man, watching the clock as he awaited his doom, Oatman kept the score on the drilling. Every foot the drill went down was another second ticked away for him, bringing the disastrous conclusion ever nearer.

He spent hours contemplating what his position would be when the bubble burst and men like Joe Evans, Ty Roberts, the Judge and several hundred others, were brought face to face with the fact that the money they had invested in the company was irretrievably lost. Being human beings, they would very likely forget that they had been told they were taking a gamble, and remember only that he had sponsored the company. He had invested his money; that would be a mitigating factor. Even so, he would not be able to escape the storm completely; the best he could hope for was to weather it and then try to rebuild his battered fences.

When the hour of disillusionment came, where would Rocky stand? Charlie dwelt long and intently on that question. The Blue Rock Oil Company was his idea; more than anyone else, he was responsible for the folly in which Boulder City was indulging.

"He'll have a hard row to hoe around here," Oatman told himself. "He's dealing with men who are hard losers. They'll let him know how they feel."

THOUGH the past weeks had been trying ones for him, it was a great comfort to notice how little Tony was seeing of Rocky. Oatman knew it wasn't due solely to the fact that Rocky was busy; during the several weeks that Mrs. Warren and Frank had been away, he had not been to the house once. Tony had been working feverishly, and on finishing the pictures for the Wyoming exhibit had turned at once to doing several things she wanted to take to San Francisco, along with The Cross Pull.

Gossip had begun to couple Rocky with Rita. She had returned in triumph from Denver and San Antonio. Rocky had been at the depot to meet her. On his frequent trips back and forth to Mustard Valley, he never failed to spend an hour or two at the Spanish Ranch.

Charlie was only too willing to accept at their face value the inferences being made. Mrs. Warren was a rich and attractive young widow. Knowing Rocky, he didn't doubt what his intentions were concerning her. It was a regrettable situation to him, for he had a high regard for Rita Warren. His regret, however, ran a bad second to his relief respecting Tony's diminished interest in the man.

Difficult as he knew his own position was going to be after the debacle, he promised himself that he would have to do something for Frank Grimwood. With this oil madness out of his mind, Frank would settle down to business. After a year or two, he could step into politics.

He didn't hold Frank's defiance against him. The boy had fallen under Rocky Jeanette's influence; that had been his great mistake. He was, in part, responsible for this miserable mess, but only a minor degree. By and large, he would make a satisfactory son-in-law. It had always been one of Charlie's fears that Tony would bring home a husband who would be an everlasting disappointment to him.

Rita arranged a dinner party, early in the week. Tony begged off immediately; it brought Rita to the studio.

"You can't be so busy it's impossible for you to take an evening off," she argued. "I don't see anything of you any more. You've been cooping yourself up in here day after day. It's beginning to tell on you, Tony. You're thin."

"A little," Tony admitted lightly. "I'll get it back in California. I want to get away next Sunday if possible."

Four paintings were already boxed for shipment.

"I didn't know you were leaving," said Rita. "Is this something that came up unexpectedly?"

"No, I've been going down every year for the annual California Oil and Water-color Show. I want to take this one down with me." She indicated the picture on the easel. "I've three or four days' work to do."

"I'm sorry you can't make it," Rita gave in at last. "Rocky is coming. Frank promised that he would come in. Of course, he won't make the effort if you're not to be there."

"That's sweet of Frank to be as faithful as that," Tony remarked, thinking that Rita had had too much makeup. "I told him, when I was out in the valley two weeks ago, that I'd be going down about the 9th. of the month. He's undoubtedly forgotten; he and Rocky are so busy."

ROCKY was in town this afternoon. Rita saw him and told him the party was off, and why. After she had left for the ranch, he made a sudden decision. Ten minutes later, he opened the studio door. Tony was busy at the easel.

"Well this is unexpected!" she exclaimed, turning to him.

"Can I come in?" he asked.

"Of course. I don't know whether you can find a chair. Things are in a mess."

"You're leaving, I understand," he said, his whole attention fixed on her.
"You must have seen Rita."
"Yeh...What were you going to do—leave without saying good-by to anyone?"
"Anyone?" she queried, her bantering tone stabbing him.
"Well, to me, then," he muttered soberly.
Tony laughed. "You make it sound important."
Something electric had touched the air with his coming. He pulled up a chair. Straddling it, he placed his elbows on the back and gazed at her approvingly.
"I haven't seen you in weeks, Tony. I missed you the last time, when you drove out with the Taylors."
"I've been right here," she said, cleaning a brush with greater care than was necessary. "You've been terribly busy, I know."
"It wasn't being busy that kept me away," he got up and pushed the chair out of his way. "I put the brakes on and kept away from you because I knew I had to. I thought I could lick this thing."
He reached out suddenly and caught her hands. "Tony, let's quit kidding ourselves!"
She broke away as he tried to draw her into his arms.
"Not that...no!" she protested.
She stood here for a moment, getting hold of herself. Her breasts rising and falling with her deep, excited breathing. "There was a time, Rocky, when I might have been foolish enough to let you sweep me off my feet. Those moments pass, and when they're gone, you wonder that you could have thought of throwing everything away on a mad impulse...I'm Frank's girl. Remember?"
"You are if he can hold you." Unconsciously, Rocky pulled down the corners of his mouth, and his eyes were grim in his hard, flat face. "I never have pretended to be a gentleman; when I see something I want, I take it if I can get it."
Tony winced. "I wish you hadn't said that."
"What difference can it make now. It's true. I knew I shouldn't have come here today; I've gone too far in another direction for it to do me any good. Talk about throwing everything away! I thought I was being smart, and I've made the biggest mistake of my life. But you know how I feel, and I'm glad you do. That's all I've got to say."
He didn't stay long. On leaving, he said, "Where are you going to be in San Francisco?"
"At the St. Francis...Why do you ask?"
"Maybe I'll send you a post card," he growled sarcastically as he slammed out of the studio.
Tony was satisfied to let him go. She didn't know whether she wanted to cry or laugh. She did neither. She had humbled him, and that's what she had been wanting to do for weeks. She didn't doubt that he was as ruthless and bereft of honor as he claimed to be. It didn't frighten her.
"Why should it?" she asked herself, "He means nothing to me. This ended any chance that he might..."

BEFORE she left for the Coast, Frank came in and spent the evening with her. He looked tired. The strain he was under was telling on him. It worried her.
"You're not getting rest enough, Frank. You can't be up day and night."
"I know it," he agreed. "I turn in, and if the drill misses a beat, I've got to get out and see what's wrong. The work's going ahead satisfactorily. We ran into a hard conglomerate this morning. Getty isn't worried; he says we'll break through it. But it slows things up for the present. You'll be home long before were ready to shoot the well. Of course, we may hit a gusher that'll blow everything sky high before we shoot." He laughed at the possibility. "That'd upset our calculations most pleasantly."
"You're as confident as ever, Frank."
"Oh, sure! I don't see how we can miss. Coming across the desert this afternoon, I promised myself that the first thing I'll do after we bring the well in will be to buy the finest diamond ring in this town and ask you to let me put it on your finger. When I first mentioned oil in the Blue Rock, you encouraged me, and you were the only one who did. I know Rocky wouldn’t have got interested but for you. If I hit the jackpot, I’ll owe it all to you.”

Tony’s head was on his shoulder. “I guess you know what my answer will be,” she murmured, without looking up. “It’ll be the same if you don’t strike oil.”

Tony had not been gone more than a week, when Rocky drove into camp. After assuring himself that everything was going smoothly, he asked if Grimwood could get along without him for a few days.

“I don’t see why not,” Frank told him. “If anything unexpected comes up at the office, I can run into town and take care of it.”

Rocky explained that one of the insurance companies he represented was calling its agents into the home office, at Sacramento, for its annual convention. It was his biggest account, he said.

Grimwood did not question the truthfulness of the story for a moment.

“Go ahead,” he said. “Get back when you can.”

Rocky let it go at that. For the past few days, he had been in a savage mood, his preoccupation so intense that if had not escaped Rita’s notice. She surmised that something in connection with the oil company was responsible. She had tried to break through it, even suggesting that if they were running out of funds, she might be able to do something about it.

Rocky had brushed it off, and not too gently either. Today, when he stopped to tell he was going to the convention, her suspicions instantly took another direction. Tony was in California. She was shrewd enough not to mention it, but on the train that carried Rocky to the Coast, there were several letters from her friends in San Francisco.

Her letters were answered in due course, and the information they held was so infuriating that she made no effort to contain herself. Rocky’s deceit, she might have forgiven; but in her jealous rage, she found the cruelest blow in the fact that held her cheaply, and for that there was no forgiveness.

Determined to avenge the indignity he had offered her, she had a team harnessed and drove to Mustard Valley.

Grimwood realized at once that something was wrong. “You’re upset Rita,” he said anxiously. I hope it isn’t bad news.”

“Frank—I think it’s about time someone opened your eyes.”

His head went up, and he gazed at her, more puzzled than ever.

“I don’t get you—”

“Rocky,” she informed him.

“Rocky?”

“He lied to you. He isn’t in Sacramento; he went straight to San Francisco to be near Tony. I have friends in the city. They’ve written. Rocky and Tony are out dining and dancing every night.”

Grimwood’s fingers tightened on the buggy wheel as he steadied himself.

“It may be innocent enough on Tony’s part; Rocky doesn’t intend it to be innocent.” Rita had thrown discretion to the winds. “When I first met him, I realized that he was reaching out for her. You were his friend, but that didn’t matter to him. He doesn’t let anything stand in his way.”

Frank winced. His own words were being tossed back at him now. “He accepted my favors and made me believe I meant something to him,” Rita rushed on, her dark eyes flashing angrily. “He was only using me; and I despise him for it!”

Her voice broke and she paused to catch her breath. The blood had drained away from Frank’s cheeks and under its tan, his face was grim. Though he was slow to anger, Rita could see his wrath rising.

“Frank—what are you going to do?”

“I don’t know,” he said slowly. “Nothing foolish, Rita. He lied to me; that’ll take some answering. But I’m not rushing down to San Francisco. He'll be home in a few days; I'll be in town, waiting for him."

HE COMMITTEE headed by Jinny Evans, had been busy for a week arranging the Harvest Festival dance at the lake, always the last party of the year, a gala affair. Grimwood was in town but in no mood to attend. The morning after the party, Judge Bonfils stepped into the oil company's office, as he was passing.

"We had quite a crowd out," he told Frank. "But as so many remarked, Mrs. Warren, Tony, you and Rocky, were conspicuous by your absence. Of course, all everyone had to talk about was when you'd be shooting the well. How far down are you, Frank?"

"About twenty-three hundred feet."

"Then you haven't far to go—according to your previous calculations, I mean."

Grimwood nodded. He found it difficult to talk about the drilling. His interest in the well remained as great as ever, but he didn't see how Rocky and he could go on together; one of them would have to step out. He sat there brooding over it after the Judge left.

His faith in Tony remained unshaken. He refused to believe for a moment that she and Rocky were together in San Francisco by prearrangement. Even Rita, bitter as she was, had not intimated anything of that nature. No, he repeatedly assured himself, the treachery was all on Rocky's part. Any doubt of it fled, when he received a letter from Tony, telling him Rocky had been in San Francisco.

"Having an attractive escort to wine and dine you in San Francisco's fashionable restaurants sounds excit-astoundingly for him, as far as Tony was concerned; now he knew that he had not only lost her but Rita and almost everything as well.

"I've been trying to take Tony away from you since the first time I saw her," he admitted. "I didn't want to rat on you; that's why I got mixed up with Rita Warren—I thought that'd take care of everything, But it didn't. Tony tried to show me I didn't have a chance with her. I wouldn't believe it, figured it was just a stall. I've had a lot of experience with dames, but I knew they weren't her kind. But that's what threw me; I couldn't get it through my dumb head that there was a different set of rules in her league.... What a sap I am!"

He threw back his head and started to laugh scornfully at himself. He stopped suddenly, and his gray eyes were fierce and bitter.

"It's over and done with, Grimwood," he whipped out. "You can make what you please out of it. I ain't apologizing for trying to beat your time. If Tony had—"

"Keep Tony out of it, if you've got any more to say!" Frank cut him off. He hauled himself to his feet and stepped around the desk, his lean jaw set at a fighting angle. "I've had a few days to think matters over. There were little things along the way that I should have noticed, but I wouldn't see them. How I could have been a fool enough to think you were on the level with me is more than I'll ever know. But that's enough of that, Jeanette: we're through. Either you're going to get out of the company, or I am. I came in from camp last Friday, and I'm not going back till I know what you're going to do."

"I ain't going to do a thing!" Rocky rifled back. "I'm hanging on to my stock!"

"Hang on to it," Grimwood's voice rose. "I can't do anything about that, but I can call a stockholders' meeting, and with the proxies I can get, I can force you out and leave you nothing to say about running the company. You know I can do it, and I won't have to explain why I'm doing it."

Rocky took a step toward him, his attitude menacing. "You better not try it!" he growled. "I won't take any pushing around from you!"

"By Gawd, I will!" Frank retorted, anger running away with him. "On my orders, Louie has paid all the outstanding bills and notified everyone that no supplies or material of any kind are to be turned over to the company without a signed order from me."

"That was smart, wasn't it?" Rocky ripped out. "It won't leave you money enough to meet this week's payroll! What are you going to do about that? You'll need another five thousand."

"I'll worry about that after I've got rid of you. I can raise it."

"Like hell you will! Who raised the fifty thousand you had?" Rocky's jeering laugh further infuriated Frank. "You're going to need me right down to the wire. All I got to do is sit air tight and call your bluff. The company needs money, and you know I can raise it."

"You couldn't raise another nickel in this town! Don't kid yourself that you can blackmail it out of Charlie Oatman!"

Rocky's right hand flashed out. His fingers closed on the collar of Frank's shirt. "What the hell do you mean?" he rapped, pulling him forward.

Grimwood slapped Rocky's hand away. "What do you think?" he blazed as they stood toe to toe. "I'm no fool; I can put two and two together!"

Out of nowhere, he brought up his right fist and sent it crashing against Rocky's mouth. The force of it drove Rocky's head back. Blood spurted from his torn lips.

Sense went out of Rocky. In savage fury he rushed in and drove Grimwood back against the desk. Pinning him there, he swung from his heels with right hand and left; punishing blows that hurt.
He was doing something more than trying to square accounts with Grimwood; his sense of complete frustration over the way everything had turned out for him was finding expression, and every time his fist smashed into Frank's face and made him wince, it added fresh fuel to Rocky's rage. Lady Luck had turned her back on him and played him a scurvy trick, and he wanted to get even. It was that, rather than any deep-seated hatred or ill will he bore Frank Grimwood that was driving him now.

FRANK weathered that first storm and clipped Rocky on the ear with another long, whistling right. Rocky saw it coming and stepped back, trying to roll with the blow. It gave Frank his chance, and he got away from the desk quickly, flicking, his left hand repeatedly to Rocky's chin and keeping him off balance. Both had room now to move either to right or left, and they began to go to it in earnest. Like Rocky, Grimwood was venting the pent up fury that had been tearing at him for almost a week. Physically they were evenly matched; Frank was an inch or two the taller, with a corresponding advantage in reach, but Rocky made up for it with a cat-like quickness and a pair of shoulders that had dynamite in them.

Save for the Maverick and several other night-hawk establishments, Boulder City was fast asleep. Though passersby along Bridger Street were few, that section of the street between the bank corner and the office of the Blue Rock Oil Company was never completely deserted for more than a few minutes at a time.

The exuberant cowboys, bound for the Chinese restaurant near the depot, came along and became the first thrilled witnesses to the battle raging within. They weren't interested in the cause of the fight; it was a good fight, and it promised to continue for some time. Accordingly, word was sent back to the Maverick and before long there was a crowd at the window. Ollie Seager, the night constable, came running.

Though Ollie tried the door and found it unlocked, he didn't step in. He was charged with maintaining the peace, but he had a prejudice against interfering when two men were settling their differences by having at each other with their fists, and especially so when the combatants were such prominent citizens as Grimwood and Rocky Jeanette. Through the glass he saw Frank feint with his left and then level off and send Rocky reeling back from a bone-crunching smash on the jaw.

The thud of it rung unconscious grunt of pain out of Ollie, as though he had been the one struck.

Rocky caught a chair and kept himself from going down. Frank was after him. Rocky whipped up the chair and used it as a weapon to fend off further trouble until his head cleared. He was battered and bleeding, his left eye so badly puffed that it was of little use to him. He had given as good as he had received. Whenever he could get in close enough to block those long, punishing rights, he had Frank at his mercy, peppering him with short, piston-like blows that had the kick of a mule behind them though they travelled only a few inches.

Rocky's back was to the window. When Grimwood tried to snatch the chair away from him, he swung it over his head so viciously that it slipped out of his hands and went flying through the air. With a shivery crash, it smashed the window, scattering the startled crowd.

BOULDER CITY began to wake up. Many of the merchants on Bridger Street had their living quarters above their establishments. Windows began to go up and heads pop out. Pete Hoffman, homeward bound from an unprofitable poker game, had heard the crashing of glass and ran up the street, seeking an explanation.

"What they fighting about?" he yelled at the constable.

Ollie shook his head. "I dunno, Pete." Uncertainty was creeping up on him. "I don't like to be officious, but they ain't leavin' me no choice, bustin' windows and the like at this time o' night!"

"The way they're going at it, they'll kill each other if they ain't stopped!" Pete jerked out. "If you don't get in there, I will!"

His concern was as much for his hundred shares of Blue Rock as for Rocky and Frank.

A few moments later, with the constable still debating what action he should take, Grimwood was forced back toward the door. Rocky, trying to make the most of his momentary advantage and get in close, leaped at him. They clinched and went down together, striking the door with impact enough to pop it open and spill them out on the side-walk. They fought there, and across the sidewalk into the street.

Ollie's attempt to get them apart failed miserably. Someone had got word to Ty Roberts. Ollie was glad to see the sheriff elbowing his way through the onlookers.

Ty ordered Pete and the constable to get hold of Rocky. He took care of Frank himself.

"I don't know what this is all about," he growled, "but it's gone far enough! The two of you git inside. The rest of you boys break it up and git along about your business."

Herding the two struggling men into the office, with Pete's help, he sat them down. Posting the constable outside to see that the crowd dispersed and a fresh one didn't gather, he pulled down the window shades and turned to Rocky and Frank.

"Yor'e a fine-lookin' sight, the two of you!" he stormed indignantly. "What's got into you? I'm mad enough to lock up both of you. The whole town dependin' on you to pull together, and you come up with this sort of thing!... What's the idea?"

Rocky shook his head sullenly. "Better forget it, Ty," he growled. He glared at Grimwood. "I got nothing to say. Maybe you'll have better luck with him."

Frank's puffed lips lifted contemptuously. "Call it personal and let it go at that," he muttered.

Belatedly, both were thinking of Tony. Boulder City would be buzzing about their quarrel in a few hours; neither wanted her name brought into it.

"All right!" Ty snapped. "I reckon if you boys want to make damn fools of yourselves at this stage of the game, that's your privilege." He turned to Hoffman. "Pete, you walk Rocky to the hotel and put him to bed. His face needs fixin' up. I'll get Frank home."

THE NEWS spread like a prairie fire. By breakfast time, tongues were wagging all over town. Charlie Oatman was one of the first to hear. He left home early and stopped at the sheriff's office on his way to the bank, hoping to get some information from Roberts.

"I'm as much in the dark as you are," Ty was compelled to tell him. "They were beatin' each other's brains out when I got there. I got 'em apart and into the office. They wouldn't say a word. Later, I took Frank home and fixed him up best I could. All I could git out of him was that Rocky and him had come to the partin' of the ways. What's this goin' to do to the oil company, Charlie?"

Oatman weighed his answer carefully. "I don't think it will have any great importance. Certainly it won't stop us from striking oil—if the oil is there. If one, or both, tenders his resignation, new men can be elected, who'll carry on."

"They won't resign," Ty declared with great positiveness. "You couldn't make me believe that after what I saw last night. Frank will try to force Rocky out, and vice versa."

"That may be the case," Oatman admitted.

He hoped it would, for if such a contest developed, Frank would have the advantage. Continuing on to the bank, Charlie checked off on his fingers the names of a dozen men among the bigger investors who would give Grimwood authority to vote on their stock; his own hands might be tied, but the men he had in mind would be enough.

It was a morning devoted to endless speculation regarding the cause of the quarrel. None of the countless ideas that were advanced satisfied Oatman, and no one was as anxious to get at the truth as he. When the morning passed without Rocky or Frank putting in an appearance at their offices or the company headquarters, he decided to find the latter and have it out with him. He felt he had to know what had happened or lose his mind.

As he was about to leave the bank, Louie Abramson hurried in and plopped down in a chair at his desk with a weary sigh of relief.

"Sit down, Charlie," he said, mopping his face. "What a morning! I been running back and forth, seeing first one, then the other, and getting nowheres. It was like banging my head against a stone wall; but I finally wore 'em down."

"I don't know whether I follow you, Louie," said Oatman.

"I got Rocky and Frank to bury the hatchet. No love lost between them, I can tell you, but they've agreed to go on working together until the well is shot. It's no secret to you that the company's out of money. Rocky is putting up three thousand and I'm kicking in with a thousand more. If they watch the nickels, that'll be enough to see us through. Make out a deposit slip. I got the money in my pocket. I'll count it out for you."

Charlie sat there without moving, unable to believe his ears. "I can't understand it, Louie. Do you mean to tell me that after what happened last night they're going to shake hands and go on pulling together?"

"Hardly," said Louie. "As near as I can figure, they hate each other's guts. I don't know why, and after what I've been through this morning, I'm damned if I care. I got something more on my mind than their troubles. If I lose every cent I put into this oil deal, I can stand it, and so can you and old Joe and some others, but there's fellas in this town who put up a hundred or two because they knew we were in that can't. I ain't going to see them let down. It'll be tough enough if the well is a bust. At least they won't be able to say there was any funny business about it."

"And Jeanette listened to that argument?" Oatman was even more incredulous.

"I made him listen, Charlie—and Frank, too. I'll have the office cleaned up and new glass put in this afternoon. Rocky will be there tomorrow morning, tending to business. Frank's heading for camp tonight."

T LEFT Oatman as deeply puzzled as ever, and disappointed, for he had not doubted that this was the definite, irreparable break between Frank and Rocky that he wanted.

That afternoon, enlightenment came to him from an unexpected source. Rita Warren drove into town and came to the bank at once. She knew Rocky was back and that he and Frank had fought. What they had quarreled about was no mystery to her. She did not want to see Rocky again, but she did want to hurt him; to have seen him drawn and quartered would not have been too much.

Oatman got up to greet her. Being wholly unaware of the changed relations between Rocky and her, he made a mental note not to make any reference to what had occurred in the early hours of the morning at the office of the Blue Rock Oil Company.

He need not have bothered, for Rita didn't propose to ignore it. "I understand Mr. Jeanette is back from San Francisco," she observed guilelessly as she took the chair Charlie offered.

"He's back," he replied, not comprehending the full significance of her remark at once. "I didn't know he'd been in San Francisco."

"Oh, didn't Tony write you?"

That did it. Oatman's face was gray as he sat down.
O LEARN that Grimwood and Jeanette had fought over Tony was a staggering blow. Charlie tried to dissemble his agitation and only partly succeeded. He pretended to listen to Rita, but his mind was locked in a vise, his one cogent thought being that his tangled dealing with Rocky had now reached a crises.

"You—you can't mean that, Mrs. Warren," he said, smothering a little gasp of astonishment, barely hearing her when she said the Spanish Ranch would be put up for sale.

"But I do," Rita insisted. "I know I'll never get out of the property anything like what's been spent on it. But my mind is made up. I told Mr. Fitz this noon that we'd be moving to California before snow flies. I'll go down in a day or two and start looking for a place."

Oatman shook his head regretfully; the Warren stable and the Spanish Ranch had been solid landmarks in the life of Boulder City. "This is a sudden decision, Mrs. Warren?"

"Very sudden," Rita admitted. "I want the bank to handle the sale. If you'll come out, we'll go over everything and set a figure."

Oatman had no heart for business. He proved it by saying, "It's a big place, Mrs. Warren. Buyers don't come along every day. So much of the value is in the buildings, rather than the land, that it isn't likely to appeal to a stockman. Perhaps Mr. Jeanette could do more with it than I; he hasn't been devoting much time to his real estate business of late but—"

"Mr. Jeanette can't do anything for me," Rita informed him, with chilling emphasis. "I prefer doing business with a man I can trust. I'm sure you'll do everything possible, Mr. Oatman."

Though he gave her an opportunity to say what had turned her against Rocky, she did not avail herself to it. Found him out, Charlie thought. I pray that Tony does.

He told Rita he would be out to the ranch as soon as he could; after she left, he was surprised to find that he had nothing to debate with himself; his course was plainly marked and he was ready to embark on it. Knowing he would find Rocky in his quarters at the hotel, he left the bank and went down the street at once. At the Boulder Inn, he sent his name up and after a short delay, he was shown upstairs.

I CAN imagine why you're here," Rocky told him, refusing to be embarrassed by the condition of his face.

"I'll leave you in no doubt about it," Charlie replied, after making sure the door was closed. "You knocked the bottom out of your game, Jeanette, when you ran down to California to see my daughter. I don't know what took place between you and I prefer not to know. I'm not going to waste any words about this: I'm giving you twenty-four hours to settle up your affairs. If you're still in town after the 3:05 pulls out tomorrow, I'm going up to the courthouse and make a full statement to the District Attorney."

Rocky met it with a sneer. "You're bluffing, Oatman. Smearing Tony with your own mistake is the last thing in the world you'll do; you can't open your mouth without shamming her."

"I've thought of that, Jeanette," Charlie flashed back. "If I knew any other way to show you up, I'd take it. But this is the only way. I hope you'll stay and face it; I'll never know for certain that Tony's safe from you until you've been shown up for what you really are. It'll more than repay her for any shame that comes to her because of my wrong-doing."
Rocky thought this was only the beginning, but Oatman had nothing further to say. Opening the door, he stepped out and descended the stairs. The gray look that had been touching his face with increasing frequency of late, came again as he crossed the lobby. Suddenly, his hand flew to his heart and he had to find a chair until the knife-like pain passed. He had been to see Wingaard recently. The doctor had warned him to avoid all excitement.

Avoid excitement! Charlie thought of it after the seizure passed. What fools these doctors were! They examined a man’s body. They knew nothing of what a man’s life was; they could tell you to avoid excitement, but they didn’t tell you how to avoid it.

ROCKY had no intention of leaving town. He was at the office in the morning, looking more presentable. Judge Bonfils nodded but did not stop for a minute or two, as he usually did. Other old friends nodded, too, but hurried on. It made Rocky realize that he was no longer the popular hero. A list of meats and groceries for the camp had to be made out. He had it already when Louie came in. The latter took exception to some of the items.

“I don’t know what they do with all the coffee we send out,” he complained. “They must feed it to the mules. Cut it down to ten pounds, Rocky, and they’ll have to go easy on it. And why maple syrup? Let ‘em use corn syrup.”

He crossed off an item or two. “Good food and plenty of it is all right, but we ain’t putting up no more banquets for that crew.”

Rocky smiled. If he had a friend left in town it was Louie Abramson. “You going to the club this noon?” Louie asked.

“Why not?” Rocky returned. “Everyone in town knows I’m sporting a black eye.”

The luncheon was as boisterous as ever. The Judge was the current chairman. He had a fellow jurist from Laramie as a guest. Rocky found his chief interest in the fact that Charlie Oatman was not present. On inquiring the reason, he learned that Doc Wingaard had been called to the Oatman home that morning.

“Nothing serious,” Bill Brown, the druggist, told Rocky. “But Charlie’s got a bad heart; he ought to take things easy.”

Rocky left early and went back to the office. When it got to be half-past two, he started watching the clock. With Oatman sick, he found more reason than ever to believe that nothing would come of the threat to expose him. And yet, as the deadline neared, he refused to sit there, waiting. Locking up, he walked up the street to the sheriff’s office. From there he could see whoever climbed the long flight of stone steps to the courthouse.

Ty was not unfriendly, though he had less to say than usual. Rocky stuck it out, doing his best to kill time. He heard the afternoon train for the West pull out. There was no sign of Oatman.

“Just a bluff,” Rocky told himself. “I was a sucker to give it a second thought.”

After another few minutes, he got up to leave, only to freeze in his tracks. Charlie Oatman was climbing the courthouse steps, and obviously with a great effort.

“What’d you say?” Ty asked.

“Nothing!” Rocky growled. “When you want me I’ll be at the office.”

His first impulse was to grab a horse and flee town. “It wouldn’t do me any good to run now; it’s too late,” he decided. “I wouldn’t get far; I’m too well known.”

He wished he had back the three thousand he had handed over to Louie the previous morning; money would get him a good lawyer. Maybe he could beat this rap; the only evidence against him was the series of admissions he had made to Oatman. If found guilty, he'd be a first offender; that would work in his favor. He didn't fear that standing trial for the First National job would be followed by indictments in other Wyoming towns.

"They couldn't make anything stick—unless they slap some fingerprints at me," he told himself. "I'll make bail and give them a fight. Even if I'm sent over the road, it won't be for more than five years and I can cut that to three with good behavior."

But it was all so needless; that was what floored him. He could have had everything he wanted if he hadn't lost his head over Tony. He had no blame for her; she was clean and decent and he'd never find another like her. But no woman was worth what she was costing him.

He let himself into the office. Before leaving he had drawn the shades. He didn't raise them now; he wanted to wait there alone.

The detachment that had once been defense was no longer his; the few months he had lived in Boulder City had changed him more than he realized.

A map of Mustard Valley was pasted on the wall. A bitter, croaking laugh welled out of him as his harried eyes fell on it. "Wouldn't it be a laugh if what I started put this burg on the map, after all, and made millionaries of some of these yokels!"

He had not been sitting there long when he heard someone run past. Others ran by. A man called across the street to another. Rocky couldn't make out what he said, but he caught Oatman's name.

"I guess that settles it!" he growled. "He's made his squawk!"

Fifteen minutes passed, with unmistakable excitement running up and down Bridger Street. A shadow fell across the door and Ty Roberts stood there.

"Charlie Oatman," he began, as he stepped in, "he's dead. Collapsed in the D. A.'s office."

"Well—?" Rocky demanded, wanting him to continue.

Not knowing what was on Rocky's mind, Ty said, "It was all over in a few moments."

"What about the statement he went up there to make?" Rocky demanded.

"Statement? He made no statement. He keeled over just as he came through the door. Where'd you git the idea he had any statement to make to Murtagh?"

"Why, I figured he must have had something on his mind, to get out of a sick bed and go up to the courthouse."

"I hadn't thought of that," Ty muttered, satisfied with Rocky's explanation. "Losin' Charlie Oatman is goin' to be a blow to this town... Can I depend on you to git word to Frank Grimwood?"

"I'll send somebody out right away," Rocky assured him. "If there's anything else I can do, let me know."

He slumped down in his chair after Ty left, tension draining out of him and leaving him weak.

FRANK arrived in town early in the morning. After making himself presentable, he went on to the Oatmans. Tony was hurryng back from the Coast but wouldn't be in Boulder City for another forty-eight hours. Around town, business was largely at a standstill, with the oil venture temporarily forgotten. In death Charles Albert Oatman was receiving a tribute from his fellow citizens such as he had never enjoyed in life.

It was noon before Grimwood walked in on Rocky. Both were coldly hostile. Rocky asked about the well.

"We're drilling night and day," said Frank. "But we're running out of casing. We'll have to shoot in another week to ten days." His eyes narrowed as he faced Rocky. "Charlie Oatman died knowing why we went to it."

It hardly came under the heading of news to Rocky.

"He didn't get anything out of me; he flung back belligerently.
"I know that," Frank told him. "He got it from Rita. She came in to see him the next day about selling the ranch; she let something slip."

"Slip, eh?" Rocky jeered. "Any old day! That dame knew what she was doing."

"And so did you," Frank flung back accusingly. "Between the two of you, you put Charlie in his grave."

Rocky leaped to his feet, ready to start swinging again; but the charge was so true that even his stony conscience was not proof against it. "Have it your way, if it'll make you feel any better," he growled.

Grimwood gave him a withering glance. "No question about how I feel," he said, on his way out.

Rocky's savage mood passed and he fell to a realistic examination of the future. He was on his own now; he had lost his ace-in-the-hole, but there was compensation in the fact that his past was now dead and buried as deeply as Oatman would be in a day or two. It led him to ask himself why he shouldn't step into Oatman's shoes.

It opened an interesting vista of thought that appealed to his ego. If the company struck oil, he'd be riding high again. Play his cards right and he could take over this town and make himself a more important man than Oatman ever had been.

After Tony got back, he saw nothing of her until he went to the church for the funeral services. She sat with her mother and Frank and several relatives from Rawlins and Casper. He found her more beautiful and precious than ever in her sorrow. Whenever he tore his eyes away from her, it was only for a moment.

Rita was among those present and as attractive as ever. Quite by accident, they came face to face, after the services were over and the funeral procession was forming or the short drive to the cemetery.

"I'm surprised that you had the effrontery to show your face here," she said, for his ears alone.

"I was thinking the same about you," Rocky retorted. "Grimwood says the two of us put Oatman in his grave. Maybe he knows what he's talking about."

A week passed before Tony ventured down-town. Rocky made no attempt to see her; and then one noon, several days later, he found her lunching alone at the Boulder Inn. On his way out, he stopped at her table.

Tony raised her eyes, silently imploring him to leave.

"Please—" she murmured, as he held on. "We haven't anything to say to one another, Rocky."

"Is everything all right with you and Frank?" he asked.

"Yes—of course."

"That's all I wanted to know," he told her. "I scrambled things for myself; I'm glad I didn't mix up everything for you."

HE STEER shipping was on. Beef herds from Joe Creek, Seven Springs and other districts were arriving daily in Boulder City. They were coming so fast now that they could not be accommodated in the railroad corrals, and it was not an uncommon sight to see two or three of the big outfits holding their cattle on the bed grounds, south of town, while they awaited their turn.

Cattle money had always been the blood and sinew and backbone of the town's prosperity. The cattle business was a solid business. You could turn young calves out on the range, see them grow to maturity, drive them into town and ship them off to Omaha or Chicago and be reasonably sure of what the returns would be. It was different with oil; no one could tell what a drill was likely to find, down in the bowels of the earth.

Out in Mustard Valley, the well was sinking deeper and deeper, and Boulder City’s confidence in the outcome was sinking with it. As the season had advanced, the prevailing northwesterly winds had begun to blow with a foretaste of their winter vigor, making the drive to the valley anything but a pleasant experience. But it was the pessimism that had set in, rather than the physical discomfort involved, that had reduced the Sunday stream of visitors to a trickle.

The drillers were now down over twenty-eight hundred feet. Only a few lengths of casing remained. Knowing the well would, of necessity, have to be shot before the week was out, Rocky locked up the office in town and established himself at the camp.

With the issue so soon to be decided, and the hope that the well would bring itself in almost extinguished, Grimwood was in a surly mood, his nerves on edge. Had relations between him and Rocky been friendly, he would have been difficult to get along with; since the reverse was true, they were snapping at each other continually.

On the way out, Rocky had not failed to notice the activity at the Spanish Ranch; he tried to tell himself it didn’t matter. But it did; the Spanish Ranch had figured very prominently in some of his shattered dreams. They would have come true if he had been content to let well enough alone. Therein lay the real bitterness of the situation for him. His fortunes wouldn’t have been hanging on the dubious returns from a hole in the ground; he would have had money, position, the seductive charms of Rita Warren to keep him amused. He had kicked it all away.

From the open doorway of the headquarters cabin, he saw Grimwood and Getty step off the floor of the rig and engage in a heated argument. They turned his way then, continuing their discussion as they covered the few yards to the door.

“What are you wrangling about?” Rocky asked.

“No wrangle,” Getty answered. “I say it’s now or never; there’s no sense in going on working till we haven’t got a piece of casing left. We’ll have to call a halt, day after tomorrow; I say stop now. It can’t make any difference; if there’s oil here, we’ll get it.”

“This ain’t the first well you’ve drilled,” said Rocky. “I thought you were the expert we were depending on.” He glanced at Grimwood. “What’s the boss got to say about it?”

Ignoring the sarcastic query, Frank said, “We’ll hit twenty-nine hundred feet early tomorrow morning. There’s no reason why we can’t go that far.”

“Okay!” Getty agreed. “When we hit twenty-nine hundred, we bring the tools up for the last time and begin to clear away and get ready to shoot. In the meantime, you better get some men and teams busy with the scrapers and finish the sump. If we get oil in any quantity, you’re going to need it. No telling how quick a well can be capped.”

The sump consisted of an earthen embankment across the lower end of the valley. That afternoon Grimwood and Rocky got out with the men and had it completed by nightfall.

THE DRILLING stopped, shortly after eight, the following morning. By the time the tools had been removed, the rig floor cleared and the nitro brought up, the camp cook was ringing his bell for dinner.

“We’ll be ready to drop the iron in a couple hours,” Getty announced to the partners, as he was about to leave the platform. “There was some talk of having a bunch of your friends out here to see us touch her off. It’s too late for that. They’d only be in the way anyhow.”

One of his roughnecks (in his oil field parlance, he never referred to his men by any other term) had been attracted to the well head by a faint hissing. He put his ear down to the open blowout preventer attached to the tip of the casing. What he heard straightened him up in a hurry. An excited cry broke from his lips.

“John, come here!”
Getty hurried to the hole. He bent down and listened. Instantly, he knew what that gulping and hissing as of a thousand snakes meant.

"Gas!" he roared. "Close the blow-out valve!" He motioned Rocky and Frank back. Not depending on anyone else to do it, he ran to the boiler. Pulling the fire, he doused it with water until he was sure it was out.

It wasn't necessary to ask if trouble was to be expected; the scurrying back and forth of Big John and his men was answer enough.

"How bad is this likely to be?" Rocky called out, when Getty came around to their side of the rig.

"There's no telling!" the contractor shouted. "If gas is all we've got, there may be enough of it to blow everything sky high! No need for you fellas to stand out here! Get back inside the shack!"

"The well may be coming in, John!" Frank cried. His face was tense and colorless.

"Of course! There ain't likely to be gas enough to blow everything to hell if there's oil behind it! It's an out and out gasser I'm afraid of!"

He ran around to the other side of the rig, barking instructions to his men.

Getty had no more than left them, when Rocky and Grimwood felt the earth tremble. From somewhere down in its depths came a low, growling rumble. Rocky pointed to the casing head. It was shaking violently.

Getty was screaming at his men to run for it. He came past the partners. "Get inside!" he roared. "She's going to go!"

He ran back another hundred feet and threw himself on the ground. Rocky and Frank darted into the cabin. They were just in time. With a sharp, thunder-like clap, the blow-out preventer was torn loose from the casing and went hurtling through the crown of the derrick. Instantly the air was filled with a deafening piano scream as the released gas shot upward, rising a hundred feet above the derrick and enveloping it momentarily in a diaphanous vapor. An explosion followed that was heard as far away as the Spanish Ranch. The crown block and its pulleys went skyward.

The debris that went up had to come down. A heavy pulley fell where Rocky and Grimwood had been standing but a moment before and ploughed into the ground.

Getty got to his knees, thinking the worst was over. A stream of gas, gravel and salt water was shooting into the air and rising high above the rig. Fire was the great danger now. All that was needed to ignite the gas was for a fragment of rock to strike the steel casing in a way to cause a spark.

Frank was as grimly aware of that threat as Getty; Rocky, in his inexperience, less so. He turned a deaf ear to Frank's warning that they get out of the cabin and drop back to a safer spot.

"We're all right here, Grimwood. We can see what's happening, and we're in no danger of getting conked with a piece of rock. If there's a fire, we can sneak out the back door."

"You never saw a gas fire," Frank snapped. "It's like a flash of lightning. There wouldn't be time for us to turn around before this shack was in flames from end to end."

A second explosion that made the first sound like the harmless snapping of a firecracker knocked them flat and brought the cabin tumbling down on them. The terrific blast levelled every building in camp. Of the rig, only the tottering derrick remained. Bull-wheel, walking beam, sampson post, the whole draw works, were gone. A hundred yards away the boiler was rolling and bouncing through the brush.

John Getty got to his feet, dazed but unhurt. His own four men had come through unscathed. Down at the barn, injured horses were screaming and the freighting crew was trying to lead them out of the wreckage.

Getty, starting to run to the shattered cabin, glanced at the well and what he saw stopped him in his tracks. Bug-eyed, he watched the earth's crust rise in a great blister that stood up like the hunched back of an angry cat. He knew what it meant. The amount of gas trying to reach the surface was so great that the casing couldn't accomodate it and it was welling up around the casing and shooting up through the earth. The top of the blister was blown off a moment later. The gas whistled briefly as it escaped. The ground began to settle back, then. It set the tottering derrick to weaving back and forth so violently that it threatened to come down any moment.

Dan Christopher, one of Getty's roustabouts, ran up.

"Come on, John!" he cried. "Them guys are trapped in there! If we don't get them out in a hurry, we won't get them out at all!"

"Look!" big John gasped, pointing to the well.

A black, glistening fountain was spouting from the casing head, rising higher and higher.

"It's oil!" Christopher cried. "But look at that derrick! It's going to fall across the cabin! It'll kill both of 'em!"

They reached the cabin and wrestled aside a section of the shattered roof.

"You alive in there?" Getty called out.

"We're all right," Rocky answered cockily. "Grimwood's pinned to the floor but he ain't hurt. I'll have him out in a minute. The two of you stay where you are, and don't try to move anything else or the rest of this junk will slide down on us."

He was on his knees, tugging at Frank. He heaved again and felt him come free.

"All right, Grimwood, roll over and start crawling out of here!" he rapped. "I'll follow you."

He could have packed out, but there wasn't room for him to turn around.

FRANK'S LEGS were not broken. They were so numb, however, that it was all he could do to move them. A splinter had struck his chin, making a deep cut that was bleeding profusely.

Rocky didn't have a mark on him. As soon as he could get his hands on Grimwood's rear, he gave him a helpful push. He knew they had had a close call but the actor in him demanded that he try to make it appear otherwise.

"How's the well doing?" he sang out, his nonchalance strictly counterfeit.

"She's spouting oil!" Getty cried, tearing his fear-stricken eyes away from the swaying derrick. "A hell of a lot of good it'll do you boys if you're caught here! The derrick's going to fall!"

He reached out and caught Grimwood's hand. Dan Christopher leaped in to help him. But as he did, a warning, terror-filled scream was torn from his lips. The swaying pendulum of heavy timbers and three-inch planking had been swinging back and forth in an ever wider arc. In the glance that Christopher flicked skyward, he saw the heavy derrick stand perfectly still for a split second as it leaned precariously. The next moment, it came hurtling down.

Christopher's warning cry had come too late. All four men were caught. The derrick fell in a splintering, rending crash that reduced it to kindling wood. Though only the upper portion of it struck the already shattered cabin, it flattened what was left of it.

The rest of Getty's crew, as well as the men who had been caught at the barn, none of whom had received more than trifling injuries, began the work of rescue without waiting for the wind to carry away the clouds of dust that hovered over the scene of the disaster.

Grimwood was the first to be taken out. He was unconscious and his condition could not be determined at once. He was carried toward the barn and placed on a blanket in the shade of an overturned wagon.

Miraculously, big John and Christopher were brought out badly shaken but with only superficial cuts and bruises. It was a different story with Rocky.

When consciousness returned to Frank, he found Getty and half a dozen others peering at him anxiously. His face had been washed and the cut on his chin attended to.

“You been out cold for more’n half an hour.”

“I feel a little shaky but otherwise all right,” Grimwood replied. “Something hit my head and that was the last I knew. . . . We struck oil, eh?”

Getty nodded. “Plenty of it.”

Frank’s glance travelled around the circle.

“I see you and Christopher,” he said. “Where’s Rocky?”

Big John shook his head soberly.

“He didn’t make it. . . . I know how things were between you of late. He had his faults, same as the rest of us, I suppose; but he was a man when had to be. You know what I mean.”

Frank could not comprehend what had happened all at once. Rocky killed! Somehow, it was incredible. Many times during the past several weeks, he had speculated on what the ultimate end of their relations would be. It had never occurred to him that it would be this way.

ETTY protested as he and Frank walked over to the team the latter had ordered harnessed.

“You ought to stay right here till we get a doctor out to look you over. That’s a bad cut you got on your chin. It may open up again. But it’s your head that really worries me. That crack may be more serious than you figure.”

“I’ve got to get to town,” Frank replied. “I’ll make it all right. You take charge of things here, John. I’ll get the coroner and undertaker started out.”

Oil was spurting from the well in a steady stream. Already a great pool was forming in the sump. Grimwood thanked big John for his foresight in having it built. Seventy-five per cent of the oil could be saved. The contractor would not promise how soon the well could be capped.

“Too much depends on what luck we have. I’ve capped too many not to know that. It may be a matter of a few hours, or it might take us a couple days. But we’ll cap her.”

Big John studied Grimwood’s drawn face for a moment. “I figured you’d be more excited than you are,” said he. “You know what you got here, don’t you Frank? A year from now, I predict there’ll be a hundred derricks dotting this field. Your Blue Rock stock will shoot up to dizzy heights. But don’t expect the well to show a profit right off the bat; it’ll be the other way around. You’ll have to borrow money. That won’t bother you; you can get whatever you want now. And you’ll need a lot. The camp’s got to be rebuilt before winter comes, and a pumping plant put in. I don’t know what sort of a deal you can make with the railroad company but the tracks have got to be run in. For a young fella, you’re sitting on top of the world.”

“I know it,” Frank acknowledged.

“I appreciate my good fortune. If I don’t seem as enthusiastic and excited as I should, it’s only because I’m kicking Rocky the way we did has taken the edge off of everything. I don’t suppose he had any idea he was kicking away his own life to save mine; but that’s the way it turned out.”

“He stuck,” Getty declared tersely. “That’s to his everlasting credit.”

He helped Grimwood into the rig and handed him the reins. “You could have a man go in with you,” he suggested.

“It isn’t necessary,” Frank assured him. “I feel all right.” The ghost of a smile touched his face as he regarded big John with friendly interest. “I’ve got a question for you, and I’m almost afraid to ask it. We’re going to be drilling more wells, John. We'll need a field superintendent... Are you going to head back East, or stay in Wyoming?"

Getty laughed softly. "Don't worry, my boy; you're in no danger of losing me. I don't know how tough these Wyoming winters will be, but I'm not going to let them scare me out. This is a virgin field, and I'm sticking with it."

Normally, it was a three-hour drive to town with a fast team. Grimwood clipped half an hour off that. He didn't intend to race into town and pull up at the bank corner and shout his glad tidings to the four winds. Boulder City would have to wait; he had to see Tony first. It wasn't going to be easy to tell her that Rocky was gone.

Men and women stopped to stare at him in amazement as he drove up Bridger Street. He was coatless and disheveled, a wild gleam in his eyes. He had been dabbing at his chin and the cut had begun bleeding again. The whole front of his white shirt was spattered with blood. His team, and the rig itself, bore evidence of what had happened in Mustard Valley. In leaving camp, he had been forced to drive through a foot of crude oil. The black gumbo covered the buggy and the legs of the horses. Wherever dust had settled, the oily smear had turned a dirty yellow. That something out of the ordinary had happened was evident.

Louie Abramson was crossing the street, when he saw Frank coming; risking being run down, Louie got in the path of the horses and spread his hands to stop them, yelling at Frank, meanwhile, to pull up.

"What's the idea?" he demanded breathlessly. Frank couldn't hold his news back.

"Oil, Louie! We've got a lake full of it already!"

"Oil!" Louie gulped. His knees felt weak suddenly. "But you? What happened to you?"

As briefly as he could, Frank told him what had happened and where he was bound. Louie was shocked, but he kept his head.

"You can't go up to the Oatmans looking like that," he contended. "You'll scare Tony to death if she gets a look at you in that condition; pull over to the hitch rack and I'll take you into Doc Wingaard's office. It'll take him only a few minutes to patch up that chin. I'll run down to the store and get you a clean shirt."

Frank was persuaded to do as Louie wanted.

"I can stop the bleeding and clean you up," Wingaard said, after examining the cut. "It wouldn't hurt to take a couple stitches. But maybe I can patch you up with adhesive. And keep your fingers away from it, Frank."

He was full of questions.

"You get busy, Doc. I'll run down to the store and get a shirt," Louie broke in. "I'll be back in a couple minutes."

At the entrance to the Bon Ton, he almost bumped into Tony in his excitement. She had been shopping in the store. He took her arm and led her inside.

"Frank's in town," he informed her. "They've struck oil. There was a gas explosion. Frank got clipped a bit on the chin. You come back to my office with me; I want to talk to you."

With a gentleness he suspected he possessed, Louie told her what had happened to Rocky. The color drained away from Tony's cheeks as she sat there, momentarily stunned.

"It's too bad," Louie said sympathetically. He had a better understanding of the situation that had existed between Frank and Rocky and herself than she suspected. "I always got along swell with Rocky. He roped me into the oil company; he did as much or more than anyone else to put it over. Frank and him fell out, I know; but I always figured they'd patch things up some day. The three of you used to be such good friends."

"I—I don't know what to say," Tony told him. She found it difficult to speak. "I wasn't prepared for anything like this."
"I know. No one ever is, Tony. Just remember it could have been Frank instead of him. I thought it would be better if I broke the news than leave it for Frank to tell you. He can stand some bucking up. It's been a tough day for him."

She accompanied him to Win-gaard's office. He left her in the waiting room and went on inside. He found Frank looking like a different person.

"Here's the shirt," he said. "Tony's outside. I ran into her at the store. She knows, Frank; I told her everything. I thought that would be a little easier on you."

Grimwood nodded his appreciation.

"The two of you stick in here and give me a few minutes alone with her," he said.

Tony flew into his arms when he stepped into the waiting room.

"Frank! Frank!" she cried, burying her head against his breast. "I know about everything—about the oil and Rocky. Louie told me. How lucky I am it wasn't you!"

He held her closer and his lips found hers. Tony's eyes were misty. "I couldn't begin to describe the second explosion," said he. "It didn't leave a stick standing in camp. It's a miracle any of us came through alive."

He spoke with feeling about Rocky.

"You think you know all you want to know about a man, and then something like this comes along and you can't help wondering if you weren't mistaken. It's so easy to misunderstand."

"No, Frank, you didn't misunderstand Rocky. I'm sure he didn't even understand himself. You remember The Cross Pull—how it seemed to fascinate him? There was a cross pull in him—the things we admired in Rocky pulling him one way and some predatory instinct pulling him the other way."

He knew that she spoke the truth. He had sensed that a struggle went on in Rocky but he had never understood it as well as now.

** **

T HE W A N I N G October moon hung low above Round Butte as Frank and Louie turned off the Slate Hills road and struck east. The nights were beginning to have a searching coolness. There was a rob in the back of the buggy. Louie fished it out and put it over their shoulders.

"That's better," he said. "I was getting so cold I didn't feel like talking."

"That's an awful fix for you to be in," was Frank's bantering rejoinder. Louie laughed.

"You don't get ahead in this world if you put a clothes-pin on your mouth. As I was telling you, when Boulder City gets to booming, I'm going to cut up that property I own along Squaw Creek and put up some houses. I won't call it Abramson's Addition, either; I'll name it for Rocky. Something real fancy, like Jeanette Park."

Grimwood nodded approvingly.

"That sounds swell to me," he muttered.

"I got other plans, too," Louie informed him. They were passing the Spanish Ranch. "I'm going to buy this place. I can get a bargain on it."

"Now you're crazy," Frank declared. "You're not going in for fast horses. It's no good as a stock ranch."

"I ain't going to run it as a ranch. I'll turn it into a hotel. It's the nearest place there is to Mustard Valley. Men will be flocking in here by Spring. I'll bet you the Wyoming and Western will build a station in the front yard of the ranch... You don't have to worry about me, I'll do all right."

"Yeh, I guess you will at that," Frank admitted. "You always seem to do all right, Louie."

"Not always," Louie replied, shaking his head. "I'm a sucker when it comes to pinochle."

THE END
No one could gentle the white stallion Bailey had his heart set on, and Sam didn’t want to risk breaking the horse’s spirit. Then this maverick kid...

Mustang Reunion

by Bill Chambers

The white stallion had thrown the X Bar’s top bronc buster and circled the breaking pen, snorting his defiance to all two-legged creatures. Bug Barton, veteran hazer of the ranch, cast his loop in time to save the rider from being trampled.

Tom Early gathered himself up from the hoof-churned earth and brushed dust from his fancy duds. Someone among the cowboys who watched the show, laughed softly as Tom limped disgustedly toward Sam Bailey, owner of the X Bar, who directed the horsebreaking job from his favorite perch on the poles.

“That’s all for the stallion,” Sam shouted to Barton. “Turn him loose in the south corral until I can decide what to do about him.”

The ranch owner stepped down from the fence as Tom Early came toward him. The young puncher’s hard black eyes betrayed a certain cruelty and his recent flop in the dust, hurt his pride. “Don’t let that spill bother you, Tom,” Bailey said.

“You’ve followed my orders regarding that bronc and I appreciate it.”

Tom finished batting dust out of his gabardine shirt. “You can’t gentle that critter the way you want it done,” he said. “If you say the word, I’ll make the white devil think he’s a kitten in about an hour.”

Bailey smiled. “Maybe you could, Tom,” he said. “But I don’t want his spirit broken. When we captured him, I said I wanted him for myself. To break him by our regular methods would kill his spirit; he’s a rare specimen and I’d rather let him go free than ruin him.”

Tom Early had more respect for the X Bar’s top wages than he had for Sam Bailey’s knowledge. “You’re the boss,” he said.

“ Forget the stallion, Tom,” Bailey said. “We’ve got other broncs to work over.”

Tom turned to the X Bar waddies to select riders for the halfbroken mustangs that were ready for the breaking pen.

Bailey turned at the sound of his daughter's voice. Patsy Bailey had appeared suddenly. Patsy was brown-eyed like her father and slender built, but not too tall. At eighteen she was female boss of the X Bar; her mother had died eight years before. Another figure, a stranger, stood behind her.

"This is Jed Fulton, Dad," the girl smiled, stepping aside so that her father could get a full view of the stranger. "He insists on seeing you, but I told him it was your busy day."

The young stranger's blue eyes attracted Bailey first. They were on a level with his own which gave him a height equal to Sam's six foot one. His storebought trousers were snagged and ill-fitting and the faded denim shirt hung loosely over a pair of broad shoulders.

In spite of the shabby clothing Sam saw strength in the figure, tapering from square shoulders to a pair of long legs. Blond hair peeped from under the brim of a black sodbuster hat and his finely chiseled features were tanned deeply by the sun.

"What's on your mind, son?" Bailey asked.

"I'm looking for work," the boy answered. "I've heard about the X Bar and how you break mustangs for the big cattle ranches."

"You mean you're a bronc-buster?"

"Well, I never laid claim to that kind of title, but I know mustangs. I was born in the Black Hills and I used to snare some horses for the mustang hunters, myself."

"That's mighty interesting," Bailey said. "We get most of our wild horses from the Black Hills country. We usually make camp along the Verde river."

The youth smiled. "My Dad's gold claim was near the south fork of the Verde and there's plenty of wild herds in the surrounding hills." Tom Early noticed the earnest conversation and he saw that Patsy Bailey remained near her father with her eyes intently upon the young stranger. There was no mistaking a softness that had crept into her eyes.

It was hardly a secret among the X Bar crew, that Tom was selfishly devoted to Patsy. He like the others had watched her grow into lovely womanhood, but Patsy treated Tom Early with the same respect that she did all of the X Bar riders.

Early walked toward his boss. "What you got here, Sam," he said, "A new kind of bronc-buster?" His dark eyes swept over Jed Fulton's peculiar attire.

"That's just possible," Bailey answered, turning toward a black mustang that was being led to the breaking pen. He beckoned to Jed Fulton to follow him and walked toward the hazer. Bug Barton was blindfolding the mustang. He looked curiously upon Jed as he and the boss approached.

"This is Jed Fulton, Bug," Bailey began, "He seems to know something about these wild critters and I want him to have a try on this black."

Jed Fulton looked the horse over, while another cowboy struggled to tighten cinch straps under the animal's middle.

Early, with several other punchers, had moved close enough to the stranger to hear him say; "I never rode a bronc with a saddle before, Mr. Bailey, but I guess I'll get used to it."

The punchers that stood behind, looked at each other and smiled. Early's lips cracked in an unpleasant grin.

They all moved back toward the corral fence as Jed swung his long legs over the saddle. Bug Barton ripped the cloth from the bronc's eyes. Barton gave his famous blood-curdling yell as he slapped the mustang's rump and stepped quickly aside.

The ears of the horse flattened. His neck curved to take one look at his rider before he bolted. It was a tricky jump, being a sideways affair with an arched back that sent Jed high. The spectators roared when the mustang hit the earth spraddle-legged and Jed almost missed the saddle on his return flight.

He had difficulty regaining his balance during the next few seconds, during which time the black tried every trick to unseat him. He tried wild runs with sudden neck breaking stops, but to no avail. Finally, he tried to rub Jed off against the corral fence.

SAM BAILEY watched the performance intently. Patsy and Tom Early sat near him. The boss was silent during the four minutes that Jed rode the black, but his features showed satisfaction. "I think my impression of that boy was right," he said. He did not see the scowl on Tom Early's face, as the horse slowed down in his attempt to unseat Jed. Bailey raised his hand, signaling Bug Barton to stop the show. Turning to Early, he said, "We can count that black as thoroughly broken."

Tom tried to hide the envious feeling that came over him. He hated to hear words of credit for anyone beside himself. An idea occurred to him that could prove embarrassing to Jed Fulton. "How about your white stallion, Sam?" he said. "Maybe this kid will be able to handle him the way you want."

Sam had been thinking about the stallion and that possibility, but he turned to study the younger man's features. At that moment he realized the poor sportsmanship that prompted Early's suggestion, but he did not let his own expressions betray him. "By Gosh! I believe you've got something there, Tom," he said dropping from the rails and hurrying to the center of the breaking pen.

He ordered the white stallion to be brought up. Bug Barton's mouth fell open when he learned that Jed would have a try at the white demon. Patsy left her place on the rail to join her father.

Tom Early kept his place on the fence. He watched the activity without a smile. He saw Jed Fulton being patted on the back and he scowled when Patsy congratulated the youth.

The stallion had been turned over to Bug Barton. He had the usual trouble and the stallion churned up great clouds of dust before Bug had him snubbed close. Another puncher brought up the saddle.

Sam Bailey drew Jed aside and explained his wishes. "You may be able to succeed where my other riders have failed" he said. "I won't have to tell you about the stallion's fine spirit."

The dust cleared. Bailey and the others moved to the fence. They noticed Jed stop suddenly in his stride toward the horse. The saddle had been thrown up and the horse strained his great white head in an effort to break loose from Barton's halter. His eyes rolled viciously.

Everyone along the fence were silent as Jed hesitated. His head bent forward like a person who doesn't believe what he sees. Tom Early thought he saw fear.

"Pull the saddle off and turn him loose," Jed called to Bug Barton. "I won't need it." Jed stepped back to the gate to lift a coil of rope that hung from a peg. Bug Barton looked toward his boss for orders. He saw Bailey nod a signal to unsaddle the horse and let Jed have his way.

Jed stood for a moment loosening up the short coil of rope, while Barton and his assistant cleared the fence.

The stallion gave a loud snort at his sudden freedom and reared high on hind legs. He circled the big corral on a dead run, but stopped short when the figure of Jed moved. At some distance he pawed the earth.

IT WAS a strange sight to Sam Bailey and his Arizona mustang hunters. They were silent as Jed edged a little closer to the dangerous stallion and were mystified at the horse's actions when Jed called to him in a soothing voice; "Ho Cloud," he called. "I want to talk to you, boy."

The ears of the stallion picked up, and he stood like a marble statue, sniffing carefully. Then suddenly he wheeled on hind legs and retreated to the farthest end of the corral.

His antics were peculiar for a wild mustang. Jed repeated the name "Cloud" and walked slowly toward him. The horse circled Jed several times kicking high and shaking his mighty head. Jed stood in one spot with the rope dangling from one hand while with the other he produced a white cube from his pocket.
The stallion had narrowed the circle, venturing closer to take loud sniffs at Jed. He shook his long white mane several times at Jed’s outstretched hand before he craned his neck to its fullest extent and seized the cube from Jed’s palm.

“You’re seeing something for sure,” Sam Bailey said.

It was surprising how deftly Jed had built a hackamore over the stallion’s head while he caressed the animal. A few seconds more and he swung his long legs over the stallion’s back.

After a moment of playful pitching, Jed steered the great white horse toward the boss, Patsy and Tom Early. The boys along the fence had begun to cheer.

Tom Early’s movement from the rails was too sudden for the human eye to follow. He jumped before the stallion and crashed his ten gallon hat across the eyes of the horse, yelling loudly, “Give him a ride, you lousy sodbuster!”

A blood chilling sound that could issue only from the throat of a wild stallion rent the air. Over the cloud of thick dust Jed could be seen flat against the stallion’s neck as the horse reared high and retreated.

All eyes were upon the rider and the stallion. They watched Jed cling and check the stallion in two attempts to jump the high fence at the southern end of the corral. They saw the stallion come out of the dust on a dead run but Jed was still aboard.

He had slowed the horse in his mad run, but at this moment, Bug Barton acted upon his own impulse and stepped in with his rope.

The stallion quieted under the taut rope of Barton and under the caressing hand of his rider.

THERE were other swift movements as Jed came up. Sam Bailey had crashed his fist hard to Tom Early’s mouth. Two punchers were holding the arms of the ranch boss and another puncher stood over Early who was on one knee, blood trickling from his mouth. Patsy was on the verge of tears.

Sam Bailey began to cool off. “You can let go of me now, boys,” he said, and to Early who had gotten to his feet he said “Go along with Toby to the house and get your pay.”

The stallion had been taken away before Bug Barton joined the group. “I’ve seen a lot of bronc bustin’ in my time” Barton said, looking up at Jed. “But tell me how a button like you could handle that white critter. What’s the secret?”

Jed smiled. “Cloud and me were colts together in the Black Hills,” he explained. “He was still running with his mother when I first roped him. I never took him home because I thought Dad would sell him. I let him run wild but I knew where to find him when I wanted to renew our friendship. I always fetched some sugar for him and he knew I’d turn him loose again, after a ride.”

“That sounds mighty fantastic,” Bug said. “That stallion was the leader of a big band of mustangs when we snared him.”

“I know it” Jed returned. “But I rode him often after he was a leader. I meant to own him someday, but after Dad died I searched the hills without a trace of him. I wondered what happened until I saw him here.”

Patsy spoke then; “Jed can tell us all about it at the ranch house.”

She smiled at Jed and turned for an instant toward her father. “I’m the cook and you are all invited for a feast, this evening. O.K. Dad?”

Bailey nodded.

Barton spoke again, “Well, boss,” he said. “Looks like you’ll get your favorite horse gentled the way you want for your own use.”

Bailey had snapped completely out of his angry mood. “I guess you’re wrong there, Bug,” he said seriously. “The horse belongs to Jed here, by a natural right. Anyway the stallion won’t let anyone else ride him, I can see that. The best I can do is proposition Jed and offer him and his horse a steady job at the X Bar.” Patsy Bailey’s brown eyes sparkled.
An Uphill Fight

By C. C. STAPLES

John Steel was running away — running desperately from a torture of loneliness and grief. But it didn’t do any good, and he knew there were some things no man could leave behind him.

After the funeral, big, grizzled John Steel rode slowly back down the hill to the ranch. He dreaded the awkward condolences of his neighbors, their desire to take his mind off his great loss. So he let them ride on ahead. Group after group went slowly out through the gate of the little ranch cemetery. Fine folks, all, and friendly, kind neighbors, but just now he wanted to be alone.

When he rode up to the house, Steel pulled his horse down to a walk. It was as though there was something within the place that he dreaded to face. And there was: it was the specter of emptiness—loneliness.

His glance roved over the comfortable house, the big, well-built barn, and subconsciously he heard the dismal, monotonous squeak of the windmill as it turned in the evening breeze and sent a stream of cold water splashing into the mossy horse trough.

Steel squared his wide shoulders and shook his shaggy, graying head as though he could that way cast off the lost, hopeless depression that weighed him down. But, it was no use. A part of him had been left up on the hill, inside that little white fence among the pines. His wife Martha, was gone. He would never see her again.

Shorty Pope came slowly out of the bunk house and turned toward him. The widely bowed, thin legs of the old puncher gave him an awkward, rocking gait. He was the first hand that John Steel had ever hired. He and Martha had been mighty proud of this evidence of success when Shorty Pope moved his war bag onto the place. Now, there were fourteen other men in the bunk house besides the bowlegged little man.

Shorty pushed up his long gray mustaches and cleared his throat noisily "Put up yore horse for yuh, boss?" he asked.

Steel shook his head, not trusting himself to reply. He turned and jerked the latigo of his cinch, stripped saddle and blanket from the animal and hung them on the fence. Shorty unbuckled the throat latch of the bridle and took it off. The little puncher wanted to help—do something for Steel. But somehow, he was dumb in the presence of his old friend's grief.

John Steel turned and dragged his feet across the hard packed earth of the yard toward the big house, pushed the door open and went in. Without bothering to light a lamp, he made for his favorite chair that always stood by the fireplace. It seemed somehow, like an old friend as he sank into it.

But he couldn't keep still. He was hardly settled when he rose abruptly and went to a window. He could see Pawnee Charlie Bates, his foreman, as the man leaned a bony shoulder against a corner of the bunk house, a cigarette hanging from his thin lips, and glanced around without expression. Pawnee's eyes were black, closely set on either side of a beak nose that dominated his thin, narrow face. Lanky black hair stuck out from under his Stetson. He had been John Steel's foreman for a year. He knew cows, got along with the crew by very carefully minding his own business. Nobody shared Pawnee's thoughts.

Next Morning in the bright light of day things looked better to Steel. He called out his punchers and gave orders for the day's work through his foreman, Pawnee Charlie Bates. But the enthusiasm, the old dominating force was missing. All of the hands could see it. The old timers in the crew glanced at each other and shook their heads sadly.

Pawnee Charlie Bates saw it too, and a sly, scheming light rose in his eyes.

More out of force of habit than anything else, Steel caught up his favorite paint horse each morning when the hands saddled up, and rode out with them. But his interest faded quickly and by ten o'clock he was back at the house, seated on the gallery, rolling and smoking endless cigarettes and gazing absently into the distance.

More and more Pawnee Charlie Bates eased into control of the Bar S. He came and went as he pleased, issued orders to the punchers without consulting his boss at all. And one night, sitting on the gallery talking to Shorty Pope, Steel saw Pawnee Bates leave the corral at a fast run, headed for Hondo, six miles to the east.

Shorty jumped to his feet. "John! That danged breed's ridin' yore paint horse," he snapped. "You tell 'im he could do that?"

Steel growled, "No! I shore didn't. I don't let no man ride that paint. If that was my horse, I'll skin Pawnee alive. Nobody...."

"I'll go check up and see," Shorty cut in. He headed for the corral on the jump. Ten minutes later he came stomping angrily back onto the gallery. "Yore paint horse is gone, boss. And that there new saddle of yourn too," he reported. "And John, while we're talkin' I'm goin' to tell yuh somethin' that Pawnee Bates should have told yuh before this. There's rustlin' goin' on, on the Bar S, here."

"Rustling! Couldn't be...unless Pawnee Bates or some of his kin-folks...."
"That's just it, John. That's just what I'm bettin' on. Last week I missed fifteen of them fat steers from Permanente Spring meadow. First of this week I counted again: there's ten more of 'em gone—the best stock we got. Now, I hate to accuse anybody on the place, but...."

"Pawnee Bates and his kin!" John Steel snarled. "If anybody is pulling anything, it's that half breed. I was a fool to ever hire 'im. I should have fired 'im long ago. He's been getting altogether too important around here for a long time. Hard to prove rustling on 'im I reckon, unless we catch 'im in the act. He's slick. But taking my horse and saddle: I'll sure kick 'im off the ranch as soon as he comes back. Should have done it long ago."

SHORTY POPE grinned to himself in the darkness. This was more like the John Steel that he had known all these years. "Now you're talkin', boss," he grunted "I never did trust that breed. Now you're talkin' more like...." Shorty left the sentence unfinished, but Steel understood. He relapsed into silence that Shorty could not rouse him from. And when Pawnee Bates rode in the next morning on a fast stepping, stylish grullo gelding and leading John Steel's paint, Steel merely told him, in a listless tone, "Don't ever fork that paint again, Pawnee."

Pawnee Bates stared insolently for a minute, his gaze roving from Steel's head to his feet. "Don't reckon I'll want to," he sneered. He put a hand on the grullo's withers. "Done bought a good hawss last night. Saddle too, and all the fixins. Tired of grubbins, along like a forty a month puncher." He pulled a new thirty dollar Stetson down over his right eye, hitched up his fancy riding pants to show new, bench made boots and turned away.

Pawnee out of hearing, Shorty Pope growled, "What'd I tell yuh, boss? Where'd that breed get money enough to buy a fine grullo horse like that? And that fine, high priced hat and them hand-made boots? Go on and fire 'im, boss. He and his half breed kin folks 'll rustle yuh clean if yuh don't."

John Steel wheeled toward Pawnee, took a few steps, then shrugged his shoulders, turned and dragged his feet slowly back to the house and seated himself wearily on the gallery. He was gazing vacantly at nothing, when Pawnee Bates rode past leading the hands out to the day's work.

Then came the day, during the unrelenting heat of the Arizona midsummer, when Shorty Pope rode in from the range on a limping horse, to find John Steel throwing a squaw hitch on the tarp-covered pack of an extra horse.

Shorty stared for a moment, something like panic growing in his heart. "Goin' some place, boss?" he got out at last.

"Takin' a pasear up north. Maybe into Utah," Steel grunted, carefully keeping his eyes away from Shorty's gaze. He felt guilty, as though he were quitting under fire.

"Comin' back soon?"

"Don't know, Shorty. Might be back before winter—might not. Don't make any difference, anyhow."

Shorty took time to roll a smoke and round up his courage. Then he said, "John, I know how yuh feel, I reckon. But I never looked to see yuh quit, cold."

John Steel yanked the hitch tight on his pack horse and wheeled. There was a dangerous glint in his gray eyes. "That 'll be about all of that, Shorty," he snapped.

Shorty Pope was almost grinning and he turned quickly to strip the saddle from his lame horse, to hide his satisfaction.

But Shorty was discounting a hurt that was a lot deeper than he knew. Steel turned back to his paint horse and gathered up his reins. "You'll take orders from Pawnee Bates from now on, Shorty," he growled as he slid his boot into the stirrup.

Shorty Pope turned around quickly. "Boss," he said, "Miz Steel had as much to do with buildin' up this here spread as you—mebbe more. She was mighty proud of it all. She was as proud of them new Hereford critters as you was. And boss, I seen two of them fine bulls and six white-faced cows, a-runnin' with them lean longhorns, down by the Big Sandy today. What you think she'd have thought of that?"

John Steel took his boot from the stirrup and stared, scowling. "Pawnee knows better 'n to allow them breeds to mix," he flared. "I'll skin him alive if...."

"Yeah." Shorty cut in. "You would have, while Miz Steel was here. But now you're a plum quitter."

"Shut up! Shut up, I tell yuh!" Steel's voice was a hoarse roar. He turned from his animals, staggered away a few steps, his eyes tortured.

SHORTY started for him as he turned and leaned on his saddle for support. He was breathing heavily. Shorty thought he had him going now, for sure. Then suddenly, with an impatient gesture John Steel flung himself headlong into his saddle and rowelled the paint horse savagely. "Good bye, Shorty," he yelled over his shoulder. "I know what you're trying to do. But I just ain't got the heart, no more. I'm quitting. I can't stand it, I tell yuh. I'll go crazy!" He went at a full run out of the corral and headed north, dragging the pack horse after him. Before sundown he had put twenty miles between him and the Bar S.

Early and late, day after day, Steel rode north, and every camp fire measured off another long step away from the ranch and the misery that was eating his heart out. He was running away—running desperately from a torture of loneliness and grief. But it didn't seem to do any good. Night after night, sitting gazing into his camp fire, his mind took him back to the Bar S, to Martha, and he knew there were some things that a man could not run away from.

On the tenth day of his desperate flight he suddenly knew that his quest for peace and a measure of contentment with his lot, was hopeless. He was trying to make up his mind to turn his gaunt animals around and hit the back trail. Then, as he rode over a ridge he saw below him a one room sod shack, a small barn, a pole corral. There was a young woman—not much more than a girl, she looked, in the yard before the cabin. Some chickens were busily scratching their living, near the barn and a pump stood by a water trough close to the house.

John Steel sat his horse, absent-minded with tobacco and papers while his mind went back about thirty years, to the time when he and Martha had started out with a little ranch much like the one below him, and with an eagerness new to him he urged his animals down the slope and rode toward the little sod house.

As he rounded the corner of the shack, the girl jumped hurriedly from the bench near the door and took a quick step toward him. Then her face fell. "Oh! I thought sure it was Pete, coming home," she burst out. He could see that she had been crying and she turned away briefly, dabbing at her eyes with a corner of her bandanna.

Steel sat undecided until the girl turned and said, "Don't mind me, stranger. Get down and rest yourself. Your horses look like you'd come a long way."

"Reckon I dropped in at a bad time, Ma'am. If I'm bothering you, I'll ride on." He gathered up his reins.

"No! Please don't go. I haven't talked to a soul for weeks, and I'm so plumb lonesome I'm just about ready to quit and go away for good."

There was in her eyes a sort of little-girl look of pleading that he couldn't resist. He dismounted, and presently, his horses unsaddled and enjoying a roll in the warm dust of the pole corral, John Steel was seated beside Olga Bowen on the shady bench just outside the cabin door.

"Your husband, Ma'am—Pete, I reckon his name would be from what you said," Steel began. "He's away from the spread?"

"Yes. He left and went down into southern Arizona to try to get his old job back. He was foreman on a big ranch down there three years ago, when we were married."

"Looks like he had a mighty tidy little spread, right here, Ma'am. A little hard work and you two young 'uns could make a good thing out of this place. I saw that much as I rode across yore range."

"Oh yes! I know it. Why, last year we cleared nearly three hundred dollars. But that didn't satisfy Pete. He grew terribly discouraged. I tried my best and worked hard to keep his ambition up. But it was no use. He wanted to throw away all our hard work and sell out and go somewhere else to find a job."

"He's probably young, and impatient to fix things so you could take your ease. I felt that way too, when Mrs. Steel and I first took up our land, farther down in Arizona."

Steel had held back his smile as Olga told him of their small gain with such pride. But his interest was stirred strongly. This girl, with her wide blue eyes and blond hair tucked up under her Stetson, her determined little chin and sturdy form in levis and rough flannel shirt, was so like Martha had been when they started life together, so long ago. He too, had been discouraged enough at his slow progress, to quit any number of times. And he knew that he likely would have quit, except for Martha's pride in their little spread and her constant encouragement.

"What do you figure to do now, Ma'am?" he asked.

"Well, I love this little place. It's home to me, and I just hate the thought of leaving it. Anyway, when Pete wanted to sell, I put my foot down and refused to let him. So he rode off south one day, after a job. Said he'd send for me. But I know he'll be back. Oh, I'd like so much to just stay on here and make a go of this place. Once I get it going, Pete will see how right I am."

John Steel's mind was busy and interested with the girl's problems already. There was a smile on his face for the first time in weeks, as he turned away to roll a cigarette and do some thinking.

The smoke drawing well, he wheeled abruptly to Olga and said, "Ma'am, you're as right as rain about sticking to this spread. A few years and a lot of hard work and you'll have a fine paying ranch here. You got water and grass. I saw that much as I rode in. There's everything you need to make a go of it." He paused and chuckled. "You might be telling me the story of the way Martha and I started out, for all the difference there is."

"And you were like Pete too—all impatience to get ahead at one big jump?"

"Yes. Just like that. Guess it's man-nature. But now, I know cows. Been running my Bar S, down Arizona way for nigh unto thirty years and if you'll have it, I'd like to stay around and help. Anyhow until that young rooster, Pete, gets back. And when he does, I'll talk to him. I'm a whole lot older'n he is, and maybe he'll listen to me."

"Oh, but I can't afford to hire anybody to help..."

"We won't say anyting about pay, Ma'am, if you don't mind," Steel cut in. "Fact is, you'll be doing me a big favor. You don't know how much it'll mean to me. But, some time before I leave, I'll tell you all about it. Coming up this way, last few days, I was running away from something. Leastwise, I was trying to. No, it wasn't the law, but well.... I'll tell you all about it, soon's I can work up the grit."

Olga was beaming, her enthusiasm at high pitch. "It would mean the difference between getting along, and failure, and.... Why, already I feel as though I'd known you all my life. Almost as if you were my father—like that. And when Pete comes home I know he'll listen to you and thank you for showing how to make the ranch pay."

STARTING the following morning when John Steel crawled out of his bunk in the barn, his days were filled with hard work, the sort of work he liked best. And in hard work, he was almost happy again. Olga rode and worked with him and his admiration for the girl grew, day by day.

Fall came and waned. Round up was over and Steel had dickered with a trail driver, coming down over the Bozeman trail, for the sale of the herd. He had combed the brush in the foothills for mavericks until no more could be found on the Bowen range, and the profits for the season ran over eight hundred dollars after all expenses had been met. Pretty good, for a ranch that was just being developed.

Olga’s gaze went more and more often as winter came closer, to the trail from the south where it came over a low ridge, and her blue eyes clouded with worry as each search revealed nothing but empty landscape. Pete was on her anxious mind constantly, but she rode about her ranch looking over all the new developments with constantly increasing pride. Satisfaction shone from her eyes like a bright light, at what she saw on every hand.

The barn was jammed with good meadow hay and the feed lot had several stacks to carry the breeder stock over the winter while the range would be deep with snow.

Steel had finally found himself, in the hard work of the summer and fall. He was the rugged and determined John Steel of old. And he too, was scanning the trail from the south with increasing impatience. The Bar S was ever on his mind and he was becoming more and more anxious to get back to his own ranch and take command again. His thoughts, as always, went to Martha and his great loss when she died. But now he was a different, a more resigned and philosophical John Steel than the one who had ridden away from the Bar S so desperately, seeking escape from a pain that was slowly driving him crazy.

Then, as September waned and the first frost was beginning to whiten the sere range grass in the early mornings, two riders came down over the ridge from which Steel had first sighted the little Bowen spread, their shadows reaching out long into the east.

Busy in the barn, working saddle soap into his horse gear and getting his pack saddle in order, John Steel did not note their approach until they rode into the hard packed yard.

He went to the door quickly and a little, grizzled, bow legged puncher, spotting him, greeted him with a wild, shrill yell, leaped from his gaunt horse and ran to him on his wide bowed legs. His long gray mustaches bobbed excitedly over his toothless old mouth and there was a wide grin on his weather beaten face.

Olga hurried to the door of the cabin, her hands white with flour. She stopped short, her face suddenly gone pale. Then she shriiled, “Pete!” and ran headlong into the arms of the tall, blond, young giant who had ridden over the ridge from the south, with Shorty.

Shorty Pope was vigorously pumping Steel’s hand, satisfaction and pleasure written all over him. “By hell! I shore am glad I found yuh at last,” he shouted. “Been a-ridin’ for a month lookin’ for yuh. Fell in with Bowen there, couple days ago.” He stood back and looked Steel over keenly. “Boss, yuh shore look fine. Yuh look ten years younger ’n yuh did when yuh pulled out from the old Bar S. Now we can go back and give that thiefin’ Pawnee Bates what fur.”

John Steel was grinnin’ all over his face. He whacked the loyal old puncher on the back. “You old horse thief! You’re a sight for sore eyes,” he whooped. “But what’s this about Pawnee Charlie Bates? What’s wrong at the ranch? Did Pawnee...”

“Plenty’s wrong, boss. Plenty! That no-account breed’s stealin’ yuh clean, just like I told yuh he would. He’s fired all the old hands and put in his half breed kin folks. And he’s Moist eyes searched Jigger Moran's face then Professor Scott nodded slowly. Jigger resumed, "Sally Woods was an alias assumed by an heiress born Susan Hunter. Her home life was a sordid story of a tyrannical father who perverted her natural development, plotted to steal a fortune bequeathed by her grandmother, and manipulated her into marriage with a pathological cousin. From all that, she sought to escape. That's why she took up as Sally Woods here in New York."

Scott was listening raptly, believingly. He said, "It explains a great portion of her writing for me. There have been clear allusions to just such conditions as you have described. A father is strongly hinted, over and over again."

"Good! I was hoping to wring some clues something of real help, from those writings. With his daughter gone, Matthew Hunter, the father, circulated news of her death, carrying the hoax even to prima facie certification and burial procedure. Undoubtedly, he sought to find her and kill her—whenever and wherever he could."

"The girl was deathly afraid to return home, afraid to assume her identity. I know that she was in telephone communication with her father not long before she was killed, and I also know the father knew where she was living, under the name of Anne Brown."

Scott said clearly, "That fits in with another exercise of hers—at last. It was a conflict of decision and fear."

"That fits in with our first time together and I remembered it when the girl's aunt spoke of a recent phone call. The girl undoubtedly wanted to go home, wanted to expose the cruel hoax; she probably found the courage to threaten that she would just before she was murdered."

"Her father, then, murdered her?" There was a shiver in Scott's tones.

THE LAW WAGON

By Harold Gluck

TO SOME people the old West means a series of standardized scenes concerning cowboys, shooting, branding irons, cattle, rustlers, a pretty heroine, and a hero. To others the old West brings forth a long wagon train crossing the plains. Hopes and dreams are blended in the desired goal across the horizon. There are the problems of food, water, sickness, reliable scouts, and the ever-feared Indian attacks. And there are those to whom the old West meant a series of names. They included Sitting Bull, General Custer, Doc Holliday, Wyatt Earp, the James Boys, Billy the Kid, the Bad Lands, Texas, U.S. Marshals, Buffalo Bill, General Mills, and many others.

Actually the winning and building of the West consists of the stories of the millions who lived and died all kinds of lives. Pick out any character at random, turn the spotlight upon this individual, and you have a true story. The man we will now follow is John Barney Sweeney, a murderer, a train robber, a monopoliment liar, and a little pebble of life who wanted to be a big shot.

eastern portion of the State of Oklahoma, was the scene of many hold-ups and brutal murders during the early days. On the night of September 13, 1882, as a north-bound M.K. & T. passenger train was being moved out onto the main line from a siding about a mile north of Vinita, two men climbed onto the front platform of the smoker. "Chick" Warner, the conductor noticed them and opened the door. Before a word had been spoken, one of the men shot the conductor in the cheek with a small caliber revolver, making a painful and dangerous wound.

The man who is said to have done the shooting, was then shot and instantly killed by his companion. A lifeless body fell across the platform of the car. The man who did the killing stepped from the train and walked back to the Vinita station. There he spoke to the station agent and said that the train had been held up by the famous James brothers and Ed Miller. He named others who had often been mentioned as members of the notorious James gang. He stated that this gang had been camping in the woods on Little Cabin Creek, about four miles to the north of the scene of the alleged hold-up. He said he had known them all personally before coming into the territory having been born and raised in Clay County, Missouri. He also said he was a cousin of the James Boys, and told the station agent that he was an expert marksman with a revolver and rifle, and that he had been practising shooting with his gang. He had beaten them all shooting at a target and he agreed to aid them in holding up the train for the purpose of causing their arrest and punishment later on.

The story was either the result of a very fertile imagination or it was true. The puzzled station agent at once notified his superiors. Col. Eddy, the General Manager, wired one of the best railroad detectives of the day to investigate the entire case. So the next day Thomas Furlong, Chief Special Agent of the Gould System, arrived at Vinita.

DOUBLE ACTION WESTERN

As a result of questioning, Fur-long learned that the man who had done the killing was one John Barney Sweeney. The victim was an unknown man who had appeared in the neighborhood looking for work. He had met Sweeney and the latter had talked him into the hold-up. Sweeney was a man about five feet seven inches tall, sort of stout, stocky built, about thirty years of age, and dark-complexioned. His dark small eyes were offset by a luxurious head of black hair and he wore a rather pretentious, long mustache. All in all, he tipped the scales at about one hundred and eighty pounds. His tongue was always busy informing those who would listen, of his great marksmanship and how fearless he was.

SWEENEY had been arrested and tried for the murder of a reputable farmer of the neighborhood. This man had been shot and killed one evening while sitting on the porch of his home with his infant baby in his arms. The shot was fired from behind a thick hedge, from the opposite side of the road, and from a distance of perhaps seventy-five feet from where the farmer was sitting. Sweeney was seen going towards the farmer's house a short time before the shooting had occurred. He had also been seen returning to his home from the same direction some time after the shooting. He was carrying a rifle. He was arrested and tried for the murder of the man. It was proved at the trial that he had once threatened the life of the dead man. But he was acquitted since there was no direct evidence of his guilt.

His reputation in the vicinity was easy to state: He was a suspected horse-thief, a notorious liar, absolutely unreliable, and a treacherous coward.

This was the man that Detective Furlong had decided to arrest. He was going to charge him with having shot and seriously wounded the conductor of the train as well as having killed the confederate in the hold-up.

At this time, Captain Sam Siskiller, a fullblooded Cherokee Indian was Chief of the United States Indian
THE BIG, BAD MR. SWEENEY

Police and lived at Muskogee. This police force was maintained by the United States Government. It consisted entirely of Indians of good reputation. It was their duty to patrol the Indian Territory. They were armed and mounted and were there to protect the law-abiding Indians, and other residents, and their property. Special attention was given to whiskey-peddlers who were breaking the Federal laws by selling cheap whiskey at exorbitant prices. Sixkiller and his force had all the authority to arrest any person charged with a crime, on sight or complaint.

Since Furlong was a private Detective, he wired from Vinita to Sixkiller at Muskogee, requesting him to come and arrest a law-breaker. An answer was received stating that Sixkiller was confined to his bed with a severe attack of fever. Furlong then went to Sixkiller's brother, Luke, who was a member of the Indian police force. He asked Luke to join in an arrest of Sweeney. Luke said he would not dare to arrest Sweeney unless his brother, the Chief, were present. "Why", he said, "this man Sweeney is a terror. He is a wonderful shot with either rifle or pistol; it will take at least a half dozen men, well-armed, to capture him. He is a desperate man; we will have to wait until the Chief gets well enough to come and help capture him."

Furlong then ordered one of his assistants, William H. Bonnell, to come with him. The private detective decided he would try to capture Sweeney himself. However, Bonnell convinced Furlong that if the two of them tried to capture the criminal, at least one of them would be killed. So Bonnell remained behind and Furlong hired a horse from a livery stable. He reached the Sweeney home and there on the porch, with a Winchester rifle leaning against the building, was the wanted man. Furlong dismounted and started to crawl through a set of bars that served as a gate to the house. As soon as he had gotten inside the bars, Sweeney commanded him to throw up his hands and (Continued on page 90) backed up his words with the Winchester. “Who are you and who do you want?” he demanded. The detective had to do some quick thinking to remain alive; he replied, “My name is Foster and I want to see Mr. John B. Sweeney.” “I am John B. Sweeney” was the reply; “what do you want with me?”

Furlong answered, “I beg your pardon, Mr. Sweeney, but is that gun loaded that you have pointed at me?”

This bit of humor produced the desired results. Sweeney laughed and replied, “What the hell do you think I would be doing with this gun if it were not loaded?”

“Well”, said Furlong, “if that gun is loaded I wish you would turn the muzzle of it in some other direction. That horse I have down there is one that I borrowed from the livery man at Vinita to ride over here on. And if that gun would accidently go off it might scare the horse and cause him to break loose or maybe hurt me. If the horse got away I would have a lot of trouble catching him, and if I did not catch him the livery man would make trouble for me. Furthermore, I did not come over here anyway to get shot; if I had expected there would be any shooting I wouldn’t have come.”

TALK ABOUT honeyed words that distract people… Furlong certainly knew how to handle them. Sweeney’s brain-power was distracted from any idea of killing the intruder. “What did you come here for?” he asked. And Furlong was ready with more words to allay any possible suspicions. “Col. Eddy, General Manager of the M.K. & T. road, went south last night, passing Vinita on his special train. He wired me from Eufaula, in a cipher, to come out here and see John B. Sweeney and ask him to come over to Vinita and meet him on his return north to Parsons. He said in the message that he expected to arrive at Vinita about eleven-thirty today. And that he wanted to have a private talk with you to arrange with him for your services in assisting in the capture Christ.

God, Man or Myth?

Did Christ himself write down any record of His life? If so, where are these writings today? Do they exist in any museum or library of sacred shrines? Can you find a trace of them in the vast and mysterious subterranean archives of the Vatican in Rome? The answer is NO! Nowhere has any man been able to discover a single word that Jesus wrote!

Who, then, wrote the Christian Gospels? And when were they written? By some historian after the death of Christ? Or are these Gospels merely myths and legends handed down to us from a civilization that existed long before the time of Christ?

At last you can get the FACTS about Christ and the Christian Church in a startling new book just off the press called "A Shield Has Two Sides" written by the eminent author, scholar and historian Wallace Stockwell.

Here is a book for people who are not afraid to look reality in the face! A book for men and women who refuse to wear mental blindness! It reveals TRUTH about the Christian Church of today—both Catholic and Protestant—that will shock many. For it pulls no punches and presents facts known to but few.

"A Shield Has Two Sides" is not sold through bookstores for reasons you will readily understand after you have read the first few pages. But the Publishers will gladly accept your order and confirm on approval to any sincere seeker of knowledge, over 21, who seeks unbiased facts about the Christian Church and how it functions today. Dramatic illustrations. Send only $1.00 in full payment.

of the parties implicated in the hold-up that occurred at Vinita a few days before.

"If you are Mr. Sweeney, and will accompany me back to Vinita we will just about have time to reach there before Col. Eddy's train arrives. The Colonel does not want the people at Vinita to know that you have met him. He has been led to understand that the people of that town do not like you. He will run his train onto the siding about a quarter of a mile from Vinita. We can leave our horses at the livery stable and walk to the side track."

The bait worked.

Sweeney called his brother-in-law and said, "Go and put the saddle on Baldy." Baldy was Sweeney's horse. He turned to Furlong and said, "Come up and take a seat here on the porch while I go up and get ready to go with you." He took his rifle and went upstairs. Furlong sat down for only a few minutes when Sweeney appeared in the doorway. He was in his shirt sleeves and in his left hand was a nine-inch .45 Colt six shooter. They mounted their horses and started back to town. In his mind the detective was working out a plan to capture the bad man and not run the risk of having that .45 emptied into his body. He mentioned to Sweeney that he had occupied the corner room in the hotel at Vinita the night before. Then he said, "I have not settled my bill and my grip is still in the room. I think we had better ride to the livery stable and leave our horses there. You had better go to my room direct. I will go from the stable to the telegraph office and find out from the operator where Col. Eddy's train is and what time it is expected."

THE TWO men separated. Furlong waited awhile and then went to the back of the hotel. He climbed a flight of stairs leading from the back yard to the second floor of the hotel. He went to his room and found the door half way open. Looking through a crack between the door and the jamb, he could spot Sweeney lying down on his bed with hat, boots, and spurs on.
THE BIG, BAD MR. SWEENEY

Entering noiselessly, the detective took a small double-barrel, Remington derringer from his pocket. Suddenly he thrust the gun into Sweeney's mouth, breaking two of his upper teeth loose. He ordered him to throw up his hands. The startled man obeyed orders—especially with a gun in his mouth! Furlong then removed the belt and holster with that nine-inch .45 colt. The prisoner was then taken to the local calaboose.

The next train to town brought Capt. Sam Sixkiller, who had left his sickbed. Together with Furlong, they took their man to the jail at Fort Smith, Arkansas. Sweeney went to trial but was acquitted.

IN HIS return to Clay County, Missouri, Sweeney wrote a threatening letter to A. A. Talmage, then General Manager of the Missouri Pacific Railroad. He demanded ten thousand dollars at once or else. . . . The alternative consisted in a threat to blow up a bridge, destroy property in general, and kill Furlong on sight. But Sweeney's brain cells were not working; he sent the letter through the U. S. Mail. Furlong was called in at once and got a warrant for Sweeney's arrest from the U. S. Commissioner. With a deputy sheriff he set out for Sweeney's house.

The bad man was in bed when Furlong knocked on the door. With shot-gun in hand Sweeney yelled, "I am here—and will kill any man who attempts to come up those stairs." When it was over, Sweeney went back mildly with Furlong to St. Louis. This time he was given four years in the penitentiary. Upon his release he went back home. He was determined to make good as a bad man, so he tried to rob a Wabash passenger train at Missouri City. Net result was that a telegraph operator shot him in the ankle and he was captured. This time he was given fourteen years. He lived to leave prison and then tried to make money on a claim he knew where a hidden lost treasure could be found. After that he fades out of the picture. He wanted to be a big shot, a terrible terror, and just fizzled the job.

“Hold on, Shorty. Hold your horses, now. Let’s go into the barn and sit down for a spell, and talk. First thing in the morning we’ll hit the back trail.”

It was an hour later when Olga and Pete came into the barn. Young Pete Bowen came up to John Steel, his hand extended, a serious look on his face. “Olga’s been telling me all that went on here after I tucked my tail and ran out on her, like a yella coyote,” he began. “Don’t reckon I know enough words to try to thank you for it all. But anyhow, I do thank you and I’m going to carry on from now until we got the best spread in Utah. I’m mighty ashamed of myself for not being able to...."

John Steel chuckled shortly. “Bowen, you talk about running away,” he interrupted. “Well, I did just that, and...."

“Now, all of you men just come in to supper before my biscuits get cold and spoil,” Olga cut in. “We can sit around the fire and talk afterwards.”

EARLY NEXT morning John Steel and Shorty were riding south, their horses’ hoofs cutting through the frost whitened grass with a sharp, hissing sound. The Bowens rode part way with them, and at the limits of their range, sat their horses and waved good by until they were out of sight. Olga and young Pete had made them both promise to come back for a visit the following summer.

**

Ten days later, Steel and Shorty Pope rode in over the north boundary of the Bar S under a threatening, cloudy sky. “Maybe I’d better go round up the boys,” Shorty said. “Most of them are hanging around Hondo, I reckon.”

“Good idea. I’ll want them on the place right away. And Shorty, I’ll be

ONE or two promotions ... several pay raises ... and then that long, long stretch "on the shelf." You want to keep on climbing. You want to feel that you are getting somewhere. But how?

I, C. S. can show you. A little more training could be all you need to get back in the upswing. An advanced course or a "refresher"—studied in your spare time—will help prepare you for the next step, will show that you are ready to handle more responsibility, a better job.

Trained men get the "breaks"! That's a fact proved over and over again by the records of former I. C. S. students.

You don't want to bog down in your job. You don't want to remain "on the shelf" with the untrained. Mail the coupon today for complete information on how you can join the steady climbers.

To the man who wants to enjoy an ACCOUNTANT'S CAREER

IF you're that man, here's something that will interest you. Not a magic formula—but something more substantial, more practical. Of course, you've got to pay the price, study earnestly. Still, wouldn't it be worth while for a brief period—provided the rewards were good—a salary of $4,000 to $10,000? An accountant's duties are interesting, varied, of real worth to his employer. He has standing. Why not, like so many before you, let LaSalle's Problem Method start you climbing?

Suppose you could work in a large accounting firm under the personal supervision of an expert accountant—solving easy problems at first then more difficult ones. With his advice, soon you'd master them all.

For your own good, write for free 48-page book, "Accountancy, the Profession that Pays!"—plus "Ten Years' Promotion in One," a book which has helped many men. Mail the coupon NOW.

need a new foreman. You've been with me a long time and I don't reckon I know a man I could trust more." He wheeled and ran his horses toward home. His paint horse and the pack animal, after the manner of horses, the world over knew instinctively that they were near the home barn and both broke into a free run.

Thirty minutes later, John Steel stood in his home corral and looked the old familiar scene over once more. But now, there was no tortured desire in his heart to get away. Now, this was home; the old, friendly, comfortable home place that he had known for so many years.

He started toward the house, wondering where Pawnee was. He was still a dozen paces short of the steps when Pawnee Charlie Bates flung the front door open, took three long strides out onto the gallery. For a moment he stared, his jaw fallen, unable to believe what he saw.

Then he ripped off one blasting oath, and his hands dove for his guns. But that moment when he stared, lost him any chance he might have had. His six-guns hadn't cleared leather when both of John Steel's Colts were spewing hot lead. The breed folded in the middle and collapsed on the boards of the gallery.

"John Steel made sure that there was no more danger to be expected from Pawnee, then had his leisurely look around the place, stared at all the old familiar sights. And then, as Shorty led the old Bar S Punchers into sight at a run he turned and rode slowly up onto the knoll where the tall pines grew.

He left his horse outside the cemetery fence and went quietly inside, and stood for long minutes beside Martha's grave, his Stetson in his hand. At last, a smile spread slowly over his face and he said, as though she stood before him and could hear his words, "It's all right now, Martha. I've come back to you and our spread. Everything 's all right."
