....“I have REDUCED MY WAIST EIGHT INCHES WITH THE WEIL BELT!”

...writes George Bailey

So many wearers are delighted with the results obtained with the Weil Belt that we want you to test it for ten days at our expense!

REDUCE YOUR WAIST 3 INCHES IN 10 DAYS ... or it won’t cost you a penny!

Because we have done this for thousands of others... because we know we can do as much for you... we dare to make this unconditional offer!

You will appear much slimmer at once, and in 10 short days your waistline will actually be 3 inches smaller... three inches of fat gone... or it won’t cost you one cent.

IT IS THE MASSAGE-LIKE ACTION THAT DOES IT!

Now there is an easy way to reduce without exercise, diet or drugs. The Weil Health Belt exerts a massage-like action that removes fat with every move you make.

It supports the sagging muscles of the abdomen and quickly gives you an erect, athletic carriage. Many enthusiastic wearers write that it not only reduces fat but it also supports the abdominal walls and keeps the digestive organs in place... that they are no longer fatigued... and that it greatly increases their endurance. You will be more than delighted with the great improvement in your appearance.

DON’T WAIT... FAT IS DANGEROUS!

Fat is not only unbecoming, but it also endangers your health. Insurance companies know the danger of fat accumulations. The best medical authorities warn against obesity, so don’t wait any longer.

Remember this... either you take off 3 inches of fat in 10 days or it won’t cost one penny! Even the postage you pay to return the package will be refunded!

NO DRUGS, NO DIETS, NO EXERCISES

For 12 years the Weil Belt has been accepted as ideal for reducing by men in all walks of life... from business men and office workers who find that it removes cumbersome fat with every movement... to active outdoor men who like the feeling of protection it gives.

SEND FOR 10 DAY FREE TRIAL OFFER

THE WEIL COMPANY, INC.
735 HILL ST., NEW HAVEN, CONN.

Gentlemen: Send me FREE, your illustrated folder describing The Weil Belt and giving full details of your 10 day FREE trial offer and Unconditional Guarantee!

Name ____________________________
Address __________________________
City __________________ State ______

Use coupon or send name and address on penny postcard.
OLD MONEY WANTED

We Pay The World's Highest Prices

UP TO $5000.00 EACH

Big Cash Premiums
FOR HUNDREDS OF COINS
NOW CIRCULATING

There are literally thousands of old coins and bills that we want at once and for which we will pay big cash premiums. Many of these coins are now passing from hand to hand in circulation. Today or tomorrow a valuable coin may come into your possession. Watch your change. Know what to look for.

Don't sell your coins, encased postage stamps, or paper money to any other dealer until you have first seen the prices that we will pay for them.

WE WILL PAY FOR 1909 CENTS UP TO $10.00 EACH 1860 Cents $50.00 — Cents of 1861, 1864, 1865, 1869, 1870, 1881, 1889, $20.00 each — Half Cents $250.00 — Large Copper Cents $2000.00 — Flying Eagle Cents $20.00 — Half Dimes $150.00 — 20c Pieces $100.00 — 25c before 1873 $300.00 — 50c before 1879 $750.00 — Silver Dollars before 1874 $2500.00 — Trade Dollars $250.00 — Gold Dollars $1000.00 — $2.50 Gold Pieces before 1876, $600.00 — $3 Gold Pieces $1000.00 — $5 Gold Pieces before 1886, $5000.00 — $10 Gold Pieces before 1908, $150.00 — Commemorative Half Dollars $6.00 — Commemorative Gold Coins $115.00.

PAPER MONEY — Fractional Currency $25.00, Confederate Bills $15.00, Encased Postage Stamps $12.00.

FOREIGN COINS — Certain Copper or Silver Coins $15.00, Gold Coins $150.00, etc.

Don't Wait! Send Dime Today for Our Large Illustrated List Before Sending Coins.

Address your envelope to:

ROMANO'S COIN SHOP
Dept. 589
Springfield, Mass.

CUT — FILL OUT AND MAIL TODAY!

ROMANO'S COIN SHOP, Dept. 589
Springfield, Mass.

Gentlemen: Please send me your large illustrated list for which I enclose 10¢ in cash carefully wrapped. (Please print plainly.)

NAME ________________________________

ADDRESS ________________________________

CITY __________________ STATE __________

Please mention Western Fiction Monthly when answering advertisements.
CONTENTS

A COMPLETE 75,000 WORD NOVEL

The Diamond River Kid ................. Eugene Cunningham 6
He turned his back to the call of the wild bunch and blazed the fastest guns the territory ever saw to exact a vengeance that was his and to bring law to an outlaw country.

** ** **

TWO SMASHING SHORT STORIES

Good Enough for the Rangers ............. Raymond S. Spears 99
Soft, yes—but not yellow. A cowboy proves himself a good man for the Texas outlaw busters.

The Border Bandits ................. John Carlisle 110
Down on the roaring border a gunslick “Americano” teaches a greaser band that crime does not pay.

Cover by J. W. Scott
Illustrations by L. F. Bjorklund

Vol. III, No. 1

JAMES RANDALL, Editor
ONLY
175 a month
(at age 30) for this 1000.00
Whole Life Policy!

Low Rates At All Ages — Men or Women

WE HAVE NO AGENTS. You share the savings we make by eliminating commissions, branch office expenses, and high overhead charges. Low initial rates—reduced still further by TWO DIVIDENDS: guaranteed 91/2% dividend, and an additional contingent dividend as earned. Policies include all standard Privileges, Benefits, and Values.

$42,000,000.00 Paid Out
Postal offers you the life time protection of real Old Line, Legal Reserve Life Insurance with cash and loan values and all standard provisions guaranteed in the policy. This strong, 30 year old company operating under the rigid New York State Insurance laws has paid out over $42,000,000.00 to policy holders and their beneficiaries. Insurance is vital! Get the facts at once. Mail coupon. There is no obligation.

Does Postal Issue Other Policies?
Yes — all standard forms of life insurance and Annuity contracts, too. We have policies to fit every situation and every pocketbook — for individuals between ages 10 and 60. Women are insured at the same rates as men. There are special policies for "Juniors." Send the coupon below—let us recommend a contract that best fits you.

Get the Facts!
Find out how Postal can lower the cost of insuring your life. Even if you are not "in the market" for life insurance right now, find out what Postal can do for you. Send the coupon for the facts—it places you under NO OBLIGATION. You'll want to know about the BUY-DIRECT-AND-SAVE Plan, anyway.

CLIP AND MAIL THIS COUPON NOW!
Postal Life Insurance Company
511 Fifth Ave., Dept. RW-94, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen:
Send me, without obligation, complete information about your low-cost $1,000 WHOLE-LIFE Policy and the BUY-DIRECT-AND-SAVE PLAN.

Name ..................................................
Street ................................................................
City .......................................................... State ..................................................
Date of birth .................................. Occupation ..................................
THE ART OF DANCING
THE CARLO, CONTINENTAL, RHUMBA, KIDS DANCE, ETC.

LEARN TO DANCE THE LATEST STEPS. Repopularize this season. Really good dancers are always admired—always admired, whether you are part of home—rite who cracked, loves and mystery friends. "World Mike" any set. Not a Toy. Also put on your pro-reductions in this new book you won’t need to make reduc-tations when the dancers are out, but fun out of parties and dances. If you want to become a perfect dancer, do your dances at home this new,

WHAT THE BOOK TELLS: How to develop sate and control. how to improve your dance strength, the art of holding, how to move to music, how to do the quickstep, the waltz, the fox trot, the swing, the foxtrot, the waltz, the fox trot, the swing, the

JOHNSON SMITH CO., Dept. 506. DETROIT, MICH.

ELECTRIC EYE PHOTOELECTRIC CELL

The Electric Eye—Photoelectric Cell—is one of the very latest scientific discoveries that have many practical applications. The cell might open a garage, window, door, turn lights on or off, or start or stop an electric motor. The Electric Eye is the basis of all television sets. The miracle with a million uses! No experiment and investigation. Why not be one of the many

Super-sensitive Electric Eye—Photocell

25c

BOYS! THROW YOUR VOICE into a trunk, under the bed or anywhere. Lots of fun fooling teacher, policeman or friend.

THE VENTRILCO
a little instrument, fits in the mouth out of sight, used with above for Bird Calls, etc. Anyone can use it. Never fails. A 64-page Book, "Ventriloquism and the

BLANK CARTRIDGE PISTOL REVOLVER STYLE

25c

10c

These new modes now out, 25c, 50c and $1.00. Ideal gift and game. Made to perascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to perascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-
ascribed. Made to per-

JOHNSON SMITH & CO,, Dept. 506, Detroir, Mich.
MAIL COUPON

MY FREE BOOK TELLS HOW

Act today for better pay. Act today to break away from a low pay, no-future job. Act to get away from having to skimp, scrape to pay your bills. Mail coupon for my free 64-page book. It tells you how I will train you at home in your spare time to be a Radio Expert; about my training that has helped hundreds of men make more money.

Many Radio Experts Make $30, $50, $75 a Week

Consider those facts—think of the good jobs they stand for. Over 20,000,000 Radio sets in use, over 600 broadcasting stations, over 40 manufacturers of Radio sets, over 3,000 manufacturers of parts, over 100 Police Departments Radio equipped, airplanes and airports Radio equipped. Thousands of ships touching every seaport of the world, Radio equipped. Over 25,000 stores selling sets and parts, about 2,000,000 autos Radio equipped and about 20,000,000 unequipped. Loud speaker systems wherever people gather indoors and outdoors. Commercial Radio stations dotting our coast lines. Radio a big industry—is growing bigger fast. A few hundred $30, $50, $75 a week jobs, have grown to thousands.

Get ready now for Jobs like these

A spare time or full time service shop; installing, maintaining, operating—broadcast, aviation, commercial, ship, television and police Radio stations. A retail Radio business of your own. Installing, maintaining, servicing loud speaker systems. A service or sales job with a store or jobber. I'll train you for good jobs in every important branch of Radio.

Many make $5, $10, $15 a week extra in Spare Time almost at once Every neighborhood can use a good part time serviceman. The day you enroll I start sending you Extra Money Job Sheets which quickly show you how to do Radio repair jobs common in most every neighborhood. Get my book—one for yourself that many of my students make $200 to $1,000 in their spare time while learning.

Your money back if not satisfied

I'll make this agreement with you. If you are not entirely satisfied with my Lesson and Instruction Service when you graduate, I'll refund you your tuition.

Find out what Radio Offers

Mail the coupon. My book of information on Radio’s spare time and full time opportunities is free to any ambitious fellow over 15. Read what Radio offers you. Read about the training I offer you. Read letters from graduates—what they are doing and earning. There's no obligation. Mail coupon in an envelope or paste it on a postal card—NOW.

J. E. SMITH, President, National Radio Institute, Dept. 6EK1, Washington, D. C.
The plaza was the only busy part of Tom’s Bluff when young Lit Taylor came along the Diamond River’s bank from Ike Menter’s saloon. There was to be a race of unusual sort—a man against a horse. The lithe, carefree young buckaroos of the Bar-B, the XLA, the L-in-a-Box, the Ladder-M, the Three-Prod, and other outfits big and little, had gathered to watch the race and lay some bets—chiefly on the horse, of course!

Lit was not much interested in the race. Today, he had a decision to make. And he was pulled two ways—pulled by loyalty to Old Man Barbee his foster-father, pulled by restlessness that burned in him and made him weary of everything he knew, made him itch to swing up on his black horse and go riding to meet the line where the blue Texas sky came down to touch the flat lands.

He went slowly across the dusty width of the plaza, six feet tall, wolfishly lean in blue flannel shirt and green wool trousers that were rammed hit-or-miss into bootlegs. His floppy black hat was pushed back on his dark hair. Ordinarily pleasant face was a mask of sulky bronze.

He loafed up to the men massed about the starting line. "Slippery" Elms, like Lit a Bar-B rider, cocked tousled towhead up at the taller man. He was more than a little drunk, Slippery. He always stayed that way when the Bar-B outfit played in Tom's bluff.

"It ain't in reason no man can outrun a quarter hawse—not fifty yard to that post an' fifty yard back!" he said beligerently, as if Lit had held the contrary. "Is it, boy?"

"Don't know," Lit shrugged, without interest.

"If I had me some dinero I'd certainly bet," Slippery grunted. "But I spent my last sou on a bottle—drink, Lit?"

Lit hesitated, then nodded. He took the flask and lifted it to his mouth. He didn't want another drink, but he was not yet twenty-one and correspondingly anxious to show that he could do anything, at any time, that any one else could do. He let the flaming home-made whiskey run down his throat, choked back a sputter and returned the bottle. As he watched the odd, imperturbable figure of the man who would run Jick Rogers’s sorrel horse, a slight haze wavered between his eyes and the broad, long-legged stranger. For he had downed several tincupsfuls of Ike Menter’s liquor since breakfast and it was not yet eleven of the morning.

“Yon’ comes Frenchy an’ his gang,” Slippery grinned. “I bet you Frenchy an’ them other Rowdy River boys’ll bet.”

Lit turned a little. Dark eyes narrowed. It was the boy-gunman who had given him his problem. One by one, he sized for the hundredth time the quarter crossing the plaza toward him. But with more thought of Frenchy Leonard than of the others, who were merely the followers of the handsome, deadly youngster.

Good sports, all, were Frenchy, Art Brand, big “Irish Tim” Fenelon and “Hog nose” Ott. Tom’s Bluff said so, in a majority of its voices. Good fellows, for all that three of them were, each in his own right, figures of blazing notoriety throughout a wide scope of country, and much wanted by the authorities of certain counties in the neighboring Territory.

During the winter, like the dozens of other cowboys who made Tom’s Bluff their rendezvous or place-of-call, to drink and gamble at poker and monte, to dance at the bailes down in “Hogtown,” the Mexican quarter, and make wild love to the slim, pretty, ready-mouthed girls, Lit Taylor had fraternized with the four outlaws. He had eaten with them, drunk with them.

THEIR records meant nothing at all to the Diamond River buckaroos. It was a long way from this little cow-town on the Diamond’s bank over to the Territory. Rewards on their heads, even, were nothing more than appealing marks of saltiness. The happy-go-lucky riders in and about this lusty little community scorned blood money.

So Frenchy Leonard’s gang, which had ridden like a band of raiding Arabs up and down the Territory, was greeted in Tom’s Bluff precisely like any other quartet of floating cowboys.

“Hello!” the cowboys said. “They never dabbed a loop on any of our stuff. And they put none of our bunch in Boot Hill. If that bunch of star-toters over in the Territory want Frenchy and his outfit so bad, why don’t they come get ‘em? It’s not up to Diamond River men to do their work for ‘em!”

Even now, Lit saw how, as usual, Frenchy and the others had Diamond River men with them. The slender, dark, cat-graceful, cat-quick boy owned an odd magnetism that drew most men irresistible. Lit had fallen under the spell during the winter. Now, it was for him to decide whether he would throw in with Frenchy, ride west with the four, or stick on the Bar-B to go through all the hard, tiresome work of spring round-up and ensuing routine. He found it a troublesome decision.

Not that he bothered much about the legal features of Frenchy’s troubles. He was at the age to look at the adventurous side of things. Too, Frenchy had several times told him how the price had been put upon his head. As Frenchy related the story, it was so reasonable, so familiar, that Lit or any other could say: “Off the old chunk! Big cowmen are always up to something like that. It could happen to you, or me, or anybody!”

It was old Barbee who checked Lit’s quick acceptance of Frenchy Leonard’s offer. Years before, back in Tennessee, he and Lit’s father had been the closest of friends. When Lit had been orphaned, eight years before, it was Barbee who had heard of it and made the journey back to get Lit and bring him to his house and in every way stand in place of Lit’s father.

Barbee was like the rest of the big cowmen. As men of property, they were naturally more analytical of strangers than were the wild young hands. Old Barbee had in no degree fallen under the spell of this always-smiling master gunman who, despite his scant twenty years, was said to have no equal at handling the Colts, and who was acknowledged leader of men almost twice his age. He did not like Frenchy. He said so, very plainly.

They came on across to Lit and Slippery. Frenchy stopped at Lit’s elbow:
“Hi, boy!” he cried cheerfully. “How you bettin’?”

“Don’t know,” Lit shrugged. “Likely, neither way.”

“He aims to git his growth, an’ not crowd his luck none, before he steps out an’ bucks growed-up men,” a voice drawled.

Lit turned slowly, to stare into the long, jade-green eyes of a man whom he had hated at first sight, hated without asking himself why he should know instantly that here was an enemy—the first man he had ever hated.

This was a newcomer to Tom’s Bluff, known only as “Bisbee.” The cowboys had nicknamed him promptly after their fashion, when he said that he was up from Arizona and named a camp without too much of hesitation. He was as tall as Lit, but forty pounds heavier. Wide of shoulders, thick of chest, there was something bearish about his bigness and the way he moved, shambling, yet sure of himself, among the wild touchy young riders using the cow-town on the Diamond.

He had long, sleek, black hair and a large, strangely pallid face.

BISBEE’S strange, long green eyes, his gash of a mouth, his habit of sitting statue-still by the hour in a saloon’s corner, staring straight ahead; the shrill, spine-rasping cackle of his infrequent laughter—all these things had effect upon Tom’s Bluff in general, as upon Lit Taylor in particular. Though he had hooked up with the Three-Prod and proved himself a Hand in every department of the puncher’s work, not even to fellow riders had he ever thowed in the least degree. Now, with heavy, doughy face contemptuous, he grinned at Lit.

“How”—Lit spoke in gentlest drawl, copying as nearly as possible old Barbee’s war voice—“are the Old Folks betting?”

Bisbee’s cackling laugh rasped his nerves. But he kept his flaming temper under control. Above everything, he must avoid acting like a yapping kid.

“Sonny!” Bisbee grinned. “Us grown folks, we feel like puttin’ up some oro on the hawse. ‘Course, mebbe we don’t know. Mebbe it’s the Orphan Asylum’ll show us up.”

“Looks like “put up, or shut up” to me,” Frenchy grinned.

Lit’s eyes shuttled almost irritably to Frenchy. He had a hundred dollars, but that was spotted for a saddle. Left alone, he would have “experted” just as Bisbee was doing—in favor of Jieck Rogers’s horse against the runner. He came very near to disliking Frenchy at that moment. But he kept his face blank.

“Maybe a hundred dollars on the man will help you think, the next time you start picking a winner,” he said evenly.

“Hold the stakes, Frenchy!” Bisbee grinned. “This is the nearest to money from home that I had in years!”

“They’re about ready.” Slippery Elms called excitedly. “Limin’ up, now! Ever see laigs like that stranger’s got!”

Lit held himself relaxed as he turned to watch the start.

He had spoken merest truth, when he said that heretofore the race had not interested him. But, now that his money was up and what amounted to an issue existed, between him and Bisbee, he found himself staring grimly at his hope, appraising those long, knobby-kneed legs that must outpace the fastest thing in horseflesh that the Diamond River boasted.

As he stared, with brown face hardened, toward the curious ones at the starting line, he thought that he would cheerfully waive all claim to the hundred if he could only win. He wanted to look Bisbee up and down and laugh gently—the way old Barbee would do it, or Long Al Kendrick the Bar-B wagon boss, or any other of the salty, seasoned figures to whom the young buckarooos looked for Model and Manners.

The mass of men about runner and horse thickened, then gave back. Lit could better see the start, now. He frowned.

“Not going to give the man a start,” he thought. “That looks funny. Any man running against that little dun devil ought to have some lead!”

He saw an arm come up above the wide hats of the cowboys. An arm that raised a long-barreled Colt. Over the murmur of voices, there sounded abruptly the heavy bellow of a .45 shot.

The runner was gone. Almost, it seemed, he “beat the gun.” For he was crossing the plaza with those knobby knees lifting, falling, lifting, falling, while yet the dun seemed to be gathering himself together. He ran as Lit had never seen a man run before; ran as he had hardly dreamed a man could run. The dun, though, was moving now.

"Yaaawaaah!" Lit yelled—nor knew that his voice was drowned by the other yells of the triumphant, or startled, cowboys about him. "Yaaawaaah!"

The incredibly long legs were flashing like—like the pistons of an engine, Lit thought. The dun, though, was crawling up on the runner. He reached him, then for an instant as the cottonwood post on the plaza’s far side was near, the runner was blanketed by the horse’s streaking body, twinkling legs.

Bisbee spoke drawlingly, all but in Lit’s ear:

“Aw, now! Ain’t that hell! An’ for a minute you could almost count that money! Well—live an’ learn! ought to be a kid’s motto, I say. An’ nothin’ like losin’ money to learn ‘em!”

“That so?” Lit inquired gently, narrowed, furious eyes on the confusion about that cottonwood post which the racers must round. “You—” He stiffened incredulously, then whirled triumphantly back to Bisbee. “Looky!” he bellowed. “Just looky!”

For the runner had the inside on the way to the post. He slapped hand upon it, came around it in a snaky twist and was pounding down the homestretch while still the dun swung wide. Those knobby knees, those long legs, seemed merely something hazy, fluttering, suspended from the runner’s waist.

If he had seemed to run like a machine on the way to the post, Lit had no words to describe the speed with which he hurried toward the starting point. When he came closer, with the dun now pounding in his wake, Lit saw that the indifference was vanished from the man’s face. It was twisted, now, strained; he was concentrated on manufacturing the utmost in speed to beat that dun flash behind him.

Lit, at least, now had little doubt of the outcome. The light rider on the dun jerked arm aloft. His quirt descended, rose, descended... He was quirting his mount furiously—quirting him withers and haunches. But it was too late—the man was too far ahead to be more than caught at the line.

Lit leaned this way and that, to see through the confusion over there at the line what had happened. The dun was little behind the runner now. Then—

A terrific roar went up, from the crowd there. Lit sent his own hat zooming up and yelled savagely. Suddenly, he caught himself, wiped expression from his face as with a sponge. He relaxed in every muscle of long body and turned with slitted, indifferent eyes to Bisbee.

The big man’s doughy face was whiter than Lit had ever seen it before. The gash-thin mouth was lipless and lifted at one side. Slowly, as if drawn by Lit’s stare, Bisbee turned to face the Bar-B’s “baby.” Long, jade-green eyes were very bright. They made Lit think of the eyes of a sidewinder rattlesnake he had killed. But whatever Bisbee might have said or done was interrupted by Frenchy.

The grinning boy whirled and smacked a hand hard between Bisbee’s shoulder blades. There was an impishness about Frenchy that Lit had noted before this—he was always finding a way to plague the men about him, egging one against another. He seemed to be laughing at Bisbee, now, as before the race he had seemed to laugh at Lit:

“Well, sir!” he cried. “If my eyes don’t deceive me, the impossible has happened. An’ all this here dinero I got in my paw, it’s Lit’s. You see her like that, Bisbee!”

Bisbee swallowed, seemed about to speak, but only nodded.

“Well,” Lit said in the easiest, most careless, voice he could manage—a tolerable copy of old Barbee’s in moments of strain, “I think I’ll split my winnings with the runner.”

CHAPTER II

THE TIN TYPE GIRL

Coming down the river bank, rounding the curve on which Boot Hill sprawled with its dozen of raw graves, Lit met Old Man Barbee. The wizened little cowman stopped and fumbled in the pockets of ancient, buttonless vest for tobacco and papers.

"Well," he drawled, "looks like you kind o' shut Bisbee up—for the time being'. But that won't end things, sonny. He will be to kill, yet! Don't you think he won't."

"He don't like losing," Lit nodded.

Barbee worked with brown "saddle blanket," paper, rolling a match-thin cigarette. He thrust it in his mouth under straggling gray mustache, reached to hat band for a match, flicked head on thumbnail. Over the tiny flame his shrewd, narrow old eyes were carelessly steady on the young face opposite.

"Reckon that Frenchy an' his bunch'll be hittin' out, today. Back to the Rowdy, huh?"

Lit's eyes shuttled suspiciously to the blank, wise old face. Barbee stared without expression down the street.

"Well," Barbee said after a moment of silence. "What do you 'low, Lit? You have been right thick with 'em."

Lit shrugged. His face was sulky. Barbee waited, but when it was plain that Lit did not intend to reply, he took the cigarette from his mouth. He was watching Lit, now. The roll of hard fingers that reduced cigarette to shreds of paper and tobacco, floating on the little wind, seemed unconsciously done.

"Sonny," he said very slowly, "I hope you don't listen too much to Frenchy Leonard. He's a bad egg. I know it. You will know the same, some day. Swingin' a wide loop is one thing—lots of us have done that, then settled down to decent livin'. But Frenchy an' them gun-fightin' thieves with him, they are throwin' the long rope, dabbin' the hungry loop onto other folks' stuff. An' you can't talk around plain rustlin'! No, sir!"

Lit felt forced to say something. And there was very little that he thought of, nothing at all which would contradict Barbee's opinion. He nodded vaguely. "I know," he nodded, "I know all that. I have been thinking things over a lot."

"You have got a good head on you," Barbee nodded, then added with the ghost of a grin hovering in the wrinkles of his weathered face, "even if to date you haven't used it much!"

He turned away. Lit looked after him. Sulkiness lightened. There was real affection in his expression. Then he lifted one shoulder uncertainly, went on around the loop of the Diamond that plucked with wet, greedy fingers at Boot Hill graves. Before he came to Ike Menter's weathered store-saloon, he heard the sounds of celebration. When he reached the door, on impulse he did not go in, but stopped in the doorway.

His lean six feet were all too many for the door. So he put back against one facing and stretched long legs comfortably. He stared out fixedly, unseeingly, upon the single dusty street of Tom's Bluff.

His position made it necessary for thirsty warriors of the various outfits to step over him. Several did so enter the saloon. They made goodhumored, if profane, comment, as they cleared the barrier. Lit hardly heard them. He was concentrating on the problem that worried him.

He moved his shoulders impatiently, at last. He shifted the hang of his cartridge belt with a twitch that slightly moved the long-barreled, single-action 44 Colt in its open-topped holster, brought the butt under his hand. He straightened, with a single sinuous movement like the stretching of a young timber wolf.

As he stood erect, turning a little, he found himself staring Bisbee straight in the face. And Bisbee's long green eyes were narrow...
But he gave little thought to that. He was stiffened by that instinctive hostility he had always known for this one-eared, green-eyed man. Deliberately, he let right hand sag a little more, until it was all but about the Colt’s handle. He had only to close his fingers, to grip the curving black butt.

‘There’s a quick way of getting me out of here!’ he told Bisbee, in the slow drawl that was copy of old Barbee’s. ‘That is, of course, if you’ve got no grudge against hanging out in Boot Hill!’

The tension made the back of his neck seem to burn. He was nervous, strained, to the point of shaking—and he knew it and the realization made him more furious still. He was not afraid of Bisbee. He was merely afraid that he might not get through the mechanical part of a row with Bisbee in a way that would make him pleased with himself. He had seen the mechanics of a gun-fight three or four times, operating in battles between other men. He was horribly afraid that he would show the nervousness he felt. That was the deadly sin!

‘Boot Hill, sonny,’ Bisbee replied in unworried-seeming sneer, ‘is a place I might use for a garden. But it won’t be no mouthy damned kid makes me use it for a bunkin’ place!’

With that grim boast, he came straight at Lit, who waited stiffly, sucking breath in swiftly between hard-clenched teeth, his gun-hand like a claw that ached for sheer rigidity of tendons.

Lit felt as if he were standing high up above everything, in a sort of cold isolation. In a split-second, he was either going to kill a man or himself be killed. It was his first experience of the kind and he had plenty of imagination which leaped ahead of this moment, painted the details in vividest colorings. He was much like a thoroughbred colt at the first barrier. Then—Bisbee brushed past him, went on inside without a sidewise or backward look.

Lit wheeled mechanically, to watch the big figure shamble down the length of the unpainted pine bar. He watched Bisbee halt beside Frenchy Leonard. Bisbee leaned to the slim boy and pressed great shoulder against Frenchy’s. He seemed to be whispering and Frenchy listened intently, head on one side, staring up into Bisbee’s tallow face. At the end, when Bisbee straightened, waited, Frenchy seemed to consider for seconds. Then he grinned, shrugged and shoved a whiskey bottle toward Bisbee, who made a long arm and got a tin cup, poured himself a drink.

Now that the strain was past, Lit found himself shaking violently. He wondered why Bisbee had backed down. He wondered if he had comported himself properly. Should he have made Bisbee stand up to his threats? It bothered him very much. He tried to think it out, recalling what he knew of men who were looked up to as models in this rough world.

But he had not made any decision when the throng inside came surging out to the street. Lit stepped back to watch them pass. He hoped that they would simply swing into the saddles and go on, taking it for granted that he was not joining them. That would simplify his problem. Rather, it would wipe out the problem. He would always regret not going, but if he went, he knew that he would be uncomfortable every time he thought of old Barbee’s wise, wrinkled face, his shrewd, kindly eyes.

Frenchy passed, looking toward the horses, missing Lit. Art Brand, Hognose, the huge Tim Fenelon, went past Lit without noticing him. Then Frenchy, catching up trailing reins, turned. His amber-flecked black eyes found Lit, who leaned gloomily against the building’s front wall.

The little outlaw’s prominent teeth—that showed always in the semblance of a grin, whether he danced or drank or fought—flashed now in widening of the grin. He lifted a hand.

‘Lit! Oh, Lit!’ he called. ‘Come here a minute, boy.’

Unwillingly, Lit went over to stand and look down at Frenchy. Brand and Fenelon and Ott mounted, then sat watching the two, the tall youngster and the short.

‘Aw, come on with us,’ Frenchy urged Lit, in confidential tone. Grudgingly, Lit admitted that it still had influence over him, in spite of the way Frenchy had seemed to play Bisbee against him, at the race. "You're too good a man to stick here!"

"I don't know what to do," Lit shrugged, "I swear—I just don't. I think one way, then think the other."

"Think this way, then!" Frenchy grinned. "We're headin' for a hot time, a sweet time. I'd like to cut you in on it. I need another good boy I can depend on. An' his name's—Lit Taylor! Listen!"

Lit's shifting eyes found a face, grim, weathered to the red-brown color of an old saddle, blank of all expression, in the background of the men outside the store. Old Man Barbee watched without making any sign whatever. But mere sight of him was enough to make Lit uncomfortable.

Frenchy scooped up his reins, swung into the saddle. He looked down at Lit.

"We'll do more'n bulge your pockets," he grinned. "We'll make a Man out o' you, sonny!"

The cowboys laughed, staring from Frenchy to Lit and back again. Lit stiffened and glared at Frenchy. Standing an even six feet in bootless feet, muscled like a jaguar, flashingly deft of movement as a big cat—to have Frenchy Leon hard a year his junior, insinuate that he was no more than a kid, infuriated him as almost nothing else could have done.

Under the smooth tan of his face the blood surged up. He could break Frenchy across his knee, throw Art Brand or Hognose Ott over his shoulder, even match the huge Fenelon at rough-and-tumble fighting. He lowered at them, where Fenelon and Brand leaned across saddle horns, grinning at him and Ott—after a quick glance around for cue—began to laugh.

"Say!" he cried furiously. "Any time I— You—none of you— Make a man out of me, hell! Why—"

"Hightail it!" Frenchy yelled. "We'll come hear him preach, some day. I bet you, he's a Babish!"

He roveled the long-legged buckskin he rode, went up the sandy track like something shot from a gun. The others hurtled after him. Back to the crowd before Menter's came Frenchy's gay yell:

"Yaaahhiaaah! Leavin' town!"

Lit stared after the riders, now vanishing in the dust cloud. Leaning there against the cottonwood hitch rack, he found himself disgusted with everything he knew. Found himself, too, faced by a new puzzle.

His wandering eyes found something in the sand at his feet, something that glinted from the spot where Frenchy Leonard had been standing. Lit moved a step forward, bent, picked up an oval locket of yellow gold that dangled, now, from a bit of thin chain. He stared.

"I wonder! Did Frenchy drop this?" he asked himself. Certainly, he had found it in a spot which had been all but under the buckskin's hoofs.

He turned the locket over and over, saw a tiny catch button and pressed it. There was a picture inside. He stared and his eyes went narrow as he looked at the girl's face.

She was young—very young, he decided. And the fluffy hair was yellow. He knew it, somehow. So, naturally, the wide, frank eyes must be blue. She had a forehead low and broad, a pert little nose, well-shaped mouth that matched determined chin. All in all—

"By Gemini!" he breathed amazedly.

"I didn't know they raised 'em like that, in this part of the country or over in the Territory! In all my ramblings and ramblings. I've never come onto anything like her match. Wonder who she can be? And how the devil did that little killer-rustler get hold of this?"

A SOFT scuffling of feet behind him, that stopped suddenly, stiffened Lit. Instinctively, he slid the locket into a shirt pocket, then turned, fumbling with the strings of tobacco sack.

It was Bisbee, a yard away. The doughy face was expressionless, but the green eyes were narrow, very bright, as he stared fixedly at Lit's lifted hand. Lit took out his tobacco, met the stare stonily. Bisbee rid himself of cigarette stub by the simple expedient of blowing it from his lips.

"What was that you picked up, sonny?" he demanded flatly.

Lit drew a long, slow breath, trying to rid himself of the tension that this one-eared man could rouse in him. Then, holding his voice very low, very even:
"And how does that happen to be any of your damned business?" he asked.

He was standing now with the hand that held tobacco sack against the black butt of his Colt. It seemed to him that Bisbee's green eyes flashed down to find Lit's gun-hand, then up.

"I can easy make it some o' my business, sonny," Bisbee nodded meaningly, after a lengthy moment.

"Oh," Lit nodded in his turn.

"You've got a wolf, then. Well, untie him! Let him howl! And you listen to one thing, Mister: Don't make any more of your 'sonny' breaks! Around me, they'll average up just about one to a killing!"

"I see," Bisbee said mockingly. "It's got its lil' popgun—just like real folks. It might even think it was real folks. But I ain't easy bluffed! Now, about whatever it was that you picked up—"

Lit could hold the copy of Barbee's drawl no longer.

"What's the matter?" he jeered.

"Where's that great, big wolf that was going to bite me? Hell's bells! Mean to say I'm not dead, yet? I must be! After all your big talk. Oh, you want to know about what I picked up, do you? Well, I'll tell you about that: Whatever it was, you can have a look at it—when you get big enough to take it away from me! Put up or—shut up!"

"You got a lot to find out, yet," Bisbee grunted. But if his voice were contemptuous drawl, he could not keep balked fury out of his eyes. Lit saw—and wondered—and was suddenly triumphant. He grinned one-sidedly at the elder man.

"Don't you think for a minute that this'll settle a thing!" Bisbee warned him and turned away, back toward the saloon door.

Lit grinned faintly. It had been amazingly easier to face the prospect of gun-play, here, this time! That much he could mark down on the credit side of the affair.

CHAPTER III

"What'd You Pick Up—Sonny?"

TOWARD supper time, Lit wandered back to Ike Menter's. He was in bad humor. For, as he had expected, everywhere that he had gone he had been greeted by Frenchy's taunt. The gunman's sneer at his callowness had been recalled with huge enjoyment by the cowboys in town. The fact that they were all his very good friends made their grinning remarks the more aggravating, for it limited the steps he could take to show his resentment. So he was scowling when he stalked into Menter's and pushed in between drinkers to demand whiskey.

"That's right—sonny!" someone yelled from the bar's end. "Make a Man out of you!"

Before Lit could whirl to locate the jester, Bisbee's flat drawl sounded, all but behind him:

"What'd you pick up—sonny? Off the ground a while ago?"

Something seemed to click in Lit's brain, warning him not to make a sudden turn. So it was slowly—very slowly—that he wheeled, letting his right hand slide most naturally toward his side as he turned. He faced Bisbee, who stood with feet wide apart, both thumbs hooked in the crossed shell belts that sagged on his thighs. Bisbee's hands were almost upon the wicked white butt of the heavy Colts that he wore in tied-down holsters.

"This," Lit thought with odd surprise, "is showdown."

But when he stood watching Bisbee, he could manage—if with immense effort—to control his face, to look with surprise at the green-eyed man, even to shake his head bewilderedly.

"Why, it seems to me"—he was pleasantly surprised to hear the steadiness of his voice—"that I spoke to you about it, then. Let's see—what was it I told you? Oh, yes! I remember, now! I told you it was none of your damned business!"

"An' I told you that I could easy make it some o' my business—sonny!"

Bisbee's tone was flat, as always; his heavy, white face was without expression. But in the long, green eyes now burned a light that Lit, young as he was and comparatively inexperienced, knew as the killing lust shining through.

Beyond Bisbee, in the forefront of the now silent cowboys, Lit saw Old Man Barbee, rigid of body and features. There was nothing that the old man could do. By the code of the day and place, Lit was a man grown and this was his battle. No matter how much that old man might want to interfere, take this fight upon his gnarled, experienced hands, he could not do it. If he stepped in between the two, he would make Lit the laughing stock of this wide country. He could only watch, fearing the tragedy that must come, but helpless to do anything.

For Lit, the day had brought the first real crises of his life. He felt like two persons—one his old self, looking at a stranger. He kept his eyes almost blankly trained upon the gunman's changeless face. His lips were oddly dry. Mechanically, he licked them.

"I was comin' upstream a while back," Bisbee told the company. But he watched Lit, and Lit only. "I lost a couple twentys. When I went back to hunt 'em, I seen this kid pickin' 'em up out o' the sand."

He leaned suddenly, a little:

"I aim to have them gold pieces—sunny!"

"You're a goddam liar!" Lit cried furiously.

He saw Bisbee's hand twitch. His own fingers moved as if automatically. They curled about his Colt's familiar butt. He was conscious of its jerk from the open-topped holster, conscious of leveling it—hammer back—upon the big man so close to him, conscious of letting the big hammer drop.

In his ears the heavy report crashed deaeningly. Almost blending with it, but the thinnest of split-seconds later, he heard in the still bar-room the roar of Bisbee's shot. But he had no time to consider noises. Twice more he thumbed back the .44's hammer, let it go. He glared at Bisbee, marked almost incredulously the big figure stagger, turn half about and drop. He leaned forward.

OLD Barbee's rigid pose shifted flashingly. The assumed deliberation of movement that marked him, usually, was gone, as well. He lunged forward, stooped over Bisbee, clawed the fallen gun aside, jerked the left hand Colt from its holster. He turned the still figure over easily—much as he might have flanked a big calf on the range. His hand went to Bisbee's chest. His wrinkled face was tense.

Suddenly, he came to his feet and glared furiously at Lit:

"A hell of a shot you turned out to be! You never did a thing but snug his gun arm. Ah—hell!"

Then he stooped again. He began to shake Bisbee viciously.

"Get off that floor! Get off it before I boot you from hell to breakfast! You dam' fourflusher! You ain't hurt! You just turned yellow!"

Bisbee sat up slowly and stared around. His left hand came up to grip the forearm from which blood ran, now. He found Lit, glared at him.

"By God! It was lucky for you—my gun stickin'!" he cried grimly. "But it'll be plenty different—next time!"

Nervousness was gone entirely from Lit, now. In its place red fury such as he had never known gripped him, shook him. He had the savage impulse to leap forward, to stamp that heavy, white face into the floor; stamp it until there was no semblance of features left.

"Next time!" he said thinly—and was surprised to hear his own voice sound like a stranger's. "Next time! Why—damn your sneaking soul! You pick up that gun and we'll have our next time right now. Pick it up—you lying, fourflushing bluff! You lost two twenties! You did nothing of the sort. I called you a liar once and I'm calling you a liar again—now! You're trying to run some kind of sandy. I don't know what it is, yet—but I'm beginning to have a notion about it. And I'm begging you to pick up that gun! Pick it up and I'll fill you so full of holes you'd drown in an inch of water!"

"I'll pick it up in my own good time!" Bisbee said in a flat, oddly expressionless voice. "An' when I do—you'll wish plenty that I hadn't. I ain't shootin' to-day, with a hole in my gun-arm. I—"

"Gun-arm?" Old Barbee yelled. He checked with lifted hand Lit's tirade.
"Gun-arm! You never used the left hand, yet! What's the matter with that hand? You pack two guns, don't you? Well—does that other gun maybe belong to some of your relations or somethin'? You have to write a letter home an' collect permission to use it, maybe? Gun-arm! Hell! For a big talkin' hairpin, you calm down the quickest I ever see! A kid makes you calm down, too! A kid that you picked because you figured he was easy; that you could build up a rep' by downin' him without really bein' in danger! Now, I'll tell you somethin'!"

He leaned forward, rather like an enraged terrier. And the cowboys and townsman there in Menter's, reckless, hardbitten men, the pick of quick-shooting, hard-riding warriors from far and wide, they watched fascinatedly this old, gray wolf of the pack, who had seen trouble and plenty of trouble, through the smoke.

"You climb onto the Three-Pedro caballo that suffers from a tinhorn in the saddle! You get to hell out o' Tom's Bluff an' you raise dust doin' it! I never butted in on the row until Lit had had his chance—I knew well enough he'd settle you! But, now! Now, she's plumb different! I'm the boss o' the Bar-B an' he's a hand o' mine! I'm tellin' you, now—drag it before one o' us comes lookin' for you! With a Winchester!"

"I'll suit myself," Bisbee told him. Lit was puzzled by the green-eyed man. In Bisbee's place, he thought, he would have been furiously ashamed. Bisbee showed no embarrassment, no worry. His face was without expression. He looked straight at old Barbee, "I don't aim to do no more shootin' today. But I am tellin' you, flat: There's goin' to be a next time an' when I come, that time, I'll come smokin' it!"

"Maybe you'll be able to use that other gun," Lit drawled, and the cowboys laughed. "And get the glue out of the holster. You had better!"

He stared narrowly at Bisbee. He had a grip on himself, now. He thought that he would never lose it again. Already, he was beginning to piece together certain odds and ends of incidents, to make a pattern of them that had some meaning. Bisbee knew that he had picked up the locket. He was not guessing about it, not guessing about the picture it held. He knew! For, otherwise, there was no reason strong enough, for this tale of dropped gold pieces, this forced row.

Lit waited only until Bisbee had lurched out of Menter's before he, too, elbowed his way to the front door, shak- ing off Slippery Elms and other grinning cowboys. Behind him Old Barbee followed quickly. Lit, noticing him, grinned a little. Barbee, he knew was thinking of a practice not uncommon—the lying in wait for a man by a vanquished gladiator. But he was not worried much, about Bisbee dry-gulching him. He had seen the big figure pass the door, mounted.

Barbee caught up with Lit a few steps beyond the door. He went silently and alertly beside him for a little while. Then he made a rasping sound deep in his throat which Lit knew indicated deep disgust.

"A hell of a shot you are!" Barbee grunted. "You ought've plugged him! Dam' polecat! Now, you got to be lookin' forty ways at once until he's cashed in!"

"Do you think, maybe, that I didn't try?" Lit cried bitterly. "I was shaky! I'm not telling you otherwise."

"I know! I know!" Barbee admitted, in softer tone. "Bein' your first shootin' scrape, naturally you'd be shaky. But— I certainly do wish you'd killed him! Save a lot of trouble . . ."

Lit said nothing. They moved on down the street toward "Hogtown" where dobe houses held rough saloons, gambling places, and with blowzy girls.

"What did you pick up, Lit, that Bisbee see—an' wanted?"

"A—Oh, I reckon Bisbee watched me lean down and naturally he thought I'd found money or something valuable. He thought he could scare me into handing over whatever it was."

"Yeh?" Barbee drawled, and let the word hang.

Lit's head turned a little. He tried to stare through the dark at the old man. "Yeh!" he said with a great deal of conviction.

They walked on quietly for a minute, then:
“‘I’m sendin’ Long Al out, tomorrow, to comb the Rowdy River country for our stuff,’” Barbee said with apparent irrelevance.

Lit was fumbling for tobacco and papers. He grunted without interest. He had expected the start to be made any time now. It was the season. Then a thought came to him. He stopped the movement of fingers. His eyes were lifted, to stare in the direction in which Frenchy and the gang had disappeared. Slowly, a grin twisted his mouth. He nodded shadowily.

“Who’s going with Long Al?” he asked, in careless tone. “I reckon there’s a lot of our stuff down in the breaks—always is after a hard winter like last.”

“Oh—Slippery Elms, Ed Sanders an’—Charley Burdette—an’ you better trail along, too. Long Al Kendrick’s the best wagon boss, best all-around cowman, too, between this an’ That. I like to have you out with him, Lit. You can’t help pickin’ up heaps an’ heaps. Yeh. You’ll go with him.”

“Good enough!” said Lit, still staring down the street.

“Oh!” Barbee said in what Slippery Elms always called his “tone of voice.” He seemed to hesitate, then: “Oh!” he said again.

“Well, I want to be getting my stuff together. See you some more.”

Lit moved off whistling. He told himself that Frenchy must have had the locket when he came to Tom’s Bluff the December before. So—

“He came in from west of the Rowdy, then. So! Chances are, that he got it over in the Territory, somewhere. And if he and Bisbee didn’t know each other, from somewhere else—but they did! That stuck out, plain. So he guessed that I’d picked up the locket and either wanted to know what was in it, or he knew and just wanted it! Now, what’s the joker? What would Bisbee want with her picture, if he knew it was her picture? Well! What do I want it for?”

He grinned vacantly. He knew very well why he wanted it!

CHAPTER IV

“STRAYED OR—STOLEN?”

Lit sat Nigger Toe, the chunky black that was favorite of his string, at the rim of one of those shallow canions that shield the Rowdy River country. Below his out-thrust boot toes, where he slouched comfortably in the saddle, the green brush on the cañon’s floor stretched to right and left, all undisturbed by life, or movement.

Three days of cow-hunting, combing the breaks in this section allotted him by Long Al Kendrick, had been all but useless. The Bar-B strays which from time immemorial collected in these little canions and were gathered each Spring, were simply non-existent this year.

“By Gemini!” Lit grunted with sudden conviction. “It’s no use playing around any more, boy. You’re heading back for the wagon, Nigger Toe! We’re going back to see what the rest of ’em found. Three days riding for nine-ten dogfaced critters means nothing much. Unless—” he amended the statement very slowly, very thoughtfully “—it just happens to mean a whole lot . . .”

He touched the black softly, affectionately, with spur rowel. Nigger Toe walked along the cañon’s rim with wise eyes looking right and left. He came to the narrow game trail that angled down to the cañon’s floor. There, he shoved his feet out before him, all but sat down on stub tail and fairly slid to the bottom.

There was a zigzagging and precipitous path up the other wall, matching that they had just descended. When Nigger Toe had sealed it and they topped out, Lit turned the black north, toward the camp on the Long Fork of the Rowdy, where Charley Burdette, the cook, should be, and perhaps Ed Sanders, Slippery Elms, and Long Al himself.

Nigger Toe smelled smoke before the pleasant tang drifted to Lit’s nostrils. He slowed his running walk and pushed out slender head with ears pricked forward.

“Now, who might that be?” Lit puzzled aloud. “It’s too close for Long Al and the camp. He didn’t aim to move it—”
"Ever try findin' out things you was wonderin' about?" a mocking boyish voice desired to know, calling from somewhere upon Lit's left.

He whirled, searching the brush on that side. After a moment, he made out the darkish bulk of a horse. Apparently, the animal had simply been backed into the bushes, for there was no sign of a trail.

"Who's there?" he challenged sharply. "Come out here where I can take a look at you. Come on, quick!"

"Say!" snapped the boyish voice. "Who the hell do you think you are, anyway? Quit wavin' that gun around! You might shoot yourself, you know. An' if it interests you—I been a-holdin' down on you for quite some while, anyway, fella! Put it up—unless you want a hunk o' lead to chew on!"

Lit jammed his gun back into the holster and waited, in curiosity rather than alarm. Both hands were in plain sight upon his saddle horn. There was silence in the thicket for a long minute.

"Now, I'm comin' out because I'm dam' good an' ready to come!" the voice announced defiantly. A scrubby spring sprang into the trail, to stop within arm's length of Nigger Toe. At sight of the rider, Lit's jaw went slack.

She was a slim girl of seventeen or so, as dark of hair and eyes—almost as dark of skin—as Lit himself. She was dressed in rough men's clothing, a good deal too large for her—an ancient, wide-rimmed Stetson, blue flannel shirt with several rents in voluminous sleeves, faded jeans trousers jammed into high-heeled boots of dimensions generous even for a man. About her slim waist sagged a heavy cartridge belt, well filled, from which hung an open-topped holster. The holster was empty now, for the tenant-Colt was in its owner's hand, trained with disconcerting steadiness and directness upon Lit's belt buckle.

"Now, who might you be?" Lit inquired amazedly.

"The Queen o' Spades!" she retorted promptly. "But, o' course, I ain't. An' who might you be?"

"The King of Spades," Lit grinned. "But—of course—I'm not!"

"Can you prove you ain't the—joker, fella?"

THERE was something menacing about the way she drawled the question. Lit watched her curiously, without making reply.

"You deef, or somethin'?" she snapped. "I'm holdin' down on you, fella. It's certainly yo' move to speak yo' piece—pronto!"

"'Why, so you are!'" nodded Lit pleasantly. "So you are! Nice of you to let me know about it."

He nodded vigorously, grinning at her, while he reached into a shirt pocket for the Durham that solves perplexities, passes idle moment. The girl's mouth tightened ominously. Spots of color shone through the tan of her smooth cheeks. Lit shook tobacco into a paper and unobtrusively his left spur rowel, that on the side farthest from her, tickled Nigger Toe. The little black danced upon the trail and with left hand Lit hauled violently at the reins.

"Cut it out, you blame' gopher!" he reproved Nigger Toe. "What's chewing your fool ear, anyhow?" Again he tickled the sensitive side and Nigger Toe's ears went back as his head went down.

He was almost alongside the girl's sorrel now, and, with a flirt of the wrist, Lit sent the loose tobacco into the snapping black eyes, plunging home both rowels even as his hand moved. The girl's bullet sang through the space behind him, which he had just left. Then he was twisting the Colt from her hand and reining back to watch with grave and scientific attention her varied and violent gestures.

"Child! Child!" he chided, after a moment of blazing, mule skinner comment. "You're making me blush! Cut the bawling! You sound like a scared calf. Here! Wipe it out of your eyes with my handkerchief!"

She took the preffered neekerchief blindly, dabbed at streaming eyes with the silk until she could look at him once more. Lit, comfortable with long leg hooked around the saddle horn, regarded her with indulgent smile that brought a glare from her. But she was caught by a paroxysm of coughing—excellent preventive of effective glaring.

"You'll be all right, pretty soon," he said tolerantly. "And think how much more you'll know! That's an old one that tobacco stunt. It oughtn't to fool anybody over ten years old. But, then, you're really nothing but a baby, now that I look at you again. Naturally, you wouldn't know it. But I certainly would like to get hold of the nitwit that let you out with that gun! Kids have got no business playing with pistols!"

She stared at him uncertainly and he kept his face grimly threatening.

"'Now, if it's not a secret,'" he drawled, "'what's the idea of all this bushwhacking? Who handed you a license to sit back in the brush and point a pistol at peaceful folks?'"

"Well, what you doin' in the country?" she countered sullenly. "How do I know what you're up to?"

"How do you know! How-come you have to know, anyway? Is this your range? I've combed these Rowdy breaks a-many's the time, Spring after Spring. This is the first dry gulching ever I ran into."

He shook his head sadly, made a disgusted noise.

"'I swear! I don't know what the Territory's coming to! Kids that ought to be home sewing on their dollrags, squatting in the bushes with their papas' guns..."

"'You quit callin' me a kid, Mister! I'm sixteen years old. Old enough to maybe show you a few! An' I got some friends, too. You wait! I'll sick Frenchy Leonard onto you an' don't you think for a minute he won't clean yo' plow! Dollrags, is it? All right! Frenchy'll shoot you into dollrags."

Lit's face went blank. He stared at her with eyes narrowed.

"'Oh,'" he said very softly. "'Oh! Frenchy Leonard . . ."

"'Yeh, Frenchy Leonard! I'll make Pap kill a horse, but what he'll catch up with Frenchy. I—"

"'He's that close?'" Lit cried, putting surprise in his voice.

"'He's that close! An' him an' the boys ain't travelin' so fast but Pap can catch up with 'em. They—"

Lit lifted restraining hand. He found this very interesting. Something like instinct told him to be careful.

"You wouldn't boorah me? About Frenchy being a friend of yours? Is he, really? A—particular friend?"

"'A friend o' mine!' she said contemptuously. "'He's a sight more'n just a friend. Me an' Frenchy, we're goin' to be married!"

"Right away?"

"'Well'—she stared at the ground, seemed to hesitate—'no. But—some time."

"'How long have you known him?"

Lit asked carefully.

"'Ever since I can remember! Him an' Pap, they knew each other down in Old Mexico, years back. So'—she glared at him again—'don't you never think he won't stop yo' clock!"

Lit grinned and nodded.

"'Sounds bad,'" he admitted. "'But why send for Frenchy? If your Pap can ride, why can't he get out his great, big gun and shoot me?"

"'Ah, Pap, he wouldn't shoot a fly!'" she said with vast disgust. "'Pap's a—ah! he's just measlin', Ma always said. But Frenchy, he's a Man!"

"'He is that,'" Lit nodded. "'You see, I happen to know him, too. I wintered with him over at Tom's Bluff. In fact, he wanted me to ride with him, this trip. He said he had a hen on, across the Rio."

"'Hell!'" she cried, staring. "'Why— you must be all right, then, if Frenchy wanted you in the gang. I never guessed that, Mister, else I never would've threwed down on you like I done. I was afraid you was just some long-nosed meddler, come a-messin' into Frenchy's affairs. Didn't Frenchy tell you anything about me—Kate Quinn?"

"'I don't remember it, if he did. But there was no reason for him to talk about you."

He was thinking of Frenchy, rather than of this queer, wild creature who was so obviously one of the gunman's conquests.

"Well! That certainly does change things! But—why didn't you take Frenchy up? Or—are you ridin' to catch up with him?"

Lit studied her frowningly, hesitated, then shrugged.

"'I didn't take him up,'" he said slowly, "'because I had a notion that maybe Frenchy wasn't telling me everything."

"'O' course he wasn't!'" she cried—and laughed. "'Frenchy never does. That's why he's boss o' the bunch. He's always a guess ahead o' anybody else. He told you it was Old Mexico he was headin' for? That's the way he does! He aimed to head for the Rowdy, all the time.

"Looks that way," Lit nodded. "But he began to look off-colored to me, in Tom's Bluff. So I stuck to the Bar-B and—here I am! Hunting our strays."

"Bar-B," she said, eyeing him intently from under sagging lids. "Bar-B..."

There was shrewdness in her face, now, out of all keeping with her avowed sixteen years.

"Didn't you ever hear of that iron? It's Old Man Barbee's outfit, over on the Diamond. Our stuff always drifts this way."

"Oh, sure! I've heard o' the Bar-B," she nodded quickly. "Pap, I bet he knows every iron from here to Canada. We're livin' over yonder a piece. Got a dugout. Been here since fall."

"I've been out of camp for three days, now," Lit told her. "Have you seen any Bar-B stuff? I haven't found a dozen head. Unless the other boys have rounded up a lot, I don't know what to think."

It came to him that she watched his face with an intentness almost strained. Again, instinct warned him. So he grinned at her, lifted a shoulder in small gesture:

"Funny about our stuff, this year. Mostly, by this time of spring, they're scattered from hell to breakfast in these breaks. But not this time. I was even wondering, a while back, if somebody mightn't have run 'em off. Your Pap hasn't been riding with a sticky loop, has he?"

SHE matched his mechanical grin with one that seemed to him just as mechanical. Nor was her laugh natural.

"Pap? Amor de dios! That man's too lazy to go farther 'n across the table for his beef! You'll find the other boys ridin' herd on yo' strays—o' course! How many of 'em are there?"

"Three boys and the wagon boss. Camp's on the Long Fork of the Rowdy. I took the south end of the breaks. Well—if you haven't seen a lot of Bar-B strays, they must be north."

"Must be," she nodded. "They're funny critters—cows. Likely, they drifted north this time. When you hit camp, likely you'll find the others rounded 'em all up."

He gathered up his reins. She pushed forward, smiling.

"Better gi' me back my cutter, before you go!"

"Oh! That's right. I did forget, didn't I?"

He stared down at the worn Colt in his hand. Looking up suddenly, he caught on her face an expression of such malevolence that it startled him. He stared and she twisted her hard mouth quickly, into the smile she had held before.

Lit was not quite a fool. He had expected no danger, here, in the Rowdy's breaks. Even her claim to friendship with Frenchy had not alarmed him, peculiar as he might think Frenchy's change of plans. But that sixth sense which had twice before warned him to be careful, in dealing with this fierce little nester's child, jogged his caution again.

So—

"You'll get the gun back, of course!" he said heartily. "But—not right now! Tell you what: I'm heading straight for the Long Fork. Somewhere along the Rowdy bank I'll find a rock or stump in plain sight. I'll put the gun down there where you can't help finding it."

She protested bitterly. Lit hardly listened. More and more, he was sure that something was queer here. In fact, there were two or three puzzling matters that he wanted leisure to mull over. With a caution quite new to him, he guarded his tongue almost without knowing that he did it. At last, he picked up the reins again. Then he said slowly, after a moment of staring:

"Frenchy is—quite a fellow..."

"He's just—wonderful!" she said softly, and this time her smile was unforced.

Lit looked long at her, then hurriedly he looked away. He was quite untutored in reading women but, as he pushed Nigger Toe off for the Rowdy he shook his head pityingly at memory at what he had surprised in her face.

"That poor kid! That poor damn kid," he said to himself.

And then and there it was that he began to dislike Frenchy Leonard. Actively to dislike him. The magnetic something about the outlaw which had drawn him during the winter had quite lost its hold. Lit began to see Frenchy more as Old Man Barbee had seen him.
Not altogether, for there was much about that daredevil young outlaw that he must secretly admire. But for the first time Lit could sit as critic—upon certain of Frenchy’s ways, at least.
“I wonder how he came to turn this way?” he asked himself after a long time of riding. “He said that the bunch was headed for Old Mexico. Headed for that Gonzalez hacienda. I—wonder! If he talked so much about that because he wasn’t even thinking about it. That was Kate Quinn’s notion. . . . Funny!”

CHAPTER V

“IT WAS FRENCHY AND HIS BUNCH”

H

E could hear voices before the brush gave him a view of the wagon. Loudest of them was the snarling bellow of Long Al Kendrick and Lit, listening with head on one side, nodded. One corner of his mouth lifted unpleasantly. He thought that he did not need to speak to the old wagon boss to know what had roused Long Al. He rode on, came up to the wagon, stopped.

They were all standing about the fire —Slippery Elms and Ed Sanders and Charley Burdette and Long Al. The wagon boss stared frowningly. Before Lit could speak, he nodded viciously.

“An’ the same with Lit!” he roared.

“Absolutely the same! He never found no strays, neither!”

“Nine-ten dogies. One black cow with her hindleg busted,’ Lit reported, swinging down. “Same with the rest of you?”

“More so!” Slippery Elms said judicially. “More so!”

Lit stripped the hull from Nigger Toe and led him to the rope corral. When he came back with headstall over his arm, supper was ready. He got tin plate and cup and sat down. And Long Al, already eating, spoke with full mouth:

“Nine-ten dogies for y’ tally, hub,

Lit nodded. He was busy, marshalling his thoughts.

“That’s the tally. For three days up-and-down the canions.”

“Did you go clean to Pillar Rock?”

“Yeh,” Lit grunted. “And I combed the breaks closer and closer all the time, too, when I began to wonder why I didn’t run onto a critter. I’ll swear not a Bar-B hoof or horn’s there.”

Long Al waved his coffee cup angrily:

“There’s no two ways about it,” he told them. “Twenty-thirty head o’ Bar-B stuff in all this scope o’ country! Nobody’s goin’ to make me believe that they critters grewed wings an’ flew out o’ here. They was run off, an’, by God!
I bet that if I had to gamble my neck on one guess, I could save it easy enough by sayin’ that Frenchy Leonard an’ his bunch o’ dam’ rustlers done the runnin’!”

“He would!” Lit said, between his teeth, with much grimness. “Long Al’s right: It was Frenchy and his bunch that cleaned the breaks ahead of us.”

He looked around at them all, looked at Long Al’s seamed, hard face, looked at Slippery Elms, at happy-go-lucky Ed Sanders, at sad-faced Charley Burdette.

“How come you figured Frenchy?”

Lit demanded of Long Al, curiously.

Long Al made a sardonic snarling sound in his throat.

“It wasn’t so awful hard! I’ve been on the Bar-B, it’s a good while, now.
An’ I made this clean-up plenty times.
So, when we’d rode a couple days without findin’ much but cow-tracks—an’ some hawse-tracks—I begun to do some inquirin’ in my mind. Funny! But what I begun to think about was them Territory hawses that Frenchy’s gang brought up to the Diamond—an’ how Frenchy was so careful to let ever’body know how his outfit was hittin’ the trail for Old Mexico. You know! When I added that to the big, wide hole where our strays ought to be an’ wasn’t, why I talled me up an answer!”

Lit nodded slowly.

“That was the right answer,” he said quietly. “Frenchy was making it just a little bit too plain that they didn’t even think of coming toward the Rowdy. But I found out today that they had come over this way.”
“So did I,” the wagon boss nodded grimly. “You boys happen to remember that spotted hair rope that Irish Tim Fenelon was so stuck on? One he said there wasn’t its like nowhere? Well—?”

From his pants pocket he pulled a piece of hair rope, marked with alternate diamonds and circles in the strands. It was perhaps a foot long—the tassel end of a lariat. Every man there recognized it. They stared at it, then stared expectantly at Long Al Kendrick. He looked around grimly from face to face.

“I found this tassel in the brush, right beside a lot o’ cow-tracks. An’ a little piece from there, in soft ground, there was hawse-tracks. Any dude could have told that the fellow on that hawse was pushin’ them cows. An’ that hawse was a big one—twelve hundred pounds, anyhow. An’ it was rode by a heavy man.”

“Irish Tim Fenelon rode a big bay, eleven, maybe twelve, hund’ed pounds.”

This was Ed Sanders, nodding like a mechanical doll.

“An’ Tim is more’n six feet high an’ he weighs around two hund’ed pounds!” Slippery Elms added, in a tone of surprise. But his expression was only sardonic.

Long Al Kendrick nodded, looked sideway at Lit. “Well, Lit?” he said. “How did you find out that Frenchy had been up this way?”

“Well—” Lit stared at the ground, hunting the way to tell about the girl. He frowned. “Well, Frenchy said that they were heading for Old Mexico when they pulled out of Tom’s Bluff. But the bunch must have turned west, instead of south, as soon as they were out of sight of town. For I ran into a—a—a nester down the Rowdy, today. Uh—he said Frenchy and the bunch had been through here last week. Naturally, nothing was said about our stuff.”

Long Al brought down a hard palm upon his thigh with a resounding smack.

“That settles it!” he bellowed. “That gang run off our stuff an’ the bunch of ‘em will decorate the cottonwoods high, wide an’ handsome before I quit.”

He jerked tobacco and papers from vest pocket.

“Mexico! Mexico—hell! What they done was to hightail it over here the minute they left Tom’s Bluff. They knew all about these strays o’ ours over here. They rounded ‘em up an’ they shoved ‘em over into the Territory. Two-three hund’ed of ‘em—it was like findin’ money in the road. They’ll sell those critters right and left. Sell ‘em to some of the big ranchers, maybe to the soldiers at Fort Lowe. They have got plenty start of us too.

“So, here’s what we’ll do: I got more on my mind than just takin’ out after this bunch of stuff. All the Spring work’s to do, back on the home range.

“‘One o’ you’ll hightail it back to the Old Man, to give him the lowdown. Me an’ Charley an’ one other, we’ll git the wagon-rollin’ an’ start the measlin’ lil’ bunch o’ stuff we gathered, back for home. But—I want one man to start down into the Territory, to keep his eyes peeled for the trail o’ our stuff—peeled for Frenchy, too!”

“That last will be Yours Truly,” Lit said very quietly.

Long Al stared long and hard at the youngest member of the bunch. Lit met the calculating eye of the range boss very steadily.

“Well,” said Long Al. “I figured to send Ed back to the Bar-B. Charley stays with me, so—I reckon it’s between you an’ Slippery, Lit, who makes the ride of the Territory.”

“Well,” Slippery grunted belligerently, “an’ why not me?”

Something like a smile flickered under the wagon boss’s mustache.

“Well, Slippery,” he drawled, “may-be the same reason that I ain’t thinkin’ about sendin’ Ed over. Both o’ you are top hands an’ mighty handy with belt guns or Winchester’s, but I do remember the time when you boys was ridin’ for the Three-Prod, an’ the two o’ you was sent ahead o’ the chuck wagon to buy grub. . . . Maybe you remember the time? An’ how you both fell from grace in a monte game an’ lost the grub money an’ the whole outfit had to eat off the country for weeks? An’ how you boys worked six months free to make up the money?”

“Awh!” Slippery said uncomfortably. “I reckon we never will hear the last o’ that story!”
“Well,” Long Al grinned, “it does kind o’ give Lit the edge, here. Maybe he would have gambled off the money too, if he’d been along. But, he didn’t! An’, he has got a pretty level head on him.”

He looked at Lit again.

“THINK you can handle it!” he asked. “No tellin’ what you’ll run into before you land where y’ goin’.”

“I don’t know,” Lit said, quite calmly. “Could you say that you could handle anything that might come up, Al—not knowing, as you say, what is ahead? You’d just do your damnedest, wouldn’t you?”

Long Al grinned.

“Fair enough! All right—come mornin’, you head south. You’ll hit for Porto. You been there. You know the road. Now, here’s what you better do: Stick around Slim Hewes’s store a spell. Amble around the village. Find out if Frenchy has been through Porto. But he has! I’ll bet on that! There’s too many there, though, that’d think it funny if he showed up with a bunch o’ Bar-B stuff. So he likely never showed our strays in the neighborhood. He’d come in on his lone or with one or two o’ the gang, leavin’ the stuff off a piece. But—you’ll maybe pick up somethin’. If you find the man that’ll talk.”

Lit nodded. The same thought had been in his own mind.

Long Al looked at the fire for a time, smoking silently.

“You go on down to Gurney. Hunt up Smoky Cole—he’s sheriff there, now, an’ he’s an old side-kick o’ me an’ the Old Man. You can put all y’ cards on the table with Smoky, for he’s a straight shooter. He’ll tell you exactly what’s what.

“Now, one thing more, Lit: You have to bear this in mind all the time. This here Territory, it’s mighty nigh split two ways—you’re either a big rancher’s man, or you’re sidin’ with the little fellow, the squatter. There ain’t no such thing as straddlin’ the fence. You got to remember that, when you talk to a man. For he’ll be on one side or the other. So, the best way is not to talk a-tall, unless you done found out, sure, from Smoky, where the fellow you’re talkin’ to is sit-tin’ in the argument. Got that?”

Lit nodded again, very briefly. Somehow, he felt quite old tonight, mature, able to handle anything that might come up.

“Sure, I sabe,” he replied, “and I’ll hightail it, come morning.”

CHAPTER VI
PORTO—AND A DEAD MAN’S SADDLE

“W E’LL get in touch with you, when the Old Man decides what to do,” Long Al told Lit. “All you need to do is let Smoky Cole know where you are, most o’ the time.”

Lit sitting near Nigger Toe at the wagon, nodded. He was ready to go. Behind the cantle was his blanket and slicker, wrapping biscuit and fried beef and coffee can.

Ed Sanders was already gone—riding fast back toward the Diamond to carry Long Al’s message to Barbee on the home range. Lit jerked his hand up in farewell to Charley Burdette, Slippery Elms and Long Al.

“See you some more!” he said.

“Stay single!” Slippery called gravely and Lit grinned.

“Not if I can help it!” he grunted cheerfully.

As he forded the Rowdy’s Long Fork and rode west with mechanical alertness, he found himself entirely pleased with life.

Looking back, he knew that he was glad that he had not listened to Frenchy Leonard. Even if Frenchy had not lied to him, even if the little outlaw’s trail had really led to Mexico, Lit knew that he would not change his present status for that other. Not even a wild raid over the border, a sweep down on the Gonzalez herd, could be so good as this. Not only was he free of the hard work of the ranch and occupying the virtual position of Bar-B detective, a difficult, a dangerous responsibility not often entrusted to one of his years, but this trail he rode led vaguely toward the girl of the locket. It had to lead toward her—he would see that it did!
Then, presently, he began to consider what might be before him in the way of business. It was moving in his mind that perchance—just perchance!—it might be a very noble idea to look around the Territory a little, before paying his call on Sheriff Smoky Cole at Gurney.

"Can't tell what we might run across. As is, all we can tell this Smoky jigger is, the Bar-B has misplaced some stuff. Yes, sir, Nigger Toe, we're due to take us a place all around and about, just like the little old bull, to see what we can see."

He considered his job in the light of what he knew of Frenchy, and what he had heard of conditions in the Territory. As Long Al had warned him, the country west of the Rowdy was split into pretty equal halves.

As far as Frenchy was concerned, it was pretty well split, too. Those who were for him were loyal to the last ditch. Those who were against him sat up nights to hate him. Which meant, for a cattle detective of Lit's sort, that either he would get no information at all—might even collect a slug of lead between his eyes!—or he would get complete and accurate reports on the outlaw's movements, whereabouts. As the day wore on, and he came nearer to the outskirts of Porto, he thought a good deal of what he might find in that little cow-town on the very edge of the Territory's settled section.

He knew Porto very well. Spring after Spring, the Bar-B and other cowboys made the drowsy village, to buy supplies, to drink a little, gamble a little, break the monotony of rounding up the Diamond River's scattered stock in the breaks of the Rowdy.

"And here I come," he told himself, "straight from where our stuff was stolen. With Nigger Toe wearing a Bar-B iron—Not so good! Frenchy had probably got somebody in Porto to do nothing but watch this back trail, and if that hairpin has got two thoughts more than any old gray goose, he'll certainly pick me for my weight. Not so good!"

BUT he could think of no alternative to riding straight into town. Even though he must ride an obvious Bar-B horse for all who watched to see. He could not have brought himself to part with the black, even if a substitute horse had been available.

"Anyway," he consoled himself, "my face is pretty well known in Porto. Just changing horses wouldn't fool anybody!"

So he rode on and in the middle of the afternoon swung down before the hitch rack in front of Slim Hewes' place. Hewes came to the door and leaned against the facing. He watched Lit hitch Nigger Toe to the cottonwood cross-bar. When Lit ducked under the rack and walked toward him, Hewes showed yellow teeth in black stubble of beard, in what might have passed for a smile.

"Howdy, Lit," he said tonelessly. "Where's the rest of the Bar-B? Ain't draggin' it by yourself?"

"That's me!" Lit nodded. "I'm what you might call a pore little orphan, out in the wide, wide world with my golden curls in a braid. Well, it had to come sooner or later, so—better, sooner. Fellow said, one time, that the world's a bodaciously big, wide place, but, hell! you can't take stock in chuck wagon yarns. So, I've come out to check up on that fellow's story for myself. How's the horse feed? Nigger Toe is right starved."

Slim Hewes nodded without expression. He straightened the six feet four or five inches of him, let Lit go by. Then he came in and passed the shorter man. Lit was impressed, as always, by the enormous height of the store-keeper. As Hewes' head was outlined against the line of tinware that dangled from roof rafters, Lit noticed something that for the moment drove thought of Slim's height from his mind.

All that tinware was unsalable, now. For each pot or pan had been punctured raggedly from two to ten times. The cottonwood saplings of the ceiling above and behind those ruined pots and pans and kettles was pocked in a manner easily understood by any cowboy who had ever witnessed a pay-day celebration.

It puzzled Lit. Slim Hewes was nobody's shrinking violet! Lit knew that very well, for he had witnessed several blazing chapters of range history in this very store. Slim could—and would!—whang away with Winchester or Colt just as freely, and just about as accurately, as any man Lit knew. So, those gentlemen who had so blithely held pistol practice upon Slim’s dangling row of tinware were no ordinary riders of the range. Had they been (Lit glanced down surreptitiously), the wide planks of the rough pine floor would now be thoroughly stained with red. And they were not.

Slim went on around the end of the rough counter which served as bar.

“Drink?” he grunted, and pulled the Jordan from under the bar. “I’ll git you some ear corn for your billy goat, after while.”

“Well, I don’t mind if I do, seeing that you ask so sweetly.”

Lit accepted the filled tin cup and bowed handsomely to Slim:

“To your long, red nose!” he said smilingly. “Keep your liquor old, and your women young, and die happy!”

He lifted the cup, tipped his head back, set the cup down empty. He fished in chaps pocket, got out a quarter, rolled it across the counter. He was wondering if, and how, he might extract any information from the notoriously close-mouthed store-keeper.

“Anybody I know in Porto?” he inquired blandly, making a cigarette for chaser to the hooch. “Anybody been through lately?”

“Depends,” Slim grunted. “Depends on who you know—Yes, sir, it certainly does!”

After a moment of staring, Lit gave the store-keeper up. If Frenchy Leonard and the others of the gang had been the gentlemen shooting at Slim’s tinware, it was quite plain that Slim had no intention of publishing that fact.

So he took his sack of corn out to Nigger Toe and came back. He demanded food for himself and in the back room of the place stowed away fried beef and black beans and saleratus-streaked biscuits brought him by Slim’s youngest Mex’ woman.

Lit after awhile, went to sit thoughtfully on the bench before Hewes’ store. As he sat there, smoking, trying to decide upon a plan of action, there came around the store—swinging wide of its corner—a tall slender and handsome Mexican riding a big bay gelding. He looked side-long at Lit, this Mex, then turned his eyes quickly front again. He tickled the bay into a swift running walk.

Lit stared after him curiously. He had not been able to see the brand on the bay, but there was something vaguely familiar about both horse and headstall. Lit scowled after him, rubbing his chin mechanically. Suddenly, he snapped his fingers and stood up like a spring uncoiling. Back into the store he went. From Hewes he ordered coffee and cooked food and “airtights.” It seemed to Lit that there was something strained about the store-keeper’s face as he went about filling the order. Something evasive, also. He watched Slim curiously, wondering how best to frame his question.

“That Mex’,” he said diplomatically, “he certainly was riding a good horse and saddle. Who is he, Slim?”

The store-keeper laid the groceries on the counter.

“What Mex’, I?” he asked, turning back to the shelf. “I never seen him!”

“You didn’t see him?” Lit burst out unguardedly. “Hell’s bells, Slim! He came right around the store. You couldn’t have helped seeing him!”

“I said—I never seen him!” Slim’s drawl was frosty. “Why I never, might be due to some several things.”

“Yes,” Lit nodded, narrow-eyed. “Now that I think about it, it certainly might.”

Slim turned slowly before the shelf. His face was very still:

“Meanin’ I?” he said.

The drawl was frostier than before, the cold little eyes hardly showed under the lids, and the lean, freckled hands were hidden beneath the counter.

Lit saw the danger signals—saw them very plainly.

“Well, just to begin—meaning that if you don’t fish your paws out in the open, on top that counter, I will begin to think that something is wrong in here! And when I get my guns out, I won’t make holes in your tinware, Slim!”

“By God! You’re gettin’ to be a wise kid, now ain’t you?” the store-keeper snarled. But the hands came hurriedly from beneath the counter, for Lit had drawn his Colt half out.

“Maybe,” Lit nodded, “just maybe!
But I wouldn't have to be terribly smart, Slim, to tell you one thing: You can't run with the rabbits, and the dogs, both. You think that over, Slim. Maybe it'll turn out to be money in your pockets. And, say! Arch Holmes had something else beside a big white-faced horse and a silver-trimmed headstall and saddle. Something a lot more important, now, than any of these things: He had a hell of a lot of good friends on the Upper Diamond. You and the Mex' both can think that over!"

Having delivered these vital statistics, Lit backed to the door. He had pistol clear out now. He slipped through the door very quickly. He jumped behind Nigger Toe and swung into saddle before he threw off the hitch. Then, mindful of the lovely target afforded by a man's broad back, to an unusually tall store-keeper shooting straight up the street, he jumped the black around the corner of the store and left Porto, keeping behind the houses; left it at a pounding gallop.

When he had time to think, he was sorry that he had betrayed any suspicions to Slim Hewes.

But, he told himself, that Mex' riding Arch Holmes' bay—either Slim sent him out to tell Frenchy about me, or the Mex' is working for Frenchy on his own. Well! it's beginning to look like the Bar-B's young detective had better head for Gurney without much more delay, to hunt up this Smoky Cole!"

WHEN darkness came, he made camp beside a tiny wet weather spring. It was chilly when the sun had gone and he was glad to hug his fire. As he sat beside the red embers, with his tin cup of coffee upon his knee, there came the not-too distant whang! of a Winchester. There followed instantly the smack of a bullet striking a nearby rock. Before Lit could move—the Winchester whanged again and the tin cup left his hand with a whining Yelp.

Lit dived into safer darkness. He was clawing at his pistol-handle with a gun-hand that tingled. He crawled away from the fire which was now being methodically sprayed with lead.

"I'd say that gunie out there was serious!" he grunted. "And my Winchester in the saddle scabbard right by the fire, of course!"

He waited and presently the firing ceased. He edged back to the scattered, pounded fire. His intentions were purely homicidal. The fire had been so lead-whipped that it gave off very little light, but what there was shone upon the saddle.

As he hesitated to expose himself, Nigger Toe nickered from behind him. Lit grinned. He went over to the little black and from his neck took the lariat which staked him. It was easy to build a loop and flip it out over the saddle horn, then drag the hull into darkness. Instantly, a splatter of bullets came, all around the fire, uncomfortably close to Lit's departing heels. He flung himself down, now armed with his Winchester. He opened up—firing at random in the direction of his assailant. When carbine was empty, he stood up.

"'Hell's bells! He—or they—seem to be getting closer! Stand still, Nigger Toe! Here is where the Bar-B's handsome young detective—young Mr. Taylor, you know—leaves a man-sized hole in the air behind him. I don't know who that hairpin's boss is, but he came mightily near to getting his money's worth out of his hired help tonight!"

Five minutes later, he was spurring Nigger Toe generally south and west. Through the night he rode steadily and, near dawn, pulled up in the bushes on the bank of a deep arroyo, to make his bed in the brush, with Nigger Toe staked close to him.

CHAPTER VII

"I'M Miss You! W'At THE HELL!"

WHEN he awakened near noon he made breakfast of cooked food and canned stuff and rode on. He kept his Winchester stock conveniently close at hand.

But, alert as he would have thought himself, careful to inspect the country ahead from the crest of every release, every hogback, before riding across it, he was surprised when on a long, clear slope a Winchester whanged! and a bullet glanced off his saddle horn.

There was no bush anywhere about him large enough to cover a jackrabbit, but there was a shallow arroyo paralleling the trail. On that arroyo’s lip, Lit threw Nigger Toe with magnificent horsemanship. He threw him flashingly, then dived out of the saddle and into the shallow water course. There was no opportunity to retrieve his rifle, for Nigger Toe rolled over, came to his feet, shook himself, then trotted off a few steps and stopped calmly to pick at the grass.

Lit, shaken by the hard jolt of landing, listened tensely. There was now silence down the slope, from the direction of the bullet’s coming. But Lit knew all too well that the bushwhacker would hardly consider that shot a hit. For Nigger Toe, not his rider, had fallen, and Nigger Toe was now on his feet.

The arroyo ran vaguely down the hill. It was a natural drain, cut in the wet season. It was barely deep enough to hide Lit as he crawled on hands and knees down hill. Frequently he looked up over his shoulder and his spine crawled when he discovered that his arching back was almost level with the arroyo’s edge. It was slow going and painful, over the little rocks of the arroyo bed.

At an acute angle in the wall he stopped, squatted there with Colt on knee, listened. There had been no sound whatever, but around the elbow of the arroyo suddenly materialized a bare-headed black-haired man who was on his hands and knees. It was a slim sinewy figure; a man with thin, brown face and twinkling sea-blue eyes. He all but ran into Lit and sprang to his feet with a grunted oath, like a cat jumped by a dog. He had been carrying a Winchester in one hand. Now, he tried to jerk it down to cover Lit.

"Stick ‘em up!" Lit grunted mechanically. Then he added, almost as an afterthought: "You dam’ bushwhacker!"

Slowly the black-haired man’s hands went climbing toward his ears. When he looked at Lit, his face was chagrined, rather than angry or alarmed. He shook his black head in a gesture that seemed one of surprise.

"Válgame dios!" he said. "I’m miss you! W’at the hell!"

Lit studied him with curiosity. He was very much the dandy. His blue shirt was of fine flannel, his trousers were of hand-woven blue wool, his boots of alligator hide were expensive looking. There was a pearl-handled Colt hanging in holster of hand-stamped leather upon a shell belt of the same beautifully tooled workmanship.

"I ought to just put a hole in you!" Lit told him angrily. "Trying to bushwhack me, the way you did!"

"Pues, w’en you’re bushw’ack me, will you be surprise’ w’en I’m bushw’ack you?" cried the black-haired man, very calmly.

One sinewy brown hand came down to the spike point of his little mustache. He twirled it with an air, shrugged.

"Last night, you’re bushw’ack me. Today, I’m see you ride like the dam’ fool over these hogback, an’ crack down with the Weenchestair. Por dios! An’ I’m wonder, now, how I’m miss you. I’m not miss much times!"

Lit glared at him.

"Last night! Bushwhack you! Why —why—"

It was too much for him, recalling as he did that tin cup leaping from his hand. He glared at his captive. Then anger slowly gave way to bewilderment. For the man’s face, his strong face, his kindly, if daredevil, face, he could see now, was quite sincere.

"Look here!" Lit cried. "Where were you last night!"

"Me? Why I’m mabbe ten miles back north. Me, I am Carlos José de Guerra y Morales, señor. I’m w’at the fellow in this dam’ Territory they’re call ‘Chihuahua Joe.’ Last night, I’m make camp all ni—ice. I’m eat, then I’m sit an’ smoke an’ drink the w’iskey—one drink only!—then, w’ile I’m look with love at the bottle—bang! the Weenchestair’s pop at me, Chihuahua Joe! I’m jump—like one dam’ green frog. Sangre de Cristo! I’m jump like the hell! An’ —I’m bust them bottle! Señor! she’s one funny, funny thing—I’m ride slow all the night. I’m ride all the morning. An’ I’m see nobody until I’m see you on those hogback."

"Hell I never shot at you! Why, somebody shot a cup of coffee out of my hand last night, and—Why, it must have been pretty close to where you were camped. Hell's bells! What kind of country is this, anyhow!"

The tall man lifted his shoulders in a shrug typically Latin:

"Señor, she's—I have them permission to put down my hand?—Gracias!—She's a place w'at you do not mistake to call one hell of a country—this dam' Territory! Por dios, me, I'm live here thirty year. My father—she's them Spaniard, of Madrid. My mother, she's them Navajo. An', w'at this Territory is, I'm know! Here! These line I'm make, she's them Rowdy River. These dot—she's Gurney, we're Smoky Cole, she's sheriff—until somebody's kill him dead. These dot—she's Los Alamos, Rancho. Señor, you're know these 'King' Connell?"

Lit had rholstered his gun. Somehow, he had no thought of treachery. He lifted his eyes from study of the rough map that Chihuahua Joe had made, nodded very slowly.

"Of course," he said. "Everybody has heard of King Connell and Los Alamos. He's a—pretty big rancher?"

"Por dios! In your country, señor, how big is them big rancher? Hah! W'en King Connell, she's just w'isper in Los Alamos, them fellas they're jump down in Arno. Pues, this dam' Territory, she's one war all time. King Connell, she's fight them squatter, them little rancher. Them squatter, she's fight King Connell. This whole dam' Territory, she's take one side or take those other."

"Which side are you taking?" Lit shot at him suddenly.

"Hah! Chihuahua, she's not take side—yet. In Gurney, Smoky Cole, she's one fine man. Work like the hell for those law an' those order. Me, I'm like to see Smoky win."

"How about rustling?" Lit asked cautiously. "How about—Frenchy Leonard?"

Chihuahua was making a cigarette of corn husk and inky-black tobacco. He finished rolling the thin cylinder, eyed it critically, lit it with a match from Lit's hatband and expelled a huge puff of smoke. Then he cocked a bright blue eye at Lit.

"Señor," he said softly, "in this dam' Territory, she's only those dam' fool w'at will ask them question to one stranger!"

Lit flushed. Chihuahua studied him keenly for an instant, then grinned.

"But this time, she's all right. You are not here for those health an' me—hah! Me, I'm Chihuahua Joe an' not give one dam' for anybody. Hah! Not many time will I miss them Weenches-tair, like today . . . Rus'lin'? W'y, she's go on all time. King Connell, she's rus'le them cow from Wolf Montague an' them Howard Boy. An' they're rus'le them cow from King Connell. Me, I'm work for King Connell, two year age. Work five-six-month. But me, w'en I'm take them poor man's cow, my stomach, she's get sick. I'm quit."

Shrewdly, he grinned sidelong at Lit:

"Me, I'm ride for Gurney. You're ride those way? Bueno! We will ride together an' if we're see those bush-wacker we're help him to git sick. An' while we're ride, mabbe you're like to tell Chihuahua w'at you're want over here in this dam' Territory."

There was something steady, dependable, about the halfbreed. Lit felt the need of a confidant and instinct told him to trust Chihuahua. So, as they rode stirrup-to-stirrup, he told his story, or all but his secret hope of finding a certain golden-haired girl. Chihuahua nodded thoughtfully at the end.

"Pues, me, if I'm lose them cow, an' think Frenchy, she's rus'le him, I will go to Los Alamos an' have the look around. Frenchy, she's rus'le lots o' cow from Wolf Montague an' those Howard Boy. King Connell, she's buy 'em. I—Válgame dios! She's more bushwacker?"

A steady rattle of shots burst upon them as they rounded a shoulder of the low hill. Down below and to their left, in a sort of natural amphitheatre, was a knot of horses. On the ground, wriggling toward a pile of boulders, from which puffs came rapidly, were men who stopped to fire at the boulders, then wriggled forward again.

Chihuahua's eyes were glittering like blue ice, now. His sinewy fingers played a tattoo on the stock of his Winchester. Suddenly he snatched out a pair of field glasses from his saddle bags and trained them, first on the attackers, then on the men behind the boulders.
"She's them stranger be'lin' those rock. Two of him. Them other fellas, I'm see in Gurney. W'at you're call them dam' bad actor. Mabbe they're work for King Connell. Mabbe for them Howard Boy. Mabbe for Wolf Montague. In this dam' Territory—quién sabe?"

Lit took the glasses and studied the battle. From man to man of the attackers he turned the lenses, then stiffened suddenly:

"I don't give a dam' who those fellows in the open are working for," he gritted. "I'm siding in with the ones in the rocks. Come on, Chihuahua! We can ride around the rim here and open up on'em from above the rocks. Are you on?"

"Pues, two an' six, she's not so good as four an' six!" grinned the halfbreed. His thin mouth was like a gash. "I'm figure, Lit, that them fella in the open is mabbe those one that bust my w'iskey. Hah! Me, I will help them to git sick!"

They put spurs to the horses and went sliding and scrambling around the rim, until they could throw themselves down upon the crest of the slope, almost over the two attacked ones. Chihuahua inspected his rifle deliberately, nodding, muttering to himself in Spanish. He rested the Winchester upon a low rock. With the whiplike crack of the report Lit, peering over also, saw a man upon the ground jump convulsively, then rise, take two amazingly long steps, turn around and crash prone.

"Hah! He would say I'm not miss," grinned Chihuahua.

The two men in the rocks were gazing upward. Lit waved at them and, as if heartened by the reinforcement, they took up their firing again. The attackers were now concentrating their fire on the rim where Lit and Chihuahua were alternating shots.

The shooting was a continuous tattoo, now. Lit almost forgot his original intention to get Bisbee, whom he had seen through Chihuahua's glasses. Bullets cut the rim around him, flinging dust in his eyes, throwing chips of rocks against his face. He fired mechanically whenever a man exposed himself, but he was far from a deadshot with the rifle. He was so engrossed in the work that he failed to note the slackening of fire from the rocks. It was only when a thud of hoofs sounded behind him that he turned. There were the two men whose cause he and Chihuahua had espoused.

"Let's git while the gittin's good!" a squat, bearded man was yelling. "Yan'der's two more murderers a-comin'!"

Lit peeped over the rim again. There were two new riders, flinging themselves off their horses to join the battle. He yelled at Chihuahua:

"Our fellows are here! Let's go!"

Chihuahua nodded with a wide grin. "Pues, my w'iskey, she's one drink they will remember! Bueno! We're go."

They caught the horses, swung up, set in the spurs and were gone at a pounding gallop across the slopes before the enemy could realize the meaning of the firing's halt. Hell-for-leather they raced for miles before slackening pace to take stock of each other.

The two men they had rescued were efficient-looking individuals. The squat one who had warned Lit of new attacks appeared the leader, for his companion, lean, walrus-mustached, narrow-eyed, seemed always to wait for him to speak.

"Well partners, yuh certainly wandered up real providential!" grinned the squat spokesman. "Jake an' me, we're prospectors. We'd been a-standin' off them dam' cowboys for half an hour an' we seen the pearly gates openin' up for us, too! But, by God! They never would've stretched us!"

"Why would they want to stretch you?" asked Lit curiously.

"Do 'no'. But they waved a lass- rope at us right understandable, while they was a-doggin' us into that valley. We flopped behind them rocks an' opened up on 'em. Me an' Jake, we're peaceful men, we are. But no dam' cow's-chambermaid's goin' to run a sandy on us while we got a ca'tridge left!"

"She's this dam' Territory!" sighed Chihuahua. "Them fella, they're work for somebody, like I'm say, Lit. They're ride out for to find them other fella's cowboy. Si! An' 'wen they find some stranger, they're hang 'em. An' then they're ask them question."
“Well, me an’ Jake, we owe yuh-all one,” grinned the squat prospector. “Mebbe we can hand her back to yuh sometime. We was headin’ over toward The Points, to have a look-see.”

“’Five-six mile, now, an’ she’s them trail for your Point,” Chihuahua told him. “We have one pleasure, Lit an’ me, to shake them old load from the Weenchestair for two dam’ good fellas —hey, Lit?”

“I’m going to Los Alamos, Chihuahua,” Lit returned unworriedly. “If King Connell is buying rustled stock from Frenchy, like as not he bought the Bar-B’s strays. Can you come along? Will you?”

“No, my friend. Me, I’m ride for Gurney. There is one reason, one dam’ good reason, w’y I’m never ride for Los Alamos, any more. But, in Gurney I’m see you! Por supuesto! Me an’ you, Lit, we’re not lose them other—no!”

CHAPTER VIII

A Student of Brands

Lit found himself strangely lonely, with parting from that big, cheerful character who called himself “Chihuahua.” He wondered why the smiling breed had made so much impression upon him. He had not missed Slippery Elms and Ed Sanders particularly, when riding away from the Bar-B wagon on the Rowdy. And he had worked and spread with the two ever since he could remember—ever since old Barbee had brought him, a shy, gawky kid, to the big rambling Bar-B house on the Diamond.

“I’ll bet there’s a lot on his back trail a man’d like to know about!” he thought, as he rode the miles of the trail Chihuahua had described as that to Los Alamos. “He’s plenty salty—it sticks out all over him.”

He mulled what Chihuahua had told him, of Territorial affairs and conditions. For it was beginning to dawn on young Mr. Taylor that what had seemed no more than a pleasant ride down into the Territory, an investigation of Frenchy’s doings, was perhaps more of a detail than he had thought when Long Al had talked about it.

He watched the land’s lie ahead. He wondered where the boundaries of this great Los Alamos range might be. Wondered, also, when he would come upon a Connell rider. Then a thought came to him, born of memory of those two prospectors whom he and Chihuahua had rescued . . .

“How’ll I know ’em for the King’s hands?” he asked himself sardonically. “Unless, maybe, I get a look-see at their horses’ brands!”

So he came to the top of one of those hogbacks which marked this country and lifted only his bare head above its crest. To right and left he looked, into a shallow valley between this hogback he was on and the next rise. Dark brows climbed.

“Well!” he said softly, as if the stooping one down in the low ground might hear him. “It looks like a committee of one to pass on brands and earmarks!”

The puncher below him had thrown a steer. A rangy yellow horse held the lariat taut while its master bent over the four-footed creature and—as Lit had remarked—seemed to study the brand. It was all very interesting.

“My business being what it is this week,” Lit thought, “a fellow curious about a brand on Los Alamos range—and I reckon this is Connell’s range—is out of the same rock with me. Be damned if that’s Spanish, either!”

So he watched the engrossed one; watched him—Suddenly, he lifted himself a little more, to see more clearly. There came to him an odd excitement that was pleasurable. The slender one down there was dressed like a puncher, but—there was something about the way of standing, of moving, that told Lit he watched a woman, or a girl. A range-bred one—that job of four-footing with a figure eight loop was no soft-sole’s work!—but still, a woman. And, being a woman, a girl, might it not possibly, just possibly, be—

He slipped back down to Nigger Toe, swung into the saddle very quickly and rode off to the right—toward an arroyo that promised to lead down the slope and arrive somewhere nearabout the student of brands. Very cautiously, remembering the lessons learned from Chibuahua about healthful travel in "this dam' Territory," he followed the rocky bed of the dry stream around a flank of the hogback.

WHEN he came in sight of the yellow horse's owner, she had got her rope off the steer and it was standing, shaking had angrily. But she was at the yellow horse's side, now. As the steer made up its slow mind to charge her, she went into the bull as easily as Lit could have done and the horse danced out of the steer's path. She slapped the steer with her rope and sent it galloping, then began to coil the lariat.

Before Lit could ride out into view, she was moving off. Lit trailed her, grinning. He was satisfied to have a little more time to study the slim figure in the big saddle.

Then, out of a cross-arroyo, two riders came. They were between Lit and the girl in the hundred yards that separated them. They came as if popping out from ambush. Each had a Winchester across his arm. As Lit stared, one man lifted his long gun. His intention was plain.

The girl had just begun to turn, as if becoming conscious of the others. Lit made a flashing draw of his own carbine from saddle seaboard. His movements were automatic. The carbine came up. He lined the sights on that one who was going to fire, lowered them a shade because of the uncertainty of their setting, and cocked and fired the Winchester.

The man in the lead, he of the lifted carbine, dropped his gun and swayed in the lank as if struck by a hammer. He clawed desperately at the saddle horn, pulled himself straight.

His companion had spun his horse about with the shot. Lit shifted aim with a twitch of the carbine's muzzle. He fired at this second man. Firing fast, he shot high. The man's hat went off. But it altered his thought of firing. Instead, he kneed his buckskin around and rammed in the hooks. The buckskin went back into the arroyo that had been their hide-out like something shot from a gun. Lit gave him no time to set himself there in its shelter. He tickled Nigger Toe with the rowel and tore down upon the arroyo's mouth.

The man he had shot now jerked his horse toward the arroyo. Lit had a queer feeling with sight of the red stain that spread on the back of this one's gray shirt.

Neither rider stopped in the arroyo. Lit had a glimpse of them vanishing around the first curve of it. He took it for granted that they had enough of the war and rode with just a trace of swagger toward the girl on the yellow horse. She had ridden hard for another hundred yards but now, with disappearance of the two men, she had reined in.

With his first full view of her face, Lit's heart began to pound. He had hoped—blindly, without reason, he knew—that when he found a girl over here in the Territory she would be the girl he hunted. But that this one, whom he had saved from pretty certain death at the hands of that bushwhacker, should be that one whose face was in the locket—

He was grinning broadly when he loped Nigger Toe up to her. She stared long and fixedly at him. The eyes so wide and frank in the tin type were narrowed, now, calculating, like the eyes of the nester's daughter—Kate Quinn—shrewd beyond her years. But he had already decided that the tin type was all but slanderous. This girl was so much more than the poor picture had indicated that he must draw a long breath before he was able to speak with controlled voice.

"I reckon they're gone for good," he told her.

"If they are, then it's the first good for them!" she said in a hard voice. When Lit, hardly hearing her, still sat staring at her, impatience came to the clear face. The red mouth tightened.

"What's the matter? Haven't you ever seen a girl, before?"

"Not like you!" Lit answered solemnly, very truthfully. "In fact, I would have argued not so long ago that they didn't make 'em along those lines."

"What?" she cried, flushing. "What are you talking about?"

"You!" he said gravely. Then he caught himself, smiled.

"Never mind all that," she told him stiffly. "I haven't thanked you for saving me that bullet in the back. I don't see how it could have missed me. The Howard Boys aren’t much on missing, with short or long guns. You certainly were the answer to a maiden’s prayer, about then!”

“Now, if I can only be that, all the time!” Lit sighed. “But, I suppose that’s asking a lot?”

SHE let that pass without remark, but her face was redder than before. Rather quickly, she shook her head reprovingly at him—as if she were much older, wiser, than he.

“I thanked you for snagging him, but, just the same, it was a foolish thing to do. For you, a stranger . . .”

“You didn’t know—you couldn’t know—the layout. You didn’t know which side you were taking. It might have been the other way ’round: It might have been one of the Howards getting smoked by a couple of Los Alamos vaqueros.”

“Oh, I see,” Lit nodded vaguely. “In that case, it would have been all right for a couple of sneaks to pour lead into a man’s back. So long as the sneaks wore the Los Alamos brand.”

“Sneaks!” she cried. “You—” “Wait a minute,” he said quickly. It had not occurred to him that what he said would infuriate her so. And he had no intention, whatever, of losing his Tin Type Girl when he had just found her. “That is an ugly word. But I don’t like to see two gusses—no matter what outfit they’re riding for—jump a lone man and start pumping lead into his system without giving him a chance for his lit’l bitsy white alley. And that’s what our friends the Howards were at. It riled me.”

“Strangers aren’t wise if they get themselves riled too easily—in the Territory,” she warned him, and her tone was so owlish that Lit grinned.

“Anyway—I did happen to hit on the right side, didn’t I? I did join Los Alamos against the Howard boys. I take it you wear the Los Alamos brand.”

“In a way,” she said very dryly. “I’m Sudie-May Connell.” “Kin to King Connell?” Lit asked innocently.

“In a way,” she said again, more dryly than before. “He’s my father. And you?”

“You can call me Rose,” he grinned. “Of the famous Four Roses. Youngest and handsomest of the bunch. Of course, I’d not need to tell you that.”

“Mr. Rose,” she nodded. She looked at the neat job of hair branding that he had done on Nigger Toe’s hip. “Of the Box-Eight. I don’t seem to recall that iron . . .”

“Why, that’s funny!” he cried. “For a lot of our stuff’s been run off, one time or another . . .”

“Is that supposed to be funny? We don’t like that kind of jokes, on Los Alamos. And we run a good School for Manners. . . . This Box-Eight outfit—where might it be?”

“On the Sarsaparilla River, just above the Gumdrop Mountains,” Lit said thoughtfully. “I had a map, but it must have melted. No matter! Probably I’ll never go back. The folks over there are all too honest. So I headed for the Territory where a wide loop’s appreciated. I was making for Los Alamos when the Howards came.”

“Let’s go, then. It’s eight miles to the house.”

But when they had ridden stirrup-to-stirrup for a silent mile, she turned her face sidelong. Lit, who had been watching her steadily, with much pleasure, grinned at sight of the small frown with which she eyed him. She was wondering about him, he thought, and that was precisely what he wanted.

“Are you job-hunting?” she asked slowly. “My father’s not at home, now.” “He’s not?” Lit said in tone of bitterest disappointment. “Ah! That’s too bad! But he’ll be home pretty soon, won’t he?”

“I don’t know. He may come back tomorrow. He may not come home for a month. Nobody ever prophesies about King Connell—except strangers . . .”

“Well, I’ll have to wait for him, I reckon,” Lit decided aloud. Inwardly, he was much pleased. He had not hesitated to admit to himself that thought of bearding the formidable monarch of Los Alamos had not been pleasant. If the King were gone, he could make certain quiet investigations much more easily.

“I’ll be relieved of some lying,” he thought whimsically. “Not all, of course. But some of the most complicated lying can be done without, if I don’t have to try to fool that hairpin!"

"What?"—Sudie-May broke in upon his thoughts abruptly—"was that Box-Eight brand before you—ah—hair-branded it?"

"Ah, you oughtn’t to have thoughts like that—a lovely girl like you! Hair-branding! The very idea! That you should suspect a pore cowboy like me of such practices!"

AGAIN, she looked at him as when she had reproved his blind mixing in affairs of the Territory—as if, Lit thought with sudden resentment, he was seventeen, not she; as if cowboys of his like were the irresponsible charges of the Connells, father and daughter.

"You’re a nice boy," she said tolerantly, with an edge of superiority in her voice. "I think I’ll have Dad hire you and assign you to me. The first thing you’ll need to learn, though, is not to try being clever with me. What was the brand?"

"Well," he shrugged, "if I have to break down and admit something, I might as well. It was the Ladder-H on the right hip, with the Fencerrail unders-sloped in the right ear. Then the Galloping-XYZ on one fore hoof and Twin Diamond in the dewlap. We didn’t have much to do, the day we branded him, so we practiced our geography lesson on his outsides."

She was furious. He could see that and it waked perverse pleasure in him.
Little as he knew of girls—and less still of girls like this, brought up as heiresses to a domain the size of many a European kingdom—instinct warned him that if any of the rosy day-dreams he had been nursing since Tom’s Bluff were to become reality, meekness and good temper would never achieve the transformation.

"Let her treat me like a sort of light-ish Mex’ to hold her stirrup and pick up her rope, and that’s what I’ll be forever," was the way he phrased it.

So he whistled cheerfully and looked with bright, interested—but wholly unimpressed!—eyes upon this section of the vast Los Alamos range.

They topped the crest of a rise and below them, on the flat where a little creek ran, he saw a red tile roof all but hidden in green foliage.

"That headquarters ranch?" he asked, nodding toward the long white house.
"Nice little place, it looks like!"

She turned clear around in the saddle and eyed him very levelly. He met the stare with unchanged grin.

"You see that buckskin horse down yonder, by the corral? It’s own-brother to this one of mine. Its owner is pretty well-known in the Territory. He is—"

"Frenchy Leonard," Lit said calmly.
But if his face were unworried, he was thinking desperately fast. "Shoo! Did you think that I didn’t recognize his caballo, in the very beginning?"

She stared at him, then caught herself and shut her mouth hard. She was silent while they rode down onto the flat and toward the long, whitewashed bulk of King Connel’s ‘dobe palace that was set in the huge cottonwoods that gave his ranch its name—Los Alamos—The Coff-twood.

Lit, too, was quiet. He had not expected to meet Frenchy so soon. He was braicing himself for the time of meeting.

CHAPTER IX

"HAVE YOU THOUGHT ABOUT FRENCHY?"

WHEN they pulled in before the horse corral, Lit swung down and was moving toward her side when Frenchy Leonard came loafing from the corner of the house. Sudie-May turned in the saddle.
Lit, watching without seeming to stare, saw how she smiled in reply to the little outlaw’s habitual grin.

Frenchy stared at Lit. Amber-flecked black eyes narrowed slightly, widened again. He lifted a careless hand, waved.
"Hi, Lit!" he cried. "What you do, boy? Change your mind?"

He did not wait for answer, but came on at his noiseless, catlike gait, to stop at the girl’s stirrup. He put up his hands and she, clearing a foot from the off-stirrup, swayed to him. So he swung her out, held her for an instant off the ground and they smiled at each other, then lightly set her down. For some reason, the small business infuriated Lit.
But he was learning to mask his feelings. He faced them both with still features. Frenchy grinned at him.

"Change your mind, boy?" he said again. It was more statement than question. Lit forced grin to match Frenchy's.

"No-o. Not exactly," he said carelessly. "That is, not as to riding with you. Anyway, I'd have hit for the Bravo if I'd thought about catching up with the bunch. I didn't think about you heading back for the Rowdy. But I did change my mind about sticking on the Bar-B. Lord! a man could choose cows around the Diamond until he sprouted a beard like the end Smith Brother's, and where would he be at the end of the whiskers! Apto die without owning his own horse, or knowing that there was another wet place than the Diamond River in the whole world. I want to see a few things before I pass in my chips for cashing."

"Course!" Frenchy nodded, still grinning. But the shrewd eyes were very watchful. "Way I feel, too."

His eyes shuttled to Sudie-May. But if he expected her to help him out, with information about Lit, he was disappointed. She merely watched Lit without expression.

"Ridin' by yourself?" Frenchy asked.

"Yeh. There was nobody on the Diamond that I cared a lot about sidin'. Too, the Old Man was making up his bunch for a Spring cow-work in the Rowdy breaks. He'd hobbled everybody for one job or other. Nobody else felt the way I did."

It seemed to Lit that the guarded alertness went out of Frenchy's eyes. The gunman's smile seemed entirely friendly.

"Well, if you want to throw in with me, 'sta bueno!"

"Thanks!" Lit nodded colorlessly, then turned to look curiously around him.

The headquarters ranch of Los Alamos was the usual collection of 'dobe buildings typical of the Territory. There were picket corrals, storerooms, a row of low houses for the vaqueros with families, and a long log-and-'dobe bunkhouse for the other Los Alamos riders.

Lit stripped the bull from Nigger Toe and led him into the horse corral. He pulled off the headstall and hung saddle and bridle in the harness shed. When he came back, Sudie-May and Frenchy had disappeared. So he went across to the bunkhouse. Three or four cowboys were lounging there, youngsters of a certain devil-may-care likeness one to another. They nodded cheerfully to Lit when he came in. They invited him to "sit and look shorter." He grinned his thanks and sat down on an unoccupied bunk. Quite openly, he and they studied each other.

"Chuckline-ridin'?" one asked him.

Lit nodded. Before he could repeat the tale he had given Frenchy, a rasping voice was lifted from the doorway.

"You the fella just rode in with Sudie-May?"

BEFORE he twisted on the bunk to face the door, Lit disliked the owner of that voice. And he noticed that the cowboys seemed to tense at the sound of it, as if made nervous by the speaker's coming. So he made a point of turning very deliberately, keeping his expression uninterested, replying carelessly.

"Meaning me?" he inquired blandly, facing the tall, slender, too-handsome young man in the doorway.

"Well—I did kind o' figger I was, yeh! Far's I can see, you're the only stranger in here!"

"Well, I wouldn't know that!" Lit said in bored tone. "But if I'm the only stranger here and you know a stranger rode in with Sudie-May, why would you ask me what you already know? If there's anything in the world that tires me worse than a winter's work, it's dam' fool questions."

The tall man came on into the room. Lit saw that he was yellow-haired—like Sudie-May—and that his blue eyes were cold and savage. He observed, also, that the man wore two guns, in holsters the toes of which were tied down to his thighs by raw-hide whanges—the sign of the gunfighter—sometimes; one sign of the gunman, the real quill or—the imitation.

"Oh," he said stiffly. His face was very red. "Don't like questions, huh? Well, on Los Alamos, fella, a stranger's apt to be ask a good many questions. Fool questions? Maybe! The stranger's a dam' fool if he don't answer up right quick an' mighty straight! But, happens I already know all about you. You want a job on Los Alamos, huh?"

"Why, yes—but likewise, no!" Lit frowned. "Yes, if I like what's offered. But, hell, no! if I don't. It was just a notion. I thought I'd come by and maybe talk turkey to King Connell!"

"You don't have to do no talkin' to Connell. I do the most o' the hirin' an' th' firin' on Los Alamos. I'm Jed Connell. I'm King's second cousin an' the foreman."

"Well!"—Lit yawned and fished for tobacco and papers—"I wouldn't know all that, just by looking at you."

"Well! What about it? You want a job, or not?"

Apparently, he could not make up his mind to be offended. Lit studied the making of his cigarette.

"Yes and no. Right now, no! I'll just sleep here, tonight. Tomorrow, I'll mosey on toward Gurney. You see, foreman is the least job I'd want on Los Alamos. And since you're the King's cousin, I'd have a fat chance getting an even break—no matter how much better man I was. So, I'll take my foot in my hand, come morning, and go on."

Jed Connell glared at him steadily. Lit faced him serenely as he put cigarette in mouth and fumbled for a match.

"Likely, it's just as well you're not wantin' a job," Jed told him meaningly, then turned and stalked out.

Lit shivered ostentatiously and grinned at the staring cowboys. Then he got up and said that he would wander around and get the saddle-stiffness out of his joints.

Apparently, none watched him as he loafed about. But he was careful to preserve an air of aimlessness. Presently, behind the row of 'dobes tenanted by the married vaqueros, he found two yellow curs snarling over a green cowhide that they must have pulled down from where it hung. Lit watched with amusement while the tug of war went on. Then a jerk of it revealed a certain peculiarity.

He moved over; kicked off the gaunt curs and stared at the ragged hole where a brand had been cut out of the hip. Upon the margin of the hole was a hairless mark, the end of a brand-scar that told him nothing. It might have been the end of the horizontal line that was the "bar" of "Bar-B."

He picked it up and went to the door of the nearest house. He yelled for the people of the place. A fat and slatternly mujer came to the door. To her, in rapid Spanish, Lit explained how he found the dogs with the hide. She asked him to toss it up to the dirt roof of the house. But when Lit grinned at her, she settled herself comfortably with thick shoulder against the door frame, to eye him coquettishly and giggle at his suggestive talk.

He knew very well how to make himself simpático with her kind. Presently, he felt safe to mention the brand cut from the hide. He shook his head at her, grinned with narrowed eyes.

"Somebody has been killing a cow very quietly," he told her. "Somebody who did not wish the patron to know that an animal of Los Alamos had been slaughtered..."

"Pues, that has been," she said—and met his knowing grin with one as knowing. "But I do not think that it was so with that cow. As you would know, if you thought of the Los Alamos iron: For we brand LA of a size to cover half the cow. No. . . . This was a cow of the herd bought by the patron—by the King—somewhere beyond our line. Only a few of the fat cows were driven here for beef. Most of the others—so my man told me—were sold to the agent of the Indians on the reservation at Rio Lobos."

Lit nodded, almost holding his breath for fear that he would betray the interest, the burning interest, he felt.

"Matters," he said sententiously, "are not always as they are usually. I brought the hide to you for fear that someone might meet trouble—"

"I thank you," she said and there was admiration plain in her eyes as she looked up and down his tall body and leaned a little to him. "I can see that you are not only handsome but—one of kind heart, simpático... I—could like one such—very much. And it pays to be watchful, anywhere. Very much, it pays on Los Alamos. The patron is one who likes a tight mouth. For he buys many cattle. Some of them—"

She grinned and lifted a shoulder eloquently.
"'What're you spypin' an' sneakin' around about?" Jed Connell snarled from the house corner. He came on around it and stood with shoulders stooped, stiff in what—Lit thought—he conceived to be a gunman's crouch. "I'm tellin' you—"

"'Well!'" Lit drawled mockingly, "'if it's not Bitter Creek, himself, again. What are you sneaking around behind me, about? Afraid I'll show you up and get your foreman's job? Or did you just want to know what a real hand looks like?"

He watched the tall man closely. How dangerous, exactly, Jed might be, he had no idea. But he fancied that he was more "'on the talk'" than "'on the shoot,'" for all the tied-down holsters. But, even if Jed were as dangerous as Bisbee had seemed, Lit knew that he felt no such nervousness as had gripped him in Tom's Bluff. He was perfectly in control of himself. As Jed's hands seemed to slide closer to gun-buts—

"'Don't you!'" he said coldly. "'Don't start for those plow-handles unless you mean it! Any time you wave 'em at me, you'd better be ready to go the whole hog clean through to the end bristle. Else you'll wake up trying to tell St. Peter's right hand round-up angel what a mistake you made!"

Jed's big hands twitched—but seemed to get no closer to the Colt butts. Lit watched him very grimly.

"'Now, is he just a plain bluff, or does he need a push to get him into a war?" Lit wondered. "'Those cowboys in the bunkhouse acted like he was a whole bottle of wolf poison with the stopper pulled out. But——"

"'Jed!'" Sudie-May cried sharply, from the house corner.

Both men turned to face her. Jed's manner blended defiance and unease. Lit looked at her with calm interest.

"Let this man alone," the girl said in flat, emphatic tone. "'He saved my back from a Howard bullet today. The least we can do, on Los Alamos, is to let him do as he pleases."

"'He was snoopin' around, talkin' to the vaquero' women," Jed said sulkily. "'That don't go on Los Alamos."

"'Why, what are you hidin', that you're afraid somebody'll find out?' Lit asked innocently.

Jed seemed to have no answer for the question. But Lit saw that the girl's eyes narrowed as they came quickly to his face. She stared hard at him, then spoke to Jed without turning.

"'Trot, Jed! I'll talk to Taylor.'"

Lit watched him stalk away. When he looked at Sudie-May, he grinned cheerfully.

"'Is he really poison? Or did somebody tell him so, once?' he wanted to know.

"'He's salty enough,' she said almost absently. "'So are—some others around here. I think it might pay you to remember that—just as a sort of general thing.'"

"'I'll try,'" Lit promised meekly. "'But I don't expect to have much time for thinking about Jed and Company. You see, I will be thinking about you so much—"

"NEVER mind that! You're not talking to a dancehall girl, now! What were you doing—when Jed caught you?"

"Just snooping around. Trying to find the place where he buries his thousands of victims. You know, I have a notion that Cousin Jed's not so fond of me. But I'll try to bear up. After all, since you like me, what does Jed matter!"

"'You think I like you?' she said angrily. "'I think that I'm in about the meanest situation possible. I have to keep remembering that I owe you a debt, when my natural impulse is to slap your face!"

"'Oh, you'll get used to that!'" Lit assured her cheerfully. "'In time, you'll probably come to like it, wonder how you got along before I came. So, don't bother! Once you’re fully acquainted with all the beauties of my nature, you’ll be absolutely wild about me. But—in spite of the fact that the place will never seem the same to you—and to Cousin Jed!—I have to leave you. Some morning I'll have to get into Nigger Toe's middle. But it's not 'adios!' that I'll say! Not—any! It's 'hasta la vista!' Until I see you again. For I certainly will see you again!"

He moved a step nearer, until he looked down into her frowning face. All trace of banter was gone and the seriousness of his expression seemed to check what she intended to say.

He put out a hand quickly, caught hers, held her.

"So—I’m telling you hasta la vista!"

She stared up at him frowningly. But there was more of surprise than irritation in her face, her eyes. Even a trace of—alarm! Lit saw, and smiled down at her.

Then she pulled her hand free, stepped back quickly.

"Wonderful!" she cried. "He just rides into the Territory, onto Los Alamos, swings down and tells the girl. And that settles everything!"

"What else is there that you’d like to have me settle?"

"Oh—there’s Frenchy Leonard, just for instance! Have you thought about Frenchy? Some folk think he matters, a little."

There came to Lit memory of Kate Quinn, the nester’s girl. "He’s just—wonderful!" she had breathed, in her boyish brown face abjectest worship...

Red fury rose in him. Not even toward Bisbee, in Ike Menter’s saloon at Tom’s Bluff, had he felt such hatred. He had played cheerfully like the other cowboys, with the painted ladies of the cowtowns, the pretty Mex’ girls of villages between the Diamond and the Bravo. He was no innocent, no "preacher." But he was like most of his kind, in that a "decent" woman brought his hat to his knee. And thought of Frenchy and the girl Kate, thought of Frenchy and this level-eyed, finely-tempered girl who was queen of Los Alamos set him shaking with rage.

Partly, he knew it was jealousy. He had built up a pretty plan, with first sight of Studie-May’s face in the locket.

His fury wrestled with the faint pull of cold common-sense that warned him to wait, wait, wait! That told him this was neither time nor place far facing Frenchy Leonard, deadliest of the gunmen across a thousand miles of range. He knew that he had not the slightest hope of matching gun-skill, with the grinning boy.

Sudie-May retreated another step, staring fascinatedly into his face. Slowly, painfully, Lit got hold of himself.

"Why, yes," he drawled. "I have sort of thought about him."

CHAPTER X

NO LAW WEST OF THE ROWDY

"So I told the agent I was riding for the M-in-a-Box over Four Rivers way and we’d been missing cows. Said I’d heard he’d just bought some beef and I’d like to have a look at the hides, if he didn’t mind. Figured, you see, that if he was buying stolen stuff, he’d be ticked to show me that this bunch wasn’t what I was hunting."

Lit grinned ruefully at the memory. Smoky Cole, tall, gaunt, grizzled, watched him steadily from his post in a chair tilted back against the wall of the sheriff’s office in Gurney, without change in hisseamed saddle-brown face.

"He bust out laughing," Lit went on. "He’s a fat, red-faced hombre, you know, and he like to died a-laughing. Finally, he got both his hands to his sides and sort of held in for a minute."

"Sonny!" he says. "Ever see an Indian eat a beef? Uh-huh, I thought you hadn’t. For he just pulls a couple of hairs out of the tail and ties his ears back with them. Then he starts eating. And when he’s done—there isn’t hide nor hair left of the critter!" He was still rolling around the agency floor, a-whooping, when I rode off."

"’S truth," nodded Smoky. "They just boil ‘em, hide on. So yuh never seen nothing o’ hides, then?"

"Not a thing. You might believe that two-three hundred of Bar-B stuff just left the Rowdy breaks and the lot was swallowed whole by this dam’ Territory."

"Son," grunted Smoky very dryly, still with tiny, squinting blue eyes upon Lit, "that ain’t nothin’ to some o’ the things this-hee Territory’s swallowed in her time. Now, way I look at it, they ain’t a Chink’s chance o’ yuh findin’ them cows. But if yuh can plant the deadwood on King Connell, an’ if we can catch him off from his boys, we can mebbe git the money fer 'em. Well, I’ll think it over."

Lit took this as his dismissal and went out to seek Chihuahua Joe. He asked up and down the street of everyone he met where he might locate the half-breed.

He encountered Halliday, a short, thickset man of red and cheerful face and twinkling, sun-squeinted blue eyes, one of the town’s store-keepers. Halliday looked Lit over shrewdly.

"Chihuahua? Why, he’s prob’ly wroppin’ himself around the Jordan, about now. Tell yuh what, young feller. Just listen as yuh go, till yuh hear what sounds like a whole dern’ band. That’ll be ‘Brownie’ with his mouth an’ bones. Some’r’s right around, yuh’ll find Chihuahua, a-pattin’ his foot."

But there was no sound of a whole dern’ band.” Lit stopped finally in the Antelope Saloon and was standing at the bar, glass in hand, indulging in a privilege infrequently available to him, that of studying his own face in a small bar-mirror, when a noisy group entered, high heels clicking upon the rough floor, spur chains jingling, talking loudly.

"Wolf Montague’s gang,” muttered the bar-tender nervously. "Oh, Lord!"

They were a hard-looking quartet, even for this country of weather-beaten and war-scarred men. But Lit had seen too many of their like to share the drink-dispenser’s emotions. Nor did he have any vested interest in the bar-fixtures. So he but kept an eye on them in the bar-mirror while he admired the color of his drink. Then entered Bisbee. He and Lit recognized each other instantly.

"Hey!” shouted Bisbee, to the four men already at the bar. "Here’s one o’ our rustlers! I seen him through the glasses, other day! Fella! You’re sure goin’ to stretch a rope tonight!"

"Don’t you reach for those guns unless you really mean it, Bisbee,” Lit advised him softly. "’Cause I sure-ly hate fooling. How’s the arm I burned for you? And your crimped left arm that you can’t shoot with? Too bad you can’t sell that other gun to somebody that could use it! Shame to let a good Colt get all rusty."

BISBEE snarled wolfishly and took a half-step forward. But a burly, brutal-faced warrior came shouldering past him, to stand with arms akimbo and glare at Lit, who now leaned lightly against the bar with folded arms.

"So yuh’re one of them dam’ rustlers that got away from us, huh? Well, this is one time yuh ain’t gettin’ away! Yuh’re goin’ to trot along of us right nice an’ peaceful, an’ when we come to a cottonwood that’s just your proper fit, we’re goin’ to take a nice, new rope an’ tie a cute little knot in one end of it—for your collar, see? Then—"

"Pues,” remarked a plaintive voice from the saloon’s rear door, "w’at is it you do, I’m wish it you’re start him. I’m git so dam’ tired to hold this Wench-chestair . . ."

Lit had no need to whirl, with the Montague clansmen. He merely dropped his hand to the butt of his Colt and grinned. As for the others, they kept their hands conspicuously clear of contact with their weapons. It began to dawn upon Lit that Chihuahua Joe was not without a certain reputation in the locality.

"Well!” grunted Chihuahua, inquiringly. "Is it not to be, then? This hangin’ with those cottonwood an’ ice, new rope! Dios mio! I am disappoint’d like the hell. Pues, if those hanging, she’s just as fine some other time, p’raps you will go now? An’, mabbe-so you will go clear away from this Gurney, st? It will be much better. For if my friens’ in town an’ me—you’re know poor ol’ Chihuahua!—we’re find you—"

"Mebbe we’ll go,” snarled Bisbee truculentely, "but don’t you never think we won’t come back. An’ when we come, we’ll come a-shootin’!"

"Said the bold, bad Bisbee, one time in Tom’s Bluff,” nodded Lit. "I recollect, now. Couldn’t figure, for a minute, where I’d heard that before. . . ."

"An’ as for you—"

"And as for me”—Lit moved softly over to stare into Bisbee’s long, green eyes—"you can’t come shooting too soon to suit. Tell you what! We’ll step out into the street right now. Stand back to back. Walk ten steps and turn and let go! That suit you? Come on!"

"I shoot when an’ where I’m good an’ ready!” Bisbee met Lit’s eyes steadily enough and Lit was forced to concede that the big, tallowy-faced man was not bluff. He began to understand that Bisbee was merely a “sure-thing” gambler. He would shoot—when he thought he had the edge.

“Mabbe you’re shoot w’en you’re ready,” Chihuahua reminded him, “but you’re hightail it w’en me, I’m good an’ ready! Pues, me, I’m ready now...”

The muttering group swaggered it outside and to the hitch rack. Like a great cat, Chihuahua flitted to the door after them, for all his high heels managing to move like a shadow. He crouched there with Winchester thrust outside, a lean, deadly figure. Presently, he straightened and came loafing back to the bar, with thin mouth stretched in widest of grins.

“Hah! I’m tell you, Lit, that me an’ you, we’re not lose the other, w’at’?”

He flung an arm about Lit’s shoulders and walked him across the bar-room, then back to the bar, where he shouted for drinks.

“W’ere’s them Brownie?” Chihuahua roared suddenly. “W’at the hell! She’s s’pose to play with them mouth-harp while I’m dance them cachucha. We will drink the w’iskey; we will dance. We will put them town marshal in them water trough! Yaawwiiiiiah!”

Entered two familiar figures, Irish Tim Fenelon and Hognose Ott. Tim greeted Lit with a wolf-howl and he, warmed by the Jordan to friendliness with all the world, replied in kind. Dimly, there came to him the memory of Irish Tim’s hair rope, found by Long Al beside cattle-tracks upon the Rowdy. But, after all, Frenchy was to blame for the rustling, thought Lit blurrily. Tim had always been a good fellow, in Tom’s Bluff. As for Hognose, he was never taken seriously by anyone. His aspiration was to be known as a man and a hard one, but his attempts to achieve the status were always either squelched promptly or ignored.

Brownie appeared presently, a shambling, grinning creature, the town’s ne’er-do-well, unknown of antecedents, sponging shamelessly his food and drinks, sleeping anywhere, tolerated good-naturedly because with his mouth-harp and bones he was, as Halliday the store-keeper had remarked, “a whole dern’ band.” He sat himself down, grinning placatingly like some friendly yellow pup, and played frantically while Chihuahua danced the cachucha.

It was a large night and it spoke loudly for their constitutions that all but Hognose were upon their feet when the dawn came to them in Mig’ Garcia’s danceplace at the end of town. They left Garcia’s for the Antelope Saloon, moving with terrific gravity.

Sometime after noon, Lit waked in the corral behind Halliday’s store, to stare blearily up at the twinkling-eyed store-keeper.

“Come on, son. Smoky Cole, he wants that yuh should come down to see him right away.”

When he had eaten the meal served him by the buxom Mrs. Halliday, Lit’s interest in life was much revived. He thanked his hostess and went through to the store, where Halliday waited.

Lit grinned weakly and went out. He drifted down to Smoky Cole’s where the sheriff sat with his sagging chair tilted against the wall, hatbrim slid down his nose.

“S’pose yuh found all your cows, last night?” Thus Smoky very dryly. “Understand yuh was lookin’ around right smart.”

“We didn’t do any harm,” Lit shrugged, reddening under the cold blue scrutiny from beneath the hatbrim.

“No! Well, if I was boss o’ the Bar-B iron an’ one o’ my hands was carousin’ around with the very jiggers he says rustled my stuff, I’d sure think some funny thoughts.”

Lit shrugged again. Viewed in the uninspired light of afternoon, the complicity of Irish Tim Fenelon and Hognose in the rustling of Bar-B strays had a more serious appearance than at the time of their entry into the Antelope the night before.

“I’d had a drink or two,” he acknowledged. “Guess I got to blaming Frenchy for everything and—Oh! I knew Tim and Hognose real well back in Tom’s Bluff.”

“I’ve knowed a good many gunkies real well—an’ then pumped lead at ’em. But what I’m drivin’ at, young fella, is what yuh figger to do, now. Goin’ to just hell around the Territory, or d’ yuh really figger to find them cows?"

"I’m goin’ to find the cows, or where they went to, no matter how long it takes, or where the trail leads," Lit told him hotly. "If my own brother—if I had one—was in on this deal, I’d hang the deadwood on him, regardless."

"Yeh," Smoky nodded, without sign of impressment. "Yeh—mebbe."

He flipped a soiled envelope across to Lit, with the deft air of a stage magician, producing a letter from nowhere.

Lit looked at it, looked at Smoky, then opened it. It was from Barbee and typically brief. Lit was to carry out Long Al Kendrick’s original instructions. He would either find the Bar-B strays, or find the rustlers. When he had news, Smoky Cole would relay it for him and the Bar-B would officially move as seemed best. He was to play a lone hand in the detective-work.

"When did this come?" Lit asked.

"A while ago. Ne’ mind who brung it. I got my own ways o’ findin’ out things an’ sendin’ an’ gettin’ messages. Them that does work for me, they don’t want to be knowed. For if they was, they not only wouldn’t never do another job for me—they wouldn’t never do another job for anybody else!"

Lit nodded, understanding perfectly.

"Big thing is," Smoky drawled, "yuh got Barbee’s powders. An’ I got a letter along with that. Now, son, I told yuh plain, I don’t play favorites—not no matter if I did know the man an’ like him, other times. Can yuh do the same, for me, if I help out all I can towards findin’ them Bar-B strays?"

Lit nodded slowly, somewhat puzzled.

"Then stick up yo paw! I’m ap- pointin’ yuh a dep’ ty sheriff under me. Here’s a star. Pin it on an’—remember yuh’ wearin’ it."

Lit turned the nicked badge over and over in his hand. At last he looked narrowly at the gray sheriff.

"According to you, King Connell gets the same deal from us as, say, the Howard Boys, or Wolf Montague?"

"Other things bein’ even, yeh!"

"But," Lit said slowly, "does King Connell think that?"

FOR the first time there showed a change of expression in the seamed, grizzled brown face. It was a flicker that might have become, with growth, a tiny grin.

"Son," Smoky grunted, with a quivering suggestion of internal amusement, "bein’ sheriff here is a job that keeps me right busy. A lot o’ inter-est-in’ things I just don’t have time to bother about. An’ one o’ them things is—what Connell thinks!"

Lit, pinning the star on, found himself very proud of the glint of it, on his buttonless vest. A deputy sheriff...

"Yuh can tell folks I made yuh a dep’ty because o’ friendship for Bar- bee," Smoky said tonelessly. "It’ll cover things."

Lit lifted narrowing eyes to the inscrutable face. And some of his inward swelling went quickly down. It was probably the truth! He had not been chosen for special abilities. The letter from Barbee to Smoky had put this star on him. So he nodded respectfully and went out of the office.

The badge might have weighed pounds, for its effect upon Lit as he went upstreet, heading for Halliday’s store.

"Por diós! You’re walk like the w’iskey, she’s still with you yet, Lit!"

Lit halted before Chihuahua. The breed’s quick blue eyes found the badge. Long and liquidly he whistled.

"Amor de diós! She’s one dep’ty sheriff. Ah! those poor, poor boy! Just w’en I’m find me one good fella, she’s fix himself up fine for to git killed!"

"Maybe," Lit grinned. "Likewise, maybe not! Anyway, it’s done, now. Yes, sir! She’s done. I’m Smoky Cole’s deputy, whatever comes out of the bag."

They went silently on together. At the door of the Antelope Saloon, Chihuahua leaned toward Lit, pushing him toward its door.

"For to c’risten them fine, new star!" he grinned.

Tim Fenelon and Hog Nose were at the bar. They turned, whooped joyously at sight of Lit. But when quickly the star’s twinkle caught their eyes, Hog Nose gaped at it, then looked nervously at Tim for guidance. The huge Irishman leaned upon the bar. Into his daredevil blue eyes came a mocking dancing light.

"So ut’s a real dip’ty sheriff, he’ll be now... Well, well, well..."
Lit stiffened instantly under the mockery.

"A real deputy and be damned if that's Spanish, either! That goes as she lays with everything she means."

Ostentatiously, Irish Tim turned his back upon Lit and Chihuahua and devoted himself to his drink. Later, as Lit gathered his dunnage together in Halliday's corral, thinking the while of the letter from Old Man Barbee which Smoky Cole had delivered, Irish Tim came swaggering up to him. It was dusk, now, and the outlaw showed a vast, dim bulk when he leaned against a corral post to stare at Lit.

"So ut's a dip' ty ye'll be now. An' ut's the Bar-B stuff ye'll be findin'. Jist like a real detective. Me son! If ye'll be takin' a word o' good advice, ye'll saddle that hammerhead an' ride for the Diamond. Ye'll tell Old Man Barbee that his stuff has gone 'where the winds come from . . .'. Tell him 'twas like to be too big a job for ye!"

"But that'd be a lie!" cried Lit, in pained accents. "You wouldn't want me to be lying, now would you?"

"Listen!" gritted Fenelon. "Whin meddlers come nosin' around the Territory, they'll be wise to come a-shootin'!"

"Sure!" nodded Lit pleasantly.

"Sure, I sabe that."

"For over this bank o' the Rowdy, there's but the lil' bit o' law we're makin' to suit ourselves."

"Sure!" Lit nodded pleasantly again. "Sure! But did you ever figure, Tim, that the day's coming, and that soon, when the real law, the simon-pure quill, will be coming? You think about that for a while, Timmy-boy!"

When Tim had gone, Chihuahua rose from the shadows and came over, teeth flashing in the darkness.

"Jed Connell, she's just ride in," he grunted. "King Connell, she's still ridin' in the country, somew'ere. For to buy more rus'led cow, mabbe . . . My friend! Chihuahua, she's the dam' fine trailer . . . Me, I have smell an' I have look an' I'm think those trail you hunt, she's lead back for Los Alamos again."

"I've got to go somewhere!" shrugged Lit. "I got a letter from the Old Man, today. He says for me to stick on the job and either find the cows or find out who got them. He's pulled the other boys back to the ranch."

Mechanically he put hand to shirt-pocket, then swore viciously.

"So that's how Irish Tim knew what I was here for! I lost that letter and he probably picked it up!"

"Well!" Chihuahua replied philosophically, "in this dam' Territory, me, I'm think a little more trouble is one small thing. Me an' you, Lit, we will ride out tonight for Los Alamos. No! No! No! You're not make them fight with Tim an' Jed. We're wait an', one day mabbe we're hang them both by one cottonwood!"

"You're going with me?" Lit asked in surprise. "Why, I thought you said —"

"Sure! Me, I'm say those other things. But I'm know you better now, am? I'm think, tonight. Me, I'm got not one dam' thing for to do, an' mabbe forty year more for to finish him, so—w'at the hell?"

CHAPTER XI

"COME SHOOTIN'—SONNY!"

Pues, w'en we're git close by Los Alamos, we're turn in them west an' we're have one look by King Connell, his Little Pasture."

They jogged along side-by-side, Chihuahua's bright blue eyes roving incessantly, Lit engrossed with a pocketful of pebbles and certain maneuvers: Upon his right wrist he placed a pebble, then extended his arm to shoulder-level and with a flip of the wrist let the pebble fall—while gun-hand flashed to Colt-butt, drew the empty gun and clicked the hammer as if firing at an opposing gunman. Then another pebble, another draw.

"Getting faster," he grunted finally, remounting with a fresh supply of pebbles. "Clicked her four times, then, before the rock hit the ground."

"Pues, w'en you're sit in them horse, you're one long way from them ground," Chihuahua reminded him, with flash of teeth. "Me, I'm think she's better w'en you're climb them tall mountain. Then, your pebble she's take more time for them fall.”

He gathered in his reins and swayed, grinning as his sorrel bucked and squealed under the sting of the pebble Lit had flipped against its haunch.

“I want to find out where our cattle went!” Lit grunted suddenly. “We’re both sure they came to Los Alamos, that some of them were sold. But we don’t know. We don’t know….”

“Pues, in Los Alamos, she’s one man w’at will know! She’s one funny fella w’at those cowboy, they’re call ‘McGregor them Handy Man.’ Dam’ funny…”

“Funny! How?” Lit looked sidewise from his quickdraw practice.

“Sí, most funny! So dam’ honest. She’s tell those cowboy how it is bad for to rusalem cow. She’s talk all time about those law an’ those order.”

“McGregor… Scotchman, huh?”

“No-o. She’s—w’at you call it? Presbyterian! If them Bar-B cows is in Los Alamos, she’s know it, McGregor.”

“But even if he doesn’t hold with rustling, he isn’t going to tell us about King Connell’s business. Not while he’s workin’ on Los Alamos, he won’t.”

“Sí, es verdad,” nodded Chihuahua to this statement of the Code of the Range. “She’s one honest fella; so she’s not talk about his boss.”

Lit rode on silently for some miles. He could not put thought of McGregor out of mind, though in his mental pictures of a dourly-honest Scot was no scene where McGregor discussed with outsiders his employer’s dishonesty. But there was one possibility, vague, and yet—

“How-come he sticks on Los Alamos if he knows there’s rustling going on?”

“Pues, me, I’m think she’s hope some day for to make King Connell one honest fella. Hah! She’s all time tell King about them hell fire for rus’lers.”

Lit grinned sourly.

“Yeh! And what does the King think about that?”

“Oh, she’s lis’en—sometimes,” Chihuahua shrugged, with answering grin. “But not all time. She’s lis’en—an’ she’s laugh. Me, I’m think these McGregor, she’s like King one fi-ine whole lot. But she’s like King’s girl more—”

Lit, jogged by the reference to thought of Sudie-May, had the vividest mental picture of those wide, steady eyes, the arrogant lift of square little chin. He could hear, as plainly as he heard Chihuahua’s voice, what she had last said to him:

“Have you thought about Frenchy? Some folk think he matters, a little.”

He nodded vaguely, barely noticing anything about him.

“Couldn’t blame him!” he muttered. “For liking Sudie-May, I mean. Couldn’t blame him a bit.”

“Then he pulled in short, to stare at a suddenly altered Chihuahua, who had spun his sorrel about almost into Nigger Toe’s path, and who leaned a little in the saddle to stare at Lit with blue eyes very grim, very cold.

“What the hell—” Lit began amazedly.

“My frien’,” Chihuahua said very softly, “you’re please to tell me how you’re come to call them lady by her first name! Me, I’m interest’ like the hell to know!”

“Well,” Lit said with the beginning of irritation, “this is a sort of queer how-do-you-do! I don’t know whether I’m pleased to tell you, or not! Why are you so interested in my calling her by her first name, anyway?”

“Me, I’m dam’ interest’ in everthing w’at’s to do with her! An’ I’m ask for to find out!”

“For dios! I ought to tell you to go straight to hell!” Lit grunted, staring hard at the grim face. “Still—I don’t know why I need to. Well, if you’re so interested, I met her the other day after I’d left you. I shot one of the Howards who was about to shoot her. She thanked me. Now, it’s all settled: I’m going to hang the hobbles onto our rustlers and as soon as that’s all strengthened, I’m going to marry her!”

Chihuahua’s tight mouth went tighter still. He was rigid in the saddle, breathing audibly through his nose. Lit watched the evidences of repressed emotion with very real curiosity.

Perhaps three hours later, for they had stopped at noon to eat and let the horses graze, Chihuahua pointed down from a hogback’s crest to a long ’dobe upon a creek-bank, with a corral of cottonwood-logs behind it.

"She's those Little Pasture. We're wait here for those McGregor. She's all time ride around an' mabbe she's come here in two, three day."

They made themselves at home in the 'dobe. Here and there in the distance were scattered bunches of cattle, grazing slowly. Chihuhuahua explained that the Little Pasture was used for small herds purchased—or more deviously acquired—by King Connell, and intended for prompt re-sale. There was no sign of any herder and with nightfall they cooked supper, lay beside the fire for a little while smoking, then rolled into their blankets.

The next day passed idly, except when Lit rode about cautiously, inspecting the varied brands on the lean cattle. Evidence of brand-blotting he found, enough to have hanged a smaller one than King Connell. But of all the cattle he found, none bore a brand that was indubitably an alteration of Bar-B.

"McGregor!" grunted Chihuhuahua, in mid-afternoon. He jerked a thumb toward a rider coming slowly across the Little Pasture toward the creek and the 'dobe.

"Howdy!" Lit greeted the big, rawboned man on tall black, when McGregor had forded the creek and sat staring sourly down upon them. "We were waiting for you. Chihuhuahua figured you would be along today or tomorrow."

"Aye? And why wad ye wait for me?" The blue eyes were noncommittal, like the craggy, brick-red face.

Lit hesitated. The old Scot was so forbidding that for an instant he wondered if it would not be wiser to find some other means of getting that information he must have, about King Connell's purchase of stolen beef. Then he decided to venture upon his original plan, and that required frankness.

"If you'll climb down and listen to me for a spell, I figure to keep you interested."

McGregor studied him without lightening of his grim expression. But, finally, he grunted and swung down.

"Ye'll be the laddie that rode in wi' Sudie-May," he accused Lit. "Wiel?"

"But it isn't well! Not by a dam' sight!" protested Lit. "Look here, McGregor. I've heard you put down as one of the two-three honest fellows in the dam' Territory."

"Dinnae sweer!" roared the old man rebukingly. "Vain oaths are the de'il's ain language that leads ye surely tae hell's fire!"

"Oh! Excuse me! Well, I'm laying my cards on the table. I'm riding for the Bar-B over in the Diamond River country. Now, our strays were rustled by Frenchy Leonard this Spring and driven over here. King Connell, he bought all or most of them. I'm going to get them back or collect the price of them. I'm going to put Frenchy where the little dogs wou' bite him for a while! Now, I'm asking you to help me put the deadwood where it belongs."

"Ye're an ambeetions laddie! Aye! Most ambeetious!" McGregor's grin was dourly mocking. "Wad ye nae like a deed tae the Territory, as weel?"

"She's a big enough job," Lit agreed. For all his quick flush, he eyed the old Scot steadily. "But I figure to do it and do it without getting killed off, either!"

"Look here! I sabe how things are going in this Territory. I've had my eyes wide open, here lately. I know the big fellows buy rustled stuff off the likes of Frenchy about as much to keep them off their own herds as because they naturally like shady deals."

"Sae I ha' said, mony's the tame!" McGregor's craggy face was still unreadable, but into the blue eyes had come enthusiasm as he stared at Lit.

"All right! I'm deputy under Smoky Cole and I can see two angles to my job: I'm going to hang this Bar-B rustling onto Frenchy's gang and make King Connell ante up our stuff or the cash for it. That's half of the ticket. The other half is—I'm going to help to bring honest-to-God law and order into this Territory. There's maybe going to be some smoke floating before the job's finished, but she's going to be done and done legal. Now, are you game to side in with me? Or will you just sit on the fence and let the other fellow do it?"

"What wad ye want o' me?"

"King Connell bought our strays off Frenchy, didn't he?"
"Sae ye ha’ said," fenced McGregor. Suspicion had crept into his face again. Lit eyed him scornfully for an instant, then deliberately he got up.

"Come on, Chihuahua! Let’s catch up the horses and hightail it!"

He went inside the ’dobe and came out with saddle and bridle. Ostentatiously, he ignored McGregor, who squatted still beside the wall. Chihuahua went in and came out with his gear, whistling softly. His bright blue eyes went furtively to Lit in flashing, questioning glance. Chihuahua might have no slightest idea of what moved in Lit’s mind, but he backed his play to the limit.

"Laddie!" The call seemed forced from McGregor’s unwilling lips. "A moment, laddie."

"Yeh?" Lit turned without appearance of interest. "Yeh?"

"Why wad ye expect me tae gi’ ye evidence against Connell?"

"Well—wouldn’t you rather see this job pinned on him, and costing him nothing but a little cash, than to have him packed out some fine morning with holes enough in him to keep him from ever floating again? What I’m trying to do is make these donkey-dumb grunies see, plain as the Fence-Rail brand, that the day’s past when they can raid another fellow’s herd, kill off his hands, and then thumb their noses at the whole world. Take it or leave it!"

OLD McGregor squatted rigidly, staring at the ground. Lit pitied the old man. It was violating the very first article of the Range Code to give evidence against one’s employer. Putting himself in McGregor’s position, Lit could understand his battle. But he felt a quick leap of excitement when at last the old Scot raised his grim face.

"I’m takin’ ye for an honest laddie, as honest a man as mysel’. ‘Tis sair against my conscience tae tell ye so much. But —" he groaned cavernously "—mayhap guid’ll come frae it."

He fumbled for plug tobacco, worried off a huge bite and worked it into beard-stubbled cheek.

"Aye! Connell bought the Bar-B strays frae Frenchy. A mixed bunch—cows, calves, steers. The calves wi’ the mithers. Connell paid Frenchy a thousand for the lot—some twa hunder’ an’ feefty head."

Lit nodded, trying to keep eagerness out of his face.

"And a tolerable average price would be three times that, beef the way it is!" he said grimly.

"Aye!" McGregor nodded. "Weel—sixty head ha’ gone tae the Injuns on the Rio Lobos. Connell’s beef contract. A hunder’ head went to the mcelelty at Fort Lowe. It’s in my mind these ha’ all been et. We ha’ beefed a few for headquarters. Seventy-odd head are on the range at Vilas Creek. An’ Connell will buy a’ the rustled stuff Frenchy can bring him."

"Where’s Connell, now?" Lit asked softly.

"Arno. For mair rustled stuff, I make na doot."

Lit drew in a long, slow breath, lifting his chin, smiling up at the sky very pleasantly.

"Funny, Chihuahua," he said, "I just happened to think that we are heading that way—towards Arno . . ."

"Ye’ll tell Connell ye ken he bought the Bar-B strays?"

Lit looked with quick gravity at the old man, nodded:

"I’ll have to. For I’m going to demand payment for every dogie calf! But he’ll never know where I got the figures on what he bought. Don’t you worry about that for a minute. I know—" he shrugged, spoke with a humility quite new to him "—that I’m bucking a tough game on this bank of the Rowdy. I’m not going to talk a lot about what I’ll do. But if things go, the way I am going to try to make ’em go—you’ve done a good job for everybody, today. For King Connell as much as for anybody else."

He stared blankly, grimly, through the old Scot.

"No law west of the Rowdy," he said softly. "Well—maybe we can change that!"

They left McGregor still hunkered before the ’dobe staring after them. Chihuahua turned in the saddle, waved at the gnarled figure silhouetted against the gray-brown wall. Then he turned back and shook his head and grunted.

"Me, today I’m swear she’s them—impossibles!"
“Luck!” Lit shrugged. “Dumb luck. I didn’t think he’d talk, either. I reckon we just hit him on his soft spot—the hope that King Connell can be bootied into being honest.”

He was busy with his thoughts for a long while. The saddle slipped a little on Nigger Toe’s back. Lit muttered and swung down to tighten the latigo. Chi-huahua rode on slowly toward the crest of a rise. So it was that Lit was on the ground, alone, tugging at the latigo, when he heard the slow clop-clop of a horse’s hoofs on stony ground. He turned, stared . . .

“Hel-lo!” he greeted Sudie-May, who sat her buckskin in an arroyo’s mouth, watching him. “This is certainly a pleasure, seeing you again so soon. You weren’t—looking for me?”

“What is it, this time?” she inquired very evenly. “Just another snooping expedition, like the one Jed interrupted.”

“Oh, don’t say that! Say ‘scouting.’ It sounds a lot better. How is Cousin Jed, by the way? Not so well, we trust!”

She pushed the buckskin closer. Lit, done with his girth, leaned against Nigger Toe and looked at her with pleasure that he made very patent. She had a grip on herself. She faced him without expression.

“I wonder how far an obligation goes,” she said after a time, in a tone of troubled thought. “If a man does you a favor, a big favor, do you have to go through life letting him spy on your own people, hit at them, without doing anything?”

“Well—” Lit began judicially. Then he decided to throw off the pretense of misunderstanding. He came over to the buckskin’s side and looked up into her face.

“I wouldn’t say so!” he told her very quietly. “In fact, since I know what you’re talking about, I say—no! You can realize that I couldn’t come to Los Alamos as a friend. Not that day! Los Alamos was enemy-country. I didn’t pretend otherwise, did I? I didn’t tell you that I was a friend of the family.”

“Then, why did you stop that Howard bullet that was marked for my back? It won’t do, Mr. Taylor! I have thought it out: You were coming to Los Alamos on a spying trip. When you saw me about to be jumped by the Howard Boys, you thought it was just what you’d have ordered. You opened up on them, counting on putting me in a hole. You did it! You put me under obligations, so I had to step in between you and Jed—”

“Lucky for him that you did,” Lit nodded amiably. “He never saw the day that he could do a good job of gunning a man. Not from the front, that is!”

His hand came up, closed over the slender hand that rested on the saddle horn. She began to pull away, but he held her.

“You thought it all out, did you? You know exactly why I smoked up the Howard boys! You don’t know a thing about it! There were two mightily good reasons for my buying into that business: First, I didn’t give a whoop who they might be; they were bushwhacking one man without giving him a chance. That was the way it looked—way it would have looked, even if I hadn’t known all the time that you were a girl.”

“And that doesn’t do! How could you know that I was a girl? You were a hundred yards away. You saw nothing but my back. And I wear pants and shirt on the range, all the time! So—”

“Oh, but I hadn’t been so far away, the whole time. I didn’t tell you before, but I had been watching you study that cow’s brand—what were you doing? Trying to figure out what it was before they blotted it?—for a good while. I placed you for a girl, even if you had four-footed her as well as any man could do.”

“You were watching me, then?”

Her tone puzzled Lit. He had not expected what he said to have so much effect upon her. She stared at him, not pulling against his hand, now. Her clear face was very red.

“For quite a while,” he nodded. “So—”

“But you were spying!”

She seemed to reach for that angle of the affair, to avoid another.

“Of course! And I was spying on Los Alamos, when the bold, bad man from the hard water fork of Bitter Creek jumped me. I’m glad you stepped in, then. I didn’t want to kill him.”

“You think you would have killed him?” she said unpleasantly. “That never occurred to me! You see, I hadn’t put you down as a gunman, then. Now, of course, I know. But, even if you are one, maybe you’re not the only one in the Territory. . . . There’s Frenchy—just for instance! Oh! I have a message for you. From Frenchy. Before he rode out the other day, he left it for you. You see, we’d heard about the pretty tin star and your—brave plans. Frenchy understands that you’re coming after him, soon, with large, ferocious gestures. He says:

“Come shooting—sonny!”

“Now that’s downright kind of Frenchy! It is that. But—I don’t see how I can go easy on him, for all his thoughtfulness.”

But, for all his air of pleasant unconcern, Lit boiled inwardly. And to cover his real emotions, he let her hand go and fumbled in shirt pocket for the Durham and brown papers. An oval object was caught in the strings of the tobacco sack. It dropped to the ground and mechanically the girls’ eyes followed it. She stared, then straightened in the saddle. Her eyes shuttled to Lit’s suddenly red face.

“My locket!” she cried. “That’s my locket! Where did you get it? Give it to me!”

Deliberately, Lit stooped and picked it up. He pressed the spring, opened it, looked up at her.

“Where did I get it! Oh—back where the winds come from. . . . I have been carrying that for quite a while, now. It’s a poor sort of thing, compared to the girl the picture is supposed to represent. But it’s the best of her I have got, so far. I’ll hang to it until I get her . . . .”

“Give it to me! It’s mine! I’ll not have you carrying it!”

“I will not! I’ll not have Frenchy wearing your picture!”

“Frenchy? Are you trying to make me believe that you got that locket from Frenchy?”

Red mouth curled with sudden scorn.

“You would have to add picking pockets to spying, to get anything from Frenchy!”

“You don’t mean that,” he told her quietly. Unwillingly, she met his steady eyes. “You may not know much about me, but you’re too much of a person not to know something about men. You know that I’d not bother to lie to you. And that I’d not take it from Frenchy. He lost it, in Tom’s Bluff. I picked it up. And when I saw that picture, I made up my mind to something. When I came upon you, that day, if my plan needed any stiffening, it got all the necessary!”

He clicked the locket shut, dropped it into his pocket. He still stared up at her.

“I’m going to keep it. Until the day comes that I’ll trade you something for it. You know what that’ll be? A ring! A plain little gold ring. Fight the rope all you want to! I’m not telling you that I’ll ever make the trade. All any man can do is live damnedest. If I can’t make you love me, that’ll be my fault and my hard luck. But don’t you think for a minute that I’m not going to put in my licks trying.”

“Love you?” Her teeth were caught furiously in lower lip. Her face mirrored a jumble of emotions. Suddenly, she laughed, a high, thin sound. “Love you! You’re going to make me love you—with Jed and Frenchy both looking for you! I think, Mr. Taylor, that whatever you intend to do won’t worry me very much, or for very long!”

CHAPTER XII

ARNO AND “AN ARRANGEMENT”

They jogged into Arno very quietly. It was afternoon and the sunshine lay like a golden film upon the cowtown’s sandy single street. Chihuahua cocked his head a trifle and squinted down the peaceful rows of one-story ‘dobs, where cow-horses drowsed at the hitch racks and occasional figures loosed from door to door. He shook his head sadly at the last.

“She’s so mi-ce an’ quiet,” he said.

“But me, I’m see them nice, clean sand all red . . . an’ wet . . . .”

“Might turn red and wet again, too,” Lit nodded, understanding perfectly.
“Well—we’ll see....”

They swung down before the Last Chance Saloon which was—fittingly—at the end of the street. Chihuahua looked about him, at the faces of the men under the mud-roofed awning of the drinking place. He seemed to know none of them. So he and Lit hitched their horses with the forethoughtful slipknot and clink-clumped across the hard-packed earth of the "sidewalk" up to the Last Chance’s open door.

“By them bar’s end,” Chihuahua breathed in Lit’s ear. Then he vanished. Lit went on in.

He thought that he would have identified Connell even without Chihuahua’s word. It was not that the King was dressed for his part. He wore the ancient and sloppy gray Stetson common to half the drinkers in the Last Chance, wore a buttonless, tattered vest and dingy shirt that had once been blue, tucked carelessly into trousers more ancient, even, than his vest, trousers of a check so violent that none but an English lord would have dared wear them on a city street.

His boots were sunburned wrecks, the heels so worn that his ankles turned ludicrously, where he leaned on the bar. But—Lit found nothing ludicrous about the King, himself....

He was a huge big man, at least three inches over six feet, and his back—now turned to Lit—had the width of a barn door. Lit moved toward him and when he edged in to the bar at the King’s heels, Connell turned slowly from talk with a man beyond. He had a round, red face, the King, and wide, steady blue eyes that made Lit think of Sudie-May. He wore long mustaches of the same sorrel hue as his thinning hair.

Lit studied him quite openly and when he was done, nodded to himself. A twinkle came into Connell’s eyes. He put up a huge red-brown hand to twist his mustache.

“Ye seem interested?” he suggested.

“That’s because I am interested,” Lit nodded. “I’d heard a lot about you. I wanted to—sort of check up for myself.”

“And now that ye’ve checked up?”

He had a booming voice, but softened by the trace of a brogue. Lit was turning over in his mind the business of ways and means. Here was competition enough for any man, he knew. Connell—Lit knew his history very well—was a fox-hunting squire from the Ould Sod, but unlike most of the Old Country youngsters bringing pounds sterling into the American West, Connell had prospered amazingly. He had schemed and fought his way to vast holdings and power in the Territory. He was bold and shrewd and cheerfully unscrupulous. That unusual discretion growing in Lit counseled him to be careful, very careful, in matching wits with this master-schemer.

“I heard you’d come to Arno,” he said slowly. “So I rode down to talk to you. About—some cows.”

Connell nodded, holding the faint, amused smile. But his eyes were guarded. He looked Lit up and down.

“I love to talk,” he said.

“You won’t love it, this time,” Lit countered—and grinned. “For it’s about Bar-B cows—that came to you Half-Box HHB...”

“Half of that I understand,” Connell said easily. “The Half-Block HBH half. But the Bar-B half—it’s news ye’re giving me. Buying and selling in the numbers I do, it would be queer if occasionally a cow or two misbranded didn’t figure. But—”

“Two hundred and fifty-odd head of mixed Bar-B stuff, blotted to Half-Box HBH,” Lit drawled. “I wanted to talk to you about collecting market price for the bunch, on Barbee’s account. They say you’re a reasonable man—within limits. I have got—arguments in favor of paying the bill.”

CONNELL dropped his air of tolerant amusement. He leaned to Lit with red face very grim, blue eyes cold and hard.

“And did ye ever hear, my son, that the young rooster should make a small crow?”

“I don’t know that I ever did,” Lit shrugged indifferently. “And I don’t know that I really give a damn about it, now that you mention it. But I’ll tell you what I didn’t have to hear—what I’ve figured out all by myself. And that is, a man as old as you ought to know better than to buy rustled stuff!”

“I don’t know why I’m long suffering, today," Connell said slowly. "Sure, I don't! That I let a long-tailed pup yap in my very face! Ye bring arguments, do ye! I'll not worry to argue. I'll just ask ye if ye've happened to hear that, from Mountain View in the north, to Alamito that's some several miles south of this, my say-so is—not without some small influence?"

"Small puddles, big frogs!" Lit returned with contempt that was only outward. "I'm a Diamond River man and what's what in this one-horse Territory is nothing to me. You may loom up like a brick church steeple, on this bank of the Rowdy. For that, I don't give a little, bitty dam'. On the Diamond River, to a Diamond River man, you look about the right size to hide behind a greasewood bush!"

He faced the King grimly, in his turn. "I've told you that I'm over here to collect for our stuff that you bought—bought knowing that it was rustled. If you want to be reasonable—fine! If you don't, it's your funeral—and you can bet on one thing for a sure thing: It'll be a funeral! About a hundred Diamond River warriors would ask nothing better than a crack at the bushwhacking cow-thieves west of the Rowdy! Not an outfit on our side but has some debts to pay off."

Watching Connell, Lit saw the first flicker of uneasiness in the shrewd, red face. He understood the King's feelings. In Connell's domain thousands of cattle grazed over miles of range. In a guerilla war with the hard-riding, straight-shooting warriors of the Diamond, Connell stood to lose enormously, even if he won in the end. And against the Diamond River outfits, he had no assurance of winning.

"Hell!" he said at last. "Ye're going off half-cooked! Ye come to me with a wild tale of Bar-B stuff ye've lost. I bought the stuff, ye say. And if I don't pay, it's to be war. Well, now! I ask ye what proof ye have, that it's as ye say? I told ye that now and again I buy a cow misbranded—how could it be different?"

"Not good enough!" Lit scoffed. "Not half good enough. One or two misbranded strays is held against no man. But that's not the case, here and now. I know that you bought two hundred and fifty-odd head of mixed Bar-B stuff—cows, steers, calves. You bought 'em from Frenchy Leonard. You sold part of 'em to the Indian agent at Rio Lobos, part of 'em to the military at Fort Lowe. The rest are on your range at Vilas Creek, right now. More! I know that you told Frenchy you'd buy every head of rustled stuff he could steal and bring you! I want the market price for two hundred and fifty head of Bar-B stuff!"

"It's a dam' lie!" Connell cried furiously. "And I'll listen to no more imudence!"

"'Est bien?" Lit nodded, grimly. "You can have until tomorrow morning to make up your mind. But you'll pay—one way or the other. You'll pay or you'll see the Diamond River through enough smoke to make it look like a prairie fire!"

"I'll not pay a penny! I'm telling ye, now!"

"Your hard luck!" Lit shrugged.

He turned, knowing that at the back door Chihuahua's Winchester covered the bar-room. He swaggered back to the front door and out. At the corner, Chihuahua joined him. They left the horses at the rack and moved together along the lines of 'dobe stores and saloons and houses.

"They're due to bother him some more," Lit said grimly.

THEY turned into a Chinese eating house and stopped to look down the long counter where men were eating. They found Art Brand at the same moment. He was staring at them. Lit frowned, at sight of the thin-faced, shifty-eyed first lieutenant of Frenchy's gang. He wondered what Brand was doing, alone, in Arno.

Brand met his stare with malevolent eyes, but turned back to his eating without open show of hostility. Lit shrugged contemptuously, hitched up his shell belt and trailed Chihuahua down the counter to a place beyond Brand. The little outlaw finished his meal before they were half-done. He got up, paid and went out. Thereafter, Chihuahua ate hurriedly, answering Lit's occasional remarks only with grunts. Suddenly, he rose:

"She's dark, very soon," he said.

"Me, I'm think mabbe Connell, she's git into them trouble, if nobody's watch ..."

He went quickly out and Lit, leaning an elbow comfortably on the counter, made a cigarette and smoked thoughtfully while he drank his coffee. With hat rim low over his eyes, he kept mechanically alert watch upon the street door and considered his talk with King Connell.

He hardly knew what to do, now. His threat to bring down the hard-bitten Diamond River warriors on Los Alamos was mostly bluff—as he feared the King would decide. At this busy season, gathering a considerable number of men would be no slight task. Even if the cowmen decided to join Barbee in a raid over the Rowdy, much time would be needed. Barbee might very well decide to let the business rest until later in the year.

"If I send him word," Lit thought irritably, "the chances are he'll snake me back to go to work."

He decided that he had to send word to Barbee about the buying of the strays and their re-sale—and about the discussion here and what he had threatened. Then he saw Chihuahua, standing in the eating house door. The breed made a small head-motion. Lit got up, paid his half-dollar and went outside. It was dark, now.

"Well?" he asked Chihuahua, when they fell into step.

"Well? My frien', she's not well! Nunca! Jamás! Me, I have scent for King Connell. An' w'en I'm find him, she's in them corrals an' she's talk to them Art Brand. Most interest', them talk: Connell, she's tell Brand for to ride fast for Los Alamos. She's tell them Jed Connell she's move them Bar-B cow for them place Jed's know. Then, Brand, she's find Frenchy. She's say w'at you're tell about them Diamond River fellas w'at will come smokin' Los Alamos."

"Oh!" said Lit. "Like that, huh?"

"Like more! Brand, she's say: An' w'at's for them nose kid wat's git all swell up like them poison püp? By God! somebody, she's better hand them kid one flime fast kick to help him go tall over them tin cup an' me, I'm just so soon be them one!"

"But Connell, she's laugh. She's say: Never mind! Them kid, she's figure for to stick in Arno one long, long time?"

"She's this dam' Territory!" Lit quoted.

Mechanically, he hitched up his shell belt. At the slight sound of creaking leather, Chihuahua leaned closer.

"Me, I'm think we're ride out, now, hah? Pues, we're bushw'ack Brand: We're help him to git sick!"

"No ... Not right now. Let's go down and let King Connell have a look at a couple of real warriors! Come on! He's probably in the Last Chance."

In the darkness, he made certain shifts in his belt. Then, grinning at Chihuahua's bitter protests, he led the way along the street until they came to the Last Chance door and stopped there to look inside.

THERE was no sign of Connell, so he stepped inside. Chihuahua did not follow. Lit crossed to the bar, bought a drink, then looked with blank face about the bar-room. Some there were in the place who were curious about him. Part of the discussion with Connell, he reflected, must have been quite audible to their neighbors at the bar. So he was marked as a Diamond River man.

He loafed over to watch the monte game going on in a corner. But as he looked on, he did not forget to watch everything about him. So, when a heavy, brutal face, almost masked by black stubble of beard, showed for a moment in the front door, he saw it. It vanished, but perhaps a minute later a squat man swaggered through the door and his face was that which had shuttled right and left as if hunting for someone in the Last Chance.

When the man moved toward the bar and ordered in a roaring voice, one or two of the other drinkers moved uneasily. Men at the monte game turned, looked at him. One said:

"There's Crowe back again—that mean freighter, you know."

Lit watched the squat man narrowly.
Mean freighters were, of course, no particular novelty anywhere. But this fellow had looked over the bar-room so carefully before coming in that his roaring entrance seemed odd, afterward.

When Crowe had finished his drink, he leaned against the bar with elbows hooked upon its top behind him. He looked up and down the room, looked at the Monte players and the watchers of the game. He straightened, came swaggering over. A path was made among the men there. But Lit was not disposed to step aside for Crowe, more than for anyone else. So the freighter met a hard shoulder thrusting out, as one of his feet came down on Lit's toe. He went staggering backward for a couple of paces. Upon his beard-stubbled face was an expression of surprise that was ludicrous.

Lit turned slowly to face him. He lowered at the freighter and Crowe gaped at him.

"You keep to hell off my feet," Lit counseled him grimly. "Don't come pushing and shoving around so free or you'll end up with your rump on a hook!"

Crowe seemed to catch himself.

"Say!" he yelled—and that yell gave him away, even to Lit. "Who y' think y' talkin' to, anyhow?"

"What has that 'who' to do with it?" Lit said unpleasingly. "I know what I'm talking to—a dam bar-room gladiator that bellows around until a man changes his bellow to a howl!"

With every indication of indifference, Lit yawned, rubbed right ear with left hand, reset his hat over one eye. It occurred to him that he knew none of that nervousness which he had felt—ages ago!—when facing Bisbee at Tom's Bluff.

"Is that so!" Crowe yelled furiously. For here and there in the bar-room men laughed. He looked down at the holster sagging from the left side of Lit's shell belt, then at Lit's left hand, which now fumbled with tobacco sack strings.

"I'll show you!" he cried triumphantly, and slapped hand to Colt-butt.

Lit's right hand—his gun-hand—had been all the while almost upon the butt of his second Colt, which he had tucked in the waistband of his trousers. He whipped it out and let the hammer drop. Crowe spun about as the heavy slug crashed into him. His gun bellowed and from the plaster of the ceiling a great chunk dropped. Then he seemed to fold, bending at neck, waist, knees. He fell face-down upon the saloon floor.

Lit looked quickly at him, then scowled broodingly around the room. He thought that this might not be the only gladiator hired by Connell to see that he stayed in Arno "a long time." But nobody did more than stare at him. And if any there owned hostile intentions, a gay voice from the back door checked them:

"Everybody! Everybody is please to look at me!" Chihuahua cried cheerfully. "Pues, he, I'm much handsomer as my partner!"

He was facing the bar-room with Winchester across his arm, bright blue eyes shuttling from face to face.

"You're come, now, Lit?" he asked. "For Dios! If anybody's move, me, I'm ready for to show them circus-trick. . . ."

But nobody seemed inclined to move, in the face of that Winchester. Crowe moved on the floor, groaned, put up a hand to the hole in his chest. Lit stepped over to him, raked the Colt away from Crowe with a boot toe, and scowled down at him.

"And I'll bet you don't die!" he said disgustedly. "But if you ever cross my trail again that won't hold! Lousy bar-room killer! You'd cut any throat that it was safe to cut, for two dollars. You think I didn't see you, peeking in the door, trying to locate me?"

He spat viciously and went over to Chihuahua. The Winchester twitched in the brown hands. Three shots sounded in flashing succession. There was the crash and jangle of oil lamps smashed and darkness engulfed the Last Chance.

"Me, I'm bring them horses back here," Chihuahua grunted.

They ran across can-littered, bottle-strewn, ground, to swing into their saddles. Behind them, in the Last Chance, many voices were lifted. But none followed them as they loped out of Arno. Chihuahua laughed softly.

"She's very fin-a, them little business. Well? We're will we go, now?"

"Gurney!" Lit said slowly. "Gurney. Do you know what for? You don't!
And so I answer for you: We’re going to Gurney to get warrants for King Connell and Frenchy, Art Brand, Tim Fene-lon and Hog nose Ott!”

Chihuahua made a choking sound and his sorrel jumped.

CHAPTER XIII FLOCKS OF WARRANTS

“Who owns Gurney, anyway?” Lit wanted to know, as their jaded animals climbed the stark slopes of the Diablos well to westward of Fort Lowe and so approached the county seat.

“Pues, you’re not make them long walk an’ not find some of King Connell, his claim-stakes. But some fellas, they’re take side with them squatter, too. Me, I’m not know w’en them fellas w’at yell loud for King Connell an’ Frenchy, theyre like him or just dam’ scared!”

They jogged on silently for a time, then over a hogback ahead appeared a lone rider. Chihuahuas eyes narrowed, then he grinned.

“She’s them store-keeper, Halliday!” Halliday pulled up short at sight of them, but made no move to retreat. Instead, his hand clung with a certain significance to the rifle-stock beneath his leg. They came on and, when he recognized them, he shoved his heavy Sharps rifle back into the scabbard.

“Yuh-all plumb crazy?” was his greeting.

“Probably,” grinned Lit. “But what put it into your mind so prominently this evening?”

“Gurney’s full up—both sides. Jed Connell an’ some Alamos hands. Wolf Montague’s crowd. Quite a few others. Frenchy an’ his gang was in town till yesterday. Stayed three days. Smoky Cole’d rid out some’r’s, so they just took the place apart. She’s all your lives are worth to show up there in daylight, even now! Young fella, stars are shore unpoplar in this neighborhood right now!”

“Yeh?” Lit lifted dark brows and his mouth set stubbornly. “Well, they’re probably going to be a sight more unpop-ular in this neighborhood before all the smoke blows away. But after that she’ll be a fine country. So Frenchy raised some hell, did he?”

“Killed Brownie, that pore, useless, harmless good-for-nothin’. Shot him down in cold blood. By the bones o’ Judas! If I’d been in town that day, I’d shore’ve handed him a Sharps’ .50 if nary other man’d stood by me.”

Chihuahua swore furiously, many long-drawn Spanish oaths. But Lit was deadly cold. Even without the details, the murder filled him with amazing disgust. That such a killing could occur with practically no hope of making the murderer pay even in the slightest degree gave him, suddenly, a clear perspective of the Territory. His original task of tracing the Bar-B strays seemed almost unimportant now, in the face of his larger duty as deputy of Smoky Cole, the Law-Bringer.

“How did it happen?” he inquired tonelessly.

“Why, Frenchy never did like Brownie none. Said his dam’ racket set his teeth on edge. That day, he was comin’ around a corner, an’ Brownie, he never seen Frenchy as he come around the other side. They bumped together, an’ Frenchy he stepped back. Pore little Brownie, he was grinnin’, an’ makin’ excuses, all scared to death. You know how he was, just like a pore friendly yaller pup.”

“Frenchy, he grinned at him, they say, an’ Brownie, thinkin’ she was all right then, he grinned back an’ bobbed his head. Then Frenchy pulled his guns an’ flipped ’em up into the air. They spun around an’ he caught ’em as they come down an’ shot Brownie dead.

“Hell!” he said. “He never kicked as much as a Mex’. An’ he walked off, still a-grinnin’. Nobody dared to touch Brownie, till Mary-Ann, she went out an’ made a couple fellas carry him into the store while she bossed the job.”

“You riding somewhere?” Lit inquired.

“Up to Faith. Got some business there. Now, young fella, yuh better take my advice an’ stay out o’ Gurney till Smoky, he gits back.”

“See you some more!” nodded Lit noncommittally.
THE store-keeper turned in the saddle to stare after them. He shook his head forebodingly as they rode straight on up the road toward Gurney. But Lit had no idea of foolishly parading his arrival. Dusk was falling as they reached the outskirts of the town. They turned to the left and rode in among the scattering houses. Finally, Lit drew rein and Chihuahua waited expectantly. His manner toward Lit had changed oddly in the past days. He seemed quite content now to await the younger man’s lead.

"Can we sneak into the district attorney’s place from the back?"

"Pues, where’s she’s back window, she’s easy!" shrugged Chihuahua.

"Me, I’m know his house."

He did not follow Lit inside when the latter, raising a warped sash cautiously, slipped into the musty back room. Lit stood in near-darkness, listening tensely. Beneath a door showed a pale line of light, but there was no sound. He tipped cautiously across the room and pressed his ear to that door. Silence hung heavy upon all the house, so he opened the door, turning the knob slowly, soundlessly.

At a table in the adjoining room hunched a wisp of a man, his back to Lit. Evidently he had not heard the door open, for he sat with fingers moving among a sheaf of bills, eyes riveted upon them. Lit stole up behind him. There was a folded legal-looking paper upon the table, at the district attorney’s elbow. Lit glanced at it mechanically, then his own name leaped out at him. It was a warrant, bearing, as near as Lit knew it, that day’s date.

"Territory vs. Murder," it read. The victim was called "Como Sellama."

Como se llama . . . "What-do-you-call him?" would be the English approximation. Lit grinned and noiselessly pocketed the warrant. Then he coughed—coughed impressively.

With a mouse-like squeak, up leaped the district attorney, overturning his chair, but clinging tight to his money. He stared transfixed at the low-held black muzzle of the Colt, until Lit had to cough again to distract his attention.

"Happen to know who I am?" Lit inquired, leaning sinisterly to the little man. "You do! That’s easy to see. You’ve at least heard of me . . . Now! Ne’mind trying to think up any polite lies. You’re not glad to see me—and if you say you are, that’ll make me sick as hell. And when I get sick as hell, I cloud up and I rain all over the fellow makes me sick as hell. And I make him sick as hell! Now, what were you about to say?"

"Nothing!" the district attorney said with feeling and conviction. "But—I suppose you come after somethin'? If—if you’ll just tell me what it is you want—"

"Warrants!" Lit breathed, perching himself on the end of the table. "About a yard of warrants!"

"Warrants? Oh!"

The relief in the district attorney’s voice was so patent that Lit grinned as he nodded vigorously.

"Oh, well! That’s not up to me, you know, Taylor. Nah! You want to see Judge Klink if you got warrants to swear out. I can’t issue warrants, you know. I ain’t got any warrants—"

"I don’t know any such thing! In fact, I know a dam’ sight better. Now, let’s don’t argue about it. That’s another thing that makes me sick as hell and so on—and so forth! Let’s see . . . First, I want a warrant for King Connell. For aiding and abetting and encouraging the willing and felonious and—and lowdown rustling of two hundred and fifty-odd head of Bar-B strays out of the Rowdy breaks. Make the charge receiving stolen property. Then, let’s see some more . . .

Dramatically, he scowled at the ceiling, in imitation of steel engravings he had seen, of the Elder Statesmen.

"One for Frenchy Leonard, for possessing those Bar-B critters. Same for Art Brand, Tim Fenelon, and Hognose Ott. And—I suppose you got one out for his arrest, Frenchy’s, for the murder of Brownie?"

THE district attorney swallowed. He had difficulty in completing the business, but he got prominent Adam’s apple back up his thin neck.

"No!" he said huskily. "No!"

"No?" Lit cried amazedly. "I’ll be jiggered! Well, let’s have a warrant for that, too. I don’t know what that poor devil Brownie’s real name was, but—no es importe! We’ll call him—” he grinned wickedly down at the little man “—Como Sellama! And I promise you the warrant’ll be served just as legally as if we had Brownie’s family tree in a flower pot! And you’d better give me at least a half-dozen made out in blank—just signed, you know. Then I can fill in the names when I see who I’m after. Hop to it! I’m in a hurry.”

“But, I told you—”

“Shut up—and get to work! Where were you raised, anyway? The idea—a common dam’ crooked district attorney, talking back to probably the only honest deputy sheriff in this whole Territory! You’ve got a drawerful of blank warrants, all signed. And don’t you try to tell me otherwise or I’ll make you eat a dozen of ‘em to teach you manners! You get ‘em out and use up some ink! I’m hell on manners—from you, to me!”

The district attorney’s watery blue eyes strayed hopefully toward the front door of his office. He seemed to tense in the kitchen chair, as if he strained his ears for some sound. When he looked back again, Lit had inched closer to him and was leaning toward him smilingly. But it was not a pleasant smile. The district attorney shrank away from that lip-curling.

“I never have killed a district attorney—yet!” Lit drewled thoughtfully, twirling Colt on trigger guard. “About those warrants, now . . .”

Hurriedly, the little man inched his chair back to the table. He opened a table drawer and drew out a stack of documents which proved him a monumental, as well as a futile, liar. For each was a warrant, and each bore the signature of one Judge Klink. He spread them out. He counted off a dozen. He put the others back in the drawer. Then he counted those on the table once more. He reached for the dusty inkwell across the table. He hunted for a pen, Until Lit rolled it to him. He looked at the point, shook his head, scraped the point against the table.

Lit’s eyes narrowed. Someone might come in to see this variety of district attorney at just any moment. Lit had the notion that the district attorney rather expected someone to come in. He felt the outside of shirt pocket, trousers pockets.

“Do you have a watch?” he inquired anxiously. “Any kind of watch. No matter if it’s not a whaling good one . . .”

The district attorney stared at him, then smirked and put down the pen. He duplicated Lit’s performance of slapping pockets. His smirk was set and stiff.

“Why, yes! I have a Waterbury. Not much of a watch, but—Here it is! I Knew it was somewhere. It’s now—”

“Put it down where it can remind you of things. The value of time, just for instance. Time’s a quaint thing, you know . . . Take now, for instance: Some nights, you could sit here piddling with those warrants and no matter how much or how long you piddled, it wouldn’t make a bit of difference to you or to anybody else! Then, again, some other night, if you took—oh! just ten seconds too long, to fill out a bunch of warrants that I’d come after, you’d wake up to find St. Pete offering you the loan of an old gown, so that you wouldn’t catch cold waiting around his courtroom. Fellow! This is one of the other nights!”

He pinwheeled the Colt in air, caught it with resounding smack of butt against hard palm.

The district attorney snatched up his pen, dipped it in the ink. It began to race across a warrant. Suddenly, he set it down and smirked at Lit.

“Ah, hell!” he cried genially.

“What’s the idea of us gettin’ into a fuss! You got the drop on me an’ it naturally made me hot under the collar. But I’m a easy-goin’ man. I never was one to hold grudges. You’ll find a bottle behind the papers on the safe yonder. Box of cigars, too. Help yourself!”

“Thanks,” Lit said slowly, puzzling this sudden shift of manner. “But, you see, I don’t ever sit, drink or smoke. And—I’m still waiting for those warrants . . .”

He rolled a cigarette, tucking Colt under arm the while.

“Well, suit yourself,” the district attorney shrugged.

His elbows were moving rapidly, but the speed of his pen across the paper was by no means proportionately swift. Lit, observing this, leaned somewhat sideway. He saw how the district attorney’s eyes kept flickering to the front door. So, when the door opened suddenly and without sound, Lit was alert. His gun covered the opening, while he dropped behind the table.

"Hey, Lit! She’s me!" Chihuahua called. He came in grinning like the cat of the canary fable. "Me, I’m think mabbe-so you take the shot for them door. So I’m yell first—careful."

His blue eyes shifted to the moveless, gaping district attorney. His lean, brown face twisted flashingly and no hired mourner at a fancy funeral could have expressed sorrow more lugubrious than did Chihuahua, sighing gustily:

"We’re stay with you one w’ile an’, if them w’iskey an’ them cigar, she’s good like you’re say, we’re accept them most kind invitation. For—them fella w’at you expect to come, all time, she’s not come, now."

Outside, ten minutes later, with the warrants a bulky packet in the bouse of Lit’s shirt, Chihuahua laughed softly:

"Me, I’m wrong about them district attorney, w’at? She’s good for some-thin’! An’ me, I’ve have one dam’ fl-ine scout: I’m go first an’ I find one Mexican hombre I’m hear about in Arno. One time, Frenchy, she’s take them pretty girl from them fella. Then I’m come back an’ w’en Jed Connell, she’s come up to see them district attorney, me, I—touch him on them head with my Colt. Then I’m tie him up an’ I put his neckerchief through his mouth."

"You found a Mex’ who’s sore at Frenchy? Well?"

"Most sore! She’s go an’ she’s find w’ere’s Frenchy. An’ she’s bring them word for us, we’re we’re say. She’s most sore! She’s do anything w’at’s hurt Frenchy—an’ for them ten dollar w’ich mabbe-so we’re pay."

"Fine!" Lit grunted. "Fine!"

"Well? We’re we’re go, now, hah? W’at we’re do?"

"Oh, everything being the way it is, I think we’ll ramble out and associate with some outstanding cow-thieves."

"The hell! Mabbe you’re think you’re tell somethin’, because you’re wiggle with them mouth? Cowthieves! She’s like you’re say: We’re go play with them peoples w’at’s live in this dam’ Territory! W’at the hell!"

"I was thinking about the Howard Boys. Suppose you find your Mex’ again and tell him to come to us at the Howards’ place, just as soon as he finds out where Frenchy is. I’ll get our horses and wait for you. I can’t show around here, now. Somebody’s sworn out a warrant for me—for murder!"

CHAPTER XIV

FRENCHY AND A POSSE

"I WAS just thinking"—thus Lit, between gasps of laughter—"how we should have brought along a few barrels of whitewash. That is, if the scheme I’m figuring works out."

"W’at will we do with them Howard boys? Kill ’em?" asked Chihuahua hopefully.

"I should say not!" cried Lit indignantly. "Frenchy and his gang may kill them, but never us! What would be the good of the whitewash if I were to kill them?"

Northwest of Gurney, well above that point where Hell Creek entered the Black River, was the log-and-adobe stronghold of the Howard brothers, whom even the Territory conceded to be hard characters. Los Alamos home ranch was south and east of the Howard place, and southwest of Los Alamos lay Wolf Montague’s ranch. So King Connell had on two sides of him hard-riding, straight-shooting squatters—though the Howards and Montagues were by no means bosom friends.

Lit was gambling that the Howards had not recognized him upon that day when he joined battle with them on behalf of Sudie-May. One cowboy looks much like another, especially when glimpsed over the sights of a Winchester. If they did recognize him today, there would be powder burned, and that was that.

"Are you safe to show yourself to the Howards?" he asked Chihuahua.

"Me, I’m safe anyw’ere," grinned the breed cheerfully. "I’m work for King Connell, si! But I’m quit him, too. An’ me, I’m never take them shot for one Howard.”

There was no sound about the log house as they rode up a little slope toward it. But from behind boulders on right and left Winchesters’ muzzles came pushing out.

“Stop right there!” a harsh voice ordered. “Yuh’ covered all-same’s a short Injun with a long blanket!”

“We’re stopped,” Lit told the invisible one. “We rode up for a pow-wow. Come on out, we don’t bite!”

Suspiciously, the Howard brothers showed themselves, a stubble-faced, sullen quartet in battered hats, patched and faded overalls, worn boots, each bearing a Winchester. For a long moment they studied Lit and Chihuahua. Then the oldest brother nodded curtly. Lit noted that he had a stiff-seeming shoulder. He wondered if that shoulder had stopped his lead . . .

“Light!” he grunted. “Let’s have the tale.”

“I understand you—all are sort of hubbing hell, with King Connell to buck,” Lit said abruptly.

The youngest Howard—a slim cowboy of eighteen or so—spat contemptuously.

“Not a bit more’n he is! Even if he has got Frenchy Leonard an’ the rest o’ them killers on his payroll. It ain’t done him much good, yet!”

“My goodness!” cried Lit. “Frenchy’s not what you’d call a favorite, in this neighborhood—I’d say.”

“Le’ me line my sights on that beaver-tooth’ illegitimate!” the boy said furiously. “That’s all! Just gi’ me one crack at him!”

“Aw, shut up, Abe!” growled the elder brother. “These fellas never rid up here just to pass the time o’ day.”

“We didn’t!” snapped Lit. “I’m a deputy sheriff under Smoky Cole—”

“Then you’re a dam’ spy for King Connell!” grunted a wide-shouldered Howard who had contended himself, hertofore, with stolid staring. He moved his Winchester suggestively.

“That’s a lie!” Lit said contemptuously. “Don’t make that crack again, fellow. Smoky Cole and I are working for this.” He tapped the star, pulled into sight. “And nobody in this country is going to give us orders. Not you little fellows, nor yet the likes of King Connell! Here! You say that Frenchy Leonard’s on the King’s payroll. All right! In my pocket I’ve got a warrant for Frenchy for murder. And I’m going to serve that warrant. That’s why we came here.”

“A warrant? For Frenchy?”

Sheer disbelief, quick suspicion, leaped into every Howard face.

“Just that! We rode out of Gurney and kept the news behind us, to find a posse Frenchy can’t bluff. Now, if you all aren’t afraid of the gang, I’ll swear you in and give you a chance to line your sights on him. But I’m running this show! Don’t you let that slip your minds a minute!”

THERE were many questions, sullen, suspicious, for Lit to answer. But the warrant bearing Frenchy’s name, reinforced by Lit’s grimly earnest manner, proved potent. Four Howards finally consented to be sworn in as a posse. Word of the vengeful Mexican trailing Frenchy pleased them.

“That’s the way to git him!” Ed Howard nodded, and Tom and Hank and the boy Abe agreed. “He’s got plenty hide-outs. No use tryin’ to smoke out all the holes in the dam’ Territory. We better wait for that Mex’.”

Two days passed, then three. In the evenings the brothers talked to Lit of their grievances. They were transplanted Missouri backwoodsmen, Ed and Tom, ex-soldiers, who had settled in the Territory because of its free land or cheap land. As they told Lit about King Connell’s treatment of his neighbors, he had to agree that they were in the right.

“Connell come in, years back, same’s we done,” Ed explained one night, grim face intent as he gathered slow thoughts. “He brought money, we brought guts. Money talks, anywhere. He dabbed his loop where he was a mind to. By God! He put that LA iron o’ his across the most an’ the best o’ the Territory!

“We never kicked about that. We located us this place that suited us. But because we was little fellas, ever’ time we got in his way he stomped on us! He run the county offices an’ he could git us charged with what he was a mind to. He called us a bunch o’ dirty, thievin’ squatters. An’ he turned his gunfighters loose on us, to waylay us an’ steal our stock. Naturally, we aim to shoot back an’ steal his stuff!

‘It ain’t right, an’ it ain’t good for this country, one man hoggin’ mile after mile o’ land, morn’n he can do a thing with, an’ ruinin’ or runnin’ off the likes o’ us—that want to settle an’ build up this country. An’ Connell an’ his likes, they’re shore goin’ to trade their strut for a limp ’fore they git shot o’ us, if ever they can!’

The Mex’ came near midnight of the third day. Lit, sleeping in the lean-to, was wakened by whispering outside. When he heard Chihuahua’s unmistakable throaty chuckle he got up softly.

“These fellas Pedro Enríquez,” Chihuahua cat eyes had caught the blur of Lit’s approaching figure, “she’s find Frenchy’s gang, all hole up in one old cabin north from here, by Hell Creek’s end. Two days past, Frenchy, she’s stick up those stage from The Points for four thousand of bullion.”

“Smoky Cole know about that?”

“These Pedro, she’s say Smoky’s disappear. But, w’at the hell! We will not need Smoky. Me, I’m go wake them Howard boys!”

They rode hell-for-leather through the remaining hours of darkness, with young Abe Howard leading the way toward the old ‘dobe on Hell Creek mouth. Once his tall bay stumbled and threw the boy headlong, but he only rolled over, hobbled back to the horse and swung up again, cursing luridly as he quieted the animal on.

“Now, let’s get organized!” grunted Lit, as well after sun-up they halted in the deep, rocky bed of Hell Creek below the ‘dobe. “We’ll scatter out and surround them. You fellows mind two things. These hombres are going to shoot to kill. That’s Number One. Second: If we can take these hairpins alive, for a nice, legal hanging, that’ll be twice as good as killing ’em here. So, the man who takes a shot at ’em after they stick up their hands had better get me first!”

When the Howards had been gone long enough to reach the brush on the ‘dobe’s far side, Chihuahua and Lit advanced upon the cabin, moving some thirty yards apart. Came a shot—from the cabin or beyond it. Then, after a fleeting interval, the rattle of a fusillade. Stooping low, Chihuahua and Lit began to run, until they dropped down behind boulders. They surveyed the cabin. Before the closed door, hitched to a cottonwood log, were five rearing horses.

Chihuahua lifted his carbine. He began to shoot toward the horses. One whirled and galloped off and, as Chihuahua continued to fire flashingly, the others followed. Lit gaped. Chihuahua had cut five ropes with nine shots! It had taken but a moment. Now the firing sounded, a steady battle between the Howards and the men in the cabin. Abruptly, a man appeared, coming from the direction of a pole corral on the creek bank, bent over, sprinting for the cabin. Lit straightened. Chihuahua, ramming shells into the loading gate of his Winchester, had not noticed the runner. Lit forgot caution, stood up.

“Stick ’em up, Brand!” he yelled.

Brand twisted about and Lit saw his teeth glinting wolfishly between snarling lips. He fired at Lit. Other lead came out of the cabin. Lit dropped down to a knee and pumped two fast shots at Brand, who staggered, came down to hands and knees, then suddenly jumped up and ran crookedly toward the ‘dobe’s door. As he ran, he yelled to Frenchy:

“Open the door! Open the dam’ door! They got me!”

“Turn around an’ bite ’em!” Frenchy yelled cheerfully from inside. “Don’t take nothin’ off them goddam Howards!”

Brand reached the door, hammered frantically upon it. The Howards were pouring lead around him. It beat like hailstones upon the thick planks. Brand leaned upon the door and the glimpse Lit had of his side-face showed despairing terror. Obviously, Brand’s nerve had snapped under the realization of death.

And over the stuttering pound of the firing, Lit could hear the high, laughing sound of Frenchy’s voice, apparently joking with his first lieutenant.

“That lowdown son of a dog!” Lit yelled to Chihuahua. “I never thought he was that lowdown! Won’t open the door and risk his dirty hide, even to help a partner!”
Then Brand went sliding down the face of the door. He came to his knees, turned like something broken in many places, fell to his face. Firing stopped. The men outside stared. Then Brand put out a hand. It still held his pistol. He inched forward, lifted himself slowly to his knees. The gun-hand came shakily up. The Colt bellowed. Where the slug went, Lit had no idea. From somewhere behind him a Winchester whanged—once. Brand toppled. Ed Howard’s grim voice was like echo to the shot.

"I wish that’d been Frenchy, instead o’ his dog!"

Lit nodded grim agreement. He lowered toward that gray door which had not opened to Art Brand. Then he lifted his hand in signal to his side.

"Don’t start the fireworks, yet awhile!" he called to the Howards.

"Just keep the house covered."

Then he lifted his voice.

"Frenchy! This is Lit Taylor! We’ve run off your horses and we’ve got you bottled up. We’ll stay here till you’re all under the daisies—or till you—all can walk through hell on solid ice! Your only chance is to grab your ears and walk out. Surrender. This is the last chance you’ll get, too!"

From the döbe came Frenchy’s defiant yell:

"Hell with you! Think I’m surrenderin’ to them dam’ Howards? Bring your fight over! Put it in the pot!"

"You’re surrendering to me—as Smoky Cole’s deputy. And I guarantee to take you down to Gurney for trial. Nobody’ll touch you on the road down—and—something like pride crept into his voice, without his intending it, "—you know dam’ well that when I say that, I mean it! But you can suit yourself: Grab your ears and walk out, or we’ll carry you out! It’s all one to me!"

"If you swear we’ll get safe to Gurney, I’ll risk it."

"You’ll get safe to Gurney, or I won’t!" Lit promised him.

The door opened. Tim Fenelon came out, sulky-faced. Hognose Ott was next. Then Frenchy and—Jed Connell! Each man’s hands were lifted high. Fenelon’s right arm was broken. Jed limped.

The young Abe Howard jumped forward with a furious oath:

"Yuh lettin’ him surrender? Like hell yuh will!"

His rifle swung up. There was red murder in the boy’s eyes. Lit sensed some cause for furious hatred between Abe and Frenchy. A girl, perhaps...

But Chihuahua, grinning amusedly, tripped Abe very neatly and possessed himself of the boy’s Colt and Winchester.

"Me, I’m wa’ch you now, sonny," he cautioned Abe. "You’re make no more move like those, or—"

Frenchy had watched without losing his habitual grim. Now he turned to Lit, seemingly friendly enough.

"How d’ you this this way?" he demanded. "Got a warrant?"

"Warrant enough!" Lit assured him grimly. "For that dirty, lowdown murder in Gurney. By God! You’re going to hang for Brownie. That’s the only reason I let you—all surrender."

Frenchy laughed carelessly, but in the amber-flecked black eyes was a sinister threat as he regarded Lit. Ed Howard had been poking around inside the cabin. He came out carrying the prisoner’s weapons and nodded Lit aside.

"That bullion off’n The Points stage is all in there. Now, looky here. We-uns got the name o’ hard cases an’ I ain’t denyin’ that when our stuff is stole we-uns git out an’ rustle somebody else’s. But in business like this-here, yuh can gamble on ary one o’ us.

"Now, yuh got your hands full gittin’ these gummies to Gurney ‘thout havin’ ’em taken from yuh to be lynched or else turned loose. Yuh can’t saddle yo’self with this bullion. Me an’ the boys’ll take it back to The Points. An’ if the’s a reward, we’ll split it with yuh—all any way yuh say."

"Fine?" Lit said without hesitation.

"That’ll settle the puzzle. And—I’m not worried about it getting back all right."

"We’re wish for to see Frenchy hang all ni-ice, no?" Chihuahua purred in Lit’s ear. "Then we’re go east, to them railroad in Ancho. We’re put Frenchy an’ them others, with them horses, on one train. We’re ride for Two Squaws we’re them railroad, she’s stop. We’re git off an’—she’s one ni-ice, safe ride for Gurney. ‘Sta bueno?’"
"'Sta bueno!'" Lit agreed. For he had wondered about taking these famous prisoners south on the hostile western side of the Diablos. "'We'll eat a bite, then rattle our hocks.'"

They herded the rawhide-hobbled prisoners into the 'dobe. The Howards, having brought up the outlaws' horses, now loaded their own with the bullion. They started for The Points, walking, leading the horses. Ed Howard said that they would eat on the road. Chihuahua went to work at the cooking fire, outside the 'dobe, while Lit stood guard over the gang.

CHAPTER XV

KEEPING THE NEWS BEHIND

It was easy to see why Hog Nose Ott had joined Frenchy's gang, Lit thought. Conscious of inferiority to the average man, and yearning above all things to be as good as any man, Hog Nose would try the weak man's trick of covering up his failings by bluster. And, riding with the hard case lot behind Frenchy, Hog Nose would share in the gang's notoriety.

He studied them all as he and Chihuahua jogged along behind the four prisoners. Frenchy was beside Jed Connell. Tim Fenelon rode sullenly, defiantly, beside Hog Nose.

Lit began to pity Ott. He was badly scared and hardly able to conceal it. And that, Lit told himself, was understandable. Frenchy, his idol, had come off second-best in two straight tests: he had surrendered to Lit and he had not caught Lit offguard in the 'dobe.

Lit thought of Sudie-May. She had been so sure that Frenchy would finish him, as soon as they met. What would she say, now, when she got the word of the fight on Hell Creek, of Frenchy's tame surrender?

He looked at Frenchy's swaggering back and his mouth hardened. Evidently, Frenchy was confident that his friends—King Connell, for instance—would never let him hang. But Lit was just as confident that, in one way or another, the little outlaw's day drew near to its close. He rode on, moody of face, until they came to a house some fifteen miles from Ancho.

There was a Mexican crone here, and a slim, bright boy of fourteen or so. Lit and Chihuahua loosed the rawhide whangs that bound their prisoners to their horses, let them get down and eat the meal for which Chihuahua bargained with the old woman. While they loaed outside the 'dobe, smoking and waiting for the fried beef and black beans and tortillas, Chihuahua came up to whisper in Lit's ear that the boy had vanished and the old woman professed ignorance of his going.

"'She's trouble!'" Chihuahua grunted. "'Somethin', she's go pop! Well—we're watch like the hell!"

They remounted the four and themselves swung up, after eating. Now they were at the apex of the equilateral triangle, the corners of the base of which rested in the two plazitas of Ancho and Cherryville. Chihuahua rode with eyes narrowed grimly. Lit watched the prisoners. Chihuahua watched the country around.

"'Ah!'" he said at last, harshly. "'Me, I'm think so!"

From the southeast—Cherryville-way—a dust-cloud rolled. Presently, they could make out the van of a numerous body of riders. They were coming hell-for-leather. Frenchy stared, then twisted to grin at Lit.

"'Well, looks like hell's goin' to pop, right sudden. That bunch of hairpins is from Cherryville. I'm not so popular over there. Not so long ago, I downed their jailor and a Mex' he had helpin' him. Looks to me like that Mex' boy hightailed it into town to tell about us.'"

Lit considered the problem hurriedly. He thought that neither he nor Chihuahua was in any particular danger—nor, perhaps, was Jed Connell. But the other three were evidently regarded as legitimate material for a lynching-bee.

"'Jailer must have been right popular!'" he observed dryly. "'Well, I guaranteed to get you into Gurney, to be hung all legal, so—'

"'Hell! You think them gunies'll listen to you?'" cried Frenchy scornfully. "'Give us back our shootin' irons an' we'll make 'em sick! You goin' to keep us here with our hands tied?"

"'Nope! I'm going to run you for the railroad at Ancho and keep you out of the hands of those hairpins so long as I've got a shell left! Come on! Dig in your persuaders!"

FROM the dust cloud behind them came now faint yells that seemed both vengeful and jubilant. It was a hard country and a hard day, where if a man were downed his killer might be brought to justice or not, dependent upon circumstances and, even more, upon the personal popularity of the victim. But when punishment was decided upon, it came swiftly! The fugitives rode with chins upon shoulders. They were barely holding their own against the foremost riders.

Back to where Lit and Chihuahua rode in the post of danger, the rear, lagged Jed Connell. His rawboned little sorrel was limping slightly. Stark fear was in Jed's brown face now.

"'Hello!' he groaned, by dint of savage roweling keeping abreast of Lit for a moment. "'My dam' horse's goin' back on me. They'll git me!"

Lit and Chihuahua eyed each other questioningly for a moment, then Lit shrugged. Chihuahua's bowie flashed in the sunlight. Jed shrank back in the saddle as it flickered toward him. But it only slashed deftly the rawhide thongs about his wrist.

"Tell 'em you were helping me guard the prisoners!" Lit yelled. "Tell 'em your gun must have dropped out of your holster. Hell! Tell 'em anything to save your worthless hide!"

Then Jed fell behind and the two spurred ahead again. They saw the pursuers mill for an instant about Jed, but when they rode on again Jed was still in the saddle, seemingly unhurt.

"Can we make it?" Lit cried anxiously.

"Quién sabe?" Chihuahua grinned. "But I'm think if we're not, them cottonwood she's sprout rotten apples... ."

Ahead of them now loomed the half-dozen buildings of the station village. Lit whooped triumphantly. A train was there, motionless. A fresh outburst of yelling from the lynching party behind showed that they, too, saw escape threatening. Now came the first shooting of the chase. But the bullets went high and wide as the fugitives covered the hundred yards to the standing train.

"Off you go!" yelled Lit. "Get inside the cars!"

The horses slid to a halt and down tumbled the three prisoners. They sprang for the steps of a rickety car and scrambled up. Lit and Chihuahua brought up the procession's rear, and Lit gasped at the wide-eyed engineer:

"Deputy sheriff! Mob coming! Give her the quirt!"

The engineer nodded and his head disappeared. But Lit, from inside, heard a frantic burst of whooping. He stuck his head through a window in time to see a horsemance slide to a stop beside the engine cab, reach in and jerk the engi-neer out by the collar. The mob was scattering now. Lit shot down the horse of the cowboy who had captured the engineer, and bullets thudded into the car's side about him. But most of the hard-faced, dusty riders only laughed. The train was immovable so long as they held the engineer. They could take their time about overpowering the officers. They made no move yet to assault the car.

"What's the ruckuss?" a voice inquired of Lit. He whirled nervously, to face a squat, efficient-looking individual, with behind him a lean, walrus-mustached, narrow-eyed man, the prospectors he and Chihuahua had helped against Bisbee and Wolf Montagne's gang. Years and years ago, that seemed!

"Mob's trying to take my prisoners! They'll have to down me first!"

"Sho!" grinned the squat man. "Me an' Jake, we'll shore admire to argue a little alongside o' yuh. Take the other side, Jake!"

Chihuahua had vanished mysteriously. Lit crouched behind the sill of a window, with rifle trained upon a loud-voiced man with heavy eight-square Sharps rifle, who was inciting the others to 'down that dam' sheriff an' stretch them murderers!"

AT the far end of the car the squat prospector held another window. Frenchy and Hognose and Fenelon were flat on the floor in the aisle.

"First man that makes a move toward the train gets lead-poisoning!" yelled Lit. "Up you come, gents! There's six of us waiting for you! Step right up!"

Suddenly his chin bumped upon the window-sill. For the train had lurched forward abruptly. It was moving slowly, but steadily gathering speed. The mob roared furiously, a spine-crinking blood-roar like that of a vast beast. Lit wondered at the train's motion, for he could see the engineer, held by two cowboys, gaping amazedly, in the forefront of the men beside the train. Bullets smashed through the windows. Lit and the prospectors returned the fire.

Men leaped for cars behind that holding Lit and the prisoners. But the train was gathering way, and—someone had uncoupled those rear coaches! Bullets continued to crash into the engine and cars, but out into the open country the train shot with a whoop and scream from the crazy whistle. It was not much of an engine, but it easily outdistanced the cow-horses pursuing.

Five or six miles they lurched along, Lit wondering about their driver. Then, slowly and without any squealing of brakes, the train lost motion. It drew slowly to a stop. Lit looked through a window. Chihuahua came trotting back from the engine. He grinned up at Lit, twisting the spike-point of black mustache.

"Hey, Lit! She's me! I'm wa'ch them engineer many time, pull them handle one way, push him back. So, w'en we're lose them engineer, me, I'm unhitch our car from them family an' I'm slip into them engine. Hah! She's nothin' for to be them engineer. I'm pull them handle—she's go! I'm pull him back—she's stop! W'at the hell!"

Lit collapsed upon a lumpy seat and stared.

"Amor de dios!" he cried. "If I'd known it was you in that engine, I'd have hopped out at Ancho and begged 'em to kill me quick so I wouldn't risk my life! Lord! And I didn't even know how close my neck was to the axe."

He shook his head bodingly.

"Well, since you've got us this far and we can't walk, you might as well climb back into the engine and see if you can get us to Two Squaws. Likely, we can get horses there."

"Seguro! We're get them horse, easy. An' our horses—me, I'm know one fella in Ancho. She's see my sorrel an' she's say: Them dam' Chihuahua! An' she's take care of our caballos an' we're send for 'em pronto."

CHAPTER XVI

A Brother-Deputy

THEY had no trouble getting horses at Two Squaws. There was a store-keeper there who was out of the same grim rock as Halliday of Gurney. He furnished horses and saddles and before they left two of his vaqueros were on their way to Ancho to bring in the horses abandoned there.

Privately, he told Lit of his pleasure at seeing Frenchy and the others under arrest.

"News gets around," he said. "So we heard over here when Smoky made you a deputy. An' we kind of wondered how-come. But the boy that can loop that little devil an' drag him to jail, he's the kind of deputy Smoky ought've had a long spell back. Any time I can help you out a bit, let me know. The name's Norris!"

They rode to Gurney without any show of hostility being made. At the houses where they got food, usually the Mexican girls looked at Frenchy and sighed.

"Pobrecito!" they called him—as if he had been a boy of nine or ten. At first Frenchy laughed and told them what would be Lit's fate very soon. But when after a time or two Lit laughed, also, and in fluent Spanish told them how Frenchy had left Art Brand outside a barred door, to die, because he feared to open it, and described vividly the meek surrender of the terrible gang, Frenchy turned sullen. He began to stare at Lit as they rode and he sang no more about Jesse James and Sam Bass and Cole Younger.

"You know," Lit told him cheerfully on the edge of Gurney, "if it wasn't that you're due to hang for the particular kind of hydrophobia eat you are, I'd be worried about you, Frenchy! You keep looking at me all the time in the meanest way!"
“Yeh?” Frenchy snarled. “You think I’ll ever stretch a rope? Wait an’ see! I’ll be ridin’ the high lines when you’re under the grass roots—sonny! Talk big while you can. You ain’t got much longer, hey, Timmy?”

“Don’t drag Tim into it!” Lit grinned. “Tim’s not feeling so spry, these days. He’s beginning to remember what I told him one night in the corral—the night I pinned a star on: You know, Tim, I said we’d have some law west of the Rowdy, yet!”

“To hell wi’ ye!” Tim Fenelon cried—and straightened his great body to stare at the county seat ahead. Sight of the familiar buildings seemed to rid him of the sulkiness that he had owned since Hell Creek. “Sure, ye better be remem—berin’ what I said: Over this bank o’ the Rowdy, there’s but the li’l bit o’ law we’re makin’ to suit ourselves!”

It seemed that word of their coming had reached the county seat ahead of them. The doors of houses and stores and saloons, the awninged sidewalks before them, were crowded. But they rode up the street without meeting anyone who cared to discuss the prisoners. At the court house they swung down and loosed the rawhide whangs, watched the prisoners get stiffly down.

Shorty Wiggins, the deputy sheriff who served as jailor, leaned in the doorway, a sawed-off shotgun over his arm. He grinned at Lit, straightened on his crippled leg.

“Visitors, huh?” he grunted. “Hi—yah, Frenchy! Hi, Tim!”

“Hi, Shorty,” Frenchy grinned. “Take a good look. We won’t be around long.”

They all went inside. The jail was on the second floor. A sort of watch-house commanded the stair. Here a jailor could sit in shelter and make it plain suicide for an unwelcome visitor to try climbing.

In the smaller of the two big rooms that constituted the jail, a thick section of cottonwood log was set in the ‘dobe wall. Great eye-bolts were in this log. Chains and shackle dangled from them. Cots covered with webwork of rawhide thongs were near the log.

“Over you go!” Lit commanded the prisoners cheerfully. “Shorty, have you got plenty of handcuffs? I’d hate for our canaries to take a notion to leave us—and leave us . . .”

“You certainly do crowd your luck,” Frenchy said softly. “Yes, sir! You are certainly crowdin’ it!”

Lit grinned at him. Shorty said nothing, merely busied himself with the shackles linked to the chains. When the trio were all manacled of hands, shackled of ankles, they could stand or sit or lie down on the cots. But none could reach another. Lit and Chihuahua went out, Shorty following and stopping to lock the room’s door.

THEY went down the stairs. Lit and Chihuahua took the bunch of horses around to the corral behind the jail. Lit looked back at the silent ones on the sidewalks, the galleries of the buildings. He shook his head, frowningly.

“He’s certainly got the place buffaled!” he told Chihuahua. “They don’t mean to let out any wolf-hows about the arrest.”

When they had seen the animals, they came back to the street and in an eating house sat down to belated dinner. The other customers watched them furtively, showing neither friendliness nor open hostility. Out on the street, heading for the office of the district attorney, Lit stared frowningly up and down and shook his head.

“My Lord! This bunch beats me! They ought to be hunkered down in the dirt, giving thanks that we’ve put Frenchy behind the bars as first step toward letting his neck find out how heavy his feet are. And—are they? Well, it’s not what you’d call prominent to me!”

“She’s this dam’ Territory,” Chihuahua sighed. “Pues, if Frenchy, she’s hang, then them people w’at will not like him, they’re happy. But they’re think—he’s not hang, yet! An’ if she’s not hang quick, then she’s not so ni-ice, that they’re show them big grin today.”

They came to the district attorney’s house and went in. The furtive-eyed little official looked at the warrants that Lit dropped upon his table-desk, then let his eyes shift up to Lit’s almost absent expression.

“Served ’em, did you? Well, that’s the kind of officer we want. I’ll take care of ’em all right.”

“See that you do,” Lit said grimly.

“Oh! Seems to me that before I pulled out—that night you remember—I heard something about a—a charge of murder, if I’m not mistaken. Against me. You happen to know anything about that?”

“Murder! Charged against you!”

The district attorney’s face was a mask of surprise. Violently, he shook his head.

“Probably just one of those things,” said Lit carelessly. “But I wouldn’t want a warrant made out for me, you know. It’d probably hurt my feelings. Might even make me sick as hell! And when I get sick as hell, I cloud up and—Oh, I remember! I told you about that once. You haven’t forgotten?”

“No,” the district attorney admitted.

“I haven’t forgotten a thing. But there’s no charge against you, that I know about.”

“Fine! Come on, Chihuahua. Let’s get some air.”

They loafed along the street and presently Lit, staring at the front of the Antelope Saloon, shook his head moodily.

“I am beginning to wonder how much of a notion it was, Chihuahua—leaving those warrants with the district attorney. You know, somehow I just don’t altogether trust that gentleman!”

“No?” Chihuahua cried incredulously. “She’s too bad! Me, I’m think you’re so fond with him!”

“I swear! I’m half a mind to go back and get ’em and keep ’em until Smoky comes back. And that reminds me: where is Smoky? I never thought to ask Shorty Wiggins.”

“Quién sabe?” Chihuahua shrugged indifferently. “Smoky, she’s have them twenty-one rings on them horn one dam’ long time. She’s need mighty few nurse. Them warrants we’re git when we’re want ’em, Lit. Same as you’re git ’em first. Now, me, I’m think she’s better if we’re have them drink. W’at the hell?”

They went into the Antelope and at the bar stood enjoying the whiskey in silence. Time wore on drowsily toward supper-time. The sulky tension still seemed to grip Gurney. Lit felt it, but he could not see anyone who looked particularly responsible, found none who incited the county seat to disapproval of Frenchy’s arrest. He watched the men drifting in for a pre-supper drink. The Antelope was doing a rushing business.

Then there was a bustle of movement at the street door. Lit half-turned where he leaned with one elbow on the bar. He faced men who looked vaguely nervous, uneasy, or merely strained. His eyes lifted to the door. A rasping voice came to him, clearly:

“Where’s that dam’ kid-deputy?” a man demanded loudly.

Chihuahua sidled noiselessly away from Lit. He achieved the effect of melting into the men standing behind him.

“Where’s that dam’ kid-deputy?” the voice repeated on a higher note.

Lit waited for a sight of this curious one. He appeared, now, as the loungers in the Antelope gave back and opened up a path. It was a long and lean and rawboned deputy sheriff to whom Lit had never so much as spoken. Bills was his name. He “worked the county” usually, in Smoky Cole’s phrase, keeping out of the county seat most of the time.

He came swinging down the lane opened for him, to stop before Lit with thumbs hooked in crossed shell belts. From each belt sagged a Colt of extraordinarily long barrel. His squinting gray eyes flicked to Lit’s waist where his .45 belt crossed to dangle black-handled Colt low on right thigh.

“Oh! So there you are!” Bills grunted belligerently, glaring at Lit. “I heard you threwed Frenchy Leonard an’ Tim Fenelon an’ Hognose Ott into jail.”

“You—heard that?”

Lit’s tone, his narrowing dark eyes, held puzzlement.

“That’s what I said. I heard you—”

“Pretty!” Lit said frowningly. “Funny that you heard about it. That you had to hear about it. For I saw you standing right here in the door, looking at us when we rode up the street. And if you couldn’t tell by the looks of Frenchy and the others that we’d arrested ’em and were headed for the jail right then—Say! I’ll bet they have to write you a letter at meal time!”

“Listen, you!” Bills said savagely. “Don’t you start any o’ your would-be funny remarks with me! I want to know who give you any authority to arrest them men. Where's the warrants? Even if you had been handed warrants to serve, you have got to hand 'em back to the sheriff or the chief deputy when you come back with prisoners. Smoky's gone somewheres. I'm chief deputy—an' I'm certainly goin' to know what's goin' on!"

"I don't mind your knowing!" Lit grinned. "And you do know. You said you did, when you came swelliing in here. You know that I arrested the bunch and slammed 'em into the calabaza. But one thing you certainly have got wrong: about being chief deputy! You dreamed that one. You're no—such—animal! If this county feels a big emptiness where a chief deputy ought to be, and has to have a chief deputy to give her the fancy touches—Look upon him and get dazzled, Bills! Look upon him! I'm it!"

"Like hell you are! I'm tellin' you—right here, right now—that I'm chief deputy and I'm sayin' what'll be done! Then, I'm doin' it! I'm goin' to turn Frenchy an' the others out an' hand 'em back their hardware an'—Lord have mercy on you when I do! You'll have to kill your own snakes or git bit! There's no warrants for them boys—I ask the district attorney. So I ain't holdin' 'em!"

"That's right," Lit said very softly. "You're not holding 'em. I'm the little stake-ropin' that's holding 'em. The district attorney is lying thirteen to the dozen—as usual. He got the warrants, properly returned. And he wouldn't have the guts to look me in the eye and deny it! I don't think he'd have the nerve to tear 'em up. I'll get 'em from him when I want 'em. Meanwhile—your little friends stay right where they are. Know why? Por Dios! Because I say they do!"

He knew that his hand had been forced. It was beyond his power, now, to go softly in this business until Smoky got back. He was being pushed by that one who was moving this obviously-handmade, not-too-intelligent, deputy.

He knew the danger of the situation he faced. Given the slightest shadow of justification, the adherents of Frenchy—and of King Connell!—might decide to free the prisoners. They could always claim that Bills' denial of warrants showed that Frenchy and Fenelon and Ott were being held illegally by a "dam' kid-deputy" as Bills had twice called him. And they would be sure that, in the present condition of the county, the Territory, very little investigation would follow.

But all that was merely what he faced, in no sense an argument for changing course. He knew without thinking that he had no alternative whatever, to standing behind his guns, his smoking guns, if it came to that! He would stand between Frenchy's handcuffs and the key to those handcuffs and tell all Gurney to try putting him out of the way. And now that he had been forced to assert himself, he would play the hand out. So he watched the lank deputy grimly, one corner of hard young mouth lifted mockingly.

His elbow was still hooked over the bar's top as he leaned with every appearance of carelessness upon it. So Bills' eyes, flickering up and down Lit, could note the wide separation of gun-hand and gun-butt. Seemingly, he was emboldened by what he saw. For his stiff-held palms twisted, closed upon the walnut butts of his own guns.

But some such move had been fairly certain, from the very beginning. Bills had not come into the Antelope just to say that Frenchy would be released. So Lit had planned his counter-move, weighed the danger against the desirability of killing this fellow outright. And it came to him that he was oddly cool about the business. He could look at a man who intended to kill him without much emotion. That coolness gave him more!

With the first twitch of Bills' hands, Lit twisted at the bar. Long body straightened. Left fist, sagging at hip-level, snaped up to jab at Bills' face. Knotted right hand hooked across from bar's top to Bills' chin.

All the force of Lit's stiffened muscles was in that blow. The sound of it was like the smack of an open hand in the quiet bar-room. Bills' head snapped back. He did not stagger. He merely dropped like a sack to his knees, sagged farther, fell sideways and lay with white glint of eyeballs showing between his lids, and thick lips parted.

The men near enough to see the knock-out drew a long breath in audible gasp. Lit chose to regard this as a show of concern for the sprawling deputy. He lifted a shoulder, looked around with small, one-sided grin:

"Hell! He's not dead. I didn't hit him full force!" he said mendaciously.

But he was watching that crowd closely. More than half of these men, he thought, would gladly join a move to free Frenchy—and that would mean a bloody, smoky night in Gurney. He looked for Chihuahua and found him lounging with back to the rear wall of the Antelope, a grinning Bearer of the Winchester. Reassured, Lit looked down at Bills, whistled softly to himself, shook his head.

"Maybe I hit him too hard, at that—harder than he could stand," he said, as if meditating aloud. "I don't reckon he meant all he was blowing about. Probably, he was just liquored up and, being a windbag, he had to blow. Will a couple of you help me pack him over to the courthouse? We can take care of him, over there. Then I'll have a talk with him when he's feeling better."

Two men picked up the long, limp body. Lit, wondering how many steps toward the front door he could take, before the stillness of the bar-room was exploded, trailed them. His spine crawled as he saw the steady stares he got from under frowning down-drawn brows. But, there was Chihuahua at his back...

The men carried Bills outside and Lit stepped through the door after them. There was no more than the beginning of a rumble of talk, behind him. He thought that those pro-Frenchy men in the Antelope were waiting for a leader. And there had been nobody in the saloon who seemed to measure up to leadership.

MEN on the street stared at the queer little procession. Only a couple inquired of Lit the meaning of it. He grinned at these curious ones:

"Bills is sick. We're taking him over to put him to bed."

The deputy was carried over to the courthouse. The carriers went inside, stopped and looked inquiringly at Lit. He motioned toward the stairs. They stared suspiciously.

"What's the idea o' takin' him up to the jail?" one demanded. "Say! There's somethin' funny about this—dam' funny!"

"Pues, she's not so dam' funny," Chihuahua suggested from the doorway behind them. "If you're not carry them Bills up, like—like them chief deputy she's tell you, she's not funny one bit!"

They whirled, to face the suggestive Winchester across his arm. Sullenly, they crossed to the stairs and began to climb. Shorty Wiggin came out of the little watch house at the stair head. He looked without expression at them. Lit thought that, to see Shorty eye Bills, one might think that this was the full dozen of unconscious deputies to be delivered that day.

"Going to put Bills where the little dogs can't bite him," Lit grinned. "I suppose in his way, he's all right. But in my way—where he seems to be getting—he's a dam' nuisance. He gets me all tangled up, Shorty."

"Such as?" Shorty inquired, but without much interest.

"He's having dreams and things. He dreamt that he's chief deputy. Of course, I know I'm chief deputy, but he might fool a pilgrim. So I'll keep him locked up until he bucks off these quaint notions of his."

"Best way," Shorty nodded gravely. "Might git some o' the weak-minded boys tangled up if he thinks he's chief dep'ty. I better take them cannon off him. One might fall out o' the holster an' mash his toe—or somethin'. Mustn't have that."

He went ahead to unlock the door of the room in which Frenchy, Fenelon and Ott were held. When Bills was carried in, the three prisoners stared frowningly at him, then looked at Lit. He grinned at Frenchy's bewildered expression. Then Shorty Wiggin took the Colts from Bills' holsters, searched him deftly for hide-outs and straightened.

"Poor fellow!" Lit drawled with mock-commiseration. "Still out! I have got to remember not to hit 'em so hard, next time."

He squatted beside Bills and took a firm grip of long hair. He lifted the deputy’s head by this handle and began methodically to slap his face, right cheek, left cheek, right cheek... He varied the maneuver by occasionally bumping Bills’ head against the floor. The method was effective—Bills regained consciousness with a hollow groan. Then, seeing Lit’s sad face above him, he roared furiously and rolled over. He came scrambling to his feet.

“Better cuff his hands, first,” Lit decided, standing also.

Shorty held out the manacles and Lit took them. When he stepped in closer to Bills, the deputy’s hands flashed to his waist. He gaped ludicrously from one to the other of his empty holsters. Lit flicked a cuff over his right wrist while he paused, went with Bills when the deputy twisted violently, jerked him off-balance and clicked the second cuff.

“Now, now!” he said soothingly—pleasantly conscious of Frenchy’s stare. “Mustn’t act that way! This is really for your own good, you know. The reckless way you go helling around, you might get hurt. We’re going to protect you!”

With which, he pulled viciously on the cuffs and, when the furious deputy stiffened, Lit pushed in the opposite direction and inserted a foot neatly behind Bills’ ankle. Bills sat down on the floor near the wall and Lit bent to scoop up a shackle. He straightened, then, grinning down at the hooded one.

“Now, I won’t have to kill you,” he told Bills pleasantly.

CHIHUAHUA was waiting at the door. He had been looking from a front window, he said. The men were out of the Antelope, now, milling on the sidewalk under the wooden awning.

“They’re not start, yet. But me, I’m think pretty soon mabbe we’re have them company...”

Lit went to the window and looked down upon the ugly gathering at the Antelope. He whistled tunelessly underneath. He was acting sheriff. There was no dodging the responsibility even if he had wanted to—and he knew of nothing that he wanted less! Acting sheriff...Acting sheriff... The words had a pleasant sound as he whispered them. No longer was he the “Bar-B Baby,” the kid-hand from the Diamond. Over here in the saltiest neighborhood between just any two points in the West, he was privileged to stand and look any man levelly in the eyes. Behind him, in the cell, were the two outstanding gunmen of time and place.

“And I put ’em in there!” Lit thought proudly. “Chihuahua and I did what nobody else wanted to do—or has wanted to try, the last couple of years.”

He turned slowly at the window and looked at the two men who waited for what he would say. Lit grinned. Chihuahua was the ideal partner. As for Shorty Wiggan, a presidential order would never get as much action out of the jailor as thought of what Smoky Cole would want. For Shorty had never seen a president and he knew Smoky and worshipped him. No give-up, in those two!

“Shorty,” Lit said drawlingly, “it does look something like smoke... You smell it? There’s three of us—without dragging in any of the town people. How many Wagon Wheel boys are in the big cell?”

“Eight,” said Shorty. “An’ that’s a notion, boy! Bein’ Wagon Wheel, they naturally ain’t got no love for Connell—or yet for Frenchy. Let’s talk to ’em!”

He hobbled back down to the big door and unlocked it. Lit stood in the opening and grinned at the cowboys who hunkered or sprawled upon the floor, smoking, playing cards, sleeping.

“Hi!” said Lit. “Looks like they kind of metagrobolized you fellows. How’re you-all fixed for guts and trouble?”

“Plenty guts!” a stocky, one-eyed man shrugged. “No trabajo!”

“I can fix you up with plenty! I slammed Frenchy Leonard and Tim Fenelon and Hognose Ott in, next-door. And some of the people in town don’t like it—including Bills, the deputy. So I slamed Bills in with the others. Now, if you-all’d like to burn some powder in town, without getting hauled in, I’ll let you-all help us hold the fort against the mob. What do you say?”

“Lead us to it, cowboy!” the one-eyed man yelled. And the rest of the Wagon Wheel men swarmed up grinning. "Give us back our guns, Shorty! We'll send Los Alames a-howlin' home."

Shorty grinned and hobbled off to the closet in which the confiscated weapons were stacked. Lit posted the recruits on the balconies that commanded the three vulnerable walls of the courthouse. They settled down, waiting anxiously.

Coming back, he had another look at the crowd before the Antelope. It was noisier, now. Men moved on its fringes, as if trying to work into the center under the awning. Then, sudden movement made it look much like a swirling bee-swarm. Down into the street the crowd surged. Four or five men walked grimly, steadily, in the van. Someone in the mob yelled shrilly. That yell was instantly taken up by others, by all. It changed tone, became a harsh, savage, wordless roar that Lit had heard once before: in Ancho at the train. It was the blood-roar of the Mob. He did not hesitate. The sawed-off shotgun came up in his hands. He fired a barrel in air. The mob stopped, to look up at him as if his appearance were entirely unexpected.

"By God! You're certainly hungry for hell!" Lit told them almost conversationally. "Here's a dozen of us. We're going to argue with you as long as there's a shell left—and we have got plenty shells! Better buck off the notion that you're coming in. You'll be whittled down, before you ever turn Frenchy loose!"

"Hell with him!" some bold spirit yelled—from the rear.

A bullet came smacking into the 'dobe wall near Lit's head. Others followed rapidly from the men below. Lit squatted on the balcony's floor and the Wagon Wheel men, waiting for no orders, shoved their Colts forward and very blithely opened up on the mob. Men began to fall under that savage hail of lead. Others, finding the job warmer than they had expected, ran for cover.

No attempt was made to rush the wide front door of the courthouse, Lit noticed. He thought that Gurney was all too familiar with that narrow stairway and the little watch-tower at its head, which one man could hold against an army. Instead, the mob split and tried the clear side wall and the back.

Dusk was coming. The garrison answered shots from below with very accurate fire from windows and balconies. An hour passed in this long range warfare and Lit began to frown. When good dark came, it was not going to be easy to keep those determined men down there from working up close. Worst of all, the attackers had posted themselves in the second story of a building across the street from which they could hammer the Wagon Wheel men. And ammunition in the jail was melting away.

Chihuahua came leaping to find Lit. He grinned cheerfully, but lifted a shoulder in doubtful shrug.

"W'en she's dark, they're rush them front door," he said thoughtfully. "'Em fella wat's in Doolan's store, they're keep us back. They're come inside an' we're fight by them stairs. My frien', we're kill plenty. But if they're keep coming—"

"We'll kill plenty," Lit nodded grimly. "They'll never let Frenchy out as long as I'm around to know about it! They—"

He stiffened, staring toward the front. Outside, clear, sharp, there sounded the blast of a cavalry bungie. He and Chihuahua ran to a window. A Wagon Wheel puncher spoke over his shoulder, where he leaned to look down.

"It's Smoky Cole! An' dam' if he ain't got a slew o' soldiers with him! Now, if that ain't showin' up in style—"

Lit stared past him. In the gray light he made out Smoky beside a rider whose bearing fairly screamed "soldier." And now a line of other soldiers were between the jail and the opposite side of the street, facing Doolan's store and the Antelope Saloon. And Smoky Cole's voice was lifting:

"Whut the hell's goin' on here? Who give yuh barroom scum a license to shoot at my jail? By God! Yuh-all better grab yo' foot in yo' hand an' scatter out o' this! Before I make out exactly who yuh are!"

Men gave back into the shadows of the buildings over there, before that grim, solid line of troopers. Lit ran down the stairs and outside. Smoky looked down at him.
"We've got Frenchy and Fenelon and Ott in the jail," Lit told him. "And some of their friends didn't like the notion—including Bills. They decided that my warrants had disappeared after I left 'em with the district attorney. So they had an excuse for trying to open up the jail and let Frenchy out. Shorty and Chihuahua and a bunch of Wagon Wheel hands helped me change their mind for 'em. But it was a good thing you drove up."

"Yuh done ex-act-ly right, son! I couldn't have done no more, myself, or done it different. Yuh say Bills was with the mob! I knowed he was a Connell-pup, but I never believed he'd have nerve enough to come out in the open like this! Where's he?"

"I put him in with Frenchy," Lit grinned.

"Fine! I'll want to talk to him—before I kick his rump into the street!
Yuh ought've killed him, though—saved doin' it later on. Oh! This—here's Lieutenant Aire from the Governor's staff up at Faith. That's where I been. Me an' the Lieutenant, we have got some work to do here. Tell yuh about it, later on."

Lit and Lieutenant Aire shook hands.
Smoky swung stiffly out of the saddle and stretched himself with a groaning yawn. But when he spoke his voice reflected very genuine pleasure.

"Put Pie into the c'ral for me, Lit, that's a good boy. I'm in a hurry. I'm daftul anxious to go right up an' talk to Bills... ."

CHAPTER XVII

"COME TO THE POTAL GROVE!"

HAVE another," Lit grunted to Chihuahua. "Then we'll slide down to that pet dance-hall of yours and hand-pick the battleaxes. You'd better take one more, though, so the picking won't be such a job. Now, over at Tom's Bluff, there were some pretty girls to dance with—"

"I'm have one more with you," Chiuahua nodded, grinning. "Then you're have one more with me an' we're think all them dance-ladies they're lovely."

The bar-tender shot the bottle down the length of the Antelope's bar to them.
He was a red-faced and stolid soul, the bar-tender. A few hours before he had served the men who proclaimed that they would kill these two. Now, he served the intended victims. By his face, one gathered that it was all a matter of perfect indifference to him.

They finished Lit's drink. They were pouring Chihuahua's, when a stocky vaquero slid into the bar at Lit's elbow.
He had an intelligent face, this Mexican.
He looked flashingly sidelong at Lit, then stared into the bar-mirror.

"Señor," he muttered, "I bring a word for you. I cannot give it, here.
Will you come—after a moment—through the back door and to the corral behind this place?"

"A word?" Lit said slowly, frowning at the man's reflected face in the glass.
"And who sends this word?"

"One who has never sent you a word before—and who says that she never thought to send such a word as this."

"She?" Lit breathed incredulously.

"Shel!"

"I go, now—to the corral. I will wait there for a time."

He swaggered toward the front door.
Lit stared after him. "She" could mean to him only one person. And it had not been within his wildest hopes that Sudie-May would ever send him a message. He watched the vaquero disappear into the night. Then he straightened, looked at Chihuahua.

"I'm going out to the corral," he told him in a low voice.

He did not wait for the breed. He loaed toward the back door, mechanically slid hand to Colt-butt, then crossed to the corral. It was moonlight and he saw the stocky figure rounding the saloon, heading in the same direction.
They stopped together beside the log walls. The vaquero looked stolidly up into Lit's face.

"It is well-known, everywhere, what you do in the Territory," he said evenly.
"We knew upon Los Alamos. You wish to prove that the patron bought from Frenchy cattle belonging to your patron, Bar-B cattle from the Diamond. La señorita did not believe that her father had bought cattle with burned brands.
She did not believe this—at first. Now, she says that if you will come with all the speed that your black horse can make, she will tell you of things that she has learned, concerning the cattle of the Bar-B. She will tell you what to do. She says: “Come to the poplar grove, south of Los Alamos.” She will wait for you, there.”

“She’s them dam’ trap!” Chihuahua grunted contemptuously.

He came around the corner of the corral, to stop and stare at the man from Los Alamos.

“Hombre,” he said softly, “you have come, not from la señorita, but from Jed Connell. It is of no use to try lying! That word came from Jed Connell. It is to take this man into a trap that waits for him in the poplars.”

“That is not so,” the vaquero grunted. “I bring this word from la señorita. It is nothing to me, if he will not come. I ride as she commands. I have ridden here. I have given him the word. What he does, now, is nothing to me.”

“Wait a minute,” Lit interrupted them. “I thought of that, Chihuahua. But, you know the change of heart of one other on Los Alamos. Maybe this is another, of the same kind. Maybe the two of ’em have talked things over. I— I have got to know!”

“You’re know!” Chihuahua said grimly. “You’re know—w’en Jed, she’s slam one fi-ne slug through you! She’s them dam’ trap, Lit! Me, I’m smell him! You’re not go?”

Lit shrugged doubtfully. But all the time he knew that he would go. If there were no more than one chance in a hundred that Sudie-May had talked with old McGregor and decided, like the grim old Scot, to side against her father for once, he would go. If Jed Connell had sent this message in her name, and if he were all but certain that Jed had sent it—still, he would go, taking any chance rather than the chance of disappointing her. But that did not mean that he could not cross-examine the man!

“Let’s have the story again!” he grunted, to the messenger. “Tell once more what la señorita told you to do. Where was she, when she gave you this word for me?”

But the vaquero was not to be disturbed by questions, by the cross-examination in which Chihuahua joined. In the white incandescence of the moonlight, his broad face was a mask of undisturbed bronze. He would not be hurried.

Sudie-May had come from the casa principal calling for her buckskin horse and he had brought it to her, saddled. She had ordered him to get his own horse. They had ridden out for a mile or two. She had seemed muy triste—very sad. She had sat the buckskin and stared out straight ahead. He, the speaker, had trailed her respectfully, keeping silent.

Suddenly, said the vaquero, she had slapped gauntleted palm on saddle horn. She had turned, beckoned him up to her side. She had asked him if he knew the deputy sheriff, Taylor, at Gurney. When he had nodded, she had told him what he was to say to that deputy sheriff. She had made him repeat it until he was letter-perfect. That was all he knew.

“And where is Jed Connell?” Chihuahua asked sardonically.

“Quién sabe?” the vaquero shrugged. “The fly upon the buffalo doesn’t tell him where to go. I am but a rider of Los Alamos. He is the right hand of our patron.”

“She’s them dam’ trap!” Chihuahua said for the dozenth time to Lit. “You’re not go!”

“Probably,” Lit admitted. “But—Hombre! I think this thing out. I will tell you, after a while, what I will do. You will stay here until I come to find you, to ride out with you, or to send a word to la señorita. Come on, Chihuahua.”

They went toward the Antelope’s back door. Chihuahua made a snorting sound of disgust. Lit laughed harshly.

“Of course! But—Im going, Chihuahua. Probably, it’s the way you think it is. But—” he fingered the locket in his pocket and grinned suddenly “—I’m going. Will you—side me?”

“Me?” cried Chihuahua. “I’m not them dam’ fool w’at’s ride into one trap I can see.”

“Well! She’s certainly a free country, this dam’ Territory! I wouldn’t ask a friend of mine to do a thing he didn’t want to do, for me. See you some more. I’ve got to find Smoky.”
He left Chihuahua very abruptly. He told himself that he had no right to be surprised, or hurt, because Chihuahua refused to act the idiot as he was going to do. After all, Chihuahua had no such reason as was his.

He found Smoky sitting with Lieutenant Aire in the sheriff’s office on the ground floor of the courthouse. The floor was littered with Smoky’s corn husk cigarette stubs. There was a quart bottle, and two tin cups flanking it, on the table. Lieutenant Aire was making notes on a sheaf of paper. Smoky looked up at Lit and into his grim eyes came something like affection.

"Hello, son," he said in his almost toneless drawl. "The Army an’ me, we’re makin’ medicine. Yuh’re due to hear about it when it’s ready. What’s on the mind?"

"I’m sliding out of town to snoop a while," Lit shrugged.

"Don’t stay out too long. There’ll be plenty poppin’ in Gurney, right soon. Hope yuh stumble onto somethin’.

Lit nodded to them and went out. In the corral, he got the good bay borrowed from the store-keeper Norris and put upon the tall gelding the borrowed saddle.

He left the county seat very quietly, keeping away from the street, ducking into a cañon of the barren mountains.

He rode on through the moonlit night and as the bay loped or trotted toward Los Alamos, Lit thought about the place set for his meeting. He remembered the poplar trees—slim, tall Lombardies that someone said had been planted by Sudie-May’s mother. Mrs. Connell, like her husband, had been Old Country. She had wanted the poplars.

Lit recalled a motte of cottonwoods—which in the Spanish are also ‘alamos’—south of the Lombardies’ line. He decided that the cottonwoods offered a sensible man cover, for inspection of the poplars. And he would be in the motte before dawn. And he would reach the cottonwoods through arroyos and all other shelter he could find.

"I’d feel ashamed for the rest of my life—ashamed to look her in the face," he told the bay, "if I didn’t come when she asked me to. But even if she sent me that word, there’s the chance that vaquero slipped the news to Cousin Jed Connell before he pulled out to find me..."

Coming by dry arroyos, bending low and quivering over hogbacks, riding watchfully through greasewood and mesquite and cactus on the flats, he was in the cottonwood motte in the dark hour before day. He swung out of the saddle and loosed the cinchas. He made a cigarette and scratched a match in shelter of his hat. When the first gray light showed in the eastern sky, he trained the glasses that Chihuahua had taught him to carry upon the Lombardies. There was no movement there. He expected none, yet. But when the cottonwoods above him began to rustle in the little dawn breeze and birds woke, he watched closely with lenses trained upon the far end of the poplars.

He saw a rider coming, a twinkle of movement through the slender trunks. A slim rider, not very tall... He straightened, then turned to the bay. He pulled tight the cinchas and swung up. Boldly, he went trotting out of the cottonwoods.

The rider was coming on, head sagging, shoulders drooping, as well as Lit could see through the trees. He remembered what the vaquero had said of Sudie-May—that she seemed muy triste, until she had made up her mind to send word to him in Gurney. He thought of Chihuahua’s forebodings, too. If he had listened to the cold voice of common-sense—

The bay slid down an arroyo’s bank and men were all about Lit before his hand could move. A loop came flipping up, and another and another. His arms were jerked down to his side. He came sprawling from the saddle. A man fell across him and pinned his gun hand. The man grunted savagely:

"Git his hogleg! Then hogtie him."

Lit made no resistance. There was no use. A half-dozen of Mex’ vaqueros swarmed about him and Jed Connell. He was tied deftly. Jed stood up and regarded Lit with yellow head on one side. He grinned at Lit, a slow, utterly triumphant lip-curling.

"Well, we got you!" he said, then crossed the arroyo and scrambled up its side until his head was above the rim.

"You can go on back to the house now, Sudie-May!" he called. "He rode right into it."

He slid down to the arroyo’s floor and came back to Lit, who lay staring at him with something like nausea at his stomach’s pit. There was no sign in Jed’s pleased expression of any memory of the ride to Ancho. He was in no degree grateful for the saving of his life from the Cherryville mob, that day. Lit knew that, very well.

"Sudie-May said she could tell you here," Jed grunted. "I wasn’t so stuck on the notion. Turned out, though, she was right."

"You’re a dam’ liar!" Lit said thickly. "This was your notion! your doing! Sudie-May wouldn’t touch a scheme like this with a pole!"

Jed’s face twisted savagely. His hand jerked and the heavy lash of his quirt cut down across Lit’s face.

"Goddam your soul! Don’t you call me a liar! I’ll beat you to death, you dam’ spy!"

Lit stared at him, while the vaqueros watched silently, stolidly. Jed whirled upon them.

"Take him out of here! Put him back on his horse and tie his ankles under the belly. We have miles to make."

The men picked Lit up and set him in the saddle. His hands were lashed to the horn, his ankles coupled under the bay’s belly by another whang. Jed Connell and the vaqueros mounted. They pushed in beside Lit and a man took the gelding’s reins. They moved off down the arroyo, heading toward the Diablo foothills.

---

CHAPTER XVIII

"Lit—if you—like me—"

A
day, as they rode, the land seemed empty about them. They made a long nooning, rode on again. When dusk came, the horses were plodding up the slant of the foothills.

Lit slouched sullenly in the saddle. He would still have called Jed a liar, still have said that Sudie-May would not trick him into such a place as this. But he could not forget the slim, despondent figure he had glimpsed through the poplars’ trunks. It was possible, of course, that her message had been sent in good faith. Jed could have learned of it and laid the trap. But how could Jed and the vaqueros have hidden in that arroyo, so near the place she had set, without her knowing something about it? It seemed nearly impossible....

There came the sound of running water. The horses slid down into a creek, crossed it and topped out. Dark had come. A stone house loomed ghostly gray ahead. When Jed swung down before it, the vaqueros pulled in and grunted in satisfied tone. They got off, uncoupled Lit’s ankles, took him down as if he were a bag of meal. They carried him inside and dropped him on a dirt floor. After a while he heard a fire crackling outside. There was the odor of bacon frying, coffee boiling. Time passed draggingly. Then Jed Connell came in.

"Supper time for us, bed time for you," he grunted. "No use feedin’ you. Frenchy’ll be along tomorrow an’ then—"

"Like hell he will! With Smoky Cole in town?"

"Whole gang’ll be along tomorrow. An’ Frenchy’ll spend his time comin’ thinkin’ about you. ...." Jed ignored Smoky in a way to worry Lit. Still chuckling, he kicked Lit and went outside again, to where the Mex’ were rolling up in blankets about the fire.

Hours passed. The fire burned down and there was no moon to give light. Painfully, for his whole body seemed one great bruise and he had badly wrenched an ankle in his fall, Lit inched around the walls. He found but the one door, that before which the vaqueros now sprawled. There was a window in each side wall, but these were mere loopholes and set high up.

The lariat that bound Lit was of tough and pliant rawhide. With the seeming mockery of a sentient thing, it yielded to his straining only to tighten at another place. Thought of the jail break worried Lit more than consideration of his own plight. Jed’s words had seemed to hint at some plan which would remove Smoky Cole, as preface to the escape. And Lit had come to heartily like the grim, honest old man.

He was still struggling against the circling lariat when he judged midnight must have passed. The door, before which he lay, now was only a lighter square of gloom. There was no sound save the snoring of Jed Connell and the vaqueros when a huge, shadowy figure materialized in the doorway, and, while Lit gaped, crouched and slipped inside.

"Lit!" came an almost voiceless whisper. "She's me!"

Lit answered in kind. A knife-blade slipped beneath the turns of the lariat, severing them. Then, as methodically as if outside were no light-sleeping guards, and all time waited for him, Chihuahua fell to chafing Lit's ankles and wrists. At last Lit struggled to his feet, nervous, impatient to be gone. A Colt was slipped into his hand and he limped cautiously after Chihuahua. They edged along the wall until past the blanket-swathed Mex' and Jed Connell's burler form. Chihuahua's hand shot out to catch Lit's wrist. He led him down to a rocky slope.

"Them horse for us, she's here!" breathed Chihuahua in Lit's ear. "Sudie-May, she's hold 'em. Shh! Pues, you're make those grunt one time more an' them fella, she's wake four-five-six!"

They went on without further words and presently saw before them, dim in the darkness, the clump-like outline of the horses.

"Who is it?" demanded a low, unsteady voice, that had, for all its timiness in this black immensity, power to thrill Lit as no other sound could have done.

"Pues, she's me an' Lit!" chuckled Chihuahua. "Me, I have let these young dam' fool loose. Then w'ile I'm up there, I'm let loose them horse of Jed an' those Mex', too. She will not follow soon, them fella!"

They mounted. Chihuahua, sensing Lit's stiffness, boosted him into the saddle. At Lit's involuntary groan, there came a quick gasp from the girl.

"You— Are you hurt?"

Lit ignored the question. He was staring her way. How had she come to be with Chihuahua, tonight? He was asking himself.

"What are you doing here?" he said slowly.

"Holding horses!" she said—and laughed.

"Amor de dios!" Chihuahua cried exasperatedly. "She's no time for them talk! She's time for them ride! She's not hurt, Lit. You're hear of them special angel w'at el buen dios give them job for to look after them fella w'at's drunk or dam' fool? She's take fi-ine care for Lit—drunk or sober!"

Lit spurred the bay after them when they pushed into a trot. They rode with no more talk than occasional directions from Chihuahua, until dawn grayed the sky in the east. Lit stared at the girl through the first light. She did not look as if she had passed a sleepless night, he thought. In fact—

"She looks like about everything you could sum up, spelling every letter in 'girl,' " he told himself.

"Well?" he addressed Chihuahua, who had turned in the saddle to grin back cheerfully. "What was it all about?"

"Me, I'm tell you she's them dam' trap! W'at's this dam' Territory—an' Jed Connell!—I'm know! So, I'm wait an' I'm ride out behind you. She's better, if them trap, she's not say 'crack!' on my leg, too! I'm do more. So—"

"I knew it was like that," Lit told Sudie-May. The girl turned a little, to look at him. "I knew that either you hadn't sent the word, or that Jed had stumbled onto your sending. I— Well, I just knew it!" he finished slowly, embarrassed by the grin that twisted Chihuahua's thin mouth.

"Thank you, Mr. Taylor!" Sudie-May said lightly. But she watched him with something unreadable in face and wide, blue eyes, something like a smile hovering at red mouth corners. "I am glad that Los Alamos can produce one deed that you approve. I had almost begun to lose hope—"

"Jed said that Frenchy was breaking jail!" Lit grunted suddenly. "I reckon our job's in Gurney."

"Do not scare!" Chihuahua grinned placidly. "Smoky, she's not born them day-before-yesterday. An' she's have them soldier with Lieutenant Aire. Frenchy's not break jail. Me, I'm sure them gang's live in them jail today.
About them trap . . .

"'When Jed, she's rope you in them arroyo, one Mex' boy w'at's look like them girl, she's ride along, hah! She's fool you plenty, w'at?"

"Plenty!" Lit nodded, watching the girl. "I—was hoping to see a girl ride along the poplars, you see. And when I saw her—thought I saw her—looking worried—"

She stared at him curiously. He lifted a shoulder and grinned twistedly.

"When I thought I saw her, I would have charged hell with or without a bucket of water, to get to her and ask her what bothered her so!"

He pushed the bay forward, until he was knee-to-knee with her. Chihuahua stared, shook his head, whistled to himself and rode on. Sudie-May gathered up the buckskin's reins. But Lit put out his hand and caught her wrist.

"Wait a minute! I've had little enough time to talk to you! It's been years since I've seen you! I want to ask you some things. I want to tell you some, too!"

"I have to go!" she said in a shaky voice. "I— Some other time, you can talk—"

"No! This is the time and the place and—so far as I'm concerned—the girl! Listen to me! Why did you come to the cabin with Chihuahua? Did you go for him?

SHE shook her head, shook it violently, looking down. Lit frowned. Then he stared at her and suddenly he leaned, so that the bay moved a step closer. Lit's arm went almost roughly around her, pulling her toward him. He caught her far shoulder with left hand, twisting her to face him.

"You mean that the two of you were out prowling, last night! And you bumped into each other! Both of you on the same trail—both coming to let me loose—Lord! What did I ever do, to make Chihuahua and you both risk your necks—"

"It wasn't any risk!" She would not lift her eyes. "Jed wouldn't dare cross me. I would simply have told him to let you go. He would have done it—or the men would have! What I say on Los Alamos is listened to! Now—let me go!"

"Not yet! I'd like to make that permanent, honey. Like to keep on holding you, time without end. . . . Why did you do this? Just because you knew that Jed had used your name?"

"What other reason could there be?" she cried.

"Oh—" Lit shrugged, staring at his sleeve "—probably none at all. But the one I'd pick out of all the others you could think of would be—because you cared a little bit about what might happen to me. But that's a lot to ask. Tell me! Suppose I'd just blundered into Jed's claws, without your name being used—would you have bothered to come, then?"

"I— Why, how can I tell you what I might do? That wasn't the case! My name was used—"

She kept blonde head down. She refused to meet his eyes. But suddenly Lit, seeing the rush of color in neck and cheek, grinned idiotically. He looked up, to where Chihuahua showed far ahead of them, foxtrotting steadily forward.

"You can tell me!" Lit said triumphantly. "You can tell me—yes! And it'll be the truth! You do care a little about my neck! Not so much as I want you to care, but you're beginning and you'll go on until—just maybe-so!—you'll care as much as I do about you!"

"I do not!" she flared. "I—I still think that you're the most maddening person I ever met! All you have to do is crook your finger at a girl—"

"Shoo! I never crooked any finger at you! I just saw your picture and fell in love with it. Then I came hunting you and when I found you it was ten times, a hundred times, worse with me! I told you about it—naturally! I couldn't help it. I'd have popped like a balloon if I hadn't! Why do you think I asked 'em to let me come over into the Territory? Into this bunch of killers and rustlers over here? A big coward, like me! It was because I knew I'd find you over here! That's why!"

"Coward! Chihuahua says you haven't got sense enough to be afraid! But that has nothing to do with—with the subject! You take everything for granted—"

"Some things! Because they have to be! It wouldn't be right if they didn't come about! Like—that trade I told you I'm going to make—for your locket! Look here!"

He fished inside his shirt, got out a tiny buckskin bag that hung about his neck nowadays. He opened it and probed with two fingers. A little plush-covered box came out. He opened it and showed the half of a yellow gold circlet.

She stared as if she had never in her life seen a wedding ring. Automatically, it seemed, she looked up at him. And Lit leaned, arm going tighter about her. He put his mouth hard on hers and held her moveless—and if Jed and the vaqueros had spurred over the hogback at the bay's very hocks, he would hardly have noticed them.

"Let me go! You can't do that! I can't. You—I can't have anything to do with you. You're on the other side. You're against King. I'll not be friendly with King's enemies. I—"

Lit laughed.

"Shoo! I'm really doing him a big favor. I'm going to show him that he can't back up the cowthieves any longer! I'm going to show him in the only way he'll understand—by hitting him dead center in his pocketbook! I—"

"YOU! A boy like you, are going to show King something! You're funny! Nobody has ever beat him—and nobody ever will! He's a big man and he's stepped on a lot of feet, getting to where he is. But he does not encourage rustling—"

"How about our Bar-B strays that he bought from Frenchy?"

"They weren't Bar-B strays—to his knowledge! Frenchy says that he bought that bunch of stuff—"

"Frenchy!" Lit said softly, scornfully.

"Listen to me! I'm not going to lie to you. I do like you—like you—very much, Lit. But you can't fight King and expect me to think about liking you. And—and there's something else. You've had all kinds of luck since you crossed the Rowdy. Well, any gambler knows that luck turns. Yours will. You—don't you see it, Lit? The more I like you, the more I think about that?"

"What are you driving at?" he demanded—but already he knew... face her, hot, sulky eyes upon the loneliness of her.

"You can't do that to me!" he told her thickly. "You or any other woman. There's a thing or two that a man has to figure out for himself—if they aren't part of him without the need for figuring at all. Loyalty's one of them! I told Dad Barbee that I'd hang and rattle on this trail until I couldn't do another thing. I told Smoky Cole that I'd shoot square and straight with him."

"And you have! Nobody could say that you haven't done more than you could have been expected to do! But it's your privilege to quit any job when you want to, Lit! Don't you—want to? Don't you consider me worth that much—worth doing what I ask you?"

"The way the question really is—no! I'm not a day laborer over here. I can't get up in the morning and decide whether I'll go to work or not, or what outfit I'll work for. No, honey! I can't do it and when you think it over, you'll see that I can't. If I had the same job, for King Connell, and quit this way—"

"Then you're on the other side of the fence, from now on," she said evenly, after a long minute of staring. "I don't believe that King ever bought a head of rustled stock—knowingly. You, nor any other man, can come to me and say otherwise, without getting my quirt across your mouth! Remember that! Don't speak to me again! Don't expect anything from me that you wouldn't expect from King, or Jed, or—Frenchy!"

S

HE hooked the buckskin viciously and was gone at the hard gallop. Lit had no wish to overtake her. He trailed at a long lope and, when he topped the hogback, saw her thundering down upon Chihuahua, who loafed in the saddle and smoked and waited. She passed the breed, ignoring his lifted hand.

Chihuahua stared shrewdly at Lit's grim face, twisted in the kik, and they foxtrotted forward, stirrup-to-stirrup. "What you're do?" Chihuahua grunted, as Lit swung off.

Lit picked up a handful of pebbles, mounted again. He set one upon gunwrist, lifted the arm out horizontally, turned his wrist and whipped the Colt from his holster flashingly.

"Oh!" said Chihuahua. "Like them, hah?"

CHAPTER XIX

THE CONFERENCE OF THE CLANS

"MOKY," Chihuahua said thoughtfully, "she's hold them dam' Sunday School, w'at? An' them fella w'at's git to Gurney first, she's wear one pretty pink ribbon! W'at the hell!"

Lit made no reply, merely stared. For the phenomenon drawing Chihuahua's satirical remark engrossed him, also. Why, upon one normally-deserted five-mile stretch of trail should be see warriors of the Lazy-W, the Flying J, the Circle-56, the Dollar, and the Arrowhead outfits, brand by brand, holding themselves aloof, yet all—men of little outfits and big—pointing their horses' heads toward Gurney? It was too much for Lit.

"By Jove!" he grunted presently. "Never saw so many hard-looking two-gunmen together in all my born days."

"She's this dam' Territory!" sighed Chihuahua. "Me, I'm think you're just never see so many o' them Territory people ride together before."

They jogged on thoughtfully, with the trail before and behind them dotted with the various cliques that, heavily-armed, watchful, each taciturn toward all others, kept steady gait toward the county-seat.

"She's them new dep'ty," Chihuahua answered the unspoken question of them both. "Them Curt Thompson, w'at is from San Antonio. Me, I'm wonder w'at he's ride here for. . . ."

The new deputy, appointed by Smoky Cole up in Faith, but a day or two before Lit rode out to answer Sudie-May's summons, slid his horse to a stop and grinned upon them. He was a smallish, cat-quick youngster, about Lit's age, but with an odd maturity of violet-blue eyes. He was of that type which gives the impression of efficiency, so that one, never having seen him pull or shoot, understood that he pulled rather faster, shot rather better, than the average. His lean, not handsome face was darkly-tanned. His eyes were twinkling, if not always good-humoredly. All in all, he rather ornamented a deputy's star, Lit thought.

"Hi-yah!" he greeted them cheerfully. "Smoky's wantin' yuh, Lit, right sudden."

"'About this?'" Lit's nod at the riders was born of sudden inspiration.

"'Ex-actly. Gov'nor's in Gurney. Sent soldiers a-lasin' hither an' yon, tellin' these hairpins to come in an' have a pow-wow. Gov'nor's goin' to tell 'em that they got to be good. If they will, he'll whitewash the books an' start a new deal. They're shore a-comin', now, ain't they?"

"Whole Territory, looks like," nodded Lit absently, his mind wandering to Gurney and the meaning of this Governor's Conference. "But where's King Connell and the Los Alamos crew? And John Powell of the Ladder P? Funny, neither of the Territory's big fellows are coming in. . . ."

Smoky greeted them with a grunt. Curt Thompson he sent off immediately, with brief orders to "'keep 'em peaceful. Don't let 'em mill." Then he turned to Lit.

"'Yuh grab your foot in your hand an' hightail it for the courthouse. Fasten yourself onto the Gov'nor an' don't yuh git bucked off—not for nothin'. There's men in town'd as soon hang a Governor's scalp to their bridle reins as a Comanche's! I got to ride herd on 'em, with Curt Thompson an' Chihuahua helpin'."

Lit nodded and went out. A dust cloud came rolling up the street toward him. It halted, swelled, before the Antelope Saloon. There was a whooping of men and squealing of half-broken horses. Then out of the dust Lit saw King Connell and Jed moving. Behind them were a hard-faced, well-armed, swaggering bunch of Los Alamos cowboys. Neither turned as Lit came near. They went into the saloon and Lit crossed to the courthouse.

GOVERNOR CUTHBERT was tall, soldierly, yellow-haired and yellow-mustached. He wore a brigadier general's uniform. He looked curiously at Lit, then devil-may-care blue eyes lighted. He smiled and Lit smiled in return. He thought that the Governor was a good-humorered man, but possibly not an easy man, regardless. He had been a famous cavalryman before retirement for wounds.

"And so you're Taylor," the Governor said. "I've heard a good deal about you from Smoky. He said that you'd be along presently. You're to sort of back Lieutenant Aire of my staff and protect my scalp, I take it?"

"'I'm supposed to try," Lit nodded. "I know the ones to watch. There are plenty of hard cases in Gurney, today. Aire would hardly know them all and I've already been introduced. Wolf Montague, and four gladiators with holsters tied down and triggers tied back, just to count one average outfit. . . ."

"'And I asked for this job!'" shrugged the Governor whimsically. "'Wanted to recuperate from an old wound and write. Oh, Lord!"

Moving about watchfully, keeping always within sight of the Governor, Lit was presently approached by King Connell, whose bluff red face was all smiles.

"'Sure, and it's a grand day for the Territory, my son!' cried the King. "'Ah, yes! A grand day!"

"'If you big fellows will let her be!'" Lit nodded sourly. "'The Governor's really offering all of you a last chance to cut out these grab-and-be-damned ways of yours, without having a blaze of killings in the Territory that will likely take you off with the little fellows. You better listen with your ears stuck up, and be damned if that's Spanish, either!"

"'Oh! don't forget, Connell! Whatever the Governor rigs up today, you're still owing the Bar-B for two hundred and fifty head of mixed stuff. Don't you think you won't pay the bill, either!"

"'It's the same hot-headed boy!" grinned Connell, seemingly unworried. "Sure, and under his hat he packs a whole herd of beef . . . But it's a grand day, just the same!"

He rolled off, chuckling, with a lean vaquero trailing him. Perhaps a half hour later, this vaquero returned to the courthouse, where the factions were gathering slowly, tensely, bringing with them the atmosphere of a powder keg with fuse lit.
"I bring a message for His Excellency señor," grinned the vaquero. "Mi patron, the señor Connell, expresses his deep sorrow that a message of urgency calls him back to Los Alamos. To His Excellency, he says: Go on with the conference. I will approve and abide by the action taken."

"I see . . ." nodded Lit, with an unpleasant smile. "Yeh, I can see plenty."

King Connell would not be bound by any direct promise now, not until he had personally conferred with Governor Cuthbert. He had come into town and so shown his willingness to aid in bringing peace to the Territory—and to assure himself that all his enemies were here. Now he could ride out swiftly—to strike certain blows which would rid him of the near-presence of divers troublesome squatters, such as Wolf Montague and the Howards.

The courthouse was filled, now. Lit pushed through the crowd until he stood beside the Governor. In the back of the room lounged Chihuahua, with Winchester across his arm. Against one wall leaned Smoky, narrow, bleak blue eyes missing nothing. Curt Thompson was facing Smoky from the opposite wall and there was a dancing devil of expectancy in Curt's face.

"Speaking of arsenals!" grunted the Governor to Lit. "I should have liked to disarm these fellows before bringing them together here. But—I don't suppose I could have had the whole United States Army loaned me, for the job."

He moved to the front of the plank dais that held the desk and bench of the judge when court was in session. He put strong hands behind his back and looked slowly, deliberately, out over the grim, suspicious faces that made his audience. Lit, watching the Governor and the units of the audience with slow weave of head from side to side, saw sudden irritation come to Cuthbert's expression.

"Men!" the Governor said suddenly, explosively. "You were asked to come into Gurney for a conference with me and you must have a pretty good notion of my reason for asking you here. But, if you haven't, I'm here to explain. I'll be plain with you. I want to be sure that, when you leave here after I've finished, none of you can say that he didn't understand me!"

He took a cheroot from the inner pocket of his tunic, flicked a match head on his thumbnail and stared at them while he held the little flame to the tobacco.

"I took this job as a sort of rest," he told them—and made a grunting, disgusted noise in his throat. "Rest! A lot of rest I've had. Ever since I've been Governor of the Territory, there has been a constant state of warfare among you people. Big versus Little. Early, Original Squatter on Government Land, lying out at night to lead poison the Later Squatter. Feudist against Feudist. 'No Law West of the Rowdy!' for a battle cry."

The smoke popped from cheroot end in vicious little jets.

"You've been stealing each other's stock, poisoning water holes and tanks, bushwhacking each other, raising Hell generally. Now, I'm tired of it! This is a fine Territory. It's a big Territory. There's room here for every one of you. There's no need for any of you to put his elbows into another man's sides. No need for any of you to feel your neighbor's elbows in your sides. As for Government Land, there are laws governing its use. They are fair laws—fair to all of you."

They stared at him, with no lightening that Lit could see of tense, suspicious faces.

"I want all of you to leave here with the intent to keep those pistols and Winchesters of yours in the scabbards. I want you big cowmen to make up your minds that you have to leave the little ranchers alone. As for you men who have small holdings owned or leased, I want you to leave the big fellow's wells and fences and cattle alone."

Still they stared blankly up at him. But Lit saw one or two of them grinning covertly at this suggestion that lion and lamb lie down together. Perhaps Cuthbert saw, too . . .

"Oh, I'm not merely hoping that you'll do all this. The administration has teeth and claws, as well as a pleasant purr! I ask you to do these things—to be moderately honest; to keep your guns in slow holsters; to deal with each other as neighbors. And the men who do these things will receive from me a general amnesty for past offenses—even capital offenses! Those who don't—That's all I have to say to you. I'm not an orator. I'm a soldier!"

But, it seemed, he had something more to say—if not from the platform in the courtroom. When the clans were filing out, muttering among themselves, the Governor turned to Lit. He nodded toward the stairs at the top of which sat Shorty Wiggin, fore-thoughtfully nursing a sawed-off riot gun, gauge twelve.

"You have a man up there that I want to talk to," he said—and smiled. "I imagine that you know more about him than almost anyone else, since you're the only one who's ever put jewelry on his wrists. I want you to escort me up to Frenchy Leonard. I have something to say to the young man."

"'Going to offer him a clean bill, too?'" Lit frowned. "He's charged with as cheap, lowdown a murder as I can think of."

"I know how you feel," the Governor nodded. "You risked your life to put him in a cell. But I have to use extraordinary methods, sometimes, to meet abnormal conditions. I have to think of the situation as a whole, not of individuals. Let's go up."

Lit nodded sulkily and they crossed to the stairs and climbed to Shorty Wiggin. He gave Lit the cell keys and Lit opened the door of Frenchy's prison and went in. He looked sharply at the prisoners, then stood back to let the Governor past.

FRENCHY was paling in the confinement of the jail. But he possessed his devil-may-care grin, just as in the days when he had ridden high, wide and handsome, up and down the Territory, feared of man and idolized of woman. He sat comfortably upon his cot, but when he saw the tall, uniformed figure of the Governor behind Lit, he stood up. Grinning, he bowed to Cuthbert.

"'Yo' Excelleneey!" he said mockingly. "This is different from the last time I seen you, up at Faith. But you'll understand that I can't do more'n offer you a seat. Things bein' the way they are—right now . . ."

And he looked steadily, still grinning, at Lit. Lit made a grunting sound, of contempt, of amusement. Frenchy's dark eyes, with the odd, amber flecks, narrowed. But he held the grin.

"It is different, Leonard," the Governor nodded. "And, since it is different, since you're in position to realize as you didn't realize up at Faith when I talked to you, that you aren't unbeatable, I've come to talk to you, again."

"You're company," Frenchy shrugged. "I'll—listen."

"Good! See that you do!" Cuthbert answered grimly. "Today, I offered to wipe all charges against Territorials from the books. Offered them clean sheets to start tomorrow with. Suppose I offer you the same amnesty for past crimes—"

"What do you mean—crimes?" Frenchy interrupted. "When a man hit me, or hit at me, I hit back. That's no crime!"

"Did the ranchers from whom you stole cattle and horses hit at you?" Cuthbert demanded sternly. "The Bar-B, for instance? Don't quibble with me, Leonard! I have thought that you were pushed into the first of your murders and thefts. But that was at first. You're under indictment for two murders that I know of. You've been a law to yourself—with the help of some prominent men of the Territory."

"I don't admit that I ever seen a head o' Bar-B stuff," Frenchy grinned. But his eyes were ugly as he stared from Lit to the Governor. "But, anyhow, I don't want none of your dam' amnesty. It's no good to me. The only thing worth a good-goddam to a man like me is his Colts! Take 'em off me an' some cheap glory-hunter'll bushwhack me from behind the first rock I ride past!"

"The way you killed that deputy sheriff at Arno," Lit said thoughtfully. "Hell! when the shoe pinches your own foot."

"Never mind, Taylor!" Cuthbert said quickly. "Keep out of this! I'm offering Leonard amnesty, for the good of the Territory as a whole. Leonard! I'm not taking your pistols out of the holsters. I'm telling you to keep them in the holsters."

"No good, like I said!" Frenchy cried mockingly. "When the word goes out I ain't on the shoot, I'm a dead man. You can use up a barrel o' whitewash an' make me white as a ghost. But you won't be along to cover my back. Uh-uh! Uh-uh! Nothin' doin'!"

"You don't have to stay here, where you're known. The whole country is open to you. You've talked of Mexico—"

"You're just wastin' yo' time, Cuthbert," Frenchy said carelessly. "I ain't runnin'. No reason I should hightail it out o' the Territory an' dam' if I'm goin' to. I got as much right in this country as anybody an' I'm stickin'. You're just barkin' up the wrong tree."

"Why offer him whitewash?" Lit burst out. "The good of the whole Territory, is it? What could be better than hanging him? He comes up to trial next week. We've got a cast-iron case, Governor. We'll convict him and there's a nice, new rope in the office that's just his fit!"

CUTHBERT made a small head-motion. Obviously, he did not want the matter discussed. Frenchy sat down and looked steadily at Lit. Tim Fenelon and Hognose Ott, from their seats, watched Frenchy, rather than Lit. They had sprawled silently, moveless, during the talk. Only their eyes were alive.

"I'm ownin' you quite a bit, now, Lit, ain't I?" Frenchy said softly. "About time we settled up . . . I don't like to owe too much, too long. So—I'm aimin' to pay you up in full, real soon. You see, I don't figure I'm goin' to be bothered by that trial . . ."

Lit grinned and reached for tobacco and papers. As upon that day in the trail when at Sudie-May's stirrup he had fished out locket and tobacco together, now the sack's strings caught the locket and it drooped to the floor. He bent quickly to recover it, but Frenchy had seen the yellow flash of the gold. He came up from the cot in a tigerish movement. For once, his set grin vanished. He faced Lit, glaring furiously:

"Where'd you get that? Dam' yo' soul! That's mine—"

"Why, you slinking little liar!" Lit drawled, at a venture. "You sneaked that, somewhere! Everything you ever had in your dirty hands, you stole!"

"Yeh? So that's what she told you, huh? Well, I wouldn't have got it, if she hadn't dam' well wanted me to have it. An' no matter what she says, she handed it over. You see, I know her—mighty well. She—"

The Governor, standing with puzzled frown, looking from Lit's set face to Frenchy's sneer, now straightened and jerked up his hand. But it was too late. Frenchy had already crashed backward to his cot and off it to the floor and sprawled there, gaping up stupidly. Blood spurted from his nose and smashed mouth.

Lit caught himself with a great, slow breath. He lifted right hand to his mouth and blew upon bruised knuckles. He nodded when the Governor put hand upon his arm restrainingly.

"You're right. I'll not hurt him. But we'd better go. For he's supposed to hang—not be hammered to death . . ."

He let the Governor out, drew the door shut and had one satisfying glimpse of Frenchy, just beginning to drag himself to a sitting position beside the cot. He grinned tightly as he turned key in lock. Then fury came up in him at recollection of Frenchy's leering face. His hand upon the key shook.

"Lousy little liar!" he said to himself. "As if she'd stoop to him—because of his swagger—like a Mex' floozie, or that poor little savage, Kate Quinn! I'd like to go back in there and unshackle him and beat him to death!"

CHAPTER XX

"I WANT THAT MAN!"

NOT yet were the warriors of the clans gone from Gurney. Lit loafed around the town, listening, watching. Everywhere, the Governor's proposal, his offers and his threats, were being violently discussed. Lit found the sentiment of the Territorials divided. But it was far from an even division. There were many more to call Cuthbert a "fool-Easterner" for trying to talk away the natural hostility of big cowman for little, than appreciated his efforts to make the statutes mean something.

It was all quite new and interesting to Lit. Law and order, property rights, had been hazy things, over on the Diamond. He had been like the average cowboy, troubling his mind over nothing more than the day's work and the night's play. But now all this discussion vitally affected him, because he was an officer of the Territory. So he studied it thoughtfully.

Looking at the swaggering men, the pick of the Territory's warriors, along the street, with their six shooters sagging, that thought of peacefully going to law made him laugh.

Smoky Cole came up the street, then. He stopped beside Lit, who eyed the grim, silent man curiously. Smoky's lips worked upon his corn husk cigarette, pushing another inch of it out of his mouth.

"I hired two new deputies," he said at last. "Couple Dutchmen that ain't long on thinkin'. But they ain't hired to think. They're hired to do what I say— an' what I'm tellin' 'em is: To watch Frenchy an' Tim an' Hognose like they was gold-plated. They'll be guards for day an' night, now, one of 'em in the cell with them fellas all time."

"Until the hanging," Lit nodded. "If we can hang Frenchy."

"I got a notion I might's well order the lumber for the scaffold," Smoky said grimly. "Governor's goin' to take a hand in that trial. I—kind o' talked to him an' it may be I let slip somethin' about our noble district attorney... I think Cuthbert will have a special lawyer here to sort o' take care o' the prosecution. Well—what I want o' yuh, Lit, is that yuh better head out an' scout around. Take Chihuahua. He's been drawin' deputy pay since I appointed yuh."

"You want to know why King Connell slid out so fast," Lit nodded. "And what he's been up to, while all the others were here together."

"I'd like to know," Smoky agreed grimly. "It's a two-man, eyes-open job. If one man was to stumble onto the King when he was up to some devilment—"

"I'm glad you hired two men," Lit said, staring down the street. "You have got what I'd class as the hardest bunch between Here and Over Yonder, in town today. There's one big, green-eyed gunie with Wolf Montague that'll bear watchin'. One-earred man. I know him from the Diamond River. In fact, I have a notion that I'll tuck him away in Boot Hill one day. I certainly will if he crowds me. I hope you keep both eyes peeled and on the jail, Smoky."

"Don't worry. That's why I hired Ull an' Zorn. They got single-barrel' minds. An' double-barrel' shotguns. An' they seen trouble before. No back-up to 'em. Find Chihuahua an' slide out, son."

Lit nodded and moved off in search of Chihuahua. He did not find the breed in the Antelope. Nor was he in any other saloon on the street. But a Mexican youth met near Halliday's store directed Lit to a drinking place on the edge of Gurney, a square dobe house favored by the Mexican vaqueros.

Chihuahua sat in a corner with a bottle on the pine table before him. He was slouching in the chair, long legs thrust out beneath the table, shoulders drooping. He lifted his head when Lit came in. His bright blue eyes were brighter than Lit had ever seen them—glassily brilliant. His thin, hard mouth was drooping. He looked drunk.

"Feel like a ride?" Lit asked him, coming over.

"My friend," Chihuahua said—using Spanish as he rarely used it when with Lit—and speaking very slowly, very thickly, "I feel as if the bottom had fallen from the world. I have no belly. Nothing is of use. There is no color to the flowers, no taste to my whiskey."

"The Willies!" Lit grinned and banged his hand hard upon the sagging shoulders. "Come along with me and ride it off."

"Muy bien. I cannot drink it away. I have tried. This is the second full bottle that I have drunk. The whiskey works upon my feet, but cannot touch my head. So—let us go. Where, is of no import to me."

Lit frowned at him. He had never seen this somber side of his friend, had never seen him anything but sardonically cheerful. But whatever it was, that made him look years older, etched grim lines on the daredevil face, was Chihuahua's private affair. He did not make the mistake of asking questions.

CHIHUAHUA stood up, unsteadily. He braced himself with a hand upon the table and fumbled in a pocket. He got out a gold piece and dropped it ringing on the pine.

"Your whiskey, Friend Antonio," he said to the cantinero, "it is not good. I can feel its bite in my liver, in my stomach. But in my heart—it does not bite. But, perhaps that is not your fault. I have never found whiskey anywhere to drown the black dogs when they eat at my heart."

Antonio stared stolidly, then nodded and came over to pick up the gold. Chihuahua took Lit's arm. He rolled as they went toward the door, but—as he had said—the liquor affected only his body. He turned toward the courthouse and when they came to the corral behind it, got headstall and saddle and put them on his horse without help, working clumsily, but surely.

They went into the sheriff's office for Winchesters. When they swung into the saddles he seemed normal, except for his expression. They rode out and turned west. As the horses foxtrotted toward the end of the Diablos, Lit forgot Chihuahua's trouble in thoughts of what might lie ahead.

Hours passed as they rode toward the nearest house that Lit would inspect—the ranch of Wolf Montague, southwest of Los Alamos. It would be dark by the time they reached the Arrowhead. Chihuahua made a grunting sound and Lit looked sidelong at him. Something like his usual expression had come back to Chihuahua's eyes and mouth.

"You are a good compañero, Lit," Chihuahua said softly. "You do not talk when it is not the time to talk. It is another of the things I like in you. You do not ask questions. So—I finish this bad time, now, by telling you why I left the world today to go sit in the dark by myself. I do not do that often. But today, as I walked along the street watching the warriors, I passed a little white house like the house that once we owned—my mother, my baby sister, and I—south, near Jupiter. Very like our house is this one. I have seen that many times."

He stared frowningly out upon the rolling foothill country.

"And a little girl was singing, somewhere in that house. Singing the little song about a cat, a burro and a hen, that I taught our Rosita when she was but beginning to walk. And the light went out of the street for me, when I heard her. I remembered Rosita and the day, eight years ago, when I rode back to that little rancho of ours."

The thin mouth tightened, became a pale line across brown face. Lit stared fascinatedly, if covertly.

"My brown dog lay dead upon the threshold. Someone had shot him. I flung myself down and ran into the house. My mother was dead upon the floor, almost at the door. In another room Rosita, too, was dead. I was like a madman! I thought of Pablo, the boy who worked for us. I could not think that he had done these murders, simple of mind though he was. But I took out my knife and I went quietly to look for trail. It had been only because of Rosita. Nothing else of worth was in that house. Only that lovely child and she had not yet fifteen years.

"I found Pablo and my first thought was the right thought: It was not he who killed my mother to take Rosita. For he was dying beside the corral. He had crawled there to the trough in which we watered the horses. He was a good boy, that Pablo. He could not write and so he knew that he must not die until I came and he told me what he could of the man who did those things to me."

He drew a great, slow breath, eyes lifted unseeingly to the yellow rim of the setting sun.

"I will not tell you what Pablo told me. I cannot talk of it. But he had eyes, that simple one, as well as that loyalty that one finds more often in a dog than in a man. He told me what this man was like—not so much as I wanted, because Pablo's senses went from him when he was shot and he recovered only after a long time. But enough to let me know that man when, some day, I come upon him. To know him by a certain thing. So, for eight years I have watched men. Sometimes, I have believed that he stood before me. But always it was another man."
He lapsed into brooding silence. They rode on silently until the sun was gone behind the far Soldados and the moon showed in the star-lit sky.

"Them Arrowhead, yonder?" Chihuahua grunted suddenly. "Me, I'm think she's smoke I'm smell!"

"I don't smell any," Lit answered, leaning forward. "Now I smell it!" he said fiercely after a moment. "I—expected to!"

"Por supuesto! Wy'll King Connell slip away, but for the knife in the back of them Arrowhead an' Wagon Wheel," Chihuahua agreed. Apparently, "the black dogs" were gone and he was his usual self.

They rode cautiously up to the blackened shell that had been the Arrowhead house of Wolf Montague. Only the parts of the house which had been built of mudbrick remained. Faint wisps of smoke still rose from charred logs.

They poked about in the moonlight, but found no sign of violence to any humans about the ruins of house, corrals and sheds. Lit drew a long breath of relief at that, but he was furious, nonetheless.

They made a coffee fire and ate, then left the vicinity of the ruins to sleep in an arroyo a mile above.

"It's just a question of which one to look at first," Lit said grimly as they smoked a final cigarette that night. "He's as down on the Howards and the Wagon Wheel outfit as he ever was on Wolf Montague. He's probably making it a clean sweep."

"Pues, them Howards is more close," Chihuahua nodded.

They turned across trailless range, next morning. Lit was in bad humor. Connell's blows would light a fire in the Territory. All that the Governor had hoped to accomplish would be made impossible. It would be war to the knife between the outfits wiped out and the warriors of Los Alamos. And he was Smoky's deputy! He could not stay out of the thick of it.

They came over the crest of a ridge and Chihuahua, looking mechanically over the country, suddenly snatched out his glasses and focussed them upon another high point ahead. After a moment he let them down and shrugged.

"One man—Mex', I'm think—w'at's go over them ridge. Me, I'm think she's not see us. We're go look, hah?"

They rode fast until they topped that ridge over which the other had vanished. And Lit saw him perhaps an eighth of a mile away, jogging along. He grunted and Chihuahua handed over the glasses. Lit studied the tall bay horse and the slim rider upon him. He handed back the glasses and put the rowels into Nigger Toe. All thought of the Howards had vanished.

"I want that man!" he said grimly to Chihuahua.

And down the slope he sent the black, scuttering after the lithe vaquero whom he had seen in Porto, riding Arch Holmes' white-faced bay gelding around Slim Hewes' store—Frenchy's spy in Porto, beyond doubt.

The vaquero turned at the thunder of their hoofs. And he leaned forward and rammed in the hooks. As they followed, Lit wondered at the presence here, north of Gurney, of a member of Frenchy's gang. It might mean nothing, but it might mean a great deal. Well—he consoled himself grimly—they would first catch the man, then see if he would not explain . . .

Their animals seemed fresher than the big bay. Steadily, they cut down the distance despite his spurring, his quieting the bay with rein ends. He rode with chin on shoulder much of the time. The space between them shrank, became two hundred, a hundred and fifty, a hundred, yards. Chihuahua stopped his sorrel flashingly and was on the ground trotting out to the side to stand motionless.

Lit understood. He continued to send Nigger Toe pounding forward, but now he angled to the side. Looking back, he saw Chihuahua in a slack calm, beginning deliberately to lift his carbine. Then the sound of his firing came—like the clapping of many hands. The bay ahead crashed down. Lit dug in the rowels. A moment, and he was looking down upon the man pinned beneath the dead horse. It was the vaquero of Porto, all right.

He flung leg over saddle fork and slid down, Winchester covering the man. He lunged and punched the wrist of the man's gun-hand, beginning to lift a Colt.
Lit hooked the pistol away with his toe. He saw that the vaquero was bleeding from wounds in back and breast.

Chihuahua loped up and swung off. They lifted the horse from the man and pulled him to one side. He looked up at them maliciously.

"Why did you run from us?" Lit demanded. "And where had you that horse and saddle and bridle?"

THE vaquero’s beady eyes seemed drawn by the nickeled badge on Lit’s shirt. He laughed, a rattling sound that ended in a spasm of coughing.

"I am not the least of the men of Frenchy," he told them boastfully, when he could talk.

"I know you," Chihuahua nodded. "You are Juan Ortiz. I have seen you with el francés, who now lies in Gurney calabozo where my friend and I threw him. That was why I killed you—because I knew you and because all the men of el francés are now marked for death if they do not drop their guns."

"You think so?" Ortiz gasped painfully, mockingly. "It may be so—but I do not think so. This horse and saddle? Why, I rode upon certain business in the country north of Porto, in the country of the Diamond River. And I came upon a vaquero riding the bay. I liked it, and his saddle and bridle, as you know, were silver-trimmed. I liked them, so—I killed him and took them. Now, I spit upon you! I spit upon you—and die!"

His head rolled sideways, and between half-closed lids his eyes shone like beads. Chihuahua put out a hand, touched the dark forehead, nodded.

"She’s dead. Now, me, I’m wonder, Lit ... W’y will she ride here? Me, I’m think Frenchy, she’s send him somew’ere, hah!"

"I think we’d better forget about the Howards, for a bit," Lit decided, staring grimly down at the murderer of that cheerful one-time rider of the Bar-B, Arch Holmes. "Even with a couple of new guards in the jail, I can’t help worrying about Frenchy. Anyway, we can tell Smoky that Connell wiped out the Arrowhead house. That’s indication enough that he went on to wipe out the others."

"Frenchy, she’s have them notion very strong against them hangin’," Chihuahua nodded. "We’re have one look for Gurney!"

They cut across the range, riding at the mile-eating hard trot toward the Diablos. There was a pass through the mountains, by which the road to Porto might be gained. It was not the usual road, but it cut off miles.

Noon came and they let the horses breathe. They swung up. Chihuahua lifted himself in the stirrups.

"Amor de dios!" he cried. "Them whole dam’ Territory, she’s come for to meet us, w’at?"

"And they’re riding like they can hardly wait to see us!"

---

CHAPTER XXI

"ANY FIGHTING MEN?"

HALLIDAY the store-keeper was the first man Lit recognized, of the baker’s dozen pouring down a slope toward them. Halliday waved his Sharps at Lit like an Indian, holding it high over head. The men behind him were store-keepers, cowboys, miscellaneous townsmen. They had one thing in common—they carried all the arms possible, rifles, shotguns, six shoot-ers.

"Didn’t yuh meet ’em?" Halliday cried when Lit and Chihuahua pulled in before the citizens. "Frenchy’s gang?"

"Frenchy’s gang?" Lit cried incredulously, leaning forward. "Why — We killed one man, Juan Ortiz—Chihuahua killed him, that is! What happened?"

"Hell!" Halliday said with immense finality. "Plumb hell! They tolled one o’ them new Dutchmen—Ull, it was—up close enough to ’em to grab him. An’ the dam’ fool was packin’ the keys to their shackles an’ handeuffs. They killed him with his own gun an’ sneaked out an’ shot Zorn, the night guard—he was still downstairs in the courtroom."

"Smoky?" Lit grunted furiously. "Where was he?"

"Asleep. Frenchy an’ the others had help waitin’ for ’em. Some o’ them fallas that’s been hangin’ around keepin' so quiet an' watchin' so hawk-eyed. The bunch slid out behind the jail with ever' thing that'd shoot out o' Shorty Wiggin's closet. They never run—then. Somebody hightailed it to fetch Smoky an' Curt Thompson an' Shorty Wiggin. Frenchy an' his bunch hid behind a corral wall an' they just shot hell out o' Smoky's bunch. Smoky an' Wiggin'll likely die. Curt Thompson's not so bad, but bad enough, with a hole in his leg an' another through his shoulder. When they'd bushwhacked Smoky, Frenchy's outfit jumped on the hawses somebody'd got for 'em. They hightailed it this way.

"I'm take them look," Chihuahua said grimly.

"Know any of the bunch that sided in with Frenchy?" Lit demanded softly. A stiffening thought had come to him: He was sheriff, now. This war had been all but dropped upon his lap. Nor was he disposed to avoid it!

"Fella they call Bisbee was one behind the wall, shootin'. An' that awful tall store-keeper, Slim Hewes from Porto. Two-three other, maybe a half-dozen, killers. My guess is they made for Porto. That's close to the Rowdy an' they know they can drop us, if once they ford the river."

"I—don't think they can," Lit disagreed, very softly. "In fact, I know damned well they won't. I'll keep after 'em clear to the Diamond—or to hell!"

Chihuahua came back at the lope. He lifted his hand in the ancient Indian summons and they rode to meet him.

"Them fellas, she's go for Porto. An' me, I find we're our Juan Ortiz, Lit, she's turn away—to ride for them hang-out we're Smilin' Badey, she's stop. Frenchy, she's not like Badey. But if she's need help for to fight us, Smilin' Badey's good. Smilin's like for to fight them posse, any time."

"Porto!" Lit called to the others.

"Let's go!"

The trail was wide, and plain, and clear, from the foothills straight toward Porto. Frenchy and his bunch—nine or ten, in all—had ridden fast, but without any attempt to cover their trail. The posse made camp that night on the dry fork of Arroyo Feo and as they sprawled around a fire, Lit had the story of the ambush in Gurney with all its details.

CURT THOMPSON was the hero of that fight, by Halliday's report. The young deputy had rolled over to the acequia—the water ditch—and despite the gaping wound in his thigh, the bullet lodged in his shoulder, had returned the outlaws' fire and kept them from coming out into the open to put pistol-muzzles to the heads of Smoky Cole and Shorty Wiggin.

"They was yellin' a lot, behind the wall," the grim store-keeper said. "I went for my Sharps, but I had quite a ways to come. I could hear 'em yellin' to each other to jump out an' be damned certain Smoky an' Shorty went to hell. But Curt knocked some dirt into their mouths, I reckon. An' I went in with the old buffalo gun an' they decided to emigrate."

He looked thoughtfully at Lit in the fire's light.

"So—yuh' sheriff, now, Lit. An' I can say what I couldn't have said some time back: I'm dam' glad yuh are!"

"I'll try to keep you that way," Lit said absently. "It is showdown in more ways than one. There's more than Frenchy riding the high lines. Smiling Badey, for one. We have got to wipe Frenchy out. When we do, Badey and the others'll hightail it for Mexico or cooler parts."

Lit and Chihuahua talked over the situation ahead. And both agreed that Frenchy's men, plus those hard cases in Porto who would naturally join them, could make life exceedingly interesting for such a force as theirs.

"But, if we're git behind house in Porto, before they're see us—"

"We'll try it," Lit grunted. "It means no sleep, tonight. Beyond midnight, anyhow, Halliday!"

The store-keeper listened and nodded. They sprawled for a nap, all but one sentry, but at midnight were in the saddle again. Chihuahua seemed to know this country as he knew all the Territory. He led them to a ridge before dawn and stopped.

"Porto!" he grunted. "She's down them hill. Me, I'm go see!"

And he vanished into the darkness as if his sorrel's hoofs were padded. They waited, watching the darkness thicken, then begin to turn gray. Chihuahua reappeared as from some 'dobe below them a rooster crowed.

"They're think we're come!" he said cheerfully. "They're sleep in Hewes's store. But they're not all sleep. On one roof them fella's watch. By, them store, too, she's them guard."

Lit called up a picture of the village as he remembered it. Then, slowly, he divided the men.

"Halliday, behind the store there's an arroyo. The ground rises on the other side of it. If you'll take a couple over there, nobody can get out the back way. Chihuahua, if you'll take a couple to the blacksmith shop, you can cover the far side. The rest of us'll scatter out and hold the Cortina house and the saloon across the road up this way from Hewes's place. That'll leave some hard cases behind us, maybe, but it's the best I can figure, offhand."

He watched them off before leading the others softly into the southern edge of Porto. As his knot of men came quietly up to the first building a man jumped up in the gray light from where he had been squatting in the shelter of a rain barrel. He ran around the corner of the building.

Lit jumped Nigger Toe forward. The little black spun about the corner and the man, now under the wooden awning of this little store, fired at his pursuer. Lit saw the orange flash in the dusk under the slanting roof. There was a that! of slug striking saddle fork. He lifted his carbine and cocked and fired it, whipped the lever down and fired again. The man ran out from the awning and Lit had a clear glimpse of him going toward the next house. He fired deliberately and the man sprawled in the dust. He did not move.

The others thundered around the corner, now. They looked at the fallen one, then fiercely at Lit. He waved left hand spasmodically.

"Some of you to Cortina's house, yonder. Roust out the family. Three-four of you get into the saloon across the road. That's Hewes's place down there. They ought to be awake, in it!"

From the dark wall of Slim Hewes's store, there came a jet of flame and the flat, metallic whang! of a Winchester. A posseman swore in a surprised tone, slid sideways in the saddle, dropped his rifle and clawed weakly at the saddle horn.

Lit jumped Nigger Toe to his side, slipped left arm about the man and lifted him clear as he roweled the black horse to one side. The others had parted, some galloping toward the Cortina 'dobe that fronted the street and presented a long, blank side wall to Hewes's store. The rest quirted and spurred across to the saloon, flung themselves down and from the ground opened on Hewes's place.

Lit saw the dust of the road spouting up under a lash of lead from the store. Something picked ever so softly at his shirt. Something else made a hissing noise all but in his ear. Then the man he supported jerked. Lit looked at him. There was a small, bluish mark upon his forehead.

He got into the shelter of Cortina's and leaned, letting the dead man gently down. From the saloon front came now a rattle of firing. It was drowned, here at Cortina's door. Lit straightened, to scowl about him. There was still no token of Halliday's arrival behind the store, or Chihuahua's garrisoning the blacksmith shop.

Suddenly, out of Cortina's, came the old man himself and behind him his fat señora and a troop of children and relatives and servants. They were half-dressed, for the most part. They ran close to the fronts of the buildings and pounded upon a door down the street, yelling for sanctuary.

Lit moved around to the front of Cortina's house. The great door stood open. Inside, was the noise of pounding. He went in. Some of the men were knocking loopholes in the 'dobe walls. He came out to see what the men across the road were doing. They had broken into the saloon over there and had an angling range toward the Hewes store front. And at this instant Chihuahua's men opened fire from the blacksmith shop beyond the store.

"I think this is finished, Frenchy!" Lit said grimly aloud, as if the grinning outlaw could hear through those 'dobe walls that spurted fire now. "I think this is—finish!"
But there was a battle to fight, first. Lit knew that well enough. The store in which Frenchy’s men sheltered was like a fort. And it was provisioned with food and water—and whiskey!—enough for a small army. Slim Hewes’s stock included cartridges, too—of the three or four calibers the garrison’s weapons would include.

Not all the hard cases were in the store. . . . Lit moved along the road that was here for a brief space Porto’s street, intending to cross and come up to the back of the saloon. Out of a house a shot came. The slug smashed a window that Lit was passing. He dropped flat, pushed his Winchester forward and fired as the hidden one let a second shot come his way. Two slugs, then, Lit sent into that window over there. The rifle-barrel slid back from that windowsill, with a telltale deliberateness. Lit watched grimly. No more shots came.

He got up cautiously, watching every door and window ahead of him. He stopped at the door of the house from which the shots had come. It gave to his push, creaked back and let light in upon a dirt floor. A woman’s voice lifted shrilly:

“Do not shoot! Do not shoot!” she screamed in Spanish. “My man is dead.”

Lit went in, moving like a cat, ready to fire or to jump aside. Under the window in the side wall lay the “mean freighter,” Crowe, whom he had beat to the draw in Arno. The man’s left arm was still strapped to his body, the left sleeve hanging empty. A pretty Mexican girl cowered in a corner, watching him with widened eyes.

“You need not be afraid,” Lit told her. “We have not come to fight with the people of Porto. We have come to get el francés. But those of Porto who fight with him are our enemies. Your man was one of these.”

“He was a friend of el francés,” she nodded. “He was with him in the store until midnight when he came back to his bed with me because he did not wish to sleep on the floor. His old hurt, which you gave in Arno, was not healed. He saw you pass as he looked from the window. I begged him not to shoot, but he was sure that he could kill you. Then, he said, the others would have no stomaeh for fighting. It was you, he believed, who would stay until the death of el francés was come.”

“I will put him upon a bed for you. How many are with the little devil in the store?”

“The great Teem and the little one of the loud mouth—Hognose, and a big one who walks like a bear and has but one ear. Four men I do not know came with them and with the store-keeper. Of the men here, my cousin and the brother of the storekeeper’s woman joined them. Perhaps my sister’s husband, Juan Ortiz, has come, bringing with him more men.”

“About ten, besides Frenchy,” Lit calculated. “Maybe only nine, depending on whether that one I killed when we rode in was an extra doing guard for ‘em, or one of their own . . .”

He put Crowe upon the bed in a corner and went out the back door of this house and made the saloon. As he came up to that rear door, he heard the familiar report of Chihuahua’s carbine from the blacksmith shop and, as for echo, the bellow of the Sharps buffalo gun from across the arroyo where Halliday watched.

The saloon garrison had two men hurt. But one could use his rifle at a window. They were sure that they had got one of Frenchy’s side at a window in Hewes’s. Lit told them what Crowe’s woman had said.

“We’re pretty even, now,” he shrugged. “Don’t show yourselves any more than you have to. Come dark, we’ll try a lick.”

He made a long round to get to Chihuahua’s post. He squatted beside the breed who was watching windows and door with steel-bright eyes that shuttled to and fro ceaselessly.

“Me, I’m git one,” he announced. “She’s poke his face up for them shot, then she’s duck. Nex’ time she’s poke his face up, me, I’m say Howdy! with them slug. I’m help him to git sick, por dios!”

“I count about eight in there, now. If the men in the saloon really dropped one as they claim they did. One thing’s sure, Chihuahua, they’ll be in there when we want ‘em! But it may take a long while to smoke ‘em out. And if the like of
to have made a decision:

“‘All right,’ he nodded resignedly.
“‘I reckon you got men enough to take it off me, if I never handed it over to you.’

Lit took the big can when it was filled for him. At the door, he turned slowly, to look from face to face at that quiet group.

“‘In Porto, today,’” he drawled. “I can see just two kinds of men: one kind is for me, and the other kind is against me. Is that plain to everybody?’

Slowly, they nodded. Lit grinned one-sidedly, turned and went on out. As he walked toward Cortina’s, he studied the weak point, the most exposed point, of his besieging line. That was the saloon diagonally opposite Hewes’ store.

As he reached the Cortina house, a man came to the corner of the saloon, sheltered by the side wall from Frenchy’s fire. He gestured significantly—with a sweeping motion toward the ground, a lift of two fingers. Then he indicated himself with pointing forefinger.

Lit understood, and waved the man back toward his post. He was the only one left to fight, there. The other two were gone. Frenchy was taking toll of the attackers! He would bite into them more deeply still, Lit feared, before he was smoked out of the Hewes store.

“‘Well,’” he thought, as he stepped into the Cortina door, to put the kerosene down, “it’s a price we’ll have to pay, I reckon! It’s a matter of getting through the day with as few down as we can manage. When it’s dark, I’ll try to show Frenchy a few with this coal oil!”

He came back out, after a word with his garrison in the house. They had no losses, nor serious hurts.

He went by roundabout course, to cross the street and enter the saloon from the back. The man who had signaled him was at the front window. He grinned at Lit over rifle-stock.

“Rance an’ Chucky passed in their chips. Reckon Rance went happy—he always said he wanted to die in a saloon!”

The store-keeper shrugged. He seemed CHAPTER XXII

"So We Come Foggin' It!"

OON came and Lit sent by the man with him food to Chihuahua and to Halliday. The man came back. Halliday had lost a man, killed. Chihuahua had been a little luckier. One of his men had taken a slug through the thigh and another across the scalp.

"I helped him around an' turned him over to Cortina," said the messenger. "Well—do'no' what we're doin' to him, Taylor, but Frenchy's certainly playin' the wolf with us!"

"We'll finish him!" Lit said grimly. "As soon as it's dark, I'm going to coal oil him out into the open. And if he comes out shooting, he'll go down the same way! But my idea is that he'll grab his ears. Frenchy likes a wall to fight behind. I've been up and down his tally and I never yet have found a place where he smoked it with a good man, in the open!"

"He's a tough kid," the cowboy said doubtfully. "I been in the Territory a long time. Frenchy an' Smilin' Badey, they are both plenty tough. Do'no' where I'd put my money, in a war between them two."

"Not going to be any war between 'em!" Lit told him angrily. "This war is Frenchy's last. And it's between Frenchy and us. You put your money on us and you won't have to copper."

He lowered across at the front of Hewes's store. He saw a shadow rising above the sill of a smashed window. Furtively, he shifted aim. It was a man's elbow. The head appeared. Lit squeezed trigger and with the flat, vicious report, a man jumped up, at that window. The cowboy's Winchester whanged! Lit saw dust jump out of the man's shirt with that second shot. Then the man fell across the sill, half-in, half-out, of the store.

"Know him?" Lit asked the cowboy. "Seen him around the saloons in Gurney, that's all. I reckon if we scalp him, we'll have to chop his scalp in two. We both hit him. Looky! He ain't dead! He's movin'!"

Lit pushed up the carbine, then let it down.

"They're pulling him back into the store, that's all. Listen to Halliday! They couldn't be trying to get out the back—"

He inched back, stood up an listened to the staccato blaze of firing from across the arroyo behind Hewes's place. It was answered from the store—and from somewhere along the street. . . .

"I'm going to see what's happening! That sounds like help for Frenchy. You'll have to handle this by yourself!"

He ran down the saloon and out. He ran along the backs of two houses, then up a wall to the street. He stopped there, listening, trying to locate that new point of fire. It was somewhere opposite him, at the back of the houses across the street. He had thought that Chihuahua had stopped Juan Ortiz before he had carried Frenchy's message. But there was the possibility that Ortiz had been on his way back when killed. If that were true, this might be Smiling Badey, second only to Frenchy as a gunman.

He ran across the street and between two houses. There were three rifles talking, somewhere on his right. He thought that they were in a corral forty yards behind the houses and in a line with Halliday's position. Then a noise at the street-end of the narrow tunnel in which he stood jerked his head about. A big man stood there. His pistol was lifting.

Lit dropped and heard the Colt bellow. He wriggled around the corner of the house as the man continued to shoot at him. Something seared across back and shoulder blade like a white-hot iron. Then he was around the corner and scuttling for the only shelter he saw—a hole from which had come the mud for the 'dobe bricks of this house. He rolled into it and all but turned a somersault to turn his Winchester on the pistolman.

But that worthy was sheltered by the house-corner. And now a man in the corral opened on Lit. He dropped flat in the bottom of the yard-deep hole. Lead was nipping its lips. But the thing that infuriated him was his isolation. He was completely out of the battle, held here by that cross-fire.

The firing stopped. He listened, then stiffened and began to crouch. For he heard horses coming at the pounding gallop, coming up the road from Gurney-way. He ventured to look cautiously over the edge of the hole and drew no fire. He could not yet see the horsemen, but his turning head let him catch a glimpse of that big man who had driven him out of the tunnel. The pistolman was staring around the corner of the house, staring in the direction from which came the pound of hoofs.

Lit flicked up the Winchester and fired. The man disappeared, but whether hit or merely taking shelter, Lit could not say. And three riders rocketed around a house. Lit stared, then grinned fiercely. They were the Howards, Ed, Tom and young Abe. He yelled at them—yelled his name. Then he shoved Winchester over the edge of the hole covering the corral.

He saw a rifle come out between the cottonwood logs. He fired instantly, more in the hope of disturbing that one’s aim than with any expectation of hitting him. The Howards flung themselves from their horses and from the ground opened on the corral. Lit continued to pound the cracks between the logs of that shelter. He heard the Howards yelling and drew down his empty carbine. They jumped up and began to run toward the corner of the corral. Lit looked thoughtfully over his shoulder, saw nothing of the man behind him, and scrambled out of the hole.

When he neared the corral, he saw a rider topping a ridge a hundred yards away, bending low, quiriting his horse furiously. Ed Howard turned—Tom and Abe were trotting toward the corral. He grinned at Lit:

"Smilin’ Badey," he grunted. "Totin’ off a plumb bellyful o’ fight! We-uns was out lookin’ for them Connell skunks that burned us out. Met a fella that told us yuh-all had hit for Porto on Frenchy’s trail. So we come foggin’ it!"

"And you landed like something the doctor ordered! Frenchy sent a word to Badey. I reckon he gathered up three men and came to help smoke us up. Oh! There was one in between the houses, back yonder. Three of ’em in the corral—"

"Between us, we finished two in the corral," young Abe yelled. "No wonder Smilin’ dogged it! He’s like Frenchy; he likes a gang with him an’ somethin’ to skulk behind!"

They moved cautiously toward the space between the houses. The man was gone and there was a trail of blood to mark where he had gone along the tunnel to a horse in the street. He had not stopped in Porto!

Lit went to where he could yell to Haliday. That grim gentleman answered in a bellow. He was by himself, now. One of the Badey rifles from the corral had broken his second man’s arm.

"Can you hold out by yourself?" Lit asked. "The Howards are here and one of ’em will side you."

"Send one over. He can load for me, anyhow. I’m shootin’ three guns an’ that’s hard on a fat man!"

"Tom Howard crossed the arroyo to join him when Lit called. Ed and young Abe and Lit went to the saloon. The cowboy grinned at them. He said he had not fired a shot since Lit’s going.

"Reckon they was all at the back tryin’ to see what the shootin’ was about," he shrugged. "So yuh run Badey, huh? Well, that was a good job, runnin’ him an’ wipin’ out his bunch. Reckon he only had one or two handy when the word got to him. For he usually travels with a dozen to twenty."

"Abe," said Lit, "will you slide over to the blacksmith shop and back up Chi-huahua, till dark? Ed and us two are enough here. Come dark—there’s going to be fireworks and a parade! or I miss my guess, plenty."

Abe nodded and disappeared. Ed and the cowboy and Lit watched the front of the store. Lit wondered who was left in there. Frenchy was still alive. He was pretty sure of that. For he thought that the others would surrender, if left alone. They had enough men to keep up firing on four sides. Ed Howard had his shirt ripped by a slug when he exposed himself.

"But I think I got the fella," he grunted, retiring calmly. "Looked like a Mex’. Frenchy got some Mex’ there?"

Lit told him what Crowe’s woman had said about the garrison. Ed nodded, chewing his Star.
Juan Ortiz, an' a couple o' Badey's killers, an' that fella Crowe, an' two-three hard cases out o' Gurney saloons, would be a tol'able clean-up by itself. An' we will settle some more before it's over. I wish King Connell was in Hewes's with Frenchie, though! I'd like to line my sights on him! But he'll keep out o' sight, like always, until he thinks the smoke's blewed away."

Lit looked uncomfortably at the grim, set face. He had all but forgotten the blows Connell had struck at his enemies. But they would not forget! As soon as this business here was finished, the Howards would be riding a vengeance trail against Los Alamos. He thought of Sudie-May and so vivid was the picture he called up that Ed spoke twice to him before he heard.

"Dark'll be soon," Ed said tonelessly. "An' that coal oil yuh got'll be mighty handy to make a light . . ."

He got up, stretched, leaned a little to look at the store. Lit, seeing him stiffen, moved to stare, too. But in the graying light the smashed front of Hewes's place was not clear. Then a heavy burst of firing sounded, from the rear.

"They're monkeyin' with that dam' front door!" Ed Howard grunted. "I seen it move. If they're goin' to try a break—"

The door opened flashingly. Lit, Ed Howard, the cowboy at their side, shoved Winchesters forward and poured lead into the dark opening. A big figure leaped out, made the corner in two great strides. Then lead from Halliday's position or Chihuahua's struck him and Tim Fenelon fell like a tree cut down. Lit stared frowningly. He shook his head somberly and looked at the door again. A man lay over the threshold, now.

"Frenchie's yellin' somethin'," Ed Howard called without turning. "'Ah! He wants him out o' the way, so's they can shut that door ag'in. Reckon he never counted on more'n one man over this side. The's the door. We'll burn 'em out yet, Lit."

Sullen silence gripped the street, with failure of that attempt. Lit and Ed went out and across to Cortina's. The town was like a place deserted. The houses were shuttered, doors closed. Even that store where he had got the kerosene was no longer the post of idlers. The dusk was thickening. Lit brought the kerosene out. He called to the men holding the house:

"Pound hell out of the wall, but don't put any buttonholes in my clothes! I'm going across to the corner. I'll be out of their range, there."

"Me, too," Ed Howard grunted. "I got a tin cup. Come on!"

He took one side of the can's bale and they raced across the space between house and store, covered by shooting. They squatted at the corner. At their backs, the rifles in Cortina's rattled.

From the store's windows in this wall that firing was answered. Lit looked sidelong at Ed's grim face. He laughed. This was the end of Frenchie in the Territory, he thought triumphantly. He moved the big can of kerosene. Ed gathered himself. They worked around the corner and Ed held the tin cup under the can. Lit poured it full. Ed's long arm moved. He splashed the kerosene on the heavy door, refilled the cup, splashed a window . . .

They worked fast, throwing the oil over the store front, then came back to the side wall, crawled along it in the growing dusk, treated the back wall and for climax Lit swung the can and sent it up to the flat roof to spill the remnant there. Ed at the front corner, Lit at the back, scratched matches and hurled them. Flames burst up, ran in a sheet up the end walls.

Lit yelled from shelter of Cortina's, yelling for the surrender of Frenchie's garrison. From the store defiant yells answered the demand. And firing burst out. Apparently, Frenchie's men lined every wall. But the kerosene on the roof caught, now. A pillar of smoke-edged flame shot up. And out of the store's front door, with a yell that they gave up, Hognose Ott and another man stumbled, flames licking at them as they jumped out.

THEIR hands were up. Lit yelled at them—to cross to the saloon and surrender to the men there. Out of the store came shots—into the backs of the two. Hognose Ott spun around with a strangled cry, fell flat. The man with him—a stranger to Lit—put his head down as if facing wind, began to run. Then his knees wobbled. He fell headfirst and clawed at the ground. Defiantly, the shooting continued in the store.

Lit grunted to Ed Howard, watching with Winchester ready for the dash that Frenchy and the others must make:

"He’s a cold-blooded little devil. But he'll have to come out—to surrender or die—or stay in there and burn to death!"

"Who, yuh reckon, is still in th’?"

"Could be Bisbee, and Frenchy, and Hewes—maybe a couple more. Frenchy!" he yelled, against the crackle of the flames at roof and front. "Better come out—and have the rope fitted!"

The firing inside swelled to a very thunder. Lit scowled. More men were in there—must be in there!—than he had believed possible. That terrific burst of firing proved it.

There was a rumbling crash. Someone, somewhere, yelled that the roof had fallen in. Then Lit, watching from the front of Cortina’s, saw two men, carrying a third between them, lurch from the store. They put down the limp one they carried, in the street. Their hands lifted.

"Come on over!" Lit yelled, watching the door. For these were unimportant privates of Frenchy’s force—a Mexican, a hard-ease cowboy. Unless that one on the ground were the little outlaw... He called to them as they bent and picked up the wounded man again. The cowboy answered:

"Side-pardner o’ mine. Shot through both hips."

In the Cortina house the cowboy grinned defiantly at Lit.

"Well, sir! I reckon y’ win—but we gathered a few tail feathers off y’ bunch! An’ we certainly—"

Lit was in no humor for polite compliments, between victor and vanquished. His dark eyes were very narrow as he rambled his face across and stooped a little to face the cowboy very closely.

"Ne’ mind the talk! You can gabble after while! Where is Frenchy? And Bisbee? And Slim Hewes? Talk up, you!"

"In Hell, I reckon," the cowboy said sulkily. "Y’ don’t need to be so dam’ fierce about it! I seen ’em at the back windows. They was bettin’ on which one’d kill Halliday across the arroyo. Then the roof come down. Looked like ever’ dam’ thing in the store blazed up when it fell. It shut Frenchy an’ Slim an’ Bisbee off from me an’ that Mex’ that was the only ones left in the front. So we picked up my pardner an’ got out. That’s all I know about it. If Frenchy an’ the others never come out the back door, they’re fried to a frizzle!"

Lit went out and to the corner of the Cortina house, looked at the blackened dobe walls that held the flames of the wooden part of Hewes’s store as a furnace might hold charcoal. He went down the side wall of Cortina’s house, with arm up to shield his face from the terrific heat that came from the store. At the back, he looked at the inferno seething inside, visible through back door, back windows. He shook dark head grimly.

"If they were not dead when the roof fell, they are certainly dead now! Halliday!" he lifted his voice. "Halliday!"

"Comin’ up!" the store-keeper answered from the arroyo. "Chihuahua’s comin’ from the blacksmith shop, too. What happened—to them inside?"

"We have got one floating cowboy, one Mexican from Porto, here, and another cowboy shot through the hips."

BRIEFLY, he told Halliday of Tim Fenelon’s death, and of Frenchy’s murder of Hognose Culp and that other, nameless man. Halliday nodded, looking at the fire in the store.

"Then that’s that! We was coverin’ the back door. Nobody got out, I’ll swear to that. Won’t you, Tom?"

Tom Howard spat and nodded, staring at the flames.

"Frenchy an’ them others got a foretaste o’ hell-fire!" he contributed.

"Many o’ the posse cash in?"

"Four," said Lit. "And four hurt more or less. I reckon our play is to bury the ones who cashed in and see about the ones that are hurt. Probably, it’ll be better to leave them here until they’re able to ride. Cortina’ll take care of ’em—with Frenchy gone and Smiling Bady out of the running..."

He left Halliday and Chihuahua, who had come around from the blacksmith shop with young Abe Howard and the other of his party, moving about. He walked draggingly, staring moodily at what lay ahead of him without consciously seeing anything.

It was not that his iron body was weary. The long day had not brought anything to touch an ordinary day of riding and working on the range, and any cowboy was able to "do his sleeping in the winter-time." But the strain of past weeks had seemed to come to a final tension here. All the hatred he had held for Frenchy had blazed up. All the watchfulness he had been forced to practice, to try to beat the little outlaw once and for all had been increased, here. Now—the strain was slack-ed.

He had done what he had intended, promised, to do. He had come into the Territory the rawest of youngsters. He saw that now, looking back as over years upon himself as he had been when riding over from the Diamond. He felt terribly mature. And yet, that was not all that dragged upon him, slouched his big shoulders.

"There's King Connell yet to settle with," he thought. "That's not like bucking Frenchy, of course. But with Smoky out of it, I'll be the one to make Connell knuckle under and settle up for the damage he's done the little fellows. And, of course, he's still owing the Bar-B for those strays! When I've done that, I'll turn over my star to somebody and"

That was the trouble! He would turn his back on the Territory and all it held. He would ride back to the Diamond to take up the regular round of work. Some day, he would own the Bar-B. For he knew that old Barbee thought of him as son and heir. But there was no attraction in that prospect.

Standing in the shadows by a house, watching dark, soft-footed people go by furtively as Porto's folk came from barred and shuttered houses with the battle's end, he thought of Sudie-May and because of the distance between them, his picture was paradoxically clearer . . .

The picture that came was of that moment on the trail, when he had shown her the little plush-covered box with its wedding ring—that hung now in buckskin sack from cord about his neck . . .

He could all but feel the pliant body in the circle of his arm, pressing close against him, the soft warmth of parted mouth lifted, clinging to his, could see again the pulse hammering in smooth temple and the quick rise and fall of round young breasts.

"Dios!" he breathed huskily, and shook his head fiercely, as if that would rid him of the pictures before inner eye, the dryness of his mouth. "I lost her—that day! When I had to choose between being a lover or a man . . . ."

"Lit!" Chihuahua said softly from his very elbow. "You're better come with me. We're not finish Frenchy—yet!"

Slowly, almost stupidly, Lit dragged himself back across the space between the place of his remembering and Porto, here, with its bullet-riddled doors and windows, its patches of red dust, its still figures.

"Not finished—Frenchy—yet? What do you mean?"

"Three men's slip from them store. Under them wall, into one acequía. Sh! She's make them tunnel to them ditch. She's crawl by them ditch w'ile Halliday, she's watch for them door. Pues, me, I'm find one fi-me trail through them arroyo, to w'ere she's git horses . . . She's ride off like the hell!"

---

CHAPTER XXIII

"WILL HE HEAD FOR CONNELL'S?"

Lit had no interest in the trail that Chihuahua had found. If Chihuahua had cut the trace of three men leaving the store by a tunnel under the wall, crawling down Hewes's water ditch to the arroyo and going along that dry water course to the place where horses were stabled, that was enough.

He ran beside the brecc, back to where Halliday and others were making ready to bury the dead in Porto's little Boot Hill. He told the grim store-keeper what they knew must be the truth—that the three most dangerous men in Hewes's place had escaped. Halliday swore furiously. Lit checked him.

"We'll get 'em!" he said impatiently.

"Now—here's the way I see it: Chihuhua, Ed Howard—if you'll go, Ed—and I am enough to handle 'em. And we can go faster. We're all on good horses. You take charge, here, Halliday. Come back to Gurney when you're ready. If we lose their trail, we'll make up a posse, or a series of posses, in Gurney. For the little son of a dog's hit back for the Territory. Probably feels safer there. More people to help cover him. Come on, Chihuahua, Ed!"

They got their horses saddled, rammed food into saddle pockets, swung up. Chihuahua had followed the trail of the three for distance enough to show that Frenchy had led the way back along the trail he had used, coming to Porto.

As they followed, at a steady lope, Lit thought grimly of Frenchy—and thought straight, as well. He considered all that he knew of that little egotist, and the people—Mexicans, Anglos, of the Territory.

Frenchy would regard this terrific beating he had taken, in Porto, as no more than a temporary check. You couldn't make him understand that he had been bested. So, he would ride back into the land that knew him. And cowboys, shepherders, ranchers and Mexican farmers, all would feed him, give him horses and weapons and ammunition under more or less compulsion, even lie to officers about his whereabouts.

There were fifty places where he could take cover. Girls of the peon class considered it an honor to lie in his arms. They would influence the men of their families to aid him. So, what seemed a foolish turnabout, when ahead lay the wilderness between Porto and the Diamond, became the logical turnabout.

"Will he head for Connell's?" Lit asked Chihuahua abruptly. "'At first, I mean?'"

"Me, I'm not have one big surprise, if she's do t ha't," Chihuahua nodded. "King, she's owe Frenchy money. An' she's scared for Frenchy, too. Por supuesto! She's one fine place for Frenchy an' them other, Los Alamos."

During the night they halted occasionally, to let Chihuahua get down and scratch matches and inspect the trail. Always, the hoofprints pointed to the south, the tracks of three horses. Steadily and fast the trio rode, by testimony of the trail. Lit grinned one-sidedly. Frenchy would expect him to believe what for a time he had believed—that the blazing roof had buried them, the flaming store been their funeral pyre.

"Is he due for a surprise?" he thought and his shoulders shook gently as he laughed.

With day they found a 'dobe house off the trail a little way. The trail of the fugitives led up to it. But the Mexican girl who was its only occupant now faced them defiantly. She would say nothing of Frenchy. Lit laughed and put hand under her chin. She clawed at him like an angry cat.

"Do not touch me! I know you! The man who tricked el francés and like a coward threw him into the jail at Gurney. Keep your hands from me. I have lain in his arms. Such as you—"

She spat eloquently. Lit grinned at her.

"When I have killed him, you may come to see him. You will find there—if they care to come—twenty others, to whom he said what he said to you."

They ate the food unwillingly given them by her. The horses rested with cinchas loosened. For an hour, they loasted before the store and smoked and talked disjointedly. Then Lit got up, scratched Nigger Toe's nose and tightened latigos.

"Good-bye, Beautiful!" he grinned at the girl. "When I have killed Frenchy, I will send you a Man!"

Hijo de la perra! she screamed at him. "El francés will give me your hair for a braided chain!"

"What he does to the women!" Lit told Chihuahua with helpless grin. Then thought of another woman, who had once taken Frenchy's part, sobered him. He could not believe that Frenchy's fascination, that so affected the like of that savage girl back there, would also affect Sudie-May. But no more than vague connection between the two was sufficient to make him lower at the trail ahead and answer with sullen grunts the occasional remark of Ed Howard and Chihuahua.

Near noon, the trail vanished in a welter of rocky ridges and shallow arroyos. And Ed Howard's horse went lame in the sharp thorns of bayonet weed. Chihuahhua cast about like a great hound, but finally acknowledged defeat with a shrug.

"We'll forget his trail," Lit decided.

"We'll cut across to Los Alamos. You come along, Ed, as fast as you can. If he didn't head straight for Connell's, we'll have to hunt for his hole-up."

He and Chihuhua left Ed and the lame horse and went at steady hard trot across the open range. The afternoon passed. Dusk came, and darkness. And, looking down from a hogback at last, they saw below them the yellow squares that were lighted windows in the casa principal of Los Alamos.

Staring at the lights, Lit found the prospect of seeing Sudie-May within a few minutes disturbing, yet oddly pleasant. He shrank from it, yet he would not have turned away, he knew, for anything.

They went quietly for a half-mile, then swung off the horses in a little motte of cottonwood trees near the main acequia that brought water to the house-yard. They scouted the corrals afoot but could not locate horses that were surely those of the three they hunted.

From the low houses of laborers and vaqueros, there came the murmur of voices, with the jangle of guitars. From the great house of King Connell no sounds came. Chihuhua thought that the outlaws would hardly be in the casa grande. He went scouting the bunkhouse and the rows of 'dobs. He came back to where Lit moved around the great bulk of the house. Neither sign nor word of Frenchy had there been, among the riders getting ready for sleep down there.

"Let's see if King's home, then," said Lit.

They went noiselessly up to look at a high-set barred window in the house-wall. As they stared up at it, listening to the faint mutter of voices within, suddenly there came to them out of the window a rasping, high-pitched, cackle of laughter. Lit stiffened and glared furiously upward.

"Bisbee!" he breathed, turning. But Chihuhua had vanished without a sound.

Lit looked around for him, decided that he was moving on his own account, and went down the wall toward the entrance of the patio around which the big house was built. He could have made no mistake—he had heard that queer laugh of Bisbee's several times, in Tom's Bluff. And if Bisbee were here, so were Frenchy and Slim Hewes. Doubtless, they were talking with King Connell inside.

He went into the patio entrance and noiselessly across the tiled pavement of this tunnel-like passage. Chihuhua would be somewhere near at the needed moment. And Lit felt that now, in cover of night, was the proper time to surprise Frenchy. In daylight, with all Los Alamos hostile to him, taking the little killer unaware was all but impossible.

He went soundlessly out under the roof that encircled the patio, under which doors opened to many rooms. He worked around in the darkness, listening, looking for light under doors, trying to locate that room out of which Bisbee's spine-rasping cackle had come.

He heard a shuffle of feet somewhere ahead. There was a door half-open, almost at his elbow. Lit stepped into that black opening. The feet came closer, paused at the door. Lit shrank farther inside and flattened himself against the wall there. Probably, that was some servant going through the patio.

THEN the doorway was blocked by a body. A grim voice spoke, in a low voice:

"Who's that in there? Answer up, or—"

Lit had not drawn his pistol. He did not take time, now, to try covering Slim Hewes. For without doubt the tall storekeeper was menacing the room with Colt-muzzle.

Lit struck out and his fist caught Hewes. There was the metallic rattle of pistol dropping to tiles. Then the storekeeper's long arms came out, caught Lit's shoulder. The grip was like nothing he had ever met, before. He had always known that Slim Hewes was credited with enormous strength. But he had considered himself a match for anyone he might meet. Now—he had to wonder.

He whipped up a clawing hand, caught Hewes's arm and jerked. Hewes staggered into the room. There was the slam of the door—as if he had caught it and pulled it shut. They were in total darkness, darkness so thick that to Lit it seemed something to feel, like a heavy black blanket that shrouded them.

Not in the least had the gaunt storekeeper relaxed vise-like grip on Lit’s shoulder. As they staggered across the room, each holding the other, Lit lashing out furiously with left fist, Hewes’s fumbling hand caught Lit’s left arm above the elbow. He fell against Lit, who instantly banged the top of hard head into the storekeeper’s chin and was rewarded by a pained grunt.

But Hewes lunged backward, then forward. They crashed to the tiled floor with Lit underneath and he saved himself from stunning impact only by jerking head forward, upward, so that his shoulders met the tiles.

Surge as he might, he could not get out from underneath. Hewes was like an anaconda, curling long legs about Lit’s legs, bracing elbows out and down. Lit jerked head forward and banged Hewes in the face again. But release of his left arm, the convulsive twitch of the storekeeper’s hand beltedward, warned him that Hewes was trying for a weapon with which to end the struggle. Hewes had dropped his pistol. It must be a knife—and Lit had the average man’s cold dread of slicing steel.

He was tired, gasping from the strain of the tug-of-war with the gigantic storekeeper. But if Hewes got a knife out, he had no chance of escaping injury that would leave him helpless to buck Frenchy, if not dead.

He hooked out savagely, felt fist impact upon flesh, then rolled desperately and dislodged Hewes from above him. He came to his knees—Lit—then lunged at the invisible bulk of the storekeeper. His hand struck Hewes’s hand. He caught the wrist, twisted it, bore the hand down. Hewes groaned softly. Lying flat upon Hewes, Lit heard an odd bubbling sound that seemed to be Hewes’s breathing . . .

He dared not get up, slack the hold that he had snatched on the wrist and on Hewes’s other arm. Then something sticky seeped upon the left hand that pressed against Hewes’s chest. He drew in air in great gasps, wondering. Cautionously, he gathered himself, let go his grip on Hewes and slid backward, fumbling for Colt-grip as he moved. There was no sound except that bubbling noise and it was dying away.

Pointing the pistol at the sound, he fumbled in his pockets until he found a match. He struck it and stared tensely as he leaned forward. Hewes’s hand had fallen away from the hilt of the bowie knife that was buried to the guard in his breast. Lit got shakily to his feet and moved over to look more closely. Hewes was dead.

“Por dios!” Lit thought wonderingly. “If ever you’d got hold of Frenchy, he wouldn’t have been kingpin for long!”

CHAPTER XXIV

“—why, He’s Faster ‘n Me!”

LISTENING at the door, Lit could hear no sound from the patio to indicate that the battle had been heard outside this room. That was hardly surprising in this house of yard-thick walls of plastered mud brick. He reholstered his pistol and worked stiffened arms reflectively before he ventured to open the door cautiously and put face into the crack.

The patio was dark and silent. But across it, glimpsed between flowers and shrubs that surrounded a fountain in its center, he saw now a yellow thread of light under a door. He stared that way and nodded slightly. That should be the room from which Bisbee’s spine-rasping cackle had sounded. He slipped outside and went across the patio, straight for that door.

Coming to it, he heard a mutter of voices. He thought that King’s was one of them. He put ear against the heavy oak, but still the voices were only a murmur. Then King Connell’s booming voice lifted, plain enough to be understood as to words:

“No! Ye want too much. Ye’re unreasonable, my lad. If ye want a couple hundreds, I’ll advance that much. Not because I’m owing ye a cent, mind! But for ould times’ sake and, it may be, because of favors ye can be doing me in times to come. But when ye come talking thousands—ye have got your sights too lifted! Talk sense and—remember ye’re talking to King Connell!"

Very softly, Lit fumbled with the hand-made iron latch and pushed on the door. Frenchy’s voice came to him, with the door’s opening. Light of tone, careless, still it held a sinister note, Lit thought.

"I’m not forgettin’ a thing, King. Not a—thing. Most of all, I ain’t forgettin’ who’s doin’ the talkin’.’"

Lit slid inside. It was a sort of office, this room, lighted by one lamp hanging from the ceiling, corners enshadowed. There was a huge iron-banded oaken desk of size to fit King Connell, who loafed behind it. Sudie-May perched upon a corner of its flat top near her father. She was staring at Frenchy, who half-sat, half-leaned, upon the arm of a huge chair, a shabby, dirty figure with the soil of Porto-fighting still marking him.

Nobody seemed to hear the door as it opened and closed behind Lit. There was tension in this group. Lit found it in the King’s red face, in Sudie-May’s bearing, even in Frenchy, who had a surface lightness of manner. Bisbee sat in the deep embrasure of the window, leaning against the iron bars, head a little back, eyes closed. Lit flattened himself against the wall. Somehow, he felt oddly very much at ease. Frenchy’s side-face was toward him, but Frenchy was grinning at Connell, apparently gripped by his own thoughts to the exclusion of everything else.

"A couple thousands, King," he said easily. "Or—say, three thousands. Call it a—weddin’ present . . ."

"What are ye talkin’ about?" King Connell boomed at him. But Lit, watching from the shadows by the door the red face plain under a hanging oil lamp, saw a sudden twinkle of perspiration on Connell’s forehead, cheeks. Sudie-May stiffened, turned a little, stared at Frenchy. "About us!" Frenchy cried, laughing. "Take it easy, King. You know, it’s right funny! King Connell, Big Auger o’ the Territory, settin’ in his casa grande with fifty men o’ his outside . . . An’ me, I’m the Big Auger! I tell him what to do an’ I back it up with one finger—an’ King Connell does it . . ."

"Ye talk like a damned fool!" King Connell said, but there was uneasiness plain in his voice. "Ye get into trouble and ye come to Los Alamos. Ye ask help and yet——"

"I ain’t askin’ help from nobody! I dam’ well take what I want. Nobody’s stopped me yet, neither! Money or horses or cows or women—Frenchy Leonard takes his pick! I never come here for help. I come here to collect some money you been owin’ me plenty long. An’ while I’m here, I’m takin’ the gal I been aimin’ to take all along."

Bisbee suddenly moved a little in the window and the slight movement seemed to catch Frenchy’s eyes. He looked that way and laughed. Lit watched them as if they were figures in a play. Most of all he stared somberly at the slim girl in frilly négligée who sat with legs twisted sideways, the cameo-clear profile lighted by the lamp’s glow.

"Hey, Bisbee?" Frenchy cried. "I been aimin’ to take her a long time, ain’t I? An’ you never said a word to me, about havin’ the same notion—but lackin’ the guts to back it up. You see, King, Bisbee wanted to make a play for Sudie-May, ever since that time he worked for you. But he was scared o’ you. When he found out I was comin’ here, he thought that was fine. I’d get her, then he’d find a chance to put one in my back. That’d leave him with her! But it won’t work, Bisbee! It—won’t work!"

"You’re crazy!" Bisbee said from the window. "I ain’t figurin’ on no such thing!"

"No? The hell you say! But—ne’ mind! It won’t work!"

He moved a step nearer the desk, coming straight with catlike twist. He seemed to be watching the huge figure of King Connell as he stopped before the moveless girl. Lit stiffened, as Sudie-May had stiffened. He felt a pulse hammering in his throat. He swallowed as he saw the quick rise and fall of her breasts, under the silk of the négligée.

"It’s Old Mexico for us, hon’!" Frenchy told her. "With a few head o’ pa’s cows to blow in down there! We’ll leave that purty boy-deputy o’ yours to find out I never got burned to death in Porto—an’ to look at you in that locket . . . Me, I’ll have lots better than a picture, hon’. I—"
"I wouldn't touch you—except with a quirt!" the girl said huskily. "And before I'd let you touch me—"

"Be still, King!" Frenchy snarled, as the huge Connell began to prop himself up behind the desk, red face twisting furiously. "You make a move an' I'll cut you in two!"

He looked sidelong at Sudie-May. And his face was reddened, Lit saw curiously. "Wouldn't touch me, huh?" he said very softly to her. "You will change your mind about that. You'll come along—an' willin'—if you know what's good for King! An' after a while, when I'm through with you—"

"That'll be all!" Lit said in flat voice. "Plenty!"

There was the heavy creaking of Connell's chair, the rustle as Bisbee shifted position in the window, the scuff of Frenchy's heel on the polished oak floor. But to Lit Sudie-May's gasp as she whirled on the desk and leaned to stare incredulously was loudest sound of them all. He moved a step toward Frenchy who stood staring, amber-flecked eyes narrow, shoulders drooping a little, right hand crooked of fingers like a claw.

"I didn't think you were burned to death in the store—not for long," Lit said evenly. "Knowing you by your back-trail, it was easy to see how you'd left the others to save their own skins, while—as usual—you sneaked off. I watched you at the stone house on Hell Creek, you know—when you let Art Brand be killed because you were afraid to open the door for him. Yeh, I know you from the back, Frenchy—and I don't know a thing about you that's straight, or white!"

"Well!" Frenchy cried, grinning. "The Boy-Deputy! Actually figured somethin' out for hisself, yes, sir! An' now he comes wanderin' up, just in time to say good-bye to me an' my gal an' see us off. Or, maybe, he come up for a lesson: come to see a li'l' draw I do!"

His shoulders slouched a little more. He shook his head in jerky motion to right and left, to clear the amber-flecked eyes of the lank black locks hanging down his forehead.

"It goes like—this!" Frenchy cried. "Tell Old Devil!"

Lit heard the thin sound of Sudie-May's scream. Out of eye-corner he glimpsed King Connell, rising, scooping Sudie-May to him across the great desk, dropping her in its shelter. But that was seen almost unconsciously. For Frenchy was drawing the deadly Colt with which he was supposed to have no equal. And Lit was focussed on the task of matching that draw, even besting it . . .

He ignored the flash of Frenchy's hand to gun-butt that—he knew from watching the outlaws shoot in Tom's Bluff—was like nothing in the world except the dart of a striking snake's head. He was going through the movements of the draw with all the smooth, mechanically swift twitch perfected during hour after weary hour of daily practice.

He did not think of Frenchy beating him, Frenchy killing him with gun undrawn. His hand slapped the smooth butt of his Colt, his thumb-joint drew back the hammer and the gun slid from tied-down holster, leveled on Frenchy, roared and belched flame as the hammer dropped.

Almost blending with the report was the bellow of Frenchy's gun. A tiny hand seemed to pluck at the sleeve of his shirt. He thumbed back the hammer, fired again, saw Frenchy spin about, come down to one knee and prop himself with gun-hand on the floor.

"Why—why, he's faster'n me!" Frenchy gasped amazedly.

Lit twitched smoking Colt up and covered Bisbee. It seemed to him that he had seen the green-eyed man drop hand to gun, while he and Frenchy were slapping the leather. But now Bisbee came sagging from the embrasure, to collapse upon the floor. Lit stared, but King Connell stood up, behind his desk, with Sudie-May's limp body across a thick arm.

"Le' me be getting her outside!" Connell panted. "Praise God! She fainted when his hand slapped his pistol!"

He ran across the room, jerked open the door, and vanished outside. Lit stared grimly down at the still bodies on the floor. The door was pushed back, Chihuahua slipped in, pistol in left hand, bloody knife in right. He stared at Bisbee, crossed to him like a stalking cat.
“It was you!” Lit grunted, with a glance at the window.

“Por supuesto? W’en I’m hear him laugh, w’en we’re outside, then I’m know! I’m know! In all these world, Lit, she’s only one fellu w’at’s laugh like that . . . Pablo, them boy w’at’s work for me, she’s always make them same noise like everything she’s hear—dog, cat, man! Before Pablo, she’s die, she’s show me how them man w’at’s kill my mother, sister, laugh. She’s show me many time before she’s die. Tonight, w’en I hear him, I’m find me one ladder. I’m kill him with my knife, through them bars.”

He put out sinewy brown hand, lifted the long hair that hid Bisbee’s gotched ear.

“Pablo, she’s tell me that, too! Amor de dios! In them saloon in Gurney, me, I’m stand before him, an’ not know! W’at’s the hell!”

“I want to see Connell,” Lit grunted suddenly, bringing himself back to thought of his own problems.

He went out into the patio. On his left an open door was a yellow square in the house wall. As he looked that way, a woman passed the door, crossing that room. There were servants in the patio, now. Evidently, the shots had roused the place. Lit went around the patio and stopped in the doorway. Connell was down on his knees before a great couch on which Sudie-May was stretched. A Mexican woman stood by her, holding a glass of water. Lit stepped into the room and called Connell’s name.

“Don’t be bothering me now,” King Connell grunted, without turning. “She fainted at the very first. I think she’s taken no harm. But——”

Lit came unwillingly over to tap his shoulder imperatively.

“I have to talk to you, Connell!” he said grimly. “Right away. Before we leave. I’m acting sheriff of the county— as you know. As Frenchy may have told you, my posse just about wiped out the worst cutthroats of the Territory. But there’s a thing or two left to settle—what you owe the Bar-B for the stuff Frenchy rustled and you bought from him. And you’re going to pay up for the damage you did to the Howards and all the others! I’ll take your word for it. Pass your word and I’ll be on my way. Refuse and—by God! I’ll take you out of this through all your hard-ease cowboys. I’ll slam you in Gurney jail and you won’t break out! Law’s come west of the Rowdy today!”

Men were crowding around the door, outside. But Chihuahua, he saw with a side glance, was inside, watching them. He lifted his voice a little—Lit:

“I’ll be running this county for a while, Smoky being laid up. Tomorrow, I’m going to gather in that cousin-foreman of yours who was so thick with Frenchy. I can put enough charges against Jed Connell to pack him away for a few years, too! I’m going to round up every last one that sided with Frenchy!”

Inwardly, he grinned. For Jed Connell’s face had vanished from those about the door. Lit rather fancied that the Territory would not be troubled long with Jed’s presence.

Connell got lumberingly to his feet. He looked steadily at Lit for a long moment. Then he grinned and put out his huge hand. Lit ignored it, but met his eyes grimly.

“My son! I owe ye plenty!” Connell said huskily. “That little devil meant every word he said—but one! And that one was about leavin’ me alive. But it’s not my own neck I’m thanking ye for. I’ve lived hard and in nature I’ve tramped plenty of toes to climb to where I am—and stick in the saddle. It’s for——”

“Don’t thank me!” Lit said flatly. “I came to get Frenchy. I got him. It—just happened that I landed in the room at a time when getting him helped you. I don’t want your thanks. I want your word that you’ll settle for the damage you’ve done, when I tell you how much it is.”

“You’d better—give in,” a low voice counseled the King, from the couch behind him. “I—know Mr. Taylor. He’s a stubborn man . . . He means every word he says and—I have to agree with him that you owe for a lot of things. I’ve been watching a good deal. I’ve roped cows on the range and puzzled out the original brands. Give him your word to foot the bill.”

“All right!” Connell said with a shrug of great shoulders. “I’ll pay
S UDDENLY, calmness vanished, that almost mannish calm she had held. She looked up at him with little head tilted, caught his shirt-sleeve, shook it gently. She leaned to him and tilted face farther back. There was nothing mannish about her, now! She was utterly feminine in that clinging négligée. "Do you want me? Still want me?" "You said—" he began thickly. "And you said—" she stopped him. "So we’re even. You haven’t told me, though, what I asked you. Do you—want me?"

Lit turned, caught her, and silk ripped under hard hand. He held her close against him, found her mouth coming up to meet his as upon the trail—but with no drawing back at all, now. So, for breathless minutes.

A discreet knock sounded upon the door. Lit lifted his head. In angry voice Sudie-May addressed the knocking one: "Go away!"

Minutes later, the knocking sounded again. She lifted her head from his shoulder, smiled at him, straightened, looked at the wide sleeve of the négligée. "If my father sees this and reacts traditionally, young man, you know what he’ll do? He’ll make you marry me!"

"Let’s show him, then," Lit grinned. "He wants to offer you the management of Los Alamos. He and the Governor are going to write a book on The Horse. He thinks it’s a big secret. But I have heard him talk about you—and swear at you . . . I knew what was in his transparent mind. Let’s set him in!"

She called and King stomped in. He looked up at the ceiling, cleared his throat:

"It’s like this, Lit," he began, then stared as Sudie-May laughed. "Ye little divil! Ye told him—though how ye knew—"

"I’ll run things my way!" Lit warned him. "Letting the little fellows live in peace, having Los Alamos men and money undo the damage you’ve done!"

"It’s a free hand I’m givin’ ye!" Connell grinned. "I’ll take the rest I’m due. Uh—you need me for anything else?"

He grinned at the double-headshake and went out.
Tip" MELLON was a peaceable lad in the Red Claybank country. His mother was a widow, left because one of the Hatton gang shot her husband on a timber-snatching day in the pines. Tip, harking back, could just remember the funeral, how deadly quiet and hot that summer day had been. Then followed years on years of toil, of corn and bacon, of berries eking out the worm-eaten vegetables and of traps set for wild meats and a few furs.

School kept three months or so in the winter out there in the wilds of the southern Ozarks. Tip went, sitting at his books with his eyes eating into the words, learning them, while around him throbbed the antagonisms, the hatreds, the suspicions which many young chaps had inherited from their nerve-wracked, hard-pressed and even desperate parents.

Hattons were there, seven or eight of the killing brood. They watched Tip Mellon to discover the sign of his awakening to the memory of the bushwhack when Rank Hatton let go the fourteen slugs which wilted the young manhood of a good worker, who hated moonshine, believed in honest labor, and who had cleaned seven of the scoundrels with a wagon spoke in a fair fight on the day they tried to bluff him into voting for a mean sheriff and a trickster county clerk. The slugs hit the brave man in the back, of course.

Would Tip Mellon remember? Would he seek revenge? No one knew. The widow said nothing outside. Minding her own business, she kept her son studying. He slicked out of schoolboy fights, no one ever succeeded in cornering him into a rocking, clubbing or fisticuff. He seemed timid. His mother, trembling for him, urged him never to stand up to any one. Instead, she pleaded with him to keep out of trouble, to edge around the rough going of bad feelings and the tormentings when boys plague boys.

Tip grew up strong, shooting erect and fine. He was right handy with an ax and chain dog, and when riding for cattle drovers in the pines, picking feeders up for the buyers, Tip was right smart and good. He handled a rope so cleverly that a drover from over in Oklahoma took him on. Mrs. Mellon, her voice shaking with gratitude, begged her son to go. The old Hatton crowd, the youngsters growing up, were rough and mean, bad as their parents had been. As children, their tauntings, plaguings and running together meant nothing much. Nobody would mind a widow’s son while he was a boy. But when a father has killed a neighbor, then the son of the murderer sticks to follow up the meanness in the next generation.

Tip Mellon rode away with four hundred head of the shrunked pine country cattle. He rode well, proved a good road herder, and emerged into the big pasture country where the Saw-Horse outfit was a lively crowd to work with. They were a pretty wild bunch of cowboys, with two of bad Indian blood and a scouter among them. They could ride anything, played rough as they worked and tried to lay a welt or two on Tip Mellon who slipped from under.

The horse-play didn’t quite connect up with the boy. He evaded the thousand things cowboys know how to do when they think it is fun to make somebody uncomfortable, try to ride a weaker man, or look for trouble with somebody they think they can whip.

The boss was a tempery old boy who liked the pine country kid. He called any one he saw trying to abuse the youngster. That of course made it a bit worse for Tip when the riders had him out alone. They slicked his saddle, trimmed the tail of his pet horse, and tried to work burrs into his shirt. But a boy who had been tormented all his life by Red Clay country kids didn’t have much new to learn, and when ‘Two Blade,’” one of the breeds, playfully sought to throw Tip under the hoofs of a racing bunch of cattle, the boy went down, but up so quickly that he rode clear.

Two Blade was less fortunate. He had crowded the boy, tangling the lad’s whirling rope to throw him. In going down, the boy greased under, and Two Blade’s horse was tripped, the breed thrown headlong, and when the doctors were through with him he made a pretty poor wagon cook, having been cut to pieces as he had intended the boy should be.

TWO BLADE had friends. The game of trying to cripple the youngster was no longer playful. They wanted to kill him for escaping the fate prepared for him, leaving the scoundrel to take the bitter medicine. The boss saw how matters were. The lad couldn’t hold his own against the crowd. The only thing to do was let him go before they gave him the raw deal which is such sport when it doesn’t snap back like a rawhide rope that breaks.

“You see how ’tis, boy,” the man said, paying him off. “They’ll get you ’count of the way you manhandled the bully.”

“Yes, sir,” the boy nodded, and rode away with his horse and pony, carrying the rather large outfit he had laid up, now that he was a wage earner.

He headed south into Texas. He was haunted by the realization of the way he had been protected. His mother shielded him, then his boss took his part. The habit of being slicked through hard places was on him. He felt the ease with which he had ducked trouble all his life. A certain emotion of pride coupled with his hidden self-confidence. He rode into the great Birdhead Brand domain. He swung down to ask at the ranch if they would take him on. A look at his lithe figure, the squaring of his shoulders, and the mean eye of his horse revealed him as a rider, all right. He was welcome, with a bunk and table place.

As he went in to eat that night, he saw one man who wore a gun, who was given the right of way by all the others, and who sat at the right hand of the foreman. Tip Mellon wondered at the different aspect of this man from all the others. He asked under his breath of the boy on his own right.

"'He's a Ranger,'" the boy answered.

A Texas Ranger! Talk ran and rippled along the table to the accompaniment of dish-clatter and foody sounds. Afterward, the Ranger sat with some of the boys on a bench and listened. Now and again he said something, and he did tell a good story about a place down in the salt-grass country. At the same time he seemed a silent center around which all the talk and gesturing took its interest.

Mellon thought perhaps the fact that the man wore a revolver meant the difference. Then he noticed the subtleties of bearing, the minimum of motion, yielding the maximum of results. This was it!

Ranger Jack Reese shook a bag of tobacco and twisted his fingers over a paper. He had a cigarette in one-quarter the time it took any other man in the camp to make a smoke. When it was time to turn in, the Ranger stepped out of his chaps, belt, shirt, and was in his blankets while some of the boys were still wrestling with their boots. And the policeman of the mesquite wilderness was dressed while yet the echo of the wake-up call was in the air.

Then after breakfast Tip saw the Ranger toss a beautiful saddle on to a horse whose proud bearing was unmistakable, float up and dart away with one motion while the crew looked on. And Tip, himself a fast, easy worker, tried to short-cut into the day's work as the Ranger had done. All his life Tip had been taking care of himself. Now he rode out with a side-kick who talked Ranger tales.

The hero riders of Texas were these boys who showed the cattle country how to ride, how to do their duty, how to stand up and take it. If a Ranger ventured to put on a tiniest of airs, his fellows would see to that. The ranger must always be last in the crowd, least in the show places, keeping out of the center of things till needs must come the answer to the call of duty.

Tip Mellon heard of men who always played the game straight and fair. Often they rode alone, and two or three went unto tough country to clean up where sheriff posses by the score had failed to make results. The boy who had been persuaded out of the Red Claybanks for fear of trouble to him heard of a few score men whose job it was to go make peace when fighting or bullying or thieving or raiding or any kind of rough-house meanness was going on.

In the face of what he learned about the Rangers, Tip Mellon flinched in his soul. He was mighty good with rope, rode about the worst of the horses and handled cattle with the best of them. But in the contacts with men he was ornery. He felt the contempt of his fellow workers as they maneuvered him around, letting him show his stuff as a cowboy but giving him every chance in the world to duck, slip through and evade the chance of standing up to bully or joker.

A GOOD man. What ailed him? How different he was from the man of a year or two greater age than himself whose every motion was watched by the boys, yet who said so little, was so gentle and polite, and fairly shrank from having himself go in ahead of the others. Mellon was quick enough in his wit. No one of slow mind could possibly have escaped trouble so often as he did. "Big Hank Houson," the Birdhead outfit bully, tried time and again to corner the slender youngster only to find the boy had somehow slipped from under, ducked around the corner or just vanished in the mesquite. Tip never faced the issue squarely. He looked afraid.

One day Tip was plaiting a rawhide rope. He had cut the strings weeks before, soaked them and then hung weights on each thong till the strings were hard. Then he soaked them again for another stretch. In this way he dragged each line to its utmost. When he at last soaked the strings and plaited them into an eight-plait braid, the strings were as slender as fine linen fishlines, and laid as beautifully into a rope not much larger than a carpenter’s lead pencil. When he had it all woven up the hondo noosed in and the ends turned back, no better lasso had ever been seen in those parts. Then for days he dragged the line behind him to take the slick and stiffness out of it.

Nowhere in the world is lariat dropping or lifting quite so well done as in the mesquite or a bit farther to the north-eastward in the pine belt. Riding at full speed through standing timber, with branches hanging low, ducking and dodging in pursuit of a critter as agile as a buck deer, when the opening appears, ten or fifteen feet across, the rope is snapped from any position, overhang Spanish, poked like a Bowie knife, tossed like a clod, lifted like a bat, thrust forward like a fast draw from the hip, and a ten-inch loop is snatched up on a foreleg, a flying oval over the horns, or even as they say, "When he lifted his tail, I draped two half-hitches on to hit!"

There Tip Mellon had learned his riding and cowhandling. So he was right good. The boys just had to let him live, yet begrudged the countless times they failed to break his leg or let him tumble, simply because he knew their tricks from long dodging.

They all knew it wasn't a good thing for a man never to stand up to trouble instead of greasing out of it. Tip never bulldogged a steer to throw it. Half his good riding was due to surprises which baffled and tricked bad horses. He would turn the tables on those who tried to blunder him, leaving them upset not knowing what had happened to them. When Big Hank came thundering down on the gray scoundrel he rode, crowding the boy into the corral fence one day to give Tip the choice of going over or rolling a leg on the crooked mesquite poles, the victim pulled so that somehow in the dust the bully found himself against the fence with a leg that never would be straight again, and six months in the hospital, to boot.

Naturally, having spoiled a rider as good as Big Hank, Tip might as well draw his time. No one wanted to work with a man who seemed to be an easy mark till the pinch came, and then proved to be entirely out of the receiving end, leaving bullies, jokers, teasers and all the playful crowd discomfited and crippled.

"'Why, that scoundrel cain't take a joke!"' the boys said. "'How the — — he does hit I don't know, but 'tain't right. He don't stand up to nothin'! He slicks yo', 'stid of hissef. He's catty an' pisen. Not a rattler, but one of them cottonmouths, hittin' 'thout no warnin'!'

So Tip rode on, glum and silent. He saved his own skin. He was always being picked on. The other fellows invariably got the worst of it. Yet he was despised. On him fell the snarling scorn of good men and dunderheads alike. As he rode away he learned a new word from the Birdhead jeering.

"He's a pariah, lean beggar dog of the range," a man who had once been a Yankee schoolboy and college student said at the parting.

TIP MELLON'S figure stiffened, his hand drew on the reins ever so slightly, his horse grew tense, ready to go into action and, for an instant, the cowboys, watching him go, were alert as they realized the tormented youngster's impulse to turn and come beating it back to settle the trouble he was enduring, that reputation of being slick, not good.

But he held himself. He regretted his moderation for days afterwards. At every ranch he stopped on, a bunk, meals, open house waited for him, but no one wanted him to stay.

"Don't need you, Mellon," the foreman or rancher said.

They knew of Mellon two hundred miles ahead of him from the Birdhead.

"That feller's nursin' the most doggone peculiarlest disposition 'at even any man accompanied hissef with,"' a rider explained in so many words. "He's treacherous, turnin' a good joke into some — busted laig instead of hisn's own, so 'tain't no fun manhandlin' 'im. An' he needs hit! My — — — ! Tip Mellon ought-a be the worst mussed-up scoundrel theh is, on'y yo' cain't rope a cottonmouth. They ain't no button on the end of his tail, they ain't! Drap a rope on him, an' he skips hit, like hit was exercise. Sho! He packs a sixty-foot rawhide rope, but — — — ?"

Mellon rode on, knowing he wasn't wanted where he was known. No one lumped a clod at him. One man said if Tip was shot with a .45, the bullet'd sure bound back, like off'n a hard-wood, an' probably mess the shooter all up or anyhow his hoss. And so Tip Mellon arrived in Poison Oak, where he believed himself a total stranger.

Poison Oak, on the edge of the Rio Grande jungle, was an unpleasant place for any one in a cheerful or reputable mood. One saw dobe houses, thatched huts, combinations of stick-and-mud, and some genuine sawed-lumber emporiums. The population ranged from breed Indian to fallen Nordic. The entertainment offered a stranger was according to his ability to stand and take it. Tip Mellon had never been in just this kind of a town before. He did not pay much attention to its appearance even now. He just knew he had arrived somewhere, and riding up to the livery accommodations, he impatiently flipped down his pack and saddle, drove his two horses into the corral, and gently nodded to the short, squat and pin-eyed livery man his desire to have the things taken care of. Then he sauntered across the street to the hotel where he discerned signs of confusion, and hastened as he approached. He noticed, without comprehending, a quick exit of boys and several women in several directions.

When he entered the hotel he saw a number of silent, watchful men sitting or standing around decoratively.

"Room?" he asked the obvious clerk.

"Oh, ye?" the clerk replied, lifting both hands and shoulders.

"All right," Mellon turned on his heel.

"I want it."

As he strolled forth, an odd feeling, different from any he had ever known, warmed his skin. Poison Oak had thrilled to his arrival. He noted the fact in every glance, in the flutter of the buzzard humans who comprised most of the population of Poison Oak. The men shrugged and lifted their hands and shoulders, when he glanced at them; the women rolled their eyes at him as no women ever before had done. In his soul this attitude of respect and interest made a subtle, undefined change.

He could not explain the difference in his mind. He reckoned down the list of his looks, from the beautiful nutria of his hat to the soft appropriateness of his riding boots. Since the day he saw that Texas Ranger, he had fallen to the lure of imitation. He was wearing a fine-weave, gray woollen shirt, an iron-cloth pair of trousers, a Mexican bob-tailed jacket, an embossed belt and a good revolver in an out-flaring holster where it was really convenient. His outfit, which he had left at the livery included a carbine rifle in a saddle-boot.

Oddly enough, his imitative drift did not now occur to him. The last thing in the world Tip Mellon would have expected, had happened. Poison Oak thought he was a Texas Ranger come to town on business. They knew a Ranger was needed there. Word had arrived that one was coming, but as usual the arrival had been some forty hours sooner than expected.

Ordinarily, Poison Oak could live or die in its own ways. Texas was divided up among the rangers, some two hundred and fifty-six thousand square miles by about 211 riders, or more than a thousand miles per rider. Quite a few of the rangers were sauntering back and forth at the railroad towns these days, seeking peace where a lot of war had been going on. Others were busy up in the oil country, and conditions were unusually mean a long way from Poison Oak.

THEN a ruckus involved a lot of Poison Oak. Local industry had run in several moods, chiefly to transportation. On many a night just west of town, long silent trains of mules and packhorses went plodding up the line, heavily laden. Shadowy figures of riders accompanied these animals. Farther north the packers met automobile trucks, where cargoes were shifted and the animals turned back more or less empty for other loads. Then one night somebody felt he wasn't getting all of his, with the result that a jangle was heard out on the byway which was a switch-out to avoid parading up the main street of Poison Oak.

It was admitted that possibly on this particular night people had heard sounds, yes, even gunshots or possibly pistol or rifle shots, only the music was loud, the merriment great, the attention far from observant. But in the morning a boy came in with the information that some men were lying about in recumbent poses, several horses were also prostrate or groaning, covered by swarms of flies and other insects.

Caramba! Could it be so? Yes! Too very bad for expression. Behold, a sheriff and four deputies had apparently—no one could really be sure—been shot dead. No? Yes! But who knows? Quien sabe? Truly, a dreadful occurrence, yet no one in Poison Oak could possibly be to blame.

Thus Poison Oak was in mourning, so to speak, and suspiciously watchful when this stranger rode in without saying anything, in fact giving only the most laconic single-word directions or inquiries. Who then could he be but one of those Texas Rangers, least welcome of visitors in Poison Oak?

Tip Mellon, wrapped in his own thoughts, filled with ingrowing self-disgust had reached a dangerous crisis in his heart and soul. How often a man arrives at the point where he knows his own scandalous weakness, his own mean failure, his abject misery, and then temptation looms to lead him into some course different and usually down.

Having tended so strictly to his own business, Mellon had evaded the usual or casual follies of spendthrift cattle country riders. He wore a money belt which would have been his death, had any of hundreds known how much he had slily picked up in clandestine trades and through top-hand workmanship. Every dollar was honest, yet somehow disgraceful. Ingrowing selfishness had slicked him over with the least honorable reputation a square dealing man can have. He knew a hundred cowboy songs, yet never sang them aloud. He admired beautiful women, yet never complimented one with the knowledge of his regard. Nor had he ever taken a drink of raw spine-filled liquor. A ducker, he never had faced an issue squarely.

Drifting into Poison Oak, his intentions were as remote from honorable as a man’s could be. Yet not knowing how to let go, he went forth down the wretched main street, giving sidelong glances to right and left from well-veiled pupils, debating with himself how best to begin his let-down; in what way to bust wide open through the crust of clean behavior into the mad life of drink, women and bullying.

Stepping gracefully, swaggering unconsciously, acknowledging the glances bestowed on him with the turn of his bright blue eyes, he looked the fine rider he was, a cowboy who could swing along despite the exaggerations of his boot-heels.

Nine doors up the street a dobe wall came flush to the packed earth of the pathway which served as a side walk. As he passed a tiny barred window in this wall, he heard a whisper—

“Oh, senor, tonight, is it, by the mid-road mesquite, eh?"

A glimpse revealed the speaker as a pale, dark-haired, beautiful-faced young woman. He went on his way, having nodded. He thrilled to the thought of romance. He stepped lightly, a young man charmed by a handsome girl’s attention. He was on tiptoes, ready to take the plunge into those wretched depths which are the refuge of the wayward, the unresourceful, the seekers of profane delights. He sauntered up the street, crossed over and came back down the far side, covertly observing the neat structure of the dried mud building in which lurked the siren of the barred window.

SUNSET was already close at hand. He went to eat at the hotel, where he found a deliciously roasted chicken with more good things to eat with it than he had enjoyed in many a day. Over him hovered obsequiously the gentleman who wished most heartily the patron would choke to death or die of a thousand torments or take his departure promptly.

Tip Mellon, long familiar with involuntary respect and contempt, now found himself the object of deep abiding terror. His glance fairly lifted, curled up men into intense expectancy. The squat, heavy-featured woman wife-cook whose unlovely figure appeared at intervals stared at him with wide, bulging eyes of unmistakable alarm. Yet he carelessly dismissed these weak tremors. His thought was of the girl he was to meet out on the road at the place where a mesquite had led to the switch-outs on both sides, rather than have the trouble of cutting the obstruction down.

In caution, the young man who used to vanishing, took his place not under or beside the mesquite, but at a safe distance where he could see plainly without being observed. He saw at last the pale shadow appear. He slipped noiselessly to see the better. The rendezvous had been kept, and at his low hail the young woman came rushing to him.

“I tell you everything!” she exclaimed. “They have kill’ my father.
He was the deputy, Rosbeck. At the bottom of all these things is the commissary-keep, Pequan Hazley. I tell you true! They would kneel me if they know I tell theses things. Eef you look in the Beeg Tangle, you fin’ a thousand t’ings, contraband. I am alone. My mother dead, my father keeled, an’ but for my knife, my gun. We’re who would I be?!

"You’re white blood!" he exclaimed.

"Oh, yes! Creole. My father was by his father a Yankee. Look out, for they kneel you if they dare. They tremble the way you come by! I laugh for they say they don’t allow yo’ to come. But look at Diaz, he carry your saddle an’ pack into the office, an’ he say he cut your throat if you come to bozzer heem."

In her eagerness, she had leaned close to whisper low in his ear. The perfume of her breath was like some extravagant flower’s. Her two hands rested on his left forearm. Her lips were within an inch of where his would be if he should turn his face, suddenly. He reached to touch her shoulder, comfortably. For a time Tip Mellon forgot what he really was. He had the joyous sensation of being there to protect this beautiful, brave but terribly jeopardized daughter of a man who had been killed by smuggling bootleggers and runners of illicit traffic across the Rio Grande and through the edge of the jungles past Poison Oak into the realms of pseudo respectable who clamored for laws and enforcement that would not spoil their own profits or passions.

When she had told him the story, given him the inside of the whole wretched business, not sparing her own father who had taken his until the politicians decided to interfere in favor of more graft, she stood for a minute in trembling excitement. She hesitated to slip back the way she had come. If she was seen, suspected of this meeting, what fate would be hers? Yet she had dared chance it.

She drew back, turned and circled by a cowpath in and out as he stillhunted behind her, seeing her safely home. She faded into the rear of her square-house. He heard the soft lumpy sound as the heavy bars fell into place, fastening the solid door. He edged on until he turned out of the packers’ trace to the rear door of an open dance hall.

He looked inside at tables, a curtained bar and through much smoke from brown paper cigarettes and particularly pungent odorous tobacco. He saw at three tables no less than eleven heads tucked close together like birds picking corn, and the shoulders, elbows, and necks were nearly as active as those of chickens would have been. Hazley, Tangle, Diaz, Creegan—he recognized a number of them. He drew into the black shadow to where he could listen. Happily, having worked so long with vaqueros as well as with cow-boys, he knew the dialect perfectly.

So! To them he was a Texas Ranger! Did he look like one, act like one of those splendid, intrepid men? Tip Mellon leaned against the dobe, mud-plastered over-poles that built this place of fandango, jig-time, and jazz. Even here he had been drifting with the current. He had continued the slick, easy way of avoiding trouble. Keeping tryst with a pretty girl, he had let her talk, sorry he had made a mistake, sorry in his soul that she was also mistaken, but he hadn’t enlightened her. With the worst intentions, he quietly, nicely evaded exposing himself. She did not know she had been tricked.

ESCAPING his conscience, he wanted to enter this dance hall, drink illicit liquor, catch up one or other of the wanton girls trafficking there, but between him and the floor were these whispering men, planning his discomfort, uttering their undying hate sibilantly, and yet who were afraid of him, dared not make an attack because they mistook him for a Texas Ranger, a man who faced things!

True, come to think of it, he was a good looker, dressed the part nicely and kept his mouth shut. The easiest listener anywhere, his ears were wonderfully keen. His eyes read thoughts in the gesture of a finger, the twitch of a nose and the shine of eyes. Always in the past, watchfulness had enabled him to foresee trouble, to dodge what was coming.

An odd shame mocked him. With his nostrils still sweetened by the perfumed girl, realizing the trust of a lovely girl when she poured the truth into his false ears. A Texas Ranger? What a scoundrel he really was. Embarrassed by his treachery to the hopeful girl, who dared her neighbors’ vengeance to warn him of the particular scoundrels to watch, he at last saw the truth. A sneaking masquerader, a slick dodger, what didn’t he lack of being a Ranger!

Two ways offered him now. He must make a choice of one or the other. For the first time in his life, he hesitated to take the easy course. A kind of fire began to burn in his heart, as he contemplated the fact that he could back out, sneak to the corral and make his getaway on his horses, or he could deny the tremors of his heart and soul—do the desperate thing he never had done before!

For months he had practised the feat. He strolled through the rear doorway, rolling a cigarette with his left hand—deftly; he was among the schemers, surrounded on all sides by them, with that gliding smoothness he so long had practised in another spirit.

“A light, senor?” he asked, turning to Pequan Hazeley who faded from a rich ochreous orange to a musty tiger lily blue.

“Si, si—Yeh,’” the store-keeper hissed with passing breathlessness.

A dozen times the wretched scoundrel essayed to strike a match for the cool young man who stood among them. Eleven times he broke the head of the match so it fell sputtering to the wet table top. And then he reached a trembling hand with a flickering flame for this arrival in their conference.

“Hold still!” Mellon ordered, and the man froze in terror.

“Thanks!” Mellon said gently, his cigarette lighted as he strolled on toward the floor where the screen of dancing had hid the backdoor gathering to decide this matter of a Ranger who had come to town just in time to force them all to sit tight.

“Music?” Tip Mellon turned to the players, who had stopped in a jangle of surprise. Hastily they began to play, five pickers each a different tune, one mournful, one clamorously strident, the other old favorites in between. As they sought concordance, Mellon bowed to one of the less repulsive women who stepped with pitiful obedience into his arms to dance as he elected.

As he circled, not so very skillfully, he saw on all sides the frozen attention of this crowd. Here was the headquarters. Here were the desperate crew, the gangsters who plotted and carried out the illicit traffic through these parts. A score, two-score, would willingly have attacked him, only they feared first his own self-defense, and then the inevitable follow-up of a lieutenant or captain with four or five devils who would never rest till every shooting or stabbing man was dead. True, by cleaning him now, they could scurry away, might not be overtaken for years, and might even be safe below the border. Nevertheless, this would hurt business, very profitable business.

ACCORDINGLY, Mellon danced his turn, slipped the girl a good silver coin, rolled another cigarette and studied the faces on all sides, wondering to see so many pig eyes, dog noses, monkey ears, twitching and evading the directness of his scrutiny. He just stood there, leaning against a muscular tree trunk supporting the roof, wondering to find himself so thoroughly respected. Not a smile tormented him, not a jeer disgraced him, not a least trace of contempt humiliated his self-respect. They would, at a word, drop on their knees should he demand it. But he didn’t. He thought of it, but couldn’t. No Texas Ranger would exact even from these poisonously hateful people that homage.

Tip Mellon was sorry for them. Criminals, they never had learned any better; cruel murderers, they were but beastly and afraid; they were ignorant like hawks or the rare jaguars which sometimes come into that particular jungle, lost out of the tropics to the southward.

Mellon strolled forth, turning his back on them all. He was safe, perhaps not perfectly safe, but just so, a Texas Ranger would have let them all know his confidence in his own self and in their self-restraint.

And when he had gone on into the shadows, presently he knew some one was in the gloom, whispering. The voice told him what the daughter of Rosbeck had already told him, adding details. Plenty of liquor had come in. The tins of dope were all in Hazeley’s store. The dead had all been buried, it was true, but so many of the smugglers had been shot that the pack train had been disordered, so they had expected to hurry a new one on this very night, but for senor’s inopportune arrival. Curamba, he was a devil to be there! And if he did not die of poison in the morning at breakfast, this, his best friend in the world, would be grateful to a white man’s divinity. Indeed so!

The informant rustled a dry leaf, vanishing. Tip Mellon circled around, finding himself perturbed. He had merely preceded the real Texas Ranger. Without saying a word, merely by looking and acting thus, he had come to masquerade as a member of the hero band. Just to know he looked and acted the part gave the cowboy an emotion of wish and longing beyond any dream he had ever had. That lovely girl saw nothing strange in his trustworthiness, in his bearing; felt no twang of suspicion against him. Yet he was a snake, a poison thing himself, not what he seemed.

In his room he buried his face, his cheeks hot and his soul perturbed by longing on the one hand and the truth of it all on the other. In another day, the real Ranger would come riding in. He would slide from his horse, give his belt a hitch, glance up and down the street, and then begin business.

Dozing at intervals, dreaming whether asleep or awake, Tip Mellon passed the worst night of his life. Even the fact of his great hour now depressed him. His finest instinct had been a false gesture.
He had even listened to sweet lips telling him what was not his to know. The real Ranger would give one look, grin, possibly even waste a tiny shrug of contempt on the wretch exposed. From that moment the pretender would be withered.

Dawn flushed the sky. Tip Mellon was up with the sun. He went to breakfast. Before him was spread a number of excellent dishes, including coffee—black, rich coffee. At the sniff of the aroma, Mellon forgot his mean imposition. He turned his glance to where his host stood shrunken up in anxiety only partly concealed.

“Come here!” Mellon smiled and when the man with shoulders on two levels came, added, “Drink!”

“Sca-a-a!” The man lifted on his toes like a rooster, then dropped on his knees to say, “Merci! Merci!”

The wretch screamed. By goddesses and gods, by heavens and hades, he declared, and denied that he meant any harm. Only he begged with wails to be excused from drinking the coffee. It was exceedingly bad for his stomach. He had not known it was the intention of anybody to mix poison in it, but he would kill the cook instantly if only Mellon laughed.

“I want coffee, not that,” the visitor said. “Also, eat—of each dish. No, —!
Keep your dirty fingers out, and with a clean spoon each time!”

APPELLANTLY, only the coffee had been poisoned. Mellon ate, and the host emptied half the cup of the next lot of coffee, to drink it from another cup.
So Mellon breakfasted well with a certain degree of safety. Then he emerged on the street. He saw a young woman on her way toward the stores. She was the girl of the mid-road mesquite. By day and in the open she was still beautiful.
With sick heart he saw himself the object of her covert, but admiring glance—just a flutter of those marvelous eyes.

He saw, too, other attentions, also covert, given to the brave young woman’s passing. From behind him, he heard her called Senorita Terina Rosbeck—information for his ears. Owner, apparently, of a ranch to the northward, but here now at her father’s because he was lately dead, as he was reported to have been killed, so to speak.

Whisperings came to his ears. From windows, from brush, from rooms and wherever he went informants poured into him, for his exaltation, the details and the lies about the killing. He knew by the tones when truth, part truth and falsehood came to him. Long habituated to reading men, he knew them now exceedingly well. He hesitated to go away.
He dared not remain to face exposure.
His hour of pride and respect was sweet in his soul!

Then up the roadway in early afternoon, when ordinarily the siesta would have been upon Poison Oak, he saw a horseman coming. No need to tell Tip Mellon he had remained too long. The rider passed the mid-road mesquite, his horse a homely brute with a big head and innumerable protuberances of bone from nose and brows to hips.

The newcomer was a wizened-up man, with head thrust forward and sunken cheeks, tiny black eyes and scrupulously clean if nondescript shirt and vest, trousers and jaunty hat. He reined up at the hotel, letting fall his bridle reins. The horse wriggled from nose to tail, twitched and then in a nonchalant way, reached with his right hind hoof to scratch himself under the jaw and up against the ear. The rider grinned, remarking to Mellon, who happened to be nearest—

"Ain’t he the dog-gondest, now?"

"He shore is!” Mellon grinned, though he did not feel like it.

The man was a real ranger. The point of his nose was intrusive. Yet his glance was quiet, disarming, his voice was much softer than one expected, and in his shirt pocket the fakir caught a glimpse of the not-too-well-concealed badge.

"Caramba, dos!" a voice whispered. "For why, two?"

The expression of the newcomer changed but slightly as he turned to look around with a complete casualness that would fool no one, least of all Mellon in his guilt. Here was a real Texas Ranger, come to clean up. If only Tip, the cowboy, had been a genuine member of that band, he would have given, forfeited thrown away everything he held precious.

The Ranger’s wandering rapid fire of glances swept up and down the street, returning to look inquisitively at Tip Mellon who stood leaning against the wall. Mellon had felt the watchfulness of a thousand onlookers. Now he saw himself revealed as never before to any man. And this observer wrinkled his forehead and his nose, his gray pearl eyes flickered as they stared at the cowboy’s face. Something needed explanation. Two Rangers, eh? How come? What the— Um-m! Mellon knew what the man was thinking.

An old-timer, this rider for the law, probably coming forty years, perhaps a lieutenant or a captain—the real article just naturally wasn’t making any mistakes. Something in the boy’s expression told a lot. No man ever begged a Texas Ranger for mercy, meaning it, without being understood and given it, even if the pleading was for a benefit undeserved.

"I don’t reckon I ever did get to see you, sonny?’ the Ranger said in a voice so low only Mellon could hear.

"Tip Mellon, the Birdhead, Oklahoma, and the pine belt of the Ozarks,” the boy replied. "I can tell you something here, anyhow."

"Good,” the Ranger smiled. "I’m hungry, though. We’ll suspend judgments."

So the Ranger understood instantly. No talking where the very ground had ears. Tip turned to the hotel keeper, saying:

"If you can feed us without poison, we’ll eat, now!"

"Poison. Sacred idols of Yucatan! Who dreamed of eet?" the man growled.

"Poison, sonny?" the Ranger presently inquired when the enthusiasm of the hotel keeper had been restrained, lest he leave nothing edible off the table of this terrible pair. A nod from Tip explained. The man regarded the scene with an odd, amused interest.

"Didn’t Taber see you-all at the Birdhead?" the Ranger inquired, casually. "I’m Fresmore."

"Oh, yes. But how come he remembered me?" Tip asked. "I didn’t—"

"He saw the crowd ragging yo’ too much. He figured likely you mightn’t always stand fo’ hit,” Fresmore explained. "We all are kind-a forehand-edly lookin’ oveh outfits, you know. Neveh can tell when we might need to particularize a man’s description. A rider as good as you-all must naturally be needed, one way or the another sometime."

They sauntered down the middle of the street, out of ear-shot.

"Now’t we’re acquainted, boy, how come, sonny, they thought yo’s a Ranger?"

Fresmore’s eyes were glinting. A pretender is a pretty ornery proposition.

Tip told the truth. He began at the beginning. For years he had kept his mouth shut. Inside, he was an honest actor. But outside, he looked a lie, not caring what happened, what people thought, if he slipped clear himself. His riding, roping, shooting were superb, yet his treachery had saved him trouble, fooling his tormenters. Sleeking out of trouble was obeying his mother’s injunction not to fight.

Fresmore listened with blank expression. Poison Oak had simply mistaken Tip for a Ranger. The girl’s trustful admiration—well, that was it. To keep her regard even for a day, Tip had accepted the honor, braved the danger, and had taken the responsibility. He told where the goods were, who had led the bushwhackers to assassinate the sheriff and his posse, and the lay of the land.

“That’s all there is to it,” the Ranger said thoughtfully. “Going to see it through with me, sonny?”

“You let me go?”

“Shucks!” the man laughed softly. “‘Tain’t no crime bein’ mistook for a Ranger, nor lookin’ like one! Why not live up to it, now?”

Mellan froze. He was forgiven his imposition. He saw the banded-up claw of the man handing him a badge.

“Put it in yore pants,” the man said.

They sauntered lightly down the roadway side by side, on their toes. Mellon had buffafoed them. The gang had simply not known how to act, what to do. Only now they were cornered; the time for action was at hand. The two arrived at the Hazeley store.

The raid was direct, the resistance that of cornered rats. For two minutes the fight was terrific. Then the state of Texas, as represented by two slender, rather wiry and competent men, took possession. Blood was running down the face of the younger, and the older one’s left foot left a stain wherever it stepped. Three men who needed hanging would never be hanged.

The smuggled and contraband things were all stocked up, the criminals having had no time to hustle them away. Mellon helped his captain with the bad leg since his own scalp wound was just a scratch. Besides, as the peaceable populauon came to look on, one young woman made her appearance right quickly. With a cry, she sprang to toke care of the young man, while Fresmore grinned.

“Much obliged for takin’ cyar of my man,” Fresmore said to her.

“Oh, I owe you so much!” she turned to him. “Coming when you did so quickly! I was afraid. They hated me—”

“Yes, sure!” Fresmore looked at her as Mellon drew back to stare.

“Oh, I had to do it!” She blinked her eyes. “I made ’em think he was a Ranger—so—so they’d leave me alone, and they’d be tricked and caught.”

“You knew I wasn’t a Ranger?” Mellon gasped, staring at her.

“Oh, sure I knew!” she blinked her eyes. “The way you first looked at me. No Ranger on business ever looked thataway! But the way you let me think you would hold them all till el capitan should come—”

SHE shrugged her shoulders, smiled with a flash of her eyes. She knew Tip Mellon had bridged for the law, come what might from criminal or the real Ranger. He colored, humbled. He hadn’t fooled the most important woman(2,1),(996,989) in the world, not a bit. She must despise him, having used his own bluff! Captain Fresmore and Terina Rosbeck exchanged laughing glances.

“Was I wrong to you, doing that?” She beautifully changed her taunt to supplication that she might not tease him who so often had been jeered.

“You couldn’t be!” he huddled up. “I’m no good.”

The two laughed, delighted.

“You’re all right, now, kid,” Fresmore remarked, “you’ve learned yo’ lesson right plumb complete! The Ranger neveh lived who wasn’t sure humble, knowin’ Texas trusts ’im. Knowin’ too, that somewhere the’s a woman to make him eat out of her hand, jes’ plumb tamed, huh!”

NOW ON SALE!
JULY BEST WESTERN

2 NOVELS!
THE BLACK CANYON OUTLAWS
by Raymond Berry BULLETS SQUEEZE THE RANGE
by Peter Field
The cell-door creaked open. Mike Stanley turned his grim head to see the Mex turnkey silhouetted against the patch of light from the corridor.

"Come out, gringo! Our jefe político softens; lets you go. If I had my way—"

Hand drawn swiftly edgeway across his throat made perfect end to the sentence.

"If I were tied!" Mike said contemptuously. "Else not your hands, but your feet, would move with swiftness."

Painfully, clumsily, he shuffled toward the door in the cowhide sandals which Flores' light-fingered police had given him a week before, upon his arrest and stripping. He was suspicious of a trick. Anything could happen in these jails south of the Rio Grande. It would not have amazed him, had the gloomy corridor suddenly flamed with shots.

But he passed nobody, saw nobody, until they came out to the half-patio which was the front entry of the jail. The turnkey slouched across it, swinging his ring of great iron keys. Outside, on a bench built along the street wall, sat three dapper men. Back of them in a sort of semicircle were most of Flores' inhabitants.

"Here is the American, Excellency," the turnkey muttered, bobbing shaggy head before the central figure of the three.

"Ah!" the squat man cried, and smiled. He was of much the same size as Mike Stanley—of middle height, wide-shouldered. He had a handsome, regular-featured face, the skin old ivory, the mouth red and full-lipped as a woman's.
"Well, gringo, I have told my brother, the jefe politico, that we may well be merciful. So, today, you will be escorted to the north side of Flores and sent on. But if ever you come again to Flores—"

"And my property?" Mike demanded, green eyes very bright and very hard. He used Spanish as if it were his mother tongue. "My clothing, for one thing. My saddle and bridle, my sorrel gelding, my two Colts which you now wear belted on you, and my two thousand pesos of American gold."

"It must be some sort of fever, brought on by the darkness of the cell," Hugo Casillas said. "But, never can it be said that Hugo Casillas was anything but fair. My brother! Is this true? Did this gringo, then, have property?"

"Those rags in which he stands. Not so much as a hat," the jefe politico shrugged. He was a younger duplicate of Hugo. "I saw him when he was brought before me for thievery."

"I understand," Mike nodded. "Now, all of you remember this: You have grown puffed up because your dealing is with the gente like these—" he jerked shaggy head toward the watchful, grinning people. "People of your own race, who fear you. You will learn of your great mistake. You will come to be very sorry that you came sneaking up behind me in the cantina and made arrest the pretense for robbing me. Very sorry!"

"Sargento!" Hugo Casillas said to the police non-com at his elbow. "Put your hand across his insolent mouth!"

The sergeant grinned and stepped briskly forward. He had nothing to fear from this haggard, beard-stubbed, half-starved scarecrow. He came within a yard of Mike Stanley, then Mike shifted his feet and stepped forward to meet him. A big fist came looping up, to crash against the sergeant's jaw; a blow that began at the right ankle. The sergeant seemed to rise bodily, then he dropped upon his face in the dust of the street.

"Kill him!" someone yelled from the crowd. "Stamp him to death!"

A stone came hurtling at Mike. He saw it, and ducked, but not quickly enough to make it miss completely. It struck glancingly, cutting a jagged gash in his scalp. He went down to his face, almost across the unconscious policeman.

As he propped himself up with his hands, dizzy and sick, he was conscious of the surge forward of the crowd. Then a shrill yell and the dull beat of galloping hoofs. Dust flew up in his face. He shook his head and saw the legs of a horse almost over him. Dimly he heard a voice.

"Hugo Casillas! What sort of murder is this! I saw your policeman come forward! And I saw this man strike to protect himself! And so, brave cowards that you are, you all come to do what no one of you dare do! This man is no Mexican and before your mob touches him, my pistol will be empty!"

"You do not understand, senorita," Casillas told the girl, as Mike scrambled weakly to his feet. "He is a dog of a ladron, a thief. Last week, he was found trying to rob the cash-drawer of Gonzales' cantina. He was arrested and today, as we released him, he insulted the noble Mexican people. Naturally, they resented it."

"And that is a lie!" Mike said thickly, but calmly.

"Gringo!" Hugo Casillas answered softly. "None gives the lie to a Casillas—and lives! So—"

"Regardless of all that," the girl said quickly, looking down at Mike and looking away again with something like distaste showing on clear, tanned face, "I will take him with me."

She looked at him again and Mike's green eyes twinkled a little. He was not a soul easily cast down. He would laugh—he had laughed—in the very shadow of all fashions of death. Now, it amused him to see how this golden-haired, blue-eyed youngster—she was no more than eighteen or nineteen—shrunk from him, but intended to save him from the mob, anyway.

"Catch hold of my stirrup-leather," she told him shortly.

As the pinto moved down the street, Casillas called after Mike:

"Remember what I said: None gives the lie to a Casillas—and lives! Remember, gringo!"

"And you remember what I told you: You will be very sorry!" Mike answered him evenly.

"Be still!" the girl rapped at him.
"I should think you'd be satisfied to escape that mob with a whole skin! I'll take you to the hotel and fix you up with decent clothes. Tomorrow I'll borrow a horse for you and you can ride out of town with my mozo and me."

"You're from the Hacienda Teneror?" Mike inquired. "You're Majors' girl? I thought so! I'll go a lil' bit farther with you. But not to the inn. An' the clothes an' all can wait a while ... I'll likely be seein' you again. An'—thanks for chargin' the Mex', back there!"

He let go of the stirrup-leather. They were nearing the edge of Flores. Mike turned down to the last side-street, and moved past the curious people in the 'dobe houses without a look behind him. He passed out of sight, near the river, and walked down to the bank. There was nobody in sight. He stepped down into the edge of the shallow stream, stripped and bathed, then put on the ragged shirt and pants again.

In a thick clump of bushes, from which he could see the dull-red tiles of the town's roofs, he lay upon his stomach to wait broodingly for dark. He had the patience of the Indian—as he had the Apache's wolf-keen hearing and sight.

"Yes, sir! You'll be plenty grievin'," he muttered. Presently, he fell asleep. When he waked, it was inky dark.

He went back toward town. He dodged lighted doorways and came like a shadow to the long, white-plastered house of the Casillas. The days before his arrest had given him accurate knowledge of Flores and its greats and near-greats. He stopped at the entry of the patio and listened. Then he slid inside.

The evening meal was over. He found Hugo Casillas with his brother and puffy-faced young Mexican they called Julio Bustos, sitting in a room off the big patio, drinking and smoking. Flat against the wall, Mike listened to their talk. Casillas the jefe politico got up and said he was going to see his girl.

Mike shrank back from the door and let him go, then went back. Hugo Casillas and Bustos had their heads close together. He could hear only fragments of their talk.

"—And then!" Bustos said grinning. "And then the girl? She is a little tiger cat, Hugo, my old!"

Hugo grinned.

"Yes... but it will be pleasant to tame that tiger kitten. Can you think of any girl for five hundred miles in any direction, to compare with her? And she—she has not been wise... She rides roughshod over us, if we do not jump from the path. She has treated me—me!—as if I were but a grade above a peon! It will be pleasant, Julio. . . ."

Mike nodded shadowly and the corners of his mouth lifted. They had some sort of a deal on, these two. For Julio got up and remarked that everything was ready. He could ride south with dawn. Hugo Casillas only nodded and continued to stare smilingly at the ceiling. But after Julio had gone Hugo stood up and yawned. Mike followed him noiselessly to the door of a bedroom.

He waited until he heard snores, inside. Then he tried the latch. The door swung open and still Hugo snored. Mike slid inside, closing the door gently. He crossed to the bed and his groping hand found Hugo's clothing across a bench. Found also his own crossed shell-belts and the white-handled, silver-plated 44s in his carved scabbards. There was a candlestick on the bench, with matches beside it.

Mike grinned as he drew a pistol out. Swiftly he scratched a match, turning his head away from the flame as he put it to the candle-wick. There was a quick cracking of the rawhide-laced coat. Hugo Casillas sat up, glaring at the light.

"Be still!" Mike said grimly. "I might miss, but I never have. . . . Did I not tell you that you would be sorry you robbed me! And is not the word of a buscadero usually kept? Did you—and that dog-brother of yours—think that I was but a tourista, an innocent, to be robbed?"

"What do you want?" Hugo demanded shakily.

"Put up your hands."

He got the rawhide rope from the wall-peg, and he tied Hugo quickly and skillfully, gagging him with the corner of a sheet. Then he set the gun down and looked around. There were his clothes on pegs in a corner. There was water in an olla; and an earthen basin, and Hugo’s razor. He stripped and dressed and shaved. Belted on his pistols. Took his Winchester carbine, still in the saddle-seaboard. But his saddle, he thought, must be in the stable. As for his money—he had searched the place thoroughly as he moved about. It was not there.

He put down the carbine and went over to take the gag out of Hugo’s mouth. He asked for his money.

“We divided it,” Hugo shrugged sullenly. “I lost my share within the hour, at cards. Your saddle is in the room of my stable-mozo. I—we did not know who you were. We had no thought that you were one of the buscadores—”

Mike nodded grimly, with lift of one hard mouth-corner. He took the sheet and gagged Hugo more thoroughly. Then, in the lariet, he made hangman’s knot. Hugo’s eyes bulged over the sheet. Mike stood on the bench, to pass the riata over a ceiling beam. Then he dropped lightly down and picked up Hugo as if he were a child. Hugo stiffened and moved his head from side to side desperately, his eyes gleaming in the candle-light. But presently he stood rigid with the noose about his neck, and Mike grinned.

“You’ll be all right if you don’t happen to slip.”

He blew out the candle and went out, closing the door. He found his big golden sorrel in a stall, but needed five minutes to locate the stable-mozo’s room. And the man rose up with an oath, off his pallet.

Mike cracked him over the head with pistol barrel. His saddle was hanging there, with others, some cow saddles, some the big-horned Mexican hulls, elaborately decorated with gold and silver. All but his own he slashed with the mozo’s dagger, reducing them to ruin. Then he went out to saddle King. He was just swinging up when a man ran at him out of the darkness and fired a pistol almost in his face.

Mike moved with the suddenness of an explosion. His hand swept down to his left-hand gun, flicked it out and let the hammer drop almost before the Mexican’s shot had stopped roaring. The man dropped with a grunt like a poll-axed bull. Mike tickled the big sorrel and shot away across the fenceless open. He rode out of town with a thunder of hoofs that brought people running to their doors.

Once out of town, heading south, Mike veered around to the north. He knew the country well. If it were his first visit to Flores, it was not his first, or his tenth, to the region. With Big Ben Cary’s gang, he had run three herds of “wet” cattle out of the Flores River country.

So he headed for rocky slopes and upon them turned due north. He lay down upon the bare ground, in an arroyo, near midnight. He fell asleep with King’s reins in his hand.

There was no sign of pursuit when he came out of the arroyo the next morning. Dawn found him on the road to the Border—and to the big Hacienda Tenedor of Andrew Majors. He stopped at a dobe house and the woman of the place brought him fat, brown beans and leathery tortillas and fresh beef cooked over an open fire. He ate and drank black coffee and gossiped with her over cigarettes.

Bandits, she said, were bad—and getting worse. Nobody was safe from pillaging; from murder, if they objected.

“Buscaderos americanos?” Mike asked her.

“No, I think that these are not gringos. We have had them, too, but not for long. I can remember them, señor. Big men, smiling even when they killed; open-handed men, throwing gold to poor women like me. Or, perhaps, kissing me. . . Ay de mi! I remember one day ten years ago, I lived with my man twenty miles north and east of this place. And upon us, out of a dust cloud, came cattle. Many cattle! Perhaps a thousand. And from the dust came singing of a sort to make one’s spine tingle. . . .”

She shook her sleek head with its threads of gray against crow black. Her face was suddenly young again.

“Ay de mi! My man spoke English. He told me the song:

Long riding it’s an easy life,
A life that’s full of fun.
The prairie is our tavern;
The moon, it is our sun!

'And a boy rode out of the haze... Hair like yours, but lighter, had he, señor. And—yes! Eyes of green had he, also like yours. But his nose was straight. A beautiful boy! And suddenly, out of the tornillo scrub, came vaqueros of the rancher whom these buscaderos had stripped. They were very close. Five of them in this party. They charged down upon this boy of mine.

'And he... Ay de mi! The two white-handled pistols came like snakes from their sheaths at his sides. And like snakes they struck. Death to two of those vaqueros. The others fled. And he, this boy, still smiling, he came over to me.

'...A gold piece for a kiss!' he said to me. I—well, I knew that he would give the gold piece, anyway, so I laughed and told him to take it and forget the gold. He bent down and kissed me, half-lifting me from the ground. And then—

'More vaqueros came. From the rear of the herd the firing was like thunder in the mountains. My boy flung me the gold piece and rode with a yell, but still laughing back to the fight. And I never saw him again. But I heard of him. Heard of how bandits from this side had stripped his father’s ranch and murdered his father and his brother. So he, having but horse and pistols, began raiding upon this side. El Tejano—the Little Texan—our vaqueros named him. I wonder where he is...'

'Quien sabe?' Mike grinned. He had almost forgotten that fight. There had been so many since!

Mike stood up. For toward the cabin came Sue Majors with a Mexican riding behind her. She reined in and stared down at him.

'You—you—Hugo Casillas was telling truth, then, when he called you a thief!' she said angrily, and Mike only grinned. 'They roused me last night, after you had slipped into Hugo’s room and stolen his clothing, his pistols and his horse and saddle. I suppose Hugo was drunk, or he wouldn’t have slept through it all.'

'Likely not,' said Mike gravely.

'Now that you mention it, I can see that, too. Liquor’s an awful thing. Man oughtn’t to drink it, I reckon. You ridin’ my way? Fine! I hate ridin’ alone.'

'I’m going home. And my father wouldn’t have a thief on the Tenedor! If you know what’s best for you, you’ll start riding as fast as Casillas’ horse can travel—back into Texas! My father would have you thrown off the ranch.'

'Then we won’t tell him,' Mike decided, nodding. 'You see, I have got to hit the Tenedor. It’s right across the directest line to the Bawdeh. An’ Casillas’ll maybe chase me. Awful, if he caught me.'

'Why did you take the pistols?' she asked contemptuously.

'Oh, them? Why, they’re worth twenty-five apiece, anyhow. I can always cash ’em in. Ready?'

He swung up on King. She looked furiously at him, then spurred on ahead, chin up. The vaquero glared at Mike, then followed Sue Majors. Mike watched, then lifted hand to hatbrim in salute to the woman of the cabin:

'Adios! I am sorry that I have not so much as uncenlavo. But there is a man of your race who owes me four thousand, six hundred pesos. That I will collect. And I will bring or send you a gold piece, as on that day ten years ago I gave you one, for a kiss!'

He spurred after Sue and the vaquero. She looked straight front, when he caught up with her and leaned a little from the saddle toward her, to remark upon the beauty of the morning. He continued to talk, over the miles to Tenedor’s line. He answered questions which he pretended she asked him; he asked her questions and answered them himself.

But, for all this foolery, Mike was very much on guard. He watched the back trail and he watched the front. His green eyes roved from right to left. Hugo Casillas was not apt to forget the man who had stood him with rope about his neck, in his own house, for servants to see!

They crossed the Tenedor boundary. And within a mile, Mike leaned forward. Sue saw the huddled body of the vaquero as soon as he. Together they raced across to where the dead man lay. They stared down at him. Then, instinctively, they looked one at the other. The girl made a strangling sound. Her tanned face had gone white; her blue eyes were very wide and the dilated pupils made them seem almost black.

"I—he was a good man, this Roman. . . . One of my father's best. . . . I—

"I cannot think who killed him. . . ."

"That another o’ yo’s?" Mike asked quietly, nodding jerkily toward the second body, which lay behind a clump of greasewood, with only cotton-jundered arm showing.

"Escopa!" she said, when a jump of her horse let her see. "Yes! He was foreman. I—oh, let’s go to the house!"

But Mike swung down, first. He touched the body of Escopa. It was still warm. He looked at the blood in the ground. Fresh. . . . Four or five hours at the very outside, since this man had been riddled with bullets.

"I have got an idea what’s at the house—what she’ll find," he muttered as the girl galloped off toward the ranch-house.

He made the saddle without touching stirrups. He rammed the steel to King and the sorrel jumped into a gallop that overhauled the others ahead as if they were earthorses.

They came up to the hacienda house. A squat, sulky-faced and swaggering Mexican, grizzled, scarred, was squatting at a corner of the long house, beyond the entry. He got up and came to take Sue’s reins.

"My father!" she gasped. "He is here?"

"No, señorita." The man frowned. "Did you not meet him? He rode out early this morning with Roman and Escopa. I thought that he must have gone on toward Flores, to meet you, when they did not come back. I—"

"Roman and Escopa! They are dead—murdered!" she whispered. "And my father. . . ."

Mike spurred King forward, to put up his hand and steady her. The Mexican gaped at her, heavy mouth sagging. Slowly, very slowly, he shook his head.

"And Escopa owed me ten pesos! Well, no need to think of that now! But the patron! Cuerpo de dios! The letter—"

He fished frantically under his green jacket and brought out a soiled envelope. He handed it up to Sue, who was straightening in the saddle again, with underlip caught between her teeth. Mike leaned to read over her shoulder:

"We hold your father for five thousand dollars. Get it from his bank in Flores. Bring it, in American bills, before noon tomorrow, to La Piedra Cabeza, on Arroyo Bonito. You must come alone. Our men will be hidden in the brush, their rifles commanding all sides of the Rock. If you do not bring the five thousand dollars, or if you tell anyone—never will you see more of your father than his finger."

Sue crumpled the paper and thrust it swiftly into a pocket of her shirt. As if concealing it from Mike.

"A man I did not know brought it, but an hour or so ago," the squat Mexican told her. "He said that it was for you."

"I must go to Flores quickly! Saddle a fresh horse—the fastest in the corrals, Cesar!"

"Don’t get excited about this," Mike counseled her. "If you take that money to La Piedra Cabeza, you’ll be no closer gettin’ yo’ father loose. There’s a lot in this business that you don’t know about."

"I’ll do this my own way," she flared at him. "Keep out of Tenedor affairs."

"You’ll be heaps better off doin’ it my way. This is the kind o’ thing I do best."

"I thought that your specialty was robbing tills—and stealing clothes. You keep out of this or I’ll have my men tie you up. I know what I’m to do."

He lifted heavy shoulders resignedly and looked out across the Tenedor range to where the Sierra Jerónimo lifted jagged, blue-hazed peaks that walled in the western horizon. He rode around the house, following Sue and the swaggering Cesar.

There were two vaqueros beyond a dobe-walled corral. He went across to them and asked the road to the Hacienda Jerónimo of Hugo Casillas. They pointed toward the mountains and explained the trail. He nodded and without speaking again to the girl, rode on into the west.

“‘So the bandidos hole up in the mountains somewhere.’ He grinned sardonically. ‘I bet you! If I remember—an! I reckon I do!’—Piedra Cabeza on Arroyo Bonito’d be just about midway between Jerónimo an’ Flores.”

He rode all afternoon across range that he knew must belong to Hugo Casillas. The arroyo-gashed foothills of the Jerónimos were no strange country to him. He knew a peak and a trail up that peak. From that height, a fire would show.

Mike went on up the steep trail in the darkness. It was a windless night, when sounds carried. He was careful to keep against the shoulder, the inside, of the trail. When he came out upon the peak he looked out over the welter of canyons and “releases” below. It was still dark, for the moon had not pushed up over the lowest ridge.

“Thought so!” he grunted, catching a pin-point of ruddy light, below and to his left.

It was painfully slow travel, getting across the arroyos of the lower heights. The moon came up, to help. He found the fire at last, near the end of a narrow arroyo. He left King with reins trailing and moved as soundlessly as an Apache over the ridge to look down upon the men at the fire. There was no sign of Majors. Only four vaqueros with rifles close at hand. In the end of the arroyo was a dark blotch—a cave-mouth, he thought.

“Killing those two Tenedor men was not exciting,” one of the lounging men drawled. “I wish I had gone with Bustos to capture the Governor’s bullion train.”

“With word going to the Governor of the wicked bandidos around Flores,” a man grunted from across the fire, “those who rode with Bustos may get a bellyful of excitement. All the troops in the State may be with that gold. I like it here.”

Mike worked along the ridge toward the arroyo end, toward that seeming cave-mouth. Still the men loafed at the fire. He began to crawl down the slanting wall. Nobody at the fire turned a head when he wriggled across the arroyo bottom. At the cave-mouth he seemed to hear breathing.

Mike slid inside and whispered Majors’ name. A grunt sounded. He worked that way, found the rancher bound and gagged. He cut him loose and took the gag from his mouth.

“Let’s go! Where are their hawses?” he grunted.

“Next draw. Where’s yo’s? My ankle’s sprained. I can crawl.”

At the entrance, Mike seewled. How two of them could crawl from that box without being heard, then seen. . . . If only it were dark!

“Stay here,” he grunted to the old man.

Mike went out. Never in his life had he moved so silently. Inch by inch, momentarily expecting someone to jump up from the fire with a yell—and a shot, he crawled toward the fire. The thirty yards seemed like miles. Still the men sprawled upon their blankets, smoking, muttering, laughing occasionally.

He came within a yard of them. One was telling some tale of a buscadero raid upon a ranch where he had worked:

“‘And so, we took up the trail. Pobres! That was a business! We would run in at them, trying to kill one or two and stampede the herd. They would fight back. There was one there who was younger than all the other gringos, but always first to rush at us. El Tejanito! My patron called us off, before I had opportunity to meet him.”

“I heard that he is dead. Well! It is my thought that, had I fired on him that day, he would have died the sooner. I would have liked to kill him.”

“Tejanito! Tejanito!” Mike yelled in his very ear. “That is why I come back tonight.”

The man screamed and scrambled across another’s body to get up and away. He left his rifle where it laid. The others jumped, grunting, swearing. Mike, on his knees, with a pistol in each hand, yelled the old battle-cry—Tejanito!

Two men took their rifles with them. They whirled and snatched at the hammers.
Right-hand, left-hand, Mike fired at them. One fell, the other whirled and ran. The third man, who had no rifle now, hurled a knife. Mike felt the shock of it glancing off of his hat crown. He knocked that fellow down with two rapid shots.

The first man up, the brave fellow who had wanted to kill El Tejanito, vanished around a crook in the draw. Mike got one more shot at the rifleman. He saw him stagger. Then he, too, was out of sight.

Mike got up quickly and scrambled to cross the ridge to the men’s horses. He found them hobbled, grazing. He cut the hobbles of the best-looking animal and turned him back. Down in the draw, he snatched up a bridle and saddle from the pile by the fire, and fairly threw them upon the horse. He was calling to Majors all the while, but there was no answer from the cave-mouth.

He swung upon the horse and jumped him the little distance to the cave. Old Majors lay motionless. Mike picked him up bodily and hoisted him into the saddle. He jumped up behind and spurred viciously. The horse slipped on loose rocks as he climbed out of the draw.

From the elbow where the rifleman had disappeared, there came a shot. The slug whined past them. Another shot sent gravel flying. Majors was limp in Mike’s encircling arms. Mike rammed the hooks to the borrowed horse. A rifle bullet buried itself in the cantle between Mike and the old man. He felt the quiver as it struck. Then the horse was over the ridge.

At a trot, he pushed on to where King waited. He swung off and shook Majors’ swollen leg. The old man groaned and clutched at the big saddle horn.

“Hold on!” Mike snapped. “Back in a minute!”

He scooped up King’s reins and threw himself into the saddle. He whirled the sorrel and charged up the hogback. Down into the draw King half-jumped, half-slid. The rifleman opened up again. Mike ignored him. At the cave he dropped off and reached inside to snatch up his carbine. Then he opened up on that elbow in the draw and the shooting stopped. He jumped onto King and sent him surging up and over the ridge; raced back to Majors, who still swayed in the saddle.

“Out o’ this!” he yelled. “There’s a couple, with rifles, left. An’ more comin’. Do’no’ when.”

But they got down onto the rolling country below the foothills without meeting anyone. Dawn came and Majors looked haggardly at Mike.

“Do’no’ how much more o’ this I can stand,” he said between his teeth. “That dam’ leg feels like somebody was hittin’ it with a hammer. I—I certainly owe you a lot for this. Do’no’ how come you bought into this deal—”

“Reckon not,” Mike said with grimly humorous lift of mouth-corner. “Don’t bother about it. Hang on! We’re on Casillas’ range, you know.”

SUDDENLY Mike leaned a little forward, to stare with narrowed eyes at the faraway column just topping a ridge to the southward. He reached across to catch the borrowed horse by the bits and draw him back behind a hill.

“Might be Bustos, comin’ from his lick at Governor Madrigal’s bullion. . . . Casillas, I figure, is waitin’ at Arroyo Bonito for Sue an’ the money. . . .”

He found his binoculars, still in a saddle pocket. But he could recognize none of the Mexicans in that column. He gave the glasses to Majors, who braced himself against pain long enough to stare. “Governor Madrigal—an’ soldiers!” “Zapatos!” Mike grunted, staring. “Let’s climb out o’ sight! I’ve lost no governors this mawnin’!”

“No! Madrigal’s a friend o’ mine. Hard egg, but I can handle him. If—if you got reason not to hunt the light, I’ll tell him you’re ridin’ for me, imported from Texas.”

Mike debated the question with himself. If that veteran soldier, His Excellency, Governor Felipe Madrigal should guess that here he faced El Tejanito, the buscadero who had twice raided the sacred precincts of the Madrigal hacienda—well, it would be the Alamo all over again!

The state would have another governor, true. But thereafter, around campfires, at dingy bars along the Border, men would have to say of El Tejanito, of Mike Stanley, that he had died.
with broken record—died with one uncollected debt on his books.

It was not so much a matter of pride with Mike, that he never left unsettled a score with either friend or enemy, never forgot a favor or a blow. It was a matter of instinct. He was clear with Sue Majors now. But there remained his score with Hugo Casillas. At last, he shrugged. They rode out onto the open again and moved straight toward the Governor’s column.

Madrigal was a big man. Six feet tall, with a chest like a barrel, with a heavy, big-chinned face and fierce, murky eyes set wide apart. He glared as the two came up. Then he recognized Majors and jerked his hand aloft with a grin.

“What is this, amigo?” he bellowed.
“What do you do on Jerómino range? Perhaps you can tell me something of these banditos who seem to snap their fingers at my officers in Flores. They have been striking right and left in this region and Casillas talked much of getting them—always mañana!

“And now, as I come north myself, to look into this business, por dios! Up comes a soldier from the guard on my bullion train! These thieves have killed all but himself, have carried off my gold!”

Majors told him briefly of his kidnapping and of Mike’s rescue. Madrigal looked narrowly at Mike. He asked him who he was. Majors answered, as he had been coached, that Mike was one of his riders.

“My thought is,” Mike said to Madrigal, “that we can go to this cave and wait for Bustos, for it was Bustos who robbed your train! Yes, Julio Bustos! Friend and lieutenant of Hugo Casillas. Hugo Casillas, brother of the jefe político in Flores. I was there, in Flores, I overheard them talking.

“Bustos was riding south on this raid. He told Hugo Casillas this. I had no way, then, of knowing where he went. But one of the fellows I killed last night talked of this robbery. I think that it is small wonder your officers have not caught these banditos. To do so would have been to catch themselves.”

“Gringo! I think you are lying,” Madrigal snarled. “I made Ricardo Casillas—as a carpenter makes of wood a statue of the saints. I knew the father of Hugo and Ricardo. He was my closest friend. Thet his sons rob me—”

“No wonder they laugh behind your back,” Mike said contemptuously. “It is nothing to me that you will not believe. I am no watchdog for you. I have done my work. Do as suits you.”

“You have a long tongue. . . .” Madrigal said ominously. “Have you thought that it might be cut?”

“No! For I have never seen the man who could cut it."

“WELL, I will go with you to this cave. And we will see what we find. If you can show me proof that Hugo Casillas and Julio Bustos are these banditos—bueno! But if you cannot, I will hang you to a tree as warning to liars.”

“If you find me asleep!” Mike sniffed. “I will lead you to this place, because it suits me to do so. But remember this. You may be Governor, but you have no more arms than I. And not all this pack of yours could keep you from death if it suited me to kill you. So don’t puff up when you look at me. In Texas we have a fierce snake that puffs—but cannot bite.”

“I think that we shall talk more—later,” Madrigal nodded grimly. “Now, Señor Majors! I will send two men to Tenerod with you. This man of yours will go on with us.”

When the two soldiers had ridden away with Majors, Mike and the Governor rode stirrup-to-stirrup with the column behind them. They climbed back into the mountains: A half mile from the draw with the cavern, Mike halted the soldiers. He rode forward alone.

Then from the direction of the bandit camp came the rippling sound of a shot, another and another. Mike whirled King to the cover of an arroyo as the bullets splattered gravel ahead.

The Governor met Mike as he rode back. He threw out his thirty men in a long skirmish line. The ends pushed on faster than the center, to develop the bandit position. Madrigal looked scowlingly at Mike.

“Well, at least there is someone there,” he admitted.
A soldier, in the line topping out of an arroyo, fell sideways from his horse, shot through the face. Mike nodded.

"It would seem so!" he said, jerking his thumb toward the man.

The firing was two-sided now. Mike thought that the sides were rather equal. That probably meant that Bustos was here. Mike grinned to himself. It meant that the Governor's bullion was here, also.

Taking advantage of every tiny bit of cover, the Governor's men moved slowly toward the little arroyo of the cave.

Mike left the Mexicans. He went around to a position above the cave end of the arroyo. For it had come to him that he had felt a draft from the interior of the cavern the night before. . . . There might be another opening.

A foot, the last hundred yards, he went crouchingly. And he found a side-hill with a black gash showing. He worked toward it, carbine ready. A man bobbed out of that gash and looked all around. Mike flattened himself behind a catelaw.

The man turned back toward the gash. He made a hand-motion. Another man and then, one by one, a half-dozen. They were carrying what seemed to be little sticks. Mike's eyes flashed. He knew that those "sticks" were crudely smelted bullion bars, weighing perhaps five pounds each. He slid his carbine forward when ten men had come out. With his first shot, a man spun around. The others dropped to their knees. Mike reloaded lead at them from his cover.

They scurried, some back toward the cave, others to take cover and unsling their rifles. He moved toward them, still in shelter. Those behind brush clumps gave back. From over the rise, Mike heard deepened firing from the battle between the Governor's men and the bandits in the draw. When at last he got down to this exist of the cavern, there was not a living man in sight.

He looked swiftly around. Then he picked up one of the bars, lying beside a dead Mexican. There was a small hole under a mesquite bush. He rammed the bar into it; picked up another and another until he had five in the hole. Then he covered the spot. There were six other such bars dropped by the bandits.

He threw these within the cavern.

The rattle of the firing resounded through the cavern. Flat on his belly, Mike fired into it.

Half an hour later, soldiers found Mike lying there. They told him that the Governor now held the draw. The bandits were taken.

Mike nodded and got up. He asked if the gold had been found. The non-com shrugged. He had seen none. He squatted there to watch the cave exit.

Mike got King and rode over and down to where Madrigal examined five prisoners. He said only that some men had tried to break out of the cave's other end and that he had driven them back inside. Madrigal nodded.

"They said that the gold was in the cave. I have sent men in to bring it out."

Soldiers came out of the cavern, bringing six bars. Madrigal glared at them. A lieutenant shrugged. They had found these bars at the far end of the cave. Searching with torches, they knew that no more were there. Nothing but bodies.

"It may be," Mike said, "that some got out of the cave, with gold, before I came up. Bustos, I see, was killed in the battle. . . . But Hugo Casillas—where is he?"

"I killed Bustos!" Madrigal snarled. "He surrendered. The dog! He was once my secretary. Take these yonder and shoot them," he snapped to the lieutenant, gesturing toward the prisoners.

"I think I will look to see where any others from the cave have gone," Mike said innocently. "If you hear me shoot, Excellency, send soldiers quickly."

He moved off before Madrigal could answer. But the moment he was out of sight, he roweled King to a lope. He headed toward Arroyo Bonito and as he went he grinned tightly. Madrigal was a shrewd customer. Presently he was going to begin thinking. And the thought that would come to him was that nobody had seen men coming out of that cavern, save Mike Stanley. And when he had got that far in his thinking, he would begin to wish a conversation with Mike Stanley, want more details.

"If she wasn't stopped, she has already taken the money to Arroyo Bonito," Mike said grimly to himself. "'An' since Hugo wasn't at the cave with Bustos, he was likely there, waitin'.'"

Once on the moderately level slopes, he pushed the tough sorrel hard.

Toward dusk, Mike heard the clink of an iron shoe on rock. He pulled in. Presently he heard the thudding of hoofs. He reined back softly behind a great boulder. A mumble of voices came to him. One was a woman's.

He spurred out, a deadly, grinning figure with Colt in each hand. There were the brothers Casillas and between them Sue Majors, her hands tied to the saddle horn. From Hugo Casillas' pommel hung a buckskin bag.

"Yup!" Mike barked at them. "The gates of hell are creaking, hombres! Pinch your ears!"

Their hands leaped up. All three gaped as at a ghost. Mike reholstered his left-hand pistol. He kneed King over, twitched the buckskin bag from Hugo's saddle.

He turned to Sue Majors. Holding the drop on Ricardo and Hugo, he freed her hands and passed the bag of currency.

"Yo' father's home by now," he drawled. He spun his Colt on the trigger guard, regarding the brothers with narrowed eyes. "I reckon every'thing's settled except to—"

"Don't shoot!" Hugo said thickly. "I will buy my life—the money we took from you, I will repay, doubled."

"Doubled is my thought, too," Mike nodded with face like a rock. "Ricardo? Why do not you, also, beg your life?"

"I do not beg!" the younger man said contemptuously.

"Then"—Mike grinned—"I give you your life. Turn back and ride as if the devil sat your shoulder, as you came."

RICARDO dropped his hands and whirled his horse. He vanished with a drumming of hoofs. Hugo Casillas licked his lips.

"Will you match speed with me? With El Tejaniito?" Mike inquired of him gently. "I will reholster my pistol."

"El Tejaniito!" It was the girl and Hugo together.

"El Tejaniito!" he nodded grimly.

"What? You will not try for your life, Hugo? Then I fear I must let you go. It would be like killing a tied calf. Straight ahead! And ride fast!"

When the second Casillas had vanished, Mike looked sidelong at the staring, white-faced girl.

"You—you're the outlaw... and you let him go? And they say of you that you never let a score go unpaid."

"Let's go. It's a tol'able ride to Tenero."

They made the miles, at first through darkness, then under the moonlight, very silently. Mike grinned, as he looked ahead. The girl watched him covertly.

"Yonder's the west line," Sue said softly, near midnight. "I—I never thought I'd see it again... Why did you do it? Risk your life in our behalf? I thought at first it was because you knew that Hugo Casillas was behind this, and intended revenge on him. But you let him go, unhurt; you let him go, without troubling even to get from him the money he took from you in Flores."

"I did it for you," he told her, reining in to stare across and down at her. "I'm a sudden sort o' hairpin, I reckon. When I looked up, there in Flores' street, an' saw you—Well—"

"Well?" she prompted him.

"I'm leavin' you now. No, I won't come to the house. I figure this country's too hot to hold El Tejaniito. But, before I go, I'd like to ask you to give me one thing... That necklace you're wearin'."

"Oh!" she said softly. "Oh! Why, of course!"

She took it quickly from her neck, a thin golden chain with a pendant gold coin in golden rim. She put it in his hand. He thanked her with a word and lifted his hat.

He held the necklace as he rode, working at it. He came into the trail by which they had come from Flores to Tenero. The trail on which lived the woman whom he had kissed ten years before. He got the ten-dollar gold piece out of its holding rim. He nodded.

"Now I'll head for the Bawdeh without a promise unpaid. I'll pick up that bullion an' cash it at Laredo. Lucky Sue had this gold piece, to give to my ol' querida... For I'll see no money this side the River."
Most Sensational Offer in Publishing History!

$11.50 WORTH OF "BEST SELLERS" COMPLETE! UNCENCENED! BOUND SEPARATELY!

Here are the 5 books you’ve always wanted to buy—packed with life, love, romance, heart-throbs, and passion. The 5 books acclaimed by critics everywhere... so sensational in theme the public made them "best sellers" overnight at $2 and $2.50 each. Now you get all five reprints for only 98c (plus postage). Truly, the book opportunity of a lifetime! Don't delay!

GEORGIE MAY • MAXWELL Boedelnheim
What happens to the glamorous girls who live in the city's "segregated" districts? To men who thirst for these haunts of wine, women and song? It is told in this sensational expose of the life and loves of a street-walker... of lurid passions in gin soaked belfires!

PRIVATE SECRETARY • LAN BREMER Schütze

FIVE SISTERS • VIOLET KASIRNE
The breath taking novel of five sisters who break the shackles of convention and restraint to fulfill their romantic destinies on the Riviera! Fierce in their devious. They love, tormented by jealousy, their adventures in love make this an enthralling book. Why wonder its daring revelations shocked London as well as America.

GOLD MEDAL BOOKS, INC.
1270 Sixth Avenue New York City

DESSERT OF LOVE • FRANCOIS MAURRAS
Only a great French author could write so penetrating a novel of passion... of a dissolute father and worthless son who both became enmeshed with the same coquette. From the sin palaces of Montmartre to the silken boudoirs of the Champs Elysee, you follow their profligate paths.

SHOW GIRL • J P. McEvoy
The spicy story of Dixie Dugan--"the hottest little wench that ever shook a scanty at a tired business man." Written by the man that knows every bright light and dark corner on Broadway. As one critic said: "Call it a wow."

HOW CAN WE DO IT?
That's the first question people ask when they see these 5 novels—in 5 separate and attractive bindings. Mass production is the answer! Where others print in thousands, we print in hundreds of thousands. Where other publishers lose fortunes on "unknowns", we print ONLY proven successes.

YOU TAKE NO CHANCES!
When you buy novels so sensational that they became best sellers overnight at $2 and $2.50 EACH... and get all 5 books for 98c, you can't lose. And when you can return the books within 5 days and get your money back, you do not risk one penny! Since the supply is limited, we suggest you act TODAY!

EDITION LIMITED... MAIL COUPON NOW!

GOLD MEDAL BOOKS, Inc. Dept. AF5
1270 Sixth Ave., New York City
Send the first best sellers C, O, D. I will pay 98c, plus few cents delivery charges. If I am not satisfied I will return the book within 5 days and the full purchase price will be refunded immediately.

NAME ADDRESS
CITY STATE

Enclose $1 with coupon and we will pay all delivery charges. Foreign Orders $1.30 in advance.

Satisfaction Guaranteed or Money Immediately Refunded

Please mention Western Fiction Monthly when answering advertisements
Stop SUFFERING with Athlete's Foot or Ringworm

The U. S. Health Service says:—"Within the past few years many persons have been afflicted with eruptions of the feet and feetMedical knowledge of Ringworm is comparatively recent. It is probable that at least one half of all adults suffer from it at some time."

If you have itchy toes or feet, ACT NOW!

Try this at our risk.

Send no money until satisfied.

Don't wait until blisters break and wet, oozy fluid spreads on surface, or becomes coated with scale. Send for REFUTethe common-sense way to correct the ailment. It first eliminates the old infected tissues—then gives nature a chance to restore the feet to health.

(Sign, clip and mail coupon below.)

SCIENCE DRUG CO.
1908 Milwaukee Ave. Chicago

[Advertisement details]

MANKIND LOSS?

Help your glands by using DR. HOLLOWAY'S VIGOR TREATMENT. Special gland medicine—No. 1 for men, No. 2 for women. You have tried the rest, now try the best. The Doctor's own private prescription. Don't be satisfied until you have tried V160. Feel young at 70. Price $1.00: double strength $4.00. If C. O. D., postage extra.

HOLLOWAY MEDICAL CO. 4904 S. Parkway Dept. 29-E Chicago, Ill.

WHAT CAUSES EPILEPSY?

IS THERE A CURE?

A booklet containing the opinions of famous doctors on this interesting subject will be sent FREE, while they last, to any reader writing to the Educational Division, Dept. AF-5, 545 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

LONELY?

Join a National Church Organization. Sure to have a select helmsmate for you. Stamp and age bring full particulars. REV. JONES, P. O. Box 2400, Kansas City, Mo.

TIRE PRICES CUT!

on GOOD YEAR

GOODRICH- FIRESTONE

FISK-U-S.

AND OTHER

FAMOUS MAKES

Here are the outstanding standard brand tires bargains of the year, repaired by the improved center-coring method and by skilled workmen. You take no risk when you buy from us! Read the old reliable tire house with 15 years of service in this field. Thousands of tires now guaranteed throughout the U. S. Declare our tires give them LONG, SATISFACTORY SERVICE. Buy New at these reduced prices and SAVE MONEY.

Don't Delay — Order Today!

BALLOON TIRES

REGULAR CORD TIRES

<table> <thead>
<tr>
<th>Size</th>
<th>Tube Type</th>
<th>Size</th>
<th>Tube Type</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>21x4.5-21</td>
<td>$2.85</td>
<td>3.00</td>
<td>$1.75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21x4.5-21</td>
<td>$2.90</td>
<td>3.10</td>
<td>$1.80</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21x4.5-21</td>
<td>$3.10</td>
<td>3.20</td>
<td>$2.15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21x4.5-21</td>
<td>$3.30</td>
<td>3.30</td>
<td>$2.35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>21x4.5-21</td>
<td>$3.55</td>
<td>3.55</td>
<td>$2.65</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>

HEAVY DUTY TRUCK TIRES

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Size</th>
<th>Tube Type</th>
<th>Size</th>
<th>Tube Type</th>
</tr> </thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>6-0.6-0.6</td>
<td>$2.50</td>
<td>6-0.6-0.6</td>
<td>$2.50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6-0.6-0.6</td>
<td>$2.50</td>
<td>6-0.6-0.6</td>
<td>$2.50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6-0.6-0.6</td>
<td>$2.50</td>
<td>6-0.6-0.6</td>
<td>$2.50</td>
</tr> </tbody>
</table>

May Issue Now On Sale!

ALL STAR

ADVENTURE FICTION

9 Thrilling World-Wide Action Stories by

Pendexter—Dunn—Carleton—Cunningham—Rud—Pierce—Hall—Carlisle—Hawley

LADIES ONLY!

Use reliable time tested B X MONTHLY RELIEF COMPOUND when nature fails! Don't be alarmed or discouraged but try this remarkable relief compound now depended upon by so many. QUICK ACTING! Brings soothing, satisfying, GLORIOUS RELIEF without pain or inconvenience in some long, unusual, difficult, discouraging, abnormal delays in 1 to 3 days—in only a few hours in some cases according to happy users. WOMEN CONTINUALLY REPORT AMAZING SUCCESS EVEN WHEN OTHER PRODUCTS FAILED. Mrs. W. W. "Used only 1/2 box and got relief with no pain or inconvenience of any kind. They are wonderful." Mrs. L. Q. "Gave me good results. Have been trying various medicines for years, and wish I had B X years ago. Send 3 more boxes." Mrs. G. M. "Delivered nine weeks. Believed in 1 1/2 day." Mrs. N. H. "One box B X worked. I get other medicines failed." Mrs. E. T. "I took 7 doses and got relief." Mrs. A. D. "I only took 4 doses and next morning got relief." Positively contains no "dope," no narcotics, no opiates, no habit-forming drugs, no harsh mineral or metallic drugs. Compounded of the best, strictly pure ingredients according to the late Dr. B. X., B. X. BAIRD. Constitutions used by American and English physicians. Thousands of grateful users everywhere. GUARANTEED PURE & HARMLESS, $2.00. Rushed last class mail, plain sealed box within 1 hour of receipt of order. Trial Size, 25c.

B X PRODUCTS, 1505 East 60th Street, Dept. AF-5, CHICAGO

Please mention Western Fiction Monthly when answering advertisements.
THE WORLD'S GREATEST Oriental and Occidental Privately Printed Books in English on the • SEX and LOVE RELATIONS of MANKIND Amazingly Illustrated
By the Greatest Sexual Anthropologists of the Orient and the Occident

Some of the recent Falstaff Private Publications for adults only are:

1. The EROTIKON
   By Doctor Augustin Cabanes

   The '1001' Strangest Sexual & Amatory Curiosa with 550 CURIOUS RACIAL — Erotic Photographs and illustrations — 500 in color ! ! !

   Anthropological Studies in the SEX LIFE IN ENGLAND ILLUSTRATED as revealed in its Erotic and Curiosa Literature and Art through our own day with Joyce's Ulysses; Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover; etc., etc. with 169 Rare Erotic Illustrations in Color by England's Greatest Masters of Erotic Art: Hogarth, Beardsley, Rowlandson; etc.

   Falstaff's Million Dollar Private Collection Was Used by Dr. Bloch

   MAGICA SEXUALIS ILLUSTRATED EXOTICALLY
   Enter the Sex Sciences and Immortal Arts of Love of All Lands
   By the World-famous French Savants — Dr. Emile Laurent and Prof. Narsar

   • INCOMPARABLY The Greatest Work in any language on this subject • Scientific and Anthropological Studies in ILLUSTRATED JAPANESE SEX RELATIONS
   Thousands of staggering unfoldments not found in any other work Hidden sources in life and letters have been ransacked by the foremost native and European authorities and eyewitnesses of the incredible practices in Japan

   Anthropological Studies on the SEXUAL RELATIONS OF MANKIND Including Oriental, Occidental and Savage Arts, Rites, Customs of Love bewitching discoveries and disclosures derived from his vast travels and practice in strange lands, and his ingenious life-long researches By Prof. Paolo Mantegazzza — Great Anthropologist — Founder of Italian Museum of Anthropology

   Prof. Paolo Mantegazzia's Cultural Anthropological Studies in the SAVAGE ARTS OF LOVE ILLUSTRATED with hundreds of authentic photographs of the love life of all Savage Races

"No serious adult can afford to do without the valuable Falstaff Private Publications or the Falstaff Private Service, unique in America," says a famous American lawyer.

IF YOU ARE A SERIOUS ADULT and want FREE ILLUSTRATED LITERATURE fully describing the above and other erotic masterpieces

Please Mail This Coupon at Once or use your own stationery, giving your age, and mention Dept. 394-A

If you send in this coupon, we will inform you how to get ABSOLUTELY FREE SEX ANATOMY AND TECHNIQUE with 227 Photographs and Illustrations and also the Natural Method of Birth Control. Illustrated

FALSTAFF PRESS, Inc., Dept. 394-A 230 Fifth Ave., New York City

Please send me marked "Personal" and in a sealed envelope your FREE Illustrated Literature on Books on the Sex and Love Relations by Authorities of World Reputation, and how to get FREE the above mentioned books.

NAME............................ Written Signature
ADDRESS..........................
CITY..................................
STATE............................ AGE

Note: FALSTAFF LITERATURE WILL BE SENT TO MATURE PEOPLE ONLY. If you are not a serious adult do not send in coupon.

Please mention Western Fiction Monthly when answering advertisements
SENSATIONAL SALE—BELOW COST
Brand new, guaranteed and tested imported arms
Model: 32 POLICE SPECIAL
$17.45

32 Cal. Auto. 5 shot: $14.95 overall; wt. 20 oz. (Reg. $8.48) $6.65.
HOLSTERS: Automatics—72c; Revolver—25c.
 枚s—$1.75.
Cartridges: Auto. 25 cal. 50c; 32 cal. 75c per 20. Revolver—.32 cal. $1.00—02 cal. $2.00 per 50. (200 Deposit required on C.O.D. orders.)

This offer applies to M.O. Quantity Limited—Order TODAY!
Send 3c for Bargain Catalog: Rifles, S.W.F. Cuffs, Binoculars, etc.
LEE SALES CO. (Dept. TF) 3523 32nd St., N. Y. City

Gallstone
Colic Pain, Stomach Distress, Pain in Right Side
arising functional troubles Liver, Gallbladder, Indigestion, Heartburn, loss of appetite, weakness, constipation, often quickly relieved with this Safe Home Treatment. Avoid operation if possible. Don't suffer longer, send today for FREE trial trial. No obligation. Complete Free. Solventone Co., Dept. C-3, 4303 Cottage Grove, Chicago

OUTDOOR JOBS
WANTED—Names of men desiring steady outdoor jobs—$1,700-$2,400 year; vacation; pleasant, healthful work. Patrol Forests; Protect game. Details Free. Write DELMAR INSTITUTE, A-42, Denver, Colo.

PROSTATE SUFFERERS
Prostate gland acute or chronic, rheumatism, kidney and bladder sufferers send for free trial package, amazing results. Improved. Free details. Write PROSTEX CO., Dept. 76, MIA, MIAMI, OKLA.

Asthma Was Choking Her

Illustration

GOT RELIEF!
Seventeen Years Later—"Still Enjoying Splendid Health!"

December 5, 1916—"I had asthma for 17 years. I coughed most of the time and couldn’t rest, day or night. I tried many things, but grew so weak I could hardly walk across the room. After taking Nacor, I could do most of my housework. That was 8 years ago. I am still feeling fine, with no sign of asthma."—Mrs. Helen R., Nacozar, January 1935.

"I continue in good health and am still praising Nacor. I feel fine with no signs of asthma."—Mrs. Mary Robb, Keyport, N. J.

FREE—No need to suffer asthma torture when blessed relief may be yours. For years Nacor has helped thousands. Their letters and book-let of vital information sent FREE. Write to Nacor Medicine Co., Dept. 2116, State Life Bldg., Indianapolis, Ind.

Sensational Sale—Below Cost
Brand new, guaranteed and tested imported arms
Model: 32 Police Special
$17.45

32 Cal. Auto. 5 shot: $14.95 overall; wt. 20 oz. (Reg. $8.48) $6.65.
Holsters: Automatics—72c; Revolver—25c.
Cartridges: Auto. 25 cal. 50c; 32 cal. 75c per 20. Revolver—.32 cal. $1.00—.38 cal. $2.00 per 50. (200 deposit required on C.O.D. orders.)

This offer applies to M.O. Quantity Limited—Order TODAY!
Send 3c for Bargain Catalog: Rifles, S.W.F. Cuffs, Binoculars, etc.
Lee Sales Co. (Dept. TF) 3523 32nd St., N. Y. City

Gallstone
Colic Pain, Stomach Distress, Pain in Right Side
arising functional troubles Liver, Gallbladder, Indigestion, Heartburn, loss of appetite, weakness, constipation, often quickly relieved with this Safe Home Treatment. Avoid operation if possible. Don’t suffer longer, send today for FREE trial trial. No obligation. Complete Free. Solventone Co., Dept. C-3, 4303 Cottage Grove, Chicago

Outdoor Jobs
WANTED—Names of men desiring steady outdoor jobs—$1,700-$2,400 year; vacation; pleasant, healthful work. Patrol Forests; Protect game. Details Free. Write Delmar Institute, A-42, Denver, Colo.

Prostate Sufferers
Prostate gland acute or chronic, rheumatism, kidney and bladder sufferers send for free trial package, amazing results. Improved. Free details. Write Prostex Co., Dept. 76, Miami, Okla.

Men! Sex Power!!
An astounding scientific discovery for men. $2.00 complete with 20 Vital-Gland Tablets. NOW—super sex power and nerve control for year, without false stimulants.

S. A. ROEBA
P. O. Box 2163

Lonely Hearts

The Mystery Sex
Half Man, Half Woman, or... Who Knows?

Federal Sales Co., Box 244, Dept. 10, Indianapolis, Ind.

Please mention Western Fiction Monthly when answering advertisements.
“BACK TO NATURE”
NATURAL FLESH COLORED PHOTOS

Showing all details in natural colors. These are ACTUAL photos made from 1-50 ORIGINAL AND UNDRAMATIZED PHOTOGRAPHS. Five grades; one of these colored photo-graphics and one full color series of this particular line, all different and all just as natural as you may have seen in the past. If you want quality here it is: send prepaid and select grade of $2.00

FREE : FREE

We are now selling a new series of CARTOON BOOKS and with every order of our Colored Photos, we include without charge, a sample cartoon book to show what we have—ALSO A LIST OF NEW TITLES IN THIS SERIES.

Use coupon below for your orders and FREE CARTOON BOOK.

REGLA COMPANY

2855 Third Avenue. Dept. AF. New York City

REGAL CO.
2855 Third Avenue. Dept. AF

New York City

Gentlemen:

Send me everything listed in your advertisement of Colored Photos, including FREE CARTOON BOOK, all charges prepaid by you. Enclosed find $[amount] in full payment.

( ) Cash ( ) Bill ( ) Money Order ( ) Stamps

Please Print Name and Address

Name:______________________________

Street & No.:______________________

City or Town:_____________________

State:___________________________

Get Rid of PIMPLES

Acne, Blackheads, Oily Skin, etc.

Write at once for Great News about Sensational Home Treatments for acne only $3.00! Result is guarantee in 30 days!Send for Free Brochure, Results Guaranteed.

F. O. Box 2408, Kansas City, Mo.

Try This On Your Hair 15 Days

Let Your Mirror Prove Results. Your hair needs the thinning out, not you need become bald. This DIFFERENT Method stops thinning out of hair, unwilling for limp, shining, hooded, thinned-thinning, or increasing baldness by strengthening, prolonging the life of hair for men and women. Send for free today for 25 cents.

LONESOME?

Let us arrange a romantic correspondence for you and yourself a sweethearts thru America's foremost selected social correspondence club. A friendship ship letter society for lonely ladies and gentlemen. Members everywhere: CONFIDENTIAL, introductions by letter, efficient and continuous service. I have made thousands of lonely people happy—why not you? Write for FREE sealed pamphlets.

Evan Moore, P. O. Box 888

JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA

Photographs Tell the Story

Genuine Photos—All Printed on Gloss Photo Paper

Set "A"—Set of 14 wonderful girl photos in very charming poses to show everything to the best advantage.

Set "B"—16 revealing new cartoons showing horticulturist's experience when the box is out to jump on it AND RUSH IT.

Set "C"—16 actual photos of men and women together! Very intimate, the kind of photos you keep in your private pocket and make sure there are no holes in the picture pocket.

Set "X"—Rare set of 8 clear brilliant photos showing actual snap of topless women. Sure to refer friends. $1 per set or if this is your first order, all 4 sets $2.

A 5¢x extremely spicy enlargement free with all 4 orders.

Express shipments only. Cash, Stamps, Money Order.

NOVELTY SALES, Dept. W, Box 496, Rockford, Illinois

SEX SECRETS

297 pieces of vital, most intimate information that you must know to get the most out of love-life—marriage. Plainly told in our 3 thicken books "Man's Social Life" and "Woman's Social Life." With confidential list for adults only. All for NATIONAL BOOKSELLERS.

DEAL, 21, Owosso, Mich.

Moulding A Mighty Arm

A SPECIAL COURSE ONLY ON ARM BUILDING 25¢

WHY not get an arm of might with the power and grip to obey your physical desires? I have taken weaklings whose arms were scrawny pieces of skin and bone and in a short time developed them into strong men of powerful proportions with bulging biceps and brawny forearms. . . . strong, solid arms of power that are respected by men and admired by women.

This course is especially designed to build every muscle in your arm. It has been scientifically worked out for that purpose. Many of my pupils have developed a pair of biceps shaped like a horseshoe, and just as strong, and a pair of biceps that show their double head formation. The sinewy cables between the biceps and triceps are deep and thick with wire cable-like ligaments. The forearm bulges with bulk, the great supinator lifting muscles become a column of power, and their wrists are alive and wiry with curly sinew.

Send 25¢ for this course today. Why not start now to build a be-man's arm.

You can't make a mistake. The assurance of the strongest armed man in the world stands behind this course. I give you my secret of strength illustrated and explained as you like them. Mail your order now while you can still get this course for only 25¢.

I will not limit you to the arm. Try any one of my courses listed in the coupon at 25¢. Or, try all six of them for only $1.00.

RUSH THE COUPON TODAY!

Mail your order now and I will include a FREE COPY of "HEROES OF STEEL, MUSCLES LIKE IRON." It is a priceless book to the strength fan and movie huffer. Full of pictures of marvelous bodied men who tell you definitely how you can build symmetry and strength the Jowett Way! Reach Out... Grasp This Special Offer!

FREE BOOK WITH PHOTOS OF FAMOUS STRONG MEN

JOWETT INSTITUTE OF PHYSICAL CULTURE

Dept. 71Ed, 422 Pooser St.
Seranton, Pa.

George F. Jowett: Send, by return mail, prepaid, the courses checked below for which I am enclosing.

Moulding a Mighty Arm, 25¢
Moulding a Mighty Back, 25¢
Moulding a Mighty Chest, 25¢
Moulding Mighty Legs, 25¢ Strong Man Stunts Made Easy, 25¢
All 6 Books for $1.00.

Address

Age:__________ PROSTATE
Gland Weakness

Nervous Debility, Frequent Night Rising, Leg Pains, Lame Back, Lumbar, Sexual Weakness, Kidney and Bladder Trouble, Chronic Constipation, Deeper, Beyntness At Night, only relieved by the administration of Prostate over a long period of time, suffering for years altogether.

THOUSANDS AFFLICTED

Thousands of men and women community suffer from these ailments, weaknesses and other physical shortcomings without knowing that they have caused serious internal failure.

MANY DOCTORS ENDORSE MASSAGE

Massaging for the alleviation of Prostate Trouble is old as time, and some of the most noted internists in the medical profession recommend massage as a safe effective treatment. (See Reference Book of the Medical Sciences, Vol. VII, 3rd Edition.)

USE "PROSGER"—a new invention which enables any man to massage his Prostate Gland in the privacy of his home. It often brings relief with the first treatment and must help or it costs you nothing. No Drugs or Electricity.

UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF GRATITUDE

The following are extracts from letters received, which are on file in our office; the complete letters and addresses will be sent free to any one interested in inquiring for them.

Mr. Wm. F. Lees, 101 Fifth Avenue, New York, writes: "The Prosger is splendid. I would not be without it."

Mr. Henry Zitman, Seymour, Indiana, says: "I will say much this for the Prosger. It has saved me from an operation."

Mr. Judge F. B. Custer, R. D. 1, Wilmot, Indiana, writes: "I have the Prosger and I love it. I wish to write to the Prosger Co., 415 W. 33rd St., New York, N.Y."

FREE BOOKLET EXPLAINS TRIAL OFFER.

A one cent post card with your name and address plainly written is all that is necessary, address card to:

MIDWEST PRODUCTS CO.
B-4705, Kalamazoo, Mich.

LILLY & MACK
THE LATEST STUFF

The French Stenographer, Adam and Eve, Kip & Alice, Maggie & Jigs, Dumb Dora, Boss & Babes, Toots & Edna, Harold & Mabel and many others. Also 50 new pictures of French Men and Women in passionate love scenes and other interesting subjects. All pictures are post card size and mailed free.

FREE—25 French Pictures—bedroom scenes, the good stuff. Also 10 pictures of French Women in Baby and Artistic pose. These pictures are post card size and mailed free.

FREE OUTDOOR ADVERTISER

OUTDOOR ADVERTISER CO., 133 Main St., Hollow Park, Me.

FIVE RARE BOOKS, ILLUSTRATED

1. "Kest Women Illustrated," $1.50
2. "Red Plunder Illustrated," 1.25
3. "Four Wives Illustrated," 1.25
4. "Inpatient Virgin Illustrated," 1.25
5. "Thieves Illustrated," 1.50

Complete set five books, $7.50. Cash—Stamps—Money Order.

NOVELTY SALES, P. O. Box 489, Dept. W, Rockford, Illinois

Please mention Western Fiction Monthly when answering advertisements.
The BEST There Is in DENTISTRY

ORDER BY MAIL AT MONEY SAVING PRICES
FREE Sanitary, wrapped impression material and full instructions how to order by mail.
60 DAYS TRIAL cup suction. Restores natural voice and facial expression. DON'T DELAY—WRITE TODAY.

Dr. J. S. Lippert, Plate Specialist for Over 30 Years
Dept. Q
24 E. Van Buren St., Chicago, III.

French Stenographer

FREE—With this order only, we include a set of well made, glossy-finished ACTUAL photos, comprising in all 30 thrilling poses, made from French original negatives of which are of men and women together. Genuine Pinoclo for the connoisseur, who wants quality and not quantity. Actual contact prints much as you would take with your own camera, carefully developed to show all details clearly. All above included and each sealed, prepaid by us on receipt of $1.00 cash, money order or stamps.

FLEUR COMPANY
Dept. A. F.
548 Melrose Ave., New York City

WE MATCH PANTS

To Any Suit!
Double the life of your coat and vest with correctly matched pants, 100,000 patterns. Every pair hand tailored to your measure. For match sent free for your O.K. before pants are made. Fit guaranteed. Send piece of cloth or vest for reference.

SUPERIOR MATCH PANTS COMPANY
209 South State St. Dept. 331
Chicago, Ill.

PILES

DON'T BE OUT

Until You Try This Wonderful Treatment

for pile sufferers. If you have piles in any form write for a FREE sample of Page's Pile Tablets and you will bless the day that you read this. Write today. E. R. Page Co., 405-A7 Page Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

DELAYED WOMEN

FOR QUICK RELIEF

USE KYBO PERIODIC COMPOUND

When troubled with unnaturally painful, disorderly, or irregular menstrual periods, don't be alarmed! KYBO periodic compound has successfully relieved many severe long standing cases that have apparently resisted other treatments with

NO BAD AFTER-EFFECTS:

Convenient and easy to take, QUICK ACTING, NOT A PATENT MEDICINE.

NOT A PILL, TABLET OR LIQUID—it comes to you like a DOCTOR'S PRESCRIPTION—EACH BOX IS DATED.

KYBO PERIODIC COMPOUND, FORMULA XX, Box $2.00
KYBO PERIODIC COMPOUND, FORMULA XXX, specially compounded for unusually obstrinate cases. Box $6.00.

TRIAL SIZE 25c

TAKES ONLY ONCE A DAY!

Deal with a reliable company.

FREE BOOKLET

"HARASLING SECRETS REVEALED" A COMPREHENSIVE TREATISE ON PILES WITH EACH ORDER.

KYBO PRODUCTS CO.
1108 S. State St. Dept. 405
Chicago, Ill.

Behind the Scenes of CRIME

WITH FORMER G-MEN

INVESTIGATOR'S HANDBOOK

Authentic Information

Compiled and Edited by former U. S. "G-Men"

INVESTIGATOR'S HANDBOOK

Also here is "the inside facts" on G-Man methods—most sensational and striking. The secrets never before revealed. How to help stamp out crime. For FREE copy write to:

INVESTIGATOR'S INSTITUTE
National Press Bldg.
Dept. 185, Washington, D. C.

LONESOME?

A Pal, Sweetheart or mate is waiting in e. 1 if through the Star Correspondence Club. Choice members, both sexes, everywhere. Small cost.

Find results Confidential. Some rich. FREE particulars and list. LOIS L. REEDER, Mgr., P. O. Box 549, Palestine, Texas.

Women! Delayed?

Use marvelous MENSTRA when nature fails. POSITIVELY FORCES REMARKABLY SPEEDY RESULTS in many most discouraging abnormal delays, without pain, harm or inconvenience.

QUICKER ACTING

Especially recommended where ordinary relief compounds fail, as QUICKER ACTING and much easier and sooner accomplished by hundreds. MENSTRA is a previous monthly restorer of a type greatly favored by physicians.

SO COSTLY RARELY OFFERED

Costs us only $0.95 per box, ordinary relief compounds, but costs you no more! Tasteless, easy to take. Contains no drugs. No lead, leading drugs, no harsh, drastic mineral poisons to poison the body—only pure, harmless, laboratory-tested vegetable ingredients used for many years by physicians all over the world. Absolutely safe to take, for women report no bad effects at all, after the flow was restored.

PURITY PRODUCTS CO., 6023 HARRISON AVENUE, DEPT. 5AF6, CHICAGO

Please mention Western Fiction Monthly when answering advertisements.
The Forbidden Secrets of Sex are Daringly Revealed

Away with false modesty! At last a famous doctor has told all the secrets of sex in words frank, daring language. No prudish beating about the bush, no veiled hints, but TRUTH, blazed through 576 pages of straightforward facts.

Love is the most magnificent ecstasy in the world... know how to hold your loved one, don’t gleam half-truths from unreliable sources. Now you can know how to end ignorance... fear... and self denial?

Everything pertaining to sex is discussed in daring language. All the things you have wanted to know about your sex life, information about which other books only vaguely hint, is yours at last.

More than 100 Vivid Pictures

The 106 illustrations leave nothing to the imagination... know how to overcome physical mismatching... know what to do on your wedding night to avoid the torturing results of ignorance.

Some will be offended by the amazing frankness of this book and its vivid illustrations, but the world has no longer any use for prudery and false modesty.

Don’t be a slave to ignorance and fear. Enjoy the rapturous delights of the perfect physical love!

Lost love... scandal... divorce... can often be prevented by knowledge. Only the ignorant pay the awful penalties of wrong sex practices. Read the facts, clearly, startlingly told... study these illustrations and grope in darkness no longer.

Send no money!

To show your faith in your satisfaction with this amazing book, we are offering it to you on trial. You send no money—just fill out the coupon below and then when it arrives, in plain wrapper, pay the postman $2.98 plus postage. Keep the book five days, then if you are not completely satisfied, send it back and we will refund your money immediately without question. "Sex Harmony and Eugenics" will not be sold to minors.

What Every Man Should Know

The Sexual Embrace
Secrets of the Nymphomaniac Ministry of Early Marriage Venereal Disease

How to Repair Writhelessness
Sexual Deformity
Ghosts and Sex Instinct
The Truth About Abstinence

What Every Woman Should Know

Joy of Perfect Passion
What to Allow a Lover to Do Intimate Feminine Hygiene Birth Control Chart

How to Attract and Hold Men
Sexual Slavery of Women
Essentials of Happy Marriage
The Sex Organs

There is no longer any need to pay the awful price for one moment of bliss. Read the scientific pathological facts told to bravely by Dr. Rubin. The chapters on venereal disease are alone worth the price of this book!

You want to know, and you should know every thing about sex. Sex is no longer a sin, a mystery, it is your pleasure source for happiness. You owe it to yourself, to the one you love, to tear aside the curtain of hypocrisy and learn the naked truth.

Free! New Book "Why Birth Control?"

This startling book discusses birth control in an entirely new way—Tells you many things about a much discussed subject, "Why Birth Control"—will be a revelation to you. Send free to all those who order "Sex Harmony and Eugenics" at the special price.

Send your order now.

Pioneer Publishing Company, Inc.
Radio City, 1270 Sixth Ave., New York City
To make 50,000 NEW Friends!

These Astounding Genuine Jewelry Values

Sent—NO MONEY DOWN!

2 Diamond BAGUETTE
Now only $19.75
$1.98 a month

LA-1 . . . Now at our most liberal terms! Exquisite styked, modern, genuine Baguette wrist watch at an amazingly low price! The streamlined white, lifetime case is set with a brilliant genuine diamond and fitted with a fully guaranteed and dependable movement. Smart, link bracelet to match. $30.75 value—specially offered at $19.75. Nothing down—Only $1.98 a month.

MEN, Look!!

17 Jewel WALANTHAM "Diplomat"
Now only $24.75

Handsome Genuine leather strap included free!

LA-3 . . . "LADY DIANE" DEO—exquisitely matched engagement and wedding ring ensemble of beautifully engraved 14K Solid White Gold. The specially selected, dazzling genuine blue-white cut-set diamond in the engagement ring makes even more beautiful by the two brilliants on each side, the wedding ring is exquisitely engraved to match. Nothing down—Only $2.79 a month for both complete.

America's Largest Mail Order Credit Jewelers

That's exactly what we mean! No Money Down—Not one cent in advance—No C. O. D. to pay on arrival! All we ask you to do is to examine any of these values for TEN DAYS at our expense. After full free inspection, if you agree with us that our style and quality values challenge duplication by cash or credit jewelers anywhere, take 10 MONTHS to PAY:

Royal offers you the most liberal credit terms without any embarrassment! No red tape—No direct inquiries—No interest or extras. Just send us your name and address and a few personal facts such as age, occupation, etc. (If possible mention 1 or 2 business references). All dealings strictly confidential. After 10 DAYS FREE TRIAL—pay the 10 equal, easy monthly payments, stated under each article, without further obligation.

Written GUARANTEE

Your satisfaction is always assured when you buy at ROYAL. A written guarantee—fully backed by ROYAL—America's Largest Mail Credit Jewelers—accompanies every ring or watch purchased from us giving you absolute protection.

Send for FREE CATALOG

New 32 page "BOOK OF GEMS"

Hundreds of special values in genuine blue-white diamonds, standard watches, fine jewelry, silverware, cameras, radios and gift novelties. Each fully described and pictured. Adults and children. Send now for your copy today!

NO DEPOSIT—NO C.O.D.—10 MONTHS to PAY!

17 Jewel WALANTHAM Outfit
Complete for $19.75

LA-4 . . . A smart, modern, square prong setting engagement ring of high quality at an amazingly low price. The fiery, brilliant genuine blue-white diamond is set in a richly hand engraved and inlaid band of 14K Solid White Gold. Specially priced at $19.75—During this special "new customer" drive our terms are Nothing Down—Only $1.98 a month.

LA-5 . . . Another famous WALANTHAM—one of America's greatest watches at a sensationally low price! Handsomely engraved 12 size white life-time case. Factory guaranteed. Accuracy and dependable. 17 Jewel WALANTHAM movement; complete with crystal, band and chain, only $19.75. Nothing Down—only $1.98 a month.

ROYAL DIAMOND & WATCH CO.
Established 1895
170 BROADWAY N.Y.C.
A Money-Making Opportunity for Men of Character

EXCLUSIVE FRANCHISE FOR

AN INVENTION EXPECTED TO REPLACE

A MULTI-MILLION-DOLLAR INDUSTRY

Costly Work Formerly "Sent Out" by Business Men

Now Done by Themselves at a Fraction of the Expense

This is a call for men everywhere to handle exclusive agency for one of the most unique business inventions of the day.

Forty years ago the horse and buggy business was supreme—today almost extinct. Twenty years ago the phonograph industry ran into many millions—today practically a relic. Only a comparatively few foresighted men saw the fortunes ahead in the automobile and the radio. Yet irresistible waves of public buying swept these men to fortune, and sent the buggy and the phonograph into the discard. So are great successes made by men able to shift the drift in public favor from one industry to another.

Now another change is taking place. An old established industry—an integral and important part of the nation's structure—in which millions of dollars change hands every year—is in thousands of cases being replaced by a truly astonishing, simple invention which does the work better—more reliably—AND AT A COST OFTEN AS LOW AS 2% OF WHAT IS ORDINARILY PAID. It has not required very long for men who have taken over the rights to this valuable invention to do a remarkable business, and allow earnings which in those times are almost unheard of for the average man.

Not a "Gadget"—

Not a "Knick-Knack"—

but a valuable, proved device which has been sold successfully by business men as well as seasoned inventors.

Make no mistakes—this is no novelty—no fad dream contrivance which the inventor hopes to put on the market. You probably have seen nothing like it yet—perhaps never dreamed of the existence of such a device—yet it has already been sold by corporations of outstanding prominence—by dealers of great corporations—by their branches—by doctors, newspapers, publishers—schools—hospitals, etc., etc., and by thousands of small business men. You don't have to convince a man that he should use an electric bell to light his office instead of a gas lamp. Nor do you have to sell the same business man the idea that some day he may need something like this invention. The need is already there—the money is usually being spent right at that very moment—and the desirability of saving the greatest part of this expense is obvious immediately.

Some of the Savings You Can Show

You walk into an office and put down before your prospect a prospect from a sales organization showing that they did work in their own office for $1 which formerly could have cost them over $200. A building supply corporation pays our man $20, whereas the bill could have been $5,600! An automobile dealer pays our representative $51, whereas the expense could have been over $1,000. A department store has expense of $80.60, possible one could do outside the business well over $200. And so on. We could not possibly list all cases here. There are just a few of the many actual cases which we cite in your hands to work with. Practically every line of business and every section of the country is represented by these field reports which hammer score dealing, convincing money-making opportunities which hardly any business man can fail to understand.

EARNINGS

One man in California earned over $1,600 per month for three months—close to $5,000 in 90 days' time. Another writes from Delaware—"Since I have been operating (just a little less than a month of actual selling) and not the full day at that, because I have been getting organized and had to spend at least half the day at the office; consequently, to this date I have had only one full day, and have made rather a little in excess of one thousand dollars profit for one month." A Connecticut man writes he has made $55.00 in a single day's time. Texas man nets over $300 in a week's time. Space does not permit mentioning here more than these few random cases. However, they are sufficient to indicate that the worthwhile future in this business is coupled with immediate earnings for the right kind of man. One man with us has already made over a thousand sales on which his earnings ran from $5 to $60 per sale and more. A great deal of the work was repeat business. Yet he had never done anything like this before coming with us. This is the kind of opportunity this business offers. The fact that this business has attracted to it successful business men as former bankers, executives of businesses—men who demand only the highest type of opportunity and income—gives a fairly good picture of the kind of business this is. Our door is open, however, to the young man looking for the right field in which to make his start and develop his future.

Not a "Gadget"—

Not a "Knick-Knack"—

Profits Typical of the Young, Growing Industry

Going into this business is not like selling something offered in every grocery, drug or department store. For instance, when you take a $7.50 order, $5.83 can be your profit. On $500 worth of business, your sham can be $1,168.70. The very least you get as your part of every dollar's worth of business you do is 87 cents—every dollar's worth $6.70, on a hundred dollars' worth $67.00—in other words two thirds of every order you get in is yours. Not only on the first order—but on repeat orders—and you have the opportunity of earning an even larger percentage.

This Business Has Nothing to Do With House canvassing

No need for you to know anything about high-pressure selling. "Selling is" in the ordinary sense of the word. Instead of hammering away at the customer and trying to "force" a sale, you make a dignified, business-like call, leave the installation—whenever the customer says he will accept—at our risk, let the customer sell himself after the device is in and working. This does away with the need for pressure on the customer—it eliminates the handicap of trying to get the money before the customer has really convinced himself 100%. You simply tell what you offer, showing proof of success in this customer's particular line of business. Then leave the invention without a dollar down. It starts working at once. In a few short days, the installation should actually produce enough cash money to pay for the deal, with profits above the investment coming in at the same time. You then call back, collect your money. Nothing is so convincing as our offer to let results speak for themselves without trying to get the customer. While others fail to get even a hearing, our men are making sales running into the hundreds. They have received the attention of the largest firms in the country, and sold to the smaller businesses by the thousands.

No Money Need Be Risked

in trying this business out. You can measure the possibilities and be not a dollar. If you are looking for a business that is not over-sold—a business that is just beginning—a business that is not a "downgrade"—a business that offers the buyer relief from a burden—a burdensome, but unanswerable expense—a business that has a prospect practically in every office, then contact us into which you can set foot regardless of size—that is a necessity but does not have any price cutting to contend with a better reception do—that because you control the sales in exclusive territory is your own business—that pays more on some individual sales than men make in a work and sometimes in a month's time—if such a business looks as if it is worth investigating, get in touch with us at once for the rights in your territory—don't delay because the chance is that if you do wait, someone else will have written to us in the meantime—and if it turns out that you were the better man—we'll both be sorry. So for convenience, use the coupon below—but send it right away—we wire if you wish. But do it now. Address

F. E. ARMSTRONG, President
Dep. 409BF, Mobile, Ala.

RUSH FOR EXCLUSIVE TERRITORY PROPOSITION

F. E. ARMSTRONG, Pres., Dept. 409BF, Mobile, Ala.
Without obligation to you, send me full information on your proposition.

Name
Street or Route
City

State

Addressee