INTRODUCTION

In 1994 my friend and colleague Michael Loewe of Cambridge University suggested that it might be possible for me to prepare a biographical dictionary of Later Han to serve as a companion to the one he was already engaged on for the Former Han dynasty. His compilation was published by in 2000 as A Biographical Dictionary of the Qin, Former Han and Xin Periods (221 BC-AD 24); the present work is intended to serve in tandem.

THE SCOPE OF THE WORK

Following Dr Loewe's plan, it was agreed that the dictionary should attempt to provide an account of every person recorded as having lived under Later Han or, in the case of non-Chinese people, in relationship to its government. The dynastic period is dated from the proclamation of Liu Xuan 劉玄, the Gengshi 更始 Emperor, in 23, and concludes with the abdication of Liu Xie 劉協, Emperor Xian 獻帝, in 220 AD.

There are some problems of demarcation at the beginning and the end of this nominal period. For the first, we adopted the rule of thumb that if a person was identified as a subject of Wang Mang, his/her details would be provided by the earlier volume. If they served or dealt with the restored Han dynasty, they would be included here. There are of course some overlaps, but in general such men as Wang Yi 王邑, who served Wang Mang and died with him in 23, has a biography only in Dr Loewe's compilation, while Guo Qin 郭欽, who surrendered to Han and was enfeoffed by the Gengshi Emperor, appears also here.

The last years of the dynasty present greater problems. Liu Xie held title as emperor from the middle of 189 until his abdication in favour of Cao Pi 曹丕 and the empire of Wei 魏 on 11 December 220, but he never controlled the government, and his reign saw thirty years of division and conflict between contending warlords. Much of Sanguo zhi 三國志, "The Record of the Three Kingdoms," deals with events which took place before the end of Han, and Cao Cao 曹操, one of the great figures of that romantic age and the founder of the state of Wei, remained a subject of the dynasty until his death.

It is in these circumstances that the reference to the Three Kingdoms appears in the title of this work, and I have sought to deal with every person recorded as having made his or her mark on history up to 220. Many leading figures of the third century AD are known or can be assumed to have been born before that year, but they are not normally given an entry unless they played a role in events up to that cut-off date.

It may be observed that the number of people dealt with is more than that for Dr Loewe's volume. His contained six thousand entries; this has more than eight thousand. Material for the history of Qin, Han and Xin is largely contained within the standard histories Shi ji 史記 and Han shu 漢書, but Later Han produced a great number of ancillary writings, such as family and local histories, many of which have survived in whole or in part, while the vast majority of stele from the Han period were composed and carved in the second century AD. I discuss this matter further in the section on sources below.

FORMAT OF THE ENTRIES

Where possible, information at the beginning of each entry is provided as follows:

Surname 姓 xing + personal name 名 ming, style 字 zi [in brackets], years of birth and death (in brackets), followed by commandery unit of registration;

Sample: Ban Gu 班固 [Mengjian 孟堅] (32-92); Youfufeng.

Where a personal name is not known, but the style is, the style is presented in brackets;

Sample: Gongsun [Boda] 公孫伯達.

Where a surname is unknown or uncertain, or where both the personal name and the style are unknown, this is indicated;

Samples: Guo 郭 [personal name unknown]

Hong 弘 [surname unknown]

[Yuanbin (style)] 元賓 [surname and personal name unknown].

Variant characters and or readings are indicated and cross-referenced;

Samples: Liu Desheng 劉德升/昇 [Junsi 君嗣]

Lao Xiu 牢脩 or Lao Shun 順; also, probably mistakenly, as Lao Chuan 川

Ma Fang 馬訪 also as Zhen Fang 甄訪

Zhen Fang 甄訪 see Ma Fang 馬訪.

Entries are arranged in alphabetical order of the transcription of the name; where the transcription is the same, they are listed in approximately chronological order.

The style served as an intimate personal name, used only by close friends and relatives, or, in somewhat contradictory fashion, as the literary name, appended to published works. It is not always easy to distinguish a style from a two-character personal name, and I have been conservative in identifying styles as such. Notable indicators are the characters bo 伯, zhong 仲, zi 子 and ji 季, which were commonly awarded to the first, second, third and subsequent sons of a family.¹

In many texts, people are referred to simply by their style [e.g. Guo Tai 郭泰, frequently as Guo Linzong 林宗], and some are best known by their style [e.g. Liu Yan/Yin 劉縝, usually as Liu Bosheng 伯升]. Because of the importance of these secondary personal names, I attach a List of Styles recorded for men and women of Later Han.

All dates are given as AD unless otherwise specified. Dates of birth and death appear at the head of the entry only when they can be reliably placed within a calendar year; otherwise they are indicated in the body of the item.

While recognising that the Chinese year ends in late January or early February of the West, I have followed the convention which expresses the Chinese year by its major Western equivalent; unless, of course, more precise dating is required. Thus the death of Liu Zhi 劉志, Emperor Huan 桓帝 occurred on 25 January 168, in the winter at the very end of the Chinese year 167/168. His successor Liu Hong 劉宏, Emperor Ling 靈帝, ascended the throne on 17 February 168, at the beginning of the following Chinese year; both the end of Emperor Huan's reign and the beginning of Emperor Ling's are generally referred to as taking place in 168. Fortunately, such confusion does not often arise.

Measurements given by Han Chinese units are generally followed by Western metric approximations. Thus Chen Wu is described as seven feet (尺 chi) seven inches (寸 zun) tall [178 cm], and grain is measured by dou 斗 [2 litres].

The commandery unit identified at the head of an entry is the person's formal place of registration.² Some names of commanderies or kingdoms changed during the course of the dynasty; where this may be significant, variants are given with a dividing stroke;

Sample: Cui Lie 崔烈 [Weikao 威考] (d.192); Anping/Boling.

In a few cases, people were able to change their formal place of residence; this is indicated by an arrow-head;

Sample: Zhang Huan 張奐 [Ranming 然明] (104-181); Dunhuang>Hongnong.

Characters for place-names are not normally provided in the body of the entries, but a Table of Provinces and Commandery Units, including characters, is presented at the end of the biographies. Characters for counties and other units are given in the general index.

Present-day place-names are normally rendered in the style of the tenth edition of The Times Atlas of the World.

² Some leading families, notably those connected to the throne such as the Dou 竇 or the Liang 梁, while formally registered in an outlying region, were in practice resident at the capital.

A survey of The Administrative Structure of Later Han provides characters for the most important offices and titles; these and some less common ones are also listed in the Index.

Though I have largely followed the system devised by Professor HH Dubs and developed by Professor Hans Bielenstein, I have made amendments, chiefly for the sake of brevity. For example, I render the title taishou 太守, which Dubs and Bielenstein have as "Grand Administrator," simply as "Administrator"; the change from shou to taishou was significant in Qin and Former Han, but taishou was used throughout Later Han. This and other changes, notably the rendering of ministerial titles, are explained in the survey, and I append a table of comparative renderings.

At the end of most entries there are one or more bibliographical citations. These are not intended to be full or in any way comprehensive, but rather provide a first point of reference. When a person has a substantial biography in a Hou Han shu or Sanguo zhi, this is indicated by an asterisk*.

Most bibliographical references relate to early texts but in some cases, where the argument is complex but convincing, I may cite only a modern scholar; readers must examine the evidence that he or she puts forward and decide for themselves.

The rulers of Later Han are best known to history by their posthumous titles, so that the founding sovereign Liu Xiu is commonly referred to as Emperor Guangwu. I usually follow that convention, but entries for each ruler appear under their surname and personal name, with cross-references from the imperial title.

SOURCES FOR THE ENTRIES: BOOKS

Most of our information on Later Han comes from the standard history Hou Han shu 後漢書, whose annals and biographies were compiled by Fan Ye 范曄 in the early fifth century. The Treatises, which had been composed separately, as part of the Xu Han shu 續漢書 of Sima Biao 司馬彪 in the third century, were later combined with the work of Fan Ye to form the official history, whose first formal edition was prepared in 1022.³

There were a number of other histories of the Later Han, some of which have completely disappeared, while others survive in part or in fragmentary quotation. The most important are Dongguan Han ji 東觀漢記, compiled as an official record at intervals throughout the dynasty, the Hou Han ji 後漢紀 by Yuan Hong 袁宏 of the fourth century, and the Hou Han shu of Xie Cheng 謝承 of the early third century. Some parts of Xie Cheng's work, and fragments from six others, are collected in the Qijia Hou Han shu 七家後漢書. Twenty-four chapters of Dongguan Hanji survive from an original 143, while the Hou Han ji of Yuan Hong appears largely complete.

Sanguozhi 三國志, compiled by Chen Shou 陳壽 of the third century, was supplemented by the commentary of Pei Songzhi 裴松之, who presented the full work to Liu Yu 劉裕, first emperor of the Song 宋 dynasty, in 420. Chen Shou describes the history of the three rival states, Wei, Shu-Han 蜀漢 and Wu 吳, beginning with their founders, Cao Cao, Liu Bei 劉備, and Sun Jian 孫堅 and his son Sun Ce 孫策, and including other leading figures such as the usurper Dong Zhuo 董卓 and the warlords Yuan Shao 袁紹, Liu Biao 劉表 and Liu Zhang 劉璋. The work is formally composed entirely of biographies, but those of the various rulers can take the form of annals.

Pei Songzhi's commentary is more than a set of annotations to the text compiled by Chen Shou, for he put together many extracts from other works to supplement and sometimes contradict Chen Shou's account of events. His eclectic selection included regular histories, family chronicles and, perhaps most notably, local records. Many of these are preserved only in the fragments quoted by Pei Songzhi, but they demonstrate the wide spectrum of literary and historical material which was available during Later Han and in the first centuries which followed.⁴

Some works survive in more substantial form. Notable are the Fengsu tongyi 風俗通義 of Ying Shao 應劭, from the end of Later Han, and Huayang guo zhi 華陽國志 by Chang Qu 常璩, a history and gazetteer for present-day Sichuan composed in the mid-fourth century, which is largely intact. The Shuijing zhu 水經注 of Li Daoyuan 酈道元, from the early sixth century, after the time of Pei Songzhi, also preserves geographical and historical information in its descriptions of the courses of the rivers of China. Sources reconstructed from quotations are listed in the bibliography of Early Works Cited, while other titles mentioned in various entries are listed among Literary and Scholarly Works of Later Han.

One feature of the world of Later Han and the centuries which followed is the strong interest in local history and family lineage. This was reflected in works such as Huayang guo zhi, and in a whole genre of writing on worthy men of particular regions, such as Sanfu jue lu 三輔決錄 "Evaluative Records of the Three Adjuncts" by Zhao Qi 趙岐/歧, dealing with gentlemen from the commanderies about the ancient capital of Chang'an 長安, and similar compilations with titles like qijiu zhuan 耆舊傳 "Venerable Men and Ancient Affairs" or xianxian zhuan 先賢傳 "Accounts of Worthy Men of the Past" for Chenliu 陳留, Shanyang 山陽, Runan 汝南 and Yingchuan 潁川 commanderies and for other territories.⁵

In the same way, biographies in Sanguo zhi and its commentary, and in later histories such as Jin shu 晉書, seek to give an account of the ancestry of each individual. Some are exaggerated and unreliable, but a few lineages were recorded through centuries, while many men who might otherwise have remained unknown are remembered through the achievements of their more distinguished descendants.⁶

SOURCES FOR THE ENTRIES: STELE

The same sense of local interest and family pride displayed in books and essays in the last years of Later Han was also shown by the erection of stele, whether in commemoration of public works or to honour an individual, family or clan. In her discussion of Later Han stone inscriptions, Ebrey 80 estimated that there were rather more than three hundred such texts still extant; and others have been discovered in the past twenty-five years. Ebrey noted the use made of them by Yen Keng-wang in his study of local government, by Lao Kan in his work on roads and bridges, and by Yang Shu-ta for information on rituals of marriage and death. As she observed, moreover, inscriptions can be of great value to social historians, for the information they provide on individuals of lower rank who seldom appear in official histories, and for the ordering of their lists of sponsors, which indicate the structures of power and responsibility in local communities.

Stele inscriptions survive in two forms. Some stones are physically extant, and a number have been excavated or otherwise discovered in modern times, but the majority are preserved as copies, notably through the work of the Song dynasty scholar Hong Kua/Guo 洪适, whose Li shi 隸釋 and its continuation Li xu 隸續 quoted or recorded 185 such texts, together with his own commentary. A further twenty-six appear in the collected works of Cai Yong 蔡中郎文集, and other compilations which I have referred to, both ancient and modern, are cited in Part III of the bibliography of Early Works Cited.

In dealing with this material, I generally provide entries for individuals mentioned in the body of the texts, though in some cases the transcription is too uncertain to be used. I do not, however, include sponsors of a commemorative stele unless they are mentioned by other sources. Though a full analysis of all the names has yet to be compiled in a Western language, the present work is not the place for it: the extra number of minor entries would add considerably to its length, and such a basic list of names and incidental functions is better kept for a separate study.⁷ Similarly, I do not provide entries for the minor officials, soldiers, citizens and convicts whose

The introductions to the genealogical tables of Xin Tang shu [XTS 71A-75B] summarise the claims of many leading families over several hundred years; in his commentary to HHS, Hui Dong cites a number of these references under the guise Shi xi 世系, and Ebrey 78:157-173 discusses the value and reliability of the tables, noting that they were evidently compiled from several different types of source, including private genealogies and more public inscriptions. Some introductions are summary, others, evidently based upon family records, are voluminous. Compiled many centuries later, however, they can naturally be confused and/or exaggerated, and there are many obvious errors and inconsistencies.

For the present volume, I have sought to identify and provide entries for people whom the Tang and Song historians recorded as having been active during Later Han. One must, however, be cautious in accepting any entry which relies solely upon a reference to XTS: in some cases I indicate specific doubts, and I may not provide entries for all claimed ancestors. For examples, see the entry for Xiao Wangzhi 蕭望之 and the discussions of the family of Xin Bozhen 辛伯? [XTS 73A:2880] and of the lineage ascribed to Jia Xu 賈誦 [XTS 75B:3387-88].

names appear in the corpus of wooden and bamboo strips and fragments found in the north-western deserts of Gansu and Xinjiang: on these, see notably Loewe 67.

One might imagine that stele, as contemporary and apparently permanent documents, would be more reliable than other texts, written on such ephemeral substances as paper, and subject to the vagaries of copyists. This, however, is not always true. Firstly, as we have observed, a great number of inscriptions survive only because they were copied later, while in some cases the stones themselves are of doubtful authenticity: forgery can be profitable and is not uncommon. So provenance and transmission are sometimes uncertain, while many characters are missing or can be misread, and there are specialised formulae. Stele can thus be difficult to decipher and their interpretation is often unclear.⁸

Besides this, one must be aware that the interest and pride in local and family affairs which was taken by the people of Later Han not only produced increasing numbers of stele, but also encouraged exaggerated claims for the ancestry and personal achievements of the men and women who were honoured by such commemorative texts. As Ebrey 80 and Bielenstein 81 have remarked, though inscriptions are generally contemporary, and their information may enhance or correct that which is to be found in the histories, they are frequently eulogistic and omit facts which may reflect badly upon their subject.⁹ Stele are important, but some of their composers had a special agenda.

THE RELIABILITY OF THE TEXTS

We have already considered the problems of stele inscriptions, which can be affected by copyists' errors, by the difficulty of identifying characters, and by the possibility of forgery. The same considerations, of course, apply to early books: an enormous quantity has been lost; there are many passages, even in the works which survive, which present difficulties of interpretation; and very often one must suspect that the text has been corrupted. Huayang guo zhi, for example, is a well-designed history of present-day Sichuan, with a quantity of detail, albeit sometimes anecdotal or apparently unreliable. Its transmission, however, is far less secure than that of standard histories such as Hou Han shu and Sanguo zhi, and there are many places where names and dates are confused.¹⁰

Similar problems are found in such texts as Shuijing zhu and the Fengsu tongyi of Ying Shao: the text of the latter is often fragmentary and contains many doubtful readings, so it is not always possible to comprehend the significance of an anecdote or incident. And the same may be said of the surviving portions of Dongguan Hanji, the Hou Han shu of Xie Cheng, and the Hou Han ji of Yuan Hong, though the difficulties are seldom so serious as for Huayang guo zhi and Fengsu tongyi.

It is encouraging, on the other hand, to find that the official standard histories, Han shu, Hou Han shu and Sanguo zhi with the Pei Songzhi commentary, present substantially fewer areas of uncertainty. Despite the prejudices of the authors, sometimes evident and sometimes only discovered by research and analysis, their works have benefited from generations of careful scholarship, and modern commentaries, such as those compiled by Wang Xianqian for Han shu and Hou Han shu, and by Lu Bi for Sanguo zhi, ensure that we can have a high level of confidence in the reliability of the texts now before us.

Even when we can be reasonably confident that the material is original, however, there still remain questions on its accuracy and interpretation. This is a problem for students of any period and place, and scholars of Han extremely grateful for her advice, guidance and most generous help to my work on this part of the project.

After Cai Yong composed the funerary inscription for Guo Tai 郭泰 in 169, he is said to have remarked that it was the only eulogy he had been able to write without any sense of embarrassment: HHS 68/58:2227.

are well aware of the conscious or unconscious biases of the compilers of the material with which they deal. Early Chinese historians, reflecting Confucian tradition, were concerned to report events honestly, but they also regarded history as a matter of morality. This could affect their understanding and rendering of the truth, while the social and philosophical background common to such literate gentlemen meant that their view of the world reflected that of the landed gentry and traditional leaders of the community. At the end of his admirable essay on the historiography of Hou Han shu, Bielenstein concludes that, while the work is not specifically partial to the gentry or the imperial clan, it is prejudiced against those who placed themselves outside what were considered to be orderly relations, thus opposing the Mandate of Heaven. In similar fashion, Mather comments on the manner in which Yuan Hong, author of Hou Han ji, expressed therein his quasi-naturalistic theory of history, stressing the importance of the relationship between ruler and subject and between father and son.¹¹ Given such opinions amongst those who recorded events, it is not surprising if eunuchs, and others who were regarded as usurping power, have a very bad press,¹² while those who sought the reform of government on Confucian lines, or who were considered to have behaved in the manner of true gentlemen, were reported with tolerance and approval.¹³

There remains, of course, the further question of the authors' own perceptions of reality: What events that are described really happened? What stories have been invented to demonstrate moral qualities? And which accounts of the magical, mystical or supernatural were given credence?

It is not inappropriate that Fan Ye compiled his Hou Han shu at the same time as Pei Songzhi prepared his commentary to Sanguo zhi, and while Liu Yiqing was working on Shishuo xinyu 世說新語 "A New Account of Tales of the World." This last is a collection of anecdotes relating to historical figures, primarily concerned to develop an impression of character and circumstance, and to entertain their readers; as Mather observes, the collection "was, at least in part, a fictionalization rather than sober history"¹⁴ and some anecdotes are better seen as analogies, not necessarily factual.¹⁵ Shishuo xinyu was primarily a work of entertainment, and its lineal descendants are the fictional stories and plays of later centuries, culminating, at least as regards the end of Han, in the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 三國演義, attributed to Luo Guanzhong 羅貫中 of the late fourteenth century.¹⁶ I seldom cite Shishuo xinyu as a source, but I do provide references to Mather's summary biographies, and these in turn list the items in Liu Yiqing's compilation.

The blurred spectrum from history to anecdote to fiction may likewise be found in Shi ji and Han shu, and certainly within Hou Han shu and Sanguo zhi. Many of the works quoted by Pei Songzhi are accounts of marvels or experiences of the supernatural, such as the Soushen ji 搜神記 "Record of Enquiry about the Spirits" by Gan Bao 干寶, while others provide anecdotes of doubtful authenticity. For its part, Hou Han shu has chapters on the lives of magicians and diviners, full of mysterious and supernatural achievements, and a number of pure ghost stories.¹⁷

¹⁷ HHS 82/72A and B have biographies of the Fangshu 方術, while among the men of Exceptional Conduct 獨行 in HHS 81/71, Wang Chun 王惇 had close encounters with the supernatural.

Given these conditions, a collection of biographies must include items and incidents of uncertain factual value. My chief purpose, like that of Dr Loewe, is to provide a survey of the information which may be found in the sources, not specifically to compose a series of critical biographies. For the most part, therefore, I accept information at face value, with occasional caveats ("we are told that") and some discussion of contradictions and variant accounts. Any scholar, however, must hold to the motto Caveat Lector.

With all these precautions, I present below A Short History of the Later Han Dynasty, accompanied by a Chronology, to discuss political, economic and social developments of the period, and to provide a historical context to the biographies.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This project has required analysis of a great variety of topics, and I have been fortunate to receive advice and support from many different scholars. In particular, I thank Dr Michael Loewe of Cambridge University, Professor Amanda Brown of the University of Michigan at Ann Arbor, and Professor Liu Ts'un-yan of the Australian National University, for their regular guidance and assistance. Other colleagues whom I have consulted with great profit include Michael Nylan, William H Nienhauser, Robert Joe Cutter, William G Crowell, Burchard Mansvelt Beck, Hans van Ess, Patricia Ebrey, Margaret Pearson, Ch'en Ch'i-yün, J Michael Farmer, Nicola di Cosmo and Igor de Rachewiltz.

I am grateful to the Chiang Ching-kuo Foundation for supporting the editorial work required to make the manuscript suitable for publication, and for the research and editorial assistance of Elizabeth Kat. Patricia Radder and Renee Otto of Brill have been most helpful editors, and have arranged for the maps to be drawn by Mrs F E Derksen-Janssens. My special thanks go to Karina Pelling, for her energy and patience in preparing the final manuscript, and to Greg Young, who has given constant support through his knowledge of Chinese and his skill in computing.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE LATER HAN DYNASTY

WANG MANG AND THE GENGSHI EMPEROR¹

In 9 AD, as Wang Mang took the imperial throne and proclaimed his new dynasty of Xin, he had a degree of acquiescence among the political class, not necessarily accompanied by great enthusiasm or trust. The imperial lineage of the Liu family, however, had been greatly weakened by the failure of Emperors Cheng and Ai to leave heirs, and the death of Liu Jizi, Emperor Ping, in 6 AD, meant that there were no surviving descendants of Emperor Yuan, who had died in 33 BC. Wang Mang's puppet replacement, Liu Ying, traced his ancestry back to Emperor Xuan, who had died in 49 BC, but that was a long way away. Wang Mang backed his choice with favourable portents, while in 6 AD and in 7 he crushed rebellions in favour of a more senior nominee. His manoeuvrings thereafter, and his establishment of a new, usurping regime, were largely unchallenged by Liu loyalists.²

By 15 AD, however, there were signs of trouble from several different quarters. The Yellow River had burst its banks in 11 AD, flooding much of the North China plain, and there were also plagues of locusts. As the central government could offer no adequate assistance, many people were driven from their homes and formed into bands, first for self-protection and then for plunder. By the early 20s, as the refugees were numbered in the tens of thousands, they challenged and destroyed the structures of local power, and in 22 the main horde, now known as the Red Eyebrows, was strong enough to defeat imperial armies.

During this same period, Wang Mang's ambitions and aggression on the frontier had led him into dispute with the Xiongnu, nominal tributaries of Han. By 19 AD he was engaged in a major quarrel with the Shanyu Yu, setting up a rival government and gathering a great army along the frontier. Though the enterprise came to nothing, the troops remained on station in the north, a drain upon the economy and a distraction from troubles within the empire.

As disturbance along the Yellow River spread south to the Yangzi, more bandit groups were formed. Among them, the so-called Troops from the Lower Yangzi moved west into the middle basin of that river, while two other bands arose in Jiangxia. From there, they were recruited to an alliance with the Liu clan of Nanyang, dispossessed kinsfolk of the former imperial lineage, and these Han loyalists added their own attacks on the weakened power of Wang Mang.

Initiative for the movement to restore the Han came from Liu Bosheng, member of a cadet branch of the clan. His enterprise was not uniformly successful, but in the summer of 23 a Han army gained major victory at Kunyang in Yingchuan, and a few days later the capital of Nanyang was taken by siege. The insurgents now proclaimed their own emperor, their armies continued to advance, and in the winter Chang'an was taken and Wang Mang was killed.

The new sovereign of Han, however, was not Liu Bosheng, but his cousin Liu Xuan, known from his reign-title as the Gengshi Emperor. Liu Bosheng had been rejected by the commoner Troops, and soon after Liu Xuan assumed the imperial title he had his rival killed.

Establishing his regime at Chang'an, Liu Xuan sent commissioners to the provinces to proclaim his government and to establish local authority. One of these, sent north into Ji province, was Liu Xiu, younger brother of Liu Bosheng. Liu Xiu had taken part in the success at Kunyang, and he had assured the new ruler of his loyalty, but he was fortunate to receive such an independent command. In the winter of 23 he was threatened by the rebellion of Wang Lang in Zhao, but by the summer of 24 his troops had destroyed the pretender and Liu Xiu held a strong position in the north.

In the mean time, the chaotic forces of the Red Eyebrows continued to move to the west. By the latter part of 24 they were approaching Chang'an, and in the autumn they took the city. Liu Xuan was captured and killed, but Liu Xiu had already taken the imperial title for himself.³

EMPEROR GUANGWU (25-57) AND THE RESTORATION OF EMPIRE

Predictably, the Red Eyebrows proved incapable of maintaining themselves at Chang'an: by the end of 27 their strength was exhausted and they were compelled to surrender to Liu Xiu. Elsewhere in the empire, a number of local and regional leaders sought to establish independent regimes, and some took the imperial title, but with territory extending in a broad band to the northeast Liu Xiu was comparatively well placed to extend his authority. By the end of 25 he had received the surrender of the Gengshi troops in Luoyang and established his capital there, and over the next few years he eliminated his rivals across the North China plain and in Jing province. With the support of the warlord Dou Rong he held the northwest under control, and Wei Ao, his major opponent in that region, was destroyed in 33. A last campaign into present-day Sichuan removed the claimant emperor Gongsun Shu, and by the middle 30s Guangwu and his restored dynasty of Han were unchallenged in China.

The frontiers

The lands and people south of the Yangzi played little part in the civil war, and though there was endemic trouble with the non-Chinese of Wuling in the middle Yangzi basin the only major rebellion, that of the Cheng [Tr'ung] sisters in present-day Vietnam, was firmly settled by the Han general Ma Yuan in 42. The north, however, remained a source of concern. The Xiongnu Shanyu Yu had supported Guangwu's rival Lu Fang, and even after Lu Fang's defeat the Xiongnu maintained a presence and expand control. By the mid-40s they occupied large tracts of imperial territory, and their raiding parties reached the North China plain and the Wei River near Chang'an.

The death of the Shanyu Yu in 46, however, was followed by a succession dispute, while the steppe was affected by locusts and drought. Taking advantage of confusion among their enemies, imperial agents encouraged the prince Bi, unsuccessful claimant to the throne, to establish a separate state in the Ordos region, and in 50 this Southern Shanyu was confirmed as an ally and a tributary of Han. As Chinese control was re-established, the former inhabitants were able to return to the north. Not all of them did so, and occupation of these frontier regions was less intense and effective than it had been during Former Han., but for the time being the situation was stabilised by the division of the Xiongnu and Chinese alliance to the Southern party.

The decline of population in the north was matched by an increase in the south. In a process which continued through the dynasty, settlers spread beyond the Yangzi, notably into Changsha and Lingling, the south of present-day Hunan, and into Yuzhang, present-day Jiangxi. The histories tell of frequent rebellions by non-Chinese; but these may better be regarded not so much as evidence of the inherent aggression of the native people but rather as their natural reaction to the steady pressure of alien new-comers from the north. By the middle of the second century the balance of demography within the empire had substantially changed.

Administration

The government of Emperor Guangwu restored most of the structures and systems of Former Han. In the empire at large, some surplus counties were abolished, but the territories of the provinces and commanderies were essentially the same, and previous arrangements for local administration were maintained. There were two major changes: control of salt and iron was removed from the central government and given to local authorities; and the Former Han system of conscription and military training was ended for all except the commanderies of the frontier. Though men could be called up for emergency service, they were not formally skilled in weapons. The threat of internal rebellion was thus reduced, but conscripts from the interior of the empire were now of limited value in dealing with foreign incursions. Henceforth the defence of China would rely chiefly upon professional fighting men, paid for by scutage, aided by non-Chinese auxiliaries from the Xiongnu, Wuhuan and Qiang.

At the court and capital, the system of ministries, offices and secretaries was modelled upon that of Former Han, but the highest level of government was no longer controlled by a single Chancellor responsible to the emperor. Instead, following an initiative from the end of the Former dynasty, there was now a triumvirate of three Excellencies, each with rough equivalence of power. For a strong and active ruler, this was convenient and practicable, but it was not so successful when the throne was occupied by a man less competent or interested. The Imperial Secretariat, moreover, which had the authority to receive reports and prepare decrees and orders, gained greatly from its access to the sovereign; though substantially lower in rank, an energetic Director of the Secretariat could exercise influence comparable to that of an Excellency.

GREAT FAMILIES

A notable aspect of the restoration was the continuity of power among men of family. Though the fall of Wang Mang came from widespread popular revolt and was followed by more than a decade of warfare, most regions of the empire suffered only passing disturbance, and the structures of local society were left largely intact. Landed families held onto their properties, and they maintained their position throughout the dynasty: manorial estates controlled tenant farming and were supported by profitable trade, while local power was enforced on occasion by gangs of retainers.⁴

Such local gentry provided the vast majority of the officials who governed the empire. Social status and economic power ensured that men of family received the education which qualified them for clerical positions in the county, commandery or provincial administrations, and they could likewise be nominated for commissioned office in the imperial service. The magistrates, administrators and inspectors who controlled the major units of local government were commissioned officials, appointed by the capital from regions other than the one that they ruled, but of similar background and interest. So there was understanding and sympathy between the heads of government in the provinces and the gentry leaders of their communities, and the imperial government made repeated and generally unsuccessful efforts to interrupt this natural alliance. Even at the beginning of the dynasty, Emperor Guangwu had great difficulty in establishing a proper land survey for taxation purposes,⁵ largely due to the reluctance of local officials to enforce regulations against men of their own class and kind, and the situation did not improve over the years.

Over time, some families produced a series of individuals who rose to high office, and many subjects of biographies are described as coming from good or well-established official families, with members who served as administrators of commanderies or held ministerial and other high ranks at the imperial capital. During the course of the dynasty, the Yang family of Hongnong and the Yuan of Runan each had the remarkable record of four Excellencies, the highest position in the civil service, but many others, such as the Cui of Boling, the Li of Runan, the Lu of Kuaiji, the Sima of Henei and the Zhou of Lujiang, held substantial posts throughout the empire.⁶ Such families had personal links through clients and colleagues across the empire, and could wield great influence in the broader spheres of government, but they generally retained links to their various homelands. Their instincts were largely conservative, and their moral attitudes were not always favourable to the pretensions and ambitions of the central government.

In some contrast, a few families gained power through direct contact with the imperial throne. In the early years of the dynasty several cliques rivalled one another for influence, associated either with leading supporters of Emperor Guangwu or connected to the imperial house by marriage. Bielenstein has identified three major factions: one group from Nanyang, home country of the emperor, and two from the northwest, led respectively by the leading general Ma Yuan and the north-western warlord Dou Rong.⁷ Both included allies from other clans of different regions, and all sought to confirm their favoured position by marriage into the imperial clan. Guangwu's first empress, the Lady Guo Shengtong, came from the north at a time when he needed support in that region; his second, Yin Lihua, was a woman of Nanyang. The Ma family suffered severe eclipse after the death of Ma Yuan; they were restored to favour when his daughter became the consort of Emperor Ming, but soon after her death they were driven from power by the rival Dou.

In the long term, only a few great clans, the Deng, Dou and Ma, together with the Liang, formerly of Anding, and some others such as the Geng and the Song of Youfufeng, were accepted as suitable for marriage with the imperial house. Of thirteen empresses from the early first century to the end of the second, eleven came from these aristocratic families. The short-lived Empress Yan of Emperor An had relied for support upon the Geng family of the emperor's mother, and the political position of the Empress, later Dowager, He of Emperor Ling and her brother the General-in-Chief He Jin was weakened by their poor social standing.

The contest at court and in the harem could be dangerous, and loss of imperial favour could be fatal, but when they did hold power the prestige of lineage, their contacts and patronage, gave these distant relatives of the imperial house status and influence far beyond even the highest official families of the empire. Their view of the world, moreover, was quite different: long removed from local origins, they were chiefly concerned with the authority of the imperial government and the extension of its power. Loewe has defined the attitude as "Modernist," and well contrasted it to that of the "Reformists," who sought to limit the force of the state and relied upon moral example and good conduct to guide the empire.

In practical terms, the dichotomy between the two approaches to government was strongly displayed towards the end of the first century, in debate between the "forward party" which planned to conquer the Northern Xiongnu on the steppe, and the regular officials who saw no need for such aggression, but rather danger in such excessive ambition.⁸ Later again, through the second century, there was endemic conflict between the men of the capital and the imperial eunuchs, who sought to maintain power, and the more ideal Confucianists who opposed corruption and wanted to reform the machinery of government.

EMPEROR MING AND EMPEROR ZHANG 57-88⁹

Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming, was thirty when he came to the throne at the death of his father. He had replaced the previous Heir, his half-brother Liu Qiang, and though they remained on good terms the new emperor had some uncertainty about the loyalty of his other siblings. In 70 Liu Ying the King of Chu was accused of treason and died, and a fierce persecution of all who had been associated with him brought the death or exile of several senior officials and imperial kinfolk.

Such problems affected primarily the upper classes, however, and the general tenor of Emperor Ming's reign was one of consolidation based upon the prosperity and security bequeathed by his father. Notably, the dykes on the Yellow River and the Vast Canal, broken in the time of Wang Mang, were now repaired, while the accretion of the Ailao people in the far southwest saw the territory of the empire extended to the borders of present-day Burma.

Further north, there was conflict with the Qiang on the frontiers of Liang province, and the Northern Xiongnu became troublesome enough to inspire a punitive expedition. This had limited effect, but a secondary campaign revived Chinese interest in the Western Regions and produced a short-lived establishment there.

Like his father, Emperor Ming sponsored New Text Confucianism, both as symbol and as support for of his authority. Where Guangwu had restored the Imperial University, however, Emperor Ming engaged in ritual at the Hall of the Circular Moat, maintaining the ceremonies of Great Archery and Serving the Aged, and Ploughing the Sacred Field. He also presided at a series of annual discussions, culminating in an official commentary evidently based on the Hong fan chapter of the Classic of History and emphasising the Five Powers.

Though Emperor Zhang succeeded his father at the age of only nineteen sui, he was formally of full age. He thus required no regency, and after a short period of tutelage under the Dowager Empress Ma, his titular mother, he governed for himself. He travelled widely in the empire, and had some success in presenting an appearance of benevolent government. Interested in ritual and scholarship, moreover, and with a revisionist concern for Old Text Confucianism, in 79 he sponsored the celebrated conference at the White Tiger Hall; it was intended to open up discussion, but the arguments of the emperor and his protégé Jia Kui were largely disregarded, and the records of the debate became a manifesto for the New Text.

At the very beginning of his reign, the government of Emperor Zhang had been faced with a heavy defeat and costly withdrawal of troops from the Western Regions. Almost as an afterthought, however, the envoy Ban Chao was allowed a free hand to operate among the oasis states in the south of the territory, and from a small beginning he established a Chinese hegemony which rose to the height of its power and influence in the following reign.

Closer to home, there was trouble with the Qiang tribes led by Miyu and then Mitang on the frontier of Liang province, but the Northern Xiongnu, affected by drought and concerned by the Xianbi to their east, sought a rapprochement and peaceful trade. This was approved by the court, but the Southern Xiongnu plundered the Northern caravans, while the "forward" group at court argued against any restraint of their allies. The matter was partially resolved by a compromise, leaving no party content, and the auguries for long-term peace were not good.

Emperor Zhang's domestic situation also boded ill. His first Heir, Liu Qing, was born to a Lady Song, protégée of the Dowager Ma, but his Empress Dou had the Song and the Ma families disgraced, and Liu Qing was dismissed. The Empress Dou had no children, but she first arranged that the son of a Lady Liang should be named as Heir, then had the Liang removed in turn. As a result of these intrigues, when Emperor Zhang died in 88 at the age of just thirty-three, his young son Liu Zhao was left in the care of a regent Dowager who had destroyed his true mother and who had a group of male relatives eager for their place in the sun.

In 88 the new emperor Liu Zhao, known posthumously as Emperor He, was aged ten sui. He would prove to be the first, but by no means the last, sovereign of Later Han to come to the throne as a minor; indeed not one of his successors until the end of the dynasty began his reign at full age.

In this situation, there was constitutional precedent from Former Han that power of regency was held by the Empress, now Dowager, of the previous ruler. She attended court and issued edicts in the new emperor's name, but she commonly took advice from her male relatives, who received high official ranks. So the government of Emperor He was controlled by the Dowager Dou and her family.

The destruction of the Northern Xiongnu

The conduct of the Dowager's brothers, notably that of the eldest, Dou Xian, was arrogant and embarrassing, but an opportunity soon appeared by which he might cover this poor conduct with military glory. The Dou family had been leaders of the forward party in debate about Xiongnu policy during the previous reign, and in 88 the Southern Shanyu proposed a joint expedition to destroy his rivals. The Northern Xiongnu had been heavily defeated by the Xianbi in the previous year, and they were currently experiencing famine, so the signs were propitious. Dou Xian was enthusiastic, and the Dowager over-ruled all opposition at court. In 89 the armies advanced into the steppe.

The campaign was a thorough success, and by 91 the Northern court had been driven away to the west, into the region of present-day Dzungaria, north of Urumqi. The Southern government, however, proved quite incapable of establishing a unified regime in the Mongolian steppe, and the Southern Xiongnu refused to accept their former enemies. As fighting broke out between the two groups, the Chinese intervened in clumsy fashion, and within a few years the Southern state had been weakened and divided. By the early part of the second century its rulers were variously in abortive rebellion against the Han, or dependent upon Chinese support to maintain a position against the Xianbi.

The situation on the open steppe was still more serious, for the vacuum created by the destruction of the Northern Xiongnu state was filled, not by the Southern Xiongnu, but by the erratic tribes of the Xianbi. By the 120s, these people had acquired their first war-leaders, and the northern frontier of China became vulnerable to their widespread attack. Though Dou Xian's campaign of 89 to 91 had been an immediate success, but it proved a long-term disaster.

Emperor He, Emperor An and the Dowager Deng

The twelve-year-old Emperor He took the cap of manhood in 91, so there was no longer any formal requirement for a regency, and in the following year, soon after Dou Xian had returned in triumph from the north, the young ruler carried out a successful coup to free himself of the over-powerful family. He was aided by eunuchs of the imperial harem, who appear for the first time in a major political role, then governed on his own account for the next several years. He died, however, in 106, aged less than thirty, and though he had sired two sons, both were children and neither had been proclaimed as Heir.

In these circumstances, an Empress-Dowager of Han became even more important. Not only did she act as regent, she was authorised to decide the successor to her late husband. Emperor He's Empress Deng, a woman of strong personality, rejected the older boy, Liu Sheng, on the grounds that he was unwell, and established the younger Liu Long, just a few months old. When the infant died soon afterwards, the Dowager again passed over his brother, and chose Liu You, son of the former Heir Liu Qing, to take his place. It may well be that Liu Sheng was incapacitated, either physically or mentally, but this was a dramatic example and confirmation of a Dowager's power.

It was not unreasonable that the Lady Deng chose the son of a formerly designated Heir, but she continued to hold power even after her nominee, Emperor An, had formally come of age in 109, and she maintained her position until her death in 121. This was well beyond the bounds of tradition and expectation, but the Lady Deng was probably the most competent and effective ruler of the second century; Emperor An was certainly less impressive.

During her period of government the Dowager Deng kept her male relatives under firm control and limited their powers, but despite this restraint Emperor An destroyed her family soon after he gained power for himself. There was a rumour that the Dowager had been dissatisfied with his ability and thought of removing him. This gave him an excuse to act, but the new ruler's own conduct could have justified such a decision.

Emperor An was interested in ritual, but even more concerned with portents, and he relied heavily upon personal favourites, including his maternal uncle Geng Bao, his former wet-nurse and some palace eunuchs, while he was also strongly influenced by his Empress Yan, a woman of low-born family. With her encouragement – and despite protests and a demonstration from many officials – Emperor An dismissed his only son and Heir, Liu Bao. He made no alternative provision, and when he died in the following year, 125, at the age of thirty-two, he left an empty place at the head of the state.

The Lady Yan, now Dowager, used her authority to place an imperial cousin, aged five, upon the throne. The only justification for choosing such a junior cadet would be the expectation of a long period of regency, but the Yan party's plans were disrupted by the death of the boy a few months later, and they were destroyed by a coup led by the eunuch Sun Cheng. Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, thus came to the throne through the initiative of palace eunuchs and against the intrigues of a distaff clan.

THE FINANCIAL CRISIS

During the thirty years from the early 90s to the early 120s the dynasty faced major difficulties. The campaigns of Dou Xian against the Northern Xiongnu had produced contradictory results: the enemy was destroyed, but the Southern state was weakened and divided, while the Xianbi became increasingly troublesome. The cost of the war, moreover, placed great strain upon the resources of the court.

There is a good deal of evidence to indicate that from the end of the first century the imperial government was in serious financial straits. There was certainly money in private hands, but the traditional system of land tax and the effective abolition of state monopolies meant that the government found it increasingly difficult to gain access to the real wealth of the nation. Many poor farmers commended themselves to a powerful family in order gain protection from official imposts, and the great land-owners were in a strong position to protect themselves against such exactions. As a result, the central power had reduced capacity to deal with the responsibilities of government, and the Dowager Deng initiated several measures of economy: restricting the food at her own table, limiting some extravagant ceremonies, and rationalising some offices at the capital.

The Great Qiang Rebellion

The situation was made worse by the rebellion of the Qiang in Liang province. The trouble began in 107, when the overstretched government was faced with rebellion in the Western Regions and resolved to withdraw from the position which had been established by Ban Chao. As this sign of military weakness was accompanied by some confusion and uncertainty, a local mutiny among non-Chinese auxiliaries became the trigger for an outburst of rebellion across the whole of north-western China. Though the rebellion was eventually put down in 118, it had lasted more than ten years and devastated the region. Fighting reached as far as Chang'an, raiding spread across the north, and at one stage the Southern Xiongnu joined the enemy alliance.

Following the abolition of universal conscription at the beginning of the dynasty, the lack of trained men within the empire restricted the government's capacity to deal with rebellions and incursions on the frontier. It was at one stage proposed that the whole of Liang province should be abandoned, and although this was formally defeated in debate at court, the situation on the ground was much the same as if the policy had been approved. As great numbers of people were driven from their homes, many took refuge within China proper or migrated further south. The 120s saw some attempt at reconstruction, but former settlers were reluctant to return, and their forebodings were justified when renewed turmoil broke out in the early 140s.

Besides the direct cost of the war, which was enormous, taxation from the territories of the northwest was seriously reduced, and the shortfall could be recouped only by increasing revenue from other provinces. For a traditional economy, such a process was difficult, disruptive and of limited success. The history of the last century of Later Han may be better understood if it is recognised that the central government was functionally bankrupt.

The confidence of the gentry

Its failure to collect adequate revenue meant that the imperial court could no longer offer any substantial assistance in time of misfortune, and its authority was consequently reduced. At the same time, local landed families throughout the empire were gaining in prosperity and self-confidence. Two manifestations may be observed through the second century: the number and quality of grave-goods recovered by modern archaeologists from gentry tombs; and the development of local histories and the production of stele, both of which increased markedly at this time.

A less attractive aspect of this process was an increase in violence, feuding and petty warfare. There are several accounts of how men of family bullied the countryside with their bands of retainers, and many tales of vendetta, including the celebrated Su Buwei, while Cui Shi's guide to the management of a manorial estate, Simin yueling, refers to the need to keep weapons in order in case of attack. Below the surface of imperial order, the towers and walls of private strongholds were signs of frequent conflict and threat.

At the same time, the self-confidence of the prosperous gentry class was reflected in its members' attitude towards service to the state. Men who rose to high rank were generally respected, but there was a growing tendency for junior officers and nominees to choose whether they wished to be associated with a particular superior, and on a number of occasions a nomination would be turned down, or an officer would resign his post, if the patron was regarded as a man of inferior morality: feiqi ren 非其人. In effect, this meant that an individual's personal standing was considered more important than his public duty, a development which did not bode well for the coherence and prestige of the imperial government.

EMPEROR SHUN AND THE LIANG FAMILY 125-159

Ten years old at the time of his accession, Liu Bao shared his father's tendency to be influenced by favourites, including his former wet-nurses and the eunuch Zhang Fang, while he showed small gratitude to Sun Cheng who had brought him to power. As the court was divided into cliques, some members of the Imperial Secretariat, notably Yu Xu and Zuo Xiong, took advantage of the situation to introduce reforms. Their concerns related primarily to corruption, to the selection of officials, and to Confucian governance, and the first half of the reign of Emperor Shun was an exceptional period when scholar-officials were able to take substantial initiatives.

One success of the Confucianists in the early 130s was the restoration of the Imperial University, which had been allowed to fall into disrepair and decline for quarter of a century. The long-term future of reform, however, depended on the personal commitment of the ruler, but Emperor Shun had neither a stable policy nor any great interest in effective action, while many officials and other men of influence had small relish for major change to a system which served them well. A special commission of eight was sent out in 142, with wide powers of investigation, but it achieved very little, and served rather as a swan-song for the reform movement.

By this time, indeed, effective power had been transferred to the Liang family of the Empress. Member of an established family, which had earlier produced the mother of Emperor He, the Lady Liang Na entered the harem in 128 and was chosen as Empress in 132. Her fine lineage was a significant factor in the choice, and her father Liang Shang appears to have become a senior and trusted adviser and mentor to the emperor. He became General-in-Chief in 135, ranking with the Excellencies at the highest level of the bureaucracy, and after his death in 141 he was succeeded by his son Liang Ji; between them they dominated the government for more than twenty years.

The death of Emperor Shun in 144, aged thirty, was followed a few months later by that of his only son, another infant emperor. To replace him, the regent Dowager Liang and her brother Liang Ji chose the boy Liu Zuan, a great-grandson of Emperor Zhang, but in just over a year he too was dead. There was suspicion he had been murdered, for he had commented unfavourably on the power of Liang Ji, but nothing was proved and the Liang were free to choose again. This time they selected Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, aged fifteen, who was promptly married to the Dowager's younger sister Liang Nüying. Though Liu Zhi came of age in 148 he continued under tutelage, and even after the death of the Dowager in 150 he remained under the control of his own Empress and her brother Liang Ji.

The Dowager had claimed to keep power because the state was facing difficulty, and this was certainly true. During the 120s, under the inspiration of Yu Xu, the government had begun to restore the ravaged northwest, but there were damaging raids from the Xianbi further east, and the northern frontier was vulnerable and unstable. In the Western Regions Ban Chao's son Ban Yong had restored an imperial position in the 120s, but he was withdrawn after just a few years, and Han never regained full authority over those distant lands. More significantly, a rebellion of the Southern Xiongnu in 140 was joined by the Qiang of Liang province, and the work of reconstruction was destroyed. In the early 140s the headquarters of several frontier commanderies were withdrawn, and though their territories remained nominally subject to Han, Chinese control was in reality very weak.

The histories describe Liang Ji as extravagant and cruel, and tell how he persecuted opponents. There is no doubt truth in this, but the hegemony of the Liang family was widely accepted, and few senior ministers were willing to stand against him; one who did, Li Gu, was eliminated very early. When the Empress Liang Nüying died in 159, however, the loss of his immediate link to the inner palace made Liang Ji's position insecure. He wanted to adopt the Lady Deng Mengnü, Emperor Huan's choice for his consort, but he was opposed by her family, and when he tried to resolve the problem by assassination the emperor became fearful for his own life. So Emperor Huan sought the aid of the palace eunuchs, the one group which he could trust, and they led a coup which destroyed the Liang family and their associates.

EMPEROR HUAN, THE EUNUCHS AND PROSCRIPTION 159-180¹⁰

At the time of his coup, Emperor Huan was some twenty-seven years old. He had long accepted the dominance of his relatives by marriage, and he was probably more interested in his extensive harem than in matters of government. Once forced into an active role as ruler, he relied heavily upon his eunuch allies and favourites, but these became a focus of hostility for the scholars and officials of the empire. Not only were such deformed creatures anathema to Confucian principles of family piety, but in practical terms the eunuchs and their relatives began to seek position in their family homelands, and there they came into conflict with established local gentry. There were acts of aggression and atrocities on both sides, and men such as the local officer Zhang Jian and the Administrator Huang Fu became heroes among students at the capital for their firm dealings with the newcomers.

We are told that with sponsorship from the Liang family the University had grown until it had as many as thirty thousand students, but traditional teachings were largely discredited and there was minimal opportunity for direct entrance to the imperial service. So Luoyang contained a host of young men seeking only to acquire a patron or to make a name which might gain them prestige and promotion at home. Among their methods were the composition and chanting of rhyming slogans, and the circulation of lists of men whom they admired, both among officials and from their own number. In general terms, they were inspired by a sense of Confucian morality and opposed corruption, and they gave high praise to senior ministers such as Chen Fan and Li Ying, known as enemies of the eunuchs, and to private exemplars such as Guo Tai.

Bolstered by these populist guardians of virtue, Chen Fan, Li Ying and others carried out a series of political attacks on the eunuch favourites, and Emperor Huan was eventually persuaded against some individuals. By 165 the last of his supporters in the coup had been dismissed and disgraced, while Deng Mengnü was also dismissed as Empress and died soon afterwards. Her place was taken by the Lady Dou Miao, chosen again for her good family background, and her father Dou Wu showed himself an energetic advocate of the Confucianist and anti-eunuch party. As the emperor himself was attacked for his personal extravagance and the size of his harem, he sought to regain some ground by sponsoring official worship of Huang-Lao 黄老, a deity combining attributes of the Yellow Emperor and the legendary sage Laozi. The initiative, however, went no further, and when Emperor Huan died in 168 at the age of thirty-six, he left no son to succeed him. Power came once more into the hands of the consort clan, the Dowager Dou and her father Dou Wu.

The Proscription

During the political struggles of the previous year, the eunuchs had persuaded the emperor to punish and proscribe their more ostentatious opponents, but the new regime promptly reversed the decree, and Dou Wu, aided by the respected Chen Fan, brought reform Confucianists such as Li Ying back to high office. To succeed the late ruler, the Dowager and her father chose the twelve-year-old Liu Hong; he was a cousin of Emperor Huan, but from a distant and junior cadet lineage. It appeared a self-serving choice, for Liu Hong's chief quality was his youth, foreshadowing a longer regency, but few of the reformists objected, for they were only too pleased to see their patrons in power.

To consolidate their position, Dou Wu and Chen Fan now planned to purge the harem eunuchs, but the Dowager objected and the eunuchs struck first. Taking the young emperor with them, in the autumn of 168 they had the Secretariat issue orders to dismiss their opponents, and when Dou Wu sought to raise troops they brought the frontier general Zhang Huan to face him. Dou Wu's men deserted him and he killed himself, while Chen Fan and others were arrested and died. One year later the eunuchs confirmed their power by a renewed purge: hundreds of their opponents were killed, and the Great Proscription of the would-be reformers was maintained for fifteen years until 184.¹¹

¹¹ In HHS 67/57, Fan Ye devotes a chapter to the Proscribed Party, commonly known as 黨錮 danggu.

Brought up under eunuch influence, Emperor Ling gave them total trust and had limited respect for his regular officials. Frivolous and greedy, he instituted a system of purchase or fines for even the highest offices; this might have been justified by the straitened circumstances of the imperial treasury, but in fact he transferred the funds to his own purposes and allowed his favourites to embezzle vast amounts. The authority of the emperor was still not questioned, but the bonds of allegiance, particularly with the Confucianist gentry, were seriously weakened.

Rebellion and the frontier

Outside the capital, there were rebellions in the 160s about Taishan and in Jing province, but the northern frontier was held comparatively well, thanks to the skills and energy of the generals Huangfu Gui, Zhang Huan and the ferocious Duan Jiong. In 168 Duan Jiong received approval for a campaign of extermination against the Qiang, and his success left a desert in Liang province. By the 170s, however, the Xianbi of the steppe had found a war-leader, Tanshihuai, and his raids became increasingly fierce. In 177 a major punitive expedition was despatched, but the imperial army was cut off and destroyed on the steppe, the first such catastrophe since the time of Former Han, and the Chinese were now firmly on the defensive. While the death of Tanshihuai in 181 gave some respite, the next threat to the dynasty came from within the empire.

YELLOW TURBANS, DONG ZHUO AND THE FALL OF HAN 180-196¹²

For the second half of the second century AD Chinese histories contain increasing references to epidemics 大疫, beginning in the first years of Emperor Huan and rising to a peak in the 170s and early 180s under Emperor Ling. Contemporary with the Antonine plague of the Roman empire, this series of inflictions may represent the appearance of a new disease among humanity, and it no doubt had effect both on the economy and upon popular sensitivity.

There are many references to religious sects about this time, commonly associated with Huang-Lao. The doctrines of Huang-Lao had been well-known since Former Han and were not necessarily opposed to the government – Emperor Huan had incorporated the worship into his state ritual – but they could inspire popular rebellion. Probably influenced by the frequent manifestations of sickness, a number of sects offered cures by faith-healing, through charms and drugs and the confession of sins. Several are recorded in the far west, in the region about Chang'an, and in the southeast by the mouth of the Yangzi, but the most widespread was that of Zhang Jue of Zhuo commandery in the north; by the early 180s his Way of Great Peace 太平道 had disciples and adherents as far away as Nanyang and Yingchuan, and even at the capital and in the court.

Local authorities were reluctant to oppose such a popular movement, and warnings by the Excellency Yang Ci and other officials were ignored. Zhang Jue, however, planned a millennial rebellion for 184, first year of a new cycle, and although his intentions were at last discovered and the rising had to be called piecemeal and ahead of time, it was nonetheless devastating. The rebels wore yellow cloth about their heads as sign of the Heaven that was to come, and both they and the imperialists raised armies ad hoc. It took several months of desperate fighting before Zhang Jue and his followers were destroyed, and some of the most populous regions of the empire suffered widespread slaughter and ruin. The major disturbance was ended within a calendar year, but the effect of the Yellow Turbans for the people of the time must have been comparable to that of the Taipings in the nineteenth century, and large groups of bandits remained, notably in Qing province, who kept the title alive.

The Yellow Turbans did not destroy the dynasty, and indeed the response and swift success of the government is impressive. The turmoil of rebellion, however, brought further disorder and banditry: in the winter of 184 a mutiny and rebellion in Liang province effectively removed that territory from the control of Han, while the Black Mountain bandit groups of the southern Taihang Mountains rose to such power that they were granted effective autonomy. Yet more serious in the longer term, the mass mobilisation to defeat the rebellion left a vast number of men trained in the use of arms. Not only did future warlords such as Cao Cao, Liu Bei and Sun Jian gain early experience in fighting the Yellow Turbans, so too did their future followers.

¹² The fall of Han is discussed by Mansvelt Beck in Chapter 5 of CHOC, MBeck 86. A chronicle history from 189 to 220 is given by deC 96.

The usurpation of Dong Zhuo

The great Proscription was ended in 184, lest disaffected gentry give support to the rebels, but the tenor of government was little changed and Emperor Ling continued his life of extravagant pleasure. He had two recorded sons, one by his Empress He and one by a concubine, the Lady Wang, whom the Empress promptly murdered. The He family was not well-born, but they naturally acquired high position at court, and the Empress's brother He Jin became General-in-Chief. When Emperor Ling died in 189, aged thirty-three, the Lady He and her brother placed her son Liu Bian upon the throne and prepared for another period of regency.

He Jin, however, came under pressure from Yuan Shao, Yuan Shu and other men of family, that he should destroy the eunuchs of the palace: they had held too much influence for long, and many of the troubles of the empire could be laid at their door. Impressed by these men of fine lineage, He Jin was persuaded to put their blood-thirsty proposals into action, but the Dowager opposed him, and as disagreement continued the eunuchs took matters into their own hands. On 22 September they waylaid He Jin and killed him. They then sought to have their own nominees appointed to critical posts but, unlike the coup of 159, they could claim no formal support from the emperor. The Yuan brothers led troops to storm the gates of the palace, and as flames lit the sky the eunuchs were slaughtered. A small party fled with the emperor and his brother, but they were chased and killed, and the imperial children were brought back.

At this point, the scenario changed. The frontier general Dong Zhuo, who had earlier been called to Luoyang to support He Jin, was camped outside the capital. As he saw the fires in the city he brought his troops forward and took over power. He proclaimed a new era of government, but when he deposed Liu Bian in favour of his brother Liu Xie, Yuan Shao and other leaders fled to the east and raised armies against him. By the beginning of 190 the empire was divided between Dong Zhuo and the "loyal rebels" who opposed him, and as the eastern alliance splintered soon afterwards, provincial and local chieftains contended for power.

Unable to hold Luoyang, Dong Zhuo withdrew the court to Chang'an. He was assassinated there in 192, but a group of his officers seized control of the nominal government. with Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, as their helpless puppet. In 195 the young emperor managed to escape, and he returned to the former capital in the following year. Luoyang, however, now lay in ruins, and a few weeks later Emperor Xian was persuaded to accept the protection of the warlord Cao Cao. As the court was transferred to Xu city in Yingchuan, the emperor entered a life-long captivity. Orders were issued in his name, and the dynasty formally survived another twenty-five years, but between Dong Zhuo and Cao Cao the rule of Han was ended.

CAO CAO AND THE THREE KINGDOMS 196-220¹³

While the nominal sovereign was held captive at Luoyang, Chang'an or Xu city, his empire became a gigantic battleground. Liu Biao in Jing province and Liu Zhang in Yi province, each with title as Governor, maintained comparatively stable states, but the open country of the North China plain saw complex conflict between a variety of contenders. By 200, after ten years close fighting, Cao Cao had defeated, destroyed or driven away Yuan Shu, Lü Bu and Liu Bei and held the south of the plain. To the north he faced Yuan Shao, and at the battle of Guandu he defeated him. Yuan Shao died soon afterwards, and by 207 Cao Cao had eliminated his quarrelling sons and controlled the whole of eastern China.

After Liu Biao died in 208, Cao Cao was able to take over Jing province, but as he moved south he was defeated at the battle of the Red Cliffs on the middle Yangzi by remnant loyalists under Liu Bei and an allied army sent by Sun Quan, warlord of the southeast. Cao Cao was forced to retreat, but he still held a line in the valley of the Han. In 211 he defeated an alliance of minor warlords of the northwest, and in 215 he received the surrender of the Taoist theocrat Zhang Lu in Hanzhong. He then sought to move into Yi province, but Liu Bei now held that territory, and in 219 Liu Bei defeated Cao Cao's army and drove his men back across the Qin Ling ranges. He took title as king and later emperor of Shu-Han.

Later in the same year, Liu Bei's general Guan Yu embarked on a major offensive in Jing province. He gained initial success, but as he was still engaged to the north he was attacked from behind by the army of Sun Quan of Wu. Guan Yu was destroyed, Sun Quan gained control of both the middle and the lower Yangzi, and Wu maintained its independence for another sixty years. Though Cao Cao's state of Wei was the most powerful, and his son Cao Pi replaced the dynasty of Han in 220, China was divided into three rival powers, the Three Kingdoms (三國 Sanguo) and unity was restored only briefly by Western Jin in the late third century.

Many traditional historians blamed Cao Cao for his failure to restore a unified empire, and there is certainly a contrast with the period after the fall of Wang Mang, when a dozen years of conflict followed but Emperor Guangwu was able to re-establish central power.

Cao Cao was certainly the most effective and successful military commander of his time, but he had two great difficulties. Firstly, the civil war itself, and notably the period from 190 to 200, saw a total breakdown of government and society. In a process which began in the aftermath of the Yellow Turbans, vast numbers of people were driven from their homes by banditry, warfare and famine. While some set up small self-defence units, others sought security by attaching themselves to a warlord, and the armies of the time became barely-organised masses, cutting swathes across the landscape, and destroying the old structures in their path. In such circumstances, it is impressive that the state of Wei and its rivals were able to establish even a minimal base of coherent government and return the people to some level of settled and profitable agriculture; there were limits to their effective reach over wide distances and in the longer term.

Added to these problems of administration, a second new factor was the changing demography of the empire. At the beginning of Later Han, Guangwu's success in the north had allowed him to take control of the south without major opposition, but the balance of power changed during the next two centuries, with increasing Chinese migration into the south and growing weakness in the north and northwest. By the middle of the second century Chinese settlers had withdrawn from much of the northern frontier, but several regions of the south had gained greatly. South of the lower Yangzi, numbers increased by up to 50% between 2 and 140 AD, while in present-day Jiangxi and southern Hunan the registered population multiplied three or four times. The process continued through the rest of the second century, and once Sun Quan had gained a breathing space after the victory at the Red Cliffs his officers embarked on an energetic process of colonisation, both to gain new land and to conscript troops for service against the north. Wu was defended by the line of the river, and in the west, after the capture of Hanzhong, Shu-Han was sheltered by the rugged barrier of the Qin Ling, but the two states were made viable by the numbers of men they could place under arms, and their successful defiance of the north meant the effective end of imperial unity for four hundred years.

² The first emperor of Han is commonly referred to as Gaozu 高祖, a combination of his dynastic title Gao "High" and his temple name Taizu 太祖 "Grand Founder." e.g. Dubs 38:145

⁴ The Dowager Lü exercised her power nominally on behalf of two infant emperors.

⁶ Wang Mang initially took title as "Acting" 假 or "Regent" 攝 Emperor on behalf of the infant Liu Ying 劉嬰 (AD 5-25), who was declared Heir in AD 6, but never reigned. In 9 Wang Mang demoted Liu Ying and proclaimed his own Xin dynasty. On Liu Ying, known as the "Young Prince" 孺子, see sub voce.

Ai Jiao 哀焦, the Lady. Ai Jiao's elder sister Ai Zhi, the wife of Zhang Chu, was seduced by Liu Dang the King of Lecheng. Zhang Chu was going to make an official complaint, but Liu Dang bribed Ai Jiao and she killed Zhang Chu. -HHS 50/40:1672.

Ai Zhi 哀置, the Lady. Formerly a servant in the imperial palace, Ai Zhi married a commoner named Zhang Chu. Liu Dang, King of Lecheng, had her come to his residence and had intercourse with her. Her husband Zhang Chu was going to make official complaint, but Liu Dang bribed Ai Zhi's younger sister Jiao to kill him. -HHS 50/40:1672.

Ajian 阿堅 (d.141); Wuhuan. A Wuhuan chieftain, in 140 Ajian joined his colleague Qiangqu in a rising to support the rebel Xiongnu leaders Wusi and Che'niu. In the following year they were defeated and killed by the Emissary Zhang Dan. -HHS 90/80:2983.

Aluoduo 阿羅多 of Further Jushi. King of Further Jushi in 153, Aluoduo quarrelled with the Chinese officer Yan Hao and attacked the Chinese military colony. His officer Tanzhe turned against him, however, and Aluoduo fled with his family to the Xiongnu.

The Chinese placed the former hostage prince Beijun upon the throne, but Aluoduo came back and fought for his position. To avoid further disruption the Chinese withdrew Beijun's insignia and accepted Aluoduo's submission. -HHS 88/78:2931.

An 安 of Shanshan. King of Shanshan in 41, An joined King Xian of Suoju [Yarkand] in sending a joint tribute mission to the court of Emperor Guangwu.

Though Guangwu later withdrew Xian's commission as Protector-General, Xian then took the title for himself. In 46, realising that Han had no interest in the region, he planned to consolidate his power and sent instructions to block the road to China. King An refused to do this, so Xian brought an army against him. An was defeated and driven away into the hills, where he died. -HHS 88/78:2923-24.

Ande 安得 of Further Jushi (d.75). King of Further Jushi, west of present-day Urumqi and north of the Bogda range, in 74 Ande surrendered to the Han commander Geng Bing and accepted a protectorate. As father of the [unnamed] king of Nearer Jushi, south of the range by present-day Shanshan, he also arranged the accession of that state to the Chinese.

A few months later the Shanyu of the Northern Xiongnu sent one of his kings to attack Jushi with twenty thousand horsemen. They defeated and destroyed the small force led by the Chinese colonel Geng Gong, then attacked Ande and killed him. -HHS 19/9:717, 720.

Andun 安敦 of Daqin 大秦. In 166 the court of Emperor Huan received a mission claiming to come from Andun, ruler of Daqin in the far west. Having travelled by sea to Rinan in the far south, the envoys presented ivory, rhinoceros horns and tortoise-shell, though the Chinese found these gifts less exotic than they had expected.

The name Andun may relate to Marcus Aurelius Antoninus [reg. 161-180], but it is unlikely this was an official embassy. More probably it was a group of enterprising merchants, who may not have been subjects of Rome. On the other hand, recognition from such a distant and magical land enhanced the prestige of Emperor Huan, who had just purged his court of the Confucian reformers. -HHS 7:318, 88/78:2920.

Anguo 安國 (d.94); Xiongnu. Son of the Southern Shanyu Han and younger brother of the Shanyu Xuan, Anguo was Worthy King of the Left and Heir under the rule of his cousin the Shanyu Tuntuhe. He led Xiongnu auxiliaries in the campaigns of Dou Xian against the Northern Xiongnu, but achieved no distinction.

In 93 Anguo succeeded Tuntuhe as Shanyu, but he was over-shadowed by the prince Shizi, son of the former Shanyu Shi, who had made a name for himself by enthusiastic co-operation with the Chinese and by energetic attacks upon the Northern Xiongnu. Shizi now became the Heir, while Anguo was not popular and had no strong group of followers. He was jealous of his cousin's success and recognition, and he sought support among the surrendered northerners by showing hostility to their persecutor.

Anguo also quarrelled with the Emissary Du Chong, and in 94 he wrote to the court of Emperor He to complain about him. Du Chong intercepted the letter, then joined the General on the Liao Zhu Hui in reporting that they were doubtful of Anguo's loyalty and believed he was planning to assassinate Shizi and other pro-Chinese chieftains. The court ordered an investigation, but gave instructions that in the meantime Anguo should be subject to a special watch and guard.

One night, Du Chong and Zhu Hui led armed men to Anguo's camp. Fleeing in fear, Anguo gathered his own supporters and a number of surrendered Northern Xiongnu, and went to attack Shizi. Shizi took refuge in Manbo, headquarters of the General on the Liao, and the attack was unsuccessful. As Chinese reinforcements arrived, Anguo still refused to surrender, but he was killed by his own followers. No dynastic title is recorded for him.

Shizi succeeded as Shanyu, but this brought rebellion among the surrendered northerners, who proclaimed the southern prince Fenghou as Shanyu and escaped across the frontier to establish a state of their own. Du Chong and Zhu Hui were punished for their mistaken policy, and both men died in prison. -HHS 89/79:2954-56; deC 84:278-281.

Anguo 安國 of Shule [Kashgar]. About 115 King Anguo of Shule exiled his maternal uncle Chenpan on account of some fault. He later died without sons, and with support from the Great Yuezhi people Chenpan returned to take the throne. -HHS 88/78:2917.

Anguo 安國 of Yutian [Khotan]. In 152 Anguo's father King Jian was assassinated by an officer of King Chengguo of Jumi [present-day Yutian], with the connivance of the Chinese. After a period of confusion Anguo came to the throne through a popular revolt, and his state became increasingly independent.

In 175 Anguo attacked Jumi, conquered it and killed the king. Chinese authorities raised an army and restored the independence of Jumi. -HHS 88/78: 2916 & 2915.

Anwei 岸尾 (d.167); Qiang. A leader of the Eastern Qiang, in the winter of 167 Anwei and his colleague Mobie gathered a number of groups to raid the region about Chang'an. They were defeated and killed by Zhang Huan's officers Yin Duan and Dong Zhuo. -HHS 65/55:2140, 87/77:2898.

Atong 阿佟 or Axiu 阿修; Xiongnu. A king of the Northern Xiongnu, he surrendered to the Chinese armies under Dou Xian shortly before the final defeat and disappearance of the Shanyu in 91. Dou Xian proposed to the court that Atong be appointed Shanyu, controlled by a Chinese resident in the same fashion as the Southern ruler. Many ministers agreed with this policy, but the Excellencies Yuan An and Ren Wei argued that Emperor Guangwu had recognised the Southern Shanyu as rightful head of the whole Xiongnu state, and the southern court should take over a re-united people on the steppe. After intense debate, the separate puppet state was approved, but Dou Xian was obliged to abandon his support for Atong and recognise Yuchujian, brother of the former Shanyu, who had claimed the succession in the north. -HHS 45/35:1520-21.

Axiu 阿修; Xiongnu: see Atong 阿佟. -HHJ 13:161.

Azu 阿族; Xiongnu. In 124 Azu was chief of a division of the Northern Xiongnu. He and his followers who had entered the Chinese frontier to take refuge from the Xianbi, but they now sought to return to the steppe with their families and their property. The Emissary Ma Yi chased them, caught and defeated them. Almost all the escapers were killed, and Ma Yi collected over ten thousand head of horses, cattle and sheep. -HHS 89/79:2959.

Ba 拔 (d.128); Xiongnu. Son of the former Southern Shanyu Chang, he succeeded his elder brother Tan in 124. His dynastic title is not recorded.

At this time the northern frontier was largely exposed to Xianbi raids, and one of Ba's senior officers was killed in the fighting. In 126 Ba petitioned the court of Emperor Shun for the strengthening of Han forces in the area. The reserve camp at Liyang, formerly in Wei commandery, was transferred temporarily to the north of Zhongshan, while increasing numbers of men from the border commanderies were called up and trained for militia service.

The new arrangements had some effect, but the appeal by Shanyu Ba marked the failure of the Xiongnu state to deal with the Xianbi. In the beginning the Southern Xiongnu had guarded the borders for Han; they now needed Chinese assistance and protection. - HHS 89/79:2959-60.

Ba Mao 巴茂; Beihai. A student and protégé of Ding Hong in the time of Emperor Zhang, Ba Mao later became Minister of Ceremonies. - HHS 37/27:1264, FSTY 5f:120.

Ba Qi 巴祗 see Ba Zhi 巴祗.

Ba Su 巴肅 [Gongzu 恭祖] (d.168); Bohai. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt in the time of Emperor Huan, Ba Su became a county magistrate in Runan and in Qinghe, but resigned each time because he disapproved of the commandery Administrators. Recruited later to the offices of the Excellencies at Luoyang, he became a Consultant and was then Administrator of Yingchuan and Intendant of Henan. He was numbered among the popular heroes in lists compiled by the reformists and students of the University during the late 160s.

Following the death of Emperor Huan, Ba Su supported the plans of Dou Wu and Chen Fan to overthrow the eunuchs. After Dou Wu and Chen Fan were destroyed in 168 Ba Su was proscribed from office and returned home, but as the eunuchs realised the full extent of his involvement they ordered his arrest. When Ba Su went to the county office, the magistrate offered to free him and escape with him, but Ba Su replied, "If a man is servant of another, he shares his plans and his punishment. I made no secret of my association with Dou Wu, so how can I seek to avoid his fate?" He was executed.

A stele in honour of Ba Su was erected in the late 180s by Jia Cong the Inspector of Ji province. - HHS 67/57:2203* & 2187-88, XC 4:7a.

Ba Zhi 巴祗 [Jingzu 敬祖]. When Ba Zhi was Attendant Officer of his province, he refused to allow his wife and children to share his official lodgings, believing that scrupulous honesty was the best example to give the common people.

He was also personally generous, and when he was Inspector of Yang province in the early 180s he gave so much away that he had nothing left from his own salary. He was even obliged to repair his official hat with glue, then refused to light candles and sat in the dark so that his friends and clients would not notice.

As Inspector of Xu in 184 Ba Zhi held command against the Yellow Turbans, and he reported on the excellent conduct of the local leader Zhao Yu. - XC 5:6a-b & 5:1b, HHSJJ 76/66:2719 Hui Dong, SGZ 8:249.

Bahua 八滑 of Further Jushi. Bahua was a son of the former King Nongqi. In 125 the Chinese agent Ban Yong led Bahua and his brothers against the Northern Xiongnu. The campaign was successful, and while his elder brother Jitenu was made king, Bahua was granted honorary title as a marquis. - HHS 88/78:2930.

Ban 班, the Lady; Youfufeng. Elder sister of Ban Gu and Ban Chao, and of the Lady Ban Zhao, she married a man of the Zhou surname and became the mother of Zhou Jizhen.

Ban 班 [personal name unknown: style Ziweng 子翁]. Younger brother of a member of the Imperial Secretariat, he was an Investigator in his commandery. - LS 12:9a-10a.

Ban Biao 班彪 [Shupi 叔皮] (3-54); Youfufeng. Member of an established official family, Ban Biao was a son of Ban Zhi 班稚, who was a friend of Wang Mang, and a nephew of Ban Jieyu 班婕妤, a concubine of Emperor Cheng of Former Han.

After the fall of Wang Mang and the subsequent collapse of the Gengshi regime at Chang'an, Ban Biao took refuge with the north-western warlord Wei Ao, and composed many of his proclamations. When Wei Ao asked about a possible division of the empire, Ban Biao warned him that the modern centralised state was more effective than the ancient house of Zhou 周. In his Wangming lun 王命論 "Essay on the Mandate" he observed that power depended upon the virtue of the sovereign and the blessings of Heaven, not upon simple force, and that the restored Han dynasty, with ancient lineage to the legendary Emperor Yao 堯, had the capacity to re-unite China [Loewe 86F:735-737, de Bary 60:192-196].

Such opinions were not acceptable to Wei Ao, and in 30 Ban Biao left him to join Dou Rong, who had lately come to an agreement with Emperor Guangwu of Han. Recommended by Dou Rong, he was nominated Abundant Talent and appointed a county magistrate in Linhuai. He left that post on account of ill health, and then held a number of brief appointments in various offices of the Excellencies.

Following the death of Wei Ao in 33 Ban Biao presented a memorial proposing the restoration of the office of Protector of the Qiang 護羌校尉, to supervise the border regions of the northwest where the non-Chinese lived amongst the Han people. His recommendation was accepted, though the post was not long maintained at this time.

For the most part, however, Ban Biao devoted himself to the compilation of a history of Former Han, aiming both to continue the Shi ji 史記 of Sima Qian 司馬遷 and also to improve it and correct bias. He followed the structure of Shi ji, with treatises 志 and tables 表 as well as annals and liezhuan 列傳, but restricted his work to the one dynastic period: this became an important model for historiography. The work was not complete by the time of his death in 54, but it was continued by his son Ban Gu and then by his daughter Ban Zhao. It is not possible to discern how much each of the three contributed to the final text of Han shu 漢書, but the bulk of the compilation is ascribed to Ban Gu.

About 47 Ban Biao returned to clerical office under the Excellency over the Masses Su Kuang, and soon afterwards presented a memorial urging that tutors be appointed for the Heir and his brothers. In 49, at the time of the embassy from the Wuhuan chieftain Haodan, he warned against too heavy reliance on Wuhuan and Xianbi auxiliaries, and again proposed the appointment of a Protector of the Wuhuan 護烏桓校尉, to supervise both groups in the northeast. This was agreed.

Two years later, after the division of the Xiongnu and the endorsement of the Southern Shanyu Bi by the court of Han, the Northern Shanyu sent envoys proposing peace and alliance. In the debate at court, Ban Biao evidently had a decisive voice, arguing that the proposals should be received, but not on terms of equality. He drafted a reply for the emperor, expressed in arrogant and ultimately unacceptable terms, and little more came of the overtures from the north.

Soon afterwards, at the recommendation of Su Kuang, Ban Biao was appointed a magistrate in Zhongshan, close to the northern frontier. He was popular with local people, but died in office some two years later.

Ban Biao left a quantity of literary work and official documents, as well as the design and the beginning of the great dynastic history which his son Ban Gu continued. His Beizheng fu 北征賦 "Rhapsody on a Northward Journey," written about 25 and describing his flight from Chang'an to take refuge with Wei Ao, is translated by Knechtges 87:164-171. -HS 100A-B*, HHS 40/30A:1313-30*; Bn 67:124-130, 135-137, QHX:4-5, Hulseyé 61, Knechtges 87:353-354.

Ban Chao 班超 [Zhongsheng 仲升] (32-102); Youfufeng. Youngest son of Ban Biao, Ban Chao was a brother of Ban Gu; they were born in the same year but are not described as twins, so either they were half-brothers or their mother had two children in swift succession. A strong-willed man, who paid small attention to formal conduct, Ban Chao acquired a general understanding of the classics and was a most loyal kinsman.

When Ban Gu fell foul of the authorities in the early 60s for his work on the history of Former Han, Ban Chao pleaded his case, and when Ban Gu was appointed to the imperial library Ban Chao and his mother accompanied him to Luoyang. The family was poor, and Ban Chao earned a living as a copy-clerk for the government offices. He was ambitious and frustrated. Emperor Ming spoke well of him and gave him appointment as a clerk at the Orchid Terrace, but this was not the work that he wanted and he was later dismissed for some fault.

In 73, however, as the general Dou Gu embarked on his punitive expedition against the Xiongnu, Ban Chao, now forty years old, was appointed as an assistant major. He distinguished himself in command of a detachment against the Xiongnu, and Dou Gu then appointed him to accompany the staff officer Guo Xun on a preliminary embassy to the Western Regions.

As the group arrived at the capital of Shanshan by Lop Nor, King Guang also received an embassy from his allies the Northern Xiongnu. Ban Chao and a small party of followers slaughtered the Xiongnu envoys and presented the king with their heads. Overwhelmed, King Guang sent hostages to Han.

When this was reported, Ban Chao was rewarded with cloth, while Emperor Ming and Dou Gu agreed that he should be sent on a longer-term mission with rank as a full major. Dou Gu offered him additional troops but Ban Chao was content with the thirty men he had: any more would be clumsy.

Moving past Shanshan along the Southern Road, Ban Chao arrived at Yutian [Khotan], which was locally powerful but had a Xiongnu Resident. King Guangde received him with minimal courtesy, and his soothsayer told him to demand that Ban Chao give him his horse. Ban Chao killed the man, and Guangde was so impressed by such ruthlessness that he killed the Xiongnu agent and offered submission to Han.

Continuing west, Ban Chao and his party came to Shule [Kashgar], where the king had been deposed by King Jian of Qiuzi [Kuqa] and replaced by his officer Douti. Local opponents to the new regime offered support, and Ban Chao's officer Tian Lü took Douti captive. Ban Chao then put Zhong, a prince of the native dynasty, on the throne, but he also insisted on a show of leniency, so Douti was sent back to Qiuzi unharmed.

Further north, the Xiongnu had returned in some strength, and in 75 the state of Yanqi [Karashar] destroyed the Protector-General Chen Mu and besieged the colonels Geng Gong and Guan Chong. Qiuzi and its allied state Gumo, near present-day Aksu, then brought an army against Shule, and though Ban Chao supported King Zhong for several months, the new government of Emperor Zhang, concerned he could be cut off, ordered him to return. The withdrawal was seen as betrayal by the people of Yanqi, and in Yutian they sought to hold Ban Chao back. Fearing they would not let him go, and inspired by his original ambitions, Ban Chao turned back to Shule. He defeated the enemy, killed some turncoats, and restored authority. For the next several years, as he expanded Han influence by diplomatic means, Shule was his base of operations.

In 78 Ban Chao brought ten thousand men from Shule, Yutian, and neighbouring Jumi to attack Gumo, aided apparently by a contingent from distant Kangju [Sogdiana]. After an initial success, he asked for reinforcements, and offered the possibility of controlling all the Western Regions with the aid of allies. Emperor Zhang approved, and in 80 Ban Chao's former comrade Xu Gan was sent to support him with a thousand reprieved convicts and non-Chinese auxiliaries. There was a rebellion in Shule, soon put down, but no further immediate action took place.

In 83 Ban Chao was promoted Chief Clerk in Command of Troops, with music and banners appropriate to an independent command, and began preparations to attack Qiuzi. Before he embarked on the project, he wanted support, or at least tolerance, from the Wusun people of the Tian Shan ranges, who overlooked the left flank of his advance. He asked that an embassy be sent, and Emperor Zhang approved, but the envoy Li Yi then claimed that Ban Chao's plans would fail, and criticised him for keeping his wife and children with him. Ban Chao, embarrassed, sent his family back to China, but Emperor Zhang trusted him and when the Wusun sent hostages, Li Yi was sent to escort them to Luoyang.

In the following year Ban Chao received another eight hundred reinforcements, but now the king of Suoju [Shache/Yarkand] was recalcitrant and Ban Chao led troops from Shule and Yutian against him. Then King Zhong of Shule turned against the Chinese, and Ban Chao was obliged to go back. Rallying those who continued to support China, he proclaimed his own nominee to replace Zhong. The western state of Kangju sent aid to the enemy, and there was a stand-off for several months. Ban Chao sent gifts of silk to the Great Yuezhi, or Kushans, in the north of present-day Afghanistan and Pakistan, who were linked by marriage to the Kangju royal house, and eventually the Kangju troops withdrew and took Zhong with them.

Later, having made a secret alliance with Qiuzi and obtained troops from Kangju, Zhong made a false offer of submission. Ban Chao pretended to agree, but killed him at the welcoming banquet and then eliminated his last supporters.

Suoju, however, remained a problem, and Ban Chao took 25,000 men from Yutian and neighbouring cities against it. The king of Qiuzi sent 50,000 men to support Suoju, but Ban Chao made a false retreat, deceived him into dividing his army, then attacked the Suoju camp directly. Surprised and heavily defeated, Suoju was forced to surrender and the army of Qiuzi withdrew. Though the Annals of HHS 3:156 record this success in 86, it seems more probable that final victory was achieved in 87. In any case Ban Chao's authority affected all the Western Regions.

The Great Yuezhi had formerly sent a contingent to aid Han forces against the states of Jushi about Turfan. They now sent tribute and hostages, but asked for a princess from China in return. Ban Chao rejected their embassy, and in 90 the Yuezhi sent an army of 70,000 against him. As Ban Chao conducted a scorched-earth policy, the Yuezhi began to run out of food. Their commander Xie attempted to purchase supplies from Qiuzi, but Ban Chao waylaid the messengers, killed them, and then showed their heads to Xie, who now sought only to retreat without harassment. The Yuezhi were suitably subdued, and Ban Chao was respected even more.

At this time, moreover, the great campaigns of Dou Xian had destroyed the Northern Xiongnu in the Mongolian steppe, and in 91 Qiuzi and its allies Gumo and Wensu submitted to Han. Ban Chao was named Protector-General of the Western Regions, with Xu Gan as his Chief Clerk. King Youliduo of Qiuzi was deposed and sent to Luoyang, while the former hostage prince Boba was placed upon the throne. Ban Chao took up residence at Qiuzi and Xu Gan camped at Suoju.

There remained now only Yanqi and its satellite states Weixu and Weili, which had been responsible for the death of the Protector-General Chen Mu in 75. In the autumn of 94 Ban Chao led a large army, with contingents drawn from Qiuzi in the west to Shanshan in the east, against Yanqi. King Guang came to Weili and gave formal submission, but he later attempted to keep the Han army from his territory, then planned to escape into the mountains. Ban Chao caught him and killed him. After plundering the city to avenge Chen Mu, he placed the former hostage prince Yuanmeng on the throne.

After six months to settle Yanqi, Ban Chao set his base at Yutian, and in 95 an imperial decree granted him a county marquisate with revenue from a thousand households. In 97 he sent Gan Ying on his celebrated mission to explore the far west, and it is claimed that tribute arrived from the most distant countries.

Ban Chao's career and his relation to the throne had evidently not been affected by the execution of his brother Ban Gu in 92, but in 100 he sent in a request to retire on grounds of age and ill health; he was now almost seventy, and he observed that the barbarians showed little respect for old men. His appeal was supported by his sister Ban Zhao, and in 102 it was approved. After thirty years in the west, Ban Chao returned to Luoyang in the autumn. He died just one month later.

Ban Chao was succeeded as Protector-General by Ren Shang, but in 106 there was a general rising against Chinese power, and in 107 the empire in the Western Regions was abandoned. -HHS 47/37:1571-86*, 88/78:2910, XC 2:12a & 7b-8a; Chavannes 06, 07.

Ban Gu 班固 [Mengjian 孟堅] (32-92); Youfufeng. Son of Ban Biao, Ban Gu was precocious by the age of nine, and he became well-read, though he appears to have had no recognised teacher and he did not engage in the detailed commentaries which were popular at the time. The philosopher Wang Chong admired him, but there were some who said that his scholarship was superficial. He was in any case distinguished primarily for his literary ability.

About 57 Ban Gu presented an essay to Liu Cang the King of Dongping, favoured brother of Emperor Ming, who became his patron. Later, according to Wang Chong, when a flock of strange birds appeared at the imperial palace the emperor ordered his officials to present hymns to these magical creatures, but only the compositions of Ban Gu, Jia Kui and three others were of suitable quality: Lun heng 37; Forke 11:274.

Some time later Ban Gu retired to his home to work on the history of Former Han begun by his father. When it was reported to the throne that he was making unauthorised changes to the records of the dynasty, an edict ordered his arrest and the seizure of his books. Ban Gu's younger brother Ban Chao, however, obtained an audience with the emperor and pleaded his case, while the commandery office sent in samples of his work. Emperor Ming was impressed, and appointed Ban Gu to junior office as a collator in the imperial library. It was probably about this time that he presented his Liangdu fu 兩都賦 "Rhapsody on the Two Capitals," describing the glories of Chang'an and Luoyang but also praising the moral achievements of Later Han in contrast to the ostentation of the Former dynasty. He also compiled Li sao jing zhangju 離騷經章句, a detailed commentary to the poem of Qu Yuan 屈原.

In 72 Ban Gu was promoted and appointed to the Orchid Terrace, where he chaired a committee of historians commissioned to compile the annals of the reign of Emperor Guangwu, 世祖本紀 Shizu benji. The Ban family had long links with the Dou clan, so he and his colleague Yin Min evidently supported their interests, while their colleagues Meng Ji and Ma Yan were chosen to represent the rival faction of the Empress Ma; two other scholars were neutral. The work was based on official archives, and Ban Gu also compiled biographies of some leading assistants of Guangwu and of his rival Gongsun Shu. The whole work, renamed "Diary of the Jianwu Period" 建武注記, became the first part of Dongguan Hanji. It was presented to the throne in twenty-eight pian, and Emperor Ming then approved Ban Gu's continuation of the history of Former Han.

Ban Gu was somewhat frustrated and embarrassed at his failure to obtain senior office, but after Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75, and particularly following the appointment of the Empress Dou in 78, he received great access to the palace. Appointed Major of the Xuanwu Gate, primarily a sinecure with a higher salary, he composed pieces for a number of court ceremonies and imperial occasions, and when the imperial conference on Confucian scholarship was held at the White Tiger Hall 白虎觀 in 79 Ban Gu was responsible for much of the work of recension; it is not known, however, how much of the text of the present Bohu tong 白虎通 can be ascribed to his brush.

The greater part of Han shu was published in the early 80s, and it was immediately accepted by scholars and other people of the time. On the other hand, it is recorded that Ban Gu's sister Ban Zhao was later ordered to complete the history, and besides additional chapters she probably carried out some editorial work.

In the middle 80s, when the Shanyu of the Northern Xiongnu sent messengers asking for a treaty, Ban Gu presented a memorial arguing for peace. In 88 he left office after the death of his mother, but in the following year he joined the staff of the general Dou Xian as he embarked on his campaign to destroy the Northern Shanyu. Following a triumphant progress to the north, Ban Gu composed the text of a celebratory stele which was erected at Mount Yanran in the heart of the enemy's homeland. He was then sent on an embassy to the Shanyu, but by the time his party arrived the Northern court had been put to flight and Dou Xian then arranged its final destruction.

In 92 Emperor He, hitherto under the control of the Dowager Dou, destroyed the Dou family in a coup. Ban Gu was dismissed from office as an associate of Dou Xian, and the Prefect of Luoyang Chong Jing, an old enemy, had him arrested. Ban Gu died in prison. -HS 100, HHS 40/30A-B:1330-86*; Bn 79:121, QHX:5-6, Hulsewé 61, Tjan 49, Mather 76:559, Knechtges 82.

We are told that as Emperor He was preparing to deal with the Dou he referred to Ban Gu's chapter on imperial relatives by marriage in Han shu. Since the coup against his patron brought Ban Gu's death, this may be taken as a striking, albeit unfortunate, example of the relevance of historical research: see HHS 55/45:1800-01.

Ban Ji 班姬 the Lady: see the Lady Ban Zhao 班昭.

Ban [Mengjian] 班孟堅; Taishan. Having served as an officer of the Imperial Secretariat, Ban Mengjian became Inspector of Yan province about 150. He probably died in that office, for a stele was set up in his honour near the provincial headquarters at Changyi in Shanyang. -SJZ 8:22a. [One must distinguish this person from the historian Ban Gu, who also had the style Mengjian.]

Ban Shi 班始 (d.130); Youfufeng. Son of Ban Xiong, about 116 he inherited his fief. He married the Princess Liu Xiande, a daughter of Liu Qing the King of Qinghe and an aunt of Emperor Shun.

Ban Shi's wife was arrogant and vicious. When she took a lover she would call Ban Shi into the room and had him stand at the bed-side to watch. At last, in 130, Ban Shi became so angry that he stabbed her to death.

Emperor Shun had Ban Shi executed by being cut in two at the waist 要斬. He was going to have Ban Shi's brothers and sisters (whose names are not recorded) killed too, but apparently dissuaded by Xue Qin. -HHS 6:257, 47/37:1586, 101/11:3243, which last claims that the execution was carried out in the Horse Market 馬市 at Luoyang.

Ban Xiong 班雄; Youfufeng. Eldest son of Ban Chao, he succeeded to his father's marquisate in 102. As rebellions broke out in central Asia in 107, Ban Xiong commanded one of the contingents sent out from Dunhuang to withdraw the Chinese garrisons from the region.

After various other appointments, Ban Xiong became a colonel in the Northern Army, and in 115 he was sent with troops from that force to camp in the region of Chang'an and guard against the rebel Qiang.

8 Ban Yi

He was then appointed Intendant of Jingzhao, but died soon afterwards. -HHS 47/37:1586-87, 87/77:2889.

Ban Yi 班姬, the Lady: see the Lady Ban Zhao 班昭.

Ban Yong 班勇 [Yiliao 宜僚]; Youfufeng. Third and youngest son of Ban Chao, he inherited much of his father's character. As a major in 107, he accompanied his brother Xiong to assist the withdrawal from central Asia.

In 120 the Chinese agent Suo Ban was killed by King Junjiu of Further Jushi, allied to the Xiongnu, while the ruler of Nearer Jushi, ally of Han, was driven from his throne. When the ruler of the loyal state of Shanshan sent for help, Cao Zong the Administrator of Dunhuang proposed an expedition, but a majority at court opposed any involvement in the Western Regions. The regent Dowager Deng invited Ban Yong to comment, evidently as heir to his father, and though he did not support a full campaign he did propose a cautious advance: to establish a Senior Colonel Protector of the Western Regions 護西域副校尉 with a garrison in Dunhuang, and an agent at Shanshan to supervise a military colony.

Members of the court were concerned variously about the dangers of Xiongnu raiding and the cost of paying for greedy tribute missions. Ban Yong responded to these questions, and it was agreed that the Han claim to supremacy in the west should be revived, that residents should be sent to various city-states, with their presence backed by a garrison of three hundred men established in Dunhuang. It was judged too ambitious to establish military colonies at this time.

The Xiongnu and the kingdoms of Jushi, however, constantly raided the west of Liang province, and in 123 Ban Yong was given title as Chief Clerk for the Western Regions and was sent out with five hundred convict conscripts. Arriving at Shanshan in 124, he presented royal insignia to King Youhuan and persuaded King Boying of Qiuzi [Kuqa] and his allies of Gumo and Wensu to pay obeisance. With the troops of these states he defeated a Xiongnu army and conquered Nearer Jushi, then set up a military colony at Liuzhong and proceeded to clear the Northern Road.

In 125 Ban Yong brought six thousand cavalry from the north-western commanderies to support the troops of Shanshan, Shule [Kashgar], and Nearer Jushi in an attack on Further Jushi. They captured King Junjiu and his Xiongnu ambassador, executed both men at the place where Suo Ban had been killed six years earlier, and sent their heads to Luoyang.

In 126 Ban Yong appointed Junjiu's son Jiatenu as king in his stead, and he sent an officer to kill and replace the king of Eastern Qiemi [Urumqi]. All the states of Turfan had now submitted, and in the winter Ban Yong sent them against the Xiongnu king in that region. The Xiongnu were defeated and 20,000 surrendered. One of those taken was a nephew of the Shanyu, and Ban Yong forced King Jiatenu to kill the prisoner with his own hand. The Shanyu himself now brought an army, but he was driven back with loss and no further attacks were made.

Yanqi [Karashar] still kept itself independent, and Ban Yong received permission to attack. In 127 he took command of an allied army while the Administrator of Dunhuang Zhang Lang was sent to join him with three thousand men. As Zhang Lang arrived early, King Yuanmeng submitted after a brief engagement, but Ban Yong was then accused of being late at the rendezvous. He was sent to prison, and though he was later amnestied he held no further official positions and died at home.

The achievements of Ban Yong in restoring a Chinese presence in the far west may be compared to those of his father, but they were not so extensive in time or space. Ban Yong was in the west for less than five years, while Ban Chao was there for more than thirty. Moreover, while Ban Chao had spread the authority of Han over the whole Tarim basin and across the Pamirs, Ban Yong's direct operations went little further than Shanshan and Yanqi. The west of the Tarim evidently endorsed Han authority, and some agents were placed in the various states, but there was no firm and consistent Chinese control, while the Wusun and peoples further west had no political contact. The general settlement, on the other hand, was maintained until the 150s. -HHS 47/37:1587-90*; Chavannes 06.

Ban Zhao 班昭, the Lady [Huiji 惠姬]; Youfufeng. [HHS 84/74 says that the Lady's style was Huiban 惠班 and she had the alternative personal name Ji 姬, but this is probably a corruption of the text. She is also known as Cao Dagu 曹大家 "Aunt Cao:" see below.]

Daughter of Ban Biao, born about 48, the Lady was some thirteen years younger than her brothers Ban Gu and Ban Chao. About 70, at the age of fourteen sui, she married Cao Shou, also a man of Youfufeng, and they had one son, Cao Cheng. Cao Shou died at an early age, probably in the 80s, and the Lady remained faithful to his memory as an unmarried widow. In the family tradition, she obtained a broad education and was celebrated for her scholarship.

In 92 the Lady's brother Ban Gu was executed on account of his association with the disgraced general Dou Xian. Though he had compiled much of the history of the Former Han dynasty, Han shu 漢書, and some parts had been in circulation before his death, at least eight tables 表 and the Treatise on Astronomy 天文志 remained unfinished, while it appears that much of the manuscript was still in disorder. It seems likely the Lady Ban had been working with her brother, and Emperor He took the remarkable step of ordering her appointment to the Eastern Pavilion, to complete the history from the library there and from official archives. Not only was this an unusual position for a woman, but the ruler himself had authorised the death of the Lady's brother: the value placed upon this first dynastic history could not have been demonstrated more clearly.

The Han shu project certainly involved more than a simple supplementation, for it was continued over several years, and it is not possible to assess just how much of the final work should be attributed to Ban Biao, Ban Gu, Ban Zhao, or their various collaborators. The Tang scholar Liu Zhiji claims that the Lady was authorised to choose ten scholars, including the celebrated Ma Rong, to receive her guidance on reading the work and on its compilation [Shitong 12:339]. Ma Rong's elder brother Ma Xu certainly worked with the Lady Ban, but no other collaborators can be identified. Though HHS 10A:424, says that the Lady Ban instructed the Empress Deng on astronomy and mathematics as well as the classics and histories [see below], it is generally accepted that the Treatise of Astronomy of Han shu was compiled by Ma Xu, who was a distinguished mathematician. Swann 32:46, notes that the development of paper took place at this time, and the formal announcement of its invention by the eunuch Cai Lun was made in 105. It may be that some of the work of the Lady Ban included the transposition of her brother's text from bamboo to the new material.

Besides her work on Han shu, the Lady Ban was several times called to court, and Emperor He had her act as tutor to his Empress Deng and the leading concubines. Honoured with the title "Aunt" [大家 Dajia (in this context commonly sounded as Dagu 大姑)], she was commissioned to compile rhapsodies and hymns and received many gifts and rewards. About 101 she presented a memorial requesting that her brother Ban Chao, now seventy years old, be permitted to return to China from his position in the Western Regions. This was approved and Ban Chao returned to Luoyang in 102.

As the Dowager Deng took power after the death of Emperor He in 106, the Lady Ban continued to be her close companion, while her son Cao Cheng was enfeoffed as a secondary marquis. In 110 Deng Zhi and the other brothers of the Dowager sought leave to relinquish their high positions on account of the death of their mother. The Dowager was at first reluctant, but she consulted the Lady Ban who convinced her of the wisdom of such a show of self-abnegation. Her memorial is preserved in her biography in HHS.

When Ban Zhao died about 120, aged over seventy, the Dowager Deng wore mourning for her and sent officials to supervise her funeral. Besides her work on Han shu, Ban Zhao is noted for her Nü jie 女誡 "Precepts for Women" addressed to her unmarried daughters. With titles such as "Husband and Wife" 夫婦 and "Respect and Devotion" 敬慎, the theme of the seven essays is the importance of a woman's maintaining the proper relationship with her husband and his family, including the essential of marital fidelity and the requirement that widows should not remarry. Admiring the work, Ma Rong had the women of his family study and practise it; together with the Nü zhuan 女傳 "Biographies of Women" compiled by Liu Xiang 劉向 of Former Han the Precepts became models of exhortatory writing encouraging the self-suppression of women.

The Lady's daughter-in-law the Lady Ding compiled her literary works in sixteen pian under the title Cao Dagu ji 曹大家集. As well as the Precepts, some texts survive in the Wen xuan collection of Xiao Tong, including the rhapsodies Dongzheng fu 東征賦 "Rhapsody on an Eastward Journey," written when the Lady accompanied her son Cao Cheng to appointment in Chenliu [translated by Knechtges 87:172-180], and Daque fu 大雀賦 "The Great Bird [from the West]," composed in honour of an ostrich presented to the court by her brother Ban Chao in 101.

Fan Ye placed the biography of Ban Zhao in his Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳, and she is cited in the table of contents as the wife of Cao Shou. The history thus emphasises her importance as a model and mentor to others, rather than her scholarly achievements. -HHS 84/74:2784-92*, XC 7b-8a; Swann 32, Hulsewé 61, Texts:129-130 [Hulsewé], Knechtges 87:356, MBeck 90:196-197, C/C 99:43.

Bao 鮑, the Lady; Jingzhao. Mother of Bao Chu 鮑出, she died about 235, aged over a hundred. -SGZ 18:553.

Bao 豹; Xiongnu. Bao was a son of the claimant Southern Shanyu Yufuluo, but at his father's death in 195 his uncle Huchuquan took over the nominal title and named Bao as Worthy King of the Left.

In 216 Cao Cao rearranged the government of the Xiongnu state into five regions, and put Bao in command of the Western Division 左部帥. The Jin shu biography of the early fourth century chieftain Liu Yuan/Yuanhai 劉元/元海 says that Bao held the Liu surname and was the father of Liu Yuan. The modern scholar Tang Changru, however, has argued that this was no more than a propaganda attempt to identify Liu Yuan with the great imperial lineages of the past. -JS 101:2645; deC 84:537, Tang 55:396-403.

Bao 苞 [surname unknown]; Nanyang. A eunuch, he entered the palace in the time of Emperor An and remained in the imperial service until the late 160s, holding office as Coachman of the Changle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager, and Regular Attendant, and receiving enfeoffment as a marquis. He was buried in a richly decorated tomb park. -SJZ 31:4b-5a.

Though he reached high rank and shared in the eunuchs' power during the reign of Emperor Huan, SJZ 31 provides the only information on Bao's career; there is no record of his surname.

Bao Ang 鮑昂 [Shuya 叔雅]; Shangdang. Noted for his filial piety, Bao Ang cared for his father Bao De during his long illness and after his death he withdrew from the world. He was nominated and invited to office, but would not accept. He died at home. -HHS 29/19:1023, XC 1:8a.

Bao [Boxiang] 寶伯向; Youfufeng. Noted for literary and scholarly ability in the latter part of the first century, Bao Boxiang later had an official career. -HHS 80/70A:2617.

Bao Cheng 鮑成 of Jingzhao was a younger brother of Bao Chu 鮑出.

Bao Chu 鮑初 of Jingzhao was the eldest brother of Bao Chu 鮑出.

Bao Chu 鮑出 [Wencai 文才]; Jingzhao. As a young man, Bao Chu took pleasure in acting as a knight errant. In the middle 190s the region about Chang'an became seriously disturbed and Bao Chu and his family were short of food. Leaving their mother at home, Bao Chu and his brothers went out to look for wild berries and fruits; when they had gathered some Bao Chu sent three of the party back while he and one other brother continued their foraging.

As the brothers returned home, however, they found that a gang of bandits had seized the household and taken their mother captive. They were frightened and dared not chase after them. Then Bao Chu came back. Furious at their cowardice, he embarked on the quest alone. He caught up with the bandits and attacked, killing several of them, withstood their counter-attack, and continued to fight and kill until the survivors asked what he wanted. He obtained the release of his mother, but continued his one-man offensive until they freed another woman, whom Bao Chu claimed as his sister-in-law.

Bao Chu later took his mother to Jing province, but in 200, as their homeland appeared more secure, he brought her back. The Lady could not walk, and his brothers wanted to transport her in a carriage, but Bao Chu felt that the road was too steep and rough, so he constructed a basket and carried her on his back.

The leading families of the territory admired Bao Chu's dedication, and he was invited to office by both the commandery and the provincial administrations. He refused, however, for he believed himself too humble to acquire the trappings of an official.

The elderly Lady Bao died about 235, aged over a hundred, and though Bao Chu was more than seventy he carried out full mourning for her. He lived another ten to twenty years, but retained the appearance of a man in his fifties or sixties. -SGZ 18:553.

Bao Dan 鮑丹; Taishan. A celebrated Confucian, Bao Dan became Minister Steward and a Palace Attendant under Emperor Ling. -SGZ 12:384.

Bao De 鮑德/得; Shangdang. Son of Bao Yu; when his father became an Excellency in 74 Bao De was made a gentleman cadet. Admired for his moral qualities, as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates in 88 he persuaded Dou Xiang to intercede with his brother Dou Xian on behalf of the official Chen Chong.

Bao De later became Administrator of Nanyang, where he rebuilt schools, honoured old people, and encouraged scholarship and music. As neighbouring territories suffered famine, Nanyang had good harvests; the people praised him as their Spiritual Father 神父.

After nine years Bao De returned to the capital and became Minister of Finance. He died in that office [but cf. sub his son Bao Ang]. -HHS 29/19:1022-23, HQ 2:7b.

Bao Die 鮑疊 [Wengong 文公]; Shangdang. A magistrate in Lu in the early 150s, Bao Die joined the Chancellor Yi Ying in a petition asking that an official be appointed to supervise ceremonies at the Temple of Confucius. An edict of 153 gave approval and a commemorative stele was erected. -LS 1:16b.

Bao Fu 鮑福; Kuaiji. Son of Bao Xian, he maintained his father's tradition of scholarship in the Analects and tutored the young Emperor He in that field. -HHS 79/69B:2570.

Bao Hong 鮑鴻/洪 (d.189); Youfufeng. In 185 Bao Hong joined Dong Zhuo in defeating the rebels of Liang province at Meiyang.

In 188 Bao Hong was a colonel in the Northern Army at Luoyang, then transferred to the newly-formed brigade of the Western Garden, personal corps of Emperor Ling.

Later that year Bao Hong was sent to attack a group of Yellow Turbans in Runan, but he was reported by the Governor Huang Wan for embezzling local funds. He died in prison. -HHS 8:356-57, HHSJJ 61/51:2213 Shen Qinhan.

There is some uncertainty from the text whether Bao Hong was a man from Youfufeng or was the Administrator of that commandery in 185. There was, however, a local Bao family [see Bao Hui below] and it would be strange for a former Administrator with a successful military record to have held only the rank of a colonel three years later. It seems more likely that Bao Hong raised local troops to assist Dong Zhuo against the incursion by the rebels of Liang province.

Bao Hui 鮑恢; Youfufeng. A clerical officer of the Excellency over the Masses about 30, Bao Hui called at the home of the senior official Wang Liang in Donghai and was surprised at the humble circumstances of his wife and family.

About 35 Bao Hui was a senior assistant to the Director of Retainers Bao Yong. The two men came from different commanderies and were not closely related, but both were strict and fearless. Emperor Guangwu noted how the two Bao were held in respect by members of the imperial family. -HHS 27/17:933, 29/19:1020; Bn 79:139.

Bao Ji 鮑吉. Intendant of Henan in 159, Bao Ji assisted the coup of Emperor Huan against the General-in-Chief Liang Ji. In the following year he and Zhang Biao, who had been Director of Retainers at that time, were enfeoffed as marquises. -HHJ 21:252.

Bao Jiu 鮑就. Inspector of Yan province in 126-127, Bao Jiu was accused of conspiring with the eunuch Zhang Fang, with Gaotang Zhi and members of the Imperial Secretariat, and with a number of frontier officials. Two men were executed, but Bao Jiu and others were permitted to purchase relief. -HHS 101/11:3243.

Two men accused of the conspiracy had the personal name Jiu; the other was Yin Jiu, an officer of the Secretariat. The history has only the personal names of the two men executed, and one of the names is Jiu. The Kyoto index identifies this unfortunate man as Bao Jiu, but the order of the Chinese text, and the fact that the other man killed was Jiang Shu, also a member of the Secretariat, suggests that it was Yin Jiu who suffered. See also sub Zhang Fang 張防.

Bao Jun 鮑駿/俊; Jiujiang. A student of the Classic of History and a former pupil of Huan Rong, Bao Jun was a friend and colleague of Ding Hong. When Ding Hong sought to abandon his family fief and travel as a private scholar, Bao Jun persuaded him to return home and set up his own academy. He told Emperor Ming of Ding Hong's fine morality and concern for scholarship, so Ding Hong was offered appointment in the government and later became an Excellency. -HHS 37/27:1263.

Bao Shao 鮑邵; Taishan. Son of Bao Xin, he was enfeoffed in 212 in memory of his father's loyalty and service to Cao Cao. He later became Commandant of Cavalry with the Staff of Authority. -SGZ 12:383 & 384.

Bao Sheng 鮑升; Shangdang. Son of Bao Xuan and younger brother of Bao Yong; early in the reign of Wang Mang Bao Sheng was arrested by the Commandant Lu Ping because of the commitment to Han shown by his father and his brother, but he was released soon afterwards by the Administrator Zhao Xing 趙興.

In 25, as Bao Yong held out in Taiyuan for the lost cause of the Gengshi regime, Bao Sheng and his kinsman by marriage Zhang Shu captured Huangcheng in Shangdang, which had been held by Guangwu's Administrator Tian Yi. -HHS 29/19:1017, 28/18A:975-76.

Bao Si 暴汜. Administrator of Huaiyang for the Gengshi Emperor in 23, in the following year Bao Si came to terms with Liu Yong, King of Liang and claimant to the imperial title.

In 26, however, Bao Si surrendered to Guangwu's general Jia Fu. -HHS 17/7:666; Bn 59:134, 152.

Bao Xian 鮑咸 [Ziliang 子良] (8 BC-65 AD); Kuaiji. As a young man in the time of Wang Mang, Bao Xian studied with the Academician Youshi Xijun 右師細君 at Chang'an, and became expert in the Analects and the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Lu. As he was returning home about 20 he was captured by the Red Eyebrows in Donghai, but he so impressed the bandits by his chanting of the Poetry that they set him free.

Bao Xian taught privately in Donghai for several years, but returned to his home country in the mid-20s. The Administrator Huang Dang appointed him as his Registrar, and asked Bao Xian to come and teach his sons. Bao Xian told him that students should attend the teacher, not the other way round, and so Huang Dang sent his sons to him.

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, Bao Xian became a gentleman cadet. He tutored the Heirs Liu Qiang and Liu Zhuang in the Analects, and prepared a detailed commentary to that work. He also held official posts as Counsellor Remonstrant, Palace Attendant and then as General of the Household in charge of a corps of gentleman cadets.

Emperor Ming treated Bao Xian with the respect of a student to a teacher, showing him great favour, granting many gifts, and sending for his opinion whenever a question arose about the classics. In 62 Bao Xian was appointed Minister Herald, with double the salary of other ministers. He died three years later. -HHS 79/69B:2570*, XC 5:9b-10a; QHX:9.

Bao Xin 鮑信 (152-192); Taishan. Son of the minister Bao Dan; in 189 Bao Xin was a Commandant of Cavalry at Luoyang under the General-in-Chief He Jin. He Jin planned to destroy the eunuchs at court, and sent Bao Xin back to his home country to raise troops. By the time he returned, He Jin was dead, the eunuchs had been massacred, and Dong Zhuo had moved into the capital. Bao Xin urged Yuan Shao to attack Dong

Zhuo before he could establish himself, but when Yuan Shao failed to act he led his troops back to the east and took over as Chancellor of Jibei.

As allied forces gathered against Dong Zhuo in 190, Bao Xin took a general's command, but gave personal allegiance to Cao Cao, and in 191 he encouraged him to take over Dong commandery. Bao Xin warned the Inspector Liu Dai not to attack the Yellow Turbans, but when Liu Dai was killed in 192 he joined other local leaders to invite Cao Cao to become Governor of Yan province.

Later that year Bao Xin died fighting the Yellow Turbans in Dongping. His body could not be found, so Cao Cao had a wooden image carved and carried out mourning before it. Restrained in conduct and generous to his subordinates, Bao Xin was admired for maintaining Confucian principles in time of war. -SGZ 12:383-84.

Bao Xuan 鮑宣 was the husband of the Lady Huan Shaojun q.v. FSTY 3f:107 cites his name as a legal authority, but this is probably a mistake for Bao Yu 昱 q.v.

Bao Xun 鮑勛 [Shuye 叔業] (d.226); Taishan. Son of Bao Xin and brother of Bao Shao, in 212 Bao Xun was given a clerical post under the Imperial Chancellor Cao Cao in memory of his father.

In 217 Bao Xun became a member of the entourage of the Heir Cao Pi, though Cao Pi resented his strict morality. Later, when Cao Cao was in the south and Cao Pi had been left at Ye city, Bao Xun was Investigator in Wei. A brother of the Lady Guo, wife of Cao Pi, embezzled government goods. Cao Pi wrote to seek leniency, but Bao Xun reported direct to Cao Cao and the offender was executed. In return, Cao Pi had Bao Xun dismissed, though he later returned to office as an Imperial Clerk.

In 220 Bao Xun joined Sima Yi and others in urging Cao Pi to take the imperial title, and in 223 Sima Yi and Chen Qun recommended him as head of the Censorate; Cao Pi still resented his criticisms but was obliged to agree. In 225, however, Bao Xin was demoted when he opposed the plan for a major campaign against Wu, and in the following year Cao Pi had him charged with lese-majesty and forced his execution. -SGZ 12:383-86*; Goodman 98:118-120.

Bao Ya 鮑雅 of Jingzhao was an elder brother of Bao Chu 鮑出.

Bao Ye 鮑鄴. An officer of the Bureau of Astronomy in 62, Bao Ye was ordered to join his colleagues Zhang Sheng and Jing Fang in calculating corrections to the official calendar to fit with the phases of the moon.

As Assistant Musician under the Minister of Ceremonies in 77, Bao Ye put forward several proposals for the reform and restoration of court music. -HHS 91/1:3015-16, 92/2:3025, XY:2a-b.

Bao Yong 鮑永 [Junchang 君長]; Shangdang. A supporter of the fading Han dynasty, Bao Yong's father Bao Xuan 宣 was killed by Wang Mang about 5 AD. Wang Mang wanted to eliminate Bao Xuan's family, and Bao Yong was threatened by the Commandant Lu Ping 路平, but the Administrator Gou Jian 苟諫 appointed him to his yamen and protected him there. Bao Yong and Gou Jian discussed the possibility of restoring the power of Han, but then Gou Jian died; Bao Yong escorted his body back to his homeland in Youfufeng. Lu Ping did arrest his brother Bao Sheng, but the new Administrator Zhao Xing 趙興 admired the family loyalty: he released Bao Sheng and appointed Bao Yong as his Officer of Merit. Bao Yong also received provincial nomination as Flourishing Talent 秀才, but he maintained his father's tradition of opposition to the Xin regime and rejected such offers of higher appointment.

Bao Yong became an expert scholar in the Classic of History according to the New Text school of Ouyang, and he also cared generously for his widowed step-mother. When his wife spoke unkindly to a dog in her presence, Bao Yong immediately divorced her.

In 24 Bao Yong joined the Gengshi Emperor. He was appointed to the Imperial Secretariat, then sent with the Staff of Authority and title as an acting general to settle Hedong, Bing province and Shuofang. He defeated the Green Calf bandits in Hedong and was rewarded with enfeoffment, but despite his military position he maintained his scholarly interests and always wore a plain black gown.

In 25, after the Gengshi regime was destroyed by the Red Eyebrows and Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, had taken the throne, he sent his officer Zhu Dabo to call Bao Yong to surrender. Refusing to accept that their master was dead, Bao Yong and his subordinate general Feng Yan arrested Zhu Dabo and attacked Shangdang, where the Administrator Tian Yi had taken service with Guangwu. At the same time they sent messengers to Chang'an, and these eventually confirmed the death of the Gengshi Emperor.

Releasing Zhu Dabo, Bao Yong and Feng Yan carried out mourning ceremonies, and at the beginning of 26, with plain cloth 幅巾 on their heads to show that they had abandoned their official positions, they went to Guangwu with some hundred followers. Asked about the rest of their troops, Bao Yong explained that he had not wanted to gain personal advantage by bringing a large contingent, so he had disbanded his army. Guangwu was not impressed with such moral pedantry, nor by the delay in submitting.

Though Feng Yan never gained favour, Bao Yong was appointed a Counsellor and persuaded some former colleagues to surrender to the new regime. He was offered a mansion in Luoyang as reward, but did not accept.

Bao Yong was then sent as Administrator to Lu to deal with a subordinate of the eastern warlord Dong Xian. He eliminated the enemy and was rewarded with a secondary marquisate and appointment as Governor of Yang province, where he likewise settled the people. Resigning office on account of his step-mother's death, he distributed his property among his family.

In 35 Bao Yong returned to office as Director of Retainers. When the carriage of Guangwu's uncle Liu Liang, King of Zhao, met that of the General of the Household Zhang Han, Liu Liang shouted at Zhang Han to turn back and abused the gate captain Cen Zun, forcing him to kowtow and then walk in front of his chariot. Bao Yong reported this conduct as unfitting to a king and as Disrespect. The emperor took no action, but Bao Yong was admired for his stand; he and his assistant Bao Hui [not a close kinsman] were treated cautiously by members of the imperial family.

As Bao Yong made a tour of inspection in the capital province, he stopped to pay his respects at the tomb of the Gengshi Emperor and made sacrifice at the tomb of his former patron, Gou Jian 苟諫, who had served Wang Mang. Guangwu was concerned at such behaviour, but the Counsellor Zhang Zhan assured him that Bao Yong was showing personal loyalty and good faith, not dissidence.

In 39 the Excellency Han Xin fell from favour for his criticisms of the emperor, but Bao Yong argued for him and refused to impeach him. Guangwu sent him out as Chancellor of Donghai. In the following year there was a major scandal over the falsification of land registers [see sub Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming]. Bao Yong was one of the heads of commanderies ordered to prison, but before he could go he was appointed Governor of Liang province. He died of illness there three years later. -HHS 29/19:1017-21*, HHS 28/18A: 969-76, XHS 3:2b-3a; Bn 79:139, QHX:10.

Bao Yu 鮑昱 [Wenyuan 文淵] (d.81); Shangdang. The style Wenyuan comes from DGHJ and XHS. HHS has the style as Wenquan 文泉, probably changed from Wenyuan to avoid taboo on the personal name of the first emperor of Tang. A fragment of XHS by Sima Biao has it as Shouquan 守泉; this is probably a miswriting.

Son of Bao Yong, Bao Yu followed his father's tradition of scholarship in the Classic of History according to the New Text school of Ouyang, and he travelled to Dongping for his studies. In the late 20s bandits were active in the Taihang mountains and Dai She the Administrator of Shangdang, who knew his father's reputation, asked Bao Yu to act as brevet magistrate of a county in his home commandery. Bao Yu accepted, destroyed the local gangs and opened up the roads to the south. He became known for this and served later with equal success in Nanyang.

Recommended by the Inspector of Jing province, Bao Yu held various offices, and in 56 he became Director of Retainers, the same office as had formerly been held by his father and his grandfather. He was dismissed by Emperor Ming in 62 for delay in responding to a fire, but he later became Administrator of Runan, where he carried out major works of water control.

In 74 Bao Yu became Excellency over the Masses, in which post he sponsored reforms to the laws proposed by his clerk Chen Chong, presenting seven chapters of Chen Chong's codification of Cisong bi 辭訟比 "Precedents for Civil Cases," and eight chapters of Jueshi dumu 決事都目 "General Principles for Deciding Cases." A number of Bao Yu's own judgements were collected by Ying Shao and appear among the fragments of his Fengsu tongyi [FSTY 3f: 107: in some cases the personal name is miswritten as Xuan 宣.]

When the Northern Xiongnu attacked the new Han positions in the Western Regions in 75, Bao Yu argued that it was important not to abandon the troops. The garrisons in Jushi [Turfan] were relieved, and Bao Yu later urged that Geng Gong be enfeoffed and rewarded for his heroic defence.

At the death of Emperor Ming in 75 Bao Yu took charge of the funerary arrangements, even obliging the new Emperor Zhang to follow proper ritual. When there was a drought in the following year the emperor asked Bao Yu's opinion on policy reforms, and he urged him to relieve the persecution of those involved in the allegations against Liu Ying the King of Chu. In the following year the purges were ended.

In 79 Bao Yu became Grand Commandant. He died in that office two years later, aged over seventy. -HHS 29/19:1021-23*, DGHJ 14:2b-3a, XHS 3:3a.

Bao Zhong 鮑衆. Administrator of Runan, Bao Zhong recommended the local worthy Cao Shun as Filial and Incorrupt. -HHS 39/29:1312.

Baqi 拔奇 [Korean: Palgi] see sub Yiyimo of Gaogouli [Koguryo].

Bei Gong 卑躬 became Administrator of Youbeiping. -FSTY 5f:125.

Bei Guo 卑國; Henan. An officer responsible for roads and bridges under the Court Architect, in 135 Bei Guo was involved in the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang; see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16:14b.

Bei Tiao 被條 became Administrator of Zangke. -FSTY 6f:137.

Bei Tong 被通 was a Palace Counsellor. -FSTY 6f: 137.

Bei Yu 貝羽. A county magistrate in Nan in 190, he set himself up as an independent warlord but was later persuaded to submit to Liu Biao. -SGZ 6:211-12.

Bei Zheng 卑整; Yanmen. A Consultant in 175, Bei Zheng joined the eunuch Zhao You in a memorial urging that recognition be given to the Lady Yu, mother of the short-lived infant Emperor Chong, and to the Lady Chen, mother of Liu Zuan, Emperor Zhi. Emperor Ling approved: the Lady Yu was named Honoured Lady in attendance at the tomb of Emperor Shun, and the Lady Chen was formally ranked as a concubine of the late Liu Hong, King of Le'an. -HHS 10B:440.

Beigong Boyu 北宮伯玉; non-Chinese Yuezhi or Qiang. A member of the Auxiliary of Loyal Barbarians of Huangzhong, he became a leader of mutineers in Liang province. The rebellion began in winter 184, with insurrections amongst the Qiang of Beidi and Anding and the frontier people of Longxi by the upper Yellow River, but the critical point came when the Auxiliary mutinied and killed Ling Zheng the Protector of the Qiang. Beigong Boyu and Li Wenhou, troopers of the Auxiliary, were then chosen to lead the rebel coalition. The headquarters of the Auxiliary were in Wuwei, but it is likely the mutiny took place as the men were led south against the earlier rebellions.

The insurgents soon controlled a band of territory along the Yellow River about present-day Lanzhou. They captured the capital of Jincheng and killed the Administrator, then moved down the Long Road, military highway of the west, defeating the local forces of Liang province and Hanyang. They reached Meiyang in Youfufeng early in 185, and from there they sent raids towards Chang'an.

An imperial army was sent out, commanded first by Huangfu Song and then by Zhang Wen, but neither side gained major success. In the winter of 185, however, the general Dong Zhuo won a battle outside Meiyang. The rebels withdrew, but when they were pursued by a column under Zhou Shen they cut his line of supplies and forced him back. Beigong Boyu and Li Wenhou are not mentioned after this time; they were probably eliminated by internal feuding among the rebels. -HHS 72/62:2320-21; Haloun 49/50, deC 84:147-150, 492-495; and see Han Sui.

Beijianzhi 北鞬支; Xiongnu. Having been a hostage at the court of Han, in 94 Beijianzhi was an officer of King Guang of Qiuzi [Kuqa]. He was sent to welcome the Protector-General Ban Chao, but Ban Chao insisted his office required that he be received by the king in person. He considered killing Beijianzhi, but because of his influence with the king he sent him back with gifts.

When Guang was soon afterwards forced to come and submit, Beijianzhi was a senior member of his escort. -HHS 47/37:1581-82.

Beijun 卑君 of Further Jushi. Son of the former King Junjiu of Further Jushi, Beijun had been a hostage prince in China. In 153 King Aluoduo turned against Han; he was driven to seek refuge with the Xiongnu in the north, and the Administrator of Dunhuang Song Liang then set Beijun upon the throne.

As Aluoduo fought to regain his position and became increasingly successful, the Chinese accepted him rather than face further disruption. Beijun's royal insignia were accordingly withdrawn and he was named as a marquis. He returned to Dunhuang with some three hundred households of followers, who provided revenue for his exiled court. -HHS 88/78:2931.

Ben Xiu 贲休 (d.28). An officer of the warlord Dong

Xian, in the autumn of 28 he seized the county city of Lanling in Donghai and offered to submit to Han. Dong Xian promptly left his headquarters at Tan city and laid siege to him. Guangwu ordered his general He Yan to strike at Tan, but He Yan attempted to relieve Ben Xiu. He was briefly successful, but Dong Xian's troops renewed the attack and He Yan had to escape in a sortie. Dong Xian recaptured Lanling and killed Ben Xiu. -HHS 18/8:687; Bn 59:141-142.

Bi 費 [surname] see also sub Fei 費.

Bi 祕 [personal name unknown]. Administrator of Kuaiji in the time of Emperor Guangwu, he obtained the help of the local official Peng Xiu to deal with the pirate Ding Yi. -XC 5:12b.

Bi 比 or Sutuhu 蘇屠胡? (d.56); Xiongnu. Son of Nangzhiyasi 囊知牙斯, the Wuzhuliu 烏珠留 Shanyu (reg. 8 BC-13 AD), Bi was a grandson of the Huhaxie Shanyu 呼韓邪 (reg. 59/58-31 BC). In accordance with Chinese custom, and under some pressure from Wang Mang, Nangzhiyasi adopted the simpler name Zhi 知 and the names of other members of the royal house were likewise amended.

HHS has no record of Bi's full Xiongnu name. However, HS 94B:3827 has an account of Sutuhu, eldest son of the Wuzhuliu Shanyu Nangzhiyasi/Zhi. QHX:501 suggests that this man probably died after the accession of the Wulei 烏累 Shanyu Xian 咸 in 13 AD. Hui Dong, however, in HHSJ 89/79:3277, suggests that this may be an early reference to Bi, and I therefore include an account of Sutuhu's career.

The Huhaxie Shanyu had left instructions that the title of Shanyu should be passed from elder to younger brother, and only when each generation had been exhausted should it be transferred to the next. HS 94B, however, says that Nangzhiyasi/Zhi [hereafter Zhi] had planned for Sutuhu to succeed him, and had appointed him Worthy King of the Left, the traditional post of the heir-apparent. At this time a number of sons holding that title had died, and so Zhi renamed the position Huyu 護于 and appointed Sutuhu as his senior surviving son.

Despite this, it appears that when Zhi died in 13 Sutuhu was too young to succeed. His uncle Xian, Zhi's brother, took the throne, and promptly demoted Sutuhu to a junior kingship, well out of the line of succession. According to the legacy of the Huhaxie Shanyu, Xian's elder brother Yu should have become Shanyu, but he was held from the position by intrigue of the pro-Chinese party at the Xiongnu court; he was, however, named Worthy King of the Left, and he succeeded Xian at his death in 18. Yu reigned almost thirty years until his own death in 46.

Soon after his accession Yu killed his remaining half-brother Yituzhiyashi 伊屠智牙師. Sutuhu disappears from the records at this time, so it is possible he suffered the fate of Yituzhiyashi. On the other hand, HHS 89/79:2939 takes over the story and says that the Shanyu Yu appointed Bi to a command in the southeast neighbouring the Wuhuan; if Sutuhu and Bi are the same man, he thus received some promotion. Bi was nonetheless resentful that, as senior member of the next generation, he had not been named Worthy King of the Left and acknowledged in the line of inheritance. He refused to attend court, and the Shanyu became suspicious and sent two officials to supervise him.

When Yu's long reign ended in 46, Bi was indeed passed over in favour of the late Shanyu's son Wudadihou, who had earlier been named Worthy King of the Left. Wudadihou died a few months later, but not before naming his younger brother Punu as Worthy King of the Left, and Punu duly took title as Shanyu. At the same time, however, even as the Xiongnu court was unsettled by two swift successions the grasslands were affected by drought and a plague of insects, and the hitherto subservient Wuhuan attacked from the east and seized considerable territory. The new Shanyu sent messengers to Han, seeking to restore peace, and the Chinese sent an embassy in return.

For his part, though Bi's father Zhi had been no friend of Han, and Bi himself was not naturally pro-Chinese, he was angry at his omission from the succession, and he also feared for his life; the fate of Yituzhiyashi a generation earlier was a matter for concern for any claimant in his position. Given the fact that the territory under his control was close to that of China, and his dissatisfaction must have been well known, it seems likely that imperial agents had earlier made some contact with him.

In any event, as the envoy Li Mao passed by on his way to the court of the Shanyu in 46, Bi sent a Chinese in his service to offer maps of Xiongnu territory in token of his readiness to submit to Han. In the following year, moreover, Bi went to visit the Administrator of Xihe and suggested that he act as an agent of Han within the Xiongnu court. This was most dangerous conduct, and Bi must have been confident of Chinese support. The officers of the Shanyu, still maintaining their supervision, reported this initiative and recommended that Bi be arrested and executed during the great summer ceremony at the Shanyu's headquarters, Longcheng by present-day Ulan Bator. One of Bi's younger brothers, however, learnt of the plan and warned him.

At this Bi gathered his troops, some forty or fifty thousand men, and prepared to kill the Shanyu's officers. They made their escape and told the court. Punu sent ten thousand men against his cousin, but they withdrew in the face of superior numbers. It is notable that the Shanyu's response to a major threat was so inadequate, and it appears the Xiongnu court and the state itself were confused and in difficulty. The Chinese, moreover, appear to have been so confident of their diplomatic success that orders had been given for a reduction of defences in the north as early as the time of the initial embassies and Bi's first approach.

Despite his local superiority, after the formal break Bi could claim the allegiance of only eight divisions [部 bu], a small fraction of the Xiongnu tribes. In 48 he shifted his base to the Ordos region, and from there he sought an alliance with China, undertaking to defend the frontier and act as a buffer against the north. At a court conference held to consider this proposal, Emperor Guangwu was persuaded by the arguments of Geng Guo, and in the winter of 48/49 Bi took title as Shanyu. His dynastic or regnal appellation was Xiluo shizhu di 醯落尸逐鞮 [where di is taken by Chinese commentators as equivalent to Xiao 孝 "Filial" in the titles of the emperors of Han], while he also took the style of Huhanxie, in memory of his grandfather and the support he had received from China.

In 49 the Shanyu Bi sent troops under his younger brother Mo, Worthy King of the Left, against the northerners. They defeated the guard of the Northern Shanyu, captured his younger brother, and returned with ten thousand people, seven thousand horses, and myriads of cattle and sheep. The Northern Shanyu withdrew across the Gobi, and two of his chiefs came with their people to join the Southern court, but at the same time the Shanyu Bi again despatched envoys offering tribute to Han, including some of the state treasures, and sent one of his sons as hostage. Despite his current success, Bi was evidently uncertain about his long-term position between the Chinese and his more powerful cousin, and with increasing anxiety he asked once more for a renewal of the old alliance and requested an emissary to ensure liaison between the two courts.

In the spring of 50 the Han sent the General of the Household Duan Chen to formally establish Bi as Shanyu. Arriving at his headquarters some thirty kilometres outside Wuyuan, they presented him with a gold seal as Shanyu, but insisted that he make the kowtow and declare himself a subject of Han. Before his weeping attendants, Bi submitted himself. He was then granted permission to set up residence within the frontiers, and received splendid presents and insignia, including chariots and horses, silk and gold, raiment and musical instruments.

A short time later, in the summer, an unnamed younger brother of the Northern Shanyu, who had been captured by Bi's brother Mo in the previous year, escaped from his nominal imprisonment, and with five Southern chieftains and some 30,000 men he went to the north and proclaimed himself as a third Shanyu, possibly as a compromise candidate to unify his people. He was swiftly attacked by the Northern Shanyu and his leading allies were slain. A few months later he was forced to kill himself, and the sons of the five dead chieftains, who had inherited their fathers' troops, attempted to make their way back to the south. Shanyu Bi sent a column to their aid, but before they could arrive the Northern army had captured the renegades, and in a head-on clash they put the southerners to rout. The incident was minor in itself, but the defection of five chieftains showed a lack of approval for Bi even among his most senior followers, while the defeat of his men in a face-to-face encounter restored the balance of power to the Northern state.

When Shanyu Bi took up residence in Chinese territory at the beginning of the year, he was initially in Yunzhong commandery, but in the winter of 50 his capital was shifted to Meiji in Xihe, within the Ordos loop by the western bank of the Yellow River; Duan Chen was appointed Emissary to the Xiongnu.

Unlike previous envoys, the Emissary was stationed at Meiji and supervised Xiongnu affairs in similar fashion to a British Resident at the court of a princely state in the time of the Indian Empire. The Emissary had a civilian staff and a military escort under a senior colonel, while a special guard of fifty crossbowmen, recruited from convicts whose sentences had been relaxed, was attached to the residence of the Shanyu. Furthermore, from winter to summer each year two thousand Chinese horsemen from Xihe camped at Meiji, with another five hundred reprieved convicts, likewise armed with crossbows, to "guard and protect" the Shanyu.

Hereafter the Shanyu maintained one of his sons as a hostage at Luoyang, and the regular annual change-over was accompanied by exchange of missions, with messages of respect from the Shanyu and gifts from the emperor of Han. Bi himself, however, never visited the imperial court, and it does not appear he was ever again required to perform the kowtow. At the same time, while Bi and his own people settled in Xihe, the other eight divisions which had followed him to the south spread across the frontier from Dai and Yanmen in the east through Dingxiang, Yunzhong, Wuyuan, Shuofang and southwest to Beidi. From the Sanggan valley round the Ordos loop of the Yellow River they acted as scouts and guards for the territory of Han, but they maintained their tribal organisation and occupied the land in common with a dwindling number of Chinese settlers.

There is debate on the true value and cost of Bi's submission. Bielenstein has pointed out that grants to the Southern Shanyu were far greater than those received by the first Huhaxie Shanyu, and it may be estimated that official gifts to the Southern court in the first eight years of dependence were almost as much as the total awards made to the Xiongnu in the last fifty years of Former Han, while some hundred millions of cash were also provided annually as subsidy to the puppet state. On the other hand, the Southern Xiongnu were something of a bargain compared to the amounts paid to the Xianbi and the Wuhuan in the northeast, and to the expenditure required for the Qiang wars in the early second century: the cost of operations against the Qiang between 107 and 118 was estimated at 24,000 million cash, not to mention the devastation of the northwest in the course of the campaigns.

So it may be judged that the subventions paid to the Southern Xiongnu were worth their cost to the Han state, and there is no question that Bi's defection and the division of the tribal confederacy gave valuable breathing space to the hard-pressed Chinese. Later events would show that the basic problems of the unstable north were essentially insoluble, but in my own study of the frontier at this time I have argued that ultimate failure came from problems of geography, loss of Chinese population to the south, and later mistaken policies of aggression and assimilation, rather than directly from the settlement of Xiongnu.

At the same time as the Emissary was sent to Meiji, in the winter of 50 the imperial court gave orders for the repatriation of those who had abandoned their homes along the northern frontier. Refugees from the border commanderies were promised food and assistance, work-gangs were sent to repair fortifications, and the whole enterprise was directed by the Grand Commandant Zhao Xi. The program was only marginally successful, for many families who had left their homes two generations earlier had no desire to return, and had often resettled far to the south. In 57 Emperor Ming abandoned the scheme, and in 65 the office of General on the Liao, first proposed by the minister Geng Guo at the time of Bi's surrender, was adopted.

Stationed in Wuyuan commandery, the duty of the Trans-Liao command was not so much to protect the limited number of Chinese in the region, but to prevent the Southern Xiongnu from communicating and co-operating with their cousins to the north. [The Liao River is actually in the northeast, and there had been a general of that title under Former Han; in Later Han, however, the General on the Liao was concerned only with the Xiongnu to the immediate north of the empire.]

When the Shanyu Bi died in 56 he was duly succeeded by his next younger brother Mo, and the system of inheritance was thereafter maintained through each generation in turn from the oldest to the youngest. -HHS 89/79; Bn 67:116-122, deC 84:229-251, Yü 67:49-51.

Bi Chen 畢謹; Dongping. In 193 Bi Chen was Attendant Officer to Cao Cao in Yan province. When Zhang Miao made his rebellion, Bi Chen was with Cao Cao's army, but the rebels seized his mother, wife and brothers, and Cao Cao gave Bi Chen permission to leave.

When Cao Cao destroyed Lü Bu in 198 he captured Bi Chen. Pardoning his service with the enemy, he appointed him Chancellor of Lu. -SGZ 1:16.

Bi Fan 費汎/汎 [Zhonglü 仲慮]; Wu. A scholarly man, skilled in ritual and music, Bi Fan was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. After probation as a gentleman cadet, he became a major in the Northern Army and then a magistrate in Pei. He served there with great success for nine years, including a period when the virtue of his government was said to have protected the territory from locusts which plagued the rest of the region. He then became Chancellor of Liang, where he governed with equal distinction until he retired on grounds of ill health. He died at the age of eighty.

Bi Fan's grandson Bi Gou set up a stele in honour of Bi Fan and his two sons, Bi Feng and Bi Zheng. -LS 11:18a-19b.

Bi Feng 費鳳 [Boxiao 伯蕭] (112/3-177); Wu. An elder son of Bi Fan, when he was aged about thirty Bi Feng received commandery nomination as Filial and Incorrupt. Following a period of probation as a gentleman cadet, he was a county magistrate in Chen, Danyang and Guangling. When he died at that age of sixty-six, his widow the Lady Bu and her brother set up a stele in his memory, another inscription was composed by his distaff kinsman Shi Xu, and he was also mentioned in the inscription erected for his father by his nephew Bi Gou. -LS 9:18a-23a, 11:18a-19b, LX 5:9b.

Bi Gou 費均; Wu. Grandson of Bi Fan and son of Bi Zheng, he set up a family stele. -LS 11:18a-19b.

Bi Hai 畢海; Kuaiji. Nominated by the Administrator Zhang Ba during the 90, Bi Hai later achieved high office. -HYZ 10A:133.

Bi Hao 畢豪. A pirate on the Yellow River, in 108 Bi Hao brought his men into Pingyuan commandery. The magistrate Liu Xiong led local troops against him, but was defeated and captured. Bi Hao and his men were going to kill Liu Xiong, but his officer Suo Fu asked to take his place. So Liu Xiong was released and Suo Fu died in his stead.

When Bi Hao was later captured by the Administrator of Donghai, he told of this incident. It was reported to the throne, and an imperial letter granted Suo Fu posthumous honours and rewarded his family. -HHS 81/71:2672.

Bi Lan 畢嵐 (d.189). A eunuch, during the 180s Bi Lan was one of twelve Regular Attendants enfeoffed as marquises. As Prefect of the Lateral Courts he cast bronze statues and bells for the Southern Palace at Luoyang, and also constructed water-lifting machines: Heavenly Deer [天祿 tianlu] and Frogs [蝦蟆 xiamā], probably fed by noria buckets, served aqueducts leading into the palace; while a square-pallet chain pump [翻車 fanche] and Thirsty Crows [渴鳥 kewu], probably suction-pumps rather than syphons, supplied the north-south roads of the city.

In 189 Bi Lan was one of the group which waylaid and killed the General-in-Chief He Jin, and he no doubt died in the slaughter which followed.

Needham and Bielenstein emphasise the achievements of Bi Lan as an engineer and artisan, but traditional historians noted the extravagance of his works, which were associated with Emperor Ling's mistaken and corrupted projects of rebuilding at Luoyang. -HHS 8:353, 78/68:2534-37, 69/59:2251; Needham 65:345-346, 358, Bn 76:32-33, deC 89:200, 574.

Bi Min 辟敏 [Shugong 叔公]; Nanyang. A former county magistrate, in 156 Bi Min was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Bi Yang 皮楊/陽. Inspector of Liang province in 114, Bi Yang attacked the rebel Qiang in Longxi commandery but was heavily defeated. He was dismissed from office. -HHS 5:221, 87/77:2889.

Bi Yu 畢瑜. Formerly a county magistrate in Julu, in 191 Bi Yu was sent by Yuan Shao and other leaders of the eastern alliance to offer the imperial title to Liu Yu. Liu Yu, however, firmly refused. -SGZ 1:22.

The main text of HHS 73/63:2355 ascribes this mission to a former Administrator, Zhang Qi, which seems more likely. SGZ PC, however, quotes Xiandi qiju zhu as saying that Han Fu and Yuan Shao sent Bi Yu with a golden seal, while HHS 73/63:2356 says that after Liu Yu rejected the imperial title they suggested he claim regency control of the Secretariat. It is possible the golden seal and Bi Yu's visit related to this second proposal, though HHS 73/63 says that Liu Yu not only rejected this, but executed the messenger.

Bi Zheng 費鳳; Wu. Younger son of Bi Fan, he became Administrator of Jiujiang. -LS 11:18a-19b.

Bi Zheng 畢整/正 miswritten for Bei Zheng 卑整. -XHS 1:16a, HHSJJ 10B:421 Hui Dong.

Bian 卞, the Lady (160-230); though her family was registered in Langye the Lady was actually born in Qi. When young the Lady was sing-song girl in a brothel, but she later became a concubine 妾 of Cao Cao. She gave birth to Cao Pi in 187, and also bore Zhang, Zhi [in 192] and Xiong.

When Cao Cao fled from Dong Zhuo at Luoyang in 189, Yuan Shu spread rumours of his death, but the Lady Bian denied them and held his party together. Following the death of Cao Ang in 197 and the dismissal of the Lady Ding, she became Cao Cao's principal wife 繼室. She was admired for her modest and sensible conduct, notably for her generous treatment of her predecessor the Lady Ding and for her restraint when Cao Pi was named Heir in 217.

Named Queen of Wei in 219, she was honoured as Queen- and then Empress-Dowager by Cao Pi in 220. She protected Cao Zhi from his brother's enmity and restrained the conduct of her own relatives. When her grandson Cao Rui came to the throne in 226 she was honoured as Grand Dowager 太皇太后. -SGZ 5:156-59*; C/C 99.90-94, Mather 76:561.

Bian 便 or Pian of Yetiao/Shetiao 葉調. King of the state, which lay beyond the frontier of Rinan in the far south, in 131 Bian sent his officer Shuhui on an embassy to the court of Emperor Shun. The emperor awarded him the golden seal and purple ribbon of royalty. -HHS 6:258, 86/76:2837.

Bian Bin 便賓; Guanghan. Husband of the Lady Chang Yuan, Bian Bin died young. The couple had no children. -HYGZ 10A:140.

Bian Bing 卞秉; Langye. Younger brother of the Lady Bian, he was a senior major under Cao Cao and was later enfeoffed. -SGZ 5:158; C/C 99.93-94.

Bian Feng 邊鳳; Chenliu. A former Intendant of Jingzhao, admired for his administration, Bian Feng was succeeded by Yan Du. The two men were celebrated by the people as comparable to the finest rulers of the commandery under Former Han. -HHS 64/54:2103-04.

Bian Gan 邊乾. As senior assistant to Wang Zhang the Chancellor of Liang in 165, Bian Gan took part in setting up the inscribed stele erected in honour of the legendary Prince Qiao 王子喬 of the Zhou period. -SJZ 23:15b.

Bian Guang 卞廣; Langye. Father of Bian Yuan and grandfather of the Lady Bian, wife of Cao Cao, Bian Guang was posthumously ennobled in 230. -SGZ 5:158.

Bian Guang 卞廣, wife of: see the Lady Zhou 周.

Bian Hong 邊鴻/洪 (d.204); Danyang. A follower of Gui Lan and Dai Yuan, Bian Hong murdered the Administrator Sun Yi. He was later killed. -SGZ Wu 6:1212; deC 90:232-233.

Bian Ji 卞忌. An attendant to Liu Chang, King of 20 Bian Jing

Liang, he claimed to interpret the king's dreams, encouraged him to sacrifice to the spirits in search of good fortune, and later told him they had said he should become emperor. In 93 the provincial and state officials reported this Impiety; Liu Chang was punished and Bian Ji is not heard of again. -HHS 50/40:1676.

Bian Jing 便敬; Guanghan. Husband of the Lady Wang He, Bian Bin died young but left her with children. -HYGZ 10B:153.

Bian Lan 卞蘭; Langye. Elder son of Bian Bing, he succeeded to his father's fief but received no particular favour from Cao Cao. He became a favourite of Cao Pi, however, by composing a rhapsody of praise for him. He rose in rank to be a general under Wei, and was a close and honest adviser to Cao Pi and to his son Cao Rui, Emperor Ming. A sufferer from diabetes 消渴, attributed to his excessive consumption of wine, he died about 230. -SGZ 5:158-59; C/C 99.90-95.

Bian Lin 卞琳; Langye. Younger son of Bian Bing, he received a share of his father's fief and was a colonel in the Northern Army under Wei. -SGZ 5:158; C/C 99:94.

Bian Mangyi 編盲意 was a magician who dealt with the spirits. -HHS 82/72B:2749; Ngo 76:140-141, DeWoskin 83:87.

Bian Rang 邊讓 [Wenli 文禮] (d.193); Chenliu. A kinsman of Bian Shao, Bian Rang was a considerable scholar, admired also for his skill in conversation and as a composer of rhapsodies. He was a close friend of Xie Zhen, but though Guo Tai admired the talents of the two men, he criticised their lack of true morality.

Bian Rang received appointment from the General-in-Chief He Jin, he was held in high regard at the capital and was recommended by his fellow-countryman Cai Yong. During the early 190s he served with limited success as Administrator of Jiujiang, but as disorder spread he returned to his homeland of Chenliu.

Bian Rang was not impressed by Cao Cao, who became Governor of Yan province in 192, and he made the mistake of saying so. In 193 one of his neighbours told Cao Cao of this, and he killed Bian Rang and his family. Leading men of the province were concerned at the fate of such a distinguished colleague, however, and Cao Cao's position in Yan became vulnerable.

Most of Bian Rang's work is lost, but HHS 80/70B preserves his Zhanghua fu 章華賦, a rhapsody on a pleasure pavilion of the ancient kings of Chu 楚 by the junction of the Han and the Yangzi, the area described also in Zixu fu 子虛賦 by Sima Xiangru 司馬相如 of Former Han. Bian Rang is said to have used extravagant phrasing but strict rhythmic form. -HHS 80/70B:2640-47*, 68/58:2230-31, 74/64A:2394, SGZ 1:55, 6:197, Cai 8:4; Mather 76:561.

Bian Shao 邊韶 [Xiaoxian 孝先]; Chenliu. Celebrated for his wit and scholarship, Bian Shao travelled widely and attracted hundreds of private students. About 135 he composed a celebratory inscription for a stele marking the completion of the major work of water control on the Yellow River and its tributaries led by the Internuncio Sima Deng.

As a member of the Imperial Secretariat in 143, Bian Shao argued that the current Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar was calculated from the wrong base year (Sivin 69:59: "working epoch") and did not accord with the apocrypha. The Astronomer Yu Gong accepted that the calendar was not perfect, but argued that it was basically satisfactory and should not be changed. Emperor Shun agreed.

Bian Shao was later a county magistrate in Yingchuan, returning to the capital as a Counsellor about 150. Soon afterwards he was appointed to the library of the Eastern Pavilion 東觀 to work on the third instalment of the official history of Later Han: this was later named Dongguan Hanji 東觀漢記 but was at that time known simply as Han ji 漢記. The compilation included annals, tables of marquises and officials, accounts of the Xiongnu and the Qiang, with biographies of empresses and other individuals, including the eunuchs Cai Lun and Sun Cheng.

In 151 Bian Shao supported a proposal for Liang Ji to receive extraordinary honours; the Excellency Huang Qiong put an end to the idea.

Bian Shao later became Administrator of Beidi, then returned to the capital as head of the Imperial Secretariat, and in 165 he was appointed Chancellor of Chen. He composed the inscription for the Laozi ming 老子銘 stele, which was set up at Hu county, putative birthplace of the sage, probably to commemorate the visit by the palace eunuch Guan Ba in the winter of 165/166 [LS 3:1a-4a; Seidel 69:122-128, deC 80:72-73 and see sub Guan Ba].

Bian Shao died in office, leaving fifteen pian of writings, including poems, inscriptions and letters. -HHS 80/70A:2623-24*, 92/2:3035, SJZ 16:9a, 23:5a;

Bn 54:11, Miyakawa 60:34, MBeck 90:59-61.

During the First Faction Incident of 166/167 the name of Bian Shao is among those commended to Emperor Huan by Dou Wu. This should relate to the same man, but he is described at that time as being only a junior member of the Secretariat; had he been Director, and also served as chief of two commandery units, he hardly needed Dou Wu's recommendation. It is possible the whole reference is anachronistic, and Bian Shao was already dead. -HHS 69/59:2240 and cf. sub Zhang Ling.

Bian Xin 編訢. In 85 Bian Xin and his colleague Li Fan were members of the calendrical office. The Taichu 太初 [Grand Beginning] calendar, which had been in use since that reign-period in 104 BC, had become seriously inaccurate, despite adjustments by the Santong 三統 [Three Sequences] system of Liu Xin 劉歆 in the time of Wang Mang. The regular office of astronomy was unable to propose a solution, and Emperor Zhang commissioned Bian Xin and Li Fan to prepare a better set of calculations.

In a major reform, Bian Xin and Li Fan proposed a variant of the ancient Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar, and an imperial edict put it into effect. Sivin 69:19-33 points out, however, that while the Sifen system was more accurate on the length of the year, it was no better at predicting eclipses. -HHS 92/2:3026-27; Needham 59:247, 401, Loewe 86E:686.

Bian Yu 卞玉 [Zigui 子珪]; Jianwei. An officer of the Yellow Gates, possibly a eunuch, Bian Yu came from the same commandery as the former Director of Retainers Yang Huai/Zhun. In 173 he passed by the tombs of Yang Huai/Zhun and his brother Yang Bi and set up a stele in their honour. -LX 11:11b, Nagata 94:200.

Bian Yuan 卞遠; Langye. Father of the Lady Bian, consort of Cao Cao, in 230 Bian Yuan was post-humously enfeoffed as a marquis. -SGZ 5:156-58; C/C 99.93-94.

Bian Yun 邊允 see Bian Zhang 邊章.

Bian Zhang 邊章; Jincheng. A man of note in the northwest, Bian Zhang served as a county magistrate in Hongnong, and in 178 he was among the sponsors of a stele in honour of Yin Hua the late Administrator of Jincheng: Guwen yuan 19:8b and see further below.

In 184 Bian Zhang was at Yuanya, present-day Lanzhou, which was the capital of Jincheng commandery and also the headquarters of Liang province. When a group of rebels and mutineers under Beigong Boyu appeared before the city Bian Zhang and his colleague Han Sui joined the rebellion; though it is said that they were taken hostage and acted under duress both men became leaders. Bian Zhang held command during an attack towards Chang'an in 185, but the rebels were forced to retreat and he died soon afterwards. He may have succumbed to illness, but was perhaps killed by Han Sui.

Though Beigong Boyu was the first leader of the coalition, and Han Sui was active several years later, Bian Zhang appears to have been the senior figure, and the Liang province insurgents are frequently referred to as "Bian Zhang and Han Sui." -HHS 72/62:2320-21, SGZ 1:45; Haloun 49/50, deC 84:147-150, 492-495.

Some texts suggest that Bian Zhang's original personal name was Yun 允, and that he and Han Sui changed their names after they joined the rebellion. The inscription to Yin Hua of 178, however, lists Bian Zhu 竺 or Bian Gan 竿: taking the latter reading, Haloun argues that it has been corrupted or miscopied from Zhang 章.

Bin Qin 邠勤; Henei. A local officer, about 140 Bin Qin took part in the erection of a stele at the funerary temple of the Grand Duke Lü Wang 太公呂望, founder of the ancient state of Qi 齊. -SJZ 9:7a.

Bing 昺 [surname unknown]. With rank as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, in 220 he was a sponsor of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Bing Ji 邴吉 (d.124). Bing Ji was supervisor of kitchens in the household of Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun, when he was Heir to his father Emperor An. He became a friend and favourite of the boy, and an associate of his wet-nurse Wang Nan. In 124, however, Liu Bao became the centre of a struggle for influence in which Bing Ji and Wang Nan were opposed to the court eunuchs Jiang Jing and Fan Feng, allied to the Lady Wang Sheng, former wet-nurse to Emperor An, and her daughter Borong. Upset and confused by the intrigues, Liu Bao took refuge at the mansion which had been built for Wang Sheng.

22 Bing Liang

Bing Ji and Wang Nan attempted to regain control by arguing that the place was affected by spirits which had been disturbed by recent construction, but their protests were ignored. They lost much of their influence and Wang Sheng and her allies soon afterwards accused them of conspiracy. Bing Ji and Wang Nan were killed and their families and associates were exiled to the far south.

Liu Bao nonetheless mourned Bing Ji and Wang Nan, and the members of the successful clique were concerned he might later seek to avenge their deaths. A few months later, therefore, they told Emperor An that Liu Bao had also taken part in the alleged conspiracy, and persuaded him to dismiss him as Heir.

After the accession of Liu Bao through the coup led by the eunuch Sun Cheng in 125, Bing Ji's relatives and associates were permitted to return to the capital and were generously rewarded. -HHS 15/5:590-93.

Bing Liang 郟良 [Wenlun 文鸞]; Danyang. Son of Bing Zhi, Bing Liang served under Sun Ce and was appointed Commandant of the east of Kuaiji. -SGZ Wu 16:1398.

Bing Xuan 郟玄 [Wenbiao 文表] (d.226); Danyang. Son of Bing Zhi, when his elder brother Liang died Bing Xuan took over his troops in Kuaiji. He was appointed a General of the Household and later enfeoffed, and because of the family tradition of loyalty Bing Xuan's daughter was married to the Heir Sun Deng.

Bing Xuan evidently died without sons. He was mourned by Sun Quan, but his troops were transferred to Pan Jun. -SGZ Wu 16:1398.

Bing Yuan 郟原 [Genju 根矩] (d.217); Beihai. Bing Yuan's father died early and his family was poor, but Bing Yuan was sponsored by a local teacher, travelled widely in search of learning, and became a close friend and colleague of Hua Xin and Guan Ning. He would not accept local appointment.

In the early 190s the new Administrator Kong Rong nominated Bing Yuan as Knowing the Way, but he still considered the situation too unstable, so he led his household to refuge on an island in the Gulf of Beihai. He later went to Liaodong, where he was welcomed by Gongsun Du and managed to save his fellow-countryman Liu Zheng from his enmity. Within a few months Bing Yuan had become the centre of a group of refugee scholars, but he irritated Gongsun Du by his direct speech, and on the advice of his colleague Guan Ning he left Liaodong and returned home.

Bing Yuan later joined Cao Cao's staff, and when Cao Cao's son Chong died in 208 Cao Cao asked he be buried with Bing Yuan's daughter, who had also just died. Bing Yuan, however, felt this would be immoral and refused.

In 215 Bing Yuan succeeded Liang Mao as Senior Clerk to Cao Pi, General of the Household for All Purposes. He accompanied the army against Wu in 217 but died on that campaign. -SGZ 11:350-54*; Mather 76:562.

Bing Zhi 郟祉 [Xuansi 宣嗣]; Danyang. Bing Zhi served under Sun Jian and was recommended by him to Yuan Shu, who appointed him Administrator of Jiujiang and then Administrator of Wu. Bing Zhi did well in each office, but died in the early 190s. -SGZ Wu 16:1398.

Bing Zun 郟尊 (d.159). In 159 the General-in-Chief Liang Ji wanted to have the Honoured Lady Deng, favourite of Emperor Huan, adopted into the Liang clan in order to maintain his influence in the palace and the court. The Consultant Bing Zun, however, husband of an elder sister of the Lady, saw opportunity for advancement through his sister-in-law's good fortune, and urged his mother-in-law the Lady Xuan not to agree to the proposed change. Liang Ji sent his agent Qin Gong and a band of retainers to kill Bing Zun. -HHS 102/12:3256.

Bique 畢缺; Qiang. A woman of the Shaohe tribe, Bique was a grandmother of the war-lord Mitang. In 92 the Protector Nie Shang attempted to attract Mitang by a show of goodwill and Mitang sent Bique to visit him. Nie Shang appears to have showed her every courtesy, but when his envoys escorted her back to Mitang's camp he murdered them and used their blood to swear enmity to Han. There is no explanation for the volte-face. -HHS 87/77:2883.

Bitongqian 比銅鉗, the Lady; Qiang. A woman of the Shaohe, aged over a hundred in the late 50s, she was recognised and trusted as a wise woman. As the tribe was attacked by a neighbouring group, the Lady brought them for refuge to the Xining valley in Jincheng. Some of them, however, offended the laws, and the local magistrate arrested Bitongqian and executed six or seven hundred of her followers. When Emperor Ming heard about this he was angry that such harsh treatment reflected badly upon the quality of his regime. He ordered that the refugees should be released and the Lady Bitongqian receive medical treatment. -HHS 87/77:2880.

Bo 薄/亳, the Lady, see Deng Mengnü 鄧猛女, Empress of Emperor Huan, and also the Lady Xuan 宣. -HHS 10B:444, 104/14:3295.

Bo 白, the Lady. About 215 the Lady's husband, a man of family in Ji province, fled Cao Cao's jurisdiction. Regulations required that the wife should be put to death in his stead, but Cao Cao's officer Lu Yu observed that the marriage was recent and she had never lived with her husband. Traditional authorities thus exempted her from his fate. -SGZ 22:650.

Bo 博 [surname unknown] [Jizhi 季智] see sub Wang Bo of Hedong. -Nagata 94:280.

Bo Bo 白波. Bo Bo appears as the name of a leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range in 185. -HHS 71/61:2310, SGZ 8:261. At this time, however, there was a group of bandits, styling themselves as Yellow Turbans, who were said to come from the Bobo valley 白波谷 in Xihe [HHS 8:355 and see sub Guo Da]. It is possible that the name of the group has been interpreted as that of an individual.

Bo Cai 波才 (d.184); Yingchuan. A leader of Yellow Turbans in 184, he initially defeated Zhu Jun and besieged Huangfu Song, but was then defeated and destroyed. -HHS 71/61:2301; deC 89:180-184.

Bo Rao 白繞. In 185 Bo Rao was a leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range. In 191 he raided Dong commandery but was defeated by Cao Cao. -HHS 71/61:2310-11, SGZ 1:8-9.

Bo Shang 白尙; Nan. Through the influence of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, about 146 accusations of corruption were made against Ma Rong the Administrator of Nan commandery. One charge claimed that Bo Shang had paid a bribe to Ma Rong's son Qiang so that he might obtain a senior appointment on his local staff. -HHSJ 60/50A:2130 Hui Dong quoting Sanfu jue.

Bo Xiaochang 柏孝長; Nanyang. Officer of Merit of Nanyang commandery for Cao Cao in 201, he was stationed in the city of Xi'e with the magistrate Du Xi. As Liu Biao's forces first came to attack, Bo Xiaochang hid in fear. He gradually ventured out of his hiding-place, and after four or five days he put on armour and took part in the fighting. He explained to the heroic Du Xu that, for him, courage came with practice. -SGZ 23:666.

Bo Yi 帛意; Lujiang. In 30 the army of Emperor Guangwu captured the city of Shu 舒, capital of the warlord Li Xian. As Li Xian fled, his follower Bo Yi killed him and went to surrender. He was rewarded with enfeoffment. -HHS 12/2:501.

Bo Ying 柏英 became Minister Herald. -FSTY 5f:130.

Bo [Zhongzhi] 白仲職; Yingchuan. During the first half of the second century Bo Zhongzhi was a teacher of the classics. -HYGZ 10C:174.

Bo [Zilao] 博子勞 was an expert on the physiognomy of horses. -FSTY 6f:138.

Boba 白霸 of Qiuzi [Kuqa]. In 78 the general Ban Chao recommended that Boba, hostage prince at court, be named King of Qiuzi on behalf of Han, and after King Youliduo surrendered in 91 he had Boba take his place.

In 106 the imperial commander Liang Qin persuaded Boba to allow Chinese troops into his city so they might defend it together. Despite fierce protests from his officials and people, Boba agreed. When Liang Qin brought additional troops, however, the people rebelled and, aided by neighbouring Wensu and Gumo [Aksu], they besieged Boba and his Chinese allies. Liang Qin held out for several months and eventually drove the enemy off with heavy losses, but the Han withdrew from central Asia soon afterwards. Deprived of Chinese support, it is unlikely Boba survived much longer. -HHS 47/37:1576, 1581, 1591.

Bode 伯得; Xiongnu. A chieftain of the Southern Xiongnu, in 142 Bode and his associate Taiqi joined the rebel leader Wusi in plundering Bing province. Though Wusi was assassinated in the following year, Bode and Taiqi remained at large and continued to cause trouble.

In 155 Bode and Taiqi led some seven thousand men to attack the Xiongnu capital at Meiji 美稷 in Xihe. Isolated and defeated by the Chinese commander Zhang Huan, they were compelled to surrender. -HHS 7:302, 65/55:2138, 89/79:2962-63.

Bogu 伯固 of Gaogouli [Koguryo]. Known in Korean history as Paekko, he was the son of Suicheng, and succeeded him as king about 130, almost certainly as a minor. The kingdom was evidently weakened by internal disorder, and the beginning of Bogu's reign saw the continuation of peace with Han, while the Chinese established military colonies in Xuantu to restore their position in the northeast.

From the middle 140s there was renewed raiding against Liaodong and Lelang, while Bogu and his people may have come under the influence of the Xianbi chief Tanshihuai. In 169, however, Geng Lin the Administrator of Xuantu attacked Gaogouli and took several hundred heads, and Bogu once again offered submission. When Gongsun Du took over Liaodong in 190, Bogu was still on the throne, and he sent envoys with tribute. -HHS 85/75:2815, SGZ 30:845; Gardiner 69A:32, 69B:181-185.

Bohou [Zi'an] 白侯子安. About 175 Bohou Zi'an was a scholar and teacher of Chunqiu and Zuo zhuan. -SGZ Wu 7:1219.

Boli Song 百里嵩; surname also, probably wrongly, as 白里 [Jingshan 景山 or Jishan 季山]; Chenliu. [Xie Cheng describes Boli Song as a man from Shanyang, but it seems clear that this is a mistake.]

A worthy man, Boli Song became Inspector of Xu province. At a time of drought, he travelled through the province and rain blessed every place he went. Because of the difficulty of the road he missed two counties in the hills, and they continued to suffer until their leaders came and begged him to visit. Boli Song turned back, and the rain duly accompanied him.

Boli Song later became Chancellor of Ji'nan, where a fall of sweet dew 甘露 honoured his regime. Emperor An admired his government and called him to court as Minister Herald. -XC 5:5b-6a, HHSJJ 76/66:2719 Hui Dong.

Boma Shaobo 駁馬少伯 [Little Lord on a Piebald Horse]. During the 20s a number of non-Chinese in the region of Anding joined the local warlord Lu Fang, who claimed descent from the house of Han and then claimed the imperial throne. When Lu Fang fled China in 36 these auxiliaries returned to their home territory. In 45, however, resenting the controls and corvée duties placed upon them by local authorities, they rose in rebellion. Their leader, a large, strong man, styled himself Little Lord on a Piebald Horse. He established a base in the central hill country and made contact with the Xiongnu outside the frontier.

The imperial official Chen Xin was sent as Chief Clerk in Command of Troops and took three thousand horsemen to attack the rebels. As the Little Lord surrendered, he and his followers were shifted to the valley of the Wei River. -HHS 12/2:508; Bn 67:115.

Boque 白雀 [White Sparrow] was the sobriquet of a leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range in 185. -HHS 71/61:2310, SGZ 8:261.

Boying 白英 of Qiuzi [Kuqa]. King of Qiuzi in 124, he was persuaded to submit to Han by Ban Yong. He and his neighbouring rulers of Gumo and Wensu then joined the attack on the Xiongnu in Jushi. -HHS 47/371:1589.

Bu 步, the Lady (d.238); Xiapi. Distant kin to Bu Zhi, during the troubles of the 190s the Lady was brought by her mother into Lujiang. When the commandery fell to Sun Ce in 199, the Lady, who was very beautiful, was taken into the harem of Sun Quan. She became his favourite and bore him two daughters, Luban 魯班 and Luyu 魯育.

The Lady Bu retained Sun Quan's affections by recommending other women for his enjoyment without jealousy. Sun Quan wished to appoint her as his queen and then as his empress, but his officials urged the claims of his earlier consort the Lady Xu V. He took no decision, but the Lady Bu was always treated as empress within the palace, and at her death in 238 she was granted the posthumous title. -SGZ Wu 5:1198*; C/C 99:126-127.

Bu 卜, the Lady: sister of Bu Yin, she was the wife and widow of Bi Feng q.v.

Bu 步. A powerful slave at Luoyang about 30, he admired the youthful scholar Ma Yan and became his patron. -DGJJ 12:5a.

Bu Cheng 卜成 see Shangcheng Gong 上成公.

Bu Jing 卜靜 [Xuanfeng 玄風]; Wu. Widely admired in his region, Bu Jing became a county magistrate in Kuaiji in the service of Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 7:1229.

Bu Shaonan 步紹南 of Xiapi was Registrar to the Chancellor Wuju Boji. -FSTY 5f:120.

Bu Si 卜巳 or Bu Yi 已 (d.184); Dong. A local leader of Yellow Turbans, Bu Si was captured and killed by a troop of Huangfu Song's army commanded by Fu Xie. -HHS 71/61:2301, XHS 4:9a; deC 89:185.

Bu Yang 卜陽 (d.164); Guiyang. From the 150s to the mid-160s Bu Yang and his comrade Pan Hong maintained a bandit force in Guiyang, with their stronghold in the mountains, but by 164 they were the last of the insurgents which had dominated Jing province and the south. In that year the Inspector Du Shang attacked their base-camp and settled them. -HHS 38/28:1285.

Bu Yi 卜巳 see Bu Si 卜巳.

Bu Yin 卜胤. Brother of the Lady Bu and brother-in-law of Bi Feng, Bu Yin became Administrator of a commandery. After the death of Bi Feng in 177 he joined his sister in arranging a stele to his memory.

-LS 9:16a.

Bu Zhi 步鷺 [Zishan 子山] (d.247); Xiapi. Bu Zhi's family claimed lineage from the pre-Han period, and he was a man of wide learning, generous and elegant. In the time of civil war in the 190s he escaped to take refuge in Kuaiji. Alone and poor, he joined Wei Jing to grow melons by day and study at night. Despite his background and quality, he was prepared to accept apparent humiliation: see sub Jiao Jiao.

Soon after Sun Quan succeeded his brother in 200 he called Bu Zhi to join his staff, but he left his post due to illness. He was later named a magistrate in Wu, but then returned to headquarters. In 210 he was appointed Administrator of Poyang, a commandery which had been established in the eastern part of Later Han Yuzhang.

A few months later Bu Zhi was sent south as Inspector of Jiao, and in the following year he received further titles and the Staff of Authority. Though he arrived in Nanhai with an escort of only a thousand men, he swiftly established his position by executing the unreliable Wu Ju, Administrator of Cangwu. He received general acceptance from Shi Xie and his kinsmen in Hepu, Jiaozhi and present-day Vietnam, though he sought alliance and acquiescence rather than direct control of that more distant region. Through Shi Xie, moreover, Bu Zhi made alliance with Yong Kai, warlord in the south of Yi province. He.

Promoted a general and given enfeoffment, Bu Zhi was succeeded in the south by Lü Dai in 220, and he brought an army of recruits to hold the south of Jing province against the threat of Liu Bei's attack down the Yangzi. Named a chief general, he held increasing responsibility for the defence of the west, and regularly gave advice on government. In 246 he was appointed Imperial Chancellor of Wu, and died in that office in the following year. -SGZ Wu 7:1236-40*.

Bubenyi 卜賁邑; Xianbi. A local chieftain about 150, he stole cattle and sheep from Tanshihuai's mother's family. Single-handed, Tanshihuai pursued the raiders and recovered the goods. -SGZ 30:837.

Budugen 步度根 (d.233); Xianbi. Grandson of the warlord Tanshihuai, he succeeded his eldest brother Kuitou about 205. The family power was now slight, however, and Budugen's elder brother Fuluohan, who had been passed over for the succession, set up a separate state of his own.

Following Cao Cao's defeat of the Wuhuan at White Wolf Mountain in 207 and through the agency of the Protector of the Qiang Yan Rou, Budugen and other Xianbi leaders paid tribute and received royal titles.

In 224, concerned at the growing power of his rival Kebineng, who had murdered Fuluohan in 218, Budugen came to the court of Cao Pi and sought aid to restore his position. He was well received and settled in Bing province, and for the next ten years he helped to protect the border. In 233, however, Kebineng persuaded Budugen to make alliance with him against China. Budugen took part in some frontier raiding, but soon afterwards Kebineng killed him. -SGZ 30:835-36; Fang 52:179-181, 404-405.

Bujuzheng 不居徵 of Suoju [Yarkand]. Son of King Xian of Suoju, when the Northern Xiongnu joined the army of Yutian [Khotan] to attack Suoju in 60, Xian gave Bujuzheng as a hostage to them.

In the following year King Guangde of Yutian [Khotan] captured Xian and annexed Suoju, but the Xiongnu sent an army which forced him to submit and then placed Bujuzheng on his father's throne.

As power of the Xiongnu waned Guangde formally submitted to China, and in the late 80s he joined Ban Chao's attacks on Suoju. In 87 the enemy surrendered, Bujuzheng was killed, and Guangde's brother Qili took his place. -HHS 88/78:2926.

Buqiao 布橋; Qiang. Leader of a group of the Shaodang tribe, in the autumn of 77 he joined the chieftain Miyu to attack Chinese positions in Longxi, Jincheng and Hanyang. Buqiao laid siege to Lintao, headquarters of the southern Commandant of Longxi, but was deceived by an advance guard sent by the general Ma Fang and was heavily defeated. As the siege was broken, the main body of the Qiang surrendered, but Buqiao maintained defiance in the valleys of the southwest. Early in the following year Ma Fang's forces pressed their advance, and though they suffered a number of setbacks they eventually forced Buqiao and some ten thousand followers to surrender. -HHS 24/14:855-56, 87/77:2881.

Cai 蔡, the Lady I; Runan: see sub her son Cai Shun.

Cai 蔡, the Lady II. Daughter of an aunt of Yuan Yaoqing, the Lady married Cai Ling and became the mother of Cai Yong. Cai Yong became known for the care he gave her during her last illness, and for his arrangement of her tomb. -HHSJJ 60/50B:2140 Hui Dong.

Cai 蔡, the Lady III. Daughter of Cai Yong, she married Yang Dao of Taishan. -JS 31:949, 34:1013.

Cai 蔡, the Lady IV; Nan. Daughter of Cai Feng and sister of Cai Mao, she became the second formal wife of Liu Biao.

When Liu Biao proposed to kill Han Song for what he saw as treachery in support of Cao Cao, the Lady argued strongly in his favour and Han Song was only imprisoned.

Since Liu Biao's younger son Zong had married her niece, the Lady encouraged Liu Biao to appoint Zong, rather than his elder son Qi, as his heir. -SGZ 6:213, HHSJJ 74/64B:2650 Hui Dong quoting Xiangyang qijiu zhuan.

Cai [Bojie] 蔡伯偕. In Lun heng 11; Forke 11:106, Wang Chong describes Cai Bojie, Administrator of Youfufeng, as a man with wide knowledge of things ancient and modern. He was probably a contemporary, living in the first century.

This man's style is very close to that of Cai Yong, but Cai Yong was born some fifty years after Wang Chong was writing; they cannot be the same person.

Cai Boliu 蔡伯流; Jiujiang. In the summer of 138 the bandit Cai Boliu ravaged his home commandery, extended his depredations east down the Yangzi into Guangling and killed a county magistrate. A few weeks later he and his followers surrendered to the Inspector Ying Zhi. -HHS 6:267.

Cai [Boqi] 蔡伯起; Nanyang. About 130 Cai Bojie held appointment in the offices of the Excellencies at the same time as Feng Gun; he later became Administrator of Donglai. He was also a colleague of Wu Shigong, who became Administrator of his home commandery about 140 and proposed to nominate his sons for office. Cao Boqi asked him to wait until his younger son Zan was old enough, and Wu Shigong did so, but he was later demoted for such favouritism.

When Feng Gun went on campaign against rebels in the south in 144, Cai Bojie was able to arrange for his son Cai Zan to hold military appointment under him. -FSTY 4:31.

Cai Chong 蔡充 (d.24). Designated Administrator of Yuyang by the Gengshi Emperor in 24, Cai Chong was sent to replace Peng Chong, an associate of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. As they came north, however, Cao Chong and his colleague Wei Shun were killed by Liu Xiu's officer Geng Yan. -HHS 19/9:705-06.

Cai Feng 蔡颯/風 (d.121). In the spring of 121 Cai Feng was Administrator of Liaodong when the neighbouring commandery of Xuantu was raided by troops of Gaogouli [Koguryo]. Cai Feng joined Feng Huan the Inspector of You province and Yao Guang the Administrator of Xuantu in a punitive expedition. They killed several chiefs of the associated Hui and Mo people, and captured quantities of weapons, horses and treasure. Yao Guang, however, was then deceived by a false surrender, and enemy infiltrators burned Chinese settlements and killed people.

As the Chinese position was disrupted by internal disputes, Gaogouli launched a further attack in the summer, this time directly against Liaodong and joined by Xianbi from the north. Cai Feng faced the invaders in the heart of the commandery, but his troops were defeated and, despite the efforts of his junior officers Geng Hao and others, he and his staff were killed with several hundred of the local militia. -HHS 85/75:2814-15, SGZ 30:844-45.

Cai Feng 蔡颯; Nan. A man of good local family, Cai Feng was the father of Cai Mao, who was born about 150, and also of the Lady Cai, wife of Liu Biao. -HHSJJ 74/64B:2650 Hui Dong quoting Xiangyang qijiu zhuan.

Cai Gong 蔡弓 [Ziqian 子騫]; Guangan. Cai Gong and his friend Xin Xian studied the Classic of Poetry under Lu Gong at Luoyang. Cai Gong was later Administrator of Lujiang. -HYGZ 10B:146.

Cai Gu 蔡谷; Chenliu. A cousin of Cai Yong, he was with him at Chang'an under Dong Zhuo in the early 190s. Cai Yong was uneasy, and thought of going to the east, but Cai Gu persuaded him that he was too well-known to effect such an escape. -HHS 60/50B:2006.

Cai Hao 采皓 served as General on the Liao. -FSTY 5f:128.

Cai Hong 蔡宏 (d.27); Nan. An officer of the warlord Qin Feng, he joined him to defend the line of the Han River against the attacks of Cen Peng and the forces of Han. In the autumn of 27, however, Cen Peng forced the crossing by a trick, then moved against Qin Feng's base at Liqiu. Qin Feng and Cai Hong attempted a surprise attack by night, but Cen Peng was ready for them. As Cai Hong's men ran away, he was taken and killed. -HHS 17/7:657-58.

Cai Jiao 蔡較. An Academician at the Imperial University in 180, Cai Jiao was a member of a board of enquiry under the Minister of Ceremonies Jiu Dan which considered rival methods for calculating eclipses of the moon. -HHS 92/2:3041-42.

Cai Lang 蔡朗 [Zhongming 仲明] (96-153). Learned in the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Lu, Cai Lang became Tutor to Liu Ju the king of Langye. -Cai 3:6.

Cai Leng 蔡陵 [Bozhi 伯直]; Chenliu. Eldest son of Cai Xi and father of Cai Yong, Cai Leng was a man of local family who was respected for his fine character. Accounts vary as to whether he ever held office, but there is a reference to an Inspector of Xu province with that name. -HHS 60/50B:1979.

Cai Lun 蔡倫 [Jingzhong 敬仲] (d.121); Guiyang. A eunuch, Cai Lun entered the harem apartments towards the end of the reign of Emperor Ming and about 80 he became an Attendant at the Yellow Gates under Emperor Zhang. In 82, on the orders of the Empress Dou, he took charge of the interrogation of the Honoured Ladies Song, mother and aunt of the former Heir Liu Qing; they killed themselves.

When Emperor He came to the throne in 88 under the regency of the Dou family, Cai Lun was appointed a Regular Attendant and then also head of the Palace Workshop. From 97 he was responsible for the design of ceremonial swords and other items; the workmanship was of the finest quality and became a model for later times.

In 105 Cai Lun announced to the throne his development of a process to make paper [紙 zhi]. There are examples of paper made from vegetable fibres which can be dated to Former Han and the first century of Later Han, and it appears most probable that Cai Lun's contribution was to make use of new materials, notably tree-bark and hemp-ends, together with rags and fishing-nets: these produced finer quality paper, enabled large-scale production, and could replace the traditional wood, bamboo and silk as material to write on. Silk had sometimes been referred to as zhi, but paper now became known as "the zhi of Marquis Cai 蔡侯紙." Cai Lun was later recognised as a god, and for many years the stone mortar he was said to have used for crushing fibres could be seen by his former home in present-day Hunan.

Cai Lun and Emperor He's old ally Zheng Zhong held continuing influence at the court of the Dowager Deng. It is said that Cai Lun was honest, cautious and a good judge of policy. He was seriously concerned with scholarship, and from about 110 he had overall charge of the collation and re-editing of the classics and other philosophical texts held in the library of the Eastern Pavilion. In 114 Cai Lun was granted a small fief, and after the death of Zheng Zhong he became Coachman to the Dowager, probably acting as head of her household.

When the Lady Deng died in 121, Emperor An took personal control of the government. He had long borne in mind how, forty years earlier, Cai Lun had imprisoned his grandmother the Honoured Lady Song and her sister, put them to the question and drove them to their deaths at the behest of the Empress Dou. He sent orders that Cai Lun should report to the Ministry of Justice. Ashamed to be treated so disgracefully, Cai Lun bathed and dressed in formal garb, then took poison. -HHS 78/68:2513-14*; Needham 85:40-41, 107, Bn 76:29.

Cai Mao 蔡茂 [Zili 子禮] (24 BC-47 AD); Henei. Noted for his scholarship, at the end of Former Han Cai Mao held positions at the Imperial University and at the court, but he refused to serve under Wang Mang. When Wang Mang was destroyed he took refuge in the northwest with the warlord Dou Rong but, although he was a personal friend, Cai Mao again would not accept any appointment from him.

In 36 Cai Mao accompanied Dou Rong to the court of Emperor Guangwu. There he became a Consultant and was later sent out as Administrator of Guanghan. In that territory he had some trouble with clients of the Yin clan of the empress, but kept them under control and maintained a strong government.

In the early 40s the slave and lover of the Princess Liu Huang, sister of the emperor, murdered a man. He was seized and executed by the Prefect of Luoyang, Dong Xuan. At the Lady's urging, Guangwu attempted to reprimand Dong Xuan, but he stood his ground. Cai Mao wrote to the emperor in praise of Dong Xuan and urged the ruler to keep his relatives under control. Guangwu formally accepted the injunction, but continued to indulge his family.

In 44 Cai Mao was appointed Excellency over the Masses, the first such appointee not to be granted a marquisate. On the other hand, while his immediate predecessors, Han Xin, Ouyang Xi and Dai She, had been dismissed and died, Cai Mao held his position until his death three years later. Emperor Guangwu provided his funerary items and paid generously for the ceremony. -HHS 16/6:907-08*; QHX:17, Bn 79:63, 140-141.

Cai Mao 蔡瑁 [Degui 德珪]; Nan. Son of Cai Feng and a man of good local family, when he was young Cai Mao was a friend of Cao Cao.

When Liu Biao came to Jing province in 190 Cai Mao assisted him to take control. His sister married Liu Biao, and they supported his younger son Liu Zong for the succession against the elder Liu Qi. As Liu Biao was dying, Cai Mao prevented Liu Qi from visiting him. -SGZ 6:211-14.

Cai Mou 蔡茂 see Cai Mao 蔡茂.

Cai Shaogong 蔡少公; Nanyang. As Liu Bosheng and his younger brother Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, were staying with their brother-in-law Deng Chen at Wan city about 20, Cai Shaogong joined them at dinner. Interested in divination, he mentioned the prophecy that "Liu Xiu is to become the Son of Heaven 劉秀當天子." Someone observed that this must refer to the well-known senior minister at Wang Mang's court; formerly named Liu Xin 歆, he had changed his personal name to Xiu 秀 in 6 BC, perhaps intending to match the prophecy. The young Liu Xiu asked jokingly whether it might not refer to himself.

Years later Deng Chen reminded Guangwu of the incident; the emperor roared with laughter. -HHS 15/5: 582-84; Bn 59:240 and QHX sub Liu Xin/Xiu.

Cai Shun 蔡順 [Junzhong 君中]; Runan. Cai Shun's father died when he was young, and he cared devotedly for his mother. He was so sensitive to her needs that on one occasion, when an unexpected visitor came as he was out gathering firewood, she bit her finger and he came back immediately to find out what was wrong; the phrase 嚙指棄薪 became proverbial.

About 70, the old lady died aged ninety, but before she was buried a fire broke out in the village. As the flames approached Cai Shun cast himself upon the coffin and prayed, and the fire duly spared his house.

The Administrator Han Chong heard of his remarkable record and appointed Cai Shun to his staff. The Lady Cai had always been afraid of thunder, and whenever there was a thunderstorm Cai Shun would go out to her tomb to reassure her spirit. Eventually Han Chong ordered a carriage to be made ready for him each time.

Later the Administrator Bao Zhong recommended Cai Shun as Filial and Incorrupt, but he could not bear to be parted from his mother's tomb. He stayed at home and died at the age of eighty. -HHS 39/29:1312.

Cai Song 蔡嵩. Intendant of Henan in 90, Cai Song was reported by the Excellency Yuan An for his failure to keep control of the retainers of the powerful Dou family of the regent Dowager. -HHS 45/35:1519-20.

Cai Xi 蔡攜 [Shuye 叔業]; Chenliu. In the time of Emperor Shun, Cai Xi was a clerk in the offices of the Excellencies at the capital. He was graded First Class and became a magistrate in Runan. Father of Cai Ling and grandfather of Cai Yong, he died at the age of seventy-nine. -HHS 60/50B:1980.

Cai Xuan 蔡玄 [Shuling 叔陵]; Runan. Well learned in the Confucian classics, Cai Xuan taught thousands of students. He refused several invitations to office, but in the time of Emperor Shun he was brought to the court by special edict and appointed a Consultant. He lectured on the text criticism of the classics, very much to the emperor's taste, and he was made a Palace Attendant.

Cai Xuan later became Administrator of Hongnong; he died in that office. -HHS 79/69B:2588*.

Cai Yan 蔡琰, the Lady [Wenji 文姬 or Zhaoji 昭姬]; Chenliu. Daughter of Cai Yong, the Lady was well-read, eloquent, and skilled at music. She was first married to Wei Zhongdao, but they had no children, and after he died she returned to her family home. About 194, during the troubles at the end of Han, the Lady fell into the hands of the Xiongnu. Taken into the harem of the Worthy King of the Left, one of the leaders of an exiled group which maintained itself in Hedong [see sub Huchuquan], she was kept there for twelve years and bore two sons.

Cao Cao, who had admired Cai Yong and had been a close friend, was sad that he had left no descendants. About 206 he paid a ransom for the Lady's return, then married her to Dong Si, a commandant in charge of agricultural colonies. Some time later Dong Si was found guilty of a crime and sentenced to death, but the Lady went to Cao Cao in the simplest clothing, and appealed to him in open court. The order for execution had already gone out, but Cao Cao sent hastily to rescind it, and because it was cold he gave her headgear, stockings and shoes.

He then asked Cai Yan about her memory of her father's library, and she told him that, though Cai Yong had left her more than four thousand scrolls, after the turmoil and destruction she could now recite the contents of only some four hundred items. Cao Cao proposed to send a team of scribes to take her dictation, but the Lady Cai insisted on doing the transcription herself. He provided her with paper and brushes and she wrote out the works and sent them to him; all were flawless.

[When he died at Chang'an in 192 Cai Yong entrusted the bulk of his library to his student Wang Can, who presumably took much of the collection with him when he went for refuge in the south. That material would have returned to the north after Cao Cao took over Jing province in the following year. See MBeck 90:46, and sub Wang Can. The Lady Cai's contribution was most likely an additional reconstruction, but since the original scrolls had evidently been lost, unless there were duplicates in Wang Can's collection or elsewhere the alleged perfection of her work would relate rather to her calligraphy than to any possibility of checking.]

The Lady also composed poems on her misfortunes in the time of troubles, and two which are attributed to her are preserved in her biography in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳. Beifen shi 悲忿詩 "Poem of Lament and Indignation" was a precursor for later writers on this theme. -HHS 84/74:2800-03*; Ch'ü 72: 320.

Cai Yan 蔡琰; Nanyang. Younger brother of Cai Boqi, he was nominated for office by Boqi's friend Wu Shigong the Administrator of Nanyang. -FSTY 4:31.

Cai Yan 蔡衍 [Mengxi 孟喜] (d.168); Runan. Having acquired excellent knowledge of the classics when he was young, Cai Yan established a local school and influenced his neighbours by his courtesy and fine conduct. Whenever there was a dispute, the participants would call upon him, and all were content with his adjudication.

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, during the middle 150s Cai Yan became Inspector of Ji province. The senior eunuch Ju Yuan wanted his younger brother Ju Hong to receive provincial nomination as Abundant Talent, but Cai Yan refused, and punished the man who had brought the letter. Again, he reported that Cao Ding the Chancellor of Hejian, a brother of the eunuch Cao Teng, had taken bribes. Cao Teng had the General-in-Chief Liang Ji send a letter on Cao Ding's behalf, but Cai Yan paid no attention, and Cao Ding was sentenced to convict service.

Cai Yan was brought to the capital as a Consultant, and then became Prefect of Insignia and Credentials. Recognising his fine qualities, Liang Ji sought to meet him, but Cai Yan pleaded illness and refused to call upon him. During Emperor Huan's personal government in the mid-160s, Cai Yan joined the Consultant Liu Yu to support Cheng Jin the Administrator of Nanyang, who had been arrested for killing the eunuch associate Zhang Fan and others during a time of amnesty. Their argument was outspoken and both men were dismissed; Cheng Jin himself was later executed.

Cai Yan retired to seclusion at his home, but he was numbered among the worthy men in lists compiled by the reformists and students of the University. In 168, as the regency for the new Emperor Ling was dominated by Dou Wu and Chen Fan, Cai Yan was recalled as a Consultant but died about this time. -HHS 67/57:2208-09* & 2187.

Cai Yang 蔡揚/陽 (d.200). A general of Cao Cao, in 200 Cai Yang was sent to attack Liu Bei and Gong Du in Runan, but he was defeated and killed. -SGZ 1:22, Shu 2:876.

Cai Yi 蔡遺. As Administrator of Jiangxia for Sun Quan, Cai Yi had early shown contempt for Lü Meng, at that time a good military man but poor and uncultured. Lü Meng later rose to high command, and when Gu Shao the Administrator of Yuzhang died about 218 he recommended Cai Yi take his place. Sun Quan was surprised at such tolerance and generosity, but did as he suggested. -SGZ Wu 9:1280.

Cai Yong 蔡邕 personal name sometimes written as 雍: see sub Gu Yong [Bojie 伯喈] (132-192); Chenliu. One of the most brilliant scholars of Han, Cai Yong was born into a substantial local family, though his father Leng had only private reputation. After the death of Cai Leng, Cai Yong lived for a time with his uncle Cai Zhi and his cousins. The family was noted for not having divided its property for three generations, and Cai Yong himself became known for the care he gave his mother the Lady Yuan for the three years of her last illness, and for his arrangement of her tomb.

Cai Yong then studied composition, mathematics, astronomy/astrology, pitch-pipes and music under Hu Guang. A fine calligrapher, he wrote Zhuan shi 篆勢, an essay on aspects of the traditional Seal Script.

In the early 160s Cai Yong was recommended to Emperor Huan by Xu Huang, Zuo Guan and other senior eunuchs for his skill with drums and the zither [see also HQ 2:1b]. He was called to the capital, but on the road he pretended illness and returned home to study in seclusion. He composed the mystical Shi hui 釋誨 "Instruction Explained" in dialogue form to justify himself.

In the early 170s Cai Yong served as a clerk in the offices of the Excellency Qiao Xuan, who greatly admired him. After brief appointment as a county magistrate, he returned to the capital as a Consultant, working on editing and collating texts in the library of the Eastern Pavilion. In 172, with encouragement from Hu Guang, now Grand Tutor, he recorded the proceedings of the ceremony of Ascending the Imperial Tombs; the text survives in his Duduan [XC 8:13a-b, HHS 94/4:3103-04; MBeck 90:74]. He was also in regular demand for eulogies, memorial inscriptions and other laudatory texts. Several of those which survive were composed for his patron Hu Guang and members of his family, but he is said to have remarked that Guo Tai was the only person for whom he could write a flattering piece without embarrassment.

In 175 Cai Yong memorialised against a proposal to amend the calendar in accordance with the apocrypha. His attack was so strong that the emperor was obliged to intervene to protect him from charges of Disrespect.

At this time, moreover, the eunuch Li Xun memorialised that the texts of the Confucian classics in the imperial library of the Orchid Terrace were being altered by Academicians of the University to support and fit their own theories. In response, Cai Yong, Tangxi Dian, Yang Biao, Ma Midi, Zhang Xun, Han Yue and Shan Yang proposed that five classics, Analects, Changes, Ritual, History, and Chunqiu with the Gongyang commentary, be edited and engraved upon stone. Emperor Ling approved, and Cai Yong and Ma Midi appear to have had particular responsibility for the Ritual. Cai Yong himself wrote the agreed texts on the stones in cinnabar for the engravers to carve, though his contribution must have ended when he left the capital in 178. The Stone Classics were completed in 183, and determined the canon for future generations of scholars.

Probably in 177, Cai Yong was also commissioned to work on a further instalment of the dynastic history "Record of Han" 漢記, now retitled Dongguan Hanji 東觀漢記 from the Eastern Pavilion 東觀, where the library and workrooms were located. Other colleagues in the project were Ma Midi, Yang Biao, Han Yue and Lu Zhi; their work included annals for emperors An and Shun, for the infants Chong and Zhi and for Emperor Huan, with biographies updated to the end of the reign of Emperor Huan in 168. Noted for his attention to textual accuracy, Cai Yong was a recognised expert on ceremonial and portents, and it appears that he worked also on a series of treatises; the first section of his Treatise on Pitchpipes and the Calendar 律曆意 Lüli yi was taken by Sima Biao for his Xu Han shu. [The treatises were known as yi 意 at this time instead of zhi 志, to avoid taboo on the personal name of Emperor Huan.]

For some time Cai Yong also played a role in politics at court. He memorialised unsuccessfully against the San-hu 三互 regulations, which forbade men to hold office in any province to which they were connected by marriage, on the grounds that it made the recruitment of good officials more difficult. In the autumn of 177, moreover, he presented a memorial of seven sections, criticising eunuch pretensions and urging the need to restore ceremonial. The emperor did pay attention to the second topic: that winter he attended in person at the ceremony to Welcome the Ethers at the Northern Suburban Altar [Bodde 75:192] and also Served the Aged at the Hall of the Circular Moat. Such imperial participation in these rituals was evidently no longer regular.

Later that year Cai Yong argued against the plan of the military commander Xia Yu, associate of the eunuch Wang Fu, to attack the Xianbi beyond the northern frontier. His advice was rejected, but the expedition indeed proved disastrous, and Cai Yong later sent in a note on his concern that the important provinces You and Ji had been left without Inspectors since the failed campaign.

In the autumn of 178 Cai Yong, Yang Ci and other scholar-officials were asked for advice on a recent series of disconcerting portents, including an earthquake and a dark mysterious snake. In another long and firm memorial, Cai Yong presented more criticisms of eunuch pretensions and also attacked the School at the Gate of the Vast Capital, personal project of Emperor Ling. The document was sealed and supposedly for the emperor's eyes only, but the eunuchs learnt of it.

Cai Yong's uncle, Cai Zhi, had quarrelled with the eunuch associate Yang Qiu, and Cai Yong quarrelled with the Minister Herald Liu He, while the Intendant of Henan Yang Zhi, who was connected to the Cai by marriage, had been dismissed on grounds of faction. [Cai Yong's daughter had married Yang Dao, son of the official Yang Xu of Taishan, and it appears that there was a further connection of the Yang clan to Cai Zhi.] The eunuch Cheng Huang, father-in-law of Yang Qiu, now arranged an accusation that Cai Yong and Cai Zhi made improper requests for private favour from Liu He and that, when these were unsuccessful, they sought to injure him. Cai Yong and Cai Zhi were investigated by the Imperial Secretariat, and despite an eloquent defence and denials from Cai Yong they were imprisoned and sentenced to death for Disrespect. In fact, it seems probable that there was a loose association of officials opposed to the party led by Cheng Huang, and the accusations represented a counter-attack: see sub Yang Zhi and Humu Ban.

The eunuch Lü Qiang now spoke for the two men, and Emperor Ling remitted the penalty to exile in the far north. After nine months Cai Yong appealed to the throne that he might finish his work on the classics and the dynastic history, and he expressed concern that the manuscripts of the ten Treatises he was working on were at risk from non-Chinese raiding. There was in any case an amnesty at this time, so his banishment was ended.

At a farewell banquet, however, Cai Yong insulted Wang Zhi the Administrator of Wuyuan, brother of the eunuch Wang Fu, and he was once more under threat. With the aid of his Yang kinsmen by marriage he fled from the capital and took refuge in Wu and Kuaiji commanderies. He stayed in the southeast for twelve years, though he evidently had contact with the capital for he composed a funerary inscription for the Lady Ma, widow of the Excellency Yuan Tang, who died in 187.

As Dong Zhuo took power in 189 he summoned Cai Yong to Luoyang, enforcing his demand with threats against his family. Within a few days Cai Yong had been appointed to the Censorate and the Secretariat, and then became a Palace Attendant. As the court went to Chang'an in the following year, Cai Yong was named a General of the Household and enfeoffed as a district marquis, and he played a leading role in revising rituals for the new government. Among other changes he persuaded Dong Zhuo to withdraw the honorific temple names of all sovereigns of Later Han since Emperor He, arguing that their virtues were inadequate; regardless of the merits of the case he appeared as an arrogant collaborator of the arbitrary, usurping regime. He did, however, dissuade the dictator from some exaggerated titles and regalia.

Dong Zhuo admired Cai Yong as a scholar and as a musician, an ornament to his court, and he would have him perform on the zither whenever there was a banquet. On the other hand, Cai Yong was concerned about Dong Zhuo's fractious temper, and worried that he seldom took his advice. It is said that he considered leaving for his home in the east, but was persuaded that he was too well known to escape.

As soon as Dong Zhuo was killed in 192, the new head of government, Wang Yun, accused Cai Yong of sympathy for the fallen tyrant and ordered his execution. Cai Yong begged to be allowed to complete his work on the history of Han, but Wang Yun had long been envious of Cai Yong's abilities, and he now claimed that if Emperor Wu of Former Han had had the sense to kill Sima Qian instead of merely castrating him, the historian would never have been able to transmit his slanders to future generations. Officials and scholars throughout the empire were appalled at such brutality: Ma Midi foretold the swift destruction of Wang Yun's family, and Zheng Xuan deplored the loss to the dynasty. It is said that Wang Yun did change his mind, but the reprieve came too late.

After his tragic death, pictures of Cai Yong were set up in his honour, and commemorative eulogies were composed throughout his home country of Chenliu and the province of Yan.

Cai Yong's major work appears to have been the ten Treatises, which he compiled from official archives and from materials passed to him by his former teacher Hu Guang. [To avoid taboo on the personal name of Emperor Huan, these treatises were known as yi 意 instead of the more common zhi 志.] Much of their text was lost in the turmoil at Chang'an in the 190s, but Cai Yong bequeathed the bulk of his library of ten thousand scrolls to his protégé Wang Can [but see also sub his daughter the Lady Cai Yan], and his scholarship was transmitted to Sima Biao, compiler of Xu Han shu, whose treatises form part of the standard Hou Han shu. He also collaborated with the mathematician and astronomer Liu Hong, whose Qianxiang 乾象 [Celestial Appearances] calendar was adopted in 223 by Sun Quan, ruler of the Three Kingdoms state of Wu.

Though his contribution was interrupted by politics, Cai Yong played a major role in editing the Stone Classics and in the compilation of Dongguan Hanji, while he left a quantity of other scholarly and literary material, including Dudian 獨斷 "Solitary Decisions[?]" on ceremonial, Cai Yong bencao 蔡邕本草, a work of pharmacology, and Nü xun 女訓, an essay of advice for women. Several items survive. -HHS 60/50B*, XC 3:10b-11a, 8:13a-b, ZF:7b-8a; Mather 76:577-578, MBeck 90:41-44, 105-108, Bn 76:69-70, deC 89:481-483, Texts:467 [Loewe] and 471-472 [Bielenstein/Loewe], Needham 86:259.

Cai Zan 蔡瓚; Nanyang. Son of Cai Boqi, although very young he was nominated for office by his father's friend Wu Shigong the Administrator of Nanyang and became a magistrate in Jiangxia. The Secretariat reported this as a wrongful appointment, and Wu Shigong was demoted.

At this time, in 144 the general Feng Gun was embarking on campaign against rebels in Jing province. Cai Boqi was a former colleague, and he persuaded Feng Gun to give Cai Zan appointment in his army. Cai Zan did well, he was appointed as a magistrate in Chen, and he later became Chancellor of Xiapi. -FSTY 4:31 [the text is not entirely complete or clear].

Cai Zhan 蔡湛 [Zide 子德]; Henei. As a county magistrate in Changshan, in 181 Cai Zhan was honoured with a stele. A few months later he was transferred to be Inspector of Bing province. -LS 5:1a-3a.

Cai Zhao 蔡昭 [Shuming 叔明]; Henan. A former magistrate in Hedong, Cai Zhao had a tomb in his home country. -SJZ 31:10a, LS 27:6b.

Cai Zhen 蔡軫; Chenliu. Local commandery officers in the late 160s, Cai Zhen and others mourned the death of their Administrator-elect Hu Shuo. It seems likely that Cai Zhen was a kinsman of Cai Yong. -Cai 5:5.

Cai Zhi 蔡質 [Ziwen 子文]; Chenliu. Younger brother of Cai Ling, he cared for his nephew Cai Yong after the death of his parents, and was himself a scholar of ceremonial and ritual. He attended and recorded the ceremony of appointment for the Empress Song in 171, was a member of the Imperial Secretariat and then Chancellor of Xiapi,

In 178 Cai Zhi was Minister of the Guards. At this time Cai Yong offended the emperor and the eunuchs with his criticisms, while Cai Zhi had an old quarrel with the Court Architect Yang Qiu, son-in-law of the senior eunuch Zheng Huang. Cheng Huang laid charges of factionalism against Cai Zhi and Cai Yong, and both uncle and nephew were sentenced to exile in the north, where Yang Qiu attempted to have them killed.

Cai Zhi is not heard of after this time, but he was probably permitted to return to his home when Cai Yong was amnestied in the following year. He left at least one work on procedure, Hanguan dianzhi yishi xuanyong 漢官典職儀式選用 "Administrative Observances of the Han Official System Selected for Use." Han yi 漢儀 "Han Ceremonial" and Han jiyi 漢舊儀 "Ancient Han Ceremonial," also ascribed to Cai Zhi, may be extracts or separate works. -HHS 60/50B: 2001-03, 95/5:3121; MBeck 90:85-87, Bn 80:3.

Cai Zhong 蔡仲; Wuling. A would-be tomb robber, Cai Zhong was unwillingly responsible for rescuing the Lady Li E from her grave. -HHS 107/17:3348.

Cang Ci 倉慈 [Xiaoren 孝仁]; Jiujiang. About 200 Cao Cao's Inspector of Yang province, Liu Fu, began to establish agricultural colonies to guard the frontier against Wu. Cang Ci, who had been a local officer, was appointed Commandant in charge.

About 225 Cang Ci became Prefect of Chang'an and about 230 he was sent out as Administrator of Dunhuang. His excellent government there did much to restore Chinese influence in central Asia.

Cang Ci is named by Chen Shou as one of the creditable Administrators of the state of Wei, though Pei Songzhi takes the occasion to remark how few such men there were. -SGZ 16:512-13*.

Cao 曹, Empress of Emperor Xian: see the Lady Cao Jie.

Cao 曹, the Lady I (116-170); Jiyin. Wife of Ma Jiang, who died in 153, after her death a stele was erected in honour of her husband and of her own exemplary conduct as his widow. -LS 8:11b-13a.

Cao 曹, the Lady II; Pei. Daughter of Cao Cao by the Lady Liu X, she became Princess of Qinghe 清河. Married to Xiahou Mao, she objected to his adulteries and about 230 she almost had him executed for treason. -SGZ 9:268-69.

Cao 曹, the Lady III; Pei. Daughter of Cao Cao, she was appointed Princess of Anyang and married Xun Yun. -SGZ 10:316.

Cao 曹, the Lady IV; Pei. Daughter of Cao Cao by the Lady Du, she became Princess of Gaocheng 高城. -SGZJJ 20:1a-b.

Cao 曹, the Lady V; Pei. Daughter of Cao Cao by the Lady Yin, she was appointed as a Princess and married her half-brother He Yan. -SGZ 9:292.

Cao 曹, the Lady VI; Pei. Daughter of a younger brother of Cao Cao, she was married to Sun Kuang in 198 and became the mother of Sun Tai. -SGZ Wu 1:1104, Wu 6:1213.

Cao 曹, the Lady VII; Pei. Daughter of a younger brother of Cao Cao, probably Cao Yu, she married Xiahou Heng. -SGZ 9:272.

Cao 曹, the Lady VIII; Pei. Daughter of Cao Pi and his consort the Lady Zhen, she was appointed as a Princess. -SGZ 5:160.

Cao 曹 [personal name unknown]. Administrator of Jiyin [or possibly of Shanyang] in the early 140s, he recommended Wu Ban of Shanyang as Filial and Incorrupt. -Wu 89:24-25.

Cao 曹 [personal name unknown]; Pei. A younger brother of Cao Cao, who evidently died young, he was later granted posthumous title as Lamented Marquis of Haiyang 海陽哀侯. His daughter married Xiaohou Heng, son of Xiahou Yuan and a grandson of Cao Cao. -SGZ 9:272 and see also sub Cao Yu.

Cao Ang 曹昂 [Zixiu 子脩] (d.197); Pei. Cao Ang was the eldest son of Cao Cao, born about 177 to his senior concubine the Lady Liu X. After his mother died he was brought up by Cao Cao's chief wife the Lady Ding.

At the age of about twenty Cao Ang accompanied his father on campaign against Zhang Xiu. The army was defeated in a surprise attack, Cao Cao's horse was hit and he himself was wounded. Cao Ang gave him his own mount and Cao Cao was able to escape, but Cao Ang was killed. [For similar equine sacrifices, see also sub Cao Hong and sub Lou Yi; the incident appears as something of a cliché.]

In 221 Cao Ang received a posthumous fief and his half-nephew Cao Wan was appointed to maintain his lineage -SGZ 1:14, 20:579*.

Cao Anmin 曹安民 (d.197); Pei. A nephew of Cao Cao, he was killed fighting Zhang Xiu. -SGZ 1:14.

Cao Bao 曹褒 [Shutong 叔通] (d.102); Lu. Son of Cao Chong, from his earliest youth Cao Bao maintained his father's tradition of scholarship in Ritual according to the New Text school of Qing Pu of Former Han, and he was expert on ceremonial. Like his father, Cao Bao was concerned that the restored Han dynasty had failed to establish a full set of court procedures. He looked back to Shusun Tong 叔孫通, who had constructed a system for the founding Emperor Gao of Former Han [QH:482-483], and he studied day and night to inform himself of precedents.

Recommended Filial and Incorrupt, Cao Bao became a magistrate in Chenliu, where he governed the people by ritual and reformed their customs. When some bandits who had troubled the region were captured in his territory, the Administrator Ma Yan ordered their execution, but Cao Bao told his men that this would be a crime against Heaven, so they were not killed. Ma Yan reported that Cao Bao was a man of weak will, and had him dismissed. Cao Bao then became Officer of Merit in his home commandery of Lu, and he later went to the capital as an Academician, presumably, like his father before him, representing the study of ritual according to Qing Pu.

Emperor Zhang, who had shown his concern for scholarship and philosophy by his sponsorship of the conference at the White Tiger Hall in 79, was interested in new rituals for the court. In 85, in an edict citing a number of apocryphal books, he raised the matter with his officials. Cao Bao responded with enthusiasm, but the Minister of Ceremonies Chao Kan argued that it was too great a task for one person. The emperor recognised the difficulties he would face in getting a consensus among officials, but in the following year he tried again, and once more Cao Bao responded with a proposal for comprehensive reform, remarking to his students on the great opportunity that was offered. As a Palace Attendant, he accompanied the emperor on his tour to the south, and when the court returned, Emperor Zhang raised the question with the scholar Ban Gu.

A short time earlier Ban Gu had presented twelve surviving chapters of Shusun Tong's compilation from the beginning of Former Han. He agreed that there should be some review and an agreed re-compilation, but he could only suggest another conference: Emperor Zhang remarked, with evident justice, that such a gathering would spend its time quarrelling, and nothing would be determined.

Seeking to break the stalemate, at the beginning of 87 Emperor Zhang formally commissioned Cao Bao to prepare a set of rules based upon the remnant text of Shusun Tong and other materials from the classics, histories and suitable works in the imperial collection. Cao Bao had evidently been working on the project long before the formal request, for at the end of that year he presented Xin li 新禮 "New Rituals" in 150 pian, dealing with everything from capping to marriage, and covering all levels of society from the ruler to the common people. The very scale of the production, however, proved self-defeating, for Emperor Zhang recognised that such a comprehensive program would meet great opposition. Although he accepted the document, he did not present it to his ministers for discussion.

Emperor Zhang died a few months later, and Cao Bao presented his youthful successor Emperor He with two sections of his work on ritual. In 91, as Emperor Ho took the cap of manhood at the age of twelve sui, Cao Bao's compilation provided the program for the ceremony. Though Cao Bao was a scholar of the New Text, the timing of the imperial coming of age fitted the requirements of the Old Text tradition: New Text theories would have delayed the ceremony until the ruler was twenty sui. Indeed the timing was important, for it entitled the young ruler to govern for himself, and he took advantage of the opportunity to destroy the great Dou family of the Dowager. The ritual itself, however, had proved unduly complex, with four different caps prescribed, to be donned in order, and the Grand Commandant Zhang Pu later joined Zhang Min of the Imperial Secretariat in complaining that Cao Bao had confused the procedures laid down by the sages. They even urged his execution. Though the emperor did not accept this, Cao Bao's system was largely abandoned. His method of capping was not used by Emperor He's immediate successor An, though it may have been restored for Emperor Shun and it is preserved in the Treatise compiled by Sima Biao; different arrangements were made for Emperors Huan, Ling and Xian.

In 92 Cao Bao was appointed a colonel in the Northern Army. He found over a hundred unburied coffins stored in the encampment, and when he enquired he was told that many of them dated from the time of Emperor Guangwu, the remains of men who could not be identified or for whom no relatives had been found to carry out proper interment. Cao Bao bought an area of open ground, arranged the burial of the unclaimed bodies, and held sacrifices for them.

He was later transferred to be Colonel of the City

Gates and then Court Architect. When there was an outbreak of plague in the city he went on a personal tour of inspection and distributed medicine and food to those afflicted.

In 95 Cao Bao was sent out as Administrator of Henei. The commandery had experienced a dry spring, and the price of grain was extremely high. As soon as Cao Bao arrived he reduced his staff and dismissed any officers who had behaved wrongly. Several falls of good rain followed, the autumn harvest was excellent, the people had enough to eat, and those who had left for other territories were able to return.

Cao Bao was later dismissed on a charge of sending in a false report of an unfavourable omen. He soon regained office, however, and became a Palace Attendant, dying in that post in 102.

Cao Bao had vast knowledge of the affairs and precedents of the past, and he was a doyen of the Confucian school, with over a thousand students. Besides "New Rituals", he left many essays and notes of text criticism, and an edition of the Ritual in forty-nine sections; this may have represented the formal compilation of the classic Li ji 禮記. Though the school of Qing Pu later ceased to have an Academician at the University, its tradition was maintained for several generations through Cao Bao's influence. -HHS 35/25:1201-06*, XC 1:13b; MBeck 90:87-88, 266-267, Loewe 86C:296, Bn 79:189, Loewe, Texts:295 [Boltz].

Cao Bao 曹褒 (d.166); Pei. An elder brother of the palace eunuch Cao Teng, Cao Bao became Administrator of Yingchuan. A tomb stele was erected for him by his home in Qiao 譙. -SGZ 9:274; SJZ 23:6a-b. His style was Boxing, Zhongxing or Shuxing qq.v., and cf. sub Cao Ding.

Cao Bao 曹豹 (d.196); Danyang? An officer of Tao Qian, in 194 Cao Bao and Liu Bei were defeated by Cao Cao.

In 196, as Chancellor of Xiapi, Cao Bao was stationed with Zhang Fei in garrison at Xiapi city against Yuan Shu. Zhang Fei killed Cao Bao, possibly because he planned to change sides. Rioting broke out, Zhang Fei was driven away, and the families of Liu Bei and his men fell into the hands of Yuan Shu's ally Lü Bu. -SGZ 1:11, 7:223, Shu 2:873-74.

Cao Bao 曹豹 see Cao Lin 曹林 or Cao Gan 曹幹.

Cao Biao 曹彪 [Zhuhu 朱虎] (195-251); Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Sun, in 216 Cao Biao was made a marquis. Under Cao Pi he became a duke in 221 and a king in 222. In 232 Cao Rui transferred him to the fief of Chu.

In 249 there was an unsuccessful coup against the government of Cao Fang 曹芳 dominated by the Sima family, and Cao Biao was the candidate of the conspirators. In 251 he was ordered to commit suicide.

In 223, when Cao Biao held the fief of Boma in Dong commandery, he came to court with the other princes. At that time his half-brother Cao Zhang died. Cao Zhang's full brother Cao Zhi, at that time King of Zhencheng in neighbouring Jiyin, was fond of Cao Biao and wished to return to his fief in his company. Such association, however, was forbidden and, in protest, Cao Zhi wrote a poem dedicated to Biao, 曾白馬王彪, which later became celebrated. -SGZ 20:586-87*.

Cao Bin 曹彬; Pei. Younger brother of Cao Zhen, he was granted a share of his fief by Cao Pi. -SGZ 9:282.

Cao [Boxing] 曹伯興; Pei. Eldest son of Cao Jie 節, he was the eldest brother of Cao Teng. -SGZ 1:1.

Cao Buxing 曹不興. Cao Buxing was so good a painter that his pictures seemed alive. He was an ornament to the court of Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 18:1425-26.

Cao Cao 曹操 alternative personal name Jili 吉利 [Mengde 孟德; childhood name Aman 阿瞞?] (155-220); Pei: posthumously titled Emperor Wu of Wei 魏武帝. Born in Qiao 譙 county, Cao Cao was a son of Cao Song by his wife the Lady Ding, and was thus an adoptive grandson of the eunuch Cao Teng. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he became a gentleman cadet at court.

A student of the Art of War, Cao Cao was fond of hawking and hunting with dogs. Notorious as a young thug about town, he was nonetheless sponsored by the minister Qiao Xuan, and he was also received by the celebrated judge of character Xu Shao, who prophesied that he would be "a good servant in time of peace, a dangerous chieftain in time of trouble;" opinions differ whether this was intended as a compliment.

In the late 170s Cao Cao became a Commandant of Luoyang, responsible for police in the capital county. He made a name for himself by strict application of the law, even against men of great family, and particularly for killing an uncle of the favoured eunuch Jian Shi who was out after curfew. He was transferred to be a magistrate in Dong commandery, but in 178, as the Empress Song was dismissed and her male relatives executed, it happened that Song Qi a brother of the Empress Song, had married one of Cao Cao's cousins; in revenge for Jian Shi's misfortune, the eunuchs implicated Cao Cao and had him dismissed.

Because of his ability as a scholar, and no doubt also through the influence of his father, who held high office at court, Cao Cao returned to office as a Consultant. A submission in favour of the late reformers Dou Wu and Chen Fan was predictably ill-received, but in 182, when there was a general request for comments after a series of unfavourable portents, Cao Cao presented another memorial on the weakness and corruption of the government. This was noted, but the quality of the regime continued to decline. Cao Cao realised the exercise was pointless and wrote no more.

Despite his record of opposition to eunuchs, confused moreover by his family background, Cao Cao was evidently pragmatic on the subject. He is said to have remarked that there was certainly a role for eunuchs at court and in the harem, but they should not be given such favour and power: a simple process of impeachment and execution for a few individuals would eliminate the problem.

INTO YAN PROVINCE 184-195

When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out in 184, Cao Cao was sent to Yingchuan as a Commandant of Cavalry. He took part in operations against the main force of rebels and was then appointed Chancellor of Ji'nan. Many county officials were subservient to imperial relatives by marriage, but he had several of them dismissed, and he also eliminated a number of local cults and unorthodox religious practices. He was increasingly concerned, however, that his actions in office had gained him enemies at court who might threaten his family; he pleaded ill health and left office. He was later re-appointed as a Consultant, and in 188 he was named as a colonel of the Western Garden, the private corps of Emperor Ling.

When Dong Zhuo seized power at Luoyang in 189, he wanted to have Cao Cao as one of his counsellors, but Cao Cao fled: a number of exaggerated tales are told of his ruthlessness on this journey of escape [SGZ 1:5; Romance chapter 4]. Arriving in Chenliu, he sold family property to raise a following and joined the alliance under Yuan Shao, who gave him acting appointment as a general. In 190, irritated by his comrades' lack of action, he advanced into Henan but was heavily defeated at Rongyang. Wounded in the fighting, he was rescued by his cousin Cao Hong. He raised more men from Yang province, and though he was nearly killed in a mutiny, he did obtain some reinforcements. It is said also that about this time he joined with kinsmen of Humu Ban, an envoy of Dong Zhuo who had been killed by Wang Kuang, to kill Wang Kuang in his turn.

In 191 Cao Cao achieved some success against the bandit chieftain Bo Rao in Dong commandery, and Yuan Shao named him Administrator to replace the ineffectual Wang Hong. Cao Cao freed the territory of bandits and in 192, after the death of Liu Dai the Inspector of Yan province, he was invited by Bao Xun and other officers to become Governor and deal with the Yellow Turbans invading from Qing province. Though he suffered a number of serious set-backs, by the end of the year he had persuaded the rebels to submit; he may have gained their accession through negotiation rather than by military success, but these Qingzhou Troops 青州兵, numbered at thirty thousand, were a substantial addition to his forces.

Cao Cao was at this time allied to Yuan Shao against his cousin Yuan Shu, and early in 193 he drove Yuan Shu away to the Huai and took a strong position south of the Yellow River. In the autumn, however, his father Cao Song was killed by troops of Tao Qian the Governor of Xu province. Cao Cao made a brutal attack upon Xu, and renewed the offensive in the following year: it is uncertain whether his ferocious campaigns were inspired by a desire for conquest, by the need to demonstrate that no-one could attack his family with impunity, or because he was truly mournful and angry; or perhaps all three.

Certainly the enterprise was counter-productive, for in the summer of 194 his one-time friend Zhang Miao turned against him and invited Lü Bu to take over Yan province. Cao Cao returned quickly, but almost all his territory was lost: only three counties in Dong commandery were held by loyalists under the guidance of Xun Yu and Cheng Yu, and the people of Xu province were certainly not prepared to welcome or support him. There was famine, Cao Cao suffered several defeats and almost despaired, but he managed to regroup his men and he received some reinforcements from Yuan Shao. After eighteen months struggle he eventually regained the province, and by the end of 195 Zhang Miao and his family had been destroyed.

Lü Bu took refuge in Xu province, where he engaged Yuan Shu and Liu Bei in a three-sided struggle for control south of the Huai.

CONTROL OF THE EMPEROR 196-200

Now with title as Governor of Yan province, Cao Cao set his headquarters at Xu city in Yingchuan, present-day Xuchang in Henan, and established military agricultural colonies to settle refugees and provide supplies for his army. As Emperor Xian came from Chang'an to the east Cao Cao used the good offices of Dong Zhao to contact Yang Feng and other leaders of the imperial escort, and in the autumn of 196 he went himself to Luoyang. He was enfeoffed as a marquis and given office as Director of Retainers with the Staff of Authority and control of the Imperial Secretariat. He over-awed or drove away the other chieftains, and within a very few days the court was transferred to Xu city. From that time on Cao Cao held control of the emperor and his puppet government, and after some awkward negotiations with his nominal superior Yuan Shao he took title as Excellency of Works.

Early in 197 Cao Cao moved west against Liu Biao in Jing province, but was defeated by a sudden attack from Zhang Xiu in Nanyang. Though he was wounded, however, he rallied his men and made a successful counter-attack. In the autumn he attacked Yuan Shu again, drove him across the Huai, then returned against Zhang Xiu. This time he had more success, but after some months he learned of a potential raid against Xu city by Yuan Shao's forces and withdrew once more.

In the autumn of 198 Lü Bu turned again on Liu Bei, who fled to Cao Cao for help. Cao Cao attacked Lü Bu, besieged him at Xiapi, and captured the city in the winter. Killing Lü Bu, he acquired general control of Xu province, and after the death of Yuan Shu in the summer of 199 he had no major opponent in the region of the Huai.

By this time, Yuan Shao in the north had destroyed his rival Gongsun Zan and was preparing to move against Xu city. Both sides sought allies, but Cao Cao was able to neutralise Yuan Shao's potential supporters, while his enemy Zhang Xiu left Liu Biao's service to join him. On the other hand, Liu Bei had become involved in a plot to support the emperor, and when Cao Cao sent him on detachment to the southeast he joined Yuan Shao's cause, allied himself with local bandits, and made a diversion in Runan. With a lightning attack, Cao Cao drove him away.

In the spring of 200 Yuan Shao crossed the Yellow River and then gradually brought his army against Cao Cao's position by Guandu, along a ridge above the Bian River, part of the Vast Canal complex between Zhengzhou and Kaifeng in present-day Henan. Cao Cao was heavily outnumbered and in desperate straits, but he held his ground from autumn until winter. Advised by the defector Xu You, he then led a raiding party behind Yuan Shao's lines, defeated his general Chunyu Qiong and destroyed his major supply train. At this blow Yuan Shao's army disintegrated; he abandoned his position and Cao Cao pursued him to the Yellow River.

In the mean time Liu Bei had been sent back by Yuan Shao to cause trouble in Runan, and he allied himself with the bandit Gong Du. Following the defeat of Yuan Shao, however, Cao Cao drove him away to take refuge with Liu Biao in Jing province, while a secondary force regained control of Xu province and the region of the Huai. At the beginning of 202 Cao Cao paid a commemorative visit to his home country of Qiao in Pei, where he gave orders for a new canal and offered sacrifice to his former patron Qiao Xuan.

CONQUEST OF THE NORTH 202-207

In the summer of that year Yuan Shao died in Ji province, leaving his youngest son Shang as his heir despite the claims of his eldest, Yuan Tan. In the autumn Cao Cao attacked across the river, and by early summer 203 he had driven the Yuan back to their capital at Ye city in Wei commandery, present-day Linzhang in Henan. He then withdrew, and issued a series of civil orders encouraging teaching and the recruitment of good officers.

With the pressure relieved, the Yuan brothers quarrelled, and Yuan Shang laid siege to Yuan Tan. Yuan Tan asked help from Cao Cao, and at the beginning of 204 Cao Cao attacked Ye. In the summer he defeated a relief force and captured the city. Yuan Shang fled north to the third brother, Yuan Xi, in Yu province, and Cao Cao now broke with Yuan Tan: he defeated and killed him with his family in the spring of 205. Yuan Xi and Yuan Shang were faced with mutiny among their own troops, and they fled to refuge with the Wuhuan people beyond the frontier.

Over the next two years, from his new base at Ye city, Cao Cao brought Ji and southern Bing province under control, extending his authority from present-day southern Shanxi to the north of modern Beijing, pleasing the people by relief from taxes, and rewarding his supporters with enfeoffment. He also prepared canal-works for an attack on the Wuhuan, and in the summer of 207 he moved against them. Blocked by flooding on the coastal route to the northeast, he took his army in oblique approach outside the frontier into the valley of the Daling River in present-day Liaoning. In the battle of White Wolf Mountain [白狼山 Bolang/Bailang Shan] Cao Cao defeated a confederate force and killed the Wuhuan war-leader Tadun. The Yuan brothers fled to Gongsun Kang in Liaodong, who killed them and sent their heads to Cao Cao.

Triumphant in the north, in 208 Cao Cao took title as Imperial Chancellor, sole head of the civil government, and turned his military attention against Liu Biao in Jing province on the middle Yangzi. In the autumn, before the campaign had begun, Liu Biao died. Like Yuan Shao, he left his inheritance to his younger son Zong, and the elder, Liu Qi, was predictably resentful. As Cao Cao approached, Liu Zong was persuaded to surrender and Liu Bei, who had taken refuge in Jing province, fled south. Cao Cao chased and heavily defeated him at the Chang Slope by present-day Dangyang in Hubei. Liu Bei's officer Guan Yu held the Han River fleet, but Cao Cao drove south to seize the naval base and arsenal at Jiangling city on the Yangzi, by present-day Jingzhou in Hubei, then moved eastwards downstream to face Liu Bei and Liu Qi by present-day Wuhan.

At this point Sun Quan, warlord of the lower Yangzi, sent forces under his general Zhou Yu to support the defenders. In the battle of the Red Cliffs, on the Yangzi south of Wuhan, Cao Cao's fleet was destroyed by fire-ships and he was forced to retreat. The extent of the disaster may have been exaggerated, and it is said that there was sickness in the camp which made the withdrawal necessary. It is possible that Cao Cao was seeking only to test the opposition rather than commit himself to a major thrust, but this proved to be the closest he ever came to command of the Yangzi, conquest of the south, and restoration of a unified empire.

Leaving a line of defences on the Yangzi and the Han, in 209 Cao Cao turned to cross the Huai against Sun Quan, making a demonstration of his naval capacity and confirming the frontier about Hefei in present-day Anhui with military colonies. Returning to Ye, he made some administrative arrangements and began to enhance the city with buildings, notably the Copper Bird Terrace. At this time he issued an autobiographical apologia for his career and also announced his policy of firm government by all men of ability, regardless of their private morality.

In 211 Cao Cao made preliminary moves against Zhang Lu in Hanzhong commandery on the upper Han River, but by doing so he disturbed the petty warlords of the Wei valley. Taking up their challenge, he advanced to the west and once more showed his mastery of the oblique approach. Faced with major defences at the Tong Pass, by the junction of the Wei with the Yellow River, he left a small blocking force to deceive the enemy and took a detachment northwards to establish a bridgehead on the Puban Crossing over the southern run of the Yellow River between present-day Shenxi and Shanxi. He then took his main army across and marched south with the River at his flank to face and destroy the enemy at Huayin, south of the Wei.

Leaving Xiahou Yuan and other commanders to mop up in the northwest, in 212 Cao Cao returned to Ye, then moved to attack Sun Quan across the Huai. Though he reached the bank of the Yangzi, however, Cao Cao's men could not break the enemy defences, and Sun Quan was confirmed in his control of the southeast.

PROBLEMS WITH THE HAN 213-219

Returning to Ye in 213, Cao Cao was enfeoffed as Duke of Wei, received the Nine Distinctions, and placed three of his daughters into the imperial harem. He established a court parallel to that of imperial Han and a princely ancestral temple, while in the following year he was given special insignia and rank above the kings. He also had the Empress Fu arrested on a charge of treason; she died soon afterwards, and in 215 Cao Cao's middle daughter became empress.

In that year Cao Cao attacked Zhang Lu, crossing the Qin Ling ranges from the Wei valley to the upper Han. After a short battle at the Yangping Pass, Cao Cao occupied Hanzhong, and in the winter Zhang Lu came to surrender. Returning to Ye in 216, Cao Cao received title as King of Wei 魏王, ploughed the Sacred Field and established ministers.

Southeast across the Huai, Cao Cao attacked Sun Quan again in the latter part of 214, and another expedition in 217 reached his defensive beach-head at Ruxu on the northern shore of the Yangzi. There was sickness in the camp and the main army was obliged to withdraw, but Cao Cao left a strong set of garrisons, and this static threat compelled Sun Quan to make formal acknowledgement of his suzerainty and accept a renewed marriage alliance. The "surrender" had no practical consequences, but as Cao Cao returned north he was granted insignia hitherto reserved for the emperor.

Though it does not appear to have inflicted as much military damage as one might have expected, the sickness in Cao Cao's army on the Yangzi in 217 evidently extended across the whole of China, and it certainly cut a swathe through the court. Among the many that died at this time were the scholars and officials Wang Can, Chen Lin, Liu Zhen, Xu Gan, Ying Chang and Sima Lang, brother of Sima Yi the future founder of the Jin dynasty.

In 218 Cao Cao returned west to attack Liu Bei, now in Yi province, but in the spring of 219, before he had taken command, his general Xiahou Yuan was defeated at Dingjun Mountain in Hanzhong. Cao Cao attempted to restore the position, but the territory was lost and Liu Bei expanded his power east down the Han. In the autumn, still more seriously, Liu Bei's commander in Jing province, Guan Yu, moving north from the Yangzi, destroyed the forces of Cao Cao's general Yu Jin in Nanyang and laid siege to Cao Ren in Fan city, present-day Xiangfan in Henan, threatening to break into the heart of Cao Cao's territory. Guan Yu, however, was checked at Fan, and in the winter Sun Quan sent his general Lü Meng to attack up the Yangzi into Jing province and take him from behind. Guan Yu's position collapsed, he himself was killed, and Liu Bei was driven back into Yi province.

PARTIAL EMPIRE

Cao Cao had stationed himself south of Luoyang for the emergency. At the beginning of the New Year he returned to that city, where he died soon afterwards, on 15 March 220. When his son Cao Pi took the imperial title at the end of the year, Cao Cao was posthumously honoured as Emperor Wu of the new Wei dynasty.

A man of many and great talents, Cao Cao was a fine poet in the traditional style, he compiled a commentary to the Art of War of Sunzi 孫子[武]兵法 and he was, as one might expect, a keen and skilled player of "surrounding chess" 圍碁 [Japanese Go]. As a military commander, he had a flair for surprise and the indirect approach and, most importantly, he was able to hold the loyalty of his men even in times of stress and difficulty. He could be both generous and ruthless, he was always extremely conscious of his own dignity, and he seldom forgave an insult.

Cao Cao's reputation has suffered from his record, as the man who took power from the last emperor of Han but failed to restore the unified empire: on the other hand, given the destruction of civil war, and the expansion of colonised territory south of the Yangzi, this was beyond anyone's ability. From his warlord base, Cao Cao restored a measure of administrative and economic order in a chaotic situation. His dynastic state lasted another forty-five years, and was better founded and more successful than many of those which came after.

In the last years of his life, Cao Cao gave pensions and appointments to a number of magicians and adepts such as Hao Mengjie, Gan Shi and Zuo Ce, and he may have been interested in the possibilities of longevity which they claimed to have achieved by their arts. Cao Cao's son Cao Zhi, however, claimed that the patronage was intended merely to keep these men under control and to restrict their capacity for stirring up trouble among credulous people; he and his family gave them no credence.

In this regard, we may note the well-known technique of developing vital force by coupling with a number of women and failing to ejaculate. Cao Cao fulfilled the first part of the practice but not the second: he had a great many women and when he died at the age of sixty-five he had sired at least twenty-five sons and six daughters. See further below. -SGZ 1*; Leban 71, deC 90, deC 90A, deC 96, Mather 76:579.

Cao Cao 曹操, wives and concubines. Cao Cao had two formal wives, at least thirteen concubines and a number of other liaisons. The Lady Ding 丁 III is described by Wei lue, quoted at SGZ 5:156-57 PC, as his first formal wife 嫡, though the Lady Liu 劉 X was evidently close in rank and favour. After the Lady Liu died about 180, the Lady Ding fostered her son Cao Ang. When he was killed in 197, however, she mourned him so deeply that Cao Cao sent her away. He later attempted a reconciliation, but it proved of no avail and he eventually dismissed her from the chief position.

The Lady Bian 卞 succeeded the Lady Ding as chief wife 繼室, and in 217 her eldest son Cao Pi was named as Cao Cao's Heir.

SGZ 5, and particularly SGZ 20, record the names of several of Cao Cao's women. They are described by a number of different terms, as "Lady" or "Senior Concubine" 夫人, "Brilliant Companion" 昭儀, "Concubine" 妾 and "Junior Concubine" 姬, but gradations in rank within the harem do not appear to have been fully formalised. A summary list appears below, and further details may be found under individual entries.

The Lady Huan 環, Senior Concubine 夫人;
The Lady Du 杜, Senior Concubine 夫人;
The Lady Qin 秦, Senior Concubine 夫人;
The Lady Yin 尹, Senior Concubine 夫人;
The Lady Wang 王 IV, Brilliant Companion 昭儀;
The Lady Chen 陳, Concubine 妾;
The Lady Sun 孫 X, Junior Concubine 姬;
The Lady Li 李 V, Junior Concubine 姬;
The Lady Zhou 周 IV, Junior Concubine 姬;
The Lady Liu 劉 XI, Junior Concubine 姬;
The Lady Song 宋 V, Junior Concubine 姬;
The Lady Zhao 趙 III, Junior Concubine 姬.

It is also recorded that in 197 Cao Cao took the widow of Zhang Ji into his harem, an action which caused Zhang Ji's kinsman and successor to turn against him and inflict a severe defeat: SGZ 8:262.

Cao Cheng 曹成 [Zigu 子穀?]; Youfufeng. Though Sanfu jue and its commentary say that Cao Cheng had the style Zigu, the modern scholar Shen Qinhan suggests that Gu may have been an alternative personal name: HHSJJ 84/74:3071, cf., however, Swann 32:85 & 91.

Son of Cao Shou and the Lady Ban Zhao, Cao Cheng was born some time in the 70s. His father died when he was young, probably in the 80s, and he evidently lived with his mother and other members of the family at the capital. He served in the offices of the Excellencies, and received nomination as Filial and Incorrupt.

In 95 Cao Cheng was appointed as a county magistrate in Chenliu, and he later became Chancellor of Qi. The date of his appointment to Chenliu is given in his mother's rhapsody Dongzheng fu 東征賦 "Rhapsody on an Eastward Journey;" the present text has the year as the seventh of Yuanchu 元初, equivalent to 113, but the Qing scholar Ruan Yuan demonstrates that the reign-period should be read as 永元 Yongyuan: Swann 32:113-139 and Knechtges

On account of his mother's close connection to the Empress and then Dowager Deng, some time after the commencement of her regency in 106 Cao Cheng received special enfeoffment as a secondary marquis. As an Attendant Counsellor in 124, Cao Cheng joined the group led by Lai Li at the palace Gate of the Vast Capital, protesting the dismissal of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. The demonstrators achieved no success, but their support was recognised, and after Liu Bao was brought to the throne at the end of 125 they were rewarded with high office and gained the ren 任 right to nominate their sons as cadet gentlemen. -HHS 84/74:2784-87, 15/5:591-93; Swann 32.

Cao Chi 曹熾 (139-177); Pei. Eldest son of Cao Bao 褒 and a nephew of Cao Teng, Cao Chi was a Palace Attendant and Colonel of the Chang River Regiment.

In 220 Cao Pi granted Cao Chi posthumous fief as a marquis in honour of the achievements of his son Cao Ren. -SGZ 9:274 & 276, SJZ 23:6b.

Cao Chong 曹充; Lu. A student of Ritual according to the New Text school of Qing Pu of Former Han, Cao Chong was appointed Academician for that discipline by Emperor Guangwu. He was an adviser for the Feng and Shan sacrifices in 56, and was commissioned to make recommendations on the construction of the Altars of Heaven and of Earth, the Five Suburban Altars and the Three Enclosures: the Bright Hall, the Hall of the Circular Moat and the Spiritual Terrace. He was also consulted on the forms of the ceremonies to be held in these buildings, including Serving the Aged and the Great Archery.

In 60 Cao Chong sent a memorial to Emperor Ming arguing that the time had come for the restored Han dynasty to review proper ceremonial and establish its own distinctive code. Questioned by the emperor, he cited apocryphal works, urging particular reform of the imperial music to encourage good conduct, and noting that virtuous harmony expressed in music was called yu 予, while an apocryphal work identified this style as particularly suitable to Han. Emperor Ming duly changed the title of the imperial officer of music to the Yu Musician at Court 太子樂, and ordered suitable compositions to be collected and prepared. Cao Chong was promoted to Palace Attendant, but it is doubtful whether the reforms amounted to much more than the change of name.

Cao Chong enhanced the Qing school of Ritual with substantial commentaries, and his scholarly tradition was followed by his son Cao Bao. -HHS 35/25:1201, 79/69B:2576, XHS 3:9a-b; Bn 79:173-189, MBeck 90:87.

Cao Chong 曹冲 [Cangshu 倉舒] (196-208); Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Huan, Cao Chong early showed remarkable intelligence: at the age of five he explained how to weigh an elephant, a gift from Sun Quan, by measuring the displacement of water. Cao Cao loved him, and when Cao Chong died he mourned him bitterly. He had his companion Zhou Buyi killed; he arranged for Cao Chong's posthumous marriage to a dead girl of the Zhen 甄 family; and he had Cao Cong, son of Cao Chong's brother Cao Ju 據, adopted to maintain his lineage.

In 231 Cao Chong was given posthumous title as a king. -SGZ 20:580-81*.

Cao Chun 曹純 [Zihe 子和] (168-210); Pei. Son of Cao Chi and younger twin of Cao Ren, Cao Chun was wealthy by inheritance but was moderate in conduct and a patron of scholars. Having held junior rank at the Han court, he joined Cao Cao in 193, first as an adviser then as commander of elite cavalry.

Cao Chun took a leading role in the defeat of Yuan Tan in 205, and in 207 he accompanied the northern campaign which defeated the Wuhuan at White Wolf Mountain. He was rewarded with enfeoffment.

In Jing province in 208 Cao Chun joined the pursuit of Liu Bei and took part in the victory at the Chang Slope in Nan commandery, capturing Liu Bei's baggage and two of his daughters. He took over many of his troops and advanced to seize Jiangling. After the defeat at the Red Cliffs he returned north with Cao Cao and in 209 he accompanied the main army for the attack against Sun Quan across the Huai.

Cao Chun died in the following year. When Cao Pi took the throne in 220 he awarded him a posthumous title. -SGZ 9:276-77.

Cao Cong 曹琮; Pei. Son of Cao Ju 據, he was adopted to maintain the descent of his late uncle, Cao Cao's son Chong. In 217 he was made a marquis, and Cao Pi made him a duke in 222. -SGZ 20.

Cao Dagu 曹大家 "Aunt Cao" see the Lady Ban Zhao 班昭.

Cao Daofei 曹桃斐 or Daoji, the Lady; Dunhuang. Daughters of the magistrate Cao Quan, the Lady and her sisters prepared and distributed medicine and healing salves in their father's county in Youfufeng. - JSCB 18:2b; Ebrey 80:342.

Cao De 曹德 (d.193); Pei. Son of Cao Song, about 189 he accompanied his father to Xu province. In 193 they travelled to join Cao Cao, but were killed by troops of Tao Qian. -SGZ 1:11, HHS 48/38:1610:78/68:2519, ZZTJ 60:1945. Cao De's personal name is also understood, mistakenly, as Ji 疾 or Deqiu 德秋: deC 96:119.

Cao Deqiu 曹德秋 see sub Cao De 曹德.

Cao Ding 曹鼎 I; Pei. Son of Cao Jie 節, he was a brother of the eunuch Cao Teng. HHS 67/57 describes Cao Ding as a younger brother of Cao Teng, but SGZ 1:1, says Cao Jie had four sons, of whom Cao Teng was the youngest; HHS is presumably mistaken. SGZ 1 lists the three elder brothers by their styles, but does not give their personal names, so it is not possible to identify Cao Ding in that list. See sub Cao [Boxing], Cao [Zhongxing] and Cao [Shuxing], also below.

During the 150s Cao Ding was Chancellor of Hejian. Cai Yan the Inspector of Ji province reported that he had taken large bribes, and though Cao Teng had the General-in-Chief Liang Ji write on Cao Ding's behalf, Cai Yan pressed the case. Cao Ding was sentenced to convict service. Despite this set-back, it is possible this Cao Ding became Director of the Imperial Secretariat during the reign of Emperor Ling. -HHS 67/57:2209 and see immediately below.

Cao Ding 曹鼎 II; Pei. Uncle of Cao Hong, he became head of the Imperial Secretariat under Han. It was through the ren 任 privilege of Cao Ding as a senior official that Cao Hong received his commission into the imperial civil service. -SGZ 9:278.

The commentary of Liu Zhao to HHS 95/5:3121 quotes a description by Cai Zhi of the enthronement of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling in 171. One of the participants in the ceremony was the Deputy Director of the Secretariat, who is cited only by his personal name of Ding. In HHSJJ 95/5:3528 Hui Dong suggests that this refers to Cao Ding.

The two men named Cao Ding, here and above, may be the same. While Cao Ding I was a brother of the eunuch Cao Teng, and thus a great-uncle of Cao Hong, Cao Ding II is described as an uncle of Cao Hong, and thus a brother of Cao Song, who was adopted by Cao Teng and became the father of Cao Cao. The generations are thus different, but it is possible Cao Hong obtained his commission through the right of his great-uncle, and SGZ has described the relationship wrongly. If, on the other hand, these are different people, they were closely related through adoption and it was normally wrong for a man to hold the same personal name as a senior relative in his lineage. As commentators to SGZJJ 1:5a observe, it is a complex question.

Cao E 曹娥, the Lady (d.143); Kuaiji. Daughter of Cao Xu, Cao E was fourteen years old when her shaman father drowned at the time of the mid-summer festival. The body was not found, but Cao E wept for him by the bank of the river without ceasing for seventeen days. Then she threw her clothing onto the stream and prayed that it might follow him. The clothing was taken by the current until it reached a particular place, where it sank. At that point Cao E jumped into the water and also died.

In 151 the county magistrate Du Shang set up a monumental stele in honour of her filial piety, and the biography of Cao E appears in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳.

Bodde discusses the death of Cao E as an aspect of ritual drowning, linking it to the tradition of the legendary heroes Qu Yuan 屈原 and Wu Zixu 伍子胥. Cao E and her memorial were evidently developments on that line. -HHS 84/74:2794-95*, SJZ 40:20b; Bodde 75:310-315, Mather 76:579.

Cao Fan 曹範; Pei. Third son of Cao Ren, he was enfeoffed under Wei. -SGZ 9:276.

Cao Feng 曹鳳 [Zhongli 仲理]; Dunhuang. Son of Cao Shu, Cao Feng was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, became Assistant Commandant of the Dependent State of Zhangye and then a county magistrate in Youfufeng.

Following the defeat of the Qiang leader Mitang in 101, Cao Feng proposed that military colonies should be set up in the Yu Valleys, on the upper Yellow River by present-day Guide in Qinghai, which had been a close sanctuary for troublemakers. This was approved and Cao Feng was sent as Commandant of the Western Region of Jincheng. The enterprise was initially successful, but the colonies were abandoned after the great rebellion of the Qiang in 107.

Cao Feng became a successful and influential Administrator of Beidi. He was the grandfather of the later magistrate Cao Quan. -HHS 87/77:2885, SJZ 2:14b-15b, 3:1b, JSCB 18:1b [the Cao Quan stele];

Ebrey 80:340.

Cao Fengsheng 曹豐生, the Lady; Youfufeng. Sister of Cao Shou and thus sister-in-law of the Lady Ban Zhao, she too was a woman of talent. It is said that when the Lady Ban published her Precepts for Women the Lady Cao wrote to her with a number of difficult questions. [The Qing scholar Shen Qinhan argues that the essays in the Precepts did not lend themselves to critical analysis; he believes the HHS story is a confused reflection of the Lady Ban's debate with her nephew Zhou Jizhen q.v.] -HHS 84/74:2792 & JJ at 3076.

Cao Fu 曹馥; Pei. Eldest son of Cao Hong, he succeeded to his fief. -SGZ 9:276.

Cao Gan 曹幹 or Cao Lang 良 [childhood name Jibao 季豹?] (d.261); Pei. Cao Gan was the son of Cao Cao by the Lady Chen. His mother died when he was three sui, and Cao Cao arranged for him to be fostered by his concubine the Lady Wang. In 215 he was made a marquis.

The Lady Wang had influence in the selection of Cao Pi as his Heir in 217, and when Cao Cao was extremely ill she persuaded him to commend Cao Gan to Cao Pi, who committed himself to a special relationship.

Cao Gan was made a duke in 221 and a king in 222. -SGZ 20:585-86*.

Cao Gao 曹嵩; Dunhuang. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt by the Administrator Zhao Zi, Cao Gao became a county magistrate in Yingchuan. Some time later Zhao Zi passed near by on his way to another post, and in a noted display of fealty Cao Gao abandoned his office to pay his respects. -HHS 39/29:1314.

Cao Gong 曹貢; Youfufeng. Son of a daughter of Ma Yu, Inspector of Yang province under Wang Mang who had died in 23, in 27 Cao Gong became magistrate of a county in Chu. He invited Ma Yu's ten-year-old son Yan and his younger brother Dun to join him, but after they had been there a year Ma Yu's brother Ma Yuan took the two boys away to the west. -DGHJ 12:5a.

Cao Gu 曹穀 see Cao Cheng 曹成.

Cao Gun 曹衮 (d.235); Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Du, in 216 Cao Gun was enfeoffed as a marquis. Under Cao Pi he became a duke in 221 and a king in 222. He was noted for his scholarship and his quiet conduct. -SGZ 20:583-84*.

Cao Hong 曹洪 [Zilian 子廉] (d.232); Pei. Nephew of Cao Song and Cao Ding, Cao Hong was commissioned as an imperial official through the ren 任 privilege of his [great-?]uncle Cao Ding II q.v., and became a county magistrate in Jiangxia. When his cousin Cao Cao gathered men for the alliance against Dong Zhuo, Cao Hong went to join him. In the defeat at Rongyang in 190 Cao Cao lost his horse and was almost captured, but Cao Hong gave up his own mount and brought him to safety [cf. also sub Can Ang and Lou Yi]. He then gathered several thousand men for Cao Cao in Yang province.

In 194 Cao Hong played a leading role in driving back the forces of Lü Bu and Zhang Miao and regaining Yan province. In the late 190s he held successful command against Liu Biao, was enfeoffed and made a general. At Guandu in 200 Cao Hong held the base camp with Xun You against the last attacks by Yuan Shao, and he was at the siege of Ye city in 204.

In 213, with title as Protector of the Army, responsible for military discipline, Cao Hong was among the officers who petitioned Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. In 217 and 218 he held command in Hanzhong and drove back an attack by Liu Bei.

When Cao Pi became ruler he promoted Cao Hong and raised his fief, and Cao Hong was one of the sponsors of a stele commemorating his assumption of the imperial title. On the other hand, though Cao Hong was extremely wealthy, his followers were ill-disciplined and he was personally mean. On one occasion he refused Cao Pi's request for a loan, and as a result Cao Pi later had him arrested and threatened to execute him. Persuaded to spare him by intervention of his mother the Lady Bian and his Empress Guo, he contented himself by stripping Cao Hong of his rank and titles. When Cao Rui became emperor he restored Cao Hong's position and added to his honours. -SGZ 9:277-78*, LS 19:3b; Goodman 98:196.

Cao Hong 曹宏. Described as a man of poor quality, in the early 190s Cao Hong became a favourite of Tao Qian. The government of Xu province deteriorated under his influence. -SGZ 8:248.

Cao Hua 曹華, the Lady; Pei. Daughter of Cao Cao, in 213 she and two elder sisters were placed in the harem of Emperor Xian, and in 214 they became Honoured Ladies. In 215 her sister Cao Jie was made empress. -HHS 10B:455.

Cao Hui 曹徽 (d.242); Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Song V, Cao Hui was appointed to maintain the descent of his uncle Cao Yu and was made a marquis in 217. When Cao Cao died in 220, Cao Hui failed to show appropriate grief, but went hunting and horse-racing until his Chancellor Gaotang Long brought him firmly to order.

Cao Hui was made a duke by Cao Pi in 221 and a king in 222. -SGZ 20:589*.

Cao Ji 曹疾 i.e. Cao De 曹德. -HHS 78/68:2519; deC 96:119.

Cao Ji 曹棘; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Liu XI, Cao Ji died young. In 231 he was posthumously enfeoffed as a duke. -SGZ 20:579 & 588.

Cao Jie 曹節, the Lady (197-260); Pei. Second daughter of Cao Cao, in 213 she and two sisters were placed in the harem of Emperor Xian. In 214 they were made Honoured Ladies and in 215, after the death of the Empress Fu, Cao Jie took her place.

In 220, the empress protested at her brother Cao Pi's forcing the abdication of her husband. At first she refused to hand over her seal, but then wept and threw it down and laid a curse upon it.

The Lady died in 260 and received posthumous title as Empress Mu 穆. -HHS 10B:455, XHS 1:19a-20a, SGZ 4:147; Goodman 98:69. [One passage in XHS 1 says that it was the Lady's elder sister Cao Xian who became empress, but this is an error. And HHS 10B has the wrong date for the Lady's death.]

On the implications of the Lady's personal name Jie for that of her adoptive great-great-grandfather Cao Jie 節 or Cao Meng 萌, see sub voce.

Cao Jie 曹節 or Cao Meng 萌 [Yuanwei 元偉]; Pei. A peasant, said to have been respected for his generosity and honesty, he had his fourth son Cao Teng taken as a eunuch into the imperial harem. -SGZ 1:1 PC quoting XHS 5:11b

The personal name Jie is given by SGZ 1 PC, but one version of the parallel text in XHS 5 has it as Meng. Since the personal name of the Empress Cao of Emperor Xian, who was an adoptive great-great-granddaughter of this man, was also Jie, Meng may be correct.

Cao Jie 曹節 [Hanfeng 漢豐] (d.181); Nanyang. Originally from a senior official family in Wei, Cao Jie became a eunuch. In the time of Emperor Shun he entered the imperial household as a cavalry guardsman, but was then made an Attendant at the Yellow Gates. As a close associate of the General-in-Chief Liang Shang, Cao Jie was a friend of his son and successor Liang Ji, and under Emperor Huan he became a Regular Attendant and held a sinecure position as a Commandant of the Equipage. Despite his connection with the Liang family, he suffered no disadvantage when they were destroyed in 159.

Following the death of Emperor Ling and the accession of the Dowager Dou as regent in 168, Cao Jie led the cortège which brought Emperor Ling to the capital, and he was enfeoffed as a district marquis. In the autumn, as Dou Wu and Chen Fan planned to kill the eunuchs, Cao Jie played a leading role in their destruction and then became Commandant of the Guards at the Changle Palace, holding the Dowager Dou under house arrest. With great influence in the government, in 169 he persuaded the young emperor to approve the proscription and persecution of Li Ying and other men accused of Faction.

Later that year Cao Jie was taken very ill. He was granted special commission as General of Chariots and Cavalry, in the same fashion as Shan Chao and Tang Heng under Emperor Huan, but he then recovered and returned the insignia. He was granted additional precedence as Specially Advanced and received a ministerial salary.

When the Empress Song was appointed in 171, Cao Jie became Grand Prolonger of Autumn, in charge of her residence. When the Dowager Dou died in 172, Cao Jie and Wang Fu argued that she should be buried only as a concubine, but they were defeated in debate at court by Chen Qiu and Li Xian. Soon afterwards anonymous writing appeared on a palace gate accusing the eunuchs of arranging the lady's death. The Director of Retainers Liu Meng was ordered to find the culprits but failed to do so. His replacement Duan Jiong arranged a purge of students at the Imperial University, and Cao Jie had him impeach Liu Meng.

At this time, moreover, Cao Jie joined Wang Fu in accusing Liu Kui the King of Bohai, brother of the late Emperor Huan, of plotting rebellion. Liu Kui was executed, Wang Fu and eleven others were rewarded with enfeoffment, and Cao Jie's own fief was increased: he now received revenue from 7,600 households.

In 178, Cai Yong sent a sealed letter to the emperor criticising the eunuchs. Cao Jie spied its contents, and Cai Yong was sent into exile. In the following year, the Director of Retainers Yang Qiu had Wang Fu and others arrested and killed. Fearing for himself, Cao Jie persuaded the emperor to transfer Yang Qiu to a ministry, and when a plan was made to reinstate him as Director, Cao Jie impeached those involved. Yang Qiu, Chen Qiu and others were arrested and killed.

About 189 Cao Jie was granted control of the Imperial Secretariat. He had relatives and clients throughout the government, and many of them acted oppressively. When the Empress He was appointed in 181, Cao Jie continued as Grand Prolonger of Autumn in charge of her household. He died later that year, received posthumous title as General of Chariots and Cavalry, and an adoptive son succeeded to his marquisate. -HHS 78/68:2524-27*; Ch'ü 72:491-493.

Cao Jie 曹楷; Pei. Second son of Cao Ren, he was enfeoffed under Wei. -SGZ 9:276.

Cao Jili 曹吉利 see Cao Cao 曹操. -SGZ 1:1.

Cao Jing 曹敬 or Jingji 敬姬, the Lady; Jianwei. At the age of seventeen the Lady was married to Zhou Ji. He died young, but left a son, Zhou Yuanyu. When the mourning period was ended, the Lady's parents wanted her to marry a certain Sun Bin, and as her mother was ill they called her home. Realising their intentions, however, the Lady threw herself into a river. She was pulled out, and though she did not breathe for twenty-four hours she then revived. She went to live with her late husband's younger brother and brought up Zhou Yuanyu, who became a celebrated scholar.

The Lady died at the age of ninety. -HYGZ 10B:160.

Cao Jing 曹竟 [Ziqi/ji 子期] (d.25); Shanyang. A man of family, Cao Jing was a noted Confucianist. At the end of Former Han he left office and went into retirement because he would not serve the usurping dynasty of Wang Mang. In 23 Cao Jing was named Grand Excellency over the Masses in the new government of the Gengshi Emperor at Luoyang, and in the rearrangement of offices in the following year he became Imperial Chancellor of the Left. As the Red Eyebrows entered Chang'an in the winter of 25, Cao Jing was invited to surrender, but he fought them hand to hand and was killed. -HS 72:3096; Bn 59:37, Bn 56:100.

Cao Jing 曹京; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Li, he died young. In 231 he was posthumously enfeoffed as a duke. -SGZ 20:588.

Cao Ju 曹據; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Huan, in 211 Cao Ju was made a marquis. Under Cao Pi he became a duke in 221 and a king in 222. When Cao Fang 芳 was deposed by Sima Shi 司馬師 in 254, Cao Ju was briefly proposed as the puppet to succeed him.

-SGZ 20:581-82*, 4:130.

Cao Ju 曹矩; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Yin, Cao Ju died young and without heirs. In 217 he was granted a posthumous fief and his half-nephew Cao Min was appointed to maintain his lineage. -SGZ 20:585*.

Cao Jun 曹俊. An assistant major under Ban Yong, in 126 he was sent to assist King Jiatenu of Further Jushi repel an attack from the Shanyu of the Northern Xiongnu. He defeated the enemy and drove them away. -HHS 47/37:1590.

Cao Jun 曹峻 [Zi'an 子安] (d.259); Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Qin, in 216 Cao Jun was made a marquis. Under Cao Pi he became a duke in 221 and a king in 222. -SGZ 20:579 & 585*.

Cao Jun 曹均 (d.219); Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Zhou IV, Cao Jun was appointed to maintain the descent of his uncle Cao Bin. He was made a marquis in 217, but died two years later. -SGZ 20:588.

Cao Jun 曹均, wife of: see the Lady Zhang 張 VI.

Cao Kang 曹抗 (d.237); Pei. Son of Cao Jun 均 and presumably of the Lady Zhang, he succeeded to his father's fief in 219 and was made a duke in 222. -SGZ 20:588.

Cao Lang 曹良 i.e. Cao Gan 曹幹. -SGZ 20:586.

Cao Lian 曹廉 (d.114); Hanzhong. Well-respected locally, Cao Lian joined the staff of the Administrator Zheng Qin. After Zheng Qin was killed by rebel Qiang in 110, Cao Lian joined Cheng Xin and other officers in an oath of vengeance, and when the Qiang came again four years later they all fought against them. The army was successful, but the oath-bearers were killed. [On the date of the campaign see sub Cheng Xin.]

In 118 an imperial letter ordered that grain should be granted to the families of the heroic band. -HYGZ 2:16, 10C:169.

Cao Lin 曹林 or Cao Bao 豹?; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Du, in 211 he was made a marquis. Cao Pi made him a duke in 221 and a king in 222. -SGZ 20:582*, 1:34.

Cao Luan 曹鸞 (187-176). In 176 Cao Luan, aged ninety, was Administrator of Yongchang in the far southwest. He sent in a memorial praising the proscribed men of Faction, ascribing recent unfavourable omens to their continued punishment, and urging the emperor to be more lenient to them.

Emperor Ling, furious, ordered the Inspector of Yi province to send Cao Luan north in a cage cart and had the Director of Retainers imprison him at Huaili in Youfufeng. Cao Luan died there, either flogged to death or by public execution.

There was local sympathy, but after Cao Luan's fatal intervention the proscription was extended to yet more distant relatives of the men of Faction. -HHS 67/57:2189, HHJ 24:283; deC 89:135.

Cao Ma 曹麻. Administrator of Nanyang, Cao Ma was reported by Yang Huai/Zhun for allowing his relatives to abuse their position. He was sent to prison. -HYZ 10B:155.

Cao Mao 曹茂; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Zhao III, in 217 Cao Mao was made a marquis. Cao Cao was not fond of him, and under Cao Pi he was only made a duke in 222. Cao Rui made him a king in 227. -SGZ 20:589-90*.

Cao Meng 曹萌 see Cao Jie 曹節 of Pei, father of Cao Teng.

Cao Min 曹敏; Dunhuang. Early in the first century Cao Min was recommended Filial and Incorrupt and became Chief Clerk in Wuwei. He was later a county magistrate in Ba commandery and then Commandant of Juyan. He is recorded in the stele inscription which honours his descendant Cao Quan. -JSCB 18:1b; Ebrey 80:340.

Cao Min 曹敏; Pei. Son of Cao Jun 均, in 217 Cao Min was made a marquis to maintain the descent of Cao Ju 矩. In 224 Cao Pi enfeoffed him as a king. -SGZ 20:585.

Cao Mou 曹茂 see Cao Mao 曹茂.

Cao Ning 曹寧; Guanghan. A magistrate in Nanyang, Cao Ning married the Lady Chen Shunqian, but died a few years later. -HYZ 10C:172.

Cao Peng 曹琫; Dunhuang. Son of Cao Feng, Cao Peng had a good local reputation, but he never held office and died comparatively young. He is recorded in the stele inscription which honours his son Cao Quan. -JSCB 18:1b; Ebrey 80:340.

Cao Pi 曹丕 or Cao Pei [Zihuan 子桓] (187-226); Pei [Emperor Wen of Wei 魏文帝 (reg. 220-226)]. Eldest son of Cao Cao by the Lady Bian, in 206 and 211 Cao Pi was left in formal charge at Ye city while Cao Cao was on campaign, and in 211 he was named General of the Household for All Purposes and associate to his father as Imperial Chancellor. Though it appeared for a time that Cao Cao was considering the claims of his younger brother Zhi, in 217 Cao Pi was proclaimed Heir of Wei.

When Cao Cao died at Luoyang in March of 220, Cao Pi was at Ye city. Amid the general mourning there was possibility of confusion, notably from the interest that Cao Cao's second son Zhang showed in the royal insignia, and from a potential revival of the claim of Cao Zhi. On the advice of Chen Jiao, therefore, Cao Pi was enthroned as King on that same day, not even waiting for the edict from the puppet Emperor Xian of Han. After the entombment of his father a few weeks later, Cao Pi sent his brothers away to their fiefs, and he reduced Cao Zhi in rank.

In the following months Cao Pi confirmed his authority, notably with a combined tour of inspection and display of strength to the family's home country in the southeast. He received formal submission from Sun Quan of Wu and the surrender of Liu Bei's commander Mang Da, while a rebellion in the distant northwest was put down by Su Ze and Zhang Gong. In December that year, after a complex debate and publication of documents to justify the move, Cao Pi forced the abdication of Emperor Xian and took the imperial title for himself. In accordance with the theory which claimed that Han, which had ruled through the power of Fire and its colour red, should give way to Earth and the colour yellow, Cao Pi took the reign title Huangchu 黃初 "Yellow Beginning."

Cao Pi died on 29 June 226. Seeking to ensure the stability of the new state, he had kept his kinsmen from power and moved their fiefs frequently, but he could never match the reputation and authority of his father and his early death, before he was forty, weakened the dynasty.

Though over-shadowed in the field by his brother Zhi, Cao Pi was a poet and writer of quality, and his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature" in the compilation Dian lun 典論 is a notable early work of criticism. As a ruler, he sought to enhance the prestige of the new state by grand construction works and by patronage of scholarship, notably through the commission of the massive Huang lan 皇覽 "Imperial Readings," a compendium of all previous writings on the classics in more than a thousand chapters. The first convenor of the project was Wang Xiang, succeeded by Wei Dan, and other scholars involved included Xun Wei, Liu Shao, Huan Fan and Miao Xi. -SGZ 2*; Leban 78, Goodman 98, Mather 76:579.

Cao Poshi 曹破石; Nanyang. Younger brother of the eunuch Cao Jie, Cao Poshi was a colonel in the Northern Army at Luoyang. Cruel and corrupt, when he was attracted by the wife of one of his subordinate officers, he demanded her from her husband. The man dared not refuse, but the woman killed herself. -HHS 78/68:2525, XC 5:8a; Ch'ü 72:493.

Cao Qian 曹謙. In 179 the Banshun people of Ba commandery rebelled, and for several years they resisted all attempts to restore order. In 182 the Reporting Officer Cheng Bao from Hanzhong told Emperor Ling that the trouble had been caused by bad local government, and that it could be settled if an honest and competent official was sent to the territory. Cao Qian was appointed Administrator, an amnesty was issued to the rebels, and the rebellion was indeed ended. -HHS 8:347, 86/76:2843.

Cao Quan 曹全 [Jingyuan 景完]; Dunhuang. In 185 a stele was erected in honour of Cao Quan by the leaders of Heyang county in Zuopingyi. The stele is preserved in the Beilin 碑林 "Forest of Stele" at Xi'an and the inscription has been translated by Chavannes 07:206-207 and by Ebrey 80:340-344.

According to that text, Cao Quan, son of Cao Peng and a grandson of Cao Feng, served as a senior local officer in the commandery and in Liang province. In 169 he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, became a gentleman cadet and was then appointed a major in the Western Regions. In 170 he joined the attack against King Hede of Shule [Kashgar], who had seized the throne by killing his father, and achieved great success.

According to HHS 88/78:2927, however, in 170 the major Cao Kuan 寬 commanded part of an allied force which was sent by Meng Tuo the Inspector of Liang province to restore authority in Shule after the prince Hede had killed the king and usurped the throne. The Chinese army was not successful. As Chavannes observes, the name of Cao Kuan is miswritten for that of Cao Quan, possibly through corruption of the characters of his style.

The stele, however, describes the campaign against Shule as a triumph for Cao Quan, and this fits badly with other records. Despite the opinions of several scholars, including Chavannes, I suspect the stele is wrong, reflecting rather a lack of detailed information about events so far away in time and space from the compilers of the text, coupled with anxiety to praise the local hero.

Cao Quan later became a magistrate in Youfufeng, but left on account of his mother's death. In 176 he was implicated in the general Proscription, which was extended in that year to include very distant relations. The trigger for the extension was a mistaken appeal for relaxation by Cao Luan, Administrator of Yongchang; it is possible that Cao Quan was a kinsman of Cao Luan, or at least was considered to be so [deC 89:135, 491, Ebrey 80:342, and [see above sub voce].

Cao Quan remained in retirement until 184. He was again nominated Filial and Incorrupt in 183, and as the Proscription was ended in the following year, he was called to the capital. He was again a county magistrate in Jiuquan, but soon afterwards sympathisers with the Yellow Turban rebels made a rising in Heyang. Cao Quan was transferred there and destroyed the troublemakers.

Thereafter we are told how Cao Quan consulted with leaders of the community and took part in charitable and other good works. Among other items, he opened a gate in the walls so that the sacred Mount Hua became visible, and as a result of this geomancy scholars received their due respect and gentlemen were encouraged to obtain official positions.

A little over a year after his appointment, a group of current and serving local officers, together with members of the gentry, almost sixty altogether, joined in subscription to honour Cao Quan's achievements. The stele was set up in the winter of 185. -HHS 88/78:2927, JSCB 18:1a-16b, Nagata 94:246-48; Chavannes 07:206-207; Ebrey 80:339-342.

Cao Ren 曹仁 [Zixiao 子孝] (168-223); Pei. Son of Cao Chi, of wealthy family and a skilled horse-archer, he raised a troop in his home region and later joined his cousin Cao Cao. He served with distinction against Yuan Shu, held command of the major cavalry force in Xu province in 193, and had consistent success also against Lü Bu. He was given title as Administrator of Guangyang, but continued with the main army, and when Cao Cao was defeated by Zhang Xiu in 197 Cao Ren led the charge which rescued him and reversed the battle.

During the campaign against Yuan Shao in 200, Cao Ren defeated a diversionary attack of Liu Bei from the south, and another by Han Xun in the west, and he joined Shi Huan in the first attack against Yuan Shao's supplies.

Cao Ren took part in the conquest of the north and was rewarded with enfeoffment. He accompanied the army into Jing province in 208, and after the defeat at the Red Cliffs he was left to hold Jiangling on the Yangzi against Sun Quan's forces under Zhou Yu. He was forced to abandon the city in the following year, but then set defence positions along the Han.

In 211 Cao Ren had a holding command in the northwest until Cao Cao arrived, and he then joined the campaign which led to victory at Huayin. He commanded troops against rebels in the northeast, then returned to garrison Fan city on the Han River in Jing province by present-day Xiangfan. In 213 Cao Ren was among the senior officials who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei.

Early in 219 Cao Ren recaptured the city of Wan in Nanyang which had been seized by mutineers, but in the summer of that year he was faced by the invasion of Guan Yu. Though floods destroyed the support army of Yu Jin, and the walls of the city were threatened by the water and by Guan Yu's ship-borne attacks, Cao Ren maintained a tight defence for over three months until Guan Yu was defeated by Xu Huang and then taken from behind by Lü Meng in Sun Quan's service.

After Cao Cao's death in 220 Cao Pi raised Cao Ren in fief and appointed him General of Chariots and Cavalry in charge of the whole southern front of Yi, Jing and Yang provinces. He was later named a chief general and then Grand Marshal. Early in 223, as part of the general offensive against Wu he attacked the Ruxu fortress on the lower Yangzi. The operation was not successful, and Cao Ren died in the summer of that year. -SGZ 9:274-76*.

Cao Ru 曹儒 [Junlin 俊林]; Pei. A younger cousin of Xiahou Shang, he served under Cao Zhang on the northern frontier in 218. He later held command on the southern front against Wu and became a minister under Wei. -SGZ 15:477.

Cao Rui 曹叡 [Yuanzhong 元仲] (c.206-239); Pei [Emperor Ming of Wei 魏明帝 (reg. 226-239)]. Son of Cao Pi by the Lady Zhen, he was a favourite of Cao Cao, who regularly allowed him to attend court functions and granted him a marquisate. Though his mother was forced to commit suicide in 221, he was still recognised as the eldest son of the Heir, and he was adopted by the Empress Guo. In 226, at the age of about twenty, he succeeded Cao Pi as emperor of Wei.

Like his father, Cao Rui was a notable poet. He sought to enhance the prestige of the state with buildings and display, but he was criticised for extravagance, and for paying too little attention to serious matters of state.

Cao Rui died on 22 January 239, leaving no sons. He was succeeded by his adoptive heir Cao Fang 芳, but the dynasty was now vulnerable to the ambitions of Sima Yi and his family. -SGZ 3*; Mather 76:578.

Cao Shao 曹紹 (d.191); Nanyang. A nephew of the eunuch Cao Jie, in 169 Cao Shao was Administrator of Dong commandery.

The junior official Xie Bi from that commandery had presented a memorial criticising the eunuch regime and urging the restoration of Li Ying and other reformists. His comments were not well received and he was sent out to a low-ranking post, but resigned and returned to his home. Cao Shao found a reason to have Xie Bi arrested, and had him die in prison under torture.

In 191 the Director of Retainers Zhao Qian had Cao Shao executed in vengeance for Xie Bi. -HHS 57/47:1860; deC 89:106.

Cao Shao 曹紹; Pei. A cousin of Cao Cao, Cao Shao became a gentleman cadet at court but died young. Cao Cao was evidently fond of him, for he had one of his own sons, Cao Zizheng, transferred to maintain Cao Shao's lineage. -SGZ 20:588.

Cao [Shishu] 曹世叔 see Cao Shou 曹壽.

Cao Shou 曹壽 [Shishu 世叔]; Youfufeng. About 70 Cao Shou married the Lady Ban Zhao, sister of Ban Gu, who was later celebrated for her scholarship and historical writing. It is said that he died at an early age, probably during the 80s, but the Lady is sometimes referred to by her husband's surname. -HHS 84/74:2784-87.

Cao Shou 曹壽. During the 150s and 160s Cao Shou worked with other scholars in the Eastern Pavilion 東觀 on the third instalment of the official history of Later Han, later entitled Dongguan Hanji but at that time known simply as "Record of Han" 漢紀. The compilation included annals, tables of kings, marquises and officials, accounts of the Xiongnu and the Qiang, with biographies of empresses and other individuals, including the eunuchs Cai Lun and Sun Cheng. -Shi tong 12:342; Bn 54:11, MBeck 90:216, Texts:471 [Bielenstein/Loewe].

Cao Shu 曹述; Dunhuang. Son of Cao Min, Cao Shu was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became an Internuncio. He was then Chief Clerk in Jincheng, a county magistrate in Zuopingyi and Commandant of the Western Region of Shu commandery. He is recorded in the stele inscription which honours his great-grandson Cao Quan. -JSCB 18:1b; Ebrey 80:340.

Cao Shuo 曹朔. A literary figure of the latter part of the first century, he compiled Han song 漢頌 "Hymns of Han" in four pian. -HHS 80/70A:2617.

Cao Shuo 曹鑠; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by his first wife the Lady Liu X, and younger brother of Cao Ang, Cao Shuo had two sons but died young. In 229 he was posthumously enfeoffed as a king. -SGZ 20:579*.

Cao [Shuxing] 曹叔興; Pei. Third son of Cao Jie of Pei, he was an elder brother of Cao Teng. -SGZ 1:1.

Cao Song 曹嵩 [Jugao 巨高] (d.193); Pei. A member of the Xiahou clan, he was adopted by the eunuch Cao Teng. He inherited his fief in 150, and held office as Director of Retainers, Minister of Finance and Minister Herald.

In 187 Cao Song paid 100,000,000 cash to become Grand Commandant, but left office in the next year. He took refuge from the civil war in Xu province, but in 193, as he travelled with a great baggage train to join his son Cao Cao, he was killed by soldiers of the Governor Tao Qian. After his grandson Cao Pi proclaimed himself emperor of Wei in 220, he awarded Cao Song posthumous imperial honours. -SGZ 1:2 & 11, HHS 78/68:2519.

Cao Song was buried at his home county of Qiao 譙, by the tomb of his adoptive father: SJZ 23:6a. A major tomb of the family was excavated in the 1970s, and the results are published and discussed in WW 1978/8:32-50.

Cao Song 曹嵩, wife of: see the Lady Ding 丁 II.

Cao Tai 曹泰; Pei. Eldest son of Cao Ren, he succeeded to his fief and was later a general of Wei. -SGZ 9:276.

Cao Teng 曹騰 [Jixing 季興]; Pei. Youngest son of Cao Jie 節. Cao Teng was castrated as a child and placed in the imperial harem. In 120 the regent Dowager Deng chose him to attend the Heir Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun, and they became personal friends. It does not appear that Cao Teng played any role in the coup led by Sun Cheng which brought Liu Bao to the throne in 125, but he became an Attendant at the Yellow Gates and then a Regular Attendant.

In 146, as Liang Ji planned to place Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, upon the throne, he was opposed by Li Gu and other senior ministers in open court. Cao Teng urged him to defy the critics; the majority backed down and Cao Teng was enfeoffed for his role in the accession. He was liable to be sent from the palace to reside at his fief in his home country of Pei, but he then received supplementary title as Specially Advanced, permitting him to stay at the capital. He became Grand Prolonger of Autumn, in charge of the household of the Empress Liang Nüying, and served also as Coachman of the Change Palace of the Dowager Liang Na.

Cao Teng died in the late 150s and was buried at his home county of Qiao; a stele was erected at his tomb in 160. He was noted for his political wisdom, for his generosity and for the quality of his protégés, men such as Bian Shao, Zhang Wen, Zhang Huan and Chong Gao. Some favourable comments in the history may be due to the later authority of Cao Teng's nominal descendants, for his adopted son Cao Song became an Excellency, and he was the father of the warlord Cao Cao. -HHS 78/68:2519*, XHS 5:11b-12a, SGZ 1:1-2, SJZ 23:6a, LS 15:3a-4b, 20:14b; Bn 81:575-576.

Cao Teng 曹騰. Administrator of Yingchuan, Cao Teng was reported by Yang Huai/Zhun for allowing his relatives to abuse their position. He was sent to prison. -HYGZ 10B:155. This man cannot be the senior eunuch described above.

Cao Wan 曹琬; Pei. Son of Cao Jun, in 221 Cao Wan was made a marquis to maintain the descent of Cao Ang; he later received title as a king. -SGZ 20:579.

Cao Xi 曹喜 [Zhongze 仲則]; Youfufeng. An officer of the imperial library in the late first century, Cao Xi was celebrated for his calligraphy in the traditional Seal Script 篆書 attributed to Li Si 李斯, ancient minister of Qin 秦. -JS 36:1063, Hou Kang:2116.

Cao Xian 曹憲, the Lady; Pei. Eldest daughter of Cao Cao, in 213 she and two sisters were placed in the harem of Emperor Xian, and in 214 they became Honoured Ladies. In 215 her sister Cao Jie was made empress. -HHS 10B:455. [XHS 1:19b says that it was Cao Xian who became empress, but this is not correct, and the statement is contradicted by a fragment of XHS immediately following.]

Cao Xing 曹性; Henei? A follower of Hao Meng, officer of Lü Bu, in 196 he joined a mutiny against Lü Bu in Xiapi, but when the attack was defeated, Cao Xing turned on Hao Meng and killed him, being wounded in the process. Interrogated, he said that the plot had been instigated by Yuan Shu. He was pardoned and given command of Hao Meng's troops. -SGZ 7:224.

Cao Xiong 曹熊; Pei. Fourth son of Cao Cao by the Lady Bian, he died young. In 221 he was posthumously enfeoffed as a duke and in 229 he was named as a king. -SGZ 19:577.

Cao Xiu 曹休 [Wenlie 文烈] (d.228); Pei. Cao Xiu was a junior cousin of Cao Cao. His father died when he was young, about 190, and he went with his mother for refuge to Wu commandery, where his grandfather had been Administrator. He then went to join Cao Cao, who received him warmly and made him a companion of his son Cao Pi. Cao Xiu became a commander of elite cavalry and in 218 he was adviser to Cao Hong in Hanzhong.

As Cao Pi took the imperial title, Cao Xiu was one of the sponsors of a commemorative stele, and he held senior command against Wu. When Cao Pi died in 226 Cao Zhen was one of four regents appointed to supervise the government of Cao Rui, but two years later he led his men into an ambush in Lujiang. He died soon afterwards. -SGZ 9:279-80*, LS 19:3b; Goodman 98:196.

Cao Xu 曹翽; Shanyang. Son of the Excellency Cao Jing, in 23 Cao Xu became a member of the Secretariat under the Gengshi Emperor. The new emperor had it in mind to send Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, on commission north of the Yellow River, but many of his followers opposed the idea. Urged by Feng Yi, Liu Xiu made contact with Cao Xu, and he and his father helped secure the decision. -HHS 17/7:640; Bn 59:37.

Cao Xu 曹盱 (d.143); Kuaiji. An excellent musician and singer, Cao Xu was also a shaman. On the fifth day of the fifth month of 143, the time of the mid-summer festival, he greeted the God of the Billows 波神 of the local river and drowned. His filial daughter Cao E q.v. followed his example. -HHS 84/74:2794-95; Bodde 75:310-315.

Cao Xuan 曹琰; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Qin, he was made a marquis in 211, but died young. -SGZ 20:579 & 584-85*.

Cao Xun 曹訓. Cao Xun was a nephew of Ma Yuan, who commented to him on one occasion about the risk Wang Pan was running by his ostentatious display of wealth and influence. -HHS 24/14:851.

Cao Yan 曹演; Pei. Son of Cao Chun, he succeeded to his fief in 210. He later held military command under Wei. During the 240s his fief was raised in rank. -SGZ

9:277.

Cao Yi 操彖; Dong. It is said that during the mid-150s Cao Yi and Rong Bao were master craftsmen building a funerary temple for Xiang Tuo and his wife. -Nagata 94:118 [this text is of doubtful provenance].

Cao Yi 曹壹; Pei. Son of Cao Lin, in 221 he was adopted and enfeoffed to maintain the descent of Cao Xuan and his elder brother Cao Zan. In 223 he became a duke. -SGZ 20:585.

Cao Yin 曹胤; Pei. Son of Cao Bao and nephew of Cao Teng, he became an Internuncio. A stele was erected by his tomb in Qiao in 177. -SJZ 23:6b.

Cao Yin 曹寅. Administrator of Wuling in 190, Cao Yin quarrelled with the Inspector Wang Rui, who gathered troops to attack him. Cao Yin sent forged instructions to Sun Jian, Administrator of Changsha who was bringing an army north to join the alliance against Dong Zhuo, listing crimes by Wang Rui and ordering his execution. As Sun Jian moved against Wang Rui, Wang Rui killed himself. -SGZ Wu 1:1097.

Cao Yu 曹瑜; Pei. Possibly a brother of Cao Song, Cao Yu was General of the Rear and a marquis under Han. -SGZ 9:278.

Cao Yu 曹玉; Pei. A younger brother of Cao Cao, he died young. He received posthumous title as Lamented Marquis of Langling 朗陵哀侯, and Cao Cao's son Hui was appointed to maintain his lineage.

SGZ 20:589 refers to an unnamed brother of Cao Cao, entitled Lamented Marquis of Haiyang 海陽哀侯, whose daughter married Xiaohou Heng, son of Xiahou Yuan and a grandson of Cao Cao. There is, however, no mention of this man in SGZ 20, nor of anyone appointed to maintain his lineage, while the only county named Haiyang was in Liaoxi, a long way from the Cao family interests. It is possible, however, that this unnamed brother was in fact Cao Yu, with different titles ascribed to him at different times. See SGZJJ 9.9b.

Cao Yu 曹宇 [Pengzu 彭祖]; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Huan, in 211 Cao Yu was made a marquis, and in 215 he was married to a daughter of the surrendered theocratic warlord Zhang Lu.

Cao Yu was made a duke by Cao Pi in 221 and a king in 222. He was a friend to Cao Rui, future Emperor Ming, who admired him and often called him to audience. As the emperor was on his deathbed in 238 he wanted to appoint Cao Yu as one of the regents for his successor Cao Fang, but Cao Yu declined.

In 260 Cao Yu's son Huan 奂 became the puppet last ruler of Wei under the control of the Sima family. He was deposed by Sima Yan 司馬炎 in the winter at the end of 265. -SGZ 20:582*.

Cao Zan 曹贊; Pei. Son of Cao Lin, in 215 Cao Zan was adopted and enfeoffed to maintain the descent of Cao Xuan, but died soon afterwards. -SGZ 20:584.

Cao Zeng 曹曾 original personal name Ping 平 [Boshan 伯山]; Jiyin or Lu. Cao Zeng changed his personal name from Ping to Zeng in honour of Confucius' disciple Zeng Can 曾參. He studied the Classic of History under Ouyang Xi, then maintained his master's teachings and had three thousand students of his own. He held office as a Counsellor Remonstrant.

A man of vastly wealthy family, Cao Zen not only provided impoverished students with food, but also gathered a great library of works from earliest antiquity, editing and copying where necessary, and constructing a building of stone to house the books and restrict danger from fire in troubled times. The collection was later transferred to the imperial library, while his students established a shrine in his honour. -HHS 79/69A:2556.

Cao Zhan 曹湛. A descendant of Cao Shen/Can 參, the great minister at the beginning of Former Han, in 77 Cao Zhan was enfeoffed by Emperor Zhang in recognition of his ancestor's service to the dynasty.

Cao Zhan died about 90, leaving no heirs to maintain the lineage, and in 91 the regency government of Emperor He ordered the Minister Herald to find another successor. -HHS 4:172, 26/16:917.

Cao Zhang 曹彰 [Ziwen 子文] (d.223); Pei. Second son of Cao Cao by the Lady Bian, Cao Zhang married a daughter of Sun Ben in 198, and in 216 he was made a marquis.

Skilled at arms, in 218 Cao Zhang held command in the north against the Wuhuan, gaining a major victory, and in 219 he was left in charge at Chang'an as Cao Cao returned east to face Guan Yu.

When Cao Cao died in 220, there was a short period of uncertainty when Cao Zhang might have claimed the throne, but Cao Pi duly succeeded their father and Cao Zhang and his brothers were sent away to their fiefs. In 221 Cao Zhang was made a duke, and in 222 he was named a king. He died in the following year, while attending court at the capital. [See also sub Cao Biao.] -SGZ 19:555-56*; Mather 76:578.

Cao Zhang 曹彰, wife of: see the Lady Sun 孫 VI.

Cao Zhen 曹震; Pei. Son of Cao Hong, he was given a share of his father's fief by Cao Cao. -SGZ 9:278.

Cao Zhen 曹真 [Zidan 子丹] (d.231); Pei. Son of Qin Shao and a kinsman of the Cao family, he was adopted into the lineage by Cao Cao and brought up with his children, notably his eldest son Cao Pi. A brave huntsman, Cao Zhen commanded elite cavalry and was enfeoffed for his success against bandits in Zhao. He served under Cao Hong in Hanzhong in 217 and 218, and briefly commanded the army against Liu Bei after Xiahou Yuan's defeat in 219.

As Cao Pi took the imperial title, Cao Zhen was one of the sponsors of a commemorative stele. An Area Commander in the northwest under both Cao Pi and Cao Rui, he fought also in Jing province. When Cao Pi died in 226 Cao Zhen was one of four regents appointed to supervise the government of his son and successor Cao Rui.

In 239 Cao Zhen's son Shuang 爽 controlled the regency government for Cao Rui's adopted successor Cao Fang 芳; in 249 he was destroyed by Sima Yi. -SGZ 9:280-82*, LS 19:3b; Goodman 98:196.

Cao Zheng 曹整 (d.218); Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Li, in 203 Cao Zheng was married to a daughter of Yuan Tan, but in the following year the agreement was broken and the girl was sent back.

In 217 Cao Zheng was made a marquis to maintain the descent of Cao Shao, but he died in the following year. -SGZ 1:24-26, 20:588.

Cao Zhi 曹祉; Jiyin. Son of Cao Zen, he maintained his father's teachings of the Classic of History according to the Ouyang interpretation.

In 123 Cao Zhi was Intendant of Henan when the Internuncio Dan Song urged that the calendar be altered to fit with the teachings of the apocrypha. Amidst wide-spread debate Zhang Heng and Zhou Xing argued that the changes would add errors and the apocryphal writings were not worth serious attention, while Cao Zhi and forty others argued that the current Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] system was acceptable and also accorded with the apocrypha. The majority, led by the Grand Commandant Liu Kai, supported change, but the Director of the Imperial Secretariat Chen Zhong opposed it, and the Sifen calendar was maintained. -HHS 79/69A:2556, 92/2:3034.

Cao Zhi 曹植 [Zijian 子建] (192-232); Pei. Third son of Cao Cao by the Lady Bian, Cao Zhi is regarded as one of the greatest poets of China. In 211 he was enfeoffed as a marquis, and the following year he impressed his father with his Dengtai fu 登臺賦 "Rhapsody on Climbing the Terrace," celebrating the building of the Copper Bird Terrace at Ye city. In 214 Cao Zhi was left in formal charge at Ye while Cao Cao was on campaign in the south. There was some possibility that he, rather than his elder brother Pi, might be chosen as successor, but Cao Pi was named Heir in 217, while Cao Zhi lost favour by his extravagant conduct and frequent drunkenness.

When Cao Pi took power in 220, Cao Zhi and all his brothers were sent to their fiefs and kept under tight control. In 222 Cao Zhi was named King of Zhencheng 鄆城 and, like those of his other brothers, his fief was later transferred several times. Though he presented several memorials asking for some responsible position, he never received one. Some of his poems and rhapsodies are plaints in this vein, but the strength of his writing is the intensity of his description and his sense of emotion. He received posthumous title as "Thoughtful" King of Chen 陳思王. -SGZ 19:557-77*; Cutter 85, Mather 76:578.

Cao Zhong 曹眾 [Boshi 伯師]; Youfufeng. Noted for literary and scholarly ability in the latter part of the first century, Cao Zhong refused all official appointments and died of old age at home.

Cao Zhong left four pian of eulogies, essays and letters. He is mentioned by Cao Pi in his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature." -HHS 80/70A:2617 & JJ at 2870 Hui Dong.

Cao [Zhongxing] 曹仲興; Pei. Second son of Cao Jie 曹節, he was an elder brother of Cao Teng. -SGZ 1:1.

Cao [Zicheng] 曹子乘; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Li V, he died young. In 231 he was posthumously enfeoffed as a duke. -SGZ 20:588*.

Cao [Ziji] 曹子棘; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Liu, he died young. In 231 he was posthumously enfeoffed as a duke. -SGZ 20:588*.

Cao [Ziqin] 曹子勤; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Sun X, he died young. In 231 he was posthumously enfeoffed as a duke. -SGZ 20:588*.

Cao [Zishang] 曹子上; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Sun, he died young. In 231 he was posthumously enfeoffed as a duke. -SGZ 20:586*.

Cao [Zisheng] 曹子乘 see Cao Zicheng 曹子乘.

Cao [Ziyuan] 曹子元; Taiyuan. A fellow-countryman of Guo Tai, he was sponsored by him and became well-known and respected. -HHS 68/58:2231.

Cao [Zizheng] 曹子整; Pei. Son of Cao Cao by the Lady Li V, Cao Zizheng was transferred to maintain the lineage of his father's cousin Cao Shao. He was made a county marquis in 217, but died two years later, leaving no children.

In 221 Cao Zizheng was posthumously honoured as a duke, and Cao Fan 範, son of Cao Ju 據, was named as his successor. -SGZ 20:588*.

Cao Zong 曹宗 or Cao Chong 崇. In 119 Cao Song was Administrator of Dunhuang. Following the Chinese withdrawal from the Western Regions and the great rebellion of the Qiang, the Northern Xiongnu had gained considerable influence among the states of central Asia and they and their allies raided the west of Liang province.

Seeking to establish a counter-presence, Cao Zong's officer Suo Ban was sent to set up a military colony at Yiwu near present-day Hami. The kings of Nearer Jushi in Turfan and of Shanshan about Lop Nor paid their respects, but a few months later King Junjiu of Further Jushi and his Xiongnu allies destroyed Suo Ban and forced the ruler of Nearer Jushi into exile. King Youhuan of Shanshan asked Cao Song for help, and Cao Song asked permission for an expeditionary force.

There was general opposition at court to any further involvement in the far west, so the enterprise was not approved. -HHS 47/37:1587, 88/78:2911.

Cao Zong 曹琮 see Cao Cong 曹琮.

Cao Zun 曹遵; Pei. A kinsman of Cao Zhen 真, a member of the future imperial family of Wei, Cao Zun served Cao Cao but died early. About 230, at Cao Zhen's urging, a fief was granted to his son. -SGZ 9:282.

Caotou 造頭; Qiang. Chief of the Dazangyi Qiang, who lived outside the frontier of Shu commandery, in 94 Caotou led more than fifty thousand of his people to pay allegiance to the government of Emperor He. He was granted title as Lord of a City 邑君長 and was awarded a seal and ribbon. -HHS 87/77:2898.

Cen Fu 岑福; Nanyang. Son of Cen Xi, he succeeded to his fief and likewise became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. -HHS 17/7:664.

Cen Hong 岑宏 see Ling Hong 冷宏. -HHJ 16:196.

Cen Huai 岑淮; Nanyang. Younger son of Cen Peng, in recognition of his father's achievements he was awarded a county marquise in Pei in 37, additional to that held by his brother Cen Zun. -HHS 17/7:663.

Cen Kang 岑伉; Nanyang. Son of Cen Zun, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 17/7:663.

Cen Ke 岑軻; Nanyang. XTS 72B:2668 says that Cen Ke, son of Cen Liangbo, served as Administrator of Kuaiji and of Poyang under Sun Quan.

Cen [Liangbo] 岑亮伯; Nanyang. XTS 72B:2668 says that Cen Liangbo was a son of Cen Zhi, and shared his exile in the south. He was the father of Cen Ke.

Cen Peng 岑彭 [Junran 君然] (d.35); Nanyang. Member of a leading family, about 20 AD Cen Peng became brevet magistrate of his native county, Jiyang. As the Han rebellion broke out in 22, Liu Bosheng attacked Jiyang on his way to Wan, capital of the commandery. Cen Peng was unable to hold his position and fled with his household to Wan. The Administrator Zhen Fu 甄阜, angry at Cen Peng for abandoning his post, took his mother and wife hostage and ordered him to redeem himself against the rebels. Cen Peng accompanied the army with his retainers, took part in the defeat of the rebels at Xiao-Chang'an, and distinguished himself in the fighting.

Early in the following year, as Liu Bosheng gained reinforcements and resumed the advance, Zhen Fu was defeated and killed near Jiyang. Wounded in the action, Cen Peng escaped to Wan and joined Zhen Fu's Assistant Yan Shuo 嚴說 [or Zhuang You 莊尤 II? q.v.] in defending the city. They held out for five months, but in the summer they were compelled to surrender for lack of food. The victorious commanders wanted to execute Yan Shuo and Cen Peng, but Liu Bosheng urged that they should be rewarded in order to encourage further defections. So the Gengshi Emperor named Cen Peng Marquis Who Turns to Virtue 歸德侯; nothing further is heard of Yan Shuo.

Cen Peng joined Liu Bosheng's command, but when Liu Bosheng was killed soon afterwards he became a colonel under the Grand Marshal Zhu Wei, who had been responsible for impeaching Liu Bosheng. Accompanying Zhu Wei into Yang province, he distinguished himself in the defeat and death of Wang Mang's Governor Li Shen/Sheng 李琴/聖 [QHX:227].

Zhu Wei had Cen Peng appointed Commandant of Huaiyang. The commandery was not fully settled, and the Gengshi court sent the chieftain Zhang Ang to confirm control. Zhang Ang's subordinate general Yao Wei rebelled and drove him to flight, but Cen Peng defeated Yao Wei and restored the situation.

Cen Peng was rewarded with appointment as Administrator of Yingchuan, but the renegade imperial clansman Liu Mao dominated the commandery and Cen Peng could not take up his position. With a few hundred men he set his formal headquarters in Henei, where the Administrator Han Xin was a man from his home county.

In the autumn of 24 Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came into Henei. Han Xin wanted to resist, but Cen Peng and others persuaded him to surrender. Uncertain of Han Xin's loyalty, Liu Xiu was going to execute him, but Cen Peng obtained an audience, swore personal allegiance, then argued that as a man of gentry status Han Xin could be useful and would give credit to the new regime. So Liu Xiu let him live.

Accepted by Liu Xiu without difficulty Cen Peng was named a general. He became a most reliable servant, and his former career gave him credibility with other officers of the Gengshi regime: besides Han Xin, he also persuaded the Gengshi general Lü Zhi to surrender. Soon afterwards Liu Xiu sent his general Wu Han to occupy Ye city in Wei and kill the Gengshi commander Xie Gong. Claiming that Xie Gong's ill-disciplined soldiers had plundered people and stirred up resentment, he authorised Cen Peng to police the troops and the civil population.

Cen Peng accompanied Liu Xiu on his further campaigns to the north, and when Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 he was named Minister of Justice, promoted to be an acting chief general and confirmed in his title as Marquis Who Turns to Virtue, the honour first granted by the Gengshi regime.

Cen Peng then joined Feng Yi and other troops engaged in the siege of Luoyang, and when the garrison commander Zhu Wei attempted a sortie Cen Peng caught him unawares in a fog and defeated him. By winter, after the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the capture of Chang'an by the Red Eyebrows, the defenders were in a hopeless position, but Zhu Wei was fearful of the vengeance Guangwu might take for his role in the death of his brother Liu Bosheng. As a former subordinate, Cen Peng was sent to negotiate. He held a friendly conversation, acknowledged his concerns, and secured a firm promise of pardon. On his return he showed good faith by entering the city under Zhu Wei's control. Suitably impressed, Zhu Wei surrendered and was indeed well treated.

In 26 Cen Peng was in the south, where former officers of the Gengshi regime, local defensive groups, and the southern warlord Qin Feng contended for power. Cen Peng captured a series of cities and towns in Nanyang and neighbouring Yingchuan, eliminating pockets of local resistance, and by autumn, with two other imperial armies in the field led by Jia Fu and Wu Han, it appeared Nanyang would soon be settled. A local insurgency by Dong Xin, however, was compounded by the revolt of Deng Feng, former subordinate of Wu Han, who defeated his former master. Wu Han was recalled, and Cen Peng, now a chief general, took over. He had a considerable army, but Dong Xin and Deng Feng led good quality troops. They joined to defeat him, then set siege to Wan, capital of the commandery.

After several months without success, in the summer of 27 Guangwu himself came to Nanyang. Cen Peng trapped one of Dong Xin's commanders and heavily defeated him, and as the imperial army approached Dong Xin surrendered. Deng Feng fled south, but Cen Peng pursued him with a large force, supported by Guangwu's troops. Deng Feng was forced to surrender, and though Guangwu was prepared to spare him on account of his earlier loyal service, Cen Peng and his colleague Geng Yan urged his execution and secured it.

As the emperor returned to the north, Cen Peng was sent with thirty thousand men to attack Qin Feng. The imperial forces swiftly eliminated the enemy positions in Nanyang, but they were held for some months by Qin Feng's defences on the Han River. In the autumn Guangwu sent a message to reprimand Cen Peng for the delay, and Cen Peng let some prisoners escape, bearing a false report that he planned a crossing to the west. Qin Feng led his main force away to meet the threat, but Cen Peng then crossed directly. He defeated Qin Feng's secondary force and killed its commander Zhang Yang, then advanced through the wilderness, cutting corduroy roads, towards Qin Feng's capital at Liqiu. Hastening back to the relief, Qin Feng attacked Cen Peng's fortified camp by night. Cen Peng, however, was prepared for the assault, and Qin Feng was defeated and took refuge in Liqiu.

Rewarded for this success with a county fief, Cen Peng mopped up the enemy outposts and returned to the siege with the aid of Qin Feng's former officer Zhao Jing, who brought his troops to the imperial cause. Early in 28 Cen Peng also received the surrender of Xin Chen, brother-in-law of the Yangzi warlord Tian Rong. Though Tian Rong had also been ready to submit, he now felt betrayed by Xin Chen and changed his mind. He attempted to aid Qin Feng, but after some months fighting was forced back to the south.

As the siege of Liqiu continued with heavy casualties, Guangwu granted fiefs to over a hundred of Cen Peng's men as reward for their efforts. By the spring of 29 Qin Feng's garrison contained barely a thousand men, and their supplies were exhausted. Leaving Zhu You in charge of the siege, Cen Peng moved south against Tian Rong. He defeated him near Jiangling, capital of Nan commandery at present-day Shashi in Hubei, then followed him west up the Yangzi. Abandoning his wife and children and accompanied by a few dozen horsemen, Tian Rong fled to Gongsun Shu. In his pursuit, Cen Peng passed through the Gorges, but the region did not produce enough to maintain his troops, transport was difficult, and his force was too small for a full attack on Gongsun Shu.

Leaving the general Feng Jun to hold the pass, therefore, backed by a series of camps along the river, Cen Peng returned to Jiangling, centre of communications on the middle Yangzi. From here he obtained the submission of local non-Chinese tribes and granted titles to their chiefs and elders. He also wrote to Deng Rang, an old friend who had been appointed Governor of Jiaozhi province by the Gengshi Emperor, inviting him to accept Guangwu, and he sent letters to the administrators in the south of Jing province. Deng Rang, whose wife was a sister of the Lady Yin, Guangwu's concubine and future empress, readily accepted, and his example swayed the others. At the same time, moreover, Cen Peng sent his officer Qu Chong with a formal call to arms and, as warning to the recalcitrant, the officer Zang Gong seized a number of cities in Jiangxia. The local officials duly sent tribute to Han, many sent hostages or troops, and all were enfeoffed. The imperial government thus obtained full access to the resources of the south.

In the spring of 30 there was an attack from the west by Tian Rong, now in Gongsun Shu's service, but the defences generally held and the enterprise amounted to little more than a raid. In the winter Cen Peng was recalled to the capital for consultations, received rewards and honours for his family, then returned to Jiangling.

For the time being, major military activity was in the northwest against the warlord Wei Ao, and in 32 Cen Peng accompanied the imperial army and joined the siege of Wei Ao in Xi city. Though Guangwu was soon afterwards obliged to lead the main army back to deal with rebellion in the east, he left Cen Peng with He Yan and Geng Yan to attend to the siege, and was confident enough to leave orders for an attack south against Gongsun Shu once Wei Ao had been eliminated. Cen Peng channelled streams in an attempt to flood Xi city, but before the water had reached its height Wei Ao's general Wang Yuan returned with reinforcements from Gongsun Shu, broke the siege and rescued Wei Ao. The imperial forces were now short of food and supplies and were compelled to withdraw; Cen Peng commanded the rearguard to hold off pursuit.

After the death of Wei Ao early in 33, Cen Peng returned to the south. A major attack from Gongsun Shu, again led by Tian Rong, broke through the Yangzi Gorges, drove in the Han defences and established a position near Yidao, seventy kilometres upstream from Jiangling, but they remained thereafter on the defensive, relying upon fortresses, palisades, and a floating bridge with towers across the river. Though Cen Peng gained no success with small-scale attacks, he continued to prepare for a major offensive, training the army, constructing warships and gathering sailors from the river lands of the south, and in the spring of 35 he brought a force numbered at sixty thousand men against the enemy. The Grand Marshal Wu Han had objected that the naval contingent was a waste of resources, but Cen Peng argued for its value and wrote to the emperor. In reply, Guangwu observed that while Wu Han was excellent in land warfare, he had no understanding of water-borne operations, and he gave Cen Peng supreme command of the campaign.

In the first assault, volunteers from Cen Peng's troops broke through the palisades and burnt the floating bridge, and as the ships advanced with a strong wind the enemy was heavily defeated. Several of Gongsun Shu's senior officers were killed and only Tian Rong escaped through the Gorges to the west.

Cen Peng was now named Governor of Yi province, to be Acting Administrator over each commandery that he might conquer. Leaving Wu Han to maintain supplies and reinforcements, he led the generals Zang Gong and Liu Xin to force their way through the passes to Jiangzhou, present-day Chongqing, where Tian Rong had taken refuge. We are told the people welcomed the invaders with food and wine, but Cen Peng had sympathy for them, having suffered so long under a government alien to Han, and refused to accept their offerings.

Tian Rong's position in Jiangzhou was strong and he was well supplied, so Cen Peng left Feng Jun to maintain a siege and led the main army and fleet past the city, up the Jialing Jiang into the Fu River. They gained initial success and captured great quantities of rice from enemy stores, but were then faced by defences in depth under Yan Cen, Wang Yuan, Lu Wei and Gongsun Hui. Cen Peng's army, moreover, now included a body of former soldiers of Gongsun Shu who had surrendered and changed allegiance: he was uncertain of their full support and reluctant to commit them against their former comrades.

Leaving Zang Gong to face Yan Cen, therefore, Cen Peng returned to the Yangzi, passed Jiangzhou once more, then moved upstream to the junction of the Min River [known at that time as the Du or Chengdu River 都/成都江] and turned north. Defeating a garrison under Hou Dan, he advanced by forced marches to Wuyang, forty kilometres south of Chengdu, then sent a raid of light horsemen to seize Guangdu, just five kilometres from Gongsun Shu's capital. His advance had by-passed Gongsun Shu's defences on the Fu River, and his success brought the surrender of the chieftain Ren Gui in Yuexi commandery to the south. About the same time, moreover, Zang Gong defeated Yan Cen, destroyed the enemy positions on the Fu, and began to move against Mianzhu, north of Chengdu. Though he was not yet willing to surrender, the whirlwind campaign had left Gongsun Shu in desperate straits, and Cen Peng's success persuaded the non-Chinese leader Ren Gui of Yuexi to send tribute to Han.

At this point, however, one of Gongsun Shu's followers, pretending to come as a runaway slave, gained access to Cen Peng and killed him. It is said that his headquarters had been set at a place called Pengwang 彭亡 "Peng dies", originally named for the death of the legendary and long-lived Peng Zu 彭祖. Uneasy at the omen, Cen Peng planned to leave, but he was killed that same evening. [In rationalist fashion, Bielenstein, discounts the story, arguing that the village obtained its name after the event, and the legend developed to fit it: Bn 54:49.]

With the death of their commander, the Han main army was obliged to withdraw down the Min River, but Zang Gong's advance from the line of the Fu was not affected, and within a few weeks Wu Han had brought a new force of invaders up the Yangzi and renewed the offensive along the Min.

Cen Peng was awarded a posthumous title, his family were granted the tribute which had been presented by Ren Gui, and in 37 his younger son Huai was also enfeoffed. Even the people of Shu remembered him with favour, and set up a shrine for his worship at Wuyang. Later, recognising Cen Peng as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 17/7:653-62*, 22/12:789-91, XC 1:3a; Bn 54:118, Bn 59:35, 105, 151-158, 184-193, 212, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:80-81.

Cen Qi 岑紀/起; Nanyang. Son of Cen Kang, he succeeded to the family marquisate. In 116 he was found guilty of some fault and lost his fief, but it was restored by Emperor An in 121. Under Emperor Shun Cen Qi was Colonel of the City Gates in 133 and later became Minister of the Household. -HHS 17/7:663, 60/50A:1971.

Cen Xi 岑熙; Nanyang. Son of Cen Qi, Cen Xi succeeded to the family fief. He married the Princess Liu Shinan, younger sister of Emperor An, became a Palace Attendant and then a General of the Household. Admired at court for his ability, he became Administrator of Wei [or perhaps Dong] commandery, where the people sang the praises of his government by moral example with limited action 無為. -HHS 10B:457, 17/7:663, 55/45:1804, HQ 2:7a.

Cen Xiang 岑像 see Cen Yu 岑豫.

Cen Yu 岑豫 or Cen Xiang 像; Nanyang. A descendant of Cen Peng, Cen Yu was Administrator of Nan commandery about 150. He maintained a greedy and oppressive government and was punished by execution. -HHS 67/57:2212, XTS 72B:2668.

Cen Zhi 岑晷 [Gongxiao 公孝]; Nanyang. Son of Cen Yu/Xiang, Cen Zhi was well read in the classics. When he was young he went to call upon his fellow-countryman Zong Ci, who had just been granted special nomination to office. Zong Ci was initially reluctant to see him on account of his father's disgrace, but after several days Cen Zhi did obtain an audience and Zong Ci was so impressed that he took him with him to Luoyang. Cen Zhi attended the University there, and his abilities gained him the friendship of such luminaries as Guo Tai and Zhu Mu, while Li Ying and Wang Chang spoke of him as one of the hopes of the empire.

Returning to his home country, Cen Zhi maintained his ambitions, and when the new Administrator Cheng Jin took up office he already knew his reputation. He immediately invited him to be his Officer of Merit, and trusted him completely, accepting all his recommendations to reform the government. A popular ditty described how:

The Administrator of Nanyang is Cen Gongxiao,
Cheng Jin of Hongnong has only to sit and sing.

In 165 Cen Zhi and his colleague the Officer for Criminals 賊曹 Zhang Mu persuaded Cheng Jin to arrest Zhang Fan, a wealthy merchant who supplied the imperial harem at Luoyang but was said to have acted arrogantly and unlawfully. Though an amnesty was current, Cheng Jin killed Zhang Fan and over two hundred of his kinsman, clients and retainers without any reference to the throne. Cheng Jin was arrested and died in prison, while Cen Zhi and Zhang Mu fled to the east. They themselves then benefited from an amnesty and were able to return home. [The moralist Jia Biao did not approve of Cen Zhi's aggressive conduct.]

Cen Zhi later received nominations from his province and his commandery, and also invitations to clerical office at the capital, but he declined them all. When Li Ying and his fellows were killed in the Second Faction Incident of 169, Cen Zhi fled again, this time to the hill country of Jiangxia. He later travelled to Wu commandery, and died in the south.

Cen Zhi was admired by gentry officials and numbered among the popular heroes in the lists compiled by reformists and students of the University, so Fan Ye included his biography in the HHS chapter on the Proscribed Party. In fact, his record is not impressive: his advice brought the death of his master Cheng Jin while he himself escaped; and he played no direct role in the struggle against eunuch power at the capital; he was a symbolic rather than an actual hero. -HHS 67/57:2212-13* & 2187, XC 4:8b, XTS 72B:2668; deC 89:70, 110.

Cen Zun 岑尊. In 25 Cen Zun was captain at a gate of Luoyang city when the carriage of Liu Liang, King of Zhao and uncle of Emperor Guangwu, was blocked by that of the General of the Household Zhang Han. Liu Liang abused Cen Zun, ordered him to kowtow before his chariot and then escort him forward. The king's inappropriate conduct was reported, but the emperor took no action. -HHS 19/9:1020. It is possible this is the same person as Cen Zun 岑遵 below, though it is not certain Guangwu could have ignored such an insult to the son of one of his best generals.

Cen Zun 岑遵; Nanyang. Son of Cen Peng, Cen Zun succeeded to his marquise in Nanyang; the fief was later transferred to a county in Yingchuan. During the reign of Emperor Ming Cen Zun was a colonel in the Northern Army. -HHS 17/7:663.

Chai Yu 柴玉. A well-known bell-maker of the early third century, Chai Yu was commissioned by Cao Cao's chief of music to prepare a set of tuned bells. When they were done, Du Kui claimed that they were not a matched set, and demanded they be melted down and cast again. Chai Yi objected that Du Kui was being arbitrary, and the quarrel was brought to Cao Cao, who had the bells sounded. He found that Du Kui was correct, and Chai Yu and his family were sent away to be horse-herders. -SGZ 29:806.

Chang [or Zhang] 長 (d.85); Xiongnu. Son of the former Southern Shanyu Shi and grandson of the founding Shanyu Bi, he succeeded his cousin Su in 63, taking the title Huxie shizuhou di 胡邪驢倥尸逐侯鞮 Shanyu. At this time the Northern Xiongnu were comparatively strong and sent a number of raids against the frontiers, but even as the imperial authorities were concerned about this the Shanyu sought to re-open trade and sent envoys to seek peace. Emperor Ming approved the overtures and sent an embassy in return.

In the summer of 65, however, groups of the Southern Xiongnu became suspicious of Chinese intentions and sent messengers of their own to the north. The envoy Zheng Zhong caught one of these men, and he urged that a military post be set on the frontier to keep the two groups of Xiongnu apart. The General of the Household Wu Tang was swiftly appointed as Acting General on the Liao, with his base in Wuyuan, and the Commandant of Cavalry Qin Peng was sent to establish a camp at Meiji in Xihe, capital of the Southern Shanyu, to keep watch on his activities. That autumn a force of two thousand Northern cavalry scouted the frontier of Shuofang and attempted to cross the Yellow River by horse-skin boats to make contact with the southerners. Seeing the Han were prepared for them, they drew back.

The Northern Xiongnu also resumed raids on the border commanderies of the Gansu corridor, burning villages and government posts; the situation became so serious that the gates of the cities were kept closed even during daytime.

In 73, therefore, a great expedition was mounted against the north. The Shanyu Chang sent his Worthy King of the Left Xin to accompany the main column led by Zhai Tong and Wu Tang, which moved out from Shuofang to Zhuoye Mountain, in the Gurvan Sayhan Uul range in the south of Outer Mongolia. Xin, however, angry with Zhai Tong for some reason, gave him false directions: the Han armies failed to make a rendezvous and the enemy easily avoided them.

In 76 a group of Northern Xiongnu re-occupied Zhuoye Mountain. The Shanyu Chang heard of this and sent light horsemen, who combined with Chinese commandery militia and Wuhuan auxiliaries to attack the new settlers. They killed several hundred, and three or four thousand surrendered.

In this year there was a plague of locusts in the territory of the Southern Xiongnu, and the imperial court sent grain to relieve the famine. Thereafter, through the late 70s and in 84, there were dry spells and droughts. The misfortunes no doubt extended across the steppe, while the southerners maintained intermittent raiding against the north. Perhaps also as a consequence of internal quarrels, in 83 the chieftain Jiliusi led his 38,000 people, with twenty thousand horses and over a hundred thousand cattle and sheep, to surrender at the Wuyuan frontier.

In 84 the court at Luoyang accepted a request from the Northern Shanyu for permission to trade along the frontier, and a formal agreement was made. The Shanyu Chang, however, sent frequent raiding parties to intercept and plunder the traders.

In 85 another group of northern chieftains, led by Cheli and Zhuobing, brought a further 73,000 people to surrender. It was clear that the northern regime was in great difficulty: besides dry seasons and harassment from the southerners, they also suffered attacks from the Dingling people of the far north and, most seriously, from the turbulent Xianbi to their east. At the same time, their position among the oasis states of the Western Regions became increasingly tenuous.

The long-lived Shanyu Chang died at this time, and the final assaults against the north took place during the reigns of his successors Xuan and Tuntuhe. -HHS 89/79:2948-50; deC 84:251-264.

Chang Ba 昌霸 i.e. Chang Xi 昌豨. -SGZ Shu 2:875.

Chang Chong 常冲. About 68 Chang Chong was Minister of Finance. Together with his outspoken colleagues Sun Kan and Zhou Ze, he received a special reward from Emperor Ming. -HHS 79/69B:2578.

Chang Feng 常豐. In 89 Chang Feng was sent out as a Commissioner in Plain Clothes 微服使者 to gather popular songs and assess the customs and feelings of the people. [Cf. Special Commissioners clad in Embroidered Garments 繡衣直指, who had held high censorial powers under Former Han: Bn 80:9-10.] Chang Feng and a colleague came to the residence of Li He in Hanzhong, who told them he had learnt of their mission from the stars. Three years later, when Chang Feng became Administrator of Hanzhong, he appointed Li He to his staff.

When the General-in-Chief Dou Xian took a wife, local offices sent congratulatory gifts. Li He objected that the Dou clan were unworthy and dangerous, but Chang Feng insisted the present must be sent, though he did agree to put Li He in charge of its delivery. Li He went very slowly, and before he reached Luoyang Dou Xian had been destroyed. As Emperor He dismissed all officials who had any dealings with the fallen leader, Chang Feng was one of the few to escape disgrace. In gratitude, he nominated Li He as Filial and Incorrupt. -HHS 82/72A:2717-18 [Chang Feng's name is given by HHSJJ at 2987 Hui Dong quoting a Secondary Biography of Li He].

Chang Gao 常高; Shu. Son of Chang Yuan, Chang Gao became a county magistrate. -HYGZ 11:186.

Chang Gui 長貴 see Ren Gui 任貴.

Chang Hong 常閔; Shu. Son of Chang Yuan, Chang Hong was Administrator of Hanzhong and of Guanghan. -HYGZ 11:186.

Chang Ji 紀常, the Lady; Shu. Daughter of Chang Qia, the Lady was married to the Excellency Zhao Qian [described as Zhao Hou "the marquis Zhao" but see HYGZJBT 552-53]. Zhao Qian died in 192, and her father was killed in 195. People admired her fine bearing in such circumstances. -HYGZ 10A:140.

Chang Liang 常良; Shu. A county magistrate, Chang

Liang was the father of the devoted widow Chang Yuan. -HYGZ 10A:140.

Chang Lin 常林 [Bohuai 伯槐]; Henei. Chang Lin's family was poor, but when he was aged seven an associate of his father came to call. Referring to Chang Lin's father by his style, Boxian, he asked if he was in, and then expressed surprise that Chang Lin did not bow. Chang Lin replied, however, that it was inappropriate for anyone to refer to a father by his style to his son, and he did not deserve the courtesy of a bow. He was admired for his sense of pride. [A similar anecdote is told of Sima Lang at the age of nine.]

Despite the family's humble circumstances, Chang Lin was a keen scholar. He carried a copy of the classics with him as he worked in the fields, and when his wife came out with his food, he would greet her with full courtesy.

Early in 190, as the self-appointed Administrator Wang Kuang raised troops for the alliance against Dong Zhuo, he sent officers into the various counties to check on any of the local officials or people who might have committed some offence; they were to be forced to redeem themselves by the surrender of their property, and any slow who were to respond would bring destruction upon their family. The officers reported an uncle of Chang Lin for beating one of his retainers, Wang Kuang ordered his arrest, and the whole clan was frightened. Chang Lin, however, went to Humu Biao, a fellow-countryman of Wang Kuang and a kinsman by marriage. He argued that a show of leniency would encourage good will among the people and strengthen his cause. Humu Biao accordingly wrote to Wang Kuang, and Wang Kuang indeed pardoned Chang Lin's uncle.

Chang Lin now left the territory and went into the hills of Shangdang, where he established a farm. When there was drought and a plague of locusts, Chang Lin was the only person able to obtain a harvest, but he divided his produce with his neighbours.

It appears that by this time Chang Lin was recognised as a leader of his clan and had gathered a number of followers. In 191 he led his people to help Chen Yan, a former Administrator of Henei, who was under attack from the fighting man Zhang Yang. The force he brought with him was evidently of some value, while Chang Lin himself acted as adviser to Chen Yan. They defied Zhang Yang's troops over a two months siege, and the assailants eventually withdrew, leaving the defence intact.

About 200 Gao Gan, Inspector of Bing province in the service of Yuan Shao, recommended Chang Lin as a Commandant of Cavalry. He would not accept the appointment, but in 206 the new appointee Liang Xi recommended Chang Lin and other leading men to Cao Cao, and they all became county magistrates. Chang Lin was first stationed in Julu, where he governed most effectively, and he was later Administrator of Boling and then Inspector of You province.

In 211 Cao Pi was appointed Gentleman of the Household and associate to his father as Imperial Chancellor, and Chang Lin came to the capital as his Officer of Merit. That same year, when Cao Pi was left in formal charge at Ye city while Cao Cao was on campaign in the west, there was a rebellion in the northeast led by Tian Yin and Su Bo of Hejian. Cao Pi wanted to attack them in person, but Chang Lin persuaded him that they posed no long-term threat and that it would be unwise to strip the capital of a substantial force when the main army was away. Cao Pi therefore sent a lesser force under Jia Xin, and the rebels were swiftly crushed.

Soon afterwards Chang Lin was sent out as Administrator of Pingyuan, and he then became Commandant of the eastern division of Cao Cao's enlarged fief of Wei. Returning to the capital, he joined Cao Cao's staff as Imperial Chancellor, and in 213 he was appointed to the newly-established Secretariat of Wei.

As Cao Pi came to the throne in 220, Chang Lin was enfeoffed, and as Minister Steward he was one of the sponsors of a commemorative stele when Cao Pi took the imperial title. Raised in fief, he continued to hold high office under Cao Rui, and was always treated with respect by Sima Yi. When he died at the age of eighty-three he was granted posthumous honours and buried with the rites of an Excellency. -SGZ 23:658-60*, LS 19:4a; Goodman 98: 197.

Chang Michang 常靡常, the Lady; Shu. Daughter of Chang Zhongshan, the Lady was married to Yin Zhongsun. An epidemic devastated the household, and only the eighteen-year-old Lady Chang survived. Pregnant at the time, she carried out the funeral rites and then reared her son to maintain her late husband's lineage. -HYGZ 10A:140.

Chang Nu 萇奴. In 196 Chang Nu was a general of Yuan Shu. As Emperor Xian returned to the east early that year, Cao Cao sent his cousin Cao Hong to meet him. Dong Cheng, one of the leaders of the escort, resisted this approach, and Chang Nu joined him against Cao Hong. -SGZ 1:13.

Chang Qia 常洽 see Chang Xia 常洽.

Chang Shao 常少. Minister of Ceremonies under the claimant imperial regime of Gongsun Shu, he joined his colleague Zhang Long, Minister of the Household, in urging their master to acknowledge Emperor Guangwu of Han. As Gongsun Shu insisted upon his claim, the two men are said to have died of grief – surely a euphemism for enforced suicide. None of Gongsun Shu's officials dared raise the question again.

The dating of this is uncertain. HYGZ says that the discussion took place in 35, after Guangwu had begun his final campaign and sent a letter calling on Gongsun Shu to surrender. The text, however, is corrupt, and the incident probably took place in 30, when it appears that Lai Xi and Ma Yuan came on an embassy. See HYGZJBTZ:335.

After the destruction of Gongsun Shu at the end of 36, Guangwu gave Chang Shao and Zhang Long posthumous recognition as ministers of his own court, and arranged their re-entombment with appropriate honours. -HHS 13/3:542-44, HYGZ 5:68-69.

Chang Wu 昌務. Leader of a group of bandits, in the early 190s he attacked Pengcheng and drove the king, Liu He, into Dong commandery. Chang Wu was later eliminated and Liu He was able to return. -HHS 50/40:1672.

Chang Xi 昌豨 (d.206). Leader of a group of bandits based on Mount Tai, he supported Lü Bu against Cao Cao but surrendered when Lü Bu was destroyed. In 199 he allied with Liu Bei but was defeated, and in 201 he surrendered again to Cao Cao's general Xiahou Yuan in Donghai.

In 206 Chang Xi rebelled once more, and this time he was attacked by Cao Cao's general Yu Jin. After a short siege he surrendered. Chang Xi had old acquaintance with Yu Jin, and Yu Jin's officers proposed he be sent to Cao Cao. Yu Jin, however, pointed out Cao Cao's rule: no pardon for an enemy who surrenders only after he has been surrounded. Despite their past connection, therefore, he killed Chang Xi. -SGZ 17:523.

Chang Xia 常洽 [Maoni 茂尼] (d.195); Shu. Inspector of Jing province in the 180s, Chang Xia was then Intendant of Jingzhao, and in 195 he was a Palace Attendant to Emperor Xian in the power of Li Jue at Chang'an.

As the emperor began his escape to the east, Chang Xia took part in his escort as a colonel in the Northern Army. He was killed in the fighting on the road. -SGZ 6:184, HYGZ 10A:135.

Chang Yi 常翊 [Mengyuan 孟元] of Shu was an Imperial Clerk. -HYGZ 12:213.

Chang Yuan 常元, the Lady; Shu. Daughter of Chang Liang, the Lady married Bian Bin of Guanghan. When he died young the couple had no children, but the Lady cared for his kin. Her parents wanted her to marry again, but the Lady took a knife, dedicated it to her chastity, and stabbed herself. -HYGZ 10A:140.

Chang Yuan 常員/原; Shu. In the late second century, Chang Yuan served as Administrator of Zangke and of Yongchang. -HYGZ 4:60[員], 11:186 [原]: the personal names are written differently, but they surely refer to the same man.

Chang [Zhongshan] 常仲山 of Shu was the father of the Lady Chang Michang. -HYGZ 10A:140. This man's surname may have been Mi 靡: see sub the Lady Mi Chang.

Chang'an, Lady of 長安君 see the Lady Xuan 宣, mother of the Empress Deng of Emperor Huan.

Chao Hanjiang 晁漢薑/疆 [Chanbo 產伯]; Hanzhong. A staff officer to the Administrator Wang Sheng in 148, Chao Hanjiang was a joint sponsor of a stele celebrating the Baoye Road through the Qin Ling ranges and honouring his master's fellow-countryman Yang Huan, who had urged its repair. -LS 4:5a.

Chao Kan 巢堪 [Zilang 次朗]; Taishan. In 85 Chao Kan was Minister of Ceremonies when Emperor Zhang raised the possibility of developing new rituals. The Academician Cao Bao was very keen, but Chao Kan argued that it was too great a task for one person, and the emperor was compelled to recognise the difficulty he would face in obtaining consensus among officials.

In 98 Chao Kan was promoted Excellency of Works. He left office in 102. -HHS 35/25:1202, 4:185-90.

Che Cheng 車成 [Ziwei 子威]; Liang. During the troubles at the beginning of Later Han, Che Cheng's brother Endu was captured by Red Eyebrows, who intended to eat him. Che Cheng went to offer himself as replacement, but the bandits had pity and let them go. -HHS 39/29:1300, XC 2:4b. [Cf. sub Ni Meng and Zhao Xiao.]

Che Endu 車恩都 see sub Che Cheng 車成. -XC 2:4b.

Che Yu 車嫗; Kuaiji. As an elderly man in the early first century, Che Yu was well treated by Chen Ao. -SGZ Wu 12:1325.

Che Zhang 車章; Liang. Che Zhang became Officer of Merit in his native county. The magistrate Huang Gong suffered a false accusation, but Che Zhang was convinced of his innocence. When he was required to prepare the documentation, he cut off the fingers of his left hand and refused to speak. He died in prison [but the text may be corrupt]. -XC 7:13a [and cf. Xiang Song].

Che Zhou 車胄 (d.199). Inspector of Xu province for Cao Cao, Che Zhou was killed by Liu Bei. -SGZ 1:18, 14:428, SGZ Shu 2:875.

Cheli 車利; Xiongnu. A chieftain of the Northern Xiongnu, in 85 he came to the frontiers with his colleague Zhuobing and other leaders, bringing a total of 73,000 people to surrender. -HHS 89/79:2950.

Che'niu 車紐; Xiongnu. Chieftain of the Goulong 句龍 clan of the Southern Xiongnu, based in Yunzhong and Dingxiang, in the early summer of 140 he and his colleague Wusi rose in rebellion. Moving west into Xihe, they gained the support of Yiti, Worthy King of the Right, then led eight thousand men in raids across the north of the Ordos. The General of the Liao Ma Xu brought an army of twenty thousand men, including Qiang, Wuhuan and Xianbi auxiliaries, but though the rebels were forced back they continued to plunder the countryside. Under pressure from the official Chen Gui, moreover, the Southern Shanyu Xiuli committed suicide, together with his brother and heir the Worthy King of the Left.

The traditional lineage of the Shanyu was thus left in limbo, and in the autumn Che'niu claimed the vacant title, though Wusi was evidently dominant in their partnership. Avoiding direct combat, Ma Xu sought to persuade individual rebels to surrender, and the Worthy King Yiti did return to his allegiance. This was of small consequence, for supporters of Wusi and Che'niu were now numbered in the tens of thousands, and they had links with the Qiang and the Wuhuan. They defeated the local troops of Shang commandery and raided south into the Wei valley, while their influence extended from Bing southwest into Liang province, east into You, and even across the Taihang ranges to the North China plain. The imperial government was obliged to withdraw the administration of Xihe and Shang commanderies to the south, and combine Shuofang into Wuyuan, where a remnant civilian regime was guarded by the garrison under Ma Xu.

In the winter at the end of 140 the Emissary Zhang Dan, aided by militia from You province and Wuhuan auxiliaries, defeated the rebels in Yanmen. They killed three thousand of the enemy, captured many more alive, and seized vast quantities of cattle and sheep and military equipment. Wusi escaped but Che'niu surrendered. He is not heard of again. -HHS 89/79:2960-62.

Chen 陳, the Lady I; Wei. Brought as a singing girl to the court of Liu Hong, King of Le'an, she received his favours and in 138 she bore him a son, Liu Zuan. In 145 Liu Zuan was chosen as emperor, and Liu Hong's fief was changed to the larger territory of Beihai. The Lady's son, the young Emperor Zhi, died in 146 and Liu Hong died in 147; the Lady Chen received only the empty style of Great Lady 大家.

In 175, as the result of a petition to Emperor Ling urging acknowledgement of her status as the mother of an emperor, together with that of the Lady Yu, the mother of Emperor Chong, the Lady was recognised as consort 妃 to Liu Hong. -HHS 10B:441.

Chen 陳, the Lady II. A concubine of Cao Cao, she was the mother of Cao Gan/Lang, but died when he was aged three sui. -SGZ 20:586.

Chen 陳, the Lady III bore a daughter to Sun Jian. -SGZ Wu 16:1399; deC 90:86.

Chen 陳, the Lady IV. Wife of Wei Ji, she became the mother of Wei Quan 瓘, Excellency under the Jin dynasty. -JS 36:1055.

Chen 陳 [personal name unknown]; Shu. As a magistrate in Jianwei about 130, he governed well and received particular praise for his improvements to the road network. -LX 4:4b-6b.

Chen 陳 [personal name unknown]; Runan. As Chancellor of Lu, he set up a stele in honour of Kong Bao q.v. -Nagata 94:272.

Chen 陳 [personal name unknown]. As Chancellor of Lu, he set up a stele to a local deity. -SJZ 25:4b.

Chen Ao 陳囂 [Zigong 子公]; Kuaiji. When he was a boy Chen Ao went fishing in the river outside his town. He caught a fish, but it was stolen. Hiding in bushes, Chen Ao saw the robber hide the fish. He then retrieved it, and went to give it to the thief. The man was embarrassed and refused, and he never stole again.

One night Chen Ao's neighbour Ji Bo moved their dividing fence to encroach on some of his land. Chen Bo saw him, but quietly moved the fence another ten feet in his property. Ji Bo was so ashamed that he restored the correct line, then added a further twelve feet to Chen Ao's holding. When the Administrator heard of this, he named their village a model of honourable conduct.

At the age of seventy Chen Ao was a Palace Counsellor. When he attended court the emperor received him with the courtesy due to a teacher, allowing him to use a stick, not to hasten, and not to announce his name [similar privileges had been awarded to the great minister Xiao He of Former Han, and see deC 96:434]. Because of ill health he asked to retire, but he died while still a Counsellor.

During the early 190s Yu Fan discussed the local worthies of Kuaiji with the Administrator Wang Lang. He praised Chen Ao for his ability to reform people by example, and mentioned also his fine treatment of the elderly Che Yu. -XC 7:2b-3a, SGZ Wu 12:1325.

Chen Ba 陳巴 miswritten for Chen Si 陳巳 of Hanzhong. -HYGZ 12:233.

Chen Bao 陳褒. A member of the Imperial Secretariat, in 102 Chen Bao was commissioned by Emperor He to investigate a charge of witchcraft which had been laid against his Empress Yin. With the senior eunuch Zhang Shen, he interrogated the Empress and her grandmother the Lady Deng Zhu in the harem Prison of the Lateral Courts. They obtained confessions; the Empress was deposed, and while she and some kinsmen died, others were exiled. -HHS 10A:417. This is probably the same man as immediately below.

Chen Bao 陳褒 [Boren 伯仁 or Zhongren 仲仁]; Lujiang. From Minister of the Guards in the winter of 120 Chen Bao was appointed Excellency of Works. He was dismissed in 122 following portents of an earthquake, widespread rain and storms, though Chen Zhong of the Imperial Secretariat complained that such procedure weakened the essential authority of the Excellencies, heads of the imperial service. -HHS 5:231-35, 46/36:1565. This is probably the same man as immediately above.

Chen Bao 陳寶. According to Latter Biographies of Worthy Women 列女後傳, cited by Hui Dong in HHSJJ 84/74:3080, the Yellow Turban bandit Chen

Bao attempted to rape and then killed the Lady Lü Rong q.v.

Chen Bao 陳寶 or Chen Shi 實 [Shengxian 盛先]; Ba. Grandson of Chen Cheng and great-grandson of Chen Shan, Chen Bao maintained the family tradition of strict conduct and honesty. During the 190s he was Headquarters Officer to Liu Zhang, Governor of Yi province, and was celebrated throughout the west. - HHS 51/41:1686, HYGZ 10B:147, 12:218.

Chen Bao 陳寶. After Sun Ce had established himself in Danyang in 196 he sent his officer Chen Bao to bring his mother, the Lady Wu, and his brothers from Yuan Shu's territory north of the Yangzi. - SGZ Wu 1: 1104-05.

Chen Bin 陳斌; Runan. In the course of an investigation about 140 Chen Bin was examined by the county officer Wang Ziyou, and died under torture. He was later avenged by his nephew Chen Gongsi. - FSTY 3f:107-08.

Chen Bing 陳秉. A eunuch Regular Attendant in 126, Chen Bing was among those who were impeached by the Director of Retainers Yu Xu, primarily for involvement in the failed attempt of the Yan clan to keep Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, from the throne in the previous year. He and his fellows were eventually dismissed. - HHS 58/48:1870.

Chen [Bojing] 陳伯敬; Runan. In the time of Emperor Huan, Chen Bojing was known as a man of extreme caution: always walking and sitting correctly; never eating the flesh of any animal he had set eyes upon; and avoiding inauspicious days and omens when he travelled. When he was old, however, he aided his son-in-law to escape arrest on some charge, and the Administrator Shao Kui killed him. People of that time became doubtful whether such strict observance of superstition was any use. - HHS 46/36:1546.

Chen [Bosi] 陳伯思; Guanghan. Chen Bosi was interested in techniques for acquiring immortality, but was dissuaded by his aunt, the Lady Chen Huiqian. - HYGZ 10C:172.

Chen Ce 陳策; Lujiang. A hills bandit about 200, he was defeated by Cao Cao's forces with advice from Liu Ye. - SGZ 14:444.

Chen Cha 陳察; Yingchuan. XTS 71B:2334 says that Chen Cha was a son of Chen Heng.

Chen Chang 陳常 [Junyuan 君淵]. A filial son who cared for his mother, Chen Chang would work in the fields during the day and study at night. - XC 7:11a.

Chen Chao 陳超 (d.191). An Assistant Officer of Yi province based in Jianwei, in 191 Chen Chao raised troops to join the insurrection of the Administrator Ren Qi against the Governor Liu Yan, who was establishing a personal regime. Their forces were defeated, and both Ren Qi and Chen Chao were killed. - SGZ Shu 1:867.

Chen Chen 陳諶 [Jifang 季方]; Yingchuan. Son of Chen Shi and younger brother of Chen Ji, Chen Chen was noted like them for fine qualities. Known as the Three Lords 三君, they were admired for the many times they were invited to office. [XTS 71B:2334 mentions four other sons of Chen Shi, brothers of Chen Ji and Chen Chen: Kui, Xia, Xiu and Guang.]

Chen Chen eventually became a clerk in the offices of the Excellency of Works, but he died comparatively young, probably before his father. After Chen Shi's death in 187 the Inspector of Yu province had portraits of Chen Shi, Chen Ji and Chen Chen sent throughout his territory as an inspiration to public morality.

Shishuo xinyu has a number of anecdotes concerning Chen Chen. - HHS 62/52:2069; Mather 76: 503.

Chen Cheng 陳澄; Ba. Son of Chen Shan, he was celebrated for his honesty. On account of his father's reputation among the Qiang people of the region, Chen Cheng was appointed Administrator of Hanzhong. - HHS 51/41:1686, HYGZ 2:16 & 12:218.

Chen Chi 陳熾; Runan. A client of Yang Tong, Chancellor of Pei, when his patron died in 168 Chen Chi arranged for a stele to be erected at the family tomb-site in honour of Yang Tong's grandfather, the Excellency Yang Zhen, and his notable descendants. - LS 12:3b.

Chen Chong 陳寵 [Zhaogong 昭公] (d.106); Pei. Son of Chen Gong, Chen Chong followed the family tradition of learning in the law. When he was young he was a local officer in both the commandery and the province, and about 75 he was appointed to the office of the Excellency Bao Yu.

At that time clerks in the offices were concerned primarily with their own interests and paid small attention to matters of government. Chen Chong, however, frequently offered advice on current affairs and Bao Yu, impressed with his ability, appointed him to the bureau responsible for litigation. His decisions were well received and he then compiled seven chapters of Cisong bi 辭訟比 "Precedents for [Civil] Cases," so that judges could make decisions in parallel matters without having to refer to higher authority. His work was presented by Bao Yu, endorsed as an official model, and vastly decreased the backlog of cases.

After a number of intermediate posts, Chen Chong joined the Imperial Secretariat about 76. He urged the new Emperor Zhang to simplify and relax the harsh regulations inherited from the past, and wide-ranging reforms were put in place. In 84, moreover, it was ordered that capital punishments should be applied only in the first month of winter, not during the whole season. When a drought occurred, some officials claimed this was because the new measure was unduly restricting the force of yin, responsible both for death and for dampness. They urged that executions should be carried out through the three winter months, but Chen Chong argued that there had been droughts before, even when all the winter was utilised [Hulsewé 55:106]. The reform was maintained, and the emperor presented Chen Chong with an inscribed sword.

Chen Chong was a strict man, concerned with his duties as an official, and was respected for the manner in which he exercised them without fear or favour. When the Empress's brother Dou Xian recommended Zhang Lin for appointment to the Secretariat, Emperor Zhang asked Chen Chong's opinion; he replied that although Zhang Lin was a clever man, he was also greedy and corrupt. Dou Xian was furious, and Zhang Lin did enter the Secretariat, but he was later punished for bribery.

After Emperor Zhang died in 88, Dou Xian dominated the regency government. He planned revenge on Chen Chong but Bao De, son of Chen Chong's former patron Bao Yu, interceded on his behalf with Dou Xian's brother Xiang, and Chen Chong was able to leave the capital as Administrator of Taishan.

Chen Chong was later sent as Administrator to Guanghan, where there were powerful families, local officials who were greedy and corrupt, and a great number of legal disputes. With the aid of his trusted local officers Wang Huan and Xin Xian, Chen Chong restored order and the disputes vanished. He also ended a noisy haunting in the south of the city by giving proper burial to the bones of those who had been killed in earlier troubled times.

When Dou Xian returned from his victory over the Northern Xiongnu in 92, all officials were instructed to send congratulations and gifts. Chen Chong and his colleagues Zhang Zhen and Ying Shun refused to take part in this flattery, and as Dou Xian was destroyed by Emperor He soon afterwards, the three recusants were rewarded: Chen Chong became Minister of Finance.

Appointed Minister of Justice in 94, he recommended on a number of difficult cases, humanely but in accord with regulations, and the emperor accepted all his proposals. Chen Chong then proposed a full reform and codification of the law, to bring the number of offences back to those recorded in the Classic of History. Before this could be considered, however, it was found that an officer of the Imperial Prison at the ministry had made improper contact with a prisoner. Chen Chong was formally responsible. Spared punishment by a special edict, he was transferred to the Secretariat and later appointed Minister Herald.

Chen Chong was respected for his classical learning and fine conduct, for revising and clarifying procedures and for distinguished service in many senior offices. In 104 he became Excellency of Works; he died in that office two years later. -HHS 46/36:1547-55*, XC 2: 11a-b, HQ 1:21a-b.

Chen Chong 陳充 [Guangshi 廣世]; Nanyang. A gentleman cadet, in 156 Chen Chong was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Chen Chu 陳楚; Pei. A modest man, Chen Chu was a Consultant under Emperor Guangwu. -XC 7:8b-9a.

Chen Cong 陳從 see Chencong 陳從.

Chen Cong 陳琮; Xiapi. Younger son of Chen Qiu, during the 190s Chen Cong was Administrator of Ruyin 汝陰, a new commandery established by Cao Cao from the county of that name in Runan. -HHS 56/46:1835.

Chen Da 陳達 (d.125). A eunuch Prefect of the Palace Gardens in the time of Emperor An, Chen Da became a close associate of the Empress Yan and her family. He obtained great influence at court and was promoted Regular Attendant.

When the Little Emperor Liu Yi died late in 125, Chen Da sought to assist the concealment of his death until a new selection could be made among other cadets of the imperial clan. At this time, however, the eunuch Sun Cheng led a coup to restore Liu Bao to the succession. As their first move, the conspirators attacked and killed Chen Da, Jiang Jing and other members of the rival party. -HHS 78/68:2514-15.

Chen Dan 陳耽 [Hangong 漢公] (d.185); Donghai. In 174 Chen Dan was raised from Minister of Ceremonies to be Grand Commandant, but left that office two years later and was again Minister of Ceremonies. At the end of 177 he became Excellency of Works, but again left office five months later.

In the winter of 181 Chen Dan was promoted a third time from Minister of Ceremonies, to be Excellency over the Masses. Soon afterwards an edict was issued that common songs and rhymes among the people should be checked in order to discover which officials were being criticised for abusing their trust. Chen Dan attempted to make an honest report, but his colleagues Xu Yu and Zhang Ji, influenced by the palace eunuchs, took bribes to protect their relatives, and instead made accusations against twenty-six worthy officials from distant and frontier commanderies. When these men came to the capital to protest, Chen Dan and the Consultant Cao Cao supported their claims, and Emperor Ling appointed all the appellants as Consultants.

A few weeks later Chen Dan again left office. Though he was admired for loyalty and honesty, his career demonstrates the frequency of change at the highest level of the bureaucracy, and its consequent weakness against the eunuchs. In 185, moreover, Chen Dan was slandered by the eunuchs. He was sent to the Northern Prison of the Yellow Gates, which was under their control, and was tortured until he died. -HHS 57/47:1851.

Chen Dao 陳導; Guangling. Intendant of Henan about 175, Chen Dao joined in the erection of a stele at the temple of the ancient and worthy hermits Boyi 伯夷 and Shuqi 叔齊 at Shouyang Mountain. -SJZ 5:3a.

Chen Dao 陳到 [Shuzhi 叔至]; Runan. Chen Dao joined Liu Bei when he was in Yu province during the mid-190s, and followed him thereafter. Noted for loyalty and courage, in the time of Liu Shan the Second Sovereign Chen Dao became Area Commander on the Yangzi Gorges, with rank as a general and enfeoffment as a marquis. -SGZ Shu 15:1084.

Chen De 陳德 [Bo? 伯?]. In 171 a stele was set up in honour of this former official. It survives now only in a fragmentary transcription. -LHJSJ 16:19b-22a.

Chen Deng 陳登 [Yuanlong 元龍]; Xiapi. Son of Chen Gui, Chen Deng was also a substantial scholar, with a high standard of morality and ability as a leader both in civil and military affairs. He became a magistrate in Guangling and in the early 190s Tao Qian appointed him Colonel in Charge of Agriculture with general authority over farming colonies in Xu province. As Tao Qian died in 194 he made a death-bed wish that Liu Bei should succeed him as Governor, and Chen Deng was one of those who urged Liu Bei to accept.

After Liu Bei was defeated in 196, Chen Deng became a member of the provincial administration under Lü Bu, but in 197 he persuaded Lü Bu to send him as an envoy to the puppet court of Han at Xu city. There he agreed plans with Cao Cao to deal with Lü Bu, then went back and established himself as Administrator of Guangling. Chen Deng and his father Chen Gui concealed their true intentions, but when Cao Cao attacked Lü Bu in 198 Chen Deng brought troops to join him.

For his role in the destruction of Lü Bu, Chen Deng was given title as a general while still Administrator in Guangling. He put down piracy there, and was then engaged in a long campaign of intrigue and warfare against Sun Ce and then Sun Quan south of the Yangzi. He was eventually obliged to move north into Xiapi and abandon his positions along the Yangzi.

Some time after 200 Chen Deng was taken ill with severe stomach cramps. The celebrated doctor Hua Tuo gave him medicine and he vomited up several large worms. Hua Tuo warned him that the condition would recur and he would need similar treatment. This proved to be the case, but at that time Chen Deng was unable to consult Hua Tuo or any other good physician, and so he died. He was at that time aged thirty-nine sui.

In memory of Chen Deng's achievements, Cao Pi appointed his descendant Chen Su a gentleman cadet. -SGZ 7:229-31*, 29:801, Wu 1:1111, HHS 82/72B:2738, XC 3:8a; Ngo 76:120, DeWoskin 83:144.

Chen Du 陳篤; Nanyang. Son of Chen Zhuanzhu, he succeeded to the family fief in Jiangxia. -HHS 18/8:691.

Chen Du 陳度 [Miaogao 妙高] (d.185); Chen. Two years after Chen Du's death, a stele was set up in his memory. The text of the inscription survives only in fragments. -LS 25:25a-b, LX 19:8b-9b.

Chen Duan 陳端 (d.184); Runan. In 184 Chen Duan was Registrar to the Administrator Zhao Qian. When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out the commandery militia was defeated. Chen Duan and six other officers shielded Zhao Qian with their own bodies, and though they were all killed he was able to escape. An edict ordered that the gates of each of the officers' homes should be inscribed in honour of the "Seven Heroes" 七賢. -HHS 45/35:1527.

Chen Duan 陳端 [Zizheng 子正]; Guangling. During the late 190s Chen Duan and his fellow-countrymen Zhang Hong and Qin Song were advisers to Sun Ce. Chen Duan died about 200. -SGZ Wu 1:1104, Wu 8: 1247.

Chen Dun 陳敦; Donghai. In 169 Chen Dun was nominated as Knowing the Way. He came to court, responded to questions, and was appointed a gentleman cadet. -HHS 57/47:1858.

Chen Dun 陳敦 of Hanzhong; see Cheng Dun 程敦.

Chen Fan 陳蕃 [Zhongju 仲舉] (d.168); Runan. Chen Fan was born during the 90s. His father was a county magistrate and his grandfather became Administrator of Hedong, but the personal names of both men are unknown. At the age of fifteen Chen Fan was staying with his grandfather in Hedong when his father's friend Xue Qin came to visit. He observed that the courtyard of the residence was littered and overgrown, but Chen Fan replied that when a gentleman serves the government, his responsibility is to keep the whole empire clean and he has no time to care for his own house. Xue Qin recognised Chen Fan's fine ambitions and was deeply impressed.

Joining the commandery staff of Runan in the early 120s, Chen Fan served as a model to others and was later appointed Officer of Merit. In the early 130s he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet at the capital, but left when his mother died.

Chen Fan was later persuaded to take appointment as Attendant Officer to Zhou Jing the Inspector of Yu province, but then resigned because of disagreements. Though he was invited to join the offices of the Excellencies at the capital and was nominated Sincere and Upright, he refused in each case.

About 146, however, Chen Fan accepted a recommendation from the Grand Commandant Li Gu. He was appointed a Consultant, and then became Administrator of Le'an. The rigorous official Li Ying was Inspector of Qing province, and many heads of commanderies left office rather than face investigation, but Chen Fan remained with a clear conscience and a clear record. At the same time, he made a point of inviting the celebrated local gentleman Zhou Qiu. Other administrators had done so before, without success, but Zhou Qiu called upon Chen Fan and they spoke to one another on intimate terms. On the other hand, Chen Fan demonstrated his ability to discern false pretences, notably by his rejection of the allegedly filial Zhao Xuan, who had bred five children while claiming to maintain twenty years' mourning for his parents.

Some time later the General-in-Chief Liang Ji sent a letter to Chen Fan with some request, but the messenger sought an audience under false pretences; Chen Fan was furious and had him flogged to death. He was demoted to be a magistrate in Henei, but soon afterwards transferred to the Imperial Secretariat in Luoyang.

About this time there was trouble from bandits in the hill country of Lingling and Guiyang. The senior officials recommended they be attacked, and also that a special recruitment of nominees for office be called from commandery and provincial officials. Chen Fan argued that military force was inappropriate against the common people, who should be regarded as the children of the emperor, while there were sufficient cadets and clerical officers at the capital to fill any necessary positions: the truly important matter was to check those in office and those who were appointed, to ensure they were of suitable quality. His arguments were against government policy at the time, and about 156 he was sent out to be Administrator of Yuzhang.

As soon as he arrived in his territory, even before entering his office, Chen Fan went to pay his respects to the local worthy Xu Zhi, invited him to become his Officer of Merit, and kept a special couch for him. Otherwise, however, considering the commandery only semi-civilised, he kept aloof and received few guests. The people were in awe of his high standards, and when he left office his farewell escort ventured with him only to the gates of the commandery city.

After the fall of Liang Ji in 159, Chen Fan returned to the capital and was appointed Director of the Imperial Secretariat under the personal government of Emperor Huan. He recommended Xu Zhi and four other scholars-recluse, Jiang Gong, Yuan Hong, Wei Zhu and Li Tan, but none would accept the imperial summons. Chen Fan then became Minister Herald, but was dismissed and sent back to his home country when he sought to defend the presumptuous magistrate Li Yun.

In the following year Chen Fan returned to the capital as a Consultant, and a few days later he was named Minister of the Household. He sent in a memorial protesting the great numbers of women in the imperial harem and against the numerous enfeoffments granted to relatives of the Empress Deng, particularly that of the emperor's personal friend Deng Wanshi. Some of the surplus women were sent away, while Deng Wanshi received a lesser fief than was originally intended.

In 163 Chen Fan repeated his strictures against the ruler's extravagance, this time criticising his hunting parties and the corvée labour required to support them. The memorial was rejected. At the same time, as minister in charge of the gentlemen at court, Chen Fan worked with his subordinate the General of the Household Huang Wan to review those nominated as cadets, and without concern for wealth or influence. Their policy offended the eunuchs and the imperial relatives by marriage of the Deng clan, and both men were dismissed. [FSTY 7:56 records two incidents when Chen Fan was harassed or treated discourteously by local officials.]

In 165, following the fall of the Empress Deng and the disgrace of a number of Emperor Huan's eunuch associates, Chen Fan again returned to office. He first became Deputy Director of the Secretariat, then a Palace Counsellor, and in the autumn he was appointed Grand Commandant, highest position of the bureaucracy. It is said that he sought to cede the honour to Hu Guang, Wang Chang or Li Ying, the last of whom was currently a convict, but the emperor insisted that he take the post.

It is probable that Chen Fan's elevation reflected the ruler's weakened political position and the pressure he was under from the reform party of gentry officials, and Chen Fan argued strongly that the well-born Lady Dou should be appointed as consort rather than the emperor's own favourite concubine Tian. The Lady Dou was duly made empress that winter, her father Dou Wu received honours and status at court, and about the same time Li Ying, long-time enemy of the eunuchs, became Director of Retainers and began a purge of the former favourites. As the reform party gathered strength, the students of the University and junior officers at the capital praised Chen Fan in the same terms as Li Ying and Wang Chang, and he held highest grading, with Dou Wu and the retiring official Liu Shu, in the lists of popular heroes.

For his part, Chen Fan gave firm support to the fierce Chancellor of Donghai, Huang Fu, and the Administrator of Shanyang Zhai Zhao, who had been sentenced to convict service for their attacks on eunuchs and their followers. First in association with the Excellency Liu Mao, and then with a memorial of his own, he argued that though the men might have acted strictly outside the law, their fine intentions justified any excesses. The emperor rejected this, and the eunuchs for their part recognised Chen Fan as their enemy: they frequently had his recommendations rejected and had him reprimanded on several occasions. Though some of his clerical staff were punished, however, Chen Fan was too well known and popular for a direct attack.

When the First Faction Incident broke out in 166 Chen Fan attempted to halt the investigation of Li Ying and his associates, arguing that they were some of the most loyal men in the empire. Determined in his anger, however, Emperor Huan insisted the men be arrested, and when Chen Fan continued his protest he was dismissed on charges of having brought unworthy men to office. Dou Wu, father of the empress, praised him as one of the finest officials of the empire, but Chen Fan remained out of office until the death of Emperor Huan at the end of 167.

At the beginning of the following year, as the Empress Dou, now Dowager, took power as regent and Dou Wu became General-in-Chief, Chen Fan was appointed Grand Tutor to the young Emperor Ling and shared control of the Secretariat with Dou Wu and the Excellency Hu Guang; in practice he and Dou Wu controlled the government. On the other hand, while Dou Wu and his relatives, with Cao Jie and other eunuchs, took fiefs for themselves as reward for establishing the emperor, Chen Fan refused all such offers, on the grounds that his virtue and achievements were insufficient.

The new regime was greeted with joy and hope by the reform party, and the men formerly accused of Faction, including Li Ying, Du Mi, Yin Xun and Liu Yu, were brought back to office. Over the months which followed, however, the eunuchs regained their influence within the palace, and the Dowager began to accept their advice against that of her father and Chen Fan. A number of proposals were rejected, and the reformers became increasingly impatient. By the summer Chen Fan had persuaded Dou Wu to use the portent of an eclipse to seek the expulsion of all senior eunuchs, and when the Dowager refused Guan Ba and Su Kang were individually arrested and put to death. In autumn, a movement of the planet Venus inspired Liu Yu to warn of further danger, and the reformers returned to the attack. Several more eunuchs were arrested, and Chen Fan and Dou Wu agreed upon a general purge of Cao Jie and his fellows.

On the night of 25 October, however, the eunuchs struck first. Killing their immediate opponents, they persuaded the young emperor there was a threat to his throne, and they forced the Secretariat to draw up orders for the arrest of Dou Wu and his supporters. Dou Wu withdrew to the camp of the Northern Army, where he was later faced down and killed by troops loyal to the eunuchs. Chen Fan, more directly, led eighty of his clerks against the Northern Palace. They fought their way as far as the entrance to the Secretariat, but there faced a troop of guards led by the eunuch Wang Fu. After a brief struggle the eighty-year-old minister was overpowered and killed.

As the eunuchs took control of the government, members of Chen Fan's family and household were exiled to the far south, and other kinsmen, clients, students and those who had served under him were dismissed and proscribed from office. Chen Fan's body was collected and buried by Zhu Zhen, who also saved his son Chen Yi at the cost of his own life. -HHS 66/56:2159-71*, XC 4:2b-5a; , Mather 76:504, deC 89:18-102.

Chen Feng 陳奉. Administrator of Wuling in 163, Chen Feng defeated a raid by the local non-Chinese people. -HHS 7:312, 86/76:2834.

Chen Feng 陳鳳. An officer of Liu Bei stationed by the Yangzi Gorges in Jing province, Chen Feng was attacked and captured by Lu Xun's forces in 219. -SGZ Wu 13:1345.

Chen Fu 陳副. About 24 Chen Fu was Registrar to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time commissioner to the north. When a boy of Liu Xiu's household offended the law, the disciplinary officer Zhai Zun investigated and executed him. Liu Xiu was furious, and had Zhai Zun arrested, but Chen Fu persuaded him that strict attention to the law was valuable to the new regime, and so Zhai Zun was pardoned and appointed as an inspector in the army.

At the beginning of 26 Chen Fu, now a Commandant of Cavalry, was sent with the general Deng Long to summon Liu Yang, the discontented King of Zhending. Liu Yang barred his gates against them, but the imperial commissioner Geng Chun enticed Liu Yang and his kinsmen to a meeting and had them arrested and killed. -HHS 20/10:738, 21/11:763-64; Bn 59:122-123.

Chen Fu 陳浮; Nanyang. Son of Chen Jun, at the death of his father in 47 Chen Fu succeeded to his marquisate in Pingyuan. In 54 the county was incorporated into the fief of Liu Kang, King of Ji'nan, and Chen Fu's fief was transferred to Jiangxia. -HHS 18/8:691.

Chen Gang 陳綱 [Zhongqing 仲卿]; Hanzhong. A man of family, Chen Gang studied in Nanyang, but returned home for his mother's funeral. When his colleague Zhang Zong was killed by a certain Liu Yuan, however, he left the mourning to return to Nanyang and avenge him. He then presented himself to the authorities, but there was an amnesty soon afterwards and he was released.

Chen Gang was promptly recommended as Abundant Talent by all the Excellencies at Luoyang. Appointed Administrator of Hongnong, he settled a family quarrel as soon as he arrived, and no further cases were brought to his court. After nine years in that office he died, and the imperial government granted 400,000 cash to his family. -HYGZ 10C:167.

Chen Gong 陳躬; Pei. Son of Chen Qin 欽, Chen Gong was a grandson of Chen Xian 咸, who was expert in the law of Former Han: QHX:30, 37. After the restoration of the dynasty Chen Gong became an officer in the Ministry of Justice, but died soon afterwards. -HHS 46/36:1548.

Chen Gong 陳恭; Jiangxia. During the 180s Chen Gong and his fellow-countryman Li Tong were leaders of fighting men operating in the area between the Yangzi and Runan commandery. A certain Zhou Zhi, who controlled another group, was seen as a rival, and Li Tong, despite Chen Gong's concerns, killed him. Chen Gong and Li Tong then killed Zhou Zhi's subordinate commanders and shared his followers between themselves.

Chen Gong was later killed by his brother-in-law Chen He, who took over his command, but Li Tong then attacked Chen He, killed him in turn, and combined his troops with his own. -SGZ 18:534-35.

Chen Gong 陳宮 [Gongtai 公臺] (d.198); Dong. In 192 Chen Gong was an officer under Cao Cao when Liu Dai the Inspector of Yan province was killed by Yellow Turbans. Himself a native of the province, he persuaded the local leaders to invite Cao Cao to become Governor.

In 194, ambitious and unsure of his favour, Chen Gong joined a plot against Cao Cao while he was engaged with Tao Qian in Xu province, inviting Lü Bu to take over Chen Gong became adviser to Lü Bu, but Lü Bu paid him small attention, and by the following year Cao Cao had retaken the province.

In 198 Cao Cao captured Lü Bu and Chen Gong at Xiapi. Cao Cao had been fond of Chen Gong: he killed him for his disloyalty, but looked after his family. - SGZ 1:9-10, 7:221-29, HHS 75/65:2446-52.

Chen Gongsì 陳公思; Runan. About 140 Chen Gongsì was a senior clerk in the commandery. Another clerk, Wang Ziyou, had formerly been a county official and in the course of an investigation he tortured and killed Chen Gongsì's uncle Chen Bin. As Chen Bin had no sons, Chen Gongsì felt obliged to avenge him, and he killed Wang Ziyou at a dinner. He then went to give himself up at the commandery offices, but the Administrator Hu Guang admired his sense of honour and allowed him to escape. - FSTY 3f:107-08.

Chen Guang 陳光. A Palace Attendant in 124, Chen Guang joined the group led by Lai Li at the palace Gate of the Vast Capital to protest the dismissal of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. The demonstrators achieved no success, but their support was recognised, and after Liu Bao was brought to the throne at the end of 125, Chen Guang and his colleagues were rewarded with high office and were granted the ren right to nominate their sons as cadet gentlemen. - HHS 15/5:591-93.

Chen Guang 陳光; Yingchuan. One of six sons of Chen Shi, Chen Guang was a brother of Chen Ji and Chen Chen. - XTS 71B:2334.

Chen Gui 陳龜. In the time of Emperor An, Chen Gui was a member of the Imperial Secretariat. - XC 2:15a.

Chen Gui 陳龜 [Shuzhen 叔珍]; Shangdang. Several generations of Chen Gui's family served on the northern frontier, celebrated for their archery and horsemanship and for their bravery. Chen Gui himself was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and about 135 the General-in-Chief Liang Shang recruited him to his staff. He later became Administrator of Wuyuan.

When the Xiongnu chieftains Wusi and Che'niu rebelled in 140, the court sent a reprimand to the Shanyu Xiuli for failing to maintain order among his people. The elderly Shanyu had no involvement with the rebellion, but his writ was of small moment to his nominal subjects. Xiuli duly paid a visit of apology to the Emissary Liang Bing, but Liang Bing left office soon afterwards and Chen Gui succeeded him.

Chen Gui took a stronger line, bullying the Shanyu. He presumably wanted to have the Xiongnu leadership play a more active role against the rebels, but Xiuli was humiliated and squeezed between the demands of the Chinese and his own weakness and lack of authority. Under such pressure the Shanyu committed suicide, together with his younger brother, the Worthy King of the Left, who would have inherited the throne; the traditional leadership of the Xiongnu thus fell into limbo. Chen Gui also attempted to have the Shanyu's close family and kinsmen move to the south, but this made the Xiongnu even more uncertain and encouraged the general unrest. Chen Gui was dismissed and sent to prison.

Returning to office later, Chen Gui became Intendant of Jingzhao. He used firm measures to restrain the powerful local families which had been oppressing poorer people, and he also had his officers care for the sick.

In 158 there was trouble along the frontier with the Southern Xiongnu, the Xianbi and the Wuhuan, and in the winter Chen Gui was sent back to the north as General on the Liao. In contrast to his former stance against the Shanyu Xiuli, he now presented an eloquent memorial in defence of the non-Chinese people. He observed that the land of the north was poor and barren, and there had been several years of flood and insect plagues. Besides this, the imperial administrators, emissaries and protectors who dealt with the non-Chinese were either insensitive or actively corrupt. He urged a purge of these officials, and greater leniency for the people.

His proposals were accepted, several men were dismissed, and the court authorised Chen Gui to grant a year's relief of taxation and labour service. As he carried out this program his authority was respected throughout the north, and he reduced official expenses to save billions of cash each year. We may observe that the military regime of the General on the Liao was now responsible for much of the administration on the frontier, including taxation and labour service, which were usually civilian concerns.

Despite, or perhaps because of Liang Shang's former patronage of Chen Gui, his son Liang Ji had an old quarrel with him. Accusing him of having harmed the dignity of the state by his leniency, taking credit for other's achievements, and giving the Xiongnu no cause to respect him, he had Chen Gui recalled.

Chen Gui asked permission to retire from official life on the grounds of age, but he was appointed instead to the Imperial Secretariat. From that position he sent in an account of Liang Ji's wrongdoing and called for him to be executed. Emperor Huan was in no position to take action at that time, and Chen Gui knew Liang Ji would take revenge. He refused food for seven days and starved to death. We are told that all the non-Chinese and common people of the frontier and the Western Regions mourned him and offered sacrifice to his tomb. *-HHS 51/41:1692-94, 89/79:2960; deC 84:307-308, 89:4-7.

Chen Gui 陳規; Guanghan. Nephew of the Lady Chen Shunqian, Chen Gui wrote a commemorative work on her long life as a devoted widow. -HYGZ 10C:172.

Chen Gui 陳珪 [Hanyu 漢瑜]; Xiapi. A nephew of Chen Qiu and a cousin of Chen Yu, in the time of Emperor Ling Chen Gui was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a county magistrate in Beihai. He left that post, but was nominated again as Abundant Talent, and became Chancellor of Jibei and then of Pei.

Chen Gui was an old acquaintance of Yuan Shu, and when Yuan Shu claimed the imperial title in 197 he took one of his sons as hostage and summoned him to join his court. Chen Gui refused. He also persuaded Lü Bu in Yan province to reject a marriage alliance, and had him attack Yuan Shu.

Chen Gui was similarly concerned about Lü Bu, and had his son Chen Deng make a secret agreement against him with Cao Cao. By the time Cao Cao came to the final attack in 198 Chen Gui had left active politics, but Chen Deng followed his plans. -HHS 56/46:1835, XC 3:8a, SGZ 7:229-30.

Chen He 陳郃. Brother-in-law of the fighting man Chen Gong, who operated in the region of Runan during the 180s, Chen He killed him and took over his command. Li Tong, an old associate of Chen Gong, attacked Chen He, killed him in turn, and combined his troops with his own. -SGZ 18:535.

Chen Heng 陳恆 (fl. 20?); Yingchuan. XTS 71B:2334 traces the descent of Chen Heng from Chen Zhen 軫, minister of the ancient state of Qin. Chen Heng is described as a great-great-grandfather of Chen Shi, but no member of the lineage distinguished himself until the middle of the second century.

Chen Hong 陳弘/宏; Ba. Administrator of Shanggu, in 154 Chen Hong supported the report of Dan Wang the Administrator of Ba commandery, his homeland, on the difficulty of maintaining control over long distances, recommending that the commandery should be divided into smaller units. The court did not agree. -HYGZ 1:6.

Chen Huai 陳淮 see Cheng Huai 程淮.

Chen Huiqian 陳惠謙, the Lady; Guanghan. Younger sister of Chen Shunqian, the Lady married Zhang Liangze. When he was Administrator of Youfufeng there was a proposal to increase the regulations, but the Lady argued that it was more important to extend education and morality than to complicate the laws.

The Lady also dissuaded her nephew Chen Bosi from his interest in techniques for acquiring immortality, and her uncle Chen Ya praised her wisdom. -HYGZ 10C:172.]

Chen Huang 陳晃; Pei. Reporting Officer of his commandery in 175, Chen Huang joined the gentleman cadet Feng Guang in a proposal to alter the base year (Sivin 69:59: "working epoch") of the current official calendar in order to accord with the apocrypha. Their arguments were forcefully opposed by the great scholar Cai Yong. -HHS 92/2:3037-42.

Chen Ji 陳箕; Runan. A local officer of Chen kingdom in 159, he arranged the erection of stele in praise of Chancellor Wang. -LS 20:12a-b.

Chen Ji 陳紀 [Yuanfang 元方]; Yingchuan. Son of Chen Shi and similarly celebrated for his virtues, Chen Ji was barred from office during the Great Proscription. He used the time to compile the Chenzi 陳子, a work which is now lost. It is said that he was among those who approved the extended mourning of the time, which involved men who were often only most marginally connected to the bereaved [FSTY 3:22].

When the Proscription ended in 184 Chen Ji received several invitations to the offices at the capital but refused all of them, and when his father died in 187 he collapsed, vomited blood and showed utmost physical distress. The Inspector of the province honoured this conduct and had Chen Ji's portrait, together with that of his father Shi and his younger brother Chen, sent throughout his territory as an inspiration to public morality. [Shishuo xinyu, however, has a story in which the judge of character Guo Tai rejects Chen Ji's show of mourning when he found him wearing an embroidered cloth: Mather 76:276.]

In 188 Chen Ji was invited again, with a special summons and an official carriage sent by the General-in-Chief He Jin. He became a General of the Household, Palace Attendant at Luoyang and then Chancellor of Pingyuan. In 190 as he came to report to the regime under Dong Zhuo, he angered him by questioning the move of the capital to Chang'an; he was too distinguished for Dong Zhuo to harm. There was some talk of making him an Excellency, but Chen Ji foresaw the coming troubles and would not take the office.

Chen Ji returned to Pingyuan, but in 190 the Inspector Jiao He died, Yellow Turban rebels occupied much of the province, and the warlords Yuan Shao and Gongsun Zan began to contest the territory. Unwilling to risk his people's lives in such a conflict, Chen Ji resigned his office and took refuge in Xu province. He was followed by many of the people, and he and his son Chen Qun later joined Lü Bu.

HHS 62/52 says that Chen Ji received an imperial letter naming him Minister Coachman. His memorial stele does not mention this, but says that he persuaded Lü Bu to break his alliance with Yuan Shu in 197, and as a reward the court named him Director of the Secretariat. HHS 62/52 agrees about that office, but makes no mention of his involvement with the failed alliance, while the biography of Lü Bu in SGZ 7:224, ascribes the advice to Chen Gui. The confusion cannot be resolved. Again, HHS 62/52 and Xie Cheng say that Yuan Shao offered to cede his title as Grand Commandant to Chen Ji, presumably in 196, but Chen Ji refused; this seems unlikely, for Chen Ji was at that time still with Lü Bu.

When Cao Cao destroyed Lü Bu in 198, he appointed both Chen Ji and Chen Qun to office. Chen Ji became Minister Herald at the Han court under Cao Cao, but died in the following year.

During his short time with Cao Cao, Chen Ji put forward a proposal to restore mutilating punishments in place of flogging. In the time of Emperor Wen of Former Han, mutilation had been commuted to strokes of the bastinado, but though the change had been intended well, those who suffered such beatings very often died; simple execution was in practice kinder. Chen Ji's arguments were not accepted. -*HHS 62/52:2067-68 & JJ at 2247-48 Shen Qinhan quoting the stele inscription by Handan Chun q.v. preserved in Gujin yuan 古今苑 [this more contemporary source is preferable to the biography in HHS], XC 3:12b-13a, SGZ 22:634, JS 30:921; Mather 76:503, deC 96:458. Shishuo xinyu has several anecdotes describing Chen Ji's intelligence.

Chen Jiao 陳矯 (fl. 25) see Chen Qiao 陳矯.

Chen Jiao 陳矯 [Jibi 季弼] (d.237); Guangling. About 190 Chen Jiao fled the troubles in his native commandery and took refuge in Xiapi. He received invitations to office from both Yuan Shu and Sun Ce, but returned to Guangling and became Officer of Merit to the Administrator Chen Deng.

Having been on several missions to Cao Cao at Xu city, Chen Jiao was appointed to the offices of the Excellencies some time after 200. He became a county magistrate in Pei, served on the staff of Cao Ren in Jing province, and was later head of Pengcheng commandery in the southeast, then of the newly-established Leling 樂陵 near the mouth of the Yellow River.

In 213 Chen Jiao was named Commandant of the Western Region of Wei commandery, enlarged to serve as Cao Cao's ducal fief. Promoted to Administrator, he simplified the laws and applied them more humanely. On one occasion a man was arrested for sacrificing an ox as an offering on behalf of his sick father. He was liable to execution for such extravagance, but Chen Jiao noted that his fault was caused by filial piety, and let him go.

Joining Cao Cao's personal staff, Chen Jiao accompanied him on campaign against Liu Bei in Hanzhong in 219, then entered the Imperial Secretariat. When Cao Cao died at Luoyang in 220 Chen Jiao aided the succession of Cao Pi, then took part in the process which led to the abdication of Han in favour of Wei. He was enfeoffed and became Director of the Secretariat, serving Cao Pi and Cao Rui, under which latter he achieved great influence. He died in office as Excellency over the Masses. -SGZ 22:642-44*; Mather 76:504.

SGZ 22:644 PC quotes the Weishi chunqiu by Sun Sheng of the fourth century saying that Chen Jiao was born into the Liu surname, but was adopted out. He later married a woman of his birth-clan. His fellow-countryman Xu Xuan disapproved of this on moral grounds, and Chen Jiao was threatened with prosecution. Cao Cao, however, issued an ordinance to pardon all such cases which antedated the year 200.

Chen Jin 陳禁 [Ziya 子雅]. An officer of the Imperial Secretariat, Chen Jin was treated with tolerance and favour by the emperor. -XC 7:9a.

Chen Jin 陳覲 see Cheng Jin 程覲.

Chen Jing 陳景 (d.148); Chen. In 148 Chen Jing styled himself the son of the Yellow Emperor 黃帝子 [a variant edition has 皇帝子 "son of an emperor," but this appears less likely]. Chen Jing and his colleague Guan Bo set up a rebel government, but they were swiftly destroyed. -HHS 7:293.

Chen Jiu 陳就 (d.208). An officer under Huang Zu, Chen Jiu commanded a squadron of his fleet on the Yangzi. During the final assault by Sun Quan's forces, Chen Jiu was sent out on a sortie, but he was defeated and killed by Lü Meng. -SGZ Wu 9:1273.

Chen Jun 陳俊 [Zizhao 子昭] (d.47); Nanyang. Chen Jun studied for a time at Chang'an when he was young, then held local office in his home commandery. As the Han rebellion broke out against Wang Mang, Chen Jun joined up and was appointed Chief Clerk to Liu Jia, a general of the Gengshi Emperor.

In 24 Liu Jia sent Chen Jun with a letter of recommendation to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, at that time commissioner in the north, and Liu Xiu took him onto his staff. He joined the campaigns against the Bronze Horse bandits north of the Yellow River and the Red Eyebrows in Dong commandery, and he was appointed a lieutenant-general commanding an elite unit of crossbowmen. In one engagement with the Wuxiao bandits in Bohai, Chen Jun dismounted to fight hand-to-hand. None could stand against him, he led the pursuit for ten kilometres and came back with the enemy chieftain's head. Liu Xiu watched from afar and remarked with admiration, "If all my officers were like that, I would have no problems!"

The Wuxiao retreated north into Yuyang, but plundered as they went. Chen Jun suggested light horsemen be sent to overtake them, to warn of their approach and encourage the local people to prepare defences. Liu Xiu approved the plan and gave command of this advance guard to Chen Jun. As a result, the bandits found that the people were either ready to defend themselves or had gone into hiding, leaving nothing for them to take. They scattered and were defeated in detail.

Chen Jun was promoted to full general, and when Liu Xiu took the throne in 25 he enfeoffed him as a marquis. Soon afterwards Chen Jun accompanied Jing Dan and Geng Yan to seize the Ao Granary in Henan. Defeating the local warlord Liu Mao, they forced his surrender, then dealt with his renegade troops. So the way was opened to Luoyang and Chang'an.

At the beginning of 26 Chen Jun was sent against bandits in Chenliu. He restored order in four counties there, and settled three more in Dong commandery. His fief was changed to a county in Zhongshan and in the autumn, on the recommendation of the Grand Marshal Wu Han, he was sent to suppress the Jinmen and Boma bandits in the hills of Henei.

In 28 Chen Jun was sent southeast to deal with another group of rebels on the upper Huai River in the south of Runan, and he then marched north and east across the Ru and Ying Rivers into Taishan. Though the account in his biography is summary, the campaign extended five hundred kilometres diagonally across the southern plain, and represented a major accession of territory to imperial control.

At this time the leading men of Taishan were active supporters of the Shandong warlord Zhang Bu. Wu Han persuaded Emperor Guangwu that Chen Jun was the one man who could bring them to accept his rule. Chen Jun was therefore appointed Administrator, acting as a chief general, and was ordered to assist Geng Yan in operations against Zhang Bu. As Chen Jun moved north to join the main army, Zhang Bu sent troops against him, but he defeated them and drove them away. He forced the surrender of all the county cities in the commandery, and took the seals of ninety officials appointed by Zhang Bu.

Chen Jun then brought his men north to join Geng

Yan in Ji'nan, and he accompanied the campaigns which defeated Zhang Bu in 29. During the critical battle at Linzi, he urged delay until Guangwu arrived with the imperial army; his cautious advice was rejected and Geng Yan gained a complete victory.

Early in 30 Chen Jun was named Administrator of Langye, still with status as a general. He had a great reputation across eastern China, and as he entered his new territory the local bandits and insurgents melted away. The warlord Dong Xian, driven from his base in Donghai by the attacks of Wu Han, came into Langye and took the southern city of Ganyu by surprise, but Chen Jun swiftly recaptured the place. Dong Xian fled into the marshlands and was killed by an officer of Wu Han, while Chen Jun advanced into Donghai and dealt with the bandit Sun Yang, evidently an associate of Dong Xian.

In 32 the former warlord Zhang Bu escaped from Luoyang and sought to re-establish himself in the east, but Chen Jun attacked and killed him. Admiring his achievements, Guangwu sent an imperial letter granting Chen Jun authority over all military operations in the eastern provinces of Qing and Xu. As both were now largely settled, his chief concern was to avoid conflict with commandery and county authorities, while arranging for care of the weak and recommending men who had shown good quality. The local people sang his praises, but Chen Jun sought a more active life, and wrote several times to the emperor asking for command against Gongsun Shu in the west. Guangwu replied that the work in the east was of great importance, for the territory was only recently settled and needed a period of stability.

In 37 Chen Jun's fief was increased and he was made Marquis of Zhu'a county in Pingyuan, scene of one of the early battles against Zhang Bu. In the following year he was granted the title Servant at Court, permitting him to reside at the capital, and it would appear that he retired to Luoyang some time before his death in 47. Recognising Chen Jun as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 18/8:689-91*, 12/2:497, 22/12:789-91; Bn 76:26, Bn 79:82.

Chen Kan 陳堪. A local officer of his commandery, when the Administrator was summonsed to the Ministry of Justice at the capital on account of some fault, Chen Kan mutilated and poisoned himself. -XC 7:6b.

Chen Kang 陳康. In 24 Chen Kang was Administrator of Wei for the Gengshi Emperor in 24. When Xie Gong went to attack the Youlai bandits in Henei he left Chen Kang and the general Liu Qing in charge at Ye city. Though they were supposed to be allies, Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, ordered Wu Han and Cen Peng to take Ye. Wu Han sent an envoy who persuaded Chen Kang to change sides. Chen Kang arrested Liu Qing and seized Xie Gong's family, then opened the gates to Wu Han. As Xie Gong came unsuspecting into the city, Wu Han killed him. -HHS 18/8:677-78.

Chen Kui 陳夔; Yingchuan. One of six sons of Chen Shi, Chen Kui was a brother of Chen Ji and Chen Chen. -XTS 71B:2334.

Chen Lan 陳蘭 or Chen Jian 簡 (d.209); Lujiang. Officers of Yuan Shu, in 199 Chen Lan and his colleague Lei Pu were in the hills of Lujiang, east of present-day Anhui. As his state collapsed, Yuan Shu came to them for refuge, but they drove him away.

In the following year Chen Lan, Lei Xu [probably Lei Pu again] and Mei Cheng were plundering between the Yangzi and the Huai, but Cao Cao sent Liu Fu as Inspector, and he arranged a measure of control and agreement.

Chen Lan and Mei Cheng continued to operate in Lujiang, and after Cao Cao's defeat at the Red Cliffs in 208 they established a loose alliance with Sun Quan, south of the Yangzi. In that year, as Cao Cao brought his main army across the Huai against Sun Quan, he sent detachments under Zhang Liao and Yu Jin to attack them. Mei Cheng made a false surrender to Yu Jin; as Yu Jin withdrew he joined Chen Lan and their combined force took refuge in the hills. Zhang Liao pursued them into the wilderness, attacked their camp, and killed both leaders. -HHS 75/65:2443 [as Chen Jian 陳簡], SGZ 6:209, 15:463, 17:518.

Chen [Liangfu] 陳梁甫. At the end of the second century Chen Liangfu was a celebrated calligrapher. -SGZ Wu 18:1425.

Chen Lin 陳臨 [Ziran 子然 or Zhishu 稚叔?]; Yingchuan? Guangzhou xianxian zhuan, quoted by Miyakawa 60:28, records how Chen Lin, Administrator of Cangwu, rejected the barbarous customs of the southern people amongst whom he lived.

The same text, quoted by Miyakawa 60:32, also tells how the posthumous son of a murdered man took revenge on the killer of his father. Though he was arrested and sentenced to death, the Administrator Chen Lin realised that he had no children. Concerned to emphasise filial piety, he allowed the man's wife to visit him in prison until she became pregnant. She bore him a son, and a popular ditty celebrated Chen Lin's ability to have a dead man maintain his lineage. This second story is also related by XC 6:8b and cited in SGZJJ 13:2a.

SGZJJ 13 suggests that this Chen Lin may be the same man as Chen Zhishu 稚叔 of Yingchuan, who is described as an Administrator of Cangwu and was compared to Zhong Hao and Xun Shu, exemplary teachers and influential models of good conduct about 160. XC 6, on the other hand, does not identify the native commandery of the worthy Administrator, but gives his style as Ziran 子然. It is not possible to determine which is correct.

Chen Lin 陳琳 [Kongzhang 孔璋] (d.217); Guangling. Recognised as a local scholar and a former student of Cai Yong, Chen Lin became a staff officer to the General-in-Chief He Jin. In 189 he warned He Jin against calling Dong Zhuo and other fighting men to the capital to help against the eunuchs.

Chen Lin later took refuge with Yuan Shao in Ji province, and in 195 Yuan Shao had him write to Zang Hong, as a fellow-countryman of literary talent, in an unsuccessful attempt to persuade him back to allegiance. During the Guandu campaign of 200, Chen Lin composed the proclamation to justify Yuan Shao's attack, and he wrote pamphlets abusing Cao Cao and his family in most extreme terms.

In 204 Chen Lin took part in a fruitless embassy from Yuan Shang to seek terms from Cao Cao.

When Cao Cao took over Ji province in 205, he taxed Chen Lin with his former propaganda, but because he admired his ability, he accepted his apology and appointed him and Ruan Yu as his confidential secretaries, preparing letters and orders.

Chen Lin became a member of the circle of scholars and writers about the young Cao Pi and Cao Zhi, and besides essays and poetry he was responsible for much of the written record of the early history of the state of Wei. He died during the epidemic which afflicted the court in 217. In his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature" Cao Pi praised Chen Lin as one of the Seven Masters of the Jian'an period. -SGZ 21:599-602*, 6:197-99.

Chen Mao 陳茂 (d.23). Senior officials of Wang

Mang, in the spring of 22 Chen Mao and Zhuang You achieved success against the bandit Troops from the Lower Yangzi. Early in 23 they were sent against the Han rebels in Nanyang, but were heavily defeated by Liu Bosheng. In the summer the two men were with the army of Wang Yi; as it was destroyed at the battle of Kunyang, they fled to refuge with Liu Wang in Runan.

In the autumn of 23, after the fall of Wang Mang, Liu Wang took the imperial title in rivalry to the Gengshi Emperor. He named Zhuang You as his Grand Marshal and Chen Mao as Imperial Chancellor. In the winter less than two months later, Liu Wang and his party were attacked and killed by the Gengshi Emperor's general Liu Xin. -HHS 11/1:469-70; Bn 54:112, 75-77, Bn 59:29-35; Dubs 55:430-468, QHX:34.

Chen Mao 陳茂; Nanyang. Guo Liang, uncle of Emperor Guangwu's first empress, died without sons before the Lady Guo had been appointed. Chen Mao, who had married one of Guo Liang's daughters, was enfeoffed in compliment to his late father-in-law. -HHS 10A:403.

Chen Mao 陳茂; Runan. The fragmentary biography of this man in XC 6:13a-b is slightly confused by his association with Zhou Chang 周敞, who is said to have lived in Former Han: Chen Mao is said to have served as Attendant Officer when Zhou Chang was Inspector of Yu province and then accompanied him in the same capacity to Jiaozhi.

Chen Mao is said to have had ability in magical arts, and when Zhou Chang planned to visit the island of Hainan he warned him of the dangers. Zhou Chang nonetheless embarked, and when a storm blew up Chen Mao drew his sword and abused the spirit of the sea. The winds died down and the crossing was completed.

Chen Mao 陳茂 [Junyin 君因]; Runan. Having served in Cangwu, presumably as a magistrate, Chen Mao became Inspector of Jing province about 70. As he came on tour to Nanyang he pleaded the case of Wei Xiu, a former client and family friend who was accused of a capital crime. The Administrator Guan Xun released Wei Xiu, but Wei Xiu was later found guilty of another offence and was executed. The local gentry criticised Chen Mao's mistaken intervention. -FSTY 4:29 [the text is not entirely complete or clear].

Though they came from the same commandery, this is probably not the same man as in the entry above.

Chen Mao 陳髦; Ba. A well-known scholar, about 120 Chen Mao was recommended by the Administrator Wang Tang. He later rose to high position. -HYGZ 1: 9.

Chen Mao 陳茂; Nanyang. Member of a powerful local family in the late second century, Chen Mao slandered the father, Han Chun, and the elder brother of his neighbour Han Ji and almost had them put to death. Han Ji pretended to pay no attention, but he secretly gathered assassins to deal with Chen Mao, then presented his head as a sacrifice to Han Chun's tomb. -SGZ 24:677.

Chen Mu 陳牧 (d.25); Nanyang. In 22 the bandit Troops from Xinshi in Jiangxia, led by Wang Kuang and others, crossed into the south of Nanyang. In response, the commoners Chen Mu and Liao Zhan led their own insurrection, styling themselves the Troops from Pinglin, and joined forces with the newcomers. In the autumn of that year, further to the north, Liu Bosheng, elder brother of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu, raised a rebellion against Wang Mang, and he sent his kinsman Liu Jia to propose an alliance. This was agreed, and Liu Bosheng gained substantial reinforcements. As Bielenstein observes, however, the commoners whose support he was compelled to seek would later be responsible for his loss of the leadership of the movement which he had begun.

The combined force moved against Wan city, capital of Nanyang, but the rebels were heavily defeated at Xiao-Chang'an, south of the city, by a commandery army under Wang Mang's officers Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci. Chen Mu and his colleagues threatened to leave the losing cause, but Liu Bosheng recruited another bandit group, the Troops from the Lower Yangzi, led by Wang Chang, Cheng Dan and Zhang Ang, and the balance against Wang Mang's local forces was restored. In the winter at the beginning of 23 the rebels again fought the army of Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci, and on this occasion they achieved decisive victory and killed both enemy commanders. A few weeks later they defeated another army under Zhuang You and Chen Mao, then advanced to besiege Wan.

At this time, the spring of 23, the leaders of the Troops arranged a coup to depose Liu Bosheng as leader of the rebellion and to proclaim Liu Xuan as [the Gengshi] Emperor. Chen Mu was named Excellency of Works although, as Bielenstein observes, he had no qualifications for such a high administrative position; the title was granted as reward for his support and to maintain his prestige. In 24 the Gengshi Emperor named Chen Mu as king of a county in Nanyang. As Bielenstein points out, the pattern of enfeoffments at this time reflected a setback for the former bandit chieftains as against their rivals of the Nanyang gentry; within a few months Chen Mu had been dismissed from his position as Excellency.

As the Red Eyebrows advanced towards the capital in the first half of 25, Chen Mu, Wang Kuang and others were sent to hold the line in Hongnong and Hedong. At this same time Deng Yu, general of Liu Xiu, entered Hedong and laid siege to its capital Anyi. Chen Mu and others were sent against him, but were heavily defeated and fled back to Chang'an; Deng Yu took over the whole commandery.

Chen Mu was then stationed east of the capital with Wang Kuang and Cheng Dan to face the Red Eyebrows, but then Zhang Ang and other leaders rebelled in Chang'an and the Gengshi Emperor abandoned the city. Suspecting their loyalty, he summoned Chen Mu and Cheng Dan, and executed them. -HHS 11/1:468-74; Bn 54:106-116, Bn 59.97-99.

Chen Mu 陳睦/穆 (d.75). In 75, after Dou Gu had obtained the surrender of the kingdoms of Jushi near Turfan, the government of Later Han restored the office of Protector-General of the Western Regions. Chen Mu, the first incumbent, set his headquarters in Yanqi [Karashar], while his subordinate Wu and Ji Colonels Guan Chong and Geng Gong camped further east in Nearer Jushi by Turfan and in Further Jushi north of the Bogda range. Soon afterwards, however, the Northern Xiongnu returned to Further Jushi, defeated Geng Gong and killed King Ande. The people of Yanqi and Qiuzi [Kuqa] then attacked Chen Mu's headquarters, killed him, and also slaughtered two thousand soldiers and officials. -HHS 2:123, 19/9:721, 88/78:2928, HHJ 10:128.

Chen Mu 陳牧 (d.197). A senior officer under Chen Yu, claimant Administrator of Wu commandery, Chen Mu was killed by Sun Ce's officer Lü Fan. -SGZ Wu 10:1310.

Chen [Pingzi] 陳平子; Changsha. A student at Luoyang, Chen Pingzi became a close friend of Fan Shi. When he contracted a fatal illness he wrote to Fan Shi and told his wife to entrust his body to him, for he was known to be a man who would care for the dead.

Fan Shi indeed carried out ceremonies for his friend and escorted his family back to their home country; he left before anyone could thank him. -HHS 81/71:2678, XC 5:14a-b.

Chen Pu 陳僕; Danyang. Chen Pu and Zu Shan were chieftains of non-Chinese people in the Huang Shan range of southern Danyang. They and their Chinese allies were conquered by He Qi in 208. -SGZ Wu 15: 1378.

Chen Qi 陳齊; Yingchuan. Son of Chen Yuan 願, Chen Qi was father of Chen Yuan 源 and grandfather to Chen Shi. -XTS 71B:2334.

Chen Qi 陳奇. Minister of Finance in 158, Chen Qi recommended Zhao Zi for office. -HHS 39/29:1313.

Chen Qian 陳謙 [Borang 伯讓]; Kuaiji. As Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate, about the middle of the second century, Chen Qian was held in great respect for the manner in which he upheld the law and was consulted on all appointments. On one occasion he was asked whether his fellow-countryman Xuan Feng could become an Excellency, but observed that anyone ambitious for such a responsible post was in fact unworthy of it. -XC 7:12a-b.

Chen Qiao 陳僑 or Chen Jiao 矯. Holding title as White Tiger Duke 白虎公 from the Gengshi Emperor, in 24 Chen Qiao was posted with other generals to guard Luoyang under the command of Zhu Wei. At the end of 25 he was forced to surrender by Guangwu's general Jia Fu. -HHS 17/7:642, 666.

Chen Qin 陳勤 (d.206). On the eve of an attack against the settlement of Mo in eastern Jiangxia, Chen Qin attended a banquet with his colleague Ling Tong. Becoming drunk and abusive, he insulted Ling Tong and his late father Ling Cao, and eventually provoked Ling Tong into attacking him. Chen Qin died of his wounds. -SGZ 10:1296.

Chen Qing 陳淸; Yingchuan. XTS 71B:2334 says that Chen Qing was a son of Chen Heng.

Chen Qiu 陳球 [Bozhen 伯真] (118-179); Xiapi. Son of Chen Wei and a man of good family, when Chen Qiu was young he studied Confucianism, and he was also an expert on law. About 132 he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. Reforms introduced by Zuo Xiong required that candidates should be at least forty years old, but Chen Qiu's abilities evidently allowed him exemption, and he became a gentleman cadet at the capital. He served in the Office for Insignia and Credentials and in the Imperial Secretariat, held charge of one of the imperial tomb parks, and was then captain of a gate at the capital.

When Chen Qiu became a magistrate in Wei, the Administrator solicited bribes, and as Chen Qiu refused he sought to dismiss him. The Investigator argued, however, that Chen Qiu's was the best-governed county in the commandery, and his dismissal would raise awkward questions. No action was taken, but Chen Qiu resigned on account of the death of his mother.

Chen Qiu returned to appointment in the offices of the Excellencies, graded First Class and joined the Censorate as an Imperial Clerk. Because of his knowledge of law he became Director in the Ministry of Justice, chief assistant to the Minister.

About 163 Chen Qiu was sent as Administrator of Lingling to deal with banditry and mutiny in the south of Jing province. In 165 his capital was attacked by the rebels Hu Lan and Zhu Gai. Since the city was built in marshland and protected only by a palisade, many argued that the place should be abandoned, but Chen Qiu called every man and boy to maintain the defence. He used great trees to construct ballista, shooting feathered spears over a thousand metres, and when the enemy tried to flood him out he turned the water against them. Relieved at last by the Inspector Du Shang, he then joined the campaign to destroy the insurrection. Chen Qiu was rewarded with half a million cash and one of his sons was appointed as a gentleman cadet.

Chen Qiu became Administrator of Wei commandery and then Court Architect, responsible for the construction of Emperor Huan's many pleasure-parks and hunting grounds. He was later Administrator of Nanyang, but was slandered and impeached, was briefly imprisoned and then freed by an amnesty. He retired to his home. [A stele claims that he left office because his father was ill, and has no mention of his disgrace.]

Some six months later Chen Qiu was called to be Minister of Justice. When the Dowager Dou died in 172, the eunuchs Cao Jie and Wang Fu sought to have her buried with the rites only of a concubine, but Chen Qiu spoke eloquently and courageously against them, and Emperor Ling accepted his arguments. Chen Qiu was later Minister of the Guards and in 177 he became Excellency of Works. He left office on account of the portent of an earthquake, but held a series of ministerial positions, and in autumn 178 he became Grand Commandant. A few months later he was again dismissed, this time for an eclipse of the sun.

In 179 Chen Qiu became Steward at the Yongle Palace, head of the household of the Dowager Dong, natural mother of the Emperor Ling. He sought to have Yang Qiu made Director of Retainers, so he might deal with the eunuchs as harshly as he had done before, but the plan was revealed by Yang Qiu's secondary wife, a daughter of the eunuch Cheng Huang, and all those involved died in prison.

Despite his disgrace, some forty of Chen Qiu's former officers and students, including Guan Ning and Hua Xin, erected three stele at his tomb in Xiapi. -HHS 56/46:1831-34*, XC 3:7b-8a, ZF:7a-b, LS 10:1a-8a, SJZ 25:21a; deC 89:60-61, 124-126, 162-163.

Chen Qun 陳羣 [Changwen 長文] (d.236); Yingchuan. Son of Chen Ji, Chen Qun came of notable family and was an associate of Kong Rong. He served Liu Bei, who nominated him as Abundant Talent and offered him a county magistracy. Chen Qun, however, went to join his father with Lü Bu and, after Lü Bu was destroyed by Cao Cao, they took office with him.

As a clerk for personnel Chen Qun recommended Chen Qiao and Dai Gan, and he warned Cao Cao against Wang Mo and Zhou Kui. He served as magistrate in two counties, but left office when his father died. Returning later to office, he joined the Imperial Censorate and was then a member of Cao Cao's military staff. In 213 he was made Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate for the new ducal state of Wei. In that office he argued unsuccessfully for the adoption of his father Chen Ji's suggestion that the ancient mutilating punishments should be restored in place of flogging, on the grounds that they were actually less fatal and cruel.

Chen Qun was himself humane and generous, and in 219 he intervened with Cao Cao to spare the life of Liu Yi, whose younger brother had been involved in the plot of Wei Feng. Liu Yi offered thanks, but Chen Qun replied that he was concerned only to advise Cao Cao on appropriate punishment; there was no emotion involved.

Chen Qun later became a Palace Attendant, again responsible for personnel. In 219 he and Huan Jie urged Cao Cao to take the imperial title, and when Cao Pi came to the throne Chen Qun took part in the process which saw the abdication of Han in favour of Wei. Cao Pi trusted and admired him, granted him honours and enfeoffment, and had him accompany him on campaign with title as a general and authority over government.

Chen Qun played a major role in establishing the system of nine grades for official rank and recruitment [九品 jiupin] and the appointment of Impartial and Just officials [中正 zhongzheng] to supervise local nominations. He also joined debate on the new calendar, was an expert in the rituals of seals, and was later given charge of the codification of the laws.

Following the death of Cao Pi in 226 Chen Qun became a member of the council of regency for Cao Rui, and he was Excellency of Works with control of the Imperial Secretariat. His memorials to the throne were published, and were admired for their good sense and foresight. -SGZ 22:633-37*, JS 17:498-99; Fang 52:507, Holzman 57, Mather 76:503, deC 96:456-461.

Chen Rong 陳容 (d.195); Guangling. A follower of Yuan Shao, Chen Rong admired Zang Hong, who came from the same city. When Zang Hong was named Administrator of Dong commandery in 194 Chen Rong became his Assistant. As Zang Hong rebelled against Yuan Shao in the following year, he sent Chen Rong back.

Yuan Shao then captured Zang Hong and sentenced him to death. Though he had no close relationship to Zang Hong, Chen Rong spoke fervently of his loyalty and accused Yuan Shao of dishonourable conduct. He too was executed, and Yuan Shao was criticised for his cruelty: "How could he kill two such heroes in one day?" -HHS 58/48:1892, SGZ 7:236-37; deC 96:181-182.

Chen Rong 陳融; Chen. A refugee scholar, Chen Rong crossed the Yangzi and joined the entourage of Lu Mao, who treated him well. Chen Rong later served as Administrator of Yuzhang for Wu, and he compiled Yaoyan 要言 "Precepts" in Legalist style. -SGZ Wu 12: 1336-37.

Chen Shan 陳禪 [Jishan 紀山] (d.126); Ba. In the time of Emperor An Chen Shan became Officer of Merit in his commandery, and was admired for the manner in which he brought forward worthy men and rejected those of poor quality. He was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, but joined the provincial office rather than taking appointment at the capital.

When the Inspector was accused of taking bribes, Chen Shan was investigated as a potential witness. In fact, he had given presents only on occasion of mourning, and though he suffered bastinado and torture he kept to his story. The matter was eventually closed for lack of evidence, but Deng Zhi, brother of the regent Dowager, heard of the case, admired Chen Shan's conduct, and nominated him as Abundant Talent.

Chen Shan was sent to be Administrator of Hanzhong. The non-Chinese people were causing trouble, but we are told that they heard of his reputation and came at once to offer their submission. He was later transferred to Zuopingyi, then came to Luoyang as a Counsellor Remonstrant.

In 120 an embassy from the state of Shan, beyond the frontiers of the southwest, arrived at the imperial court. The group included musicians, conjurers, jugglers and people who could swallow fire. They performed at the assembly for the New Year's Day of 121, but as everyone was enjoying the spectacle Chen Shan stood up and gave a Confucianist denunciation of the desecration of court ritual by such a heathenish display. A few days later Chen Zhong of the Imperial Secretariat sent in a memorial with counter-arguments, and urged that Chen Shan be sent to prison for his inappropriate conduct. Many had admired his principled stand, and Chen Shan was not arrested, but he was sent out to a low-ranking command on the north-eastern frontier of Xuantu, and orders were given that his family would suffer if he failed to take up the post. Chen Shan duly departed.

It is said that the Shanyu of the Northern Xiongnu soon afterwards entered Liaodong, and Chen Shan was promptly appointed Administrator of the commandery. Awed by his reputation, the Xiongnu withdrew several hundred li. Chen Shan then sent messengers offering peace, and the Shanyu presented tribute and went away. As Sima Guang observes in his Kaoyi commentary to ZZTJ 50:1608, however, the Xiongnu were by this time a considerable distance to the west, and it is unlikely that they had any means to be involved in Liaodong. It is nonetheless possible that Chen Shan did become Administrator of Liaodong, and he may have dealt with some group of Wuhuan or Xianbi in the manner described.

Following the death of the regent Dowager Deng and the disgrace of her kinsmen in 121, Chen Shan was dismissed on account of his association with the family, but in 125 he was appointed chief of staff to the General of Chariots and Cavalry Yan Xian, brother of the new regent Dowager. The Yan group had earlier persuaded Emperor An to depose his son Liu Bao as Heir, and after the emperor's death they placed their own candidate, the child Liu Yi, upon the throne. Liu Yi, however, was sickly, and Cui Yuan, an officer under Yan Xian, was concerned that his succession was in any case tainted by the wrongful deposition of Liu Bao. He wanted Yan Xian to take the lead in restoring Liu Bao to the succession, but Yan Xian was continually drunk and Cui Yuan could not get to see him. He approached Chen Shan with the same argument, Chen Shan accepted the idea, but though he made some preparations, he was reluctant to move, and before anything more happened Liu Yi died and the palace eunuchs, led by Sun Cheng, destroyed the Yan and brought Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, to the throne.

Chen Shan did not suffer for his association with the defeated faction. He became a Consultant and led a group at court calling for firm treatment of the Dowager Yan, on the grounds that by urging Liu Bao's deposition as Heir she had failed to treat her nominal son in suitably maternal fashion. Intervention by the Excellency Li He brought a more humane policy, but the Lady Yan died soon afterwards.

Chen Shan was then transferred to be Director of Retainers, but died in that office soon afterwards. -HHS 51/41:1684-86*, 52/42:1723, XC 2:14b-15a, HYGZ 2:16, 12:218.

Chen Shang 陳尙; Yingchuan. XTS 71B:2334 says that Chen Shang was a son of Chen Heng.

Chen Shao 陳紹 (d.181). Administrator of Cangwu in Jiaozhi province in the late 170s, Chen Shao joined the insurgents led by Liang Long. In 181 the new Inspector Zhu Jun arrived on the border with troops. He killed Chen Shao to show his authority and inspired a great many surrenders among the rebels. -HHJ 28:334.

Chen Sheng 陳省; Shu. In 115, responding to a call from the general Yin Jiu, Chen Sheng joined Luo Heng to assassinate Lü Shudu, leader of rebel Qiang who had come to attack Yi province. Both men were enfeoffed and rewarded with money. -HHS 87/77:2889.

Chen [Shengsun] 陳盛孫; Pei. Formerly a clerk in the offices of the Excellencies, when the local magistrate Wang VII was transferred to Guanghan Dependent State, Chen Shengsun took a lead in setting up a stele to honour his good government. -SJZ 24:7b-8a.

Chen Sheng 陳省; Hanzhong. Chen Sheng was the husband of the Lady Yang Ligui. -HYGZ 10C:171.

Chen Sheng 陳生 see Chen Zuo 陳坐. -SGZ 6:212.

Chen Shi 陳寔 [Zhonggong 仲弓/躬] (104-187); Yingchuan. Son of Chen Yuan 源, of ancient but currently undistinguished lineage, Chen Shi was a leader amongst his fellows even as a child. He was always anxious to study, and spent time in the wilderness as a disciple of Fan Ying, expert on the Book of Changes. He became a petty officer in the county yamen and then an assistant village headman. The magistrate Deng Shao admired him and had him attend the University at Luoyang, where he became a close friend of Guo Tai and Chen Fan.

Returning home, Chen Shi maintained a private school with several hundred students, but when he was called up again for local office, he went to live in the hills. On one occasion a robber broke into his house and hid among the roof-beams. Chen Shi realised that he was there, and speaking indirectly to his companions in the room below he persuaded the robber to give himself up. He then presented him with silk to encourage his future good conduct.

At another time there was a murder, and suspicion fell on Chen Shi. The county officer Yang arrested and tortured him, but found no evidence and was obliged to let him go. Chen Shi later became a commandery Investigator, but when he came on visitation to his home county he treated Yang most favourably; all who heard of the affair were impressed.

About 160 Chen Shi commanded the guard at one of the gates of the commandery office, but was then appointed Officer of Merit on the recommendation of Zhong Hao. The Administrator Gao Lun was asked by the palace eunuch Hou Lan to appoint one of his protégés, and Gao Lun named him a Literary Scholar. Chen Shi knew that the nominee was a man of poor quality and urged Gao Lun to appoint another, more worthy candidate. Defying the eunuch's influence, Gao Lun accepted this advice, and the tone of government was improved throughout the commandery. Gao Lun was later appointed to the Imperial Secretariat, where he praised Chen Shi and so established his reputation.

In 161 the Excellency of Works Huang Qiong nominated Chen Shi as Qualified to Deal with Complex Affairs. He became a county magistrate in Hedong, but because he disapproved of the commandery government and his protests had no effect, he left that office. [Another version says that he resigned on account of family mourning; this may also be true.]

Chen Shi later joined the offices of the Excellencies, and was then a magistrate in Pei. People came from neighbouring counties to receive his excellent government, but he again left his post because the Chancellor of the state was dishonest in the collection of tax.

When the First Faction Incident broke out in 166, Chen Shi was implicated, but while others sought to escape he went deliberately to present himself at the prison. He was released under amnesty, and in 169 was appointed to the offices of the General-in-Chief Dou Wu.

At this time the father of the court eunuch Zhang Rang died. The funeral was held in his home country of Yingchuan, but of all of the leading gentry only Chen Shi was prepared to attend. Zhang Rang bitterly resented the snub, but he was grateful to Chen Shi. In the Proscription which followed the fall of Dou Wu and Chen Fan Zhang Rang protected Chen Shi and, through him, many other gentlemen.

Living in retirement, Chen Shi maintained his local influence, and people came regularly for him to adjudicate their disputes. None disputed his judgements, and so great was his authority that it was said "It is better to be punished by the law than have Master Chen despise you."

Chen Shi was admired throughout the empire, and Excellencies such as Yang Ci and Chen Dan expressed regret that they could not yield place to him. Shishuo xinyu contains several anecdotes describing his wise and honourable conduct, and when he and his sons went to visit Xun Shu and his family the court astronomers found signs of their passage in the stars. Following the end of Proscription in 184 Chen Shi was again invited to office, but he refused on the grounds that he was out of touch with current affairs.

Chen Shi died in 187 at the age of eighty-four. His funeral was attended by a host of people, with representatives from the highest officials, and he received posthumous title as "Gentleman of Civil Qualities" 文範先生, similar to that of his contemporary Fan Dan. A stele and an altar were established in his honour and portraits of him and of his two sons Ji and Chen were sent throughout the province to encourage good conduct.

As Vervoorn observes, Chen Shi was probably not unwilling to be kept from office during the period of Proscription but, unlike many hermit scholars and critics, he had been prepared to concern himself with the problems of the day. The historian Fan Ye observes that the balance Chen Shi maintained between commitment to public affairs and withdrawal from office should have served as a model for all gentleman of the time. -HHS 62/52:2065-67*, XC 3:12b, HQ 2:2a, Cai 2:2, LS 18:2b-3a; deC 89:79, 204, Vervoorn 90:158-159, 173, Bn 81:574-576, Mather 76:5-6, 28, 81-82, 504.

HHS 82/72B:2748 says that when Shangcheng Gong q.v. went off into the heavens Chen Shi and his friend Han Shao were witnesses to his elevation. The parallel text in the fourth century Baopu zi, cited by Hui Dong in HHSJJ at 3024, has the style of Chen Shi as Yuanfang 元方, not Zhonggong, and also ascribes a variant style to Han Shao: it is likely the two distinguished witnesses are cited to give credit to the extraordinary story, and the difference in the styles is a marginal matter.

Chen Shi 陳式; personal name also, wrongly, as Jie 戒. An officer of Liu Bei, in 218 Chen Shi was engaged in the campaign for Hanzhong.

In 222 Chen Shi commanded a fleet in Liu Bei's ill-fated attack down the Yangzi against Sun Quan, and in 229 he was sent by Zhuge Liang and captured Wudu commandery. -SGZ 17:529, Shu 2:890, Shu 5:924; deC 96:521, Fang 52:291.

Chen Shou 陳授 also as Chen Yuan 援 (d.158). In 158 the Court Astronomer Chen Shou was persuaded by the eunuch Xu Huang to present a warning that an eclipse of the sun and other portents boded ill for the General-in-Chief Liang Ji. Liang Ji had Chen Shou arrested and tortured, and he died in prison, but in the following year Liang Ji was indeed overthrown by Emperor Huan, aided by Xu Huang and other eunuchs. -HHS 34/24:1185; deC 89:4.

Chen Shunqian 陳順謙, the Lady; Guanghan. Elder sister of Chen Huiqian, the Lady married Cao Ning. Left a widow at the age of nineteen, she devoted herself to caring for the children. When she died at the age of eighty her nephew Chen Gui composed a eulogy. -HYGZ 10C:172.

Chen Si 陳巳 (d.114); Hanzhong. Well-respected locally, Chen Si joined the staff of the Administrator

Zheng Qin. After Zheng Qin was killed by rebel Qiang in 110, Chen Si joined Cheng Xin and other officers in an oath of vengeance, and when the Qiang came again four years later they all fought against them. The army was successful, but the oath-takers were killed. [On the date of the campaign see sub Cheng Xin.]

In 193 Chen Wen died, perhaps of illness, or perhaps by agency of Yuan Shu. -SGZ 1:8, 6:208, 9:277, Wu 11:1310, HHS 75/65:2439.

Chen [Wenzhi] 陳文知 see Cheng Zhi 程祇 and sub the Lady Li Mujiang.

Chen Wu 陳武 [Zilie 子烈] (d.215); Lujiang. Seven feet seven inches tall [178 cm], at the age of eighteen Chen Wu went to join Sun Ce when he was with Yuan Shu in 194. He accompanied him on his campaigns south of the Yangzi in the mid-190s, was appointed a senior major, and when Lujiang was conquered in 199 he was given command of a special force of shock troops from that territory. When Sun Quan took over in 200 he gave Chen Wu authority over five colonels. He later became a lieutenant-general, but was killed in the disastrous assault on Hefei in 215.

A generous man, Chen Wu attracted many clients, and Sun Quan was very fond of him. He attended his funeral in person, and Jiangbiao zhuan says that he had Chen Wu's favourite concubine, together with two hundred families of his retainers, buried alive with his body. Pei Songzhi quotes Sun Sheng of the fourth century, who is predictably scathing, but one must wonder if the story is true. -SGZ Wu 10:1289*.

Chen Xi 陳禧; Ba. As a local officer in 154, Chen Xi joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery and recommending that the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree. -HYGZ 1:5.

Chen Xia 陳洽; Yingchuan. One of six sons of Chen Shi, Chen Xia was a brother of Chen Ji and Chen Chen. -XTS 71B:2334.

Chen Xian 陳先 see Chen Guang 陳光.

Chen Xiang 陳翔 [Zilin 子麟 or Zhonglin 仲麟]; Runan. Grandson of Chen Zhen, Chen Xiang was well-known when he was young and had many friends. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he was then recommended First Class and was appointed to the Censorate as an Imperial Clerk. [It is said that Chen Xiang's nomination as First Class was made by the Grand Commandant Zhou Jing, but this does not fit with the impeachment of Liang Ji described below: Liang Ji was destroyed in 159, but Zhou Jing became an Excellency only in 163 and was Grand Commandant only in 166.]

At court assembly for a New Year, the General-in-Chief Liang Ji presumed upon his position to ignore proper procedure. Chen Xiang reported him, and asked for his arrest on the capital charge of Disrespect. Nothing, of course, came of this initiative, but people admired Chen Xiang's temerity. He was sent out to the frontier as Administrator of Dingxiang, but later returned to the capital as a Consultant.

About 160 Chen Xiang became Inspector of Yang province. With no concern for rank or power, he reported Wang Yong the Administrator of Yuzhang for subservience to the eunuchs and Xu Can the Administrator of Wu commandery for greed and corruption; both men were sent to prison. Since Xu Can was a brother of the eunuch favourite Xu Huang, Chen Xiang's reputation grew, and he was numbered among the popular heroes in the lists compiled by the reformists and students of the University.

80 Chen Xin

After another term as a Consultant, Chen Xiang became Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate. At the time of the First Faction Incident he was imprisoned for his alleged connection to the reformists, but was found not guilty and released. He retired from office and died at home about 170. -HHS 67/57:2213* & 2187, XC 4:8b, SGZ 6:211.

Chen Xin 陳訢. As Administrator of Yuyang in 34, Chen Xin was in the vanguard of Wu Han's unsuccessful attack against Lu Fang's general Jia Lan in Dai commandery.

In 45 Chen Xin was appointed Chief Clerk in Command of Troops in Anding and sent with three thousand horsemen to attack the rebel non-Chinese in the central hills. Their leader Boma Shaobo, Little Lord on a Piebald Horse, surrendered, and was shifted with his followers to the south of the Wei River.

As Commandant of a garrison camp in Youfufeng in 58, Chen Xin led a contingent of the great army under Ma Wu which defeated the Qiang leader Dianyu on the upper Yellow River. -HHS 22/12:737, 12/2:508, 22/12:786; Bn 67:108, 115, deC 84:79.

Chen Xin 陳歆. In 94 Chen Xin was Prefect of Luoyang. There was a serious drought, and in the autumn the Excellency Zhang Fen urged a review of those held in jail. In accordance with theories of Yin and Yang, such prison relief was a common practice at time of drought. The emperor duly visited the Luoyang Prison and all cases were reviewed. Those who had been wrongfully held were released, and Chen Xin was arrested. Three days of heavy rain followed. -HHS 35/25:1199; Bn 76:51.

Chen Xiu 陳修 (d.26). Administrator of Pei for the pretender Liu Yong, Chen Xiu was killed by Guangwu's general He Yan. -HHS 18/8:686-87.

Chen Xiu 陳休; Yingchuan. One of six sons of Chen Shi, Chen Xiu was a brother of Chen Ji and Chen Chen. -XTS 71B:2334.

Chen Xiu 陳武 (d.229); Lujiang. Son of Chen Wu, Chen Xiu was a man of similar quality. When Chen Wu was killed in 215 Sun Quan gave Chen Xiu command of five hundred men and rank as a senior major. Many recruits were unruly, or actually deserted, but Chen Xiu gained his men's confidence, maintained discipline and did not lose a man. Sun Quan was impressed and promoted him colonel.

When Sun Quan took the royal title in 221 he reviewed the achievements of his followers. He granted Chen Xiu a village marquisate and gave him command of a force of shock troops. -SGZ Wu 10:1289.

Chen Xuan 陳宣 [Zixing 子興]; Pei. A courageous man, learned in the New Text Lu interpretation of the Classic of Poetry, Chen Xuan refused service under Wang Mang, but when Emperor Guangwu of Later Han took the throne in 25, he went to court and became a Counsellor Remonstrant.

In 34 there was flooding on the Luo River which threatened Luoyang. It was proposed to build levees to protect the city, but Chen Xuan argued that the sacral nature of the new capital, and the presence of the emperor, sufficed to preserve it from harm. [He cited the example of Wang Zun 王尊, worthy Administrator of Dong commandery during Former Han: QHX:567.] The waters receded, and Guangwu was suitably impressed.

On another occasion Chen Xuan protested when the imperial carriage was driven at a dangerous pace. The emperor accepted his remonstrance.

Chen Xuan was later appointed Internuncio for Control of the Yellow River. He died in that office. -XC 6:14a-b.

Chen Ya 陳雅 [Botai 伯臺]; Guanghan. As a Counsellor Remonstrant, Chen Ya presented a memorial on the power of the eunuchs and warning of the consequences. Emperor Ling did not approve, but sent Chen Ya out as Administrator of Ba commandery.

Chen Ya died at the age of seventy-five, warning his son of the trouble to come and asking for a hidden tomb in the mountains. -HYGZ 10C:168.

Chen Yan 陳弇 [Shuming 叔明 or Zhongming 仲明]; Chenliu. Having studied the Ouyang teachings of the Classic of History under Ding Hong, Chen Yan taught students of his own. Some time a county magistrate in Pei, he was known for the simplicity of his life, particularly for ploughing his own fields, where he was constantly accompanied by a small yellow bird. -HHS 79/69A:2556, YSS:21a.

Chen Yan 陳延; Shangdang. A man of old official family, Chen Yan served at one time as Administrator of Henei.

In 191 Chen Yan's house was attacked by the fighting man Zhang Yang, greedy for his women and his goods. Chang Lin, a former resident of Henei, brought retainers to support him, and they withstood a two months siege. -SGZ 23:659.

Chen Ye 陳曄. A county magistrate in Nan commandery, Chen Ye ran a gentle government, particularly encouraging the cultivation of silk. -XC 8:2a.

Chen Ye 陳業; Kuaiji. In the early 190s, Chen Ye was celebrated in his community for his high moral conduct, but when the refugee scholar Huan Ye went to call upon him, he refused to see him.

Huan Ye later left for the far south, but before he did so he wrote an open letter to Chen Ye, denouncing his lack of courtesy, and posted it on a pillar of a popular pavilion. -SJZ 40:15b.

On the other hand, in a discussion with the Administrator Puyang Xing 濮陽興 in 258, the officer Zhu Yu 朱育 cited Chen Ye as one of the worthies of the commandery. -SGZ Wu 12:1326.

Chen Yi 陳義; Runan. A migrant into the south of Nan commandery in the early 20s, he was probably, as Bielenstein suggests, a refugee from the troubles which followed the flooding of the Yellow River. As rebellion broke out against the government of Wang Mang in 23, Chen Yi and his associate Tian Rong took control of territory along the Yangzi, gave themselves titles as generals and kings and made alliance with Qin Feng, immediately to the north. Chen Yi is not heard of again, but Tian Rong maintained his position for several years. -HHS 17/7:658-59; Bn 59:28.

Chen Yi 陳揖; Nanyang. Chen Yi was a friend of Zhu Hui, who cared for his family after his death. -HHS 43/33:1459.

Chen Yi 陳已 (d.154). A village marquis in Ba commandery, Chen Yi was killed in the course of a rebellion. -HYGZ 1:6.

Chen Yi 陳逸 [Ziyou 子游]; Runan. Son of Chen Fan, after his father was killed in 168 Chen Yi was hidden in Ganling by Zhu Zhen. At the time of the Yellow Turban rebellion in 184 he was amnestied with other members of the Proscribed Party and became Chancellor of Lu. In 188 he was party to the plot of Wang Fen to kidnap Emperor Ling, but his involvement was evidently not discovered. -HHS 66/56:2171, SGZ 1:4.

Chen Yi 陳懿 (d.184). In 184 Chen Yi was Administrator of Jincheng when an army of rebels and mutineers led by Beigong Boyu laid siege to his capital at Yuanya, present-day Lanzhou. They seized a number of hostages, and when Chen Yi tried to negotiate their release he was killed in the enemy camp. The city fell to the rebels. -HHS 72/62:2320-21, 58/48:1880; dC

Chen Yi 陳禕. In 219 Chen Yi was Commandant of the Guards at the Changle Palace, residence of the Lady Bian, wife of Cao Cao and mother of the Lady Cao Jie, Empress of Emperor Xian. He joined the conspiracy of Wei Feng for a coup at Ye city, but then became frightened and revealed the plot. -SGZ 1:52.

Chen Yin 陳寅/寅. When Chen Yin was Administrator of Danyang in 169 the non-Chinese people of the hills rebelled and laid siege to his headquarters. He defeated them.

In 172 Chen Yin joined the Inspector Zang Min on campaign against the religious rebels led by Xu Chang of Kuaiji. They achieved final victory in 174. -HHS 8:330, 334-36, 58/48:1884, 102/12:3258.

Chen You 陳友; Nanyang. The posthumous son of Chen Yi, Chen You was cared for by his father's friend Zhu Hui. Some time in the 70s Zhu Hui recommended Chen You for local appointment ahead of his own son Zhu Pian. -HHS 43/33:1459.

Chen Yu 陳豫 see Cheng Yu 程豫.

Chen Yu 陳予. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Chen Yu took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county fief in Changsha.

After Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang in 127, he and Chen Yu and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in 128 the emperor recalled their good work and they were allowed to return to the capital. Chen Yu died a few years later. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Chen Yu 陳瑀 [Gongwei 公瑀]; Xiapi. Son of Chen Qiu, Chen Yu was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and joined the offices of the Excellencies in Luoyang. In 189 he became a Consultant.

In 193 Chen Yu was named Inspector of Yang province by Yuan Shu, but when Yuan Shu was defeated by Cao Cao soon afterwards the local people used Chen Yu as a figure-head to rebel against him. Yuan Shu drove Chen Yu back to his home country.

Chen Yu later made contact with Cao Cao, and in 197 he was named Administrator of Wu, nominally to assist the southern warlord Sun Ce against Yuan Shu. In fact, Wu commandery was controlled by Sun Ce, and Chen Yu's real mission was to subvert that territory. Sun Ce accordingly sent Lü Fan to attack Chen Yu's base on the coast in Guangling. Chen Yu fled, and he took a minor military post under Yuan Shao. -HHS 56/46:1835, XC 3:8a, SGZ 6:208, SGZ Wu 1:1107, 11:1310; deC 90:176-179.

Chen Yuan 陳元 [Changsun 長孫 or Xiangsun 襄孫]; Cangwu. Chen Yuan's father Qin 欽, a celebrated scholar of Chunqiu and the Old Text school of Zuo zhuan, had been tutor to Wang Mang and a general under his regime, but was later obliged to commit suicide: QHX:37.

Chen Yuan received his father's teaching from the time he was young, and he was recognised as a leading scholar of Zuo zhuan and the Fei interpretation of the Book of Changes, both in the Old Text tradition. Through the ren right of his father, he became a gentleman cadet at Wang Mang's court.

Chen Yuan later joined the court of Emperor Guangwu, where in 27 the Director of the Secretariat Han Xin proposed that Academicians be appointed for the study of Zuo zhuan and the Fei interpretation of the Book of Changes. In debate at the New Year court of 28 the Academician Fan Sheng led the case for the New Text, arguing orally and in a subsequent memorial that Old Text studies should be rejected. Chen Yuan, at that time a clerical officer under the Excellency of Works Song Hong, presented a memorial in reply, and the emperor eventually approved a chair for Zuo zhuan. Though Chen Yuan was considered the best candidate for the position, his involvement in the debate meant that the emperor gave the post to Li Feng.

When Song Hong was disgraced for his involvement in a false accusation about 30, Chen Yuan presented a letter in his support.

Some time in the early 30s it was proposed that the Excellencies, highest officials of the bureaucracy, should be subject to inspection by the Director of Retainers, head of the capital province. The question was presented to the Excellencies themselves and there was a debate at court. Chen Yuan argued that the ruler should emulate the legendary sovereigns of the past and the model of Former Han, regarding his ministers as teachers, and that he should reject the style of the ancient hegemony, allegedly followed by Wang Mang, who had sought to exercise inappropriate control, demonstrated distrust and made personal errors of judgement. His arguments presumably reflected the opinion of the gathering, and Guangwu accepted

When Li Tong left office, Chen Yuan transferred to the office of the Excellency over the Masses Ouyang Xi. He continued to take part in debates, and made proposals for rituals at the imperial temples. Guangwu did not adopt them, but when Ouyang Xi was disgraced and died in 40, Chen Yuan joined a petition on his behalf, and Guangwu awarded him posthumous honours.

Soon afterwards Chen Yuan left office on grounds of ill health. He died of old age at home.

Though Chen Yuan's efforts on behalf of the Old Text tradition gained small success at the time, the line of disciples that followed him and his colleague Zheng Xing, including Zheng Zhong, Ma Yuan, Zheng Xuan and Xun Shuang, meant that by the end of the dynasty the Fei interpretation of the Book of Changes flourished at the expense of the teachings based upon Jing Fang. -HHS 36/26:1229-34*, 79/69A:2554; Tjan 49:150-151, Bn 79:54, 56, 190-193.

Chen Yuan 陳願; Yingchuan. XTS 71B:2334 says that Chen Yuan was a son of Chen Heng and the father of Chen Qi.

Chen Yuan 陳源; Yingchuan. XTS 71B:2334 says that Chen Yuan was a son of Chen Qi and the father of Chen Shi.

Chen Yuan 陳元 also as Yang Yuan 羊元; Chenliu. Chen Yuan was an unfilial son until his mother complained of him to the village headman Qiu Lan. Qiu Lan upbraided him and had him read a chapter of the Book of Filial Piety, and Chen Yuan was quite reformed. -XC 5:5a.

Chen Yuan 陳援 see Chen Shou 陳授.

Chen Zhan 陳湛 [Xiaobo 小伯 or Zibo 子伯]; Shu. Having been a popular magistrate of several counties, Chen Zhan became Headquarters Officer of Yi province. When the Administrator of Guanghan sent his son with a courtesy gift for the Inspector, Chen Zhan warned him not to accept. There was later an investigation about any private relationship between the two officials, but both men were cleared. -HYGZ 10A:136.

Chen Zhen 陳珍; Runan. As Chancellor of Dongping in 120, Chen Zhen commended the king Liu Chang for his display of filial piety at the death of his mother, and Liu Chang received an increment to his pension. Chen Zhen was later Director of Retainers at Luoyang. -HHS 42/32:1442, 67/57:2213.

Chen Zhen 陳震 [Xiaoqi 孝起]; Nanyang. When Liu Bei took title as Governor of Jing province in 208, Chen Zhen became an Assistant Officer with supervisory powers over various commanderies. He accompanied Liu Bei to the west in 211, and after the take-over of Yi province he was Commandant of a Dependent State and then an Administrator.

Admired by Zhuge Liang, Chen Zhen entered the Secretariat of Shu-Han in 225, and later became its Director. When Sun Quan took the imperial title in 229 Chen Zhen was named a minister and sent on embassy to Wu, where he negotiated the nominal division of the north between the two empires. -SGZ Shu 9.984-85*.

Chen Zheng 陳正 [Shufang 叔方]; Lu. During the time of Emperor Guangwu, Chen Zheng was Court Provisioner. A Gentleman at the Yellow Gates had an old quarrel with Chen Zheng, and when he was presenting the emperor with a dish he put a hair in it. Guangwu was furious and was going to have Chen Zheng killed, but in a parody of confession Chen Zheng pointed out that the hair had evidently survived the whole cooking process for the meal, and no-one in the kitchen had seen it before. So blame was turned against the Gentleman who had presented the dish, and he was arrested. -XC 6:9a-b.

Chen Zhi 陳祗 see Cheng Zhi 程祗. [Note that there was also a man named Chen Zhi who held great influence in Shu-Han from 245: SGZ Shu 9.987.]

Chen [Zhishu] 陳稚叔 (fl. 160); Yingchuan. Administrator of Cangwu, Chen Zhishu was admired by many gentlemen of the time in the same way as Zhong Hao and Xun Shu, who were considered exemplary teachers and influential models of good conduct. -SGZ 13:392. This may be the same person as Chen Lin 臨 q.v.

Chen Zhong 陳眾; Lujiang. After the defeat and death of Li Xian in 30, his follower Chunyu Lin led a bandit group in the western hills of Lujiang. The Governor Ouyang Xi attacked them with his troops, but without success, and Guangwu then planned to send an imperial army. Chen Chong, however, then an Assistant Officer of Yang province, went to Chunyu Lin in a carriage drawn by white horses, and persuaded him to surrender. Admiring his courage, and glad to be free from the threat of war, the local people established a shrine to "White-Horse Chen the Assistant Officer 白馬陳從事." -HHS 12/2:501, XC 8:3a-b.

Chen Zhong 陳重 [Jingong 景公]; Yuzhang. Chen

Zhong was a close friend of Lei Yi, and the two young men studied the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text Lu interpretation and the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu in the tradition of Yan Anle. The Administrator Zhang Yun nominated Chen Zhong as Filial and Incorrupt, but Chen Zhong urged the claims of Lei Yi. Zhang Yun insisted on his initial choice, but in the following year he recommended Lei Yi; both men became gentleman cadets. They were described as being bound closer together than glue to varnish, or two wings of the same bird. [Xie Cheng says that the contested nomination was that of Abundant Talent, awarded by the provincial Inspector.]

In his probationary position, Chen Zhong showed his generosity and modesty by settling the debts of one of his colleagues, then denying he had done it and refusing all thanks. On another occasion, falsely accused of stealing a house-mate's trousers, he bought a pair to replace them; the trousers were later returned by the man who had taken them.

Chen Zhong and Lei Yi entered the Imperial Secretariat, and in 117 they sought to persuade their colleague Zhang Jun not to report against the officers Zhu Ji and Ding Sheng. Zhang Jun was adamant, but Zhu Ji and Ding Sheng then implicated him in a major scandal. When Lei Yi took the blame for another officer's crime and was dismissed, Chen Zhong also resigned his appointment on grounds of ill health.

Chen Zhong returned to office through nomination by his native Yang province as Abundant Talent, and he became a magistrate in Runan. His government was excellent and Ji province reported its Exceptional Quality. He was to be appointed Administrator of Kuaiji, but resigned when his elder sister died.

Returning to the imperial service as a clerk to the Excellency over the Masses, Chen Zhong joined the Censorate as an Imperial Clerk, and died in that office. [His later nominations and appointments are recounted slightly differently in the biography of his friend and colleague Lei Yi.] -HHS 81/71:2686-87*, 45/35:1524, XC 6:1b-2a.

Chen Zhong 陳忠 [Boshi 伯始] (d.125); Pei. Son of Chen Chong, Chen Zhong entered the offices of the Excellency over the Masses about 110, and was later Director in the Ministry of Justice, chief assistant to the Minister. He gained a reputation for knowledge of the law, but was denied advancement because his father had opposed the award of posthumous honours to Deng Xun, father of the regent Dowager Deng.

About 120, on the recommendation of the Excellency Liu Kai, Chen Zhong was transferred to the legal section of the Imperial Secretariat, where he revived Chen Chong's plans and presented a list of reforms for more lenient punishments. His recommendations included abolition of the penalty of castration, consideration for those who committed crimes while insane [Hulsewé 55:301], and some easing of the proscription from office for three generations of officials convicted of corruption. All were approved.

When Emperor An took personal rule after the death of the Dowager, Chen Zhong encouraged him to sponsor scholarship, and the Shuowen jiezi dictionary of Xu Shen was presented to the throne through his good offices. Chen Zhong was likewise concerned at the standards of the bureaucracy, constantly urging the emperor to seek good men. He nominated worthy men in retirement such as Feng Liang and Zhou Xie, but though special carriages were sent to invite them to court, not all proved successful. Chen Zhong had earlier supported the policy that senior officials should be entitled to three years' leave for mourning, providing examples of Confucian virtue to their subordinates; when the matter was raised again he argued unsuccessfully for its retention.

Soon afterwards Chen Zhong involved himself in debate about the right to wear caps with two bridges 梁, loops from front to back. When Liu Bao was named Heir in 120, members of his suite wore such caps and, despite objections to such a breach of tradition, Chen Zhong spoke in favour of the change and his views were approved by the emperor. He also supported extension of the privilege to all officers about the rank of 600 shi [MBeck 90:259 and see sub Ren Fang, Zhi Kan and Meng Bu].

More practically, Chen Zhong warned that although banditry had greatly increased since the turmoil of the Qiang rebellion, local officials were too lazy, incompetent or corrupt to deal with the problem or even to report it; this had potential to cause enormous trouble for the dynasty, and there was urgent need to tighten control. At the same time, though he was concerned at the favour the emperor showed the eunuchs Jiang Jing and Li Run, and at the enfeoffment of his former wet-nurse Wang Sheng, Chen Zhong was reluctant to protest. He wrote an essay to ridicule the unworthy favourites, but it was very long and he never finished it.

In 122 Chen Zhong persuaded Emperor An not to authorise an attack on the hostile Gaogouli of the northeast while they were mourning the death of their King Gong. The court sent condolences instead, and in the following year Gong's successor Suicheng offered his submission.

About this time Chen Zhong was promoted Deputy Director of the Secretariat. The emperor had allowed the Lady Wang Yong, daughter of Wang Sheng, to carry out ceremonial duties on his behalf, and she insisted on comparable honours. Chen Zhong wrote to protest, and in he warned the ruler against the manner in which he relied upon the Secretariat rather than upon the Excellencies. Such inappropriate delegation threatened the hierarchy and even the stability of government, in the same way as Former Han had been weakened by excessive use of personal favourites; he urged the emperor to attend to affairs in person, but his advice was not taken. When the Excellency Chen Bao was dismissed on account of an earthquake, widespread rain and storms, Chen Zhong complained that such a direct response to portents weakened the necessary authority of the heads of the imperial service.

In 123 the Internuncio Dan Song urged that the calendar should be changed to accord with the apocrypha, and there was wide debate. Zhang Heng and Zhou Xing argued that the apocrypha were not worth attention; a majority led by the Grand Commandant Liu Kai wanted to bring back the Taichu 太初 system of Former Han which had been abandoned forty years earlier; while Cao Zhi and others argued for the current Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] system. Chen Zhong also opposed change, and the Sifen calendar was retained.

In general, Chen Zhong supported and agreed with senior ministers, he frequently deputised for one or another if they were ill, and in 123 or 124 he became Director of the Secretariat. During debate on policy for the west in 123, he urged the need for a presence beyond the frontier to prevent the expansion of Xiongnu influence and the isolation of the north-western commanderies. As a result Ban Yong was sent to the Western Regions.

When Emperor An dismissed his son Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun, as Heir in 124 there was a great demonstration outside the palace, led by Lai Li and Dai Feng. Chen Zhong did not support the protesters, and indeed proposed their impeachment.

Soon afterwards Chen Zhong was made Director of Retainers. He established control over the eunuchs and the imperial relatives and favourites, but in the following year these enemies arranged for him to be sent from the capital as Administrator of Jiangxia. He was recalled once more as Director of the Secretariat, but took ill and died.

After Chen Zhong's death and the accession of Liu Bao, the Director of Retainers Yu Xu reported his attack on Lai Li and Dai Feng; his reputation suffered severely. -HHS 46/36:1555-65*, 92/2:3034-35, 85/75:2814-15; Loewe 86C:300, 305, Ch'en 86:786.

Chen Zhu 陳助, the Lady; Ba. Married to Yang Fenggui of Jianwei, after his early death the Lady devoted herself to bringing up his children. Her brothers wanted her to marry again, but she cut her own throat and nearly died; she was then allowed to continue in her widowhood. -HYGZ 10A:140.

Chen Zhuanzhu 陳專諸; Nanyang. Son of Chen Fu, he succeeded to the family fief in Jiangxia. -HHS 18/8:691.

Chen Zi 陳崩; Yingchuan. XTS 70B:2334 says that Chen Zi was a son of Chen Yuan 源 and younger brother to Chen Shi.

Chen [Zihui] 陳子迴; Guangling. A man of letters in the late first century, Chen Zihui was praised by Wang Chong. -Lun heng 37; Forke 07:469.

Chen [Ziwei] 陳子威; Wuling. Chen Ziwei grew up without knowing his mother, presumably because she died in childbirth. As he was travelling to Luoyang to study at the Imperial University, he met an old woman by the roadside, who told him that her married name was Chen and her maiden name Li 李. This was the same as Chen Ziwei's mother, and the age also matched hers, so Chen Ziwei brought the old lady back to his house and treated her as if she had been his mother.

Chen Ziwei became Administrator of Jiujiang. -FSTY 3:21; Ying Shao categorises his conduct as Inappropriate 愆禮.

Chen Zong 陳縱 see Chencong 陳從.

Chen Zong 陳宗. Formerly a magistrate in Liang, in 72 Chen Zong was among the group of historians commissioned by Emperor Ming to compile annals of the reign of Emperor Guangwu, Shizu benji 世祖本

紀; this work, initially known as "Diary of the Jianwu Period" 建武注記, became the first part of Dongguan Hanji. As Bielenstein observes at 79:21, the project was politically sensitive and the committee delicately balanced: it was chaired by Ban Gu, a member of the Dou faction which had been instrumental in the disgrace of Ma Yuan in 49, but Ma Yuan's daughter was now empress, and Ma Yan and Meng Ji represented that interest. Chen Zong and his colleague Du Fu were probably neutral. -HHS 40/30A:1334; Bn 54:10.

Chen Zun 陳遵 [Menggong 孟公] (d.24); Jingzhao. A man of leading local family, celebrated for his arrogant and wild behaviour, he became Administrator of Henan under Wang Mang, and despite habitual drunkenness and sexual scandals held office also in Jiujiang and Henei.

Chen Zun later became Grand Marshal and Protector of the Army to the Gengshi Emperor, and in 24 he accompanied Liu Li on embassy to the Shanyu Yu of the Xiongnu to present a new seal. In accordance with precedent from the end of Former Han, the rank proposed was below that of the kings of Han, but the Shanyu now claimed that he had given assistance against Wang Mang and should be respected as the senior of the two rulers. In the debate which followed Chen Zun maintained the dignity of Han while winning the admiration of the alien chieftain, but as the embassy was returning through Shuofang the rule of the Gengshi Emperor collapsed. Chen Zun was attacked and killed by bandits while he was drunk. -HS 92:3709-14*, HHS 27/17:931, HS 94B:3829; Bn 67:103.

Chen Zun 陳遵. Chancellor of Langye about 180, Chen Zun invited Zhao Yu to take office in his government, but Zhao Yu refused. -SGZ 8, 349. Though his rank is higher than that of the man in the entry below, they may be the same person.

Chen Zun 陳遵. An Imperial Clerk in the 180s, Chen Zun was a member of the cortège sent by Emperor Ling to honour the funeral of the Excellency Yang Ci. -Cai 3:2.

Chen Zuo 陳坐 or Chen Sheng 生; Jiangxia. In 190 the new Inspector of Jing province, Liu Biao, advised by Kuai Yue, invited a number of local leaders to a banquet, but then killed them and took over their followers. Chen Zuo and Zhang Hu, two bandit chieftains from Jiangxia, escaped the massacre and took refuge in Xiangyang city. Kuai Yue and Pang Ji persuaded them to surrender. -HHS 74/64B:2420.

Chencong 陳從 or Chenzong 陳縱; non-Chinese. A tribesman of the hill county west of Wuling, in 76 Chencong rebelled and raided his neighbours. He was defeated that winter by local non-Chinese fighting for the commandery, and he and his men surrendered. -HHS 86/76:2832.

Cheng 程, the Lady: see Cheng Huang II, adopted daughter, Cheng 成 of Shule [Kashgar] (d.73). King of Shule, in 73 Cheng was attacked and killed by King Jian of Qiuzi [Kuqa], who placed his officer Douthi upon the throne. -HHS 88/78:2926, 47/37:1574.

Cheng 乘 [surname unknown]. A member of the Imperial Secretariat in 171, he took part in the enthronement of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling. -HHS 95/5:3121.

Cheng 盛 [surname] see Sheng 盛 passim.

Cheng 盛 [personal name unknown] see Sheng 盛.

Cheng A 程阿. A Palace Counsellor, Cheng A was an associate of the senior palace eunuch Wang Fu. About 178 he joined Wang Fu in a report that the Empress Song had been involved in magical practices. Emperor Ling believed the accusation and the empress was dismissed. -HHS 10B:448.

Cheng Bao 程包/苞 [Yuandao 元道]; Hanzhong. In 182 Cheng Bao was sent to the capital as Reporting Officer. At that time the Banshun people of Yi province had been in rebellion for some years, and there were proposals for a major expedition against them. Emperor Ling asked the Reporting Officers from the various commanderies of the province for their opinions.

Cheng Bao replied that the Banshun had given loyal service to Han, and had been strong allies against the rebel Qiang and the tribesmen of Wuling and of Yizhou commandery. They had lately suffered bad treatment from local officers, but all that was required was an honest and competent official, and they would be settled.

The emperor accordingly named Cao Qian as Administrator and proclaimed an amnesty, and the Banshun people were indeed peaceful once more. -HHS 86/76:2843, HYZ 10C:169; deC 89:172-173.

HYZ dates this incident to 179, but HHS Annals and other sources note that the rebellion began in 179 and Cao Qian was appointed in 182.

Cheng Bing 程秉 [Deshu 德樞]; Runan. A former student of Zheng Xuan, known for his mastery of the classics, during the civil war at the end of Han Cheng Bing took refuge in Jiao province and became a senior assistant to the local warlord Shi Xie.

He was later invited by Sun Quan and became Senior Tutor to his Heir, Sun Deng. He died in that office, leaving scholarly works on the Book of Changes, on History and on the Analects, amounting to more than 30,000 words. -SGZ Wu 8:1248*.

Cheng Dan 成丹 (d.25); Nanyang. Moving south as a refugee into Jiangxia, Cheng Dan joined the bandit force led by Wang Feng and Wang Kuang and became a secondary leader. In 22, as the group divided under the impact of disease and privation, Cheng Dan accompanied Wang Chang and Zhang Ang to go as a separate party west into Nan commandery. They were known as the Troops from the Lower Yangzi. The name may reflect only that they came from the region of Jiangxia, downstream from Nan commandery, but it may also indicate the presence of a number of refugees who had come to the lands of the middle Yangzi after disastrous flooding of the Yellow River over more than ten years: those driven south from the plain would have migrated gradually across the Huai and then upstream along the Yangzi south of the Dabie Shan. See Bn 54:152 and sub Wang Kuang and Fan Chong.

Wang Mang's government sent Zhuang You and Chen Mao with an army against them. Cheng Dan and his fellows were defeated, but they regrouped, resumed their career of plunder, and soon regained sufficient strength to defeat the local levies of Jing province. They then moved north into Nanyang and, following negotiations conducted by Wang Chang, joined the Han rebels led by Liu Bosheng. With such reinforcements, Liu Bosheng destroyed the army of Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci, followed by that of Zhuang You and Chen Mao, who had also come north into Nanyang.

In the spring of 23 the leaders of the Troops arranged a coup to depose Liu Bosheng as leader of the rebellion and to name Liu Xuan as [the Gengshi] Emperor. Cheng Dan was given title as a chief general, and in 24 he was named king of a county in Chenliu; Bielenstein observes that the pattern of enfeoffments at that time reflected a setback for the former bandit chieftains against their rivals of the Nanyang gentry.

In the first half of 25, as the Red Eyebrows advanced towards the capital, Cheng Dan, Wang Kuang and others were sent to hold the line in Hongnong and Hedong. At this same time Deng Yu, general of Liu Xiu, entered Hedong and laid siege to its capital Anyi. Cheng Dan and others were sent against him, but were heavily defeated and fled back to Chang'an; Deng Yu took over the whole commandery.

Cheng Dan was then stationed east of the capital with Wang Kuang and Chen Mu to face the Red Eyebrows, but then Zhang Ang and other leaders rebelled in Chang'an and the Gengshi Emperor abandoned the city. Suspecting their loyalty, he summoned Cheng Dan and Chen Mu, and executed them.

Another account says that Cheng Dan survived longer: he joined the Red Eyebrows as they entered Chang'an, and was killed with Wang Kuang and others after they surrendered to Liu Xiu's officer Zong Guang. -HHS 11/1:467-74, 16/6:600-01; Bn 54:134-136, Bn 59:97-102.

Cheng Dang 成當. An officer of Sun Quan, about 210 Cheng Dang was stationed on the frontier of Jing and Yang provinces. He died about this time, and Sun Quan proposed to transfer his troops to Lü Meng, who was stationed close by. Lü Meng objected, arguing that Cheng Dang had given good service to the state, and his troop should pass to his male heir, even though he was still young. Sun Quan eventually accepted the argument, and Lü Meng sent an officer to guide the young successor in managing this human inheritance. -SGZ Wu 9:1275.

Cheng Die 承蠱; Langye. Son of Cheng Gong, Cheng Die became Administrator of Jiyin. -HHS 27/17:945.

Cheng Dun 程敦; Hanzhong. Cheng Dun was the second son of Cheng Zhi by his first marriage. After their father's death he and his three full brothers abused their stepmother the Lady Li Mujiang. Eventually, however, impressed by her generous conduct, they presented themselves at the local prison to expiate their lack of filial respect.

Cheng Dun and his brothers later had official careers. -HYGZ 10C:171, HHS 84/74:2793 [some editions of HHS have the family surname as Chen 陳].

Cheng Fan 承汎. An officer of Gongsun Shu, in 33 he was named Administrator of Nan commandery and went with Tian Rong and Ren Man to attack down the Yangzi. They broke through the Gorges and gained a position in Nan commandery, but made no move to expand their holdings; their position was rather a protective salient than a springboard for a further offensive.

In the summer of 35 the Han general Cen Peng broke the river defences and destroyed Gongsun Shu's army. Cheng Fan was taken prisoner. -HHS 13/3:541, 17/7:661; Bn 59:187-189.

Cheng Feng 成封. Minister Steward in 79, Cheng Feng took part in the imperial conference on Confucianism called by Emperor Zhang in the White Tiger Hall. - HHS 37/27:1264.

Cheng Gao 程高; Guanghan? About the middle of the first century AD Cheng Gao sought to become a disciple of the Old Man of the Fu River, who was skilled in acupuncture 針. He was eventually accepted, and passed on his knowledge to Guo Yu. Like his master, Cheng Gao lived as a recluse. -HHS 82/72B:2735; Ngo 76:116-117, DeWoskin 83:75.

Cheng Gong 承宮 [Shaozi 少子] (d.76); Langye. Orphaned when he was young, Cheng Gong worked as a swine-herd, but was fascinated by the teachings of Xu Zisheng on Chunqiu. He became a servant to Xu Zisheng's students and gained a mastery of the classic.

During the civil war at the beginning of Later Han, Cheng Gong fled first to Hanzhong in the west, then returned to the region of Mount Tai. He colonised new fields to cultivate millet, but when local people claimed the harvest, he left it to them. Becoming well-known for this, and also for his scholarship, he was invited to office at the capital, but initially refused.

Emperor Ming sent a special carriage to receive him, and through the good offices of his friend, Fan Shu, Cheng Gong accepted the call. He was appointed an Academician at the Imperial University and was then a General of the Household, celebrated for his excellent and principled advice. His fame even reached the Xiongnu, and an envoy of the Northern Shanyu was sent to see him; Cheng Gong considered that he did not look sufficiently distinguished, and he insisted the emperor present the minister Wei Ying in his stead.

In 74 Cheng Gong was made a senior Palace Attendant. When he died two years later, Emperor Zhang intended to allocate tomb-land to support his family. They asked instead that he be buried in his home country, and he granted them 30,000 cash. -HHS 27/17:944-45*, XC 1:6b, XHS 3:1a-b.

Cheng Heng 程横; Youfufeng. An officer under the county magistrate Cao Quan, Cheng Heng distributed medicine and clothing to the poor. -JSCB 18:2a; Ebrey 80:342.

Cheng Hong 程肱; Jianwei. Cheng Hong was the uncle of the widowed Lady Cheng Zhenjue q.v.

Cheng Huai 程淮; Hanzhong. The elder son of Cheng Zhi by his second marriage to the Lady Li Mujiang, Cheng Huai and his brothers later had official careers. -HYZ 10C:171. HHS 84/74:2793 [some editions of HHS have the family surname as Chen 陳].

Cheng Huan 程奂/涣. Officers under Han Fu in Ji province in 191, Cheng Huan and Zhao Fu defied Yuan Shao with their troops and urged Han Fu not to yield to him. -HHS 74/64A:2378.

Cheng Huang 程璜 I. A eunuch Regular Attendant in 126, Cheng Huang was among those impeached by the Director of Retainers Yu Xu, primarily for involvement in the failed attempt of the Yan clan to keep Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, from the throne in the previous year. He and his fellows were eventually dismissed. -HHS 58/48:1870.

It appears that there were been two eunuchs of the same name at court some fifty years apart: cf. Cheng Huang II below.

Cheng Huang 程璜 II. A eunuch Regular Attendant, Cheng Huang's adopted daughter became a secondary wife of Yang Qiu. Yang Qiu was an enemy of Cai Zhi, uncle of Cai Yong, and in 178 Cheng Huang circulated an anonymous leaflet asserting that the two men had sought private favours. The Imperial Secretariat investigated, and Cai Zhi and Cai Yong barely escaped death.

In 179, as Yang Qiu was hoping to regain his position as Director of Retainers, his wife revealed his plans to her father. Cao Jie and other eunuchs compelled Cheng Huang to inform them, and they had Yang Qiu and his associates arrested and killed. -HHS 56/46:1834.

It appears there were been two eunuchs of the same name at court some fifty years apart: cf. Cheng Huang I above.

Cheng Huang 程璜 II, adopted daughter of. The Lady was a secondary wife 小妻 to the stern official Yang Qiu and, through her father, she had access to and influence in the palace. In 178 Cai Yong criticised her conduct and warned that she could bring ruin to the state, but Cheng Huang then arranged for his exile.

In 179 the Excellency Chen Qiu and others wanted Yang Qiu reappointed as Director of Retainers, so he might continue his purge of the palace eunuchs. The Lady Cheng revealed their plans to her father, and all those involved were arrested and killed.

About 180 a Lady Cheng was described as a close associate to Emperor Ling. Huang Gang of Yingchuan relied upon her influence in seeking an area of public wilderness to create a private park. Despite such pressure, the Administrator Chong Fu accepted the advice of his staff officer Liu Yi and refused the proposal.

In 185 the minister Cui Lie paid a fine to the emperor's private treasury in order to be appointed as an Excellency. At the inauguration Emperor Ling remarked to his attendants that they might have got a better price, but Lady Cheng replied that it was remarkable a man of such distinction was prepared to pay anything at all, and it was only through her persuasion that they had obtained anything.

The Lady referred to in each of these incidents was probably the same woman. -HHS 60/50B:1999, 56/46:1834, 81/71:2695, 52/42:1731.

Cheng Ji 程基 [Zhiye 雉業]; Hanzhong. The younger son of Cheng Zhi by his second marriage to the Lady Li Mujiang, Cheng Ji rose to be Administrator of Nan commandery. -HYZ 10C:171, HHS 84/74:2793 [some editions of HHS have the family surname as Chen 陳].

Cheng Ji 程畿 [Jiran 季然 or Jimo 季默] (d.222); Ba. In 200 Cheng Ji was a magistrate in his home commandery in Yi province. The Administrator Pang Xi was concerned that the warlord Governor Liu Zhang might have doubts about his loyalty. He sent Cheng Ji's son Qi/Yu to him, with orders for Cheng Ji to raise auxiliary troops from the local non-Chinese people. Cheng Ji refused, insisting that despite all provocation they must remain resolutely loyal to Liu Zhang and give him no cause for suspicion; if Pang Xi had any plans for rebellion, he would not follow him. Pang Xi argued with Cheng Ji and threatened to kill Cheng Qi, but Cheng Ji replied that even if he made his son into soup, like the legendary general Yue Yang 樂羊 he would drink the mixture and not change his policy. So Pang Xi was compelled to make terms with Liu Zhang.

When Liu Zhang heard of Cheng Ji's stand, he appointed him Administrator of Jiangyang, established from the southern part of Jianwei. Later, as Liu Bei took over the province from Liu Zhang, Cheng Ji changed allegiance and joined his staff.

In 222 Cheng Ji went with Liu Bei to attack Sun Quan on the middle Yangzi. Liu Bei's troops were heavily defeated and forced to retreat, but Cheng Ji and his squadron maintained the rear against great odds. He was killed in battle. -SGZ Shu 15:1089-90, HYZ 5:71, 12:220; deC 96:305-306.

Cheng Jian 程堅; Nanyang. Gentleman of the Palace to Liu Qian, King of Zhao, Cheng Jian was known for his moral worth. In 118 Liu Qian was disgraced for unseemly conduct: a county was taken from his fief and Cheng Jian was appointed as his Tutor. He took the king in hand, and Liu Qian gave up his bad ways. Cheng Jian reported to the court on this reformed conduct, and the territory which had been taken was restored.

Cheng Jian later became Administrator of Nan commandery, and a stele was erected for him at the temple of the legendary Qu Yuan 屈原. -HHS 14/4:559, SJZ 38:15a.

Cheng Jin 程覲; Hanzhong. Cheng Jin was the third son of Cheng Zhi by his first marriage. After their father's death he and his three full brothers abused their stepmother the Lady Li Mujiang. Eventually, however, impressed by her generous conduct, they presented themselves at the local prison to expiate their lack of filial respect.

Cheng Jin and his brothers later had official careers. -HYGZ 10C:171, HHS 84/74:2793 [some editions of HHS have the family surname as Chen 陳].

Cheng Jin 成璠 [Youping 幼平] (d.166); Hongnong. Well known as a virtuous scholar, Cheng Jin was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet.

In the middle 160s he was appointed Administrator of Nanyang. The commandery had long-established and powerful local families and many connections of the eunuchs at the imperial court, who joined in alliance and acted as bandits. Determined to bring order with a firm hand, as soon as he took up office Cheng Jin invited the well-known local reformer Cen Zhi to become his Officer of Merit, gave him complete trust and accepted all his recommendations. A popular song described Cen Zhi as the real administrator of Nanyang, while Cheng Jin "needs only to sit and sing."

In 165 Cen Zhi and his colleague, the Officer for Criminals 賊曹 Zhang Mu, reported against Zhang Fan, a wealthy merchant who supplied the imperial harem at Luoyang and who was alleged to have used his influence at court to act unlawfully. Cheng Jin had Zhang Fan arrested, and although an amnesty was current at the time, he had him beaten to death with a bastinado and killed more than two hundred of his kinsmen, clients and retainers. Only when they were dead did he report the matter to the throne.

The leading eunuch Hou Lan arranged for Zhang Fan's widow to present a formal complaint to Emperor Huan. Cheng Jin was arrested, while Cen Zhi and Zhang Mu fled away to the east. The case of Cheng Jin was associated with that of Liu Zhi, Administrator of Taiyuan, whose officer Wang Yun had killed a eunuch official, also under amnesty, and with those of Zhai Chao in Shanyang, who had attacked Hou Lan's property, and Huang Fu in Runan, who had taken ferocious action against the eunuch relative Xu Xuan. There was great interest among the reform party at the capital, and the Excellencies Chen Fan and Liu Mao presented arguments in their favour. The emperor was angry, the two men were criticised by other officials. Liu Mao made no further approach, but Chen Fan returned to the question, and in an eloquent presentation he argued that Cheng Jin's disregard of the amnesty should be ignored in the light of his devotion to the public interest. At this time too, the scholar Xiang Kai came to court and submitted memorials on the conduct of government, citing as number of portents and giving particular attention to the fate of Cheng Jin and Liu Zhi.

Despite these appeals, Cheng Jin and Liu Zhi were executed – sources differ whether they suffered in public or died in prison. The whole affair, with Chen Fan's argument that the letter of the law was irrelevant to men of good will, and the intense interest among the students of the University, the junior officers of the bureaucracy and gentry officials who sought reform, played a critical role in damaging the relationship between the imperial court and the administration which should serve it. -HHS 66/56:2163-65, 67/57:2186 & 2212, 102/12:3258, XC 4:3b-4a & 8b; deC 89:70-77, 373 ff., deC 75:8-9:76.

Cheng Lian 成廉. A cavalry commander under Lü Bu, Cheng Lian was captured by Cao Cao in 198. -SGZ 1:16.

Cheng Lü 程慮 or Cheng Xian 憲. When Deng Yu was given command in the west against the Gengshi Emperor in 24, he appointed Cheng Lü to his staff. -HHS 16/6:601.

Cheng Ping 程秉 [Deshu 德樞]; Runan. Formerly a student of the great scholar Zheng Xuan, during the 190s Cheng Ping went to the far south to take refuge from the troubles, where he studied philosophy and morality with Liu Xi and read widely in the Confucian classics.

Called up by Shi Xie, Cheng Ping became his Chief Clerk, but he was then summoned by Sun Quan and appointed Senior Tutor to his Heir, Sun Deng. He was later a minister of the kingdom of Wu, and died in the late 220s.

Cheng Ping compiled studies of the Book of Changes, the Classic of History and the Analects, a total of more than thirty thousand characters. -SGZ Wu 8:1248-49.

Cheng Pu 程普 [Demou 德謀]; Youbeiping. A good-looking man, quick-witted and skilful at planning, Cheng Pu was a local officer in his commandery and his province. He served under Sun Jian against the Yellow Turbans in 184 and then against Dong Zhuo in 190. He regularly distinguished himself in battle, and was several times wounded.

Sun Jian was killed in 192, but Cheng Pu joined Sun Ce in his operations south of the Yangzi from 195, and he rose to command two thousand soldiers and fifty horsemen. As Sun Ce attacked Kuaiji in 196, he named Cheng Pu Commandant of Wu commandery, with headquarters at Qiantang, present-day Hangzhou. He was later transferred to be Commandant of Danyang, with his base on the Yangzi south of present-day Nanjing, and he attacked and settled various groups of refugees and non-Chinese in the hill country to the south. On one occasion he rescued Sun Ce when he was surrounded by enemy soldiers of Zu Lang. He was promoted and given title as Administrator of Lingling, though that territory was not yet under the control of the Sun, and in 199 he accompanied the main army for the attacks on Liu Xun in Lujiang and on Huang Zu by the mouth of the Han.

When Sun Ce died in the following year, Cheng Pu and Zhang Zhao were among the leading supporters of the new chieftain Sun Quan, and Cheng Pu led an army through the Sun territory to ensure its loyalty. In 203 he took part in the settlement of Yuzhang, and in 208 he and Zhou Yu held joint command in the campaign against Cao Cao which brought victory at the Red Cliffs and the conquest of the middle Yangzi. [Years later, however, Lü Meng cited this experience as an argument against such shared authority: see sub Sun Jiao.]

Senior military commander of Wu, Cheng Pu was made Administrator of Jiangxia with title as a general and four cities to provide supplies. He moved to Nan commandery when Zhou Yu died in 210, but returned to Jiangxia after that territory was transferred to Liu Bei. He died soon afterwards; according to one story he became ill after burning the bodies of several hundred enemies, and died a few months later.

When Sun Quan took the imperial title in 229, he enfeoffed Cheng Pu's son Zi 咨 in memory of his father's service. -SGZ Wu 10:1283-84*.

Cheng Qi 程祈 or Cheng Yu 郁 [Gonghong 公弘]; Ba. Son of Cheng Ji, a county magistrate in his home commandery, Cheng Qi was on the staff of the Administrator Pang Xi.

About 200 Pang Xi sent Cheng Qi with orders for his father to raise auxiliary troops from the local non-Chinese people. Cheng Ji, rightly concerned that Pang Xi was considering rebellion against their overlord the Governor Liu Zhang, did not obey. Pang Xi threatened to kill Cheng Qi, but Cheng Ji defied him, claiming that his sense of duty was more important than his son's life. Pang Xi was eventually obliged to make terms with Liu Zhang.

Cheng Qi became a celebrated gentleman of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 15:1089, HYGZ 5:71; deC 96:305-306.

Cheng Qiu 程球 (d.187). Local officer to Geng Bi, Inspector of Liang province, Cheng Qiu was hated for his greed and corruption. In 187, as Geng Bi led troops against the rebels of Liang province, the men mutinied and killed them both. -HHS 58/48:1877; deC 84:152-153.

Cheng Tuo 程他 or Cheng Ta; Dong. About 210 Cheng

Tuo was murdered by Guo Zhen, who was having an affair with his wife. -SGZ 27:741.

Cheng Tuo 程他, wife of. About 210 the Lady had an affair with her cousin Guo Zhen, who then killed her husband. The pair were arrested and questioned by the commandery officer Feng Liang, but they withstood the flogging intended to force the truth from them. Feng Liang came to believe that he had made a false accusation, but the county magistrate Hu Zhi noted the sexual relationship between the two, examined the affair in more detail, and found out the truth. -SGZ 27:741.

Cheng Wei 程未; Chenliu. At the age of fourteen Cheng Wei became known for his filial conduct, and particularly for his almost hysterical response to the death of his father's brother. In a letter of recommendation to the Administrator of the commandery, probably written in the 170s, Cai Yong describes a personal interview with the boy, who appeared ravaged by sorrow, and his own examination of various attendants, who confirmed Cheng Wei's evident grief. Such excessive conduct was regarded as a reason for recommendation as Filial and Incorrupt. -Cai 8:2.

Cheng Wu 程烏 or Cheng Yan 焉. An officer under Gongsun Shu, in 28 Cheng Wu was sent to assist the warlords Lü Wei, Zhang Han and Jiang Zhen in the Wei valley. Guangwu's general Feng Yi defeated the allies at Chencang, then pursued Cheng Wu to the Han River and defeated him again.

After the destruction of Gongsun Shu in 36, Cheng Wu and some other officers were noted for their ability by Emperor Guangwu and were given appointments in his regime. -HHS 17/7:648, 13/3:537, 544.

Cheng Xian 程憲 see Cheng Lü 程慮.

Cheng Xin 程信 [Boyi 伯義] (d.114); Hanzhong. Officer of Merit in the commandery, in 110 Cheng Xin was left in charge at the capital as the Administrator Zheng Qin went to attack the Qiang. Zheng Qin was killed in battle, and Cheng Xin collected his body and escorted it to his home in Hejian. He then had twenty-five of Zheng Qin's former officials and students join an oath to avenge him, and each raised a troop of volunteers.

The new Administrator Deng Cheng maintained Cheng Xin on his staff, and when the Qiang came again four years later, Cheng Xin and his comrades fought them. They heavily defeated the enemy, but Cheng Xin died of his wounds.

Cheng Xin's heroism was reported to the throne, and in 118 an imperial letter ordered a grant of grain to his family. -HHS 87/77:2889, HYGZ 10C:169.

HYGZ gives the date of Cheng Xin's campaign and death as 115, but HHS has 114, which fits better with the pattern of events.

Cheng Xing 程興; Hanzhong. Cheng Xing was the eldest son of Cheng Zhi by his first marriage. After their father's death he and his three full brothers abused their stepmother the Lady Li Mujiang. Eventually, however, impressed by her generous conduct, they presented themselves at the local prison to expiate their lack of filial respect.

Cheng Xing and his brothers later had official careers. -HYGZ 10C. 171, HHS 84/74:2793 [some editions of HHS have the family surname as Chen 陳].

Cheng Xiu 程休. A senior official in Zuopingyi about 212, he was killed by the bandit Zhao Qinglong. -SGZ 16:511.

Cheng Xu 程徐 or Mu Xu 穆徐. During the 160s Cheng Xu was Administrator of Changsha. As he went on tour during the spring, orders were sent for the roads to be prepared, but the magistrate Zhou Gui did not have the work done, for he believed it was more important that the people should work in the fields. Cheng Xu sent an Investigator, and Zhou Gui promptly abandoned his office. Now embarrassed, Cheng Xu apologised and asked Zhou Gui to return, but Zhou Gui refused to serve under a man who cared more for his horses' hooves than for his people. -HQ 2:7b.

Cheng Xu 程緒 (d.193); Dai. In 193, as Liu Yu was preparing to attack Gongsun Zan, his officer Cheng Xu argued against it. Liu Yu killed him. -HHS 73/63:2356.

Cheng Xun 程恂. When Sui Yu, general in the service of Lu Fang, turned against him in 36, Emperor Guangwu sent Cheng Xun as an envoy to bring him and his brother Sui Xing to the capital for appointment and enfeoffment. -HHS 12/2:507.

Cheng Yan 程焉 see Cheng Wu 程烏.

Cheng Yan 程嚴 (d.121). In the autumn of 121 the Xianbi chieftain Qizhijian raided Yunzhong. The Administrator Cheng Yan led local levies to oppose him, but was defeated and killed. -HHS 5:233, 19/9:719, 90/80:2987; deC 84:300.

Cheng Yishi 成翊世 [Jiming 季明]; Pingyuan. A keen and skilled scholar when he was young, Cheng Yishi became a local officer in the commandery. From that position he sent a letter to the capital objecting to the fact that, although Emperor An had taken the cap of manhood in 109 and was formally of age, the Dowager Deng still controlled the government. The Dowager had him punished, but when Emperor An took power after the death of the Lady Deng in 121, Cheng Yishi was called to the capital and appointed to the Imperial Secretariat.

In 124 the eunuch Fan Feng and the emperor's wet-nurse, the Lady Wang Sheng, spoke against the Heir Liu Bao and obtained his dismissal. Cheng Yishi wrote several times to defend Liu Bao and to accuse Fan Feng and Wang Sheng. Emperor An paid no attention, and Cheng Yishi was arrested. He was threatened with execution, but the emperor ordered that he only be expelled from office and sent back to his home country.

After Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, was brought to the throne by a coup in 125, the Excellency Zhang Hao reported Cheng Yishi's endeavours. Cheng Yishi was appointed a Consultant, but he did not regard his efforts as worthy of such reward: he resigned his office and likewise refused invitations to join the clerical offices at the capital.

The Deputy Director of the Secretariat Yu Xu admired Cheng Yishi's attitude and believed he should be involved in government. He arranged his recall as a Consultant, and about 130 the succeeding Deputy Guo Qian and the Director Zuo Xiong nominated Cheng Yishi for the Secretariat itself. Widely respected for his honest and direct advice, Cheng Yishi later took Zuo Xiong's place as Director. -HHS 57/47:1840.

Cheng Yu 程豫; Hanzhong. Cheng Yu was the fourth son of Cheng Zhi by his first marriage. After their father's death he and his brothers abused their stepmother the Lady Li Mujiang. Eventually, however, impressed by her generous conduct, they presented themselves at the local prison to expiate their lack of filial respect.

Cheng Yu and his brothers later had official careers. -HYGZ 10C:171 HHS 84/74:2793 [some editions of HHS have the family surname as Chen 陳].

Cheng Yu 程昱 or Cheng Li 立 [Zhongde 仲德] (142-221); Dong. As the Yellow Turban rising broke out in 184, Wang Du, assistant magistrate of Cheng Yu's home county Dong'a, joined the rebels. As the magistrate led the people into the hills, Cheng Yu sent men to spy and learnt that Wang Du, unable to hold the empty city, had set up camp outside. The refugees were afraid to return, but Cheng Yu and the local leader Xue Fang tricked them into believing that the enemy were not in the city but in the hills behind them. So the people returned to the city, and when Wang Fu attacked they rallied and defeated him.

About 190 the Inspector Liu Dai invited Cheng Yu to join his staff. He would not accept, but he did advise Liu Dai to ally with Yuan Shao rather than with Gongsun Zan. When Liu Dai was killed and Cao Cao took over in 192, Cheng Yu accepted appointment as a county magistrate in Dongping.

As Cao Cao attacked Xu province in 194, Cheng Yu remained behind, and he helped Xun Yu defend the position in Yan province against Lü Bu and the rebel Chen Gong. Lü Bu held the family of Jin Yun, magistrate of Fan, as hostages, but Cheng Yu persuaded Jin Yun to hold his position, and he himself blocked Chen Gong's advance and guarded his own home city of Dong'a. When Cao Cao returned he was suitably grateful and he appointed Cheng Yu Chancellor of Dongping. Cao Cao later became discouraged and considered taking refuge with Yuan Shao, but Cheng Yu stiffened his resolve to remain independent. He became one of Cao Cao's most trusted advisers.

As Emperor Xian was brought to Xu city in 196, Cheng Yu was appointed to the Imperial Secretariat. Yan province was still disturbed, however, so he was sent there as Administrator of Jiyin and Area Commander for the region. Eight foot three inches tall [190 cm] and well bearded, he was rigid and could be abrupt. He distrusted Liu Bei, urged Cao Cao to kill him when he came to surrender in 196, and opposed letting him go to Xu province in 199.

When Yuan Shao attacked south in 200, Cheng Yu held appointment as a general and commanded a small garrison in Dong commandery. Cao Cao offered reinforcements, but Cheng Yu refused, saying that a larger force would attract attention and it was safer not to be noticed. Admiring his courage, Cao Cao agreed, and indeed Cheng Yu was not attacked.

Cheng Yu later recruited men from refugee groups of the hills and marshes to join the attack on Yuan Tan and Yuan Shang. He was placed in charge of the water transport with Li Dian, and they defeated Yuan Shang's officer Gao Fan when he attempted to block the supply route.

After the defeat of the Yuan in 204 Cheng Yu was rewarded with enfeoffment, and he went into semi-retirement. He served as adviser to Cao Pi at Ye city when Cao Cao went on campaign to the northwest in 211, and he persuaded Cao Pi not to kill defeated rebels without first referring the question to his father.

In 217 Cheng Yu was one of the senior officials who petitioned Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei, and in 217 he became Commandant of Guards for the royal state of Wei; he was dismissed after he quarrelled over precedence with the Commandant of the Capital Xing Zhen.

When Cao Pi came to the throne in 220 Cheng Yu was restored to office and raised in fief, and his name appears as sponsor on a stele which commemorated Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. He died at the age of eighty, and Cao Pi mourned him with high posthumous honours. -SGZ 14:425-29*, LS 19:4a; Goodman 98:196.

Wei lue, quoted in SGZ 14:427, tells how Cheng Yu's original personal name was Li 立. As a child he had a dream that he climbed Mount Tai and grasped the sun. During the struggle to hold Yan province against Lü Bu in 194, he mentioned this dream to Xun Yu, who then told Cao Cao. Cao Cao remarked that this was a sign of his loyalty, and he added the character 日 "sun" to his personal name, so that Li 立 became Yu 昱.

Cheng Yu 程郁 see Cheng Qi 程祁: HYGZ 5:71.

Cheng Zeng 程曾 [Xiugong 秀升]; Yuzhang. Having studied at Chang'an for over ten years, Cheng Zeng became an expert in the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu according to the Zhuang/Yan interpretation. He returned to his home country and became a teacher, with several hundred students at a time; one of them was Gu Feng of Kuaiji. Cheng Zeng wrote over a hundred pian on problems in the classics, and he also compiled a detailed commentary to Mencius.

In 78 Cheng Zeng was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a county magistrate in Guangling. He died in that office. -HHS 79/69B:2581*.

Cheng Zheng 程徵; Jianwei. In 203 Cheng Zheng and his fellow-countryman Shi Qian persuaded the Governor Liu Zhang to divide Jianwei and set up the new commandery of Jiangyang. -HYGZ 3:40.

Cheng Zhenjue 程貞玦, the Lady [Qiongyu 瓊玉]; Jianwei. The Lady's original personal name was simply Jue. At the age of nineteen she was married to Zhang Wei, but he died a few months later. Though the couple had no children, the Lady cared day and night for her late husband's nephew Zhang Yue and other dependents.

The Investigator Wang Zhong wanted to marry the Lady, her uncle Cheng Hong approved on her behalf, and the Administrator Li Yan sent an officer with wedding gifts. The Lady, however, threw herself into a river, and although she was rescued the marriage plans were abandoned.

Later Administrators praised the Lady's loyalty, and the character zhen 貞 "chaste" was officially added to her personal name. -HYGZ 10B: 160.

Cheng Zhi 程祗 [Wenju 文矩]; Hanzhong. A widower with four sons, Cheng Zhi took the Lady Li Mujiang as his second wife and had two sons by her. He became a county magistrate in Nanyang but died in that office. -HYGZ 10C:171, HHS 84/74:2793. [Some editions of HHS have his name as Chen Wenzhi 陳文知, presumably from confusion with his style.]

Cheng Zhi 程祗, wife of: see the Lady Li Mujiang 李穆姜.

Cheng Zun 成存; Guanghan. In 203 Liu Zhang established the region of Jiangyang, in the southern part of Jianwei, as a separate commandery, and appointed Cheng Zun, who had been Commandant there, as the new Administrator. -HYGZ 3:40.

Chengda 成大 of Shule [Kashgar]. In 84 King Zhong of Shule turned against Han, but his minister Chengda did not support him. The Chinese agent Ban Chao put down the dissidents, deposed King Zhong, and placed on the throne. -HHS 47/37:1579.

Chenggong Fu 成公浮. Administrator of Kuaiji, Chenggong Fu was accused of embezzlement by the Inspector Ouyang Can. Through the loyal defence of his officer Dai Jiu, he was eventually cleared and allowed to retire. -HHS 81/71:2691.

Chenggong Ying 成公英; Jincheng. In the late 180s Chenggong Ying became a personal follower of the Liang province rebel Han Sui [or Han Yue]. After the north-western warlords were defeated by Cao Cao in 211, Han Sui's men scattered and Chenggong Ying was the only one to accompany him back to his base.

Han Sui's officer Yan Xing later turned against him in support of Cao Cao, and in 214 Cao Cao's general Xiahou Yuan drove Han Sui from his positions in Hanyang. Han Sui thought of fleeing south into Shu, but Chenggong Ying persuaded him to seek aid from the Qiang and other non-Chinese, and with these allies Han Sui defeated Yan Xing and held his ground in Jincheng.

When Han Sui died in 215, Chenggong Ying surrendered to Cao Cao; he was well received and was granted a military post and a marquisate. As he accompanied Cao Cao on a hunt, three deer crossed their path, and Cao Cao told Chenggong Ying to shoot them. He killed them with just three shots and Cao Cao clapped his hands, but then asked whether Chenggong Ying could serve him so loyally as he had Han Sui. Chenggong Ying got down from his horse, knelt before Cao Cao and wept as he explained that he could make no such promise, for he would never have joined Cao Cao if Han Sui were still alive. Admiring his honesty, Cao Cao continued to treat him with affection and respect.

In 220 Chenggong Ying was sent by Cao Pi to assist Su Ze and Zhang Ji take control over the newly-restored Liang 涼 province, which controlled the route to central Asia. He died of illness on that campaign. -SGZ 15:475.

Chengguo 成國 of Jumi [present-day Yutian]. In 129 King Fangjian of Yutian [Khotan] attacked Jumi and killed its king Xing. In 132 King Chenpan of Shule [Kashgar] was commissioned by Han to retake Jumi, and Chengguo, a member of the royal house, was placed on the throne.

In 151 the Chinese Chief Clerk for the Western Regions Zhao Ping was taken ill and died at Yutian. Chengguo asserted that he had been poisoned, and as King Jian of Yutian was being questioned by Zhao Ping's successor Wang Jing, one of Chengguo's officers, Qinmu, assassinated him.

In 175 Jian's son Anguo launched another attack on Jumi, devastated the state and killed the king. This unfortunate ruler was probably not Chengguo, but a successor. -HHS 88/78:2915, 2916.

Cheniu 車紐 see Che'niu 車紐.

Chenliu, Old Man of 陳留老父 see Old Man of Chenliu.

Chenpan 臣槃/磐/盤 of Shule [Kashgar]. Maternal uncle of King Anguo of Shule, on account of some wrongdoing about 115 Chenpan was sent into exile. He travelled to the Great Yuezhi in present-day northern Afghanistan, and was treated with great favour.

When Anguo died without sons his mother served as regent. She planned to have Yifu, a nephew of Chenpan, succeed to power, but when Chenpan arrived with an escort of Yuezhi he was promptly acclaimed as ruler. As the state of Suoju [Yarkand] turned from Yutian [Khotan] to ally itself with Shule, Shule became a leading state of the west in opposition to Qiuzi and Yutian.

In 127 Chenpan sent a tribute mission to Han and was given title as Grand Chief Commandant 大都尉, with nominal authority over the Western Regions; this was the same title as had been awarded to King Xian of Suoju [Yarkand] a hundred years earlier. In 130 he sent a hostage son, and in 133 he presented lions and zebus.

In 132 the Administrator of Dunhuang Xu You ordered Chenpan to attack Yutian, and compel King Fangqian to restore the independence of Jumi [present-day Yutian]. The mission was carried out with energy.

In 168 the king of Shule was assassinated by Hede, described by HHS 88/78 as his uncle, and by the stele of Cao Quan [a less reliable source] as his son. Though the victim is described as Grand Chief Commandant, his name is not given. Since Chenpan was probably born before 100 he could not have had an active uncle seventy years later, and the title had evidently been transferred to some unfortunate successor. -HHS 88/78:2915, 2927.

Chentang 陳湯; non-Chinese. Tribesmen of the hill county in the west of Wuling, in 116 Chentang and his colleague Yangsun took over an indigenous rebellion which had begun the year before. Styling themselves generals and adopting red caps as a uniform, they destroyed government offices and plundered the people. The provincial authorities called up auxiliaries from tribes which had stayed loyal, and the trouble was put down. -HHS 86/76:2833.

Chenxun 臣勳 of Shule [Kashgar]. Nephew of King Chenpan by an elder brother, when a tribute mission was sent to Han in 127 Chenpan was named Grand Chief Commandant and Chenxun was given title as a major. -HHS 88/78:2927.

Chenzong 陳縱 see Chencong 陳從.

Chi 郝 [surname] see Hao 郝 passim.

Chi Jian 郗儉 see Que Jian 卻儉.

Chi Lü 郗慮 [Hongyu 鴻豫]; Shanyang. When he was young Chi Lü was a student of Zheng Xuan, and in the late 190s Chi Lü joined the Han court at Xu city under Cao Cao. Recommended by Xun Yu, he became a Palace Attendant and Minister of the Household. Kong Rong and he disliked one another, and Chi Lü presented a memorial which brought Kong Rong's dismissal. In 208 he had Lu Cui offer a further set of accusations, and Kong Rong was killed. Later that year Chi Lü became Imperial Counsellor, second only to Cao Cao as Imperial Chancellor in the formal structure of Han; he probably owed his position rather to compliance than to ability.

In 213 Chi Lü formally presented Cao Cao with his insignia as Duke of Wei and with the Nine Distinctions, and in 214 he purged the Fu family of the Empress Fu, arresting her in the presence of the emperor. He left office or died about 215. -HHS 70/60:2274, 10B:454.

Chi Meng 郗萌. A scholar of portents, Chi Meng composed works on omens in Chunqiu and under Qin, and Liu Zhao cites a number of his interpretations in commentary to the Treatise of Astronomy by Sima Biao. Hou Kang and Yao Zhenzong suggest that he was a man of the Later Han period. -Hou Kang:2119, Yao Zhenzong:2345 and (e.g.) HHS 110/10:3222.

Chi Qiong 池瓊 was a county magistrate in Henan. -FSTY 5f:122.

Chi Yi 郗揖 see Que Yi 卻揖; on other forms of the surname see sub Que Jian.

Chi'er 赤兒. In 192 Chi'er was the trusted leader of a group of non-Chinese bodyguards to Niu Fu, nephew of Dong Zhuo, who commanded an army in Hongnong. Following the assassination of Dong Zhuo at Chang'an, there was a mutiny in the camp and Niu Fu was frightened. Gathering his treasure, he offered to reward Chi'er and his fellows if they would escort him north across the Yellow River. Instead, however, they took all the goods, killed Niu Fu and sent his head to the new government at Chang'an. -HHS 72/62:2332-33, SGZ 6:181.

The characters before the name of Chi'er appear variously as zhihu 支胡 [HHS 72/62], hu, puhu 支胡 or even youhu 友胡 [SGZ 6], while modern punctuation and indexes are likewise uncertain. Hu alone can be a surname, but I believe the characters simply describe Chi'er as some form of non-Chinese.

Chong, Emperor 冲帝 (reg. 144-145) see Liu Bing 劉炳.

Chong 种 [surname unknown]. Younger brother to a secondary wife 小婦 of Ma Chao, Chong stayed in the region of Chang'an when Ma Chao went to the west. As Ma Chao turned against Cao Cao about 210, Chong took refuge in Hanzhong, and a few years later, as Ma Chao was driven south from Liang province, Chong went to call upon him. Ma Chao beat his breast and wept that all his family had been lost, save only the two of them. -SGZ Shu 6:946.

In SGZJJ Shu 6:12a, Zhao Yijing suggests that Chong was a brother of the Lady Dong V, who was a concubine 庶婦 of Ma Chao at this time [SGZ Shu 6:948], but the relationship may well have been through an earlier connection.

Chong Dai 种岱 [Gongzu 公祖]; Henan. Son of the Excellency Chong Gao, Chong Dai received many recommendations to office, but refused all of them. He was eventually sent an invitation and an official carriage, but died at that time. Li Xie, who had received a similar invitation and became a Consultant, argued that Chong Dai should be recognised as a former official; this was not approved. -HHS 56/46:1829*.

Chong Fu 种拂 [Yingbo 穎伯] (d.192); Henan. Son of the Excellency Chong Gao, Chong Fu became an Attendant Officer under the Director of Retainers and was later magistrate of Wan, chief city of Nanyang commandery. He established good government by moral pressure on his juniors to attend to their duties and take less time for their pleasures.

About 180 Chong Fu became Administrator of Yingchuan and invited the wealthy recluse Liu Yi to become his Officer of Merit. Because Chong Fu was the son of a worthy senior official, Liu Yi accepted.

During Chong Fu's term in Yingchuan a certain Huang Gang sought an area of public wilderness to create a private park. He had support from the Lady Cheng, a close associate to Emperor Ling, but Chong Fu refused to give permission.

In 190 Chong Fu was promoted from Household Counsellor to Excellency of Works in the regime controlled by Dong Zhuo, but he left that office on account of an earthquake in the following year. He became Minister of Ceremonies.

In 192, after the assassination of Dong Zhuo, his former officers Li Jue and others attacked Chang'an. Bitterly angry that "By our failures as servants of the state, we have brought naked swords against the palace," Chong Fu fought them and died. -HHS 56/46: 1829-30*.

Chong Gao 种嵩 (d.115) see Zhong Guang 仲光.

Chong Gao 种嵩 [Jingbo 景伯] (103-163); Henan. Chong Gao's father, a county magistrate in Jiyin, was wealthy, but when he died Chong Gao distributed his property to the poor people of his clan and neighbourhood.

Chong Gao first held appointment in the county office of his native Luoyang, and was then recommended to the Intendant of Henan, Tian Xin, by his nephew Wang Shen. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he served in the offices of the Excellencies, was graded First Class, and about 142 he became an officer of the Imperial Censorate.

At this time eight special commissioners, including Du Qiao and Zhou Ju, had been sent on a tour of inspection, but through the influence of Liang Ji and the eunuchs little had been done to follow up their reports. Pressing the matter, Chong Gao secured the impeachment of Liu Xuan the Administrator of Shu commandery and some others, and he also persuaded Emperor Shun to review the appointments of eunuch relatives and favourites who held provincial office and had performed badly. This program, however, had little effect, and even Liu Xuan was later promoted to ministerial office.

In 144 Chong Gao was given charge of the household of the one-year-old Heir Liu Bing. When the eunuch Gao Fan came to collect the infant, Chong Gao faced him with a drawn sword and demanded his authority. Eventually an imperial authorisation for the move arrived, but Chong Gao was admired for his firm action.

Later that year Chong Gao became Inspector of Yi province, where he attended to the non-Chinese people of the hill country and restored their allegiance to Han. On one occasion, the Administrator of Shu commandery sent a bribe to the leading eunuch Cao Teng, carried in the baggage of the annual Reporting Officer. Chong Gao seized it and asked that Cao Teng be punished. The court held there was no evidence Cao Teng had solicited the gift, so no action was taken. For his part, Cao Teng admired Chong Gao's honesty and became his patron.

Chong Gao's relationship with the General-in-Chief Liang Ji was more unsettling. When Liu Junshi, Administrator of Yongchang, had a snake cast from local gold for Liang Ji, Chong Gao intercepted the gift and reported it, so that it had to be placed in the official treasury. Then the religious leader Fu Zhi made a rising in Ba commandery in 147; Chong Gao and the Administrator Ying Cheng attacked the rebels but were heavily defeated. Liang Ji impeached them, and they were liable to execution, but both men were defended by the Grand Commandant Li Gu, and the regent Dowager Liang sentenced them only to dismissal.

Later that year, however, on the recommendation of Zhu Mu, Chong Gao was invited to join Liang Ji's staff, and when there was trouble with the Qiang he was made Inspector of Liang province. He was so popular that a petition was presented for him to stay an extra year, and when he became Administrator of Hanyang non-Chinese people migrated there for refuge.

Chong Gao was then Emissary to the court of the Southern Xiongnu, and he later transferred to Liaodong, where his reputation for benevolence settled the unruly Wuhuan. Some fault, however, was found, and he was dismissed and returned to the capital.

In 154 the Director of Retainers gave Chong Gao special recommendation as Capable and Good, Sincere and Upright. He was appointed a Consultant, then transferred to be Administrator of Nan commandery. He returned to a post in the Imperial Secretariat, but in 159 he was sent north as General Who Crosses the Liao to deal with raiding by the Xiongnu in Bing and Liang provinces. Emphasising negotiation before any attack, he arranged the release of non-Chinese held hostage by the local authorities. From the Ordos to the northwest, the non-Chinese submitted, and it is said the borders were so peaceful that watch-towers could be abandoned and beacon fires were unused.

Returning to Luoyang as Minister of Finance, Chong Gao became Excellency over the Masses in 161. He sponsored worthy officials such as Qiao Xuan and Huangfu Gui, while he always acknowledged the favour he had received from the eunuch Cao Teng.

Chong Gao died after three years in office. He was mourned by the people of the frontier, and each time the Shanyu of the Southern Xiongnu visited the Han court he offered sacrifice at his tomb. -HHS 56/46:1826-29*, XC 3:7b, XHS 4:6b-7a.

Chong Guang 种光 see Zhong Guang 仲光.

Chong He 冲和. Probably a man of Later Han, Chong He became an Academician. -FSTY 5f:124.

Chong Ji 种辑 (d.200). A Palace Attendant at Chang'an in 192, Chong Ji joined Xun You and others in a conspiracy against Dong Zhuo. The plan was found out, but Dong Zhuo was killed soon afterwards.

As an associate of Dong Cheng and Yang Ding in 195, Chong Ji accompanied the court on the escape to the east and was enfeoffed for his good work. Later a colonel at Xu city, in 199 he joined Dong Cheng's conspiracy against Cao Cao. The plot was discovered a few months later, and Chong Ji and his family were destroyed.

Chong Jing 种兢. About 90 Chong Jing was Prefect of Luoyang. One day when he was travelling, a slave of Ban Gu obstructed his cortège. The man was drunk, and as Chong Jing's attendants sought to clear the way he swore at them. Since Ban Gu was connected to the Dou family of the regent Dowager, Chong Jing was afraid to take any action at that time.

When Emperor He destroyed the Dou family in 92, Ban Gu was dismissed from office. Chong Jing then had him arrested, and Ban Gu died in prison. -HHS 40/30B:1386.

Chong Shao 种劭 [Shenfu 申甫] (d.194); Henan. Chong Shao was a son of Chong Fu. As Dong Zhuo was advancing towards Luoyang on the request of He Jin in 189, Chong Shao was sent with orders for him to keep out of the capital district. Dong Zhuo continued his advance, and sent men to threaten Chong Shao, but Chong Shao overawed them and repeated his demand. Dong Zhuo then withdrew his troops.

When Dong Zhou seized power in 189, he named Chong Shao a Palace Attendant, but he came to resent his opposition. He demoted him to be a Consultant, and in 192 he intended to send him out as Inspector of Liang and Yi provinces. Then Dong Zhuo was assassinated, and Chong Shao's father was killed fighting Li Jue and his followers. Leaving office, Chong Shao later refused ministerial appointments, though he did become a Counsellor Remonstrant.

As the western warlord Ma Teng quarrelled with Li Jue and his fellows in 194, Chong Shao planned to take advantage of the confusion to overthrow Li Jue's power at Chang'an. The conspiracy was discovered and the plotters fled west to Huaili in Youfufeng. Li Jue's troops drove Ma Teng away, then stormed the city and killed Chong Shao and his associates. -HHS 56/46:1830*.

Chong Wei 崇隗; Langye. Intendant of Henan in 135, Chong Wei was involved in the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang; see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16:14b.

Chong Yu 种昱; Shu. As a young man Chong Yu studied under Yan Jihou, and when Yan Jihou was appointed Commandant of a frontier territory in Shu commandery Chong Yu wanted to join him. The road was blocked by non-Chinese rebels, and Chong Yu was forced to make several detours. He was almost killed, but eventually reached his master, and was widely admired for his dedication. -HYGZ 10A:137, HYGZJBTZ:537.

Chu 鄙 [personal name unknown]. A stele erected in 63 records the contribution of this man, Administrator of Hanyang, to the reconstruction of the Baoye Road through the Qin Ling ranges. The project, over a hundred kilometres, included five large bridges, 623 trestles and sixty-four ancillary buildings such as post-and-relay-stations. -Needham 71:21-22, Ebrey 86:613-614.

Chu 觸 [surname unknown] see Jiao Chu 焦觸. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Chu [Dabo] 儲大伯. In the autumn of 25 the new Emperor Guangwu sent the Counsellor Remonstrant Chu Dabo to Shangdang and Taiyuan to call the Gengshi commanders there to surrender. Tian Yi the Administrator of Shangdang accepted the summons, but Bao Yong and Feng Yan in Taiyuan did not. They kept Zhu Dabo prisoner, but when messengers from Chang'an confirmed that the Gengshi Emperor was dead they released him and went to surrender. -HHS 29/19:1018.

Chu Feng 褚鳳; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Chu Feng was a senior member of the group. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Chunyu Deng 淳于登 (d.179). A eunuch Regular Attendant, Chunyu Deng was an associate of Wang Fu. In 179 he and others of their party were impeached by the Director of Retainers Yang Qiu. They were tortured and died in prison. -HHS 77/67:2499-2500.

Chunyu Gong 淳于恭 [Mengsun 孟孫] (d.80); Beihai. Born at the end of Former Han, Chunyu Gong was an expert in Lao zi and a firm follower of passivism. He constantly sought to prevent people quarrelling or fighting, and if robbers came to steal his crops he would help them, or hide so as not to embarrass them.

During a time of famine at the end of the reign of Wang Mang, Chunyu Gong's brother Chong was taken by bandits. They intended to eat him, but Chunyu Gong asked to take his place, and the bandits were so impressed that they let both men go. In similar disregard for his life, Chunyu Gong worked in the fields even at the height of civil war, remarking that his life or death should not concern anyone else.

He was invited to office by the commandery and provincial governments, was recommended Filial and Incorrupt and recruited to the offices at the capital, but he always refused and would retire into the wilderness when the summonses became too importunate. Eventually he took refuge in exile in Langye, and remained there more than twenty years.

In 76 Emperor Zhang issued an edict praising Chunyu Gong's conduct, and ordered the local authorities to award him twenty bales of silk. He sent a carriage for him, appointed him a Consultant, and a few days later promoted him Palace Attendant. Chunyu Gong delighted the ruler with his moral advice, and was honoured and favoured.

Despite his quietist approach, when Emperor Zhang called the conference on Confucianism at the White Tiger Hall in 79, Chunyu Gong played a leading role. Questions were presented to the panel of scholars by Wei Ying, and Chunyu Gong prepared the summary of their opinions which was presented to the emperor for final decision.

When Chunyu Gong was taken ill in 80 the emperor sent frequent messengers to enquire after him, and when he died he was honoured with a special edict and an inscribed stele. -HHS 3:138-39, 39/29:1301*; Tjan 49:16, 161, Vervorn 90:148-149, 285-286.

Chunyu Jia 淳于嘉; Ji'nan. In 191 Chunyu Jia was promoted from Household Counsellor to be Excellency of Works under the regime of Dong Zhuo at Chang'an, and in the following year he became Excellency over the Masses. He attended Emperor Xian at his capping ceremony in 194, but left office at the end of that year. -HHS 9:371-77.

Chunyu Lin 淳于臨; Lujiang. After the defeat and death of Li Xian in 30, his follower Chunyu Lin led a group of his comrades into the western hills where they caused trouble and killed a county magistrate. Ouyang Xi, Governor of Yang province, could not defeat them, but the junior official Chen Chong persuaded them to surrender. -HHS 12/2:501.

Chunyu Qiong 淳于瓊 [Zhongjian 仲簡] (d.200). In 188 Chunyu Qiong was a colonel in the Western Garden corps established by Emperor Ling. He later joined Yuan Shao, and in 195 he persuaded him not to take Emperor Xian under his protection.

In 199, contradicting Ju Shou, Chunyu Qiong urged a direct attack on Cao Cao. He was given command of one of the three divisions of the army, and in 200 he led the main convoy bringing supplies to Yuan Shao's forces at Guandu. He was attacked by Cao Cao's raiding party, was captured and, like many of his men, had his nose taken off. Cao Cao thought of sparing his life, but the renegade Xu You persuaded him to kill him. -HHS 8:358, SGZ 1:19-22, 6:195-99.

Chunyu Shi 淳于式. Administrator of Kuaiji in Sun Quan's service about 217, he criticised Lu Xun for harshness during his campaigns of settlement in the southeast. Lu Xun on the other hand praised Chunyu Shi. Sun Quan asked about it, and Lu Xun explained that although he disagreed with Chunyu Shi he respected his concern for the people. -SGZ Wu 13:1344.

Chunyu Xiao 淳于孝; Beihai. Son of Chunyu Gong, after the death of his father in 80 Chunyu Xiao was made a member of the Suite of the Heir, a low ranking probationary office for commissioned appointment. -HHS 39/29:1301.

Chunyu Yi 淳于翼; Kuaiji. A distinguished scholar, Chunyu Yi was a magistrate of the markets at Luoyang. Early in the reign of Emperor Huan, when a large snake appeared in a hall of the Northern Palace Chunyu Yi observed that since snakes have scales, this was a sign that there would be armed conflict and a great minister would be killed. He left the capital and returned home to live in seclusion. [His forecast presumably related to the death of Liang Ji in 159, though this took place more than ten years later.]

In 151, though initially reluctant to receive him, Chunyu Yi became friends with the local magistrate Du Shang. -HHS 107/17:3344, HHJ 22:257.

Ci Chong 茨充 [Zihe 子河 or 子何]; Nanyang. When Ci Chong was a young candidate on his way to the capital, a colleague's horse died. Having arrived at the post-house, he left his own carriage and went back with his horse to pull his friend's. He became known for this generosity.

In the early 50s Ci Chong succeeded Wei Sa as Administrator of Guiyang. He continued his program of civilisation and settlement, encouraging schools and increasing the prosperity of the people with farming and weaving. He also taught the people to grow hemp and make sandals, as a means to provide themselves with civilised footwear instead of going barefoot. He is classed as a Benevolent Official 循吏. -HHS 76/66: 2458-60; Miyakawa 60:31, 34, deC 90:11, 28.

Congqian 從錢 [Follow Money]. Sobriquet of a robber-bandit in Donglai, put down by He Kui and Zhang Liao about 200. -SGZ 12:379.

Cuan Xi 爨習; Yizhou? A man of family, Cuan Xi became a county magistrate in Yizhou. He was reported for some fault, and should have been dismissed, but because of his local influence the Administrator Dong He took no action. Cuan Xi later became a military commander. -SGZ Shu 13:1045-46.

Cui 崔, the Lady (d.218); Qinghe. A niece of Cui Yan, she married Cao Cao's son Cao Zhi. In 218 she was wearing an embroidered gown, in defiance of the sumptuary laws, when Cao Cao saw her from a tower. He sent her home to kill herself. -SGZ 12:369.

Cui Juye 崔巨業. A general under Yuan Shao, in 192 Cui Juye was sent to invade Zhuo commandery. He had no success, and Gongsun Zan defeated him heavily as he withdrew. -HHS 73/63:2363.

Cui Jun 崔鈞 [Yuanping 元平 or Zhouping 州平? qq.v.]; Boling; see sub Cui Zhuan. Son of Cui Lie, as a young man Cui Jun established a reputation as a fighting man; he became General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger, in charge of a palace guard of military cadets.

In 185 his father Cui Lie became an Excellency, but he had paid a large amount of money for the appointment and felt uneasy about it. He asked Cui Jun what people thought, and Cui Jun replied that people believed he was suitable for high rank, but they disapproved of the payment he had made. Cui Lie was angry, and took a stick to hit Cui Jun. Though Cui Jun was in armour, he ran away. Cui Lie shouted at him for his lack of filial piety, but Cui Jun replied that though the legendary sage Shun 舜 would stand his ground for blows given by his father with a small stick, he ran away from a large one. Cui Lie calmed down.

In 190 Cui Jun was Administrator of Xihe. Though his father was with Dong Zhuo, he led troops to join the rebellion led by Yuan Shao. He is not heard of again. -HHS 52/42:1731-32; Ebrey 78:50-51, but see also Cui Yuanping and Cui Zhouping below.

Cui Lie 崔烈 [Weikao 威考] (d.192); Anping/Boling: see sub Cui Zhuan. Son of Cui Ban and a junior cousin of Cui Shi, he too was a man of considerable scholarship. He wrote a number of poems, hymns and essays, and held a high reputation across the north of the empire. He was a local officer in his commandery, joined the offices of the Excellency over the Masses about 170, and was later Administrator in a number of commanderies. About 180 he became a minister.

In 185 Cui Lie was promoted from Minister of Justice to Excellency over the Masses. At this time the government had instituted a system of fines or purchase of office, and Cui Lie was obliged to present five million cash to the emperor's private treasury in the Western Garden. At the inauguration Emperor Ling observed to his attendants that if he had been kept him longer he might have given more, but his favourite the Lady Cheng replied that it was only through her efforts that such a distinguished man had been persuaded to pay anything at all. Cui Lie's reputation suffered from this affair, he was unhappy about it himself, and he quarrelled with his son Cui Jun when he told him that, though people believed he was worthy of high rank they disapproved of the means by which he had obtained it; he was nicknamed Tongchou 銅臭 "Stink of Copper."

In the following year, concerned at the costs of the rebellion in Liang province, Cui Lie suggested that the northwest should be abandoned; he was vehemently opposed by the Consultant Fu Xie, who argued that the region was of essential strategic value against the barbarians, and Cui Lie was either a fool or a traitor. The emperor accepted Fu Xie's arguments.

In 187 Cui Lie was promoted Grand Commandant and was enfeoffed as a marquis. There is no record whether he paid money on this occasion, but he left his office after only a few months tenure.

In 189 Cui Lie attempted unsuccessfully to prevent Dong Zhuo from seizing the young emperor. In the following year Cui Jun joined the eastern alliance; Dong Zhuo arrested Cui Lie and imprisoned him kept in irons at the fortress of Mei in Youfufeng.

When Dong Zhuo was assassinated by Wang Yun and Lü Bu in 192, Cui Lie was released. He was appointed Colonel of the Gates in the new government, but was killed a few weeks later as Dong Zhuo's former officers captured Chang'an. -HHS 52/42:1731-32; Mather 76:581.

Cui Lin 崔林 [Deru 德儒] (d.244); Qinghe. Cui Lin was slow to demonstrate any ability, and only his cousin Cui Yan recognised his potential. After Cao Cao had taken over Ji province in 204 Cui Lin was appointed as a county magistrate in Taiyuan; he was so poor that he could not afford a carriage and had to walk to take up his new position.

In 207, after Cao Cao had defeated Gao Gan and taken over Bing province, he asked the Inspector Zhang Zhi who was the best of his local officials. Zhang Zhi recommended Cui Lin, and Cao Cao appointed him to senior positions on his staff in Ji province. He later transferred Cui Lin to his Imperial Chancellor's offices, and when the state of Wei was established in 213 Cui Lin became head of the Censorate.

As Cao Pi took power in 220 he appointed Cui Lin to his Secretariat, and he later held a variety of administrative positions in the provinces and at the capital. Under Cao Rui he became an Excellency and was enfeoffed. -SGZ 24:679-82*.

Cui Qi 崔琦 [Ziwei 子瑋]; Boling. Having travelled to the capital for study when he was young, Cui Qi became known for his wide learning, was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and became a gentleman cadet.

About 140 Liang Ji, the brother of the empress who was at that time Intendant of Henan, invited Cui Qi to call upon him, but Cui Qi objected to the power of the imperial relatives by marriage and disapproved of Liang Ji's own conduct. He published Waiqi zhen 外戚箴 "Exhortations to the Consort Clan;" the text of the work is preserved in his HHS biography. When he saw this had no effect, Cui Qi composed Baigua fu 白鵠賦 "Rhapsody on the White Crane," in satirical vein. Liang Ji was angry, but Cui Qi faced his remonstrances with further criticism.

Cui Qi was named a magistrate, but he was afraid for his life and did not take up the post. Liang Ji sent one of his henchmen to kill him, but when the man found Cui Qi he was peacefully ploughing a field, chanting from a book. Unable to kill such a virtuous man, he warned him of his master's intentions. Cui Qi went into hiding, but Liang Ji sent other men who sought him out and killed him.

Though we are told that Cui Qi was a kinsman of Cui Yuan and connected to the main line of the clan from Boling, the relationship was evidently not close, for Yuan's son Cui Shi accepted appointment from Liang Ji after the death of Cui Qi.

Cui Qi left fifteen pian of literary works, including rhapsodies, hymns, inscriptions, eulogies and essays. -HHS 80/70A:2619-23*; Ebrey 78:36-47, deC 89:11.

Cui Quan 崔權; Pingyuan. XTS 72C:2736 describes Cui Quan as a son of Cui Ting, and says that he became a general.

Cui Rong 崔融 [Zichang 子長]; Pingyuan. XTS 72C:2736 describes Cui Rong as a son of Cui Jiu, and says that he was granted a county fief; this last seems unlikely.

Cui Shi 崔寔/實 or Cui Zhi 治 [Zizhen 子真 or Yuanshi 元始]; Anping/Boling: see sub Cui Zhuan. Son of Cui Yuan, Cui Shi was a moral man, devoted to scholarship. Like his father, he was celebrated as a master of calligraphy in the informal cao shu 草書 "Grass Style." When Cui Yuan died in 142 Cui Shi spent the period of mourning in seclusion by his tomb: on this, however, see further below.

Invited to office by the three Excellencies, Cui Shi refused all of them, but in 147, when the government of the new young Emperor Huan was controlled by the Empress Liang Nüying and her brother Liang Ji, he received commandery nomination for a special recruitment of men who were Extremely Filial and of Exceptional Conduct. He was brought to court in a special carriage and was appointed a gentleman cadet, though on plea of ill health he failed to attend the examination and interview which usually followed such special nominations. He set out his opinions independently, in Zheng lun 政論, "An Essay on Government," which claimed there had been a steady decline in public morality and which criticised past policies of leniency in administering the laws.

Cui Shi was nonetheless invited to serve in the offices of the Grand Commandant Yuan Tang and of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji. Again he refused, but the ministers Yang Fu and He Bao urged that a man of such talents should hold some position at court. Cui Shi was therefore appointed as a Consultant, and later transferred to Liang Ji's staff. Soon afterwards, about 151, an edict had him join the team of scholars, including Bian Shao, Fu Wuji, Huang Jing and Yan Du, at work in the Eastern Pavilion 東觀 of the Southern Palace on a third instalment of the official history of Later Han. The work was known at that time simply as the "Record of Han" 漢紀, but was later entitled Dongguan Hanji 東觀漢記. Cui Shi continued his involvement with the project for several years, and the new compilation contained annals, tables of marquises and officials and of the bureaucracy, accounts of the Xiongnu and the Qiang, together with biographies of empresses and other individuals, including the eunuchs Sun Cheng and Cai Lun.

During the 150s Cui Shi also served as Administrator of the frontier commandery of Wuyuan. It is said that until that time, though the land produced hemp the people did not know how to use it, and they clad themselves, if at all, only in grasses and leaves: Cui Shi taught them to weave hemp, and purchased the first spinning wheels and looms. He also restored the system of warning beacons against raids from the non-Chinese, and his government was regularly cited as the best on the frontier.

Leaving office on account of illness, he was re-appointed as a Consultant and took part in editing the classics in the imperial library. At some time, moreover, Cui Shi compiled the Simin yueling 四民月令 "Monthly Ordinances for the Four Categories of People," an agricultural almanac designed for a gentleman farmer with a large estate and social responsibilities. It not only includes information about the proper times for planting and harvesting, but also gives advice on festivals and ceremonies, the education of children, marketing produce for the best returns, and preparation for self-defence in a time of banditry and disturbance.

When Liang Ji was destroyed by Emperor Huan in 159, as one of his former officers Cui Shi was dismissed and proscribed, but in 161, as the frontiers suffered increasing raids from the Xianbi, there was a call for nomination of men experienced in such problems. The Excellency Huang Qiong recommended Cui Shi. He was appointed Administrator of Liaodong, but his mother died at this time and he received permission to leave office for the period of mourning. He was then appointed to the Imperial Secretariat, but was reluctant to be involved in an increasingly troubled government, and after a few months he once more pleaded ill health and returned home. He died about 170.

As indicated above, there is contradiction in the stories of how Cui Shi carried out the mourning for his father in 142, and the accounts of his personal fortunes. According to the biography of Cui Yuan, his family was comparatively poor, his last testament urged Cui Shi to avoid extravagance, and his instructions were dutifully carried out. Cui Shi's biography, however, says that he sold family property to pay for a magnificent tomb and set up a stele, and maintained such extravagant ritual that he eliminated the family wealth and was thereafter obliged to make a bare living by selling wine and preserved food. Though he later held office, the salary was inadequate, and he died in such poverty there was not enough money to pay for his funeral: a group of friends, the ministers Yang Ci, Yuan Feng, Duan Jiong and Yuan Wei, subscribed for his last rites.

On the other hand, Simin yueling reads as the work of a man experienced in dealing with a substantial property, and Cui Shi wrote specifically against the folly of extravagant funerals. It is possible that he wrote in each case from experience; having lived as a young man on a prosperous estate developed by Cui Yuan, and regretting his own foolishness after his father's death.

Besides his works on government and estate management, Cui Shi left a quantity of literary material including inscriptions, memorials and historical essays, and he was remembered for centuries as one of the leading writers of Han. -HHS 52/42:1725-31*; Balazs 50:105-116, Bn 54:11, Ebrey 78:36-49, 86:615, Hsü 80:59-61, 215-228, Loewe 86C:311-312, 86E:714-715, MBeck 90:25, 187, 216, Nishijima 86:566-568.

Cui Wen 崔溫 [Daohe 道和]; Pingyuan. XTS 72C:2736 says that Cui Wen, son of Cui Rong, held clerical office at the capital.

Cui Yan 崔琰 [Jigui 季珪] (d.216); Qinghe. A well-built man of fine bearing, when Cui Yan was a young man he practiced military skills, but later turned to Confucian scholarship and studied under Zheng Xuan. During the early years of disorder in the 180s and 190s he travelled widely between the Yellow River and the Yangzi, then joined Yuan Shao in Ji province.

Cui Yan argued against Yuan Shao's plan to attack Xu city in 200, as it was war against the emperor, and after Yuan Shao's death he refused to join either of his rival sons Shang or Tan. When Cao Cao took over Ji province in 204 Cui Yan became his Attendant Officer and urged him to a sensitive government.

As Cao Cao left Cao Pi at Ye city in 206 he appointed Cui Yan to be his mentor, and when he became Imperial Chancellor in 208 he put Cui Yan and Mao Jie in charge of official appointments and promotions; they enforced strict morality and restraint. Though Cui Yan was a close friend of Sima Lang, he told him that his younger brother Sima Yi, future founder of the Jin 晉 dynasty, had greater ability. He also recognised the potential of his cousin Cui Lin and of Sun Li and Lu Yu, all of whom had distinguished careers. When his friends Gongsun Fang and Song Jie died young, he brought up their children and treated them as generously as if they had been his own.

In 213 Cui Yan joined the Secretariat of Wei. He advised Cao Cao against making his younger son Cao Zhi his heir, even though Zhi was married to his niece. Admiring his honesty, Cao Cao appointed him to ministerial rank, but in 216, through misunderstanding of his support for Yang Xun, Cui Yan was accused of plotting against the government and was sent to prison. His enemies claimed he showed resentment, and he was ordered to commit suicide. -SGZ 12:367-70*; Mather 76:581.

Cui Yi 崔毅; Zhuo: see sub Cui Zhuan. Son of Cui Zhuan, because of ill health he lived in retirement and held no office. He nonetheless continued to study, and taught his young son Cui Yin 駟. -HHS 52/42:1708-22; Ebrey 78:36.

Cui Yin 崔殷; Pingyuan. XTS 72C:2730 says that Cui Yin was Officer of Merit in his commandery; this was probably early in Later Han.

XTS then lists seven sons of Cui Yin: Shuang 雙, Han 邯, Yu 寓, Jin 金, Hu 虎, Fan 蕃 and Gu 固. None of them were distinguished, but Cui Yu was the great-grandfather of Cui Lin and Cui Yan.

Cui Yin 崔駟 [Tingbo 亭伯] (d.92); Zhuo/Lecheng: see sub Cui Zhuan. Son of Cui Yi, Cui Yin was educated by his father and then attended the Imperial University at Luoyang, where he became a close friend of Kong Xi and was compared to Ban Gu and Fu Yi.

When a jealous fellow-student, Liang Yu, claimed that Cui Yin and Kong Xi had spoken disrespectfully of Emperor Wu of Former Han, the two young men were threatened with execution, but Kong Xi persuaded Emperor Zhang to halt the process.

Cui Yin had wide knowledge, particularly in the Classic of Poetry, the Book of Changes and Chunqiu, and he also had literary talent. He composed an essay to answer the rationalist tendencies of the day and about 87 he presented a hymn in praise of the tours made by Emperor Zhang. The emperor was impressed and arranged for Dou Xian to take Cui Yin as a respected client.

Many of Dou Xian's protégés rose to high office, but Cui Yin preferred a private life and was not anxious for appointment. After Emperor Zhang's death he refused several flattering invitations from Dou Xian, and presented a letter warning him against taking too great power. He did join Dou Xian's staff for the expedition against the Northern Xiongnu in 89, but raised so many criticisms that Dou Xian got rid of him: he graded Cui Yin as First Class and had him appointed as a magistrate in Lelang, present-day Korea. Considering this, quite reasonably, as exile, Cui Yin resigned office and returned home, where he died a few years later.

Noted for his literary work, Cui Yin left twenty-one pian of poems, rhapsodies, hymns, formal documents and essays, and he supplemented the Exhortations 箴 compiled by Yang Xiong 楊雄. He wrote with pleasure and skill of luxurious life, dramatic buildings, gallant hunting, fine food, wine, music and dance. -HHS 52/42:1708-22*, HQ 1:22b; Ebrey 78:36-49.

Cui Yu 崔寓 see sub Cui Yin 崔殷.

Cui Yuan 崔瑗 [Ziyu 子玉] (77/78-142/143); Lecheng/Anping; see sub Cui Zhuan. Son of Cui Yin 駟, who died when Cui Yuan was in his teens, he was a diligent scholar who maintained his father's tradition of learning. At the age of eighteen he travelled to Luoyang to study under Jia Kui. An expert in mathematics and the calendar, and in the Jing interpretation of the Book of Changes, he was widely admired by Confucian scholars of the time and became a close friend of Ma Xu, Ma Rong and Zhang Heng.

Then Cui Yuan's elder brother Chang was killed, and Cui Yuan took vengeance with his own hand. He fled to escape punishment but was able to return home after an amnesty. Cui Yuan lived in the same house as his remaining brothers for more than twenty years, and he spent freely in order to maintain a number of retainers. Some regarded this as an extravagance, but Cui Yuan justified it as the duty of a gentleman, and though the family was comparatively poor they held great influence in the local community.

Some time before 120, when Cui Yuan was forty, he became a local officer of his commandery. Because of some misconduct he was sent to prison in Dong commandery. One of the guards was interested in the Ritual, and Cui Yuan was so devoted to scholarship that he would discuss the classic even as he was questioned under torture. The matter was eventually resolved, Cui Yuan returned home, and soon afterwards took service with Deng Xun, General on the Liao. In 121, after the death of the Dowager Deng, Deng Xun shared in the fall of his family and Cui Yuan once more returned home.

In 125 Cui Yuan joined the staff of the General of Chariots and Cavalry Yan Xian, brother of the new regent Dowager. The Yan group had earlier persuaded Emperor An to depose his only son Liu Bao as Heir, and after the emperor's death they placed their own candidate, the child Liu Yi, on the throne. Liu Yi, however, was sickly, and Cui Yuan was concerned that his succession was in any case tainted by the wrongful deposition of Liu Bao. He wanted Yan Xian to take the lead in restoring Liu Bao to the succession, but Yan Xian was constantly drunk and Cui Yuan could not get to see him. He accordingly approached Yan Xian's senior aide Chen Shan, who accepted the idea and made some preparations. It all moved slowly, and before anything was arranged Liu Yi died and the palace eunuchs led by Sun Cheng destroyed the Yan and brought Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, to the throne.

As a member of the fallen faction, Cui Yuan was dismissed from his post. His disciple Su Zhi wrote to the throne with an account of his plans for the restoration of Liu Bao, and Chen Shan also offered to testify in his favour, but Cui Yuan refused their support. He retired to his home and refused all offers of even local appointment.

Years later, in 135, Liang Shang, father of Emperor Shun's new Empress Liang, became General-in-Chief and established administrative offices. He invited Cui Yuan to join his staff, but Cui Yuan was reluctant to be involved again with any imperial relatives by marriage; he excused himself on grounds of ill health.

Liang Shang nonetheless recommended Cui Yuan as Abundant Talent, and he became a county magistrate in Henei. During seven years in that office he opened up new areas of farm-land and arranged for a stele to be set up at the funerary temple of the Grand Duke Lü Wang 太公呂望, founder of the ancient state of Qi 齊: SJZ 9:7a. The people sang the praises of his government.

In 142 the ministers Hu Guang and Dou Zhang reported on Cui Yuan's qualities as a worthy Confucian official, arguing that it was not appropriate for such a man to remain so long in such a humble position. Cui Yuan was accordingly transferred to be Chancellor of Jibei, but a few months later, when Du Qiao and seven other commissioners were sent out to inspect the empire, Cui Yuan was reported for a number of faults and was sent to the Ministry of Justice. He presented a petition for clemency and was permitted to resign his office, but soon afterwards, at the age of sixty-six, he took ill and died.

Cui Yuan had evidently restored some of the family fortune, and on his deathbed he encouraged his son Shi not to be extravagant: as the spirit returned to the heavens and the body to the earth, there was no point in arranging a special cortège for entombment in his home country. He was buried where he had died, at Luoyang. Cf., however, sub Cui Shi.

One of the great calligraphers of his day, skilled in the informal cao shu 草書 "Grass Style," Cui Yuan compiled a treatise, Caoshu shi 草書勢. His work and that of his colleague Du Bodu, known as the style of Cui and Du 崔杜之法, served as a model for the later master Zhang Zhi.

Altogether Cui Yuan left fifty-seven pian of collected works, including letters, inscriptions, rhapsodies and hymns. His Nanyang wenxueguan zhi 南陽文學官志 "Account of the Literary Office in Nanyang" was a challenge and an inspiration to later times, he supplemented the Exhortations 箴 originally compiled by Yang Xiong 楊雄 and worked on by his father Cui Yin, and he also prepared a commentary to Yang Xiong's Taixuan jing 太玄經 "Classic of the Great Mystery." Cui Yuan was remembered also for the respect he showed other scholars, for his generosity towards clients and guests, and for the simple manner of his life. -HHS 52/42:1722-24*, XC 3:1a, JS 36:1066; Ebrey 78:36-49, Knechtges 82:516.

Cui [Yuanping] 崔元平; Boling: see sub Cui Zhuan. According to Liang Zuo 梁祚 of the fifth century, Cui Yuanping was a son of Cui Lie and an elder brother of Cui Zhouping. He accompanied his father to Chang'an and became a Consultant in the government controlled by Dong Zhuo. After Cui Lie was killed in 192, Cui Yuanping wanted to avenge him, but he became ill and died soon afterwards.

Sima Biao, however, says that Yuanping was the style of Cui Jun. Cui Jun led troops against Dong Zhuo in 190, so he was certainly not a Consultant in his government, but one cannot judge whether Cui Yuanping was a separate person, or whether his story has been confused. -HHSJJ 52/42:1866 & 1867 Hui Dong.

Cui [Zhouping] 崔州平; Boling: see sub Cui Zhuan. Son of Cui Lie and younger brother of Cui Jun, after the death of his father in 192 he travelled to Jing province, both to avoid the civil war in the north and also to study under Sima Hui. A fellow-student with Zhuge Liang, Cui Zhouping was one of the few to recognise his abilities, and Zhuge Liang long remembered him with affection and high regard. -SGZ Shu 5:911.

Ebrey 78:30 notes that the genealogical table of the family in XTS 72C:2773, identifies Zhouping as the style of Cui Jun, not as the name of a separate younger brother. Sima Biao, however, has Cui Jun's style as Yuanping 元平 [but see sub voce]: HHSJJ 52/42:1866.

Cui Zhuan 崔篆; Zhuo. Member of an official family of Former Han, and younger brother of Wang Mang's high-ranking supporter Cui Fa 發, Cui Zhuan was appointed as a commandery Administrator under the Xin dynasty. He was reluctant to act, and resigned on grounds of ill health.

After the restoration of Han Cui Zhuan was recommended and invited to office, but since he had served the usurper he felt too embarrassed to accept.

He retired to seclusion in Henan, where he engaged in literary and scholarly work, including Zhouyi lin 周易林, a study of divination in the Book of Changes. On his death-bed he composed a rhapsody of regret, Wei zhi 慰志. -HHS 52/42:1703-08; Ebrey 78:35, QHX: 55.

In her important study of the history of this long-lasting lineage, Ebrey 78 gives the place of origin of the Cui family as Boling 博陵. In fact, their home county of Anping, in Zhuo commandery under Former Han, was later transferred to Xindu/Lecheng/Anping, and in 158 formed part of Boling, a new commandery which was itself abolished towards the end of the dynasty [see the Table of the Provinces and Commandery units, items 18 and 19].

Dai Feng 代諷 or Duo Feng, also as Zhu Feng 祝諷. Brought to office by Deng Zhi and his sister the Dowager Deng about 110, Dai Feng became Administrator of Guanghan and was then brought to the capital as Director of the Secretariat.

In 116 the government of the Dowager Deng ordered that high officials should observe a three-year period of mourning for the death of a parent. This moral policy, however, proved impracticable and in 121 Dai Feng and his colleague Meng Bu urged that it should be rescinded because of its disruptive effect on administration. Their argument was supported by leading eunuchs and was put into effect.

Minister of the Household in 124, Dai Feng took part in the demonstration led by Lai Li at the palace Gate of the Vast Capital, protesting the dismissal of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. They achieved no success at the time, but after the accession of Liu Bao at the end of the following year their support was recognised. Dai Feng had died, but his son was appointed a cadet gentleman. -HHS 15/5:591-93, 46/36:1560-61, HYZ 10B:149-50.

Dai Feng 戴封 [Pingzhong 平仲]; Jibei. At the age of fifteen Dai Feng went to the University at Luoyang and studied with a "Lord Shen" 申君. When his teacher died, Dai Feng escorted his body home to Donghai. On the way he passed his own home, where his parents expected him and where he was to be married. Dai Feng simply bowed as he passed and would not halt his journey. Then he returned to the capital to finish his studies.

At Luoyang, Dai Feng's fellow-student Shi Jingping also died. Dai Feng cared for the corpse, purchased a coffin and escorted it to Shi Jingping's home. When his family went to prepare the body for burial, they were surprised to find all his belongings packed in the coffin.

On another occasion Dai Feng was waylaid by robbers, who took his possessions but failed to find several bales of silk. Dai Feng went after them to hand the silk over too, but the robbers appreciated his honesty and gave everything back.

Dai Feng was later nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and became a senior secretary in the office of the Minister of the Household. He left office when his uncle died, but when nominations were called for men Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright, probably in 95, Dai Feng was recommended both by his home commandery and by the Minister of Finance. A carriage was sent for him, he was received in audience, and after replying to questions he was appointed a county magistrate in Runan. His virtue preserved his territory from a plague of locusts which affected all the rest of the region. When the commandery Investigator came the locusts suddenly appeared, but as the man went away that same day, so did the insects. Everyone remarked on this phenomenon.

That year there also came a great drought. Dai

106 Dai Feng

Feng prayed for rain, but without result. So he built a pile of wood, sat on top, and set it on fire. Immediately a downpour of rain put it out. This really got him a reputation.

Dai Feng then became Chancellor of Zhongshan. At that time there were more than four hundred men in the local prisons awaiting execution. Dai Feng was sorry for them, and he had them all released to return to their homes; none of them offended again. An edict approved and praised him.

About 100 Dai Feng became Minister of Ceremonies. He died in that office. -HHS 81/71:2683-84*, XC 6:1a.

Dai Feng 戴風; Lujiang. About 185 Dai Feng was a leader of rebels in the present-day Dabie Shan. He was defeated by the Administrator Yang Xu. -HHS 31/21: 1110.

Dai Gan 戴乾; Danyang. Recommended to Cao Cao about 200 by his personnel clerk Chen Qun, Dai Gan later died fighting loyally against the forces of Sun Quan of Wu. -SGZ 22:633.

Dai Hong 戴宏 [Yuanxiang 元襄]; Jibei. At the age of sixteen Dai Hong was living with his father, assistant magistrate of a county in Beihai. The magistrate Wu You was walking in the garden of the residence when he overheard Dai Hong chanting the classics. He befriended and sponsored him, and Dai Hong became a noted scholar in the east of the empire.

At twenty-two Dai Hong was an Investigator in the commandery. Reported for some fault and liable to a flogging, he compared the Administrator to Confucius and described himself as a loyal, albeit inadequate, disciple. Not only was he not punished, but he was appointed Registrar in the local government. Dai Hong later rose to commissioned rank and became Administrator of Jiuquan. -HHS 64/54:2101-02.

Dai Hui 戴恢. During the First Faction Incident in 166/167 Dai Hui, described as a member of the Imperial Secretariat, was commended to Emperor Huan by Dou Wu. He is not heard of again. -HHS 69/59:2240.

Dai Jiu 戴就 [Jingcheng 景成]; Kuaiji. Dai Jiu was commandery Officer for Granaries 倉曹 about 150 when Ouyang Can the Inspector of Yang province claimed that the Administrator Chenggong Fu had stolen grain. Dai Jiu was arrested, but he withstood the most ferocious tortures and firmly maintained the innocence of his master. Eventually he convinced the Attendant Officer in charge of the case, Xue An, who reported accordingly and praised Dai Feng. The case was dropped and Chenggong Fu was released.

Nominated by the Administrator Liu Chong, Dai Jiu held appointment under the Minister of the Household but took ill and died in that office. -HHS 81/71:2691-92*, XC 6:3a.

Dai Li 戴禮. Having done well as an Imperial Clerk, Dai Li was sent out as Commandant of the eastern region of Danyang. -XC 6:14b.

Dai Liang 戴良 [Shuman 叔鸞]; Runan. Dai Liang's father Dai Lingding died when Dai Liang was young. Proud of his own fine qualities, Dai Liang was boastful, and though his mother attempted to restrain him by braying like a donkey each time he spoke in such a way, Dai Liang would simply respond in kind. He was briefly discouraged, however, when he met Huang Xian, a young man of the same county whom Dai Liang recognised as his superior.

When his mother died, both Dai Liang and his brother Boman appeared sorrowful, but while Boman stayed by the tomb, ate nothing but rice gruel, and kept all the rites of mourning, Dai Liang continued to eat meat and drink wine. Questioned about such behaviour, Dai Liang argued that ritual was the means to concentrate the emotions, but his own feelings were fully engaged, so the food made no difference and gave no pleasure.

Though talented, influential and respected in the community, Dai Liang frequently startled his fellows by such eccentric conduct and argument; in conversation with his neighbour Xie Jixiao he compared himself to Confucius and the sage Emperor Yu 禹. He was recommended Filial and Incorrupt, but would not accept, and likewise refused an invitation to appointment in the offices at the capital. The provincial authorities sought to force him, but as he was on the road he escaped, and then fled with his family to the hill country of Jiangxia. He remained there until his death in old age.

Dai Liang had five daughters. As each of them married, he sent her away with no more than simple bedding, plain clothes and wooden clogs. They all respected his precepts and were admired for their intelligence. -HHS 83/73:2772-73*, XC 6:7b; Vervorm 90:298.

Dai Ling 戴陵. A colonel in the Northern Army with enfeoffment as a secondary marquis, in 220 Dai Ling was one of the sponsors of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. Soon afterwards, however, Cao Pi became angry when he protested at the number of times he went hunting, and he sentenced Dai Ling to death less one degree.

In 231 Dai Ling commanded troops under Sima Yi in operations against Zhuge Liang. -SGZ 2:76, Shu 5:925, LS 19:4a [also written as 凌]; Goodman 98:197, Fang 52:338.

Dai [Lingding] 戴零丁; Runan. Grandson of Dai Zun and father of Dai Liang, he died when Liang was young. -XC 6:7b.

Dai Ping 戴憑 [Zizhong 次中]; Runan. An expert on the Jing Fang interpretation of the Book of Changes, at the age of sixteen Dai Ping was recommended as Understanding the Classics. He was examined by Academicians at the University and then appointed as a gentleman cadet.

Soon afterwards Dai Ping was called to debate with other scholars at a court conference. He refused to take his regular seat but remained standing, claiming that when a scholar expounded upon the classics he took precedence over all other officials. Emperor Guangwu was impressed and called him to sit upon the dais. As Dai Ping demonstrated his knowledge, Guangwu made him a Palace Attendant, and he frequently sought his opinion on matters of policy.

On one occasion Dai Ping claimed that Guangwu was too harsh in his judgements, and pointed to the case of Jiang Zun, a clerical officer whom he had excluded from office on the basis of slander. Guangwu angrily accused him of seeking to establish a faction, for Jiang Zun also came from Runan. Dai Ping promptly presented himself at the prison of the Minister of Justice, but the emperor ordered his release, and after a further interview Jiang Zun was restored to office.

While still holding office as Palace Attendant, Dai Ping was appointed a General of the Household in charge of military cadets.

At a New Year court gathering Guangwu ordered that all those present should debate questions of the classics, and that each who failed a test should have their mat taken away and given to his successful rival. By the end of the contest Dai Ping was sitting on a pile of fifty mats.

When Dai Ping died after eighteen years in office, the emperor ordered that a coffin be prepared for him in the imperial workshop and gave money for his funeral. -HHS 79/69A:2553-54*, XC 5:8b-9a; Bn 79:142, 187-

Dai Run 戴閏; Xiapi. Having served as a clerk in the offices of the Excellencies at the capital, in 86 Dai Run was Officer of Merit in his home state. He had great influence in the territory, but the new Chancellor Zhang Yu found fault with his arrangements on a formal tour and had him sent to prison. -HHS 44/34:1498.

Dai Shao 戴紹 [Youqi 幼起]; Runan. After the death of his father, Dai Shao yielded all the family property to his elder brother and took his wife and children to live as peasants. He later held local office, was made Reporting Officer, nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and eventually became a magistrate in Hongnong. -FSTY 4:31: Ying Shao regarded his conduct as excessive.

Dai She 戴涉 [Shuping 叔平] (d.44); Qinghe. As Administrator of Shangdang in the late 20s, Dai She appointed Bao Yu as a magistrate to deal with bandits in the Taihang mountains.

Dai She was later enfeoffed as a secondary marquis, and at the end of 39 he succeeded Ouyang Xi, who had died in disgrace, as Excellency over the Masses. When Empress Guo was dismissed in 41, Dai She and the Minister of the Imperial Clan Liu Ji were sent to take back her seal.

At the beginning of 43 there was a court conference to consider sacrifices to be offered to the imperial ancestors and the dynastic predecessors. The argument presented by Dai She and the Excellency of Works Dou Rong was accepted by Emperor Guangwu, and it was agreed that the emperor in person should sacrifice to the Former Han rulers Yuan and Xuan as members of his father's and grandfather's generations, that senior ministers should make offerings to Cheng, Ai and Ping, while ceremonies for Guangwu's own direct ancestors were to be carried out by local officials in Nanyang commandery.

In the summer of 44 Dai She was dismissed and died in prison. According to one account, he was found guilty of taking bribes to recommend people, but it is also claimed that he had falsely accused the former official Xi She of theft. Bielenstein notes that Dou Rong was also dismissed, and judges that the two Excellencies suffered primarily for their formal failure as guardians of good conduct: the accusation against Xi She is thus the more probable cause. -HHS 1B:72, 27/17:930; Bn 79:63, 169.

Dai Sheng 代盛; Shanyang. It is said that during the mid-150s Dai Sheng and Shao Qiangsheng were master painters for the funerary temple of Xiang Tuo and his wife. -Nagata 94:118 [this text, however, is of doubtful provenance].

Dai Yi 戴異 (d.166); Pei. As he was cultivating his fields about 165 Dai Yi found a blank golden seal. He travelled to Guangling to join the religious leader Long Shang, who held sacrifice to wells and fountains and prepared written charms and amulets 符書. Either Dai Yi or possibly Long Shang took title as Grand Supreme Emperor 太上皇 [cf. He Deng]. Early in 166, however, they were caught and executed. -HHS 7:316.

Dai Yuan 戴員 (d.204); Wu. Dai Yuan and his colleague Gui Lan had been nominated for office by Sheng Xian, but after Sheng Xian's death at the hands of the Sun group they took refuge in the hills. In an attempt at reconciliation, Sun Yi the Administrator of Danyang gave them office, but when their follower Bian Hong assassinated Sun Yi, the general Sun He investigated and held them at fault. Frightened of punishment, they killed Sun He and called Cao Cao's officer Liu Fu to come from across the Yangzi. Sun Yi's officers, however, led by his widow the Lady Xu IV, killed the rebels and regained control. -SGZ Wu 6: 1214-15; deC 90:232-234.

Dai Zigong 戴次公; Kuaiji. Dai Zigong was the father of the Lady Dai and the father-in-law of Huang Chang. -HHS 77/67:2497.

Dai Zun 戴遵 [Zigao 子高]; Runan. Officer of the Censorate under Emperor Ping of Former Han, as Wang Mang took power Dai Zun pleaded illness and went home. He was extremely wealthy, kept hundreds of retainers and was described as the greatest magnate east of the passes. -HHS 83/73:2772-73, XC 8:12b.

Daisheng 戴升 of Gaogouli [Koguryo]. Chieftain 大加 of a tribal group numbering over ten thousand people, in 47 Daisheng came to the frontier of Lelang commandery and submitted to Chinese authority. -HHS 85/75:2814.

Daji 大計 see sub Ping-Han 平漢.

Dajuququ 大車且渠; Xiongnu. A king of the Xiongnu, in the time of Emperor Ming he came to Luoyang to study Confucian learning. -HHS 32/22:1126. [One must note that Da juqu 大且渠 was the title of an office under the Xiongnu, so it is possible that the name recorded for this man in fact represents a misunderstanding of his title: cf. sub Yimozi.]

Damu/Damou 大牟 (d.58); non-Chinese. In 58 Damu and Timieling, tribal chieftains in Yizhou commandery, led a rebellion. They were defeated by local Chinese forces and their heads were sent to Luoyang. -HHS 101/11:3229.

Dan Chen 單臣 (d.43). Disciples of the former cult leader Wei Si, in 43 Dan Chen and his colleague Fu Zhen rose in rebellion and seized the county city of Yuanwu in the east of Henan. The imperial general Zang Gong was sent to deal with them, but though his force included troops from the Northern Army, strategic reserve of the empire, the rebels were well supplied and entrenched, and they drove back his assaults with heavy casualties.

On the advice of his son Liu Zhuang, future Emperor Ming, Emperor Guangwu then sent instructions for Zang Gong to ease the pressure. Seeing a chance to escape, the rebels broke out from their lines and were then defeated in detail. Dan Chen and Fu Zhen were both killed. -HHS 18/8:695.

Dan Chuan 但穿 of Taishan was a son of Dan Wang q.v.

Dan Meng 儋萌 (d.226). Administrator of Jiuzhen about 220, Dan Meng was subordinate to the warlord Shi Xie in Jiaozhi.

His local officer Pan Xin got into a quarrel at a banquet and Dan Meng killed him on the spot. Pan Xin's brother Miao then attacked the commandery headquarters and Dan Meng was hit by a poisoned arrow and died.

Shi Xie sent troops to restore order in the commandery, but without success. -SGZ Wu 8:1252.

Dan Song 竇誦. An Internuncio in 123, Dan Song proposed that the official Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar should be changed to use a jiayin 甲寅 year [cycle number 51] as base (Sivin 69:59: "working epoch") rather than a guisi 庚巳 year [cycle number 30]; this would accord with the apocrypha. After wide debate on alternatives, the current system was retained. -HHS 92/2:3034, 3038; MBeck 90:59-60.

Dan Wang 但望 [Bohe 伯闔]; Taishan. In the early 140s, when Dan Wang was a clerical officer at the imperial capital, his nephew, son of his younger twin brother, was arrested for having had a man killed. Dan Wang immediately left office and presented himself before the commandery offices, head and arms stripped bare, to ask for mercy. When the Administrator, Li Gu, invited him in, Dan Wang kowtowed until the blood flowed, took the blame for his nephew's conduct upon himself and offered his own son Dan Chuan in his stead. Suitably impressed, Li Gu let the young men go. -FSTY 5:37. [One version of FSTY has the surname as Ren 任, whereas another gives the style as Bomen 伯門; the reading in HYGZ below appears more probable.]

Dan Wang later became Inspector of Bing province and then Administrator of Ba commandery. At the urging of his local officers, in 154 he presented a report on the difficulty of maintaining control over such a vast territory, and recommended the commandery be divided into three. The court did not agree at that time, but the change was made in the last years of the dynasty. -HYGZ 1:5-6.

Dan Yang 單颺 [Wuxuan 武宣]; Shanyang. Orphaned when he was young, Dan Yang brought himself up and led a life of the utmost austerity. Skilled in astronomy and mathematics, he was recommended Filial and Incorrupt, became Astronomer at the imperial court and a Palace Attendant, then left the capital to serve as Administrator of Hanzhong. He was dismissed for some fault, but later joined the Imperial Secretariat.

In 176 a yellow dragon appeared in Qiao county in Pei. The Counsellor Qiao Xuan asked Dan Yang for his interpretation, and Dan Yang observed that the territory was producing a ruler. Within fifty years the dragon would appear again. A certain Yin Deng recorded his prophecy.

Qiao was the birth-place of Cao Cao, at that time twenty years old. Forty-five years later, in 220, as Cao Cao's son Cao Pi [born in 187] succeeded his father as King of Wei, a yellow dragon was again reported from Pei. Yin Deng told Cao Pi of the earlier prophecy and later that year Cao Pi took the imperial title, claiming to rule under the power of yellow Earth which should take over from the red Fire of Han. -HHS 82/72B:2733, SGZ 2:58; Ngo 76:114, DeWoskin 83:72-73.

Dang 當 [surname unknown]. With rank as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, in 220 he was a sponsor of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Dantai 澹臺 [surname] see Tantai 澹臺.

Dao Zhi 到質 became Administrator of Dongping. -FSTY 5f:125.

Deng 鄧, Empress of Emperor He and regent Dowager for Emperor An, see the Lady Deng Sui.

Deng 鄧, Empress of Emperor Huan, see the Lady Deng Mengnü.

Deng 鄧, the Lady (d.33); Nanyang. Second wife of Yin Lu/Mu and mother of the Lady Yin, future empress of Guangwu, she was killed by bandits. -HHS 10A:405.

Deng 鄧 [personal name unknown]; Nanyang. Elder son of Deng Bao 褒 and the Princess Liu Biede, sister of Emperor An, he succeeded to his father's fief. -HHS 16/6:606.

Deng Ai 鄧艾 [Shizai 士載] (d.264); Nanyang. When Deng Ai was young his father died, and as Cao Cao came to Jing province in 208 Deng Ai travelled with his mother to Runan, where he became a cowherd. When he was twelve years old the family migrated again to Yingchuan, where Deng Ai was inspired by a stele honouring the local worthy Chen Shi 陳寔 and changed his personal name to Fan 範 and his style to Shizi 士則: both new characters have the sense of "model" or "pattern." He later found that he had a kinsman of the same name and style, so he reverted to the original.

Having served as a local officer, Deng Ai came to the notice of the minister Sima Yi and entered the Secretariat of Wei. A practical and keen surveyor, in 241 he presented Jihe lun 濟河論, "Essay on Improving Rivers," and proposed major canals and water-control works for the south-eastern front along the Huai. He became a leading general of Wei and defeated Shu-Han in 263, but then fell under suspicion and was killed in the following year. -SGZ 28:775-83*; Fang 52:641-642, 65:402-479, Needham 71:573, Mather 76:575-576.

Deng Bao 鄧豹 [Boxiang 伯庠] (d.121); Nanyang. A cousin of the Dowager Deng, Deng Bao was appointed Court Architect; he was admired for the fact that his projects were not ostentatious and caused no hardship to the people. He later became Intendant of Henan, though his appointment was blocked for some time by the Excellency Li He, who objected to a member of the consort family occupying such a sensitive position.

After the death of the Dowager in 121, as Emperor An destroyed the power of the family Deng Bao killed himself. -HHS 10B:428, 16/6:617, DGHJ 8:4a.

Deng Bao 鄧寶 or Deng Zhen 珍: see below; Nanyang. Son of Deng Jing, he became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, and in 117 he was granted a marquisate in Runan with revenues from 3,500 households. After the death of the regent Dowager Deng he and other members of the family were stripped of their fiefs, reduced to the rank of commoners and sent out to their home countries. -HHS 16/6:615-16, HHJ 16:193.

HHS 16/6 gives this man's personal name as Zhen 珍, but the modern scholar Shen Qinhan notes that this would mean he had the same name as his great-uncle. HHJ has the personal name as Bao, and this seems more likely. -HHSJJ 16/6:629.

Deng Bao 鄧褒; Nanyang. Son of Deng Cheng, he succeeded to his fief. He married the Princess Liu Biede, younger sister of Emperor An, and became a General of the Household. In the time of Emperor Huan Deng Bao was Minister Steward. -HHS 10B:457, 16/6:606, 55/45:1804.

Deng Bi 鄧弼; Nanyang. A kinsman of the Lady Deng Mengnü, Empress of Emperor Huan, Deng Bi became a colonel in the Northern Army. When the empress was disgraced in 165 all members of her family were stripped of their appointments and sent back to their home country. -HHS 102/12:3257.

Deng Biao 鄧彪 [Zhibo 智伯] (d.93); Nanyang. Son of Deng Han, Deng Biao was a man of family virtue and fine morality. When his father died and he was due to succeed to his fief, he asked it be given instead to his half-brother Feng [or Jingfeng]. Emperor Ming admired Deng Biao's generosity and granted the request.

Deng Biao held local office in his commandery and his province. He and four colleagues, all of whom were talented and ambitious and had the character bo in their styles, were known locally as "the five elder brothers" 五伯. Entering the commissioned civil service through the offices of the Excellencies at the capital, after various postings Deng Biao became Administrator of Guiyang and in 74 he was called to the capital as Minister Coachman.

When his step-mother died a few years later, he left his office and sought to retire on grounds of ill health. Instead he was appointed as a Household Counsellor for the duration of the mourning period and was then given supernumerary rank as Commandant of the Equipage.

Deng Biao returned to senior office as Minister of Finance in 81 and in the winter of that year he was appointed Grand Commandant; he was well known for honest and upright conduct. In 84 he sought to retire on account of ill health. This time leave was granted; he received a donation of 300,000 cash and life ranking as an official of two thousand shi. It was also ordered that the Minister of Ceremonies was to present him with flesh from the sacrifices at the Imperial Ancestral Temple four times a year, and the Intendant of Henan should enquire after his health and offer mutton and wine in the eighth month of each year.

At the death of Emperor Zhang in 88, the government of the Dowager Dou, ruling as regent for the young Emperor He, appointed Deng Biao as Grand Tutor and enfeoffed him as a secondary marquis. The appointment was well deserved, but it was organised by the Dowager's brother Dou Xian and Deng Biao felt beholden to the Dou family. When there was opposition at court to the dominance of the imperial relatives by marriage, Deng Biao played no active role and when the head of the Imperial Censorate Zhou Yu failed to show suitable subservience to the regency regime Deng Biao arranged his dismissal.

In the autumn of 92 the emperor and a group of eunuchs ran a coup which destroyed the power of the Dou family. Now old and ill, Deng Biao offered to relinquish his nominal power of supervision; the emperor accepted, rewarding him with meat and wine. At the beginning of the following year Deng Biao died, and Emperor He personally attended his funeral. -HHS 44/34:1495-96*, 23/13:813, DGHJ 18:2a.

Deng Bing 鄧秉; Nanyang. Son of Deng Yan and nephew of the Empress Deng Mengnü of Emperor Huan, at the death of his grandmother the Lady Xuan about 163 he was granted a fief in Nanyang and held office among the guards at the capital. When the empress was disgraced in 165 all members of her family were stripped of their titles and appointments, sent back to their home country and obliged to return the gifts they had received. -HHS 10B:445, 102/12:3257.

Deng [Bokao] 鄧伯考; Runan. During the 150s Deng Bokao was Deputy Director of the Imperial Secretariat. His son Yuanyi returned home to Runan, leaving his wife the Lady Li to care for her mother-in-law. The Lady Deng cruelly mistreated the Lady Li and it was some time before Deng Bokao became aware of the situation. Embarrassed and ashamed, he sent his daughter-in-law back to her own family. -HHS 48/38:1607.

Deng Chang 鄧闡 [Jizhao 季昭] (d.118); Nanyang. Son of Deng Xun and brother of the Lady Deng Sui, when his sister became the Empress of Emperor He Deng Chang was appointed a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. When Emperor He died in 106, the Lady Deng, now Dowager, took control of the regency for Liu Long the Young Emperor and Deng Chang was made a Palace Attendant. He married a woman of the Geng family.

In 107, after the death of the Young Emperor and the appointment of Emperor An, Deng Chang and his brothers were each granted county marquises with revenues from ten thousand households. They expressed reluctance, petitioning against such excessive rewards and honours, and after several exchanges the Dowager accepted their refusals. On the other hand, they were named Servants at Court, normally held by the most senior marquises, which gave authority to take part in court councils next only to the Excellencies.

When the Lady Yin of Xinye, mother of the Dowager and her brothers, became ill in 110, Deng Zhi and others all asked permission to leave their official appointments in order to care for her. Because Deng Chang was the youngest and showed particular filial piety, he was granted the honour. Soon afterwards the Lady died and after many requests her sons were given permission to leave the court and escort the cortège back for burial in her home country. Deng Chang again acquired great reputation for his display of filial conduct. A modest and moral man, he was also admired for his concern with the fortunes of the state and his anxiety over unfavourable portents.

Deng Chang and his elder brother Hui both died about the same time in 118 and their testaments asked that they be buried in simple fashion without special ceremony. The Dowager accepted the request, and Deng Chang's son Zhong succeeded to his father's fief.

After the death of the Dowager in 121 it was alleged that Deng Chang had been involved with his brothers Hui and Hong in a proposal to depose Emperor An in favour of Liu Yi the king of Pingyuan. This may have been true, though the high point of the campaign was not reached until 119, after all three brothers were dead: see sub Liu Yi. Emperor An is said to have been furious and he certainly took this as a reason to rid himself of the powerful family. He had the senior ministers present posthumous indictments of treason against the alleged conspirators and he stripped Deng Zhong and the other marquises of their fiefs, reducing them to the rank of commoners. -DGHJ 8:3b, HHS 16/6:612-16.

Deng Chang 鄧暢 (d.121); Nanyang. A cousin of the Dowager Deng, he became Court Architect. After the death of the Dowager in 121, when Emperor An disgraced the family and destroyed their power, Deng Chang killed himself. -HHS 16/6:617.

Deng Chang 鄧昌; Nanyang. Younger son of Deng Bao 褒 and the Princess Liu Biede, sister of Emperor An, Deng Chang was made Marquis of Wuyin in right of his mother, and served as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. -HHS 16/6:606.

Deng Chen 鄧晨 [Weiqing 偉卿] (d.49); Nanyang. Deng Chen belonged to a wealthy family which had produced many senior officials; his father Hong 宏 had been Commandant of Yuzhang. A student of the Book of Changes, and known as a man of honour, Deng Chen was a close friend of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu. He married Liu Yuan, youngest sister of Liu Xiu, who bore him a son and three daughters.

Early in 22, after the first troubles of Liu Bosheng, Liu Xiu came to take refuge in Xinye, where he was protected by Deng Chen's connection to the magistrate Pan Lin. In the winter Deng Chen supported the Han rebellion against Wang Mang, but at the battle of Xiaochang'an his wife the Lady Liu Yuan and their three daughters were all killed. In the aftermath of defeat Pan Lin was obliged to demonstrate his loyalty to Wang Mang by destroying the houses and tombs of the Deng clan. Deng Chen's relatives were angry that he had involved them in rebellion and caused such damage to their prosperity and prestige, but Deng Chen remained a supporter of Han.

As the Gengshi Emperor was proclaimed in the spring of 23, Deng Chen was made a lieutenant-general. He took part in the invasion of Yingchuan, captured the commandery capital, and joined Liu Xiu in the great victory at Kunyang in the summer. He was then sent with a detached force to the east of Henan, and in the winter of 23, when the Gengshi Emperor established his capital at Luoyang after the destruction of Wang Mang, Deng Chen was sent north as Administrator of Changshan.

When Liu Xiu, now commissioner for Han in the north, attacked the pretender Wang Lang in 24, he was driven into Xindu, but then received reinforcements from the Gengshi Emperor and was able to attack Wang Lang in Handan city. Deng Chen came to join him at Julu, but Liu Xiu sent him back to his territory to guard the north. In the autumn Deng Chen sent a thousand archers to aid in the campaign against the Bronze Horse and other bandits and he maintained supplies for the army.

As Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 Deng Chen was named a county marquis and in 26 his late wife Liu Yuan, sister of the emperor, was awarded posthumous title as a Senior Princess, while their son Deng Fan also received a county fief.

In 27 Deng Chen was called to court. He accompanied the emperor to Nanyang, was named a Household Counsellor, and was sent with the Staff of Authority to hold formal command over Jia Fu in his attack on rebels in Runan. In the following year he accompanied Guangwu to Shouchun, and stayed there in charge of Jiujiang commandery.

Deng Chen was Administrator in several commanderies, and we are told that he preferred settled government to military campaigns. In Runan he rebuilt the ancient Hongxi Dam, and in Zhongshan he was praised by the local officials and people, while his rule was rated best in the province. When his fief was transferred to another county in 37 he returned to Luoyang to give thanks and was granted title as Servant at Court, excusing him from the requirement to reside at his fief. Soon afterwards he went out once more to be Administrator of Runan.

In 41 Deng Chen was called up as acting Minister of Justice to join Guangwu on his imperial progress into Nanyang. He took a leading role in celebrations at Xinye, with a banquet and grand donations, then returned to his post in Runan. In that commandery he opened new agricultural land, and controlled the Ru River to supply fish-ponds and paddy rice and to aid development further downstream.

In 42 Deng Chen's fief was changed once more and when he came to the capital to give thanks he was again named a Servant at Court. When he died in 49 an imperial edict ordered that he be buried in the Beimang hills north of Luoyang, and envoys were sent to bring the coffin of his late wife the Princess Liu Yuan to share his tomb. -HHS 15/5:582-84*, XC 1:2b-3a.

Deng Chen 鄧晨, wife of: see the Lady Liu Yuan 劉元.

Deng Chen 鄧辰 [Botai 伯臺]; Nanyang. Evidently a member of the aristocratic clan, in 156 Deng Chen was a student at the Palace School for Noble Families [founded by Emperor Ming q.v.]. He was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu.

-LS 17:16b.

Deng Cheng 鄧成; Nanyang. Son of Deng Gan, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 16/6:606. This is probably not the same man as below.

Deng Cheng 鄧成. After Cheng Qin was killed fighting the rebel Qiang in 110, Deng Cheng succeeded him as Administrator of Hanzhong. He kept Cheng Xin and other officers of his predecessor on his staff. -HYGZ 2:16, 10C:169. It is doubtful if this the same man as above.

Deng Cheng 鄧盛 see Deng Sheng 鄧盛.

Deng Dang 鄧當. Brother-in-law of Lü Meng, Deng Dang was an officer under Sun Ce and took part in operations against the hills people. He died about 199. -SGZ Wu 9:1272.

Deng Dao 鄧道. Deng Dao initially refused invitations from his commandery and province, but later entered the imperial service. As Administrator of Zuopingyi he acquired a wide reputation for the manner in which he kept powerful families under control. -XC 7:5a.

Deng De 鄧德; Nanyang. A kinsman of the Lady Deng Mengnü, Empress of Emperor Huan, Deng De became a Palace Attendant and an officer of the guards of the Feathered Forest. When the empress was disgraced in 165 all members of her family were stripped of their appointments and sent back to their home country. -HHS 102/12, 3257.

Deng Die 鄧疊 (d.92); Nanyang. Related to the throne through a female line, Deng Die was presumably a kinsman of Deng Chen, husband of the Lady Liu Yuan the sister of Emperor Guangwu.

In the time of Emperor Ming it was felt necessary to maintain constant watch lest Deng Die and the cousins Yin Dang and Yin Bo, also imperial relatives by marriage, presumed upon their position to act wrongfully, but after the death of Emperor Zhang in 88, as the Dowager Dou became regent for the young Emperor He, the Deng were close associates of the ruling faction.

Deng Die and his younger brother Lei were both colonels in the Northern Army, and their mother the Lady Yuan had ready access to the Dowager's apartments within the palace. Deng Die was also an old friend of the marquis Liu Chang, a man of depraved character, who came to the capital in 88 with a message of condolence from his family on the death of the emperor. Through Deng Die, Liu Chang met the Lady Yuan, and was able to visit the Dowager Dou in her apartments. The Dowager's brother Dou Xian, concerned at the political implications of the favours the Lady Dou was showing, had Liu Chang killed. Despite this Deng Die and his family remained on good terms with both Dou Xian and his sister.

After the success of Dou Xian's initial campaign against the Northern Xiongnu in 89, he went out again to Liang province to supervise further operations in the following year. At this time he named Deng Die as his second-in-command and early in 92, after the final destruction of the Northern Xiongnu, Deng Die was enfeoffed as a marquis.

As the Dou rose to the height of their power and influence the Deng group, together with Guo Huang and his son Ju, had ready access and most friendly contact with the palace and the Dowager Dou. In the autumn, however, as the young emperor and his eunuch allies overthrew the power of the Dou, Deng Die, Deng Lie and the Lady Yuan were all accused of treason and died in prison. -HHS 23/13:812-20.

[Deng?] E 鄧娥, the Lady; Nanyang. Deng E was the daughter of the Lady Deng Yan by a father whose name is not recorded. Her mother died when she was an infant and she was then cared for by her aunt Deng Sui, future consort of Emperor He. -XHS 1:13a.

Deng Fan 鄧汎 Nanyang. Deng Fan was the son of Deng Chen and the Lady Liu Yuan, sister of Emperor Guangwu. The Lady Yuan was killed in 22, at an early stage of the Han rebellion against Wang Mang. In 26 the emperor awarded her posthumous title as a Senior Princess and enfeoffed Deng Fan as a marquis responsible for her sacrifices. -HHS 15/5:583.

Deng Fan 鄧蕃; Nanyang. A son of Deng Xi, he married the Princess Liu Xiaoji, daughter of Emperor Ming. He was granted a county fief and became a Palace Attendant under Emperor He. -HHS 10B:459.

Deng Fan 鄧範 [Shizi 士則] see sub Deng Ai 鄧艾 [Shizai 士載]. -SGZ 28:775.

Deng Fang 鄧方 [Deshan 德山]; Runan. Assistant to the Administrator of Henei Xiang Bao, about 134 Deng Fang joined him in the major project, led by Wang Hui and then by Sima Deng, to dredge and reconstruct the channel of the Yellow River and its tributaries near Rongyang. -SJZ 7:9a.

Deng Fang 鄧訪/防; Nanyang. During the time that Emperor An was under the control of the regent Dowager Deng, her kinsman Deng Fang was a member of the Imperial Secretariat. When the Dowager died in 121 and Emperor An came to power, his favourites Li Run and the Lady Wang Sheng told him that Deng Fang had planned with the Dowager's brother Deng Kui and others of the family to put Liu Yi [or Liu De] the King of Pingyuan in his place. The emperor sent Deng Fang to the frontier, reduced the Deng clan to be commoners, and transferred Liu Yi's fief to a district marquisate. -HHS 16/6:616-17.

Deng Fang 鄧方 [Kongshan 孔山] (d.221); Nan. An Assistant Officer to Liu Bei in Jing province, Deng Fang accompanied him to the west in 211. When Liu Bei seized power there in 214 he appointed Deng Fang as Commandant of the Dependent State of Jianwei, then raised the territory to a commandery and named him Administrator. He also became Area Commander of Laixiang, controlling the southern part of Yi province, with rank as a general. -HYZ 4:49, SGZ Shu 15:1081, 12:1045.

Deng Feng 鄧奉 (d.27); Nanyang. A nephew of Deng Chen, Deng Feng was a member of the leading local family in Xinye county. He joined the Han rebellion against Wang Mang at an early stage and was named a general by the Gengshi Emperor. As that regime collapsed Deng Feng transferred his allegiance to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu.

Liu Xiu's concubine the Lady Yin also came from Xinye and during 24 and 25 she found safety at Deng Feng's base in Yuyang to the south. Deng Feng also became a general under Guangwu, and the Lady Yin's brother Yin Shi served in his army.

In 26, however, as Wu Han led an imperial army into Nanyang, Deng Feng was angered at the way Wu Han's men ravaged his homeland and in the autumn he rebelled. The men under his command were of high quality, and he surprised and defeated Wu Han in a night attack. Capturing his equipment and supplies, he re-established himself in Yuyang and allied himself to the neighbouring chieftain Dong Xin. In the winter their forces defeated Guangwu's general Cen Peng, captured his colleague Zhu You, and laid siege to Wan city.

Early in 27, however, as Guangwu brought an army into Nanyang, Deng Feng was driven back to Yuyang and forced to surrender. Recognising his earlier support and the provocation he had suffered, Guangwu was willing to be lenient, but Cen Peng and Geng Yan argued for his execution and so Deng Feng died. -HHS 10A:405, 17/7:656-57; Bn 59:153-154.

114 Deng Feng

Deng Feng 鄧鳳 or Deng Jingfeng 荆鳳; Nanyang. Son of Deng Han, when his father died his elder half-brother Deng Biao should have succeeded to his fief. Deng Biao, however, asked to cede it to Deng Feng, and Emperor Ming approved. -HHS 44/34:1495.

Deng Feng 鄧奉 (d.102); Nanyang. Son of the Lady Deng Zhu, in 102 Deng Feng was accused of having assisted the Empress Yin in her sorceries. Arrested and tortured, he and his brother Yi made confessions implicating one another and also the empress's brothers. The empress was deposed, and Deng Feng and Deng Yi died in prison. -HHS 16/6:606.

Deng Feng 鄧鳳 (d.121); Nanyang. Son of Deng Zhi, he involved himself in official business and palace intrigue. On one occasion he wrote to Zhang Kan of the Imperial Secretariat suggesting that the scholar Ma Rong, then a collator in the library of the Eastern Pavilion, be appointed to that office.

Deng Feng was later given a horse by the General of the Household Ren Shang, but in 118 Ren Shang was accused of exaggerating his success against the rebel Qiang and embezzling military stores; he was arrested and executed. Concerned that his contact would be found out, Deng Feng confessed to his father. Deng Zhi was afraid of how his sister the regent Dowager might react, so he had Deng Feng's head shaved, and also that of his own wife the Lady Kou, mother of Deng Feng. This symbol of convict servitude was taken as an apology for Deng Feng's ill-chosen associate, and everyone was impressed.

Following the death of the Dowager Deng in 121 Emperor An turned against the family. Deng Zhi was ordered into effective exile in Changsha, south of the Yangzi; he and Deng Feng starved themselves to death. -HHS 16/6:616-17.

Deng Fu 鄧福 (d.126); Nanyang. Son of Deng Guo, he succeeded to his fief. He died without sons, and the marquise was ended. -HHS 15/5:584-85.

Deng Fu 鄧輔. In 219 Deng Fu was Liu Bei's Administrator of Fangling, on the Han River in the northeast of Yi province. He was attacked and defeated by Lu Xun. -SGZ Wu 13:1345.

Deng Fude 鄧甫德; Nanyang. Deng Fude was the younger son of Deng Hong 弘. After his father's death in 115 his elder brother Guangde was given the marquise Deng Hong had refused years before. Because Deng Hong had been tutor to Emperor An, however, Deng Fude was also considered worthy of enfeoffment, so part of Guangde's territory was taken to provide him with a district fief.

When the Deng family was disgraced after the death of the Dowager Deng in 121 Deng Guangde and Deng Fude were permitted to remain at the capital because their mother was connected to the family of the Empress Yan.

Deng Fude maintained his father's tradition of scholarship in the Classic of History, and became a magistrate in Henan. He left office when his mother died and did not take appointment again. -HHS 16/6:615-18.

Deng Gai 鄧亥; Nanyang. Son of Deng Yu, he was a younger brother of Deng Xun; on his position in the family see sub Deng Yu. After Deng Xun's death in 92, his daughter the Lady Deng Sui, future Empress and Dowager, was about to enter the imperial harem. Among omens of her coming fortune, Deng Gai recalled the achievement of his brother, who had arranged the cancellation of the extravagant Hutuo Canal project in 78 and so saved many lives which would have been lost if the works had continued. -HHS 10A:419 & JJ at 394.

Deng Gan 鄧乾; Nanyang. Son of Deng Zhen, he succeeded to his marquise and married the Princess Liu Zhi, daughter of Emperor Ming. When the Empress Yin was disgraced in 102, Deng Gan was involved through his cousin Deng Feng and was deprived of his fief, but in 105 his title was restored and he was made a Palace Attendant. -HHS 16/6:606.

Deng Gu 鄧固; Nanyang. Son of Deng Tang, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 15/5:584.

Deng Guangde 鄧廣德; Nanyang. Son of Deng Hong 弘, after his father's death in 115 Deng Guangde was given the marquise he had refused years before, though part of his territory was taken to provide a district fief for his younger brother Fude.

In 121, after the death of the Dowager Deng, her family was disgraced but Deng Guangde and Deng Fude were permitted to remain at the capital because their mother was connected to the family of the Empress Yan. Deng Guangde died soon afterwards. -HHS 16/6:615-18.

Deng Guangzong 鄧廣宗 (d.121); Nanyang. Son of Deng Kui, after his father's death in 118 Deng Guangzong was given the marquise he had refused years before. After the death of the Dowager Deng in 121, however, it was alleged that Deng Kui and other members of the family had earlier supported a proposal to depose the emperor. Emperor An is said to have been furious, and he certainly took this as a reason to rid himself of the powerful family. He had posthumous indictments of treason presented against the alleged conspirators, stripped Deng Guangzong and others of their fiefs and sent them away to their home country. Harassed by local officials, Deng Guangzong killed himself. -HHS 16/6:616-17.

Deng Guo 鄧國; Nanyang. Son of Deng Gu, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 15/5:584.

Deng Han 鄧邯; Nanyang. Deng Han's family came originally from the lower Yangzi, but his ancestor Deng Kuang 況 had migrated to Nanyang, and the family farmed estates there for several generations. Their residence was in Xinye county, and Deng Han's kinsman Deng Yu became a leading supporter of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu.

Deng Han also joined the Han rebellion against Wang Mang. He became Administrator of Bohai under Guangwu and was enfeoffed as marquis of a county. -HHS 44/34:1495.

Deng Hong 鄧弘; Nanyang. In the spring of 27 Deng Hong was General of Chariots and Cavalry under the command of Deng Yu, presumably a kinsman. They pursued the Red Eyebrows from the west, but they were defeated and had to be rescued by Feng Yi, imperial commander of the eastern army.

Feng Yi proposed a pincer movement to catch the enemy between them, but Deng Hong again attacked the Red Eyebrows directly. The enemy left their baggage and fled, but the flight was feigned and the baggage was bait. Deng Hong's troops were short of food, the wagons were laden with beans, and as Deng Hong's men stopped to eat the rebels returned. The imperial position collapsed, and when Deng Yu and Feng Yi went to help they were driven back with heavy losses. Deng Hong does not appear again in the records. -HHS 16/6:604, 17/7:646; Bn 59:118, 221.

Deng Hong 鄧鴻 (d.95); Nanyang. Deng Hong was a son of Deng Yu; on his position in the family see sub Deng Yu. About 70 Deng Hong was a student in the Palace School for Noble Families which had been founded by Emperor Ming. He became noted for his skill in planning, and paid particular attention to affairs of the frontier. The emperor thought well of him and appointed him a Chief Clerk in Command of Troops, in charge of units of of the Northern Army garrisoned in Yanmen commandery.

Under Emperor Zhang, Deng Hong became Administrator of Zhangye and in 82 he was made General on the Liao. In 89 he commanded a column in Dou Xian's attack on the Northern Xiongnu, and took part in the victory at Jiluo Mountain. In the following year he returned to the capital as Minister Herald, and later became Minister of the Household.

In the autumn of 94 the renegade Xiongnu prince Fenghou sought to establish an independent position across the frontier. Deng Hong was appointed Acting General of Chariots and Cavalry, with rank above the nine ministers, and was sent with forty thousand men, including regiments of the Northern Army, border levies, and Wuhuan and Xianbi auxiliaries, to deal with him. He achieved one major victory, and separate columns under Ren Shang and Feng Zhu also gained notable successes, but Fenghou and many of his people fled across the frozen Yellow River, and at the beginning of 95 the imperial army abandoned the pursuit.

When Deng Hong returned to the capital, he was accused of having mismanaged the campaign by "delay and lack of zeal" 逗留畏懦, a formula which in military law was punishable by execution. He was sent to prison and died. -HHS 16/6:605-06, 89/79:2956-57; deC 84:280-281.

Deng Hong 鄧弘/宏 [Shuji 叔紀] (d.115); Nanyang. Son of Deng Xun and brother of the Lady Deng Sui, when his sister became empress of Emperor He Deng Hong was made a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. When the emperor died in 106, the Lady Deng, now Dowager, took control of the regency government, and Deng Hong became a Palace Attendant. After the death of the Young Emperor he and his brothers advised the Dowager on the selection of Liu You, Emperor An, and Deng Hong then became General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger.

In 107 Deng Hong and his brothers were each granted county marquises with revenue from ten thousand households. They petitioned against such excess, and the Dowager eventually accepted their refusals, but they were granted the title Servant at Court, normally held by the most senior marquises, with authority to take part in court councils next only to the Excellencies.

As a young man Deng Hong had become expert in the study of the Classic of History according to the New Text school of Ouyang. He was respected by Confucian scholars of the day, and was a tutor to the youthful Emperor An. When he became ill in 115 both the Dowager and the emperor went to call upon him and when he died they both wore mourning.

Deng Hong had asked that his funeral be carried out with the utmost simplicity, without brocade cloth or jade armour. Though the senior ministers recommended he be buried with the honours of a senior marquis and a general the Dowager did not agree, and even the gifts she did offer were rejected by Deng Hong's brother Deng Zhi, as senior male member of the family.

Deng Hong's son Guangde succeeded to his marquisate, but later, considering Deng Hong's special connection to the throne as a teacher of the emperor, the younger son Deng Fude was granted a second fief from his elder brother's territory.

After the death of the Dowager in 121 it was alleged that Deng Hong and his brothers Hui and Chang had supported a proposal to depose Emperor An in favour of Liu Yi the king of Pingyuan. This may have been true, though the high point of the campaign was not reached until 119, after all three brothers were dead: see sub Liu Yi. In any event, Emperor An is said to have been furious, and he certainly took this as a reason to rid himself of the powerful family. He had senior ministers present posthumous indictments of treason against Deng Kui and the others, and he stripped Deng Guangde, Deng Fude and the other marquises of their fiefs. -HHS 16/6:612-16, DGHJ 8:3a-b.

Deng Hui 鄧悝 see Deng Kui 鄧悝.

Deng Hui 鄧會 (d.165); Nanyang. A grandson of Deng Xiang and the Lady Xuan, parents of the Empress Deng of Emperor Huan, at the death of the Lady Xuan about 163 Deng Hui was granted the marquisate which had been awarded posthumously to Deng Xiang; he was also appointed a General of the Household. When the empress was disgraced in 165, Deng Hui was sent to prison and died there. -HHS 10B:445, 102/12:3257 [as Deng Lu 魯].

Deng Ji 鄧濟. An officer of Liu Biao, in 197 Deng Ji commanded a garrison in Nanyang. As Cao Cao attacked, the city fell and Deng Ji was captured. -SGZ 1:15.

Deng Jing 鄧京; Nanyang. Son of Deng Xun and brother of the Lady Deng Sui, future regent Dowager, when his sister became the empress of Emperor He Deng Jing was appointed a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. He died in that office soon afterwards. -HHS 16/6:612.

Deng Jing 鄧靜. In the early third century Deng Jing and his colleague Yin Qi, expert vocalists of formal music 雅樂, were members of the orchestra at the puppet court of Han under Cao Cao. -SGZ 29:806.

Deng Jingfeng 鄧荆鳳 see Deng Feng 鄧鳳.

Deng Kai 鄧闔 miswritten for Deng Chang 鄧閭.

Deng Kai 鄧凱; Nan. Local clan leaders in 219, Deng Kai and Wen Bu gathered non-Chinese people from the western hills to resist the invading forces of Sun Quan. Defeated by Lu Xun's officer Xie Jing, they fled west into Yi province and received military appointment under Liu Bei. -SGZ Wu 13:1345.

Deng Kang 鄧康 (d.134); Nanyang. Son of Deng Zhen 珍 and grandson of Deng Yu, in 112 Deng Kang was granted the succession to his father's marquisate after the death of his elder brother Lang. At this time, as each such fief changed hands by inheritance, the pension was reduced by half, but because Deng Kang was a cousin of the regent Dowager his revenues were reduced by only a third. He became a colonel in the Northern Army.

Deng Kang was concerned that the Dowager did not transfer power to the young Emperor An, even though he was formally of age. He protested several times but the Dowager made no change, so in 120 he claimed to be ill and did not attend court. The Dowager sent to ask after him, but the messenger had been a slave in the Deng household, and Deng Kang abused her, "You are one of our former slaves; how dare you show your face here!" The woman was angry; she reported to the Dowager that Deng Kang's illness was a pretence and that he had spoken disrespectfully. Deng Kang was dismissed and sent out to his fief in Beihai.

When the Dowager died in the following year and Emperor An turned against her family, Deng Kang's earlier remonstrances meant that he escaped their fate. He was appointed a Palace Attendant, and after Emperor Shun came to the throne in 125 he became Minister Coachman. He was admired by all the court for his fine morality and when he retired on account of ill health he was granted title as Specially Advanced, allowing him to remain in residence at the capital rather than go out to his fief. -HHS 10A:428-29, 16/6:608, 23/13:811-12.

Deng Kang 鄧康; Nanyang. Son of Deng Yan and nephew of the Lady Deng Mengnü, Empress of Emperor Huan, Deng Kang succeeded to his father's county marquisate in Runan about 157. When the empress's original surname was recognised in 161 [see sub Deng Mengnü], Deng Kang's fief was changed to a larger county in Nanyang and he received a grant of a hundred million cash. As the empress was disgraced in 165, however, all members of her family were stripped of their titles and appointments, sent back to their home country, and compelled to return all the gifts they had received. -HHS 10B:444-45, 102/12, 3257.

Deng Kuan 鄧寬; Nanyang. Younger brother of Deng Yu, in 37 Deng Kuan was awarded a noble title on account of Deng Yu's great service to Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 16/6:605.

Deng Kui 鄧攄 [Shuzhao 叔昭] (d.118); Nanyang. Son of Deng Xun and brother of the Lady Deng Sui, when his sister became the empress of Emperor He Deng Kui was made a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. When Emperor He died in 106 the Lady Deng, now Dowager, took control of the regency government and Deng Kui was appointed General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger. After the death of the Young Emperor he and his brothers took part in the selection of Liu You, Emperor An, and Deng Kui then became Colonel of the City Gates.

In 107 Deng Kui and his brothers were granted county marquisates with revenues from ten thousand households. They were reluctant, and after several exchanges the Dowager accepted their refusals, but they were named Servants at Court, a title normally held by the most senior marquises, which gave the right to take part in court councils next only to the Excellencies.

Deng Kui and his brother Chang both died about the same time in 118, and their testaments asked that they be buried in simple fashion without special ceremony. The Dowager accepted the request.

After the death of the Dowager in 121 it was alleged that Deng Kui and his brothers Hong and Chang had supported a proposal of Deng Fang that Emperor An should be deposed in favour of Liu Yi the king of Pingyuan. This may have been true, though the high point of the campaign was not reached until 119, after Deng Kui's death. Emperor An took the occasion to rid himself of the powerful family: he had senior ministers present posthumous indictments of treason, and he ended several fiefs, including that of Deng Kui's son and successor Deng Guangzong. -HHS 16/6:612-16, DGHJ 8:3a.

Deng Lang 鄧朗; Runan. Son of Deng Yuanyi, he told his grandfather Deng Bokao how Bokao's wife was ill-treating his mother the Lady Li. Deng Bokao was ashamed, and he sent the Lady Li back to her own family.

The Lady then married Ying Shun, but when she returned to the capital with her new husband Deng Lang, now a Gentleman at court, refused to accept her. In a face-to-face meeting, however, she persuaded him to take a less rigid attitude. -HHS 48/38:1607.

Deng Lei 鄧磊 (d.92); Nanyang. Younger brother of Deng Die, Deng Lei and his brother and their mother the Lady Yuan were close associates of the Dou faction which dominated the court at the beginning of the reign of Emperor He. Deng Lei became a colonel in the Northern Army. When the young emperor and his eunuch allies overthrew the power of the Dou in 92, Deng Lei, Deng Die and the Lady Yuan were accused of treason and died in prison. -HHS 23/13:819-20.

Deng Li 鄧鯉; Nanyang? In the early 70s, at the time of the alleged conspiracy involving Liu Ying the King of Chu, Deng Li held a marquisate, presumably as a member of the leading family from Nanyang. He and other members of the nobility were implicated by the confessions of Yan Zhong and Wang Ping, but before any action could be taken against them the censorial officer Han Lang persuaded Emperor Ming of their innocence. -HHS 41/31:1417.

Deng Liang 鄧良; Nanyang. Son of Deng Zhen 珍 and grandson of Deng Yu, he succeeded to his father's fief but died, probably in 112, leaving no heirs. -HHS 16/6:606.

Deng Long 鄧隆; Nanyang? A general of Emperor Guangwu, at the beginning of 26 Deng Long was sent with Chen Fu to summon Liu Yang, the discontented King of Zhending. Liu Yang barred his gates against them, but the imperial commissioner Geng Chun came to join Deng Long and Chen Fu, then enticed Liu Yang and his kinsmen to a meeting and had them arrested and killed.

In the autumn, after the rebellion of Peng Chong in Yuyang, Deng Long was sent to relieve Zhu Fu, who was besieged in Ji city in Guangyang. This was successful, but the two commanders then sought to operate separately and Peng Chong inflicted heavy defeats upon each of them. Deng Long was driven away and Zhu Fu was forced back into Ji. -HHS

21/11:764-65, 12/2:504; Bn 59:122-126.

HHS 15/5:582 refers to a Deng Long 鄧隆 who was Inspector of Yang province. Though the name is identical, it cannot be the same person, for the Inspector is described as a great-grandfather of Deng Chen, who married a sister of Emperor Guangwu and died in 49; he must have been active during Former Han: QHX:59. The Deng Long who served Guangwu was probably a member of the great Nanyang clan, but he cannot have been a lineal descendant of his namesake, for that would offend taboo.

Deng Long 鄧龍. An officer under Huang Zu, in 207 Deng Long was sent to lead a counter-attack against Sun Quan's general Zhou Yu on the Yangzi by the borders of Jing and Yang provinces. He was defeated and captured. -SGZ Wu 9:1260.

Deng Man 鄧滿 or Deng Pu 蒲. An officer under Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, in 24 he was left in charge of the siege of Wang Lang's supporter Wang Rao in Julu while the main army went to attack Handan city. -HHS 12/2:493.

Deng Meng 鄧猛, the Lady: see Deng Mengnü 鄧猛女.

Deng [Mengnü] 鄧猛女 or Deng Meng 猛, the Lady; Nanyang: Empress of Emperor Huan. [XHS 1:17a says that the Lady's style was Mengnü, and it is possible that her given name was Meng.] Daughter of Deng Xiang and the Lady Xuan, the Lady Deng was selected into the harem of Emperor Huan in 153 or 154. The common age for such entry was thirteen sui, so the Lady was born about 141.

The Lady's father Deng Xiang was a great-nephew of the Dowager Deng and the family had been respected in Nanyang for many generations. Following the death of the Dowager in 121, however, Emperor An had disgraced her kinfolk, and Deng Xiang was no longer regarded as a man of noble descent. He held only low-ranking appointments and died within a few years of the birth of his daughter. His widow the Lady Xuan soon married again, and her second husband, step-father to the Lady Deng, was Liang Ji/Gi 紀, maternal uncle to the Lady Sun Shou, wife of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji. [Liang Gi was not directly related to the General-in-Chief, and I use the variant transcription to distinguish him.]

Xuan and her children by Deng Xiang now shared in the prosperity of the imperial relatives by marriage; they adopted the surname Liang and Mengnü entered the harem under the patronage of Sun Shou, who evidently hoped she would serve as an agent or support for her adopted relatives. She was initially appointed as a Chosen Woman, lowest of the three ranks of imperial concubines, but her beauty attracted the favours of the emperor and she was soon promoted to be an Honoured Lady, highest rank below the empress. At first it appeared that Sun Shou's hopes were fulfilled, for the Lady Deng offered no challenge to the Empress Liang Nüying, sister of Liang Ji.

She did, however, seek and obtain favours for her own family. A year after she entered the harem, presumably at the time she was promoted to be Honoured Lady, her elder brother Deng Yan was made a county marquis in Nanyang with the high rank of Specially Advanced and precedence next only to the highest ministers of state, and when he died a year or so later his son Kang succeeded to his fief. On the other hand, the Lady's step-father Liang Gi died soon after her entry into the harem, so the connection with Sun Shou and Liang Ji was weakened, and in the autumn of 159 the situation was changed by the unexpected death of the Empress Liang. Liang Ji had no longer any direct connection to the imperial harem, and in order to regain his influence there he proposed to adopt the Lady Mengnü as his daughter and have her established as empress.

Emperor Huan was increasingly resentful of Liang Ji's dominance at court, but he still preferred Mengnü to the other women available, and so long as Liang Ji had the approval of Mengnü's family, notably her mother Xuan, there was no room for manoeuvre. At this point, however, Xuan and her relatives realised that they would lose much of their influence if Mengnü came under Liang Ji's control, and Xuan herself saw the opportunity to become mother-in-law to the emperor. She refused to approve the adoption.

An elder sister of Mengnü had married a certain Bing Zun, currently a Consultant at the court. He took the lead in urging the Lady Xuan to oppose Liang Ji's plans. Within a few days Liang Ji had sent a group of his retainers to kill him, and when Xuan still would not change her mind, Liang Ji sent his men against her too. They attacked the Lady Xuan's mansion in the capital but she was warned by her neighbours, ran to the palace, and told the emperor. With the aid of a trusted group of eunuchs, Emperor Huan drew up orders for a mixed force of eunuchs and palace gentlemen to take their insignia from Liang Ji and Sun Shou and send them to exile in the far south. Husband and wife preferred to kill themselves, and the Liang clan was destroyed.

Five days later, on 14 September 159, the Honoured Lady Mengnü became empress. She and her relatives had renounced their connection with the Liang family, and Emperor Huan, who intensely disliked the name of Liang, insisted his new consort adopt the surname Bo 薄. This name, which also appears as 亳, may have been Xuan's maiden name before her marriage to Deng Xiang, but more likely it was chosen as a reminder of the good example of the modest Lady Bo, concubine of Emperor Gao of Former Han who became the mother of Emperor Wen; and one may note a similarity with the ritual which accompanied the enthronement of the emperor's previous Empress Liang [see sub voce].

Since Mengnü's brother Deng Yan had been enfeoffed when she was made an Honoured Lady in 155, and her cousin Deng Wanshi was a childhood friend of Emperor Huan, her true lineage must have been well known. Two years later, in 161 senior officials sent in a memorial to say that it was inappropriate for the empress to avoid the name of her true father, and an edict restored her surname from Bo to Deng. Deng Xiang was now granted posthumous title as a marquis and appointment as General of Chariots and Cavalry and Xuan was enfeoffed as Lady of Kunyang, a prosperous county in Yingchuan. Their grandsons Deng Kang, Deng Tong and Deng Bing all held fiefs, and Deng Xiang's title was transferred to a cousin, Deng Hui.

On the other hand, though her relatives commanded various units in the palace guards and the Northern Army, only the empress's cousin Deng Wanshi held significant position as Intendant of Henan, and that was probably on account of a long-standing personal connection to the emperor. Despite the modesty of their perquisites compared to the extravagance and power of the Liang family, the Deng family were not popular and Emperor Huan received many protests against the honours he had granted them. In particular and very strangely, though the Deng had long been a leading family, and there appears to have been no question raised about the empress's legitimacy, she was described as a woman of low birth [e.g. Sima Biao in HHS 104/14:3295].

The emperor paid small attention to these criticisms and the Lady Deng continued to receive his favours. She bore him no sons, however, and though two imperial daughters appeared about this time it is unlikely that either of them were hers. Furthermore, the emperor had now gathered a vast harem, and the empress, in her late twenties and faced with constant competition from new, younger and ambitious rivals, was in a weak position. It is recorded that she had a furious quarrel with the Honoured Lady Guo, each telling tales about the other, and there is reference to her drunkenness. Her biography says she was arrogant and over-bearing and that the emperor became tired of her presumptions and importunities.

On 27 March 165 the Empress Deng was disgraced and imprisoned in the Drying House, the harem hospital which was also used for the seclusion of high-ranking ladies when they were out of favour, and a short time later she was dead, officially through an excess of grief 以憂死 – very possibly a euphemism for suicide or murder. It is also claimed that she was guilty of "heretical doctrines" 左道: i.e. non-Confucian teachings and superstition. Apart from her erratic behaviour under the pressure of harem rivalries, it may well be that the empress had been in search of some charm or drug which might enable her to bear the emperor a son. The accusation of witchcraft was a cliché of harem politics, but it may nonetheless be true, and any accusation of supernatural interference with the sacred person of the emperor or the imperial lineage, let alone the possibility of poison, were highly dangerous.

With the fall of the empress, her relatives were removed without difficulty from their positions at court. Deng Wanshi and Deng Hui died in prison, while others of the family were stripped of their honours and property and sent back to their home country in Nanyang.

The Empress Deng, in association with the eunuch Zuo Guan, was very likely involved in the early stages of the imperial worship of the divinity Huang-Lao 黃老, a combination of the legendary Yellow Emperor 黃帝 and the sage Laozi 老子. The cult had long been well established, but Emperor Huan was the first ruler to grant his patronage. At the beginning of 165

Zuo Guan was sent to make sacrifice at the shrine to Laozi in Chen, and it may be that this ritual reflected an enterprise of the Empress Deng, seeking mystical support for herself, her husband and his dynasty.

Even after her death and that of Zuo Guan, the imperial interest continued, culminating in the ceremony of worship to Huang-Lao and the new, alien, divinity of the Buddha 浮圖/浮屠, held at the imperial palace in Luoyang in the summer of 166. It has been suggested that Emperor Huan's third empress the Lady Dou was responsible for this development, but it seems more probable the imperial worship of Huang-Lao initially reflected the concerns of the Empress Deng. -HHS 10B:444-45*; deC 75B, deC 89:8-14, 58, also Seidel 69 and 69-70.

Deng Rang 鄧讓; Nanyang. Appointed by the Gengshi regime as Governor of Jiaozhi, controlling present-day Guangdong, Guangxi and the coast of Vietnam, Deng Rang was married to an elder sister of the Lady Yin Lihua, concubine and later empress of Guangwu, and he was an old and close friend of Cen Peng, Guangwu's commander in the south. In 29, as Cen Peng defeated the warlord Tian Rong and took control of the middle Yangzi, he wrote to Deng Rang and invited him to submit to the new imperial regime. Deng Rang was naturally willing to do so, and his example encouraged the administrators of commanderies in the south of Jing province. All sent tribute and were enfeoffed, so the new Han government gained access to the riches of the south. -HHS 17/7:659; Bn 59:157.

Deng Rong 鄧融; Nanyang. Administrator of Longxi in 60, he obtained the services of Lian Fan as his Officer of Merit. The provincial authorities later accused him of some crime and he was sent to prison. Lian Fan managed to care for him there, but Deng Rong died shortly after his release. The case became a cause célèbre, for in 61 the Excellencies Guo Dan and Feng Fang were dismissed for having supported the false allegations and the ill-intentioned officials who had made them. -HHS 31/21:1101-02, 27/17:941, Deng Sheng 鄧盛 or Deng Cheng [Bozhen 伯真]; Cangwu. Deng Sheng was a junior officer under the Grand Commandant when the Chancellor of Pengcheng Zuo Xiang was arrested for embezzlement. Zuo Xiang was examined by torture, but he refused to provide the confession required for a guilty verdict. Then Deng Sheng was sent to the prison; he had Zuo Xiang's manacles removed and allowed him to wash, then spoke to him courteously. At this good treatment, Zuo Xiang confessed his wrongdoing.

Deng Sheng was later a magistrate in Nan commandery, but when he heard his mother had died he immediately left his post. Admired for his filial conduct, he was called up to a more senior position in the office of the Grand Commandant.

In the early 170s Deng Sheng was Inspector of Bing province. The Administrator of Taiyuan, Wang Qiu, admired a certain Lu Fu and intended to give him appointment, but his officer Wang Yun objected that Lu Fu had shown no distinctive qualities. Wang Qiu threatened to kill Wang Yun, but Deng Sheng, impressed by his judgement and courage, made him his Attendant Officer. Wang Yun was thus protected from Wang Qiu and acquired local fame. -HHS 66/56:2172 & JJ at 2388 Hou Kang quoting Guangzhou xianxian zhuan.

At HHSJJ 66/56:2388, Hou Kang observes that although the styles are slightly different and the places of origin are not the same, it is strange to have two men named Deng Sheng about the same time. He suggests this may be the same man as the Deng Sheng described above.

Deng Sui 鄧綏, the Lady (81-121); Nanyang; Empress of Emperor He and later regent Dowager. Deng Sui was the daughter of Deng Xun 訓 and his wife the Lady Yin, who was a cousin of Guangwu's Empress Yin Lihua. She was a favourite of her grandmother, the widow of Deng Yu and mother of Deng Xun. When she was five the elderly lady trimmed her hair for her, but because of her poor eyesight she cut her on the forehead. The girl made no complaint; when asked she said that it did hurt, but her grandmother would be upset if she complained and she would not hurt her feelings.

By the age of six she had mastered the Shi shu 史書 "Book of History," a standard elementary text, and by twelve she had read the Classic of Poetry and Analects and joined her brothers in their study of the classics and histories. Devoted to literature and scholarship, she had no interest in household work. When her mother complained about this, the Lady attended to traditional women's occupations during the day and returned to her books at night. The people of the household called her the "Scholar" 諸生, and her father Deng Xun was most impressed. Considering her superior to her brothers and the hope of the family, he regularly discussed matters of business with her.

In 92 Deng Xun died. It had been planned that the Lady would enter the harem of Emperor He, but that was abandoned for the duration of mourning. The Lady wept for her father day and night, and for three years she refused salt and vegetables; her appearance was so changed by grief that her own family did not recognise her. On the other hand, she had a dream in which she drank milk from Heaven, while a physiognomist described her face as having the same pattern as that of the legendary King Tang 湯, founder of the Shang 商 dynasty. Some questioned these signs of fortune and eminence, but others recalled the achievements of the Lady's grandfather Deng Yu and the fine record of her father Deng Xun; such family virtue was now to be rewarded. At this time also we are told that the Lady's elder sister Deng Yan had died, leaving a daughter named E. Though still young herself, the Lady cared for the infant.

THE RISE TO HIGH RANK

In 95 the Lady at last joined the imperial harem. Seven feet two inches tall [166 cm], she had evidently recovered from the privations of mourning her father, for she is described as having a handsome face and a most elegant appearance, quite different to the common run of entrants. All who attended her were amazed, and in the winter of the following year, at the age of sixteen, she was appointed an Honoured Lady, next rank below the empress. Modest in her conduct, she behaved with courtesy to all, from the empress to the maids and concubines. When she became ill her mother and brothers brought medicines for her, but the Lady was concerned that this weakened the proper separation of the harem and the outside world; she spoke of her concerns to the emperor, and he gave special approval for their visits. At times of feasts and banquets, when other women dressed in competing finery and ornament, the Lady Deng wore plain colours unadorned. Her usual costume reflected that of the Empress Yin, and she was careful to show respect in the empress's company, never sitting at the same level, bending when they walked together, and never speaking first to the emperor. Emperor He was increasingly impressed.

Later, as the Empress Yin became estranged from the emperor, she would claim to be ill whenever he wanted to couple with her. For her part, the Lady Deng was sad that the emperor had seen many of his infant children die, and she was anxious that his lineage should flourish, so on several occasions she brought forward a junior concubine to give him greater opportunities. It seems certain that the Empress Yin was related to the Lady Deng, not only because the latter was kin to the Empress Yin of Guangwu, but also because the empress herself had a grandmother of the Deng clan. The details of the connection cannot be determined, and they made no real difference to the rivalry between the two women, for as the empress observed the success of the Lady Deng she became increasingly concerned at the threat to her own position.

There came a time that the emperor was extremely ill, and the empress remarked privately that if she had her way the Lady Deng would not survive him for long. The Lady heard of this, and she was so distressed at the evidence of the empress's hostility that she planned to commit suicide rather than bring scandal to the court and disaster to her family. One of her palace women, however, arranged a false report that the emperor was getting better, and so the Lady gave up the idea. Next day the emperor did indeed recover.

In the summer of 102 the Empress Yin was found to have been involved in black magic, and though the Lady Deng petitioned in her favour she was dismissed, imprisoned, and duly "died of grief." As senior ministers urged a new consort be appointed, Emperor He announced his choice of the Lady Deng. Though the Lady made suitable protestations, she was proclaimed empress on 21 November 102. In keeping with her conduct before she came to the throne, the new consort established a regime of some austerity, forbidding extravagant offerings to the court and arranging that seasonal offerings should comprise only ink and the newly-invented paper. Closer to home, though the emperor wanted to grant honours and offices to her family, the Lady Deng dissuaded him, and in the course of his reign her eldest brother Deng Zhi rose only to the position of a General of the Household, while the others were Gentlemen at the Yellow Gates.

THE DOWAGER AND THE SUCCESSION

In the winter of 105/106 Emperor He died, and the Lady Deng, now twenty-five years old, became Dowager. According to the constitutional custom of Han the Dowager had great potential power. Firstly, if the new ruler was under age she was entitled to attend court and act as regent. Second, if her husband had died without naming an Heir, she was required to select his successor from among his sons or other males of the imperial clan. Emperor He had fathered several children, but many had died in infancy. Four daughters survived him, and they were enfeoffed as princesses at the time of his death, but he left only two sons. The identities of the mothers are unknown, though they were very likely among the junior concubines introduced to the ruler's bed through the agency of the Lady Deng. It was announced, moreover, that because of the high mortality, and the fear of evil within the palace, whether supernatural or human, both boys had been removed and cared for outside, and only the Dowager knew who and where they were.

Neither of the princes had been acknowledged as Heir before their father died, and the Dowager now announced that the elder, Liu Sheng, had a chronic illness which prevented him taking the throne. Enfeoffing him as King of Pingyuan, she granted the imperial succession to his younger brother, Liu Long, at that time barely three months old. The Young Emperor was brought to the throne on the evening that his father had died, but a few months later, in the autumn of 106, the child died. Liu Sheng was once more passed over, and the Dowager looked for a successor among the males of the imperial clan. Liu Qing the King of Qinghe had at one time been the Heir of Emperor Zhang, and though he had been deposed in favour of his half-brother he had been on excellent terms of friendship and trust with Emperor He. He could now have been named emperor, but he had always been sickly, and we are told that when Emperor He died Liu Qing again became ill, and he died at the end of the year. Instead, the Dowager chose Liu Qing's son Liu You, who had been born in 94 and was therefore thirteen sui, some twelve years old by Western reckoning, when he was brought to the throne on 23 September 106. He is known as Emperor An.

Some commentators have questioned the Dowager's motives and policy, arguing not only for the candidacy of Liu Qing, but noting that there were several other sons of Emperor Zhang who might have provided a new ruler of full age. Soon after the accession of the Young Emperor the Dowager had ordered Liu Qing and his brothers Shou, Kai and Zhang, kings of Jibei, Hejian and Changshan respectively, to leave their long-term residences at the capital and go out to their fiefs. She was evidently anxious to have such possible pretenders away from the centre of power, while she arranged that the future emperor Liu You remained at Luoyang.

There are no details of the illness of Liu Sheng, the son of Emperor He who had now been passed over for a second time; it may have been physical or mental. A number of officials believed that the disability was not sufficiently serious to disqualify him from the imperial succession and the Dowager was choosing youthful rulers in order to prolong her regency. It does not appear, however, that Liu Sheng was markedly older than Liu You, and he may have been younger: he left no sons when he died in 113, and he may have been too young to sire children even then. In the winter of 107/108, a year after the accession of Emperor An, the Excellency Zhou Zhang attempted a coup to depose the Dowager and her nominee and set Liu Sheng upon the throne. The plot, however, was found out, and Zhou Zhang killed himself.

It is arguable that the Dowager had sought to carry out her responsibilities with honour: it may well be that the illnesses of both Liu Sheng and Liu Qing were, in different ways, truly incapacitating, while the choice of Liu You restored the inheritance to the lineage of the former Heir Liu Qing and prevented the claims of other descendants of Emperor Zhang from causing a struggle for the succession.

THE DOWAGER AND THE REGENCY

There is no question, however, that the Dowager enjoyed exercising power. It is said she consulted her elder brother Deng Zhi on the imperial successions, but this may be little more than lip-service to public expectation, and it is clear that she restricted the role of her male kinsmen in government. In 108 Deng Zhi was named General-in-Chief 大將軍, a position which Bielenstein regards as indicating his authority as regent [e.g. Bn 80:152 and 86A:283-284]. My own interpretation, however, is that the Dowager ruled as regent through her authority to "take part in the affairs of court" 臨朝, and Deng Zhi's position as her senior male relative was not significantly affected by his title as General-in-Chief: the appointment was actually used as an excuse to relieve him of direct command of operations against the rebel Qiang, where he had achieved very limited success.

Deng Zhi and his brothers formally withdrew from government when their mother the Lady Yin died at the end of 110, and unlike Liang Ji, Dou Wu and He Jin, senior relatives by marriage in later reigns, Deng Zhi never held control of the affairs of the Imperial Secretariat, giving formal command of the government. From 106 the Grand Tutor for the Young Emperor Zhang Yu and the Grand Commandant Xu Fang held this authority, but that arrangement ceased in 107 after the appointment of Emperor An; there was never any doubt that the Lady Deng was the effective ruler.

Even after Emperor An had formally taken the cap of manhood 加元服 at the beginning of 109, the Dowager continued to dominate the court. When she was taken ill a few months later, there was suggestion that she might hand over power, but the Lady reacted strongly and firmly. There were a number of protests over the years, and the emperor was naturally resentful, but there was no effective challenge until her death in 121. When he at last gained power for himself, Emperor An turned on the Deng family, disgraced its leaders and drove them to exile or suicide.

From 106 to 121, therefore, the Lady Deng was the de facto ruler of Later Han, primarily responsible for government policy, and the events of those years are discussed and summarised below.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND THE QIANG REBELLION

On the northern frontier, the pattern begun in the time of Emperor He initially continued. In 106 there was a new incursion of the Xianbi in the northwest, but the Northern Xiongnu sent messengers to Dunhuang commandery offering tribute. In the autumn of that year, however, there was a general outbreak of rebellion in central Asia and the Protector-General Ren Shang was besieged at Shule [Kashgar]. He called for help, and a force of five thousand horsemen, primarily composed of auxiliaries from the Qiang and other non-Chinese tribes of Liang province was sent to his relief. Though the siege was broken before the relief force arrived, the troubles continued and worsened, Ren Shang was recalled and replaced, and in the summer of 107 the Dowager ordered that the whole territory of the Western Regions should be abandoned: the extended empire was more than the government could afford to maintain.

The strategic decision was justifiable: the enterprise in central Asia had been the personal achievement of Ban Chao, and its military costs now appeared to outweigh the benefits. Unfortunately, the withdrawal still required a transitional military presence, and when the Qiang were subjected to a further impressment they rose in rebellion throughout Liang province: the troubles in the far west were seen as a clear sign of weakness, and the non-Chinese resented the conscription and feared they would be kept from their homes indefinitely. An initial mutiny, badly handled, spread rapidly, and though some of the insurgents simply fled across the frontier other groups fought back. By the winter of 107 the insurgents had cut the road to central Asia, and the great Qiang rebellion was maintained for more than ten years.

The rebellion was far more serious than the earlier wars of this region, for those had been waged primarily against tribespeople on or outside the frontier, the so-called "Western Qiang," while this affair involved the "Eastern Qiang" who had settled within imperial territory. That process had begun early in the first century, partly by circumstance and partly though policy decisions by officials like Ma Yuan. The result, in any event, was that Chinese and non-Chinese occupied the same territory, and when trouble broke out the Qiang turned on their neighbours with devastating effect. Within a very short time the whole of Liang province had been affected, government offices were destroyed, and Chinese people fled south and west to escape massacre.

The government initially sought to ease the trouble with an amnesty, but by the end of 107 the rebels had found a leader, Dianlian of the Xianlian tribe in western Longxi, and they captured military equipment from camps and bases in the region. In the winter a hastily-gathered imperial army was sent out, commanded by the Dowager's brother Deng Zhi, with Ren Shang as his assistant. Many of the troops were untrained men from inner commanderies, and they were defeated in a series of battles in Hanyang. By the end of 108 Deng Zhi had been recalled, probably to save him further military embarrassment, Qiang raiding parties were ravaging the territories still under nominal imperial control, and there was widespread famine.

In the winter of 109 the Shanyu Tan of the Southern Xiongnu joined the Xianbi and Wuhuan of the northeast in rebellion against Han, and though that trouble was soon settled the situation had become so unstable that the imperial forces were brought back to defend Chang'an, while in 110 and 111 the headquarters of Jincheng, Longxi, Anding, Beidi and Shang commanderies, and that of the Protector, were withdrawn south and east into more secure territory. In an effort to deny resources to the enemy, the government now forced its own people to leave their homes, and this deliberate depopulation, combined with the effects of the war itself, reduced Chinese tenure of the northwest still further.

In fact the year 111 marked the high point of Qiang success, for Dianlian died in the following year, and none of his successors was able to achieve the wide authority which he had held. Following another offer of amnesty, the Han forces returned to the attack and by 114 they had largely recovered Jincheng. A major offensive was defeated in 115 but thereafter, under the command of Ren Shang, the Chinese regained the initiative and as the remnant rebels were harried by raids, increasing numbers came to surrender. In 117 Ren Shang and the Protector Ma Xian defeated the last major army at Fuping in Beidi, and by 118 all resistance had ended.

The victory, however, was Pyrrhic, for massive damage had been done to the Chinese position in the northwest. There were continuing small-scale risings and raids across the frontier, while the displaced commandery capitals returned but slowly to their former sites and communications were only gradually restored. The government made grants of grain and farmland to refugees, forgave taxes on several occasions, and attempted to persuade emigrants to return, but the loss of population was not recovered. It was not until the late 120s that there was an active program of reconstruction, and that was overtaken by events ten years later.

The imperial position as a whole had also suffered heavily. The direct costs of the war were enormous – 24,000 million cash – and the collateral damage and disruption to the region was even greater. Furthermore, the loss of revenue from Liang province placed increasing strain upon the already stretched finances of a government which had been in difficulty even before the disaster, and in later years the pressure for funds from other sources would disrupt the equilibrium of both the court and the provinces. In the end the armies of Han had been successful, but they had certainly achieved no long-term stability.

By good fortune for the Chinese, the rebellion of the Xiongnu, Xianbi and Wuhuan in 109 and 110 had not involved any active co-operation with the Qiang, and the trouble was put down within a few months. This was the first time that the hitherto subservient state of the Southern Xiongnu had turned against its master, and though peace was kept for the next ten years, and the surrender of the pretender Shanyu Fenghou in 118 marked the end of that renegade enterprise, the northern frontier was no longer stable and the problem of the Xianbi remained intractable.

Apart from the joint enterprise of 109-110 and some raids on the northeast in 115 and 117, the Xianbi had been comparatively quiet during this period, but they continued to spread westwards. By 118 and 119 they were raiding Shanggu and Dai commanderies, and their expanding power threatened the Xiongnu and the Wuhuan as well as the north of China Proper. Though leaders of the latter groups accepted Chinese suzerainty once more, they were driven to do so through their own weakness against the newcomers, while many of their subjects abandoned their former allegiance and styled themselves Xianbi. By the end of the Dowager's regency in 121 the Xianbi were dominant on the steppe while the northwest remained devastated in the aftermath of the Qiang rebellion.

Elsewhere in the northeast Chinese fortunes varied. In 107 tribute came from the Wa 倭 people of present-day Japan, and in 109 from Gaogouli [Koguryo] in present-day Manchuria. In 111, however, there was raiding by the people of Fuyu, northern neighbours of Gaogouli, and in 118 Gaogouli attacked Xuantu. During these years the court set up the commandery-level Dependent State of Liaodong in the hill country about the Daling River to strengthen military control there, and in 120 the Xianbi of that region offered submission while Fuyu sent tribute. In the following year, however, when the Inspector of You province Feng Huan attacked Gaogouli and its allies he was tricked by a false surrender and suffered a serious counter-attack.

From 109 to 111 there was serious piracy along the coast of the North China plain, but the south of the empire remained comparatively calm, apart from a series of disturbances in Wuling during 115 and 116, all of which were put down locally, and a rebellion which affected Cangwu, Yulin, Hepu and Nanhai about the same time. This too was settled by local forces, though the Imperial Clerk Ren Chuo was sent to lead them, and he was given authority to issue an amnesty to those insurgents prepared to surrender.

As in the northeast, Yi province in the southwest experienced alternating tribute missions, raids and rebellions from the non-Chinese people of the frontier. In 107 and 108 some sixty thousand Qiang, separated from their rebellious cousins in the north, declared their submission, and the Dependent States of Jianwei and Guanghan, followed later by a third for Shu commandery, were set up to deal with them. Chinese sources say they were designed to assist the settlement of surrendered barbarians, but the Dependent States did not control new territory; on the contrary they included counties which already existed but which were now subject to military administration, and with their new population of non-Chinese they may be seen as much a sign of instability as of imperial expansion. On the other hand the region was certainly more secure than Liang province, and a number of new horse-parks were developed for the imperial cavalry, taking the place of those which had formerly been maintained in that now vulnerable territory.

In 120 King Yongyoutiao of Shan 掸, in the region of present-day Burma/Myanmar, sent tribute to the court. He had showed similar respect to Emperor He in 97, but this embassy included musicians, conjurers, jugglers and people who could swallow fire. They performed at the court assembly on New Year's Day 121, and Yongyoutiao was sent an official seal.

The envoys from Shan claimed that their country was connected in the southwest to the state of Daqin 大秦, traditionally identified with the Roman empire; they presumably referred to the sea route across the Indian Ocean. About the same time, following the end of the Qiang rebellion some Chinese presence was restored in central Asia. In 119 Cao Song the Administrator of Dunhuang sent an officer to set up a military colony at Yiwu near Hami and arranged for agents to take up residence in Shanshan and in the kingdoms of Jushi about present-day Turfan. In 120 the king of Further Jushi called on the Northern Xiongnu in Dzungaria to help him drive the Chinese away, and the king of Shanshan felt threatened and asked for help. The Dowager invited Ban Chao's son Ban Yong to comment. While he did not support a full campaign, Ban Yong did propose a cautious advance, primarily to deprive the Xiongnu of the resources of the region. So it was agreed that the claim to authority in the west should be revived, with residents in various city-states and a garrison presence in Dunhuang to back them. Military colonies were as yet too ambitious, but this limited establishment marked the beginning of the second expansion of Later Han into the Western Regions.

THE FINANCIAL CRISIS

Towards the end of the reign of Emperor He there was increasing concern about the weakness of government finance and the failure of officials to care for the people. Soon after she came to power the Dowager issued edicts expressing concern about the quality of local administration and calling for stricter attention to pastoral care, notably for refugees from the various disasters which afflicted the empire. She was particularly encouraged in this policy by Fan Zhun, an officer of the Imperial Secretariat; in following years she held special recruitment for worthy men in retirement and in 108 she sent Fan Zhun and Lü Cang as special commissioners to organise relief in the east of the empire.

The problems of drought, flood and locusts in the time of Emperor He continued with comparable and even increased ferocity during the regency of his Dowager Deng. There are almost annual reports of such misfortunes, coupled with frequent references to earthquakes and great winds. Some of these, particularly those in the Treatises of Astronomy and of the Five Powers, may reflect the exaggeration and even invention of contemporary politicians or later historians [this problem is discussed by Bielenstein and by Mansvelt Beck: Bn 54:156, MBeck 90:170], but it is clear that many of the phenomena recorded in the annals were only too real, that the human distress was very great, and that the government made such efforts as it could to alleviate it. There are frequent references to the opening of government granaries 稟, and in 107 it was ordered that grain was to be transferred from Yang province north to impoverished areas of Xu and Yan provinces. In 109 there were reports of cannibalism in the capital district, and the Vast Pond and other imperial parks were opened to the public. In later years, drought was accompanied by visitations of the imperial prison and jail release, together with prayers for rain; and successive plagues of locusts brought donations and the remission of taxes. In 113 there was another forced transfer of grain from the commanderies south of the Yangzi to afflicted territories in the north, while grain was also requisitioned from counties on the Vast Canal to replenish the great Ao Granary. In 119 there was plague in Kuaiji, and a special mission was sent with the Court Physician, to authorise tax relief and to grant somewhat macabre awards of coffins.

There were attempts at positive construction, notably in 115 and 116 when old water control works in Wei and Taiyuan were repaired to increase arable land for new settlement. Elsewhere, however, the costs of the great rebellions and constant calls for tax remission and famine relief meant that there were few resources available.

The Dowager made several economies on ceremonial and imperial expenditure. We are told that she was little enamoured of magical or mystical beliefs and practices: she eliminated many of them from official ceremonies; and at the end of 106 she ordered the cessation of the festivals of Fishes and Dragons 魚龍 and of the Manyan 曼延 monster [Knechtges 82:230; Bodde 75:159-161]. In the following year the drummers and pipers of the Yellow Gates were transferred to more practical employment with the Feathered Forest corps of guards, while the allocation of fodder for the imperial stables was reduced except for those horses actually drawing carriages, and the manufacture of goods in the palace workshops was restricted. The Dowager likewise reduced expenditure on imperial banquets, and it is said that she herself ate meat only once a day.

These reforms had been found necessary even before the outbreak of the great Qiang rebellion in 107, and the financial problems of the imperial government then became even greater. In 109 there were further reductions, notably in the ceremony of the Great Exorcism 大讎, in the entertainments offered at the annual changing of the palace guards [Bodde 75:75], and in the court assembly held for the New Year of 110. The revenues of all marquisates were heavily cut, particularly at time of inheritance, as were the numbers of officials and their salaries, while the penalty for speculation in office included proscription of the culprit's family for three generations. Also in 109, the sale of offices and orders of honour was approved and inaugurated: secondary marquisates and lesser noble ranks were made available, as well as junior positions as guards and clerks at the capital. The program was introduced on recommendation from the Excellencies, and there was precedent from the time of Emperor Wu of Former Han, when proceeds had been similarly used to cover military expenses, but this was the first occasion in Later Han: the model would be followed by Emperor Huan, and a more extensive and corrupt system would develop under Emperor Ling.

Given such pressures, at the peak of the Qiang rebellion in 111 the official Pang Can raised serious debate about the most effective way to maintain order on the frontier, and whether large regions of the northwest should not be abandoned. The government was persuaded to continue its campaign of reconquest and was eventually successful, but the costs and losses were enormous. It is impossible to assess the situation accurately, but it appears that by the end of the Dowager's rule, and despite her best efforts, the imperial government was functionally bankrupt: it was certainly generally incapable of carrying out its traditional duty to provide relief in times of public distress.

MORALITY AND SCHOLARSHIP

When the Dowager took power as regent in 106 official scholarship was in decline. The New Text had triumphed under Emperor Zhang, and its dominance had been confirmed by the authoritarian examination system at the University, instituted at the urging of the Excellency Xu Fang. In fact, however, New Text theories were largely rejected by leading scholars of the time, and the most distinguished preferred to work and teach privately. Early in the regency Fan Zhun presented a memorial urging the promotion of learning, praising the patronage shown by the early emperors, and particularly the splendid age of Emperor Ming, when the Book of Filial Piety was known even by military men, and the Xiongnu King Dajuququ came to study at Luoyang. On the other hand, Fan Zhun deplored the empty formality of orthodox teaching, and while recognising the value of Confucianism to law and political affairs, he emphasised the importance of individual morality, which was better fostered by the teachings of Huang-Lao and other forms of popular religion. He urged the government to seek out scholars in retirement and offer them appointment, and the Dowager issued a number of calls for nomination as Sincere and Upright, Plain and Honest, and Kind and Worthy.

For her own part, the Dowager had maintained her interest in scholarship. After she entered the imperial harem she was tutored by the Lady Ban Zhao on the classics, history, mathematics and astronomy, and when she came to power she worked on government business during the day and studied at night. She also had palace eunuchs attend lessons on the classics in order that they in turn could teach the inmates of the imperial harem.

The Lady Deng sponsored two major projects. About 110 the scholars Liu Zhen, Liu Taotu and Ma Rong, were commissioned to join Academicians of the University in compiling a definitive edition of the official Five Classics, Changes, History, Poetry, Ritual and Chunqiu. The project was supervised by the eunuch Cai Lun, putative developer of paper, and was carried out in the imperial library of the Eastern Pavilion.

In 120 Liu Zhen was further commissioned to work with Liu Taotu, Liu Yi and Li You on the official history of Later Han, Han ji, later known as Dongguan Hanji. The work had been started by Ban Gu and others under orders from Emperor Ming, with the title Jianwu zhuji 建武注記 "Diary of the Jianwu Period," and this second instalment contained annals for the period 58 to 106, being the reigns of Emperors Ming, Zhang, He and the infant Shang, together with tables and biographies of leading men, imperial relatives by marriage and noted scholars. A few years later Liu Zhen and Liu Taotu asked for the assistance of the scholar Zhang Heng, but Emperor An did not approve. Liu Zhen and Liu Taotu died soon afterwards, and further requests by Zhang Heng to complete the work were likewise rejected. It is possible, therefore, that this particular recension may never have reached final form.

Though she had limited interest in the Imperial University, in 119 the Dowager did summon some forty young members of the imperial clan and another thirty of her own family to the capital. They were provided with lodgings so they might study the Confucian classics and the histories, and the Lady Deng herself supervised their examinations. One cannot be certain how much this program overlapped with or supplemented the Palace School for Noble Families set up by Emperor Ming, but in the style of Fan Zhun's proposals ten years before the Dowager explained that she sought to revive the good examples of earlier rulers, and with this special tuition, together with her commissioning of classical editions and dynastic history, she could claim to follow the tradition of imperial patronage.

As further evidence of the Dowager's concern for Confucian principles, in 116 the government ordered that high officials should observe a three-year period of mourning for the death of a parent. The decision represented a triumph of theoretical morality over the real needs of administration, for the inconvenience of losing the services of senior ministers for extended periods was naturally great. The policy was initiated and supported by the Excellency Liu Kai, but it indeed proved impracticable and was rescinded after the Dowager's death.

Finally we may note that in 119 the Excellency Li He, who had sought to enhance the prestige of the University, persuaded the court that worship of a Sixth Venerable One 六宗 should be restored to the official program of rituals, as in Former Han. Given the previous concern of the Dowager to reduce and simplify state rituals, this addition may have reflected the personal influence of Emperor An [HHS 98/8:3184; MBeck 90:97].

THE DEATH OF THE DOWAGER AND THE FALL OF THE DENG CLAN

The Dowager died on 17 April 121, after a short illness, at the age of forty by Western reckoning. One of the most competent and effective rulers of Later Han, she had placed two emperors upon the throne and controlled the government in difficult times for more than fifteen years. Emperor An, however, bitterly resented her refusal to grant him power after he had formally come of age, and though her authority was unassailable while she lived, the emperor, once freed of her tutelage, soon turned upon her family.

After her death it was claimed that the Dowager had been disillusioned with the quality of the emperor, and that she had even planned to depose him and put his cousin Liu Yi, King of Pingyuan, in his place. Certainly Liu Yi had been among the princes brought to the capital for education in 119, and he received some signs of favour from the Lady Deng, but it is hard to believe she would have risked the turmoil of a succession conflict, while the allegation came from known enemies of her family. Given Emperor An's performance in power, however, it might have been better if the Dowager had followed such an inclination. In any event, Emperor An accepted the charge, and he may well have been waiting for an excuse to rid himself of such a powerful family. He had senior ministers present indictments of treason, then stripped the Deng of their fiefs and their property, and drove many to suicide. Within a few months their power and influence were ended.

Despite the quality of her government and the later wilfulness of Emperor An, notably in regard to the succession of his only son Liu Bao, traditional commentators regard the regime of the Dowager Deng as an aberration from the proper pattern of imperial government, and the experience of the Deng family demonstrated the difficulties faced by any imperial relatives by marriage. No matter how it was managed, their position depended upon the good will or weakness of the emperor, and once the sovereign was in a position to exercise his own power there was no possibility of resistance. In different ways, the Dou in the time of Emperor He, and later the Liang and Dou under emperors Huan and Ling, demonstrated the ultimate authority of the imperial throne and the weakness of any subject, no matter how mighty, who might hope to contend with it. In the long term, there were no good answers. -HHS 10A:418-30*, HHS 5; Bn 86A:283-284, Loewe 86C:297-305.

Deng Tang 鄧棠; Nanyang. A younger son of Deng Chen, but not by the Lady Liu Yuan who was sister of Emperor Guangwu, Deng Tang succeeded to his father's county marquise in 49. His fief was later shifted from Changshan into Nanyang. -HHS 15/5:584.

Deng Tong 鄧通 [Ziyuan 子淵]. As a colonel in the Northern Army, Deng Tong was respected by his officers and men. -XC 7:4b.

Deng Tong 鄧統; Nanyang. Son of Deng Yan and nephew of the Empress Deng of Emperor Huan, at the death of his grandmother the Lady Xuan about 163 he was granted a marquise to take over her fief in Nanyang and was also made a Palace Attendant.

When the empress was disgraced in 165, however, all members of her family were stripped of their titles and appointments, sent back to their home country, and obliged to return the gifts they had received. -HHS 10B:445, 102/12:3257.

Deng Wan 鄧萬 see Deng Wanshi 鄧萬世.

Deng Wandai 鄧萬代 see Deng Wanshi 鄧萬世.

Deng Wanshi 鄧萬世 [also Wan and Wandai 代] (d.165); Nanyang. Son of Deng Zun, he was a friend of Liu Zhi, future Emperor Huan, when he was still a marquis, before he came to the imperial throne in 146. Since Deng Zun was disgraced and died in 121 and Liu Zhi was born only in 132, Deng Wanshi must have been a good deal older than the future emperor.

Deng Wanshi is described as an uncle 從父 of the Empress Deng Mengnü, but it is unlikely that he was actually the brother of her father Deng Xiang: Deng Xiang's family is described as being reduced to a low status, while Deng Wanshi's father Deng Zun was still recognised as a senior officer of the past. More probably, Deng Wanshi was a senior cousin of the empress.

No doubt as a result of his connection to the throne, in the early 160s Deng Wanshi was Intendant of Henan. Emperor Huan sought to grant posthumous re-entfeoffment to Deng Zun. Deng Zun had been granted a county marquisate in 118, but it was cancelled when he was disgraced in 121. Though the emperor claimed the honour recognised Deng Zun's past success in the north, the real purpose was to ennoble Deng Wanshi. Though the minister Chen Fan and others objected that the emperor was too generous to his relatives by marriage and that Deng Zun's achievements were exaggerated, Deng Wanshi eventually received his fief.

When the empress was disgraced in 165, Deng Wanshi died in prison. Other members of the family, who had hitherto shared in the good fortune, were sent back to their home country. -HHS 10B:445, 48/38:1619, 66/56:2162-63; deC 75B:19.

Deng Xi 鄧襲; Nanyang. Second son of Deng Yu, at the death of his father in 58 he shared his fief with his brothers Deng Zhen 震 and Deng Zhen 珍 and received title as a marquis in Beihai. -HHS 16/6:605.

Deng Xi 鄧羲; Nanyang. An officer in Jing province about 198, he protested against Liu Biao's alliance with Yuan Shao against Cao Cao. Liu Biao paid no attention, so Deng Xi left his service. When Liu Biao died in 208 and Cao Cao took over Jing province, he enfeoffed Deng Xi and gave him high rank at court. -SGZ 6:211-12, 215-16 [HHS 74/64B:2424 and SGZ 1:30 have the personal name as Yi 義].

Deng Xian 鄧顯 (d.144). After the rebellion of Fan Rong and Zhou Sheng broke out in Jiujiang in 144, the Administrator Qiu Sheng was disgraced and Deng Xian took his place. Soon afterwards he followed Feng Gun in an attack on the rebels, but the army was defeated and Deng Xian was killed. -HHS 6:275, 38/28:1279.

Deng Xian 鄧賢. In 212, as Liu Bei turned against Liu Zhang, warlord Governor of Yi province, Liu Gui and other officers were sent to oppose him but were defeated and forced to surrender. -SGZ Shu 2:882.

Deng Xiang 鄧香; Nanyang. A descendant of Deng Yu, he was a great-nephew of the Dowager Deng. After the Dowager's death in 121, however, the power of the Deng family at court had been broken by Emperor An, and Deng Xiang was no longer regarded as a man of noble descent. He held appointment as a gentleman cadet, but rose no higher than a junior position in the Lateral Courts, the bureau supervising the affairs of the harem, which was staffed by both eunuchs and full men.

Deng Xiang married the Lady Xuan, whose maiden surname is unknown, and had children by her, including the Lady Deng Mengnü who became an empress of Emperor Huan. He died in the 140s, a few years after the birth of his daughter, and his widow the Lady Xuan married Liang Ji/Gi. In 161, after his daughter had become empress, Deng Xiang was awarded posthumous honours as a marquis and General of Chariots and Cavalry. -HHS 10B:444, 16/6:618, 34/24:1186.

Deng Xuanzhi 鄧玄之; Nanyang. In 215 Deng Xuanzhi was with Lü Meng's army as he attacked Liu Bei's holdings in the south of Jing province. Liu Bei's Administrator of Lingling, Hao Pu, an old friend of Deng Xuanzhi, held out and then Lü Meng was recalled. Before he left, however, he sent Deng Xuanzhi to Hao Pu with a threat to take the city by storm, and Hao Pu came to surrender. -SGZ Wu 9:11276-77.

Deng Xun 鄧尋 or Deng Xin. When Deng Yu was ordered west against the Gengshi Emperor in 24, he chose Deng Xun to be a general under his command. -HHS 16/6:601.

Deng Xun 鄧訓 [Pingshu 平叔] (36-92); Nanyang. Deng Xun was a son of Deng Yu; on his position in the family see sub Deng Yu. As a young man Deng Xun was ambitious but showed no love of learning, and his father was always angry at him. After Emperor Ming came to the throne Deng Xun was appointed a gentleman cadet. He was popular with men of every rank, and became well known after he helped the imperial physician Pi Xun when he was taken ill one cold night in a palace gatehouse.

We are not told whether Deng Xun held further offices after his period as a cadet, or whether he retired into private life, but early in the reign of Emperor Zhang he was sent as an Internuncio to report on canal works in Changshan. In 66, during the reign of Emperor Ming, a transport canal had been planned for the Hutuo River in the Taihang Mountains between Taiyuan and Changshan. The work was difficult and dangerous, and though it was carried on for many years with heavy loss of life, it had not been finished. Deng Xun was evidently expected to give impetus to the project, but in 78 he urged it be abandoned. Despite official reluctance to give up a long and expensive commitment, this was done, and Deng Xun was admired for his wise and sensitive recommendation.

About this time Ren Xing the Administrator of Shanggu organised a punitive expedition against the Wuhuan. General trouble broke out, and Deng Xun was ordered to bring reinforcements north from the base at Liyang in Wei commandery to camp in Yuyang. He became known to the people of the border regions and was extremely popular in You province.

After another interlude as Internuncio in charge of the Camp at Liyang, Deng Xun was sent north again in 81 as Protector of the Wuhuan. Though it entailed a long posting on the frontier, many of the Liyang troops went with their families to join him in his new command: see also sub Ju Guo. It is said that Deng Xun's reputation for military authority combined with fair dealing was such that the Xianbi did not venture to trouble the borders. Among his own men Deng Xun had wives found for those soldiers who had none, and when there was an outbreak of infectious fever he personally prepared medicines to treat the sick.

In 83 the intrigues of the Dou family of the empress brought the deaths of the Honoured Ladies Liang and the disgrace of their family. Deng Xun had been in correspondence with Liang Hu, a cousin of the concubines, and because of this he was dismissed and sent back to his home country. In 86, however, when rebellion broke out among the non-Chinese people in western Liang province, Deng Xun was sent as an Internuncio. He then became Administrator of Zhangye, and held great influence across the northwest.

Two years later the Protector of the Qiang Zhang Yu killed the chieftain Miyu by treachery, and his people were furious and caused trouble. The court at Luoyang was concerned, and Deng Xun was recommended by the senior ministers to replace Zhang Yu.

The Qiang leader Mitang, son of Miyu, had created an alliance of the tribes through a network of treaties and hostages. He planned to wait until the Yellow River froze over in the winter, then bring forty thousand men to attack Deng Xun. At this time, however, the Little Yuezhi people of the hill country between the Koko Nor and the commandery of Wuwei lived separately from the Qiang and had long been hostile to them. Though fine and courageous horsemen, they numbered only three thousand fighting men and were always at a disadvantage. Mitang had ten thousand men from the frontier of Wuwei, and he intended to deal with the Yuezhi before turning against Deng Xun.

His advisers urged Deng Xun to take advantage of this conflict among the alien peoples, but he sent orders that his frontier troops should make no move, but offer refuge in Chinese forts and garrisons to Yuezhi refugees, and do their utmost to protect them. As a result, the Qiang could not harm the Yuezhi, and the Yuezhi came to kowtow in thanks. Deng Xun recruited several hundred of their young men into a force which became known as the Loyal Auxiliary of Barbarians of Huangzhong 湟中義從胡 [Huangzhong being the name for the valley of the Xining 西寧河 or Huang River 湟水].

Deng Xun also gave presents to the Qiang tribes and sent medicines when they were ill, so many groups, including that led by Mitang's uncle Haoyu, came to make peace. Deng Xun enlarged the Loyal Auxiliary to include Qiang and other non-Chinese tribesmen, and with this force, now numbering four thousand men, he advanced beyond the borders to seek out Mitang. He defeated him, killed more than six hundred of the enemy and captured over ten thousand head of horses, cattle and sheep. Mitang was driven from his base on the upper Yellow River, while many of his people abandoned him and fled.

In the spring of the following year, 89, the rebel Qiang attempted to return to their homelands, but Deng Xun was now able to gather six thousand auxiliaries, and he sent them to the attack under the command of his Chief Clerk Ren Shang. Crossing the Yellow River, they attacked the settlements of Mitang's people, forced them away again into the hill country to the north, and defeated a counter-attack with heavy losses. Now at the end of his strength, Mitang led the remnants of his followers away to the west, while the other tribes of the enemy coalition fell away and came to make terms with Han.

The Shaodang chieftain Donghao, whose people had earlier settled in Chinese territory but had since gone to join Mitang, now returned to make obeisance, and other groups across the frontier sent hostages. Deng Xun made a full settlement, combining authority and good faith. The troops which had been called up from the commanderies were able to return to their homes and only some two thousand reprieved convicts were kept under arms. Distributing land to the poor, he set up a number of military colonies, and he put the cities and local fortresses into good repair.

As Dou Xian embarked on his campaign of conquest against the Northern Xiongnu in 89, he sought Deng Xun's advice and assistance. Deng Xun, however, was an old ally of the clan of the former Empress Ma of Emperor Ming, which had been destroyed by the Dou, so he established no close connection to the rival group. When Emperor He and his eunuch allies overthrew Dou Xian in 92 Deng Xun was unaffected.

Though he was tolerant and generous in his dealings with others, Deng Xun was strict with his own family. When his sons came to call upon him, he looked upon them sternly and insisted that they stand in respect before him. We are also told that he treated the sons of his friends like his own, punishing them when they misbehaved.

Deng Xun became ill and died in the winter at the end of 92. Not only his own officers, but also the non-Chinese people of the frontier, had admired and loved him, and thousands came day and night to pay their respects. The non-Chinese showed the same expressions of grief as at the death of a parent, riding their horses with wails and cries, while some cut themselves or slaughtered their dogs, horses, cattle and sheep, taking Deng Xun's death as one of their own. Men who had served when he was Protector of the Wuhuan also sought leave to attend the mourning, so many that some garrison posts would be left unmanned. The problem was reported to the current Protector Xu Yan, who gave his permission in admiration at such a display of respect for a man of honour. And every household put up a shrine to Deng Xun and prayed for his aid whenever there was illness.

A few years later Deng Xun's daughter the Lady Deng Sui entered the harem of Emperor He. She became an Honoured Lady, then Empress, and later regent Dowager. In 105 Emperor He sent officials to pay respects at Deng Xun's tomb and granted him posthumous honours as a marquis. -HHS 16/6:607-12*, 87/77:2883, DGHJ 8:2a-b; Ch'ü 72:300, deC 84: 86-94.

Deng Yan 鄧衍/演; Nanyang. A member of the clan of the imperial relatives by marriage, early in the reign of Emperor Ming he attracted the attention and favour of the ruler. The Administrator Yu Yan was not impressed, and would not grant him any appointment nor show any respect. The emperor then ordered that Deng Yan be appointed Officer of Merit, called him up as a gentleman cadet, and made him major at one of the palace gates.

Later, when Deng Yan's father died he failed to carry out proper mourning. Emperor Ming now turned against him, and he appreciated Yu Yan's earlier understanding of his true character. -HHS 33/23:1153.

Deng Yan 鄧燕, the Lady; Nanyang. Eldest daughter of Deng Xun 訓, the Lady was a sister of Deng Sui, future Empress Deng of Emperor He. She died young, leaving an infant daughter named E, who was cared for by Deng Sui. -XHS 1:13a.

Deng Yan 鄧演; Nanyang. Son of Deng Xiang and elder brother of the Lady Deng Mengnü, when his sister was appointed Honoured Lady about 155 Deng Yan was enfeoffed as a county marquis in Runan with designation as Specially Advanced and precedence next only to the highest ministers of state. He died a few years later. -HHS 10B:444.

Deng Yan 鄧閭 miswritten for Deng Chang 鄧昌.

Deng Ye 鄧暉; Hongnong. Known for his fierce nature and strict sense of honour, in the autumn of 23 Deng Ye joined his fellow-countryman Yu Kuang in a rising against Wang Mang on behalf of Han. Their county magistrate was a loyalist, so they gathered troops across the border in western Nanyang, then returned to Hongnong, persuaded the magistrate to change sides, and stormed two cities. Taking title as generals who Support Han 輔漢 [or generals of the Restored Han 復 漢], Deng Ye and Yu Kuang took the Wu Pass, south-eastern gateway to the capital region, and despatched messages inviting the Gengshi Emperor to send an army to join them. In the mean time they continued their advance, killed Wang Mang's Administrator of Hongnong, then turned north to the Yellow River by its junction with the Wei.

Wang Mang now sent his last field army, commanded by Guo Qin and eight other generals, each with the word "Tiger" 虎 in his title. They guarded the mouth of the Wei River at Huayin, but as Deng Ye faced them Yu Kuang made a flank march to the south and took the enemy by surprise from the rear. Four of the generals fled, two committed suicide, and the remaining three gathered some of their scattered forces to defend the nearby Capital Granary. Shentu Qian and Li Song, generals of the Gengshi Emperor, had now caught up and may have taken part in the victory at Huayin. The combined force besieged the Capital Granary, but the defenders held out tenaciously. Impressed by their resistance, and reluctant to go further with such an enemy force astride their communications, the main army remained in Huayin, and sent only two advance detachments, one north of the Wei under the colonel Wang Xian, and the other, under the lieutenant-general Han Chen, directly towards Chang'an.

By this time the military failures of Wang Mang had inspired a number of local rebellions in the capital district, and Wang Xian placed himself at the head of a vast irregular force which entered Chang'an, ravaged the city, and killed Wang Mang. Filled with pride at his achievement, Wang Xian held sway there for three days, but when the main army arrived he was executed for lese-majesty.

Early in 24, as the Gengshi Emperor established his capital at Chang'an, Deng Ye was named Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital and a position equivalent to ministerial rank; he was not, however, granted a royal fief, for those were reserved to the original supporters of the rebellion.

In the autumn of 25, when the Gengshi Emperor heard that Wei Ao had joined Zhang Ang and other chieftains in plotting against him, he sent Deng Ye to arrest Wei Ao. Wei Ao called in his followers and barricaded himself in his house, then broke out by night and escaped from the city.

As the Red Eyebrows entered Chang'an and destroyed the Gengshi Emperor, Deng Ye and his old comrade Yu Kuang made their escape, and at the beginning of 26 they came to Luoyang and offered submission to Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu. Both men were confirmed in their rank as generals and were sent under the command of Feng Yi to bring control over the region about Chang'an.

In 27 Deng Ye and Yu Kuang were sent against the warlord Yan Cen, then based in Hongnong, and drove him back into Nanyang. Transferred also to that region, at the beginning of 28 they joined the forces of Deng Yu to defeat Yan Cen once more, forcing him to take refuge in Hanzhong. Neither Deng Ye nor Yu Kuang appear again in the records. -Dubs 55:456-466, HHS 13/3:521, 1A:27, 17/7:647, 16/6:604-05, XC 6:10a; Bn 54:127-132, Bn 59:56.

Deng Yi 鄧毅 (d.102); Nanyang. Son of the Lady Deng Zhu, in 102 he was accused of having assisted the Empress Yin in her sorceries. Arrested and tortured, Deng Yi and his brother Feng made confessions implicating one another and also the empress's brothers. The empress was deposed and Deng Yi and Deng Feng died in prison. -HHS 16/6:606.

Deng Yu 鄧禹 [Zhonghua 仲華] (2-58); Nanyang. Member of a leading clan of Xinye county in the southwest of Nanyang, when Deng Yu was still young he acquired an understanding of the classics and histories, notably the Poetry. He studied for several years at Chang'an, where he met Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu. Deng Yu, the younger man, recognised Liu Xiu's quality and became a close companion. As the Han rebellion against Wang Mang broke out in 22, and Liu Xuan was proclaimed as [the Gengshi] Emperor, Deng Yu initially made no move. In 23, however, when he heard Liu Xiu had been sent to the north he went to join him.

They met at Ye city, and Deng Yu was welcomed warmly, for he was the first of Liu Xiu's fellow-countrymen to join him of his own accord rather than as a former follower of his elder brother Liu Bosheng. Deng Yu was a man of limited military ability, and in an early campaign he and Zhu Fu were defeated by Wang Lang's commander Li Yu, but his chief role was that of a friend. Even in times of difficulty and despair he encouraged Liu Xiu with prospects for the future, and urged him to seek the imperial throne. He was also trusted to recommend good men for office: among his nominees were Wu Han, Jia Fu, Kou Xun and Yao Qi, and they formed the basis of a strong faction of men from Nanyang.

Leading cavalry in support of He Yan, Deng Yu defeated the Bronze Horse bandits in Qinghe, and at the end of 24 he was named General of the Van and sent to the west with twenty thousand men. The main force of the Red Eyebrows was moving along the Yellow River towards Chang'an, and the Gengshi Emperor had sent troops to face them in Hedong and Hongnong. The threat from Deng Yu was intended to distract the imperial forces, for Liu Xiu was prepared to let the Red Eyebrows destroy the Gengshi regime, expecting to bring them under control once he had gained full control in the northeast. As sign of his trust, Deng Yu held the Staff of Authority and was allowed to appoint his own subordinate officers, even those of general rank.

At the beginning of 25 Deng Yu's forces attacked the Qi Pass, leading west from Henei into Hedong. The pass was fiercely defended by the Gengshi Commandant of Hedong, but after ten days Deng Yu's men broke through. Having gained quantities of baggage, they laid siege to the capital Anyi, but were held there for several months without success. The Gengshi general Fan Can attempted to bring relief, but Deng Yu sent a detachment which defeated and killed him.

In summer another army under Wang Kuang and other chieftains came to attack. In the initial clash, Deng Yu's men had the worst of it and his officers urged him to withdraw. He rejected their advice and the battle was renewed two days later. Deng Yu's men held the palisade of their camp until the enemy were almost upon them, then struck together and gained a complete victory. As the enemy commanders fled, Deng Yu captured six staves of authority, five hundred official seals and quantities of supplies. He executed the Administrator Yang Bao and other officers of the Gengshi regime, named his staff officer Li Wen in Yang Bao's place and set up new magistrates in each county.

Soon afterwards Liu Xiu took the imperial title and sent messengers appointing Deng Yu, now twenty-four sui, as Excellency over the Masses. Deng Yu remained with his army, however, and his civil duties were carried out by his assistant Fu Zhan.

Deng Yu now crossed the Yellow River at its junction with the Fen and entered Zuopingyi, defeating Gongcheng Xi the local commander for the Gengshi Emperor. By this time the Red Eyebrows had entered Chang'an, the Gengshi regime had fallen, and the people of the region were ready to welcome Deng Yu as a source of stability. Though his officers urged a swift advance, and even Guangwu sent complaints of his tardiness, Deng Yu argued that it was hard to judge the strength of the bandits now they had access to the resources of the former capital. Circling Chang'an, he moved into Youfufeng, defeated a group of Red Eyebrows there, then spread his men north into Beidi, Shang and Xihe, taking over territory and gathering supplies for an offensive.

Deng Yu had left his generals Feng Yin and Zong Xin to face Chang'an, but the two men quarrelled. Feng Yin killed Zong Xin, then turned against Deng Yu and inflicted an embarrassing defeat. Feng Yin was soon afterwards defeated in Anding by the warlord Wei Ao and was brought as a prisoner by his officer Huang Fang, but Deng Yu had been obliged to recognise Wei Ao's effective independence as a nominal ally in the east of Liang province.

Early in 26 the Red Eyebrows abandoned Chang'an for an excursion to the south and then to the west, and Deng Yu entered the city without fighting. He held a banquet for his officers, sacrificed at the Temple of the founding Emperor Gao, cleaned the tomb-mounds and parks of the former rulers, and sent their ancestral tablets to Guangwu at Luoyang. He was enfeoffed as a marquis with revenues from four counties.

Militarily, however, Deng Yu was in trouble. A southern attack on the condottiere Yan Cen was defeated and, more importantly, the capital district had been plundered and exhausted. Deng Yu was obliged to withdraw into Zuopingyi to search for grain. The surrender of Liu Jia, former King of Hanzhong for the Gengshi regime, offered some satisfaction, but as Liu Jia's party arrived Deng Yu found his Chancellor Li Bao discourteous and had him executed. In revenge, Li Bao's brother brought followers to attack Deng Yu, and they killed the general Geng Xin.

These misfortunes and misjudgements weakened the prestige of the new Han regime in the west, already damaged by the trouble with Feng Yin. Many people drifted away, and the army was short of supplies. Even more seriously, as the Red Eyebrows returned from their failed incursion into Wei Ao's territory, Deng Yu attacked them at the Long Slope but was defeated. They went on to attack Yan Cen and Deng Yu attempted to gain a position in Chang'an behind them, but he was again defeated and driven out.

Guangwu now sought to recall Deng Yu, and sent instructions that he should in any case undertake no further offensives. As the region about Chang'an was short of food, it was only a matter of time before the Red Eyebrows were obliged to return east where the main imperial armies could deal with them. Deng Yu felt ashamed at his lack of success, however, and as the bandits departed east into Hongnong early in 27 he pursued and attacked them. He was again defeated and had to be rescued by Feng Yi, commander of the imperial army from the east. Feng Yi urged a pincer movement, to catch the enemy between them, but before this was ready Deng Yu's general Deng Hong attacked on his own. His hungry men were routed as they plundered the enemy supply train, and Deng Yu and Feng Yi were drawn into the fight. Pressing forward in foolhardy fashion, Deng Yu was heavily defeated, and he fled the debacle with just twenty-four men. Feng Yi regrouped his men and drove the Red Eyebrows to their final surrender before Guangwu, but Deng Yu played no further part in the campaign.

Deng Yu was now quite humiliated, and in the spring of 27, just before the Red Eyebrows' surrender, he resigned as Excellency and handed back his seal as a marquis. The fief, however, was restored and a few months later he was appointed General of the Right.

In the spring of 28 Deng Yu was given a substantial army, with the subordinate generals Deng Hua and Yu Kuang, and sent against Yan Cen, now operating in Nanyang. Yan Cen was defeated and fled to Gongsun Shu. This proved to be the last occasion Deng Yu was actively involved in a campaign, though he retained his title as a general.

In 37, after the destruction of Gongsun Shu brought the end of civil war, the leading officials received augmented fiefs: Deng Yu received five counties in Beihai, and his younger brother Kuan was also granted a title. Soon afterwards Deng Yu and his colleague Jia Fu the General of the Left sent in a joint memorial offering to resign their posts and disband their forces. Guangwu abolished both commands and used the occasion to begin a general disarmament.

Deng Yu was granted the status of Specially Advanced, permitting him to reside at the capital rather than on his fief, and though he held no formal office he continued to attend court. In 39 he was among those who supported the proposal to enfeoff the emperor's sons.

From his later thirties Deng Yu sought to lead a civilised private life from the revenues of his estates, treating his widowed sister-in-law with respect and educating his thirteen sons so that each became an expert in one of the classics. The emperor admired this, and when he carried out the Feng and Shan sacrifices in 56 he had Deng Yu act as Excellency over the Masses to accompany the cortège in place of the substantive officer, Feng Qin, who evidently remained at Luoyang.

In 57 Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming named Deng Yu as his Grand Tutor. He held no executive power, but took precedence over all other officials and had the right to sit beside the throne facing east, while the rest of the court faced north towards the ruler. In the following year Deng Yu took ill and died. The emperor attended his sick-bed on several occasions and two of Deng Yu's sons were made gentlemen cadets. -HHS 16/6:599-607*, XC 1:3a.

HHS 16/6:605 says that Deng Yu had thirteen sons, but names only six. Zhen 震, Xi and Zhen 珍 were evidently the eldest, while three others, Xun, Gai and Hong, are recorded. HHS 16/6:605 refers to Hong as the youngest son 少子, while 16/6:607 says that Xun was the sixth, and HHS 10A:419 records a memorial from Deng Gai referring to Xun as his elder brother. It would appear, therefore, that two boys were born between Zhen 珍 and Xun, and that Gai was one of six brothers born between Xun and Hong.

Deng Yuan 鄧元, the Lady. Mother of Deng Die, the Lady had regular access to the private apartments of the imperial palace, and in 88 she arranged for the introduction of the libertine marquis Liu Chang to the regent Dowager Dou.

When Emperor He and his eunuch allies overthrew the power of the Dou family in 92, the Lady and her sons Deng Die and Deng Lei were arrested and died in prison. If the implied accusations, no doubt levied by the emperor and his allies after the coup, can be believed, the Lady had served as a go-between for the Dowager, arranging liaisons not only with Liu Chang but also with the Palace Attendant Guo Ju. -HHS 23/13:813-19, 101/11:3234.

Deng Yuan 鄧淵. In 195 Deng Yuan was Minister of the Household. He was one of the senior officials taken hostage by Guo Si during his quarrel with Li Jue at Chang'an, and later that year he was killed in the fighting as the emperor escaped from Chang'an. -HHS 9:338, 103/13:3275, HHJ 28:334, 340; deC 96:150, 164.

HHJ 28:334 has the surname of this man as Liu 劉, and this is followed by ZZTJ 61:1960, but later entries in HHJ 28:340 and ZZTJ 61:1967 have Deng, and this agrees with HHS 9 and 103/13. HHS 9 has the given name as Quan 泉, but this was a variation to avoid taboo on the personal name of the founding emperor of Tang.

Deng Yuanyi 鄧元義; Runan. While his father Bokao was Deputy Director of the Imperial Secretariat in the 150s, Deng Yuanyi returned home to Runan. He left his wife the Lady Li at the capital to care for his mother. The elder woman, however, hated her daughter-in-law and mistreated her. The Lady Li never complained, but Deng Bokao eventually found out through his grandson Deng Lang. Ashamed of the scandal, he sent the Lady Li back to her own family.

Having made a second marriage to Ying Shun, the Lady later returned with him to the capital. When Deng Yuanyi saw her, he explained that she was in no way at fault and he always spoke of her with respect. -HHS 48/38:1607.

Deng Yuanyi 鄧元義, wife of: see the Lady Li 李 of Runan and also above.

Deng Zhen 鄧震; Nanyang. Eldest son of Deng Yu, at the death of his father in 58 he shared his fief with his brothers Deng Xi and Deng Zhen 珍 and received title as a marquis in Beihai. -HHS 16/6:605.

Deng Zhen 鄧珍; Nanyang. Third son of Deng Yu, at the death of his father in 58 he shared his fief with his brothers Deng Zhen 震 and Deng Xi and received title as a marquis in Beihai. -HHS 16/6:605.

Deng Zhen 鄧珍 see Deng Bao 鄧寶. HHS 16/6:615 says that a son of Deng Jing had the personal name Zhen. The modern scholar Shen Qinhan, however, notes that this man was a great-nephew of Deng Zhen 珍 above, and should not have had the same personal name. HHJ 16:193 has the personal name as Bao, and this appears more likely. -HHSJJ 16/6:629.

Deng Zhi 鄧鸞/陟 [Zhaobo 昭伯] (d.121); Nanyang. Deng Zhi was the eldest son of Deng Xun and elder brother of the Lady Deng Sui, future Empress and Dowager of Emperor He. As a young man he held appointment in the office of the General-in-Chief Dou Xian, and when his sister became an Honoured Lady in 96, he and his brothers were made gentleman cadets. They received further appointments when the Lady Deng became empress in 102, and Deng Zhi was made General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger.

In 106, when Emperor He died and the Empress Deng, now Dowager, took control of the regency for Liu Long the Young Emperor, Deng Zhi was named General of Chariots and Cavalry, with ceremonial ranking equal to the Excellencies: this was the first time a General of Chariots and Cavalry had held such status. Liu Long died a few months later, and Deng Zhi and his brothers then advised the Dowager on the selection of Liu You, Emperor An.

Deng Zhi and his brothers had apartments in the imperial palace so that they might support their sister, but Deng Zhi was concerned not to appear presumptuous, and he asked that they be allowed to withdraw to their own residences. The Dowager eventually agreed. In the following year, 107, the brothers were granted county marquises, each with revenues from ten thousand households, while because of his leading role in choosing the new emperor Deng Zhi was to receive an additional three thousand households. He and his brothers made great show of reluctance: they petitioned the Dowager against such excessive rewards, and their refusals were eventually accepted. On the other hand, they were granted title as Servant at Court, normally held by the most senior marquises, with authority to take part in court council next only to the Excellencies.

In the summer of that year the great rebellion of the Qiang broke out and spread rapidly across Liang province. In the winter Deng Zhi was sent with an imperial army to deal with it. Besides men from the regiments of the Northern Army and guards of the Feathered Forest the greater part of his command was drawn from the inner regions of the empire: Taiyuan and Shangdang north of Luoyang, Runan and Yingchuan to the southeast, Nanyang to the south, and the capital province of Sili. This was a major weakness, for the men of these territories were not trained for war: the policy of Later Han had restricted serious military exercises to the frontier, and preferred to have untrained men within the empire as being less likely to present a source of competent rebels. As Ying Shao observed later in the century, "to send men into battle without having trained them is nothing more than throwing them away." Even the Northern Army, though described as the elite force of the empire, and maintained as the central strategic reserve, was below the expected standard. We are told that after the great successes achieved by Dou Xian against the Northern Xiongnu more than ten years before, optimistic and idealistic Confucianism at court had allowed a general relaxation of military preparedness, and had discontinued the annual ceremonies of hunting and military review. Deng Zhi's troops had therefore serious problems of competence and morale.

It was intended that the imperial army should hold Hanyang commandery on the lower Wei, then move against the enemy. In the spring of 108, however, the Qiang attacked their advance posts and drove them back. No further activity took place until the winter, when Deng Zhi's officer Ren Shang, sent to attack the Qiang leader Dianlian, was heavily defeated and lost eight thousand men. As the imperial armies were forced onto the defensive Deng Zhi was recalled to the capital, presumably to save further embarrassment, and Ren Shang was left to hold the line in the Wei valley as well as he could.

Deng Zhi was received at the capital with great honour and was named General-in-Chief in the winter of 108, but he took no further part in military operations. He and his sister the Dowager sought to recruit competent officials and re-establish a government capable of dealing with the massive problems of rebellion, natural disasters and internal disorder which faced them. There was a proposal at court, initiated by Pang Can, that Liang province be abandoned altogether. Deng Zhi, with its problems fresh in his mind, supported the idea, but the plan was opposed by the energetic junior official Yu Xu, and a full retreat was not approved; on the other hand, withdrawal of commandery capitals from the north and west over the following years produced a very similar effect.

At the end of 110 Deng Zhi and his brothers formally withdrew from government on account of the illness and death of their mother the Lady Yin. Deng

Zhi soon returned to court, and though he no longer held title as General-in-Chief and still had no fief he was ranked just below the Excellencies and above all marquises.

[Bielenstein interprets Deng Zhi's position as General-in-Chief, which he held from the winter of 108/109 to the end of 110, as indication of authority as regent [Bn 80:152 and 86A:283-284]. My interpretation is that the real power of regency was held by the Dowager, through her authority to "take part in the affairs of court" 臨朝, and Deng Zhi's position as her senior kinsman was not notably changed by his title as General-in-Chief. Unlike senior relatives by marriage in later reigns, Liang Ji, Dou Wu and He Jin, Deng Zhi never held "control of the affairs of the Imperial Secretariat" with formal command of the government.

Despite their high position, greater than the Dou had held in the previous reign, Deng Zhi is said to have sought to restrain his family, and when his son Deng Feng was found to have been in contact with the general Ren Shang, who was then executed for embezzlement, he had Deng Feng and his own wife the Lady Kou, mother of the young man, shave their heads as sign of guilt and remorse.

In 121 the Dowager died and Emperor An was able to exercise power for himself. Initially, he awarded Deng Zhi the county marquise that he had refused many years before, together with the rank of Specially Advanced, allowing him to reside at the capital. Within a few weeks, however, various of the emperor's favourites, including his former wet-nurse Wang Shang and the eunuchs Li Run and Jiang Jing, brought forward allegations that Deng Zhi's brothers Hui, Hong and Chang, and their kinsman Deng Fang, had proposed that the Dowager should depose the emperor for incompetence and replace him with Liu Yi the King of Pingyuan. The story was primarily based upon evidence from Zhao Ren, a discontented woman of the harem, but Emperor An accepted it, and despite his earlier show of courtesy he may well have been waiting for a reason to rid himself of a powerful family. He had senior ministers present indictments of Great Refractoriness and Impiety against the alleged conspirators, stripped Deng Zhi's kinsmen of their fiefs and confiscated their property.

It was not suggested that Deng Zhi himself had been involved, so he was permitted to keep his noble rank, but he lost the position of Specially Advanced and was forced to quit the capital for his estates. Then his fief was transferred from Runan to Changsha, south of the Yangzi, and at this sentence of exile Deng Zhi and his son Feng starved themselves to death. Through the efforts of the minister Zhu Chong the emperor was persuaded to regret his persecution: Deng Zhi was buried at Luoyang with proper ceremonial and sacrifices, and surviving members of his clan were permitted to return to the capital. -HHS 16/6:612-18*, 87/77:2886; deC 84:92-102.

Deng Zhi 鄧鸞/陟, wife of: see the Lady Kou 寇 I.

Deng Zhi 鄧芝 [Bomiaoyang 伯苗] (d.250); Nanyang. A distant kinsman to the Deng clan of imperial relatives by marriage, as the Han government fell into ruin Deng Zhi travelled to Yi province and became a client of Pang Xi, Administrator in Ba.

When Liu Bei took over the province in 214 Deng Zhi held only minor office, but he impressed Liu Bei, who made him a county magistrate and then Administrator of Guanghan. His administration proved excellent and he was later appointed to the central Secretariat.

After the death of Liu Bei in 223 the regent Chancellor Zhuge Liang sent Deng Zhi as envoy to Wu. Sun Quan admired him greatly, and they negotiated peace and alliance. Deng Zhi later became a general and served at that rank for more than twenty years. Widely respected, he left no surplus in his household when he died. -SGZ Shu 15:1071-73*.

Deng Zhong 鄧終/眾 (d.27); Nanyang. Younger brother of Deng Feng, early in 27 he was defeated and killed by Emperor Guangwu's general Zhai Zun. -HHS 20/10:739.

Deng Zhong 鄧忠 (d.121); Nanyang. Son of Deng Chang and the Lady Geng, he succeeded to his father's fief in 118. After the death of the Dowager Deng in 121 it was alleged that Deng Chang and other members of the family had supported a proposal to depose the emperor. Emperor An took the opportunity to rid himself of such a powerful family. He had senior ministers present posthumous indictments of treason against the alleged conspirators, then stripped Deng Zhong and other kinsmen of their fiefs, reducing them to the rank of commoner, and sent them away to their home country. Harassed and oppressed by local officials, Deng Zhong killed himself. -HHS 16/6:616-18.

Deng [Zhongkuang] 鄧仲况. In 27 Deng Zhongkuang was a junior commander under the condottiere Yan Cen in Nanyang, and his troops ravaged the surrounding country. His staff officer Liu Gong was a kinsman of the celebrated scholar Liu Xin, and Liu Xin's former colleague Su Jing wrote to criticise their conduct. Deng Zhongkuang then submitted to Emperor Guangwu of Han. -HHS 30/20A:1041-46.

Deng Zhu 鄧朱, the Lady; Nanyang. Maternal grandmother of the Empress Yin of Emperor He, she visited her regularly in the imperial harem, but in 102 she was accused of assisting the empress with witchcraft. Arrested and questioned in the harem prison, she implicated her sons Deng Feng and Deng Yi and the Empress's brothers. The empress was deposed, she and other members of the family died, and the Lady Deng was exiled to the far south.

In 110 the Empress Yin's successor, the regent Dowager Deng, issued an amnesty, and the accused were permitted to return to their home countries. -HHS 16/6:606.

Deng [Zijing] 鄧子敬; Nanyang. Three years younger than his fellow-countryman Zhang Boda, although they were not related Deng Zijing treated him with all the honour of an elder brother, sleeping on a couch below his bed and doing obeisance each morning.

Having accompanied Zhang Boda in his migration to Henan, where they taught in a private academy, Deng Zijing was later invited to join the offices of the Excellency over the Masses, and an official carriage was sent for him. -FSTY 3:24: Ying Shao categorises his behaviour as Inappropriate 愆禮.

Deng Ziran 鄧子然 see Zhen Ziran 甄子然.

Deng Zixiao 鄧子孝. In 196 Deng Zixiao fled with Xu Jing from Kuaiji to Jiao province in the far south. In 208 he met Wang Lang in Jing province and gave him news of Xu Jing in Yi province. -SGZ Shu 8:964, 968.

Deng Zun 鄧遵 (d.121); Nanyang. A cousin of the Dowager Deng, Deng Zun became Protector of the Wuhuan, and in 114 he was appointed full General on the Liao, responsible for military affairs on the northern frontier. Though Liang Qin had held the full title for a short time, this was the first occasion the office had been awarded without the qualifying prefix "acting" 行 and the distinction was granted on account of Deng Zun's relationship to the throne and to the regent Dowager.

In 116 Deng Zun led ten thousand horsemen of the Southern Xiongnu, commanded by the Shanyu Tan and one of his kings, to raid the Qiang leader Lianchang at Lingzhou by the Yellow River in Beidi. They killed over eight hundred of the enemy.

In 118 Deng Zun sent the Qiang renegade Diaohu to assassinate the fugitive Qiang leader Langmo, the last significant leader of the rebellion. Diaohu was granted a noble title, while Deng Zun received gifts and honours and was enfeoffed as a marquis with revenue from three thousand households. It was generally believed, however, that he received these rewards for his connection to the Dowager rather than for his own good work. In contrast, his fellow-commander Ren Shang, whose achievements were at least comparable, was granted no such honours but was instead accused of exaggerating his successes and was then executed for embezzlement.

In 118 and 119 the Xianbi attacked the frontier of Dai commandery. The frontier defences were strengthened, and on the second occasion Deng Zun led three thousand bowman scouts with a mixed force of Xiongnu cavalry and local levies to defeat the raiders in the field and pursue them across the border. Soon afterwards the Xiongnu leader Fenghou surrendered, and in the winter at the end of 120 the Xianbi chieftains Wulun and Qizhijian of Liaoxi came to submit.

As Emperor An took power after the death of the Dowager Deng in 121, the former wet-nurse Wang Sheng and her eunuch associate Li Run claimed that members of the family had planned to dismiss the emperor and set a new ruler in his place. The Deng were dismissed from all their offices, and Deng Zun and others committed suicide. [It was claimed, perhaps correctly, that the later incursions against the Chinese frontier by the Xianbi war-leader Qizhijian followed from the death of his patron Deng Zun.]

In the early 160s Deng Zun's son Wanshi was a favourite of Emperor Huan, who planned to grant posthumous re-enfeoffment to Deng Zun and thus to ennoble Deng Wanshi. The minister Chen Fan and others objected that the emperor was too generous and that Deng Zun's military achievements had been exaggerated, but Deng Wanshi did receive a district fief. -HHS 5:225-33, 16/6:617, 87/77:2890-91, 89/79:2958, 90/80:2987; deC 84:109-111, 288-289, 298-299.

Di Du 邸杜 was Administrator of Shang commandery. -FSTY 5f:128.

Di Fu 翟輔 and/or Di Pu 翟輔 see Zhai Fu 翟輔.

Dian 滇 [part of a Qiang name] appears also as 顛: DGHJ 22:2a.

Dian Man 典滿; Chenliu. Son of Dian Wei, when his father died fighting in 197 Cao Cao gave Dian Man a position at court. Later he again recalled Dian Wei's service, and made Dian Man a major and a member of his body-guard.

When Cao Pi came to the throne in 220 he appointed Dian Man as a Commandant and enfeoffed him as a secondary marquis. -SGZ 18:545.

Dian Wei 典韋 (d.197); Chenliu. A large man of great strength, Dian Wei saw himself as a knight errant, and when the local Liu clan had a vendetta with a certain Li Yong of a neighbouring county, he chose to act as their champion.

Li Yong was a former magistrate and had an attentive group of guards. Dian Wei, however, rode up to the gates of Li Yong's residence in a cart laden with chickens and wine under the guise of a tradesman. When the gates were opened for him he went in with a dagger hidden in his clothing and killed both Li Yong and his wife.

Dian Wei then made his escape on foot. He was chased by several hundred men, for Li Yong's house was near a market, but none of his pursuers dared get too close, and after four or five li he met some companions and they fought their way free. From this exploit Dian Wei became celebrated among the local bullies and bravos.

In 190, as Zhang Miao was raising troops for the rebellion against Dong Zhuo, Dian Wei went to join him. He impressed his commanding officer Zhao Chong by setting up the great headquarters banner with just one hand, when no-one else had been able to manage it even with two hands.

Dian Wei later transferred to the unit led by Xiahou Dun and served with him in the defence of Yan province for Cao Cao in 194. He killed great numbers of the enemy and was appointed a major. In a hard-fought engagement with Lü Bu outside the city of Puyang, Dian Wei led a group of volunteers to break the enemy line and establish a forlorn hope within their ranks. Totally surrounded, Dian Wei ordered his men to hold their position until the enemy were within five paces, then launched a counter-attack to drive them back. Cao Cao thus gained a breathing space to effect his own withdrawal.

Dian Wei was appointed Commandant of a troop of guards, and with several hundred picked men he watched Cao Cao's tent day and night. He took the lead in every engagement and was promoted to be a colonel. He was admired by Cao Cao for his vast appetite for food and his capacity for drinking great quantities of wine, and he was celebrated in the army for his favoured weapon, a double-axe halberd weighing twenty kilos.

In 197 Cao Cao attacked Nanyang in Jing province. Liu Biao's local commander Zhang Xiu surrendered, but then Cao Cao took the widow of Zhang Xiu's former master Zhang Ji as a concubine, and he planned to kill Zhang Xiu. Learning of this, Zhang Xiu made a sudden attack. Taken by surprise, Cao Cao was wounded and compelled to flee, and Dian Wei, fighting in the rear-guard, was overwhelmed and slain.

When Cao Cao learned of Dian Wei's death he wept for him, had his body returned to his home country and offered sacrifice at his tomb each time he passed that way. He appointed his son Dian Man to be a major on his staff. -SGZ 18:543-45*; deC 96:139-140, 212.

Dian'an 滇岸; Qiang. Son of Dianliang and younger brother of Dianyu, Dian'an was an associate leader in the great attack by the Shaodang Qiang in 57, but was forced to surrender in 58. Wrongly advised by his officers, Dou Lin the Protector of the Qiang took Dian'an to be the senior chieftain, and granted him titles as Marquis Who Returns to Allegiance 歸義侯 and Grand Chief Commandant for Han 漢大都尉. In the following year, when Dianyu the real leader of the rebels also came to surrender, Dou Lin presented him too as the paramount chief. When Emperor Ming enquired about this, Dou Lin claimed the two men were the same, and their names had been confused in the local speech. The emperor investigated further, discovered the truth, and dismissed Dou Lin from his post. -HHS 87/77:2880.

Dianlian 滇零 (d.112); Qiang. Leader of a small sub-group of the Xianlian tribe, as disturbance erupted in the northwest in the late summer of 107, Dianlian joined men of the Zhong tribe in an attack on Chinese positions. It is said that the Qiang had been at peace for so long they had no weapons or armour, but they took up bamboo staves and carried boards as shields, terrifying the local authorities and cutting the military communications of the Long Road which led into central Asia.

In the following year the Han court sent Deng Zhi with a large army against the rebels, but the Zhong tribe inflicted an initial defeat, and in the winter Dianlian drove back an attack by Ren Shang in Hanyang with heavy losses. Following that success Dianlian proclaimed himself emperor; and from his base in Beidi commandery he gathered allies from Wudu, Shang and Xihe commanderies. His forces dominated Liang province and the Chinese position became largely untenable. In the east the Qiang ravaged Zhao and Wei on the edge of the North China plain, while in the south they invaded the Han valley and killed the Administrator of Hanzhong. In 109 the Qiang continued their successes and consolidated their hold on the upper Wei valley and in Longxi. In 110 Dianlian again sent troops against the passes of the Qin Ling ranges leading into Hanzhong, where they defeated and killed the Administrator Zheng Qin. At the same time the Han court ordered that the administration of Jincheng should be transferred into Longxi, effectively abandoning the commandery.

Ren Shang's attacks in the Wei valley had been continually defeated, and in 111 he was dismissed for his lack of success. Governments-in-exile were now established also for Anding, Beidi and Shang, and the administration of Longxi was transferred to a more secure county. The commanderies were largely abandoned to the rebels, and orders were given to drive Chinese settlers from their lands, while Qiang raiding extended into Hedong and Henei, and refugees crossed the Yellow River to seek safety in the capital. Six hundred forts were set up in Wei, Zhao, Changshan and Zhongshan to defend the North China plain, and a contingent of the Northern Army was sent to defend the Meng Crossing of the Yellow River north of Luoyang; this camp, however, was disbanded soon afterwards when Ren Shang, restored to a command, defeated a raiding party of the Qiang in Shangdang.

The rebels were now joined by Chinese renegades, and though their leader Du Qi was swiftly assassinated and his followers were defeated, Du Qi's brother Du Jigong came to join Dianlian.

In 112, however, Dianlian died. He was succeeded by his young son Lianchang, but the centre of the rebellion was considerably weakened. -HHS 87/77:2886-88; deC 84:94-106. [On the pronunciation of the character 零 (normally ling), see deC 84:471 note 14.]

Dianliang 滇良; Qiang. Shaodang 燒當, chieftain of the Yan 研 tribe during Former Han about 40 BC, gained such a reputation as a war-leader that the name of the tribe was changed in his honour. The power of the Shaodang later declined, and they suffered at the hands of their neighbours the Xianlian and the Bi'nan, but by the time of Shaodang's great-great-grandson Dianliang the Xianlian in particular had been seriously weakened by the campaigns of Ma Yuan and the migration into China that he imposed.

About 40 Dianliang led his people to attack the remnant Xianlian and the Bi'nan. He took over their territory and established a new position in the Yu valleys, on the southern bank of the upper Yellow River by present-day Guide in Gansu. Over the next several years Dianliang established his local authority and a pattern of occasional alliances among the other tribes of the frontier. In his own time, Dianliang was not a direct source of major trouble for China, but his son Dianyu became a noted foe of Han. -HHS 87/77:2878-79; deC 84:78-79.

Dianling 滇零 see Dianlian 滇零.

Dianyu 滇吾 [or Dianwu] I; Qiang. Son of Dianliang, during the 50s Dianyu led minor raids against Chinese frontier positions and gained recognition as a war-leader and counsellor among the Shaodang and other tribes. In the autumn of 57 he led five thousand men in a substantial attack along the Yellow River, defeating the commandery forces of Longxi and Jincheng and inspiring a series of local rebellions which also gained success. In 58 an army of forty thousand men was sent from Luoyang under the command of Ma Wu and Dou Gu, the incursions were put down, and in the following year Dianyu surrendered to the Protector Dou Lin. -HHS 87/77:2879-81.

Dianyu 滇吾 [or Dianwu] II; Qiang. A chieftain of the Goujiu group of the Qiang, in 184 he commanded the force which defeated local troops of Hanyang led by He Xun. Dianyu knew He Xun to be a worthy man, and when his men surrounded him he ordered them to hold back and offered his own horse to He Xun so that he might escape. He Xun swore at him and rejected his aid, so Dianyu took him prisoner, but released him soon afterwards. -HHS 58/48:1880-81; deC 89:187-188.

Diao 鈔 [surname] see Yao 鈔 passim.

Diao Wei 刁韃 [Zirong 子榮]; Pengcheng. About 163 Diao Wei was an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate when powerful families objected to the policy of Chen Fan and Huang Wan, who insisted that only men of good quality in the corps of Gentlemen should receive ministerial recommendation as Abundant Talent. Diao Wei and his superior Wang Chang approved the change and took no action, but then the matter was pressed: Wang Chang was demoted and Diao Wei proscribed from office.

Diao Wei, however, was praised for his stand, and he was later returned to an appointment in the Imperial Secretariat. In 169 he joined the Director Liu Meng and the minister Zhang Huan in urging that Wang Chang and Li Ying, known enemies of the eunuchs who controlled the court of Emperor Ling, should take part in the selection of Excellencies. Cao Jie and the other eunuchs had an edict sent down to reprimand them, and the petitioners presented themselves in bonds at the imperial prison. They were released on payment of a fine equal to three months salary.

Diao Wei later served as Administrator of Donghai and Chancellor of Lu. He was known for clear thinking, firm adherence to the law, and strict discipline in his household. -HHS 61/51:2040-41, 65/55:2141.

Diao Yao 刁曜 [Ziqing 子卿]; Pengcheng. Having served as an Imperial Clerk, Diao Yao was appointed to Yuyang, where he found that his predecessor had planted vegetables; he harvested them and sent them on.

Diao Yao was also an influential Chancellor of Lu. -XC 7:3b-4a.

Diao Zidu 刁子都 see Li Zidu 力子都. -Bn 59:41.

Diaohe 雕何; Qiang. Sent by the Chinese general Deng Zun in 118 to assassinate the rebel Qiang leader Langmo, he was rewarded for his success with the title Marquis of the Qiang 羌侯. -HHS 87/77:2891.

Digen 氏根 or 甌根 i.e. Yu Digen. -SGZ 8:261.

Ding 丁, the Lady I. Wife of Cao Cheng, she was the daughter-in-law of the Lady Ban Zhao. After the death of the Lady Ban about 120 the Lady Ding collected her literary works in sixteen pian and published them with an introductory Eulogy 讚. -HHS 84/74:2792; Swann 32:44-45.

Ding 丁, the Lady II; Pei? Wife of Cao Song, she was the mother of Cao Cao. In 220 her grandson Cao Pi had her honoured by Emperor Xian of Han. -SGZ 2:59.

Ding 丁, the Lady III; Pei? Wife 嫡 of Cao Cao, she had no children of her own but cared for his eldest son Cao Ang, born to the Lady Liu X. When Cao Ang was killed in 198, she mourned him bitterly and Cao Cao, angry at this, sent her away. He later sought a reconciliation, but she rejected him and so he replaced her with the Lady Bian.

The Lady Ding had not treated the Lady Bian well, but when the Lady Bian came to favour she always showed her respect. The Lady Ding died about 220. -SGZ 5:156-57; C/C 99.90-92.

Ding Chen 丁綝 [Youchun 幼春]; Yingchuan. In 23 Ding Chen was a county commandant in Yingchuan in the service of Wang Mang. Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came to attack and Ding Chen persuaded his colleagues to surrender. He was well rewarded and was named a lieutenant-general in the Han forces.

In 25 Ding Chen took part in the crossing of the Yellow River from the north into Henan, then raised troops to garrison Chenliu and Yingchuan. As Liu Xiu took the imperial title he appointed Ding Chen his Administrator of Henan and awarded him a marquisate. Unlike other commanders, who sought county fiefs, Ding Chen asked only for the territory of his native district: he was granted it, together with the revenue from five thousand households; the territory of his fief was later changed to a county in Danyang. -HHS 37/27:1262.

Ding Cheng 丁盛 see Ding Sheng 丁盛.

Ding Chong 丁冲. A Gentleman at the Yellow Gates at Chang'an in 195, Ding Chong joined Yang Qi, Zhong Yao and others in a plot with Liu Jue's officer Yang Feng to kill Li Jue. They were unsuccessful, but Yang Feng then set himself up independently and Li Jue was weakened.

Ding Chong then became a Palace Attendant and travelled with the emperor to the east. An old friend of Cao Cao, he helped arrange the transfer to Xu city in 196. He was enfeoffed for good service in the escape from Chang'an and was named Director of Retainers, but died soon afterwards in a drinking bout. -HHJ 28:336-37, HHS 72/62:2342, SGZ 19:561-62.

Ding Fan 丁蕃 (d.203); Kuaiji. A fellow-countryman of He Qi, in 203 Ding Fan was a county magistrate under his command in southern Kuaiji. Ordered to remain behind to guard the lines of communication, Ding Fan was reluctant to accept such a humble post. He Qi cut off his head. -SGZ Wu 15:1378.

Ding Fang 丁魴 [Shuhe 叔河]. After successful service as Commandant of the Dependent State of Shu commandery, Ding Fang was transferred to the Dependent State of Guanghan. In 151, after he had left that office, sixty local gentlemen honoured him with a stele. -LS 17:5b-6b.

Ding Feng 丁奉 [Chengyuan 承淵] (d.271); Lujiang. As a young man, Ding Feng served in junior commands under Gan Ning, Lu Xun and Pan Zhang, generals of Wu. He was steadily promoted thereafter, and from 252 he held high military rank. -SGZ Wu 10:1300-02*.

Ding Fu 丁浮; Yingchuan. Son of Ding Zhan, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 37/27:1268.

Ding Gong 丁恭 [Ziran 子然]; Shanyang. Expert in the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu according to the Zhuang/Yan interpretation, Ding Gong established a private academy with emphasis on morality. He refused appointments in the commandery and the province, but soon after Emperor Guangwu claimed the throne he became a Counsellor Remonstrant, then an Academician at the University, and was enfeoffed as a secondary marquis.

In 26 it was proposed that the fiefs of full marquisates awarded to leading followers of Guangwu could be as large as four counties, depending upon merit. Ding Gong argued in court that they should not exceed the classical level of 100 li, but the emperor claimed that the failure of previous regimes was a result of their rulers' lack of virtue, and expressed [perhaps naive] confidence in his meritorious supporters.

In 36 Ding Gong became Minister Steward. Scholars from every part of the empire came to him, and he was recognised as the leading Confucianist of his time, with Lou Wang, Cheng Gong and Fan Shu among his students.

In 44 Ding Gong was appointed Libationer of the Palace Attendants and Commandant of Cavalry. He and Liu Kun were close attendants of Emperor Guangwu, and were regularly consulted on affairs of state. Ding Gong died in office. -HHS 79/69B:2578*; Bn 54:189, Bn 67:44, 79.

Ding Gong 丁宫 [Yuanxiong 元雄]; Pei. Inspector of Jiaozhi and Administrator of Cangwu in the 180s, Ding Gong later became Minister of the Household. He was promoted Excellency of Works in 187 and Excellency over the Masses in 188, but left office when He Jin held power in 189. Later that year, as a member of the Imperial Secretariat, he approved Dong Zhuo's deposition of Liu Bian and his replacement by his half-brother Liu Xie, Emperor Xian. -HHS 8:354-58, SGZ 6:175, SGZ Wu 4:1191. See also sub Ding Yansi.

Ding Han 丁邯 [Shuchun 叔春]; Jingzhao. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt about 30, Ding Han refused a position as a Gentleman in the Imperial Secretariat on the grounds that he had not yet served the traditional apprenticeship as a Foreman Clerk in that office. Emperor Guangwu, who was attempting to change the system, was furious and had him flogged, but Ding Han maintained his defiance.

After a successful term as a magistrate in Hedong, Ding Han became Administrator of Hanzhong. When his wife's brother took a military position under the pretender Gongsun Shu, Ding Han sent her to the commandery prison, then took off his hat and went bare-foot to report the situation. An edict acknowledged his loyalty, he remained in office and maintained good government. -HHS 116/26:3598-99; Bn 80:172-173.

Ding Hong 丁頔 (d.46). An officer at the court of Emperor Guangwu, in 46 Ding Hong was accused of inappropriate association with the gentleman Wang Pan and the Director of Retainers Su Ye. All three died in prison. -HHS 24/14:851.

Ding Hong 丁鴻 [Xiaogong 孝公 or Jigong 季公] (d.94); Yingchuan. Son of Ding Chen, at the age of thirteen Ding Hong became a pupil of Huan Rong, studying the Ouyang interpretation of the New Text Classic of History. After three years he understood the major commentaries and could explain most difficult passages. He travelled long distances as a simple scholar in search of further knowledge.

When his father died, Ding Hong asked permission to yield his fief to his younger brother Ding Sheng. He received no reply, but after the funeral he left a letter for his brother, abandoning everything in his favour, and travelled east to Donghai. There he met his friend Bao Jun, who had been a fellow-student under Huan Rong. Bao Jun persuaded him that he had been wrong to abandon his responsibilities, so Ding Hong returned and opened a private academy.

Bao Jun wrote to Emperor Ming, praising Ding Hong's scholarship and fine conduct, and in 67 the emperor invited Ding Hong to court. In a special interview, he discussed "The Charge to Prince Wen" 文侯之命 chapter of the Classic of History, and was rewarded with robes, ribbons and noble rank, and honours comparable to those of an Academician. He was named a Palace Attendant soon afterwards and in 70 he was appointed a colonel in the Northern Army.

In 79 Ding Hong was awarded a marquise in Lujiang, and in that year, when Emperor Zhang called an imperial conference on Confucianism in the White Tiger Hall, Ding Hong played a leading role in the Discussions. Admired by the ruler and by his colleagues, he received many rewards and marks of favour, taught pupils and edited books.

Ding Hong later became Minister Steward, and in this position he attracted thousands of students from the furthest parts of the empire; among them were Liu Kai, Ba Mao and Zhu Chang, all of whom rose to high rank. He accompanied the emperor on tour to the east in 85 and presented a most flattering memorial on his care for the nation and his attention to ritual.

At the accession of Emperor He in 88 Ding Hong was transferred to be Minister of Ceremonies, and he became Excellency over the Masses in 92. The court was at that time dominated by the Dowager Dou, her brother Dou Xian and other members of the family, and Ding Hong sent a sealed memorial urging the emperor to take action against them. The emperor had already planned to destroy the Dou, notably with the aid of the eunuch Zheng Zhong, but Ding Hong's proposal showed his good will. Ten days later he was made acting Grand Commandant and also Minister of the Guards, and he commanded the troops which took control of the palaces and seized Dou Xian's insignia as General-in-Chief. Dou Xian and his brothers killed themselves. [We must note, however, that although his biography credits Ding Hong with a high level of involvement in the coup, the Annals at HHS 4:173 and the biography of Dou Xian at HHS 23/13:819-20 make no mention of his role, and he received no reward: cf. HHS 78/68:2512, the biography of Zheng Zhong. On one occasion at least, moreover, he agreed with Dou Xian and his ally the Excellency Song You on a question of frontier policy: HHS 45/35:1520.]

Later in 92 the emperor noted there was an imbalance in Filial and Incorrupt nominations for the imperial civil service. All commandery units were entitled and required to present two such candidates each year, regardless whether they were populous and prosperous, or had limited numbers and were on the frontiers of the empire. In response to an edict Ding Hong and his colleague the Excellency of Works Liu Fang proposed that commandery units should recommend one Filial and Incorrupt candidate for every 200,000 inhabitants; those with population less than 200,000 should nominate one man every second year; and those with fewer than 100,000 one man every three years. This was approved.

Ding Hong died in office two years later and was granted special funerary honours. -HHS 37/27:1262-68*; Tjan 49:161, Bn 80:134.

Ding Kui 丁夔 see Ding Xia 丁夏. -XHS 3:12a.

Ding Lan 丁覽 [Xiaolian 孝連]; Kuaiji. Orphaned when he was young, Ding Lan held local office in his county. A generous and honourable man, he was recommended by Yu Fan and Sun Quan promoted him to be a magistrate. He died before he could rise higher, but his son Gu 固 became an Excellency in Wu. -SGZ Wu 12:1323.

Ding Lang 丁朗 see Sun Lang 孫朗.

Ding Lin 丁綝 see Ding Chen 丁綝.

Ding Mu 丁牧. As a clerical officer under Liu Cang when he was General of Agile Cavalry at Luoyang, Ding Mu admired his courteous treatment of his troops. When Liu Cang went out to his state as King of Dongping in 62, Ding Mu followed him, and he served Liu Cang, his son Zhong and his grandson Chang as an officer in the royal household.

When Emperor Zhang came on tour to Dongping in 86, Ding Mu and his colleague Zhou Xu were presented to him. In recognition of their good will and loyalty, both men were appointed Consultants, and Ding Mu later became Chancellor of Qi. -HHS 42/32:1442.

Ding Sheng 丁盛 or Ding Cheng [Zhonggong 仲公]; Yingchuan. Ding Sheng was a younger brother of Ding Hong, who cared for him while their father Ding Chen was on campaign with Emperor Guangwu during the 20s. When Ding Chen died Ding Hong abandoned the family property in favour of Ding Sheng. -HHS 37/27:1263.

Ding Sheng 丁盛 or Ding Cheng. A member of the Imperial Secretariat in 117, he was threatened with exposure by Zhang Jun, but conspired to bring about his downfall. -HHS 45/35:1524.

This may be the same person as the Ding Sheng/Cheng above, but the dating appears wrong. If the younger brother of Ding Hong of Yingchuan was a child in the 20s, or even the 30s, he would have been aged over eighty in 117, and it is hard to believe a man of that age would occupy a regular post in the Secretariat. There is similar confusion between two people named Ding Hong: cf. above.

Ding Su 丁肅; Jiyin. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow

Gates under Emperor Ling, he was respected for his honesty and loyalty and for the fact that, unlike Zhang Rang and others, he did not contend for power. He later became a Regular Attendant, and in the early 170s he was known as a close associate of the senior official Hu Guang. Hu Guang's biography, however, records that the connection attracted unfavourable comment and criticism. -HHS 78/68:2533, 44/34:1510.

Ding Xia 丁夏 or Ding Kui 夔; Yingchuan. Son of Ding Fu, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 37/27:1268.

Ding Xu 丁諶; Wu. Head of a section of five conscript soldiers, Ding Xu was developed and befriended by Gu Shao, son of Gu Yong and a noted judge of character. He later held administrative and military office at the court of Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 7:1229.

Ding [Yansi] 丁彥思. Following the assassination of Dong Zhuo in 192, the minister Wang Yun made some attempt to reassure his former officers Li Jue and others. They were concerned at the manner in which he had executed Cai Yong and Ding Yansi simply because Dong Zhuo had favoured them, and they accordingly turned against him and destroyed the new government.

On Cai Yong see sub voce. Ding Yansi does not appear elsewhere, but Hong Liangji suggests he may be the same person as Ding Gong [though Ding Gong is known to have had a different style]. -HHS 66/56:2177 & JJ at 2380, but cf. JJ at 2389 Liu Congchen.

Ding Yi 丁義. A pirate in the early years of Later Han, Ding Yi and his band were dissuaded from attacking Kuaiji by the arguments of the official Peng Xiu. -XC 5:12b.

Ding Yi 丁儀 [Zhengli 正禮] (d.220); Pei. Son of Ding Chong, because of his father's good service Cao Cao intended to marry Ding Yi to one his daughters. Cao Pi, however, dissuaded him, on the grounds that Ding Yi had only one eye. Cao Cao did appoint Ding Yi as a clerk, admired his ability, and later regretted having taken his son's advice. With Cao Cao's favour, Ding Yi accused Mao Jie and Xu Yi, securing their dismissal and demotion and establishing a personal influence at court.

In resentment against Cao Pi, Ding Yi became a close friend of his younger brother Cao Zhi, and supported his push for the succession. In 217, however, Cao Pi was appointed Heir, and when he came to power in 220 he killed Ding Yi, his brother Yi 廙, and all male members of their family.

Ding Yi was a man of considerable literary talent, but he was, predictably, not ranked by Cao Pi with the Seven Masters of the Jian'an period in his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature," nor did he receive any substantial biography in the Sanguo zhi of Chen Shou. -SGZ 19:561-62.

Ding Yi 丁廙 [Jingli 敬禮] (d.220); Pei. Younger brother of Ding Yi 儀 and also a man of literary talent, he joined Liu Yi in compiling an essay on criminal law and ritual, Xingli lun 刑禮論. Also a close friend of Cao Zhi, he joined in pressing his claim to succeed Cao Cao. He shared his brother's fate when Cao Pi came to the throne. -SGZ 19:562.

Ding Yu 丁羽. Administrator of Guanghan about the middle of the second century, he nominated Jing Yi as Filial and Incorrupt. -HYGZ 10C:174.

Ding Yuan 丁原 [Jiayang 建陽] (d.189). A man of the frontier, excellent horseman and archer, Ding Yuan became Inspector of Bing province and then a Commandant of Cavalry stationed in Henei. As the General-in-Chief He Jin planned to deal with the palace eunuchs in 189, he ordered Ding Yuan to make a show of strength. Ding Yuan burnt the city of Mengjin, north of Luoyang, and was then appointed Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital.

As Dong Zhuo took power at the capital after the destruction of He Jin, he was concerned that Ding Yuan might become a rival. He persuaded Lü Bu, Ding Yuan's protégé, to kill him. -SGZ 7:219, HHS 75/65:2444.

Ding Zhan 丁湛; Yingchuan. Son of Ding Hong, he succeeded to his fief in 94. -HHS 37/27:1268.

Ding Zhong 丁仲; Pei. A leading robber in the middle 40s, Ding Zhong was captured by the Assistant Administrator Han Gong, who took his booty and had him bastinadoed eight hundred times. Ding Zhong survived this, but Han Gong then simply killed him. -HHS 29/19:1032, DGHJ 15:4a.

Ding Zhong 丁中 miswritten for Ding Chong 丁冲.

Ding [Zhongli] 丁仲禮 was an Assistant Officer in Yan province. -LS 27:4b.

Ding [Zisi] 丁子嗣 (d.184); Runan. In 184 Ding Zisi was a member of the local staff of the Administrator Zhao Qian. When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out the commandery militia was defeated. Ding Zisi and six other officers shielded Zhao Qian with their own bodies, and though they were killed he was able to escape. An edict ordered that the gates of each of the officers' homes should be inscribed in honour of the "Seven Heroes" 七賢. -HHS 45/35:1527.

Dingxing 丁興 of Jumi [present-day Yutian]. A member of the royal house, Dingxing was a hostage prince at the Han court.

In 175 King Anguo of Yutian [Khotan] attacked Jumi and killed the king. Chinese authorities in the Western Regions retook Jumi and placed Dingxing upon the throne. The small state, however, whose population was formerly 7,500, now contained only about a thousand people. -HHS 88/78:2915.

Director of Retainers Who Scales the City Wall 司隸緣城 see Sili Yuancheng.

Diwu Fang 第五訪 [Zhongmou 仲謀] (d.159); Jingzhao. A kinsman of Diwu Lun in a later generation, Diwu Fang was orphaned when he was young. The family was very poor, and he worked in the fields to support his elder brother's wife. Any spare time he had from his labours he spent in reading and study.

Having served as Officer of Merit in his commandery, Diwu Fang was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a magistrate in Guanghan. His administration was peaceful, and it was claimed his moral authority was so well expressed that people from neighbouring counties went to live under his rule, as a result, in no more than three years the population had increased tenfold.

Diwu Fang then became Administrator of Zhangye. There was a famine at the time, and the cost of grain was enormous. Diwu Fang ordered that the official granaries be opened to relieve the distress. His officers were reluctant to take the responsibility and wanted to refer the proposal to the capital, but Diwu Fang insisted. The grain was distributed, all the people of the commandery were saved, and Emperor Shun sent a letter of commendation. Diwu Fang then encouraged the people to agriculture, and in following years the harvests were abundant and there were no robbers or bandits.

Diwu Fang was later transferred to Nanyang, but then resigned. In 155 he was recalled to be Protector of the Qiang, and he maintained the frontier by personal authority and honest dealing. After four years he died in office. He is classed by Fan Ye as a Benevolent Official 循吏 -HHS 76/66:2475-76*; Ch'ü 72:379-380, deC 84:126.

Diwu Jun 第五儁; Jingzhao. In 188, as the Liang province rebels under Wang Guo approached Chang'an, the Intendant He Xun persuaded Emperor Ling to commission private troops. Diwu Jun was one of five leaders of local gentry who received title as Commandant, to raise their own regiments and join the imperial forces under He Xun's command. -HHS 58/48:1883.

Diwu Lun 第五倫 [Boyu 伯魚]; Jingzhao. The Diwu were descended from the royal Tian 田 clan of the ancient state of Qi 齊. During Former Han different groups of the clan were moved at various times to settlement in the funerary parks about Chang'an; the lineage of Diwu Lun identified itself as the fifth 第五 to suffer such forced migration. Despite this distinguished ancestry, no member of Diwu Lun's family appears in a prominent position in the empire before his time.

Diwu Lun showed quality as a young man, and during the troubles which followed the fall of Wang Mang he commanded his family and retainers in an encampment, well-equipped with cross-bows and other weapons of war. They dealt successfully with local bandits and withstood attacks from the Bronze Horse group and even the Red Eyebrows.

After the region had been largely settled by the new government of Emperor Guangwu, Diwu Lun called on the Intendant Xianyu Bao, who was impressed and gave him a position on his staff. When Xianyu Bao was demoted to a county magistracy in the east, Diwu Lun became a district headman. Though he governed well and was popular with the people, he had criticised his superior and believed he would never gain advancement. [HQ 1:16a identifies this superior as He Yan, but the statement appears anachronistic: He Yan was engaged elsewhere in the late 20s, and though he did replace Xianyu Bao as Administrator of Zuopingyi in the late 30s he was never Intendant of Jingzhao.]

Diwu Lun therefore left his post and took his household to Hedong. Changing his name to Wang Boqi, and cutting all ties with his former acquaintances, he became a salt merchant in Taiyuan and Shangdang. The change of name was partly from embarrassment, and concern that as a member of the gentry he should not engage in such an occupation, but it also meant that he could later resume his true name and re-enter official service.

After some years Diwu Lun's former patron Xianyu Bao was able to recommend him to the new Intendant

Yan Xing, who appointed Diwu Lun as his Registrar. At this time the markets in Chang'an were in disorder, with great numbers of false coins and forgers. Put in charge, Diwu Lun enforced strict control of currency, weights and measures. He was swiftly successful and was widely praised.

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt in 51, Diwu Lun was made physician to the imperial son Liu Yan, King of Huaiyang. As the king left for his state in the following year, Diwu Lun met Emperor Guangwu, and though the meeting was brief he made a favourable impression. When he returned with his master on a visit to the capital in 53, Guangwu asked about affairs of state at a general assembly, and Diwu Lun's reply pleased him so greatly that he summoned him for a long conversation, lasting well into the night.

Diwu Lun was named as a county magistrate in Lingling, but even before he took up that post he was transferred and promoted to be Administrator of Kuaiji. Though he now held high rank and salary, he lived most frugally, cutting grass himself to feed his horse, while his wives did the cooking for the household; any surplus was given to the poor.

Kuaiji was strongly influenced by shamans and diviners, who told the people that they must sacrifice their plough-oxen to the gods – should they fail to do so they would fall ill, bellowing like an ox, and die. Previous officials had tried to suppress the custom, but without success, and shortage of oxen naturally made it difficult to establish traditional Chinese agriculture. Diwu Lun enforced strict penalties against the medicine men and any who obeyed them, and the cult was eliminated [also in FSTY 9:70; Nylan 83:531-532].

After almost ten years in office, in 62 Diwu Lun was recalled for punishment on account of some fault. The local people held his carriage to prevent him leaving, and even when he evaded them and left by boat several thousand followed him to the capital, where they held vigil outside the gates and sent petitions in his favour.

At this time Emperor Ming was engaged in the case of his former brother-in-law Liang Song 松, and was annoyed by the host of petitions which had been sent in on behalf of Liang Song. He therefore ordered that no pleas were to be accepted for either Liang Song or Diwu Lun. He did, however, visit the prison soon afterwards, and Diwu Lun was released. Allowed to return home, he worked on his land beside his household slaves, and he kept no contact with the outside world.

A few years later, about 65, Diwu Lun was again appointed as a county magistrate, this time in Ba commandery, where he became the patron of the future minister Xuan He. After four years he was made Administrator of Shu, where he confirmed his reputation as a judge of men. He had his staff selected for ability and honesty rather than for wealth and breeding, and he encouraged the recruitment of men from poor families. Corruption was reduced, there was strong competition, and many of his local officers became ministers and administrators.

Soon after Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75, Diwu Lun was called to the capital as Excellency of Works. He promptly presented a memorial objecting to the high offices held by the Ma family of the Dowager, and another urging that officials act less harshly: though it had been appropriate for Guangwu to establish a firm regime after the disorders which followed Wang Mang, it was time for a more generous policy. He likewise supported Yang Zhong's proposal to end the exile of convicts from the southeast of the empire onto the northern frontier.

At the end of that year the Northern Xiongnu attacked the newly-established protectorate-general in the Western Regions and messengers came for help. Arguing a conservative position, Diwu Lun opposed sending reinforcements, but the emperor was persuaded that it would be bad for morale to abandon the troops, and that it would enhance the prestige of the empire to save them.

In 77 Diwu Lun protested at the appointment of the Dowager's brother Ma Fang to lead an army against the Qiang, but he was once more over-ruled.

Despite such political defeats, Diwu Lun retained imperial favour, while he was celebrated for his honesty and frugality and for his refusal to allow private interest to interfere with his conduct of public affairs. When a cattle plague broke out in 76, the first to affect the empire as a whole, Diwu Lun organised the relief program and was admired for its effectiveness.

After several requests to retire on grounds of old age, Diwu Lun was permitted to leave office in 86 with a grant of 500,000 cash and a pension for life. When he died a few years later, aged over eighty, the state provided regalia and other expenses for his funeral. -HHS 41/31:1395-1402*, 19/9:721-22, XC 2:5b-6a;

Diwu Xi 第五頡 [Ziling 子陵]; Jingzhao. Younger son of Diwu Lun, Diwu Xi was a close friend of the leading officials and scholars Zuo Xiong and Zhang Heng. He became Officer of Merit in his commandery and was an Attendant Officer under the Director of Retainers, then entered the offices at the capital. Recommended First Class, he became an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate and then a county magistrate in Runan.

Diwu Xi later served as Administrator in Guiyang, Lujiang and Nanyang, and he was praised in each commandery for his good government. Returning to the capital as Counsellor Remonstrant, he was promoted to be a Palace Counsellor. In 124 he joined the demonstration led by Lai Li at the Gate of the Vast Capital, protesting the dismissal of the Heir Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. Though the demonstrators achieved no success, their support was recognised, and after Liu Bao had been brought to the throne at the end of 125 they were rewarded with high position, and the ren right to nominate their sons as cadet gentlemen.

Diwu Xi became Court Architect and died in that office about 130. -HHS 41/31:1402.

Diwu Xun 第五巡 [Wenxiu 文休]; Jingzhao. Son of Diwu Zhong and a man of local reputation, he with Jin Shang and Wei Duan were known as the "Three Xiu" from the common character in each man's style. Diwu Xun was Reporting Officer of the commandery, but nothing more is recorded of his official career. -HHSJJ 41/31:1492 Hui Dong quoting *Sanfu jue*lu, SGZ 7:223.

Diwu Yong 第五永; Jingzhao. In the time of Emperor Ling Diwu Yong was sent to You province as Imperial Clerk in Command of Troops. He was farewelled from Luoyang by a notable assembly of scholars and writers, including Cai Yong and Gao Biao. -HHS 80/70B:2650.

Diwu Yuan 第五元 or Diwu Yuanxian 第五元先?; Jingzhao. A kinsman and perhaps a brother of Diwu Zhong, Diwu Yuan was a scholar of the Book of Changes and the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu, and also of the Santong 三統 [Triple Concordance] calendar of Liu Xin 劉歆 of Former Han, as well as Jiuzhang suanshu 九章算術 "Nine Chapters on the Mathematical Art." As a member of the Imperial University at Luoyang about 150, Diwu Yuan was a teacher of Zheng Xuan. -HHS 35/25:1207 & JJ at Diwu [Yuanxian] 第五元先 see Diwu Yuan 第五元.

Diwu Zhong 第五種 [Xingxian 興先]; Jingzhao. A great-grandson of Diwu Lun, Diwu Zhong held local appointment and then served in the offices at the capital. In 145 he was sent to Ji province as a Commissioner against Corruption.

Diwu Zhong then became a county magistrate in Beihai. His territory was on the border of two provinces, both troubled by bandits, but Diwu Zhong kept control and gave refuge to several thousand displaced families. He was later Chancellor of the duchy of Wei, the county in Dong commandery which had been granted as a fief to descendants of the royal house of Zhou 周.

Inspector of Yan province in 160, Diwu Zhong sent his officer Wei Yu to investigate Shan Kuang, Administrator of Jiyin and kinsman of the palace eunuch Shan Chao. Wei Yu arrested a number of Shan Kuang's retainers and found stolen goods, but though Diwu Zhong reported Shan Kuang and Shan Chao, the affair was halted.

Soon afterwards Wei Yu persuaded the bandit Shusun Wuji to a short-lived surrender, but Shan Chao had his colleague Hou Lan accuse Diwu Zhong of exaggerating his success, and he was exiled to Shuofang. A kinsman of Shan Chao was Administrator there, and waited to kill him, but Diwu Zhong's former officer Sun Bin gathered men to waylay the escort and rescue him. Diwu Zhong went into hiding, but later benefited from an amnesty and died at home. -HHS 41/31:1403-05*; deC 89:22.

Dong 董, the Lady I (d.189); Hejian. A concubine of Liu Chang the Marquis of Jiedu Village 解瀆亭, the Lady became the mother of Liu Hong, future Emperor Ling. When Liu Hong was brought to the throne in 167, she remained in Hejian with rank as an Honoured Lady at her late husband's tomb, but after the eunuchs destroyed Dou Wu in 169 she was brought to the capital, given title as Dowager and allocated private apartments, known as the Yongle Palace 永樂宮 [Palace of Perpetual Joy]. A woman of poor background, it is said that she encouraged the emperor to sell offices to gain money for his private treasury.

Soon after the birth of Liu Xie, future Emperor Xian, in 181, his mother the Lady Wang was killed, and the Lady Dong was entrusted with the infant's care, to protect him from the dangers, supernatural or real, of life in the central apartments of the palace [see also sub the eunuch Zhu Zhi]. The boy became known as Lord Dong 董侯, and the Lady attempted to persuade the emperor to establish him as Heir, rather than his elder half-brother Liu Bian, son of the Empress He. Though the emperor indeed favoured Liu Xie, he made no decision, and when he died in 189 the Dowager He placed Liu Bian upon the throne.

With the aid of some senior eunuchs, the Lady Dong nonetheless attempted to involve herself in politics at court. When she was unsuccessful, she became angry and threatened the Dowager He and her family with the power of her nephew Dong Zhong. The General-in-Chief He Jin, however, had no difficulty in arranging for the Excellencies to present an accusation that the Lady Dong had arranged for provincial governments to send funds to her private treasury. It was ordered that the Lady's presence was no longer required at the capital, and that she should be sent back to Hejian. At the same time He Jin sent troops to arrest Dong Zhong, and Dong Zhong killed himself.

The Lady Dong died soon afterwards, and was buried with her husband in Hejian. It was believed that the Dowager had behaved wrongly towards her mother-in-law, and the He family was blamed for her death. -HHS 10B:446-47*.

Dong 董, the Lady II (d.192); Longxi. Widow of Dong Junya, the Lady was the mother of Dong Zhuo. When her son took power in 189 he granted her an estate and title, but after he was assassinated in 192 she was killed in the general massacre of the family. She was at that time aged 90. -SGZ 6:179-80.

Dong 董, the Lady III; Anping? Wife of Guo Yong and mother of the future consort of Cao Pi, she died about 189. When her daughter became empress in 222 she received posthumous enfeoffment. -SGZ 5:165; C/C 99:107.

Dong 董, the Lady IV (d.200). Daughter of Dong Cheng, she became an Honoured Lady of Emperor Xian. In 200, when Cao Cao discovered her father's treachery, he had the Lady arrested. Though she was pregnant at the time and the emperor begged for her life, she was killed. -HHS 10B:453.

Dong 董, the Lady V; Longxi? Secondary wife 庶婦 of Ma Chao, the Lady was left behind in Hanzhong as Ma Chao left to join Liu Bei in 214. When Cao Cao conquered Hanzhong in 215, he gave her to his officer Yan Pu. -SGZ Shu 6:948. See also sub Chong 种 [surname unknown], the brother-in-law of Ma Chao.

Dong, Lord 董侯 see Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, and sub the Lady Dong (d.189) above.

Dong, Lord 董君 see Dong [personal name unknown] IV below.

Dong 董 [personal name unknown] I; non-Chinese of Zangke. Head of the clan of that name in the middle 20s, he and other leaders supported the Chinese Xie Xian, Officer of Merit of the commandery, in maintaining allegiance to Han rather than acknowledging the imperial claim of Gongsun Shu. They sent messengers by the south-eastern route through present-day Guangdong, and Guangwu rewarded them with ceremonial robes. -HHS 86/76:2845, HYGZ 4:54.

Dong 董 [personal names unknown] II & III; Runan. Two brothers, father and uncle of Dong Zizhang, were killed about 30 by a neighbour of the Sheng surname. Before Dong Zizhang could avenge their deaths he fell mortally ill, but his friend Zhi Yun did the work for him. -HHS 29/19:1027.

Dong 董 [personal name unknown] IV; Hongnong. In commenting on the case of Hu Yi and Fan Shao qq.v., Ying Shao tells of a certain Lord [or Mr] Dong 董君, who had received high assessment as a clerk in the offices of the Excellency over the Masses during the mid-180s, but then took leave of absence to deal with family matters. While he was in his commandery, although he had not resigned his office at the capital, he agreed to meet the Administrator Ji Chong and worked with his Officer of Merit. The Excellency Yuan Wei disapproved of this conduct, but took no action, and Ying Shao complains that, as a result of this failure in demarcation and proper loyalty, the structures of local government became hopelessly confused. -FSTY 5:39; Nylan 83:469-471.

Dong An 董黯 [Xiaozhi 孝治]; Kuaiji. During the early 190s Yu Fan discussed the local worthies of Kuaiji with the Administrator Wang Lang. He praised Dong An as a man of filial piety, so great that when his mother died the wild beasts came to help him build her tomb. -SGZ Wu 12:1325.

Dong Ba 董巴. Little is known of Dong Ba, though he wrote several works on Later Han. A scholar of cosmology and the calendar, he compiled treatises on portents and on carriages and robes, and he prepared some part of a full history of Later Han, all of which is now lost. His treatises were used extensively by Sima Biao for those of his Xu Han shu, now incorporated into the standard Hou Han shu.

During the debates and negotiations as Cao Pi took the imperial throne in 220, Dong Ba appears as an Academician with supernumerary title as Serving within the Palace; he and Su Lin prepared a genealogy which linked the Cao family with the mythical Yellow Emperor 黄帝. -HHS 103/13:3265, SGZ 2:70, JS 17:499; Goodman 98:108, 145-151, MBeck 90:18, 39, 145-146, 242-246, 269-273.

Dong Ban 董班 [Ji? 季 (second character lost)]; Nanyang. As a young man Dong Ban travelled to Luoyang, where he became a student of the Excellency Li Gu.

When Li Gu was executed in 147, the General-in-Chief Liang Ji had his body displayed and ordered that anyone who approached it would be killed. Dong Ban nonetheless carried out mourning rituals. This was reported, but the regent Dowager Liang ordered that Dong Ban should not be punished, and he was permitted to take Li Gu's corpse for burial in his home country of Hanzhong.

Dong Ban was widely admired. He was offered appointment in the offices of the Excellencies, but refused and went into hiding. -HHS 2088-89.

A similar story of the loyal student is told of Guo Kiang and of Yang Kuang.

Dong Bing 董炳 (d.108 or 116). An Administrator in Yi province, Dong Bing was killed by rebel Qiang. -HHS 87/77:2886, HYGZ 1:5; deC 84:97.

The texts disagree on the post Dong Bing held and the year that he died. HHS 87/77 says that he was the head of Hanzhong and was killed in 108 or 109, while HYGZ 1 and HHS 31/21:1105 say that he was head of Ba commandery and died in 116. [The disagreement on dates is based on whether the reign period was Yongchu 永初 (107-113) or Yuanchu 元初 (114-119)]. HYGZ 1 adds that he was succeeded by Wang Tang; from context, Wang Tang took his position in 116.

It may well be that an Administrator of Hanzhong was killed about 109, and it seems certain that an Administrator of Ba died in 116. Dong Bing was probably the latter.

Dong Bing 董並; Chenliu. Son of Dong Xuan, he was made a gentleman cadet in honour of his father and later became Chancellor of Qi. -HHS 77/67:2490.

Dong Bing 董竝 [Gongfang 公昉]; Henei. A county Commandant in Danyang, in 181 Dong Bing was a leading sponsor of a stele in honour of the magistrate Pan Qian, his senior officer. -LS 5:4a.

Dong Bo 董白, the Lady (d.192); Longxi. Granddaughter of Dong Zhuo, though not of marriageable age in 191, she was enfeoffed as Lady of Weiyang in an extravagant ceremony at the family stronghold of Mei in Youfufeng.

The Lady presumably died in the massacre of the family which followed the death of Dong Zhuo in the following year. -SGZ 6:178.

Dong Can 棟蠶 see Dongcan 棟蠶.

Dong Chen 董臣. In 71 it was alleged that Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan had sent his officers Dong Chen and Zhang Yang to make contact with Yan Zhong and other members of the alleged conspiracy about Liu Ying the King of Chu.

Dong Cheng 董承 (d.200); Hejian or Longxi [some sources say that Dong Cheng was a nephew of the Dowager Dong and a childhood friend of his cousin Emperor Xian, others that he was a kinsman of Dong Zhuo; he cannot have been both].

In the early 190s Dong Cheng was an officer under Niu Fu, son-in-law of Dong Zhuo. In 195 he was one of the troop commanders who helped Emperor Xian escape from Chang'an to Hongnong and across the Yellow River to Hedong; in 196 he escorted him back to Luoyang. He initially opposed Cao Cao's plan to bring the court to his headquarters at Xu city, but later agreed. He was named General of the Guards and enfeoffed, and his daughter entered the imperial harem.

In 199 Dong Cheng was made General of Chariots and Cavalry, but about this time Emperor Xian asked him to organise a conspiracy against Cao Cao. Early in 200 the plot was discovered and Dong Cheng and his family were destroyed. -HHS 72/62:2338-43, SGZJJ Shu 2:8a; deC 96:268-271.

Dong Chong 董崇; Youfufeng. At some time a fellow-student of Kou Xun the Administrator of Henei, he warned him in 25 that despite his good work he should be concerned lest Emperor Guangwu doubt his loyalty. Citing the advice of Bao Sheng 鮑生 to Xiao He 蕭何 in the time of Emperor Gao [QHX:8], he urged him to send some of his kinsmen as quasi-hostages. At the end of the year, therefore, when Guangwu passed through Henei Kou Xun offered the services of his two nephews with troops of cavalry. The emperor was delighted.

Well-known as a gentleman scholar, Dong Chong became a county magistrate in Nanyang, and in the 30s he was commended to Guangwu by the Administrator Du Shi. He does not, however, appear again in the histories. -HHS 16/6:622, 31/21:1096.

Dong Chong 董寵 (d.170); Hejian. Dong Chong was elder brother to the Lady Dong the mother of Emperor Ling. When she was brought to Luoyang as Dowager in 169 he accompanied her and became Bearer of the Mace. In the following year, however, he was found guilty of extortion and died in prison. -HHS 10B:446.

Dong[?] Chong 董种 see sub Chong [personal name], brother-in-law of Ma Chao. -SGZJJ Shu 6:12a Zhao Yiqing.

Dong Chun 董春 [Jiyang 紀陽]; Kuaiji. In the latter part of the first century BC Dong Chun studied the New Text Classic of History with the Palace Attendant Wang Junzhong 王君仲 and the Book of Changes with Jing Fang 京房. He established a private academy in his home country and was later a popular and successful Administrator of Lujiang. -XC 7:4a-b.

Dong Cizhong 董次仲 (d.26); Dong. A leader of local bandits during the disorders at the time of the fall of Wang Mang, in 24 he became chieftain of the band of Tanxiang 檀鄉 [Tan District] in the marshlands to the south of Dong commandery, which combined a number of disparate groups including followers of the late Li Zidu. Dong Cizhong led his people into Wei and Qinghe. Their depredations extended over the North China plain and they joined the Wuxiao group about present-day Beijing and Tianjin to form a band estimated at more than a hundred thousand.

In 25 Emperor Guangwu sent his general Wu Han to deal with them, and in the spring of 26 he destroyed Dong Cizhong and his fellows. -HHS 21/11:753; Bn 59:80-81.

Dong Dun 董敦. A leader of the Wuxiao bandits operating in the region of the Yellow River, Dong Dun took the title of Household Counsellor bearing credentials 持節光祿大夫. In 26 he surrendered to the forces of Du Mao and Wang Liang. -HHS 22/12:776.

Dong Fang 董訪; Jiyin. Younger brother of Dong Zhao, in 192 he was an officer under Zhang Miao. When Zhang Miao quarrelled with Yuan Shao, Yuan Shao turned against Dong Zhao.

When Zhang Miao attacked Cao Cao in 194, however, Dong Fang transferred his allegiance.

Dong Zhao became one of the leading advisers of

150 Dong Fen

Cao Cao and the new Wei state, Dong Fang played a less prominent role. In 221, however, he was enfeoffed by Cao Pi as a secondary marquis. -SGZ 14:437, 441.

Dong Fen 董芬; Hongnong. Head of the Imperial Censorate in 196, as the remnant court came under Cao Cao's control Dong Fen was one of those enfeoffed for good service in the escape from Chang'an. He later joined Cao Cao's staff.

At one time, influenced by the example of the adept Gan Shi, Dong Fen sought to obtain long life by practising techniques of controlled breathing. His throat became blocked, however, and it was a considerable time before he recovered. -HHS 72/62: 2342, 82/72B:2747, SGZ 29:805.

Dong Fengde 董奉德. A student at the University in Luoyang, he was a friend of Ren Mo, and very likely came also from Shu commandery. When Dong Fengde died, Ren Mo took his body back to his home country for burial. -HHS 79/69B:2572.

Dong Fu 董扶 [Mao'an 茂安]; Guanghan. As a young man Dong Fu attended the Imperial University at Luoyang. He and his fellow-countryman Ren An studied prognostication according to the Book of Changes and the apocrypha under Yang Hou/Xu. They acquired considerable reputations, and when they returned home the two men maintained private academies which attracted numbers of students from far and near.

Dong Fu was invited several times to appointment in the offices at the capital, and an official carriage was sent for him on three occasions. He was also given special nominations as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright, Knowing the Way and as an Academician. Each time he pleaded illness and did not go, but after more than twenty years, towards the end of the reign of Emperor Ling, the General-in-Chief He Jin called him to be a Palace Attendant. He was held in great respect at court.

In 188 the Minister of Ceremonies Liu Yan sought appointment as Governor of the southern province of Jiaozhi, but Dong Fu told him privately that "The capital district will suffer great disorder, but in the region of Yi province there are signs of a Son of Heaven." Liu Yan accordingly changed his request to Yi province. Dong Fu accompanied Liu Yan to the west as Commandant of the Dependent State of Shu.

In the following year Emperor Ling died and the empire fell into turmoil. Dong Fu left his position and returned home, where he died at the age of eighty-two. Liu Bei's later proclamation of the dynasty of Shu-Han was believed to have fulfilled his prophecy.

Many years later Zhuge Liang asked Qin Mi of Guanghan to compare Dong Fu and Ren An. Qin Mi replied that Dong Fu would praise anything that was in any way good, but criticised even the smallest fault. Ren An, on the other hand, considered only men's good points, and ignored their faults. -HHS 82/72B:2734*, SGZ Shu 1:866, HYGZ 10B:147; Ngo 76:115-116, DeWoskin 83:74.

Dong Fu 董馥 (d.188). An Assistant Officer of Yi province, in 188 Dong Fu was on detachment with his colleagues Yan Bin and Zhang Yin when the Inspector Que Jian was attacked and killed by rebels at his headquarters nearby. Yan Bin urged his fellows to turn against the enemy, but when they refused he fought alone and died. When Liu Yan arrived as Governor he honoured Yan Bin's heroism but executed Dong Fu and Zhang Yin for cowardice. -HYGZ 10C:170.

Dong He 董和. In 214 Dong He was a military adviser to Zhu Guang the Administrator of Lujiang in the service of Cao Cao. As Sun Quan's army stormed Huan, capital of the commandery, Zhu Guang and Dong He were both taken prisoner. -SGZ Wu 2:1119.

Dong He 董和 [Youzai 幼宰] (d.221); Nan. Dong He's family came originally from Ba commandery, and during the disorders at the end of Han he led his kinsmen back to the west and took service with Liu Zhang the Governor of Yi province. He was magistrate in two counties, and then held charge of the capital, Chengdu.

The region of Shu was prosperous, but the people were fond of fine clothing and good food, while their marriage and funeral ceremonies were so extravagant they could bankrupt a family. Dong He gave an example of plain living and temperate conduct [see also sub his son Dong Yun], and he gained influence and respect in each territory he was posted to. The powerful clans about Chengdu, however, concerned at his strict enforcement of the laws, sought Dong He's removal. The local officers and the common people sent petitions for him to stay, but Liu Zhang was persuaded to transfer him to be Commandant of the Dependent State of Badong by the Yangzi Gorges, and later appointed him Administrator of Yizhou in the far south.

Showing the same modest conduct, Dong He gained the trust of the non-Chinese people by his honest and fair dealings.

When Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214, he appointed Dong He to be General of the Household Manager of the Army, responsible for supplies. He served in that capacity for seven years, and when he died his house contained not one item of value. Zhuge Liang, who had worked with him at headquarters, praised his conscientiousness and his honesty of opinion. -SGZ 9.979-80*; deC 96:470-471, Fang 52: 141.

Dong Huang 董璜 (d.192); Longxi. Son of Dong Zhuo 擢, Dong Huang held court and military position after his uncle Dong Zhuo 卓 seized power. When Dong Zhuo 卓 was assassinated in 192, Dong Huang and his kinsmen were killed. -SGZ 6:176, 179.

Dong Hui 董恢 [Hanzong 漢宗]; Langye. The main text of HHS 76/66:2482 gives the surname of this man as Tong 童, while commentary cites XC 5:5a as reading variously 僮 or 懂. In HHSJJ at 2718, however, Hui Dong argues that those characters are a variant form of the common surname Dong, and the modern edition of Xie Cheng follows this. Xie Cheng gives the personal name as Zhong 种 or 仲, though this may be a confusion with Dong Hui's father Zhongyu 董仲玉.

Dong Hui's father died when Dong Hui was young, but his family was prosperous. He served as a local officer of both the commandery and of Xu province. About 176, having heard of his honesty and knowledge of the law, the Excellency Yang Ci appointed him to his offices. In 177, when Yang Ci was accused of making a bad appointment and was about to be dismissed, all his clerical officers offered their resignations but Dong Hui went to the palace gates to complain of his master's treatment. Later, when the others returned to work he went in and whipped them for their cowardice, then left. He was admired for his sense of honour.

Later Dong Hui was again appointed to the offices at the capital and then became a county magistrate in Donglai, on the southern shore of the Shandong peninsula, close to his native commandery but in neighbouring Qing province. If any official or commoner did something wrong he would explain their fault to them, and when they did something well he would present them with wine. As a result, we are told that the prisons were empty for years at a time, while there was a flourishing production of food and silk, and each household had pigs and hens. People came from neighbouring counties to receive his government, so the population increased by two hundred thousand households.

Then there was the tiger incident. The region was plagued by tigers, but when two were caught Dong Hui went and spoke to them, demanding that if either had killed a man it should confess and face its punishment. We are told that one of the beasts lowered its head and looked guilty, so they killed it; the other roared with righteous indignation at the accusation, and it was set free.

The local officers and the people sang the praises of Dong Hui, and a flock of auspicious red birds appeared to honour him. The provincial authorities reported his Exceptional Quality and he was transferred to be Administrator of Danyang, but then became ill and died. He is classed by Fan Ye as a Benevolent Official 循吏 and LS 13:6a-7b preserves a fragment of a stele inscription set up in his honour. -HHS 76/66:2481-82*.

Dong [Jizhong] 董季中; Hongnong. In the middle 190s Dong Jizhong and his younger brother Dong Yu went for protection to the territory of the warlord Duan Wei. Though they were desperately poor, Dong Yu maintained his studies. Dong Jizhong laughed at him for this, but Dong Yu became a minister of Wei, while Dong Jizhong is not heard of again. -SGZ 13:420.

Dong Jun 董鈞 [Wenbo 文伯]; Jianwei. A scholar of the Ritual according to the interpretation of Qing Pu 慶普, at the beginning of the first century Dong Jun went to study at Chang'an. During the reign of Emperor Ping of Former Han he was nominated as Understanding the Classics and held charge of the Office for Sacrificial Grains and Animals, but later resigned on grounds of ill health.

In the time of Emperor Guangwu of Later Han Dong Jun was recommended as Filial and Incorrupt and held appointment in the office of the Excellency over the Masses. With wide knowledge of both Old Text and New Text Confucianism, he took part in a number of debates at court. During the reign of Emperor Ming Dong Jun became an Academician, and in 58 and 59 he played a leading role in determining the procedures for ceremonies including Serving the Aged, worship of Heaven and Earth, at the five Suburban Altars and the Imperial Ancestral Temples, and funerary rituals for kings.

Regarded as the doyen of Confucian scholarship, Dong Jun had more than a hundred students. His highest office at court was that of General of the Household for All Purposes, but he was later found guilty of some fault and demoted to a Commandant of Cavalry. Some time after 60 he died in retirement, aged over seventy. -HHS 79/69B:2576-77*, HYGZ 10B:155; MBeck 90:72, Bodde 75:199.

Dong Lu 董魯. A noted Confucian scholar, during the time of Emperor Guangwu Dong Lu became a Consultant. -DGHJ 16:8a.

Dong Meng 董萌. An officer for the calendar under the Minister of Ceremonies, in 66 Dong Meng advised that the official system was not accurate. The matter was referred to a committee of the Excellencies, the Minister and other experts, but it was reported in the following year that there was no immediate solution to the problem. -HHS 92/2:3025 and see sub Bian Xin.

Dong Meng 董蒙. A village marquis in 213, Dong Meng was among the petitioners who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. -SGZ 1:40.

Dong Meng 董萌. A eunuch, Dong Meng was Prefect of the Yellow Gates under Emperor Ling. He was an advocate of the Dowager Dou of Emperor Huan, whose family had been destroyed but who still retained residence in the Southern Palace. In 171 the emperor went to pay respects to his formal and titular mother, but the leading eunuchs Wang Fu and Cao Jie, concerned at Dong Meng's support for the Dowager, accused him of having slandered the emperor's natural mother, the Lady Dong. Dong Meng was sent to prison and died. -HHS 10B:446.

Dong Min 董旻 [Shuying 叔穎: see sub Dong Zhuo 卓] (d.192); Longxi. Third son of Dong Junya and younger brother of Dong Zhuo, in 189 Dong Min was Commandant of the Equipage at Luoyang. When He Jin was assassinated by the eunuchs, Dong Min joined Wang Kuang to kill He Miao, regarded as a eunuch ally.

After Dong Zhuo seized power, Dong Min was enfeoffed and named General of the Left, commanding the stronghold at Mei in Youfufeng. After the assassination of Dong Zhuo in 192 the fortress was overrun and plundered, while Dong Min and other members of the family were killed. -SGZ 6:171-73.

Dong Qin 董勤. Inspector of Yang province in the late 80s, Dong Qin invited the scholar Wang Chong to become his Headquarters Officer. Some time later, however, Wang Chong resigned. -HHS 49/39:1630.

Dong Sheng 董生. A magistrate in Chenliu in 163, Dong Sheng had a stele set up at the temple honouring the early Han hero Li Yiji 酈食其 [QHX:234-235]. -SJZ 24:1a-b.

Dong Si 董祀 or Dong Shi; Chenliu. About 206 Cao Cao arranged for Dong Si to marry the Lady Cai Yan q.v., whom he had ransomed from the Xiongnu. Dong Si became a commandant of agricultural colonies, but he was then found guilty of some crime and sentenced to death. The Lady Cai appealed to Cao Cao, and persuaded him to leniency. -HHS 84/74:2800-01.

Dong Tai 董臺; Jianwei. A gentleman of family in the late second century, he arranged for a brother of the Attendant Officer Wang Shang to seek the hand of the young widow Han Jiang on his behalf. The Lady refused him, but two of Dong Tai's clients, Zuo Xi and Wang Su, then abducted her and forced her into the marriage. The Lady Han killed herself, and when the Administrator Gong Yang learned of the affair he had Zuo Xi and Wang Su executed to avenge the suicide. -HYGZ 10B:160.

Dong Teng 董騰 (d.172). A eunuch, Dong Teng became an Attendant at the Yellow Gates. He and the Regular Attendant Zhang Li had friendly contact with Liu Kui, King of Bohai and younger brother of Emperor Huan, whom they admired for his free and sometimes frivolous conduct. The senior eunuch Wang Fu, however, was angry at Liu Kui, and in 172 he claimed that Zheng Li and Dong Teng were conspiring to set Liu Kui upon the throne in place of Emperor Ling. Zheng Li and Dong Teng died in prison at the hands of the Director of Retainers Duan Jiong, while Liu Kui and his household were destroyed. -HHS 55/45:1798.

Dong Xi 董喜; Youfufeng. In 23 Dong Xi was the head of a strong local clan in Maoling county. In the autumn the armies of the Gengshi Emperor of Han defeated the last field force of Wang Mang and sent advance parties under Wang Xian and Han Chen towards Chang'an. Dong Xi and other local leaders took title as generals in the name of Han and came to attack the capital. As the main Han army was halted at Huayin, these irregular troops ravaged the city and killed Wang Mang. -Dubs 55:461, Bn 54:130.

Dong Xi's local power no doubt suffered a few years later when the condottiere Yan Cen took control of Maoling.

Dong Xi 董襲; Chenliu. LS 27:1b lists a stele to this man.

Dong Xi 董襲 [Yuandai 元代] (d.217); Kuaiji. Eight feet tall [185 cm], strong and brave, Dong Xi went to join Sun Ce when he arrived in Kuaiji in 196, and he was appointed to his personal staff. He joined the attack on Huanglong Luo and Zhou Bo and it is said that he killed both men. He was then made a senior major with several thousand men, and later became a Commandant. In 199 he took part in the western expedition which conquered Lujiang and Yuzhang and attacked Huang Zu in Jiangxia.

After Sun Ce was killed in 200, Dong Xi was one of the chieftains who reassured the Lady Wu, mother of Sun Quan, that the warlord state could survive against Cao Cao. He later dealt with the groups led by Peng Hu in the Poyang region.

When the Sun army attacked Huang Zu in Jiangxia in 208, Huang Zu based his defence on a great boom across the mouth of the Han River, with two moored lines of armoured boats, and crossbows to provide covering fire. Dong Xi and Ling Tong led a group of volunteers against the boom, and Dong Xi cut the ropes with his sword. The boom was swept away, the attackers could move forward, and Huang Zu was killed as he fled. Sun Quan gave credit for the victory to Dong Xi.

When Cao Cao attacked the line of the Yangzi in 217, Dong Xi held command of five towered warships based at Ruxu. A fierce wind sprang up during the night, however, and the great ships capsized. His attendants called him to join them in their boats but Dong Xi refused and was drowned. Sun Quan came in person to pay respects at his funeral. -SGZ Wu 10: 1290-91*, XC 8:9b.

Dong Xian 董憲 I [Qiaoqing 僑卿] (d.30); Donglai. A man of gentry family, when Dong Xian's father was murdered he gathered retainers to avenge him, then established a local power. In 24 he was named Administrator of Linhuai by the Gengshi Emperor, and held authority on the coast from the Shandong peninsula to the mouth of the Yangzi. He later accepted title as a chief general from Liu Yong, but gave him no practical assistance.

At the end of 26, after the first defeat of Liu Yong, Dong Xian's southern territory of Linhuai was occupied by Guangwu's forces. He remained independent in Donghai, however, and was named as a king by Liu Yong during his brief revival in 27.

In the autumn of 28, after the final destruction of Liu Yong by Guangwu's forces, Dong Xian's officer Ben Xiu changed sides and invited the general He Yan. Dong Xian drove He Yan away and killed Ben Xiu. He Yan attacked Dong Xian's capital at Tan, but gained no success, and campaigns in the following months left Dong Xian's position largely intact.

The main imperial army, commanded by Guangwu himself, now advanced through Lu and Shanyang, and in the autumn of 29 Dong Xian and his fellows brought a combined force to face them at Changlü in Donghai. There, after a three-day battle, the Han obtained a complete victory. Dong Xian fled to Tan, and as that city fell to Guangwu's troops a few weeks later, he fled further east with Pang Meng to the coast, where they were besieged in Qu city by Wu Han.

In the spring of 30 Qu city was starved into submission. Abandoning their families, Dong Xian and Pang Meng now escaped to the north. They took Ganyu in Langye by surprise, but were driven out by the Administrator Chen Jun and fled into the marshes. Dong Xian attempted to make his way west to surrender, but he was killed by Han Zhan, an officer of Wu Han. -HHS 12/2:494-97; Bn 59:132-150.

Dong Xian 董憲 II. Leader of a detachment of the Red Eyebrows in 22, Dong Xian defeated Wang Mang's troops in Yan province and killed his general Lian Dan 廉丹. [This is not the same man as Dong Xian I, who was a member of the gentry from a very different region.] -HS 99C:4177; Bn 54:139, QHX:67.

Dong Xin 董訢; Nanyang. In 26 Dong Xin was a local leader in the countryside east of Wan, capital of the commandery. A few months after the armies of Emperor Guangwu took first control of Nanyang, he led a rebellion which seized the city and captured the Administrator Liu Lin. The Han general Jian Tan soon recaptured the city, and Dong Xin returned to his base, but in autumn the imperial general Deng Feng rebelled and made common cause with him. The allies defeated Guangwu's local commander Cen Peng, then besieged Jian Tan in Wan city for several months.

Early in 27 Guangwu brought another major army into Nanyang, while Cen Peng caught a detachment of Dong Xin's troops, several thousand strong, in a blocked road and heavily defeated them. As the imperial army continued to advance Dong Xin surrendered. -HHS 22/12:783, 17/7:656; Bn 59:153-154.

Dong Xuan 董宣 [Shaoping 少平]; Chenliu. Recruited to the offices at the capital about 30, Dong Xuan was graded First Class and became Chancellor of Beidi. When the local leader Gongsun Dan and his son committed murder Dong Xuan had them arrested and executed. Their kinsmen and followers rioted in protest, but he arrested and killed them too, as former adherents of Wang Mang and potential allies of a local pirate gang.

Dong Xuan was impeached by the Inspector of Qing province for excessive brutality, and his assistant Shuiqiu Cen was tortured. Insisting that the responsibility was entirely his, Dong Xuan was sent to Luoyang and condemned. Even in the face of the death sentence, however, he took full responsibility and justified his actions to a personal emissary of Emperor Guangwu. He was reprieved at the last moment by direct order of the emperor, and suffered only demotion to be a magistrate in Henei, while Shuiqiu Cen escaped further investigation.

Dong Xuan was later sent as Administrator of Jiangxia to deal with banditry. He did so successfully, but was dismissed for having shown disrespect to a member of the Yin family of the empress who was serving as his Commandant.

About 40 Dong Xuan was appointed Prefect of Luoyang. A favourite slave and lover of the Princess Liu Huang killed a man in broad daylight but then took protection with her. No other official dared to take action, but Dong Xuan halted the carriage in which the slave was riding with the princess, arrested him and killed him.

The Lady Liu complained to her brother and sought to have him punished, but Dong Xuan asked how the ruler could justify allowing slaves to kill innocent men. He offered to kill himself, and beat his head till the blood flowed, but he refused to apologise and resisted even when attendants sought to force him to kowtow to the princess. The emperor, admiring his obstinacy and his principles, released him and rewarded him; Dong Xuan shared the money with his junior officers. [XHS 5 attributes the incident to the Lady Huang's sister Boji, Senior Princess of Ningping, and has the guilty man as either a slave or the son of her wet-nurse.]

Dong Xuan remained as Prefect for five years, celebrated for his defiance of powerful families. When he died about 45 at the age of seventy-four, he left only a little wheat, a white horse and an old carriage. Admiring his obvious honesty, Guangwu had his funeral carried out with the honours of a high official and appointed his son Dong Bing a gentleman cadet.

Fan Ye classified Dong Xuan as a Stern Official 酷吏. -HHS 77/67:2489-90, XC 5:6b-7a, XHS 5:10a-b; Bn 79:133, 140, Ch'ü 72:373-374.*

Dong Yanxing 董彦興; In FSTY 9:75; Nylan 83:550-552, Ying Shao tells how in 165 Qiao Xuan was haunted by a strange light which appeared in his bedroom. He told Ying Shao about it, and Ying Shao advised him to seek the advice of the diviner Dong Yanxing. After some demur, Dong Yanxing cast his fortune and told him that the sign was not harmful, but that he would rise to high office. Qiao Xuan was at first surprised and doubtful, but the prophecy came true.

Ying Shao describes Dong Yanxing as a grandson of the soothsayer Xu Man in the maternal line and says that he was a student of Wang Chang.

Dong Yao 董曜 see Dong Zhao 董昭.

Dong Yi 董翊 [Hanwen 漢文]; Langye. The main text of HHS 76/66:2482 gives the surname of this man as Tong 童, but see sub the entry for his brother Dong Hui.

Son of Dong Zhongyu, Dong Yi's reputation was comparable to that of his elder brother Dong Hui. He initially refused local appointment, but when Dong Hui went to office at the capital Dong Yi accepted nomination as Filial and Incorrupt, and later became a county magistrate in Dongping. He had great influence for good, and a stele was erected in his honour.

Dong Yi left office on account of mourning, and though he received provincial nomination as Abundant Talent, he did not accept and died at home. -HHS 76/66:2482.

Dong Yu 董翊. An Internuncio in 172, Dong Yu was sent to supervise the funeral of Hu Guang, who had been awarded special insignia and grave goods. -Cai 4:1.

Dong Yu 董遇 [Jizhi 季直]; Hongnong. A quiet man and a keen scholar, in the middle 190s Dong Yu and his elder brother Jizhong went to the territory of the warlord Duan Wei, who provided a measure of security. They were forced to make their living by gleaning wild vegetables and selling them, but although his brother jeered at him, Dong Yu kept his books and maintained his studies.

A few years later, as some order was restored under Cao Cao, Dong Yu was nominated Filial and Incorrupt by his commandery. Appointed to the Han court as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, he became a close confidant to Emperor Xian.

Following the failed rebellion of Ji Miao in Xu city in 218 a purge was carried out. Dong Yu had not been involved in the affair, but he was transferred to Cao Cao's capital at Ye, and in the following year he attended Cao Cao on campaign to the west. The army passed the tomb of Liu Bian the Little Emperor, elder half-brother of Emperor Xian, who had been deposed by Dong Zhuo and named King of Hongnong before he was killed. Cao Cao wondered whether he should send an envoy to pay respects but Dong Yu persuaded him, with citations from the classics, that such courtesy was not appropriate for a ruler of less than a year.

It appears that Dong Yu later returned to the court of Han, and when Cao Pi came to the throne in 220 he took part in the process which brought the abdication in favour of Wei. He was then a commandery Administrator, but later returned to the capital and was a Minister under Cao Rui. He died in the early 230s.

Dong Yu compiled a variorum edition of Zuo zhuan, together with commentaries to Laozi and the Book of Changes. He took only a limited number of students, telling those who approached him that they should first seek the meaning of the classics through their own reading. Because he had so few disciples, his edition of Zuo zhuan was lost, but Yu Huan, compiler of Wei lue, identified Dong Yu as one of seven Confucian Exemplars 儒宗 who maintained the tradition of Han scholarship in times of disorder. -SGZ 13:420; Fang 52:170-171, Goodman 98:97-98.

Dong Yuan 董援. A junior relative by marriage to the eunuch Shan Chao, about 160 Dong Yuan was Administrator of Shuofang. When Diwu Zhong, who had accused Shan Chao of wrongdoing, was sent to exile there, Dong Yuan planned to kill him, but Diwu Zhong was rescued by a group of his former officers. -HHS 41/31:1404.

Dong Yue 董越 (d.192). An officer of Dong Zhuo, but probably not a close kinsman, as Dong Zhuo withdrew from Luoyang to Chang'an in 191, Dong Yue was given charge of the defences at Mianchi in Hongnong.

In the following year, after the death of Dong Zhuo, Dong Yue was killed by Niu Fu. It is said that Niu Fu took the advice of a sooth-sayer who cast a trigram which told against him, but the diviner held a grudge against Dong Yue because he had formerly had him flogged. -HHS 72/62:2328, SGZ 6:181.

Dong Yun 董允 [Xiuzhao 休昭] (d.246); Nan. Son of Dong He, he accompanied his father west into the former family homeland of Ba commandery. About 215 he wanted to attend the funeral of a friend, the son of Xu Jing, and asked his father for a carriage. When Dong He gave him and his companion Fei Yi only a rickshaw, Dong Yun felt ashamed but Fei Yi was quite unperturbed.

When Liu Bei established his son Liu Shan as Heir to his kingdom of Hanzhong in 219, Dong Yun was appointed to his suite. When Liu Zhan succeeded his father in 223, Dong Yun obtained rank at court, and he was one of those left to guide the young ruler when Zhuge Liang went on campaign to the north in 227. Dong Yun later became Director of the Secretariat and held great moral influence over Liu Shan. -SGZ Shu 9.985-86*.

Dong Zhao 董昭 [Gongren 公仁] (156-236); Jiyin. To avoid taboo on the personal name of Sima Zhao, a founder of the Jin dynasty, the personal name sometimes appears as Zhao 照 or Yao 曜; Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, Dong Zhao became a county magistrate in Julu and then in Zhao. When the reforming Governor Jia Cong came to Ji province in 187 Dong Zhao was one of the few officials prepared to remain in their posts and withstand his scrutiny.

About 190 Dong Zhao became an adviser to the warlord Governor Yuan Shao. As Gongsun Zan attacked Julu in 192, the senior officers were frightened and planned to change sides. Yuan Shao learned of this and sent Dong Zhao to take over government there, but when asked about his plans Dong Zhao replied only that he would adapt to circumstances.

As he arrived in his territory Dong Zhao found the officials and people under strong influence from Sun Kang and other members of leading families. Claiming that there was threat of attack from bandits, he proclaimed a state of emergency, then executed Sun Kang and some thirty other local leaders. The people were impressed and Dong Zhao had no difficulty in re-establishing good order and loyalty.

Soon afterwards Yuan Shao sent Dong Zhao to Wei commandery, where the previous Administrator had been killed in battle. The territory was in complete disorder, with tens of thousands of bandits, but Dong Zhao obtained information from travelling merchants and was able to surprise the enemy and defeat them.

Dong Zhao's younger brother Dong Fang, however, was an officer of Zhang Miao, and Zhang Miao now quarrelled with Yuan Shao. So Yuan Shao turned against Dong Zhao, and Dong Zhao went west in hope of joining the emperor. In Henei he met Zhang Yang, Administrator in Dong Zhuo's service and enemy of Yuan Shao. Zhang Yang kept Dong Zhao with him, had him return his former insignia of office, and appointed him a Commandant of Cavalry.

Late that year Cao Cao sought to make contact with the imperial court at Chang'an, now under the new regime of Li Jue and his fellows. Zhang Yang at first rejected his approach, but Dong Zhao persuaded him to send a memorial endorsing Cao Cao, and he himself wrote letters in support to Li Jue and the others. Up to this time it does not appear that Dong Zhao had had any direct contact with Cao Cao, but his brother's commander Zhang Miao was a close supporter.

In 195, as Emperor Xian came to Henei after his flight from Chang'an he was welcomed by Zhang Yang and Dong Zhao was named a Consultant. In the following year, however, as the court returned to Luoyang, the various leaders fell out among themselves. Noting that Yang Feng had the strongest force but the weakest party at court, Dong Zhao composed a letter, as if from Cao Cao, offering friendship and alliance. Yang Feng was delighted, and he persuaded his fellows to recognise Cao Cao as a general and a marquis. Cao Cao came to Luoyang and swiftly established authority over the ramshackle rivals. He now met Dong Zhao, who advised him how to persuade Yang Feng to allow the transfer of the court to Xu city. Cao Cao thus confirmed control of the puppet government, and Dong Zhao was named Intendant of Henan.

In 198 Zhang Yang was killed in Henei by one of his officers. His former subordinates Xue Hong and Miao Shang sought support from Yuan Shao, but Cao Cao sent Dong Zhao to them, and he persuaded them to surrender.

When Cao Cao sent Liu Bei to Xu province in 199, Dong Zhao protested. It was, however, too late, and Liu Bei made himself independent and allied with Yuan Shao. Cao Cao drove him away, and then named Dong Zhao as Governor of Xu. As Yuan Shao attacked, Cao Cao named Dong Zhao Administrator of Wei commandery, in Yuan Shao's territory, and he came north to assist the defence.

As Cao Cao laid siege to Ye city in 204, Yuan Chunqing, a kinsman of the Yuan family, was Administrator of Wei for the Yuan and was in the city. Chunqing's father Yuanzhang had been in Yang province; Cao Cao had him brought to court, and Dong Zhao wrote a most eloquent letter to Yuan Chunqing, urging him to obey the dictates of filial piety and change his allegiance. Ye city was captured and Dong Zhao came to court as a Counsellor Remonstrant.

In 206 and 207 Dong Zhao accompanied Cao Cao to the northeast against the Wuhuan chieftain Tadun and the Yuan brothers. He designed the Pinglu 平虜 "Pacify the Caitiffs" and Quanzhou 泉州 canals to bring supplies up for the army, and at the conclusion of the campaign he was enfeoffed. He became a senior adviser on Cao Cao's staff.

In 212, in a memorial of gross flattery, Dong Zhao argued that Cao Cao should be awarded the Nine Distinctions and that the five feudal ranks of the ancient Zhou dynasty should be revived in order that he might take title as a Duke 公. He was opposed by Xun Yu, but Cao Cao was pleased, and after Xun Yu died a short time later he took the honours in the following year.

As Guan Yu was besieging Cao Ren in Fan city in 219, Sun Quan sent a secret message to say that he planned to attack him from behind. Dong Zhao recommended they promise Sun Quan to keep the proposal quiet, but in fact release it. This Machiavellian plan was agreed, but in the event Guan Yu did not believe the news. [It is questionable whether Sun Quan would have been so foolish as to reveal his plans in the first place.]

When Cao Pi succeeded his father in 220 Dong Zhao was appointed Court Architect; he was among the sponsors of a commemorative stele when Cao Pi took the imperial title. He then became Minister Herald and was raised in fief. Dong Zhao was a Palace Attendant and became an Excellency under Cao Rui. He died at the age of eighty-two. -SGZ 14:436-42*, LS 19:4a; Goodman 98:197.

Dong Zhong 董重 (d.189); Hejian. Son of Dong Chong and a cousin of Emperor Ling, Dong Zhong became Minister of the Guards. In 188 he was enfeoffed and made General of Agile Cavalry with command of a thousand men at Luoyang. In 189 his aunt the Lady Dong, mother of the late emperor, threatened to use him against her rival the regent Dowager He. The Dowager had her brother the General-in-Chief He Jin send troops to arrest him, and Dong Zhong killed himself. -HHS 10B:447.

Dong Zhong 董种/仲 see Dong Hui 董恢. -XC 5:5a.

Dong [Zhongyu] 董仲玉; Langye. A prosperous young gentleman, at a time of famine Dong Zhongyu distributed family supplies to his kinsmen and neighbours, saving hundreds of lives. He died soon afterwards. -HHS 76/66:2481-82: the main text gives the surname of this man as Tong 童, but see the entry for his son Dong Hui.

Dong Zhuo 董擢 [Menggao 孟高]; Longxi. Eldest son of Dong Junya and brother of Dong Zhuo 卓, he died young. -SGZ 6:171.

Dong Zhuo 董卓 [Zhongying 仲穎 often miswritten as 仲穎] (d.192); Longxi. Dong Zhuo's father Dong Junya came from Lintao county in Longxi, but at the time Dong Zhuo and his brother Min were born he was serving as a county commandant in Yingchuan 穎川; he therefore included the character ying in their styles.

In his youth Dong Zhuo had dealings with the Qiang people, gained reputation as leader of fighting men, and distinguished himself on the frontier. Braver and stronger than other men, he carried a bow at each side and was skilled with both of them. About 165 he was recommended as a cadet in the Feathered Forest guard, then became a major under Zhang Huan.

In the winter of 167 Dong Zhuo and his colleague Yin Duan defeated rebel Qiang in Hanyang, killed their leaders and forced their surrender. Dong Zhuo was rewarded with silk, which he distributed among his troops, and he was appointed a gentleman cadet for civil office. He then became a county magistrate in Yanmen, a divisional commandant in Shu, and Wu and Ji Colonel in the Western Regions; leaving the last office on account of some wrongdoing. In the late 170s he became Inspector of Bing province and in the early 180s he was Administrator of Hedong.

In the summer of 184 Dong Zhuo was sent as General of the Household of the East with the Staff of Authority to take over operations against the Yellow Turbans led by Zhang Jue in Julu. He was not successful, however, and in the autumn he was dismissed. Soon afterwards, as rebellion broke out in Liang province and Chang'an came under threat Dong Zhuo was sent to the west as a subordinate general, first under Huangfu Song and then under his replacement Zhang Wen.

After almost a year of indecisive engagement, in late 185 the main body of the enemy were defeated by Dong Zhuo and Bao Hong at Meiyang in Youfufeng: it is said the rebels were demoralised by a shooting star which appeared to fall in their camp. They nonetheless withdrew in good order, and when Dong Zhuo and Zhou Shen were sent to follow them into Hanyang they were both compelled to fight their way out. In accounts of the campaign we are told how Dong Zhuo extricated his force from a siege by the Qiang and other non-Chinese: pretending that he wanted to catch fish to alleviate the problems of his men under siege, he dammed a river and then used it to protect his line of retreat, while he had also kept a large reserve force to threaten the enemy and restrict their manoeuvre. He later claimed that he had urged Zhou Shen to act as spearhead while he himself waited in reserve, but that Zhou Shen refused to co-operate and so both forces got into difficulties. His victory at Meiyang, the only success achieved by imperial forces, earned Dong Zhuo a district marquiseate.

In 188 a new coalition of rebels laid siege to Chencang in Youfufeng. Dong Zhuo, now General of the Van but under the command of Huangfu Song, joined operations against them, and the enemy were defeated and driven away. It is said that Huangfu Song rejected his advice on two occasions, first in not hastening to relieve the city and then attacking the rebels as they retreated; on both occasions his decisions proved successful. Though Dong Zhuo may have been embarrassed, he was promoted in fief and appointed Governor of Bing province with both civil and military authority. Though ordered to leave his troops under the command of Huangfu Song, he refused to do so, and when he was called to the capital as Minister Steward he claimed that his men would not allow him to leave.

There are several stories about Dong Zhuo's arrogance, his insubordination, and his military failures. He is said to have lacked energy against the Yellow Turbans [see sub Guo Dian], he refused to respect Zhang Wen [see sub Sun Jian] and he gave mistaken advice to Huangfu Song. Some tales may have been true, but many were surely written in the light of his later reputation as the traitor who destroyed the Han; there seems no doubt of his victory at Meiyang in 185.

After the death of Emperor Ling in 189 the General-in-Chief He Jin planned to eliminate eunuch power from the court, and he called in Dong Zhuo to place pressure on his opponents. Dong Zhuo came with threats against the wrongdoers at the capital, but while he was in camp outside Luoyang the eunuchs killed He Jin and were then slaughtered themselves by guards at the capital. Dong Zhuo saw flames in the sky and led his men forward. On 25 September he took possession of the young emperor Liu Bian and his brother Liu Xie, then entered Luoyang to establish his own regime. When the senior ministers protested, he replied that the killing and burning and the flight of the ruler from the capital displayed their failure, and the time for reform had come. His army at the capital, which terrified the inhabitants with ill-disciplined ravages, provided all the authority he needed.

At one level, Dong Zhuo did attempt to restore the government. He held ceremonies to honour Chen Fan, Dou Wu and the men of Faction, he appointed scholars and reformers to high office at court and in the provinces, and he restricted his own favourites to middle-rank military commands. On the other hand, as a fighting general from the uncouth northwest, Dong Zhuo had no right to his authority and no acceptance among the gentlemen from central China who controlled the bureaucracy. Though he revived for himself such titles as Chancellor of State 相國 and Grand Master 太師, and raised his fief to a county marquisate, he held his position by military force and only another army could remove him: that way led to civil war and the end of Han.

Dong's Zhuo's conduct ensured massive opposition. On 28 September, three days after entering the capital, he forced Liu Bian to abdicate in favour of his younger half-brother Liu Xie, Emperor Xian. Two days later the Dowager He died, and she was duly followed by Liu Bian. Both deaths were the work of Dong Zhuo. Regardless of their faults and irrespective of claims for reform, there was no justification for such brutality, and by the spring of 190 the leaders of eastern China had joined in "loyal rebellion" to remove the usurper and restore the Han.

Dong Zhuo's men were at first successful in holding the passes which led to Luoyang, but his regime had lost authority over the greater part of the empire, and in the spring and summer of 190 the court was withdrawn west to Chang'an. The civilian population was driven away, and Luoyang became a centre for military defence, with wholesale plundering of the city, the imperial tombs and the treasures of the dynasty. Dong Zhuo also destroyed the traditional coinage, melting down statues to cast new money, and bringing massive inflation.

Dong Zhuo made some attempt to come to terms with his enemies, but he had embarked upon a personal feud with Yuan Shao, leader of the allies, by executing Yuan Wei, his own former patron, and other senior members of the clan. So the gentlemen he sent on embassy were killed without compunction. In the spring of 191 the general Sun Jian in the service of Yuan Shu forced his way into Luoyang from the south, and in the summer Dong Zhuo completed the retreat to Chang'an, where his government was based upon raiding abroad and terror within, with banquets accompanied by torture. Despite his initial restraint of office-holding among his supporters, Dong Zhuo now granted honours and fiefs to the most junior members of his family, and stored treasure and supplies at his fortified fief city of Mei, west of Chang'an.

Wang Yun, Excellency over the Masses appointed by Dong Zhuo, planned his assassination, notably with Lü Bu, who had sworn an oath to Dong Zhuo as son to father, and served as his bodyguard. On 22 May 192, as Dong Zhuo called upon the emperor, Lü Bu and his associates killed him, and they followed up the coup by the massacre of his family and supporters at the capital and at Mei. We are told Dong Zhuo was vastly fat, and as his corpse lay exposed someone placed a wick in the belly and lit it: he burned like a candle for several days.

The coalition of Wang Yun and Lü Bu was swiftly overthrown by former officers of Dong Zhuo, led by Li Jue and Guo Si, and the regime at Chang'an fell into utter confusion.

In traditional history, Dong Zhuo is reviled for destroying the dynasty of Han, and the accusation is not unfair. Given the chaos at Luoyang in 189, the task of restoration and reform was perhaps impossible, but Dong Zhuo was quite unsuited and inadequate to the task, and he confirmed the collapse of imperial government. -HHS 72/62:2319-32*, XC 4:12b; SGZ 6:

Dong [Ziyi] 董子義. Dong Ziyi was one of several gentlemen and scholars from the north who took refuge in Kuaiji to avoid the troubles which accompanied the fall of Wang Mang. -HHS 76/66:2461.

Dong [Zizhang] 董子張; Runan. Dong Zizhang's father and uncle were killed about 30 by a neighbour of the Sheng surname, but Dong Zizhang fell mortally ill before he could avenge their deaths. His old friend Zhi Yun came to visit him on his death-bed, and though Dong Zizhang could not speak he signalled with his eyes and Zhi Yun guessed the source of his distress. Taking a troop of retainers, he killed the enemy and presented his head to Dong Zizhang. Dong Zizhang died content. -HHS 29/19:1027.

Dong Zizhong 董次仲; Dong. After the bandit leader Li Zidu was killed by his own men in 23, his followers regrouped in Dong commandery south of the Yellow River. They chose the local man Dong Zizhong as their leader, and were known by the district name of Tanxiang 檀鄉. In 24 they crossed the river to operate in the southeast of Ji province.

In early 26, as the group was in the east of Wei commandery, a large army under the command of Wu Han was sent against them, and the Tanxiang bandits were destroyed. -HHS 1A:16, 26, 18/8:678; Bn 59:80, 121.

Dong'an 東岸; Qiang. In 107 Dong'an was a leader among the Lejie and Dangjian tribes. Disturbed by the mutiny of Qiang conscripts in Jiuquan, he and other chieftains scattered to go across the frontier. This marked the beginning of the unravelling of the Han position in the northwest and the start of the great Qiang rebellion. -HHS 87/77:2886.

Dongcan 棟蠶 (d.45); non-Chinese. A chieftain of Yizhou commandery, in 42 Dongcan led a rebellion, killing local officers and burning their posts. The disturbance extended through six counties and over the border into Yuexi commandery. Fan Sheng the Administrator of Yizhou fought the insurgents without success and was driven to take refuge in Jianwei.

In 43 the general Liu Shang was sent, calling up militia from Guanghan, Jianwei and Shu commanderies, with auxiliaries from the tribespeople of Yuexi. He entered Yizhou in 44, and though the rebels occupied fortified settlements in the hills, he captured their supplies of grain and animals.

Early in 45 Dongcan's headquarters were captured.

He and some seven thousand of his followers were killed, while almost six thousand prisoners were taken, together with three thousand horses and thirty thousand cattle and sheep. The region was quiet thereafter. -HHS 86/76:2846-47; Bn 67:66-67.

Dongguan Yi 東關義 was a junior military officer. -FSTY 5f:127.

Dongguo Dou 東郭竇 (d.156). Leaders of bandits in the region of Mount Tai, Dongguo Dou and Gongsun Ju commanded a force of thirty thousand men which ravaged Taishan and Langye and extended their depredations to Qing, Yan and Xu provinces. In 155 Duan Jiong was sent against them; he destroyed their army and executed the leaders. -HHS 7:200-01, 65/55: 2145-46; Young 84:65.

Dongguo Yannian 東郭延年 [Gongyou 公淤]; Shan-yang. At the end of the second century, Dongguo Yannian and his associates Zuo Ce and Gan Shi were noted for their long life, while still retaining a youthful appearance. All three men nourished their vital essence by coupling with a number of different women and failing to ejaculate. They also drank urine and hung upside down in order to emulate vegetables, whose growth comes from below.

Cao Cao gave appointment to Dongguo Yannian and other adepts and he may have been interested in the possibilities of longevity. His son Cao Zhi, however, claimed that such patronage was intended only to keep these men and their wild teachings under control; he and his family gave them no credence. -HHS 82/72B:2750, SGZ 29:805-06; Ngo 76:141-142, DeWoskin 83:87-88, 150-152.

Donghao 東號; Qiang. Son of Dongyu, about 89 he succeeded his father as head of the Shaodang tribe. He and his people had left Chinese territory to join Donghao's nephew Mitang, who had established himself across the frontier and was seeking vengeance for the murder of his father Miyu. As the new Protector Deng Xun used bribes to divide the Qiang alliance, Donghao brought his people back and submitted. He died about 106. -HHS 16/6:611, 87/77:2883.

Dongli Bao 東李褒 see Dongli Gun 東李袞.

Dongli Gun 東李袞. In 218 Dongli Gun was Administrator of Nanyang. The people were suffering from heavy demands of labour services, and in the winter the garrison officer Hou Yin led a mutiny, seized the capital, Wan, and called people from the hills to support him. Dongli Gun managed to escape from the city, but Hou Yin sent men in chase and his party was caught. As the enemy shot at them, the Officer of Merit Ying Yu shielded Dongli Gun with his own body. He was fatally wounded, and the fugitives were all taken prisoner, but before he died Ying Yu persuaded his captors to spare Dongli Gun.

Dongli Gun was brought back to Wan, but Zong Ziqing, who had succeeded Ying Yu as Officer of Merit, persuaded Hou Yin to let him go. Dongli Gun then collected loyal troops outside the city and returned to lay siege to Hou Yin. In the spring of 219 a major army under Cao Ren arrived and the rebellion was destroyed.

Dongli Gun was succeeded as Administrator by Tian Yu, and he became a major under Yu Jin. The Han system ranked a major in the army substantially below the civilian head of a commandery, but it is likely that this new appointment was not a demotion but reflects the changed significance of the two posts in Cao Cao's militaristic regime.

In the autumn of 219 Yu Jin was defeated and captured by Guan Yu outside Fan 樊 city. Dongli Gun was also taken prisoner, and when Guan Yu was destroyed by the surprise attack of Sun Quan's general Lü Meng a few weeks later, Dongli Gun and his comrades came into the hands of Sun Quan.

In 220, after Cao Pi had succeeded Cao Cao as King of Wei, Sun Quan sent Dongli Gun and his colleague Hao Zhou back to the north with messages assuring Cao Pi of his allegiance. Cao Pi asked them whether Sun Quan's protestations of good faith could be relied upon. Hao Zhou said they could, and he later went on embassy to grant Sun Quan enfeoffment as King of Wu. Dongli Gun, on the other hand, expressed his doubts, and he proved to be correct. -SGZ 4:141, 1:51, SGZ Wu 2:1128; deC 96:523-524, Fang 52:107, 127.

Dou 竇, Empress of Emperor Huan: see the Lady Dou Miao.

Dou 竇, Empress of Emperor Zhang: see the Lady

Dou I.

Dou 竇, the Lady I (d.97) [Empress of Emperor Zhang]; Youfufeng. Eldest daughter of Dou Xun by his wife the daughter of Liu Qiang, King of Donghai, who held title as Princess of Piyang, the Lady was a great-grand-daughter of Dou Rong and, through her mother, of Emperor Guangwu. She is said to have been precocious, learning to read by the age of six, and even in the years of disgrace and exile after her father's death in the early 70s she was admired and received prophecies of great honour for the future.

In 77 the Lady and her younger sister were brought by selection into the harem of Emperor Zhang and in 78 she was named empress, while her sister became an Honoured Lady. At that time she was presumably about fifteen years old. It is said that the Lady Dou received approval and endorsement from the Dowager Ma, widow of Emperor Ming and foster-mother of Emperor Zhang, but this is unlikely, for the Lady Ma had attempted to secure the future prosperity of her clan through her cousins the two sisters Song. She had brought them to Liu Da before he came to the throne, both had been made Honoured Ladies, and in 78 the elder gave birth to Liu Qing, who was named Heir in 79. The Song sisters had been in the harem of Liu Da some five years longer than the Dou, and it is likely that, despite the birth of an imperial son, the Lady Dou attracted the attention of the twenty-year-old emperor because she was new and younger; and perhaps also because the relevant Lady Song was unavailable by reason of her pregnancy. Political considerations would in any case encourage the ruler not to commit himself too firmly to one distaff faction.

In 79 the Dowager Ma died, and the Empress Dou became chief of the harem. She had no son of her own, and suffered from a condition which ensured that she could have no children. Like the Lady Ma before her, she sought to maintain her family's power through indirect control of the inheritance. In 82 the empress arranged that Liu Qing, son of the late Dowager's protégée the Honoured Lady Song, was dismissed as Heir and appointed King of Qinghe. Aided by her mother the Princess of Piyang, she then had the Lady Song and her sister accused of witchcraft; they were sent to the harem jail and forced to commit suicide. The Empress Dou now had Liu Zhao, son of the Honoured Lady Liang, named as Heir.

Dou, and there was probably an understanding that they would accept a secondary role. Very soon, however, the Liang relatives displayed undue ambition, and in 83 the empress had the Honoured Lady's father Liang Song arrested and executed on a charge of treason. The two Liang sisters then "died of grief" 以憂死 – killing themselves or being helped to do so – while their brothers were exiled to Jiuzhen in the far south. The empress now took over the care of the future Emperor He, and she arranged to have him treated as a scion of the Dou with no reference to his Liang maternity. When Emperor Zhang died in 88 the boy was aged ten, and the Lady Dou, now in her mid-twenties, ruled as regent Dowager.

For the most part the Dowager was willing to grant political authority to her eldest brother Dou Xian, but there was an early crisis when the marquis Liu Chang came to the capital at the beginning of the new regime. Officially he was bringing a message of condolence at the death of Emperor Zhang from the King of Qi, but Liu Chang was a well-known libertine, and through his friend Deng Die and Deng Die's mother the Lady Yuan he was able to gain entry to the palace and to the favour of the Dowager. Concerned that he might become a rival for influence with his sister, Dou Xian sent retainers to kill him. His guilt was discovered, and he was held in house arrest. Soon afterwards the Southern Shanyu of the Xiongnu sent in a memorial to urge a major attack on his northern rivals, and the Dowager was able to release her brother in order that he might take command of a major expedition.

Over the following years, as Dou Xian and his troops destroyed the Northern Shanyu and his government, the scandal was lost in celebrations for the military triumph, and the Dou became increasingly powerful. In 91 the emperor came formally of age, and in the following year, with the aid of the eunuch Zheng Zhong and others, he destroyed Dou Xian and his brothers. The Dowager herself was not harmed, but she was held under house arrest in her apartments, known as the Changle Palace [Palace of Prolonged Joy]. She died of natural causes five years later, aged in her middle thirties.

In the course of the coup, the Lady Yuan and Deng Die had been executed, as well as the colonel Guo Ju, who was accused not only of treason but also of having been favoured 得幸 by the Dowager. The phrase is the same as that used for the unfortunate Liu Chang in 88, and commonly describes the sexual favours shown by an emperor for an attractive concubine. So it appears that the Lady Dou was not entirely chaste in her widowhood but it is also possible that the accusation was devised by Emperor He and his supporters to eliminate her influence.

After the death of the Dowager in 97, and before she was buried, the family of the late Honoured Lady Liang, led by her cousin Liang Hu and her sister Liang Yi, reported on her role in the death of the emperor's true mother and on her ill-treatment of the family. As the Liang were restored to favour, senior officials argued that the Dowager should be excluded from the imperial lineage. Emperor He, however, gave his personal approval that she be buried with her consort Emperor Zhang. -HHS 10A:415-17*, 23/13:813-19.

Dou 寶, the Lady II; Youfufeng. Younger daughter of Dou Xun, in 77 she and her sister were taken into the harem of Emperor Zhang. When her elder sister was appointed empress in the following year, she was named an Honoured Lady. -HHS 10A:415.

Dou 寶, the Lady III. Daughter of Dou Zhang, she inherited his ability at literary composition. Aged twelve in the late 120s, on account of both her talents and her beauty she was selected into the harem of the young Emperor Shun. She received his favours, and she and the Lady Liang Na both became Honoured Ladies. For a time there was rivalry between the ambitious Liang family and those who sought to encourage the fortunes of the Lady Dou and other candidates. The Lady's father Dou Zhang, however, showed little interest in such intrigues, and the Lady herself died young, probably before she was twenty. Given the intensity of harem politics, and the record of the Liang family, one cannot be sure her death was natural. The emperor mourned her deeply, and commissioned a stele in her honour, with an inscription written by her father. -HHS 23/13:813.

Dou Ba 寶霸; Youfufeng. Son of Dou Mu, Dou Ba shared in the family's loss of favour under Emperor Ming. From the late 70s their fortunes were restored through the Empress Dou, who became regent Dowager for the young Emperor He in 88. Dou Ba became Colonel of the City Gates, but is not mentioned again after Emperor He destroyed the power of the family in 92. -HHS 23/13:819.

Dou Du 竇篤 (d.92); Youfufeng. Son of Dou Xun, when his sister the Lady Dou became the consort of Emperor Zhang in 78 Dou Du and his brothers Dou Xian, Dou Jing and Dou Xiang were favoured as her male relatives. Dou Du became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates.

The Prefect of Luoyang, Zhou Yu, had proclaimed a firm policy to control the imperial relatives by marriage, and as Dou Du was returning home from the palace one evening he was halted by the police officer Huo Yan. One of the slaves of Dou Du's escort attacked Huo Yan, but he drew his sword and arrested Dou Du. When Dou Du complained, the Intendant of Henan and the Director of Retainers were questioned by the Secretariat, while Zhou Yu was briefly imprisoned. Emperor Zhang, however, then endorsed his policy of keeping the distaff families under control.

Following the testamentary edict of Emperor Zhang in 88, Dou Du was appointed General of the Household of the Feathered Forest. The Dowager Dou was now regent for the young Emperor He, and her family became still more powerful. Dominating the court and the capital, the brothers used official corvée labour to build great mansions, and gathered armies of retainers who plundered the people.

As Dou Xian embarked on his campaign against the Northern Xiongnu in 89, Dou Du was Minister of the Guards, and in 90, after Dou Xian's triumphant return from his first campaign against the Northern Xiongnu, his brothers were enfeoffed. After the final victory in 91 Dou Du was named Specially Advanced, with ceremony comparable to that of the Excellencies, and the right to present candidates for official appointment.

In 92 with the aid of the eunuch Zheng Chong, Emperor He carried out a coup against the Dou group. Dou Xian and his brothers were stripped of their offices and sent away to their fiefs; all but Dou Xiang either committed suicide or were killed on the road. -HHS 23/13:812-820; Ch'ü 72:460-462.

Dou Feng 竇奉, wife of. It is said that when the Lady gave birth to Dou Wu she also gave birth to a snake, which promptly disappeared into the forest. When she died and before her body had been placed in the tomb, a great serpent emerged from a thicket of thorns and came weeping to beat its head upon the coffin, so that blood and tears flowed together. People took this as a sign of great fortune for the Dou family. -HHS 69/59:2245.

Dou Fu 竇敷 see sub Dou Rong 竇融.

Dou Fu 竇輔 (167-211); Youfufeng. A grandson of Dou Wu, after the family was destroyed in 168, the victorious eunuchs instigated a fierce search for Dou Fu, then two years old. Dou Wu's client Hu Teng, however, aided by his colleague Zhang Chang, brought the child south to Lingling, and spread the story that he had died. Hu Teng arranged for Dou Fu to marry into his family in Guiyang and adopted him as his son.

About 200 Dou Fu received commandery nomination as Filial and Incorrupt, and he became an Attendant Officer under the warlord Governor Liu Biao. Learning his true origins, Liu Biao had him resume the Dou surname, for it enhanced his own prestige among gentlemen and scholars to have the head of the great reformist family at his court. When Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208, Dou Fu and his kinfolk went north to Ye city, and he was appointed to a clerical post in Cao Cao's office as Imperial Chancellor.

In 211 Dou Fu accompanied the army on campaign to the northwest. He was struck by a chance arrow and died of his wound. -HHS 69/59:2244-45.

Dou Gu 竇固 [Mengsun 孟孫]; Youfufeng. Son of Dou You and a nephew of Dou Rong, Dou Gu married the Princess Liu Zhongli, daughter of Emperor Guangwu, and was granted junior office as a Gentleman of the Yellow Gates. He enjoyed the Confucian classics, but was also interested in military affairs. He was respected for his ability and generally treated with favour.

Dou Gu suffered some embarrassment over his association with the critic Du Bao, evidently caused by one of the supporters of the faction led by Ma Yuan, but avenged himself in 49 by joining the chorus of accusations which brought the posthumous disgrace of Ma Yuan and the eclipse of his family.

In 56 Dou Gu was granted the succession to his father's fief, and in 58 Emperor Ming appointed him General of the Household of the Feathered Forest. In that capacity he accompanied the army of Ma Wu which defeated the Qiang war-leader Dianyu.

When Dou Mu and his cousins were disgraced in 61, Dou Gu was also forced to leave office, and he remained at home for over ten years. In 72, however, as Emperor Ming resolved to attack the Northern Xiongnu he consulted privately with Dou Gu and then appointed him as Commandant of the Equipage with command of a force recruited from Zhangye, Jiuquan and Dunhuang and an auxiliary of 12,000 horsemen from the Qiang and other non-Chinese of the northwest. In 73 he moved north from Jiuquan in conjunction with another column under Geng Bing, which was to attack from Juyan/Edsin Gol. At the same time, two armies further east, commanded by Zhai Tong and Lai Miao, advanced from Shuofang in the Ordos region and from the Sanggan valley at Yanmen. Of the four commanders in this enterprise, only Dou Gu achieved any notable success. Reaching Lake Barkol, he defeated a Xiongnu king and occupied the region of Yiwu near present-day Hami.

Dou Gu was honoured as Specially Advanced, and late in 74, leading Geng Bing and Liu Zhang with a combined force of 14,000 horsemen, he made another expedition. Advancing to the Barkol Tagh, their forces defeated the Xiongnu once more and received submission from the kingdoms of Jushi in Turfan. For the first time Later Han gained control of the approaches to the Western Regions and re-established the protectorate which had been maintained by Former Han.

After Emperor Zhang succeeded to the throne in 75, Dou Gu returned to the capital as Minister Herald and became a leading adviser on frontier policy. Following the appointment of his great-niece as empress in 78 his achievements were recognised by an augmentation to his fief. In 82 he became Minister of the Household and in 83 Minister of the Guards. Greatly honoured, and vastly wealthy from his long service in high office, he was nonetheless admired for his unaffected manner.

Dou Gu's son Biao had died before him, so although he received posthumous honours as a marquis the fief was ended at his death. -HHS 23/13:809-811*.

Dou Huizong 寶會宗; Youfufeng. Son of Dou Wanquan, he inherited his fief. -HHS 23/13:809.

Dou Ji 寶機 (d.168); Youfufeng. Son of Dou Wu and brother of the regent Dowager, in 168 Dou Ji was appointed as a Palace Attendant and received a county fief for his nominal role in bringing Liu Hong, Emperor Ling, to the throne. He was killed when the Dou were destroyed later that year. -HHS 69/59:2241, HHJ 22:259.

Dou Jia 寶嘉; Youfufeng. Youngest son of Dou Mu, in 71 Dou Jia was enfeoffed as a county marquis to maintain the lineage of his grandfather Dou Rong. He shared in the family's loss of favour under Emperor Ming, but in the late 70s their fortunes were restored through the appointment of Dou Jia's niece the Lady Dou as the consort of Emperor Zhang. In 88 the Empress Dou became regent Dowager for the young Emperor He, and Dou Jia became Minister Steward. When Emperor He destroyed the power of the family in 92 Dou Jia was dismissed and sent to his fief in Lujiang. -HHS 23/13:809 & 819.

A memorial presented in 232 by the official Du Shu 杜恕 to Cao Rui, Emperor of Wei, says that on one occasion Dou Jia had recommended the appointment of a nephew of the Minister of Justice Guo Gong and that he was criticised for such favouritism; this may have been among the accusations at the time of his dismissal in 92. -SGZ 16:504; Fang 52:382.

Dou Jian 寶建 or Liu Jian 劉建. Dou Jian's family is not known, but he held a marquisate in the early 70s, at the time of the alleged conspiracy involving Liu Ying the King of Chu. Implicated by the confessions of Yan Zhong and Wang Ping, Dou Jian and others were liable to execution, but the censorial officer Han Lang persuaded Emperor Ming to doubt the accusation. - HHJ 10:123, HHSJJ 41/31:1506.

Dou Jing 寶景 (d.92); Youfufeng. Son of Dou Xun, when his sister the Lady Dou became the consort of Emperor Zhang in 78 he and his brothers Dou Xian, Dou Du and Dou Xiang were favoured as her male relatives, and in 88 Dou Jing and Dou Xiang were both granted court rank by the emperor's testamentary edict.

With their sister as regent Dowager the family became still more powerful, and Dou Jing was named a Palace Attendant. The brothers dominated the court and the capital, using official corvée labour to build great mansions and gathering armies of retainers to plunder the people, but Dou Jing was considered the most violent and oppressive of them. After Dou Xian's triumphant campaign against the Northern Xiongnu in 89, his three brothers were enfeoffed and appointed as Palace Attendants, and after the final victory in 91 Dou Jing was appointed Bearer of the Mace, in charge of police within the capital. On this basis he called up elite cavalry from the northern frontier to form a private guard, while inside Luoyang he allowed his slaves, clients and troopers to rob people, free criminals and either rape women or force them into marriage. Traders closed their businesses in fear of him, but no-one dared present an impeachment.

The Excellency Yuan An made repeated protests, both against the illegitimate use of military resources and against the failure of local officials to control the activities of the brothers. At first his memorials had no effect, but the Dowager later removed Dou Jing from office: he maintained his position at court as Specially Advanced, but had no executive power.

In 92, with the aid of the eunuch Zheng Chong, Emperor He carried out a coup against the Dou family. Dou Jing and his brothers were stripped of their offices and sent away to their fiefs, and all except Dou Xiang committed suicide or were killed on the road. -HHS 23/13:813-820, 45/35:1519-20; Ch'ü 72:461-462.

Dou Jing 竇靖; Youfufeng. A nephew of Dou Wu, in 168 Dou Jing was awarded a district fief for his nominal role in bringing Liu Hong, Emperor Ling, to the throne. He was also appointed a Palace Attendant and given command of a troop in the Feathered Forest cavalry. He was presumably killed when the eunuchs destroyed Dou Wu and Chen Fan later that year. -HHS 69/59:2241.

Dou Ke 竇恪; Youfufeng. Son of Dou Wu, he probably died before 168, when his sister the Lady Dou Miao became Dowager. -HHJ 22:259.

Dou Lin 竇林 (d.59); Youfufeng. HHS 23/13 describes Dou Lin as the son of a cousin of Dou Rong. The family genealogy in XTS 71B:2289 says he was the second son of Dou Xiu 秀, who was elder brother to Dou Rong's father Dou Fu 敷, and that he had a brother Dou Pi 丕; the latter two names are not mentioned elsewhere.

Dou Lin was an Internuncio under Emperor Guangwu. In 58 he was appointed by Emperor Ming to the restored position of Protector of the Qiang. Setting his headquarters in Longxi, he established trust among the non-Chinese people and received the surrender of the chieftain Dian'an. Wrongly advised by his officers, he believed Dian'an to be the leader of all the Qiang rebels, and granted him titles accordingly.

In the following year Dian'an's brother Dianyu, who was indeed the chief, came in turn to surrender, and Dou Lin now presented him as the leader. When Emperor Ming asked how there could be two paramount chiefs, Dou Lin claimed they were in fact the same man, and that the different names were caused by confusion in the local dialects. The emperor investigated further, found out the truth, and dismissed Dou Lin from his post. Just at this time, moreover, the Inspector of Liang province accused Dou Lin of bribery; he was sent to prison and died there. The scandal made Emperor Ming suspicious of all the Dou family. -HHS 87/77:880-81, 23/13:808; deC 84:83-84.

XTS 71B says that Dou Lin settled in Wuwei and became the ancestor of the family of that name in that territory.

Dou Miao 竇妙, the Lady (d.172); Youfufeng. Eldest daughter of Dou Wu, she joined the harem of Emperor Huan in 165, perhaps at the time of the regular autumn selection, in which case she would have been some thirteen sui. She was promptly appointed an Honoured Lady, highest rank of concubine, and on 10 December 165 she was proclaimed empress in succession to the Lady Deng Mengnü who had been disgraced, imprisoned and had died earlier in the same year.

The arrangement was not so straightforward as the Chinese records indicate. It is clear that the Lady Dou had been forced upon the emperor by his senior ministers, notably the Grand Commandant Chen Fan and the Director of Retainers Ying Feng. Emperor Huan's own preference was for his concubine the Lady Tian Sheng, who shared his bed and his favours with eight companions, while he had shown no interest in the Lady Dou and attended her very rarely, if at all. The argument of his ministers was that it was essential for the dynasty that the emperor take a woman of good family as his consort, and the Dou were presented as a most appropriate alliance.

There seems no doubt the Lady Tian was of humble origin, but the former Empress Deng Mengnü had been criticised, surprisingly, on the same grounds. Deng Mengnü had been related to the Dowager Deng of Emperor He and the Lady Dou was connected to the Dowager Dou of Emperor Zhang; both families had suffered disgrace and loss of political favour, and the fathers of both women had held only minor official rank. One must assume it was simple prejudice which led contemporary commentators to denigrate the family of the Lady Deng and praise that of the Lady Dou.

From the point of view of the dynasty, moreover, the arguments for a woman of good family are strange. In 159 the emperor had been able to gather supporters among the eunuchs of the harem to overthrow the power of the Liang family, which had dominated the government since the days of his predecessor Emperor Shun [see sub Liang Na], while his first empress Liang Nüying had been responsible for the miscarriage or abortion of any children he might have conceived with other women of the harem. One would imagine that the last thing Emperor Huan would wish to inflict upon his lineage was another generation of aristocratic relatives by marriage; it is likely the Lady Tian Sheng and her eight companions were engaged not only for their qualities as sexual partners, but also in the hope that one of the magical number nine might conceive a son.

Emperor Huan, however, was in a weak position. There had been many complaints about the size and expense of his harem, while several of his eunuch favourites had lately been disgraced for corruption. The fall of the Empress Deng gave the reform party at court the opportunity to press for a new influence within the palace, and they evidently regarded Dou Wu as a supporter of their cause. So the emperor was obliged to accept their wishes, though he still showed no interest in his new empress, and seldom if ever visited her. Even more important, though two daughters were born about this time, he acquired no son and heir.

It has been suggested that the Empress Dou had some influence on the emperor's patronage of the cult of Huang-Lao which culminated in a great ceremony of sacrifice at the capital in the summer of 166. It is more probable that his initial interest had been inspired by the Empress Deng and some eunuch officials, and developed further not in association with the Dou but rather in opposition to the Confucianism represented by Dou Wu and his ministerial allies. It may even be that the emperor was seeking an alternative source of spiritual legitimacy for his personal regime which would be independent of the traditional ideology. See sub Deng Mengnü and especially deC 80.

On 25 January 168 the emperor died. From his death-bed he promoted Tian Sheng and her colleagues to be Honoured Ladies, but even as his body lay in state within the palace the Empress Dou, now Dowager, killed Tian Sheng. Through the intervention of the eunuchs Guan Ba and Su Kang she was obliged to spare the lives of the other eight favourites, but the Dowager and her father Dou Wu now controlled the government.

As the emperor had died without an heir, the customs of Han, confirmed by the recent precedent of the Dowager Liang Na, allowed the Lady Dou a free choice among the cadets of the imperial house. Probably still aged no more than twenty, she consulted her father within the private apartments of the palace. They were chiefly interested in descendants of Liu Kai [or Gong] the King of Hejian, a son of Emperor Zhang of Later Han, and sought the advice of the Imperial Clerk Liu Shu, a member of the Censorate who came from that territory. On his recommendation they chose the village marquis Liu Hong, and on 17 February 168 he was brought to the throne; he is commonly known by his posthumous title as Emperor Ling.

We are told that Liu Shu was asked to propose members of the imperial clan noted for their moral qualities, but it is difficult to see how such criteria should have led necessarily to Liu Hong. The new emperor was twelve sui when he was placed upon the throne, so he was little more than ten years old by Western reckoning at the time he was chosen. A great-grandson of Liu Kai, Liu Hong was a member of the same lineage as his predecessor Emperor Huan, but Liu Hong's grandfather, a younger son, had held only a village marquisate, neither he nor Liu Hong's father had shown any personal distinction, and Liu Hong's own later conduct was not exemplary. As in the cases of Liu Zuan and of Liu Zhi, future Emperor Huan, a generation earlier, one may assume that in the eyes of his sponsors Liu Hong's chief recommendations were that he was old enough to be past the risks of infant mortality, and young enough to require the guidance of a regent, thus ensuring the hegemony of the Dowager's clan for some years to come [see sub Liang Na].

The Dowager and her father now arranged enfeoffments and rewards for their relatives and clients and, like the Liang before them, members of the Dou family held significant military and police appointments about the capital. Dou Wu became General-in-Chief, the same position as had been held by Liang Ji, and he established a close partnership with Chen Fan, now Grand Tutor; the two men shared control over the Secretariat, centre of imperial authority. In accordance with the wishes of the Confucian reformers, Dou Wu and Chen Fan planned to destroy the power of the eunuchs. Under the influence of Cao Jie, however, the Dowager rejected her father's proposals. As months passed, the frustration of Chen Fan and his party became more obvious and Dou Wu prepared for a coup.

In the autumn of 168 the eunuchs struck first. They persuaded the boy emperor to issue orders to overthrow their enemies, they arrested Chen Fan, and with the aid of the frontier general Zhang Huan they persuaded Dou Wu's men to desert him. Dou Wu committed suicide, others of the family were killed, and remnant relatives and clients were exiled to the far south of the empire in present-day Vietnam. Chen Fan was killed, with many of his supporters, and there was a general Proscription against all the reformist party.

Stripped of her seal and insignia, the Lady Dou was placed under house arrest in the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang. She was not treated well by her eunuch jailers and, though Zhang Huan protested and the emperor himself gave orders, her situation did not greatly improve. At the beginning of winter in 171 Emperor Ling made a special visit and held court to pay respects to her for having brought him to the throne, and the eunuch Dong Meng again raised the matter of her ill-treatment. The emperor gave increasing quantities of supplies and provisions, but Cao Jie and Wang Fu avenged themselves by trumping up charges of Impiety against Dong Meng; he was executed.

Hou Lan succeeded Cao Jie in authority at the Changle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager, and in 172, when the Dowager's mother died in exile in the south, it is said that she became ill from grief. She died on 18 July, and may have been assisted to her end. About this time Hou Lan was accused of acting without proper authority; he was dismissed and obliged to kill himself. This may be on account of his harsh treatment of the Lady Dou, or because he was made a scapegoat for her death, but it is uncertain whether she died before or after he was punished.

The eunuchs, enemies to the last, argued that the Dowager's funerary rites should be carried out with no more ceremony than for an Honoured Lady, but after debate in court between eunuchs and senior ministers, Emperor Ling determined she should receive full honours, and the Lady Dou was placed in the same tomb as her consort Emperor Huan. -HHS 10B:445-46*; deC 75B, deC 89:64-126, Seidel 69, Ch'ü 72:484-490.

Dou Mu 竇穆; Youfufeng. Son of Dou Rong, Dou Mu married a grand-daughter of Emperor Guangwu and succeeded his uncle Dou You as Colonel of the City Gates. The Dou family had been honoured and powerful under Guangwu, but Emperor Ming regarded them less favourably. Dou Rong pleaded age and illness and kept in the background, but Dou Mu and other kinsmen showed no such restraint, encouraging favourites and clients and interfering with the regular administration.

In particular, seeking to round out the fief territory which the family had been granted in Lujiang, the Dou group forged an edict as from the Dowager Yin of Emperor Guangwu, ordering Liu Xu the Marquis of Liu'an to divorce his wife, then had him marry a daughter of Dou Mu. The family of the former wife reported this to the throne in 61, and Emperor Ming was furious. He dismissed Dou Mu and his relatives from all their offices, and ordered them back to their homelands in Youfufeng. They were recalled before they had gone far, but because of their record the emperor appointed an Internuncio specifically to supervise the family.

Some ten years later, about 70, the Internuncio Han Yu reported that Dou Mu and his kinsfolk were resentful of their treatment. Emperor Ming again sent them away from the capital, and soon afterwards Dou Mu was found guilty of attempting to bribe a local officer. He and his son Xuan were arrested, and they died in prison in Youfufeng. -HHS 23/13:808-09.

Dou Qian 竇潛; Youfufeng. Dou Qian was a son of Dou Jia. -XTS 71B:2289.

Dou Rong 竇融 [Zhougong 周公] (15 BC-AD 62); Youfufeng. Dou Rong claimed descent from Dou

Guangguo 廣國, brother of the consort of Emperor Wen of Former Han. The family transferred to the region of Chang'an in the latter part of the first century BC, and Dou Rong's father and grandfather both held senior appointments, but his father died when he was young and the family was comparatively poor. [According to the genealogy in XTS 71B:2289, Dou Rong was the third son of Dou Fu 敷, and brother of Dou Pingnian 平年 and Dou You 友. The last is confirmed by HHS 23/13, but the other names are not recorded elsewhere.]

Having held junior staff rank, Dou Rong served in the army as a major against rebels in AD 6. He gained a reputation for courage and honesty and received a noble title. His younger sister married the Excellency Wang Yi 王邑 and Dou Rong held high position in the capital, where he was known for family loyalty and good conduct.

In 23 Dou Rong led a contingent to join the army led by Wang Yi and Wang Xun 王尋 against the rebels in the eastern provinces, but they were heavily defeated by Han forces at Kunyang in Yingchuan. The Xin forces withdrew to Chang'an, and as the Han troops entered the passes Dou Rong was made a general and stationed to the east of the capital.

After Wang Mang was killed at Chang'an Dou Rong brought his troops and surrendered to Zhao Meng, the influential minister of the Gengshi regime. Zhao Meng thought well of him, and he had Dou Rong appointed as a colonel and then offered the post of Administrator of Julu. Dou Rong felt that the east was not secure, and since members of his family had held office in the northwest of Liang province he asked for a post in that region. So Zhao Meng had him appointed as Commandant of the Dependent State of Zhangye, and Dou Rong went there with his family.

Dou Rong established excellent relations with the local people, with the non-Chinese Qiang, and with his neighbouring administrators and commandants: Liang Tong and Zhu Zeng of Jiuquan, She Jun of Jincheng, Shi Bao of Zhangye and Xin Rong of Dunhuang.

When the Gengshi regime was destroyed in 25, Dou Rong persuaded Liang Tong and the others that they should unite for mutual support, and he was recognised in the acting position of Chief General West of the River 河西大將軍. While his colleagues all became administrators, Dou Rong remained at his headquarters in the Dependent State, but exercised hegemonic authority over the Gansu corridor northwest of the Yellow River. He trained soldiers to maintain defence against the non-Chinese, and many refugees came to the region from Anding, Beidi and Shang commanderies.

As Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, took the imperial title and began to extend his power, the warlord Wei Ao in the eastern part of Liang province accepted his calendar and issued seals in the name of Han, but was reluctant to commit himself fully. Dou Rong likewise accepted Han suzerainty and paid respects to Wei Ao as his formal superior. There was, however, a natural hostility between them.

In 29 Wei Ao sent an envoy to argue that the northeast should unite and remain independent, but though various leaders had differing opinions Dou Rong was anxious to return to the east and secure the fortunes of his family under the new dynasty. That summer he sent his officer Liu Jun with a message to Luoyang and a gift of horses, while other chieftains also sent envoys. Guangwu had just sent his own messenger, but he turned back to escort Dou Rong's party. They were welcomed most warmly, and the emperor responded with a gift of gold and a letter which confirmed Dou Rong's position as a chief general in the northwest and also named him Governor of Liang province, in despite of an earlier commission to Wei Ao.

Guangwu made it clear that he sought Dou Rong's support, and Dou Rong replied with a reminder of his family service to the throne and the connection by marriage, while he undertook to send his younger brother You as a hostage. About this time Dou Rong received envoys from King Kang of Suoju [Yarkand] and other rulers of the Western Regions, and he acted on Guangwu's behalf in endorsing their submission.

Dou Rong also sent a letter to Wei Ao, reprimanding him for his failure to accept the Han, and he gathered troops for operations against him. He also attacked the Qiang leader Fenghe, who had taken over Jincheng and was an ally of Wei Ao. He drove the tribesmen away and occupied the territory up to the Yellow River, but when the first imperial attack on Wei Ao was driven back in 30 he withdrew from the border, while Dou You was obliged to turn back and did not come to serve as a hostage at Luoyang.

Guangwu continued to show favour to Dou Rong. He repaired the grave of Dou Rong's father, held a great sacrifice, and sent valuable gifts, with texts and charts on the connection of his family to the throne. For his part, Dou Rong cut all links with Wei Ao, killed his envoy and returned the seals he had received, then brought troops from the five commanderies of the northwest to support the abortive campaign of 31.

In the summer of 32, as a further imperial offensive was launched, Dou Rong brought another army, with Qiang and Little Yuezhi allies and a supply train of five thousand carts, to meet Guangwu in Anding. He was received with great ceremony and private show of affection and confidence, and his relatives were given positions at court. After the fall of Wei Ao in the following year Dou Rong was enfeoffed as a marquis with revenue from four counties in Lujiang, while his brother You and his attendant administrators received marquises of title. Dou Rong expressed concern at such generosity, but Guangwu assured him that he looked upon their relationship as close as the right hand to the left. One may note that the site of Dou Rong's fief was far to the east of his centre of current power, which must have encouraged his commitment to the central government.

In 36, after the destruction of Gongsun Shu, Dou Rong came to the capital with an enormous cortège. As he reached the gates of Luoyang, he surrendered his office as Governor of Liang province and Commandant of the Dependent State of Zhangye, together with the insignia of his marquise. An imperial messenger restored them, and added the title Servant at Court, exempting him from the requirement to reside on his fief. Dou Rong was received in audience by the emperor and shown utmost honour and favour. In 37 he was named Governor of Ji province in the east, and was named Excellency of Works a few days later. He expressed embarrassment at being placed above long-term companions of the emperor, and several times asked to resign, but Guangwu refused to listen.

As Excellency, in 37 Dou Rong endorsed the enfeoffment of Guangwu's sons as kings, and in 43 he recommended on arrangements for the Imperial Ancestral Temple. In 44, however, his colleague the Excellency over the Masses Dai She was involved in some wrong-doing, probably a mistaken censorial accusation [see sub Xi She] and both he and Dou Rong were dismissed on grounds of collegial responsibility; the third Excellency, Wu Han, was ill and soon to die, so he was spared the penalty.

In 45 Dou Rong's marquise was enhanced by the title Specially Advanced, the most senior rank permitted to remain at the capital, and in 47 he became acting Minister of the Guards and also Court Architect. Dou You was appointed Colonel of the City Gates at about the same time, so both brothers commanded security forces at the capital. Dou Rong asked to resign, but Guangwu gave him presents instead, and when Dou You died soon afterwards he sent messengers with condolences.

By the end of the reign of Emperor Guangwu Dou Rong's son Mu, his grandson Xun and his nephew Gu had all married into the imperial house, while besides his position as Excellency and his own great fief the family had another marquise and four officials ranked at Two Thousand shi. They were also extremely wealthy, with mansions at Luoyang and thousands of slaves. The alliance had been valuable twenty years earlier, but Dou Rong had built upon it to a remarkable level.

Guangwu's son and successor, Emperor Ming, was less sympathetic. In 58 Dou Rong's nephew the Protector of the Qiang Dou Lin was dismissed and disgraced, and the emperor reprimanded Dou Rong. Dou Rong was frightened and asked to resign his offices; he was permitted to retire to his residence on grounds of ill health and some months later he returned his insignia as Minister of the Guards and was rewarded with gifts. Now elderly, Dou Rong lived quietly, but younger members of his family were less restrained.

In 61, when his son Dou Mu and the others were disgraced and sent briefly from the capital, Dou Rong was given special permission to remain. He died about his time at the age of seventy-eight and was interred with high honours, but his widow was exiled from the capital in the early 70s after the final fall of Dou Mu.

Bielenstein has discussed the background of Dou Rong's family as one of the national gentries of Former Han, and noted the significance of the faction which he founded in Later Han, rivalling that of Ma Yuan. The disgrace under Emperor Ming was accompanied by the establishment of the Empress Ma, but the Dou regained their power when Dou Rong's great-granddaughter became the empress of Emperor Zhang in 78. Thereafter the family continued as one of the most distinguished in the empire, with clear rights of inter-marriage to the imperial clan. -HHS 23/13:795-

Dou Shang 竇尙; Youfufeng. The genealogy of the Dou family in XTS 71B:2289 says that Dou Shang was the son of Dou Xuan and that about 70, following the disgrace and death of his grandfather Dou Mu and his father Dou Xuan, he took refuge in the area of Longxi. He became the founder of a separate lineage in that region.

Dou Shao 竇紹 (d.168); Youfufeng. Eldest son or possibly a nephew of Dou Wu, father of the Lady Dou Miao, Empress of Emperor Huan, during the last years of the reign of Emperor Huan Dou Shao was General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger. When the emperor died in 168 the Empress Dou became regent Dowager for the young Emperor Ling. Dou Shao was made a colonel in the Northern Army and received enfeoffment for his nominal role in the selection of the new ruler. In contrast to the apparent frugality of Dou Wu, Dou Shao was known for his extravagant and wasteful conduct.

In the autumn, as the eunuchs launched their coup Dou Wu took refuge in Dou Shao's camp, and when messengers were sent to call for their surrender they shot and killed them. Summoning the troops of the Northern Army, they gathered several thousand men on the open ground before the Capital Hostel, but when they were faced by palace forces under the frontier general Zhang Huan, their men deserted them. Dou Shao and Dou Wu fled, were chased and surrounded. Both men committed suicide, and their heads were put on display. -HHJ 22:259, HHS 69/59:2239-44; deC 89.99-100.

Dou Shi 竇士; Youfufeng. When Dou Rong brought his troops to join Guangwu for operations against Wei Ao in 32, his cousin Dou Shi was appointed a Palace Counsellor. Dou Tao 竇陶; Youfufeng. XTS 71B:2289 says that Dou Tao was the eldest son of Dou Zhang and brother of Dou Tang.

Dou Tong 竇統 [Jingdao 敬道]; Youfufeng. XTS 71B:

2289 says that Dou Tong was the youngest son of Dou Zhang and brother of Dou Tang, that he was appointed Administrator of Yanmen. After the overthrow of Dou Wu in 168, Dou Tong fled to the Xianbi, and held territorial command under the alien state.

XTS further says that Dou Tong's son Bin 賓 inherited his position, and the table continues with an account of his descendants, but it evidently omits some generations.

Dou Wanquan 竇萬全; Youfufeng. Son of Dou Jia, Dou Wanquan inherited the family marquisate. He was exiled to his fief in Lujiang after the coup by Emperor He in 92, but in 109 an edict of the regent Dowager Deng authorised his return to the capital. -HHS 23/13:809 & 820.

Dou Wu 竇武 [Youping 游平] (d.168); Youfufeng. Son of Dou Feng and a descendant of Dou Rong, who had been an ally of the founding Emperor Guangwu of Later Han, Dou Wu was a collateral relative of the Empress of Emperor Zhang who had been regent for the young Emperor He and whose family controlled the government until the overthrow of their power in 92. Though the family had not recovered its position at the capital, the Dou retained personal influence and considerable wealth in their home country about Chang'an, and Dou Wu's father was a commandery administrator.

Dou Wu became known as a scholar of the classics, living in a marshland with a private academy of a hundred students. He initially took no interest in politics, but in 165 his eldest daughter Miao entered the harem of Emperor Huan and was appointed an Honoured Lady. Dou Wu then came to Luoyang as a cadet gentleman, and when she was proclaimed empress at the end of the year he was made colonel of a regiment in the Northern Army and received a county fief with revenue from five thousand households. On the politics of the enthronement, see sub the Lady Dou Miao.

Dou Wu was later promoted Colonel of the City Gates, responsible for the outer defences of the capital. He gave patronage to students and junior clerks, recommending many for promotion and distributing rewards and subsidies, while his own style of life was simple and plain. With a fine reputation and many recipients of his bounty, he confirmed his alliance with Chen Fan and other leading officials and established a substantial position at court. At the time of the First Faction Incident in 166-167, when the eunuchs had Li Ying and other critics arrested and Chen Fan was dismissed for protesting, Dou Wu made an eloquent submission, threatening to resign his office and his fief, and obtained the release of the prisoners. He also urged the emperor to employ better men as his senior officials, and made specific recommendations. Predictably, Emperor Huan was not pleased at this political activity, and he had no fondness for the empress.

Emperor Huan died on 25 January 168 and the Lady Dou, now Dowager, held authority in the government. Since the emperor had died without an heir, the Dowager could choose his successor from among any cadets of the imperial house; the young woman consulted her father within the private apartments of the palace. Despite his association with the outer court and bureaucracy, Dou Wu did not involve any senior ministers in the selection. He and his daughter were chiefly interested in descendants of Liu Kai the King of Hejian, a son of Emperor Zhang of Later Han, and they sought the advice of the Imperial Clerk Liu Shu, member of the Censorate, who came from that territory. Liu Shu proposed the village marquis Liu Hong and was sent with an escort to bring him to the capital. On 17 February 168 the ten-year-old Liu Hong, Emperor Ling, was placed upon the throne.

With his family established in power, Dou Wu and his daughter arranged enfeoffments and rewards for their relatives and clients and, like the Liang before them, members of the family received significant military and police appointments about the capital. Dou Wu himself became General-in-Chief, the same position formerly held by Liang Ji, brother of the empresses Liang Na and Liang Nüying, which gave nominal command over the Northern Army, the major professional force at the capital. He established a close partnership with Chen Fan, now Grand Tutor, and these two men, with the Excellency Hu Guang, shared control over the Secretariat, centre of imperial authority. Under their aegis Li Ying and other members of the Proscribed Party were brought back to the capital and given high office.

For a few months there was a sense of confidence that the government and the court would be reformed on idealistic Confucian lines, but a major obstacle was the influence of the harem eunuchs who had acquired power through the favour of Emperor Huan. Chen Fan persuaded Dou Wu that they should be purged, but under the influence of Cao Jie the Dowager rejected her father's proposals and continued to protect her attendants. As time passed the frustration of Chen Fan and the reformers became obvious, and Dou Wu prepared for a coup to bring swift and bloody resolution to the stalemate.

In the autumn of 168 matters came to a head. Through his agents Shan Bing and Yin Xun, Dou Wu recommended the arrest of Cao Jie and Wang Fu, but then he then went back to bed; and during the night the eunuchs ran a counter-coup against him. Persuading the boy Emperor Ling to support them, they seized the Dowager's seal, took control of the palaces, and arrested the elderly Chen Fan as he sought to attack them. Dou Wu and his nephew Dou Shao gathered troops from the Northern Army, but they were faced by imperial orders and by the frontier general Zhang Huan, who had been persuaded to oppose the traitor. Dou Wu's men deserted him and Dou Wu and Dou Shao committed suicide.

As Dou Wu's head and that of his son were exposed at the Capital Hostel, central police station of the city, where the confrontation had taken place, other members of the family were executed and remnant relatives and clients were exiled to the far south. Chen Fan and many of his supporters among the officials were killed, and there was a second Proscription against the reformists throughout the empire. -HHS 69/59:2239-44*, 10B:445-46, XC 4:11a; deC 75A, deC 89:64, 88-102, 121-126, Ch'ü 72:484-490, Bn 76: 95-98.

When the Dou family was destroyed by the eunuchs in 168, the Lady was exiled to the far south. She died there in 172 and it is said that when her daughter the Dowager heard it she died of grief 以憂死; this latter death may have been assisted. -HHS 10B:446.

Dou Xian 竇憲 [Bodu 伯度] (d.92); Youfufeng. Eldest son of Dou Xun, Dou Xian was left an orphan when his father was disgraced and died about 70, but the family fortunes were restored when his two sisters entered the imperial harem in 77 and the elder became empress to Emperor Zhang in the following year. Dou Xian and his brothers Du, Jing and Xiang were favoured as her male relatives. Dou Xian was first appointed a gentleman cadet, then Palace Attendant, and then General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger in command of palace guards. His younger brothers received comparable honours, but Dou Xian was leader of the clan.

Within the court, imperial kinsmen and the former consort families Yin and Ma were all intimidated by the Dou, and Dou Xian forced the Princess Liu Zhi, daughter of Emperor Ming, to sell him a pleasure ground at an unfairly low price. Emperor Zhang found out and was furious. He was going to make an example of him, and Dou Xian was terrified. His sister the empress apologised and persuaded her husband not to take the matter so far, but Dou Xian was compelled to return the property and he received no positions of importance.

After the death of Emperor Zhang in 88 Dou Xian's sister became regent Dowager for the young Emperor He, and Dou Xian acted as her agent in dealing with the officers of state. He also had the former Grand Commandant Deng Biao named Grand Tutor for the new reign, and thus held influence both inside and outside the palace. Dou Xian was cruel and impatient, and no-one at court dared withstand him when he was angry. He sent his retainers to kill a son of the former Intendant Han Yu, who had been involved in the interrogation of his father Dou Xun years before, then had the young man's head presented as an offering to Dou Xun's grave.

The marquis Liu Chang, son of Liu Shi the King of Qi, came to Luoyang with a formal message of condolence for the death of Emperor Zhang. A man of depraved character, Liu Chang had visited the capital several times before, and he now gained admission to the palace and to the favour of the Dowager. Concerned that Liu Chang might become a rival for influence with his sister, Dou Xian sent retainers to kill him, then sought to put the blame upon Liu Chang's brother Gang. Through the efforts of the clerical officer He Chang, the whole affair was found out, there was a great scandal and Dou Xian was placed under house arrest in the palace.

Just at this time the Shanyu Tuntuhe of the Southern Xiongnu sent a memorial to the throne, reporting turmoil amongst the Northern Xiongnu and proposing a decisive campaign to take over the steppe. Warmly supported by the general Geng Bing, the plan was opposed by senior ministers, but the Dowager saw it as a means to cover the family embarrassment by giving her brother an opportunity for military glory. Dou Xian was named General of Chariots and Cavalry to lead the expedition, with Geng Bing as second-in-command.

The army was prepared during the winter of 88. The core of the force was provided by troops from the five regiments of the Northern Army, the professional elite force normally stationed at the capital which formed the central strategic reserve of the empire. To these were added regular troops from the great base and training camps of Liyang in Wei commandery and Yong in Youfufeng, the army commanded by the General on the Liao in Wuyuan, and levies from frontier commanderies. Besides the main force of the Southern Xiongnu there were also auxiliaries from the Qiang and other tribespeople. The total force numbered some forty thousand.

In the summer of 89 four columns passed out from the frontier to gather at Zhuoye Mountain, in the Gurvan Sayhan Uul range, first high ground on the way into Mongolia. From this concentration point a large detachment commanded by the senior colonel Yan Pan was sent northwest. Defeating the Northern Shanyu at Jiluo Mountain, they pursued him into the Altai ranges, and it is said that they captured a million head of horses, cattle, sheep and camels, killed over thirteen thousand men, and received the surrender of two hundred thousand people from eighty-one tribal groups. This broke the power of the northern state, and Dou Xian and Geng Bing led the main army north in a triumphal progress. Burning the sacred site of Longcheng, in the autumn they erected a celebratory stele at Mount Yanran in the Hangayn Nuruu range. Composed by the historian Ban Gu, the inscription described how the army of Han had come more than three thousand li beyond the frontiers and traversed all the lands of the empire held by the great Shanyu Modun 冒頓 in the early second century BC.

As Dou Xian returned to Wuyuan, he sent two envoys, Wu Si and Liang Feng, to offer the Northern Shanyu gifts of gold brocade and a summons to surrender. The Shanyu agreed, but as he approached he heard the Han troops had withdrawn. Still in the Altai, he decided to wait. He did send a younger brother as envoy and hostage, but Dou Xian insisted he come in person. Even as these negotiations were in train, the Southern Shanyu Tuntuhe sent eight thousand cavalry under the prince Shizi to accompany the Emissary Geng Tan in an attack on the Northern headquarters. Putting the Shanyu to flight, they seized his seal and treasury, his wife and family, and several thousand of his subjects.

Dou Xian had sent Liang Feng and Ban Gu on a second embassy to the Shanyu, but by the time they arrived Geng Tan and Shizi had driven him away. The envoys returned, and Dou Xian recommended that the Shanyu was now too weak to be worth dealing with; he should be finally eliminated. In the autumn of 91 the colonel Geng Kui attacked and destroyed the remnants of the Northern court. The Shanyu fled to the west and was not heard of again.

Dou Xian planned to set up a puppet court for the Northern Xiongnu, parallel to that of the south, with the prince Atong as his preferred candidate. Yuan An and others argued that this would break faith with the Southern Shanyu, long-time ally of Han, and though Dou Xian won the debate he was obliged to accept the prince Yuchujian, younger brother of the recent Shanyu, instead of Atong. The new arrangement lasted only a year.

Dou Xian's victories were generously rewarded. After his initial success in 90 he was greeted by imperial messengers appointing him General-in-Chief and granting him a county marquis with revenue from 20,000 households. Dou Xian refused the fief, but the position of General-in-Chief was raised: in the past it had been below the Excellencies, with staff equivalent to that of the Grand Commandant, but Dou Xian now ranked next only to the Grand Tutor, while the number and salaries of his staff were vastly augmented. At the same time rewards were issued to his troops and appointments given to those heads of commanderies who had supported the great enterprise.

The Dou faction now dominated the court, with Geng Kui and Deng Die in military authority, the clerical officers Ban Gu and Fu Yi controlling the affairs of the Secretariat, and numbers of clients in positions of authority within and outside the capital. Dou Xian's brothers received fiefs of 6,000 households each, Dou Du and Dou Xiang were ministers, and Dou Jing was Bearer of the Mace until his excess of corruption rendered it politic to remove him from executive power. Dou Xian's uncles Dou Ba, Dou Bao and Dou Jia likewise held ministerial rank or its equivalent, and another dozen of the family were appointed to high office in the court and the administration. Within the palace itself, Guo Ju, Deng Die's brother Deng Lie and other allies held great influence with the Dowager Dou, and there were allegations of sexual and political intrigue.

At this time, while Dou Xian was still with the army in the northwest, the young Emperor He was able to gather support among a group of eunuchs led by Zheng Zhong to free himself from the control of these over-mighty subjects. In the summer of 92, as Dou Xian returned to the capital, he was welcomed by the Minister Herald with an imperial donation for each of his men. As he entered the palace, however, imperial orders called the palace police and the troops of the Northern Army to guard the gates while Deng Die, Deng Lei, Guo Ju and other associates of the Dowager Dou were arrested and executed. The Supervisor of Internuncios was then sent to strip Dou Xian of his insignia as General-in-Chief. Dou Xian's fief was changed, and he and his brothers were sent from the capital.

In a show of respect for the Dowager, Emperor He did not formally order her brothers' execution, but as they arrived at their estates Dou Xian, Dou Du and Dou Jing were compelled to commit suicide. Because of his good reputation, Dou Xiang escaped that immediate fate, but he and other associates of the family were dismissed and likewise expelled. -HHS 23/13:813-20*, 43/33:1483; deC 84:266-275, Ch'ü 72:460-464.

Dou Xiang 寶翔. Administrator of Kuaiji in the 30s, he appointed Zhongli Yi as his Officer of Merit. -HHSJJ 41/31:1493 Hui Dong quoting the Secondary Biography of Zhongli Yi.

Dou Xiang 寶瓌 (d.98); Youfufeng. Son of Dou Xun, he was left an orphan by the forced death of his father. In 78 his sister became the consort of Emperor Zhang, and Dou Xiang and his brothers Dou Xian, Dou Du and Dou Jing were favoured as her male relatives. Fond of Confucian scholarship, during the early 80s Dou Xiang was Administrator in Wei commandery and then in Yingchuan.

In 88 Emperor Zhang's testamentary edict recommended Dou Jing and Dou Xiang be granted court rank, and with their sister as regent Dowager for the young Emperor He the family became increasingly powerful. Dominating the court and the capital, the brothers built great mansions and gathered hosts of retainers. All were accused of misusing imperial property and plundering people, but Dou Xiang was more restrained than his elders.

Following Dou Xian's triumphant campaign against the Northern Xiongnu in 89, his three brothers were enfeoffed and Dou Xiang became Commandant of Attendant Cavalry. After the final victory in 91 Dou Xiang was made Minister of the Household, with great authority in the capital.

In 92, with the aid of the eunuch Zheng Chong, Emperor He carried out a coup against the Dou. The brothers were stripped of their offices and sent away to their fiefs, and all except Dou Xiang committed suicide or were killed on the road. Recognised for his previous good conduct, he escaped death, but in the following year he was charged with making grants to the poor, outside the authority of a marquis. His fief was transferred to Changsha, and it was ordered that he should have no authority over any officials of his territory.

In 98, following the death of the Dowager Dou in the previous year, the family of the Lady Liang, natural mother of Emperor He, was restored to favour, and Liang Tang and his brothers, uncles of the emperor, were brought back from their exile in Jiuzhen. On their way through Changsha they called at the estate of Dou Xiang and forced him to kill himself. -HHS 23/13:813-820; Ch'ü 72:462.

Dou Xuan 寶宣; Youfufeng. Son of Dou Mu, he shared in the family loss of favour and exile under Emperor Ming. About 70, Dou Mu was found guilty of attempting to bribe a local officer in Youfufeng. Dou Xuan was arrested with him and they both died in prison. -HHS 23/13:809.

Dou Xun 寶勳; Youfufeng. Son of Dou Mu, he married a daughter of Liu Qiang the son of Emperor Guangwu. When his father and other members of the family were disgraced and sent back to their home country about 70, Dou Xun was permitted to remain at the capital. Soon afterwards, however, the Internuncio Han Yu accused him of a crime, and Dou Xun was sent to prison and died.

The family was sent from Luoyang, but in 77 Dou Xun's two daughters entered the harem of Emperor Zhang, and in 78 the elder became empress. In 82 Dou Xun was granted posthumous honour as a marquis. -HHS 23/13:808-09, 10A:415; Ch'ü 72:213, 459-460.

Dou You 寶友 (15 BC-AD 47); Youfufeng. Younger twin brother of Dou Rong, when Emperor Guangwu sought Dou Rong's support in 29 and named him Governor of Liang province, Dou Rong undertook to send Dou You to him. The road was blocked by Wei Ao, and though the message got through and the alliance was confirmed, Dou You did not in fact travel to the east at this time.

As Dou Rong brought his troops to join Guangwu for operations against Wei Ao in 32, Dou You was appointed a Commandant of the Equipage, and after the first stage of the campaign proved successful he was granted a marquisate in Hanyang.

In 47 Dou You was appointed Colonel of the City Gates. He died soon afterwards. -HHS 23/13:800, 806-07.

Dou You 寶攸. A conscientious student, in the time of Emperor Guangwu Dou You was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. During a court conference a mouse appeared which looked like a leopard [鼠如豹: presumably spotted]. The emperor asked what it was called, and only Dou You knew that it was a ting 鼯 [or ding], supporting his claim by reference to Er ya 爾雅, where it was checked and proved correct. He was generously rewarded and his colleagues were inspired to study the dictionary. -HQ 2:9a.

Dou Yuan 寶元 [Shugao 叔高]; Youfufeng? According to Sanfu jue, Dou Yuan came to the court of Emperor Xian as Reporting Officer for his commandery. He was extremely good looking, and the emperor insisted he marry one of his daughters. Dou Yuan objected that he already had a wife, but the imperial orders were carried out.

Since the Sanfu jue is a history of gentlemen from the commanderies about Chang'an, we may assume that Dou Yuan was a member of the distinguished family of Youfufeng, presumably a kinsman of Dou Fu.

Dou Zhang 寶章 [Boxiang 伯向]; Youfufeng. Younger son of Dou Wanquan, he was a keen scholar as a boy, became skilled at literary composition, and was a close associate of Ma Rong and Cui Yuan.

When the Qiang rebellion broke out in 107, Dou Zhang moved east to Chenliu for refuge from the troubles. Though very poor, he maintained proper modes of conduct and held firm to his scholarship. Deng Kang, who became Minister Coachman about 126, learned of his reputation and sought his acquaintance, but Dou Zhang would not go to visit him. Deng Kang was all the more impressed. He arranged his appointment as a collator in the Eastern Pavilion, major imperial library and a centre for literary and historical work, and Dou Zhang became a recognised "hermit at court" 朝隱.

A year or so later a young daughter of Dou Zhang was taken into the imperial harem of the young Emperor Shun, received his favours, and both she and the Lady Liang Na became Honoured Ladies. On the basis of this connection to the throne, Dou Zhang was named a commander of the guards of the Feathered Forest and then a colonel in the Northern Army. Despite these appointments and favours, he remained committed to scholarship and took no part in the court intrigues which arose about his daughter and her rival of the Liang family. When the young woman died, the emperor mourned her deeply and commissioned a stele in her memory, with the inscription written by Dou Zhang himself.

Emperor Shun continued to show his regard for Dou Zhang, appointing him Minister Steward in 140 and Minister Herald in 143. In the following year when Emperor Shun died and the Lady Liang Na, now Dowager, took over as regent, Dou Zhang resigned his office. He died at home, but a collection of his works survived to the Sui and Tang periods. -HHS 23/13:821-22*; Vervoorn 90:217.

Douti 兜題 of Qiuzi [Kuqa]. In 73 King Jian of Qiuzi attacked the state of Shule [Kashgar], killed its King Cheng and set his own officer Douti on the throne. Later that year, however, the Chinese envoy Ban Chao came to Shule, and Douti was taken by surprise and captured by his officer Tian Lü. The native dynasty was restored and Douti was sent back to Qiuzi. -HHS 47/37:1574, 88/78:2926.

Du 杜, the Lady I. The beautiful wife of Qin Yilu, an officer of Lü Bu, she came into Cao Cao's hands when Lü Bu's capital at Xiapi fell in 198. Cao Cao had promised her to Guan Yu, but then took her into his own harem. -SGZ 3:100, SGZ Shu 6:939.

Du 杜, the Lady II. A senior concubine of Cao Cao, she was the mother of Cao Lin, Cao Gun and a daughter. This is probably the same person as the Lady Du formerly married to Qin Yilu: see above. -SGZ 20:579 & JJ 1a-b.

Du An 杜安 [Boyi 伯夷]; Yingchuan. A brilliant scholar, when he attended the Imperial University at the age of thirteen during the 70s Du An was known as the Young Genius 神童. He was recommended by the worthy officer Yue Hui, Zhou Yu the harsh Prefect of Luoyang called upon him and he was invited to join the offices of the Excellencies. A man of high moral standards, he was initially reluctant to take service in the government, and refused all such offers.

Eventually Du An was persuaded by his county magistrate Song Du to become his Officer of Merit, and he later received a special imperial summons and was appointed magistrate of Wan, capital of Nanyang commandery. There he halted a private vendetta among leading families by carrying out a public execution but, concerned that he might be impeached for such strict conduct, he resigned his office on grounds of ill health.

As Emperor Zhang was on tour in Yingchuan in 83, Du An wrote to him, was called to court and appointed an Imperial Clerk, member of the Censorate. Transferred to be Administrator of Ba commandery, he became known for excellent government, guiding people to good conduct by personal example.

In the 80s and early 90s, Du An received letters from several members of powerful families, including relatives of the Empress Dou, but he did not respond to them and hid them in the wall of his house. After the Dou were destroyed in 92, orders were given for the arrest of their associates, but when the officers came to Du An he was able to hand them all the letters, unopened with their seals intact. He was admired for his foresight.

Du An died in office in Ba commandery, leaving only the most frugal possessions, and his sons pulled the funeral carriage. The people honoured him, and a stele was set up at his tomb. -HHS 43/33:1478, 57/47:1839, HQ 1:18a, XC 7:6a, SGZ 23:665.

Du Bang 杜邦 [Shaobo 召伯]; Jingzhao. XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Bang, a son of Du Dun, became a Consultant.

Du Bao 杜保 [Jiliang 季良]; Jingzhao. In the early 40s Du Bao was an officer in the Northern Army. In a letter from Ma Yuan to his nephews Ma Yan and Ma Dun, reprimanding them for their excessive criticism of others, he praised Du Bao for his love of morality, but expressed reservations about his outspokenness, in contrast to the exemplary Long Shu.

An enemy of Du Bao later reported to the throne that he was a rabble-rouser, and that the imperial sons-on-law Liang Song and Dou Gu were friendly with him: the accuser was no doubt a member of the Ma faction, opposed to the Dou group. The emperor called Liang Song and Dou Gu and showed them the document and also Ma Yuan's letter. The two apologised, kowtowing until blood ran from their foreheads. They were pardoned, but Du Bao was dismissed. -HHS 24/14:844-45.

Du Bin 杜賓 [Shuda 叔達]; Jingzhao. XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Bin, a son of Du Bang, was nominated as Knowing the Way, but did not accept the invitation.

Du [Bochi] 杜伯特; Jianwei. Perhaps a kinsman of Du Fu, Du Boshi served as Administrator of Wuling. -HYGZ 3:32.

Du [Bodu] 杜伯度. Du Bodu was considered one of the great calligraphers of his day, skilled in the informal cao shu 草書 "Grass Style." His treatment of the character sha 殺 was considered particularly beautiful.

Du Bodu's work and that of his younger contemporary Cui Yuan, known as the style of Cui and Du 崔杜之法, served as a model for the later master Zhang Zhi. -HHS 64/54:2122, 65/55:2144.

JS 36:1065 refers to this man as Du Du 杜度, ascribes him to the time of Emperor Zhang, in the last quarter of the first century AD, and says that he served as Chancellor of the kingdom of Qi.

Du Chang 杜長. A subordinate commander to Zhang Yan in the 190s, he was sent to assist Gongsun Zan against Yuan Shao but was defeated. -SGZ 8:261.

Du Cheng 杜成 (d.30); Youfufeng. As the capital district fell into disorder after the fall of Wang Mang in 23, Du Cheng accompanied his elder brother Du Lin and other gentlemen escaping to the west. The party joined the warlord Wei Ao, but in 30 Du Cheng died. Du Lin took his death as an excuse to return to Luoyang and join the court of Emperor Guangwu of Han. -HHS 27/17:935-36.

Du Cheng 杜成; Guanghan. About 100 Du Cheng was a citizen of the county ruled by the worthy magistrate Yan Xian. When he found a valuable roll of cloth, he was inspired by Yan Xian's moral example and returned it to its owner. -HYGZ 10C:168.

Du Chong 杜崇 (d.95). Emissary to the Xiongnu in 94, Du Chong was on bad terms with the Shanyu Anguo. Anguo had succeeded to the title in 93 but was overshadowed by his younger cousin Shizi, who had made a name for himself by enthusiastic co-operation with the Chinese and by energetic attacks upon the Northern Xiongnu.

Anguo wrote to complain of Du Chong, but Du Chong intercepted the letter, then joined the General on the Liao Zhu Hui in reporting that they doubted his loyalty and suspected he was planning to assassinate Shizi and other pro-Chinese chieftains. The court of Emperor He ordered an investigation, but gave instructions that in the mean time Anguo should be subject to a special watch and guard. One night, Du Chong and Zhu Hui led armed men to Anguo's camp. Fleeing in fear, Anguo gathered his personal supporters and some surrendered Northern Xiongnu and went to attack Shizi.

As Shizi took refuge in Zhu Hui's headquarters, Anguo's attack was unsuccessful. Then Chinese troops came up, and when Anguo refused to surrender he was killed by his own followers. Shizi succeeded Anguo as Shanyu, but his enmity for the northerners, and the manner in which he had been placed upon the throne, brought rebellion among the people who had surrendered. Du Chong and Shizi were obliged to take refuge in a herding office, from which they were rescued by the Shanyu's Chinese body-guard.

The rebels now proclaimed the southern prince Fenghou as a rival Shanyu. Killing Chinese officials and burning guard-houses, they made their way towards the frontier. The court sent a large army, but despite heavy defeats Fenghou and many of his people managed to escape and establish a state of their own in the steppe.

The conduct of Du Chong and Zhu Hui had contributed greatly to this major failure of policy. Both men were arrested and died in prison. -HHS 89/79:2955-56; deC 84:278-281.

Du Chong 杜崇 [Boguo 伯括]; Jingzhao. XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Chong, a son of Du Bin, held a clerical post under the Excellency of Works. XTS also says that he was the father of Du Ji 畿, who held office under Wei. As Du Ji was born about 160, this Du Chong cannot be the same man as in the entry above.

Du Ci 杜慈, the Lady; Hanzhong. The Lady was married to Yu Xian of Ba commandery, but he died young and the couple had no children. Her father Du Ji wanted her to marry again, but she swore to remain loyal to her husband's family, and when he attempted to force her she hanged herself. -HYGZ 10C:177.

Du Ci 杜慈 [Ziren 子仁]; Guanghan. Commandery officer for water control, in 176 Du Ci was involved in the works carried out at Mianzhu under the Administrator Shen Ziju. -LS 15:8b.

Du Du 杜篤 [Jiya 季雅] (d.78); Jingzhao. Du Du was a descendant of the leading official Du Yannian 杜延年 of the first century BC [XTS 72B:2418 says that he was the son of Du Rang and a brother of Du Dun]. He was already widely learned when he was young, but he was not a courteous man and his neighbours resented him. Du Du went to Youfufeng, where he became friends with the local magistrate, but then they fell out, and in 44 his former friend had him arrested and sent to Luoyang.

About this time the Grand Marshal Wu Han died and Emperor Guangwu asked all scholars at the capital to prepare a eulogy for his old comrade-in-arms. Du Du sent one from his prison cell, with lofty sentiments and fine diction, and the emperor so admired the work that he ordered Du Du be released.

Du Du then composed the rhapsody Lundu fu 論都賦 "Rhapsody on the Capitals," urging that the imperial court be moved from Luoyang back to Chang'an: the text occupies the greater part of his biography in HHS 80/70A. His arguments were countered by Wang Jing, and their debate was a forerunner of the great paired works by Ban Gu and Zhang Heng. Many of the older generation appreciated such nostalgia for the old capital and hoped for a change, and though nothing was done, Du Du's literary ability was celebrated. He retired to his home country, however, where he held appointment as Literary Scholar in the commandery, then left office because of an illness of his eyes. He did not return to the capital for over twenty years.

On his mother's side Du Du was connected to the general Xin Wuxian 辛武賢 of Former Han, and he frequently expressed regret at not being a man of such military achievement. His sister, however, had married into the Ma family of imperial consorts, and as the general Ma Fang embarked on a campaign against the Qiang in 78 he gave Du Du a senior position on his staff. Unfortunately Du Du was killed in battle.

Celebrated for his calligraphy, Du Du left eighteen pian of literary works, including rhapsodies and eulogies, an essay of advice to women 女誡 Nu jie and a discussion of the frontier 邊論 Bian lun, together with Mingshi lun 明世論, on current affairs, in a further thirteen pian. -HHS 80/70A:2595-2609*, 76/66:2466.

Du Du 杜度 see Du [Bodu] 杜伯度. -JS 36:1065.

Du Dun 杜敦 [Zhongxin 仲信]; Jingzhao. XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Dun, a son of Du Rang, was Administrator of Xihe.

Du Fan 杜繁; Jingzhao. XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Fan was a son of Du Bang.

Du Fang 杜訪; Yingchuan. A student of the Excellency Li Gu, executed in 147, Du Fang was one of the disciples who compiled De xing 德行 "Virtuous Conduct," a record of their late master's sayings. -HHS 63/53:2089.

Du Feng 杜奉; Nanyang. Du Feng was a grandson of Du Mao. In 113 the regent Dowager Deng granted him a village marquisate in recognition of Du Mao's service and in replacement of the district fief which had been taken from his uncle [or father] Du Yuan. -HHS 22/12:778.

Du Fu 杜撫 [Shuhe 叔和]; Jianwei. Recognised for his abilities when young, Du Fu studied the classics under the Academician Xue Han, and assisted his compilation of a detailed commentary to the Han interpretation of the Classic of Poetry. Returning to his home country, he established a private academy which attracted over a thousand students, including Feng Liang, from as far away as Nanyang.

Du Fu was invited to become Officer of Merit by the Administrator Wang Qing, and was also offered appointment at the capital in the office of the Excellency over the Masses. He refused both positions, but when his would-be patron left office he went to pay his respects.

Du Fu later accepted senior clerical office with Liu Cang, brother of Emperor Ming and at that time General of Agile Cavalry. When Liu Cang retired to his estates in 62, his staff were transferred to his royal court. Many of them, seeing limited opportunities for advancement, left his service before their time had expired, but Du Fu was unwilling to do so. When Liu Cang learnt of his loyalty he rewarded him with valuable gifts, including a carriage and horses, and formally approved his departure.

Du Fu later held clerical office under the Grand Commandant, and in 72 he was one of the historians commissioned by Emperor Ming to compile annals of the reign of Emperor Guangwu 世祖本紀; this work, initially known as the "Diary of the Jianwu Period" 建武注記, became the first part of Dongguan Hanji.

As Bielenstein observes at 79:121, the project was politically sensitive and the committee delicately balanced: it was chaired by Ban Gu, a member of the Dou faction which had been instrumental in the disgrace of Ma Yuan in 49, but Ma Yuan's daughter was now empress, and Ma Yan and Meng Ji represented that interest. Du Fu and his colleague Chen Zong were probably neutral.

In the late 70s Du Fu was appointed Prefect of the Majors for Official Carriages, where memorials to the throne were received. He died soon afterwards.

Du Fu left a major work on the Classic of Poetry, Shi tiyue yitong 詩題約義通; his tradition of scholarship, the techniques of Lord Du 杜君法, was maintained for generations. -HHS 79/69B:2573*, 40/30A:1334, XC 5:10a, HYGZ 10B:156; Bn 54:10.

Du Gen 杜根 [Bojian 伯堅]; Yingchuan. Son of Du An, he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet at Luoyang. At this time, though Emperor An had taken the cap of manhood in 109 and was formally of age, the Dowager Deng still held control of the government. Du Gen and a group of fellow-countrymen from Yingchuan sent in letters of protest. The Dowager was furious: the men were arrested and sentenced to death by bastinado. One of the legal officials, knowing Du Gen's reputation, persuaded the executioners not to beat him with full force, and so he escaped. [The dating of this incident is confused.]

Du Gen then worked several years for a wine-maker near the Yangzi in Nan commandery. When Emperor An came to power after the death of the Dowager in 121, he was told of the loyal concern which Du Gen and his colleagues had shown. Believing they were dead, the emperor issued a call for their sons or grandsons, but Du Gen made himself known and was appointed to the Censorate.

In the time of Emperor Shun Du Gen became Administrator of Jiyin, where he governed with virtue and inspired good conduct by his example. He then retired to his home, dying in his late 70s. For years afterwards, as men came to take office in Yingchuan they first paid respects at the tombs of Du Gen and his father Du An. -HHS 57/47:1839-41*, SGZ 23:665, HHJ 16:190.

Du He 杜合 [Jusun 巨孫]; Nanyang. Described as a former Investigator of the commandery, in 156 Du He was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele of the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:17a.

Du Hong 杜弘; Nanyang. A local leader in the northwest of the commandery, in the summer of 27 he joined the renegade Yan Cen, who had been driven southeast from the capital territory into Nanyang. After capturing a number of cities, they were defeated in Rang county by an imperial army under Geng Yan. Du Hong surrendered. -HHS 19/9:707.

Du Hong 杜宏; Jingzhao. XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Hong was a son of Du Bang.

Du Hui 杜恢 (d.115). Administrator of Anding in 115, from his base in Youfufeng Du Hui was sent with a subordinate command under Sima Jun to attack the Qiang rebels and the renegade leader Du Jigong. They occupied the enemy fortress at Dingxi in northern Beidi, but when Sima Jun sent Du Hui and other officers out to collect grain they ignored his orders, allowed their troops to scatter, and were cut off by the rebels and their Qiang allies. Sima Jun, angry at their disobedience, stayed in the city and refused to send assistance. The Chinese lost over three thousand men, and Du Hui died in the fighting. -HHS 87/77:2889; deC 84:107-108.

Du Ji 杜季 of Hanzhong was the father of the loyal widow Du Ci.

Du Ji 杜畿 [Bohou 伯侯]; Jingzhao. Born in the early 160s, Du Ji gained reputation for the care he showed his mother after the early death of his father. [XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Ji's father was Du Chong.]

Du Ji became a local officer and then brevet magistrate in his home commandery, gaining reputation for the speed and efficiency with which he dealt with those in prison. Recommended Filial and Incorrupt, he became Assistant Administrator in Hanzhong but left office at the beginning of the civil war about 190 and spent some years in Jing province.

When his mother died, Du Ji brought her coffin back to their home country, where he was appointed Officer of Merit by his old friend Zhang Shi, now Administrator of Jingzhao for Cao Cao. Noticed and recommended by Xun Yu, Du Ji was given office by Cao Cao, first on his staff, then as Protector of the Qiang with the Staff of Authority and Administrator of Xiping in the Xining valley, the western part of Jincheng, now set up as a new commandery.

In 205 Du Ji was appointed Administrator of Hedong, which was at that time under threat from Gao Gan of the Yuan family and was controlled by the local officers Wei Gu and Fan Xian. These attempted to block his entry, but Du Ji had met Wei Gu before and knew that he was indecisive. He went by side-roads, acted humbly and obliged the potential rebels to accept him, then persuaded them to weaken their troops. As Gao Gan attacked the commandery from the east, he was supported on the south by the bandit Zhang Cheng, while there was widespread rebellion in neighbouring Shangdang. Du Ji, however, gathered loyal forces to hold the county cities against the invader and the mutineers, Wei Gu and his fellows were killed and Gao Gan and Zhang Cheng were driven away.

Du Ji remained in Hedong sixteen years, setting up schools and maintaining a good and generous government. When Cao Cao attacked the north-western warlords in 211, Hedong provided supplies to the army. After the victory Du Ji's salary was raised to that of a minister, and he gave support in later campaigns against Hanzhong.

In 220 Cao Pi enfeoffed Du Ji and appointed him to his Secretariat at the capital. He then became Director of Retainers and in 222 he took charge of famine relief in Ji province. When Cao Pi attacked Wu in 223 Du Ji was left in charge at the capital as Deputy Director of the Secretariat. He was drowned soon afterwards, when a ship undergoing trials capsized in the Yellow River. -SGZ 16:493-97*.

Du Ji 杜稷 see Du Mu 杜穆.

Du Ji 杜基; Yingchuan. A grandson of Du Gen, about 230 he was granted minor enfeoffment by Cao Rui, Emperor of Wei, on account of the achievements of his elder brother Du Xi. -SGZ 23:667.

Du Jie 杜楷; Jingzhao. In 188, as the Liang province rebels under Wang Guo approached Chang'an, the Intendant He Xun persuaded Emperor Ling to commission private troops. Du Jie was one of five leaders of local gentry who received title as Commandant to raise their own regiments and join the imperial forces under the command of He Xun. -HHS 58/48:1883.

Du Jigong 杜季貢 (d.117); Hanyang. In the autumn of 111 Du Jigong joined his elder brother Du Qi and Wang Xin in a rebellion allied to the Qiang. Du Qi was assassinated, and the rebels were defeated by the Imperial Clerk Tang Xi in the following year. Wang Xin was killed and Du Jigong fled to join the Qiang leader Dianlian.

When Dianlian died soon afterwards, Du Jigong was named a general and a member of the regency council for his young heir Lianchang. He established himself at Dingxi city in northern Beidi, and in 115 he inflicted heavy casualties upon an army of levies led by Sima Jun.

Soon afterwards the Chinese commander Ren Shang sent a cavalry raid against Dingxi. They killed four hundred of Du Jigong's men and captured several thousand head of cattle, horses and sheep. Du Jigong did not take an active role again, and two years later he was assassinated by Yu Gui and a group of turncoat Qiang. -HHS 87/77:2888-91; deC 84:107-110.

Du Kuang 都匡 [Zhongying 仲英]; Nanyang. A former county magistrate, in 156 Du Kuang was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Du Kui 杜夔 [Gongliang 公良]; Henan. Because of his ability in the field, Du Kui became Gentleman of the Court Music during the 180s, but he resigned in 188 on account of ill health. His provincial and commandery governments invited him to office, as did the Excellency over the Masses, but when the region of the capital became troubled Du Kui went to take refuge in Jing province. The warlord Governor Liu Biao had Du Kui and Meng Yao compose pieces suitable for the court of Han, and when it was ready he wanted to have it played in his own assembly. Du Kui, however, told Liu Biao that since he was not the Emperor it would not be appropriate to arrange such a performance. Liu Biao duly gave up the idea.

When Liu Biao's son Liu Zong surrendered to Cao Cao in 208, Du Kui was appointed to Cao Cao's staff and became responsible for the music of the puppet court of Emperor Xian. He was expert with bells and pipes, and had an excellent ear for all musical instruments, but was less skilled in singing and dancing. His associates Deng Jing, Yin Qi, Yin Hu Feng Su and Fu Yang, however, complemented his abilities, while Du Kui also carried out wide research in an attempt to reconstruct ancient instruments and their tuning.

In particular, Du Kui conducted an unsuccessful experiment on the traditional pitchpipes 律, which were supposed to blow ashes into the air in accordance with the seasonal changes of qi 氣 ethers. He also had the bell-maker Chai Yu prepare a set of tuned bells, but then claimed they did not match and demanded they be melted down and re-cast. Chai Yi objected that Du Kui was being arbitrary, and the quarrel was brought to Cao Cao. Cao Cao had the bells sounded, and found that Du Kui was correct. Chai Yu and his family were sent away to be horse-herders.

In the time of Cao Pi, Du Kui became Court Musician. Cao Pi, however, had admired Chai Yu and resented his fate, and when a time came that Du Kui was reluctant to perform when requested, Cao Pi became even more annoyed. He found opportunity to dismiss Du Kui, who died soon afterwards. -SGZ 29:806-07*; Needham 62:185, 188.

Du Lin 杜林 [Boshan 伯山] (d.47); Youfufeng. A man of old official family, Du Lin's father Ye 鄴 had been Inspector of Liang province under Emperors Cheng and Ai of Former Han. The family had a major library, and Du Lin was inspired also by his mother's relatives: his great-grandfather Zhang Chang 張敞 had been a leading Old Text scholar of Zuo zhuan, and Du Lin himself travelled to study with his senior cousin, Zhang Chang's grandson Zhang Song 張竦. Du Lin became a celebrated Confucian scholar.

Du Lin held local office in the commandery, but after the fall of Wang Mang in 23 the capital district fell into disorder. Du Lin and his brother Cheng, with Fan Qun, Meng Ji and others of their fellow-countrymen, led a group of refugees to the west. They were attacked by bandits, robbed and threatened with death, but escaped through the fast talking of Meng Ji.

Du Lin and his companions became clients of the local warlord Wei Ao, and in 25 Wei Ao made Du Lin a senior official in his separatist government. Du Lin was reluctant, and wanted to return east. In 30 his brother Cheng died and he used the excuse to get away. Soon afterwards Wei Ao regretted he had given approval and sent his retainer Yang Xian to kill Du Lin. When he caught up, however, Yang Xian saw Du Lin hauling a small cart and mourning his brother. Unable to kill such a worthy man, he turned away.

As soon as Emperor Guangwu heard Du Lin had come, he offered him position as an Imperial Clerk and spoke with him about scholarship and, more relevantly, about the situation in the western provinces under Wei Ao and his rival Dou Rong. Delighted with the discussion, he awarded him carriages and robes and later appointed him to the Imperial Secretariat. A friend of the powerful Ma Yuan, Du Lin had a wide reputation, and when other gentlemen of the region saw how well he was treated they also came to join the court of Han.

While in the west Du Lin obtained a single chapter of the Old Text Classic of History, written in lacquer. He treasured it above all else and kept it constantly with him. In Luoyang he showed it to the scholar Wei Hong, praising its teaching and urging the revival of the tradition. Though it never gained favour with the emperor, and those who adhered to it remained isolated, the Old Text revived in energy to rival the dominant New Text.

A conference held in 26 had urged recognition of Emperor Gao of Former Han as coadjutor 配 for sacrifices at the Altar of Heaven, but Guangwu wished to have the legendary Yao 堯, founder of the Xia 夏 dynasty, as coadjutor, and in 31 he called a second meeting. The majority was ready to accept the emperor's preference, but Du Lin argued that the pragmatic and humane dynasty of Han was of recent origin, and that there was no close connection with the distant and doubtful Yao. The emperor was persuaded, and Emperor Gao remained coadjutor.

Du Lin later replaced Wang Liang as Guardian of Honesty under the Excellency over the Masses, and he used this censorial position to recommend his fellow-countrymen Fan Qun, Zhao Bing and Shentu Gang, with Niu Han of Longxi and others, as well as the Old Text scholars Zheng Xing and Xu Xun. All obtained appointments and his choice was widely respected. The office of Director was abolished in 35, but Du Lin then became Minister of the Household, responsible both for guarding the ruler and for supervising gentlemen cadets. The selection of officials was always a major concern and it was of particular importance for the new dynasty. Du Lin encouraged scholarship among his protégés, and quickly brought forward those who showed aptitude and interest.

In 38 the Palace Counsellor Liang Tong urged the introduction of more severe punishments to ensure greater obedience to the law, and Guangwu called a court conference to consider the matter. Du Lin argued for the majority that the lenient policy of the recent past had proven effective, and was appropriate for an enlightened ruler. His view was accepted.

When the former Heir Liu Qiang, son of the disgraced Empress Guo, was deposed to be King of Donghai in 43, Du Lin was made his Tutor, with responsibility for his conduct and for the selection of his attendants. In the autumn he and his royal charge accompanied the emperor to the south, and though some of the kings wandered and could not be found when their father wanted them, Du Lin ensured that Liu Qiang was always accounted for and available. The other guardians were not punished, but Du Lin was rewarded, and when he sought to refuse because the gifts were too generous, Guangwu added more.

In 44 Du Lin became Minister Steward, and he was later again Minister of the Household. He succeeded Zhu Fu as Excellency of Works at the end of 46, the first to hold that office without enfeoffment. When he died in the following autumn, Guangwu attended his funeral, and he appointed his son Du Qiao as a gentleman cadet and then a magistrate. -HHS 27/17: 934-39*; Bn 54:64-65, Bn 67:230, Bn 79:57, 129-130, 166-167, 189-193.

Du Mao 杜茂 [Zhugong 諸公] (d.43); Nanyang. When Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came north of the Yellow River in 24, Du Mao went to join him. He was named a general and took part in his campaigns. When Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 Du Mao was made a chief general and was enfeoffed with a district marquisate, which was raised to a full county in the following year.

Towards the end of 25 Du Mao went with Shu Shou to defeat the Wuxiao bandits in Zhending [near present-day Shijiazhuang, later the eastern part of Changshan], and they also took over Guangping [later the southern part of Julu]. In 26 Du Mao accompanied Wu Han against the Tanxiang and other bandits in Wei and Henei commanderies.

Following the success of these campaigns, in the spring of 27 Du Mao was sent east with Wang Liang against the Wuxiao in Wei, Qinghe and Dong commanderies, either side of the Yellow River. Over-running the enemy camps and settlements, they forced the surrender of Du Meng, Dong Dun and thirty other leaders. All three commanderies were pacified, the roads were cleared to the northern and eastern frontiers, and an imperial messenger brought Du Mao insignia as Chief General of Agile Cavalry.

Du Mao then joined the attack on Liu Yong in Pei commandery and captured Wang city. Early in 29 he was sent with the general Ma Wu to attack Xifang in Shanyang: the city had been taken by He Yan in 28, but then the people rebelled and invited Liu Yong's officer Jiao Qiang, who came from that region, and who was joined by Liu Yong's son and claimant heir Liu Yu.

After a siege of several months Du Mao and Ma Wu recaptured the city and drove Jiao Qiang to refuge with Dong Xian.

The east of the plain was settled in 30, and in the following year Du Mao was sent to establish military colonies in Taiyuan as a defence against the northern pretender Lu Fang and his Xiongnu allies. In the winter of 33/34, after an unsuccessful campaign by Wu Han earlier in the year, Du Mao and Guo Liang, the latter named Administrator of Yanmen, attacked Lu Fang's officer Yin You in that commandery, while Wang Ba advanced from Shanggu. As the defenders were relieved by Jia Lan and some Xiongnu cavalry, however, Du Mao and Guo Liang were heavily defeated and driven back to the south. Raiding by Lu Fang and the Xiongnu continued unabated.

In 36 the Internuncio Duan Zhong was sent with a force of convict labourers to help Du Mao construct a system of border fortifications, with walls, watch-towers and beacons. Soon afterwards treachery in his camp forced Lu Fang to flee to the north, and Guo Liang was able to occupy Yanmen. The threat from the Xiongnu remained, however, and in 37 Du Mao worked with Wang Ba on the strategic "Flying Fox" Road from Shanggu through Dai commandery to the south, while they also constructed 125 kilometres of wall across the border of Yanmen and Dai. The emperor sent gold, silk and brocade to pay the army and to encourage the people on the frontier.

Du Mao was granted a new and more valuable fief, and he remained in the north until 39, when he was found guilty of embezzling supplies of horses, grain and silk, and of allowing his officers to kill people. He was dismissed from his command and his fief was reduced in rank and value to a district marquisate. He died four years later.

Recognising Du Mao as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 22/12:789-91*; Bn 67:108-111, Bn 76:26.

Du Meng 杜猛. A leader of the Wuxiao bandits, he operated in the region of the Yellow River with the title of a chief general, but surrendered to the forces of Du Mao and Wang Liang in 26. -HHS 22/12:776.

Du Mi 杜密 [Zhoufu 周甫] (d.169); Yingchuan. During the 140s Du Mi was appointed to the offices of the Excellency Hu Guang, and later became head of several commanderies, including Dai and Taishan. Many local magistrates were kinsmen of the palace eunuchs, and some governed badly, but Du Mi kept strict control over them. As Chancellor of Beihai he met the scholar Zheng Xuan, recognised his quality, and arranged for him to attend the University at Luoyang.

Du Mi later left office and returned to his home country, but he had regular contact and considerable influence with local officials. On one occasion the Administrator Wang Yu, irritated by his constant stream of advice, praised his fellow-countryman Liu Sheng for his reticence. Du Mi responded that it was a matter of principle to speak out on matters of public policy. [This incident is recounted also in FSTY 5:40; Nylan 83:484-487. Ying Shao strongly disapproves of Du Mi's busy-bodying.]

Du Mi later became Director of the Imperial Secretariat, then Intendant of Henan and Minister Coachman. A known supporter of the reform movement, he was listed by the students at the University as one of the Eight Heroes 八俊, second rank of their ideal hierarchy. He does not appear to have played such a leading role as Li Ying, but their surnames were often coupled together in the phrase Li Du 李杜, both because they came from the same commandery and also in echo of the earlier pair Li Gu and Du Qiao at the beginning of the reign of Emperor Huan.

When the First Faction Incident broke out in 166 Du Mi was dismissed and returned home, but as Chen Fan became Grand Tutor after the death of Emperor Huan he had him reappointed Minister Coachman. Chen Fan was destroyed by the eunuchs in 168 and in the following year Du Mi was arrested in the Second Faction Incident. He killed himself. -HHS 67/57:2197-98* & 2187-88.

Du Mou 杜茂 see Du Mao 杜茂.

Du Mu 杜穆 or Du Ji 稷. Administrator of Cangwu in 29, Du Mu held commission from the late Gengshi Emperor but had his own local power. Guangwu's commander in the south, Cen Peng, wrote and urged him to accept the new imperial regime, while the Governor of Jiaozhi Deng Rang led by example. Du Mu duly sent tribute to Han and was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 17/7:659; Bn 59:157-158.

Du Pu 杜普. An officer in the service of Liu Bei, about 210 he held an advance position as chief of a county in Nan commandery facing Cao Cao's garrison commander Yue Jin in Xiangyang. Yue Jin defeated him and drove him away. -SGZ 17:521.

Du Qi 杜琦 (d.111); Hanyang. Local leaders south of the Wei, in the autumn of 111 Du Qi and his brother Du Jigong, together with Wang Xin, led a rebellion in alliance with the Qiang. Du Qi took title as a general, but the court put a price on his head, and the Administrator of Hanyang Zhao Bo sent Du Xi, possibly a relative, to assassinate him. -HHS 5:218, 87/77:2888; deC 84:106.

Du Qi 杜祺; Nanyang. About 220 Du Qi was appointed an assistant officer of the salt monopoly of Shu-Han under Wang Lian. He later held high rank. -SGZ Shu 9.988, 11:1009.

Du Qian 杜遷; Jingzhao. A local staff officer, in 165 Du Qian was sent to prepare a stele celebrating the completion of work on a temple at Mount Hua which the Intendant Yuan Feng had inaugurated in 161. -LS 2:3a.

Du Qiao 杜喬; Youfufeng. When his father the Excellency of Works Du Lin died in 47, Emperor Guangwu appointed Du Qiao as a gentleman cadet and then as a magistrate in Nanyang. -HHS 27/17:939.

Du Qiao 杜喬 [Shurong 叔榮] (d.147); Henei. A keen scholar, though he was descended from a high official family Du Qiao travelled on foot to seek teachers, and he became an expert in the Poetry, the History, Ritual, Chunqiu, the Book of Changes and in the teachings of Laozi.

About 121 Du Qiao was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and joined the offices of the Excellency Yang Zhen. He later became Administrator of Nan commandery, and then Chancellor of Donghai.

In the autumn of 142, in response to continuing criticism of the growing power of the empress's brother Liang Ji and their kinsmen, eight scholar-officials were appointed to a special commission of inquiry, with Du Qiao and Zhou Ju as the senior commissioners. They had a wide brief, with authority to report on good officials of every rank throughout the empire, and to impeach those who ruled badly. In Yan province, Du Qiao reported most favourably on Li Gu the Administrator of Taishan, and indicted the officials Fan Gong, Cui Yuan and Liang Rang: all were members of the Liang group; and Liang Rang was Liang Ji's uncle. Some good men gained advancement, but Liang Ji and his associates blocked hostile comments, and the emperor eventually ordered the investigations ended. In the following year the reformist Li Gu, now a minister, arranged a review of the reports, and some provincial officials were dismissed.

About 144 Du Qiao was Tutor to the Heir Liu Bing. When the eunuch Gao Fan came to take charge of the infant, Du Qiao and his companions were unable to oppose him until the censorial officer Chong Gao turned him back with a drawn sword.

Du Qiao then became Minister of Finance. Liu Junshi, Administrator of Yongchang, sent a golden snake as a present for Liang Ji, but the Inspector Chong Gao reported it, and the ornament had to be placed in the official treasury. When Liang Ji asked for it Du Qiao refused him. Du Qiao was transferred to be Minister Herald, but in a further insult, when Liang Ji ordered senior officials to attend the funeral of his daughter, Du Qiao refused.

Following the death of Liu Zuan, Emperor Zhi, in 146, Du Qiao supported Li Gu and the other Excellencies in seeking to place Liu Suan the King of Qinghe on the throne. They were over-ridden by Liang Ji, who promoted his own candidate Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan. Du Qiao was appointed Minister of the Household, and in 147 he was promoted Grand Commandant. He promptly presented a memorial objecting to the manner in which members of the Liang family and senior eunuchs had been enfeoffed without good cause but, predictably, nothing was done.

At this time the Lady Liang Nüying, sister of the Dowager and of Liang Ji, was due to enter the imperial harem, and it was proposed to mark the occasion with special ceremony. Based upon precedent, Du Qiao refused his permission, and he also prevented the appointment of Liang Ji's supporter Fan Gong to the Secretariat: as a commissioner in 142 Du Qiao had arranged Fan Gong's dismissal for corruption.

Despite frequent disagreements with Liang Ji, and the fact that he and Li Gu were the only men to stand up to him, Du Qiao had risen to the highest ranks of the bureaucracy: he clearly had considerable influence and support. In the autumn of 147, however, soon after the Lady Liang became empress, he was dismissed on account of an earthquake at the capital.

In the mean time the eunuchs Tang Heng and Zuo Guan told the young emperor how Du Qiao and Li Gu had opposed his accession. Liu Zhi was predictably resentful, and when there was a plot to install Liu Suan upon the throne in the following year, Liang Ji was able to accuse Li Gu and Du Qiao of involvement, while the eunuchs Tang Heng and now Zuo Guan told the young emperor how Li Gu and Du Qiao had opposed his accession. The Dowager was still reluctant, but Liang Ji offered Du Qiao the opportunity of suicide, and when he refused he sent soldiers to arrest him.

Du Qiao died in prison, Li Gu was executed, and the corpses of both men were displayed at the capital. Du Qiao's former officer Yang Kuang later collected his body for burial. -HHS 63/53:2091-94*.

Du Qin 杜禽. Du Qin was a close friend of Yin Xing, who was a confidant to Emperor Guangwu. Though fond of Du Qin, Yin Xing considered him a man of only superficial ability, and would not recommend him for any official appointment. -HHS 32/22:1131.

Du Qiong 杜瓊 [Boyu 伯瑜] (d.250); Shu. Du Qiong and his colleague He Zong were well known as students of the Book of Changes under the scholar Ren An. Du Qiong became an Assistant Officer to the Governor Liu Zhang, and when Liu Bei seized power in 214 he continued as a member of his staff.

In 221 Du Qiong joined the petition citing works of divination to urge Liu Bei to take the imperial title. He later held ministerial office under Liu Shan, and in 234 he bore the imperial edict of mourning to the tomb of Zhuge Liang. He died aged over eighty, leaving a detailed commentary to the New Text Han version of the Classic of Poetry in over a hundred thousand characters. -SGZ Shu 12:1021-22*.

Du Rang 杜穰 [Zirao 子饒]; Jingzhao. XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Rang, a son of Du Xiong 熊 [QH:83], became a Counsellor Remonstrant under Later Han. This must have been early in the first century.

Du Shang 度尚 [Boping 博平] (117-166); Shanyang. HHS 38/28 says that Du Shang's family was poor, that he did not study, and so he received no attention from the local authorities. XHS 3:12a, however, says that Du Shang's father died young, but that he was a cultivated man who treated his mother with utmost filial piety, studied the Jing Fang interpretation of the Book of Changes and the Classic of History in the Old Text tradition, and was skilled in both civil and military arts. Given his friendship with scholars, the latter account of Du Shang's background appears more likely, but it appears that he was at some time employed as a field guard by the high-ranking eunuch Hou Ba; with this patronage he became Reporting Officer of his commandery and then a gentleman cadet.

In 151 Du Shang was appointed as a county magistrate in Kuaiji. He governed strictly but wisely, people admired his understanding, and he established a memorial stele for Cao E, the filial and suicidal daughter of the shaman Cao Yu. He made friends with leading scholars such as Chunyu Yi, and he invited good men to take office: among others, the future general and minister Zhu Jun served on his personal staff.

Transferred north to a county in Hejian at a time of plague and famine, Du Shang relieved some distress by opening official granaries for those who cared for the sick. The Inspector Zhu Mu was impressed.

Du Shang retired in mourning for his uncle, but he was later nominated Filial and Incorrupt and then held charge of convict labourers under the Court Architect. As Administrator of Liaodong in 163 he defeated an attack of the Xianbi.

By this time an extensive rebellion in Jing province had extended south into the region of Jiaozi and defied expeditions led by Sheng Xiu and by Ma Xu. When Liu Du the Inspector of Jing province abandoned his post, Emperor Huan sought recommendations for a replacement. Zhu Mu, now Director of the Imperial Secretariat, nominated Du Shang, and he was transferred to the south.

A great army led by Feng Gun enforced a brief settlement, but after those troops were withdrawn the disturbance was renewed and Du Shang had to deal with it from his local resources. Sharing the hardships of his men, he gathered allies among non-Chinese people and showed good faith in allocating rewards. He defeated the rebels and mutineers and brought tens of thousands to surrender, until by 164 the only major enemies were Bu Yang and Pan Hong, based in the mountains of Guiyang.

As Du Shang advanced against them, his troops refused to attack: they were content with the booty they had gathered and had no wish to go further. Du Shang proclaimed a halt to wait for reinforcements, and gave permission for the men to go hunting. While they were away he had his officers burn the camp and the soldiers' treasure; when they bewailed their losses he encouraged them to take what they needed from the hoards at the enemy camp. Inspired by greed, his men took the bandits by surprise and settled the last of the disorder.

Du Shang was enfeoffed and promoted to be Administrator of Guiyang, but in 165 he was recalled to the capital, and soon afterwards the soldier Zhu Gai led a mutiny and joined the bandit Hu Lan. They drove out the new Administrator Ren Yin, captured the Inspectors of Jing province and of Jiaozi, then attacked Chen Qiu the Administrator of Lingling. In the summer Du Shang was named a General of the Household and sent to the south with 26,000 men, including levies from You and Ji provinces, Wuhuan auxiliaries and troops from the camp at Liyang in Wei commandery. Aided by militia from Changsha, they raised the siege of Lingling and destroyed the rebels. Du Shang was re-appointed Inspector of Jing province.

Remnants of Hu Lan's following had fled into Cangwu, from where they were driven back by Zhang Pan the Inspector of Jiaozi province. Embarrassed that the bandits had not been wiped out, Du Shang reported that the incursion came from a new group based in Cangwu. Zhang Pan was arrested, but he demanded a proper enquiry and Du Shang's fault was found out. Though he was pardoned on account of his previous good service, he died soon afterwards.

Admired by the reformers at Luoyang, Du Shang was included in the major list of worthy men which was circulated at the capital, and Cai Yong composed the inscription for a stele in his honour. -HHS 38/28:1284-87, 86/76:2834, 67/57:2187, XC 2:2b-3b, LS 7:10a-13a; deC 89:50-51, 60-62, 110.

Du Shi 杜詩 [Jungong 君公] (d.38); Henei. Noted for his ability when he was young, Du Shi became Officer of Merit in his commandery, and in 23 he received clerical appointment in the government of the new Gengshi Emperor.

Transferring his allegiance to Emperor Guangwu, in 25 Du Shi became an officer of the Censorate with particular responsibility for Luoyang. When troops of the general Xiao Guang terrorised the people, and Xiao Guang paid no attention to protests, Du Shi arrested and executed him, sending in a report only after the event. Guangwu called him to audience and granted him insignia to justify the authority he had taken.

Soon afterwards Du Shi was sent to deal with bandits led by Yang Yi in Hedong, and destroyed them in a lightning attack. He then spent three years as a county magistrate in Henan, where his government was commended by the provincial authorities for Exceptional Quality. From about 29 he served as Commandant in Pei and then in Runan.

In 31 Du Shi became Administrator of Nanyang, where his government was noted for its honesty and authority. He was good at planning and concerned to save people's labour. He developed dykes and canals to extend agricultural land, and he invented a water-power reciprocator for the bellows used to smelt metal: his machinery improved production and saved vast effort by corvée workers. The people named him "Mother Du" 杜母 and compared him to Shao Xinchun 召信臣 of Former Han [QHX:467-468].

Besides local administration, Du Shi was involved in the general policies of the imperial government. About 33, concerned by possibilities for confusion and forgery in the mobilisation of troops, he recommended the restoration of Tiger Tallies 虎符 by which the authority of officials could be checked [Bn 59:209]. He was also interested in recruiting good officials, making several strong nominations, and about 37 he sent in a memorial praising the former Excellency Fu Zhang and urging his appointment to the Imperial Secretariat.

In 38 Du Shi was accused of having sent one of his retainers to kill a man in vengeance for his brother. He became ill and died. The Director of Retainers Bao Yong reported that he was so poor there was no place for the funeral ceremony; an imperial edict ordered it be held in the commandery residence at the capital and gave a grant of silk for the expenses. -HHS 31/21:1094-97*, XC 1:8b; Needham 65:370.

Du Shi 杜碩; Runan. About 80 Du Shi was accidentally killed by Zhang Miao q.v. -FSTY 3f:107.

Du Shuo 杜碩; Jingzhao. Son of Du Du, in the latter part of the first century Du Shuo was a man of local power, famous for his wealth. -HHS 80/70A:2609.

Du Song 杜松. About 192 Du Song was a colonel in garrison command in Donghai for Cao Cao. His men mutinied under the leadership of Gui Mu, and Cao Cao sent Lü Qian to take his place. -SGZ 18:540.

Du Taiji 杜泰姬, the Lady; Hanzhong. Wife of Zhao Xuan, she bore him seven sons and seven daughters, whom she brought up according to careful precepts. -HYZ 10C:171.

Du Tong 杜通. In 220 Du Tong was Administrator of Zhangye when the local leader Zhang Jin arrested him and usurped the position. Zhang Jin was defeated and killed by Su Ze, and Du Tong was restored. -SGZ 16:492, 28:761-62.

Du Wei 杜威. Counsellor Remonstrant in the claimant imperial regime of Wang Lang in 24, Du Wei was sent from the besieged capital of Handan to negotiate terms for surrender with Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. His embassy was unsuccessful and the city fell soon afterwards. -HHS 12/2:493-94; Bn 59:75-76.

Du Wei 杜微 [Guofu 國輔]; Guanghan. Having studied with Ren An, an expert in the Book of Changes, during the 190s Du Wei became an Assistant Officer of Yi province under the Governor Liu Zhang, but left office on grounds of ill health. Unwilling to serve Liu Bei, he had it put about that he was dead, but in 224 Zhuge Liang persuaded him to take a position at court. -SGZ Shu 12:1019-20*.

Du Wu 杜吳 or Du Yu 虞: the two characters were interchangeable; Hongnong. Member of an advance guard of Han led Wang Xian or possibly Han Chen, in 23 Du Wu took part in the final assault on Chang'an and killed Wang Mang. He took Wang Mang's imperial seal, but not his head; that was later cut off by Gongbin Jiu.

It appears that Du Wu came from Shang 商 county in Hongnong, though the character shang has been understood as meaning that he was a merchant. More probably he was a butcher [tu'er 屠兒] by trade; see also sub Tu Er. -Dubs 55:465-66; Bn 54:132.

Du Xi 杜習; Hanyang. Formerly a local officer of the commandery, in 111 Du Xi was sent by the Administrator Zhao Bo to assassinate the renegade Du Qi. He was rewarded with a million cash and title as Marquis Who Punishes the Wicked 討姦侯. -HHS 5:218, 87/77:2888; deC 84:106.

Du Xi 杜翕; Jingzhao. XTS 72A:2418 says that Du Xi was a son of Du Bin and brother of Du Chong, who lived in the mid-second century.

Du Xi 杜希. As a senior assistant in the Imperial Secretariat about 170, Du Xi was a close friend of his direct colleague Liu Xin and the more junior Huan Bin. They would often eat and drink together, but they despised Feng Fang, who was son-in-law to the powerful eunuch Cao Jie, and they never asked him to join them.

Resentful at his exclusion, Feng Fang accused the companions of forming a faction. The matter was passed to the Director Liu Meng, and when he took no action Cao Jie, extremely angry, sent in a memorial claiming that he too was implicated in the clique. Liu Meng was arrested, and although he was soon released he was dismissed and proscribed from office. Huan Bin resigned. -HHS 37/27:1262.

Du Xi 杜襲 [Zixu 子緒]; Yingchuan. A grandson of Du Gen, during the 190s Du Xi went south to take refuge with Liu Biao in Nanyang. His friend Po Qin was received with favour, but Du Xi warned him against accepting such a provincial master, and he himself left Liu Biao and went south to Changsha.

After Cao Cao took Emperor Xian into his control and established the imperial capital at Xu city in 196, Du Xi returned north and was appointed magistrate of Xi'e in Nanyang, immediately north of the capital Wan on Cao Cao's frontier with Liu Biao. Because of the uncertainty of the time and the region, the local officials kept the people inside fortified towns and villages, so no-one could work the fields and there was shortage of food. Du Xi ordered that the able-bodied men should be kept under arms in the defences, but that the old and the weak should go out to farm.

Du Xi's rule was well supported by the people, but in 201 Liu Biao's troops attacked in overwhelming force, and though he and his men fought with great courage, the invaders captured the city. Du Xi barely escaped, but he rallied the people outside and brought them back to a new defensive position on the Mo Slope.

Du Xi was then recommended by the Director of Retainers Zhong Yao, and became a Consultant and military adviser. Recommended again by Xun Yu, he was taken onto Cao Cao's personal staff. In 213 Du Gong was one of the petitioners who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei, and he became a Palace Attendant in the new state. He was later Chief Clerk to Cao Cao as Imperial Chancellor.

In 215 Du Xi accompanied the campaign against Zhang Lu in Hanzhong, and when Cao Cao returned to the east Du Xi was named Commandant of Attendant Cavalry and left to supervise the military administration of the newly-occupied region. He persuaded some eighty thousand people to leave the frontier and colonise the depopulated areas about Luoyang and Ye city in central China.

After Xiahou Yuan was defeated and killed by Liu Bei in the battle at Dingjun Mountain in 219, the Wei forces were leaderless and confused. Du Xi and Zhang He took command and restored order, but even Cao Cao could not regain the lost territory. He abandoned Hanzhong and appointed Du Xi Area Commander for the region about Chang'an. When Cao Cao planned to attack the renegade commander Xu You, Du Xi defied his anger and persuaded him to treat Xu You generously and gain his surrender.

As Cao Pi took the imperial title in 220, Du Xi was enfeoffed. He was put in charge of military supplies and later joined the Secretariat. During the reign of Cao Rui he was adviser to Cao Zhen and then to Sima Yi in the war against Zhuge Liang in the west. He was raised in fief, but became ill and returned to the capital as a Palace Counsellor. He died about 232 and was posthumously named Minister Steward. -SGZ 23:664-67*.

Du Xuan 杜宣; Henan. Early in the second century, Du Xuan was Registrar of his county. During a party at the house of the magistrate Ying Chen he saw in his wine the reflection of a red cross-bow which was hanging on the wall. He believed it was a mysterious snake, and later became ill, and when Ying Chen asked after him he told him about the snake. Ying Chen showed him how he had been deceived, and Du Xuan was cured.

Du Xuan later joined the Imperial Secretariat and was then a successful Administrator in four commanderies. -FSTY 9:67; Nylan 83:521-522.

Du Xuan 杜宣; Henei. Formerly Administrator of Kuaiji, about 140 Du Xuan persuaded the local magistrate Cui Yuan that a stele should be set up at the funerary temple of the Grand Duke Lü Wang 太公呂望, founder of the ancient state of Qi 齊. -SJZ 9:7a.

Du Yang 杜陽; Henei. An uncle of Han Hao, in 190 he was held by Dong Zhuo in an attempt to persuade Han Hao to change sides. Han Hao paid no attention. -SGZ 9:269.

Du Yang 都陽/羊 see Duyang 都陽/羊.

Du Yi 杜愔/憶. An Internuncio, Du Yi was a friend of Ma Yuan. In 48 Ma Yuan left the capital to take command of the campaign against the non-Chinese of Wuling; as they said their farewells he expressed his satisfaction at his own service to the dynasty, but was concerned for the future of his family. -HHS 24/14: 843.

Du Yong 杜永 (d.139?). A eunuch, in 139 Du Yong was Supervisor of the Retinue of Emperor Shun. He joined Zhang Kui and others in claiming that the father of the empress, Liang Shang, and the rival eunuchs Cao Teng and Meng Ben were planning to depose the emperor. Emperor Shun doubted the story, and when the conspirators had Cao Teng and Meng Ben arrested he became furious and had them killed. -HHS 6:268, 43/24:1176, 101/11:3245 [which last, however, says that some committed suicide and others escaped].

Du You 杜祐; Yingchuan. A local officer under the Administrator Yin Xiu, about 189 Du You was nominated for commissioned appointment. -SGZ 13:392.

Du Yu 杜虞 see Du Wu 杜吳. -DGHJ 23:2b.

Du Yuan 杜元; Nanyang. Son of Du Mao, in 43 Du Yuan succeeded to his father's district marquise. In 71 he was accused of involvement in the alleged conspiracy of Liu Ying, King of Chu, and though he escaped the death penalty by one degree, his fief was abolished. -HHS 22/12:778.

Du Yuan 杜瑗 [Zigao 次高]; Nanyang. Described as a private gentleman 處士, in 156 Du Yuan was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele of the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:17a.

Du Zan 督瓚 became Administrator of Wuyuan. -FSTY 6f:140.

Du Zhen 杜真 [Mengzong 孟宗]; Guanghan. A man of filial piety, Du Zhen was an expert on the Book of Changes and Chunqiu.

In the late 120s the Court Architect Zhai Fu was accused of conspiracy and threatened with death. Du Zhen's elder brother had served at one time under Zhai Fu, and Du Zhen therefore gathered signatures and presented a petition in his favour. He was himself arrested and suffered six hundred strokes of the bastinado, but Zhai Fu was eventually found innocent and released.

As a result of this, Du Zhen gained a great reputation at the capital, and many invitations to official position. Disgusted with the government, however, he distributed his property amongst his kinsmen and lived in retirement. -HHS 48/38:1605, HYGZ 10B:149.

Du Zhong 杜眾 (d.159); Hongnong. In 159 Du Zhong was Officer of Merit in his commandery when Li Yun, a county magistrate of Dong, sent in a memorial which criticised the favour shown by Emperor Huan to his eunuch associates. The emperor was furious. He had Li Yun arrested, and though several officials pleaded for him the ruler remained adamant.

Though he does not appear to have had any direct relationship with him, Du Zhong so admired Li Yun's stand that he asked to share his fate. His wish was granted: he was arrested and executed.

The eunuch Guan Ba had argued unsuccessfully to Emperor Huan that Li Yun and Du Zhong were too insignificant to be worth his attention, but the ruler had clearly lost his temper, and the two men's deaths marked the end of any honeymoon period the new regime of his personal rule might have hoped for. Their sad fates were frequently cited by the Confucianist reformers against Emperor Huan and his eunuch allies; by unfortunate coincidence, moreover, their surnames matched those of the worthy Li Gu and Du Qiao in an earlier generation. -HHS 57/47:1852; deC 89:18-20.

Du [Zhongchang] 杜仲長; Nanyang. Evidently a local gentleman, in 153 Du Zhongchang set up a stele at the temple to Mount Peng 彭山廟, in the border hill country near present-day Pingdingshan in Henan. -SJZ 31:3b.

Du Zhoufu 杜周甫; Yingchuan. About 140 Du Zhoufu maintained a private academy in his home commandery. When he was a young man, Guo Liang was one of his pupils. -HHSJJ 63/53:2276 Shen Qinhan.

Du [Zichun] 杜子春; Henan. A former student of the celebrated Liu Xin 劉歆, about 60 Du Zichun compiled a commentary to the Old Text Zhou li. -Yao Zhenzong:2317.

Duan Chen 段郴. In 50, as the Xiongnu prince Bi sought agreement with Han, the General of the Household Duan Chen was sent to present him with a seal as Shanyu, but also to enforce upon him the humiliation of a kowtow. Duan Chen then had him take up residence in Yunzhong, and soon afterwards transferred his court to Meiji in Xihe. He became the first Emissary.

When the Shanyu Bi died in 56, Duan Chen presented condolences and offerings on behalf of Han. -HHS 1B:78, 89/79:2943-48; deC 84:237-238.

Duan Cheng 鍛成; Ji'nan. A member of the Imperial Secretariat about 75, Duan Cheng was awarded an inscribed sword by Emperor Zhang. -XC 2:11b.

Duan Chong 段崇 [Ligao 禮高] (d.110); Hanzhong. Well-respected locally, Duan Chong became Registrar to the Administrator Zheng Qin. When rebel Qiang came to attack in 110, Duan Chong warned Zheng Qin to stay on the defensive, but Zheng Qin took the commandery militia out and was heavily defeated. Duan Chong, his son and his nephew, with the officers Wang Zong and Yuan Zhan, fought to protect their master, but all of them were killed.

Duan Chong's heroism was later reported to the throne, and in 118 an imperial letter ordered a grant of grain to his family. -HHS 87/77:2887, HYGZ 10C:169.

Duan Gong 段恭 [Jieying 節英]; Guanghan. When he was young Duan Gong travelled in search of learning. In the course of thirteen years he visited over seventy commanderies and studied under a wide variety of teachers. He became skilled in astronomy and astrology, and he received the scholar Yu Shuya from distant Dongping.

About 130 Duan Gong was sent by his commandery as Reporting Officer for the annual assembly at the imperial court. The Grand Commandant Pang Can was at that time suffering accusations from factional enemies, and sent apologies for his absence on grounds of illness. Duan Gong, however, told of Pang Can's wide reputation for honesty and fair dealing. As a result Pang Can was restored to favour: palace eunuchs were sent to enquire about his health and the Court Physician was sent with wine and meat. -HHS 51/41:1691, HYGZ 10B:148.

Duan Guang 段光 [Shixian 世賢]; Wei. As a county magistrate in Runan in 160, Duan Guang had a dream in which he saw Sun Shu'ao 孫叔敖, a celebrated minister of the ancient state of Chu 楚 [SJ 119:3099]. He set up a shrine for his worship and searched out his lineal descendants to maintain the sacrifices. -LS 3:4b-9b; Ebrey 86:627-628.

Duan Gui 段珪 [Ziyin 子殷] (d.189); Jiyin. A eunuch, in 160 Duan Gui was an Attendant at the Yellow Gates and held property in his home country. His retainers and those of his colleague Hou Lan, who had estates close by in Shanyang, robbed and plundered the neighbouring territory. Teng Yan the Chancellor of Jibei caught them and killed them, but Hou Lan and Duan Gui reported Teng Yan to the throne and he was dismissed from office.

In the time of Emperor Ling Duan Gui was promoted to be a Regular Attendant and was enfeoffed as a marquis. On 22 September 189, as He Jin called upon his sister the Dowager and urged her to destroy the eunuchs, Duan Gui joined Zhang Rang in gathering a group to waylay and kill him. They sought to have the Imperial Secretariat draw up orders so they and their supporters could seize power, but the plan failed and He Jin's former troops attacked the palace compounds. Duan Gui led the Dowager He, together with the young emperor and his brother Liu Xie, future Emperor Xian, along the Covered Way from the Southern to the Northern Palace. Lu Zhi accosted the party, and though Duan Gui escaped he was compelled to let the Lady He go.

Two days later Zhang Rang and Duan Gui fled the capital with the imperial children and went north to cross the Yellow River. They were chased and caught by Lu Zhi and a small posse led by Min Gong; the eunuchs were either killed or drowned. -HHS 78/68:2522, 2534, 67/57:2251-52; deC 96:14-16.

Duan Jian 段建 or Yin Jian 殷建; Yingchuan. In 23 Duan Jian was recommended by his fellow-countryman Feng Yi and joined the staff of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. He accompanied him to Luoyang, but is not mentioned again. -HHS 17/7:639.

Duan Jiong 段頰 or Duan Gong, also as Duan Ying 穎 [Jiming 紀明] (d.179); Wuwei. Duan Jiong's great-grand-uncle Duan Huizong 段會宗 had been Protector-General of the Western Regions in the time of Former Han [QHX:86-87]. As a young man, Duan Jiong became an expert archer and horseman, and prided himself on military virtues and rejection of property. He later became involved in Confucian learning, and about 150 he was recommended Filial and Incorrupt. He served competently in some minor posts at the imperial tomb parks, and was then sent out as Commandant of the Dependent State of Liaodong.

A group of Xianbi raided the frontier and Duan Jiong led troops in pursuit. Concerned that the enemy might escape, he forged orders for his withdrawal, halted his men and went back. The Xianbi believed that he was retreating and came after him, but Duan Jiong had prepared an ambush and heavily defeated them. He was charged with having forged an imperial document and was sent to convict service, but because of his success he was required to serve only two years. When his sentence was finished he returned to the court as a Consultant.

Some thirty thousand bandits of Taishan and Langye, led by Dongguo Dou and Gongsun Ju, had ravaged the region. Several expeditions had been sent against them without success, and in 156 the government called for nominations of commanders who might deal with them. The Excellency Yin Song recommended Duan Jiong, and he was given command as a General of the Household. His operations were completely successful: he is said to have killed ten thousand of the enemy, and the remainder scattered and fled. Duan Jiong was enfeoffed and awarded fifty thousand cash, and one of his sons was granted entry to the imperial service as a gentleman cadet.

In 159 Duan Jiong was sent to his home region of the northwest as Protector of the Qiang. Just at this time there were raids along the borders of Jincheng and Longxi led by the Shaodang, Shaohe, Dangjian and Lejie tribes of the west. Duan Jiong led out his troops, with twelve thousand horsemen of the Huangzhong Auxiliary, and set a trap for the raiders. He defeated them, pursued them along the Yellow River beyond the frontier, and inflicted heavy losses.

In the spring of the following year the Shaohe attacked north into Zhangye and gathered the local non-Chinese to mount an attack on Duan Jiong's camp. Though heavily out-numbered, Duan Jiong fought the enemy hand-to-hand and forced them to withdraw. Following up this success, he led his men in a remarkable pursuit, maintaining continuous contact for six weeks, harrowing them for a thousand kilometres across the mountains south to the Yellow River, and finally bringing them to bay at Jishi Mountain south of the Koko Nor, well outside the Chinese frontier. He killed their chieftains and thousands of their men, then raided and slaughtered the neighbouring tribes.

Despite this demonstration of power and range, in the winter the Lejie and Lianyu tribes attacked Yuanjie, capital of Jincheng, and killed several Chinese officials. Duan Jiong again drove them away, but the frontier was obviously very unstable.

In 161 further groups of Qiang caused trouble in Longxi, while in the summer the Lianyu and the Xianlian tribes joined up within Chinese territory to raid as far as Chang'an. As Duan Jiong led the Auxiliary into Longxi, however, the Inspector Guo Hong interfered and caused him to halt. The Auxiliary troops, anxious to return home, mutinied, and Guo Hong put the blame on Duan Jiong. Duan Jiong was brought back to the capital and again sent to convict labour.

Duan Jiong's successor Hu Hong proved unable to deal with the situation, and in the winter Huangfu Gui was appointed in his place. He restored the situation, then investigated and impeached Guo Hong. Duan Jiong was released, and he was admired for the manner in which he had accepted his wrongful punishment.

After a short period as a Consultant, Duan Jiong returned to the frontier as Inspector of Bing province. In 163 the Dianna and other tribes of the Qiang ravaged Wuwei, Zhangye and Jiuquan, and although they were defeated there were fears the whole territory could be lost. In the winter Duan Jiong was reappointed Protector, and his reputation was such that by the spring of 164 more than three hundred chieftains of the Dianna had come to submit.

The Dangjian and Lejie continued recalcitrant, however, and Duan Jiong led ten thousand men against them. After initial success in the winter of 164, he forced the Lejie to surrender in the spring of 165, and in the summer he attacked the Dangjian base region in the Xining valley. This proved more difficult: his first attack was driven back and he and his men were besieged for three days. Then he sent a detachment to take the enemy from the rear, and as they broke up in confusion Duan Jiong embarked on another of his ferocious pursuits. From spring to autumn he harried the Qiang to starvation, and drove them to seek refuge in the north of Wuwei, far from their former home.

In his campaigns against the Western Qiang Duan Jiong had killed 23,000 people, captured tens of thousands more, seized millions of horses, cattle and sheep, and forced the surrender of over ten thousand camp-fire groups 落. He was granted a greater fief than before, with revenues from five hundred households. There was a last raid from the Dangjian tribe into Wuwei in 167, but Duan Jiong defeated them, and the Western Qiang, the people of the frontier lands and the Gansu corridor, were settled.

There remained, however, the Eastern Qiang, and particularly the Xianlian tribes. These people inhabited Chinese territory inside the Yellow River, notably Anding and Hanyang in Liang province and Beidi and Shang in the south of Bing province, and they had several times troubled the region about Chang'an. In the same year as Duan Jiong finished his dealings with the west, the Xianlian made successive rebellions and raids, and though they were defeated by Zhang Huan they were obviously a continuing problem. The government of Emperor Huan asked Duan Jiong's opinion, and one may assume both parties had prepared question and answer: Duan Jiong's recommendation was for a campaign to exterminate the aliens, and in particular the Xianlian tribe. He criticised Huangfu Gui and Zhang Huan for their mistaken leniency, asked for five thousand horse and ten thousand foot, with three thousand baggage carts, and undertook to destroy the enemy at a cost of less than 5.5 million cash. The court approved, and he began his operations in the winter of 167.

In the spring of 168 Duan Jiong attacked the main force of the Xianlian at Fengyi Mountain in Anding. Though faced with heavy odds, he rallied his men for a charge, sent cavalry against the enemy flanks, and completely defeated them. Emperor Huan had died, but the Dowager Dou, regent for the young Emperor Ling, issued an edict of approval and rewarded Duan Jiong with gold and appointment as a general.

In summer Duan Jiong embarked on another attack, this time beginning further north and east to drive the Qiang in flight across the Ordos. Harrying them south through Anding, by the winter he had driven them into the hill country to the north of Hanyang.

The experienced Zhang Huan now questioned the ferocity of the campaign, but when his comments were sent to Duan Jiong he replied indignantly that his operations were ahead of schedule and well below budget, and asked to be left alone without distraction. The court did send the Internuncio Feng Shan to give the non-Chinese people some opportunity to surrender, but those who failed to do so were left to Duan Jiong's mercies.

In the spring of 169 he approached the enemy at Fanting Mountain. The Qiang launched a fierce attack, but the Chinese and the Huangzhong Auxiliary held firm, and the tribesmen retreated once more south into Hanyang, where they took a defensive position at Shoot-Tiger Valley, south of the Wei. Duan Jiong set an abatis to block further escape into the Qin Ling ranges, then occupied the heights and surrounded the enemy. In a final massacre he killed almost twenty thousand and took all their goods and chattels.

The Eastern Qiang were now "pacified" – the whole campaign had taken just four hundred Chinese lives and less than 4.5 million cash. Duan Jiong was awarded a county fief and the revenue from ten thousand households. We are told that he always treated his troops well, cared for them in sickness and shared their hardships; in ten years campaigning he never slept in a comfortable bed. His men were devoted to him.

Early in 170 Duan Jiong came in triumph to the capital, leading fifty thousand non-Chinese troops, with ten thousand captives and some of the celebrated "blood-sweating thousand-li horses" 汗血千里馬 in his train. He was welcomed by the Minister Herald, and as the army reached Luoyang he was appointed a Palace Attendant, Bearer of the Mace, and then Intendant of Henan.

Henan brought trouble, for when the tomb of an Honoured Lady Feng was broken into and robbed Duan Jiong was formally responsible. He was demoted to be a Counsellor Remonstrant, but as a supporter of Wang Fu, one of the eunuchs who dominated the government of Emperor Ling, he had no difficulty in retaining his fief and his wealth.

In 172 slogans opposed to the eunuchs appeared on a gate of the capital, and after the Director of Retainers Liu Meng had failed to pursue the matter Duan Jiong was appointed in his stead. He promptly ran a purge of the students at the University, and when Wang Fu arranged false accusations against the eunuchs Zheng Li and Dong Teng, Duan Jiong had them arrested and executed. The value of his fief was increased by four thousand households.

In the summer of 173 Duan Jiong became Grand Commandant, highest office in the bureaucracy, but was taken ill and resigned in the winter of that year. He was later re-appointed Director of Retainers, then became Administrator of Yingchuan. [In 177 his former lieutenants Xia Yu and Tian Yan launched a major attack on the Xianbi. Though Duan Jiong was an energetic exponent of the offensive, it is probable that he was in Yingchuan and was not consulted. Certainly the campaign was a disaster.]

Returning to court as a Palace Counsellor, in the third month of 179 Duan Jiong was again appointed Grand Commandant. When there was an eclipse of the sun on the first day of the fourth month Duan Jiong took formal responsibility for the omen, but other senior officials used the occasion to present real complaints against him: the emperor ordered him to hand in his seal and attend the prison of the Minister of Justice. Yang Qiu, Director of Retainers at this time, accused Wang Fu of extortion and implicated Duan Jiong in the charge. As he was about to be interrogated Duan Jiong took poison.

Duan Jiong's family and retainers were banished to the frontier, but the eunuch Lü Qiang wrote to recall Duan Jiong's achievements and Emperor Ling gave permission for his wife and children to return to their home.

The energy with which Duan Jiong pursued his beaten enemies, and his campaign of extermination against the Eastern Qiang in 168 and 169, gained a brief period of peace along the frontier. Many, however, were appalled by his cruelty, and the results of his success were soon overwhelmed by the realities of Chinese weakness on the ground. In his own lifetime, Duan Jiong saw the destruction of a major expeditionary force against the Xianbi, commanded by his former officers Xia Yu and Tian Yan, and five years after his death the rebellion in Liang province raised by Beigong Boyu largely removed that territory from the control of Han. -HHS 65/55:2145-54*, 87/77:2897-98; Young 84, deC 84:126-149, deC 89:62, 89-95, 107-109, 127, 154-155.

Duan Jiu 段舊; Guanghan. Duan Jiu was the elder son of Duan Liaoshu. The Administrator Wu Shigong, a friend of his father, nominated Duan Jiu for office. Local officers advised him that Duan Jiu was dull, and of limited ability, while his brother Kun was a far more promising candidate. Wu Shigong nonetheless confirmed his decision, explaining that to choose the younger man would damage proper relationships within the family. -FSTY 4:30-31.

Duan Kui 段馗; Liaodong. A noted astrologer and soothsayer, about 150 Duan Kui explained the appearance of a yellow dragon in the southeast of the empire as a sign that a Perfect Man 真人 would emerge from that region fifty years later. The prophecy was said to be fulfilled by Cao Cao's triumph over Yuan Shao in 200 and his effective hegemony over the empire thereafter. -SGZ 1:22.

Duan Kun 段髡; Guanghan. Duan Kun was the younger son of Duan Liaoshu. The Administrator Wu Shigong, a friend of his father, nominated Duan Kun's elder brother Duan Jiu for office. Local officers advised him that Duan Kun was a far more promising candidate, but Wu Shigong explained that choosing the younger man would harm the family. -FSTY 4:30-31.

Duan [Liaoshu] 段遼叔; Guanghan. Chief Clerk under the Excellency over the Masses about 140, Duan Liaoshu was the same age as the Administrator Wu Shigong, who nominated his son Duan Jiu for office. -FSTY 4:30-31.

Duan Peng 段彭. Administrator of Jiuquan in 75, Duan Peng was sent to aid the besieged garrison at Liuzhong in Nearer Jushi. With seven thousand commandery troops and support from the state of Shanshan he relieved the defenders in the following year and restored Nearer Jushi to its allegiance. Despite this success Emperor Zhang ordered a withdrawal and ended the military colonies in that region. -HHS 2:130-133, 88/78:2909.

Duan Su 段肅 see Yin Su 殷肅.

Duan Wei 段煨 [Zhongming 忠明] (d.209); Wuwei. In 191, as Dong Zhuo withdrew from Luoyang to Chang'an, Duan Wei was left in charge of defences at Huayin in Hongnong, south of the Wei by its junction with the Yellow River. Taking title as a general, he established a local command, encouraged farming and set up a stele to commemorate his repair work at a local temple to Mount Hua.

As Emperor Xian fled from Chang'an in 195, Duan Wei prepared provisions to receive him. Yang Ting and others of the escort had a quarrel with Duan Wei. Claiming that he was planning treachery, they asked to attack him and then did so without leave. Duan Wei defended himself, but rejected the assistance offered by Li Jue and Guo Si and maintained his support for the emperor's escape. Emperor Xian ordered the factions to make peace, and the journey continued to the east.

In 198 Duan Wei and other leaders about Chang'an, on instructions from Cao Cao's officer Pei Mao, joined to destroy Li Jue. Duan Wei was enfeoffed and named Administrator of Beidi; he was later Minister Herald at the Han court under Cao Cao. He died of old age. -HHS 72/62:2338-42 & JJ at 2551 Hui Dong, SGZ 10:328, SJZ 19:35a.

Duan Xi 段禧 (d.110). Early in 107 Duan Xi was Commandant of Cavalry in the Western Regions when the Protector-General Ren Shang was recalled. Duan Xi was appointed as his successor and set his base at the fortress of Tuogan in Qiuzi [Kuqa]. As the Senior Colonel Liang Qin arranged for the army to move into the capital city, however, the people of the state rebelled against their king Boba and his Chinese allies. The trouble was suppressed, but the imperial government was now concerned at the costs and dangers of the whole enterprise in the Western Regions.

That summer the office of Protector-General was ended and all troops and colonists were recalled. In the following year, 108, early in the great Qiang rebellion, Duan Xi was named Protector of the Qiang. He died of illness two years later. -HHS 47/37:1591, 87/77:2886-87.

Duan Xiao 段孝. In 24 Duan Xiao was officer responsible for discipline under Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who at that time held title as Grand Marshal under the Gengshi Emperor. The new arrival Jia Fu held equivalent office on Liu Xiu's staff in his capacity as a general. Duan Xiao objected to Jia Fu receiving the same precedence as he did, arguing that his position under the Grand Marshal should rank higher. Jia Fu argued that their ranks were irrelevant, for they were both concerned to serve Liu Xiu. -HHS 17/7:665, DGHJ 8:5a.

Duan Xun 段訓 or Yin Xun 殷訓. In 193 Duan Xun was sent from Chang'an to the northeast with awards for Liu Yu and Gongsun Zan. Gongsun Zan had just fought and captured Liu Yu; he now charged him with treason and obliged Duan Xun to have him executed. He then named Duan Xun as Inspector of You province. -HHS 73/63, 2357, SGZ 8:243; deC 96:121-122.

Duan Yi 段翳 [Yuanzhang 元章]; Guanghan. A scholar of the Book of Changes and expert at divination by the wind, Duan Yi was noted for his knowledge of visitors well before they arrived. He lived in retirement and never accepted office.

One of his students believed he had learnt all he needed and prepared to leave. Duan Yi told him he would be involved in a fight as he was returning home, and provided ointment to heal his wounds. The fracas took place just as he said, and the young man returned to seek further instruction. -HHS 82/72A:2719*, HYGZ 10B:144; Ngo 76:98, DeWoskin 83:60-61, Vervoorn 90:190.

Duan Zhi 段志 also as Yin Zhi 殷志 (d.42). As General of Agile Cavalry in 41, Duan Zhi was sent with Ma Yuan to deal with the religious rebel Li Guang in Lujiang.

In the following year, he was again despatched to assist Ma Yuan in his attack on the rebel Zheng/Tr'ung sisters in Jiaozhi. With title as General of Towered Ships 樓舟將軍, he was responsible for the fleet of some 2,000 ships to accompany the invasion force by sea. As Ma Yuan brought his levies from Jing province to the coast at Hepu, however, Duan Zhi died. -HHS 1B:68-69, 24/14:838, 86/76:2836-37; Bn 67:64.

Duan Zhong 段忠. In 36 Duan Zhong was sent as an Internuncio in charge of a labour force of reprieved convicts to assist the general Du Mao construct defence works against Lu Fang and the Xiongnu in the region of Yanmen, Dai and Shanggu. -HHS 22/12:777; Bn 67:110.

Duan Zhu 段著. Scholars of the mid-first century, Duan Zhu and others lived near Zhang Ba at Luoyang to benefit from his learning. -HHS 36/26:1241, HYGZ 10A:133.

Dugan 都紺; Xiongnu. Dugan was a king of the Xiongnu royal house in 166, when the Shanyu Juche'er made an alliance with the Xianbi and the Wuhuan and raided Chinese positions. Dugan evidently remained loyal to Han.

When the general Zhang Huan returned to the north, the Xiongnu and Wuhuan surrendered. Zhang Huan recommended Juche'er be dismissed for disloyalty and lack of authority, and suggested Dugan replace him, but Emperor Huan permitted Juche'er to keep his position. -HHJ 22:265.

Duguan 杜灌 see Duhu 杜濩. -SGZ 8:264.

Duhu 杜濩; non-Chinese. Towards the end of the second century the Zong people of Ba commandery, naturally superstitious, were attracted by the teachings of Zhang Lu, and during the period of confrontation between Zhang Lu and Liu Zhang they and other tribespeople were able to establish a measure of independence from Chinese administration. Duhu was one of their leaders.

When Cao Cao attacked in the summer of 215, Zhang Lu went to take refuge with Duhu and Fuhu of the Banshun clans. In the autumn Duhu and Fuhu, with their colleague Yuan/Ren Yue, went to submit to Cao Cao. They received titles as marquises and were sent back as administrators: Duhu was named to the western territory of Baxi. In the winter Zhang Lu followed his allies' example and surrendered.

Soon afterwards the non-Chinese forces were defeated by Huang Quan, officer in the service of Liu Bei, and the various groups fled north to Cao Cao's territory in the Wei valley. -SGZ 1:46, 8:264, SGZ Shu

Dumo 都末 of Yutian [Khotan] (d.60). A man of noble family, in 60 Dumo led his kinsmen to assassinate Junde, the oppressive governor who had been appointed by the hegemon King Xian of Suoju [Yarkand].

Soon afterwards Dumo and his associates were themselves killed by the chieftain Xiumoba and the Chinese Han Rong. -HHS 88/78:2925.

Dun Zixian 頓子獻. A former commandery Investigator, Dun Zixian became ill but then recovered. He went to the doctor Hua Tuo, who took his pulse and advised him that the sickness was still present and that he must avoid any exertion, including sexual intercourse, as a relapse could kill him. The fatal moment would be known by a protrusion of his tongue for several inches.

When Dun Zixian's wife heard he was cured, she travelled a hundred li to care for him. The couple had intercourse, however, and Dun Zixian died three days later, just as Hua Tuo had foretold. -SGZ 29:800.

Fa Du 法度 (d.124). Administrator of Taiyuan in 124, Fa Du was appointed General on the Liao. He died in that office a few months later. -HHS 89/79:2959.

Fa Miao 法邈; Youfufeng. Son of Fa Xiong, after his father's death in 220 Liu Bei enfeoffed Fa Miao as a secondary marquis. Fa Miao was later Commandant of the Equipage and titular Administrator of Hanyang, a territory to which Shu-Han laid claim but did not in fact control. -SGZ Shu 7:961.

Fa Shi 法氏 [sobriquet?]. A leader of rebels in Jing province in 162, Fa Shi may have been a non-Chinese of Wuling. In 162 he and other chieftains surrendered to the great imperial army led by Feng Gun. -HHSJJ 38/28:1364 Hui Dong quoting the stele honouring Feng Gun, LS 7:13b.

Fa Xiong 法雄 [Wenqiang 文彊]; Youfufeng. Fa Xiong's family claimed descent from the ancient royal house of Qi 齊, transferred to the capital district in the time of Emperor Xuan of Former Han, and many members had held high office.

Fa Xiong became Officer of Merit in his commandery, then entered the offices of the Grand Tutor Zhang Yu at the capital in 106 or 107. He was graded First Class and became a magistrate in Nanyang. Noted for excellent administration and the good order he brought to the territory, he was recommended by the Administrator Bao De and transferred to the chief county of Danyang.

In 109 the pirate chieftain Zhang Bolu ravaged the commanderies of the east, and in the following year Fa Xiong was appointed Inspector of Qing province and sent to support the Censorate official Wang Zun in operations against them. Just as they gained the upper hand there was an edict for a general pardon, and Wang Zun called a council to consider what the army should do. Most commanders wanted to maintain the attack, but Fa Xiong argued that it would be better to treat the raiders leniently and persuade them to submit. Wang Zong agreed, and the pirates did surrender and returned the prisoners they had taken. The Administrator of Donglai failed to disband his troops, however, and the bandits took fright: they fled to the islands of the Gulf of Zhili and resumed their raiding. In 111 Fa Xiong led local troops to defeat them and drive them across the sea to Liaodong. The remnants were destroyed there and the province was settled.

As Inspector, Fa Xiong made regular circuits of the territory, interviewing prisoners and reviewing their convictions and sentences, and he ensured the dismissal of any official who had acted unlawfully. After four years he was transferred as Administrator to Nan commandery. He again reduced the number of criminal convictions, and increasing numbers of people came to the territory.

For several years the commandery had been troubled by tigers and wolves from the wild country of the rivers and the Yunmeng marshland. The previous Administrator had tried to hunt them out, but the casualty rate only increased. Fa Xiong issued a proclamation ordering a halt to this policy and an end to trapping and hunting. As the animals were left in peace their harm to humans was greatly reduced.

Fa Xiong's years in Nan were marked by excellent harvests, reflecting his virtuous government. He died in office about 120. -HHS 38/28:1276-78*.

Fa Yan 法衍 [Jimou 季謀]; Youfufeng. Son of Fa Zhen, Fa Yan was appointed to the offices of the Excellency over the Masses at Luoyang and was then a senior official under the Minister of Justice. -SGZ

Shu 7:957.

Fa Zhen 法真 [Gaoqing 高卿 or Qiaoqing 喬卿] (100-188); Youfufeng. Son of Fa Xiong, when he was still a boy Fa Zhen went to visit his father, who was then Administrator of Nan commandery. His father arranged for him to observe the morning assembly of his officers from behind a screen and asked him to comment upon them. Fa Zhen remarked that Hu Guang had the air of a man who could reach for the highest office, and Hu Guang indeed became one of the long-serving Excellencies of Han.

Fa Zhen studied the Confucian classics, the apocrypha and the works of Laozi, but he did not follow any particular school or teacher. A quiet man with few desires, he was recognised as the leading scholar of the west and received hundreds of students. He rejected all offers of nomination and office at the capital, including a personal approach from the Administrator, and even refused four specific invitations from Emperor Shun.

Isolating himself in marshlands, Fa Zhen died at the age of eighty-nine. His friend Guo Sheng eulogised him as the Master of Hidden Virtue 玄德先生. -HHS 83/73:2774*, 44/34:1505, XC 6:7b, SGZ Shu 7:957; Vervoorn 90:186-187.

Fa Zheng 法正 [Xiaozi 孝直] (176-220); Youfufeng. Son of Fa Yan, Fa Zheng was a man of distinguished family. In the late 190s he and his fellow-countryman Meng Da abandoned the devastated region about Chang'an and travelled south to join Liu Zhang, warlord Governor of Yi province.

Fa Zheng became a county magistrate and then a colonel on Liu Zhang's staff, but he was disappointed at his lack of recognition and resentful at the insults he suffered from his fellow-refugees. The Attendant Officer Zhang Song, a friend of Fa Zheng, was likewise unhappy with Liu Zhang, and after an abortive embassy to Cao Cao he had come to regard Liu Bei as an alternative. Following the battle of the Red Cliffs Zhang Song persuaded Liu Zhang to send Fa Zheng on embassy to Liu Bei and to take him support troops. Fa Zheng also transferred allegiance, so he and Zhang Song were now secret agents of Liu Bei.

In 211 the two men persuaded Liu Zhang to call Liu Bei to assist him against Zhang Lu and the threat from Cao Cao in the north. Fa Zheng was again the envoy, and he encouraged Liu Bei to come into Yi province and then seize it from Liu Zhang. As Liu Bei did this Fa Zheng gave regular advice and support, culminating in an eloquent letter to Liu Zhang urging him to surrender.

When Liu Bei took control of government at Chengdu in 214 Fa Zheng was made Administrator of Shu, the capital commandery, with title as a general and continuing influence in council. He worked with Zhuge Liang and others to compile the administrative code Shu ke 屬科, and though he and Zhuge Liang disagreed on a number of occasions they respected each other's abilities.

It is said that Fa Zheng made use of his new powers to pay back old favours and scores, killing several people without authority. When Zhuge Liang was asked to intervene he observed that Liu Bei owed his good fortune to Fa Zheng, and it was pointless to try to restrain him. Another account says that Zhuge Liang introduced strict government; Fa Zheng urged him to be more humane and pay attention to local custom but Zhuge Liang replied that it was first necessary to be firm so as to establish good order and make the people appreciate leniency. The two stories are contradictory.

In 217 Fa Zheng urged Liu Bei to attack Hanzhong, where Cao Cao had left his general Xiahou Yuan on guard. He then accompanied the army, and gave critical advice at the battle of Dingjun Mountain in 219. As Liu Bei proclaimed himself King of Hanzhong later that year, Fa Zheng was one of the officials listed in the formal memorial to the emperor, with title as a general. He was then named Director of the royal Secretariat and General Protector of the Army, formally responsible for discipline.

When Fa Zheng died in the following year Liu Bei wept and gave him posthumous rank as a marquis, and after the disastrous attack on Sun Quan in Jing province in 222 Zhuge Liang sighed that, "If Fa Zheng had been here he would have dissuaded [Liu Bei], or arranged that things turned out differently." -SGZ Shu 7:957-62*.

Fan 樊, the Lady I; Nanyang. Daughter of a leading local family, she was a cousin of the mother of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. She married Liu Hong, also a kinsman, and bore him two sons, Liu Guo and Liu Min.

Liu Hong died at an early stage of the rebellion against Wang Mang, and the Lady Fan followed the Gengshi Emperor to Chang'an. In 26, after he was destroyed, she came east with her sons to join Emperor Guangwu at Luoyang. Both young men were enfeoffed as marquises. -HHS 14/4:567.

Fan 樊, the Lady II. One of the celebrated beauties of the empire, the Lady married an elder brother of Zhao Fan. When her husband died she joined the household of her brother-in-law.

As Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208, he sent Zhao Fan south as Administrator of Guiyang. After Cao Cao's defeat at the Red Cliffs a few months later, Zhao Fan was compelled to surrender to Liu Bei, who sent his own officer Zhao Yun to take his place. Presumably seeking a useful alliance, Zhao Fan proposed that he marry the Lady, but Zhao Yun observed that they were men of the same surname, so if he married the Lady it would be like wedding the widow of his own brother. He refused the offer. -SGZ Shu 2:879.

One may compare the punctilious attitude of Zhao Yun with the more relaxed advice given by Fa Zheng to Liu Bei when he was considering marriage to the Lady Wu, widow of his fellow-clansman Liu Mao. The Lady Wu duly became Liu Bei's consort and empress. Fan 范 [personal name unknown]; Lujiang. In 185 he was Administrator of Wu. The celebrated scholar Gao Biao, who came from that commandery, had died in the previous year and Fan arranged for leaders of the community to set up a stele in his honour. LS 10:25b.

Fan 汎 of Weili (d.94). King of Weili, Fan was a long-term ally and dependent of the state of Yanqi [Karashar]. In 94 the Protector-General Ban Chao brought a large army against the territory and Fan and many officers, accompanied by King Guang of Yanqi, came to surrender.

The two kings were executed at the same place as the former Protector-General Chen Mu had met his death in 73. Their heads were sent to Luoyang. -HHS 47/37:1581-82.

Fan A 樊阿; Pengcheng. An expert in acupuncture, Fan A specialised in deep penetration. Where other doctors inserted the needle barely a fraction of an inch, Fan A would enter one or two inches, sometimes even five or six, and his patients were all said to recover.

About 200 Fan A studied under the celebrated doctor Hua Tuo, who taught him the preparation of medicines, advising him on those which guarded against the three worms of mortality 三蟲 and which improved bodily health. Fan A followed his instructions and is said to have lived over a hundred years. -HHS 82/72B:2739-40; SGZ 29:804; Ngo 76:123-126, DeWoskin 83:148-149.

Fan An 樊安 [Zizhong 子仲 or Ziyou 子佑] (103-158); Nanyang. A eunuch, Fan An held a series of appointments in the palace and rose to be a Regular Attendant. Members of his family gained high office, and when Fan An died he received posthumous appointment as a Commandant of Cavalry.

Fan An's adopted son had a stele in his memory set up in his home country in 165. The inscription provides him with an impressive genealogy, praises his fine qualities and describes how he was well read in history and skilled in the Classic of Poetry, in the Analects and in the Book of Filial Piety. -LS 6:21a-23a, SJZ 29:20a.

Fan Bin 范邠. Commandant of Juyan about 121, Fan Bin was found guilty of bribery and proscribed from office. There was question whether the penalty should be extended to his family, but the Excellency Liu Kai urged that punishment for ill-doing should be applied to the individual, not to his descendants, and Emperor An accepted his argument. -HHS 39/29:1308-09.

Fan [Bodi] 范伯第. After the high minister Chen Fan was dismissed from office in 163, he went back to his home in Runan. As his party was travelling through a village some of his followers caused trouble and the local headman seized them. He wanted to arrest Chen Fan too, but Chen Fan claimed that his rank entitled him to deal directly with the most senior officials. He was accordingly released, and the local magistrate Fan Bodi killed the troublesome headman soon afterwards. -FSTY 7:56.

Fan Can 樊参 or Fan Shen (d.25). In 25 Fan Shen was a chief general in the service of the Gengshi Emperor. Deng Yu, general of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu, had laid siege to Anyi the capital of Hedong. Fan Shen brought a large force north across the Yellow River to relieve the city, but Deng Yu sent a detachment from his army which defeated Fan Shen and killed him. -HHS 15/5:601.

Fan Changsun 樊長孫. About 110 Fan Changsun wrote to the scholar Liu Qianqiu proposing the compilation of a comprehensive guide to the offices of Han. -HHS 114/24:3555-56.

Fan Chen 樊郴; Nanyang. Second son of Fan Shu, Fan Chen became a gentleman cadet, but probably died soon afterwards. -HHS 32/22:1124.

Fan Chong 樊崇 I [Xijun 細君] (d.27); Langye. Chief of a band of a hundred men in Ju county of Langye, Fan Chong styled himself Thrice Venerable, traditional title of a village elder. About 15 AD he crossed into Taishan commandery and set his base in the area of Youlai Mountain, present-day Cilai Shan in the Taishan massif. As Qing and Xu provinces suffered from famine, there was increasing unrest, and within a year Fan Chong had ten thousand people under his command, while other bands, led by Pang An of his own commandery and by Xu Xuan, Xie Lu and Yang Yin of Donghai, also came to join him.

Discussing the origins of the group later known as the Red Eyebrows, and their influence on the fall of Wang Mang, Bielenstein emphasises that these were people of commoner, peasant origin, not inevitably opposed to the government, and not basically influenced by religious beliefs, still less by fanaticism. He has argued that the source of the movement was popular distress brought by massive flooding of the Yellow River: in the time of Emperor Ping, the first years AD, the river broke its dykes in the region of the Bian Canal by present-day Zhengzhou, and later breaches opened a vast area of uncontrolled streams, marshes and meanders southeast as far as the Huai River and the sea. Effectively the Yellow River had now two courses to the sea, one north and one south of the Shandong peninsula, and of these the southern route was quite uncontrolled. In human terms, the consequence was a vast displacement of people, driven north and south by flood and starvation, and these migrants in turn disrupted the economy and government across the whole eastern plain. The argument is well presented by Bielenstein in 54:147-149, who points out also that by about 20 AD several waves of migrants who had travelled south and west from the troubled area had reached the middle Yangzi and were involved in the disruption and discontent which inspired the bandits of Jiangxia, the Troops from Xinshi and the Troops of the Lower Yangzi, later allies of the gentry Han rebellion in Nanyang. See sub Wang Chang, Wang Kuang et al.

The full effect of these floods took time to work its way through the region, but the government of Wang Mang proved quite unable to cope with the work required to address the problem, and by 15 to 18 AD Fan Chong and his colleagues were at the head of a great horde of dispossessed and desperate people. Some members of the bands were of gentry origin, but the vast majority, including the leaders, were of poor and illiterate background, and even the titles of their chieftains, Thrice Venerable 三老, Assistant Officer

About 18, or soon afterwards, Fan Chong felt strong enough to attack the county city of Ju. He was unsuccessful, but he ravaged the country of northern Langye, and the local forces of the counties and commanderies were unable to bring them under control. The marquis Tian Kuang 田況 had raised levies for self-defence and kept the bandits out of his territory; he argued to the court that the problem had been greatly under-estimated and the correct solution was to co-ordinate a proper local response. In 21 Tian Kuang was given command over the combined forces of Qing and Xu provinces, but he was then defeated with heavy losses and was dismissed.

Fan Chong and his fellows extended their depredations into Qi, by the northern course of the Yellow River, then moved south into Donghai. They dominated the eastern part of the North China plain, and about this time, to distinguish themselves from the imperial forces which opposed them, they marked themselves with red colouring across the forehead: they thus became known as the Red Eyebrows 赤眉.

In the summer of 22 Wang Mang sent a large army under Wang Kuang 王匡 and Lien Dan 廉丹. Moving very slowly, and causing great distress in the countryside through which they passed, the imperial forces came up with the enemy only in the winter of that year. After successfully recapturing a county city in Dongping which had been seized by an internal revolt, they attacked a detachment of Red Eyebrows under Dong Xian in Liang commandery, but were utterly defeated. Lian Dan was killed and Wang Kuang fled back to the capital.

About this time Fan Chong again attacked Ju city, but broke off the operation, either because many of his men had relatives in Ju or, more probably, because the citizens paid a ransom. With further reinforcements, notably from the division of the band of pirates controlled by Mother Lü 呂母 who died about this time, he invaded Donghai, but he was defeated by local levies under the commandery Administrator.

By this stage, it appears that the depredations of the vast horde had all but exhausted the resources of the region, or certainly those easily accessible. During 22, in separate bands and waves the Red Eyebrows moved gradually westwards, first south into Chu and Pei, then north through Runan, Yingchuan and Chenliu towards the Yellow River. By the latter part of the year some groups were approaching Nanyang commandery, and it is again Bielenstein's argument that part of the inspiration for the revolt of Liu Bosheng and his associates in the name of Han came from the pressure of these approaching hordes.

The bulk of the Red Eyebrows, however, did not move so far west at this stage. With no direct goal, they were concerned to search for supplies wherever they might find them, and by the latter part of 23 they had turned north into Dong commandery. They may well have been seeking to return by a roundabout route to their homelands in the east, but found the floods of the region barring their way.

By this time Wang Mang had been overthrown, and in the winter of 23 the Gengshi Emperor invited Fan Chong and his fellows to his new capital at Luoyang. They offered submission and were rewarded with titles, but the honours they received from the new regime were accompanied by no useful income or formal influence, and they soon heard that their troops, deprived of their leadership, were beginning to disperse. Without opposition from the imperial government, Fan Chong and his colleagues left Luoyang and rejoined their men, but they now turned their minds to the wealth and power of the west.

Early in 24 the Red Eyebrows began to move. Fan Chong and Pang An went southwest into Nanyang, where they attacked Wan city, killed the magistrate in battle, but then crossed the Wu Pass into Hongnong. Another group, led by Xu Xuan, Xie Lu and Yang Yin, advanced through Henan, where they killed the Administrator, then journeyed south and west through the Luhun Pass into Hongnong. A third horde sought first to cross the Yellow River to the north, but was defeated by Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu; it too then travelled west, by-passing Luoyang but moving through the Hangu Pass. By the end of the year all had reached Hongnong, and the Gengshi Emperor, who had mistakenly transferred his capital to Chang'an, was isolated and trapped.

At the beginning of 25 the three columns regrouped, and they established a basic organisation of thirty divisions, each said to number 10,000 men, commanded by a Thrice Venerable and an Attendant Officer. In the first month they defeated the Gengshi Emperor's general Su Mao, and in the third month, still in Hongnong, they defeated another army under Li Song. In the summer they entered the valley of the Wei, and in the sixth month, at Zheng county in Jingzhao, they chose their own emperor, Liu Penzi.

In the autumn the Red Eyebrows crossed the Wei River and made their final attack on Chang'an from the north. They were joined by Wang Kuang, Zhang Ang and other chieftains of the commoner Troops who had joined the Han cause in Nanyang but now abandoned the Gengshi Emperor. Defeating the last Gengshi army under Li Song, the bandits entered the city and installed Liu Penzi in the palace. Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor fled north, but was arrested by one of his former officials. His loyal follower Liu Gong, brother of Liu Penzi, negotiated terms of surrender, but soon afterwards Liu Xuan was killed by Xie Lu.

The leaders of the Red Eyebrows now awarded themselves official positions, and though Fan Chong, like most of his colleagues, could neither read nor write, he was named Imperial Secretary; Xu Xuan, who had been keeper of a county jail and had an amateur's knowledge of the Book of Changes, took title as Imperial Chancellor.

These illiterate leaders of peasant insurgents were quite incapable of forming a government and showed no interest in doing so. They plundered Chang'an and its surroundings, but any pretence at ceremonial was meaningless, and court gatherings broke down in a chaos of rivalry, quarrelling and fighting.

By the beginning of 26 the Red Eyebrows had exhausted the available supplies of the capital region and, having sacked and burned the city and looting the imperial graves as they passed, they moved out to the south. Turning west as they came to the Qin Ling mountains, they climbed the Long Slope into the upper Wei valley. The journey made no strategic sense, and was evidently an extended foraging expedition, as the group still hoped to maintain a presence in the area of the capital. When they came into the territory of Wei Ao in the upper Wei, the bandits were twice defeated by his armies, and by autumn they had been forced to retreat; as they encountered heavy snowfalls on the passes, many died of the cold.

So the Red Eyebrows' military power was weakened, and as they returned to the lower Wei valley they were attacked by Deng Yu, general of Liu Xiu, now Emperor Guangwu. Deng Yu, however, was defeated and abandoned Chang'an, so the Red Eyebrows returned once more to the city. By now the morale and military strength of the disorganised masses were in critical decline. Once more quitting the capital, the bandits came down the Wei, and at the beginning of 27 they returned east into Hongnong.

Though they had gained success against Guangwu's generals Feng Yi and Deng Yu, great numbers began to surrender. One party went through the Hangu Pass, but was defeated near the Yellow River and disappeared. The main group returned through the Lulun Pass, but were met at Yiyang in Hongnong by Guangwu and his main army. With Feng Yi's troops behind them, and overwhelming forces in front, the Red Eyebrows asked to surrender. Granted their lives, they capitulated on 15 March.

Fan Chong and the other leaders were ordered to settle in the neighbourhood of the new imperial capital, Luoyang, where they could be kept under observation. Within a few months Fan Chong and Pang An again planned to rebel, possibly hoping to return to banditry in the east. They were found out, and in the summer they were executed. -HHS 11/1:478-86; Bn 54:137-162, Bn 59:40, 78-96, 120.

Fan Chong 樊崇 II (d.25). When Deng Yu was ordered west against the Gengshi Emperor in 24, he chose Fan Chong to be a general under his command. In the summer of 25 Wang Kuang and other chieftains came with a large army to break the siege of Anyi, capital of Hedong. Deng Yu's men had the worst of the initial encounter, and Fan Chong was killed. -HHS 16/6:601.

Fan Chong 范充; Nanyang. As Administrator of Wu and of Guiyang, Fan Chong taught people to cultivate silkworms and to make cloth. -XC 8:2a.

Fan Chou 樊儵/儵 see Fan Shu 樊儵/儵.

Fan Chou 樊稠 (d.195); Longxi? After Dong Zhuo was assassinated in 192 his follower Fan Chou joined Li Jue and Guo Si to capture Chang'an, taking third place in their ramshackle regime with titles as a general and a marquis. In the spring of 194 he joined Guo Si to defeat Ma Teng and Han Sui, and in autumn they repelled rebel Qiang from Youfufeng.

Fan Chou then agreed a truce with Han Sui and the two men spoke privately in sight of their armies. Fan Chou, however, had earlier abused Li Jue's nephew Li Li for not fighting hard enough, and Li Li now reported Fan Chou's dealings with Han Sui to his uncle.

Li Jue was already jealous of Fan Chou's popularity among the men. In the spring of 195 he invited Fan Chou to a meeting, killed him as he sat, and took over his troops. The murder marked the final falling out amongst the leaders at Chang'an. -HHS 9:375-77, 72/62:2333-36, SGZ 6:181-83.

Fan Dan 樊丹; Nanyang. Son of Fan Zhong and a maternal uncle of Emperor Guangwu, Fan Dan was enfeoffed as a county marquis in 37. -HHS 32/22: 1120.

Fan Dan 范丹 or Fan Ran 冉 [Shiyun 史雲] (112-185); Chenliu. As a young man Fan Dan became Officer of Merit to the county magistrate Niu Shu, and he was made a commandery Investigator at the age of eighteen. Ashamed to act as a spy, he left his post.

About 130 Fan Dan travelled to Nanyang to study under Fan Ying, then went to Fa Zhen and Ma Rong near Chang'an, returning after several years as an expert in the Confucian classics. He enjoyed eccentric and sometimes offensive behaviour, modelling himself upon Liang Hong and Min Gong, scholarly recluses of the first years of Later Han, and he intensely disliked receiving gifts or favours. He despised Jia Biao and Guo Tai, leaders of the students in the 160s, but was a friend of the officials Li Gu and Wang Huan. He fell out with Wang Huan, however, complaining that he paid more attention to his official duties than to his friends.

The Administrator Feng Dai, advised by Fu Rong, appointed Fan Dan as Officer of Merit for the commandery. He was then named a county magistrate in Taishan, but did not go because of his mother's death. He later joined the office of the Grand Commandant at the capital, and wore a leather girdle in court to remind himself not to speak too hastily. He was proposed for a position in the Imperial Censorate, but again avoided an investigative role and fled in disguise. He then made a living as a fortune-teller while his wife spun cloth.

From the late 160s Fan Dan was barred from office in the Great Proscription. He journeyed in the wilderness with his wife and children, dressed in shabby clothes to tell fortunes in market-places, gleaning for food but refusing help even from his own kin. His poverty was made proverbial by a popular chant, but he steadily maintained his countenance. When the Proscription ended in 184 all three Excellencies invited him to join their offices. He served briefly but then sought to resign. Because of the Yellow Turban rebellion and the emergency in the northwest anyone who left the clerical offices at the capital was liable to impeachment, but Fan Dan received special dispensation.

Invited once more, he refused on grounds of illness, and died in 185. His testament to his son Fan Xiang described his sense of failure and resignation in dealing with confused and turbulent times. Two thousand people, including representatives of the Excellencies, attended his funeral, the General-in-Chief He Jin had him honoured as "Gentleman of Pure Qualities" 貞節先生, and both the provincial and commandery authorities set up stele and offered memorials in his honour. -HHS 81/71:2688-90*, 68/58:2233, XC 6:2a-3a, YSS:19b-20a, Cai 2:7; Bn 81:573.

Fan Deng 樊登 (d.125). A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates, in 125 Fan Deng was an associate of the Dowager's brother Yan Xian, General of Chariots and Cavalry. As Sun Cheng led a coup against the Yan, Fan Deng urged Yan Xian to call up the regiments of the Northern Army, and to use the authority of the Dowager to summon Feng Shi and Yan Chong. Yan Xian sent Fan Deng and Feng Shi to gather reinforcements, but Feng Shi killed Fan Deng, returned to his own camp, and took no further part in the affair. -HHS 78/68:2515.

Fan Diao 樊調 see Fan Tiao 樊調.

Fan Duan 樊端; Nanyang. A grandson of Emperor Guangwu's associate Fan Hong, though his uncle Fan Shu was a leading Confucian, Fan Duan was attracted to Huang-Lao beliefs. He lived simply and frugally. -HHS 32/22:1125.

Fan E 樊阿 see Fan A 樊阿.

Fan Fan 范汜; Shanyang. Son of Fan Ji, Fan Fan was the grandfather of Fan Shi. -LS 19:17b.

Fan Fan 樊梵 [Wen'gao 文高]; Nanyang. Third son of Fan Shu, Fan Fan served as an officer of the Imperial Secretariat for more than twenty years. He was noted for his extreme punctiliousness, never doffing his official robes even when he was off duty. He was extremely wealthy, but gave all his goods to the children of an elder brother, probably Fan Chen, who died before him.

Fan Fan was later Minister Herald. -DGHJ 11:2b-3a, HHS 32/22:1124.

Fan Fang 范方. In 192 Fan Fang was a cavalry officer of Gongsun Zan seconded to support Liu Dai in Yan province. Liu Dai had taken in the wife and children of Yuan Shao, and when Gongsun Zan quarrelled with Yuan Shao he asked him to send his family away and abandon the alliance. Liu Dai refused, and Fan Fang returned to Gongsun Zan. -SGZ 14:425-26.

Fan Feng 樊豐 (d.125). A eunuch Regular Attendant, Fan Feng was a favourite of Emperor An and an associate of his uncle Geng Bao. Early in 124 he and some others took advantage of the emperor's absence from Luoyang to enhance their mansions in the city. The Excellency Yang Zhen acquired proof of their corruption, but before he could present the documents to the emperor, Geng Bao and Fan Feng levied accusations which brought his dismissal and death.

A few months later Fan Feng aided the Lady Wang Sheng to destroy her rivals the Lady Wang Nan and Bing Ji, then joined the slander against Liu Bao which caused him to be dismissed as Heir.

In 125 Fan Feng assisted the Empress Yan and her brother Yan Xian to conceal the death of Emperor An until his body had been returned to the capital. Soon afterwards, however, as the Yan group turned on Geng Bao and his party, Fan Feng was sent to prison and died there. -HHS 5:242, 10B:437, 15/5:590-91.

Fan Feng 樊豐, wife of: XC 7:13a says that Fan Feng's titular wife killed a maid-servant and hid the body in a well. Zhu Liang the Prefect of Luoyang discovered the crime and the Lady was executed. A similar story involving Zhu Liang is attributed to the wife of Pang Can.

Fan Gong 范宫. An associate of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, Fan Gong became Administrator of Jiyin. In 142 he was impeached for corruption by the special commissioner Du Qiao.

In 147 Liang Ji wanted to have Fan Gong appointed to the Imperial Secretariat, but Du Qiao, now Grand Commandant, stopped him. -HHS 63/53:2092-93.

On the Fan surname, see QHX:93 sub Fan Shengzhi.

Fan Guidu 樊歸都, the Lady, see Fan Xiandu 樊嫺都. -HHJ 1:1.

Fan Heng 范横. Administrator of Wei commandery about 25, Fan Heng recommended Feng Qin, a future Excellency for office. -DGHJ 13:6a.

Fan Hong 樊宏 [Miqing 靡卿] (d.51); Nanyang. Son of Fan Zhong, Fan Hong was a brother of the Lady Fan Xiandu and thus a maternal uncle of Liu Bosheng and of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu, while his daughter married the wife of their kinsman Liu Ci. At the beginning of the Han rebellion in 23 Liu Ci attacked Huyang, the home city of Fan Hong. He and his family were in some danger on account of their connection to the insurgents, but the rebel forces became so strong that the Wang Mang loyalists were afraid to act.

Fan Hong warned Liu Bosheng about the threat from the Gengshi Emperor, but without effect, and when the emperor offered him a military command he explained that he was only a scholar and was able to return to his estates. Having inherited vast property when his father died in 22, he established a defensive encampment for his clan and the local people, and he bribed the Red Eyebrows to stay away.

As Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 he appointed Fan Hong a Household Counsellor with status as Specially Advanced and rank next to the Excellencies. After the death of Peng Chong in 29 he was sent to award honours to the successful commanders Geng Kuang and his son Shu. That year Fan Hong was enfeoffed as a county marquis, and in 37 his younger brother Dan, his nephew Xun and his cousin Zhong were also granted fiefs.

Despite, or perhaps because of, his great wealth, Fan Hong urged his dependents and heirs to restraint, and he was reluctant to accept gifts and honours on the ground that he had not earned them. His funerary testament prescribed a simple burial, and Guangwu held it as a model for his kinsmen and for other officials. He nonetheless contributed ten million cash and thousand of bolts of cloth to the expenses, and he attended the ceremony in person. -HHS 32/22:1119-22*; Bn 54:57-58.

Fan Ji 范暨; Shanyang. Chancellor of Changshan during the first century AD, Fan Ji was great-grandfather of Fan Shi. -LS 19:17b.

Fan Jian 樊建; Nanyang. Son of Fan Shi, he succeeded to the family marquisate. Fan Jian died without heirs, and the fief was ended: see, however, sub Fan Pan. -HHS 32/22:1124.

Fan Jin 范津 [Wenyuan 文淵]; Nanyang. Well-known for his judgement of character, when he was Administrator of Beidi Fan Jin recommended Fu Xie as Filial and Incorrupt. In 186, as Administrator of Hanyang, he was succeeded by his former nominee. -HHS 58/48:1877.

Fan Jing 范荊. Appointed as Administrator of Dongping for the Gengshi Emperor about 24, he held that office until 28, when he was brought to surrender to Guangwu's officer Geng Chun. -HHS 21/11:764.

Fan [Jugong] 樊巨公; Nanyang. Fan Jugong was a kinsman of the Lady Fan Xiandu, who died in 22 just as her son Liu Bosheng was planning to rebel against the government of Wang Mang. None of her sons could attend to her funeral, so Fan Jugong arranged it. -HHS 14/4:556; Bn 54:103.

Fan Kang 范康 miswritten for Yuan Kang 苑康.

Fan Ling 樊陵 [Deyun 德雲] (d.189); Nanyang. Grandson of Fan Ying, Fan Ling was Intendant of Jingzhao in 182. Cai Yong wrote praises of his good government there, notably the canal work which he carried out in 182.

Fan Ling later became Steward of the Yongle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager Dong, natural mother of Emperor Ling. In 188 he paid cash to become Grand Commandant, but left that office after only a month.

When Zhang Rang and his fellow eunuchs assassinated He Jin in the following year, they named Fan Ling as Director of Retainers. As the eunuchs were massacred, Fan Ling was killed by Yuan Shao and Yuan Wei. -HHS 8:355, 82/72A:2724, 69/59:2251-52, Cai 6:1, 12:9.

Fan Meng 樊萌; Nanyang. A memorial stele was set up in his home country for Fan Meng, who had been a magistrate in Chenliu. -SJZ 29:20a.

Fan Min 樊敏 [Shengda 升達] (120-203). A worthy gentleman of Yi province, expert in Chunqiu, Fan Min was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. He was sent out as Chief Clerk of Yongchang commandery in the far southwest, and was then a county magistrate in Ba commandery. He left office to care for his mother.

During the 180s Fan Min received several invitations to join the offices at the capital, but refused on grounds of ill health. When Liu Yan became Governor of Yi province, however, Fan Min was appointed Administrator of Ba commandery, with acting authority as Colonel Who Rewards Honour 褒義校尉. He was evidently respected as an elder statesman of the west, for he continued in that appointment under Liu Zhang, and he was over eighty when he died.

Two years after Fan Min's death, a stele was set up in his honour. -LS 11:9a-12b, Nagata 94:262.

Fan Pan 樊盼; Nanyang. Son of Fan Shi, Fan Pan was a younger brother of Fan Jian, who succeeded to the family marquise. When Fan Jian died without heirs the fief was ended, but in 120 the regent Dowager Deng revived it in favour of Fan Pan. -HHS 32/22:1124.

Fan Pang 范滂 [Mengbo 孟博] (137-169); Runan. Son of Fan Xian, Fan Pang was admired by his neighbours for his strict morality even when he was young. He became Officer of Merit for the commandery, was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and at the end of his period of probation at Luoyang the Minister of the Household certified him with the Four Types of Virtuous Conduct: simplicity, sincerity, generosity and good behaviour. There was famine and associated banditry in Ji province at this time, and Fan Pang was sent there as a Commissioner against Corruption. It is claimed that his mere appearance in the territory frightened bad officials into fleeing their posts.

About 160 Fan Pang became a senior assistant to the Minister of the Household Chen Fan, but when Chen Fan rejected his advice he resigned in disgust and returned home. Guo Tai rebuked Chen Fan for having lost such a worthy official, and Chen Fan recognised his error. [It is said that the Excellency Sheng Yun offered to arrange an appointment for Fan Pang's father Fan Xian, but Fan Pang rejected the approach as he did not wish to be beholden to Sheng Yun. Ying Shao disapproved of his conduct [FSTY 5:36; Nylan 83:455-458.]

Soon afterwards the Grand Commandant Huang Qiong appointed Fan Pang to his offices, and in response to an edict he reported more than twenty senior officials of Ji province whom people believed to have abused their power. The Imperial Secretariat questioned such zeal, and suggested he had some personal malice. Indignantly denying the charge, Fan Pang said this was only the beginning, he had presented only the most serious cases, and he was planning further investigations. There were no more complaints, but Fan Pang recognised that his reports had no effect and again left office.

Back in Runan the Administrator Zong Zi chose Fan Pang as his Officer of Merit and accepted his judgement on all personnel. In one case Zong Zi was anxious to appoint Li Song, who was related to Fan Pang by marriage, but Fan Pang believed Li Song to be a man of bad character and refused to issue the orders. Though the commandery was well governed, Fan Pang had such authority that popular ditties claimed he was the real Administrator and Zong Zi no more than a cipher.

Fan Pang was numbered among the popular heroes in the lists compiled by the reformists and students of the University, and when the First Faction Incident broke out in 166 he was arrested and brought to the Northern Prison of the Yellow Gates, under eunuch control. He and his colleagues maintained their innocence, and in the following year the senior palace eunuch Wang Fu recommended their release.

The Minister Huo Xu was among those who had pleaded the cause of the prisoners. Fan Pang went to pay a courtesy call upon him, but did not offer formal thanks. Questioned about this, he observed that Huo Xu had behaved as duty demanded, so personal gratitude was inappropriate.

As he returned home Fan Pang was welcomed by thousands of local leaders, but he turned away and went into strict retirement. When the Second Faction Incident broke out in 169 orders were issued for his arrest. The local officials were most reluctant to obey, but Fan Pang went readily to prison and was duly executed. -HHS 67/57:2203-08* & 2187-88, XC 4:7a, ZF:11a-b, SGZ 6:211, XTS 74A:3153; deC 89:15, 85, 111-112, Mather 76:519.

Fan Qian 范遷 [Zilü 子廬 or Zilu 子廬] (d.65); Pei. When he was Administrator of Yuyang, Fan Qian's wise policies kept the Xiongnu quiet. He became Intendant of Henan, where he was noted for his honesty, and in 61 he was appointed Excellency over the Masses.

On one occasion Fan Qian's wife complained that despite all his official positions his family was poor and his sons had no land. Fan Qian replied that if he used his power for his own profit he would be ashamed before his descendants. He held the Excellency post four years, and when he died in office his family still had nothing. -HHS 27/17:941.

Fan Qiang 范羌. In 75 Fan Qiang was an officer under the Wu Colonel Geng Gong in Further Jushi, north of the Bogda mountains to the east of present-day Urumqi. Their small force was attacked by a great army of the Xiongnu, and Geng Gong and his companions defended themselves fiercely for a year. As winter approached, Fan Qiang was sent back to Dunhuang for supplies.

Early in 76 a relief force was sent out which broke the siege of the garrison in Nearer Jushi and restored that state's allegiance to Han. The commanders, however, considered that Geng Gong was too far away to get help to him. Fan Qiang had accompanied the expedition as it set out from Dunhuang and he pressed most urgently to be allowed to take reinforcements. He was eventually given a detachment of two thousand men.

In the mountains he and his men encountered heavy snow, with drifts ten feet deep, and could barely get forward. As they approached the city, the defenders sounded the alarm, but Fan Qiang called out to them, and they were greeted with cheers and tears of joy.

Next day the combined force began to withdraw. Followed closely by the enemy, they fought as they marched, and reached the frontier at Dunhuang with only twelve of the rescued garrison, not counting Fan Qiang himself. The ferocious defence and gallant rescue were widely admired, but the heroes were not treated with great generosity. Fan Qiang became an assistant magistrate in Henei. -HHS 19/9:722-23

Fan Qiang 范疆. In 221 Fan Qiang was an officer of the guard with Zhang Fei at Langzhong 閬中 on the Jialing River. Zhang Fei was notorious for his cruelty, and Fan Qiang and his colleague Zhang Da evidently suffered harsh treatment. As Zhang Fei was about to go south to join Liu Bei's expedition down the Yangzi against Sun Quan, Fan Qiang and Zhang Da killed him. Taking his head, they sailed down the river to the junction with the Yangzi, avoided Liu Bei's men, and went to join Sun Quan. -SGZ Shu 6:944.

Fan Qun 范逵; Youfufeng. After the fall of Wang Mang in 23 Fan Qun fled west into Tianshui, where he became a client of the local warlord Wei Ao. In 25 Wei Ao made him a senior official in his separatist government, but about 30 Fan Qun left and returned to the east. On the recommendation of his friend and fellow-countryman Du Lin he was given office under Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 27/17:935-37, 13/3:522.

Fan Rong 樊融; Nanyang. Son of the stern official Fan Ye, Fan Rong was a man of talent but followed the doctrines of Huang-Lao and would take no official position. -HHS 77/67:2492.

Fan Rong 范容 or Fan Yao 突 (d.145); Jiujiang. Both men of bandit families, in 144 Fan Rong and Zhou Sheng joined in a rising which affected all the region of the lower Yangzi and the Huai. The Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk Feng Gun, head of the Censorate, was sent with authority to lead troops from Yang and Xu provinces against them, but his army was defeated, two senior officials were killed, and the disorders grew worse.

In the following year Teng Fu was appointed Commandant of Jiujiang, and he joined Feng Gun and the General of the Household Zhao Xu to attack the rebels. This time they achieved a complete victory, killing both Zhou Sheng and Fan Rong. -HHS 6:275-77, 38/28:1279.

Fan Shang 樊赏; Nanyang. Son of Fan Wei, in the late 60s Fan Shang's father arranged his marriage to a daughter of Liu Ying the King of Chu. His uncle Fan Shu warned against the project, but we may assume the match was consummated. After allegations of treason were raised against Liu Ying in 71, however, this proved to have been a very bad idea. -HHS 32/22:1123.

Fan Shang 樊尚; Nanyang. Son of Fan Pan, he succeeded to the family marquise. -HHS 32/22:1124.

Fan Shao 樊紹 [Mengjian 孟建]; Runan. In 161 Fan Shao and his fellow-countryman Hu Yin were clerks in the offices of the Excellency Yu Fang. When Yu Fang left office at the end of that year they too returned home. When the Administrator of the commandery invited Hu Yin to local appointment, he was reluctant to take a local position. Fan Shao encouraged him to accept, on the basis that a gentleman should always be willing to serve.

The Excellency Huang Qiong disapproved of this advice, which confused the responsibilities of office at the capital and in the provinces, and he sent orders that Fan Shao should not be nominated for commissioned office. Fan Shao, however, did later become a county magistrate. -FSTY 5:39; Nylan 83:468.

Fan Shen 樊參 see Fan Can 樊參.

Fan Sheng 范升 also as Fan Shu 叔 [Bianqing 辯卿]; Dai. Orphaned as a child, Fan Sheng was brought up in his mother's family. By the age of nine he had studied the Analects and the Book of Filial Piety, and when he was older he became an expert on the Laozi and the Book of Changes. Recruited to the staff of Wang Mang's cousin Wang Yi about 20, Fan Sheng argued unsuccessfully against the regime's extravagant military adventures. He was later sent to Shangdang, and remained there as the Han rebellion broke out.

In 26 Fan Sheng was appointed a Consultant by Guangwu and soon afterwards, though he demurred on the grounds that there were better-qualified scholars, he was appointed Academician for the Book of Changes according to the New Text school of Liangqiu. He also maintained the Meng interpretation of the text, and no doubt controlled the other versions of the classic.

Fan Sheng regularly took part in debates at court, and he criticised those who had refused invitations from the restored regime of Han, accusing Zhou Dang and others of insolence and ingratitude. Emperor Guangwu, however, not only approved the recusants' stance, but even rewarded them.

In 27 the Director of the Imperial Secretariat Han Xin proposed that chairs be established for the study of Zuo zhuan and the Fei interpretation of the Book of Changes, both in the Old Text tradition. At the New Year assembly of 28 Fan Sheng took a leading role in opposition on behalf of the New Text. After oral argument all morning he presented a memorial with selected quotes from Confucius, urging on grounds of precedent that the Old Text be rejected. The Old Text scholar Chen Yuan presented a memorial in reply, and debate continued until the emperor approved an Academician for Zuo zhuan. After the death of the first appointee Li Feng, however, the post was not renewed, and New Text scholarship maintained its supremacy.

When the general Zhai Zun died in 33 Fan Sheng composed a eulogy which was incorporated into the official mourning.

Fan Sheng was married three times, and at one time he was accused of a crime by his most recently divorced wife. He was sent to prison, and though his student Yang Zheng obtained his release, Fan Sheng left the court and returned to private life. About 60 he became a county magistrate in Dong commandery, but was dismissed for some fault and died at home. -HHS 36/26:1226-29*, 79/69B:2587, 79/69A:2552 & 2554; Tjan 49:150-151, Bn 79:191-192, 141.

Fan Shi 范式 also Fan Si 汜 [Juqing 巨卿]; Shanyang. Grandson of Fan Fan, Fan Shi travelled to study at the capital and became a close friend of Zhang Shao of Runan. When they were due to leave, Fan Shi agreed to visit him exactly two years later. As the day approached, Zhang Shao asked his mother to prepare a meal to welcome Fan Shi. His parents were doubtful anyone could be so accurate, but Zhang Shao assured them that his friend was trustworthy, and Fan Shi came exactly at the appointed time.

Fan Shi became Officer of Merit in his home commandery, but Zhang Shao later became mortally ill, and told his companions that he regretted not seeing Fan Shi, whom he described as his "death friend." He died, but then spoke to Fan Shi in a dream. When Fan Shi awoke, he asked permission to travel to the funeral. The Administrator was sceptical, but he respected Fan Shi's concern. In fact, the funeral was due to begin before Fan Shi arrived, but the coffin of Zhang Shao became so heavy it could not be moved, and only when he appeared did it become light enough for the ceremony to proceed. Fan Shi planted a tree by the burial mound and then left again.

Fan Shi later returned to the capital and completed his studies. This time he became a close friend of Chen Pingzi from Changsha, but he too contracted a fatal illness. Chen Pingzi wrote to Fan Shi and told his wife to entrust his body to him, for he was known to be a man to care for the dead. Fan Shi indeed carried out ceremonies for his friend and escorted his family back to their home country, but left before anyone could thank him. The Reporting Officer sent from Changsha told of his good deeds, and Fan Shi was invited to join the offices of the Excellencies, but he would not accept.

Recommended as Abundant Talent by his province, Fan Shi was graded First Class, served in the Imperial Censorate and then became Inspector of Jing province. Kong Song of Nanyang, an old friend of humble family, had changed his name and gone to another county to become a local policeman, and when Fan Shi came on tour he was ordered to hold his horse. Recognising Kong Song, Fan Shi asked for someone to take his place, but Kong Song, fortified with noted examples from the past, insisted on doing his duty with no feeling of embarrassment.

Fan Shi was later a successful Administrator of Lujiang. In 235, after his death, a memorial stele was set up in his home country. -HHS 81/71:2676-79*, XC 5:13b-14b, LS 19:16b-18b, 20:5a-b. See also XC 7:4a referring to Fan Juqing.

Fan Shu 樊儵/儵 [Changyu 長魚] (d.67); Nanyang. [The personal name can also be transliterated as You, Chou or Tiao; I have followed the style used by Tjan Tjoe Som.] Son of Fan Hong and a cousin of Emperor Guangwu, when Fan Hong died in 51 Fan Shu succeeded to his marquisate. He cared for his father's second wife with great affection, and when she died he mourned so deeply that he became ill. Emperor Guangwu sent frequent messengers with gifts.

Fan Shu studied the Chunqiu according to the New Text Gongyang school of Zhuang/Yan Pengzu under Ding Gong. He compiled an enormous commentary to the classic, which became known as Fanhou xue 樊侯學 "Teachings of the Marquis Fan" [cf. sub Fan Ying], and at one time or another he had three thousand students; among them were Li Xiu and Xia Jin, both of whom became Excellencies. His magnum opus was later abridged to 200,000 characters by his student Zhang Ba.

Unlike other imperial relatives, Fan Shu did not maintain a large following of clients and retainers, and when a crack-down followed the excesses of Liu Fu the King of Pei and his friend Liu Li in 52 he escaped any involvement.

When Emperor Guangwu died in 57 Fan Shu was in charge of the funeral, then became a colonel in the Northern Army. He was involved in arrangements for state ceremonies and in 58 he received approval for a meeting of scholars to determine the meaning of the classics in accordance with the apocrypha: it appears that this became a series of discussions on the sacred texts [see sub Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming]. He also recommended the scholars Cheng Gong and Zhou Ze, who were his colleagues in the study of Chunqiu.

More generally, he urged the new ruler to ensure that the traditional custom, of delaying all legal punishments until at least the months of autumn, was enforced; so that such affairs of state accorded with the flow of the seasons. He also complained that heads of commandery units were choosing younger men as Filial and Incorrupt nominees on the expectation that they would be repay the favour later. This was obviously introducing a patron-client relationship into the imperial service – a problem which became very much more significant towards the end of the dynasty – but it also meant that older men were being passed over. He urged that orders be given that only the best men should be chosen. Both these recommendations were followed. [The modern commentator Zhou Shouchang notes that the concern to recruit mature men was taken up by Zuo Xiong in the time of Emperor Shun.]

In 67 Liu Jing the King of Guangling was found guilty of treasonous conduct. Fan Shu recommended his execution, and despite the anger of Emperor Ming he stood his ground in open court. Liu Jing committed suicide.

Fan Shu died soon afterwards. His testament expressed sympathy for the people of a county in Henan, who had been driven to despair by harsh application of collective punishment, and those of a county in Henei who had seen their offerings embezzled by local officers. He had intended to memorialise on these matters, but died before he had done so. An official reported this to the emperor, however, and Fan Shu's wishes were carried out.

Shortly before his death, Fan Shu had urged his brother Wei not to seek a marriage for his son Fan Shang with the daughter of King Liu Ying of Chu. Five years later, when accusations of treason against Liu Ying brought a purge and persecution of gentry and officials, Emperor Ming learnt of his cautious advice, and as a result Fan Shu's three sons escaped any involvement in the affair. -HHS 32/22:1122-24*, DGHJ 11:2b; Tjan 49:6, 154-155.

Fan Tiao 樊調 or Fan Diao; Nanyang. Member of a great clan and descended from the elder brother of Emperor Guangwu's associate Fan Hong, Fan Tiao married Liang Yi, daughter of Liang Song 竦 and eldest sister of the Honoured Ladies Liang, of whom the younger became the mother of Emperor He. In 83 Liang Song was executed and the Honoured Ladies died, but Liang Yi's marriage to Fan Tiao meant that she was regarded as a member of his clan and thus escaped exile.

In 97, after the death of the Dowager Dou, Liang Yi sent a letter to Emperor He, giving the facts about his parentage and the intrigues of the Dou family which had brought about the deaths of his mother and her relatives. As a result of her petition the family was restored to favour, and Fan Tiao became an officer in charge of military cadets. -HHS 34/24:1172-73.

Fan Wei 樊鮪; Nanyang. A younger son of Fan Hong and a cousin of Emperor Guangwu, when Fan Hong died in 51 Fan Mao's elder brothers Fan Shu and Fan Mao received marquises; in the following year Fan Wei and seven other brothers were awarded gifts of cash.

In the late 60s Fan Wei wanted his son Shang to marry a daughter of Liu Ying the King of Chu. Fan Shu warned him against stretching the privileges of the family too far, but Fan Wei paid no attention. We may assume the match was consummated, but when allegations of treason were raised against Liu Ying in 71, this proved to have been a very bad idea. -HHS 32/22:1121-23.

Fan Xian 樊顯; Shu. About 46 Fan Xian was sent to the capital as Reporting Officer for his commandery. During audience with him and his colleagues, Emperor Guangwu asked their opinion of officials they had known. Fan Xian praised the former Administrator Zhang Kan for his scrupulous honesty in cataloguing the treasures left by Gongsun Shu at the time of conquest in 36. The emperor was impressed; he appointed Fan Xian as a county magistrate in Ba commandery and called Zhang Kan to court for reward. -HHS 31/21:1100-01.

Fan Xian 范顯 [Shuju 叔鉅]; Runan. After Fan Xian's mother died, it was found that the family property was exhausted and there was no food. Though the principles of mourning would have discouraged such activity, Fan Xian persuaded his brothers to migrate to Jiujiang. Accompanied by their household and clients, they farmed and herded animals, living in the plainest fashion, and eventually paid off their debts.

When the three-years of mourning was over, his brothers embarked on official careers, but Fan Xian maintained his simple life, personally constructing an altar to his parents' memory, and living as a hermit to maintain the ritual beyond the customary time. The commandery nominated him as Extremely Filial.

Fan Xian later became a county magistrate in Lujiang, but left office due to ill health. He was later called to appointment as an Academician, but could not take the post because his elder brother died. There is a story that the Excellency Sheng Yun offered to arrange an appointment for him, but Fan Xian's son Fan Pang rejected the approach. He said that Fan Xian was determined to remain in private life; but he also remarked later that he did not wish to be beholden to Sheng Yun. -HHS 67/57:2207, FSTY 5:36; Nylan 83: 453-454.

Member of a leading local clan, in 205 Fan Xian and his colleague Wei Gu secretly supported Gao Gan of the Yuan family and sought to resist Du Ji, the Administrator appointed by Cao Cao. He outmanoeuvred them, and when fighting broke out Fan Xian was killed. -SGZ 16:494-95.

Fan [Xiandu] 樊嫻都 or Fan Guidu 樊歸都, the Lady (d.22); Nanyang. Daughter of Fan Zhong, wealthy member of a leading local clan, she married Liu Qin and bore him three sons, including Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, and three daughters. The Lady died in 22, just as Liu Bosheng was planning to rebel against the government of Wang Mang. Because of the urgency and tension of the time, none of her sons were able to carry out her funeral, so the burial was arranged by the Lady's kinsman Fan Jugong. -HHS 14/4:555-56; Bn 54:98, 103.

Fan Xiang 范馨; (d.222); Chenliu. Son of Fan Dan, he shared his poverty during the Great Proscription. Fan Dan left him a moral testament on his death in 185, and as Fan Xiang died he passed his ink-stone to his two-year-old grandson Fan Qiao 喬. -HHS 81/71:

Fan Yan 樊嚴 (d.125). Fan Yan married a daughter of the Lady Wang Yong, daughter of Wang Sheng the former wet-nurse of Emperor An. After the death of the emperor in 125, the family of the Dowager Yan accused their rival party, including the senior minister Geng Bao, the Wang and a number of eunuchs, of faction and conspiracy. Fan Yan escaped the death sentence but was sent to convict labour. -HHS 10B:437.

Fan Yan 樊演. In 137 Fan Yan was Inspector of Jiaozhi when the non-Chinese chieftain Oulin attacked Han positions in Rinan. Fan Ye 樊曄 or Fan Yu 煜 [Zhonghua 仲華]; Nanyang. Before Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, had gained any position, he was arrested in Xinye county in Nanyang. Fan Ye was at that time a local officer in the market, and he visited Liu Xiu and took him a box of cakes. The incident presumably took place in 22, when Liu Xiu's brother Liu Bosheng was stirring trouble against the regime of Wang Mang and Liu Xiu took refuge with his brother-in-law Deng Chen.

Liu Xiu remembered Fan Ye's kindness, and when he claimed the throne in 25 Fan Ye was named an Imperial Clerk. Soon afterwards Deng Yu conquered Hedong, and Fan Ye was named Commandant there. The emperor called Fan Ye to a meal at the palace, granted him horses and chariots, robes and other goods, then joked, "A Commandant's position in exchange for a box of cakes – not bad?" Fan Ye bowed and thanked him.

When Fan Ye arrived in Hedong he executed the local leader Mashi Kuang and others. The local bandits became peaceable and all the officers and people held him in awe. He was transferred to be Inspector of Yang province, where he encouraged the people in farming and silkworm cultivation, and reformed their family relationships. He stayed there ten years, but was then found guilty of some fault and demoted to a county magistracy in Henei.

Soon afterwards Fan Ye was sent as Administrator of Tianshui to deal with the region of the upper Wei, which was still unsettled after the destruction of Wei Ao and his followers in 33/34. Delighting in the Legalistic techniques of Shen Buhai 申不害 and Han Feizi, he ruled with the utmost ferocity and was rigid in his application of the law. Anyone who offended was lucky to leave prison alive, and both Chinese and non-Chinese people were frightened of him. On the other hand, it is said that Fan Ye was admired for the fact that when he arrived in the commandery as funeral rites were being carried out for his predecessor, the mourners offered to cede him the main hall of the residence, but Fan Ye insisted that the casket of the former Administrator must take precedence.

Fan Ye's regime was so successful that it was claimed even goods dropped by the roadside were left untouched, while a popular song observed that it was better to meet a tigress defending her young than be taken into Fan Ye's prison.

After fourteen years in Tianshui, Fan Ye died in office about 50. Some years later Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming considered Fan Ye's administration to be unmatched by any who came after him, and he awarded his family a million cash. The historian Fan Ye, however, classed him as a Stern Official 酷吏, and placed his biography in the relevant chapter of Hou Han shu. -HHS 77/67:2491-92*; Bn 59:180.

The given name of this man appears as Ye 曄 in HHS 77/67, and this is the accepted reading. DGHJ 15:6b-7a, however, has Yu 煜. Both characters have the meaning of a bright light, and the DGHJ edition has evidently chosen to avoid taboo. See also sub Huan Ye.

Fan Yi 樊毅 [Zhongde 仲德]; Henan. Appointed Administrator of Hongnong in 178, in the following year Fan Yi sent in a memorial asking permission to restore a temple near Mount Hua at public expense. This was approved, and the work was commemorated by stele. -LS 2:4a-10b.

Fan Yi 汜疑 (d.194). When Lü Bu invaded Yan province to seize it from Cao Cao, he sent Fan Yi to occupy Fan county in Dong commandery. The magistrate Jin Yun had his whole family held hostage by Lü Bu, but Cheng Yu persuaded him to remain loyal, and Jin Yun killed Fan Yi in an ambush. -SGZ 14:426-27.

Fan Ying 樊英 [Jiqi 季齊 or Jigao 季高]; Nanyang. As a young man, Fan Ying travelled to study in the region of Chang'an. He became expert in the Confucian canon and the apocrypha, with particular ability in the Jing Fang interpretation of the Book of Changes. He was also skilled in divination by the wind and the stars and the calendar, and in the interpretation of portents.

Fan Ying lived in retirement among the mountains, and many people came to receive instruction. On one occasion he observed that there was a great fire in the city of Chengdu in Sichuan, and he spat a mouthful of water towards the west. Some time later a report came of how there had indeed been such a conflagration, but then clouds gathered and heavy rain put it out. Another time, as his disciple Xi Xun was travelling abroad, Fan Ying learned by magical arts that he was in danger from bandits and miraculously went to save him.

Commandery and provincial authorities sent repeated invitations, but Fan Ying would not accept. In the time of Emperor He he was nominated as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright, and as Knowing the Way, but still refused appointment. Under Emperor An he was twice offered position as an Academician, and in 121 a special carriage and escort were sent, again without success.

In 127, partly by force, the government of the young Emperor Shun managed to get Fan Ying to the capital, but he refused to attend court on grounds of ill health, and when he was compelled to come he would not make the kowtow and firmly declared his independence. After treatment by the imperial physician, in 129 he was at last engaged in audience, received with gifts and favour, and was named a General of the Household in charge of gentleman cadets. A few months later Fan Ying again claimed to be ill and asked to retire. He rejected a further promotion to Household Counsellor, but was permitted to return home. He was still asked for opinions on portents and received regular gifts of food.

As an exercise in propaganda, the invitation to Fan Ying appears to have been successful, for we are told that many other scholars were now pleased to attend the imperial court. It was generally agreed, however, that Fan Ying had shown no great distinction, nor presented any remarkable thoughts on government. He gave some useful interpretations of portents, but otherwise, as the senior official Li Gu observed, there was nothing exceptional about him, and in some respects the whole affair had been unsatisfactory and embarrassing.

Li Gu went on to note that there was contradiction between the imperial court's pursuit of hermit scholars, and common opinion amongst the people that such men were little more than charlatans. While not agreeing with the general judgement, Li Gu used the example of Fan Ying to warn the emperor against showing too much enthusiasm for men of ostentatiously reclusive morality.

Relying heavily upon the apocrypha, Fan Ying compiled a commentary to the Book of Changes, commonly known as Fanshi xue 樊氏學 "Teachings of Mr Fan" [cf. sub Fan Shu], and also Shibi wen 石壁文. He died at home aged over seventy. -HHS 82/72A: 2721-24*, 61/51:2032, XC 6:5b, HYGZ 10B:149; Yao Zhenzong:2443, Ngo 76:100-104, DeWoskin 86:62, Vervoorn 90:157-163, 189-190.

Fan You 樊友. In 219 Fan You was Administrator of Yidu, by the Yangzi Gorges, in Liu Bei's service. As Sun Quan's troops attacked Guan Yu, Lu Xun came against Yidu, and Fan You fled. -SGZ Wu 13:1345.

Fan Zeng 范曾 [Zimin 子閔]. A major under the General-in-Chief He Jin, in 184 Fan Zeng defeated a group of Yellow Turbans in Nanyang. -SJZ 31:10b.

Fan Zhizhang 樊志張; Hanzhong. A man of wide learning, Fan Zhizhang lived in retirement and refused all invitations to office. When Duan Jiong was attacking the Qiang in 165, he invited Fan Zhizhang to visit him, but while he was there the enemy came and surrounded the Han camp. On the third night of the siege Fan Zhizhang told Duan Jiong of a gap in the enemy lines, and encouraged him to send out a detachment in counter-attack. Duan Jiong followed his advice and scored a complete victory.

Duan Jiong recommended Fan Zhizhang in the strongest terms, and he received a special summons to office. He died, however, soon afterwards. -HHS 82/72B:2732-33*; Ngo 76:113-114, DeWoskin 83:72.

Fan Zhong 樊重 [Junyun 君雲]; Nanyang. A man of family with extensive landed property, and also a prosperous merchant, Fan Zhong was celebrated for his energy and his generosity and became Thrice Venerable in his local community. Over eighty years old when he died, he left a testament to cancel all loans outstanding in his favour.

Fan Zhong's daughter the Lady Fan Xiandu married Liu Qin, so Fan Zhong was the grandfather of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. When he travelled to Nanyang in 42, Guangwu made sacrifice at Fan Zhong's tomb, granted him posthumous title as a marquis, and established a temple in his honour. Thereafter he visited the tomb on each journey to the south, and in 164 Emperor Huan also paid his respects. -HHS 32/22:1119, SJZ 29:18b; Bn 54:95, 98, QHX:94-95.

Fan Zhong 樊重; Shandong. Leader of the Datong bandits, he was possibly a kinsman of Fan Chong. The group came originally from Shandong, but in 24 they joined the Red Eyebrows north of the Yellow River. After their combined force was defeated by Liu Xiu, most of the Datong were absorbed by the Red Eyebrows. -HHS 1A:16; Bn 59:81-84.

Fan Zhong 樊忠; Nanyang. A kinsman of Fan Zhong 重, grandfather of Emperor Guangwu, in 37 Fan Zhong was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 32/22:1120.

Fan [Zhongbo] 范仲博; Runan. As Fan Pang went to execution at Luoyang in 169, he entrusted his mother to the care of his younger brother Fan Zhongbo. -HHS 67/57:2207.

Fan [Zhongli] 范仲禮 (d.184); Runan. In 184 Fan Zhongli was a member of the staff of the Administrator Zhao Qian. When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out, the commandery militia was defeated. Fan Zhongli and six other officers shielded Zhao Qian with their own bodies, and though they were all killed he was able to escape. An edict ordered that the gates of each of the officers' homes should be inscribed in honour of the "Seven Heroes" 七賢. -HHS 45/35:1527.

Fan Zhou 樊卣 (d.219); Wuling. In 219, after Sun Quan had taken Jing province, Fan Zhou raised local troops loyal to Liu Bei. His fellow-countryman Pan Jun knew that Fan Zhou was incompetent, told Sun Quan, and was sent with a small force to deal with him. He destroyed Fan Zhou. -SGZ Wu 16:1398.

Fan Zhun 樊準/准 [Youling 幼陵] (d.118); Nanyang. Son of Fan Duan, though his father had been committed to Huang-Lao beliefs, and Fan Zhun was influenced by such teachings, he maintained family tradition as a Confucian. When his father died he gave his property away to his orphaned nephews.

As Emperor He came on a tour of inspection to Nanyang in 103, Fan Zhun was Officer of Merit in the commandery. He impressed the emperor at an audience, and was made a gentleman cadet. He then accompanied the imperial party back to the capital and received special appointment into the Secretariat.

When the Dowager Deng took power as regent in 106, Confucian scholarship was in decline. Fan Zhun presented a memorial urging the promotion of learning, praising the patronage shown by previous rulers, and particularly the splendid age of Emperor Ming, when the Book of Filial Piety was well-known even to military men, and the Xiongnu King Dajuququ came to study at Luoyang. On the other hand, Fan Zhun deplored the empty formality of official Confucianism, and while recognising the value of its teaching to law and political affairs, he urged the importance of individual morality, which was better fostered by Huang-Lao and other private beliefs. Citing the example of Emperor Wen of Former Han and his Empress Dou, who encouraged such teachings and thus paved the way for the prosperity of emperors Jing and Wu, Fan Zhun asked that the new government should seek out those scholars who maintained themselves and their virtues in retirement, and invite them to appointment at court. Impressed by his recommendations, the Dowager inaugurated a number of calls for nomination as Sincere and Upright, Plain and Honest, and Kind and Worthy.

In the following year, 107, Fan Zhun was appointed Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate. When the great rebellion of the Qiang broke out, he recommended the convict Pang Can as a man of quality, suitable for command; he also presented a memorial on the problems in the heartland of the empire. Noting a series of floods, droughts and other natural disasters over several years, he urged thrift and economy at court, putting an end to the extravagant items used for the imperial table, for ceremonies and for decoration.

About this time there were reports of distress and unrest in the eastern provinces of Ji and Yan, with people abandoning their homes in aimless and uneasy wandering. Fan Zhun proposed a number of measures, including the distribution of resources from government land, and recommended a commission of enquiry to the east to investigate the causes of local distress and means by which it might be alleviated, His policy was adopted, and in 108 Fan Zhun was named an acting Household Counsellor and sent out to Ji province, while the Consultant Lü Cang went to Yan. By establishing public granaries and arranging relief, Fan Zhun was able to settle a number of the homeless migrants.

Having returned to Luoyang, Fan Zhun was again sent to Ji province, this time as Administrator of Julu. The territory was ravaged by famine, with many wanderers, and Fan Zhun was faced with the need for a longer-term policy than had been required for his earlier tour of inspection. He encouraged resettlement of abandoned lands, and within a single year grain production multiplied. The neighbouring territories of Zhao and Wei, closer to the Taihang ranges, were raided by rebel Qiang, but Fan Zhun protected his commandery and kept the people at peace.

Transferred to Henei in 111, a region also vulnerable to raiding by the Qiang, Fan Zhun led local troops to drive them back, then developed a system of guard-posts. His reputation kept the enemy at a distance.

About 114 Fan Zhun became ill and retired from the commandery, but he soon returned to the imperial service, and after further appointments he became Director of the Secretariat. Because of his knowledge of precedent, Fan Zhun held great influence in that office; in 116 he was appointed Minister of the Household, remaining in that position until his death two years later. Ch'en Ch'i-yün cites Fan Zhun as one of the leading protagonists of reform in the early second century, relying upon personal morality and the recruitment of good men rather than strict enforcement of the laws. -HHS 32/22:1125-29*; Loewe 86C:299-301, Ch'en 86:787.

Fan [Zizhao] 樊子昭; Runan. Formerly a hat merchant, he was recommended for office by the judge of character Xu Shao and was noted for his concern to keep a high reputation. He could be fierce in debate, but always maintained composure and was generous in his public dealings. -HHS 68/58:2234, SGZ Shu 7: 954; Mather 76:519.

Fang Chu 方儲 [Shengming 聖明]; Danyang. After his father died when he was young, Fang Chu cared for his mother. He became a gentleman cadet, but left that appointment when his mother died, built the tomb with his own hands, and planted pines and poplars there. In honour of his filial devotion, a magical red luan 鸞 bird came to roost above it, and white rabbits gathered below.

Fang Chu then travelled to the region of Chang'an to study. It was said that he knew every skill, he was expert in astrology, and he compiled a detailed commentary on the art of divination by the wind. On one occasion a peasant left some grain and tools in the fields and they were gone when he returned. He suspected his neighbour, but Fang Chu promptly accused a local officer, and the man confessed.

When Emperor Zhang had gentleman cadets choose whether they were more suited to military or civil affairs, Fang Chu claimed that he was equally adept at both. The emperor gave him a tangled skein of silk to unravel, and Fang Chu drew his sword and cut it like a Gordian knot, explaining that it was sometimes necessary to defy the natural order.

Fang Chu became Prefect of Luoyang. His Officer of Merit Shi Xian had one of his retainers kill a man. When the head was found in the stables, Fang Chu spoke to it, and announced that Shi Xian was responsible. Put to the question, Shi Xian and confessed his guilt.

Later, as Emperor Zhang was preparing to carry out sacrifice at the Altar of Heaven, Fang Chu warned that there would be fierce wind and rain and urged that the cortège should not go. The emperor thought he was mad, and ordered him to take poison. After his death, the weather behaved just as he had foretold. -XC 7:1a-2a.

Fang Dan 芳丹 or Mao Dan 茅丹; Jingzhao. During the troubled period of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the invasion of the Red Eyebrows, Fang Dan became warlord in his home county of Xinfeng near Chang'an. He and other local leaders in the old capital district were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu, but they were conquered by Emperor Guangwu's general Feng Yi in 27. -HHS 17/7:647.

Fang Guang 方廣; Guangling. About 50 Fang Guang killed a man in vengeance for his father. He was arrested and imprisoned, but when his mother died the county magistrate Zhongli Yi let him go to carry out the funerary rites. When Fang Guang duly returned to the prison, Zhongli Yi petitioned on his behalf and he was sentenced to death less one degree. -HHS 41/31:1407.

Fang He 方賀 is mentioned in FSTY 5f:120.

Fang Wang 方望 (d.25); Youfufeng. A man of influence and authority in the northwest, in 23 Fang Wang was invited to become an adviser to Wei Ao, and persuaded him to proclaim his support for the Liu family against Wang Mang. When Wei Ao actually offered allegiance to the Gengshi Emperor in 24, however, Fang Wang opposed the move and left his service: rather than support a new imperial regime, he evidently saw the Han cause as an opportunity to set up an independent government

Later that year Fang Wang and Gong Lin gained control of the Young Prince Liu Ying, nominal heir to Former Han, who had been held at Chang'an since Wang Mang took the throne. Foreseeing the troubles awaiting the Gengshi Emperor, they took the young man into Anding and proclaimed him as emperor at the beginning of 25. Fang Wang was named Imperial Chancellor and Gong Lin Grand Marshal. They raised a few thousand supporters, but were attacked and defeated by troops of the Gengshi Emperor. The pretender and his party were killed. -HHS 1A:18, 11/1:473; Bn 59.91.

Fang Zhen 房楨 i.e. Fang Zhi 房植. Cai 12:2 has the text of a funerary inscription for Fang Zhen, described as Excellency of Works. No-one of that name is recorded by Hou Han shu, however, and the only Excellency of Works with the Fang surname is Fang Zhi: see immediately below. It appears that the two characters 楨 and 植 have been confused in transmission.

Fang Zhi 房植 [Bowu 伯武]; Qinghe/Ganling. Having been recommended by Li Gu in 143, Fang Zhi was Intendant of Henan in 146 when Zhou Fu, also from Ganling, entered the Imperial Secretariat at Luoyang. Zhou Fu had been the private tutor of Liu Zhi, future Emperor Huan, and gained his appointment when Liu Zhi was brought to the throne. Many people of their home country believed that Zhou Fu owed his advancement only to his connection to the new ruler, and they compared him unfavourably to Fang Zhi. A ditty was circulated, composed from two seven-character phrases, each with an internal rhyme: A model for the empire, Fang Bowu; Grasping appointment through his tutoring, Zhou Zhongjin. The gentry of Ganling were divided into "northern" and "southern" parties, opponents and supporters of Zhou

Fu and Fang Zhi. See further sub Zhou Fu.

Fang Zhi was later Minister Steward and Minister of the Household. In 153 he became Excellency of Works, leaving that office in 155. -HHS 7:298-301, 67/57:2185-86.

Fangqian 放前 of Yutian [Khotan]. King of Yutian, in 129 Fangqian attacked his neighbouring state of Jumi [present-day Yutian], killed its king, Xing, and placed one of his own sons on the throne.

In 131 Fangqian sent a son to the Han court as a hostage with tribute, and sought recognition of his conquest. On the advice of the Administrator of Dunhuang Xu You, this was refused, and though Fangqian was pardoned he was ordered to restore the state. When he refused, in 132 Xu You had King Chenpan of Shule [Kashgar] attack Yutian. Fangqian was defeated, his capital was plundered, and the state of Jumi was restored. -HHS 88/78:2915-16.

Fei 費 [surname] see also sub Bi 費. There were apparently two different clans, who wrote their surname the same but pronounced it differently: see LS 11:19a-b, discussing Bi Fan.

Fei [Boren] 費伯仁; Jiangxia. Fei Boren's aunt was the mother of Liu Zhang, who sent messengers about 200 to invite him to the west. See also Fei Guan. -SGZ Shu 14:1060.

Fei Changfang 費長房; Runan. As a guard in the local market, Fei Changfang encountered an old man who sold medicine, and who went each night into a large gourd. Fei Changfang introduced himself and was invited into the magical gourd. The old man then introduced himself as an exiled immortal, and as his exile was ended he invited Fei Changfang to accompany him. They hung up a piece of bamboo which his family took to be Fei Changfang's dead body, and after the funeral Fei Changfang left with his mentor. He passed two magical tests, but when he failed to eat a pile of worm-eaten dung he was obliged to return home.

The immortal nonetheless gave Fei Changfang a magical staff to ride, which turned out to be a dragon, and also granted him a spell to control earthly spirits. Though his absence had seemed only ten days, it was in fact as many years, and his family accepted him only after they had opened the grave and found the bamboo they had buried.

Fei Changfang cured many illnesses and engaged in feats of magic, including long-distance instant travel and the ability to be in several places at once. He also exorcised and punished many demons, one of them a remarkable tortoise which had impersonated the local Administrator. Later, however, he lost his powers and was killed by resentful spirits. -HHS 82/72B:2743-45; Ngo 76:128-134, DeWoskin 83:77-81.

Fei Deng 費登 (d.41). Disciples of the religious leader Wei Si, who had been executed about 40, in 41 Fei Deng and Li Guang raised a rebellion in Lujiang. They were defeated and killed by the general Ma Yuan. -HHJ 7:82 [and see sub Li Guang].

Fei Gan 費敢. A general under the eastern warlord Zhang Bu in 29, Fei Gan was sent by his brother Fei Yi to garrison the village of Juli in Ji'nan against Guangwu's general Geng Yan. Geng Yan made ostentatious preparations to attack, but left only a small force to watch it while he laid an ambush for Fei Yi's main army as it came to bring relief. As Fei Yi was defeated and killed, Fei Gan abandoned his position and went back to Zhang Bu. -HHS 19/9:708-09.

Fei Guan 費觀 [Binbo 賓伯]; Jiangxia. Fei Guan was a kinsman of Liu Zhang, warlord Governor of Yi province, by Liu Zhang's mother the wife of Liu Yan; Liu Zhang also had Fei Guan marry his daughter.

In 213 Fei Guan was a staff officer to Li Yan, a commander of Liu Zhang's troops opposed to Liu Bei. When Liu Yan surrendered, however, Fei Guan also changed sides.

Liu Bei appointed Fei Guan as a major-general, Administrator of Ba commandery, and then Area Commander at Jiangzhou, present-day Chongqing. In 223 he was granted a village marquisate, but he died a few years later at the age of thirty-seven. -SGZ Shu 15: 1081-82.

Fei Qin 肥親; Henan. In 82 Fei Qin was a local officer under the Intendant Yuan An. A plague of locusts destroyed crops, but it was reported that the county ruled by the virtuous magistrate Lu Gong had been spared. Yuan An sent Fei Qin to check the story. Fei Qin found Lu Gong sitting under a tree with a wild pheasant nesting beside him. There was a boy nearby, but when he asked why he did not catch the bird, the boy replied that it was about to hatch and so it would be wrong to harm it. Fei Qin remarked to Lu Gong that he was amazed at his influence for good: not only had his territory escaped the locusts, but he could set wild creatures at ease and tame a boy's natural instincts of cruelty. He reported all this to Yuan An. -HHS 25/15: 874.

Fei Shi 費詩 [Gongju 公舉]; Jianwei. In 213 Fei Shi was magistrate of Mianzhu in Guanghan for the warlord Governor Liu Zhang. As Liu Bei advanced to the south, Fei Shi gave refuge to several officers whom he had driven back, but he was later obliged to surrender the city. Joining Liu Bei's staff, he served for a time as Administrator of Zangke, then returned to headquarters.

In 221, following the forced abdication of Emperor Xian of Han in favour of Cao Pi of Wei, Liu Bei planned to take the imperial title for himself. Members of the court encouraged him, and favourable portents were found, but Fei Shi argued that the move was premature and even immodest, for Liu Bei still controlled no more than a single province. Liu Bei was predictably unimpressed, and Fei Shi was sent as Assistant Officer to the distant commandery of Yongchang.

Fei Shi took part in Zhuge Liang's southern campaign in 225, then returned to the north as an adviser and courtier. He died about 240. -SGZ Shu 11: 1015-16*; Fang 52:44, 65.

Fei Sui 費遂. Inspector of Jing province under the Gengshi Emperor in 23, Fei Sui was sent to Linhuai with the Internuncio Hou Sheng to call the Administrator Hou Ba to appointment at the capital. The local people protested so earnestly that the emissaries did not present Hou Ba with his invitation, and he remained at his post. -DGHJ 13:1b.

Fei Sui 費遂 [Ziji 子奇]; Jiangxia. When Fei Sui became Inspector of Yang province, he found that his predecessor had planted garlic and wheat at the residence. He gave the produce to his local officers. -XC 8:2b.

Fei Wei 費禕 see Fei Yi 費禕.

Fei Yi 費邑 (d.29). An officer of the eastern warlord Zhang Bu, he was given title as King of Ji'nan and held command of defences along the Yellow River. In 29 Guangwu's general Geng Yan came to the attack. He tricked Fei Yi into marching to relieve his brother Zhang Gan, then took his column by surprise. Fei Yi was defeated and died in the battle. -HHS 19/9:708-09.

Fei Yi 費貽 [Fengjun 奉君]; Jianwei. When Gongsun Shu took the imperial title in 25 he invited many local leaders to join his regime. Unwilling to serve, Fei Yi painted himself with lacquer, pretended to be mad, and escaped into the mountains. He remained in hiding for more than ten years.

After Gongsun Shu was destroyed by the armies of Han, Fei Yi took service under Emperor Guangwu and became Administrator of Hepu. -HHS 81/71:2668, HYZ 10B:156; Vervoorn 90:143.

Fei Yi 費禕 [Wenwei 文偉] (d.253); Jiangxia. Orphaned when he was young, Fei Yi was brought up by his father's kinsman Fei Boren. Fei Boren's aunt was the mother of Liu Zhang, who sent messengers to invite him, and so the family travelled to the west. He was a friend of Dong Yun [q.v.], whose father Dong He admired his conduct.

When Liu Bei established his son Liu Shan as Heir to his kingdom of Hanzhong in 219, Fei Yi was appointed to his suite, and when Liu Zhan succeeded his father in 223, Fei Yi obtained rank at court and later held senior appointments under Zhuge Liang, who also commended him. After Zhuge Liang's death he served Jiang Wan, and when Jiang Wan retired in 243 Fei Yi succeeded him to the dominant position in the state. After ten years he was assassinated at a banquet by a captive officer of Wei. -SGZ Shu 14:1060-62*; Fang 52:436-437, 655, 65:124-126.

Fei Zhan 費棧; Danyang. A local rebel against Sun Quan about 217, he raised troops from the non-Chinese of the hills 山越 and received a seal of office from Cao Cao. Lu Xun was sent against him, defeated him and settled the area. -SGZ Wu 13:1344.

Fei Zhi 肥谿 [Changhua 萇華] (d.169); Henan. A stele found in a tomb at Yanshi in present-day Henan in 1991 tells how this man held office in the Lateral Courts under Emperors Zhang and He. As the authors of the report in Wenwu observe, this would mean he was born about 54, and would have been some 115 years old when he died. The Lateral Courts were the harem apartments of the emperor, so Fei Zhi would probably have been a eunuch.

The circumstances of the stele's discovery are not fully convincing, and its authenticity is doubtful. -WW 1992/9.

Feng 逢 or Pang 逢. These two characters are sometimes confused by the texts, and it is not possible to determine the correct reading in every case. As surnames, I transcribe both versions as Pang; the modern p and f initials were very close during Han. See, for example, Bn 54: 137 note 4 on Feng/Pang An.

Feng 馮 [personal name unknown]; Longxi. Appointed Chancellor of Changshan in 117, he carried out ritual ceremonies, including sacrifice to the Three Excellencies Mountain in the Taihang ranges. He received credit for favourable conditions after the disruption of the Qiang rebellion, and his local officers set up a stele in his honour. -Nagata 94:56.

Feng 馮, the Lady I. She was an Honoured Lady in the harem of Emperor He when he died in 105. It was expected that the concubines of a dead emperor should reside at his funerary park as notional guardians of his tomb, but the Dowager Deng, who now took regency control of the government, ordered that the Lady Feng and the Honoured Lady Zhou be excused this exile. Explaining that the two women had been her companions for more than ten years, and that she could not bear to part with her old friends, she allowed them to remain at the capital. They were granted gold, brocade and fine cloth, with carriage and horses fit for a king, and the Lady Feng also received special insignia and head-gear.

A story in the Lieyi zhuan 列異傳 "Chronicle of Strange Events" compiled by Cao Pi in the third century, says that the Honoured Lady Feng of Emperor Huan [sic] died and was buried, and that seventy years later, in the reign of Emperor Ling, her tomb was broken into by thieves who found the body intact and well preserved. The tale is anachronistic, for Emperor Ling was the direct successor of Emperor Huan, but the Lady Feng of Emperor He would indeed have died some seventy years before the reign of Emperor Ling. Cf. the Lady Feng II below. -HHS 10A:421; deC 89: 464-465.

Feng 馮, the Lady II. At the time of the disgrace and death of the Empress Deng in 165 the Lady Tian Sheng and eight other women were taken to the bed of Emperor Huan; they continued to share his favours even after the appointment of his Empress Dou. It is probable they were engaged not only for their qualities as sexual partners, but also in the hope that one of the magical number nine might conceive a son.

As Emperor Huan was on his death-bed in the winter of 167/168, he promoted Tian Sheng and her companions to be Honoured Ladies. After he was dead the Empress Dou, now regent Dowager, killed the Lady Tian Sheng, though the eunuchs Guan Ba and Su

Kang obliged her to spare the lives of the other eight favourites.

Of the nine concubines, only Tian Sheng is named by the texts, but there is a possibility that one of the others was a woman of the Feng surname. The biography of Chen Qiu in HHS 56/46, tells how the eunuchs argued that the Dowager Dou, who died in 172, should be buried in a separate tomb to Emperor Huan and that the place normally given to the consort's funerary tablet should be awarded not to her but to the Honoured Lady Feng. It was eventually resolved that the Dowager should receive full honours and share the emperor's tomb, but in the course of debate the minister Chen Qiu noted that the Lady Feng's tomb had been robbed and desecrated, and her spiritual soul [魂 hun] contaminated: it was believed that the spiritual soul journeyed to the next world, leaving the earthly soul [魄 po] with the body; if the robbery was to affect the spiritual soul, therefore, it should have taken place very soon after the interment.

HHS 65/55:2153 also refers to the robbery of the tomb of the Honoured Lady Feng: it took place in 170 or 171, and the Intendant of Henan, Duan Jiong, was found responsible and demoted. Leaving aside the magic surrounding the grave of the Honoured Lady of Emperor He, discussed above and below, a recent grave was more likely to attract robbers.

The only Honoured Lady Feng specifically referred to in the histories was a member of the harem of Emperor He: see the entry above, and particularly the confused anecdote about the robbery of her grave and her well-preserved body. There was no reason for anyone to propose that the tablet of that Lady Feng should be placed in any relation to the tomb of Emperor Huan.

So it appears Emperor Huan also had an Honoured Lady Feng, presumably a colleague of the Lady Tian Sheng. If there was justification for placing her tablet in a high position it may have been because she was the mother of one or both of the two princesses born about that time: see Liu Jian and Liu Xiu. -HHS 10B:445-46; deC 89:124-125, 464-467.

Feng 馮, the Lady III. Daughter of Feng Fang, the Lady was one of the great beauties of the empire. In the early 190s she took refuge from the disorders at Chang'an and went to Yang province. Yuan Shu saw her there, and took her as his concubine.

The Lady was treated with great favour, and the other women of the harem became extremely resentful. They told her that if she wanted to become his principal wife she should occasionally weep at Yuan Shu; he would pity her and she would gain even more influence over him. The Lady did this, and Yuan Shu did feel sympathy for her, but then the other women combined to kill her, hanging her body from a beam in the lavatory as if she had committed suicide.

Believing that she had killed herself because he had not given her the status she wanted, Yuan Shu carried out her funerary rites most generously. -HHS 75/65:2443, SGZ 6:210.

Feng 豐 or Li 豐 [surname unknown]. With rank as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, in 220 he was a sponsor of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Feng An 逢安 see Pang An 逢安. -Bn 54:137 note 4.
Feng Bao 馮豹 [Zhongwen 仲文] (d.102); Jingzhao. Son of Feng Yan 衍, Feng Bao was twelve years old when his father sent his wife the Lady Ren away from the family home. She was angry and attempted to kill Feng Bao, but he managed to escape. He refused to make any accusation against her, claiming only that she was ill, and he was admired for his filial piety.

A noted scholar of the Poetry and Chunqiu, Feng Bao maintained a private academy and held a high reputation among the local people. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he joined the Imperial Secretariat, where he was noted for the speed and accuracy with which he drafted even the most confusing memorials. Emperor Zhang admired his work and gave him generous gifts.

Probably during the 80s, as Ban Chao established a Han presence in the Western Regions, Feng Bao was made Senior Colonel for the West of the Yellow River, presumably based in Dunhuang. In the time of Emperor He he gave advice on frontier policy, and in the early 90s he recommended the re-establishment of the system of Wu and Ji Colonels and garrisons at Jushi, near Turfan.

Feng Bao served two years with success as Administrator of Wuwei, then returned to the Secretariat. He died in that office. -HHS 28/18B:1004.

Feng Chen 馮晨; Yingchuan. Grandson of Feng Yi, Feng Chen's father Feng Pu lost the family marquisate because he killed a man. In 112 the government of Emperor An under the regent Dowager Deng issued an edict honouring the twenty-eight generals, Feng

214 Feng Cheng

Yi and his colleagues, who had aided the founding Emperor Guangwu, and the family fief was revived in favour of Feng Chen. -HHS 17/7:652.

Feng Cheng 馮承; Nanyang. Son of Feng Shi 石, in 121 Feng Cheng was appointed a gentleman cadet. He became a colonel of the Northern Army, and after the death of his elder brother Dai [or Shi? q.v.] he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 33/23:1149-50.

Feng Cheng 逢盛 see Feng Sheng 逢盛.

Feng Dai 馮代; Nanyang. Son of Feng Shi 石, in 121 Feng Dai was appointed a gentleman cadet, and after his father's death he succeeded to his fief. See also sub Feng Shi 馮世. -HHS 33/23:1149-50.

Feng Dai 馮岱 [Deshan 德山]. As a clerk in the offices at the capital in the early 160s, Feng Dai took part in regular discussions with colleagues on the affairs of the frontier. Energetic and competent in both military and civil matters, he became Administrator of Chenliu, where he took the advice of Fu Rong and appointed Fan Dan, Han Zhuo and Kong Zhou as senior assistants. -HHS 68/58:2233, XC 7:16b.

Feng Ding 馮定; Nanyang. Elder son of Feng Zhu and the Princess Liu Yi, daughter of Emperor Ming, Feng Ding succeeded to his father's fief and became General of the Household of the Feathered Forest. He died without heirs and the fief was ended. -HHS 33/23:1149.

Feng Fang 馮魴 [Xiaosun 孝孫] (1-85); Nanyang. A man of local family, during the disorders of the early 20s Feng Fang gathered retainers for self-defence; he was admired for protecting Shentu Ji 申屠季 from his enemies Yu Duwei 虞都尉 and Yu Changqing 長卿. Unlike other chieftains, Feng Fang was not a troublemaker. Emperor Guangwu heard well of him and in 27 he made him a county magistrate in Liang. While quite prepared to resort to violence in order to maintain firm government, Feng Fang was also admired for his honesty and reliability. He was later transferred to Yingchuan.

As Guangwu was attacking Wei Ao in 32, there was rebellion in the commandery, and the local leader Yan Bao brought three thousand men against Feng Fang's city. Though vastly outnumbered, Feng Fang and his men defended themselves for some time, but as ammunition was exhausted the city was taken. Feng Fang escaped, and when the imperial army arrived soon afterwards he went to apologise for his failure. Guangwu knew of his heroic defence and when the rebels surrendered he gave them into his charge. Their leaders were due to be executed, but Feng Fang spoke on their behalf: they all received a pardon and so the territory was peaceful.

In 37 Feng Fang was appointed Administrator of Wei commandery and after several years of excellent government, regularly graded First Class, he became Minister Coachman in 51. In 56 he acted as Minister of the Guards on tour to Taishan for the imperial Feng and Shan sacrifices; when the cortège returned he was made Excellency of Works and granted a secondary marquissate. Towards the end of the year he attended the Temple of the Eminent Founder to report the demotion of the Empress Lü 呂 from the imperial pantheon.

When Guangwu died in 57 Feng Fang was formally responsible for the imperial tomb, and as Emperor Ming came to the throne Feng Fang and his Excellency colleagues were awarded district marquissates: see also sub Li Xin.

In 61 Feng Fang and his colleague Guo Dan were dismissed for having supported the false allegations against Deng Rong; Feng Fang also lost his fief.

Two years later Feng Fang again acted as Minister of the Guards on an imperial tour, and in 64 he became Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital. Known for his plain speaking, he frequently took part in debate and many of his opinions were approved. In 71 his fief was restored, and in the following year, as Emperor Ming again went on tour, he left Feng Fang in charge of the guard of the Southern Palace.

In 78 Emperor Zhang approved Feng Fang's request to retire on grounds of old age. That winter he was honoured as the Five-fold Experienced in the ceremony of Serving the Aged at the Hall of the Circular Moat. He died in 85 at the age of eighty-six. -HHS 33/23:1147-49*, XC 1:10b-11a.

Feng Fang 馮放 miswritten for Feng Gun 馮緄. -HHJ 19:230.

Feng Fang 馮方/芳. Married to the adopted daughter of the powerful eunuch Cao Jie, in the early 170s Feng Fang was a member of the Imperial Secretariat. His colleagues Liu Xin, Du Xi and Huan Bin, men of strict Confucian standards, would have no dealings with him. They often drank and ate together, but never invited Feng Fang to join them. Resentful at this exclusion, Feng Fang accused Huan Bin and his companions of faction, and when the Prefect Liu Meng took no action Cao Jie alleged that he too was involved in the clique.

Liu Meng was briefly arrested and then proscribed from office, while Huan Bin retired.

Feng Fang later became Director of Retainers and Minister of Finance, and in 188 he was one of the colonels of the Western Garden, the personal army established by Emperor Ling.

Feng Fang's daughter became a favourite concubine of the warlord Yuan Shu. -HHS 8:356, 37/27:1262.

Feng Fen 馮奮; Wei. Second son of Feng Shun and his wife the Princess Liu Nu, daughter of Emperor Ming, in 83 Feng Fen was made Marquis of Pingyang in Hedong in right of his mother. When he died without sons the fief was ended, but it was later revived through his elder brother Feng Jing. -HHS 26/16:911.

Feng Fu 馮敷; Kuaiji. Investigator for the commandery about 120, Feng Fu recognised the quality of the impoverished scholar Shi Yan and gave him food and clothing. -HHS 46/36:1558.

Feng Fu 馮孚 see Li Fu 李孚.

Feng Gao 封告 [Junda 君達]. A member of staff under the Excellency over the Masses Yu Yan, Feng Gao was involved in the release of the wrongly convicted Administrator Deng Rong. -XC 6:15b.

The Hou Han shu of Fan Ye has no mention of this man, and there is anachronism in the story: Deng Rong was found innocent in 61, and two Excellencies were punished for the error [HHS 27/17:941, 33/23:1149], but Yu Yan did not become Excellency over the Masses until 65.

Feng Guan 封觀 [Xiaoqi 孝起] (d.184); Runan. A loyal man, Feng Guan was due to be nominated Filial and Incorrupt, but was concerned that his elder brother had not yet received a recommendation. He therefore claimed to be unable to speak: when a fire broke out in his house he made his escape but did not call for help. When his brother did gain the nomination a few years later, Feng Guan said that he was cured and joined the local staff of the commandery, becoming Officer of Merit to the Administrator Zhao Qian.

When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out the commandery militia was defeated. Feng Guan and six other officers shielded Zhao Qian with their own bodies, and though they were all killed he was able to escape. An edict ordered that the gates of each of the officers' homes should be inscribed in honour of the "Seven Heroes" 七賢. -HHS 45/35:1527, XC 2:10b, XHS 5:18b. LS 27:8b lists a stele set up at his tomb.

Feng Guang 馮珫; Nanyang. Son of Feng Zhu and the Princess Liu Yi, daughter of Emperor Ming, Feng Guang was made Marquis of Huojia in Henei in right of his mother. As his brother Feng Shi became a favourite of Emperor An, Feng Guang was appointed Colonel of the City Gates. -HHS 33/23:1150.

Feng Guang 馮光; Ba? A gentleman cadet in 175, Feng Guang joined the junior officer Chen Huang in a proposal to alter the base year (Sivin 69:59: "working epoch") of the current official calendar so as to accord with the apocrypha. Their arguments were strongly opposed, however, by the great scholar Cai Yong. -HHS 92/2:3037-42.

In HHSJJ 92/2:3412, Hui Dong suggests that Feng Guang may be the same person as Feng Yun/Yuan 允/元, brother of Feng Gun. All three characters are similar, but Feng Guang appears to belong to a different generation to Feng Gun.

Feng Gun 馮緄 [Hongqing 鴻卿 or Huangqing 皇卿] (d.167); Ba. Son of Feng Huan, as a young man Feng Gun followed his father's example in studying the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu, the Classic of Poetry and the Art of War ascribed to Sima Rangju 司馬[穰苴]兵法.

In 122 Feng Huan was Inspector of You province when a forged edict was sent for his arrest. He was going to kill himself, but the youthful Feng Gun suspected the document and persuaded him to petition the throne. The forgery was discovered, and though Feng Huan had died in prison the family was recompensed with 100,000 cash and the right to an appointment as a gentleman cadet.

Feng Gun thus gained a reputation, but he left the cadetship to hold a series of offices in his commandery, then returned to the commissioned imperial service through nomination as Filial and Incorrupt. He held appointment in the offices of the Excellencies and was then a county magistrate in Yi province, where he controlled the powerful local clans. After a period in retirement he was appointed to the Imperial Secretariat and the Censorate. He went west once more as Commandant of the Dependent State of Guanghan, then returned to the capital as Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate.

In 144 there was widespread rebellion in the southeast, inspired by Zhou Sheng and Fan Rong of Jiujiang, and Feng Gun was sent with authority to command the combined forces of Yang and Xu provinces against the bandits. His first assault was defeated with heavy losses, but in the following year, aided by Teng Fu the Commandant of Jiujiang, a new attack was completely successful and the rebel leaders were killed. Feng Gun was nonetheless charged with lack of energy, his commission was removed, and he spent some time as a clerk in the offices of the Excellency over the Masses.

In 155 Feng Gun was sent west as Administrator of Longxi, and when Xianbi raided the northeast in 158 he was transferred to that front as Administrator of Liaodong. He returned to the capital district as Intendant of Jingzhao and was then Director of Retainers. Noted for his strict authority and experience in the law, he was made Minister of Justice and later became Minister of Ceremonies.

For some years there had been rebellion in Jing province, and by 162 the trouble extended from Changsha south into Jiaozi province. The insurgents were joined by non-Chinese of Lingling, while the non-Chinese tribes of Wuling attacked Nan commandery. Two campaigns led by the censorial officer Sheng Xiu and by the Internuncio Ma Mu both failed, local officials fled, and the greater part of the territory was out of control. Then Feng Gun was named General of Chariots and Cavalry, one of the highest military posts, and sent south with an army claimed to be over a hundred thousand men.

At this time the empire and the government were seriously short of food and supplies; each time there was a campaign the ministers were required to contribute from their salaries and the kings and marquises from their pensions. Furthermore, the eunuchs accused each general of embezzlement: they were invariably convicted. As a result, though his commission was accompanied by an inspirational and exhortatory edict, Feng Gun asked that a eunuch Regular Attendant take charge of his supplies, so that there could be no question of them being stolen; or at least to ensure that the blame would not fall upon him. Zhu Mu of the Imperial Secretariat argued that he lacked the true spirit of a high commander, but Emperor Huan ordered no action be taken.

As Feng Gun's great army appeared, aided by the Banshun people of Yi province, the insurgents surrendered, and Feng Gun went forward against the Wuling tribes. He took more than four thousand heads, and received the surrender of a hundred thousand rebels. The whole region appeared to be settled, and Feng Gun returned in triumph to the capital. Refusing a reward of a hundred million cash, he asked to be allowed to retire on grounds of age; this was not approved.

Following the army's return, Feng Gun's subordinate Zhang Chang accused him of having taken two female slaves with him in military garb, and also of having had a stele set up by the Yangzi to record his achievements. Huang Jun, Director of the Secretariat, found that the alleged offences were not specified by the codes, so there was no need for a formal enquiry.

In the following year the rebels in Changsha rose again and attacked Guiyang and Wuling. Since this trouble had arisen so soon after he had withdrawn his army, Feng Gun resigned his office.

Soon afterwards Feng Gun was appointed Court Architect and then Intendant of Henan. He wrote to object to the appointment of eunuch relatives to official positions, but Emperor Huan would not accept the protest.

Feng Gun was later transferred again to be Minister of Justice. In 165 he urged leniency for the anti-eunuch Administrators Cheng Jin and Liu Zhi, and for the unfortunate Inspector of Jing province Li Kui. On the other hand, when Shan Qian the Administrator of Shanyang was arrested for various crimes, Feng Gun ordered the death penalty.

Shan Qian was a brother of the eunuch Shan Chao, and though Shan Chao was dead his colleagues joined to present accusations against Feng Gun. At the same time, Li Ying and Liu You had sent in protests about other matters, and Emperor Huan became angry at the interference. All three officials were sent to convict labour, though with reduced punishment 弛刑.

The Director of Retainers Ying Feng, a former officer of Feng Gun whom he had recommended for that post, argued in his favour and that of his colleagues, and after some months Feng Gun was released. He was later appointed a colonel in the Northern Army, and then became Minister of Justice for a third time. He died at the end of 167.

There were mysterious occurrences associated with Feng Gun's tomb in Ba commandery, and local people worshipped there. -HHS 38/28:1280-84*, XC 2:2b, HYGZ 12:218, SJZ 29:12a, LS 7:13a-15b; deC 89:35, 39, 58-59, 64-65.

Feng Han 馮含; Ba. As Administrator of Longxi, in 154 Feng Han endorsed the report of Dan Wang the Administrator of Ba commandery, his homeland, on the difficulty of maintaining government control over long distances. It was recommended that Ba commandery be divided into smaller units, but the court did not agree. -HYGZ 1:6.

Feng Hao 馮顥 [Shuzai 叔宰]; Guanghan. As a young man Feng Hao studied under Yang Ban and Zhang Guangchao in Shu commandery; he learned magical arts and divination from Yu Shuya of Dongping.

After service as an Internuncio at Luoyang, about 140 Feng Hao returned to the west as magistrate of Chengdu, where he reported the unlawful conduct of the Administrator Liu Xuan. He encouraged learning and opened new areas for agriculture, and his government was graded as Exceptional Quality. He later became a successful and influential Administrator of Yuexi, but then fell foul of Liang Ji and left office.

In retirement Feng Hao conducted himself according to the principles of Huang-Lao. He compiled a commentary to the Book of Changes and also Cishe shuo 刺奢說, an essay against extravagance. -HHS 86/76:2854, HYGZ 3:354, 10B:145; Yao Zhenzong: 2310, 2385.

Feng Heng 封衡 [Junda 君達]; Longxi. Having eaten the huanglian 黃連 coptis plant for fifty years, followed by a hundred years in the mountains on a diet of mercury 水銀, Feng Heng returned to his home country with the appearance of a twenty-year-old. He is commonly referred to by his style, Junda, but he was known as the Taoist Master of the Green Ox 青牛道士, from the beast that he rode, a symbol of the spring and of youth.

Feng Heng is said to have healed many people with drugs or by acupuncture, never giving his name. Like many claimants to long life, he nourished his vital essence by controlled breathing, by drinking urine and by coupling with a number of different women and failing to ejaculate.

Feng Heng acquired a copy of Wuyue zhenxing tu 五嶽真形圖 "Veritable Images of the Five Sacred Peaks" from Lu Nüsheng, and he passed it to his student Zuo Ce. The mystical diagrams, also known as Wuyue tu 五岳圖, served as a talisman against misfortune, particularly for travellers, and modern copies may still be seen [see Ngo 76:112]. -HHS 82/72B:2750, SGZ 29:805; Ngo 76:142, DeWoskin 83:179, Chavannes 10:415-424.

Feng Huan 馮煥 [Pinghou 平侯] (d.121); Ba. Feng

Huan's family was admired by local people for the generosity with which they shared their wealth, and Feng Huan was a noted scholar of Chunqiu, the Classic of Poetry and the laws. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he became a gentleman cadet and was later Inspector of Yu province. His service there was commemorated by an imperial edict of 119, recorded on a stele [LS 15:1b-3a].

Feng Huan was then transferred to You province, where he faced incursions by the Xianbi. After some success, early in 121 he led Yao Guang and Cai Feng, administrators of Xuantu and Liaodong, on a punitive expedition against King Gong of Gaogouli [Koguryo], who had raided Xuantu. They killed several chiefs of the allied Hui and Mo people and captured weapons, horses and treasure, but then Yao Guang was deceived by a false surrender of King Gong's Heir Suicheng, and enemy infiltrators burned Chinese settlements and killed many people. Though Feng Huan called up provincial troops from Zhuo and Yuyang on the North China plain, by the time they arrived the raiders had gone.

Following this debacle, local enemies of Feng Huan and Yao Guang forged an edict for their arrest and execution; Pang Fen the Commandant of Liaodong killed Yao Guang and arrested Feng Huan. Feng Huan was going to kill himself, but his son Feng Gun suspected the orders and persuaded his father to write to the throne. The forgery was discovered, but by the time the matter was determined Feng Huan had died of illness in prison. Pang Fen was punished, while the emperor gave money to the families of both victims and had their sons made gentlemen cadets. [On the dating of the conspiracy, see also sub Yao Guang.] -HHS 5:232, 38/28:1280, 85/75:2814-15, HYGZ 12:218, LS 13:3b-5a, Nagata 94:60; Gardiner 69B:171-182.

Feng Ji 封岌 [Zhongshan 仲山]; Bohai. During Later Han, Feng Ji was Inspector of Liang province and a Palace Attendant. -XTS 71B:2341.

Feng Jie 馮楷 see Feng Kai 馮楷.

Feng Jing 馮勁; Wei. Eldest son of Feng Shun and his wife the Princess Liu Nu, daughter of Emperor Ming, Feng Jing became an officer of the Feathered Forest corps of guards. His younger brother Feng Fen had been made Marquis of Pingyang in Hedong in right of their mother, but when he died without sons the fief was ended. In 95 an imperial letter of Emperor He restored the marquissate for Feng Jing in order that he might maintain sacrifices for the late princess. -HHS 26/16:911.

Feng [Jizai] 馮季宰; Guanghan. Husband of the Lady Li Er, he died young. -HYGZ 10B:153.

Feng Jun 馮駿. Commandant to Liu Xing the King of Changsha, in 29 Feng Jun brought his troops to join Cen Peng, Guangwu's commander in the south, and was made a general. He accompanied the attack which drove the warlord Tian Rong up the Yangzi to take refuge with Gongsun Shu, then remained on guard at the western entrance to the Gorges.

In 30 Gongsun Shu sent Tian Rong in a counter-attack. Feng Jun's position was overrun and the enemy broke into the middle Yangzi. They were turned back without permanent effect, and Feng Jun was able to resume his post.

In the spring of 33 Tian Rong and other commanders again attacked. This time they occupied the course of the Yangzi well into Nan commandery, and established a position which defied the imperial army for two years. In the summer of 35 Feng Jun accompanied Cen Peng in the attack which broke Tian Rong's defences and forced him to take refuge in Jiangzhou, present-day Chongqing. Cen Peng then left Feng Jun to hold him in that city while he advanced against Gongsun Shu's capital Chengdu. Feng Jun maintained the siege until the autumn of 36, when his men took the place by storm and killed Tian Rong. -HHS 17/7:659-62, 1B:57-59.

Feng Kai 馮楷. When Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208 Feng Kai commanded one of seven divisions in Nanyang under the Area Commander 都督 Zhao Yan. -SGZ 23:668.

Feng Li 馮禮 also miswritten as Feng Zha 札 (d.204). An officer under Shen Pei at Ye city, as Cao Cao came to attack he opened a sally-port to let in three hundred of the enemy. The commander Shen Pei found out, blocked the gate and killed all who had entered. -SGZ 6:202.

Feng Liang 馮良 [Junlang 君郎 or Junqing 君卿]; Nanyang. Feng Liang's parents died when he was young, and he later held junior office in the county. As an attendant to the local Commandant at the age of thirty, he was sent to receive the commandery Investigator, but suddenly felt ashamed of his mean position: he threw off his official robes, overturned his carriage, killed the horses and went away to the southwest, where he studied under Du Fu of Jianwei.

When the wreckage of the carriage was found, it was thought that Feng Liang had been taken by wolves or a tiger or bandits, and his wife and children held mourning for him. After more than ten years, Feng Liang returned home, but treated his family and his neighbours very formally.

At the instigation of the official Chen Zhong, in 123 Feng Liang and the hermit scholar Zhou Xie of Runan received special invitations from Emperor An. Though the matter was courteously pressed, both men pleaded ill health and abandoned the journey.

Feng Liang lived to be more than seventy. -HHS 53/43:1742-43; Vervoorn 90:194-195.

Feng Liang 馮諒; Dong. A commandery officer about 210, he arrested Guo Zhen and his female cousin for the murder of the woman's husband Cheng Tuo. Both Guo Zhen and the woman withstood the flogging which was intended to force the truth from them, and Feng Liang became distressed at the pain he was inflicting. He came to believe that he had made a false accusation and that he should himself be punished. The new county magistrate Hu Zhi, however, noted the sexual relationship between the two, examined the affair in more detail, and found out the truth. -SGZ 27:741.

Feng Liu 馮留; Wei. Son of Feng Mao, he inherited his fief. -HHS 26/16:911.

Feng Luan 馮鸞; Ba. Son of Feng Gun, he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet, but appears to have had no further official career. -HHS 38/28:1284.

Feng [Manci] 封曼慈; Taishan. Feng Manci was a distant cousin of Feng Ziheng the Chancellor of Pingyuan. When Feng Ziheng's mother died about 178, Feng Manci took part in her mourning, and his example, as a remote relative, was taken by numbers of gentlemen from Taishan as justification to do the same. -FSTY 3:22; Ying Shao categorises this as Inappropriate 愆禮.

Feng Mao 馮卯; Wei. Son of Feng Jing, he inherited the family marquissate, and about 122 he was a Palace Attendant. -HHS 26:16:911.

Feng Meng 逢萌 see Pang Meng 逢萌. -Vervoorn 90:282, 301.

Feng Pu 馮普; Yingchuan. Son of Feng Zhang and grandson of Feng Yi, he inherited the family marquiss-ate, but was later found guilty of killing a traveller in an affray. Because of an amnesty, Feng Pu suffered only the loss of his fief; it was later restored to his son Feng Chen. -HHS 17/7:652, DGHJ 9:4a.

Feng Qi 封祈 [Wuxing 武興]; Runan. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt by the Administrator Li Zhang 張 [or better Li Chang 偃], probably during the 150s, Feng Qi later became Administrator of Yuzhang. -FSTY 5:37-38 and see also sub Zhou Cheng.

Feng Qiang 馮姜, the Lady; Jingzhao. Daughter of Feng Yan 馮衍 and his wife the Lady Ren q.v., whom he later sent away, she is mentioned in a letter from her father to her uncle Ren Wuda. -HHS 28/18B:1003.

Feng Qin 馮勤 [Weibo 偉伯] (d.56); Wei. Feng Qin was the son of Feng Kang 伉. Feng Kang's father Feng Yan 偃 had tall brothers, but was himself less than seven feet. He arranged for Feng Kang to marry a tall woman, and Feng Qin grew to eight foot three inches Chinese measure [192 cm], one of the tallest men recorded for his time.

By the age of eight Feng Qin was already skilled in calculations. About 25 he became Officer of Merit to the Administrator Yao Qi, a commander for Emperor Guangwu. He was recognised for his ability, and when Yao Qi went on campaign outside the commandery he left Feng Qin in charge.

Feng Qin and his fellow-countryman Feng Xun raised local troops, but before they were ready there was an insurrection by the local chieftain Qiao Qian, and Feng Qin was obliged to take his household, including his aged mother, to seek refuge with Yao Qi. Yao Qi recommended him to Guangwu, but he gained no appointment. Then Yao Qi's successor Fan Heng also recommended him, and Feng Qin was made a gentleman cadet with responsibility in the Imperial Secretariat. He impressed the emperor with his planning for military supplies, and became a close associate. When marquises were awarded, he calculated the value of each fief based upon its distance from the capital and the quality of its land, and his advice became essential for any such grant. Moreover, when the Excellency Hou Ba incurred Guangwu's wrath for recommending the satirist Yan Yang, Feng Qin explained the matter and resolved the difference.

He was then appointed Deputy Director of the Secretariat, and after fifteen years in that office he was enfeoffed as a secondary marquis and promoted to be Director. In 44 Feng Qin became Minister of Finance and in 47 he was appointed Excellency over the Masses.

Guangwu had quarrelled with several earlier holders of that high office, and when he appointed Feng Qin he removed the prefix 大 "Grand" from the Excellency's title, and also warned him of the need for loyalty. Feng Qin was appropriately cautious, he was treated with great favour, and when his aged mother came to court audience, she was excused the kowtow and was escorted to a high place in the hall.

Following an imperial visit to Chang'an in 56, Feng Qin became ill. The emperor sent the court physician to attend him but he died soon afterwards. Guangwu provided funerary items and paid generously for the ceremony. -HHS 26/16:909-11*; Bn 67:18, Bn 79:63.

Feng Ren 封仁. About 215 Feng Ren was Chancellor of Pei when Cao Cao told him of his confidence in the loyalty of Jiang Ji. -SGZ 14:450.

Feng Shan 馮禪. Early in 169 Feng Shan was sent as an Internuncio to invite tribes of the Eastern Qiang to return to their allegiance before the final attack of the general Duan Jiong. A few thousand took advantage of his offer, and they were resettled in Anding, Hanyang and Longxi. -HHS 65/55:2152-53.

Feng She 馮赦 miswritten for Feng Gun 馮緄. -HHS 6:274.

Feng Sheng 逢盛 [Bomi 伯彌] (170-181). Eldest son of a local officer, Feng Sheng was intelligent and well-read, but he died young. His father's colleagues subscribed to a stele in his memory. -LS 10:8a-10b.

Feng Shi 馮石 [Zichu 資初]; Nanyang. Younger son of Feng Zhu, in right of his mother the Princess Liu Yi, daughter of Emperor Ming, Feng Shi was enfeoffed with that county and named a Palace Attendant. He became Bearer of the Mace, then Minister of the Guards and later Minister of the Household.

In 121 Emperor An visited his office, feasted there for several days, and distributed gifts and honours. Feng Shi's three sons received appointments at court, and a special edict was issued to maintain the revenues of his fief, making up for the losses which all marquises had suffered on account of the costs of military operations against the Qiang and other groups.

In 124 Feng Shi became Grand Commandant, and in 125, when the Little Emperor Liu Yi was placed upon the throne by the Dowager Yan, he was named

220 Feng Shi

Grand Tutor. He and the Grand Commandant Liu Xi shared control of the affairs of the Imperial Secretariat, giving formal command of the government.

When Emperor Shun was brought to the throne by the eunuch coup at the end of the year, Feng Shi continued as Grand Tutor, but in 126 he and other officials were impeached by the Director of Retainers Yu Xu for their earlier support of the Yan clan. There was some opposition to raking over old wrongs, and suggestions that the men had simply accorded with the situation at the time, but Yu Xu pressed the question of personal responsibility, and Feng Shi and his colleagues were dismissed.

Feng Shi later returned to office as Minister of the Guards. -HHS 5:234-42, 6:252, 33/23:1149, 58/48:1870.

Feng Shi 馮世; Nanyang. Son of Feng Shi 石, in 121 he was appointed a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. -HHS 33/23:1149.

HHS 33/23:1150 says that when Feng Shi 石 died his son Feng Dai 代 succeeded to his fief. The Song commentator Liu Bin 劉攽 argues that this actually refers to Feng Shi 世: the character was changed to respect taboo on the personal name of Li Shimin 李世民, Emperor Taizong of Tang 唐太宗, but was treated inconsistently. It is also possible that Feng Shi 世 was the eldest son, but died before his father, so the younger brother Feng Dai 代 succeeded to the fief, which later went in turn to the third brother Feng Cheng.

Feng Shi 馮詩. In 125 Feng Shi was a colonel in the Northern Army. As Sun Cheng led a coup against the Yan family to place the former Heir Liu Bao on the throne, Yan Xian the General of Chariots and Cavalry called Feng Shi and Yan Chong to the Northern Palace. He took Feng Shi to audience with the Dowager, who gave him a seal and promised great fiefs for anyone who captured Liu Bao and/or the eunuch Li Run.

Yan Xian was concerned that Feng Shi had too few troops with him, so he sent him with the eunuch Fan Deng to gather reinforcements. Feng Shi, however, killed Fan Deng, returned to his own camp, and took no further part in the affair. -HHS 78/68:2515.

Feng Shi 馮碩 (d.196). In 196 Feng Shi was a member of the Secretariat at the remnant imperial court in Luoyang. As Cao Cao took over he executed him for wrongdoing. -HHS 9:380, HHJ 29:344.

Feng Shu 馮述 (d.168). In 168 Feng Shu was appointed a colonel of the Northern Army by the government of the regent Dowager Dou and her father Dou Wu; it was evidently intended that he would be a source of support in the purge planned against the eunuchs.

In the autumn, however, the eunuchs struck first, and as the troops of the Northern Army abandoned Dou Wu and his party, Feng Shu and many members of his family were killed. -HHS 69/59:2241-44; Ch'ü 72:486-490.

Feng Shun 馮順; Wei. Second son of Feng Qin, he married the Princess Liu Nu, daughter of Emperor Ming. He became Minister Herald. -HHS 26/16:911, 10B:459.

Feng Shuo 馮碩 see Feng Shi 馮碩.

Feng Su 馮肅; Nanyang. Son of Feng Guang, he succeeded to his fief and held office as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. -HHS 33/23:1150.

Feng Su 馮肅. In the early third century the court dancer Feng Su and his colleague Fu Yang preserved the traditions of Han under Cao Cao. -SGZ 29:806.

Feng Ta 封塌 (d.179). A eunuch Regular Attendant, Feng Ta was an associate of Wang Fu. In 179 he and others of their party were impeached by the Director of Retainers Yang Qiu. They were tortured and died in prison. -HHS 77/67:2499-2500.

Feng Ti 馮趯 [Gongxiang 公向]; Yingchuan. Inspector of Xu province, Feng Ti lived very frugally. -XC 6:12a.

Feng Xi 馮奚. Minister of Ceremonies in 64, Feng Xi explained to Emperor Ming why Han Chong the Administrator of Runan would not allow his wife to attend the tomb of the emperor's mother the Dowager Yin. -HHSJJ 29/29:1397-98 Hui Dong quoting Tao Hongjing 陶弘/宏景 of the sixth century.

Feng Xi 馮禧; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Feng Xi was a senior member of the group. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed the association was treasonous, and a warrant was issued for the members' arrest. This was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Feng Xi 馮習 [Xiuyuan 休元] (d.222); Nan. In 212 Feng Xi accompanied Liu Bei into Yi province and became a senior officer in his army. In 221 he held command of the main force of Liu Bei's attack down the Yangzi against Sun Quan, but in the following summer he was defeated and killed. -SGZ Shu 15:1088, 2:980, SGZ Wu 10:1300; Fang 52:100-102.

Feng Xi 馮熙 [Zirou 子柔]; Yingchuan. A member of the leading family of Yingchuan descended from Feng Yi, Feng Xi took refuge in the south from the civil war at the end of Han and joined the staff of Sun Quan.

When Liu Bei died in 223 Feng Yi was sent to present condolences, and was then given appointment at Sun Quan's court. He was later sent on embassy to Wei, was held there by Cao Pi and died in that territory. -SGZ Wu 2:1130-31.

Feng Xian 馮羨. Formerly Inspector of Qing province and a senior and distinguished Confucianist, in 142 Feng Xian was given acting position as a Household Counsellor at the court of Emperor Shun and joined the special commission of eight sent out to observe the conduct of the empire. Little came of the project, however, and government remained in the hands of the Liang kinsmen of the empress.

Feng Xian was subsequently appointed Director of Retainers; years later he was named by Kou Rong as one of the corrupt officials who had persecuted him and his family. -HHS 6:272, 61/51:2029, 16/6:628.

Feng Xiao 馮孝; Yingchuan. An elder cousin of Feng Yi, who was an officer of Wang Mang, he joined Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, in 23. In the summer of that year the Han forces captured Feng Yi, but Feng Xiao arranged that Feng Yi met Liu Xiu, and Feng Yi became one of Guangwu's leading military commanders. -HHS 17/7:639.

Feng Xin 馮信 [Jicheng 季誠]; Guanghan. Celebrated in his region, at the end of Former Han and in the time of Wang Mang Feng Xin was repeatedly nominated for office by the commandery and provincial authorities, was invited to join the offices of the Excellencies at court, and had a special carriage sent to bring him to the capital. He rejected all such offers.

When Gongsun Shu took the imperial title in 25, he too wanted Feng Xin to join his government. Feng Xin followed the example of his neighbour Ren Yong and pretended to be blind; on one occasion his servants copulated in his presence, but he acted as if nothing was happening.

In 36, after Gongsun Shu was destroyed, the two men ended the pretence, and those who had acted badly before them now killed themselves. Emperor Guangwu heard of this conduct and invited them to court, but Feng Xin was now too old to travel, while Ren Yong died of illness. -HHS 81/71:2670, HYGZ 10B:147; Vervooorn 90:143.

HHS describes Feng Xin as a fellow-countryman of Ren Yong, who came from Jianwei, but HYGZ says that he came from Qi 鄆 county in Guanghan. Qi was in the south of Guanghan, close to the border with Jianwei.

Feng Xin 馮訢; Yingchuan. A younger son of Feng Yi, after his father's death in 34 his elder brother Feng Zhang inherited his county fief. In the following year, in recognition of Feng Yi's great service, Emperor Guangwu awarded Feng Xin a district marquiseate. -HHS 17/7:652.

Feng Xu 封譚 (d.184). Though favoured palace eunuchs, the Regular Attendants Feng Xu and Xu Feng were members of the religious sect led by Zhang Jue; in the early 180s they joined his agent Ma Yuanyi in plans for a coup at the capital to coincide with rebellion throughout the empire. Some weeks beforehand, however, the renegade disciple Tang Zhou sent a message to the court to tell of the conspiracy. Ma Yuanyi was killed and a purge of Zhang Jue's followers in Luoyang brought another thousand to execution.

Emperor Ling was furious at this disloyalty among his attendants, but Zhang Rang and Wang Fu managed to reconcile him.

It appears that Feng Xu was a close associate of Emperor Ling's mother the Dowager Dong, for in 189 He Jin and the Excellencies claimed that he had assisted her to receive money from provincial authorities for her own private treasury -HHS 71/61:2299-2300, 78/68:2535, 10B:447.

Feng Xuan 封囷; Bohai. Feng Xuan was a son of Feng Ji. -XTS 71B:2341.

Feng Xun 馮巡; Wei. A fellow-countryman of the Officer of Merit Feng Qin about 25, he joined him in attempting to raise local troops and hold Wei commandery for Emperor Guangwu. They were attacked and defeated by the local chieftain Qiao Qian. -HHS 26/16:909.

Feng Xun 馮巡. About 175 the Attendant Officer Feng Xun joined the Registrar Hua Cao and other senior colleagues in erecting a stele in honour of their master Xue Jixiang, Inspector of Yan. -SJZ 8:22a.

Despite the similarity of name and date, this Feng Xun should not be the same man as in the entry below, for an Attendant Officer was appointed locally and Nanyang commandery was not in Yan province.

Feng Xun 馮巡 [Jizu 季租] (d.184); Nanyang. HHS 107/17:3345 and FSTY 4f:113 say that in 178 Feng Xun was Chief Clerk under the Excellency over the Masses when his horse gave birth to a child of alien appearance; the non-Chinese slave who looked after the animal was assumed to be involved. The portent is interpreted as a sign of disorder for the empire.

LS 3:15a-25a, 22:6a-b and Nagata 94:238-40 preserve the text of several inscriptions recording how Feng Xun, Chancellor of Changshan, with approval from the court, set up stele to important peaks along the edge of the Taihang Mountains. These are dated from 181 to 183, and in 181 Feng Xun also offered a prayer for rain in time of drought.

HHS 107/17 says that Feng Xun became Chancellor of Ganling, and was killed by Yellow Turbans in 184.

Feng Xun 馮恂. In 174 Feng Xun held probationary appointment as a member of the Suite of the Heir, but was evidently attached to the Bureau of Astronomy. When the commandery official Liu Hong sent in a proposal to correct the calendar of lunar eclipses, Feng Xun and his colleague Liu Gu were ordered to test his system against observations, but they also devised another set of calculations. It was agreed that the rival methods would be tested in 179, when the official calendar forecast an eclipse in the fifth month, Liu Hong had the third month, and Liu Gu and Feng Xun the fourth month. When the time came, however, two of the full moons were overcast and could not be observed; in fact there was no eclipse that year until the ninth month.

In 175 the former astronomical official Zong Zheng, a grandson of the calendrical scholar Zong Gan, sent in a proposal to revise the system of forecasting solar eclipses by calculating the course of the moon in relation to the ecliptic, and Feng Xun was ordered to check his workings against observations. They proved correct, but the Astronomer Shan Yang found little improvement over the current system.

In that same year Zong Zheng's younger brother Zong Cheng also presented revisions to Zong Gan's method of forecasting eclipses of the moon. The revised system was found superior to that of the official bureau and was put into effect. In 179 the Astronomer Xiu accepted the method of Feng Xun [surname probably miswritten as Zhang: see below], and recommended that Zong Cheng's system be abandoned. In the following year Zong Zheng complained that Feng Xun's calculations had been wrong, and by imperial order the Minister of Ceremonies set up a committee of enquiry. After acrimonious debate Zong Cheng's method was found to be slightly the better and it was restored. It was explained that astronomy was an inexact science and no system was perfect, and because of the trouble they had caused Zong Cheng and Feng Xun were each fined two months salary and Zong Zheng suffered two months convict service. [In this incident, the name of Feng Xun is given as Zhang 張, but I believe the character has been miswritten for Feng 馮: see sub Zhang Xun.] -HHS 92/2:3030, 3041-42; Sivin 69:60.

Feng [Wudian] 封武典; Runan. Though nominated and invited to office at the imperial capital, when their patron the Administrator Li Chang died, Feng Wudian and other nominees remained to carry out his mourning. This is very likely a reference to Feng Qi, whose style was Wuxing 武興: see sub Li Chang 佷.

Feng Yan 馮衍 [Jingtong 敬通]; Jingzhao. Son of Feng Zuo 座, Feng Yan was a grandson of a great-uncle of the infant Emperor Ping [QHX:104; HQ 1:7a has Feng Zuo's personal name as Man 滿]. Showing early talent, he knew the Classic of Poetry by the age of nine and was widely learned by the age of twenty. He refused several invitations to office, but in 22 he joined the staff of Wang Mang's general Lian Dan 廉丹, opposed to the Red Eyebrows in Yan province. When Wang Mang sent Lian Dan orders to defeat the enemy or die, Feng Yan urged him to abandon the lost cause of Xin. Lian Dan, however, died in battle, and Feng Yan then fled to refuge in Hedong.

As the Gengshi commissioner Bao Yong came to the region in 24, Feng Yan made himself known. Bao Yong was aware of his reputation and was impressed with his eloquent letter of presentation. He gave him title as a general and sent him as a magistrate to Taiyuan, where he was to co-operate with Tian Yi the Administrator of Shangdang in raising and training men to defend Bing province.

After the fall of Luoyang in 25 the armies of Emperor Guangwu attacked Shangdang, and though Tian Yi held them off for a time, when he learnt of the death of the Gengshi Emperor he surrendered to the new regime. Bao Yong and Feng Yan did not believe the news, and Feng Yan wrote to criticise Tian Yi. He replied in turn, and their exchange was preserved as a model of literary debate.

Believing that the Gengshi Emperor was still alive with the Red Eyebrows, Feng Yan and Bao Yong maintained their troops in Taiyuan and attempted to stir up trouble in Shangdang. At the beginning of 26, however, having confirmed that their leader was dead, they disbanded their forces and surrendered.

Guangwu was annoyed at their long resistance and that they had brought no troops with them. Bao Yong was soon employed, but Feng Yan remained for some time without any position. He was then sent as a county magistrate to Changshan, where he put down bandits so successfully that he was proposed for enfeoffment. People spoke against him, and nothing came of it. Again, in 30 or 31, there was an eclipse of the sun and Feng Yan sent in a memorial urging eight points of reform. Guangwu intended to summon him for audience, but Linghu Lue and others were concerned about what he might say of them, and they successfully quashed the idea.

Later, perhaps in the mid-40s, Feng Yan was sponsored by the emperor's brothers-in-law Yin Xing and Yin Jiu, and with this support he became popular with other feudal lords. He was appointed to the staff of the Director of Retainers but then Guangwu became worried about the potential of imperial relatives by marriage to take over power as they had in Former Han, and purged the bureaucracy of their clients. Fang Yan spent some time in prison, and though he was released on an amnesty he went back to his home, lived in seclusion, and had no more contact with the court.

Some time in the 50s Feng Yan made a last appeal to the throne for some useful appointment, but was again ignored on account of his unfortunate record. He expressed frustration at his failed career in the rhapsody Xianshi fu 顯士賦 "Revealing my Aspirations," describing a journey through earth and heaven in which he looks for a world more in tune with his ideals. This major piece, which occupies the bulk of HHS 28/18B, had considerable influence thereafter. On the other hand, though there was a possibility of employment by Emperor Ming in the late 50s, presumably through support of the Yin family, it was still felt that Feng Yan was better at literature than in dealing with the real world.

Feng Yan had great problems with his wife the Lady Ren and eventually sent her away, writing a long letter to his brother-in-law Ren Wuta to explain himself.

Otherwise he was a man who had high ambition but no concern for his personal fortunes. He died in poverty.

Feng Yan's collected writings amounted to fifty pian, including rhapsodies, essays, inscriptions and official documents. In later years his work was admired by Emperor Zhang. -HHS 28/18A-B:962-1003*; QHX: 102, Bn 79:128, Knechtges 82:32, 504-505.

Feng Yan 馮衍, wife of: see the Lady Ren 任 of Beidi.

Feng Yan 馮晏 (d.25). In 25 Feng Yan was magistrate of Huangcheng in Shangdang for Emperor Guangwu. Bao Sheng and Zhang Shu, officers of the Gengshi regime, captured the city with the aid of an internal rising, and Feng Yan was killed. -HHS 28/18A:976.

Feng Yi 馮異 [Gongsun 公孫] (d.34); Yingchuan. Fond of reading, Feng Yi had good understanding of Chunqiu and Zuo zhuan, and of the Art of War ascribed to Sun Wu 孫子[武]兵法.

In 23 Feng Yi was a local commandery officer responsible for supervision of five counties. That summer the Han rebels under Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, defeated Wang Mang's army at Kunyang, and Feng Yi joined Miao Meng the magistrate of his home county to hold the city for the Xin dynasty. Liu Xiu attacked without success, but as he left the city to make contact with other counties Feng Yi was captured. His cousin Feng Xiao and two men of Yingchuan, Ding Chen and Lü Yan, had already joined Liu Xiu, and they arranged for Feng Yi to meet him. Feng Yi argued that he personally was of no great value to the Han cause, but asked to return home to his mother, and undertook to persuade his colleagues to change sides. Liu Xiu agreed, and Feng Yi did persuade Miao Meng to accept Liu Xiu.

About this time the Gengshi Emperor had Liu Xiu's brother Liu Bosheng killed. Liu Xiu returned to Nanyang, and when the Gengshi Emperor sent troops to take over the city Feng Yi and Miao Meng refused them. A few months later Liu Xiu was given acting appointment as Director of Retainers and sent to restore order in Luoyang. He travelled by Fucheng and was welcomed by Feng Yi and Miao Meng. He appointed Feng Yi as his Registrar, and Feng Yi recommended Yao Qi and other members of the local gentry to Liu Xiu; this Yingchuan group never obtained factional importance.

At Luoyang Feng Yi played a role in arranging for Liu Xiu to be sent as commissioner north of the Yellow River. Though the Gengshi Emperor had considered the appointment, many of his party opposed the idea, but Feng Yi urged Liu Xiu to make amicable and generous contact with the Excellency Cao Chang and his son Cao Xu, and their influence secured the decision. As they travelled north Feng Yi observed to Liu Xiu that the Gengshi Emperor was losing the confidence of the people, and recommended he consider seeking the throne himself. It is said that as Liu Xiu came to the north he sent Feng Yi on an ostensible tour of inspection, with instructions to find officials who might support his cause. This would have been a dangerous move, and premature, but Feng Yi was evidently a confidant.

Soon afterwards Wang Lang rebelled and Liu Xiu fled from Ji city in Guangyang to Xindu. Feng Yi was a close companion, and as they took refuge along the way he gathered firewood to cook bean-porridge and a shoulder of hare. From Xindu Feng Yi was sent out to gather troops in Hejian. He took part in the campaigns against Wang Lang as a lieutenant-general, and after the final victory he received title as a marquis, with a district fief which was apparently in his own homeland. Quiet and reluctant to compete for precedence, Feng Yi would withdraw his chariot before any other that he met upon a road. He was known for the good order in his camps, and was nicknamed the "Big-Tree General" 大樹將軍 for his custom of sitting apart under a tree when the army came to a halt, rather than joining the other officers. He was well-liked by his men, and when surrendered soldiers of Wang Lang were shared among Liu Xiu's commanders, the majority applied to join his troop.

Feng Yi was then sent on a separate expedition to the north, where he defeated a group of bandits about present-day Beijing and forced the surrender of a Xiongnu king. For the time being, the frontier was settled. Returning south, he advised Liu Xiu how to gain the surrender of Han Xin the Gengshi Administrator of Henei.

The Gengshi Emperor had set Zhu Wei and Li Yi to hold Luoyang against the threats from Liu Xiu and the Red Eyebrows in the east. Liu Xiu had still to deal with resistance and banditry in the north, so he left Kou Xun as Administrator of Henei and Feng Yi as General of the Meng Crossing to hold the line of the Yellow River, supported only by the forces of Wei commandery and Henei. Early in 25 Feng Yi wrote a secret and eloquent letter inviting Li Yi to surrender. An early associate of Liu Bosheng, Li Yi had later turned against him and been instrumental in his death. Concerned that the Gengshi regime was doomed, however, Li Yi replied that he wished to make peace with Liu Xiu, and he halted operations. Relieved of that threat, Feng Yi established a defensive position to the north, then crossed the Yellow River to occupy territory to the east. The Gengshi Administrator of Henan, Wu Bo, made a sortie but was defeated, and Li Yi closed the gates of Luoyang so that he was isolated and killed. Feng Yi now told Liu Xiu of the agreement, but Liu Xiu would not forgive the betrayal of his brother: he published the correspondence and Li Yi was killed by his fellows.

Zhu Wei attempted a counter-attack against Feng Yi at the Meng Crossing, while he sent his subordinate Su Mao to outflank him downstream. Kou Xun, however, gathered his commandery troops, and with reinforcements from Feng Yi he defeated Su Mao. Feng Yi then crossed the River with his main army, defeated Zhu Wei, drove him back into Luoyang, and marched triumphantly around the city walls.

Feng Yi now joined other commanders urging Liu Xiu to claim the imperial title, and he took part in the enthronement on 5 August 25. Early in the following year he was awarded a county fief.

Feng Yi was withdrawn from the final stages of the campaign about Luoyang and sent to deal with local bandits in his home commandery of Yingchuan. He drove them away, and a palace official was then sent with offerings to assist him carry out sacrifices at his family tombs, while the administrators, imperial officials and kinsmen for hundreds of li around were ordered to attend the ceremony.

In the latter part of 26 Feng Yi joined Wu Han in putting down the Five Towers bandit group in Ji province north of the Yellow River, and they went on to eliminate the Bronze Horses and Five Banners groups. In the winter Feng Yi was recalled to the main army under Guangwu and sent west, with detailed instructions, to replace Deng Yu in operations against the Red Eyebrows. Moving through Hongnong commandery, he had small difficulty in dealing with local leaders and bandits, but he was then held for two months in a series of engagements with the Red Eyebrows by the junction of the Wei and the Yellow River. Early in 27 the immediate enemy surrendered with five thousand men, and Feng Yi was promoted from lieutenant-general to a chief general.

Ashamed at his own lack of success, Deng Yu now sought to return to the campaign, but was again defeated. Feng Yi came to the rescue and urged a pincer movement against the bandits, but then Deng Yu's officer Deng Hong attacked on his own, and both Deng Yu and Feng Yi were drawn into the fight. Deng Yu was defeated in a foolhardy sortie, while Feng Yi lost his horse and escaped by climbing the side of a ravine. Regrouping his men, he returned to face the Red Eyebrows and agreed with them on a day to renew the battle. This time, he had some of his men dress in enemy costume and hide. He gained early success, and as the bandits withdrew the men in ambush attacked them. The Red Eyebrows were thrown into confusion and heavily defeated.

Having thus regained the initiative, Feng Yi forced great numbers of the enemy to surrender and harried the bulk of the horde east to Yiyang in Hongnong. As they came face-to-face with the main army under Guangwu, Feng Yi blocked the rear, and on 15 March the Red Eyebrows capitulated.

The lands about Chang'an, long disrupted by the bandits, were still beyond the control of the new Han regime. A number of local gentry had seized power in the counties and held title as generals. Each claimed command of several thousand men, and each fought the other. Feng Yi was sent to establish order, and he set his base at the Shanglin Park south of Chang'an. In the summer he was attacked by the condottiere Yan Cen and the local warlords Zhang Han and Ren Liang. Feng Yi defeated their combined army, forced the surrender of Ren Liang, and drove Yan Cen away into Hongnong and then into Nanyang.

The territory was short of food, but Feng Yi's position was relieved by Zhao Kuang the new Administrator of Youfufeng, who brought reinforcements and supplies. They attacked the remaining local leaders, killed those who would not submit and sent the others to Luoyang. For the time being the Han had a tacit agreement with the warlord Wei Ao of the upper Wei valley, so it was possible to return the followers of the former warlords to their homes and encourage the resettlement of the land.

In 28, a last attempt at resistance saw Cheng Yan/Wu, general of Gongsun Shu, come north to support the surviving warlords Zhang Han, Lü Wei and Jiang Zhen. Feng Yi defeated this allied force at Chencang in Youfufeng, and Cheng withdrew across the Qin Ling. He was followed by Lü Wei, while Jiang Zhen and Zhang Han are not heard of again. By the end of the year the territory was well under Han control, though Feng Yi was obliged to repel a number of exploratory raids by Gongsun Shu's forces across the mountains.

At this time Feng Yi asked leave to return to the east, but Guangwu refused. Later it was reported that Feng Yi was usurping authority, that he had killed the magistrate of Chang'an, that he was unduly popular among the people, and that he was known as the King of Xianyang 咸陽王. The emperor had him shown the report, Feng Yi sent in a most apologetic and eloquent memorial to assure Guangwu of his loyalty, and an edict in reply confirmed his trust and favour.

In 30 Feng Yi came to court at Luoyang, where Guangwu received him most generously, recalling his loyalty in the difficult times against Wang Lang. Feng Yi, for his part, remembered the favour he had received at the time of his initial capture. Having joined in the plans for attack against Gongsun Shu, after a few weeks he was sent back to the west, now accompanied by his wife and family. That summer, as Wei Ao refused to support the campaign against Gongsun Shu, the Han forces attacked him up the Long Slope. Surprisingly, Wei Ao's men defeated them and counter-attacked towards Chang'an. Ordered to hold the northern flank, Feng Yi took Wei Ao's general Xing Xun by surprise and defeated him, while his colleague Zhai Zun achieved similar success further south.

As the enemy retreated, Feng Yi was sent into Beidi with additional title as Acting Administrator to compel the allegiance of the local chieftains. He also forced the surrender of the non-Chinese people of the Qing Shan 青山 hills and drove away the troops of the pretender Lu Fang and his Xiongnu allies. With Beidi and Shang commandery largely free of hostile forces, Feng Yi was named Acting Administrator of Anding to press on Wei Ao's position from the north.

In 32, however, unexpected rebellions broke out in the east, Wei Ao briefly recovered his position, and Anding and Beidi rebelled once more. Feng Yi had his hands full to regain control, but early in 33 Wei Ao died. Wei Ao's officers Wang Yuan and Zhou Zong set up his son Wei Chun and received support from Gongsun Shu, who sent his general Zhao Kuang to assist them. Feng Yi, who had taken over the troops of his late colleague Zhai Zun, was now named Acting Administrator of Tianshui, and was actively engaged with the enemy, frequently at the forefront of the imperial army. After a year of fighting in Tianshui, he captured Zhao Kuang and killed him.

In the summer of 34, on campaign outside the capital of Tianshui commandery, Feng Yi was taken ill and died. He was awarded a posthumous title, and his eldest son Feng Zhang succeeded to his fief. In 35 Guangwu gave further recognition by awarding a district fief to his younger son Feng Xin.

In recognition of Feng Yi as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. Feng Yi's grandson Pu lost his fief because he killed a man, but in 112 the government of Emperor An under the Dowager Deng issued an edict to commemorate the twenty-eight generals of Guangwu, Feng Yi and his colleagues, and Feng Pu's son Chen was granted a district fief. -HHS 17/7:639-52*, 16/6:601; Bn 54:71, Bn 59:63, 117-119, 160, Bn 67:103, 115, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:80, 103.

Feng Yi 馮翊 [Xiuyuan休元] (d.222); Nan. Having joined Liu Bei when he was in Jing province, Feng Yi went with him to the west in 211.

As Liu Bei attacked down the Yangzi against Wu in 221, Feng Yi was commander of the main army. He was killed in the rout which followed. -SGZ Shu 15:1088, SGZ Wu 10:1300.

Feng Yin 馮愷. When Deng Yu was ordered west against the Gengshi Emperor in 24, he appointed Feng Yin as a general under his command. In the autumn of 25 Feng Yin and the minister Liu Yan led troops into Shangdang, where they were opposed by the Gengshi officer Tian Yi. Though they captured Tian Yi's wife and family they could make no progress, and Tian Yi later sent envoys to surrender directly to Emperor Guangwu at Luoyang.

In the winter, Deng Yu left Feng Yin and his colleague Zong Xin in Youfufeng to face Chang'an while he took the main army to mop up in the north. As the two generals quarrelled about their respective authority, Feng Yin killed Zong Xin and then turned against Deng Yu. Deng Yu was defeated and asked Guangwu for advice; the emperor enquired which was Feng Yin's favourite officer. Told it was Huang Fang, Guangwu assured Deng Yu he would deliver Feng Yin into his hands.

Feng Yin moved into Anding, but was defeated by troops of the warlord Wei Ao, who captured his baggage. Deng Yu sent Zong Guang, an officer of the Imperial Secretariat, with the Staff of Authority to invite the rebels to surrender, and a few weeks later Huang Fang arrested Feng Yin and came to submit. As Feng Yin was brought to Luoyang, he received an amnesty and escaped execution.

Though the affair had been quickly settled, Feng Yin's defection and his embarrassing defeat of Deng Yu weakened the newly-established position of Han in the northwest. -HHS 16/6:601-04, 13/3:522.

Feng You 馮由; Wei. A younger son of Feng Shun, he married the Princess Liu Wang, daughter of Emperor Zhang, and became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. -HHS 10B:460, 26/16:911.

Feng You 馮尤; Hongnong. Though he came from outside the commandery, about 150 Feng You was a local officer on the staff of Dan Wang, Administrator of Ba. In 154 he and his colleagues persuaded Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending that the territory be divided. The court did not agree. -HYGZ 1:5.

Feng Yun 馮允 or Feng Yuan 元 [Gongxin 公信]; Ba. Younger brother of Feng Gun, Feng Yun was known for honesty and filial piety. A scholar of the Classic of History, he was also an expert in divination and astronomy. He served as a colonel, perhaps under his brother's command. -HHS 38/28:1284, HYGZ 12:218.

HHS has the personal name as Yun 允 but HYGZ has Yuan 元. In HHSJJ 92/2:3412 Hui Dong suggests that Yun/Yuan may be the same person as Feng Guang 光, who was a junior officer in 175 with views on the calendar. Though the three characters are similar, Feng Guang appears to belong to a different generation to Feng Gun.

Feng Ze 馮則. In 208 Feng Ze was a cavalry trooper under the command of Sun Quan against Huang Zu. As the enemy was defeated Huang Zu fled, but Feng Ze chased him and took his head. -SGZ Wu 2:1117.

Feng Zha 馮札 miswritten for Feng Li 馮禮. -HHS 74/64B:2416.

Feng Zhan 馮湛; Ba. Registrar of the commandery, Feng Zhan was celebrated for his loyalty. -HYGZ 12:220.

Feng Zhang 馮彰/璋; Yingchuan. Eldest son of Feng

Yi, after his father's death in 34 he inherited his county marquisate in Chen. In 37 the fief was transferred to Shanyang, with revenue from three counties. In 62 Emperor Ming changed it to Julu, with revenue drawn from Yulin in the far south. -HHS 17/7:652, DGHJ 9: 3b-4a.

Feng Zhi 馮直. Inspector of Ji province about 130, Feng Zhi was recommended for military appointment by Zuo Xiong, Director of the Secretariat, who had at one time served under Feng Zhi's father. It was later found that Feng Zhi had been guilty of a crime and that he had limited military ability. Zhou Ju, another protégé of Zuo Xiong, reported this and criticised Zuo Xiong. -HHS 61/51:2022.

Feng Zhou 馮冑 [Shiwei 世威]; Shangdang. A disciple of Li He, when his master died about 130 Feng Zhou maintained three years full mourning for him, and was much admired for his devotion. Following the examples of Zhou Dang and Min Gong, he went to live as a hermit among the hills and marshes, and would accept no invitations or offers of appointment. -HHS 82/72A:2718.

Feng Zhu 馮柱; Nanyang. Son of Feng Fang, Feng Zhu succeeded to his father's fief and married the Princess Liu Ji, daughter of Emperor Ming. Known for his courtesy and modesty, he became a Palace Attendant and was then a colonel in the Northern Army.

In 94, Feng Zhu commanded a column in the army of Deng Hong which was sent to pursue the renegade Xiongnu prince Fenghou. The army gained a victory and Feng Zhu's division followed and caught a group of the enemy, but the main body escaped across the frontier and in the following year Deng Hong abandoned the pursuit and withdrew.

In 96, as the Chinese faced the threat from Fenghou now established across the frontier, Feng Zhu took command of troops drawn from the Tiger Tooth Camp near Chang'an, reinforcing the General on the Liao Pang Fen on the frontier of Wuyuan. Later that year a major group of Fenghou's people came back to China, and in the autumn Feng Zhu and Pang Fen combined with commandery troops to attack and kill the renegade Xiongnu chieftain Wujuzhan. Wujuzhan's followers surrendered and were brought back to settle in Anding and Beidi.

Soon afterwards Feng Zhu was recalled to the capital as Court Architect. -HHS 33/23:1149, 89/79: 2956-57, 4:179-81, 10B:459; deC 84:282.

Feng [Ziheng] 封子衡. Feng Ziheng was Chancellor of Pingyuan about 178. When his mother died, though he had himself only marginal contact with the commandery of Taishan, numbers of gentlemen from that territory put on mourning as a sign of respect. - FSTY 3:22; Ying Shao categorises this as Inappropriate 愆禮.

Feng Zong 馮宗; Wei. Eldest son of Feng Qin, he inherited his father's secondary marquisate at his death in 56. He became Commandant of the Dependent State of Zhangye. -HHS 26/16:911.

Feng Zun 馮遵 [Wenheng 文衡]; Ba. Son of Feng Yun/Yuan, he became a member of the Imperial Secretariat. -HYGZ 12:218.

Fenghe 封何; Qiang. A leader of the Xianlian tribe of the Qiang, about 24 he attacked Jincheng commandery, killed the Administrator and occupied the territory. He formed an alliance with Wei Ao, and about 30 Wei Ao was proposing to use him against the north-western warlord Dou Rong. Dou Rong attacked Fenghe, heavily defeated him and drove him from Jincheng. -HHS 23/13:804.

Fenghou 逢侯; Xiongnu. A son of the Southern Shanyu Tuntuhe, in 94 Fenghou was a middle-ranking king. The new Shanyu Shizi, who had been brought to the throne with Chinese support, was known for his hostility to the Northern Xiongnu, and the many northerners who had lately been forced to surrender and submit themselves to the southern court were seriously concerned for their future.

In the autumn some fifteen tribal groups of Northern Xiongnu, numbering more than 200,000 people, rose in rebellion and named Fenghou as their Shanyu. Killing the officials who had been set over them and burning the guard stations, they attacked Shizi and the Emissary Du Chong in a herding office near the Xiongnu capital at Meiji in Xihe. In this last the rebels gained no success, and they then sought to move northwest across the Ordos to Shuofang and escape into the steppe.

The Han government named Deng Hong Acting General of Chariots and Cavalry, gave him an army of forty thousand men, including regiments of the Northern Army and Wuhuan and Xianbi auxiliaries, and sent him to deal with Fenghou. He achieved one substantial victory, and separate columns under Ren Shang and Feng Zhu also gained success, but Fenghou and his people were primarily anxious to escape and they did not stand to fight. By good fortune the Yellow River had frozen, so the fugitives could cross to the northern shore, and early in 95 the imperial army abandoned the pursuit and withdrew to the frontier line.

In aftermath of the campaign, Deng Hong was sent to prison for his failure and died there, while Du Chong and the General on the Liao Zhu Hui, held responsible for the initial trouble through their support of Shizi against the previous Shanyu Anguo, shared Deng Hong's fate. Faced with a new enemy, the Han were obliged to reinforce their garrisons in Wuyuan, but once outside the frontier the escapees divided into two. Fenghou was based at Zhuoye Mountain, north of Wuyuan in the Gurvan Sayhan Uul range, the first notable high ground in present-day Outer Mongolia; the other group was more than a hundred kilometres away, northwest of Shuofang. In the winter of 96 this western group, including four thousand fighting men and over ten thousand of their families, returned to the Chinese frontier to surrender.

Though Fenghou's territory was close to the old centre of the Xiongnu state, he was isolated on the steppe. He not only suffered raiding from the Southern Xiongnu and their Chinese allies, but was also under pressure from the Xianbi to the east. Increasingly distressed, he and his people were driven steadily to the west, and in 104 he sent messengers to offer himself as a tributary. Emperor He sent generous gifts, but did not authorise his envoy to negotiate a formal peace.

After Emperor He's death in the following year, Fenghou again sought terms from the new regime controlled by the Dowager Deng. He sent a hostage, and apologised for the meagre tribute, which was all he could offer from his impoverished people. Once again the court rejected his advances, and Fenghou abandoned his position to withdraw further into the steppe.

In 118, with barely a hundred followers, Fenghou entered the Shuofang frontier and surrendered unconditionally to the Han general Deng Zun. On Deng Zun's recommendation, the group was resettled into Yingchuan commandery, in the heart of the empire, where they were presumably introduced to the techniques of farming in place of the wandering pastoral life they had led in the past. They are not heard of again.

Besides his personal experience, the career of Fenghou demonstrates the failure of Chinese policy toward the Xiongnu. Though he was a member of the royal clan of the Southern Shanyu, Fenghou became leader of northerners who felt threatened by their southern cousins led by Shizi and quite inadequately protected by Chinese officials such as the Emissary Du Chong. On the other hand, when he was able to reach the lands beyond the frontier, Fenghou proved unable to maintain an independent state there. After twenty years in the steppe, almost all of his people had left him and called themselves Xianbi. By sheer attrition and the loss of authority, a Xiongnu state and its nominal subjects had been absorbed into the growing, albeit unorganised, power of the Xianbi. -HHS 89/79:2955-58; deC 84:280-295.

Fengli 封離. A clan chieftain of the Qiongnu people in Yuexi, in 118 he led a rebellion which first killed a county magistrate and then obtained support in the neighbouring commanderies of Yongchang, Yizhou and Shu.

In the following year the Inspector Zhang Qiao sent his Assistant Officer Yang Song against them, and though at first the enemy were too numerous to attack, Yang Song raised further troops by impressment and bounties, then heavily defeated the rebels. Great numbers were killed, some prisoners taken, and quantities of booty were taken. Fengli and his fellows then killed a number of their senior associates, claimed that these men had been the ring-leaders, and went to Yang Song to surrender. -HHS 86/76:2853-54.

Fu 伏, Empress of Emperor Xian: see the Lady Fu Shou.

Fu 傅 [personal name unknown]; non-Chinese of Zangke. Head of the clan of that name in the middle 20s, he and other leaders supported the Chinese Xie Xian, Officer of Merit of the commandery, in maintaining allegiance to Han rather than acknowledging the imperial claim of Gongsun Shu. They sent messengers by the south-eastern route through present-day Guangdong, and Guangwu rewarded them with ceremonial robes. -HHS 86/76:2845, HYGZ 4:54.

Fu 伏 [personal name unknown]; Langye. Son of Fu Li 理 and elder twin of Fu Zhan, he was the natural father of Fu Gong. -HHS 79/69B:2571.

Fu 扶 [personal name unknown]; Nanyang. A former county magistrate, in 156 this man was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. It is possible that his personal name was Zhong 仲. -LS 17:16a.

Fu, Old Man 涪翁 see Old Man of the Fu River.

Fu An 伏黯 [Zhiwen 稚文]; Langye. Son of Fu Li 理, Fu An was younger twin brother of Fu Zhan. A noted Confucian scholar, in 15 he was chosen by Wang Mang to accompany an embassy to the Xiongnu, evidently to assist in debates with the Shanyu, and on their return he and his colleagues were enfeoffed.

Fu An later became Minister of the Household to Emperor Guangwu. As he died without children, his nephew Gong was adopted to maintain the lineage.

An expert on the Classic of Poetry according to the school of Qi, Fu An composed a Jieshuo 解說 "Explanation of Terms" and left also a revised detailed commentary. His adopted son Gong summarised the latter, massive, work to 200,000 words. -HHS 79/69B: 2571-72; Dubs 55:352-353 [transcribing the personal name as Yan], Tjan 49:148-149.

Fu An 傅安. An officer in the Bureau of Astronomy about 90, Fu An devised the ecliptic ring 黃道 or 日道 for the armillary sphere. His work was reported to the throne by Jia Kui. -HHS 92/2:3028; Needham 59:343-349.

Fu Bao 傅保/寶 [Jitu 紀圖]; Zangke. Known for his virtues, Yin Gong joined the Imperial Secretariat and was later Administrator of Ba commandery. -HYGZ 4: 54, 12:237, HYGZ/JBTZ:260.

Fu Chang 傅昌; Yingchuan. Son of Fu Jun, he succeeded to his fief, but the territory was later transferred from Yingchuan to Danyang. About 75 Fu Chang's mother died, and he petitioned the throne that, because the revenues were small and his family was poor, he wished to relinquish his full county fief and be granted a secondary marquise, together with 500,000 cash. Angry at such insensitivity, Emperor Zhang reduced Fu Chang's rank but gave no money in compensation. -HHS 22/12:782.

Fu Chen 伏湛 see Fu Zhan 伏湛.

Fu Chen 伏晨; Langye. Son of Fu Guang and a scholarly, generous man, Fu Chen succeeded to his father's fief and married the Princess of Gaoping in Shanyang. When his grand-daughter became an Honoured Lady of Emperor Shun, Fu Chen was named Specially Advanced, a senior title which allowed him to remain at Luoyang rather than residing at his fief. -HHS 26/16:897-98.

Fu Cheng 伏盛 or Fu Sheng [Boming 伯明] i.e. Fu Long 伏隆. -DGHJ 13:1b.

Fu Chong 傅充; Beidi. Son of Fu Rui, he held court office at Luoyang, and his son Fu Jia 赧 gained high office under Wei. -SGZ 21:623.

XTS 74A:3154 has the personal name as Yun 允, with a style including the character gu 固, and says that he was Administrator of Hongnong.

Fu Chou 傅稠 [Gong? 公?]; Nanyang. Described as a private gentleman 處士, in 156 Fu Chou was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele of the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:17a.

Fu De 伏德; Langye. Eldest son of Fu Wan and the Princess Liu Hua, daughter of Emperor Huan, Fu De became a Consultant at Chang'an.

In 195 Fu De accompanied his father and his sister the Empress Fu Shou in the escape of the imperial court to the east. After the defeat at the hands of Li Jue and his associates in Hongnong, Fu De assisted Emperor Xian to climb down the cliffs of the Yellow River and escape by boat. [For a different account, see sub Sun Hui.] As the court came under Cao Cao's control in 196 Fu De was enfeoffed for his services.

Fu De was probably killed by Cao Cao in 214, when the empress's attempted plot against Cao Cao was discovered and the family was destroyed. -HHS 26/16:898, HHJ 28:334; deC 96:166-167.

Fu Dian 伏典 or Fu Xing 興 (d.214); Langye. Son of Fu Wan and the Princess Liu Hua, daughter of Emperor Huan, Fu Dian succeeded to his father's fief in 209. In 214 Fu Dian and many of his kinsmen were killed by Cao Cao when the failed plotting of his half-sister the Empress Fu Shou was discovered.

Fu Fu 傅福 (d.139?). A eunuch, in 139 Fu Fu was head of the Palace Workshop for Emperor Shun. He joined Zhang Kui and other colleagues in claiming that the father of the empress, Liang Shang, and the rival eunuchs Cao Teng and Meng Ben planned to depose the emperor. The emperor doubted the story, and when the conspirators had Cao Teng and Meng Ben arrested he became furious and had them killed. -HHS 6:268, 43/24:1176, 101/11:3245 [which last, however, says that some committed suicide and others escaped].

Fu Fu 輔服 [Xiangong 顯公]; Hanzhong. A junior official, Fu Fu was responsible for construction work to repair the Baoye Road through the Qin Ling ranges. His contribution was recorded in a stele inscription of 148. -LS 4:5a.

Fu Gan 傅幹 [Yanlin 彥林 or Yancai 彥材] (b.175); Beidi. In 187 Fu Gan was thirteen years old and was living with his father Fu Xie the Administrator of Hanyang. The rebels of Liang province came to attack Ji city, capital of the commandery, but they offered Fu Xie the chance to escape. Fu Gan urged him to accept, then withdraw to their homeland in the north and wait for a real leader to bring order to the empire. Fu Xie, addressing him by his childhood style Biecheng 別成, explained that he was honour bound to fight and die.

Fu Gan did escape, and in 202 he was a member of the staff of the north-western warlord Ma Teng. He persuaded Ma Teng that his best policy was to assist Cao Cao's agent Zhong Yao against the attack by Guo Yuan of the Yuan family, and Ma Teng sent a contingent under his son Ma Chao.

It seems likely that Fu Gan remained with Ma Tang, and he was probably involved in his decision to attend the Han court under Cao Cao in 208. When Liu Bei turned against Liu Zhang in Yi province in 212, some believed that such a consistently unsuccessful condottiere could never win, but Fu Gan argued that Liu Bei now had excellent followers and would be successful.

As a military adviser to Cao Cao in 214, he argued against a proposed attack against Sun Quan across the Huai on the grounds that the enterprise was unlikely to succeed and that it would be better policy to attract Sun Quan by diplomatic means. Cao Cao did not accept his advice, but the offensive gained no result and was very short-lived.

Fu Gan was later a senior clerk on Cao Cao's staff as Imperial Chancellor, and then became Administrator of Youfufeng under Wei. He left a number of literary and scholarly writings, and he was the father of the scholar Fu Xuan 傅玄 (217-278), author of Fuzi 傅子.

-HHS 58/48:1877-79, SGZ 1:43-44, 13:393-94, Shu 2: 882, JS 47:1317; deC 89:202.

Fu Gong 伏恭 [Shuqi 叔齊] (5 BC-AD 84); Langye. Nephew of Fu Zhan by his elder twin brother An, Fu Gong was adopted across to maintain the lineage. With a strong sense of filial piety, he showed great respect to his step-mother and maintained Fu An's scholarship, later editing and abbreviating his vast commentary on the Classic of Poetry.

Entering the imperial service through the ren privilege, Fu Gong was appointed as a magistrate in Beihai in 28. He remained there for thirteen years, and was recommended by the provincial government for the Exceptional Quality of his administration. He was later examined by the Minister of Ceremonies, graded Number One in classical scholarship, and became an Academician at the Imperial University.

Fu Gong was later Administrator of Changshan, but maintained his scholarly activity and taught many men in the north of the empire. In 59 he became Minister Coachman, and as Emperor Ming held ceremony at the Hall of the Circular Moat in 61 he named Fu Gong as Excellency of Works; this was seen as a major endorsement of Confucian scholarship.

When Fu Gong retired on grounds of ill health in 69 he was granted an annual stipend of a thousand shi for life, and when the emperor made a tour to Langye in 72 he received Fu Gong with the ceremony of an Excellency.

In 77 Fu Gong was honoured by Emperor Zhang as Thrice Venerable of the state, and when he died in 84 at the age of ninety it was ordered that he be buried in the tomb park of Emperor Ming. -HHS 79/69B:2571-72*.

Fu Gongming 傅公明; Runan. About 165 Fu Gongming was offered an [adoptive] daughter of the court eunuch Tang Heng in marriage. He rejected the alliance. -HHS 70/60:2281, SGZ 10:308.

Fu Guang 伏光; Langye. Son of Fu Xi, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 26/16:897.

Fu Han 傅韓 see Fu Gan 傅幹.

Fu Jian 傅堅; Ba. In the autumn of 167 some people of Ba commandery told the commandery office that there was a dragon in a local pond. The Attendant Officer Fu Jian advised that this was nothing but a hoax, made up because the water looked muddy. The Administrator reported the falsely favourable omen to the throne. [Emperor Huan died four months later.] -

HHS 107/17:3344; deC 89:86-87, MBeck 90:151.

Fu Jin 扶禁. As Liu Bei attacked Liu Zhang in 213, Liu Zhang's generals Fu Jin and Xiang Zun attacked his base at Jiameng in Guanghan. Though heavily outnumbered, the garrison commanded by Huo Jun held out for several months and eventually drove the enemy away with a sortie. -SGZ Shu 11:1007.

Fu Jun 傅俊 [Ziwei 子衛] (d.31); Yingchuan. Fu Jun was a village chief when the army of Han rebels against Wang Mang came to Yingchuan in 23. He welcomed the insurgents and was appointed a colonel under Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. The local magistrate, still loyal to Wang Mang, seized Fu Jun's mother, younger brother and other kinsmen, and killed them.

Fu Jun became a personal attendant of Liu Xiu, and took part in the battle of Kunyang which destroyed one of Wang Mang's armies. Named a lieutenant-general, he was sent with a detached force to occupy southern Henan, then returned to his home country to inter his slaughtered relatives. When Liu Xiu was sent north as commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor in 24, Fu Jun brought a dozen followers to join him; he was appointed commander of all the men from Yingchuan. He took part in the campaigns in the north, and when Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 he named Fu Jun a Palace Attendant and sent him to escort his Empress Yin to Luoyang. In the following year Fu Jun was enfeoffed as marquis of Kunyang: since this battle had been one of the great triumphs of the future emperor, it was a remarkable courtesy for him to allocate the title to his follower.

Appointed a general in 27, Fu Jun was sent with Cen Peng, first to secure the final defeat and surrender of the rebel Deng Feng, and then south to drive the warlord Qin Feng from Nanyang. After Qin Feng was surrounded and besieged in his base in Nan commandery, Fu Jun went on to the south of the Yangzi to take over the further commanderies of Yang province.

Fu Jun died in 31, and he was granted a posthumous title. When Emperor Ming had portraits of his father's great servants painted on the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang, Fu Jun was one of those who were honoured. -HHS 22/12:782*; Bn 76:26, Bn 79:86.

Fu Jun 伏均; Langye. Son of Fu Wan, he was a younger brother of the Empress Fu Shou of Emperor

Xian. He was probably killed by Cao Cao in 214, when the empress's attempted plot against Cao Cao was discovered. -HHS 26/16:898, HHJ 28:334.

Fu Kang 傅抗/亢. Director of Retainers under Emperor Guangwu, in 32 Fu Kang was sent to prison and died there. -HHS 1B:53.

Fu Kuan 傅寬. As Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, was engaged against Wang Lang in 24, he appointed Fu Kuan, Yao Qi and Lü Yan as officers under Deng Yu. Deng Yu considered Yao Qi to have the greater ability, so he promoted him to be lieutenant-general with command of two thousand men, and placed Fu Kuan and Lü Yan under him with a few hundred soldiers each. Fu Kuan was later a protégé of Guangwu's brother-in-law Yin Shu, and he rose to high rank at court. -HHS 20/10:731, 32/22:1130.

Fu Kuang 輔匡 [Yuanbi 元弼]; Nan. Having joined Liu Bei when he was in Jing province, Fu Kuang went with him to the west in 211 and became Administrator of Ba commandery.

Fu Kuang was with Liu Bei's army in the attack down the Yangzi against Wu in 221, but escaped the debacle which followed. He took part in Zhuge Liang's conquest of the south in the mid-220s, was promoted and enfeoffed. -SGZ Shu 15:1084, SGZ Wu 10:1300, HYGZ 7:95.

Fu Kui 府攄. He was a clerk in the offices of the Excellency over the Masses. -FDTY 126.

Fu Lang 伏朗; Langye. Son of Fu Wan, Fu Lang was a younger brother of the Empress Fu Shou of Emperor Xian. He was probably killed by Cao Cao in 214, when the empress's attempted plot against Cao Cao was discovered. -HHS 26/16:898, HHJ 28:334.

Fu Liqing 傅栗卿/立卿; Longxi. A local bandit, he was attacked and defeated by Guangwu's general Lai Xi in 34. -HHS 15/5:588.

Fu Long 伏隆 [Bowen 伯文] (d.27); Langye. Elder son of Fu Zhan, Fu Long established a reputation for upright conduct while still young, and served as an Investigator in the commandery.

In 26 Fu Long went to join Guangwu in Henan. The emperor was impressed with him; at the end of that year he named him a Palace Counsellor and sent him east with the Staff of Authority as his agent in Qing and Xu provinces. In a proclamation, Fu Long listed Guangwu's success against Wang Mang, his victories in Henan and the recent defeat of Liu Yong in Liang. Most of the Huosuo group of bandits surrendered to him, and an envoy from the local warlord Zhang Bu accompanied him back to Luoyang with tokens of submission.

In 27 Fu Long was promoted to Household Counsellor and sent back to the east. He was accompanied by new governors for Qing and Xu together with administrators and commandants for the various commanderies, and he had authority to appoint all lesser magistrates. The new regime was an initial success, and most of the territory turned to Guangwu. Zhang Bu was appointed only as Administrator of Donglai, and just at this time Liu Yong re-established himself in Liang and offered him the title of King of Qi. Bound by Han tradition against royal enfeoffments from outside the house of Liu, Fu Long could only promise a great marquisate, and Zhang Bu changed sides. He invited Fu Long to join him against Guangwu, but Fu Long remained loyal.

Aware of the fate which awaited him, Fu Long sent in a final report before he was taken and killed. The emperor mourned him, and his son Fu Yuan was made a gentleman cadet. When Zhang Bu surrendered again in 29 Fu Long's body was entombed with gifts from the state and an escort of officials. -HHS 26/16:898-900*; Bn 59:135-138.

DGHJ 13:1b has the personal name as Sheng/Cheng 盛 and the style as Boming 伯明; the personal name was no doubt changed in the texts to avoid taboo on the name of Liu Long, the Young Emperor (*reg.*106).

Fu Qian 服虔 [Zishen 子慎]; Henan. Fu Qian's original personal name was Zhong 重, and he was also known as Zhi 祗, but he later changed it to Qian. A young man of scholarly ambition, Fu Qian attended the University at Luoyang and acquired a fine literary style. His Chunqiu Zuoshizhuanjie[yi] 春秋左氏傳解 [詁] "Explanation of Zuo zhuan" was in circulation for several hundred years, and he also compiled Chunqiu Han yi bo 春秋漢議駁 to supplement the Chunqiu Han yi 春秋漢議 of He Xiu: where He Xiu had analysed six hundred items of the history of Han according to the "praise and blame" style of Gongyang, Fu Qian applied the technique of Zuo zhuan.

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, Fu Qian held a number of official positions. About 189 he was Administrator of Jiujiang, but then left that office and became a refugee among the troubles of the civil war. In 192 he joined a petition organised by Tao Qian, Inspector of Xu province, urging Zhu Jun to lead an army west to rescue the emperor at Chang'an. Nothing came of the proposal.

Fu Qian died of illness about 195. Besides scholarly works, he left a dozen pian of literary compositions, including rhapsodies, essays and inscriptions. -HHS 79/69B:2583*; Mather 76:520.

Fu Qun 傅羣. About 210 Fu Qun was Cao Cao's Inspector of Jing province. -SGZ Shu 10:1004.

Fu River, Old Man of the 涪翁老父 see Old Man of the Fu River.

Fu Rong 符融 [Weiming 偉明]; Chenliu. As a young man Fu Rong held a censorial office in the provincial government, but he was ashamed of such mean work and resigned. About 160 he went to the Imperial University at Luoyang and studied under Li Ying, who admired his ability in conversation and made him a trusted client. Fu Rong recommended Guo Tai to Li Ying, and he later urged Li Ying to investigate the pretensions of Jin Wenjing and Huang Zi'ai.

As Fu Rong became increasingly well known, he was recommended Filial and Incorrupt and was offered positions both in his province and in the offices at the capital. He refused all of these, but when the newly-appointed Administrator Feng Dai invited him to call and give advice he recommended Fan Dan, Han Zhuo and Kong Zhou; he excused himself on grounds of illness.

Fu Rong was later barred from office during the Great Proscription, presumably because of his association with Li Ying. Now very poor, when his wife died he had no means to pay for her funeral. Refusing all offers of help, he insisted that he would follow ancient practice and provide her with a simple tomb of earth in the wilderness. The gentleman Zhang Yuanzu persuaded him to accept the loan of his ox-cart for the cortège. -HHS 68/58:2232-33*, XC 7:16a-b.

Fu Rui 傅睿; Beidi. Father of Fu Chong and Fu Xuan 選, he was Administrator of Dai. -SGZ 21:623.

Fu Shipu 傅石甫. Otherwise unknown, he was the husband of the literate Lady Kong. -Sui shu 35:1058.

Fu Shou 伏壽; Langye. Son of Fu Gong, Fu Shou became Administrator of Dong commandery. -HHS 79/69B:2572.

Sui shu 34:1032 lists a study of the Jing Fang version of the Book of Changes compiled by Fu Wanshou 萬壽; Yao Zhenzong:2403 suggests that this is the same man.

Fu Shou 伏壽, the Lady (d.214); Langye: Empress of Emperor Xian. Daughter of Fu Wan and his concubine the Lady Ying, and thus step-daughter of the Princess Liu Hua, daughter of Emperor Huan, Fu Shou entered the harem of Emperor Xian in 190 as an Honoured Lady and was made empress in 195. She accompanied the emperor in his travels from Chang'an to Xu city under Cao Cao's control in 196.

After Cao Cao killed the Honoured Lady Dong in 200, the empress was concerned for her own life, and she urged her father to act against Cao Cao. Fu Wan did nothing, but after his death in 214 the empress's proposal was found out. Cao Cao sent officers to break into the palace and put her in prison where she died. Two children she had borne to the emperor were killed, together with over a hundred of her kinsmen, while her mother and others were sent into exile. -HHS 10B:452-54*.

XHS 1:19a claims that Emperor Xian himself found her guilty of Impiety and ordered her death. This seems unlikely, for HHS 10B describes his distress at her fate and how he remarked, as she called to him for help, "I do not even know when my time will come," and appealed to her escort Chi Lü.

Fu Tie 傅鐵; Yingchuan. Son of Fu Chang, he inherited his secondary marquise: see sub Fu Chang. In 113 the regent Dowager Deng raised it to a village fief. -HHS 22/12:782.

Fu Tong 傅彤 (d.222); Nanyang. A divisional commander under Liu Bei, as the army retreated from the disastrous invasion of Jing province in 222, Fu Tong was cut off. Refusing offers of surrender, he died in battle. -SGZ Shu 15:1088-89.

Fu Wan 伏完 (d.209); Langye. Son of Fu Zhi, he succeeded to his fief, gained reputation at court and married the Princess Liu Hua, daughter of Emperor Huan. He was made a Palace Attendant.

In 195 the Lady Fu Shou, daughter of Fu Wan by his concubine the Lady Ying, became empress. Fu Wan was appointed Bearer of the Mace, and as the court came to Xu city under Cao Cao in 196 he was named General Who Supports the State 輔國將軍, ranking with the Excellencies. Anxious to avoid a high profile under Cao Cao's regime, he took a lesser position as a colonel and kept out of politics. In the early 200s his daughter the empress urged him to a plot against Cao Cao, but he took no action. The proposal was discovered after his death, however, and the family was destroyed: see sub Fu Shou. -HHS 10B:452-53, 26/16:898.

Fu Weng 涪翁 see Old Man of the Fu River.

Fu Wuji 伏無忌; Langye. Son of Fu Chen 晨, Fu Wuji succeeded to his father's fief and maintained the family tradition of wide learning and scholarship. In the time of Emperor Shun he became a Palace Attendant and colonel in the Northern Army, and in 136 he was commissioned with Huang Jing to edit the imperial collections of Confucian classics and philosophical writings, together with works on art, mathematics, archery and chariot-driving, medicine and divination. No further detail is given of the project, and one must imagine that it entailed cataloguing rather than detailed copy-editing.

At the beginning of the reign of Emperor Huan, about 151, another edict ordered Fu Wuji, Huang Jing, Cui Shi and others to work in the Eastern Pavilion on a third instalment of Han ji, official history of the Later Han dynasty, known later as Dongguan Hanji. The compilation included annals, tables of kings, marquises and officials, accounts of the Xiongnu and the Qiang, while Fu Wuji and Huang Jing also compiled a Treatise of Geography 地理志, which was edited by Sima Biao to compose the Treatise of Administrative Geography 郡國志 for his Xu Han shu.

Fu Wuji's Fuhou gujin zhu 伏侯古今注 "Notes of the Marquis Fu on Things Ancient and Modern" was a historical encyclopaedia, beginning in earliest times, but relying on the archives of the Han and continued up to 146. Entries discussed astrological and earthly portents, population, official salaries, imperial taboo names and tombs. The work survives only in quotations, many of which are cited in the commentary of Liu Zhao to the treatises of portents compiled by Sima Biao for his Xu Han shu, now combined into HHS. -HHS 26/16:898; Bn 54:11, MBeck 90:19-27, 129-130, 187-189.

Fu Xi 伏翕; Langye. Youngest son of Fu Zhan, he succeeded to his fief in 37. -HHS 26/16:897.

Fu Xian 伏咸; Langye. Second son of Fu Zhan, in 29 an imperial edict granted him assistance in carrying out the funeral of his elder brother Long. -HHS 26/16: 900.

Fu Xian 傅賢 [Zhongshu 仲舒]. As Minister of Justice for four years, Fu Xian brought experience and impartiality to his office, and maintained the prisons in excellent order. Sensitive to his responsibilities, he wept each winter as he approved the seasonal executions.

Fu Xian later became Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate, and was again widely respected. -XC 7:2a-b.

Fu Xie 傅燮 [Youqi 幼起 then Nanrong 南容] (d.187); Beidi. Eight feet tall [185 cm], with an imposing demeanour and Confucian virtue, Fu Xie was a student of the Grand Commandant Liu Kuang. He was recommended as Filial and Incorrupt, but when the Administrator who had nominated him died he resigned his office and held mourning for him.

In 184 Fu Xie was sent as a major responsible for discipline to serve under Huangfu Song against the Yellow Turbans of Yingchuan. He had long disapproved of the eunuchs at court, and as he was about to leave he sent in a memorial urging Emperor Ling to purge the court of his favourites. When the troop he commanded in the field killed three rebel leaders, Fu Xie was recommended for enfeoffment, but the eunuchs slandered him, and although he was not punished he was likewise not rewarded.

Fu Xie then served as Commandant of Anding, but resigned on grounds of illness, and later became a Consultant at the capital. About 186, following the initial rebellion in Liang province, the Excellency Cui Lie suggested the northwest be abandoned. Fu Xie spoke heatedly against the proposal in open court, claiming that the region was of essential strategic value against the barbarians, and that withdrawal would just bring the danger closer: "If Cui Lie cannot see the consequences of his policy, he is a fool. If he understands what he is proposing, he is a traitor." The emperor accepted his arguments, Fu Xie was now recognised as an expert in strategy, and was consulted regularly by the highest officials.

Soon afterwards the eunuch Zhao Zhong was commissioned to re-examine the rewards and enfeoffments due to those who had served against the Yellow Turbans. Fu Xie's merits were raised once more, but when he was invited to offer a sweetener to ensure his favour he indignantly refused. Zhao Zhong was furious, and though he dared not attack him directly, he had Fu Xie transferred to be Administrator of Hanyang.

In his new position Fu Xie encouraged the non-Chinese to surrender with promises of good treatment; he also set up a large number of military colonies to defend the territory. When the new Inspector Geng Bi proposed an attack against the rebels, Fu Xie urged him to establish a good civil regime before embarking on military ventures. Geng Bi rejected his advice, and in 187 he was killed in a mutiny by his own troops.

The rebels then came east and laid siege to Fu Xie in his capital at Ji, by present-day Gangu in Gansu. Fu Xie had few troops and limited supplies, but when the enemy leader Wang Guo asked him to join them, he rejected the offer in fury. Then some non-Chinese from Beidi, whom he had treated well in the past, gave him a chance to escape; his young son Fu Gan urged him to accept the offer, withdraw to their homeland in the north, and wait for a real leader to bring order to the empire. Fu Xie explained that he was honour bound, and his courageous speech, with references to classical heroes, is recorded in his biography and in Zizhi tongjian. He led a sortie and died fighting. -HHS 58/48:1873-78*, XC 3:9a-b; deC 89:182-183, 194, 201-202.

Fu Xing 伏興 see Fu Dian 伏典.

Fu Xuan 伏瑗; Langye. Son of Fu Long, about 29 Fu Xuan was appointed a gentleman cadet in honour of his father's loyal death. -HHS 26/16:900.

Fu Xuan 傅選 [Gongti 公悌]; Beidi. Son of Fu Rui and noted for his judgement of men, Fu Xuan joined the offices of the Excellencies and was then a member of the Imperial Secretariat of Han. He later took refuge in Jing province and became a senior member of staff to the warlord Governor Liu Biao. In 208 he was one of those who persuaded Liu Zong to surrender to Cao Cao, and he was rewarded with a secondary marquise.

In 213 Fu Xuan was among the petitioners who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei; he later joined the Secretariat of the new state.

As a Cavalier Regular Attendant in 220 Fu Xuan joined the debate which encouraged Cao Pi to take the imperial throne, and soon afterwards, with title as a general, he was one of the sponsors of a commemorative stele. He became a Palace Attendant and died about 230. -SGZ 6:213-14, LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:107, 197 [as Fu Xun].

This Fu Xuan must be distinguished from his distant kinsman Fu Xuan 傅玄 (217-276), son of Fu Gan, who became a senior official under the Sima family, founders of the Jin dynasty, and was the author of Fuzi 傅子: JS 47; Fang 519-520; Paper 87.

Fu Ya 伏雅; Langye. Son of Fu Wan, he was an elder brother of the Empress Fu Shou of Emperor Xian. He probably died at Cao Cao's hand in 214, when the empress's attempted plot against Cao Cao was discovered. -HHS 26/16:898, HJJ 28:334.

Fu Yan 伏黯 see Fu An 伏黯.

Fu Yang 服養. In the early third century the court dancer Fu Yang and his colleague Feng Su preserved the traditions of Han under Cao Cao. -SGZ 29:806.

Fu Yi 傅毅; Beidi. Son of Fu Yu, after his father's death in battle in 87, Fu Yi was enfeoffed as a marquis by Emperor Zhang. -HHS 87/77:2882.

Fu Yi 傅毅 [Wuzhong 武仲]; Youfufeng. Widely learned as a young man, during the time of Emperor Ming Fu Yi made intensive study of the classics. He composed a series of poems on his work, while his Qi feng 七諷 "Seven Incitements" criticised scholars who stayed aloof in retirement even when the emperor was seeking worthy men. According to Wang Chong, when a flock of strange birds appeared at the imperial palace, the emperor ordered his officials to present hymns to the magical creatures, but the composition of Fu Yi was one of the few considered to be of high quality [Lun heng 37; Forke 11:274. In another reference Forke 07:469 has the surname mistakenly as Zhuang 傳].

In the late 70s the new Emperor Zhang issued a general call for Literary Scholars. Fu Yi was appointed to the library of the Orchid Terrace, named a gentleman cadet and worked on collation. Feeling that the achievements of the late Emperor Ming had been insufficiently appreciated, he presented a set of hymns for his temple ritual, and his abilities were now recognised by the court. The general Ma Fang, member of the consort clan, invited Fu Yi to join his staff and treated him as a personal friend. As the Ma family fell from favour in the early 80s, their clients also suffered and Fu Yi lost his post.

In 89 the imperial kinsman Dou Xian, who had succeeded to Ma Fang's position as General of Chariots and Cavalry, also appointed Fu Yi, together with the scholar Cui Yan. It is not known whether Fu Yi accompanied the campaign against the Northern Xiongnu, but he did compose a hymn to celebrate the victory and when Dou Xian became General-in-Chief in 90, Fu Yi continued on his staff and was joined by Ban Gu. The literary and scholarly skills in that office were the best of that time.

Still comparatively young, Fu Yi died about 91, leaving almost thirty pian of rhapsodies, poems, essays, eulogies and other compositions. -HHS 80/70A:2610-13*.

Fu Yi 服宜 see Fu Zhi 服直.

Fu Ying 傅嬰. In 204 Fu Ying was an officer under Sun Yi the Administrator of Danyang, when Sun Yi was murdered and Gui Lan and Dai Yuan seized power in the commandery. Sun Yi's widow the Lady Xu IV recruited Fu Ying and other loyalists to trap and kill Gui Lan and Dai Yuan. Sun Quan rewarded Fu Ying with appointment to his own headquarters. -SGZ Wu 6:1214-15; deC 90:232-234.

Fu Yu 傅育; Beidi. As a county magistrate in Jincheng in 58, Fu Yu gained a fine reputation in Ma Wu's campaign against the Qiang chieftain Dianyu. He later became Administrator of Wuwei, where he was respected by the Xiongnu, and in 77 he was appointed to replace Wu Tang as Protector of the Qiang. He joined the general Ma Fang in the campaign against the frontier raider Miyu.

In 86 Miyu and his brother Haoyu again attacked the frontier. They were persuaded to restore peace, but in the following year, though he formally kept the truce in good faith, Fu Yu stirred up trouble indirectly. He then gained approval for a joint campaign, with contingents from five commanderies, to deal with Miyu and his followers. Without waiting for the other troops, however, Fu Yu led his men too far and was ambushed by Miyu. Killing a dozen of his opponents, Fu Yu died a hero's death.

Fu Yu was admired for the fact that he used his official salary to support his friends, while his wife and children were obliged to do the work of the household. He was posthumously honoured by Emperor Zhang, who enfeoffed his son Fu Yi as a marquis. -HHS 87/77: 2881-82.

Fu Yuan 伏援/媛; Langye. Son of Fu Long, when his father was killed in 29 Emperor Guangwu had Fu Yuan appointed as a gentleman cadet. -HHS 26/16:900.

Fu Zhan 伏湛 [Huigong 惠公] (d.37); Langye. Fu Zhan's family claimed descent from Fu Sheng 伏勝/生, scholar of the Qin and early Han, and source of the New Text of the Classic of History. Fu Zhan's ancestors maintained the tradition; his father Li 理 was a noted scholar who taught the Classic of Poetry to Emperor Cheng and maintained a distinctive school in the tradition of Qi [Tjan 49, Table IV]. He became Tutor to the king of Gaomi.

An agreeable and filial man, Fu Zhan took over his father's teaching while he was still young, and had several hundred students. Through his father's ren privilege, he was appointed to the Imperial University and then embarked on an official career. In the time of Wang Mang he was a special commissioner of the Censorate and later held office in Henei.

When Wang Mang was destroyed, Fu Zhan transferred his allegiance to the Gengshi Emperor and was named Administrator of Pingyuan. Despite the troubles, he maintained a regime of peace and scholarship, distributing food and using his own money to relieve the people. More than a hundred families came as dependents, but when one of his officers sought to conscript them for military service Fu Zhan killed him and displayed his head as a sign of his good will. The territory of Pingyuan remained quiet.

As Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, took the imperial title he called Fu Zhan to join his Secretariat so that he might re-establish the administrative structure of Han. Fu Zhan became Guardian of Honesty, a censorial position under the Excellency over the Masses Deng Yu, but as Deng Yu was engaged on campaign in the west for the whole of his appointment Fu Zhan acted in his stead, and when the emperor was also in the field Fu Zhan held charge at Luoyang.

In 26 Fu Zhan was named Acting Excellency over the Masses, and early in 27 he formally succeeded Deng Yu and was enfeoffed as a marquis. Later that year he urged Guangwu not to go in person to attack Peng Chong: his military reputation was well-established and it was time to attend to the affairs of government rather than embark on a campaign in a poor region far away to the northeast. As Bielenstein observes, the respite gave Peng Chong time to cause serious trouble. On the other hand, the bandit Xu Shao [or Xu Yiqing], leader of the Fuping group in Pingyuan which had been allied to Peng Chong, surrendered personally to Fu Zhan because of his fine reputation in the region.

A stickler for scholarship and ritual, even in the turmoil of civil war, in 29 Fu Zhan persuaded the emperor to reinstate the local ceremonies of Winter Wine to honour the aged [Bodde 75:362]. At the end of the year, as Guangwu was on campaign against Zhang Bu and Fu Zhan was again in charge at Luoyang, a disruptive quarrel broke out during the winter sacrifice at the Temple of Emperor Gao between the Intendant of Henan, Ouyang Xi, and the Director of Retainers. Fu Zhan failed to report the incident, but it was found out and he was dismissed. His fief was shifted to his home country of Langye and he was sent to take up residence there.

Du Shi, Administrator of Nanyang, later sent in a memorial on Fu Zhan's good service and urged that he be appointed once more to the Imperial Secretariat. In the summer of 37 Fu Zhan was recalled, but he died of heat exhaustion on the journey. Emperor Guangwu mourned him, and sent envoys to escort his funeral. -HHS 26/16:893-97*; QHX:105 [as Fu Chen], Bn 59:126, Bn 79:62.

Fu Zhen 傅鎮 (d.43). Disciples of the former cult leader Wei Si, in 43 Fu Zhen and his colleague Dan Chen rose in rebellion and seized the county city of Yuanwu in the east of Henan. The imperial general Zang Gong was sent to deal with them, but though his force included troops from the Northern Army, strategic reserve of the empire, the rebels were well supplied and entrenched, and they drove back his assaults with heavy casualties.

On the advice of his son Liu Zhuang, future Emperor Ming, Emperor Guangwu sent instructions for Zang Gong to ease the pressure. Seeing a chance to escape, the rebels broke out from their lines and were defeated in detail. Fu Zhen and Dan Chen were both killed. -HHS 18/8:695.

Fu Zhen 傅楨. Fu Zhen's name appears in the colophon to the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu in the Stone Classics engraved in the early 180s. He is described there as a Gentleman of the Palace, which may be only a cadet appointment but may represent a more substantive rank. -LS 14:8b.

Fu Zhi 服直 or Fu Yi 宜; Ba. About 147 he gathered a group of followers and styled himself King of Heaven 天王. The Inspector of Yi province Chong Gao and the Administrator Ying Cheng attacked him but were defeated. Fu Zhi is not mentioned again. -HHS 56/46:1827.

Fu Zhi 伏質; Langye. Son of Fu Wuji, he succeeded to his fief. He was Minister of Finance under Emperor Huan or Emperor Ling. -HHS 26/16:898.

Fu Zhi 服祗 see Fu Qian 服虔.

Fu Zhong 傅眾 (d.125). Administrator of Hanyang in 125, Fu Zhong was appointed General on the Liao, but died later that same year. -HHS 89/79:2959.

Fu [Zifang] 傅子方; Chen. When the false apparition of Zhang Hanzhi q.v. appeared to his sister in a dream, it mentioned money which had been sent by Fu Zifang. -FSTY 9:71.

Fu Zong 富宗. In the mid-20s Fu Zong became Administrator of Chenliu. A man of extravagant tastes, he ignored the warnings of his Officer of Merit Yu Yan: he was eventually arrested and executed for disobeying the sumptuary laws. -HHS 33/23:1151.

Fu Zun 伏尊; Langye. Son of Fu Wan, he was a younger brother of the Empress Fu Shou of Emperor Xian. He was probably killed by Cao Cao in 214, when the empress's attempted plot against Cao Cao was discovered. -HHS 26/16:898, HHJ 28:334.

Fuhu 朴胡; non-Chinese [the pronunciation fu rather than pu follows the reading of Sun Sheng of the fourth century in SGZ 1:46 PC]. A chieftain of the Banshun people early in the third century, Fuhu was leader of seven clans. When Cao Cao attacked in the summer of 215, Zhang Lu went to take refuge with Fuhu and the Zong people led by his associate Duhu. In the autumn Fuhu and Duhu, with their colleague Yuan/Ren Yue, went to Luoyang to submit to Cao Cao. They received titles as marquises and were sent back as administrators: Fuhu was named to the eastern territory of Badong. In the winter Zhang Lu also went to surrender.

Soon afterwards the non-Chinese were defeated by Huang Quan, officer in the service of Liu Bei, and the various groups fled north to Cao Cao's territory in the Wei valley. -SGZ 1:46, 8:264, Shu 13:1043, HYGZ 6: 83; deC 96:495-498.

Fujiu 腹久 of Yanqi [Karashar]. Chief minister to King Guang in 94, as the king surrendered to the Protector-General Ban Chao, Fujiu and many others fled into the lake country for fear of execution. -HHS 47/37:1582.

Fuluohan 扶羅韓 (d.218); Xianbi. A grandson of Tanshihuai, Fuluohan was the younger brother of Kuitou and the elder brother of Budugen. When Kuitou died about 205, Fuluohan was passed over for the succession, and he set up a state of his own.

Following Cao Cao's defeat of the Wuhuan at White Wolf Mountain in 207, and through the agency of the Protector of the Qiang Yan Rou, Fuluohan and other Xianbi leaders paid tribute and received royal titles.

In 218, the Wuhuan chieftain Nengchendi was planning an alliance against China and Fuluohan accepted his invitation to join. When Fuluohan arrived for the meeting, Nengchendi considered his people ill-disciplined and unreliable, so he also called in Fuluohan's rival Kebineng, and Kebineng killed Fuluohan at the oath ceremony. -SGZ 30:835-36; Fang 52:179-180.

Fushen 夫沈; Xiongnu. A king of the Southern Xiongnu, in 133 Fushen was sent by the Emissary Wang Chou on a punitive expedition against the Xianbi. The attack was successful, and the court rewarded Fushen and his associates with a seals and ribbons and various gifts. -HHS 90/80:2988-89.

Gai 蓋 [surname] see He 蓋 passim. Pronunciation of this surname varies, but I have standardised it to He rather than to Gai. On the other hand, HHS 7:316 TC gives the pronunciation of the surname of the pirate chieftain and religious pretender 蓋登 as Gai.

Gan 干 [surname] see Yu 于 passim.

Gan 甘, the Lady; Pei. A woman of humble family from a poor village, the Lady Gan was extremely beautiful. Aged eighteen in the early 190s, when Liu Bei was in Yu province, she came to his attention and he took her as his concubine. She played a leading role in his household during the several disruptions and losses of Liu Bei's campaigns, and though Liu Bei's family was captured by Cao Cao in 201, the Lady Gan was able to make her way to join him in Jing province.

In 207 the Lady Gan gave birth to Liu Bei's son Liu Shan, who became the Later Sovereign of Shu-Han. As Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208, the Lady accompanied Liu Bei to the south. She and her son were almost captured, but they were rescued by Zhao Yun.

The Lady died about 210 and was buried near Liu Bei's headquarters in Nan commandery. After Liu Bei's death she was granted posthumous title as an empress and was reburied with him at Chengdu. -SGZ Shu 4:905-06*; C/C 99:115-116.

Gan 甘 [personal name unknown]; Danyang. Former Administrator of Cangwu, he admired Tao Qian and, though his wife thought him immature and frivolous, gave him their daughter in marriage. -SGZ 8:248.

Gan Ding 甘定. Administrator of Cangwu in 162, when rebels from Changsha invaded his territory Gan Ding abandoned his post and fled. -HHS 7:309.

Gan Gong 甘公 see Gan 甘 [personal name unknown]: Gong was probably a title of respect, not a personal name.

Gan Gui 甘瑰 or Gan Xiang 瓌; Nanyang. Son of Gan Ning, he was exiled for some fault to Kuaiji and never held an official position. -SGZ Wu 10:1195.

Gan Ji 干吉 or Yu Ji 于吉 (d.200); Langye. Many texts and modern scholars have the surname of this man as Yu, which is certainly the more common character in such a context. Fukui 52/58:63, however, argues that the correct reading is Gan, and I have accepted that.

A teacher and adept, in 200 Gan Ji was operating in Yang province south of the Yangzi, the territory controlled by the young warlord Sun Ce. He was extremely popular among the people, and Sun Ce found that his prestige rivalled his own. There are varying stories about the causes of Sun Ce's final exasperation: one account says that Gan Ji went by when Sun Ce was addressing his troops, and many of his men turned to Gan Ji; another that he accompanied Sun Ce's army and produced rain for his barge transports, but again Sun Ce was angry at the veneration which his men showed. In any event, Sun Ce killed Gan Ji.

Gan Ji's followers claimed that he had not in fact been killed but had taken immortal form; we are told also that Sun Ce was wounded soon afterwards and then, whenever he looked in a mirror he saw the face of his victim: in his rage and despair, his wounds broke open and he died.

The teachings and practices of Gan Ji, including charms to cure illness, were similar to those of Zhang Jue, chief of the Yellow Turbans rebellion, and Zhang Ling the theocratic warlord of the west. An extended tradition links him to the origins of the celebrated Taiping jing 太平經.

According to the second memorial of Xiang Kai, presented to Emperor Huan in 166, a sacred book had been presented to the throne of Emperor Shun by a certain Gong Chong, a disciple of Gan Ji. It is possible that Xiang Kai was involved in the presentation, and he may have acted on Gong Chong's behalf. The biography of Xiang Kai says that the book was called Taiping qingling shu/dao 太平清/青領書/道, which may be understood as "The Way [or Book] of Great Peace, with Dark Green Headings," and that it comprised 170 juan 卷 chapters written on pale-green silk, with vermilion borders, dark green headings and vermilion titles – green and vermilion being colours of magical significance. It was said that the book had been found by Gan Ji and Gong Chong at the Quyang Spring in Xiapi, and that its text relied heavily upon yin-yang and the Five Powers 陰陽五行, with many references to shamanism 巫覡. The work had been rejected by the court, on the grounds that it was heretical and inappropriate; Xiang Kai's later recommendation proved no more fruitful. It is also claimed that the work was later used by Zhang Jue.

There are a number of other accounts, notably in the Shenxian zhuan of the fourth century, of how Gan Ji and Gong Chong obtained or created the Taiping jing, including claims that one or the other acquired it from an immortal, and that the transmission took place in the time of Emperor Yuan of Former Han. [A work entitled Baoyuan taiping jing 包元太平經 had been presented to Emperor Yuan's successor Emperor Cheng by a certain Gan Zhongke 甘忠可: see Loewe 74:278-280, and QHX:113.] Even if we discount the attempts of later Taoists to add antiquity to their tradition, it would appear Gan Ji was already old when he encountered Sun Ce.

Petersen argues that the association between Gan Ji and the Taiping jing is fictitious, and all attempts to involve him with the book are later interpolations and/or forgeries. -HHS 30/20B:1084, SGZ Wu 1:1195; Seidel 69/70, Kaltenmark 79, Kandel 79, MBeck 80, Gan Ning 甘寧 [Xingba 興霸]; Nanyang. As a young man Gan Ning led of a band of local fighting men, noted for their armament of bows and cross-bows, with bone ornaments on their heads and bells about the waist. In the manner of Robin Hood, Gan Ning would feast officials who received him well, but ravaged the territories of those less generous. He later ceased his depredations and read the works of philosophers.

Moving to the west, Gan Ning became an officer under Liu Yan the Governor of Yi province. After Liu Yan's death in 194 Gan Ning fought his son Liu Zhang in support of Hu Mao, the new Inspector appointed by the government at Chang'an, who was sponsored by Liu Biao from Jing province. The insurgents were defeated, and Gan Ning led his personal following of eight hundred men to refuge with Liu Biao.

Disappointed by Liu Biao's lack of initiative, Gan Ning joined his subordinate Huang Zu, who held the middle Yangzi against Sun Quan of Wu, but over three years he received no recognition or favour.

When Sun Quan's forces came to attack in 203, Gan Ning led the rear-guard. He shot and killed the enemy leader Ling Cao and broke up the attack. Huang Zu still refused to reward him, and even sought to transfer his followers to other chieftains. Eventually, in 207, with the aid of Huang Zu's officer Su Fei Gan Ning led his men across to the enemy. Zhou Yu and Lü Meng both recommended him, Sun Quan received him well, and Gan Ning told him of Liu Biao's weakness and the need to seize Jing province before Cao Cao did. When Huang Zu was destroyed in the following year, Gan Ning spoke to save the life of Su Fei, guaranteeing his loyalty with his own head.

Later that year Gan Ning took part in the defeat of Cao Cao at the Red Cliffs, then accompanied Zhou Yu to attack Jiangling on the Yangzi. At first the army could not cross, but Gan Ning led a detachment to seize Yiling city near the Yangzi Gorges, establishing a bridgehead to the north. Cao Ren sent men to attack, but though Gan Ning was outnumbered five to one he maintained defence until relief arrived and Cao Ren was forced away to the north.

In 214 Gan Ning led the scaling party which stormed Huan city in Lujiang, in 215 he commanded a defence post which halted Guan Yu's counter-attack in Jing province; he was then named an Administrator and given charge of two cities controlling the Yangzi at the border of Jing and Yang provinces.

Later that year Gan Ning joined the attack on Hefei, maintaining the rearguard which saved Sun Quan after that debacle. In 217 he took a raiding party to disrupt Cao Cao's attack on the Ruxu fortress. He died about 220.

A close friend and associate of Lü Meng, Gan Ning was brave, erratic and dangerous, generous to his men, fond of extravagant display and conduct, and capable of killing at a whim. He was probably somewhat mad. -SGZ Wu 10:1292-95*, SGZ Shu 1:868.

Gan Shi 甘世; Ganling. At the end of the second century, Gan Shi and his associates Zuo Ce and Dongguo Yannian were noted for their long life while still retaining a youthful appearance. All three nourished their vital essence by coupling with a number of different women without ejaculation. They also drank urine and hung themselves upside down in order to emulate vegetables, whose growth comes from below.

Cao Cao gave appointment to Gan Shi and other adepts, and he may have been interested in possibilities of longevity. In Bian dao lun 辯道論, however, his son Cao Zhi asserted that such patronage was intended only to keep these men and their wild teachings under control, and he and his family gave them no credence.

Cao Zhi recorded a conversation with Gan Shi, in which he described himself as an alchemist and magician who had been alive in the time of the First Emperor of Qin, over four hundred years earlier, and had recipes which enabled him to ride on clouds and dragons. When asked for a demonstration, however, he explained that he did not have the necessary medicines with him, and they were a long way outside the borders of China. -HHS 82/72B:2750*, SGZ 29:805-06; Ngo 76:141-142, DeWoskin 83:151-152.

Gan Shu 甘述; Nanyang. Son of Gan Ning, he became a member of the Secretariat of Wu. -JS 70:1862.

Gan Tu 甘菟 see Gan Ying 甘英.

Gan Xiang 甘瓌 see Gan Gui 甘瑰.

Gan Ying 甘英. A staff officer under the Protector-General of the Western Regions Ban Chao, in 97 Gan Ying was sent on embassy to Daqin 大秦, identified as the Roman empire. It appears that he reached only as far as the head of the Persian Gulf, but his report on the countries of the far west became the basis for Later Han knowledge of that region; in 101 King Manqu of Anxi [Parthia] sent an embassy to Han. -

HHS 88/78:2910, 2916, 2931.

Gao An 高安. In the late 80s Gao An was Administrator of Shu. As the imperial general Dou Xian prepared to attack the Xiongnu he asked Gao An to send him a copy of Bingyun tu 兵雲圖, a table for predicting the course of warfare from the appearance of clouds, which was in the possession of the commandery's literary officer Yang You. Yang You objected that Dou Xian lacked virtue and would come to a bad end, but it is probable that Gao An sent the document. -HYGZ 10A:134, HHSJJ 82/72A:2985 Hui Dong quoting Yibu qijiu zhuan.

Gao Bao 高褒; Chenliu. Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital, Gao Bao was honoured with a stele. -LS 27:1a.

Gao Bao 高褒 [Xuanren 宣仁]; Bohai. XTS 71B:2387 says that Gao Bao, a great-grandson of Gao Hong 洪, became Senior Tutor of the Heir. Even if this is correct, it is doubtful whether he served Later Han, for in the second century only Liu Bao, the future Emperor Shun, briefly held formal position as Heir, and Gao Hong would have been a man of the first century: the dates do not fit.

Gao Biao 高彪 [Yifang 義方] (d.184); Wu. Descended from a poor and undistinguished family, Gao Biao was the first to become a scholar and attend the Imperial University. Though affected by a stammer, he had fine ability. On one occasion he called upon the celebrated Ma Rong, who was not feeling well at the time and was unwilling to see him. Gao Biao left a note of criticism, expressed in most elegant terms, and Ma Rong felt quite ashamed. He sent after him with apologies, but Gao Biao would not turn back. [For a similar story, see sub Zhao Yi.]

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt by his commandery, Gao Biao took first place in the examinations on the Confucian classics and was appointed to the Eastern Pavilion, where he composed rhapsodies, hymns and other works for suitable occasions, very much to the taste of Emperor Ling. One of his pieces, an exhortation 箴 composed for a farewell ceremony in honour of the official Diwu Yong, was greatly admired by Cai Yong and other leading men of letters.

Later, as Gao Biao left the capital to become a county magistrate in Chenliu, Emperor Ling came with attendants to farewell him in person, and ordered that his portrait should be placed in the Eastern Pavilion as an inspiration to others.

Gao Biao governed his county most virtuously, and he recommended Shentu Pan and other worthy men. He died in office in 184, and in 185 the Administrator of Wu commandery, surnamed Fan, arranged for leaders of the community to set up a stele in his honour.

Most of Gao Biao's literary and scholarly works were lost soon after his death. -HHS 80/70B:2649-52*, XC 11b, LS 10:24a-27a; Bn 81:574.

Gao [Botong] 高伯通; Wu. Gao Botong was the head of a powerful local family. When Liang Hong first came to Wu about 80 took him as a servant, but when he saw how respectfully Liang Hong's wife the Lady Meng Guang behaved towards him, Gao Botong realised his quality and received him as a guest in his household. -HHS 83/73:2768.

Gao Chang 高昌; Chenliu. Second son of Gao Shen, he became an Inspector and an Administrator. -SGZ 24:683.

Gao Cheng 高承; Kuaiji. Local officers under Sun Ce in 197, Gao Cheng and his colleague Liu You were sent with tribute gifts to the Han court controlled by Cao Cao. -SGZ Wu 1:1105.

Gao Ci 高賜; Chenliu. Third son of Gao Shen, he criticised the ministers Liu Jia and Zhao Shi for failing to attend a court assembly.

Administrator of Nanyang about 140, he was reported by the Inspector Li Gu for corruption, but bribed the General-in-Chief Liang Ji and had Li Gu transferred.

Gao Ci later became Director of Retainers. -HHS 115/25:2352-53, 63/53:2080, HYGZ 10C:165, SGZ 24:683.

Gao Dai 高岱 [Kongwen 孔文]; Wu. Son of Gao Biao, Gao Dai was celebrated as an expert in Zuo zhuan. About 190 the Administrator Sheng Xian made him his Reporting Officer and recommended him as Filial and Incorrupt. When Xu Gong came to take over the territory about 193, Gao Dai took Sheng Xian to the encampment of the local leader Xu Zhao for refuge from the troubled times, and he went to seek help from Tao Qian in Xu province. His tears and pleas induced Tao Qian to offer some nominal support, and Gao Dai returned with a letter for Xu Gong, who had in the mean time arrested Gao Dai's mother. Gao Dai managed to persuade him to let her go, then fled to Kuaiji to lead the life of a hermit scholar.

The young warlord Sun Ce, who controlled the lower Yangzi in the late 190s, was interested in Zuo zhuan and wanted to discuss it with Gao Dai. Some unkind person told Gao Dai that Sun Ce hated to be contradicted, so he should accept everything he said; he also told Sun Ce that Gao Dai did not regard him as worthy of debate, and would simply agree with him. When Gao Dai followed the advice he had been given, Sun Ce was furious at the apparent contempt. Despite many public protests – and even perhaps because of them, for he resented such rival popularity – Sun Ce killed Gao Dai. -HHS 80/70B:2652, SGZ Wu 1:1109; deC 90:207.

Gao Dan 高丹. Gao Dan and Man Yin are described as clients of Dou Xian about 90. Both were Administrators of Nanyang. -HHS 45/35:1520.

Gao Fan 高梵. A eunuch, in 124 Gao Fan was a member of the staff of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. As Liu Bao was dismissed by his father Emperor An, Gao Fan was exiled on a false charge to the northern frontier. In the following year a coup by the eunuch Sun Cheng and his associates restored Liu Bao to the succession; Gao Fan returned and was appointed a Regular Attendant.

In 126, when the Director of Retainers Yu Xu accused the eunuch Zhang Fang of conspiracy and extortion, Gao Fan was persuaded by Yu Xu's son Yi to support the accusations. His intervention was critical: Zhang Fang was exiled and others of his associates were killed, convicted or dismissed. The Treatise of Astronomy says that Gao Fan, Zhang Fang and several associates were punished, but HHS 58/48 is clear on the role Gao Fan played in the affair, and the Treatise is surely mistaken. [It is possible, but unlikely, that Zhang Fang was soon reinstated, then involved in a second conspiracy, this time associated with Gao Fan.]

In 144, despite a flurry of confusion with the official Chong Gao, Gao Fan was authorised to take charge of the infant Heir Liu Bing, future Emperor Chong. -HHS 15/5:591-93, 58/48:1871, 78/68:2518, 101/11:3243.

Gao Fan 高蕃. Administrator of Wei commandery for Yuan Shang in 203, Gao Fan was sent to occupy a position on the Yellow River in order to break the water transport of supplies for Cao Cao's army as he was attacking Yuan Tan. He was defeated by Li Dian and Cheng Yu. -SGZ 18:533.

Gao Feng 高鳳 [Wentong 文通]; Nanyang. Though a man of peasant family, Gao Feng was devoted to scholarship from the time he was young, and was known for his total concentration. When his wife went to the fields, she asked him to look after some wheat that was spread out to dry in the courtyard, but when rain came Gao Feng was too absorbed to notice.

Gao Feng had a wide reputation, he maintained a school in the hill country, and on one occasion he ended a feud among his neighbours, but he resolutely refused to take any office. Under pressure from the Administrator, he falsely claimed that members of his family had been shamans and that he was currently involved in a court case about land: both criteria should disqualify him from appointment. In the late 70s the Court Architect Ren Wei recommended him as a man of Direct Speech. He was obliged to attend at the capital, but then pleaded illness, returned to his home, gave all his property to a nephew, and hid in the wilderness.

Fan Ye adds a note to the biography of Gao Feng, remarking that his own father Fan Tai 范泰 had generally disapproved of extreme eremitism, but that he admired Gao Feng's devotion to principle and his acceptance of the poverty which his stance entailed. -HHS 83/73:2768-69*, XC 6:7b; Vervoorn 90:149, 286.

Gao Gan 高幹 [Yuancai 元才] (d.206); Chenliu. Son of Gao Gong and a nephew of Yuan Shao, Gao Gan was a man of high ambition. In 191 he persuaded Han Fu to hand over Ji province to Yuan Shao, who later named him Governor of Bing province.

In 202, now in the service of Yuan Shang and supported by his officer Guo Yuan, Gao Gan joined the Southern Shanyu Huchuquan in an attack on Hedong. They were defeated, Guo Yuan was killed and Huchuquan surrendered to Cao Cao's officer Zhong Yao.

Following the defeat of Yuan Shang in 204, Gao Gan surrendered to Cao Cao and was reappointed, but as Inspector rather than Governor of Bing. Unsatisfied and uncertain at this treatment, while Cao Cao was in the north in 205 Gao Gan seized Shangdang, invaded Hedong, and attempted a raid on Ye city. He was driven away by Yu Jin and Li Dian, supported by Ma Teng, and in 206 Cao Cao came himself to the attack. Gao Gan attempted to escape, first to the Xiongnu and then south into Jing province, but he was caught and killed. -SGZ 1:28, 6:203-07, 16:494-95, XC 8:8a.

Gao Gong 高躬; Chenliu. Son of Gao Ci, Gao Gong was Administrator of Shu about 170. -SGZ 24:683.

Gao Hong 皋閔 [Fengqing 奉卿]; Wu. Member of a leading local family, at the end of Former Han Gao Hong was a pupil of Zhu Pu 朱普 at Chang'an, studying the New Text of the Classic of History in the Ouyang tradition. He became a close friend of Huan Rong.

In 44 Gao Hong was a local official in his native Yang province when a vacancy appeared for an Academician at the Imperial University in Luoyang. Emperor Guangwu intended to appoint Huan Rong, but Huan Rong recommended Gao Hong and another former colleague, Peng Hong, as the more accomplished scholars. Though Guangwu gave Huan Rong the post, he appointed Peng Cheng and Gao Hong as Consultants. -HHS 37/27:1250 commentary quoting XC 6:10b.

Gao Hong 高洪. XTS 71B:2387 says that Gao Hong became Administrator of Bohai under Later Han, and that he moved the family there from its earlier residence in the region of the Yangzi. This was no doubt very early in the first century AD

Gao Hong 高弘. In 73 a raiding party of Northern Xiongnu entered the frontier. They were driven back by Lian Fan the Administrator of Yunzhong, but the court also sent Gao Hong with a commission to raise troops from three northern commanderies and pursue the enemy. He achieved no success. -HHS 89/79:2949.

Gao Hong 高弘; Chenliu. Son of Gao Shi, he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, but no more is told of his career. -SGZ 24:682. Though the name is identical with that of the military commissioner mentioned above, it does not appear that this was the same man. Gao Shi, father of this Gao Hong, was active in 106, while the other Gao Hong was of full age a generation earlier.

Gao Hong 高弘 [Bowu 伯武]; Henei. Appointed Chancellor of Langye, Gao Hong first travelled there in the guise of a travelling student in order to assess the customs of the people. When he took up office he cleared out the official residence, refused to allow his family to live there, and made a point of sitting on plain planks in summer and on a sheep-skin in winter, taking simple food from wooden bowls. -XC 8:4a-b.

Gao Hu 高扈. A leader of the Wuxiao group of bandits, after their defeats in the west of the North China plain he led his remnant forces to the southeast to join Su Mao and other local warlords. In the autumn of 29 they were again defeated at Changlü in Donghai, and he and his men took refuge with Dong Xian and Liu Yu at Tan. As that city fell to Guangwu's forces, Gao Hu killed Liu Yu and surrendered. -HHS 12/2:497.

Gao Hui 皋徽/誨; Wu. Son of Gao Hong 閔, about the middle of the first century he became Chief Clerk to the Excellency over the Masses. -HHS 37/27:1250 commentary quoting XC 6:10b [personal name as Hui 徽], FSTY 5b.133 [personal name as 誨].

Gao Hui 高恢 [Bota 伯達]; Jingzhao. A friend of Liang Hong, Gao Hui studied the Laozi when he was young, then lived as a hermit in the hills south of the Wei and the Yellow River. As Liang Hong left for the east in 80, Gao Hui wrote a poem to bid him farewell. -HHS 83/73:2768.

Gao Huo 高獲 [Jinggong 敬公]; Runan. As a young man about 20 AD, Gao Huo studied the Classic of History at Chang'an under the future Excellency Ouyang Xi, and he became a friend of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. He had a distinguished physiognomy and was skilled in astrology and in the control of ghosts and spirits.

When Ouyang Xi was imprisoned in 40, Gao Huo was among many former students who pleaded unsuccessfully for his pardon. Guangwu received Gao Huo at that time, and urged him to mend his ways, but Gao Huo replied that his nature came from his parents, and he could not change. He went away, and though he was several times invited to office at the capital he always refused.

The Administrator Bao Yu also sent him an invitation and ordered his Registrar to welcome him; as the Registrar sent a junior officer to the gate instead, Gao Huo took offence and went away. When a drought affected the commandery, however, Bao Yu asked advice. Gao Huo told him to dismiss his three Investigators and then go out to a particular post-house in the north. The rain fell as Bao Yu arrived, and thereafter Bao Yu regularly paid respects at Gao Huo's gate.

Gao Huo later went away and died in Danyang south of the Yangzi. The people there set up a shrine in his honour. -HHS 82/72A:2711*, XC 6:4a; Ngo 76:85-86, DeWoskin 83:51-52. [XC 6 has the surname as Zhou 周, but this is probably an error.]

Gao Ji 高吉; Chenliu. Local commandery officers in the late 160s, Gao Ji and others mourned the death of their Administrator-elect Hu Shuo. -Cai 5:5.

Gao Jin 高進; Jingzhao. Gao Jin was an adoptive son of the eunuch Gao Wang, who was a favourite of Liu Bian the son of Emperor Ling. Encouraged by the influential eunuch Jian Shi, in 188 or 189 Liu Bian proposed Gao Jin for nomination as Filial and Incorrupt. He Xun the Intendant of Jingzhao, however, who controlled the procedure, rejected Gao Jin as unworthy. -HHS 58/48:1882.

Gao Jing 高靖; Chenliu. Son of Gao Hong, he became Commandant of Shu. He died about 195. -SGZ 24:682.

Gao Jun 高峻; Anding. A general of Wei Ao, in 31 he was defeated in his home territory by the imperial commander Wang Chang. In the following year Ma Yuan persuaded him to defect, thus opening the road to Dou Rong in the northwest. Guangwu's officer Lai Xi used his authority to enfeoff Gao Jun as a secondary marquis and give him office as a general; he then joined Wu Han to attack Wei Ao.

Soon afterwards the imperial forces were forced to withdraw and Wei Ao staged a recovery with assistance from Gongsun Shu. Gao Jun returned to Wei Ao, and though the tide changed against them once more he stayed with him during his final defence in Longxi.

When Wei Ao died early in 33, Gao Jun returned to Anding, where he defended himself with several thousand men. An army under Geng Yan came to lay siege to him, but he held out for a year, and refused to surrender even when Guangwu came himself. Before ordering Geng Yan to make a full attack, Guangwu sent his officer Kou Xun with a letter to obtain Gao Jun's submission.

As Kou Xun arrived Gao Jun sent his staff officer Huangfu Wen out to him, but he refused to bow before the imperial envoy. Furious, Kou Xun beheaded Huangfu Wen and sent his second-in-command back to tell Gao Jun that this was the fate of anyone who refused to submit: "If you intend to surrender, do it quickly; otherwise, look out!" Gao Jun was frightened and opened the gates. He was sent back to Luoyang and is not heard of again. -HHS 16/6:625-26, 1B:56, 24/14:832.

Gao Jun 高峻; Chenliu. LS 27:1a lists a stele to this man as [a clerical officer under the] Grand Commandant.

Gao [Kuanfang] 高貴方 see sub Gao Yi 高頤.

Gao [Kuan'guang] 高貴光 see sub Gao Yi 高頤.

Gao Lan 高覽. A commander under Yuan Shao, at the final stage of the Guandu campaign in 200 he was sent with Zhang He to attack Cao Cao's camp. When they heard that Cao Cao had destroyed Yuan Shao's main supply train, both officers surrendered. -HHS 74/64A:2401, SGZ 6:199.

Gao Lü 高呂. Administrator of Guanghan, Gao Lü encouraged learning. -XC 7:6b.

Gao Lun 高倫. As Administrator of Yingchuan about 160, Gao Lun followed the advice of his Officer of Merit Chen Shi on appointments and other policy. Gao Lun was later appointed to the Imperial Secretariat, and at his farewell function he emphasised the advice and good influence he had received from Chen Shi. -HHS 62/52:2065.

Gao Pei 高沛 (d.212). In 212 Gao Pei was a general of Liu Zhang in Ba commandery. As Liu Bei prepared to turn against Liu Zhang he arrested Gao Pei and his colleague Yang Huai, charged them with a lack of courtesy, and killed them. -SGZ Shu 7:955.

Gao Ping 高平 see Gao Wu 高午.

Gao Rou 高柔 [Wenhui 文惠] (174-263); Chenliu. Son of Gao Jing, in 194 he warned his neighbours that Yan province would become the scene of conflict between Cao Cao and Zhang Miao. They did not listen to him, but Gao Rou took his family to join his cousin Gao Gan in Ji province.

Soon afterwards Gao Jing died in Shu. Gao Rou went to bring back his father's body, but because of the troubles it was three years before he returned.

About 204, when Cao Cao took over in the north, he appointed Gao Rou a county magistrate in Ji'nan, where he reformed corrupt officials by his generous conduct. When Gao Gan rebelled in Bing province in 205 Gao Rou remained loyal. He was nonetheless imprisoned, and Cao Cao even considered killing him. Then, however, he appointed him as a clerk in his offices.

In 211, when Cao Cao sent Xiahou Yuan to the northwest, Gao Rou warned that this would cause the local warlords to join forces against him, and they did indeed do so.

In 214 Gao Rou became Senior Clerk in the Department of Justice for the new kingdom of Wei in 214, and he persuaded Cao Cao not to apply the death penalty to the families of deserters. After serving briefly as Administrator of Yingchuan, he returned as Senior Clerk in the Department of Law. He protested about the Examiners Lu Hong and Zhao Ta interfering with and corrupting the administration of justice; Cao Cao later killed them.

When Cao Pi came to the throne in 220 he appointed Gao Rou as Imperial Clerk Preparer of Documents, a senior member of the Imperial Censorate with responsibility for legal matters, and enfeoffed him as a marquis. In 223 Gao Rou became Minister of Justice, a post which he held for twenty-two years, often arguing for leniency and opposing extravagance.

In 245 Gao Rou became an Excellency, and during the coup by Sima Yi in 249 he acted as General-in-Chief to seize Cao Shuang's headquarters. In 254 he took part in the deposition of Cao Fang, and in 256 became Grand Commandant, steadily in the service of the Sima family. He died in 263. -SGZ 24:682-90*.

Gao Shen 高慎 [Xiaofu 孝甫]; Chenliu. Son of the Former Han loyalist Gao Gu 固, who was executed for refusing office under Wang Mang, Gao Shen became known for his generous care of the orphaned children of his elder brother. He Ying, Chancellor of Langye, gave him his daughter in marriage.

Gao Shen was a county magistrate and then Administrator of Donglai. After long service he retired to a simple home. When his wife asked why he had accumulated no property for his descendants, he replied that a reputation for honesty was the best heritage. -SGZ 24:682-83.

Gao Shen 高慎; Chen. An officer in Chen about 100, he protested when the king, Liu Jun, held archery ceremonies like those of the emperor. -HHS 50/40:1668, XC 2:14b.

Gao Sheng 高勝 (d.218); Guanghan. In 218 Gao Sheng and Ma Qin led a great bandit force into Jianwei. The Administrator Li Yan brought commandery militia against them, and both leaders were killed. -SGZ Shu 10:998-99.

Gao Shi 高式; Chenliu. Eldest son of Gao Shen, he was a man of the utmost filial piety, and when a plague of locusts came to the county about 110, Gao Shi's fields were spared. The local magistrate reported this and the Administrator recommended him for office. Gao Shi at first refused, but later became a gentleman cadet. -SGZ 24:683.

Gao Shi 高碩. A partisan of Guo Si, in 195 Gao Shi tried to prevent Emperor Xian escaping east from Chang'an. -HHJ 28:339.

Gao Shu 高舒. In 123 Gao Shu was an officer under the Grand Commandant Yang Zhen. Arresting a clerk of the Court Architect and putting him to the question, he obtained forged documents which had been prepared by the eunuchs Fan Fang and others to justify the requisition of public materials for their private mansions. He reported this to Yang Zhen, who prepared charges against the offenders, but early in 124, before the matter could be submitted to the throne, Yang Zhen was slandered, dismissed and driven to suicide. Gao Shu was also involved in Yang Zhen's disgrace, and barely escaped the death sentence, but after the accession of Emperor Shun in 125 Yang Zhen was posthumously honoured and Gao Shu shared in his rehabilitation.

Appointed to the Imperial Censorate, Gao Shu was later Inspector of Jing province. -HHS 54/44:1766-68.

Gao Shun 高順 taboo writing for Gao Shen 高慎.

Gao Shun 高順 (d.198). As Lü Bu was camped by Xiapi city in 196, Hao Meng led a mutiny and attacked him in the night. Lü Bu fled to his officer Gao Shun, who restored control.

An honourable, sober man, Gao Shun commanded an elite force of seven hundred men, trained to break the enemy line. By favouritism, Lü Bu gave these troops in peacetime to Wei Xu, leaving the fighting to Gao Shun. Gao Shun remained loyal, but he criticised Lü Bu for his erratic and mistaken policies, and he did not get on well with Lü Bu's counsellor Chen Gong.

As Cao Cao attacked Lü Bu in 198, Gao Shun defeated his generals Xiahou Dun and Liu Bei, but Lü Bu was nonetheless driven back and besieged in Xiapi city. Gao Shun and Chen Gong were then kidnapped by the renegade Hou Cheng and others and taken to the enemy camp. When Lü Bu surrendered, Gao Shun and Chen Gong were executed with him. -SGZ 7:226-27, 1:16, HHS 75/65:2450.

Gao Shun 高眈; Chenliu. Administrator of Shu commandery in the late 180s, Gao Shun was a patron of learning. He restored the lecture hall known as the Stone House or Jade House in Chengdu after it was damaged by fire, and he arranged for the scholar Zhao Ning to prepare Xiangsu ji 鄉俗記 "Record of Local Customs." -HYGZ 3:34.

Gao Tanglong 高堂隆 see Gaotang Long 高堂隆.

Gao Wang 高望 (d.189); Jingzhao. A eunuch associate of Zhang Rang in the 180s, Gao Wang was an Attendant at the Yellow Gates, then a Regular Attendant enfeoffed as a marquis. As an officer for medicines he became a favourite of Liu Bian the son of Emperor Ling. Liu Bian proposed Gao Wang's adopted son Gao Jin for nomination as Filial and Incorrupt, but He Xun the Intendant of Jingzhao, who controlled the process, would not approve.

In 189 Gao Wang was killed in the massacre of eunuchs led by Yuan Shao and Wang Kuang. -HHS 58/48:1882, 74/64A:2385.

Gao Wu 高午 or Gao Ping 平. A cavalry officer under Wu Han at Chengdu in 36, Gao Wu was one of the commanders of the elite reserve which broke the troops of Gongsun Shu during his final sortie. Gao Wu chased Gongsun Shu and gave him his death wound with a blow to the head from his lance. -HHS 18/8:682, HYGZ 5:69.

Gao Xiang 高相 [or Gaoxiang; a sobriquet?]. Probably a non-Chinese of Wuling, associated in rebellion with Huang Jiashao, in 162 he and other chieftains surrendered to the great imperial army led by Feng Gun. -LS 7:13b.

Gao Xiang 高翔; Dongping. As Cao Cao attacked Yuan Shang in alliance with Yuan Tan in 203, Gao Xiang and Lü Kuang, officers of Yuan Shang, prepared to join him. Yuan Tan secretly invited them to join his own service and gave them seals as generals. They reported his approach to Cao Cao, who enfeoffed both men; he now had an excuse to turn against Yuan Tan. -HHS 74/64B:2414, SGZ 1:24, 6:202. [SGZ has the surname mistakenly as Lü 呂].

Gao Xiang 高詳. An officer under Liu Bei in Hanzhong in 219, Gao Xiang was defeated by Cao Zhen and Xu Huang. Serving under Zhuge Liang in 228, he was defeated by Guo Huai. -SGZ 9:280, 26:734. Despite the similarity of name, it is unlikely this is the same man as immediately above.

Gao Xu 高詡 [Jihui 季回] (d.37); Pingyuan. Gao Xu's ancestors had held office, and Gao Xu's father Rong 容 was a Counsellor at court towards the end of Former Han. Gao Xu became a gentleman cadet through the ren right of his father, but when Wang Mang took power both father and son refused to serve the usurper. The family was noted for scholarship in the Classic of Poetry according to the Old Text school of Mao, and Gao Xu maintained the tradition.

Respected for his honesty, in the late 20s Gao Xu was recommended by the Excellency Song Hong and became a county magistrate in Pei. He left that office, but was then named an Academician at the Imperial University; though family tradition was in the Old Text, Gao Xu's chair was for the study of Poetry according to the New Text school of Lu.

In 35 Gao Xu was appointed Minister of Finance. When he died in that office two years later the emperor gave money and land to his family. -HHS 79/69B:2569*; Bn 79:188.

Gao Ya 高雅. An officer of Lü Bu operating in Dongping in 193, Gao Ya was defeated by Cao Cao's officer Yu Jin. -SGZ 17:522.

Gao Yan 高焉. When Gongsun Zan declared war against Yuan Shao in 191, he presented a formal memorial to the court listing his enemy's wrongdoings. One of the allegations was that Yuan Shao had killed Gao Yan, a former Administrator of Shanggu, and Yao Gong the former Chancellor of Ganling because he was greedy for their property. -HHS 73/63:2360.

Gao Yi 高頤 [Kuanfang 貫方 or Kuan'guang 貫光: see below] (d.209); Dependent State of Shu commandery. LS 11:12b-13a preserves the text of an inscription entitled Yizhou taishou Gao Yi bei 益州太守高頤碑, which tells how Gao Yi, whose style was Kuanfang, served the warlord Governor Liu Zhang as Assistant in the northern region of Shu commandery, as a magistrate, as acting Commandant of the Dependent State of Guanghan, and finally as Administrator of Yizhou commandery. He died in that office in 209.

In commentary to this text, at LS 11:13b-14a, Hong Kuo refers to two additional fragmentary inscriptions, at LS 13:2a, and discusses the problems they raise. The inscriptions are also transcribed by Nagata 94:264: they were on opposite sides of a pillar, and Nagata provides a photograph of the site as it appeared in 1914. The pillar itself was/is in present-day Ya'an 雅安 county in Sichuan, which during Later Han was part of the territory of the Dependent State of Shu commandery. The paired texts are fragmentary, but appear to refer to different people.

On the western side of the pillar we are told of Gao Kuan'guang 貫光, who had been Administrator of Yizhou but had previously served as magistrate of Wuyang 武陽 county in Jianwei and as Commandant of Yinping 陰平, headquarters of the Dependent State of Guanghan.

On the eastern side, the inscription is dedicated to Gao Kuanfang. He too had been Administrator of Yizhou, but there is no reference to his appointment as a Commandant, while he had earlier been magistrate of a county named Wuyin 武陰: no place of that name appears in other records; it may have been a short-lived local establishment, or perhaps there is confusion with Wuyang and Yinping above.

Despite contradictions and possible dittography, it seems there were two brothers, both of whom became Administrators of Yizhou commandery. And despite LS 11, it is likely that Gao Yi, who died in 209, had the style Kuan'guang, not Kuanfang, and that it was he who is commemorated on the western side of the pillar.

Gao You 高誘; Zhuo. A student of Lu Zhi, Gao You became a noted scholar, compiling commentaries to Zhanguo ce, Lüshi chungiu and Huainan zi. He held a number of middle-range appointments under Cao Cao. -SKQSCM:117, Yao Zhenzong:2320-21.

Gao [Yuanlü] 高元呂. An expert physiognomist, about 217 Gao Yuanlü reassured Cao Pi about his prospects as a future ruler. -SGZ 2:57.

Gao Zhen 高朕; Chenliu? A commandery Administrator in the service of Liu Zhang, warlord Governor of Yi province, in 195 Gao Zhen arranged the reconstruction of a ceremonial hall in honour of the legendary sage Duke of Zhou 周公禮殿. -LS 1:13a-14b.

The title of the stele describes Gao Zhen as Administrator of Yizhou 益州, but the Song commentary of Hong Kuo says that the hall was in Chengdu, capital of Shu commandery and a considerable distance from Yizhou commandery. The text of the stele, moreover, refers to the educating work of Wang Weng 王翁, Administrator of Shu in Former Han [QHZ 582-583], to the shrine which was erected in his honour, and also to damage inflicted by fires in the city.

Though the hall in question may have been in Yizhou commandery, it is more likely to have been in Chengdu. In that case, either Gao Zhen was contributing to work on a building well outside his own territory, or else he was in fact Administrator of Shu: awkwardly and unusually, the term Yizhou here would thus indicate not the commandery of that name but the province as a whole.

Gao Zhi 高直 [Wenyu 文玉]; Shu? LS 13:8b records a fragment of a stele from the Spirit Road 神道 of this man's tomb.

Gao Zuo 高祚. In 215 Gao Zuo was an officer under Cao Cao in the campaign against Zhang Lu. The army suffered an initial set-back at the Yangping Pass defended by Zhang Wei, but then Gao Zuo's troop met by chance with a group of the enemy, drove them back and began a rout. -SGZ 8:265; deC 96:491.

Gaoding[yuan] 高定[元] (d.225); Yuexi. A king of non-Chinese people, in 218 Gaoding led an attack on a county city in Jianwei, but was driven away by the Administrator Li Yan.

Gaoding caused trouble again in 223, but Zhuge Liang killed him during his Southern Expedition in 225. -SGZ Shu10:999; Fang 52:195.

Gaotang Long 高堂隆 [Shengping 升平] (d.237); Taishan. Though his family had evidently achieved no distinction for several generations, Gaotang Long claimed descent from the classicist Gaotang Sheng 高堂生 of early Han, and as a young man he was a serious scholar. About 210 the Administrator Xie Ti appointed him as an Investigator.

The local military commander had some dispute with Xie Ti, and in the course of the argument he addressed him insultingly by his personal name when he should have used his formal title. Gaotang Long drew his sword and threatened the officer, who was terrified, while Xie Ti, equally startled, persuaded him to calm down.

Gaotang Long later left office and went to Ji'nan, but in 213 he was called up to an advisory post on Cao Cao's staff as Imperial Chancellor. In 217 he became a Literary Scholar in the household of Cao Hui, and was then Chancellor of his county marquisate in Ji'nan. When Cao Cao died in 220, Cao Hui failed to show appropriate grief but spent his time hunting and horse-racing. Gaotang Long brought him to order.

Gaotang Long served for a time as Court Astronomer of Wei, in which capacity he was involved, with his Assistant Han Yi, in presentation of the Huangchu 黃初 [Yellow Beginning] calendar, named from the first reign period of the new dynasty. Transferred to a county magistracy, he was soon afterwards made Tutor to Cao Rui, at that time King of Pingyuan. When Cao Rui succeeded Cao Pi as Emperor in 226 Gaotang Long received appointments at court, in the provinces and in the Imperial University. He was recognised as a loyal and valuable official and rose to ministerial rank. -SGZ 25:708-19*, JS 17:498; Fang 52:531-533.

Gaotang Zhi 高堂芝. Director of the Secretariat under Emperor Shun, in 126/127 Gaotang Zhi was accused of conspiracy with the eunuch Zhang Fang, other members of the Secretariat, and a number of provincial officials. Two of their colleagues were executed, but Gaotang Zhi and others were able to purchase relief. -HHS 48/38:1605, 101/11:3243 and see sub Zhang Fang 張防.

Ge Gong 葛龔 [Yuanfu 元甫]; Liang. A man of spirit and unusual strength, in the time of Emperor He Ge Gong was known for literary work and scholarship.

During the reign of Emperor An Ge Gong received commandery nomination as Filial and Incorrupt and became Assistant Court Provisioner. He put forward several advantageous proposals 上便宜 and was made a county magistrate in Henei. He was later invited to join the offices of the Grand Commandant, but was unable to accept because of illness.

Later Ge Gong received provincial nomination as Abundant Talent and was again appointed a magistrate, this time in Hedong. He received high praise in both the counties where he had held office.

Ge Gong compiled twelve pian of literary works, including rhapsodies, inscriptions and eulogies, and he is mentioned by Cao Pi in his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature." -HHS 80/70A:2617-18* & JJ at 2870 Hui Dong.

Ge Xing 葛興. Some time in the 50s, Ge Xing was Administrator of Yingchuan. Unable to attend to affairs because of illness [中風: possibly a mental incapacity], he should have left his post, but his Officer of Merit Han Leng concealed the problem and managed the government on his behalf. After two years Ge Xing's son quarrelled with Han Leng. He reported the situation and Han Leng was punished. -HHS 45/35:1534.

Ge Zhi 葛祗. Inspector of Jiaozhi, in 165 Ge Zhi was captured by the rebel Hu Lan. He was freed by the general Du Shang, but was later executed for his military failure. -HHS 102/12:3257; MBeck 90:128.

General Who is Pillar of Heaven 柱天將軍 was the sobriquet of a rebel leader in Jiao province in 186. The trouble was settled by the Inspector Jia Cong. -HHS 31/21:1111-12.

Geng 耿 [surname] see also sub Jian Yong 簡雍.

Geng 耿, the Lady. Wife/widow of Deng Chang 闓, and a woman of high moral principle, she was saddened at the fall of the Deng clan after the death of the Dowager Deng in 121, and at the early death of her son Deng Zhong. She adopted Deng Si, a son of Deng Bao 豹, as heir to her late husband, and personally tutored him in classical learning. Deng Si became a fine scholar, took part in continuation of the Dongguan Hanji, and was a colonel in the Northern Army. -HHS 16/6:618.

Geng Ai 耿艾; Julu. Administrator of Ji Yin commandery, then known as Jiping 濟平, for Wang Mang, at the end of 23 he surrendered to Li Yi, general and commissioner of the Gengshi Emperor, and was appointed Administrator of Ji'nan. -HHS 21/11:761; Bn 59:34-37, QHX:116-117.

Geng Ba 耿霸; Youfufeng. When Geng Kuang died in 36, his son Geng Guo was due to inherit his fief. Geng Guo, however, asked that it be passed to his youngest brother Ba, who had been their father's favourite. The emperor approved. -HHS 19/9:713.

Geng Bao 耿寶 [Junda 君達] (d.125); Youfufeng. Son of Geng Xi and the Princess Liu Ying, daughter of Emperor Ming, he succeeded to his father's fief. His younger sister the Lady Geng Ji married Liu Qing, King of Qinghe, and was thus titular mother to Liu You, Emperor An. When the emperor took personal power after the death of the regent Dowager Deng in 121 he showed respect and favour to Geng Bao as his senior maternal uncle. Geng Bao was given command of a corps of palace guards and then appointed Minister Herald.

Geng Bao had close associates among the eunuchs, notably Fan Feng and Li Run, and was also allied to the emperor's former wet-nurse Wang Sheng. In 123 he recommended for office an elder brother of Li Run, but the nomination was rejected by the Excellency Yang Zhen. In 124, as Yang Zhen suffered accusations from Fan Feng and his eunuch colleagues, Geng Bao claimed he had been insubordinate when faced with the charges; this brought Yang Zhen's dismissal and subsequent suicide.

In the summer of that year Geng Bao was named General-in-Chief, a post which had hitherto been reserved for the senior male of the consort clan; the empress's brother Yan Xian was evidently regarded as too junior. Geng Bao was obviously a close associate of the Yan family, and a few weeks later, when Fan Feng and Jiang Jing presented accusations against the emperor's only son Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun, he successfully argued in court that Liu Bao should be dismissed as Heir.

In 125, as Emperor An was taken ill on his progress to Nanyang, Geng Bao was named Acting Grand Commandant while still holding office as General-in-Chief. It would appear he was aware of the early death of the emperor, for his ally Fan Feng is said to have been involved in the deception, but after the cortège had returned to Luoyang Geng Bao played no role in the decision to place the Little Emperor Liu Yi upon the throne, which was taken privately by the Dowager Yan and her brother Xian.

A few weeks later the Yan turned against Geng Bao, for his high rank and long standing made him a rival to their position. Accused of factionalism, he was dismissed by the regent Dowager and degraded to a village fief. Geng Bao committed suicide, while other associates were killed or exiled. -HHS 19/9:714.

Geng Bao 耿苞/包 (d.199). Following the destruction of Gongsun Zan, Yuan Shao had his Registrar Geng Bao suggest that he take the imperial title. When the proposal was raised in open council, however, Yuan Shao's officers protested so fiercely that he was obliged to repudiate Geng Bao and kill him. -SGZ 6:195, HHS 74/64A:2390.

Geng Bi 耿鄙 (d.187). In 186, after the first assault of the rebels from Liang province against the region of Chang'an had been driven back, Geng Bi was sent as Inspector. As he was planning a counter-attack, Fu Xie the Administrator of Hanyang warned him that the troops' loyalty was uncertain, but Geng Bi ignored him. In 187 he led an army from the eastern commanderies into Longxi and Jincheng.

Geng Bi had Cheng Qiu, a man notorious for corruption and extortion, as his personal assistant, and when the army came to Didao, capital of Longxi by present-day Lintao in Gansu, the troops mutinied and killed both men. -HHS 58/48:1877; deC 84:152-153.

Geng Bing 耿秉 [Bochu 伯初] (d.91); Youfufeng. Son of Geng Guo, Geng Bing was a man of great stature and enormous girth. A keen student of strategy, he had broad knowledge of the histories and could recite by heart from the Art of War ascribed to Sima Rangu 司馬[穰苴]兵法. Through the ren right of his father, Geng Bing became a cadet gentleman at court, and from that position he made a number of suggestions on military affairs, with the general theme that money spent on the inner territories of China was wasted so long as the frontier was unstable, that the major threat came from the Xiongnu, and that the emperor should demonstrate his authority by proper military means.

By the early 70s, as raids from the Northern

Xiongnu became an increasing nuisance and source of concern, Geng Bing and Dou Gu became leading spokesmen for a war party, and Emperor Ming, who secretly agreed with the policy, invited Geng Bing to consultations in his private apartments and treated him with great favour. Geng Bing was appointed Supervisor of Internuncios, and his views on frontier policy were received in court conference with the highest ministers.

In 72 Geng Bing was named Commandant of Attendant Cavalry, and in 73 he led one of four columns against the Northern Xiongnu: as Geng Bing advanced from Juyan/Edsin Gol, his colleague Dou Gu moved north from Jiuquan, while further to the east two armies under Zhai Tong and Lai Miao came from Shuofang in the Ordos and the Sanggan valley at Yanmen. Of the four commanders in this enterprise, only Dou Gu achieved real success, defeating a Xiongnu king and occupying the region of present-day Hami. Geng Bing went two hundred kilometres across desolate country, but the enemy retreated and though he planned a raid with light horsemen to bring them to bay, his second-in-command Qin Feng dissuaded him and they returned without any real contact.

In the following year Geng Bing joined Dou Gu and Liu Zhang to lead a combined force of over 14,000 horsemen against Turfan. In the two major kingdoms of that region, Ande the ruler of Further Jushi, north of the Bogda range, was father of the [unnamed] king of Nearer Jushi, which lay south of the mountains. Because of distance and the difficulty of the passes, Dou Gu planned to concentrate upon Nearer Jushi, but Geng Bing argued that if they obtained the submission of Further Jushi the nearer state would fall into their hands. As Dou Gu was undecided, Geng Bing volunteered to make the expedition, and left without further ado. Crossing the mountains, he defeated the Xiongnu and their allies at the Pulei Lake and captured over a hundred thousand head of horses and cattle.

King Ande now came to submit, but Su An, a major in the service of Dou Gu, hoping to gain credit for his master, told the ruler he should surrender to Dou Gu as supreme commander. So Ande sent some of his officers to Geng Bing while he himself waited for Dou Gu and the main army. Furious at such interference, Geng Bing rode with an armed escort to Dou Gu's camp, demanding Ande's head for having reneged on his agreement to surrender. Dou Gu urged him not to confuse the negotiations, but Geng Bing would not be dissuaded. Ande was frightened: he came out from his capital bare-breasted and on foot, was received by Geng Bing and led to Dou Gu. Nearer Jushi also surrendered, and Later Han, having regained control of the approaches to the Western Regions, restored the protectorate which had been maintained by Former Han.

In 75, however, the Xiongnu returned in force. The Protector-General Chen Mu was killed, and his Wu and Ji Colonels Geng Gong, a cousin of Geng Bing, and Guan Chong were besieged in Further and Nearer Jushi. After a hiatus following the death of Emperor Ming, the new government of Emperor Zhang despatched a rescue force. Geng Bing was given command as General Who Subdues the West 征西將軍, though he remained in reserve in Jiuquan while the Administrator Duan Peng led the expedition early in 76.

Later that year Geng Bing became General on the Liao, based in Wuyuan to supervise the Southern Xiongnu and the northern borders. He held that post for seven years and kept the Xiongnu at peace by goodwill and honest dealing. Returning to Luoyang as Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital, he was treated with great favour, and always held command of the guard when the emperor was on tour or visiting an outlying residence. All three of his sons were appointed gentleman cadets.

In 88 a memorial from the Southern Shanyu asked for the support of an imperial army for a campaign of reconquest in the north. The regent Dowager Dou asked Geng Bing's advice, and he was predictably enthusiastic, for the new plan was very close to the proposals he had made in 73. There were protests from senior ministers, including all the Excellencies, but the Dowager was determined and her brother Dou Xian was named General of Chariots and Cavalry for a grand campaign to destroy the Northern Xiongnu. Geng Bing, again holding title as General Who Subdues the West, was second in command.

When the expedition was launched in 89, the major victory over the Northern Shanyu was achieved at Jiluo Mountain by a detachment under the senior colonel Yan Pan, while Dou Xian, Geng Bing and the main army were largely unopposed. In triumphal progress through the heartland of the enemy, they burned the sacred capital of Longcheng and set a commemorative stele at Mount Yanren in the Hangayn Nuruu range. Geng Bing was awarded a county marquisate with revenue from three thousand households.

Strong and brave, Geng Bing was a man of simple taste and conduct. On all campaigns he rode in full armour at the forefront of the fighting, and when there was a halt he would not stay in camp but kept watch at a distance. The army was thus prepared for any emergency, and officers and men were glad to risk their lives for him. He returned to the capital in 90 as Minister of the Household, but died in the summer of the following year, a little over fifty years old. He was granted a vermilion coffin and a shroud of jade armour, his tomb was prepared by the Court Architect, and the funeral was accompanied by official musicians and an escort from the Northern Army. When the Shanyu of the Southern Xiongnu heard of the death he proclaimed state mourning, and some of his people cut themselves in grief until blood flowed. -HHS 19/9:716-18*; deC 84:258-271, Chavannes 07:221-225.

Geng Bo 耿伯. While Geng Bo was a student of Du Qiao, he had shared lodgings with Liu Wen of Wei commandery.

In 147 Liu Wen planned a coup to place Liu Suan the King of Qinghe upon the imperial throne. The attempt failed, but the General-in-Chief Liang Ji used the tenuous connection through Geng Bo as a means to implicate Du Qiao and the former Grand Commandant Li Gu in the conspiracy. -HHS 63/53:2093, XHS 4: 15b.

Geng Cheng 耿承. A nephew of Geng Bao, in the early 120s Geng Cheng became a Palace Attendant and was granted the marquisate of Linlü 林慮 in Henei in succession to his grandmother the Princess Liu Ying. [The fief of Liu Ying had been Longlü 隆慮, but the name had been changed to avoid taboo on the personal name of the Young Emperor (reg. 106).]

When Geng Bao was destroyed by the Yan group in 125 Geng Cheng was dismissed and sent away to a village fief, but in 134, at the urging of Geng Cheng's aunt the Honoured Lady Geng Yi, Emperor Shun restored the family to favour and Geng Cheng became a General of the Household. When the Lady Geng died during the 140s, however, the General-in-Chief Liang Ji asked for her jewellery. Geng Cheng refused, and Liang Ji had him stripped of his fief.

Geng Cheng fled to hiding in Nanyang, but a few years later Liang Ji found him and killed him, together with a dozen of his family and household. -HHS 19/9: 714.

Geng Chong 耿种/冲; Youfufeng. Geng Chong was the eldest son of Geng Bing. He and his two brothers became gentlemen cadets through the ren right of their father, and at Geng Bing's death in 90 Geng Chong succeeded to his fief. Because of the association between the Geng and Dou families, however, when Dou Xian was overthrown by Emperor He in 92, the marquisate was abolished.

In 109 Geng Chong was Emissary at the court of the Shanyu Tan of the Southern Xiongnu. In the summer the Shanyu rebelled and besieged Geng Chong's camp. Despite intense pressure Geng Chong maintained his defence for several months. Relieved by Liang Qin early in 110, he accompanied the army on the pursuit which compelled the Shanyu to surrender.

Geng Chong was later Administrator of Hanyang, and in 122 he received the surrender of the chieftain Manu and his followers of the Shaodang Qiang, granting them imperial rewards. -HHS 19/9:718, 5: 213, 47/37:1592-93, 89/79:2957-58, 87/77:2892; deC 84:285-286.

Geng Chun 耿純 [Boshan 伯山] (d.37); Julu. The Geng family had local authority, and had married into the lineage of the kings of Zhending, descended from Emperor Jing of Former Han who ruled in the second century BC. Geng Chun's father Geng Ai, Administrator of Jiyin under Wang Mang, surrendered in 23 to Li Yi the commissioner for the Gengshi regime, and was appointed Administrator of Ji'nan.

Geng Chun studied at Chang'an and then held office in the ministry of Finance. Following the fall of Chang'an he returned to Julu, and after several attempts he met the commissioner. Impressed with his personal qualities and his family influence, Li Yi appointed him a Commandant of Cavalry and sent him with a Staff of Authority to settle Zhao and Wei.

Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came as commissioner to the north soon afterwards and set his headquarters at Handan in Zhao. When Geng Chun called upon him he was well received, was impressed by the discipline he saw, and presented horses and silk as sign of allegiance. As Liu Xiu went north into Zhongshan, Geng Chun remained at Handan. When Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in the winter of 23/24, he attempted to take Geng Chun prisoner, but he made his escape, raised a clan army, including his three cousins Geng Xin, Geng Su and Geng Zhi with two thousand followers, and went to join Liu Xiu, who had returned to Julu. Having arranged the surrender of his home city of Songzi, Geng Chun joined the fighting against Wang Lang with title as General of the Van.

In joining Liu Xiu, Geng Chun had been accompanied not only by fighting men, but also by the old and the weak of his clan. He was concerned that his kinsmen might be influenced by the popular support of Wang Lang, so he sent his cousins Xin and Xiu to burn the family properties. When Liu Xiu asked why, Geng Chun explained that he wished to ensure that any of his family who had doubts would have no place for refuge or as a stronghold. Like burning bridges, he thus committed his people to the imperial cause. Liu Xiu was duly impressed by such display of loyalty.

As the army advanced through Changshan they halted at He city. The head of the Su family opened the gates of the city and called Wang Lang's officer Li Yun to surprise the Han camp. Geng Chun discovered the plot, fought Li Yun and killed him. Later, he was severely wounded, fell from his horse and broke his shoulder. While he was out of action his cousin Geng Zhi took command of his troop, but Geng Chun continued in office as General of the Van.

After the destruction of Wang Lang Geng Chun went east to defeat the Bronze Horse bandits, then joined the main army to face the Red Eyebrows and their allies at Shequan in Henei. Geng Chun's troop was forward of the main body, and the enemy attacked their isolated camp by night. Many defenders were killed or wounded by the hail of arrows, but Geng Chun and his personal followers held firm, and he sent two thousand volunteers [敢死 gansi: "dare-to-dies"], armed with cross-bows, to circle the enemy and surprise them from the rear. Demoralised by the unexpected assault and the war-cries of the attackers, the bandits fled. The success was reported on the following day, and a general advance brought complete victory. Geng Chun was praised by Liu Xiu, and his kinsmen were rewarded with appointments.

As Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 he enfeoffed Geng Chun as marquis of a county in Zhuo, then sent him against the pretender Liu Yong. Geng Chun captured the city of Dingtao, capital of Jiyin, but early in 26 the former ally Liu ["Goitre"] Yang, King of Zhending, resentful at apparent neglect, turned against Guangwu and barred the gates of his capital. Geng Chun was sent with the Staff of Authority to the north, ostensibly to issue an amnesty and restore peace, but in fact to arrest the rebel. Liu Yang was prepared to trust him, for Geng Chun belonged to the leading clan of a neighbouring territory and was also a kinsman. Initially hesitant, he eventually agreed to visit, though he came to the meeting with an escort. Geng Chun received him with courtesy, but as Liu Yang, his brother Liu Rang and their cousin Liu Xi entered the reception hall, he seized them and closed the gates. The soldiers outside made no move, and Geng Chun had Liu Yang and his associates executed.

Returning to the capital, Geng Chun asked leave to retire from active service and take a more settled position. Guangwu teased him for seeking to change from military to civilian life, but named him Administrator of Dong commandery. The territory was only partly under control, but Geng Chun established a degree of order within a few months.

In 28 he was ordered to bring levies to support operations against Zhang Bu. He obtained the surrender of Fan Jing, who had been Administrator of Dongping for the Gengshi Emperor, then turned into Ji'nan and came back to join the settlement of Taishan.

In 29 Geng Chun was dismissed. A local magistrate had committed some crime, Geng Chun reported it to the throne and sought approval to punish him, but in the mean time he laid siege to the county city. Before imperial authority to take action arrived the magistrate killed himself. Geng Chun was found to have acted prematurely and was recalled to the capital without appointment. On the other hand, though a marquis was normally expected to reside at his fief, he was granted the title Servant at Court, excusing him from that requirement.

Soon afterwards Geng Chun accompanied the imperial forces to attack Dong Xian. As the army passed through Dong, thousands of people came to escort their former Administrator, crying that they wanted him back. Guangwu was amazed at the way in which Geng Chun, brought up as a soldier, had been so successful and popular in civil government; he did not, however, restore him to his post.

In 30 Geng Chun was given final enfeoffment as a marquis in Bohai. He had asked to be transferred from his fief in Zhuo because while he was in Dong he had executed a number of followers of Zhu Ying.

Zhu Ying was now Administrator in Zhuo, and Geng Chun feared he would take revenge. When Guangwu agreed, Geng Chun left for his territory. As he passed through Wei, he was awarded quantities of grain, and when he arrived in his fief he impressed the people by the manner in which he enquired about those who were sick and mourned those who had died.

In 32 there was a rebellion in Dong and Jiyin commanderies. The Excellency Li Tong and the chief general Wang Chang were sent to deal with it but Guangwu, recalling Geng Chun's popularity in the region, named him Palace Counsellor and ordered him to accompany the army. As soon as he was heard to have come, nine thousand rebels came to surrender and the army withdrew without need for a battle. An imperial letter restored Geng Chun as Administrator of Dong, and the officials and people were content and obedient thereafter.

Geng Chun died in office in 37. Recognising him as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 21/11:761-65*, 22/12:789-91; Bn 59:37, 69-73, 122-123, 132, 140, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:84.

Geng Dan 耿弼; Youfufeng. Grandson of Geng Yuan/Shou, he was the only survivor when the Geng family was destroyed by Cao Cao after the failed plot of Geng Ji 紀 in 218. -HHS 19/9:714, Bn 54:34.

Geng Feng 耿馮; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Zhong and grandson of Geng Yan, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 19/9:713.

Geng Fu 耿阜; Julu. Son of Geng Chun, at his father's death in 37 he inherited his marquisate, but it was transferred south from Bohai to a county in Jiujiang and later changed to a district fief.

In 71, during the crisis over the alleged conspiracy involving Liu Ying the King of Chu, Geng Fu and others were implicated by confessions from Yan Zhong and Wang Ping and were liable to execution. The censorial officer Han Lang persuaded Emperor Ming to doubt the accusation. Geng Fu's fief was abolished, but after his death Emperor Zhang restored the honour, though at lower rank, for his son Geng Xu. -HHS 21/11:765, 41/31:1417, HHJ 10:123.

Geng Gong 耿恭 [Bozong 伯宗]; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Guang, who died young, Geng Gong was an ambitious man and a talented military commander.

After Dou Gu's success against the Xiongnu in 73 he was sent out from Dunhuang on another expedition in the winter of 74. Liu Zhang and Geng Gong's cousin Geng Bing held command of two additional columns, and Liu Zhang asked for Geng Gong as his major. The Chinese forced the surrender of the kingdoms of Jushi [Turfan] and the imperial government re-established the office of Protector-General of the Western Regions.

Geng Gong was appointed as Wu Colonel, with his camp at Jinpu city in Further Jushi, north of the Bogda range and west of Lake Barkol. His colleague Guan Chong was stationed south of the mountains at Liuzhong oasis in Nearer Jushi. Each had some five hundred men. As he took up his post, Geng Gong sent messengers to the Wusun tribes of the Tian Shan, proclaiming the authority of Han and recalling past exchanges, when they had sent fine horses to the Han court in the first century BC and had received generous gifts and imperial princesses for marriage. The chieftains sent hostage sons to China, and Geng Gong rewarded them with gold and brocade.

In the spring of 75 the Northern Shanyu sent twenty thousand horsemen, led by a king, to attack Jushi. Geng Gong sent reinforcements of three hundred men under a major, but they were overwhelmed by the Xiongnu, who then defeated and killed King Ande of Further Jushi. Following this success they turned to attack Geng Gong in Jinpu. As Geng Gong and his men defended the walls, he prepared poisoned arrows and had word spread amongst the Xiongnu that the Han had magical powers on their side to ensure that any who were wounded would surely die. Fired from crossbows, the arrows caused suppurating wounds and the enemy was struck with panic. Then Geng Gong took advantage of a rain-storm to make a sortie, his men killed or wounded great numbers, and the Xiongnu abandoned the siege.

Geng Gong took advantage of the respite to shift his camp to the neighbouring city of Shule, defended by a river [though the name is the same, this was not the oasis state by present-day Kashgar, far to the west]. He also raised several thousand more men, and when the Xiongnu returned to the attack in the autumn they were scattered by the new auxiliaries, caught amongst the streams below the fortress, and suffered heavy casualties. Once the siege had begun, however, though his men dug a well 150 feet deep they found no water, and they were obliged to drink the sweat and urine of their horses. Geng Gong then told the story of how the general Li Guangli 李廣利 of Former Han had found water by striking a rock with his sword. Dressed in his best uniform, he bowed to the well and prayed, and soon afterwards water poured out. As the men cheered, Geng Gong had them throw water about to show the enemy they had plenty to spare; the Xiongnu, disheartened, withdrew once more.

At this time the people of Yanqi and Qiuzi, two states further west along the Northern Road, killed the Protector-General Chen Mu, while the Xiongnu were besieging Guan Chong in Liuzhong. Emperor Ming had just died, and the new Emperor Zhang sent no assistance, so the local states joined the Xiongnu against Geng Gong. He drove off one attack, and was secretly aided by the queen of Further Jushi, whose family was originally Chinese and who sent information and some supplies. Nonetheless, after a few months the men's food was exhausted and they were reduced to boiling leather coats, horn crossbows and leather quivers. Geng Gong had established complete faith with his followers, and they were determined to hold out together to the end, but they were killed one by one until only a few dozen remained. The Northern Shanyu, knowing their straits, sent messengers to invite surrender, offering Geng Gong enfeoffment and a marriage alliance. Geng Gong took their leader to the top of the walls, killed him with his own hand and burned his body; the other envoys wept and went away. The Shanyu was furious and increased the pressure, but could not overcome the defence.

By this time Guan Chong in Nearer Jushi had sent a message calling for help. There was debate at court whether any further commitment should be made, but it was eventually agreed it would be bad for morale to abandon the troops, while it would enhance the prestige of the empire to rescue them. Geng Bing was therefore sent to Jiuquan to secure the rear, while the Administrator Duan Peng and two Internuncios, Wang Meng and Huangfu Yuan, gathered commandery troops and auxiliaries from the state of Shanshan. Early in 76 a force of seven thousand men advanced along the Northern Road, collected the remnant garrison of Liuzhong in Nearer Jushi and attacked the state's capital. They killed four thousand of the enemy, took three thousand prisoners and captured almost forty thousand head of camels, horses, cattle and sheep.

The Xiongnu fled back to the north, and Nearer Jushi returned to allegiance.

With this success, Wang Meng and his fellows planned to return to China, but Geng Gong's officer Fan Qiang, whom he had sent to get supplies from Dunhuang, had followed the army and now sought leave to aid his master. The leaders of the main army would not go forward, but Fan Qiang was allowed to take two thousand men through the mountains to relieve Geng Gong. They met snow-drifts ten foot deep and could barely get forward. As they approached the city, the defenders sounded the alarm, but Fan Qiang called to them, and they opened the gates and greeted their deliverers. Next day the combined force began to withdraw, fighting as they marched and constantly hungry and cold. Of the original garrison under Geng Gong, just twenty-six left the fortress in his company, and when they reached the frontier at Dunhuang only twelve remained [thirteen with Fan Qiang], all desperately thin and dressed in rags.

The General of the Household Zheng Zhong prepared baths and fresh clothing, and reported on Geng Gong's courageous stand against odds, inflicting heavy casualties on the enemy; he described the feat as a splendid example of courage and loyalty. As Geng Gong returned to Luoyang the Excellency Bao Yu memorialised his virtues, comparing him to the celebrated Su Wu 蘇武 of Former Han and urging he be granted noble rank and rewards; the courtier poet Ban Gu later composed a rhapsody on his great feat of arms.

The tale of heroism was nonetheless a reminder that the empire had suffered a setback, and one must note that the commander and two senior assistants were among the very few to return from a campaign in which hundreds of lower ranks perished. The survivors were not treated with great generosity: Geng Gong was promoted to Commandant of Cavalry, his majors were made assistant magistrates, and the remaining nine men were placed in the Feathered Forest troop of guards.

Geng Gong took leave of absence to pay posthumous respects to his mother, who had died while he was away. An imperial edict ordered the General of the Household Ma Yan to take offerings, but he was also instructed to ask Geng Gong to end his mourning and return to office at Luoyang. In 77 Geng Gong became a colonel in the Northern Army.

Later that year there was trouble with the Qiang tribes led by the chieftain Miyu, who attacked Longxi and Jincheng and invaded Hanyang. Geng Gong proposed a plan to deal with them, and he was sent with the three thousand men of the Northern Army to assist the general Ma Fang. Camping by the upper Yellow River in the west of Longxi, he fought several engagements, and in autumn of 78 the major Shaodang group of the Qiang surrendered. Ma Fang then returned to the capital, leaving Geng Gong to deal with those who had not surrendered. He captured more than a thousand, together with over forty thousand head of cattle and sheep. Thirteen clans of the Lejie and Shaoh groups, numbering several tens of thousands, then came to surrender.

Geng Gong's plan to deal with the Qiang noted that the warlord and later minister Dou Rong, a man of the northwest, had established good relations with the non-Chinese people at the beginning of Later Han. He proposed that Dou Rong's nephew Dou Gu, already a man of military achievement, be sent as an envoy with authority to negotiate and settle them, while Ma Fang should be stationed with an army in Hanyang, east of Jincheng and Longxi, to provide a credible threat against any who stayed recalcitrant. The plan may have been genuine, but the Geng had an old alliance with the Dou clan against the Ma. Ma Fang saw his secondary place as an insult to himself and to his family, which had also a long tradition in the northwest, and on his return to the capital he made his feelings known. The Internuncio Li Tan was sent to inspect the troops, and duly reported that Geng Gong was unconcerned about his duties and showed resentment at the imperial orders. Geng Gong was recalled and arrested, then dismissed from his appointment and sent back to his home country. He died without holding further office. -HHS 19/9:720-24*.

Geng Guang 耿廣; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Kuang and a younger brother of Geng Yan, Geng Shu and Geng Guo, Geng Guang became a General of the Household under Emperor Guangwu, but died young. -HHS 19/9:713, 720.

Geng Guo 耿國 [Shulü 叔慮 or Shuxian 叔憲] (d.57); Youfufeng. Third son of Geng Kuang and younger brother of Geng Yan, Geng Guo was sent to Guangwu's court in 28 as a goodwill hostage for his family's loyalty in operations against Peng Chong. He was first appointed as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, but then gained the emperor's admiration by his excellent responses to questions and was promoted to be a colonel in the Northern Army. The regiment was disbanded in 31, but Geng Guo was named Commandant of Attendant Cavalry.

When Geng Kuang died in 36, both his elder sons Yan and Shu already held fiefs, so Geng Guo was next in line to succeed him. He asked that Geng Kuang's marquisate be passed to his youngest brother Ba, their father's favourite, and the emperor approved this filial and fraternal generosity.

Geng Guo was a county magistrate in Dong commandery, Yingchuan and Runan, was praised by all who served under him, and returned to Luoyang as General of the Household for All Purposes. In the course of his duties at court, and no doubt on the basis of his family's contact with the north through his father, the long-term Administrator of Yuyang, Geng Guo presented advice on a number of policy questions concerning the northern frontier. Emperor Guangwu was impressed.

At the beginning of 48 the Xiongnu prince Bi sent envoys offering submission and undertaking to protect the imperial frontiers in the north. At the court conference held to consider this request, the majority argued against it, largely on grounds that the barbarians could not be trusted and it was more important to consolidate security within the empire. Geng Guo, however, argued that the opportunity could not be missed, and that the alliance offered by Bi would enable the border commanderies to be restored and would ensure peace for generations. Emperor Guangwu accepted his argument, and Bi was recognised as Southern Shanyu.

In 51 Geng Guo became Minister of Finance. Following his earlier advice about the surrender of the Xiongnu, he urged the appointment of a General on the Liao; this officer was to be stationed in Wuyuan commandery to prevent the Southern Xiongnu from communicating and co-operating with their cousins beyond the frontier. Hoping and expecting that former Chinese settlers could be repatriated to the north and balance the power of the Xiongnu, Guangwu did not approve, but Geng Guo's plan was put into effect by Emperor Ming in 65.

Geng Guo died in office in 57. -HHS 19/91.715-16*; Bn 67:119, 126-128, deC 84:234, 252.

Geng Hao 耿耗 (d.121); Liaodong. Commandery

Officer of Merit, in the summer of 121 he accompanied the Administrator Cai Feng and the local militia in an attempt to deal with a major raid from Gaogouli [Koguryo], supported by Xianbi from the north. As their troops were defeated with heavy losses, Geng Hao and his colleagues Long Duan and Gongsun Pu tried to shield their master Cai Feng. All of them were killed. -HHS 85/75:2814-15.

Geng Heng 耿恆; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Bao, when Emperor Shun restored the family to favour in 134, he granted Geng Heng a small fief. -HHS 19/9:714.

Geng Hong 耿宏; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Pu, after his father's death in 115 he was appointed a gentleman cadet. -HHS 19/9:724.

Geng Ji 耿姬, the Lady; Youfufeng. Daughter of Geng Xi and the Princess Liu Ying, daughter of Emperor Ming, the Lady was the principal wife of Liu Qing, King of Qinghe, and thus titular mother to Liu You, Emperor An, whose natural mother was the Lady Zuo Ji. In 106 Liu Qing was sent out to his state, but as the infant emperor Liu Long was sickly, and the Dowager Deng was prepared to put Liu You upon the throne, she kept the Lady and the boy in the royal residence at Luoyang. Later that year, after Liu You had been placed upon the throne, the Lady Geng was also escorted off to rejoin her husband.

After the death of the Dowager Deng in 121, Emperor An awarded posthumous imperial honours to Liu Qing and the Lady Zuo, and he appointed the Lady Geng as Grand Honoured Lady of their tomb in Qinghe. He also showed respect and favour to her brother, his senior uncle Geng Bao.

Following the death of Emperor An in 125 his Dowager Yan dismissed Geng Bao and disgraced the family. The Lady Geng survived to plead their cause, and in 134 an edict of Emperor Shun restored them to favour and enfeoffment.

When the Lady died the General-in-Chief Liang Ji asked for her jewellery. Her nephew Geng Cheng refused him, so Liang Ji stripped him of his fief; he later had Geng Cheng killed, with a dozen members of his household. -HHS 55/45:1804-05, 19/9:714.

Geng Ji 耿倨; Julu. After Geng Chun's success against the Red Eyebrows at Shequan in 24 Liu Xiu appointed his kinsman Geng Ji as a county magistrate in Changshan. -HHS 21/11:763.

Geng Ji 耿箕; Youfufeng. Geng Ji was a son of Geng Bao. When Emperor Shun restored the family to favour in 134 he appointed Geng Ji as a Palace Attendant and granted him the county fief which had been taken from his father at the time of his disgrace in 125. -HHS 19/9: 714.

Geng Ji 耿紀 [Jixing 季行] (d.218); Youfufeng. A descendant of Geng Bing, he showed early talent and was recruited into the offices at the capital. Cao Cao admired him, and he became Palace Attendant and then Minister Steward at the Han court in Xu city.

With long family connection to the house of Liu, Geng Ji was concerned at Cao Cao's control of the imperial court and hoped to restore the power of the dynasty. He therefore joined Jin Yi, Ji Ben, Wei Kuang and others in a plot to seize Xu city and call in Guan Yu from the south. The coup was attempted at the beginning of 218, but was defeated by Cao Cao's agent Wang Pi.

Geng Ji and his fellows were executed with their families, and the Geng clan was almost entirely destroyed in Cao Cao's vengeance [see sub Geng Hong 耿耿]. -SGZ 1:50, HHS 19/9:718; deC 89:518-519.

Geng Ju 耿舉; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Kuang and a younger brother of Geng Yan and Geng Guo, Geng Ju became a General of the Household under Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 19/9:713.

Geng Kuang 耿況 [Xiayou 俠游] (d.36); Youfufeng. The family came originally from Julu, but was moved to Youfufeng in the time of Emperor Wu of Former Han as part of the policy to separate leading men and officials from their native country. Though HHS does not say so, Geng Kuang and his family were surely distant kinsmen of Geng Ai and the Julu lineage.

A keen student of the Classic of Poetry and Ritual, at the end of Former Han Geng Kuang was appointed a gentleman cadet for his Understanding of the Classics, and he studied the Laozi under the recluse Anqiu Wangzhi 安丘望之 of Jingzhao. One of his fellow-students was Wang Ji 王伋, a cousin of Wang Mang.

Wang Mang appointed Geng Kuang as lianshuai 連率 of Shuotiao 朔調, equivalent to Administrator of Shanggu in the system of the Xin, but Geng Kuang had no faith in the usurper's regime. He was, however, willing to accept the restored Han dynasty under the Gengshi Emperor, and after the fall of Wang Mang in 23 he went to meet Han Hong, commissioner of Han. It had been proclaimed that those who accepted the new government would be confirmed in their position, but when Geng Kuang offered his seal in token of submission the envoy did not return it immediately but kept it overnight. Geng Kuang's Officer of Merit Kou Xun went with armed men to Han Hong's tent, had Geng Kuang invited to join them, and attached the seal and ribbon to his waist. The commissioner had no choice but to give formal approval, and Geng Kuang was thus confirmed in office.

Despite this coup, Geng Kuang was uneasy about his position, but his son Geng Yan urged him to commit to Han, and Geng Kuang sent Geng Yan with tribute to the new imperial court. Before he could get through, Wang Lang claimed the imperial title, and Geng Yan went to the new imperial commissioner Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, in Zhongshan. With strong approval among the northern gentry, Wang Lang sent an officer to seek support from Geng Kuang. Many of his officers were prepared to agree, but Geng Kuang was not a man of that region, and his son was already established on Liu Xiu's staff. So he rejected Wang Lang's approach and sent his second son Geng Shu with horsemen to aid Liu Xiu.

Liu Xiu was soon afterwards driven away to the south and suffered a series of defeats. Despite this, however, with encouragement from Geng Yan, who had now rejoined his father, Geng Kuang sent Kou Xun to establish alliance with Peng Chong, neighbouring Administrator of Yuyang, then dispatched a force of cavalry under his assistant Jing Dan, with Kou Xun and Geng Yan, to combine with Peng Chong's officer Wu Han and the horsemen of Yuyang in support of Han. Killing hundreds of Wang Lang's appointed officials and taking more than twenty counties, they destroyed his position in the north and joined Liu Xiu at Guang'e city in Julu.

Geng Kuang was named a chief general and given title as Marquis Who Elevates Honour 興義侯; his officers likewise received appointments and nominal fiefs. By mid-summer Wang Lang was dead, the horsemen of Shanggu had played a leading role in the victory, and Geng Kuang's son Geng Yan held high rank and favour with Liu Xiu.

About this time the Gengshi Emperor sent orders to recall the Administrator of Dai commandery, Zhao Yong. Geng Kuang persuaded him not to obey, but to go instead to pay respects to Liu Xiu. As Zhao Yong was returning to his territory, his officer Zhang Ye mutinied and invited the Xiongnu and Wuhuan to support him. Liu Xiu sent Geng Shu to attack them, Zhang Ye was destroyed and Zhao Yong regained his post.

Soon afterwards the Wuxiao bandits, numbered at 200,000, came north into Shanggu. Geng Kuang and Geng Shu joined forces to put them to flight. Concerned at the alliance developing in the north since the defeat of Wang Lang, the Gengshi Emperor ordered Liu Xiu to disband his troops and return to the capital, and sent officials to replace Geng Kuang and Peng Chong in Shanggu and Yuyang. Refusing these instructions, Liu Xiu had the Gengshi general Xie Gong killed, and moved towards open war. Geng Yan, who had argued strongly for this decision, killed the two nominee administrators, and Geng Kuang continued in his office.

In 26 Peng Chong rebelled against Guangwu. He sought to renew his earlier association with Geng Kuang but, unlike Peng Chong, Geng Kuang and his family were well-established at the Han court through Geng Yan, now a chief general; Geng Kuang rejected Peng Chong's approaches and put his envoys to death. Both he and Geng Yan were nonetheless concerned that Guangwu might doubt their loyalty. Geng Yan offered to return to Luoyang, and though the emperor assured him of his confidence Geng Kuang sent another son, Geng Guo, to attend court. Delighted at this voluntary hostage, Guangwu enfeoffed Geng Kuang with a county in his homeland of Youfufeng.

In 28 Geng Kuang and Geng Shu brought troops from Shanggu to assist the imperial forces against Peng Chun, brother of Peng Chong, who had led a force of Xiongnu auxiliaries against Zhuo commandery. Peng Chun was heavily defeated.

After the death of Peng Chong in the following year, Guangwu sent the Household Counsellor Fan Hong to grant Geng Kuang the title Servant at Court, excusing him from the requirement to reside at his fief, and inviting him to return from the harsh conditions of the frontier to a more comfortable residence at the capital. Such a move, of course, made Geng Kuang a hostage himself, but it may be taken as a sign of genuine good will, for his native country was in the old capital territory. We are told that when Geng Kuang became ill the emperor paid him several visits, and when he died in 36 he was honoured with a posthumous title, while his six sons all held ranks at least as high as that of the dark ribbon 青綬, next only to the purple of the most senior officials. -HHS 19/9:703-13, 16/6:620-21; Bn 54:34, 59, 65-78, 126-130.

Geng Kui 耿夔 [Dinggong 定公]; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Guo, and a young man of spirit, Geng Kui was an acting major under Dou Xian in the great campaign of 89 against the Northern Xiongnu; he joined the senior colonel Yan Pan in the western expedition which defeated the Northern Shanyu at Jiluo Mountain. Geng Kui was then promoted to be a Commandant of Cavalry.

In 91 Dou Xian named Geng Kui as a colonel and sent him out from Juyan with eight hundred cavalry in a final attack on the Northern Shanyu. Advancing over a thousand kilometres into the Jinwei ranges, on the west of the present-day Altai Mountains in the far west of Mongolia north of Dzungaria, they drove the Shanyu to flight with just a few horsemen, and he was not seen again. They killed the Shanyu's consort the Yanzhi and over five thousand members of the leading clans, and returned with the remnants of his treasure. No Chinese army had ventured so far before, and Geng Kui was made marquis of a county. [HHS 89/79:2953 says that the Yanzhi had been captured by Geng Kui's kinsman Geng Tan the year before. One of the accounts may be mistaken, or the Shanyu may have taken another consort in the intervening months. On pronunciation of the title, see HHS 4:172 TC.]

The former Shanyu's younger brother Yuchujian now took the title and asked to surrender to Han. In 92 Geng Kui was sent to receive his submission and grant him a seal, and was named Emissary on the same lines as at the court of the Southern Shanyu. Soon afterwards, however, as Emperor He destroyed the power of Dou Xian and his family, Geng Kui was dismissed from office and stripped of his fief.

Geng Kui was later a colonel in the Northern Army, but returned to the frontier as Administrator of Wuyuan. Transferred east to Liaodong, in 105 he drove back a raid by the Mo people, killing several chieftains.

In 109, at the time of the great Qiang rebellion, a raiding party led by the Wuhuan chieftain Wuhe came into Wuyuan and defeated the commandery troops, and this was followed by a rebellion of the Southern Shanyu Tan. The general He Xi came from Luoyang, but while he prepared his forces Geng Kui was ordered to bring troops from the eastern frontier commanderies and a force of Xianbi auxiliaries into Yanmen. As the main army was further delayed, He Xi sent another two thousand men and ordered Geng Kui to advance.

As they approached the Shanyu's capital of Meiji in Xihe, Geng Kui and his men defeated a Xiongnu army three thousand strong, killing six of their chiefs and capturing quantities of baggage and vast numbers of herding animals. Disease broke out among the Xianbi horses, however, and the tribal auxiliaries departed across the frontier. Without their support Geng Kui could no longer maintain the offensive, and for this failure he was demoted to Administrator of Yunzhong. He continued to command troops against the Xiongnu in association with the General on the Liao Liang Qin, and he took part in the final campaigns of 110.

In 111 Geng Kui succeeded Liang Qin in the Trans-Liao command, but three years later he quarrelled with the Emissary Zheng Jian over their areas of responsibility. He was dismissed and sent to prison, and though he escaped execution he suffered two hundred strokes of the bastinado.

In 121 Geng Kui was again made General on the Liao, this time in the full position, which had been established for the intermediate incumbent Deng Zun. In the autumn, under their new war leader Qizhijian, Xianbi raiders attacked Shanggu, killed Cheng Yan the Administrator of Yunzhong, then entered Dai commandery and laid siege to the Protector of the Wuhuan Xu Chang. Geng Kui and the Inspector of You province, Pang Can, brought troops to break the siege.

This was only the first of many incursions from the Xianbi. To deal with them Geng Kui recruited Xiongnu who had come to the borders for refuge from the expanding power of the Xianbi, and in co-operation with the king Huyouhui he defended Chinese territory with a mobile reserve and occasional punitive raids of his own. In 122 he was obliged to repel an attack from the south by the Qiang and other non-Chinese tribes of Shang commandery; on that occasion he had auxiliaries from the Wuhuan.

Soon afterwards, in a sad but common pattern, Geng Kui was once more accused of some wrongdoing and suffered dismissal. He held no further appointments and died at home. He had been several times affected by court politics and, like other frontier generals, by the lack of understanding, let alone gratitude, of authorities at the capital. -HHS 19/9:718-

Geng Liang 耿良 or Geng Wujin 無禁; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Feng, he succeeded to his fief. In 106 he married the Princess Liu Jiuchang, sister of Emperor An, and became a Palace Attendant. -HHS 10B:457, 19/9:713, 55/45:1804.

Geng Lin 耿臨. In 169 Geng Lin was Administrator of Xuantu, where the non-Chinese people of Gaogouli had been raiding the north-eastern frontier for over twenty years. He led a punitive expedition which took several hundred heads, and Bogu the king of Gaogouli came once more to offer submission. -HHS 85/75:2815.

Geng Pu 耿溥 (d.115); Youfufeng. Son of Geng Gong, in 109 Geng Pu was a major under the command of He Xi and was sent to accompany Geng Kui and his Xianbi auxiliaries as they advanced against the rebel Shanyu Tan of the Xiongnu in Xihe.

Geng Pu then became Commandant of the Tiger Tooth Camp at Chang'an, and in 115 he was sent with a subordinate command in the army led by Sima Jun against the Qiang rebels and the renegade Du Jigong. They occupied the enemy fortress at Dingxi in northern Beidi, but when Sima Jun sent some of his troops out to collect grain, they scattered across the countryside and were cut off by the rebels and their Qiang allies. Angry that they had failed to follow his orders, Sima Jun stayed in the city and refused to send assistance. The Chinese lost over three thousand men.

It appears that Geng Pu died in the debacle, but he was not one of the commanders who were detached and cut off, and he was not held responsible; his family connections no doubt had influence. His sons Hong and Ye were made gentlemen cadets. -HHS 19/9:719, 724, 87/77:2889; deC 84:107-108.

Geng Shou 耿援 see Geng Yuan 耿援.

Geng Shu 耿舒; Youfufeng. Second son of the Administrator of Shanggu Geng Kuang, and younger brother of Geng Yan, in 24 he was sent by his father to Ji city near present-day Beijing, leading a troop of horsemen to reinforce Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu but then commissioner of the Gengshi Emperor in the northeast. About this time the Gengshi Emperor recalled the Administrator of Dai commandery Zhao Yong, but Geng Kuang persuaded him to go instead to pay respects to Liu Xiu. Zhao Yong was endorsed in his office, but as he was returning to his territory his officer Zhang Ye led a mutiny and invited the Xiongnu and Wuhuan to support him. Liu Xiu named Geng Shu as a general and sent him to deal with the matter. He destroyed Zhang Ye and re-established Zhao Yong in his post.

Soon afterwards the Wuxiao bandits, numbered at over 200,000, came north into Shanggu territory. Joining his forces to the commandery troops under Geng Kuang, Geng Shu attacked the invaders and put them to flight. Though his father sent an army under Geng Yan to aid Liu Xiu, Geng Shu stayed in the north, and in 28 he made a successful flank attack on the Xiongnu allies commanded by Peng Chun, brother of the rebel Peng Chong. Two enemy chieftains were killed, and Geng Kuang then joined Geng Shu in a drive against Peng Chong's position from the west. In the following year Peng Chong was destroyed and Geng Shu was enfeoffed as a county marquis.

We are not told anything specific about Geng Shu's military activities over the next twenty years, but in 49 he was one of four Generals of the Household under the command of Ma Yuan which was sent against the non-Chinese of the Five Streams. In the previous year these people of the hills to the west of Wuling commandery had destroyed the imperial general Liu Shang and his army. In preliminary planning for the campaign, Geng Shu urged an approach by the longer land route, north of the Dongting Lake. Ma Yuan, however, preferred a more direct route to the south although it was known there could be difficulties in bringing supplies up and across the rivers. Ma Yuan's plan was endorsed by the emperor, but after initial success the army halted at Hutou mountain and stayed there for seven months across the summer.

At this point Geng Shu wrote to his brother Geng Yan, a confidant of Emperor Guangwu, criticising Ma Yuan's conduct of the campaign. He claimed that his own plan had been far superior, and that Ma Yuan was bogged down and unable to proceed. Geng Yan reported these comments to the throne, and the emperor sent Liang Song to investigate. By the time he arrived, Ma Yuan's strategy had proved successful: he himself was dead, but the tribesmen had surrendered to his deputy Zong Kun. As Bielenstein observes, Geng Shu's complaints may have been partly based upon disagreement of strategy, but they were also a manoeuvre in court politics. The Geng were supporters of the Dou faction led by Dou Rong, who were rivals to the Ma, and the impeachment of Ma Yuan which followed Geng Shu's accusations, including charges of corruption and embezzlement, brought the eclipse of the Ma. -HHS 19/9:705-08, 24/14:843-45; Bn 67:70-72, Bn 79:112.

Geng Shu 耿叔 (d.141?); Youfufeng? Presumably a member of the great Geng clan, in 140 Geng Shu was second in command to Ma Xian in the great army assembled about Chang'an to deal with the second great Qiang rebellion. Ma Xian was killed in battle in the following year; Geng Shu may have been with him, for he is not mentioned again. -HHS 87/77:2895.

Geng Su 耿宿; Julu. A cousin of Geng Chun, in 24 Geng Su joined his kinsmen in rejecting the usurper Wang Lang and bringing household troops to support Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu who was commissioner in the north for the Gengshi regime. Geng Su and his cousins Geng Xin and Geng Zhi were appointed lieutenant-generals, and with Geng Chun they persuaded the people of their home town of Songzi to surrender. Soon afterwards, still uneasy about the loyalty of his kinsmen, Geng Chun sent Geng Su and Geng Xin to burn their former homes as guarantee of their commitment to the Han cause.

Geng Su was later Administrator of Dai commandery and received a district fief. -HHS 21/11:762-65.

Geng Tan 耿譚; Youfufeng. A member of the Geng clan, he was an acting major under Dou Xian in the great campaign of 89 against the Northern Xiongnu; he accompanied the senior colonel Yan Pan in the expedition to the northwest which defeated the Northern Shanyu at Jiluo Mountain and pursued him into the Altai ranges. He was then named Emissary to the court of the Southern Shanyu Tuntuhe.

Though the Northern Shanyu had asked to surrender, eight thousand cavalry of the Southern Xiongnu under the chieftain Shizi went to attack his headquarters in the spring of 90, and Geng Tan sent a contingent of Chinese to support them. Taken by surprise, the Northern Shanyu was wounded and barely escaped with his life, while the Chinese and their allies, having killed eight thousand of his followers, seized his seal and treasury, his consort the Yanzhi and five of his children, and several thousand of his subjects. In the following year, 91, Geng Tan's cousin Geng Kui made a final attack on the Northern Shanyu and drove him away forever.

So great was the number of those who surrendered or were taken that Geng Tan requested an increase in the senior staff of the Emissary's office from two to twelve, in order that the new subjects of the Southern Shanyu might be properly supervised. For the time being, however, the court did not grant the Southern regime authority over all the Xiongnu; instead the former leader's younger brother Yuchujian was named Shanyu in his place, while Ren Shang was named Emissary to the new Northern court.

In 98, after a fierce battle against the Qiang leader Mitang in Longxi had left the imperial forces too exhausted to follow up their success, Geng Tan and Wang Xin were sent to replace the commanders Liu Shang and Zhao Tai. They set themselves in garrisons on the upper reaches of the Yellow River, and offered rewards to those of the enemy who came to submit. Mitang, concerned at the loss of his followers, came himself to surrender; he was sent to Luoyang to pay homage and then resettled beyond the frontier. Wang Xin and Geng Tan disbanded their troops.

Two years later, however, Mitang led another attack; Wang Xin, Geng Tan and the Protector Wu Zhi were all dismissed. -HHS 23/13:814, 89/79:2953, 87/77:2884; deC 84:81, 271-272.

Geng Xi 耿襲; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Shu, he succeeded to his fief. He married the Princess Liu Ying, daughter of Emperor Ming. -HHS 19/9:714.

Geng Xi 耿歛; Julu. Kinsman of Geng Fu, in 71 he was found guilty of having conspired with him and with Yan Zhong, associate of Liu Ying, King of Chu. This was part of Emperor Ming's purge of anyone suspected of involvement in Liu Ying's alleged conspiracy. Geng Fu's fief was abolished, but nothing is recorded of the fate of Geng Xi. -HHS 21/11:765.

Geng Xi 耿喜; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Wenjin, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 19/9:713.

Geng Xian 耿顯; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Xi 喜,

Geng Xian succeeded to his fief. He became an officer in the corps of imperial guards of the Feathered Forest. -HHS 19/9:713.

Geng Xie 耿協; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Liang and the Princess Liu Jiuzhang, sister of Emperor An, Geng Xie succeeded to his father's fief. -HHS 10B:457, 19/9:713.

Geng Xin 耿訢 (d.26); Julu. A cousin of Geng Chun, when Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in the winter of 23/24 Geng Xin joined him and other kinsmen in rejecting the usurper and bringing their households to support Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, at that time commissioner in the north for the Gengshi Emperor. Geng Xin and his cousins Geng Su and Geng Zhi were appointed lieutenant-generals, and with Geng Chun they persuaded their home town Songzi to surrender. Soon afterwards, still uneasy about the loyalty of his kinsmen, Geng Chun sent Geng Xin and Geng Su to burn their former homes as guarantee of their commitment to the Han cause.

Named a general against the Red Eyebrows and enfeoffed as a marquis, Geng Xin went under Deng Yu's command to the west. In 26, when Liu Jia came to surrender, Deng Yu executed his officer Li Bao for discourtesy. Li Bao's younger brother then attacked Deng Yu, and Geng Xin died in the skirmish. -HHS 21/11:762-65, 16/6:604.

Geng Xing 耿行, the Lady; Ba. The Lady was a concubine of Geng Bing. -HYZ 12:222.

Geng Xu 耿盱/盱; Julu. Geng Xu's father Geng Fu had been dismissed from his district fief because of an alleged intrigue; the accusation was evidently based upon Emperor Ming's purge of all those connected to Liu Ying, King of Chu. In 77, in recognition of the good service of Geng Fu's father Geng Chun, and as part of the program of restoration after the previous excesses, Emperor Zhang restored the fief as a village marquisate. Geng Xu died without children, but the honour was passed to his younger brother Teng. -HHS 21/11:765.

Geng Xun 耿勳 [Bowe 伯瑋]; Youfufeng. Sent to the capital as Reporting Officer, Geng Xun impressed the emperor. He was appointed a gentleman cadet and then became commandery Assistant in Shangdang. Soon after he took up appointment as Administrator of Wudu in 173 there was a period of excessive rain and massive flooding. Geng Xun visited the affected regions, opened the granaries and provided clothing for those bereft. In the following year his good work was honoured with a stele. -LX 11:2b-4b, Nagata 94:210.

Geng Yan 耿弇 [Bozhao 伯昭 also as Zhaobo 伯昭] (3-58); Youfufeng. Eldest son of Geng Kuang, when Geng Yan was young he followed his father's tradition of scholarship in the Poetry and the Ritual. At the same time, he was fascinated by the cavalry exercises in Shanggu commandery, where Geng Kuang held office as Administrator, and in the signals given by flags and drums. He became an expert rider and archer, and a keen student of military matters.

After the fall of Wang Mang and the establishment of the Gengshi Emperor, all local and provincial leaders were in a state of uncertainty. Geng Kuang was anxious about his own position, for he had been appointed to his office by Wang Mang and the commissioner Han Hong had confirmed him only reluctantly and under duress. Geng Yan encouraged his father to commit himself to Han, and at the age of twenty-one he was sent on a tribute mission to the new imperial court.

As the party was travelling through Julu, the pretender Wang Lang proclaimed his rebellion in Zhao. Two of Geng Yan's officers, Sun Cang and Wei Bao, men of the north, proposed to join Wang Lang, and though Geng Yan threatened them with a sword they went over to the rebels. Perhaps fortunate to escape with his life, Geng Yan abandoned the idea of going to the capital and turned to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was now regional commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor with headquarters in Zhongshan. Liu Xiu appointed Geng Yan to his personal staff, and admired his energy and initiative.

Soon afterwards the expansion of Wang Lang's power drove Liu Xiu north to Ji city in Guangyang, by present-day Beijing and close to Shanggu. Geng Yan had his father make contact, and Geng Kuang sent his younger son Shu with horsemen to reinforce Liu Xiu. As Wang Lang's army approached, however, rioting broke out in the city and the imperialists were forced to leave: Liu Xiu and the bulk of his party fled south, while Geng Yan was sent north to seek assistance. He had urged Liu Xiu to take advantage of the support from his own family and from Peng Chong, a fellow-countryman from Nanyang who was now Administrator of Yuyang, and he developed that alliance. Geng Kuang sent a force of cavalry under Jing Dan, aided by Kou Xun and Geng Yan. Joining Peng Chong's officer Wu Han and the horsemen of Yuyang, they destroyed Wang Lang's position in the north, killing hundreds of in Ji province the officials he had appointed and taking over twenty counties; they then went forward to join Liu Xiu in Julu. Their enterprise turned the tide, and by mid-summer Wang Lang was dead. Geng Yan gained high rank and favour under Liu Xiu.

Concerned at the alliance which was developing in the north after the defeat of Wang Lang, the Gengshi Emperor awarded Liu Xiu a royal title but also ordered him to disband his troops and return to the capital. It is said that as Guangwu was retiring to bed one evening at the palace in Handan, Geng Yan came to his apartments, urging him to declare independence and seek the imperial throne. This indeed was what Liu Xiu decided. He appointed Geng Yan a general, and sent him north with Wu Han to gather troops. Geng Yan killed Wei Shun and Cai Chong, officers of the Gengshi Emperor who had been sent to replace Geng Kuang and Peng Chong in Shanggu and Yuyang.

With the north secure, Geng Yan took a leading role in the campaigns against the Red Eyebrows and other bandit groups of the northern plain. His men were recognised as an elite force, constantly in the van. On one occasion, when there was sickness in the army in Zhuo commandery the imperial forces were defeated and forced to take refuge behind a palisade, but Geng Yan came to the rescue and his counter-attack brought decisive victory.

As Liu Xiu took the imperial title in the autumn of 25, he named Geng Yan as a chief general and sent him with Jing Dan to seize the Ao Granary in Henan. Forcing the surrender of the warlord Liu Mao and defeating his troops, they opened the way towards Luoyang and Chang'an.

In 26 Geng Yan was granted a fief in Youfufeng with revenue from two counties. He accompanied Cen Peng in unsuccessful operations against Dong Xin and Deng Feng in Nanyang, but early in 27 returned north to join Wu Han in a final attack on a remnant group of the Green Calf bandits north of the Yellow River. Returning to Nanyang with Guangwu and the main army in the summer, he took part in the final campaign against Deng Feng and successfully argued for his execution. He was then sent south to deal with the renegade Yan Cen and the local leader Du Hong. He defeated the rebels with heavy losses, captured numbers of their senior officers with insignia, and forced Du Hong to surrender.

At the end of 27 Geng Yan accompanied the imperial cortège for the visit to Guangwu's home commandery of Nanyang, then sought permission to return to the north. In an ambitious strategy, he planned to raise further levies in Shanggu, deal with the rebels Peng Chong and Zhang Feng in Yuyang and Zhuo commanderies, settle the Fuping and Huosuo bandits in the North China plain, then attack Zhang Bu in the southeast. At the beginning of 28 this plan was approved, but Geng Yan did not receive such a leading role as he had sought. Guangwu does not appear to have had any real concern over Geng Yan's loyalty, but Geng Kuang was anxious there might later be some suspicion of the family, with all male members in the north, and he insisted that Geng Yan's younger brother Guo be sent to court as a goodwill hostage.

As imperial forces under Zhai Cun reconquered Zhuo commandery and moved against Yuyang, Geng Kuang and Geng Yan's younger brother Shu gained success against Peng Chong's brother Chun and his Xiongnu auxiliaries, and in the following year Peng Chong was dead. Geng Yan played little part in these operations, but was sent with Wang Chang, under the overall command of Wu Han, to mop up bandit groups in Pingyuan.

Early in 29 Geng Yan was given independent command against the warlord Zhang Pu, whose territory lay immediately to the south across the Yellow River. It is said that forty thousand former bandits had surrendered, and Geng Yan took them into his army and organised them into formal military units. He then crossed the River east into Ji'nan. Zhang Bu sent his general Fei Yi to oppose him, with a series of posts to threaten his advance from the south. Geng Yan turned to capture the westernmost of these, Zhu'a in Pingyuan, then began to roll up the enemy line. Fei Yi faced him at Lixia in Ji'nan and sent his brother Fei Gan to hold the neighbouring village of Juli. Having made ostentatious preparations against Juli, Geng Yan announced a date for his attack. Deserters took the news to Fei Yi, but as he marched to the relief Geng Yan left a small force to hold the siege lines and took his main army to surprise the enemy columns. He gained a complete victory, Fei Yi was killed, and when Geng Yan showed the heads and other trophies Fei Gan and his men abandoned Juli and fled back to Zhang Bu.

Forcing the surrender of over forty garrisons, Geng

Yan consolidated his position in Ji'nan, and in the winter of 29 he resumed the advance on Zhang Bu, whose capital was at Ju in Zichuan [capital of Beihai under Later Han]. Zhang Bu sent his brother Zhang Lan to hold Xi'an in Qi. Geng Yan prepared to attack this post, but then switched to storm the city of Linzi. Zhang Lan, now isolated, withdrew his men.

As Geng Yan awaited the counter-attack, Zhang Bu came against him with the combined forces of his three younger brothers and auxiliaries from former bandit groups; the whole army was numbered at 200,000. They met in the open ground east of the city, but on the first day Geng Yan allowed himself to be driven back by the bandit leader Zhong Yi in order to entice the enemy into the network of fortifications. As the enemy troops engaged his subordinate commander Liu Xin, Geng Yan watched from the walls of the royal palace, then charged them in the flank. He was wounded in the thigh by a flying arrow, but cut it out with his own sword and none of his companions knew of it.

At sunset both sides withdrew, and his officer Chen Jun urged Geng Yan to wait for the imperial army under Guangwu, which was approaching from Lu. Geng Yan remarked that the duty of a subject was to welcome his ruler with a feast, not with a request for help, and urged his men back into battle. Again they fought all day, with heavy casualties on both sides, and the drainage channels of the city were filled with bodies. Realising Zhang Bu was preparing to withdraw, Geng Yan placed men on the flanks of his retreat, and they took the enemy completely by surprise. The retreat turned into a rout, and Geng Yan maintained the pursuit for several kilometres, capturing two thousand carts of Zhang Bu's baggage train. Zhang Bu's army was scattered and he took refuge in Ju city.

When the emperor came to Linzi he issued an edict praising Geng Yan's strategy and comparing him to the great general Han Xin 韓信 of Former Han. Geng Yan advanced again, and Zhang Bu now abandoned Ju and retreated into Beihai. Killing his former ally Su Mao, he came with his brothers to surrender, stripped to the waist and carrying an axe for execution. Geng Yan had the enemy troops arrange themselves under the banners of their home commanderies and divided the baggage amongst them before sending them home. He then completed the conquest of the eastern plain by forcing the surrender of the remnant Wuxiao bandits in Chengyang.

In the following year, 30, Geng Yan commanded a division in Youfufeng against Wei Ao. He took part in the advance of Guangwu's army up the Long Slope in 32, and as Guangwu withdrew to deal with rebellion in the east Geng Yan, He Yan and Cen Peng were left to besiege Wei Ao at Xi city in Longxi. In the winter Wei Ao's general Wang Yuan came with reinforcements from Gongsun Shu, broke the siege and rescued Wei Ao; the imperial forces were compelled to withdraw.

After Wei Ao's death in the following year, Geng Yan joined Lai Xi for mopping-up operations in Anding and Beidi; he had now been responsible for the settlement of forty-six commanderies and had taken more than three hundred cities. In 37 his fief was increased, and though he resigned as a chief general he was granted title as Servant at Court, excusing him from the requirement to reside outside the capital. He was regularly consulted on questions from all parts of the empire.

In 49 Geng Yan sponsored the criticism of his brother Geng Shu against Ma Yuan's strategy to deal with the non-Chinese people of Wuling commandery; Ma Yuan was posthumously disgraced and his clan fell into eclipse.

At his death in 58 Geng Yan was granted posthumous honours, and when Emperor Ming had portraits of his father's great servants painted on the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang, Geng Yan was among those honoured. -HHS 19/9:703-13*, 17/7:656-57, XC 1:3b; Bn 59:65-76, 72-78, 147-149, Bn 76:26, Bn 79: 82.

Geng Ye 耿暉 [Jiyu 季遇 or Jiguo 季過]; Youfufeng. Son of Geng Pu, after his father's death in 115 Geng Ye was made a gentleman cadet.

Early in the reign of Emperor Shun Geng Ye was appointed Protector of the Wuhuan. This post also entailed responsibility for the Xianbi tribes, currently under the leadership of Qizhijian, who attacked Dai commandery in the autumn of 126 and killed the Administrator Li Chao. With levies from the frontier commanderies, troops from the Southern Xiongnu and Wuhuan auxiliaries led by Fushuguan and Rongzhuhui, Geng Ye was engaged against the Xianbi for several years, with operations on both sides of the frontier, until enemy raiding petered out following the death of Qizhijian about 134. During the course of these operations, to develop further the network of alliances with the Wuhuan against the raiders, Geng

Ye moved his headquarters as Protector from Ning city in Shanggu east into Liaodong. He was admired for his personal authority in the north, and towards the end of the fighting he received the surrender of large numbers of Xianbi along the eastern part of the frontier.

In 133 Geng Ye was transferred to be General on the Liao, stationed in Wuyuan with primary responsibility for the Xiongnu. His loyal associate among the Wuhuan, Rongzhuhui, had now left the scene, and in the winter of 135/136 a group of those former allies raided Yunzhong and plundered merchants on the roads. Geng Ye led two thousand men to deal with the incursion, but after one successful skirmish he was besieged in a small fortress close to the frontier. A relief force came swiftly, and the enemy withdrew, but the incident marked an unwelcome change from the useful allegiance of the Wuhuan which he had maintained for so long in former years.

In 136 Geng Ye left the Trans-Liao command on account of ill health. -HHS 19/9:724, 89/79:2960; deC 84:303, 391-392.

Geng Zhi 耿植; Julu. A cousin of Geng Chun, in 24 he joined his kinsmen in rejecting the usurper Wang Lang and bringing household troops to join Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu who was at that time commissioner in the north for the Gengshi regime. Geng Zhi and his cousins Geng Xin and Geng Su were appointed as lieutenant-generals, and with Geng Chun they persuaded their home town of Songzi to surrender.

When Geng Chun was wounded in fighting against Wang Lang, he recommended Geng Zhi to command his troop, and so Geng Zhi served as his deputy. He was later made a general, and in 26 he joined Cen Peng in unsuccessful operations against the rebels Dong Xin and Deng Feng in Nanyang.

In 28 Geng Zhi took over from Cen Peng and accompanied Zhu You south against the warlord Qin Feng in Nan commandery. They defeated and killed

Qin Feng's general Zhang Kang, and in the summer of 29, after a siege of eighteen months, they obtained the surrender of Qin Feng. Geng Zhi received a county fief in Xindu. -HHS 21/11:762-65, 22/12:770.

Gong 宮 (d.121) of Gaogouli [Koguryo]. Later known as Ancestor of the Realm 國祖王, Gong became king of Gaogouli about 100. He may have been the founding ruler of the house of Kyerubu 桂婁部, which replaced the original royal clan of Yonnobu 涓奴部 about this time. It was said that as soon as Gong was born his eyes opened and he was able to see; his people admired this.

When Gong grew to manhood he was strong and brave, and led many raids against the Chinese frontiers, breaking the period of peace which had held since the time of Guangwu and the pacification achieved by Zhai Tong. The first attack with which Gong is identified was in the spring of 105, when he plundered six counties in Liaodong. The Administrator Geng Kui, however, defeated the raiders and killed a number of their leaders. A few years later, in 109, Gong sent messengers to bring tribute, and asked to be subordinated to Xuantu commandery, presumably in some form of dependent state.

In 118 he again led his men, with associated Hui and Mo people, on a raid against Xuantu, and he also attacked Lelang to the south. As a result of his incursions the capital of Xuantu was withdrawn to the west.

In the spring of 121 the Inspector of You province Feng Huan led the administrators of Xuantu and Liaodong, Yao Guang and Cai Feng, in a punitive expedition across the frontier. They caught and killed several chieftains and seized weapons, horses and treasure. Gong sent his Heir Suicheng in a pretended surrender, and Yao Guang believed him. The enemy then occupied strong positions while sending infiltrators into Chinese territory, burning settlements and killing or wounding two thousand people. Reinforcements were brought from as far as Zhuo and Yuyang on the North China plain, but by the time they arrived the raiders had gone.

It appears that the Chinese now suffered internal divisions, and in the summer, with support from Xianbi to the north, Gong attacked Liaodong, heavily defeating the local troops and killing the Administrator Cai Feng. In the autumn he turned against Xuantu, this time with allies from the Hui and Mo and from among the Mahan people of south-western Korea, and he brought several thousand horsemen to besiege the capital. In the winter the king of Fuyu, north of Gaogouli, sent his Heir Weiqutai with over twenty thousand men to aid the Chinese with a counter-attack, and at the beginning of 122 the siege was lifted and five hundred of the raiders were killed.

At some stage during these operations Gong died. Advised by Chen Zhong, Emperor An refused to authorise an attack on the enemy during their period of mourning, but sent condolences instead, and in the following year Gong's successor Suicheng made a genuine, albeit well-rewarded, surrender. -HHS 85/75: 2814-15; Gardiner 69A:30-32, 69B:161-162.

Gongsha Fan 公沙樊 [Yiqi 義起]; Beihai. Gongsha Fan was one of five sons of Gongsha Mu, all known as excellent scholars. -HHSJJ 82/72B:3005 Shen Qinhan citing Qunfu lu.

Gongsha Fu 公沙孚 [Yunci 允慈]; Beihai. Son of Gongsha Mu, Gongsha Fu was known as an excellent scholar. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he joined the Imperial Secretariat, served as a magistrate in Runan, and became Administrator of Shanggu. -HHS 82/72B: 2731, XC 6:7a.

Gongsha Ke 公沙恪 [Yunrang 允讓]; Beihai. Gongsha Ke was one of five sons of Gongsha Mu, all known as excellent scholars. -HHSJJ 82/72B:3005 Shen Qinhan citing Qunfu lu.

Gongsha Kui 公沙逵 [Yize 義則]; Beihai. Gongsha Kui was one of five sons of Gongsha Mu, all known as excellent scholars. -HHSJJ 82/72B:3005 Shen Qinhan citing Qunfu lu.

Gongsha Lu 公沙盧; Beihai. Head of a powerful clan in the early 190s, Gongsha Lu defied local authority, but the county magistrate Wang Xiu brought a small posse to kill him and several of his brothers. -SGZ 11:345.

Gongsha Mu 公沙穆 [Wenyi 文义]; Beihai. Born to a humble family, Gongsha Mu took no interest in childish games when he was young, but studied the classics and divination by the trigrams and by the calendar. He attended the University at Luoyang, studying the Han version of Poetry and the Gongyang commentary to Zuo zhuan, and he became a close friend of Wu You.

He later lived as a hermit in the hills of the Shandong peninsula, rejecting the fortune offered him by the wealthy Wang Zhong. On one occasion he claimed to have preserved himself from demons by reciting the Confucian classics and, in a more mundane fashion, when one of his pigs was sold but turned out to be ill he refused the money because his agent had failed to tell the purchaser of its condition.

Gongsha Mu was later nominated Filial and Incorrupt, certified First Class, became a senior assistant to the Minister of the Household and was then magistrate of a county fief in Langye. The marquis Liu Chang, a descendant of Liu Qiang, King of Donglai, was a man of unlawful and immoral conduct, who had dismissed his senior wife and replaced her with one of his concubines. As soon as he arrived, Gongsha Mu criticised Liu Chang for his bad reputation, forced him to restore his former wife to her rightful position, to remove his concubine's son from the succession, and to give back the public and private farmland he had seized. Gongsha Mu also arrested and tortured those retainers and slaves of the household who had offended the law. Liu Chang, weeping, asked pardon for his wrong-doing, and he accepted Gongsha Mu's instructions thereafter.

Gongsha Mu was later magistrate in the capital of Hongnong when a plague of caterpillar moths appeared. Gongsha Mu raised an altar and offered to take upon himself the faults of the people. Heavy rain fell, and when it ceased the pests were gone. The people praised his spiritual wisdom.

In 155 there were great floods on the Wei and the Yellow River, but through his skill in divination Gongsha Mu foresaw the danger. He warned his people to take refuge on high ground, and they largely escaped the disaster.

Transferred to be Commandant of the Dependent State of Liaodong, Gongsha Mu again won the hearts of the people by fine administration. He died in office there at the age of sixty-six. Gongsha Mu's five sons were celebrated at the capital as "five dragons" 五龍, of unmatched ability. -HHS 82/72B:2730-31*, XC 6: 6b-7a; Ngo 76:109-111, DeWoskin 83:68-70.

Gongsha Shao 公沙紹 [Ziqi 子起]; Beihai. Gongsha Shao was one of the five sons of Gongsha Mu, all known as excellent scholars. -HHSJJ 82/72B:3005 Shen Qinhan citing Qunfu lu.

Gongsheng 公乘 [surname] see Gongcheng 公乘 passim.

Gongsun 公孫, the Lady; Youfufeng. Younger sister of Gongsun Shu, about 30 she married Yan Cen. -HYGZ 5:69; Bn 59:191.

Gongsun Bao 公孫豹. Son of Gongsun Yu 域/域, he died about 168 at the age of eighteen. -SGZ 8:252.

Gongsun Bao 公孫豹: childhood name of Gongsun Du q.v. -SGZ 8:252.

Gongsun Binjiu 公孫賓就 see Gongbin Jiu 公賓就.

Gongsun [Boda] 公孫伯達. Gentlemen from the region about Chang'an, Gongsun Boda, Wei Biao and Wei Zhongda were celebrated scholars; the local people referred to them as the three "intelligent ones" 三達, from the common character in their styles.

Gongsun Boda became Administrator of Shang-dang. -HHSJJ 26/16:970 Hui Dong quoting Sanfu jue.

Gongsun Chen 公孫臣 see Shentu Chen 申屠臣.

Gongsun Dan 公孫丹; Beihai. Leader of a great clan, Gongsun Dan held a senior clerical position in the offices of the state. About 30 Gongsun Dan built himself a new house, but a diviner foretold there would be a death there, so Gongsun Dan had his son kill a man passing by on the road. The Chancellor Dong Xuan executed both the father and the son, and when thirty of their kinsmen and followers rioted in protest he had them arrested and killed as well. -HHS 77/67:2489.

Gongsun Du 公孫度 [Shengji 升濟] (d.204); Liaodong>Xuantu. Son of Gongsun Yan, who had migrated to Xuantu from Liaodong, Gongsun Du held a junior post in Xuantu, but was then adopted by the Administrator Gongsun Yu, whose son Bao 豹 had died young: Gongsun Du's childhood name was also Bao 豹, and he was the same age. Gongsun Yu arranged for Gongsun Du's marriage and further education.

In 169 Gongsun Du was nominated as Knowing the Way. He came to court, responded to questions and was appointed a gentleman cadet, then joined the Imperial Secretariat. He became Inspector of Ji province, but left on account of popular complaint and evidently held no office for some time.

In 189 Gongsun Du was recommended by Dong Zhuo's lieutenant Xu Rong, who also came from Xuantu, and Dong Zhuo named him Administrator of Liaodong. Though gentlemen of Liaodong had looked down upon him as a man from the frontier, Gongsun Du swiftly established his authority, killing several men of family, then expanded against Koguryo and the Wuhuan. He dominated the northeast from southern Manchuria to Liaoxi, and for a time also held position on the north of the Shandong peninsula. Styling himself Marquis of Liaodong and Governor of a new Ping 平 province, he ruled independently, found auspicious omens and prophecies and usurped imperial ceremonial and regalia.

In 204 Cao Cao named Gongsun Du a general and marquis of a district: the latter title Gongsun Du naturally despised; he stored the insignia in his arsenal. He died that year and was succeeded by his son Kang. -SGZ 8:252-53*, HHS 74/64B:2418-19*; Gardiner 72A, Mather 76:543, deC 96:58-61.

Gongsun Fan 公孫範; Liaoxi. A cousin of Gongsun

Zan, in 191 he was named Administrator of Bohai by Yuan Shao to hold the territory against him. Gongsun Fan, however, went over to Gongsun Zan. -HHS 73/63:2362, SGZ 8:242.

Gongsun Fang 公孫方 or Gongsun Yu 育. A fellow-student under Zheng Xuan, Gongsun Fang was a friend of Cui Yan. He died young and Cui Yan cared for his children. -SGZ 12:367, 370.

Gongsun Gong 公孫恭; Xuantu. Younger son of the warlord Gongsun Du, Gongsun Gong became regent of their north-eastern state about 220, following the death of his elder brother Kang, whose children were too young to rule. He maintained his independence, but he accepted titles as a general and enfeoffment as a marquis from Cao Pi.

Gongsun Gong suffered an illness which made him impotent and incapable, and his government was weak. He was forcibly replaced by his nephew Gongsun Yuan in 228, but survived the fall of the state in 238. -SGZ 8:253; Gardiner 72B.

Gongsun Guang 公孫光 or Gongsun Huang 晃 (d.36); Youfufeng. When Gongsun Shu took the imperial title in 25 he appointed his younger brother Gongsun Guang as Grand Marshal, but in 29 the office was awarded to Yan Cen, a soldier of fortune newly come from the east. Bielenstein notes that HYGZ 5 has Guang's brother Hui as Grand Commandant in 25, and equates that post to Grand Marshal; he therefore argues that Gongsun Guang should have held some other, unidentified, office. Grand Commandant and Grand Marshal may have been distinct appointments under Gongsun Shu, however, so the information is not necessarily contradictory.

In 30 the officer Jing Han urged Gongsun Shu to adopt an aggressive strategy, sending Yan Cen north to the Wei valley and Tian Rong east into the middle Yangzi. By this means he would confirm the allegiance of Wei Ao and threaten Emperor Guangwu of Han from two directions. Yan Cen and Tuan Rong were eager for the project, but many local officials considered the distant venture too risky, and Gongsun Guang, perhaps influenced by his displacement from the office of Grand Marshal, led the opposition. No action was taken.

Gongsun Guang was killed when Chengdu fell in 36. -HHS 13/3:539-40 [as Guang 光], 100/10:3221 [as Huang 晃]; Bn 59:107, 186-187.

Gongsun Hong 公孫弘/宏. An Assistant Officer of You province about 70, Gongsun Hong was in correspondence with Liu Ying the King of Chu. The Excellency Yu Yan planned to invite him to office, but when he learned of his connection to the king he proceeded no further. In 71, as Liu Ying was accused of plotting treason, Gongsun Hong was arrested and killed; despite his earlier caution Yu Yan was implicated by association. -HHS 33/23:1154.

Gongsun Huang 公孫晃 see Gongsun Guang 公孫光.

Gongsun Huang 公孫晃 (d.238); Xuantu. Elder son of Gongsun Kang, he was considered too young to rule the warlord state when his father died. The regency was taken by Gongsun Gong, who sent Huang as a hostage to Wei. After his brother Yuan succeeded to power in the northeast in 228, Gongsun Huang warned the Wei court of the likelihood of war, but after hostilities had broken out in 237 he and his children were killed. -SGZ 8:261; Gardiner 72B:178-179.

Gongsun Hui 公孫灰 (d.36); Youfufeng. In 24 the Gengshi Emperor sent his officers Li Bao and Zhang Zhong, the latter named as Inspector, to take over in Yi province. The local warlord Gongsun Shu sent his younger brother Hui, who defeated them as they approached Chengdu and drove them north into Hanzhong.

When Gongsun Shu took the imperial title in the following year he appointed Hui as an Excellency. HHS 13/3 says that he was Excellency of Works, but HYGZ 5 has him as Grand Commandant. Given the order of the titles in HYGZ, Excellency of Works appears more likely, but in that case he was later replaced by Ren Man. See also sub Gongsun Guang.

In the summer of 35, as Cen Peng advanced up the Yangzi, Gongsun Hui was sent with Yan Cen and others to guard the approaches to Chengdu along the Fu River in Guanghan. A few months later Yan Cen was heavily defeated by the Han general Zang Gong, and Gongsun Hui withdrew northeast to Fu county. He was destroyed there in the autumn of 36 [HHJ 6:72 says he was killed at the time of the defeat in Guanghan in the previous year]. -HHS 13/3:534-35, 542, HYGZ 5:68; Bn 59:86, 107, 191-196.

Gongsun Ji 公孫紀; Liaoxi? A local officer under Liu Yu, he was well-treated by Gongsun Zan because they had the same surname. As Liu Yu was planning to attack Gongsun Zan in 193, Gongsun Ji went to warn him. -HHS 73/63:2356.

Gongsun Ju 公孫舉 (d.156). A leader of bandits in the region of Mount Tai, by 155 he and Dongguo Dou had acquired a force of thirty thousand men. Ravaging Taishan and Langye, they extended their depredations over Qing, Yan and Xu provinces.

In 156 Duan Jiong attacked them, destroyed their army and executed the leaders. -HHS 7:300-02, 65/55:2145-46. HHS 38/28:1286 refers to Gongsun Ju in 160, but this is a mistake for the later bandit Shusun Wuji.

Gongsun Kang 公孫康; Xuantu. Elder son of the local warlord Gongsun Du, Gongsun Kang succeeded his father in 204. He initially sought to establish suzerainty over the Wuhuan, but after Cao Cao's victory at White Wolf Mountain in 207 he received Yuan Shang and Yuan Xi, with Louban, Supuyan and other Wuhuan leaders, then killed them and sent the heads to Cao Cao.

Though he acknowledged the nominal suzerainty of the Han court under Cao Cao, Gongsun Kang remained an independent warlord. He later took advantage of a succession struggle in Koguryo to extend his power into present-day Korea, restoring Lelang, setting up the new commandery of Daifang about present-day Seoul, and restoring communication with the south of the peninsula and with Japan. He probably died about 220. -SGZ 8:253*, Gardiner 72A.

Gongsun Mo 公孫模 or Gongsun Mu; Liaodong? About 210, after the north-eastern warlord Gongsun Kang had defeated Gaogouli and taken some of its territory [see sub Yiyimo], he sent his officers Gongsun Mo and Zhang Chang south down the coast of Korea to restore Chinese control of the region of Lelang. They gathered sufficient support among remnant settlers to defeat the local non-Chinese and establish a new commandery, Daifang, at the estuary of the Han River near present-day Seoul. -SGZ 30:851; Gardiner 72A: 89-90.

Gongsun Pu 公孫輔 (d.121); Liaodong. A local officer in the commandery, in the summer of 121 Gongsun Pu accompanied the Administrator Cai Feng in an attempt to deal with a major raid from Gougouli [Koguryo], supported by Xianbi from the north. As their troops were defeated Gongsun Pu and his colleagues Geng Hao and Long Duan tried to shield their master Cai Feng, but all of them were killed. -HHS 85/75:2814-15.

Gongsun Qing 公孫慶. Administrator of Nanyang about 160, Gongsun Qing nominated his clerk Liu Zu as Filial and Incorrupt. -FSTY 5:39-40.

Gongsun Shou 公孫守; Youfufeng. During the troubled period of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the invasion of the Red Eyebrows, Gongsun Shou became warlord in his home county of Changling. He and other local leaders in the old capital district were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu. Gongsun Shou was presumably related to Gongsun Shu, but though they came from the same commandery they did not come from the same county.

In 27 Gongsun Shou and his colleagues were conquered by Emperor Guangwu's general Feng Yi. -HHS 17/7:647.

Gongsun Shu 公孫述 [Ziyang 子陽] (d.36); Youfufeng. A man of established official family, Gongsun Shu's father Ren 仁 had been an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate during the reign of Emperor Ai of Former Han, and later became Commandant of Henan. Through the ren appointment right of his father, Gongsun Shu entered the civil service as a member of the Suite of the Heir, then became a gentleman cadet, and when Gongsun Ren was in Henan Gongsun Shu became a county magistrate in Tianshui. Considering him young and inexperienced, his father sent one of his officers to advise and guide him, but after a few weeks the man returned and told Gongsun Ren that his son needed no such help. Also recognising Gongsun Shu's capability, the Administrator had him supervise four other counties. We are told that the government was in good order, with no instances of robbery or banditry, while all the commandery admired his uncanny ability.

About 15 AD, Gongsun Shu was appointed Administrator of Shu, under the regime of Wang Mang, with his capital at Linqiong, west of Chengdu. He was still in that position when Wang Mang was destroyed by the army of the Gengshi Emperor of Han in 23. As the empire fell into disorder, the self-styled general Zong Cheng of Nanyang raided Hanzhong commandery. The effect of his incursions extended south of the mountains into Guanghan, while at the same time the bandit Wang Cen attacked Luo city, north of Chengdu and headquarters of the province. Song Zun, the Governor appointed by Wang Mang, was killed, and Wang Cen also took title as a general and declared his support for Zong Cheng.

Gongsun Shu now invited Zong Cheng south to Chengdu, where he was joined by Wang Cen. As Zong Cheng paid primary attention to plunder, Gongsun Shu explained to his people that he had mistakenly believed Zong Cheng to be a true officer of the new Han regime. He arranged for a messenger to appear, pretending to be from the Gengshi Emperor and carrying forged documents which not only confirmed him as Administrator of Shu but also named him Governor of Yi province and gave him title as a general. Armed with this false authority, Gongsun Shu attacked Zong Cheng; Zong Cheng's officer Yuan Fu killed Zong Cheng and surrendered with all his troops. As Bielenstein observes, with this complex of trickery Gongsun Shu gained reputation as a good local official, acquired a substantial number of new recruits, and set himself up as a recognised high officer of the new imperial regime. Even if the Gengshi regime objected to his pretensions, Gongsun Shu could claim to have acted in good faith, and his provincial power, whether legitimately acquired or not, gave him an excellent bargaining position.

In the autumn of the following year, 24, the Gengshi Emperor sent his officers Li Bao and Zhang Zhong to take over the territory, with Zhang Zhong designated as Inspector of Yi province. Gongsun Shu sent his brother Gongsun Hui to attack them, the Han forces were defeated and withdrew into Wudu, and Gongsun Shu's independence was confirmed. Soon afterwards Gongsun Shu took title as King of Shu 屬王. His Officer of Merit Li Xiong, who put forward this welcome proposal, emphasised the coherence and prosperity of the territory, compared it to the misery and weakness of central China, and encouraged Gongsun Shu to plan for expansion as a hegemon. Taking over Jianwei, immediately to the south, Gongsun Shu received tribute from Ren Gui, the non-Chinese chieftain of Yuexi, who styled himself as a king, while the Zuodu people in the west and some White Horse Di of Wudu also submitted. Hou Dan was set to guard the pass controlling the northern approach from Hanzhong, while Ren Man, based at Jiangzhou, present-day Chongqing, established defences on the Yangzi Gorges at the border of present-day Sichuan and Hunan.

In the summer of 25 Gongsun Shu took the imperial title. He did this in defiance of the Gengshi regime, which was clearly on the point of collapse, while Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, did not present his own claim until the autumn. The move was again encouraged by Li Xiong, and justified by various omens, including a favourable dream, a dragon which emerged from Gongsun Shu's yamen, and lights in the sky, together with calculations from apocryphal texts to foretell his succession to Han and Wang Mang. As he took the throne, Gongsun Shu announced the name of his dynasty as Cheng 成 "Complete," based upon the name of his capital, Chengdu, and proclaimed the reign title Longxing 龍興 "Dragon Rising". He adopted the colour white, which opposed the red of Han and succeeded to the yellow of Wang Mang, while it also reflected his position in the west, home of the Power of Metal 金行. He designated Yi province by the imperial title of Sili 司隸 and changed Shu commandery to be the Intendancy of Chengdu 成都尹. Li Xiong, Ren Man and Gongsun Shu's brothers Hui and Guang were named as Excellencies [HHS and HYZG disagree on the precise distribution of these senior offices; see sub voce], while other members of his clan held high positions. Gongsun Shu's appointments were based chiefly upon personal connection: he showed no special favour to men of his homeland in the north, but he was likewise not bound to local leaders, and in later years an outsider such as Yan Cen of Nan commandery was readily approved for the highest military rank.

In 26 Gongsun Shu's general Hou Dan took advantage of the fighting between Liu Jia the king of Hanzhong and his rival Yan Cen to occupy that commandery, and during the following years Lü Wei and other gentry leaders in the Wei valley, north across the Qin Ling divide, offered allegiance to and received appointment as generals. Gongsun Shu also maintained contact with the north-western warlord Wei Ao, notably through the intermediacy of Ma Yuan, a fellow-countryman, who came on embassy from Wei Ao in 26 but was unhappy with his reception and later supported Emperor Guangwu. In the south, Wen Qi the Administrator of Yizhou commandery refused to acknowledge Gongsun Shu and sent messengers to Guangwu, while in Zangke the non-Chinese clans also resisted his authority and offered nominal allegiance to Han. These pockets of resistance were not of great importance: the armed men nominally under Gongsun Shu's command were numbered by hundreds of thousands, while the territory he controlled, the whole of present-day Sichuan, was coherent and prosperous.

On the other hand, though Gongsun Shu attempted to recruit local worthies to his court and cause, we are told that many refused, and expressed loyalty to the Han even at pain of death: see, for example, the cases of Li Ye, Wang Hao and Wang Jia, and the discussion of Vervorm 90:142-143.

As Guangwu extended his power over eastern China during the late 20s, Gongsun Shu was chiefly concerned with the symbols of empire. He paid great attention to prophecies, signs and portents which might be taken to foretell his success; he constructed a palace at Nanzheng in Hanzhong, with ten fine barges, all painted red and adorned with silk and fine woods, and he sought to replace the copper currency of Han with iron coins of his own minting – this may have reflected the fact that his territory was the dominant producer of copper in China, but the change was resented by the people. Furthermore, though Gongsun Shu is said to have issued insignia for official positions all over the empire, and his imperial claim ensured that he must at some time contend directly with Guangwu of Han, he never embarked upon a strategy to deal with the empire as a whole.

The closest Gongsun Shu appears to have come to such broad planning was in 30, when Guangwu already controlled the lower Wei valley about Chang'an and had established his dominance in the east. He was pressing hard against Wei Ao in the northwest, who was sufficiently concerned to seek an alliance, while Gongsun Shu had also received the refugee warlords Yan Cen and Tian Rong from the middle Yangzi. His adviser Jing Han proposed that he embark on a pincer movement, east though the Yangzi Gorges and north into the Wei valley, to support Wei Ao and threaten Guangwu on two fronts. Led by Gongsun Shu's brother Guang, officials at court opposed the plan and it was shelved. In any case, such a move should have been attempted three or five years earlier, while there were still potential allies in the east. By the 30s the best to be hoped for was a defensive stalemate with Wei Ao's support, for though the Sichuan basin is guarded by mountains Gongsun Shu's resources were too small to withstand the full power of the rest of the empire.

In 33, as a partial expression of Jing Han's plan, Tian Rong and Ren Man were sent through the Gorges to seize Nan commandery. They drove in the Han positions and occupied some territory along the Yangzi, but then established a defence line and advanced no further. Guangwu's general Cen Peng took no immediate action, but spent two years on the construction of warships and other equipment, and in the summer of 35 he embarked on counter-offensive. Tian Rong's river defences were broken, and the Han armies pursued him the whole length of the Gorges. Laying siege to him in Jiangzhou but by-passing that position, Cen Peng moved up the Yangzi and the Min towards Chengdu while his associate Zang Gong forced his way up the Fu River and destroyed Yan Cen's army. Guangwu offered terms of surrender, but Gongsun Shu, committed to his imperial position, refused, and in the winter he sent a false deserter to assassinate Cen Peng and thus obtained a breathing space.

The campaign was resumed by the Grand Marshal Wu Han. His strength was fully extended as he approached Chengdu, and he was briefly defeated by Gongsun Shu's general Xie Feng, but Wu Han recovered and resumed the advance. By the end of 36 he had been joined by Zang Gong from the Fu River, and together they invested Chengdu. Gongsun Shu still refused to surrender, and although the Han armies were on the outskirts of his capital their position was still vulnerable: supplies were short, the troops were exhausted, and Wu Han was considering retreat. It would no doubt have been wiser to let him withdraw, but we are told Gongsun Shu took the omens and found that "A caitiff will die below the city walls" 虜死城下. Believing this referred to Wu Han, on 24 December 36 he ordered a sortie. His men gained initial success, but Wu Han's reserves turned the battle. Gongsun Shu was badly wounded, and though he was brought back into the city he died that night.

On the following day Yan Cen surrendered, and two days later Wu Han allowed his men to loot the city. Numbers of people were killed, Gongsun Shu's palace was destroyed by fire, and Gongsun Shu's widow, his children and other kinsmen, together with Yan Cen and his family, were executed. In the following summer blind musicians and their instruments from the court of Gongsun Shu, together with various carriages, were brought to Luoyang and presented at the Altar of Heaven. -HHS 13/3:533-43, DGHJ 23:6b-7b, HYGZ 5; Bn 59:28-31, 107-109, 180-198.

Gongsun Song 公孫松; Kuaiji. Recommended for office by the Administrator Zhang Ba during the 90s, Gongsun Song had a distinguished career and became Director of Retainers. -HHS 36/26:1241.

Gongsun Te 公孫特; Shu. Member of a powerful local family, about 65 Gongsun Te was given appointment by the Inspector. -HYGZ 10A:136.

Gongsun Xu 公孫續 (d.199); Liaoxi. In 198, as Yuan Shao came for a final assault on his fortress at Yi in Hejian, Gongsun Zan sent a letter to Gongsun Xu stating that the situation was serious, and that he should seek aid from Zhang Yan, leader of the Black Mountain bandits. Before the relief force could arrive, however, Gongsun Zan had been destroyed, and Gongsun Xu was then killed by Xiongnu. -HHS 36/26:1241, SGZ 8:246-47.

Gongsun Yan 公孫延; Liaodong>Xuantu. Gongsun Yan moved to Xuantu to avoid office in his native commandery. His natural son, the local warlord Gongsun Du, gave him posthumous enfeoffment. -SGZ 8:252; Gardiner 72A:60.

Gongsun Yan 公孫延. A general under Sun Quan, Gongsun Yan was captured by Cao Cao in 213. -SGZ 1:37.

Gongsun Ye 公孫曄 [Chun'guang 春光]. Having studied the Classic of History at the University in Luoyang, Gongsun Ye became an Academician and then an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate. His opinion was frequently sought on matters of policy, and his advice was always based upon the teachings of the classics and served the good of the state. He acquired great influence at court.

When Gongsun Ye became Director of Retainers he refused to be influenced by the great families, and the region was so secure that the city gates could be opened early and closed late. -XC 6:15a-b.

Gongsun Yong 公孫永; Youfufeng. A cousin of Gongsun Shu, Gongsun Yong was Minister of the Guards in his imperial regime. Early in 36 he commanded a defensive position on the Yangzi in Jianwei, but he was defeated by Guangwu's general Wu Han. -HHS 18/8:681, 100/10:3221.

Gongsun Yu 公孫域/域. Administrator of Xuantu in 167, Gongsun Yu defeated an attack by the Fuyu tribes. His son Bao died soon afterwards, and he adopted Gongsun Du. -HHS 7:319, 85/75:2812, SGZ 8:252.

Gongsun Yu 公孫育 see Gongsun Fang 公孫方.

Gongsun Yuan 公孫淵 (d.238); Xuantu. Younger son of Gongsun Kang, in 228 he took power from his regent uncle Gong. He maintained the warlord state, varying between fealty to Wei and alliance with Wu, until his destruction by the army of Sima Yi in 238. -SGZ 8:261; Gardiner 72B.

Gongsun Yue 公孫越 (d.191); Liaoxi. A cousin of Gongsun Zan, he was sent to assist Yuan Shu's general Sun Jian against Zhao Yu in the service of Yuan Shao. He was killed in battle and Gongsun Zan attacked Yuan Shao to avenge him. -SGZ 8:242.

Gongsun Zan 公孫瓚 [Bogui 伯珪/圭] (d.199); Liaoxi. Though Gongsun Zan's father came from a family of high officials, his mother was of mean descent. A handsome man with a powerful voice, skilled in debate, Gongsun Zan's first appointment was as a local officer in the commandery, where Administrator Hou admired him and gave him his daughter in marriage. He studied briefly under Lu Zhi and Liu Kuan, then returned to the commandery office and was later named Reporting Officer. When the Administrator Liu Ji was taken by cage-cart to the capital and then exiled to Rinan, Gongsun Zan gained local admiration for his display of loyalty, escorting Liu Ji to Luoyang and making sacrifice for his safe journey to the far south.

Returning to Liaoxi, Gongsun Zan was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, served as a gentleman cadet, and became assistant magistrate of a county in Liaodong Dependent State. He made his name as a leader of cavalry against the Wuhuan and the Xianbi, and was noted for his companion force of archers on white horses. He was dismissed when he lost a large part of his force in an attack against heavy odds, but the Xianbi were intimidated and halted their raids: it is said they used his image for target practice, and cheered when someone hit it. He was re-appointed as a magistrate in Zhuo, and in 187 he was given command of Wuhuan auxiliaries for the campaign against the rebels in Liang province. Some levies mutinied, but Gongsun Zan attacked them with success.

Promoted Commandant of Cavalry, in 188 Gongsun Zan defeated the rebels Zhang Ju and Zhang Chun and the Wuhuan chieftain Qiuliju. When he advanced into the Dependent State, however, he was besieged by Qiuliju and escaped only after heavy losses. He was nonetheless made a colonel and enfeoffed, and was feared by the non-Chinese for his courage and ferocity.

As Qiuliju continued his raids across the northeast, the new Governor Liu Yu adopted a more lenient policy, and though Gongsun Zan argued with him and killed envoys from the rebels, Qiuliju submitted. Liu Yu was rewarded with Excellency rank and enfeoffment, and Gongsun Zan was resentful. As Dong Zhuo took power he named Liu Yu Grand Marshal and made Gongsun Zan a general, enfeoffing him with Ji county in Guangyang, south of present-day Beijing, which was also the capital of You province.

In 191 a group of Yellow Turbans came north from the region of the Shandong peninsula. Gongsun Zan defeated them, caught them at a river crossing as they sought to escape, and killed vast numbers. Soon afterwards the death of his cousin Gongsun Yue, whom he had sent to assist Yuan Shu, made Gongsun Zan an enemy of Yuan Shao. He issued a long proclamation enumerating Yuan Shao's crimes, seized a great part of Ji province and named his own Inspectors and other officials to Qing and Yan. In the following year he was heavily defeated by Yuan Shao and his general Qu Yi at Jie Bridge on the Qing River between Qinghe and Julu. He regrouped to defeat an invading force under Cui Juye and then sent Tian Kai southeast into Qing province. In 193 the respected elder statesman Zhao Qi arranged a truce.

Liu Yu was angry that Yuan Shao's cousin and rival Yuan Shu had held his son Liu He when he escaped from Chang'an in 191, and he supported Yuan Shao. Disapproving also of Gongsun Zan's aggressive policy, he withheld his supplies; so the two men confirmed their enmity. In 193 Gongsun Zan built a fortress in Ji city, and when Liu Yu attacked he was defeated, captured and killed.

The government at Chang'an at this time gave Gongsun Zan title as General of the Van and changed his fief to Yi in Hejian, while he also styled himself Inspector of You province. Though Tian Kai was driven from Qing province by Yuan Shao's son Yuan Tan, Gongsun Zan still dominated the northeast. He ruled harshly, however, being particularly severe on members of the gentry, and in 195 Xianyu Fu led a rising of local leaders assisted by Yan Rou and Wuhuan allies. As the insurgents were joined by Yuan Shao's troops under Liu He and Qu Yi, Gongsun Zan's power was broken, and the officials he had appointed were killed and replaced by the rebels.

Gongsun Zan had prepared a vast defensive complex and agricultural colonies at Yi city. He now retreated there, keeping himself completely isolated, except for the women of his harem; these he trained to shout in unison so that his followers could be kept at a distance and yet hear his orders. He repulsed one attack, by Yuan Shao's general Qu Yi, but in 198 Yuan Shao came with his main army. He dug tunnels, then fired them to bring down the walls; and early in the following year the citadel was taken by storm. Gongsun Zan killed his wife and children and then himself; Yuan Shao sent his head to the imperial court at Xu city. -HHS 73/63:2357-64*, XC 4:13a-b, SGZ 8:239-47*.

Gongsun Zhao 公孫昭 (d.190); Liaodong Dependent State. As a magistrate in Liaodong, Gongsun Zhao gave a poor position on his staff to Gongsun Kang. Kang's father Gongsun Du later became Administrator, and he had Gongsun Zhao flogged to death in the marketplace. -SGZ 8:252; Gardiner 72A:65.

Gongsun [Zhijie] 公孫志節; Chen. Having served as a local commandery officer, Gongsun Zhijie became Inspector of Yang province and was later Court Architect.

While in Yang province, Gongsun Zhijie found his runaway slave Diyu, who had taken the name Wang Bin. He took no action against him, however, and Wang Bin later held high office. -FSTY 3f:105.

Gongwu Zhou 公武周 miswritten for Wu Zhou 武周. -SGZ 18:537.

Gongxu Gong 公緒恭; Shanyang. A reformist at Luoyang in the late 160s, Gongxu Gong joined the sworn brotherhood of twenty-four men from Shanyang under the leadership of Zhang Jian. In 169 their fellow-countryman Zhu Bing, acting at the instigation of the powerful eunuch Hou Lan, claimed that the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this became the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188, ZF:16a [SGZ 6:211]; deC 75A:28-31.

Gongzu [Jinjie] 公族進階; Bohai. No details are known of this man's career, but he was admired by the reformists and students at Luoyang in the 160s for his upright and fearless criticism of powerful men. -HHS 67/57:2186, FSTY 5f:119.

Gou Ju 勾/句矩 (d.114); Hanzhong. Well-respected locally, Gou Ju joined the staff of the Administrator Zheng Qin. After Zheng Qin was killed by rebel Qiang in 110, Gou Ju joined Cheng Xin and other officers in an oath of vengeance, and when the Qiang came again four years later they all fought against them. The army was successful, but the oath-bearers were killed. [On the date of the campaign see sub Cheng Xin.]

In 118 an imperial letter ordered a grant of grain to the families of the heroic band. -HYGZ 2:16, 10C:169.

Gou Si 緜汜 see Wei Si 維汜.

Gou Yu 苟宇. An officer in the service of the warlord Wei Ao, in 30 he captured the imperial official Wen Xu. He attempted to persuade him to change sides, but Wen Xu resisted violently and killed several of his men. Admiring his courage, Gou Yu gave him a sword to kill himself with.

Following the death of Wei Ao in 33, Gou Yu was one of his former officers who rallied to his son Wei Chun. At the end of 34, however, they were forced to surrender to Han, and Gou Yu joined Wei Chun in exile in Hongnong. -HHS 81/71:2672-73, 13/3:531.

Gou Yu 緜玉, the Lady; Chenliu. A woman of family, about 130 she killed her husband's uncle Li Shi to avenge her own uncle. She was arrested and liable to death, but the young scholar Shentu Pan spoke to the magistrate Liang Pei, arguing that even as a woman she had fulfilled the obligations of family vengeance, and praising her conduct as a model for future generations. Liang Pei, deeply impressed, obtained her an official pardon. -HHS 53/43:1751, XHS 4:1b.

Gu Ba 古霸; Donglai. An officer under Liu Cang the King of Donglai about 58, he was sent to the capital to enquire after the health of the Princess Liu Zhongli, daughter of Emperor Guangwu. While there, he heard of the proposal to establish counties at the tombs of emperors Guangwu and Ming. He reported this to Liu Cang, who sent a memorial to Emperor Zhang arguing against the plan. -HHS 42/32:1437.

Gu Chong 谷崇. In 25 Kou Xun was concerned that Emperor Guangwu might be uncertain of his loyalty. As the imperial army passed through Henei on his way to attack Luoyang, therefore, he offered the services of his sister's son Gu Chong and his elder brother's son Kou Zhang with their troops of cavalry. The emperor, very pleased, appointed both men as lieutenant-generals.

In 26 Gu Chong had rejoined Kou Xun in Yingchuan and he offered his aid against Jia Fu. Kou Xun resolved the confrontation with a trick, but sent Gu Chong to report the matter to the emperor. Gu Chong was later granted a marquissate for his achievements in the civil war. -HHS 16/6:622-23, 626.

Gu Chu 古初; Changsha. In the 40s, Gu Chu's father died. Before he could be buried a fire broke out in the next-door house. Gu Chu protected the coffin with his own body, and the fire went out.

The Administrator Zhi Yun reported this as an example of the finest filial conduct. -HHS 29/19:1032, FSTY 5f:121.

Gu Feng 顧奉 [Jihong 季鴻]; Kuaiji. Gu Feng travelled to Yuzhang to study the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu under Cheng Zeng. Recommended for office by the Administrator Zhang Ba during the 90s, he became well known and served as Administrator of Yingchuan.

Gu Feng's great-grandson Gu Yong q. v. was Chancellor of the Three Kingdoms state of Wu. -HHS 36/26:1241, 79/69B:2581, SGZ Wu 7:1225.

The Wu lu of Zhang Bo, cited in SGZ Wu 7:1225, identifies Jihong as the style of Gu Feng the Administrator of Yingchuan had the style Jihong. In a letter to Huang Qiong of 127, Li Gu referred to a certain Gu Jihong as a hermit scholar who was called to court and offered gifts, but did not distinguish himself. That was probably not the same man. -HHS 61/51:2032; Vervoorn 90:294.

Gu Kan 顧龕; Kuaiji. About 150 Gu Kan was a junior officer at the headquarters of the commandery. On a day of assembly he wore a fur coat over his formal clothing. His colleague Wang Lang disapproved of this, and when Gu Kan refused to take off the offending garment Wang Lang beat a drum and tried to tear it off. The Administrator dismissed Gu Kan and offered his post to Wang Lang. -HHSJJ 67/57:2433 jiaobu Hou Kang quoting Kuaiji dianlu 會稽典錄[略].

Gu Li 谷利. Originally a junior servant in attendance on Sun Quan, because of his honesty and courtesy Gu Li became an officer of his bodyguard, the Companions 親近. When the army was defeated at Hefei in 215, Gu Li helped Sun Quan drive his horse across a river to escape the enemy. He was rewarded with enfeoffment.

On a later occasion Sun Quan was on the Yangzi near Wuchang in his great flagship. A storm blew up, and though Sun Quan believed the ship could sail safely downwind, Gu Li drew his sword and compelled the helmsman to steer for shelter. Sun Quan, presumably somewhat put out by the fact that Gu Li had overriden his orders, sought to tease him for being afraid of the water. Gu Li, however, knelt and explained that although Sun Quan might jest about the danger, the ship was in fact top-heavy and the consequences of his loss would be devastating for the state. Sun Quan admired him all the more; as a sign of respect, he hereafter addressed Gu Li only by his surname, not by his personal name. -SGZ Wu 2:1120, 1133.

Gu Mang 谷莽; Jingzhao. Formerly Administrator of Qinghe in the service of Wang Mang, in 25 Gu Mang became a senior official in the warlord government of Wei Ao. -HHS 13/3:522.

Gu Ping 顧平 served as Commandant of Shangdang. -FSTY 6f:149.

Gu Pu 古朴; Guanghan. A noted scholar, Gu Pu joined colleagues to compose a hymn at the death of the Lady Zhang Shuji, wife of Wang Zun.

In 214, as Officer of Merit to Xiahou Zuan, Administrator of Guanghan in the service of Liu Bei, he accompanied him to a meeting with the scholar recluse Qin Mi. Xiahou Zuan twitted Gu Pu about the apparent lack of distinction among men from Yi province. Gu Pu responded by citing the literary qualities of such men as Sima Xiangru 司馬相如 and Yang Xiong 楊雄 of Former Han. Qin Mi then joined the debate with emphatic praise of the region, and Xiahou Zuan was quite discountenanced. -SGZ Shu 8: 975, HYZG 10A:139.

Gu Shao 顧邵 [Xiaoze 孝則]; Wu. Son of Gu Yong, Gu Shao was widely read in history and took particular interest in moral obligations between people. While he was still young, he and Lu Ji, his mother's sister, were both well known, and were accounted of higher quality than Lu Xun, Zhang Dun and Bu Jing. Gu Shao was known throughout his home country for his judgement of character and for the men of good quality whom he brought from obscurity, befriended and developed.

Sun Quan gave Gu Shao one of his nieces, daughter of Sun Ce, to wife, and at the age of twenty-seven he became Administrator of Yuzhang. He paid respects at the tomb of the local hermit Xu Zhi and gave patronage to his family, he emphasised the importance of correct ritual, and he continued his work of promoting men of ability from his junior staff and encouraging them to study. After five years, about 218, he died in that office. -SGZ Wu 7:1229*; Mather 76:542.

Gu Shilang 古師郎 see Gushi Lang 古師郎.

Gu Yong 谷永. Administrator of Yulin in 170, by generosity and honest conduct Gu Yong brought hundreds of thousands of Wuhu tribespeople to offer allegiance. They were settled within the borders of the empire and their chieftains were awarded caps and belts as insignia of authority.

We are told that seven new counties were established as a result of Gu Yong's work. They are not specifically identifiable, however, and it appears likely they were abandoned soon afterwards: in 178 there was a notable rebellion of the Wuhu people in the region of Hepu, which bordered Yulin to the south; see sub Zhu Jun. -HHS 86/76:2839; Miyakawa 60:34, deC 89:119, 453-454.

This Gu Yong must be distinguished from the man of the same name who was a soothsayer and minister under Wang Mang: e.g. HHS 23/13:798, 108/18:3369; QHX:132-133.

Gu Yong 顧雍 [Yuantan 元歎] (168-243); Wu. Gu Yong's great-grandfather Feng had been an Administrator, but there is no mention in the history of his father or grandfather. During the 180s the great scholar Cai Yong came to the southeast as a refuge from intrigue at court, and Gu Yong studied calligraphy and the lute with him. An excellent student, he was greatly admired by Cai Yong, who prophesied a great future for him and honoured him by granting him his own personal name [Cai Yong's name is usually written 邕, but sometimes appears as 雍; Gu Yong's always appears as 雍]. It is also said that his style Yuantan came from the fact that Cai Yong sighed 歎 in admiration at his ability; but the same character was included in the style of his uncle Hui [surname unknown].

Gu Yong was recommended both by his commandery and by the administration of Yang province, and while still young he became a county magistrate, first in Jiujiang, then closer to home in Danyang, Wu and Kuaiji; these last three presumably under the authority of Sun Ce. He did well in each post, and when Sun Quan succeeded his brother in 200 he held title as Administrator of Kuaiji but named Gu Yong as his Assistant and gave him full charge of the commandery. He settled the hills bandits and confirmed authority over the whole territory.

Gu Yong later came to court, and after Sun Quan became King of Wu in 221 he received enfeoffment and became Director of the Secretariat. A man of strict morality and conduct, he was always treated with respect, and when he brought his mother to court Sun Quan himself went to call upon her. In 225 he became a minister and in the following year was appointed Chancellor in succession to Sun Shao. He held that office for nineteen years until his death, and his family was recognised as one of the greatest in the state. -SGZ Wu 7:1225-28*; Mather 76:542-43, deC 90:464-465, 502.

Gucheng Yun 古城雲 was Commandant of Guanghan. -FSTY 5f:121.

Guan Ba 管霸 (d.168). A eunuch, in 159 Guan Ba was a Regular Attendant to Emperor Huan. Though not directly involved in the coup which destroyed the Liang family, he took part in the interrogation of the protester Li Yun and held a senior position among the harem officials.

In 165 the Minister of Finance Liu You reported that Guan Ba and his colleague Su Kang had enclosed good farmland and wilderness throughout the empire, to the hardship of common people. The emperor was angry at Liu You, and sent him to convict labour.

Later that year Guan Ba was sent by Emperor Huan to present offerings at the temple of Laozi in Hu county in Chen state, the alleged birthplace of the sage. It was probably on that occasion that the Laozi ming 老子銘 stele was set up: the text is dated to the jiazi day of the eighth month of Yanxi 8, being 24 September 165, and Guan Ba's visit took place in the winter at the beginning of Western 166.

When Emperor Huan died in 167 his Empress Dou immediately killed his favourite, the Honoured Lady Tian Sheng, and she wanted to murder all the other women who had shared the monarch's favour. Guan Ba and Su Kang, however, protested and obliged her not to do so.

In 168, under the regency government of the Lady Dou, Dou Wu charged Guan Ba and Su Kang with wrong-doing and had them tortured to death. This was the first step in a planned attack on the eunuchs, eventually overturned by the eunuchs' counter-coup. The Dowager was not keen on the plan, but she may have been more ready to approve these deaths because of her disappointment at not having been allowed to kill her former rivals in the harem. -HHS 7:316, 10B: 446, 57/67:2199, 69/59:2242; Seidel 69:122-128, deC 89:18-19, 59, 97.

Guan Bo 管伯 (d.148); Runan. In 148 Guan Bo raised a rebellion and styled himself a Perfect Man 真人, a sage in the popular Huang-Lao doctrines, combining worship of the legendary Yellow Emperor 黃帝 and Laozi 老子. He and his colleague Chen Jing were swiftly destroyed. -HHS 7:293.

Guan Cheng 管承; Donglai. About 200 Guan Cheng was a pirate leader by the mouth of the Yellow River, north of the Shantung peninsula. He was persuaded to surrender by He Kui, but later reverted to his former trade. In 206 Cao Cao sent his officers Yue Jin and Li Dian to deal with him, and Guan Cheng was driven away to the off-shore islands. -SGZ 11:279, 1:28.

Guan Chong 關寵 (d.75). After the general Dou Gu obtained the surrender of the kingdoms of Jushi [Turfan] in 74, the government of Later Han restored the Protectorate-General of the Western Regions. Guan Chong, an Internuncio, was appointed Ji Colonel with his camp at Liuzhong oasis in Nearer Jushi. His colleague Geng Gong was at Jinpu city in Further Jushi, north of the Bogda range. Each had a few hundred men in his command.

That same year the Northern Xiongnu returned in force to Further Jushi, brought the state once more under control and placed Geng Gong's isolated force under heavy siege. By the summer Guan Chong was also under attack in Liuzhong city, while the people of Yanqi [Karashar] and Qiuzi [Kuqa], further west along the Northern Road, killed the Protector-General Chen Mu.

At this time Emperor Ming had just died, and the government of Emperor Zhang did not at first recognise the emergency. When a messenger sent by Guan Chong to seek help arrived at the capital, some argued the troops should be abandoned, but it was eventually decided that this would be bad for morale, while it would enhance the imperial prestige to rescue them.

Early in 76, therefore, the Administrator of Jiuquan Duan Peng was sent with seven thousand commandery troops and auxiliaries from Shanshan. He relieved the remnant garrison of Liuzhong and restored Nearer Jushi to allegiance. By the time these reinforcements arrived, however, Guan Chong had been killed in battle. -HHS 19/9:720-22.

Guan Gu 觀鵠 (d.187); Lingling. A religious rebel, in 187 Guan Gu commanded a group of bandits under the title General of the Peaceful Heaven 平天將軍 [or General Who Pacifies Heaven]. He probably died that year, but his troop, now jointly commanded by Zhou Chao and Guo Shi, ravaged Lingling, Guiyang and Changsha. They were later destroyed by Sun Jian the Administrator of Changsha. -HHS 8:354, SGZ Wu 1: 1095; deC 90:103-104.

Guan Guo 管虢 became Administrator of Xihe. -FSTY 6f:143.

Guan Hai 管亥. A leader of Yellow Turban rebels, in 193 Guan Hai laid siege to Kong Rong the Chancellor of Beihai. Liu Bei sent troops to the relief, and Guan Hai's men scattered. -HHS 70/60:2263, SGZ Wu 4: 1187.

Guan Jing 關靖 [Shiqi 士起] (d.199); Taiyuan. A trusted staff officer under Gongsun Zan, Guan Jing was cruel, but not good at planning.

In 198, as Yuan Shao laid siege to his fortress at Yi in Hejian, Gongsun Zan planned to make a strategic sortie behind his lines. Guan Jing warned that he would lose the support of his men if he appeared to abandon them. So Gongsun Zan stayed in Yi; and he was killed when the city fell in the following year.

Seeing the fate of his master, Guan Jing spurred his horse against the victorious enemy and died in battle. -HHS 73/63:2364.

Guan Ning 管寧 [You'an 幼安] (158-241); Beihai. A tall, handsome man, who held no concern for property, he travelled widely for scholarship with his friends Bing Yuan and Hua Xin, and was a student 弟子 of the Excellency Chen Qiu. After Chen Qiu was disgraced and died in 179 Guan Ning and Hua Xin were among those who joined to set up a stele at his tomb in Xiapi.

About 191 Guan Ning took refuge in Liaodong from the disturbances of central China, and set up a separate community in the northern hills. Though he spoke with Gongsun Du, he would only discuss the classics, never current affairs, and he warned Bing Yuan against committing himself. The Gongsun warlords both honoured him, and when Cao Cao sent an invitation, Gongsun Kang intercepted the letter.

In 223, on the advice of Hua Xin, Cao Pi called Guan Ning to his court. Guan Ning, however, refused all offers of appointment, even when Hua Xin asked to cede him his position as an Excellency. He died in retirement in his home country. -SGZ 11:354-60*; Mather 76:543.

Guan Ping 關平 (d.219); Hedong. Son of Guan Yu, Guan Ping was killed with his father in Jing province. -SGZ Shu 6:941-42.

Guan Tong 管統. In 203 Guan Tong was Administrator of Donglai for Yuan Tan. When Yuan Tan was defeated by his brother Shang and faced mutiny from his local officers. Guan Tong went to help him, but his own wife and children, whom he had left behind, were killed by bandits. Guan Tong was then appointed Administrator of Le'an.

Though Yuan Tan was killed in 205 Guan Tong refused to surrender to Cao Cao. Wang Xiu was ordered to kill him, but refused because he admired his loyalty, and Cao Cao eventually set him free. -SGZ 11:346-47.

Guan Xing 關興 [Anguo 安國]; Hedong. Son of Guan Yu, Guan Xing showed ability when he was still young, Zhuge Liang admired him, and he held various appointments at the court of Liu Bei, ruler of Shu-Han.

After his death in Jing province in 219 Guan Yu was given posthumous enfeoffment as a full marquis, and Guan Xing received the title. He died a few years later. -SGZ Shu 6:942.

Guan Xun 觀恂. Inspector of Yang province about 65, Guan Xun sent in a report praising the exemplary conduct of the marquis Liu Ban, who held a county fief in Lujiang.

Guan Xun later became Administrator of Nanyang. -HHS 39/29:1304, FSTY 4:29.

Guan Yang 關陽 was a colonel in the Northern Army. -FSTY 6f:148.

Guan You 貫友 (d.96). Commandant of Juyan in 93, Guan You was transferred to be Protector of the Qiang. His predecessor Nie Shang had sought to deal courteously with the Qiang warlord Mitang, but failed to gain peace; Guan You was more aggressive.

He first broke up some of Mitang's following with agents, plots and bribes, then attacked his base in the Yu Valleys on the upper Yellow River, by present-day Guide in Qinghai. He built fortresses to hold the area, and constructed a pontoon bridge to pursue Mitang across the River. Mitang withdrew northwest into the wilderness, and no further action took place until Guan You died three years later.

The territory taken by Guan You remained in Chinese hands until the great Qiang rebellion of 107. -HHS 87/77:2883.

Guan Yu 關羽 [Yunchang 雲長; originally Changsheng 長生] (d.219); Hedong. In fear of his life for some reason, Guan Yu took refuge in Zhou commandery, where he joined Liu Bei, who was at that time raising a private force. Guan Yu and Zhang Fei became Liu Bei's closest associates, they treated one another like brothers, and they accompanied Liu Bei on his campaigns in the east of the empire.

Early in 200 Cao Cao defeated Liu Bei and captured Guan Yu. He treated him generously and appointed him a lieutenant-general. In return Guan Yu killed Yuan Shao's general Yan Liang, cutting him down in the midst of his camp and forcing the enemy to withdraw. Cao Cao enfeoffed him as Marquis of Hanshou Village 漢壽亭侯, and he is sometimes known by that title. Guan Yu was determined to rejoin Liu Bei, however, and when he escaped Cao Cao did not pursue him.

Guan Yu accompanied Liu Bei into Jing province, and when Liu Biao died in 208 he took command of the Han River fleet and brought it down to join the defence at the Red Cliffs. After that victory he was named a general and put in command of defences in the north towards Xiangyang. When Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214, Guan Yu remained in charge of the whole of Jing province. In 219 he was one of the officials listed in the formal memorial to the emperor as Liu Bei took title as King of Hanzhong, and he was named General of the Van. Initially resentful at sharing his rank with others, he eventually agreed to accept the office.

A man of great physical courage and skill, at one occasion Guan Yu had a serious operation on his arm carried out during a banquet, and even as the blood flowed he ate and drank and laughed as usual. In 215 he was obliged to redivide Jing province with Sun Quan, but he was not overly impressed by Sun Quan's local commander Lu Su, and as he moved north up the Han against Cao Cao's forces in 219 he had no concern for any threat from Lu Su's successor Lü Meng. Lü Meng encouraged this confidence, but then brought an army up the Yangzi to attack Guan Yu's rear. Guan Yu had already been driven back by Cao Ren at Xiangyang, and he was now cut off in Nan commandery; he and his son Guan Ping were captured and killed.

One of the great romantic heroes of the Three Kingdoms, Guan Yu attracted many legends and stories, he was later worshipped as the God of War 管帝, and his image appears in many Taoist temples of the present day. -SGZ Shu 6:939-42*.

Guan Zun 管遵 [Juntai 君臺]; Boling. Magistrate of Chengyang in Jiyin in 175, Guan Zun took a leading role in restoring the Spiritual Terrace 靈臺 associated with the temple of the sage Emperor Yao and his mother 堯母. -LS 1:8a-10a, 21:22b, SJZ 24:15b.

Guang 廣 of Shanshan. King of Shanshan in 73, Guang received the Chinese envoys Guo Xun and Ban Chao. He had hitherto been allied to the Northern Xiongnu, but Ban Chao and his small party slaughtered the Xiongnu envoys and presented King Guang with their heads. Thoroughly disconcerted, Guang acceded to Han and sent hostages. -HHS 47/37:1572-73.

Guang 廣 of Yanqi [Karashar]. King of Yanqi in 94, Guang attempted to block the advance of the Protector-General Ban Chao. He was taken and then executed at the fortress where Chen Mu the previous Protector-General had been killed by Guang's predecessor Zhong in 73.

Guang's head and that of his ally King Fan of Weili were sent to Luoyang, while the capital of Yanqi was ravaged and plundered. With this success, the last resistance to Chinese power in the Western Regions was ended. -HHS 47/37:1581-82.

Guang Nihe 光泥和 see Xian Nihe 先泥和.

Guangde 廣德 of Yutian [Khotan]. Guangde was a nephew of Xiumoba, who led a rebellion against the hegemon King Xian of Suoju [Yarkand] in 60 and proclaimed himself king of Yutian. After Xiumoba's death in that same year his senior officials set Guangde on the throne.

About this time, following up the victories of Xiumoba, a coalition of Qiuzi [Kuqa] and other states from the north of the Tarim basin, aided by the Northern Xiongnu, came to attack Suoju. They were not successful, but Guangde sent a raid directly against King Xian himself, and Xian sued for peace.

Before this, Guangde's father had been held captive for several years in Suoju. Xian now sent him back and also gave him one of his daughters to wife. He thus claimed a family tie, and Guangde withdrew his men from the offensive.

In the following year, 61, there was a plot against Xian within Suoju, and Guangde came forward again with thirty thousand men. When Xian sent messengers to ask why he was attacking his kinsman, Guangde replied that they should hold a face-to-face meeting. Reassured by his treacherous chief minister, Xian went out. He was promptly taken prisoner, and the troops of Yutian were let into the city.

When the Northern Xiongnu learnt of this success, they sent a large army, with troops from fifteen client states, including Qiuzi [Kuqa], Yanqi [Karashar] and Weili, to attack Yutian. Guangde was obliged to submit: he sent his eldest son as hostage and promised regular tribute of cashmere. The Xiongnu placed Xian's son Bujuzheng on the throne of Suoju, but Guangde still dominated his neighbours, and Yutian and Shanshan were the most powerful states on the Southern Road of the Tarim basin.

After the success of Dou Gu over the Northern Xiongnu in 73, the envoy Ban Chao was sent from China. Guangde treated him with small courtesy, and his sooth-sayer told him to demand the gift of Ban Chao's horse. Instead Ban Chao killed the man, and Guangde was so impressed by his ruthlessness that he killed the Xiongnu agents and offered submission.

In 84 and again in 86 Guangde joined the attacks on Suoju under the command of Ban Chao, and in 87 Suoju was forced to surrender. King Bujuzheng was killed and Guangde's brother Qili was set on the throne under the general suzerainty of Han. -HHS 88/78:2925-26, 47/37:1573.

Guangwu, Emperor 光武帝 (reg. 25-57) see Liu Xiu 劉秀.

Guanqiu Chang 田丘長; Beihai. A peddler, Guanqiu Chang was travelling with his mother when he killed a drunken man who had insulted her. He fled, but was arrested and brought before the county magistrate Wu You. Wu You questioned him, and he confessed to open murder, which all agreed was an unpardonable crime even when mitigated by filial respect. Learning that Guanqiu Chang was married but had no children, Wu You had his wife brought to him in jail from their home in a neighbouring county, and gave orders for his fetters to be removed so they might couple together. Before the execution was carried out that winter, the woman had become pregnant. In gratitude, as Guanqiu Chang went to his death he bit off his finger and swallowed it to make an oath, that if the child was a boy he should be named after their benefactor Wu You. -HHS 54/44:2101.

Guanqiu Xin 田丘歆. In 116 the Chancellor of Lecheng Zhao Mu presented a false accusation that the king, Liu Gong, had offered sacrifices to the deities against the interests of the dynasty. This was Impiety and rendered Liu Gong liable to execution, but on the basis of his past good conduct a full investigation was ordered and Guanqiu Xin, an officer of the Imperial Censorate, was sent to Lecheng. As he found no evidence to support the charges, Zhao Mu was sent to prison, escaping the death penalty only because of an amnesty. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Guanqiu Xing 田丘興; Hedong. In 220 Guanqiu Xing was Administrator of Wuwei when Zhang Jin raised an alliance of Chinese rebels and non-Chinese across the far northwest. Guanqiu Xing set local defences, called in Su Ze for assistance, and took part in pacification. Restoring government in the region, he was later enfeoffed and became Court Architect of Wei. His son Jian 儉 was a noted general. -SGZ 28:761-62.

Guanqiu Yi 田丘毅. About 188 the General-in-Chief He Jin sent Guanqiu Yi as a Commandant to Danyang, to raise troops and deal with banditry there. -SGZ Shu 2:872.

Gui Dan 洼丹 [Ziyu 子玉] (30 BC-AD 41); Nanyang. Member of a family with a tradition of scholarship in the Meng interpretation of the Book of Changes, during the reign of Wang Mang Gui Dan refused all invitations to office but maintained a private academy with several hundred students.

Early in the reign of Emperor Guangwu Gui Dan became an Academician at the Imperial University, and after some other appointments was made Minister Herald. He died in that office.

Gui Dan compiled Yi tonglun 易通論, a study of the Book of Changes, in seven pian; it was later known as Guijun tong 洼君通 "Explanations of Master Gui". His intense and detailed scholarship had great influence, and he was a leader of New Text Confucianism. -HHS 79/69A:2551*; QHX:137-138.

Gui Fu 媯敷 see Yao Fu 姚敷.

Gui Hao 媯皓 [Yuanqi 元起]; Wu. Son of Gui Kun, when his father was imprisoned Gui Hao went to the government offices and kowtowed against a pile of stones until his face was covered in blood. Gui Kun was released.

When Gui Hao was getting married, his mother became drunk and vomited at the wedding reception. She was afraid she had taken poison, but Gui Hao bent down and tasted the vomit, then observed that it was cold, so she had not been poisoned. On another occasion, when his mother underwent moxibustion she came out in pustules; Gui Hao sucked them out until they were healed.

During the First Faction Incident of 166/167 Gui Hao, described as a member of the Imperial Secretariat, was commended to Emperor Huan by Dou Wu. He is not heard of again. -XC 8:6a, HHS 69/59:2240.

Gui Kun 媯昆; Wu. Administrator of Nan commandery, Gui Kun was imprisoned for some wrongdoing. His son Gui Hao, however, came to the government offices and kowtowed until he was bleeding. Gui Kun was released. -XC 8:6a.

Gui Lan 媯覽 (d.204); Wu. Gui Lan and his colleague Dai Yuan had been nominated for office by Sheng Xian, but when Sheng Xian died at the hands of the Sun group they took refuge in the hills. In an attempt at reconciliation, Sun Yi the Administrator of Danyang gave them office, but when their follower Bian Hong assassinated Sun Yi, the general Sun He investigated and held them at fault. Frightened of punishment, they killed Sun He and called Cao Cao's officer Liu Fu to come from across the Yangzi.

Gui Lan also took over Sun Yi's harem, and sought to compel his widow the Lady Xu IV to marry him. She pretended to be willing, but arranged for Sun Yi's officers to trap Gui Lan and retake control. -SGZ Wu 6:1214-15; deC 90:232-234.

Gui Mu 媯母 also as Gui Wu 毋; Donghai. About 192 Gui Mu was a soldier under the colonel Du Song. He led a mutiny and planned to ally with the bandit leader Chang Xi. Cao Cao sent Lü Qian, who invited Gui Mu and his associates to a feast, then took and killed them. -SGZ 18:540.

Gui Qian 貴遷 became Administrator of Lujiang. -FSTY 6f:139.

Gui Wu 媯毋 see Gui Mu 媯母.

Guiyang Hong 鮒陽鴻 [Mengsun 孟孫]; Zhongshan. [Pronunciations of the surname vary, as Guiyang, Huiyang or Xieyang, with differing dictionary and commentary glosses for the first character.]

A scholar of the New Text Meng interpretation of the Book of Changes, during the reign of Emperor Ming Guiyang Hong was Minister Steward and Minister of Finance. -HHS 79/69A:2551*, 26/16:916.

Guo 郭, Empress of Emperor Guangwu: see the Lady Guo Shengtong.

Guo 郭, the Lady I (d.50); Zhending/Changshan. Daughter of Liu Pu 劉普 the King of Zhending, the Lady married Guo Chang, a man of local family, and was known as Mistress Guo 郭主. She bore a daughter, Shengtong, and a son, Kuang. Guo Chang died early and the Lady brought up the two children.

In 24 Guo Shengtong married Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, and in 26 she became his empress. She was dismissed in 41, but the family was still treated with respect and favour, and when Mistress Guo died Guangwu attended the funeral with all his court. -HHS 10B:402-03*; Bn 79:119.

Guo 郭, the Lady II. A member of the harem of Emperor Huan in the early 160s, she was favoured by the emperor and became an Honoured Lady. She quarrelled fiercely with the Empress Deng, each telling tales against the other. It is possible that the Lady Guo was among the eight companions of the Honoured Lady Tian Sheng q.v., who regularly shared the emperor's bed together. -HHS 10B:445.

Guo 郭, the Lady III [Nüwang 女王] (184-235); Anping. Daughter of Guo Yong, the Lady was orphaned as a child and became a servant in a noble household during the disorders at the end of Han. About 212 she entered the harem of Cao Pi, supported him as he sought to be made Heir, and became a high-ranking concubine when he obtained the imperial throne in 220.

The Lady Guo used her influence over Cao Pi to slander the Empress Zhen, who was ordered to kill herself in 221. In the following year, despite protests from the court that her family background was too humble, Cao Pi appointed the Lady as his empress, and he had her adopt his eldest son Cao Rui, born of the Lady Zhen.

Despite her intrigues, it is claimed that the Lady ruled the harem leniently and that she restrained the conduct of her relatives. She was named as Dowager after Cao Pi's death in 226, but Cao Rui later questioned the role she had played in the death of his mother. It is said she died of anxiety, and the whole story was then revealed. The Lady Guo was buried disgraced, without honours. -SGZ 5:164-66*; C/C 99:106-111.

Guo 郭 [personal name unknown]. Administrator of Runan, he committed some fault and received a summons. He was frightened and wanted to kill himself, but was saved by the self-sacrifice of his officer Wang Wei. -XC 8:8a.

Guo 郭 [personal name unknown]; Donghai. Administrator of Wu in the early 140s, he nominated Bi Feng as Filial and Incorrupt. -LS 9:21b.

Guo 郭 [personal name unknown]. Having served as an Investigator and then Registrar of his commandery, he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet. He died before the end of his period of probation, and his family erected a stele to his memory. -LS 17:4b-5b.

Guo 郭 [personal name unknown] (d.179). A former Assistant Officer of Ji province, he had a stele set up to his memory. -LX 19:3b-5a.

Guo Ba 郭霸 (d.68). As a general under Guangwu, in 35 and 36 Guo Ba took part in operations against Gongsun Shu.

In 68 Guo Ba was Director of Retainers, but he was sent to prison for some fault and died there. -HHS 110/10:3221, 2:114.

Guo Bao 郭苞; Nanyang. A local gentleman, Guo Bao set up a stele in front of the Temple to the Source of the Huai River 淮源廟 about 140. During the 160s this was matched by two more, erected by the commandery and the county. -SJZ 30:1b, LS 2:12a-14a.

Guo Biao 郭表; Anping. Cousin of the Empress Guo of Cao Pi, Guo Biao was head of the family after the death of her brothers. He was granted succession to the posthumous fief of her father Guo Yong and Cao Rui gave him rank as a general. Though the Lady Guo was disgraced after her death, Biao and his family continued to receive favour. -SGZ 5:165; C/C 99:108-110.

Guo Cang 郭蒼; Guiyang. Former local officers under the Administrator Zhou Jing, in 174 Guo Cang, Gong Tai and Gong Luo took a leading role in having a stele set up in his honour. -LS 4:15a.

Guo Chang 郭昌; Zhending/Changshan. A man of leading local family, Guo Chang was admired for his generosity in transferring a substantial quantity of land and property to benefit a younger half-brother. He became Officer of Merit in the commandery, and married a daughter of Liu Pu 劉普 the King of Zhending. He was the father of the Lady Guo Shengtong, first empress of Emperor Guangwu, but died about 20 when the Lady was still a child.

When Guo Chang's widow, known as Mistress Guo 郭主, died in 50, Guangwu arranged for Guo Chang's coffin to be disinterred and brought to the capital to be buried with her, and gave him posthumous honours as a marquis. -HHS 10B:402-03.

Guo Chang 郭敞 [Taizhong 泰中]; Yingchuan. Son of Guo Yi and brother of Guo Shen, he held office at court under the Wei. -SGZ 14:436.

Guo [Changxin] 郭長信; Taiyuan. A fellow-countryman of Guo Tai, he was sponsored by him and became well-known and respected. -HHS 68/58:2231.

Guo Chen 郭謙; Dong. As Cao Cao was attacking Zhang Lu in Hanzhong in 215, he was faced with resistance from Zhang Lu's brother Zhang Wei. He intended to retreat, but Guo Chen argued that Zhang Lu was willing to submit, and urged him to press on. Cao Cao was doubtful, but then Zhang Wei was defeated in a confused battle and Zhang Lu indeed surrendered. -SGZ 8:265.

Guo Cheng 郭成; Anping. Younger brother of the Empress Guo of Cao Pi, he died young.

Guo Cheng or his brother Guo Du may have been executed for theft by Bao Xun about 218, but it is possible that a cousin was killed and the two brothers died of natural causes. -SGZ 5:165, 12:384-85.

Guo Cong 郭琮 or Guo Zong 宗. During the 150s Guo Cong was Administrator of Chenliu. He intended to punish the officer Yuan Shuzhi but was dissuaded by Zhu Chen. -XC 4:4b.

Guo Da 郭大 [Big Guo] also as Guo Tai 郭太/泰; Xihe. In 187 Guo Da was a leader of bandits from the Bobo 白波谷 valley in Xihe, claiming affiliation with the Yellow Turbans. They plundered Taiyuan and Hedong. -HHS 8:355, XY:4a.

Guo Dan 郭丹 [Xiaoqing 少卿] (24 BC-AD 62); Nanyang. Known for his honesty, Guo Dan's father Zhi 稚 was Administrator of Lujiang in the last years of Former Han. He bought property on his son's behalf, and though Guo Dan was only seven when his father died he mourned him with great filial piety.

Guo Dan later studied at Chang'an and gained a fine reputation there. Refusing office under Wang Mang, he went with other scholars north into Beidi. In 24 he became a Counsellor Remonstrant for the Gengshi Emperor Liu Xuan and was sent as a commissioner back into Nanyang to restore order there.

As the Gengshi regime was destroyed in 25, most its followers turned to Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, but Guo Dan remained loyal and held mourning for the late ruler. He then sought out the widow and children of Liu Xuan at Luoyang, returned his insignia and retired to his home. In the early 30s the Administrator Du Shi invited him to become his Officer of Merit, but Guo Dan ceded the place to a more senior man of his district; Du Shi admired his self-abnegation.

In 37 Guo Dan was nominated as First Class by the Grand Marshal Wu Han, and became Governor of Bing province. Praised for his honest and peaceable administration, he was transferred to be Emissary to the Southern Xiongnu, then Administrator of Zuopingyi, and in 60 he became Excellency over the Masses. Admired at court for his sense of public duty, he was a close friend and colleague of Hou Ba, Du Lin and other members of the faction about Ma Yuan.

In 61 Guo Dan and his fellow-Excellency Feng Fang were dismissed for having supported false allegations against the Administrator of Longxi Deng Rong. Guo Dan died in the following year at the age of eighty-seven.

Emperor Ming later enquired after Guo Dan's family. Finding they had been left in poverty, he had his sons Yu and Qi sought out and given office. -HHS 27/17:940-42*, XC 1:6b.

Guo Dan 郭耽; Nanyang. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates under Emperor Ling, he was respected for his honesty and loyalty and for the fact that, unlike Zhang Rang and others, he did not contend for power. -HHS 78/68:2533.

Guo Daxian 郭大賢 [Guo Great-Virtue]. A leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range, he was killed by Yuan Shao in 193. -HHS 74/64A:2381, SGZ 8:262, 6:194.

Guo Dian 郭典 [Junye 君業]; Zuopingyi. Administrator of Julu in 184, Guo Dian joined Dong Zhuo in the attack on the Yellow Turbans. It is said that he embarrassed Dong Zhuo by the energy of his attacks and dissuaded the enemy from venturing outside their fortifications, but this may be no more than another slander against the future usurper Dong Zhuo.

Guo Dian then joined Huangfu Song in the final attack on the remnant Yellow Turbans led by Zhang Bao at Xiaquyang. -HHS 71/61:2302, & JJ at 2520 Hui Dong quoting Jiangbiao zhuan.

Guo Du 郭都; Anping. Son of Guo Yong, and a younger brother of the Empress Guo of Cao Pi, he died young. See also sub Guo Cheng 郭成.

Guo Duo 郭多 see Guo Si 郭汜.

Guo Feng 郭鳳; Bohai. An Academician at the Imperial University during the reign of Emperor Zhang, Guo Feng was an expert in divination and the apocrypha and interpreted omens with great accuracy. He correctly foretold the day of his death and had his students prepare the funeral in advance. -HHS 82/72A:2715; Ngo 76:92, DeWoskin 83:56.

Guo [Fengxiao] 郭奉孝 of Yingchuan had a stele set up in his memory. -SJZ 23:4a.

Guo Fu 郭輔 [Fucheng 甫成]; Nan or Nanyang. A worthy private gentleman 處士, with four sons and three daughters, he died at the age of fifty-two and was remembered with a stele. -LS 12:13b-14b.

Guo Fu 郭浮; Anping. Elder brother of the Empress Guo of Cao Pi, he became a county magistrate but died young. -SGZ 5:165.

Guo Gan 郭乾 see Guo Qian 郭虔. -HJJ 18:221.

Guo Gong 郭躬 [Zhongsun 仲孫] (d.94); Yingchuan. Son of Guo Hong 弘, Guo Gong followed his father's tradition of legal scholarship and attracted hundreds of students. He served as a clerk in his commandery and was then called up to the offices at the capital.

During the campaign against the Northern Xiongnu in 73, while the officer Qin Peng was in charge of a detachment from the main army, he killed a man for an offence. Dou Gu, commander of the expedition, arrested Qin Peng and asked he be executed for usurping authority. A majority of the court was in favour of punishment, but Guo Gong argued that at the time of his alleged offence Qin Peng had not been subject to the rule that decisions of life and death lay with the supreme commander, for he had at the critical time held a formally independent command. Emperor Ming accepted this reasoning and Qin Peng was not punished.

Guo Gong also saved the eunuch Sun Zhang after he had issued an edict ordering two brothers to be executed for a murder when only one was legally liable; the emperor suspected the miswriting was deliberate, but Guo Gong persuaded him that it was accidental and thus liable to a lesser penalty.

Guo Gong was then made Director, senior assistant in the Ministry of Justice. He left that office on account of some fault, but after further appointments he became Minister of Justice in 86. Based upon family tradition and his own experience he presented forty-one recommendations for more lenient punishments, and all were approved. He also persuaded Emperor Zhang to extend the application of amnesties, so that fewer criminals were executed and more were sent to exile on the Jincheng frontier: this saved lives and was good for the border country.

Guo Gong died in office. -HHS 46/36:1543-45*.

Guo Gong 郭貢. Inspector of Yu province in 194, as Lü Bu was attempting to seize Yan province from Cao Cao, Guo Gong brought an army into Jiyin. As Xun Yu, commander at Juancheng city, showed no hesitation in defying him, Guo Gong was disconcerted and withdrew. -HHS 70/60:2282, SGZ 10:308; deC 96: 132-133.

Guo Great-Virtue 郭大賢 see Guo Daxian 郭大賢.

Guo He 郭賀 [Qiaoqing 喬卿] (d.64); Guanghan. Guo He's grandfather Guo Jian [or style Jianbo 堅伯?] had been Protector of the Wuhuan under Former Han, but both he and Guo He's father [or uncle?] Youjun 游君 refused to serve under Wang Mang. [There is confusion as to the punctuation about the character 伯 in the text: it may be the second character of the Guo He's grandfather's style, or it may indicate that Guo Youjun was an uncle 伯父 rather than the father of Guo He.]

During the 30s Guo He became a local officer under the Administrator Huang Xing. Huang Xing had some disagreement with Li Rong the Administrator of Hanzhong, and both were called to the capital. From study of the stars, Guo He advised Huang Xing that he should present himself at the imperial prison; if he did so he would escape punishment. Huang Xing followed his advice and was spared, but Li Rong delayed and was executed. Guo He acquired a considerable reputation.

About 40 the Administrator Cai Mao invited Guo He to be his Registrar, and in 44 he correctly interpreted a dream of Cai Mao, in which he plucked a plant growing in a great hall. He told him this meant he would rise to the highest office, and a few days later Cai Mao was appointed Excellency over the Masses. Cai Mao took Guo He with him to Luoyang.

Expert in law, after further appointments Guo He became Director of the Imperial Secretariat, holding that office for six years and advising Emperor Guangwu on precedents. Named a Palace Attendant, he was treated with great favour and granted substantial gifts.

Guo He was later Director of Retainers, Inspector of Ji province and then Inspector of Jing province, where the people hymned his excellent government. When Emperor Ming came on tour to Nanyang in 60 he granted Guo He the robes of an Excellency as sign of his particular favour.

In 61 Guo He returned to the capital as Intendant of Henan. Maintaining a fine reputation for honesty, he held that office for three years until his death. Emperor Ming granted a carriage and a quantity of cash to his family. -HHS 26/16:908-09, HYGZ 10B:146, XC 1: 6a.

Guo He 郭賀 [Huigong 惠公]; Yingchuan. Eldest son of Guo Zhen 鎮, when his father died in 129 Guo He was due to the succession of his marquisate. He ceded it to his youngest brother Guo Shi and went into hiding. After some years the Minister Herald was ordered to seek him out and Guo He was obliged to accept the fief. He later became Minister of Justice.

After Guo He's death, Emperor Shun awarded special posthumous titles to him and to his father Guo Zhen. -HHS 36/26:1545, XC 5b; Vervoorn 90:120-121.

Guo Heng 郭衡. In 46 Li Mao, General of the Household at the court of Han, came as an envoy to the Xiongnu. At that time Guo Heng, Chinese by origin, was in the service of the Xiongnu prince Bi, claimant to the throne of the Shanyu Punu. Bi sent Guo Heng to present Li Mao with maps of the Xiongnu lands, in token of his willingness to submit to Han. -HHS 89/79: 2942.

Guo Hong 郭弘/宏 [Lingqing 令卿? q.v.]; Yingchuan. Descended from an old official family, Guo Hong became a student of the legal philosophy of Du Zhou 杜周 of Former Han. The Administrator Kou Xun appointed him as his clerk for judicial affairs and Guo Hong determined cases for thirty years. His judgements were given with utmost equity, and none who came before him were left angry or resentful. People compared him to Lord Yu 于公 of Donghai, father of the Imperial Chancellor Yu Dingguo 于定國 and a celebrated adjudicator of Former Han. -HHS 46/36:1543.

During Later Han, the Guo family produced seven Ministers of Justice. Besides Guo Hong, there were Guo Gong, Guo Zhen 鎮, Guo Xian, Guo Xi, Guo He and Guo Zhen 禎.

Guo Hong 郭宏; Yingchuan. Sent to the capital as Reporting Office, Guo Hong impressed the emperor and the court with his detailed and eloquent presentation of the geography, customs and distinguished men of his commandery. -XC 7:14a-b.

Guo Hong 郭闕 (d.162?). In 161, as the Qiang rose in rebellion, Guo Hong was Inspector of Liang province. Old and incompetent, he was jealous of the Protector Duan Jiong, and when Duan Jiong wanted to lead his troops forward Guo Hong prevented him. Angry at being kept from their home country, the Auxiliaries of Huangzhong mutinied. Guo Hong put the blame on Duan Jiong, and Duan Jiong was dismissed and sent to prison.

In the following year Huangfu Gui came into the province to deal with the rebels. He impeached Guo Hong, who was dismissed and may have been executed. -HHS 65/55:2133-34, 2147.

Guo Hong 郭鴻/洪; Chenliu. Son of Guo Xi, Guo Hong was Administrator of Wuyuan about 180 and then Director of Retainers. He was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 46/36:1546, HHSJJ 8:312 Hui Dong.

Guo Hu 郭扈. In 91, after the power of the Dou family was destroyed by Emperor He and his eunuch allies, the minister Ma Guang was sent to his estates on account of his association with the fallen faction. Dou Xian's slave Yu Dang had unsuccessfully sought help from Ma Guang, and was bitterly resentful at being rejected. When government officers captured Yu Dang, he claimed that Ma Guang had been actively involved in a treasonous plot with Dou Xian. Unable to disprove the allegations, Ma Guang killed himself. Later Guo Hu, who had also been a slave in the household of Dou Xian, came forward with evidence to exonerate Ma Guang. -DGHJ 12:4b, HHS 24/14:858.

Guo Huai 郭淮 [Boji 伯濟] (d.255); Taiyuan. Son of Guo Wen, Guo Huai was nominated Filial and Incorrupt about 205, and became Assistant Administrator in Pingyuan. When Cao Pi was appointed General of the Household for All Purposes in 211 Guo Huai was summoned to join his personal staff; he later transferred to be an adviser to Cao Cao. He accompanied the campaign which captured Hanzhong in 215, then remained there as an acting major under Xiahou Yuan.

In 219 Liu Bei was victorious in the battle at Dingjun Mountain, and Xiahou Yuan was killed. Guo Huai was ill and missed the battle, but he took a leading role in restoring order among the scattered and demoralised troops, and he assisted Zhang He to establish a defensive position on the Han River. As Liu Bei advanced to follow up his success, most commanders wanted to hold the line of the Han, but Guo Huai argued that they should withdraw some distance to entice the enemy over, then hope to attack while he was half-way across. This was done, but Liu Bei saw the trap and did not advance. When Cao Cao arrived he was unable to restore the situation, but he fully approved Guo Huai's actions.

When Cao Pi took power in 220 he enfeoffed Guo Huai as a secondary marquis. He also promoted him to be senior staff officer to Zhang He and named him Protector of the Army against the Qiang, to assist Zhang He and Yang Qiu attack the hills bandits of Zuopingyi led by Zheng Gan and Wang Zhao. The two men surrendered, and the region about Chang'an was settled.

Later that year, as Cao Pi took the imperial throne, Guo Huai was sent to offer congratulations, but he was taken ill on the road and arrived late, so that the ceremony had to be delayed. Cao Pi reprimanded him, and enquired why he should not punish him, as the Great Yu 禹 had done to a similarly tardy officer. With ready wit, Guo Huai replied that Cao Pi's regime resembled that of the legendary Five Emperors 五帝, who did not inflict such punishments and were thus superior even to Yu. Cao Pi was pleased. He granted Guo Huai a village marquisate and appointed him Inspector of the new Yong 雍 province, extending from the valley of the Wei to the Yellow River [deC 96:137]. Guo Huai held administrative and military command in the northwest for more than thirty-five years, and towards the end of his life he was awarded the honours of an Excellency. -SGZ 26:733-36*; Mather 76:545.

Guo Huang 郭璜/瑄 (d.92); Zhending/Changshan. Son of Guo Kuang and a nephew of the first empress of Emperor Guangwu, Guo Huang married Guangwu's daughter the Princess Liu Liliu, and was appointed a gentleman cadet. In 59 he succeeded to his father's fief.

In 89 Guo Huang became Steward of the Changle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager Dou, and he was a close associate of the Dou family. When Dou Xian was destroyed by Emperor He in 92, Guo Huang and his son Ju were charged with treason and died in prison. Members of their household were exiled to Hepu, and other kinsmen were dismissed from office. -HHS 10B:403-04, 23/13:819.

Guo Huang 郭璜 (d.141). In 129 Xu Yu urged that the empire should re-establish control and settlement in the northwest. Guo Huang was accordingly sent as Internuncio to supervise reconstruction in Anding, Beidi, Shang, Longxi and Jincheng commanderies.

Guo Huang later became Administrator of Anding. When Ma Xian was killed by the Judong Qiang in 141, Guo Huang was arrested and died in prison, presumably for failure to support the general in his fatal campaign. -HHS 6:256, 271, 87/77:2893; deC 84: 117.

Guo Hui 郭惠; Henei. Son of a magistrate and brother of Guo Zhongqi, Guo Hui served as chancellor of a county marquisate, was a member of the Imperial Secretariat, and became Chancellor of Jibei. -LS 9:1a-3a.

Guo Ji 郭伋 [Chouhou 紬侯 or possibly Xihou 緄侯] (38 BC-AD 47); Youfufeng [or Henan?]. A man of good lineage, Guo Ji's father Fan 梵 had been Administrator of Shu commandery under Former Han. Guo Ji held clerical office at the capital in the time of Emperor Ai and was later appointed Commandant of Yuyang. In the time of Wang Mang he was the head of Shanggu commandery and then Governor of Bing province.

When the Gengshi Emperor established his government in 23, he put Guo Ji in charge of Zuopingyi so that he might bring the people, and particularly the powerful local families, under control. When Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, took the throne, he first appointed Guo Ji as Governor of Yong 雍 province in the northwest, then brought him to court as Director of the Imperial Secretariat. Guo Ji became known for loyal criticism and argument.

In 28 Guo Ji was sent out as Administrator of Zhongshan, and after the destruction of Peng Chong in the following year he was transferred again to Yuyang. Having suffered in the troubles under Wang Mang, the territory had been a centre of Peng Chong's short-lived state. The people were restless, but Guo Ji settled the commandery by good faith and rewards on the one hand, and strict punishment of bandits on the other. He also raised local troops to oppose Xiongnu raiders and established a successful plan of defence on the frontier. The territory was at peace and in five years the population doubled through immigration from less settled regions.

Guo Ji was associated with Du Lin, Zheng Xing and other members of the faction linked to their fellow-countryman Ma Yuan. When the Excellency Song Hong was dismissed in 31 there was general pressure for Guo Ji to take his place, but Emperor Guangwu preferred his brother-in-law Li Song.

As banditry broke out in Yingchuan in 33, Guo Ji was called to the capital, welcomed by the emperor, and named as Administrator there. Arriving in the commandery he persuaded the hills bandits Zhao Hong and Shao Wu to surrender, and had them and their followers return to farming. He granted pardons without reference to the throne, but the emperor was delighted at his report and gave retrospective approval. It is said that through Zhao Hong and Shao Wu the reputation of Guo Ji was spread south to the Yangzi and north across the plain, so great numbers of former rebels and bandits came to offer submission on his lenient terms.

In 35, after the failure of several attacks on the northern pretender Lu Fang, based in Wuyuan and allied to the Xiongnu, Guangwu ordered that the provincial entity of Shuofang be combined with Bing province, and appointed Guo Ji as Governor. Guo Ji passed by the capital to attend audience and offer his thanks, and the emperor held a great banquet in his honour. He presented him with chariots and horses, raiment and other riches, but Guo Ji, no doubt recalling his rejection as an Excellency, took the opportunity to urge Guangwu not to rely too heavily upon his fellow-countrymen from Nanyang.

As he came to his new territory Guo Ji made a point of asking all the people he met about their problems and sufferings, and his reputation for courtesy and leniency spread across the province [XHS, cited by Bn 80:181 tells how on one occasion he promised a group of boys that he would come to their town on a certain day, and when he found that he was a day early he stayed outside until the appointed time]. He issued a reward for Lu Fang's head and in the following year Lu Fang's general Sui Yu changed sides, subverted his troops, and tried to capture Lu Fang. Lu Fang fled to the Xiongnu and Guangwu's government took over the northern commanderies.

In 46, now old and ill, Guo Ji asked to retire. He returned to the capital as a Palace Counsellor and was given a mansion, with furniture and food to fill it. It is said that he kept nothing for himself but gave away everything he received, even to distant relatives. When he died in 47 at the age of eighty-six, Emperor Guangwu came to the funeral and granted land for Guo Ji's tomb. -HHS 31/21:1091-93*, DGHJ 15:4b, XHS 3:3b-4a; Bn 79:60. [DGHJ suggests that Guo Ji came from Henan, and both DGHJ and XHS have his style as Xihou.]

Guo Ji 郭濟; Nanyang. Some time after the former Excellency Guo Dan had died in 62, Emperor Ming enquired after his family. When told they had been left in poverty he had his sons Guo Yu and Guo Ji sought out and given office. Guo Ji later became Chancellor of Zhao. -HHS 27/17:942.

Guo Jia 郭嘉 [Fengxiao 孝奉] (170-207); Yingchuan. Realising the danger of civil war, in the early 190s Guo Jia went north to Yuan Shao, who treated him with great courtesy. After a few weeks, however, he warned Xin Ping and Guo Tu that their master did not have the qualities of a successful leader: his courtesy would not make men serve him effectively, and though he made many plans he lacked the will to carry them out. His friends resolved to stay with Yuan Shao, but Guo Jia went to Cao Cao, and in 196 he became a clerical officer in the puppet Han government. He was then recommended by Xun Yu, had a most successful interview, and was appointed to Cao Cao's staff in the office of Minister of Works. He appears to have been close to Xun Yu's kinsman Xun You, and their advice often coincided.

During the final campaign against Lü Bu in 198, though Lü Bu was repeatedly defeated in the field, he withdrew to the defences of Xiapi city while Cao Cao's army was exhausted and suffering from sickness. Cao Cao considered withdrawal, but Guo Jia pressed him to finish the job, and Lü Bu was indeed destroyed. Later, though he argued Cao Cao could not afford the opprobrium of killing the fighting chieftain Liu Bei when he surrendered, he urged against giving him any freedom of action.

Liu Bei did escape in 199, and in the following year he was threatening Cao Cao from the south as Yuan Shao approached from the north. Guo Jia emphasised that Yuan Shao would be slow to move, and there was time to attack Liu Bei and drive him away. He gave similar advice on the potential threat from Sun Ce, warlord south of the Yangzi. In each case his strategy proved correct.

In 203, when Cao Cao attacked Yuan Shao's sons Yuan Tan and Yuan Shang, he gained rapid success, and it was proposed that he should press forward. Guo Jia argued rather that he should withdraw, for the two brothers were rivals for the succession to their late father, and would quarrel if they were left alone. Cao Cao followed this advice, and the brothers indeed came to self-destructive conflict. Soon afterwards, when Yuan Tan sent Xin Pi to seek assistance from Cao Cao, Guo Jia assisted his embassy. Cao Cao's intervention allowed him to defeat the brothers separately.

After final victory in 205, Guo Jia encouraged Cao Cao to recruit leading scholars from the north so as to strengthen his acceptance in the region.

In 207, as Cao Cao prepared to attack the Wuhuan chieftain Tadun, supporter of the refugee Yuan brothers, some of his advisers were concerned at the possibility of an attack from Liu Bei in alliance with Liu Biao. Guo Jia, however, argued that Liu Biao would be slow to move, and would not want to give Liu Bei too much independent authority. He urged Cao Cao to a swift attack, and accompanied him on the successful campaign.

As the army was on its way back, Guo Jia became ill and died. Cao Cao mourned him deeply, wrote a commemorative memorial to the emperor, and had him posthumously enfeoffed as a marquis. At the time of the Red Cliffs debacle in the following year he remarked that "Had Guo Jia still been with us, I would never have got into such trouble." -SGZ 14:431-35*.

Guo [Jianbo] 郭監伯. An Acting Internuncio in 56, Guo Jianbo was sent with a team of labourers to repair the road to the summit of Mount Tai in preparation for the imperial Feng and Shan sacrifices. -Bn 79:174, 234.

Guo Jing 郭竟; Zhending/Changshan. A cousin of the Lady Guo Shengtong, the first empress of Emperor Guangwu, Guo Jing commanded cavalry under Guangwu, was enfeoffed, and became Chancellor of Donghai. -HHS 10A:403-04.

Guo Jiu 郭究 [Changquan 長全] (157-184); Henei. Son of Guo Xian, and a man of official family, Guo Jiu joined the commandery staff, served as an Investigator and also acted as a county magistrate. He then became an Attendant Officer under the Director of Retainers, but died at the age of twenty-eight. He was remembered with a stele. -LS 10:20a-22a, 21:21b-22a.

Guo [Jitong] 郭季通. Guo Jitong was Assistant Administrator of Jingzhao about 30 when Ban Biao sent him a letter which praised the literary ability of Liu Gong. -HHS 30/20A:1047.

Guo Ju 郭舉 (d.92); Zhending/Changshan. Guo Ju was a son of Guo Huang and, through his mother, a grandson of Emperor Guangwu. He married a daughter of Dou Xian, and at the beginning of the reign of Emperor He both Guo Ju and his father were close associates of the Dou faction. A Palace Attendant and colonel in the Northern Army, Guo Ju had regular access to the apartments of the Dowager Dou within the imperial palace.

As the power of the Dou was destroyed by Emperor He in 92, Guo Huang and Guo Ju were charged with treason and died in prison. Members of their household were exiled to Hepu and other kinsmen were dismissed from office. It was also alleged that Guo Ju had been a particular intimate of the Dowager [the phrase 得幸 commonly describes the sexual favours shown by an emperor for an attractive concubine], but the accusation may have been devised by Emperor He and his supporters to eliminate the Dowager's influence. - HHS 10B:404, 23/13:819.

Guo Jun 郭駿; Zhending/Changshan. Son of Guo Xun, he succeeded to his fief. In 70, like his cousins Guo Song and Guo Qin, he was implicated in the alleged conspiracy of Liu Ying, King of Chu, and was deprived of his fief. In 78 Emperor Zhang re-enseffed Guo Jun, but he died without sons and the fief was again ended. - HHS 10A:404.

Guo Kai 郭凱. At the end of Han Guo Kai was known as an expert player of "surrounding chess" 圍碁 [Japanese Go]. - SGZ 1:54.

Guo Kuang 郭況 (10-59); Zhending/Changshan. Son of Guo Chang, a man of local family, and his wife a daughter of Liu Pu 劉普 the King of Zhending, Guo Kuang was brother of Guo Shengtong, first empress of Emperor Guangwu. Guo Chang died early and the children were brought up by their mother. When his sister, then Honoured Lady, bore her first son Liu Qiang in 25, Guo Kuang was sixteen. It is said Guangwu admired his careful conduct, and appointed him as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. When the Lady became empress in the following year Guo Kuang was enfeoffed as a marquis. As an imperial relative by marriage he was surrounded by clients and retainers, but he maintained a reputation for courtesy and generosity.

In 38 Guo Kuang was appointed Colonel of the City Gates. Though his sister was replaced as empress by the Lady Yin in 41, the family continued to receive favour. In that same year Guo Kuang was granted a larger fief, and in 44 he was appointed Minister Coachman. The emperor called frequently at his residence, often invited him to the palace, and presented him with gold, coins, silk and brocade. Guo Kuang became so wealthy that his mansion in Luoyang was known as the "Golden Cave" 金穴; his son Guo Huang married one of Guangwu's daughters.

When the emperor died in 57 his son Liu Jing, the erratic King of Shanyang, forged a letter in Guo Kuang's name urging his nephew the former Heir Liu Qiang to rebel. Liu Qiang reported the matter at once, and neither he nor Guo Kuang appear to have suffered. Guo Kuang, indeed, was appointed Specially Advanced, the same status as the ruler's own maternal uncles Yin Shi and Yin Jiu, and both groups of relatives continued to receive the same favour.

When Guo Kuang died in 59 the emperor attended the funeral and paid most generous expenses. - HHS 10B:402-03; Bn 79:119-120.

Guo Kuang 郭匡 (d.54); Zhending/Changshan. Brother of Guo Jing and cousin of the Lady Guo Shengtong, first empress of Emperor Guangwu, he was enfeoffed and became a Palace Counsellor. - HHS 10A:403-04.

Guo Liang 郭梁; Zhending/Changshan. Younger brother of Guo Chang and uncle of the Lady Guo Shengtong, first empress of Emperor Guangwu, he died young and left no sons. In his honour, Guangwu enfeoffed his son-in-law Chen Mao. - HHS 10A:403.

Guo Liang 郭涼 [Gongwen 公文]; Youbeiping. Presumably a kinsman of Guo Ji, Guo Liang was eight feet tall [185 cm], fierce and strong, but also a keen scholar of the Confucian classics and histories. First appointed to local military office by Zhu Fu the Governor of You province, Guo Liang distinguished himself in the campaigns against Peng Chong during the 20s, and was rewarded with a county marquise.

Nominated Administrator of Yanmen in 33, he took part in the attack of Du Mao against Yin You, who held the commandery for Lu Fang. Their forces were heavily defeated. In 36, when Lu Fang's position collapsed and he was forced to take refuge with the Xiongnu, Yin You's officers Jia Dan and others killed Yin You and came to Guo Liang to surrender. Guo Liang recommended they be rewarded with enfeoffment. He went forward into Yanmen, put down troublemakers, notably the powerful Xun family, and settled the commandery within a fortnight.

Known throughout the north for his understanding of the frontier, Guo Liang was also recognised at court for his sensible advice. As reward for his success in Yanmen, Emperor Guangwu appointed one of his sons as a gentleman cadet. - HHS 22/12:777.

Guo Liang 郭亮/諒 [Hengzhi 恆直]; Runan. As a young man Guo Liang was a student of the private tutor Di Zhoufu, and then of the Excellency Li Gu at Luoyang. When Li Gu and Du Qiao were executed in 147 the General-in-Chief Liang Ji had their bodies displayed and ordered that anyone who approached them would be killed. Bearing instruments of execution, Guo Liang asked to collect the corpses, and though permission was refused he still carried out mourning rituals, and persuaded Yang Kuang, who had been sponsored by Du Qiao, to support him.

The two men were arrested and interrogated, but the regent Dowager Liang ordered that they should not be punished and allowed them to continue. Both men were widely admired. -HHS 63/53:2088, XC 8:5b.

Guo [Lingqing] 郭令卿. JS 20:923 refers to Guo Lingqing as compiler of Hanlü zhangju 漢律章句, a commentary to the laws of Han. Lingqing may have been the style or a sobriquet of Guo Hong 弘, or it may refer to his son Guo Gong.

Guo [Linong] 郭林宗 see Guo Tai 郭泰. The father of the historian Fan Ye had the personal name Tai 泰, so Guo Tai's personal name appears as 太, and he is frequently referred to by his style, Linong.

Guo Mai 郭脈 see Guo Sheng 郭勝. -HHJ 25:305.

Guo Meng 郭孟; Guanghan. Guo Meng was the husband of the Lady Yang Jingyang q.v. -HYGZ 10C:177.

Guo Min 郭旻 [Jugong 巨公] (d.158); Chenliu. A nephew of Guo Zhen 鎮 of Yingchuan and elder brother of Guo Xi, Guo Min held local office in his commandery and province. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he became a gentleman cadet and was then an Internuncio. After appointment as a county magistrate he served in the Ministry of Justice and then transferred to the Censorate.

Guo Min left office for a time when his father died, but he received another nomination and returned to his censorial post. Appointed Inspector of Ji province, he did well in that post, returned to the capital as an officer of the Secretariat, and was later Administrator of Danyang. -LS 24:16a-17b, LX 3:3a-5a, 19:1a-2b, HHSJJ 46/36:1658 Hui Dong.

Guo Mu 郭睦. In 219 Guo Mu was Liu Bei's Administrator of Nanxiang commandery in the north-west of Jing province. He was defeated by Sun Quan's general Lu Xun. -SGZ Wu 13:1345.

Guo Pei 郭配 [Zhongnan 仲南]; Taiyuan. Second son of Guo Wen and younger brother of Guo Huai, he became well known and served as a commandery Administrator under Wei. -SGZ 26:736.

Guo Pu 郭溥. In 195 Emperor Xian sent Guo Pu, an officer of the Secretariat, to persuade Guo Si to let the court continue east. In the following year, as the imperial party came to Xu city under Cao Cao's control, Guo Pu was one of those enfeoffed for good service. -HHS 72/62:2339, 2342.

Guo Qian 郭虔/乾 [Junxian 君賢] (d.141); Zuopingyi. As Deputy Director of the Imperial Secretariat, in 129 Guo Qian joined the Director Zuo Xiong to protest the harsh administration of the law. Noting that there had been a series of earthquakes and floods, and that, despite amnesties, banditry was endemic over much of the northern plain, they argued that the policy whereby one man's offence could bring the extermination of his whole family served only to spread trouble, and there should be more official restraint and opportunity for reform.

Guo Qian was succeeded as Deputy Director by Hu Guang, but he remained a member of the Secretariat and was associated with the conservative group which formed about Hu Guang. In 132 it was suggested that the emperor should select his empress by lot, so that spiritual powers might be involved, but Guo Qian, Hu Guang and Shi Chang argued the decision should be based upon quality of lineage. So the Lady Liang Na was chosen, and her family began its domination of the court.

Later that year Zuo Xiong, Director of the Secretariat, proposed tightening the processes of selection for office. Guo Qian, Hu Guang and Shi Chang claimed that the traditional system worked well and was supported by a majority of officials, but the emperor approved the reforms.

Guo Qian later became Minister of the Household, and in 137 he was appointed Excellency of Works. He died in office four years later. -HHS 61/51:2019, 44/34:1505-06, 6:266 & 271, HHJ 18:221 [as 郭乾]

Guo Qin 郭欽. As Colonel in the Western Regions under Wang Mang in 16 AD, Guo Qin led a raid on Yanqi [Karashar]. He was promoted general and granted enfeoffment.

In 23 Guo Qin was one of the Nine Tiger generals [each with the character 虎 in his title] commanding Wang Mang's last field army against Han. They tried to hold the mouth of the Wei River, but were defeated and scattered by Deng Ye and Yu Kuang. Guo Qin and two remaining generals gathered some troops and took refuge in the Capital Granary. Their firm defence prevented the main army of Han from advancing against Chang'an, but the capital was stormed by local irregulars and Wang Mang was killed. Guo Qin and his colleagues then surrendered, and the Gengshi Emperor rewarded them with fiefs. -Dubs 55:467, QHX:140.

Guo Qin 郭勤; Zhending/Changshan. Son of Guo Song, he was evidently due to succeed to his fief in 70, but then Guo Song was posthumously accused of involvement with the conspiracy of Liu Ying, King of Chu, and the fief was abolished. In 77 Emperor Zhang enfeoffed Guo Qin with a village. He died without sons and the fief was again ended. -HHS 10A:404.

Guo Quan 郭全; Taiyuan. In the second half of the second century Guo Quan served as Minister of Finance. -SGZ 26:734.

Guo Rou 郭柔; Chenliu. Son of Guo Xi and younger brother of Guo Hong, he was a Consultant under Emperor Ling. -HHSJJ 46/36:1658 quoting Shen Qinhan.

Guo Shen 郭深; Yingchuan. Son of Guo Yi, after his father's death about 217 Guo Shen inherited the fief which had been awarded posthumously to his grandfather Guo Jia. -SGZ 14:436.

Guo Sheng 郭勝; Changshan. A local bandit in the late 20s, Guo Sheng was killed by Fan Yan. -HHS 28/18A:977.

Guo Sheng 郭勝 also as Guo Mai 脈; Nanyang. A eunuch, Guo Sheng was a Regular Attendant during the 180s and was enfeoffed as a marquis. In 189 Jian Shi planned to assassinate the General-in-Chief He Jin, uncle of the new Little Emperor Liu Bian, and he discussed this with other senior eunuchs. Guo Sheng, however, a fellow-countryman of the He clan, was closely involved with their fortunes. He warned He Jin, and He Jin had Jian Shi arrested and killed. -HHS 78/68:2535, 69/59:2248, HHJ 25:305 [as Guo Mai].

Guo Shengtong 郭聖通, the Lady (d.54); Zhending/Changshan: Empress of Emperor Guangwu. The Lady was a daughter of Guo Chang, a man of local family, and his wife who was a daughter of Liu Pu 劉普 the King of Zhending. Her father died early and she was brought up by her mother.

When Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, was commissioner to Ji province in 24, the Lady Guo was presented to him for his harem, and she provided a useful connection to the leading families of the north. As Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 he named her an Honoured Lady, and in that year she bore him a son, Liu Qiang. In 26 he appointed the Lady as his empress and Liu Qiang as Heir.

In 41 Guangwu dismissed the Lady Guo and replaced her with the Lady Yin Lihua. Sources say this was because of the empress's jealousy and poor character, but Bielenstein argues that it was a result of pressure from the powerful families of Nanyang, and the reduced importance of the Lady Guo's connections in the north. The Lady was named Queen Dowager of Zhongshan and was permitted to reside in the Northern Palace at Luoyang, while her second son Liu Fu was promoted from Duke to King of Zhongshan and had Changshan commandery added to his fief; he was evidently formally responsible for her support, and the augmentation may have been designed to assist with her revenues. In 44 the fief and title of Liu Fu and the Lady were transferred to Pei.

The Guo family continued to receive favour. The Lady's brother Guo Kuang received valuable donations, and when their mother died in 50 the emperor himself attended her funeral and gave posthumous honours to the late Guo Chang. When the Lady died in 52 she was given state burial in the Beimang hills north of Luoyang.

In 86 Emperor Zhang visited the homeland of the Guo family, held a great feast and gave presents to her kinsmen. -HHS 10A:402-05; Bn 67:21-29, Bn 79:114-120.

Guo Shi 郭時; Yingchuan. Guo Shi was the youngest son of Guo Zhen 鎮. When Guo Zhen died in 129 Guo Shi's elder brother He was due to the succession of his marquisate, but Guo He ceded the fief to Guo Shi. -HHS 36/26:1545.

Guo Shi 郭石 (d.187); Lingling. In 187, probably as successors to Guan Gu, Guo Shi and Zhou Chao were leaders of bandits in Lingling, Guiyang and Changsha. They were destroyed by Sun Jian, Administrator of Changsha. -SGZ Wu 1:1095; deC 90:103-104.

Guo Shou 郭守. In 26 Guo Shou was a general under the command of Cen Peng in unsuccessful operations against the rebels Dong Xin and Deng Feng in Nanyang. -HHS 17/7:656.

Guo Shun 郭順; Henei. Son of a magistrate and brother of Guo Zhongqi, Guo Shun became a county magistrate, then Inspector of Xu province, and was later Chancellor of Zhongshan and of Jibei. -LS 9:1a-3a, 21:20b.

Guo Si 郭汜 also Guo Duo 多; Zhangye. An officer in the service of Dong Zhuo, in 192 Guo Si was sent by Niu Fu, with Li Jue and other commanders, to raid Yingchuan and Chenliu. By the time they returned to Hongnong Dong Zhuo had been assassinated and Niu Fu killed by his own troops. With no good will shown by the new regime at Chang'an, Guo Si joined Li Jue and his colleagues in attacking the capital and seizing power.

For the next three years, with title as a general and enfeoffment, Guo Si held second rank to Li Jue in the ramshackle government at Chang'an. In 194 he joined Fan Chou to defeat Ma Teng and Han Sui, and later drove rebel Qiang from Youfufeng, but in 195 endemic feuding came to a head when Li Jue killed Fan Chou. Guo Si became nervous, and his concern was encouraged by his wife, who was jealous that he might be having an affair with one of Li Jue's serving-maids. The crisis came when Guo Si, invited to a banquet, suspected he had been poisoned and took an emetic of diluted excrement. As each gathered troops against the other, Li Jue seized the emperor and plundered the palace while Guo Si kidnapped senior ministers of the court.

Faction fighting continued for months until in early autumn Emperor Xian bluffed his way out of the capital and began to move east. Guo Si tried several times to get him into his own control, but he was put off with excuses and was not strong enough to force the issue. He retired briefly to the south, but then joined Li Jue in pursuit of the imperial cortège. After an abortive attempt to ally with Duan Wei the warlord of Huayin, Li Jue and Guo Si pursued the emperor and his escort, with bloody skirmishes, east through Hongnong, until the ruler escaped across the Yellow River north into Hedong. [Xie Cheng says that Guo Si captured the wives of the imperial officials and cut the hair off the good-looking ones; it is likely their fate was even less fortunate.]

After a final bout of plunder and slaughter, Li Jue and Guo Si agreed to a notional peace, handed back some prisoners and booty, and returned to the west. Guo Si had a base at Mei, the former fortress of Dong Zhuo west of the capital; he was killed there by his officer Wu Xi. -HHS 72/62:2332-42*, SGZ 6:181-87*, XC 7:13b.

Guo Si 郭汜, wife of. During the early 190s Guo Si frequently went to drinking parties with his colleague Li Jue. His wife was jealous, and concerned that her husband might be having an affair with one of Li Jue's women. When Li Jue sent a present of some food, therefore, the Lady added some poisonous beans, then picked them out as if they had come with the gift and warned him to be careful.

Next time he went to Li Jue, Guo Si became drunk, then thought that he had been poisoned and made himself an emetic with liquid excrement. Li Jue was offended and the two leaders went to war. -HHS 72/62:2337, SGZ 6:183; deC 96:149-150.

Guo Song 郭嵩; Zhending/Changshan. Son of Guo Jing, he succeeded to his fief about 60, but died about 70. Soon afterwards he was posthumously accused of involvement with the alleged conspiracy of Liu Ying, King of Chu, and the marquissate was abolished. -HHS 10A:404.

Guo Tai 郭泰/太 [Linzong 林宗] (127/128-169); Taiyuan. The personal name of this man was Tai 泰, but Fan Ye, author of HHS, avoided taboo on the personal name of his own father by writing it as 太. Guo Tai is also referred to in many texts by his style, Linzong.

Guo Tai was the son of a poor family. After his father died when he was young, his mother thought to indenture him as a servant in the county office. Guo Tai persuaded her that this would disgrace his father and that he should be free to study. At the age of twenty, having borrowed 5,000 cash from his elder sister's husband, he travelled to Henan to study the Chunqiu under Qu Boyan. Barely clothed and seldom eating, he completed his course in only three years.

Eight feet tall [185 cm] and well built, with a voice clear as a bell and skilled in conversation, Guo Tai came to Luoyang in the early 150s. At first he made no mark, but about 160 his quality was recognised by Fu Rong, who introduced him to Li Ying the Intendant of Henan. Li Ying was immensely impressed and became his close friend, while Guo Tai's reputation now dominated the capital. A few years later, as Guo Tai was returning to his home country in the north, all the officials and scholars came to escort him to the crossing of the Yellow River. Li Ying was the only person to accompany him in the boat, and the vast crowd is said to have gazed upon them as if at a vision of two immortals.

Guo Tai was invited to office by the Excellency Huang Qiong and was recommended as Knowing the Way by the minister Zhao Dian, but he refused all such offers. He explained that he preferred to study the heavens by night and the affairs of men during the day, that he sought the spirit of nature in the trigrams of the Book of Changes, and that he saw no future for the state of Han. He remained in the region of the capital, travelling as a scholar and a teacher and holding immense influence. There are a multitude of anecdotes about his praise and admonition, his exemplary conduct and his sponsorship of men from humble origins who later distinguished themselves: Mao Rong, Meng Min, Shentu Pan and Yu Cheng were among them, and the sympathy he showed Zuo Yuan kept him from murder. He was also known for his fondness of wine.

By the middle 160s Guo Tai was recognised by the reformists and students at the Imperial University, his judgements of men determined their success, his private students were numbered in the thousands, and the most senior officials came to seek his approval. He was even a leader of fashion: on one occasion he was caught in the rain while travelling and a corner of his headgear drooped down; soon other men were wearing hats with folded corners like the "Linzhong cap." When his mother died he enhanced his reputation by his mourning for her, becoming so ill that he vomited blood [cf., however, sub Chen Ji].

Though Guo Tai was a leader amongst those who emphasised individual morality and rejected the corruption of the court and an official career, he restricted his opinions to matters of personal character, and made no specific comment on political controversies or affairs of state. At the time of the First Faction Incident of 166 it appears that he retired to his home, maintaining a private academy with thousands of students. And as the fall of Dou Wu and Chen Fan in 168 brought down many worthy men, Guo Tai mourned their fate but was not himself involved.

When Guo Tai died early in 169, thousands came from all parts of the empire to attend his funeral. Cai Yong was commissioned to compose the inscription for a stele in his honour, remarking that this was the only occasion he felt able to compose a flattering piece without embarrassment. Vervorn remarks that the "combination of moral seriousness and studied elegance in Guo Tai ... makes him the epitome of Confucian eremitism of the last hundred years of Han."

HHS 68/58 says that Guo Tai was forty-two sui when he died, but the inscription composed by Cai Yong says he was forty-three. He was therefore born either in 127 or in 128. -HHS 68/58:2225-31*, 67/57:2187, XC 4:9b-10b, XHS 5:2b-3a, Cai 2:1, Nagata 94:176, SJZ 6:7a-b; Mather 76:546, deC 89:44-47, Vervorn 90:170-179.

Guo Tai 國泰; Le'an. Guo Tai was a son of Guo Yuan. When Cao Pi succeeded Cao Cao early in 220 he appointed him a Gentleman at court. -SGZ 2:59, 11:340.

Guo Tai 郭太 see also Guo Da 郭大.

Guo Tang 郭唐; Xindu. In 23 Guo Tang was a senior member of commandery staff. As Wang Lang took the imperial title the greater part of the north accepted his claim, but Ren Guang the Administrator of Xindu refused to submit; Guo Tang and other officers supported him in maintaining loyalty to Han. They raised troops against the pretender and welcomed Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time a commissioner of the Gengshi Emperor.

Guo Tang became known for his ability and Emperor Guangwu appointed him Intendant of Henan, the capital commandery. -HHS 21/11:751-53.

Guo Tu 郭圖 [Gongze 公則] (d.205); Yingchuan. About 189 Guo Tu was sent to the capital as Reporting Officer by the Administrator Yin Xiu. A friend of his fellow-countryman Han Fu, in 191 Guo Tu encouraged him to hand over Ji province to Yuan Shao; he then became a high officer on the new governor's staff.

Arguing against Ju Shou in 195, Guo Tu persuaded Yuan Shao not to take Emperor Xian under his protection. In 199, again in opposition to Ju Shou, he urged a direct attack on Cao Cao. He was given command of one of the three divisions of the army, and in 200 he took over all Ju Shou's troops.

At the critical point of the Guandu campaign, Guo Tu argued for a raid on Cao Cao's camp rather than sending reinforcements to Chunyu Qiong to defend the supply train. When the camp held out and Chunyu Qiong was destroyed, Guo Tu accused his rival Zhang He of disloyalty: Zhang He went over to Cao Cao and Yuan Shao's army disintegrated. Guo Tu later argued that Shen Pei was also unreliable, but this accusation was properly dismissed.

In the rivalry for the succession to Yuan Shao, Guo Tu and Xin Ping supported Yuan Tan against the younger son Yuan Shang and his partisans Shen Pei and Pang Ji, and in 203 they urged Tan to attack his brother and then to seek aid from Cao Cao. When Cao Cao destroyed Yuan Tan in Bohai in 205, he also killed Guo Tu and his family. -HHS 74/64A:2382-83, 74/64B:2410-17, SGZ 6:194-206.

Guo Wen 郭纘/纘; Taiyuan. Son of Guo Quan, in the late second century Guo Wen was Administrator of Yanmen. -SGZ 26:734.

Guo Xi 郭禧 [Gongfang 公房] (d.179); Chenliu or Yingchuan. [HHS 46/36 says that Guo Xi was a nephew of Guo Zhen 鎮, who came from Yingchuan, but DGHJ, quoted by HHS 8 TC, says that he came from Fugou 扶溝. Fugou county was in Chenliu, close to the border with Yingchuan.]

Guo Xi cared for the affairs of his household when he was young, but he also made a name as a Confucian scholar and was recommended for office. He became Minister Coachman, and in 169 he was appointed Grand Commandant under Emperor Ling. He left office in the following year, after only a few months.

Guo Xi was later Minister of Justice, like his uncle and two cousins before him. In a memorial of 178 Cai Yong praised his maturity and honesty. -HHS 8:331, 46/36:1545-46, 60/50B:1999, LX 19:12b-13a.

Though the main lineage of the family was based on Yangdi, capital of Yingchuan, HHS 8:331 TC says that Guo Xi came from a county in Chenliu, close to the Yingchuan border. It is possible that Guo Xi's [unnamed] father had formally shifted his residence.

Guo Xian 郭憲 [Ziheng 子橫]; Runan. As a young man at the end of Former Han, Guo Xian studied at Chang'an under Wang Zhongzi of Donghai [probably Wang Liang q.v., but possibly Wang Heng/Huang 橫/黃 of Langye: QHX:566, 534, 524-525]. About 1 AD Wang Mang called Wang Zhongzi to court, but Guo Xian argued that it was not appropriate for his master to obey such a summons; the student, Wang Mang, should come to the teacher, not the other way round. As a result, Wang Zhongzi arrived late, but he explained Guo Xian's position to Wang Mang, who was impressed. When Wang Mang took the throne in 9 AD he appointed Guo Xian to his court and awarded him robes. Guo Xian, however, burnt the garments, fled to Donghai and evaded pursuit.

As Emperor Guangwu took the throne in 25, Guo Xian was summoned as Knowing the Way. He became an Academician and in 32 was made Minister of the Household. That year, as the imperial cortège was proceeding to a sacrifice, Guo Xian spat three mouthfuls of wine towards the east. Reported for disrespect, he explained that there had been a fire in the state of Qi and he had just put it out. A report from the east later confirmed the conflagration and its marvellous extinguishment.

In the following year, as Guangwu planned to attack Wei Ao in the west, Guo Xian objected that the east of the empire was still insecure, and he even cut the reins of the emperor's chariot as he was attempting to leave. Guangwu embarked on the campaign, but rebellion broke out in Yingchuan and he was obliged to return; he duly admired Guo Xian's prescience.

About 35 Guangwu held a court conference to discuss reprisals against the Xiongnu, who were raiding the frontiers. Guo Xian was in the minority who opposed the plan, but he argued his case so fiercely that he became ill and had to be escorted from the assembly. Guangwu commented on his obstinacy, but did not proceed with the attacks.

Soon afterwards Guo Xian left office on grounds of ill health. He died at home. -HHS 82/72A:2708-09*; Ngo 76:81-83, DeWoskin 83:48-49.

Guo Xian 郭咸; Henei. Son of a magistrate and brother of Guo Zhongqi, Guo Xian became Prefect of Luoyang. -LS 9:1b, 10:12a.

Guo Xian 郭憲 [Youjian 幼簡] (199-220); Jincheng. A man of local family, admired for his generous nature, Guo Xian became Officer of Merit in his commandery but refused provincial appointment.

In 215, having lost all his troops, the aged rebel Han Sui came for refuge, and Guo Xian, then seventeen, gave him shelter. Some wanted to kill him for the sake of reward, but Guo Xian defended the suppliant.

Soon afterwards Han Sui became ill and died, and his head was taken to Cao Cao by Tian Yue and Yang Kui [cf., however, sub Han Sui]. They told of Guo Xian's involvement, and all three were granted secondary marquises. Guo Xian became well-known and influential, but he died a few years later. -SGZ 11: 350.

Guo Xiang 郭襄. An Internuncio at the court of Emperor Ming, in 59 Guo Xiang was named Protector of the Qiang in place of the disgraced Dou Lin. When he arrived in Liang province and learned how strong the Qiang were, however, he took fright, returned to Luoyang and resigned his position. The office of Protector was again abolished. -HHS 87/77:2880.

Guo Xiang 郭香; Jingzhao. A local clerical officer, in 165 Guo Xiang was sent by the Intendant Yuan Feng to prepare a stele celebrating the completion of work on a temple at Mount Hua which Yuan Feng had inaugurated in 161. -LS 2:3a. See also the following entry.

Guo Xiang 郭香; Jingzhao? An officer of the Bureau of Astronomy in 175, Guo Xiang and his fellow calendarist Liu Gu were criticised by the would-be reformers Feng Guang and Chen Huang, who sought to alter the base year (Sivin 69:59: "working epoch") of the calendar to accord with the apocrypha. Their position was vigorously defended by the great scholar Cai Yong. -HHS 92/2:3040; MBeck 90:60.

At HHSJJ 92/2:3412 Hui Dong suggests this may be the same man as in the entry above.

Guo Xu 過栩翽 became Inspector of Yan province. -FSTY 6f:141.

Guo Xun 郭勳; Zhending/Changshan. Son of Guo Kuang 匡, he succeeded to his fief in 54. -HHS 10A:404.

Guo Xun 郭恂. An officer of the general Dou Gu, in 73 Guo Xun was sent with the colonel Ban Chao as agents to the Western Regions, and he was later Senior Colonel to the Protector-General of the Western Regions Chen Mu at Yanqi [Karashar]. As the Northern Xiongnu returned in force in 75, the people of Yanqi and Qiuzi [Kuqa] attacked Chen Mu's headquarters and killed everyone there. -HHS 47/37:1572-73, 88/78:2928.

Guo Xun 郭訓 [Xianqing 顯卿]. A member of the Suite of the Heir, Guo Xun composed two treatises on calligraphy. -XTS 57:1448; Hou Kang:2117, Yao Zhenzong:2343.

Guo Xun 郭勳. Inspector of You province in 184, Guo Xun was defeated by the Yellow Turban rebels of Guangyang. -HHS 8:349.

Guo Yan 郭晏; Runan. Local trouble-makers, about 160 Guo Yan and a number of his fellows were recruited by the county magistrate Liu Tao, who forgave their crimes and formed them into a strike force to deal with others. The county was settled. -HHS 57/47:1848.

Guo Yi 郭揖. In 169 Guo Yi was a magistrate in Runan, controlling the home county of the man of Faction Fan Pang. When orders came for Fan Pang's arrest he presented himself at the prison. Guo Yi offered to abandon his post and run away with him, but Fan Pang rejected the offer and insisted on facing his fate alone. -HHS 67/57:2207; deC 89:111.

Guo Yi 郭奕 [Boyi 伯益]; Yingchuan. A widower, Guo Yi was intended to marry the Lady Xun Cai, daughter of Xun Shuang and widow of Yin Yu. Rather than abandon her loyalty to her first husband, the Lady killed herself. -HHS 84/74:2799.

While HHS TC identifies this man with Guo Yi the son of Guo Jia below, and quotes from the Wei shu which gives the style of that Guo Yi, later scholars agree that the dates do not match and they were two different men. See sub Xun Cai.

Guo Yi 郭奕 [Boyi 伯益]; Yingchuan. Son of Guo Jia, in 207 Guo Yi was granted the posthumous title which had been awarded to his father.

After Cao Pi was named Heir to Cao Cao, Guo Yi became a Literary Scholar in his household. He died soon afterwards, possibly in the plague of 217. -SGZ 14:435-36, HHS 84/74:2799 [but cf. Guo Yi above].

Guo Yong 郭永; Anping. Members of Guo Yong's family had held low official positions, but Guo Yong became Administrator of Nan commandery. He died about 189, and received posthumous enfeoffment from Cao Pi when he took his daughter as empress. -SGZ 5: 164-65; C/C 99:106-107.

Guo Yong 郭永, wife of: see the Lady Dong 董 III.

Guo Yu 郭宇; Nanyang. Some time after the Excellency Guo Dan was dismissed and died in 62, Emperor Ming enquired after his family. When he was told they had been left in poverty, he had his sons Guo Yu and Guo Ji sought out and given office. Guo Yu later became Administrator of Changshan. -HHS 27/17:942.

Guo Yu 郭玉 [Tongzhi 通直]; Guanghan. A student of Cheng Gao, who was a disciple of the Old Man of the Fu River, Guo Yu was skilled in acupuncture 針 and in the medicinal balance of Yin and Yang. He became Assistant Court Physician to Emperor He, and cured many people.

On one occasion the emperor tested his abilities by having a eunuch and a young woman, both of delicate build, present Guo Yu with one arm each, matching and side by side from behind a curtain so that he might read the pulse. Guo Yu identified one as masculine and the other as feminine: Emperor He was impressed.

Guo Yu treated rich and poor with equal dedication, though he was more successful with those of lowly birth. Emperor He had one of his courtiers present himself in shabby clothes, and Guo Yu cured him with a single needle. The emperor asked the reason for the difference, and Guo Yu explained that men of noble birth were more difficult to treat because they disliked physical work and did not care for their health, they frequently failed to follow advice and were sometimes too weak to take strong medicine, while their natural arrogance made him nervous and uncertain in his treatment. Emperor He was again impressed.

Guo Yu died old, still in office. -HHS 82/72B:2735*, HYGZ 10B:151; Ngo 76:116-118, DeWoskin 83:74-76.

Guo Yu 郭昱, the Lady; Anping. Daughter of Guo Yong and elder sister of the Empress Guo of Cao Pi, she married a man of the Meng 孟 family. -SGZ 5:165; C/C 99:108.

Guo Yuan 國淵 [Zini 子尼]; Le'an. A favoured student of Zheng Xuan, in 191 Guo Yuan accompanied Bing Yuan and Guan Ning to refuge in Liaodong. Returning, he became a clerk to Cao Cao, respected for his direct and honest counsel.

Guo Yuan was later given responsibility for setting up military agricultural colonies, and when Cao Cao attacked west in 211 he left Guo Yuan with Cao Pi at Ye city in charge of civil affairs. When the rebel Tian Yin was defeated in the northeast, Guo Yuan argued clemency for his followers, and he refused to exaggerate the victory on the grounds that rebellion marked a failure of government and there was no glory in putting it down. Cao Cao approved.

Guo Yuan then became Administrator of Wei commandery, where his detective work trapped the author of a series of libellous pamphlets. In 213 he was made a minister at the court of Wei, but lived humbly and gave away any surplus income or property. He died in office.

As Cao Pi came to the throne in 220, in recognition of his past loyal service a son or grandson of Guo Yuan was granted the right to appointment as a gentleman cadet. -SGZ 11:339-40*, 2:59.

Guo Yuan 郭援 (d.202); Yingchuan. In 202 Guo Yuan was named Administrator of Hedong by Yuan Shang and sent to conquer the commandery in alliance with Gao Gan and the Southern Shanyu Huchuquan. After initial success, Guo Yuan was defeated and killed at Pingyang on the Fen River by Cao Cao's Director of Retainers Zhong Yao, aided by troops of Ma Teng from the west. -SGZ 13:393.

Guo Zhen 郭鎮 [Huanzhong 桓鍾] (d.129); Yingchuan.

A nephew of Guo Gong, Guo Zhen attended to family affairs when he was young, but later obtained a clerical position under the Grand Commandant and then joined the Imperial Secretariat.

In 125 the eunuch Sun Cheng led a coup to establish Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, and edicts were issued to destroy the Yan clan of the Dowager. Though he was at that time ill in bed, Guo Zhen took command of a group of the palace guards of the Feathered Forest and went to help. He met with Yan Jing, Minister of the Guards, who had gathered a few troops to oppose the coup. After a brief skirmish Yan Jing was arrested, taken to prison and killed there.

On recommendation from the highest officers of state, Guo Zhen was enfeoffed for his work in destroying the Yan group and preserving the dynasty. He became Director of the Secretariat, Intendant of Henan and then Minister of Justice. Leaving office, he died at home, and a special grant of honour was ordered for his tomb. -HHS 46/36:1545.

Guo Zhen 郭禎; Yingchuan. Second son of Guo Zhen 鎮, like his father and his elder brother Guo He, Guo Zhen was learned in the law and became Minister of Justice. -HHS 46/36:1545.

Guo Zhen 郭鎮 [Ji'nan 季南]; Taiyuan. Youngest son of Guo Wen and brother of Guo Huai, Guo Zhen became an Internuncio under Wei. -SGZ 26:736.

Guo Zheng 郭正; Hanyang? A friend of the scholar recluse Fa Zhen, who died in 188, Guo Zheng composed a funerary inscription in his honour. -HHS 83/73:2774; Vervoorn 90:299.

JS 94:2454 says that in the time of Emperor An a certain Guo Zheng 郭整 of Hanyang received eight invitations to appointment in the offices of the Excellencies, and an official carriage was sent to him five times, but he would never accept. This may be a reference to the Guo Zheng of 188, with the reign of the emperor given wrongly.

Guo Zheng 郭政; Dong. About 210 Guo Zheng had an affair with his cousin, then killed her husband Cheng Tu. Arrested and questioned by the commandery officer Feng Liang, both Guo Zheng and the woman withstood the flogging which was intended to force the truth from them. Distressed at the pain he had inflicted, Feng Liang came to believe that he had made a false accusation, but the new county magistrate Hu Zhi noted the sexual relationship between the two. He examined the affair in more detail and found out the truth. -SGZ 27:741.

Guo Zhi 郭芝 [Gongzai 公載]; Nanyang. Administrator of Hanzhong about 100, Guo Zhi played a leading role in restoring a temple to the local worthy Tang Gongfang 唐公房, who in the time of Wang Mang had swept his whole household away into the world of the immortals. -LS 3:9b-11a; Ebrey 80:337.

Guo Zhi 郭晳; Yingchuan. Son of Guo Gong, Guo Zhi became Administrator of Nanyang and left a record of good government. -HHS 46/36:1545.

Guo [Zhongqi] 郭仲奇 (106-171); Henei. Son of a magistrate, Guo Zhongqi became Adjutant of the Northern Army and also served as a county magistrate in Nanyang. A stele was erected in his honour when he died. -LS 9:1a-3a, 21:20b-21a; Ebrey 80:334.

Guo [Ziyu] 郭子瑜; Runan. A stable-boy, Guo Ziyu was recommended for office by the judge of character Xu Shao, and later became celebrated for his quality. -SGZ 23:658.

Guo Zong 郭宗 see Guo Cong 郭琮.

Guo Zu 郭祖; Taishan. In the early 190s Guo Zu, Gongsun Du and other bandit chieftains were given titles by Yuan Shao, but they maintained their positions in the mountains and raided the settled population. Cao Cao's Administrator Lü Qian persuaded them to submit, and their troops became Cao Cao's best soldiers. SGZ 18:540-41. This is probably not the same man as in the entry immediately below.

In 220 a colonel in the Northern Army with personal name Zu and enfeoffment as a village marquis was a sponsor of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. Goodman suggests this man may have been Guo Zu. -LS 19:4a; Goodman 98:197.

Guo Zu 郭祖. About 200 Guo Zu was a leader of pirates by the mouth of the Yellow River. Cao Cao appointed He Kui as Administrator of Le'an, and he restored order. -SGZ 12:380.

Though the names are the same and Taishan is comparatively close to Le'an, this is probably not the same man as above.

Guo Zun 郭遵. Inspector of Yan province, Guo Zun was a senior and distinguished Confucianist. In 142 he was given acting position as a Household Counsellor and was appointed to the special commission of eight sent out to observe the empire. Little came of the enterprise, however, and government remained in the hands of the Liang kinsmen of the empress. -HHS 6:272, 61/51: 2029. [XHS 4:11b has this man's surname as Zhen 甄.]

Gushi Lang 古師郎 also Youshi Lang 右師郎. In 24 Gushi Lang was leader of the Huosuo bandits in the Shandong peninsula. In 26 the group surrendered to Guangwu's agent Fu Long. -HHS 1A:16; Bn 59:80, 135.

Han [River], Old Man on the Bank of the, 漢濱老父 see Old Man on the [Southern] Bank of the Han River 漢陰老父.

Han 韓, the Lady. A concubine of the Gengshi Emperor about 24, she was his regular drinking companion. When an official interrupted them with some business she abused him, beat him and destroyed the documents. -HHS 11/1:471; Bn 59:251.

Han 汗 (d.59); Xiongnu. Younger brother of the founding Southern Shanyu Bi, Han succeeded his next elder brother Mo in 57, taking the title Yifayülü di 伊伐於慮鞮 Shanyu. He died two years later. -HHS 89/79:2948.

Han 韓 [personal name unknown]. Administrator of Wu commandery at some time in the second century, he discussed local worthies of the region with Liu Shengbo. Their conversation was recorded, and though nothing more is known of either man, nor have any details of their talk survived, it may be seen as a symbol of the developing interest in local history. -SGZ Wu 12:1324, and see also sub Zhang Kai.

Han 韓 [personal name unknown]; Yingchuan. Eldest son of Han Fu, after his father had resigned his office as Governor of Ji province in 191, his residence was attacked by Zhu Han, who beat his son and broke both his legs. -HHS 74/64B:2380.

Han Bin 韓斌. An officer of the Imperial Secretariat at Chang'an in 195, Han Bin joined Zhong Yao and others in a plot with Liu Jue's officer Yang Feng to kill him and free the emperor. The plan was unsuccessful, but Yang Feng set himself up independently, Li Jue was weakened, and Emperor Xian escaped to the east soon afterwards.

As the remnant court came under Cao Cao's control in 196, Han Bin was enfeoffed and granted nominal title as Administrator of Zuopingyi. -HHS 72/62:2342, SGZ 13:391, HHJ 28:336-37, 29:344.

Han [Bogao] 韓伯高; Julu. A student of the Han version of the Classic of Poetry under the Academician Xue Han, he became a celebrated scholar. -HHS 79/69B:2573.

Han Chen 韓臣; Nanyang. In 23 Han Chen was a lieutenant-general under Li Song in the force sent against Wang Mang's capital in Chang'an. After the defeat of Wang Mang's last field army at Huayin, the allies entered the Wei valley, but as they halted to attack the Capital Granary Han Chen was sent with an advance guard towards the capital. He defeated Wang Mang's general Dou Rong south of the Wei outside Chang'an, and he and his men may have taken part in the capture of the city and the destruction of Wang Mang by Wang Xian and his irregulars. Han Chen does not appear again in the records. -Dubs 55:460, Bn 54:130.

Han Chi 韓勅 [Shujie 叔節]; Yingchuan. Chancellor of Lu in 156, Han Chi arranged for repair work on the Temple of Confucius. -LS 1:17b-25a, Nagata 94:124-26.

Han Chong 韓崇 [Changji 長季]; Wu. When Han Chong was a magistrate in Danyang, it is said that the county escaped a plague of locusts. He was later transferred to be Administrator of Runan.

When the Dowager Yin died in 64, it was ordered that the wives of all Administrators near the capital should attend her tomb. Though Han Chong's wife wished to go, he forbade her to do so, even when she wept in sorrow and frustration. An edict enquired the reason, and the Minister of Ceremonies Feng Xi explained that Han Chong was a most moral and conscientious administrator, but he did not feel it appropriate for his wife to take part in such a public function. Emperor Ming was impressed, and raised Han Chong's salary. Han Chong also allowed his wife and children to eat only vegetarian dishes.

Han Chong nominated Yuan An as Filial and Incorrupt. He also appointed the filial Cai Shun to his staff, and each time there was a thunderstorm he provided a carriage to take him to his late mother's tomb so that he could reassure her spirit.

During the imperial tour to the east in 72, Han Chong made his wife leave the official residence and received the emperor with only old women in the house. Again impressed with his strict morality, Emperor Ming rewarded him with silk. On this or another occasion Han Chong was also presented with a carriage and horses and a sword.

After fourteen years in Runan, Han Chong died aged seventy-four. -HHSJJ 29/29:1397-98 Hui Dong quoting Tao Hongjing 陶弘/宏景 of the sixth century, XC 6:12a.

Han Chong 韓崇, wife of: the Lady suffered some restrictions from her husband's ideas about moral conduct: see above.

Han Chun 韓純; Nanyang. Son of Han Shu, Han Chun was Administrator of Nan commandery in the latter part of the second century. Presumably after his retirement, a certain Chen Mao, of powerful local family, slandered Han Chun and his elder son to the local authorities, and almost had them put to death. Han Chun died soon afterwards, but his son Han Ji later arranged for a group of assassins to take revenge on Chen Mao, then presented his head as offering to Han Chun's tomb. -SGZ 24:677.

Han Cong 韓琮 (d.110). A Chinese in the service of the Shanyu Tan of the Southern Xiongnu, in 109 he urged him to take advantage of difficulties within the empire, both from flooding and from the rebellion of the Qiang in Liang province, and declare his independence. Tan did this, but after three defeats by the Chinese armies he was forced to abandon his capital and flee. As he sent messengers seeking to submit, he turned on Han Cong and complained of his advice; it is doubtful Han Cong lived much longer. -HHS 89/79:1957-58.

Han Dan 韓丹 (d.220). Early in 220, when Liu Bei heard that Cao Cao had died, he sent his junior adviser Han Dan with a message and gift of condolence to Wei. Cao Pi, however, considered this as no more than an attempt to gain favour. He had Han Dan executed and the two states thereafter cut off diplomatic relations.

Another account says that Han Dan died on the journey, but the message was forwarded and Cao Pi responded. This seems more likely to be correct. -SGZ Shu 2:889 & JJ at 35a.

Han Dang 韓當 [Yigong 義公] (d.227); Liaoxi. Han Dang did not come from a notable family, and though he was skilled at horsemanship and archery he gained no advancement until he joined Sun Jian in the late 180s. He became a senior major under his command and accompanied him on his campaigns thereafter.

When Sun Ce gained his father's former troops under the command of Yuan Shu, Han Dang joined him and later took part in his expedition south of the Yangzi. Appointed a colonel, with two thousand foot-soldiers and five hundred horsemen, he was engaged against Liu Xun, in the attacks on Huang Zu, and in the conquest of Yuzhang, where he held position as a magistrate with responsibility to bring the non-Chinese into submission.

In 208 Han Dang accompanied Zhou Yu to the defeat of Cao Cao at the Red Cliffs, and in 209 he held garrison command at Huan city in Lujiang, defeating Cao Cao's commander Zang Ba in a skirmish.

In 215 Han Dang accompanied Lü Meng as he invaded Liu Bei's territories in Jing province; he was then named Administrator of Yongchang. The commandery was in the far south of Yi province, nominally part of Liu Bei's sphere of influence, so the appointment can be seen as a provocation, though Sun Quan did have some expectations there: see sub Yong Kai.

At the time of Liu Bei's great attack in 221 Han Dang served under Lu Xun and Zhu Ran, and joined in the destruction of the Shu army. He was appointed a general and enfeoffed as a village marquis. When Cao Zhen attacked Nan commandery in 222 Han Dang held the south-eastern front. He was later raised to be a full marquis, promoted general and made an Area Commander. He led elite troops to defeat bandits in Danyang, but then took ill and died.

Han Dang was succeeded by his son Zong 綜, but he rebelled soon afterwards and went over to Wei, where he was made a general and enfeoffed. -SGZ Wu 10:1285-86*.

Han Fan 韓範. A county magistrate in Zhao for Yuan Shang, in 204 he made a false surrender to Cao Cao but then maintained his defences. Xu Huang was sent against him, persuaded him to yield and arranged that, to encourage others, Han Fan be rewarded with enfeoffment. -SGZ 1:25, 17:528.

Han Fu 韓福. In the late 20s Han Fu was Chancellor of the kingdom of Changsha, a fief which had been granted to Liu Xing by the Gengshi Emperor. In 29 Guangwu's regional commander Cen Peng wrote to urge Han Fu to accept the new imperial regime, and sent one of his officers with a summons. Han Fu sent tribute to Han and was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 17/7:659; Bn 59:47, 157-158.

Han Fu 韓輔; Yingchuan. Son of Han Leng, Han Fu was Chancellor of Zhao during the reign of Emperor An. -HHS 45/35:1536.

Han Fu 韓馥 [Wenjie 文節] (d.191); Yingchuan. Formerly a member of the Secretariat, then head of the Imperial Censorate, in 189 Han Fu was named Governor of Ji province by Dong Zhuo. As Yuan Shao in Bohai planned a rising against Dong Zhuo, Han Fu initially regarded it as a private quarrel and sent officers to keep Yuan Shao under control, but by the end of the year he had been persuaded that it was an affair of public concern. He approved Yuan Shao's plans and joined the alliance, though he stayed himself at Ye city in Wei.

As the alliance broke up in 191 Han Fu sought to control Yuan Shao by reducing his supplies, but Yuan Shao contacted Han Fu's mutinous officer Qu Yi, encouraged Gongsun Zan to threaten him from the north, and himself advanced down the Yellow River. Intimidated by circumstance and by the Yuan family prestige, and encouraged by men he believed to be his friends, Han Fu handed his position to Yuan Shao.

Despite promises of goodwill, Han Fu and his family were harassed, while his supporters either abandoned him or were killed. Han Fu took refuge with Zhang Miao, but soon came to fear that he too was plotting against him. He killed himself. -SGZ 1:6, HHS 74/64A:2375-80.

Han Gong 韓龔. In the middle 40s Han Gong was Assistant Commandant in a county in Pei. Having caught the robber Ding Zhong, he took his booty and had him bastinadoed eight hundred times. Surprisingly, Ding Zhong survived, and Han Gong told the magistrate Zhi Yun about it. Angry at such cruelty, Zhi Yun hit Han Gong with the metal staff that had been used for the punishment.

Han Gong was now angry too, and he killed Ding Zhong. Zhi Yun was found responsible and dismissed from his office. -HHS 29/19:1032, DGHJ 15:4a.

Han Guang 韓廣. Han Guang married the Princess Liu Hongfu, daughter of Emperor Guangwu, and was named Commandant of Attendant Cavalry. In 73 he was executed for alleged involvement in a conspiracy of witchcraft with Liu Yan the King of Huaiyang. -HHS 10B:458, 42/32:1444.

Han Hao 韓皓. Administrator of Youfufeng in 129, Han Hao succeeded Ma Xian as Protector of the Qiang. He was involved in plans for the expansion of military colonies from the Xining valley to the upper Yellow River, but was dismissed for some fault after only a year. -HHS 87/77:2894.

Han Hao 韓浩 [Yuansi 元嗣]; Henei. A local leader against bandits, Han Hao received commandery office from Wang Kuang and joined the alliance against Dong Zhuo in 190. After Wang Kuang was destroyed Dong Zhuo attempted to bring Han Hao over by holding his uncle Yang Du as hostage, but Han Hao rejected the threat. After a short time with Yuan Shu, he joined Xiahou Dun.

When Lü Bu attacked Yan province in 194 Xiahou Dun was seized by mutineers, but Han Hao compelled them to surrender and killed them.

As Protector of the Army, responsible for discipline, Han Hao was trusted by Cao Cao; he was associated with Zao Zhi in the establishment of agricultural colonies about Xu city.

Han Hao later took part in campaigns against the Wuhuan in 207 and Zhang Lu in 215, and he was enfeoffed. In 213 he was one of the officers who petitioned Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. He died about 216. -SGZ 9:267-70.

Han Heng 韓珩 [Zipei 子佩]; Dai. A worthy man, Han Heng was respected for the manner in which he carried out mourning for his parents and served his brothers and sisters. He became Attendant Officer to Yuan Xi, Inspector of You province.

In 205 Jiao Chu and other officers drove Yuan Xi away and turned the province over to Cao Cao, but though Han Heng was threatened with death he maintained his allegiance to the Yuan. Jiao Chu allowed him to leave and Cao Cao, admiring his integrity, did not pursue him. -HHS 74/64B:2417-18, SGZ 6:206-07.

Han Hong 韓鴻; Nanyang. Internuncio under the Gengshi Emperor, after the destruction of Wang Mang in 23 Han Hong was sent as special commissioner for the north with the Staff of Authority to confirm the new imperial regime in You and Bing provinces. Such envoys had the right to appoint or dismiss even the highest officials, and in Yuyang Han Hong used his authority to name his fellow-countryman and old friend Peng Chong as a lieutenant-general and acting Administrator, while he appointed Wu Han, another compatriot, as a county magistrate. The former Administrator of Yuyang was evidently removed without difficulty.

When Han Hong came to Shanggu, circumstances changed. It had been announced that those who accepted the new regime would be confirmed in their position, but when the Administrator Geng Kuang duly offered his seal in token of submission Han Hong did not return it immediately but kept the insignia overnight. Then, however, Geng Kuang's Officer of Merit Kou Xun went with armed men to Han Hong's tent, had Geng Kuang invited to join them, and attached the seal and ribbon to his waist. Han Hong had no choice but to give formal approval, so Geng Kuang was confirmed in office. Han Hong is not heard of again. -HHS 12/2: 502, 18/8:675, 16/6:620; Bn 59:36-39.

Han Ji 韓暨 [Gongzhi 公至] (d.238); Nanyang. Han Ji was the son of Han Chun. A certain Chen Mao, of powerful family, slandered Han Chun and Han Ji's elder brother to the local authorities, and they were nearly executed. Han Ji appeared to pay no attention to the incident, but some time after his father's death he arranged for a group of assassins to take revenge on Chen Mao, and presented his head as sacrifice to his father's tomb.

Celebrated for this achievement, Han Ji was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and was also invited to clerical office at the capital. He would not go, but changed his name and took refuge in the hill country of Lujiang. There he treated the local bandits well and persuaded them to end their depredations. About 197 the usurping emperor Yuan Shu sent a summons, but Han Ji refused him and went back into the mountains east of Nanyang. There he received a call from Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province, and this time he sought refuge southeast in Wuling. The people there admired and respected him, but Liu Biao was now angry, and Han Ji was obliged to accept office as a magistrate in Nan commandery.

When Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208, he appointed Han Ji to his ministerial staff and then made him Administrator of Leling, a new commandery divided from Pingyuan by the mouth of the Yellow River in Qing province.

Han Ji later became Internuncio in charge of Metallurgical Production 監冶謁者. Hitherto horses had generally provided the power for the bellows used in smelting, but great numbers were required for each unit of wrought iron that was produced, and while man-power was also used, it was exhausting and expensive. Du Shi, Administrator of Nanyang in the early first century, had devised a water-power reciprocator to power the bellows, but although this was three times as efficient the technique appears to have been restricted to the metal-workers of that region. Han Ji, who came from Nanyang, evidently spread the knowledge, and in the seven years that he held office implements of iron became plentiful. He was promoted to be Commandant for Metal 司金都尉, with rank just below the Ministers, and when Cao Pi took the imperial throne in 220 he was granted enfeoffment.

Han Ji became Minister of Ceremonies in 226, and in 229 he brought the imperial tablets of the Wei from Ye city to the restored capital at Luoyang. He retired from his ministerial post on grounds of age in 234, but continued as a Counsellor at court. In 238, aged over eighty, he was named an Excellency, but died a short time later. -SGZ 24:677-78*; Needham 65:370.

Han Jiang 韓姜, the Lady; Jianwei. At the end of the second century the Lady was married to Yin Zhongrang. Her husband died when she was twenty years old, and at the conclusion of the mourning period the local gentleman Dong Tai arranged for a brother of Wang Shang, Assistant Officer of the province, to seek her hand on his behalf. The Lady refused him.

Two of Dong Tai's clients, Zuo Xi and Wang Su, believed that the Lady could be forced to accept their master's suit. They accordingly told her that her mother was ill, and as she went back to the family home they abducted her and forced her into the marriage. The Lady Han killed herself.

The Administrator Gong Yang learned of the affair, and he had Zuo Xi and Wang Su executed to avenge the Lady's death. -HYGZ 10B:160.

Han [Jichao] 韓季朝 or Han Jizhao; Yingchuan. Han Jichao was Administrator of Nanyang in the time of Emperor Shun, but the Imperial Secretariat accused him of wrongdoing and he was dismissed. -FSTY 7: 56.

Han Juzi 韓莒子 see Han Xun 韓荀.

Han Kang 韓康 [Tianxiu 恬休 or Boxiu 伯休]; Jingzhao. Han Kang's family had been well known for several generations, but he made his living by collecting medicinal plants and selling them in the market at Chang'an, where he fixed his prices and refused to bargain. After thirty years of anonymity, he was recognised by a young woman and promptly fled into the hills.

Despite this seclusion, a series of invitations were sent to him to take up office, and Emperor Huan himself prepared to receive him. So Han Kang was obliged to leave for court, but he insisted on travelling in his own simple cart, not in an official carriage. He then made his escape on the way, disappeared and died in hiding. -HHS 83/73:2770-71*.

Han Kui 韓攄 [Boyan 伯彥]; Guanghan. In 188 Han Kui was Registrar in his county when it was attacked by Yellow Turban rebels led by Ma Xiang. The magistrate Yi Pou [but cf. sub voce] fled into the wilderness, and sent Han Kui to find a good hiding place. Before he do so, however, Yi Pou was taken and killed.

Having carried out funeral ceremonies for his late master, Han Kui obtained provincial troops from the Assistant Officer Jia Long and joined the attack which destroyed the bandits. Revenge complete, he killed himself. -HYGZ 10B:150.

Han Kui 韓攄. A eunuch, Han Kui was a Regular Attendant during the 180s and was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 78/68:2534.

Han Lai 韓賴 see Han Chi 韓勅.

Han Lang 寒朗 [Boqi 伯奇] (26-109); Lu. When Han Lang was a few days old there was fighting nearby and his mother hid him in a thicket. When it was peaceful again, she was able to find the infant by a light which shone above him. When he grew up, he became an expert scholar, specialising in and teaching the Classic of History. About 60 he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt.

An Internuncio in 70, Han Lang was given an acting post in the Censorate to join members of staff of the Excellencies in the investigation of the alleged conspiracy of Li Ying the King of Chu. Yan Zhong and Wang Ping, at the centre of the affair, named Geng Fu, Zang Xin, Liu Xun and Dou Jian, but the four men denied any contact with the plotters. Emperor Ming was furious, and all officials were terrified, but Han Lang believed the accused were innocent. He tried to question Yan Zhong and Wang Ping again, but they had been so tortured that they could give no coherent replies.

Han Lang nonetheless braved the imperial displeasure, and though very nearly executed he was able to persuade the emperor that some people could have been falsely implicated by Yan Zhong and Wang Ping, who had themselves nothing to lose. A few days later Emperor Ming went to the prison, reviewed the cases, and had a thousand people released. Han Lang presented himself in bonds, but there was an amnesty and he was released.

Han Lang then left office, but he was later nominated once more as Filial and Incorrupt, and Emperor Zhang praised his loyalty and courage in open court. About 80 he became a county magistrate in Hejian and then in Chenliu, but left office again when his mother died.

The people of his community admired Han Lang, and when an imperial progress came to the region in 87 the local leaders sent a letter to the throne. Emperor Zhang called Han Lang to audience, and had him appointed to the offices of the Excellencies. He became Administrator of Qinghe about 90, but was dismissed for some fault.

In 109 the Excellency Zhang Yu had Han Lang named an Academician. A carriage was sent to collect him, but he died at this time, aged eighty-four. -HHS 41/31:1417-18*, HHJ 10:123.

Han Leng 韓稜 or Han Ling 稜 [Boshi 伯始] (d.98); Yingchuan. Han Leng's father Han Xun died when he was four. When he grew up Han Leng distributed the family property among his relatives, and the local people admired him for it.

Han Leng became Officer of Merit in the commandery [FSTY 4:28 says he was Registrar]. The Administrator Ge Xing was incapacitated and could not attend to the government. Regulations required that he should retire after three months illness, but Han Leng concealed the situation. He attended to everything in secret, and in the course of two years there was no fault to be found. Then, however, he quarrelled with Ge Xing's son, who reported the situation. Han Leng was proscribed from office for having usurped the functions of the Administrator, but Emperor Ming recognised his sense of loyalty and issued a special pardon.

Han Leng served in the offices of the Excellencies and then became a county magistrate in Xiapi, where his virtuous government preserved the territory from a hailstorm which damaged crops.

After some further appointments Han Leng became Director of the Secretariat. He and his Deputy Zhi Shou, and the officer Chen Chong, became known for their ability and on one occasion Emperor Zhang presented each of them with an inscribed sword.

When Dou Xian had Liu Chang assassinated in 88, the senior officials were afraid of the Dou family and suggested that one of Liu Chang's kinsmen was involved in the murder. They wanted the head of the Imperial Censorate to investigate the matter in his home country of Qi. Convinced that the cause was to be found at the capital, Han Leng held his ground even against the regent Dowager, and Dou Xian's involvement was eventually discovered.

In 92, as Dou Xian returned in triumph after his conquest of the Northern Xiongnu, many officials proposed to welcome him with cries of "Ten Thousand Years!" 萬歲, but Han Leng argued that such an ovation was suitable only for the sovereign, so the idea was dropped. An officer of the Secretariat, Wang Long, privately proposed that there should be offerings of oxen and wine; Han Leng charged him and had him sent to convict service.

When Emperor He destroyed the Dou clan soon afterwards, Han Leng took the lead in purging and prosecuting the former supporters of the faction. His efforts were rewarded by an imperial gift of cloth. On the other hand, he also made a number of recommendations of good men for office, including Ying Shun and Zhou Yu.

Having served successfully for some years as Administrator of Nanyang, Han Leng became Minister Coachman, and in 97 he was appointed Excellency of Works. He died in the following year. -HHS 45/35: 1534-36*.

Han Li 韓立. A member of staff to Peng Chong, after his murder in 29 Han Li and his cousin Zihou Lanqing proclaimed his son Peng Wu as King of Yan 燕王. The insurrection was swiftly put down by the forces of Emperor Guangwu. See also Han Li 韓利 below. -HHS 12/2:505.

Han Li 韓利. After the murder of Peng Chong in 29 his followers Han Li 韓立 and Zihou Lanqing proclaimed his son Peng Wu as King of Yan. Their colleague Han Li 韓利, however, killed Peng Wu and took his head to the imperial general Zhai Cun. -HHS 12/2:505.

Han Ling 韓稜 see Han Leng 韓稜.

Han Meng 韓猛 see Han Xun 韓荀.

Han Pin 寒貧 [Cold and Poor: sobriquet]; Anding. This man's original surname was Shi 石, and his style Delin 德林. About 200 he came to the region of Chang'an, where he studied the Poetry and the History under the Confucian master Luan Wenbo. He later became a devotee of Laozi and of mysterious arts 內事, neglecting his wife and children for the sake of that study.

As Cao Cao came to attack in 211 he moved to Hanzhong, but when that territory was conquered by Liu Bei in 219 he returned to Chang'an. Apparently impervious to the cold, he begged for food but ate very little, and as he refused to give his name he was known as "Cold and Poor" 寒貧. -SGZ 11:365-66.

Han Ren 韓仁 (d.175). A successful county magistrate in Hedong, Han Ren was due to be transferred to the capital of Youfufeng, but he died before the letter of appointment arrived. He was commemorated with a stele. -Nagata 94:214.

Han Rong 韓融. In 60 Han Rong was a Chinese living in Yutian [Khotan]. Following the assassination of Junde, the oppressive governor appointed by the hegemon King Xian of Suoju, Han Rong aided the local chieftain Xiumoba to kill the original conspirators and proclaim himself king. -HHS 88/78:2925.

Han Rong 韓融 [Yuanchang 元長]; Yingchuan. Son of Han Shao, he became well known as a senior private scholar. It is said that he was among those who approved the extended mourning of the time, involving men who were only most marginally connected to the bereaved: FSTY 3:22.

Han Rong refused an invitation to office in 188, but in the following year he was forced by Dong Zhuo to come to Luoyang. Leaving his family in refuge in the hill country of southern Henan, he joined the Imperial Secretariat and was then appointed Minister Herald.

In 190 Dong Zhuo sent Han Rong on embassy to seek peace with the eastern alliance. All the other envoys were killed, but Han Rong was spared because of his fine reputation. As Minister Coachman at Chang'an in 195, he was held hostage by Guo Si, but was then able to join Emperor Xian on his escape to the east; he later negotiated with Li Jue and Guo Si for the release of the officials and palace people they had taken.

Han Rong died about 196, aged seventy. -HHS 62/52:2063, 74/64A:2376; deC 96:53, 168.

Han Rong 韓榮; Henan. Adopted son of Han Hao, he succeeded to his fief about 215. -SGZ 9:269.

Han Ruo 韓若 see Han Xun 韓荀.

Han Shao 韓韶 [Zhonghuang 仲黃/潢 or Yuanchang 元長]; Yingchuan. As a young man Han Shao held local appointment in his commandery and he later joined the offices of the Excellencies at Luoyang. In 155 Taishan commandery was being ravaged by Gongsun Ju. The Imperial Secretariat recommended Han Shao as a man who could restore order, and he was sent there as a magistrate.

When the bandits heard of Han Shao's virtue, they spared his county from their ravages, but then refugees came in distress from other regions. Although it was against regulations Han Shao opened the official granaries to feed them; no official action was taken, but Han Shao took ill and died soon afterwards. His fellow-countrymen Li Ying, Chen Shi and others set up a stele in his honour. -HHS 62/52:2063-64*, XC 3: 12a.

HHS 82/72B:2748 says that when Shangcheng Gong q.v. went into the heavens Han Shao and Chen Shi were witnesses to his elevation. The parallel text in Baopu zi by Ge Hong of the fourth century, cited by Hui Dong in HHSJ at 3024, has the style of Han Shao as Yuanchang 元長 [a variant which also appears at SGZ 11:355], and gives a different style to Chen Shi: it is likely that two distinguished witnesses have been cited to give credit to the extraordinary story, and the different styles are marginal.

Han Shu 韓術; Nanyang. During the second century Han Shu was Administrator of Hedong. -SGZ 24:677, XTS 73A:2854.

Han Shu'nian 韓樹南, the Lady (d.160); Hanzhong. In 147 the local officer Zhao Zijian organised the execution of Li Ji and Li Zi, sons of the disgraced minister Li Gu. When the surviving son Li Xie returned from exile in 160, Zhao Zijian was afraid he would seek revenge. He hired a man to kill him, but Li Xue found out. He told the Administrator and Zhao Zijian was executed.

The Lady Han, wife of Zhao Zijian, had disapproved of her husband's plans and tried to dissuade him, but when he was condemned she wanted to share his fate. Though her family tried to prevent her, she killed herself at his tomb. -HYGZ 10C:172-73.

Han Shuo 韓說 see Han Yue 韓說.

Han Song 韓嵩 [Degao 德高]; Nanyang. A private scholar, Han Song avoided calls to office and took refuge in the south from the Yellow Turban rebellion. When Liu Biao came to Jing province he accepted a senior position on his staff, but protested when Liu Biao usurped imperial rituals.

In 199 Han Song urged Liu Biao to support Cao Cao against Yuan Shao. Liu Biao sent him to check the situation, but Han Song warned him that if he received appointment in the imperial government under Cao Cao, he would be compelled to accept: he would then be no more than a former officer 故吏 of Liu Biao, and would not owe him prime loyalty. Han Song was indeed appointed Palace Attendant and Administrator of Lingling, and when he returned he urged Liu Biao to commit himself to Cao Cao and to send him a hostage. Liu Biao was furious at Han Song's change of policy. He tortured and killed the men who had accompanied him, and was going to kill Han Song too, but then Han Song reminded him of what he had said at the beginning, and Liu Biao only put him in prison.

Han Song was released some time later, but accounts vary whether it was by Liu Biao himself, by his son and successor Liu Zong, or by Cao Cao after his take-over of the province in 208; one source says that he encouraged Liu Zong to surrender to Cao Cao. When Cao Cao arrived he named Han Song a minister at the imperial court and granted him enfeoffment. - HHS 74/64B:2422-24, SGZ 6:212-15.

Han Sui 韓遂 [Wenyue 文約] (d.215); Jincheng. Han Sui's father was a man of family who had been nominated Filial and Incorrupt and evidently held appointment at the capital. Han Sui himself became a local commandery officer; in 178 he was a leading sponsor of a stele set up in honour of the late Administrator Yin Hua, and soon afterwards he was sent to Luoyang as Reporting Officer. He evidently became friends with Cao Cao, and he was noticed by the General-in-Chief He Jin, whom he urged to attack the eunuchs. He Jin was reluctant, and after some time at the capital Han Sui returned to the west.

In 184 Han Sui was an Assistant Officer of Liang province, based at Yuanya, present-day Lanzhou, which was the capital of Jincheng commandery and also the provincial headquarters. When a group of rebels and mutineers under Beigong Boyu appeared before the city Han Sui and his colleague Bian Zhang joined the rebellion, though we are also told that they were taken hostage and acted under duress.

Han Sui was among the leadership group in two attacks towards Chang'an in 185 and 188/189, and the insurgents are commonly referred to as "Bian Zhang and Han Sui." HHS 72/62 says that in 186 or 187, after the first retreat of the rebels, Han Sui seized command, killing Beigong Boyu and others. It is probable, however, that the chief position was taken by Wang Guo, who led the second expedition. In 189, after he too had been driven back to the west, Wang Guo was deposed and only then did Han Sui achieve substantial authority. The rebel coalition broke up about this time, and Han Sui controlled one division of the former force, based on Jincheng, while other groups were led by Ma Teng in Longxi, Song Jian on the upper Yellow River, and various petty warlords north of the Wei.

In the early 190s Han Sui supported Dong Zhuo at Chang'an and was recognised as an imperial general, and after Dong Zhuo's death in 192 he acknowledged the regime of Li Jue and his fellows. He then returned to Jincheng. His main base was in the west of Huangzhong, the valley of the Xining River, but he also controlled territory eastwards into Hanyang, on the upper Wei.

In 194 Han Sui brought an army to support Ma Teng and others against Li Jue and his colleagues. They were defeated at the Changping Slope, northwest of Chang'an, and Han Sui withdrew to Chencang in Youfufeng. He offered a truce and held friendly talk with his fellow-countryman Fan Chou, a chief in the enemy forces; Li Jue became suspicious of Fan Chou and killed him soon afterwards.

In 197 Han Sui acknowledged the government at Xu city controlled by Cao Cao, and sent hostages to the east. Soon afterwards, it appears that Cao Cao's agent Zhong Yao turned Ma Teng against Han Sui, and their forces were engaged in a number of skirmishes. In 208 Ma Teng went to join Cao Cao, leaving his son Ma Chao in Longxi, and Ma Chao later established a rapprochement with Han Sui. In 210 Han Sui attacked and destroyed the Inspector Zhang Meng, based in Wuwei.

In 211 Cao Cao sent troops into the northwest to attack Zhang Lu in Hanyang. Believing the offensive was directed against them, Han Sui and Ma Chao gathered a local alliance. Cao Cao's forces were driven from the Wei valley and in the autumn he came himself. Blocked at the Tong Pass on the junction of the Wei with the Yellow River, Cao Cao left a holding force while he led the bulk of his men northwards, crossed the Yellow River upstream to the west, then came south to force a crossing of the Wei at Huayin. During negotiations at this time Han Sui asked for a private conversation, for Cao Cao had been a colleague of his father. Cao Cao met him in sight of the armies, and they talked of old days at Luoyang, but then Cao Cao sent a confusing letter and Ma Chao and the others became suspicious. A day for battle was agreed, and the enemy alliance was defeated.

Soon afterwards Han Sui's officer Yan Xing, whom he had arranged to marry one of his daughters, nonetheless rebelled against him in support of Cao Cao, and in 214 Cao Cao's general Xiahou Yuan drove Han Sui from his forward positions in Hanyang. Han Sui thought of fleeing south into Shu, but his adviser Chenggong Ying persuaded him to seek aid from the Qiang and other non-Chinese people, and with these allies Han Sui defeated Yan Xing and held his ground in Jincheng.

In the following year, aged over seventy, Han Sui died in the region of the Xining River in present-day Gansu. -HHS 72/62:2320-21, 2335, SGZ 1:34-35, 45*, 9:271, SGZ Shu 6:944; Haloun 49/50, deC 84:159-165, 492-495.

It appears Han Sui died naturally, but there is confusion over the events which followed. At SGZ 1:45, Dian lue says that his head was sent to Cao Cao by the local leaders Qu Yan and Jiang Shi as a sign of their submission; at SGZ 15:475, Dian lue tells how his loyal follower Chenggong Ying made a good surrender to Cao Cao; while SGZ 11:350 quotes Wei lue, which says that Han Yue lost all his troops and took refuge with the local gentleman Guo Xian, but died soon afterwards and his head was presented to Cao Cao by Tian Yue and Yang Kui.

Xiandi chunqiu, quoted by HHS 72/62:2321 TC, says that Han Sui's original personal name was Yue 約, but that he changed it after joining the rebellion. The inscription to Yin Hua of 178, however, has his personal name as Sui: Guwen yuan 19:8b. Dian lue, quoted in SGZ 1:45 PC, gives his style as Wenyue 文約, which may account for the confusion. See also SGZ 15:475 PC quoting Wei lue, and cf. Bian Zhang/Yun.

Han Tong 韓統. A General of the Household in 30, he led the second embassy from Emperor Guangwu to the Shanyu Yu of the Xiongnu. They brought gifts of gold and silk, but the Shanyu was arrogant, comparing himself to the great Modun 冒頓 at the beginning of Former Han. He continued to support the renegade Lu Fang, and no further embassies were exchanged. -HHS 89/70:2940; Bn 67:106.

Han [Wenbu] 韓文布; Taiyuan. A fellow-countryman of Guo Tai, he was sponsored by him and became well-known and respected. -HHS 68/58:2231.

Han Xi 韓晞 (d.200); Nanyang. An officer of Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province, in 199 Han Xi was sent with troops to assist Huang Zu against Sun Ce on the Yangzi. Han Xi and Liu Biao's nephew Liu Hu led an advance guard, but they were heavily defeated and both men were killed. -SGZ Wu 1:1108.

Han Xian 韓暹 (d.197); Xihe? A former leader of the Bobo bandits, in 195 Han Xian brought assistance to Yang Feng and Dong Cheng as they escorted Emperor Xian from Chang'an. Successful in one engagement, the allies were heavily defeated in a second, but the emperor escaped across the Yellow River to Anyi in Hedong.

Han Xian was named a general and Governor of You province, but he quarrelled with his colleagues Dong Cheng and Hu Cai. As the emperor went south to Luoyang, Han Xian rejoined the escort party, and when they arrived at the former capital he was appointed a chief general and Director of Retainers.

As Cao Cao came to Luoyang in 196, he impeached Han Xian, who took refuge with Yang Feng. The emperor ordered, however, that no questions be asked of anyone who had assisted him on his journey.

As Cao Cao took the emperor to Xu city later that year, Yang Feng and Han Xian chased after him, but Cao Cao drove them away to the south of Henan.

In 197 Yang Feng and Han Xian joined Yuan Shu to attack Lü Bu, but were persuaded to change sides. Soon afterwards Yang Feng was killed by Liu Bei, and as Han Xian returned north alone he was killed by the local chieftain Han Xuan in Pei. -HHS 72/62:2340-42, SGZ 6:185-87.

Han Xin 韓歆 [Wengjun 翁君] (d.39); Nanyang. Member of a leading family, Han Xin joined the Han rebellion in 22, and after the destruction of Wang Mang in 23 he was named Administrator of Henei for the Gengshi Emperor.

In the autumn of 24 Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came to Henei. Han Xin planned to resist but his fellow-countryman Cen Peng, who had joined him for refuge, persuaded him to surrender. Uncertain of Han Xin's loyalty, Liu Xiu was going to execute him, but Cen Peng argued that as a man of local standing he could serve and give credit to the new regime. So Liu Xiu let him live.

Later that year, as Deng Yu took command in the west against the Gengshi Emperor, he appointed Han Xin to a senior position on his staff. In the summer of 25 the army was in Hedong when a major force led by Wang Kuang and other chieftains came to attack. After the first engagement proved indecisive, Han Xin and other officers urged Deng Yu to withdraw. He rejected their advice, and after one day's rest the two armies engaged once more and Deng Yu achieved a complete victory.

Han Xin was later awarded a marquise for his contribution to the imperial success, and in 27 he was Director of the Imperial Secretariat. In that position he urged the establishment of chairs at the University for the Fei interpretation of the Book of Changes and for Zuo zhuan, both Old Text studies. At a court conference on the New Year's Day of 28, with Guangwu presiding, the Academician Fan Sheng argued against the proposal, but in a later exchange of memorials Han Xin was supported by the officer Chen Yuan, and the emperor agreed to a chair for Zuo zhuan.

Han Xin later became Administrator of Pei, and in 37 he was recalled to the capital as Excellency over the Masses. A man of moral standards and direct speech, he appears always to have been an irritant to the emperor, and early in 39 he criticised him publicly for having read the correspondence between his defeated rivals Wei Ao and Gongsun Shu. Guangwu, furious, had him dismissed, and continued the pressure even after Han Xin sought to retire into private life. Han Xin and his son Ying were driven to suicide.

Han Xin had been well regarded by the gentry of the empire; the emperor was later obliged to pay him respects and provide for his funeral. -HHS 26/16:602, 17/7:654; Bn 79:54, 61-69, 191.

Han Xing 韓珩 see Han Heng 韓珩.

Han Xu 韓序, the Lady (d.72). Concubine of Liu Yan the King of Zhongshan, she committed some fault and he strangled her to death. The chancellor of the state reported him, and Liu Yan suffered the loss of one county from his fief; it was restored some twelve years later. -HHS 42/32:1449.

Han Xuan 韓玄. As Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208 he sent Han Xuan south as Administrator of Changsha, but after the defeat at the Red Cliffs later that year Han Xuan was obliged to surrender to Liu Bei. -SGZ Shu 2:879.

Han Xuan 韓宣 [Jingran 景然 or Zijing 子景]; Bohai. A short, small man, about 215 Han Xuan became a member of Cao Cao's staff, with various duties about Ye city. On one occasion he met Cao Zhi at a gate of the palace. At first Cao Zhi was annoyed at his apparent lack of respect to a nobleman, but he was then impressed by Han Xuan's self-confident justification, based upon Confucian teachings. He told his brother Cao Pi of the incident, and praised Han Xuan's skill in debate.

Early in the reign of Cao Pi, Han Xuan became a member of the Secretariat. He was arrested for some administrative fault, but Cao Pi remembered his name and pardoned him. He later served as Administrator in two commanderies, returned to the Secretariat and held ministerial office under Cao Rui. He died about 235. -SGZ 23:675-76.

Han Xun 韓尋; Yingchuan. Claiming distant descent from Han Xin the King of Han 韓王信 at the beginning of Former Han [QHX:146-147], and a man of noted local family, Han Xun was Administrator of Longxi in the time of Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 45/35:1534.

Han Xun 韓荀/莫 [Juzi 莒子?] (d.200?). There is a deal of confusion about the name of this man and the circumstances of his death.

SGZ 9:274 says that Han Xun 韓荀 was an officer of Yuan Shao. At the time of the Guandu campaign in 200, he was sent to cut Cao Cao's communications with the west, but was thoroughly defeated by Cao Ren in southern Henan, and after that setback Yuan Shao sent out no further detachments. -SGZ 9:274; see also sub Han Meng.

SGZ 10:323 says that during the same campaign Han Xun guarded supplies for Yuan Shao in the west of the theatre of operations. He was attacked by Cao Cao's officer Xu Huang and the provisions were destroyed.

The main text of SGZ 10:323 writes the personal name as 莫, an extremely rare character, known only in this context. The commentary of Pei Songzhi at 324 says that it appears also as Meng 猛 and as Ruo 若; and the parallel text in ZZTJ 63:2033 has it indeed as Meng [deC 96:285]. This, however, is probably the same man as Han Xun 荀, who had earlier been defeated by Cao Ren in Henei, and was evidently still acting on Yuan Shao's right flank.

Both the previous references tell how Han Xun was defeated, first by Cao Ren and then by Xu Huang. SGZ 1:22 says that a later and decisive attack, led by Cao Cao in person [deC 96:287-288], resulted in the defeat and death of several of Yuan Shao's commanders, including Han Juzi 莒子. Given the similarity between 莒 and 若, as in Pei Songzhi's note above, it is likely this is a further and final account of an unlucky general, whose personal name was Xun [written either as 荀 or as 莫] or Meng, and whose style was Juzi.

Han Yan 韓演 or Han Yin 寅 [Bonan 伯南];

Yingchuan. Grandson of Han Ling, Han Yan was Administrator of Danyang in the time of Emperor Shun. With a good reputation, he was transferred to Henei, and became noted for his unbiased recommendations for office. In contrast to his successor Zhou Jing, Han Yan made no fuss of his nominees, and never promoted their kinsmen, explaining that it would be wrong to grant too much to the same family. When his cousin Han Jichao was charged with some offence, Han Yan was also dismissed from his office and taken to the capital in a prison cart. Bearing this with dignity, he later benefited from an amnesty and was made Chancellor of Pei.

During the reign of Emperor Huan, Han Yan became Minister of Ceremonies in the government dominated by the Liang clan. In 155 he was appointed Excellency of Works and in 157 he was promoted to Excellency over the Masses. When the Empress Liang Nüying died in 159, Liang Ji wanted to adopt the emperor's favourite, the Honoured Lady Liang/Deng Mengnü as his daughter and have her established as empress. Han Yan approved the plan, but after Emperor Huan and his eunuch allies destroyed the Liang he and his fellow-Excellencies, Hu Guang and Sun Lang, were found guilty of failing to support the sovereign. Han Yan was dismissed, imprisoned and sentenced to death less one degree. He was allowed to commute the penalty by payment of a fine, and was then sent home.

Following an eclipse of the sun and other omens early in 165, Han Yin was recalled to be Director of Retainers. He promptly impeached the eunuch Zuo Guan and his brother Zuo Cheng; they committed suicide. He then had the Chancellor of Pei Ju Gong arrested for corruption. Ju Gong's brother, the palace eunuch Ju Yuan, went to plead for him, but he was demoted in fief and the whole affair reduced the influence of eunuchs and other favourites. Han Yan left office soon afterwards. -HHS 7:301-05, 45/35:1536, 78/68:2522, FSTY 5:38, 7:56, HQ 1:18b; deC 89:13, 57.

Han Yan 韓晏. Magistrate of Yongning county in southern Kuaiji, Han Yan was appointed Commandant by Sun Ce in 196 and sent against the loyalist Shang Sheng at Houguan by present-day Fuzhou. Defeated, he was dismissed and replaced by He Qi. -SGZ Wu 15:1377.

Han Yan 韓顏 see Wei Yan 韋顏.

Han Yi 韓翼 [Gongfu 公輔]; Hedong. As a county magistrate in Beihai in 174, Han Yi took a leading role in establishing a local shrine. -Beitu 159 [the provenance of the inscription is uncertain].

Han Yi 韓翊. Assistant to the Court Astronomer Gaotang Long in the early 220s, Han Yi criticised the existing calendrical system and sponsored the Huangchu 黃初 [Yellow Beginning] calendar, named for the first reign period of the new dynasty. -JS 17:498; Needham 59:294.

Han Yin 韓寅 see Han Yan 韓演/演.

Han Yin 韓胤 (d.197). In 197 Han Yin was sent by the claimant emperor Yuan Shu to negotiate a marriage alliance with Lü Bu. Lü Bu agreed, but then changed his mind and called his daughter back. Han Yin was sent in a cage cart to Xu city, the imperial capital controlled by Cao Cao, and was executed there. -HHS 75/65:2448, SGZ 7:224.

Han Ying 韓嬰 (d.39); Nanyang. In 39 the Excellency Han Xin lost favour and was dismissed from his position. Still angry, Emperor Guangwu continued the pressure until both Han Xin and his son Han Ying had been driven to suicide. -HHS 26/16:902.

Han You 韓攸 see Han Shao 韓韶.

Han Yu 韓紆. An Internuncio about 70, he investigated and interrogated Dou Xun, who died in prison. In 88, when Dou Xun's daughter became regent Dowager for Emperor He, her brother Dou Xian sent retainers to kill a son of Han Yu, take his head, and offer it at the tomb of Dou Xun. -HHS 23/13:813.

Han Yue 韓說 [Shuru 叔儒]; Kuaiji. Learned in the Confucian classics, Han Yue was also an expert in prognostication by means of the apocryphal texts. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he became a Consultant, was a friend of Cai Yong, and composed a number of rhapsodies, hymns and poems in the lian Zhu 連珠 "Linked Pearl" style of epigram and admonition.

In 175 Han Yue joined Cai Yong and others to urge that the five classics Analects, Changes, Ritual, the History and Chunqiu with the Gongyang commentary be edited and engraved on stone. This was approved, and Han Yue worked on the project until its completion in 183.

Probably in 177, the court commissioned a fourth instalment of the dynastic history Hanji 漢記, and Han Yue was appointed to the committee, together with Ma Midi, Cai Yong, Yang Biao and Lu Zhi. The work included annals for emperors An and Shun, the infants Chong and Zhi and Emperor Huan, with biographies updated to the end of the reign of Emperor Huan in 168. It was at this time that the history acquired the name of Dongguan Hanji 東觀漢記, from the Eastern Pavilion 東觀 of the Southern Palace, where the library and workrooms were located.

Promoted Palace Attendant, in 178 Han Yue warned Emperor Ling against a forthcoming eclipse, and in 180 he took part in a board of enquiry under the Minister of Ceremonies Jiu Dan which considered rival methods for calculating eclipses of the moon. In 185 he foretold a fire in the Southern Palace.

Han Yue later became Administrator of Jiangxia, but was dismissed for some fault. He died at his home aged seventy. -HHS 82/72B:2733-34*; Ngo 76:115, DeWoskin 83:73.

Han Yue 韓約 see Han Sui 韓遂.

Han Zhan 韓湛. A colonel under Wu Han in the east in 30, Han Zhan captured and killed Dong Xian and sent his head to the capital. He was rewarded with enfeoffment. -HHS 12/2:497.

Han Zhao 韓昭 (d.145). Administrator of Nanyang, in 145 Han Zhao was found guilty of corruption and died in prison. -HHS 6:279.

Han Zhong 韓忠 (d.184); Nanyang. Leader of the local Yellow Turbans after the death of Zhao Hong, he was besieged in Wan city. As the imperial commander Zhu Jun enticed him into a break-out, he was ambushed and killed. -HHS 71/61:2309-10.

Han Zhong 韓忠; Liaodong. In 204 Han Zhong was sent by Gongsun Kang of Liaodong to grant a seal as Shanyu to the Wuhuan chieftain Supuyan. Qian Zhao, envoy of Cao Cao, confronted and attacked him in open court. Supuyan, over-awed, accepted Cao Cao's suzerainty and sent Han Zhong away. -SGZ 26:730-31.

Han [Zhongbo] 韓仲伯. When the Red Eyebrows destroyed the Gengshi Emperor in 25, Han Zhongbo fled with others from Chang'an. His beautiful wife came with them, but Han Zhongbo was afraid she would be a danger to the group by attracting attention. He was going to leave her at the wayside, but his comrade Zhao Xi put dirt on the Lady's face and took her along in a hand-cart, explaining to anyone whom they met that she was ill. So they arrived safely in Nanyang. -HHS 26/16:912-13.

Han Zhuo 韓卓 [Ziju 子助]; Chenliu. A generous and tolerant man, of wide learning, with good judgement of character, Han Zhuo was a noted teacher. He encouraged others to good conduct, if he passed an altar he would pay his respects, and he could not eat the flesh of any animal once he had seen it alive [Mencius 1A:7:8].

In the 160s, on the advice of Fu Rong, the Administrator Feng Dai appointed Han Zhuo as Registrar of the commandery. One year, at the time of the winter La 臘 sacrifice, a slave stole food to make an offering to his ancestors. Despite the theft, Han Zhuo was touched by his fine feelings and freed him. -HHS 68/58:2233, XHS 5:20a, YSS:21b. [This may be the same man as in the entry below.]

Han Zhuo 韓卓. In 185 Han Zhuo was a clerical officer under the Grand Commandant. The general Huangfu Song proposed bringing Wuhuan auxiliaries to help deal with the rebellion in Liang province. But when the matter was discussed in court Han Zhuo argued that the Xianbi, though difficult to handle, would be more effective: indeed, if the Wuhuan were called up, the Xianbi would attack their home country and cause them to desert. The whole idea of using these erratic allies was opposed by Ying Shao, the majority agreed with him, and the idea was dropped. -HHS 48/38:1609-10. [This may be the same man as in the entry above.]

Han [Zifang] 韓子方; Jianwei. A master of the Book of Changes, Han Zifang tutored the unfortunate Zhang Zhen. -HYGZ 10B:161.

Han [Ziran] 韓子冉. A magistrate in Jianwei, Han Ziran admired the devotion of the Lady Huang Bo, widow of Zhang Zhen, and granted her son appointment in the county office. -HYGZ 10B:161.

Han Zong 韓琮 (d.110). A Chinese, Han Zong joined the court of the Shanyu Tan of the Southern Xiongnu. In 109, the imperial government was faced by rebellion of the Qiang in Liang province, floods in eastern China, and trouble with the Wuhuan and Xianbi across the frontier of Yanmen and Wuyuan. Han Zong persuaded the Shanyu Tan that he should take the opportunity to seek independence, and with his advice Tan attacked the Emissary Geng Chong in his camp at the Xiongnu capital, Meiji in Xihe.

The General on the Liao Wang Biao died at this time, and though the Chinese sent additional troops and Xianbi auxiliaries they suffered a number of setbacks. In 110 the Xiongnu raided Changshan and Zhongshan commanderies on the North China plain below the Taihang mountains, but the imperial forces were able to isolate the rebel Xiongnu from their potential allies on the steppe, and the Chinese applied increasing pressure towards Meiji.

The Shanyu Tan now sought to return to allegiance, and he was permitted to surrender. He spoke bitterly to Han Zong at the failure of his plan, and it is doubtful that Han Zong escaped with his life. -HHS 89/79:2957-58.

Han Zong 韓宗. An Academician at the Imperial University in Luoyang about 180, Han Zong taught New Text interpretations of Changes and History. One of his students was Zhang Hong. -SGZ Wu 8:1243.

Han Zun 韓遵. In 30 Han Zun was Registrar to Guangwu's Protector of the Qiang Wen Xu, who was captured by Wei Ao's men but killed himself rather than submit. Han Zun and his colleague Wang Zhong brought his body back and told the emperor of his heroic death. -HHS 81/71:2673.

Handan 邯鄲 [personal name unknown]; Zhao. Formerly a local officer under Yong Quan the Chancellor of Zhao, this man later became Administrator of Hanzhong. The tomb of the Yong family had been damaged, but he made repairs and set up a stele inscription. -LS 12:12b.

Handan Chun 邯鄲淳 or Handan Zhu 竺 [Zishu 子叔 or Zili 子禮]; Yingchuan. A nephew of Du Shang, Handan Chun accompanied him when he became a county magistrate in Kuaiji. He encouraged Du Shang to set up a commemorative stele for Wang E, the filial and suicidal daughter of the shaman Cao Yu; when the scholar Wei Lang failed to complete the text Handan Chun took it over. He was noted for scholarship and literary ability, and particularly for his calligraphy, in which field he followed the tradition of the first-century master Wang Xi and was credited with restoring the tradition of the ancient script 古文.

In the early 190s Handan Chun was with the court in Chang'an, but then took refuge in Jing province. As Cao Cao took over in 208, he called Handan Chun to be a mentor to his son Cao Zhi.

About 217, when Cao Cao was considering which of his sons should be named as Heir, Handan Chun praised Cao Zhi's talents. Cao Pi resented this, and though he later gave Handan Chun literary office at his court of Wei, and rewarded him for his work, he did not rank him with the Seven Masters of the Jian'an period. Yu Huan, compiler of Wei lue, however, named Handan Chun as one of seven Confucian Exemplars 儒宗 who maintained the tradition of Han scholarship in times of disorder. -HHS 84/74:2795, SGZ 21:602-03*, JS 36:1063; Fang 52:170-171, Goodman 98:67.

Handan Shang 邯鄲商 (d.206); Chenliu. In 194 Handan Shang was sent out as Inspector of a newly-established Yong 雍 province, controlling commanderies of the far west which had been cut off by the troubles in Liang province. In 206 he was killed by Zhang Meng the Administrator of Wuwei. -HHS 9:376 & 384, 65/55:2144, SGZ 18:547-48; deC 96:137 and see sub Zhang Meng.

Handan Shun 邯鄲淳 see Handan Chun 邯鄲淳.

Handan Yi 邯鄲義. In 159 Handan Yi was Minister of Justice. He and the Minister of the Household Yuan Xu were the only leading officials not controlled by the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, and when the Liang were destroyed, Handan Yi was among the few who retained their positions at court. -HHS 34/24:1186, 45/35:1525.

Handan Yi was also at some time Minister of the Guards. -FSTY 5f:128.

Handan Zhu 邯鄲竺 see Handan Chun 邯鄲淳.

[Hande (style)] 漢德 [surname and personal name unknown]; Wudu. A local officer of the commandery, in 172 he joined in setting up a stele to commemorate the road works of the Administrator Li Yu. -LS 4:12b.

Hao Bodu 郝伯都, the Lady; Ba. The Lady is mentioned as an exemplary woman 烈女 of the Later Han period, but there are no further details. -HYGZ 12:220.

Hao [Bozong] 郝伯宗; Guanghan. A local scholar, Hao Bozong was a teacher of Jing Luan. -HYGZ 10C:174.

Hao Chong 郝崇. Administrator of Jincheng, in the summer of 77 Hao Chong learned that the chieftain Miyu of the Shaodang Qiang wanted to cross the frontier from Chinese territory. Hao Chong chased them and attempted to bring them back, but was heavily defeated. He escaped himself, but left two thousand dead behind him. -HHS 2:135, 87/77:2881.

Hao Guang 郝光. Administrator of Ji'nan about 210,

Hao Guang admired the county magistrate Sima Zhi. When Sima Zhi laid a complaint against Hao Guang's Registrar Liu Jie, Hao Guang accepted it and degraded Liu Jie to be a common soldier. -SGZ 12:387.

Hao Jie 郝絜; Taiyuan. In the late 150s Hao Jie and his fellow-countryman Hu Wu presented a memorial to the offices of the Excellencies, recommending a number of worthy scholars, but they did not call upon the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, nor provide him with a copy.

Hao Jie and Hu Wu were friends of Yuan Zhu, who later criticised the General-in-Chief Liang Ji and paid a fatal penalty. Angry at their lack of respect, and suspicious of their connection with Yuan Zhu, Liang Ji ordered their execution. Hu Wu's family was slaughtered, but Hao Jie managed to escape.

Realising that he would eventually be captured and thus involve his own family, Hao Jie took his own coffin to Liang Ji's residence and sent in a letter, then took poison and died. Because of his suicide, his family was spared. -HHS 34/24:1184; Ch'ü 72:474, deC 89:10.

Hao [Lizhen] 郝禮真; Yunzhong. Sponsored by Guo Tai, Hao Lizhen became well-known and respected. -HHS 68/58:2231.

Hao Meng 郝萌 (d.196); Henei. An officer of Lü Bu, in 196 Hao Meng was suborned by Yuan Shu and led a mutiny at night in Xiapi city. Lü Bu fled to Gao Shun, who attacked Hao Meng and defeated him. Hao Meng was killed by his own follower Cao Xing. -SGZ 7:224.

Hao [Mengjie] 郝孟節; Yingchuan? There are a number of different accounts of the name/s, place of origin, attributes and skills of this man, who came to Cao Cao's court in the early third century.

HHS 82/72B:2750-51 [Ngo 76:143-146, DeWoskin 83:88] says that Hao Mengjie could keep food in his mouth under his tongue without eating it for five to ten years [this is mentioned also by XC 6:7a], and it was likewise claimed that he could hold his breath for months at a time, entering into a trance which appeared like death. Evidently in contrast to other men of magic, however, Hao Mengjie was married, lived simply, and behaved like a gentleman; Cao Cao had him supervise his colleagues.

The Dian lun 典論 of Cao Pi, quoted by HHS 82/72B:2748 TC and at SGZ 29:805 PC, tells how Xi Jian 郤儉 of Yingchuan was likewise known for his ability to abstain from food, but that he regularly ate the "China-root" fungus Pachyma or Poria Cocos 伏苓, and when he came to Cao Cao's court in the early third century, the market price of China-root quickly doubled. [See sub Li Tan 李覃 for an example of an unsuccessful amateur in this dietary technique.]

The Bowu zhi by Zhang Hua of the third century, cited by Hui Dong at HHSJJ 82/72B:3026 and by Ngo 76:143, says that Cao Cao gave charge of the magicians to Xi Jian 郤儉, whose style was Mengjie, and who came from Yangcheng, a county in Yingchuan.

As Hui Dong suggests, it seems likely that Xi Jian and Hao Mengjie were in fact the same man, and the various characters for the surname have been confused. If that is so, then although HHS 82/72B says that both Hao Mengjie and his colleague Wang Zhen were men of Shangdang, Xi Jian/Hao Mengjie probably came from Yingchuan.

Some texts, moreover, have the surname as 郤, and there was a man from Henan named Que Jian 郤儉 q.v. He died in 188, however, and the magician was evidently alive some years after 210.

Though Cao Cao gave appointment to Hao Mengjie and others, and may have been interested in the possibilities of longevity, his son Cao Zhi claims that such patronage was rather to keep these men and their teachings under control, and he and his family gave them no credence. Cao Zhi's Biandao lun, also quoted by Pei Songzhi in SGZ 29:805-06, discusses these men and their claims with a degree of scepticism.

Hao Pu 郝普 [Zitai 子太] (d.230); Nanyang. In 215 Hao Pu was Administrator of Lingling in the service of Liu Bei when Sun Quan's general Lü Meng came to attack. As Hao Pu held out and Liu Bei's general Guan Yu prepared to relieve him, Lü Meng had orders to withdraw. Lü Meng sent Hao Pu's old friend Deng Xuanzhi to urge him to give up before he stormed the city. Hao Pu agreed but, after the surrender was complete, Lü Meng showed him the orders to leave and laughed at his embarrassment.

Hao Pu later became Minister of Justice to Sun Quan, but was forced to commit suicide in 230 for his credulous support of the traitor Yin Fan 隱蕃. -SGZ Wu 9:1276-77, 17:1418, SGZ Shu 15:1090; Fang 52: 321-322.

Hao Zhao 郝昭 [Bodao 伯道]; Taiyuan. In 220 Hao Zhao held command under Su Ze in the resettlement of Liang 涼 province in the far northwest. He remained in the region as a general, and in 229 he defended the city of Chencang in Youfufeng against strong attack from Zhuge Liang of Shu-Han. -SGZ 16:492, 3:95-96.

Hao Zhou 浩周 [Kongyi 孔異]; Shangdang. Having served Cao Cao as a county magistrate in Pei, Hao Zhou became Inspector of Xu province.

In 219 he was Protector of the Army, in charge of discipline, under Yu Jin. In the autumn of that year Yu Jin and his men were captured by Liu Bei's general Guan Yu outside Fan city in Nanyang. Soon afterwards Sun Quan's general Lü Meng attacked and destroyed Guan Yu, and the prisoners came into Sun Quan's hands.

Sun Quan treated Hao Zhou with great generosity, and in the following year he sent him back to the north with messages of submission and allegiance for Cao Pi, who had lately succeeded his father Cao Cao as King of Wei. Cao Pi received Hao Zhou and his colleague Dongli Gun, who had also been a captive in Wu, and he asked them whether Sun Quan's assurances could be relied upon. Dongli Gun was doubtful, but Hao Zhou was full of confidence, and even swore upon the lives of his family.

Cao Pi was glad to accept Hao Zhou's assurances, and as he took the abdication of Emperor Xian of Han he sent an embassy to enfeoff Sun Quan with the title King of Wu. Hao Zhou accompanied the party and was received privately by Sun Quan, who repeated his assurances of good faith, weeping with emotion and gesturing to heaven. After the embassy returned, Sun Quan apologised for the delay in sending his eldest son Sun Deng as hostage to Wei, and he repeated his assurances to Hao Zhou, but he never fulfilled his undertakings. In 222 Cao Pi lost patience and attacked Wu.

Though Hao Zhou's trust in Sun Quan had been mistaken, Cao Pi did not enforce any penalty against him or his family. On the other hand, Hao Zhou received no further appointment. -SGZ Wu 2:1127-28; Fang 52:127-131.

Hao [Zilian] 郝子廉; Taiyuan. Hao Zilian was criticised by Ying Shao for his excessive abstemiousness. -FSTY 3:23.

Haodan 郝旦; Wuhuan. A chieftain of Liaoxi, in 49 Haodan and some 900 lesser leaders came on embassy to Han. They brought slaves, cattle and horses, together with bows and the skins of tigers, leopards and sables. Received in audience by Emperor Guangwu, they were rewarded with generous presents in exchange, and eighty chieftains were granted insignia and permitted to bring their people to settle in the commanderies along the north of the plain.

Bielenstein doubts the significance of this agreement, but I note that the Wei shu of Wang Shen, quoted by SGZ 30 PC, refers to nine thousand leaders, so the total number of people involved may have been as many as a hundred thousand. In practice, the Chinese had lost considerable ground in the north after the fall of Wang Mang, so it is probable that many of the Wuhuan were already in place and the "permission" granted by Guangwu was no more than recognition of a fait accompli.

At this time, on the recommendation of Ban Biao, the office of the Protector of the Wuhuan was established with headquarters at Ning in Shanggu, by present-day Zhangjiakou [Kalgan] in Hebei. The Protector was responsible for the Xianbi tribes as well as the Wuhuan and, most importantly, maintained the markets for trade across the frontier. In culmination of the settlement with these non-Chinese people, by the end of the reign of Emperor Guangwu it appears that the Chang River Regiment of the Northern Army at Luoyang was composed entirely of Wuhuan troopers [HHS 117/27:3612-13, deC 84:387-389].

The surrender of Haodan and his associates may be seen as a critical point in the organisation of the north-eastern frontier of Han, for the arrangements made at that time remained effective until the final years of the dynasty. -HHS 90/80:2982, SGZ 30:833; Bn 67:130, deC 84:381-389.

Haoduo 號多; Qiang. A chieftain of the Shaodang tribe of the rebel Qiang, in 114 he was sent by Lianchang to attack Wudu and Hanzhong. His men were driven back by the local Chinese troops aided by the Banshun people of Ba commandery. As he retreated, Haoduo cut the fortified Long Road, then went north to consult with Lianchang in Beidi.

In the following year Haoduo and seven thousand followers surrendered to the Protector Pang Can. Haoduo was sent to the capital and enfeoffed as a marquis, then returned to the northwest to aid the Chinese. -HHS 87/77:2889.

Haofeng 號封; Qiang. A member of the Jiaogong tribe, in 117 he was sent by the Chinese commander Ren Shang to assassinate Lianchang, leader of the rebel Qiang. Haofeng was rewarded with title as King of the Qiang. -HHS 87/77:2891.

Haoliang 號良 (d.119); Qiang. In 119 Haoliang joined members of the Lejie tribe in planning a revolt, but they were attacked by the Protector Ma Xian. Haoliang and several of his associates were killed, and the remainder scattered. -HHS 87/77:2891.

Haoyu 號吾 or Haowu; Qiang. Son of Dianyu and younger brother of the chieftain Miyu of the Shaodang group of the Qiang, in 86 he joined a raid on Longxi but was captured by the local official Li Zhang. He was brought before the Administrator Zhang Yu, who was going to put him to death. Haoyu argued that if he were killed it would confirm the hostility of his people, but if he were released the Qiang would cause no further trouble. Zhang Yu did release Haoyu, and the Qiang duly scattered and withdrew across the border.

In 89 Zhang Yu, now Protector, was dismissed on account of the disruption caused by his treacherous murder of Miyu. Miyu's son Mitang maintained the fight against Zhang Yu's successor Deng Xun, but Haoyu accepted his good will and brought his mother and other members of their tribe to surrender. -HHS 87/77:2881-83, 16/6:610.

He 何, the Lady (d.189); Nanyang: Empress of Emperor Ling. Daughter of He Zhen and his wife the Lady Xing, she is said to have come from a butcher's family. Most likely born in the late 150s, she entered the harem of Emperor Ling by common selection in the 170s. Despite her questionable background, she was described as a woman of respectable family 良家; there was suggestion that she obtained her position by bribery. Seven feet tall [162 cm] and good-looking, she attracted the emperor's favours and gave birth to a son Liu Bian, probably in 173 [but see sub Liu Bian]. She then became an Honoured Lady, and was made empress in 180 [strictly, on 1 January 181].

Jealous and fierce, the Empress He terrorised the harem, and when the Beauty Wang bore the imperial son Liu Xie in 181, she poisoned her. The emperor was furious and intended to dismiss her, but his eunuch favourites dissuaded him.

When Emperor Ling died in 189, the Lady He used her authority as Dowager to establish her young son upon the throne, and held the regency with the support of her half-brother the General-in-Chief He Jin. He Jin planned to kill the eunuchs, but the Lady He sought to protect them, and in the autumn, concerned for their fate, the eunuchs killed He Jin and attempted a coup. They were unsuccessful and were massacred; in the turmoil the court and the capital came into the control of the frontier general Dong Zhuo.

On 28 September Dong Zhuo compelled the Lady He to issue an edict deposing her own son Liu Bian in favour of Liu Xie, and two days later she was killed by poison. -HHS 10B:449-50*, Ch'ü 72:390.

He 何 [personal name unknown]; Youfufeng. Administrator of Shu commandery in 57, he arranged the construction of a gallery or trestle road 閣道 through the mountains. -LS 4:1a-b, Beitu 1:23-24.

He 何 [personal name unknown]; Rencheng: see sub He Bao 何豹. -LS 27:6b.

He Ba 何霸; Shu. At some time He Ba was a local officer of his commandery. -HYGZ 10B:156.

He Bao 何豹; Rencheng. As Minister Steward in the early 150s, He Bao joined his colleague Yang Fu to recommend Cui Shi for appointment at court. [LS 27:6b mentions a Minister Steward of the He surname, whose personal name was not recorded. This is probably He Bao.]

In the early 160s, He Bao was Intendant of Henan when Kou Rong charged him with having made false accusations against him. -HHS 52/42:1730, 16/6:629.

He Biao 蓋彪; Dunhuang [but cf. sub He Xun]. Son of He Jin, He Biao was Minister of Finance about 100. -HHS 58/48:1879.

He Ce 蓋側 (d.70); Yuyang. Son of He Fu, he succeeded to his fief. In 70 he was implicated in the alleged conspiracy of his uncle Wang Ping on behalf of Liu Ying, King of Chu. He Ce was executed and the fief was abolished. -HHS 18/8:689.

He Chang 何敞. In the early 20s, during the last years of Wang Mang, He Chang was Administrator of Runan, where he repaired fishponds and irrigated fields.

The commandery was invaded by bandits, and as He Chang attacked them his troops were defeated and scattered. Impressed by the loyalty of his officer Zhou Jia, the enemy let He Shang go. -HQ 1:18a, HHS 81/71:2676.

He Chang 何敞; Wu. He Chang lived in retirement and studied magical arts. When there was a plague of insects the Administrator Qing Hong sent one of his officers to invite him to county office. He Chang refused, but in pity for the people he went on foot to the city and stayed one night at the residence. The insects duly died, and He Chang went away again.

He Chang was later nominated as Sincere and Upright, but would not accept. He died at home. - HHSJJ 31/21:1162 Hui Dong quoting Soushen ji.

He Chang 何敞 [Wen'gao 文高]; Youfufeng. Son of He Chong, He Chang was a fine scholar of high moral standards. At first he refused invitations to office, but in 86 he joined the offices of the Grand Commandant Song You, who treated him as a particular confidant, while he was also admired by the Excellency Yuan An. When strange birds, animals and plants appeared about the capital, He Chang's understanding of omens enabled him to warn his seniors of the coming death of Emperor Zhang.

He Chang complained to Song You about the power and extravagance of the family of the regent Dowager Dou in time of bad harvests and trouble on the frontier, and he urged some relief for the people. Song You, however, took no action. Then Dou Xian had the marquis Liu Chang murdered and attempted to conceal his responsibility by a false accusation. The offices of the other Excellencies argued that the highest officials should not become involved in criminal matters, but He Chang pressed the investigation until the whole affair was uncovered. Dou Xian was held in house arrest and He Chang acquired a high reputation at the capital. Graded First Class, he joined the Imperial Censorate.

As an army was raised for Dou Xian to lead against the Xiongnu, his brothers Du and Jing used corvée labour to build mansions for themselves; He Chang wrote to protest, but his memorial was not acted upon, though he did save the life of his ally Zhi Shou, who was falsely accused and liable to execution.

Transferred to the Imperial Secretariat, He Shang wrote once more against the Dou. They were angered by his exposure of their excesses, and about 90 He Chang was sent as Tutor to Ji'nan. The king Liu Kang, a son of Emperor Guangwu, was wealthy and oppressive. He respected He Chang and admired his admonitions, but did not change his conduct.

Soon afterwards He Chang was appointed Administrator of Runan. At each Beginning of Spring 立春 festival he withdrew his Investigators from their supervision of the various counties, and sent Confucian officers to review those held in jails and to reward people who had shown family affection. The commandery became noted for filial piety, and brothers readily yielded their rights to one another. He also repaired the old canal on the Tong River and opened a great area of arable land for colonisation. He was hymned for his virtue and achievements.

Despite He Chang's record of hostility to the Dou group, after they had been destroyed by Emperor He in 92 it was alleged that his son had been close to Dou Xiang; He Chang was dismissed.

In 100 he returned to appointment as a General of the Household, and he became an energetic advocate of the former Grand Commandant Zhang Pu, who had been dismissed in that year; in 104 Zhang Pu was reappointed as an Excellency.

Having made an enemy of the eunuch Cai Lun, in 105 He Chang was accused of pretending sickness to avoid the fasting required for ceremonial at the Imperial Ancestral Temple. He was dismissed and died at home. - HHS 43/33:1480-87*; Ch'ü 72:301-302.

He Chang 何萇 [Youzheng 幼正 also miswritten as Chushan 初山]; Shu. About 150 He Chang was a disciple of Yang Hou, expert in Huang-Lao doctrines, and he also became a teacher. - HYZG 10B:144, 12: 214.

He Chong 何寵; Youfufeng. He Chong was descended from a noted official lineage. He became a commandery Commandant under Emperor Guangwu, but left office on account of ill health and remained in retirement. - HHS 43/33:1480, DGHJ 19:5a.

He Chun 賀純 [Zhongzhen 仲真]; Kuaiji. Having studied widely when he was young, He Chun became celebrated as a hermit scholar. He was repeatedly invited to office, but always refused: it is said that he rejected ten invitations to offices of the Excellencies, five appointments as an Academician at the Imperial University, three special nominations, and four summons with an official carriage.

Eventually, through the persuasion of Li Gu, in 127 He Chun accepted one more special invitation. He became a Consultant and then a Palace Attendant, interpreting natural disasters and omens to Emperor Shun, and was later Administrator of Jiangxia. - HHS 61/51:2032, 63/53:2081-82, SGZ Wu 15:1377, XC 8: 7a; Vervoorn 90:294.

This He family of Kuaiji originally held the surname Qing 慶, and claimed descent from Qing Pu 慶普 of Former Han, who founded a school of interpretation of Ritual. It was changed in 106 to avoid taboo on the personal name of the father of the new Emperor An.

He Deng 蓋登 (d.165); Bohai. A religious rebel operating along the sea coast, He Deng proclaimed himself Grand Supreme Emperor 太上皇帝 [cf. sub Dai Yi], acquired a jade seal and other insignia, and appointed officials. In the autumn of 165 he was taken and executed. -HHS 7:316 [commentary gives the pronunciation of the surname as Gai].

He Fu 蓋扶; Yuyang. Son of He Yan, He Fu succeeded to his fief. -HHS 18/8:689.

He Fu 蓋扶, wife of: see the Lady Wang 王 II of Yuyang.

He Fu 何阜; Chen. Youngest son of He Xi, He Fu was talented but died young. -HHS 47/37:1594.

He Fu 賀輔; Kuaiji. Younger brother of He Chun, He Fu became magistrate of Yongning, present-day Wenzhou in Chejiang, in the south of his home commandery. -SGZ Wu 15:1377. [On the surname, originally Qing 慶, see sub He Chun.]

He Fu 和浮 miswritten for He Hai 和海.

He Gong 和恭. In 84 He Gong and three other officers were sent with eight hundred men as reinforcements to Ban Chao in the Western Regions. -HHS 47/37:1579.

He Gong 何貢 miswritten for He Zhen 何真. -HHS 8: 345.

He Hai 和海; Henei. A county magistrate in Wudu in 179, He Hai sent in a memorial arguing that the proscription applied to distant relatives of the men of Faction since 176 [see sub Cao Luan] conflicted with proper tradition. In contrast to his earlier reaction, Emperor Ling accepted the argument and eased the proscription. -HHS 8:343, 67/57:2189; deC 89:161-162.

He Heng 何衡; Chen. Son of He Lin, He Heng became a member of the Imperial Secretariat, admired for his honesty. He Lin had been recommended by Li Gu, and when Li Gu was disgraced in 147 He Heng was identified as one of his associates. He was briefly imprisoned, then dismissed to his home. -HHS 47/37: 1594, SGZ 12:379.

He Hui 蓋恢; Yuyang. In 113 the regent Dowager Deng granted a village marquisate to He Hui, a great-grandson of He Yan [see also sub He Ce]. -HHS 18/8: 689.

He Jin 蓋進; Dunhuang. He Jin was Administrator of Hanyang during in the first century AD. -HHS 58/48: 1879.

Though He Jin is registered as a man from Dunhuang, and his family may have continued to be formal residents of that commandery, it is likely they shifted their abode to Hanyang: by the end of the second century it appears that He Jin's descendant He Xun had family estates in that commandery.

He Jin 何瑾; Chen. Second son of He Xi, He Lin was an able official. -HHS 47/37:1594.

He Jin 何進 [Ding'an 安定]; Nanyang. Described as a former local officer at commandery headquarters, in 156 He Jin was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:17a.

He Jin 何進 [Suigao 遂高] (d.189); Nanyang. He Jin was a son of He Zhen, but not by the Lady Xing, who became the mother of the Empress He of Emperor Ling. When his younger half-sister entered the imperial harem and received the emperor's favours in the 170s, He Jin was made a gentleman cadet. He later became General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger and then Administrator of Yingchuan.

In 180 the Lady He became empress and He Jin, her senior male relative, was appointed Palace Attendant and Court Architect, then Intendant of Henan.

When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out in 184 He Jin was named General-in-Chief, commanding the Northern Army for the defence of Luoyang; he was enfeoffed for having uncovered a conspiracy of Yellow Turbans in the capital. Later that year he petitioned in favour of Wang Yun, imprisoned for his hostility to the eunuchs, and secured his release.

In 188 He Jin commanded a great levy and grand parade at Luoyang, but at the same time the emperor also established the Western Garden corps of personal guards, and the eunuch Jian Shi, named senior colonel, was given authority even over He Jin. He attempted to have He Jin sent against the rebels of Liang province, but He Jin was able to delay the expedition.

When Emperor Ling died in 189, He Jin aided his sister, now regent Dowager, to place her son Liu Bian upon the throne; he shared control of the Secretariat, and hence formal command of the government, with the Grand Tutor Yuan Wei. Jian Shi and other eunuchs planned two assassination attempts, but he had Jian Shi killed and took over his troops, while he also destroyed the Dowager Dong, mother of Emperor Ling, and her brother Dong Cheng.

Yuan Shao and other young gentlemen now urged He Jin to attack all the eunuchs, but the Dowager He and other members of the family argued in their favour. He Jin could not make up his mind, but in an attempt to impress the recalcitrants he called up fighting men from the east of the empire and also summoned the frontier general Dong Zhuo.

On 22 September 189, as He Jin was leaving the palace after a further discussion with his sister, he was waylaid and killed by a eunuch group headed by Zhang Rang. In revenge, Yuan Shao led mutinous troops against the palaces, the eunuchs were massacred, and Dong Zhuo seized power in Luoyang. -HHS 69/59:2246-52*; Bn 76:98-100, deC 89:164, 177, 208-212, deC 96:1-15.

He Ju 何矩 [Shiju 世舉]; Nanyang. A former county magistrate, in 156 He Ju was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

He Kui 何夔 [Shulong 叔龍]; Chen. A descendant of He Xi, He Kui's father died when he was young and He Kui was brought up by his mother's brother. Eight foot three inches [192 cm] tall, he was noted for his serious bearing, filial piety and personal loyalty.

In the early 190s He Kui took refuge south of the Huai. The claimant emperor Yuan Shu, a distant relative by marriage, tried to recruit him, but He Kui escaped into the hills and made his way back to Chen.

In 198 he joined Cao Cao's staff, and in 199 he was sent as a magistrate in Runan to settle the disturbances caused by Liu Bei's defection and rebellion. He then became Administrator of the new commandery of Changguang, by the mouth of the Yellow River on the north of the Shandong peninsula, where he put down Yellow Turbans and a variety of local leaders allied to Yuan Tan. He then argued successfully that the commandery should be assessed as a "new territory" and taxed lightly.

Returning to Cao Cao's headquarters about 200, He Kui was sent out again as Administrator to deal with pirates in Le'an. He returned to appointment as a senior clerk to the Imperial Chancellor, and in that role he urged Cao Cao to reform the recruitment of officials.

In 213 He Kui was appointed to the Secretariat of the duchy of Wei, and in 216 he succeeded Mao Jie as Deputy Director. Mao Jie had been disgraced because Ding Yi had slandered him, but He Kui showed Ding Yi neither fear nor respect. In 217 he became Junior Tutor to Cao Pi as Heir, then succeeded Liang Mao as Senior Tutor. He was later Minister Coachman, and though Cao Pi sought to maintain contact with him, He Kui held a strict and proper distance.

As Cao Pi came to the throne He Kui was enfeoffed, and he was one of the sponsors of a commemorative stele set up after Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. He died soon afterwards. -SGZ 12:378-81*, LS 19:4a.

He Lin 何臨 [Ziling 子陵]; Chen. Eldest son of He Xi, in 143 he was recommended by Li Gu. An able official, he became Administrator of Pingyuan. -HHS 47/37:1594, 63/53:2081-82.

He Luan 和鸞 (d.219); Zhangye. Local warlord and self-styled general, in 219 He Luan killed his rival Yan Jun of Wuwei, but was in turn killed by Wang Bi of the same commandery. -SGZ 15:474.

He Man 何曼. Leaders of Yellow Turbans in Runan and Yingchuan during the early 190s, He Man and his fellows allied themselves with Yuan Shu and Sun Jian, and by the middle 190s their troops were numbered by the tens of thousands. In the spring of 196, however, Cao Cao led an army against them. As the chieftain Huang Shao was killed, He Man and other leaders surrendered. -SGZ 1:13.

He Mao 何茂. In 200 He Mao was an officer of Yuan Shao commanding a detached camp on the Yellow River in the campaign against Cao Cao. The camp was destroyed in a raid led by Yu Jin and Yue Jin, and He Mao surrendered. -SGZ 17:523.

He Miao 何苗 or Zhu Miao 朱苗 (d.189); Nanyang. Son of the Lady Xing by her first husband, whose family name was Zhu, he changed his surname when his half-sister the Lady He, future empress, joined the harem of Emperor Ling in the 170s. He became Intendant of Henan and in 187 he was sent to put down rebels in Yingchuan. Returning successfully, he received a triumphal welcome, was enfeoffed and named General of Chariots and Cavalry.

After the accession of Liu Bian in 189, He Miao's half-brother He Jin planned to kill the eunuchs. With his mother and his sister the Dowager, He Miao argued against this. When the eunuchs assassinated He Jin, He Miao joined Yuan Shao in leading troops against the palace to kill them, but he was blamed for the earlier delay, which had allowed the disaster to happen, and was killed by his officer Wu Kuang. -HHS 69/59:2246-52, SGZ 6:173; deC 96:7-17.

He Min 和旻 (d.152). Administrator of Youbeiping, He Min was found guilty of embezzlement. He died in prison. -HHS 7:298.

He Mou 何茂 see He Mao 何茂.

He Ping 何平 see Wang Ping 王平.

He Qi 賀齊 [Gongmiao 公苗] (d.227); Kuaiji. Son of He Fu, He Qi became an officer in the commandery and then a magistrate on the eastern coast. He distinguished himself by killing the local bully Si Cong, who had support among the non-Chinese hills people 山越, then defeating a revenge attack from Si Cong's large clan. Transferred to an upper valley of the Fuchun River, he put down rebellion there.

As Sun Ce took over Kuaiji in 196, he nominated He Qi as Filial and Incorrupt and sent him to govern Yongning, his father's former county. Replacing Han Yen as Commandant in the south, he made alliance with the non-Chinese people to put down loyalist resistance at Houguan by present-day Fuzhou.

In 203, with troops raised by quota from each county of the commandery, He Qi embarked on the conquest of the Min River and its tributaries. From a base at Jian'an, present-day Jian'ou in Fujian, by 205 he had moved northwest to Yuzhang, linking the coast with the Yangzi and gaining ten thousand men for Sun Quan's army. In 208 he defeated the non-Chinese people and Han renegades in the Huang Shan range of southern Danyang, taking their camp by surprise with troops using bolts and darts as pitons to scale an undefended cliff. He became Administrator of a new commandery linking Hangzhou Bay with the Poyang region of eastern Yuzhang; in 211 he defeated a local rising at the head of Hangzhou Bay and again established a new commandery.

In 213 He Qi settled the east of Yuzhang, registering the people and raising regular troops and militia. Appointed a general, he accompanied the disastrous offensive against Hefei in 215. He relieved Sun Quan with a counter-attack, urging him to be more careful of his personal safety in future.

In 216 He Qi returned south to put down a rebellion by Cao Cao's agent You Tu in Poyang. With Lu Xun, he re-established control south of the Huang Shan and pressed more men. He was enfeoffed and appointed Area Commander for the Yangzi defences by Lujiang. When Cao Xiu's army attacked in 222 the Wu defences were devastated by a gale, but when He Qi came up his very appearance forced Cao Xiu to retreat. He Qi was named General of the Rear and granted the Staff of Authority as Governor of Xu province. In 223 he led an expedition which seized Qichun, north of the Yangzi below the Dabie Shan, and captured the turn-coat officer Jin Zong, now in the service of Wei.

He Qi was noted for military display, with splendid ornamentation on his warships and the finest materials for his weapons and engines. His conquests in present-day eastern Jiangxi, southern Zhejiang and northern Fujian were of utmost value to the state of Wu, giving Sun Quan and his successors the human resources and depth of territory to hold out against attacks from the far more powerful state of Wei across the Yangzi. -SGZ Wu 15:1377-80*; deC 90:328-332.

He Qia 和洽 see He Xia 和洽.

He Rong 何融. After the destruction of the Dou clan by Emperor He in 92 He Rong memorialised on the loyalty shown by his late teacher Yue Hui, which had cost him his life. The emperor granted office to Yue Hui's son Ji. -HHS 43/33:1479.

He Sheng 蓋升; Hejian. A neighbour and friend of Emperor Ling before he came to the throne, He Sheng was made Administrator of Nanyang, where he embezzled vast quantities of money. The Director of the Imperial Secretariat Qiao Xuan sought to have him dismissed and proscribed, but the emperor promoted him from Palace Counsellor to Palace Attendant.

In 178 He Sheng was a colonel in the Northern Army, criticised by Cai Yong as having received favour and honour beyond his due. -HHS 51/41:1696, 60/50B:1999.

He Shi 何侍, the Lady; Nan. Daughter of He Yang, the Lady was the wife of Xu Yuan q.v. In a family quarrel, she attacked her husband's aunt and was sentenced to death less one degree. -FSTY 3f:107.

He Shi 何詩; Shu. He Shi was a potential husband for the widowed Lady Luo Gong q.v. -HYGZ 10A:140.

He Shun 蓋順; Dunhuang [but cf. sub He Xun]. Son of He Xun, He Shun became Administrator of Yongyang, a commandery set up in 193 from Hanyang. Like his father, He Shun served on the frontier against the rebels and non-Chinese of the northwest. -HHS 58/48:1884, 113/23:3517.

He [Siqi] 蓋思齊; Dunhuang [but see sub He Xun]. Son of He Biao, he was Commandant of the Dependent State of Anding about 140. -HHS 58/48:1879, XC 3: 9b.

He Sui 蓋遂; Yuyang. Son of He Hui, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 18/8:689.

He Tang 何湯 [Zhonggong 仲弓]; Yuzhang. A student of Huan Rong in Jiujiang about 20, He Tang was the most brilliant among the hundreds who attended that private academy. Huan Rong was over forty and had no children, but He Tang persuaded him to divorce his wife and take another: Huan Rong sired three sons and was most grateful for the advice.

He Tang was later a gentleman cadet at Luoyang and then captain in charge at a gate of the city. As Emperor Guangwu returned one evening from a private excursion, He Tang refused him admission. The emperor was able to enter through another gate, but next morning he ordered that He Tang be issued with additional provisions, while the other gate captain had his salary docked.

During a period of drought in the summer of 43 the senior officials went in open carriages to pray for rain. Seeing a parasol on the carriage of the Prefect of Luoyang, He Tang ordered his arrest. The Prefect was dismissed and He Tang was appointed General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger.

At this time Emperor Guangwu named his son Liu Zhuang as Heir and appointed He Tang as his tutor in the Classic of History. He later asked He Tang the name of his own teacher, and He Tang told him about Huan Rong, who was at that time a clerk in the office of an Excellency. The emperor called Huan Rong to audience, rewarded and promoted him. Huan Rong thereafter had a notable career, and he attributed his success to the good offices of He Tang. -HHS 37/27: 1250, XC 6:10b-11a; Bn 76:15.

He Wen 何汶 [Jingyou 景由]; Shu. Grandson of He Ying, he was similarly learned in the classics and the apocrypha, and when an eclipse took place he correctly foretold a rebellion of bandits.

He Wen became a senior Internuncio at the imperial capital, successfully prayed for rain in a time of drought, and later transferred to the Dependent State of Jianwei, presumably as Commandant. He compiled Shiwu lun 世務論 "Essays on Affairs of the World" in thirty pian. -HYGZ 10A:134, 12:213.

Though both men were scholars and wrote books, the texts of Huayang guo zhi are confused and contradictory, so it is difficult to determine whether it was He Wen or his grandfather He Ying who had an official career, or whether both men held some appointment. He Ying was probably active in the late first century [see sub Yang You], so He Wen would have flourished in the first half of the second century.

He Xi 何熙 [Mengsun 孟孫] (d.110); Chen. Son of He Ying, He Xi was eight foot five inches tall [195 cm], with a commanding presence. An Internuncio in the 90s, he was noticed by Emperor He and was appointed Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate, then Director of Retainers and then Minister of Finance.

In 109, at the time of the great Qiang rebellion, the Wuhuan chieftain Wuhe attacked Wuyuan, and this was followed by rebellion of the Shanyu Tan of the Southern Xiongnu. He Xi was named Acting General of Chariots and Cavalry, commanding units of the Northern Army and local militia, to deal with the situation. As he collected his forces he ordered Geng Kui the Administrator of Liaodong to bring troops from the eastern frontier commanderies, together with a force of Xianbi auxiliaries. When his army was further delayed He Xi sent Geng Kui reinforcements and ordered him into Xihe, where they defeated the Xiongnu army.

Joined by the general Liang Qin, He Xi and the main army then compelled Wuhe to surrender and re-occupied Wuyuan. Sickness broke out among the troops, however, and He Xi died. His command was taken over by Pang Xiong, who finally defeated the Xiongnu. -HHS 47/37:1593*; deC 84:285-286.

He Xia 和洽 [Yangshi 陽士]; Runan. His quality noticed by the Officer of Merit Xu Shao, He Xia was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and invited to appointment at the capital by the General-in-Chief He Jin, but he refused to go.

About 190, as many local gentry went to join Yuan Shao in Ji province, He Xia suspected that region would be too exposed in time of war, and he went south instead to Jing province. Liu Biao welcomed him warmly, but He Xia preferred the isolation of Wuling.

When Cao Cao took over in 208 He Xia joined his staff. He criticised the excessive rigidity of the sumptuary codes applied by Cui Yan and Mao Jie, but years later in 216, when he was Palace Attendant of the state of Wei he argued for Mao Jie after Cui Yan had been put to death.

When Cao Cao died in 220, He Xia was Prefect of the Gentlemen of the Palace, in charge of household security for the kingdom of Wei, and he helped to arrange a smooth succession for Cao Pi. One of the sponsors of a stele commemorating Cao Pi taking the imperial title, He Xia was enfeoffed and named Minister of the Household in the new empire. He received further honours from Cao Rui. -SGZ 23:655-57*.

[He] Xing 何興, the Lady (d.189). First married to a man of the Zhu surname, by whom she bore He/Zhu Miao, she later married He Zhen. In the early 170s one of their daughters was selected into the harem of Emperor Ling, and in 180 she was made empress. He Zhen had already died, but he was posthumously enfeoffed as Marquis of Wuyang in Yingchuan and his widow was named the Lady of Wuyang.

The Lady often received bribes and favours from the court eunuchs, and when her stepson the General-in-Chief He Jin planned to eliminate them in 189 she and her daughter, now Dowager, argued in their favour. As Dong Zhuo took power after the massacre at Luoyang, he had the Lady killed. -HHS 10B:449.

He Xiong 何雄; Kuaiji. In 196 the local leader Zhang Ya of Houguan, near present-day Fuzhou, faced Sun Ce's officer He Qi. As Zhang Ya's son-in-law He Xiong attempted to seize power, He Qi seized the advantage, defeated the disorganised enemy and forced them to surrender. -SGZ Wu 15:1377-78.

He Xiu 何休 [Shaogong 邵公] (129-182); Rencheng. Son of He Bao, He Xiu was a quiet man with a speech impediment, but had a strong personality. A student of Yang Bi, he was considered superior to all others of his time as a scholar of the Confucian classics in the New Text tradition. He was an expert in calculations of the calendar, and made use of both the traditional texts and the apocrypha.

Since his father had been a minister He Xiu was granted entry to the imperial service as a gentleman cadet, but he disapproved of the political situation and resigned on grounds of ill health. He likewise refused service with the provincial and commandery offices, but always did so with courtesy.

As Emperor Ling was brought to the throne in 168, the Tutor Chen Fan invited He Xiu to join the new regency government. When Chen Fan was destroyed by the eunuchs later that year, He Xiu was dismissed and proscribed from office, but when the Proscription was relaxed some time later he was again invited to court. The Excellencies commended his knowledge and skills, and claimed he was suitable for the most confidential appointments, but the eunuchs objected, and He Xiu was named only as a Consultant. Having presented excellent advice in several occasions, he was promoted to Counsellor Remonstrant, and died in that office.

During his time in retirement, He Xiu produced a great amount of scholarly work, including commentaries to the Book of Filial Piety and to the Analects, texts on divination, and several studies on Chunqiu and its commentaries reflecting the opinions of his teacher Yang Bi and the master Li Yu. He paid particular attention to the Gongyang tradition: his commentary, Chunqiu Gongyang jiegou 春秋公羊解詁, was recognised as the basis of a new school of interpretation 何氏學 "Teachings of Mr He," and he also compiled Chunqiu Han yi 春秋漢議, which analysed six hundred items of the history of Han according to the "praise and blame" style of Gongyang.

In the early 170s He Xiu questioned the conduct of Su Buwei, who carried out a vendetta against his enemy Li Gao by murdering a concubine and a child and desecrating a grave. The celebrated moralist Guo Tai, however, praised Su Buwei's gallantry, and public opinion agreed. -HHS 79/69:2582-83*.

He Xuan 何瑱, the Lady; Shu. When her husband Zhao Xian died young, the Lady's parents wanted to have her remarry. The Lady, however, starved herself to death. The commandery and county offices set up memorials in her honour. -HYGZ 10A:140, 12:216.

He Xun 蓋勳 [Yuangu 元固] (140-190); Dunhuang/Hanyang. Son of He Siqu, and descended from an old official family, He Xun received commandery nomination as Filial and Incorrupt, and about 180 he became Chief Clerk in Hanyang, which was classified as a frontier territory. In practice, though He Xun's great-grandfather He Jin was registered as a man from Dunhuang, and his family may have continued to be formal residents of that commandery, there is reference below to He Xun's family estates in Hanyang and it appears they had shifted their abode there. He Xun thus held appointment in his home territory.

The Administrator of Wuwei, who was well connected to the palace, was using his position to indulge his lust and greed, but when the Attendant Officer Su Zhenghe reported on his misconduct, the Inspector Liang Gu was concerned about the political implications. He thought to rid himself of the problem by killing Su Zhenghe, and consulted He Xun, to whom Su Zhenghe had once done a bad turn. Refusing to allow his private enmity to affect his official duty, He Xun argued to Liang Gu that "If you keep a hawk on a string, you can catch birds; but what is the use if you kill the hawk and eat it yourself?" So Liang Gu left Su Zhenghe alone. Su Zhenghe attempted to call upon He Xun and offer thanks, but He Xun refused to see him, saying, "My advice was for Commissioner Liang, not for you." And he liked him no better than before.

A similar story is told of an incident in 184, when Huang Jun of Jiuquan was ordered to raise troops against the Yellow Turbans. He arrived late and was liable to execution, but He Xun spoke on his behalf and Liang Gu took no action. Huang Jun offered a quantity of gold in gratitude, but He Xun remarked that he had argued a matter of law, not privately; he was angry someone might think his opinion could be purchased.

Late in 184, as mutiny in Liang province developed into rebellion, the Qiang and other non-Chinese people of Beidi came to join the insurgents. The Inspector Zuo Chang raised troops, but he also took the opportunity to embezzle quantities of stores. When He Xun protested, Zuo Xun sent him to an exposed outpost against the enemy, hoping he would be defeated or would commit some fault punishable by death under military law. He Xun, however, was successful in a number of engagements.

As the rebels attacked Jincheng commandery He Xun urged Zuo Chang to go to the aid of the local troops, but he made no move and the territory was taken. The rebels then laid siege to Zuo Chang himself in Ji city, capital of Hanyang, and Zuo Chang called for help. Some of his colleagues were unwilling, but He Xun threatened them with execution if they failed to answer the call. As he arrived with reinforcements he called on the enemy to surrender, and although they refused they did withdraw.

Zuo Chang was recalled, but his successor Song Nie was no more effective, and a force of Qiang laid siege to the Protector Xia Yu in the yamen of the Liuma horse-park in Hanyang. He Xun brought troops to relieve him, but was heavily defeated and was wounded three times. With barely a hundred men, surrounded by the enemy, he drew up his small force in a tight "fish-scale" 魚麗 formation and prepared to die. Knowing He Xun as a worthy man, the chieftain Dianyu ordered his men to hold back and offered his own horse so that he might escape. He Xun swore at him and rejected his aid; he was taken prisoner but soon released.

The new Inspector Yang Yong now recommended He Xun act as Administrator of Hanyang. There was severe famine, and He Xun not only released grain from the official granaries, but also issued supplies from his own household; by his example several thousand people were kept alive. He Xun left office soon afterwards, but he was respected at the capital, and in 188 he was brought to Luoyang. He was now in his late forties, and though his title was Colonel Who Exterminates Caitiffs 討虜校尉 he was not expected to engage in active service but commanded a troop of palace guards.

When Emperor Ling gave him audience and asked about the causes of the current troubles, He Xun ascribed the blame to the eunuchs and their associates. He also criticised the emperor's private corps of the Western Garden as no more than an ornament at the capital: the real problem was in the provinces, while the essential concern for the sovereign should be the moral conduct of government. He Xun was impressed by Emperor Ling's intelligence and good will, and he spoke with Yuan Shao and Liu Yu about a coup to free the ruler from his eunuch entourage in order that he might restore the fortunes of the dynasty. Before anything could develop, however, the Director of Retainers Zhang Wen proposed that He Xun be appointed Intendant of Jingzhao. Emperor Ling would have preferred to keep He Xun with him, but the eunuch favourite Jian Shi, concerned at He Xun's influence, persuaded his master to approve Zhang Wen's recommendation.

As Intendant at Chang'an He Xun investigated the corruption of the Prefect Yang Dang, adopted son of a leading eunuch, and confiscated his property. Despite pleas from his relatives and favourites, the emperor supported a full enquiry and both Yang Dang and his nominal father were punished. He Xun also rejected the nomination for office of another eunuch associate, even though it was put forward by the emperor's son Liu Bian and supported by Jian Shi.

Even though he was not at the capital, He Xun continued to receive favour from Emperor Ling, who gave him frequent presents and would ask his advice on military matters. Towards the end of 188, as the rebels from Liang province attacked towards Chang'an, He Xun encouraged the commissioning of private troops: so leaders of local gentry were given title as commandants, to raise their own regiments and join the imperial forces under He Xun's command.

When Dong Zhuo seized power in Luoyang after the death of Emperor Ling, He Xun wrote to protest his usurpation, and his deposition of the Young Emperor Liu Bian. To keep him under control, Dong Zhuo called him to be a Consultant at Luoyang. He Xun tried to persuade the general Huangfu Song to attack Dong Zhuo, but Huangfu Song obeyed a similar summons and He Xun, unable to stand alone, went to the capital. Naturally enough, Dong Zhuo did not trust He Xun with command of troops, and although he was given various offices, they were soon removed. He Xun was one of the few men prepared to oppose Dong Zhuo in open court, but he was predictably frustrated with the situation.

He Xun died of illness at Chang'an, at the age of fifty-one sui. His testament asked that he be given no special honours by the regime, but Dong Zhuo was eager to gain prestige from his reputation, so he had funerary items prepared by the imperial workshops and had him buried at Anling, the tomb park of Emperor Hui 惠 of Former Han.

He Xun left a collection of poetry for the lute Jinshi 琴詩. -HHS 58/48:1879-84*, XC 3:9b, XHS 4:9a-b; deC 89:186-187, deC 96:42.

He Yan 蓋延 [Juqing 巨卿] (d.39); Yuyang. Eight feet tall [185 cm], He Yan is said to have wielded a bow of 75 kilograms tension, and he was celebrated on the northern frontier for his fighting skills and spirit. During the reign of Wang Mang he was a local officer in his commandery and provincial governments, distinguishing himself in each position, and when Peng Chong became Administrator of Yuyang in 23 he appointed He Yan as commandant of his camp and acting officer for discipline.

When Wang Lang rebelled in the winter of 23/24, Peng Chong sent He Yan with Wu Han and a force of cavalry to support Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor of Han. Joining forces with troops from Shanggu, they destroyed Wang Lang's position in the north, killing hundreds of his appointed officials and taking over twenty counties. As they relieved Liu Xiu in Julu, He Yan was given rank as a lieutenant-general and title as a marquis. He took part in the campaigns which destroyed Wang Lang and defeated the bandits of the north, and when Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 He Yan was named a full general.

In 26 He Yan's fief was changed to a county marquisate in Zhuo commandery. He accompanied Wu Han to mop up a remnant group of the Green Calf bandits north of the Yellow River, and was then sent to occupy the Ao Granary at the head of the Bian Canal and to lead an attack on the pretender Liu Yong. Taking the city of Xiangyi in Chenliu by storm, by the summer he had laid siege to Liu Yong's capital at Suiyang in Liang.

At this point He Yan's subordinate general Su Mao changed sides to support Liu Yong. He occupied Guangle, north of Suiyang, but his attempt to relieve Liu Yong was driven back, and He Yan gathered all the grain in the area. In the autumn he ordered a night attack on Suiyang. As the imperial troops scaled the walls, Liu Yong fled and his men were defeated.

He Yan followed up the success, first south into Pei, then northeast to Lu, where he killed Liang Qiushou, the administrator appointed by Liu Yong. He turned back south, taking surrenders in Chu and killing Liu Yong's administrator of Pei, Chen Xiu. Liu Yong's generals Su Mao, Jiao Qiang and Zhou Jian attempted a counter-attack, but were defeated and scattered, and He Yan settled Pei, Chu and Linhuai/Xiapi. In Pei he restored the Duplicate Temple of the Eminent Founder, Emperor Gao of Former Han, appointed officers for worship at the site, and held sacrifice.

In the following year the people of Suiyang rebelled and invited Liu Yong to return. He Yan once more laid siege and starved Suiyang of grain. Wu Han came to take over, defeated Su Mao at Guangle, then joined He Yan outside Suiyang. After three months Liu Yong fled. He was killed by one of his own officers, and his brother Liu Fang surrendered the city.

In the spring of 28 He Yan attacked Su Mao and Zhou Jian in Pei, then moved into Chu to defeat the warlord Dong Xian. To the east he occupied the stronghold of Liu Yong's former general Jiao Qiang in Shanyang and then returned to take Pengcheng city in Chu, driving Su Mao and Zhou Jian to flight once more. In the autumn Dong Xian's officer Ben Xiu seized the county city of Lanling in Donghai and offered to submit to Han. As Dong Xian left his headquarters at Tan city and went to attack him, Guangwu ordered He Yan to ignore Lanling and strike at Tan, but He Yan disobeyed and went to relieve Ben Xiu. He entered Lanling, but was then surrounded by Dong Xian's troops, and though he escaped in a sortie Dong Xian recaptured Lanling and killed Ben Xiu. Belatedly, He Yan now attacked Tan, but had no success, and a series of engagements against Dong Xian's officers were also inconclusive.

Guangwu was concerned that He Yan was taking his opponents too lightly and warned him against over-extending his position, but He Yan paid small attention. One night in the spring of 29 his colleague and rival Pang Meng changed sides and attacked him, and He Yan was driven north across the Si River. He destroyed bridges and boats behind him, but Pang Meng made his way over and occupied Dongping. In the summer Guangwu himself arrived with the main imperial army; He Yan then joined the final campaign which defeated Pang Meng and broke the power of the warlords in the southeast.

In 30 He Yan was transferred to take command at Chang'an, facing Wei Ao to the west in Hanyang, but an initial attack was defeated and driven back at the Long Slope. He accompanied the imperial army on the campaign of 32, and when Guangwu was forced to withdraw to deal with rebellion in the east He Yan, Geng Yan and Cen Peng were left to besiege Wei Ao at Xi city in Longxi. In the winter Wei Ao's general Wang Yuan returned with reinforcements from Gongsun Shu, broke the siege and rescued Wei Ao. The imperial troops were compelled to withdraw, but after Wei Ao's death and the fall of his party in 33, He Yan led an army to take control in the north of Tianshui.

In 35 He Yan went with Lai Xi to attack Gongsun Shu through the Qin Ling ranges, but he was taken ill and returned to the north. For the last years of his life he served as Administrator of Zuopingyi, still with formal command of troops. His predecessor Xianyu Bao had not been an effective ruler, but He Yan restored order and in 37 his fief was increased to 10,000 households. He died in office two years later.

Recognising He Yan as one of the chief assistants of his father the founding emperor, Guangwu's successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 18/8:686-89*; Bn 59:133-152, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:81-82, 165.

He Yan 何晏 [Pingshu 平叔] (d.249); Nanyang. Son of the Lady Yin 尹 by her first husband, who was a son of He Jin, he followed her into Cao Cao's household. Cao Cao treated him as his own son and had him marry a princess, his half-sister.

A celebrated writer and philosopher, He Yan became a leading figure at court, but he was destroyed with Cao Shuang in 249. -SGZ 9:292-93; Demiéville 86:829-832, deC 91:33-34; Mather 76:523.

He Yang 何陽; Nan. Father-in-law of Xu Yuan q.v., he was an abusive drunkard. -FSTY 3f:107.

He Yanzhen 何彦珍; Shu. The fragmentary stele commemorating Meng Xuan q.v. mentions his proposed marriage connection with a daughter of He Yanzhen, but it appears she may have died before that event. -Nagata 94:266.

He Yi 何儀. Leaders of Yellow Turbans in Runan and Yingchuan during the early 190s, He Yi and his fellows allied themselves with Yuan Shu and Sun Jian, and by the middle 190s their troops were numbered by the tens of thousands. In the spring of 196 Cao Cao led an army against them. The chieftain Huang Shao was killed, and He Yi and the other leaders surrendered. -SGZ 1:13.

He Ying 何英 [Shujun 叔俊]; Shu. Widely learned in the classics, He Ying compiled Hande chunqiu 漢德春秋, following the apocryphal tradition, in fifteen pian. -HYGZ 10A:134, 12:213; Yao Zhenzong:2351, and see sub He Wen.

He Ying 何英; Chen. Chancellor of Langye, He Ying admired the family loyalty of Gao Shen of Chenliu and arranged for him to marry his daughter. -SGZ 24:683.

He Yong 何顛 [Boqiu 伯求]; Nanyang. As a young man in the 160s, He Yong attended the University at Luoyang and despite his youth he became friends with such leaders as Guo Tai and Jia Biao, Chen Fan and Li Ying. He was known for his ability to judge character, and on one occasion he fulfilled a vendetta for his dying friend Yu Weigao.

He Yong was not listed among the heroes of the students at the University, but he was admired by Chen Fan and Li Ying, and after the reformers were destroyed by the eunuchs in 168 he too came under threat. He therefore changed his name and went into hiding in the south of Runan. He acquired considerable authority in the region of the middle Yangzi, and as persecution of the reformists began in the following year he and Yuan Shao created a network for men to escape; they travelled several times in secret to Luoyang to rescue opponents of the eunuchs.

As the Proscription ended in 184 the General-in-Chief He Jin had He Yong and other leading men recalled to the capital. He Yong joined the offices of the Excellencies, and was later Adjutant of the Northern Army. He praised Cao Cao and his future assistant Xun Yu as men who could deal with the problems of the time.

During the regency for the Little Emperor Liu Bian in 189, He Yong held office under the General-in-Chief He Jin, and when Dong Zhuo took power at Luoyang later that year he offered him a senior position on his staff. He Yong refused on grounds of ill health, but it appears that he joined Zheng Tai in selecting suitable men as officials in the new regime.

In the early 190s He Yong joined a plot against Dong Zhuo. Arrested on some other ground, he appears to have killed himself so as not to reveal his fellow conspirators.

After Xun Yu became Director of the Imperial Secretariat at Xu city for Han under Cao Cao in 196, he arranged for the body of his uncle Xun Shuang to be brought back for burial, and had He Yong also interred in the tomb complex. -HHS 67/57:2217-18*, ZF:12a; deC 89:115.

He Yu 蓋豫. Inspector of Xu province about 60, He Yu was an expert on the Classic of History. The biography of his student Zhou Fang in HHS says that he worked in the Old Text tradition, but it is more probable that he was a follower of the New Text school of Ouyang Gao. -HHS 79/69A:2560.

He Yu 何玉; Shu. A man of distinguished family, He Yu asked to become the second husband of the Lady Wang He, widow of Bian Jing. The Lady's brother agreed to the match, but the Lady cut off one of her ears to disqualify herself. -HYGZ 10B:153, HYGZJBTZ:581.

He Ze 蓋側 see He Ce 蓋側.

He Zeng 何曾 [Yingkao 穎考]; Chen. Son of He Kui, he joined the household of Cao Rui, future Emperor Ming of Wei, about 220, and later became a noted minister of Wei and of Jin. -JS 33:994-98; Mather 76:523.

He Zhen 何真; Nanyang. Said to have been a butcher, He Zhen fathered He Jin by his first marriage. He later married the Lady Xing, who bore him the future Empress He of Emperor Ling. He Zhen died before his daughter received her imperial position, but in 181 he was awarded posthumous enfeoffment and given title as General of Chariots and Cavalry. -HHS 10B:447.

He Zhen 何真, wife of: see the Lady [He] Xing 何興.

He Zhi 何祗 [Junsu 君肅]; Shu. A junior officer of the commandery, about 220 He Zhi was recommended by the Administrator Yang Hong and approved by Zhuge Liang. He became magistrate of Chengdu and was later Administrator of Guanghan and of Jianwei. -SGZ Shu 11:1014-15.

He Zhuan 何傳. Officers under the Inspector of Liang province Qiao Xuan about 153, He Zhuan and Niu Cheng were sent to summon Aluoduo and Beijun, contenders for the throne of Further Jushi. -HHSJJ 88/78:3267 quoting a stele erected for Qiao Xuan, but cf. sub Yan Xiang.

He Zong 何宗 [Chanying 彥英 or Chanruo 彥若]; Shu. He Zong and his colleague Du Qiong were well known as students of the Book of Changes under the scholar Ren An. About 210 He Zong became Administrator of Jianwei under the warlord Governor Liu Zhang, and when Liu Bei seized power in 213 he became a senior Attendant Officer.

In 221 He Zong joined the petition which used works of divination to encourage Liu Bei to proclaim himself emperor; he was named Minister Herald in the new imperial regime. He died about 230. -SGZ Shu 15:1083.

Hede 和得/德 of Shule [Kashgar]. Uncle of the king of Shule, in 168 Hede shot his nephew during a hunt and seized the throne. In 170 the Governor of Liang province Meng Tuo sent a large army to attack Shule and restore order, but they gained no success. Shule was thereafter effectively independent, but there was constant and murderous contest for the throne. -HHS 88/78:2927.

According to the stele of Cao Quan q.v., Hede was a son of the murdered king, not his uncle; this source, however, is less reliable for the incident.

Hefei 合肥, marquis of, see Liu 劉 [personal name unknown] of 188. -SGZ 1:4.

Helian 和連; Xianbi. Son and successor of Tanshihuai, Helian lacked his father's abilities and his state was seriously reduced. He continued to attack the Chinese frontier, but was killed during a raid on Beidi about 186. -HHS 90/80:2994, SGZ 30:838; G/deC 77:38-39, deC 84:342-343.

Heng Fang 衡方 [Xingzu 興祖] (106-168); Dongping? Members of Heng Fang's family had held official positions, and he himself received appointment in the offices of the commandery and the province. He was then nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and after probation as a gentleman cadet he served as a county magistrate in Dong commandery and in Beihai. Praised for his excellent administration, he was transferred to be a Commandant in Kuaiji.

Following a period of mourning for his mother, Heng Fang was brought to the capital as a Consultant and was then Administrator of Youbeiping and of Yingchuan. He evidently left office again, perhaps because of the death of his father, but was recalled once more as a Consultant and was appointed Court Physician. As Intendant of Jingzhao, he settled a disturbance, then returned to the capital as Minister of the Guards.

Heng Fang retired from office towards the end of the reign of Emperor Huan. In 168 the new regency government of Emperor Ling offered him appointment as a colonel in the Northern Army, but he died at this time, aged sixty-three. His students, clients and nominees set up a stele in his honour. -LS 8:1a-4a, Nagata 94:168-169.

Heng Li 衡立 [Yuanjie 元節/節]; Dongping? Evidently a kinsman of Heng Fang, Heng Li became a county magistrate in Chenliu. He was honoured with a stele. -LS 12:10a-11a.

Heng Pei 恆裴 was a county magistrate in Langye. -FSTY 5f:130.

Hong 弘 [surname unknown]. In 84 Hong was Assistant to the Court Astronomer when it was suggested that Yan Xuan, son of the former officer Yan Chong, had learnt the art of tuning the sacred pitchpipes 律 from his father. At the orders of Emperor Zhang, Hong tested Yan Xuan, but his method proved quite unsuccessful and he was dismissed. -HHS 91/1:3015.

Hong Jin 洪進; Kuaiji. A local leader on the upper Min River in present-day Fujian, presumably a relative of Hong Ming below, Hong Jin and his allies were conquered by He Qi in 203. -SGZ Wu 15:1378.

Hong Ming 洪明 (d.203); Kuaiji. A local leader on the upper Min River in present-day Fujian, presumably a relative of Hong Jin above, Hong Min was defeated and killed by He Qi. -SGZ Wu 15:1378.

Hong Zi 弘咨; Danyang. Husband of a half-sister of Sun Quan, he recommended Zhuge Jin to him. -SGZ Wu 7:1231; deC 90:86.

Hong Zi 弘咨, wife of: see the Lady Sun 孫 IV.

Hou 侯, the Lady; Shanyang. The Lady was the mother of the eunuch Hou Lan. As her son rose to power at the imperial capital she appears to have become increasingly aggressive in their native country, gathering retainers, applying pressure to local officials, and taking property from her neighbours by force. The commandery Investigator Zhang Jian and the Administrator Zhai Chao reported on the family's activities and asked that they be punished, but Hou Lan had the messages intercepted, and when the Lady died he returned for the mourning and had a vast and extravagant tomb built for her.

In 165 Zhang Jian took action on his own account, seizing the stolen property and demolishing the Lady's tomb. Four years later, in 169, Hou Lan arranged an accusation of Faction against Zhang Jian, and he was driven into exile.

The timing of the Hou family activities and the details of Zhang Jian's counter-attack are confusing. The biography of Zhang Jian in HHS 67/57 at 2210, says that he made his move in 165, and the arrest and punishment of Zhai Chao did indeed take place about that time. The biography of Hou Lan in HHS 78/68 has the date as 169, but that is when Hou Lan had Zhang Jian accused, and it appears the reports and action by Zhang Jian took place earlier and are presented anachronistically as background. The biography of Yuan Kang in HHS 67/57:2214 says Zhang Jian killed the Lady Hou, and HHJ agrees, but in his Kaoyi commentary to ZZTJ 55:1789 Sima Guang dismisses the claim. -HHS 78/68:2523, 67/57:2214 & 2210, HHJ 22:261; Ch'ü 72:481, deC 89:71.

Hou 侯 [personal name unknown]. Administrator of Liaoxi about 180, he admired Gongsun Zan and gave him his daughter in marriage. -SGZ 8:239.

Hou Ba 侯芭 [Puzi 鋪子]; Julu. HS 87B:2385; QHX:158 tells how Hou Ba, a close disciple of Yang Xiong 楊雄, received his teaching on Fa yan 法言 and on Taixuan jing 太玄經 "Classic of the Great Mystery," a development of the Book of Changes. When Yang Xiong died in 18 AD, Hou Ba constructed his tomb and carried out mourning for him, and later proselytised his work.

Wang Chong mentions Hou Puzi, i.e. Hou Ba, as a commentator to Taixuan jing. -Lun heng 29; Forke 11:469, Yao Zhenzong:2380-81.

Sui shu 34:998 says that a commentary to Fa yan compiled by Hou Bao 侯苞 of Han had been in the collection of the Liang dynasty but was since lost; it is probable this was a work by Hou Ba, with the personal name miswritten. Sui shu 32:915 lists a commentary to the Poetry according to the Han interpretation compiled by Hou Bao of Han, and this again was probably Hou Ba's work.

Hou Ba 侯霸 [Junfang 君房] (d.37); Henan. A nephew of the eunuch Hou Yuan 侯淵, who had served Emperor Yuan of Former Han and established the fortunes of his family, Hou Ba studied the Guliang commentary to Chunqiu and also became an expert on legal matters.

Having held a preliminary post under Emperor Cheng, at the beginning of Wang Mang's reign Hou Ba was appointed as a magistrate in Nanyang, where he kept order in troubled times; in 17 he was transferred to be Administrator of Linhuai. He had a reputation for good government, and the Gengshi Emperor called him to Chang'an, but the local people protested so earnestly that the officers bringing his new seals of office did not present them and Hou Ba remained at his post.

As Emperor Guangwu came on tour to the southeast in 28 he appointed Hou Ba Director of his Secretariat. Hou Ba provided valuable continuity and accounts of past precedents, and encouraged the new ruler to proclaim annual and seasonal acts of grace.

In 29 Hou Ba was made Excellency over the Masses and became a secondary marquis. When he recommended Yan Yang, a satirist whom Guangwu intensely disliked, the emperor doubted his loyalty for a time, but the affair was sorted out through the good offices of Feng Qin, and Hou Ba kept his position until his death. He was awarded posthumous enfeoffment as a full marquis, while the people of Linhuai set up a shrine in his honour and held sacrifice each season. -HHS 26/16:901-02*; QHX:157, Bn 79:62.

Hou Ba 侯霸 (d.114). In 100 Hou Ba was Administrator of Jincheng. When the Qiang warlord Mitang led an attack, the Protector Zhou Wei gathered non-Chinese auxiliaries and Hou Ba brought commandery levies. Pursuing Mitang outside the frontier, Hou Ba attacked and defeated the enemy while Zhou Wei, perhaps uncertain of his men's loyalty, kept them on the defensive in a small fortress. The Qiang surrendered and large numbers were resettled inside China.

In the following year Zhou Wei was dismissed for cowardice and Hou Ba took his place as Protector. He encouraged Cao Feng's plan for the establishment of military colonies on the upper Yellow River to control the territory of Mitang's former base.

In 108, after the great rebellion of the Qiang had broken out, Hou Ba was dismissed. Re-appointed in 110, he set his base in Zhangye, presumably to keep the peace with the Little Yuezhi and the Qiang of that region and protect the route to central Asia.

In 113 Hou Ba joined Ma Xian in a successful attack on a group of Qiang in Anding commandery, and in the following year they led surrendered Qiang and members of the Loyal Auxiliary of Yuezhi to retake the territory on the upper reaches of the Yellow River. Soon afterwards Hou Ba became ill and died. -HHS 87/77:2884-89; deC 84:103-107.

Hou Bao 侯包/苞 see Hou Ba 侯芭.

Hou Can 侯參 or Hou Shen (d.165); Shanyang. Brother of the powerful eunuch Hou Lan, Hou Can became Inspector of Yi province. He laid false accusations of treason against many wealthy men, killed them and destroyed their families, then confiscated their property for himself. He thus acquired great wealth.

In 165, however, the Grand Commandant Yang Bing reported on Hou Can's cruelty and extortion. He was arrested and brought to the capital in a cage cart, but killed himself on the way. His baggage train comprised over three hundred carts, and Yuan Feng the Intendant of Jingzhao found vast quantities of treasure in them.

In consequence of this, Hou Can's brother Hou Lan was dismissed and there was a general attack on Emperor Huan's eunuch favourites and their associates. -HHS 78/68:2523; Ch'ü 72:481 [as Hou Shen].

Hou Cheng 侯成 [Bosheng 伯盛] (89-169); Shanyang. Member of a distinguished family, claiming kin to the Excellency Hou Ba at the beginning of Later Han, Hou Cheng had a reputation for scholarship and was invited to local office in the commandery. He served as Registrar and Officer of Merit, and also held acting position as magistrate of Jinxiang county, in Shanyang itself. A mourning stele was erected at his death. -LS 8:6a-8a.

Hou Cheng 侯成. An officer of Lü Bu, he was with him in 198 under siege by Cao Cao in Xiapi city. One of his troopers attempted to run away with some horses, but Hou Cheng chased him and recovered the animals. His comrades gave a party in celebration, and offered Lü Bu a share, but Lü Bu objected to their making wine in such a time of crisis and accused them of treachery. Frightened and resentful, Hou Cheng and his fellows went over to Cao Cao. -HHS 75/65:2451, Hou Chong 侯崇; Runan. As the magistrate Zhang Xi threw himself onto a funeral pyre in an attempt to bring rain which might end a drought, his Registrar Hou Chong followed his example. Their prayers were answered. -SJZ 21:16b.

Hou Dan 侯丹. When Liu Jia was driven from Hanzhong by Yan Cen in 26, Gongsun Shu sent his general Hou Dan to seize the capital, Nanzheng, and occupy the commandery. Liu Jia returned from Wudu to attack Hou Dan with several ten thousand men, but Hou Dan held his ground and forced him back to the northwest.

In 35 Hou Dan commanded a garrison of twenty thousand men on the Min River south of Chengdu. He was defeated in a surprise attack by Guangwu's commander Cen Peng. -HHS 14/4:568, 17/7:662; Bn 59:117, 192.

Hou Deng 侯登. Administrator of Jiangxia in 29, Hou Deng held a formal commission from the late Gengshi Emperor but controlled his own territory. Guangwu's commander Cen Peng wrote to urge him to accept the new imperial regime, and had his officer Zang Gong raid the commandery in order to encourage his submission. Hou Deng duly sent tribute to Han and was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 17/7:659; Bn 59:157-158.

Hou Feng 侯諷 see Hou Li 侯颯.

Hou Fu 侯輔. In 162 Hou Fu was Inspector of Jing province, but when rebels from Changsha attacked Cangwu he abandoned his post and fled. -HHS 7:309.

Hou Hai 侯海. About 91 Hou Hai was an officer of the guards under the Bearer of the Mace Dou Jing, chief of police at the capital. When members of the Dou household were arrested for attacking the guards at the capital market-place, Hou Hai was sent with five hundred troopers to attack the offices of the market. Yang Zhang, a police officer under the Intendant of Henan Zhang Pu, investigated the affair, arrested Hou Hai, and had him exiled to Shuofang. -HHS 45/35:1531.

Hou Jian 侯儉 see Jiao Jian 焦儉. -XC 1:9b.

Hou Jin 侯進. When Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, claimed the imperial title in 25, he appointed Hou Jin as a general and gave him command of a contingent in the great army sent to capture Luoyang from troops loyal to the Gengshi Emperor.

In 26 Hou Jin was sent to assist Kou Xun the new Administrator of Yingchuan deal with local bandits, and at the end of that year, as the Red Eyebrows attempted to return east from the region of Chang'an, Hou Jin was stationed in Hongnong to guard one of their possible escape routes.

In 28 Hou Jin accompanied the general Geng Zhi under the command of Zhu You against the warlord Qin Feng of Nan commandery. After eighteen months siege they received his surrender in the summer of 29.

In the summer of 30 Hou Jin went under Li Tong's command to attack Yan Cen in Hanzhong and then establish military colonies to defend Nanyang.

In the summer of 33 Hou Jin was sent with three other generals and fifty thousand men under the command of Wu Han and Wang Ba to attack Lu Fang's officers Jia Lan and Min Kan in Dai commandery. They were defeated in a rain-storm and forced to withdraw; Hou Jin was left in garrison to command the defences of Yuyang.

Hou Jin does not appear again in the texts. Though he held high military rank in some notable campaigns, he received no special recognition, nor did his family obtain any later fief or favour. -HHS 11/1:485, 22/12:770, 15/5:575 20/10:737; Bn 59:118, 186, Bn 67:108.

Hou Jin 侯瑾 [Ziyu 子瑜]; Dunhuang. When Hou Jin was young he was orphaned and poor, and had to live with relatives. As he grew up he was obliged to work as a labourer, but he studied every evening by light of a fire. The commandery and provincial authorities invited him to office, and the court sent a special summons, but Hou Jin would always decline on grounds of ill health.

Having composed Jiaoshi lun 矯世論 "A Discussion on Reform," addressing the ills of the time, Hou Jin retired into the hills to meditate and then wrote Ying binnan 應賓難 "Replies to Questions from a Guest" to explain his philosophy. He also made a study of the history of the dynasty up to his own time and compiled Huangde zhuan 皇德傳 "An Account of Sovereign Virtue" in thirty pian. This work survived for some time, but much else of Hou Jin's writing, originally amounting to dozens of pian, was soon lost.

Hou Jin's ability was so widely respected in the west of the empire that the people referred to him simply as Lord Hou 侯君. -HHS 80/70B:2649*, XC 5:11b.

Hou Lan 侯覽 (d.172); Shanyang. A eunuch Regular Attendant at the court of Emperor Huan, Hou Lan became notorious for corruption and for the wealth that he gathered. He played no active role in the overthrow of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji and his clan of imperial relatives by marriage, but soon after the coup he presented five thousand rolls of silk as contribution to the military expenses of the state, and he was enfeoffed as a secondary marquis. Then the emperor announced that Hou Lan had actually taken part in the planning against Liang Ji, and his fief was raised to a district.

Though he was a special favourite of Emperor Huan, Hou Lan is described by the histories as the most vicious of the palace eunuchs. Apart from his influence and extravagance at court, he and his associates became grossly unpopular in his native region. In 160 numbers of his retainers, together with those of his junior colleague Duan Gui, were taken and killed by Teng Yan the Chancellor of Jibei on the grounds that they had been robbing and plundering his territory from their bases near his borders. Hou Lan and Duan Gui reported Teng Yan to the throne and he was dismissed from office. About the same time Hou Lan impeached the Inspector Diwu Zhong, enemy of his colleague Shan Chao, for having exaggerated his success against bandits.

Similarly, in his home country of Shanyang Hou Lan, his mother and their retainers bullied the people and seized their property. Hou Lan acquired vast estates, including sixteen mansions with parks and gardens, and a quantity of farmland. The commandery Investigator Zhang Jian reported this, and when no official action was taken, in 165 he confiscated much of Hou Lan's property and demolished the extravagant tomb which Hou Lan had built for his mother. More reports were sent to the throne, but Hou Lan had them intercepted. For his part, Hou Lan laid false but successful accusations against Yuan Kang and Hu Jia, the Administrator and the Commandant of Taishan, who had attacked his followers when they fled across the border from Shanyang.

About this time, Hou Lan's brother Hou Can was accused of extortionate conduct as Inspector of Yi province. He killed himself, and the Grand Commandant Yang Bing took the opportunity to argue that Hou Lan should be barred from the emperor's presence. After some debate, as the Imperial Secretariat questioned

Yang Bing's authority to criticise the ruler's personal staff, and Yang Bing responded that the Excellencies had no limit to their right to comment; the emperor was obliged to dismiss Hou Lan. This was followed by a general attack upon the eunuch favourites, Zuo Guan, Ju Yuan and others, and the five marquises who had supported Emperor Huan against Liang Ji were stripped of their fiefs.

Hou Lan was soon reinstated, and in the following year he arranged for the widow of the merchant Zhang Fan, who was killed despite an amnesty by the Administrator of Nanyang Cheng Jin, to make formal complaint to the throne. Cheng Jin and others were arrested and executed, and the protests by reformist officials and students brought a substantial rift with the emperor and went some way to restore the fortunes of the eunuch favourites.

Hou Lan, again, does not appear to have played any notable role in the enthronement of Emperor Ling in 168 nor in the destruction of the reform government of Dou Wu and Chen Fan soon afterwards. In 169 he arranged for the malcontent Zhu Bing to report his old enemy Zhang Jian of Shanyang, accusing him of forming an association to bring harm to the state. Zhang Jian was pursued into exile in the north, and the incident became a trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription which destroyed Li Gu, Du Qiao and many other scholar-officials and reformists.

In 171 Hou Lan became Coachman of the Changle Palace, replacing Cao Jie in charge of the apartments of the imprisoned Dowager Dou; he took part in the enthronement of the Empress Song. In the following year the Lady Dou died, and unnamed senior officials accused Hou Lan of excessive conduct and acting without proper authority. Ordered to surrender his office, Hou Lan killed himself, and his followers and associates were dismissed. It is possible that this disgrace, after so many years of immunity, meant that Hou Lan was either guilty or made a scapegoat for the Dowager's death. -HHS 78/68:2522-24*; Ch'ü 72:480-483.

Hou Li 侯颯 or Hou Feng 颯. Early in the reign of Emperor Ming a flock of strange birds appeared at the imperial palace. The emperor ordered his officials to present hymns to these magical creatures, but only the compositions of Jia Kui, Ban Gu, Fu Yi, Yang Zhong and Hou Li were of high quality. Nothing more is known of this man. -Lun heng 37 quoted by HHSJJ 36/26:1310 Hui Dong [personal name as Li 颯]; Forke 11:274 [as 颯 Feng]

Hou Man 侯蔓; Ba. Formerly a student in Liang province, Hou Man was killed by Wang Xiang of Bohai. He was avenged by his fellow-student Kou Qi. -HYGZ 10C,175.

Hou Meng 侯猛. Some time in the 150s Hou Meng was appointed Administrator of Liaodong. Liang Ji, brother of the regent Dowager, controlled the government of Emperor Huan, and all officials were expected to pay him a courtesy call before they took up their posts. Hou Meng refused to do so. Soon afterwards Liang Ji found an excuse to charge him with a crime, and Hou Meng was sentenced to be cut in two at the waist 要斬. -HHS 34/24:1183.

Hou Qi 侯祈 [Shengbo 升伯]; Shu. About 150 Hou Qi was a disciple of Yang Hou, expert in Huang-Lao doctrines. -HYGZ 10B:144, 12:214. This may be the same man as Hou Qi below.

Hou Qi 侯祈 (d.196). Consultant at Luoyang when Cao Cao took over the court in 196, he was executed for wrongdoing. -HHS 72/62:2342. This may be the same man as Hou Qi above, though if so he must have been well into his sixties when he encountered Cao Cao.

Hou Sa 侯颯 see Hou Li 侯颯.

Hou She 侯折 see Hou Zhe 侯折.

Hou Shen 侯參 see Hou Can 侯參.

Hou Sheng 侯盛 or Hou Cheng. An Internuncio under the Gengshi Emperor in 23, Hou Sheng was sent to Linhuai with Fei Sui to call the Administrator Hou Ba to office at the capital. The local people protested so earnestly that the emissaries did not present Hou Ba with his invitation, and Hou Ba remained at his post. -DGHJ 13:1b.

Hou Sheng 侯聲. In 196 Hou Sheng was a member of Cao Cao's staff. There was a proposal that the group of Yellow Turbans lately captured by Cao Cao should be placed in agricultural colonies in the area of Xu city. The General of the Household Zao Zhi, who had suggested the program, wanted the contributions of the settlers to be assessed according to the land that they held, but Hou Sheng argued for payments to be based upon the number of oxen they leased. He calculated that land-based assessment would benefit the government but disadvantage the tenants. Zao Zhi claimed that if payments were based upon oxen there would be no gain to the state in good years, while in bad years the government would be obliged to grant exemptions on grounds of hardship.

Cao Cao accepted Zao Zhi's argument and gave him charge of the project. -SGZ 16:490.

Hou Xie 侯諧. Chancellor of Pengcheng in the service of Lü Bu, Hou Kai was captured by Cao Cao in 198. -SGZ 1:16.

Hou Xuan 侯選; Hedong. A bandit leader in the 190s, Hou Xuan was one of the north-western allies defeated by Cao Cao at the battle of Huayin in 211. He fled to Zhang Lu, but surrendered to Cao Cao when he took Hanzhong, and received titular office. -SGZ 8:266, SGZ Shu 6:946.

Hou Wen 侯汶 [Wenlin 文林]; Taiyuan. When there was famine at Chang'an in 194, the Imperial Clerk Hou Wen was entrusted with the issue of grain relief. As people still died, Emperor Xian investigated and found he had been giving short measure. Hou Wen was flogged, and rations were thereafter issued in full. -HHS 9:376, 72/62:2336, HHJ 27:331; Yang 63:157, deC 96:139.

Hou Xiang 侯相; Hedong. A former Chief Clerk of Shanggu commandery, Hou Xiang was remembered with a stele. -SJZ 6:13a.

Hou Wuyang 侯武陽; Hedong. Hou Wuyang was an old acquaintance of the mysterious hermit Qiao Xian. About 211 the county magistrate Zhu Nan wanted to assist Qiao Xuan, but Hou Wuyang persuaded him to leave him alone. -SGZ 11:363.

Hou Yin 侯音 (d.219); Nanyang. In 218 Hou Yin was a garrison officer at Wan city, capital of Nanyang. The people were suffering from the demands of forced labour, and in the winter Hou Yin led a mutiny, seized the city and called people from the hills to support him. With several thousand men, he ravaged the surrounding territory and sent messengers to invite the Shu-Han general Guan Yu from the south.

Hou Yin captured the Administrator Dongli Gun and, probably seeking support from local leaders, he appointed Zong Ziqing as Officer of Merit. Zong Ziqing, however, persuaded him to release Dongli Gun, and Dongli Gun gathered loyal troops and returned to besiege Hou Yin. As a major army under Cao Ren arrived early in 219, the rebellion was crushed and Hou Yin was killed. -SGZ 1:51, 9:257; deC 96:523-524.

Hou Yu 侯昱; Nanyang. Son of Hou Ba, when his father died as an Excellency in 37, Hou Yu was granted a full marquisate in his honour.

Though Hou Yu's father had been an associate of the Ma family faction, following Ma Yuan's death in 49 Hou Yu joined Ma Wu in accusing Ma Yuan of having appropriated pearls and rhinoceros horn after his campaign in the far south in 43. -HHS 16/6:902, 24/14:846.

Hou Zhang 侯章 (d.160). Commandant of Taishan, Hou Zhang was defeated and killed by the bandit Shusun Wuji in 160. -HHS 7:307.

Hou Zhe 侯折 or Hou She (d.196). In 196 Hou Zhe was a guardsman at the remnant imperial court in Luoyang. As Cao Cao took over he executed him for wrongdoing. -HHJ 29:344.

Hou [Zidao] 侯子道. A clerical officer under the Excellency Hou Ba, in 30 Hou Zidao was sent as a messenger to the reclusive Yan Guang. -HHS 83/73:2764.

Hu 胡 [personal name unknown]. Students of calligraphy under Liu Desheng in the late second century, Hu and his colleague Zhong continued the tradition of their master's new xing shu 行書 "Running Style." -JS 36:1065.

Hu Bo 胡博; Nanyang. Younger brother of Hu Ji, Hu Bo was a member of the Secretariat of Shu-Han and then a colonel in the Northern Army. -SGZ Shu 9.980.

Hu [Boshi] 胡伯始; Nan. Known for his literary and scholarly ability in the latter part of the first century, Hu Boshi is mentioned by Cao Pi in his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature." -HHSJJ 80/70B:2870 Hui Dong.

Hu Cai 胡才; Xihe? A former leader of the Bobo bandits of Xihe commandery, in the winter of 195 he came from Hedong into Hongnong to assist the group escorting Emperor Xian east in his escape from Li Jue and Guo Si in Chang'an. Successful in one engagement, the allies were badly defeated in the second, but the emperor and a small party managed to cross the Yellow River into Hedong.

Hu Cai was named a general and Governor of Bing province, but he and his colleagues then quarrelled, and as the emperor continued to Luoyang Hu Cai remained in Hedong. He was killed in a feud. -HHS 72/62:2340-42, SGZ 6:185-87.

Hu Che'er 胡車兒. A trusted officer of Zhang Xiu, Hu Che'er was celebrated for his bravery. In 197 Zhang Xiu surrendered to Cao Cao at Wan city in Nanyang, but Cao Cao planned to kill him, and gave a present of gold to Hu Che'er. When Zhang Xiu heard of this he made a surprise attack on Cao Cao and drove him away. -SGZ 8:263.

Hu Chi'er 胡赤兒 see Chi'er 赤兒.

Hu Chong 胡寵; Nan. Father of the Excellency Hu Guang, Hu Chong was Administrator of Jiaozhi commandery, having possibly served previously as Commandant; he died comparatively young. -SJZ 32:14b.

HHS 44/34:1504 says the personal name of Hu Guang's father was Gong [q.v. below], but the commentary says it was Chong, and SJZ 32:14b records a stele in that name close to Hu Guang's. See also HHSJJ 44/34:1607-08 Hong Liangji and Hui Dong.

Hu Chong 胡寵, wife of [and step-mother of Hu Guang]; see the Lady Huang Lieying.

Hu Chong 壺崇 miswritten for Tai Chong 臺崇. -HHSJJ 9:353 Hui Dong.

Hu Chou 胡疇. As Protector of the Qiang, Hu Chou accompanied Ma Xian on his fatal expedition in 141. -HHS 60/50A:1971.

Hu Du 狐篤 see Ma Zhong 馬忠. -SGZ Shu 13:1048.

Hu Fang 胡芳. In 166 Hu Fang was Inspector of Bing province. The General on the Liao Huangfu Gui wished to leave that post but could not obtain permission. When his friend Wang Min the Administrator of Shang commandery left office on account of mourning, Huangfu Gui accompanied him south and briefly crossed the provincial frontier. He then had someone tell Hu Fang so that he would report the offence and have him dismissed. Hu Fang saw through the ruse, and refused to take any action, for Huangfu Gui's services were too valuable to lose at that time. -HHS 65/55:2136.

Hu Feng 胡封. A kinsman by marriage of Li Jue, in 195 Hu Feng was a Commandant of Cavalry in the regime at Chang'an. Li Jue had him murder his potential rival Fan Chou during a drinking party. -HHS 72/62:2333.

Hu Fu 胡輔 see sub Dou Fu 竇輔.

Hu Gang 胡剛; Nan. Having held junior office under Emperor Ping of Former Han, Hu Gang refused to take service under Wang Mang and fled to the far south. After Wang Mang was destroyed he returned home. -HHS 44/34:1504.

Hu Gen 胡根 [Zhongyuan 仲原] (163-169); Nan. Son of Hu Shuo and grandson of the Excellency Hu

Guang, Hu Gen was taken ill and died young, about the same time as his father. Cai Yong composed a stele inscription for him. -Cai 6:4.

Hu Gong 胡貢; Nan. According to HHS 44/34:1504 Hu Gong, a descendant in the fifth generation from Hu Gang, was the father of Hu Guang. He became Commandant of Jiaozhi commandery, but died comparatively young. Cf. Hu Chong.

Hu Guang 胡廣 [Boshi 伯始] (91-172); Nan. Eldest son of Hu Chong [or of Hu Gong qq.v.], who died when he was young, Hu Guang was brought up by his aunt and step-mother the Lady Huang Lieying. The family was poor, but Hu Guang obtained a wide knowledge of the classics, and when he grew older he held a minor position in the commandery. The Administrator Fa Xiong respected the judgement of his son Fa Zhen, and when recommendations were due he held an assembly so that Fa Zhen could view all his officers. Fa Zhen pointed out Hu Guang, who was accordingly nominated Filial and Incorrupt. This was in 117, when Hu Guang was twenty-seven.

On arrival at the capital, each candidate was required to present a memorial. Hu Guang's was judged the best, and within a few days he was appointed to the Imperial Secretariat. He later held further positions, and as Court Architect he was responsible for the reconstruction of the Imperial University during 131 and 132.

In 132 Emperor Shun was due to appoint an empress, but there were four Honoured Ladies, each of whom received comparable favour. There was a suggestion that the consort should be chosen by lot so that the gods could decide, but Hu Guang and his colleagues Guo Qian and Shi Chang objected, arguing the decision should be based upon quality of lineage. So the emperor chose the Lady Liang Na, and her family began its dominance of the capital.

Later that year Zuo Xiong, Director of the Secretariat, proposed tightening the process of selection for office but Hu Guang, now Deputy Director, joined other colleagues to argue that the current system worked well and was supported by a majority of officials. The emperor nonetheless approved the reforms and Hu Guang then left the capital to become Administrator of Jiyin. He was dismissed soon afterwards on the grounds that he had presented inadequate nominees for office; this no doubt reflected his defiance of Zuo Xiong's reform.

Hu Guang was later Administrator of Runan, and in that office he allowed his officer Chen Gongsu to make his escape after murdering a colleague in a vendetta.

Returning to the capital as Minister of Finance, in 142 Hu Guang was appointed Excellency over the Masses. After the death of the young Emperor Zhi in 146 the Grand Commandant Li Gu pressed the claim of Liu Suan the King of Qinghe, and he was initially supported by Hu Guang and the other Excellency Zhao Jie. Liang Ji, however, faced them down in open court, and both Hu Guang and Zhao Jie acceded to his candidate Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan. When Li Gu was dismissed soon afterwards Hu Guang took his place as Grand Commandant, sharing control of the Imperial Secretariat, and hence formal command of the government. He and his colleagues were later rewarded for their compliance by enfeoffment as marquises, with designation as Specially Advanced which allowed them to remain at the capital.

In 147 Hu Guang asked to be relieved of his responsibilities on account of ill health. He left office, but soon afterwards became Excellency of Works. He resigned again in 151 and became Minister of Ceremonies, with the title Specially Advanced so that he was not required to reside at his fief. At this time he endorsed a proposal to grant Liang Ji extraordinary honours, but the Excellency Huang Qiong put an end to the idea.

In 153 Hu Guang was once more appointed Grand Commandant, but left office in the following year on account of an eclipse. He then became Director of the Secretariat, Minister Coachman and Minister of Ceremonies, and in 158 he was appointed a third time as Grand Commandant.

In the following year, after the destruction of Liang Ji and his family by Emperor Huan and his eunuch allies, Hu Guang and his fellow-Excellencies Han Yin and Sun Lang were found to have failed to support the sovereign. All three were dismissed and sentenced to death less one degree, commuted by payment of a fine, and Hu Guang was stripped of his fief. He was later appointed a Household Counsellor, became Minister of Ceremonies again, and in 166 he was once more Excellency over the Masses.

During the First Faction Incident of 166/167 Dou Wu, father of the empress, praised Hu Guang as one of the finest officials of the empire, and when Emperor Ling came to the throne at the beginning of 168 under the regency of the Dowager Dou, Hu Guang shared control of the Secretariat with the Grand Tutor Chen Fan. He sought to retire because of illness, but then the eunuchs destroyed Chen Fan and Dou Wu, and Hu Guang was named Grand Tutor in place of Chen Fan, with continuing authority in the government. He continued in that position until his death in 172.

Hu Guang held Excellency rank for thirty years, and even at eighty he was in excellent health, possibly due to drinking water from the Ju River in Nanyang to cure a recurrent illness. He was granted a posthumous title and was buried at the tomb park of Emperor Guangwu. All his five sons had died earlier, but a member of his family was appointed as a gentleman cadet. In 177 Emperor Ling had Hu Guang's portrait and that of Huang Qiong painted in the inner apartments of the palace, and ordered Cai Yong to compose a hymn in his honour.

Hu Guang had the most distinguished career of any Later Han official, and hundreds of men served under him, but he owed much of his success to the policy of the Vicar of Bray. He was cautious and respectful of those who held power, but we are told that his contemporaries believed he lacked any strong sense of loyalty or integrity.

Hu Guang left a quantity of literary and scholarly work, including poems, rhapsodies, hymns and inscriptions. An expert on ceremonial, both in theory and in fact, he collected a quantity of material which he passed to his student Cai Yong, and many of his comments appear in or form the basis of the relevant treatises of Hou Han shu, incorporated from the Xu Han shu of Sima Biao. Among works on this line are forty-eight chapters of Boguan zhen 百官箴 "Exhortations to Officials," based on an original compilation of Yang Xiong 楊雄 (53 BC-18 AD) supplemented by Cui Yin, Cui Yuan and Liu Taotu. -HHS 44/34:1504-11*, XC 2: 8a-9a, Cai 4:1, 4:2, 4:3, 4:4; deC 89:123, MBeck 90: 43, 84-87, 266.

Hu Guang 胡廣, wife of: see the Lady Zhang Xianzhang 章顯章.

Hu Hao 胡顥; Nan. Son of Hu Ning, who became a Consultant but died when he was young, Hu Hao was brought up by his mother Zhao Yongjiang.

At the time of troubles in the mid-180s Hu Hao was appointed Administrator of Jiyin, but the Lady Zhao was ill and he was obliged to leave her at Luoyang. When she died there in 187 Hu Hao had Cai Yong compose a mourning elegy for her. -Cai 4:7.

Hu Hong 胡閔. Chancellor of Ji'nan in 161, He Hong was appointed Protector of the Qiang after Duan Jiong was dismissed from that office. He was unable to deal with the endemic rebellion, and military operations were entrusted to Huangfu Gui.

In 163 Hu Hong left office on account of ill health and Duan Jiong returned as Protector. -HHS 87/77: 2897-98.

Hu Ji 胡濟 [Weidu 偉度]; Nanyang. Registrar to Zhuge Liang, Hu Ji was admired for his willingness to engage his master in debate. He was later commander in Hanzhong against Wei. -SGZ Shu 9.980; Fang 52: 141, 65:303.

Hu Jia 壺嘉. Commandant of Taishan under Yuan Kang, in 166 Hu Jia was arrested, at the instigation of Hou Lan, for having presented false reports of success against rebels. -HHS 67/57:2214.

Hu [Jiedeng] 胡節等; Anding. Known for his literary and scholarly ability in the latter part of the first century, Hu Jiedeng is mentioned by Cao Pi in his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature." -HHSJJ 80/70B:2870 Hui Dong.

Hu [Jinying] 胡金盈, the Lady; Nan. The eldest daughter of the Excellency Hu Guang and the Lady Zhang Xianzhang, when her mother died in 170 the Lady commissioned Cai Yong to prepare her memorial statement 靈表. -Cai 4:6.

Hu Kang 胡康 [Zhongshi 仲始]; Nan. Son of Hu Chong and his wife the Lady Huang, Hu Kang was the younger brother of the Excellency Hu Guang. He became a magistrate in Henan, but died about 150. -Cai 4:5, HHSJJ 44/34:1607-08 Hui Dong.

Hu Lan 胡蘭 (d.165); Guiyang. A bandit in the south of Jing province, Hu Lan led a rebellion in 165 which extended into Lingling but was destroyed by Du Shang and Chen Qiu. -HHS 7:315, 38/28:1286, 56/46:1831-32.

Hu Lei 扈累 [Bozhong 伯重]; Jingzhao. At the end of Later Han Hu Lei was a wandering scholar, a disciple of the mysterious Master Qingniu, from whom it is said that he learned his arts of divination.

Hu Lei later lived as a hermit in Wei, showing few signs of old age. He died about 250, aged in his eighties but appearing as if in his forties. -SGZ 11:365.

Hu Liang 胡良; Ba. As a local officer in 154, Wang Qi joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending that the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree. -HYGZ 1:5.

Hu Mao 扈瑁; Yingchuan. In 194, after the death of Liu Yan the Governor of Yi province, Hu Mao was named Inspector by the imperial regime at Chang'an controlled by Dong Zhuo's successors Li Jue and his fellows. Liu Yan's government had been taken over by his son Liu Zhang, but as Hu Mao reached Hanzhong his approach triggered a rebellion against the new ruler. Troops loyal to Liu Zhang, however, defeated the insurgents and drove them into Jing province; Hu Mao is not mentioned again. -SGZ Shu 1:868.

Hu Miao 胡邈 [Jingcai 敬才]. A Palace Attendant in 195, Hu Miao remonstrated with the Internuncio Huang Li for lacking respect for Li Jue, who had made his uncle Huangfu Song Grand Commandant. Huangfu Li in turn accused Hu Miao of failing in his duty to the emperor by his support for Li Jue. -SGZ 6:185.

Hu Min 胡敏 [Tongta 通達]; Jiujiang. During the reign of Emperor Ling Hu Min was nominated as Sincere and Upright, but he is not recorded as having held any appointment. Cao Cao admired him, and later invited his son Hu Zhi to take office in his regime. -SGZ 27:741.

Hu Ning 胡寧 [Zhiwei 穉威]; Nan. Son of the Excellency Hu Guang and his wife the Lady Zhang Xianzhang, Hu Ning received provincial nomination as Abundant Talent and served as a magistrate in two counties. He later became an Consultant and died in that office. -Cai 4:6.

Hu Qian 胡潛 [Gongxing 公興]; Wei. Though he had little formal education, Hu Qian had great knowledge of rituals for the worship of ancestors and for mourning. He travelled to Yi province, and when Liu Bei took over in 214 he had Hu Qian join a group of scholars to work on ancient texts and establish a set of procedures to reform the disordered customs of the region. As Hu Qian quarrelled bitterly with his colleague Xu Ci, however, the project foundered. Hu Qian died about 220. -SGZ Shu 12:1023.

Hu Qianyi 胡千億 [Shurang 叔讓 or Shuwei 叔韡]; Nan. Son of the Excellency Hu Guang and his wife the Lady Zhang Xianzhang, Hu Qianyi held office as a provincial Inspector. -Cai 4:6.

Hu Shao 胡邵. As Administrator of Huainan 淮南, Hu Shao made a show of preparing his simple meals in public. -XC 7:11a. [There is serious confusion here, for the kingdom of Huainan was abolished in 122 BC. No commandery unit of that name existed in Later Han, and the closest approximation would be Lujiang.]

Hu Shao 胡紹. As magistrate of a county in Henei, Hu Shao created exemplary government with a display of personal frugality and firm punishment. -XHS 5:19a.

Hu Shou 壺壽 (d.193). Appointed Governor of Ji province by the government at Chang'an in 193, Hu Shou made an alliance with the bandit Poison Yu. They were defeated and killed by Yuan Shao. -SGZ 6:194.

Hu Shuang 胡爽 (d.162); Nan. In 162 Hu Shuang was Registrar in the commandery administration when the non-Chinese people of Wuling attacked the capital, Jiangling. As the Administrator Li Su prepared to flee Hu Shuang seized the bridle of his horse and urged him to stay at his post until imperial troops could relieve them. Li Su killed him and rode off; he was later arrested and executed, while Hu Shuang's family was exempted from tax and allowed to nominate a cadet gentleman. -HHS 86/76:2834; deC 89:34-35.

Hu Shuo 胡碩 [Jirui 季叡 also mistakenly as Xiurui 秀叡] (128-168); Nan. Youngest son of the Excellency Hu Guang and his wife the Lady Zhang Xianzhang, Hu Shuo was a fine scholar of the Book of Changes, the History and the Poetry according to the official New Text, but had also a wide understanding of the Old Text. When Hu Guang became an Excellency in the 140s, his ren privilege gained Hu Shuo appointment as a gentleman cadet, but he left office a few years later in mourning for the death of his uncle Hu Kang. He was invited to appointment by the commandery and the province, but would not accept.

Hu Shuo was later sponsored by the General-in-Chief Liang Ji and was graded First Class. He became an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate and then a Counsellor Remonstrant, but left office when Liang Ji was destroyed in 159. Though he was later invited to return to office, he would not accept while Emperor Huan was alive.

As the young Emperor Ling came to the throne in 168, Hu Guang held high rank under the regency of the Dou family, and Hu Shuo accepted a position as Consultant. He was swiftly transferred to be a Palace Attendant and a General of the Household, but a few months later he became ill and resigned his positions. In the summer an imperial messenger was sent to award him insignia as Administrator of Chenliu, but he died a few weeks later. Funerary grants were made to his family and Cai Yong composed two stele in his honour.

Hu Shuo's parents were living at the time of his death, but his four elder brothers had predeceased him. -Cai 5:4 and 5:5.

Some editions say that Hu Shuo's style was Xiurui 秀叡, but that is surely an error: the character xiu was the personal name of the founding Emperor Guangwu of Later Han, and was taboo throughout the dynasty. The inscription honouring Hu Shuo's mother the Lady Zhang Xianzhang, Cai 4:6, gives the style as Jirui 季叡, and that is more likely.

Hu Su 胡肅 [Boyu 伯於]; Nanyang. A former county magistrate, in 156 Hu Su was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:17a.

Hu Tan 胡譚, Pingyuan. Because Hu Tan was unable to manage proper intercourse with his wife Zhou Bi, he allowed his friends Li Fang and Zhang Shao to couple with her, in the hope that she might bear a child. -FSTY 3f:108. This affair evidently ended in a court case, but the fragment contains no further information.

Hu Teng 胡騰 [Zisheng 子升]; Guiyang. In 164 Hu Teng was an Assistant Officer in Jing province, and as Emperor Huan came on progress south to the Yangzi he was given responsibility for transport. The cash cost and levied labour to support the enterprise were enormous, while members of the imperial entourage made extravagant demands upon the local people. Arguing that even though the emperor was away from the capital, the central government resided in his person, Hu Teng asked that the Inspector of Jing province be granted temporary powers of investigation and punishment equivalent to those of the Director of Retainers. This was approved, and local authorities were authorised to punish excessive or wrongful conduct by the visitors. From this Hu Teng became well known and his influence in the province was very great.

As a young man Hu Teng had been a student of the future General-in-Chief Dou Wu, and in 168 he was a clerk in his offices. When Dou Wu was killed by the eunuchs Hu Teng was the only man to carry out mourning for him, and the victorious eunuch party had him proscribed from office.

The eunuchs, moreover, instigated a tight search for Dou Wu's two-year-old grandson Dou Fu. Hu Teng and his colleague Zhang Chang, however, arranged a false report of the child's death and took him to the south. Hu Teng had Dou Fu marry his daughter and adopted him as his own son.

When the Proscription ended in 184, Hu Teng returned to the capital and was appointed to the Imperial Secretariat. -HHS 69/59:2244-45, XC 4:11b; deC 89:51.

Hu [Wencai] 胡文才. After the assassination of Dong Zhuo at Chang'an by Wang Yun and L Bu in 192, Hu Wencai and Yang Zhengxiu, men of influence in Liang province, were sent to reassure Li Jue and other former officers of Dong Zhuo, then stationed in Hongnong. The two men had not been treated well by Wang Yun, so they made no approach to the potential rebels, but gathered their followers and returned to their home country. -SGZ 6:181-82 PC quoting Jiuzhou chunqiu.

Yingxiong ji, quoted by SGZ Wu 1:1098 PC, says that Wencai was the style of Dong Zhuo's officer Hu Zhen, so the names describe the same man. HHS 72/62:2333, however, says that Hu Zhen was sent by Wang Yun to attack Li Jue, but then changed sides and joined him. On the other hand, the commentary also quotes Jiuzhou chunqiu with the story of the abortive embassy. Either the texts are confused, or the two men were different.

In HHSJJ 72/62:2557, Hui Dong accepts the identification of Hu Wencai with Hu Zhen, and that of Yang Zhengxiu with Yang Ding qq.v. Both seem questionable.

Hu Wu 胡武; Taiyuan. In the late 150s Hu Wu and his fellow-countryman Hao Jie presented a memorial to the offices of the Excellencies, recommending a number of worthy scholars, but they did not call upon the General-in-Chief Liang Ji or provide him with a copy.

Hu Wu and Hao Jie were friends of Yuan Zhu, who later criticised the General-in-Chief Liang Ji and paid a fatal penalty. Angry at their lack of respect, and suspicious of their connection with Yuan Zhu, Liang Ji ordered their execution, and Hu Wu's family was slaughtered. -HHS 34/24:1184; Ch'ü 72:474, deC 89: 10.

Hu Xian 胡憲; Jiujiang. About 50, when Huan Rong was resident tutor to the Heir Liu Zhuang, future Emperor Ming, he brought in his student Hu Xian as an assistant to relieve him. Liu Zhuang, however, was so pleased with Huan Rong that he allowed him only one day's absence. -HHS 37/27:1250.

Hu Xian 胡顯; Nan. When Hu Guang's aunt and step-mother the Lady Huang Lieying died in 169 at the age of ninety, Hu Guang had his senior grandson Hu Xian compose an announcement of her death. -Cai 4:5.

Hu Yang 胡瑒; Nanyang. A descendant of Hu Zhen, Hu Yang became Administrator of Guiyang. In 161 he set up a stele at his mother's tomb. -S/JZ 29:19a.

Hu Yi 胡伊 [Bojian 伯建]; Runan. In 161 Fan Shao and his fellow-countryman Hu Yin were clerks in the offices of the Excellency Yu Fang. When Yu Fang left office at the end of that year they too returned home. The Administrator of the commandery invited Hu Yin to local appointment, but he was reluctant to accept a local position after having been engaged at the capital, and he went to register himself in the neighbouring territory of Chen.

Fan Shao had encouraged Hu Yi to accept, but the Excellency Huang Qiong disapproved of such advice, and sent instructions that Fan Yi should be not be nominated for commissioned office, while he had Hu Yi called up in his stead. Hu Yi later became Administrator of Anding. -FSTY 5:39; Nylan 83:468.

Hu Yin 胡殷 (d.25). Probably an associate of the gentry clique from Nanyang, Hu Yin is first recorded in 24 as a member of the Secretariat of the Gengshi Emperor at Chang'an, when he was enfeoffed as king of a county in Nanyang.

In 25 Hu Yin joined the conspiracy of Zhang Ang, Shentu Jian and others to rob the emperor and escape to Nanyang. The plot was discovered, but Zhang Ang, Liao Zhan and Hu Yin plundered the markets, attacked the palace and drove the emperor away. After a month of fighting they were expelled from Chang'an by the loyalists Li Song and Zhao Meng.

That winter, as the Red Eyebrows came to Chang'an, Hu Yin went with his comrades to join them, and when the Gengshi Emperor surrendered they persuaded the victors to have him killed. Soon afterwards, having fallen out with the newcomers, Hu Yin and others surrendered to Guangwu's officer Zong Guang. They were taken under escort to the east, but "died while attempting to escape." -HHS 11/1:470, 16/6:604; Bn 59:53-54, 97-102.

Hu Yu 胡玉; Wu. A pirate on the Fuchun River near present-day Hangzhou about 171, he was attacked by the youthful Sun Jian. -SGZ Wu 1:1093; deC 66A:29-30, 90:78-80.

Hu [Yuan'an] 胡元安. In a letter to Huang Qiong in 127, Li Gu refers to Hu Yuan'an as a hermit scholar who was called to court and offered gifts, but did not distinguish himself. -HHS 61/51:2132; Vervoorn 90:294.

Hu Zhao 胡昭 [Kongming 孔明] (162-250); Yingchuan. A noted scholar of history, Hu Zhao migrated to Ji province but refused office under Yuan Shao. He later accepted an invitation from Cao Cao, but explained that he was a simple man, unsuited to military or political service. He received permission to retire and settled in the hill country of Hongnong. Many refugees came to him, and it is also said that he saved Sima Yi from assassination by Zhou Sheng.

In 218 Hu Zhao aided the magistrate Zhang Gu to deal with the rebellion of Sun Lang, while his own people were spared by the enemy on account of his fine reputation. He received further invitations from the court of Wei, but always refused them. -SGZ 11:361-62.

Hu Zhen 胡珍; Nanyang. Son of Hu Zhu, Hu Zhen married the Princess Liu Huang, sister of Emperor Guangwu, and was a Commandant of Cavalry. He died about 26. -S/JZ 29:19a.

Hu Zhen 胡軫 [Wencai 文才?]. Holding title as Administrator of Chen, in 191 Hu Zhen was sent by Dong Zhuo with five thousand men to attack Sun Jian as he approached Luoyang. Lü Bu, who was in charge of the cavalry, quarrelled with him and spread false rumours to confuse the attack. Hu Zhen was heavily defeated.

In 192, after the assassination of Dong Zhuo at Chang'an, Hu Zhen was sent with Xu Rong to attack Dong Zhuo's former officers headed by Li Jue. In battle at Xinfeng, just east of Chang'an, Xu Rong was killed and Hu Zhen surrendered to join the rebels.

Hu Zhen became Director of Retainers under the new regime, with his headquarters at Chang'an. He later quarrelled with You Yin, a gentleman and local officer of Zuopingyi You Yin, and had him put to death on a false charge. A few months later, however, Hu Zhen died, exclaiming that he had been at fault and that You Yin's spirit had come for him. -HHS 72/62:2328, 2333, SGZ 6:181, 15:473, SGZ Wu 1:1098. Yingxiong ji, cited in PC to this last, says that Hu Zhen had the style Wencai, but cf. sub Hu Wencai.

Hu Zheng 胡整 [Boqi 伯齊]; Nan. Eldest son of the Excellency Hu Guang and his wife the Lady Zhang Xianzhang, Hu Zheng died before he reached manhood. -Cai 4:6.

Hu Zhi 胡直; Ba. Registrar of his county, Hu Zhi was killed by brigands about 150. -HYGZ 1:6.

Hu Zhi 扈質. About 200 Hu Zhi was sent by Cao Cao to deal with rebels in the north of Guangling. Believing that his force was too small, he was reluctant to attack, but the local officer Xu Xuan provided him with details of the terrain and urged him forward. Hu Zhi put down the rebellion. -SGZ 22:645.

Hu Zhi 胡質 [Wende 文德] (d.250); Jiujiang. Son of Hu Min, as a young man Hu Zhi was well known in the region of the Yangzi and the Huai for his ability; he was a close companion of Jiang Ji and Zhu Xu. Cao Cao had admired his father, and when Jiang Ji told him that Hu Zhi was Hu Min's son, Cao Cao made him a county magistrate in Dong commandery, and later called him to the capital as a clerk in his office as Imperial Chancellor.

About 215 Hu Zhi was invited to become Headquarters Officer in his native Yang province, and while he was there he persuaded the general Zhang Liao to make up a quarrel with his officer Wu Zhou.

Cao Cao called Hu Zhi once more to join his Imperial Chancellor's office, and he remained at the capital until the time of Cao Pi. He then became an Administrator, served as a general and Inspector of Jing province, and received enfeoffment. -SGZ 27:741-43*.

Hu Zhong 胡种 (d.192). Appointed Director of Retainers by the government of Li Jue in 192, he was an old enemy of Wang Hong, and urged his execution. As he was about to die, Wang Hong cursed Hu Zhong for taking advantage of another's misfortune, and foretold that he too would soon die. Then Hu Zhong had a dream where Wang Hong attacked him with a stick. He became seriously ill and died a few days later. -HHS 66/56:2177.

Hu Zhu 胡著; Nanyang. A former Administrator of Rinan, about 25 Hu Zhu had a stele erected in his honour at the side of Mount Long 隆山 in Nanyang. -SJZ 29:19a.

Hu Zong 胡綜 [Weize 偉則] (183-243); Runan. Hu Zong's father died when he was young, and about 190 his mother took him south of the Yangzi to avoid the civil war. Sun Ce came to the commandery when Hu Zong was fourteen sui, he went to join him, and then studied with his younger brother Sun Quan. When Sun Ce was killed in 200, Sun Quan appointed Hu Zong as a staff officer in charge of finances.

Hu Zong took part in the campaigns against Huang Zu, and was appointed a magistrate in Jiangxia. Recalled to the capital about 211, he joined Xu Xiang and Shi Yi as Sun Quan's confidential clerks, and when Sun Quan became King of Wu he enfeoffed the three men.

Hu Zong also played a military role: he was commissioned to raise troops when Liu Bei was preparing to attack in 222 and took part in several operations against rebels and renegades. He held rank as a General of the Household and was later appointed a lieutenant-general.

At the same time Hu Zong was recognised as poet and essayist laureate to the court of Wu: he probably wrote Sun Quan's proclamation of claim to empire in 229 and he was certainly commissioned to compose a rhapsody when he took the imperial title. Raised in fief at that time and appointed a Palace Attendant, he wrote a flattering set of "Appreciations of Friends and Guests" 賓友目 for the Heir Sun Deng. More generally, he composed the elegant oath of covenant between Wu and Shu-Han later that year, and he was responsible for diplomatic and other official documents. -SGZ Wu 17:1413-18*; Fang 52:223, 292.

Hua Cao 華操. About 175 the Registrar Hua Cao joined the Assistant Officer Feng Xun and other senior colleagues in erecting a stele in honour of their master the Inspector of Yan province Xue Jixiang. -SJZ 8: 22a.

Hua Dang 華當; Kuaiji. A local leader on the upper Min River in present-day Fujian, Hua Dong and his associates were conquered by He Qi in 203. -SGZ Wu 15:1378.

Hua Fu 華苒/敷 see Hua Tuo 華佗. The commentary of Pei Songzhi to SGZ 29799 observes that Hua Tuo's alternative personal name of Fu appears in two forms which are often confused. On the basis of his style of Yuanhua 元化, Pei Songzhi suggests that 苒 is the correct version.

Hua Meng 華孟 (d.145); Jiujiang. A local bandit, Hua Meng took the title of Black Emperor 黑帝 [indicating that his power would destroy the Red of Han]. In 145 he attacked the commandery capital, Hefei, and killed the Administrator Yang Cen. He and his men were soon afterwards defeated by Teng Fu, and Hua Meng was killed. -HHS 6:279, 38/28:1279-80.

Hua Song 華松. Hua Song was orphaned and poor when he was young, but he dreamed one night that his house was the residence of the Director of Retainers, with guards at the gate. From the ages of fifteen to nineteen, about 40, he studied the Chunqiu with Ding Gong, who foretold great things for him, and he indeed became Director of Retainers.

In that office, though the regular ministers were heavily influenced by leading relatives, Hua Song enforced the law firmly, and he reported the wrongdoing of the powerful Ma family of the consort of Emperor Ming. He later became Intendant of Henan, where he encouraged the people to education and good conduct, while maintaining control over the powerful clans. Enemies at court, however, slandered him and had him killed. -XC 7:6b-7a.

Hua Tuo 華佗 or Hua Fu 萸敷 [Yuanhua 元化]; Pei. One of the most celebrated medical men of early China, Hua Tuo was said to have mastered the technique of nourishing the vital spirit 養性, and we are told that even when he was almost a hundred years old he had the appearance of a man in the prime of life. The people of the time looked upon him as an immortal, but it is more likely that he claimed to be older than he was. He was probably born about 140, and he was dead by 208.

Hua Tuo travelled to Xu province, where the commandery of Langye was noted for its tradition of magic. He is said to have studied a number of classical works, certainly Huangdi neijing 黃帝內經 and Huangdi waijing 黃帝外經, the Yellow Emperor's "inner" and "outer" manuals of medicine, and probably also the Taiping jing 太平經 ascribed to Gan/Yu Ji. He had deep knowledge of medicinal herbs, and the original text of the pharmacopeia Shen Nong bencao jing 神農本草經 has been ascribed to Hua Tuo and his contemporary Zhang Ji.

Hua Tuo appears to have been restrained in his treatments. He used a limited number of herbs, and if he applied moxibustion or acupuncture he did so sparingly. When he operated for an internal problem he anaesthetised the patient with wine and powdered hemp 麻沸散, and he had an ointment which could cure the wound within a month. Hua Tuo also emphasised the importance of regular exercise for long life and good health, and he identified a program of five sets of callisthenics: those of the tiger, the deer, the bear, the ape and the bird.

The biographies of Hua Tuo in Hou Han shu and Sanguo zhi, and his Secondary Biography, contain several accounts of his treatments and cures, varying from a dead foetus to internal worms, fevers, coughing and a blocked throat. There were also occasions when he could do no more than comment on the failure of others and/or warn his patients of their likely fate. His prognoses were invariably correct.

Acupuncture at this time frequently involved a full invasion of the body, placing a long needle directly onto an internal organ: the case of Xu Xin treated by Liu Zu is a case in point. When we are told that Hua Tuo was sparing in his use of the technique, he presumably preferred the light, subcutaneous needles – which seek their effect through the nervous system – to invasive operations which sought to deal directly with the internal organs. The subcutaneous method is now most common, but full penetration with heavier needles has been used by Chinese traditional practitioners in modern times.

Despite his success and fame, Hua Tuo was an irascible man, and he considered the practice of medicine unworthy of a true scholar and gentleman. He was nominated Filial and Incorrupt about 190 and was also invited to join the offices of the Excellencies at the capital, but refused both opportunities. Later, the warlord Cao Cao called him to his personal service: he suffered from headaches and dizziness which affected his eyesight, and Hua Tuo cured them by acupuncture to his diaphragm.

After some time in Cao Cao's service Hua Tuo was granted leave to return to his home country. He claimed that his wife was ill and that he needed to seek out additional recipes for medicines, but in fact he was tired of the court and he wanted to go home. Cao Cao wrote repeatedly to call him back, and send orders for local officials to send him on his way, but Hua Tuo relied on his reputation and refused to go. Cao Cao made enquiries, however, and when he found that Hua Tuo's wife had never been ill he became angry and had Hua Tuo arrested and tortured. Cao Cao's close adviser Xun Yu urged restraint, but Hua Tuo was executed.

After Hua Tuo's death Cao Cao's headaches returned, and when his well-loved son Cao Chong died in 208 he regretted that he had had Hua Tuo killed.

Just before he was taken out to die, Hua Tuo offered a scroll to his jailer, saying that it could save men from death. The jailer was nervous and refused to take the document, so Hua Tuo burnt it. Some of his teachings, however, were taken over by his disciples Wu Pu and Fan A. -HHS 82/72B:2736-40*, SGZ 29:799-804*; Ngo 76:118-122, DeWoskin 83:140-153, Needham 86:245-248.

Hua Xin 華歆 [Ziyu 子魚] (157-231); Pingyuan. Recognised as a scholar and a man of quality, Hua Xin was a close friend and colleague of Bing Yuan and Guan Ning, and a student 弟子 of the Excellency Chen Qiu. After Chen Qiu was disgraced and died in 179, Hua Xin and Guan Ning were among those who joined to set up stele at his tomb in Xiapi.

Hua Xin later held local office, and in 188 he persuaded Taoqiu Hong not to join the plot of Wang Fen against Emperor Ling. Soon afterwards he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet, but left on account of illness.

In 189 He Jin had Hua Xin appointed to the Imperial Secretariat, but when Dong Zhuo shifted the court to Chang'an in 190 Hua Xin fled to Nanyang. There is a story that on the journey his party met a straggler who asked to join them. Xin objected, but his companions felt sorry for the man and agreed. The newcomer later got into difficulty, but when the others wanted to leave him Hua Xin insisted that they were now honour-bound to help. He explained that he had been reluctant to accept the stranger just because of the additional commitment.

Hua Xin was held for a time by Yuan Shu, but escaped about 194 when the Grand Tutor Ma Midi, emissary of the Chang'an government, authorised him to go as an envoy to Xu province. In 195 Hua Xin became Administrator of Yuzhang under Liu Yao.

When Liu Yao died in 198 his followers wanted to make Hua Xin their leader. Hua Xin refused; he kept his territory and no more, and he readily surrendered to Sun Ce in the following year. In 200 he received a call to the imperial court under Cao Cao at Xu city, and Sun Ce's successor Sun Quan allowed him to return to the north.

Hua Xin was appointed to Cao Cao's staff, then to the Imperial Secretariat of Han, and in 212 he succeeded Xun Yu as Director. In 214 he took guards with Chi Lü to arrest the Empress Fu Shou on grounds of treason; in order to get her out, he and his men broke down the doors and walls of her apartments.

In 217 Hua Xin was appointed Royal Counsellor 御侍大夫 at the court of Wei. When Cao Cao died in 220 Hua Xin brought Cao Pi the edict authorising his succession as King of Wei, and as Cao Pi took the imperial title Hua Xin was enfeoffed and appointed an Excellency. He held that rank until his death. -SGZ 13: 401-06*.

Hua Xin features in a number of generally favourable but slightly ambiguous anecdotes in SSXY: Mather 76:533.

Hua Xiong 華雄 (d.191). A senior administrative officer with an army of Dong Zhuo in 191, he was killed fighting Sun Jian. -SGZ Wu 1:1096.

Hua Yan 華彥. Clever but wicked, about 200 Hua Yan was a trusted counsellor to Yuan Tan. -SGZ 6:196.

Huaitou 槐頭 or Huitou; Xianbi. A subordinate commander in the east under Tanshihuai in the 170s, he was probably the same person as Tanshihuai's grandson Kuitou 魁頭. -SGZ 30:838.

Huan 郇 [surname] see Xun 郇荀 passim.

Huan 桓, the Lady I; Pei. The Lady was married to Liu Changqing, but he died young in the late 160s, leaving a five-year-old son. Not wishing to marry again, the Lady refused to return to her father's house but cared for the child herself.

When the boy died ten years later there was strong expectation that the Lady should remarry; it was common custom in the Han period. In order to remain faithful to her late husband, however, she cut off her ear to show her firm intention to remain his widow.

The Administrator Wang Ji reported her fine conduct to the throne and a sign was placed on her gate to recognise the Widow Huan of Honourable Conduct 行義桓釐. Whenever there was a sacrificial ceremony in the county, the local authorities presented her with some of the meat. -HHS 84/74:2797; Ch'ü 72:312.

Huan 桓, the Lady II; Pei. Daughter of Huan Liang 良 and sister of Huan Luan, she married the Excellency Yang Ci.

When Huan Luan died in 184 the Lady attended the ceremony. Her nephew Huan Ye, Huan Luan's son, disapproved of the care she had given to her appearance. He refused to speak to her or accept anything from her or from Yang Ci. -HHS 37/27:1259.

Huan 環, the Lady; Pengcheng. A senior concubine of Cao Cao, the Lady Huan was the mother of Cao Chong, Cao Ju 據 and Cao Yu. -SGZ 20:579.

Huan 桓 [personal name unknown]; Nanyang. As Chancellor of Donghai in 155, he initiated the construction of a temple by the sea. -LS 2:10b-12a.

Huan 桓 [personal name unknown]; Changsha. This man died some time in the early 190s and was placed in his coffin, but more than a month later his mother heard sounds from inside, and when it was opened he was found to be alive. -HHS 107/17:3348.

Huan An 環安. A general of Gongsun Shu, in 35 he held a defensive position in Wudu when the imperial general Lai Xi attacked from the north. Defeated in the initial engagements, Huan An sent an assassin to kill Lai Xi, and the Han made no further advance on that front. -HHS 1b.54, 13/3:542; Bn 59:191.

Huan Bin 桓彬 [Yanlin 彦林] (133-178); Pei. Son of Huan Lin, Huan Bin rivalled his contemporary Cai Yong in scholarly repute. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he joined the Imperial Secretariat in the late 160s. Fang Feng, son-in-law of the powerful eunuch Cao Jie, was also a member of the Secretariat, but Huan Bin refused to deal with him. He and the Assistants Liu Xin and Du Xi would often drink and eat together, but they never invited Fang Feng to join them.

Resentful at this exclusion, in the early 170s Fang Feng accused Huan Bin and his companions of factionalism. The matter was referred to the Director Liu Meng, but he admired Huan Bin and took no action. Cao Jie was extremely angry, and he sent in a memorial claiming that Liu Meng was also implicated in the clique and asking he be arrested. Liu Meng was soon released, but he was dismissed and proscribed from office. Huan Bin himself resigned and died at home, mourned by all Confucian scholars.

Qi shuo 七說 "The Seven Discussions," a collection of essays probably begun by his father Huan Lin and completed by Huan Bin, was widely admired, and Cai Yong and other colleagues wrote a eulogistic preface listing Huan Bin's exceptional qualities. -HHS 37/27:1260-61*.

Huan Dan 桓譚 see Huan Tan 桓譚.

Huan Dian 桓典 [Gongya 公雅] (d.201); Pei. Son of Huan Shun and a grandson of Huan Yan 焉, after his parents died when he was twelve Huan Dian went to live with his aunt, serving her as if she were his own mother. Known for his honesty and fine principles, he maintained the family tradition of scholarship and established an academy on the Classic of History in Yingchuan, which was attended by hundreds of students.

About 179 Huan Dian was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet at court, but soon afterwards the Chancellor of Pei Wang Ji, who had been responsible for his nomination, was found guilty of crimes and killed. Wang Ji was an adopted son of the disgraced eunuch Wang Fu; his cruelty had been notorious, so none of his former friends or clients dared have further dealings with him. Huan Dian, however, left his position to attend his patron's funeral, maintained three years mourning for Wang Ji, built him a tomb-mound and set up a shrine, and departed only when he had paid his last respects.

In 182 Huan Dian entered the offices of the Excellency Yuan Wei, was graded First Class and then appointed to the Censorate as an Imperial Clerk. Though palace eunuchs dominated the government, he showed them no fear or favour. He always rode a piebald horse, and there was a popular jingle:

Walking, walking, better watch your step,
Beware the Clerk on the piebald horse."

When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out in 184 Huan Dian was sent to supervise military operations in Henan, just east of the capital. After the enemy had been destroyed he returned, but because of his refusal to submit to the eunuchs he received no reward. He was a member of the cortège sent by Emperor Ling to honour the funeral of the Excellency Yang Ci [Cai 3:2].

After almost ten years in the Censorate Huan Dian was again appointed as a Gentleman. This would appear a demotion, but he joined the staff of the General-in-Chief He Jin, and when Emperor Ling died early in 189 he was a close adviser. He then held a swift succession of posts and was made a General of the Household.

Later that year, after the death of He Jin, the seizure of power by Dong Zhuo and the accession of Emperor Xian, the senior ministers noted how Huan Dian had urged He Jin to destroy the eunuchs: though his advice was not taken, he had shown wisdom and public spirit. An imperial edict awarded him 20,000 cash and authorised the appointment of a member of his family as a cadet gentleman. Having accompanied the court west to Chang'an, Huan Dian became Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate, and was enfeoffed as a secondary marquis. In 196 he came with the emperor to Xu city and was named Minister of the Household in the government controlled by Cao Cao. He died in office five years later. -HHS 37/27:1258*;

Huan Fan 桓汎; Pei. Huan Fan was the son of Huan Yong and grandson of Huan Rong, who was tutor to Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming. Huan Yong died early, and when Huan Rong died his second son Huan Yu was awarded the succession to his secondary marquise. Huan Yu sought to renounce the title in favour of Huan Fan, who represented the elder lineage, but the emperor would not agree. -HHS 37/27:1251-52.

Huan Fan 桓範 [Yuanze 元則] (d.249); Pei. A man of good official family, some time before 220 Huan Fan was appointed to the offices of Cao Cao as Imperial Chancellor. In 220 he was named Inspector of the Left of the Feathered Forest. This office had formerly been part of the imperial body-guard, but it was now evidently supernumerary or at least a sinecure, for Huan Fan joined Wang Xiang, Liu Shao and other scholars in the compilation of Huang lan 皇覽 "Imperial Readings," a massive edition of the classics and their commentaries, which was commissioned by Cao Pi in that year.

Under Cao Rui, Emperor Ming, Huan Fan held a number of posts in the provinces and at the capital. Respected for his wisdom and learning, he became Minister of Finance as an associate of the powerful Cao Shuang. When Cao Shuang was destroyed by Sima Yi in 249, Huan Fan was implicated and executed. -SGZ 9:290.

Huan Feng 桓豐; Pei. Huan Feng was the fifth son of Huan Yu, and his sons and grandsons followed the family's scholarly tradition. -HHS 37/27:1257.

Huan Heng 桓衡; Pei. Elder son of Huan Yan 焉, he died young. -HHS 37/27:1257.

Huan Hua 桓華 see Huan Ye 桓擘.

Huan Jie 桓階 [Boxu 伯緒]; Changsha. Son of Huan Sheng, Huan Jie became Officer of Merit in his native commandery, and about 188 he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt by the Administrator Sun Jian. He was appointed to the Imperial Secretariat, but left office on the death of his father.

Sun Jian came to attack Jing province for Yuan Shu in 192, but was killed in action against the troops of the Governor Liu Biao. Huan Jie obtained permission from Liu Biao to take the body back to Sun Jian's family in the east, then returned to his home country in Changsha. It is said that in 198 he encouraged the Administrator Zhang Xian to rebel against Liu Biao in order to prevent him supporting Yuan Shao against Cao Cao during the Guandu campaign, but he later joined Liu Biao and was offered marriage into the Cai clan of Liu Biao's wife. Concerned at the entanglement, he pleaded illness and left.

When Cao Cao took Jing province in 208, he appointed Huan Jie to his staff; he later became Administrator of Zhao and then Palace Attendant in the kingdom of Wei. A firm and influential adviser, opposed to the Ding brothers and a supporter of Cao Pi, Huan Jie held office in the Secretariat with responsibility for appointments. In 219 he persuaded Cao Cao not to go in person to deal with Guan Yu's attack into Jing province, but to hold back in order to display the power which his state held in reserve.

Huan Jie joined Chen Qun in urging Cao Cao to take the imperial title, and after his death he took part in the process which brought the abdication of the Han in favour of Wei in 220.

Huan Jie became Director of the Imperial Secretariat of Wei and was enfeoffed. He died a few years later. -SGZ 22:631-32*.

Huan Jun 桓俊 of Pei was the fourth son of Huan Yu. -HHS 37/27:1257.

Huan Lan 桓覽 see Huan Xian 桓賢.

Huan Liang 桓梁; Zuopingyi. A noted Confucian scholar, about 28 Huan Liang and other gentlemen were recommended to Emperor Guangwu by the Excellency Song Hong, and Huan Liang took up a clerical post in Song Hong's office. -HHS 26/16:904, 40/30A:1331.

Huan Liang 桓良; Pei. Sixth and youngest son of Huan Yu, Huan Liang became a county magistrate in Lujiang, and his sons and grandsons followed the family's scholarly tradition. -HHS 37/27:1257 & 1259.

Huan Lin 桓麟/麟 [Yuanfeng 元鳳]; Pei. Son of Huan Feng, even when he was young Huan Lin was noted for his ability and his generous nature. When Emperor Huan came to the throne in 147 he was appointed a Consultant. All the court admired him, and he was authorised to enter the palace in order to tutor the young ruler.

Huan Lin was later a county magistrate in Yingchuan, but left office because of illness. His mother died at this time; he did not live to see out her mourning period but died at the age of forty-one sui.

Huan Lin left some twenty chapters of collected works, including eulogies and inscriptions for funerary and memorial stele, letters and essays including Qi shuo 七說 "The Seven Discussions". [This work is also attributed to Huan Lin's son Huan Bin; it was probably begun by the father and completed by the son]. -HHS 37/27:1260.

Huan Luan 桓鸞 [Shichun 始春] (108-184); Pei. Son of Huan Liang 良, Huan Luan was known for his fine conduct even as a child. He studied the classics intensely, wore plain clothes and ate simply, and gave away much of his property to friends. Because he regarded the times as corrupt, and most of the men in his commandery and province as unworthy, he was unwilling to accept any official appointment.

During the 150s, as Xiang Miao the Chancellor of Pei, his native commandery unit, was a man of good reputation, Huan Luan did accept nomination as Filial and Incorrupt. He was appointed a magistrate in Beihai, but before he could take up his post Xiang Miao died. Huan Luan immediately resigned his appointment to attend the funeral, and he maintained mourning for his patron for three years before returning to his duties. He was admired by all the people in the region.

Huan Luan then served as a magistrate in Chenliu and in Henei. He gained a fine reputation, all three Excellencies invited him to join their offices, and during the 160s he was appointed a Consultant at the court of Emperor Huan. He presented a memorial with five heads of proposal: give office to worthy men, review those who hold positions, dismiss the imperial favourites, abolish the parks and pleasure grounds, and reduce the tax and corvée burden. His document came to Emperor Huan, but because of the influence of the eunuchs in the government no action was taken.

Huan Luan later left office on grounds of illness and died at home. -HHS 37/27:1259*.

Huan Pu 桓普; Pei. Eldest son of Huan Yu, he maintained the family tradition of scholarship and was granted the succession to his father's secondary marquissate, which had originally been awarded to his grandfather Huan Rong. The fief descended in Huan Pu's lineage to his great-grandson. -HHS 37/27:1257.

Huan Ren 桓任. When Huan Ren's mother was pregnant with him, she did not eat the meat of pigs or sheep. As a result, in all his life Huan Ren ate neither pork or mutton. -XC 6:10a.

Huan Rong 桓榮 [Chunqing 春卿 or Zichun 子春]; Qi>Pei. Towards the end of Former Han Huan Rong travelled from his home country of Qi to Chang'an, where he was a pupil of Zhu Pu 朱普 and studied the New Text Classic of History in the Ouyang tradition. Extremely poor, he worked as a farm labourer, but devoted himself to his studies and stayed at the capital for fifteen years.

When Wang Mang took the imperial title in 9 AD, Huan Rong returned to Qi, but when Zhu Pu died soon afterwards he went to Jiujiang for the funeral and raised a tomb mound for his former master. He then remained in Jiujiang as a private teacher with hundreds of pupils.

After the fall of Wang Mang in 23 Huan Rong took refuge in the mountains with his books and his followers, and though living in difficult conditions he maintained teaching and scholarship and continued to attract students from all the lands between the Yangzi and the Huai. He had at first no children, but his favourite He Tang persuaded him to divorce his wife and take another: Huan Rong then sired three sons.

In 44, aged over sixty, Huan Rong received his first official appointment, in the offices of Excellency over the Masses. Liu Zhuang, future Emperor Ming, had been named as Heir in the previous year, and Emperor Guangwu chose Huan Rong's former pupil He Tang to teach him the History. He asked He Tang who his own teacher had been; He Tang named Huan Rong, and the emperor called him to discuss the work. Delighted with his exposition, he granted Huan Rong 100,000 cash, promoted him to be a Consultant and had him tutor the Heir. At court gatherings, Huan Rong's discussion of the classics took precedence over the most senior officials.

Despite his respect for Zhu Pu, Huan Rong considered his 400,000-word commentary on the History to be too long, and when he began to tutor Liu Zhuang he reduced his late master's arguments to an edition of 230,000 words. Huan Rong was then appointed Academician for the study of the Ouyang interpretation of the History, he distinguished himself in discussions during an imperial visitation to the University; and was noted for his insistence on wearing the specific robes of a Confucian scholar. He received particular favour, and was ordered to reside in the apartments of the Heir and instruct him in the History and the Book of Filial Piety.

Liu Zhuang respected and admired Huan Rong, kept him regularly in his company, and when he was ill he enquired after him constantly and sent presents of delicacies, cloths and slaves. When the scholar and Academician Zhang Yi was appointed Senior Tutor to the Heir in 52, Huan Rong was named his Junior. He was awarded a carriage and horses, and gathered his other pupils to show them what could be achieved by study of the past. Soon afterwards, suggesting that the Heir was now fully learned in the classics, he offered his resignation, but Liu Zhuang would not accept.

In 54 Huan Rong was made Minister of Ceremonies. He was among the scholars who sought and found justifications for the emperor to celebrate the Feng and Shan sacrifices in 56, while he also urged construction of a Bright Hall and a Hall of the Circular Moat. He may have put forward the latter proposal while still an Academician, and it is said that he anticipated the Excellency Zhang Chun, but as Minister of Ceremonies he was naturally involved in discussions with the Excellencies, and their plan was endorsed by a court conference. Work commenced in 56, and the buildings were inaugurated by the new Emperor Ming in 59.

With the imperial observatory at the Spiritual Terrace, also built about this time, the Halls were close to the University in the south of the capital; they were together known as the Three Enclosures. The Bright Hall and the Hall of the Circular Moat were both ascribed to the traditions of early Zhou, but they had not been constructed by Former Han until 4 AD, when government at Chang'an was controlled by the Reformist and spiritualist Wang Mang. The Bright Hall, designed to reflect cosmological influences, was used for ritual and dynastic ceremonies. Square below to represent Earth and circular above to echo Heaven, it was roofed with rushes overlaid by tiles and protected by a dry ditch. The Hall of the Circular Moat, surrounded by water but open to view from the outside, was the site for Serving the Aged, a ceremony held each winter in the tenth month, and for the Great Archery in the third and the ninth months.

When Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming, succeeded his father in 57, he appointed two of Huan Rong's sons as Gentlemen, and Huan Rong himself received honour and favour. At the first ceremony of Serving the Aged, held at the Hall of the Circular Moat in the winter of 59, Huan Rong was named Five-fold Experienced, one of the chief figures for the ritual offering by the emperor. He was enfeoffed as a secondary marquis, with a substantial pension, and at the conclusion of the ceremony the ruler summoned Huan Rong and his students to discuss the classics.

About 60, now more than eighty years old, Huan Rong entered his final illness. Emperor Ming sent doctors, medicine and gifts to his house, went in person to make enquiry, and even got down from his carriage. When he died the emperor changed his clothing, took part in mourning and granted him a special tomb.

Two of Huan Rong's nephews and eight of his students were granted special pensions, many of his former pupils became high officials, and his son Huan Yu inherited his high favour. The influence of his teaching of New Text History continued throughout Later Han. -HHS 37/27:1249-53*, 79/69A:2545 & 2566; Bn 79:58-59, 173-194, Bn 76:65-67, Bodde 75: 361-380, Tjan 49:148.

Huan Shao 桓邵; Pei. Huan Shao treated Cao Cao disrespectfully when he was young, and as Cao Cao later gained in power he took refuge in the far south. Cao Cao persuaded the local warlord Shi Xie to extradite him, and when Huan Shao came before him he rejected his apologies and had him executed. -SGZ 1:55.

Huan [Shaojun] 桓彦林, the Lady; Bohai. Towards the end of Former Han Bao Xuan 鮑宣 of Shangdang, a man of humble means, studied under the father of the Lady Huan, who admired him and gave his daughter to be his second wife. The Lady's family was wealthy, but at her new husband's wish she gave up the property her parents had given them and went with him to his home country pulling a simple handcart. A model of female conduct, she served her husband's mother in exemplary fashion.

Bao Xuan was killed about 5 AD for his opposition to the new government of Wang Mang, but the Lady lived until the late 20s, cared for by her step-son Bao Yong. When Bao Yong's son Yu asked about the early days she told how her mother-in-law would often quote the Book of Changes, that one could never be confident of the future and must always prepare for trouble: Wilhelm 66:341.

The biography of the Lady Huan appears in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳. -HHS 84/74: 2781-82*; Ch'ü 72:283.

Huan Sheng 桓勝; Changsha. Son of Huan Zhao, Huan Sheng was well-known in the south of the empire. Like his father, he served in the provinces as an Inspector and an Administrator and he was also a member of the Imperial Secretariat. He died about 190. -SGZ 22:631.

Huan Shun 桓順; Pei. Huan Shun was a son of Huan Yan 焉. -HHS 37/27:1257.

Huan Tan 桓譚 [Junshan 君山] (d.28); Pei. One of the leading philosophers of his day, though most of his work has been lost, Huan Tan was an independent thinker of the Old Text realist tradition, an associate of Liu Xin 劉歆 and Yang Xiong 楊雄, and very probably an influence on Wang Chong. His later reputation suffered, however, as he was considered too closely associated with the usurping regime of Wang Mang.

Born about 43 BC, Huan Tan held office under Emperor Ai and Wang Mang, with responsibility for music, and he served as a Palace Counsellor under the Gengshi Emperor.

About 27 the Excellency Song Hong recommended Huan Tan to Emperor Guangwu, and he was appointed a Consultant with supernumerary title as Serving within the Palace. He was commissioned to play the lute at imperial banquets, but Song Hong criticised him for playing the licentious Tunes of Zheng 鄭聲 rather than formal music suitable to state occasions. He threatened him with punishment and Huan Tan apologised, but when Guangwu called Huan Tan to play Song Hong accused himself of having made a bad recommendation. In order to ease the situation the emperor withdrew Huan Tan's privilege of Serving within the Palace.

Huan Tan unsuccessfully proposed a number of reforms, including an overhaul of the legal code, and he argued against reliance on texts of divination and portents. Guangwu had great trust in these, however, and at a court conference held to consider the establishment of a Spiritual Terrace he proposed that apocryphal texts 讖緯 should be consulted to determine its site. Huan Tan observed to his sovereign that he never read the apocrypha, and despite his former favour he was very nearly executed. Sent out instead to minor office as assistant to the Administrator of Liu'an, he died on the journey, aged in his seventies.

Huan Tan left a number of rhapsodies, essays and memorials, but his major work was Xin lun 新論, which was admired by Guangwu and whose fragments contain both philosophical argument and comments on economics and society. There was also an interrupted essay on the art of the lute 琴道 Jin dao, which was later completed by Ban Gu on the instructions of Emperor Zhang; during an imperial tour in 85 the same emperor sent messengers to sacrifice at Huan Tan's tomb in Pei. -HHS 28/18A:955-962*, 26/16:904, XC 1:8a; Bn 79:33, 55, QHX:164-165, Tjan 49:151-153, Texts:158-160 [Pokora], Ch'en 86:763, 777-779, Ebrey 86:631-632, Nishijima 86:593-594.

Huan Xian 桓賢 also as Huan Lan 覽. A eunuch, in 178 Huan Xian was a guard at the Yellow Gates. A man clad in white, presumably mad, entered the gate of the Hall of Virtuous Light of the Northern Palace. He claimed to have been told by Liang Boxia [i.e. the late General-in-Chief Liang Shang] that he should ascend the dais and become the new emperor; another version reports him as claiming himself to be Liang Shang. Huan Xian intercepted the intruder and called for help to arrest him, but by the time support arrived the man had disappeared. -HHS 8:341, 107/17:3346-47, DGHJ 3:5b, Cai 7:4; Bn 76:39. Cf. sub Xie Bu.

Huan Yan 桓延; Pei. Huan Yan was the second son of Huan Yu. -HHS 37/27:1257.

Huan Yan 桓焉 [Shuyuan 叔元] (d.143); Pei. Third son of Huan Yu, Huan Yan became a gentleman cadet through his father's position, but became well-known in his own right through his understanding of the classics and his fine conduct. In 107 he was brought into the palace as a tutor to the young Emperor An, and after various further appointments he became Palace Attendant and a colonel in the Northern Army.

When Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun, was named Heir in 120, Huan Yan was appointed as his Junior Tutor, and he became Senior Tutor a few weeks later. At that time senior officials were not permitted to take leave for mourning, but when Huan Yan's mother died he was made a junior Counsellor for the period of the mourning, and a few years later an imperial messenger was sent with wine and meat to call for his return. He became a Household Counsellor and then Minister of Ceremonies.

When Liu Bao was deposed as Heir in 124, Huan Yan and his colleagues Lai Li and Zhang Hao argued against the move. They had no success, but when Liu Bao came to the throne at the end of 125 Huan Yan was appointed Grand Tutor. He control of over the Imperial Secretariat, and hence formal command of the government, with the Grand Commandant Zhu Chong, and he had permission to enter the private apartments of the palace in order to carry out his instruction of the ruler. He was offered enfeoffment for his courage in opposing the earlier dismissal of Liu Bao, but refused.

After three years in his high position, it was found that Huan Yan had appointed someone under proscription as a clerk in his office; he was reduced in rank to be a Household Counsellor.

In 133 Huan Yan was appointed Minister Herald, and Minister of Ceremonies a few days later. He became Grand Commandant in 140, but was dismissed in 142, and died in retirement at his home in the following year.

The Annals at HHS 6:272, record that Huan Yan and his colleague the Excellency Liu Shou both left office in the winter of 142. Huan Yan's biography says that he was dismissed on account of an eclipse, but the closest such event was in the autumn of 141, more than a year earlier. The Annals also record that in the autumn of 142 a special commission of eight senior officials was sent to inspect the empire, and HYGZ 10B:157 says that Zhang Gang, one of the commissioners, took the opportunity to report on the undue influence of the Liang family and on the corruption of Huan Yan and Liu Shou; the two were then dismissed. Zhang Gang's biographies in HHS and XHS say that he complained about the Liang group but that no action was taken. It seems likely HYGZ has exaggerated his effect, and that Huan Yan and Liu Shou left office for other reasons, possibly because Liang Ji wished to confirm his authority over the highest positions at court.

Huan Yan left several hundred disciples to carry on his tradition of scholarship; two of the most notable were Huang Qiong and Yang Ci. -HHS 37/27:1257*.

Huan Yan 桓嚴/嚴/嚴 see Huan Ye 桓曄.

Huan Ye 桓曄 or Huan Yu 煜 or Huan Yan 嚴/嚴/嚴 [Wenlin 文林]; Pei. Son of Huan Luan, he was skilled in divination and also a man of strict principle. His father's sister was married to the Excellency Yang Ci, and when Huan Luan died in 184 she came for the mourning. As she arrived, she halted at a lodging place and arranged herself and her escort before she came in for the ceremony. Huan Ye disapproved of such vanity, and when his aunt sought to offer condolences he responded only with sobs and cries. Yang Ci sent officers to take part in the funerary sacrifices, and the local county office prepared ritual objects, but Huan Ye refused to accept them. Later, when he went to the capital, he would never stay at Yang Ci's residence.

Followers and clients admired his independence.

Having served as commandery Officer of Merit, Huan Ye was nominated as Filial and Incorrupt and as Abundant Talent, received several special selections, and was invited to join the offices of the Excellencies at the capital. He always refused.

In the early 190s Huan Ye went south of the Yangzi to take refuge from the civil war. He went first to join Liu Yao, then to Wang Lang in Kuaiji. Each offered him gifts and provisions, but he refused them all. Having stayed for a time at the former residence of the earlier notable Zhongli Yi, Huan Ye moved to the house of the Attendant Official Qu Yu, where he forecast dangers by the fall of oranges from a tree in the courtyard.

When Wang Lang in his turn was obliged to surrender to Sun Ce, Huan Ye fled south along the coast by ship. In Jiaozhi, his Confucian virtue persuaded the non-Chinese Yue people to abandon their quarrelsome ways. He was later slandered by some ill-doer, and died in prison in Hepu. -HHS 37/27:1259-60*, XC 2: 2a.

The given name of this man appears as Ye 曄 in HHS 37/27, and this is the accepted reading. Xie Cheng, however, has Yan 嚴 and commentary to DGHJ 16:5a has Yu 煜. Both 曄 and 煜 have the meaning of a bright light, and the DGHJ edition has evidently chosen to avoid taboo. See also sub Fan Ye.

Huan Yong 桓雍; Pei. Eldest son of Huan Rong, in 57 Huan Yong was appointed a gentleman cadet by Emperor Ming in honour of his father. He died a year or so later. -HHS 37/27:1251-52.

Huan Yu 桓郁 [Zhong'en 仲恩] (d.93); Pei. Second son of Huan Rong, in 57 Huan Yu was appointed a gentleman cadet by Emperor Ming in honour of his father, and when Huan Rong died about 60 he was granted the succession to his secondary marquisate. He sought to renounce the title in favour of his nephew Huan Fan, son of his deceased elder brother Yong, but Emperor Ming would not agree, and he treated Huan Yu with great favour as the son of his former teacher.

Huan Yu continued his father's tradition as a scholar in the Ouyang tradition of the Classic of History; he was regularly consulted on the classics and on matters of government. He further abridged the work of his father, who had reduced the commentary of Zhu Pu from 400,000 to 230,000 words. Huan Yu's compilation contained 120,000 characters and, since he later held the same ministerial post as his father, the editions were known as the "Greater and Lesser Commentaries of the Masters of Ceremonies the Lords Huan" 桓君大小太常章句.

In 71 Huan Yu was appointed a Consultant and then a Palace Attendant, in which capacity he edited the Wujia yaoshuo zhangju 五家要說章句, formally and nominally compiled by Emperor Ming. The work was placed in the main library of the Northern Palace [see Note below], and soon afterwards Huan Yu received supplementary appointment as General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger.

In 72 Huan Yu was named tutor for the classics to the Heir Liu Da, future Emperor Zhang, and was transferred to be a colonel of the Northern Army. He was treated with great respect by all the imperial family, and his advice was taken on several occasions.

As Liu Da came to the throne in 75 Huan Yu's mother died. At this time senior officials were not permitted to take leave for mourning, so he sought leave to retire. Instead, however, he was made a Palace Attendant for the mourning period, and in 77 he was again appointed a colonel in the Northern Army. In 79 Huan Yu took part in the imperial conference on Confucianism called by Emperor Zhang and held in the White Tiger Hall.

When the young Emperor He succeeded in 88 the Dowager's brother Dou Xian recommended Huan Yu and Liu Fang as his resident tutors. Huan Yu became Steward of the Changle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager, and on the occasion of a drought in the capital district he was called within the palace to give special lectures to the emperor and the Dowager Dou. He was then re-appointed Palace Attendant, with a sinecure office as Commandant of Equipage.

In 92 Huan Yu was made Minister of Ceremonies, the same post as had been held by his father, but in the following year he became ill and died. Tutor to two emperors, he had been treated with great respect and awarded gifts and pensions amounting to millions of cash. Two of his students, Yang Zhen and Zhu Chong, reached the rank of Excellency. -HHS 37/271254-56*; Bn 76:37, Tjan 49:161.

Note: There is some debate about the origin, nature and even the title of the compilation by Emperor Ming which was edited by Huan Yu. HHS 37/27:1255 mentions the Wujia yaoshuo zhangju 五家要說章句 prepared in 71, but according to the Hou Han shu of Hua Qiao [HQ 1:1a], cited by commentary to that passage, the emperor's work was called Wuxing zhangju 五行章句, being a detailed commentary on the Five Powers. DGHJ, however, mentions two works: at 2:2a we are told that on the first occasion of his discussion of the classics in the Hall of the Circular Moat in 59 [see sub Huan Rong], Emperor Ming compiled Wuxing zhangju; at 16:4b, the biography of Huan Yu, we are told that he issued the Wujia yaoshuo zhangju 五家要說章句. The one may thus be seen as a continuation of the other, and the full title of the final version was probably Wu[xing]jia yaoshuo zhangju 五行家要說章句 "Detailed Commentary to Major Points of the Tradition of the Five Powers."

As Huan Yu and Huan Rong were both scholars of the New Text Classic of History, Hou Kang and Yao Zhenzong have catalogued the work in that section of their bibliographies. It seems probable that the text was centred on the Hong fan 洪範 chapter, the locus classicus for Five Powers theory, which emphasised the central role of the emperor in the cosmos and so justified his authority, while noting the importance of portents as warnings to him from Heaven [Nylan 92]. Though the work may have been thus formally restricted to the Classic of History, it in fact represented a broad interpretation of the spiritual and physical nature of the empire.

We may further note that the edict of Emperor Zhang in 79, giving instructions for the Discussions in the White Tiger Hall, refers to a proposal made to Emperor Ming by the scholar Fan Shu in 58: that Academicians should be convened to determine the meaning of the classics. The edict is translated by Tjan 49:6, and at 158 Tjan argues that the White Tiger Discussions were of a different nature to those held by Emperor Ming.

Given that Emperor Ming had been urged to hold discussions to settle disputed points in the classics, and that he is known to have held expository sessions at the time of the annual ceremonies in the Hall of the Circular Moat, we may suggest this scenario: Following the proposal of Fan Shu in 58, the emperor arranged a series of discussions on the five Confucian classics by his senior academic advisers. Based upon their research, he took the occasions of the formal exegeses at the Hall of the Circular Moat to announce their findings. The program began at the first ceremony in 59 and was maintained for several years. Huan Yu then edited the material, and the work, a general philosophical and political survey based upon the Hong fan chapter of the History, approved by New Text scholars and promulgated by the emperor, was placed in the library at the palace.

If this is so, then the work carried out under the active patronage of Emperor Ming is comparable to that of Emperor Zhang's great conference in the White Tiger Hall, with two differences. Firstly, though Tjan suggests that Emperor Ming may have held one meeting in 58, he in fact carried out his study from 59 through the 60s; his successor held a single long meeting. Secondly, Emperor Ming, following the policy of his father Guangwu, was strongly committed to the New Text; while Emperor Zhang was attempting, albeit unsuccessfully, to challenge some aspects of that tradition. The White Tiger Discussions proved far more influential, for they were concerned with the general philosophy of the Confucian tradition, and the work of Emperor Ming was over-shadowed by the later compilation, but the general intention of the two rulers was similar, however, and Huan Yu's contribution was analogous to that of Ban Gu in 79. Huan Yu 桓虞 [Zhongchun 仲春 or Bochun 伯春]; Zuopingyi. Formerly a magistrate in Lu, Huan Yu left office to care for his aged parents, but returned to the imperial service after they died. He held senior office in the Secretariat was then Administrator of Nanyang, where his firm but clear government was greatly admired. In 79 Huan Yu was brought to that capital as Excellency over the Masses.

In 85 Meng Yun the Administrator of Wuwei reported that the Southern Shanyu, dependent of Han, had sent raiding parties to attack traders from the Northern Xiongnu. The initial consensus at court was that the southern allies should be allowed to keep their booty, but the minister Yuan An argued that the moral authority of the empire required the agreement for peaceful trade be honoured. Huan Yu was persuaded to support him, and there followed fierce debate: at one point the Grand Commandant Zheng Hong shouted at Huan Yu that "Anyone who says we should hand back the captives is a traitor!" Huan Yu responded in kind, and several other officials lost their tempers. The Director of Retainers reported all of them for lese-majesty, and the disputants apologised and offered their resignations.

The emperor finally decided that the government would purchase the prisoners from the southerners, restore them to their own people, and pay blood-money for any who had been killed. The peace party was thus largely successful, but in the longer term the supporters of the Southern Xiongnu had the advantage. Even the agreement to pay ransom meant that aggression was rewarded, and over the following years, as the Northern Xiongnu became weaker the attacks on their trade-routes continued.

Huan Yu left the position of Excellency in 87, but was later Minister of the Household -HHS 3:137, 156, 45/35:1519, DGHJ 18:2a, HHJ 11:141; deC 84:263.

Huan Yuanjiang 桓元將. In Jing province in 208 he gave Wang Lang news of Xu Jing in Yi province. -SGZ Shu 8:968.

Huan Yuanqing 桓元卿; Pei. A kinsman of Huan Rong, when they were both young and poor he scoffed at Huan Rong for his devotion to learning and instead concentrated on farming. Later, when Huan Rong became Minister of Ceremonies, he came to call upon him and admired the rank and honour he had achieved. -HHS 37/27:1253.

Huan [Yudu] 環玉都; Pengcheng. When Liu Ju fell out with the General-in-Chief Liang Ji in the 150s, he went for shelter to his friend Huan Yudu. Huan Yudu agreed, but then became nervous and went away himself, while the people of his household neglected their guest. After a year, however, Liu Ju was restored to favour and high office, and Huan Yudu was embarrassed and ashamed. -FSTY 7:55.

Huan [Zhanzhong] 桓弄終 (d.139); Pengcheng. When Huan Zhanzhong died, his two brothers, one with the style Wenshan 文山 and the other recorded with only the second character of his style, shan 山, constructed a hall 食堂 in his memory. The work was completed in 141. -Nagata 94:84 [includes a rubbing of the decoration of the building].

Huan Zhao 桓超; Changsha. During the mid-second century Huan Zhao was a provincial Inspector and an Administrator. -SGZ 22:631.

Huang 黃, the Lady I; Nan. Elder daughter of Huang II and sister of Huang III, the Lady married Hu Chong and bore him the future Excellency Hu Guang and his brother Hu Kang. She died soon afterwards, and the children were brought up by her younger sister Huang Lieying. -Cai 4:4.

Huang 黃, the Lady II; Jiangxia. During the time of Emperor Ling the Lady went to bathe, but turned into a tortoise. The tortoise lived in a deep pool, but when it emerged it could be recognised as the Lady Huang because it still wore her silver hair ornaments. -HHS 107/17:3348.

Huang 黃 I [personal name unknown]; Nan. Grandfather of the Lady Huang Lieying, wife of the future Excellency Hu Guang, his father had been head of a commandery under Wang Mang. About the middle of the first century this man was magistrate of Panyu in Nanhai, present-day Guangzhou. -Cai 4:5.

Huang 黃 II [personal name unknown]; Nan. In the second half of the first century this man was Registrar of the commandery and acted for a time as Administrator. He had three children: the Lady Huang, mother of the future Excellency Hu Guang and his brother Hu Kang; her sister the Lady Huang Lieying, who became their step-mother; and a son who became Inspector of Yu province. -Cai 4:4.

Huang 黃 III [personal name unknown]; Nan. Son of Huang II, in the second half of the first century he was Inspector of Yu province. -Cai 4:4.

Huang Ang 黃昂; Jiuquan. Member of a powerful local clan, about 210 his relatives were attacked and slaughtered by the Administrator Xu Yi. Huang Ang escaped the massacre and, using family resources to raise an army of a thousand men, he attacked Xu Yi's capital and killed him. Soon afterwards Huang Ang in turn was killed by Yang Feng. -SGZ 18:547 & 552-53.

Huang Bing 黃秉; Qinghe. Senior local officers of the commandery in 26, Huang Bing and Liu Shi planned to embezzle funds for the building of a new yamen. As the angry ghost of the former Administrator Xianyu Ji came to confront them, both men dropped dead. -SJZ 9:27b-28a.

Huang Bo 黃帛, the Lady; Jianwei. The Lady's husband Zhang Zhen travelled to study but was drowned. His brother searched, but could not find the body. Then the Lady Huang went, and when she too had no success she threw herself into the river at the head of the rapids where he had disappeared. Everyone was concerned, but fourteen days later she emerged at the foot of the rapids with the hand of her late husband. [The text is not specific, but one suspects the Lady was dead.]

People compared the devotion of the Lady Huang to that of the Lady Xian Luo in a neighbouring county, and the magistrate Han Ziran appointed her son to a local office. -HYGZ 10B:161, SJZ 33:10b quoting Yibu qijiu zhuan. HYGZ 3:41 refers to the Lady by the Zhang surname.

Huang Chang 黃昌 [Shengzhen 聖真]; Kuaiji. A young man of humble family, Huang Chang lived near a school, and when he saw the respect that was shown to learning he embarked on classical scholarship. He also studied law and literature and became Officer for Legal Matters 決曹 in the commandery. The provincial Inspector admired him and appointed him to his staff.

Huang Chang was later magistrate in Wan, capital of Nanyang. He ruled firmly, and took pleasure in discovering wrong-doers. When someone stole the canopy from his official carriage he at first said nothing about it, but then sent one of his trusted retainers to the house of his Officer for Criminals 賊曹, and there they found the canopy. Huang Chang had the whole household arrested and executed. Even the leading families were frightened, and everyone praised his powers of deduction.

Because of his ability, the court appointed Huang Chang Administrator of Shu. His predecessor Li Gen had run a lax regime and the people had become unruly. As soon as he arrived Huang Chang settled a great number of law cases, then used an informant to discover and deal with wrong-doers in every county. Criminals fled to other jurisdictions.

At this time there occurred a remarkable reunion. When he was a junior official in Yang province Huang Chang's wife the Lady Dai had been kidnapped, taken to Shu, and married to someone else. Her son was later arrested for a crime and was brought before Huang Chang, now Administrator. Huang Chang suspected that the mother of the accused was not native to the region and asked her about it. She told her story, and confirmed it by describing a hidden birthmark on Huang Chang's foot. Huang Chang took the Lady back and gave her preference in the household above his later wife.

After four years Huang Chang was recalled and appointed Chancellor of Chen. The powerful Peng family had constructed a great house by the road, and the Lady Peng would climb the tower and stare at him each time he came out of his yamen. Huang Chang took offence at this, so he had the members of the family arrested and killed.

In 140, after further appointments in Henei and Yingchuan, Huang Chang became Court Architect, with charge of convict labourers. In 142 he was made Minister of Finance but was later transferred to be a Palace Counsellor. He died in that office. Fan Ye classified Huang Chang as a Stern Official 酷吏. -HHS 77/67:2496-97*, XC 5:7a-7b, FSTY 3f:104.

Huang Chang 黃閭; Ba. As a local officer in 154, Huang Chang joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree. -HYGZ 1:5.

Huang Chang 黃長. A stele of 173 from the region of Shu commandery tells how Huang Chang, Zhang Pu and four other Libationers of the Rice Magicians 米巫祭酒 received a mysterious text. These men were evidently members of an early form of the Rice Sect which was later led by Zhang Lu. -LX 3:8a-9a cited by Qian Daxin in HHSJJ 75/65:2689 jiaobu.

Huang Cuo 黃鈞; Ba. An elderly scholar in retirement, about 120 Huang Cuo was recommended to the Administrator Wang Tang. Some years later Huang Qiong commended him to the young Emperor Shun, and Huang Cuo was invited to court. Nothing further is heard of him, but we are told that all Wang Tang's nominees rose to high office. -HYGZ 1:5, HHS 61/51:2033.

Huang Dang 黃黨. An Imperial Clerk under the Gengshi Emperor, in 24 Huang Dang was sent with the Staff of Authority to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, at that time a commissioner in the north. He was to enfeoff Liu Xiu as King of Xiao county in Pei, on condition that he disband his troops and return to the capital. Liu Xiu accepted the title but refused to demobilise. -HHS 1:15, XHS 1:1b.

This may be the same man as Huang Dang 黃讜 the later Administrator in the southeast.

Huang Dang 黃讜; Runan. Administrator of Kuaiji for Emperor Guangwu in the late 20s, Huang Dang appointed the scholar Bao Xian to his staff, and asked him to come and teach his sons. Bao Xian told him that students should attend the teacher, not the other way round, so Huang Dang sent his sons to him.

Concerned to recruit men of ability, Huang Dang appointed Li Shou as his Officer of Merit, with instructions to find good candidates for office, and he had the Investigator Zhongli Yi act as a brevet magistrate. -HHS 79/69B:2570, HHSJJ 41/31:1492 Hui Dong, 79/69B:2847 jiaobu quoting Hou Kang.

This may be the same man as Huang Dang 黃黨 the former officer of the Gengshi Emperor.

Huang Fang 黃防. In 25 the officer Feng Yin, left in garrison in Youfufeng by Emperor Guangwu's general Deng Yu, killed his associate Zong Xin and turned against Deng Yu. When Deng Yu sent a messenger to the court for advice, the emperor asked the name of Feng Yin's favourite officer. Told that it was Huang Fang, responsible for discipline in the army, Guangwu felt confident the two men could not remain in agreement for long. He advised Deng Yu that Huang Fang would deliver Feng Yin into his hands, and Deng Yu sent Zong Guang, an officer of the Imperial Secretariat, with the Staff of Authority to invite the rebels to surrender. A few weeks later, as the troops returned from Anding after their defeat by the warlord Wei Ao, Huang Fang arrested Feng Yin and surrendered himself. -HHS 16/6:604.

Huang Feng 黃奉 see Huang Gong 黃恭.

Huang Fu 黃浮 [Yin'gong 隱公]; Runan. When aged about twenty, Huang Fu was a junior local officer, but he left that position and travelled to study at the capital. After some years he gained a junior post in the Imperial Secretariat, and because of his good work he was appointed as a county magistrate in Donghai. He gained a reputation there as a wise and firm official.

In the middle 160s Huang Fu was Chancellor of Donghai. The eunuch relative Xu Xuan was magistrate of Xiapi and ruled with the utmost ferocity. He asked to marry a daughter of the former official Li Gao, but was refused. Xu Xuan brought official troops to Li Gao's house, kidnapped the young woman, and shot and killed her for the fun of it.

Though the county of Xiapi was chief of the commandery of that name, we are told that it was at that time subject to the administrative authority of Donghai. Huang Fu arrested Xu Xuan and all members of his household, examining them by torture regardless of their age. His junior officers objected, but Huang Fu replied that Xu Xuan was a public menace, and that it was his duty to eliminate him regardless of the consequences. He had Xu Xuan executed and displayed the corpse.

The eunuchs made formal complaint to Emperor Huan, and Huang Fu was arrested. He was sentenced to have his head shaved, be manacled about the neck, and sent to convict labour. The case of Huang Fu was associated with those of Cheng Jin and Liu Zhi, administrators of Nanyang and Taiyuan, who had killed guilty men under amnesty, and with that of Zhai Chao in Shanyang, who attacked the property of the powerful eunuch Hou Lan. There was great interest among the reform party at the capital, and the Grand Commandant Chen Fan presented arguments in their favour. Such incidents are evidence of a general lack of order in the provinces of the empire, while Emperor Huan's insistence on punishing these officials damaged the relationship between his imperial court and the administration which should serve it. -HHS 78/68: 2521-22 & JJ at 2765, 66/56:2164-65; deC 89:71-73.

Huang Gai 黃蓋 [Gongfu 公覆]; Lingling. Huang Gai's family claimed descent from Huang Zilian of Yingchuan, sometime Administrator of Nanyang, by a cadet branch which had migrated to the south. When Huang Gai was young he was orphaned and was very poor, but he became a local officer in his commandery, was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and was appointed to the offices at the capital. In 187 he joined Sun Jian, Administrator of Changsha, and became a senior major.

After Sun Jian's death, he served Sun Ce and then Sun Quan, specialising in the colonisation of non-Chinese people and their territories and serving in several marginal counties. Popular with his troops, he paid chief attention to military affairs and appointed senior clerks to deal with civil matters; when two of them tried to cheat, he found out and killed them. He later became Commandant of Danyang.

In 208 Huang Gai was with Zhou Yu at the Red Cliffs. He was wounded and nearly drowned, but then planned and carried out the attack by fire-ships which destroyed Cao Cao's forces. He was promoted General of the Household and went to take over Wuling, where he settled the non-Chinese people of the hills and marshes. He put down trouble in neighbouring Changsha and was named a lieutenant-general, but died of illness soon afterwards.

People mourned him and offered sacrifices to his portrait, and when Sun Quan took the imperial title in 229 he enfeoffed Huang Gai's son Bing 柄 in memory of his father's service. *-SGZ Wu 10:1284-85.

Huang Gai 黃蓋; Nanhai. Administrator of Rinan at the end of Han, Huang Gai killed his Registrar because he had failed to make suitable preparations for his arrival at his post. He was driven out by his own people. -SGZ Wu 8:1252.

Given that the name is the same, that Lingling and Nanhai were both commanderies in the far south, and that both held commandery office in the south, this story could refer to Huang Gai in the entry above. On the other hand Xue Zong, who tells of the incident in Rinan, was a contemporary and should have known the difference, while modern commentators are sure there were two men of that name: SGZJJ Wu 8:14b.

Huang Gang 黃綱; Yingchuan. Huang Gang was a close associate of the Lady Cheng, who was the adopted daughter of the senior eunuch Cheng Huang II, and was a favourite of Emperor Ling. Relying upon her influence, about 180 Huang Gang sought an area of public wilderness to create a private park. On the advice of his officer Liu Yi, the Administrator Chong Fu rejected the proposal. -HHS 81/71:2695.

Huang Gao 黃高?; Wuling. FSTY 9:75; Nylan 83:549 refers to Huang Gao of Wuling as the leader of the non-Chinese rebellion which attacked Nan commandery in the early 160s. The troubles were settled by the general Feng Gun. LS 7:13b refers to the rebel leaders Huang Jiashao 黃加少 and Gao Xiang 高相; the name Huang Gao may represent a combination of those two.

Huang Gong 黃恭 or Huang Feng 奉. A magistrate in Liang, Huang Gong suffered a false accusation, but was fiercely defended by his Officer of Merit Che Zhang. -XC 7:13a.

Huang Guang 黃廣. In 123 Huang Guang was an Academician at the Imperial University. In debate at the court of Emperor An on a proposal to change the calendar, Huang Guang and Ren Qian argued for returning to a system of calculating lunar eclipses, based upon the course of the moon, which had been used in the past. Zhou Xing and Zhang Heng argued that the current system was more accurate, others supported them, and no change was made. -HHS 92/2:3034 and see sub Zhou Xing.

Huang Guo 黃國; Linhuai/Xiapi. During the 70s Huang Guo was Registrar of the commandery. When a white deer appeared on the road in front of the carriage of the Administrator Zheng Hong, Huang Guo foretold that this was a sign Zheng Hong would become an Excellency. -HHS 33/23:1158.

Huang Hu 黃虎 see Yellow Tiger 黃虎.

Huang Hua 黃華; Jiuquan. Member of a local family and a kinsman of Huang Ang, from about 210 Huang Hua established himself as a warlord in the east of Jiuquan. In 220 he proclaimed himself Administrator and joined Zhang Jin of Zhangye in an alliance to reject the authority of Han/Wei. As Zhang Jin was killed by Su Ze, Huang Hua surrendered. -SGZ 2:59, 15: 474, 16:492; Fang 52:5-7.

In 251 Huang Hua the Inspector of Yan province was invited to join a conspiracy against Sima Yi, but revealed the plan and was rewarded with enfeoffment. It is unlikely this is the same man. -SGZ 28:758-59; Fang 65:82.

Huang Jiashao 黃加少; non-Chinese of Wuling. A leader of rebels in 162, Huang Jiashao and other chieftains surrendered to the great imperial army led by Feng Gun. -LS 7:13b. See also sub Huang Gao and Gao Xiang.

Huang Jing 黃競. Administrator of Kuaiji in the 80s, Huang Jing nominated Xu Jing as Filial and Incorrupt. -HHS 76/66:2472.

Huang Jing 黃景. A Consultant at the court of Emperor Shun, in 136 he was commissioned with Fu Wuji to work, probably as cataloguers, on the imperial collections of Confucian classics, philosophical and other writings.

At the beginning of the reign of Emperor Huan, about 151, another edict ordered Fu Wuji, Huang Jing, Cui Shi and others to commence work in the Eastern Pavilion 東觀 on a third instalment of Han ji, official history of the Later Han dynasty, known later as Dongguan Hanji. The compilation included annals, tables of kings, marquises and officials, accounts of the Xiongnu and the Qiang, while Fu Wuji and Huang Jing also compiled a Treatise of Geography 地理志, which was edited by Sima Biao to compose the Treatise of Administrative Geography 郡國志 for his Xu Han shu. -HHS 26/16:898; Bn 54:11, MBeck 90: 19-27, 129-130, 187-189.

Huang Jiu 黃就; Liang. A county magistrate in Anping as the Governor Jia Cong came to Ji province in 187, Huang Jiu was one of the few officials prepared to remain in their posts and withstand the reformer's scrutiny. -HHS 31/21:1112.

Huang Jun 黃儁. In 159 Huang Jun was Director of the Imperial Secretariat. Emperor Huan wanted to make him a marquis in order to continue a fief once held by a different branch of his family. The Minister of the Household Chen Fan objected, and Huang Jun received only a secondary fief.

After the general Feng Gun returned from his campaign in the south in 162, his subordinate Zhang Chang accused him of having taken two female slaves with him in military garb, and also of having a stele carved to record his achievements. Zhang Chang asked the matter be investigated, but Huang Jun argued that the offences were not specified by the codes, so there was no occasion for a formal enquiry. -HHS 66/56:2181, 38/28:1281; deC 89:23.

Huang Jun 黃雋; Jiuquan. Formerly an Administrator of Wuwei, at the time of the Yellow Turban rebellion in 184 Huang Jun was ordered to raise troops to aid the imperial forces. When he arrived late, the Inspector Liang Gu was going to recommend that he be executed. Liang Gu's adviser He Xun spoke for Huang Jun, and Liang Gu took no action. Huang Jun offered He Xun a present of gold, but He Xun replied that he had argued on legal principles; he was angry if anyone thought his opinion could be purchased. -HHS 58/48:1880.

The Kyoto Index identifies this man with the preceding, but some texts present the characters of the personal name differently, and the appointments and dates of the two men do not match. On the other hand, another very similar story is also told about He Xun, so this second incident is questionable.

Huang Kuang 黃況; Jiangxia. Probably during the 70s, Huang Kuang held local appointment in the commandery office. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he became a county magistrate in Nanyang.

The family was poor, with no slaves or servants, but Huang Kuang's son Huang Xiang studied diligently, joined the Imperial Secretariat and became an influential officer of Emperor He.

Huang Kuang died in the middle 80s. -DGHJ 19: 6a, HHS 80/70A:2615.

Huang Lang 黃朗 [Wenta 文達]; Pei. A man of spirit and ambition, though his father was only a trooper in the local county office, Huang Lang travelled for education, and he became respected by the leading men of the region. He was a particular friend of Wang Huiyang of Dongping, who treated Huang Lang's mother with the same courtesy as his own.

Having held his first appointment under Cao Pi,

Huang Lang rose to be a commandery Administrator. Remembering his own humble origins, he was always polite to his subordinates, addressing them by their full names. He died about 230. -SGZ 23:676.

Huang [Lieying] 黃列羸, the Lady (79-169); Nan. The Lady Huang's family had held senior office, and the family had local consequence: her grandfather had been a county magistrate, her father was commandery Registrar, acting for a time as Administrator, and her brother became Inspector of Yu province.

The Lady's elder sister was married to Hu Chong and bore him two sons, Hu Guang and Hu Kang. She died soon afterwards, and Hu Chong took the twelve-year-old Huang Lieying as his second wife so that she could care for the children. When he in turn died Huang Lieying arranged the education for both children.

When Hu Guang became an Excellency, the Lady lived with him in his residence until she died at the age of ninety. Hu Guang mourned her deeply, the emperor sent an Internuncio to offer funerary sacrifice, and Cai Yong composed her obituary. -Cai 4:4, HHSJJ 44/34: 1607-08 & 1612 Hui Dong.

Huang Long 黃龍. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Huang Long took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county marquise in Changsha.

In 127, after Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang, he and Huang Long and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in the following year the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital.

Huang Long was later one of a group of eunuchs associated with the former wet-nurse Song E. Found guilty in 137 of corruption and making false accusations, they were all sent out to their fiefs and their pensions were reduced by a quarter. -HHS 78/68: 2516-18.

Huang Long 黃龍 [Yellow Dragon] see Huanglong.

Huang Mu 黃穆 [Zijing 子敬]; Runan. As Registrar of the commandery, Huang Mu dealt excellently with both senior officials and lower ranks and kept good order in the office. The Administrator Jing Yu was going to recommend him as Filial and Incorrupt but Huang Mu objected, saying that his colleague Yin Tao was far more worthy. Claiming to be ill, he returned the nomination and took to his bed. So Jing Yu had to accept his advice.

In 167, as the local hero Fan Pang returned from prison at Luoyang after the First Faction Incident he was met by a crowd of leading local gentry, and Huang Mu and Yin Tao acted as his escorts and attendants. Warning them that their good intentions only added to his danger, Fan Pang went into strict retirement. -HHS 67/57:2206 & JJ at 2415.

Huang Qiong 黃瓊 [Shiyong 世英] (86-164); Jiangxia. Son of Huang Xiang the Director of the Imperial Secretariat, through the ren right of his father Huang Qiong was appointed to the Suite of the Heir, but excused himself on grounds of ill health. Then his father died, but even when the mourning period was ended, though he received invitations from each of the Excellencies to join their offices he steadfastly refused.

In 127 Huang Qiong's name was raised by many senior officials and a special carriage was sent to him and to two other celebrated hermits, He Chun and Yang Hou. As Huang Qiong was on the road he again pleaded illness and refused to go on. This time he was threatened with a charge of Disrespect and was obliged to proceed. Li Gu, who had encouraged the emperor to call such talented men to join him, also wrote to Huang Qiong, urging him to serve, and arguing that he had a duty to demonstrate his ability and put paid to claims that hermit scholars were charlatans. So Huang Qiong came to court. He was appointed a Consultant and then succeeded Yu Xu as Deputy Director of the Secretariat.

In this position Huang Qiong presented three major memorials. The first observed the great number of portents which had appeared lately, and urged that the Stone House should be opened. This library had been founded by Emperor Guangwu to hold the works of apocrypha which he had proclaimed as canonical [Bn 79:197], and no doubt also held the records of previous omens. Huang Qiong proposed that the patterns of omens since the beginning of the dynasty should be compared with those of recent years and used as a guide to future policies. Given the opportunity for interpretation by the officers responsible for such a project, there was strong potential to influence imperial policy by Confucian tenets of the New Text. Huang Qiong also encouraged the emperor to make use of scholars in retirement such as himself, and he recommended Huang Cuo and Ren Tang. Though it is not clear whether the Stone House was opened and the portents collated, Emperor Shun did issue further invitations.

In the following year there was drought, and Huang Qiong took the occasion to encourage the emperor to avoid wasteful expenditure on luxury goods, to consult regularly with the Excellencies and Ministers, and with good Confucian scholars. Soon afterwards, in a third memorial, he noted that the emperor had not yet carried out the Ploughing 籍 ritual, due to take place each spring. Huang Qiong encouraged him to do so, and his advice may be seen as an attempt to have the young ruler involve himself not only in the ceremonial duties of his office but also in his wider responsibilities of state.

In all these presentations, like Yu Xu and Zuo Xiong before him, Huang Qiong may be seen as attempting to consolidate the interests of Confucian officials in the bureaucracy, and persuading the ruler to consult with his regular senior ministers rather than with his personal favourites within the palace. It is said that his comments were well received, but it is less certain that they had any great effect.

In 134 Huang Qiong succeeded Zuo Xiong as Director of the Secretariat. Under reforms introduced by Zuo Xiong, men who were nominated Filial and Incorrupt were supposed to be forty years of age and qualified either for their Confucian Scholarship 儒學 or their Literary Ability 文吏. As many failed such tests, it appears there was a shortage of recruits. Huang Qiong suggested two further categories [ke 科] be added: Filial and Fraternal Affection 孝悌 and Able to Deal in Affairs of State 能從政者. This was eventually agreed, and while the new criteria provided a balance of morality against technical ability, they were also more difficult to assess and thus perhaps easier to satisfy.

Zuo Xiong had also provided that candidates should be examined by the Excellencies and then by the Secretariat. Zhang Sheng, a member of that office, suggested that the second test might be abolished, but Huang Qiong argued its value and no change was made.

In 136 the elder statesman Yu Xu took over as Director of the Secretariat, while Huang Qiong was sent out as Administrator of Wei commandery. It appears that he retired from office some time later, for a memorial from the reformer Li Gu in 143 appears to suggest that he was no longer in service and urged that he be given substantial office.

In the mid-140s Huang Qiong was Steward of the Changle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager Liang, and in that office he supported the candidacy of Liu Suan the King of Qinghe, against those of the youthful Liu Zuan, Emperor Zhi, and then of Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan [FSTY 3:22]. His opposition to the interests of the Liang family may have brought a temporary eclipse, but by 150 he was Minister of Ceremonies, with special access to the private apartments of the palace, and in 151 he was promoted Excellency of Works.

A few months later there was a proposal to grant Liang Ji extraordinary honours. It was supported by Hu Guang and other senior officials, who compared him to the legendary Duke of Zhou 周公, but Huang Qiong argued that Liang Ji was not so special and that he might rather be compared to Deng Zhi, brother of the regent Dowager who had ruled for Emperor An. The parallel was not complimentary, for the Dowager had held power longer than she should, Deng Zhi had held limited authority, and the family had come to a sad end, but the court accepted Huang Qiong's argument. Liang Ji was predictably angry, and soon afterwards an earthquake gave him occasion to have Huang Qiong dismissed.

In 153 Huang Qiong was again promoted to Excellency over the Masses, and in the following year he succeeded Hu Guang as Grand Commandant. He regularly defied Liang Ji, and refused to appoint any men that he recommended, even those of good quality. In 158 he left office on account of an eclipse and became Minister of Finance, but in the following year Liang Ji was destroyed by Emperor Huan and the eunuchs; all three Excellencies were dismissed for collusion and Huang Qiong was re-appointed Grand Commandant. He was offered a marquiseate, but refused.

Huang Qiong recommended a number of men who had suffered for their opposition to the Liang group, and so gained support for the changed regime. As Zuo Guan, Xu Huang and other eunuch favourites of the emperor displayed increasing power, however, Huang Qiong found that he was unable to deal with the situation. Claiming to be ill, he retired to bed, and left office in 161. He was briefly restored as Excellency of Works, but quit for good in the autumn.

In 164 Huang Qiong presented a last memorial, warning the emperor of the danger to his dynasty from his lack of discrimination, the influence of the eunuchs and his rejection of loyal officials. Huang Qiong died early that year at the age of seventy-nine, and was granted posthumous honours as General of Chariots and Cavalry and title as a marquis. In 177 Emperor Ling ordered that his portrait and that of Hu Guang be painted in the inner apartments of the palace.

It is notable that Huang Qiong was able to oppose the Liang family on several significant matters, but that he appears to have suffered only minor set-backs for doing so. -HHS 61/51:2032-38*; Vervorm 90:161-162.

Huang Quan 黃權 [Gongheng 公衡] (d.240); Ba. A junior officer in his commandery when he was young, Huang Quan became Registrar to Liu Zhang the warlord Governor of Yi province. In 211, when Zhang Song urged Liu Zhang to invite Liu Bei to come and assist him, Huang Quan opposed the idea, without success.

Soon afterwards Huang Quan was sent out as a county magistrate in Guanghan. As Liu Bei turned against Liu Zhang he sent his troops to demand that all local officials acknowledge his authority. Unlike his colleagues, Huang Quan held out until Liu Zhang surrendered, but then accepted appointment under Liu Bei and became one of his senior officers.

In 215 Huang Quan warned Liu Bei of the danger that the fall of Hanzhong presented to the security of Ba commandery, and Liu Bei sent him north as Protector of the Army to invite Zhang Lu. Zhang Lu had already surrendered to Cao Cao, but Huang Quan attacked and drove away the non-Chinese chieftains Fuhu, Duhu and Yuan Yue, whom Cao Cao had named as administrators in Ba.

When Liu Bei took title as King of Hanzhong in 219, he named Huang Quan as his Headquarters Officer for Yi province, which he kept under his personal control. Following the abdication of Emperor Xian of Han in 220 Huang Quan, now ranked as a lieutenant-general, joined a petition which cited various works of divination and urged Liu Bei to claim the imperial title.

In 222 Huang Quan warned of the dangers of the attack down the Yangzi against Wu, though he asked nonetheless to command the van. He was instead given charge of the northern flank against Wei, and as Liu Bei's main army was destroyed Huang Quan was isolated and forced to surrender. He was received with honour by Cao Pi, and later became titular Governor of Yi province, a general of Excellency rank at the court of Wei, and was enfeoffed as a marquis.

Liu Bei accepted that he had left Huang Quan isolated, and did not punish his family. One son, Huang Yong 邕, had accompanied Huang Quan to Wei and later succeeded to his marquisate; another, Huang Chong 崇, became a senior official in Shu. -SGZ Shu 13:1043-44*; deC 96:429-430, 473, Fang 52:98-105.

Huang Rang 黃穰; Lujiang. A local bandit about 180, he combined forces with non-Chinese of Jiangxia to trouble the border region for almost ten years. At one time he claimed ten thousand followers and occupied four counties, but about 188 Lu Kang was sent as Administrator to Lujiang and settled the disturbance. -HHS 31/21:1114, 86/76:2841.

Huang Shang 黃尚 or Huang Xiang 向 [Bohe 伯河]; Nan. Formerly Director of Retainers, in 133 Huang Shang was Minister of Finance when the reformer Li Gu was attacked by the Lady Song E and the palace eunuchs. Huang Shang spoke to the General-in-Chief Liang Shang on his behalf.

In 134 Huang Shang was promoted to Excellency over the Masses. He left that office in 138. -HHS 6: 264-68, 61/51:2027-28, 63/53:2078.

Huang Shao 黃邵 (d.196); Runan. Leaders of Yellow Turbans, during the early 190s Huang Shao and his fellows allied themselves with Yuan Shu and Sun Jian. By the middle 190s their troops were numbered by the tens of thousands, but in the spring of 196 Cao Cao led an army against them. Huang Shao was killed and the other leaders surrendered. -SGZ 1:13.

Huang She 黃射 or Huang Yi (d.199). Eldest son of Huang Zu, Huang She became Administrator of Zhangling in the service of Liu Biao.

In 199 Huang She was sent to assist Liu Xun against Sun Ce on the Yangzi by the Pengli 彭蠡 lake and marshes, the region of the present-day Poyang Lake in Jiangxi. The army was defeated and Huang She was killed. -SGZ Wu 1:1108; deC 90:190.

Huang Tuo 黃他; Kuaiji. Formerly a junior county officer, in the early 190s Huang Tuo was listed by Yu Fan among those who had risked their lives in battle to protect their senior official. -SGZ Wu 12:1325.

Huang Tu 荒秃 or Dongshan Huangtu 東山荒秃/Huang Tu from the Eastern Hills [the name may refer to his baldness]. Probably from the south of the Shandong hills, he became a leader of the Bronze Horse bandits on the North China plain. Since the other named leader of the group is Shanghuai Kuang, who evidently came from the region of the upper Huai River in the hill country of the Dabie Shan, it appears that the Bronze Horses must have been formed from at least two other bands which arose separately.

In the autumn of 24 the Bronze Horse group and others were defeated in Julu by the forces of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who pursued them into Wei commandery, where they surrendered. Huang Tu and other chieftains were enfeoffed as marquises, while their troops were incorporated into Liu Xiu's army. - HHS 1A:16-17; Bn 59:79-83.

Huang Wan 黄琬 [Ziyan 子琰 or Gongyan 公琰] (141-192); Jiangxia. Huang Wan's parents died when he was young and he was raised in the household of his grandfather Huang Qiong, who was impressed by his quick thinking and wit. When Huang Qiong became Excellency over the Masses in 153, Huang Wan was twelve years old. As the grandson of an Excellency, he was entitled to become a Junior Gentleman 童子朗, a post which offered early entrance to probation for a commission in the civil service. Huang Wan refused on grounds of illness, and he became known throughout the capital for his modesty and restraint.

About 163 Huang Wan became General of the Gentlemen of the Household for All Purposes, senior of the commanders of gentlemen cadets who had been nominated for office by their local authorities and were under probation. According to the established system, the Minister of the Household had the power to promote some cadets as Abundant Talent, which gave immediate entrance to the commissioned bureaucracy. The system had become so corrupted by favour to powerful families, however, that it was a scandal and a joke. Huang Wan and the minister Chen Fan now recognised talents, not connections, and several good men were promoted. In the process they offended many people of influence, and their opponents had the matter referred to the Imperial Censorate. The officers there, Wang Chang and Diao Wei, admired the initiative and took no action, but then all involved were accused of faction: Wang Chang was demoted, Chen Fan was dismissed, and Huang Wan and Diao Wei were proscribed from office altogether.

Huang Wan remained in disgrace for twenty years, but in the early 180s, with the support of Yang Ci he became Inspector of Jing province and then Palace Attendant. About 184 he was head of Youfufeng, returned to the capital as Court Architect, and was then Minister Steward and Minister Coachman. In 188, as offices were being sold in increasing numbers because of the emergency in Liang province, Huang Wan sent in a memorial of protest: though money was certainly needed for the army, corruption of the civil service was even more dangerous for the state.

That year, as the office of Governor was re-established to consolidate power in the provinces, Huang Wan was appointed to Yu province. He put down local disturbances, his administration became a model for the empire, and he was rewarded with a secondary marquise.

As Dong Zhuo seized power in 189, Huang Wan was named Excellency over the Masses to give credit to the new regime. He was soon afterwards appointed Grand Commandant, but he and his colleague Yang Biao were dismissed in 190 when they opposed Dong Zhuo's plan to shift the capital. Huang Wan's reputation was high enough for Dong Zhuo not to harm him; he later made formal apology and was appointed a Household Counsellor.

When the capital was moved to Chang'an Huang Wan became Director of Retainers, and he joined Wang Yun and others in planning to overthrow Dong Zhuo. The plot succeeded in 192, but Wang Yun's government proved arrogant and inept, and the capital fell a few weeks later to the forces of Li Jue and other former officers of Dong Zhuo. They captured Huang Wan and killed him. -HHS 61/51:2039-40*, XC 3:11b-12a.

Huang Wu 黄武 (d.161); Nanyang. In 161 Huang Wu ["Yellow Warfare"?) joined Hui De and Yue Ji in the leadership of a heterodox cult with branches across three counties. They were arrested and executed. -HHS 7:309.

Huang Xian 黄显 (d.22); Nanyang. General of the Household under Wang Mang at Chang'an in 22, Huang Xian was a close friend of Li Shou. When Li Shou's son Li Tong planned rebellion in Nanyang, Li Shou received only very brief warning. Huang Xian suggested that Li Shou be sent to persuade his son to surrender: he undertook to escort him, and guaranteed to kill Li Shou if he failed. Wang Mang was initially prepared to agree, but as further reports came to hand he rejected the proposal and ordered that both Li Shou and Huang Xian be executed. -HHS 15/5:574-75; Bn 54:102-103, QHX:227-228.

Huang Xian 黃憲 [Shudu 叔度]; Runan. Of humble family, his father having been a cow doctor, when he was fourteen years old Huang Xian met Xun Shu at an inn. Xun Shu was enormously impressed by Huang Xian's skill in conversation, halted his journey for several days to keep his company, and praised him to the local gentleman Yuan Lang as a second Yan Hui 顏回, the favourite disciple of Confucius.

Other gentlemen such as Chen Fan and Zhou Ju then took him up, remarking to one another that "If a month goes by without my seeing Huang Xian, a mean spirit stirs once more in my heart," and years later, when Chen Fan was appointed an Excellency in 165 he observed that he would have been ashamed to take the position if Huang Xian were available.

Huang Xian lived a hermit's life. Though he was nominated for office about 150 [see sub Li Chang 俚], we are told that he stayed at Luoyang only briefly before returning home, and he otherwise rejected official contacts. On the other hand, when Guo Tai came to the commandery he called upon both Yuan Lang and Huang Xian; he left Yuan Lang after a few hours, but he stayed with Huang Xian for several days. He explained that Yuan Lang's capacity was like waves of water on the surface, pure but easy to draw upon; Huang Xian, however, was like a vast reservoir, impossible to disturb and hard to fathom.

Huang Xian was seen as an exemplary recluse, his influence was widespread and "his peers all looked up to him as their standard." He died about 165 at the age of forty-eight. Like Yu Cheng and Jiang Gong, who were also called to office but did not accept, he was known as a "Summoned Lord" 徵君. -HHS 53/43:1744-45*, XC 3:1b; Mather 76:537, Vervoorn 90:178-179.

FSTY 5:38 mentions Huang Shudu, presumably Huang Xian, as a nominee of the Administrator Li Zhang, but this passing reference does not seem entirely secure.

Huang Xiang 黃香 [Wenqiang 文彊]; Jiangxia. Huang Xiang was a son of Huang Kuang. His mother died when he was nine, and he was admired by his neighbours for his long display of fervent mourning. The Administrator heard of this and when Huang Xiang was twelve he gave him special appointment in his office as a model filial son and treated him with utmost favour. Though his mother had been the sister of a marquis, his father's family was poor. Huang Xiang refused support, even clothing from his uncle, but devoted himself to scholarship, learned the magical arts, and was a fine literary composer. Even at the capital there was a song about his incomparable devotion and skills, and Emperor Zhang presented him with complete editions of Huainan zi and Mencius.

After service as a gentleman cadet, in 84 Huang Xiang was appointed to the library of the Eastern Pavilion, where he worked on rare and obscure texts. He took leave for a time to care for his father, but when he returned to the capital the emperor himself called him in to meet the kings of the imperial house, praised his abilities, and later discussed policies with him in a private audience.

Huang Xiang then joined the Imperial Secretariat, where he continued to attract Emperor Zhang's admiration for his analysis of affairs; he was equally successful with Emperor He. When the latter was capped in 91 Huang Xiang composed Tianzi guan song 天子冠頌 to hymn the occasion, and after a series of promotions he became Director of the Secretariat in 94. At one time it was proposed that he should become Administrator of Dong commandery, but he sent in an eloquent plea that such responsibility was beyond his capabilities. The emperor sympathised and kept him at the Secretariat, but with a salary of 2,000 shi, comparable to that of an Administrator and double the normal rate for the office, while he also received a donation of 30,000 cash. Henceforth Huang Xiang was at the centre of affairs, regarded with the utmost trust, and as concerned for matters of government as he was for his own family. About 100 he took part in a major debate at court with Jia Kui, Lu Pi and other scholars.

In 100 the governments of Dongping and Qinghe reported that a certain Qing Zhongliao had criticised the court and had as many as a thousand sympathisers. Huang Xiang took charge of the case and resolved it leniently, applying only light penalties to those suspected of involvement and being reluctant to order executions. He dealt similarly with problems on the frontier, maintaining a careful balance between civil administration and military intervention. The emperor recognised his skill and regularly granted favours and rewards, enquiring after his health and sending medicines if he was taken ill.

After the death of Emperor He the regent Dowager

Deng evidently felt the need for independence from such a leader of her late husband's regime, and in 106 Huang Xiang was sent off to be Administrator of Wei. Hitherto there had been a system of government-controlled fields and gardens, producing considerable crops and produce, but in Confucian tradition Huang Xiang objected to the involvement of officials in agriculture which should be the preserve of peasant farmers. He distributed the fields among the people.

When widespread flooding caused the harvest to fail, and people were starving, Huang Xiang gave his own money to relieve the poor, and his example encouraged wealthy families to follow suit and join the government relief efforts. Many were saved, but because of the floods Huang Xiang was dismissed. He died at home a few months later.

Besides his official career, Huang Xiang was also a noted literary figure, leaving five pian of rhapsodies, including Jiugong fu 九宮賦 on the Nine Palaces, together with hymns, letters and various documents. -HHS 80/70A:2613-15*, DGHJ 19:6a, XC 5:10b-11a.

HHS 50/40:1674 tells how in 120 the new king of Lecheng, Liu Chang was accused of impiety; this charge could bring the death penalty, but Liu Chang was only degraded to a county marquise. Commentary to that passage quotes HHJ 16:196-97, which says that the case was made by Ling Hong of the Imperial Secretariat, and that his argument is preserved in the Collected Works 集 of Huang Xiang, who was evidently the instigator of the appeal. This must be an anachronism, however, for Huang Xiang left the Secretariat in 106 and was probably dead by 110.

Huang Xiang 黃向 [Wenzhang 文章]; Yuzhang. Huang Xiang found a sack of treasure on the road. He returned it to the owner, who proposed to halve it with him, but Huang Xiang walked away.

On another occasion Huang Xiang described the close friends Lei Yi and Chen Zhong as two wings of the same bird. -XC 6:11b.

Huang Xiang 皇象 [Xiuming 休明]; Guangling. In the early third century, combining the styles of Zhang Chao and Chen Liangpu, Huang Xiang became the finest calligrapher of his age. He took refuge for a time in the hill country of Kuaiji, but later came to the court of Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 18:1425-26.

Huang Xiang 黃向 see Huang Shang 黃尚.

Huang Xing 黃幸. Administrator of Guanghan during the 30s, Huang Xing had some disagreement with Li Rong the Administrator of Hanzhong, and both were called to the capital. Huang Xing's officer Guo He studied the stars and advised Huang Xing to present himself at the imperial prison; if he did he would escape punishment. Li Rong did not do this, and he was executed. -HYGZ 10B:146.

Huang Yan 黃衍. A former Administrator of Jiuquan, in 187 Huang Yan was with the rebel forces of Liang province besieging Fu Xie in Hanyang. Wang Guo sent him to persuade Fu Xie to surrender, but his embassy was rejected with contempt. -HHS 58/48:1878.

Huang Yi 黃猗. A son-in-law of Yuan Shu, Huang Yi was with him when he died in 199. He and Yuan Yin took their family and followers to refuge in Lujiang with Liu Xun. -SGZ Wu 1:1108.

It is possible that Huang Yi died soon afterwards, and his widow entered the harem of Sun Quan: see sub the Ladies Yuan IV and V.

Huang Yi 黃射 see Huang She 黃射.

Huang Yu 黃毓; Pei. An Assistant Officer of Yu province, Huang Yu died at the age of twenty-five. His Inspector Yin was blamed, and other officials set up a stele to his memory. -SJZ 24:7b.

Huang [Yuannai] 黃元艾 see Huang Yun 黃允. -HHJ 23:276.

Huang Yun 黃允 [Zi'ai 子艾 also miswritten as Yuannai 元艾]; Jiyin. During the 160s Huang Yun acquired a reputation at the capital for outstanding ability. He was warned by Guo Tai, however, that when he reached the age of forty he should be careful of his conduct.

Later, about 172, the [future?] Excellency Yuan Wei admired Huang Yun and was considering him as a husband for his niece. Huang Yun was already married, but he was prepared to repudiate his wife the Lady Xiahou in order to gain alliance with such a distinguished family. The Lady abused him in most public fashion, and Huang Yun was utterly shamed. -HHS 68/58:2230, HHJ 23:276.

This is probably the same person as Huang Zi'ai, colleague of Jin Wenjing qq.v., but there are serious anachronisms about their stories. See deC 89:48, 336.

Huang Yun 黃允, wife of, see also the Lady Xiahou 夏侯.

Huang Zhang 黃長 see Huang Chang 黃長.

Huang Zhen 黃真 [Xiafu 夏甫]; Chenliu. A junior officer in his commandery, Huang Zhen was a friend of Wu You. Trusting Wu You's good judgement, the Administrator Leng Hong nominated Huang Zhen as Filial and Incorrupt. He became a magistrate in Runan and was celebrated for his honesty and fine sense of morality. -HHS 64/54:2100.

352 Huang Zhen

Huang Zhen 黄珍. About 200 Huang Zhen was commandery assistant to He Kui on the north of the Shandong peninsula. He Kui sent him to persuade the bandit Guan Cheng to surrender. -SGZ 12:379.

Huang Zhong 黄忠; Chenliu. In the late 180s the General-in-Chief He Jin sent several invitations to Shentu Pan to join his offices but Shentu Pan always refused. He Jin had Shentu Pan's fellow-countryman Huang Zhong write with arguments for him to accept, but Shentu Pan made no reply. -HHS 53/43:1753.

Huang Zhong 黄忠 [Hansheng 汉升] (d.220); Nanyang. A senior officer under Liu Biao, Huang Zhong was posted with Liu Biao's nephew as a county magistrate in Changsha. When Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208 he confirmed Huang Zhong in his post, with brevet appointment as a major-general. As Liu Bei took control of the region after the battle of the Red Cliffs, Huang Zhong took service with him and gave hostages as surety.

Huang Zhong accompanied Liu Bei into Yi province in 211, and as Liu Bei turned against Liu Zhang in 212 he sent Huang Zhong and Zhuo Ying to occupy the approaches to Chengdu. Regularly in the front line of combat, Huang Zhong was admired for his bravery and became a general in the new regime.

In 219 Huang Zhong led the decisive charge to defeat Xiahou Yuan at Dingjun Mountain in Hanzhong, and as Liu Bei took the royal title he was one of the officials listed in the formal memorial to the emperor. Huang Zhong died in the following year. -SGZ Shu 6: 948*.

Huang Zhu 黄柱; Nanyang. When Liu Bei proclaimed himself King of Hanzhong in 219, he named Huang Zhu his Minister of the Household.

Following the abdication of Emperor Xian in favour of Cao Pi of Wei in 220, Huang Zhu was a signatory to the memorial urging Liu Bei to take the imperial title. He later received a secondary marquisate and became Minister of Ceremonies. -SGZ Shu 15:1082, Shu 2:888.

Huang [Zi'ai] 黄子艾; Jiyin. During the 160s Huang Zi'ai and Jin Wenjing were celebrated for their intelligence. They came to stay at the capital for medical reasons, and though neither would accept appointment and they kept no clients or retainers, they attracted great attention. High officials sent messengers to enquire about their health and crowds of junior officers gathered at their gates in the hope of seeing them.

About 166, however, at the urging of Fu Rong, the Director of Retainers Li Ying investigated the two men. They lost their influence and reputation and each later suffered public rejection. -HHS 68/58:2232-33.

This Huang Zi'ai may well be the same as Huang Yun above, but the reasons for loss of favour appear different and should probably be ascribed to different times. It appears that two anecdotes are ascribed to the same man. -deC 89:48, 336.

Huang [Zilian] 黄子廉; Yingchuan. Formerly Administrator of Nanyang, Huang Zilian was an ancestor of Huang Gai of Wu. -SGZ Wu 10:1284.

Huang Zu 黄祖 (d.200). When Sun Jian, general of Yuan Shu, attacked Liu Biao in Nanyang in 191, Liu Biao sent his commander Huang Zu in a sortie. Huang Zu was driven back, but Sun Jian was killed in a skirmish and his army then withdrew.

As Administrator of Jiangxia in the late 190s Huang Zu faced the growing power of Sun Jian's son Sun Ce in the lower Yangzi. He attempted to expand downstream and to support Liu Xun in Lujiang in 199, but was defeated and forced back by Sun Ce.

In 203 an attack by Sun Quan's forces destroyed Huang Zu's fleet, and after a pause of some years for consolidation Sun Quan returned to the offensive in 207. In 208 the Sun soldiers and ships stormed Huang Zu's defences on the junction of the Han with the Yangzi at present-day Wuhan, destroyed Huang Zu's army and killed him. -HHS 74/64B:2420-21, SGZ Wu 1:1100, 1108; deC 90:135, 187-191.

Huangfu Gui 皇甫规 [Weiming 威明] (104-174); Anding. Son of Huangfu Qi, in 141 Huangfu Gui was a private gentleman when the non-Chinese Qiang people raided the region of Chang'an. The general Ma Xian led commandery troops against them, but Huangfu Gui sent in a letter criticising his conduct of operations. Soon afterwards Ma Xian was defeated and killed, and the local officers recognised Huangfu Gui's prescience. They recommended his appointment as Officer of Merit for the commandery, and in that capacity Huangfu Gui led eight hundred men to engage the Qiang. He defeated a troop of the enemy, killed their leaders and forced the rest to surrender. He was then named Reporting Officer and sent to the capital.

In the following year the Qiang ravaged Longxi in even greater numbers, and Huangfu Gui asked for a military command. He also criticised the greed and cruelty of officials on the frontier, and claimed this was a core reason for the rebellions of non-Chinese people and for the failure of Chinese arms. He did not receive appointment at this time.

Following an earthquake in the winter of 144 senior ministers were ordered to present special nominations, and Huangfu Gui's name was put forward. At this time the Dowager Liang held the regency for the young Emperor Zhi, and the court was dominated by her brother Liang Ji. In his memorial responding to the nomination, Huangfu Gui ostensibly praised the Liang family for having reformed the government left in disorder by Emperor Shun, but warned against poor selection of officials and undue influence from the eunuchs of the palace. Recognising and resenting the criticism, Liang Ji had Huangfu Gui graded at the lowest rank of cadets.

Huangfu Gui promptly pleaded ill health and went home but the local authorities, encouraged by Liang Ji, made several attempts to kill him. He stayed in retirement, but collected some three hundred disciples for his teachings of the Classic of Poetry and the Book of Changes: aside from the benefits of scholarship, his students may have served as an informal guard.

After Emperor Huan destroyed Liang Ji in 159 Huangfu Gui was several times invited to office. He did not accept, but sent in several petitions on behalf of his friend Zhang Huan, a frontier commander proscribed from office as a former subordinate of Liang Ji.

In 160 the bandit Shusun Wuji killed the Commandant of Taishan and drove back an initial attack by the general Zong Zi. A special carriage was then sent for Huangfu Gui, and this time he accepted appointment as Administrator. Zong Zi eventually defeated the rebels, but Huangfu Gui used both military and civil measures to settle the commandery.

In 161 the Lianyu tribe of the Qiang led a rebellion, and after the Protector Duan Jiong was dismissed the rebels gained in numbers and ravaged Bing and Liang provinces. Huangfu Gui volunteered his services, and in the winter he was named a General of the Household and sent to command troops about Chang'an.

In a first attack he defeated the enemy and brought a large number to surrender, among them the Xianlian group. He then organised these men as an auxiliary corps and in early 162 he advanced up the Long Road into Liang province. The way was blocked, however, and illness broke out among the troops. Huangfu Gui visited the sick, which raised morale, and the Qiang people made peace and opened the road. Huangfu Gui was appointed Protector of the Qiang.

He impeached Sun Jun, Guo Hong and a number of other officers who were cruel, corrupt or incompetent. They were variously dismissed or executed, but their friends at court now claimed that Huangfu Gui had bribed the Qiang and that the surrenders were false and short-lived. Emperor Huan sent a reprimand and Huangfu Gui, concerned the matter might go further, sent in a memorial to deny the charge and justify his policy, arguing that his program had saved over a hundred million cash, and expressing resentment that his achievements and personal sacrifice were rewarded only with calumny.

Huangfu Gui was recalled to the capital as a Consultant, and there was talk of enfeoffing him for his achievements. Xu Huang and Zuo Guan, eunuch favourites of the emperor, tried to extract a bribe, and when Huangfu Gui refused they raised once more the question of his alleged bribery of the Qiang. He was demoted to a junior position, and was then sent to convict service on the grounds that the Qiang were still in revolt. Led by the three Excellencies and the student Zhang Feng of the Imperial University, hundreds of people went to the gates of the palace to protest on his behalf. As an amnesty was proclaimed soon afterwards Huangfu Gui was set free and went to his home.

During this period Cai Yong presented a memorial extolling his achievements and abilities, and in 164 Huangfu Gui was sponsored by the Excellency Chong Gao and appointed General on the Liao. He asked to cede the post to Zhang Huan, and took Zhang Huan's position as Emissary to the Xiongnu. Two years later Zhang Huan was called to ministerial office at the capital and Huangfu Gui returned to the Trans-Liao command.

Now in his sixties, Huangfu Gui was reluctant to continue in military service. Having made several requests to retire on grounds of ill health, he sought to force the hand of Hu Fang the Inspector of Bing province: he first left his official territory and then sent someone to tell Hu Fang. Hu Fang refused to be drawn, and Huangfu Gui was obliged to remain at his post.

Later that year, as the reformists in Luoyang were proscribed from office, Huangfu Gui was upset that he had been neither recognised at the capital nor included in their clique. He sent in a memorial expressing support for the cause and seeking to share their punishment, but his offer was ignored by both sides of the conflict. This may demonstrate the lack of interest shown by the men at court for those on the frontier; but Huangfu Gui's protest may also be seen as one more attempt to escape from office.

Since Zhang Huan's biography says that the people of the northern frontier caused trouble as soon as Huangfu Gui left the region, it would appear that his tenure in the Trans-Liao command was not an easy one. No details are given of his fighting, and the disturbance was put down only after Zhang Huan returned to the north.

In 167 Huangfu Gui was called to the capital to join the Imperial Secretariat. That summer there was an ominous eclipse, and when an edict called for submissions Huangfu Gui presented harsh criticism of Emperor Huan's selection of officials and his conduct of affairs. Perhaps fortunately, his remarks went unnoticed.

Huangfu Gui was then transferred to be Administrator of Hongnong, but he declined the offer of a village marquise. In the early 170s he was transferred once more to be Protector of the Qiang, but was at last allowed to retire on grounds of ill health in 174. He died on the way home.

Like his friend and comrade Zhang Huan, Huangfu Gui was a prolific writer: he left twenty-seven pian of poetry, essays, letters, inscriptions and memorials.

Fan Ye placed Huangfu Gui's biography in the same chapter as those of Zhang Huan and Duan Jiong. The three generals maintained the weakened Chinese position in the north before its eventual collapse under pressure from the Xianbi and from the disturbances of the Xiongnu, Wuhuan and Qiang. -HHS 65/55:2129-37*, XC 4:2a; Young 84, deC 84:130-135, 322-329.

Huangfu Gui 皇甫規, wife of. Substantially younger than her husband, the Lady was a skilled student of literature and an expert calligrapher in the cao shu 草書 "Grass Style." She acted as Huangfu Gui's secretary and her work was widely admired.

When Huangfu Gui died in 174 the Lady was still young and attractive. As Dong Zhuo took supreme power in 189 he sent her a proposal of marriage. It was accompanied by a hundred wagons of treasure, twenty horses, slaves, cash and valuable cloth, but the Lady went to Dong Zhuo's residence in plain clothing and begged her excuses.

Dong Zhuo was furious that, as master of the world, he was defied by a woman, and he ordered his house slaves to surround her with drawn swords. Realising she had no escape, the Lady cursed Dong Zhuo for his disloyalty and usurpation of power; Dong Zhuo had her crushed by chariots.

The Lady was commemorated for her fidelity, and her biography appears in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳. -HHS 84/74:2798*.

Huangfu Jianshou 皇甫堅壽; Anding. Son of Huangfu Song, Jianshou was nonetheless a friend of Dong Zhuo. After Dong Zhuo had transferred the capital to Chang'an early in 190, he summoned Huangfu Song and intended to kill him. Huangfu Jianshou, however, travelled to Luoyang and publicly pleaded with Dong Zhuo at a banquet. All those present joined the supplication, and Dong Zhuo gave orders for Huangfu Song's release.

Huangfu Jianshou became well known, and he was invited to become a Palace Attendant at the puppet court of Emperor Xian. He declined, and died of illness. -HHS 71/61:2307-08.

Huangfu Jie 皇甫節; Anding. Son of Huangfu Qi and an elder brother of Huangfu Gui, Huangfu Jie became Administrator of Yanmen. He died about 165. -HHS 71/61:2299.

Huangfu Jun 皇甫雋. Administrator of Anding early in Later Han, Huangfu Jun was the first to move the lineage there, though he himself later returned to Jingzhao. -HHSJJ 65/55:2323 Hui Dong quoting Sun Mian 孫佃 of Tang.

Huangfu Leng 皇甫棱; Anding. Administrator of Dingxiang, in 90 Huangfu Leng was appointed Acting General Who Crosses the Liao. When the Southern Xiongnu chieftain Shizi took refuge in Wuyuan from his cousin the Shanyu Anguo in 93, Huangfu Leng protected him. He left office in the following year. -HHS 65/55:2129, 89/79:2953-55.

Huangfu Li 皇甫麗/麗麗; Anding. In 189 the general Dong Zhuo was appointed as Governor of Bing province and ordered to hand over his troops to his commanding officer Huangfu Song. When he failed to do so, Huangfu Song's nephew Li urged him to attack Dong Zhuo. Huangfu Song did no more than send in a report, and the emperor allowed Dong Zhuo to keep his men.

Huangfu Li accompanied his uncle to Chang'an in 190 and became Supervisor of Internuncios under the ramshackle regime of Li Jue and Guo Si. When the two men quarrelled in 195 Emperor Xian sent Huangfu Li to make peace. Guo Tuo was willing, but when Li Jue refused Huangfu Li warned him to his face and then criticised him to the emperor.

Emperor Xian sent Huangfu Li away, but Li Jue sent Wang Chang after him. Wang Chang did not want to see such a loyal man killed, so he reported that he could not catch him, and Huangfu Li escaped. -HHS 71/61:2306, SGZ 6:184; deC 89.9-10, 153-154.

Huangfu Ling 皇甫稜 see Huangfu Leng 皇甫稜.

Huangfu Qi 皇甫旗; Anding. Son of Huangfu Leng, in 115 Huangfu Qi was Commandant of Youfufeng. He accompanied Sima Jun in the disastrous attack on the rebel fortress of the Qiang chieftain Dingxi in Beidi. -HHS 65/55:2129, 87/77:2889; deC 84:107-108.

Huangfu Song 皇甫嵩 [Yizhen 義真]; Anding. Son of Huangfu Jie and a nephew of Huangfu Gui, as a young man Huangfu Song was skilled in both military and scholarly pursuits. He was well acquainted with the Classic of History and the Poetry and was also an expert archer and horseman. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he served as a magistrate in Jingzhao and in Hedong, but left office when his father died. He was later nominated by his province and was also invited to join the offices of the Grand Tutor Chen Fan and the General-in-Chief Dou Wu, but he would not go. Later, Emperor Ling sent a special carriage and an invitation as a Consultant, and this he accepted. About 180 he became Administrator of Beidi.

As the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out in 184, Huangfu Song was called to Luoyang; he urged that the Proscription be ended lest disaffected gentlemen join the insurgents. This proposal was supported by the senior eunuch Lu Qiang, and Emperor Ling approved. It was also agreed that the central treasury and the emperor's private holdings in the Western Garden should be used to raise an army. Lu Zhi had already been sent northeast against Zhang Jue, and Huangfu Song was named General of the Household on the Left in joint command with Zhu Jun, General of the Household on the Right, for operations southeast against Yingchuan.

Both men had the Staff of Authority, and each had a nominal force of twenty thousand men, including troops from the Northern Army with conscripts and volunteers from the commanderies about the capital. The Northern Army was a professional force, the strategic reserve of the empire stationed at Luoyang, and though other units were not of that standard, their enemies were for the most part equally untrained.

At first, Zhu Jun was defeated by the rebel leader Bo Cai, and Huangfu Song was placed under siege in Yingchuan. He was heavily outnumbered, but dismayed the enemy by a fire attack against their flimsy encampments, and in the fifth month Zhu Jun and a contingent led by the junior commander Cao Cao joined him to defeat the enemy. Huangfu Song was rewarded with enfeoffment, and the combined armies harried the rebels from Yingchuan through Runan and Chen. At the end of summer the three territories were pacified and Huangfu Song was sent on to Dong commandery, which he settled within a few weeks.

In the ninth month Huangfu Song was ordered north against Zhang Jue, and in the tenth month, after an initial set-back, he thoroughly defeated the major rebel army led by Zhang Jue's brother Liang at Guangzong in Julu. Zhang Liang was killed, together with vast numbers of his followers, while many others drowned in the Yellow River. Zhang Jue had earlier died of illness, but the victors dug up his body and sent the head to Luoyang.

In the following month Huangfu Song joined the local Administrator Guo Dian to defeat and kill Zhang Bao. So great were the enemy losses that it is said they could form a "Capital Observatory" 京觀: a macabre conceit based upon the idea that the heads were piled so high one could see the capital from the top. Huangfu Song was named General of Chariots and Cavalry on the Left and Governor of Ji province, while his fief was increased by the revenues of a second county.

Huangfu Song was known for his care of his soldiers, ensuring their food and lodgings ahead of his own, and he now asked that Ji province be excused taxation for a year to relieve the people's distress. This was approved, and a popular song was composed in his honour. About this time the judge of character Yan Zhong urged that he should take advantage of his current authority and prestige to take over the government and introduce reforms, but Huangfu Song resolutely refused the opportunity.

At the beginning of 185 Huangfu Song was sent west to guard Chang'an from the threat of the Liang province rebels, and he went forward to attack them. Though he was given a grand official send-off, he had offended the leading palace eunuchs, firstly by having Zhao Zhong's grand mansion at Ye city confiscated to the state, and then by refusing a bribe to Zhang Rang. These two now claimed that Huangfu Song was achieving no success, and in the autumn he was recalled. His seal as general was withdrawn, and his fief was reduced to a district with revenue from two thousand rather than eight thousand households.

In the winter of 188, as the rebels led by Wang Guo laid siege to Chencang in Youfufeng, Huangfu Song was appointed General on the Left with Dong Zhuo, General of the Van, as his subordinate; each had twenty thousand men. Dong Zhuo wanted to relieve Chencang, but Huangfu Song was confident the city could hold out. It did indeed, and as the rebels withdrew early in the following year Huangfu Song followed and defeated them. Dong Zhuo had argued against this offensive, and Huangfu Song left him to serve as rearguard. This was a justified strategy to fix the enemy for the attack, and Dong Zhuo himself had used it in 185, but we are told he was angry at the apparent slight.

Soon afterwards Dong Zhuo was appointed Governor of Bing province and was ordered to transfer his troops to Huangfu Song, but he refused to do so. Huangfu Song's advisers urged him to take direct action, but he only sought instructions, and though Dong Zhuo received a reprimand nothing more was done.

A few months later Dong Zhuo seized power, and early in 190 he shifted the capital to Chang'an. Intending to kill him, he called Huangfu Song to be Colonel of the City Gates. Huangfu Song still commanded an army of thirty thousand men, and both his staff officer Liang Yan and the Intendant He Xun urged him to act to preserve the state. Once again, however, Huangfu Song obeyed formal orders and accepted the summons.

Inspired by Dong Zhuo, senior officials accused Huangfu Song of disloyalty, and he was in danger of execution until his son Jianshou pleaded on his behalf. Huangfu Song was released and appointed as a Consultant. He later became head of the Imperial Censorate, and when Dong Zhuo teased him about the change in their status he accepted with good grace.

After Dong Zhuo was assassinated in 192 the new government led by Wang Yun again named Huangfu Song as a general, and he was soon afterwards promoted General of Chariots and Cavalry. As Li Jue and his fellows occupied the capital Huangfu Song was named Grand Commandant, but he left office in the winter on account of a meteor [or because of a halo 珥 around the sun: XHS 5:6b; Ho 66:139-140]. He became a Household Counsellor and then Minister of Ceremonies, titles largely meaningless under the ramshackle regime. When he died of illness about 195 he was awarded posthumous honours as General of Agile Cavalry, with one of his sons entitled to appointment as a gentleman cadet.

Huangfu Song was widely admired as a loyal, honest and generous man who presented excellent advice to the throne. He was, sadly, too honourable for his time. -HHS 71/61:2299-2307*, XC 4:11b-12a; deC 84:150-159.

Huangfu Wen 皇甫文 (d.34). Adviser to Wei Ao's general Gao Jun, after Wei Ao died in 33 Huangfu Wen accompanied him to Anding. Geng Yan laid siege to his position but Gao Jun held out for a year.

As Emperor Guangwu was approaching with the main army, he sent Kou Xun with an imperial letter to obtain Gao Jun's submission. Huangfu Wen was sent out to meet him, but he refused to bow to the imperial command. Furious, Kou Xun beheaded Huangfu Wen and sent his deputy back to tell Gao Jun that this would be the fate of anyone who refused to submit. Gao Jun surrendered at once.

When Kou Xun's officers congratulated him, Kou Xun explained that Huangfu Wen had been Gao Jun's closest counsellor, and his refusal to kowtow showed they had no intention of surrendering. By killing him, he deprived Gao Jun of his advice and left him shocked and isolated. -HHS 16/6:625-26.

Huangfu Yuan 皇甫援; Anding? An Internuncio, in 75 Huangfu Yuan and his colleague Wang Meng were sent with Qin Peng on the expedition to rescue the garrisons in Jushi which were under siege from the Northern Xiongnu. At the beginning of 76 an army of seven thousand men, recruited from commandery levies with auxiliaries from the state of Shanshan, advanced along the Northern Road, defeated the Xiongnu, relieved the remnant garrison in Nearer Jushi and returned that state to its allegiance. -HHS

19/9:722.

Huangfu Zhen 皇甫禎; Anding? As a county magistrate in Hanyang in the 150s, Huangfu Zhen acted wrongly. When Qiao Xuan arrived as Administrator, he had him flogged to death in the market-place of the capital. -HHS 51/41:1695.

Huanglong 黃龍 [Yellow Dragon] or Huanglong xiaowei 黃龍校尉 [Yellow Dragon Colonel] (d.193). A leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range in 185, he was killed by Yuan Shao. -HHS 71/61:2310, 74/64A:2381, SGZ 8:261, 6:194.

Huanglong Luo 黃龍羅 [Yellow Dragon Luo] (d.196); Kuaiji. When Sun Ce occupied Kuaiji in 196, Huanglong Luo and Zhou Bo were local leaders south of Hangzhou Bay. They were defeated and killed by Sun Ce and his new officer Dong Xi. -SGZ Wu 10: 1291.

Huchuquan 呼廚泉; Xiongnu. Son of the Southern Shanyu Qiangqu, and younger brother of the claimant Shanyu Yufuluo, when Yufuluo died in 195 Huchuquan took over the nominal title. He attempted to regain his legitimate position, but was driven back by the same faction that had killed his father and expelled his brother. The exiles were also under pressure from the Xianbi, and command of the group was effectively taken over by the Worthy King of the Right Qubi, while Huchuquan maintained a shadow court at Pingyang, on the Fen River in northern Hedong.

In 202 Huchuquan joined the Yuan family commander Gao Gan in an attack on Hedong, but Cao Cao's officer Zhong Yao came to besiege Pingyang. Yuan Shang sent Guo Yuan to the relief, but Zhong Yao defeated and killed him, and Huchuquan then surrendered.

In 216, no doubt under the pressure from agents of Cao Cao, Huchuquan came with his court to Ye city, capital of Wei, where he was held as an honoured prisoner. The remnant Xiongnu state, now largely restricted to the valley of the Fen River, was divided into five divisions under the supervision of Qubi.

Huchuquan attended the accession ceremony as Cao Pi took the throne from the Han dynasty at the end of 220, and he was one of the sponsors of a commemorative stele. After his death, no new Shanyu was proclaimed to succeed him. -HHS 89/79:2965, SGZ 1:47, LS 19:4a; deC 84:349-354.

Hui 廆 see Xiaowei Hui 校尉廆 [Colonel Hui]; Wuhuan.

Hui 徽 [surname unknown] [Zi'nan 子歎]; Wu? Uncle of Gu Yong 顧雍, being the younger brother of his mother, Hui travelled for study when he was young and was a most accomplished orator. About 200 he became Registrar to Sun Quan. He persuaded him to spare the life of a young man due to be executed for robbery, arguing that he would be more useful as a soldier.

About 204 Sun Quan became concerned that Cao Cao might be planning an attack, and he sent Hui as his envoy to the north. Recounting the prosperity of the south, he warned Cao Cao indirectly against any ambition in that direction. He was well treated, but when he returned he told Sun Quan that there was indeed a potential threat, but that for the present Cao Cao was engaged in the north against the remnants of the Yuan family.

Later, probably about 210, Hui was given nominal title as Administrator of Badong in the far west, territory which Sun Quan hoped to gain, but which was outside his control. He died soon afterwards. -SGZ Wu 7:1228.

Hui De 惠得 (d.161); Nanyang. In 161 Hui De, Huang Wu and Yue Ji were joint leaders of a heterodox cult with branches across three counties. They were arrested and executed. -HHS 7:309.

Hui Yan 惠衢; Langye. In 194 Yuan Shu named Hui Yan as Inspector of Yang province to rival Liu Yao. He achieved no success. -SGZ Wu 1:1102.

Humu Ban 胡母班 [Jiyou 季友] (d.190); Taishan. During the 160s, Humu Ban was named among the popular heroes in lists compiled by the reformists and students of the University. He and his friend Yang Zhi, from the same commandery, were admired by the reformists, though it does not appear that either man was directly involved with the cause; they did not suffer the persecution and proscription of those who opposed the eunuchs at that time.

Humu Ban became an Imperial Clerk, but about 178 he and Yang Zhi were accused of factionalism. Both were proscribed from office, while the charges extended to Cai Yong and Cai Zhi, who were connected to the Yang family by marriage and who had opposed the eunuch group headed by Cheng Huang.

In 190 Humu Ban was Bearer of the Mace in the regime of Dong Zhuo at Chang'an. He was sent as ambassador to the rebel alliance in the east, but Yuan Shao ordered the Administrator of Henei Wang Kuang, Humu Ban's brother-in-law, to arrest him. Humu Ban wrote him an eloquent letter, but he died in prison. - HHS 9:370, 60/50B:2001, 67/57:2187, 74/64A:2376, XC 5:1b-2b, SGZ 6:192-93, FSTY 3:22.

Humu Biao 胡母彪; Taishan. Early in 190, as Wang Kuang the Administrator of Henei was raising troops to join the alliance against Dong Zhuo, he sent officers out to arrest those who could be accused of any crime and to confiscate their goods. One of the victims was an uncle of Chang Lin, but Chang Lin approached Humu Biao, as a fellow-countryman of Wang Kuang, and suggested that a show of leniency would benefit the cause. Humu Biao wrote to Wang Kuang in these terms, and Chang Lin's uncle was released.

It seems likely that, besides being a man from the same county as Wang Kuang, Humu Biao was also connected to him by marriage: though that was not necessarily a long-term advantage, it may have served its purpose at this time. See sub Humu Ban above. - SGZ 23:658-59.

Humu Guan 胡母官; Kuaiji. Nominated by the Administrator Zhang Ba during the 90s, Humu Guan later achieved high office. - HYZ 10A:133.

Humu [Jipi] 胡母季皮 see Humu Ban. FSTY 3:23 refers to Humu Jipi as an Imperial Clerk about 178. It seems probable that Jipi has been miswritten for Jiyou 季友, which was the style of Humu Ban.

Hun Dian 阡典 [Shuze 叔則] (85-169); Nanyang. A worthy scholar, Hun Dian remained in private life. Cai Yong composed an inscription for him. - Cai 2:9.

Huo 獲. Marquis of Sha'n'an in Yunzhong, he was commemorated by a stele set up in the Western Regions near the Pulei Lake, present-day Barkol, in 141. - Nagata 94:82.

Huo Du 霍篤; Nan. Elder brother of Huo Jun, Huo Du had a private army of several hundred retainers. He died about 205, comparatively young. - SGZ Shu 11:1007.

Huo Jun 霍儁; Wei. Son of Huo Xu, Huo Jun became Administrator of Anding. - HHS 48/38:1617.

Huo Jun 霍峻 [Zhongmiao 仲邈] (178-217); Nan. After the death of his brother Huo Du, the Governor Liu Biao had Huo Jun take over his troops. When Liu Biao died in 208 Huo Jun joined Liu Bei, who gave him title as a General of the Household. Huo Jun later accompanied Liu Bei into Yi province.

As Liu Bei moved south against Liu Zhang in 213, he left Huo Jun to guard his base at Jiameng in Guanghan. Liu Zhang's generals Fu Jin and Xiang Zun came to attack, but though heavily out-numbered Huo Jun held out for several months and eventually drove the enemy away with a sortie, killing Xiang Zun.

When Liu Zhang surrendered in 214 Liu Bei named Huo Jun as an Administrator with rank as a major-general. He died after three years in office, and Liu Bei mourned him. - SGZ Shu 11:1007*.

Huo Kuang 霍匡; Yanmen. In 36 Huo Kuang was a conscript officer under Lu Fang's general Yin You, holding Yanmen commandery against Guangwu's forces under Du Mao. As Lu Fang was driven to flight and his position in China collapsed Huo Kuang joined his colleagues Jia Dan and Xie Sheng to kill Yin You and surrender to Guo Liang, Guangwu's Administrator of Yanmen. On Guo Liang's recommendation all three men were granted marquises, to encourage others. - HHS 22/12:777.

Huo Lang 霍郎; Hongnong. A local leader who had taken title as a general, he surrendered in 26 to Emperor Guangwu's officer Feng Yi. - DGHJ 9:3b.

Huo Nu 霍奴 (d.205); Zhuo. Local leaders in the commandery, Huo Nu and Zhao Du rebelled in 205, killing the Administrator and the Inspector of You province. They were attacked and killed by Cao Cao. - SGZ 1:27.

Huo Rong 霍融. An officer of the Bureau of Astronomy in 102, Huo Rong reported that the official clepsydra water-clock was insufficiently accurate, primarily because of the arrangements for changing indicator-rods to measure the hours: since day and night were divided into equal parts, the length of an hour varied through the year. After investigation, the rods were changed not, as hitherto, according to the observed declination of the sun, but regularly each calendrical fortnight. This system was maintained for a thousand years, and Huo Rong compiled one of the earliest manuals on the clepsydra, the Louke jing 漏刻經. - HHS 92/2:3032-33; Needham 59:322, 328.

Huo Shou 霍收. In 124 Huo Shou was an assistant magistrate in Ji'nan. As Emperor An came on tour to the east, the chancellor's office of the kingdom reported that a flock of phoenixes had gathered in a tree above his house. The ruler awarded bales of silk to the magistrate, to Huo Shou and other officers of the county, exempted from the annual land tax each district where the magical birds had appeared, and granted two ranks of nobility to each man. -HHS 5:238.

Huo Xing 霍性 (d.220). In 220 Huo Xing was General of the Household at the court of Wei. As Cao Pi was going on an inaugural tour of inspection and display of strength to the south Huo Xing presented a memorial of protest against such energetic action, which he claimed was inappropriate.

In fact it would appear that Cao Pi's enterprise was a considered method of demonstrating his new authority in the empire. Angry at this interference, Cao Pi ordered Huo Xing tortured and killed. It is claimed he sought to rescind his orders, but it was too late. -SGZ 2:60.

Huo Xu 霍諝 [Shuzhi 叔智]; Wei. A keen scholar when he was young, Huo Xu had wide knowledge of the classics. About 140, when he was still only fifteen, someone accused Song Guang, Huo Xu's maternal uncle, of forging an imperial edict. The General-in-Chief Liang Shang had Song Guang arrested and questioned under torture, but Huo Xu pleaded his innocence in an eloquent memorial. Song Guang was pardoned and released, and Huo Xu became well known.

Having served as a local officer in his commandery, Huo Xu was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and later became Administrator of Jincheng, where his generosity and good faith gained the respect of the Qiang and other non-Chinese people. He left office on the death of his mother, but when the mourning period was ended he was again invited to office, serving as Chancellor of Beihai and then as Deputy Director of the Secretariat.

At this time the General-in-Chief Liang Ji and his family dominated the court. Senior ministers were afraid to oppose them, but Huo Xu joined Yin Xun, Director of the Secretariat, in presenting memorials of criticism. When Emperor Huan overthrew Liang Ji in 159 he remembered Huo Xu's loyalty and display of principle and awarded him a marquiseate.

At various times Huo Xu sought to leave office and return to private life, but his requests were denied, and he was appointed successively as Intendant of Henan and Director of Retainers, then Minister Steward and Minister of Justice. On the other hand, when Ju Yuan and Zuo Guan were disgraced in 165 and various eunuch favourites suffered demotion, Huo Xu and his colleagues had their fiefs taken away altogether.

At the time of the First Faction Incident in 166-167 the reformist Jia Biao came to Luoyang to ask Huo Xu and the General-in-Chief Dou Wu to urge the emperor to leniency. [HHS 67/57 describes Huo Xu as a member of the Secretariat at this time, but this is an anachronism, for he already held ministerial rank.] Their pleas were effective, there was a review of the cases, and Li Ying and the reformers were released. -HHS 48/38:1615-17*, 57/47:1858, 67/57:2216; deC 89:84-85.

Huo Yan 霍延. Captain of a police district in Luoyang under the Prefect Zhou Yu, one night in the early 80s Huo Yan halted the cortège of Dou Du, brother of the empress, as he was returning to his residence after visiting the palace. One of the slaves escorting Dou Du attacked Huo Yan, but he drew his sword, arrested Dou Du and swore at him.

Dou Du sent in a complaint and serious enquiries were made, but the emperor endorsed the policy of keeping his powerful relatives under control. -HHS 77/67:2495.

Huo Yi 霍弋 [Shaoxian 紹先]; Nan. Son of Huo Jun, after his father's death in 217 Huo Yi was appointed a companion to Liu Shan, Heir of Shu-Han. He later became a general and Administrator, and guarded the Yangzi Gorges.

As Shu-Han fell to Wei in 263 Huo Yi made a good submission and held back an attempted invasion by Wu. Wei and Jin maintained him in his former rank and position. -SGZ Shu 11:1007-08.

Huo Yu 霍玉, the Lady. The Lady was an attendant in the Yongle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager Dong, natural mother of Emperor Ling. It appears that she received the emperor's favour and held influence at court: in a memorial of 177 Cai Yong observed that she had recommended the Grand Commandant Zhang Hao. -HHS 60/50B:1999.

Huo Yu 霍圜. Magistrate of Linrong county in Shuofang, about 178 Huo Yu transmitted to the throne of Emperor Ling a letter from Cai Yong seeking an end to his exile in the north and presenting some completed parts of the Treatises which he had been working on for the official history of Later Han. -HHS 60/50B:2004, 93/3:3083-84; MBeck 90:43-44.

Huyouhui 呼尤徽 or Huyouzheng 呼尤徵. A king of the Northern Xiongnu in the early 120s, Huyouhui came to the Chinese frontier seeking refuge from the Xianbi. With followers recruited from amongst his fellow-refugees, Huyouhui became a commander of auxiliaries for the General on the Liao Geng Kui, defending the territory against their mutual enemy.

In 124 another chieftain, Azu, planned to escape back across the frontier. He and his comrades asked Huyouhui to join them, but he replied that he was now old, he had received favour from the Han, and he would rather die than desert. Azu wanted to kill him, but someone intervened and Huyouhui survived. -HHS 89/79:2959; deC 84:289.

Huyouzheng 呼尤徵 see Huyouhui 呼尤徽.

Huyuqiu 護于丘; Xiongnu. A chieftain of the Northern Xiongnu, in 59 he brought about a thousand people to surrender to the Southern regime. -HHS 89/79:2948.

Huzheng 呼徵 or Huyan 呼演 (d.179); Xiongnu. Son of the Tuteruo shizhujiu Shanyu of the Southern Xiongnu, Huzheng succeeded his father in 178. He quarrelled with the Emissary Zhang Xiu, and in 179 Zhang Xiu killed Huzheng and set the Worthy King of the Right, Qiangqu, in his place. -HHS 89/79:2964 [as Huzheng], HHJ 24:288 [as Huyan]; deC 84:345, deC 89:162 [both as Hucheng].

Ji Bao 籍褒. Chancellor of Donghai about 130, Ji Bao reported on the excellent conduct of the king Liu Zhen and his brother Liu Jian. Both men were rewarded with enhancement of their fiefs. -HHS 42/32:2426.

Ji Ben 吉本 (d.218); Zuopingyi. Court Physician of Han at Xu city in 218, Ju Ben and his sons Miao and Mu joined the plot of Jin Wei and Geng Ji to take over the administration and invite Guan Yu to come from the south. They attacked Cao Cao's agent Wang Bi, but he made his escape and next morning gathered troops to destroy the rebels. Ji Ben and his family were executed. -SGZ 1:50; deC 89:518-519. [The personal name also appears as Pi 丕 or Ping 平.]

Ji Bo 紀伯. A neighbour of Chen Ao, he attempted to encroach on his land, but was embarrassed into returning it. -XC 7:3a.

Ji Chang 姬常 (d.29). Following a tradition established by Emperor Wu of Former Han, Ji Chang was recognised as the senior descendant of the ancient imperial house of Zhou 周; he was enfeoffed as a duke at the end of Former Han and again by Wang Mang.

In 26 Emperor Guangwu of Later Han enfeoffed Ji Chang as Duke Who Succeeds to the Greatness of Zhou 周承休公. -HHS 1A:29-30; QHX:181, Bn 67:36-37.

Ji Chang 紀常, the Lady: see Chang Ji 常紀.

Ji Huang 吉黃 (d.208); Zuopingyi. Elder twin brother of Ji Mao, about 207 Ji Huang was appointed as a clerk under the Excellency Zhao Wen, and soon afterwards became a county magistrate in Jingzhao. At this time there were regulations against senior local officials leaving their positions, but when Zhao Wen died in 208 Ji Huang left his post to attend the funeral as a former officer and client. The Director of Retainers Zhong Yao, head of the provincial administration, arrested Ji Huang and executed him. -SGZ 9:718.

Ji Ji 戚寄. A commander under Yuan Shu, about 197 Ji Ji was persuaded by Liu Fu to transfer allegiance to Cao Cao. His decision surely reflects concern at Yuan Shu's assumption of the imperial title; Cao Cao at that time controlled the formal imperial government of Han. -SGZ 15:463.

Ji Jian 籍建. A eunuch, in 124 he was a member of the staff of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. When Liu Bao was dismissed by his father Emperor An, Ji Jian was exiled on a false charge to Shuofang on the northern frontier. After the coup of Sun Cheng and his associates restored Liu Bao to the succession in the following year, Ji Jian returned. He was appointed a Regular Attendant and was later enfeoffed. -HHS 15/5:591-93, 78/68:2518.

Ji Jin 季進 see Li Jin 李進 of Jiyin.

Ji Lian 汲廉. Chancellor of Pengcheng in 192, Ji Lian joined a petition organised by Tao Qian, Inspector of Xu province, urging Zhu Jun to lead an army west to rescue the emperor at Chang'an. Nothing came of the proposal. -HHS 71/61:2312.

Ji Liao 薊遼 [Zixun 子訓]; Qi. A Secondary Biography of Xu Kui, quoted from Taiping yulan by Shen Qinhan at HHSJJ 82/72B:3020, identifies Ji Zixun 薊子訓 below with Ji Liao, whose style was also Zixun, who came from Qi and was a disciple of the long-lived medicine man Li Shaojun 李少君 in the time of Emperor Wu [QHX:227].

According to the Secondary Biography, Ji Liao was a local officer in his commandery and in the provincial administration, was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and after serving in the army became a Commandant of Attendant Cavalry. He studied the healing techniques of Li Shaojun and compiled a textbook on medicine, Yi fa 醫法. It is uncertain whether the text indicates that Ji Liao was in personal contact with Li Shaojun – a claim that stretches credulity – or whether he adopted his techniques well after the master's death: such longevity is hard to assess. See also Ji Zixun.

Ji Ling 紀靈. In 196 Ji Ling was a general in the service of Yuan Shu, who sent him against Liu Bei, then stationed in Pei. Ji Ling's troops heavily outnumbered the defenders, but the warlord Lü Bu came to the rescue as an honest broker. By a celebrated feat of archery, hitting the spike on top of a halberd, he so impressed Ji Ling that he withdrew his men. -SGZ 7:222-23; deC 96:205-206.

Ji Mao 吉茂 [Shuchang 叔暢]; Zuopingyi. Ji Mao was so fond of learning that it was said he would rather dress badly and eat poor food than fail to know something. About 200 he was living in the Qin Ling ranges as a hermit scholar with Su Ze, but in 208 he was nominated by the Director of Retainers Zhong Yao and became a magistrate in Hedong. Such was his quiet authority that none of his officers dared to act wrongly.

There is a sad story to Ji Mao's nomination. Earlier in the year Zhong Yao had arrested and executed Ji Mao's elder twin brother Ji Huang, because he had left his post as a county magistrate in order to attend the funeral of his former patron the Excellency Zhao Wen. Ji Mao was at this time still a commoner, but he had a fine reputation in the region. He was bitterly angry that his brother had been killed for carrying out his duty as a gentleman, but he was not willing to weep for him.

At the end of that same year, when the time came for reports and nominations Zhong Yao proposed Ji Mao as Abundant Talent. Most people assumed Ji Mao would refuse, but when the appointment was offered he accepted. There was disagreement whether he was frightened of Zhong Yao, or whether this demonstrated his fine quality.

Ji Mao was later transferred to the household of the youthful Cao Rui, son of Cao Pi, but in 218 he was arrested on suspicion of involvement in the plot of his kinsman Ji Ben against Cao Cao. His former patron Zhong Yao, now Chancellor of State, testified that there was no close connection between Ji Mao and the conspirators, and Ji Mao was released. We are told that he was initially concerned because he owned various books on occult and military arts, which had been forbidden by Cao Cao and which he had hidden and not handed in to the government.

Ji Mao held later appointments as chief of various commandery units, then came to court as a Consultant. He died about 237. -SGZ 23:660-61.

Ji Miao 吉邈 [Wenran 文然] (d.218); Zuopingyi. Son of Ji Ben, he took an active role in the attempt to seize Xu city in 218, and led the attack on Cao Cao's agent Wang Bi. Wang Bi, however, escaped, and next morning, as Ji Miao's men were confused and disorganised, they were routed by loyal troops led by Wang Bi and Yan Kuang. Ji Miao and his family were executed. -SGZ 1:50; deC 89:518-519.

Ji Mu 吉穆 [Siran 思然] (d.218); Zuopingyi. Son of Ji Ben and younger brother of Ji Miao, he joined the plot to seize Xu city in 218. The rebels were defeated and Ji Mu and his family were executed. -SGZ 1:50.

Ji Wu 姬武. Son of Ji Chang, on his father's death in 29 Ji Wu succeeded to his title as Duke Who Succeeds to Greatness 承休公, in recognition of his position as representative of the ancient Zhou 周 dynasty. In 37 his title was changed to Duke of Wei 衛, a county in Dong commandery. Though the fief was evidently maintained throughout Later Han, no successors are recorded. -HHS 1B:61, 111/21:3450; Bn 67:36-37. [HHS 1B miswrites the personal name of Ji Wu for that of his father Ji Chang, but the modern commentator Hui Dong notes the error.]

Ji Yi 集一 was a magistrate in Chenliu. -FSTY 6f: 139.

Ji Yong 季雍; Ganling. An officer of Yuan Shao, about 192 Ji Yong changed sides to support Gongsun Zan and held Yu city in Ganling on his behalf. He was attacked by Zhu Ling, but he held Zhu Ling's mother and younger brother. He sought to use them as hostages, but Zhu Ling stormed the city and captured Ji Yong. -SGZ 17:530.

Ziping.

Ji [Zixun] 薊子訓. Though Ji Zixun's place of origin is unknown, a man who was a hundred years old at the turn of the second and third centuries claimed to have seen him when he was a child, selling medicines in Kuaiji; his appearance had not altered since that time.

About 200 Ji Zixun was in Ji'nan. He killed an infant there by dropping it, but brought it back to life a month later and returned it to its parents. The child had been buried, but when the tomb was opened the body was gone – and the restored infant clearly recognised its father and mother.

When this incident became known at the capital, now Xu city, Ji Zixun received several invitations, and he travelled there with his disciples, in a carriage drawn by a donkey. At one stopping place the donkey died, but after a leisurely lunch Ji Zixun restored it to life by a tap of his stick.

He was followed by more than a thousand people and when he arrived at Xu city he was welcomed by hundreds of officials. He provided an inexhaustible supply of wine and food for all who were there.

Soon afterwards, Ji Zixun disappeared, accompanied by a remarkable display of clouds, but he was seen again in the vicinity of Chang'an a generation later, accompanied by another old men. They claimed to be more than five hundred years old, then walked away apparently slowly but in fact moving more swiftly than a horse at full gallop. [A similar skill is ascribed to Zuo Ce.]

A biography in the fourth-century Shenxian zhuan tells how Ji Zixun was popular with the imperial favourites and on one occasion appeared in twenty-three places at once. It is also said that he foretold the day of his death but his grave was later found to contain only a pair of sandals: this is a model of the false death 尸解, a device to reach the world of the immortals.

The Secondary Biography of Xu Kui, quoted from Taiping yulan by Shen Qinhan at HHSJJ 82/72B:3020, identifies him with Ji Liao q.v., whose style was also Zixun, a man from Qi who was a disciple of the long-lived medicine man Li Shaojun 李少君 [QHX:227]. -HHS 82/72B:2755-56*; Ngo 76:134-137, DeWoskin 83:81-82. See also Ji Liao above and Ji Zixun 計子勳 immediately below.

Ji Zixun 計子勳. No-one knew where Ji Zixun came from, but he was believed to be several hundred years old. Having travelled widely, he announced one day that he would die at noon. Taking a shroud, he laid himself down and expired on schedule. -HHS 82/72B:2758*; Ngo 76:140, DeWoskin 83:86. Although this man has a separate entry in HHS 82/72B, the similarity of the pronunciation of the names makes it likely his story relates to some alternative manifestation of Ji Zixun 薊子訓 immediately above.

Ji [Zixun] 計子勳 also written as 薊子訓. FSTY 5f:131 mentions a man named Ji Zixun 計子勳 who was at some time a clerical officer under the Excellency of Works. FSTY 6f:147, however, refers to a man named Ji Zixun 薊子訓 and claims that he was Excellency of Works. There was no Excellency of Works with that name; the two citations evidently suffer from the same confusion as afflicts the entries immediately above.

Jia 賈, the Lady; Nanyang. About 55 the Lady Jia was brought by selection into the harem of the Heir, Liu Zhuang, future Emperor Ming, and in 57 she gave birth to his fifth son, Liu Da, future Emperor Zhang.

That same year Liu Zhuang succeeded to the throne, and the Lady Jia was appointed an Honoured Lady, most senior rank of concubine. The infant Liu Da, however, was taken from his natural mother by the Dowager Yin, mother of Emperor Ming, and she entrusted the nurture of the child to the Honoured Lady Ma, a cousin of the Lady Jia: her mother was an elder sister of the late mother of the Lady Ma. We are told that the Lady Ma brought up the child with devotion, more than if he had been her own, while Liu Da responded to her with the utmost affection.

In 60, at the nomination of the Dowager Yin the Lady Ma was appointed empress and Liu Da was designated Heir on the same day. Despite their connection to the throne and their relationship to the Ma, no male members of the Jia family gained any preferment. They were evidently not in a position to withstand the rivalry of other factions, and one must assume that sponsorship by the Dowager and takeover by the Ma were the best options open, even if the Jia gained little from the arrangement.

When the Dowager Yin died in 64 the Honoured Lady Jia was given royal insignia, a "comfortable carriage" 安車, two hundred maid-servants and quantities of silk, gold and cash. She remained secluded in the rear palace, there is no record of her date of death, and she received no recognition when her son came to the throne in 75. -HHS 10A:414-15;

Jia Biao 賈彪 [Weijie 偉節]; Yingchuan. Jiao Biao was one of three brothers. All were talented, and they were known as the Three Tigers 三虎, but Jia Biao was considered to be outstanding. As a young man he was a student of Chen Shi and travelled to the capital, where he and Xun Shuang became known for their public spirit. The two were not friends, but Jia Biao was an associate of Li Xie and others.

Jia Biao first held appointments in his local commandery and province, was recommended Filial and Incorrupt, and became a county magistrate in Runan. Many of the people were poor, and in their distress they would not care for their children. Jia Biao made firm regulations that infanticide should be punished in the same fashion as the murder of an adult.

At one time there were two separate cases: south of the city bandits had killed some people, while to the north a woman had killed her child. As Jia Biao was going out on assizes, his officers urged that he deal first with the bandits, but Jia Biao remarked angrily that it was in the nature of things for bandits to harm people, but against all the laws of Heaven for a mother to kill her child. So he went north and punished the mother. When the bandits heard this they were so impressed they surrendered of their own accord. [Shishuo xinyu attributes a similar story, probably mistakenly, to Chen Shi: Mather 76:81.]

As a result of Jiao Biao's show of concern, moreover, within a few years there were thousands of children who would formerly have been left to starve but were now cared for by their parents. The people said "It is Father Jia who has given them life," and named their off-spring "Son of Jia" 賈子 or "Daughter of Jia" 賈女.

In the mid-160s Jia Biao was again at the capital. He held no official post, but he and Guo Tai were recognised as leaders of the student reformists, who judged the quality of their peers and officials and praised or blamed them with rhyming seven-character couplets. The name of Jia Biao, however, does not appear among any of the lists of heroes and exemplars recorded in the texts, he took no active part in opposition to the eunuch favourites of the emperor, and by 166 he had left the city.

When the Administrator of Nanyang Cheng Jin was arrested for executing the merchant and eunuch associate Zhang Fan at a time of amnesty, his former adviser Cen Zhi fled into hiding. Though many sympathised with him and offered help, Jia Biao turned him away. Some people criticised him, but Jia Biao explained that he considered Cen Zhi to have been too aggressive and troublesome, and that he had brought his problems upon himself.

On the other hand, when the First Faction Incident broke out soon afterwards and the reformists were arrested, Jia Biao travelled to Luoyang to urge Dou Wu, father of the empress, and Huo Xu of the Imperial Secretariat to use their influence with the emperor. Dou Wu did apply pressure, Emperor Huan issued an amnesty, and the reformist leader Li Ying specifically acknowledged the value of Jia Biao's intervention.

At the time of the Second Faction Incident in 169, Jia Biao was implicated and proscribed from office. He died at home. The people of his former county in Runan remembered him with a temple. -HHS 67/57: 2216-17* & 2187, XC 4:9a-b, YSS:18a-b, SJZ 30:5a; deC 75A:24, deC 89:70-78.

Jia Bin 賈邠; Henan. XTS 76B:3387 says that Jia Bin was a son of Jia Yuan; see sub Jia Xu 翽.

Jia Bing 賈冰; Henan. XTS 76B:3387 says that Jia Bing was a son of Jia Ye; he would have lived in the first century. See sub Jia Xu 翽.

Jia [Bosheng] 賈伯升; Youfufeng. Presumably a son of the scholar-official Jia Kui, Jia Bosheng was a scholar of Zuo zhuan, and was probably the teacher of Yan Du of Nanyang [see below].

When Jia Kui died his sons were appointed to the suite of the Heir, but they did not have a notable official career. -HHS 36/26:1240.

HHS 64/54:2103 says that Tangxi Dian was the teacher of Yan Du, but I note that the ages of these two men were very close, with Yan Du perhaps the elder. The Jingdian [xuanru dayi] xulu of the sixth century, cited by Hui Dong in HHSJJ 64/54:2293, says that Yan Du studied Zuo zhuan under Jia Bosheng. Jia Bosheng may be identified as one of the otherwise unnamed sons of Jia Kui, and one may note similarity between Bosheng 伯升 and Bobing 伯并, which was probably the style of Tangxi Dian. There may have been confusion in the texts.

Jia Can 賈參 or Jia Shen; Nanyang. Son of Jia Zong, he inherited his fief in 88. -HHS 17/7:668.

Jia Chang 賈昌. In 137 Jia Chang was an Imperial Clerk, officer of the Censorate, currently in Rinan, when the non-Chinese chieftain Oulin attacked Han positions in that commandery. The Inspector Fan Yan brought troops from Jiaozhi and Jiuzhen, but his men mutinied and the banditry continued to spread.

Jia Chang managed to raise further local troops to attack the insurgents, but he was defeated and then besieged for a year. There was a proposal at court to send a major relief expedition, but on the advice of the staff officer Li Gu two experienced officials, Zhu Liang and Zhang Qiao, were sent to the region, and they restored order by a combination of power, prestige and bribery. -HHS 86/76:2837-39.

Jia Chang 賈長; Nanyang. Son of Jia Yu, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 17/7:667.

Jia Cong 賈琮 [Mengjian 孟堅]; Dong. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, Jia Cong became a successful county magistrate in Henan.

In 184, resentful at years of extortion by a series of imperial officials, the people of Jiao region in the far south rose in rebellion under a leader who styled himself General Who is Pillar of Heaven 柱天將軍, and they seized the Inspector and the Administrator of Hepu. Jia Cong was chosen as replacement Inspector.

When he arrived he enquired about the reasons for the trouble and was told that taxation was too heavy. Because of its distance from the imperial capital the territory was not formally established as a province: the Inspector had very wide powers and could block complaints or petitions. With executive authority Jia Cong issued a proclamation to reduce government demands, while he set up centres to care for refugees and announced that only ringleaders and troublemakers would be punished. He also reviewed the local officials and members of their staffs and selected good men to govern the counties. Within a year the rebellion was ended and the people sang his praises, claiming they would never have rebelled if Father Jia had come sooner. The region was assessed as the best governed in the empire.

In 187, after three years in the south, Jia Cong was recalled to become Governor of Ji province, formerly a centre of the Yellow Turban rebellion. It was at this time that the change was made to appoint Governors 牧 rather than Inspectors 刺史 in several provinces; Governors had executive authority, while Inspectors were supposed only to report on wrong-doing.

By custom the carriage of a provincial head was shielded by red screen curtains, but Jia Cong had these removed, as symbol of his determination to look carefully at every part of the administration. The people were impressed, and many local officials chose to abandon their posts rather than face his scrutiny.

Also as a sign of his policy, Jia Cong erected stele to commemorate recent worthies, such as the man of Faction Ba Su and the earlier critic Li Yun.

After the death of Emperor Ling in 189, the regency government controlled by the He family appointed Jia Cong as General on the Liao. He died in that office. -HHS 31/21:1111-12*, 57/47:1853, 67/57:2203, XC 1: 10a-b; deC 89:183-184.

Jia Dan 賈丹; Yanmen. In 36 Jia Dan was a conscript officer under Lu Fang's general Yin You, holding Yanmen commandery against Guangwu's forces under Du Mao. When Lu Fang was driven to flight and his position in China collapsed, Jia Dan joined his colleagues Huo Kuang and Xie Sheng to kill Yin You and surrender to Guangwu's Administrator of Yanmen, Guo Liang. On Guo Liang's recommendation all three men were enfeoffed as marquises. -HHS 22/12:777.

Jia Fang 賈魴/訪 [Shengqing 升卿?]. Jia Fang was a student of calligraphy who became a gentleman cadet under Emperor He. Among other works, he compiled Pang xi pian 滂喜篇, a commentary to the manual Cang jie 蒼頡, which had originally been composed by Li Si 李斯, minister of Qin 秦, as part of the reform of script carried out by that dynasty. -Sui shi 32:942; Hou Kang:2116, Yao Zhenzong:2340-41 [also QHX:229 and 677].

Jia Fang 賈訪; Wuwei. Younger son of Jia Xu, when Cao Pi came to the throne of Wei in 220 Jia Fang was granted a fief in respect of his father. -SGZ 10:331.

Jia Fu 賈復 [Junwen 君文] (d.55); Nanyang. As a young man Jia Fu was fond of scholarship, with particular attention to the Classic of History. He studied under the local Master Li 李生, who praised him to his other pupils as worthy of the highest official positions.

As a local officer in his county about 20, Jia Fu was sent to bring salt from Hedong. There were many bandits at this time, but while other convoys were robbed Jia Fu brought his load in safely. He was admired for his energy and honesty.

As rebellion broke out in 22, and the Troops from Xinshi and the Lower Yangzi entered Nanyang, Jia Fu took to the hills, gathered hundreds of followers and styled himself a general.

When the Gengshi Emperor took power in 23 Jia Fu brought his men to Liu Jia, King of Hanzhong, and was given rank as a colonel. Observing the disorder of the new regime, he urged Liu Jia to take an independent role. Liu Jia would not move against the emperor, but in 24 he sent Jia Fu with a letter to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, north of the Yellow River, and Jia Fu entered his service. Deng Yu recommended him as a competent military commander, and Liu Xiu took him onto his staff as officer responsible for police and discipline.

Since Jia Fu had only lately joined the cause, some of Liu Xiu's followers were concerned at his holding such authority and urged that he be transferred to a local administration. Liu Xiu was confident of his loyalty, and when he found that Jia Fu's horse was worn out and exhausted he gave him one of the team from his own carriage. As Liu Xiu gathered his forces in Xindu to attack Wang Lang in his capital of Handan, he named Jia Fu a lieutenant-general. Jia Fu took part in the capture of Handan, and was then made General Controller and Protector, probably still responsible for military police, but at a substantially higher rank.

In the autumn of 24 Jia Fu joined the attack on the Datong, Green Calf and other bandits at Shequan in Henei. After the enemy had held their ground through half a days' hard fighting, Liu Xiu sent a message to recall his troop for a meal. Jia Fu sent back word that they would defeat the enemy first. With feathers tied to his back so his followers could see him, he broke the enemy line and drove them to flight. All the army admired his courage.

Jia Fu then defeated the Wuxiao bandits in Zhending on the east of the plain, but he was badly wounded in the fighting. Liu Xiu, very upset, observed that the reason he had not given him an independent command before was that he had too little regard for his own danger in the face of the enemy. Jia Fu was one of his finest officers, and he now heard that his wife was having a child. He promised that if the baby proved to be a girl she should marry one of his sons, and if it was a boy he would take one of his daughters; Jia Fu need have no concern for the future of his widow and child. Jia Fu recovered, and as he returned to headquarters he was guest of honour at a great banquet. He then went to attack local bandits in Wei commandery.

As Liu Xiu took the throne in the autumn of 25 he named Jia Fu as Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital, and enfeoffed him as marquis of his home county. He was one of the first to cross the Yellow River south against Zhu Wei in Luoyang, and he forced the surrender of the enemy commander Chen Qiao. Early in 26 he took part in the campaign of Wu Han against more bandit groups in Wei commandery, and his fief was increased by two counties.

At that time Guangwu was faced with two enemy forces in Nanyang, Yin Zun at Yan city, and Wan the capital. At a council of war, as his officers hesitated, he struck the staff of mobilisation on the ground and observed, "Yan is strongest, Wan is the second. Who will attack them?" Jia Fu volunteered, and Guangwu remarked that with him in charge he had no further concern.

Despite initial defeat in Yingchuan, by the late spring of 26 Jia Fu had brought an army into Nanyang. Yin Zun capitulated after a month's siege, and Jia Fu then moved east through Runan into Huaiyang, where he received the surrender of the Administrator Bao Si. In the autumn he advanced to the Huai and confirmed the frontier on the southeast. Despite his official concern with discipline, it is recorded that on the march through Runan some of his men were executed by Kou Xun, Administrator of Yingchuan, for looting and killing. As Jia Fu returned he intended to take revenge on Kou Xun, but Kou Xun sent wine to get his followers drunk, and the emperor was able to make peace between them.

In the spring of 27 Jia Fu was appointed General on the Left and sent to face the Red Eyebrows in the north of Hongnong. He drove back their sortie, then rejoined the imperial army for the final manoeuvres which enclosed the rebels and forced their surrender.

In all his campaigns, Jia Fu was never defeated, and he had several times fought his way out of encirclement as a forlorn hope or broken the opposing line. He had been wounded a dozen times, most seriously against the Wuxiao at Zhending. Because of his readiness to drive deep into enemy positions, Guangwu was reluctant to use him on campaigns at a distance, where he was likely to get into trouble, but he greatly admired his physical courage. When other officers spoke of their successes, Jia Fu stayed silent; the emperor observed on one occasion that there was no need for him to speak, for he knew Jia Fu's merits.

In 37 Jia Fu received definitive enfeoffment as a marquis in Jiaodong with revenue from six counties.

Now that the civil war was ended, he realised Guangwu wished to reduce the military style of his regime, and that he was unwilling to have even his most worthy ministers maintain troops in the capital. He and Deng Yu, therefore, Generals of the Left and the Right, offered to resign their commands and disband their forces. Guangwu readily accepted, and rewarded them with the right to live at the capital as marquises and attend the court. Though they held no office in the civil administration, Jia Fu and Deng Yu were treated with the same courtesy as the emperor's brother-in-law Li Tong, and the three were regularly consulted, along with Excellencies and ministers, on great affairs of state.

Recognising Jia Fu as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 17/7:664-68*, 22/12:789-91, DGHJ 8:5a-6a; Bn 59:151-152, 211, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:81.

Jia Fu 賈福. In 142 Jia Fu was Administrator of Beidi when the commandery was attacked by the Gongtang tribe of the Qiang. Jia Fu attacked them with the aid of the regional commander Zhao Chong, but the enemy proved too strong and the administrative headquarters of Beidi were soon afterwards withdrawn south to Zuopingyi. -HHS 87/77:2896.

Jia Gong 賈龔; Henan>Wuwei. XTS 75B:3387 says that Jia Gong, father of Jia Xu 詡, held a military appointment and that he settled his family in Wuwei.

Jia Han 賈邯; Nanyang. A younger son of Jia Fu, after his father's great fief was abolished in 76 due to the crime of Jia Min, Emperor Zhang approved restoration of the marquissate for Jia Han, but with only a single county. See also Jia Zong. -HHS 17/7:667.

Jia Hong 賈洪 [Shuye 叔業]; Jingzhao. A keen and talented scholar, with particular interest in Chunqiu and Zuo zhuan, in the late 190s Jia Hong held local office in his commandery. He was sent to the capital as Reporting Officer, then joined the staff of the province under the Director of Retainers Zhong Yao. Among all the local officers, only Jia Hong and Yan Bao were scholars of any quality.

Jia Hong served as brevet magistrate in three counties, and in each place he set up and taught in an informal school.

When Ma Chao rebelled with the other north-western warlords in 211 he captured Jia Hong and forced him to write a proclamation for him; Zhong Yao recognised his calligraphy. After the defeat of the warlords Jia Hong was appointed to Cao Cao's staff, but because of the proclamation he was not fully trusted. He was later sent out again as a magistrate, this time in the east of the empire.

When Cao Pi took the imperial throne in 220 he appointed Jia Hong as Chancellor to Cao Biao, Duke and then King of Boma. Cao Biao was also fond of scholarship, and the two men became close friends. When Jia Hong died about 225, aged a little more than fifty, there was general regret that he had not risen to higher rank.

Yu Huan, compiler of Wei lue, identified Jia Hong as one of seven Confucian Exemplars 儒宗 who maintained the tradition of Han scholarship in times of disorder. -SGZ 13:421; Fang 52:170-171.

Jia Hu 賈護. Having studied composition and calligraphy, Jia Hu became a favourite of Emperor Ling and was a senior Palace Attendant. In 177 Cai Yong criticised him as a man of mean family, with frivolous skills, leader of a gang of sycophants. -HHS 60/50B:1992.

Jia Hui 賈徽 [Yuanbo 元伯]; Youfufeng. Descended from a long line of scholars and officials, at the end of Former Han Jia Hui studied Zuo zhuan under Liu Xin 劉歆, and compiled a commentary entitled Zuoshi tiaoli 左氏條例. He also studied the Classic of Poetry according to the Old Text school of Mao, the Old Text History, Ritual, and Guo yu. He served for a time as a county magistrate in Yingchuan.

Jia Hui's son Kui was born in 30, and began his studies under his father's guidance. -HHS 36/26:1234; Tjan 49:153-155.

Jia Ji 賈期 see Jia Qi 賈期.

Jia Jian 賈建; Nanyang. Son of Jia Can, he inherited his fief. In 114 he married the Princess Liu Li, daughter of the late Emperor He, who possessed the income from three counties in her own right. The regent Dowager Deng regarded Jia Jian with great favour and appointed him a Palace Attendant. In the time of Emperor Shun he became Minister of the Household. -HHS 17/7:668.

Jia Kui 賈逵 [Jingbo 景伯] (30-101); Youfufeng. Son of Jia Hui, Jia Kui followed his father's scholarly interest in Zuo zhuan and while still a child he was familiar with the basic texts of all the classics. As a young man he studied at the University in Luoyang, and was noted both for his devotion to learning and for his unusual height of eight feet two inches [190 cm]. A popular rhyming couplet claimed there was no question "Tall-Boy Jia" 賈長頭 could not answer.

Jia Kui's preference was for the Old Text tradition, but he taught the Classic of History according to the New Text school of Xiahou, and he was well acquainted with scholarship on the Guliang commentary to Chunqiu. Like his father, he had particular understanding of Zuo zhuan and Guo yu, and he compiled an "Explanation and Commentary" 解詁 to the two texts in fifty-one pian. He presented the work to Emperor Ming, who admired it and had it placed in the imperial collection, and he also compiled a detailed commentary to the Li sao 離騷 of Qu Yuan 屈原, parallel to that of his colleague Ban Gu [Yao Zhenzong:2414].

At this time a flock of strange birds gathered at the palace. Emperor Ming asked his cousin Liu Fu about them, and Liu Fu suggested he consult Jia Kui. Jia Kui explained that they were the spirits of non-Chinese northerners who had surrendered to Emperor Xuan of Former Han. Impressed by this, the emperor appointed Jia Kui to the library of the Orchid Terrace, and had him compile Sherjue song 神雀頌 "Hymn to the Sacred Birds." Wang Chong has a slightly different story: all officials were invited to compose hymns, but only those of Jia Kui, Ban Gu, Fu Yi, Yang Zhong and Hou Li were of high quality [Lun heng 25; Forke 11: 274].

Jia Kui joined Ban Gu in editing books in the imperial library. Liu Da, Emperor Zhang, was interested in Confucianism, with particular concern for the Old Text of History and for Zuo zhuan. Soon after he came to the throne, in 76 he called Jia Kui to discuss questions of scholarship both in the White Tiger Hall of the Northern Palace and at the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace. Delighted with his presentations, he commissioned Jia Kui to expound the manner in which Zuo zhuan was superior to the Gongyang and Guliang commentaries to Chunqiu. Jia Kui presented a long memorial, preserved in his biography, which argues that only Zuo zhuan agrees with the established texts of prognostication 圖讖. This was again received with approval, Jia Kui was rewarded with presents, and orders were given that he should select twenty good young scholars from amongst those currently studying the Gongyang commentary, instruct them in Zuo zhuan, and compile a new edition of the classic and the commentary.

The emperor frequently called Jia Kui to discuss the Old Text History and expound its connection to other classics and to the Er ya 爾雅 dictionary, while he commissioned him to prepare comparisons between the Old and New Texts of both History and Poetry and also a commentary to Zhou li, an Old Text work which had been sponsored by Liu Xin 劉歆 of Former Han but had since fallen from favour. Concerned that he should have no distractions from his work, the emperor sent twenty thousand cash to Jia Kui's aging mother, while Jia Kui himself was appointed commander of the guards in the Northern Palace.

Scholars of the official New Text were increasingly concerned at this support for their rival, and the Academician Li Yu was a leader of opposition to Zuo zhuan. In 79, on a proposal of Yang Zhong, a formal conference was held in the White Tiger Hall 白虎觀, under the patronage and in the presence of the emperor, to resolve the multitude of disagreements [see sub Ban Gu]. It is known that Jia Kui took part in the conference, but the surviving record of the discussions, Bohu tong 白虎通, reflects almost entirely the teachings of New Text. There is question of how much may have been amended, interpolated, or even forged since the original compilation, but it would appear, as Tjan suggests, that the academic establishment carried the day, and the interests of Jia Kui and his imperial patron were defeated.

On the other hand, as Tjan also observes, Emperor Zhang maintained his support. An edict of 83 expressed concern at the deterioration of learning and the proliferation of detailed and over-long commentaries. At the same time there were renewed instructions for good students to be introduced to the study of Zuo zhuan with the Guliang commentary, together with the Old Text of the History and the Mao interpretation of the Poetry, also in Old Text tradition, while the emperor appointed nominees of Jia Kui to be gentlemen at the court of his senior son Liu Kang the King of Qiansheng.

In the long term, though New Text retained formal dominance until the end of Han, the most energetic and imaginative scholars were those of the Old Text tradition which had been largely revived by Jia Kui.

In 85, with advice from Bian Xin and Li Fan, officers of the Bureau of Astronomy, Emperor Zhang promulgated a new calendar based upon an amended version of the ancient Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] system. There remained, however, several questions of fine tuning, and because of his experience of historical dating Jia Kui was commissioned to consult with various experts and present a report. In 92, moreover, after the accession of Emperor He, Jia Kui prepared Li lun 歷論, a fuller "Essay on the Calendar:" extensive quotations are preserved in the Treatise on Pitchpipes and the Calendar 律歷志 of Sima Biao.

In 91 Jia Kui was made a General of the Household in charge of a corps of gentleman cadets at the court of Emperor He, and in 97 he became a Palace Attendant and a Commandant of Cavalry. He continued to receive high trust, was influential in study and debate, and compiled a quantity of scholarly commentary and literary compositions, but his manner was considered too informal for senior administrative office. When he died at the age of seventy-one Jia Kui received official mourning, and his two sons were appointed to the suite of the Heir. -HHS 36/26:1234-40*, 92/2:3027-30, XC 1:14a-b; Tjan 49:154-165, Texts:347-356 [Loewe] and 27 [Boltz], MBeck 90:24, 59, Needham 59:200, 287.

Jia Kui 賈逵 or Jia Qu 衢 [Liangdao 梁道] (174-228); Hedong. Jia Kui's father died when he was young, and though the family was of good quality they were so poor that Jia Kui had no trousers to wear in winter; he took a pair from his uncle Liu Fu. He was a keen scholar, with broad knowledge of the classics and particular interest in Chunqiu and Zuo zhuan.

In 202 Jia Kui was brevet magistrate of Jiang county in Hedong, his home commandery, on the middle Fen River. Guo Yuan, named Administrator by the Yuan group, invaded the commandery from the east, and though Jia Kui attempted to hold the city for Cao Cao he was compelled to surrender. The elders of Jiang obtained a promise from Guo Yuan that he would not harm Jia Kui, and though Jia Kui abused Guo Yuan, and he threatened to kill him, the people clamoured in his favour and Guo Yuan sent him to prison in Shangdang. He was rescued by Zhu Gongdao.

Jia Kui had earlier noted that the county of Pishi, by the junction of the Fen with the Yellow River, was of critical strategic importance, and while the siege of Jiang was still in progress he sent an urgent message to the commandery authorities that they should occupy that city. After he was captured, he persuaded Guo Yuan's adviser Zhu Ao to keep Guo Yuan halted for a week. During that time Cao Cao's men were able to enter Pishi and prepare their defences.

Jia Kui received provincial nomination as Abundant Talent and was appointed full magistrate of Mianchi in Hongnong. As Gao Gan of the Yuan family attacked Hedong, the local leader Zhang Yan planned to join the invaders but Jia Kui, having first pretended to support him, turned and destroyed him.

Jia Kui later joined the offices of Cao Cao as Imperial Chancellor. On one occasion he angered Cao Cao when he and two colleagues wrote to protest against a foolhardy plan to attack Sun Quan during unfavourable weather. Jia Kui insisted that the responsibility was his alone; he was sent to prison, but Cao Cao came to appreciate his loyalty.

As Cao Cao attacked the western warlords in 211 Jia Kui was named Administrator of Hongnong. He was dismissed after a demarcation dispute with the head of a military colony, but when Cao Cao attacked Liu Bei in 219 Jia Kui served as his scout and adviser, and he was then appointed Counsellor Remonstrant.

When Cao Cao died at Luoyang in 220, there was a mutiny among the Qingzhou Troops, originally formed from surrendered Yellow Turbans. Jia Kui settled them, then disbanded the force and had the men return to their home country in the east. Cao Cao's second son Cao Zhang came to Luoyang and enquired about the royal insignia, but Jia Kui rebuked him and sent him away. He reported Cao Cao's death to Cao Pi at Ye city, took part in arrangements for his succession, and was appointed Prefect of Ye and then Administrator of Wei commandery, restoring order in the heartland of the new empire.

Jia Kui was later Inspector of Yu province, where he maintained a strict administration and firm defence. He took part in several campaigns to the south, and in 228 he rescued Cao Xiu, a personal rival, from a trap set by the Wu. He was granted enfeoffment, and when he died the people of the province erected a stele and held sacrifices in his honour. -SGZ 15:479-84*.

Jia Lan 賈覽 (d.36?). A general in the service of Lu Fang, in the summer of 30 Jia Lan defeated and killed Liu Xing, Guangwu's Administrator of Dai commandery, and took over the territory.

Later that year Jia Lan was in Beidi with a force of Xiongnu led by a king. The Han general Feng Yi, advancing from the Wei valley, drove them away and took the territory south of the Ordos.

In 33 Jia Lan was faced by a major offensive against Gaoliu from an army of Guangwu under Wu Han, but he received support from Min Kan and a force of Xiongnu cavalry. Aided by a heavy rainstorm they defeated the imperial forces, and further attacks in the winter and spring were resisted with equal success.

In 36 Jia Lan was ordered to support Lu Fang's attack on Yunzhong commandery by a simultaneous invasion from the east, but then his colleague Sui Yu changed sides, Jia Lan was put to flight and was probably killed. Dai commandery returned to the control of Han. -HHS 12/2:507, 17/7:651; Bn 67:106-110.

Jia Lang 賈朗. A member of the Imperial Secretariat, Jia Lang was a friend of the eunuch Zhang Fang. When the Director of Retainers Yu Xu accused Zhang Fang of conspiracy and extortion in 126, the matter was referred to the Secretariat. Jia Lang reported against Yu Xu, but on the urgings of the eunuchs Sun Cheng and Gao Fan, Zhang Fang was found guilty and was exiled. Jia Lang and other officers of the Secretariat were either executed or sentenced to convict service. -HHS 58/48:1871.

Another report of conspiracy involving Zhang Fan appears in the Treatise of Astronomy, HHS 101/11:3243. There it is said that two members of the Secretariat were executed, while other officials at the court, in the provinces and on the frontier were able to expiate their faults by paying a fine. Though there is no mention of Jia Lang, this would appear to be the same affair. Cf. sub Zhang Fang.

Jia Long 賈龍 (d.191); Jianwei [some texts, probably mistaken, say that he came from Shu]. A man of family, Jia Long was Assistant Officer of the provincial government in 188 when the Inspector Que Jian was killed and the north of Yi province was over-run by rebels under the leadership of Ma Xiang. With a nucleus of family troops, Jia Long collected a loyalist force of a thousand men for a counter-attack. Ma Xiang was defeated and killed, the rebellion was settled, and Jia Long led his men north to receive the new Governor Liu Yan, who appointed him as a colonel.

In 191, as Liu Yan made himself independent of the court of Han, Jia Long led troops against him. Sources disagree whether he acted in close alliance with the Administrator of Jianwei Ren Qi, who also led an insurrection about this time, or whether he acted separately in response to encouragement from Zhao Qian, an officer of the government at Chang'an. In any event, the attack was defeated and Jia Long was killed. -HHS 75/65:2432, SGZ Shu 1:866-67, HYGZ 5:70.

Jia Min 賈敏; Nanyang. Son of Jia Zhong, he inherited the marquissate of Jiaodong which had first been awarded to his grandfather Jia Fu. In 76 he was found to have wrongfully accused his mother of murder; the fief was abolished. -HHS 17/7:667.

Jia Mu 賈穆; Wuwei. Eldest son of Jia Xu, he succeeded to his fief in 223 and held regional appointments under Wei. -SGZ 10:331.

Jia Na 賈納; Henan. XTS 76B:3387 says that Jia Na was a son of Jia Yuan; see sub Jia Xu 詡.

Jia Pi 賈丕; Henan. XTS 76B:3387 says that Jia Pi was a son of Jia Yuan; see sub Jia Xu 詡.

Jia Qi 賈期 (d.26); Henan. Leader of a group of bandits in south-eastern Henan, Jia Qi joined Yan Zhong and Zhao Dun of Yingchuan to plunder the region. In 26 Kou Xun was sent as Administrator to Yingchuan, aided by the general Hou Jin. Jia Qi was captured and executed and the territory was settled. -HHS 16/6:623.

Jia Qiang 賈彊 (d.25). In 25 Jia Qiang was second in command to Su Mao in his attack on Henei. They were defeated by Liu Xiu's Administrator Kou Xun, and Jia Qiang was killed. -HHS 16/6:622.

Jia Qu 賈衢 see Jia Kui 賈逵. Jia Kui's original personal name was Qu, but he changed it. -SGZ 15:481.

Jia Shu 賈淑 [Zihou 子厚 or Ziyu 子序]; Taiyuan. A fellow-countryman of Guo Tai, and a man of old official family, Jia Shu was aggressive by nature and the local people disliked and feared him.

About 160 Jia Shu killed a man to avenge his uncle Song Yuan. He was arrested by the county officers and condemned to death. Touched by his mother's distress and impressed by Jia Shu's own show of remorse, Guo Tai interceded for him, first with the county magistrate and then with the commandery authorities. Jia Shu was released.

When Guo Tai's mother died Jia Shu attended the funeral. Another gentleman, Sun Weizhi, who was also present, was offended that someone of such poor quality as Jia Shu should be there, and he was going to leave. Guo Tai explained that Jia Shu had great potential, and so Sun Weizhi stayed.

Jia Shu overheard Guo Tai's comment. Resolving to change his ways, he made amends to the neighbours he had offended, and became known as a gentleman of the finest quality. -HHS 68/58:2229-30, XC 4:10a-b.

Jia Tingyu 賈廷玉; Henan. XTS 75B:3387 says that Jia Tingyu was a son of Jia Yi and brother of Jia Xiuyu. I suspect, however, that this generation did not exist: see sub Jia Xiuyu.

Jia [Wuzhong] 賈武中 (36-64); Nanyang. Fifth son of Jia Fu, Jia Wuzhong married Ma Jiang, a daughter of the general Ma Yuan. He died at the age of twenty-nine sui. -Nagata 94:44.

Jia Xi 賈習; Hedong. Grandfather of Jia Kui, he prophesied a military career for him after watching how he played with toy soldiers as a child. -SGZ 15: 479.

Jia Xian 家羨 was a county magistrate in Beihai. -FSTY 5f:132.

Jia Xin 賈信. Early in 203, as Cao Cao made a temporary withdrawal from his offensive against Yuan Tan and Yuan Shang, he left Jia Xin in garrison in Wei commandery.

In 212 Jia Xin was sent to deal with the north-eastern rebels Tian Yan and Su Bo. -SGZ 1:23, 14:429.

Jia Xiuyu 賈秀玉; Henan. XTS 75B:3387 says that Jia Xiuyu, great-grandfather of Jia Xu 詡, was Administrator of Wuwei. It is hard to believe, however, that a man of that name could exist in Later Han, because the character xiu, personal name of the founding Emperor Guangwu, was subject to taboo. I suspect the generation did not exist.

Jia Xu 賈栩 [Yuanji 元集]; Guanghan. Because of his father's death in a family feud, Meng Boyuan wanted to kill Jia Xu. He was arrested by the local authorities, but Jia Xu killed himself in order to end the chain of violence. Jia Xu was praised by the moral commentator Li Sheng. -HYGZ 10B:150-51.

Jia Xu 賈許 [Weikang 偉康]. Working in the market as a butcher or a wine-merchant, both regarded as disgraceful occupations, Jia Xu was appreciated by Guo Tai and became well-known. -XC 4:10a.

Jia Xu 賈詡 [Wenhe 文和] (147-223); Wuwei. Though Jia Xu's biography in SGZ 10 has no mention of his ancestry, high officials of the Jia surname under Tang claimed descent from him, and XTS 76B:3387-88 presents a long and detailed lineage, including the Former Han statesman Jia Yi 賈誼, a man of Luoyang, and says that Jia Xu's father Gong held military office and moved his family to Wuwei. There are doubts about dating, and apparent anachronisms: see, for example sub Jia Ye, Jia Yi and Jia Xiuyu. I nonetheless provide entries for the names of Jia Xu's putative ancestors back to Jia Ye.

SGZ says that when he was young Jia Xu was not well recognised, but the judge of character Yan Zhong admired his potential and about 170 he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet at the capital. Leaving on account of illness, on the journey home he was captured by rebel Di, but while the others of his party were killed Jia Xu falsely claimed kinship with the frontier general Duan Jiong and was escorted by his captors to safety.

When Dong Zhuo seized power at Luoyang in 189 Jia Xu was a clerk in the offices of the Excellencies, but then held a series of military appointments. At the time Dong Zhuo was assassinated in 192 Jia Xu was a colonel with the army of Niu Fu, but Niu Fu was killed in a mutiny soon afterwards. As Li Jue and Niu Fu's other subordinates felt threatened by the new regime at Chang'an under Wang Yun, Jia Xu persuaded them that their best hope was to attack the capital directly. The enterprise was completely successful, Li Jue and his fellows gained power, but Jia Xu refused any rewards and took an ordinary post in the Imperial Secretariat, though he had responsibility for appointments. He retired from that office when his mother died, then became a Household Counsellor, still influential in the counsels of the leaders. He tried to keep peace and some order amongst them, and on his advice and that of Zhou Zhong the new regime called the potential enemy Zhu Jun back into imperial service at Chang'an, evidently in the hope he might serve as an ally against the excesses of the ramshackle warlords.

In 195, as Li Jue and Guo Si fought in the capital and the emperor began his escape to the east, Jia Xu remained with Li Jue and acted to keep him under some moral control. He persuaded the Qiang and other non-Chinese groups to leave the capital before they plundered it, and he saved several officials from death after Li Jue captured them.

Soon afterwards Jia Xu joined his fellow-countryman Duan Wei in western Hongnong. Many among Duan Wei's troops knew and admired him, and Jia Xu became anxious that Duan Wei might be jealous and suspicious. He therefore left his family in Duan Wei's care and went to Zhang Xiu in Nanyang, who was fighting Cao Cao on behalf of Liu Biao. Jia Xu established himself as a close adviser.

In 199, when Yuan Shao sent an envoy to seek support against Cao Cao, Jia Xu persuaded Zhang Xi to a volte-face, allying himself with Cao Cao instead. Cao Cao, suitably grateful, granted Jia Xu ministerial rank and enfeoffment, and kept him regularly in his council. Jia Xu, for his part, recognising he had no long and close connection, was careful to give Cao Cao no cause to suspect his loyalty or ambition.

Jia Xu accompanied Cao Cao to Jing province in 208, where he advised against the risky advance which led to defeat at the Red Cliffs, and to the northwest in 211, where he encouraged Cao Cao to a pretence of negotiations with the enemy warlords as a means to divide them.

In 213 Jia Xu was among the senior officials who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. About 217, as Cao Cao was considering whether to appoint his eldest son Pi, or his favourite Zhi, as Heir, Jia Xu supported Cao Pi, citing the example of Yuan Shao and Liu Biao, who had ruined their families by allowing a younger son to succeed in despite of the eldest.

As Cao Cao died and Cao Pi succeeded him in 220, Jia Xu became Grand Commandant of the kingdom of Wei, and he was a sponsor of the stele which commemorated Cao Pi's accession to the imperial throne. He continued as Grand Commandant of the new dynasty for three years until his death, but he had limited authority, and Cao Pi did not accept his advice to avoid further campaigns against Wu and Shu-Han. -SGZ 10:326-31*.

Jia Yan 賈衍; Henan. XTS 75B:3387 says that Jia Yan, grandfather of Jia Xu 詡, was Inspector of Yan province.

Jia Yao 賈瑤 see Jia Cong 賈琮.

Jia Ye 賈曄; Henan. XTS 76B:3387 says that Jia Ye was a descendant of the statesman Jia Yi 賈誼 of Former Han, and that he became Administrator of Xiapi. Generation count indicates that this should have been early in Later Han, but Linhuai commandery was named Xiapi only in 72. See sub Jia Ye's putative descendant Jia Xu 詡.

Jia Yi 賈沂; Henan. XTS 76B:3387 says that Jia Yi was the son of Jia Pi, and that he became Custodian of the Private Library (mishu jian 祕書監). This office was not established until 159, and the statement appears anachronistic, for XTS also says that Jia Yi was the great-great-grandfather of Jia Xu 詡, who was born in 147.

Jia Yu 賈育; Nanyang. Son of Jia Han, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 17/7:667.

Jia Yuan 賈淵; Henan. XTS 76B:3387 says that Jia Yuan, a son of Jia Ye, became Administrator of Liaodong. This would have been in the first century; see sub Jia Xu 詡.

Jia Zhang 賈長 see Jia Chang 賈長.

Jia Zhong 賈忠; Nanyang. Son of Jia Fu and elder brother of Jia Han and Jia Zong, he inherited their father's fief in 55. -HHS 17/7:667.

Jia Zong 賈宗 [Wuru 武孺] (d.88); Nanyang. Son of Jia Fu and younger brother of Jia Zhong and Jia Han, Jia Zong was a man of fine principles, known for his wise counsel. After their father's great fief was abolished in 76 due to the crime of their nephew Jia Min, Emperor Zhang approved renewal of the marquisate for Jia Han, and another was created for Jia Zong. Each, however, had only a single county.

Jia Zong became a gentleman cadet, and about 80 he was sent as Administrator to Shuofang. Hitherto, when people from within the empire were transferred to the frontier they were generally poor, oppressed by the locals, and were not eligible for commandery office. Jia Zong, however, allowed immigrants to be selected along with the native-born. As each group checked the other, wrongdoers were removed, while those who did well received senior posts and gave utmost loyalty. Impressed by this, and by Jia Zong's reputation as a son of Jia Fu, the Xiongnu ceased raiding the borders.

Returning to the capital as a colonel in the Northern Army, Jia Zong developed his Confucian scholarship. At a time of drought in 85 he proposed unsuccessfully that punishments should be applied outside the traditional winter season, and he held a number of debates with the celebrated scholar and Minister Steward Ding Hong. All the court mourned his death. -HHS 17/7:667-68.

Jia Zong 賈琮 see Jia Cong 賈琮.

Jian 建 of Qiuzi [Kuqa]. King of Qiuzi by favour of the Northern Xiongnu, Jian shared control of the Northern Road of the Tarim basin with the state of Yanqi [Karashar]. In 73 he attacked Shule [Kashgar], killed its King Cheng and set his own officer Douti on the throne. Later that year, however, the Chinese envoy Ban Chao restored the native dynasty there and sent Douti back to Qiuzi.

In 75 Jian sent troops to Yanqi to destroy the Han Protector-General Chen Mu, then made another attack on Shule and again forced its submission. Ban Chao returned and restored the situation. -HHS 47/37:1574-75, 88/78:2926.

Jian 建 of Yutian [Khotan] (d.152). In 151 the Chinese agent Zhao Xu died at Yutian. King Jian of that state was slandered by his rival King Chengguo of Jumi [present-day Yutian], who told Zhao Xu's son that he had poisoned him. The young man believed this and reported it to Ma Da the Administrator of Dunhuang, who encouraged the new officer Wang Jing to investigate.

As Wang Jing was on his way to Yutian, Chengguo repeated the story, and Wang Jing attempted to hold Jian for investigation during a feast. Before any arrest could be made, Chengguo's staff officer Qinmu, who was present at the gathering, came forward and killed him. -HHS 88/78:2916.

Jian Fu 堅浮; Yingchuan. Son of Jian Hong, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 22/12:784.

Jian Hong 堅鴻; Yingchuan. Son of Jian Tan, he succeeded to his fief in 50. -HHS 22/12:784.

Jian Lan 蹇蘭 was an Inspector of Jiaozhi.

Jian Lang 蹇朗 see Han Lang 寒朗.

Jian Qiong 賤瓊 became Administrator of Youbeiping. -FSTY 6f:144.

Jian Shi 蹇碩 (d.189); Yingchuan. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates, Jian Shi was strong and warlike. In 188, as Emperor Ling established the eight colonels of the Western Garden, evidently planned as his personal army, he appointed Jian Shi Colonel of the First Army 上軍校尉. Not only was he chief among his fellows, but the General-in-Chief He Jin, formal commander of the regular Northern Army, was also placed under his orders.

After the death of Emperor Ling in the following year, Jian Shi planned to assassinate the General-in-Chief He Jin, uncle of the elder imperial son Liu Bian, and place the younger brother Liu Xie on the throne. Warned by Jian Shi's junior officer Pan Yin, He Jin withdrew from the palace, gathered his troops, and forced the succession through from a distance.

Jian Shi made plans against He Jin, but his conspiracy with other senior eunuchs was revealed by Guo Sheng. Jian Shi was arrested and killed, and He Jin took over his troops. -HHS 8:356-58, 69/59:2247-48, HHJ 25:303-07.

Jian Tan 堅鐔 [Ziji 子伋 or Zipi 子皮] (d.50); Yingchuan. A local officer in his county, Jian Tan was recommended to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, when he was sent as commissioner in the north by the Gengshi Emperor in 24. Jian Tan was a fellow-countryman of Fu Jun, who had served Liu Xiu before, and it is likely that Jian Tan accompanied him to Liu Xiu and received his nomination.

Because of his clerical experience Jian Tan was first appointed as Registrar, but he then became a lieutenant-general and took part in all the campaigns in the north. When Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 Jian Tan was made a full general and enfeoffed with a county in Runan.

He went with the imperial army to attack Luoyang, still held by the Gengshi Emperor's commander Zhu Wei. One of Zhu Wei's officers, responsible for the eastern wall of the city, wrote secretly to Jian Tan and undertook to open one of the gates at dawn. Jian Tan and the general Zhu You got in and fought with Zhu Wei's men. Though they were obliged to withdraw, they had inflicted heavy losses, and the incident confirmed Zhu Wei's decision to surrender.

Early in 26 Jian Tan took part in the campaign of Wu Han against the Tanxiang bandit group in Wei commandery, and soon afterwards he was sent under the general Wan Xiu into Nanyang. The campaign was initially successful, but in the autumn the local leader Dong Xin led a rebellion which seized Wan city, capital of the commandery, and captured the administrator Liu Lin. Returning to Wan, Jian Tan selected a group of volunteers to climb the wall by night and open the gates. Dong Xin abandoned the city and returned to his home territory nearby on the east.

About this time the general Deng Feng rebelled and drove off his erstwhile commander Wu Han, while Jian Tan's own superior, Wan Xiu, died of illness. Faced by Dong Xin on the north and Deng Feng to the south, Jian Tan and his men were isolated in Wan, cut off from the main imperial forces and from their sources of supply. With a diet of simple vegetables, Jian Tan shared his men's hardships and took the lead in the defence. Though he was wounded three times, he held the troop together for several months. Then Guangwu brought an army into Nanyang early in 27, and Dong Xin and Deng Feng were defeated and surrendered.

Jian Tan was once more appointed to the emperor's staff, and accompanied him thereafter on his campaigns. In 30 his fief was transferred to a county in Jiujiang. It is not known when he retired from the imperial service, but he died in 50 without any further incident recorded against his name. When Emperor Ming had portraits of his father's great servants painted on the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang, Jian Tan was one of those who were honoured. -HHS 22/12:783*; Bn 59:153-154, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:86.

Jian Wei 蹇威; Ba. A local commandery officer, Jian Wei was killed by brigands about 150. -HYGZ 1:6.

Jian Ya 堅雅; Yingchuan. Son of Jian Fu, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 22/12:784.

Jian Yin 蹇胤; Ba. In 201 Jian Yin persuaded Liu Zhang the warlord Governor of Yi province to change the names of the various divisions which had been made from Ba commandery of Later Han. -HYGZ 1: 8.

Jian Yong 簡雍 [Xianhe 憲和]; Zhuo. The surname of Jian Yong was originally Geng, but the two characters 簡 and 耿 were pronounced the same in northern dialects, and so it changed.

A friend of Liu Bei when they were young, Jian Yong accompanied him on his travels, served on his staff and, with Mi Zhu and Sun Gan, was a close confidant. He treated Liu Bei with marked informality and gave him jocular but outspoken advice. When Liu Bei entered Yi province in 211, the Governor Liu Zhang had shown his admiration for him, and as Liu Bei laid siege to Chengdu in 214 he sent Jian Yong into the city to persuade Liu Zhang to surrender. Jian Yong was given title as a general, but remained on Liu Bei's personal staff. -SGZ Shu 8:970-71*.

Jian Yu 賤虞 of Lu is mentioned in FSTY 6f:144.

Jian Zhong 諫忠 was an officer of the Censorate. -FSTY 6f:144.

Jiang 姜 [a woman bandit] see sub Zheng Jiang.

Jiang 姜, the Lady I; Ba. The Lady Jiang was the mother of Xian Ni, but nothing more is known of them. -HYGZ 12:222.

Jiang 姜, the Lady II (d.213). Mother of Jiang Xu, she had also cared for her nephew Yang Fu when he was a child. In 213, when Yang Fu urged Jiang Xu to make a rising against Ma Chao in Hanyang, she encouraged the plan. Ma Chao was defeated, but as he retreated he captured Li city where the Lady was living.

When she was brought before him, the Lady abused Ma Chao for abandoning his father Ma Teng [who had been killed as a hostage by Cao Cao] and for murdering his lord the Inspector Wei Kang. Ma Chao killed her and some of her children.

Yang Fu later reported on the Lady's conduct, and Cao Cao issued a proclamation to honour her courage. -SGZ 25:701-03; deC 96:454-456.

Jiang 蔣 [personal name unknown] (88-152). A man of old official family, he became chancellor of a county marquisate in Yuzhang. When he died in office at the age of sixty-five, he was deeply mourned by his daughter and a stele was erected in his honour. -LS 6: 15a-17a.

Jiang Chong 蔣崇. Chancellor of Beihai, Jiang Chong sent his Officer of Merit Xu Meng to tour his territory as the "eyes and ears" of his administration. -XC 7:12b.

Jiang Gan 蔣幹 [Ziyi 子翼]; Jiujiang. Known as the finest debater of the region, about 209 Jiang Gan was sent by Cao Cao in an attempt to suborn Sun Quan's commander Zhou Yu. Zhou Yu received him courteously but rejected his advances. -SGZ Wu 9: 1265.

Jiang Ge 江革 [Ciweng 次翁 or Cibo 次伯]; Qi. When Jiang Ge was young his father died and he lived alone with his mother. During the troubles at the end of Han he was caught by bandits, but persuaded them to let him go so that he could find food for her. They travelled to Xiapi, where they lived very poorly, but Jiang Ge always provided for her.

They returned home about 50, by which time his mother was old, and in order to avoid disturbing her he pulled the carriage himself rather than using an ox or a horse. The people nicknamed him Great Piety 巨孝, and the Administrator invited him to office, but because of his mother he would not accept. When his mother died he lived in a hut by her tomb during the mourning period, but eventually accepted office in the commandery.

Early in the reign of Emperor Ming Jiang Ge was nominated Filial and Incurrupt, served as a gentleman cadet, and was then Coachman to Liu Ying the King of Chu. He left that office after a few weeks, and despite threats and blandishments he refused to go back. He later accepted invitations from the Excellencies, but again left soon afterwards.

About 77 the Grand Commandant Mou Rong nominated Jiang Ge as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright, and he became head of the office of the Excellency of Works. Emperor Zhang was impressed by the fact that he refused contact with his distaff relatives Ma Liao and Dou Xian. He appointed him a General of the Household, showed him special respect and attention at court, and when Jiang Ge was taken ill he sent him special delicacies.

Because of his illness Jiang Ge asked to retire, but instead he was granted a less onerous position as Counsellor Remonstrant. Eventually he was allowed home, but in the late 80s Emperor Zhang recalled his fine conduct: he wrote to the Chancellor of Qi to enquire about his health. Referring to Jiang Ge's old nickname of Great Piety, which thus became widely known, the ruler ordered that he receive an annual donation of meat and wine, and when Jiang Ge died his family was granted a great quantity of grain. -HHS 39/29:1302-03*, XC 2.b.

Jiang Gong 姜肱 [Bohuai 伯淮] (96-173); Pengcheng. Jiang Gong and his brothers Zhonghai and Jijiang were men of established family: their father had been Chancellor of Rencheng and their grandfather Administrator of Yuzhang. Celebrated for filial piety and close friendship, they slept under the same coverlet and even when they married they were unwilling to be separated. Having bedded their wives just long enough to sire an heir, they sent the women back home.

Jiang Gong had broad knowledge of the Confucian classics and of astronomy. Thousands of students came to attend him, while his brothers were only slightly less celebrated. On one occasion Jiang Gong and Jiang Jijiang were travelling at night to the commandery capital when they encountered robbers upon the road who intended to kill them. Each, however, begged for his brother's life, Jiang Gong explaining that Jijiang was his parents' solace and was not yet married, while Jijiang argued that his elder brother was of far greater virtue and value. Impressed by such self-sacrifice, the bandits took their goods but let both men go.

When the two men arrived at the city, they were asked how they had lost their clothes. They gave some excuse, but neither mentioned the bandits. When the robbers heard about this, they were very impressed and went to the brothers' lodging to apologise and return what they had taken. Jiang Gong refused to take back his property, but instead treated the robbers to wine and food, then sent them away. Another version of the story says that the robbers overlooked some money lying in the bottom of the carriage. Jiang Gong sent someone after them to give them this too, and when they demurred he pressed it into their hands himself.

Jiang Gong thus displayed his indifference to worldly things, and though they received many invitations and nominations neither he nor his brothers would accept office. When Chen Fan became Director of the Secretariat under the personal government of Emperor Huan in 159, he recommended Jiang Gong as one of the five most worthy men of the empire. A special carriage was sent to invite him to the capital, but he would not go. The emperor sent an artist to Pengcheng to paint his portrait, but Jiang Gong claimed to be suffering from dizzy spells; he lay in the dark with a cover over his face, and the man was obliged to return without a likeness.

After the eunuchs had overthrown the government of Dou Wu and Chen Fan in 168, Jiang Gong was again noted as one of the most admired men of the empire. He was named Administrator of Jianwei, but refused to go and fled to the coast. The emperor himself sent an edict in his own hand asking him to accept appointment as a Palace Counsellor, but when this came to his door Jiang Gong fled away completely, taking an assumed name and making his living by the practice of divination. Not even his family knew where he was, and it was not for some time, after the edict of invitation was revoked, that he returned.

Jiang Gong died in his own home, and his disciples Liu Cao, Shentu Pan and others composed and erected a stele in his honour. -HHS 53/43:1749-50*, XC 3:3a-4a, Cai 2:6; Vervoorn 90:179-181, deC 89:15-17.

FSTY 5:40; Nylan 83:474-476, which mistakenly gives Jiang Gong's style as Boya 伯雅, says that Jiang Gong fled the invitations he received from the eunuch government by sailing away on a raft [cf. Analects V.6], and that he was never seen again. Ying Shao contrasts his refusal to serve the eunuch regime with that of the weaker position taken by Wei Zhu.

Jiang Gong 江宮 (d.200); Runan. A local bandit, Jiang Gong and his group were destroyed by Li Tong, who sent his head to Cao Cao. -SGZ 18:535

Jiang Han 江漢 [Zifu 子甫]. For several years in the early 140s the territory of Danyang was ravaged by bandits and pirates led by Yu Lai and Lu Gong. When Jiang Han was appointed Administrator he trained a volunteer militia, and by 145 he had defeated the enemy and killed their leaders. The imperial government rewarded him with a sword and a belt. -HHS 6:278, XC 8:11a.

Jiang Hao 姜昊. Holder of a small fief in Ba commandery, Jiang Hao was attacked by bandits about 150. - HYGZ 1:6.

Jiang He 姜合 (d.219); Wudu. Celebrated in the northwest of the empire for his study of the Mysteries [玄學 Xuan xue], in 213 Jiang He came to the court of Zhang Lu the theocratic warlord of Hanzhong. Claiming authority from the oracular Kongzi ban 孔子版 "Tablet of Confucius," he advised Zhang Lu's officer Li Fu that the state of Wei would take over the empire.

About 215 Li Fu passed this prophecy to Zhang Lu, encouraging him to surrender to Cao Cao, while Jiang He was one of the first to welcome the forces of Wei.

In 220 Li Fu presented a report of Jiang He's claim to the throne of Cao Pi, urging him to fulfil the destiny of his state. This began the process which led to the abdication of Han to Wei. -SGZ 2:62-63; Goodman 98:78-79.

Jiang Ji 姜濟 (d.114); Hanzhong. Well-respected locally, Jiang Ji joined the staff of the Administrator Zheng Qin. After Zheng Qin was killed by rebel Qiang in 110, Jiang Ji joined Cheng Xin and other officers in an oath of vengeance, and when the Qiang came again four years later they all fought against them. The army was successful, but the oath-bearers were killed. [On the date of the campaign see sub Cheng Xin.]

In 118 an imperial letter ordered a grant of grain to the families of the heroic band. -HYGZ 2:16, 10C:169.

Jiang Ji 蔣濟 [Zitong 子通] (d.249); Jiujiang. Having been Reporting Officer for his commandery, Jiang Ji became Attendant Officer of Yang province. Fond of wine, he was frequently drunk, and at one time, infuriated by his discourtesy, the magistrate Shi Miao set up a wooden figure, labelled it "the Drunkard Jiang Ji" 酒徒蔣濟, and shot arrows at it each morning and evening.

In 208, however, as Cao Cao's main army was engaged in Jing province, Sun Quan came to attack Hefei. Though Cao Cao had ordered the general Zhang Xi to bring relief it would be some time before he could arrive, while the Inspector of the province was outside the city and had too few troops to break the siege. Jiang Ji, however, told the Inspector that he had received a letter to say Zhang Xi was coming with forty thousand men. The Inspector believed him and sent men through the enemy lines to encourage the defence. More importantly, Sun Quan captured some of the messengers; he too believed the report, and he led his army away.

In 213 Cao Cao proposed to transfer the people from the territory between the Huai and the Yangzi so as to deprive Sun Quan of the opportunity to make use of them. Jiang Ji argued that this would only unsettle them, but Cao Cao put the policy into effect nonetheless. When the people fled south across the Yangzi, Cao Cao acknowledged his mistake and named Jiang Ji as Administrator of Danyang – since that territory was outside his control the appointment was not necessarily a compliment. In practice, Jiang Ji was soon transferred to his old position as Attendant Officer in Yang province, assisting the Inspector Wen Hui. At one time there was a rumour that Jiang Ji was planning to change allegiance to Wu, but Cao Cao expressed complete confidence in him, and later transferred him to his Imperial Chancellor's offices.

When Guan Yu attacked up the Han River in 219, there was a proposal to shift the capital from Xu city to Ye in order to avoid the threat, but Jiang Ji and Sima Yi argued that the enemy's position was unstable, and Sun Quan should be encouraged to make an attack on his rear. This indeed happened.

As Cao Pi succeeded his father in 220, he promoted Jiang Ji in the Chancellor's offices. When Cao Pi took the imperial throne, Jiang Ji was sent out briefly with a military command, then returned as a personal adviser. He held various appointments at the capital and in the field, notably as an adviser on campaigns against Wu and as a member of the Secretariat. He continued as a counsellor to Cao Rui, but protested at his extravagance. In 242 Jiang Ji became Grand Commandant to Cao Fang, and in 249 he supported Sima Yi in the coup which destroyed Cao Shuang. He died that year.

Author of Wanji lun 萬機論 "Myriad Subtleties" and Sanzhou lun 三州論 "Essay on the Three Provinces," prepared for Cao Pi, Jiang Ji is sometimes referred to as "Master Jiang" 蔣子. -SGZ 14:450-55*, 23:662.

Jiang [Jijiang] 姜季江 of Pengcheng was the youngest brother of Jiang Gong 姜肱 q.v.

Jiang Jing 江京 (d.125). A eunuch, in 106 Jiang Jing received Liu You, the future Emperor An, when he came to stay at the royal residence for Qinghe in Luoyang before the Dowager Deng placed him upon the throne. When the emperor took full power after the death of the Dowager in 121, he granted Jiang Jing a fief and promoted him from Attendant at the Yellow Gates to Regular Attendant.

Holding great influence at court, Jiang Jing took part in the destruction of the family of the late Dowager, of the Excellency Yang Zhen and of the Lady Wang Nan, who had been wet-nurse to the Heir Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. Concerned that Liu Bao might later avenge his former favourite, he then joined the accusations which brought Liu Bao's dismissal as Heir. Closely associated with the Empress Yan, her brother Yan Xian and other members of her clique, Jiang Jing became Grand Prolonger of Autumn, head of the Lady Yan's household, and was a leader of her supporters among the eunuchs.

After the death of Emperor An in 125 Jiang Jing was involved in the selection and appointment of the Little Emperor Liu Yi. Later that year, as Liu Yi was taken ill, Jiang Jing warned Yan Xian that he must continue to exclude Liu Bao, and urged him to call potential candidates from among the imperial clan to find a successor. Before this could be done, however, the Little Emperor died, and a few days later the eunuch Sun Cheng and others ran a coup which restored Liu Bao to the succession. In their first move the conspirators attacked Jiang Jing, Li Run and others in the Northern Palace, and they killed Jiang Jing. - HHS 78/68:2514-15.

Jiang Jun 蔣均; Guiyang. When Xu Jing was Administrator of Guiyang about 100, Jiang Jun came to him concerning a dispute with his brothers about property. Xu Jing was ashamed that his teaching of proper conduct had so little effect, and he sent in a report asking to be punished for his failure. Jiang Jun and his kinsmen promptly abandoned their case and asked that they might suffer instead. - HHS 76/66:2472.

Jiang Lan 江覽. When Emperor Ling set up the School at the Gate of the Vast Capital in 178 the new building contained thirty-two portraits of members of the School. Two of the men so honoured were Yue Song and Jiang Lan, but in a memorial written at that time both men were described by the scholar-official Yang Qiu as petty fellows, of mean origin and minimal capacity.

Yue Song was actually a scholar and calligrapher of some ability, and a favourite of Emperor Ling, but nothing more is known of Jiang Lan. - HHS 77/67:2499.

Jiang Mengying 姜孟穎. A disciple of Zhang Zhi, at the end of Han Jiang Mengying was a celebrated calligrapher in the cao shu 草書 "Grass Style." - JS 36:1065.

Jiang Mian 江免; Qi. Son of Jiang Ge, when his father was ill Emperor Zhang still hoped to keep him at the capital, but Jiang Ge sent Jiang Mian to assure that it was truly serious, and that he needed to return home. - HHJ 11:135.

Jiang Mo 姜謨; Hanyang. A younger cousin of Jiang Xu, in 213 Jiang Mo was sent into Ji city to co-ordinate the local revolt against Ma Chao. - SGZ 25:701.

Jiang Mu 姜穆; Guanghan. Father of Jiang Pin, Jiang Mu was a magistrate in Longxi. He was found guilty of some offence, and was sent to Shuofang with all his family. He died there in exile. - HYGZ 10B:153.

Jiang Pin 姜嬪 [Yijiu 義舊], the Lady; Guanghan. Daughter of Jiang Mu, who was a magistrate in Longxi, the Lady was betrothed to her fellow-countryman Sima Ya when her father was found guilty of some offence and was sentenced to exile in Shuofang with all his family.

Despite this forced separation, Sima Ya maintained his connection to the Lady, but when he died soon afterwards she had to arrange for other people to carry out the funeral. Then her parents died, and the Lady remained in exile with her young brother for another ten years until she eventually sought permission to return home. The emperor sympathised with her, and gave orders that in future a woman who was betrothed should not be obliged to go into exile with her family. - HYGZ 10B:153, 12:227.

Jiang Qi 姜岐 [Ziping 子平]; Hanyang. Jiang Qi's father died when he was young, and he cared for his mother until her death. He then gave the best of the family land to his brother and retired to the wilderness where he herded pigs and kept bees. Widely known as a scholar of Chunqiu, the Book of Changes and of magical arts, he had more than three hundred students. He refused all offers of appointment from both local and central governments, even under threat of force. He died of old age at home. - HHS 51/41:1695.

Jiang Qi 蔣奇 [Yiqu 義渠?]. During the fighting at Guandu in 200, Ju Shou urged Yuan Shao to send Jiang Qi with troops to cut Cao Cao's supply lines; Yuan Shao would not agree. After the defeat, Jiang Qi and Meng Dai accused Shen Pei of potential disloyalty. - HHS 74/64A:2400-02. See also Jiang Yiqu.

Jiang Qin 蔣欽 [Gongyi 公奕] (d.219); Jiujiang. Jiang Qin and his fellow-countryman Zhou Tai joined Sun Ce in 194. They accompanied him south of the Yangzi and were appointed as senior majors. Jiang Qin then took part in the conquest of Danyang, Wu, Kuaiji and Yuzhang, and having served as magistrate in three counties he became Commandant for the west of Kuaiji under Sun Quan.

About 205 Jiang Qin put down the rebellion of Lü He and Qin Lang along the southeast coast; he was promoted General of the Household and rewarded with revenue from two counties. He took part in operations in the Poyang region, and later assisted He Qi against the hills people of southern Danyang.

In 215 Jiang Qin accompanied the abortive assault on Hefei, but distinguished himself amidst the rout. He was promoted to be a general and shared command at Ruxu with Lü Meng when Cao Cao attacked in 217. He was later recalled to the capital and appointed Protector of the Army on the Right, responsible for discipline and military law.

Jiang Qin was noted for his modesty, simplicity and generosity: though Xu Sheng had acted against one of his followers, he always recommended him as a loyal and capable officer. On one occasion Sun Quan visited his house and found his women-folk in the humblest garb. He personally presented them with brocade for clothing and arranged new curtains and, as with Lü Meng, he encouraged Jiang Qin to study.

In 219 Jiang Qin took command of the fleet in the surprise attack on Guan Yu in Jing province, but became ill and died on the road back. Sun Quan wore mourning for him, granted his widow and children a tax pension and land, and later enfeoffed his son Jiang Yi 壹. -SGZ Wu 10:1286-87*.

Jiang Qiong 姜冏; Hanyang. Toward the end of Han Jiang Qiong was Officer of Merit in his commandery. During an attack by Qiang tribespeople he protected the Administrator with his own person and was killed. -SGZ Shu 14:1062; Fang 52:271.

Jiang She 江舍 (d.147); Chenliu. According to HHS 7:292-92 TC quoting Dongguan Hanji, Jiang She and Li Jian took the imperial title but were captured and executed in 147. The present text of DGHJ 3:4b does not contain that passage, and it is uncertain whether Jiang She was an associate of Li Jian or whether he was a predecessor or successor in making the imperial claim.

Jiang Shi 姜詩 [Shiyou 士遊]; Guanghan. Jiang Shi was noted for his filial piety. His mother was fond of water from the river which flowed some two kilometres away. His wife the Lady Pang Xing would go each day to fetch some, but when she returned late one day Jiang Shi sent her away. She was later permitted to return.

The old lady was also very fond of shredded carp, but did not like to eat alone. Each day, therefore, Jiang Shi and his wife prepared the fish and served it to his mother and to a neighbour woman. Eventually, in reward for their good conduct, a stream appeared alongside their dwelling, with just the same taste as the water of the more distant river, and every morning there were two fresh carp. The source, moreover, extended to form a great lake and marshland, where a temple was erected in honour of Jiang Shi.

During a period of famine in the late 30s, a gang of brigands came by Jiang Shi's village, but they spared it on account of his fine reputation, and even provided him with food. He kept the supply hidden, and later handed it to the local authorities.

In 60 Jiang Shi was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and Emperor Ming was delighted to welcome a man of such reputation. As a magistrate in Jianwei, he governed the county well, and when he died in office the people set up a shrine to worship him. -HHS 84/74:2783-84, HYGZ 10B:148, SJZ 33:12a; Ch'ü 72:285.

Jiang Shi 姜詩, wife of: see the Lady Pang Xing 龐行.

Jiang Shi 蔣石; Xiping/Jincheng. A local leader in the Xining valley, the western part of Jincheng, in 215 Jiang Shi, Qu Yan and others sent Han Sui's head to Cao Cao as a sign of submission. It is not certain whether they killed him, or simply took advantage of his death from old age. -SGZ 1:45. See also sub Han Sui, where other accounts are cited.

Jiang Shu 姜述 (d.127). A junior officer of the Imperial Secretariat, in 126 Jiang Shu was accused of conspiring with the eunuch Zhang Fang, the Prefect Gaotang Zhi and other members of the Secretariat, together with a number of frontier officials. Most of the accused were able to purchase relief, but Jiang Shu and his colleague Yin Jiu were executed. -HHS 101/11:3243 and see sub Zhang Fang 張防.

Jiang Shuang 江雙. As Prefect of Luoyang in 135, Jiang Shuang was involved in the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang: see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16:14b.

Jiang Wan 蔣琬 [Gongyan 公琰] (d.246); Lingling. As young men, Jiang Wan and his cousin Liu Min had local reputations. Jiang Wan held a junior clerical post under Liu Bei, and accompanied him to the west in 211.

After Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214 Jiang Wan became a magistrate in Shu. As Liu Bei chanced to visit he found him drunk and everything in disarray. He was going to execute him, but Zhuge Liang pleaded on his behalf. Jiang Wan suffered only dismissal and he was later reappointed.

When Liu Bei proclaimed himself king in 219 Jiang Wan joined his Secretariat, and in 223 he was given senior office on Zhuge Liang's staff. As Zhuge Liang went on campaign to the north in 227 Jiang Wan remained at Chengdu, and he succeeded Zhang Yi in charge of affairs at the capital in 230. After Zhuge Liang died in 234 Jiang Wan held dominant position in the state for the next ten years. -SGZ Shu 14:1057-59*.

Jiang Wei 姜維 [Boyue 伯約] (d.264); Hanyang/Tianshui. Son of Jiang Qiong, who died when he was young, Jiang Wei was a keen scholar in the tradition of Zheng Xuan. He gained his first advancement in the service of Wei on account of his father's fine conduct, but when Zhuge Liang attacked in 228 he was forced to surrender.

Admired and promoted by Zhuge Liang, Jiang Wei became one of the leading generals of Shu-Han. Following the surrender to Wei, he was killed when he attempted a counter-coup. -SGZ Shu 14:1062-69*; Fang 52:271, 65:456-458.

Jiang Xu 姜敘 [Boyi 伯奕]; Hanyang. In 213 Ma Chao seized Ji, capital of Hanyang, killing the Administrator and the Inspector Wei Kang. Jiang Xu held command of troops at Li city, south of Ji. His cousin Yang Fu came to persuade him to attack Ma Chao and, encouraged by his mother, Jiang Xu agreed. In alliance with Zhao Ang and other local leaders they defeated Ma Chao and drove him south.

In the following year Ma Chao returned. He besieged Jiang Xu and Zhao Ang at Qi Mountain, on the edge of the Qin Ling ranges to the south of Hanyang, but they held out for a month and were then rescued by Xiahou Yuan. Jiang Xu received enfeoffment. -SGZ 25:701-02.

[This man must be distinguished from Jiang Xu 蔣詡 of Jingzhao at the end of Former Han, who was admired for refusing to serve Wang Mang: QHX:193.]

Jiang Xuan 姜宣. A colonel of the Northern Army in 195, Jiang Xuan was among the senior officials taken hostage by Guo Si during his conflict with Li Jue in Chang'an. -HHJ 28:334.

Jiang Yiqu 蔣義渠. Officer commanding the camp at Liyang in Wei commandery, he received Yuan Shao after his defeat at Guandu in 200. -HHS 74/64A:2401. It is possible that Yiqu was the style of Jiang Qi 蔣奇 q.v.

Jiang Yin 姜隱; Hanyang. A local leader, in 213 Jiang Yin joined Jiang Xu and Zhao Ang to attack Ma Chao and drive him from the commandery. -SGZ 25:701.

Jiang Ying 江英; Jincheng. A local officer under the Administrator Yin Hua, when Yin Hua died in 178 Jiang Ying joined Bian Zhang and Han Sui in setting up a stele to his memory. -Guwen yuan 19:8a-b.

Jiang Zhen 蔣震; Jingzhao. During the troubled period of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the Red Eyebrows' invasion of Chang'an, Jiang Zhen became a local warlord. He and other leaders in the old capital district were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu.

In 27 they were attacked by Emperor Guangwu's general Feng Yi. Jiang Zhen and his colleagues Lü Wei and Zhang Han asked Gongsun Shu for help, and Gongsun Shu sent an army under his officer Cheng Wu. Feng Yi defeated the allied force, and Jiang Zhen is not heard of again. -HHS 17/7:647; Bn 59:161.

Jiang [Zhonghai] 姜仲海 of Pengcheng was the second brother of Jiang Gong 姜肱 q.v.

Jiang Zuan 蔣纂; Pei. A refugee scholar, Jiang Zuan crossed the Yangzi and joined the entourage of Lu Mao, who treated him well. -SGZ Wu 12:1336-37.

Jiang Zun 蔣遵; Runan. A clerk in the offices of the Excellencies, Jiang Zun was slandered to Emperor Guangwu, who excluded him from office. The imperial adviser Dai Ping, also a man from Runan, spoke in Jiang Zun's favour, and though Guangwu initially rejected the advice and accused Dai Ping of factionalism, he later had the matter reviewed by the Imperial Secretariat. Jiang Zun was restored to office. -HHS 79/69A:2553; Bn 79:142.

Jiangzi 蔣子 "Master Jiang" see Jiang Ji 蔣濟.

Jiao Can 焦參. Inspector of Yi province about 120,

Jiao Shen sought to meet the local scholar Yang Hou. You Hou objected to Jiao Can's cruel government, and refused to leave his farm in the marshes. To persuade Yang Hou to emerge, Jiao Shen took his wife and children prisoner, but Yang Hou continued to stay in hiding and Jiao Shen eventually let them go. -XS:3a, XC 7:15a-b.

Jiao Chu 焦觸. In 205 Jiao Chu and Zhang Nan were senior officers in Zhuo commandery under Yuan Xi, but they rebelled and drove him and his brother Yuan Shang away to the Wuhuan. Taking title as Inspector of You province, Jiao Chu went over to Cao Cao and was enfeoffed. -SGZ 1:27, 6:206, HHS 74/64B:2417.

Jiao Chu's name does not appear again in the histories, but in 220 a general with the personal name Chu and enfeoffment as a village marquis was among the sponsors of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. Goodman suggests this may have been Jiao Chu. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Jiao He 焦和 (d.190). Skilled in Pure Conversation 清談, Jiao He believed in divination and the spirits. In the late 180s he became Inspector of Qing province.

In 189 Qiao He wanted to join the rebel alliance against Dong Zhuo, but his territory still had a great number of Yellow Turbans, who ravaged the cities and towns. Though Jiao He had limited practical experience and possessed no military ability, he used sorcerers to summon assistance. Concerned the rebels might attack him across a frozen river, he had special pills made to break up ice, and when he threw them into the stream the enemy were scattered.

Soon afterwards Jiao He became ill and died. -HHS 58/48:1886, SGZ 7:232, HHJ 26:313; deC 96:51.

Jiao Jian 焦儉. Assistant to Yang Xu the Administrator of Nanyang, about 186, Jiao Jian sought to ingratiate himself by presenting Yang Xu with a fish. Though Yang Xu was fond of fish, he left the gift hanging in his office, and when Jiao Jian came again in the following year he showed him the dried-out remains.

After Yang Xu's death in 189 Jiao Jian followed the terms of his will and refused to pay his family the funerary payment due to such a high-ranking official. -XC 1:9b, HHS 31/21:1111.

Jiao Jiao 焦矯; Kuaiji. Head of a powerful local family, Jiao Jiao had been magistrate of Zhengqiang in Runan, and was thus also known as Jiao Zhengqiang.

During the 190s Bu Zhi and Wei Jing, impoverished refugees from the north, went to call upon him. He made them wait, then fed them plain food while he feasted himself. Wei Jing was angry, but Bu Zhi accepted the discourtesy as a fair reflection of his currently humble position. -SGZ Wu 7:1236-37.

Jiao Kuang 焦贲 or Jiao Yong 永 (d.70); Kuaiji or possibly Chenliu. Some time an Academician and later Administrator of Hedong, Jiao Kuang was accused of involvement in the alleged conspiracy of Liu Ying the disgraced King of Chu. He died on the road to his trial, while his wife and children were sent to prison, with occasional floggings. They were eventually released through the advocacy of Jiao Guang's former student Zhang Hong. -HHS 33/23:1155 [as Kuang 贲], 43/33:1477 [as Yong 永].

Jiao Li 焦立; Nanyang. A marquis, Jiao Li was remembered with a stele. -SJZ 31:3a.

Jiao Qian 焦廉; Wei. A local chieftain, about 25 Jiao Qian attacked and drove away Feng Qin, the local officer loyal to Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 26/16:909.

Jiao Qiang 佼彊; Shanyang. A bandit leader, in 24 Jiao Qiang became a general under Liu Yong. When Liu Yong was driven from his capital at Suiyang in Liang by Guangwu's general He Yan in 26, Jiao Qiang brought new troops to join Su Mao and Zhou Jian in a counter-attack. They were again defeated, and Jiao Qiang went with Liu Yong and Zhou Jian northeast to Huling city in Shanyang.

During 27, as Liu Yong's short-lived revival at Suiyang was followed by his death, Jiao Qiang remained in Huling. Su Mao and Zhou Jian took refuge with him, and when they proclaimed Liu Yong's son Yu as King of Liang at Chuihui in Pei commandery, Jiao Qiang recognised the succession. He returned to his home district of Xifang, and after the fall of Chuihui in the spring of 29 he took in the fugitive Liu Yu.

Soon afterwards Xifang was attacked by Han troops under Du Mao, and Jiao Qiang fled with Liu Yu to take refuge with Dong Xian. In the summer Dong Xian sent Jiao Qiang and Su Mao to take reinforcements to Guangwu's rebel general Pang Meng, and they laid siege to the city of Tao in Dongping/Rencheng. The main imperial army came to the relief and the besiegers were heavily defeated, and a few weeks later the combined armies of the south-eastern warlords were defeated by Guangwu at Changlü in Donghai. Jiao Qiang surrendered and is not heard of again. -HHS 12/2:494-95; Bn 59:135-146.

Jiao Shen 焦參 see Jiao Can 焦參.

Jiao Shen 橋慎 [Zhongyan 仲彥]; Youfufeng. A devotee of Huang-Lao from the time he was young, Jiao Shen lived as a hermit in a cave in the hills and practised the ancient arts of immortality. A fellow-countryman of Ma Rong and Su Zhang, celebrated scholar-officials, he was regarded as being of higher quality than either of them.

Jiao Shen never married, and he ignored approaches from would-be disciples. Eventually, when he was aged over seventy, he returned to his home, foretold the day of his death and fulfilled that prophecy. There were later claims that he had been seen at Dunhuang, like the sage Laozi, and some believed he had become an immortal. -HHS 83/73:2771-72*; Vervoorn 90:188.

Jiao Shen 橋慎 miswritten for Jiao Shen 橋慎.

Jiao Yi 焦已; Danyang. A local leader, in 197 Jiao Yi joined Zu Lang in alliance with Cao Cao's agent Chen Yu against Sun Ce, but he was defeated and driven away. -SGZ Wu 1:1107.

Jiao Yong 焦永 see Jiao Kuang 焦况.

Jiao Zhengqiang 焦征羌 see Jiao Jiao 焦矯.

Jiaolesu 交勒蘇; Xiongnu. In 88 Jiaolesu was a senior king of the Southern Xiongnu. In the autumn the Shanyu Tuntuhe sent a memorial to the Han court with an account of turmoil among the Northern Xiongnu and plans for a campaign to take over the steppe. He proposed that Jiaolesu and the prince Anguo should lead a force of ten thousand horsemen out from the Juyan frontier, north of the Gansu corridor. The campaign indeed took place under the command of Dou Xian in the following year, but Jiaolesu is not mentioned again. -HHS 89/79:2952.

Jiatenu 加特奴 of Further Jushi. In 125 the Chinese agent Ban Yong executed King Junjiu of Further Jushi, and in the following year he compelled the princes Jiatenu, Bahua and others, sons of the former King Nongqi, to attack the Northern Xiongnu, their former allies. They were successful, and captured a nephew of the Shanyu. Jiatenu was placed upon the throne as successor to Junjiu, who had been killed in the previous year, but to ensure his commitment to China Ban Yong had him kill the Xiongnu prisoner with his own hand. The Shanyu made a counter-attack, but was driven back with Chinese assistance.

In 134 Jiatenu took his army under Chinese command to attack the Northern Xiongnu; and they captured the Shanyu's mother with many women of his household. When the Xiongnu made a counter-attack in the following year, however, the Han forces and their allies were defeated. Further Jushi was over-run, and though it was apparently regained for Han later [see sub Pei Cen] it is likely Jiatenu was killed at that time. -HHS 6:264, 47/37:1590, 88/78:2930.

Jie 解 [surname] see Xie 解 passim.

Jie Tan 街彈 see Wei Tanquan 衛彈勸. -LS 25:23b.

Jiechang 且昌; Qiang. A chieftain of the Zhong tribe, in 135 Jiechang was associated with the rebel Liangfeng. He was attacked by the Protector Ma Xian and surrendered to the Inspector of Liang province. -HHS 87/77:2894.

Jiliusi 稽留斯; Xiongnu. A tribal chieftain of the Northern Xiongnu, in 83 Jiliusi brought 38,000 people, with twenty thousand horses and over a hundred thousand cattle and sheep, to surrender at the Wuyuan frontier. -HHS 89/79:2950.

Jimo Wei 卽墨威 was a county magistrate in Yunzhong. -FSTY 5f:129. [Under Former Han, Jimo Cheng 成 from Qi became Chancellor of a state: QHX:195. That man, however, was known as a scholar of the Changes, and despite the similarity of the personal names the two are probably distinct.]

Jin 金; Zhao. A slave of Liu Qian, King of Zhao about 118, he escorted the king on one of his incognito journeys. Travelling south into Wei, the party halted for the night at a village post-station. When Liu Qian sent Jin to commandeer some bedding he was accosted by the post officer Meng Chang, and stabbed him. Liu Qian's party fled, but they were followed by a posse. Qian sought to escape involvement by hiding Jin, then strangled him and left the body hanging from a tree by the roadside. -DGHJ 7:2a.

Jin 金 [personal name unknown]; Guanghan. An Assistant Officer of Yi province, he was the father of the young scholar Jin Ya, who died on his way to Luoyang and was buried by Wang Jun. Having learned of Wang Jun's good deed and seen his supernatural reward, he told the local magistrate and Wang Jun became well known. -HHS 81/71:2680-81.

Jin 金 [personal name unknown]; Shu. Formerly Administrator of Julu, he was commemorated by a stele. -LS 13:5a.

Jin Chang 金敞 see Jin Shang 金尚.

Jin Dan 金丹 [Zhaoqing 昭卿]; Jingzhao. A man of literary ability, Jin Dan compiled a continuation to the Shi ji of Sima Qian. In the time of troubles which followed the fall of Wang Mang and the failure of the Gengshi Emperor in 25, he brought his people west into Tianshui and took service with Wei Ao. -HHS 13/3:522.

Jin Fu 靳富; Zuopingyi. A local bandit, Jin Fu drove whole communities away into the hills. He was put down by the administrator Zheng Hun about 212, and the people were brought back. -SGZ 16:511.

Jin Gong 金恭 [Zisu 子肅]. Son of Jin Yuan, Jin Gong died young. -LS 13:9a-b, 15:10b-13a.

Jin [Guangyan] 金廣延; Ba. Jin Guangyan was a grand-nephew of Jin Yuan, who adopted him after the death of Jin Gong, his own son by his wife the Lady Xu II.

Jin Guangyan held local office in the commandery, and at the age of eighteen he married the Lady Xu III, presumably a kinswoman of his step-mother. The couple had children, but Jin Guangyan died at the age of twenty.

Though both Jin Guangyan and his wife had shown great filial piety, the family property was passed to Jin Yongzhi, son of Jin Yuan by a concubine, who had evidently put pressure on his father and then threatened his widow the Lady Xu II. -LS 15:10b-13a.

Jin Ji 金奇 see Jin Qi 金奇.

Jin [Jiben] 金季本 see Jin Yuan 金援.

Jin Liang 金梁 (d.32). An officer under Wei Ao, Jin Liang held command at Lueyang in Tianshui. At the beginning of 32 the city was taken by Guangwu's officer Lai Xi and Jin Liang was killed. -HHS 15/5:587.

Jin Qi 金奇; Danyang. Leader of a group of Chinese renegades in the Huang Shan range of southern Danyang, he and his allies were conquered by He Qi in 208. -SGZ Wu 15:1378.

Jin Qian 金遷. Jin Qian was Director of the Imperial Secretariat in the time of Emperor Ai of Former Han. When Dou Rong was named Excellency of Works in 37 he was reluctant to receive such honour ahead of closer companions to Emperor Guangwu; he had Jin Qian, as an elder statesman, support his request to decline the office. The emperor would not agree. -HHS 23/13:807; QHX:197.

Jin Shang 金尚 or Jin Chang 敞 [Yuanxiu 元休]; Jingzhao. Men of local reputation, Jin Shang, Wei Duan and Diwu Xun were known as the "Three Xiu" from the common character in each man's style.

In 192 Jin Shang was named Inspector of Yan province by the court at Chang'an, probably when it was controlled by Wang Yun after the assassination of Dong Zhuo. Cao Cao, however, had already been invited by the local gentry, and Jin Shang could not enter the territory. He went south to Yuan Shu.

As Yuan Shu took the imperial title in 197 he wanted to make Jin Shang his Grand Commandant, but Jin Shang would not accept. He tried to escape back to the north, but Yuan Shu caught and killed him.

Later that year, Cao Cao drove Yuan Shu from his capital and recovered the bodies of his victims Ma Midi and Jin Shang. As they were brought to the capital, Emperor Xian came out in person to honour Jin Shang, while his son Jin Wei was appointed a gentleman cadet; Ma Midi received no such honours. -SGZ 7:223.

Jin Xuan 金旋 [Yuanji 元機] (d.208); Jingzhao. Formerly a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, in the early 190s Jin Xuan was Administrator of Hanyang. Returning to the Han court under Cao Cao, he became a Consultant and then a General of the Household.

As Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208 Jin Xuan was sent south as Administrator of Wuling, but after Cao Cao's defeat at the Red Cliffs later that year he was attacked, captured and killed by Liu Bei. -SGZ Shu 2:879-80.

Jin Wei 金瑋; Jingzhao. Son of Jin Shang, in 197 Jin Wei was appointed a gentleman cadet in recognition of his father's martyrdom. -SGZ 7:223. [Though the names are slightly different, it is possible that the man Jin Yi 金禕, described below as leader of an attempted coup against Cao Cao, was this same Jin Wei.]

Jin [Wenjing] 晉文經; Hanzhong. During the 160s Jin Wenjing and Huang Zi'ai [or Huang Yun q.v.] were celebrated for their intelligence. They came to stay at the capital for medical reasons, and though neither would accept appointment and they kept no clients or retainers, they attracted great attention: high officials sent messengers to enquire about their health and crowds of junior officers gathered at their gates in the hope of seeing them.

About 166, at the urging of Fu Rong the Director of Retainers, Li Ying investigated the two men. They lost their influence and reputation and both suffered public rejection. -HHS 68/58:2232-33; deC 89:48.

Jin Yan 金彥; Guanghan. A young scholar, Jin Yan died of illness on his way to Luoyang. Wang Jun cared for his corpse and was later rewarded by supernatural means. -HHS 81/71:2680-81.

Jin Yi 金禕 [Deyi 德禕 or Dewei 德偉] (d.218); Jingzhao. Perhaps the son of Jin Xuan [but see below], as scion of a family of Han loyalists Jin Yi resented Cao Cao's control of the imperial court and hoped to restore the power of the dynasty. His friend Wang Bi was in charge at Xu, but Jin Yi planned to attack him, seize the city and call in Liu Bei's general Guan Yu. He persuaded Geng Ji, Wei Huang, Ji Ben and others to join him.

At the beginning of 218 Ji Ben's son Miao led an attack on Wang Bi's camp. Wang Bi was wounded and fled to Jin Yi, not realising that he was behind the plot. As he approached, however, Jin Yi's men mistook him for Ji Miao, and from what they said Wang Bi realised the true situation. He managed to get away and next morning he obtained reinforcements from Yan Kuang and led loyal troops to destroy the rebels. Jin Yi and his fellows were executed with their families. -SGZ 1:50; deC 96:518-519.

SGZ Shu 2:880 identifies Jin Yi as a son of Jin Xuan, Administrator of Wuling in the service of Cao Cao who was killed by Liu Bei in 208. As Lu Bi observes in SGZJJ at 18a, however, it is hard to believe Jin Yi would have sought alliance with the warlord who had killed his father. It may be that this Jin Yi should be identified with Jin Wei 瑋 the son of Jin Shang.

Jin [Yongzhi] 金雍直; Ba. Son of Jin Yuan by a concubine, Jin Yongzhi initially received part of the family estate. He thereafter maintained a separate establishment, and later put pressure on his father's chief wife the Lady Xu II, now widowed, to obtain the rest of the property. -LS 15:10b-13a.

Jin Yuan 金援 [Jiben 季本]; Ba. Jin Yuan married the Lady Xu II and became the father of Jin Gong, who died young. He adopted Jin Guangyan, but also had a son, Yongzhi, by a concubine. Though Jin Guangyan and his wife the Lady Xu III both showed great filial devotion, the bulk of the family property was passed to Jin Yongzhi. -LS 15:10b-13a.

Jin Yun 靳允. In 194, as Lü Bu came to take Yan province from Cao Cao, Jin Yun was magistrate of Fan in Dong commandery. His family was held hostage by Lü Bu, but Cheng Yu persuaded Jin Yun to remain loyal, and Jin Yun killed Lü Bu's officer Fan Yi. -SGZ 14:426-27.

Jin Zong 晉宗. An officer of Sun Quan, he went over to Wei, established himself at Qichun in the southwest of Lujiang, and raided the Yangzi about Jiangxia. In 223 he was attacked and taken by He Qi. -SGZ Wu 15:1380.

Jing 景 [personal name unknown] (d.117); Rencheng. Formerly a county magistrate in Donghai, he was commemorated by a stele at his tomb. -LS 6:1a-4a.

Jing 景 [personal name unknown] (d.143); Rencheng. A former Chancellor of Beihai and Inspector of Yi province, he was commemorated by a stele sponsored by eighty-seven gentlemen. -LS 6:9a-11a, LX 16:3b-8a, Nagata 88-90.

Jing Bao 景豹 of Chenliu was chancellor of a county marquisate in Nanyang. -LS 27:8a.

Jing Bao 景苞; Zuopingyi. Son of Jing Shang, he inherited his fief. -HHS 22/12:774.

Jing Bi 井畢. An officer of the Bureau of Astronomy about 90, Jing Bi was consulted by the commissioner Jia Kui on Fu An's introduction of an ecliptic ring for the armillary sphere. -HHS 92/2:3029.

Jing Dan 景丹 [Sunjing 孫卿] (d.26); Zuopingyi. As a young man Jing Dan studied at Chang'an and was Versed in the Four Classes: conduct, rhetoric, administration and literature, a nomination which led to junior office in one of the ministries at the capital. He was noted for his ability in public speaking, and was later praised for his administration as a county magistrate.

As Wang Mang was destroyed in 23 Jing Dan held county office in Shanggu commandery, and he became Chief Clerk to the Administrator Geng Kuang. Geng Kuang accepted the new regime of the Gengshi Emperor, and when Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in the winter of 23/24 Geng Kuang sent Jing Dan, with Kou Xun and his own son Geng Yan, to support the Han cause with the troops of the Administrator of Yuyang Peng Chong under his officer Wu Han. They destroyed Wang Lang's position in the north, killing hundreds of his officials and taking over twenty counties, then relieved Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, at Guang'e city in Julu. Their intervention turned the tide of the campaign.

Appointed a lieutenant-general and given title as a marquis, Jing Dan commanded the cavalry as Liu Xiu moved against Wang Lang. A counter-attack by the enemy generals Ni Hong and Wang Rao gained initial success, and the Han forces were driven from their camp and their baggage, but Jing Dan saw a weakness in the enemy position. Leading a charge, he threw them into utter confusion, then pursued them over five kilometres and inflicted heavy casualties.

Jing Dan continued to play a leading role in the conquest of the territory north of the Yellow River; when Liu Xiu took the imperial title in the autumn of 25, there was debate whether he or Wu Han should be appointed Grand Marshal. Guangwu chose Wu Han on account of his success in destroying the Gengshi Emperor's officers Xie Gong and Miao Zen, but Jing Dan was named Chief General of Agile Cavalry, with understanding that precedent from Former Han gave the two titles equal status.

Jing Dan was then sent with Geng Yan and Chen Jun to the Ao Granary in Henan. They forced the surrender of Liu Mao, former general of the Gengshi Emperor, and defeated his renegade troops, opening the way towards the capitals Luoyang and Chang'an. In 26 Jing Dan was granted the exceptional honour of a marquisate at Luoyang 櫟陽, his home county in Zuopingyi, with revenue from ten thousand households.

In the spring of that year Jing Dan was sent with a large army to put down bandits in Hedong and Hongnong, then joined the imperial campaign against the Wuxiao group in Wei commandery north of the Yellow River. A few months later, the local rebel Su Kuang plundered Hongnong and captured the administrator, and since Jing Dan had established authority in that territory, Guangwu intended to send him. Jing Dan was ill but the emperor thought little of his excuses and obliged him to go, with a court eunuch to provide medical care, arguing that he could deal with the rebels even from his sick-bed. Jing Dan did lead his army into Hongnong, but after ten days there he died.

Recognising Jing Dan as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 22/12:772-74*; Bn 76:26, Bn 79:85.

Jing Dan 井丹 [Dachun 大春]; Youfufeng. As a young man, Jing Dan studied at the Imperial University, where he learned the Confucian classics and was noted for his ability in conversation and discussion. He was very independent, and would not present himself to any potential patron.

During the 50s, when five of Emperor Guangwu's sons were still living at Luoyang, they sought eagerly to gather clients around themselves, but Jing Dan would accept none of their invitations. Yin Jiu, brother of the Empress Yin, undertook to bring Jing Dan if his nephews would pay him a hefty commission. When they agreed he put such pressure on Jing Dan that he was obliged to attend.

For a joke, Yin Jiu provided Jing Dan only with food considered suitable for a hermit: boiled wheat and onion leaves. Jing Dan was obliged to put up with this, but as Yin Jiu prepared to leave in his palanquin Jing Dan observed with a laugh that such a "carriage drawn by men" had been used by the evil King Jie 桀 of the legendary state of Xia 夏. Everyone was appalled, and Yin Jiu was obliged to send the litter away.

The well-connected official Liang Song 松 also invited Jing Dan, who similarly refused, but when he was taken ill Liang Song sent medicine. Some time later Liang Song's eldest son Lei died, and Jing Dan went with condolences, but he would deal with no-one else. -HHS 83/73:2764* & JJ at 3045; Vervoorn 90:286.

Jing Fang 景防. An officer of the Bureau of Astronomy, in 62 Jing Fang joined his colleague Zhang Sheng in calculating corrections to the calendar to fit with the phases of the moon, and in 69 the two men were placed in charge of a special Office for the Moon [see sub Zhang Sheng]. -HHS 92/2:3025, XHS 1:3a [surname miswritten as 京].

Jing Gu 景顧; Guanghan or Shu [see sub Jing Yi]. Jing Gu's father Jing Yi placed him as a student to the scholar-official Li Ying, but before Jing Gu's name had been formally registered Li Ying was killed in the Faction Incident of 169. The family could have avoided implication, but Jing Yi declared his connection and left office. -HHS 67/57:2197, HYGZ 10C:174.

Jing Han 荆邯; Youfufeng. A man from the same commandery as Gongsun Shu, he accompanied him into Shu and became a Commandant of Cavalry. In 30, realising that Emperor Guangwu of Han had almost settled the east of the empire, Jing Han sought to persuade Gongsun Shu to adopt a more aggressive strategy. In particular he urged him to send his new associates Yan Cen north to occupy the Wei valley and Tian Rong to move east through the Gorges into the middle Yangzi. By this means he would confirm the alliance with Wei Ao in Liang province and threaten Guangwu from the west and the south.

Though some preparations were made, the ambitious project was opposed by the Academician Wu Zhu on the grounds that there was no wide support for Gongsun Shu in the east and such a long-range venture was too risky. Jing Han derided Wu Zhu as an irrelevant classicist, claiming falsely that Guangwu's position in the east was insecure. There was, however, more general feeling against the plan, and Gongsun Shu's brother Guang was a spokesman for the opposition. Despite urgings by Yan Cen and Tian Rong, the matter was shelved.

In 33 Jing Han's proposal was to some extent revived, but by this time Wei Ao was dead and the implementation was on too small a scale. -HHS 13/3:539-40; Bn 59:186-187.

Jing He 營郃 see sub Rong He 榮郃.

Jing Ji 景奇 see Jing Qi 景奇.

Jing Ju 景遽; Zuopingyi. Son of Jing Shang and younger brother of Jing Bao, in 117 the regent Dowager Deng granted him a village marquisate to restore the family fief which had been abolished when Jing Bao's son Jing Lin died without an heir. -HHS 22/12:774.

Jing Lin 景臨; Zuopingyi. Son of Jing Bao, he inherited the family marquisate. He died without sons and the fief was ended. -HHS 22/12:774.

Jing Lü 景慮; Rencheng. In the early 140s Jing Lü was nominated Filial and Incorrupt by the Chancellor Yang Bing. Some ten years later Yang Bing was dismissed from office at the capital and retired to his home country, where he lived in some poverty. Jing Lü came to offer a great quantity of cash, but Yang Bing closed the gates of his house and refused even to see him. -HHS 54/4 4:1771.

Jing Luan 景鸞 [Hanbo 漢伯]; Guanghan. As a young man Jing Luan travelled through seven provinces of the empire to study the classics under different teachers. He became an expert in the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Qi and the Shi interpretation of the Book of Changes, and he received instruction on the apocrypha and on prognostication. He compiled Yi shuo 易說 "Discussion on the Changes" and Shi jie 詩解 "Explanation of the Poetry," linking them to mystical diagrams and naming his work He-Luo jiaojì 河洛交集 "Connected Collection to [the Diagrams from] the Yellow River and [the Book from] the Luo." He also compiled Li lue 禮略 "Outline of Ritual," a study of divination techniques, and Yueling zhangju 月令章句, detailed commentary on an ancient calendrical text. His works amounted to more than half a million characters, and he several times presented advice to the throne on the interpretation of portents.

His commandery and provincial governments several times invited Jing Luan to office, but he would not accept. He died of old age at home. -HHS 79/69B:2572*, HYGZ 10C:174.

Jing Qi 景奇; Shu. Husband of the Lady Luo Gong, Jing Qi died young. -HYGZ 10A:140.

Jing Shang 景尚; Zuopingyi. Son of Jing Dan, he inherited his marquisate. The fief was later transferred to a county in Shangdang. -HHS 22/12:774.

Jing Shao 敬詔; Hedong. XTS 75A:3249 mentions a Jing Shao who was Inspector of Yang province at the end of [perhaps Later] Han.

Jing Xiu 荆修 became Administrator of Jiujiang. -FSTY 5f:133.

Jing Yi 景毅 [Wenjian 文堅]; Guanghan or Shu. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt and sponsored by the Excellency over the Masses, Jing Yi served as magistrate in two counties, encouraging learning and good conduct. He then became an Administrator and was later an Imperial Clerk at Luoyang.

Jing Yi had placed his son Jing Gu as a student and attendant to Li Ying, but when Li Ying was killed in the Second Faction Incident of 169 Jing Gu had not formally registered his name. Jing Yi could therefore have avoided involvement, but he nonetheless declared his connection, left office and returned to his homeland. [On this incident, see also below.]

Jing Yi later once more became a magistrate in Wudu, and when he was transferred to be Administrator of Yizhou about 177 the people wept as they farewelled him.

Li Yong, Jing Yi's predecessor in Yizhou, had put down rebellion among the non-Chinese people, but after he died in office the trouble began again and Jing Yi had to restore order. Following those disturbances, grain was in short supply and the price was high, but through his good government there were soon abundant harvests and the price fell to a fraction of its former level.

Jing Yi was later called to the capital as a Consultant, but instead retired and went home. Some time after 190 he was invited to office under the Governor Liu Yan, but died about this time at the age of eighty-one. -HHS 67/57:2197, 86/76:2843, 2847, HYGZ 10C:174.

In describing the incident of 169 involving Li Ying, HHS 67/57 refers to Jing Yi as a man from Shu, which would indicate a different person to Jing Yi of Guanghan. HYGZ, however, has the incident as part of the biography of Jing Yi of Guanghan, and it seems certain they were the same man.

Jing Yin 敬愼 of Hedong became Inspector of Yang province. -FSTY 6b.140.

Jing Yin 敬愼 (129-181); Hedong. FSTY 6b.140 says that Jing Yin of Hedong became Inspector of Yang province, and LS 27:4a lists a stele to Jing Yin.

At LS 25:18b-19a, Zhao Mingsheng discusses a stele set up in honour of a man of the Jing surname who had been Inspector of Yang province. The personal name was illegible but his dates were given, while it was also stated that he had been an Attendant Officer under the Director of Retainers and then a member of the Censorate. It this is surely the man mentioned by FSTY.

The heading of the stele refers to him as Jing shijun 敬使君, shijun being the courtesy style for the head of a province. At LS 22:14b-15a, however, Ouyang Fei reads the character 使 as 仲 and has no mention of the appointment to Yang province. Ouyang Fei then takes 敬仲 as the man's style and suggests he had the surname Tian 田. Zhao Mingsheng disagrees, and his interpretation appears more likely.

Jing Yixiao 京邑蕭. When they were at the Imperial University in Luoyang, Jing Yixiao and his friend Liang Hong swore an oath not to take office under the corrupt government. When Jing Yixiao later accepted appointment in his commandery office, Liang Hong wrote to criticise him and break off their relationship. -DGHJ 18:9a.

Jing Yu 荆寓. Administrator of Runan in the 160s, he wanted to nominate his Registrar Huang Mu as Filial and Incorrupt. Huang Mu, however, argued that Yin Tao was the more worthy candidate and compelled Jing Yu to follow his advice. -HHSJJ 67/57:2415.

[Jingzhong] 敬仲 see Jing 敬 [personal name unknown].

Jiu 就 [surname unknown] [Jinde 進德]. A former magistrate in Shu commandery, in 160 he was commemorated with a stele. -LS 13:7b-8a.

Jiu Dan 就耽/耽. In 180 the calendrical scholar Zong

Zheng complained that the Court Astronomer Xiu had chosen to use the calculations of the officer Feng Xun [or Zhang Xun] to forecast eclipses of the moon rather than those of his brother Zong Cheng, which were more accurate. The Minister of Ceremonies Jiu Dan was ordered by Emperor Ling to convene a committee of enquiry. After lengthy argument it was found that Zong Cheng's work was better, and it was restored, but all the contenders were punished as trouble-makers. -HHS 92/2:3041-42.

Jiu Ren 救仁 was a Counsellor Remonstrant. -FSTY 6f.136.

Jiwu 飢五; Qiang. A chieftain of the Dangjian tribe, in 120 he attacked Jincheng while the Protector Ma Xian was occupied with raiders in Zhangye. Ma Xian turned back and drove Jiwu and his men back across the frontier. -HHS 87/77:2192.

Jixu 鬬須 [Korean: Kyesu] of Gaogouli [Koguryo]. According to Samguk-sagi, a Korean chronicle compiled in the twelfth century but based upon older material, Jixu was a younger brother of King Yiyimo [Yanyou: i.e. Yon-u] and about 208 he commanded the army against an attack by the Chinese warlord Gongsun Kang in support of their elder brother Baqi/Faqi [i.e. Pakgi]. The invaders were defeated and Baqi killed himself.

Chinese records indicate, however, that the invasion was a success and that Baqi was settled in conquered territory under the protection of Gongsun Du; Gardiner observes that there are a number of instances where Samguk-sagi seeks to reverse the reality of a defeat. Jixu's existence is almost as doubtful as his victory. -Gardiner 72A:87-88.

Jizhi 飢指 (d.137); Qiang. During the 130s, the White Horse tribe of the Qiang, which lived on the Wudu frontier, had been troubling the territory. In 137 they were defeated by the Commandant of Guanghan, and later that year the Protector Ma Xian also attacked them, killing two of their chieftains, Jizhi and Leizu, and taking three hundred heads. -HHS 87/77:2194.

Ju 車 [surname] see Che 車 passim.

Ju Bao 具褒 He became Chancellor of Zhongshan. -FSTY 5f.125.

Ju Gong 具恭; Wei. Elder brother of the palace eunuch Ju Yuan, Ju Gong became Chancellor of Pei. In 165 the Director of Retainers Han Yan accused him of corruption, and Ju Gong was sent to the prison of the Ministry of Justice. His brother pleaded for him, and it appears that Ju Gong was freed, but he was demoted in fief and forced into private life. -HHS 78/68:2522.

Ju Gu 沮鵠; Julu. Son of Ju Shou, in 204 Ju Gu commanded Yuan Shang's garrison at Handan in Zhao. Cao Cao attacked and stormed the city. -SGZ 1:25.

Ju Guo 舉國. A poor man, of slight build, Ju Guo was a junior officer at the base camp in Liyang in Wei commandery when it was commanded by the Internuncio Deng Xun.

In 81 Deng Xun was transferred to be Protector of the Wuhuan, stationed on the northern frontier. Knowing that a medicine Deng Xun used was not easily available in the north, Ju Guo pulled a handcart to Luoyang to purchase a supply in the market there, then went through Zhao to collect a quantity of the special green paste which Deng Xun preferred to use to seal his letters, and finally came to Shanggu and presented his offering.

Dongguan Han ji gives this as an example of the affection which Deng Xun inspired among his followers and subordinates. -DGHJ 8:2a, cited by HHS 16/6:609 TC.

Ju Jun 沮儁 (171-195). A colonel of the Northern Army, Ju Jun accompanied the escape of Emperor Xian from Chang'an. Wounded in battle in Hongnong, he was captured by Li Jue. He cursed Li Jue for the disorder he had brought to the empire, and Li Jue killed him.

As the imperial court came into Cao Cao's control in 196 Ju Jun was granted posthumous title as Administrator of Hongnong, in recognition of his heroic defiance and death. -HHS 9:378-80, 72/62:2339-40 & 2342, YSS:21b.

Ju Kang 苴康 (d.174); Kuaiji? Presumably a chieftain under the religious rebel Xu Chang, at the end of 174 Ju Kang was defeated and killed by the provincial army led by Zang Min and Chen Yin. -HHS 102/12:3258; MBeck 90:128.

Ju Lan 巨覽; Hanyang. As the new General-in-Chief Liang Shang was making appointments to his staff in 135, Ju Lan was amongst those chosen. Liang Shang was admired for the quality of his officers. -HHS 34/24:1175.

Ju Shou 沮授; (d.200); Guangping. After service in the administration of Ji province, Ju Shou was nominated Abundant Talent, held county magistracies and was then Commandant of Cavalry to Han Fu. He may have opposed Han Fu's decision to cede the province, but when Yuan Shao took over he promptly joined his staff and was appointed Attendant Officer. Encouraging Yuan Shao in his broader ambitions, he became a close favourite and was named a general with disciplinary authority over all his officers.

In 195 Ju Shou unsuccessfully urged Yuan Shao to receive Emperor Xian as he came from the west, and he protested against the favour that Yuan Shao showed his youngest son Shang.

In 199 Ju Shou objected to the plan to attack Cao Cao, but was over-ruled and obliged to share his command with Guo Tu and Chunyu Qiong. In 200, as they crossed the Yellow River, Ju Shou claimed to be ill and asked for leave. Angry, Yuan Shao removed him from command but kept him with the army.

Ju Shou continued to urge caution, but his advice was ignored. He was captured in the flight from Guandu, and though Cao Cao was an old friend and asked him to join his service, he refused. He later sought to escape and was executed. -HHS 74/64A:2378, SGZ 6:192-200.

Ju Xing 處興. Administrator of Beihai for Emperor Guangwu about 30, Ju Xing was kidnapped by the rebel Xiashang Si, head of a leading local family. Li Zhang the Administrator of neighbouring Langye brought a thousand men to destroy the enemy stronghold, and he restored Ju Xing to his position. -HHS 77/67:2493.

Ju Yuan 具瑗; Wei. A eunuch, in 159 Ju Yuan was Prefect of the Yellow Gates. When Emperor Huan asked Tang Heng who might help him get rid of Liang Ji, he recommended Ju Yuan and Xu Huang, for they had spoken privately against the dominance of the Liang family. They accordingly joined the conspiracy with Zuo Guan and Shan Chao.

Liang Ji became suspicious, and on 9 December he sent in his eunuch agent Zhang Yun to spy out the private apartments. Ju Yuan used his authority as Prefect to arrest Zhang Yun for trespass without authorisation. Then, as the emperor took control of the Imperial Secretariat, Ju Yuan led a body of guards to join the Director of Retainers Zhang Biao, surround Liang Ji's residence, and force Liang Ji to surrender his seal. Liang Ji and his wife Sun Shou both killed themselves, and other members of their families were arrested and executed.

The five leaders of the successful coup were granted county marquises and a cash donation, while Ju Yuan was probably promoted to be a Regular Attendant [HHS 78/68 says that he already held that position, but HHS 34/24:1186 refers to him as Prefect of the Yellow Gates, and his actions during the coup indicate that he held some appropriate executive authority].

Shan Chao died a few months later, but the four other eunuchs presumed on their favour and influence to live in luxury, building great mansions and taking women of good family as [decorative and titular?] concubines. They adopted unrelated children and even slaves to maintain their lineages, while their kinsmen held high office.

Popular discontent was supported by fierce criticism from regular officials, but they were generally ignored by Emperor Huan, though in 163 the Excellencies Yang Bing and Zhou Jing succeeded in forcing Ju Yuan's brief exile from court. In 165 the Director of Retainers Han Yan secured the dismissal and death of Zuo Guan, and he went on to accuse Ju Yuan's brother Ju Gong of corruption. Ju Yuan went to court to apologise and handed in his seal as a marquis. He was granted a fief of lesser rank and was forced from public life. -HHS 78/68:2520-22*; Ch'ü 72:476-480, Bn 76:94-95, deC 89:12-14.

Ju Zong 沮宗; Julu. Younger brother of Ju Shou, in 199 Ju Shou told him of his forebodings about the campaign against Cao Cao. -SGZ 6:199.

Juan Cheng 圈稱 [Youju 幼舉 or Mengju 孟舉]; Chenliu. Juan Cheng compiled a Chenliu qiji zhuan 陳留耆舊傳 "Venerable Men and Ancient Affairs of Chenliu" and also Chenliu fengsu zhuan 陳留風俗傳 "Record of the Customs of Chenliu." The former was presumably the work sponsored by the Administrator Yuan Tang or a continuation of it, and both were examples of the interest in local history during the second century. -Sui shu 33:974, 983; Yao Zhenzong: 2369.

Juche'er 居車兒 (d.172); Xiongnu. At the death of the Shanyu Toulouchu in 147, Juche'er succeeded him, with dynastic title as Yiling shizhujiu 伊陵尸逐就 Shanyu. His position in the royal lineage is not known, nor his relationship to his predecessor. It is doubtful whether he held any more than marginal authority over the vast majority of his nominal subjects

In 166, after the General on the Liao Zhang Huan left the frontier to take up a ministerial post at the capital, the Xianbi across the frontier arranged an alliance with the Wuhuan, and also with Juche'er and his followers, and in the summer and autumn of that year they joined in raids on Chinese positions. Zhang Huan was promptly sent back to the north with emergency powers, and the Xiongnu and Wuhuan immediately surrendered.

Zhang Huan arrested Juche'er and recommended he be dismissed, both for his disloyalty and for his clear lack of authority among his people. Emperor Huan was unwilling to remove an established ruler, and accepted that Juche'er had been an innocent party forced into rebellion. He was permitted to maintain his position until his death, after a reign of twenty-five years. -HHS 89/79:2963-64; deC 84:314, 323-324, 329.

Jue Hong 角闕; Youfufeng. During the troubled period of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the Red Eyebrows' invasion of Chang'an, Jue Hong took power in his home county of Qian. He and other warlords in the old capital district were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu, but in 27 they were conquered by Emperor Guangwu's general Feng Yi. -HHS 17/7:647.

Jun Xi 鈞喜 became a Palace Attendant. -FSTY 6f: 139.

Juyun 且運 of Suoju [Yarkand]. In 61 Juyun was chief minister to King Xian of Suoju. He and other senior officials were discontented with his harsh government, which had caused the former tributary of Yutian [Khotan] to attack the capital.

As King Guangde of Yutian approached he called Xian to a meeting. Juyun reassured Xian it was safe to go, but when he went out he was taken prisoner and Juyun and his fellows then opened the gates to the enemy. -HHS 88/78:2925-26.

Junde 君得 of Suoju [Yarkand] (d.60). An officer under the hegemon King Xian of Suoju, in the late 50s Junde was appointed governor of the subordinated state of Yutian [Khotan]. He ruled very harshly, and in 60 he was assassinated by the local nobleman Dumo. -HHS 88/78:2925.

Ju'niu 車紐 see Che'niu 車紐.

Junjiu 軍就 of Further Jushi (d.125). King of Further Jushi, in 120 Junjiu and his mother Shama killed the Chinese agent placed at his court, then joined the Northern Xiongnu to destroy the military colony set up by Suo Ban and drive the ruler of Nearer Jushi from his kingdom. Taking general control of the states along the Northern Road, Junjiu joined the Xiongnu in raids against the Chinese northwest.

In 125 Ban Yong brought Chinese cavalry and central Asian allies to attack him. He captured Junjiu and his Xiongnu associates and executed them at the place where Suo Ban had met his death. -HHS 5:231, 242, 47/37:1589-90, 88/78:2930.

K

Kaifeng, Lady of 開封君 see the Lady Yin 陰 V.

Kan Ze 闕澤 [Derun 德潤] (d.243); Kuaiji. A man of poor peasant family, Kan Ze nonetheless became known for his devotion to scholarship and for his calculations of the calendar. He was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and served as a county magistrate in Wu and in Guiyang.

In 220 Kan Ze was appointed to Sun Quan's headquarters staff and later held senior clerical office in his imperial government. He prepared convenient summaries of the classics and rituals, and also a commentary to correct the Qianxiang 乾象 [Celestial Appearances] calendar which was adopted by Wu in 223. His advice was regularly asked on scholarly matters, and he was later rewarded with enfeoffment.

Sun Quan held mourning for his death, and in 258, during a discussion with Puyang Xing 濮陽興, Administrator of Kuaiji, his officer Zhu Yu 朱育 cited Kan Ze as one of the local worthies of the commandery. -SGZ Wu 8:1249-50*, Wu 12:1326.

Kang 康 of Suoju [Yarkand] (d.33). Son of King Yan 延 of Suoju in the west of the Tarim basin, Kang succeeded his father in 18 AD. Yan had been staunchly pro-Chinese, and Kang maintained that tradition. Though Chinese control in central Asia was disrupted after the fall of Wang Mang, he led his neighbouring states to oppose the Xiongnu and took in a number of Chinese officials and others who had been associated with the Protectorate and were now stranded in the Western Regions.

In 29 Kang sent an embassy to China, including representatives of other states, and escorting the widow and children of Li Chong 李崇, Wang Mang's former Protector of the Western Regions [QHX:218]. The road to Guangwu's capital was blocked at that time by the warlord Wei Ao, but the Han ally Dou

Rong received the envoys. Guangwu instructed him to confirm Kang's royal title and to give him title as Grand Chief Commandant of the Western Regions 西域大都尉, with authority over all fifty-five states of Han central Asia. -HHS 88/78:2923; Chavannes 07:197-198, Bn 67:131-132, Yü 86:413-414.

Kang 亢 [surname unknown] see [Liu] Kang 劉亢.

Kang Xu 抗徐 [Boxu 伯徐]; Danyang. Serving in his home commandery, Kang Xu was recognised for his courage and intelligence and was given probationary office as a county magistrate in Changsha. He put down banditry and settled the non-Chinese of the forests and hills.

In 160 Kang Xu served as a senior major under Zong Zi against the bandits of Taishan. Outstandingly successful, he was rewarded with enfeoffment and made Commandant of the commandery.

In 165, as the rebellion of Hu Lan and Zhu Gai in Changsha became serious, the Excellencies recommended Kang Xu as a man with the ability to deal with them, and he was appointed Administrator. He joined Xu joined Du Shang in putting down the trouble. He died soon afterwards, but his reputation as a military commander was equal to that of Du Shang, and Emperor Huan issued a special edict to double the value of his fief. -HHS 38/28:1286, 7:315, XC 8:8a.

Kebineng 軻比能 (d.235); Xianbi. Member of a minor clan, Kebineng gained wide recognition for his personal qualities, and by the late 190s he was a leader on the frontier west of Dai commandery. He took in a number of Chinese fleeing from the civil war, and some of these men gave instructions in civil learning and in the making of weapons and the techniques of drill.

Following Cao Cao's defeat of the Wuhuan at White Wolf Mountain in 207 and through the agency of the Protector of the Qiang Yan Rou, Kebineng and other Xianbi leaders paid tribute and received royal titles. In 211 Kebineng sent assistance against the rebel Tian Yin.

Kebineng briefly supported the rebel Wuhuan in Dai in 218, and he murdered his rival Fuluohan, grandson of the great war-leader Tanshihuai. Then Cao Zhang attacked and forced him back across the frontier. Kebineng returned to his allegiance, and when he acknowledged Cao Pi as emperor in 220 he was confirmed as a king.

At the same time, Kebineng had been steadily expanding his state. By the early 220s the territory under his general control extended along the frontier region from the Ordos into Manchuria, and he became increasingly independent and aggressive. His rival Budugen, however, received protection from China, and an attack on the chieftain Suli was frustrated by the Wei officer Tian Yu.

Turning against Wei, Kebineng sent a number of raids against the frontier, but though they defeated local forces and inflicted serious damage, his troops could not withstand a major army. He was killed by a Chinese agent in 235 and his confederacy disintegrated. -SGZ 30:838-39; Fang 52:62, 96, 180-182, 482.

Kezui 柯最; Xianbi. During the 170s Kezui was a commander in the central region under Tanshihui in the 170s. -SGZ 30:838.

Kong 孔, the Lady I? (202-208); Lu. Daughter of Kong Rong, when her father was charged with Impiety and he and her mother were to be executed, it was proposed that she and her elder brother, nine years old, be spared on account of their youth.

As Kong Rong was arrested the two children were playing chess; they continued the game, and when taxed for making no move or comment explained that "When the nest is broken, the eggs cannot survive." They were later offered broth, but as the boy took some, his sister observed that their future was too uncertain to expect they would ever see the meat. This was reported to Cao Cao, and both children were killed.

As they went to the headsman, the girl remarked to her brother that if there is life afterwards, they would see their parents again soon; what more could they wish? Fully composed, she stretched her neck to the blade. -HHS 70/60:2279.

SGZ 12:373PC quotes different texts, which also describe the chess-game but identify the children not as brother and sister, but as two boys, both eight years old.

Kong 孔, the Lady II. Wife of Fu Shipu, she left a body of collected works. -Sui shu 35:1058.

Kong 孔 [personal name unknown] (d.155); Lu. A descendant of Confucius in the nineteenth generation, he had a memorial stele set up for him which was discovered in 1793. -Nagata 94:122.

Kong 孔 [personal name unknown] (201-208): see sub the Lady Kong (202-208) above.

Kong An 孔安. Presumably a descendant of Kong Ji

吉 and Kong Heqi 何齊, who had been recognised by Wang Mang as representatives of the ancient royal house of Shang/Yin 商/殷, in 29 Kong An was enfeoffed by Emperor Guangwu as Duke Who Continues and Honours the Yin 殷紹嘉公. In 37 his fief was changed to Duke of Song, a county in Runan. Though the fief was evidently maintained through the dynasty, no successors are recorded. -HHS 1B:61, 110/20:3424; QHX:209, Bn 67:36-37.

Kong Bao 孔褒/褒 [Wenli 文禮] (d.169?); Lu. Eldest son of Kong Zhou, in 169 Kong Bao was among the sponsors of the ceremony and inscription organised by Shi Chen the Chancellor of Lu at the Temple of Confucius: LS 1:28a.

Kong Bao was a friend of the reformist Zhang Jian, and as the eunuch party began the purge of their opponents in 169, Zhang Jian fled the capital and came to Kong Bao's house for refuge. Kong Bao was at that time away from home, but his younger brother Kong Rong took Zhang Jian in and gave him a hiding place.

After Zhang Jian had left, the local authorities arrested both Kong Bao and Kong Rong. Kong Rong sought to take the blame, as the person who had aided Zhang Jian, but Kong Bao claimed responsibility, for Zhang Jian had initially come to seek his aid and Kong Rong had acted only as his agent. Even their widowed mother demanded punishment, for she was the senior member of the household. Unable to decide, the Chancellor referred the question to the court, and an edict declared that responsibility lay with Kong Bao. He was executed. -HHS 70/60:2262, SGZ 12:371.

Some time later the Chancellor of Lu, surnamed Chen, had a stele set up in honour of Kong Bao. - Nagata 94:272.

Kong Biao 孔彪 [Yuanshang 元上] (123-171); Lu. A descendant of Confucius, Kong Biao travelled to study and later received commandery nomination as Filial and Incorrupt. After probation as a gentleman cadet, he was appointed as a magistrate in Le'an. He became ill, however, and then left office to mourn his father.

Returning to the imperial service, Kong Biao passed an examination, served successively in the Imperial Secretariat and the Censorate, and was then appointed Administrator of Boling. At that time a gang led by the commoner Zhang Bing was carrying out armed attacks in broad daylight, but Kong Biao dealt firmly with the bandits as soon as he took up his post, and the whole territory was restored to order, so that

390 Kong Chang

"items dropped on the roads were not picked up by others" 路不拾遺 and the people considered him as their father and mother.

Kong Biao then served as Chancellor of Xiapi and as Administrator of Hedong, in each case to good effect. In 169 he was among the sponsors of the ceremony and inscription organised by Shi Chen the Chancellor of Lu at the Temple of Confucius, and when he died at the age of forty-nine his former subordinates in Boling, led by the local gentleman and future Excellency Cui Lie, set up a stele to his memory. -LS 8:14b-18a, Nagata 94:192-94, LS 1:28a, Nagata 94:180.

Kong Chang 孔常. At the beginning of the rebellion in Liang province in 184, the Assistant Officers Kong Chang and Xin Zeng were stationed with their colleague He Xun at an outpost in Hanyang. The Inspector Zuo Chang was attacked in the capital of the commandery and called for help. Kong Chang and Xin Zeng were reluctant to respond, but He Xun threatened to execute them by military law if they failed in their duty, so they took their troops and Zuo Chang was rescued. -HHS 58/48:1880.

Kong [Changchan] 孔長彥; Lu. Sons of Kong Xi, when their father died in Zuopingyi about 88 Changchan and his younger brother Jichan were in their early teens. They refused to return to their home country, but remained in the west to arrange his burial and tend his tomb.

Both brothers were active scholars, with hundreds of students, and Kong Changchan was particularly interested in detailed commentaries to the classics. He died about the same time as his brother, in 124. -HHS 79/69A:2563.

Kong Chou 孔疇 [Yuanzhi 元知]; Lu. A descendant of Confucius, about 140 Kong Chou was Administrator of Jiangxia. He and other officials were reported by the Inspector Li Gu for corruption, but they bribed the General-in-Chief Liang Ji and had Li Gu transferred.

In 149 Kong Chou was Chancellor of Chen. The government of the young Emperor Huan, controlled by the Liang family, had a temple to Laozi constructed in Hu county, believed to have been the birthplace of the sage. One of the walls of the temple bore a portrait of Confucius, and Kong Chou had a stele set up before it. -HYGZ 10C:165, SGZ 16:514-15, SJZ 23:5b; Seidel 69:36-37, Seidel 78:38.

Kong Dan 孔耽 [Boben 伯本]; Liang. A senior local officer, Kong Dan held temporary position as head of the state after the Chancellor left office on grounds of illness. He had a funerary temple constructed for his family at the cost of 300,000 cash. -LS 5:5a-7a; Ebrey 80:336.

Kong Fen 孔奮 [Junyu 君魚]; Youfufeng. Kong Fen's great-grandfather had held court office under Emperor Yuan in the mid-first century BC, and when Kong Fen was young he studied Zuo zhuan under Liu Xin, who admired his ability.

As trouble broke out at the end of Wang Mang's reign Kong Fen took his family to refuge in the far west. In the late 20s he became a junior member of the staff of Guangwu's ally Dou Rong and then held a county post in Wuwei. His territory became one of the best-governed and most peaceful in the empire, and had excellent contact with the non-Chinese through open markets. In a time of confusion and plunder, Kong Fen was noted for his restraint and honesty and for the manner in which he served his elderly mother, so that she ate fine food while his wife and children had to content themselves with onions. The Administrator Liang Tong called to pay respects to his mother and Kong Fen was awarded a secondary marquissate.

Kong Fen later became Commandery Assistant of Wudu. After the death of Wei Ao in 33 his kinsman Wei Mao surprised the headquarters, killed the Administrator and took Kong Fen's family hostage. Kong Fen nonetheless raised the non-Chinese Di people against them. The enemy used his wife and son as shields to cover their retreat, but Kong Fen still led an attack. Wei Mao was killed, but so was Kong Fen's family.

Issuing a special edict to praise Kong Fen, Guangwu appointed him Administrator; in that office he continued to inspire people by his moral quality. Though he was more than fifty years old, he managed to sire another son, Kong Jia, to replace the one killed by Wei Mao. He later retired on grounds of ill health and died at home. -HHS 31/21:1098-99*, 86/76:2860.

Kong Fu 孔扶 [Zhongyuan 仲淵]; Lu. A nineteenth-generation descendant of the sage, in 132 Kong Fu was involved in the reconstruction of the Imperial University as Minister of Ceremonies; in the following year he was promoted Excellency of Works.

In 134 when Emperor Shun invited Zhou Ju of the Imperial Secretariat to identify bad officials, Zhou Ju named the Excellency Liu Qi as a man who held office without useful effect; Liu Qi was dismissed. Kong Fu also left office on the same day, and it is likely that he too had been criticised by Zhou Ju.

In 168 a memorial stele for Kong Fu was placed at the site of Confucius' tomb. -HHS 6:262-64, LX 11:1b-2b.

Kong Gang 孔綱; Lu. In 169 Kong Gang was among the sponsors of the ceremony and inscription organised by Shi Chen the Chancellor of Lu at the Temple of Confucius. -LS 1:28a.

Kong Gui 孔桂 [Shulin 叔林]; Hanyang. About 200 Kong Gui served as an emissary to Cao Cao for the north-western warlord Yang Qiu. He ingratiated himself with Cao Cao, who admired his skill at football 便辟 and at "surrounding chess" 圍碁 [Japanese Go]. He became a constant companion, with considerable influence, though he mistakenly allied himself with Cao Zhi and treated the eventual Heir, Cao Pi, with limited respect.

In the time of Cao Pi, Kong Gui was found to have embezzled quantities of goods from the Western Regions; he was executed. -SGZ 3:100-01.

Kong He 孔龢; Lu. A literary officer and a scholar of the Zhuang/Yan interpretation of Chunqiu, in 153 Kong He was selected for a new appointment to supervise ceremonies at the local Temple of Confucius. -LS 1:16a.

Kong Hong 孔宏; Lu. Having served in the Imperial Secretariat, Kong Hong became Administrator of Hedong. -LS 27:6a.

Kong Ji 孔奇 see Kong Qi 孔奇.

Kong Jia 孔嘉 [Shanpu 山甫]; Youfufeng. Son of Kong Fan, Kong Jia followed the model of his uncle Kong Qi and also composed Zuo zhuan shuo 左氏說, a commentary to the classic. He became Colonel of the City Gates. -HHS 31/21:1099; Yao Zhenzong:2327-28.

Kong [Jichan] 孔季彥 (d.124); Lu. Jichan was a son of Kong Xi, who died in Zuopingyi about 88 when Jichan was some ten years old. Jichan and his elder brother Changchan refused to return to their home country, but remained in the west to arrange their father's burial and tend his tomb. Both became active scholars, with hundreds of students.

Though his father had accepted the more rational Old Text tradition, Kong Jichan was skilled in mystical arts. When great hailstones fell in the northwest of the empire in 121 and Emperor An called for men to explain the portents, Kong Jichan went to the capital.

Received in audience, he advised the emperor that the government was too much influenced by the family of the late Dowager Deng and other relatives by marriage. His advice shocked the court and the emperor did not respond, but he soon afterwards purged the Deng family and their supporters.

Kong Jichan was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, but did not take up the offer and died at home a few years later. -HHS 79/69A:2563.

Kong Lan 孔覽; Lu. A local officer, in 153 Kong Lan was an unsuccessful candidate for the new appointment of an official to supervise ceremonies at the Temple of Confucius. -LS 1:16a.

Kong Li 孔立 see Kong Yu 孔昱.

Kong [Linlian] 孔麟廉; Lu. A descendant of Confucius in the nineteenth generation, in the early 150s Kong Linlian petitioned Yi Ying the Chancellor of Lu to appoint an official to supervise ceremonies at the temple of the sage. An edict of 153 gave approval, and a commemorative stele was set up. -LS 1:17a.

Kong Qi 孔奇 [Ziyi 子異]; Youfufeng. Younger brother of Kong Fan, Kong Qi travelled to Luoyang to study. Expert in the classics, he compiled a commentary, Chunqiu Zuoshi shan 春秋左氏刪. -HHS 31/21:1099.

Kong Qian 孔謙 [Derang 德讓] (131-154); Lu. Son of Kong Zhou, he became a clerk in the commandery but died of illness at the age of twenty-four. -LS 6:17a-b, Nagata 94:152.

Kong Qian 孔潛; Liang. JS 78:2051 says that Kong Qian was Junior Tutor to the Heir 太子少傅, but left his home country during the troubles at the end of Han and settled in Kuaiji, where his descendants held office under Wu.

There was, however, no Heir proclaimed during the last fifty years of Later Han, so there can have been no position as a Junior Tutor. It is possible Kong Qian's appointment was to low-ranking probationary office as a Member of the Suite of the Heir 太子舍人.

Kong Qiao 孔喬 [Zisong 子松]; Nanyang. A scholar of the Old Text Classic of History and of Zuo zhuan, Kong Qiao was so diligent and reclusive that he kept to his house for years. In 121 Emperor An sent carriages and escorts to invite him and other hermit scholars to court, but Kong Qiao ignored the courteous summons. He died at home. -HHS 82/72A:2722, XC 6:5b; Vervoorn 90:292.

Kong Rong 孔融 [Wenju 文舉] (153-208); Lu. Sixth son of Kong Zhou, Kong Rong was a precocious child, and there are several anecdotes concerning his quick wit and his pretensions. At the age of ten he accompanied his father to the capital, where he impressed the judge of character Li Ying, and in 169 he sheltered the fugitive Zhang Jian on behalf of his brother Kong Bao; Bao was later executed on that account. Kong Rong's reputation was comparable to those of Taoqiu Hong and Bian Rang.

Having initially refused all offers of appointment, in the late 170s Kong Rong joined the offices of the Excellency Yang Ci, from which position he reported on the corrupt conduct of several associates of the palace eunuchs, defending his cases successfully when questioned by officers of the Imperial Secretariat. In 184 he was sent to pay respects to the new General-in-Chief He Jin, but left in disgust when he could not gain an audience. He Jin's staff wanted to kill him for his lack of respect, but the assassin they nominated persuaded He Jin that he would lose by such a deed and that it would be better to make friends with such a well-known figure. So He Jin took Kong Rong onto his staff. Graded First Class, Kong Rong then joined the Imperial Censorate, but resigned on grounds of illness after a disagreement with its head Zhao She.

Kong Rong later returned to the offices of the Excellencies, then became Adjutant of the Northern Army, and after three days he was made a General of the Household in charge of palace guards. As Dong Zhuo took power at the capital in 189 Kong Rong expressed opposition to several of his plans, including the deposition of the Little Emperor Liu Bian and the establishment of his brother Emperor Xian. He was transferred to be a Consultant and in 190 he was sent as Chancellor to Beihai, a territory with serious problems of banditry.

In idealistic Confucianist fashion, Kong Rong sought to restore order and settle the people by encouraging schools and rituals and by celebrating contemporary scholars such as Zheng Xuan and Bing Yuan, and various gentlemen of the past. He paid little attention to his local advisers, he was criticised as pretentious and ineffectual, and he achieved small success against the Yellow Turbans and other rebels. In 193 he was besieged by the bandit leader Guan Hai and sent his follower Taishi Ci to seek aid from Liu Bei. Surprised and delighted that Kong Rong had heard of him, Liu Bei sent a relief force and the enemy scattered and fled.

Isolated in the east, Kong Rong sought to keep aloof from the growing powers of Cao Cao and Yuan Shao, and when his adviser Zuo Chengzu suggested an alliance, he killed him for such treasonous talk. In 192 he joined an abortive petition of Tao Qian, urging the general Zhu Jun to advance on Chang'an and rescue the emperor, and after the death of Tao Qian in 194 he urged Liu Bei to take over Xu province. Yuan Shu, whose ancestors had held high official rank under Later Han, also wanted the territory, but Kong Rong decried his claim: "Dry bones from a tomb, why bother about them?" [Such strictures, of course, could not apply to a man who claimed seven hundred years and twenty generations descent from Confucius.]

Liu Bei nominated Kong Rong as Inspector of Qing province, but in 196 Yuan Shao's son Yuan Tan came to attack him. The conflict lasted several months, but we are told that Kong Rong paid little attention, preferring literary pursuits and elegant conversation. Eventually, as the enemy entered his capital he fled to Cao Cao, leaving his wife and children to be captured by Yuan Tan.

Cao Cao named Kong Rong Court Architect at the puppet court of Han, and in 198 he became Minister Steward. His rhetoric influenced the formalities of the court: he opposed the award of posthumous honours to Ma Midi, protested at Cao Cao's impeachment of Yang Biao, rejected a proposal to restore mutilating punishments, and argued against special sacrifices for Liu Feng, a son of Emperor Xian who had died young and without heirs.

Kong Rong also made himself unpopular with Cao Cao through criticisms with classical tags. One story tells how, objecting to Cao Pi taking the Lady Zhen, widow of Yuan Xi, as his wife, he claimed that the Classic of History recorded how King Wu of Zhou had given the concubine of his defeated enemy the king of Shang/Yin to his brother the Duke of Zhou. Because of Kong Rong's great scholarship, Cao Cao at first believed him; when he found that history and tradition held King Wu had killed the woman, Kong Rong explained that he was simply reconstructing the past in terms of the present: the parallel was not complimentary. He also ridiculed Cao Cao's victory over the Wuhuan, and opposed his restrictions on alcohol. His letter to Cao Cao on this last matter is a paean to intoxication, referring among other items to the future founding Emperor Gao of Former Han killing the mystical white snake when he was drunk [Dubs 38:34-35], and the fact that Liu Fa, ancestor of the restoring Emperor Guangwu, was conceived only when Emperor Jing was too befuddled to know which concubine he was dealing with [HS 53:2426; QHX:294]. In a second letter Kong Rong argued that trouble with women was more dangerous to a dynasty than trouble with wine [HHS 70/60:2273].

Kong Rong was respected and popular at all levels of the court and among leaders of the empire, so for a long time, Cao Cao was obliged to tolerate him, but eventually Kong Rong went too far, arguing that Cao Cao should leave the capital and be sent to his fief. Though cast in terms of precedent, this was a direct attack upon Cao Cao's structure of power, and Cao Cao's follower Chi Lü now accused Kong Rong of breaking the law and had him dismissed from the ministry. Cao Cao wrote to warn Kong Rong that he was pressing too hard. His letter is long and carefully composed, a mark of his concern, but Kong Rong replied with defiant self-righteousness. He returned to office as a Palace Counsellor, and gathered an increasing following of clients.

In 208 a renewed attack by Chi Lü, joined by Cao Cao's staff officer Lu Cui, claimed that Kong Rong had planned treason when he was in Beihai, that he had held secret talks with envoys of Sun Quan, and that he and Ni Heng had compared themselves to Confucius and his close disciple Yan Hui 顏回. This ragbag of charges was classified by the pejorative terms Great Refractoriness and Impiety, and Kong Rong was arrested and killed with his family. Because of his reputation, Cao Cao had a special statement circulated, condemning Kong Rong's conduct and seeking to justify his punishment; but it was not a good mark for his regime.

Kong Rong left a quantity of literary material, including poetry, essays, letters, inscriptions and official documents. When Cao Pi took the throne of Wei he offered rewards for any item by his hand, and in his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature" he honoured Kong Rong as one of the Seven Masters of the Jian'an period. -HHS 70/60:2261-79*, XHS 5:3b-6a, SGZ 12:370-73*; Mather 76:544.

Kong Shang 孔尚; Lu. A descendant of Confucius, Kong Shang was Administrator of Julu. -SGZ 12:370.

Kong Shun 孔順. Clever but wicked, about 200 Kong Shun was a trusted counsellor to Yuan Tan. -SGZ 6:

196.

Kong Song 孔嵩 [Zhongshan 仲山 or Jushan 巨山]; Nanyang. A man of humble family, Kong Song studied at the University in Luoyang, but later changed his name and went to a neighbouring county to become a local policeman. When the Inspector Fan Shi came on tour, Kong Song was ordered to hold his horse for him. Fan Shi, an old friend from their student days, recognised Kong Song. He urged the county authorities to put someone else in his place, but Kong Song, fortified with examples from the past, insisted on doing his duty with no feeling of embarrassment.

Kong Song had great influence for good in his adopted community, and he was invited to join the offices of the Excellencies. As he was travelling to the capital, thieves stole his horse, but when they learned whom it belonged to they returned it with apologies.

Kong Song later became Administrator of Nanhai in the far south. -HHS 81/71:2678, XC 5:14b, XHS 5:14b, HQ 2:6a-b.

Kong Sun 孔損; Lu. Son of Kong Zhi and a direct descendant of Confucius in the eighteenth generation, Kong Sun inherited the family title as Marquis in Recompense of Perfection [褒成侯 Baocheng hou]. In 85 Emperor Zhang held a ceremony at Lu in honour of the sage, and gave presents to Kong Sun and his kinsmen.

In 90 the government of Emperor He transferred the fief to a village, Baoting 褒亭. The title appears to have been restored soon afterwards, but Baocheng was not the name of a county and the value of the fief is not recorded. At Kong Sun's death the marquisate passed to his son Yao. -HHS 79/69A:2563.

Kong Wan 孔完; Lu. Son of Kong Yao and a direct descendant of Confucius in the twentieth generation, Kong Wan inherited the family title as Marquis in Recompense of Perfection 褒成侯. The fief was ended during the time of troubles about 190, but Cao Pi, Emperor of Wei, later granted Kong Xian 羨, a descendant in the twenty-first generation, title as Marquis Who Honours the Sage 崇聖侯. -HHS 79/69A:2563.

Kong Xi 孔僖 [Zhonghe 仲和 or Zihe 子和]; Lu. A descendant of Confucius, Kong Xi attended the University at Luoyang and was a friend of Cui Yin. A jealous fellow-student, Liang Yu, reported them for having spoken disrespectfully of Emperor Wu of Former Han, and the two young men were threatened with execution. Kong Xi wrote to Emperor Zhang to apologise and explain, and the emperor put a stop to the process.

When Emperor Zhang made a tour to the east in 85 he arranged a special ceremony at Lu in honour of Confucius and his disciples. All adult males of the Kong clan were called to take part, and scholars were ordered to recite the Analects. Kong Xi excused himself, and when the emperor asked why he did not appreciate the honour done to his family he replied that the ceremony was no more than appropriate courtesy from a wise ruler to the sage. Emperor Zhang was amused and impressed. Presenting gifts to his kinsmen, he made Kong Xi a gentleman cadet and appointed him a compiler at the library of the Eastern Pavilion.

Kong Xi, however, was a scholar of the Old Text History and Poetry, and he had limited concern for the apocryphal texts which had been favoured by previous rulers. Emperor Zhang could tolerate such idiosyncrasy, but at the end of the year he sent Kong Xi away from the capital to be magistrate of a county in Zuopingyi. Kong Xi's old friend Cui Yin took a prognostication from the Book of Changes and warned that the omens were unlucky, but Kong Xi replied that it was wrong to pick and choose appointments, and that fortune rested with oneself, not with yarrow sticks. He died in office three years later. -HHS 79/69A:2560-63*.

Kong Xia 孔峽 of Lu served as Minister of Finance. -LS 27:6a.

Kong Xian 孔顯. An officer of the guards in 124, Kong Xian joined the demonstration led by Lai Li at the palace Gate of the Vast Capital, protesting the dismissal of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. Though the demonstrators achieved no success, their support was recognised, and after Liu Bao was brought to the throne at the end of 125 Kong Xian and his colleagues were rewarded with high office and gained the ren right to nominate their sons as cadet gentlemen. -HHS 15/5:591-93.

Kong Xian 孔憲; Lu. A local teacher, in 153 Kong Xian was an unsuccessful candidate for the new appointment of an official to supervise ceremonies at the local Temple of Confucius. -LS 1:16a.

Kong Xin 孔訢; Liang. See sub Zhongli Yi. -HHS 41/31:1410.

Kong Xin 孔信; Hanyang. A local leader, in 213 he joined Jiang Xu and Zhao Ang to drive Ma Chao from the commandery. -SGZ 25:701.

Kong Xun 孔恂 [Juqing 巨卿]; Yuzhang. Kong Xun became Attendant Officer to the Inspector of Yang province. By tradition, when they went on tour the Attendant Officer had screen curtains on his carriage, the same as the Inspector. On one occasion the Inspector was angry and wanted to remove his screen, but Kong Xun protested that the screen was official regalia: the Inspector could dismiss him as an official, but he could not remove the screen. The Inspector accepted his argument. -XC 8:7a, HHS 119/29:3648.

Kong Yao 孔曜 [Jianshou 建壽?]; Lu. Son of Kong Sun and a direct descendant of Confucius in the nineteenth generation, Kong Yao inherited the family title as Marquis in Recompense of Perfection 褒成侯. At his death the fief passed to his son Wan. -HHS 79/69A:2563.

Kong Yi 孔翊. HHS 65/55:2136 tells how a memorial from Huangfu Gui presented in the late 160s referred to Kong Yi as a worthy man who had not received the high position he deserved. From the context, it seems probable this is a reference to Kong Yu 孔昱 below.

LS 27:6a lists a stele dedicated to Kong Yi 翊, who is described as a Imperial Clerk; this may also be a reference to Kong Yu.

Kong Yu 孔昱 also as Kong Yi 翊 [Yuanshi 元世 or Shiyuan 世元]; Lu. Through Kong Anguo 孔安國, Kong Yu was descended in the nineteenth generation from Confucius. His ancestor Kong Ba 孔霸 had held high office under Former Han, and his lineage had produced fifty-three ministers, heads of provinces or commandery units, while seven men had received enfeoffment.

As a young man, Kong Yu maintained the family tradition of scholarship in the Classic of History. In the middle 150s he refused an invitation to join the offices of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, and when he was recommended as Sincere and Upright his responses to questions opposed the attitudes of the court. He pleaded illness and retired, but it appears that he later returned to appointments at the capital: see below.

Kong Yu was numbered among the popular heroes in the lists compiled by the reformists and students of the Imperial University, and he was proscribed from office at the time of the First Faction Incident of 166-167.

In 168, as Dou Wu and Chen Fan controlled the regent government for the new Emperor Ling, a special carriage was sent to invite Kong Yu as a Consultant, and he became Prefect of Luoyang. When his former teacher died soon afterwards, Kong Yu used the excuse of mourning to leave office and return to private study. In 169 he was among the sponsors of the ceremony and inscription organised by Shi Chen the Chancellor of Lu at the Temple of Confucius, and he later died at home, probably in 172.

Kong Yu is often described as a moral scholar in retirement, but though he may have lived as a hermit during the time of Proscription, he does not appear to have had any long-term commitment to the role. -HHS 67/57:2213* & 2187 & JJ at 2423, 65/55:2332, SGZ 6:211, LS 1:28a, Nagata 94:180; Vervoorn 90:173.

Kong [Zhangchan] 孔長彥 see Kong Changchan 孔長彥.

Kong Zhi 孔志; Lu. A direct descendant of Confucius in the seventeenth generation, Kong Zhi was the son of Kong Jun 均鈞 [original personal name Mang 莽], who had been awarded a fief by Wang Mang in order to maintain the sacrifices to the sage [QHX:210-211]. The fief was abolished when Wang Mang was destroyed.

Kong Zhi became a magistrate in Henei under Emperor Guangwu, and in 38 he was granted title as Marquis in Recompense of Perfection 褒成侯. He was succeeded by his son Sun. -HHS 1B:63, 79/69A:2563; Bn 67:36-37.

LS 27:6a lists a stele dedicated to Kong Zhi, described there as an Academician.

Kong Zhi 孔芝 (d.181). Administrator of Nanhai in the late 170s, Kong Zhi joined the rebellion of Liang Long. In 181 the insurgents were destroyed by the Inspector Zhu Jun. -HHS 71/61:2308.

Kong Zhou 孔宙 [Jijiang 季將] (103-163); Lu. A descendant of Confucius, Kong Zhou was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet. He later served as a magistrate and was Commandant of Taishan during the insurgency of the 160s. Following his death, a number of students, clients and other gentlemen set up a stele in his honour. -LS 7:4a-5b, Nagata 94:148-50, SGZJJ 12:6a-b; Mather 76:544.

HHS 70/60:2262, the biography of his son Kong Rong, says that his father died when he was thirteen, and at 2278 it says that Kong Rong was fifty-six sui when he was executed in 208: this would mean that he was born in 153 and his father died in 165. The inscription on the Kong Zhao's commemorative stele, however, dated 164, says that the memorial was set up one year after his death.

The personal name also appears as 侁, probably through confusion with Kong Zhou of Chenliu below. Kong Zhou 孔宙, wife/widow of. The Lady was the mother of Kong Bao and Kong Rong. In 169 they gave shelter to the fugitive Zhang Jian, and when the local authorities sought to allocate blame for the offence, both brothers claimed responsibility, while the Lady Kong also demanded punishment as being the senior member of the household. In the end the penalty was held against Kong Bao, and he was executed. -HHS 70/60:2262, SGZ 12:371.

Kong Zhou 孔侁/胄 [Gongxu 公緒]; Chenliu. Noted for his skill in Pure Conversation, during the 160s Kong Zhou was recommended by Fu Rong to the Administrator Feng Dai and made Reporting Officer.

In 189 Kong Zhou was appointed Inspector of Yu province by Dong Zhuo, but in the following year he joined the alliance against him and came to camp in Yingchuan. He died there soon afterwards. -HHS 68/58:2233, SGZ 1:6.

Kong Zhou 孔侁 of Lu: see Kong Zhou 孔宙 of Lu.

Kou 寇, the Lady I; Shanggu. Grand-daughter of Kou Xun, she married Deng Zhi, brother of the Lady Deng who became Empress of Emperor He and regent Dowager for Emperor An. In 118 the Lady's son Deng Feng confessed to his father that he had been in private contact with the general Ren Shang, who had been executed for embezzlement. Deng Zhi was afraid of the reaction of his sister the regent Dowager, so he had Deng Feng's head shaved and also that of the Lady Kou. This symbol of servitude was taken as an apology for Deng Feng's ill-chosen friend; everyone was impressed.

Through their marriage connection to the Deng, the Kou became wealthy, powerful and well connected to the throne, but they suffered disgrace in the time of Kou Rong. -HHS 16/6:606, 626.

Kou 寇, the Lady II; Shanggu. A great-niece of Kou Rong, she entered the harem of Emperor Huan. -HHS 16/6:627.

Kou 寇 [personal name unknown]; Shanggu. Son of a cousin of Kou Rong, he married the Princess of Yiyang, younger sister of Emperor Huan. -HHS 10B:443, 16/6:627.

Kou Feng 寇封 see Liu Feng 劉封.

Kou Huan 寇權 [Wenyi 文儀]; Guanghan. About 150 Kou Guan was a disciple of Yang Hou, expert in Huang-Lao doctrines. -HYGZ 10B:144, 12:223.

Kou Li 寇釐; Shanggu. Son of Kou Sun, he succeeded to his father's county marquisate in Xindu. The fief was later reduced to a district. -HHS 16/6:626.

Kou Rong 寇榮 (d.164?); Shanggu. A great-grandson of Kou Xun, his family enjoyed prosperity after the marriage of the Lady Kou I to Deng Zhi, brother of the Dowager Deng who ruled as regent for Emperor An. Later, a junior cousin of Kou Rong married the younger sister of Emperor Huan, and one of his great-nieces entered the imperial harem. Kou Rong himself had a fine reputation when he was young, and he became a Palace Attendant under Emperor Huan. A man of moral principle, there were few people he was prepared to have dealings with, and the emperor's favourites, particularly the eunuchs, disliked him and were concerned at his potential influence as a relative by marriage.

About 160 Kou Rong was accused of various crimes, and he and his kinsmen were sent back to the family's original home country in the north. Seeing the political situation, local officials in Shanggu also began to apply pressure. Despairing of escape from this persecution, Kou Rong fled back to the capital in hope of pleading his case. Before he arrived there, however, Zhang Jing the Inspector of You province, who was an old associate of the palace eunuchs, reported him for crossing borders without authority. Orders were issued for his arrest and Kou Rong went into hiding for several years; even when amnesties were issued he was specifically excluded from their benefits. Eventually, in distress and despair, he wrote most eloquently to the emperor from his place of exile, complaining of the falsehoods that had been told against him and of the ruler's own implacable hostility. The letter occupies the greater part of Kou Rong's biography in HHS, and came to be regarded as a classic literary composition by an innocent man, wrongly accused. Emperor Huan, however, was only made more angry by this appeal.

It appears that Kou Rong was captured soon afterwards. He was executed, probably in 164, and the family fortunes were ended. [Though members of the family had held high rank at court, surprisingly few of Kou Rong's kinsmen are named or referred to specifically in the histories.] -HHS 16/6:627-33*; deC 89:52-54.

Kou Qi 寇祺 [Zaichao 宰朝]; Guanghan. Kou Qi went to study in Liang province. A fellow-student, Hou Man was later murdered by Wang Xiang of Bohai, and Kou Qi went to take revenge. As he arrived, Wang Xiang pleaded that he was ill and he went away, but he waited until Wang Xiang recovered and then returned to kill him.

As a result of this, Kou Qi was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. He became a county magistrate in Jingzhao and then Chancellor of Jiyin. -HYGZ 10C,175.

Kou Shou 寇壽; Shanggu. Son of Kou Xun by a concubine, and elder half-brother to Kou Sun, in 37 he was enfeoffed with a county marquisate in Pei. -HHS 16/6:626.

Kou Sun 寇損 or Kou Yi 揖; Shanggu. Son of Kou Xun by his chief wife, he succeeded to his father's marquisate in 36. The fief was later transferred from Yuyang into Xindu. -HHS 16/6:626.

Kou Xi 寇襲; Shanggu. Son of Kou Li, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 16/6:626.

Kou Xu 寇盱; Shanggu? Administrator of Longxi in 88, Kou Xu drove back a raiding force led by the Qiang chieftain Mitang.

Ten years later, as the general Liu Shang brought an army to deal with a far more substantial incursion by Mitang, Kou Xu was major in charge of militia from the local commanderies. At a great battle near Lintao in southern Longxi, Kou Xu's men killed hundreds of the enemy and took great numbers of cattle, horses and sheep. Chinese losses, however, were also heavy, and as Mitang withdrew the Han troops did not follow. -HHS 87/77:2883-84.

Kou Xun 寇恂 [Ziyi 子翼] (d.36); Shanggu. A man of noted local family and a keen scholar, in the time of Wang Mang Kou Xun became Officer of Merit to the Administrator Geng Kuang, who admired him greatly.

After the fall of Wang Mang in 23 the Gengshi Emperor dispatched commissioners to persuade local authorities to give allegiance to his new regime, and it was announced that those who did so would be confirmed in their positions. Geng Kuang duly went to meet the envoy Han Hong and handed over his official seal in token of submission. Presumably seeking to show his authority, Han Hong did not immediately return the insignia but kept it overnight. Kou Xun led armed men to his tent to demand the seal, and when Han Hong refused he overpowered him, called Geng Kuang to join them, and himself tied the seal and ribbon about his waist. The commissioner could only add formal approval to this démarche, and so Geng Kuang was confirmed in his position.

In the winter of 23/24 Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in Handan, and he sent an officer to seek support from Geng Kuang. Kou Xun urged him to refuse, and Geng Kuang sent him to make alliance with Peng Chong in neighbouring Yuyang. They agreed to support Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu but currently Han commissioner in the northeast; as he returned Kou Xun killed Wang Lang's envoy and took over his troops.

Wang Lang had strong local support and at first achieved considerable success, but Geng Kuang sent cavalry under his assistant Jing Dan, with Kou Xun and his own son Geng Yan, to aid the Han. Combining with Peng Chong's officer Wu Han, they destroyed Wang Lang's position in the north, killing hundreds of his officials, took over twenty counties, then joined Liu Xiu at Guang'e city in Julu. Kou Xun was made a lieutenant-general and given title as a marquis. By summer Wang Lang had been destroyed, and the horsemen of Shanggu had played a leading role in the victory.

Kou Xun frequently discussed plans with Liu Xiu's close assistant Deng Yu and they became close friends. As Liu Xiu moved south through Henei against Luoyang in 25 he asked Deng Yu whom he should put in charge there. Emphasising the importance of the region for future planning, Deng Yu strongly recommended Kou Xun. He was named Acting Administrator with the authority of a chief general.

As Liu Xiu returned to the north, Kou Xun sent letters to all the counties with orders for the men to practise archery. He also had the bamboos in Qi Park, at the north of the commandery on the edge of the Taihang ranges, cut to make a million arrows, collected two thousand horses and levied great quantities of tax grain to supply Liu Xiu's army

Soon afterwards Zhu Wei attacked Henei. Leading his own men against Guangwu's general Feng Yi at the Meng Crossing of the Yellow River, he sent his subordinate Su Mao downstream to outflank Feng Yi with an attack on Wen county.

As soon as the news reached Kou Xun's capital in Huai, he sent orders to his county officials to bring their troops to Wen. His subordinates argued that he should keep back to await developments, but Kou Xun replied that Wen was of critical importance. He hurried there by forced marches with his own men and engaged the enemy for a full day. Then the county troops arrived and Feng Yi also sent reinforcements. Kou Xun ordered his men to climb their ramparts, beat the drums and shout that Liu Xiu's army was approaching. As Su Mao's men wavered, Kou Xun charged. He achieved complete victory: several thousand enemy were killed, including Su Mao's second-in-command Jia Qiang, and over ten thousand captured. They maintained a pursuit across the Yellow River to Luoyang and then returned; Feng Yi achieved equal success.

Liu Xiu's first news from Henei indicated that Kou Xun had been defeated. When he learnt of the victory he congratulated himself on the appointment, and the success inspired him to take the imperial title.

Kou Xun also applied himself to maintaining the supplies of the imperial army, and Guangwu wrote several times to thank him and enquire after him. Observing that the officers of Kou Xun's command were almost all his kinsmen, his old colleague Dong Chong warned him that the emperor's apparent solicitude could indicate that he was unsure of his loyalty. He urged him to send some of his relatives as quasi-hostages. So Kou Xun claimed to be ill and, as Guangwu passed through Henei on his way to attack Luoyang at the end of 25, he asked to resign and accompany the army. Guangwu refused, for the post in Henei was too important, but Kou Xun then offered the services of his nephews Kou Zhang and Gu Chong with their troops of good cavalry. The emperor was very pleased, and appointed them lieutenant-generals.

In the following year Kou Xun was nonetheless briefly dismissed because he had arrested and questioned a man bearing a letter for the emperor. A few months later he was named Administrator of Yingchuan and sent with the general Hou Jin to attack a large group of bandits led by Yan Zhong, Zhao Dun and Jia Qi. After several weeks they took Jia Qi's head. As the commandery became peaceful, Kou Xun once more raised quantities of supplies for the imperial forces. He was enfeoffed as a county marquis, with revenue from ten thousand households.

The Bearer of the Mace Jia Fu was at this time on campaign in Runan. When some of his officers and men crossed the border and killed people in Yingchuan, Kou Xun had them arrested and executed. Jia Fu was offended at such discourtesy to a fellow-commander, and as he returned to the capital through Yingchuan he told his officers that he would kill Kou Xun if they met. Kou Xun learnt of this, and though his nephew Gu Chong wanted to fight, he observed that his duty to the state took precedence.

Ordering his local officials to ply the troops with food and wine, he set out to receive Jia Fu, but then pretended to be taken ill and returned to his camp. When Jia Fu ordered his men to chase after him they were too drunk to do so. Then Kou Xun sent Gu Chong with a report to the throne, and Guangwu called both men to audience, scolding them: "The empire is not yet settled, and you two tigers start a private quarrel? You must end it today." Kou Xun and Jia Fu apologised and made up. They rode out in the same carriage and became friends thereafter.

Within a year Kou Xun had given peace and security to Yingchuan, and in 27 he was transferred to Runan, this time to assist the general Du Mao deal with local bandits. They too were swiftly settled, and Kou Xun encouraged the establishment of schools; he personally took tuition in the classics from an expert in Chunqiu and Zuo zhuan.

In 31 Kou Xun was called to the capital as Bearer of the Mace, and in 32 he accompanied the emperor on campaign against Wei Ao. As rebellion broke out again in Yingchuan, the main army turned back to deal with it. Apologising for the apparent reduction in rank, Guangwu asked Kou Xun to return to the commandery as Administrator, for he was the only person who might restore order. Kou Xun remarked that as soon as the army appeared the rebels would surrender, and this indeed was what happened. He did not take the administrator's position, but stayed in the territory a year to confirm its submission.

In 34 Kou Xun rejoined the imperial army, which at this time was moving against Gao Jun, a former general of Wei Ao who had taken refuge in Anding. He had already withstood a year's siege by Geng Yan, and even when Guangwu approached he refused to surrender. Since the situation in the east was still unstable, Kou Xun warned against too great a commitment to the operation. Guangwu was determined that Geng Yan should make a full attack, but he did agree to send Kou Xun with an letter to try once more for Gao Jun's submission.

When Kou Xun arrived Gao Jun sent his staff officer Huangfu Wen to greet him, but Huangfu Wen refused to bow before the imperial envoy. Kou Xun was furious and wanted to execute him, but his subordinates objected that Gao Jun had a strong defensive position, it could take years to reduce him, and killing his envoy was no way to bring about his surrender. Kou Xun did not agree: he beheaded Huangfu Wen and sent his second-in-command back to tell Gao Jun that this would be the fate of anyone who refused to submit: "If you are going to surrender, do it quickly; otherwise, look out!" Gao Jun opened the gates and gave himself up.

As Kou Xun's officers congratulated him, they asked how he had known what would happen. Kou Xun replied that Huangfu Wen had been Gao Jun's closest adviser, and when he refused to kowtow it was clear the enemy had no intention of giving up. By killing him, however, he deprived Gao Jun of his counsellor and left him shocked, lonely and vulnerable.

Influential and popular at the imperial court, Kou Xun was admired for his ability to solve confrontations by skill rather than force. Many believed he had ability for the highest office, but he died two years later. When Emperor Ming had portraits of his father's great servants painted on the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang, Kou Xun was one of those who were honoured.

Besides his own enfeoffment, Kou Xun's twin brother and his nephews, eight men in all including Kou Zhang and Gu Chong, received marquises for their military achievements. Only Kou Xun, however, left a son and heir, Kou Sun. The family later gained high rank at court through the marriage of Kou Xun's grand-daughter to Deng Zhi, brother of the Dowager, but comparatively few of Kou Xun's descendants are recorded specifically in the histories [cf. also sub Kou Rong]. -HHS 16/6:620-28*; Bn 59:39, 72, 102-104, 211, 216, 218, Ch'ü 72:290-291.

Kou Yi 寇儀 (d.142); Shanggu? Probably a member of the great clan, in 142 Kou Yi was Chancellor of Lu. The commissioner Zhang Gang reported him to the throne for misconduct, and Kou Yi killed himself [but cf. sub Zhang Gang]. -HYGZ 10B:157.

Kou Yi 寇揖 see Kou Sun 寇損.

Kou Zhang 寇張; Shanggu. In 25 Kou Xun was concerned that Emperor Guangwu might be uncertain of his loyalty. As the imperial army passed through Henei on its way to attack Luoyang, therefore, he offered the services of his elder brother's son Kou Zhang and his sister's son Gu Chong with their troops of cavalry. The emperor, very pleased, appointed both men as lieutenant-generals. Kou Zhang later received a marquisate for his military service. -HHS 16/6:622-23, 626.

Ku Jun 苦均 became Administrator of Kuaiji. -FSTY 5f:131.

Ku Jun 庫鈞 see She Jun 庠鈞.

Kuai Liang 蒯良 [Zirou 子柔]; Nan. Elder brother of Kuai Yue, in 190 he advised Liu Biao on the moral government of Jing province; his brother was more practical. -SGZ 6:211.

Kuai Qi 蒯祺 (d.219); Nan. No doubt a junior kinsman of Kuai Liang and Kuai Yue, in 219 Kuai Qi was Cao Cao's Administrator of Fangling, on the western border of Jing province against Liu Bei. He was attacked and killed by Meng Da. -SGZ Shu 10:991; deC 96:529.

Kuai Qin 快欽 is mentioned in FSTY 5f:124.

Kuai Yue 蒯越 [Yidu 異度] (d.214); Nan. A man of local distinction, he joined the offices of the General-in-Chief He Jin at the capital and in 189 urged him against the eunuchs. Realising that He Jin's lack of decision would destroy him, he left Luoyang for a magistracy in Runan.

Returning to his home country soon afterwards, in 190 Kuai Yue joined Liu Biao the newly-appointed Inspector of Jing province. He advised Liu Biao as he established his authority, assisted him to trap and kill several local leaders, and was later made Administrator of Zhangling commandery, set up from the east of Nanyang.

Cao Cao evidently admired Kuai Yue, and in 199 Kuai Yue urged Liu Biao to support Cao Cao against Yuan Shao; Liu Biao, however, remained essentially neutral. In 208 Kuai Yue encouraged Liu Biao's son and successor Liu Zong to surrender to Cao Cao, and when this was done Cao Cao enfeoffed him as a marquis. Kuai Yue became a senior adviser and a minister of Han. -SGZ 6:211-15.

Kuang of Shanghuai 上淮況 see Shanghuai Kuang 上淮況.

Kuang 颺 [surname unknown]. Administrator of Guanghan, he several times invited the scholar Jing Luan to take office, but was always refused. -HYGZ 10C:174.

Kuitou 魁頭; Xianbi. Son of an elder brother of Helian, he may probably be identified with Huaitou/Huitou 槐頭, one the leaders of the eastern region of the confederation of his grandfather Tanshihuai.

When Helian died in the mid-180s, Kuitou took the leadership of the Xianbi in place of his young cousin, Helian's son Qianman, who was still a minor.

When Qianman came of age, he sought his inheritance. He was unsuccessful and soon disappeared, but the conflict with Kuitou destroyed the last of the unity achieved by Tanshihuai. Kuitou evidently died in the early 220s. -SGZ 30:838, HHS 90/80:2994; deC 84:343.

Kujiu 苦齧 [Dry Grub] was the sobriquet of a leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range in 185, possibly because of his lack of hair. -SGZ 8:261, HHS 71/61:2311 [where the second character appears as 晒].

L

Lai 來, the Lady; Nanyang. Younger sister of Lai Xi, she married Liu Jia, who became king of Hanzhong in 24. -HHS 15/5:585.

Lai Bao 來褒; Nanyang. Elder son of Lai Xi, in 35 he was granted succession to the fief which had been posthumously awarded to his father. -HHS 15/5:590.

Lai Chao 來超; Nanyang. Lai Chao was a younger brother of Lai Li, who led a protest against the dismissal of the Heir Liu Bao in 124; Emperor An then ordered that he and his brothers be stripped of their official posts. After Liu Bao came to the throne in 125 Lai Chao became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. -HHS 15/5:593.

Lai Da 來達. Administrator of Hepu in 184, Lai Da was captured by local rebels. -HHS 8:349.

Lai Ding 來定; Nanyang. Son of Lai Li, he married the Princess Liu Zhide, sister of Emperor An. He succeeded to his father's fief in 133, and was a General of the Household under Emperor Shun. -HHS 10B:457, 15/5:593, 55/45:1804.

Lai Fu 來輔. In 26 Lai Fu was an attendant at the Temple of the Eminent Founder, Emperor Gao 高廟. As Emperor Guangwu's general Deng Yu entered Chang'an he put Lai Fu in charge of the temple and named him acting Assistant Intendant of Jingzhao, He was then sent to take the ancestral tablets of the Former Han emperors to Luoyang. -XC 1:3a; Bn 59:114.

Lai Gong 賴恭; Lingling. About 204 Lai Gong was sent by Liu Biao to take the place of the late Zhang Jin as Governor of Jiao province. He attempted to govern humanely, but his more warlike colleague, Wu Ju the Administrator of Cangwu, disagreed. Lai Gong was driven out and returned to Lingling.

As Liu Bei took over the south of Jing province in 208, Lai Gong joined him. He became a general, and when Liu Bei proclaimed himself King of Hanzhong in 219 Lai Gong was one of the officials listed in the formal memorial to the emperor. He was then named Minister of Ceremonies, and in 221 he joined the petition for Liu Bei to take the imperial title. -SGZ Wu 4:1192, 8:1252, Shu 2:884, 888, 15:1082.

*FSTY*6f:143 mentions a Lai Xian 先, Administrator of Jiaozhi. This is probably the same man.

Lai Hu 來虎; Nanyang. Son of Lai Ding, whom he succeeded to the family fief, in the time of Emperor Huan he was a colonel in the Northern Army. -HHS 15/5:593.

Lai Ji 來機. In 139 Lai Ji was appointed Inspector of Bing province; he and his colleague Liu Bing in Liang province were given shared responsibility for the office of Protector of the Qiang after Ma Xian left that position. They were urged by the General-in-Chief Liang Shang to treat the non-Chinese tolerantly, but both were cruel men, and they caused trouble as soon as they arrived at their posts.

In the following year, as the second great rebellion of the Qiang broke out, Lai Ji and Liu Bing were found guilty and dismissed. -HHS 87/77:2895.

Lai Leng 來陵 or Lai Ling 稜; Nanyang. Son of Lai Bao, he married the Princess Liu Hui, daughter of Emperor Ming. He became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. -HHS 10B:460, 15/5:590.

Lai Li 來歷 [Bozhen 伯珍] (d.133); Nanyang. Lai Li was a son of Lai Leng and the Princess Liu Hui, daughter of Emperor Ming. His father died young and Lai Li later succeeded his grandfather Bao to the fief which had been awarded posthumously to his great-grandfather Lai Xi.

About 100 Lai Li was named a Palace Attendant and then a commander of cavalry among the guards of the Feathered Forest. He became a colonel in the Northern Army in 109, and Bearer of the Mace in 120. In 121 Lai Li's mother was made a Senior Princess by Emperor An, and in the following year Lai Li became Minister Coachman.

In 124, as conflict between the imperial favourites and the leaders of the bureaucracy came to a head, the eunuch Fan Feng, the emperor's titular uncle Geng Bao and the Palace Attendants Zhou Guang and Xie Yun impeached the Excellency Yang Zhen and forced his suicide. To show their disapproval Lai Li and the Imperial Clerk Yu Xu refused further dealings with Zhou Guang and Xie Yun.

Soon afterwards Geng Bao and his party joined the Empress Yan and her family in urging the dismissal of the emperor's son Liu Bao from his position as Heir. Lai Li joined the Minister of Ceremonies Huan Yan and the Minister of Justice Zhang Hao in protest, but Liu Bao was indeed dismissed. Lai Li then led more than a dozen senior officials in a demonstration to the Gate of the Vast Capital at the Southern Palace, protesting that the former Heir was innocent of any fault. The emperor sent a senior eunuch to advise them that this was a matter between father and son, and instructing them to withdraw. His associates departed one by one, but Lai Li maintained a solitary protest for several days. Furious, the emperor stripped Lai Li and his brothers of their offices, reduced their fiefs, and banned the princess their mother from attendance at court.

Lai Li retired to his house. He had no contact even with his close kinsmen, and all the people were concerned for his fate. In the following year, however, when Emperor An died and the Little Emperor Liu Yi was placed upon the throne, the Dowager Yan appointed Lai Li as Court Architect. At the end of the year, when Liu Yi died and the coup led by the eunuch Sun Cheng restored Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, to the succession, his protest was remembered. Lai Li was promoted to Minister of the Guards, and those who had joined him were also rewarded.

In 126 Lai Li was awarded honorary position as General of Chariots and Cavalry, but retired on the grounds of illness when his mother died two years later. At the end of the period of mourning he was appointed Minister Herald, and died in that office in 133. -HHS 15/5:590-93*, Bn 76:28.

Lai [Lide] 來李德; Nanyang. FSTY 9:72; Nylan 83:538-539 tells how this man, although dead, rose up several times from his coffin and gave instructions to his household. He is described as an Excellency of Works, and the anecdote evidently refers to Lai Yan, whose style was Jide 季德.

Lai Ling 來稜 see Lai Leng 來稜.

Lai Miao 來苗. When Wu Tang was appointed first Acting General on the Liao in 65, Lai Miao became his Senior Colonel.

As a Commandant of Cavalry in 73, Lai Miao led a column of northern militia with Wuhuan and Xianbi auxiliaries in the ambitious campaign against the Northern Xiongnu. When the main army failed to meet Lai Miao and his men at the agreed rendezvous, the enterprise was a failure. Wu Tang was among those held at fault, and Lai Miao took his place as Acting General on the Liao. In 76 Lai Miao was appointed Administrator of Jiyin in central China. -HHS 89/79:2949, 23/13:810.

Lai Min 來敏 [Jingda 敬達]; Nanyang. Son of the Excellency Lai Yan, Lai Min was brother-in-law to Huang Wan. As the empire fell into chaos in the early 190s, Huang Wan was killed at Chang'an in 192, and Lai Min went with his widowed sister into Jing province. Huang Wan had been a cousin of Liu Zhang, the warlord Governor of Yi province, and about 195 Liu Zhang invited the Lady to join him. Lai Min accompanied his sister and was well received.

Expert in the formal writing style known as Cangya 倉雅, Lai Min was a noted scholar of Chunqiu and Zuo zhuan, though he had disagreements with his colleague Meng Guang. As Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214 he named Lai Min as Colonel for Education 典學校尉 and had him work with a group of scholars on the codification of procedures and rituals; the project, however, dissolved in squabbles.

When Liu Shan was named Heir in 219, Lai Min became the head of his household. He later served Zhuge Liang, and rose to ministerial rank with title as a general. He died about 260, at the age of ninety-seven. -SGZ Shu 12:1025*.

Lai Xi 來歙 or Lai She [Junshu 君叔] (d.35); Nanyang. Descended from a frontier general who had served Emperor Wu of Former Han, Lai Xi's father Zhongchen

[or Chong 沖] held office at court. He married an aunt of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, so Lai Xi was a senior cousin. It is said that Liu Xiu was a close friend of Lai Xi, that he admired and looked up to him, and they were several times together in Chang'an.

As the Han rebellion led by Liu Bosheng broke out in 22, Lai Xi was once more in Chang'an. On account of his connection to the Liu, Wang Mang ordered his arrest, but Lai Xi's followers came in a mob to attack the prison, and Lai Xi was able to escape.

When Liu Xuan was proclaimed as the Gengshi Emperor in 23, Lai Xi was granted junior office, and followed the new regime to Chang'an. Finding that he had no influence at court and no prospect of advancement, he pleaded ill health and went away. His brother-in-law Liu Jia, King of Hanzhong, invited him to the south, and Lai Xi went to join him.

In 26 a three-cornered conflict broke out between Liu Jia, the rebel Yan Cen, and Gongsun Shu's general Hou Dan. Liu Jia eventually took refuge north in the Wei valley, but though he defeated an army of the Red Eyebrows he came under threat from Guangwu's general Deng Yu. Lai Xi persuaded him to make terms and negotiated a successful surrender. Guangwu welcomed Lai Xi, took his own robe to clothe him as a sign of affection, and appointed him a Palace Counsellor.

Guangwu's chief concern at this time was with the eastern part of the empire, but he asked Lai Xi's advice how he might keep the west under control. Lai Xi observed that he had been a friend of Wei Ao in the earlier days at Chang'an, and offered to try to persuade him to submit. Guangwu approved, and Lai Xi made his first approach in 27. Wei Ao gave formal submission, but he was reluctant to abandon hope of independence, and negotiations continued over the following years. In 29 Lai Xi escorted the local leader Ma Yuan from Guangwu's court to present an imperial letter to Wei Ao, and in a subsequent embassy, with Ma Yuan's help, he persuaded Wei Ao to send his son Wei Xun as a hostage.

It is possible that at this time Lai Xi and Ma Yuan also went on embassy to Gongsun Shu, though their proposal for his submission was firmly rejected: see sub Chang Shao.

As Guangwu came to Chang'an in 30 under the guise of an attack on Gongsun Shu, he sent Lai Xi to demand that Wei Ao permit the imperial army to advance through his territory and support the campaign. Realising this would mean the end of his independence, Wei Ao temporised, and when Lai Xi pressed him for an answer he became angry and left the meeting. His officers became threatening, and Wei Ao's general Wang Yuan urged him to kill Lai Xi. During earlier visits, however, Lai Xi had gained respect and made several friends, and the general Wang Zun argued in his favour. Lai Xi was able to leave unmolested.

Wei Ao achieved a brief success against the first imperial attack, but his own advance was then driven back and his fellow-warlord Dou Rong refused an alliance. Wei Ao wrote once more to Guangwu, and Lai Xi was sent to a final meeting on the border to seek his submission and demand a further hostage. Wei Ao remained recalcitrant and negotiations were ended.

The offensive was renewed at the beginning of 32, and Lai Xi accompanied the general Zhai Zun in the van of the army approaching the Long Slope. As Zhai Zun was taken ill and forced to retire, he transferred his best soldiers to Lai Xi. Though this was Lai Xi's first significant command, he showed great courage and a fine grasp of strategy, leading two thousand men in a surprise attack to seize Lueyang in Tianshui. The city was promptly besieged by Wei Ao, aided by troops sent by Gongsun Shu, a combined army numbered at several ten thousand men. They cut trees from the hills to make siege engines and channelled the river in an attempt to flood the city, but Lai Xi and his men resisted all attacks. When short of arrows, they broke up the houses to get wood, and though utterly exhausted they held out until the autumn.

Wei Ao maintained defences on the north and east, but Lai Xi's forlorn hope weakened his position from behind and prepared the way for the attack of the main army under Guangwu. As the Han forces approached, Wei Ao's men scattered and Lai Xi and his men were relieved. Guangwu gave a banquet for him, set him in the highest position of honour, and granted his wife a thousand rolls of silk.

Lai Xi was sent back to Chang'an to take administrative command of all the army. When Wei Ao died at the beginning of 33 Lai Xi proposed a major campaign to occupy the Wei valley and deprive Gongsun Shu of this northern area of defence in depth. He was duly given command over the chief generals Feng Yi, Geng Yan and He Yan, with the generals Ma Cheng and Liu Shang, and sent to invade Tianshui. By 34 his forces had destroyed Gongsun Shu's commanders Tian Yan and Zhao Kuang and forced Wei Ao's son Wei Chun to surrender, together with Zhou Zong, Zhao Hui and other former officers of Wei Ao.

Lai Xi and his generals He Yan and Liu Shang then moved against the Qiang of Jincheng and Longxi, former allies of Wei Ao who had turned to raiding after the death of their patron. With support from Ma Yuan he defeated the tribesmen, killing several thousand and capturing great numbers of cattle and sheep and quantities of grain. He then attacked the local bandit Fu Liqing and others, and settled Longxi commandery. The people were short of food, but Lai Xi arranged to import grain and distribute it to all the counties. So the territory was at peace, the White Horse Di of Wudu submitted, and the Han empire regained direct contact with the northwest.

In the summer of 35 Lai Xi attacked Gongsun Shu's generals Wang Yuan and Huan An in Wudu, broke their defences and continued to the south. This advance was the northern flank of Guangwu's campaign against Gongsun Shu, and was co-ordinated with the offensive under Cen Peng moving up the Yangzi from the east. In the sixth month, however, Lai Xi was stabbed by an enemy agent and died soon afterwards. He composed a last memorial to the emperor, and handed his command to He Yan. Operations then petered out, and the northern army played no significant role in the destruction of Gongsun Shu.

Expressing the utmost sorrow, Guangwu had Lai Xi's body brought back to Luoyang and attended the funeral in person. He granted Lai Xi posthumous enfeoffment as Marquis Who Subdues the Qiang 征羌侯, with fief territory of Dangxiang 當鄉 in Runan, changing the name of the county to Zhengqiang 征羌. -HHS 15/5:585-89*; Bn 59:165-191.

Lai Xian 賴先. FSTY 6f:146 refers to Lai Xian as Administrator of Jiaozhi. This may be the same man as Lai Gong 恭 the Governor of Jiaozhi q.v.

Lai Yan 來豔 [Jide 季德] (d.178); Nanyang. Son of Lai Ding and younger brother of Lai Hu, Lai Yan was a keen scholar as a young man and became known for his generosity. Minister of Ceremonies in 171, he was promoted Excellency of Works but left that office a few months later. In 178 he was again promoted from Minister of Ceremonies to Excellency of Works, but left office on grounds of ill health and died soon afterwards. -HHS 8:332-33:341, 15/5:593.

Lai You 來由; Nanyang. Lai You was a younger brother of Lai Xi, who had been granted posthumous enfeoffment in 35 to honour his achievements. That marquisate was inherited by Lai Xi's son Bao, but in 37, as further recognition, Lai You received a district fief. -HHS 15/5:590.

Lai Zhi 來祉; Nanyang. Lai Zhi was a younger brother of Lai Li, who led a protest against the dismissal of the Heir Liu Bao in 124; Emperor An ordered that he and his brothers be stripped of their official posts. After Liu Bao came to the throne in 125 Lai Zhi was appointed as a colonel in the Northern Army. -HHS 15/5:593.

Lan Xiang 蘭襄; Zhao. Lan Xiang died and was buried, but his coffin was washed away. About 200 he appeared in a dream to Wen Shuliang, downstream in Ganling, and asked for a proper reburial. Wen Shuliang found the coffin and carried out his wishes. -SJZ 5:18b.

Lang Sheng 郎勝 [or "Gentleman Sheng"] see Guo Sheng 郭勝. -ZZTJ 59:1895 Kaoyi.

Lang Yi 郎顛 [Yaguang 雅光]; Beihai. Son of Lang Zong, Lang Yi maintained his father's scholarly tradition in the Book of Changes and in esoteric arts, but he was widely learned in the classical texts, and his students were numbered in the hundreds. The local offices invited him to office, and he was nominated as Knowing the Way and as Sincere and Upright, but always refused.

In 133, after many portents had been reported, Emperor Shun sent a special carriage and asked for his advice. Lang Yi replied with three detailed memorials, on the essentials of good government [including the need to pay respect to worthy hermits], on the significance of portents, and on the importance of the emperor's personal virtue as a means to restore natural order. Foreshadowing further misfortunes to come, he protested at the numbers of women in the imperial harem, criticised the senior ministers, urged a general enquiry and purge of all officials, and opposed the recent reforms of the Filial and Incorrupt nomination process which had been lately introduced by Zuo Xiong. He also wrote strongly on the fine qualities of the potential reformers Li Gu and Huang Qiong.

Lang Yi received special summons to become a gentleman cadet, but this was only a probationary position and did not indicate any particular favour from the throne. He pleaded ill health and returned to his home. In following years there were a number of natural disasters and several invasions from the non-Chinese along the frontier, much as Lang Yi had foretold. A special carriage was again sent with an invitation, but this time he did not accept.

A local strongman named Sun Li admired Lang Yi and wanted to establish a relationship with him. When Lang Yi paid no attention, Sun Li killed him. It may well be that the murder was instigated by some of Lang Yi's enemies at the capital. -HHS 30/20B:1053-75*, XC 1:8a-b; MBeck 90:166, Vervoorn 90:192, Ngo 76:79, DeWoskin 83:172.

Lang Zhi 郎稚 (d.211); Wu. Leader of a clan rebellion about the head of Hangzhou Bay, he was destroyed by He Qi in 211. -SGZ Wu 15:1379.

Lang Zong 郎宗 [Zhongsui 仲綏]; Beihai. A scholar of the Jing Fang interpretation of the Book of Changes, Lang Zong was also expert in astrology and divination by the wind. He wandered about in shabby clothes, carrying a bag of books and telling fortunes for a living, and no-one recognised him.

In 121 Emperor An sent carriages and escorts, with most courteous invitations, to Lang Zong and other hermit scholars, that they might take positions at court. Lang Zong and Yang Lun were the only two to obey the call; Lang Zong was appointed a Consultant and then a county magistrate in Wu.

A few weeks after he arrived in Wu, Lang Zong noted a fierce gust of wind and, remarking that there was a great fire at Luoyang, recorded the day and time. He was quite accurate: the Treatise of the Five Powers, HHS 104/14:3294, lists a fire at Luoyang in the autumn of 122. When senior officials referred the matter to an Academician for verification, however, Lang Zong was angry at his claim being questioned. He resigned his office and died at home. -HHS 30/20B:1053, 82/72A:2722, XC 6:6a-b; Vervoorn 90:292.

Langfeng 良封 (d.135); Qiang. In 133 the Chinese established a commandant's district based on Lintao in the south of Longxi. Though there had been such a post during Former Han, this was a new development at the time and the local Qiang felt threatened by the expansion.

In the following year Langfeng led men of the Zhong tribe to attack Longxi and raid Hanyang. Ma Xu the Protector of the Qiang gained some initial success, but his predecessor Ma Xian [not a close kinsman] was then given command of operations and raised local troops in Longxi and auxiliaries from other groups of the Qiang.

In 135 Ma Xian defeated and killed Langfeng and almost two thousand of his followers, and seized over 50,000 cattle, horses and sheep. Langfeng's kinsmen and household came to surrender. -HHS 87/77:2894.

Langmo 狼莫 (d.118); Qiang. At the death of Dianlian, leader of the rebel Qiang, in 112, his son Lianchang was too young to take full command. Langmo, a man from the same tribe, was in charge of strategy, while the Chinese renegade Du Jigong became a general. The new regime, however, lacked the authority of Dianlian, and though they gained some victories the fortunes of the rebellion declined thereafter and the Han armies pressed against them and sent raiding parties.

In 117 Du Jigong and Lianchang were both killed by Chinese assassins, and in the winter Langmo was attacked by the general Ren Shang and the Protector Ma Xian. After an initial success against Ma Xian, he was decisively defeated in Beidi. Langmo fled, but in the following year he was killed by a fellow-Qiang at the instigation of the general Deng Zun. -HHS 87/77:2888-91; deC 84:106-111.

Lao Bing 勞丙 (d.160); Langye. A leader of bandits in Langye, he was allied to Shusun Wuji of Taishan. In 160, however, Zong Zi took command of operations, defeated Lao Bing and Shusun Wuji and killed them both. -HHS 7:307, 82/72B:2732.

Lao Chuan 牢川 see Lao Xiu 牢脩.

Lao Shun 牢順 see Lao Xiu 牢脩.

Lao Xiu 牢脩 or Lao Shun 順 and, probably mistakenly, as Lao Chuan 川; Henei. Lao Xiu was a disciple of Zhang Cheng, an expert on divination by the wind. In 166 the Director of Retainers Li Ying executed Zhang Cheng's son for murder, and it appears that Zhang Cheng shared his fate. The palace eunuchs, however, old associates of Zhang Cheng, now arranged for Lao Xiu to accuse Li Ying and his colleague reformists of forming a faction, protecting students of the University, and seeking support throughout the empire for their own interests. Emperor Huan ordered that Li Ying and others be dismissed and imprisoned. This was the beginning of the First Faction Incident. -HHS 67/57:2187, 103/13:3283 [as Lao Chuan 川].

Lei Pu 雷蒲 or Lei Bo. In 199 Lei Pu and Chen Lan, officers of Yuan Shu, were in the hill country of Lujiang. As his state collapsed, Yuan Shu came to them for refuge, but they drove him away. -HHS 75/65:2443, SGZ 6:209. [This is probably the same person as Lei Xu below.]

Lei Qian 雷遷 see Leiqian 雷遷.

Lei Shou 雷授; Yuzhang. Son of Lei Yi, Lei Shou became Administrator of Cangwu. -HHS 81/71:2688.

Lei Tong 雷銅/同 (d.218). An officer of Liu Bei, in 218 Lei Tong was sent with Wu Lan on detachment into Wudu commandery, but they were destroyed there by Cao Cao's forces. -SGZ Shu 2:884, 12:1020.

Lei Xu 雷緒 (d.209); Lujiang. A local leader, Lei Xu plundered the region of the Yangzi and the Huai about 200, but then accepted the authority of Cao Cao's officer Liu Fu.

After Cao Cao's defeat at the Red Cliffs in 208 Lei Xu changed allegiance to Liu Bei, but he was destroyed by Xiahou Yuan in the following year. -SGZ 15:463, 9:270, SGZ Shu 2:879. [This is probably the same person as Lei Pu above.]

Lei Yi 雷義 [Zhonggong 仲公]; Yuzhang. As a young man Lei Yi was a close friend of Chen Zhong, and they studied the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Lu and the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu in the tradition of Yan Anle.

Lei Yi became Officer of Merit in his commandery. Those whom he recommended were always of the highest quality, but he claimed no credit for such a remarkable record. On one occasion, after his intercession had saved a man from the death penalty, his protégé brought two catties of gold as a thank-offering. Lei Yi refused to accept the gift, but the man waited until he had gone out and then hid the gold in the ceiling of his house. As the roof was being repaired some time later the gold was discovered, but by this time the man was dead and Lei Yi had no-one he could return it to. He presented it to the local treasury.

About 112, when the Administrator Zhang Yun nominated Chen Zhong as Filial and Incorrupt, Chen Zhong urged that Lei Yi be given preference. Zhang Yun insisted on his choice, but in the following year he recommended Lei Yi. [Xie Cheng says that the contested nomination was that of Abundant Talent, awarded by the provincial Inspector.]

and then entered the Imperial Secretariat. In 117 they attempted to persuade their colleague Zhang Jun not to report against the officers Zhu Ji and Ding Sheng. Zhang Jun was adamant, but Zhu Ji and Ding Sheng then implicated him in a major scandal.

Some years later, when another member of the Secretariat committed an offence and was due to be sentenced, Lei Yi took the blame for his crime and was sentenced to penal servitude. Other officers, knowing the situation, sent a delegation to ask for mercy on his behalf and offering to take the penalty instead. Emperor Shun ordered that no punishment be applied, but Lei Yi was dismissed from his office.

Lei Yi was again nominated Abundant Talent by his province. On this occasion he sought to cede the place to Chen Zhong, who had resigned in sympathy at his dismissal. When the Inspector refused, Lei Yi pretended to be mad, wore his hair in disarray and refused to respond to the summons. The local people explained that Lei Yi and Chen Zhong were bound closer than glue to varnish, while Huang Xiang described them as two wings of the same bird. The offices of the Excellencies at the capital called up both men together. [The biography of Chen Zhong says that he received one appointment as Abundant Talent, then resigned, and was re-appointed through the offices of the Excellencies.]

Lei Yi was made a probationary Internuncio and sent with the Staff of Authority to observe customs and government in a number of commanderies and kingdoms. He reported seventy administrators and magistrates for poor conduct, and was then appointed as an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate. This tour of inspection is reminiscent of the major commission of eight sent out in 142 [see sub Dong Qiao], but Lei Yi was not one of that number, and his expedition probably took place a few years earlier, perhaps in the 120s.

Lei Yi later became a magistrate in Runan, and died in that office. -HHS 81/71:2687-88, 45/35:1524, XC 6:1b-2a.

Lei Zi 羸咨 see Ying Zi 羸咨.

Lei'ao 類牢 of Ailao 哀牢 (d.77). King of the Ailao people in the far southwest of China, possibly the son of Liumiao, in 76 Lei'ao quarrelled with his Chinese supervisor: the man was probably attempting to extract greater tribute and obedience from the empire's new subjects. Gathering three thousand men, Lei'ao killed several Chinese officials, attacked the headquarters of Yongchang commandery on the Mekong by present-day Yongping in Yunnan, drove the Administrator Wang Xun back to the region of the Dali Lake, and destroyed the newly-established Chinese counties of the region.

The government of Emperor Zhang ordered a mixed force of nine thousand Han militia and non-Chinese auxiliaries from Yuexi, Yizhou and Yongchang commanderies to attack Lei'ao. In the following year he was defeated and killed, and his head was sent to Luoyang. -HHS 86/76:2851, 101/11:3232.

Leigong 雷公 see Zhang Leigong 張雷公.

Leiqian 雷遷; non-Chinese. A tribal chieftain in Nan commandery, Leiqian rebelled in 47 and attacked Chinese positions. The trouble was put down by the Han general Liu Shang, and seven thousand of Leiqian's people were transferred east across the Han River into Jiangxia. -HHS 86/76:2841.

Leizu 累祖 (d.137); Qiang. During the 130s the White Horse tribe of the Qiang, which lived on the Wudu frontier, had been troubling the territory. In 137 they were defeated by the Commandant of Guanghan, and later that year the Protector Ma Xian also attacked them, killing two of their chieftains, Leizu and Jizhi, and taking three hundred heads. -HHS 87/77:2194.

Li 李, the Lady I; Danyang. Daughter of Li Nan, she was married to a man of a neighbouring county. Like her father, the Lady was skilled in divination by the wind. One morning, a gust of wind blew through her kitchen from the stove to the well. Observing that this indicated the mistress of the kitchen would shortly die, she asked leave to return to her own family and even named the day of her death. Her prophecy was fulfilled. -HHS 82/72A:2717; Ngo 76:94-95, DeWoskin 86:58.

Li 李, the Lady II. A concubine of Emperor An, in 115 the Lady gave birth to his son Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. Soon afterwards she was poisoned by the Empress Yan.

The Lady was buried north of Luoyang, but Liu Bao was told of his mother's fate only after he had come to the throne in 125. He had her remains exhumed, gave her special honours and a posthumous imperial title, and established a tomb and park for her immediately north of Emperor An's. -HHS 6:249, 10B:437-38.

Li 李, the Lady III; Yingchuan. Daughter of Li Yi, at the instigation of her grandfather Li Xiu she was married to her cousin Zhong Qin. -HHS 62/52:2064.

Li 李, the Lady IV; Runan. The Lady was first married to Deng Yuanyi, whose father Bokao became Deputy Director of the Imperial Secretariat at Luoyang. When Deng Yuanyi returned to Runan, the Lady stayed at the capital to care for her mother-in-law. The mother-in-law hated her, however, shut her away and refused to feed her. The Lady made no complaint, but eventually her son Deng Lang explained to Deng Bokao that she was not ill but starving. Bitterly ashamed at the treatment she had received from his wife, Deng Bokao sent the Lady Li back to her own family.

The Lady then became the second wife of Ying Shun, and when he became Court Architect in the 160s she returned with him to the capital. Deng Yuanyi saw her there and spoke of her with respect, but Deng Lang, now a gentleman cadet, destroyed her gifts and refused to reply to her letters. At last she tricked him into a meeting and pleaded with him, so the two were reconciled. -HHS 48/38:1607.

Li 李, the Lady V. A concubine of Cao Cao, she was the mother of Cao Zicheng, Cao Zizheng and Cao Zijing. -SGZ 20:579.

Li 李, the Lady VI. A senior concubine of Cao Pi, the Lady became the mother of Cao Xie 協, who died young.

About 220 the favour the Lady Li and others were receiving caused the Lady Zhen, his senior consort, to become fatally jealous. In 221, on the other hand, when the Lady Zhen was slandered by her rival the Lady Guo and was ordered to commit suicide she entrusted her son Cao Rui to the care of the Lady Li. Despite her wishes, however, Cao Pi removed the young man from the care of the Lady Li and had him adopted by the Lady Guo, now empress.

After the death of the Dowager Guo in 235, the Lady Li told Cao Rui, now Emperor, of the role she had played in his mother's death. The Lady Guo was posthumously disgraced. -SGZ 5:160, 166-167, 20:590; C/C 99.97, 110.

Li 李 [personal name unknown]; Runan. A magistrate in Pei, he mourned the death of the Attendant Officer Huang Yu and joined in setting up a stele to his memory. -SJZ 24:7b.

Li 李 [personal name unknown]; Liaodong. Son of Li Min, after Gongsun Du attacked the family he became separated from his father and was twenty years in refuge and exile beyond the frontier. Taxed by Xu Miao for failing to maintain his father's lineage, he married and bred a son, then repudiated his wife and resumed mourning for his lost parents. The son, Li Yin 胤, became a minister of Jin. -SGZ 8:253.

Li 李 [personal name unknown]. A general in Cao Cao's service in the early 200s, he consulted the doctor Hua Tuo about his wife, who had suffered a miscarriage and was not getting better. Hua Tuo told him that although one foetus had been expelled, another was still inside her.

The husband was unwilling to believe this, and his wife did appear to recover slightly. Three months later, however, her condition was worse and he asked Hua Tuo to return. Hua Tuo applied acupuncture and gave medicine to bring on labour, but the woman was unable to expel the foetus. Hua Tuo explained that it was now too dry, and had an assistant abort the foetus: it proved to be male, recognisably human, but black in colour. -HHS 82/72B:2738, SGZ 29:802; Ngo 76:121, DeWoskin 86:145.

Li 豐 or Feng 豐 [surname unknown]. With rank as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, in 220 he was a sponsor of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Li 李阿. An attendant to Liu Chang, King of Liang, in the early 90s he was an associate of Bian Ji and encouraged the king to seek support and guidance from the spirit world. As a result of these activities, Liu Chang was reported for impiety. -HHJ 14:174.

Li Bao 李寶 (d.26); Nanyang. Probably a kinsman of Li Tong, he was a leader of the Han rebels when the Gengshi Emperor claimed the imperial title in 23. He was named a general, and when the Han troops took Wan city in the summer of that year Li Bao was enfeoffed as a titular marquis.

After the Gengshi Emperor had established his capital at Chang'an in 24 he sent Li Bao with the Inspector-designate Zhang Zhong to take control of Yi province, present-day Sichuan. The warlord Gongsun Shu, however, sent his brother Gongsun Hui to attack the invaders as they approached Chengdu. Li Bao and Zhang Zhong were defeated and withdrew into Wudu commandery.

Early in 26 the rebel Yan Cen attacked Liu Jia the King of Hanzhong, took over the commandery and pursued Liu Jia into Wudu. Li Bao came to the rescue, defeated Yan Cen and drove him north into Tianshui on the upper Wei. Liu Jia named Li Bao as his Chancellor, and they collected several ten thousand men to attack Hanzhong, which had been seized in the mean time by Gongsun Shu's general Hou Dan. Hou Dan defeated the invaders and forced them back into Wudu. Yan Cen returned, but after several engagements he was forced once more over the mountains to the north, this time into Youfufeng. Liu Jia and Li Bao followed him there, defeated him again, then moved north of the Wei.

Attacked by Red Eyebrows, they defeated them and killed their leader Liao Zhan. It was probably at this time that Li Bao was defeated and forced to surrender in a preliminary engagement, but stayed behind as battle was resumed, seized the enemy camp, displayed his banners, and turned their retreat into a rout: HHS 11/1:484; Bn 59:221 [Bielenstein observes that this anecdote is surely mistaken to describe Li Bao as fighting for Liu Jia's enemy Yan Can].

As Liu Jia's position near Chang'an was vulnerable to Guangwu's general Deng Yu, Li Bao and other officers persuaded him to surrender. When the party came to Deng Yu's camp Li Bao is said to have acted discourteously, and Deng Yu executed him. In revenge, Li Bao's younger brother gathered his followers to attack Deng Yu. They killed the general Geng Xin, but are not heard of again. -HHS 14/4:568, 16/6:604; Bn 59:20-21.

Li Bao 李寶; Zhongshan>Liaodong. XTS 72A:2593 says that Li Bao became Commandant of Xuantu and moved the family residence to the northwest.

Li Bao 李苞; Longxi. Local officers under the Administrator Liu Xu in 56, Li Bao and Xin Du were sent with five thousand men to assist the local forces of Wudu against a raid by the Shenlang tribe of the Qiang. Their initial success against the enemy encouraged the Wudu troops to rally; they defeated the raiders and forced their surrender. -HHS 87/77:2879.

Li Biao 黎彪; Ba. Li Biao was Administrator of Yongchang during Later Han. -HYZG 4:60.

Li Big-Eyes 李大目 see Li Damu 李大目.

Li Bing 李昺 [Ziran 子然]; Nanyang. A hermit scholar, with no concern for wealth or fame, Li Bing was an expert on the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Lu and on the Jing Fang interpretation of the Book of Changes. He was frequently invited to office, and was nominated by the provincial government as Abundant Talent, but always refused. In 121 Emperor An sent carriages and escorts, with most courteous invitations, to Li Bing and other hermit scholars, that they might attend and take positions at court. Li Bing ignored this summons too. He died at home. -HHS 82/72A:2722, XC 6:5b-6a; Vervoorn 90:292.

Li Bing 李冰. A former Administrator of Shu commandery, Li Bing had a pictorial stele erected in his honour in 168. -Nagata 94:164.

Li Bo 李伯 (d.154); Shu. Claiming membership of the imperial house, in 154 Li Bo took title as Emperor of the Grand Beginning 太初. He was defeated and killed. -HHS 7:300.

Li Boqing 黎伯卿. Early in 26 Li Boqing was among the leaders of bandits in the hill country on the edge of the Taihang ranges west of Wei commandery. Emperor Guangwu's general Wu Han brought a great army against Li Boqing and his fellows and wiped them out. -HHS 18/8:678.

Li Boyu 李伯玉: alternative personal name or style of Li Tong 李通.

Li Can 李參. At the time of the rebellion in Liang province in 185, Li Can was Administrator of Longxi. Ying Shao praised his ability. -HHS 48/38:1610.

Li Chang 李萇. A man of humble family, Li Chang cared for his mother, working in the fields by day and studying at night. -XC 8:2a.

Li Chang 李偃. Administrator of Runan about 150, Li Chang recommended six gentlemen for office. They duly received imperial invitations, but Li Chang died before they had left for the capital. As they went to attend his funeral Li Chang's widow urged that they should leave, for they had official responsibilities.

Zhou Ziju 周子居 observed that if they went they would be neglecting their duty to their late patron, while if they did not go they would be failing their public responsibility. He and Ai Bojian 艾伯堅 then went to the capital, while Feng Wudian 封武典, Huang Xian 黃憲 [style Shudu 叔度], Zhi Boshang 鄧伯尚 and Sheng Kongshu 盛孔叔 stayed to carry out the mourning ceremonies. -HHSJJ 53/43:1879-80 Hui Dong quoting an anecdote included in a later edition of Ban Zhao's Precepts for Women 女誡.

FSTY 5:37-38; Nylan 83:462-465 has a version of this story, but the names are somewhat different. In that text, Li's personal name is written as Zhang 張, and his nominees are given as Zhou Cheng 周乘 [style Ziju 子居], Zheng Bojian 鄭伯堅, Feng Qi 封祈 [style Wuxing 武興], Huang Shudu [i.e. Huang Xian], Zhi Boxiang 鄧伯嚮 and Sheng Kongshu.

While the names of Zhou Ziju, Huang Shudu and Sheng Kongshu are fully compatible, and the differences between Chang 偃 and Zhang 張, between Wudian 武典 and Wuxing 武興, and between Boshang 伯尚 and Boxiang 伯嚮 can be explained by minor textual corruption, the difference between Ai Bojian and Zheng Bojian is awkward: see sub Zheng Gu.

Li Chang 離常 held probationary office as a Palace Cadet of the Heir. -XC 8:2a.

Li Chao 李超 (d.126). In the autumn of 126 Dai commandery was attacked by Xianbi tribesmen led by Qizhijian. The Administrator Li Chao faced the invaders with local troops, but was defeated and killed. -HHS 6:253, 90/80:2988.

Li Chao 李朝 [Yongnan 永南 or Weinan 偉南] (d.225); Guanghan. Brother of Li Miao and Li Shao, Li Chao became Officer of Merit in his commandery. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt about 215, he became a county magistrate and then Attendant Officer to Liu Bei. He was killed in the disastrous expedition against Wu in 222. -SGZ Shu 15:1088, HYGZ 10B:151.

Li [Chaobo] 李朝伯; Yuzhang. Internuncio in charge of the Camp at Liyang in Wei commandery in 150, Li Chaobo assisted the magistrate Zheng Chen, in neighbouring Henei, to set up a stele in honour of a local hero known as Lord Zhang 張公. -LS 3:12b-15a.

Li Cheng 李盛 see Li Sheng 李盛.

Li Cheng 栗成. Administrator of Wei for Yuan Shao in 193, he was killed in Ye city by bandits and mutineers. -SGZ 6:194.

Li Cheng 李成. A general in the service of Cao Cao about 200, Li Cheng suffered from a constant and violent cough, accompanied by blood. The celebrated doctor Hua Tuo diagnosed an ulcer and gave him a powder to take. Li Cheng vomited a great quantity of blood and then recovered.

Hua Tuo warned that the malady would recur in eighteen years time, and gave him a repeat dose. A few years later, however, one of Li Cheng's kinsmen suffered from the same illness and asked Li Cheng for a dose to cure himself; he promised to go to Hua Tuo and get a new supply. When he did so, however, Cao Cao had just had Hua Tuo arrested, and the man was too frightened to make his request before Hua Tuo was executed. The illness duly returned and Li Cheng had no means to treat it, so he died. -SGZ 29:803, HHS 82/72B:2739; Ngo 76:122, DeWoskin 86:146-147.

Li Chong 李寵; Nanyang. Younger brother of Li Shu and Li Tong, in 22 Li Chong took part in the approach to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, on plans for a rising against Wang Mang. Li Tong was clearly the leader of the kinship group, and Li Chong does not appear again in the histories; it is probable that he and his eldest brother Shu were among those killed after the defeat of the rebels at Xiao-Chang'an in the winter of 22. -HHJ 1:2.

Li Chong 李崇. An officer of the Bureau of Astronomy in 85, Li Chong was one of the experts consulted by Jia Kui when he prepared his report on the revised Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar for Emperor Zhang. -HHS 92/2:3027.

Li Chong 李充 [Daxun 大遜]; Chenliu. A poor man, Li Chong lived with his six brothers, sharing their food and clothing, and showing utmost respect to their mother.

Li Chong's wife, who had money of her own, suggested they should leave and live apart. Pretending to agree, Li Chong had her invite the neighbours for a farewell ceremony, but then repudiated her and sent her away. As Ch'ü observes, this was harsh treatment, but may have appeared justified by the fact that the wife proposed to abandon her mother-in-law rather than devoting herself and her property to her husband's whole family.

After Li Chong's mother died, a man stole a tree from her grave-mound; Li Chong killed him. When the mourning period was over he went to live alone and established a school. The Administrator Lu Ping invited him to become his Officer of Merit, and when he refused he had him arrested and forced him to become headman of the chief village of the county.

When Emperor He sent an official carriage for him to come to court, Li Chong refused, but in 106 the new regency of the Dowager Deng issued a call for worthy Confucian gentlemen living in obscurity 隱士大儒. Li Chong received a special summons and became an Academician at the Imperial University. His former oppressor Lu Ping was also an Academician, and he paid his respects each time they met.

Li Chong then became a Palace Attendant. He was greatly admired by the General-in-Chief Deng Zhi, brother of the Dowager, who invited him to a feast and asked him how the government could encourage hermit scholars to emerge from retirement. When Li Chong expressed doubt concerning the quality and value of such men, Deng Zhi tried to persuade him to eat something rather than continue in this vein, but Li Chong threw down the food and left the gathering in disgust. Someone observed that such criticism offended Deng Zhi and would do little to enhance the fortunes of his descendants, but Li Chong replied that it was more important to be honest than to seek good fortune for his family.

Li Chong later became a General of the Household, and at the age of eighty he was honoured as Thrice Venerable, a central figure in the annual imperial ceremony of Serving the Aged at the Hall of the Circular Moat. Emperor An treated him with great favour, permitting him to use a staff and then to sit on a bench when he came to audience. Li Chong died at home about 125. -HHS 81/71:2684-85*, XC 6:1a-b; Ch'ü 72:303-304, *Vervoor*n 90. 288.

Li Chong 李充; Guanghan. Grandson of Li You, he was also a man of literary ability. Appointed to the library of the Eastern Pavilion and later a member of the Imperial Secretariat, he composed a number of rhapsodies, essays, eulogies and hymns. -HYGZ 10B: 146, 12:224.

Li Chun 李春. When Deng Yu was given command in the west against the Gengshi Emperor, he appointed Li Chun to his staff. -HHS 16/6:601.

Li Chun 李純; Donglai. Son of Li Wei, he succeeded to the family fief. When his mother Li Li murdered her brother-in-law Li Ji, Li Chun was held responsible: in 59 or 66 his fief was ended. DGHJ 10:4a, says that the murder took place in 永平二, while HHS 21/11 says Li Chun lost his fief in 永平九.

In 113 the Dowager Deng granted Li Chun a new marquisate, but fief was a village, not a county as before. -HHS 21/11:756.

Li Ci 李慈 see Li Zi 李兹.

Li Damu 李大目 [Big-Eyes Li] (d.193). A leader of the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range in 185, he was defeated and killed by Yuan Shao in 193. -HHS 71/61:2310, 74/64A:2381, SGZ 8:262, 6:194.

Li Dangzhi 李當之. A disciple of the celebrated doctor Hua Tuo, Li Dangzhi continued his pharmacological work and also published his own compilation, Lishi yaolu 李氏藥錄, which became one of the texts forming a basis for the modern Bencao jing 本草經. Needham 86:246-248 says that Li Dangzhi was a man of Later Han, but other references date him well into the third century; he may not have been a direct student of Hua Tuo, who died before 208.

Li Deng 李登; Jibei. A local officer of the province, Li Deng became ill and was given sick leave. While still believing that he was sick, he received a summons to return, but persuaded his identical twin brother Ning to take his place. They were later found out, and Li Deng was executed. -FSTY 3f:106.

Li Di 李覲. About 214 Li Di had a high reputation in Yan province. The Inspector Sima Lang, however, disapproved of him and refused to recommend or appoint him to office. Li Di was later disgraced, and the people acknowledged Sima Lang's good judgement. -SGZ 15:468.

Li Dian 李典 [Mancheng 曼成]; Shanyang. A cousin of Li Zheng, Li Dian took over his troops after his death in 195. He was a man of scholarly interests, and Cao Cao at first gave him civil posts as a magistrate and administrator. In 200 Li Dian brought clan troops and provisions to aid in the campaign against Yuan Shao and he was made a major-general.

In 202 Li Dian joined the defence against Liu Bei's advance from Jing province. As Liu Bei burned his camp and retreated, Li Dian warned Xiahou Dun and his colleagues against the likelihood of an ambush. Xiahou Dun and Yu Jin did fall into Liu Bei's trap, but Li Dian came and rescued them.

When Cao Cao attacked Yuan Tan in 203 he put Li Dian and Cheng Yu in charge of transport. Yuan Shang sent his officer Gao Fan to occupy a position on the Yellow River and cut the supply line by water. Cao Cao suggested they should bring up the goods by land, but Li Dian argued that Gao Fan's troops were largely light-armed and not prepared for naval warfare. He and Cheng Yu proposed to attack them, and Cao Cao agreed. The offensive was completely successful and the water route was opened.

After the capture of Ye city in 204 Li Dian and Yue Jin faced Gao Gan in Bing province and in 206 they defeated the pirate Guan Cheng on the eastern coast. Li Dian was promoted a general, enfeoffed, and permitted to shift his clans-folk to settle at Ye. When Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208 Li Dian commanded one of seven divisions in Nanyang under the Area Commander Zhao Yan.

From 209 Li Dian was in garrison at Hefei, defending the line of the Huai River. He was an old enemy and rival of his fellow-commander Zhang Liao, but when Sun Quan came with a major offensive in 215, he joined Zhang Liao in a gallant defeat of the southern army. He was rewarded with an increase in the value of his fief.

Li Dian was fond of learning and honoured Confucian scholars. He would not compete for credit against other commanders, and he was always respectful to worthy gentlemen. He died about 217, aged thirty-six.

When Cao Pi came to the throne in 220 he commemorated Li Dian's defence of Hefei by increasing the fief inherited by his son Li Zhen and granting a secondary marquissate to one of Li Dian's other sons. -SGZ 18:533-34*.

Li Ding 李定; Nanyang. Son of Li Yin, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 15/5:576.

Li Ding 李定; Zhuo. About 170 Li Ding foretold that a great man would emerge from the household of Liu Bei. Liu Bei later became a warlord and claimed the imperial title as First Sovereign of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 2:872.

Li Du 李篤; Donglai. As Zhang Jian fled the eunuchs' persecution in 169, he took refuge with Li Du, and when the local official Mao Qin came to search for him, Li Du persuaded him to let such a worthy man go. He then assisted Zhang Jian to escape across the northern frontier. -HHS 67/57:2210, HHJ 22:262, XC 4:8a; deC 89:113.

Li E 李娥, the Lady; Wuling. In 199, aged over sixty, the Lady became ill and apparently died. She was buried some distance outside her home city. Two weeks later, however, when a certain Cai Zhong attempted to rob the tomb, the Lady shouted at him from inside her coffin. He was frightened and ran away, but was seen and captured, and the Lady Li was found alive. -HHS 9:381, 107/17:3348-49.

Li Er 李珥 [Jin'e 進娥], the Lady; Guanghan. After her husband Feng Jizai died young, the Lady's parents wanted her to marry again, but she cut off her hair to show her determination to remain a virtuous widow. -HYGZ 10B:153, 12:228.

Li Er 李兒. In an inscription of 150 Li Er is mentioned as an engineer dealing with the transport galleries on the Sanmen Gorges of the Yellow River. -Needham 71: 277.

Li Fa 李法 [Bodu 伯度]; Hanzhong. A man of wide learning and high morality, Li Fa was called to court as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright. Having presented an essay, he was made an Academician, and then became a Palace Attendant and Household Counsellor. He later presented a memorial against recent developments in government, including the growth of power of the eunuchs, while also criticising the accuracy of current historical writing. Such temerity offended the emperor: Li Fa was reduced to commoner rank and returned to his home country.

After eight years in private life, Li Fa was recalled to be a Consultant and then a Counsellor Remonstrant, though his comments were as critical as before. Appointed Administrator of Runan, he ran a successful government, and HYGZ claims he also served as Director of Retainers. He retired and died at home. -HHS 48/38:1601*, HYGZ 10C:167.

HYGZ says Li Fa was at court during the time of Emperor Huan, presumably in the 160s, but HHS dates him to the time of Emperor He in the 90s.

Li Fan 李汎; Nanyang. Younger brother of Li Song, in the autumn of 25 he was Colonel of the City Gates at Chang'an for the Gengshi Emperor. Li Song was captured by the Red Eyebrows, and Li Fan offered to open a gate to the enemy if they would spare his brother's life. The agreement was made and the Red Eyebrows took the city, but Li Song was killed. -HHS 11/1:475.

Li Fan 李梵; Qinghe. In 85 Li Fan and his colleague Bian Xin were members of the calendrical office. The Taichu 太初 [Grand Beginning] calendar, which had been in use since that reign-period in 104 BC, had become seriously inaccurate, despite adjustments by the Santong 三統 [Three Sequences] system of Liu Xin 劉歆 in the time of Wang Mang. The official Bureau of Astronomy was unable to propose a solution, and Emperor Zhang commissioned Bian Xin and Li Fan to prepare a better set of calculations.

In a major reform, Bian Xin and Li Fan proposed a new version of the ancient Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] system, and an imperial edict put it into effect. Sivin 69:19-33 observes that the Quarter Day calendar was more accurate on the length of the year, but was no better at predicting eclipses.

Li Fan was also involved with Huo Rong's work on the clepsydra in 102. -HHS 92/2:3026-27:3032; Needham 59:247, 320, Loewe 86E:686.

Li Fang 李芳; Pingyuan. Li Fang's friend Hu Tan was unable to have proper intercourse with his wife, so he allowed Li Fang to bed her in the hope she might bear a child. -FSTY 3f:108.

Li Fen 李奮 see sub Li Hu 李護.

Li Feng 李封. After heated debate at court, in 28 Emperor Guangwu resolved to appoint an Academician for Zuo zhuan in the Old Text tradition. Li Feng, who was at that time an Attendant Officer under the Director of Retainers, was a scholar in the field. Though he was only second on the short list, he was given the position because the front-runner, Chen Yuan, had been too deeply involved in the earlier debate.

Opposition to the Old Text continued, and when Li Feng died a short time later the chair for Zuo zhuan was allowed to lapse. -HHS 36/26:1233; Bn 79:193.

Li Feng 李封 (d.195); Shanyang. When Lü Bu seized Yan province from Cao Cao in 194, Li Feng and Xue Yan joined his staff. They captured Cao Cao's officer Li Qian of Jiyin and killed him when he refused to change sides. In 195 they were attacked by Cao Cao in Shanyang; Lü Bu was unable to relieve them and both men were killed. -SGZ 18:533, 1:12.

Li Feng 李豐 (d.197). A general under Yuan Shu, in 197 he was posted with Qiao Rui at Hu city in Chen against Cao Cao. Cao Cao stormed the city and slaughtered the defenders. -SGZ 1:15.

Li Fu 李阜. A partisan of the Dou group, in the early 90s Li Fu was Prefect of Luoyang. He was criticised by Yue Hui for his failure to maintain order in the city. -HHS 43/33:1478.

Li Fu 李阜; Wei. Li Fu was the father of Li Gao. In the late 160s his tomb was broken into and his head was taken by the family enemy Su Buwei, to serve as an offering at the grave of his own father Su Qian. -HHS 31/21:1108.

Li Fu 李孚 [Zixian 子憲]; Julu. Li Fu originally held the Feng 馮 surname. When Cao Cao attacked Ye city in 204, Li Fu was Registrar to Yuan Shang.

He volunteered to bring news to Shen Pei that relief was coming, tricked his way through the siege lines by posing as an officer of military police, then escaped by mingling with a horde of old and sick pushed out of the city.

After Yuan Shang fled to the north, Li Fu joined Yuan Tan in Bohai, and when Cao Cao destroyed Yuan Tan outside Nanpi, capital of the commandery, Li Fu arranged the peaceful surrender of the city.

Li Fu served Cao Cao as a county magistrate, and later became Director of Retainers and a commandery administrator. He died aged seventy-eight. -SGZ 15: 485-86.

Li Fu 李福 [Sunde 孫德]; Guanghan. Son of Li Quan, after Liu Bei had taken Yi province from Liu Zhang in 215, Li Fu joined his staff, became magistrate of Chengdu and later held senior office as a commandery Administrator, as an Area Commander, and as a member of the Imperial Secretariat of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 15:1087, HYZ 10C:176; Fang 52:453.

Li Fu 李伏; Hanzhong? Sometime an officer under Zhang Lu, the theocratic warlord of Hanzhong, Li Fu joined the service of Cao Cao and became General of the Household on the Left.

In 220 Li Fu presented a memorial to Cao Pi, King of Wei, recalling the prediction of a change of Mandate made by his former colleagues Li Shu and Jiang He in 213, citing further auspicious signs which had followed his accession to his father's power, and urging the new ruler that he should now take the imperial position. This document initiated the process which led to the abdication of Han in favour of Wei. -SGZ 1:62-63; Fang 52:453, Leban 78:326-327, Goodman 98:73-78.

Li Gang 李剛. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Li Gang took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county marquise in Nan commandery.

In 127, after Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang, he and Li Gang and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in the following year the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital.

Li Gang was later one of a group of eunuchs associated with the former wet-nurse Song E. Found guilty in 137 of corruption and making false accusations, they were all sent out to their fiefs and their pensions were reduced by a quarter. -HHS 78/68: 2516-18.

Li Gang 李剛 [Shuyi 叔毅] (d.172); Shanyang. A former Inspector of Jing province, Li Gang had an ornate tomb and temple, with a stele, established for him in his home country. -SJZ 8:23b.

Li Gao 李嵩; Dong/Xiapi. A retired Administrator of Runan, during the 160s the local magistrate Xu Xuan, elder brother of the eunuch Xu Huang, asked to marry his daughter. When Li Gao refused, Xu Xuan brought official troops to his house, took the young woman, and shot and killed her for sport. Xu Xuan was arrested and executed by the Administrator Huang Fu. -HHS 78/68:2521-22; deC 89:71-72.

Li Gao 李嵩 [Junqian 君遷]; Wei. A friend of the eunuch Ju Yuan, about 160 Li Gao became a magistrate in Youfufeng. He ruled with cruelty and greed, but because of his connections to the court no-one dared complain. The commandery Investigator Su Qian impeached Li Gao, confiscated his goods and had him sent to prison.

Some years later, in 166, Li Gao was Director of Retainers, and he took the excuse of an unauthorised visit to Luoyang by Su Qian to have him arrested. Su Qian died in prison, and Li Gao beat his corpse in revenge for the past humiliation.

Li Gao then became Minister of Finance. Su Qian's son Su Buwei had sworn vengeance for his father. Breaking into Li Gao's residence during the night, he killed Li Gao's concubine and his infant son, then went to Wei commandery where he dug up the head of his father Li Fu and presented it at the tomb of Su Qian.
