The Crook in Crimson

A Thrilling Book-Length Story by Edgar Wallace
The Crook

Chapter 1.

Dope!

In the dusk of the evening the waterman brought his skiff under the overshadowing hull of the Baltic steamer and rested on his oars, the little boat rising and falling gently in the swell of the river. A grimy, unshaven, second officer looked down from the open porthole and spat thoughtfully into the water. Apparently he did not see the swarthy-faced waterman with the tuft of grey beard, and as apparently the waterman was oblivious of his appearance. Presently the unshaven man with the faded gold band on the wrist of his shabby jacket drew in his head and shoulders and disappeared.

A few seconds later a square wooden case heaved through the port and fell with a splash in the water. For a moment one sharp corner was in sight, then it sank slowly beneath the yellow flood. A small black buoy bobbed up, and the waterman watched it with interest. To the buoy was attached a stout cord, and the cord was fastened to the case. He waited, moving his oars slowly, until the buoy was on the point of being sucked out of sight; then, with a turn of his wrist, he hooked an oar under the cord—literally hooked, for at the end of the short blade was a little steel crook.

Pushing the boat forward, he reached for the buoy and drew this into the stern sheets, fastened the cord round a wooden pin, and, lifting his oars, allowed the tide to carry him under the steamer's stern. Anchored in midstream was a dingy-looking barge and towards this he guided the skiff.

A heavily built young man came from the aft deck of the barge, and, reaching down a boathook, drew the skiff alongside. The swarthy man held on to the side of the barge, whilst the boathook was transferred to the taut line astern. The younger man did no more than fasten the soaking cord to a small bight. By this time the occupant of the skiff was on board.

"Nobody about, Ligeoy?" he asked gruffly.

"Nobody, cap'n," said the younger man. The captain said nothing more, but walked to the deck-house astern and disappeared down the companion-way, pulling the hatch close after him. There he stayed till the estuary was a black void punctured with dim ships' lights.
Ligsey went forward to where his youthful assistant sat on an overturned bucket, softly playing a mouth-organ. He stopped being musical long enough to remark that the tide was turning.

"We going up to-night?" he asked.

Ligsey nodded. He had already heard the chuff-chuff of the motor in the stern of the barge, where the skipper was starting it.

"What we hangin' around here for?" asked the youth curiously. "We've missed one tide—we could have been up to Green- wich by now. Why don't Captain Atty-mar—".

"Mind your own business!" growled the mate.

He heard the swarthy man calling him and went aft.

"We'll get that case in and stow it," he said in a low voice. "I left a place in the bricks."

Together they pulled gingerly at the cord and brought the square, soaked packing-case to sight. Ligsey leaned over and gripped it with an instrument like a pair of huge ice-tongs, and the dripping case was brought to the narrow deck and stowed expeditiously in the well of the barge.

The Alleman invariably carried bricks between a little yard on the Essex coast and Tenny's Wharf. Everybody on the river knew her for an erratic and a dangerous-steering craft. The loud clashing of her engine was an offence. Even nippy tugboats gave her yawning bows a wide berth.

The boy was called aft to take charge of the engine, and Ligsey took the tiller. It was five o'clock on a spring morning when she came to Tenny's Wharf, which is at Rochesthite.

As a wharfage it had few qualities attractive to the least fastidious of barges. It consisted of a confined space with room for two builders' lorries to be backed side by side (though it required some manoeuvring to bring them into position), and the shabbily little house where Joe Attymar lived.

Through the weather-beaten gate, which opened at intervals to admit the builders' carts, was Shadwick Lane. It had none of the picturesque character of the slum it used to be, when its houses were of wood and water-butts stood in every back-yard. Nowadays it consists of four walls, two on either side of the street. Bridging each pair is an inverted "V" of slate, called hushed voice appropriate to one who has lost a dear friend. "Of what did he die?" "Loss of breath," said Gaylbor vulgarly.
A grumpy, unshaven, second officer peered suspiciously from the porthole.

Mr. Reeder knew nothing more that he could recall about dope merchants.

"Haven't you some record on your files?" suggested Gaylor.

"I never keep files, except—um—mail files," said Mr. Reeder.

"Perhaps," suggested Gaylor, "one of your peculiar friends?"

"I have no friends," said Mr. Reeder.

But here he did not speak the exact truth. He was cursed with a community spirit and he had a tremendous sense of neighbourly obligations. Especially would he give up valuable time to diagnosing and curing the mysterious diseases which attacked the chickens in Brockley Road.

Mr. Reeder was an authority on poultry. He knew exactly why hens droop and cockerels comb go pink. He had a marvellous chicken farm in Kent—not large, but rare. Noble lords and ladies consulted him before they exhibited their birds. He could wash and dry living chickens for the bench; the Poultry Show at the Crystal Palace was an event to which Mr. Reeder looked forward for eleven months and two weeks.

He would stand in his back garden for hours discussing with the man next door the eccentricities of laying hens, and his acquaintance with Johnny Southers began in a fowl-house. Johnny lived three doors from Mr. Reeder. He was rather a nice young man, fair-haired and good-looking. He had in Mr. Reeder's eyes the overwhelming advantage of being a very poor conversationalist.

Anna Welford lived in the house opposite, so that it may be said that the scene was set for the curious tragedy of Joe Attymar on a very small stage.

It was through the unromantic question of a disease which attacked Johnny Southers' prize Wyandottes that Mr. Reeder met Anna. She happened to be in the Southers' back garden when Mr. Reeder was engaged in his diagnosis. She was a slim girl, rather dark, with amazing brown eyes. Her father was a retired fish merchant, who had made a lot of money, and had sent her to a high-class school at Brighton, where ladies are taught to ride astride, use lipstick and adore the heroes of Hollywood.

In some respects her education had been neglected, for she returned to the dullness of Brockley a very sane, well-balanced young lady.

She did not find Brockley a "hole." She did not smoke or do anything which made life worth living, but settled down to the humdrum of a stuffy home as though she had never shared a room with an earl's daughter engaged hockey against an all-England team.

Johnny did not fall in love with her at first sight. He had known her since she was so high; when she was a boy she was endurable to him. As a young man he thought her views on life were sound. He discovered he was in love with her as he discovered he was taller than his father. It was too late.

It was brought home to him when Mr. Clive Desbyno called in his glittering coupé to take Anna to a dinner-dance. He realized Mr. Desbyno's easy assurance, the proprietal way he handed Anna into the car; he thought it was appalling bad manners for a man to smoke a cigarette while he was driving a lady. Thereafter Johnny found himself opening and examining packing-cases and casks and barrels at the Customs House with a sense of his inferiority and the hopelessness of his future. He realized his lack of authority on poultry, and Mr. Reeder listened with all the interest of one who was hearing a perfectly novel and original story that had never been told before by or to any human being.

"I know so very little—um—about love," said Mr. Reeder awkwardly. "In fact—er—nothing. I would like to advise you to—um—let matters alone. Very excellent, if vague, advice. But matters took the wrong course, as it happened.

REEDER'S INVESTIGATIONS.

On the following Saturday night, as Mr. Reeder was returning home, he saw two men fighting in Brockley Road. He had what is called a "repugnance" to fighting men. When the hour was midnight and the day was Saturday, there was a considerable weight of opinion in favour of fights being between two gentlemen who were the worse for intoxicating drink, and it was invariably Mr. Reeder's practice to cross, like the preacher, to move more slowly towards the streets of Brockley. Nevertheless, Mr. Reeder hardly felt it was the occasion to act either as mediator or timekeeper.

He would have passed them by, had it not in fact come to his mind that one came up to him, leaving his companion—though that hardly seems the term to apply to one who had been so bruised and ex- hasted that he was the ravingings—to recover as best he could. It was then that Mr. Reeder saw that one of the contestants was Mr. John Southers. He was more than a match for Mr. Desbyno.

"I'm terribly sorry to have made a fuss like this," he said. "I hope my father didn't hear me. This fellow is intolerable."

The intolerable man, who had evidently broken his head when a car was parked by the sidewalk, they watched him in silence as he got in, and,
Pushing open the door with his umbrella, Mr. Reeder directed a strong beam of light into Ligsey’s cubby hole.

He was again called to Scotland Yard on a consultation. He found Gaylor and the Chief Constable together, and they were examining a very dingy-looking letter which had come to the Yard in the course of the day.

"Sit down, Reeder," said the chief. "Do you know a man called Attymar?"

Mr. Reeder shook his head. He had never heard of Joe Attymar.

"This is a thing we could do ourselves without any bother at all," interrupted the chief; "but there are all sorts of complications which I won’t bother you with. We believe there’s a member of the staff of one of the Legations in this business, and, naturally, we want this fact to come out incidentally, and not as the result of any direct investigation by the police."

Mr. Reeder then learned about Joe Attymar, the large, master of the little wharf at the end of Shadwell Lane, and the large Semana that went up and down the Thames, year in and year out, and brought bricks. He did not hear at that moment, or subsequently, what part the Legation played, or which Legation it was, or if there was any Legation at all. In justice to his acumen it must be said that he doubted this part of the story from the first, and the theory at which he eventually arrived, and which was probably correct, was that the part he was called upon to play was to stampede Attymar and his associates into a betrayal of their iniquity. For this was at a period when Mr. Reeder’s name and what he was, not having been instrumental in breaking up one of the best organised gangs of river thieves that had ever amalgamated for an improper purpose.

Mr. Reeder scratched his nose and his lips drooped dolefully.

"I was hoping—um—that I should not see that distressing stream again for a very long time."

He sat down and listened patiently to a string of uninteresting facts. Joe Attymar brought bricks up the river—had been bringing them for many years—at a price slightly lower than his competitors. He carried for four builders, and apparently did a steady, if not too prosperous, trade. He was believed locally to be rolling in money, but that is a reputation which Shadwell Lane applied to any man or woman who was not forced at frequent intervals to make a call at a local pawnshop. He kept himself to himself, was a sly customer, and had no apparent interests outside of his brick-laying.

"Fascinating," murmured Mr. Reeder. "It sounds almost like a novel, doesn’t it?"

After he had gone:

"I don’t see what there is fascinating about it," said Mason, who did not know Mr. Reeder very well.

"That’s his idea of being funny," said Gaylor.

It was a week later, and the Alhonna lay at anchor off Queensborough, when a small boat, rowed by a local boatman, carrying a solitary passenger, came slowly out, under the watchful and suspicious eye of Ligsey. The boat rowed alongside the barge, and Ligsey had a view of a man with a square hat and lop-sided pince-nez, who sat in the stern of the boat, an umbrella between his legs, mentally making a map of the big handle; and, seeing him, Ligsey, who knew a great deal about the river and its scandals, started up from his seat with an exclamation.

He was blinking stupidly at the occupant of the small boat when Mr. Reeder came up to him.

"Good morning," said Mr. Reeder.

Ligsey said nothing.

"I suppose I should say ‘afternoon,’" continued the punctilious Mr. Reeder. "Is the captain aboard?"

Ligsey cleared his throat.

"No, sir, he isn’t."

"I suppose you wouldn’t object if I came aboard?"

Mr. Reeder did not wait for the answer, but, with surprising agility, drew himself up on to the narrow deck of the barge. He looked round, with mild interest, the hatches were off, and he had a good view of the cargo.

"Bricks are very interesting things," he said pleasantly. "Without bricks we should have no houses; without straw we should have no bricks. It seems, therefore, a very intelligent act to pack bricks in straw, to remind them, as it were, of what they owe to this humble—um—vegetable."

Ligsey did not speak, but swallowed something.

"What I want to know," Mr. Reeder went on, and his eyes were never still, "is this. Would it be possible to hire this barge?"

"You’ll have to ask the captain about that," said Ligsey huskily.

"There was a shade paler. The stories of Reeder that had come down the river had gained in the telling. He was credited with supernatural powers of divination; his knowledge and perspicacity were unbounded. For the first time in years, Ligsey found himself confronted with the slowly-moving machinery of the law; it was a little terrifying, and the emotions were not all what he had anticipated. He used to tell Joe Attymar:

"If they ever come to me I’ll give ‘em a saucy answer."

And here “they” had come to him, and no saucy answer hovered on his lips. He felt totally inadequate.

"When are you expecting the captain?" asked Mr. Reeder, in his blandest manner.

"Tonight or to-morrow—I don’t know," stammered Ligsey. "He’ll pick us up, I suppose."

"Gone ashore for dispatches?" asked Mr. Reeder pleasantly. "Or possibly to wire to the owners? No, no, it couldn’t be that—no, sir, the owner. How interesting! He’ll be coming off in a few moments with sealed orders under his arm. Will you tell me—pointed to the hold—why you leave that square aperture in the bricks? Is that one of the secrets of packing, or shall I say stowage?"

Ligsey went whiter.

"We always leave it like that," he said, and did not recognise the sound of his own voice.

Mr. Reeder would have descended to the cabin, but the hatch was padlocked. He did invite himself down to the little cubby-hole in the corner of the boat where Ligsey and the boy slept; and, strangely enough, Mr. Reeder carried in his pocket, although it was broad daylight, a very powerful electric hand-lamp which revealed every corner of Ligsey’s living-place. It had never been revealed before.
The THRILLER

"Rather squalid, isn't it?" asked Mr. Reeder. "A terrible thing to have to live in these circumstances and conditions. But, of course, one can live in a much worse place."

He made this little speech after his return to the deck, and was fanning himself with the brim of his high-crowned hat.

"One can live, for example," he went on, surveying the picturesque shëre of Queenborough vacantly, "in a nice clean prison. I know plenty of men who would rather live in prison than at—um—Buckingham Palace—though, of course, I have no knowledge that they've ever been invited to Buckingham Palace. But not respectable men, with wives and families."

Ligsey's face was a blank.

"With girls and mothers." Ligsey winced.

"They would prefer to remain outside. And, of course, they can remain outside if they're only sufficiently sensible to make a statement to the police."

He took from his pocket a book and handed it almost timorously to Ligsey.

"I live there," said Mr. Reeder, and I'll be glad to see you any time you're passing. Are you interested in poultry?"

Ligsey was interested in nothing.

Mr. Reeder signalled to the batman, who pulled the skiff aside, and he stepped down into the boat and was rowed back to the shore.

There was one who had seen him come and had watched him leave by the skiff. When night fell, Joe Attyman rowed out to the barge and found a very perturbed lieutenant.

"Old Reeder's been here," blurted Ligsey, but Joe stopped him with a gesture.

"Want to tell the world about it?" he snarled. "Come aft!"

The thick-set young man followed his commander.

"I know Reeder's been here—I've seen him. What did he want?"

Briefer Ligsey told him quite a number of unimportant details about the visit. It was not remarkable that he did not make any reference to the card or to Mr. Reeder's invitation.

"That's done it," said Ligsey, when he had finished. "Old Reeder's got a nose like a hawk. Asked me a lot of questions about that hole in the bricks. I've never had to deal with a detective before—"

"You haven't, eh?" sneered the other.

"Who was that waterman who came aboard off Graveshave that night? And why did I drop half a hundredweight of good stuff overboard, eh? You fool! We've had half a dozen of these fellows on board, all of 'em cleverer than Reeder. Did he ask you to tell him anything?"

"No," said Ligsey instantly.

Joe Attyman thought for a little time, and then:

"We'll get up the anchor. I'm not waiting for the Dutch boat," he said.

Ligsey's sigh of relief was audible at the other end of the barge.

DEATH.

This visit of Reeder's was the culmina- tion of a series of inquiries he had con- ducted in the course of a few days. He turned in a short report to Scotland Yard, and went home to Brookley Road, overtaking Johnny Southers as he turned from Lewisham High Road. Johnny was not alone.

"Anna and I were discussing you," he said, as they suited their steps to match the more leisurely pace of Mr. Reeder. "Is it possible for us to see you for five minutes?"

It was possible. Mr. Reeder ushered them up to his big, old-fashioned sitting-room, inwardly hoping that the consultation would have no reference to the mysterious work- ings of the young and human heart.

They were going to get married.

"Anna's father knows, and he's been awfully decent about it," said Johnny, "and I'd like you to know, too, Mr. Reeder."

Mr. Reeder murmured something congratulat- ory. That matter of love and living was a gay rate sheet.

"And Desboye has been awfully decent. I told Anna all about that rather unpleasant little scene you witnessed—he never told her a word. He wrote apologising to Anna, and wrote an apology to me. He has offered me a very good position in Singapore, if I care to take it. He's terribly rich, and it sounds very good."

"I don't mean good to me." Anna's voice was decisive.

"I appreciate Clive's generosity, but I don't think Johnny ought to give up his Civil Service work except for something better in England. I want you to persuade him, Mr. Reeder."

Mr. Reeder looked from one to the other dismally. The idea of persuading anybody to do anything in which he himself was not greatly absorbed filled him with dismay. As a mentor to the young he recognised his limitations. He liked Johnny Southers as he liked any decent young fellow. He thought of Clive Desboye as an extraordinary pretty; but even these two facts in con- junction could not arouse him to enthusiasm.

"I don't want much persuading," said Johnny, to his relief. "I've got something else up my sleeve—a pretty big thing. I'm not at liberty to talk about it; in fact, I've been asked not to. If that comes off, the Singapore job will be refused. It isn't so very difficult now. The point is this, Mr. Reeder: if you were offered a partnership in a thriving concern, that could be made into something very big if one put one's heart and soul into it, would you accept?"

"That's what I wanted to see you about, Mr. Reeder," Anna nodded slowly. "I'm so terribly afraid of Johnny leaving the service for an uncertainty, and I do want him to talk the matter over with you. I don't want to know his secrets—there was the ghost of a smile in her eyes—'I think I know most of them that count.'"

Mr. Reeder looked round miserably. He felt himself caught and entangled in a net- work of lies. He was, if the truth be told, immensely bored, and, had he been more temperamentally, he might have screamed. He wished he had not overtaken the suffering lovers, or that they would supply to one of the caped ideologicals which maintain a department devoted to advising the young and the sentimental in the choice of their careers. It was with the greatest humanity to his good fortune that he clung upon their small mystery and devoted himself to the serious business of high tea.

Mr. Reeder had many anxieties to occupy his mind in the next few days, and the fact that he had added Joe Attyman to the list of his enemies, even if he were aware of the fact, was not one of these.

In the gaols of a dozen counties were men who actively disliked him. Meister, of Hamburg, who used to sell United States bills by the hundredweight; Lefère, the clever wholesale engraver of line notes; Monsatta, who specialised in English rivers; Monniron, and of course, many years ago, was the chief distributor of forged money in Eastern and Southern Europe; Al Selinski, the paper maker; Don Leishner, who printed French miles by the thousand—knew Mr. Reeder least by name, and none of them had a good word for him except Monsatta, who was large- minded and could detest himself from his personal misfortunes to put clays upon their small mystery and devoted himself to the serious business of high tea.

Letters came to Mr. Reeder from many peculiar sources. It was a curious fact that a very large number of Mr. Reeder's correspondents were women. A number of the letters which came to him were of a most embarrassing character.

His name had been mentioned in many cases that had been heard at the Old Bailey. He himself had, from time to time, stood up in the witness stand, a lugubrious and unhappy figure, and had given evidence in his hesitant and deferential way against all manner of wrongdoers, but mostly forgers.

He was variously described as "an expert," as "a public prosecutor," and as "a bank official." In a sense he was all these, yet none of them entirely. Judges and certain barristers knew that he was at the very bottom of the social scale.

It was said that privately he enjoyed a status equivalent in rank to a superintendent of police. He certainly had a handsomely retaining fee from the Bankers' Association, and probably drew pay from the Government, but no one knew his business. He banked at Torquay, and the manager of the bank was his personal friend.

But the net result of his fugitive appear- nces in court was that quite intelligent women were seized with the idea that he was the man who should be employed to watch over them and safeguard their evidence necessary for their divorces. Business men wrote to him asking him to investigate the private lives of their partners; quite a few were under great commercial concerns, but none of these appealed to Mr. Reeder, and with his own hand he would write long and carefully-punctuated letters to Mr. Reeder, and addressing him as a private detective in the real sense of the word. He was not surprised, therefore, when, some four days after his talk with Johnny Southers, he was addressed from a Park Lane flat, requesting his services. He turned first to the signature, and, with some difficulty, deciphered it as "Clive Desboye." For a moment the name, whilst it had a certain familiarity, was difficult to attach, and then he remembered the quarrel he had witnessed, and realised that this was the other party to that unhappy conflict.
The letter was typewritten, and ran:

"Dear Sir,—I happen to know your private address because Miss Welford pointed it out to me one evening when I was visiting her. I am in rather a delicate position, and I am wondering whether I could employ your services professionally to extricate myself? Since the matter affects Southerns, whom I think you know (I have learned since that you were a witness of a certain disgraceful episode, for which I was probably more to blame than he), I thought you might be willing to receive me. I want you to undertake this task on a professional basis and charge me your usual fees. I shall be out of town until Friday night, but there is no immediate urgency. If I could call some time after ten on Friday
I should be eternally grateful.—
Yours, etc."

Mr. Reeder's first inclination was to take out a sheet of paper and write a firm, but polite, note of refusal to see Mr. Deshoyez, however stringent might be his predicament.
He had written the first three words when one of those curious impulses which came to him at times, and which so often urged him to the right course, stayed his hand. Instead, he took a telegraph form and sent a laconic message agreeing to the young man's suggestion.
The day of the appointment was a busy one for Mr. Reeder. Scotland Yard had made two important discoveries—a small garage in the north of London which contained nearly 400 lbs. of saccharine had been raided in the early hours of the morning, and this was followed up by a second raid in a West End mansion flat, where large quantities of heroin and cocaine were unearthed by the police.

"It looks as though we've found one of the principal distributing agents," said Gaylor. "We've got the barge under observation, and we're taking the chance of arresting Attymar as soon as he steps on board."

"Where is it?"

"Off Greenwich," said Gaylor.
Mr. Reeder dipped down into his pocket and produced an envelope. The paper was grimey, the address was a scrawl. He took from this as dingy a letter and laid it on the table before Gaylor.

As the waterman brought his boat under the hull of the steamer a wooden case was heaved through a port hole.

"Dear Sir,—I can give you information.
I will call at your house on Sunday morning.—From a Friend."

Gaylor inspected the envelope. The date-stamp was "Greenwich."
"The SILENT SIX"
A powerful long complete novel by
T. ARTHUR PLUMMER appears in next week's issue of
The THRILLER
Order your copy to-day.
Your newsagent may sell out.

Mr. Reeder, with a murmured apology, took up the receiver and listened with a face that did not move. He only asked "What time?" and, after a long pause, said "Yes." As he was hanging up the receiver, Desboyne went over:

"What I should like to do is to see Attyman—"

Mr. Reeder shook his head.

"I'm afraid you won't see Attyman. He was murdered between nine and ten this night."

The ARREST.

It was half-passed eleven when Mr. Reeder's taxi brought him into Shadwick Lane, which was alive with people. A police cordon was drawn across the gate, but Gaylor, who was waiting for him, conducted him into the yard.

"We're dragging the river for the body," he explained.

"Where was it committed?" asked Mr. Reeder.

"Come inside," said the other grimly, "and then you will ask no questions."

It was not a pleasant sight that met Mr. Reeder's eyes, though he was a man now a great deal older. The effect of the body was a confusion of smashed furniture, the walls splashed with red. A corner table, however, had been left untouched. Here were two glasses of whisky, one full, the other half-poured. A half-eaten sandwich and a crumpled newspaper carefully laid on a piece of paper by the side of these.

"The murder—or perhaps I should say murders—were committed here, and the bodies dragged to the stream by the force of the current and thrown into the water," said Gaylor.

"There's plenty of evidence of that. Seems that Ligeys was outed as well as Attyman."

"We've taken possession of a lot of papers, and we found a letter on the mantelpiece from a man named Southers—John Southers. No address, but evidently from a man having a writing for some education. At nine-thirty to night Attyman had a visitor, a young man, who was admitted through the wicket-gate and who was seen to leave at twenty-five minutes to ten, about ten minutes after Attyman died."

Gaylor opened an attaché-case and took out a battered, cheap silver watch, which had evidently been under somebody's heel. The glass was smashed, the case had been out of shape. The hands stood at nine-thirty.

"One of the people here recognised this as Ligeys's—a woman who lives in the street, who had pawned it for him on one occasion. It's important, because it probably gives us the hour of the murder, if you allow the watch to be a little fast or slow. It's hardly likely to be ten minutes out. We have sent a description round of Southers, though it isn't a very good one, but it will probably be sufficient. I'm having a facsimile of the writing—"

"Can you do me the trouble; here is the young man's address."

Mr. Reeder took a notebook from his pocket, scribbled a few lines, and handed it to the detective. He handed it solemnly to the bloodstained room and the evidence of tragedy, followed the detective in silence, whilst Gaylor, with the aid of a powerful light, showed the tell-tale stains leading from the wharf, and...

"Very interesting," said Mr. Reeder.

"When you recover the bodies I should like to see them."

He stared out over the river, which was... covered by a faint mist—not sufficient to impede navigation, but enough to shroud and make indistinct objects thirty or forty yards away.

"The barge is at Greenwich, I think," he said, after a long silence. "Could I borrow a police launch?"

One of the launchers was brought into the crazy wharf and Mr. Reeder lowered himself gingerly, never losing grip of the umbrella, which no man had seen unfurled. It was a chilly night, an easterly wind blowing up the river, but he sat in the bow of the launch motionless, sphinx-like, staring ahead as the boat streaked eastwards towards Greenwich.

It drew up by the side of the barge, which was moored close to the Surrey shore, and a quavering voice hailed them.

"That you, Ligsey?"

Mr. Reeder pulled himself on board before he replied. "No, my boy," he said gently, "it is not Ligsey. Were you expecting him?"

The youth held up his lantern, surveyed Mr. Reeder, and visibly quailed. "You’re a copper, ain’t ye?" he asked, tremulously. "Have you pinched Ligsey?"

"I have not pinched Ligsey," said Mr. Reeder, patting the boy gently on the back. "How long has he been gone?"

"He went about eight, soon after it was lark; the guv’nor come down for him."

"The guv’nor come down for him," repeated Mr. Reeder in a murmur. "Did you see the governor?"

"No, sir; he shouted for me to go below. Ligsey always makes me go below when him and the guv’nor have a talk."

Mr. Reeder drew from his pocket a yellow carton of cigarettes and lit one before he pursued his inquiries. "Then what happened?"

"Ligsey come down and packed his ditty box, and told me I was to hang on all night, but that I could go to sleep. I was frightened about being left alone on the barge."

Mr. Reeder was already making his way down the companion to Ligsey’s quarters. Evidently all the man’s kit had been removed; even the sheets on his bed must have been folded and taken away, for the bunk was tumbled.

On a little swing table, which was a four-foot plank suspended from the deck above, was a letter. It was not fastened, and Mr. Reeder made no scruple in opening and reading its contents. It was in the hand-script which he had been informed was the only kind of writing Attyman knew.

"Dear Mr. Southers,—If you come aboard, the stuff is in the engine-room. I have got to be careful, because the police are watching."

When he questioned the boy, whose name was Hobbs, he learned that Ligsey had come down and left the letter. Mr. Reeder went aft and found the hatchway over the little engine-room unfastened, and descended into the strong-smelling depths, where the engine was housed. It was here, evidently, that Attyman remained during his short voyages. There was a signal bell above his head and a comfortable armchair had been fixed within reach of the levers.

His search here was a short one. Inside an open locker he found a small, square package, wrapped in oiled paper, and a glance at the label told him its contents, even though he did not read Dutch.

Returning to the boy, he questioned him closely. It was no unusual thing for Attyman to pick up his mate from the barge. The boy had once seen the launch, and described it as a very small tender. He knew nothing of Mr. Southers, had never seen him on board the ship, though occasionally people did come on which occasions he was sent below.

At his request, Mr. Reeder was put ashore at Greenwich and got on the telephone to Gaylor. It was now two o’clock in the morning, and much had happened. "We arrested that man Southers; found his trousers covered with blood. He admits he was at Attyman’s house to-night, and tells a cock-and-bull story of what he did subsequently. He didn’t get home till nearly twelve."

"Extraordinary," said Mr. Reeder, and the mildness of the comment evidently irritated Inspector Gaylor.

"That’s one way of putting it, but I think we’ve made a pretty good capture," he said. "We’ve got enough evidence to hang him! Attyman’s left all sorts of notes on his invoices."

"Amazing," said Mr. Reeder, and gathered from the abruptness with which..."
About this Red-Robed Villain

Presuming you have already perused the long complete story in this issue of The THRILLER, I venture to suggest you have never read anything more exciting from the pen of Edgar Wallace, the most popular author of mystery stories. True you have had to wait a few weeks for this latest adventure of Mr. Reeder, but I feel sure you will agree that patience has brought its own reward.

"The Creek in Crimson" is a typical Edgar Wallace yarn. It provides full measure of drama, thrill, mystery and humour of a kind unique to the ingenuity and personality of the Master of Mystery. Only Edgar Wallace could have produced the amazing adventures of J. G. Reeder in search of The Creek in Crimson, just as only Leslie Charteris could have told The Story of a Dead Man, or Hugh Clevley produced Lynch Law. So we must add this week's gripping story to the many triumphs of both its talented author and The THRILLER. This is the third novel especially contributed to this paper by Mr. Wallace. There is no denying, that to place in your hands a novel-length story by the premier thriller author of the day, at the cost of twopenny-halfpenny achievement never previously considered possible. We are proud of what we have done. Proud, too, of the gigantic circulation by which you have shown your appreciation.

It will interest you to know that the manuscript of "The Creek in Crimson" came to hand when No. 7 of The THRILLER was about to be printed. Regardless of cost incurred by the re-arrangement, necessitating the holding up of printing machines and rush work for all concerned, everything was put aside, in order to put Edgar Wallace's latest story in your hands at the earliest possible date.

We now await the word from Mr. Wallace that another story for this paper is being prepared. You will understand that the preparation of a novel takes time, and requires much thought and construction, until it gives complete satisfaction. However, it is hoped that definite news will come along soon.

In launching The THRILLER, our project was highly ambitious, but I believe we have already proved to you that stories of the highest standard have been maintained week by week. An exceptionally large number of letters have come to hand asking for more stories like "The Creek in Crimson" in last week's issue. I am so confident that the long complete novel by Gwyn Evans would be enthusiastically received, that I promptly commissioned further stories from him.

Next week you will enjoy "The Silent Six," a splendid story by T. Arthur Plummer. This author is already recognized as a leader in the world of thriller fiction, and I have not the slightest hesitation in assuring you that the new novel will be as good as the first-rate thriller fiction. It is bound to please you, so make it the foremost thought of the week not to miss reading "The Silent Six."

In the meantime, don't forget to keep a sharp look-out for announcements of future stories by Edgar Wallace and other star authors. Every effort has been made to keep The THRILLER on the top note of quality, and you may rest assured that this standard will be maintained.

Yours sincerely,

The Editor.
He looked at the watch on his wrist.

"It's too late to ask you to breakfast," said Mr. Reeder gaily.

"Breakfast is my favourite meal," said Mr. Desboye.

Late as the hour, he was standing before the polished mahogany door of 974, Memorial Mansions, Park Lane, at nine o'clock next morning. Mr. Desboye was not so early a riser, and indeed had doubted whether their detective would keep his promise. Mr. Reeder was left standing in the hall whilst the servant went to inquire exactly how this strangely appearing gentleman should be disposed of.

There was plenty to occupy Mr. Reeder's attention during her absence, for the wide hall was hung with photographs which gave some indication of Desboye's wide sporting and theatrical interests. There was one interesting photograph, evidently an enlargement of a snapshot, showing the House of Commons in the background, which held Mr. Reeder's attention, the more so as the photograph also showed the corner of Westminster Bridge, across which motor buses were moving. He was looking at this when Clive Desboye joined him.

"There is a piece of detective work," said Mr. Reeder triumphantly, pointing to the photograph. "I can tell you almost the whole story that picture was taken. Do you see those two omnibuses bearing the names of two plays? I happen to know there was only one week in the year when they were both running (younger) together --"

"Indeed," said Desboye, apparently not impressed by this piece of deduction as Mr. Reeder had expected.

He led the way to the dining-room, and Reeder found by the side of his plate three foolscap sheets covered with writing.

"I don't know whether you'll be able to read it," said Desboye, "but you'll notice there are two things that I forgot to tell you at our interview. I think, on the whole, they favour Southerns, and I'm glad I made a note of them. For example, he said he had never seen Attymar, and only knew him by name. That in itself is rather curious."

"Very," said Mr. Reeder. "Regarding that photograph in the hall—it must have been in May last year. I remember some years ago, by a lucky chance, I was able to establish the date on which a cheque was passed as distinct from the date on which it was drawn by the fact that the drawer had forgotten to sign one of his initials."

It was surprising how much Mr. Reeder, who was not as a rule a loquacious man, talked in that short interview. Mr. Reeder talked about nothing. When Clive Desboye led him to the murder Mr. Reeder skillfully edged away to less unpleasant topics.

"It doesn't interest me very much, I confess," he said. "I am not a member of the—um—Criminal Investigation Department. I was merely directed to deal with this man's smuggling—and he seems to have smuggled pretty extensively. It is distressing that young Southerns is implicated. He seems a nice boy, and has rather a sane view of the care of chickens. For example, he was telling me that he had an incubator."

At the end of the meal he asked permission to take away the notes for study, and this favour was granted.

He was at the house in Shadwell Lane half an hour later. Gaylor, who had arranged to meet there at the time, had arrived, and Mr. Reeder had two men who had had semi-permanent jobs on the wharf. It was the duty of one to open and close the gates and pilot the ferries to their positions. He had also (as had his companion) to assist at the loading.

They had not seen much of Attymar all the years they had been there. He usually came in on one of the night or early-morning tides. Ligeay paid them their wages.

"There was never any change," said one mournfully. "We ain't had the gates painted since I've bin here—we've had the same little anvil to keep the gate open—"

He looked round, first one side and then the other. The same little anvil was not there.

"Funny," he said.

Mr. Reeder agreed. Who would steal a rusty little anvil? He saw the place where it had lain; the impression of it still stood in the dusty earth.

Later came Gaylor, in a hurry to show him over the other rooms of the house. There was a kitchen, a rather spacious cellar, which was closed by a heavy door, and one bed-room, that had been divided into two unequal parts by a wooden partition. The bed-room was simply but cleanly furnished. There was a bed and bedstead, a dressing-table with a large mirror, and a chest of drawers, which was empty. Indeed, there was no article of Attymar's visible, except an old razor, a stubby shaving-brush and six worn shirts, that had been washed until they were threadbare.

From the centre of the ceiling hung an electric light with an opalescent shade; another light hung over a small oak desk, in which, Gaylor informed him, most of the documents in the case had been found. But Mr. Reeder's chief interest was in the mirror and in the greasy smear, which ran from the top left-hand corner almost along the top of the mirror. The glass itself was supported by two little mahogany pillars, and to the top of each of these was attached a piece of string.

"Most amusing," said Mr. Reeder, speaking his thoughts aloud.

"Remind me to laugh," said Mr. Gaylor heavily. "What is amusing?"

For answer Mr. Reeder put up his hand and ran the tip of his finger along the smear. Then he began to prowl around the apartment, obviously looking for something, and as obviously disappointed that it could not be found.

"No, nothing has been taken out of here," said Gaylor, in answer to his question. "Except the papers. Here's something that may amuse you more."

He opened a door leading to the bed-room. Here was a cupboard—it was little bigger. The walls and floor were covered with white tiles, as also was the back of the door. From the ceiling projected a large nozzle, and in one of the walls were two taps.

"How's that for luxury? Shower-bath—hot and cold water. Doesn't that make you laugh?"

"Nothing makes me laugh except the detectives in pictures," said Mr. Reeder.
calmly, returning to the bedroom. "Do you ever go to the pictures, Gaylord?"

The inspector admitted that occasionally he did.

"I like to see detectives in comic films, because they always carry large magnifying glasses. Do they make you laugh?"

"They do," admitted Mr. Gaylord with a contemptuous and reminiscent smile.

Then get ready to howl," said Mr. Reeder, and from his pocket took the largest reading-glass that Gaylord had ever seen.

Under the astonished eyes of the detective, Reeder went down on his knees in the approved fashion, and began carefully to scrutinise the floor. Inch by inch he covered, stopping now and again to pick up something invisible to the Scotland Yard man, and placed it in an envelope, which he had also taken from his pocket.

"Cigar-ash?" asked Gaylord sardonically.

"Almost," said Mr. Reeder.

He went on with his search, suddenly sat back on his heels, his eyes ablaze, and held up a tiny piece of silver paper, less than a quarter of an inch square. Gaylord looked down more closely.

"Oh, it is a cigarette you're looking for?"

But Mr. Reeder was oblivious to all sarcasm. Inside the silver was a scrap of transparent paper, so thin that it seemed part of the tinsel. Very carefully, however, he separated the one from the other, touched it to a few of its edges, and examined his finger-tips.

"Where's the fireplace?" he asked suddenly.

"There's a fireplace in the kitchen—that's the only one,"

Mr. Reeder hurried downstairs and examined this small apartment. There were ashes in the grate, but it was impossible to tell what had been burnt.

"I should like to say," said Gaylord, "that your efforts are wasted, for we've got enough in the diary to hang Southerns twice over. Only I suspect you when you do things unnecessarily."

"The diary?" Mr. Reeder looked up.

"Yes, Attymara's."

"So he kept a diary, did he?" Mr. Reeder was quietly amused. "I should have thought he would, if I had thought about it at all."

Then he frowned.

"Not an ordinary diary, of course? Just an exercise-book. It begins—let me see—shall we say two weeks ago, or three weeks?"

To Inspector Gaylord's astonishment, Reeder went down on his knees, and began carefully to scrutinise the floor through a large reading glass.

Gaylord gazed at him in amazement.

"Mason told you?"

"No, he didn't tell me anything, partly because he hasn't spoken to me. But, of course, it would be in a sort of exercise-book. An ordinary printed diary that began on the first of January would be unthink-able. This case is getting so fascinating that I can hardly stop laughing!"

He was not laughing; he was very serious indeed, as he stood in the untidy yard before the little house and threw his keen glance across its littered surface.

"There is no sign of the tender that brought Ligsey here? The little boy on the barge was much more informative than he imagined! I'll tell you what to look for, shall I? A black, canoe-shaped motor-boat, which might hold three people at a pinch. Remember that—a canoe-shaped boat, say ten feet long."

"Where shall I find it?" asked the fascinated Gaylord.

"At the bottom of the river," said Mr. Reeder calmly, "and in or near it you will find a little anvil which needed to keep the gate open!"

Mr. Reeder had a very large acquaintance with criminals, larger perhaps than the average police officer, whose opportunities are circumscribed by the area to which he is attached; and he knew that the business of detection would be at a standstill if there were such a thing in the world as a really clever criminal. By the just workings of Providence, men who gain their living by the evasion of the law are deprived of the eighth sense which, properly functioning, would keep them out of the hands of the police.

He made yet another survey of the house before he left, pointed out to Gaylord something which that officer had already noticed, namely, the bloodstains on the floor and the wall of a small lobby, which connected the main living-room with the yard.

"Naturally I saw it," said Gaylord, who was inclined to be a little complacent. "My theory is that the fight started in the sitting-room; they struggled out into the passage—"

"That would be impossible," murmured Mr. Reeder.

JOHN SOUTHERS made a brief appearance at the Tower of London Police Court—a dazed, bewildered young man, so overwhelmed by his position that he could do no more than answer the questions put to him by the magistrate's clerk.

Gaylord had seen him earlier in the morning.

"He said nothing, except that he went to Attymara's house—oh, yes, he admits that—by appointment. He says Attymara kept him waiting for some time before he opened the door, and then only allowed him to come into the lobby. He tells some rambling story about Attymara sending him to meet a man at Highgate. In fact, it's the usual man story."

Mr. Reeder nodded. He was not acquainted with that mysterious man who figures in the narratives of all arrested persons. Sometimes it was a man who gave the prisoner the stolen goods, in the possession of which he had been found; sometimes it was the man who asked the other to cash a forged cheque; but always it was a vague somebody who could never be traced. Half the work of investigation which occupied the attention of the detective force consisted of a patient search for men who had no existence except in the imaginations of prisoners under remand.

"Did he see him?" asked Mr. Reeder.

"Gaylord laughed.

"My dear chap, what a question!"

Mr. Reeder fondled his bowy chin.

"Is it possible to—um—have a little chat with our friends?"

Gaylord was dubious, and had reason for his doubt. Chief-Constable Mason, and the high men at headquarters, were at the moment writhing under a periodical wave of criticism that swept across Scotland Yard at regular intervals; and their latest delinquency was the cross-examination of a man under suspicion of a serious crime. There had been questions in Parliament, almost a Royal Commission.

"I doubt it," said Gaylord. "The chief is feeling rather sick about this Hanny business, and, as the kick has come down from your department, it isn't likely that they'll make an exception. I'll ask Mason, and let you know.

Mr. Reeder was home that afternoon when Anna Welford called. She was most amazingly calm. Mr. Reeder, who had shown some hesitation about receiving her, was visibly relieved.

"Have you seen Johnny?" was the first question she asked.

Mr. Reeder shook his head, and explained to her in the strictest sense he was not in the case, and that the police were very jealous of interference.

"Clive has been to see me," she said when he had finished, "and he has told me everything—he is terribly upset."

"Told you everything?" repeated Mr. Reeder.

She nodded.

"About Ligshey, and the story that Clive told you about—understood—in a way. He is doing everything he can for Johnny; he has engaged a lawyer and briefed counsel."

For the second time Mr. Reeder motioned her to a chair, and, when she was seated, continued his own restless pacing.

"If there was any truth in that story, your Johnny should be rather well off," he said. "The wages of sin are rather—um—high. Yet his father told me this morning—I had a brief interview with him—that young Mr. Souther’s bank balance is not an excessive one."

He saw her lower her eyes and heard the quick little sigh.

"They’ve found the money—I thought you knew that," she said in a low voice.

Mr. Reeder halted in his stride and peered down at her.

"They’ve found the money?"

She nodded.

"How came they to find it?"

"The police came and made a search about an hour ago, and they found a box in the tool-shed, with hundreds of pounds in it, all in notes."

Mr. Reeder did not often whistle; he whistled now.

"Does Mr. Desboye know this?" he asked.

She shook her head.

"Clive doesn’t know. It happened after he had left. He’s been terriblynice—" he’s made one confession that isn’t very flattering to me."

Reeder’s eyes twinkled.

"That he is—um—engaged to somebody else?" he suggested, and she stared at him in amazement.

"Do you know?"

"One has heard of such things," said Mr. Reeder gravely.

"I was very glad," she went on, "it removed a lot of pressure — she hesitated—"personal bias. He really is sorry for all he has said and done. Johnny’s trouble has shaken him terribly. Clive thinks that the murder was committed by this man Ligshey."

"Oh!" said Mr. Reeder. "That is interesting."

He stared down at her, pursing his lips thoughtfully.

"The—um—police rather fancy that Mr. Ligshey is dead," he said, and there was a note of irritation in his voice as though he presented the police holding any theory at all. "Quite dead—um—murdered, in fact."

There was a long pause here. He knew instinctively that she had come to make some request, but it was not until she rose to go that she spoke her thoughts.

"Clive wished to see you himself to make a proposition. He said that he did not think you were engaged on the—official side of the case and he has a tremendous opinion of your cleverness, Mr. Reeder; and so of course, have I. Is it humanly possible for you to take up this case—on Johnny’s side, I mean? Perhaps I’m being silly, but just now I’m clutching at straws."

Mr. Reeder was looking out of the window, his head moving slowly from side to side.

"I’m afraid not," he said. "I really am afraid not! The police on your—um—friend’s side are the police. If he is innocent, I am naturally on his side with them. Don’t you see, young lady, that when we prove a man’s guilt we also prove everybody else’s innocence."

It was a long speech for Mr. Reeder, and he had not quite finished. He stood with his hands deep in his pockets, his eyes half closed, his body swaying to and fro.

"Let me see now—if Ligshey were alive? A very dense and stupid young man, quite incapable, I should have thought, of—um—so many things that have happened during the last twenty-four hours."

After Anna had left, he went to Southers’ home and interviewed Johnny’s father. The old man was bearing his sorrow remarkably well. Indeed, his principal emotion was a loud fury against the people who dared accuse his son.

He led the way to the tool-shed in the yard and showed the detective just where the box had been hidden.

"Personally, I never go into the shed. It’s Johnny’s little cubby hutch," he said.

"The boy is fond of gardening, and, like you, Mr. Reeder, has a fancy for poultry."

"Is the shed kept locked?"

"No; I’ve never seen it locked," said old Souther.

The place from which the box had been extracted was at the far end of the shed. It had been concealed behind a bag of chicken-seed.

Mr. Reeder took a brief survey of the garden—it was an oblong strip of ground, measuring about a hundred yards by twenty. At the further end of the garden was a wall which marked the boundary of the garden which backed on to it. The garden could be approached either from the door leading to a small glass conservatory, or along a narrow gravel strip which ran down one side of the house. Ingress, however, was barred by a small door stretched across the narrow path.

"But it’s seldom locked," said Souther.

"We leave it open for the milkman; he goes round to the kitchen that way in the morning."

Mr. Reeder went back to the garden and walked slowly along the gravel path which ran between two large flower-beds. At the farther end was a wired-in chicken run. Mr. Reeder surveyed the flower-beds meditatively.

"Nobody has dug up the garden?" he asked, and, when the other replied in the negative: "Then I should do a bit of digging myself if I were you, Mr. Souther," he said gently; "and whether you tell the police what you find, or do not tell the police, is entirely a matter for your own conscience."

He looked up at the sky for a long time as though he were expecting to see an aeroplane, and then:"

"If it is consistent with your—um—science to say nothing about your discovery, and if you removed it or them to a safe place where it or they would not be found, it might be to the advantage of your son in the not too distant future."
Mr. Southers was a little agitated, more than a little bewildered, when Mr. Reeder took his leave. He was to learn that the bias on his activities in regard to the Attymar had been strengthened rather than relaxed, and he experienced a genteel, but malignant, pleasure in the thought that in one respect he had made his task more difficult.

It was Gaylor who brought the news.

"I spoke to the chief about your seeing Southers in Brixton, but he thought it was best if you kept out of the case until the witnesses are tested."

Mr. Reeder's duties in the Public Prosecutor's Department were to examine witnesses prior to their appearance in court, to test the strength or the weakness of their testimony, and he had been employed in this capacity before his official connection with the department was made definite.

"At the same time," Gaylor went on, "if you can pick up anything we'll be glad to have it."

"Naturally," mumbled Mr. Reeder.

"I mean, you may by accident hear things—you know these people, they live in the same street—and I think you know the young lad is engaged to her?"

Mr. Reeder inclined his head.

"There's another thing, Mr. Reeder," Gaylor evidently felt he was treading on delicate ground, having summarily declined and rejected the assistance of his companion. "If you should hear from Ligsaw—"

"A voice from the grave," interrupted Mr. Reeder.

"Well, there is a rumour about that he's not dead. In fact, the boy on the barge, Hobbs, says that Ligsaw came alongside last night in a skiff and told him to keep his mouth shut about what he'd seen and heard. My own belief is that the boy was dreaming, but one of Ligsaw's pals said he'd also seen him or heard him—I don't know which. That's a line of investigation you might take on for your own amusement."

"Investigation doesn't amuse me," said Mr. Reeder calmly; "it bores me. It wears me. It brings me in a certain—um—income, but it doesn't amuse me."

"Well," said the detective awkwardly, "if it interests you, that's a line you might take up."

"I shall not dream of taking up any line at all. It means work, and I do not like work."

Here, however, he was permitting himself to romance.

That afternoon he spent in the neighbourhood which Ligsaw knew best. He talked with men and women, little old women who kept tiny and unremunerative shops, and the consequence of all his oblique questioning was that he made a call in Little Calais Street, where lived an unpossessing young lady who had gained certain social recognition—her portrait would appear in the next morning's newspapers—because she had been engaged to the missing man. She had, in fact, walked out with him, amongst others, for the greater part of a year.

Miss Rosie Loop did not suggest romance; she was short, rather stout, had bad teeth, and a red face; but for the moment she imparted a knowledge that she had been associated with the Press.

"Who shall I say it is?" asked her blowzy mother, who answered the door.

The Editor of The Times," said Mr. Reeder without hesitation.

In the stuffy little kitchen where the bereaved fiancé was eating bread and jam, Mr. Reeder was given a clean Windsor chair, and sat down to hear the exciting happenings of the previous night.

"I haven't told the Press yet," said Rosie, who had a surprisingly shrill voice for one so thick-lipped for the deeper tones.

"He come last night. I sleep upstairs with mother, and whenever he used to anchor off the creek he used to come ashore, no matter what time it was, and throw up a couple of stones to let me know he was here. About 'arf past two it was last night, and, lord, it gave me a start!"

"He threw the stones to let you know he was there?" suggested Mr. Reeder.

She nodded violently.

"And was it Mr. Ligsaw?"

"It was him!" she said dramatically. "I wouldn't go to the window for a long time, but mother said 'Don't be such a fool, a ghost can't hurt yer,' and then I pulled up the sash, and there he was in his old black coat! I asked him where he'd bin, but he was in a 'urry. Told me not to get worried about him, as he was all right."

"How did he look?" asked Mr. Reeder.

She rolled her head impatiently.

"Didn't I tell you he was the middle of the night? But that's what he said—Don't get worried about anything—and then he popped off."

"And you popped in?" said Mr. Reeder pleasantly. "He didn't have a cold, or anything, did he?"

Her mouth opened.

"You seen him? Where is he?"

"I haven't seen him, but he had a cold?"

"Yes, he had," she admitted; "and so would you 'ave if you 'ad to go up and down that river all day and night. It's a horrible life. He's going to give it up. He's bound to get some money if he comes forward and tells the police the truth. It was very funny, me thinkin' he was dead. We'd bin to buy our black—hadn't we, mother?"

Mother offered a hoarse confirmation.

"And all the papers sayin' he was dead, an' dragging the river for him, an' that Captain Attymar. He used to treat Ligsaw like a dog."

"He hasn't written to you?" She shook her head.

"He was never a one for writing."

"What time was this?"

She could tell him exactly, because she had heard the Greenwich clock striking the half-hour.

Mr. Reeder might have been bored with investigation, but he found some satisfaction in boredom.

Mr. Amanuma still lay off Greenwich, and he hired a boat to take him to the barge. The Master Hobbs was still on board, and even the fact that he was now commander did not compensate him for his loneliness, though, pappishly, the police had supplied him with food and had arranged to relieve him that evening.

He was very emphatic about the visitation of Ligsaw. He had rowed alongside and whistled to the boy—the whistle had wakened him. From under the companion steps he had looked over and seen him sitting in the boat, a big white bandage round his head. Miss Rosie had said nothing about the white bandage, but calling on his way home, Reeder had confirmation.

"Yes, I forgot to tell you about that," said Rosie. "I see it under 'is at. I said: 'What's that white round your head? Fancy me forgettin' to tell you that?'

As a matter of form Mr. Reeder, when he got home that night, jotted down certain sequences.

At some time after eight on the night of the murder Attymar had come in a launch, had collected Ligsaw and taken him towards London. At nine-thirty John Soutberras had called at Attymar's house, and, according to his story, had been sent on a fool's errand to Highgate. At some time about eleven o'clock the murder had been discovered.

Mr. Reeder put down his pen and frowned.

"That's old and stupid," he said, reached for the telephone, and called a number to which he knew Gaylor would certainly be attached at that hour.

It was Gaylor's clerk who answered him, and, after four minutes' wait, Gaylor himself spoke.

"Have you found anything, Mr. Reeder?"

"I find I am suffering from a slight softening of the brain," said Mr. Reeder pleasantly. "Do you realise I never asked how the murder was discovered?"

He heard Gaylor laugh.

"Didn't I tell you? It was very simple. A policeman on his beat found the wretched door open, saw the lantern on the ground and the other lantern burning in the lobby of the house. What's the matter?"

Mr. Reeder was laughing.

"That's a story," he said at last. "Are you sure there wasn't an alarm-bell ringing?"
"I didn't hear of any alarm-bell—in fact, I don't know that there is one."

Mr. Reeder exchanged a few commonplace, denied that he was making any inquiries about Ligeo, and hanging up the receiver, sat back in his chair, his hands clasped about his middle, and real amusement in his eyes.

Later he had a call from the solicitor engaged to defend young Southers. He also suggested that Mr. Reeder should place his services at the call of the defence; but again he refused.

Opening the telephone directory, he found the number of Mr. Clive Desboyne, and it was that gentleman who answered his call.

"That's queer; I was just going to ring you up," said Desboyne. "Have you taken up the case?"

"I am wavering," replied Reeder. "Before I reach a decision I'd like to have another talk with you. Could I call at your flat tonight about—nine?"

There was a little pause.

It was not a pleasant sight that met their eyes. The room was a confusion of smashed furniture, and blood was splattered about the place.
“Certainly. I was going out, but I’ll wait in for you.”

At the conclusion of this call Mr. Reeder again leaned back in his chair, but this time he was not smiling; he was not even pleased. Perhaps he was thinking of Ligesey; possibly he was impressed by the generosity of this man who was ready to spend a considerable part of his fortune to prove the innocence of a man he disliked.

Whatever trains of thought started and slowed, switched into side-tracks, or ran off into tributary lines, they all arrived at one mysterious destination.

“It will be spring cleaning,” said Mr. Reeder as he got up from his chair.

THE REVOLVER CLUE.

Reeder spent the rest of the afternoon at the West End of London, calling upon a succession of theatrical agents. Some were very important personages who received him in walnut-paneled salons; a few were in dingy offices on the floors above; all were important. But the most important of these, he interviewed in the bar of a public-house in St. Martin’s Lane—a fat and seedy man, with a fur collar and frayed cuffs, a half-tupped tippler who no one knew by name. And, as he proudly claimed, “the best collection of old theatrical programmes in London.”

Mr. Reeder, who was a good listener and very patient, heard all about the agent’s former grandeur, the amount of commission out of which eminent artists had swindled him, and at last he accompanied his bibulous companion to his lodging off the Waterloo Road, and from seven till eight was engrossed in masses of dog-cared literature.

Mr. Reeder had a meal in a Strand restaurant and drove to Park Lane. As the lift carried him to the floor on which Desboye’s flat was situated—“I’m sure it’s spring cleaning,” murmured Mr. Reeder to himself.

He rang the bell of the flat and waited. Presently he heard the sound of footsteps echoing hollowly in the hall. Clive Desboye opened the door with an apologetic smile.

“I hope you don’t mind the place being in confusion?” he said. “We’ve started our spring cleaning. The truth is, I’d arranged to go away to-day if this wretched business hadn’t turned up.”

The carpet had been taken up from the floor of the hall, the walls had been stripped, and the crystal pendant which lit the hall showed through a gauze covering. Clive Desboye was of medium height, but he had been left untouched by the decorators.

“I’m going to clear out to an hotel to-morrow. It’ll probably be the Ritz-Carlton, but if you want me urgently my solicitors will be able to put me in touch. Now, Mr. Reeder, you’re going to do this for Anna and me?”

Mr. Reeder shook his head feebly.

“You’ve got to do it,” insisted the other energetically. “You’re the only detective in London——”

“I know you’re attached to the Public Prosecutor’s Department, but I’ve been making a few inquiries, too,” he said with a little smile, “and I hear that you take outside commissions.”

“Banks,” said Mr. Reeder reverently.

“I’m afraid,” he said, “that my story is true, and that Southerns was making something on the side. A lot of decent fellows, otherwise perfectly honest, do that sort of thing, and I’m not condemning him. In fact, I don’t want my—what’s the word for being shocked?”

“Horror, amazement?” suggested Mr. Reeder.

“Well, whatever it was—I was being a hypochondriac. I only have had a few bad reactions, lack of money, maybe——”

“You’re rather fond of the young lady?” said Mr. Reeder, after an interregnum of silence.

Again Desboye laughed.

“Of course I am! The fact that a man is engaged to be married to the sweetest girl in the world—doesn’t prevent him philandering. Of course, it’s a caddish thing to do, and it’s got me into quite a lot of trouble. But the fact remains, I’m terribly fond of Anna. I won’t say I love her like a brother, because I’m tired of being a hypocrize. I’m going to try to get Southerns out of the mess he’s in, and that doesn’t mean I’m going to stop loving her. After all, I was in love with her before I knew her. Now, Mr. Reeder, what do you want to see me about, if it isn’t to tell me that you’re taking up this case?”

All that Mr. Reeder wanted to see Clive Desboye about was spring cleaning, but he could not resist this. He had, however, a good excuse for calling: Ligesey was apparently alive, he explained. Clive Desboye was not impressed.

“I don’t worry whether he was alive or dead,” he said frankly. “Naturally, I do not know what theory the police have, but I understood from the newspapers that they were concentrating on the murder of Attymar—that infernal woman against John Southerns. If Ligesey is alive I’m hardly likely to meet him, unless, of course, he feels, as so many of these crooks do, that once one has committed a murder one is entitled to a pension! If I hear from him, I’ll let you know.”

As they came out into the hall Mr. Reeder’s eyes wandered up and down the bare walls.

“You will have this repainted, Mr. Desboye?” he asked. “At present it is rather a delicate cream. If I were you I should have it painted green. Green is a very restful colour, but possibly my views are modern.”

“I think they are,” said the other good-humouredly.

Mr. Reeder had made an appointment to see the bibulous agent at ten o’clock. The agent knew where certain photographs were to be obtained. Mr. Reeder had promised to be waiting at the corner of St. Martin’s Lane at that hour. Mr. Reeder arrived as St. Martin’s Church clock was striking, but there was no sign of Billy Gurthe. He had not appeared at half-past ten, and Mr. Reeder decided to go to his house, for he was very anxious to complete his dossier.

The landlady at Mr. Gurthe’s lodgings had a surprising and extraordinary story to tell. Gurthe had hardly left (she had witnessed his departure) before a messenger came, and Billy had gone out. He had returned in half an hour, very volatile and excited. He had been given a commission to collect cabinet turns in Spain. He had to leave London some time after nine, travel all night, and catch the Sud Express in the morning. He was plentifully supplied with money.

“He was so excited, he was nearly sober,” said the landlady.

The sudden departure of an obscure music-hall agent, of whose existence he had been unaware until that afternoon, did not at all distress Mr. Reeder. It was the circum-

“Banks,” said Mr. Reeder reverently.

morning. He was plentifully supplied with money.

“He was so excited, he was nearly sober,” said the landlady.

The sudden departure of an obscure music-hall agent, of whose existence he had been unaware until that afternoon, did not at all distress Mr. Reeder. It was the circum-

”

He drove immediately to the big building on the Thames Embankment, sought, nay, demanded, an interview with Chief Counsel. He had known, he had been at home and in bed, but was in fact in consultation with his five chiefs when the detective arrived.

The first message sent to Mr. Reeder was cold and unappreciative. Would he be in the morning? It was Gaylor who was detached from the conference to carry this message.

“Go back to your chief, Mr. Gaylor,” said Reeder rudely, “and tell him I wish to see him this evening, at once. If I see him tomorrow I will be at the Home Office.”

This was a threat—nobody knew it better than Gaylor. The exact extent and volume of this threat was not known. For perhaps there was something certain—he could be extremely unpleasant, and the consequences of his displeasure might even affect a man’s career. Gaylor returned instantly, and summoned Mr. Reeder to the conference, and there Mr. Reeder sat down, and, quite uninvited, expounded a theory, and supported his fantastic ideas with a considerable amount of grim literary

“We can stop Gurthe at Southampton,” suggested Gaylor, but Reeder shook his head.

“I think not. Let him soak into the Continent, and then we may pick him up with no trouble. Send a man to Southampton, and let him shadow him to Paris. In Paris he can blanket him.”

Mason nodded.

“If they are correct, there must be a method of proving it,” he said; “not a simple one, perhaps—”

“On the contrary, a very simple one,” said Mr. Reeder.

He hurried to Gaylor.

“You remember the bed-room above the one where the murder took place, or where we think it was committed? You probably got a photograph.”

“I’ll get it right away,” said Gaylor, and left the room.

He was back with a slab of photographic enlargements which he laid on the table.

“There it is,” said Reeder, and pointed. “The ceiling. Yes, I noticed that.”

“Naturally,” said Gaylor.

“But most people who go to sea, or even bargees, have it put there.”

The little clock was fastened to the ceiling immediately over the bedstead, so that anybody lying in bed could look up and tell the time. It had luminous hands, Reeder had noticed.

“I want you to have that clock removed and the ceiling plastered,” he said. “And I want a table and chair there. In two days I think I will make the further prosecution of young Southers unnecessary.”

“You can do as you like,” said Mason.

“You’re well in the case now. Mr. Reeder. I’ve put out a special call to get Ligesey, and the river police are searching all the beaces.”
with him two expert officials from the explosives department. One of them had a delicate spring balance, and with this the package was weighed.

"Allow for the weight of the wooden box," said the expert; "that leaves the exact weight of a Mills bomb. I'm sure you're right, Mr. Reeder."

He handed the package to his ear and shook it gently.

"No, nothing more complicated." He took a case of instruments from his pocket and removed a slither of wood from the lid.

"Yes, there's the lever, and the pin's out," he said, after examining it under a strong light.

He cut away the side, and revealed a black, segmented egg shape, grinning as he recognized an old friend.

"You see that?" He pointed to a little hole at the end of the box. "The fellow who brought this was taking no risks; he kept an emergency pin through until it was delivered. I'll have this out in a jiff."

It was no idle promise. Mr. Reeder watched with interest as the skilful fingers of the man removed the lid, catching the lever at the same time and holding it firm against the swelling side. From his pocket he took a steel pin and thrust it in, and the bomb became innocuous.

"You've kept every scrap of paper, of course," said Gaylor. "There was no other packing but this?"

Every piece of paper was carefully folded and put in an envelope, and the two explosive experts went back to pack away Mr. Reeder's dangerous gift.

"There was a lot you didn't tell the chief," said Gaylor, at parting. "That's the trouble with you, you old devil!"

Mr. Reeder looked pleased.

"That is not a very pleasant expression," he said.

"But it is," insisted Gaylor. "You always keep back some juicy bit to spring on us at the last moment. It's either your sense of drama or your sense of humour."

For a second Reeder's eyes twinkled, and then his face became a mask again.

"I have no—um—sense of humour," he said.

He had, at any rate, a sense of vanity, and he was irritated that his little idiosyncrasy had been so crudely exposed to description.

He was up at six the next morning, and by half-past seven was on his way to the Thames Valley. On the previous day he had telephoned to eight separate boathouses between Windsor and Henley, and he was satisfied that he had found what he wanted in the neighbourhood of Bourne End. He had telephoned to the boatbuilder on whom he was calling, and he found that industrious man at work in his yard.

"You're the gentleman who wanted to know about the Zaira? I was going to send a note of my boat up to see if she was still tied up, but I haven't been able to spare him this morning."

"I'm rather glad you haven't," said Mr. Reeder.

"It was a funny thing you telephoned to me when you did," said the builder. "She'd just gone past on her way to Marlow. No, I've never seen her before, but I caught the name. In fact, it was now in this part of the river that I noticed her. She's a forty-foot cruiser, nearly new, and I should think she's got pretty powerful engines. As it was, she made a bit of a wash."

He explained that, after Mr. Reeder's inquiry he had telephoned through to Marlow, had learned that the boat had not

---

Intent upon what was happening outside, Mr. Reeder did not feel the sudden impact of the truncheon that thudded dully upon his head.

"Above this?" said Mr. Reeder hastily.

"No, no; I think you'd better stay in the kitchen until I hear from Mr. Gaylor. If you could make yourself comfortable there, in fact, if you could sleep there, I should be very much obliged. There is nothing to be alarmed about," he said, when he saw consternation dawning in her face. "It is merely that I may want to—um—send a detective upstairs to—er—overhear a conversation."

A lame excuse. Mr. Reeder was a poor liar; but his housekeeper was a very simple soul, and, except that she insisted upon going up to make the room tidy, agreed to retire to the basement. She had hardly gone when Gaylor came through, and for five minutes he and Reeder spoke together. After this the detective settled down to await his coming, and Inspector Gaylor did not arrive alone, but brought..."
The THRILLER

23/3/29

passed, and had sent one of his assistants up the towpath to locate her.

She’s lying at a private quay that runs in from the river, up against a little house, which has been empty for years. There’s nobody on board her, and I suppose the owner’s had permission from the agents. Are you thinking of buying her?

That view had never presented itself to Mr. Reeder. He thought for a long time, and gave the boatbuilder the impression that it was a matter of price that prevented him from ownership.

"Yes, it’s quite usual for people to tie up and leave their boats for months at a time, especially at a private quay like that. It’s not safe; you get a craft full of rats, especially in the winter months. These big boats cost a lot to keep up, and you couldn’t afford to have a caretaker on board." Mr. Reeder made a very leisurely way along the towpath, stopping now and again to admire the lovely reach. Although he had explicit instructions, he might have passed the narrow canal which runs in from the river, in spite of the brick bridge across; for the stream was choked with weeds, and ran apparently into a tangle of trees and undergrowth. With some difficulty, Mr. Reeder reached a corner, and then saw that the canal was brick-lined. Nevertheless, though he had this indication of its edge, he walked gingerly.

It opened into a larger pool, a sort of backwater. Passing a clump of bushes, he came suddenly upon the boat. The bow lay almost within reach of his hand. It was tided up for the night, and had a deserted appearance. Across the forepart of the boat was drawn a canvas cover, but he was prepared for this by the description of the boatbuilder. Mr. Reeder slipped his hand in his pocket and cautiously along the length of the boat. He noted that all the portholes were not only closed but made opaque with brown paper.

"Is anybody there?" he called loudly.

There was no answer. In midstream a moorhen was paddling aimlessly; the sound of his voice sent it scurrying to cover.

The foremost part of the ship was evidently the engine-room, and possibly accommodation for a small crew. The living saloon was aft. It was these that had their portholes covered. Both cabins were approached from the well-lit midships, and he saw here a canvas-covered wheel. The doors were padlocked on the outside.

Mr. Reeder looked around, and stepped on to the deck, down a short ladder to the well. He tried the padlock of the saloon door. It was fast: but it was a very simple padlock, and if fortune favoured him, and in next week’s issue of “The THRILLER” book-length story—

The BIG NOISE

"THE SILENT SIX"

Do not Miss It!

the boat he sought was really discovered, he had prepared for such an emergency as this.

He tried three of the keys which he took from his pocket before the lock snapped back. He unsnapped the hasp, turned the handle, and pulled open the door. He could see nothing for a moment; then he switched on an electric hand-lamp and sent its rays into the shadowy space.

The saloon was empty. The floor of it lay possibly eighteen inches below the level of the deck on which he was standing. And then the boatbuilder went down into the saloon.

He reached the bottom of the steps and turned, walking back with his face to the door through which he had come; then, as he turned back, his eyes lighted on the opening. Presently his heel kicked the pistol. He took another step back and stopped to pick it up.

"I’m afraid I haven’t that pleasure," said Mr. Reeder, and the man chuckled.

"If you had lived, I would have been your first, you know. The one man of your acquaintance, who could plan murder and—what is the expression?—get away with it! Do you know where you are?"

"On the Zaira," said Mr. Reeder.

"Do you know who is her owner?"

"She is owned by Mr. Clive Desboye."

"Then why did Mr. Reeder nod slowly.

"Now tell me, my friend—my time is very short and I cannot waste it here with you—do you know who killed Attymar?"

"You are Attymar," said Mr. Reeder, and was rewarded by a shrill chuckle of delighted laughter.

"So clever, after all! It is a good thing I have you, eh? Otherwise—"he shrugged his shoulders and glared at thevision of the cabin. "Somebody was talking very distressedly; a falsetto voice which Mr. Reeder loathed. His senses came back sharply.

He was shocked to find himself one of the figures in a most fantastical scene, something which did not belong to the great world of reality in which he lived and had his being. He was part of an episode, torn bodily from a most imaginative and impossible work of fiction.

The man who sat in one corner of the lounge, clasping his knees, was—Mr. Reeder.

"I am Attymar," he said. "I am Attymar." He leaned back, contemplative, on the sofa, with a long black stick in his hand, which he twirled round his fingers. "I am Attymar—"

Mr. Reeder could not very well move; he was handcuffed, his legs were strapped painfully tightly together, and there was a pithy sheath of wood, lighted tied behind his ears. It was not painful, but it could be, he realised.

At any rate, he was spared the necessity of replying to the exultant man who sat at the other end of the table.

"Did you hear what I said, my master of mystery?"

He spoke with a slightly foreign accent, this man in the red robe.

"You are so clever, and yet I am more clever, eh? All of it I planned out of my mind. The glittering silver pistol on the floor—that was the only way I could get you to stoop and bring your head into the grasp of my hand. The gaff does not easily escape, but I was afraid you might have dropped a cigarette, and that would have betrayed everything. If you had waited, in that time the gaff could have rolled out of the open door, but no; you must have the pistol, so you stooped and picked it up, and roll!"

His hands glittered dazzlingly.

"You are used to criminals of the stupid kind. For the first time Mr. Reeder, you meet one who has planned everything step by step. Pardon me!"

He stepped down to the floor, leaned forward and untied the gag.

"Yes, I will admit it if conversation is one-sided," he said pleasantly. "If you make a fuss I shall shoot you, and that will be the end. At present I desire that you should know everything. You know me?"

"I am a man of no common, in spite of his being in a terrible position, he was intensely bored. The man in the red cloak must have heard something, for he went quickly to the door and listened more intently, then were to the stairs. If the door behind had been put on the padlock. Presently Mr. Reeder heard him mount the side of the boat and guessed he had stepped ashore to meet whatever was threatening. It was, in truth, the boatbuilder, who had come to make inquiries, and the grey-haired man with the sweep and the white moustache and twirled his stopper in his hand, as if to get rid of it, while he asked him that Mr. Reeder had made an offer for the boat, that it had been rejected, and that the detective had gone on to Marlow.

The man had had time to consider his unfortunate position and to supply a remedy. Mr. Reeder satisfied himself that it was a simple matter to free his hands, the steel bandspeculiarly thin wrists, and his large, bony hands were very deceptive. He freed one, adjusted the gag to a less uncomfortable tension, and brought himself to a sitting position. He swayed and would have fallen to the floor but for a stroke of luck. The effort showed him how dangerous it would be to make an attempt to escape before he recovered strength.
With an oath Desboye looked round at the figure in the doorway. "Put up your hands," said Mr. Reeder gently. "I shall shoot if you do not."

His pistol had been taken from him; the silver-handled revolver had also been removed. He resumed his handcuffs and had not apparently moved when his captor opened the door, only to look in.

"I'm afraid you will have to do without food to-day—does it matter?"

Now Mr. Reeder saw that on the inside of the saloon door was a steel bar. It was painted the same colour as the woodwork, and it was on this discovery that he based his hope of life. For some reason, which he never understood, his enemy switched on two lights from the outside, and this afforded him an opportunity of taking stock of his surroundings.

The portholes were impossible—he understood now why they had been made airtight with brown paper. It would be as much as he could do to get his arms through them. Having decided upon his plan of campaign, Mr. Reeder acted with his customary energy. He could not allow his life to depend upon the caprice of this man. Evidently the intention was to take him out late at night, loaded with chains, and drop him overboard; but he might have cause to change his mind. And that, Mr. Reeder thought, would be very unfortunate.

His worst forebodings were in a fair way to being realised, did he but know. The man who stood in his shirt sleeves, prodding at the centre of the backwater, had suddenly realised the danger which might follow the arrival of a curious-minded policeman. The boatbuilder would certainly gossip. Reeder had something of an international reputation, and the local police would be only too anxious to make his acquaintance.

Gossip runs up and down the river with a peculiar facility. He went into the engine cabin, where he had stowed his fantastic robe and hat, and dragged out a little steel cylinder. Unfasten that nozzle, leave it on the floor near where the helpless man lay, and in a quarter of an hour perhaps.

He cold-bloodedly pulled out two links of heavy chain and dropped them with a crash on the deck. Mr. Reeder heard the sound; he wrenched one hand free of the cuff, not without pain, broke the gag, and, drawing himself up into a sitting position, unfastened the first of the two straps.

His head was splitting from the effect of the gas. As his feet touched the floor he reeled. The second cuff he removed at his leisure. He was so close to the door now that he could drop the bar. It stuck for a little while, but presently he drew it down. It fell with a clatter into the socket.

The man on the deck heard, ran to the door and tagged, drew off the padlock and tried to force his way in.
He pointed towards the place where the backwater turned.

"Is there a house there or a road or something? That's the way he went. What has happened?"

Mr. Reeder was sitting on a little deck-chair, his throbbing head between his hands. After a while he raised his face.

"Have you met the greatest criminal in the world," he said solemnly. "He's so clever that he's alive. His name is Attymar!"

Clive Desboye opened his mouth in amazement.

"Attymar? But he's dead!"

I hope so," said Mr. Reeder viciously, "but I have reason to know that he isn't. No, no, young man, I won't tell you what happened. I'm rather ashamed of myself. Anyway, I am not particularly proud of being an amateur. Why did you come?"

"It was only by luck. I don't know why. I came. I happened to phone through to Twickenham about some repairs to the boat — by the way, you must have seen a picture of it hanging in my hall. In fact, it was in that picture where you were so smart as to tell the date. I lend the Zaira at times; I lent it a few months ago to an Italian or Serbian cousin of mine. He said it that I sent a message that it was to be sent back to the yard. They telephoned along the river for news of it, and that's when I learnt you were down here — you lock rotten."

"I feel rotten," said Mr. Reeder. "And you came?"

"I drove down. I had a sort of feeling in my mind that something was wrong. Then I met a man who'd seen the bullet and he told me about this little old fellow. Until then I didn't know that he was in the boat, and I came along to make inquiries. For some reason, which I can't understand, he no sooner saw me than he pulled a gun and let fly at me, and, turning, went like mad through those bushes." "Have you a gun?" asked Mr. Reeder.

Desboye smiled.

"No, I don't carry such things.

"In that case it would be foolish to pursue my ancient enemy. Let one of the Buckingham Constabulary carry on the good work. Is your car anywhere handy?"

There was a road apparently within fifty yards.

"By Jove!" said Desboye suddenly. "I left it outside the gates of an empty house. I wonder whether that's the place where the old bird went — and whether my car is still there?"

It was there, in the drive of a deserted house; the two-seater coupé which had so excited the disgust of poor Johnny Southers. With some difficulty Clive started it up, and the action recalled something to him.

"Did we leave the engines of that boat running?" he asked suddenly. "If you don't mind I'll go back and turn them off; then I'll notify the police and I'll send a man to bring the Zaira into Maidenhead." He was gone ten minutes.

Mr. Reeder remained in the vicinity of walking round the car and admiring it.

Rain had fallen in the night; he made this interesting discovery before Desboye returned.

"We'll run up to Marlow and I'll get a man to knock down and collect the boat," he said, as he climbed in. "I've never heard anything more amazing. Tell me exactly what happened to you?"

Mr. Reeder smiled sadly.

"You will perhaps, if I do not?" he asked slowly. "The truth is, I have been asked by a popular newspaper to write my reminiscences, and I want to save every personal experience for that important volume."

He would talk about other subjects, however; for example, of the fortunate circumstance that Desboye's car was still there, though it was within reach of the enemy.

"I've never met him before. I hope I'll never meet him again," said Desboye.

"But I think he can be traced. Naturally, I don't want to go into court against him. I think it's the most ridiculous experience, to be shot at by no apparent reason."

"Why bother?" asked Mr. Reeder. "I personally never go into court to gratify a private vendetta, though there is a possibility that in the immediate future I may break the habit of years?"

He got down at the boat-house, and was a silent listener whilst Clive Desboye rang up a Twickenham number and described the exact location of the boat.

"I've collected it," he said, as he hung up. "Now, Mr. Reeder, what am I to do about the police?"

Mr. Reeder shook his head.

"I shouldn't report it," he said. "They'd never understand."

On the way back to town he grew more friendly to Clive Desboye and he had never been before, and certainly he was more communicative than he had been regarding the Attymar murder.

"You've never seen a murder case at first hand?"

"And I'm not very anxious to," interrupted the other.

"I applaud that sentiment. Young people are much too morbid," said Mr. Reeder. "But this is a crime particularly interesting because it was obviously planned by one who has studied the art of murder and the methods of the average criminal. He had studied it to such good purpose that he was satisfied that if a crime of a certain character were committed by a man of intelligence and acumen, he would—um—escape the consequence of his deed."

"And will he?" asked the other, interested.

"No," said Mr. Reeder, rubbing his nose. He thought for a long time. "I don't think so. I think he will hang; I am pretty certain he will hang."

Seizing the cylinder of escaping gas, he crashed the nozzle through the ventilation panel of the cabin door.

Another long pause.

"And yet in a sense he was very clever. For example, he had to attract the attention of the policeman on the beat and establish the fact that a murder had been committed. He left open the wicket gate on the—um—wharf, and placed a lantern on the ground and another within the open door of his little house, so that the policeman, even if he had been entirely devoid of curiosity, could not fail to investigate."

Clive Desboyeau frowned.

"Upon my life I don't know who is murdered! It can't be Attymar, because you saw him to-day; and it can't possibly be Ligsey, because, according to your statement, he is alive. Why did Johnny Southers go there?"

"Because he'd been offered a job, a partnership with Attymar. Attymar had two or three barges, and, with vigorous management, it looked as if his business might grow into a more important concern. Southers didn't even know that this man Attymar was the type of creature he was. An appointment was made on the telephone. Southers attended. He interviewed Attymar or somebody in the dark, during which time I gather he was sprinkled with blood—whose blood, we shall discover. There was a similar case in France in the eighteen forty-seven. Madame Payres—"

He gave the history of the Payres case at length.

"That was our friend's cleverness, the blood-sprinkling, the lantern-placing, the removal of Mr.—um—I forget his name for the moment, the theatrical agent of unsavoury reputation. But he made one supreme error. You know the house—oh, of course, you've never been there."

"Which house?" asked Clive curiously.

"Attymar's house. It's a little more than a weighing shed. You haven't been there? No, I see you haven't. If you would like a little lecture, or a little demonstration of criminal error, I would like to show you at first hand."

"Will it save Johnny Southers—this mistake?" asked Desboyeau curiously.

Mr. Reeder nodded.

"Nothing is more certain. How amazing are the—um—ravages of the human mind! How peculiar are the paths into which—um—vanity leads us!"

He closed his eyes and seemed to be communing with himself all the way through Shepherd's Bush. Mr. Desboyeau put him down at Scotland Yard, and they arranged to meet at the end of Shadwick Lane that same afternoon.

"There is no further news of Ligsey," said Gaylor when Reeder came into his office.

"I should have been surprised if there had been," said Mr. Reeder cheerfully. "Partly because he's dead, and partly because we'll, I didn't expect any communication from him."

"You know he telephoned to the chief last night?"

"I shouldn't be surprised at that," said Mr. Reeder, almost daintily.

They talked about Johnny Southers and the case against him, and of the disappointing results of a careful search of the garden. They had dug up every bed and had done incalculable damage to Mr. Southers herbarious borders.

"Our information was that he had a couple of thousands pounds cached there in real money, but we found nothing."

"How much was there in the box you discovered in the house?"

"Oh, only a hundred pounds or so," said Gaylor. "The big money was hidden in the garden, according to what we were told. We didn't find a cent."

"Too bad," said Mr. Reeder sympathetically. Then, remembering: "Do you mind if I take a young—um—friend of mine over Attymar's house this afternoon? He is not exactly interested in the crime of willful murder, but he is providing for the defence of young Mr. Southers."

"I don't mind," said Gaylor, "but you had better ask the chief."

The Chief Constable was out, and the opportunity of meeting him was rendered more remote when Clive Desboyeau rang him up, as he said, on the off-chance of getting him at Scotland Yard and inviting him out to lunch.

Anna Welford is coming. I have told her you think that Johnny's innocence can be established, and she's most anxious to meet you."

Mr. Reeder was in something of a predicament, but, as usual, he rose to the occasion. He instantly cancelled two important engagements to meet this, and at lunchtime he sat between a delighted girl and a rather exhilarated benefactor. The one difficulty he had anticipated did not, however, arise. She had some shopping to do that afternoon, and he went alone with Clive Desboyeau to what the latter described as "the most gruesome after-lunch entertainment" he had ever experienced.

The Second Trap.

A car dropped them at the end of Shadwick Lane, which had already settled down to normalcy, and had grown accustomed to the notoriety which the inquirer had brought to it.

There was a constable on duty on the wharf, but he was inside the gate. Mr. Reeder opened the wicket and Clive Desboyeau stepped in. He looked round the littered yard with disgust visible on his face.

"How terribly sordid!" he said. "I am not too fastidious, but I can't imagine anything more grim and miserable than this."

"It was grimmer for the—um—gentleman who was killed," said Mr. Reeder.

He went into the house ahead of his companion, pointed out the room where the murder was committed, "as I feel perfectly sure," he added; and then led the way up the narrow stairs into what had been Captain Attymar's sitting-room.

"If you sit at that table you'll see the plan of the house, and I may show you one or two very interesting things."

Mr. Reeder switched on a hand-lamp on the table, and Clive Desboyeau sat down, and followed, apparently entranced, the recital of J. G. Reeder's theory.

"If you have time—what is the time?"

Clive Desboyeau looked up at the ceiling, stared at it for a while.

"Let me guess," he said slowly. "Four o'clock."

"Marvellous," murmured Mr. Reeder. "It is within one minute. How curious you shouldn't look up at the ceiling! There used to be a clock there."

"In the ceiling?" asked the other incredulously.

He rose, walked to the window, and stared out on to the wharf. From where he stood he could see the policeman on duty at the gate. There was nobody watching at a little door in the ragged fence which led to Shadwick Passage. Suddenly Mr. Clive Desboyeau pointed to the wharf.

"That is where the murder was committed," he said quietly.

Mr. Reeder took a step towards the window and cautiously craned his neck forward. He did not feel the rubber truncheon that crashed against the base of his skull, but went down in a heap.

Clive Desboyeau looked round, walked to the door, and listened, then stepped out, locked the door, came down the stairs and on to the wharf. The policeman eyed him suspiciously, but Mr. Desboyeau turned and carried on a conversation with the invisible Reeder.

He strolled round to the front of the house. Nobody saw him open the little gate into the passage. The end of Shadwick Lane was barred, but Gaylor did not remember the passage and it was he who found Reeder and brought him back to consciousness.

"I deserve that," said Mr. Reeder, when he became articulate. "Twice in one day! I am getting too old for this work."

THE THRILLER
One of these amazing things—which so rarely happen, that fifty-thousand-to-one—against chance, had materialised, and the high chiefs of Scotland Yard grew apoplectic as they asked the why and wherefore. A man wanted by the police on a charge of murder had walked through a most elaborate cordon. River police had shut off the waterfront; detectives and uniform men had formed a circle through which it was impossible to escape; yet the wanted man had, by the oddest chance, passed between two detectives, who had mistaken him for somebody they knew.

Whilst Reeder was waiting at Scotland Yard he explained in greater detail the genesis of his suspicion.

"The inquiries I made showed me that Attymar was never seen in daylight, except by his crew, and then only in the fading light. He had established buying agencies in a dozen Continental cities, and for years he has been engaged in scientific smuggling. But he could only do that if he undertook the hardships incidental to a bargemaster's life. He certainly reduced those hardships to a minimum, for, except to collect the contraband which was dumped near his barge, and bring it up to the wharf he had first hired and then bought in the early stages of his activity, he spent few nights out of his comfortable bed.

"I was puzzled for many curious happenings. If Clive Desboye had not taken the trouble to appear in Brockley at almost the hour at which the crime would be discovered—he knew the time the policeman came down from brick lane—my suspicions might not have been aroused. It was a blunder on his part, even with his clever assumption of frankness, to come along and tell me the story of what Ligsey had told him; for as soon as the crime was discovered and I examined the place, I was absolutely certain that Ligsey was dead, or he would never have dared to invent the story.

Desboye prides himself on being a clever criminal. Like all criminals who have that illusion, he made one or two stupid blunders. When I called at his flat I found the walls covered with photographs, some of which showed him in costume. It was the first intimation I had that he had been on the stage. There was also a photograph of the Zaira when it was going upstream, with the House of Commons in the background. Attached by the painter at the stern was a small, canoe-shaped tender, which had been faithfully described to me that day by the boy Hobbs. Desboye knew he had blundered, but hoped I saw no significance in those two photographs, especially the photograph of him dressed as a coster, with the identical make-up that Attymar wore.

"I started inquiries, and discovered that there was a Clive Desboye who worked in music-halls, giving imitations of popular characters and making remarkably quick changes on the stage. I met people who remembered him, some who gave me the most intimate details about his beginnings. For ten years he had masqueraded as Attymar, sunk all his savings in a barge, rented the wharf and house, and eventually purchased it. He is an extraordinary organiser, and there is no doubt that in the ten years he has been working he has accumulated a pretty large fortune. Nobody, of course, associated the bargemaster with this elegant young man who lived in Park Lane.

"What Ligsey knew about him I don't know. Personally, I believe that Ligsey knew a little, and could have told us a little. Attymar discovered that Ligsey was communicating with me. Do you remember the letter he sent to me? I told you the envelope had been opened—and so it had, probably, by Attymar. From that moment Ligsey was doomed. And his vanity was such that he thought he could plan a remarkable crime, throw the suspicion upon the man he hated, and at the same time remove Ligsey, the one danger, from his path. I should think that he had been planning Johnny Southers' end for about three weeks before the murder. The money that was found in the tool-house was planted there on the actual night of the murder, and the money in the garden—"

"Money in what garden?" asked Mason.

"The garden was searched, but none was found.

Mr. Reeder coughed.

"At any rate, the money in the tool-house was put there to support the suspicion. It was clumsily done. The message on the piece of paper was an old Jill, as the story that Desboye told me with such charming effect, were designed with two objects. One was to cover the disappearance of Attymar, and the other to ruin Southers.

"But perhaps his cleverest and most audacious trick was the one he performed this morning. He had me in his boat—he had been waiting for me—probably had watched me from the moment I arrived at Bourne End. Then, wearing his fantastic get-up, and jealous to the very last that I should get away, he placed me in his car for—um—unpleasant exit. I give him credit for his resourcefulness. As a quick-change artist he has probably few equals. He could get into any bank and leave it with certain other things. The telephone-bell rang, and Mason took up the instrument.

"She went out a quarter of an hour ago—you don't know where? It was Desboye, wasn't it? She didn't say where she was meeting him."

Reeder signed and rose wearily.

"Do I understand that Miss Anna Welford has been allowed to leave her house?" There was a slightly exasperation in his tone, and Mr. Mason could not but agree that it was justified. For the first request that Reeder had made, and that by telephone from Botherlithe, was that a special guard should be placed. Cautious. Certain of Mr. Mason's local subordinates, however, thought that the least likely thing that could happen would be that Desboye would come, and she would try to meet him, and here she went away. Matters had been further complicated by the fact that the girl had gone out that day, and was still out when the police officers called. She had not been up, however, a moment before Desboye had telephoned, and had given her number, which was transferred to him. Later, when she was called up at the address she had given, she discovered that she had gone out to meet him, nobody knew where.

"So really," said Gaylor, "nobody is to blame."

"Nobody ever is," snapped Mr. Reeder.

It was Mr. Clive Desboye's little conceit that he should arrange to meet the girl at the corner of the Thames Embankment, within fifty yards of Scotland Yard. When she arrived in some hurry, he saw nothing that would suggest that anything unusual had happened, except the good news he had passed to her over the telephone.

"Where she was then before she was within talking distance, and he was amused. "I really ought to be very jealous," he bantered her.

He called a cab as she spoke, and ordered the man to drive him to an address in Chiswick.

"Reeder hasn't been on to you, of course? I'm glad—I want him to be the first. I shall tell you."

"Is he released?" she asked, a little impatiently.

He will be released this evening. I think that is best. The authorities are very chary of demonstrations, and Scotland Yard have particularly asked that he should give no newspaper interviews, but shall spend the night of possible, out of town. I am arranged with my cousin that he shall stay at his place till-morrow."

It seemed all very feasible, and when of his own accord he stepped the cab and getting out to telephone, returned to tell her that he had 'phonied her father that she would not be back before eight, the thought of his disinclination aroused a little warm glow of friendship towards him.

"I have been besieged by reporters myself, and I'm rather anxious to avoid them.

These wretched papers will do anything for a sensation."

The swift express van of one of these offending newspapers passed the taxi at that moment. On its back doors was posted a placard.

"ALLEGED MURDERER'S DARING ESCAPE."

Later the girl saw another newspaper poster.

"POLICE OF METROPOLIS SEARCHING FOR MURDERER."

The taxi drove up a side street, and, as he tapped on the window, stopped. There was a garage a little further along, and, leaving Anna, he went inside and came out in a few moments with a small closed coupé.

"I keep this here-in case of emergency," he explained to her. "One never knows when one might need a car."

Exactly why he should need a spare car in Chiswick he did not attempt to explain.

Avoiding the Great West Road, he took the longer route through Brentford. Rain was falling heavily by the time they reached Hounslow.

She was so grateful to him for all the services he had rendered, and which, though she was unconscious of the fact, he had particularised, that she did not resist his suggestion that they should go on to Oxford. She wondered why until they were on the outskirts of the town and then he explained with a little smile that Johnny had been transferred to Oxford Gaol that morning.

"I kept this as a surprise for you," he said. "Only about three people in London know, and I was most anxious that you should not tell."

They went into a teashop on the other side of the city, and she was puzzled why he should choose this rather poverty-stricken little café to an hotel, but thought it was an act of consideration on his part—part of the general scheme for avoiding reporters. They lingered over tea until she grew a little restless.

"We'll go to the prison and make inquiries," he told her.

Actually they did go to the prison, and he descended and rang the bell. When he came back he was grinning ruefully.

"He was released half an hour ago. My cousin's car picked him up. We can go on."

It was getting dark now, and the rain continued to fall steadily. They took another route towards London, passed through a little town which she thought she recognised as Marlow, turned abruptly from the main road, and as abruptly again up a dark and neglected carriage drive. She had a glimpse of the scene of a stagnant backwater on her left, and then the car drew up before a forbidding-looking door, and, stepping down, Clive Desboye opened the door with his key.

"Here we are," he said pleasantly, gave her his hand, and, before she realised what had happened, she was in a gloomy hall smelling of damp and decay.

The door thundered close behind her.

"Where are we? This isn't the place," she said tremulously, and at that second all her old suspicions, all her old fears of the man returned.

"It is quite the place," he said.

From the pocket of his mackintosh he took an electric lamp and switched it on. The house was furnished, if rotting carpets and dust-covered chairs meant anything. He held her firmly by the arm, walked her along the passage, then opening a door, pushed her inside. She thought there was no window, but found afterwards that it was shuttered.

The room was fairly clean; there was a bed, a table, and a small oil stove. On a sideboard were a number of packets of food-stuffs.

"Keep quiet, and don't make a fuss," he said.

Striking a match, he lit a paraffin lamp that stood on the table.

"What does this mean?" she asked. Her face was white and haggard.

He did not answer immediately, and then:

"I am very fond of you—that's what it means. You will probably be hanged in about six weeks' time, and that old saying that you might as well be hanged for a sheep as for a lamb. For the moment you are the lamb."

The bright, shining eyes were fixed on hers. She almost swooned with horror.

"That doesn't mean I'm going to murder you, or cut your throat, or do any of the things I tried to do to Mr. Reeder this morning—oh, yes, I was the fantastical gentleman on the Zaira. The whole thing happened a few yards away from where you're standing. Now, Anna, you're going to be very sensible, my sweet—there's nobody within five miles of here who is at all concerned—"

The hinges of the door were rusty; they squeaked when it was moved. They spoke now. Clive Desboye turned in a flash, fumbling under mackintosh and coat.

"Don't move!" said Mr. Reeder gently. It was his conventional admonition.

"And put up your hands. I shall certainly shoot if you do not. You're a murderer—I could forgive you that. You're a liar—that, to a man of my high moral code, is unforgivable."

The dozen detectives who had been waiting for three hours in this dank house came crowding into the room and snapped irons on the wrists of the white-faced man.

"See that they fit," said Mr. Reeder pleasantly. "I had on a pair this morning which were grossly oversize."

THE END.

Do not miss the opportunity of reading yet another brilliant story. Order your copy to-day.)
The SHOOTING of WHISPER MALLOY

PROBLEM No. 7 OF BAFFLERS!
The Popular Detective Story Game.

THE RULES.
The rules are simplicity itself. On this page you are given details of Baffer Problem No. 7—there will be another next week. Briefly, you are told the story of a crime and given ALL the clues necessary for its solution. Be your own detective. Read the problem through very carefully, giving consideration to every detail, then try to answer the questions at the end. Award yourself marks as indicated after comparing your answers with those given on page 20. These answers are printed upside down so that they may not catch your eye before you have had a chance to test your skill. Remember, it is the spirit of your solution, not its exact wording, that counts.

Try a baffer on your friends. Read the problem to them and see what they can make of it, awarding a small prize—if you like—to the first to give the correct solution.

The scene of the tragedy, reconstructed according to data in the possession of the Police.
INTRODUCTION.

The Trapper, a wealthy but dangerous fanatic, was under the impression that he was performing a very necessary and wanted service to the community at large by independently dealing with criminals, where he considered the police powerless or incompetent to deal with.

 Entirely ruthless in his methods, he is trying to organize a gang, one of the first members of which is Dick Estrehan, an ex-clerk of the firm of Hint, Hini, Sons & Barter.

 Estrehan, after embezzling £20,000 of his employers’ money, had hit the high spots in the West End, and fallen victim to the wiles of Stella Cline and Velvet Grimshaw, two crooks who, ignorant of his real position, fleeced him of the money.

 In the hands of the Trapper, Dick is promised that the £20,000 shall be paid back in payment for one year of his life. For that period he must give his life and reputation to the Trapper. The alternative being prison and disgrace. There being no option, he is disguised as an Eurasian named Thompson, and entered as clerk to the staff of Maule’s, James & Co., of Farrington Street.

 Meanwhile, Velvet Grimshaw is murdered under strange circumstances at a West End night club. On his coat is found a wire noose similar to the cable found in the Trapper’s shooting bag.

 This was not the first occurrence of the wire noose. Several previous crimes had borne this trade-mark, and Chief Constable Winter, of the C.I.D., determined to get the mysterious criminal known as the Trapper. The job is given to Detective Martin Wilde.

 Wilde is obliged to accept the assistance, although in only an unofficial capacity, of Quentin Thordol and Patricia Langton. Thordol, an American millionaire, was already known to the Yard on account of valuable services he had previously rendered. On the night that Grimshaw was murdered at the Gnomes Club, it was Thordol who banded to Detective Wilde a flash-lamp belonging to the murderer, and curiously enough Thordol was the only person present that night who possessed a revolver. The following day Wilde called at Thordol’s flat, and while there discussing the situation with the American and Patricia Langton, an envelope is delivered to each of them—and each contains a wire noose.

 Through following Stella Cline, Wilde traces the Trapper and Estrehan to a bogus firm in Farrington Street, but fails to make an arrest. Circumstances lead him to suspect Thordol, but the American is able to prove his innocence, and soon after decides to go to America.

 Wilde, when on one of his expeditions, finds that he is being followed by an habitual crook known as Paddy the Ghost. Events lead him to suspect that Paddy is in league with the Trapper, and manages to get him arrested for his complicity in a burglary.

 He is brought for trial at the Old Bailey, but when the case is reaching a climax, there is a sudden dramatic turn. The court is "held up" by the Trapper and his gang and Paddy is released.

 (Now continue the story.)

 A FLYING SQUAD CHASE.

 As the marauders disappeared, a dozen determined, angry men—detectives, lawyers, journalists—rushed to each door. But the retreat had been well organised, and a couple of shots drove them back. The bandits had rallied in a compact little group, and, with ready weapons thrust themselves through the door, and down the stairs. Outside, in the Old Bailey, a large, powerful car was waiting with engine running. They sprang to their places and the car began to move, taking the corner into Holborn Viaduct at breakneck speed, and threading its way westwards through the traffic at a pace that promised speedy success, unless the uncanny skill of the driver was reinforced by the favouritism of all the gods of luck.

 The precincts of the Central Criminal Court buzzed like a disturbed and angry hive of bees as the success of the audacious enterprise became apparent. Men rushed wildly into the street to gape vacantly in the direction taken by the fugitives. A few detectives and uniformed police chartered taxis, in the forlorn hope that traffic delays or some accident would enable them to come up with their quarry.

 Wilde himself, outwardly composed, had managed to detach a wire noose, which he had found attached to the door of the court-room, before it had attracted attention, and, leaving the immediate pursuit to others, was in earnest conversation over the telephone with Winter, at Scotland Yard. A City detective-officer was in similar communication with his headquarters at the Old Jery. Both conversations were interrupted, at the further end of the wire, swift instructions were passed on.

 The complex machinery of the Metropolitan Police was speeded to meet the unexpected emergency. The fast Flying-Squad cars, each hastily filled with armed men, were rushed out to intercept or pick up the trail of the fugitives. Each of these cars was fitted with wireless, so that it might always be in touch with Scotland Yard, for, although the occasions for central directions are few, they are of vital importance once in a while.

 Within five minutes an "all-station" message had conveyed the alarm to the two hundred police-posted over the seven hundred square miles of London. London police officers of all ranks have an unerring objectiveness as a rule, but in this case the small armouries kept for contingencies were soon denuded of their stores. No instructions had been given that every man on duty, who could be reached, was to be provided with a firearm of some sort. Where the stock in the armours failed, other sources were drawn upon.

 If a man could not have the latest pattern of automatic-pistol, he was provided with a double-barrelled shotgun, or even with a Morris-tube rifle from the miniature ranges.

 Little bodies of men were available all over London, no incident being reported of all kinds, from the ordinary police tenders to private motor-cars, hastily borrowed.

 Winter ordered that every man of the Criminal Investigation Department—there were nine hundred of them—was to be armed, and drop all other affairs till the fugitives were caught at last. He was applying the same police principle as that used when two big constables arrest a small drunken man. One is plenty, but twelve are sure. Where they were sure, the fugitives were run to bay, there would almost certainly be a fight, unless the police could display overwhelming force.

 To all the local police forces within a hundred miles of London, persistent telephone and telegraph messages were sent, urging them to be on the lookout, and to be ready to send in a rush for a man who had a car. But the chief hope of the authorities was that the net which had been so quickly and widely spread would ensnare the fugitives before they could get out of London.

 Wilde’s conversation with Winter had not finished when one of the Flying-Squad cars drove up in the Old Bailey. With an abrupt farewell he made a dash for the street. As he jumped aboard, the car whirled in the direction taken by the reluctant fugitives. It was already known that they had turned at Hatton Garden, escaping collision with a taxi-cab and a furniture van by the margin of an inch, and leaving a traffic policeman, who had attempted to stop them, with a broken leg in the middle of the road. They had wheeled to the left, but in less than half a mile were known to have swerved into some of the by-streets of Bloomsbury. The supposition was that they were trying to break through some of the less congested thoroughfares into one of the main north or west roads.

 Hooting wildly the Flying-Squad car dashed in force pursuant. A man with ear-phones over his head was listening intently to the chatter of Morse of the wireless from Scotland Yard—experience had shown that this was less liable to interruption than telephonic communication—and now and then scribbled a message on a pad of paper, which he handed to Wilde, who directed the driver. Thus for a while they steadily pressed forward, following through a series of streets roughly parallel with Oxford Street, including Wardour Street.

But here the wireless directions, which had hitherto permitted a more or less direct pursuit, began to falter. Quick as had been the alarm from Paddington Station, although this fugitives' someday somewhere between Portland Place and Edgware Road. This had been the "blind spot", the "hole in the picture". Up to this point in the fugitives' car had crossed Portland Place, it had been remarked for its territorial speed. But now, in the face of this, that moment of the affair at the Old Bailey.

The news had not had time to reach the men in the street. So it seemed as if the car had driven past them in the same, if not in any other. No one could be said to have been an obvious source of danger to them, at the first convenient point.

This crossed through Wilde's mind as the Flying Squad car came to a halt. Men, said a message from the Yard, had, already been ordered to take a search among all garages in the vicinity. The work was to be clean, and other Flying Squad cars had been recalled to be at hand, in case of any discovered official. The chief detective-inspector did not feel optimistic. The job was one likely to take some time, he knew. Up to the point where he believed it would help matters immediately. He decided to leave matters for the time, and get back to Scotland Yard and have a word with Winter. He held up his hand to a passing taxi.

"What have you been doing in this direction?"

"A conviction I was about to put to you," said Winter. "His tone was light, but all his suspicions of the American had returned. It was, to say the least, confoundingly odd that Querelle, the American, should have appeared at that moment at the spot where the Trapper had vanished. But Thorold wore a light grey suit, a silk hat, and his face was powdered and attired in brown. There was, however, the possibility that a very quick change had been made. The American might well have carried through that afternoon's exploit, would be prepared for all contingencies. On the other hand, it was at least equally possible that the encounter was a mere coincidence.

He thrust a hand through the millionaire's arm.

"What have you been doing during the last hour or so?" he demanded.

Thorold raised his eyebrows.

"Ah, I recognise that official tone. You're on the warpath again, old chap. Tomahawk all ready for my scalp. Something gone wrong with your digestion?"

"I suppose you think that you're being funny," said the detective stiffly. "Anyway, you'll see it all in the evening papers soon—if you have the time. Everything in London has been held up, and a prisoner has been helped to escape.

"Aha!" ejaculated Thorold.

Wilde went on:

"The gang got away by car, and they have been traced to this neighbourhood. We're scouring the town and there's still a beat about the bush. It's damned queer I should meet you here, and I want to know something about it."

The millionnaire thrust his free hand into a trousers pocket and pursed his lips in a low whistle.

"Say, this Trapper Johnny of yours is a swift little worker," he commented. "I guess the prisoner will be Paddy Whodoyoucallhim. The newspapers kind of hinted that he was mixed up with the Gnomes' Club murder. And now you find me almost on the spot. I seem to be unlucky. You'll nab me one of these days, Wilde, if I'm not careful."

"Did you notice the fellow's cars?" gibed Thorold gently. "Oh, I'm sorry. You want me to be careful? This fellow is behind me to-day, and I'm going to tell you if I told you. But I think I can satisfy you."

He waved a hand, and shouted a summons. He was still holding with his sheaf of newspapers, fifty yards away, on the other side of the road. "Here he is," he said to someone speaking with me ever since I came out for a constitutional. Of course, he may be hoping to sell me a paper. But he looks to me uncommonly well acquainted with you. Do you think you've put some of your best shadows on to me. I expect he's got a complete diagram and everything I've done to-day."

Wilde bit his lip:

"Have you been keeping this gentleman under surveillance?" he asked at the man approached.

The man looked doubly from one to the other. Thorold laughed.

"Don't be shy, my man. Mr. Wilde is not quite so innocent as he seems. Tell him about our outing."

Gently re-engaging his arm, he strolled away.

THE YARD BECOMES ANNOYED

Before the day was out they had found the car. Indeed, it almost found itself, for it had been left at a small garage in a turning, and the man who had taken the car had phoned through to Scotland Yard when he had seen an account of the escape in the evening paper. Then it was all too easy for the car to be traced. The car had been casually left by two men, like dozens of others, in the normal way of business. No peculiar feature of the vehicle had been taken of the vehicle. They had promised to be back within an hour, but had left no name. The only thing that was certain was that some of the car had been dropped ere the garage.

Nor did an examination of the car itself disclose anything of value. The manufacturer, from the invoices, discovered the peculiar feature of the vehicle had been that the price—several hundred pounds—had been paid in Treasury notes, which cannot be traced like a cheque or Bank of England notes. The buyer, who, said the salesman, appeared to be an American, had asked that a car and had made no mention of his name. This had been done, and the following day he called for them, and drove the car away.

"What name did he give for the licences?" asked Wilde.

"He called himself Martin Wilde, and gave an address at the Regal Hotel to trace it by association."

The corner of the chief inspector's mouth twitched. He could appreciate the sardonic flavor of the joke.

"That's bad, isn't it to be my name," he declared dryly. "I'll be obliged if you do not mention that little detail to the newspapers."

In fact, it was not to be taken by the Trapper. He had overlooked nothing. Not the glimmer of an opening presented himself. Wilde felt that was confined to being a man who was playing a game with the power and omniscience of a master. The ordinary crook, he thought, would have been a different sort of man, and there some small mistake on which a shrewd and observant man might fasten. Such few errors as the Trapper had made he covered up with an act of secrecy and suddenness.

It is axiomatic among the police of London that a known fugitive never escapes. A unknown fugitive, a man found wanted in Scotland Yard is sooner or later ensnared in the gigantic police web which covers the countries. It was the Trapper's plan to show that this rule was not invariable. He had managed to keep Euston in hiding. Would he be able to do the same for Paddy?

There was no question in Wilde's mind that every device at his disposal was being employed to pick up Paddy if he attempted to break out of town. But it had been easier to lock the gates of London before the advent of the motor. The railway-station and the docks were always full of capable men of exit, and they were comparatively simple to watch. But now there were the roads, and the devilment of the crook, who all seemed to be able to be caught if not exposed. Wilde shook his head doubtfully as he climbed the back stairs to his room.

Winter was still in his office, and leaning over his shoulder as he concentrated on a paper lying on his desk was the tall, lean, determined-looking official who was the administrative chief of the Criminal Investigation Department. Before Wilde could withdraw the Chief Constable called to him.

"Your friend Wilde, isn't it?"

He handed over the typewritten sheet which he had been examining.

"This is a circular letter which has been dealt with," said Winter. "I'm sending it by hand. You'll see the plan of the city.

"I suppose he sent along another wire nose?" commented Wilde. "Mad—completely mad."
"Mad or not mad, he's holding us up as a gang of incompetent idiots," declared Winter. "There's a whole panel of judges waiting out there to hear what we've got to say about it."

"We've got to tell 'em something," interposed the Assistant-Commissioner. "We can't say this letter is a fake. It's a darned nuisance, Mr. Wilde."

The chief detective-inspector felt an atmosphere of covert irritation. Scotland Yard chiefs are only human, and it would be a delicate business to avoid a newspaper outcry that would stir the mandarins at the Home Office and in Parliament to be unpleasant. Wilde forewarned that if a kick came it was likely to be passed along to him. He caseroed his chin meditatively.

"I'm doing all I can," he declared quietly. "If you want to pass the job on to someone else—"

"Now don't fly off the handle," admonished Winter. "No one's blaming you. We know you'll get this man. But we don't know how. We're going to take a look at Winter. I'll raise a laugh at us—at us all!" He jammed a fist savagely on his desk.

"I wouldn't give a tinker's curse what they said in the ordinary way, but this is out of the ordinary. Why, they might even stir up a Parliamentary Committee to sit on the Department. That would speak as though of some dire calamity. Can you think of any way to hold off the newspapers until we've cleaned up?"

"You might take a bone from a hungry tiger," observed Wilde, "but that would be simple to holding a big story from the newspapers. We might persuade them to suflten it down a bit. Why not see 'em now?"

The Assistant-Commissioner rose hastily.

"I'll be going," he said. "Better not make it too official."

His subordinates conferred together for another five minutes, and then strolled into the room where the "crime merchants" of the London Police were assembled. Immediateiy a babel of questions was shot at them. Wilde flung up his hands laughingly.

"For the love of Mike, boys, give a fellow a chance! I can't answer you all at once. No, there isn't any inside story to this. You know pretty well as much as we do. I've only just seen the letter. Is that letter true?" he demanded one man.

"I'd hate to take my oath about it," said Winter. "No, you needn't."

"You mean you say that there's some person pulling off these stunts just as he likes?

"Look here, you boys," said Wilde snarly. "We'll hold as little as we can help back from you, but we don't want all we say published. And what you write doesn't come from us. Is that clear?" He paused an instant, and, taking silence for assent, went on with an air of complete candour. "We have some idea of one or two people who may be at the bottom of this, and, quite frankly, we didn't expect that they would go so far as they have to-day. The thing was a complete surprise to us. At the same time, of course, the best thing that could have happened. We know that they didn't get out of London, and it may enable us to get the lid on behind Paddy. By the way, we've got photographs of Paddy and several interesting little points about him, which we'll give you."

He gave some details of the chase, and the name and address of the dealer from whom the car had been purchased.

"You can say that we're going through the West End from the West End and the other incidents in which the Trapper had been concerned, were skillfully parried by both Winter and Wilde. At last someone reverted to the subject of the letter.

"Wilde spread his hands and shook his head dubiously.

"You've read it," he said. "It may be genuine, or it may not. Whoever wrote it knows something about the case. That isn't to say he's the head cook and bottlewaher. There may be a little behind it. I'll bet some of you have noticed that it contains one or two raw libels. I can imagine a pretty action for damages coming along when you call men receivers, or blackmailers, or bloodsuckers, merely on the say-so of some anonymous correspondent.

"You're trying to scare us off," laughed one journalist. "You suggest that the letter was written by one of the persons it mentions as part of a scheme to extort money."

"I don't believe I could scare the papers if I tried. Whoever wrote that letter, it's liable to provoke libel actions if it's published. Suit yourselves. I'll freely admit that, all other things apart, we'd rather you didn't mention it. It's not too complimentary to us."

"You carried that off well, Wilde. They have been told just as much as they'd find out in any case. I believe your hint of libel may do the trick."

"They'll suppress it as a favour to us," said the other gravely, but with the suspicion of a twinkle lurking in his deep-set eyes. "No reputable journal is to be terrorised into silence."

STELLA VANISHES AGAIN.

Queston Thorold sat with one leg crossed over the other, a foot swinging idly to and fro. Patricia Langston with swift fingers sorted a batch of papers and laid them on her desk.

"Now?" she said.

"Dear lady," declared Thorold, "I have many things to say. He glanced meaningly beyond which came the clatter of many typewriters. If your excellent staff—"

"They won't interrupt," she asserted, and pushed a box of cigarettes towards him. "I have given instructions."

His foot stopped swaying, and he languidly lit one of the cigarettes.

"Forgive this caution. I know now how a rabbit feels when it is lured by a persistent hound. Outside in the rain—and, I hope, getting thoroughly soaked—is one of Mr. Martin a Widde's myrmidons. You're quite sure that there isn't a diaphanous in the room—nobody hidden in one of the filing cabinets?"

She laughed, and made a little gesture of denial.

He breathed an exaggerated sigh of relief.

"Honestly I'm getting afraid of Wilde. Every step I take is trailed, every bite I eat is watched. I am suspicious of everyone—particularly of waiters, and taxi-drivers, and newspaper sellers. I've got a notion that my telephone is tapped; and I wouldn't swear that my letters are not read before they reach me. That man Wilde has sure got a suspicious mind. It's hammering me, Pat."

"And you're thoroughly enjoying yourself," she retorted crisply. "You didn't come here to cry on my lap."

"Don't be so abrupt with me," he complained. "Can't you see that I'm thoroughly unnerved—that the strain is telling. I'm not sure that I'm enjoying it so much. Fact is that I told Wilde some time ago that I was going back to the States. I'm a man of my word, I want to clean up."

The stranger behind the pillar brought the sandbag down upon the detective's head with terrific force. Stella Cliffe dashed towards the car and made her escape.

"Ah!" She tapped her lips thoughtfully with a small gold pencil, and her grey eyes clouded.

He leaned forward and put a hand gently on her knee.

"This is becoming deep water. I'm half- glad to eat it all out. Why not come back with me, Pat? Let Scotland Yard stew in its own juice. We're not children to keep on playing with fire."

"That's the dilemma between her fingers, and was silent for a few moments."

"No," she said with sudden decision. "It can't be done. We can't drop out halfway. We're got to go through to a finish. Besides, as you say, we're under suspicion. If either of us put foot on the gangway of a boat I wouldn't be surprised if we were immediately arrested."

"Wilde is capable of anything," he commented. "But he'd find it hard to prove."

"Even if we got clear there would be a nasty taste left." He tossed the remains of his cigarette away.

"Fairest and wisest of your sex, you said a mouthful. I'm getting senile—an exploded fallacy. I want a woman like you by my side for always."

She held up a warning forefinger.

"Let that pass," he said. "Do you know you'd make a fine Lacy MacIntosh. 'Oh, infirm of purpose, give me the dagger!' he quipped sarcastically. "Now let's take stock. Where do we stand?"
The THRILLER

She smiled down at him.

"I suppose you know that I'm being watched quite as closely as you are?"

"That dare I hear. He promised me — I'll while the hide off him for this!"

Patricia Langton gave an infectious little chuckle.

"Don't be absurd, Quentin. You'll do nothing of the sort. If you meet him you'll be as far from him as I am to you. It doesn't count, and a row will do no good. There's nothing at all obtrusive, and they're very considerate. Even when they searched this hotel I expect they had to go no more or less in its place. A little less observant person than I am might not have known anything had happened."

"You don't tell me?"

"Oh, I know they had no right. They just used a duplicitous key and went quietly through my papers. I had been expecting something of the sort, and had attached a small piece of black thread to the door, which was broken when I arrived this morning. But I should warn you — this is a crook that I am supposed to be would leave anything lying about! Let them amuse themselves. My immediate problem is Stella."

"Yes."

"She's getting restless. Wants to know what has happened to Dick Estechen."

"That's simple. You don't know.

"No; but she believes you do. And she thinks that I'm in the plot to tell her."

He handed himself to another cigarette.

"And that's a crooked notion," he observed calmly. "You don't mean to say that little handful of red peppers is really structure."

"Yes."

"I know it. It is difficult to believe—that that story—hearted, little crook should be hit that way. Maybe it's being idle-pluous. I don't know anything to do but think. If she didn't look on the police as her traditional enemies she would be going to Scotland Yard to-morrow. As it is she may have another talk with the men who are watching her. That would be awkward."

"It would," agreed Thorold. "It would be particularly awkward at this point. What about sending her away—a little trip abroad?"

"But we may want her at any minute."

"Paris is no distance from London by air.

"There are two objections to that. She might have to go, and if she did she might not stay there."

Before Thorold could reply there was a discreet tap at the door. A girl entered and laid her hand on the shopkeeper's shoulder. She glanced at it and, with a smile, handed it to the man.

"Wilde," her voice called. "Shall I stay?"

"Please do. You will make a pleasant surprise for him."

"Send him up."

The detective-inspector bowed gravely as he entered.

"Good morning, Miss Langton, Ah Mr. Thorold! I heard you were here."

The gentleman outside, of course, said Thorold, with the lightness of the blue tips of the eyebrows, "I hope he is not getting wet."

"Oh, it has been sheltered, thank you," replied Wilde imperiously.

"Your wish is my command," asked Patricia, "What can I do for you?"

Martin Wilde hiched a chair to an angle that afforded it an exclusive view of both of them, and settled himself with deliberation.

"Quite a small matter," he said. "It's about Stella Cliffe."

The shopkeeper, or the woman he addressed, showed any sign of the surprise that they felt, beyond the exchange of one swift, involuntary glance.

"Stella?" remarked Patricia, with calm interest. "I saw her last night."

"I know you did," said the detective. "You were with her for half an hour—from ten to half-past. That's the reason I have come to you. For, so far as we know, you were the last person to see her before she disappeared again."

Thorold jumped to his feet with a sudden rush. "You don't mean to say that damned little crook has disappeared again?"

"I imagined that you would appear surprised," said Wilde, with the faintest possible stress on the word "appear."

"What is this?" the millionaire regained his poise and laughed.

"Now how in the world could that happen, Wilde? If Miss Langton could not pay a casual call without knowing you all about it I guess you had somebody there with his eyes on the girl?"

"She was being watched," ascended the detective. "She was being watched. Miss Langton was seen in the streets of London this morning. One of my men who intervened was sandbagged, and before the other could get assistance she was spirited away."

"But Langton's grey eyes were wide and innocent."

"Amazing," she declared. "I'm sorry about your man. Did you want me to do anything about it?"

Wilde watched her carefully. "You found her before?" he ventured.

"Yes. So did I."

"Perhaps you could find her again?"

"Perhaps. I could. There was a hint of amusement in her tone. "But you forget. We have more to do than grope under the auspices of Scotland Yard. I gather that since then circumstances have changed."

"I have reason to believe that there is a suspicion."

"Confess I should find it a little difficult to trouble the roles of the rat and the mouse. So I think I will stick to my typewriter and become a blameless citizen of course, any information I can give you—"

She made a sweeping gesture with a slim hand. "His eyes met hers dourly.

"You're a clever woman, Miss Langton."

"Would you kindly put that in writing?" she challenged.

"He went on as though she had not interrupted."

"I am not going to leave—my—tempor, declared the detective. "This may not be so funny as you think. Now, Miss Langton..."

"And you, Monsieur."

"Not the last night, and what passed between you and Stella."

"I've taken an interest in Stella," said Patricia. "Our eyes met. "Mr. Wilde. She's an interesting study. I've been to see her and to see me several times, and I must confess I find nothing written and in her last night, and what passed between you and Stella?"

Wilde pulled a chair closer to the table, and said, "Nothing was said that would lead you to believe the contemplation was abandoned."

"No."

"Not the last, he assured her, and rose and reached for his hat. "I am sorry to have disappointed you. I see that you can't help me."

"Don't misunderstand the lady," interpreted Thorold. "She could—but she won't."

"I quite understand," agreed Wilde. "Thank you so much. Good-bye!"

The door closed after wild jingled some coppers in his pocket vigorously.

"We've declared open war, Pat. Here's a pretty kettle of fish. I wonder what the deuce has happened to Stella?"

A DEFIANCE!

No one knew better than Stella Cliffe how closely her every action was scrutinised. For that reason she, since her return to London, had subjected her appearance to a minute inspection with which the most severe Puritan could find no fault, but which was entirely alien to her temperament. Always, of course, she had been wary of the police, but that had in no great degree interfered with her habits complementarily.

But she had never before had detectives incessantly upon her heels for weeks on end, and she found the surveillance troublesome. She was not accustomed to a detective together, with a dread of his lack and cunning which lurks in the breast of most denizens of the underworld.

Somehow her mind turned upon Dick Estechen. He was a bood of a youth. She despised his intelligence, but, all the same, there was something about him which she liked. It may have been the man in him to protect him from his own folly that possessed her, but she herself maintained an anxiety for him. What had become of him? Why didn't she have some word?" Miss Langton and Quentin Thorold knew more than they would say, Why wouldn't they tell her about Dick?

She sat on her bed and, reckless of their fragility, tugged viciously at one of her silk gloves, and finally she tore it. She looked at the stain o'clock—why, the day had scarcely begun—'

"Darn it!" she exploded, as her fingers burst through the frail fabric.

Below a telephone rang, and the girl was listening the diagnosed loss from her landlady summoned her to the instrument, with one bare foot thrust into a scarlet slipper. She descended.

"Miss Cliffe?" a yoke, as she answered in the affirmative, went on: "Listen. I don't want to mention names, but I'm pretty sure somebody can tell you where to pick a suit-case and be ready for a car in the next hour or so?"

Stella's nimble wits were instantly, on the alert.

"What's the bright idea?" she asked guardedly.

"From the other end of the wire there came an impatient oath.

"You want to stuff out I've got no time to argue!"

The girl hesitated an instant before replying. She had no doubt from whom the message came, though it took her up her mind. Recent events had shown her that she would be playing with fire, and what end had she to gain?"

She approved lightly. "Roll out the soft stop! I want to know what it's all about. I'm not going gallivanting around in the middle of the night with any gentleman to know what's for."

"Sorry. That's all right, Stella. You can beat it back to bed if you like, my dear, though it is pretty certain that Dick was anxious to see you; that's all. If you don't care to turn out, let it go."

Her grip on the receiver tightened.

(Another long instalment of this powerful serial appears next week in THE THRILLER. Avoid disappointment by ordering your copy TODAY!)"