

The PHANTOM 10¢ DETECTIVE

APR.

THE MURDER BUND

A Full-Length
Novel Featuring the World's Greatest Sleuth
By ROBERT WALLACE

A THRILLING
PUBLICATION

"WE WERE ENTOMBED IN A MOUNTAIN LABYRINTH!"

A true experience of W. B. BOLTON, Monett, Mo.

"A MYSTERIOUS 'MANHOLE' in the roof of an Ozark mountain cavern we were exploring one day intrigued us," writes Mr. Bolton. "With no sense of danger, we wriggled through the hole and into the inky darkness of a cave beyond. For hours, we explored.

"THEN TO OUR HORROR, we found that we were lost! Visions of searching parties finding our bones, months afterward, flashed in my mind as we searched for the exit. The candles flickered out as the hours passed. Only the flashlight was left.

"AFTER SEVEN HOURS and a half of hideous searching, we came upon the exit to safety. We had found our way back to life again, thanks to our flashlight and its dependable 'Eveready' fresh DATED batteries!"

(Signed) W. B. Bolton

The word "Eveready" is a registered trade-mark of National Carbon Company, Inc.

FRESH BATTERIES LAST LONGER... Look for the DATE-LINE

NATIONAL CARBON COMPANY, INC., 30 EAST 42nd STREET, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Unit of Union Carbide  and Carbon Corporation

Will You Be Clerk or Manager Ten Years from Now?

"SURELY, this could never happen to me," you say—"that I should be sitting at the same desk—be doing the same work—for ten straight years!" But wait a minute—

Exactly that same thing has happened to thousands upon thousands of men. It has probably happened to men right in the company you now are working for. And—unless you fit yourself for a better job—there is a very good chance that it may happen to you!

Unthinkable? That's what J. N. Dixon of Columbus, Ohio, said to himself. Yet lack of training kept him slaving away at low wages for a long time.

TRIPLES INCOME

Here is Mr. Dixon's own story—"Just after I returned from the war, one of your representatives found me plugging away at a bookkeeper's job in Marietta, Ohio. He performed a real service and explained to me the need of further training, and induced me to take the LaSalle training in Higher Accountancy. After a few months of study, I secured a position with the Trust Department of a National Bank. This was the stepping stone I needed to various responsible positions including handling of receiverships and other important duties. That quickly boosted my income several hundred percent."

ANOTHER AMAZING SUCCESS STORY

If you think Mr. Dixon's success story unusual, please read what J. H. Krouse of Memphis, Tennessee, says. "When I decided to take your training in Higher Accountancy, I was a clerk. Today I am Chief Consultant Accountant for the U. S. Engineer's Office in Memphis, Tenn. Whatever success or recognition I have had, I owe to your training. I have had no other specialized training along this line. Your method of teaching is not only instructive but highly engaging. I have observed other courses, but firmly believe LaSalle has the best to be had anywhere."

Another bit of evidence is Mr. R. P. Barthalow's experience. Mr. Barthalow is Chief of the Sales Tax Section of the Tax Commission of Ohio. A department which handles over $50,000,000 a year. Mr. Barthalow attributes much of his success to LaSalle training.

SEND FOR These Two Books and Start Toward Bigger Success

Need you hear more before you investigate the opportunities in Accountancy?

Or will you face the problem of your future NOW—and send to LaSalle and get further facts and particulars?

Without cost or obligation, the coupon will bring you two interesting books—one a 48-page book entitled, "Accountancy, the Profession that Pays"; the other "Ten Years' Promotion in One."

How about those next ten years—will you wait or will you START TODAY to realize the tremendous opportunities that lie ahead of you through sound and practical home-study business training?

Measure your grit and ambition by what you do with this coupon—NOW.

LaSalle Extension University A CORRESPONDENCE INSTITUTION

Dept. 4329-HR CHICAGO

Opportunities in Accountancy—Check below and we will send you a copy of "Accountancy, the Profession that Pays," also copy of "Ten Years' Promotion in One," all without obligation.

☐ Higher Accountancy: Leading to position as Auditor, Comptroller, Certified Public Accountant, Cost Accountant, etc.

Other LaSalle Opportunities: If more interested in one of the other fields of business indicated below, check that.

☐ Business Management ☐ Expert Bookkeeping
☐ C. P. A. Coaching
☐ Modern Salesmanship

☐ Traffic Management
☐ Law: Degree of LL. B.
☐ Industrial Management
☐ Modern Business Correspondence

☐ Stenotypy ☐ Business English
☐ Commercial Law
☐ Effective Speaking

Name..... Age.....

Present Position..... Address.....

● EVERY STORY BRAND NEW ●

Vol. XXXV, No. 1

APRIL, 1941

Price 10c

*Featuring the World's Greatest Sleuth
in*

A Full Book-Length Novel

THE MURDER BUND

By ROBERT WALLACE

Taken from the Case-book of Richard Curtis Van Loan (Profusely Illustrated)

Follow the Phantom Detective as He Takes the Trail of Fifth Column Killers Who Threaten the Peace and Security of America! Death Hangs Over a Great City when Democracy's Foes Plot a Grim Coup! 14

GRIPPING SHORT STORIES

CLIENT UNKNOWN Fredric Brown 91
Detective Carey Rix Thinks He's Broken His Jinx, But—

DEATH'S ADVANCE SHADOW . . . Arthur J. Burks 100
The Grim Reaper is Particular About Choosing Victims!

AND

THE PHANTOM SPEAKS A Department 8
Join FRIENDS OF THE PHANTOM! Coupon on Page 12

Published monthly by Standard Magazines, Inc., 10 East 40th Street, New York, N. Y. Entire contents copyrighted, 1941, by Standard Magazines, Inc. Subscription yearly, $1.20; single copies, $.10; foreign and Canadian postage extra. Entered as second-class matter November 10, 1932, at the Post Office at New York, N. Y., under the Act of March 3, 1879. 173
Names of all characters used in stories and semi-fiction articles are fictitious. If the name of any living person or existing institution is used, it is a coincidence. Manuscripts must be accompanied by self-addressed, stamped envelopes, and are submitted at the author's risk.

Read our companion magazines: Thrilling Western, Thrilling Ranch Stories, Thrilling Wonder Stories, Thrilling Adventures, Thrilling Sports, Thrilling Love, Thrilling Mystery, Thrilling Detective, Popular Western, Popular Detective, Popular Love, Popular Sports Magazine, Texas Rangers, G-Men Detective, Air War, West, The Lone Eagle, Sky Fighters, Everyday Astrology, Detective Novels Magazine, Masked Rider Western Magazine, Range Riders Western, The Rio Kid Western, Captain Future, Black Book Detective Magazine, The Green Ghost Detective, The Masked Detective, Strange Stories, Startling Stories, Exciting Love, Exciting Sports, Exciting Detective, and Exciting Western.

PRINTED IN THE U. S. A.

Are You HAUNTED by FEARS like these?

Suppose I am drafted! How can I become more than a private?

Will I stick in this same low pay job another 3 years?

Will a machine be invented that will wipe out my job?

Is there a way out for me? What can I do?

Bills! Bills! Will I ever be more than one jump ahead of the sheriff?

My job will be too tough ten years from now -- what then?

Where or how can I make more money?

You know that LOW PAY is at the bottom of nearly all fears that haunt a man's future. You know too that it takes specialized ability to get into the higher pay brackets. If fear of the future haunts you — if you can't see in the years ahead, security, freedom from money worries, here's an answer to "How can I acquire specialized ability"? Risk a postage stamp — find out what Radio offers.

Learn at Home to Make up to $50 a Week as a Radio Technician

Trained Radio Technicians make good money, and you don't have to give up your present job or leave home to learn Radio. I train you at home nights in your spare time.

Why Many Radio Technicians Make $30, $40, $50 a Week

Radio broadcasting stations employ operators, technicians. Radio manufacturers employ testers, inspectors, servicemen in good-pay jobs. Radio jobbers, dealers, employ installation and servicemen. Many Radio Technicians open their own Radio sales and repair businesses and make $30, $40, $50 a week. Others hold their regular jobs and make $5 to $10 a week fixing Radios in spare time. Automobile, Police, Aviation, Commercial Radio; Loudspeaker Systems, Electronic Devices are other fields offering opportunities for which N.R.I. gives the required knowledge of Radio. Television promises to open good jobs soon.

DRAFT REGISTRANTS!

Hundreds of men who know Radio when they enter military service are going to win specialist ratings in the Army, Navy and Marine Corps. These ratings pay up to 6 times a private's or seaman's base pay, in addition to carrying extra rank and prestige! Whether you enlist or wait for conscription — IT'S SMART TO LEARN RADIO — NOW!

Many Make $5 to $10 a Week Extra in Spare Time While Learning

The day you enroll, I start sending you Extra Money Job Sheets — start showing you how to do Radio repair jobs. Throughout your Course I send plans and directions which have helped many make $5 to $10 a week extra in spare time while learning. I send special Radio equipment to conduct experiments and build circuits. This 50-50 training method makes learning at home interesting, fascinating, practical. YOU ALSO GET A MODERN, PROFESSIONAL ALL-WAVE, ALL-PURPOSE SET SERVICING INSTRUMENT.

Find Out What Radio, Television Offer You — Mail Coupon

Act Today! Mail the coupon for my 64-page book, "Rich Rewards in Radio." It points out Radio's spare time and full time opportunities and those coming in Television; tells about my Course in Radio and Television; shows more than 100 letters from men I have trained, telling what they are doing and earning. Read my money back agreement. MAIL COUPON in an envelope or paste on a penny postcard — NOW!

J. E. SMITH, President
National Radio Institute
Dept. 1D09
Washington, D. C.

MAIL NOW • Get 64 page book FREE

J. E. SMITH, President, Dept. 1D09
National Radio Institute, Washington, D. C.

Mail me FREE, without obligation, your 64-page book, "Rich Rewards in Radio." (No salesman will call. Write plainly.)

Age.....

Name

Address

City..... State.....

Calling All Cars!

A MYSTERIOUS DISCOVERY
SAVES UP TO 30%
ON GASOLINE!
OR COSTS NOTHING TO TRY

VACU-MATIC
SETS NEW COAST-TO-CHICAGO RECORD

*Scores
Again*

Answer this call! Investigate this remarkable discovery that trims dollars off gasoline bills—gives you worthwhile gas savings—more power—greater speed—quicker pickup—faster acceleration. Proven so efficient, it is guaranteed to save up to 30% and give better performance or the trial costs you nothing.

Automatic Supercharge Principle

Vacu-matic is entirely different! It operates on the supercharge principle by automatically adding a charge of extra oxygen, drawn free from the outer air, into the heart of the gas mixture. It is entirely automatic and allows the motor to "breathe" at the correct time, opening and closing automatically as required to save dollars on gas costs.

Sworn Proof of Gas Savings

This certifies that I have carefully read 300 original letters received from Vacu-matic users testifying to gas savings up to 30%, many reporting added power, smoother running, and quicker pick-up. These letters are just a small part of the larger file of enthusiastic user letters that I saw at the company offices.

Signed Marvin J. Clouty
Notary Public

AGENTS Get Yours FREE For Introducing

Vacu-matic offers a splendid opportunity for unusual sales and profits. Every car, truck, tractor, and motorcycle owner a prospect. Valuable territories now being assigned. If you help us introduce it to a friend, you can obtain your own free. Check and mail coupon today.

SEND THIS Free Offer COUPON

THE VACU-MATIC COMPANY
7617-555 W. State St., Wauwatosa, Wis.
Please send full particulars about VACU-MATIC, also how I may obtain one for my own car FREE.
This does not obligate me in any way.

Name

Address

City..... State.....

☐ Check here if interested in Agency Proposition.

BOB McKENZIE
TRANS-CONTINENTAL AUTOMOBILE CHAMPION
COAST TO COAST

Vacu-matic Carburetor Co.
7617 W. State Street
Wauwatosa, Wisconsin

Dear Sirs:

Having just completed a new speed record between Los Angeles and Chicago, driving a Chevrolet equipped with a Vacu-matic carburetor control, I thought you might be interested in knowing some of the facts and the important part Vacu-matic played in the success of the run.

The distance covered was 2322 miles in thirty-nine hours and forty-two minutes, officially timed by Western Union, which gave me an average speed of 59.7 M.P.H. based on elapsed time and with the Vacu-matic averaged 18-1/2 miles per gallon on gasoline.

Before leaving Los Angeles, we made several test runs both with and without the Vacu-matic, and the tests proved that Vacu-matic increased my gas mileage 3-1/2 miles per gallon at the driving speed of 60 M.P.H. and also very noticeable increase in both acceleration and power.

Yours very truly,
Bob McKenzie

In addition to establishing new mileage records on cars in all sections of the country, the Vacu-matic has proven itself on thousands of road tests and on dynamometer tests which duplicate road conditions and record accurate mileage and horse power increases.

You, too, can make a road test with Vacu-matic on your car and prove its worthwhile gas savings to your entire satisfaction.

Learn all about this remarkable discovery. Get the facts NOW!

Fits All Cars

Easy To Install

Vacu-matic is constructed of six parts assembled and fused into one unit, adjusted and sealed at the factory. Nothing to regulate. Any motorist can install in ten minutes. The free offer coupon will bring all the facts. Mail it today!

The Vacu-matic Co.

Wauwatosa, Wis.

The 97 Pound Weakling

—Who became “The World’s Most Perfectly Developed Man”

“I’ll prove that YOU too can be a NEW MAN!”

—Charles Atlas

I KNOW, myself, what it means to have the kind of body that people pity! Of course, you wouldn’t know it to look at me now, but I was once a skinny weakling who weighed only 97 lbs! I was ashamed to strip for sports or undress for a swim. I was such a poor specimen of physical development that I was constantly self-conscious and embarrassed. And I felt only HALF-ALIVE.

Then I discovered “Dynamic Tension.” It gave me a body that won for me the title “World’s Most Perfectly Developed Man.”

When I say I can make you over into a man of giant power and energy, I know what I’m talking about. I’ve seen my new system, “Dynamic Tension,” transform hundreds of weak, puny men into Atlas Champions.

Only 15 Minutes a Day

Do you want big, broad shoulders—a fine, powerful chest—biceps like steel—arms and legs ripping with muscular strength—a stomach ridged with bands of sinewy muscle—and a build you can be proud of? Then just give me the opportunity to prove that “Dynamic Tension” is what you need.

No “ifs,” “ands,” or “maybes.” Just tell me where you want handsome, powerful muscles. Are you fat and flabby? Or skinny and gawky? Are you short-winded, pepless? Do you hold back and let others walk off with the prettiest girls, best jobs, etc.? Then write for details about “Dynamic Tension” and learn how I can make you a healthy, confident, powerful HE-MAN.

“Dynamic Tension” is an entirely NATURAL method. Only 15 minutes of your spare time daily is enough to show amazing results—and it’s actually fun! “Dynamic Tension” does the work.

Send for FREE BOOK

Mail the coupon right now for full details and I’ll send you my illustrated book, “Everlasting Health and Strength.” Tells all about my “Dynamic Tension” method. Shows actual photos of men I’ve made into Atlas Champions. It’s a valuable book! And it’s FREE. Send for your copy today. Mail the coupon to me personally. CHARLES ATLAS, Dept. 77D, 115 East 23rd St., New York, N. Y.

CHARLES ATLAS
Holder of title,
“The World’s Most Perfectly Developed Man.”

CHARLES ATLAS,
Dept. 77D,
115 East 23rd Street,
New York, N. Y.

I want the proof that your system of “Dynamic Tension” will help make a New Man of me—give me a healthy, husky body and big muscular development. Send me your free book, “Everlasting Health and Strength.”

Name.....
(Please print or write plainly.)

Address.....

City..... State.....

THOMAS J. HAMMOND was the first of the vanishing men.

Seated in the rear of his swank sixteen-cylindereed limousine, led by two bluecoats riding motorcycles, Thomas J. Hammond reflected complacently that he was safe from attack by any unknown agency. His chauffeur could be trusted; and beside him sat Detective O'Brien.

Hammond leaned back in his cushioned seat, puffed a cigar. The sirens of the two motorcycles wailed now as they picked up speed and cleared scant traffic before them. Behind the small but impressive escort, the limousine was racing toward Manhattan, unimpeded by traffic lights.

Suddenly, from that limousine on a clear stretch of road, a tendril of smoke curled insidiously, out of the open front window. With incredible swiftness, that smoke became a black, opaque cloud which surrounded the whole limousine like some black Satan's cloak.

The smoke-cloaked limousine veered crazily in the road, finally careened into a ditch. The two motorcycle police stopped their vehicles, dismounted and raced to the limousine. The car was stalled in the ditch, its two doors on that side both swinging wide-open.

Inside the car reposed two dead men. One was the chauffeur, a bullet hole in his forehead. The other was Detective O'Brien, his throat slashed.

But of Thomas J. Hammond there was not a single trace. Only his malacca stick remained!

The Second Victim

Benjamin Russell, millionaire, was the second of the vanishing men.

Benjamin Russell left his office on the thirtieth floor of the Heysler Building, walked to the bank of elevators, and pressed a button. A moment later a door opened, and Russell strode into the elevator. The operator pressed his down button, and the automatic doors slid closed.

"Straight down and no stops," ordered Russell.

On the main floor onyx-and-chrome lobby of the Heysler Building, Benjamin Russell's chauffeur and a private bodyguard he had recently hired, both awaited their employer, who, they knew, was on his way down. Their eyes were on the clock-like indicator above the elevator doors. It recorded the car's steady, uninterrupted descent. Smoothly the pointer scaled around over the down-numbers.

It paused finally at Number One. The automatic doors slid open.

A gasp ripped from the watching chauffeur and bodyguard. It echoed through the lobby. Somewhere a woman screamed and fainted, as—out of the opened elevator pitched the young, uniformed operator! He tumbled out, a knife stuck in his chest. Of Benjamin Russell, there was no sign. The car was empty.

The Snatcher

Somewhere during that steady, downward descent, that uninterrupted drop in a paneled car, the millionaire had vanished. Again some invisible magician seemed to have accomplished black wizardry—accompanied by murder!

Who is this mysterious abductor?

Listen in as an outlaw broadcaster cuts in on the very short waves used by the police and announces:

"Greetings to the police! This is the Snatcher!"

Evil and sibilant, the words came in precise English.

"Your vanished millionaires are here—in my hands. How did I whisk them away: where do I hold them?" A mocking, satanic laugh. "These are things you will never know. But just as you could not stop me from capturing these men, so

(Continued on page 10)

To those who think LEARNING MUSIC is hard...

PERHAPS you think that taking music lessons is like taking a dose of medicine. It isn't any longer!

As far as you're concerned, the old days of long practice hours with their scales and hard-work exercises and expensive personal teacher fees are over and done with.

For, through a method that removes the boredom and extravagance from music lessons, you can now learn to play your favorite instrument entirely at home—without a private teacher—in an amazingly short time—at a fraction of the usual cost.

Just imagine . . . a method that has made the reading and playing of music so downright simple that you don't have to know one note from another to begin. Do you wonder that this remarkable way of learning music has already been vouched for by over 700,000 people in all parts of the world?

EASY AS CAN BE!

The lessons come to you by mail from the famous U. S. School of Music. They consist of complete printed instructions, diagrams, and all the music you need. It's actually fun to learn this simple way. One week you are learning a dreamy waltz—the next you are mastering a stirring march. As the lessons continue they prove easier and easier. For instead of just scales you are always learning to play by actual notes the classic favorites and the latest syncopation that formerly you only listened to. And you're never in hot water. First, you are told how a thing is done. Then a picture shows you how, then you do it yourself and hear it. No private teacher could make it clearer or easier.

NEW FRIENDS—BETTER TIMES

Soon, when your friends say "please play something," you can surprise and entertain them with pleasing melodies on your favorite instrument. You'll find yourself in the spotlight—popular everywhere.

If you're tired of just looking-on at parties—if you've been envious of others entertaining your friends and family—if learning music has always been one of those never-to-come-true dreams, let the time-proven and tested home-study method of the U. S. School of Music come to your rescue.

Don't be afraid to begin your lessons at once. Over 700,000 people have studied music this modern way—and found it easy as A.B.C. Forget that old-fashioned idea that you need special "talent." And bear in mind no matter which instrument you choose, the cost in each case will average the same—just a few cents a day. No matter whether you are a mere beginner or already a good performer you will be interested in learning about this newly perfected method.

Our wonderful illustrated Free Book and our Free Print and Picture Sample explain all about this remarkable method. They show just how anyone can learn to play his favorite instrument by note in a short time and for just a fraction of what old slow methods cost.

Read the list of instruments below, decide which one you want to learn to play. Act NOW. Clip and mail this coupon today, and the fascinating Free Book and Free Print and Picture Sample will be sent to you at once. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit. U. S. School of Music, 2944 Brunswick Bldg., New York City.

FREE PRINT and PICTURE SAMPLE

U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, 2944 Brunswick Bldg., New York City

I am interested in music study, particularly in the instrument indicated below. Please send me your free illustrated booklet, "How to Learn Music at Home," and your illustrated Print and Picture Sample.

Piano	Cello	Trombone	Ukulele	Organ
Violin	Hawaiian	Cornet	Flute	Modern Elementary
Guitar	Guitar	Trumpet	Piccolo	Harmony
Accordion	Banjo	Harp	Drums and	Voice culture
Saxophone	Mandolin	Clarinet	Traps

.....Have you Instr.?.....

Name

Address

City..... State.....

☐ Check Here if under 16 Years of Age.

AUDELS Carpenters and Builders Guides 4 vols. $6

Inside Trade Information for Carpenters, Builders, Joiners, Building Mechanics and all Woodworkers. These Guides give you the short-cut instructions that you want—including new methods, ideas, solutions, plans, systems and money saving suggestions. An easy progressive course for the apprentice and student. A practical daily helper and Quick Reference for the master worker. Carpenters everywhere are using these Guides as a Helping Hand to Easier Work, Better Work and Better Pay. To get this assistance for yourself, simply fill in and mail the FREE COUPON below.

Inside Trade Information On:

How to use the steel square—How to file and set saws—How to build furniture—How to use a mitre box—How to use the chalk line—How to use rules and scales—How to make joints—Carpenters arithmetic—Solving mensuration problems—Estimating strength of timbers—How to set girders and sills—How to frame houses and roofs—How to estimate costs—How to build houses, barns, garages, bungalows, etc.—How to read and draw plans—Drawing up specifications—How to excavate—How to use settings 12, 13 and 17 on the steel square—How to build hoists and scaffolds—skylights—How to build stairs—How to put on interior trim—How to hang doors—How to lath—lay floors—How to paint

THEO. AUDEL & CO., 49 W. 23rd St., New York City

Mail Audels Carpenters and Builders Guides, 4 vols., on 7 days' free trial. If O.K. I will remit $1 in 7 days, and $1 monthly until $6 is paid. Otherwise I will return them. No obligation unless I am satisfied.

Name.....
Address.....
Occupation.....
Reference..... PAI

High School at Home

Many Finish in 2 Years

Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Equivalent to resident school work—prepares for entrance to college. Standard H. S. texts supplied. Diplomas awarded. Credit for H. S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin on request. American School, Dept. H-458, Drexel at 58th, Chicago

INVENTORS

Protect your idea with a Patent. Don't delay. Get Free "Patent Guide." No charge for preliminary information. Write us today. CLARENCE A. O'BRIEN—Registered Patent Attorney 108 Adams Building Washington, D. C.

She Got $400.00 for a Half Dollar

I will pay CASH for OLD COINS, BILLS and STAMPS

POST YOURSELF! It pays! I paid $400.00 to Mrs. Dowty of Texas, for one Half Dollar; J.D. Martin of Virginia $200.00 for a single Copper Cent. Mr. Manning of New York, $2,500.00 for one Silver Dollar. Mrs. G.F. Adams, Ohio, received $740.00 for a few old coins. I will pay big prices for all kinds of old coins, medals, bills and stamps.

I WILL PAY $100.00 FOR A DIME! 1894 S. Mint; $50.00 for 1913 Liberty Head Nickel (not Buffalo) and hundreds of other amazing prices for coins. Send 4c for Large Illustrated Coin Folder and further particulars. It may mean much profit to you. Write today to B. MAX MEHL, 133 Mehl Bldg., FORT WORTH, TEXAS (Largest Rare Coin Establishment in U. S.)

THE PHANTOM SPEAKS (Continued from page 8)

you cannot now interfere with my collection of due ransom! I warn you"—the voice lashed out—"I will brook no interference! That is all."

But that is not all. For the Snatcher's mocking defiance to the law is a challenge that cannot remain unanswered! The Snatcher, a diabolical kidnaper whose cunning defies all detection, meets more than a match for himself when the forces of the law unite with me in a mighty effort to crush him.

It's a thrilling manhunt, one that follows a trail of murder and mystery.

The Snatcher versus the Phantom in next month's complete book-length novel—THE TRAIL TO DEATH, by Robert Wallace! A smashing novel of a sinister Criminal Caesar who rules the underworld with a grim scepter of death!

Precious stones—jewels of fabulous worth—lure the Snatcher to his sensational crimes! The whole story's told in THE TRAIL TO DEATH—one of the most exciting cases in my career, which Robert Wallace has fashioned into one of the best mystery novels he has ever written! Remember, it's in next month's issue—together with other thrill-packed yarns.

Join FRIENDS OF THE PHANTOM

Again I invite you to join FRIENDS OF THE PHANTOM, our great nationwide organization to combat crime. There are no dues or fees, and everyone is eligible. Simply clip, sign and mail the coupon on Page 12. The coupon also tells you how to obtain your PHANTOM insignia, if desired.

Membership signifies your determination to uphold the laws of your country, state and nation. One warning must be sounded: Membership does not confer upon you any special privileges in regard (Concluded on page 12)

THE BIG NEW FUN BOOK POPULAR CROSSWORD PUZZLES

ONLY 10c AT ALL STANDS

STUDENTS BUSY AT WORK IN LARGE COYNE SHOPS

Learn ELECTRICITY

Pay For Your Training After You Graduate

Find out all about this wonderful offer. My big Free Book tells you how you can train for a good job and a future . . . And through my "Pay Tuition After Graduation" Plan you can get your training now and pay your tuition in easy monthly payments after you graduate.

"LEARN BY DOING"

12 Weeks' Practical Training in COYNE Shops

In the Big Coyne Shops you have individual help by expert instructors so that you quickly and easily learn Electricity by actual work. No advanced education or previous electrical experience is needed. You are taught . . . Not by correspondence, not by books or embarrassing reciting . . . but by the Famous Coyne "Learn-By-Doing" training method which has helped hundreds of successful graduates to get and hold the job they like, or go into business for themselves.

At Coyne you do PRACTICAL ELECTRICAL WORK on real electrical equipment.

PART TIME WORK WHILE TRAINING

EMPLOYMENT HELP AFTER GRADUATION

If you are short of money and need part-time work to help pay for your room and board while training, my Employment Department will help you get a part-time job. When you have graduated, they will give you Lifetime Employment Service.

You wind real armatures . . . run real motors, dynamos, generators. When you have finished each step, you KNOW HOW because you have done it yourself. If you are ambitious here is your chance to get the PRACTICAL TRAINING and a good electrical job with a future.

H. C. Lewis

READ WHAT THESE GRADUATES SAY

I think the "pay after graduation" plan . . . offers the fellow who wants to get ahead in life a wonderful opportunity . . . I am now employed by the ——— Power Co. I have been employed by this Company ever since graduating from COYNE . . . I make almost double what I did at my previous work . . . COYNE School helped me in landing the job I now have.

James Dible

I owe a lot to COYNE . . . I secured a job after returning home wiring cranes for the ——— Machine Co. Before going to COYNE I was clerking in a grocery store earning the usual clerk's wages. I was in doubt about quitting my job but I have tripled the cost of the entire course . . . in the first ten months. The school is everything you say it is and more. I was completely satisfied. Thanking you for your kind cooperation while at school and since returning home.—Jack E. Stroup.

GET THE FACTS

Don't let lack of money keep you from sending in the Coupon now. My Big FREE Book is full of facts and photographs which tell you about Coyne Training. It also gives you the details of my Pay After Graduation Plan, Spare Time Employment Offer, Graduate Employment Service, Lifetime Scholarship and other advantages.

MAIL
COUPON

Send Today for this FREE Book!

H. C. LEWIS, President,
COYNE ELECTRICAL SCHOOL,
500 S. Paulina Street,
Dept. 41-84, Chicago, Ill.

Dear Mr. Lewis:—Without obligation send me your big free illustrated catalog, with all facts about Coyne Training and details of your "Pay-Tuition-After-Graduation" Plan, as well as the details of your 4 weeks' Radio Course you are including.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

Mail in envelope or paste on a postcard occupies this entire Modern, fireproof

COYNE
Building

ELECTRIC REFRIGERATION AIR CONDITIONING

In addition to the extra Radio Course at this time I am including additional valuable instruction in these two important branches of electricity.

COYNE H. C. LEWIS, President FOUNDED 1899
ELECTRICAL SCHOOL
500 S. Paulina St., Dept. 41-84, Chicago, Ill.

MACHINE SHOP MEN

Learn to set up and run ANY kind of machine; MAKE MORE MONEY NOW by learning quickly HOW TO DO THINGS which usually take years of study and practice! The demand for SKILLED men is ALREADY ahead of the supply, then what WILL IT BE a month or two from now?

Needed NOW!

Bigger Pay Don't miss this chance to qualify for promotion, don't miss this Big Opportunity which is yours almost for the asking. Eight Big Books chockful of important mechanical facts told simply and clearly. Over 3000 pages, nearly 3000 illustrations cover every subject fully, including Tool Making, Pattern Making, Foundry Work, Mechanical Drawing, Forging, Machine Shop Practice and Management, and hundreds of other subjects.

8 Big Books (Up-to-date Edition) Sent FREE to you for examination. With them we send a Big Binder of nearly 800 pages with 267 original shop tickets with 1200 illustrations. These show, step by step, how to set up almost any kind of job and are in addition to the 8 books. Decide in your own home or place of business whether or not you want to keep them, check up on any facts you want to. Note their great MONEY MAKING value, then, if you want them, pay on the easiest kind of payments. Send NOW and we will include a year's consulting service without extra charge.

American Technical Society, Publishers — Home Study Courses.

American Technical Society, Dept. S449, Drexel at 58th, Chicago. You may send me the 8 big NEW books and binder of shop tickets for free examination. I will pay the delivery charges only, unless I decide to keep them in which case I will send $2.00 in ten days and $3.00 per month until the total price of only $34.80 is paid. If I return them in 10 days I will owe you nothing. Because I send now you agree to give me a certificate entitling me to consulting privileges with your experts for one year.

Name

Address

Please attach a letter stating age, occupation, employer's name and address and that of at least one business man as reference.

WANTED ORIGINAL SONG POEMS any subject. Don't delay—send us your poem at once for offer and FREE Rhyming Dictionary.

RICHARD BROS., 74 Woods Building, Chicago, Ill.

SEND NO MONEY!—Save Money!

TRANSPARENT 60 Days' Trial! ROOFLESS PARTIAL
We make FALSE TEETH for you by MAIL. $685 to $35 from your own mouth-impression. Money-Back Guarantee of Satisfaction.
FREE Free impression material, directions, catalog.

Professional Model U. S. Dental Co., Dept. 4-82, Chicago, Ill.

MUSIC LESSONS
EARNINGS. $. SUCCESS. $. ROMANCE! Learn in your home. Courses: Piano, Voice, Accordion, Saxophone, Mandolin, Tenor Banjo, Clarinet, Organ, Cornet, Guitar. Check course. Surprisingly low cost. Easy terms. FREE catalogue. If juvenile, parent's signature must accompany inquiry. Write Dept. 122-N, 1525 East 53rd St., Chicago, Ill.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

ANY PHOTO ENLARGED

Size 8 x 10 inches or smaller if desired. Same price for full length or bust form, groups, landscapes, pet animals, etc., or enlargements of any part of group picture. Safe return of original photo guaranteed.

47¢
3 for $1.00

SEND NO MONEY Just mail photo or snapshot (any size) and within a week you will receive your beautiful enlargement, guaranteed fadeless. Pay postman 47c plus postage — or send 49c with order and we pay postage. Big 16x20-inch enlargement sent C. O. D. 78c plus postage or send 80c and we pay postage. Take advantage of this amazing offer now. Send your photos today. Specify size wanted.

STANDARD ART STUDIOS, 113 S. Jefferson St., Dept. 401-D, Chicago

THE PHANTOM SPEAKS

(Concluded from page 10)

to national or local law-enforcement agencies.

Members and readers are urged to keep in constant touch with the headquarters of this magazine. Your letters and postcards are invaluable to us in planning future issues. Please address your comments, suggestions and criticisms to The Editor, THE PHANTOM DETECTIVE, 10 East 40th Street, New York. Here are some typical excerpts from communications recently received in our mailbag:

MURDER CALLS THE PHANTOM is the most exciting mystery I have ever read.—James Daly, Chicago.

THE PHANTOM DETECTIVE is my favorite of all magazines. The featured novel is always most thrilling and the short stories are uniformly excellent.—William Warner Greenly, Boston, Mass.

I have met many fellow members of FRIENDS OF THE PHANTOM and have made some good friends in this way.—Jean Crory, Los Angeles, Cal.

Since you have started running the longer novels, your magazine is better in every way. Keep up the good work. Those extra two or three chapters, added to the length of your novel, mean a lot because they give readers a fuller, better rounded-out story, until I can truthfully say that every PHANTOM novel is as good as a $2 book. And a mighty good book at that.—Harold Claridan, New York.

It's great relaxation to sit down of an evening with THE PHANTOM DETECTIVE or your swell companion magazine, THRILLING DETECTIVE.—John Curtisman, Miami, Fla.

Thanks to everybody! Please continue writing me. See you next month!

—THE PHANTOM.

THE PHANTOM DETECTIVE

10 East 40th Street
New York City

I wish to join the FRIENDS OF THE PHANTOM. I promise to uphold the laws of the nation and do all in my power to aid in their enforcement.

Name

Address

City

State..... Age..... Sex.....

Enclose a self-addressed stamped envelope if a membership card is desired.

TO OBTAIN THE PHANTOM EMBLEM, our official insignia, enclose the name-strip THE PHANTOM DETECTIVE from the cover of this magazine plus ten cents in stamps or coin.

Note: If you do not enclose the name-strip, send 15c in stamps or coin. This nominal charge is made merely to cover our expense in mailing this valuable bronze badge.

☐ If already a member, check here.

Foreign readers are requested to send International Reply Coupon or American Stamps.

4-41

1/3
MFRS. ORIG. PRICE

GENUINE Late Model No. 8

L.C. SMITH

was $102.50

NOW

$31.85
CASH

only 60c

a week

NO EXTRA CHARGE—14" MODELS

SPECIAL!—While 43 Last

Same as machine shown but equipped with 14" carriage. Beautifully rebuilt and unconditional 2 year guarantee.

EXTRA VALUE
ROLL-A-WAY SECRETARIAL

TYPEWRITER STAND

For those who have no typewriter stand or handy place to use a typewriter, I make this special offer. This attractive stand that ordinarily sells for $4.85 can be yours for only $2.00 extra added to your account. Quality built. Just note all its convenient features. (See coupon)

Mounted on casters, can be moved by touch of finger.

Big working surface, all metal, compact, strong, quiet, rigid, attractive. Two metal wings, correct working height.

NO MONEY DOWN
10 DAYS' TRIAL

Easy Terms—9c a day

No obligation. Send no money. See before you buy on wide-open 10 day Trial. Pay on easiest terms—only 9c a day. You get this genuine late office model L. C. Smith beautifully rebuilt with all standard improvements—basket shift, standard 84 character, 4-row keyboard, shift lock key, back spacer, 2 color ribbon, ribbon reverse, stencil cutting device, tabulator, etc. Ball Bearing throughout—quiet operation. THOUSANDS PAID $102.50—IT'S YOURS FOR ONLY $31.85 (CASH PRICE). No risk, money back guarantee.

2 YEAR GUARANTEE

Our 2 year ironclad guarantee is your assurance of satisfaction and long service; Our 30 years of Fair Dealing Backs Up This Guarantee.

14 INCH CARRIAGES

The L. C. Smith with basket shift is the machine used by schools, large corporations, and business houses the country over. A perfect typewriter for office work, correspondence, manifold work, etc. The wide carriage model contains all modern improvements same as the regular carriage (illustrated) but takes paper 14 inches wide and has a writing line of 12 inches. This is the machine you need for making government reports, using large office forms, billing, etc. It can be yours at No Extra Cost for a limited time—only $31.85 cash—an extremely low price for a wide carriage machine—or buy on easy terms of $2.50 a month—less than the cost of renting an inferior machine!

FREE

COMPLETE TOUCH TYPING COURSE

We give FREE with your L. C. Smith a complete 9 lesson Home Study course of Famous Van Zandt Touch Typing system. You can now learn typing quickly and easily.

OFFER FOR LIMITED TIME—SEND COUPON TODAY

Accept this wide open offer now! Send no money. Use L. C. Smith for 10 day trial in your home. Return it if you don't think it the greatest value you have ever seen. If you buy, pay on easiest terms—only $2.50 a month. 2 yr. ironclad guarantee. Avoid disappointment—mail coupon today.

MAIL THIS COUPON

INTERNATIONAL TYPEWRITER EXCHANGE,
Dept. 488, 231 W. Monroe St., Chicago, Ill.

Send me L. C. Smith (F.O.B. Chicago) for 10 days' trial. If I keep it I will pay $2.50 per month until easy term price ($35.85) is paid. If I am not satisfied I can return it express collect.

☐ 10" carriage ☐ 14" carriage (No Extra Charge)
☐ Check for typewriter stand ($2.00 extra). Stand sent on receipt of first payment on L. C. Smith.

Name..... Age.....
Typewritten signatures not acceptable

Address

City..... State.....

CAUTION—For Quick Shipment Give Occupation and Reference

INTERNATIONAL TYPEWRITER EXCHANGE
231 West Monroe Street Dept. 488 Chicago, Illinois

OVER 200,000 SATISFIED CUSTOMERS ALL OVER THE WORLD.

The two drivers slumped near the woman, their guns unexploded
(Chap. 1)

Follow the Phantom on the Trail of Fifth Column Killers

The Murder Bund

A Complete Book-Length Crime Mystery Novel Taken from the Case-book of Richard Curtis Van Loan

By ROBERT WALLACE

Author of "Murder Calls the Phantom," "The Phantom and the Television Murders," etc.

Featuring the World's Greatest Sleuth in Action

CHAPTER I

MURDER PROPHET

MURDER struck swiftly and silently.

Woodward Avenue, Detroit, in the early evening, was among the widest, the most heavily traveled, and gayest of America's greater city main streets. Yet death stalked without any fanfare, except for the single scream of a suddenly pallid-lipped woman, into the midst of the thronging pedestrians, the lines of motor cars.

Swiftly and silently. And yet there had been warning of its approach. A warning known by few as yet, however, for it had come only minutes in advance of the evil climax.

To some men in that vast industrial city there had come a voice over the humming telephone wires, a taunting voice out of the ether, one

Who Threaten the Peace and Security of America!

Death Hangs Over a Great City When

that the country was coming to fear. It had predicted murder—three murders, to be exact. It had come in the voice of an unknown who called himself the Murder Prophet, a man of mystery for whom a nation-wide search was being made by authorities of cities, states and nation as foremost in an adroitly publicized Fifth Column terrorism, an elusive Bund devoted to Kulturkampf which was boring into the heart of the national defense industries.

For weeks that sinister voice had inspired terror among industrialists and defense workers. Kulturkampf! "The conflict of humanity!" Everywhere the word was on the tongues of patriotic citizens, on the radio, over the teletypes, and in the newspapers. And now the cold, uncompromising voice that promoted it had spoken again.

Three more men, the voice had droned, were to die in a few minutes. Three among all the teeming thousands in Detroit's vital, speeded-up defense industries. And they were only three in a series of murders and acts of criminal sabotage that had been predicted by the gloating Murder Prophet—and had come to pass as predicted.

It happened in the middle of a busy block. A big sedan rolled to a stop as its brakes were applied. An awful bundle rolled out into the street—a bundle that at first flash was made up of bright garments, white face and hands.

On the seat of an armored truck, the youthful driver and guard chilled at the sight. With a sharply grated expletive, the driver jammed his foot down.

"She didn't know what hit her!" he groaned.

The woman lay squarely in front of the huge truck. Guard and driver forgot all rules about keeping their doors closed before reaching their destination, though fully aware that their cargo was the newly finished torpedo from an arms corporation on which, should it prove itself, might depend the destiny of mighty nations.

They should have thought, should have remembered that, but—a dead woman in the street was enough to upset all rules.

Two men were getting out of the halted sedan. Other cars rolled on. A crowd was quickly gathering, but the messenger truck driver and his guard were the first to reach the woman.

Both were suddenly pushed and jostled. The guard may have had a last second instinct of danger, for his hand gripped his gun. But in that instant, death struck!

The driver sprawled on his face, his outflung hands touching the woman's bright dress. The guard slumped down. His gun fell from his hand unexploded. None in the crowd nearest the two men seemed to understand what had happened.

A WOMAN cried out half hysterically. Men shouted and pushed back, anxious to be clear of something sinister. And even as the startled, awed crowd momentarily fell back, the apparently dead woman leaped lightly to her feet. The door of the sedan opened and closed. The sedan rolled swiftly away, and the woman was in it.

In the same breath the truck also was moving. Two men were on the seat of the armored vehicle. Their green uniforms duplicated those of the guard and driver lying in the street. From where they had appeared, no one in the sidewalk crowd could have told. But swiftly they had usurped the places of the legitimate driver and guard who lay in the street with faces contorted in death agony.

Democracy's Foes Plot a Grim Coup!

In the speeding sedan, the woman who had played dead sank into a seat. A man laughed evilly and spoke to another who sat beside him, a man with marblelike, protruding eyes, a round face, thick lips, and a pouchy chin.

"Hit you hard, eh, Slater—to see the plan in action? You're too soft."

"We have to pick up Hauptmann Karl!" She glared at him. "And you'd better button up your coat over that swastika before we meet him. It's an order never to wear those shirts away from the Bund camp, and you know it."

The sedan was lost in traffic before the first police arrived at the scene of death left behind. But there was nothing to be discovered from those

THE PHANTOM DETECTIVE

Another man, seated beside the girl, was bullet-headed, with hair so blond it was almost white, and was as coarse as pig bristles.

"Good work, Freda," he commended. "You made it look like the real thing."

The woman was black-haired, but there was something in the blue of her eyes in her handsome, hard face that suggested the hair might once have been the blond of a Teuton.

"Step on it, Fritz!" she snapped.

bodies in the street—then—to show how death had swooped down on them so swiftly. Only later, in the autopsy room, would the red spot on each of their necks be discovered. Or the peach-stone odor that was about those tiny wounds. . . .

AT ABOUT the moment the morgue wagon was arriving to take away the dead truck driver and guard, the phone on the desk of the city editor of the City News Association rang. Red-faced, excitable McCable listened to the slow, emotionless voice that spoke.

"This is the Murder Prophet, speaking for Kulturkampf," the voice said woodenly. "As you have already been notified would happen, two men have just died on Woodward Avenue. The dead men are unimportant. Another murder is about to be committed. His death will shock the nation. That is all now. You will hear from the Kulturkampf Bund again, and each message will be the truth, as it has been in the past."

Sweat glistened on McCable's brow as the line went dead. He swore violently at the futility of attempting to trace the call over dial phones.

Only a few weeks before such a message would have been regarded as a hoax. But there had been many such messages. Each time the man calling himself the Murder Prophet had foretold murder and sabotage. The calls and the crimes had moved from one industrial city devoted to national defense, to another.

Never, however, had any details been given so that it had been possible for the police to interfere. This time Woodward Avenue had been mentioned, but Woodward Avenue was Detroit's main street, extending for miles. It seemed useless even to call the police about this newest sinister prophecy, but McCable did, chilling as he thought of that cold, emotionless voice promising death.

There was nothing more he could do—except wait, and wonder about the identity of the man high up in the defense industry who was unaware that the black shadow of death was hovering over him. . . .

Blinding, pitiless light played into the pain-sunken eyes of the elderly man bound securely in an armchair. His body, his face, sagged from the agony which had exhausted him. A queer head-set lay on the floor beside him, and a thin trickle of dried blood made a line from his ears down each side of his neck. Roger Latham, head of the great Latham Corporation, makers of war weapons, had been subjected to fiendish torture.

Opposite him, also bound by wrists and ankles to a straight-backed chair, sat a woman. Janet McGregor, confidential secretary to Latham for years, was no longer in the full flush of youth, but she was maturely beautiful, calm, poised, and with high intelligence and courage in her clear eyes.

Man and woman looked up as the door opened and another man and a woman entered. The man was staggering under the weight of a coffin-like wooden crate which he set down and swiftly proceeded to open. Fritz and Freda of the delivery truckmen murders!

From the rectangular box the hulking Fritz took a gleaming cylindrical tube. He laid it on the floor between the two captives, chuckling as he saw their eyes go wide, recognizing it.

"Ah, Freda!" he said. "So now we take up our inquiry where we left off to go for this torpedo model. Now these two know we mean business. The stubborn old fool is deaf now, so we will have to use the cards on him."

Freda nodded and pulled some hand-lettered cards from a briefcase. The huge Teutonic torturer selected one and held it before Roger Latham's eyes. It read:

HERE IS YOUR MODEL TORPEDO.
WHAT IS THE EXPLOSIVE FORMULA?

"Speak, schweinhund!" Fritz growled. "Tell me the secret!"

"He can't hear you, Fritz, and he refuses to focus on the card," said Freda angrily. She reached out and slapped Roger Latham viciously over the face.

THE victim barely quivered. Painfully slow, he raised his head and stared at his inquisitor.

"You may cut me to pieces, if you like," he choked, "but I will never reveal to spies and agents of terrorism the secret of this weapon which belongs to my own country."

Fritz snarled, while Freda clawed her nails across the face of the defiant old man.

"Fritz! Freda!" came a hollow command out of nowhere. "You gain nothing, because you do not use your heads. Call Hauptmann Karl and ask him how to proceed."

Both torturers stiffened and turned toward what appeared to be a window of faint glowing blue glass. Nothing could be seen, but both two Teutons trembled slightly and hastened to obey that command of the Murder Prophet whom they also knew as the "Little Fuehrer."

In a moment a young man with long black hair and dreamy eyes, but with the thin, hard, cruel lips and hawkish nose of a beast of prey, entered. He carried an old violin in one slender white hand and a flexible bow in the other. Plainly Fritz and Freda feared this lieutenant of the Murder Prophet. A mystery man himself, Hauptmann Karl, from the wild heart of Hungary, an inscrutable being who would have been more at home in the vampire castles of medieval Europe than in the modern Detroit of the New World.

Fritz' right arm came up in a stiff salute, which the long-haired musician acknowledged with a lazy nod.

"So you have failed, in spite of my lovely amplified music?" he said disinterestedly. "You have overlooked the next logical step. We will work on Mr. Latham through this woman, the charming Miss McGregor. Go quickly, Fritz, and bring your cavalry sword."

In moments the gross Fritz stood in front of Janet McGregor, his big hand flicking the heavy, sharp sword he carried as easily as though it were a small carving knife. Janet paled, but eyed him bravely. Hauptmann Karl chuckled as he selected a blank card and swiftly printed letters on it.

He held it before Latham. The tortured manufacturer read:

LAST CHANCE TO TALK. KEEP SILENT AND YOU WILL WATCH YOUR SECRETARY LOSE HER FACE AND EYES, FEATURE BY FEATURE.

The old man groaned in anguish.

"Even such devils as you could not do that!"

Hauptmann Karl raised his eyebrows and dropped the card. A radio on the nearby table was playing low, sweet music. He picked up his violin and swept his bow across the strings in perfect harmony with that distant orchestra. It was ghastly, macabre.

FRANK HAVENS

"That part of Die Fledermaus is lovely," he said softly. "All right, Fritz! Not too deep a cut at first. Just enough to dimple the chin."

Roger Latham was straining forward, his bruised lips trembling, the claw marks on his face standing out like the red canceling of a postage stamp.

"No, no, no," he was muttering feebly.

Into the dark eyes of Janet McGregor appeared a light that was beyond the perception of those about her. She looked at her employer, a loyalty and affection in her gaze that could only have been built up by years of devoted service to a kindly and noble man. She smiled faintly, and shook her head at the man who could not have heard words if she had voiced them.

The brutal Fritz, the feral Freda, the silken Karl should have taken warning. But Hauptmann Karl was entranced with the music of his own making. Freda was intent only on Fritz as he flicked up his sword and made a smooth, expert jab. The sharp point cleaved a reddening line down Janet's face with the precision of a surgeon's scalpel. With the poise of a dancer frozen into immobility for the applause, Fritz posed thus in tableau.

THIS was too much for Roger Latham. "No more, you fiends!" he cried. "Janet, I must speak! I can't—" He broke off with a scream of agony.

For quick as a flash Janet McGregor had thrown herself forward, chair and all. She impaled herself on that glittering sword point, the blade sinking deep into her throat.

Cursing, Fritz jerked back. But it was too late. Janet McGregor toppled forward to the floor.

"Don't talk, Mr. Latham," she choked. "They'll keep you alive—as long—as you don't—tell—"

A hemorrhage cut off her words, as her life's blood spread out about her head in a halo of scarlet heroism.

Hauptmann Karl drew his bow across the violin strings in a wierd chord.

"Magnificent!" he murmured. "A Spartan gesture I had not anticipated. Now we will have to proceed with our alternate plans. Freda, you will go at once to the Latham home and effect your entrance there by that fake car accident and a sprained leg. There are still the wife, the son, and the daughter. Macht schnell!"

Coolly he studied Roger Latham as he plucked in pizzicato on his violin.

CHAPTER II

MURDER DELIVERS

AT A FEW minutes before eight, more than a score of men had assembled in the directors' room of the Latham Corporation Building just off Cadillac Square. It was of significance that all the men, of national prominence, were vitally important to the defense industry—Amos Stout, production manager of the Latham Corporation, manufacturers of war weapons and supplies, young Paul Latham, second only to his father in importance in the corporation, Herman Slater of Slater Foundries, Randolph Merkle, the kingpin of the alloy industry — others whose names ranked high in the country's defense program.

Downstairs at the entrance to the building, a small, slender man kissed a pretty girl just before getting out of her coupé. He was Horace Craft, a mild, almost colorless man, the fiancé of Lela Latham, and the plant superintendent of the Latham Corporation. Little in physique but big enough in capability.

"Please drive straight home, Lela," he said anxiously. "Don't stop for anything. I'll come out with your father after this meeting."

Lela laughed lightly at his apprehension. "Don't worry, darling, I'll be all right. And that was a lovely dinner."

She drove away, and Craft hurried up to the directors' room on the fourteenth floor of the building. As he entered, bulletins on the latest Murder Prophet warning were being broadcast. There was a tenseness in all the listening men, but perhaps of them all the big, gray-eyed Merkle, a partner and big investor in the Latham Corporation, was most in-

Janet impaled herself on that glittering sword point (Chapter I) tent, aside from the anxious young Paul Latham.

Craft was showered with questions the instant he stepped through the door. For now the Murder Prophet had named names. Now the whole world was informed that the latest victim was Roger Latham. But there was nothing more that Horace Craft could tell them. He had first heard the news while having dinner with Lela Latham. As to its truth, he could not say, nor had he any idea of Roger Latham's whereabouts.

"I last saw him at the plant late this afternoon," he said. "I can't understand this at all. The last thing I did before leaving was to follow out his instructions to supervise the boxing of the aerial torpedo models and see that it was delivered here promptly at eight o'clock . . . Paul, have you heard anything at all from your father?"

"Nothing," said Paul Latham, white-lipped. "There is nothing we can do right now save wait—and hope he has escaped the Murder Prophet."

"If Latham has been kidnaped, none of us are safe," said a heavy-featured man—Grayson of United Aircraft Engines. "Something must be done about this Murder Prophet and his Kulturkampf Bund."

"Where is that Phantom Detective who was supposed to be here at this meeting?" demanded Amos Stout, but none had an answer.

In that hour of stress, the Phantom, greatest of all detectives, famous Nemesis of crime and criminals was, in fact, the sole remaining hope of these men, big in business, but futile in the face of a hidden danger with which they could not cope. And it had been with the knowledge that there was but one man who could fight the mysterious Murder Prophet with his own weapons—and win—that already the Phantom had been summoned.

A frantic, urgent call had gone out from the publisher of the Detroit

Recorder to Frank Havens in New York, publisher of the Clarion and a coast-to-coast chain of other powerful newspapers. Havens alone, as these men knew, as the world knew, was the one man who could contact the Phantom whose real identity had always been so closely hidden that no one had ever been able to make even a wild guess as to who the Phantom actually was.

And had anyone known, the astonishment would have been all the greater, for the man whose exploits had made his very name feared above all others in the ranks of evil-doers was the last man anyone would have guessed him to be. In private life, and among his friends, the Phantom was Richard Curtis Van Loan, one of the wealthiest playboys in the country, a man who was believed to live only for the pleasure he could get from life, dashing about from one of his homes to the other, aboard his yacht, a devotee of night life.

YOUNG Van Loan's father had been a lifelong friend of Havens, and it was after the elder Van Loan's death that Frank Havens had been responsible for the existence of the Phantom. The idea had first been born when Havens had suggested that Dick Van Loan, bored with life and restless, try his hand at solving a mysterious crime which had stumped the police of the nation. And so successful had he been that the young heir to the tremendous Van Loan fortune had gone on and on, perfecting himself in what had become his lifework until now the name of the Phantom led all the rest in the annals of crime detection, a name known and admired by the police of every nation.

From his first taste of the composite science of crime prevention and the keener art of man-hunting, detective work had enthralled Dick Van Loan. He had ardently applied himself to the mastery of his profession.

which was his vocation and his avocation, exploring the very by-paths of crime through the twisting and devious channels of the underworld. He had plunged into studies that required long months of grueling, exhausting work to complete—and had completed them all, until now he was as well versed as any man living in all aspects of crime, its prevention, and detection.

His studies of the psychological make-up of the criminal, his laboratory work on the physical aspects of crime, had made him the unchallenged leader in his field. Long since he had become a master of disguise, without an equal. He was endowed with a prodigious memory which retained and recalled to him, given time, facts, names and dates that would have vanished completely from the memory of an ordinary man.

Wide-shouldered, powerful, Van Loan's vitality constantly amazed those who met him in disguise as the Phantom. He could stay on his feet for ninety-six hours at a stretch and appear as fresh at the end of the long grind as when he started it. For he had learned how to cat-nap and cat-rest in scant, broken minutes of utter relaxation. He was adept at nearly all sports, an expert with the fencing foils, at ju-jutsu, la savate, and his marksmanship with guns of all kinds was uncanny.

In one careful disguise, that of a stoop-shouldered scientist who called himself Dr. Bendix, he maintained far up in the Bronx one of the most modern-equipped laboratories in the world. But of all the thousands of disguises the Phantom used, his best characterization was played without the use of a single bit of make-up, false hair, moulage, or gadgets. This was when he appeared as himself, the playboy Dick Van Loan, idly circulating around in the uppercrust circles to which his name and background gave him entrance. And only Frank Havens knew all this.

Such then, was the famous detective so earnestly awaited by these men now at their momentous meeting in the Latham Building in Detroit. It was Amos Stout, an oldish man who wore rimmed glasses and a clipped mustache which gave him a fatherly appearance, who finally broke the silence that had become more and more tense when the news bulletins had been finished.

"While I am worried badly about your father, Paul, I am also worried about his aerial torpedo and his plans on that."

"If Dad is right," Paul Latham said tightly, "and I think he is, that light aerial bomb will supercede all heavier torpedoes. And if furnished to Great Britain in quantity, we believe it will quickly end this present war."

"I'll have to see this model first," wheezed Herman Slater dryly. "Your father is much of a dreamer, Paul. Look at the flying wing he didn't finish."

Paul Latham's dark eyes flashed.

"My father isn't the only one who abandons mistakes!" he said tersely.

Herman Slater's slightly bulging blue eyes had a cold look. Amos Stout moved placatingly into the threatened breach.

"I understand, Slater, that you are still experimenting with Roger Latham's flying wing idea."

Paul Latham swung on the head of the Slater Foundries. "So you are stealing my father's flying wing idea, are you, Slater? Perhaps you also have commercial spies in our plant?"

Slater wheezed out an oath and doubled one of his fists. The elderly Randolph Merkle halted this belligerent move.

"No quarreling, men," he said crisply. "We have troubles enough." His keen gray eyes studied each man closely, but his face was inscrutable, expressionless.

Randolph Merkle, key figure of the alloy world, was a big man in industrials, and was a close acquaintance of Frank Havens. So his voice had already been added to that of the Recorder publisher, to Havens to contact the Phantom. And Havens, he knew, would not fail them.

"I don't know what can be keeping the delivery crew of that torpedo," Horace Craft said anxiously, for it was now past eight o'clock.

At that instant the corridor door opened, and four heavily armed men in police uniform filed into the room.

"I'm Captain Reagan from Headquarters," said the man in the lead. "We just dropped in to make sure that everything is all right here. You have no word yet on Roger Latham, I suppose?"

"That blasted murder Bund—giving all German people here a bad name, even when they are loyal Americans!" Herman Slater mumbled.

What answer would have been made to that was not voiced, for it was at that moment that heavy feet came along the hallway, then four men came grunting and panting into the luxurious room carrying a long box of unpainted wood which bore the black stenciling of the Latham Corporation. The expected torpedo had arrived.

Young Paul Latham nodded shortly after he had tipped the messengers and they had swiftly departed.

"Open it," he directed curtly, as all eyes were centered on the long crate. "You men are to be shown the invention no matter what—may have happened to—my father. Your plants may be called upon to help manufacture the torpedo."

Horace Craft began using a screwdriver with hands that shook slightly.

"You're sure that box is okay?" demanded Captain Reagan.

"I personally saw the torpedo packed at the plant," declared Paul Latham. "Mr. Craft saw it checked out. It isn't loaded."

The lid came off with a rasping sound that somehow was chilling. An awful choking cry was torn from the throat of Paul Latham. Frozen horror gripped every man in the room. Then Paul's cry became agonized words.

"My God! Janet McGregor—Dad's secretary!"

CHAPTER III

MUSIC OF DEATH

INSTANTLY the room became bedlam. The four policemen endeavored to take charge, to bring about order, to prevent a panic. Perhaps strangest of all was the sudden action of the usually aloof Randolph Merkle.

He leaned over the opened crate and studied the dead woman, noting the disfiguring cut on the chin and the slashed throat. He it was who picked up the little card pinned to the dead woman's chest and read it aloud:

ROGER LATHAM IS UNAVOIDABLY DETAINED BY DEATH.

That was all.

"Hey, you!" growled Captain Reagan. "What did you touch that card for? There might have been fingerprints. . . ."

He broke off as Merkle suddenly bent his head over the crate, tensely listening. Everybody heard it then—an ominous ticking, steady as the rhythm of death came from near the feet of the corpse. Merkle plunged his hand quickly into the foot of the box, tossing aside the packing as he did so. Captain Reagan angrily grabbed one of his wrists.

The two men stared into each other's eyes. Then Merkle swiftly put one hand into his pocket and brought it forth with something palmed that only the zealous police captain could see. It was a tiny diamond-studded platinum mask, the badge of the Phantom, known to the police of the entire world.

CHIP DORLAN

"The Phantom!" gurgled Reagan.

"But where is Randolph Merkle, then?"

"With Mr. Frank Havens," said the Phantom. "I arranged earlier to take his place at this meeting, and—" He whirled, and raised his voice sharply. "Run for your lives! There's a bomb planted here!"

His hand came up with a small box from which the rapidly ticking sound came. And at that moment all the lights were blacked out.

The Phantom clutched the ticking box of death enclosed with the corpse of Roger Latham's secretary.

"Into the corridor, everybody!" he yelled. "It's a bomb!"

Captain Reagan, near the Phantom, swore roundly, and the Phantom was jolted off his feet as every man in the room rushed for the door. Rising above the yells and shouts suddenly came a crunching blow and a cry. But only the Phantom realized that that cry was in the voice of Paul Latham. And to him the wheezed oaths of Herman Slater, the foundryman, were unmistakable.

Grimly holding onto the box in the rush of panic-stricken men, the Phantom realized only too well that the bomb undoubtedly had been set to go off within a minute or two after that torpedo model box was opened to show the body of Janet McGregor.

That would mean a horrible death, death for many key figures in the defense industry if it exploded now, or if it were carried into the corridor. The Phantom raced with the box toward the opposite end of the long room. He judged wisely, that if he threw it from him, concussion might hasten the explosion.

Perhaps a third of the men were out of the room when battering blows and shouts came from the corridor doorway.

"Clear the way!" shouted Captain Reagan's voice. "Get out—" His shout was cut off so short that it sounded to the Phantom as if Captain Reagan had been knocked cold.

"The door!" someone else was yelling. "They've locked it!"

AS PART of his intensive training, until his senses had become superfine, the Phantom always memorized all details of any room he ever entered. It was that habit which now gave him the only slim chance there might be.

"Lie down! On the floor, everybody!"

His voice was a command, showing nothing of his full realization of the danger to every man still locked in the black room with him. And with no way out except by the windows—with the street fifteen stories below.

To hurl the ticking bomb through the glass might mean the death of no telling how many men and women down in the street. But here—well, the interior of the room was photographed on his amazing brain, and he might save the others at the expense of his own life. He might even survive, himself, if he acted quickly enough, racing against a time bomb that might have only seconds to go. He sprang along the wall, calling out:

"All of you stay on the floor, and crawl away from my voice!"

Because he had already studied the identity of Randolph Merkle, when he had met the industrialist with Frank Havens, the Phantom was deliberately speaking in Merkle's voice.

"Merkle!" a man's voice cried out in the dark. "He'll be killed! Merkle! Drop the thing! Come on!"

Men were hammering at the locked door as the Phantom reached the spot that was photographed on his brain. A thick steel door swung partly open. He had earlier marked this as the directors' room vault where possibly the records of the Latham Corporation were kept.

Thrusting the ticking box inside the steel door, the Phantom swung it shut, throwing the heavy bolt. And as instantly, he threw himself to the floor, rolling away. But as he sought his own safety last of all, he saw two men who had disregarded his warning. Their silhouettes showed against the window, as if groping uncertainly—and moving toward the steel door behind which death was about to let go! The Phantom leaped. He carried the endangered men with him to the floor just as the time bomb exploded.

The sides of the building seemed to split. The Phantom, every man in the room, were blown against a wall with breath-taking force.

"Merkle!" men were calling out. "Merkle! Are you alive?"

"I'm all right!" said the Phantom. "Get ready to smash down that corridor door! Be careful! There must be Fifth Column Bundists among the employees of this building! Maybe here in the room with us!"

The Phantom sent a thin sliver of light from his pencil flash across the long room. The blast had been terrific. The great steel door of the vault had been blown off. The vault was ripped apart and he knew that if that bomb had let go in the room, everybody there would be dead.

Pushing through to the locked door, he shouted:

"Stand back!"

Possibly the real Randolph Merkle never had been marked as a man of action, because even in this moment of stress, men exclaimed with amazement. The Phantom's flashlight showed a heavy automatic in his hand.

TWO shots blasted the lock from the door. The entrapped men barged through it—only to be stopped outside by the body of a policeman. And on the floor, near an elevator, lay the two operators. Both were alive, but had been slugged.

The Phantom took a swift inventory of who was with him. About half of the score of the men who had gathered for the defense council meeting had escaped before the door had been locked. Among those were Paul Latham, Herman Slater, Amos Stout and Horace Craft. And the Phantom's mind dwelt for a moment on Craft, remembering now that the man had kept an eye on his watch after that time bomb had arrived in the death box.

"Good heavens, Merkle!" a man cried out to him. "You don't think all of those men have been abducted by that murder Bund, do you?"

The question was answered wordlessly when Captain Reagan came down the corridor with Herman Slater, Horace Craft, Amos Stout, and some of the other men.

"I'm holding every man who was in that room until we have investigated this thing!" Captain Reagan shouted harshly. "Someone knocked out Paul Latham and he's missing! Two men who worked on the freight elevator are gone! Some other employees here—Bundsmen, of course—were responsible for the lights going out! What happened in there, anyway, before that bomb let go?"

The Phantom was wondering about that himself. He might have ideas about who had been responsible for this horror and the attempted wholesale bombing, but pinning it down would be difficult. Several persons had already been on the move toward the door when the lights had gone out. Just one thing was plainly apparent—Paul Latham had been knocked out and taken away.

Even as he was pondering, the Phantom was fading away, while Captain Reagan was speaking. He was on a winding back stairway, dropping swiftly downward.

Crowds were being held back by quickly formed police lines as the Phantom reached the street. Thousands had been attracted by the terrific explosion so near Cadillac Square.

Near the Latham Corporation Building a deserted messenger truck still stood. But the messengers who had brought Janet McGregor's body instead of the aerial torpedo model were well away from here now, probably with the other Bundsmen who had abducted young Paul Latham.

In the side street into which the Phantom turned, a small coupé was drawn up to the curb. One of the Phantom's own powerful cars was parked not far away, and in heading for it he would have passed the coupé without giving it special attention had he not suddenly heard a radio in it playing low—the music of a symphony orchestra.

To his amazement, the Phantom saw in the coupé a young man with long hair, who looked like some down-at-the-heels music teacher. The young man was holding an old violin under his chin and moving the bow with delicate fingers.

The Phantom knew good music when he heard it. He knew he was hearing it now, as that young violinist played in perfect tune and rhythm with the orchestra. He barely seemed to be aware of the Phantom who paused close to the coupé. His dreamy eyes seemed to indicate that he had been deaf to the explosion that had drawn crowds into the nearby block.

CHAPTER IV

STRANGE SIGNALS

THE Phantom moved into the shadows. As he did, a street lamp showed him the face of a slightly built youth crossing the street. The youth moved quickly, but did not come directly toward the Phantom.

Instead, he whistled a gay little tune and disappeared into the darkness of a doorway. The Phantom smiled to himself. Chip Dorlan, his fighting aide and pupil who had come up the hard way in San Francisco slums, was on the job all right. As he always was, as he always had been since the Phantom's efforts had won freedom for Chip's framed brother, and had brought to the Phantom Chip's own undying loyalty and devotion.

The Phantom knew now that Chip Dorlan probably could inform him better than any other person what had happened outside the Latham Corporation Building when Paul Latham had disappeared. But for the moment, the Phantom, now invisible, was busy studying the seedy-appearing violin player sitting liesurely in the coupé.

As he waited, watching, listening to the violin, the Phantom took quick stock of his reason for being here, recalling all that he had learned from Frank Havens about the operation of the so-called Murder Prophet and the Kulturkampf Bund. For the Murder Prophet's methods had gained the murdering Bund columns of space in newspapers, including the chain owned by Havens.

Havens resented being forced to print this news of murder and sabotage, believing it only to be clever propaganda. But the Kulturkampf Bund was news, and so were the murders and sabotage. Though Havens well knew that the Murder Prophet warnings, the sureness of the murder Bund crimes were inspiring fear among workers and defense manufacturers alike.

"And they're deliberately using our newspapers," Frank Havens had told the Phantom. "It has to be stopped, Dick. But the Federal Bureau of Investigation, state and local police are insufficient to cover all the angles. These Bundsmen are being paid by foreign governments. Many employees have been added in all consular, shipping and other German offices everywhere since the war, although their business has dropped to nothing."

"Which means, Frank," the Phantom had admitted, "that under diplomatic immunity, agents, spies and saboteurs must be filtering into all of our defense industries. They are members of Bunds that are still unchecked, or meet secretly in unknown places."

And so it had been as much to work for the end that Frank Havens desired—the cleaning up of the festering Bund sores on the body politic—as to answer the frantic call for and from the publisher of the Detroit Recorder that the Phantom, the man of truly a thousand faces, was now in the Michigan city. And catapulted at once into the heart of intrigue and danger. There was also another consideration. As Dick Van Loan, the Phantom was the friend of the Latham family, having often met them at social functions, and he felt it a duty to stand by them now in this hour of trouble. Now, as the Phantom remained motionless, watching the queer violin player in the coupé, and aware that Chip Dorlan was hidden, awaiting a signal, the Phantom was thinking of Frank Havens, now in the apartment of the real Randolph Merkle.

"Frank will be burning up when he hears of the explosion, until I make contact," thought the Phantom. "But it must wait. A kind of hunch tells me that violin player isn't altogether what he seems."

ODDLY, he was recalling, the odor that had come to him when he had bent over that torpedo model box containing the corpse of Janet McGregor.

"Like the bilge water in some old ship," he remembered. "That model box didn't get that in the Latham plant. It wasn't the crate that originally went out from there with the torpedo model. The man responsible for that exchange, for the murders, must be well informed on the workings of the Latham plant."

That reasoning brought Horace Craft to mind. The meek, little plant superintendent's face had been gray and frightened before that box had been brought up. Why?

Then there was Herman Slater, with whom Paul Latham had tilted at the meeting. Van was not prejudiced against any man or woman who bore a German name, but he had to remember Slater's quick anger when Paul Latham had accused him of having spies in the Latham plant.

To be sure, there was Paul himself, who would inherit the multi-million corporation, with his sister, Lela.

"Not Paul Latham," he told himself grimly. "His affection for his father is deep. Could Paul have been temporarily deranged by the horror, and be rushing off to his own death?"

Van put that thought from him. Across the street, the violin player in the coupé suddenly ceased accompanying the symphony being played on his motor radio. Van's keen ears picked up a muffled, sepulchral voice, which also came from the coupé.

It came to Van that perhaps the regular radio was being used to cover another special set. The words spoken in the muffled voice were indistinct, and Van edged closer.

While he could not determine the words of the person speaking to the violin player, he hoped to hear the violinist's reply. He did hear this much:

"That is good. Now listen closely—"

Ping ping-ping-ping. Ping-ping!

The man in the coupé was picking at one string of the violin. The ping-ing was all on the same note. But each one was spaced so that the string formed little groups of numbers in series of threes. Like 6-7-4 and 5-8-3.

For more than a minute, the violin string pinged its combination of numbers. A code message was being put on that special short-wave set in the coupé!

A bulky figure lunged into the Phantom
(Chapter VII)

"And if any amateur happened to pick it up, he would learn exactly nothing," Van said softly. "If I could get to my own car and be ready to trail that coupé, it might be worthwhile."

All doubt had been removed of the violin player being somehow connected with tonight's tragic horror. Van started from the shadows, but halted just in time to remain unobserved. A short, fat man was waddling along the opposite sidewalk. The street light showed a white, round face and heavy figure. He paused beside the coupé and opened the door.

The violinist's greeting came to Van's ears.

"Good, Slater. Everything's set."

"But I don't like it, Haupt—er—Mr. Lawson," the fat man spoke quickly. "If Paul Latham won't talk, then what?"

"It is arranged," said the violinist.

THE Phantom was quick, but silent, and almost upon the coupé, angling toward it from the rear.

Then he heard the violinist say:

"Randolph Merkle is one of the Latham big shots, Slater. He's next on the list. You understand? The Little Fuehrer named him tonight."

Van would not have been so confident had he known that his figure, in his disguise as Randolph Merkle showed in the coupé windshield. But Van had no time to think of that, or that words might have been spoken for his benefit. He was springing directly upon the strange violinist.

"Hold it!" he snapped, his powerful fingers shooting to the arm of the violinist.

It did not appear to Van that a man armed only with a violin could offer much resistance. But if his fingers even reached the violinist's arm, the Phantom was unconscious of it.

The violin, still tucked under the man's chin, seemed to Van to burst with a squashy explosion. Brilliant fire and blinding fumes shot into his face. The blast, scarcely loud enough to be heard more than a few yards, jolted the Phantom back on his heels with all the effect of a powerful blow.

Fumes shut off his breath and seemed to be burning his eyes from their sockets. He heard Chip Dorlan cry out, and knew the youth was plunging toward the men in the car.

Choked as he was, Van managed to speak, "Back, Chip! Get back! Wait!" He was fully aware his warning might mark him as the Phantom, if those in the car knew of Chip Dorlan. There was no time, then, to consider that perhaps these men in the coupé already knew that the man who appeared to be Randolph Merkle was in reality the disguised Phantom. But even before the Phantom's vision entirely cleared, the coupé was speeding away. Then Chip Dorlan appeared as Van was beginning to see through an agonizing mist.

"Phantom!" cried Chip. "You hurt bad?"

Van shook his head. "No, Chip. That car turned out of the street. Which way did it go?"

"The first turn to the right, Phantom," said Chip. "Toward the river and the Lake St. Clair road."

Slowly the Phantom's throat became less painful.

"That's the first time I was ever attacked and stopped by a musical instrument, Chip," he said ruefully. "This Kulturkampf Bund is the coldest-blooded and the cleverest group of criminals we have ever opposed, I'm beginning to realize."

He was debating swiftly what steps he should take first.

"I was down here, Phantom," Chip said, "when several men came into the street. They were carrying a young fellow, and a car picked them up. That coupé with the man playing the fiddle was here all the time. He didn't seem to notice anything or hear that explosion. Phantom, gee! I was afraid you had been—"

"Listen, Chip," interrupted Van, his brain working at lightning speed. "As a boy you had a job as a core-maker in a San Francisco foundry, didn't you?"

"Yes," said Chip. "It was tough work."

"Still remember enough to apply for such a job here?"

"Sure, Phantom! But, gee! I'm pretty soft!"

"Not so soft as you think," said Van. "This is so vital to all behind this murder Bund that I would try the job myself, if the lives of several persons were not in deadly danger right now. Chip, get into old clothes, and I'm fairly sure you'll land a quick job in a foundry. The Herman Slater foundries, among the biggest in the defense industry."

"But there won't be any fighting—" Chip started to complain.

"Don't be too sure of that," said Van. "Get that job, the first thing in the morning, if you can, Chip. I want you to find out all you can about a new plane or any kind of a plane or flying wing that may be in the foundries. Contact me through Frank Havens at the Cadillac Hotel at noon tomorrow."

CHIP nodded gloomily. But Van knew if there was anything of importance to be discovered in the Herman Slater plant, Chip would surely find it.

As Chip moved away, Van sought the nearest telephone booth. He called the number of Randolph Merkle's apartment. He must put Randolph Merkle, the alloy expert whom he was impersonating, on guard because of the threat he had heard made upon his life.

The voice of Frank Havens replied.

"I'm certainly glad to hear your voice, Dick," Havens said heartily. "I'm all mixed up with the conflicting stories I've been hearing. It was reported that Randolph Merkle had saved several lives, then ducked out on the police, so I've been on edge, knowing you were the man they believed to be Merkle."

"You know what's happened, of course," said Van quickly. "I have no time to waste. Send police to the Roger Latham home, if they're not already there. And tell Randolph Merkle I'm still impersonating him, and for him to keep under cover. I know that his life is threatened."

"So that's it!" Frank Havens said bitterly. "Merkle isn't here, Phantom! He had a mysterious call, asking him to go to the Latham home at once. I haven't heard from Merkle since he left."

So perhaps Randolph Merkle had already been called to his death! But he had been posing as Merkle at the defense meeting over the torpedo model. There could be but one answer to that. Someone in that room, some member of that council, must have been aware of the Phantom's identity. Perhaps Merkle himself had trusted someone there. Merkle had agreed only reluctantly to allowing even the Phantom to impersonate him when Van had considered that advisable. But Merkle must be saved now, though he might have been rash in exposing himself to the killers.

Van's decision was instant. "I'm starting for the Latham residence on Lake St. Clair, Frank. I'm convinced there's where the murder Bund is all set to strike next—if it hasn't already struck."

CHAPTER V

BAIT FOR MURDER

SHOOTING his battered old car, with its super-powered motor, toward the Grosse Point Boulevard that led to the swanky Lake St. Clair residence section, the Phantom was fully aware that in retaining the appearance of Randolph Merkle, he had become a living bait for murderers.

"If I am in time, it may be that I can still mix up their signals," he thought grimly. "If I only knew what those violin string signal numbers meant! Three numbers in groups."

The Phantom knew all of the codes employed in international espionage, so far as they had been studied up to this time. But he was well aware that some simple form of communication could be a code, and because of its simplicity it could balk the smartest detective living.

Even as one part of his mind kept working over the signals, he was reviewing with horror the number of persons involved who might have some connection with the infamous Kulturkampf Bund, and one or two angles that did not seem to fit in directly with the acts of sabotage and murder that had brought him into the matter.

Swiftly, he reviewed the men he had met, considering their positions in the puzzle.

Paul Latham, son and heir of Roger Latham, undoubtedly had been abducted. And that of course was because Paul Latham knew all the secrets of the aerial torpedo which might prove a devastating war weapon.

Then there was Horace Craft, superintendent of the Latham plant. He was well informed about the torpedo model, but possibly lacked some of its details known only to Paul Latham. Craft had seemed furtive and frightened. It seemed impossible to believe, but Craft probably had been in better position than any other person to have exchanged those model boxes.

Herman Slater, who had aroused Paul Latham's anger, seemed to have secret work going on in his foundries. And this same Herman Slater apparently was working with the mysterious violinist who might be the head of the murder Bund.

"Slater called him Hauptmann?" mused Van. "Which he changed to Mr. Lawson. And Hauptmann means head man, the captain. Still, I'm not so sure that violinist could be the leader. Someone is behind this who has great stakes, a personal interest in the deliberate sabotage of defense work."

There was Amos Stout, the production expert. He was a big man in all of the defense work. He was counted upon to bring about mass production of the Latham torpedo, if it could be made to work.

"And so probably Amos Stout's life also would be endangered," considered the Phantom. "He is a key figure the Bund would want to remove."

Swiftly he ran over in his mind several other names of the defense council. And wound up with only one element that might be vital. Someone in that room seemed to have known of that time bomb, of the minute for which it was set, and had been prepared to have the lights go off while Paul Latham was seized, and he himself escaped.

But there was a more direct reason for Van speeding toward the Latham home. He was thinking of pretty Lela Latham, remembering her as he, as Richard Curtis Van Loan, had met her several times in New York.

"Paul Latham will prove as stubborn as his father," was Van's thought. "So if they have snatched

Every man in the room was blown against a wall (Chapter III)

Lela Latham, they may do for her what they did for poor Janet McGregor."

THAT might have been what those queer violin signals had meant! That Mr. Lawson, that Hauptmann, might have been radioing in some simple code for the seizure of Lela Latham!

Roaring along the boulevard, chancing the speed limit, Van was aware that he had done all he could by sending the police through Frank Havens.

But would the police be enough? Police had not counted much in the Latham Building explosion and murders. It was maddening to the Phantom to realize that this murder Bund probably controlled uncounted numbers of men, and perhaps of women. They were working in every industry.

Unquestionably some had been among workmen in the Latham Corporation Building. Others might be servants in the Roger Latham home. It was like trying to put a finger on many drops of quicksilver.

The seventy miles an hour the Phantom was making was over the limit. He kept a watchful eye out for police cars, to prevent being delayed. He could establish his identity and be freed quickly, but he wished to avoid that.

Thus on guard, he noticed the lights of a car behind jump out into the passing lane. It was coming up on him. Van eased on his speed, prepared to produce his platinum domino with its tiny diamonds, the recognized badge of the noted Phantom anywhere.

To his surprise, the pursuing car also slowed. Van eased down to fifty, then forty. The headlights of the other car moved back into traffic, staying behind him.

Van pulled out into the passing lane and shot ahead. His guess had been correct. The pair of lights again took on speed. He knew now that, either, whether he was known to be the Phantom, or believed to be Randolph Merkle that he was being directly tailed.

Perhaps the driver had never been born who could trail the Phantom and remain undetected. Sure of his shadower, Van watched the lights ease in and out of thinning traffic behind him. It was only a mile or more now to the turn-off leading to the side highway that passed the Latham residence, as Van had learned.

As he reached the turn-off road he was grimly sure that members of the murder Bund must be in the vicinity of the Latham place. Likely, some would be between him and the residence.

"The way that radio was used, the Bundsmen are making special contact," came to him. "And the most logical place to get me, either as the Phantom or Merkle, is in the darker road beyond the turn-off."

Van really let his car out then. The trailing lights merely kept pace. Van was watching the turn-off, the shadows, everything that his own headlights revealed. He freed the heavy automatic under his armpit.

He was in the turn-off safely, then into the curving, dark highway along the lake shore. His quick eyes saw the steep grade of a side lane, and was rushing toward it when the shadowy bulk of an unlighted car started shooting down the side grade.

Few drivers could have acted so calmly and so quickly as the Phantom did then. The lights of the other car had been turned off to prevent him being warned. Van flicked out his own lights instantly. He shot forward at sixty into temporary blackness.

But every foot of the road for a hundred yards ahead, as far as his lights had reached, was imprinted upon Van's brain. He was the one-in-a-million driver who could hold his car to a road that was suddenly blacked out.

HOLDING the road, he accelerated, and shot ahead. Just as the shadowy bulk of the other car hurtled into the highway, Van twisted the steering wheel sharply. His car climbed the shoulder and went down into a shallow ditch. That swift turn off the road probably saved his life. As it was, the dark car that had been intended as a murder weapon jolted the rear of his coupé. There was a crackling smash. A rear fender was ripped off.

Van seemed almost to lift the car back onto the road by sheer strength. He grinned a little grimly over the closeness of the murder ambush. His lights on again, he watched the curves ahead, estimating he had only about one more mile to go, and was convinced that, having dodged the death car, he was on a clear road the rest of the way.

He was too late to avoid the log that was suddenly swung across his headlights from the side of the road. At sixty he could neither turn out nor stop.

His coupé smashed head-on into the log in a skid that had reduced his speed to a possible thirty miles. The coupé's hood crumpled and it somersaulted over the log, landing on its top.

Half a dozen shadowy figures rushed from the bushes from which the log had been swung. Sharp exclamations were uttered in guttural German. A command was given—an order from a masked and hooded figure who stood well above the road, flanked and guarded by four other hooded men.

Although spoken in German, Van interpreted that order. It was: "If he still lives, smash in his skull! Don't start shooting yet!"

Other masked men were climbing upon the overturned coupé. They could not see inside, although they flashed torches through the windows. For at that instant the gas tank exploded, the fuel ignited from a shorted wire of the motor.

Black smoke and gaseous flame enveloped the coupé, driving back those who would have completed the murder as ordered by the hooded leader. Within a few seconds the coupé was a flaming mass.

Again the masked leader spoke in guttural German, gloatingly.

"That is the end of the great Phantom! His cleverness failed! Those of you who are not assigned for further duty, will return to the camp!"

The masked men moved from the highway into the woods bordering Lake St. Clair, jabbering about the triumph they believed had come to the one they called the Little Fuehrer.

Under the bushes, where he had rolled in the darkness, after one of the quickest jumps he had ever made from a car, Van was half stunned. His jump had been instinctive, but he had left the car, hitting the ground and rolling in the split second before it had crashed the log.

"So it is the Phantom they believe has died in the car," came to him in an illuminating flash. "They were not seeking to murder Randolph Merkle!"

Van would have trailed the Bundsmen as they moved away, but it was still firmly fixed in his mind that if death had not already struck at the Latham home, or some other crime had not been committed, that it was direfully imminent. And those men were on the job now. The masked and hooded leader had spoken to them of "further duty."

The Phantom's muscles were bruised and aching, but his bones were all intact. He waited until sure all of the Bundsmen had departed, then started afoot toward the Latham home, keeping well in the woods at the side of the highway.

CHAPTER VI

MURDER IN FLAMES

JUST at the moment the Phantom was following the road to the Roger Latham mansion Lela Latham was proving she had courage as well as charm. Her face was white and drawn, and her eyes reddened, but her voice was quiet and fully under control.

Outside the residence, isolated in its wide grounds, heavily armed policemen were on guard. Two guards were likewise stationed on the porch of the motor driveway entrance.

Lela Latham was speaking now to a woman who lay on a couch in the big living room, a woman who had suffered an accident and had been brought into the house. The woman, who had told Lela that her name was "Miss Andrews" apparently had a badly sprained ankle. Alarmed, Lela had at once telephoned the Latham family physician, but he had been out.

By a stroke of good fortune, one of the police on guard had been able to flag down a passing car carrying a physician's license. That doctor, who introduced himself as Dr. Cross, was in the Latham house now, and there was need for his services. For not only did "Miss Andrews" need attention, but Mrs. Latham had finally collapsed, so that Dr. Cross was busy alternating between the two women—Mrs. Latham in her bedroom upstairs, and Miss Andrews downstairs.

The black-haired woman's shapely right leg was bandaged at the ankle, and her blue eyes reflected every evidence of pain. This woman, the same who had played dead on Woodward Avenue, and had been called Freda, unquestionably was a finished actress.

"Dr. Cross says you should not be moved until the swelling goes down," Lela Latham was saying. "So I am having a room prepared for you, Miss Andrews."

"But it's so terrible for you, Miss Latham," Freda said compassionately. "After hearing of your present trouble, my ankle is a trivial matter. If you'd call a car, I could go home now."

Lela shook her head firmly.

"We're only too glad to do whatever we can for you, Miss Andrews," she insisted. "It must have been agonizing getting from your car to our house."

When Freda had come limping into the Latham grounds with a stick, the policeman at the entrance had carried her into the house.

After the shock of the news over the radio, Lela Latham had kept on her feet by sheer will. She now knew, which her mother mercifully did not, that Paul also was missing. Horace Craft had phoned, saying he would be out as quickly as he could leave the police.

Beside the police sent as the result of the Phantom's warning through Frank Havens, other guards had been called. And Randolph Merkle, the alloy expert and close friend of the Latham family in both a personal and business way, had arrived shortly after the Latham murder had been broadcast.

Merkle had remained with Lela, trying to comfort her. And at the moment the wily Freda was apparently seeking to relieve the Latham home of her presence. Merkle came into the living room.

He was a big man, with slightly stooped shoulders, a partly bald head, and a habit of seeming to look into other men's minds with his cool, gray eyes. The Phantom, in impersonating him, had done an excellent job of duplication.

Frank Havens had phoned. He had warned Merkle of what the Phantom had heard and advised him to leave the Latham home. But this warning had gone unheeded.

"I'd like to come to grips with some of those killers, Frank," Merkle's reply had been. "Since what has apparently happened to Roger Latham, rooting out this Kulturkampf Bund with the help of the Phantom will be my sole business."

SO, AS Freda again voiced her plea to go home, Merkle added his arguments to Lela's.

"Leaving tonight in your condition is not to be thought of, Miss Andrews," he said. "You're as well off here as you would be at home. Otherwise I would have an ambulance called for you."

Freda's blue eyes looked from Lela Latham to the kindly Merkle. The eyes suddenly brimmed with tears.

"I'll never be able to thank you enough," she said brokenly.

Merkle smiled slightly.

"You listen to Lela, Miss Andrews," he said. "And do as she says. I'll be upstairs in the study, if you want me, Lela. I have some calls to make. Everything is quiet outside, and I'll let you know the minute any news of Paul comes in. I have been all over the grounds in the past hour."

"I guess men who are really big are the kindest," Freda said, as Merkle left the room.

"Mr. Merkle is always that way," said Lela. "Now put out of your mind any thought of leaving before tomorrow. I'll go upstairs to Mother now, but I'll be down in a few moments."

Freda stirred a little. Her eyes were fixed upon one broad window of the drawing room. It seemed impossible, with the police outside, and added guards called, that anything could happen.

The Latham butler was moving just beyond the open doors of another room as Lela started toward the stairway. The wide window suddenly reflected a light, as if a car had turned and directed its beams upon it.

The light was reflected and blacked out three times quickly.

The butler stuck his long face through the door, looking at Freda. She made a little gesture with her hand, and he nodded. The Phantom had been correct in judging there might be Bundsmen planted even in the Latham home.

Freda then moaned piteously, as if in sudden pain.

"Please, Miss Latham!" she called. "Will you wait just a moment? I'm—"

Lela Latham was beside Freda instantly, rubbing her hands, calling the butler.

"Harden! Bring Dr. Cross at once!"

The butler moved stiffly to the stairs. Crackling shots sounded from several directions outside. They had the chattering staccato sound of many riveting hammers. Submachine-guns!

A man screamed with death agony. Lela Latham sprang to her feet. She did not see Freda's glinting blue eyes open, watching.

The entrance door burst open. One of the policeman staggered in, as if blown upon the stream of death lead from a chopper. Then the policeman was down, firing his revolver wildly. He quit shooting. He lay quiet.

Lela Latham screamed as a double explosion rocked the house. It seemed to come from upstairs. Almost immediately a ceiling burst through and billowing fire rolled from what must have been an incendiary bomb. Tongues of fire licked through a doorway into the big living room.

Lela's first thought was for her mother. She started for the stairs. The tall figure of Randolph Merkle appeared at the top of the stairs.

"Get out, Lela!" he shouted. "I'll help Dr. Cross with your mother! The fire hasn't reached her room!"

[Turn Page]

Mr. R--- makes a Confession

3 Feel like a million this morning. Ex-Lax worked fine. Didn't upset me or keep me awake last night... Boy, watch me tear into my work today!

1 Almost got fired today. Boss caught me napping at my desk. The trouble is I need a laxative. But I hate to take the awful stuff.

2 Tom told me to try Ex-Lax and I bought a box on my way home. Took some before turning in for the night. A cinch to take — it tastes just like chocolate!

The action of Ex-Lax is thorough, yet gentle! No shock. No strain. No weakening after-effects. Just an easy, comfortable bowel movement that brings blessed relief. Try Ex-Lax next time you need a laxative. It's good for every member of the family.

10¢ and 25¢

Freda cried out then. She was standing on her uninjured foot, holding onto the couch. She swayed, almost falling.

"Oh, please, Miss Latham!" she called. "Help me! I can't walk!"

Lela Latham sprang back to Freda's side, supporting her. Together they started toward the door where the policeman lay motionless.

Fiery tongues ran along the ceiling of the living room, and flared up over the window draperies. Women servants screamed with terror at the rear of the house.

In the face of this appalling horror Freda appeared to go to pieces. She moaned and clung to Lela Latham as if every step caused her acute agony. From outside came more crackling gunfire. Machine-guns were cutting down the police guard.

Helping the cold-blooded, soulless Freda, Lela was compelled to pass close to the dead policeman. She could see another policeman huddled outside. And if only she could have read Freda's hard blue eyes, she would have known that she was in the power of a merciless monster in the guise of a beautiful woman. Freda was watching the private driveway which curved to the house.

Just inside the doorway, close to the dead policeman, Lela's foot slipped in the little pool of blood by the dead man's head. Her strength left her then. She swayed under the other woman's weight. She was falling when Freda uttered a guttural oath in a foreign tongue.

"Fools! Why don't they swing in?"

Freda's supposedly injured foot now was firmly planted. She suddenly demonstrated that she possessed the strength of a man. She picked up Lela Latham and stepped through the front doorway, carrying the girl with ease.

She was in the driveway when a big car swung off the highway into the curve, its rubber shrieking. Five seconds later, a man wearing a hooded mask lifted Lela Latham into the car. Freda was berating the others.

"Turn it off, Freda!" ordered one man harshly. "The Little Fuehrer will be with Hauptmann Karl at the camp tonight! You have earned a little cross!"

That appeared to calm Freda. The car swung along, taking a route which would lead away from the city. There were countless by-roads that crossed Grosse Point in the vicinity of Lake St. Clair.

The spreading fire of the mansion painted the cloudy sky with an orange glow. Just as the Kulturkampf Bund car neared the open concrete of the outside road, a pair of headlights came into view.

The driver of this car narrowly missed a head-on crash with the Bund machine. It seemed that the Bundsman who was driving deliberately swung the rear of his car so that his bumper ripped into a fender of the smaller car.

The coupé whirled off the road into a tree. Its driver fell out and rolled. He climbed slowly to his feet, staring after the kidnap machine.

The driver was the meek appearing little Horace Craft. . . .

A DOUBLE explosion, the bright orange flare in the sky, the staccato hammering of machine-guns burst upon the Phantom's sight and hearing when he was still a quarter of a mile from the Latham mansion. He forgot his bruised muscles and broke into a run through the woods.

Already the sprawling Latham residence was blazing fiercely in the upper stories. Van judged instantly that the blaze must have been set off upstairs.

"Servants!" he grated. "Hirelings of the murder Bund!"

The wide lawn between him and the house showed several bodies in police uniform. Shooting was still to be heard beyond the house. Van saw two figures move swiftly through the shrubbery. In the bright light he saw the masks over their heads and faces and the swastikas on their sleeves.

In the shooting, he had heard what had seemed to be the crash of two cars.

He was at the end of the curved driveway when he saw a small car with its hood crumpled into a tree.

Near the ditched car, Horace Craft was standing, staring at the blazing residence as if he were dazed. In the distance, sirens were sounding. Horace Craft acted as if he had been knocked silly as he saw the Phantom approaching.

"Merkle!" he cried. "For God's sake, Merkle! They've got Lela! She's in there! She'll be burned alive!"

Craft started running straight toward the wide front entrance. Flames were licking out, touching a uniformed body on the steps.

The front door was becoming solid flame and smoke. Yet Horace Craft did not hesitate in his dash for the entrance. Van overtook him and gripped him with one hand. Craft's face was contorted as he swung around on the man he believed was Randolph Merkle. His fists pounded into Van's face.

"Lemme go!" he screamed. "Merkle, you fool! Lela's in there with her mother! I've got to get her!"

Van held Horace Craft firmly, trapping his wrists.

"Be quiet!" he commanded. "I'll do what I can!"

CHAPTER VII

DR. CROSS

AN'S gaze darted along the flaming house. Three women servants were huddled together on the lawn. They were looking at a window which was a smoky square with lurid flame behind it.

As Van first saw the window, a tall, bulky figure materialized from the smoke. The man got outside, struck the roof of the porch, and rolled. His clothing was on fire in places. As he came to the low edge of the porch roof, the man turned, held with his hands and dropped.

"Randolph Merkle!" exclaimed Van. "That was close! Now there are two of us!"

His disguise was no longer of service now. He would have made a quick movement to make a change in his appearance, but at that moment Horace Craft broke free. He seemed demented, shouting, running toward the burning house.

Van swerved and made sure that Horace Craft would stay out of the fire. One short punch and Craft lay on the lawn, his eyes closed. As Van started back toward Merkle, Merkle turned and disappeared around the corner of the house, crying:

"Mrs. Latham is still in her room! Find a ladder!"

The women servants seemed paralyzed. They stared at the Phantom, the image of Randolph Merkle, were as much frightened by this sudden doubling as they were by the fire.

Van turned from them. His hands flew over his face and head. Mouldages popped from his jaws and nose. The bald spot disappeared. The gray eye-shells came out. And in moments only the Phantom was as different from Randolph Merkle as he could possibly be. His hair was thick and dark. But over his face he had slapped a tight-fitting domino mask.

"Don't be frightened," he said to the women. "I'm the Phantom, and I have been called to help the Lathams."

They were but servants. But the wide fame of the amazing Phantom never had better proof. For even those women house servants knew of the Phantom.

"The Phantom!" one of them exclaimed breathlessly. "I never expected to live to see the day—"

Van cut off her excited speech.

"Tell me all you know of what happened," he said.

"Oh!" the servant exclaimed. "Fire exploded all over the kitchen. I saw a big car come up and a woman and man put Miss Latham into it. It went away fast and knocked Mr. Craft's car off the highway. Then it went out toward the lake roads."

"I see," nodded Van. "And Miss Latham was forced to go?"

"Yes! The woman we thought had a sprained ankle carried her out after the house was set on fire!"

Van bit off a sharp oath. It was clear enough why Lela Latham had been kidnaped. If it was true that Roger Latham was dead, as the message in the horrible torpedo model box had indicated, it was easy to judge that Paul Latham would undergo any suffering rather than reveal the torpedo plans to this Kulturkampf Bund.

But if the Bundsmen had Paul's sister? Van was bitter because he had apparently arrived a few minutes too late. And Randolph Merkle had been cut off by the explosion and fire upstairs, and had been unable to go to the assistance of Lela Latham.

VAN raced around the rear of the flaming house. He expected now to run upon Merkle, but when he had reached the opposite side of the mansion, the only persons moving were firemen bringing up two lines of hose.

By this time the highway was filled with fire apparatus. Police sirens screamed. Apparently the attacking Bundsmen had made as clean a sweep of this mob attack upon the police as they had of a lesser number of murders.

Van could not see any wounded policeman or guard who might tell of what had happened, or from which direction the attack had come. The thickly forested shore of Lake St. Clair could have given cover to several hundred killers.

Van's attention was suddenly drawn to an open side door. The fire had not yet swept this side of the house. Smoke was coming from the door and there was glowing red light in some of the upper windows.

Before he could reach it, a tall, thin scarecrow of a man darted from the door, heading toward the nearest shrubbery. He was carrying a small black bag.

"The doctor!"

Van almost gasped his amazement. The man with the black bag was fleeing as if some evil pursued him. He was looking back over his shoulder, giving every evidence of having left something or someone behind and of his desire to escape notice. Undoubtedly the man was the doctor who had been attending Mrs. Latham. His clothes were still smoking as if he had come through fire.

"And Mrs. Latham is still in there!" shouted Van.

The Phantom rarely gave vent to anger, but he was cold with rage now. He had one glimpse of the doctor's face in the glare of the fire, and that face was photographed upon his retentive brain. This doctor had a long face, with long ears, coming to a point at his chin. Upstanding black hair above the forehead looked somewhat like horns.

"It makes him look like the devil, and he's a devil of a doctor," grated

Van, springing toward the open doorway. He would find and settle with that man later.

Two servants came around the corner of the house dragging a ladder, but it was impossible to judge where it might be employed. Too many windows had fire behind them, and only the doorway seemed clear.

The Phantom flashed into the doorway and found himself at the foot of narrow stairs. There was a glow of smoke-darkened fire in the space he could see above him. Driving through this seemed impossible, but Van nevertheless started up the stairs. At that moment a woman's high-pitched scream came from somewhere back of the fire.

"Help! Somebody help me! I can't get her out!"

Smoke was striking the Phantom's eyes. He whipped his coat across his face as he made the top of the stairs. A bulky figure seemed to fall blindly out of the smoke, lunging into him, carrying his legs from under him. Van rolled halfway back down the narrow stairs before he could check either himself or the man who had come plunging out of the fire. A heavy stream from a fire hose struck the wall, broke through and deluged both men.

"Help! She'll burn up! I can't get her out!"

The fierce scream of the woman above was repeated. Van freed himself from the man who had smashed into him. The other man remained limp. Aware of the need for haste, Van half pushed, half threw the other man down the stairs, following and pulling him outside.

The man was Randolph Merkle who had made an heroic effort to reach the trapped Mrs. Latham, only to be overcome by the smoke as he stumbled into Van, or he may have struck his head during their plunging fall down the stairs. Merkle was out, cold.

Firemen were opening up now with two streams from the high pressure hose. The red glow was increasing above the stairs inside the door. The woman up there had ceased screaming.

Firemen, white-coated ambulance men, and police were hurrying from the highway.

"Hit the house hard with that water!" the Phantom shouted to them. "Two women are in there! Drown out this doorway!"

And even as the firemen shouted a protest, Van was up the stairway again. Two streams of water smashed through, rained down upon him. It thickened the smoke until he was compelled to hold his breath.

He reached a closed door and burst through it. By the glow of the fire he saw a heavily built woman bending over another even more portly figure in a luxuriously furnished bedroom. The heavy woman was in a nurse's uniform.

[Turn Page]

"It's no use," she said to Van. "Mrs. Latham's dead. Dr. Cross said she was, but I didn't believe him. Well, she is now. We'll have to leave her."

The nurse overlooked Van's domino mask in the uncertain light. The portly Mrs. Latham must have weighed well over two hundred pounds. Water came through the ceiling now like rain. It hissed in live fire not far away.

Van saw that Mrs. Latham's face was as white and quiet as marble. And his fingers failed to detect any pulse.

"Perhaps Dr. Cross cannot be criticised too much for saving himself," he muttered quickly. "He's too thin to have carried her, and he must have believed her dead." But with a movement so fast the nurse missed it, Van had produced a little mirror, and when he held it over Mrs. Latham's mouth and nose, a slight vapor showed. "She's still living," he said. "Get out yourself. I'll bring Mrs. Latham."

For the first time the nurse noticed the domino mask worn by the Phantom. It seemed to mean nothing to her, except that he must be a criminal.

"No, you don't, you murderer!" she cried. "You only came up to make sure! There were others wearing masks like you, killing the police before the explosion up here!"

The nurse was brave. She caught up a chair, swinging it. But Van trapped the chair easily, then held the nurse powerless.

"Don't be foolish," he said. "I am a friend of the Lathams. You can help get Mrs. Latham out, so you will be sure I intend to save her."

The nurse nodded dumbly.

The aid given by the nurse was slight, though Van carried Mrs. Latham easily. Continuous streams of water made the air steamy, but breathable.

Going quickly down the narrow stairs, Van asked: "Was the explosion upstairs?"

"Yes," said the nurse. "In the next room to Mrs. Latham. Two bombs or something let go."

"Were any servants upstairs?" he asked.

"I don't believe so," she replied. "There was only Dr. Cross and he was out of the room when the explosions came."

That gave the Phantom food for thought. So Dr. Cross had been out of the room at the time of the explosions. That made it look rather bad for him. Possibly the explosions had narrowly missed trapping Randolph Merkle whom the nurse evidently had not known was also upstairs.

CHAPTER VIII

FIRE BOMB SUSPECT

WHEN Van placed Mrs. Latham on a blanket spread by firemen outside the house, he saw that Randolph Merkle was still unconscious. At this moment a swearing policeman appeared, gripping the arm of the long-faced, scarecrow Dr. Cross.

"Sure, an' he's the doctor, an' he was runnin' away when I bumped into him," said the policeman.

"But I wasn't running away," Dr. Cross protested. "I told the nurse to get out. Mrs. Latham was dead, I tell you, and I could not lift her. I was trying to save my own life."

"That was apparent," spoke up Van dryly. "But Mrs. Latham is alive. See!"

At that moment Mrs. Latham breathed deeply and one hand fluttered toward her face.

"You bring her around now, Doc," the policeman grated, "or I'll see that you have no more practice around Grosse Point!"

Dr. Cross was beside the woman, preparing a stimulant.

"Dr. Cross believed Mrs. Latham was dead, Officer," stated Van. "When I got inside, I thought so, too. I took a chance on there being a spark of life."

The policeman had time to notice Van's domino mask for the first time. He was instantly beside him.

"What's this?" he demanded. "So you're one of them murderin' devils of Bunders! You'll—" But the next instant the policeman stopped short, staring at a piece of platinum shaped like a domino. Tiny diamonds gleamed from it.

"The Phantom?" he gulped. "I didn't know. Sure, an' I'll keep my lip buttoned up. An' what might I be doin' to help you, Phantom?"

"Walk to one side with me and keep me covered a few minutes," said Van, his hands bringing a few articles from inside his clothes.

The policeman's broad figure covered the Phantom as the domino mask came off, and Van's hands went over his face. Something happened. In only moments, the policeman was looking at what might have been some coarse-featured mobster of the old Detroit Purple Gang. It was the quickest change that Van ever made. And that policeman had failed to glimpse enough to ever have identified Richard Curtis Van Loan before the face was changed under the Phantom's moving hands.

When they moved back Dr. Cross was still applying restoratives to Mrs. Roger Latham. Looking at the thin doctor with his slight, blue-veined hands, Van realized anew that the physician could not have brought Mrs. Latham out himself. He also noted that Dr. Cross was still a young man, and not so ill looking in spite of his long, thin face. His eyes were of piercing blue, and the Phantom could see that the doctor was watchful, as if on guard against something. And it was still to be explained why he had been away from the nurse and Mrs. Latham when the fire bomb had been exploded.

Dr. Cross turned to the unconscious Randolph Merkle.

"From what I heard," he said, "Mr. Merkle must have been close to the explosion. He's burned slightly."

Van could see that Merkle's hair was singed on one side below his slight bald spot. One sleeve of his coat was burned some, as if he had beaten out the fire that had caught him there.

Van dropped down beside Dr. Cross.

"Need any help, Doc?" he asked. "I used to be an interne."

"No!" snapped Dr. Cross.

VAN arose, but not before he had checked and memorized all of Randolph Merkle's burns. Knowing of the deliberate attempt to blot out defense leaders, the setting off of the bombs might have been intended to catch Merkle as well as burn the Latham home.

When Dr. Cross arose from Merkle's side, Merkle appeared to be breathing regularly.

"Where is Miss Latham?" he asked. "She should be with her mother. Will someone find her?"

"From what we have learned, it looks like a snatch," the Phantom growled. "Miss Latham was taken away in a car."

"Taken away? Gone?"

Van read either real or simulated anguish in Dr. Cross' exclamation.

It appeared to Van as if there was much more feeling in the physician's voice than would have been expected of a doctor who had only so recently come to know Lela Latham.

Van saw a big car pull through the police lines. He had been expecting Frank Havens to arrive, especially after news of the fire had been broadcast. He was about to move toward the car, but halted. He saw that Merkle was conscious, and was getting to his feet. Captain Reagan, who had been in the Latham Building, came up and confronted him. The alloy metal magnate rubbed his hand across his forehead.

"Just why did you run out on our investigation at the Latham Building, Mr. Merkle?" demanded Captain Reagan. "Even if you did discover that time bomb and probably saved the others, you should have waited."

"I discovered—"

Randolph Merkle started to speak, then caught himself up. Van then judged Merkle had not yet learned the details of the time bomb and the arrival of the body of Janet McGregor, the secretary to Roger Latham, downtown.

"Oh, yes," said Merkle. "Well, I thought I would be needed out here, and so I came right along. I'm sorry."

Dr. Cross was staring at Merkle. His blue eyes were perplexed.

"Did I understand you to mean that Mr. Merkle was downtown when that time bomb exploded in the Latham Building, Captain Reagan?" he asked. "Why, Mr. Merkle was out here at the time the news of it came over the radio."

Under less tragic circumstances, Merkle's position would have been amusing.

Because of the Phantom, the man had to explain being in two places at once.

The Phantom judged this would be a good opportunity for him to fade from the picture. Then he heard Merkle say calmly:

"You might as well know it, Captain Reagan. I was not attending that meeting downtown. The Phantom Detective was there in my place."

The look on Captain Reagan's face and his exclamation was all that Van waited to hear. One little thing that might be vitally important had been in his mind for the past few minutes. He had some independent checking to do.

The fire had died down under battering streams of water. Moving with his usual speed, Van reached a darker side of the house. Here he easily fixed the origin of the fire, probably the exact spot where the incendiary bombs exploded, judging by the condition of the ruined residence.

HE GROPED his way into the dripping structure, though he realized that his effort might be useless. The incendiary bombs might have been of a type that destroyed all vestige of their own structure. But so accurate had been his judgment of the fire's point of origin, that he did come upon a twisted piece of burned metal. It was of brass.

The metal was but some three inches in length. Van examined it, sniffed at it carefully. Then he wrapped it in his handkerchief and slipped it inside his clothes. . . .

"It might match up," he said softly. "There's one chance in a hundred that the burned powder or acid is the same."

From the ruins, Van moved directly into the darkness toward the woods. As he did, he saw Frank Havens crossing the front lawn. The rugged publisher, with his iron-gray hair, was a striking figure. Havens looked worried, too, so Van relieved that worry by a simple trick, without revealing himself.

A voice that seemed to come from someone close to Havens halted the publisher. But few professional ven-triloquists could equal the Phantom.

"Everything is okay so far, Frank," said the voice. "You might do well to continue staying with Randolph Merkle, for I have instructed Chip Dorlan to communicate with you at noon tomorrow."

Frank Havens wore a hard smile as he paused, listening. Even to him, the man responsible for the Phantack had been facilitated by the proximity of those trees.

Moreover, Van was again recalling that from the box containing the corpse of Janet McGregor he had detected the odor of bilge water. And there were many old vessels up here, the majority of them iron ore carriers that were important links in the defense industry.

The Phantom and Heinrich fought grimly, silently (Chapter X) tom's marvelous skill and talents, the Phantom was sometimes amazing.

"I have a little errand to perform, Frank," said the voice. "The word sent by the Bund that Roger Latham is dead may or may not be true. I mean to find out. You will hear from me."

Even as his voice was giving Frank Havens assurance of his own safety, Van was moving toward the trees bordering the lake beyond the burned Latham home. The ease of the at-

The Phantom was in the fringe of the trees, moving cautiously. Bundsmen and their hooded leader believed the Phantom had died in his overturned car before the Latham fire, but some of the killers might still be lurking in the woods, watching for the first move of the police and government men who were arriving on the scene. As he moved through the trees, Van was considering the Latham family angle of the Kulturkampf Bund attacks.

CHAPTER IX

MASK IN THE WOODS

QUITE evidently, Van saw, the Fifth Columnists were making a direct drive to obtain the secret of the Roger Latham aerial torpedo. But with one or two other items coming to his shrewd attention, he was becoming convinced that something more than the possession of the torpedo secret might be involved.

He had a thought for Chip Dorlan and hoped he would manage to become a coremaker at the Herman Slater foundries in the morning. Right now, the biggest business at hand was the finding of a lead to the whereabouts of Paul and Lela Latham.

"And unless I do find that lead, it might be that all of the Latham family are due to be annihilated," murmured the Phantom.

He was summing up in his mind the night's activities of several persons.

There was Herman Slater, for one. That brought him to the exploding violin and the man whom Slater had addressed as Hauptmann Karl.

He thought of Horace Craft's position as the fiancé of Lela Latham, and acting head of the Latham Corporation plant. It would be fortunate indeed for Horace Craft if others of the Latham family were removed, and Lela Latham could be rescued.

Then there was Dr. Cross, one of the few persons upstairs who might have set off the fire bombs. His manner had indicated he was infatuated with Lela Latham, might have been her admirer from a distance for a long time.

Still, a servant, a member of the Bund, could have planted time bombs.

Van had got that far, when he was halted by scuffling feet in the darkness among the trees. He glided, ghostlike, toward the sound.

Faint light still came from the dying fire. By it, Van saw two or three shadows cross an open space, going toward Lake St. Clair. He might have believed these to be some of the manhunters if his keen eyes had not detected the hooded masks. Gliding swiftly upon the masked figures, Van picked up their voices.

"Perhaps Heinrich made it out," he heard one hooded man exclaim in guttural German. "I saw him fall, but he might not have been badly hit. We can't search much longer or we'll be cut off."

The others grunted assent. The little group started away in the direction of the lake. The Phantom would have followed, but at this moment he became aware of another figure moving among the trees between him and the burned residence.

Van dropped and his movements were as silent as those of a creeping deer. The man bulked alongside a tree. Van saw then that he was carrying something draped over one arm.

Unable to distinguish the man's features, Van slipped closer, without disturbing a twig or a leaf. Suddenly the man flashed a cigarette lighter, holding it toward the ground. It failed to reveal his face but it showed Van that it was a black, hooded mask the man was holding.

Van sprang from his toes. His jump and the blurring of his fist were perfectly timed. Being in a half-bent position, as if he was seeking some place to hide his hooded mask, the man could not have been better placed for a knockout punch.

Van's smashing knuckles snapped up his head and seemed almost to lift his bulky body from the ground. The man was out cold when Van picked up the dropped hood and mask.

He had entered the woods with the definite idea of taking on the identity of a Bundsman, if he could have the luck to find one who could be overcome without raising an alarm. Now he had his chance. His next step was to slip out his makeup case, then prepare to make himself quickly into the person of the man he had knocked out.

HIS pencil flashlight picked out the features of the big man on the ground. Seldom had the Phantom been handed a greater shock of surprise. For he was looking at the benign, fatherly features of none other than Amos Stout, mass production expert.

A bruise showed where Van's fist had clipped Stout though the man's rimmed eye-glasses hung from a cord and had not been broken. Van was forced to admit to himself that, although he never overlooked any person or possibility, Amos Stout had escaped all suspicion up to this moment.

Van could recall but one act of Amos Stout that might have been significant. He had been close to Paul Latham when the time bomb was found in the model murder box. And Amos Stout also had glanced at his watch.

"He could have known of that time bomb, and he was in position to have helped knock out Paul Latham, get him out, then return with the others who had rushed out," ran Van's thoughts.

Anyhow, here he was in the woods, apparently hiding a Bundsman's hood and mask, with the probable intention of appearing at the Latham home. It was beginning to look to Van as if almost everyone connected with the Lathams and the defense council might in some way be involved with the Kulturkampf Bund.

One of the greatest assets of the Phantom was his ability to read character. In every way, Amos Stout has seemed to him to be a kindly man. Now it seemed evident that Amos Stout must be an unusually clever actor. Could he possibly be the chief, the Little Fuehrer, who had stood near the Phantom's burning car and ordered his killers to make sure of the Phantom's death?

The Phantom was a great detective because he could identify and work with cold facts. He was greater because he found vital facts in trivial items that the average manhunter would pass by. He was greatest of all detectives because he had at times almost an occult clarity of reasoning.

Still Van hesitated about assuming the identity of Amos Stout. Remarkable as were his powers, he had not enough information concerning the activities of this Kulturkampf Bund to attempt a successful impersonation of its Little Fuehrer, its commander. For that he must first know

[Turn Page]

BEHAVE!

Don't cough in public places. Carry with you a box of delicious Smith Brothers Cough Drops. (Black or Menthol, 5¢.)

Smith Bros. Cough Drops are the only drops containing VITAMIN A more of the inner workings of the Bund, of the mechanics of its sabotage and murder system, of its code and various other details, including knowledge of its members.

Vitamin A (Carotene) raises the resistance of mucous membranes of nose and throat to cold infections, when lack of resistance is due to Vitamin A deficiency.

"So, Amos Stout," Van thought grimly, "for a little while you will have a break. I'll have to find some other Bundsman of less importance, and you will have to wake up believing you were knocked out by someone who saw the chance for a holdup."

It was a new experience for the Phantom, but he quickly rifled Amos Stout's pockets. He took his well filled wallet, his watch, a gold fountain pen and even his gold-rimmed eye-glasses. Then, as he faded back into the woods, the Phantom left the hooded mask lying beside the unconscious man.

TWO minutes later, having gone through Amos Stout's wallet, and examined everything he had taken from the production expert, the Phantom shook his head. It was apparent that Amos Stout was too smart, too clever, to have the slightest trace of anything upon his person that might connect him with the Kulturkampf Bund or any other such Fifth Column organization.

However, more from routine habit than from hope of finding anything, Van unscrewed the top of Amos Stout's fountain pen. To his surprise a tightly rolled paper fell into his hands. His pencil flash was on it but for a few seconds.

"Yes, clever," Van said softly. "Too clever perhaps."

There were only figures upon the papers. These were in groups of three, beginning with 5-7-4 and ending several groups later with 9-10-1. Van's memory recalled Hauptmann Karl's twanging violin. That violin had sent numbers over a special radio in groups of three. Those numbers had been a code that undoubtedly had directed the Latham fire and kidnaping. Van debated but a moment.

"A trapped fox cannot lead the hunters to its lair," he told himself.

He had moved but a short distance from the unconscious Amos Stout figure. He circled back now. It might be well to keep an eye upon the production man.

He had heard no sound or movement, but when he reached the spot where he had knocked Amos Stout cold, the man was gone. The hooded mask still lay there, but the man himself certainly had aroused and fled quickly.

Van was now back near the Latham grounds and the motor driveway. He saw Horace Craft's wrecked car still crumpled, with its hood jammed into a tree. Police and many other persons were thronging about the burned residence. Van could hear Captain Reagan's hard voice directing groups of policemen in the hunt that had begun.

There was no one near the Horace Craft car. Van heard its radio and approached the car cautiously, ready for instant action.

There was no one in the coupé. Evidently the radio had been tuned in when the car had been ditched. News bulletins were flashing into the instrument which was tuned low.

An announcer was saying:

"Following the Latham fire, the kidnaping of Lela Latham, and the probable murder of Roger Latham, the Murder Prophet has been heard again. It is stated that the Kulturkampf Bund is prepared to strike in a dozen key industries within the next forty-eight hours. The warning evidently is intended to frighten thousands of workers off their defense jobs. The latest word of the Murder Prophet is that mines will be tied up, airplane and other factories will be disabled, and that an hour has been set for great explosions in several munitions works. The police and government agents are discounting the Murder Prophet's latest warning as an attempt at terrorism, asserting that it is impossible for such a widespread organization to have gained such a foothold in the industries—"

The Phantom was in the car. He cut out the radio.

"All of it could be true," he said through gritted teeth. "But it could also be a deliberate effort to divert the authorities from the main issue of what is now happening to the Lathams. If the Murder Prophet succeeds, it means the scattering of police and government men, instead of concentrating on running down the killers in this latest outrage here."

RUNNING his hand over the instrument board, the Phantom found what he sought—a built-in, special short-wave radio set designed to communicate two ways. He was instantly sure it was the same kind of set that had been in Hauptmann Karl's car when he was sending code with his violin.

And this was Horace Craft's car! Van looked at the driver's license strapped to the steering post. His whole body stiffened. The driver's license belonged to Amos Stout. Doubtless Stout had loaned Horace Craft his car to come out here.

The Phantom was leaving the car when a ripple of gunfire seemed to run along one section of the woods back of the burned Latham residence. Van judged the shooting to be some distance back among the trees.

He heard Captain Reagan shouting. Policemen, government men and county deputies started in a wave toward that part of the woods. To Van's amazement, Amos Stout came from among the trees in a direct line with the chattering guns.

Amos Stout was running, zigzagging. He stumbled once and fell, but got to his feet and continued toward the police and others grouped near the burned home. Van started toward the fleeing man, then halted abruptly. He saw Amos Stout reach the police. Then he saw Frank Havens and Randolph Merkle reach Stout. Amos Stout waved his arms, talking.

The burst of gunfire was maintained for half a minute or more. All available armed men were vanishing into the woods, converging toward the sound of the shooting. Then as suddenly as it had broken out, the gunfire died.

It seemed to the Phantom that the shots had been directed at Amos Stout. But Van's judgment of distance and sound told his reasoning brain another story.

"The gunmen were too far back among those trees to have hit Stout or anyone else dashing outside," he said musingly. "Those guns were fired deliberately. It's ten to one the men doing the shooting wanted to pull the bulk of the police away from this end of the woods."

Van acted upon his own quick idea. Amos Stout and the others would keep. Right now he believed that murder Bundsmen were making a getaway out into the lake. The shooting had been accomplished by men set as a rear guard, who likely were well prepared to escape in a car or in some other manner.

The trees were thicker near the lake. Van glided between them. He was well past the spot where he had met and knocked out Amos Stout when a single, shadowy figure weaved through the trees not far away.

With long, silent leaps, the Phantom neared the man and saw that he was unmasked, but that he was carrying a hooded mask in one hand. The man moved as if he were dazed. Recalling what he had heard a short time before, Van sent his voice off to one side.

First he uttered a few words in German, then he called:

"Heinrich! Heinrich!"

The weaving figure halted, turned slowly toward the sound of the Phantom's voice off to one side.

"Fritz!" he replied hoarsely. "That you, Fritz? Rudolph!"

Van's quick surmise had been correct. This was the missing Heinrich for whom others had been searching. Again Van sent his voice off to one side, keeping the Bundsman turned in that direction and covering his own swift attack.

CHAPTER X

SCREAMING TORTURE

HENRICH heard him just before Van sprang upon him. Perhaps because he had heard that this Heinrich was wounded, Van may have lessened the drive of his fists. It was as if he had suddenly thrown himself into a fight barehanded against a powerful, raging beast.

Heinrich had all of Van's weight. His hard jaw seemed to break Van's knuckles and the man scarcely staggered. Instead, he gave evidence of having had plenty of training in rough-and-tumble battle. One of his driving knees sank into Van's stomach.

The impact was unexpected and drove Van's breath hissing from his throat. Van ripped in an uppercut, that was weakened because of his own pain. A hairy hand, as clawed and strong as that of a wild gorilla, hooked behind Van's neck.

The hold was ordinary enough, but this Heinrich seemed possessed of the strength of a madman. Teutonic oaths frothed from his lips as Van was sent to his hands and knees. Heinrich apparently had some training in the deadly art of savate.

The hard toe of a boot drove to Van's ear. It felt as if his head had been spun from his shoulders. The ground heaved up into his face. Van, forced to admit his mistake in making his first attack in the belief that Heinrich was wounded, was now stunned.

But realizing the physical strength of the Bundsman, Van had the quick wit to change his tactics. As Heinrich's toe snapped his head to one side, Van flattened limply, his hands and legs outspread as if his senses had been knocked out of him. It was an even bet now whether the surprising, maddened Heinrich would send in another finishing kick or blow, or make a mistake.

Heinrich made the mistake. He grunted a satisfied oath in German, bending over the Phantom. He put one hand upon Van's shoulder and started to turn him over, and this time it was the Phantom's steel fingers that hooked over the back of Heinrich's neck. Because of his own dizziness, Van employed one of the most forceful of all Oriental holds. The Bundsman's heavy body jerked into the air, driven by the reflex action of his own legs.

He turned over once, but Van's fingers never loosened their hold. The ganglia of nerve ends behind the Bundsman's jaw administered as effective an anaesthetic as if ether had been applied.

The Phantom was still dizzy and his stomach was aching as he got to his feet. In the trees near him it was silent. Farther up the shore, man-hunters ranging through the woods where the shooting had been heard, were shouting to each other.

The Phantom propped Heinrich against a tree. His make-up case came from under his clothes. He never had worked faster. A light from his case outlined Heinrich's features, his short, blond hair, his lips and broad cheekbones. Van guessed that Heinrich's ancestors had been as much Slavic as German.

Within five minutes, Van was comparing his own face with that of Heinrich. He looked odd with his lips thickened, and with his own dark hair tightly held by the short blond covering that made him a perfect image of the Bundsman.

Van was forced to pry open an eyelid to get the correct color of the eyes. Then his own eyes became light blue. Another three minutes got him into Heinrich's rough clothes. When he left, Heinrich was well hidden and good for several hours of sleep.

VAN slipped the hood and mask over his head, and hastened to the slanting shore of Lake St. Clair. Except for some rotten shore ice, the water was clear. Riding lights of a few boats could be seen out half a mile or more.

"If those Bundsmen are still trying to find Heinrich, it will work," he thought. "Otherwise, I'll have to try something else."

Watchful for possible police, who were still scouring the woods, Van started along the soggy shore. He judged the police were making the mistake of believing that all of the murder Bund killers had been traveling in cars.

In that his judgment was good. The police had looked along the cold, lonely lake and had seen nothing. But Van saw the black hulk of a cruiser with a whispering motor gliding along the edge of the shore ice. It was without lights, and could easily have passed unnoticed if Van had not been expecting a boat to appear. Van took a long chance. Being hooded and masked, he flashed a cigarette lighter he had taken from the Bundsman's pocket. As he did, he called out softly in German:

"It's me, Heinrich!"

His imitation of Heinrich's voice was perfect. His light had showed his hood and mask.

"Hurry, Heinrich!" commanded a

[Turn Page]

OLD MR. BOSTON SAYS: "MY APRICOT NECTAR IS A TREAT YOU'LL CHEER!"

IT'S THE DRINK THAT DOES THE TRICK, GOT WHAT IT TAKES TO MAKE YOU CLICK!

Mr. Boston's Apricot Nectar is a liquor with the tempting flavor of ripe apricots. "Rich as brandy, smooth as honey," you'll enjoy drinking it straight. A handy drinking cup tops each pint bottle.

A Beverage Liqueur prepared by Ben-Burk, Inc., Boston, Mass.

OLD MR. BOSTON APRICOT NECTAR

ALSO BLACKBERRY - PEACH - WILD CHERRY - 70 PROOF

voice from the boat. "You'll have to come out on the shore ice!"

Half a minute later, the Phantom was pulled aboard the boat.

Just a little later than that, the Phantom sat with some two score Bundsmen at a long table in an iron-walled space, the converted hold of a mammoth iron ore carrier, which appeared from the outside to have been either grounded on shallow flats or to have been laid up for the winter. Van knew this, because the half dozen Bundsmen who had been searching for Heinrich had been pulled directly through the side of the rusty plates. The hull had opened and closed. Inside, Van had seen several small cruisers, and one amphibian plane. These were floating at one end of the three hundred foot hull.

That the remarkable interior of this rusty ore carrier would never be suspected was plain enough. The lake ship was apparently too far up on the flats, and it was winter time with but little navigation of small boats around Lake St. Clair shores.

With all of this, the Phantom was not at this moment concerned. Everyone had removed the masked hoods. Van was interested in a huge, blond man with small eyes and heavy lips he heard called Fritz.

It was this Fritz who had first spoken to him inside the strange camp of the Kulturkampf Bund.

"They say you have been wounded, Heinrich?" said Fritz.

"It was close, Fritz," replied Van, his German as perfect as that of any Bundsmen. "A bullet rapped me behind my ear, but I was only stunned a little while."

He rubbed the bloody gouge behind his ear where the real Heinrich had kicked him. That had been a lucky kick, although he had not thought so when it had happened.

"We almost did not find you, Heinrich," Fritz said.

Van's fellow Bundsmen were at the moment more concerned with the liquor that was being passed along the table than in the misfortune of Heinrich. Van had time to study the interior of the old ore carrier.

"LITTLE wonder the police have not caught up with these Bundsmen here," was Van's thought. "And with the weapons they have, and the explosives, there's plenty of foreign money behind the Bund, and plenty of men being paid in the defense industries."

Van joined the others drinking for a time, and then it was that he noted a glowing, blue window, and that the other lights now on in the camp cabin were small electric bulbs covered with black paper. It was a blackout to prevent possible light being seen.

Several bulkheaded compartments had been built toward the forward end of the old lake vessel. But all of the time he was fixing all of this in mind, his eyes were upon one figure, a man who was tightly bound to an iron stanchion, but who was seated in a chair around which the ropes had been passed.

The Phantom's impersonation of a Bundsmen had carried him directly to his objective. For the man in the chair was young Paul Latham. Paul's face was drawn and haggard with pain, plainly enough having already been subjected to torture.

But there was nothing Van could do about it now. He could only await the turn of events, and make sure that he drank and talked and laughed as Heinrich would have done. Still he realized that a greater test was coming quickly.

Paul Latham had been tortured, and there was to be more of it. The Phantom was alone, in a spot isolated from all possible opportunity to summon aid. Still, it would be maddening to sit through a torture scene.

Suddenly the light glowed a little brighter in the blue window at the after end of the cabin. A toneless voice spoke. Van instantly decided that a man was speaking over a microphone wire, or a radio connection, and that he was not present. But Van grew tense. For it was equally certain that the speaker was seeing and hearing all that transpired in the Bund cabin.

"Hauptmann Karl," said the voice. "You will forget your infernal music for a little while. We must finish soon. It is certain now that the Phantom did not die. Go on with what you were doing and follow instructions. I will watch awhile as I am alone now."

So the Little Fuehrer was watching. And he was alone for awhile, wherever he was. That indicated he must be somewhere with persons who did not suspect his identity.

"Watching?" ran Van's thoughts. "Through that blue window?"

It came to him what that meant now. It matched up with the special radio he had found in a car owned by Amos Stout, and one he had heard in the car occupied by Hauptmann Karl. The blue window must be part of a private television system.

In the dim light, with a violin under his chin, the long-haired young man with the dreamily cruel eyes was here. Until the voice came from the blue window, he had been playing soft, low music. Van saw the tall, graceful figure of a black-haired woman near Hauptmann Karl. Van could not see her eyes, but he could tell from her attitude of watching that her big interest here was this musical murderer.

CHAPTER XI

THE SOUL OF A MAN

READY for anything now, Van was well armed. He had his own guns, and the Luger automatic he had taken from Heinrich. But he was outnumbered something like forty-four to one. He could but wait and watch, and be ready for any break that might come.

He heard Hauptmann Karl speak to the black-haired woman.

"You are ready, Fraulein Freda? The girl still sleeps?"

"She still sleeps," said the woman.

"All right, then," said Hauptmann Karl, and his low, soft music ended. "You may proceed, Fritz."

Fritz apparently was Hauptmann Karl's right-hand man. The blond giant lifted hands thickly matted with whitish hairs. He held a large white card as he stepped in front of Paul Latham.

Another Bundsman pulled what appeared to be an aviator's helmet with ear-phones over Paul Latham's head. The young man's lips were bloodless. His body writhed as if against his will.

"Only if my father is alive, and I see him, will I ever talk!" he screamed. "You have lied! He is dead, or you would bring him here! You murdered Janet McGregor and then my father!"

Hauptmann Karl disregarded Paul Latham's words. Van guessed that at first the Bundsmen must have attempted to coerce Paul into talking by telling him his father was alive and that he could save him.

Roger Latham might be alive, or dead. But Van knew that there was no question that Lela Latham was alive and was here, and he was also convinced that what he was about to witness would drive him into action against any odds.

With this in mind, he studied every possible advantage he might gain by knowledge of the cabin's interior, and again studied the men. All of them wore black swastikas on yellow arm bands, the emblem of the Nazis. Van could read intelligence in many faces. Here were internationalists, fanatics, Bundsmen, men whose souls had been bought for murder.

Van's eyes turned back to Paul Latham, and he saw the white card being held up by Fritz.

Paul Latham could not hear speech with the odd helmet over his ears. The card read:

YOU HAVE ONE MORE CHANCE.
NOD THREE TIMES WHEN YOU ARE READY TO TALK.

Paul Latham screamed out. Van had never heard more poignant agony in a human voice.

"Kill me if you want to! I'll follow my Dad! You did this to him! He wouldn't talk! You tortured and killed Janet McGregor and still my Dad defied you, or you would not have needed me!"

Fritz only smiled a little and turned around. Hauptmann Karl's cruel, dreamy eyes glistened like those of a snake. His long-fingered hands, as delicate as those of any woman, drew the bow across a screeching string of the violin. Drew it back and forth, holding it upon a single, high note.

Back and forth, slowly, the bow rubbed out that bit of strident, wailing sound. Then Van saw the amplifying instruments, and the wires leading to Paul Latham's ear-phones.

The note never varied. Its continuous wailing made even the stupid-souled men at the table nervous.

"It will not be long now," said one of the men. "The blood will run from his ears. Hauptmann Karl always gets them with his violin. They talk or they die. This Paul Latham's father was the only one who was too tough to kill."

VAN caught that remark in a flash. Roger Latham had been too tough to kill. Perhaps there was still a chance for the head of the Latham family.

Van could feel his blood chilling. That persistent, single, wailing note was like a steel point pressing slowly into his own brain. The face of Paul Latham was a rigid mask of agony.

The fiendishness of the torture came fully to Van now. That wailing note from Hauptmann Karl's violin was being amplified perhaps a hundred times. Van could tell that it was reaching Paul Latham's burning brain as a steady, piercing scream.

Hauptmann Karl was smiling a little. Fraulein Freda was beside him, straining forward, intense enjoyment pictured on her hard, beautiful face.

"She's a devil from Hades," breathed Van.

Another card was placed before Paul Latham's eyes.

WHEN YOU ARE READY TO TALK,
NOD THREE TIMES. SOON YOUR EARS WILL BURST AND BLEED.
THEN YOU WILL NEVER HEAR
AGAIN.

Paul Latham swore.

"I'll never talk! I'll die like my Dad did! You'll never find what is missing from the torpedo model you stole! I'm the only one who knows, and who has the explosive formula!"

Van's fingernails bit into his palms under the table. The odds might be a thousand-to-one, but he could endure just so much. Only one thing kept him waiting. Lela Latham was a prisoner of these fiends. He had to know where she was, if he was going to be able to save her. Though just how he could save the girl and Paul Latham, with the fighting odds at forty-four to one, the Phantom was not sure.

The single violin note was being magnified now in Van's own ears. How many minutes, how many hours could Paul Latham endure it? His brain must be on fire.

Then suddenly Paul Latham ceased to writhe. The agony of endurance passed from his face. Little threads of blood crept from under the ear-phones and down his neck. Yet it seemed that he had ceased to suffer.

The brutal Fritz saw that, and cursed.

"It is finished," he said. "His ear-drums have burst. He can hear nothing."

That card was held up again. Van's nerves were as tense as tight wires. Against any or all odds, the time was at hand when he must fight, win or lose.

"We'll have to put on the pressure while he's still able to think," Hauptmann Karl said. "Fraulein Freda, I'll have to play my violin for the girl. We have to have results for the Little Fuehrer. Bring her out."

The changed card before Paul Latham read:

YOU THINK YOU WILL NOT TALK.
YOU WILL. WATCH.

There was movement in the shadows. Paul Latham cried out in an awful voice:

"Lela! Not you, too!"

"Paul—Paul!" her anguished voice cried. "What have they done to you?"

Seldom had the Phantom seen a girl of more wistful charm and appeal than Lela Latham. As she was moved into the light, with Fraulein Freda's hands holding her arms, the exquisite, oval face was white. Golden hair clustered about her ears.

NEVER had the Phantom been more greatly stirred. It was as if an angel had suddenly appeared in a den of beasts.

Paul Latham was rigid, silent, after his first outcry. One of the Bundsmen lifted the helmet of screaming torture from his head. The girl uttered a cry that would ring long in the Phantom's ears.

"Paul! Paul!"

The red threads of scarlet trickled from the youth's ears. The amplified shriek of Hauptmann Karl's violin had forever destroyed his hearing.

The brutal Fritz brought the helmet over to Fraulein Freda. This thoroughly evil, if beautiful woman, slipped the helmet over Lela Latham's head. She pulled out a handful of the golden hair that was in the way, as if she hated the girl for her beauty.

Paul Latham seemed too stricken to speak. His eyes stared at his sister and his mouth was a tight line. He was like some dead man who still could see. Then the youth threw back his head and laughed, loudly, horribly, until he was screaming.

"He's gone nuts!" grated a Bundsmen in English. "So what do we get?"

Fritz walked over and slapped Paul Latham until his head rolled sideward. The awful laughter continued. Lela Latham's burning eyes were fixed upon her brother.

The Phantom knew human emotion too well to be deceived. He saw that the youth was making one desperate effort to save his sister, and still keep the secret of the father he believed to be dead. Paul Latham was feigning insanity.

Then Van realized that Hauptmann Karl was not being fooled either. The long-haired violinist uttered a harsh command.

"Gag him until he knows his sister can hear my violin! When he sees that, he will recover!"

Big Fritz whipped a cloth around Paul Latham's mouth, ending the crazy laughter. Van was glancing casually at the ceiling, at the electrical wiring and the dim, blacked light bulbs. But his feet were already planted, and one hand was upon his heavy automatic.

The thing that happened was almost too incredible for belief. Hauptmann Karl glanced at his watch. He stood there, his violin under his chin, his bow motionless.

"All can wait until I hear this one," he said. "I never miss it."

He turned the dial of a small radio. There was a crash of drums, the rumbling of brasses, the faint but rising voice of violins. Hauptmann Karl stood there, his cruel, dreamy eyes half closed.

A symphony orchestra was rising to the highest crescendo. Hauptmann Karl nodded, and his violin bow moved over the strings in perfect harmony with the orchestra. Then he turned off the music.

"Beautiful!" he exclaimed. "Beautiful! Now we will proceed!"

He glanced at Lela Latham, her wistful face half concealed by the torture helmet. The bow touched that one string, drew forth that single, wailing note. Van's eyes were fixed upon the girl's face.

ALMOST instantly, he realized the note of the violin was not being magnified as yet in Lela Latham's ears. For some reason the amplifier was cut off. That semblance of torture to trick the brother into talking suggested wide possibilities to the probing brain of the Phantom.

"Someone does not want Lela Latham really hurt," he thought. "Only the pretense is being made. Who would that be but the Little Fuehrer? By whose command would this mock show be put on, yet apparently with every idea of sparing the girl from permanent injury?"

Horace Craft was said to be the girl's fiancé. Dr. Cross was mad about her. Even Amos Stout might have it in mind to marry the girl. And Herman Slater might have some of the same interest, purely from a selfish point of view.

This summed up, to Van, that others of the Latham family, possibly of the Latham Corporation stockholders, would be permanently removed. And that meant danger for Randolph Merkle, who was one of the biggest of the stockholders. It could have been intended for Randolph Merkle to have died either in the downtown bomb explosion, or at the Latham home.

Van's thinking was cut off. Paul Latham had broken. He could see only that the torture violin was being applied to his lovely sister. He was nodding his head violently, a signal that he would talk.

The gag was removed and Paul Latham's voice screamed out because of his own deafness.

"No!" his sister cried. "No, Paul! Don't tell! Dad died to keep his secret! I can die, too!"

But Paul's voice screamed on.

"All right, you beasts! Stop it! Turn my sister free, and I'll tell you everything about the torpedo! I'll give you—"

The eyes of all Bundsmen were riveted upon the tense scene. Van crouched, his muscles bunching. He would have leaped upward, but another voice cried out fearfully from the darkness. At the same moment, a gun exploded and a man screamed.

With ropes trailing from his body, Roger Latham sprang from the darkness at the end of the cabin. He was swinging a gun, and his voice was like a cry of doom.

"Don't talk, Paul! They'll kill us, anyway! Kill us and your mother! Janet McGregor died to keep me from telling our secret, and if all of us must die, we can't destroy what she gave her life to save!"

Two Bundsmen were jumping toward Roger Latham. The elderly man was a fearful figure. His clothes were in rags. His face seemed scarcely human. Blood was clotted under his ears.

In a split second, the Phantom understood all that must have happened before Janet McGregor had been sent as a message to the defense council. She had died to protect Roger Latham's secret.

Even as the truth came to him, the Phantom jumped from his toes. He had a flashing glimpse of a Bundsmann pointing a gun at Roger Latham. Van's heavy automatic jolted in his hand. The intended murderer jerked around and fell without shooting.

VAN'S free hand gripped instantly onto the ceiling wires of the lights. Startled oaths, the sounds of blows, the rush of feet over the iron floor came into the darkness that blotted out everyone as Van ripped the wires loose.

He had but one chance in a thousand, and he knew it. If he failed, there was not the slightest hope of him or any of the Lathams getting out alive. He must drive through in the darkness, seize Hauptmann Karl, and then use Fraulein Freda's voice to trick the others.

His chief fear now was that some of the Bundsmen would strike at the Lathams. So as the wires came free and blackness shrouded the place, Van deliberately sent his voice to the other end of the cabin.

"Your Little Fuehrer spoke the truth! I am the Phantom!"

He heard the rush toward the sound of his voice. He dragged the wires down and killed all of the lights. But the wires still were unbroken as his feet struck the iron floor.

Blue fire flashed across the darkness.

It had been Van's own body that had shorted the wire. The terrific shock of grounding the electrical current into the iron floor knocked him down.

It stiffened and numbed his body and for the moment he was completely paralyzed.

Heavy feet trampled upon him. He could not speak or again employ his voice to trick the murderers.

"It is Heinrich!" one Bundsmann called out. "He is the Phantom! Get lights! Find Heinrich!"

The Phantom fought desperately to bring his numbed muscles back to life.

He could but wonder if Roger Latham was still alive.

CHAPTER XII

CHIP ON HIS OWN

ENGINES stuttered furiously on the Herman Slater foundry trackage. In the chain welding rooms the big and little hammers created a deafening din. In the molding sheds where the cast-iron parts were poured in liquid red metal to become gray shapes for various articles from meat grinders to stoves, there was the grind and thunder of the high tramway motors where magnets lifted tons of plates and bars.

Chip Dorlan was nearly black of face, and there were cinders in his hair. He was shaping sand neatly in a mold. A foreman watched him and nodded.

"You'll do, kid! You didn't lie none! You've been a coremaker!"

"Sure," said Chip, grinning. "I can make cores in my sleep."

The foreman passed along. Chip's sharp blue eyes turned toward a wall of corrugated iron that extended nearly to the skeleton framework in the high roof peak of the building.

But one small door opened through that wall. Yet Chip had watched many men going in and out through that door. Whatever activity went on behind that wall, the heavily barred and double guarded door blocked casual investigation.

Chip Dorlan had not waited for morning to try for a coremaking job in the Herman Slater foundries. He had squeezed himself in on the midnight shift by picking out a foreman and putting his case up to him.

"I just got pushed off a rattler, an' I've gotta have a job to eat," Chip had said. "How about it?"

The foreman had frowned at his light weight, and shaken his head.

"We don't use waterboys, and there's a child labor law. Here's a two-bit piece for a meal. Good luck, kid."

"Nuts!" was Chip's reply. "I'm twenty-two, an' I can make cores faster'n any guy twice my weight! Lookit!"

A much soiled San Francisco birth certificate, Chip's grin, and his refusal of two-bit charity turned the trick. So he was in the foundry molding room, but in the back of Chip's mind were the Phantom's instructions.

"Keep an eye out for a flying wing or some knew kind of a plane."

This general casting factory was not the place to look for that class of machine work, as Chip well knew. Foundries made cast-iron stuff. Little steel was employed. But Chip had found out the Slater plant made chains.

"Chains need good steel," reasoned Chip. "So there's more than cast-iron being made."

He was a fast worker. He had that grinning way about him that was his biggest asset. And he looked like a thin, half-starved kid.

Chip first noticed the barred door, the iron wall and the guards when he saw a fat, round-faced, marble-eyed man pass toward it with several others.

"Herman Slater," Chip said to himself quietly, recalling this must be the man he had seen in the car with the violin player who had knocked out the Phantom with a gas gun. "Somethin' goes on in there."

He asked a fellow workman about that.

"Less you say about that end of the shop, the longer you'll last," growled the workman. "Some sort of experimentin' is goin' on in there, an' only a few men picked by Slater himself ever get in there. Keep your nose clean, kid."

CHIP nodded and grinned, as if it did not matter. But his sharp eyes were turned upon the iron wall, following it to the open space above. Here girders and steel beams supported the plant roof. Someone with the agility of a monkey might climb over the wall.

He had the agility of a monkey. All he needed was opportunity. And in one brief hour he had learned that Herman Slater was not working directly upon anything considered as defense material, unless it might be the anchor chains for ships. Therefore, the immense plant was not under government inspection.

Herman Slater had his own private police force. The guards at the iron wall door were in plant uniform and wore guns.

Chip worked away for two hours. Because of the terrific bedlam of the switch engines and the chain mill hammers, he was unable to gain anything by listening. Whatever went on behind that wall was concealed from the human ear as well as the eye.

At the end of the second hour, Chip felt a sudden chill of cold air on his sweating back. He turned. He could have sworn that the end of the big building beyond the wall had somehow opened and closed.

There had been a swift humming sound. It had died out quickly.

"By golly!" grunted Chip. "I'd almost swear that was an airplane motor. And that the plane took off. But it couldn't be done, not in here."

He was studying the beams and girders under the high peak of the roof. It looked dark up there in contrast to the brilliant lights below.

The barred door opened. Chip saw the marble-blue-eyed Herman Slater come out accompanied by two men.

The hooded figures advanced on the overturned car (Chapter V)

As they passed close to him, Chip heard one of the men say:

"Well, Slater, I guess tomorrow night cleans us up. We'll shoot the last one out of here and take out the catapult. That'll—"

The voice faded away. But one word had impinged upon Chip's brain. Catapult!

That was the contrivance employed to shoot planes into the air off of plane carriers. So the end of the building had opened and closed beyond the wall.

At lunchtime, Chip's fellow workmen thronged toward the locker and washrooms for their twenty minute snack and smokes. None noticed that the new kid coremaker was not among them.

Chip Dorlan played it smart. He moved away from the barred door and the iron wall as far from the police guards as possible. When he reached an upright girder with cross-pieces, Chip proved the human race might after all have come up, or down, from the monkey tribe.

High in the dark peak of the roof, he swung lightly from one hold to another. He was sure the guards and others could not see him in the blackness above.

A motor swinging a magnet load passed close to the wall. A second too late, Chip realized the motorman was above the lights. He saw the man's face turned briefly toward him as he was swinging from one cross-piece to another.

"If that guy saw me, I'm sunk," he muttered, but he went on faster until he was directly over the mysterious space behind the wall.

GLANCING back, he saw the magnet motor being run toward the far end of the building. The motor-man would go there to descend, if he had seen Chip.

"Anyway, I'll see all I can, an' make a break for it before they get me," thought Chip, and then a gasp of surprise opened his mouth. He had hoped he might see work being done on some kind of a plane. His view gave him the shock of realizing that he had come upon something big, something that had no place in the Slater foundries.

Four small planes were lined up at one side. He saw the catapult with its cylinders and springs, and a runway along which a plane could be shot toward the closed end of the building. A huge door appeared to be connected with the catapult.

"Now why would they want to be taking that chance instead of using a regular air-field?" muttered Chip.

In his excitement he risked climbing to a much lower beam, forgetting all about the motorman who might have seen him. More than a score of men were at work behind the wall, packing bright, metal objects into plain wooden boxes. One box was being carried over to one of the planes, and Chip saw it slid in.

"Bombs!" jumped from Chip's tongue. "Great gosh! They're packin' an' loadin' bombs!"

Then he saw a queerly shaped machine, like a single wing of a giant plane. But it had two motors set in its sides. There was a covered cockpit between the motors.

Chip was elated. He had found what the Phantom wanted! This must be the flying wing. Some men were working around it. They had a long, gleaming metal object that looked like a torpedo. The men were arguing, waving their hands, in heated dispute as they examined the torpedo.

"I've got to find out about that, if it's the last thing I ever do," gritted Chip.

Here was something bigger than Chip had ever encountered on his own in any of his adventures with the Phantom. That metal thing might be that missing Latham torpedo, and if it was, the Phantom would never forget how he had discovered it.

Clinging to the side of an upright steel in the darkest corner, Chip started sliding toward the floor. The door of the iron wall was suddenly slammed open. The two police guards came through, guns in their hands.

Too late, Chip started to shinny upward toward safer darkness.

A bright searchlight swept around the walls. When it struck Chip, he was almost blinded by it. He heard the little crackling sound of guns amid all of the bedlam of the chain mill and the foundry. A splotch of gray appeared on the steel directly in front of his face.

Looking down, he saw a guard with a gun held upon him. The guard motioned and shouted. He indicated that Chip could have his choice—climb down or be shot off the steel. Chip decided on the safest way. He slid slowly toward the waiting guard, who jerked him around and shot questions at him.

Chip tried to grin. "I like to climb, Mister," he said, "So I—"

THE guard backhanded Chip across the mouth. Then Chip saw Herman Slater come hurrying into the secret room. Before Slater's thick lips slammed out a guttural oath, Chip realized the jig was up.

This Slater had seen him with the Phantom downtown near the Latham Building. Now Slater was saying something about the Phantom, speaking rapidly in German. Chip wished he knew languages like the Phantom. Then a man spoke to him in English.

"So, the smart Phantom sent you here? He knows about this place, huh?"

From what he had seen, Chip could well believe his life was not worth a thin dime now. But he had to make as good a bluff as he could.

"Sure, the Phantom knows about this place, and so does the FBI, and if I'm not back when I'm expected, they'll bust in here."

But when he saw the cold blue eyes of Slater, and the mocking smile on the thick lips, Chip knew his bluff had failed. For some reason, they knew he was lying.

Slater gave an order in English.

"You will put the meddlesome fellow into a box!" said Slater. "It will be one of the boxes on the wing when we send it up tonight! Fritz will be flying it, an' he'll bail out when the bomb load is over the city!"

Chip had a cold chill along his spine, even if he did not believe all of that threat. This Slater talked as if it was intended to drop a load of bombs in Detroit. Even this Kulturkampf Bund would not dare do that. Or would it?

"Perhaps you could tell us who the Phantom is working with here in Detroit," Slater said, "if we promise to fly you out of here and turn you loose a long way off, say, down in Mexico?"

"I'm not telling anything, Mister!" said Chip emphatically. "You might as well put me in a box!"

Two minutes later, Chip had been forcibly picked up and slammed into one of the long, empty boxes by two of the Slater men. The solid lid was shoved into place. Then hammers started pounding.

There was air, for Chip could see threads of light along the loosely built shipping case. But the nails were being put in all along the lid. Chip guessed he had made a mistake, this time for keeps.

When the hammering ended, Chip experimented with the strength of the box. He might as well have been sealed in a coffin for all he could do now. The chilling thought caused his heart to pound until he could hear its beating.

This box might become his coffin.

CHAPTER XIII

THE PHANTOM STRIKES

MEANWHILE, the Phantom seemed in a hopeless position. Though there came one heartening note while some measure of life was beginning to return to his shocked nerves and muscles as he lay upon the iron floor, not moaning, almost lifeless.

The heartening note was the clear but wooden voice that Van knew must be emanating from the glowing blue window, the only faint mark of light left in the iron ship camp of the Kulturkampf Bund. It was a command of the Little Fuehrer, who must be hearing all that pandemonium.

While the order marked the Phantom for quick extinction, it gave temporary hope for the other prisoners.

"Sieze the Phantom! Make no mistake of his death this time! But keep the Lathams alive! We must have their secret!"

As the Phantom had fallen, and one of the men had cried out that he was in the guise of Heinrich, two small flashlights had been produced, but their beams were little more than firefly flashes in the vast darkness of the spacious ore carrier cabin.

Van's power to send his voice to any point had saved him, and now it must save him again. Strangely enough, it was the trampling of rushing feet that gained him the time he needed now to bring back his own strength.

A small sharp heel prodded his neck. There was the brushing of smooth silk across one of his ears. This could be no other than the panther-woman, Fraulein Freda, probably trying to reach safety from possible shooting.

As she passed over him, and toward where Van recalled were the iron doors to bulkheaded compartments, Van employed his power of ventriloquism. His tone was that of the beautiful Freda herself. He spoke in German.

"Karl! Karl!" the voice cried out, some distance to one side. "Help me! It—it's the Phantom! Karl!"

The voice trailed off chokingly, as if Fraulein Freda had been seized. The sudden surprise must have kept her silent for several seconds. Then her voice could scarcely have been heard above the roaring curses of the Bundsmen, the harsh, rasping voice of Hauptmann Karl.

"Over there, by the bulkhead!" shouted Hauptmann Karl. "Beat out his brains!"

The Phantom, strength at last returning, heard a guttural assent in the voice of the hairy, brutal Fritz, the Hauptmann's chief torturer. Van estimated where Fritz was as he surged to his feet.

As men rushed toward what they believed to be Freda's cry for help, Van used another voice, that of Hauptmann Karl.

"Stay beside Paul Latham and the girl, Fritz!" was the command.

Before Hauptmann Karl could have conjectured the source of that quick command in his own voice, Van was lunging toward the prisoners. A Bundsmen intervened.

Van smashed unerringly down upon the man's skull with his heavy automatic. He went on over the falling body to collide heavily with Fritz.

An oath from Fritz, the rubbing of the wirelike hair on one of his slapping hands made Van sure of his target. He put everything he had into a ju-jutsu hold that would paralyze brain and body alike. Just to make sure, he flailed the side of Fritz' hard, blond skull with his gun.

THE torturer collapsed. And instantly Van took on the wooden voice of the Little Fuehrer himself. His command was quick and logical. "Fools! The Phantom will escape! Get to the exit dock! He'll seize a boat or the plane!"

Van was sure the real Little Fuehrer would reply to that order, knowing that his Bundsmen were being tricked by the elusive Phantom. The glowing, blue window was between him and the doors leading to the boat and plane dock. Van hurled his heavy automatic with scarcely less than the speed of a bullet. The weighty weapon smashed glass, made a crackling sound, and purple flame shot out for a split second.

Then there was no blue window. Nor was there any further voice of the Little Fuehrer. The special television radio communication was temporarily wrecked. Van could but hope there was not a substitute system that it could not be connected quickly.

In mass panic, the Bundsmen went rushing toward the dock exit doors. And in that single moment of grace, while the two small flashlights were with the mass of men, Van flung the big, hairy Fritz over his shoulder, carrying him as he might have carried an empty sack. He headed for one of the remembered iron doors leading to one of the bulkheaded compartments.

The door's bolt slipped easily. In fact, it seemed to Van that this door had been unlocked. It had a heavy, iron lock on the inside. As he deposited the heavily breathing Fritz, Van made sure the door was secure.

He bent over Fritz, producing his body-fitting make-up case. He was about to flash on the little light to study Fritz' features, when a rustle of silken garments, or it may have been a whiff of heavy, cheap perfume that warned him that Fraulein Freda was somewhere near.

It was pitch dark in this tight little room which might be equipped with a loudspeaker alarm. Guided by his sense of smell alone, Van moved lightly.

He was the tenth of an inch from the knife that hissed viciously past his face. But in the next breath he had pinned the black-haired, cold-blooded woman to prevent any sound. Not, however, before his face was liberally scratched. He was forced to slap a fairly hard punch to Freda's jaw before she subsided.

Then Van was down beside Fritz, his make-up light revealing the face covered with wirelike blond hairs. It was one of the toughest jobs of make-up with which the Phantom had ever been confronted. Moreover, within the next few minutes, he was confronted by a situation far from pleasant. At the wrong moment Fritz revived, sufficiently to put up a strong battle, though fortunately for the Phantom it was a silent one. It was quickly over, however, and Fritz, already divested of his clothing by the Phantom, had stumbled through an outside door, to splash into the lake.

Quickly, before Freda should awaken, the Phantom got into the clothes of the brutal Fritz. Van could hear through some microphonic connection into the compartment. He had been correct in surmising there was an auxiliary radio system, if not of television. He heard Hauptmann Karl command silence, then speak a few words. This was followed by the quick twanging of his violin string.

EVEN as he worked, converting his face into the heavy-jawed, thick-lipped counterpart of Fritz, Van's brain was noting the code numbers given via the violin string—

The torture was unbearable
(Chapter X)

9-17-6, 4-3-7, 7-13-4, and on like that in grouped letters of three until he had some twenty-five or thirty combinations to keep in mind. Now his face had been broadened by moulages. New eye-shells and thick, blond brows gave his glowering features the perfect appearance of Fritz.

He could hear Fraulein Freda sighing, as if she might be coming out of her coma. Then it was, while slipping on Fritz' coat that Van came upon a small, printed book. A flash of his light showed a volume of old German lore. But as he flipped the pages, the complete working of the violin code came to Van, for his light showed where Fritz had marked words on many pages. Each word was numbered from one upward. Van felt quick elation. He had come upon the radio code, which all of the FBI and other experts could never have discovered without the proper little book! And he saw now that each time Hauptmann Karl's violin twanged three numbers, it supplied the page number, the number of the line, and the position in the line of the word that made up a part of the message.

It was so simple a child might have grasped it.

"But the age-old truth of gravitation was just as simple," mused Van, "until an apple fell and hit Newton on the head."

Now he flipped the pages of the book, picking up Hauptmann Karl's present signal. The message received was astounding!

Tonight—wing—will—trap—ghost—

Van judged the word "ghost" was employed because the little book failed to have the word "phantom" in it. The violin message proceeded.

Free camp ship—ten—fleet—ore carriers—river tunnel—Fritz—wing—crash—city—bomb—set off—camp ship—wreck carriers—smash—tunnel—all—scatter—Hauptmann—

The Phantom's disguised mouth was grim. So the message of warning by the Murder Prophet had been true! The Kulturkampf Bund was planning its greatest terrorizing smash for tonight.

But, like the tapping of a metal object on wood, series of numbers were coming back to Hauptmann Karl, presumably from the fiendish Little Fuehrer.

Ghost—gone—may live—his—aide—be—on—death—wing—send—girl—keep—father—brother—girl—useless—have—caught—Craft—Stout—sending—camp—

Because of the quickness of the tapped numbers, Van was forced to thumb the little book rapidly to pick out the words. He chilled all over at two parts of the message. The Little Fuehrer evidently was informing Hauptmann Karl that the Phantom's aide, Chip Dorlan, and the girl, Lela Latham, were to be on the exploding wing tonight.

And his quick brain read an amazing revelation. "Fritz," who now was himself, was also to be on that wing, was to be the pilot of the bomb wing, which was to carry death and destruction, and also to be the murder ship for Chip Dorlan and Lela Latham.

It required possibly no more than two or three minutes for Van to make his interpretation of the simple code. And then he heard Fraulein Freda moving.

Van glanced at the faint light around the door opening in the outside plates. Somehow, he had to deceive this Freda. He worked that by giving a good imitation of two men struggling, and cursing in German as Fritz might have cursed before Freda should be entirely out of her daze. Grunting, apparently fighting, he got the door open. A hurled box made a heavy splash in the lake. Immediately Van was swearing in Fritz' voice.

"An' that finished the meddlin' Phantom!" he concluded.

CHAPTER XIV

PRISONERS

NEVER before had the Phantom put on a greater show of ferocious triumph. In German he berated the Phantom, apparently looking into the darkness where the body had disappeared in the icy lake.

He turned back to where he could hear Fraulein Freda trying to speak. It was well that his demonstration had taken place when it had, because someone had discovered a way to repair the shorted electrical wires. A light bulb flashed on in the compartment, along with the outside lights.

"I heard all of it, Fritz!" Freda exclaimed. "You'll wear the little cross for that. Did you know the Phantom struck me as he was fighting with you?"

"Ja!" muttered Van, adding in German, "That was why I finished him for sure this time."

As they came into the long cabin, Hauptmann Karl and the other Bundsmen were milling about. Van entered as the shuffling, wire-haired Fritz, with huge, awkward hands. His position was made all the stronger, because it was the cold-blooded Freda who told the story of the fierce fight she had heard between Fritz and the Phantom in the dark compartment. Hauptmann Karl sent Bundsmen outside to scan the lake.

"There's no sign of the Phantom," one reported, coming back. "No man could survive five minutes in that ice water."

Van shivered a little. So much for Fritz, but the Bund torturer and killer had had it coming.

The three Lathams were still alive and not further harmed. Roger Latham was bound again.

"Good enough, Fritz," approved Hauptmann Karl. "The Little Fuehrer will know of this. Now we have some quick work to put through before daylight. Lela Latham and Freda will be going ashore farther down the lake. You will drive them, Fritz. Your car will be met by the one from the chosen place, and Freda will remain with Lela Latham until she is safely confined there. We have orders to keep the Latham men alive, but the girl has become unimportant to the Little Fuehrer. We have some visitors coming, so she is no longer required."

It was then that the Phantom was made sure of his vast importance in the widespread murder and terrorism planned by the Kulturkampf

Bund for tonight, still several hours away.

"You'll be carrying the girl, Fritz, on that exploding wing tonight!" said Hauptmann Karl crisply. "And don't have any ideas of your own about Lela Latham. You'll parachute out as planned, and let the boxed prisoners ride down with the bombs. Any wrong move, and our other ships will gun you out of the sky, for you'll be trailed every minute."

Van grunted in the voice of Fritz. Yes, he was to be the pilot of the plane to rain down death, and to carry Lela Latham and Chip Dorlan to their doom.

A buzzer sounded near the entrance from the dock. Van heard the whispering of a boat's motor. All eyes were upon the opening door, but no one there was more amazed than Van over the new arrivals.

Securely taped and blinded, three men were prodded into the camp cabin. The first to appear was little Horace Craft. His partly bald head was streaked with blood.

Hauptmann Karl selected that moment to play a soft melody while Van stared at the second prisoner. Either circumstances were far wrong, or here was one of the reddest red herrings he had ever seen. For the genial, kindly Amos Stout stood there, contusions on his face and his clothing torn. He seemed trying to see through the tape over his eyes.

But it was seeing the third prisoner who stirred the Phantom to icy anger and apprehension.

THE third man was none other than Frank Havens, the newspaper publisher! Havens, the Phantom's friend and sponsor. But before a guess could be made as to why Frank Havens was here, Hauptmann Karl supplied the answer.

"Well, the famous Mr. Havens!" he taunted in English. "The interfering newspaperman who had to send the Phantom to meddle in our affairs.

It may please Mr. Havens to know that his noted Phantom is now groveling in the mud at the bottom of Lake St. Clair, and all others who know too much will be lucky if they meet as pleasant an ending."

Frank Havens' teeth ground together. His jaws were hard-set, even though his usually ruddy cheeks were white. And the Phantom knew that just now he could take no chances even to relieve Havens' anxiety. All he could do was play out his rôle of Fritz, to reach the real Little Fuehrer. He must locate the Kulturkampf Bund's stronghold and striking point on the land, the place where Chip Dorlan surely was a prisoner, and from which the mysterious exploding wing was designed to rain death upon innocent persons.

A break now, an attempt to rescue the prisoners, or even to contact Frank Havens might be fraught with disaster. Had Havens' eyes been unblinded, Van might have signaled that he was in the rôle of Fritz, but now all were surrounded by the armed Bundsmen. And before he was to leave the murder Bund's supposedly grounded ore carrier camp, the Phantom was to learn ever more of the ingenious terrorism planned by the Little Fuehrer's clever brain.

Hauptmann Karl called him to one side, through a door near to the inside dockage space for boats and the small plane.

"You understand all of your part tonight, Fritz?" he asked. "After you have jumped from the plane, you will go to the Little Fuehrer's garage. I will be there, and we will be ready to start South. None of us have been suspected, except by the Phantom, and through your good luck you have removed him as a menace."

"Ja!" replied Van. "I understand, Hauptmann Karl."

He wished that he did. He would have to trust to luck after he had arrived at the stronghold in the city, wherever it might be. His mind had been on the Herman Slater foundries, but that did not fit in with a belief that had come to him at first, and which had grown stronger. For while it had seemed that Herman Slater himself was likely to be the Little Fuehrer, the Phantom had more positive reasons for suspecting another man. Because of this, he was already trying to formulate some plan whereby he might drop the rôle of Fritz for a short time in the city, then resume it.

HOWEVER, the truth that now came to him was that this supposedly grounded and useless iron ore carrier used as the Bund camp, was really afloat. Also, he had just seen the Diesel engine by which the old vessel could be moved. The Diesel bright and shining, was close in the stern of the carrier. Three Bundsmen were working around it. Its pumps were clicking. Hauptmann Karl followed the supposed Fritz' eyes, and smiled.

"Too bad, Fritz, you have to be on your own assignment when this ship collides with the iron fleet in the river and the big explosion blocks the Detroit-Canada railroad tunnel, and fills the channel. It will be a tremendous spectacle."

The temptation to throttle this Hauptmann Karl, with his torturing violin, his love of fine music and his heinous soul, was strong. There also might be an opportunity to disable the Diesel engine and disrupt this phase of the Bund plot.

It might also be possible, by another complete blackout to rescue the prisoners. Six captives now. The three Lathams, Frank Havens, Horace Craft and Amos Stout.

"Is Amos Stout a bonafide prisoner?" flashed into Van's mind.

Even as this came to Van, he realized that it could not possibly work out. If he failed, then the prisoners would die. That would leave the Little Fuehrer free to carry out the major part of his program of terrorism.

As the trusted Fritz, he might make contact with the Little Fuehrer. And only as Fritz could he possibly locate what he believed to be the industrial heart of the Kulturkampf Bund.

"This Frank Havens, and the others, they are to die, to be blown to bits with the ship?" he said in German, half a question, half a statement.

"Especially Frank Havens, Fritz," was Hauptmann Karl's quick reply. "Knowing that his great Phantom is dead, he would leave nothing undone to track down the Bund. His newspapers are powerful, greater than our explosives, I'm afraid. But with Havens and the Phantom both gone, we have nothing to fear."

Van stepped from the motor room of the ore carrier, planned by the Bund to bring death, block a tunnel between the United States and Canada, and hamper important ore shipment on the Great Lakes, with the knowledge that upon his brain and his other powers depended the lives of many persons, and the fate of a vast portion of the American defense industry. . . .

The Phantom regretted that Hauptmann Karl remained with the murder Bund ship, as a dark cruiser slid from its side. Two powerful Bundsmen, Fraulein Freda and Lela Latham were in the cruiser with Van. It was his job, he discovered, to operate the craft.

To the Phantom this was simple enough. He glanced at Lela Latham. She was in a trancelike state. Van could understand that. Her fear was not now for herself. She had been told that if she refused to obey any command, her father and brother, Paul, would die.

Van was unable to communicate with the girl. The circumstances of the future hours might give him an opportunity, but just now he had to play the rôle of Fritz as he never before had essayed the rôle of any other man.

The dark cruiser was equipped with one of the special radio sets. They were nearing a deserted wharf, when the voice of Hauptmann Karl suddenly came in.

"I'll play for you, while you read the little book."

Van signaled one of the Bundsmen to hold the cruiser off shore while he produced the little book of German lore he had taken from Fritz. He thumbed the book. The E string of Hauptmann Karl's violin twanged.

CHAPTER XV

DEATH JOB FOR VAN

DURING his whole crime-fighting career, the Phantom had never been confronted by a more fantastic situation than was brought to him by Hauptmann Karl's radio code on his murder violin. He thumbed the book rapidly, finding page numbers, lines and words.

The message conveyed to his quick brain added one more angle to the complicated tangle of the Bund plot. In substance, the message stated that Mrs. Roger Latham, still suffering from the shock of the night, had been removed to a small, private hospital on the River Rouge road.

"There she is under the care of Dr. Cross," was Hauptmann Karl's message. "You will see that the girl is placed, then go with Fraulein Freda to this hospital. She will be made up as a friend of Mrs. Latham. She will use the hypo with the cyanide. When she calls for help, Mrs. Latham will be dead. Fraulein Freda will have time to escape."

Again it came to the Phantom that the annihilation of the Latham family was apparently as important to the murder Bund, or to its Little Fuehrer, as the hampering of defense work, or the ferreting out of the aerial torpedo plans for the master of the Bund overseas.

The radio became silent. Van was now more than ever convinced that a deduction he had made hours before was being confirmed. He took the wheel of the cruiser, guided by what might have been the flicker of a cigarette lighter three times on the deserted wharf. Lights in the cruiser cabin were hidden from the outside by heavily blacked-out port-hole windows.

Van took a chance and laid the cruiser alongside the unoccupied landing place. Back of the wharf he saw a waiting sedan. Fraulein Freda was watching him, her blue eyes bright and expectant. Van surmised that she must have guessed part of the radio message.

"She has a soul for murder," was his thought. "Somehow she knows that she is to have the chance to kill."

The two Bundsmen with them were strong-armed, burly men, but all of their strength seemed to lie below their necks. Van realized, that as Fritz, he was in full command. He was computing time and the order he had been given.

"I have until tonight before the death plane is to take off," was his thought, "and before the Kulturkampf Bund ship of death is to start upon its way. It would be natural for Fraulein Freda, playing the rôle of some friend of Mrs. Latham, to choose the afternoon visiting hours at the hospital."

The instructions about the "hypo" and "cyanide" came to the fore. Undoubtedly such a death instrument was somewhere at hand, ready for Fraulein Freda. It might be here on the cruiser. Or it might be in that waiting car, or even at the place to which Lela Latham was being taken.

Van, adopting the surly tone of Fritz, pulled Freda to one side. Quickly he growled out the instructions he had received. He was intent, watching the woman's reaction, and he had been correct.

There was an unholy light in Fraulein Freda's bright blue eyes. That woman did have a soul tuned to murder.

"Good!" she exclaimed. "It is always ready, the quick way to kill, and they never suffer."

FREDA'S hand sought a fold of her dress. She produced a hypodermic needle of shining metal.

"When I have done this," she murmured, "then I will be sure of Karl! Today you will drive me to the hospital, Fritz, but I will leave alone. I am quick, you see. I will be one of Mrs. Latham's society friends when I enter, and I will be one of their own nurses walking out for a little air when I leave."

The Phantom had known that Fraulein Freda was a finished actress. His estimation of her ability was suddenly increased now. Freda had a little mirror. She employed but three or four minutes, and she turned back to the Phantom and the Bundsmen.

Her hard, pretty face had taken on unexpected lines. Her eyes had changed, and her hair. She pulled a fur cape around her shoulders. Even to Van, the world's greatest make-up artist, Fraulein Freda proved herself as one nearly as great.

She might well have been some middle-aged socialite of New York. Her voice, when she spoke, in English, had a definite Boston accent.

Van nodded. "Ja, Freda!" he grunted.

He was still at the wheel and the throttle of the cruiser motor. Gruffly he ordered the two Bundsmen to make the boat fast, directing both now to make sure they were not being observed as they would go to the waiting car.

The Bundsmen stepped to the wharf, carrying the mooring lines. Van suddenly touched the throttle, kicking the boat ahead, its prow ramming a wharf piling as if by accident. At the same time he cut off the light inside the cabin, which had been so blacked out that it could not have been observed outside.

"You blundering dolt!" Fraulein Freda cried. "Fritz, you are dumb-headed!"

Van muttered, as he felt Fraulein Freda thrown off balance and jolted against his shoulder. In the darkness, his hands moved with lightning speed. Yet their touch was imperceptible to Fraulein Freda.

From Van's inner garments came a hypodermic that he nearly always carried. It contained a potent drug. But the effect of that drug would never be lethal.

Even as Freda cried out and Van was apparently preventing her from falling, his lightning hands made a quick substitution. Fraulein Freda might later today satiate her soul with the belief she had ended another woman's life. But Mrs. Roger Latham would not be greatly endangered.

For Van now had the hypo of deadly cyanide. Freda had his harmless but potent drug. But there was more now to Van's unexpected jarring of the cruiser before he cut off the speeded-up motor.

He swore hoarsely in German. He switched on the lights inside the cabin, where the windows were blacked out, and he was was groaning. His right arm was in a peculiar, contorted position.

"My shoulder!" he exclaimed. "It's dislocated!" He was moving his left hand, working with it. "It is bad! I should see a doctor! We must get to the car, quickly!"

LELA LATHAM was helped to the wharf by Fraulein Freda. Van noted the closed sedan had a driver. But, as they came along the wharf, this Bundsmen driver came from the car.

"I'll take the boat back into the lake and sink it, as ordered," he said.

Van had not guessed what was to be done with the cruiser. Fraulein Freda spoke to the other two Bundsmen.

"You will keep this Fraulein Latham in the back seat," she said. "Don't bind or tape her. She knows what will happen if she tries to raise an alarm. Fritz has hurt his arm badly. So I will drive the car. The doctor at the place will fix your arm. It must be all right for the ride this afternoon and your great flight tonight."

The Phantom was in the seat beside Fraulein Freda. As the plane pilot for tonight, as the operator of the cruiser to this point of meeting with the car, he had saved himself by his uncanny faculty of guessing what might lay ahead. He had judged that he might be expected to drive this car carrying Lela Latham and the others. And thus far, he had not been given the slightest hint as to what the car's immediate destination might be.

A blunder would have upset his future plans, which were much too vague even now to suit him. His feigned dislocation of his shoulder had put Freda at the wheel of the car. He had planned it that way, although he had expected that one of the Bundsmen guards might have become the driver.

Fraulein Freda sent the sedan through a waterfront industrial district. Soon the Phantom would know of the Kulturkampf Bund's connections ashore, probably in one of the defense plants. But in the back of his mind was a major part of a plan whereby he might make personal contact with the so-called Little Fuehrer.

Gray daylight fogged down over Lake St. Clair and the famed River Rouge, where the main plant of the Ford Company was situated. The sedan crossed a multitude of tracks.

Freda glanced occasionally at Van, slouched in the front seat beside her, his right arm and shoulder still queerly twisted. That arm was as good as it had ever been, but he had learned to perform that contortion of the muscles which made his shoulder appear useless.

"If there's a doctor where we're going, I'll have to make it look good," was his thought. "If I could only have been free for an hour or two now, it would have helped. But I'll have to take a chance on what this afternoon will turn up. Yes, Fraulein Freda, I'll see that I'm in condition to drive your car for the murder of Mrs. Roger Latham."

Only the Phantom's clever brain, and his trick had maintained his rôle of Fritz. Even had he guessed their destination was the Herman Slater foundries, he would not have known the route to it through the roaring industrial center.

So it was Fraulein Freda, with keen anticipation of murder in her blue eyes, who shot the car through a gateway and into a huge iron shed shortly after daylight. Lela Latham still seemed to move as if she were living in a dream.

"Down this way!" directed Fraulein Freda, guiding the girl in front of her.

Van groaned and managed to stay beside the two Bundsmen. He made his pretense of pain to permit Freda to lead the way to a huge trap-door that opened in the floor of the dark, iron shed.

They passed along a tunnel, then there were stairs leading upward. Van apparently had no thought for anything but his dislocated arm as they came into a brilliantly lighted place, but his sharp eyes missed nothing. There were small planes here. Part of the interior of a high-roofed building was piled with plane wood boxes. There were rows of bright objects that could be no other than aerial bombs.

CHAPTER XVI

BENT ON MURDER

CONTROLLING himself by supreme will enabled the Phantom to pass up all that he saw as if he had been here many times before. His vision and his ears did not miss a trick, but all the time he appeared to be interested in only his personal suffering.

"The doctor?" he demanded of Fraulein Freda. "The pain is unendurable!"

He seemed barely to notice the huge catapult, the automatic connection with the end of the Slater Foundry building that would permit planes to be shot into the air. He could understand the aerial bombs and the boxes.

"So the Bund has been smuggling out planes loaded with bombs, probably at night, shooting them from the catapult," he was thinking. "And this is the heart of the Kulturkampf Bund terrorism. But Chip Dorlan? Lela Latham?"

He saw two armed guards in plant police uniforms, as all the time he remained half doubled with the apparent agony of his dislocated shoulder. There were at least forty men at work in the building, placing bombs in boxes, and loading some of the planes. He saw a queer one-winged plane with two motors.

"The wing," he thought, remembering the altercation between Paul Latham and Herman Slater at the defense council meeting. "So that's what, as Fritz, I'm supposed to fly tonight! Loaded with bombs! Carrying Chip Dorlan and Lela Latham! But how did Chip get in here, and where is he?"

The clanging of the foundry chain mill, and the blasting roar of its other machinery drowned out any unusual sound that might have come from this place of the planes and bombs. Fraulein Freda was beside Lela Latham. She had seated the white-faced, terrorized girl upon one of the empty boxes, and was bringing a white-shirted little man over to the supposed Fritz. The little man evidently was a doctor. He spoke in German.

"Fools!" he said to Freda and the two Bundsmen who had come with them. "Why didn't you pull the arm back into its socket? Here, Fritz, you ought to know what to do! Sit down on the floor!"

The Phantom knew exactly what to do. Even if his arm had been dislocated at the shoulder, it was but a minor, though painful operation to put it into place. The doctor pushed one foot under Van's armpit. He caught Van's hand with both of his own hands, then jerked suddenly, pulling the under-arm solidly against his foot.

Van let out a German oath expressive of intense agony. His shoulder resumed its normal shape. He was grateful that the doctor had been quick and rough, instead of removing his coat and shirt to examine that shoulder. It had not been dislocated.

Van was arising. He was close to a plain, long box. Because of the infernal racket of the foundries, it was almost impossible to hear minor sounds, but Van had felt the thumping of something or someone inside that box while his back had rested against it.

When he glanced at the box lid, he saw that it was nailed down tightly. A chill ran through him. Chip Dorlan must be in that box. He glanced once more at Lela Latham. He was sure that the girl now was feigning stunned stupidity

INSTEAD of adding to the Phantom's self assurance, this pretense of the girl but presented a greater problem. He realized that her nerve might break at any moment, or that she might make some wild attempt to gain her freedom.

Van lacked any possible means of communicating with either the girl or Chip. He saw Lela Latham watching him with all the loathing and fear she must have had for the real Fritz who had helped with the torture of her brother.

Van noticed that the plane shaped like a single wing, which must be Roger Latham's creation, was being loaded by some of the Bundsmen. However, the bombs being placed in the wing were sliding into a metal rack. They were not being packed in boxes. That made him sure that this was the death threat of the Kultur-kampf Bund. This load of bombs was to be dumped on some section of an unsuspecting city tonight.

To some degree, this knowledge gave the Phantom a sense of elation. It was mixed with his acute fear for the safety of his best friend and sponsor, Frank Havens. For now, acting as the brutal Fritz, he was to be entrusted with that wing loaded with bombs, and presumably the boxes that would carry Chip Dorlan and Lela Latham.

[Turn Page]

"I can prevent the air bombing and save Chip and the girl," was Van's thought. "But how can I be in time to avert the death of Frank Havens, or the other disastrous explosion in the river?"

His mind jumped ahead. In a few hours he was scheduled to drive Fraulein Freda to a private hospital for the cold-blooded murder of Mrs. Roger Latham. He was to leave the Fraulein to escape as a nurse.

"And in that time, if I am thinking straight, I'll have the self-styled Little Fuehrer in my power," was his relieving thought. "That accomplished, all of this may be stopped, all of the Kulturkampf Bund may be delivered into the hands of the police and the FBI."

At this moment, the Phantom believed he could not be mistaken concerning the identity of the so-called Little Fuehrer. He could already picture himself in control of the Little Fuehrer's radio communication, in position to frustrate all of the murder Bund plans.

Blankets were arranged on bunks at the side of the Bund stronghold. The sight of them brought to Van the realization that he needed rest, a restoration of strength after the past exhausting hours.

The Phantom had the trained ability to fully recuperate in a few hours. He grunted a few words in German to Fraulein Freda.

"My shoulder will be all right by the time we are to drive to that hospital," he told her.

She nodded, her eyes bright and cruel with anticipation. Van ignored the nailed box in which he was sure Chip Dorlan was a prisoner. He crossed the space among the boxes, picked out some blankets and stretched himself out.

He was arranging the details of what must happen this afternoon, as he closed his eyes. It was an extreme emergency now. It compelled him to strike hard and surely at the Little Fuehrer if many lives were to be saved.

"Even Frank Havens will be the last one to believe the identity of the head of the murder Bund," Van told himself.

THERE was some commotion at the side of the room. An outer door opened. A small group of men entered, with several of the plant policeman. Van was watching through slitted eyes.

A chill struck through him. He was looking at the short, fat figure, the round face and marblelike eyes of Herman Slater. He could not hear words in all of that din, but he could read Herman Slater's lips.

"Everything is ready," Slater was saying. "Load all of the bombs the planes will take. We strike at midnight, or a little before. When the wing is out, then all of the planes will take off. In here there will be the great explosion that will demolish what we have set up. We will get to the ore carrier, then transfer from it before the river blast."

Herman Slater's round face was marked by a cold, ruthless smile.

"It will seem to these government fools that we have had an act of sabotage, but all will be destroyed, and they will find out nothing," he said. "And this is one time that even the blood of one's kin cannot be permitted to stand between the Little Fuehrer and success. Heil Hitler!"

"The blood of one's kin?" murmured Van, studying Slater.

There was a round of quick-armed salutes from the men nearest Herman Slater. Van closed his eyes.

At this time, he was more confused than at any moment since the first break of the Kulturkampf Bund.

Herman Slater was being obeyed. His boastful reference to the Little Fuehrer was as if he had spoken of himself. His fat body drew up and his chest puffed out. Then Van read the fiendish order that came from the thick lips.

"Place Lela Latham ready in a box," commanded Slater. "Why was he so dumb as to permit her to rest? If she thinks this is the end, she may tell something she knows that will be of value. Otherwise, we will be compelled to employ other methods to learn the secret of the Latham aerial torpedo."

The Phantom had endured many crucial moments in his long career. He had often steeled his impulses against action that would have been disastrous. But never had the force of red, human rage fought with his inward control as now.

He saw Fraulein Freda's lips. "I'll bring her," said the murderous woman.

The Phantom's nerves were like drawn, tingling live wires as he saw Lela Latham walking as if she were still in a dream. Perhaps it was her great courage, her unflinching pretense of being numbed beyond feeling that prevented the Phantom from acting then. As Fritz, he was armed with two automatics. He could have shot down Herman Slater and Fraulein Freda.

Or perhaps he could have bluffed all of the other Bundsmen by capturing Herman Slater.

But there arose the vital question. Herman Slater seemed to be the Little Fuehrer. Yet if he were not, all that Van might do now to save Lela Latham would accomplish nothing for many others who faced death.

And the Phantom still had one or two small items that must be checked before he could be sure of naming the Little Fuehrer. So his slitted eyes watched, and he remained rigid, apparently stupidly asleep.

Lela Latham was lifted from the floor by one of the Bundsmen. She made no outcry as she was placed in one of the long bomb boxes.

A hammer pounded. It seemed to Van as if every stroke of the hammer drove a sharp point into his own spinal column.

Lela Latham was being nailed in a wooden box. There she must wait through the long day, until time for the wing of death to be shot into the sky.

* * * * *

WINTRY rain sogged down upon the smoke-fogged city in the vicinity of the gray, private hospital as the Phantom sent the sedan he was driving into the curved motor entryway.

Fraulein Freda sat stiffly beside him, her blue eyes fixed ahead. Those cruel orbs glinted with relish for what lay before this woman of the strangely warped soul. Her face was middle-aged, wrinkled, and there was no resemblance, except in the eyes, to the actress she really was.

The Phantom had to admit he himself could have mistaken her for some rather weary society matron. He opened the car door for her. She went up the steps into the private hospital.

Van touched the hypodermic syringe in his clothes. It was loaded with lethal cyanide. He smiled a little. But his mouth went grim again.

It was mid-afternoon. He was glad of the winter rain and the fog. Perhaps it might aid him in what he was about to undertake.

Back in the Herman Slater foundry, he had rested for several hours, compelled his nerves to be quiet by force of his iron will. For Lela Latham was nailed in a wooden box. Chip Dorlan was in another. He had to keep to the rôle of Fritz or chance the lives of all those who were threatened. This hospital visit was important, and Fraulein Freda must be convinced she had murdered Mrs. Roger Latham.

Call in the police? Summon the FBI?

The Phantom had gone over all of that. He was balked by the certainty of death itself. The Herman Slater bomb shipping room was loaded with high explosive, ready to blow all of it to bits at the first alarm. The Bundsmen could escape by the tunnel to the garage shed.

And there was the iron ore carrier, the camp of the Kulturkampf Bund. One word from the Little Fuehrer, and the ore ship could be blown to pieces. On the carrier were Frank Havens, the Lathams, Horace Craft and Amos Stout.

"I took it all on, and I have to finish it alone," Van thought grimly, as he watched Fraulein Freda go inside the private hospital. "Any call for help means murders, and probably the loss of any chance to capture the Little Fuehrer himself."

CHAPTER XVII

MURDER GOES WRONG

KEEPING in character in his disguise as the blond, wire-haired Fritz, Van was carrying out the afternoon plan of murder that the code message of the early morning had commanded.

As arranged, he was now to drive away. In the hospital, Fraulein Freda was to end the life of Mrs. Roger Latham with what she believed to be a deadly needle, then escape with the cape and hood of a nurse.

"She's smart enough to do it, too," gritted Van. "And if she doesn't believe she has accomplished the murder, and she does not return to the Slater foundries, or join Hauptmann Karl, whichever she means to do, everything may break loose at once."

He was easing off the brakes, permitting the sedan to slide slowly out of the hospital roadway. He had purposely waited for several minutes, as other cars nearby were discharging visitors. But he desired to be away as soon as possible, for his own plan called for the fastest action of his career.

As the sedan moved, Van was picturing the hard-eyed Fraulein Freda. By this time, doubtless she had been admitted to the room occupied by Mrs. Roger Latham. She would seize the first opportunity to jab the hypo needle into the woman's body.

"And that drug will act instantly," thought Van. "So Freda will believe she has accomplished her purpose, and she—"

Van bit off his thoughts, let his car roll along, but turned it toward a side parking space. As if he had been hurled bodily from the hospital entrance, the thin, long figure of Dr. Cross, flew into view.

At the foot of the broad steps a woman screamed shrilly. Dr. Cross somersaulted, landing on his back. Other women took up the chorus of frightened screaming.

For Dr. Cross was not alone. Van recognized Fraulein Freda springing from the hospital doorway. It seemed as if the cold-blooded, beautiful actress had suddenly gone insane. She was leaping upon the rolling doctor, as their bodies came together on the hospital steps. Van caught the gleaming flash of a weapon.

Even as a small caliber automatic cracked twice, Van muttered:

"I should have known it, and taken that from her!"

Dr. Cross managed to get to his feet, but he was entangled with Fraulein Freda.

"You murdering devil!" Dr. Cross cried out. "I've got it—"

Van could but guess that in some manner Fraulein Freda had slipped up. Perhaps the physician had seized the hypo. For its effect would have been as quick as if it really had contained the murder acid.

Freda's little gun cracked again, then again. Dr. Cross went off his feet, as if his spine had stiffened, then bent into a backward bow. But Fraulein Freda was falling with him. Van saw then that the scarecrow doctor's hand must have seized the small gun and fired those last shots.

Fraulein Freda and Dr. Cross, the doctor who was mad about Lela Latham, lay together at the foot of the broad hospital steps. Van's trained senses informed him with unerring accuracy that both Fraulein Freda and Dr. Cross had been mortally wounded.

THE Phantom set his sedan rolling again. His lips were set tight. If it had not been for the killing of Dr. Cross, he knew he would have felt grim satisfaction over this unexpected tragedy, the sudden passing of the soulless Fraulein Freda. In one way, Dr. Cross had redeemed himself for whatever he had done, in killing Freda.

But the police now could take care of that. Van was sure that Mrs. Roger Latham was saved. It might be believed that she had been fatally drugged, but the hypo Fraulein Freda had used would do no more than give the already suffering woman a few hours of sound and dreamless sleep.

Van kept a close watch, to be sure that no one had connected the car he was driving with Fraulein Freda. He was two blocks from the hospital when he heard the first police siren. Then he turned into a side street and toward blocks that appeared to be only vacant lots. There, the Phantom worked with lightning fingers, using his make-up case. In a few minutes he was driving again, heading toward downtown Detroit.

"The word of the deaths will reach the Little Fuehrer at once," he reminded himself. "It will make my excuse, as Fritz, all the stronger, to say I stuck around awhile to see what I might discover. I can still show up at the Slater foundries without being suspected."

Van parked the sedan in a broad street of better-class apartment houses. When he locked the door of the car, a man who was passing nodded and said:

"Hello Merkle. Glad to see you after your tough experience in that Latham fire."

For the Phantom was again the figure he had appeared to be the night before at the meeting of the defense council. He was the stoop-shouldered, partly bald Randolph Merkle.

"Thanks," he said. "I came out of it without more than my hair singed a little."

He was thankful that the friend of Randolph Merkle passed on without stopping for further conversation. He had never seen the man before.

Van crossed the street and entered the corridor of a big apartment house. He was thinking of a man on the seventh floor of this apartment house, as he glanced at the tenant directory and picked out a name. That of "Herman Slater" stood out.

On the seventh floor, Van discovered that the corridor was empty except for one woman. He waited until she disappeared, then pushed the buzzer of an apartment.

The man who opened the door was holding himself stiffly, his elbows at his sides, as befitted a good butler. Van's entering movement was a flashing surprise that erased all of the butler's dignity. His hands shot out, and the butler's senses faded out with his stiff-elbowed poise.

A swift hold, a pressure of his fingers, and the butler was asleep with his back against the wall. Van glided silently into the hallway of the big apartment, as surely as if he had long been familiar with this place.

Van listened for the possible murmur of voices. There were none. The apartment had a long thickly-rugged hallway. From it a dozen doors led to other rooms. He was opposite one of these doors when a heavy voice spoke.

"Harkins, who was that at the door?"

VAN had heard the butler speak but once. Yet his voice was a perfect imitation of that of the servant.

"It was a woman, sir," he said, opening the door but partly. "I do not know her. She is waiting, sir."

"A woman, Harkins?"

Van heard the occupant of the room moving toward the door. He started it swinging open, stepping to one side so that he would be invisible until the man was fully in the door.

The Phantom's greeting to him was similar to that with which he had greeted the butler. Only this time he smashed out straight and fast with a fist that blinded the other man before he hooked him with a nerve-deadening hold.

The light in the room was dim, so inadequate that Van employed his own pencil flashlight as he bent over the man. The Phantom had developed a light that had a peculiar quality, and one that had only recently come to the attention of other criminal investigators. This brilliant ray of light had a strange effect of magnifying the object upon which it fell.

Van played it over the man's face, his clothes and his hands. He smiled grimly. When he arose, he held some bits of skin that had been so expertly shaved off that the wounds failed to bleed.

Listening, Van determined that only the master and his butler had been in this part of the apartment, but he proceeded warily. First, he disposed of both his unconscious prisoners in what appeared to be a storage room for odds and ends. When the Phantom had finished, he was sure they would remain quiet for hours, and that they would be helpless, even if awake, in the huge storage boxes where he had placed them. He made certain they were well supplied with air.

Ten minutes later, Van was puzzled. He had been seeking a special short-wave radio, but there was only a standard model in the living room, and a small portable in the servants' quarters which were vacant. All other servants, except the butler, appeared to have been sent away.

It was in the library that Van concentrated his efforts at last. There was an elaborate liquor cabinet. What struck Van was that it contained three bottles of Scotch of the same brand, two unopened. There was other liquor.

"There aren't usually two spare bottles of Scotch kept ready for service like that," he mused, then he acted.

When he grasped the two unopened bottles, the cabinet divided suddenly. Little lights glowed. A special short-wave radio set was revealed. Also he saw a short metal rod and a small wooden block that gave forth a hollow sound when struck.

Van had no time to waste. He started calling, using a wave frequency with which he was familiar. Within half a minute he had a reply in the low voice of Hauptmann Karl, aboard the Kulturkampf Bund ship.

Van produced the little German book he had taken from Fritz. He tapped out page numbers, lines and positions of words he wanted as he employed the simple code. His voice had been the wooden tone of the so-called Little Fuehrer.

Also, that tone was the same as that of the dreaded Murder Prophet. Hauptmann Karl replied by his twanging out a code on his violin.

The Phantom smiled as he finished his message.

THAT simple message from the Phantom, with the voice and the code of the murder Bund's Little Fuehrer, changed some of the plans for the coming night. Van moved out, after closing the liquor cabinet, but not before he had removed some of the small parts of the two-way radio, the metal rod and block, and a small book of German lore he discovered beside the radio.

The little book was the same as that he had taken from Fritz. Van was moving out through the hallway, alert, realizing that discovery now would mean his own death and the murder of many others. From overhead came a weird, ghostly thumping.

It was too persistent, too well timed to be some chance workman overhead. Van then recalled that this apartment was on the top floor. He saw a trap-door overhead, or rather the outline of faint cracks around it. Before investigating this, Van made a phone call. He talked with the local FBI chief, gave directions for action, but withheld his own identity.

Although time was valuable, Van hunted until he had found a long stepladder in the storage room. Two minutes later he pushed open the trap-door. The thing that greeted his eyes in the dim light was more incredible than any other phase of the activities of the Kulturkampf Bund.

A figure that might once have been that of a fat man, judging from his flabby, sunken cheeks, was securely chained to a beam. He was little more than a skeleton. He had been thumping on the floor with his heels. His whispering voice hoarsely begged for water.

Van brought water and some food. Five minutes later he was listening to the strangest story he had ever heard. It recalled and connected up directly with what Van had read upon the thick lips of Herman Slater in the bomb shipping stronghold when Herman Slater had said, "And this is one time that the blood of even one's kin cannot be permitted to stand between the Little Fuehrer and success!"

Van's teeth ground together thinking of what the next few hours must bring out. He was convinced now that he was striking at the heart of the Kulturkampf Bund. But he could not now throw away the chance to save others who were prisoners, before calling upon the government and the police to take over.

"I have to have control of the explosives in the Herman Slater plant and of the menacing iron ore carrier, for any slip would mean extinction for those who have suffered the most," he said. "If it works out right, the FBI will be on the job."

To the skeleton prisoner, he said: "A few hours more won't mean much. All of this fiendish injustice shall be set right, I promise you."

The other man nodded dully. He thanked Van with thick speech, speaking in German. That prisoner must have much medical care before his mind would be fully restored to normal.

CHAPTER XVIII

THE PHANTOM FLIES

OUTSIDE, early dusk was striking. Newspaper headlines gave the news of the murder of Dr. Cross and of Fraulein Freda, although she had not been publicly identified. The Phantom realized he must change his identity and return at once to the Herman Slater bomb shipping room.

The papers gave nothing of the disappearance of Frank Havens, of Horace Craft or of Amos Stout. There were still stories of the missing Lathams, and a secondary headline that read:

MRS. ROGER LATHAM DYING

This accompanied the story of Dr. Cross and Fraulein Freda. It related how it was believed the woman who had died with Dr. Cross had administered a lethal drug to Mrs. Latham.

Van nodded with satisfaction, thinking of the order he had issued to Hauptmann Karl on board the iron ore carrier that was to become a terrific bomb, that was to destroy ore vessels, possibly block Great Lakes navigation for some time, and smash in a railroad tunnel between the two countries that had never been at war. He reviewed what he knew as he drove swiftly toward the Herman Slater foundries.

First, the iron ore carrier. The vessel that had been used by the Kulturkampf Bund carried enough high explosive stored in compartments in its forward end, under the high bow, literally to rip the Detroit River. It was so placed that striking of the bow in collision would set off tons of the terrific explosive.

The new Diesel engine operating the propeller was placed far back in the stern, aft of the inside dockage space for small boats, and the plane by which the Bundsmen planned to leave the ore carrier once it was set upon its way.

Van knew that the crew of the Diesel engine could operate and steer the 360-foot carrier from their position at the stern. When these men were sure the carrier could not miss a collision, they were to leave hastily by means of the small amphibian plane, which was to be held ready for them.

This much the Phantom had learned before he had left the carrier in the rôle of Fritz. Over that hidden radio that he had used as the Little Fuehrer, the Phantom had changed that order but slightly. If his plan worked, it would give the government a long awaited chance.

As he had changed it, he had been thinking of the slow, expensive and uncertain system of convicting murderous Fifth Columnists in the courts.

Van's lips were a hard line now, and his eyes were like agate.

"This will be a different conviction," he said softly. "And an execution all at the same time."

A brief halt near vacant lots, and shortly again the Phantom was the brutal, heavy-jawed, blond Fritz. As such he rolled the sedan into the iron shed at the Herman Slater works. Two plant policeman were quickly beside his car.

"You saw what happened at the hospital?" one questioned quickly. "Is what the radio and newspapers say true?"

Fritz nodded, speaking in German. "Ja! It is all truth. I saw the Fraulein Freda die, but I could be of no help. She accomplished her purpose, though, as you may have read. Mrs. Roger Latham is dying."

THE uniformed policemen, who wore swastikas on their arm bands under their coats, nodded.

"Hauptmann Karl will be glad to know how you have used your head, Fritz," one said. "He has just come with new orders from the Little Fuehrer."

"Hauptmann Karl?" exclaimed Van. "New orders? But I want to fly the plane tonight. I want to watch it tearing the heart of this town apart! I have only been waiting—"

"Not so fast, Fritz," said one of the Bund policemen. "You are still to fly the plane. It is only that all of the Bundsmen are to escape by a different way, a smart way that our Little Fuehrer has figured. Instead of risking our staying or leaving by cars on guarded roads, we are to be aboard the camp vessel until it reaches the Detroit River. In the darkness we are to transfer to another ore carrier, which the Little Fuehrer has provided."

Van nodded, his thick, blond eyebrows working.

"That is very smart," he said. "For who of the stupid law would think of looking for any Bundsmen on an ore am sad for Fraulein Freda. If circumstances were not as they are, this Lela Latham would be most charming. You see, I play for her the beautiful music."

Realizing that Lela Latham was imprisoned in that wooden box on which Hauptmann Karl was sitting, Van's fists clenched. Many times in the past hours he had been compelled to keep a grip upon himself, but none greater than now.

The Phantom Challenges the Might of The Snatcher, Crime's Overlord, as a Grim Tide of Murder and Jewel Theft Engulfs a Nation

IN

THE TRAIL TO DEATH

Complete Book-Length Mystery

By ROBERT WALLACE

FEATURED IN NEXT MONTH'S ISSUE

PACKED with ACTION THRILLS and SUSPENSE!

carrier in the river, when others have just been destroyed by our blast?"

They went down through the tunnel and up into the lighted bomb shipping stronghold. Outside night had fallen. Van shot quick glances around. He saw the long-haired Hauptmann Karl, with his dreamy, cruel eyes, seated upon one of the closed bomb boxes. He was playing his ever-present violin. He glanced up.

"I have heard, Fritz," he said, "and I am not blaming you. But I

"The orders have been changed by the Little Fuehrer, Fritz," Hauptmann Karl said. "Because of what happened at the hospital, we are to act at once. I am flying back to the camp ship, and those Bundsmen who wish to move South are to be taken on board an ore carrier in the Detroit River before the great explosion."

"And I am to take up the death plane then before midnight?" Fritz asked.

"At once," said Hauptmann Karl, his violin still giving forth plaintive, low music. "All right, load the boxes. The bombs are in the racks. You will parachute out, Fritz, over the fields at the outskirts, but be sure you are high and that the plane is headed straight for downtown Detroit. Lela Latham and this aide to the dead Phantom never will be found after the explosion. There is enough in that rack of bombs to level a dozen city blocks."

Van shivered a little, but he nodded. He wondered about the instruments and controls of this flying wing, but dared make no inquiries. As Fritz, he probably was supposed to be familiar with the wing idea that had been stolen from Roger Latham.

A Bundsmen brought a parachute, and Van slipped his arms into the straps.

"You will land near Lake St. Clair, Fritz," said Hauptmann Karl. "You know where you are to meet us in the South."

VAN nodded, buckling a parachute strap. Bundsmen picked up the box containing Lela Latham and slid it into the death wing.

Van started to walk over to inspect the bomb rack. It was then that he saw the bomb rack was simply metal strips to hold the deadly bombs in place. There was no mechanism by which the pilot could release the bombs. It made him sick inside. All of the bombs were meant to crash with the wing, so the opportunity for the pilot to dump his load had not been provided.

This was an appalling discovery. Yet Van dared not speak now. The plane was to be shot from the catapult. Even as he noted its landing wheels it quickly came to him that all of his recent plan must be now changed.

"I'll have to set that ship down carefully at the airport," he thought. "Then I'll have to summon every available arm of the law to get to the Kulturkampf Bund ore carrier and trap those on board."

He was thinking desperately of the plight of Frank Havens, Roger and Paul Latham, Amos Stout and Horace Craft. Could they be saved? Even if he succeeded in landing that wing of concentrated destruction safely?

The wooden box containing Chip Dorlan was slipped into the carrying compartment of the wing. A Bundsmen was warming up the two motors. The wing was being turned and wheeled toward the steel grip of the huge catapult that was to hurl it into the air.

"All right, Fritz," Hauptmann Karl said. "Good luck, and—"

A hoarsely screamed oath was followed by a clatter of angry words. From the door, followed by two plant policemen, came a huge figure. The man was plastered with mud. His coat and shirt had been torn off and his chest was a bare mat of thick, whitish hairs.

"Hauptmann Karl!" he screamed with bull-like rage. "It's me! Fritz! Me! He—he's—"

The huge, brutal Fritz halted as if struck by a bullet. His speech failed him. He pointed a shaking finger at the Phantom, as if seeing his own image in a mirror where there was no mirror.

Hauptmann Karl was much faster of wit than his dreamy, cruel eyes indicated. The Phantom also had a quick decision to make. Then all decision was out of his hands. His action had to be governed by those two helpless prisoners. Lela Latham and Chip Dorlan, secured in what was intended to be their coffins.

Fritz was again crying out words in German that convinced Hauptmann Karl of his identity. How he had survived the icy water of the lake, then made his way here was of little interest. The desperate fact was that he was here.

Van wisely kept his hands away from his automatics. Already the guns of Bundsmen were trained upon him. Alone, he might have made a quick fight of it, seized Hauptmann Karl, attempted to have controlled the situation.

But the girl and Chip in those boxes would have no chance. Van slowly lifted his hands, and offered no resistance as his weapons were stripped from him.

A QUICK command was uttered by Hauptmann Karl, his dreamy eyes glinting with the joy of contriving what possibly would rank as the top among all murder committed by the Kulturkampf Bund.

"The Phantom!" he gloated. "And he is a great flyer! Orders of the Little Fuehrer will be unchanged! Only we are changing pilots!"

A quick hope sprang up in Van's heart. It died almost as quickly.

"The Phantom will fly," Hauptmann Karl said calmly. "Wheel the wing into the catapult. Remove its landing gear. Those bombs are so sensitive they'll explode whether they hit land or water. Take the parachute from the Phantom. Smash that radio in the wing. Put the Phantom at the controls."

"I'll fly the wing, as you say," Van said quietly. "But is it necessary that the girl and the other one must die?"

"Oh, yes, my fine Phantom," said Hauptmann Karl. "They know too much. The girl is in the way of the Little Fuehrer. You are clever. You almost succeeded. But once that wing is shot from the catapult, there can be no landing but one that will leave not even a trace of the plane itself."

CHAPTER XIX

ONLY DEATH BELOW

RIMLY the Phantom watched the wing being stripped of parachutes and parts of its radio. He saw its landing gear taken off and temporary wheels substituted for the run off the catapult. The two pro-pellors were turning slowly.

"Perhaps the Little Fuehrer will not approve of your orders, Hauptmann Karl," Van said. "Why not communicate with him?"

The reply came in Hauptmann Karl's low, mocking voice.

"Unfortunately, we have our final orders from the Little Fuehrer," he said. "And he cannot be contacted until all of tonight's plans are carried out."

Van spoke calmly, as if he were thinking deeply.

"You mean, your Little Fuehrer possibly desires to be with other company at this time, with persons of prominence, so there can be no slip-up on his future alibi, if he happens to need one?"

"You're smart, Phantom," Hauptmann Karl nodded. "You couldn't have guessed it better if you had been the Little Fuehrer himself."

Van said nothing. His speech had been uttered with a purpose. For he was repeating exactly what he himself, acting as the Little Fuehrer, had told this Hauptmann Karl within the past two hours.

"If only he goes ahead as he believes the Little Fuehrer intends, there may still be hope," he was thinking. "I can stay up, and wait. Given time enough, I can somehow stabilize the controls and get to those bombs. It'll take time but—"

The wing was being rolled upon the runway of the catapult.

"Wait!" broke in Hauptmann Karl. "The fuel tanks. Drain them off. Cut them down to only a few gallons, a few minutes of flying time. It would be regrettable if our good Phantom smashed his load of death somewhere in the woods or perhaps outside the city where its effect of terror would be lost."

The Phantom had never before felt so empty and sick as now. Ace of flyers that he was, he could accomplish just so much. If only they had overlooked that little matter of the gas!

But the acrid fumes of the gasoline were biting his nostrils as the tanks were being drained. Bundsmen kept guns trained upon him as he sat in the control seat. In a new plane, an untried ship, he could but guess at the intent of some of the instruments.

The Phantom was rigid. His eyes swept the bomb loading stronghold, hidden here in the Herman Slater foundries. According to schedule, its occupants would be leaving as soon as the death wing was shot from the building.

A time fuse would be lighted. Within a few minutes, all that part of the building occupied by the murder Bund would be a mass of wreckage. Van fully believed there would be no evidence left here to connect the foundries or Herman Slater personally with the Bund. It would appear as if an act of sabotage had been committed against Herman Slater.

As Van had one last look over the Bundsmen, Herman Slater was missing. Van smiled grimly, in spite of the desperate emergency now confronting him.

HE COULD hear the whistling hiss of the air compressors of the giant catapult. The wing was being moved back into the grip of the monster arm that would hurl it through the automatically opening doors of the building at better than one hundred miles an hour.

From the instant the catapult would spring, the Phantom would be riding a death wing. That death wing seemed to afford no possible chance for even the super-skill, the super-brain of the world's mightiest man-hunter.

"Chip," said Van under his breath, "Frank—and the rest of you, there has to be some way to avert this monstrous crime. There must be. For myself, perhaps I have served the ends of justice long enough, but the rest of it isn't fair."

His hands gripped the controls hard. He saw Hauptmann Karl's hand rise and fall. The wing started a breath-taking rush. It was as if he were being hurled from a giant Big Bertha.

The wing shot through the opening wall. Misting rain instantly glazed over the shield glass, but a wiper started automatically. Van's first few seconds was all instinctive action. All he could do now was to keep the elevators of this queer-shaped wing depressed and its broad, two-motored nose pointed upward.

Not too much, not enough to stall, but enough to clear any wires or stacks that might be outside. Then—

Van felt the roaring motors take hold, shooting the wing into a climb at a speed he never before had attained even in his fastest low-winged monoplanes. He had a glass, foot-view window. Through it he could see the beading lights of Detroit in the misting rain.

The great city's luminance seemed to drop away, faster than lights on the ground had ever fallen away from any plane Van had ever piloted. Pressure against his diaphragm drove his breath upward in his lungs, making him a little dizzy.

"Glory!" he exclaimed. "This wing's climbing as fast as the average plane would dive. And perhaps it'll come down just as fast!"

He began feeling out his controls, lightly touching the ailerons, the rudder, and the elevator. Never before had he experienced such instant ease of control. Below him now the lights had seemed to fade altogether in the rainy mist.

His instruments showed an upward air-speed of over 300 miles per hour, which was incredible. Van flattened out tentatively. Would the single wing construction throw him into a spin?

It was as if he had suddenly cushioned the plane on a mass of clouds filled with feathers. In spite of its load of bombs, the human weight of Van, and the helpless girl and youth back there in the wooden boxes, the wing, the idea of Roger Latham, was pillowed on the air as easily as if it had been a broad-winged glider carrying no weight.

"Why, this alone would be of the greatest help to Great Britain!" muttered Van.

His minute or two of finding the maneuverability of the wing was over. He forced himself to look at the fuel indicators. They showed so nearly empty that Van drew in a sharp breath, feeling a desperate nausea at the thought of Chip Dorlan and Lela Latham, riding helplessly, unknowingly to their doom.

"If they have only passed out, it will be a good thing," he said slowly. "We're heading for the lake now. That's the best I can do. And, if it has to be my last act, I can do that."

THE wing rushed downward until lights came into view. Van could pick out the central luminance of the city, then the misty beads that ran along avenues and highways. Then he found the gap where the Detroit River separated Detroit from the Canadian shore.

Over there he could just see the lesser lights of Windsor and of Sandwich, the Canadian towns. From these he picked out the dark blot that was Lake St. Clair. His hand found a switch and landing light beams shot out. He cut them off.

"One little thing Hauptmann Karl forgot," he said grimly. "If I could find the camp ore carrier, I could crash—"

But Frank Havens and the other prisoners came into his mind. If only the ore carrier had been occupied by Bundsmen alone! At least the death crash of the wing might have had some recompense.

Van held over the blackness of Lake St. Clair. He started climbing again. He was afraid to glance at the gas gauges. He expected at any minute to hear the motors begin to stutter and quit.

In all of his experience, the Phantom never had expected miracles. He was not hoping for one now. If he'd had fuel, he had learned enough control of the wing to accomplish the release of Chip Dorlan and the girl, by taking a long chance.

But lacking fuel, he could do nothing with a dead-motored plane when it once started diving. With this wing, it seemed to him there could be only a swifter rush to earth than with any standard plane.

Still he climbed, keeping as nearly as he could in a banking spiral that would maintain his position over Lake St. Clair. All lights vanished again. He was in the upper gloom, in the blindness of the rain clouds.

Suddenly the wing passed through. Van saw the stars. He saw the bright, steel-cut lanterns of the sky, and he felt as if he might be seeing them for the last time. Still he kept the nose of the plane pointed upward.

"It'll happen any time now," he whispered. "Any time now—"

It happened. One thundering motor stuttered, missed, picked up and stuttered again. The wing seemed to be falling off to one side. Van compensated on the controls on the motor still pulling.

The second motor faltered. Van was leaving the control seat. He had found and fastened a stabilizing bar. The wing was dropping.

"It'll hold the spiral a little while," he thought. "At least I can get them out of the boxes. We may die, but we'll not be blown to bits."

One of the motors seemed to have become imbued with sudden life. Its propeller thundered again, went into the steady beat of power. Before Van could get back into the seat, the other motor was revving up.

The Phantom never had listened to sweeter music than the renewed thunder. His unbelieving eyes went to the fuel indicators.

A MIRACLE? It appeared to be nothing less. Then Van's gaze went over the instruments, scores of them. And he saw a red lettered circle that had sprung into view. That red circle was a warning of danger to any pilot who might be in the wing. But it was life itself to the Phantom.

The letters read:

EMERGENCY RESERVE ON

"Always — always," came from Van's stiff lips. "Always the smartest of killers overlook some one little thing."

He realized now what had happened. Hauptmann Karl and his Bundsmen had overlooked a reserve tank of emergency fuel. The designer of the wing had built into it one fool-proof device. With the stopping of the motors for lack of fuel, some automatic mechanism cut in the reserve without the pilot being required to act.

"And, unless I've misjudged it, that gives at least half an hour of flying time," came to Van, studying the new position of the fuel indicators.

Yes, he had more flying time. But he still carried a rackful of bombs where his landing gear should have been. He was flying two passengers, confined in wooden boxes. There was no bomb trigger, no connection, no means of releasing the deadly explosive.

The Phantom's lips were compressed.

"A miracle can do just so much," he thought grimly, "then the other fellow has to carry on from there. So—"

Once again he started climbing. He was at 15,000 feet before he set the stabilizer. Never had he worked faster or employed his great physical strength to better advantage.

The only tool he could find quickly was a heavy wrench. He slid back, raised it and smashed down into the corner of one of the box lids. A little scream responded.

"Never mind, Miss Latham!" Van shouted. "I'll come to you next! Everything will be all right!"

He wished mightily he could believe his own shouted words. The wrench splintered the corner of the other box lid. Chip Dorlan made no outcry. Van feared he was unconscious, but he had to have Chip with him now, or all of the miracle of the extra fuel tank would be wasted.

CHAPTER XX

BOMBS FOR BUNDSMEN

FOR average men a chisel, a hatchet or a nail puller would have been required to have got the lid off that box. But when the Phantom's hard fingers gripped into the smashed corner, there was a rasping sound of nails being pulled out.

Van's massive shoulders heaved once, and the splintered lid was in his hands. Chip lay as inert as if he were dead. The plane hit an air pocket. Van held his breath, imagining the stabilizer had failed, but the wing slowed again into that downward spiral at which he had set it.

He lifted Chip's light body from the box. It was no time for gentle methods. Chip was breathing. Van slapped his thin cheeks until they reddened and Chip's blue eyes opened slowly.

For seconds he stared at what was still the ugly face of the Bundsman, Fritz. Then Van spoke.

"The Phantom?" breathed Chip. "I knew—you—"

"No time, Chip," cut in Van. "Swing your arms. Get your muscles limbered up. You've got some flying to do in a kind of a ship you've never seen before. And either you fly it within the next few minutes, or our landing isn't going to be a happy one."

"Gee, Phantom!" gulped Chip. "I can fly anything that's got wings!"

"That's the trouble, Chip," stated Van. "This hasn't wings. It has only a wing, one wing, that's all. Now we'll try it."

Whatever Roger Latham or some other designer had put into that arrowlike wing, it was easily mastered. Chip had the feel of it quickly.

Van sprang back to the box in which Lela Latham was still imprisoned.

"Miss Latham, I'm the Phantom," he said quietly. "I am leaving you in the box for a little while. I have something more vital that must be accomplished quickly."

The girl's tortured eyes stared at him. She saw the features of the terrible Fritz. But Van's voice was reassuring.

"It doesn't matter," she said. "Nothing matters, because my father and Paul are dead."

The Phantom could only say, "They are alive, Miss Latham. What I am about to do may save them. I can only hope it will."

He was back beside Chip. Lights were coming up. So was the black space that was Lake St. Clair.

"Hold steadily until you are down to two hundred, Chip, and keep your nerve," directed Van. "I'm going outside, and you keep on flying. I'm trying to spot a dark ore carrier on the lake, and there is but one way it can be done."

"How, Phantom?"

But Van was down now, peering intently through the bottom view glass. Tiny riding lights of small boats came into view. He touched Chip's arm.

"Hold steady, level off, bank slowly, but be ready to give it the gun, Chip."

Van's eyes cornered on the fuel gauges. He had to beat the exhaustion of the gas. He was sure he could save them now, but he had an even greater idea in mind.

Spotting a blacked-out ore carrier on that lake in that misty rain seemed impossible. Van's eyes ached as he scanned every foot of space below. Then he saw what he had been seeking.

There was the intermittent red glowing of an engine's exhaust and no other light. That could be no other than the Diesel engine operating the Kulturkampf Bund's ghostly ship of murder as it moved slowly toward the thickly navigated Detroit River.

LIGHT as was the rain, with the wind it seemed to form a solid wall that tore at the Phantom's swaying body. Chip Dorlan was employing all of the flying skill his famous mentor had taught him. The wing's landing lights painted the old ore carrier, the Kulturkampf Bund ship, as an ugly-looking black hulk against the lake.

Chip's job was to hold that darting wing at the lowest possible altitude, and still keep the murder Bund ship in a banking circle beneath him. There was the faint, red glowing of the exhaust from the big carrier's Diesel engine.

The wind of speed almost tore the Phantom loose from the door as he opened it. His great strength alone swung him down to that improvised bomb rack. He was also remembering that Hauptmann Karl had said that the mere impact of water would explode them.

"Hold it, Chip," he breathed, knowing he could not be heard by the thin-faced youth. "Keep to the course. Cross the ship's stern."

The Phantom's body swayed, slapped hard against a bomb. He swung by one hand, slipping the first bomb along the rack. Then he had to wait. Chip had the landing lights concentrated upon the ore carrier's high, rusty afterdeck.

It seemed to the Phantom that the tip of the wing almost brushed the Bund ship. It was his moment. He heaved against the first bomb, felt it slide free, then his own breath was held as the wing shot onward.

There was an explosion, a muffled, thundering sound. The wing and the bomb rack rocked in the vacuum of the air. Van had his teeth locked, and he was grimly satisfied. He was sure the bomb had hit water instead of the ship.

"If only it was close enough," he muttered. "Bank it, Chip! Bank it!"

Below him was chaos. Tons of water arose and fell back. Rain and wind shrieked in Van's ears, rasped at his face and hands. The wing lights were playing only over water.

"But they have to come off now, all of them, wherever they may fall!" shouted Van.

Clinging, fighting, he battled the inert bombs as if they were living enemies. They were more than that. They were annihilation if he failed. Once more he saw the wing lights touch the stern of the murder Bund ship.

"Right there!" he grated, and one of the bombs went down.

In the darkness he saw the steady, hammering red flashes that he knew must be a machine-gun. He had one satisfaction. As the sting of the rain and wind tore at him, the shock of a bullet would scarcely be felt.

Now Chip was climbing with the wing. The Phantom went sick. What had happened? For the moment he overlooked that Chip was inside, and that he could see more clearly. The wing arose higher.

Bomb after bomb went off the rack. One bomb stuck. The Phantom tore at it until his hands were bleeding, his body lying across the metal. Part of the rack went down with that last bomb.

Below him it seemed as if the lake was a churning, roaring cauldron. That died down. Van tried to pull himself to the wing's door. It was impossible.

SUDDENLY he had the sense of knowing that the motors had ceased thundering, stopped vibrating. The wing was sinking.

"Chip can't hold the ship," was Van's last conscious thought.

But even unconscious, perhaps the Phantom's highly trained brain was working on a reflex of its own. For he freed himself as the wing seemed to stall, then dropped as flat as a pancake on the lake.

Van suddenly knew that he was swimming, and that erased some of the fog from his senses. He could see a box, like the rough box used to cover a coffin. Instinctively, he was beside it, and his hands pushed through a broken corner.

"All right, Miss Latham!" he said chokingly. "I'll have you out quickly."

His hands gripped the girl's shoulders. Lights like shining knives shot out. Small guns cracked and cracked again. Boats were coming upon the wing, surrounding it.

The Phantom was clinging to Lela Latham, keeping her face above the surface of the water as he lay beside the box that had been intended to be her coffin. Deep oaths were uttered by the uniformed harbor patrolmen who got the box, then the Phantom into the boat.

Van opened his eyes quickly. He could see many bright beam lights playing. The stern of an ore carrier was sinking and its rusty prow was pointed upward into the rain. It was the murder Bund ship, and it was sinking, going down slowly.

The after-hull of the carrier had been shattered. Its propeller had been torn off, and its rudder. Inside four men were dead beside the gleaming, but useless Diesel engine.

Hooded figures were climbing from the sinking ship aboard another rusty ore carrier that lay alongside the wrecked ship. Van fought against restraining hands. He could see some of the figures in the light. He realized with grim humor that Bundsmen imagined they were being rescued by the Little Fuehrer.

A member of the patrol crew gave him a drink, but Van pushed it aside.

"Frank! Frank!" he called out. "The Phantom! Have them find Chip Dorlan!"

Van saw Frank Havens walking with others across the gangplank laid from one ore carrier to another, one sinking and the other riding level. He also saw Roger Latham being supported by Frank Havens, and Paul Latham limping beside them. The fatherly Amos Stout and Horace Craft were in the group.

As he watched, Van cried out: "No! Stop him!"

For he saw the long-haired Hauptmann Karl leap from the side of the ore carrier. The light showed this dreamy, cruel-eyed aide of the self-styled Little Fuehrer clutching his violin. He held it strangely as he fell, tucked under his chin, as if he might be playing out his final rhapsody of murder.

Van was standing on his feet now, seeking the wing.

"You're the Phantom?" one of the guard crew said. "This is the greatest stuff we've ever had. Bombs stopped that ore carrier, and I hear it carried enough high explosive to have blown the Detroit River clear out of its bed, and not one man was hurt outside its own engine room."

"But the wing?" said Van. "The plane that carried the bombs? There's a young fellow, a—"

"Aw, gee, Phantom!" exclaimed a voice behind him. "I tried to make 'em bring me over here, but they wouldn't! So I jumped out of the boat that picked me up and swam over! I made it awful tough for you Phantom on that last bank! I almost hit that ship and I was scared stiff you went down with the bombs! I guess I'm just dumb when it comes to pushing a new ship! Seems like I can't ever learn!"

THE Phantom's strong hand was on Chip's shoulder.

"Never mind, Chip," he said, "the dumb way you fly will do until you learn. Now we've a clean-up to make."

He issued a quick request.

"It seems as if they've rounded up nearly all of the Bundsmen," he said. "Put me aboard the FBI ore carrier."

For it was that he had ordered, acting as the Little Fuehrer, a government ore carrier to "rescue" the members of the Kulturkampf Bund permanently. Minutes later he was beside Frank Havens, his appearance hardly human after his fight with the wind and the rain. Roger Latham was sitting beside Havens, silent.

"Latham got the word of his wife being poisoned and near death, Phantom," stated Havens.

Van put life into Roger Latham with a few quick words. He told him how he had substituted a sleeping drug for deadly cyanide. At the same time, Lela Latham had been brought aboard among the government men and police.

"Darling, they tried to make it appear you were against my father," Lela Latham was saying, and she was in the arms of Horace Craft.

Kindly Amos Stout stood near them, his mild eyes showing his approval. Stout walked over to the Phantom. His hand was extended.

"I have learned," he said sternly, "that you are a holdup man and a thief, Phantom. And you pack one big wallop. You have my wallet and my watch?"

"I'm not a very good thief, Mr. Stout," the Phantom said. "Your valuables were later taken off of me. But I can give you a clean bill of health, except for a special radio that might pick up the Bund code that was in a small car you loaned to Horace Craft."

Amos Stout smiled genially. "That's right," he said. "I was given that special radio by Herman Slater. Perhaps he wished it to be found in my car in an emergency. Also, I started for the Latham fire with Herman Slater, but he ran his car into the ditch. The next thing I knew, I was wandering through the woods with a funny hooded mask over my head. Then you found me."

"Good enough," stated Van, to the surprise of Frank Havens and several government agents. "It checks."

Then it was that Captain Reagan, red-faced, came into the scene.

"How does it check?" he growled. "We have Herman Slater, Phantom, over here. And he was with the Bundsmen, but claims he was prisoner. A third of the Slater foundries was blown to bits not long ago."

Two agents came over and the round-faced, marble-eyed man known as Herman Slater was between them.

"So, it seems as if Herman Slater was the Little Fuehrer all the time," said Captain Reagan. "He was running the works at the foundries, and jumping bombs to Mexico on night planes shot from a catapult. They were picked up by submarines below the Border."

CHAPTER XXI

MURDER PLAYED SAFE

LOOKING like fury incarnate, the marble-eyed man had only cold rage in his eyes, and his tongue was silent. Van looked at him closely.

"You have made a mistake, Captain Reagan," he said.

"Herman Slater is a good American citizen, and he is not the Little Fuehrer. I'm afraid even my close friend, Havens, has been deceived. Has the visit been made to the downtown apartment, as I directed?"

A harbor police boat was coming alongside. From it three men were pushed up the Jacob's-ladder to the deck. Frank Havens was the first to utter an exclamation.

"Great glory, Phantom! If Herman Slater had been on a desert island for weeks, left unshaved and starved, I would say this was he!"

A short man, who was little more than skin and bones, was being held up by two government men.

"Right, Frank," said Van. "This nearly starved man who has been a prisoner for weeks is Herman Slater. The Herman Slater you have known recently is his worthless brother, Hans Slater. And because their mother and sister have been held in a German internment camp, subject to a death sentence, Hans Slater first gained power over his good American brother Herman."

"But at the last, when Herman realized his brother was a member of the Kulturkampf Bund, plotting against the United States, it became necessary to imprison the real Herman. It became easy, because Herman's wife was also in Germany. Also Herman lived in the same apartment building with the real Little Fuehrer."

Frank Havens and the others now were staring at two prisoners brought on board. One was in the uniform of a butler. The other man was sputtering and fuming.

"This is unthinkable!" the man was raging. "It will cost you your fortune, Frank Havens! You have been with me! Why, I arranged myself for the Phantom to appear at the defense council meeting! And I—"

The Phantom took up the words of the prisoner. "Yes, you did arrange for me to appear at the defense council meeting. Except for Frank Havens, you were the only man in Detroit who knew I was there. Your alibi was perfect.

"A time bomb came to that meeting with a corpse in a box. At one stroke, you hoped to wipe out the Phantom, and many of the defense council. It was arranged that Hans Slater, your helper who was posing as his brother, Herman Slater, would seize Paul Latham and get him away before the time bomb exploded. But you were making sure that the Phantom would die."

The prisoner stared at Van. "He is lying," he said. "That story is crazy. There is no evidence against me! Why, I have given my time, my money—"

"It's no use, Randolph Merkle," said Van calmly. "Surely, you gave your time to enacting the rôle of a Little Fuehrer. You stood to win vast concessions if your master in Europe should win. But you were making more sure than that. You were a stockholder in the multi-million Latham plant, and as such stood to gain possession of its control. You were after the great aerial torpedo evolved by Roger Latham, and you had learned that his fighting wing was an amazing weapon.

"If your master should win in this war, you would have had a position of power and wealth. If he loses, and you had destroyed all of the Roger Latham family, as you intended, then you still would have become a man of power and great wealth."

THE dignified, angry Randolph Merkle was defiant.

"I have been known too long in Detroit, and there is no evidence to support such tommyrot!" he cried out. "I have worked for defense. Moreover, I nearly lost my life trying to rescue Mrs. Latham from the fire at her home. I—"

The Phantom was producing a small leather case. From it he was taking bits that looked like human skin and tiny fragments of metal.

"You mean, Randolph Merkle, or Rudolph, as your name really happens to be, that you came close to losing your life when you set off the incendiary bombs in the Latham home," stated Van. "You injured—"

Everyone there saw Randolph, or Rudolph Merkle, glance quickly at the palm of one hand. Van smiled.

"Yes, that's it, Merkle," he said. "You were too close to one of the exploding bombs. I have here bits of the bombs I took from the Latham residence ruins. I also have something you never can disprove, for it matches. I have some of the burned skin shaved carefully from your injured hand. That skin matches the skin I found on that exploded brass. Is that clear—"

Randolph Merkle attempted to wrest himself free. Steel clicked. Havens stared at the Phantom.

"And I was in his apartment with him when you were appearing as Randolph Merkle?" said Havens.

"That's right." The Phantom nodded. "You don't often take a drink, do you, Frank?"

"No. Seldom."

"But Randolph Merkle must have left you several times to go to his library for a little drink of Scotch?"

"Why, yes, Phantom," said Havens.

"So he was in constant touch with his Hauptmann Karl and his other Bundsmen through his radio and a private television set, concealed in his library liquor cabinet," stated Van.

He was looking at Roger and Paul Latham, at Lela Latham and Horace Craft. In a hospital, Mrs. Latham would be recovering from a harmless drug. Many persons had died, but the great climax of the Kulturkampf Bund, the extinction of the Phantom, of the Latham family, and the blowing up of the tunnel and blocking of the Detroit River had failed.

The Phantom walked beside Frank Havens toward a waiting boat. Chip Dorlan trailed along behind them.

"I love good music, Frank," stated the Phantom. "But it will be a long time before I'll enjoy hearing a violin. If there is any special punishment hereafter for the cruelest of murderers, I wonder if that Hauptmann Karl will not be compelled always to hear the music of a violin."

Frank Havens shook his head. Sometimes even he could not fathom the depths of the Phantom's thinking. The publisher was sure of but one thing.

The world-famous Phantom had removed a national and international menace. Also, he had rescued the great freedom of the press, of the newspapers, from being converted into instruments of propaganda in this still-surviving free land of America. And then, only a little later, the weary Phantom also was thinking—there was compensation for living, in being able to accomplish what he had with this murder Bund. He was sick to death with it all, and now he must rest, perhaps as the playboy, Richard Curtis Van Loan. But none knew better than Van himself that when the next call came that he would be there to answer the cry of the oppressed.

Next Month's Novel: THE TRAIL TO DEATH

You glide through whiskers like a breeze—
And find new comfort, speed and ease
With Thin Gillettes, priced four for ten;
They rate sky-high with thrifty men!

Top quality at rock-bottom
price

4 for 10¢
8 for 19¢

The Thin Gillette Blade Is Produced By The Maker Of The Famous Gillette Blue Blade

Client Unknown

By FREDRIC BROWN

Author of "The Little Green Men," "The Cheese on Stilts," etc.

Carey leaped forward in a headlong dive

When Detective Carey Rix Thinks He's Broken His Jinx, He Lands a Case Without a Customer!

CAREY RIX stared in surprise at the man behind the hotel desk.

"You say Room Two-o-eight is empty?" he repeated. "Are you sure?"

The clerk nodded, looking strangely at Rix.

"If you know anything about the guy that checked in there yesterday, you'd better go up," he said. "The police are up there. Something funny happened—something darned funny."

Carey Rix wanted a moment to think before going up to 208. He lighted a cigarette, turned to the clerk.

"What was the guy's name?" he asked.

"Frank. Just a moment." He leafed back to yesterday's page in the register on the desk and pointed to an entry. "F. Frank. The younger guy that was with him didn't sign. Said he wasn't staying."

Rix walked up to the second floor and along the single corridor. He passed 204 and 206. The next door was slightly ajar. On it he saw the outline, lighter than the rest of the door, of the figures 208. The brass numerals themselves had been removed.

Carey Rix tapped lightly and pushed the door open. Two detectives, one of whom he recognized as Sergeant Stanger, were standing in an empty room, an absolutely stripped room.

"Hi, Rix," said the sergeant. "Know anything about this? It's goofy."

Rix looked around. There wasn't a stick of furniture in the room. Lighter spots on the wall showed that pictures had been removed. The curtain and shade had been taken from the window. If there had been a carpet on the floor, it wasn't there now. His eyes went back to Sergeant Stanger.

"What gives, Sarge?" he asked. "Termites?"

The sergeant frowned. "Maybe it's funny to a private detective like you. But I'm supposed to make a report on this. What do you know about this F. Frank? Who was he?"

Rix shook his head in denial. "Yesterday afternoon, about five o'clock, a guy called my office. I wasn't there. Sue made an appointment for me to call at Room Two-o-eight at the Avalon at ten A. M. today. The guy didn't give a name. Well, here I am."

The sergeant looked at him narrowly.

"You wouldn't kid me, would you, Carey? When you walked in here, I thought we'd sure get a lead."

"I wouldn't kid you about this, Sarge. What's your angle? There must be a night clerk here. How could they have taken all this stuff out without his knowing it?"

STANGER spat disgustedly into a corner.

"They doped him. The young guy who came in with the old guy gave him a drink. He got sleepy and dozed off, and didn't wake up till four A. M. The drink business happened about midnight."

"There's a back door on the alley," added the other police detective. "It's only a couple of yards from here to the stairs, and the door's at the bottom. They could have cleaned this room in half an hour. But why did they do it?"

"Well, you got a case at last, Rix." Sergeant Stanger grinned suddenly. "A swell one, whatever it is. How's the new agency coming? Sorry you quit with Argus Agency."

"Nope, not yet. Business is great, Sarge, but maybe I can sandwich in time to look for my client on this one. I suppose you got a couple of descriptions. Swell. Let's have them."

He copied the descriptions of F. Frank and his younger companion from Stanger's notebook. They certainly weren't minutely detailed descriptions. The man who had registered had been described by the clerk as about sixty, medium height, slight build, had a bad cough. The younger man was taller, heavier, seemed better dressed, and looked like a professional man—a lawyer, maybe, or a doctor.

"Thanks, Sarge," Rix said when he had finished copying the notes. "If I get anything, I'll let you know as soon as possible."

Slowly he walked back to the office. Unless he got an idea somehow, there wasn't any reason for hurry. He didn't know what he could do when he got there.

Sue Moran looked up as he entered. She jerked a sheet of paper from her typewriter.

It was covered from the top to the bottom with one sentence stating that that moment was the proper time for all good men to come to the aid of a certain unnamed party.

"Don't tell me, after two months of waiting, that we've got a case, Carey?" she blurted.

"Angel, we sure have. I told you I'd land one if I stuck it out long enough. And this is just the beginning."

She opened a drawer of the desk, took out a printed form in duplicate. Inserting a carbon between the sheets, she put the form in the typewriter.

"Okay," she said. "Let's go. First blank is for the client."

Carey Rix perched on a corner of her desk and smiled down at her.

"Client: unknown," he dictated. "And here's the rest of the dope. Retaining fee: nothing. Daily rate: highly doubtful. Object of investigation: have no idea whatever. Put all that down, Angel."

She didn't. Instead, she leaned back in her chair and looked up at him with a reproachful, worried frown.

"Carey," she said soberly, "do you realize that opening this agency and keeping it open for two months has cost you nearly a thousand dollars, what with the furniture and everything? How much longer do you think you can keep on without a case?"

HE reached down and ran a forefinger up across her forehead to erase the frown.

"I've got a case, Sue. Somebody whose name may have been F. Frank called on me, and I'm going to find out what he wanted. Then I'll get it for him, and send him a bill."

As he gave her a quick sketch of what had happened at the hotel, he saw her eyes widen.

"But, Carey, it doesn't make sense. The furniture in that room couldn't have been worth enough to—"

"Angel, you miss the point. The brass numerals on the door were gone, too, and the rate card that hung on the back of the door. Everything was taken, whether it was worth a shout in Sheol, or less. Now add that up. What do you get?"

"A headache," Sue answered. Then her eyes grew thoughtful. "Unless someone had a room about that size somewhere, and wanted to make it into a duplicate of the hotel room, complete with rate card and everything."

"Go to the head of the class, Angel. That's our lead! But where it gets us, I haven't any idea."

He rose and began to pace the length of the office.

At the end of the fifth trip, he stopped at Sue's desk, thumbing open the telephone directory to the classified section.

"Whoever took that stuff out," he said, "must have used a truck. The bed—even taken apart—and the dresser, wouldn't have loaded into a passenger car. Wonder how many trucking companies there are in this town."

"Plenty," Sue told him grimly. "It'd take a week to canvas half of them." She leaned across the desk, helped him find the right place. "Look at that list!"

The regular listings were among the inner columns of the book. The outer columns carried display advertisements of the larger trucking concerns. Carey Rix put his finger on the largest display advertisement in the outer column of the right-hand page.

"Look, Angel. Timothy Trank Cartage Company."

"So what?" demanded the secretary.

"So maybe nothing. But look." Carey Rix took his notebook and pencil from his pocket. "Here's what T. Trank looks like. T. Trank is Timothy Trank. Now watch."

He drew a horizontal bar through each T. The name now read F. Frank.

"It could be," he pursued. "Or it could be an accident. But if the old guy registered as T. Trank, and any one wanted to change that registration, all he had to do was take the desk pen and make two little marks. Sue, call the Chamber of Commerce and get me what dope you can on the Timothy Trank Cartage Company."

A few minutes later, Sue put the transceiver back on its cradle, and read from the shorthand notes she had taken.

"Timothy Trank is retired. He's sixty. His son, Roger Trank, runs the business for him. Another son, John, is a doctor. John has an interest, too. It's a family business, sort of."

"Addresses?"

"Timothy Trank lives in Wyandotte, thirty miles out from town. So does his son, Dr. John Trank. Roger lives in town, at Sixteen-seventy-five Kane Place."

CAREY RIX walked to the window and looked out. Sue turned and watched him. For the first time she realized what a big difference there was in her employer since he had returned from the Avalon Hotel. He had been moping around the office for two months, his face getting longer each day the agency drew a blank, his shoulders gradually sagging. Now his whole body seemed like a coiled spring. This was the Carey Rix she'd almost forgotten existed. She smiled at his eagerness as he resumed pacing the office. What did it matter if there wasn't a fee in sight?

"Call up Timothy Trank, Angel!"

he snapped. "If he's there, I'll talk to him. If he isn't, find out all you can."

Timothy Trank was not at home. Sue had a bit of difficulty pumping the servant who had answered the phone, but at last she was satisfied she had all the information he could give her.

"Mr. Trank came in to town yesterday afternoon," she told Carey. "His son John drove him in. He was going to get in touch with them and tell them where he'd be staying, but he hasn't called home yet. He expected to be in the city for several days. Maybe your hunch is working. Want me to call Roger Trank?"

Carey Rix grabbed his hat and started for the door.

"Never mind, Angel. I'll go out there myself."

He slowed his car across the street and a few doors away from 1675 Kane Place. It was a two-story brick residence. As he pulled to the curb and parked, he saw the door of Roger Trank's house open.

A tall, slim man, wearing a snap-brim hat pulled down over his eyes, left the house. Rix waited until he had rounded the corner and gone out of sight before he left the car. The slim man had seemed vaguely familiar. Rix seen him somewhere before—was it in a police lineup?

A maid in a starched uniform answered Carey's ring at the door of 1675 Kane Place.

"Is Mr. Roger Trank in?" he asked.

The maid looked him over and seemed to like what she saw, for she smiled briefly before answering.

"He's out right now. Be back shortly, sir."

"The gentleman who just left here," said Carey. "I recognized him, but I can't place him. Do you know who he is?"

"Yes, sir," replied the maid. "Would you care to come in and wait for Mr. Trank? The gentleman who left here a moment ago is Mr. Rix—Mr. Carey Rix."

"Oh," said Carey. "Yes, I've met Mr. Rix. Odd that I wasn't able to place him the minute I saw him. Yes, I'll wait for Mr. Trank."

She took his hat and showed him to the parlor.

"By the way," Rix asked as she turned to leave, "is Mr. Timothy Trank here?"

She nodded. "I think he's sleeping now. It's too bad."

"Isn't it?" Carey smiled sympathetically. "Is he — uh — completely—"

"Dr. John says there's hope if they humor him. And they certainly are, fixing up that room and all."

"I hope he's right," said Carey. "It must be a lot of trouble keeping up the pretense."

HE CHOSE a comfortable chair and sat down, facing the doorway of the room. The maid's footsteps died away to silence as she went to the back part of the house.

Carey waited until he heard her close a door behind her. Then he rose silently, tiptoed out into the hall, and up the staircase. It was heavily carpeted and his feet made no sound.

There was no mistaking the room he sought. The brass numerals "208" on the outside of the door at the end of the upstairs hallway left no doubt.

He did not doubt, either, that the door opened inward. Otherwise a man in bed in that room would not see the outside of the door when it was opened. In that case, there would be no need for the brass numerals.

He turned the knob silently, pushed the door ajar, and peered into the darkened room. The covers on the bed outlined the slight figure of an elderly man, whose gray head rested upon the pillow. He breathed heavily in deep slumber.

Carey Rix stepped quietly into the room and closed the door. The shade was pulled down at the single window of the little room, but enough light came in around it to enable him to see clearly as he looked about the room.

It was almost the same size and shape as Room 208 at the Avalon Hotel. Undoubtedly the furniture and the carpet were from the hotel room. The Avalon's rate card and instructions to guests hung from a nail on the back of the door.

To a man forbidden to arise from bed, unable to walk to the window or door to investigate his surroundings, the room was nearly a perfect imitation of the hotel room Timothy Trank had taken at the Avalon.

Quietly Rix skipped closer to the bed and looked at the sleeping man. He seemed to slumber soundly, a natural sleep, but Carey couldn't be sure of that.

As he stood there, wondering whether or not to awaken Timothy Trank, he heard a door open and close nearby. There were footsteps approaching the room of the sick man.

Rix looked about hastily. He darted to a closet and got inside just as the door of the room opened. Carey left the closet door ajar.

The tall, heavily built man who entered carried a bottle and a spoon in his left hand. He walked to the bed and put a hand on Timothy Trank's shoulder.

"Dad," he said. "Wake up. Time to take this medicine."

The old man opened his eyes with a great effort.

"Hello, John," he mumbled.

He raised himself on one elbow. His eyes drooped shut again. John Trank took the cork from the bottle, tilted it to pour some of the liquid into the spoon.

Carey Rix pushed open the door, was across the room in three quick strides. Making no effort to be silent, he got there before John Trank could turn.

"Stay where you are, Doctor!" he ordered as he jabbed a rigid forefinger against John Trank's back. "And I wouldn't give that to your patient, if I were you."

THE eyes of Timothy Trank had gone wide. Carey Rix spoke to him over John's shoulder.

"I'm Carey Rix, Mr. Trank—the real Carey Rix. You've been talking to an impostor that your sons are ringing in on you. You're being made the victim of a conspiracy. Why, I don't know."

John Trank didn't turn, but he spoke angrily to the man on the bed.

"That's absurd, Dad! Whoever this man is, he's lying. I—"

Carey Rix' attention had been fixed on the events in the room. He hadn't heard the second set of footsteps approaching. When the door opened, and a middle-aged, bald man, whom he hadn't seen before, came into the room, he was caught unaware.

Carey's finger, poked into the doctor's back in lieu of a gun, would be obvious to the man who had opened the door. He dropped his hand, pivoted to face the newcomer.

"Who is this, John?" demanded the bald man. His hand dropped into his coat pocket, came out with a small nickel-plated .32 revolver. "What's he doing here?"

Carey felt his arms pinned behind him as the doctor took a sudden step toward him. He didn't dare fight with the revolver pointed at his midriff.

"I suppose you're Roger Trank," he said. "I'm Carey Rix. I want to know why you're—"

The powerful man behind propelled him forward with a vicious shove that cut off his speech in mid-sentence.

"He's some impostor, Roger," bel-lowed the doctor furiously. "I don't know what his game is, but we'll turn him over to the police and let them find out."

"The police," said Rix as the two men took him down the stairs, "will be just the logical answer."

"Shut up!" grated Roger Trank. Once out of hearing of the old man in the upstairs room, his manner had changed completely. "The police aren't going to be in on this. Tie him up, John. We'll decide what to do with him when Spike gets back."

Spike! Rix remembered now where he had seen the tall man, in the snap-brim hat, who had been leaving the house when he arrived. The bogus Carey Rix was Spike Gordon, gambler and con man. Carey had seen him in many a lineup at Headquarters.

Dr. John Trank found a rope, tied Carey's arms behind him, then bound his ankles.

"In the closet!" Roger Trank grabbed one of Carey's arms and motioned to his brother to take the other. "When Spike gets back, we'll figure out what to do with him."

Between them, the brothers carried him to the hall closet. Before Roger closed the door he spoke threateningly.

"One peep out of you, Rix, and we'll know what to do."

The door slammed and the key turned in the lock. Left alone in the darkness, Carey Rix wasted no time getting to work. He knew how his fate would have to be decided. It was decided already, for that matter. The brothers merely wanted Spike to help with the details of removing the body.

His ankles were bound, but the closet was too small for him to fall down, as long as he kept his knees and body rigid. He shifted his weight, groped behind with his hands until he found what he sought.

IT WAS the head of a nail that was projecting from the wall, low enough so he could get at it. Though it was four feet from the floor, by bending sideward, he could reach it with his wrists. An old sweater hung on the nail. He dropped it to the floor and went to work on the knot, trying to catch the proper loop on the head of the nail.

It was slow, hard work. Frequently the ache in his arms became intolerable, forcing him to rest unwillingly. How long or short the minutes were, he had no idea. But it must have taken at least a half hour before he loosened the knot, slipped the rope over his wrists, and untied his ankles.

The lock was easy. They hadn't searched his pockets, except for a quick frisk to make sure he didn't have a gun. In his vest pocket he carried a small pick-lock with which he was able to grip the end of the key in the old-fashioned lock. He turned it silently.

He reached for the knob, then pulled his hand back. He had heard the sound of the front door opening, the clump of steps coming from the living room.

"Glad you're back, Spike," John's voice said. "Something came up. Carey Rix is here."

There was a muttered exclamation from the con man, then more footsteps, and the sound of the living room door closing.

That didn't leave Rix much time. He bent down quickly and untied his shoes. He stepped out of them, opened the door and left the closet.

As he crossed the hall and started up the stairs, he could hear the murmur of voices from the living room.

Upstairs, he turned the knob of the door marked 208. He put his fingers to his lips in an appeal for silence as he stepped into the pseudo hotel room. The sick man was awake. He looked at Carey Rix doubtfully, but he made no outcry.

Carey closed the door behind him and spoke quietly, so his voice wouldn't carry downstairs.

"I really am Carey Rix, Mr. Trank," he said. "I've got to explain things to you fast, and you've got to believe me."

He crossed to the window, pulled up the shade.

"Come here to the window, Mr. Trank, and look out. Then you'll know. You can reach it all right. You're not as sick as your son is making you believe."

Timothy Trank stared at the private detective uncertainly for a moment. Then he threw back the covers and started to cross the room. He wobbled a bit as he reached the window. Carey put a supporting arm about Trank as the old man gaped through the glass.

"Roger's house," Trank said slowly, his face going bleak and gray.

Rix helped him back into bed, then sat down on the edge of the mattress.

"What was it you wanted to see me about, Mr. Trank, when you made the original appointment?"

The old man lay back and closed his eyes as he answered.

"The business was losing money, and it shouldn't have been. I suspected Roger was taking company funds, but I wanted to know. I didn't suspect John. Yet he must have been working with Roger."

CAREY nodded. "And when John found out you were going to have an investigation, he knew he and Roger were sunk unless he could sidetrack it. They would both be dis-inherited, maybe prosecuted, if you found out."

"I trusted John," said the old man faintly. "But Roger—"

"They doped you and brought you here. They were going to keep you in this room while a friend of Roger's impersonated me, pretending to conduct an investigation. Of course, he'd report to you that everything was okay. Then you'd be satisfied, so they planned to dope you again and take you home. They'd tell you that you were taken there while you were in a coma. After that, John would let you get well again—or maybe he wouldn't."

"I think he would," the old man answered. "The bulk of my estate goes to charity. Apparently my sons are raiding the business while they have control of it, while I'm still alive. I'd be worth less to them if I were dead."

Most of Carey Rix' thoughts were on his conversation with Timothy Trank. But a part of his mind had been listening for sounds downstairs, and he heard them now.

A door opened. There were footsteps in the hallway. He heard low-pitched conversation as the three men reached the bottom of the staircase. Then there was the sound of their footsteps as they started to ascend.

There wasn't a second to waste, or he'd be trapped. He raced through the door of Timothy Trank's room and was sprinting down the hall before they reached the landing. His shoeless feet made no sound.

He paused briefly just around the corner from the top of the staircase, waited until he judged the first was half a dozen steps from the top. Now was the time! The advantage of position and surprise should balance the three-to-one odds against him.

He leaped around the corner, left the floor in a headlong diving tackle that caught John Trank around the waist. The doctor was carried over backward, crashing into the two men behind him.

The stair landing shook with the impact. Carey Rix scrambled off the top of the heap, knew he was unhurt.

He swung his fist into the face of Roger Trank. The bald-headed man had partly risen and was reaching for the revolver in his pocket.

Spike Gordon, Carey's impersonator, was out cold. His head had struck the wall as he'd been carried backward. John was still prone, staring around dazedly.

Roger's head snapped back under the force of Rix' blow, but his hand came up from his pocket with the revolver. Carey's foot lashed out. It struck Roger Trank's wrist as the gun roared. The bullet buried itself in the wall behind Carey.

He lunged forward, caught Roger's wrist with both hands, and twisted. The revolver fell. Carey leaped, scooped it up.

"Are you all right, Mr. Rix?" he called.

Carey looked up. Old Timothy Trank, in his nightgown, stood at the top of the stairs. He held the banister for support. He seemed to have aged five years since Carey Rix had revealed the conspiracy against him. Carey took a few backward steps toward him.

"It's all over, Mr. Trank. Shall I phone the police?"

The old man's face was gray as the hair above it as he looked down down at the trio on the landing. Two of them were his sons. They had conspired to rob him, and would not have stopped at murder to serve their ends.

"Yes, Mr. Rix," he replied slowly. "You may call the police."

He swayed and would have fallen, if Carey Rix had not caught him.

IT WAS a week later, in Carey Rix' office, that Sue Moran held up the envelope as Carey came in.

"This is it!" she exulted. "Timothy Trank's return address is on the envelope. Shall I open it, or do you want the fun?"

"Go ahead, Angel," he said in a martyred voice.

Eagerly she ripped open the envelope, snatched out a piece of paper that looked exactly like a check.

"One thousand bucks! That pays for the furniture, all expenses, our salaries, and actually puts us a little ahead!"

Carey sat down thoughtfully on the corner of her desk.

"How much ahead?" he asked sternly.

She made a hasty mental computation. "About sixty-five dollars," she said at last.

Rix smiled at her, and his voice was half serious, half kidding as he said:

"Angel, the way I feel right now, I don't ever want to be rich. A man with money can't trust anyone, not even his own family. So tonight you are going to put on your fanciest gingham apron, and I'll call for you at nine. We'll see how many night clubs will help us get rid of that surplus sixty-five smackers."

INNOCENT VICTIMS VANISH INTO THIN AIR — AND THEN SPEAK FROM THE GRAVE IN

THE TRAIL TO DEATH

Next Month's Complete Book-Length PHANTOM Mystery Novel

HERE'S A BREATH-TAKING VALUE

You can sweeten your breath fifty times or more with one five-cent package of Sen-Sen, the tastiest, handiest breath sweetener of them all.

Yes, Sen-Sen is really a bargain, but it does the job quickly and thoroughly. Bad breath due to onions, liquor, smoking, tooth decay, or any other cause, Sen-Sen sweetens swiftly and pleasantly.

Get Sen-Sen today. In five and ten cent packages. You'll delight in its delicious oriental flavor.

DON'T OFFEND...USE SEN-SEN

DEATH'S ADVANCE SHADOW

By ARTHUR
J. BURKS

Author of "The Speed Demon," "Death of the Spotted Dolls," etc.

Newton sent Gordon crashing to the floor again, unconscious

Detective John Kinnick Foretells His Own Murder, But the Reaper Is Particular About Choosing Victims!

JOHNN KINNICK had always played his hunches, because he had learned that they never played him false. And he had a hunch now. It was a very simple one. He felt that he would die on his next tough case. There had been many signs pointing the way, little omens that John Kinnick, private detective, alone would have called omens.

Take that afternoon, only last week, when he had been walking down Park Avenue below Grand Central Station. In an apartment house across the street, men were hand-lifting pieces of board to the top floor, walking the boards up the windows. The man on the pavement outside the house lifted two narrow boards. The man at the window next above grabbed them, leveled up the outer ends and lifted them for the next man to catch. And so on until the man on the top floor took them in through his window.

Even as John Kinnick watched, the man on the sixth floor dropped a board. It shot down like an arrow, and slammed into the sidewalk beneath. Luckily, no one was hurt. And Kinnick decided that if he hadn't crossed the street that board would have knocked him straight to kingdom come.

Then, only yesterday, there had been another of Death's advance shadows.

A group of men had started painting a sign, which was situated high on the face of a building. Their scaffolding was draped with canvas, and swayed back and forth as they walked upon it. The protective bar of the scaffold didn't look to be more than knee-high. The painters were careful as they worked.

Kinnick had held his breath. He had a fear of heights, though his work often made him force himself to forget it. Then he stopped and watched a man walk toward the end scaffold. Then he screamed as he saw what was happening. But it was too late.

The far end of the scaffold had slipped. The painter plunged to the street like a falling comet, landed on a pedestrian and killed him instantly. The falling man only suffered a few broken bones.

John Kinnick looked at the set face of the dead man. The deceased had just elbowed him back to pass through a narrow aisle formed by piles of cement sacks on the sidewalk.

Kinnick had twice been saved from death by something—his hunches.

And now his hunch was stronger than ever. He would die with his next case. That was why he was going to quit. Why should he stay at it? He was fifty years old, gray as a sheep when he should have had his original brown hair. His face was like granite. It showed the lines of the tough life he had led. He had struggled hard to save enough money against his old age.

When he retired he had always told himself, he wouldn't be a burden on Bob and Ann, his son and daughter-in-law. He had fifty thousand dollars in his bank. Enough to last him all his life.

BUT he wanted to live to enjoy that fifty grand. So, he was quitting.

Now, he sat behind the scarred old desk over which, for twenty-five years, he had transacted the business of the Kinnick Detective Agency—which had always been just himself. He hired no telephone girl, no accountants, no secretary. He never wrote letters, never answered any. He had a way of balancing his books, and keeping his income tax straight.

Nervously, he ran his hand over the top of the desk. Every mark on it meant something to him. There was a deep gouge to his right. That's where "Cokey" Morrissey had sent a slug at him. It would have got him if he hadn't had a sudden hunch when the door opened, and heaved the inkwell, diverting the killer's aim.

Kinnick had shot him expertly in the legs after Cokey had missed. He could still see the bloodstains, black as ink, on the floor in front of the desk. Wanted for murder, Morrissey had burned.

There were mementoes on the wall, of the crimes John Kinnick had solved. Pictures of famous crooks, wanted men and women. There were newspaper clippings, pictures of heroes of the police force. His office was almost a museum. Maybe, when he retired, he would maintain the place for exactly that reason.

He felt pretty sentimental about it. He hated to leave. His hunch, though, went further. When he made up his mind and finally walked out, he must never come back, even on a visit. If he did, he would die. Of course, it was silly. But then, all his hunches had seemed silly, and they had always worked out.

He sighed then and rose to his arrow-straight six feet of slim manhood. His body was still that of the twenty-five-year-old, ambitious fellow who had started this agency twenty-five years before.

"But this is the end," he promised himself. "I'm finished. Me for the quiet life. Boredom will kill me, but it won't kill me as fast as my next case."

He hesitated. It was certainly hard to leave the scene of his life's work. He hesitated, because in that moment he wasn't sure about something. Maybe it would be better to get bumped off on his next case, instead of spending the rest of his life in absolute boredom.

HE SAT down a minute to think it over. Suddenly, the door began to open. John Kinnick stiffened. The door opened slowly, as though someone dreadfully afraid was getting up the courage to enter.

Kinnick half-smiled when he saw the girl. And for just a moment he thought it was his twenty-two-year-old daughter-in-law, Ann. The girl even reminded him of his wife, Madge, who had died so many years before. She couldn't be Madge, of course, nor Ann either. Ann was a blonde. This girl was a brunette. But the fact that he had thought of the dead Madge when he first saw Clare Gordon, he took to be another omen—of his own death.

"It's no use, Sister," he said brusquely, before she could open her mouth. "No use even telling me about it. I'm going out of business, and if you insist I'll tell you why. But don't sit down because I'm soft-hearted and might listen to you too long. So, beat it, please. I'm shutting up shop."

She came toward him, letting her tongue moisten her dry lips. Her eyes were filled with a fear she was trying to hide. That fear crept into them when he had told her to beat it. Kinnick knew then that she had come to him because he was her last resort. But then, you couldn't keep taking them on. There would always be people coming to him as a last resort.

However, John Kinnick was a polite man, and he always had a sympathetic nature toward them. His heart went out to this girl, who was trying so hard to find words with which to express herself. Her hand trembled as she opened the clasp of her pocketbook, took out a handkerchief and touched her dry lips with it. John Kinnick took off his hat—a rare concession with him—and dropped it on the floor beside his scarred desk.

"Well," he said, sighing, "suppose you spill it. I can listen, anyway, and send you to someone I know who's as good or better than I am."

"My name is Clare Gordon," she began in a tremulous voice. "My Father has been kidnapped, maybe murdered, for all I know!"

"You're Cyrus Gordon's daughter?" Kinnick asked, a note of interest in his tone. "The retired lapidary?"

"Yes," she said simply.

"Then why don't you call the F.B.I.?" he demanded. "Or the cops?"

"You don't understand," she protested. "If you'll wait, I'll tell you. Father was under a cloud when he left. He was accused of smuggling jewels worth millions past the customs. He never told me much about it. But if I were to call in the police, and he were to be rescued, he might face a jail sentence."

"Then you think he's guilty?" said Kinnick softly.

Tears rolled down her cheeks. Her lips trembled.

"I don't know! I don't know!" she burst out. "But three days ago he told me that no matter what happened to him—and he plainly expected something—I was not to notify either the police or the government."

"Sounds silly," he said, shrugging. "But what do you want of me?"

"I want you to get him back."

"Has there been a ransom demand?"

"Yes. At least that's what I think it was. Whoever is holding him wants those jewels within seventy-two hours. The deadline is three in the afternoon, three days from now. I got the telephone call just before I came here. I'd heard my Father speak of you many times, so I came here. If you promise not to call the F.B.I., Customs Officials, or the police. . . ."

"I promise nothing," he said grimly. "I'm out of business. It'll be better if I send you to someone else."

"But can't you take just this one last case?" she pleaded. "What difference will just one more make? And besides, twenty-five thousand dollars is a lot of money."

"That will be my fee?" he asked softly, then added hurriedly, "If I turn damn fool and take the case?"

"Yes. It's my own money. I've always had a large allowance, and some inherited money of my own from my Mother."

John Kinnick reached down for his hat.

"No," he said, "and I'll tell you why. I'm quitting because I'm a guy who believes in his hunches. I'm going to be killed on my next case. Therefore, there'll be no next case. I never miss when it comes to hunches. Even this is part of the hunch. When you came in I thought you were Madge, my wife who's been dead for years. Then, there have been other things. Nix, Clare, I'm finished with being a private detective."

Clare put her handkerchief back in the pocketbook. She straightened, threw her shoulders back and stood up a bit unsteadily.

Walking stiff and straight as a soldier, Clare Gordon moved toward the door. Her shoulders shook a little. She was beautifully dressed, Kinnick noticed. A beautiful young girl.

"Clare," he said softly. "Clare Gordon. Come on back here!"

SHE turned slowly and went back. Her eyes were empty, sad.

"I'm a fool," he told her. "I'm a sucker for tears and a pretty face. I guess I always have been. Give me the lowdown, and I'll get to work."

"I can't ask you to do it, Mr. Kinnick," she said. "If you're so sure about that hunch of yours. . . . Well, my Dad wouldn't like it, either. Why would he want to live, if a man died to save him?"

"Would it make any difference to you?" he asked. He looked deep into her soft blue eyes.

"No, it would mean nothing to me," she said honestly. "You could die, if you got him back, and I'd lose no sleep over your death. He's my Dad. And others could die too, and I'd still lose no sleep if he came back to me."

"That," said Kinnick, "is how a girl should feel about her Dad. If you had put it any other way, I wouldn't even have sent you to one of my detective friends. As it is, give me the lowdown. In the first place, have you noticed anyone following you?"

Her eyes widened.

"Why—why I never even looked around!" she gasped. "Why would anybody follow me? I haven't done anything. I haven't gone to the police."

"But you've come to John Kinnick, who occasionally does an even better job than the police. And if I were the gents holding your Dad, I think I'd have someone watching you—just in case you did something of the sort. And because of the business they're in, they'd at least know about me."

"Then, no matter what your decision, you were already in this the minute I came here?" she asked.

"Oh, no, not at all! If you'd gone out crying, they might have thought that you hadn't got anywhere. On the other hand, they might think I'd put you up to an act. And besides, it doesn't matter what they think. Can you tell me where the jewels your Dad is supposed to have copped are cached?"

"I don't know," she said. "But I've

ZIPPY PRIZES

for BOYS AND GIRLS
MEN AND WOMEN!
Get Yours — Here's How!

JUNIOR GUITAR

Any of these beautiful and useful articles (and many others) may be yours for selling GARDEN SPOT SEEDS. Positively no extra money to pay. Send for 28 pkt. collection of seeds (2 collections for Sport Watch). Sell at 10c a pkt. Remit money collected then receive your choice of prizes absolutely free, post-paid. Send No Money Now, just name and address. Write for Seeds today. A Post card will do. We Trust You.
LANCASTER COUNTY SEED CO., Sta. 500, Paradise Pa.

"I'LL GIVE YOU LUCK"

Power, Money, Success"

Says Igo in his amazing new system. Draw things to you! You get full directions on MIND MAGIC for only 25c. Thousands have won over obstacles! You can't lose! Guaranteed to make a hit with you the DAY YOU RECEIVE IT or money back.

The KONJURIKANS

1265 BROADWAY

Dept. TG

NEW YORK

Follow the Exploits of DOC STRANGE, America's Favorite Comics Character, in

A BIG DIME'S WORTH!

Now On Sale At All Stands taken everything out of his safe. Maybe these will help you."

She opened that pocketbook again, and dumped a pile of diamonds, rubies and emeralds on his desk. Kinnick swore in silence.

"Now I am in for it," he growled. "You brought them for me to hold?"

"Or to deliver to the kidnapers. It all depends on what you decide to do."

"It has all been decided for me," he said heavily. "Go home now, and wait until you hear from somebody."

"Who?"

"Your Dad, or myself. Probably your Dad."

Thanking Kinnick volubly, she left his office with new hope.

Frowning, the detective went to the window and peered down at the street. His Police Positive pressed hard against his left armpit as he did so. He saw Clare cross the sidewalk, step into a long black limousine. He couldn't see whether there was anyone else in it, but there had to be, because she got in the back door. The chauffeur had no manners, though, or he'd have been out to hold it open for her. But what if—

He whirled to the desk, pushed all the stones into a drawer, slammed it shut and went down the steps faster than he ever had done so before. He had only caught a glimpse of the license, but it didn't matter too much. He would know that car anywhere. A simple little thing, like a chauffeur not holding the door for his boss, told him that something was amiss.

He grabbed a taxicab.

"Catch that black car!" he snapped, pointing ahead through the traffic on Broadway. "Police business."

BUT they were caught by the first red light. Kinnick, looking straight ahead and keeping his eye on that car, scarcely noticed it when the door opened and a man slid in beside him. But he knew the feel of a pistol muzzle pressing against his side. He turned and looked into the smiling face of a young man dressed in natty

How do you KNOW you can't WRITE?

Had Never Written a Line— Sells Article Before Completing Course

"Before completing the N.I.A. course, I sold a feature to Screenland Magazine for $50. That resulted in an immediate assignment to do another for the same magazine. After gaining confidence with successive feature stories, I am now working into the fiction field. Previous to enrolling in the N.I.A. I had never written a line for publication, nor seriously expected to do so."

—GENE E. LEVANT,
Broadmoor Hotel, San Francisco, Calif.

HAVE you ever tried? Have you ever attempted even the least bit of training, under competent guidance?

Or have you been sitting back, as it is so easy to do, waiting for the day to come some time when you will awaken all of a sudden to the discovery "I am a writer"?

If the latter course is the one of your choosing, you probably never will write. Lawyers must be law clerks. Engineers must be draftsmen. We all know that, in our times, the egg does come before the chicken.

It is seldom that any one becomes a writer until he (or she) has been writing for some time. That is why so many authors and writers spring up out of the newspaper business. The day-to-day necessity of writing—of gathering material about which to write—develops their talent, their insight, their background and their confidence as nothing else could.

That is why the Newspaper Institute of America bases its writing instruction on journalism—continuous writing—the training that has produced so many successful authors.

clothes. The stranger had nice white teeth, and a merry twinkle in his deep black eyes. But Kinnick knew that those eyes were deadly as a jungle beast.

"Nice going, shamus, don't you think?" he said smoothly. "But you should have stuck to your hunch. Oh, I heard everything. I was listening outside your office door. I got away in time to watch things here. Of course, I could have let you go ahead, but this is better. Gives us a chance to get acquainted."

DEFTLY, the fellow took Kinnick's Police positive from his left shoulder holster, hefted it and dropped it in his own pocket.

"Call me Count, Kinnick," he said. "How can we talk if we don't know each other's names? A pal of mine will be along later. His name's Percival. But don't let the name fool you. He just stayed behind to go through that trick desk of yours." He paused, went on: "Well, what did the dame say?"

[Turn Page]

Learn to write by writing

NEWSPAPER Institute training is based on the New York Copy Desk Method. It starts and keeps you writing in your own home, on your own time. Week by week you receive actual assignments, just as if you were right at work on a great metropolitan daily. Your writing is individually corrected and constructively criticized by veteran editors. You will find that (instead of vainly trying to copy someone else's writing tricks) you are rapidly developing your own distinctive, self-flavored style—undergoing an experience that has a thrill to it and which at the same time develops in you the power to make your feelings articulate.

Many people who should be writing become awe-struck by fabulous stories about millionaire authors and give little thought to the $25, $50 and $100 or more that can often be earned for material that takes little time to write—stories, articles on business, fads, travels, sports, recipes—things that can easily be turned out in leisure hours, and often on the impulse of the moment.

Let us help you test your native abilities. Our interesting Writing Aptitude Test will do it. It's free—entirely without obligation. Send the coupon today. Newspaper Institute of America, One Park Avenue, New York. (Founded 1925.)

Newspaper Institute of America
One Park Avenue, New York

Send me, without cost or obligation, your Writing Aptitude Test and further information about writing for profit.

Mrs. }
Mr. }
Miss }

Address
(All correspondence confidential. No salesman will call on you.)

94D361

DRAFTING

DRAFTSMEN NEEDED in all manufacturing and building lines—$30 to $50 a week and UP. Learn quickly at home in spare time. Selective Employment Service. FREE Bulletin. No obligation. Write immediately!

American School
Dept. DD-458, Drexel & 53th, Chicago

$7⁹⁵

60 DAYS TRIAL

FALSE TEETH

AS LOW AS $7.95

Per Plate. Dental plates are made in our own laboratory from your personal impression. WORKMANSHIP and Material GUARANTEED or PURCHASE PRICE REFUNDED. We take this risk on our 60-Day Trial Offer. Do NOT SEND ANY MONEY Mail post card for FREE material and catalog of our LOW PRICES. DON'T PUT IT OFF—Write us today!

BRIGHTON-THOMAS DENTAL LABORATORY (INC.)
DEPT. 607 6217 S. HALSTED STREET, CHICAGO, ILL.

I N V E N T O R S

Delays are dangerous—Secure patent protection now. Get new FREE copyrighted booklet, "How to Protect Your Invention." No charge for preliminary information. McMORROW and BERMAN, Registered Patent Attorneys, 169-D Barrister Building, Washington, D. C.

STOMACH ULCER PAIN

Due to Gastric Hyperacidity

TRIAL OFFER Write today for details concerning this special trial offer of a simple home treatment which has given beginning relief in thousands of cases, right from the start. Amazingly effective, yet inexpensive. Does not necessitate liquid diet. We will also include an informative FREE booklet.

TWIN CITY VON CO., Dept. 209A, Minneapolis, Minn.

FALSE TEETH
MONEY RETURNED IF NOT SATISFIED!
 Order by mail—a wide selection of styles. Now—a dental plate (upper or lower) As LOW As $6.50. Our order-by-mail method insures your money back if not satisfied. Actual 90 DAYS' WEARING TRIAL lets you judge for yourself! You Must Be Fully Satisfied! SEND NO MONEY Send a postcard or letter for free descriptive circular showing different styles and Free impression material. You follow directions. Don't delay! — Write now! Ward Dental Lab., 936 W. 63rd St., Dept. 26D, Chicago, Ill.

INDIVIDUALLY Made from YOUR Mouth Impression

EARN GOOD MONEY STEADILY
WRITE TODAY FOR FREE OUTFIT!

Be our representative in your locality for Dove Work Garments. No experience necessary. Pleasant, simple work. Every business prospect. Advertising embroidered on garments great sales feature. Easy to make good money weekly. We supply everything needed to start at once, including FREE OUTFIT. Write immediately. BEN DOVE GARMENT CO., 801 So. Fourth St., Dept. 865 Kankakee, Ill.

SONGWRITERS
 Original songs and song poems wanted. NO CHARGE FOR MELODIES. Monthly awards. Free Examination. HOLLYWOOD RECORDING STUDIOS
 Dept. B8, Box 87, Preuss Sta. LOS ANGELES

FREE! 136 PAGE BOOK ON FISHING

NEW!

PEACH-ORENO

1941 Fish getter. Ask any dealer.

SOUTH BEND

ALL NEW! 1941 edition "Fishing What Tackle and When." Bait and fly casting lessons. New angling hints. Identifies fish species in color. New tackle items. Free! A postal get it!
SOUTH BEND BAIT CO.
 615 High St., South Bend, Ind.

THE NEWEST PICTURE MAGAZINE
COLLEGE HUMOR
NOW 10c EVERYWHERE

FUN ON THE CAMPUS IN CO-EDS
 An All-Picture Magazine
 10c At All Stands

"You heard, didn't you?" Kinnick said.

"Yes, but not everything."

"I've nothing to say," said Kinnick staunchly.

"Then, in that case, what's the use of me trying to be sociable?"

Grinning wolfishly, he reversed his gat and slugged Kinnick on the side of the head, so hard that John's lights went out. And when they came on again he was in a musty cellar somewhere, and things were happening—a lot of things that he did not like. He knew now that his hunch was probably right, for it was pretty obvious that he would never get out of this alive.

None of the crooks wore masks. They didn't seem to care what anybody else saw and remembered—even Clare. Even Cyrus Gordon, who appeared to have gone through a lot of roughing up. Like himself, Gordon and his daughter were expertly tied with rope.

"We'll settle everything," Count Newton announced, "when Percy gets here with the rocks. You people were awful tough about it, and the dame didn't obey our orders. Yes, tough for everybody, including the shamus who didn't follow his last hunch."

Kinnick didn't like the way he spoke the last two words.

Percival came in then, and he looked pretty sour.

"It's a trick desk," he said. "There's nothing in it. I couldn't even find what happened to the stuff after he dumped it. I guess we'll have to sweat it out of them, Count. It's the only way I know of. We'd better start with Kinnick."

Newton came over to Kinnick, grinning with sadistic expectancy. He kicked the private investigator savagely on the shins. First one, then the other. Tied to the chair, Kinnick had to take it. Then Newton slugged him in the mouth and nose. It was terribly painful, but it didn't knock him out. The leader of the gang grinned amiably. He was a pretty cold, deadly killer.

"How does the desk work, Kinnick?" he snapped.

Kinnick looked at Cyrus Gordon.

"You have a legal right to those rocks, Gordon?" he asked.

"Yes, but for heaven's sake give them up!" Gordon begged him. "I could stand it myself, but with Clare here . . . Tell them what they want to know."

"When I take a case," said Kinnick, "I never compromise. Especially with rats."

But when Percival and Newton finished with him he was a complete wreck. Cyrus Gordon was swearing in a low terrible voice. Clare was weeping, begging.

"Tell them, Mr. Kinnick!" she said in a tearful voice. "I won't see you killed."

"Those rocks," Kinnick mumbled painfully, "are our bodyguards. We've got to hang onto 'em. These rats get them, and we're done. You were done when you saw their faces, Gordon. If you don't hold out, you're sunk. Same with your daughter, and with me. It's the rocks they want, don't you see?"

COUNT NEWTON didn't wait any longer. He stared in hurt surprise at Kinnick, as though amazed that a man could plan to die so coldly. Sighing in mock regret, he knocked the detective out with a right cross to the jaw. And when Kinnick opened his eyes again, Cyrus Gordon was out too. Count Newton was talking to the girl now.

"He's a sucker for a girl, Sister," he was saying. "When he comes to, I'm going to do some work on you that won't be so pleasant. Then he'll talk to save your good looks. So you'd better start begging now."

John Kinnick knew what he had to do. He had to play possum, think, and make plans. Deftly, his hands began to fumble with his bonds.

[Turn Page]

Do You Make these Mistakes in ENGLISH?

Sherwin Cody's remarkable invention has enabled more than 100,000 people to correct their mistakes in English. Only 15 minutes a day required to improve your speech and writing.

MANY persons say, "Did you hear from him today?" They should say, "Have you heard from him today?" Some spell "calendar" "calender" or "calander." Still others say "between you and I" instead of "between you and me." It is astonishing how often "who" is used for "whom," and how frequently the simplest words are mispronounced. Few know whether to spell certain words with one or two "c's" or "m's" or "r's," or with "ie" or "el."

SHERWIN CODY

Most persons use only common words—colorless, flat, ordinary. Their speech and their letters are lifeless, monotonous, humdrum. Every time they talk or write they show themselves lacking in the essential points of English.

Wonderful New Invention. For many years Mr. Cody studied the problem of creating instinctive habits of using good English. After countless experiments he finally invented a simple method by which you can acquire a better command of the English language in only 15 minutes a day. Now you can stop making the mistakes which have been hurting you. Mr. Cody's students have secured more improvement in five weeks than previously had been obtained by similar pupils in two years!

Learn by Habit—Not by Rules. Under old methods rules are memorized, but correct habits are not formed. Finally the rules themselves are forgotten. The new Sherwin Cody method provides for the formation of correct habits by calling to your attention constantly only the mistakes you yourself make.

One of the wonderful things about Mr. Cody's course is the speed with which these habit-forming practice drills can be carried out. You can write the answers to fifty questions in 15 minutes and correct your work in 5 minutes more. The drudgery and work of copying have been ended by Mr. Cody! You concentrate always on your own mistakes until it becomes "second nature" to speak and write correctly.

FREE—Book on English. A new book explaining Mr. Cody's remarkable method is ready. If you are ever embarrassed by mistakes in grammar, spelling, punctuation, pronunciation, or if you cannot instantly command the exact words with which to express your ideas, this new free book, "How You Can Master Good English—in 15 Minutes a Day," will prove a revelation to you. Send the coupon or a letter or postal card for it now. No agent will call. SHERWIN CODY SCHOOL OF ENGLISH, 34 Searle Building, Rochester, N. Y.

SHERWIN CODY SCHOOL OF ENGLISH

34 Searle Building, Rochester, N. Y.

Please send me, without any obligation on my part, your new free book, "How You Can Master Good English—in 15 Minutes a Day."

Name
Please print plainly

Address

☐ If 18 years or under check here for Booklet A

MAGIC DISC

HEATS WATER
IN 60 SECONDS

Millions need Speed King—gives you hot water fast and cheap. Drop into any pan of water—plug into socket—in 60 seconds you have hot water. Rush your name for sample offer for use or demonstrator. Plenty cash profits for agents. No money. Just send name. Postcard will do.

NU-WAY MFG. CO., DES MOINES, IOWA
Dept. 504, Walnut Bldg.

Pocket Size
SAMPLES
FOR AGENTS.
SEND NAME!

USED Correspondence Courses

Complete home-study courses and educational books, slightly used. Sold, rented, exchanged. All subjects. Money-back guarantee. Cash paid for used courses. Full details and illustrated 72-page bargain catalog FREE. Write today! NELSON CO.

500 Sherman, Dept. D-227, Chicago

TEAR GAS

100% Protection
A REAL SURE FIRE SELLER

Thugs and Thieves Beware!—Here is a regular 6 shot repeater which discharges 6 smothering clouds of Tear Gas in rapid succession to instantly Stop, Stun and Incapacitate the most vicious man or beast. A safe and effective substitute for dangerous firearms. NO PERMANENT INJURY. Needed in Stores, Banks, Autos and Homes everywhere to protect Life and Property. No skill required. Also Pencil Guns, Electric Shells, Riot Bombs, Fountain Pen Guns, Police Club Guns. All precision-built. NO TOYS. Demonstrations lead to $4.00 to $16.00 sales, offering big profits. Handle our Tear Gas Equipment as a side line, you'll soon give it full time.

TRIAL OFFER: To enable you to make a quick start, we will send you a complete demonstrator outfit consisting of an Automatic Pencil Gun with 10 demonstrator cartridges, and 3 powerful Tear Gas Cartridges, fully guaranteed, for only $2.00. At this low cost, you can promptly break into a business that is hot, alive and not overcrowded. Complete sales plan furnished with each order or inquiry. Write today.
HAGEN IMPORT COMPANY, Dept. S-444, St. Paul, Minn.

PATENT YOUR IDEA

Inventors read and profit by free "Evidence" form and free book "Patent Protection" illustrating important mechanical principles and explaining patent procedure fully. Promptness, low fees, deferred payments, 43 years' experience. Write immediately for free copy of our book.
VICTOR J. EVANS & CO., 407-D VICTOR BLDG., WASH., D.C.

RUPTURED Throw Away! Your Truss

FREE—See this Amazing New Discovery

Why suffer with rupture? You need never wear your truss again! You will be amazed at the wonderful successful results. See how this discovery works. FREE. Positively costs you nothing. No obligation. Just fill in and

MAIL COUPON TODAY!

PNEUMATIC INSTITUTE CO., 103 Park Av., Dept. T1, New York
Send me free under plain seal and wrapper "Amazing New Discovery." This places me under no obligation to buy.

Name
Address T1

MAKE MORE MONEY

Taking Orders For The NIMROD Line

Earn more every day in the year representing old established firm with a complete line of fast selling necessities: Shirts of all kinds, Ties, Underwear, Hosiery, Raincoats, Sweaters, Pants, Belts, Breeches, Shoes, Ensembles, Sport Coats, Uniforms, Summer Suits, etc. Every item guaranteed. Experience unnecessary.

Write quick for FREE SALES EQUIPMENT

NIMROD COMPANY
4922-J Lincoln Ave. Chicago, Ill.

BEST ACTION PICTURE THRILLS IN EXCITING COMICS
NOW ON SALE 10c AT ALL STANDS

Under one puffy eyelid he peered at the mob of killers. There were six of them, all armed. He could see his own Police Positive still weighting the right-hand pocket of Newton's coat. If only he could get to it.

There was nothing else for him to do. He had to make a try for that gun, somehow. If he told where the jewels were hidden, they were all as good as dead. That amiable grin of Newton's had made the matter quite clear. But Kinnick didn't make his return to consciousness known to his captors immediately. He kept up his stertorous breathing all the time, until he felt sure he could free his hands. Not his ankles, but his hands. They'd see him if he tried to free his ankles.

It took time, and a great deal of pain, but finally he worked his hands free. But he still refrained from going into action. He had to wait and hope—hope that Clare could take it. It all depended on her courage and stamina, if they were to regain their freedom.

Kinnick groaned audibly, signaling to the crooks that he was conscious once more. Newton turned and faced him, that grin still on his face.

"Have you decided to talk, Kinnick?" he demanded.

"I don't care what you do to any one of us," Kinnick snapped back. "I'm not talking."

"No?" Newton said. "Okay, Percy. Go ahead."

Percival was smoking a long cigarette. Grinning evilly, he walked over to Clare. And without the slightest compassion he pressed the lighted end of the cigarette into her forearm. Clare simply glared at him. She made no outcry for mercy, did not even wince.

Cyrus Gordon swore savagely, mouthing strong oaths. But Count Newton slugged him again, knocking him out cold.

Percival touched the girl again, twice, outlining the three points of a triangle on the fair white skin of her forearm. This time she shuddered at the cruel pain.

"If you don't talk fast, Kinnick," Newton warned him, "we won't be so easy on the girl. The next time Percival uses that cigarette it'll be in her eyes. Well? What do you say?"

"I'll blow the whistle," said Kinnick, "if you'll let the girl alone. You could burn her to pieces, but when it comes to eyes. . . . Well, I have ideas about eyes. Burns will heal and eyes won't. I have a stipulation though. . . ."

Count Newton's smile faded perceptibly.

"You're in no position to bargain," he said grimly.

"I always talk over a weighty decision with myself," Kinnick said garrulously, "before I find the right words to explain just what I'm driving at. It's like that now. I'm going to talk, but I'm not going to hurry." He watched Count Newton thoughtfully.

"If you're going to spill, Kinnick, why waste time?" Newton snapped. "Let's have it, or I'll kick your teeth out."

KINNICK'S heart hammered with excitement as he watched Count Newton. The mob leader was becoming more and more edgy.

"If you did that it would take me even longer," he said tauntingly.

Count Newton moved like a tiger. He grabbed Kinnick by the shoulders, started to yank him erect. Kinnick clung to the back of the chair with his free hands, so that Count Newton would not know, too soon, that his hands were free.

As Newton yanked him up, Kinnick's arms shot around the killer. His left hand shot into Newton's right-hand pocket, came out with the comfortable feel of his own Police Positive resting against his palm. He

[Turn Page]

WANTED

1,000 MEN

WE WILL PREPARE YOU FOR A

★ LIFETIME ★ GOVERNMENT JOB

Salaries $1260-$2600 Per Year

NO LAYOFFS!

VACATIONS WITH PAY!

★ RAILWAY POSTAL CLERKS ★

CITY MAIL CARRIERS ★ CLERKS—FILE CLERKS
POST OFFICE CLERKS ★ STENOGRAPHERS—TYPISTS
RURAL MAIL CARRIERS ★ INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS

★ Patrol and Immigration Inspectors ★

NOTE—Women are also eligible for Government jobs.

Pay for Course Only After You Are Appointed & Working

So sure are we that our simplified Interstate Home Study Courses of coaching will result in your passing the examinations and being appointed that we are willing to accept your enrollment on the following basis. The price of our complete 10-week lesson course is $30 plus $3 Examiners' Fee.

We are willing to give you any course with the understanding that you are to pay for the Course ONLY AFTER YOU ARE APPOINTED AND WORKING FOR THE GOVERNMENT. Should you take the examination and fail, or not be appointed for any reason whatsoever, the loss will be ours and you will not owe us one cent for the course.

Clip and Mail This Coupon NOW!

INTERSTATE HOME STUDY BUREAU S.M.14
901 BROAD ST., DIV. S. M. 14, NEWARK, N. J.

Please RUSH me FREE particulars how to qualify for a government job.

Name
(Please print plainly in pencil)

Address

City..... State.....

If you wish Paste on Postcard and Mail.

FREE SAMPLES OF REMARKABLE TREATMENT FOR Stomach Ulcers Due to Gastric Hyperacidity

H. H. Bromley, of Shelburne, Vt., writes: "I suffered for years with acid-stomach trouble. My doctors told me I had acid stomach ulcers and would have to diet the rest of my life. Before taking your treatment I had lost a lot of weight and could eat nothing but soft foods and milk. After taking Von's Tablets, I felt perfectly well, ate almost anything and gained back the weight I had lost." If you suffer from indigestion, gastritis, heartburn, bloating or any other stomach trouble due to gastric hyperacidity, you, too, should try Von's for prompt relief. Send for FREE Samples of this remarkable treatment and details of trial offer with money back guarantee. Instructive Booklet is included. Write:

PHILADELPHIA VON CO. Dept. 612-H
Fox Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

RAILWAY & BUS PASSENGER TRAFFIC INSPECTOR

Our home-study training prepares you quickly for interesting, necessary job in transportation. We place graduates or refund tuition. Many good opportunities. Graduate Inspectors earn up to $135 per month, plus expenses, to start. Established 1918.

Standard Business Training Institute, Div. 8504, Buffalo, N. Y.

LEARN TO SHOOT STRAIGHT WITH BENJAMIN

For Target—Small Game—Camping—Guaranteed—Accurate—Practical—Economical—Safe—Clean—Quiet. Adjustable Force—Amazing Maximum Velocity. No Smoke or Fumes. Bolt Action—Hammer Fire—Hair Trigger—Safety Lock—Hand Pump. Single Shot BB with 1 lb. shot $3.50; Single Shot cal. 177 or 22 RIFLED with 500 pellets $10.00; BB 8-Shot with 1 lb. shot $10.00; Holster $2.00. Also a complete line of Benjamin Genuine Compressed Air Rifles for BB and cal. 177 or 22. No license required from dealer or factory. Write today for complete specifications and free targets.

BENJAMIN AIR RIFLE CO., 880 Marion St., St. Louis, Mo., U. S. A.

DICE. CARDS.

Specialties for Magicians use. Inks, Shiners, Check-Cop, Daubs. Catalog ten cents, stamps or coin.

HILL BROS., Box T, Salida, Colo.

FEATURING THE ACTION
ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN
FUTURE, MAN OF TOMORROW!

ONLY 10¢ AT ALL NEWSSTANDS

INDIGESTION

may affect the Heart

Gas trapped in the stomach or gullet may act like a hair-trigger on the heart. At the first sign of distress smart men and women depend on Bell-ans Tablets to set gas free. No laxative but made of the fastest-acting medicines known for acid indigestion. If the FIRST DOSE doesn't prove Bell-ans better, return bottle to us and receive DOUBLE Money Back, 25c at all drug stores.

jammed the gun muzzle in the killer's side. Newton tried to pull free and tug at his own gat.

"Get on either side of him!" the frightened killer yelled. "Drill him in the legs! Get him off me!"

"I'll fill your boss full of slugs if one of you hoods make a move," Kinnick promised.

The other men exchanged glances. Kinnick was holding Count Newton tightly, very tightly. This fact seemed to reassure them. Percival grinned, lifted his gat.

"Hold him, Kinnick," he said. "We'll drill him. That'll save an extra cut. Now you can tell us what the score is!"

Count Newton swore savagely, still trying to yank away. With deadly aim, Kinnick fired. Percival went down with a neat hole in his forehead. His gat exploded, sending a bullet into the wall.

"That was just Percy talking, Count!" yelled one of the others. "We're sticking with you!"

But Newton had gone insane at Percival's hint of a doublecross. Even the menace of the Police Positive in his side did not deter him. He slugged his way clear, and John Kinnick fell, all entangled with the chair again, which held his ankles imprisoned. Knowing he had set himself an impossible task, Kinnick started throwing lead, careful to throw it where it wouldn't hit the Gordons.

Lead was smashing at him, too, and he was trying the best he could to dodge the slugs in his twisted position. A bullet burned along his left side. It was too deep for comfort. He held his gun in his right hand now. He was getting a trifle dizzy.

One of the doublecrossing hoods threw a slug at Newton, missed. Snarling, Newton shot him in the belly, then ran to him and kicked the gun out of his hand. Then he kicked him again, in the jaw this time. The man died after that.

That diversion of Newton helped, and Kinnick got another hood. He also got another slug in him, in his right shoulder. It sort of numbed his whole right side. Slugs were hammering at him, plumping into him from everywhere, he thought. And through a haze of descending darkness he could see Clare watching him, horror in her face. She, like Kinnick, must be remembering his hunch—and realizing that it was working out here.

Kinnick began to crawl toward her, pausing as he crawled to fire at one member of the gang. The hood went down, his guns still blazing. Kinnick kept right on firing, and men kept firing at him. He got the gun that Newton had kicked out of the hand of the man he had shot in the belly.

It seemed a good idea, sort of poetic justice, for him to shoot Count Newton in the belly with it, too. Just as Newton started to run behind Clare to keep away from this hideous, twisted, crawling thing—with the remnants of a chair fastened to its ankles—that bullets did not seem able to stop, Kinnick fired.

Count Newton fell against Clare, knocking her over. Kinnick heard her head hit the floor. But he didn't hear any more shooting after that. He figured that he would never hear firing again, or anything else for that matter. Unless it was the angels playing on their harps.

SILLY, he thought, thinking things like that. But he didn't mind. All the noise that had been made by the shooting would bring somebody. He was glad, since his hunch had been right, that he could pass out for a gal who looked and behaved so much like Madge would have, or Ann. Then blackness claimed him for its own....

When John Kinnick regained consciousness he didn't see any angels, or hear any harps. He simply heard a man say: "By all rights he should be a dead man, but his kind are plenty tough."

[Turn Page]

I DO HALF DAYS IRONING in 1 hour

Says Mrs. R. C. Shelley of Virginia.

WOMEN are amazed at easy, fast, cool ironing with the new Streamlined Diamond. Self-heating, instant heat control, triple pointed base, heat-proof rosewood handle. Rust-proof CHROMIUM finish for lifetime service. No tiring hot stove work or dangerous cords — Burns 96% AIR, only 4% kerosene (coal oil). It actually IRONS FAMILY WASHING for 1 CENT. 30 DAYS HOME TRIAL! Enjoy Diamond Ironing for a month at our risk. Write for full particulars of Trial offer. Akron Lamp & Mfg. Co. 1096 Iron St., Akron, Ohio

BURNS 96% AIR

AGENTS: $8.00, $10, $14 A DAY being made. Write at once.

FREE!

$6.00 Full Size FOOD & HOUSEHOLD PRODUCT ASST.

SEND NO MONEY! Rush name and address for big Assortment of FOODS, GROCERIES, SOAPS, ETC.—full size package, worth $6.00. Yours ABSOLUTELY FREE! Show these products to friends, neighbors. Take orders for sensational values, more than 200 quality products used in every home. Earn big profits, full or spare time. No experience necessary. Write for FREE $6.00 Assortment of Products NOW. ZANOL, 3675 Monmouth, Cincinnati, Ohio

MEN WANTED

Side Line — Spare Time — Full Time

BIG CASH COMMISSIONS IN ADVANCE DAILY

Complete line of EVERYDAY BUSINESS NECESSITIES—over 2,000 fast selling, steady repeating items for all retail merchants, gas stations, business offices, etc., at a saving of more than half. You take orders. We deliver! Elaborate SAMPLE DISPLAY OUTFIT sent FREE. Write quick. NORTHWESTERN, 625-AB WEST JACKSON, CHICAGO, ILL.

WORK FOR THE

GOVERNMENT START

$1260 to $2100 YEAR MEN—WOMEN

Postoffice Clerks, Carriers
Railway Postal Clerks
Stenographers-Typists
Messengers
Many Other Jobs

Franklin Institute
Dept. N258
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

PREPARE IMMEDIATELY

Mail Coupon TODAY

Gentlemen: Rush to me, FREE of charge, list of U. S. Government big pay jobs. Send FREE 32-page book describing salaries, vacations, hours, work. Tell me how to qualify for one of these jobs.

Name

Address

BACKACHE?

Try Flushing Excess Poisons
And Acid Thru Kidneys
And Stop Getting Up Nights

35 CENTS PROVES IT

When your kidneys are overtaxed and your bladder is irritated and passage scanty and often smarts and burns, you may need Gold Medal Haarlem Oil Capsules, a fine harmless stimulant and diuretic that starts to work at once and costs but 35 cents at any modern drugstore.

It's one good safe way to put more healthy activity into kidneys and bladder—you should sleep more soundly the whole night through. But be sure to get GOLD MEDAL—it's a genuine medicine for weak kidneys—

SONG POEM WRITERS
Write today for free Booklet outlining profit sharing plan.
ALLIED MUSIC
Dept. 32, Box 507, Cincinnati, Ohio

WE MATCH PANTS
To Any Suit!
Double the life of your coat and vest with correctly matched pants. 100,000 patterns. Every pair hand tailored to your measure. Our match sent FREE for your O. K. before pants are made. Fit guaranteed. Send piece of cloth or vest today.
SUPERIOR MATCH PANTS COMPANY
209 S. State St. Dept. 196, Chicago

ASTHMA TREATMENT mailed on Free Trial. If satisfied send $1; if not, it's Free. Write me for your treatment today.
W. K. STERLINE, 830 Ohio Ave., Sidney, Ohio

TOMBSTONES
DIRECT TO YOU

Perpetuate the grave of your loved one with beautiful Rockdale Monuments and Markers. Low cost—guaranteed satisfaction or money back—Free lettering. Send for Free Catalog and compare our prices.
WE PAY THE FREIGHT
Rockdale Monument Company,
Dept. 343, Joliet, Ill.

EASY TERMS
$7.50 AND UP

KRISTEE CO.

SUCTION SPONGE
Cleans Cars New Way!
AMAZING INVENTION! Banishes auto-washing drudgery. Cleans linoleum, woodwork, windows like a flash. Auto owners, housewives wild about it. HOT SELLER FOR AGENTS AND DISTRIBUTORS. Hustlers cleaning up big money.
SAMPLE OFFER Samples sent on trial to first person in each locality who writes. No obligation. Get details. Be first—send in your name TODAY!
1434 Kristee Building AKRON, OHIO

Kinnick heard the distinctive sound a nurse's uniform makes when she walks. He smelled disinfectants. His entire body ached like the devil. Then he opened his eyes. There were quite a few people around, including the cops. He spotted Detective-lieutenant Masterson.

"Did you find the rocks in Percival's inside pocket?" he managed to say.

"How did you know where they were, Mr. Kinnick?" a girl's voice asked.

He turned and looked at Clare.

"My desk wasn't a trick desk," he said. "I knew Percival got them and was planning a doublecross. He knew that I knew. And when I didn't say anything, he knew I was going to wait for the breaks. And when I made my move, he pulled his stuff. He was sure he could beat any breaks in my favor. I thought he could, too, but it was my only chance. Even free, I couldn't possibly have beaten the whole mob."

"I'm not so sure you couldn't," said Clare, smiling happily.

"He'd have licked them to a frazzle!" said another voice which made him turn and look toward the other side of the cot—into the proud, concerned faces of Ann and his son, Bob. He shook his head.

"They're no good any more, kids," Kinnick said. "My hunches, I mean."

"How so?" Bob asked.

"I had a hunch that if I took another case I'd be bumped off. Of course"—he looked a bit hopefully at the doctor—"maybe it has, at that. If I'm not going to live, Doc—"

"Your chances were ninety-nine to one against," said the Doctor, "when you got here. You were as good as dead. Yes, my friend, you were a gone gosling. But now, I'm damned sure you'll live to be a hundred. If those bullets didn't kill you, nothing will."

John Kinnick grinned happily.

"Then everything's all right," he said. "I wouldn't be able to go on being a detective, if I couldn't depend on my hunches."

"You mean, Mr. Kinnick," Clare gasped, "that in spite of what you've just been through, you're not going to retire?"

"Retire?" he repeated. "Why should I? Now that I've passed the danger spot I'll never be killed. So, when your Dad gets kidnaped again, come right to me, will you? Say! Did your Father go to the customs officials about that smuggling charge?"

"Yes," Clare answered, and there was a note of relief in her voice. "He's going to take his medicine. His lawyer said he'd probably only have to pay a heavy fine, that Dad would receive a suspended prison sentence. Dad's certainly learned his lesson all right. He'll behave from now on."

Everybody, it seemed, felt swell about everything—and John Kinnick felt especially thankful to have escaped a life of certain boredom.

COMING NEXT MONTH

THE TRAIL TO DEATH

A Complete Book-Length Mystery Novel Featuring the Phantom in Action!

By ROBERT WALLACE

DOWN GO TIRE PRICES

On GOODYEAR
FIRESTONE-GOODRICH

and Other Standard Makes

Only our 25 years' experience, big buying power and volume production make it possible to offer these amazing tire values. Think of it; Standard Brand reconditioned tires, serviceably repaired by experts with high-grade materials at a fraction of original cost. Order now. Enjoy the tremendous savings our cut prices make possible.

$1.85

28-4.75-19

BALLOON TIRES

Size	Tires	Tubes
29x4.40-21	$1.85	$0.85
29x4.50-20	1.85	.85
30x4.50-21	1.95	.85
28x4.75-19	1.85	.95
29x4.75-20	2.10	.95
29x5.00-19	2.25	1.05
30x5.00-20	2.40	1.05
6.25-17	2.45	1.15
28x5.25-18	2.45	1.15
29x5.25-19	2.45	1.15
30x5.25-20	2.50	1.15
31x5.25-21	2.80	1.15
6.50-17	2.75	1.15
28x5.50-18	2.75	1.15
29x5.50-19	2.75	1.15
6.00-16	3.15	1.45
6.00-17	2.85	1.15
30x6.00-18	2.85	1.15
31x6.00-19	2.85	1.15
32x6.00-20	2.95	1.25
33x6.00-21	3.10	1.25
32x6.50-20	3.20	1.35

TRUCK BALLOONS

Size	Tires	Tubes
6.00-20	$3.10	$1.65
6.50-20	3.35	1.95
7.00-20	4.60	2.95
7.50-20	5.15	3.75
8.25-20	6.75	4.95

HEAVY DUTY TRUCK TIRES

Size	Tires	Tubes
8.00x6	$3.50	$1.95
32x6	6.95	2.75
34x7	8.95	3.25
38x7	9.45	3.95
36x8	9.65	3.95
40x8	11.60	4.15

ALL OTHER SIZES

DEALERS WANTED

SEND ONLY $1.00 DEPOSIT on each tire ordered. ($3.00 on each Truck Tire.) We ship balance C. O. D. Deduct 5 per cent if cash is sent in full with order. To fill order promptly we may substitute brands if necessary. ALL TUBES BRAND NEW—GUARANTEED—

PERRY-FIELD TIRE & RUBBER CO.
2329-30 S. Michigan Ave., Dept. TF-42, Chicago

FALSE TEETH

LOW AS
$6.85

90 DAYS' TRIAL
TEST THEM
EXAMINE THEM

We make FALSE TEETH for you by mail from your own impressions. You have satisfaction of MONEY BACK GUARANTEE. Customers in United States and Canada report SATISFACTION but you be your own JUDGE. SEND NO MONEY WRITE TODAY for FREE BOOKLET and MATERIAL. CLEVELAND DENTAL SUPPLY CO.
Dept. 2-D1, East St. Louis, Illinois

I Have Special Work for HOUSEWIVES who need up to $22 A WEEK!

No Experience
No Investment Necessary!

If you need $22.00 in a week—if you want a beautiful selection of the latest Spring and summer Styles for yourself absolutely Free of extra charge—all without house-to-house canvassing, experience, or investment, even without interfering with your household duties, write me at once giving your dress size and age. Nothing to pay now or at any time. Harford Frocks, Inc., Dept. U-207, Cincinnati, Ohio.

SONG POEMS

WANTED AT ONCE!
Mother, Home, Love,
Patriotic, Sacred,
Comic or any subject.
Don't delay—send us your original poem today for immediate consideration.

RICHARD BROTHERS, 74-A Woods Building, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

STOP Scratching

Relieve Itch Fast or Money Back

For quick relief from itching of eczema, pimples, athlete's foot, scales, scabies, rashes and other externally caused skin troubles, use world-famous, cooling, antiseptic, liquid D. D. D. Prescription. Greaseless, stainless. Soothes irritation and quickly stops the most intense itching. 35c trial bottle proves it, or money back. Ask your druggist today for D. D. D. PRESCRIPTION.

What about I.C.S. students who are drafted?

MAYBE you've learned that only with proper training can you hope to get ahead on your job — maybe you've often said, "Some day I'll take an I. C. S. Course, and really amount to something!" — but because of the draft, you've decided to put it off. Don't do it!

If you're drafted, you'll be encouraged to continue your I. C. S. studies — for the U. S. Army, like business and industry, needs trained men — and pays them well! Furthermore, you will have real training by the time your term of enlistment is over, and you'll be ready to step into a bigger, better-paying job than you have now.

Figure it out for yourself — training pays in peace-time or war-time, in army or civilian life. Mail this coupon right now for information on low-cost I. C. S. Courses in your line of work. The I. C. S. Limited is headed for Success — climb on!

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS

CELEBRATE 50 YEARS OF SERVICE TO AMBITIOUS AMERICANS

1891*1941

BOX 3970-R, SCRANTON, PENNA.

Without cost or obligation, please send me a copy of your booklet, "Who Wins and Why," and full particulars about the course before which I have marked X:

TECHNICAL AND INDUSTRIAL COURSES

- | | | | | |
|---|---------------------------------------|---|---|--|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Agriculture | <input type="checkbox"/> Air Brake | <input type="checkbox"/> Cotton Manufacturing | <input type="checkbox"/> Mfg. of Pulp and Paper | <input type="checkbox"/> R. R. Section Foreman |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Air Conditioning | | <input type="checkbox"/> Diesel Engines | <input type="checkbox"/> Marine Engines | <input type="checkbox"/> R. R. Signalmen's |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Architectural Drafting | | <input type="checkbox"/> Electrical Drafting | <input type="checkbox"/> Mechanical Drafting | <input type="checkbox"/> Refrigeration |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Architecture | | <input type="checkbox"/> Electrical Engineering | <input type="checkbox"/> Mechanical Engineering | <input type="checkbox"/> Sanitary Engineering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Auto Engine Tune-up | | <input type="checkbox"/> Electric Lighting | <input type="checkbox"/> Mine Foreman | <input type="checkbox"/> Sheet Metal Work |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Auto Technician | | <input type="checkbox"/> Fire Bosses | <input type="checkbox"/> Navigation | <input type="checkbox"/> Steam Electric |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Aviation | <input type="checkbox"/> Boilermaking | <input type="checkbox"/> Foundry Work | <input type="checkbox"/> Patternmaking | <input type="checkbox"/> Steam Engines |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Bridge Engineering | | <input type="checkbox"/> Fruit Growing | <input type="checkbox"/> Pharmacy | <input type="checkbox"/> Steam Fitting |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Building Estimating | | <input type="checkbox"/> Heat Treatment of Metals | <input type="checkbox"/> Plumbing | <input type="checkbox"/> Structural Drafting |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Chemistry | | <input type="checkbox"/> Highway Engineering | <input type="checkbox"/> Poultry Farming | <input type="checkbox"/> Structural Engineering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Civil Engineering | | <input type="checkbox"/> House Planning | <input type="checkbox"/> Practical Telephony | <input type="checkbox"/> Surveying and Mapping |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Coal Mining | | <input type="checkbox"/> Locomotive Engineer | <input type="checkbox"/> Public Works Engineering | <input type="checkbox"/> Telegraph Engineering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Concrete Engineering | | <input type="checkbox"/> Machinist | <input type="checkbox"/> Radio, General | <input type="checkbox"/> Textile Designing |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Contracting and Building | | <input type="checkbox"/> Management of Inventions | <input type="checkbox"/> Radio Operating | <input type="checkbox"/> Toolmaking |
| | | | <input type="checkbox"/> Radio Servicing | <input type="checkbox"/> Welding, Electric and Gas |
| | | | | <input type="checkbox"/> Woolen Manufacturing |

BUSINESS COURSES

- | | | | | |
|--|--|--|---|---|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Accounting | <input type="checkbox"/> Advertising | <input type="checkbox"/> College Preparatory | <input type="checkbox"/> Foremanship | <input type="checkbox"/> Railway Postal Clerk |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Bookkeeping | | <input type="checkbox"/> Commercial | <input type="checkbox"/> French | <input type="checkbox"/> Salesmanship |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Business Correspondence | | <input type="checkbox"/> Cost Accounting | <input type="checkbox"/> Grade School | <input type="checkbox"/> Secretarial |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Business Management | | <input type="checkbox"/> C. P. Accounting | <input type="checkbox"/> High School | <input type="checkbox"/> Sign Lettering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Cartooning | <input type="checkbox"/> Civil Service | <input type="checkbox"/> First Year College | <input type="checkbox"/> Illustrating | <input type="checkbox"/> Spanish |
| | | | <input type="checkbox"/> Lettering Show Cards | <input type="checkbox"/> Traffic Management |
| | | | <input type="checkbox"/> Managing Men at Work | |

HOME ECONOMICS COURSES

- | | | |
|---|---|--|
| <input type="checkbox"/> Advanced Dressmaking | <input type="checkbox"/> Home Dressmaking | <input type="checkbox"/> Tea Room and Cafeteria Management, Catering |
| <input type="checkbox"/> Foods and Cookery | <input type="checkbox"/> Professional Dressmaking and Designing | |

Name..... Age..... Address.....

City..... State..... Present Position.....

Canadian residents send coupon to International Correspondence Schools Canadian, Limited, Montreal, Canada
British residents send coupon to I. C. S., 71 Kingsway, London, W. O. 2, England

Only 89^{*}¢

per month
(at AGE 21)

Someone's depending on YOU

per $1000.00 of this
OLD LINE LEGAL RESERVE LIFE INSURANCE

HERE ARE LOW MONTHLY RATES at YOUR AGE (nearest birthday) per $1000. (* Rates shown are one-half permanent rates beginning fifth year)

Age	Age	Age	Age
21 $.89	30 $1.13	39 $1.50	48 $2.14
22 .91	31 1.16	40 1.56	49 2.24
23 .94	32 1.19	41 1.61	50 2.35
24 .96	33 1.23	42 1.68	51 2.46
25 .98	34 1.27	43 1.74	52 2.58
26 1.01	35 1.31	44 1.81	53 2.71
27 1.04	36 1.35	45 1.89	54 2.85
28 1.06	37 1.40	46 1.97	55 3.00
29 1.09	38 1.45	47 2.05

Owing to low rates at which this policy is offered $1500 is the minimum amount of insurance accepted. Most families need more.

If this policy does not fit your needs, Postal issues all standard forms, men and women, ages 10 to 60.

POSTAL LIFE OF NEW YORK

has paid out more than $50,000,000.00

to policy holders and beneficiaries during 35 successful years

POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
511 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

Postal's "Modified 4" Policy is a Whole life contract with premiums so modified that you pay only HALF the permanent rate for the first four years. The Policy offers Cash, Loan, Paid-up and Extended Insurance values; Automatic Premium Loan Clause (if desired) and all Standard Provisions.

All Postal policies are participating — that is, they share in the Company's earnings, and dividends are paid as earned and declared.
For illustration: a DIVIDEND of 9½% of the Annual Premium has been declared on policies issued during 1940 at rates shown, payable on anniversary of the policies in 1941.

Postal Has No Agents—Pays No Commissions or Branch Office Expenses. Deal direct with Postal Life of New York for low cost Life Insurance.

CLIP AND MAIL COUPON TODAY!

POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

511 Fifth Ave., Dept. M-48 New York, N. Y.

Mail me complete information about your new low cost Modified "4" Whole Life Policy, rates at my age and Postal's method of doing business direct.

Date of Birth _____

Occupation _____

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ State _____

GROUP LIFE POLICY INSURES THE ENTIRE FAMILY

The Murray Family, 4712 Leamington Ave., Chicago, Ill.

TOTAL COST ONLY
$1⁰⁰
A MONTH

NO MEDICAL EXAMINATION!

GRANDPARENTS, PARENTS, CHILDREN, AGES 1-75
ALL INSURED IN ONE SINGLE LIFE INSURANCE POLICY

AS PLAINLY STATED IN THE POLICY YOUR ENTIRE FAMILY IS INSURED UP TO:

$1,000.00

maximum for natural or ordinary death . . .

$2,000.00

maximum for auto accidental death . . .

$3,000.00

maximum for accidental death by travel . . .

All for $1.00 Per Month

The policy is not cancelled by the death of one of the insured members. The benefits are paid and the policy remains in force on the balance of the insured group as long as premiums are paid. Monthly premiums are divided equally between the number insured and benefits are graded according to the attained ages of members insured.

ACT NOW • SEND COUPON!

10 DAY FREE OFFER—Mail Coupon!

This wonderful Family Group policy now gives your whole family safe, reliable insurance, paying benefits for natural death, double amount for auto accidental death, and triple benefits for travel accidental death. One policy, one premium insures all your loved ones—baby to grandparents—all for only $1.00 per month!

NO AGENT WILL CALL

We have thousands of satisfied policyholders all over the country, many of whom could not afford to pay big prices. Now YOUR ENTIRE FAMILY can enjoy real life insurance protection. No agent will call. No medical examination, no investigation, no red tape. This remarkable Triple Indemnity policy sold by mail on Bankers Life and Casualty Company's ironclad guarantee. You take no risk.

SEND NO MONEY!

Remember, you do not send one cent with coupon—just your name and address, and we send you our 10 Day Free offer and full details. Be sure to write today. Don't put this off. Just mail coupon. No obligation.

ACT NOW— AND RETURN COUPON AT ONCE

BANKERS LIFE AND CASUALTY CO.
Bankers Insurance Bldg., Jefferson Sta., Dept. 38
Chicago, Illinois.

Please send details and tell me how to get the Family Group Policy for free inspection. No Agent Will Call.

Name

Street or R. F. D.

City State.....