Li Gao tried to catch Su Buwei, but without success, and he died of an apoplexy. -HHS 31/21:1107-08, YSS:21a-b; deC 89:127-128.

Li Ge 李郃 see Li He 李邵.

Li Gen 李根; Kuaiji. Nominated by the Administrator Zhang Ba during the 90s, Li Gen achieved high office. When Administrator of Shu in his old age, however, he ran a very lax regime. -HYGZ 10A:133, HHS 77/67:2497.

Li Gong 李躬. Described as an elderly man of wisdom and knowledge, Li Gong was Thrice Venerable at the inaugural ceremony of Serving the Aged 養老, held by Emperor Ming at the Hall of the Circular Moat in the winter of 59. -HHS 2:102.

Li Gong 李龔; Chenliu. Officer of Merit about 80, he was sent to the capital to report on the illness of the Administrator Ma Yan. -DGHJ 12:5a.

Li Gu 李固 [Zijian 子堅] (94-147 but see at the end);

Hanzhong. Son of the Excellency Li He, Li Gu was a man of distinguished appearance, with a physiognomy indicating he was destined for great things. As a young man he was eager for learning and travelled widely to find good teachers. He became expert not only in the Confucian classics but also in the apocrypha and the arts of fortune-telling. As a travelling student he used an assumed name, and when he attended the Imperial University he would visit his distinguished father only in secret.

Well-known and influential among the leaders of his generation, Li Gu was several times offered nomination by his province and appointment to the offices at the capital, but repeatedly refused, claiming ill health. When his friend Huang Qiong was reluctant to accept an invitation in 127, however, Li Gu wrote to encourage him, observing that though several retired scholars had failed to live up to their reputations when they took up office, men such as he could justify the ideal of eremitism and also contribute to the well-being of the state. It appears that Li Gu soon afterwards took appointment in the offices of the Excellency Wang Gong; though he later gained high office he had great respect for the ideal of philosophical withdrawal.

In 133, following a series of earthquakes and other ominous portents, there was a call for nominees to give advice. Li Gu was recommended by the senior official Jia Jian and endorsed by the celebrated recluse Lang Yi. His memorial expressed concern at the growing power of the consort Liang family, remarking on the precedent of the usurping Yan group, who had sought to keep Emperor Shun from the throne, and he objected to the numbers of high-ranking eunuchs, to their influence in government, and to the appointment of their family members to office. He also protested at the proposed enfeoffment of the emperor's former wet-nurse Song E.

Emperor Shun regarded Li Gu's presentation as the best he received: he sent Song E away from the palace, and the leading eunuchs kowtowed to confess their faults. In general, however, little was changed, and when it was proposed to confirm Li Gu's appointment as a Consultant the palace group made accusations against him. Through representations to the General-in-Chief Liang Shang and with the support of Huang Qiong Li Gu did obtain the post, but a few months later he was transferred to Yi province as a county magistrate. Evidently dissatisfied, Li Gu resigned, returned home and stayed aloof.

In 135 Li Gu accepted an invitation from Liang Shang to become his senior assistant, and began an active political life. Urging Liang Shang to use his power to purge corruption, he also expressed concern at the lack of an imperial son. To solve this last problem, he suggested that there should be a search throughout the harem to find potentially fertile women, even those of humble birth, who might share the ruler's bed and give him a son. Such a proposal, of course, threatened the influence of the Liang family, and though the concubine Lady Yu later bore the imperial heir Liu Zuan, Liang Shang was hesitant to accept Li Gu's ideas.

In 137 there was wide-spread rebellion in Rinan followed by a mutiny of local troops, and the Imperial Clerk Jia Chang was besieged for several months. A major relief force was proposed, but Li Gu argued that the difficulties and dangers of such a long-distance enterprise were prohibitive. He recommended that officers and troops should be temporarily withdrawn from Rinan, while competent officials were sent to turn the various enemy groups against one another. This was agreed, the experienced Zhu Liang and Zhang Qiao were sent to the region, and they restored order.

In the late 130s the eunuchs attacked the Grand Commandant Wang Gong after he had expressed concern at the growth of their influence. As one of Wang Gong's former officers, Li Gu presented an eloquent letter to Liang Shang, urging him to speak to Emperor Shun. The matter was resolved.

About 140 Li Gu was appointed Inspector of Jing province, which had been troubled for several years. When Li Gu arrived, he investigated official misconduct and offered pardons to the bandits. The leader Xia Mi and six hundred of his fellows surrendered and Li Gu had them travel through the province encouraging others to trust in his good will. Within six months the troubles were ended.

Li Gu reported several Administrators, including Gao Ci of Nanyang, for maladministration and corruption. Gao Ci and his fellows sent bribes to the new General-in-Chief Liang Ji, who arranged Li Gu's transfer as Administrator of Taishan. That commandery too was infested with bandit groups and the official troops could make no headway.

Li Gu dismissed many of the soldiers to their homes, keeping just a hundred good fighting men. Backed by this tougher force, he made a show of trust and good-will, and again within a few months the bandits had dispersed.

In 142 the special commissioner Du Qiao reported favourably on Li Gu's regime, and in the following year he was brought back to Luoyang as Court Architect. He promptly sent in a memorial expressing concern that noted scholars such as Huang Qiong and Yang Hou, who had given lustre to the court at the beginning of the reign, had since left office. Expressing his regrets at such losses, Li Gu urged they be asked to return, while he also arranged invitations for other retired scholars such as Yin Cun and He Lin, and spoke warmly of the abilities of his fellow-reformers Zhou Ju and Du Qiao. Li Gu had evidently gained the ear of the emperor, for Zhou Ju was made Minister Herald, and he himself became Minister of Finance.

Li Gu now presented two further memorials. He and his colleague Wu Xiong asked that the reports of Du Qiao, Zhou Ju and the other commissioners, which had earlier been put aside, should be reviewed. Turning to matters of recruitment, moreover, central to the reformists' agenda, they noted that appointments to the offices of the Excellencies and from the ranks of gentleman cadets into the Secretariat were not being properly examined but made through special favour. Emperor Shun was impressed, several provincial officials who had been criticised by the commissioners were dismissed, and the Excellencies were ordered to tighten their selection procedures.

Soon afterwards Li Gu and the Minister of the Household Liu Xuan presented a joint memorial, claiming that recent appointees to provincial and commandery office were unsuitable and ill-chosen, that they wasted their time on meaningless tours, and that they were harming the people by their poor government. Liu Xuan had himself been criticised by the commissioners when he was Administrator of Shu, but Li Gu was evidently willing to associate with him, and the emperor approved. Senior officers were to impeach any juniors who were cruel, and those who were corrupt would have their property confiscated.

This was to prove the last success of the reformers for some time, for in the autumn of 144 Emperor Shun died, and his infant son Liu Ping was subject to a regency government dominated by Liang Ji. With the support of the Empress Liang, now regent Dowager, Li Gu became Grand Commandant and shared control of the Imperial Secretariat, but when Liu Ping died in the following year he was unable to arrange for his own candidate, Liu Suan the King of Qinghe, a young man of character, to receive the succession. In order that they might retain the regency, the Liang preferred the seven-year-old Liu Zuan.

During his period of influence under Emperor Shun, Li Gu had arranged the dismissal of more than a hundred officials. Looking for support from Liang Ji, many of these enemies now presented accusations against Li Gu. Liang Ji forwarded them to his sister the Dowager, but she took no action.

In 146 the young Emperor Zhi became fatally ill. He called Li Gu to attend him, but died before anything could be done. Li Gu insisted that the imperial physicians be impeached and the death investigated, but nothing more came of the matter and Liang Ji and his relatives maintained their power. Li Gu once more argued for Liu Suan to be granted the succession, and he was initially supported by the other two Excellencies Hu Guang and Zhao Jie. When Liang Ji pressed his point in open court, however, all except Li Gu and the minister Du Qiao acceded to his choice. Liang Ji dissolved the assembly, and when Li Gu continued to argue he persuaded his sister the Dowager to act on the previous accusations and dismiss Li Gu. The fourteen-year-old Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, was duly brought to the throne.

Some months later there was a plot to install Liu Suan upon the throne, and Liang Ji took the occasion to implicate Li Gu and send him to prison. A petition and a demonstration from his supporters persuaded the Dowager to order his release, and there was general rejoicing in the capital, but about this time the eunuchs Tang Heng and Zuo Guan told the young emperor how Li Gu and Du Qiao had opposed his accession. When Liang Ji returned to the charge a second time Li Gu was executed and Du Qiao shared his fate. Two of his sons, Li Ji and Li Zi were also killed, and Li Xie was the only male of the family to escape.

Li Gu had left instructions for a simple burial, but Liang Ji ordered anyone who attended his corpse to be killed. His former student Guo Liang defied the prohibition and escaped punishment, while Li Gu was mourned by seventy-two disciples [an auspicious number, likewise attributed to followers of Confucius]. A stele was set up in his home country.

Li Gu left eleven pian of writings, including official documents and inscriptions, while his student Zhao Cheng and other disciples collected records of his sayings to compile De xing 德行 "Virtuous Conduct." -HHS 63/53:2073-89*, 86/76:2837-39, XC 3:13a-14a, XHS 4:13b-15a, HYGZ 10C:165-66, SJZ 27:7b, Beitu 1:100; Vervoorn 90:161-164.

HHS 63/53 says Li Gu was fifty-four when he died, but SJZ 33:5a quotes a letter to his brother Li Yu in which he describes himself as fifty-seven. It is not possible to decide which is correct, but the HHS figure is generally accepted.

Li Gu 李固 or Li Guo 國. A General of the Household in 195, Li Gu was sent by Emperor Xian to appoint Li Jue as Grand Marshal. -SGZ 6:185.

Li Guang 李廣 (d.41). A disciple of the religious leader Wei Si, who had been secretly executed about 40, Li Guang claimed that Wei Si had not died but had undergone spiritual transformation. In 41 he raised a rebellion in Lujiang, occupied Huan city, killed the marquis Liu Min, and styled himself Great Leader of the Southern Peaks 南岳大師. The Internuncio Zhang Zong was despatched against the rebels, but was defeated. Then the general Ma Yuan was sent. Calling up more than ten thousand troops, he stormed Huan city and killed Li Guang. -HHS 1B:68, 24/14:838.

Li Guang 李廣; Donglai. Son of Li Chun, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 21/11:757.

Li Guang 李光 [Boming 伯明]; Runan. Li Guang was Inspector of Yan province. When his mother died he went to mourn her. -XC 7:13b [this short text appears corrupt].

Li Guang 李光; Jianwei. Towards the end of Later Han Li Guang was Administrator of Shushi 朱提 commandery, established from the Dependent State of Jianwei. -HYGZ 11:190.

Li Gui 李貴. A bandit of the northwest, in 109 Li Gui was attacked by Qiang and other non-Chinese auxiliaries in the service of Han and was forced to surrender. -HHS 101/11:3239; MBeck 90:128.

Li Guo 李國 i.e. Li Gu 李固 (*fl.*195). -HHS 72/62:2338.

Li He 李郃 [Mengjie 孟節]; Hanzhong. Son of Li Jie, Li He followed his father's tradition of scholarship. He studied the Confucian classics at the Imperial University while earning his keep as a public scribe. He became an expert at divination by the trigrams, the wind and the stars, but because of his ordinary appearance his abilities were not generally recognised.

Returning to his home country, Li He became private astrologer to his county magistrate, and in 89 he foretold the arrival of two imperial commissioners who had been sent out in plain clothes to gather popular songs as a means to assess the customs and feelings of the people. They came incognito to his residence, and were amazed when he told how he knew of the mission from his reading of the stars.

Three years later, in 92, one of the commissioners, Chang Feng, became Administrator of Hanzhong and appointed Li He to his local staff. At this time the General-in-Chief Dou Xian was taking a wife, and all the territories of the empire sent in congratulatory gifts. Li He objected, on the grounds that Dou Xian and his sister the Dowager were unworthy and overpowerful; a loyal official should avoid them. Chang Feng insisted that the present must be sent, but he agreed to give Li He charge of its delivery, and Li He proceeded very slowly to see if there would be changes. Before he reached Luoyang, Dou Xian had been destroyed. Emperor He, determined to eliminate his party, dismissed all officials who had had any dealings with the fallen leader; because of Li He's delay Chang Feng was one of the few to escape disgrace.

Recommended Filial and Incorrupt, and sponsored by Deng Zhi, brother of the regent Dowager for Emperor An, Li He became an Internuncio and later joined the Secretariat, where he rose to become Director. He was then Minister of Ceremonies, and in 117 he became Excellency of Works. He sought to enhance the prestige of the University and he was respected for his good advice and loyal conduct. In 119 he successfully urged that worship of the Sixth Venerable One 六宗 should be restored to the official program of rituals, as in Former Han. [On the controversies concerning the Sixth Venerable One (or the Six Venerable Ones, sometimes identified as Heaven, Earth and the Four Directions), see Bn 76:77, Bn 79:163 and 79:232 note 5, MBeck 90:97-98.]

In 118 Li He and his colleague Ma Ying joined members of the Deng family in seeking to shield the successful general Ren Shang against charges of corruption. As the Excellency Liu Kai pressed the case, however, Ren Shang was executed and Li He and Ma Ying were reprimanded.

It appears that Li He later fell out with the Deng group, possibly because he opposed the appointment of the Dowager's cousin Deng Bao as Intendant of Henan. In 120 he was dismissed for soliciting bribes, but in the following year, soon after the death of the Dowager, he presented a memorial citing a recent eclipse and an earthquake and suggesting there had been a plot to depose the emperor. When Emperor An investigated, the harem woman Zhao Ren confirmed the allegations and the emperor's favourites Li Run and Wang Sheng pressed the accusation; the Deng family was purged and destroyed.

After the death of Emperor An in 125, Li He was appointed Excellency over the Masses by the new regency government of the Empress Yan and her kinsmen, but when the young emperor became ill he joined the minister Tao Fan and the colonel Zhao Zhi in a plot to restore Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun, to the succession. Before they could act the eunuch Sun Cheng and his associates carried out their own coup.

Early in the following year, at the instigation of his officer Zhou Ju, Li He persuaded the new ruler to show some leniency and courtesy to the Dowager Yan, an action which eased any embarrassment that might have arisen from the Lady's death soon afterwards.

A short time later, Li He left office on account of illness among the people. The Court Architect Zhai Fu/Pu then told the emperor how Li He had planned to restore him to power: Emperor Shun offered him a fief, but he refused.

Li He died at home aged over eighty. He was the father of the distinguished statesman Li Gu. - HHS 82/72A:2717-18*, 5:226 & 231 & 242, 6:252, 108/18:3364-65, HYGZ 10C:164-65; Ngo 76:95-98, DeWoskin 86:58-60.

Li Hei 李黑. In 192, under orders from Lü Bu at Chang'an, Li Hei and a dozen others dressed as guards to ambush and kill Dong Zhuo. - HHS 72/62:2332.

Li Hei 李黑; non-Chinese. In the early third century Li Hei was one of the leaders of the Zong people influenced by the teachings of Zhang Lu: see sub Li Hu. In 215 he and other chieftains submitted to Cao Cao, and when Liu Bei took over the territory in 219 they migrated to the valley of the Wei. - HYGZ 9:119. [See also Li Hu.]

Li Hong 李鴻; Yingchuan. Administrator of Runan about 80, Li Hong invited the scholar Li Xun to become his Officer of Merit. Li Hong died before Li Xun had taken up the post, but Li Xun escorted his body home, arranged his interment and mourned him for three years. -HHS 51/41:1683.

416 Li Hong

Li Hong 李鴻 [Fengxun 奉遜]. Elder brother of Li Yu 育 v. q., Li Hong was a clerical officer under the Grand Commandant. When Li Yu was arrested and due to be executed, Li Hong resigned his position, returned to his home country, and killed himself to expiate his brother's wrong-doing. -XC 6:12b-13a.

Li Hong 李泓. In 123 Li Hong was a member of the Suite of the Heir, attached to the Bureau of Astronomy. He took part in the general debate on change to the calendar, and joined the Intendant of Henan Cao Zhi as spokesmen for a large minority, arguing that the current Sifen system was acceptable and accorded with the apocrypha. The majority, led by the Grand Commandant Liu Kai, supported a reversion to the Taichu 太初 [Grand Beginning] system of Former Han, with adjustments for the apocrypha, but the Director of the Secretariat Chen Zhong opposed any change, and the existing calendar was maintained. -HHS 92/2:3034.

Li Hu 李護 [Hongmo 鴻默]; Yingchuan. XTS 72A:2473 says that Li Hu, sometime Administrator of Jiuquan, was the father of Li Wu and the grandfather of Li Xiu, who was Grand Commandant early in the second century. It also says, however, that Li Hu and his brother Yuan 元 were sons of Li Chi 哆, who was active about 100 BC [QHx:218]. Some generations have evidently been omitted, and the genealogy is clearly in error. I nonetheless list below the immediate claimed descendants of Li Hu:

besides Li Wu, Li Hu had two other sons, Zhao 昭 and Fen 奮;

Li Wu had four sons, of whom Xiu was the second; the others were Zan 讚, Yi 弈 and Jiu 就.

Li Zhao, brother of Li Wu, may be the Li Zhao who was honoured by a stele: see sub voce. None of the others are mentioned elsewhere.

Li Hu 李虎; non-Chinese. A leader of the Zong people of Ba commandery in the early third century, he and his fellows were attracted by the religious and superstitious teachings of Zhang Lu in Hanzhong. Moving north to the hill country at the border of his territory, they settled on the Yangche Slope, where they plundered local people and travellers and were known as the Ba people of Yangche.

When Cao Cao took over Hanzhong in 215 Li Hu brought five hundred families to submit to him, and he was named as a general. As Liu Bei took the territory in 219, Li Hu went with other tribal groups north to the valley of the Wei; they became known as the Di people from Ba. -HYGZ 9:119, JS 120:3022. [See also Li Hei.]

Li Huai 李恢 see Li Hui 李恢. -Fang 52.

Li Huang 李黃 or Li Ji 箕; Nanyang. Son of Li Ding, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 15/5:576.

Li Hui 李翬; Guanghan. When Li Ye killed himself rather than take office under Gongsun Shu, the claimant emperor sent envoys to the funeral and offered a gift of cloth, but Li Ye's son Li Hui refused. Later, under the regime of Emperor Guangwu Li Hui was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a county magistrate. -HHS 81/71:2670, HYGZ 10C:174.

Li Hui 李恢 [Shuxing 叔興]; Yingchuan. XTS 72A:2473 says that Li Hui was a son of Li Jin and a grandson of Li Ying.

Li Hui 李會 see Li Xi 李翕.

Li Hui 李恢 [De'ang 德昂] (d.231); Yizhou. An Investigator in the commandery about 212, Li Hui reported against his aunt's husband Cuan Xi, and urged he be dismissed from his position as a magistrate. Because of Cuan Xi's local influence the Administrator Dong He took no action, but he recommended Li Hui to the provincial government of Liu Zhang.

Just at this time Liu Bei was moving against Liu Zhang, and Li Hui went over to him. Liu Bei sent him to invite Ma Chao, and when he had taken power he appointed Li Hui to his staff. He was accused of planning rebellion, but Liu Bei had complete confidence and promoted him.

In 221 Li Hui succeeded Deng Fang as Area Commander of Laixiang, controlling the southern part of Yi province, with the Staff of Authority and nominal control of Jiao province. He withstood local insurgencies, then joined Zhuge Liang in his southern expedition of 225. Enfeoffed and promoted general, he continued to deal with local troubles. Following the agreement with Wu in 229, the claim to Jiao province was dropped, and Li Hui was later transferred to Hanzhong to avoid holding office in his home country. -SGZ Shu 13:1045-46*; Fang 52:195 [as Li Huai].

Li Ji 李季 (d.22); Nanyang. As Li Tong and Liu Bosheng were planning their rebellion against Wang Mang, Li Tong's father Li Shou held official appointment at Chang'an, Wang Mang's capital. Li Tong sent his cousin Li Ji to warn Li Shou, but Li Ji was taken ill and died on the road, so Li Shou did not receive any warning until some time later. -HHS 15/5:574; Bn 54:102.

Li Ji 李箕 see Li Huang 李黃. -DGHJ 24:4a.

Li Ji 李季 (d.59 or 66); Donglai. Son of Li Zhong and younger brother of Li Wei, he was killed by his sister-in-law the Lady Li Li, wife or widow of Li Wei. The Lady's son Li Chun was held responsible for her conduct and his marquise was abolished. -DGHJ 10:4a, HHS 21/11:756-57. DGHJ 10:4a, says that the murder took place in 永平二, while HHS 21/11 says Li Chun lost his fief in 永平九; the crime could have taken place in 59 and the dismissal in 66, but more probably the year number has been corrupted by one of the texts.

Li Ji 李幾 [Mengyuan 孟元]; Shu. About 70 Li Ji was Registrar to the Administrator Diwu Lun. When flooding occurred, there was question whether it should be reported to the throne. Against Li Ji's protests, Diwu Lun followed the advice of the provincial Inspector that it was not necessary to do so, for the price of grain had remained stable.

The grain transport was later affected by flooding, and a new Inspector was going to report Diwu Lun for having failed in his duty. Li Ji now argued that reporting natural disasters was outside the authority of his office, so Diwu Lun escaped censure.

When Diwu Lun was promoted Excellency of Works in 75, he brought Li Ji to the capital as a member of his staff. -HYGZ 10A:136.

Li Ji 李季; Yingchuan. XTS 72A:2473 says that Li Ji was a son of Li Xiu.

Li Ji 李基 [Xiangong 憲公] (d.147); Hanzhong. Son of Li Gu, Li Ji became a county magistrate in Henan. Realising that he would be destroyed by Liang Ji, in 147 Li Gu ordered his sons back to the family's home country, but Li Ji and Li Zi were arrested and executed by local authorities in Yi province; Li Xie was the only male of the family to escape. -HHS 63/53:2088-89.

Li Ji 李奇 see Li Qi 李奇.

Li Ji 李基; Jiangxia. Son of Li Tong, though a younger brother of Li Xu, he succeeded to their father's enhanced fief in 209/210. In 220 he was appointed a General of the Household by Cao Pi. -SGZ 18:536.

Li Jian 李建. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Li Jian took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county marquise in Nanyang.

In 127, after Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang, he and Li Jian and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in the following year the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital.

Li Jian was later one of a group of eunuchs associated with the former wet-nurse Song E. Found guilty in 137 of corruption and making false accusations, they were all sent out to their fiefs and their pensions were reduced by a quarter. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Li Jian 李堅 (d.147); Chenliu. A local bandit chieftain, Li Jian took the imperial title in 147, but he was captured and killed. -HHS 7:291-92.

Li Jie 李頡; Yingchuan. Grandson of Li Wu, he gained a reputation for scholarship and became an Academician at the University. He later moved to Hanzhong, which became the registered homeland of his son Li He. -HHS 82/72A:2717.

Li Jin 李進. In 136 the Administrator of Wuling recommended that since the non-Chinese people of the hills had been quiet for many years, it was possible to raise their taxes. Emperor Shun approved, but a major insurrection broke out in protest.

Li Jin was sent to take over. Having defeated the rebels, he set good officials over them to regain their trust. He remained peacefully in office for nine years, and in 145 the new regent Dowager Liang awarded him an increased salary and a grant of 200,000 cash. -HHS 86/76:2833.

Li Jin 李瑾; Wudu. A local officer of the commandery, about 170 Li Jin was involved in the road construction projects of the Administrator Li Yu. -LS 4:9b.

Li Jin 李瑾 or Li Kui 珪? [Shuyu 瑜叔]; Yingchuan. A son of Li Ying, Li Jin became Chancellor of Dongping, and later went to Zhao to avoid the coming civil war.

As he was dying, some time about 190, Li Jin urged Li Xuan and other sons to support Cao Cao, even though Zhang Miao was a close friend and there were family connections to Yuan Shu. The family took his advice and so survived the troubles. -XTS 72A:2473. [HHS 67/57:2197, however, ascribes the chancellorship, the sons and the recommendation of Cao Cao to Li Zan, another son of Li Ying.]

Li Jin 李進; Ji Yin. A local leader, in 194 he defeated Lü Bu and drove him away. -SGZ 1:12. The surname also appears as Ji 季, but this man was probably a kinsman of Li Qian.

Li Jing 李敬; Runan. When Li Jing was Chancellor of Zhao, one of his servants found pearl bracelets and ear-rings down a mouse-hole in the official residence. Li Jing asked his Registrar about it, and was told that the later wife of the previous Chancellor, the daughter of a marquis, had lost her jewellery. Suspecting that it had been stolen by her nominal daughter-in-law, the wife of the Chancellor's son, she had had the young woman sent away and killed her maid-servant.

Li Jing had the jewellery sent to his predecessor, who promptly repudiated his wife. -XC 6:15a.

Li Jiu 李就 see sub Li Hu 李護.

Li Jiu 李久; Liaodong. A local leader, in 111 Li Jiu and his followers slaughtered the last remnants of the pirate band formerly commanded by Zhang Bolu. -HHS 38/28:1277.

Li Jing 黎景; Ba. Towards the end of Later Han, Li Jing was named Administrator of Rinan. -HYGZ 10B:147, 12:221.

Li Jue 李隗 (d.198); Beidi. An officer in the service of Dong Zhuo, in 190 Li Jue was sent on an unsuccessful embassy to make terms with Sun Jian, general of Yuan Shu.

In 192, under orders from Niu Fu and in the company of Guo Si, Li Jue attacked Zhu Jun, then raided Yingchuan and Chenliu. About this time Dong Zhuo was assassinated in Chang'an, and when Li Jue and his colleagues returned Niu Fu had also been killed.

Though Li Jue and his fellows offered submission, Wang Yun refused an amnesty. Increasingly fearful, they took the advice of Jia Xu and attacked Chang'an. Storming the city, they drove Lü Bu to flight, killed officials and civilians, and executed Wang Yun.

Now in formal command of the imperial regime, the victors gave themselves appointments and fiefs: Li Jue became General of Chariots and Cavalry, the most senior post, while Guo Si and Fan Chou shared in government. They attempted a rapprochement with the east of the empire, but their rule was brutal and incompetent and the leaders feuded amongst themselves. The capital was in disorder and there was constant shortage of food.

Li Jue was remarkably superstitious, believing in every form of divination and sorcery. He set up a throne for the spirit of Dong Zhuo at the entrance to the court, and held frequent sacrifices there. When the emperor gave him title as Grand Marshal, ranking above the Excellencies, he was convinced that this came from his supernatural assistants and he redoubled his attentions.

In 194 there was a short war with Ma Teng and Han Sui from the west, while an internal conspiracy was put down. As rivalry came to a head early in 195, Li Jue killed Fan Chou and took over his troops; Guo Si then turned openly against him. As his men plundered and burnt the palace, Li Jue seized the emperor while Guo Si kidnapped the senior ministers.

After months of fighting, at the end of summer Li Jue and Guo Si were persuaded into a truce, but a few weeks later, taking advantage of disagreement between his jailors and trouble among Li Jue's men, Emperor Xian bluffed his way out of Chang'an and began a journey to the east, supported by a loose consortium of leaders. Early in winter he came to Huayin, by the junction of the Wei with the Yellow River.

Realising that their prize was escaping, Li Jue and Guo Si reunited to try to bring him back. They first intervened on the side of Duan Wei, warlord of Huayin, against the escort group, but Duan Wei supported for the emperor's plan to escape, and at the end of the year the cortège moved into Hongnong. In a series of engagements the emperor's party was alternately victorious and defeated, but the running battle ended at the Shan Crossing by the Sanmen Gorges on the Yellow River. The emperor, his family and a few dozen others escaped across the river into Hedong, leaving the remainder of his followers to the slender mercies of the escort soldiers and Li Jue's own troops.

A short time later, a form of peace was agreed, and Li Jue returned some prisoners and a part of his plunder. In 196 the emperor reached Luoyang and was then taken by Cao Cao into Yingchuan. Li Jue, deprived of his imperial hostage, returned to the desolation of Chang'an.

In the summer of 198 the imperial agent Pei Mao, under orders from Cao Cao, had Duan Wei and other local leaders attack and kill Li Jue and his family. His head was sent to Xu city. -HHS 72/62:2332-42*, SGZ 6:180-87*.

Li Jun 酈峻 [Wenshan 文山]; Chenliu. Possibly a brother of Li Yan, Li Jun became a clerk in the offices of the Excellencies at Luoyang. -HHSJJ 80/70B:2902 Hui Dong quoting Chenliu fengsu zhuan 陳留風俗傳 [see Juan Cheng].

Li Jun 李俊; Wudu. Local leaders, in 213 Li Jun and Wang Ling joined Jiang Xu and Zhao Ang of Hanyang to attack Ma Chao and drive him from that commandery. Li Jun was later enfeoffed and became a general.

After Cao Pi took the imperial title in 220, Li Jun was one of the sponsors of a commemorative stele. -SGZ 25:701, LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Li Kan 李堪 (d.211); Hedong. A bandit leader in the 190s, in 211 Li Kan was one of the north-western allies opposed to Cao Cao. He was killed at the battle of Huayin. -SGZ 8:266, SGZ Shu 6:946.

Li Kuang 李匡. In 25, as Bao Yong held out in Taiyuan for the lost cause of the Gengshi regime, he sent his younger brother Bao Sheng and his son-in-law Zhang Shu to capture Huangcheng in Shangdang, which was held by Guangwu's Administrator Tian Yi. Li Kuang, commandant of the county, made a rising inside the city and opened the gates to the invaders. -HHS 28/18A:976.

Li Kui 李逵; Runan. A fellow-townsmen of Xu Shao, Li Kui initially admired his honesty and fine spirit, but later found fault and quarrelled with him. -HHS 68/58:2235.

Li Kui 李隗 see Li Wei 李隗.

Li Kui 李恢 see Li Hui 李恢.

Li Kui 李珪 probably miswritten for Li Zan 李贇 or his younger brother Li Jin 李瑾. -HHS 67/57:2197 commentary citing Xie Cheng, also JJ at 2407.

Li Le 李樂; Xihe? A former leader of the Bobo bandits in Xihe commandery, in the winter of 195 Li Le came from Hedong south into Hongnong to assist the group escorting Emperor Xian east in his escape from Li Jue and Guo Si in Chang'an. Successful in one engagement, the allies were badly defeated in a second, but Li Le then brought boats so that the emperor and a small party could cross the Yellow River into Hedong.

Li Le's original plan had been to travel by boat downstream past the Sanmen Gorges, but Yang Biao and Liu Ai pointed out that the passage was extremely dangerous and there were now no competent boatmen: cf. Needham 71:277, where Li Le's personal name is transcribed as Yo>Yue.

Having held the emperor for a time, after some argument Li Le accepted an edict and allowed him to go on to Luoyang. He was granted title as a general and Governor of Liang province, but remained in Hedong and died there of illness. -HHS 72/62:2340-42, SGZ 6:185-87.

Li Li 李立; Zhuo. In 24 Li Li was Junior Tutor in the claimant imperial government of Wang Lang. As Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, attacked Wang Lang's capital, Handan, Li Li opened the gates so that his troops could storm the city. -HHS 12/2:494.

Li Li 李禮, the Lady. Wife/widow of Li Wei, in 59 or 66 the Lady murdered her brother-in-law Li Ji. Her son Li Chun was held responsible for her conduct and his marquise was abolished. -DGHJ 10:4a, HHS 21/11:756-57. [On the dating, see sub Li Ji.]

Li Li 李歷 [Jizi 季子]; Hanzhong. A nephew of Li He, Li Li was a cousin of Li Gu, but much younger. Honourable and virtuous, he was a friend of Zheng Xuan, Chen Ji and other noted scholars. As a magistrate in Henan, he governed by the principles of limited action 無為, and during a year of drought his was the only county to receive good rain.

Li Li became a Commandant of the Equipage, and although he did not come from Ji province he may have been a member of the staff of the Governor Han Fu in 191; see immediately below. -HHS 82/72A:2719*, HYGZ 10C:168.

Li Li 李歷/曆. Headquarters Officer to Han Fu the Governor of Ji province in 191, he urged him not to yield his position to Yuan Shao. -SGZ 6:191. [This may be the same man as Li Li the nephew of Li He, above.]

Li Li 李利; Beidi. Nephew of Li Jue, in 194 Li Li accompanied Fan Chou on campaign against Ma Teng and Han Sui, but Fan Chou abused him for not fighting hard. Li Li then reported to Li Jue that Fan Chou had held a private conversation with Han Sui in view of their armies; Li Jue killed Fan Chou. -HHS 72/62:2335, SGZ 6:183.

Li Li 李立 [Jianxian 建賢]; Zhuo. After the surrender of Liu Zong in 208, Cao Cao appointed Li Li as Inspector of Jing province. -SGZ 6:215.

Li Liang 李諒 [Shiyi 世益]; Yingchuan. XTS 72A:2473 says that Li Liang was a son of the Grand Commandant Li Xiu. He became Chancellor of Zhao and was the father of the reformist Li Ying. HHS 67/57:2191 has the personal name as Yi 益, but it seems possible that the two characters 諒 and 世 have fallen out of the text, and that XTS is correct.

Li Liang 李亮 [Weiming 威明]; Liaodong. XTS 72A:2593 says that Li Liang, son of Li Xiong, became a county magistrate in Henan.

Li Ling 李陵. A member of the staff of Zhu Fu the Inspector of Yi province about 74, Li Ling was sent to escort the clerical officer Tian Gong to Luoyang, where they presented the court of Emperor Ming with the text and translation of three songs in praise of Han sent in by the tribal chieftain Tangzou of the Zuodu people from the west of Shu. The emperor, delighted to receive such recognition from afar, had the texts and their Chinese rendering sent to the history office. -HHS 86/76:2855, DGHJ 17:5a.

Li Long 李隆 see Zhang Long 張隆.

Li Lu 李陸 (d.25); Wei. A man of local family, in 25 Li Lu planned to make common cause with the Tanxiang bandits and seize Ye city, capital of the commandery. His elder brother Li Xiong was an officer of the Administrator Yao Qi, and after several warnings Yao Qi questioned Li Xiong. Li Xiong asked that he and his aged mother be put to death to atone for the renegade, but Yao Qi ordered only that they be sent out of Ye. Li Lu came back with Li Xiong to the gate of the city and, bitterly ashamed, killed himself to show remorse. Admiring the brothers' conduct, Yao Qi buried Li Lu with full funerary rites, and restored Li Xiong to his former position. -HHS 20/10:733.

Li Mao 李茂. When the Shanyu Punu of the Xiongnu sent messengers to Han in 46, asking for a term of peace, the General of the Household Li Mao was sent as an envoy in return. At this time the Shanyu's senior cousin Bi believed he had a stronger claim to the throne, but he was uneasy about his current position. As the embassy passed his territory, Bi sent Guo Heng, a Chinese in his service, to present Li Mao with maps of Xiongnu lands in token of his willingness to submit to Han. -HHS 89/79:2942.

Li Mao 李卯 see Meng Fu 孟孚.

Li Meng 李蒙. A former follower of Dong Zhuo, in 192 Li Meng joined Li Jue and others in the capture of Chang'an. He was later killed by Li Jue. -SGZ 6:181.

Li [Mengchu] 李孟初; Nan. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, after a probationary period as gentleman cadet Li Mengchu became a county magistrate in Nanyang and then Inspector of Yi province. He died in that office.

In 154 a group of local gentlemen set up a stele at his shrine. -Nagata 94:116.

Li Miao 李邈 [Hannan 漢南] (d.234); Guanghan. Li Miao was a magistrate in Jianwei under Liu Zhang. He joined Liu Bei after he had taken Yi province in 214, but when he criticised Liu Bei's conduct he would have been executed if Zhuge Liang had not intervened on his behalf.

Li Miao later became Administrator of Jianwei, served as an adviser to Zhuge Liang and then became a general. He later fell out with Zhuge Liang, and after his death in 234, he wrote to say that he had held too much power in the state and that his death was a relief. The Sovereign Liu Shan was angry and had Li Miao executed. -SGZ Shu 15:1086, HYGZ 10B:152.

Li Min 李旻 (d.190). Administrator of Yingchuan in 190, Li Min was with Sun Jian when he was defeated by Xu Rong, general of Dong Zhuo. Li Min was captured and boiled alive. -HHS 72/62:2328 and see sub Zhang An.

Li Min 李敏; Liaodong. Son of Li Liang and a man of local family, Li Min was sometime Administrator of Henei. In the early 190, as the local warlord Gongsun Du sought to have him join his service, Li Min fled to the sea with his household. Gongsun Du then desecrated his father's tomb and killed the kinsmen he had left behind.

Li Min's son Xin sought him for twenty years, travelling beyond the frontier, but Li Min was not found. -SGZ 8:252-53, JS 44:1253, XTS 72A:2593.

Li Mou 李茂 see Li Mao 李茂.

Li Mu 李睦. In 76 Li Mu was a local officer in Longxi. As the Bi'nan and other tribes of the Qiang attacked the frontier the Administrator Sun Chun sent Li Mu to join forces with the troops of Jincheng commandery. They defeated the raiders. -HHS 87/77:2881.

Li [Mujiang] 李穆姜, the Lady; Hanzhong. A sister of Li Fa, the Lady Li became the second wife of Cheng Zhi and bore him two sons [some editions of HHS have the name of the Lady's husband as Chen Wenzhi 陳文知].

When Cheng Zhi died, his eldest son Xing and three others by his previous marriage treated the Lady with hatred and contempt, but she nonetheless behaved to each according to his seniority, not favouring her own children. Eventually Cheng Xing and his brothers realised how wrongly they had behaved and went to the local prison to expiate their fault.

When the Administrator heard of this he paid special honours to the family and provided them with sacrificial meats twice a year. All the young men became local officers and received nominations from the commandery or the province, while the youngest, Cheng Ji, rose to be Administrator of Nanyang.

When the Lady Li died, aged over eighty, she asked her sons to arrange a simple funeral in accordance with the principles of her brother Li Fa. Her biography appears in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳. -HHS 84/74:2793-94*, HYGZ 10C:170.

Li Nan 李南 [Xiaoshan 孝山]; Danyang. A keen scholar when he was young, Li Nan became an expert on divination by the wind. About 95 the Administrator of his commandery, Ma Leng, was accused of involvement in robbery and banditry and his case was forwarded to the Minister of Justice at the imperial capital. Before any word had come, Li Na called upon Ma Leng and offered congratulations. Ma Leng asked what there was to be congratulated about, and Li Nan assured him that a messenger would come on the following day with news of his exoneration. The messenger did not arrive until late, but explained that he had been delayed when his horse went lame.

Li Nan was nominated as Knowing the Way, but claimed to be too ill to accept appointment. He died at home. -HHS 82/72A:2716-17*; Ngo 76:94, DeWoskin 86:57.

Li Niao 李嬈, the Lady. Formerly a member of the imperial harem, in 113 she was taken by Liu Jun, King of Chen, as a secondary wife 小妻. Liu Jun was punished for lese-majesty by loss of three counties from his fief. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Li Ning 李寧; Jibei. The Attendant Officer Li Deng persuaded his identical twin brother Ning to carry out his duties. They were found out, and Li Deng was killed. -FSTY 3f:106.

Li Pan 李攀. Administrator of Wei commandery for Yuan Shao about 193, he was killed fighting bandits. -SGZ 14:436.

Li Ping 李平 [Zhengliu 正流], the Lady; Guanghan. Daughter of Li Yuan, the Lady became the second wife of Yang Wen and bore him a son and a daughter. Some years later, Yang Wen was killed, and the Lady maintained herself and her children by weaving and making sandals.

The Lady's father wanted her to marry again, but she was quite unwilling and threw herself into a river. She almost drowned before some kinsmen rescued her; and there were no further plans for remarriage. The Administrator Wu Fang had a portrait of her painted for his yamen. -HYGZ 10B:153-54.

Li Ping 李平 see Li Yan 李巖.

Li Qi 李奇; Henei. In 178 Cai Yong was accused of having sought private favours from the official Liu

He and planning revenge when he was not successful. Cai Yong agreed that when Liu He was Director of Retainers he had recommended the local commandery officer Li Qi to him for his staff, but denied any wrongdoing. -HHS 60/50B:2001.

Li Qian 利乾 became Chancellor of Zhongshan. -FSTY 5f:123.

Li Qian 李乾 (d.194); Jiyin. During the early 190s Li Qian came to join Cao Cao with a group of kinsmen and retainers. He served against the Yellow Turbans in Qing province and against Yuan Shu, and he took part in the attack on Tao Qian in Xu province. When Lü Bu seized Yan province in 194, Cao Cao sent Li Qian back to his home country in Jiyin to gather support, but he was captured by Lü Bu's officers Xue Lan and Li Feng. They tried to persuade him to change sides, but killed him when he refused. -SGZ 18:533.

Li Qing 李磬 [Wensi 文寺]; Shu. Li Qing was Registrar to the county magistrate Zhang Biao when there was a raid by the non-Chinese. Zhang Biao fled, but the enemy caught up. Li Qing then offered them his life if they would let his master go free. The tribesmen accepted the proposal: Li Qing was killed and Zhang Biao got away.

The commandery office heard of this, and honoured Li Qing by putting his portrait on the walls of the yamen. -HYGZ 10A:137.

Li Quan 李權 [Boyu 伯豫]; Guanghan. A man of family, Li Quan became a magistrate in Shu commandery. About 190, seeing him as a potential opponent in his drive for local power, the Governor Liu Yan had him arrested on some charge and executed. -SGZ Shu 1:867.

Li Rao 李嬈 see Li Niao 李嬈.

Li Ren 李仁 [Dexian 德賢]; Guanghan. A colleague of Yin Mo, Li Ren travelled with him to Nanyang to study under Song Zhong and Sima Hui. Widely read in the classics and philosophers, he was also expert in archery, medicine, mechanics, mathematics and divination by numbers.

Li Ren held appointment in the provincial office under Liu Bei, and later served in his royal Secretariat. He died about 220. -SGZ Shu 12:1026-27, HYGZ 10B: 175-76; Miao 82:73.

Li Rong 李容 (d.114); Hanzhong. Well-respected locally, Li Rong joined the staff of the Administrator Zheng Qin. After Zheng Qin was killed by rebel Qiang in 110, Li Rong joined Cheng Xin and other officers in an oath of vengeance, and when the Qiang came again four years later they all fought against them. The army was successful, but the oath-bearers were killed. [On the date of the campaign see sub Cheng Xin.]

In 118 an imperial letter ordered a grant of grain to the families of the heroic band. -HYGZ 2:16, 10C:169.

Li Rong 李榮. Administrator of Hanzhong during the 30s, Li Rong had some disagreement with Huang Xing the Administrator of Guanghan. As both men were called to the capital, Huang Xing immediately presented himself at the imperial prison; he escaped punishment. Li Rong failed to do this and was executed. -HYGZ 10B:146.

Li Ru 李儒 [Wenyou 文優]; Youfufeng. A gentleman scholar, in 185 Li Ru held local office and contributed 500 cash to a stele in honour of the magistrate Cao Quan. -JSCB 18:3a-41; Ebrely 80:342-343. [Based upon dates, this could be the same man as in the entry below.]

Li Ru 李儒. In 190 Li Ru was Prefect of the Gentlemen of the Palace to the deposed emperor Liu Bian, King of Hongnong. At Dong Zhuo's orders he compelled the young man to take poison. -HHS 10B:450-51, YSS:2b: the two texts record slightly different versions of Li Ru's advice to Liu Bian as "Drink this, and your troubles will be over 服此辟惡." [Based upon dates, this could be the same man as in the entry above.]

Li Run 李閏. A eunuch, Li Run was Attendant at the Yellow Gates from about 115 and became a confidant of Emperor An, then under the regency of the Dowager Deng. When the Dowager died in 121 and Emperor An took full power, Li Run and the emperor's former wet-nurse Wang Sheng persuaded him that the Dowager's brother Deng Kui and other members of the family had planned to depose him in favour of Liu Yi the King of Pingyuan. The emperor accordingly destroyed the Deng clan and reduced his putative rival from a king to a marquis, while Li Run and his colleague Jiang Jing were enfeoffed and promoted to be Regular Attendants.

Li Run was an ally of the emperor's uncle Geng Bao who, together with the Empress Yan and her family, dominated the court and government, arranging the dismissal of the Excellency Yang Zhen and the deposition of the Heir Liu Bao. In 125 Li Run aided the Dowager Yan to bring the Little Emperor Liu Yi to the throne. Despite his earlier association with Geng Bao, when the Yan group destroyed him and his party Li Run was unaffected and remained in a position of power.

When the Little Emperor died at the end of 125, Sun Cheng and other eunuchs organised a coup to restore Liu Bao to his inheritance. In their first move they attacked Li Run, Jiang Jing and other eunuchs of the ruling clique. Killing his companions, they kept Li Run alive because of his influence, and forced him at knife-point to escort the new emperor and take control of the Imperial Secretariat. The coup was successful, but because of his association with the Yan clan and the fact that he had acted only under duress, Li Run received no reward.

Li Run kept his appointment as a Regular Attendant, but in the following year the Director of Retainers Yu Xu impeached a number of men who had been involved in the former regime. After some political debate they were all dismissed. -HHS 78/68:2514-16, 58/48:1870.

Li Shan 李善 [Cisun 次孫]; Nanyang. Li Shan was the household slave 蒼頭 of a certain Li Yuan. About 40 there was a great plague and all the family died except the new-born Li Xu. The other slaves wanted to kill the infant and steal the family property, and though Li Shan could do nothing against them he did rescue Li Xu and fled with him to Shanyang. There it is said, not only did Li Shan chew food to make it soft for the baby, but he also managed to produce milk from his breasts.

When Li Xu was ten, Li Shan brought him home to reclaim his inheritance, and the criminals were punished. The local magistrate Zhongli Yi reported the affair, and Emperor Guangwu had Li Xu and Li Shan appointed as members of the Suite of the Heir.

Li Shan became a clerk in the offices of the Excellencies under Emperor Ming. He served successfully, and after various appointments, including an assistant magistracy in Hedong, he became Administrator of Rinan. On the way to that post he paid respects at the grave of his former master Li Yuan.

In the far south, Li Shan managed well with the non-Chinese. He was then named Administrator of Jiujiang, but took ill and died on his way that post. -HHS 81/71:2679-80*, XC 5:14b-15a; Ch'ü 72:366-368.

Li Shao 李邵; Henei. Formerly an Inspector of Ji province, in 190 Li Shao was living at Yewang county when troops gathered in the east of the empire against the usurping rule of Dong Zhuo. Believing that Yewang was too close to the mountain passes where fighting could take place, he planned to shift his household south towards the Yellow River. Sima Lang argued that this was not far enough to make a difference, while such a flight would make the people uneasy and give encouragement to trouble-makers. Li Shao paid no attention, and the territory did suffer from incursions and banditry.

Li Shao later became Administrator of Julu, but when Gongsun Zan attacked Yuan Shao in 192, he was afraid and planned to change sides. Hearing of this, Yuan Shao sent Dong Zhao to take the commandery. -SGZ 15:466, 14:436.

Li Shao 李邵 [Weinan 偉南 or Yongnan 永南] (d.225); Guanghan. Younger brother of Li Miao and Li Chao, after Liu Bei took over Yu province in 214 Li Shao became a member of his staff. In 223 he became a clerical officer under Zhuge Liang, Imperial Chancellor of Shu, and when Zhuge Liang went on campaign to the south in 225 he left Li Shao with authority at the capital. Li Shao died, however, in that same year. -SGZ Shu 15:1086, HYGZ 10B:151.

Li She 李歙 see Li Xi 李歙.

Li Shen 李參 see Li Can 李參.

Li Shencheng 李申成. About 213 Li Shencheng reported Liu Xun, an old friend of Cao Cao, for extortion and illegal conduct. Liu Xun was executed. -SGZ 12:387.

Li Sheng 李勝 [Maotong 茂通]; Guanghan. A man of literary ability and a fellow-countryman of Li You, Li Sheng served in the library of the Eastern Pavilion early in the first century. He compiled several dozen pian of rhapsodies, eulogies and hymns. -HHS 80/70A:2616, HYGZ 10B:146.

Li Sheng 李盛 [Zhonghe 仲和]; Henan. Administrator of Ba commandery in the time of Emperor Huan, Li Sheng enforced heavy taxes. The people sang of his greed. -HYGZ 1:5.

Li Sheng 李升 (d.188). Magistrate of Mianzhu in Guanghan in 188, Li Sheng was killed by the bandit group of Ma Xiang. -SGZ Shu 1:866, HYGZ 5:70. Cf. however, HYGZ 10B:150, which gives the name of the magistrate of Mianzhu killed by Ma Xiang and his fellows as Yi Pou.

Li Shi 李士; Chenliu? Li Shi was elder brother to the mother-in-law of the Lady Gou Yu. About 130 the two families were involved in a vendetta, and the Lady Gou killed Li Shi to avenge the death of her own uncle. -HHS 53/43:1751.

Li Shi 李實 see Li Bao 李寶.

Li Shou 李守 (d.22); Nanyang. Li Shou's forebears had been merchants, but the family was established among the gentry in Wan city, capital of Nanyang commandery, and Li Shou held local office. Nine foot tall [208 cm] with a commanding presence, it is said that he and his household held the authority and respect of a regular official.

Sometime a pupil of the noted scholar and official Liu Xin 劉歆, Li Shou was interested in prognostication and apocryphal works, and he found a prophecy that "The Liu clan shall rise again, and the Li family will be its support" 劉氏當起 [or 復興], 李氏為輔: see sub Wang Kuang 王況. He told his son Li Tong, and Li Tong used it in negotiations with Liu Bosheng for a rebel alliance against Wang Mang.

In 22, as the rising was being planned, Li Shou held office at Chang'an, Wang Mang's capital. Li Tong sent his cousin Li Ji to warn Li Shou, but Li Ji died on the road, and Li Shou had only minimal warning. He sought permission to leave and went to the gates of the city, but before he had received approval for his departure there came news of Li Tong's rebellion, and Wang Mang had Li Shou arrested. His friend Huang Xian sought to persuade Wang Mang that he should send Li Shou to dissuade his son from the venture, but as further reports came to hand Wang Mang rejected the proposal and had both Li Shou and Huang Xian executed. -HHS 15/5:573-75; Bn 54:102-103, Bn 59:239.

Li Shou 李壽; Nanyang. Son of Li Huang, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 15/5:576.

Li Shou 李壽; Kuaiji. Li Shou had local reputation for intelligence and ability. During the late 20s the Administrator Huang Dang appointed him his Officer of Merit, encouraged him to find good candidates for office, and accepted his recommendations without question. -XC 7:9b, HHSJJ 79/69B:2847 jiabou quoting Hou Kang.

Li Shou 李壽/壽 or Li Shouchang 壽長. Inspector of Qing province, Li Shou travelled widely through his region in a distinctive red carriage and made strict judgements. He recommended the dismissal of four heads of commandery units, and many other officials preferred to resign before he could act against them. He was also prepared to criticise neighbouring territories, arguing that the basis of all good government was the same, and should not be limited by artificial barriers. -XC 7:9b-10a.

Li Shou 李壽 (d.179); Jiuquan. Li Shou killed his fellow-countryman Zhao An, but was himself killed by Zhao An's daughter E. -SGZ 18:548.

Li Shu 李儵 [Boyu 伯玉?]; Nanyang. In 22 Li Tong approached Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, about the possibility of a rising against Wang Mang. As Liu Xiu came to the first meeting, Li Tong was ill, and he had his brothers Li Shu and Li Chong go with their cousin Li Yi for preliminary discussions with Liu Xiu. Liu Xiu was suspicious, for there was a feud between the families, but Li Shu and his companions were able to persuade him to meet Li Tong.

Though Li Shu was his elder brother, Li Tong was clearly the leader of the kinship group and Li Shu does not appear again in the histories. It is likely that he and his brother Chong were among those killed after the early defeat of the rebels in the winter of 22. -HHJ 1: 2.

Li Shu 李叔; Yingchuan. XTS 72A:2473 says that Li Shu was a son of Li Xiu.

Li Shu 李術/述 (d.200); Runan. In 199, when Sun Ce captured Lujiang, he had Li Shu hold the commandery with headquarters at Huan city, present-day Qianshan in Anhui. Li Shu attacked and killed Yan Xiang, Inspector of Yang province for Cao Cao.

When Sun Quan succeeded Sun Ce in the following year, Li Shu rejected his authority, but because Li Shu had killed Yan Xiang, Sun Quan persuaded Cao Cao to allow him a free hand to deal with him. His army then stormed Huan city and killed Liu Shu. -SGZ 15:463, Wu 1:1108, Wu 2:1116; deC 90:231.

Li Shu 李庶; Wudu. Li Shu was an associate of Jiang He, who came to Zhang Lu in Hanzhong and foretold the imperial fortunes of the Wei dynasty of Cao Cao. -SGZ 2:62.

Li [Shuca] 李淑才/叔才; Runan. A common man of his village, he was recommended for office by the judge of character Xu Shao, and was later celebrated for his quality. -SGZ 23:658.

Li [Shujian] 李叔堅 see Wei Shujian 韋叔堅.

Li Shuo 李朔; Shanyang. In the late 180s Li Shou and a number of other local leaders gathered retainers and bullied the local people. They were brought to order by the Investigator Man Chong. -SGZ 26:721.

Li Si 李思. During the late 190s Li Si was an officer under Pang Xi, Administrator of Ba commandery in the service of Liu Zhang, facing the threat from Zhang Lu and his adherents in the north. They achieved only limited success. -HYGZ 2:17.

Li Song 李松 (d.25); Nanyang. Member of a leading local family and a cousin of Li Tong and of Li Yi, in 23 Li Song and Shentu Jian commanded an army of the Gengshi Emperor which joined Deng Ye in the defeat of Wang Mang's Nine Tiger Army, then entered the passes to occupy Chang'an. They later brought items of imperial insignia to Luoyang.

By early 24 Li Song and Zhao Meng had emerged as leaders of the Nanyang gentry faction at the court of the Gengshi Emperor. Sending away potential rivals, the two men established a dominant position in the government. It was at Li Song's urging that the capital of the new regime was moved west to Chang'an, and he then replaced Liu Ci as Imperial Chancellor.

Early in 25 Li Song commanded the army which destroyed the party of Liu Ying the Young Prince in Anding, but a few weeks later, sent to face the Red Eyebrows in Hongnong, he was heavily defeated and driven back to the west.

In the autumn Li Song and Zhao Meng joined the Gengshi Emperor to fight their way into Chang'an and drive out Zhang Ang, Wang Kuang and other former chieftains. Li Song was then sent again to fight the Red Eyebrows as they approached, but was defeated and captured. Though his brother Fan opened a gate of the capital in exchange for his life, Li Song was killed, very likely at the instigation of the former chieftains who had joined the Red Eyebrows. -HHS 11/1:469-75, 15/5:575-77; Dubs 55:460-466, Bn 59:51-53, 91-92, 98-101.

Li Song 李嵩. In 48 the Internuncio Li Song was sent with the general Ma Cheng in an attempt to halt the raiding by the non-Chinese people of Wuling commandery. They had no success. Ma Cheng resigned his appointment, and Li Song is not heard of again. -HHS 1B:6, 86/76:2832.

Li Song 李頌; Runan. About 163 the powerful eunuch Tang Heng recommended Li Song to Zong Zi the Administrator of Runan. Li Song was a man of bad character, and though he was related by marriage to the Officer of Merit Fan Pang, Fan Pang disapproved of him. Despite pressure from Zong Zi to call Li Song to office, Fan Pang refused to do so. -HHS 67/57:2205; deC 89:69-70, 373.

Li Song 栗嵩. Li Song was a eunuch Regular Attendant during the 180s and was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 78/68:253.

Li Song 李嵩 see also Li Gao 李嵩.

Li Su 李肅 (d.162); Yingchuan. In 162 Li Su was Administrator of Nan commandery when the tribesmen of Wuling attacked his capital, Jiangling. Li Su ran away, and killed his staff officer Hu Shuang when he tried to stop him. The city fell, and vast quantities of cash, supplies and insignia came into the hands of the enemy. Li Su was arrested and publicly executed.

Li Su had previously been Administrator of Wu, and had nominated Lu Kang as Filial and Incorrupt. Lu Kang now collected his corpse and took it home to Yingchuan for burial. -HHS 7:311, 86/76:2834, 102/12:3256:1328.

Li Su 李肅 (d.192); Wuyuan. Commandant of Cavalry, in 192 he joined Lü Bu in killing Dong Zhuo. He was then sent to attack Niu Fu in Hongnong, but was driven away. Lü Bu had him killed. -HHS 72/62:2332, SGZ 6:179-181.

Li Su 李肅 [Weigong 偉恭]; Nanyang. Known for his abilities as a critic and literary stylist, Li Su served in Sun Quan's headquarters, and was responsible for the selection of many good men for office. He later became Administrator of Guiyang and then a minister, most likely in 229. He probably died during the 230s. -SGZ Wu 7:1238.

Li Tai 李泰 miswritten for Li You 李尤. -HHJ 17:206.

Li Tan 李譚. In 78 Li Tan was sent as an Internuncio to inspect the troops in the northwest. The general Ma Fang had disapproved of the plans of his subordinate Geng Gong to deal with the Qiang, and on his return to the capital he made his feelings known. Echoing this, Li Tan reported that Geng Gong was insufficiently concerned with his duties, and that he showed resentment when he received imperial orders. Geng Gong was recalled and arrested. -HHS 19/9:724.

Li Tan 李曇 [Ziyun 子雲]; Pingyuan. Friends of Pang Meng and scholars of Yinyang 陰陽, during the troubles of the 20s and 30s Li Tan and Xu Fang cared for some thousand refugees. -HHS 83/73:2760.

HHS 83/73 refers to this man by his style Ziyun, but in JJ at 3040 Wang Xianqian quotes the Gaoshi zhuàn of Huangfu Mi, which gives his personal name as Tan. Though the personal name and style are the same, this cannot be the same man as Li Tan below, who lived more than a hundred years later.

Li Tan 李曇 [Ziyun 子雲]; Yingchuan. Li Tan's father died when he was young and Li Tan cared for his step-mother, who was tyrannical and fussy. He nonetheless treated her with utmost respect, obtained for her the most costly products of each of the seasons, and each time he brought them he would always bow first. His wife and children followed suit, and the people of his district took him as a model of good conduct.

In 159, when Chen Fan became Director of the Imperial Secretariat under the personal government of Emperor Huan, he recommended Li Tan as one of the five most worthy men of the empire. A special carriage was sent to invite him to the capital, but he would not go. -HHS 53/43:1748, XC 3:3a, HHS 3:21a; deC 89:15-17.

Li Tan 李覃; Anping. A Consultant at the Han court under Cao Cao, Li Tan was influenced by the adept Hao Mengjie/Xi Jian and attempted to practice his techniques of long life, including abstention from cereals 辟穀, eating the "China-root" fungus Pachyma or Poria Cocos 伏苓, and drinking cold water. He got diarrhoea, however, and very nearly died. -SGZ 29:805.

Li Tao 李陶. In 169 Li Tao joined other clients of the family in arranging a funereal stele for Hu Gen, young grandson of the Excellency Hu Guang. -Cai 6:4.

Li Tiao 李調. Chief Clerk under the general Ma Fang, in the spring of 78 he was sent with four thousand men to outflank the Qiang of Longxi on the west while his colleagues Xia Jun and Ma Peng led two other columns against the enemy. Attacking together, the three killed or captured over a thousand men and seized more than a hundred thousand cattle and sheep. -HHS 24/14:856.

Li Tiao 李條; Donglai. One of several leaders of bandits in his commandery, about 206 Li Tiao and his fellows were defeated and restored to order by a combined force from the commanderies of Qing province led by Cao Cao's officer Lü Qian. -SGZ 18:540.

Li Tiao 李條; Runan: see Wei Tiao 韋條.

Li Tong 李通 [Ziyuan 次元 or Wenyuan 文元?] (d.42); Nanyang. Son of Li Shou and member of a leading family in Wan city, capital of the commandery, in the time of Wang Mang Li Tong was a clerk on the staff of a general and then became an assistant magistrate in an outlying county of Nan commandery. Praised for his administration, he nonetheless regarded these lowly official positions as being less than his due as a leader in his home community. He did not maintain his career and retired to Wan.

Inspired by an apocryphal saying from his father, that "The Liu clan shall rise again, and the Li shall be their support" [see sub Li Shou], Li Tong and his cousin Li Yi considered rebellion against the government of Wang Mang. In 22 Li Yi approached Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was visiting the city, and Liu Xiu involved his elder brother Liu Bosheng. Liu Bosheng had earlier killed Shentu Chen, a half-brother of Li Tong, so there was an unresolved feud between the families and Liu Xiu came armed to the first meeting. Though Li Tong was chief of his party, he was ill at that time, so he sent his brothers Shu and Chong to accompany Li Yi to the rendezvous, and they persuaded Liu Xiu to visit Li Tong. Li Tong was able to convince Liu Xiu of his family's good faith, and when Liu Xiu reported to his elder brother Liu Bosheng the two groups agreed to an alliance.

The rising took place in the winter of 22, but after some initial success the rebels were heavily defeated at Xiao-Chang'an. Li Tong's father Li Shou and many of his household were arrested and killed in Chang'an, and sixty-four of their kinsfolk were executed in Wan, with their bodies burnt in the market-place. Li Tong, however, was able to escape, and he accompanied Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu to meet the commoner Troops from the Lower Yangzi. Negotiating with the bandit leader Wang Chang, they established an alliance to restore the position.

When Liu Xuan was proclaimed as the Gengshi Emperor, Li Tong was named a chief general and a marquis, but his influence as leader of the clan was gradually usurped by his cousin Li Song, who became a favourite of the emperor. When royal fiefs were awarded at Chang'an in 24, Li Tong was named as king of a county in Runan – Bielenstein observes that the pattern of grants reflected a changing balance of power, firstly to the advantage of the Nanyang gentry, but also marking the rise of Li Song and Zhao Meng at the expense of others.

Soon afterwards Li Tong was sent out from the capital as a commissioner into Jing province, and though he had lost status at the court of the Gengshi Emperor he restored his fortunes by marrying Liu Boyi, the sister of Liu Xiu. In 25, as the government at Chang'an collapsed into turmoil and Liu Xiu claimed the imperial title, Li Tong went to join him and was named Minister of the Guards.

In the following year, as his wife was made a Senior Princess Li Tong was enfeoffed as a marquis and transferred to become Minister of Finance. Held in the greatest trust, he was given charge of the capital while the emperor was on campaign, and he paid particular attention to the repair of the palaces at Luoyang and to the re-establishment of schools.

In 29 Li Tong was named General of the Van and in the summer of 30 he was given command of a large force, including the generals Hou Jin and Wang Ba, which was sent west from Nanyang up the Han to attack Yan Cen in Hanzhong, who was allied to Gongsun Shu. In a limited campaign, the Han army defeated the allies, then withdrew and set military colonies to secure the front.

Claiming that the empire was now largely settled, Li Tong sought to retire from public life on the grounds of ill health, notably a weak stomach. When Emperor Guangwu asked for comments from his officials, the Excellency over the Masses Hou Ba compared Li Tong's inspiration of the original revolt with the work of the greatest ministers of Emperor Gao of Former Han, and insisted that he must not leave the court. The emperor supervised his medical treatment, and had him attend to such duties as he could.

In the summer of 31 the emperor had Li Tong appointed Excellency of Works, despite opposition from senior officials who had recommended Guo Ji. For his own part, it is said Li Tong was not anxious to hold high honours, and he asked several times to resign.

In the autumn of 32 Li Tong was sent with the chief general Wang Chang to deal with rebellion in Dong commandery and Jiyin. The disturbance was apparently soon settled through the good offices of Geng Chun, former Administrator of Dong.

In 36 Li Tong was permitted to leave his office, but remained at the capital with the senior title Specially Advanced, excusing him from the requirement to reside at his fief. He continued to be treated with honour and favour.

In 39, on the same day as Guangwu's sons were enfeoffed Li Tong's younger son Xiong was also granted a marquisate, and each time the ruler visited Nanyang he made a point of arranging sacrifices at the Li family tomb. When Li Tong died in 42 both Guangwu and his

Empress Yin put on mourning and accompanied the funeral cortège, and when Emperor Ming had portraits of his father's great servants painted on the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang, Li Tong was one of those who were honoured

Of the three cousins Li who had taken a leading role in the rebellion against Wang Mang, Li Yi and Li Song committed themselves to the Gengshi Emperor and paid the political penalty, but Li Tong, aided by his marriage to Guangwu's sister, obtained high honours at court and profitable fiefs for his descendants. On the other hand, despite the initial connection, the Li family was not closely associated with the throne thereafter and did not become one of the great families which regularly inter-married with the imperial house. -HHS 15/5:573-76*; Bn 54:55, 102-108, Bn 59:186, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:55, 60.

Li Tong 李统 [Shaoyou 少幼]; Runan. In the time of Emperor Zhang Li Tong was Chancellor of Zhao. Ruan Kuang the Inspector of Ji province reported that Li Tong was going blind and deaf. His officers were indignant and wanted to defend him, but Li Tong quietly resigned his post on grounds of old age; he was then approaching seventy.

At this time there was a difficult law case in the province and the emperor asked Li Tong's opinion. Impressed with his answers, he commented on the manner in which he had been forced from office, but Li Tong offered no criticism of Ruan Kuang. Emperor Zhang nonetheless dismissed Ruan Kang and appointed Li Tong to the high office of Palace Attendant. -FSTY 5:40; Nylan 83:476-478.

Li Tong 李通 [Wenta 文達; childhood style Wanyi 萬億] (168-209); Jiangxia. During the 180s Li Tong and his fellow-countryman Chen Gong were fighting men in the area of Runan commandery. A certain Zhou Zhi, who controlled another group, was seen as a rival, and Li Tong planned to kill him. Ignoring Chen Gong's concerns, he invited Zhou Zhi to a feast and killed him there. Then he and Chen Gong killed Zhou Zhi's subordinate commanders and shared his former followers between them.

Chen Gong was later killed by his brother-in-law Chen He, who took over his command. Li Tong then attacked Chen He, killed him in turn, and combined the Chen family troops with his own. He also captured the Yellow Turban leader Wu Ba and compelled his followers to surrender.

Li Tong was now the dominant local warlord, and he confirmed his authority by taking control of the distribution of grain at a time of famine. When Cao Cao brought the imperial court to Xu city in 196, however, Li Tong went to offer his allegiance. He was named a General of the Household and given charge of the western part of Runan, the territory he already controlled.

When Cao Cao was defeated by Zhang Xiu in 197, Li Tong brought reinforcements and was in the van of Cao Cao's successful counter-attack. He was granted titular enfeoffment, named a major-general and appointed Commandant in charge of Yang'an commandery, formed from two counties of Runan to guard the frontier against Liu Biao in Jing province. Soon afterwards the uncle of Li Tong's wife was found guilty of some crime, and the local magistrate Zhao Yan proposed to execute him. Though Li Tong had the right to over-ride the sentence, and his wife and children pleaded with him, he refused to intervene, and he made Zhao Yan a trusted adviser.

As Yuan Shao prepared to attack Cao Cao in 200, he sent agents to seek allies in Yu province, while Liu Biao also made offers. Several of Li Tong's family and followers urged him to turn to Yuan Shao, but Li Tong remained firm: he killed Yuan Shao's envoys and sent the insignia he had been offered to Cao Cao's headquarters. As his demand for taxes caused resentment, Zhao Yan urged him to greater leniency, but Li Tong explained that he feared Cao Cao might doubt his loyalty if he failed to maintain the rate of payments. Zhao Yan persuaded Cao Cao that the tax should be reduced, to reward the people who stayed loyal.

Li Tong then established control over the whole region between the Ru River and the upper Huai, destroying a number of local bandit groups and sending their leaders' heads to Cao Cao. He was promoted in fief and became Administrator of Runan.

After Cao Cao's defeat at the Red Cliffs in 208, Liu Bei and Zhou Yu laid siege to Cao Ren in Jiangling. At the end of 209 they forced him to abandon the city, and Guan Yu was sent to construct an abatis to cut his line of retreat. Li Tong brought his army to the rescue and broke the blockade. As he escorted Cao Ren to the north he became ill and died.

Li Tong received posthumous enhancement of his fief, and when Cao Pi succeeded to the throne of Wei in 220 he issued an edict granting him further honours, and gave rewards to his sons Li Ji and Li Xu. -SGZ 18:534-36*.

Li Wei 李鮪 see Lü Wei 呂鮪.

Li Wei 李威; Donglai. Son of Li Zhong, he succeeded to his fief in 43. -HHS 1/11:756.

Li Wei 李威, wife of: see the Lady Li Li 李禮.

Li Wei 李威; Jianwei. Member of a powerful local family, about 65 Li Wei was given appointment by the Inspector of Yi province. -HYGZ 10A:136.

Li Wei 李瑋/偉. A member of the Imperial Secretariat in 159, Li Wei was one of the non-eunuch supporters of Emperor Huan who were enfeoffed for their aid in the coup which destroyed Liang Ji. After the disgrace of the emperor's former favourites Zuo Guan and Ju Yuan in 165, Li Wei and others who had been rewarded in 159 were deprived of their fiefs. -HHS 7:305, 57/47:1858.

Li Wei 李隗. Inspector of Jing province in 165, Li Wei was captured by rebels. They released him soon afterwards, but he was punished for his military failure by execution. -HHS 102/12:3258; MBeck 90:128.

Li Weilong 李威龍 see Wei Weilong 韋威龍.

Li Wen 李文. When Deng Yu was given command in the west against the Gengshi Emperor in 24, he appointed Li Wen to his staff. After the conquest of Hedong in the following year Li Wen was made Administrator of that commandery. -HHS 16/6:601.

Li Wen 李文. About 90 Li Wen was a personal attendant of the General-in-Chief Dou Xian. He was sent to Wang Fu the Administrator of Yizhou with a request for six million cash, but was kept waiting until formal approval was received from the court. -DGHJ 18:5b.

Li Wen 李濫; Ba. As a local officer in 154, Li Wen joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending that the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree.

Li Wen later became Administrator of Guiyang, and when he died he had a tomb near that of Feng Gun in his home country. Mysterious occurrences were associated with the site, and people worshipped there. -HYGZ 1:5, SJZ 29:12a.

Li [Wende] 李文德; Nanyang. A former Administrator of Yuexi, Li Wende was a friend of Yan Du. About 160

he argued at court that Yan Du, then in retirement, should be brought back to office. In a letter, however, Yan Du extolled the pleasures of private life and scholarship, and asked Li Wende not to press the matter further. -HHS 64/54:2106.

Yan Du was one of the chief sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu, who died in 156, and Li Wende, described as a private gentleman 處士, also appears on the list. The character of his personal name has been lost. -LS 17:17a.

Li Wenhou 李文侯. In 184, Li Wenhou joined the mutiny of the Loyal Auxiliary of Barbarians in Liang province and was chosen with Beigong Boyu as joint leader of the rebellion. From his membership of the Auxiliary, it would appear he was non-Chinese, though he may have been a junior officer of Chinese origin.

Li Wenhou remained a chieftain through the rebel invasion of the region about Chang'an in 185, but he and Beigong Boyu disappear from the records after the retreat at the end of that year; they were probably eliminated in quarrels among the leadership. -HHS 72/62:2320-21; Haloun 49/50, deC 84:147-150, 492-495, and see sub Han Sui.

Li Wenji 李文姬, the Lady; Hanzhong. Daughter of Li Gu, she married the local gentleman Zhao Boying. After the destruction of her father in 147 she arranged the escape of her youngest brother Li Xie and, when he returned years later, warned him against any discussion of past politics. -HHS 63/53:2089-90, HYGZ 10C:172.

Li Wensi 李文思; Anding. Second husband of the daughter of Zhou Ba q.v., Li Wensi became Administrator of Nanyang. -FSTY 3f:105.

Li Wu 李武 [Zhaoxian 昭先]; Yingchuan. Son of Li Hu, Li Wu was Administrator of Dong commandery and later became Minister of Ceremonies. -XTS 72A:2473.

Li Xi 李歙 or Li She. A palace eunuch, in 139 Li Xi was ordered by Emperor Shun to arrest Zhang Kui, Qu Zheng and other colleagues, who had laid false accusations against the General-in-Chief Liang Shang and had then arrested Cao Teng and Meng Ben. Zhang Kui and his fellows died in prison. -HHS 34/24:1176.

Li Xi 李翕 [Bodu 伯都]; Hanyang. In the early 160s Li Xi was Commandant of a Dependent State in Liang province. There was trouble with the Qiang people, but when some of them surrendered Li Xi killed them. As Huangfu Gui came to the northwest in 162 he impeached Li Xi and had him dismissed.

Despite this unfortunate record, Li Xi later became Administrator of Wudu, where he carried out major projects to improve roads through the mountains. Favourable omens appeared and several stele were set up to commemorate his achievements. -HHS 65/55:2133-34, JJ at 2328 Zhou Shouchang & jiaobu at 2354 Hui Dong, LS 4:8b-13a 22:17a-18a [as Liu Hui 會], LX 11:9b-10a, Nagata 94:186, 196.

Li Xian 李憲 (d.30); Yingchuan. In the time of Wang Mang Li Xian was military commander of Lujiang. About 20 a bandit group of the Yangzi led by Wang Zhongong plundered the territory. Li Xian was named lieutenant-general and chief of the commandery to put them down. When Wang Mang was destroyed, Li Xian made himself independent in Lujiang, and he evidently also took over Jiujiang by killing Wang Mang's administrator Jia Meng 賈萌 [Bn 59:29]. Li Xian thus controlled the greater part of present-day Anhui between the Huai River and the Yangzi, and in 23 he styled himself King of Huainan 淮南王.

In 27 Li Xian took the imperial title and named a complement of Excellencies, ministers and other officials. He had not been active in the civil war, and it is difficult to see what purpose he thought to serve except perhaps to rally the south-eastern forces which had previously looked to the pretender Liu Yong, now dead. In any case, his pretensions drew the attention of Guangwu, who was already engaged with other warlords of the region.

The Han emperor sent Ma Cheng and three other generals to gather troops in the region of the lower Yangzi and the Huai and to attack Li Xian. Li Xian's position collapsed, and by the end of 28 he held only his capital city of Shu 舒.

At the beginning of 30, after a siege lasting more than a year the city fell to starvation and storm. Li Xian was killed by one of his own men as he fled, and his wife and children were captured and executed. -HHS 12/2:500-01*, XC 1:2b; Bn 59:133-149.

Li Xian 李咸 [Yuanzhen 元貞 or Yuanzhuo 元卓] (100-175); Runan. There are two accounts of Li Xian's early life, complementary but sometimes contradictory: the Hou Han shu of Xie Cheng, cited by HHS 44/34:1511 TC, and a stele composed in his honour by Cai Yong.

According to Xie Cheng, Li Xian was a man of poor family. After his father died, he farmed the land to care for his mother while still studying the classics. He was invited to join the offices of the Excellencies at the capital and was nominated Abundant Talent by Hu Guang about 145. He served as a county magistrate in Beihai, where he was regularly cited for his excellent administration, and was later Inspector of Xu province and Administrator of Yuyang.

According to the inscription by Cai Yong, Li Xian came from an old official family, both his grandfather and an uncle had been commandery Administrators, and he himself was widely read and learned. With commandery nomination as Filial and Incorrupt, he became a gentleman cadet, and was then granted further nomination as Abundant Talent. [The stele says that the nomination was made by the Minister of the Household, responsible for the corps of cadets, but HHS 44/34:1510 refers to Li Xian as a nominee of Hu Guang, so Xie Cheng's attribution appears more probable.] Li Xian was a successful magistrate in two counties, then Inspector of Xu and Administrator of Yuyang, and was later appointed General on the Liao. He left office when his mother became ill and died.

Again according to the stele, during the reign of Emperor He at the beginning of the second century Li Xian returned to office as member of the Imperial Secretariat. This date, however, must be wrong, for the stele itself says that he died in 175 at the age of seventy-six sui: Li Xian was actually born in the time of Emperor He.

Li Xian did become Deputy Director of the Secretariat, then served as Court Architect and held several ministries. In 171 he was appointed Grand Commandant.

When the Dowager Dou died in 172, the eunuchs argued that she should be buried with only the rites of a concubine. Though Li Xian was extremely ill, he attended court to speak against them and won the argument. In 173 he was permitted to resign his office on grounds of age and ill health. Widely honoured and admired, he died at home. -XC 2:9a-b, Cai 5:2, HHS 56/46:1833.

Li Xian 李暹; Beidi. A nephew of Li Jue, in 195 Li Xian was sent to bring Emperor Xian from his palace to Li Jue's camp in the north of Chang'an city. -HHS 72/62:2336, SGZ 6:183.

Li Xiang 李瓌; Yingchuan. XTS 72A:2473 says that Li Xiang was a son of Li Ying.

Li Xiangru 李相如. Administrator of Longxi in 186, when his capital was attacked by the rebels of Liang province Li Xiangru joined the insurgents. -HHS 72/62:2321.

Li Xie 李燮 [Degong 德公] (135-187); Hanzhong. Youngest son of Li Gu, when his father was destroyed by Liang Ji in 147 Li Xie was sent for refuge in the family's home country. As Li Xie's brothers Ji and Zi were arrested and killed, his sister Wenji entrusted the boy to the care of Wang Cheng, a former client of Li Gu, who took the boy east into Xu province. Li Xie changed his name and served in a wine shop, while Wang Cheng told fortunes in the market. They acted as strangers to one another, meeting only in secret. [Another version of the story, from XC 3, says that he took refuge at the house of Teng Zi of Beihai.]

Impressed by Li Xie's concern for scholarship, the wine merchant had him marry his daughter. The year after the fall of Liang Ji in 159, Emperor Huan was persuaded by astronomers to order a search for the families of Liang Ji's victims, and Li Xie was able to return home. He carried out mourning for his father and brothers and later for Wang Cheng, but on the advice of his sister he avoided all discussion of past politics.

On the other hand, the local officer Zhao Zijian, who had urged the execution of Li Xie's brothers, was afraid he might seek revenge. He hired a man to kill him, but Li Xie found out and told the Administrator. Zhao Zijian was executed.

Li Xie was offered nomination by local authorities and positions in the offices of the Excellencies, but always refused. Eventually an official carriage was sent, and he became a Consultant, junior adviser at court. Chong Dai, a scholar in retirement who had also rejected nominations, was offered a similar post, but died before he could accept. Li Xie argued unsuccessfully that Chong Dai should be recognised by the state as a former official.

In office Li Xie was admired for his ability to plan long-term and for the quality of his associates. About 184 he became Chancellor of Anping. The king, Liu Xu, had been kidnapped by the Yellow Turbans, and the people of the kingdom were levied for his ransom. When Liu Xu returned, Li Xie argued he should not be restored to the throne, for he had failed in his duty as a vassal ruler. His advice was rejected, and Li Xie was sent to prison for slandering the imperial clan, but a few months later Liu Xu was found guilty of Impiety and was executed.

Li Xie was re-appointed as Consultant, and was then named Intendant of the capital commandery Henan. Emperor Ling had instituted the purchase of offices, but Li Xie protested against the system, and he was not required to pay.

In one incident as Intendant, Li Xie arrested Zhen Shao, a former supporter of Liang Ji, denounced his immorality, and had him proscribed from office. The people sang praises of his administration, but he died after two years in office. -HHS 63/53:2089-91*, XC 3: 14a, HYGZ 10C:167-68.

Li Xin 李訢; Donghai. In 56 Li Xin was promoted from Director of Retainers to be Excellency over the Masses.

When Emperor Guangwu died in the following year Li Xin was formally responsible for the imperial coffin, and as Emperor Ming came to the throne Li Xin and his Excellency colleagues were awarded district marquisates. [Vervoorn 90:285 quotes HHJ 18:103, which gives one reason for the enfeoffment of the three men as their "labours in the mountains and forests" 以山林之勞; he relates this to their experience as hermits, but all three had active official careers, and the phrase "mountains and forests" in fact refers to their responsibilities for aspects of the funeral.]

In 60 Li Xin and his colleague Zhao Xi were dismissed, apparently for some irregularity in dealing with Xue Xiu, Chancellor of Zhongshan, which was the kingdom held by Emperor Ming's half-brother Liu Yan 焉. No further details are given of the affair. -HHS 1B:83, 2:96, 105.

Li Xin 李敏; Liaodong. Son of Li Min, after his father had fled from the local warlord Gongsun Du, Li Xin sought for twenty years to find him, travelling by sea beyond the imperial frontiers. He was eventually persuaded by Xu Miao that it was his filial duty to marry and conceive an heir to carry on the lineage; but as soon as this was done, he abandoned his wife and infant son to maintain mourning for his father, and died of grief a few years later. -SGZ 8:252-53, JS 44: 1253, XTS 72A:2593.

Li Xing 李興 (d.31); Wuyuan. A local warlord, in 28 Li Xing was persuaded by an emissary of the Shanyu Yu of the Xiongnu to support the pretender Lu Fang. In the following year he and his colleague Min Kan escorted Lu Fang from the court of the Shanyu into Wuyuan, where he established his capital on Chinese soil. Li Xing was given title as Administrator of Wuyuan. In 31 possibly fearing Li Xing as a potential rival, Lu Fang killed him and his brothers. -HHS 12/2:506-07; Bn 67:105-107.

Li Xiong 李熊/雄; Shu. Officer of Merit to Gongsun Shu as Administrator of the commandery in the middle 20s, Li Xiong first urged him to style himself as a king, and then to claim the imperial title. When he took this advice in the summer of 25, Gongsun Shu appointed Li Xiong his Excellency over the Masses. -HHS 13/3: 534-35, HYGZ 5:68.

Li Xiong 李熊; Wei. A man of local family, in 25 Li Xiong was a military officer under the Administrator Yao Qi. Yao Qi was contending with Zhuo Jing, an officer of the Gengshi Emperor who sought to raise the leading clans of the commandery against the newly-proclaimed Emperor Guangwu.

Zhuo Jing was defeated and driven away, but Li Xiong's younger brother Li Lu planned to make common cause with the Tanxiang bandits and seize the capital, Ye city. Yao Qi was warned of this, and at first paid no attention, but when he heard it three or four times he called Li Xiong to ask him about it. Li Xiong kowtowed and asked that he and his aged mother be put to death to atone for his renegade brother, but Yao Qi ordered only that they be sent out of Ye to join Li Lu.

Li Xiong then brought his brother back to the gate of the city and Li Lu, bitterly ashamed, killed himself to show his remorse. Admiring the brothers' conduct, Yao Qi buried Li Lu with full funerary rites, and restored Li Xiong to his former position. -HHS 20/10:733.

Li Xiong 李雄; Nanyang. Li Xiong was a younger son of Liu Tong and the Princess Liu Boyi, sister of Emperor Guangwu. On the same day as Guangwu's sons were enfeoffed in 39, he was granted a county marquisate in his father's honour. -HHS 15/5:576.

Li Xiong 李雄; Liaodong. XTS 72A:2593 says that Li Xiong, son of Li Bao, served as Chief Clerk to a General of Chariots and Cavalry.

Li Xiu 李脩/修 [Boyou 伯游]; Yingchuan. Son of Li Wu, Li Xiu was a student of the New Text Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu under Fan Shu. He later became Minister of the Household, and in 111 he was appointed Grand Commandant.

That year, as the Qiang rebellion reached its height, the officer Pang Can argued that the empire should withdraw from Liang province. The proposal was endorsed by the General-in-Chief Deng Zhi, but Li Xiu was persuaded by his subordinate Yu Xu that he should oppose the plan. He gained the support of the other Excellencies, and kinsmen of local officials and members of leading clans were recruited into the imperial service to encourage their loyalty and commitment. In practice, however, the northwest was largely abandoned to the enemy.

Li Xiu left office in 115. -HHS 5:21, 58/48:1866.

Li Xiu 李休 [Zicai 子材] (d.156); Nanyang. A scholar of the classics, with broader interests in divination and other strange arts, Li Xiu was known as the Gentleman of Mysterious Learning 玄文先生. He served as Officer of Merit in his commandery, then attracted the attention of the Excellency Hu Guang and rose in office to become Minister Herald. -Cai 2:8.

Li Xiu 李休 [Zilang 子朗]; Hanzhong? Known for his intelligence and ability in planning, 200 Li Xiu held military command under Zhang Lu, theocratic warlord of Hanzhong. Impressed by his strength, and inspired by a reported fall of sweet dew 甘露, he urged Zhang Lu to take an independent title. Zhang Lu, however, refused.

When Zhang Lu surrendered to Cao Cao in 215 Li Xiu was recognised as one of his leading counsellors and was rewarded with a secondary marquisate. He held court appointment, and served Cao Pi as Administrator of Shangdang and Julu. -SGZ 9:290.

Li Xu 李續; Nanyang [see sub Li Yuan]. Li Xu was the grandson of the wealthy Li Yuan, but about 40, when he was still an infant, all his family died of the plague. The household slaves divided the property amongst themselves and intended to kill Li Xu, but he was rescued and taken to Shanyang by the loyal Li Shan.

When Li Xu was ten, Li Shan brought him back to reclaim his inheritance, and the criminals were punished. The matter was reported, and Emperor Guangwu had both Li Xu and Li Shan appointed to the retinue of the Heir. Li Xu later became Chancellor of Hejian. -HHS 81/71:2679-80, XC 5:14b-15a.

XC 5 describes Li Xu as a grandson of Li Yuan; HHS 81/71 refers to him simply as a child 兒.

Li Xu 李緒; Jiangxia. Son of Li Tong, he distinguished himself in the defence against Guan Yu in 219, and in the following year he was made a General of the Household by Cao Pi. -SGZ 18:536.

Li Xuan 李玄. An officer under Cen Peng, general of Emperor Guangwu, after the warlord Tian Rong of Nan commandery was driven up the Yangzi to take refuge with Gongsun Shu in 29, Li Xuan was left in garrison at Yidao, to maintain defence in depth against any incursion back through the Gorges.

In 30 Gongsun Shu sent Tian Rong in a counter-attack. The advance positions were overrun and the enemy entered the middle Yangzi, but were turned back without permanent effect.

In the spring of 33 Tian Rong and other commanders again attacked, and this time they broke right through the defences and established a position which defied the imperial troops for two years. It is likely that Li Xuan was killed in this campaign, for he is not heard of again. -HHS 17/7:659-60; Bn 59:184-187.

Li Xuan 李宣 [Gongxiu 公休]; Runan. In the middle 150s Li Xuan became a clerk in the office of the Grand Commandant Huang Qiong. When Huang Qiong complained to his staff that the balance of nature was awry and he felt responsible, some sought to encourage him by observing that even the legendary heroes of the past had experienced similar times of ill omen, but they would pass. Li Xuan, however, argued that such a situation required action to restore good government. -HHSJJ 61/51:2222 jiaobu quoting Hou Kang.

Li Xuan 李宣; Yingchuan. As Li Xuan's father was dying, he warned Li Xuan that the empire was falling into disorder and advised him that though Zhang Miao was a close friend and Yuan Shao was a kinsman by marriage, Cao Cao was the man to follow. Li Xuan and his brothers took this advice and so the family survived.

Li Xuan's grandfather was Li Ying, but there is disagreement whether he was a son of Li Zan or of Li Jin. Compare HHS 67/57:2197 and XTS 72A:2473.

Li Xuan 李譔 [Qinzhong 欽仲]; Guanghan. Son of Li Ren, Li Xuan joined the suite of Liu Shan, Heir of Shu-Han, who greatly admired his learning and steadily promoted him at his court.

Li Xuan was a prolific scholar of the Old Text, but he enjoyed singing and behaved frivolously, so his work was not well respected. He died about 260. -SGZ Shu 12:1026-27*.

Li Xun 李恂 personal name also miswritten as 珣 [Shuying 叔英]; Anding. Having studied the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Han, Li Xun became a teacher with several hundred students. The Administrator Li Hong invited him to become his Officer of Merit, but before he could take up the post he received another invitation to be an Assistant Officer of the province. Just at this time, however, Li Hong died, so Li Xun refused the appointment and instead escorted Li Hong's body back to his home, saw to the raising of his tumulus and maintained mourning for three years.

In the early 80s Li Xun was appointed to the offices of the Excellency Huan Yu, then became an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate. Sent with the Staff of Authority to You province, he behaved kindly toward both Chinese and non-Chinese, and prepared a set of maps and a geographical report in over a hundred juan 卷. It was presented to the throne as a sealed memorial, and Emperor Zhang was greatly impressed.

Li Xun was made Inspector of Yan province, where he was noted for his honesty and simple living, and was then transferred to be Administrator of Zhangye, where he gained a reputation for firm government.

In 88 Dou Xian, brother of the regent Dowager, came to the neighbouring commandery of Wuwei, to prepare his great expedition against the Northern Xiongnu. All the other officials of the region went to pay their respects, but Li Xun kept aloof, and Dou Xian reported against him and had him dismissed.

About 91, after the destruction of Dou Xian, Li Xun was named an Internuncio and was then sent with the Staff of Authority to act as Senior Colonel in the Western Regions; this appointment was no doubt made in association with that of Ban Chao as Protector-General.

The Western Regions were extremely wealthy, and the hostage princes of the various states, the local officers and the merchants trading abroad all sought Li Xun's favour with gifts of slaves, horses from Dayuan [Ferghana], gold and silver, perfumes and cashmere cloth. He refused all of them.

The Northern Xiongnu still attempted to interrupt traffic along the Northern Road to the west past Yiwu and Jushi [Turfan], but Li Xun offered rewards for heads of the leaders of the raiders, and when he got them he hung them at the gate of his camp. Thereafter trade proceeded peacefully.

Li Xun was transferred to be Administrator of Wuwei, but was dismissed on account of some fault. He went on foot back to his home country, built a hut for himself in marshland, and lived with his students, weaving mats to provide for himself. At the time of the Qiang rebellion after 107, Li Xun fell into the hands of the insurgents, but they knew his fine reputation and set him free.

Li Xun then went to Luoyang to apologise for his involvement with the enemy. At this time the harvest had failed and there was famine. The Excellencies Zhang Min and Lu Gong sent their sons to give him food, but he would not accept, and he went to settle in the country west of the capital, and subsisted there upon acorns.

Despite his humble diet, Li Xun lived to the age of ninety-six. -HHS 51/41:1683-84*.

Li Xun 李訓; Yingchuan. XTS 72A:2473 says that Li Xun was a son of Li Xiu.

Li Xun 李巡; Runan. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates under Emperor Ling, Li Xun was respected for honesty and loyalty and for the fact that, unlike Zhang Rang and others, he did not contend for power.

In 175 Li Xun reported that the texts of the Confucian classics in the library of the Orchid Terrace were being altered by members of the Imperial University to support and fit their own theories. In response, Cai Yong and other scholars memorialised that five classics should be edited and engraved upon stone. Emperor Ling approved, Li Xun took part in the work, and the Stone Classics were completed in 183. See sub Cai Yong.

On his own account, Li Xun compiled a commentary to the Er ya 爾雅 dictionary. -HHS 78/68:2533, Hou Kang:2115; Bn 76:69.

Li Yan 李嚴. As Administrator of Jianwei, Li Yan sent wedding gifts for the expected marriage of his Investigator Wang Chong to the widowed Lady Cheng Zhenjue q.v.

Li Yan 李言; Henan. In 170 the local magistrate Li Yan requested that the Qing Dyke on the Ru River in Runan be restored. Endorsed by the Excellency Xu Xun, the project was duly carried out, irrigating a considerable area of farmland. A stele was erected to mark the completion of the work. -SJZ 21:18a.

Li Yan 李研; Guiyang. A local bandit leader, he caused widespread trouble in 163, and though he was defeated by Du Shang in 163 he was still active in 165. Chen Qiu was sent as Administrator to deal with him, and settled the disturbance. -HHS 7:312-13, 56/46:1831.

Li Yan 酈炎 [Wensheng 文勝] (150-177); Zhuo. Li Yan's family claimed descent from the scholar official Li Yiqi 酈食其 of Chenliu, who had been enfeoffed with a county in Zhuo by Emperor Gao at the beginning of Former Han. In the time of Emperor Ling Li Yan was known as a man of literary ability, skilled in music and admired for his conversation and repartee. Invited to office by both his province and his commandery, he would not accept, though he expressed his fine ambitions in two poems preserved in his HHS biography, and he had other collected works.

Li Yan was extremely sensitive and suffered fits of insanity, and after his mother died his condition grew worse. His wife, who had just given birth, feared for herself and her child, so her family laid an accusation against Li Yan. Because of his illness, he could make no coherent answer to questions, and he died in prison at the age of twenty-eight.

The scholar-official Lu Zhi composed an epitaph for Li Yan, describing his fine qualities. -HHS 80/70B:2647-49*.

Li Yan 李延 (d.190). A member of the alliance against Dong Zhuo, Li Yan was captured and then boiled alive. -SGZ 7:178. See also Li Min and Zhang An.

Li Yan 李嚴 also as Li Ping 平 [Zhengfang 正方] (d.234); Nanyang. Having served in a commandery office when he was young, Li Yan had a fine reputation, and the Governor Liu Biao sent him out to inspect his various territories. When Cao Cao came to the province in 208 Li Yan went west into Yi province and he served Liu Zhang well as magistrate of Chengdu.

As Liu Bei attacked in 213 Liu Zhang sent Li Yan against him, but Li Yan went over to the enemy and was promptly appointed a major-general. After Liu Bei's victory he worked with Zhuge Liang, Fa Zheng, Liu Ba and Yin Ji to compile the administrative code Shu ke 屬科, and was sent out as Administrator of Jianwei with rank as a full general.

In 218, as Liu Bei was engaged in Hanzhong the bandits Ma Qin and Gao Sheng brought a great army to attack. Unwilling to raise a major force, Li Yan attacked with just five thousand commandery militia. He defeated the enemy and killed their leaders, and went on to defeat the non-Chinese chieftain Gao Dong in Yuexi.

When Liu Bei proclaimed himself King of Hanzhong in 219 Li Yan was one of the officials listed in the formal memorial to the emperor. He was given higher title as a general, but remained in Jianwei.

As Liu Bei was dying in 223 he called Li Yan to be Director of the Secretariat, and Li Yan became chief assistant to Zhuge Liang in the regency government for Liu Shan. In 231, however, he failed to maintain supplies for Zhuge Liang's offensive operations, and when he attempted to cover up the affair he was demoted to common rank and sent into exile. As Zhuge Liang died three years later, Li Yan lost hope of being reinstated; he too died soon afterwards. -SGZ Shu 10:998-1000*.

In 230 Li Yan changed his personal name to Ping 平, but he is referred to by that name in some records of earlier occasions.

Li Yan 李延. Local commandery officers in the late second century, Li Yan and his colleague Ni Xun both suffered from headaches and fever. Though their symptoms were identical the doctor Hua Tuo gave Ni Xun medicine to reduce his temperature, but Li Yan received a draught to bring on sweat. Questioned, he observed that while Ni Xun's problem was external, Li Yan's was internal and needed to be forced out. By the following day both men were cured. -SGZ 29:800.

Li Ye 李業 [Juyou 巨遊]; Guanghan. As a young man, Li Ye acquired local reputation for his sense of honour. He studied the Classic of Poetry according to the Lu interpretation under the Academician Xu Huang 許晃, and in the time of Emperor Ping, about 5 AD, he was recommended as Understanding the Classics and became a gentleman cadet.

Soon afterwards, as Wang Mang seized power, Li Ye left his post on a plea of illness. He retired to his home, closed the gates and ignored summons from both provincial and commandery authorities. The Administrator Liu Xian 劉咸 was particularly insistent that Li Ye become his Officer of Merit, to recommend men for local appointment and as candidates for commission in the civil service. Li Ye did go to call upon Liu Xian, but had himself carried in a litter and still claimed to be ill. Angry at such lack of public spirit, Liu Xian had him arrested and intended to kill him. Members of his staff, however, argued that such an action would reflect badly upon him, so Liu Xian released Li Ye. He then nominated him as Sincere and Upright, and Wang Mang appointed Li Ye to office at court. Again he pleaded illness and left, this time taking refuge in the mountains until the reign of Wang Mang was ended.

Gongsun Shu knew Li Ye's reputation, and when he took the imperial title in 25 he summoned him to be an Academician at his court. Li Ye again excused himself on grounds of ill health, but after several years Gongsun Shu became angry at the delay. About 30 he therefore sent his Minister Herald Yin Rong with a dose of poison and instructions that Li Ye must accept office as an Excellency or enfeoffment as a marquis, or that he take the potion. Yin Rong urged him to accept appointment, arguing that in time of confusion, with no means to tell which cause was correct, it was meaningless to hold aloof on account of loyalty to the former dynasty. Li Ye, however, quoted the words of Confucius [Analects 8:13], that a worthy man would not "enter a state which is going to fall, not stay in one which is disordered." Yin Rong urged him to consider his family, but Li Ye replied that a man with a sense of public conscience can pay no attention to his wife and children. He took the poison.

Gongsun Shu was amazed and ashamed by Li Ye's decision. He sent envoys to the funeral and offered a gift of cloth, but Li Ye's son Hui refused. After the destruction of Gongsun Shu in 36 Emperor Guangwu issued an edict recalling Li Ye's fine conduct, the local histories recorded his story, and portraits were painted in his honour. -HHS 81/71:2668-70*, HYGZ 10C:173-74; Vervoorn 90:142-143.

Li Yi 李軼 [Jiwen 季文] (d.25); Nanyang. Member of a leading family of Wan city, capital of the commandery, Li Yi and his cousin Li Tong considered rebellion against the government of Wang Mang, and in 22 Li Yi approached Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was visiting the city. There was a vendetta between the families, and Liu Xiu was suspicious, but after a first meeting with Li Yi and Li Tong's brothers Li Shu and Li Chong, he agreed to meet Li Tong himself and brought in his elder brother Liu Bosheng. The two groups agreed to join in a rising, and in the winter of 22 Li Yi and Liu Xiu raised the standard of revolt in Wan, then went to the rebel rendezvous at Chongling.

Early in 23 Li Yi supported the nomination of the Gengshi Emperor. He was appointed a general, and in the summer of that year he held command among the Han forces at Kunyang. Escaping from the city with Liu Xiu, he took part in the attack from outside which destroyed the army of Wang Xun and Wang Yi.

A few weeks later, Li Yi and Zhu Wei, a leader of the bandit Troops from Xinshi, impeached Liu Bosheng for involvement in the alleged treason of his kinsman Liu Ji. Liu Bosheng and Liu Ji were executed.

After the destruction of Wang Mang at the end of 23, Li Yi was sent to take Jiyin commandery [known under Wang Mang as Jiping 濟平]. Geng Ai, Administrator for Wang Mang, surrendered and was transferred to Ji'nan, while Li Yi sent his son Geng Chun as an envoy to the north.

In 24, when the Gengshi Emperor awarded fiefs at Chang'an, Li Yi was named as king of a county in Nanyang. Bielenstein observes that the pattern of these grants reflected a changing balance of power, firstly to the advantage of the Nanyang gentry, but also marking the rise of Li Song and Zhao Meng at the expense of others. Later that year Li Yi was sent out under the command of Zhu Wei to hold Luoyang against the threats from Liu Xiu and the Red Eyebrows in the east.

Early in 25 Guangwu's general Feng Yi secretly invited Li Yi to surrender. Li Yi replied that he wished to make peace, and he halted his operations so that Feng Yi was able to consolidate his position in the north, cross the Yellow River and occupy territory east of Luoyang. Moreover, when Wu Bo the Gengshi Administrator of Henan attempted to attack and was defeated, Li Yi kept the gates of Luoyang closed against him so that he was isolated and killed. Feng Yi told Guangwu of the agreement, but Guangwu recalled how Li Yi had betrayed his brother Liu Bosheng. He refused to make any agreement and published the correspondence. Zhu Wei had Li Yi killed. -HHS 14/4: 549-52, 17/7:642-43; Bn 54:102-105, 119-121, Bn 59: 35-37, 51-57, 102-103.

Li Yi 李邑. A captain of palace guards, in 83 Li Yi was sent on embassy with gifts to the Wusun people of the Tian Shan ranges. When he came to the Western Regions he reported that Ban Chao's plans were over-ambitious and doomed to failure, and he criticised Ban Chao for keeping his family with him in the west, rather than as quasi-hostages in China.

Ban Chao, embarrassed, sent his family back, but Emperor Zhang recognised his good faith, reprimanded Li Yi, and told him that he was answerable to Ban Chao. When the Wusun accepted Han hegemony and sent hostages, Ban Chao had Li Yi escort them to Luoyang, remarking that he was glad to be rid of a disloyal trouble-maker. -HHS 47/37:1577-79.

Li Yi 李儀, the Lady (d.99). Wife and then widow of Liu Xian, King of Chen, the Lady was hated by his son and successor Liu Jun. In 99 Liu Jun had his retainer Wei Jiu kill her and members of her household. -HHS

50/40:1668.

Li Yi 李益 see sub Li Liang 李諒.

Li Yi 李弈 see sub Li Hu 李護.

Li Yi 李禕; Guanghan? Grand Administrator of Zangke in the first part of the second century, Li Yi had a troubled household. He frequently expressed admiration for the harmony which reigned between the Lady Wen Ji, wife of Wang Tang, and her daughter-in-law Yang Jin. -HYGZ 10B:159.

Li Yi 李翊 [Fuguo 輔國] (120-173); Zangke. Claiming descent from an established official family, Li Yi became known for scholarship and moral worth. He held commandery appointment as an Investigator, Officer of Merit and a brevet magistrate. In 163 he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet, but fell ill and returned home.

Soon afterwards Li Yi received a special commission from Yi province to take appointment as a captain 候 in the Dependent State of Guanghan, and he served there with distinction until 168, when he left office in mourning for the death of one of his parents. We are told that he was invited several times to return to office, but remained in retirement and died a few years later. A stele was set up in his honour, and another for his wife, the Lady Zang. -LS 9:7a-8b, 12:16a-17b.
Li Yi 李義 [Xiaoyi 孝懿]; Zuopingyi. Li Yi and his colleague Yan Gan both came from the east of the commandery, which had never produced an imperial official. Despite their commoner status, they were generous men of high ability. At the end of the 180s, when both were about twenty years old, Li Yi was known to the leading clans of the region for his knowledge of ritual, particularly funerals.

Many people fled when the capital region fell into disorder in the 190s, but Li Yi and Yan Gan stayed behind and maintained a self-defence group for those who were otherwise lost. In the late 190s, as a measure of control was restored under Cao Cao's Director of Retainers Zhong Yao, the western part of Zuopingyi was separated from the east to form the new commandery of Zuoneishi; the east kept its name. Li Yi's home country was in the west, but because of their close association he stayed with Yan Gan in the east, and both men rose to high local office.

Li Yi was then sent to the capital as Reporting Officer for the commandery, became a magistrate in the region of Chang'an, and then an officer of the household guards. In 213 he was appointed to Cao Cao's military staff, and also held senior office in the Secretariat of the new state of Wei.

As Cao Pi came to the throne in 220 he appointed Li Yi a Counsellor Remonstrant, then Bearer of the Mace and then Minister of the Guards. Li Yi died in office about 225. -SGZ 23:674-75.

Li Yi 李異. In 201 Li Yi was an officer under Zhao Wei, who had rebelled against the warlord Governor of Yi province Liu Zhang. The rebels were defeated and Zhao Wei withdrew to Jiangling, but as Liu Zhang's army approached Li Yi and his colleague Pang Yue killed Zhao Wei and surrendered.

In 211 Li Yi was a senior officer under Liu Zhang. -SGZ Shu 1:868-69. See also Li Yi immediately below.

Li Yi 李異. In 219 Li Yi led Lu Xun's fleet to hold Liu Bei's forces on the Yangzi while Lü Meng attacked Guan Yu.

In 221 Li Yi and Liu A commanded the forward line of defence on the Gorges. They were driven back by Liu Bei's initial attack, but after his defeat by Lu Xun in the following year they returned to hold the advance position against him. -SGZ Wu 13:1345, Shu 2:890.

In SGZJJ Shu 2:36a, Zhao Yiqing suggests that this may be the same man as the Li Yi above: as a former officer of Liu Zhang, opposed to Liu Bei, he may have found occasion to transfer to Sun Quan.

Li Yin 李音; Nanyang. Eldest son of Liu Tong and the Princess Liu Boyi, sister of Emperor Guangwu, in 42 he succeeded to his father's fief. -HHS 15/5:576.

Li Ying 李膺 [Yuanli 元禮] (d.169); Yingchuan. Son of Li Liang/Yi and grandson of the Grand Commandant Li Xiu, Li Ying was born about 110. He was a reserved man of high standards, and his only friends were Xun Shu and Chen Shi.

During the 130s Li Ying was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. Reforms lately introduced by Zuo Xiong required candidates to be at least forty years old, but it appears Li Ying's abilities allowed an exception. Joining the offices of the Excellency Hu Guang, he was graded First Class and in the mid-140s he was Inspector of Qing province. The local heads of commanderies and county magistrates feared and respected him, and many left office rather than face his enquiries.

Li Ying was then Administrator in Yuyang and in Shu. Ruling with authority and generosity, he gave clear legal decisions, encouraged learning and restored the schooling system. Both Yi province and the imperial court recognised his achievements and ability. He left office on account of his mother's death, but later became Protector of the Wuhuan. When the Xianbi raided the borders Li Ying personally led the counter-attack, inflicted heavy casualties on the enemy, pursued them and brought them to heel. Dismissed for some fault, he established a private academy which attracted thousands of students, but he refused admission to Fan Ling, who later became an ally of the eunuchs and rose to be Grand Commandant.

In 156, as the Xianbi chieftain Tanshihuai began to raid the frontier, Li Ying was recalled to be General on the Liao. Xianbi raids continued, but it is claimed that Li Ying had some success and that he also settled disturbances among the Qiang people further west.

After the destruction of the Liang clan in 159, Li Ying was called to the capital as Intendant of Henan. With great personal prestige, he was an early sponsor of the moral judge Guo Tai, while his investigations brought about the disgrace of Huang Yun and Jin Wenjing. About 164 he was sentenced to convict service after he attacked the influential Yang Yuanqun, who arranged counter accusations, while his colleagues Feng Gun and Liu You were likewise imprisoned for their opposition to the eunuchs. The Director of Retainers Ying Feng argued in their favour, however, and after some months the three men were released.

Li Ying then succeeded Ying Feng as Director of Retainers. He executed the eunuch kinsman Zhang Shuo, and though the eunuchs complained Emperor Huan approved his actions. So the eunuchs were now afraid of Li Ying, while he was vastly admired for his composure in difficult times. The students chanted his praises, his name appeared high on their lists of heroes, and those gentlemen whom he received in person were considered to have "climbed the Dragon Gates" 登龍門 and would rise to greatness.

In 166, probably in the autumn, Li Ying revisited the case of Zhang Cheng, who had arranged for his son to kill a man in anticipation of an amnesty. The actual incident probably took place earlier, when Li Ying was Intendant of Henan, but he now discovered the details of the trick and had the murderer executed. At this point the palace eunuchs had Zhang Cheng's disciple Lao Xiu accuse Li Ying and his fellow-reformists of protecting unruly students at the University and seeking support for their own interests. They accused them of faction 黨; Emperor Huan was furious, and despite protests from the Grand Commandant Chen Fan it was ordered that Li Ying and others should be dismissed and sent to the Northern Prison of the Yellow Gates, controlled by the eunuchs. This was the beginning of the First Faction Incident.

Though a number escaped, the prisoners eventually numbered two hundred. They were held for several months, but there was continuing protest at such treatment of loyal gentlemen, and the eunuchs themselves became concerned that their own associates might be implicated. In the late summer of 167 there was an amnesty and the men were released. They were allowed to return to home, but their names were recorded and they were to be proscribed from office for the rest of their lives. Li Ying retired into the hills, where great numbers of gentlemen came to pay their respects. They regarded the court with contempt, and after Chen Fan was dismissed from office Li Ying was seen as the leader of the reformist community.

At the end of the year Emperor Huan died; his Empress, now Dowager, Dou took the regency for the new ruler Liu Hong, Emperor Ling, while her father Dou Wu controlled the court with Chen Fan as Grand Tutor. Early in 168 Li Ying and many of his associates were recalled to the capital and Li Ying became Steward of the Changle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager. In the autumn, however, Chen Fan and Dou Wu were destroyed by the eunuchs' coup, and Li Ying and his comrades were once more dismissed and proscribed.

There were attempts by sympathisers to bring Li Ying and other senior colleagues back into the circles of power, and continuing agitation among the students at the University, while the eunuch group attempted by repeated edicts to confirm the disgrace of their enemies. Eventually the oath-taking of Zhang Jian and his friends from Shanyang provided an excuse to revive the charge of faction, and on 25 November 169 the young Emperor Ling was persuaded to issue an edict for the arrest of Li Ying and those who had earlier been involved with him: this was the Second Faction Incident.

Though Li Ying was offered opportunity to escape, he refused to take it and accepted responsibility for his actions as an official. He and many others died in prison under torture, their families were exiled and their students and former subordinates were proscribed; the latter exclusion attached even to fathers and brothers. -

HHS 67/57:2191-97* & 2187-88, XC 4:5b; Mather 76: 549, deC 89.

Li Ying 李應; Hanzhong. A cousin of Li Jue, Li Ying had served as a clerk under the minister Zhao Wen. As Zhao Wen remonstrated with Li Jue in 195, Li Jue intended to kill him, but Li Ying dissuaded him. -SGZ 6:184.

Li Yiqi 李意其; Shu. Described as an immortal 仙人, Li Yiqi was believed to have been born in the time of Emperor Wen of Former Han during the second century BC. Consulted by Liu Bei as he prepared to attack Sun Quan in Jing province in 221, Li Yiqi foretold the failure of the expedition and the day of Liu Bei's death. -SGZ Shu 2:891 PC quoting the fourth century Shenxian zhuan.

Li [Yizi] 李移子. A silk-merchant, in the mid-190s Li Yizi became a favourite of the north-western warlord Gongsun Zan and was treated by him like a brother. -SGZ 8:245.

Li Yo 李樂 [i.e. Li Yue] see Li Le 李樂. -Needham 71:277.

Li Yong 李顥 [De'ang 德印]; Ba. In 176 the non-Chinese people of Yizhou commandery rebelled. They captured the Administrator Yong Zhi, and an expedition led by Zhu Gui, head of the Censorate, was unsuccessful. The court was considering abandoning the territory, but Li Yong, who was at that time a clerical officer under the Grand Commandant Chen Dan, put forward a plan to deal with the trouble.

Li Yong was accordingly named Administrator of Yizhou. Joined by the Inspector Pang Zhi, he called up the neighbouring Banshun people to help him attack the rebels. The territory was settled and the captive Yong Zhi was freed.

Li Yong died soon afterwards. -HHS 8:337, 86/76: 2843, 2847, HYGZ 12:219.

Li Yong 李永; Chenliu. A member of the local gentry and a former magistrate, some time in the 180s Li Yong had a vendetta with the Liu clan of a neighbouring county. The self-styled knight-errant Dian Wei resolved to act as a champion of the Liu.

Though Li Yong had an attentive group of guards, Dian Wei pretended to be a merchant and rode up to the gates of his residence in a cart laden with chickens and wine. When the gates were opened he went in with a dagger hidden in his clothing and killed both Li Yong and his wife. -SGZ 18:543-44.

Li You 李由. Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk under

Emperor Guangwu, in 28 Li You was sent to the warlord Qing Feng in Nan commandery with a sealed letter and a summons to surrender. Qin Feng, however, shouted abuse and refused to submit. -HHS 22/12:770.

Li You 李尤 [Boren 伯仁]; Guanghan. Celebrated for his literary skill when still young, Li You was praised by Jia Kui as continuing the tradition of talent from the west established by Sima Xiangru 司馬相如 and Yang Xiong 楊雄 of Former Han. He held appointment in the library of the Eastern Pavilion, and was commissioned by both Emperor Ming and Emperor He to compose rhapsodies, inscriptions and hymns for ceremonial buildings such as the Hall of the Circular Moat. Liu You later transferred to the Orchid Terrace, and after various other appointments he became a Counsellor Remonstrant in the reign of Emperor An.

In 120 Li You was commissioned to work with Liu Zhen, Liu Taotu and Liu Yi on the official history of Later Han, later known as Dongguan Hanji. The history had been started by Ban Gu and others under orders from Emperor Ming as the "Diary of the Jianwu Period" 建武注記. This second instalment contained annals for the period 58 to 106, being the reigns of Emperors Ming, Zhang, He and the infant Shang, together with tables and biographies of leading men, imperial relatives by marriage and noted scholars, and the whole compilation was now entitled Han ji "Record of Han."

In 124 Li You joined the demonstrators led by Lai Li at the palace Gate of the Vast Capital, protesting the dismissal of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. Though they achieved no success, their support was recognised, and after Liu Bao had been brought to the throne at the end of 125 they were rewarded with high office and gained the ren right to nominate their sons as cadet gentlemen. Li You became Chancellor of Le'an.

Li You died at the age of eighty-three. Besides his work on the history, he left twenty-eight pian of poems, rhapsodies, hymns, memorial and inscription writings, together with Qi tan 七歎 "Seven Laments" and Ai dian 哀典 "An Account of Mourning." -HHS 80/70A:2616*, 15/5:591-93, HYGZ 10B:146.

Li You 李幼; Chen. When the false apparition of Zhang Hanzhi q.v. appeared to his sister in a dream, it said that he had bought an ox from Li You. -FSTY 9:71.

Li Yu 李育 I; Zhao. A leader of local gentry, in 23 Li Yu joined Liu Lin and Zhang Can to support the claims of Wang Lang to the imperial title; as Wang Lang took the throne he named Li Yu his Grand Marshal. When Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, attacked Zhao, Li Yu defeated him with a surprise attack, but in the summer Wang Lang was destroyed, and Li Yu is not heard of again. -HHS 1A:14, 12/2,491-92; Bn 59:71.

Li Yu 李育 II. An officer under Gongsun Shu, in 27 Li Yu was sent with troops to assist the warlord Lü Wei in Youfufeng, but they were defeated by Guangwu's general Feng Yi.

In 32 Li Yu was again sent north to aid Wei Ao in Tianshui. For several months he and his colleague Tian Yan joined the attack on Lai Xi's forlorn hope in Lueyang, but they failed to take the city and were driven off when Guangwu's main army arrived. Li Yu and Tian Yan retreated to Shanggui in Tianshui, near Wei Ao's refuge in Xi city of southern Longxi. At the end of the year Wang Yuan came with reinforcements from Gongsun Shu and the sieges were broken.

Li Yu returned to the south and took part in the final campaigns which ended with the death of Gongsun Shu at the end of 36. After their surrender, he and other enemy leaders noted for their ability were given office by Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 13/3:537 & 528 & 544.

There is another reference to a man named Li Yu about this time. HHS 13/3:513 says that in 23 Wang Mang's administrator of Tianshui, whose name is not given, was killed by the Wei 隗 clan and their associates; Bn 54:123. HS 99C:4187, however, says that the name of the administrator was Li Yu, but that he was only "kidnapped" 劫: Dubs 55:456. Though unlikely, it is possible this man survived and made his way south into Gongsun Shu's service.

Li Yu 李育 III see sub Li Yu II above.

Li Yu 李育 IV [Yuanchun 元春]; Youfufeng. As a young man Li Yu studied the Gongyang interpretation of Chunqiu, gaining deep understanding of the text together with a broad knowledge of the classics. He was celebrated in the University. His fellow-countryman Ban Gu recommended him to Liu Cang, brother of Emperor Ming who was King of Dongping and also General of Agile Cavalry, and through this connection Li Yu became favoured by the nobility about the capital. He was invited to local office by his commandery and by the provincial government, but when he arrived he pleaded illness and left again.

Li Yu became a private teacher, with several hundred students. He read widely among works of the Old Text tradition, including Zuo zhuan, but regarded them as superficial expositions of the deep intentions of the sage Confucius. Believing that the debates of Chen Yuan and Fan Sheng in the previous generation had relied too heavily upon prognostications and apocrypha, and paid insufficient attention to reality, he composed a discussion in forty-one topics on "Errors in Zuo zhuan" 難左傳義 Nan Zuo zhuan yi.

Nominated as Sincere and Upright by the minister Ma Liao in 76, Li Yu was appointed a Consultant. He then became an Academician at the Imperial University, and was a leader of the opposition to Emperor Zhang's patronage of Jia Kui and his Old Text interests. In 79 he took part in the celebrated conference in the White Tiger Hall, which formally confirmed the primacy of New Text teachings.

Liu Yu was later Director of the Imperial Secretariat, but when the Ma family was disgraced in 83 he suffered for his earlier association and was dismissed. He was appointed again a few years later, this time as a Palace Attendant, and died in that office. -HHS 79/69B:2582*; Tjan 49:156-163.

Li Yu 李育 V. After Li Yu was attacked by a man, he gathered retainers and avenged himself, presumably by killing the offender. He was arrested and liable to be executed, but his elder brother Li Hong committed suicide in his stead. We are told that the local magistrate was deeply affected by such self-sacrifice, and it seems likely that Li Yu was allowed to go free. -XC 6:12b-13a.

Li Yu 李餘; Hanzhong. Li Yu's elder brother killed a man and then fled. Their father was dead and their mother was liable to execution in the murderer's place. Li Yu, then age thirteen, went to offer himself as a substitute. Though he was refused because he was too young, he nonetheless killed himself. The affair was reported to the county magistrate, to the commandery and then to the throne. The emperor made a donation for the funeral and Li Yu's portrait was painted on the wall of the local yamen. -HYGZ 10C:175.

Li Yu 李圉. Li Yu was a younger brother of the Excellency Li Gu. In 147, as Li Gu was about to be executed, he wrote Li Yu a letter which is recorded in SJZ 33:5a.

Li Yu 李禹 [Jishi 季士]; Jianwei. Having served as an Assistant Officer in Yi province, Li Yu was recommended Filial and Incorrupt. He became a county magistrate in Ba commandery and in Hanzhong and was then a Commandant in Charge of Agriculture, responsible for agricultural colonies.

As Assistant in Youfufeng in the mid-150s, Li Yu arranged major roadwork in the mountains, which was commemorated with a stele. -Nagata 94:120.

Li Yu 李玉 (d.213); Yuzhang. A leader of bandits in the east of Poyang, Li Yu was destroyed by He Qi in 213. -SGZ Wu 15:1379.

Li Yuan 李元; Nanyang. A wealthy gentleman, Li Yuan and his family died of the plague about 40, leaving only his infant son Li Xu. The household slaves divided his goods amongst themselves, but Li Xu was rescued by the loyal Li Shan. -HHS 81/71:2679-80, XC 5:14b. [XC describes Li Yuan as a man of Jiyang 濟陽, a county in Chenliu, but HHS 81/71, reading 南 for 濟, appears the more likely version.]

Li Yuan 李元. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Li Yuan took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county marquisate in Runan.

In 127, after Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang, he and Li Yuan and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in the following year the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital. Li Yuan was appointed a Commandant of Cavalry.

Later Li Yuan was among a group of eunuchs associated with the former wet-nurse Song E. Found guilty in 137 of corruption and making false accusations, they were all sent out to their fiefs and their pensions were reduced by a quarter. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Li Yuan 李元; Guanghan. Father of the Lady Li Ping, after her husband Yang Wen died Li Yuan wanted her to marry again. She refused, and attempted to drown herself in protest. -HYGZ 10B:153.

Li Yuan 李元; Zangke. A local gentleman in the early 160s, Li Yuan got drunk with the Inspector Hou Can, brother of the palace eunuch Hou Lan. The two men quarrelled, at first light-heartedly, but Hou Can then accused Li Yuan of blasphemy and had him killed. -XC 3:6a.

Li Yuan 李元 miswritten for Li Chong 李充 of Chenliu. -XC 6:1a.

Li Yue 李樂 see Li Le 李樂.

Li Yun 李暉 (d.24). As the army of Liu Xiu, future

Emperor Guangwu, was advancing through Changshan to attack Wang Lang, he halted at the city of He. A member of the powerful Su family opened the gates and invited Wang Lang's officer Li Yun to bring troops and surprise the Han. Liu Xiu's officer Geng Chun, however, discovered the plot, fought with Li Yun, defeated and killed him. -HHS 21/11:762.

Li Yun 李雲 [Xingzu 行祖] (d.159); Qinghe/Ganling. In 159 Li Yun was magistrate of Boma county in Dong commandery. Like many members of the court and the bureaucracy, he resented the generous treatment which Emperor Huan showed to the eunuchs Shan Chao, Zuo Guan and others who had assisted him to overthrow Liang Ji, and he also objected to the favours shown to the relatives of the new Empress Deng [or Bo] Mengnü. Taking occasion from a number of avalanches and other portents, Li Yun sent in an open memorial, with copies to the Excellencies, criticising the emperor's policy.

The memorial is preserved in HHS 57/47. It is outspoken and eloquent, but quite inappropriate for such a junior official. At one point, moreover, Li Yun cited words attributed to Confucius, that "to be an emperor is to be a judge" 帝者諦也, then asserted that the ruler's laxity in granting rewards showed that "the Emperor does not wish to act as a judge."

Emperor Huan was furious, and he had Li Yun arrested and examined by torture. Many senior officials pleaded for leniency, and the eunuch Guan Ba, who was in charge of the interrogation, argued that Li Yun was no more than a silly fellow from the country and was not worth punishing. The comment about the emperor and the judge, however, had touched the sovereign to the quick, and he would not relent. Li Yun died in prison.

Another junior officer, Du Chong, sympathised with Li Yun and asked to share his fate. His wish was granted.

The deaths of Li Yun and Du Chong marked the end of whatever honeymoon period the new regime of imperial personal rule might have hoped for, and their sad fates were frequently cited by the Confucianist reformers against Emperor Huan and his eunuch allies.

Many years later Jia Cong, Governor of Ji province, presented sacrifices at Li Yun's tomb and set up a stele in his honour. -HHS 57/47:1851-52*, SJZ 9:26b-27a; deC 89:18-20.

Li Yun 李允; Jiangxia. Well-treated by Sun Jiao, Sun Quan's commander in the west about 215, Li Yun was a devoted officer. As an aide responsible for dealings with civilians, he later served Sun Jiao's brother Huan with similar commitment. -SGZ Wu 6:1207-08.

Li Yusheng 李羽生, the Lady. A female slave in the household of a former Tutor to Liu Yan, King of Zhongshan, about 95 she was taken as a secondary wife 小妻 by Liu Dang, King of Lecheng. -HHS 50/40:1672.

Li Zan 李讚 see sub Li Hu 李護.

Li Zan 李瓚 or Li Kui 珪; Yingchuan. Li Zan was a son of Li Ying. HHS 67/57:2197 and YSS:17a-b say that he became Chancellor of Dongping, and that as he was dying he urged Li Xuan and his other sons to follow Cao Cao in the coming civil war, even though Zhang Miao was a close friend and there were family connections to Yuan Shu. The family took his advice and so survived the troubles. XTS 72A:2473, however, ascribes all this to Li Zan's brother Li Jin and describes Li Xuan as a son of Li Jin.

Li Ze 李則; Chenliu. In the 150s Li Ze accompanied Cai Yong as a student to the imperial capital. -HHSJ 60/50B:2140 Hui Dong.

Li Zhang 李章 [Digong 第公]; Henei. A man of high official family, Li Zhang taught the Yan interpretation of Chunqiu in the New Text tradition; he also held local office in the commandery and the province. When Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came to Henei in 23 he invited Li Zhang to join his staff. Li Zhang accompanied him on his various campaigns, and when Guangwu took the throne in 25 he appointed him a county magistrate in Dong commandery. Zhao Kang, member of a leading local family, had gathered a large following, set up an encampment, and plundered the people. Li Zhang invited him to a banquet, then killed him and a hundred of his men, and went on to destroy the remainder of his following in camp. The county became peaceful.

In 29 Li Zhang was transferred to be Administrator of Qiansheng, a territory lately under the control of the warlord Zhang Bu. He again put down resistance with a firm hand, but this time he was accused of excess and was sent to prison for a time. A few months later he was appointed to the Imperial Censorate and was then made Administrator of Langye, which had also been part of Zhang Bu's holding.

When Xiachang Si, head of a leading family in neighbouring Beihai, rose in rebellion and kidnapped the Administrator Ju Xing, Li Zhang raised a thousand men to go to the rescue. One of his clerks protested that it was forbidden for an Administrator to act outside his own territory, while Beihai was even in another province. Taking up his sword, Li Zhang swore that he would rather be executed than fail to assist a colleague in need. He attacked the rebels' stronghold, sent volunteers to burn the gates, killed Xiachang Si and captured three hundred of his followers, then restored Ju Xing to his position. He also collected five hundred head of cattle and horses, which he distributed among his troops. The matter was reported to the throne, but no action was taken for his breach of regulations.

Li Zhang was later found guilty of presenting false reports on arable land and population [see sub Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming], but because of his previous good work he was sentenced only to two year's convict service and was in fact released after only a few weeks. Recalled to office, he became ill and died.

Fan Ye classified Li Zhang as a Stern Official 酷吏. -HHS 77/67:2492-93*; Bn 59:180, Bn 79:134-139.

Li Zhang 李章; Longxi. In the autumn of 86 Li Zhang was a commandery officer in charge of beacon fires 督烽掾 when a raiding party of the Qiang entered the frontier. Li Zhang pursued them and captured the chieftain Haoyu. -HHS 87/77:2881.

Li Zhang 李張 see Li Chang 李偃. -FSTY 5:37-38.

Li Zhao 李朝 see Li Chao 李朝.

Li Zhao 李昭; Jiujiang or Runan. When Xun Shu was a county magistrate he discovered and appointed Li Zhao to local office. Xun Shu served in Jiujiang and in Runan, and it is not possible to say which territory Li Zhao came from; he is not mentioned again. -ZF:8b, SGZ 10:307.

Li Zhao 李昭 [Boming 伯明] (d.118). Li Zhao became a gentleman cadet, served in the county administration of Luoyang, and later held office in Jianwei. He was admired for his loyalty and filial piety, and a stele was erected to his memory. -LHJSJ 14:21a-b, Beitu 1:43.

This may be the same man as the Li Zhao of Yingchuan who was the son of Li Hu and brother of the Excellency Li Wu.

Li Zhen 禮震 [Zhongwei 仲威] (23-?); Pingyuan. In 39 the Excellency Ouyang Xi was due to be executed on multiple charges of bribery. Li Zhen, at that time aged seventeen, came in bonds to a county office in Henei and presented a petition. Emphasising the importance of Ouyang Xi to the world of scholarship, he offered to die in his stead. The gesture was unavailing, for Ouyang Xi was already dead, but Emperor Guangwu did grant him posthumous honours and, admiring Li Zhen's sense of honour, appointed him a gentleman cadet. Later, however, Li Zhen was himself found guilty of some fault; he became chief of stables at the court of Huaiyang. -HHS 79/69A:2556, XC 5:9a.

Li Zhen 李禎; Beidi. In the early 190s Li Zhen was a Palace Attendant at Chang'an. The general Li Jue insisted upon attending court armed with knives and swords, and he was concerned that the emperor's attendants did the same. Li Zhen, a fellow-countryman who had some old acquaintance with him, reassured Li Jue that it was no more than established custom. -SGZ 6:184.

Li Zhen 李禎; Shanyang. Son of Li Dian, about 206 he succeeded to his fief. -SGZ 18:534.

Li Zheng 李政; Yingchuan. In 175 Li Zheng was Assistant to Zhang Chong the Administrator of Jiyin. He joined a group of local gentlemen to set up a stele at the temple of the sage Emperor Yao 堯. -LS 1:5a-7b.

Li Zheng 李整 (d.195); Jiyin. Son of Li Qian, after his father's death in 194 he took over his troops and raised more men to defeat Lü Bu's officers Xue Lan and Li Feng. He joined Cao Cao for the reconquest of the rest of Yan province and was then named Inspector of Qing province. Soon afterwards, however, Li Zheng died. -SGZ 18:533.

Li Zhi 李志; Yingchuan. XTS 72A:2473 describes Li Zhi as a son of Li Jin and a grandson of Li Ying.

Li Zhong 李忠 [Zhongdu 仲都 or Zhongqing 仲卿] (d.43); Donglai. Since his father was Commandant of a kingdom, about 5 AD Li Zhong was given privileged ren appointment as a gentleman cadet at the court of Emperor Ping of Former Han. He was noted for his courtesy and fine conduct.

Li Zhong then became Commandant of Xinbo 信博 [Xindu commandery of Han] under the government of Wang Mang. He was respected and trusted by the people, and after the restoration of Han under the Gengshi Emperor in 23 he was confirmed in his appointment by the regional commissioner Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu.

That winter the pretender Wang Lang took the imperial title and the greater part of the north accepted his claim. Ren Guang the Administrator of Xindu, however, remained loyal to Han, and Li Zhong joined him in raising troops, welcoming Liu Xiu and assisting in a counter-attack. As Ren Guang was named Chief General on the Left, Li Zhong received parallel appointment on the Right and was enfeoffed as a marquis of title; to confirm the appointment Liu Xiu took off his own insignia and tied the seal and ribbon to Li Zhong's waist.

Early in the campaign Li Zhong was praised for not joining in the plunder of a surrendered city in Zhongshan, and Liu Xiu gave him his own fine horse and special robes of honour. Soon afterwards, as the army was besieging the capital of Julu, Wang Lang sent a detachment against Xindu and Ma Chong, member of a leading family in the city, opened the gates and let the enemy in. Li Zhong's mother and his wife were captured, and the rebels sent members of Li Zhong's household to call on him to change sides. On the contrary, Li Zhong arrested and killed Ma Chong's younger brother, who had been serving as a colonel in his command. When other officers expressed shock at such ferocity, Li Zhong explained that he did not want his loyalty to be questioned.

In admiration, Liu Xiu gave him permission to leave his ranks and go back to Xindu, and he offered 100,000 cash so he might ransom his kinsmen and clients. Li Zhong refused. After an unsuccessful attack by Ren Guang, Xindu city was recaptured by troops of the Gengshi Emperor led by Xie Gong, and Li Zhong's family were rescued unharmed. Li Zhong was made Acting Administrator, and he executed several hundred members of leading families who were supporters of Wang Lang.

Ren Guang then returned to be Administrator and Li Zong was Commandant once more, but he also received a substantive fief, with a county in Zhuo commandery and revenue from 3,000 households. Later that year he was named General of the Household for All Purposes, and in 28 he took part in the campaigns against Pang Meng and Dong Xian in the south of present-day Shandong.

In 30 Li Zhong was appointed Administrator of Danyang. Some pockets of trouble remained from the civil war, but he soon settled these, combining rewards for surrender with fierce punishment for recalcitrance. Because the indigenous Yue people of the region had no concern for learning, while their customs, notably marriage, were alien to the Chinese, Li Zhong established schools and emphasised Confucian rituals. He held ceremonies in spring and autumn to honour the aged, and gave local office to men who knew the classics. His rule was successful and popular, there was a vast increase in cultivated land, and tens of thousands of refugees came to settle. In 38 the Excellencies at court assessed his administration as Number One 第一 in the empire.

Li Zhong was later transferred to Yuzhang commandery, but left office because he suffered from rheumatism in the damp climate. He was invited to the imperial capital, and died there in 43. Recognising him as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had Li Zhong's portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 22/12:789-91*, 21/11; Bn 76:26, Bn 59:74-75, Bn 79: 83.

Li [Zhong-?] 李仲-; Yingchuan. A local scholar, he was a teacher of Jing Luan. -HYGZ 10C:174. Zhong was evidently the first character of this man's style, but the present text of HYGZ lacks the second character.

Li [Zhongzeng] 李中曾. Assistant in the Dependent State of Shu commandery, in 164 he joined the Commandant Xin Tongda in the construction of an important bridge. -LS 15:4b-7b.

Li Zhu 李助 [Wengjun 翁君]; Guanghan. A master of magic and skilled in medicine, Li Zhu compiled Jingfang songshuo 經方頌說 "Eulogy and Explanation of the Classical Arts." His reputation matched that of his fellow-countryman Guo Yu. -HYGZ 10C:175.

Li Zhuan 李譔 [Qinzhong 欽仲 or Zhongqin 仲欽]; Guanghan. Son of Li Ren, Li Zhuan succeeded to the tradition of his father and of Yin Mo in the study of New Text Confucianism, as opposed to the more eclectic interpretations of Zheng Xuan. He acquired wide learning in the classics and other philosophical schools, while he was also skilled in divination, medicine, mathematics and mechanics. His opinions became similar to those presented by Wang Su of Wei.

Li Zhuan was a clerical officer under Liu Bei as Governor of Yi province and then a member of his imperial Secretariat. He held office at court under Li Shan and was appointed to tutor the Heir Liu Xuan 劉璿. -SGZ Shu 12:1026-27, HYGZ 10B:176.

Li Zi 李茲 or Li Ci 慈 [Jigong 季公] (d.147); Hanzhong. Son of Li Gu, Li Zi held office about Luoyang. In 147, as Li Gu realised that he would be destroyed by Liang Ji, he ordered Li Zi and his brothers back to their home country. Li Zi and Li Ji, however, were executed by local authorities in Yi province, and Li Xie was the only male of the family to escape. -HHS 63/53:2088-89.

Li [Zichun] 李子春; Henei. Formerly Chancellor of Langye, during the late 30s Li Zichun was head of a powerful local family in Henei, deeply resented by the people. When Zhao Xi was appointed as magistrate, he immediately arrested Li Zichun's grandsons on a charge of murder. They committed suicide, and Zhao Xi arrested and questioned Li Zichun himself and intended to kill him.

Many people in the capital appealed on Li Zichun's behalf, but without effect, and the King of Zhao Liu Liang, then on his deathbed, appealed directly to his nephew Emperor Guangwu. The emperor initially refused his plea, but when Liu Liang died soon afterwards he gave orders for Li Zichun's release. -HHS 26/16:913-14; Ch'ü 72:458.

Li Zidu 力子都 or Diao Zidu 刁子都 (d.24); Donghai. Between 15 and 18 Li Zidu emerged as a leader of local bandits, largely recruited from refugees displaced by the flooding of the Yellow River over the previous ten years. His group was for some time associated with the Red Eyebrows [see sub Fan Chong], but when the main horde moved west Li Zidu remained in Yan and Xu provinces on the North China plain. As the Gengshi Emperor established his new government in 23, Li Zidu offered submission. He was named Governor of Xu province, but was soon afterwards murdered by his own followers. -HHS 21/11:753; Dubs 55:379, Bn 59:41.

Li [Ziyun] 李子雲; Pingyuan: see Li Tan 李曇.

Li [Zizheng] 李子政; Taiyuan. A fellow-countryman of Guo Tai, Li Zizheng was sponsored by him and became well-known and respected. -HHS 68/58:2231.

Lian Fan 廉范/範 [Shudu 叔度]; Jingzhao. Lian Fan was descended from a long line of officials, and many of his forebears had served on the frontier. His great-grandfather Lian Bao 褒 had been a chief general at the end of Former Han, and his grandfather Dan 丹 was Governor of Yi province and a general under Wang Mang [QHx:237]. Lian Dan died in battle against the Red Eyebrows in 22, and Lian Fan's father died in the far west during the civil war. Lian Fan and his family were exiled there, but after the fall of Gongsun Shu in 36 they were able to return to their home country.

About 40, at the age of fifteen Lian Fan went to bring his father's body from the west. Zhang Mu the Administrator of Shu commandery, who had served under Lian Dan, offered assistance, but Lian Fan arranged the transport with his own retainers. As they were crossing a river their boat struck a rock and sank. Lian Fan clasped the coffin, and his attendants searched for him with grappling hooks and saved him. It is implied Lian Fan held onto the coffin because of filial piety, but Bielenstein, more cynically, suggests he was seeking to save himself with something which might float. Still refusing outside aid, Lian Fan returned with his father's body and fulfilled the funerary rites.

Before he left, he had given a thousand acres of good land to the family retainer Mao Zhong. Mao Zhong died before Lian Fan came back, but left instructions in his will for his son Mao Shu to return the property. When Mao Shu sought to do so, Lian Fan insisted he keep it, for he believed that the constancy shown by Mao Shu and his father was more important than his family's ownership: the loyalty of men was more important than the possession of things.

Lian Fan then studied at Luoyang under Xue Han, Academician for the Han school of the Classic of Poetry, and became well known. Because of his family's long connection with the frontier, Lian Fan was eligible for nomination to office not only in his native Jingzhao but also in Longxi. Both administrations invited him, but he did not accept until about 60, when Deng Rong the Administrator of Longxi sent a most courteous request and Lian Fan agreed to become his Officer of Merit.

When Deng Rong was soon afterwards falsely accused by the provincial authorities, Lian Fan realised that the matter was serious. He took leave on grounds of illness, and though Deng Rong resented his departure, he in fact went to Luoyang, changed his name, and obtained a post as prison officer at the Ministry of Justice. By this means, when Deng Rong was brought to prison Lian Fan was able to look after him. Deng Rong did not recognise him, and when he remarked how his jailer resembled his former officer, Lian Fan made no response. Then Deng Rong was released, but he became extremely ill, and Lian Fan cared for him. He died without knowing the identity of his good Samaritan, and Lian Fan escorted his body back to Nanyang.

Lian Fan was later appointed to clerical office at the capital. In 71 his former teacher Xue Han was implicated in the alleged treason of Liu Ying the King of Chu and died in prison. Other former students were frightened, but Lian Fan attended his body. He was reported and called before Emperor Ming, who accused him of involvement with a traitor. Lian Fan replied that regardless of Xue Han's faults, he owed him a personal duty. The emperor, somewhat mollified, asked if he was connected to Lian Bao and Lian Dan, and when Lian Fan explained that they were his great-grandfather and his grandfather Emperor Ming expressed admiration for his courage and granted him pardon.

Now well known, Lian Fan was nominated as Abundant Talent, and after some months in various offices he became Administrator of Yunzhong. In the winter of 73 a strong force of Northern Xiongnu ravaged the frontier and entered his territory. According to precedent, if a raiding force numbered more than five thousand men, the administrator should seek assistance from neighbouring commanderies. Lian Fan's officers wished to do so, but Lian Fan would not agree and led out his men. His soldiers were outnumbered, but night fell as they approached the enemy and Lian Fan had each man tie two torch-brands together to form a cross, then hold one end and set light to the other three. Seeing so many lights, the Xiongnu thought his numbers far greater than they were, and they became frightened. They planned to retreat at dawn, but Lian Fan struck first. They killed some hundreds, the raiders turned on one another in confusion, and another thousand died. The Xiongnu dared not approach again.

Lian Fan then served as Administrator of several commanderies on the northern frontier, in each place maintaining a firm regime and extending good influence over the people, and about 80 he was appointed to Shu. The people there were quarrelsome, but Lian Fan refused to be influenced by gossip or slander. Many admired his good government so greatly that they named their children after him.

Chengdu the capital was crowded, with houses close together, and there was an old regulation which prohibited people working at night because of the danger of fire from their lamps. Naturally enough, the rule was ignored, and fires broke out daily. Lian Fan ended the proscription, but insisted there be adequate supplies of water kept for emergency. People were delighted, and a song was composed in praise of his lateral thinking.

After several years in Shu, Lian Fan was dismissed for some fault and retired home. He had gained land and wealth during his time at the frontier, but he gave it away to less prosperous friends and kinsmen.

When Emperor Zhang died in 88, Lian Fan went to pay respects at his tomb, southeast of Luoyang. On the road he encountered the local official Yan Lin of Lujiang, who was coming to the capital with a formal message of condolence. Yan Lin's horse had died and he could not move his carriage. Lian Fan ordered one of his escort to get down from his horse and give it to Yan Lin, then went on his way without giving his name. When Yan Lin had finished his errand he wanted to return the horse but did not know the owner. He asked around, and was told that Lian Fan could act in such a way, and he had been there at the time. Yan Lin had also heard of Lian Fan, and he duly returned the horse: such was Lian Fan's reputation.

Disapproving of the government of the regent Dowager Dou and her brother Dou Xian, Lian Fan stayed in retirement. He died at home about 90. He had a substantial career, but he was chiefly remembered as a man of quick wit and fine spirit. -HHS 31/21:1101-04*, 89/79:2949, HHJ 9:113-15; Bn 54:66-67.

Lian Fan 廉翻. Administrator of Liaoxi in the time of Emperor Ling, Lian Fan had a dream in which the spirit of the legendary hermit Shuqi 叔齊, originally a native of the region, told him that his coffin was adrift on the sea and Lian Fan was commissioned to arrange its reburial. Next morning there was indeed a floating coffin, and Lian Fan had a tomb made for it. Some of his attendants scoffed at the story, but they all suddenly dropped dead. -SJZ 14:20b-21a.

Lian Pin 廉品, a Consultant during the last years of Han, left a collection of literary and scholarly works. -Sui shu 35:1058.

Lianchang 零昌 (d.117); Qiang. Son of Dianlian, in 112 he succeeded his father as nominal leader of the Qiang rebellion against the Han, with headquarters at Lingzhou 靈州 by the Yellow River in Beidi. Lianchang was too young to exercise authority, however, and so another man of the tribe, Langmo, took charge of strategy. The new regime, however, lacked the authority of Dianlian, and though they made some offensive moves and gained a few victories against the armies of Han the fortunes of the rebellion declined thereafter.

In 116 the general Deng Zun came from the north with ten thousand horsemen of the Southern Xiongnu to raid Lianchang's headquarters, killing over eight hundred of the enemy and another raid sent from the south by Ren Shang killed Lianchang's wife and children and seized his insignia.

In the following year, as the Han armies continued their pressure, Lianchang was assassinated by agents of Ren Shang. -HHS 87/77:2888-91; deC 84:106-110 [on the pronunciation of the character 零 (normally ling), see deC 84:471 note 14].

Liang 梁, Empress of Emperor Huan: see the Lady Liang Nüying.

Liang 梁, Empress of Emperor Shun: see the Lady Liang Na.

Liang 梁, the Lady I (d.83); Anding. Second daughter of Liang Song 竦 and younger sister of the Lady Liang Yi, she entered the harem of Emperor Zhang in 77, at the same time as her younger sister, and also became an Honoured Lady. In 83 the Liang family was attacked by the Dou, and the Lady Liang and her sister both died. See the entry immediately below.

Liang 梁, the Lady II (62-83); Anding. Youngest daughter of Liang Song 竦 and sister of the Lady Liang Yi, after the early death of their mother she and her two sisters were brought up by their aunt the Princess Liu Yiwang, daughter of Emperor Guangwu. In 77, when she was sixteen, the Lady and her second sister, the Lady Liang I, were selected into the harem of Emperor Zhang. No doubt aided by the influence of the princess, they were appointed Honoured Ladies, senior concubines ranking next after the empress, and in 79 the Lady gave birth to Liu Zhao, future Emperor He. The Empress Dou was barren, and there was old connection between the Dou and the Liang families of the northwest. The empress therefore arranged that in 82 the infant Liu Zhao, future Emperor He, was named as Heir, replacing Liu Qing the son of the Honoured Lady Song.

The Liang group were delighted at the prospects of honour and power which this offered, but their ambitions were a threat to the empress and her family, and in 83 the Lady's father Liang Song was subject to an anonymous denunciation, no doubt arranged by the empress or her relatives. Liang Song was executed, and both Honoured Ladies "died of grief" 以憂死; they may have killed themselves or have been actively assisted.

The whole affair was concealed within the palace, and the Empress Dou brought up the child as her own. It is said that his true maternity was forgotten, and that Emperor He did not know the identity of his mother. Though the power of the Dou clan was destroyed by the emperor and his eunuch allies in 92, it was not until the death of the Empress, now Dowager, in 97 that the Liang family ventured to present their case to the throne.

Liang Hu, nephew of Liang Song 竦, had his cousin Liang Shan claim the rights due to the late concubine as mother to the ruler. The petition came to the Grand Commandant Zhang Pu, who had it investigated, found it to be accurate, and reported his findings to the emperor. Amazed and upset, Emperor He asked what he should do. Zhang Pu urged him to follow traditional principles and demonstrate a proper sense of kinship by awarding posthumous honours to his mother and restoring the fortunes of her family. Emperor He accepted his advice, and the Lady Liang was granted title as an empress and was reburied in full regalia.

The Lady's eldest sister Liang Yi also sent in an account of how the Dou had ruined the emperor's mother and his grandfather, and forced their relatives into exile. The emperor restored them to favour and the fortunes of the family were greater than ever before. -HHS 10A:416-17, 34/24:1172-74.

Liang 梁, the Lady III; Anding. Daughter of Liang Yong and a sister of Liang Shang, in 128 she was recruited into the harem of Emperor Shun in company with Liang Shang's daughter Liang Na. Liang Na was then aged thirteen and the emperor was one year older. This second Lady Liang, not so young, may have served as escort and guardian to her niece in the dangerous milieu of the palace. She is not referred to again. -HHS 10B:438.

Liang 梁, the Lady IV. The Lady was the mother of Sun Shou, wife of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji. About 150 Liang Ji appealed to her to dissuade Sun Shou from reporting to the throne that he had taken as his mistress the Lady You Tongji, formerly a concubine of Emperor Shun. The matter would have raised a scandal, but the Lady Liang was able to use her influence on her daughter so that she remained silent. -HHS 34/24:1180.

The personal name of the Lady's husband is not recorded, but we know her maiden surname because we are told that Liang Ji/Gi was Sun Shou's maternal uncle. The blood, as opposed to marital, connection between the two families Liang, if any, is not known. -HHS 10B:444.

Liang 梁, Empress of Emperor Shun, see the Lady Liang Na.

Liang 梁, Empress of Emperor Huan, see the Lady Liang Nüying.

Liang Anguo 梁安國; Anding. Son of Liang Tang, he succeeded to his fief and was a Palace Attendant about 123. Soon afterwards, very likely as part of the intrigues of the consort Yan clan and their ally Geng Bao, Liang Anguo was found guilty of some crime. He was dismissed from his appointment, and all other members of the family in office were likewise removed. -HHS 34/24:1175.

Liang Bing 梁並; Anding. A kinsman of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, Liang Bing was Emissary to the Xiongnu in 140. When the Xiongnu chieftains Wusi and Che'niu attacked Meiji, residence of the Southern Shanyu in Xihe, Liang Bing brought troops to aid the General on the Liao Ma Xu. After the enemy had been driven back, the court sent to reprimand the elderly Shanyu Xiuli for his failure to maintain order among his subjects. Xiuli came to apologise to Liang Bing, but Liang Bing left office soon afterwards on account of illness; his successor Chen Gui drove the Shanyu to suicide.

Later, as Administrator of Zuopingyi, Liang Bing treated the non-Chinese people with kindness, and as the second great Qiang rebellion drew to its close in 145 he received the surrender of more than fifty thousand households from the Li'nan and Hunu tribes. Because of his relationship to the General-in-Chief, Liang Bing was granted the special reward of a county fief. -HHS 89/79:2960, 87/77:2897.

Liang Boning 梁伯寧 (d.184); Yingchuan. A local leader of Yellow Turbans in 184, Liang Boning was defeated and killed by Fu Xie. -HHS 58/48:1875.

Liang [Boy] 梁伯玉; Anding. Son of Liang Ji and his concubine the Lady You Tongji, when Liang Ji's wife Sun Shou had her son Liang Yin destroy the Lady's family, Liang Ji became afraid for the child and hid him away in a concealed room between walls. He is not heard of again. -HHS 34/24:1180.

Liang Buyi 梁不疑; Anding. Son of Liang Shang and younger brother of Liang Ji, Liang Buyi was a keen scholar. After his sister became the consort of Emperor Shun in 132, Liang Buyi was made a Palace Attendant and had good contact with the eunuch Cao Jie, an influential ally of the family within the palace.

When Liang Shang died in 141 and Liang Ji succeeded him as General-in-Chief, Liang Buyi took over as Intendant of Henan. The appointment maintained family control of the capital district, and though the censorial commissioner Zhang Gang memorialised in 142 against the favouritism which had brought him to office, Liang Buyi was generally respected as a good judge of men.

In 147, after Emperor Huan had been brought to the throne, Liang Buyi was enfeoffed with a county. Liang Ji, however, was jealous of him, and concerned that he might become a focus for opposition to his rule. He killed a number of his clients and set spies on him, and when Ma Rong and Tian Ming, Administrators-elect of Nan and Jiangxia, went to pay their respects to Liang Buyi they were flogged and exiled to Shuofang. Liang Ji later had Liang Buyi transfer to be Minister of the Household so that his own son Liang Yin might take his place. For his part, Liang Buyi disapproved of Liang Ji's extravagance, and in 152 he retired into private life.

By the time Emperor Huan planned his coup against Liang Ji in 159, Liang Buyi was dead. The eunuch Tang Heng, however, recalled that when Liang Buyi was Intendant of Henan the eunuchs Shan Chao and Zuo Guan had called upon him but failed to show proper respect. Liang Buyi promptly arrested their brothers, and held them in prison until Shan Chao and Zuo Guan apologised. The incident had taken place some ten years earlier, but it was reason for the two eunuchs to dislike the Liang family, and they were recruited to the emperor's group of conspirators. -HHS 34/24:1175-86; Ch'ü 72:477, deC 89:286.

At HHSJJ 36/26:1319-20, the modern commentator Hui Dong argues that Liang Yin was the same person as Liang Buyi, but Su Yu observes that this is not correct.

Liang Da 梁大 or Liang Tai 太. An officer in the service of Liu Bei, about 210 he held an advance position as chief of a county in Nan commandery facing Cao Cao's commander Yue Jin in Xiangyang. Yue Jin defeated Liang Da and drove him away. -SGZ 17:521.

Liang Di 梁翟; Anding. Youngest son of Liang Song 竦, when their father was executed through the intrigues of the Empress Dou and her family in 83, Liang Di and his brothers Tang and Yong were exiled to Jiuzhen in the far south.

After the death of the Lady Dou in 97 the family was restored to favour. As the brothers returned from exile in the following year they passed through Changsha and called at the estate of Dou Huai/Xiang, brother of the late Dou Xian, who had been sent away from court after the fall of his family in 92. They forced him to commit suicide.

Arriving at Luoyang, each of the brothers was enfeoffed as a marquis, with estates of five thousand households and the rank of Specially Advanced, allowing them to reside at the capital. They were also awarded quantities of landed property, mansions, slaves, horses and carriages, as well as troops of guards armed with crossbows. The fortunes of the Liang were greater than ever before. -HHS 34/24:1172-74.

Liang Feng 梁諷; Beidi. Having held office as a provincial Inspector, in 89 Liang Feng was named a major in the army gathered by Dou Xian to attack the Northern Xiongnu. Before the expedition set forth Liang Feng was sent to present gold and silk to the Northern Shanyu, as a sign of the authority and splendour of Han and a means to attract defectors. He then set camp on the frontier, and ten thousand Xiongnu came to surrender to his good will, and because they feared the power of China.

After Yan Pan and his western detachment defeated the Shanyu at Jiluo Mountain, Dou Xian sent Wu Si and Liang Feng to present the Shanyu with a gift of gold brocade and an invitation to surrender. The Shanyu agreed, but as they were returning he heard that the army had withdrawn. Still in the Altai ranges, he decided to wait. He sent a younger brother as envoy and hostage, but Dou Xian insisted he come in person. Liang Feng and Ban Gu were sent on a second embassy, but in the mean time the Emissary Geng Tan and the Southern prince Shizi attacked the Northern headquarters: by the time the envoys arrived the Shanyu had fled. When they reported this, Dou Xian recommended that the Northern court was too weak to deal with and should be utterly destroyed.

Later, Liang Feng displeased Dou Xian in some way. He was sentenced to convict service in Wuwei, where the administrator followed Dou Xian's intentions by having him killed. After the Dou were overthrown in 92, Emperor He recalled how Liang Feng had suffered false accusation, and he appointed his son Qin as a gentleman cadet. -HHS 47/37:1591, 23/13:817; deC 84:272.

Liang Feng 梁豐; Henan. In 123 the Internuncio Dan Song proposed that the official Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar be changed to accord with the apocrypha. Liang Feng, evidently a private scholar, argued instead for restoration of the Taichu 太初 [Grand Beginning] system of Former Han, abandoned forty years earlier. After extensive debate, the Sifen system was maintained. -HHS 92/2:3034.

Liang Fu 諒輔 [Hanru 漢儒]; Guanghan. When Liang Fu was a local officer in his commandery there was a great drought. The Administrator prayed for rain over several days, but without result. Then Liang Fu built a bonfire and swore to Heaven that unless rain fell by midday he would burn himself alive to expiate any sins of the community. He mounted the pyre and set light to it, but as he did so clouds gathered and rain fell.

Liang Fu acquired a great reputation for public spirit. -HHS 81/71:2694-95*, HYGZ 10B:150.

Liang Gan 梁乾; Anding. Liang Gan was a younger brother of Liang Shang and uncle of Liang Ji and the empress of Emperor Shun. Administrator of Runan in 142, he was reported by the censorial commissioner Zhang Gang for corrupt conduct. He was sent by cage-cart to the imperial prison, but because of his relationship to the throne he suffered only formal loss of rank and retained his appointment. -HYGZ 10B:157 but cf. sub Zhang Gang. [It is likely this is the same man as Liang Ji 梁戟 q.v.]

Liang Gang 梁綱 (d.197). A general under Yuan Shu, in 197 he was stationed with Qiao Rui at Hu city in Chen against the advance of Cao Cao. Cao Cao stormed the city and slaughtered the defenders. -SGZ 1:15.

Liang Gi 梁紀 see Liang Ji/Gi 梁紀: I sometimes use the variant transcription Gi to distinguish this man from Liang Ji 梁冀 the General-in-Chief, his nephew by marriage.

Liang Gong 梁恭. At the beginning of the first century Liang Gong and Lü Qiang and Fan Sheng were fellow-students of the Book of Changes according to the system of Liangqiu He, and it appears that Liang Gong later became an Academician in that field under Wang Mang.

About 27 Emperor Guangwu proposed to appoint Fan Sheng to the chair for the Liangqiu school in the restored University. Fan Sheng replied that Liang Gong and Lü Qiang were both older than he and better scholars. He urged that one of them be appointed, but Guangwu still gave him the post. -HHS 36/26:1227; Bn 79:187.

448 Liang Gong

Liang Gong 梁恭; Anding. Son of Liang Tong, when their elder brother Liang Song 松 was found guilty of slander in 61, Liang Gong and his second brother Liang Song 竦 were sent to exile in the far south. -HHS 34/24:1170.

Liang Gu 梁鵠 [Menghuang 孟皇/黃]; Anding. Noted for his calligraphy in the official li shu 隸書 "Clerical Style," Liang Gu studied under Shi Yiguan and became a favourite of Emperor Ling.

Because of his writing skill, Liang Gu was appointed to the Imperial Secretariat with authority for appointments. In the mid-170s the young Cao Cao wanted to be made Prefect of Luoyang, but Liang Gu arranged that he receive only a police appointment.

In a memorial of 178 the Confucianist Yang Ci described Liang Gu as a man who had received position far above his true quality. When he was Inspector of Liang province in the early 180s Liang Gu was advised by his officer Su Zhenghe about the vicious and corrupt Administrator of Wuwei. Concerned that the offender was well-connected to the court, Liang Gu wanted to kill Su Zhenghe so as to avoid the responsibility of making a report. He was dissuaded by his adviser He Xun, but it is doubtful that he took any action against the Administrator.

Liang Gu took refuge from the civil war with Liu Biao in Jing province. When Cao Cao came to that territory in 208 he summoned Liang Gu, who came to his gate with bound hands in apology for his earlier conduct. Cao Cao, however, had long admired his calligraphy, and he now appointed him to his staff. He had his favourite passage of Liang Gu's writing displayed in his tent, and believed him superior to Shi Yiguan.

Liang Gu was later appointed to the imperial library of Wei, where he worked on restoring texts which had been lost in the turmoil brought by Dong Zhuo. He wrote new title pages in traditional Seal Script 篆書 for most of the books in the state collection. -HHS 54/44: 1780, 58/48:1879, SGZ 1:31, SJZ 16:17a, JS 36:1064; deC 89:146, 186-187.

Liang He 良賀. A eunuch, in 124 Liang He was Assistant to Zhao Xi, Grand Prolonger of Autumn, head of the household of the Empress Yan. The two were evidently regarded as supporters of the Heir Liu Bao, for after Emperor An had been persuaded to dismiss Liu Bao they were accused on trumped-up charges and sent to exile in Shuofang.

At the end of 125, when Liu Bao was placed upon the throne by the coup of Sun Cheng, Liang He and his fellows were recalled to the capital and appointed Regular Attendants. In the early 130s Liang He became head of the household of the Empress Liang.

Modest and generous by nature, Liang He was once asked why he never recommended men for office. He explained that the Legalist Shang Yang 商鞅 had been introduced to the ruler of ancient Qin 秦 by a eunuch, and since he did not know enough about scholars he did not want to be responsible for making a similar error.

Liang He died in the late 130s, and Emperor Shun honoured his loyalty by granting fiefs to his two adopted sons. -HHS 78/68:2518.

Liang Hong 梁鴻 [Boluan 伯鸞 or Bochun 伯淳]; Youfufeng. Liang Hong's father Liang Hu 梁護 was enfeoffed by Wang Mang but died when he was still young [Liang Hu's personal name is miswritten Rang 讓 by HHS 83/73: QHX:238]. In the 30s Liang Hong went to the University at Luoyang. He had great understanding of the Confucian classics, particularly the Poetry, Chunqiu and Ritual, but made no contact with other students and showed no interest in the current fashion for detailed commentaries.

After his father's experience of office under the usurper, Liang Hong swore an oath never to become an official, and when his studies were finished he became a swineherd in the Shanglin Park near Chang'an, possibly in emulation of the ancient philosopher Zhuangzi. When his old friend Jing Yixiao accepted some junior local appointment, Liang Hong wrote to end their acquaintance.

Later he mistakenly let a fire burn out of control, and some houses were destroyed. He gave all his pigs away in compensation, then worked to pay for the rest of the damage. The owners of the houses were so impressed by his conscientious conduct that they offered to return the pigs, but Liang Hong refused and went back to his home country.

There he married the Lady Meng Guang [also named as Zhao Guang], a woman of strong character who encouraged him to withdraw to the hills south of Chang'an, where they maintained themselves by farming and weaving, playing the lute 琴 or reading for entertainment. Held to his resolve by the Lady Meng, Liang Hong modelled his conduct on notable hermits of the past and composed eulogies for twenty-four of the most distinguished of Former Han.

In 80 the couple left the region of Chang'an and travelled east. As they passed Luoyang Liang Hong composed the short song Wuyi zhi ge 五噫之歌 "Five Exclamations," criticising the extravagance of the court and its exploitation of the people. Though normally regarded as a lenient ruler, Emperor Zhang was furious and sought to have him arrested, but Liang Hong changed his name to Yunqi Yao 運期耀 "Glory of the Age" and took refuge in Qi and Lu.

The couple later moved south to Wu, where Liang Hong became a servant of the magnate Gao Botong. When Gao Botong saw the respect with which the Lady Meng treated her husband, however, he realised his quality and took him into his household as a guest.

Liang Hong's writing amounted to more than ten pian. Almost all the corpus is lost, but some poetry survives to express his ideals of independence, his concern at slander and misunderstanding, his sense of the ephemeral nature of the world, and the moral effort which accompanied his chosen way of life. "Five Exclamations," which is preserved in HHS 83/73, has been popular with the modern Communist regime in China for its outspoken attack on the wrongs done by traditional government, and two longer poems have been translated by Vervoorn.

When Liang Hong died he was buried at his request near the tomb of the ancient hero Yaoli 要離, who had killed a man out of loyalty to his ruler but committed suicide through his own sense of honour as having behaved wrongly. In later years Liang Hong and the Lady Meng were taken as models of the hermit style. -HHS 83/73:2765-68*, DGHJ 18:8b-9b; Vervoorn 90:196-201, 302-303.

Liang Hong 梁鴻, wife of: see the Lady Meng Guang 孟光.

Liang Hong 梁宏; Kuaiji. Liang Hong was Registrar of his commandery in 70, when the Administrator Yin Xing was suspected of involvement in the conspiracy involving Liu Ying, King of Chu. As Yin Xiang was arrested, Liang Hong and five hundred other officers were also taken to prison at Luoyang. The majority died under torture, but Liang Hong continued to proclaim his innocence. Then the filial piety of his colleague Lu Xu was reported to Emperor Ming and earned all the survivors a pardon. Though they were proscribed from office for life, they were able to return home.

Liang Hong was later praised as a local worthy by Yu Fan. -HHS 81/71:2682-83, SGZ Wu 12:1325.

Liang Hu 梁扈; Anding. Son of Liang Song 松 and the Princess Liu Yiwang, daughter of Emperor Guangwu, he was a keen student of the classics of Poetry and History. Though his father died in disgrace and his fief was abolished, Liang Hu's mother the princess retained her state and her wealth.

In 83 the intrigues of the Dou family of imperial relatives by marriage caused Liang Hu's uncle Liang Song 竦 to be executed and brought the deaths of his cousins the Honoured Ladies Liang, concubines of Emperor Zhang. With other members of the family, Liang Hu was exiled to Jiuzhen in the far south, while the frontier commander Deng Xun was dismissed for having communicated with him.

In 97, following the death of Dowager Dou, Liang Hu arranged for his cousin Liang Shan to present a petition, telling of Emperor He's true mother the late concubine Liang, and asking she be given ceremonial as mother of the sovereign. The Grand Commandant Zhang Pu investigated the claim and advised the emperor that he should grant the Lady Liang posthumous title as an empress. Soon afterwards the Lady Liang Yi, daughter of Liang Song 竦 and cousin of Liang Hu, presented a parallel petition asking justice for those of her family who had been wrongfully killed and exiled. Again the claims were found to be correct. The sisters Liang were re-entombed with honours, while Liang Hu and Liang Yi were sent with an escort to bring back the body of Liang Song from his criminal's grave in Hanyang.

The fortunes of the family were thus restored. Treated with great favour by the emperor, Liang Hu was appointed a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, then rose to ministerial rank and was later a colonel in the Northern Army. About 110 he became Steward of the Changle Palace, the apartments of the regent Dowager Deng. -HHS 34/24:1170-73.

Liang Ji/Gi 梁紀. Maternal uncle of Sun Shou, wife of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji 冀, he was not, however, a direct relative of Liang Ji himself, and the blood connection between the two families Liang, if any, is not stated. I sometimes use the variant transcription Gi to distinguish this man from the General-in-Chief.

About 150 Liang Gi married the Lady Xuan, widow of Deng Xiang and mother of the Lady Deng Mengnü. In 153 or 154 Liang Ji's wife Sun Shou arranged for the entry of the young Lady Deng into the harem of Emperor Huan, where she was greatly favoured and swiftly promoted to be an Honoured Lady. Sun Shou evidently intended that Deng Mengnü should serve as an agent for her family within the harem, but within a few years, before 159, Liang Gi was dead, the direct connection with Sun Shou was broken, and the Lady Xuan and her daughter were largely independent. - HHS 10B:444.

Liang Ji/Gi 梁紀, wife of: see the Lady Xuan.

Liang Ji 梁冀 [Bozhuo 伯卓 also as Boju 伯車] (d.159); Anding. Son of Liang Shang, Liang Ji was the elder brother of Liang Na, consort of Emperor Shun. After the Lady Liang became empress in 132 it was proposed that Liang Ji should be enfeoffed, but his father would not allow it. Liang Ji, however, was granted junior office as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, then rose to higher rank as a Palace Attendant. He later became General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger, commanding a corps of palace guards, then colonel of two regiments of the Northern Army, then Bearer of the Mace, chief of police in the capital. At the same time, Liang Ji and his brother Buyi were friends of the eunuch Cao Jie, who served the interests of the family within the palace.

In 136 Liang Ji became Intendant of Henan. It is said that he was cruel and acted outside the law, and that he arranged the murder of Lü Fang the Prefect of Luoyang, who had reported his conduct to his father. When Liang Shang died in 141, Liang Ji inherited his fief and was swiftly appointed General-in-Chief in his place. There was some criticism of the new regime, and in 142 Emperor Shun was persuaded to establish a special commission to report on the condition of the empire and on the quality of its government. Though Zhou Ju and Du Qiao offered recommendations, however, and their colleague Zhang Gang made a direct attack on the Liang family, Liang Ji and his allies were able to block any real debate or action and their power was, if anything, enhanced by the perception that the emperor supported them.

At first it is unlikely that Liang Ji's position was more than a courtesy to his late father: since he was about the same age as the emperor he would have received neither the trust nor the authority which Liang Shang had held. The situation changed considerably, however, when Emperor Shun died in 144, for Liang Ji's sister Liang Na, now Dowager, became regent for the infant Liu Bing, and Liang Ji held great influence as her senior male relative. With the Grand Tutor Zhao Jun and the Grand Commandant Li Gu he shared control of the affairs of the Imperial Secretariat, which gave formal command of the government, and it appears that from this time he also had the right to maintain offices 府, comparable to those of the Excellencies, by which men could gain commissioned entry to the imperial service.

Within a few months, moreover, Emperor Chong was dead, and the Dowager now had the right to choose any member of the imperial clan to succeed him. On Liang Ji's advice she placed the eight-year-old Liu Zuan, Emperor Zhi, upon the throne.

The choice was not a success. Despite his youth, Liu Zuan noticed the limits on his notional authority, and he was not wise enough to keep silent. On one occasion he referred to Liang Ji in public court as an "over-bearing general" 跋扈將軍.

On 26 July 146 Liu Zuan was seized by stomach cramps. He asked for water, but Liang Ji forbade it, and he died almost immediately. Many believed Liang Ji poisoned the boy to remove a future threat to his authority, but it was possibly only bad cooking, and Liu Zuan may have been naturally weak and sickly. On the other hand, the young Liu Zhi, future Emperor Huan, had been called to the capital before his predecessor's death and was formally betrothed to Liang Nüying, younger sister of the Dowager. If Liu Zuan had been expected to reign for a normal life-time, Liang Nüying would surely have been committed to him, so one must assume Liang Ji and his elder sister had early knowledge of his fate.

In 146 Liu Zhi was about fourteen years old by Western reckoning, and he took the cap of manhood in 148. Shortly before her death in 150 the Dowager formally handed over power to him, but in practice Emperor Huan remained under the influence of his consort Liang Nüying, and Liang Ji exercised power as before. The emperor had no means to oppose his dominance and it is possible that, like Emperor Shun before him, he had no particular ambition to do so. At any rate, in 151 Emperor Huan summoned a court conference to assess and enhance Liang Ji's privileges and honours, which were now comparable to those of the great Huo Guang 霍光 of Former Han.

Liang Ji encountered both real and imagined threats to his expanded authority. The first challenge came from the Grand Commandant Li Gu, who had urged the claims of Liu Suan, King of Qinghe, who was of full age, to succeed the infant Emperor Chong instead of the child Liu Zuan. Then, after the death of Liu Zuan, Li Gu pressed for a full investigation and argued once more that Liu Suan should become emperor. He was initially supported by his two Excellency colleagues, Hu Guang and Zhao Jie, but they withdrew in the face of Liang Ji's firm disapproval, and though Li Gu attempted to rally more general support he was unsuccessful. Soon after Liu Zhi had been brought to the throne Liu Suan was impeached for treason and Li Gu and his associate Du Qiao were arrested and executed.

THE POWER OF LIANG JI

Liang Ji's actions had been high-handed, and though he had manipulated the succession to his liking he encountered significant opposition from the officials and gentry. His authority was clear, but there was always opposition, and Liang Ji was ruthless in suppressing it. His office and staff were twice the size of any of the Excellencies, he had clients and allies at every level of the bureaucracy, and his patronage was appealed to for offices and for pardons. His power, however, was brittle, and it was alleged that reforms of earlier years had been abandoned as corruption increased.

The extravagance of the Liang family was noted and resented. Liang Ji's marquisate rose to include four counties, with revenues from over forty thousand households, while his brothers and his son Liang Yin also held valuable estates. His wife Sun Shou was comparably avaricious, she gained a vast fief of her own, and she arranged for members of her family to gain high office, where they acted with greed and cruelty.

Liang Ji and Sun Shou rivalled one another in extravagant mansions, parklands and furnishings. Liang Ji constructed a set of pavilions to house his many concubines, and he used the corvée labour of several counties to create vast parklands, which are said to have extended over much of the capital commandery. Among his constructions were a great stone bridge [Needham 71:172], and enormous terraces and pavilions carved and painted with the images of dragons, tigers and other wild beasts. Liang Ji was also extremely fond of rabbits 兔 and built the Dodder Park 菟苑 as a sanctuary for them. The animals were gathered from every part of the empire, and when some ill-informed foreign merchants killed one, a dozen of the culprits were executed. Zhang Fen records also that one of the boats on his ornamental lakes unexpectedly capsized; a omen of its master's approaching fate [ZF:3a-b & 4a sub Zhu Mu].

Calculating and licentious, though he spoke with a stutter Liang Ji is said to have had fierce, cruel eyes; he was physically powerful, with high shoulders which gave him an intimidating presence. Fond of drinking and gambling, he was skilled at board games, including Liubo 六博, and composed Tanqi jing 彈碁經, a treatise on a form of chess [Song shi 207:5289]. He was a strong archer and played the Zuju 蹴鞠 football game [Bodde 75:331 as daju 蹋鞠], while he also enjoyed horse-racing and hunting with dogs. On the other hand, though he had a considerable harem, he was intimidated by the Lady Sun Shou, and it appears that he may have had homosexual interests: his slave Qin Gong is said to have been favoured by both husband and wife.

Administratively, Liang Ji insisted that newly-appointed officials call upon him before they received their commissions from the Imperial Secretariat, and he likewise saw all imperial documents before they went to the Secretariat for formal drafting. Liang Ji also took choice of all offerings presented to the throne, he sent messengers on his own account to trade for luxuries abroad, and he received a multitude of special honours and privileges when he attended court. At the same time, he was extremely jealous of his position: he suspected his younger brothers Buyi and Meng might form the centre of an opposition group, so he attacked their staff and their friends; and he arranged the death or disgrace of several officials who had failed to show proper respect or, worse, had criticised him.

After twenty years of Liang family hegemony, it appears that Emperor Huan had become somewhat impatient with his limited role in government, and matters were brought to a head in 159 by the death of his Empress Liang Nüying, breaking the immediate connection and control of her family. The emperor's favourite concubine, the Lady Deng Mengnü, had been connected to the Liang family and to Liang Ji's wife Sun Shou, but her mother the Lady Xuan had ambitions for her own family. In an attempt to regain control, Liang Ji killed Bing Zun, brother-in-law of the Lady Deng, and attempted to assassinate the Lady Xuan.

Emperor Huan was now both furious and frightened. With the aid and protection of the eunuchs Tang Heng, Shan Chao, Zuo Guan, Xu Huang and Ju Yuan, he issued orders to strip Liang Ji of his offices and send him to exile in the far south. The coup encountered small resistance, and Liang Ji and Sun Shou committed suicide that day, 9 September 159. Great numbers of their associates, clients and supporters were arrested, killed or proscribed from office, and the three Excellencies, Hu Guang, Han Yan and Sun Lang were all dismissed and reduced to commoner rank. The Liang family property was sold off, raising three billion cash, and it is said that the taxation demand from the empire was halved for that year.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE LIANG CLAN

Though Liang Ji and his imperial consort sisters dominated the government of the empire for fifteen years, it appears most convenient to provide an outline of general events in the empire during that period under the biography of Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan. In general, regardless of accusations against the personal conduct and extravagance of Liang Ji and his family, the Annals contain a number of edicts designed to improve the quality and the benevolence of government. There were several amnesties and remissions of punishment, frequent donations to the people and attempts to provide relief in times of disaster, repeated calls for good men to be brought to office, and many expressions of moral concern and urgings to reform.

One notable phenomenon, perhaps echoing the official desire for progress and improvement, was the number of reign periods: from the time Liang Ji gained authority under Emperor Shun in 142 until his overthrow in 159, no less than ten changes were made, more than one every two years. Admittedly there were two short-lived emperors, but the average under Emperors Shun and Huan was still high, with such slogans as Establishing Harmony 建和, Perpetual Revival 永興 and, finally, Extended Splendour 延熹 in 158. In contrast, after he destroyed Liang Ji in the second year of Yanxi Emperor Huan kept the same title for another eight years.

There was also a serious attempt by the regency government to encourage scholarship. As early as 136, at the time Liang Na became Empress and Liang Shang was appointed General-in-Chief, the scholars Fu Wuji and Huang Jing were commissioned to prepare an imperial collection of Confucian classics, as well as treatises by philosophers and works on art and literature. Little is known of this ambitious project, but about 150, early in the reign of Emperor Huan, an edict ordered a third instalment of Han ji, official history of the Later Han dynasty, known later as Dongguan Hanji from its compilation in the Eastern Pavilion. Fu Wuji and Huang Jing were again involved, together with Cui Shi, Bian Shao and Yan Du. This work continued through the 150s.

At the same time the Imperial University, reconstructed under Emperor Shun, received special favour and was dramatically expanded. An edict of 146 ordered kingdoms and commanderies to nominate men aged between fifty and seventy with Understanding of the Classics to attend the University, while the sons of senior officials were required to study there. Henceforth the first five successful candidates at the annual examinations would become gentleman cadets, probationary positions for commission in the imperial service, and the next five would be members of the suite of the Heir, a lower entry point. At the same time a variety of officials, both senior and junior, together with students at the Palace School for Noble Families, were invited to take examinations in the classics and those who did well could expect rewards and advancement.

As a result of this and similar signs of encouragement and patronage it is claimed that the number of students at the University grew to thirty thousand. Unfortunately, we are also told that the quality of the writing and teaching was unimpressive, for the orthodox New Text tradition was in decline, and the finicky pedantry of the traditional detailed commentaries was no longer considered valuable or relevant. Vast numbers of nominal students, uninspired by their teachers or their texts, turned readily to idealistic criticism of the government, and the tradition of activist opposition, inspired by Confucian morality, was maintained for twenty years, not only against the Liang hegemony but also against Emperor Huan and his eunuch favourites who came to power afterwards.

Whatever the personal short-comings of Liang Ji, his period of power may be seen as having come very close to establishing the equivalent of a Japanese-style shogunate. Both Emperor Shun and perforce Emperor Huan had accepted a system in which the leader of a consort clan held effective power while the nominal sovereign occupied himself within the palace. Had Liang Ji been able to take over control of the Lady Deng Mengnü, he might have maintained his hegemony over the imperial court and reduced Emperor Huan to a figurehead in the same style as the Japanese emperors of the Heian and later periods. Unlike Wang Mang, there is no sign that Liang Ji wished to take the throne for himself, and the manner in which Emperor Huan – once he had a moment of opportunity to act – was able to use the authority of the throne to overthrow his powerful minister indicates that there was vast loyalty to the house of Liu even after fifty years of weak sovereigns.

Ultimately, as with the family of the Dowager Deng in the time of Emperor An, there was no secure future for a powerful consort clan once the essential connection to the throne was broken. On the other hand, one may speculate whether the Han dynasty might not have lasted for longer, at least in titular existence, if Emperor Huan had not determined to rule as well as reign, for by taking power he also took responsibility. -HHS 34/24:1178-87*, XC 1:13b; Ch'ü 72:471-477, deC 89:4-14

Liang Ji 梁冀, wife of: see the Lady Sun Shou.

Liang Ji 梁戟 (d.159); Anding. A member of the clan of imperial relatives by marriage, in 159 Liang Ji was a colonel in the Northern Army. As the power of the family was overthrown in that year, he was arrested and killed. -HHS 34/24:1186. It is likely this is the same man as Liang Gan 梁乾.

Liang Jin 梁金 (d.32). A general of Wei Ao in command of Lueyang city in Tianshui, he was defeated and killed by Lai Xi. -HHS 15/5:587.

Liang Kongda 梁孔達. A disciple of Zhang Zhi, at the end of Han Liang Kongda was a celebrated calligrapher in the informal cao shu 草書 "Grass Style." -JS 36:1065.

Liang Kuan 梁寬; Anding. In 213 Liang Kuan was in Ji city, the capital of Hanyang which had been captured by Ma Chao. He joined the conspiracy led by Yang Fu, Jiang Xu and Zhao Ang: as those local leaders raised arms Ma Chao left the city, and Liang Kuan, Pang Gong and Zhao Qu then barred the gates against him and killed his family. Liang Kuan was enfeoffed, and later held office at the court of Wei. -SGZ 25:702, 18:549.

Liang Lei 梁磊; Anding. Eldest son of Liang Song 松, Liang Lei died young. -HHSJJ 83/73:3045 Hui Dong quoting the Gaoshi zhuan of Xi/Ji Kang.

Liang Long 梁龍 "Dragon Liang" (d.181); Jiaozhi. Probably a chieftain of the Wuhu people of Hepu, in the late 170s Liang Long controlled a large rebel force across the far south. He was destroyed by Zhu Jun in 181. -HHS 86/76:2839, 71/61:2308-09; deC 89:537.

Liang Ma 梁馬 or Liang Yan 焉; Anding. Son of Liang Buyi and nephew of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, in 154 Liang Ma was enfeoffed as marquis of a county. -HHS 34/24:1185.

Liang Mao 涼茂 [Bofang 伯方]; Shanyang. A keen scholar, Liang Mao joined Cao Cao's staff, served as a censor and, as Administrator of Taishan, settled the unruly people.

Sent to the northeast as Administrator of Lelang, he was unable to get past Liaodong, but he is said to have dissuaded Gongsun Du or his son Kang from attacking Cao Cao while he was occupied elsewhere.

Liang Mao later governed Wei commandery and Ganling, then became Senior Clerk to Cao Pi when he was named General of the Household for All Purposes in 211. In 213 he was among the officials who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei, and he joined the Secretariat of the new state. He was later a minister, and when Cao Pi was named Heir in 217 Liang Mao became his Tutor. Highly respected, he died soon afterwards.

After Cao Pi came to the throne in 220, in recognition of his past loyal service a son or grandson of Liang Mao was granted the right to appointment as a gentleman cadet. -SGZ 11:338-39*, 2:58.

Liang Meng 梁蒙; Anding. Son of Liang Shang and younger brother of Liang Ji and Liang Buyi, after Emperor Huan was brought to the throne in 147 Liang Meng was enfeoffed with a county. In 152 Liang Meng and his brother Buyi retired to private life. Liang Meng died before the coup of Emperor Huan which overthrew Liang Ji in 159. HHS 34/24:1179, 1185-86.

Liang Mengnü 梁猛女 or Liang Meng 猛, the Lady, see Deng Mengnü.

Liang Min 梁旻; Anding. A kinsman of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, Liang Min held office as Administrator of Kuaiji during the 150s. The Inspector Liu You, however, reported his crimes, and Liang Min was dismissed. -HHS 67/57:2199.

Liang Mou 涼茂 see Liang Mao 涼茂.

Liang Na 梁納, the Lady (116-150); Anding: Empress of Emperor Shun. Daughter of Liang Shang, Liang Na was a great-niece of the Honoured Lady Liang, the natural mother of Emperor He, who had died in 83 under the influence of the Empress Dou of Emperor Zhang. The family suffered political eclipse, but was restored to political status at the capital in 97, when Liang Na's grandfather Liang Yong and two other brothers of the late Lady Liang were enfeoffed as marquises.

Liang Shang succeeded to his father's fief in 126, and two years later his daughter was brought into the harem of Emperor Shun. Her biography claims that a splendid light accompanied her birth, that she was skilled in women's work of spinning and needlework while she was still young, and that by the age of nine she could recite the Analects of Confucius and had studied the Classic of Poetry. It is said, moreover, that she kept portraits of the worthy women celebrated by the Lienü zhuan 列女傳 of Liu Xiang 劉向 of Former Han always beside her, to compare her conduct with theirs and remind herself of the moral standards she must seek to attain. Her father spoke of her in admiration as the means by which the prosperity of the house would rise to its greatest heights. Some of this may be true, but these are also the clichés by which Chinese history and legend enhance the facts about any person of future consequence.

Though Liang Na was formally selected for the harem, her family connections were obviously important in gaining her entry and securing the emperor's attention. She was thirteen years old at the time by Chinese reckoning and Emperor Shun was only one year older. [HHS 10B:440 says that she was forty-five sui at the time of her death in 150, which would indicate she was born in 106; CHOC:xli has followed this. The age of thirteen sui at the time of her entry, however, is given by HHS 10B:438, and that would indicate she was born in 116: cf. also Bn 86:285. Since entry to the imperial harem was normally about the age of thirteen, while twenty-three would be very late, HHS 10B:438 is far more likely to be correct.]

Liang Na was accompanied by one of her father's sisters, the Lady Liang III, no doubt as an escort and guardian in the dangerous political milieu of the palace. The physiognomist Mao Tong, who took part in the selection, exclaimed at the Lady's appearance, and when the Court Astronomer tested her fortune by oracle bones and the Book of Changes the signs were remarkably good.

Liang Na was appointed an Honoured Lady, highest rank of concubine, and was favoured by the emperor. With erudite quotations from the Book of Changes and the Classic of Poetry, she urged her consort not to devote all his attention to her lest she suffer the jealousy and calumny of others; we are told that the emperor was impressed with her good sense.

Emperor Shun took the cap of manhood in 129, and by 132 the senior ministers were pressing for the appointment of an empress. Despite accounts of the favour she received, Liang Na was just one of four concubines to have attracted the young ruler, and he had been bedding her for four years without producing any children. The choice was so even that the emperor proposed to cast lots, and let the spirits decide. Hu Guang, however, a senior officer of the Secretariat, supported by colleagues, argued that the traditional hierarchy of criteria should be applied: first consider family background, then compare virtue; if virtue was equal, there was the question of age; and finally one should think of physical attraction. Liang Na was therefore chosen as a woman of excellent family, and on 2 March 132 she was named as empress.

The Lady's father Liang Shang immediately became a Palace Attendant, his fief was increased in size and value, and he was soon named Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital. In 135 Liang Shang was appointed General-in-Chief, giving formal command of the Northern Army and also providing substantial authority in government at the highest level.

When Liang Shang died in 141 he was promptly succeeded as General-in-Chief by his eldest son Liang Ji, and with the aid of the Empress Liang in the inner palace the family and their clients continued to dominate the court. We are told that the Empress continued to behave with intelligence and good will, that she took no false pride in the advancement which her virtues had gained her, that she studied the lessons of the past with utmost care, and that whenever there was an eclipse she would make particular confession of her faults and failings. There was an element of rivalry with the Lady Dou, daughter of Dou Zhang, whose kinswoman the Dowager Dou of Emperor He had persecuted the Liang family [see sub Liang Song]; but it is claimed that she bore no grudge from this family feud and took no action as the fortunes of the Dou were restored.

Despite her presumed opportunities, the Empress had no children, and when Emperor Shun died in 144 his only son was the infant Liu Bing, born the previous year to his concubine the Beauty nee Yu, and proclaimed as Heir just a few months before his father's death.

According to the constitution of Han, when an emperor died leaving a recognised heir under age his empress, now Dowager, acted as regent for the infant successor. The Lady Yu came of respectable family 良家 and had given Emperor Shun a daughter as well as a son, but she had not been awarded any special status before he died and she was given no role in the court or in government. The Dowager Liang does appear to have taken her responsibilities seriously, and she supported the appointment of the reformer Li Gu as Grand Commandant, sharing control of the Imperial Secretariat.

Early in 145, however, after just a few months of nominal rule, the infant Emperor Chong was dead, and there was now no named heir to the throne. In such circumstances the Dowager had undisputed authority to choose the next emperor from any of the male members of the imperial family. She could take such advice as she wished, but the matter was not open to public debate, nor was any minister of state, no matter his rank, entitled to intervene; the precedent had been confirmed by the Dowager Deng in 105 and 106, when Emperor An was brought to the throne. So the Dowager Liang took counsel with her brother within her private quarters, and after three weeks their choice fell upon Liu Zuan, a great-great-grandson of Emperor Zhang through the lineage of the kings of Le'an.

Eight years old by Chinese reckoning, there was nothing to distinguish Liu Zuan from any other cadets of the imperial house, apart from the fact that he was old enough to avoid the risks of infant mortality and young enough to require the guidance of a regent. His mother the Lady Chen was a former singing girl who had been taken by Liu Hong the King of Le'an but had not been granted the position of concubine in the royal harem: his maternal ancestry left much to be desired.

Li Gu and other officials had urged the claims of Liu Suan, King of Qinghe. Twenty years old, he appeared well qualified to take the throne and would not require a regent; but this in itself rendered him unacceptable to the Liang, and after a short exchange of memorials, the Dowager exercised her prerogative and installed Liu Zuan.

One year later, Liu Zuan too was dead. Despite his youth, he had perceived the tight limits to his notional authority, but he was not perceptive enough to keep silent, and on one occasion he referred to Liang Ji as "an over-bearing general." A short time later the emperor was eating dumplings when he was seized by stomach cramps and died. It was traditionally argued that Liang Ji had poisoned the boy, but it may only have been bad cooking, and Liu Zuan was perhaps naturally weak and sickly. On the other hand, even before his death Liu Zhi, future Emperor Huan, then fifteen sui, had been called to the capital and betrothed to Liang Nüying, younger sister of the Dowager: it seems Liang Ji and the Dowager may have had early knowledge of his fate. There was an inconclusive investigation, and the Liang held their power through their new nominee.

At this time Li Gu and his colleagues, notably Du Qiao, had again pressed the claims of Liu Suan. Liu Zhi, at fourteen years, was older than Liu Zuan, but he was not yet of full age and was clearly intended as another puppet of the Liang family. On the other hand, there was no means to determine the succession other than by the authority of the Dowager, and Liu Suan's candidacy was also opposed by Cao Teng and a strong faction of eunuchs. So Li Gu and his allies were defeated and Liu Zhi was placed upon the throne.

A few months later, at the end of 146, a small local group sought to arrange a coup in Qinghe and proclaim Liu Suan as emperor. The disturbance was put down without difficulty, and Liu Suan himself was in no way involved, but he was reduced in rank, exiled and committed suicide. Soon afterwards Li Gu and Du Qiao were also implicated and arrested. Many officials protested and the Dowager herself initially issued a pardon, but her brother Liang Ji eventually persuaded her that they must die.

For the next few years the Dowager held formal control of government in association with her brother. Though historians of Han have accused Liang Ji and his wife Sun Shou of inordinate greed, luxury and extravagance, Liang Na is praised for her devotion to duty in difficult times: the second great rebellion of the Qiang in the northwest in the early 140s, and troubles with the Xiongnu of the northern frontier, were reflected inside China by frequent small-scale rebellion, increasing feuding amongst local gentry and a gradual alienation from the imperial regime. The government had been in serious financial straits since the first great Qiang rebellion of 107-118, and its weakness was symbolised by the plundering of the tomb of Emperor Shun outside Luoyang within a year of his burial. The biography of the Dowager in Hou Han shu says that she was restrained and frugal, that she appointed good officials and sent out troops to deal with disorder, and that all the empire was settled by her efforts. One may observe a literary contrast between the worthy public actions of the sister and the wicked private life of the brother, and both are no doubt exaggerated, but Liang Na does well from the comparison.

Emperor Huan took the cap of manhood at the beginning of 148, but the Dowager maintained her regency, on the grounds of the disturbances in the empire, for another two years. She formally relinquished her responsibilities in the first month of 150, and she died a few weeks later, on 6 April, at the age of forty-four. -HHS 10B:438-40*.

Liang Nüying 梁女瑩, the Lady (d.159 AD); Anding; Empress of Emperor Huan. Daughter of Liang Shang, Liang Nüying was the younger sister of the Empress Liang Na of Emperor Shun and the General-in-Chief Liang Ji.

In 146 the Lady Liang Na, now regent Dowager, called Liu Zhi, Marquis of Liwu in Hejian, to come to the capital, and arranged his betrothal to Liang Nüying. Liu Zhi was fifteen sui, and the throne was at that time occupied by the Dowager's previous selection, Liu Zuan. The nine-year-old Emperor Zhi had shown disapproval of the dominance held by Liang Ji over the court, and he died a short time later. His death was investigated and nothing was found, but the betrothal throws suspicion upon the affair: had Liu Zuan been expected to reign for a normal life-time, the younger Lady Liang would surely have been committed to him; as it is, one may assume Liang Ji and his elder sister had early knowledge of his fate; he may have been ill, or they may have arranged his demise.

As Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, was placed upon the throne, the Dowager Liang maintained her regency. In the summer of the following year Liang Nüying entered the imperial harem, and on 30 September 147 she became empress. It is not possible to make a firm estimate of her age at that time. Her elder sister was born in 116, and her father Liang Shang died in 141. Many women came to the harem at the age of thirteen sui, but the age for general selection could be as high as twenty, and it is likely that in this special case the empress was in her early twenties, born about 125 and some ten years younger than her sister.

The ceremony of enthronement was modelled on precedents from the early second century BC, when Emperor Hui was under the authority of his natural mother the Dowager Lü and, perhaps more significantly, those of 4 AD, when the young Emperor Ping, last ruler of Former Han, was married to a daughter of Wang Mang. The betrothal money was 20,000 pounds of gold, while imperial presents to the bride's family included jade bi-rings 璧, a team of horses, a quantity of rolled silk and wild geese [these last because they obey the natural relationship of Yin and Yang]. We are told that the empress shared the extravagant tastes of her brother Liang Ji rather than the frugality of her sister the Dowager, for her apartments and pavilions were expensively carved and ornamented, while her clothing and jewellery, trinkets and brightly-painted carriages were more ostentatious than any of her predecessors'.

With support from her family to deal with eunuchs and other attendants inside the harem, and with her own physical attractions to influence her young husband, it is not surprising that, as her biography says, she monopolised Emperor Huan's attentions and favours, and during these first years at least, no other women were permitted to approach him.

Early in 150 the Dowager Liang formally ended her regency, and a few weeks later she was dead. While this made little immediate difference, for Liang Ji's position at court as General-in-Chief was unimpaired and the Empress Liang was well placed to supervise the inner palace, Emperor Huan acquired greater freedom and his personal relationship with the empress was weakened. The fact that she was expected to keep surveillance over him on behalf of her family caused tension, she had not borne an imperial son, and we may assume that the charms of an older woman were less fascinating to a young man of eighteen than they had been three years earlier.

From this time, therefore, Emperor Huan embarked upon the sexual career which was to make him celebrated in Chinese history, giving his attention to a vast number of concubines. The empress may have been jealous and frustrated, but in some respects it served the interests of the Liang family that the ruler should thus distract himself, and she had no way to affect her husband's choice of partners. She could, however, control the results, and the history remarks that "if a woman of the palace became pregnant, it was seldom she came to full term." Only one child, the Princess Hua, was born at this time and survived to maturity.

The empress died on 9 August 159. She was probably in her mid-thirties, about the same age as her elder sister the Dowager at the time of her death in 150. There is no reason to believe she did not die of natural causes, but her demise was evidently unexpected and brought immediate crisis to the central government. Within a few weeks Liang Ji and his clan had been destroyed by a coup of the emperor and his eunuchs, and as the new consort Deng Mengnü took her place, the tomb of the late Empress was demoted to that of an Honoured Lady. -HHS 10B:443-444*; deC 75B.

Liang Pei 梁配. A county magistrate in Chenliu, about 130 the youthful scholar Shentu Pan argued to him that the Lady Gou Yu, guilty of a vendetta killing, should actually serve as a model of family virtue. Impressed by Shentu Pan's eloquence, Liang Pei obtained a pardon for her. -HHS 53/43:1751.

Liang Ping 梁憑 see the Lady Liang Yi 梁嫵.

Liang Qi 梁岐. A county magistrate in Wei for Yuan Shang, in 204 he surrendered to Cao Cao and was rewarded with enfeoffment. -SGZ 1:25.

Liang Qin 梁謹 [Boweï 伯威] (d.115); Beidi. Liang Qin's father Liang Feng was killed for opposing Dou Xian, and after Emperor He destroyed the power of the Dou in 92 he made Liang Qin a gentleman cadet. A courageous man, concerned to establish a fine reputation, Liang Qin served as a major under the general Deng Hong against the renegade Xiongnu prince Fenghou in 95-96, and after further postings he became Senior Colonel of the Western Regions in 106.

As Liang Qin went to take up his position, the peoples of central Asia rebelled and the Protector-General Ren Shang was besieged at Shule [Kashgar]. Liang Qin was ordered to raise five thousand horsemen from the Qiang and other non-Chinese peoples of Liang province and take them to the rescue. The siege was broken before they arrived, but Ren Shang was replaced by the Commandant of Cavalry Duan Xi, while the Chief Clerk Zhao Bo took over from Duan Xi. Both officers were at the fortress of Tuogan, which had been established by Ban Chao in the territory of Qiuzi [Kuqa], but Liang Qin did not believe their position was secure. He persuaded King Boba to allow Chinese troops into his capital so that they might defend it together, and despite fierce protests from his officials and people Boba agreed.

As soon as Liang Qin entered the city he sent urgent messages for Duan Xi and Zhao Bo to join him, and their combined force amounted to eight or nine thousand men. With such provocation, however, the people rebelled against their ruler and his allies and laid siege to them, aided by volunteers from the neighbouring states of Wensu and Gumo. After a successful sortie, Liang Qin maintained active defence for several months. Then the enemy were defeated and fled, and the Chinese pursued them, killing or capturing over ten thousand, and seizing vast numbers of camels and other herding animals.

Qiuzi was thus settled, but the routes to Luoyang were still blocked. Senior ministers at court now argued that the region was far away, that the imperial armies had suffered several defeats, and there appeared no limit to the cost of maintaining troops and military colonies. In the summer of 107 orders were sent to abolish the office of the Protector-General in the Western Regions, and to recall the colonists from Yiwulu near present-day Hami and from Liuzhong by present-day Shanshan.

The Commandant of Cavalry Wang Hong was sent with recruits from within the passes to escort the settlers back into Chinese territory, together with the forces commanded by Liang Qin, Duan Xi and Zhao Bo. Wang Hong also pressed several hundred Qiang horsemen, and the resentment aroused by this, on top of the earlier levy by Liang Qin, combined with the Chinese weakness displayed by the withdrawal, brought the great East Qiang rebellion.

When Liang Qin and his men arrived at the frontier of Dunhuang early in 108, there was massive disturbance as the tribesmen attacked government posts and slaughtered Chinese officials and people. The court raised troops for a counter-offensive, and Liang Qin was ordered to bring forces from the west to assist against the rebels. Fighting his way through Zhangye into Wuwei, he received the surrender of three hundred chieftains, sent them back to their homes, and generally settled this marginal area of the troubles.

Liang Qin was then ordered to Jincheng, an early centre of the revolt. Hearing that the Qiang had moved east, however, he followed them down the Long Road and attacked a force of rebels at Meiyang Pass in Youfufeng. He was wounded in the fighting, but put the enemy to flight, recovering many of their captives and much of the herds and treasure they had taken. The court sent letters of praise and congratulation, and Liang Qin was given authority over all military forces in the west.

In the autumn of 109 a Wuhuan raid defeated the commandery forces of Wuyuan, and in winter the Shanyu Tan of the Southern Xiongnu also rebelled. He besieged the Emissary Geng Chong at his capital Meiji in Xihe, and was joined by numbers of Wuhuan. The minister He Xi was sent against them as Acting General of Chariots and Cavalry, and Liang Qin was named Acting General on the Liao.

Early in 110 Liang Qin advanced north through Shang commandery with eight thousand men, defeated the Xiongnu and the Wuhuan, killed three thousand of the enemy, captured women and children, and took great quantities of goods and treasure. The Shanyu attacked him with eight thousand men, but Liang Qin dressed in armour, led the charge and broke the circle about his men. The Shanyu took refuge in marshland, and surrendered soon afterwards to the imperial armies. Liang Qin was promoted to be full General on the Liao.

As the Qiang raided Anding, Beidi and Shang commanderies, the price of grain rose massively and people began to leave. In 111 Liang Qin was ordered to aid the relocation of the governments of the three commanderies into Youfufeng and Zuopingyi, while even those Chinese who wished to remain were driven from their homes away to the south. Liang Qin was aided in this forced migration by the Xiongnu prince Yougutunu, nephew of the Shanyu Tan, and when the operation was complete he granted Yougutunu the seal of a marquis. This, however, was beyond his authority, and he was recalled and sent to prison.

Liang Qin was allowed to commute his punishment with a fine, and in 115 the clerical officer Ma Rong sent a letter praising his achievements and those of the Protector Pang Can and asking that they be pardoned. This was done. Liang Qin was then sent as an Internuncio with command of troops to deal with the Qiang and local rebels about Chang'an. On the way through Hongnong he was taken ill and died. -HHS 47/37:1591-93*; deC 84:90-99, 286.

Liang Qiushou 梁丘壽 (d.26). Administrator of Lu for the pretender Liu Yong, he was attacked and killed by Guangwu's general He Yan. -HHS 18/8:686-87.

Liang Rang 梁讓 i.e. Liang Hu 梁護, a subject of Wang Mang and father of Liang Hong. -HHS 83/73:2765, but see QHX:238.

Liang Rang 梁讓 (d.159); Anding. A younger brother of Liang Shang, and uncle to the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, Liang Rang became Administrator of Nanyang. Reported for his misrule by the Inspector of Jing province Zhao Jie, he transferred to Chenliu, but was indicted for corruption in 142 by the commissioner Du Qiao.

In 159 Liang Rang was a colonel in the Northern Army. As the power of the family was overthrown in that year, he was arrested and killed. -HHS 7:305, 34/24:1186, 63/53:2092.

Liang Shan 梁禪/寔; Anding. Probably a son of Liang Gong, in 97 Liang Shan presented a petition on behalf of his cousin Liang Hu, then in exile in the far south. The petition told of Emperor He's true mother, the late concubine Liang, and asked that she be given the ceremonial rights to which she was entitled as mother of the sovereign. The Grand Commandant Zhang Pu investigated the claim, then recommended to the emperor that he should grant the Lady Liang posthumous title as an empress. So the family was restored to favour and fortune. -HHS 34/24:1172.

Liang Shang 梁商 [Boxia 伯夏] (d.141); Anding. Son of Liang Yong, Liang Shang was well read, and studied the Poetry when he was young. As his family was connected to the throne Liang Shang became a gentleman cadet and then a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, and in 126 he inherited his father's marquisate. In 128 Liang Shang's sister and his daughter Liang Na entered the harem of Emperor Shun, and Liang Shang was made a Palace Attendant and a colonel in the Northern Army. In 132 Liang Na was made empress. Liang Shang's fief was increased, he was honoured as Specially Advanced, awarded a special carriage, and later became Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital.

In the following year Liang Shang's son Ji was offered enfeoffment, but Liang Shang would not allow him to accept. In general, the histories present Liang Shang as a model of cautious and respectful conduct, while Liang Ji, who succeeded him in power, was arrogant and greedy. One must suspect stereotyping: similar comparisons are made between Liang Shang's daughter Liang Na, worthy consort of Emperor Shun, and her younger sister Nüying, Empress of Emperor Huan.

In 134 Liang Shang was offered the title of General-in-Chief. At first he declined, but he accepted in the following year. Besides formal command of the Northern Army, the position gave authority in government at the highest level. Liang Shang's predecessors as Generals-in-Chief under Later Han, Dou Xian, Deng Zhi and Geng Bao, had all held their posts during the regency of a Dowager. Dou Xian and Deng Zhi, moreover, had commanded armies in the field, but Liang Shang's was a purely political appointment, comparable to that of the short-lived Geng Bao. On the other hand Emperor Shun was now twenty, of full age, and though the initial choice of Liang Shang's daughter as empress had not been uncontested, it is possible that the emperor came to regard Liang Shang, old enough to be his father, as a senior and trusted adviser to counter the demands of his regular officials. Though the General-in-Chief was not part of the bureaucracy, the office had been used on occasion since Former Han, and Liang Shang's influence was comparable and even superior to that of the Excellencies.

We are told that Liang Shang used his trust and favour with restraint, and even in high office he remained modest, obedient to the law, and generous to those in need. He took particular care to promote good men, and Zhou Ju and Li Gu both joined his staff. His influence may also have shown itself in the field of scholarship, for in 136 the Han government commissioned Fu Wuji and Huang Jing to edit the imperial collection of Confucian classics, philosophers and works on art and literature.

Since the accession of the young emperor, the energies of the reformists Yu Xu and Zuo Xiong had often clashed with the privileges of the imperial favourites and kinsmen, and Liang Shang appears to have sought to maintain a balance between the interests of those close to the throne, including his own family, and the sensible proposals of officials. He was not without opposition: in 139 a group of eunuchs led by Zhang Kui and Qu Zheng claimed that he planned to depose the emperor. Emperor Shun did not believe the story and the conspiracy was crushed.

In 141 Liang Shang became extremely ill. Encouraging his son Liang Ji to maintain comparable restraint, he asked only for a simple funerary service. When he died soon afterwards, however, Emperor Shun attended the ceremony, and he was buried with great pomp and honour.

During his five years of power Liang Shang brought a measure of stability to the government, which had been confused by the combination of a youthful emperor, evidently not very strong-willed but with certain decided favourites, and some Confucian officials who saw the lack of central authority as opportunity to press well-meant reforms. As an authority figure hors concours, Liang Shang's appointment can be regarded as a success, but the precedent was not necessarily a good one, and the uneasy situation and the personal qualities of his son and successor Liang Ji guaranteed long-term disaster. -HHS 34/24:1175-77*, XC 1:13a.

For two accounts of strange later manifestations related to Liang Shang, see sub Huan Xian and Xie Bu.

Liang Shao 梁邵/紹. Court Architect in 195, Liang Shao was one of the senior officials taken hostage by Guo Si during his quarrel with Li Jue at Chang'an. Later that year, as a member of the Imperial Secretariat, he accompanied the emperor as he escaped from Chang'an, and joined in reassuring him of the loyalty of the general Duan Wei.

Liang Shao later became Grand Prolonger of Autumn, in charge of the residence of the empress at Xu city under the control of Cao Cao: the post had formerly been reserved for eunuchs, but was evidently now entrusted to a full man. He had an old quarrel with Yuan Shao, who tried to have Cao Cao kill him on some pretext, but Cao Cao refused to act. -HHJ 28: 334, 339, SGZ 1:16.

Liang Shi 良史. From about 110 the Academician Liang Shi took part in the compilation of a definitive edition of the Five Classics, Changes, History, Poetry, Ritual and Chunqiu, held in the library of the Eastern Pavilion. -HHS 78/68:2513.

Commentaries and editors are generally agreed that Liang Shi is the name of a man, though such a scholar is mentioned nowhere else in the texts describing this work. It is possible that the phrase 博士良史 should be interpreted in a more general sense as simply "good scholars among the Academicians."

Liang Shu 梁淑 (d.159); Anding. A kinsman of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, in 159 Liang Shu was Minister of the Guards. As the power of the family was overthrown in that year, he was arrested and killed. - HHS 7:305:34/24:1186.

Liang Shuang 梁雙; Hanyang. A local rebel, about 210 he stormed Xi city, but later made peace with the authorities. - SGZ 25:703.

Liang Si 梁嗣 see Liang Yin 梁胤.

Liang Song 梁松 [Bosun 伯孫] (d.61); Anding. Eldest son of Liang Tong, he succeeded to his fief about 40. A gentleman cadet, he married the Princess Liu Yiwang, daughter of Emperor Guangwu, and was granted junior office as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. He was generally treated with favour, though he had a brief embarrassment over his association with the critic Du Bao.

On one occasion, when the general Ma Yuan was ill Liang Song called upon him, but he simply bowed before Ma Yuan's couch. Ma Yuan made no acknowledgement. His associates warned him that Liang Song, as son-in-law of the emperor, held great influence at court, but Ma Yuan remarked that he had been a friend of Liang Song's father Liang Tong, both being men of the northwest, and even if Liang Song was an imperial relative he had not shown him the courtesy owed to his age and seniority. Liang Song heard of this and resented it.

As a General of the Household in 49, Liang Song was sent to investigate Ma Yuan's conduct of the campaign against the non-Chinese people of Wuling. Though Ma Yuan's strategy had been successful, he died just before the enemy's surrender. Liang Song reported unfavourably, then joined Dou Gu and other members of his faction to present a posthumous impeachment of Ma Yuan for corruption. The Ma family was disgraced and the influence of their faction at court was ended.

With knowledge of the classics and apocrypha and great understanding of the past, Liang Song joined other scholars discussing the establishment of the Bright Hall, the Hall of the Circular Moat and the ritual altars at Luoyang. He was commissioned to seek, and duly found, justifications in portentous texts for the emperor to celebrate the Feng and Shan sacrifices held in 56, and he led a thousand convict labourers to repair the imperial road to the summit of Mount Tai.

Emperor Guangwu held high regard for Liang Song, and his testamentary edict stated that he should play a senior role in government. Emperor Ming duly appointed Liang Song as Minister Coachman, but in 59 it was found that he had written to commandery and county offices seeking personal advantage. He was dismissed, and in the following year Emperor Ming appointed a daughter of Liang Song's old enemy Ma Yuan as his empress.

Liang Song evidently showed resentment at these set-backs, and in the winter of 61/62 he was accused of treachery and slander. He died in prison and his fief was abolished, while his daughters killed themselves and members of his household were exiled to the far south. - HHS 34/24:1170, 24/14:842-45; Bn 79:112-113, 173-181, Ch'ü 72:300.

Liang Song 梁竦 [Shujing 叔敬] (d.83); Anding. Son of Liang Tong and younger brother of Liang Song 松, he was a precocious student of the Book of Changes, and before he had taken the cap of manhood he was able to give instruction in the Meng interpretation of the classic. When Liang Song his elder brother was imprisoned for slander in 61 Liang Song was sent to exile in Jiuzhen in the far south. Travelling through the lake country of the middle Yangzi, across the Yuan and up the Xiang, he was inspired by thoughts of the ancient heroes Wu Zixu 吳子胥 and Qu Yuan 屈原. He composed a rhapsody, Daosao fu 悼騷賦, on innocent men unjustly treated, then tied the text to a stone and threw it into the water [but not, it appears, before making a copy which is preserved by HHS 34/24 TC quoting DGHJ].

Emperor Ming later granted a pardon to Liang Song and his kindred, and he was able to return to the north. He went back to his home territory in the upper Wei valley and lived there in seclusion, refusing all offers of appointment and paying small attention to managing his estates. Concentrating his attention on problems in the classics, he published his work as "Seven Essays" 七序 Qi xu; Ban Gu compared his achievement to that of Confucius.

Liang Song nonetheless felt frustrated in his isolation from the capital, regarding himself too highly to accept any of the appointments that he was offered in provincial administration. His ambitions, however, were aided by his sister-in-law the Princess Liu Yiwang: even after the disgrace and death of her husband at the hands of her brother Emperor Ming, she continued to support the Liang family, and showed special attention to Liang Song. She gave him clothing, food and items of use, which he promptly distributed to his kinsfolk and to the poor. More significantly, as Liang Song's wife had died early, the princess took over the care of his three daughters, her nieces.

In 77, no doubt through influence of the princess, the two younger daughters of Liang Song were selected into the harem of Emperor Zhang and appointed Honoured Ladies, and in 79 the youngest gave birth to a son, Liu Zhao, future Emperor He. In 82 the Empress Dou, unable to bear children herself, had Liu Zhao named as Heir.

The Liang were delighted at the prospects of honour and power which this offered, but their ambitions were a threat to the empress and her family. In 83 an anonymous letter accused Liang Song of treason, and orders were sent for the Administrator of Hanyang to arrest him and put him to question. Liang Song died in prison there, the two imperial concubines were either killed or committed suicide, and other members of the family and their households were arrested or sent to exile in the far south.

The background to the affair was hidden within the palace, and it is said that no-one knew that Emperor He, who came to the throne in 88, had any connection to the Liang. The power of the Dou clan was destroyed by Emperor He in 92, but it was not until the death of the Empress, now Dowager, in 97, that the Liang family ventured to present their case to the throne.

Liang Song's nephew Liang Hu, son of Liang Song 松, then had his cousin Liang Shan claim the rights due to the late concubine as the mother of the ruler, while Liang Song's surviving daughter Liang Yi told how the intrigues of the Dou had ruined his mother and his grandfather. The youngest Lady Liang was accordingly granted posthumous title as an empress and was buried in full ceremony with her sister, while Liang Hu and Liang Yi were sent with an imperial escort to bring the body of Liang Song, now honoured as a marquis, from his prison grave in Hanyang for reburial in full regalia by the tomb of his daughter. - HHS 34/24:1170-74*, XC 1:13a.

Liang Tai 梁太 see Liang Da 梁大.

Liang Tang 梁棠; Anding. Eldest son of Liang Song 諫, when his father was executed through the intrigues of the Empress Dou and her family in 83 Liang Tang and his kinsmen and household were exiled to Jiuzhen in the far south. After the death of the Empress, now Dowager, Dou in 97, and through the petition of his sister Liang Yi, the family was restored to favour and in the following year Liang Tang and his brothers Yong and Di returned from exile. On their way through Changsha they passed by the estate of Dou Xiang, brother of the late Dou Xian, who had been sent from court after the fall of his family in 92. The Liang brothers forced him to commit suicide.

When they arrived at Luoyang each of the brothers was enfeoffed as a marquis, with estates of five thousand households and the rank of Specially Advanced, allowing them to reside at the capital. They were also awarded landed property, mansions, slaves, horses and carriages, and troops of guards armed with crossbows. The fortunes of the Liang were greater than before, and Liang Tang rose to become Minister Herald. -HHS 34/24:1172-74.

Liang Tao 梁桃; Anding. Son of Liang Yin and grandson of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, in 154 Liang Tao was enfeoffed as marquis of a county. -HHS 34/24: 1185.

Liang Teng 梁騰; Anding. A cousin of Liang Tong, he joined him in giving support to the imperial campaign against Wei Ao. After the victory in 33 Liang Tong was given title as a full marquis, while Liang Teng became a secondary marquis and was made an officer for agriculture in Jiuquan. -HHS 34/24:1166.

Liang Tong 梁統 [Zhongning 仲寧]; Anding. Liang Tong's family claimed descent from an official of the ancient state of Jin 晉. During Former Han the lineage had moved from Hedong to Beidi, but later paid for permission to transfer from the frontier to the territory about Chang'an. However Liang Tong's grandfather Pu 溥 and his father Yan 延 acquired expertise and served as majors on the north-western frontier, and in the last years of Former Han they returned to residence in Anding.

A strict man, fond of the law, Liang Tong was a local officer in his commandery and in the provincial government. In 24 he was named a General of the Household by the new Gengshi Emperor of Han, then sent as Administrator to Jiuquan with a commission to bring the northwest under control. His official authority was surpassed by the personal influence of Dou Rong, and when the Red Eyebrows destroyed the Gengshi Emperor at Chang'an Liang Tong joined Dou Rong in raising troops to hold the passes. Ceding leadership to Dou Rong, who took title as a chief general, Liang Tong became Administrator of Wuwei. His rule was firm, and his influence kept neighbouring territories in order.

As Dou Rong made contact with Emperor Guangwu in 29, Liang Tong and other men of family sent private messengers to the court. Liang Tong received title as a general in addition to his commandery office, and he later killed Wei Ao's envoy Zhang Xuan. When Guangwu attacked Wei Ao in 32 Liang Tong again joined Dou Rong in support, and in 33 he held a subordinate command under Geng Yan at the siege of Wei Ao's former officer Gao Jun in Anding. He was named Marquis Who Achieves Honour 成義侯, while his brother and cousins received secondary fiefs.

The family returned to the northwest, but in 36 Liang Tong accompanied Dou Rong and his fellows to the capital, where they were received with honours. Liang Tong was enfeoffed with a county in the south-eastern commandery of Linhuai, together with the title Servant at Court, excusing him from the requirement to reside there. He was also made a Palace Counsellor, while his four sons became gentleman cadets.

As Palace Counsellor in 38, Liang Tong pressed for harsher punishments and less frequent amnesties to ensure greater obedience to the law, and Guangwu called a court conference to consider the question. The minister Du Lin presented the majority view that the lenient policy of the recent past was more effective, and the emperor agreed.

Soon afterwards Liang Tong was sent out as Administrator of Jiujiang, while his fief was finally set in Qinghe. Again he achieved a reputation for strong government, but he died in that office about 40. -HHS 34/24:1165-70*.

Liang Wei 梁鮪 [Boyuan 伯元] (d.107); Hedong. As a clerk in the offices of the Grand Commandant, Liang Wei was known as an expert on the calendar. As Jia Kui prepared his report on the revised Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] system for Emperor Zhang in 85, he consulted Liang Wei.

Liang Wei became Minister of the Household under Emperor He, and in 106 he was promoted to be Excellency over the Masses under the regent Dowager Deng. He died in the following year. -HHS 4:196, 5:206, 92/2:3027.

Liang Xi 梁習 [Ziyu 子虞] (d.230); Chen. Having served as a local officer in his commandery, in 196 Liang Xi was appointed by Cao Cao as a county magistrate in Dongping, and he held several more such appointments in the east. He maintained good government in all his territories, though when he was in the north of Guangling about 200 he was driven from his office by a local rebellion and was saved only through the protection of the local officer and leader Xu Xuan.

Liang Xi served for a time as a clerk in Cao Cao's offices, but in 206 he was sent to Bing province with appointment as Inspector and military command as a senior major. Gao Gan, the Inspector appointed by Yuan Shao, had been defeated and killed, but many of his supporters remained active, and non-Chinese from the north had entered the frontier. Many of the local people had run away to join the invaders, others had gathered into self-defence groups, and there were many local warlords to cause trouble.

Liang Xi encouraged the common people to return to their homes, and he persuaded the local leaders to accept nomination for office under Cao Cao. As these chieftains departed, he gathered their private troops into an auxiliary force of "volunteers" and set his own officers to command them. Transferring several thousand people to the region about Ye city, he dealt firmly with any who opposed him, including the non-Chinese [see, for example, sub Yuyan and sub Luxi]. Eventually the whole province accepted his authority and the Xiongnu returned to allegiance; it was said that the later settlement of the Xiongnu by Cao Cao, confirmed in his reception of the Shanyu Huchuan to reside at Ye in 216, was based upon the work of Liang Xi.

On the other hand, despite Liang Xi's achievements, much of the north was beyond the control of the new regime. In 215 the commanderies of Yunzhong, Dingxiang, Wuyuan and Shuofang were all formally abandoned, and this withdrawal presents a truer picture than the historian's praise of Liang Xi. The Bing province of his time was little more than the region south of the Sanggan and east of the Yellow River: Yanmen, Taiyuan, Shangdang and part of Xihe. Liang Xi may have established a reasonable position in the area of present-day Shanxi, but the Chinese writ ran no further.

Within the area which he did control, Liang Xi encouraged local agriculture, and he recommended a number of men for office, including both locals and refugees. Such men as Chang Lin, Yang Jun and Wang Ling were initially appointed as county magistrates, and many of them became famous. Cao Cao enfeoffed Liang Xi as a secondary marquis.

In 213 Bing was absorbed into Ji province. Liang Xi was recalled to Ye city as a Consultant and then became Area Commander for the west of Ji province, controlling much the same territory as before, with his base in Taiyuan. He was also given responsibility for collecting timber from Shangdang to be used for new buildings at Ye, and he established agricultural colonies along the road to provide for the men and beasts engaged in transport. In 215 he killed the renegade Wuhuan chieftain Luxi, and was rewarded with a full marquise.

When Cao Pi succeeded his father in 220 he restored Bing province and re-appointed Liang Xi as Inspector, and in 225 Liang Xi defeated the Xianbi chieftain Kebineng. He returned to the capital as Minister of Finance in 228, and was honoured by Cao Rui for his twenty years' work in the north. He died two years later. -SGZ 15:469-70*.

Liang Xing 梁興 (d.212); Zuopingyi. One of the north-western warlords defeated by Cao Cao at Huayin in 211, Liang Xing was killed by Zheng Hun in the following year. -SGZ 16:510-11, 17:525, 528, 1:36, 9: 270, SGZ Shu 6:946.

Liang Xiu 梁休 [Yuanjian 元堅] (d.222). Having held local office in his commandery, Liang Xiu was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, served as a gentleman cadet and held clerical appointment in the offices of the Excellencies and under the Minister of the Household. He left office for a time during the Great Proscription, but was also a magistrate in Guanghan, then retired and died at home. -LX 1:4a-6b.

Liang Xuan 梁宣, the Lady, see the Lady Xuan, mother of the Empress Deng of Emperor Huan.

Liang Xun 梁巡; Anding. Twin brother of Liang Tong, he joined him in giving support to the imperial campaign against Wei Ao. After the victory in 33, while Liang Tong was given title as a full marquis, Liang Xun received a secondary fief. -HHS 34/24:1166.

Liang Yan 梁衍. In 190 Liang Yan was a senior staff officer under the general Huangfu Song. When Dong Zhuo called Huangfu Song to the capital, Liang Yan urged him to raise troops against the illegitimate holder of power. Huangfu Song, however, insisted on obeying the formal summons. -HHS 71/61:2306.

Liang Yan 梁焉 see Liang Ma 梁馬.

Liang Yi 梁嫫 or Liang Ping 憑, the Lady (62-?); Anding. Eldest daughter of Liang Song 竦, the Lady married Fan Tiao, member of a great clan in Nanyang. In 77 her two sisters were selected into the harem of Emperor Zhang and became Honoured Ladies; in 79 the youngest gave birth to Liu Zhao, future Emperor He.

In 83 Liang Yi's father Liang Song was executed and both her sisters the Honoured Ladies died, but Liang Yi's marriage meant she was regarded as a member of her husband's clan and so she escaped the sentence of banishment applied to her kinsmen. The power of the Dou clan was destroyed by Emperor He in 92, but it was not until 97, when the Empress, now Dowager, died, that the Liang family ventured to present their case to the throne.

Initially, Liang Song's nephew Liang Hu had his cousin Liang Shan claim the rights due to the late concubine as mother to the sovereign, but Liang Yi followed this by a petition to the emperor, describing the intrigues of the Dou which had brought the deaths of his mother and grandfather and the disgrace of the family, and asking that they be restored to their proper position of honour. The emperor was astonished and touched, but he had the Lady questioned by senior eunuchs. All her answers tallied, and she was then granted an audience at which she gave a full account of the sad history. She stayed at the palace for several months, and as she departed she received gifts of clothing, cash, silk, landed property and slaves, treasure of enormous value.

Liang Yi was a woman of high moral standards, and her imperial nephew became increasingly fond of her. He gave her title as Lady Liang 梁夫人, and appointed her husband Fan Tiao as an officer in the corps of guards of the Feathered Forest. -HHS 34/24:1172-73, HHJ 14:171-73.

Liang Yi 梁懿; Nanyang. A senior member of staff to the Administrator Lu Nu in 163, Liang Yi was associated with the new temple at the source of the Huai in the mountains to the east of the commandery. -LS 2:12a-14b, Nagata 94:142.

Liang Yin 梁胤 also as Liang Si 嗣 (d.159); Anding. Son of Liang Ji, after Emperor Huan was brought to the throne in 146, Liang Yin was enfeoffed as a marquis with revenue from ten thousand households.

In the early 150s Liang Ji had Liang Yin named Intendant of Henan in succession to his uncle Liang Buyi. This move kept the sensitive office in the hands of the family, but Liang Yin was only sixteen sui at the time. He looked ridiculous in his official robes, and he was so ugly that he was known as the "barbarian dog" 胡狗. Later, his mother Sun Shou had Liang Yin destroy the family of Liang Ji's mistress You Tongqi.

When Liang Ji was destroyed by Emperor Huan and his eunuch allies in 159, Liang Yin was arrested and died in prison. -HHS 7:305:34/24:1179-80, 1185-86.

At HHSJJ 36/26:1319-20, the modern commentator Hui Dong argues that Liang Yin was the same person as Liang Buyi, but Su Yu says this is not correct.

Liang Yong 梁雍; Anding. Second son of Liang Song 竦, when their father was executed through the intrigues of the Empress Dou and her family in 83 Liang Yong and his brothers Tang and Di were exiled to Jiuzhen in the far south. In 97, however, after the death of the Lady Dou the family was restored to favour. As the brothers returned from exile in the following year they passed through Changsha and called at the estate of Dou Huai/Xiang, brother of the late Dou Xian, who had been sent away from court after the fall of his family in 92. They forced him to commit suicide.

As they came to Luoyang, each of the brothers was enfeoffed as a marquis, with estates of five thousand households and the rank of Specially Advanced, allowing them to reside at the capital. They were also awarded quantities of landed property, mansions, slaves, horses and carriages, and troops of guards armed with crossbows. The fortunes of the Liang were greater than ever before, and Liang Yong rose to become Minister Steward. -HHS 34/24:1172-74.

Liang Yongguo 梁永國 [Shuru 叔儒]. As magistrate of a county in Xiapi, he ran a peaceful government with minimal action. -HQ 2:9a.

Liang Yu 梁郁. A student at the Imperial University about 80, he was jealous and resentful of his colleagues Kong Xi and Cui Yin. He reported them for having spoken disrespectfully of Emperor Wu of Former Han, and the two young men were threatened with execution. -HHS 79/69A:2560.

Liang Yu 梁寓 [Kongru 孔儒]; Wu. In 219, after Sun Quan had taken Jing province and was prepared for a revenge attack by Liu Bei, he sent Liang Yu with tribute to the court of Wei. Cao Cao appointed Liang Yu to clerical office on his staff, but soon afterwards sent him back to the south. -SGZ Wu 2:1121.

Liang Zhai 梁翟 see Liang Di 梁翟.

Liang Zhan 梁湛 (d.107); Longxi. Administrator of Runan, Liang Zhan died in office. His officer Miao Tong escorted his body home and erected his tomb under most difficult conditions. -HHS 81/71:2686.

Liang Zhong 梁忠 (d.159); Anding. A kinsman of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, in 159 Liang Zhong was a colonel in the Northern Army. As the power of the family was overthrown in that year he was arrested and killed. -HHS 7:305:34/24:1186, HYGZ 10B:156.

Liang Zhongning 梁仲寧 (d.184). A leader of Yellow Turbans, Liang Zhongning was defeated and killed by a troop of Huangfu Song's army led by Fu Xie. -HHS 58/48:1875.

Lianglong 梁龍 see Liang Long 梁龍.

Lianxiu 連休; Xianbi. A chieftain of Liaodong, in 117 Lianxiu led a raiding party to attack and plunder Chinese positions on the frontier. The Wuhuan Yuzhiju, however, who had an old quarrel with Lianxiu, joined the commandery troops in pursuit, defeated the raiders, and took 1300 heads. -HHS 90/80:2987; deC 84:391.

Liao Bo 廖伯; Guanghan. Husband of the Lady Yin Jipei, he died young. -HYGZ 10B:153.

Liao Chun 廖淳 see Liao Hua 廖化.

Liao Dun 廖惇 see Liao Hua 廖化.

Liao Fu 廖扶 [Wenqi 文起]; Runan. Liao Fu's father had been Administrator of Beidi, but he was held responsible when the commandery was over-run by the Qiang during the great rebellion in 108, and he died in prison. Liao Fu was devastated, and resolved on the life of a hermit. A scholar of the Classic of Poetry according to the Han interpretation, and of the New Text Classic of History following Ouyang Gao, he maintained a school of several hundred students. He was several times invited to office, but refused to consider affairs of state, and though he was skilled in astrology, the apocrypha and divination by the wind, he would not even offer an interpretation of portents.

Liao Fu lived in his ancestral territory, north of the local town. Realising that a great drought was coming, he amassed a store of grain which he shared with his kinsmen and with those reduced to penury by the deaths of their families. Admired as a local sage, he was over eighty when he died. -HHS 82/72A:2719-20*, XC 6:5b; Ngo 76:98-100, DeWoskin 86:61-62.

Liao Hua 廖化 [Yuanjian 元儉] (d.264); Nanyang.

Liao Hua's original personal name was Chun 淳, but he changed it; it sometimes appears as Dun 惇.

Registrar to Guan Yu in Jing province, when the territory was seized by Wu in 219 Liao Hua submitted to the invaders, but two years later he managed to rejoin Liu Bei as he attacked down the Yangzi. He joined Zhuge Liang's staff, rose to high military command and received enfeoffment. Together with Zong Yu, Liao Hua died on the road to Luoyang after the surrender to Wei. -SGZ Shu 15:1077*.

Liao Ji 廖覲 was Administrator of Julu. -FSTY 6f: 142.

Liao Li 廖立 [Gongyuan 公淵]; Wuling. At the age of thirty Liao Li became an Assistant Officer to Liu Bei in Jing province. Admired by Zhuge Liang, he was appointed Administrator of Changsha, but when Lü Meng attacked that territory in 215 he abandoned his post and fled to the west.

Liu Bei still respected his ability, so he did not punish him but made him Administrator of Ba commandery. When he took title as King of Hanzhong in 219 he named Liao Li as a Palace Attendant.

Under Liu Shan Liao Li held only a colonel's position at court, but he considered himself to be the equal of Zhuge Liang and resented his lowly position. As he expressed this too clearly, Zhuge Liang had him reduced to commoner rank and exiled to the northwest. -SGZ Shu 10:997-98*.

Liao Meng 廖孟; Guanghan. Son of Liao Bo, he was cared for by his widow Yin Jipei. -HYGZ 10B:153.

Liao Mengju 廖孟舉; Runan. Sons of Liao Fu, both Liao Mengju and his younger brother Weiju made names for themselves. -HHS 82/72A:2720; Ngo 76: 100, DeWoskin 86:62.

Liao Weiju 廖偉舉; Runan. Sons of Liao Fu, Liao Weiju and his elder brother Mengju both became well known. -HHS 82/72A:2720; Ngo 76:100, DeWoskin 86:62.

Liao Xi 廖析 was Administrator of Guiyang in 163, but when bandits attacked the commandery he fled. -HHS 86/76:2834.

Liao Xin 廖信. Administrator of Beidi, about 68 Liao Xin was found guilty of extortion and was sent to prison. His goods were confiscated, and Emperor Ming distributed his property among the various officials. -HHS 79/69B:2578.

Liao Zhan 廖湛 (d.26); Nanyang. In 22 the bandit Troops from Xinshi in Jiangxia, led by Wang Kuang and others, crossed into the south of Nanyang. In response, the commoners Chen Mu and Liao Zhan raised an insurrection of their own. They styled their party the Troops from Pinglin and joined forces with the Troops from Xinshi.

In the autumn of that year, further to the north, Liu Bosheng, elder brother of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu, rose in rebellion against Wang Mang, and he sent his kinsman Liu Jia to propose an alliance. This was agreed to, and Liu Bosheng gained substantial reinforcements. As Bielenstein observes, however, the commoner troops whose support he was compelled to seek would later be responsible for his loss of the leadership of the movement which he had begun.

The combined force moved against Wan city, capital of Nanyang commandery, but the rebels were heavily defeated at Xiao-Chang'an, south of the city, by a commandery army under Wang Mang's officers Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci. Liao Zhan and his colleagues threatened to leave the losing cause, but Liu Bosheng recruited another group, the Troops from the Lower Yangzi, led by Wang Chang, Cheng Dan and Zhang Ang, and the balance against Wang Mang's local forces was restored.

In the winter at the beginning of 23 the rebels again fought the army of Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci, and on this occasion they achieved decisive victory and killed both enemy commanders. A few weeks later they defeated another army commanded by Zhuang You and Chen Mao, then advanced to besiege Wan. At this time, however, in the spring of 23, the leaders of the Troops arranged a coup to depose Liu Bosheng as leader of the rebellion and to proclaim Liu Xuan as [the Gengshi] Emperor. Liao Zhan was named Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital and a post equivalent to ministerial rank, and he was later made a chief general.

In 24 the Gengshi Emperor named Liao Zhan as king of a county in Nanyang. Bielenstein observes that the pattern of enfeoffments at this time reflected a political setback for the former bandit chieftains as against their rivals of the Nanyang gentry, and Liao Zhan lost his office as Bearer of the Mace about this time.

In 25 Liao Zhan took part in the unsuccessful campaign against Deng Yu in Hedong, then joined Zhang Ang in Chang'an and entered his conspiracy against the Gengshi Emperor. The plot was found out, but Liao Zhan, Zhang Ang and Hu Yin then plundered the markets, attacked the palace and drove the emperor out of the city. They were joined by Wang Kuang, but after a month of fighting the rebels were driven from Chang'an by the loyalists Li Song and Zhao Meng.

As the Red Eyebrows approached Chang'an in the winter of 25, the former chieftains went to join them, and when the Gengshi Emperor surrendered they persuaded the victors to have him killed. Though his colleagues soon fell out with the newcomers, Liao Zhan established himself among their leaders. In the spring of 26 he held command of an army operating north of the Wei River, but he was defeated and killed by Liu Jia in Zuopingyi. -HHS 11/1:468-74; Bn 54:136, Bn 59.98-102, 117.

Lin 蘭, the Lady (d.49). Concubine of Ma Yuan, she bore his fourth son Ma Keqing and his youngest daughter the future Empress Ma of Emperor Ming. The death of Ma Yuan in 49 was followed closely by that of the young Ma Keqing, who had been recognised as a child of great potential. Demented by grief, the Lady Lin also died. -HHS 10A:407.

Lin Shuo 臨/林碩 [Xiaocun 孝存]; Beihai. A noted local gentleman and scholar, he compiled a commentary to Zhou li. In the early 190s the Chancellor Kong Rong honoured him posthumously with offerings at his county altar. -HHS 70/60:2263; Hou Kang:2108, Yao Zhenzong:2318. The surname of this man appears both as 臨 and as 林.

Ling, Emperor 靈帝 (reg. 169-189) see Liu Hong 劉宏.

Ling 冷 [surname] appears also as 伶 and 冷.

Ling 陵/凌 [personal name unknown] see Dai Ling 戴陵. -LS 19:4a; Goodman 98:197.

Ling Cao 凌操 (d.203); Wu. A man from the hill country, Ling Cao is described as a wandering bravo 輕俠, generous and brave, but cunning. He joined Sun Ce at an early stage of his career, took a leading role in fighting, then became a magistrate in the west of Wu, where he brought the non-Chinese of the hill country to submit and was given title as a colonel.

In 203 Ling Cao took part in Sun Quan's first attack on Huang Zu. The army was victorious but Gan Ning, in Huang Zu's rearguard, shot Ling Cao as he followed in pursuit. Gan Ning later joined the Sun group, and there was always tension between him and Ling Cao's son Tong. -SGZ Wu 10:1295-96.

Ling Hong 冷宏 [surname also as 冷 or 岑

岑]. An officer of the Imperial Secretariat in 120, Ling Hong argued that the new king of Lecheng, Liu Chang, who had been accused of Impiety, should be treated leniently. Since he had been appointed to the throne from another lineage he had not been expected to gain such a position, and so he had not been given the moral tutoring a regular heir would receive to guide him to proper conduct. Though a charge of Impiety carried the death penalty, Liu Chang was only degraded to a county marquisate.

Later, as Administrator of Chenliu, Ling Hong was impressed by the scholarship of Wu You. He nominated him Filial and Incorrupt, and refused to endorse criticism of his erratic behaviour at the farewell ceremony. -HHJ 16:196-97, HHS 50/40:1674, 64/54:2100.

Ling Shouguang 冷壽光 [surname also as 冷 and 靈]. At the end of the second century, Ling Shouguang was noted for his long life. He nourished his vital essence by coupling with women but refusing to ejaculate, and he also engaged in breathing exercises. It is said that he lived over a hundred and fifty years, with white hair and beard but the complexion of a man aged thirty. -HHS 82/72B:2740; Ngo 76:126.

Ling Tian 令田 see Lingtian 令田.

Ling Tong 凌統 [Gongxu 公績] (189-217); Wu. Son of Ling Cao, Ling Tong was fifteen years old in 203 when his father was killed by Gan Ning fighting against Huang Zu. Sun Quan nonetheless gave him command of his father's men and named him a senior major with acting authority as a colonel.

Ling Tong took part in settling resistance in the Poyang region of Yuzhang, and in 206 he was ordered to join the attack on the recalcitrant camp of Mo, on the edge of Huang Zu's territory. Before the battle, his fellow-officer Chen Qin got drunk at a banquet and insulted Ling Tong and his late father. Ling Tong attempted to ignore him, but Chen Qin pursued the matter outside, and eventually Ling Tong turned on him; Chen Qin died of his wounds a few days later.

Ashamed of this internal feuding, Ling Tong inspired his men to great efforts, and he expiated his crime by breaking the enemy defences and leading the way to victory.

As the army advanced against Huang Zu, Ling Tong played a leading role fighting on the river, and in 208 he joined Pang Xi in a sortie which broke the enemy's boom defending the mouth of the Han and opened the way for the final attack. Later that year he was in the defence against Cao Cao at the Red Cliffs and was appointed a substantive colonel. During the attack on Jiangling in 209 Ling Tong was left in command of the base with a skeleton force while the main army went upstream to support a bridgehead held by Gan Ling.

In 214 Ling Tong was at the capture of Huan city in Lujiang, and he was raised to be a General of the Household and notional Chancellor of Pei, at that time outside Sun control. He joined the campaign in Jing province in 215 and later that year he accompanied the attack on Hefei. As the army was defeated and withdrew, Sun Quan was cut off, but Ling Tong and three hundred Companions 親近 held a bridge behind him until he had made his escape. Though seriously wounded, he swam his way to safety. Sun Quan showed his gratitude and promoted Long Tong to lieutenant-general, with double the number of troops.

In 217 Ling Tong was ordered to settle the east of Sun territory, being Wu commandery and Kuaiji, with ten thousand troops and authority to commandeer any supplies he needed. Soon after he arrived at his old home near present-day Hangzhou, however, he was taken ill and died.

Ling Tong was well-mannered, generous by nature, and interested in scholarship. He had small concern for wealth, but a great sense of honour. Sun Quan mourned him deeply, had a stele engraved in his honour, and had his two young sons, Ling Lie 烈 and Ling Feng 封, taken into his palace and treated as his own. -SGZ Wu 10:1295-97*.

Ling Zheng 冷徵 [surname also as 伶 and 冷]. Protector of the Qiang in 184, Ling Zheng was killed by mutineers at the beginning of the rebellion in Liang province. -HHS 72/62:2320, 87/77:2899; deC 84:147, 492.

Lingchang 零昌 see Lianchang 零昌.

Linghu Ba 令弧霸 see sub Linghu Yu 令弧禹.

Linghu Chang 令弧瑒 see sub Linghu Pu 令弧溥.

Linghu Chun 令弧淳 see sub Linghu Yu 令弧禹.

Linghu Fu 令弧扶 see sub Linghu You 令弧由.

Linghu Huan 令弧渙 see sub Linghu Yu 令弧禹.

Linghu Huang 令弧璜 see sub Linghu Pu 令弧溥.

Linghu Hui 令弧輝 see sub Linghu Pu 令弧溥.

Linghu Jian 令弧堅 see sub Linghu You 令弧由.

Linghu Jin 令弧瑾 see sub Linghu You 令弧由.

Linghu Lue 令弧略; Taiyuan. Member of a leading local family, in 24 his family power was broken by Feng Yan, an officer of the Gengshi Emperor.

Linghu Lue later became chief clerk to the Excellency of Works Song Hong at the court of Emperor Guangwu. In 30 or 31 Feng Yan sent in a memorial proposing reforms, and Guangwu wanted to see him. Linghu Lue, however, told Wang Hu and Zhousheng Feng of the Imperial Secretariat that Feng Yan would slander them, and the two men prevented the audience taking place. -HHS 28/18A:977.

Linghu Meng 令弧猛 see sub Linghu You 令弧由.

Linghu Ming 令弧明 see sub Linghu Yu 令弧禹.

Linghu Pu 令弧溥 [Wenwu 文悟]; Dunhuang. XTS 76B:3397 says that Linghu Pu, youngest son of Linghu Yu 禹, became Administrator of Cangwu.

XTS also gives the names of three brothers of Linghu Pu: Hui 輝, Qia 洽 and Yan 延; and of three sons, Huang 璜, Rui 叡 and Chang 瑒; but says nothing further about any of them.

Linghu Qia 令弧洽 see sub Linghu Pu 令弧溥.

Linghu Rong 令弧容 see sub Linghu Yu 令弧禹.

Linghu Rui 令弧叡 see sub Linghu Pu 令弧溥.

Linghu Shao 令弧邵 [Kongshu 孔叔]; Taiyuan. A man of family, Linghu Shao's father was Protector of the Qiang. About 196 Linghu Shao went to live at Ye city under Yuan Shao. As Cao Cao attacked the Yuan in 204 Linghu Shao took refuge in a fortress to the west of the city, but Cao Cao captured the place. About a dozen men were to be executed, but Cao Cao saw that Linghu Shao appeared to be of good family and asked him about his background. When he found that he had known Linghu Shao's father, he released him and appointed him to his staff.

Linghu Shao later served as a county magistrate, returned to a senior post on Cao Cao's staff as Imperial Chancellor, and was then appointed Administrator of Hongnong. Disliking lawsuits and treating his officers in friendly and informal fashion, he maintained an honest and generous government. He was particularly concerned to encourage education and scholarship, and chose his best young men to go to Hedong and study with Yue Xiang, expert on Zuo zhuan and the other Confucian classics.

As Cao Pi took power in 220 he called Linghu Shao to the capital to take charge of military cadets. He died about 224. -SGZ 16:514; Fang 65:92-93.

Linghu Xian 令弧羨 see sub Linghu You 令弧由.

Linghu Yan 令弧延 see sub Linghu Pu 令弧溥.

Linghu Yang 令弧瑒 see sub Linghu Pu 令弧溥.

Linghu You 令弧由 [Zhongping 仲平]; Dunhuang. XTS 75B:3379 says that Linghu You was the third son of Linghu Cheng 稱, who had settled in Dunhuang after a failed rebellion against Wang Mang, and that Linghu You became a Commandant at Yiwu near present-day Hami; this was presumably in the early 70s, but see sub Linghu Yu.

XTS also gives the names of five brothers of Linghu You: Fu 扶, Jian 堅, Xian 羨, Jin 瑾 and Meng 猛, but says nothing further of them.

Linghu Yu 令弧禹 [Juxian 巨先]; Dunhuang. XTS 75B:3379 says that Linghu Yu, eldest son of Linghu You, was Administrator of Boling. Since that commandery was not established until 159, while Linghu You was a man of the first century, there is anachronism.

XTS also gives the names of five brothers of Linghu Yu: Ba 霸, Rong 容, Ming 明, Huan 渙 and Chun 淳, but says nothing further of them.

Linghu Yu 令弧愚 (d.249); Taiyuan. As a young man Linghu Yu had high ambitions and the people of his family expected him to make the fortunes of their house. His uncle Linghu Shao had doubts, but Linghu Yu held a number of positions under Cao Cao and did well.

As Inspector of Yan province in 249, Linghu Yu joined a conspiracy against Sima Yi. He died soon afterwards, but when the plot was discovered two years later, his tomb was broken open, his corpse was exposed, and his close relatives were killed. -SGZ 16: 514; Fang 65:42, 83-84.

Linghu [Zibo] 令弧子伯; Taiyuan. An old friend of the hermit Wang Ba from the same commandery, Linghu Zibo became Chancellor of Chu. On one occasion he sent his son, now also an official, to deliver a letter to Wang Ba. Wang Ba's son was so dazzled by the distinguished visitor that he could not look him in the face, and Wang Ba was ashamed that his simple life had made his son simple too. -HHS 84/74:2782; Vervoorn 90:193-194.

Lingtian 令田; non-Chinese. A chieftain of the Zuodu people, in 108 Lingtian offered tribute and submission on behalf of 310,000 people in three tribes from the southwest of the empire. Their goods included yellow gold and ornamental tassels made of yak hair. Lingtian was granted a noble title. -HHS 86/76:2857.

Little Emperor, the 少帝 (reg. 125) see Liu Yi 劉懿.

Little Emperor, the 少帝 (reg. 189) see Liu Bian 劉

辯.

Little Lord on a Piebald Horse 駁馬少伯 see Boma Shaobo 駁馬少伯.

Liu 劉, the Lady I. The name of the Lady's father is not recorded, but she was granted title as Princess of Gaoping in Shanyang. She married Fu Chen and became the mother of the historian Fu Wuji. -DGHJ 13:1b.

Liu 劉, the Lady II. A daughter of Liu Ying the King of Chu, she was enfeoffed as Princess of a district. She evidently married Fan Shang about 70. -HHS 32/22:1123.

Liu 劉, the Lady III. A daughter of Liu Cang the King of Dongping, she was enfeoffed as Princess of Neihuang in Wei. She married Dou Mu the son of Dou Rong. -HHS 23/13:808.

Liu 劉, the Lady IV. A daughter of Liu Qiang the King of Donghai, she was enfeoffed as Princess of Biyang in Nanyang. Her husband Dou Xun was disgraced and died in prison, but in 78 their eldest daughter became empress of Emperor Zhang. In 88 the Lady Dou, now regent Dowager, granted her mother title as a Senior Princess and the revenues of a county. -HHS 10A:415-16.

Liu 劉, the Lady V (d.161). Wife and then widow of Cui Yuan, the Lady was described as generous, well-educated and frugal. After the death of her husband in 142 she aided in maintaining the traditions of the family, and assisted her son Cui Shi in his administration of the frontier commandery of Wuyuan. Cai Yong composed a eulogy for her. -HHS 52/42:1730, Cai 6:6; Ebrey 78: 39.

Liu 劉, the Lady VI. A younger sister of Emperor Huan, the Lady became Senior Princess of Changshe in Yingchuan. She married Geng Yuan/Shou. -HHS 10B:442-43, 19/9:714.

Liu 劉, the Lady VII. A younger sister of Emperor Huan, the Lady became Senior Princess of Yiyang in Changsha. She married a junior cousin of Kou Rong. -HHS 10B:442-43, 16/6:627.

Liu 劉, the Lady VIII. Daughter of Emperor Ling, in 180 the Lady was appointed Princess of Wannian in Zuopingyi. -HHS 10B:462.

Liu 劉, the Lady IX; Kuaiji. Wife of Xu Yu, she died about 180, when he was Minister of Finance. A stele was erected to her memory. -LX 2:6a-7b.

Liu 劉, the Lady X. A senior concubine of Cao Cao, about 177 she bore his first son Cao Ang, and later gave birth to the Princess of Qinghe. She died soon afterwards, while still young. -SGZ 5:158, 20:579; C/C 99.91.

Liu 劉, the Lady XI. A concubine of Cao Cao, she was the mother of Cao Ji. -SGZ 20:579.

Liu 劉, the Lady XII; Langye. Daughter of Liu Xun, she was healed of a leg ulcer by Hua Tuo. -HHS 82/72B:2736, SGZ 29:803.

Liu 劉, the Lady XIII; Runan. Daughter of a prosperous local family, about 190 she was sought in marriage by Lü Fan. He was not of wealthy background, and the Lady's mother demurred. Her father, however, was confident Lü Fan would do well in future and he approved the match. -SGZ Wu 11:1309.

Liu 劉, the Lady XIV; Shanyang. The Lady was a daughter of Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province. About 193 Liu Biao considered having her marry the exiled scholar Wang Can. Disapproving of Wang Can's appearance and conduct, however, he gave the young woman to his cousin Wang Kai. -SGZ 28:796.

Liu 劉, the Lady XV. A later wife of Yuan Shao, the Lady urged him to make his youngest son Shang his heir.

The Lady was very jealous. When Yuan Shao died in 202 she killed five of his concubines and, lest there was life in the after-world and they met Yuan Shao there, she had the faces of the dead women blackened and their hair cut off.

In 204 the Lady was captured at Ye city by Cao Cao in the company of her daughter-in-law the Lady Zhen, wife of Yuan Xi. She introduced her to Cao Pi, and the Lady Zhen became his consort. -HHS 74/64A:2403, SGZ 6:201, 5:160; Cutter 92:579, C/C 99.97-98.

Liu 劉, the Lady XVI. Wife of Zhen Yan, after his death in 196 she and their child were cared for by her sister-in-law Lady Zhen, future consort of Cao Pi, Emperor Wen of Wei. In 236 the Lady Zhen's son Cao Rui, Emperor Ming, granted the Lady Liu enfeoffment. -SGZ 5:159, 162; C/C 99.97, 101.

Liu 劉, the Ladies. Daughters of Liu Xie, Emperor Xian of Han, in 220 the Ladies were offered as concubines to Cao Pi the King of Wei, and after Cao Pi had taken the imperial title they entered his harem. -SGZ 5:160; Fang 52:37-40, C/C 99.97.

The Sanfu jue of Zhao Qi says that one of Emperor Xian's daughters was given in marriage to Dou Yuan.

Liu 劉 [personal name unknown]. Holder of a fief in Bohai, and formerly Administrator of Ba commandery and Minister of the Imperial Clan, he was honoured with a stele set up jointly with a former Chancellor of Zhongshan, surnamed Xue. Most of the inscription is lost. -LS 26:9b, LX 1:9b-10b.

Liu 劉 [personal name unknown]. In 188 the Inspector of Ji province Wang Fen organised a conspiracy to kidnap Emperor Ling and put another member of the Liu house on the throne. The plot was discovered and Wang Fen killed himself.

Wang Fen's candidate is described as the Marquis of Hefei, a county in Jiujiang. Though he was presumably a member of the imperial clan, nothing is recorded of his name and lineage nor of the history of the fief. -SGZ 1:4-5.

Liu 劉 [personal name unknown]; Langye. Elder brother of Liu Xun 勳, he was Inspector of Yu province but died of illness. -SGZ 12:387.

Liu 劉 [personal name unknown] (d.206?). Son and successor 嗣子 of Liu Zhong the King of Ganling, he was killed by a group of Yellow Turbans. He left no heir, and in 206 the state was abolished by the Han government under the control of Cao Cao.

HHS Annals have no record of this man, and the formal ending of the state was not necessarily linked to his death, for several other kingdoms were also abolished in 206; the royal fief of Ganling could have been held in abeyance until that time. It is probable, however, that he indeed met his end about that time, for a group of Yellow Turbans was active in Ji'nan in 207: see sub Liu Yun. -HHS 55/45:1804.

Liu 劉 [personal names unknown]. When the Lady Fu Shou, Empress to Emperor Xian, was killed at Cao Cao's orders in 214, it is said that two of her children by the emperor were also killed. -HHS 9:391, 10b.454. The names of these imperial children 皇子 are not given, but we may assume they were boys and that, unlike their half-brothers Dun, Miao, Ping, Xi and Yi, they had not received enfeoffment.

Liu 劉 [personal name unknown]. Son of Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, he was named Heir to the duchy of Shanyang, but died before his father in 234; his son Kang 康 succeeded to the duchy. -HHS 9:391. This Heir may have been a son of the Empress Cao Jie or one of her sisters, or perhaps one of Liu Xie's named sons Dun, Miao, Xi or Yi qq.v.

Liu A 劉阿. In 221 Liu A and Li Yi commanded

Sun Quan's forward defences in Jing province on the Yangzi Gorges. They were driven back by Liu Bei's initial attack, but after Lu Xun's defeat of Liu Bei in the following year they returned to hold the advance position against him.

About 227 Liu A was defeated by Zhang He of Wei. -SGZ 17:526, SGZ Shu 2:890.

Liu A'nu 劉阿奴. Son of Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, in 112 he was enfeoffed as a marquis in Pei. -HHS 50/40:1670.

Liu Ai 劉艾. Formerly a magistrate in Hongnong, Liu Ai was Chief Clerk to Dong Zhuo at Chang'an in 191, and as Palace Attendant in 194 he was trusted by Emperor Xian to supervise the grain ration.

In 195 he bullied the soldiers of Guo Si to let the emperor leave the city, assisted him on his journey to the east, and was appointed Minister of the Imperial Clan. When Li Le proposed that the imperial party should escape down the Yellow River through the Sanmen Gorges, Liu Ai joined Yang Biao in arguing from local knowledge that the passage was extremely dangerous, with many rapids, and there were now no good boatmen: cf. Needham 71:277. They accordingly crossed the River into Hedong.

As Cao Cao brought the imperial court to Xu city in 196, Liu Ai was enfeoffed and appointed Chancellor of Pengcheng.

Liu Ai later became Minister of the Imperial Clan, and in 214 he was a member of the official party which received Cao Cao's daughters as brides for the Emperor. As Acting Imperial Counsellor in 216 he presented Cao Cao with his insignia as King of Wei.

With personal experience at the centre of government in troubled times, Liu Ai compiled accounts of the reign of Emperor Ling, Lingdi ji 靈帝紀, and of his successor, Xiandi ji 靈帝紀, the latter receiving its present title after the death of the former emperor in 234. Both works survive in fragments; Liu Ai's name as author is sometimes miswritten as Liu Fang 方. -HHS 72/62:2328, 2336, 2339, 2341-42, SGZ 1:43, 48, 6:186; deC 90:99, 545.

Liu An 劉安; Nanyang. Son of Liu Long, he succeeded to his fief in 57. -HHS 22/12:781.

Liu An 劉安 (d.120). Son of Liu Shang the King of Rencheng, Liu An succeeded his father in 101. Frivolous and greedy, he would wander out from his residence in disguise, and he took the property of his officials, even the rations of his guards, without payment. In 119 he was reported by the Chancellor Xing Hong, who recommended his dismissal. Emperor An did not agree, but Liu An was fined a fifth of his revenue for a year.

Liu An was succeeded by his son Chong. -HHS 42/32:1443.

Liu An 劉安 (d.125). A eunuch, Liu An became Prefect of the Yellow Gates in the time of Emperor An. He held great influence at court and was a close associate of the Empress Yan and her family. In 124 he supported the accusations which brought the dismissal of the Heir Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun, and when the Little Emperor Liu Yi died late in 125, he sought to assist the concealment of his death until a new selection could be made among other cadets of the imperial clan.

The eunuch Sun Cheng, however, led a coup to restore Liu Bao to the succession. As they made their first move, the conspirators encountered Liu An, Jiang Jing and other members of the rival party, and promptly killed them. -HHS 78/68:2514-15.

Liu An 劉安 or Liu Anguo 安國 (d.145). Son of Liu Shou the King of Jibei, in 120 he was enfeoffed as a district marquis. In 139 he was made King of Jibei to maintain the lineage after the death of his nephew Liu Duo.

Liu An was succeeded by his son Zi, and his son Meng was enfeoffed as a village marquis. -HHS 55/45:1807, 6:269.

Liu Ang 劉印. Eldest son of Liu Yan 衍 the King of Xiapi, about 90 he was excluded from the succession because of his immoral and criminal conduct. -HHS 50/40:1674-75.

Liu Anguo 劉安國. Grandson of Liu Xian the King of Chen, in 113 he was enfeoffed as marquis of a village. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Liu Anguo 劉安國 see Liu An 劉安, King of Jibei.

Liu Anu 劉阿奴. Son of Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, in 112 Liu Anu was enfeoffed with a county in Pei.

Liu Ao 劉囂 [Zhongning 重寧]; Changsha. A close associate of the palace eunuchs, in 168 Liu Ao was Steward of the Changle Palace, the apartments of the regent Dowager Dou of Emperor Huan. He then became Minister Coachman, and was promoted Excellency of Works in 169. He left office a year later. -HHS 8:330-31, 103/13:3283.

The commentary of Liu Zhao to HHS 95/5:3121 quotes a description by Cai Zhi of the enthronement of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling in 171. One of the participants in the ceremony was the Director of the Secretariat, who is cited only by his personal name of Ao. At HHSJJ at 3528, Hui Dong suggests that this may refer to Liu Ao.

Liu Ao 劉囂. Director of Retainers under Dong Zhuo at Chang'an about 191, Liu Ao was ordered to enforce the moral relationships of loyalty, diligence and obedience; those found guilty were executed and their property confiscated. As a result, there were a great number of false accusations and people were terrified. -SGZ 7:179.

It is most unlikely that this is the same man as in the entry above.

Liu Ba 劉巴 [Zichu 子初] (173-222); Lingling. Son of Liu Xiang, in 189 Liu Ba went with his father on campaign into Nanyang with Sun Jian. Liu Xiang was killed, and Liu Ba fell into the hands of the new Governor Liu Biao, an old enemy of Liu Xiang. Liu Biao wanted to kill Liu Ba but needed an excuse, so he had former officers of Liu Xiang go to Liu Ba and encourage him to lead a rebellion against the new regime. Liu Ba did not respond, and he reported every approach.

Changing his intention, Liu Biao offered Liu Ba appointments to his provincial staff and nomination as Abundant Talent, but Liu Ba declined. Retiring to Lingling, he served for a time as commandery Registrar and was then a private scholar and teacher.

As Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208, Liu Bei fled to the south. Many of the local scholars and gentry went to join him, but Liu Ba went north to Cao Cao, and he was commissioned to take control of the commanderies south of the Yangzi, Changsha, Guiyang and his native Lingling. After Cao Cao was defeated at the Red Cliffs, however, Liu Bei dominated that region, and Liu Ba was obliged to withdraw further south. Changing his surname to Zhang 張, he planned to make his way back to the north, and though Zhuge Liang wrote to invite him into Liu Bei's service, he rejected the approach.

In Jiaozhi, Liu Ba fell foul of the warlord Shi Xie, who was establishing his own regime in the south. He escaped into Yi province, but was arrested by the Administrator of Yizhou commandery. The Administrator was going to put him to death, but was persuaded by his Registrar to send him to the provincial capital. There Liu Ba met with the Governor Liu Zhang, whose father Liu Yan had been a friend of Liu Ba's father. Liu Zhang welcomed Liu Ba and made him a close adviser.

Liu Ba warned Liu Zhang against the alliance with Liu Bei, and when Liu Zhang refused his advice he retired to his house, claimed that he was ill, and closed the gates. As Liu Bei attacked Chengdu in 214 he gave strict orders that no harm should come to Liu Ba. Liu Ba apologised for his past opposition, and he was appointed to Liu Bei's staff.

Liu Bei had given his soldiers permission to plunder Chengdu, so the official treasury was stripped bare and there was no money for the needs of the army. Liu Ba solved the financial crisis by issuing zhibo 直百 money, an artificial and over-valued currency, and controlling the resultant inflation by strict price controls through official markets.

Liu Ba worked with Zhuge Liang, Fa Zheng, Yin Ji and Li Yan on the administrative code Shu ke 屬科. When Liu Bei took title as King of Hanzhong in 219 Liu Ba was appointed to his Secretariat, and after Fa Zhang died in the following year Liu Ba succeeded him as Director.

A man of strict conduct, Liu Ba warned Liu Bei that his self-indulgent government would discourage men of quality from joining his service. On the other hand, he considered himself, as a scholar, far superior to fighting men like Zhang Fei, and both Liu Bei and Zhuge Liang were annoyed at the disruption he caused by pretensions and his lack of courtesy.

It is said that Liu Ba had opposed Liu Bei taking the imperial title in 221, but he nonetheless composed the proclamations for the ceremony. He died in the following year. -SGZ Shu 9.980-82*; deC 96:471-474.

Liu Ban 劉般 [Boxing 伯興] (19-78); Chu/Pengcheng. A distant descendant of Emperor Xuan of Former Han, Liu Ban was the son of Liu Yu 紆, former King of Chu. The royal fief was abolished by Wang Mang and Liu Yu died when Liu Ban was still young, so Liu Ban lived with his mother's family.

When Wang Mang was destroyed in 23, Liu Ban's mother and her kinsmen went to Chang'an, capital of the new Gengshi Emperor, hoping to escape the troubles. Soon afterwards, however, Chang'an fell to the Red Eyebrows, and the family fled west into Wuwei. Despite his youth, Liu Ban was a leader of the party.

Following the defeat of Wei Ao in 32, communications were once more restored and Liu Ban returned with his family to the new capital at Luoyang, where he studied the Confucian classics. In 33 Emperor Guangwu enfeoffed him as a marquis in order that he might maintain sacrifices for his royal ancestors. Later, when Guangwu's son Liu Ying was granted the fief of Chu, Liu Ban's marquisate was moved from that territory into Pei.

In 43, as the emperor came on tour to Pei, the Administrator recommended Liu Ban as the marquis who had displayed the best conduct among those who held fiefs in the commandery. Liu Ban was rewarded with a million cash and two hundred bolts of silken cloth. In the tour of the following year he was again received in audience and accompanied the emperor back to Luoyang, where he was granted title as a Marquis Attending Sacrifices, permitting him to remain at the capital.

After the accession of Emperor Ming in 57, it was found inappropriate that Liu Ban should hold a fief within the kingdom of Pei, and his state was changed once more to a county in Lujiang. With other marquises, he was sent out to his fief.

Some years later Guan Xun the Inspector of Yang province reported that Liu Ban's exemplary conduct was worthy of official recognition, and in 67 Liu Ban was summoned to join the imperial tour in Nanyang and was given acting position as Bearer of the Mace, chief of police. He then returned to the capital as a Marquis at Court, a title senior to his former position as Marquis Attending Sacrifices, and likewise excusing him from the requirement to reside in his fief.

In the following year Liu Ban was appointed a colonel in the Northern Army. Though the Northern Army was the professional core of the imperial military forces, the commanders and their offices were noted for splendid display, excellent appointments, and their fine uniforms and accoutrements. The colonelcies were therefore regularly awarded to kinsmen of the ruler, and on each occasion Emperor Ming went out on tour, Liu Ban led an imperial escort of non-Chinese horsemen from the Chang River Regiment.

About this time the emperor proposed to establish Ever-Normal Granaries 常平倉, a system which sought to control food prices through government purchases of grain when it was cheap, then resell at low prices if supplies became limited. Senior advisers endorsed the scheme, but Liu Ban objected, arguing that though the idea was superficially attractive, in reality the official purchases raised the price of grain to the profit of great landholders in times of plenty, while the common people gained no advantage. The plan was therefore dropped.

There are some problems about this account of the price-control scheme. An Office for Price Adjustment and Stabilisation had been maintained by Wang Mang at the head of the Vast Canal in Rongyang in Henan, but his policy on this line, part of his government's monopolies, had been the subject of major complaints from his rebel opponents on the grounds of excessive and authoritarian centralisation. Emperor Guangwu therefore abolished the office at Rongyang [HHS 11/1:486, and sub Liu Penzi]. On the other hand, the Treatise of Economics of Jin shu says that in 62 Emperor Ming established an Ever-Full Granary 常滿倉 at the east of the city, by the terminus of the Yang Canal which brought supplies from the Ao Granary by Rongyang, and as the result of the emperor's initiative the price of a hu of unhusked grain [some 20 litres] was reduced from about a hundred to just twenty cash [JS 26:781; Yang 63:154 and Bn 76:59-60].

The biography of Liu Ban at HHS 39/29:1305 is the only text where a general scheme for price-control of grain is mentioned in Hou Han shu [Hsü 80:243, Ch'ü 72:460], but since Liu Ban was not at the capital in 62 he could not have been involved in policy at that time. It appears that the earlier price-control system had been revived, but the question was later reconsidered: Liu Ban then spoke for the opposition, and his arguments persuaded the ruler to abandon the policy. He was probably right: price control was a good idea, but the process of its administration was beyond the competence of government.

At this time, moreover, an ordinance was issued to enforce the prohibition against people holding two occupations 二業. This policy had initially been adopted by Former Han to prevent merchants holding official posts or buying up agricultural land, but local officers now interpreted it so strictly that they forbade farmers to hunt or fish, depriving them of their livelihood in the winter and spring. Furthermore, because of a plague among draught cattle and the effects of drought, there was limited opportunity to expand arable land, so people were encouraged to plant paddy-fields instead of dry-land farming. Again, local officers showed a lack of sensitivity, and sought to collect tax even against fields which were not being cultivated.

Protesting at these arrangements, Liu Ban urged the emperor to instruct the heads of provinces and commanderies that revenue collected should reflect the actual harvest, and officials who made inflated claims on taxable land should be penalised in the same way as taxpayers who concealed it. The emperor endorsed Liu Ban's specific proposals, but there was no change to the general policy of taxing acreage rather than production.

When Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75, Liu Ban was appointed Steward of the Changle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager Ma, and he later became Minister of the Imperial Clan. When his wife died, the family was awarded funerary gifts and a burial place in the tomb park of the late Emperor Ming, northwest of Luoyang; he himself soon followed her. During his long service in government Liu Ban was admired for his standards of debate, for his fine conduct and for his generosity to kinsmen. -HHS 39/29:1303-06*; Bn 54 appendix # 128, Bn 79:44-45, Hsü 80:243, Ch'ü 72:460.

Liu Ban 劉班. Chief Clerk to the Grand Commandant and a senior and distinguished Confucianist, in 142 Liu Ban was given acting position as a Household Counsellor and joined the special commission of eight sent out to observe the conduct of the empire. Little came of the project, and government remained in the hands of the Liang kinsmen of the empress. -HHS 6:272, 61/51:2029.

Liu Ban 劉班. Liu Ban was Administrator of Jiuquan about 180. Together with Zhou Hong the Inspector of Liang province he reported on the fine vengeance taken by the Lady Zhao E against her father's murderer; they set up a stele in her honour. -SGZ 18:549.

Liu Bao 劉寶. Son of Liu Fu the King of Pei, in 57 he was granted a marquissate. -HHS 42/32:1427.

Liu Bao 劉寶. Son of Liu Xian the King of Chen, in 100 he was made a marquis. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Liu Bao 劉保, the Lady. Eldest daughter of Emperor He, in 106 she was named Senior Princess of Xiuwu in Henei. -HHS 10B:461.

Liu Bao 劉保 (115-144) [Emperor Shun 順帝 (reg. 125-144)]. Liu Bao was born in 115, the son of Emperor An by his concubine the Lady Li I. His mother was poisoned soon afterwards by the Empress Yan, and Liu Bao knew nothing of her, but he was the only son of the emperor, and in 120 he was duly appointed as Heir. He is described as gentle and generous, a good student of the Book of Filial Piety, and it is said that the Dowager Deng was pleased with him.

THE HEIR AND HIS ACCESSION

The child had two wet-nurses, Wang Nan and Song E, and the Lady Wang was a particular favourite. In 124 Liu Bao became the centre of a struggle for influence in which Wang Nan and the kitchen officer Bing Ji were opposed by the eunuchs Jiang Jing and Fan Feng and the Lady Wang Sheng who had been wet-nurse to Emperor An. Upset and confused by the intrigues, Liu Bao took refuge at a mansion lately built for Wang Sheng, and Wang Nan and Bing Ji lost much of their influence. Wang Sheng and her allies then accused them of conspiracy: both were killed and their families and associates were exiled to the far south.

Liu Bao mourned his two former favourites, and Wang Sheng and her associates were concerned he might later seek to avenge them. They accordingly told Emperor An that Liu Bao had also been involved in the alleged conspiracy, and urged that he dismiss him as Heir. The ruler was encouraged by his Empress Yan, and though the minister Lai Li and many other officials demonstrated against the plan at the palace gates, in the autumn of 124 the boy was deposed and given title as King of Jiyin.

Early in the following year Emperor An died while on tour to the south. Despite his deposition as Heir, Liu Bao was an obvious candidate for the succession, but the Empress Yan, now Dowager, had the right to act as regent and, when no Heir was formally appointed, to choose a new ruler from the males of the imperial clan. To prevent any difficulty, she and her supporters concealed the emperor's death until the cortège had returned to the capital; they then passed over Liu Bao and named his cousin, the five-year-old Liu Yi, as emperor.

Liu Yi, however, died at the end of that same year, and though the Yan group had some knowledge of his fatal illness they had no firm plans made and no candidate prepared. They attempted once more to conceal the death, but a few days later, on 16 December, a group of eunuchs led by Sun Cheng carried out a successful coup and placed Liu Bao upon the throne. As the Dowager was placed under arrest, her brothers and their eunuch allies were killed and remnants of the Yan group were exiled to the far south.

STYLE OF GOVERNMENT

Liu Bao came to the throne at the age of eleven sui, just over ten years old by Western reckoning, and with the disgrace of the Dowager Yan there was no specific person to control a regency. The officials who had protested against his deposition in the year before were rewarded with appointments: Lai Li was reappointed as a minister and then General of Chariots and Cavalry; Huan Yan, who had been Tutor to Liu Bao when he was Heir, now became Grand Tutor; and Zhang Hao was made an Excellency. Zhu Chang was first appointed as head of the Dowager's household, but after the convenient death of the Lady Yan a few weeks later he too was made an Excellency. The Grand Tutor Huan Yan also held control of the affairs of the Imperial Secretariat, giving formal command of the executive government, sharing the responsibility for the first three years with the Grand Commandant Zhu Chong and his successor Liu Guang. Huan Yan was dismissed in 128, but Lu Guang and his successor Pang Can continued in control of the Secretariat, even after the young emperor had taken the cap of manhood in 129.

The eunuch Sun Cheng, leader of the plot which had restored Liu Bao to his inheritance, was rewarded with a county marquisate, while nineteen of his colleagues also received fiefs and gifts. Early in 127 Sun Cheng joined the Director of Retainers Yu Xu in an attack on the eunuch Zhang Fang, accusing him of extortion and conspiracy, and the emperor was forced to dismiss him. Zhang Fang had taken no part in the coup against the Yan clan, but he was a personal favourite of the young ruler and Emperor Shun resented the humiliation. He soon afterwards ordered Sun Cheng and his associates to go to their fiefs, and though there were protests at such treatment of his loyal supporters, the emperor remained adamant until he was embarrassed into recalling the exiles by the intervention of Zhu Chang.

Despite his youth, Emperor Shun could make decisions on his own, but they were not always wise: he tended to vacillate from one policy to another, and he continued to be influenced by friends and associates. The court was to a considerable degree divided between Yu Xu and his Confucianist associates, notably Zuo Xiong, Huang Qiong and Zhou Ju, who sought moral and administrative reform, and those who opposed their sometimes extreme measures. The cliques and factions appear to have been separated as much by personality as by philosophy and, as in the case of Sun Cheng, officials of the bureaucracy were quite willing to accept alliance with the eunuchs or other personal favourites of the emperor.

From the mid-120s to the mid-130s Yu Xu and his associates sought to improve the conduct of government. Yu Xu was chiefly concerned with specific instances of corruption, while Zuo Xiong sought to establish a general Confucian dominance in the recruitment and control of the bureaucracy for the longer term. They introduced some reforms to the procedures for selecting officials, and they persuaded the emperor to invite a number of distinguished scholars in retirement to take positions at court, but in the long term their efforts were unsuccessful, for they used the Secretariat, with its close connection to the throne, as their base, and much of their success came from factional support at court and influence with the emperor. In such a process other members of the regular bureaucracy, even the Excellencies who theoretically held control of the Secretariat and all other officials, were often bypassed and unable to play an effective role. From this point of view, the very means by which Yu Xu and his colleagues sought to reform the administration brought about a decline in its authority.

Even as Yu Xu and his colleagues were attempting to tighten the requirements for entry to the imperial service, moreover, there appears to have been increasing difficulty in finding satisfactory officials. There were several edicts calling for special nominations, and the young emperor was frequently successful in attracting leading scholar recluses to his court, but there was a growing tendency for men to avoid public life, to attend rather to their private affairs, or even to seek distinction as hermits. It is difficult to assess the degree to which potential recruits may have been discouraged by stories of intrigues at court, or whether the responsibilities of family estates were becoming greater and more attractive, but the lack of good men to hold office, and the problems of keeping them at their posts, were of constant concern and led to many of the irregularities of appointment and promotion which the purists complained about.

In somewhat similar fashion, the government continued to display evidence of financial stress. On several occasions convicts were permitted to redeem their offences by payment of a fine – certainly a more profitable procedure than inflicting punishment – and during the difficult years about 140 forced loans were called from the holders of fiefs and from wealthy commoners.

Across the empire, there were continuing natural disasters, earthquakes, floods, drought and locusts, and in 132 there were fierce attacks by wolves in Changshan. The government responded with humble edicts of remorse, and also by opening granaries and giving exemption from taxation, while commissioners were sent to supervise relief work and assess the quality of the local administration. In 134 a major project, led by the Internuncios Wang Hui and then Sima Deng, repaired the channel of the Yellow River and its tributaries near Rongyang in Henan. Though the work was important for transport on the Vast Canal which supplied the capital, and imperial officials were sent to supervise, it was not funded primarily by the central government but by cash and corvée labour extracted from commanderies of the region. Other projects in this period were likewise arranged at a local level, apparently without assistance from a cash-strapped court.

Besides this, there were more spiritual concerns: in 129 it was ordered that people should be prevented from quarrying in the hills because their activity could be releasing emanations which brought floods and the failure of crops. Drought at the capital in 132 and 134 brought prayers for rain and jail release; when there were floods in Ji province the Palace Attendant Wang Fu and others were sent to offer sacrifice to the gods of Mount Tai and the Eastern Sea, to the Yellow River, the Luo, and other troublesome streams; while in 133 an earthquake at Luoyang led to an edict seeking advice.

One of the submissions on this occasion came from the Court Astronomer Zhang Heng, who had lately developed a seismograph, but was nonetheless quite prepared to use natural phenomena as omens of concern. He and others at this time, notably the official Li Gu, complained that the emperor was failing to exercise full authority and that he paid too great attention to his personal attendants and family connections. In some response, in 134 the ruler sought the opinion of Zhou Ju, newly appointed to the Secretariat, and the Excellencies Liu Qi and Kong Fu were dismissed.

Though they dealt with them on occasion, the regular officials always resented the power of the eunuchs, whom they regarded as illegitimate advisers to the throne. There had been disapproval when Sun Cheng and his colleagues were enfeoffed, and there was further protest in 135, when eunuchs were authorised to pass on fiefs to their adopted sons. By this time, however, there was greater anxiety about the rise of the Liang family.

The Lady Liang Na had entered the harem of Emperor Shun in 128, and in 132 she became empress. Her father Liang Shang was first appointed as a Palace Attendant and a colonel in the Northern Army, but when his daughter came to the throne he received additional honours and became Bearer of the Mace, chief of police at the capital. In 134 he was offered position as General-in-Chief, ranking with the Excellencies, and though he initially refused he took the office in 135. The family now held great power at court, and officials had to deal not only with the emperor and his favourites but also with the consort family.

Liang Shang appears to have exercised his authority with some restraint, and his position was only enhanced when a group of eunuchs sought to accuse him and his associates of treachery. Their slander was disproved, the conspirators were killed, and the emperor was confirmed in his confidence. Though he continued to hold ultimate power, it appears Emperor Shun was content to leave much of the business of government to this mature and responsible relative, old enough to be his father; and Liang Shang did maintain a balance between the inner court of the emperor and his officials in the outside bureaucracy.

When Liang Shang died in 141, he was succeeded in his high office by his son Liang Ji. In the following year there was another attack, for as eight commissioners were sent out to assess the condition of the empire, one of them, Zhang Gang, remained at Luoyang and sent in an indignant report on the corruption of Liang Ji and the excessive favour being shown to the family. It is said that the emperor appreciated his honesty, but nothing was done. Certainly the sovereign could maintain control, but when he died three years later the Liang acquired real power.

More widely in the empire, there was increasing trouble from the early 130s. As pirates ravaged Kuaiji in 132, the religious rebel Zhang He caused disturbance to the whole of Yang province, and in 134 there was banditry in Yi province. A major rising among the non-Chinese of the far south in the late 130s triggered discussion of the need to send a full imperial army, and though the people were settled by the experienced officials Zhu Liang and Zhang Qiao, the lower Yangzi was then afflicted by the bandit troops of Zhang Ying, while in 143 there was rebellion in Yang, Xu and Jing provinces. Financially, the government was under such strain that official stipends were reduced, a forced loan of a year's tax was made from kings and marquises, convicts were permitted to ransom themselves by fines, and it was forbidden to brew wine.

All these troubles and difficulties were important enough to be recorded in the imperial annals, but the problems of the northern frontier were far more serious and placed far greater strain upon the empire.

NON-CHINESE AFFAIRS

In the aftermath of the great Qiang rebellion from 107 to 118 the northwest remained restless; in 126 a rising in Longxi was put down by the Protector Ma Xian.

Further afield, the enterprise of Ban Yong in central Asia was largely successful, culminating in the defeat of Yanqi [Karashar] in 127, but Ban Yong was dismissed as the result of an intrigue, and though his father Ban Chao had spread the authority of Han over the whole Tarim basin and across the Pamirs, his own operations had gone little further than Shanshan and Yanqi. The states in the west of the Tarim sent tribute and sometimes contributed troops, agents were placed in various cities, and new colonies were set up in Yiwu and Jushi, on the Northern Road through Turfan. There was, however, no firm and consistent Chinese control, and little contact further west, though the general settlement lasted until the 150s.

In 129, at the urgings of the energetic official Yu Xu, the government resolved to reclaim territories in the northwest which had been abandoned in the course of the Qiang rebellion. Reprieved convicts were sent to settle the frontier, while the administrations of Anding, Beidi and Shang commanderies were restored to their former capitals.

At least in appearance, therefore, there was reconstruction in the region, and in 137 the emperor went on progress to Chang'an: this journey, accompanied by donations to the poor and dispossessed, is the only occasion on which he is recorded as having left his capital.

The major problem, however, lay more directly to the north, and particularly with the Xianbi who now controlled great parts of the steppe and were inspired by their war-leader Qizhijian. In 126 an attack on Dai commandery brought the death of the Administrator, and as raiding continued the troops of the Liyang camp in Wei commandery were sent north to garrisons in Changshan while further recruits were gathered for training. In 127 the Xianbi raided Liaodong and Xuantu in the east, and in 128 they attacked Yuyang. The Protector Geng Ye defeated them on occasion and the Chinese mounted a series of punitive expeditions, but disturbance remained endemic along the whole frontier.

By the middle 130s the trouble was beginning to influence other non-Chinese groups: the Wuhuan raided Yunzhong, while Qiang tribesmen attacked Longxi, Hanyang and Wudu. These latter were regularly defeated by the Protector Ma Xian, but in 140 rebellion among the Xiongnu, compounded by failure among the Chinese, brought widespread disaster.

Leader of the insurgents was the chieftain Wusi, and as his following increased he was joined by the prince Yiti and attacked the Shanyu Xiuliu. The insurgents were driven back by the General on the Liao Ma Xu, but then Xiuliu was placed under such pressure by the Emissary Chen Gui for his failure to control the people that he committed suicide. The rebellion spread further, and the government was obliged to withdraw the headquarters of Xihe and Shang commanderies once more to the south, and to combine Shuofang into Wuyuan, where the remnant civilian regime could be guarded by the garrison under Ma Xu.

The rebellion was brought under control by the end of 140, and Wusi surrendered in early 141, but in the mean time he had established links with the Wuhuan and with the Qiang. In 140 these latter raided Wudu and the region about Chang'an and threatened the Long Road to the northwest. In 141 they defeated and killed the general Ma Xian in Beidi.

This last misfortune for the Chinese inspired a new series of rebellion and raiding, Wusi returned to the fray, and as the Qiang attacked Longxi and Chang'an once more the commandery capitals of Anding and Beidi were also brought back to the south. Over the following years the Chinese gradually gained the upper hand, and the trouble was finally ended in 144, but the work of reconstruction had been overthrown, the commandery headquarters never returned to their former territories, and although there was some resettlement by convicts there was no real attempt to recover the ground that he been lost.

In the mean time, the death of Shanyu Xiuliu had caused great damage to the prestige of that regime and had broken the line of inheritance. The Han court set up the prince Toulouchu with great ceremony, but it is doubtful whether he or his successors held any real authority over their nominal subjects. In effect, the greater part of the Ordos had been abandoned by the Chinese, and the Xiongnu people who occupied the region were organised rather in campfire and tribal units than as part of a coherent, controllable state.

SCHOLARSHIP AND BELIEF

In 131 Emperor Shun, probably at the instigation of the energetic Zuo Xiong, ordered the restoration of the Imperial University. Emperors Zhang and He had supported the institution, but the stultifying effect of official New Text teachings brought its decline, and though the regent Dowager Deng had initiated some reforms and Emperor An may have planned improvements, it was now said that the Academicians failed to teach, their pupils would not study, the buildings were in ruins and the site had reverted to pasture and gleanings. In the late 120s the Court Architect Zhai Fu had proposed rebuilding, and though the work was delayed several years in 131 and 132 a labour force of 112,000 convicts constructed 240 buildings with 1,850 rooms; within a year the new complex was ready.

Leading Confucian scholars were now recruited as Academicians, scholarships were offered, and the number of students grew. Direct entry to the bureaucracy by examination was always limited, but time at the University formed part of the curriculum vitae for many young men of the gentry and frequently preceded their entry into local government or nomination for senior office. The reconstruction also demonstrated Emperor Shun's formal commitment to Confucian ideals, and as patronage continued and grew in later years, notably under the influence of the Liang family of his empress, the University became a centre of reformist activism.

Besides this restoration of the University, in 136 the scholars Fu Wuji and Huang Jing were commissioned to prepare an imperial collection of Confucian classics, treatises by philosophers and works on art and literature. Little is known of this ambitious project, and it appears to have been later discontinued, but one may note that neither of the principal researchers held office at the University.

Emperor Shun himself appears to have been genuinely interested in the mantic practices endorsed by New Text Confucianism. He went to considerable lengths to bring the scholar recluse Fan Ying, expert in the Book of Changes, to his court, and he also sought advice from Lang Yi, who was noted in the same field. We have observed how he would issue humble edicts in response to portents, in 132 he had the Palace Attendant Wang Fu lead a special expedition to make sacrifice to the deities of rivers and mountains, and he held two special ceremonies at the Hall of the Circular Moat. Even more personally, with four Honoured Ladies to choose from, he wanted to select his empress by lot, so the spirits could decide for him. He was dissuaded by the conservative Hu Guang, who insisted upon the traditional criteria of family background followed by virtue, age, and lastly physical attraction; so the Lady Liang Na was chosen.

If Emperor Shun was interested in the esoteric, beyond even the orthodoxies of the New Text and the approved apocrypha, he matched a growing tendency. The rebel Zhang He, who was active in Yang province in 132 and 133, is the first to be described in the Annals as religious or heterodox 妖賊, and it appears probable that the Rice Sect of Zhang Ling was among a number of religious movements in Yi province about this time. Closer to home, it is claimed that an early version of the Taoist text Tai ping jing 太平經 was presented to the throne by Gong Chong and/or Xiang Kai, disciples of the teacher Gan Ji from the region of Langye. The emperor may have been interested, but his advisers rejected it as being heretical and inappropriate.

DEATH AND JUDGEMENT

Emperor Shun died on 20 September 144, at the age of thirty sui. He was buried in the "Mound of Glory" 憲陵 northwest of Luoyang and received the temple-name Jingzong 恭宗 "Reverent Exemplar." In 190, however, Dong Zhuo, who controlled the court of Han at that time, approved a recommendation of Cai Yong that his tablet should be deposed from a permanent position in the Imperial Ancestral Temple on the grounds that he had shown neither merit nor virtue: see MBeck 90: 106-107 and sub Liu Zhao, Emperor He. -HHS 5*.

The emperor was succeeded by his infant son Liu Bing, born the previous year to his concubine the Honoured Lady Yu. Power in the state, however, was taken by the Lady Liang Na, now regent Dowager, and her brother Liang Ji.

From the point of view of the dynasty, like Emperor He before him Liu Bao's great failing was his early death, which left the way open for the dominance of the consort family; and the Dowager Deng was a more effective ruler than the Liang family. More generally, and despite the harsh assessment of Cai Yong, historians have debated whether Emperor Shun was indeed a weak and inadequate ruler, or whether his reign marked a brief attempt, ultimately unsuccessful, to restore the declining fortunes of the house of Han, a period of hope which was shattered by the "stupid tyranny" of Emperors Huan and Ling: e.g. ZZTJ 68:2173-74; deC 96:555-558, discussed by MBeck 86:364.

Certainly, the first decade of the reign of Emperor Shun proved to be the last time that a ruler of Later Han dealt directly with his Confucianist officials, and the style of government followed that traditional model, with worthy sentiments and attempts at reform. The teenage sovereign, however, was strongly influenced by personal relationships, and his policies could vary through the intrigues of favourites within the palace or the strong will and authority of leaders in the bureaucracy. It does not appear that he had great interest in abstract notions of consistent and impartial government, and the partnership between the ruler and his ministers suffered accordingly.

Perhaps most significant is the appointment of Liang Shang as General-in-Chief and the consequent extension of his influence. The emperor was twenty years old in 135, formally of full age, and should in theory have had no problem exercising his authority, but he preferred to rely upon the older man, and even after Liang Shang's death in 141 he allowed Liang Ji to take his father's position.

A decisive moment came in 142, when Zhou Ju and others persuaded Emperor Shun to appoint eight commissioners for a general investigation of the empire. The men were chosen for their moral authority and held wide powers of supervision and remonstrance, but when Zhang Gang criticised the favour shown to the Liang, the emperor noted the problem but took no action. This marked the end of any possibility that Confucian officials of the traditional bureaucracy might match the authority of the consort family. It is possible, but unlikely, that the emperor could have changed his attitude, but for the time being he had accepted the Liang family, and his death soon afterwards confirmed the new, and potentially dangerous, situation.

It may indeed be argued that, for all the difficulties which faced the empire, the reign of Emperor Shun was a period of hope and offered the dynasty a chance for revival. Sadly, the ruler himself was lazy, fickle, and not very interested. -HHS 6.

Liu Bao 劉豹 (d.152). A younger son of Liu Yi the King of Changshan, he succeeded his father in 144. In 151 four older brothers were granted village marquisates. - HHS 50/40:1678. [On a confused reference to Liu Bao as King of Anping, see sub Liu Xu 續.]

Liu Bao 劉褒 was a noted painter in the time of Emperor Huan. - Yao Zhenzong:2408.

Liu Bao 劉豹. A former Consultant, and successor to a marquisate, probably in Lujiang, following the abdication of Emperor Xian of Han in 220 Liu Bao joined a petition which cited various works of divination and urged Liu Bei, King of Hanzhong, to claim the imperial title. -SGZ Shu 2:887.

Liu Bao 劉寶 see Liu Zhen 劉珍.

[Liu] Bao 劉豹 see Bao 豹; Xiongnu.

Liu Bei 劉備 [Xuande 玄德] (161-223); Zhuo: First Sovereign of Shu-Han 蜀漢先主. Liu Bei's family claimed descent from Emperor Jing of Former Han through the kings of Zhongshan and a short-lived fief in Zhuo held by a cadet lineage. Liu Bei's grandfather Liu Xiong was a county magistrate and his father Liu Hong held office in the local administration.

EARLY CAREER

Liu Hong died when Liu Bei was young and his mother maintained the family by selling straw sandals. In a corner of their small property there was a mulberry tree over fifty feet tall, shaped like the umbrella of the chariot, and those who saw it from afar took it as a sign of future fame and honour. Liu Bei agreed, but his uncle Liu Zijing suggested that he would only bring the family to ruin.

In 175 Liu Bei's mother sent him to study with Lu Zhi, a distinguished man of the commandery who was an Academician at the University in Luoyang. One of his fellow-students was Gongsun Zan of Liaoxi, whom Liu Bei admired and treated as an elder brother, and another was his kinsman Liu Deran. Though they were not closely related, Liu Deran's father Liu Yuanqi gave provisions to Liu Bei in the same fashion as to his own son, and when his wife questioned him he explained that Liu Bei was a man of exceptional quality and promise.

Liu Bei grew to be seven foot five inches tall [173 cm]. It was said that his hands reached below his knees, and his ears were so large that he could see them when he turned his head; accurate or otherwise, these were taken as attributes of a future hero. A man of few words, showing little emotion, Liu Bei had small interest in books but took pleasure in dogs and horses, in music and in fine clothing. He enjoyed the life of a fighting man, he treated his subordinates well and many young men were anxious to join him.

At an early stage Liu Bei acquired his two companions Guan Yu and Zhang Fei. There is no historical account of the celebrated and romantic Oath of the Peach Garden 桃園結義, but they treated one another as brothers and the other two gave Liu Bei the utmost loyalty and service. Zhang Shiping and Su Shuang, moreover, two wealthy merchants of Zhongshan, admired Liu Bei and presented him with gold and other valuables so that he was able to recruit a large number of followers.

When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out in 184 Liu Bei and his troop followed the colonel Zou Jing against them, and he also served against Zhang Chun and Zhang Ju in the northeast in 187. He did well in both campaigns, being badly wounded in a skirmish with the Wuhuan but rescued by his men, and he was appointed a county commandant in Zhongshan, lowest commissioned rank of the imperial civil service. Liu Bei did not stay there long, for when an officer of the commandery was sent on inspection, with plans to make him redundant, he beat the man, then fled to escape punishment.

Soon afterwards Liu Bei joined the Commandant Guanqiu Yi on an expedition to deal with rebels in Danyang. He again distinguished himself, and was appointed assistant magistrate of a county in Pingyuan. Leaving that post, he became a county commandant in Pingyuan, later transferred to full magistrate, but was then defeated by local bandits and driven from the territory.

By this time the imperial government was falling into disorder. It is said that Liu Bei raised troops to join the alliance against the usurping government of Dong Zhuo, but soon afterwards he went to join his old friend Gongsun Zan, who held a largely independent command in the north and who appointed him a senior major.

INTO XU PROVINCE

In 191 Liu Bei aided Gongsun Zan in a major victory over his rival warlord Yuan Shao, and he was sent south with Tian Kai, Gongsun Zan's Inspector of Jing province, to follow up the success. He was named magistrate of the capital county of Pingyuan, and then Chancellor of the kingdom. After a long military career, of varying success, this was his first senior office. He was at that time thirty years old.

In 192 Yuan Shao achieved a major victory over Gongsun Zan, and Tian Kai and Liu Bei were driven from Pingyuan east to Qi. In the following year Tian Kai went to assist Tao Qian the Governor of Xu province, who was under attack from Cao Cao. Liu Bei's own command comprised a thousand Wuhuan horsemen and a larger contingent of ill-fed refugees, but Tao Qian provided him with four thousand commandery troops from Danyang, and Liu Bei changed his allegiance. Tao Qian nominated Liu Bei as Inspector of Yu province, with his headquarters in Pei: from this time he is frequently referred to by courtesy as Liu of Yu province 劉豫州.

Tao Qian died in 194, but he urged his attendants to invite Liu Bei to take his place as Governor of Xu province. After formal hesitation Liu Bei allowed himself to be persuaded by Mi Zhu, Chen Deng and others, while the scholar Kong Rong assured him that a man of action such as he was far more suitable than Yuan Shu, the neighbouring warlord in Yang province, who relied merely upon his past lineage.

In 196 Yuan Shu came to attack, and Liu Bei faced him in Xiapi, while despite their former hostility Cao Cao now gave Liu Bei title as a general and fief as a marquis. Zhang Fei, however, killed the Chancellor of Xiapi and was driven from the capital by rioting, while Yuan Shu persuaded the general Lü Bu to change sides. Liu Bei's army disintegrated and Lü Bu captured his wife and children. Liu Bei surrendered to Lü Bu, who promptly changed once more and joined him against Yuan Shu. As Yuan Shu was driven away Liu Bei got his family back and was again named Inspector of Yu province, stationed in Pei, while his former subordinate Lü Bu took the senior title as Governor of Xu province.

Soon afterwards Lü Bu once more made terms with Yuan Shu, and Yuan Shu sent his general Ji Ling with a strong force to attack Liu Bei. Though Lü Bu could well have allowed one of his rivals to destroy the other, he was worried lest Yuan Shu became too powerful. So he went to the rescue and saved Liu Bei by a celebrated feat of archery: hitting the spike on top of a halberd and so impressing the enemy that they withdrew.

By early 198 Liu Bei had acquired more troops, and he intercepted a convoy of treasure which Lü Bu had sent north to buy horses. Lü Bu's officers Gao Shun and Zhang Liao then stormed Pei city, captured Liu Bei's family, and drove him north to Cao Cao. Cao Cao received Liu Bei generously, gave him title as Governor of Yu province, and assisted him to return southeast to face Lü Bu. He was supported by an army of Cao Cao's under Xiahou Dun, and in the autumn they took the offensive.

Both armies were initially defeated by Lü Bu's general Gao Shun, but in the winter Cao Cao arrived, joined Liu Bei in Liang and then advanced to defeat Lü Bu. When they captured him in Xiapi, Lü Bu sought to persuade Cao Cao to give him senior command in his army, and asked Liu Bei to speak on his behalf. Liu Bei, however, recalling how Lü Bu had killed his masters Ding Yuan and Dong Zhuo, urged Cao Cao to get rid of him. "Big-ears," observed Lü Bu as he was led to execution, "you're a crook."

Reunited once more with his family, Liu Bei returned to Cao Cao's headquarters in Xu city, where he was named General on the Left and treated with great courtesy, riding on occasion with Cao Cao in his chariot and sitting on the same mat. He was nonetheless quite willing to join the conspiracy of Dong Cheng, instigated by Emperor Xian, to assassinate Cao Cao and restore imperial power. It was of this period that the story is told how Cao Cao remarked to Liu Bei that the two of them were the only men of significance in the empire: Liu Bei was so startled at the possibility the plot was discovered that he dropped his chopsticks, then attributed his clumsiness to a convenient clap of thunder.

By the summer of 199 Yuan Shu's position in the south had collapsed, and as he sought to join his kinsman Yuan Shao in the north Liu Bei was sent from the capital to intercept him. When Yuan Shu died, Cao Cao's officers Zhu Ling and Lu Zhao returned to the north, leaving Liu Bei in Xu province; he promptly rebelled and killed Cao Cao's Inspector Che Zhou. Leaving Guan Yu to hold Xiapi, Liu Bei then moved into Pei, linked with Chang Ba in Donghai, gathered other dissidents in the region and made alliance with Yuan Shao. He set his headquarters at Pei city, and though Cao Cao sent an army against him, Liu Bei now controlled a major force and the attack was unsuccessful.

Early in 200, however, even as Yuan Shao was threatening invasion from the north, Cao Cao made a lightning attack. His success was complete, and though Liu Bei himself escaped he was compelled once more to abandon his wife and children, while his companion Guan Yu was captured and obliged to remain with Cao Cao for several months.

Fleeing to Qing province, Liu Bei recovered some of his scattered forces, then joined Yuan Tan and was welcomed by Yuan Shao. He was sent back to Runan to support the bandit Liu Pi in raiding about Xu city, but was again defeated and driven back to Yuan Shao.

Liu Bei was now anxious to leave, and he persuaded Yuan Shao to give him another detached command in the south. He joined the bandit Gong Du of Runan, and they defeated and killed Cao Cao's officer Cai Yang, but after the defeat of Yuan Shao at Guandu Cao Cao came against them in person, and in 201 Liu Bei was driven to refuge with Liu Biao, Governor of Jing province.

JING PROVINCE AND THE RED CLIFFS

Between 192 and 201 Liu Bei had served or been in alliance with Tian Kai, Tao Qian, Lü Bu, Cao Cao and Yuan Shao; he had left Tian Kai, Tao Qian and Yuan Shao, spoken against Lü Bu and rebelled against Cao Cao. It was a remarkable history of switched allegiances, military defeats and recoveries. As evidence of his vicissitudes, Liu Bei had suffered the capture or arrest of his family three times: by Lü Bu in 196 and 198, each time later returned, and by Cao Cao in 200, after which it appears they did not rejoin him.

Liu Bei remained seven years with Liu Biao. He had been fortunate to find refuge in Jing province, and could expect the same fate as Lü Bu if he fell again into Cao Cao's hands. On the other hand, despite his erratic record, Liu Bei obviously inspired great loyalty: even after heavy defeats his men would return to him, and he attracted support from leading members of the gentry. Concerned at this popularity, Liu Biao was reluctant to make use of Liu Bei's abilities in case he developed a rival party.

Stationed initially on the northern frontier, Liu Bei achieved one notable success in an ambush of Cao Cao's commanders Xiahou Dun and Yu Jin. Later, however, Cao Cao was pre-occupied in the north and Liu Bei was evidently recalled to Liu Biao's court. We are told that on one occasion he went to the lavatory and came out in tears. When Liu Biao asked him the reason, Liu Bei explained that his thighs used to be thin from horse-riding, but they were now flabby from lack of exercise. It was during this period that Liu Bei met and gained the allegiance of Zhuge Liang, who later became his chief minister and the bulwark of his state of Shu-Han.

In the autumn of 208 the situation changed. Just as Cao Cao was moving against Jing province from the north, Liu Biao died. In a brief political struggle the Cai family of Liu Biao's current wife gained the succession for his younger son Liu Zong, who promptly surrendered. Dangerously exposed, Liu Bei paid respects at Liu Biao's tomb and proclaimed his loyalty to Liu Biao's elder son Liu Qi, then gathered such followers as he could and fled south towards the Yangzi while his officer Guan Yu commandeered the Han River fleet. Cao Cao pursued Liu Bei's ramshackle troops, heavily defeated him at the Chang Slope in Nan commandery, and went on to occupy the naval base at Jiangling on the Yangzi. Once again Liu Bei was obliged to abandon his family, but this time his concubine the Lady Gan and her son Liu Shan were saved by the efforts of his officer Zhao Yun.

As Cao Cao took over the Yangzi fleet, Liu Bei turned west with his remnant force and joined up with Guan Yu's ships from the Han River and the army of Liu Qi from Jiangxia. More importantly, Zhou Yu, general of Sun Quan the warlord of the lower Yangzi, came up-river with a substantial army, so it was possible for Liu Bei and Liu Qi to contemplate resistance.

In the winter of 208 Cao Cao continued his advance, with his own troops now augmented by the main army and Yangzi fleet of Jing province. The allied armies took up a defensive position on the eastern bank of the Yangzi south and upstream of present-day Wuhan, at a place known variously as Wulin 烏林 or the Red Cliffs 赤壁. Though his force was by far the larger, Cao Cao's own men were tired from a long series of campaigns, they were now in alien river- and marshland, there was sickness in the camp, and the men of Jing province were still uneasy over their new leadership. It is probable that Cao Cao hoped to establish a beach-head by a swift attack and then force terms on the enemy; it is less likely that he planned a full campaign of conquest.

In any event, Cao Cao's initial attack was unsuccessful, and before he could take further action his position was attacked by fire-ships under the command of Sun Quan's officer Huang Gai. The fleet and the camp were lost, Cao Cao retreated to the north, and he never again came so close to crossing the Yangzi. After a year's siege, in the winter of 209 Zhou Yu's forces captured Jiangling and the southern allies thus controlled the river line.

Despite romantic tradition, the role of Liu Bei at the Red Cliffs was secondary to that of Sun Quan's forces led by Zhou Yu. Sun Quan's counsellors urged him to keep Liu Bei under tight control, and he gave his energetic sister, the Lady Sun III, to be Liu Bei's principal wife. Following the death of Liu Qi in 209, Sun Quan was obliged to recognise Liu Bei as Governor of Jing province; he could hardly avoid it, but the title gave Liu Bei a status comparable to Sun Quan's own and made him a focus of attraction for local interests of the middle Yangzi. Furthermore, while Zhou Yu was engaged against Jiangling, Liu Bei had established a base down-river at Gong'an and sent his forces south up the Xiang to take over the commanderies of Wuling, Changsha, Lingling and Guiyang. As a result, though Sun Quan's men controlled the line of the Yangzi itself, they were squeezed between Cao Cao on the north and Liu Bei on the south.

In 210 Zhou Yu died, and with the loss of his leading general Sun Quan's position in the region was seriously weakened. Soon afterwards, at the recommendation of Zhou Yu's successor Lu Su, Liu Bei was allowed to "borrow" Nan commandery – the significance of the term 借 jie was later disputed; he thus acquired a dominant position on the middle Yangzi, while Sun Quan kept only the region about the junction of the Yangzi and the Han.

For the time being, Cao Cao was engaged in the northwest, and though the relationship with his nominal ally Sun Quan was uneasy, Liu Bei held effective control of a coherent and useful territory. He had done very well, as much by political manoeuvring as through military effort, and his ambitions now turned to the west.

YI PROVINCE AND THE CONTEST FOR JING

Given the success on the middle Yangzi, about 209 it is said that Sun Quan proposed a joint attack upstream against Yi province, at that time controlled by Liu Zhang. Accounts of the planning vary, but it is clear that such a campaign could be undertaken only with the support of Liu Bei, and he had no wish for Sun Quan to share in such possibilities as might appear in the west. Claiming among other things that Liu Zhang, albeit a weak ruler and no fighting man, was nonetheless his kinsman, Liu Bei rejected the plan and is said to have guarded the passes against Zhou Yu, whose death in any event removed Sun Quan's opportunity.

For his part, by 211 Liu Zhang had become concerned at Cao Cao's successes against the warlords of the Wei valley, across the Qin Ling ranges, and he was afraid that Zhang Lu in Hanzhong, immediately to his north, might allow Cao Cao's men into Yi province. Several of his advisers, who had privately committed themselves to Liu Bei, urged Liu Zhang to seek his aid. So at the end of the year Liu Bei came through the Gorges, was welcomed in a grand ceremony, and went north to face Zhang Lu.

Though he had entered Yi province as an ally, Liu Bei had no intention of remaining subordinate to Liu Zhang. For most of a year he faced Zhang Lu from his base at Jiameng in Guanghan, but he took no substantial action and concentrated rather upon establishing himself in the province and suborning Liu Zhang's followers. By the end of 212 he was ready to act.

At that time Cao Cao was moving southeast against Sun Quan, and Liu Bei sought leave to take an army down the Yangzi to assist his old ally. In fact, Sun Quan was well ensconced behind the Yangzi, Zhuge Liang and Guan Yu had firm control of Jing province, and the operations were in any case too distant for Liu Bei to usefully intervene. When Liu Zhang gave only minimal support, however, Liu Bei made a fine show of righteous indignation and declared war.

At first Liu Zhang's men were regularly defeated and many of his officers and men changed sides, particularly after Liu Bei took their families hostage, but Liu Zhang and his loyalists then held out in the region of Chengdu. It was more than a year before greater part of the territory was brought under control, aided by Zhuge Liang, Zhang Fei and Zhao Yun with troops from Jing province. At last, in the summer of 214 Liu Zhang surrendered and Liu Bei took over his capital. He sent Liu Zhang into exile down-river, released his own troops to plunder, and gave generous rewards to his followers and to those who had betrayed his rival.

Sun Quan was predictably not pleased at Liu Bei's success: his erstwhile colleague now controlled all but small portions of Yi and Jing province while he himself was basically restricted to the lower Yangzi; and with such resources Liu Bei could prove a dangerous neighbour. His sister, Liu Bei's formal wife, returned to the east, and only swift action by Zhao Yun prevented her from taking Liu Bei's son Liu Shan with her as a future hostage.

In the following year, 215, Sun Quan sent an envoy to ask for the return of the territories of Jing province which Liu Bei had "borrowed" in 210: his claim included not only Nan commandery but also a share of the south. As Liu Bei temporised, Sun Quan sent an army under Lu Su to face Guan Yu, while Lü Meng occupied Changsha, Guiyang and Lingling. With Cao Cao as common enemy, neither party could afford a full-scale conflict, and a settlement divided Jing province along the line of the Xiang River. Sun Quan then turned north towards the Huai, while Guan Yu kept a dominant position along the Han and Liu Bei was free to deal with Hanzhong.

That autumn Cao Cao indeed attacked Zhang Lu, and in the winter he obtained his surrender. Liu Zhang's earlier anxieties were fulfilled, for the forces of Wei were on the immediate frontier, but Cao Cao, did not follow up. For the next two years he was concerned with affairs at the capital, with ceremonies of kingship and the question of succession. He attacked Sun Quan in the southeast, but left only his general Xiahou Yuan to garrison Hanzhong.

In 217 Liu Bei attacked Hanzhong and in the spring of 219 he gained a decisive victory at Dingjun Mountain, defeating the Wei army and killing Xiahou Yuan. Cao Cao came to the commandery but could not recover the lost ground and in the summer, after a few months indecisive action, he withdrew across the mountains to the north. Liu Bei was left in undisputed command of the territory.

KING OF HAN AND THE LAST CAMPAIGNS

In the autumn of 219, with a formal, albeit meaningless, memorial to the imperial court of Han and a coronation ceremony at Mianyang, Liu Bei proclaimed himself King of Hanzhong and established some semblance of a court at Chengdu. Emperor Gao had been enfeoffed in Hanzhong at the end of the third century BC, and the title was obviously convenient to a putative descendant who proposed to maintain the tradition of the dynasty. The claimant state is commonly known as Shu-Han 屬漢.

Success in Hanzhong not only gave Liu Bei the claim to a royal title, but also put a halt to Cao Cao's forward momentum and forced him for a time onto the defensive. His weakness lay in the north of Jing province, where Liu Bei's men threatened Nanyang with an advance east down the Han from Hanzhong, while Guan Yu, inspired by the success of his master, embarked on a strong attack from the south. In the autumn the Han River flooded, a great part of Cao Cao's defensive positions were overwhelmed, and Guan Yu brought ships up the river to besiege Fan city, at present-day Xiangfan. Cao Cao's cousin Cao Ren held out, and though there was trouble behind Cao Cao's lines the Wei forces recovered and began to press Guan Yu.

In the winter, moreover, Sun Quan sent Lü Meng with an army up the Yangzi to attack Nan commandery. Guan Yu's position was ruined, he himself was killed, and Sun Quan seized the whole of Jing province. Just as Guan Yu's great attack marked the high point of Liu Bei's power, his catastrophic defeat ended all hope of hegemony. Cao Cao died early in 220, but the state that he had built in the north was too great to be overthrown, and though Sun Quan, Liu Bei and their descendants survived for several years with the protection of the Yangzi and the western mountains, they were never able to make serious inroads against his territory.

Despite the loss of Jing province, when Cao Cao's son Cao Pi compelled Emperor Xian of Han to abdicate in his favour at the end of 220, Liu Bei was swift to emulate him. Claiming to believe that the emperor had been killed, but in any case relying on his kinship to the imperial house, he proclaimed himself emperor on 15 May 221. He appointed suitable officials for his court, set up a temple to worship the rulers of Han since Emperor Gao, and established the reign-title Zhangwu 章武. Historians and commentators have debated for almost two thousand years whether Liu Bei's state or the Wei dynasty of the Cao family should be considered to have maintained the true line of succession to Han [正流 zhengliu or 正統 zhengtong]. A well-known example of the controversy is the disagreement between Sima Guang 司馬光 of Northern Song, who accepted the dating used by Wei, and Zhu Xi 朱熹 of Southern Song, who followed that of Shu-Han; in each case, and in the present day, the choice is primarily a reflection of contemporary political perception.

At the same time, infuriated by Sun Quan's stab against Guan Yu's back, Liu Bei prepared an expedition of revenge and reclamation, and in 221 he brought a great army through the Gorges into the middle Yangzi. Sun Quan made formal surrender to Wei in order to keep Cao Pi neutral, and in the summer of 222 his general Lu Xun destroyed Liu Bei's extended line of camps and drove him back with heavy losses. Retreating into the Gorges, Liu Bei set his headquarters at Yong'an, present-day Fengjie in Sichuan, but he was in no position to take any further initiative.

In the summer of the following year Liu Bei died, and his body was taken for burial to Chengdu. His son Liu Shan succeeded to the throne of Shu-Han, but the government of the state was largely in the hands of Zhuge Liang.

Liu Bei was a typical condottiere, primarily concerned with the loyalty of his followers and showing limited interest in a long-term stable future. [A perceptive comment by Pei Qian is recorded in SSXY; Mather 76:196-197.] He was remarkably successful, for he was an effective fighting general and had several good advisers and officers, but the basis of his survival and that of his state was his isolation in the west and the fortunate series of chances which had led him there.

From his earliest days, Liu Bei had changed his coat and his allegiance at any time it seemed to suit, and his take-over of Yi province was a betrayal of the kinsman who had sought his aid. It is not inappropriate that the destruction of his wider ambitions came through an even greater, and quite unexpected, act of treachery and trickery by his ally Sun Quan.

In Chinese tradition, however, Liu Bei is the great romantic hero of the age, praised for his loyalty and his sense of honour; while his assistants Guan Yu, Zhang Fei, and above all Zhuge Liang, share in his glory. Some of this adulation may be attributed to the emotions of later times, notably during the formative period of the Romance of the Three Kingdoms 三國演義 during Southern Song. As for Zhu Xi in the debate on dating, the concept of a legitimate successor state maintaining itself against a more powerful rival has often aided political legitimacy and inspired a sense of national self-worth in times of crisis and defeat.

Behind the ostensible realities of history and the exaggerations of romance, we may perceive a man who could inspire great loyalty and admiration, and whose recovery from repeated set-backs – in an age when defeat so frequently brought death – reflects personal qualities and a presence which can no longer be properly reconstructed. From humble background with an erratic record, Liu Bei was a man of remarkable character: certainly courageous, surely untrustworthy to superiors and rivals, but clearly loyal to his subordinates; in many respects an ideal hero for an age of individuals. -SGZ Shu 2:871-92*; deC 90, deC 96.

Liu Bei 劉備; wives and concubines. The history of the marital and other relationships of Liu Bei, First Sovereign of Shu-Han, is confused, and it is not well recorded by SGZ and other parallel texts. A summary follows.

In 196 Liu Bei's women and children 妻子 were captured by Lü Bu. They were returned to him soon afterwards, but the same thing happened again in 198, and when Liu Bei was defeated by Cao Cao in 200 he was once more obliged to abandon his family. One concubine 妾, the Lady Gan, managed to return to him, but most of them apparently did not. There are no details of the status of the other women nor of the children involved.

After the first capture in 196 Liu Bei's follower Mi Zhu gave him his sister to be a formal wife 夫人, but there is no further record of her. It seems likely that the Lady Mi died soon afterwards and that she was not involved in the later abductions. There may have been one other principal wife, for SGZ Shu 4:905 says that Liu Bei was "several times in mourning for his principal wives and household 數喪嫡室."

In 207 Liu Bei's concubine the Lady Gan, who had re-joined him in Jing province, gave birth to his son and later Heir Liu Shan.

On the other hand, despite references to children 子 falling into enemy hands, none are identified, whether male or female. Liu Shan is the eldest son that he is recorded as having sired, and while he was in Jing province but before Liu Shan was born, Liu Bei adopted Liu Feng to be his heir.

Besides the Lady Mi and the Lady Gan, other named consorts are the Lady Sun and the Lady Wu, the last of whom was named as his empress. In later life Liu Bei had at least two more women, for SGZ

Shu 4:907-08 has biographies of Liu Yong 永 and Liu Li 理, younger half-brothers of Liu Shan by different mothers. See also C/C 99:48-49, deC 90:294-295, and individual entries for the following:

the Lady Gan 甘;

the Lady Mi 麋;

the Lady Sun 孫 III;

the Lady Wu 吳 of Chenliu.

Liu Ben 劉本 see Liu Pi 劉丕.

Liu Bi 劉辟 see Liu Pi 劉辟.

Liu Bian 劉辯; Guangling. A descendant of Liu Shou 劉守 the King of Guangling in Former Han, Liu Bian was Administrator of Qinghe about 140. -HHS 57/47: 1854, XC 3:8b.

Xie Cheng has the personal name of this man as Xiang 祥, but it seems most likely that his name was Bian, and that it was changed in the text of Xie Cheng's work to reflect taboo on the personal name of the Little Emperor Liu Bian: see below.

Liu Bian 劉辯 (173/176?-190) [the Little Emperor 少帝 (reg. 189)]. Liu Bian was the son of Emperor Ling by his Empress He. Since a number of imperial children had died in infancy he was taken outside the palace and brought up at the house of the Taoist Shi Zimiao; he was accordingly known as Lord Shi 史侯. We are told Emperor Ling was doubtful of his ability and so did not name him formally as his Heir, but after the emperor died in 189 Liu Bian's mother the Empress, now Dowager, and her brother He Jin ensured his succession.

Liu Bian took the throne on 15 May 189, under the regency of the Dowager, with He Jin as General-in-Chief. HHS 8 says that he was seventeen at the time, so born in 173, and HHS 10B says that he was eighteen when he died in 190. The Hou Han ji of Zhang Fan has his age as fourteen, which would indicate that he was born in 176. Given the reference below to his concubine the Lady Tang, the advanced age seems more probable, though it does not appear that he had formally come of age.

On 22 September the eunuchs, threatened by He Jin and his associates at court, killed He Jin and attempted to seize power. They were slaughtered by guards about the capital, and the palaces were burnt. A small party, seizing the emperor and his younger half-brother Liu Xie, sought to escape north from Luoyang, but they were caught at the Yellow River by the local officer Min Gong, who killed the eunuchs and brought the two imperial children back to the city, riding in an open cart. On 25 September they came into the hands of the general Dong Zhuo, who seized power to reform the government.

When Dong Zhuo asked Liu Bian what had happened, he was not impressed by his response, and he preferred Liu Xie in any case on account of his connection with the Lady Dong, mother of Emperor Ling and a notional member of his own clan. On 28 September, therefore, he compelled the Lady He to dismiss her own son from the throne and recognise Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, in his place. Liu Bian was named King of Hongnong.

In the following year, on 22 March 190, Liu Bian was poisoned at Dong Zhuo's orders by the Prefect of the Gentleman of the Palace Li Ru, head of his personal staff. HHS 10B has a touching account of how the young man was forced to drink the potion. When it was clear there was no help for it, he held a party with his concubines, had his favourite the Lady Tang Ji dance for him, and sang a farewell song.

There is no reference to the place of Liu Bing's burial, and it is unlikely that the tomb was of any note. Because his reign had not extended beyond a calendar year, he received no formal dynastic title, and he is referred to, like his comparable predecessor Liu Yi, as Shao 少 or "Little" Emperor. -HHS 8:358-59, 10B: 450-51, ZF: 1a.

Liu Biao 劉便 see Liu Bianqin 劉便親.

Liu Bianqin 劉便親 (d.159). Son of Liu Hui the King of Fuling, when his father died in 132 Liu Bianqin was passed over for succession in favour of his younger brother Dai. In the following year he was enfeoffed as marquis of a village.

As Liu Dai died without heirs in 145, the state was abolished, but in 147 the new regency government for Emperor Huan restored the fief and enfeoffed Liu Bianqin as formal successor to his father Liu Hui. -HHS 7:290, 304, 42/32:1446. [HHS 7 has the personal name simply as Bian, but HHS 42/32 has Bianqin.]

Liu Biao 劉彪. Son of Liu Ping and grandson of Liu Jing the King of Guangling, Liu Biao inherited his father's district marquisate. He was admired for filial conduct towards his grandmother. -LS 5:18a, XTS 71A:2254, HHSJJ 42/32:1546 Shen Qinhan.

Liu Biao 劉表 [Jingsheng 景升] (142-208); Shanyang. A distant descendant of Emperor Jing of Former Han, Liu Biao was a good-looking man over eight feet tall [185 cm]. He had been a student of Wang Chang, but in the late 150s he protested to his master that his rule as Administrator of Nanyang was too fierce; his and others' expressions of concern produced some lightening of Wang Chang's regime.

As a reformist at Luoyang in the late 160s, Liu Biao was numbered among the popular heroes in the lists compiled by reformists and students of the University, and he joined the sworn brotherhood of men from Shanyang under the leadership of Zhang Jian. In 169 this latter association was alleged to be treasonous, and the accusation was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident. Liu Biao was proscribed from office, but after the end of the Great Proscription in 184 he became a clerk in the offices of the General-in-Chief He Jin and then Adjutant to the Northern Army.

In 190 the Inspector of Jing province Wang Rui was killed by Sun Jian, and the imperial government controlled by Dong Zhuo appointed Liu Biao in his place. Since Nanyang commandery was under the influence of Yuan Shu, Liu Biao was obliged to make his way to the south alone and by side-routes. Once there, he gained support from Kuai Yue and others, and with their assistance he trapped and killed some fifty local leaders, persuaded others to surrender, and established his regime at Xiangyang, on the Han River by present-day Xiangfan in Henan. Late in 191 he was attacked by Sun Jian, in the service of Yuan Shu, but Sun Jian was killed in a skirmish and thereafter Liu Biao was able to maintain his borders without great difficulty. On the other hand, he held only the southern part of Nanyang, and though a number of local officials handed over their seals he had limited authority south of the Yangzi.

In 192 Liu Biao sent formal tribute to the new regime at Chang'an led by Li Jue and Guo Si, and he was promoted Governor, named a general and enfeoffed. In practice, such titles from the ramshackle regime were meaningless, and Liu Biao held warlord control of the Han valley and the middle Yangzi. He was criticised for his pretensions, including the use of carriages designed after the imperial style, and there was a mildly embarrassing incident when the former master of the imperial music, Du Kui, rejected Liu Biao's request to play the music of the court of Han. On the other hand, his court became a refuge for scholars and gentlemen from the north, while his generous attitude towards Zhang Ji, who had invaded his territory but was then killed in the fighting, meant that he gained the allegiance of Zhang Ji's kinsman and successor Zhang Xiu.

During the late 190s Liu Biao's control of southern Jing province was interrupted by the rebellion of Zhang Xiu in the south, allied to Cao Cao, but Zhang Xiu died in 200 and Liu Biao regained general authority over the valley of the Xiang. He sought no role in the confused fighting to his north and east, and though he had a loose alliance with Yuan Shao he kept aloof from the conflict with Cao Cao. He was not involved in the critical campaign about Guandu in 200, but he did give refuge to Liu Bei and he later wrote eloquent letters urging Yuan Shao's son Yuan Shang and Yuan Tan to end their quarrels and join forces against Cao Cao. When Cao Cao was in the far northeast in 207 Liu Bei urged Liu Biao to attack him from the rear, but Liu Biao again took no action.

Many commentators have criticised Liu Biao's apparent lack of energy and initiative, but others respect him for preserving a haven of literature and traditional culture in a period when so much else was confused and destroyed. He had himself compiled commentaries to the Book of Changes and the Ritual, he was interested in astrology [see sub Liu Rui], and he encouraged the scholars who came to his court to clarify and simplify the classical texts. As a result of his patronage, and notably under the leadership of Qimu Kai and Song Zhong, new and authoritative editions and commentaries were prepared and circulated; they were known as the "Later Edition" 後定. In this regard his policies and achievements may be seen as a development of the process already apparent in the work on the Stone Classics at Luoyang by Cai Yong and his colleagues during the 170s and 180s.

In 208, after a long period of comparative peace, Liu Biao's territory came under threat from Cao Cao, now dominant in the north, while Sun Quan, son of Sun Jian and now warlord of the lower Yangzi, defeated and destroyed Liu Biao's general Huang Zu in the south. Aged in his late sixties, Liu Biao died that autumn. His succession was contested by his two sons, Liu Zong and Liu Qi, and Jing province was soon afterwards taken over by Cao Cao. -HHS 74/64B:2419-24*, SGZ 6:210-13*; Mather 76:552, Miao 82:69-72.

Cai 3:7 has the text of a funerary inscription to Liu Biao as General Who Maintains the South in Peace 鎮南[將軍]碑; this cannot be genuine, for Cai Yong himself died in 192.

Liu Biao 劉彪, second wife of: see the Lady Cai 蔡.

Liu Biede 劉別得, the Lady. Daughter of Liu Qing the father of Emperor An, after her brother's accession to the throne in 106 she and her sisters were given titles and estates as princesses, and after the death of the regent Dowager Deng in 121 she was named Senior Princess of Wuyin in Nanyang. She married Deng Bao. -HHS 55/45:1804, 10B:457, 16/6:606.

Liu Bin 劉賓 (d.119). Son of Liu Xun the King of Lecheng, he succeeded his father in 111. He left no sons when he died, and the kingdom was ended [but see sub Liu Chang]. -HHS 50/40:1673.

Liu Bing 劉炳 (d.87). Son of Emperor Ming by an unknown concubine, in 72 he was enfeoffed as King of Changshan. In 79 his fief was changed to Huaiyang, and the territory was increased by two counties from Runan. After his death the kingdom was not maintained [but see sub Liu Ze]. -HHS 50/40:1678*.

Liu Bing 劉丙. Son of Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, in 118, after his eldest brother Liu Dao succeeded to their father's kingdom, Liu Bing and his brothers Guo and Ding were enfeoffed as district marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671, DGHJ 7:5a.

Liu Bing 劉秉 or Liu Kang 康. Appointed Inspector of Liang province in 139, Liu Bing and his colleague Lai Ji in Bing province were given shared responsibility for the office of Protector of the Qiang after Ma Xian left that position. They were urged by the General-in-Chief Liang Shang to treat the non-Chinese tolerantly, but both were cruel men, and they caused trouble as soon as they arrived in their posts.

In the following year, as the second great rebellion of the Qiang broke out, Liu Bing and Lai Ji were found guilty and dismissed. -HHS 87/77:2895.

Liu Bing 劉炳 (143-145) [Emperor Chong 沖帝 (reg. 144-145)]. Only son of Emperor Shun, Liu Bing was born in 143 to the Beauty Yu. In 144, a few months before the death of his father, the child was named Heir, and on 20 September he acceded to the throne under the regency of the Dowager Liang. The Grand Commandant Zhao Jun became Grand Tutor, and the minister Li Gu succeeded him as Grand Commandant. Together with the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, brother of the Dowager, they held control of the Imperial Secretariat, giving formal command of the government.

At the beginning of the following year, on 15

February 145, Liu Bing died. His tomb, northwest of Luoyang, was named "Mound of Affection" 懷陵. Because his reign had been so short he did not receive a temple-name, while his dynastic title Chong 冲 relates to death at a young age. Events during his short reign are summarised in the biography of his successor Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan. -HHS 6:275-76.

Liu Bo 劉博 (d.174). Son of Liu Kai the King of Hejian, he was a village marquis. In 161 his nephew Emperor Huan enfeoffed him as King of Rencheng, to maintain sacrifices for the lineage of the late Liu Chong.

Liu Bo showed great filial piety at the death of his mother, and his fief was increased by three thousand households. When he died without heirs, the kingdom was abolished. -HHS 7:308, 8:336, 42/32:1444.

Liu Bo 劉伯 see Liu Zu 劉祖.

Liu [Bolin] 劉伯麟; Danyang. A man of humble family who had worked in the fields, Liu Bolin served as an Assistant Officer of Yang province, was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and became a magistrate in Runan. He died at the age of sixty-two. -LS 22:7a-b.

Liu [Bolu] 劉伯鄜; Pei. A former gentleman cadet, when the magistrate Wang VII was transferred to Guanghan Dependent State Liu Bolu took a lead in setting set up a stele to honour his good government. -SJZ 24:7b-8a.

Liu [Bosheng] 劉伯升 (d.23); Nanyang. This man's personal name was Yan 續 (for which XHS 2:1b gives the pronunciation as yin 引), but the early texts and Bielenstein regularly refer to him by his style and I follow this. Liu Bosheng's grandfather Liu Hui 回 was a first cousin of Liu Ren 仁, who was transferred in 45 BC to the marquisate of Chongling district in Caiyang county of Nanyang. Liu Hui's son Liu Qin 欽 married the Lady Fan Xiandu, a woman of wealthy family from Huyang county, north of Caiyang. They had three sons, of whom Liu Bosheng was the eldest, and three daughters. Liu Bosheng's youngest brother was Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu of Later Han.

After the death of Liu Qin in 7 AD, the family went to the household of his younger brother Liu Liang, who was a county magistrate in Pei. Liu Bosheng studied for a time at Chang'an, but then returned to Nanyang, where he led a gang of trouble-making retainers.

About 20 Liu Bosheng developed the idea of overthrowing the government of Wang Mang and restoring the house of Han, but such plans were initially little more than the vague ambitions of a local bully with a distinguished name and some pretensions. Liu Bosheng's own lineage was descended from Emperor Jing of Former Han (reigned 157-141), but this gave no effective claim to the throne. In 6 AD, Liu Chong 劉崇 the marquis of Anzhong county, from another branch of the family, had rebelled against Wang Mang but was defeated and executed. There was natural resentment among the imperial cadet gentry of Nanyang against the "usurping" rule of Wang Mang, and some families lost prestige and pensions when hereditary fiefs were abolished by the new dynasty, but few were willing or anxious to take action.

The local situation was disturbed by a shortage of grain at this time, but the critical mass for rebellion was obtained through Liu Bosheng's contact with the Li clan of Wan, capital of Nanyang. The two groups were initially suspicious of each other, for Liu Bosheng had killed a member of the Li family, and the death had not been avenged. Early in 22, however, Li Yi brought Liu Bosheng's brother Liu Xiu to meet his cousin Li Tong, and it was agreed to co-operate in a rising against Wang Mang. The attempt began in the winter of that year. It may have been planned to coincide with the annual winter review, in the hope of arranging a coup to take over the local troops, but this part of the plan was unsuccessful. The rebels then gathered in the Chongling district of Caiyang county, home of Liu Bosheng, who was recognised as leader and took title as Chief of Companies and Pillar of Heaven 柱天都部. He was at this time a little over thirty years old.

To augment his limited forces, which were so far composed largely of gentry and their retainers, Liu Bosheng negotiated the support of two groups of commoner bandits, the Troops from Xinshi, led by Wang Kuang and Wang Feng, who had come into Nanyang from Jiangxia, and the Troops from Pinglin, led by Chen Mu and Liao Zhan, who had joined the Xinshi force when they entered the south of Nanyang. With these reinforcements Liu Bosheng occupied and looted some local villages and districts, then invaded Huyang, the home of his mother's family, capturing the county city with the aid of his distant cousin Liu Zhong, who pretended to be an imperial official. After settling a quarrel between the disparate confederates over the sharing of booty, Liu Bosheng brought his army to Jiyang, south of Wan. He established a base there, and received further support from the local gentleman Ma Cheng and from his brother-in-law Deng Chen of Xinye county to the southwest.

The insurgents now moved against Wan city by way of Yuyang. They failed, however, to capture the county city of Yuyang, and Wang Mang's local officials, the Administrator Zhen Fu 甄阜 and the Commandant Liangqiu Ci 梁丘賜, raised levies to oppose them. In a battle confused by fog, Liu Bosheng's troops were defeated at Xiao-Chang'an on the Yu River south of Wan. There were heavy casualties, including Liu Bosheng's brother Zhong, his sister the Lady Yuan, wife of Deng Chen, and her three daughters, and the wife and two sons of their uncle Liu Liang. Many of the associated Li clan in Wan suffered execution, and officials throughout the commandery now turned against the rebels and sought to show their loyalty to Wang Mang by persecuting sympathisers. Still more dangerously, Wang Kuang and his fellow-commanders of Troops now threatened to abandon the cause in which they no longer saw opportunity for profit or power.

Liu Bosheng regrouped the remnants of his scattered forces at Jiyang, and went in person to recruit another bandit group, the Troops from the Lower Yangzi led by Wang Chang, which had likewise come north into Nanyang in search of plunder. With this second group of reinforcements from displaced peasant and commoner bandits, Liu Bosheng's position against Wang Mang's local forces was restored with remarkable speed, and in the first month of 23 he renewed the campaign. Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci brought their army towards Jiyang and prepared a forward defensive position between two rivers north of the city, but during the night Liu Bosheng sent a detachment to surprise their rear-guard and seize their supplies, and next morning he followed this demoralising success with an attack on two flanks. The enemy force was destroyed and Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci were killed.

The rebels thus gained both booty and valuable equipment, and a few weeks later Liu Bosheng achieved another victory beneath the walls of Yuyang city over an army commanded by Zhuang You and Chen Mao. He now embarked on the siege of Wan, and sent envoys across the empire to invite support against Wang Mang. For his part, Wang Mang designated Liu Bosheng as his chief enemy, placed a vast reward of gold, pensions and honours on his head, and had his troops practice target shooting at his portrait.

It was now time for the rebels to prepare a rival claimant to the imperial throne which had been usurped by Wang Mang. Liu Bosheng was the obvious candidate, but just as he and his cause appeared well-established and successful, he suffered a dramatic set-back from within the ranks he commanded. The leaders of the commoner Troops from Xinshi, Pinglin and the Lower Yangzi held a caucus and agreed to name Liu Bosheng's distant cousin Liu Xuan as emperor. It is likely that they distrusted Liu Bosheng and the traditional gentry who formed the core of his power, and saw Liu Xuan, who had been a member of the Troops from Pinglin, as more sympathetic to their interests. Liu Bosheng sought to delay the decision, or at least have the leader appointed only as a king, but he and his party were out-numbered and their arguments were over-ruled. On 11 March 23 Liu Xuan took the imperial title: from the name of his reign period, he is known as the Gengshi Emperor. Liu Bosheng was named Excellency over the Masses in the new regime, he continued in command of the forces about Wan, and he retained some personal support, but most of the gentry who had previously accepted his leadership showed no hesitation in turning to Liu Xuan.

The newly-proclaimed government was sufficiently powerful to despatch another force to subdue the northeast of Nanyang, and this group extended operations into Yingchuan, Runan and Pei, and sent provisions to the besiegers at Wan. Wan city surrendered to Liu Bosheng on 4 July, and three days later the Han troops in Yingchuan, with Liu Bosheng's brother Liu Xiu playing a major role, gained decisive victory over a major army of Wang Mang at Kunyang.

Such successes, however, only made Liu Bosheng more of a threat to his nominal superior the Gengshi Emperor, and soon afterwards it was alleged that a certain Liu Ji, kinsman of Liu Bosheng and one of his divisional commanders, had spoken angrily at the failure of Liu Bosheng to receive the imperial title. His remarks were reported to the emperor, and Liu Xuan planned to execute Liu Ji. Liu Bosheng pleaded for him, but this action only implicated him further in the alleged treason. In a display of solidarity between two disparate groups, Liu Bosheng was impeached by Li Yi of the great Nanyang family and by Zhu Wei, a leader of the bandit Troops from Xinshi. Liu Bosheng and Liu Ji died together.

In 39 Emperor Guangwu granted Liu Bosheng a posthumous title, possibly as King but probably as Duke of Qi. When his son Zhang was restored to the royal title in 43, Liu Bosheng shared the retrospective promotion. -HHS 14/4:549-55*; Bn 54 and appendix # 81.

Liu [Boji] 劉伯姬, the Lady; Nanyang. The Lady was a younger sister of Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, who is said to have rescued her from the slaughter at Xiao-Chang'an in 22. In 24 she married Li Tong and in 26 she was named Senior Princess of Ningping in Huaiyang. -HHS 15/5:575, 14/4:555-56, 26/16:904-05, 7:313; Bn 54:108, Bn 67:19-21, Bn 79:140.

According to XHS 5:10a-b, in the early 40s a member of her household killed a man. When the Prefect of Luoyang executed him she sought to have him punished, but Guangwu rewarded the officer. HHS 77/67:2489-90 attributes the incident to the Lady Boji's sister Huang, and this appears more probable.

Liu Can 劉參 or Liu Shen; Nanyang. Son of Liu Jia, in 39 he succeeded to his father's marquisate. He was later found guilty of a crime, and his fief was reduced from a county to a district. During the reign of Emperor Ming, some time after 57, Liu Can held appointment as Colonel of the City Gates. -HHS 14/4:568; Bn 54 appendix # 111.

Liu Can 劉參 or Liu Shen. Son of Liu Xian the King of Chen, in 100 he was made a marquis. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Liu Cang 劉蒼 (d.83). Son of Emperor Guangwu by his Empress Yin, in 39 Liu Cang was named Duke of Dongping and in 41 his title was advanced to King. A keen student of the classics when young, he was wise, elegant and very good-looking. He was a favourite of his full brother Emperor Ming, who appointed him General of Agile Cavalry, with a large staff and rank above the Excellencies. His fief was augmented by five counties from Dong and Shanyang, and his two sons were enfeoffed as marquises. When the emperor left the capital Liu Cang stayed in charge; was the constant guard of their mother the Dowager, and he was able to give direct advice on conduct.

Liu Cang took great interest in the legitimation of the restored Han government. With senior ministers he prepared the Regulations for the Caps, Crowns, Carriages and Robes for the Southern and Northern Sacrifices [to Heaven and to Earth] 南北郊冠冕車服制度, and he was a leading figure in determining ritual, costumes and music for other ceremonies.

In 62, concerned not to be too closely involved with the imperial government, Liu Cang sought to retire to his estates, and after several requests the emperor acceded. Liu Cang retained his seal and office as a general, his staff were transferred to his royal court, and he received an additional grant. When Emperor Ming toured the east in 63, he had Liu Cang return with him to the capital. After the death of the Dowager Yin in the following year Liu Cang went back to Dongping accompanied by substantial gifts, including five hundred palace ladies and male and female slaves.

Liu Cang attended the capital again in 68, and in 72 Emperor Ming visited Dongping and presented him with a copy of the Annals of Emperor Guangwu, compiled by Ban Gu. Liu Cang composed Guangwu shouming zhongxing song 光武受命中興頌, a Hymn on the Receipt of the Mandate and the Restoration, and the emperor, full of praise, had the scholar Jia Kui prepare a commentary for its learned allusions.

When Emperor Zhang came to the throne Liu Cang continued to hold influence. In 76 he took the occasion of an earthquake to offer a memorial of guidance, and soon afterwards he protested the extravagant plan to establish county cities at the tombs of emperors Guangwu and Ming. Both pieces of advice were accepted, and any major concern at court was thereafter referred to him.

In 83 Liu Cang was received at Luoyang with special honours; he was invited to stay after other kings had left, and his daughters were endowed with counties while those of other rulers received only districts. Soon after returning to his state he became ill, and though Emperor Zhang sent the Court Physician, he died. His funeral was attended by high officials and was marked by grand donations and an edict of mourning, while the emperor ordered that Liu Cang's literary works should be collected and preserved.

Liu Cang was succeeded by his son Zhong. In 84 his younger son Shang was enfeoffed as King of Rencheng, while five other sons were enfeoffed as county marquises.

In 86 Emperor Zhang visited Dongping, where Liu Cang's grandson Chang was now king, and he paid honours and held sacrifice at Liu Cang's grave. -HHS 42/32:1433-42*; MBeck 90:21, 84.

Liu Cang 劉倉; Henan. Liu Cang was a commoner who lived outside the western walls of Luoyang. In 184 his wife gave birth to a child with two heads; presumably a pair of Siamese twins. -HHS 107/17:3348; Bn 76:17 [as Liu Cangju 屈]; MBeck 90:144.

490 Liu Cangju

The Annals of Emperor Ling, HHS 8:343 & 352, record similar births, of children with two heads and four arms, to unnamed parents in 179 and 185. One suspects some dittography.

Liu Cangju 劉倉屈 see Liu Cang 劉倉 of Henan.

Liu Cao 劉操; Chenliu. Liu Cao was a student and disciple of Jiang Gong, and after his master's death in 173 he and his colleagues composed an inscription and erected a stele in his honour. -HHS 53/43:1750.

Liu Chan 劉闡 alternative personal name Wei 緯; Jiangxia. Grandson of Liu Yan 焉 the warlord Governor of Yi province, and son of his successor Liu Zhang, when Liu Zhang left Chang'an to join Liu Yan in the early 190s, Liu Chan and his brother Liu Xun remained in the capital with their cousins the children of Liu Fan and Liu Dan.

In 194 Liu Fan and Liu Dan were involved in a failed attack on the regime and were killed. Pang Xi, however, whose daughter had married Liu Xun, was able to bring the brothers and their cousins to Liu Yan in Yi province.

As Liu Zhang was deposed by Liu Bei in 214, Liu Chan accompanied him to exile in Jing province. When Sun Quan's army captured the region in 219, Sun Quan restored Liu Zhang to his title as Governor of Yi province, and after Liu Zhang's death he named Liu Chan as Inspector. At this time the local chieftain Yong Kai of Yizhou commandery had rebelled against Liu Bei and sent messages through Shi Xie in Jiaozhi offering allegiance to Wu. Sun Quan sent Liu Chan to take command on the border of the two provinces in the southwest, but in 225 Zhuge Liang of Shu destroyed the rebellion and settled the south; Liu Chan returned to Wu.

Recognised as an honourable and generous man, Liu Chan became an officer of the Imperial Censorate of Wu. He retired on account of ill health and died at home. -SGZ Shu 1:870.

Liu Chan 劉禪 see Liu Shan 劉禪 [Later Sovereign of Shu-Han].

Liu Chang 劉敞; Nanyang. Son of Liu Ren 仁, Marquis of Chongling district in Caiyang county of Nanyang, Liu Chang succeeded to his fief, probably in the time of Emperor Ping of Former Han. The first marquis of Chongling had been a grandson of Emperor Jing by Liu Fa 發 the King of Changsha; the fief was originally in Lingling commandery, but was transferred to Nanyang in the time of Emperor Xuan. Commended for his generosity to his family, Liu Chang became Commandant of Lujiang, but was dismissed after he abused the Administrator for his lack of concern at a time of famine.

Liu Chang's distant cousin Liu Chong 崇 spoke with him about the Wang family threat to the Han dynasty, and when Liu Chong rebelled in 6 AD, Liu Chang was sympathetic. Though he took no active role, he sought support from the powerful family of the late Imperial Chancellor Zhai Fangjin 翟方進, and arranged a marriage alliance through his son Liu Zhi. When Zhai Yi 翟義 rebelled in Dong commandery in 7, Liu Zhi's wife was killed by the authorities in Nanyang and Liu Zhi was arrested. Liu Chang pleaded for him, and Wang Mang was merciful. [On the rebellions of Liu Chong and Zhai Yi, see Bn 54:87-91.]

As Wang Mang took the throne in 9 AD all marquises of Former Han were degraded to viscounts 子, and in the following year the fiefs were abolished entirely. Liu Chang, however, still held his lands, and by 20 it was claimed that he owed a large tax bill to the state. His cousin Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, went to Chang'an about 21 to negotiate on his behalf, but the result of the case is not recorded. Liu Chang died about this time. -HHS 14/4:560-61; Bn 54:97-101 and appendix # 48, QHX:270.

Liu Chang 劉常 see Wang Chang 王常. When the Gengshi Emperor established his court at Chang'an in 24, he enfeoffed the chieftain Wang Chang as a king and granted him the privilege of the imperial Liu surname. -HHS 15/5:580.

Liu Chang 劉長 (d.84). Son of Emperor Ming by an unknown concubine, in 72 he was enfeoffed as King of Jiying. In 79 his territory and revenue were augmented by two counties from Chenliu and Dong commandery. Liu Chang lived at the capital and was buried near Luoyang. He left no sons when he died, and the kingdom was ended. -HHS 50/40:1679*.

Liu Chang 劉暢 (d.98). Son of Emperor Ming by the Honoured Lady Yin, in 72 he was enfeoffed as King of Runan. His mother was a favourite of the emperor, and Liu Chang was also treated with great affection; the revenues from his state were double those of his half-brothers.

When Emperor Zhang came to the throne, he continued his father's policy, showing Liu Chang the utmost goodwill and giving him generous presents, while in 77 he granted his uncle Yin Tang a county marquisate in Jiangxia. In 79 Liu Chang was transferred to be King of Liang, with territory and revenue augmented by six counties from Chenliu and Jiyin. When Emperor Zhang died in 88, the new regime of the regent Dowager Dou ordered Liu Chang and his brothers to leave the capital.

Liu Chang was proud, and did not always obey the law. He had bad dreams, and came under the influence of his attendant Bian Ji, who claimed to interpret them. Together with Liu Chang's former wet-nurse Wang Li and another attendant Li A, Bian Ji introduced Liu Chang to fortune-telling and dealings with the spirit world. Engaged in ceremonies to seek good fortune, he was told that the spirits said he should become emperor. Liu Chang was delighted, but in 93 the Inspector of Yu province and the Chancellor of Liang reported him for impiety. The senior officials urged Liu Chang be arrested, but Emperor He would not agree, nor would he approve the transfer of his state to Jiuzhen in the far south. Liu Chang suffered only the removal of two counties from his fief.

Fearful and bitterly ashamed, Liu Chang sent in a memorial offering to give up a further five counties, reducing his fief to four, and also to send away those of his thirty-seven concubines who had not borne children, together with most of his guards, servants and slaves. The emperor confirmed his affection and his lenient attitude, and though Liu Chang repeated his offer it was not accepted.

Liu Chang was succeeded by his son Jian, and two younger sons were later granted village or district marquisates. -HHS 50/40:1675-77*, HHJ 14:174.

Liu Chang 劉暢 (d.88). Son of Liu Shi the King of Qi, Liu Chang was enfeoffed as a district marquis. In 87 his elder brother Huang was demoted from his royal fief to a marquisate. He died soon afterwards, and when Emperor Zhang died in the following year, Liu Chang went to Luoyang with a message of condolence. Such an embassy was not uncommon, but the visit at this time was no doubt encouraged by the possibility that the family might regain their royal fief. The testamentary edict of Emperor Zhang, however, recommended that the kingdom be restored in favour of Liu Chang's son Liu Wuji, and this was done two years later.

Liu Chang was known at the capital as a man of depraved character. As he waited for the formal reply to his message, he gained admission to the palace through the agency of the Lady Yuan, mother of his friend Deng Die, and obtained the favour of the Empress, now Dowager, Dou. Concerned that Liu Chang might rival his influence with his sister, Dou Xian sent retainers to waylay and kill him.

Seeking to conceal his responsibility, Dou Xian put the blame upon Liu Chang's brother Gang, but through the efforts of He Chang the whole affair was found out and Dou Xian was placed under house arrest in the palace. -HHS 23/13:813, 43/33:1483; Bn 54 appendix # 149.

Liu Chang 劉常, King of Guangchuan, see Liu Changbao 劉常保.

Liu Chang 劉敞 (d.132). Son of Liu Zhong the King of Dongping, he succeeded his father in 84. He showed great filial devotion at the death of his mother, and was commended by the Chancellor Chen Zhen. In 120 Liu Chang's pension was increased by the revenue of five hundred households.

Liu Chang was succeeded by his son Duan. -HHS 42/32:1442.

Liu Chang 劉昌; Nanyang. Son of Liu Shang and grandson of Liu Min 敏, he succeeded to his father's minor fief. -HHS 14/4:565.

Liu Chang 劉葦. Son of Liu Shou the King of Jibei, in 120 Liu Chang was made King of Lecheng, to restore the lineage of Liu Dang the son of Emperor Ming. A few months later, however, he was reported by the Inspector and the Chancellor for impiety. His grossly improper conduct included playing the lute and playing chess during the period of mourning, showing a lack of respect for the widow of his predecessor, taking other men's wives into his disorderly household, and brawling with his officials. Liu Chang was liable to the death penalty, but Ling Hong of the Imperial Secretariat argued that he had been inadequately prepared for his high rank, and he suffered only demotion to a county marquisate in Lujiang. -HHS 5:231-33, 50/40:1673.

Liu Chang 劉敞. A descendant of Liu Qiang the King of Donghai, Liu Chang held a county marquisate in Langye, where he was known for his illegal and immoral behaviour, including the dismissal of his chief wife in order to promote one of his concubines.

About 150 Gongsha Mu was sent out as chancellor. He criticised Liu Chang for his bad reputation, obliged him to restore his former wife to her proper place, to dismiss his concubine's son from the succession, and to restore the public and private land he had seized without authority; Gongsha Mu also arrested and tortured those retainers and slaves of the household who had offended the law. Liu Chang, weeping, asked pardon for his wrong-doing and thereafter obeyed Gongsha Mu's instructions. -HHS 82/72B:2730-31.

492 Liu Chang

Liu Chang 劉常; Guiyang. A noted Confucian scholar of the 150s, Liu Chang was a friend of Yuan Zhu. Yuan Zhu criticised Liang Ji and was killed by him, and Liang Ji then humiliated Liu Chang by appointing him to a lowly clerical position. -HHS 34/24:1184.

Liu Chang 劉暢 (d.174). Son of Liu Hong the King of Zhongshan, he succeeded his father in 140. -HHS 42/32:1450.

HHS 8:335 says that Liu Chang died without sons and the kingdom was ended, but see sub Liu Zhi 劉稚.

Liu Chang 劉萇/長; Hejian. Son of Liu Shu, Liu Chang succeeded his father as Marquis of Jiedu Village 解瀆亭. In 168, when his son Liu Hong, Emperor Ling, was brought to the throne, Liu Chang received posthumous imperial honours. -HHS 9:327-28, 55/45:180.

Liu Changbao 劉常保 (d.108). Third son of Liu Qing the King of Qinghe and a brother of Liu You, Emperor An, in 107 Liu Changbao was named King of Guangchuan. The territory was taken from the kingdom of Qinghe held by Liu Changbao's elder brother Liu Huwei, and it probably comprised only the county of that name.

When Liu Changbao died without children in the following year, the kingdom was abolished, though the territory was restored to Qinghe only in 121. -HHS 5:206-210, 55/45:1804.

Though HHS three times gives the name of this man as Changbao 常保, in HHSJJ 5:198 the modern commentator Qian Daxin observes that the son of Emperor An, future Emperor Shun, had the personal name Bao 保. Since it is most unlikely that an uncle and a nephew would share the same characters, he suggests there must be an error in the texts. It is probable that the personal name was simply Chang 常.

Liu Changqing 劉長卿; Pei. Liu Changqing died in the late 160s, leaving a five-year-old son. His widow the Lady Huan became known for her devotion. -HHS 84/74:2797.

Liu Chen 劉臣; the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 76 she was named Princess of Luyang in Nanyang. -HHS 10B:460.

Liu Cheng 劉成, the Lady. Second daughter of Emperor He, in 106 she was appointed Princess of Gong in Henei. -HHS 10B:461.

Liu Cheng 劉成 (d.127). Liu Cheng was a son by a concubine of Liu Yan the King of Xiapi. About 90 his elder half-brother Liu Ang was disqualified from inheriting the state on account of his bad conduct, and the government of Emperor He ordered that Liu Gong, King of Pengcheng, should adjudicate the competing claims of Liu Yan's other sons by various concubines. Liu Cheng was chosen as the new heir.

Liu Cheng, however, had to wait thirty-five years before he succeeded his father in 125, and he died only two years later. In 126 two of Liu Cheng's elder brothers and two grandsons of Liu Yan were enfeoffed as marquises, with fiefs presumably taken from the territory and revenues of Xiapi.

Liu Cheng was succeeded by his son Yi, and eight of his other sons later received district or village marquisates. -HHS 50/40:1674-75.

Liu Cheng 劉稱; Hejian. About the middle of the second century Liu Cheng was Director of Retainers. -HHS 67/57:2190.

Liu Cheng 劉成 (d.164). Son of Liu Jian the King of Liang, in 127 Liu Cheng was enfeoffed with a village marquisate. In 135 his elder brother the king Liu Kuang died, leaving no sons, and Emperor Shun granted the inheritance to Liu Cheng.

Liu Cheng was succeeded by his son Yuan. -HHS 50/40:1678.

Liu Cheng 劉承. Son of Liu Xi the King of Qi, he succeeded his father in 146. The kingdom was abolished in 206, presumably after Liu Cheng's death. -HHS 14/4:554; Bn 54 appendix # 166.

Liu Cheng 劉承. Son of Liu Chong 崇 the King of Chen, he succeeded his father in 124. He was succeeded in turn by his son Chong 寵. -HHS 50/40:1669.

Liu Cheng 劉丞 [Jiyi 季意]. Magistrate of Huai county, the capital of Henei, about 134 Liu Cheng took part in the major project led by Wang Hui and then by Sima Deng, to dredge and reconstruct the channel of the Yellow River and its tributaries near Rongyang. -SJZ 7:9a.

Liu Chengnan 劉成男, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Shun, in 138 she was appointed Senior Princess of Guanjun 冠軍 in Nanyang. -HHS 10B:461.

Liu Chong 劉崇, Marquis of Anzhong (d. 6 AD), see Liu Chong 劉寵 immediately below.

Liu Chong 劉寵 (d.37); Nanyang. After Liu Chong 崇, Marquis of Anzhong in Nanyang, made an unsuccessful rebellion against Wang Mang in 6 AD, he was killed and his fief was ended [Bn 54:88]. There is confusion, however, about the restoration of the fief and the establishment of a successor.

HHS 25/15:872 says that Liu Chong's cousin Liu Xuan 宣 took no part in the rebellion, though he did refuse to serve the new Xin dynasty: he changed his name and retired to a life of scholarship. After Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, had taken the imperial title Liu Xuan went to his court and was granted the marquise of Anzhong.

The Table of Fiefs in HS 15A:459-60 says that the successor to Liu Chong 崇 was his cousin Liu Chong 寵, who was granted the restored marquise in 26. He was succeeded by his son Song 松 in 37.

HHS 15/5:577 TC, in a quotation from Xie Cheng also at XC 6:10a-b, has an extract from the biography ascribed to Liu Chong 崇 the Marquis of Anzhong. It mentions the rebellion, but then goes on to say that Liu Chong did well against Wang Mang, that he joined Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, during his campaign in the north against Wang Lang in 24, that he was admired for his loyalty and became the founder of a restored marquise of Anzhong.

Evidently through confusion between the names, XC 6 has conflated the story of the rebel marquis Liu Chong 崇 with that of his cousin and successor Chong 寵, who may indeed have been with the future emperor in the north in 24. The statement by HHS 25/15 that Liu Xuan received the fief appears likewise to be based upon a confusion of the characters 寵 and 宣. See also comments by Gu Yanwu, Hui Dong and Chen Jingyun at HHSJ 15/5:581.

Liu Chong 劉沖 or Liu Zhong 种 (d.91). Son of Liu Yan 延 the King of Fuling, when his father died in 89 Liu Chong was granted the succession to the state in preference to his elder brother Liu Fang, who had earlier been implicated in an alleged plot. In the following year an edict of Emperor He removed a number of counties which had been restored to Liu Yan's fief by Emperor Zhang three years earlier.

Liu Chong died without heirs, and two years later the fief was allowed to revert to Liu Fang. -HHS

42/32:1445 [沖], 4:172 [种].

Liu Chong 劉崇 (d.96). Younger son of Liu Dang the King of Lecheng, he succeeded his father in 96 but died two months later. He left no sons and the state was abolished [but see sub Liu Xun]. -HHS 50/40:1673.

Liu Chong 劉寵 or Liu Fuhu 伏胡 (d.121). Son of Liu Kang the King of Qiansheng, he succeeded his father in 93; in 95 the fief was renamed Le'an. Like his father, Liu Chong lived at the capital and was buried near Luoyang. -HHS 55/45:1797.

Liu Chong 劉崇 (d.124). Son of Liu Xian and grandson of Emperor Ming, he became marquis of a village. In 120 he was made King of Chen to maintain the lineage of Liu Xian.

Liu Chong was succeeded by his son Cheng. -HHS 50/40:1669.

Liu Chong 劉崇 (d.151). Son of Liu An the King of Rencheng, he succeeded his father in 120. At the time of the Qiang and Xiongnu attacks in 140, Liu Chong sent cash and silk as a contribution to the costs of frontier defence. When Emperor Shun died in 144 he again offered money for the expenses of the imperial tomb, but though the court was grateful it did not accept. Liu Chong left no sons when he died, and the kingdom was ended. -HHS 42/32:1443.

Liu Chong 劉寵; Guanghan. Magistrate of two counties in Shu about the time of Emperor Huan, Liu Chong brought several powerful families under control. -HYZ 3:35.

Liu Chong 劉寵 [Zurong 祖榮 or Rongzu 榮祖]; Donglai. Elder son of Liu Pi, Liu Chong inherited his father's scholarly skills, and on account of his knowledge of the classics he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. At the end of his period of probation he was certified with the Four Types of Virtuous Conduct [simplicity, sincerity, generosity and good conduct] and he became a county magistrate in Ji'nan. There he improved the conduct of the people, and his rule was so popular that when he attempted to leave on account of his mother's illness, they held his carriage back and he had to escape in disguise [a common cliché, see Meng Chang].

Returning to clerical office under the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, Liu Chong became Administrator of Yuzhang and then of Kuaiji. He was noted for his good government, encouraging agriculture among the hills people and prohibiting non-Chinese customs. He was called to the capital as Court Architect, and as he was leaving he was visited by a party of old men from the hills, each with a gift of a hundred cash, because "the people no longer see officials and the dogs no longer bark at night." Liu Chong accepted just a single coin from each of them.

Liu Chong was later Minister of the Imperial Clan and Minister Herald. In 161 he was promoted Excellency of Works, but left that office at the end of the following year when a mysterious mist concealed the sun. He was still in high position and became Grand Commandant in 168, retiring in the following year on account of an eclipse. In 178 Cai Yong recommended Liu Chong to Emperor Ling as a worthy man from whom he should seek advice.

Despite his distinguished career, Liu Chong remained a frugal man of simple manner. He did not gather clients and students, he dressed in plain clothes, and he slept on rough skins. On one occasion he went to stay at an official rest-house but was turned away because the host was waiting for "His Excellency Liu" 劉公. Liu Chong left quietly.

Liu Chong died of old age at home. He is classed by Fan Ye as a Benevolent Official 循吏. -HHS 76/66: 2477-79*, XC 5:4b, XHS 5:9a-10a, SGZ Wu 4:1183; deC 89:30-31.

Liu Chong 劉寵 (d.197). Son of Liu Cheng, he succeeded his father as King of Chen. In 173 the Chancellor Shi Qian reported that Liu Chong and his former Chancellor Wei Yin had offered sacrifices to the deities asking for inappropriate good fortune; this was Impiety. The senior officials proposed a commission of enquiry, but Liu Kui the King of Bohai, brother of the late Emperor Huan, had been obliged to commit suicide in the preceding year and Emperor Ling was anxious to avoid another such affair. He had both Shi Qian and Wei Yin brought to the capital by cage-cart, where they were examined by the eunuch Wang Fu with the Director of the Imperial Secretariat and the censors.

Wei Yin acknowledged that he and the king had held worship to Huang-Lao, but they had asked only for long life and good fortune, and made no improper requests. Wang Fu and his colleagues reported that Wei Yin's administration had been well carried out, and though the ceremonies had not been correct, there was no question of Impiety: Shi Qian had laid false information against his king. Both officials were executed, but an edict ordered there be no further investigation of Liu Chong himself.

Liu Chong was a fine shot with the cross-bow and is said to have written a textbook on the subject, Nushe bifa 弩射祕法. When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out in 184 the local officials abandoned their posts and fled, but Liu Chong raised a force of several thousand archers and brought them to his capital. The people knew of his skill and did not dare rebel, so the state remained undisturbed and great numbers from neighbouring territories came to join him.

As the alliance formed against Dong Zhuo in 190, Liu Chong gathered an army and styled himself General Who Supports Han 輔漢將軍. With his Chancellor Luo Jun he maintained Chen as an island of prosperity and security, but in 197 Yuan Shu asked for supplies. When Luo Jun refused him, Yuan Shu sent men to kill Liu Chong and Luo Jun by treachery, and the state was destroyed. -HHS 50/40:1669-70; Yao Zhenzong:2388, deC 96:222-223.

Liu Chong 劉寵 [Shixin 世信]; Guanghan. Towards the end of the second century, Liu Chong, an orphan from a humble family, became expert in the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu, and was a friend of the distinguished scholars Wang Shang and Chen Bao/Shi.

The commandery sent Liu Chong to the capital, and he returned to the west as magistrate of Chengdu. He maintained an excellent government there, and as other counties were in disorder he was transferred from one to the other, achieving similar success. He was then made Administrator of Zangke, where he influenced the southern people by his modest conduct and simple clothing. He held office for nine years, and when he left they set up a stele in his honour. -HYGZ 10B:147.

Liu Chun 劉醇; Pingyuan. A man of humble background, Liu Chun was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet. About 163 he was recommended by the General of the Household Huang Wan, head of his corps of cadets, and the Minister of the Household Chen Fan promoted him as Abundant Talent so that he could take substantive office. Nothing more is known of Liu Chun's career. -HHS 61/51:2040.

Liu Chunlong 劉春龍, the Lady; Nanyang. Zhengao 眞誥, a book of revelations compiled by the Taoist master Tao Hongjing 陶弘景 (455-536), refers to the Lady as a daughter of the minister Liu Zu 劉祖.

-HHSJ 95/5:3528 Hui Dong.

Liu Ci 劉賜 [Ziqin 子琴] (d.52); Nanyang. A grandson of Liu Li 利, sometime Administrator of Cangwu, Liu Ci was a first cousin of Liu Xuan, the future Gengshi Emperor, and a more distant kinsman of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, and his elder brother Liu Bosheng. Liu Ci's father died when he was still young and he lived with his brother Xian 顯.

About 20 AD Liu Xian gathered retainers to avenge the death of his cousin Liu Qian 騫, younger brother of Liu Xuan: Liu Qian had been killed by the son of a local officer slain by Liu Qian's father Liu Zizhang ten years before: see sub Liu Xuan and Bn 54:97. Before he could proceed, Liu Xian's followers killed some innocent people and the local authorities had him arrested and executed.

Undeterred by the fate of his brother and by the similarly unsuccessful activities of his cousin Liu Xuan, Liu Ci and his nephew, Xian's son Xin, sold land and property to gather a band of nine retainers. With these men they attacked and burned the home of their rivals and slaughtered their enemy's widow and three sons. They then fled, but later benefited from an amnesty and were able to return to their estates.

In the winter of 22 Liu Ci and Liu Xin were among the first to join the Han rebels against Wang Mang under the command of Liu Bosheng, and when his cousin Liu Xuan was proclaimed as the Gengshi Emperor in 23 Liu Ci was named Minister of the Household and enfeoffed as a marquis. Soon afterwards Liu Bosheng was destroyed, and Liu Ci took his place as Excellency over the Masses. He was sent to attack Runan, but Liu Xin took over before the campaign was ended, and Liu Ci accompanied the main army to Luoyang.

As the Gengshi Emperor was considering whom he should send north of the Yellow River, Liu Ci pressed the claims of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. The Grand Marshal Zhu Wei argued against the proposal, but Liu Ci insisted, and so Liu Xiu was made Acting Grand Marshal and sent with the Staff of Authority to the north. On the same day, Liu Ci was given title as Chancellor and was sent to Chang'an to repair the temples and palaces. He returned to escort the emperor to his western capital, and in the spring of 24 he was enfeoffed as King of Wan county. He was then named Grand Marshal of the Van and sent with the Staff of Authority to settle the east of the passes.

As Bielenstein 59:57 observes, Liu Ci was one of the few leaders who had a personal connection to the Gengshi Emperor and might have helped maintain a balance of power between the contending factions at the capital. His departure from Luoyang, and his replacement by the ambitious Li Song, a leader of the Nanyang gentry, meant a fatal division with the commoner Troops.

Liu Ci occupied Nanyang and took over military command in the region, but as the Red Eyebrows attacked and destroyed the Gengshi Emperor in the latter part of 25, the local troops deserted, and Liu Ci was forced to abandon his capital at Wan. Hearing that Liu Xiu had taken the imperial title, he went to the Wu Pass in Hongnong, received the former emperor's wife and children as they fled Chang'an, and brought them to the new ruler at Luoyang. Emperor Guangwu rewarded him with enfeoffment as a county marquis in Runan.

Liu Ci was trusted and favoured by the emperor, who would discuss private matters with him, and frequently visited his residence at Luoyang. In 37 he received final enfeoffment as a county marquis, again in Runan, with an increased pension and the senior title Servant at Court, excusing him from the requirement to reside at his fief. He continued to live at the capital until his death, and his ancestral tombs and temples were set up and staffed in the same fashion as those of his cousins in the direct lineage of the marquises of Chongling [see sub Liu Zhi]. -HHS 14/4:564-65*; Bn 54 appendix # 80.

Liu Cong 劉琮 see Liu Zong 劉琮.

Liu Cuo 劉錯 (d.103). Son of Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan, he succeeded his father in 97. While still Heir to the kingdom, Liu Cuo fell in love with Song Run, a musician at his father's court. He had the physician Zhang Zun act as his go-between, but she refused him. Liu Cuo was angry and killed Zhang Zun. The Chancellor reported the matter, but no action was taken.

Liu Cuo was succeeded by his son Xiang, and four younger sons were later enfeoffed as marquises. -HHS 42/32:1432.

Liu Da 劉烜 (57-88) [Emperor Zhang 章帝 (reg. 75-88)]. Fifth son of Emperor Ming, Liu Da was born in 57 to the Honoured Lady Jia. His elder half-brothers were children of minor concubines without noted lineage, but Liu Da's mother was a woman of family from Nanyang, and she was a maternal cousin of the Lady

Ma, who was designated empress. The Lady Ma could not bear children, and it was evidently by agreement between the families that Liu Da was named Heir on the same day, 8 April 60, the Lady Ma was brought to the throne. As the empress brought the boy up, he came to look upon her relatives as his own, while his natural mother and her kinfolk gained little from their connection to the throne.

STYLE OF GOVERNMENT

Nineteen years old by Chinese reckoning when he came to the throne, Liu Da was formally of full age and the Dowager Ma never acted as regent. On the other hand, for the first years of the new reign the Grand Tutor Zhao Xi and the Grand Commandant Mou Rong shared control of the Secretariat, which gave formal command of the government, and one may assume that they had influence on policy. Mou Rong died in 79, and Zhao Xi and the Dowager Ma followed him in 80, so that by the Western age of twenty-three the emperor had full charge.

From the time of his accession, the government of the young ruler sought to present an image of benevolence. Edicts were issued expressing sympathy, concern and interest in the problems of the people, there were frequent awards of noble ranks and donations on auspicious occasions, and relief was granted from imposts at times of misfortune or ill omen. In 85 it was ordered that in future a woman who gave birth should be exempted from the poll tax for three years, that her husband should be exempted for one year, and that the family should receive a special grant of grain.

In 76, after a disease among cattle had seriously affected agriculture, an edict ordered that crimes not liable to the death penalty should not be tried until the autumn, so as to restore the traditional balance of the seasons between the forces of Yin and Yang. In further development of this principle, it was ordered in 84 that, except for capital crimes, complaints and lawsuits could be considered only in autumn and winter, that questioning should be enforced with the bastinado only while the accused was still able to stand, and that executions were to be carried out only in the first month of winter, not during the whole season [see also sub Chen Chong].

In 78, on the advice of the Internuncio Deng Xun an edict approved the cessation of canal works on the Hutuo River in the Taihang Mountains: the project had proven too difficult, it was considered wrong to submit the people to such extravagant corvée, and transport was thereafter carried out by donkey-carts. In similar fashion, during the mid-80s the dangerous sea-route along the coast, from the mouth of the Yangzi past present-day Fujian to the Bay of Canton, was partially replaced by a new road from Lingling and Guiyang across the Nan Ling ranges to Nanhai in the far south [see sub Zheng Hong].

As part of his personal government, Emperor Zhang travelled widely outside the capital. On each of his tours he held or arranged for special sacrifices, received his royal kinsmen in audience, called local officials to report, held jail release and heard law cases, gave alms to relieve distress, and forgave taxes for the regions where he travelled. In the autumn of 82 the emperor went north through Henei into Wei commandery, and in the winter he went west to Chang'an, into the hills beyond, and made a boat journey on the Jing River. Late in 83 he went east through Chenliu and Yingchuan, and in the autumn of 84 he journeyed into Jing province, visiting the homeland of his ancestors and then travelling south as far as the Yangzi. In the spring of 85 he went east again, holding the Ploughing ceremony in Jiyin, visiting Mount Tai, and offering sacrifice to Confucius and his disciples in Lu. One year later he travelled to the north: having carried out Ploughing in Henei, he issued an edict urging local authorities to encourage agriculture, then went through Zhongshan to the northern frontier, where he arranged a series of sacrifices to his predecessors and to local deities. In the summer and autumn of 87, a few months before his death, he journeyed southeast to Pengcheng and Pei. An impressive display of energy and interest, the tours provide a considerable contrast to many later rulers.

Despite imperial benevolence and good will, there were signs of problems to come. In particular, by the middle 80s there was increasing concern that government revenues were insufficient to maintain the necessary business and responsibilities of the state. Zhang Lin of the Secretariat proposed the re-introduction of a centralised monopoly on salt and the establishment of government trade to control the activities of private merchants and gain profit for the state. The emperor was persuaded to accept his suggestions, but the program was opposed by conservative Confucianists such as the Excellency Zhu Hui, and it was ended soon after Emperor Zhang's death. The fact remained, however, that the imperial government could not gain access to an appropriate proportion of the national wealth, and the situation became far worse when the cautious policies of Emperor Zhang were replaced by the more ambitious ideas of his widow, the regent Dowager Dou, and her family.

FRONTIER AFFAIRS

At the beginning of his reign Emperor Zhang inherited a military disaster. Based upon a successful incursion into the region of Turfan, Emperor Ming had re-established the Protectorate-General for the Western Regions, but just before his death the Northern Xiongnu attacked in force, killed the Protector-General Chen Mu, and brought local sympathisers to besiege the Wu and Ji Colonels Geng Gong and Guan Chong in Jushi. The new government was persuaded to send an army to their rescue, but the losses were heavy and at the conclusion of the campaign the various outposts and garrison positions were abandoned.

In following years, the misfortune which had had been suffered through the over-ambitious appointment of a Protector-General was more than made up by the remarkable achievements of the energetic Ban Chao. With very few troops, relying largely upon local alliances and his own strategic skill, Ban Chao established a Chinese position in the Tarim basin, and by the late 80s his authority dominated the Western Regions. The culmination of his success came in the 90s, but with minimal expenditure of Chinese men and material he largely reconstructed the empire which had been held in central Asia by Former Han.

Closer to home, there was trouble with the Qiang war-leader Miyu in the northwest. The Chinese were able to keep incursions in check and maintained reasonable control through the Protector Fu Yu, but in 86 Fu Yu was killed in battle, and in the following year his successor Zhang Yu killed Miyu by treachery. Miyu's son, Mitang, then took up a campaign of revenge, and the problem remained to trouble Emperor Zhang's son and successor Emperor He. As in the north, there was a constant problem of keeping Chinese people on the ground in the face of regular disruption, and a number of edicts ordered that criminals and convicts should be sent to garrison duty in Jincheng.

Following the settlement reached by Guangwu and Emperor Ming, dealings with the Xiongnu remained comparatively peaceful: the Chinese continued to subsidise the Wuhuan and Xianbi to attack the Northern Xiongnu, but they launched no major expeditions, and in 84, after a series of droughts, the Northern Xiongnu asked for peaceful trade through the frontier of Wuwei. The Han court approved, but the Southern Xiongnu sent raiding parties to kidnap the merchants from the north and plunder their caravans. The Southerners may have been inspired by hereditary enmity, but they were no doubt also concerned that a rapprochement between China and the steppe would weaken their special position as a loyal ally and buffer state.

In 85, after heated debate at court, it was resolved that Northerners taken prisoner by the South should be returned and the Chinese treasury would pay their ransoms, with blood money for those who had been killed. This was a weak compromise between the war party and those who favoured peace, so the Southern raiders were rewarded for their disruptive activities, while Northerners could have no faith in Chinese authority. Hopes of peace were lost, but the Han government gained advantage as increasing numbers of Northern Xiongnu came to the frontier to surrender outright. The steppe regime became still weaker, and in 87 the Youliu Shanyu of the north was killed by Xianbi raiders. Opportunity thus developed for the great campaign of conquest by Dou Xian in the following reign.

Elsewhere, there was some trouble with the Ailao people of the far southeast, and endemic disturbance from the non-Chinese people of the hills in the west of Wuling. Both regions, however, were controlled by local forces, and other peoples made offerings to the court: in 84 tribespeople south of Rinan presented egrets and a rhinoceros, and in 87 the Yuezhi people from the north of present-day Afghanistan and Pakistan, and also Parthia 安息, sent tribute to Ban Chao: the cortège included lions and a fuba 符拔, said to have resembled a deer 鹿 or a "unicorn" 麟 lin but without horns. Such gifts from distant lands, together with frequent favourable omens reported inside China, enhanced the prestige of the dynasty without any great display of military ambition or energy [the triumphs of Ban Chao in the Western Regions came from his own initiatives, and he neither sought nor received a major commitment from the central government]. Not surprisingly, the reign of Emperor Zhang was looked back upon with admiration by generations which followed.

RITUAL, SCHOLARSHIP AND PHILOSOPHY

Besides practical matters of politics and policy, Emperor Zhang paid great attention to ceremony, with sacrifice and worship offered to the deities and spirits, to his imperial ancestors, and to Confucius. He was also a patron of scholarship, he introduced a new calendar, and he sought to reform the rituals of the court. None of his projects were totally successful, but the programs enhanced imperial authority, and the discussions in the White Tiger Hall, in particular, are a landmark in Confucian philosophy.

From an early age, the future ruler appears to have been genuinely interested in Confucianism, particularly the Old Text of History and in Zuo zhuan, and in 76, soon after he had come to the throne, he called the Old Text enthusiast Jia Kui to discuss questions of scholarship. Delighted with his presentations, he had Jia Kui present a long memorial describing how Zuo zhuan was superior to the Gongyang and Guliang commentaries to Chunqiu, and arguing that only Zuo zhuan agreed with the established texts of prognostication 圖讖. Rewarding Jia Kui, the emperor ordered him to select twenty good young scholars from amongst those currently studying Gongyang, instruct them in Zuo zhuan, and compile a new edition of the classic and the commentary. Continuing his discussions and show of favour, he also had Jia Kui prepare comparisons between the Old and New Texts of the History and the Poetry, together with a commentary to the Old Text Zhou li or Zhou guan.

The Academician Li Yu and other scholars of the established New Text were concerned at this support for the rival tradition, and in 79, on a proposal of Yang Zhong, the emperor convened a formal conference in the White Tiger Hall to resolve the many disagreements. It was planned to follow the model of the debate in the Hall of the Stone Conduit [石渠 Shiqu], held by Emperor Xuan of Former Han in 51 BC: questions were presented to the panel of scholars by Wei Ying, and Chunyu Gong prepared a summary of their opinions which was presented to the emperor for final decision. A full record was then provided in the form of memorials to the throne, Bohu yizou 白虎議奏, and a summary "Account of the General Significance" of the gathering, Bohu tongyi 白虎通義 or Bohu tong delun 白虎通德論, was prepared later. Ban Gu was responsible for much of this work of recension.

Though Jia Kui and other Old Text scholars took part in the conference, and Chunyu Chong was a particular favourite of the emperor, the surviving text of Bohu tongyi reflects almost entirely the teachings of the New Text. There is some question how much has been amended, interpolated, or even forged since the original compilation, but it does appear, as Tjan suggests, that New Text orthodoxy carried the day, and that despite his formal involvement Emperor Zhang's wishes were disregarded. As Tjan observes, however, Emperor Zhang maintained his support for Old Text scholarship rather than New. In 83 he issued an edict expressing concern at the deterioration of learning and the proliferation of detailed and over-long commentaries; he renewed instructions that good students should be introduced to the study of Zuo zhuan with the Guliang commentary to Chunqiu, together with the Old Text of the History and the Mao interpretation of the Poetry, also in Old Text tradition; and he appointed nominees of Jia Kui to the court of his senior son Liu Kang the King of Qiansheng. In the long term, the New Text retained formal dominance until the end of Han, but the most energetic and imaginative scholars were those of the Old Text tradition.

By the latter part of the first century AD, the Taichu 太初 [Grand Beginning] calendar, which had been in use for almost two hundred years, had become seriously inaccurate, and in 85 Emperor Zhang proclaimed a new calendar, based on an amended version of the ancient Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] system. Some attempt at reform had been made under Emperor Ming [see sub Zhang Sheng], and the ruler sought advice from the Bureau of Astronomy, but the essential calculations were made by the individual officers Bian Xin and Li Fan, and Jia Kui was commissioned to prepare a final report on several questions of fine tuning. This was the major reform of the dynasty, though Sivin 69:19-33 points out that while the Quarter Day calendar was more accurate on the length of the year, it was no better at predicting eclipses.

Emperor Zhang was also interested in ritual. At the recommendation of his nominal uncle Ma Fang in 80 he had adopted special music for the seasonal ceremony to Welcome the Ethers 迎氣, though a more extended repertoire was rejected because of the cost of instruments and players. And in 85 an edict discussed the possibility of developing a new and comprehensive set of rituals for the court and other ceremonies. The Minister of Ceremonies Chao Kan argued that this was too great a task for one person, and there would be great difficulty in obtaining a consensus among any group of scholars. The emperor raised the matter again in the following year, but the scholar Ban Gu recommended another general conference, and from his own experience the emperor forecast that such a gathering would produce disagreement without decisions.

Seeking to break the deadlock, at the beginning of 87 Emperor Zhang commissioned the scholar Cao Bao to prepare a set of procedures based upon the remnant text of Shusun Tong 叔孫通, who had constructed a system for the founding Emperor Gao of Former Han, with other material from the classics, histories and suitable works in the imperial collection. Cao Bao had long been working on such a project and at the end of the year he presented Xin Li 新禮 "New Rituals," dealing with every matter from capping to marriage, and covering all levels of society, from the ruler to the common people. The emperor was compelled to recognise, however, that any attempt to enforce such a vast production would meet massive opposition. He accepted the document but did not present it to his ministers for discussion, and though Cao Bao's program was used in the first years of Emperor He, it was indeed found too clumsy and was largely abandoned.

COURT AND HAREM

Unlike his father, Emperor Zhang had no problems with his kinsmen. He treated his half-brothers generously, allowing them to remain in residence at the capital, and he ended the persecutions maintained by Emperor Ming, so that hundreds of people who had been sent to exile were able to return home. The emperor received his royal uncles and cousins both at the capital and on his tours, and when Liu Yan and his son Liu Fang were accused of treachery early in his reign he treated them leniently and later, touched by pity, eased Liu Yan's exile.

The politics of the imperial harem were complicated, as much through the ambitions and intrigues of rival consort families as through Emperor Zhang's own preferences. He respected the Dowager Ma, his titular mother, and planned to enfeoff her male kinsmen, but the Lady argued against such favouritism and the fiefs were only granted in 79, a little before her death. On the other hand, the Dowager sponsored her cousins, two sisters Song, who had entered Liu Da's harem in 75 when he was still only Heir. They became Honoured Ladies, and one of them bore Liu Qing, who was appointed Heir to the new ruler in 79. It was evidently intended that the Ma family and the Song should hold distaff influence together.

The Dowager, however, was not able to arrange for the Lady Song to become empress, and the position fell to a concubine of the Dou family, who was appointed in 78. The Lady Dou had entered the harem only recently, she was some years younger than the Song sisters and she attracted the favour of the twenty-year-old emperor through her youth and novelty – and perhaps also because the relevant Lady Song was unavailable by reason of pregnancy. Political considerations would in any case have encouraged the ruler not to commit himself too firmly to one distaff faction, and the Lady Dou was not only a member of a great family from the northwest but was also a granddaughter of Emperor Guangwu and thus a second cousin of Emperor Zhang.

For a few years the rivalries remained in balance. Like the Lady Ma before her, the Empress Dou could bear no children. Two sisters of the Liang family, however, had been brought into the harem in 77, and they too had imperial connections through their aunt, a daughter of Emperor Guangwu. Both were appointed Honoured Ladies and in 79 one of them gave birth to Liu Zhao, future Emperor He. The Dowager Ma died at this time, and the Empress Dou formed an alliance with the Liang and commenced a campaign of slander against the Song and the brothers of the late Dowager. In 82 the infant Liu Zhao was named as Heir in place of Liu Qing. The Ladies Song died in prison under accusation of witchcraft and the Ma brothers were disgraced in the following year.

The Liang were delighted at the prospects before them, but their ambitions were a threat to the empress and her family. In 83 the sisters' father Liang Song suffered an anonymous denunciation and was executed, both Honoured Ladies "died of grief," and the Empress Dou took the child as her own. It is said that his true maternity was forgotten, and the boy himself did not know the identity of his mother.

The first Heir named by Emperor Zhang, Liu Qing, was his third son; his elder brothers had been born to unknown concubines whose lack of family made them unsuitable. Given the situation which had developed through the intrigues of the Empress Dou, it appears that by 82 the emperor had no choice but to approve Liu Qing's dismissal. Liu Zhao, future Emperor He, was a son of the well-born Lady Liang and just one year younger, so the choice was appropriate. Emperor Zhang continued to treat Liu Qing well, and it is something of a tribute that the rival princes became close and trusted friends.

Despite their ambitions and pretensions, moreover, the consort families themselves were held under control. The emperor reprimanded and later disgraced the Ma, and shortly before his death he expressed anger and disgust at the conduct of his brother-in-law Dou Xian: he was barely persuaded not to punish him heavily for extortion, and he gave him no position of any significance. Unfortunately for the future of the dynasty, however, Emperor Zhang died on 9 April 88, aged just over thirty. His successor Liu Zhao was only ten sui, the Empress, now Dowager, Dou became regent for his minority, and her family, led by Dou Xian, gained great power at court.

Emperor Zhang was awarded the temple name Suzong 肅宗 "Respectful Exemplar" and his tomb northwest of Luoyang was named "Mound of Reverence" 敬陵. -HHS 3*.

Liu Dai 劉代. Son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, and younger brother of his successor Liu Ding, in 146 he and eight other brothers were made village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Dai 劉代 (d.145). Son of Liu Hui the King of Fuling, he succeeded his father in 132 while his elder brother Liu Bianqin was passed over.

When Liu Dai died without heirs in 145 the state was abolished, but it was later restored in favour of Liu Bianqin. -HHS 6:279, 42/32:1446.

Liu Dai 劉岱 [Gongshan 公山? cf. Liu Dai of Pei below] (d.192); Donglai. Elder son of Liu Fang/Yu and nephew of the Excellency Liu Chong, as an officer of the Censorate in 185 he defended Lu Kang who had criticised a levy of land tax.

Palace Attendant in 189, Liu Dai was appointed Inspector of Yan by Dong Zhuo, but joined the eastern alliance in 190. Later that year, in an early breaking of the pact, he killed the Administrator of Dong commandery Qiao Mao, and he soon afterwards allied himself with Yuan Shao against Gongsun Zan.

Liu Dai was popular among the people, but in 192 he was killed fighting the Yellow Turbans of Qing province. -HHS 76/66:2479, SGZ 1:6.

Liu Dai 劉岱 [Gongshan 公山? see below]; Pei. An officer of Cao Cao, in 199 Liu Dai was sent with Wang Zhong to attack Liu Bei in Pei. They had no success, but Liu Dai was later enfeoffed for other victories. -SGZ 1:18.

Wei lue says this man's style was Gongshan 公山, the same as that of Liu Dai of Donglai above. It may be that two men of the same personal name had also the same style.

Liu Dan 劉旦. Son of Liu Xian the King of Chen, in 100 he was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Liu Dan 劉旦. A celebrated calligrapher in the time of Emperor Ling, Liu Dan's portrait was painted on the wall of the newly-established School at the Gate of the Vast Capital. -Lidai minghua ji.

Liu Dan 劉誕 (d.194); Jiangxia. Sons of Liu Yan 焉, at the time of their father's appointment as Governor of Yi province in 188, Liu Dan, Liu Fan and Liu Zhang remained at Luoyang, where Liu Dan held a post in the Imperial Censorate. When Dong Zhuo shifted the capital to Chang'an in 191 they were obliged to follow him, but Liu Zhang was later sent to Yi province.

In 194 Liu Dan was implicated in the conspiracy of his brother Liu Fan with others against Li Jue. He was taken and killed. -HHS 75/65:2432, SGZ Shu 1:867.

Liu Dang 劉黨 (d.96). Son of Emperor Ming by an unknown concubine, in 66 he was granted an ornamental title as King of Respect and Fame 重熹王, but received no territorial fief. In 72, however, he was enfeoffed as King of Lecheng.

Liu Dang was the same age as his half-brother Liu Da, the future Emperor Zhang, and the two were very close. When Liu Da came to the throne in 78, the senior officials recommended that Liu Dang and his half-brothers Liu Gong and Liu Xian be sent out to their states, but the emperor would not be parted from them and they remained at the capital. In 79 Liu Dang's fief was increased by eight counties taken from the territories of Qinghe, Bohai and Zhuo. After Emperor Zhang died in 88 the regent Dowager Dou ordered Liu Dang and his brothers to leave the capital.

Liu Dang was a scholar of history with particular interest in text criticism, but he was also an intemperate man, with small regard for the law. There was a regulation that although women from the palace might marry out, they could not enter a royal harem. A certain Lady Ai Zhi, who had formerly served in the imperial palace, married a commoner named Zhang Chu. Liu

Dang had her come to him and had intercourse with her. When Zhang Chu proposed to make an official complaint, Liu Dang became frightened, and he bribed Ai Zhi's younger sister Jiao to kill Zhang Chu. As suspicion developed, Liu Dang strangled three people from his own household in an attempt to halt the gossip.

In another scandal, he took Li Yusheng, slave of a former Tutor to Liu Yan the King of Zhongshan, as a secondary wife 小妻. In 95 the Chancellor of his state reported these affairs, but Emperor He punished Liu Dang only by taking two counties from his fief.

Liu Dang died in the following year and was succeeded by his son Chong. -HHS 50/40:1672-73*.

Liu Dao 劉道 (d.145). Son of Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, he succeeded his father in 117.

Liu Dao was succeeded by his son Ding, and in 146 nine other sons became village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Daying 劉大英 see Liu Taiying 劉泰英.

Liu De 劉德/得; Zhending/Changshan. Son of Liu "Goitre" Yang the King of Zhending, who was executed for planning rebellion in 26, Liu De was granted the succession to his father's fief later that year. In 37, with other kings outside the immediate imperial family, he was reduced in rank to be a marquis. -HHS 1A:29, 1B: 61; Bn 59:123, Bn 67:25.

Liu De 劉德. Son of Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan, in 57 he was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 42/32:1431.

Liu De 劉得 (d.119); Le'an. Son of Liu Chong the King of Le'an, in 113 the regent Dowager Deng appointed him King of Pingyuan to maintain the lineage of Liu Sheng, eldest son of Emperor He. Liu De died without heirs, and the state was later restored again in favour of Liu Yi, son of Liu Kai the King of Hejian. -HHS 5: 230, 55/45:1810.

HHS 78/68:2514 says that after the death of the Dowager in 121 the eunuch Li Run and Emperor An's former wet-nurse Wang Sheng claimed to the ruler that members of the Deng group had planned to depose him and place Liu De [miswritten as 德] on the imperial throne. It appears more probable, however, that their alleged candidate was Liu De's successor Liu Yi.

Liu De 劉德/得 (d.151). Son of Liu Kai the King of Hejian, in 122 he was made King of Anding, formerly Lecheng, to maintain the lineage of Liu Dang the son of Emperor Ming. See also sub Liu Chang 萇.

Liu De was succeeded by his son Xu. -HHS 5:235,

7:297, 50/40:1674, 55/45:1808.

Liu De 劉得 miswritten for Liu Yi 劉翼, King of Pingyuan q.v. and see Liu De 劉得 of Le'an above. -HHS 16/6:616.

Liu De 劉德 miswritten for Liu Yi 劉翼, King of Pingyuan q.v. and see Liu De 劉得 of Le'an above. -HHS 78/68:2514.

Liu Deng 劉登 (d.135). Son of Liu Shou the King of Jibei, he succeeded his father in 120.

Liu Deng was succeeded by his son Duo. -HHS 55/45:1807.

Liu Deran 劉德然; Zhuo. In the late 170s Liu Deran studied under the Academician Lu Zhi. One of Liu Deran's fellow-students was his kinsman Liu Bei, future First Sovereign of the Three Kingdoms state of Shu-Han. Though the families were not closely related, Liu Deran's father Liu Yuanqi supplied provisions to Liu Bei in the same fashion as to his own son, and when his wife questioned him he explained that Liu Bei was a man of great potential. -SGZ Shu 2:871.

Liu Desheng 劉德升/昇 [Junsi 君嗣]; Yingchuan. A celebrated calligrapher during the time of Emperors Huan and Ling, Liu Desheng is said to have developed the xing shu 行書 "Running Style," a compromise between the official li shu 隸書 "Clerical Style" and the informal cao shu 草書 "Grass Style." -Ch'en 66:50.

Liu Ding 劉定 (d.95). Son of Liu Fu the King of Pei, he succeeded his father in 85.

Liu Ding was succeeded by his son Zheng, and two younger sons were later enfeoffed as marquises. -HHS 42/32:1427.

Liu Ding 劉丁. Son of Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, after his first wife died in 116 his brother Liu Pu insulted his secondary wife 小妻. Their father, angry at Liu Pu's conduct, sent him to prison and then forced him to kill himself. In 118, after his eldest brother Liu Dao had succeeded to their father's kingdom, Liu Ding and his brothers Bing and Guo were enfeoffed as district marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671, DGHJ 7:5a.

Liu Ding 劉定 (d.149). Son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, he succeeded his father in 145.

Liu Ding was succeeded by his brother He. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Ding 劉定 (d.176). Son of Liu Li/Hui the King of Ganling, he succeeded his father in 172.

Liu Ding was succeeded by his son Zhong. -HHS 55/45:1806.

Liu [Dingxing] 劉定興; Pei. Described as a private scholar and gentleman [義士 yishi], in 172 Liu Dingxing arranged the erection of a stele to his patron. All details of the inscription and of other sponsors are now lost. -SJZ 23:8b.

Liu Du 劉度 (d.28). Administrator of Linhuai for Emperor Guangwu, Liu Du was killed without authority, presumably in a private feud, by Xu Yun. -HHS 1A:37.

Liu Du 劉篤. Son of Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan, he committed some crime, and when his brothers were made marquises in 90, Liu Du was excluded. -HHS 42/32:1432-33.

Liu Du 劉犢 see Liu Yi 劉懿, the Little Emperor.

Liu Du 劉度. Son of Liu Zhong and grandson of Liu Ying the disgraced King of Chu, Liu Du succeeded to his father's marquisate in Lujiang. -HHS 42/32:1430.

Liu Du 劉度. In 162 Liu Du was Inspector of Jing province when the non-Chinese of Wuling rebelled and bandits from Yuzhang attacked Changsha. The Internuncio Ma Mu was sent to take command of operations in Changsha, but the army was defeated and Liu Du and Ma Mu fled. Both men were sentenced to death, commuted by one degree. -HHS 38/28:1285, 86/76:2834.

Liu Du 劉度. As Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208 he sent Liu Du south as Administrator of Lingling. Following Cao Cao's defeat at the Red Cliffs later that year, Liu Du was obliged to surrender to Liu Bei. -SGZ Shu 2:879.

Liu Duan 劉端 (d.179). Son of Liu Chang the King of Dongping, he succeeded his father in 132.

Liu Duan was succeeded by his son Kai. -HHS 42/32:1442.

Liu Dun 劉惇 [Ziren 子仁]; Pingyuan. During the 190s Liu Dun crossed the Yangzi to avoid the civil war and settled in the south of Yuzhang. He joined the staff of the Administrator of Luling, Sun Fu, and guided him to the hiding places of rebels and bandits by his divinatory arts. Sun Fu gave him high rank, and the men of the army were awed by his magical powers. In 204 he foretold the murder of Sun Yi by Bian Hong in Danyang.

Liu Dun compiled a book of more than a hundred pian on his art, but did not explain it to anyone, so nobody afterwards was able to understand it. -SGZ Wu 18:1423-24*.

Liu Dun 劉敦. Son of Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, presumably by a concubine, Liu Dun was enfeoffed as King of Beihai in 212. When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, however, Liu Dun and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 9:386, 390.

HHS 9:386 gives Liu Dun's fief as Donghai, but the modern commentator Qian Daxin correctly points out that this is mistaken. The kings of Donghai were descended from Liu Qiang, son of Guangwu, and the lineage was still maintained at that time through Liu Xian: see HHS 70/60:2271 and HHSJJ 9:258-59, also sub Liu Zhi, King of Donghai.

Liu Duo 劉多 (d.138). Son of Liu Deng the King of Jibei, he succeeded his father in 135. In 138 he died without sons, but in the following year his uncle Liu An/Anguo was granted the fief so as to maintain the lineage. -HHS 55/45:1807.

Liu E 劉阿 see Liu A 劉阿.

Liu Fa 劉發 miswritten for Liu Feng 劉奉. -HHSJJ 16/6:610.

Liu Fan 劉番. Son of Liu Xian the King of Chen, he was made a marquis in 100. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Liu Fan 劉範 (d.194); Jiangxia. Son of Liu Yan 焉, when his father became Governor of Yi in 188 Liu Fan and his brothers Liu Dan and Liu Zhang remained at Luoyang. As Dong Zhuo shifted the capital to Chang'an in 191 they were obliged to follow him, and Liu Fan became a General of the Household.

At the beginning of 194 there was a quarrel between Li Jue's party, controlling the capital, and the warlord Ma Teng of Liang province. Liu Fan joined a plot of Chong Shao, to act as agents within the capital for Ma Teng and to kill Li Jue. The plan was found out and the conspirators fled to Huaili in Youfufeng, just west of Chang'an. Liu Yan sent reinforcements, but Ma Teng and his allies were defeated and driven away, and Li Jue's forces then captured Huaili and killed Liu Fan and his associates. -HHS 56/46:1830, 72/62:3334, 75/65:2432, SGZ Shu 1:867.

Liu Fang 劉防; Liang. Son of the late King of Liang Liu Li 立, Liu Fang was a younger brother of Liu Yong, who named him a chief general as he set up an independent position in 24. When Liu Yong was defeated and killed in 27, Liu Fang surrendered to Guangwu's general He Yan. -HHS 12/2:494, 18/8:687.

Liu Fang 劉方 [Bokuang 伯況] (d.97); Pingyuan. A noted scholar of the Classic of Poetry, as a magistrate in Yingchuan in 85 Liu Xiang urged the importance of an accurate calendar. The government of Emperor Zhang acknowledged his arguments in an edict, and soon afterwards adopted the Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] system. Liu Fang was then appointed Minister of the Imperial Clan.

When Emperor He succeeded in 88 the Dowager's brother Dou Xian recommended Liu Fang and Huan Yu as resident tutors to the young ruler.

In 91 Liu Fang supported Yuan An and Ren Wei in opposition to Dou Xian's plan to set up a separate puppet court for the Northern Xiongnu.

Following the fall of the Dou family in 92 Liu Fang succeeded Ren Wei as Excellency of Works, and he later joined Ding Hong in a proposal to regulate the nomination of Filial and Incorrupt candidates according to the population of each commandery unit; Emperor He approved.

In 94 Liu Fang was promoted Excellency over the Masses. In 97 he left office and killed himself; there is no record of the fault he was alleged to have committed. -HHS 3:148, 37/27:1256, 4:174-84, 45/35:1520-22.

Liu Fang 劉防. Son of Liu Bing the King of Huaiyang, he died early, and when Liu Bing died in 87 no successor was named to the fief. In 102, when Liu Fang's younger brother Liu Ze died without heirs, Liu Fang's son Liu Zhang was enfeoffed as King of Changshan to maintain the lineage. -HHS 50/40:1678.

Liu Fang 劉魴 (d.123). Son of Liu Yan 延 the King of Fuling, in 76 Liu Fang was accused of involvement in a plot of his father. It was proposed that both men should be brought to the capital in a cage cart, but though Emperor Zhang reduced Liu Yan's fief he pardoned Liu Fang.

When Liu Yan died in 89, the succession to the state was granted to Liu Fang's younger brother Chong. Liu Chong died without heirs in 91, and in 93 the fief was given to Liu Fang. In 96 twelve younger brothers of Liu Fang were granted district and village marquisates.

When Liu Fang died in 123 he was succeeded by his son Hui, and another five sons were later enfeoffed. -HHS 4:176, 42/32:1445-46; Bn 67:35.

Liu Fang 劉方 or Liu Yu 輿; Donglai. Son of Liu Pi and younger brother of the Excellency Liu Chong, Liu Fang was Administrator of Shanyang about 160. -HHS 76/66:2479, XHS 5:10a [in SGZ Wu 4:1184 PC]; HHS gives the personal name as Fang; XHS has Fang as an alternative to Yu.

Liu Fang 劉放 [Ziqi 子棄] (d.250); Zhuo. Claiming distant descent from the imperial house through the royal house of Guangyang under Former Han, Liu Fang's family had held local office for generations.

Having served as a senior clerk in the commandery, Liu Fang was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. Instead, however, he went for refuge into Yuyang, and in 205 he persuaded the local authority Wang Song to surrender to Cao Cao. The letter he composed was so elegant that Cao Cao took him on his staff, and later sent him out to county magistracies in Zuopingyi and Pei.

In 213 Liu Fang was appointed to the library 祕書 established by Cao Cao for his ducal state of Wei. Under Cao Pi this now imperial library was renamed the Palace Library 中書; Liu Fang and his colleague Sun Zi held the senior positions, were close counsellors and granted enfeoffments.

Equally trusted by Cao Rui, in 238 their influence was decisive in arranging that Sima Yi and Cao Shuang should hold the regency for the youthful Cao Fang, and excluding Cao Yu 曹宇 from power. They received further honours under the regency, and both held title as senior generals. They resigned on grounds of age in 248, and Liu Fang died two years later.

Expert in composition, Liu Fang wrote official documents for Cao Cao, Cao Pi and Cao Rui. -SGZ 14:456-62*.

Liu Fang 劉方 see Liu Ai 劉艾.

Liu Fen 柳分. A member of the Imperial Secretariat during the 160s, Liu Fen was an associate of the eunuchs Guan Ba and Su Kang. He was criticised by the outspoken Fan Pang. -HHS 103/13:3283.

Liu Feng 劉颯 miswritten for Liu Li 劉颯.

Liu Feng 劉奉 (d.24). An officer of Wang Lang, in 24 Liu Feng was sent to assist Wang Rao defend Julu, but he was destroyed by the army of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 1A:14.

Liu Feng 劉鳳; Nanyang. Younger son of Liu Zhong the King of Zichuan, when his father died in 34 he was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 14/4:563; Bn 54 appendix # 122.

Liu Feng 柳豐; Hedong. XTS 73A:2835 says that Liu Feng was a Minister of the Household.

Liu Feng 劉馮 (d.200). Young son of Emperor Xian, he was appointed King of Nanyang in 200, but died a few days later. The emperor wished to offer special sacrifices for him, but he was dissuaded by Kong Rong. -HHS 9:381, 70/60:2271.

504 Liu Feng

Liu Feng 劉封 (192-220); Changsha. Liu Feng was a son of the Kou 寇 family, who held a county fief in Changsha and was related by marriage to the Liu clan of that commandery. At the time Liu Bei came into Jing province in 201 he had no heir, so he adopted Liu Feng, then ten years old, as his son.

When Liu Bei went to Yi province in 211, Liu Feng accompanied him and, though he was barely twenty when Liu Bei attacked Liu Zhang in 213, he showed considerable enterprise and military spirit. He shared command with Zhuge Liang and Zhang Fei as they brought reinforcements up the Yangzi, and when Yi province was settled in 214 he was named a General of the Household.

In 219 Liu Bei's officer Meng Da attacked north from the Yangzi and took Cao Cao's commanderies Fangling and Shangyong, west of the Wei position in the north of Jing province. Uncertain of Meng Da's loyalty, Liu Bei ordered Liu Feng to move east down the Han River from Hanzhong and take command in that sector. As Guan Yu besieged Cao Cao's forces in Xiangyang later that year he sent several requests for assistance, but Liu Feng and Meng Da argued it would be dangerous to leave their newly-conquered and yet unsettled territories. They made no move, and Guan Yu was destroyed by the attack of Sun Quan.

Both men felt uneasy, and under pressure they quarrelled. In 220 Liu Feng seized Meng Da's military band of trumpeters and drummers and Meng Da, furious at the insult, went over to the enemy. He was given charge of the same territory, to capture it from Shu-Han, aided by an army of Wei and then assisted by the rebellion of Shen Yi against Liu Feng.

Meng Da wrote to Liu Feng, urging that he too change allegiance. He pointed out that Liu Feng's position was more tenuous now that Liu Bei had an heir of his own body, Liu Shan, and that he would be in danger if he returned to the capital. On the other hand the Wei government was willing to offer Liu Feng the succession to the family fief of the Kou family.

Liu Feng rejected Meng Da's advice and the enemy offer, but he was indeed driven from the frontier and went back to Chengdu. Liu Bei held Liu Feng responsible for the defeat, blaming him for his poor treatment of Meng Da and for having failed to assist Guan Yu. At the same time the minister Zhuge Liang suggested that when Liu Shan came to the throne it would be difficult for him to control Liu Feng, as former heir of his father.

To solve the problem Liu Feng was ordered to kill himself. As he obeyed, he sighed with regret at not having taken advantage of Meng Da's offer. It is said that Liu Bei wept for him. -SGZ Shu 10:991-94*; C/C 99:178-179.

Liu Feng 劉諷 i.e. Liu Li 劉颯. -HS 17:672; Bn 67:103.

Liu Fu 劉輔 (d.84). Son of Emperor Guangwu by his first Empress Guo, Liu Fu was named Duke of Youpingyi 右馮翊, a short-lived western division of Zuopingyi, in 39; his younger brother Liu Yan 焉 received the other half of the territory: see Bn 67:27 citing the modern commentator Hui Dong. When the Lady Guo was deposed in 41, Liu Fu was made King of Zhongshan, with extra revenue from Changshan commandery, evidently to support his mother, who was named Dowager Queen of Zhongshan. In 44 his and the Lady Guo's titles were transferred to Pei, though both remained at the capital.

In the summer of 52 the Lady Guo died, and soon afterwards Liu Fu's client Liu Li committed murder [see sub voce]. Liu Fu spent three days in prison, and that autumn he and his brothers were sent to their fiefs. The laws against imperial relatives keeping large numbers of clients and retainers were strictly enforced, and many were arrested and even put to death.

Liu Fu was a scholar of the Book of Changes, the Book of Filial Piety, Analects and the apocrypha, and he compiled a set of essays on the Five Classics, known as Pei wang tonglun 沛王通論 "Comprehensive Essays by the King of Pei." Admired for his conduct, he received several donations from his half-brother Emperor Ming, and he and his brothers returned on occasion to court.

Liu Fu was succeeded by his son Ding, and twelve younger sons were later enfeoffed as district marquises. -HHS 42/32:1427*; Bn 67:27-32.

Liu Fu 劉浮; Nanyang. Son of Liu Kuang 匡 the younger brother of Liu Mao, he received a marquissate. -HHS 14/4:564; Bn 54 appendix # 87.

Liu Fu 劉復. Son of Liu Xing and grandson of Liu Bosheng, in 54 Liu Fu was enfeoffed as a county marquis. A keen scholar and a fine writer, he was regularly consulted on scholarly matters by his cousin Emperor Ming, and he was admired by leading literary figures of his day. He worked with Ban Gu, Jia Kui, Ma Han and others in the history office, and composed Hande song 漢德頌 "Hymns to the [Men of] Virtue of Han," including praise for the hermit Wang Fu. -HHS 14/4:556-58, 24/14:859, 39/29:1298; Vervoorn 90:148; Bn 54 appendix # 136.

[Liu?] Fu 劉福. A son of Liu Shang the King of Rencheng, and younger brother to his successor Liu An, in 102 he was enfeoffed as a district marquis. -HHS 42/32:1443.

HHS refers to this man only by his personal name, and describes him as "mother's younger brother" 母弟 to Liu An. The Harvard and Kyoto indexes interpret this as indicating that Fu was a brother by the same mother 同母弟, and therefore had the surname Liu. Commonly one would understand 母弟 as referring to a maternal uncle, but there is no indication of the family name of Liu An's mother and thus none to any alternative surname for Fu. Cf. also sub Liu Kang.

Liu Fu 劉輔 see Liu Pu 劉廂. -Ch'ü 72:305.

Liu Fu 劉福. Inspector of Xu province, he was executed for corruption about 120. -HHS 79/69A:2564.

Liu Fu 劉孚 or Liu Ji 季. Liu Fu was a maternal uncle of Jia Kui. -SGZ 15:480.

Liu Fu 劉馥 [Yuanying 元穎] (d.208); Pei. In the early 190s Liu Fu moved south into Yang province to avoid the troubles of the civil war. About 197, probably after Yuan Shu had assumed the imperial title, Liu Fu persuaded two of Yuan Shu's generals, Ji Ji and Qin Yi, to transfer their allegiance to Cao Cao, who at that time controlled the Han imperial government. As reward, Cao Cao appointed Liu Fu to a clerical position in the government offices at the new capital, Xu city.

In 199 Li Shu, Administrator of Lujiang for the warlord Sun Ce, attacked and killed Cao Cao's Inspector of Yang province Yan Xiang. The formal government of the region between the Huai and the Yangzi was overwhelmed by bandits, but Cao Cao was pre-occupied with the threat from Yuan Shao north of the Yellow River. He had Liu Fu appointed as Inspector of Yang province and sent him to deal with the situation as best he could.

Travelling alone to the region, Liu Fu set up his administration at Hefei in Jiujiang, and through exchange of gifts he persuaded the local bandit chieftains to accept some measure of his authority. They maintained the peace for several years, while tens of thousands of refugees came to settle in his territory.

Liu Fu set up schools and, most importantly for the longer term, he developed a wide system of agricultural colonies to hold the frontier between the Yangzi and the Huai. Supporting these ventures by major works of water control and irrigation among the lakes, and he also developed local defence works. He died in 208, but his work had consolidated Cao Cao's control of the Huai valley and, despite an immediate attack after his death and repeated efforts in future years, Sun Quan and the forces of Wu were never able to gain ground in that region. -SGZ 15:463*; deC 90:231-232.

Liu Fuhu 劉伏胡 see Liu Chong 劉寵. -HHS 55/45:1797.

Liu Gai 劉丐 or Liu Zheng 正 (d.109). Son of Liu Ding the King of Pei, he succeeded his father in 95, and was in turn succeeded by his son Guang.

HHS 42/32:1427 has this man's name as Zheng 正, while HHS 101/11:3239 refers to him as Ya 牙, corrected to Zheng by the Beijing editors; XTS 75B:3437 has Gai 丐. In HHSJJ 42/32:1523, Hui Dong and Shen Qinhan argue that Gai is correct, while Shen Qinhan also notes the variant Hu 互.

Liu Gai 劉陔. Son of Liu Li the King of Hejian, he succeeded his father in 179. When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, he and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 55/45:1808-09.

Liu Gan 劉幹; Nanyang. About 220 Liu Gan was appointed an assistant officer of the salt monopoly of Shu-Han under Wang Lian. He later rose to high rank. -SGZ Shu 9.988, 11:1009.

Liu Gan 劉紺 see Liu Xi 劉細. -DGHJ 24:4a, XHS 2:12a.

Liu Gang 劉剛. Son of Liu Shi the King of Qi, he was made a marquis. In 87 he and his elder brother the King Huang, and the Lady Zong their mother, were found to have made false accusations in a family quarrel. Senior officials recommended the men be reduced to commoner rank and exiled to Danyang, but Emperor Zhang ordered only that Liu Huang be demoted from king to marquis while Liu Gang's fief was reduced by 3000 households.

In 88 Liu Gang's younger brother Chang was murdered at Luoyang by order of Dou Xian, brother of the regent Dowager. Dou Xian sought to conceal his involvement by accusing Liu Gang, and officers of the Imperial Censorate were sent to investigate him. Through the efforts of He Chang, the whole affair was found out and Dou Xian was placed under house arrest. -HHS 14/4:553-54, 23/13:813; Bn 54 appendix # 151.

Liu Ge 劉郃 see Liu He 劉郃.

Liu Gen 劉根; Yingchuan. A magician, Liu Gen lived in the mountains and received numbers of students and followers. It is said that he dwelt in a cave on a cliff, that he wore no clothing in winter or summer, his body was covered with a thick coat of hair, but his face looked like that of a fifteen-year-old.

The Administrator Shi Qi, concerned at Liu Gen's influence, had him arrested and demanded a demonstration of his ability. Liu Gen explained that the only thing he could do was bring back spirits of the dead, and he showed Shi Qi his own parents and ancestors: all of whom appeared in chains. The spirits complained to Shi Qi that he had shamed them and that was why they were bound. At their demand, Shi Qi kowtowed to Liu Gen and asked to be punished in their stead. Liu Gen did not reply, but he and the apparitions suddenly vanished. -HHS 82/72B:2755-56*; Ngo 76:137-138, DeWoskin 83:82-83.

A lengthy biography of Liu Gen in Shenxian zhuan says that he had the style Jun'an 君安, was a man from Jingzhao, and lived during Former Han; the unfortunate Administrator had the surname Zhang 張. Liu Gong 劉龔 [Menggong 孟公]; Jingzhao. Liu Gong was a kinsman of the celebrated scholar Liu Xin 劉歆, though opinions vary whether he was a son, a nephew, or a more distant relative, and he may be the Liu Gong who was a marquis under Wang Mang: HS 99B:4120, and see QHX:302 (2).

In the mid-20s Liu Gong joined the condottiere Yan Cen and in 27 he was a member of the staff of the junior commander Deng Zhongkuang in Nanyang. Deng Zhongkuang's troops ravaged the countryside but Su Jing, a former colleague of Liu Xin, sent long and eloquent letters criticising their conduct, and Liu Gong and Deng Zhongkuang submitted to Emperor Guangwu of Han.

A skilled debater, Liu Gong was admired by both Ma Yuan and Ban Biao. -HHS 30/20A:1041-47.

Liu Gong 劉恭 (d.52); Taishan. A descendant of Liu Zhang 劉璋, grandson of Emperor Gao who became King of Chengyang 城陽 under Former Han, he was the eldest son of Liu Meng 萌, whose marquisate had been abolished by Wang Mang. About 20 Liu Gong and his brothers Liu Mao and Liu Penzi were captured by the Red Eyebrows and brought into their leadership group. As the leaders of the Red Eyebrows went to Chang'an to make formal submission to Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor in 23, Liu Gong was restored to his father's county fief and, since he had studied the Classic of History when he was young, he was appointed a Palace Attendant at the new court. He became one of Liu Xuan's most loyal supporters.

Two years later in 25, as the Red Eyebrows turned against Liu Xuan and proclaimed Liu Gong's youngest brother Liu Penzi as emperor, Liu Gong took himself to the imperial prison, for he was ashamed to be connected to the nominal head of the rebellion. When the Red Eyebrows came to Chang'an they treated him with respect, but Liu Gong escaped to join Liu Xuan outside the city. He went to negotiate with his former colleagues, argued for Liu Xuan's life and arranged for him to receive title as King of Changsha. When Liu Xuan was eventually killed, Liu Gong retrieved his body for burial.

Liu Gong retained a position amongst the Red Eyebrows, but it was clear they were incapable of forming a stable government, and he urged his brother Liu Penzi to quit the throne. At the New Year gathering of 26 Liu Gong abused the leaders for their unruliness and Liu Penzi tried to give up his insignia. The leaders refused to accept Liu Gong's right to comment and he left the ceremony. They apologised for their poor behaviour, but refused to accept Liu Penzi's resignation.

The situation continued to deteriorate, and in 27 Liu Gong was sent by the Red Eyebrows to seek terms from Emperor Guangwu, and soon after the surrender Liu Gong killed Xie Lu, former leader of the Red Eyebrows, for his role in the murder of Liu Xuan. He presented himself in bonds for punishment, but was pardoned under an amnesty.

In 52 Liu Gong was murdered by Liu Li, son of the Gengshi Emperor, who sought to avenge the death of his father on the family of his replacement Liu Penzi. Given Liu Gong's well-demonstrated loyalty to Liu Xuan, however, the crime made no sense. -HHS 11/1:480-86, XC 1:2a-2b; Bn 54 appendix # 141, Bn 59:41, 95, 119-120, Bn 79:138.

Liu Gong 劉恭 (d.117). Son of Emperor Ming by an unknown concubine, in 66 Liu Gong was named King of Spiritual Long Life 靈壽王, but received no territorial fief. In 72 he was given title as King of Julu, but remained at the capital.

When Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75, the senior officials recommended that Liu Gong, Liu Xian and Liu Dang should be sent out to their states, but their half-brother the emperor would not be parted from them and they remained at the capital. In 79 Liu Gong's title was changed to King of Jiangling, with Nan commandery as his territory for revenue, but in 85 the senior ministers noted that the fief lay due south of the imperial capital: such control of a cardinal direction was not proper, and Liu Gong was transferred to be King of Liu'an, with revenue from Lujiang.

When Emperor Zhang died in 88, his testament appointed Liu Gong as King of Pengcheng 彭城, the territory hitherto known as Chu 楚; this had been the fief of Liu Ying, disgraced in 71. The regent Dowager Dou promptly ordered Liu Gong and his brother kings to leave the capital and reside in their states.

About 90 Liu Gong was sent as adjudicator to the court of his half-brother Liu Yan the King of Xiapi, to decide which of his sons should be made Heir.

Liu Gong was admired by the people for his generous nature and fine conduct. In 116, angry at his son Pu for insulting his sister-in-law, he locked him in the stables and, when he escaped, sent an official and a posse of slaves to recapture him. Upbraided by his father, Liu Pu killed himself.

The Chancellor Zhao Mu reported this affair, and claimed also that Liu Gong had offered sacrifices to the deities against the interests of the dynasty; this was Impiety. The senior officials urged Liu Gong be executed, but he pleaded his own case, and on the basis of his fine conduct in the past a full investigation was ordered. No evidence could be found to support the charges, and Zhao Mu was sent to prison, escaping death only because of an amnesty soon afterwards.

Liu Gong was succeeded by his son Dao, and three younger sons were later enfeoffed as district marquises. -HHS 50/40:1670-71*.

Liu Gong 劉恭. Inspector of Liang province in the late 170s, Liu Gong was praised by the reformist Yang Zhi. -HHS 67/57:2209.

Liu Gong 劉恭 see Liu Liang 劉梁.

Liu Gong 劉恭 see sub Liu Kai 劉開 the King of Hejian.

Liu Gu 劉固. Scholars of the mid-first century, Liu Gu and others lived near Zhang Ba at Luoyang to benefit from his learning. -HHS 36/26:1241, HYGZ 10A:133.

Liu Gu 劉固. Son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, and younger brother of his successor Liu Ding, in 146 he and eight other brothers were made village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Gu 劉固. In 174 Liu Gu was an officer of the Bureau of Astronomy. When the commandery official Liu Hong sent in a proposal to correct the calendar of lunar eclipses Liu Gu and Feng Xun were ordered to test his system against observations. They in turn devised another set of calculations, and it was agreed that the two methods would be tested in 179: in that year the official calendar forecast an eclipse in the fifth month while Liu Hong had the third month and Liu Gu and Feng Xun the fourth month. When the time came, however, two of the full moons were overcast and could not be observed; modern calculations indicate that there was no eclipse that year until the ninth month.

In 175 Liu Gu and his colleague Guo Xiang were criticised by the would-be reformers Feng Guang and Chen Huang, who sought to alter the base year (Sivin 69:59: "working epoch") of the calendar to accord with the apocrypha. Their position was vigorously defended by the great scholar Cai Yong.

It appears that Liu Gu died before 179, for he is not mentioned in the controversy on calculations of lunar eclipses at that time: see sub Feng Xun. -HHS 92/2: 3037, 3040; Sivin 69:59-60.

Liu Gu 劉顧 see Liu Shi 劉碩.

Liu Guang 劉光 [Zhongliao 仲遼]; Pei. In 125 Liu Guang was Director of the Secretariat when Sun Cheng and his eunuch colleagues staged their coup against the Yan clan and restored Emperor Shun to the succession. Liu Guang supported the enterprise and led the officials in a ceremony to proclaim their loyalty to the new ruler.

In 127 Liu Guang was promoted from Minister of Ceremonies to be Grand Commandant, with control of the Imperial Secretariat. He left that office two years later on account of unfavourable omens. -HHS 6:250-256, 76/66:2476.

Liu Guang 劉廣, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Shun, in 141 she was appointed Senior Princess of Ruyang in Runan. -HHS 10B:462.

Liu Guang 劉廣 (d.144). Son of Liu Gai/Zheng the King of Pei, he succeeded his father in 109. He was incapacitated by ill health, and his grandmother the Lady Zhou had charge of his household.

Liu Guang was succeeded by his son Rong. -HHS

508 Liu Guang

42/32:1428.

Liu Guang 劉廣 (d.153). Son of Liu Xian the King of Ji'nan, he succeeded his father in 128. He left no sons when he died, and the kingdom was ended. -HHS 42/32:1433.

Liu Guang 劉光. Son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, and younger brother of his successor Liu Ding, in 146 he and eight other brothers were made village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Guang 劉光 see Liu Xian 劉先.

Liu Gui 劉桂; Nanyang. Elder son of Liu Zhong the King of Zichuan, when his father died in 34 he was granted the succession to maintain his sacrifices, but held only the rank of a marquis. -HHS 14/4:563.

Liu Gui 劉瓌; Nanyang. A member of the imperial clan, in the early 120s Liu Gui had an affair with and then married the Lady Wang Yong, daughter of the former wet-nurse Wang Sheng and current favourite of Emperor An. Through this influence he obtained inheritance of the marquise formerly held by his cousin Liu Hu, and was also appointed a Palace Attendant. In 125, however, Wang Sheng and her associates were killed or exiled, and Liu Gui's fief was reduced from a county to a village. -HHS 14/4:564.

Liu Gui 劉瓌. Administrator of Beidi, Liu Gui was an adherent of New Text Confucianism. About 150 he was challenged by Ma Rong, who tended to the Old Text, and the debate is said to have brought a revival of the Old Text. -HHS 35/25:1208.

Liu Gui 劉珪. Son of Liu She the King of Zhao, he succeeded his father in 211. In 213, when Cao Cao became Duke of Wei, his vast fief included the territory of Zhao. Liu Gui was therefore transferred to Boling, a commandery which had been separated from Zhongshan in 158.

When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, Liu Gui and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 14/4:559, 7:303, 9:387; Bn 54 appendix # 168.

Liu Gui 劉瓚. In 212, as Liu Bei turned against Liu Zhang, warlord Governor of Yi province, Liu Gui and other officers were sent to oppose him. They were defeated and compelled to surrender. -SGZ Shu 2:882.

Liu Guo 劉國; Nanyang. Liu Guo was a son of Liu Hong, who died in rebellion against Wang Mang, and his mother the Lady Fan was a cousin of the mother of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. After Liu Hong's death, the Lady and her sons Liu Min and Liu Guo followed the Gengshi Emperor to Chang'an, but in 26, after his fall, they came east to join Guangwu at Luoyang. Liu Guo was enfeoffed with a county in Yingchuan. -HHS 14/4:567; Bn 54 appendix # 75.

Liu Guo 劉國. Son of Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, in 118, after his eldest brother Liu Dao had succeeded to their father's kingdom, Liu Guo and his brothers Bing and Ding were enfeoffed as district marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671, DGHJ 7:5a.

Liu Han 劉漢; Henan. In the summer of 142 there was a great fire at Luoyang, affecting almost two hundred houses and completely destroying ninety of them. The government of Emperor Shun issued cash and grain to those affected, and Liu Han is named as one of those who lost their home. -HHS 104/14:3295; Bn 76:46.

Liu He 劉郃 [Jicheng 季承] (d.179); Yuyang. Younger brother of Liu Shu 儵, who had recommended Emperor Ling for the imperial throne but was killed in 168, Liu He received some favour at court on his brother's account. He became Administrator of Jiyin, then Director of Retainers, and in 178 he was Minister Herald. When Liu He had a quarrel with Cai Yong, the eunuch Cheng Huang arranged an allegation that Cai Yong had made improper requests for private favour from him. Cai Yong was sentenced to exile to the north.

In the following year Liu He became Excellency over the Masses. He held resentment against the eunuch group led by Cao Jie and Wang Fu for their involvement in the death of his brother, and Chen Qiu and Liu Na urged him to use his authority to have the anti-eunuch official Yang Qiu reappointed Director of Retainers so he might continue his attacks against them. These plans were discovered, and when they were presented to Emperor Ling as treason Liu He and his colleagues were executed. -HHS 60/50B:2001, 56/46:1834, 113/23:3284; deC 89:149, 162-163.

Liu He 劉何. A commander under Lü Bu in the 190s, Liu He was defeated and captured by Cao Ren. -SGZ 9:274.

Liu He 劉和 (d.213). Son of Liu Ding the King of Pengcheng, he succeeded his father in 149. Extremely filial, when his mother died he carried out the rites of mourning far beyond the expected requirements. The Tutor and Chancellor of the state reported this to the throne, and Emperor Huan invited him to a banquet at his palace. The people of Pengcheng also admired him for his fine conduct and generosity.

During the disturbances of the early 190s, Liu He was attacked by the bandit Chang Wu and took refuge in Dong commandery. He was later able to return, and remained in residence until his death, having reigned sixty-four years. He was succeeded by his grandson Zhi. -HHS 50/40:1671-72.

Liu He 劉和; Donghai. Son of Liu Yu, in 191 Liu He was a Palace Attendant at Chang'an. Emperor Xian ordered him to escape and seek aid from his father in You province, but as Liu He came east he fell into the hands of Yuan Shu, who kept him in Nanyang in order to take over the troops that Liu Yu sent.

Liu He later escaped to join Yuan Shao. When the Wuhuan and Chinese rose against Gongsun Zan in 195, Liu He accompanied Yuan Shao's general Qu Yi to avenge his father's murder. -HHS 73/63:2355, 2363, SGZ 8:241, 243.

Liu He 劉何. An officer of Lü Bu, he was captured by Cao Ren about 194. -SGZ 9:274.

Liu He 劉闔. After the death of Liu Yan the Governor of Yi province in 194, Liu Biao the Governor of Jing province sent his senior officer Liu He to assist the new Inspector Hu Mao, who had been nominated by the government at Chang'an. Liu Yan's son Liu Zhang had already taken over in Yi province, and though Liu He stirred up a local rebellion against him the insurgents were defeated and driven into Jing province. -SGZ Shu 1:868.

Liu Heng 劉衡 (d.41). Son of Emperor Guangwu by his future empress the Lady Yin, Liu Heng was named Duke of Linhuai in 39, but died two years later. He left no heirs and the state was ended. -HHS 42/32:1449*.

Liu Heng 劉衡 [Yuanzai 元宰] (135-187); Ji'nan. Having served at the court of Liu Kui, King of Bohai and brother of Emperor Huan, who was known for his erratic conduct, Liu Heng received special provincial nomination and became a county magistrate in that state. He then served as Commandant of the Dependent State of Zhangye.

Liu Heng retired on grounds of ill health, but later returned to a holding position as a Consultant at the capital and was then appointed Chancellor of Zhao. He died in that office, and a stele was erected in his honour. -LS 17:1a-3a.

Liu Hong 劉弘/宏 [Rusun 孺孫]; Nanyang. Brother of the marquis Liu Chang, of Liu Qing and Liu Liang, and uncle of Liu Shun, Liu Hong was a kinsman of Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, and he married the Lady Fan, a cousin of their mother. He died about 23, at an early stage of the rebellion against Wang Mang. -HHS 14/4:567 [弘], DGHJ 7:2b [宏], XHS 2:4a [宏]; Bn 54 appendix # 49.

Liu Hong 劉宏. In 26 Liu Hong was a general under Cen Peng in the unsuccessful operations against the rebels Dong Xin and Deng Feng in Nanyang. In the following year he again followed Cen Peng to attack and defeat the southern warlord Qin Feng. -HHS 17/7: 656-67.

Liu Hong 劉宏 (d.116). Son of Liu Shang the King of Zhao, he succeeded his father in 104.

Liu Hong was succeeded by his son Qian, and two younger sons received village marquisates. -HHS 14/4:559; Bn 54 appendix # 138.

Liu Hong 劉鴻 (d.147). Son of Liu Chong the King of Le'an, he succeeded his father in 121. Initially Liu Hong lived at the capital as his father and grandfather had done, but after the death of Emperor An in 125 he was sent out to his state.

In 145 Liu Hong's son Liu Zuan, Emperor Zhi, was chosen for the throne by the regent Dowager Liang and her brother Liang Ji. An edict of the Dowager ordered that, because much of the territory of Le'an was marshland and the revenues of the state were poor, Liu Hong's fief should be changed to the more prosperous region of Bohai.

Liu Zuan died in 146, and when Liu Hong died in the following year he left no other sons. The Dowager ordered that Liu Kui, younger brother of Emperor Huan, be enfeoffed as King of Bohai to maintain the lineage. -HHS 55/45:1797-98.

Liu Hong 劉弘 (d.140). Son of Liu Xian the King of Zhongshan, he succeeded his father in 118.

Liu Hong was succeeded by his son Chang. -HHS 42/32:1450, 6:269.

Liu Hong 劉弘; Zhuo. Son of Liu Xiong, Liu Hong was no more than an officer in the local administration, but he claimed descent from Emperor Jing of Former Han, through the kings of Zhongshan and a short-lived fief in Zhuo held by a cadet lineage.

In 161 Liu Hong became the father of Liu Bei, future First Sovereign of the Three Kingdoms state of Shu-Han. He died soon afterwards. -SGZ Shu 2:879.

Liu Hong 劉洪 [Yuanzhuo 元卓]; Taishan. One of the leading mathematicians of his time, during the 160s Liu Hong became an officer of the Bureau of Astronomy. He then went out as Assistant Chancellor of Changshan, and from there in 174 he presented a proposal for improving forecasts of lunar eclipses, based on the movements of the sun, the moon, and the five visible planets 七曜術. The officers Liu Gu and Feng Xun were ordered to test his system against observations, and they in turn devised another set of calculations, based upon eight epochs 八元術. It was agreed that the two methods would be tested in 179: in that year the official calendar forecast an eclipse in the fifth month while Liu Hong had the third month and Liu Gu and Feng Xun the fourth month. When the time came, however, two of the full moons were overcast and could not be observed; modern calculations indicate that there was no eclipse that year until the ninth month.

After a period in private life following the death of his father, Liu Hong returned to the capital as a Reporting Officer, served as a gentleman cadet, and then transferred to the Eastern Pavilion. There he worked with Cai Yong on his Treatise of Pitchpipes and the Calendar 律曆意 Lǜlì yì, which was incorporated by Sima Biao into his Xu Han shu and is now attached to Hou Han shu. Liu Hong compiled the third section of the Treatise, describing the calculations of the official Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar of Later Han, and he also worked with Cai Yong on a new Qianxiang 乾象 [Celestial Appearances] calendar: the system was adopted in 223 by Sun Quan, ruler of the Three Kingdoms state of Wu.

Sivin 69:65 notes that Liu Hong was the first great astronomer to take eclipse cycles seriously, but though his calendar was theoretically better than the Sifen it did not greatly increase the number of confirmed predictions. Liu Hong did, however, prepare tables on the varying apparent movements of celestial bodies (ephemerides) and he analysed the path of the moon in relation to the ecliptic. At the same time, moreover, he discarded the links with apocryphal texts which had confused matters in previous centuries.

In 179 Liu Hong was consulted by the Imperial Secretariat on the calendrical proposals of the private scholar Wang Han: his report was negative. In 180 he took part in a board of enquiry under the Minister of Ceremonies Jiu Dan which considered rival methods for calculating eclipses of the moon.

Liu Hong became an Internuncio and then head of the guards at a gate of the capital. He was later a Commandant in Kuaiji and Administrator of Shanyang.

He died in that last office.

Liu Hong's commentary to the important Jiuzhang suanshu 九章算術 "Nine Chapters on the Art of Mathematics" is still extant. -HHS 92/2:3041-43, YSS: 3b-4a; Needham 59:25, 247, 288, 421, Sivin 69:59-66, MBeck 90:60-63.

Liu Hong 劉宏 (156-189) [Emperor Ling 靈帝 (reg. 168-189)]. A great-great-grandson of Emperor Zhang and great-grandson of Liu Kai [or Gong? q.v.] the King of Hejian, Liu Hong was the son of Liu Chang the Marquis of Jiedu Village 解瀆亭 and his concubine the Lady Dong. His father died when Liu Hong was young, and he succeeded to the fief.

ACCESSION, REGENCY AND THE EUNUCH COUP 168

When Emperor Huan died in the winter of 167/168 he left no heir, and his widow the Dowager Dou Miao had the constitutional right to choose any member of the imperial clan to succeed him. She and her father Dou Wu consulted together, and they asked the advice of the Imperial Clerk Liu Shu, a member of the Censorate who came from that territory. He recommended Liu Hong, at that time twelve sui, a little more than ten years old by Western reckoning, and on 17 February 168 Liu Hong was placed upon the throne. We are told that Liu Shu praised his high moral qualities, but he was surely rather young for such an encomium, and we may assume that in the eyes of his sponsors Liu Hong's chief advantages were that he was old enough to avoid the risks of infant mortality, and young enough to require the guidance of a regent, thus ensuring the hegemony of the Dowager's clan for some years to come. As the boy was brought to the capital, his father and his grandparents were granted posthumous imperial honours, but his mother the Lady Dong was left behind in Hejian.

While the Dowager Dou held power as regent, her father Dou Wu was named General-in-Chief, which gave nominal command over the Northern Army, the major professional force at the capital, and he maintained a close partnership with the senior official Chen Fan, now Grand Tutor. With the Excellency Hu Guang they shared control over the Secretariat, centre of imperial authority, and under their patronage Li Ying and other reformers who had been proscribed the year before were brought back to the capital and given high office. The moral Confucianists believed that the time for change had come, and they planned to eliminate the power of the palace eunuchs who had held such influence under Emperor Huan.

As the Dowager resisted the plans of her father and his associates, the matter was undecided for several months. Eventually, however, Dou Wu and Chen Fan had their ally Shan Bing appointed Prefect of the Yellow Gates, with authority over all palace eunuchs, and Shan Bing had the eunuch Zheng Li arrested and tortured. From his forced confession they obtained a case against the senior eunuchs Cao Jie, Wang Fu and others. Orders were given for their arrest too, but at this point, early on 25 October, the eunuchs struck back. They swore an oath to destroy their enemies, Cao Jie persuaded the young emperor to support them against the alleged traitors, and with this imperial authority the Secretariat was persuaded to issue an edict dismissing Dou Wu.

Refusing to accept the edict, Dou Wu gathered the troops of the Northern Army to regain control. Chen Fan also attempted a counter-attack, but was overpowered and arrested. The eunuchs then gathered a scratch force of palace guards to face Dou Wu, and they were fortunate enough to have the support of the well-known general Zhang Huan, lately returned from the frontier. It is claimed that Zhang Huan was confused as to which side he should support, but his intervention proved decisive, and as the two sides faced one another Dou Wu's men steadily abandoned him. By the middle of the morning he had been driven to flight and suicide, other members of the family and their party were killed, and the Dowager was placed under house arrest. She played no further role in government and died, not necessarily of natural causes, in 172.

EUNUCH GOVERNMENT AND PROSCRIPTION

Following their decisive victory over Dou Wu and his allies, the eunuchs renewed the proscription against the Confucianist reformers such as Li Ying, but they still had some concerns, and the students of the University and various junior officers maintained their agitation. In the winter of 169 the eunuch Hou Lan reported that Zhang Jian and a group of his fellow-countrymen from Shanyang had sworn an oath of mutual allegiance. Such a ceremony may have been innocent – a group of likeminded men from the same region confirming friendship and brotherhood – but Zhang Jian was an old enemy of Hou Lan, and the eunuchs claimed that the gathering was treasonous. They persuaded the young emperor that the members of the Proscribed Party were a threat to the state which had to be crushed. Zhang Jian made his escape, and the student leader Guo Tai was not directly involved, but Li Ying, Liu Shu, Fan Pang and some hundred others were killed, while their wives and children were sent to the frontiers. Many people also denounced one another for private reasons, and it was estimated that six or seven hundred people were executed or exiled. This Second Faction Incident marked the beginning of the Great Proscription.

In 172 the senior eunuch Hou Lan was dismissed for corruption and killed himself, and the death of the Dowager Dou soon afterwards inspired a flurry of protest, seeking to take advantage of the set-back to the emperor's favourites. Slogans opposed to the eunuchs and blaming them for the Lady Dou's death appeared on a gate of the capital, but the frontier general Duan Jiong, now Director of Retainers, promptly conducted a purge of students at the University.

In 176 the elderly Administrator of the distant commandery of Yongchang, Cao Luan, presented an ill-advised plea for leniency; the emperor was furious at the suggestion, and the proscription was extended even to most distant relatives. Three years later this was reversed, but it was not until the time of the Yellow Turban rebellion of 184, fifteen years after its commencement, that the Proscription was ended, largely because of concerns that disaffected and resentful gentry might join the rebel cause.

In practice, though the Proscription affected hundreds and even thousands of people, many of them scholar-officials of high quality, the administration continued to function and many men of family, notably from the well-established Yang and Yuan clans, were content to serve the state and were respected for doing so. The eunuchs had the support of the young emperor, and their intervention for personal gain sometimes disrupted the government, but in formal terms the situation was not greatly changed.

As time passed, however, the imperial bureaucracy was weakened by frequent changes among the Excellencies. In the twenty years of the reign of Emperor Shun there had been ten appointments as Grand Commandant, seven as Excellency over the Masses and eight as Excellency of Works. During the eight years of the personal reign of Emperor Huan from 159 to 167, there were seven Grand Commandants, five Excellencies over the Masses and seven Excellencies of Works, an average of some two new appointments each year. Under Emperor Ling, however, during the twenty years from 169 to 189, there were twenty-five Grand Commandants, fourteen Excellencies over the Masses and twenty-two Excellencies of Works, an average of three appointments a year. Some appointments were promotions within the ranks of the Excellencies, and some men held the same office on separate occasions, but the overall effect was to remove continuity at the highest level and reduce the influence of those who were nominally the most senior of the state. Many Excellencies left office on account of unfavourable omens, notionally accepting responsibility for the balance of the cosmos, but in fact reducing the authority of government. And during the 180s the sale of office, or fines for acceptance, extended to Excellency ranks as well and did further damage to the prestige and morale of all officials.

The reign of Emperor Ling was marked by a host of reports of portents, some natural, such as earthquakes, locusts, floods and droughts, the latter particularly from 175 to 177, others more questionable, such as the appearance of magical snakes and dragons, notably in 178 and 179, and some suspicious, such as frequent fires in imperial buildings, culminating in a conflagration at the Southern Palace in 185. Following such events there were calls for sealed memorials on problems of the day, and the government attempted to relieve distress by distribution of supplies or exemption from taxation. Finance, however, continued to be difficult, and many people who had been arrested but not yet convicted were encouraged to commute their risk by paying a fine.

Offices and noble ranks were offered for sale from 178 [deC 89:152, 516-518]. At first the trade was restricted to secondary marquises and some junior positions in the palace guards, in much the same fashion as had been used by the regent Dowager Deng in 109 and Emperor Huan in 162, but the program was later extended to all ranks of the civil service, from the Excellencies down, and new appointees had to negotiate the amount they should pay for the privilege. Proceeds from the sales and fines were placed not into the public treasury but into the private hoard of Emperor Ling, while in a cynical market, as wealthy men received a discount for payment in advance, those who were considered particularly worthy were assessed at a lower rate. We are told in particular that in 185 Cui

Lie paid five million cash to become Excellency over the Masses; the emperor expressed regret that he had not extracted double the amount, but Cui Lie's own reputation suffered heavily.

It is clear that many suitable candidates had adequate private means; and the fact that men like Cui Lie could put up such great sums may be taken as a sign of the inability of the imperial government to find more regular means of tapping the financial resources of the empire as a whole. At the lower level, however, there was certainly hardship, and the system was liable to gross corruption as men sought to recoup their investment in office by extorting wealth from the communities in their charge.

Also in 178 Emperor Ling authorised his School at the Gate of the Vast Capital to provide an alternative route of entry to the civil service. The emperor was interested in literary composition and calligraphy, and had established the School to encourage such studies, but he now called for nominations from senior officials at the capital and in the provinces and ordered that graduates could be appointed directly to office. Students of calligraphy were required to write nine thousand characters in the major scripts, and were then assigned to the Imperial Secretariat, while others obtained positions as Inspectors, Administrators or senior advisers at court.

The new establishment provided a challenge to traditional forms of scholarship, and leading scholars and officials such as Cai Yong objected to the patronage of such frivolous compositions such as rhapsodies. Even from the hostile evidence, however, the curriculum was not without merit. On the practical side, it included the style and technique of drawing up official documents, while in more imaginative fashion it included the art of the rhapsody and calligraphy. It is arguable that a graduate of such an institution would have been at least as well equipped to handle affairs of government as an official who had spent all his time in study of the texts of current Confucianism. There was, however, a moral and political dimension to the argument.

After the heady years of political activity under Emperor Huan and in the early 170s, the Imperial University had fallen once more into decline. It appears that entry to the civil service may still have been available by examination, on the limited scale established under Emperor Huan, we have no record of any such candidates, and the scale of the backlog may be judged by an edict of 176, which provided for special examinations of some hundred University students aged sixty or over, who were then appointed as gentleman cadets, members of the Suite of the Heir, and to junior positions at royal courts or commandery offices.

The most dramatic example of failure in official scholarship came in 175, when the eunuch Li Xun memorialised that texts in the imperial library of the Orchid Terrace were being altered by Academicians of the University to support and fit their own theories. In response, Cai Yong and other scholars proposed that five classics, Analects, Changes, Ritual, History, and Chunqiu with the Gongyang commentary, be edited and engraved upon stone. Emperor Ling approved, and he visited the University in 182, presumably to inspect the final stages of the work. The Stone Classics 石經, completed in 183, determined the canon for future generations of scholars, but the monumental project had been called into being by the corruption of the formal guardians of Confucian tradition.

Within the palace, the eunuchs were by no means always united, and there were a number of rival cliques. The leading favourites, notably Zhao Zhong and Zhang Rang, were ferocious in maintaining their position and equally energetic in seeking profit. Even at the time of the Yellow Turban uprising in 184, when the maverick Lü Qiang persuaded the emperor to end the proscription of reformists and to restrict eunuch power, Zhao Zhong and his fellows had him charged with treason and compelled to commit suicide, while the successful generals Lu Zhi and Huangfu Song both suffered dismissal for refusing their demands. Like their master, the senior eunuchs had limited concern for the good of the state and far more for their own self-interest.

THE PERSONAL RULE OF EMPEROR LING

Emperor Ling took the Cap of Manhood in 171 at the age of sixteen sui, and later that year the Lady Song was named as his first empress. She soon lost favour, and was dismissed in 178, but the emperor amused himself with other companions. We are told that he would set up an imitation market-place in the harem, with his concubines running the stalls. As in a real market, they were encouraged to fight and steal from one another, while the emperor dressed as a merchant and called at each place, to eat and drink and amuse himself like the proverbial travelling salesman.

Among other inappropriate conduct, it is said that he dressed one of his dogs in a cap and sash of honour, that he personally drove a donkey-cart – so donkeys became fashionable and expensive at the capital – and that he enjoyed barbarian clothing and food. More seriously, he composed a study of the mythical emperor Fuxi 皇[伏羲]篇 in fifty parts 章, and his interest in literature was reflected in the establishment of the School at the Gate of the Vast Capital, described above.

By 175 all the heads of offices under the Minister Steward were eunuchs, and the emperor increased their number to provide for his personal comfort. In 180, against protests at such extravagance, he set up the Jade Sceptre Park for Bird-Netting and Park of Spiritual Jade at Luoyang, and in the following year he established the Stables for Thoroughbreds to collect fine horses from commanderies and kingdoms. Each project was carried out at vast expense, large amounts were paid to traders or embezzled by eunuch officials, and besides the extravagant works at Luoyang Emperor Ling also acquired land for houses and pavilions in his former home country of Hejian, and had a commemorative stele erected there.

At the end of 184, after the crisis of the Yellow Turban rebellion, there was some show of economy: a few rare delicacies were no longer required, and the emperor ate meat only once a day, while those horses in the imperial stables which were not required for ceremonial processions were transferred to the army. These signs of restraint were more than balanced in the following summer, when a great fire destroyed much of the Southern Palace. Despite the financial straits of the government, senior eunuchs persuaded Emperor Ling to levy a special land tax to pay for rebuilding; the whole program became a centre of extravagance and corruption, while large amounts were taken for the emperor's own treasury in the Western Garden. Apparently as a gesture to the public good, in 186 the eunuch engineer Bi Lan improved the water supply within the city of Luoyang, but increasing contributions were exacted from new appointees as Inspectors or Administrators in the provinces, secondary marquises were sold for half a million cash, and the sale of offices reached a peak of extortion.

Given his supreme authority and his access to the resources of the empire, Liu Hong's conduct appears absurd, but we are told that as a junior marquis, before he came to the throne, he had been poor, and that he never recovered from the experience. He was devoted, moreover, to the eunuchs Zhao Zhong and Zhang Rang, describing them as his mother and his father, and even as they encouraged the young ruler in his building program they constructed great mansions for themselves. Concerned that the emperor might find out, they persuaded him that it would bring ill fortune to the people if he climbed tall buildings, and in this way they concealed their extravagance.

In 188, with another gesture towards the public good, the emperor used his own money from the Western Garden to assemble eight regiments as a private army. Predictably, a eunuch, Jian Shi, was made senior colonel, and even the General-in-Chief He Jin was placed under his orders. As Emperor Ling died in the following year, nothing more came of this new array, but he did find occasion to hold a grand parade, dress up in military costume, and be acclaimed as "General Supreme" 無上將軍. Like Caligula and Nero during the previous century in Rome, Emperor Ling evidently regarded his position and power as an opportunity for play-acting and pleasure; he was, however, less blood-thirsty.

EPIDEMICS, FAITH-HEALING AND REBELLION

Amongst a plethora of other portents during the reign of Emperor Ling, the Annals and the Treatise of the Five Powers [HHS 107/17:3351] describe a remarkable increase in the incidence of epidemics 大疫 during the reign of Emperor Ling, with outbreaks recorded in 171, 173, 179, 182 and 185, and earlier under Emperor Huan in 151 and in 161. Before that time, there had been illness in Kuaiji in the southeast in 38 and 39 and again in 119, and sickness at the capital in 125. The outbreak in 151 affected the capital and the south-eastern commanderies of Jiujiang and Lujiang, but from 160 there are no particular areas named and the epidemics appear to have spread across the empire.

At the other end of the Eurasian landmass the Antonine plague, which afflicted the Roman empire for fifteen years from the mid-160s, was described by the physician Galen and is identified by Hopkins 83:22 as smallpox. It is said to have been brought by troops returning from campaign in Mesopotamia, though it could, of course, have come from further east. [It is uncertain whether the alleged embassy which reached the court of Emperor Huan in 167 was involved in the spread of the sickness: it would appear to have been established in both regions by that time.] Unfortunately, though Ge Hong 葛洪 of the fourth century provides a clear description of smallpox in China, there are no clinical descriptions from the second century [and one must remark that most historical studies of diseases in Western literature are marked by an unfortunate tendency to superficial reading of Chinese sources, accompanied by a somewhat insouciant attitude towards dates and a general ignorance of geography: Hopkins 83:103-104 provides an example, though his discussion elsewhere is often excellent]. There are many attested examples of the devastation brought by new outbreaks of known diseases, or how sicknesses formerly restricted to non-human populations may make a "species jump" to afflict mankind with similar dramatic effects, and McNeill 76:103-104 suggests that the epidemic of the second century, and a subsequent one in the mid-third century, marked either a resurgence of smallpox or the arrival of measles among humans. In Han China, the pattern of illness after 190 is confused by famine and war, with itinerant hordes of refugees and massive armies providing convenient reservoirs for a variety of infectious diseases. We can recognise one major attack in 217, which devastated the capital of Cao Cao's kingdom of Wei and which probably represented a recurrence of the same disease as had afflicted the reigns of Emperors Huan and Ling.

One phenomenon very probably related to this great epidemic was the growth of faith-healing, generally associated with unorthodox cults which frequently developed into religious rebellion [妖賊 yaozei]. Among early rebels of this type we may note Zhang He in the early 130s, Pei You in the late 140s, He Deng and Dai Yi with Long Shang in the mid-160s, and the Xu family of Kuaiji in the early 170s [see sub Xu Chao]. We are told that there then were a number of such sects, including Luo Yao/Zhao in the region of Chang'an, Zhang Xiu or Zhang Lu in Yi province, and Zhang Jue on the North China plain [SGZ 8:264, PC quoting the Dian lue of Yu Huan]. Of these, the movement of most dramatic and widespread consequence was that of Zhang Jue, who came from Zhuo commandery but who had adherents across the whole of eastern China, Nanyang in the south, and even in the imperial capital.

Zhang Jue's Way of Great Peace 太平道 was based upon faith-healing, and he treated the sick with charmed water and required them to confess their sins. Claiming that the blue sky of Han would be replaced by the Yellow Heaven of a new age and order, in 184 Zhang Jue raised rebellion across the greater part of the empire. His followers wore yellow cloth about their heads as a badge and were known as the Yellow Turbans 黃巾. The imperial government was at first hard-pressed, but recovered its position surprisingly well, and by the end of the year Zhang Jue was dead and his armies had been destroyed. The fighting, however, was ferocious, with heavy casualties on both sides, and large groups of Yellow Turbans continued to operate for many years afterwards: the surrender and accession to Cao Cao of the Yellow Turbans of Qing province in 192 represented a major gain to his forces.

Historians have debated the significance of the Yellow Turban rebellion in weakening the dynasty of Han and bringing its ultimate destruction. The Chinese Communist tradition, with a prejudice towards peasant revolution in the style of their twentieth-century success, has seen Zhang Jue's movement as crucial, and it is certainly true that the need to raise great armies to deal with the threat militarised and destabilised the empire. On the other hand, though numbers of officials were killed, the basic structure of commandery and county government appears to have been restored quite quickly, and there was a long tradition of disorder and feuding in the countryside [see, for example, sub Su Buwei]. The final collapse of government was the result of events at the imperial capital following the death of Emperor Ling, and the Yellow Turbans played no role in those affairs.

NON-CHINESE, FRONTIER AFFAIRS AND INTERNAL REBELLION

In 167, at the end of the reign of Emperor Huan, the general Duan Jiong had been given authority for operations against the Eastern Qiang, and notably the Xianlian tribe. He achieved his first major successes in the spring and summer of 168, and although there was criticism of his ferocity from his fellow-commander Zhang Huan, the regent Dowager ordered that the process of extermination should continue, and the policy was maintained after the destruction of the Dou family. By the first half of 169 the Xianlian had been pacified by massacre and Duan Jiong returned in triumph to the capital.

Success against the Qiang was more than balanced by increasing difficulty with the Xianbi and their energetic warlord Tanshihuai. From the time of Emperor Huan he had embarked on a series of incursions along the frontier, and from the late 160s into the 180s the Annals record almost annual raids against You or Bing province or both.

In the winter of 174 a raid deep into Beidi was defeated by the Administrator Xia Yu, formerly an officer of Duan Jiong, and as the situation became still more serious it was proposed to send a major expedition into the steppe. There was a good deal of concern, but in the summer of 177 three columns were sent out, led by Xiu Yu, Tian Yan, also a former officer of Duan Jiong, and Zang Min, who had served with success against rebels in the southeast. The enterprise, however, was defeated with heavy losses, the first time that a full Chinese army had suffered such a fate since the time of Former Han, and incursions continued along the whole of the north.

By good fortune for the Chinese, Tanshihuai died in the early 180s, his son Helian proved less able, and the Xianbi confederacy fell into disarray. Raids continued for a few years longer, but they were less intense, and the Xianbi were not able to take advantage of the imperial distraction with the Yellow Turban rebellion of 184.

In the far south of the empire, a number of tribute missions were recorded from non-Chinese states and peoples, but there was also a major rebellion in 178 among the non-Chinese of Hepu and Jiaozhi, which extended down the coast to affect present-day Vietnam; it was settled in 181 by the general Zhu Jun. Another rebellion in 184 was soon put down.

In 176 the non-Chinese of Yizhou commandery in the southwest rebelled and captured the local Administrator. The trouble spread wide, and the court even thought of abandoning the territory, but the local officer Li Yong took command, secured the alliance of the Bانشun people of Ba commandery, and settled the disturbance. The Bانشun in turn made a rising in 182 to protest against ill-treatment, but when the humane official Cao Qian was sent they submitted to an amnesty; there was a further brief flurry in 188.

Within the empire, the non-Chinese of Jiangxia rebelled in 169, but were put down by local forces, and when the tribespeople of the Danyang hills south of the lower Yangzi laid siege to the Administrator Chen

Yin he was likewise able to defeat them.

The outbreak of the Yellow Turban rebellion in 184 represented the greatest challenge to the authority of the Han state. The origins of Zhang Jue's religious regime are discussed in the section above and in his biographical entry, but it should be recognised that the government at Luoyang obtained remarkable success against what appeared at first to be a very powerful opponent. The imperial commanders suffered setbacks, but by the end of the summer Yingchuan, Runan and Chen had been pacified, in the winter Huangfu Song defeated the last Yellow Turbans in the north, and Zhu Jun concluded the reconquest of Nanyang soon afterwards. Various independent groups survived, and others claimed the title for themselves later, but the heart of the movement had been destroyed, and it represented thereafter no direct threat to the dynasty.

Rather more localised, but almost as damaging, was the mutiny and rebellion in Liang province which broke out at the end of 184. In this case, no ideology was involved, but for the next several years a large group of non-Chinese and renegades, led by such men as Beigong Boyu, Wang Guo and Han Sui, removed imperial control from a great part of the province, and in 185 and 187 their forces threatened the old capital of Chang'an. They were driven back in 188, but the northwest of the empire was divided thereafter among petty warlord states, and central control was not restored for more than twenty-five years.

Closer to the imperial capital, groups operating in the Taihang mountains, known collectively as the Black Mountain bandits and loosely associated under Zhang Niujue and then Zhang Yan, became so entrenched that the government was obliged to come to terms and recognise their rebel regimes as part of its regular administration, with rights of appointment and nomination for office comparable to those of regular commanderies and kingdoms. After 190 the various groups were attacked and brought under some measure of control by Yuan Shao and others, but there were no resources to deal with them in the second half of the 180s.

Elsewhere in the empire, rebellions in Jiangxia and Wuling in 186 were put down locally, but Ou Xing and others led a widespread rising in the south of Jing province until they were quelled by Sun Jian the Administrator of Changsha, one of a new breed of fighting men who came to prominence at this time.

There were rebels in Henan, Runan and Yingchuan, many styling themselves Yellow Turbans, and though they were dealt with fairly swiftly, the Yellow Turbans of Qing and Xu provinces were a major force in the east of the empire until they were persuaded to give formal submission to the warlord Cao Cao in 192. In 188 a group of rebels from Bobo in Xihe also claimed affiliation with the Yellow Turbans; they ravaged Taiyuan and Hedong, and survived to play a role in the 190s. In a sad postscript to the history of the Southern Xiongnu, the Shanyu Yufuluo was driven from his heritage and ended his days as a marginal bandit leader loosely associated with the Bobo group and other regional rebels.

As some response to the wave of unrest across the empire, and in the belief that the resources and authority of individual commanderies were too limited to cope, in 188 the government re-introduced a system of provincial Governors, with the equivalent of ministerial rank, for some of the troubled regions. The first appointments were to Yi, Yu and You provinces, and though Inspectors continued to be appointed elsewhere, provinces under a single executive became core units of administration outside the capital.

DEATH AND JUDGEMENT

Emperor Ling died on 13 May 189 at the age of thirty-four sui. He was buried in the "Mound of Civil Achievement" 文陵 northwest of Luoyang. Unlike his predecessors, he was never awarded a temple-name, and in 190 Dong Zhuo, who controlled the court of Han at that time, approved a recommendation of Cai Yong that his tablet should be deposed from a permanent position in the Imperial Ancestral Temple on the grounds that he had shown neither merit nor virtue [MBeck 90:106-107, and see sub Liu Zhao, Emperor He].

Though one may debate the judgements of traditional scholars and historians on a ruler such as Emperor Huan, it is difficult to dispute the general condemnation of Emperor Ling. He may have had artistic and literary skills, but he was quite unsuited to rule China at such a time. Even allowing for the exaggeration of critics, he was evidently besotted by his eunuch associates within the palace, and was absurdly greedy and extravagant at a time when the state was under desperate financial and military pressure. The sale of offices, or forced fines for taking them up, distorted and corrupted the bureaucracy, while the wastage which accompanied his vast building program in the mid-180s was utterly inappropriate after the disruption of the Yellow Turban rebellion.

Emperor Ling evidently enjoyed his life, whether playing with dogs and donkeys and with the women of his harem, or dressing up for a grand parade of his private army of the Western Garden. It does not appear, however, that he had any idea what was really going on in his government or in the empire at large, nor that he had any care for the problems of the time. Remarkably, the turmoils of rebellion and war were dealt with by his military men, and at the time of his early death the dynasty still held power and authority. As a final kick, however, Emperor Ling left two sons with claim to the succession, and the combination of a low-born consort family and some fearful eunuchs made disaster all but inevitable.

Had any man resolved to destroy the four-hundred year inheritance of Han, he could hardly have done better than Emperor Ling. -HHS 8*; deC 89.

Liu Hong 劉弘 [Yugao 于高 or Zigao 子高]; Nanyang. In 188 Liu Hong was promoted from Minister of the Household to Excellency of Works. After Dong Zhuo seized power in the following year, Liu Hong left office on the grounds that it had not rained for several months; his place was taken by the dictator. -HHS 8: 356-59, 72/62:2324.

Liu Hong's name appears in the colophon to the Stone Classics engraving of the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu in the early 180s. He is described there as a Consultant. -LS 14:8b.

Liu Hongfu 劉紅夫, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Guangwu, in 39 she was appointed Princess of Guantao in Wei. She married Han Guang, but in 73 he was executed for alleged involvement in a conspiracy with Liu Yan the King of Huaiyang.

Presumably before the disgrace of her husband, the princess asked her brother Emperor Ming to make her son a gentlemen cadet so that he might enter the commissioned civil service. Faithful to the principle that close imperial relatives should not be involved in regular government, the emperor refused, but he gave her ten million cash in recompense. -HHS 10A:403, 2: 124, HQ 1:1a.

Liu Hu 劉祐 see Liu You 劉祐 [Emperor An].

Liu Hu 劉互 see sub Liu Gai 丐.

Liu Hu 劉護; Nanyang. Grandson of Liu Fu 浮, he succeeded to his marquissate. He left no sons when he died, and the fief was ended: cf., however sub Liu Gui and sub Liu Wei. -HHS 14/4:564; Bn 54 appendix # 139.

Liu Hu 劉護. Administrator of Jiangxia about 70, Liu Hu admired the filial piety shown by the twelve-year-old Huang Xiang at the death of his mother. He gave the boy a position at his yamen and acted as his friend and patron. -HHS 80/70A:2614.

Liu Hu 劉虎 (d.199); Shanyang. A nephew of Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province, in 199 Liu Hu was sent with troops to assist Huang Zu against Sun Ce on the Yangzi. Liu Hu and Han Xi led an advance guard, but they were heavily defeated and both were killed. -SGZ Wu 1:1108.

Liu Hua 劉華, the Lady. Eldest daughter of Emperor Huan, in 158 she was appointed Senior Princess of Yang'an in Runan. She married Fu Wan, and their daughter Shou became empress of Emperor Xian. -HHS 10B:462.

Liu Hua 劉華 i.e. Liu Ye 劉曄. -Mather 76:249.

Liu Huan 劉緩, the Lady, miswritten for Liu Shou 劉綏.

Liu Huang 劉黃, the Lady; Nanyang. Elder sister of Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, she married Hu Zhen. When Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 26 he had the Lady brought from Nanyang to Luoyang and named her Senior Princess of Huyang in Nanyang. Hu Zhen died soon afterwards and, admiring the minister Song Hong, the Lady hoped to marry him. When Guangwu broached the subject, however, Song Hong refused to divorce his wife, and the plan was abandoned.

The Lady evidently satisfied her needs out of wedlock. In the early 40s her favourite slave killed a man and took protection with her, but the Prefect of Luoyang Dong Xuan halted the carriage in which she was riding with her companion, arrested him and killed him. The Lady complained to her brother and sought to have him executed, but Dong Xuan refused to accept that slaves could kill innocent men. He would not apologise and the emperor, admiring his obstinacy and his principles, released him and rewarded him. [XHS 5:10a-b attributes this incident to the Lady Huang's sister Boji.]

The Lady died before her brother, and a temple was established for her in Huyang. -HHS 26/16:904-05, 77/67: 2489-90, 7:313; Bn 67:19-20, Bn 79:140; Ch'ü 72:373-374.

Liu Huang 劉晃. Son of Liu Shi the King of Qi, he succeeded his father in 70. In 87 Liu Huang and his younger brother Gang, and the Lady Zong their mother, were found to have made false accusations in a family quarrel. Senior officials recommended that the men be reduced to commoner rank and exiled to Danyang. Emperor Zhang did send Liu Huang to Danyang, but he granted him a marquisate there; Liu Gang also kept his title, but with a reduced fief. Liu Huang died soon afterwards.

When Emperor Zhang died in 88, his testamentary edict noted that Liu Huang was a descendant of Liu Bosheng, elder brother of Guangwu, who had led the rising against Wang Mang. He therefore urged that the royal state be restored, and in 90 Liu Huang's son Wujì, who had succeeded him as marquis, was promoted to King of Qi. -HHS 14/4:553-54, 4:157, 170; Bn 54 appendix # 150.

Liu Hui 劉惠, the Lady (d.128). Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 74 she was appointed Princess of Wu'an in Wei commandery. She married Lai Leng.

In 121 Emperor An promoted the Lady to Senior Princess, but in 124, after her son Lai Li led a major protest against the dismissal of the Heir Liu Bao, Emperor An dismissed him and his brothers from their official positions, banned the Lady Liu from audiences, and reduced the family fiefs.

Late in 125, after the accession of Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, the family was restored to favour. -HHS 10B:460, 15/5:590-93.

Liu Hui 劉恢 (d.132). Son of Liu Fang the King of Fuling, he succeeded his father in 123.

Liu Hui was himself succeeded first by his younger son Dai and later by Dai's elder brother Bianqin. -HHS 6:260, HHS 42/32:1446.

Liu Hui 劉惠 see Liu Zihui 劉子惠.

Liu Hui 劉輝 i.e. Liu Shan 劉輝. -HHS 14/4:563.

Liu Hui 劉悝 see Liu Kui 劉惔.

Liu Hui 劉恢 i.e. Liu Li 劉理. -HHS 8:334.

Liu Huwei 劉虎威 (d.109). Son of Liu Qing the King of Qinghe, he succeeded his father in 106/107. He died without heirs, and the Dowager Deng arranged for Liu Yanping to maintain the succession. -HHS 55/45:1804.

Liu [Huzi] 劉胡子; Zhao. Early in 24 Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, was under pressure from Wang Lang and his partisans. There was some suggestion that he should abandon the north and return to the territory about Chang'an, but Pi Tong stressed the strength of his position as a commissioner of Han, and observed that people were supporting Wang Lang because many of them believed that he was indeed a son of the Former Han Emperor Cheng.

In the course of his argument, Pi Tong remarked that in the previous year a certain Liu Huzi and others had published false divinations [卜 bu] in support of Wang Lang's claim. -HHS 2:14.

It has been suggested that Liu Huzi was the same person as Liu Lin 劉林/臨, and that Liu Lin's style was Huzi. It appears more likely that they were different men: Liu Lin being the son of Liu Yuan 元 the King of Pinggan 平干, who died in 56 BC [HS 14:412; QHX:402]; and Liu Huzi the son of a concubine of a king of Zhao. -HHS 1A:11, HHS 12/2:479, 501.

Liu Ji 劉稷 (d.23); Nanyang. A kinsman of Liu Bosheng and one of his divisional commanders, in 23 he was on campaign against Wang Mang's forces in Nanyang. Hearing of the election of Liu Xuan, the Gengshi Emperor, as chief of the rebel party, he commented angrily on the failure of Liu Bosheng, original leader of the alliance, to receive the appointment which was his just reward. When his remarks were reported to Liu Xuan, his first response was to offer him appointment as a general, but Liu Ji refused. Liu Xuan gathered several thousand men to arrest and execute Liu Ji; Liu Bosheng pleaded for his life, and he too became implicated. Both men died together. -HHS 14/4:552; Bn 54:121.

Liu Ji 劉吉. As Minister of the Imperial Clan in 41, Liu Ji was sent with the Staff of Authority to accompany the Excellency Dai She and take back the seal of appointment from the deposed Empress Guo of Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 10A:406.

Liu Ji 劉姬, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 59 she was appointed Senior Princess of Huojia in Henei. She married Feng Zhu. -HHS 10B:459.

Liu Ji 劉吉, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Zhang, in 93 she was appointed Princess of Yin'an in Wei. -HHS 10B:461.

Liu Ji 劉基 (d.87). Son of Liu Mu, he succeeded his father as King of Beihai in 74.

Liu Ji died without sons, but Emperor Zhang did not formally abolish the state, and in 90 Emperor He restored the inheritance through Liu Wei, son of Liu Mu by a concubine and half-brother of Liu Ji. -HHS 14/4:557; Bn 54 appendix # 153.

Liu Ji 劉季 see Liu Fu 劉孚, maternal uncle of Jia

Kui. -SGZ 15:480.

Liu Ji 劉基. Administrator of Liaoxi about 180, Liu Ji was found guilty of some wrong-doing. He was taken by cage-cart to the capital and then exiled to Rinan. He was escorted to Luoyang by his officer Gongsun Zan, and while still on the road to the south he was pardoned and allowed to return. -SGZ 8:239, XC 4:13a, HHSJJ 73/63:2584 Hui Dong quoting Yingxiong ji.

Liu Ji 劉基 [Jingyu 敬興] (185-233); Donglai. Eldest son of Liu Yao, Liu Ji carried out the rites for his father's funeral in 198, then came into the hands of Sun Ce and lived frugally with his brothers.

Sun Quan admired Liu Ji and favoured him with staff appointments; when he took title as King of Wu he named him as a minister. On one occasion Liu Ji prevented Sun Quan from killing Yu Fan in a drunken rage.

After Liu Ji's death Sun Quan had his own son Sun Ba 霸 marry his daughter. -SGZ Wu 4:1186.

Liu Ji 劉琦 see Liu Qi 劉琦.

Liu Ji 劉奇 see Liu Qi 劉崎/琦. -LS 27:3b.

Liu Ji 劉績 miswritten for Liu Xu 劉續 the King of Anping.

Liu Jia 劉嘉 [Xiaosun 孝孫] (d.39); Nanyang. Liu Jia's father Xian 憲 was a younger brother of Liu Chang 敞, Marquis of Chongling district in Caiyang county of Nanyang under Former Han. Liu Jia was thus a second cousin to Liu Xuan, future Gengshi Emperor, and a more distant kinsman of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, and his elder brother Liu Bosheng. Liu Xian, however, died when Liu Jia was young, and Liu Jia was brought up by Liu Qin 欽, father of Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu, and after his death by Liu Qin's brother Liu Liang.

Liu Jia was a kindly and generous man, and while his cousin Liu Shun was about the same age as Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, Liu Jia appears to have been close to Liu Xiu's elder brother Bosheng; about 12 he spent time with him at Chang'an, studying the History and Chunqiu.

In the winter of 22 Liu Jia was among the first to join the Han rebels against Wang Mang under the command of Liu Bosheng; his wife and children were slain in the defeat at Xiao-Chang'an. When Liu Xuan was proclaimed as the Gengshi Emperor in 23, Liu Jia was appointed a lieutenant-general and named a minister, and after the capture of Wan city a few months later he was enfeoffed as a titular marquis and made a chief general. Later that year he attacked the local leader Yan Cen in the west of Nanyang and forced his surrender.

When the Gengshi Emperor established his capital at Chang'an early in 24 he enfeoffed Liu Jia as King of Hanzhong and sent him as a chief general, bearing the Staff of Authority, to establish his capital at Nanzheng on the upper Han River. Later that year Liu Jia made friendly contact with Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time commissioner in the north of the Yellow River, and he sent Jia Fu, Chen Jun and Zhu You to join his service: all three became valued officers of Lu Xiu.

Liu Jia's troops are said to have numbered several hundred thousand, but early in 26, as Yan Cen rebelled again and came west into Hanzhong, he put Liu Jia's army to flight, captured Nanzheng and took over the commandery. He pursued Liu Jia into Wudu, but Li Bao, an officer of the late Gengshi Emperor, came to rescue him. Yan Cen was defeated and driven north into Tianshui on the upper Wei, but in the mean time Gongsun Shu had sent his general Hou Dan to take Nanzheng. Naming Li Bao as his Chancellor, Liu Jia gathered several ten thousand men and returned to attack Hou Dan. He was unsuccessful and was driven back into Wudu. By this time Yan Cen had returned, and Liu Jia fought several engagements with him. Yan Cen fled once more over the mountains to the north, this time into Youfufeng, where Liu Jia pursued him and defeated him again.

At this point Liu Jia was attacked by an army of the Red Eyebrows, numbered at 180,000 men and commanded by Liao Zhan, who had been leader of the commoners under the Gengshi Emperor. Liu Jia defeated them, and he is said to have killed Liao Zhan with his own hand. He was now able to consolidate his position north of Chang'an and gather grain to feed his men, but his position was vulnerable to the advance of Guangwu's general Deng Yu, and his brother-in-law Lai Xi, with Li Bao and other officers, urged him to make terms. At the same time Guangwu wrote to Deng Yu to say that Liu Jia was a worthy man and an old friend who had unfortunately chosen the wrong side. Deng Yu let these kind remarks be known, and Liu Jia went to surrender.

Joining Guangwu at Luoyang in 27, Liu Jia took part in his campaigns and was later appointed Administrator of Qiansheng, by the mouth of the Yellow River. In 30 he became ill and asked to resign that post; he was brought back to live at the capital.

In 37 Liu Jia was enfeoffed as a marquis in Nanyang, while his son Liu Qiang was also granted a fief. Liu Jia died two years later. -HHS 14/4:567-68*; Bn 54 appendix # 77.

Liu Jia 劉嘉 see Liu Xi 劉喜. -HHS 17/7:656 et alia.

Liu Jia 劉嘉. Son of Liu Fu the King of Pei, in 58 he was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 42/32:1427.

Liu Jia 劉嘉; Donghai. A descendant of Liu Qiang the King of Donghai, Liu Jia became Minister of the Household but was punished when he failed to attend court for New Year's day. -HHS 73/63:2353.

Liu Jia 劉嘉. Son of Liu Yu, he inherited the family fief. -HHS 14/4:562; Bn 54 appendix # 159.

Liu Jian 劉堅. Son by a concubine of Liu Zhi the King of Chengyang, he was a half-brother of Liu Ping, who was the son of Liu Zhi's chief wife. When Liu Zhi was on his deathbed in 35 he returned his insignia of royalty, seeking only to maintain the rites of his ancestors through a marquisate. In 37 Liu Ping was duly enfeoffed as marquis of a county in the former kingdom, while Liu Jian received a district fief. -HHS 14/4:562; Bn 54 appendix # 108.

Liu Jian 劉建 probably miswritten for Dou Jian 竇建. -HHS 41/31:1417, but cf. JJ at 1506.

Liu Jian 劉建 (d.61). Son of Emperor Ming by an unknown concubine, in 60 he was enfeoffed as King of Qiansheng. He died young in the following year. -HHS 50/40:1667*.

Liu Jian 劉堅 (d.124). Son of Liu Chang the King of Liang, he succeeded his father in 98.

Liu Jian was succeeded by his son Kuang, and seven other sons later received district and village marquisates. -HHS 50/40:1677-78.

Liu Jian 劉儉. Son of Liu Su the King of Donghai, in 127 he was made a marquis by Emperor Shun. His fief was later granted additional households in recognition of his filial and generous conduct. -HHS 42/32:1426.

Liu Jian 劉建 (d.151). Son of Liu Zheng the King of Hejian, he succeeded his father in 141.

Liu Jian was succeeded by his son Liu Li. -HHS 55/45:1808.

Liu Jian 劉堅. Son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, and younger brother of his successor Liu Ding, in 146 he and eight other brothers were made village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Jian 劉堅, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Huan, perhaps by his concubine the Lady Feng II, in 164 she was appointed Senior Princess of Yingyin in Yingchuan. -HHS 10B:462.

Liu Jiande 劉堅得, the Lady, see Liu Xiande 劉賢得.

Liu Jiang 劉疆 see Liu Qiang 劉疆.

Liu Jie 劉接 (d.24). Son of a former king of Guangyang, in 24 Liu Jie responded to the call of the pretender Wang Lang and raised arms in Ji county against Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time commissioner in the north for the Gengshi regime. Unable to compete with the popularity of the rebel cause, Liu Xiu was compelled to flee to the south.

Soon afterwards troops from Yuyang and Shanggu led by Wu Han and Jing Dan slaughtered Wang Lang's supporters in the north, and in the summer Wang Lang was destroyed. Liu Jie no doubt died during this period. -HHS 1A:12; Bn 54:69.

Liu Jie 劉節. In HHSJJ 42/32:1523 Shen Qinhan notes a private genealogy which has Liu Jie as the son of Liu Ding, King of Pei, and the father of Liu Ding's successor Liu Gai. Jie, however, was the posthumous title of Liu Gai, and a later chronicler has mistakenly interpolated it. A similar error was made concerning Liu Ding: see sub Liu Li and XTS 75B:3437.

Liu Jie 劉節; Ji'nan. A man of powerful family, about 210 Liu Jie was Registrar of the commandery. He had a large body of retainers, who evaded their corvée duties and frequently acted like bandits, but he used his official position to protect them.

The county magistrate Sima Zhi determined to end this corrupt arrangement, and impressed a number of Liu Jie's men as soldiers. Liu Jie hid them and sent an Investigator to look for charges against Sima Zhi. Sima Zhi then reported the whole matter to the Administrator Hao Guang, and presented a catalogue of Liu Jie's offences. Hao Guang decided in favour of Sima Zhi, and made Liu Jie a conscript himself. -SGZ 12:386-87.

Liu Jinbo 劉進伯. XTS 75B:3437 says that Liu Jinbo was a son of Liu Mu 穆 and that he became General on the Liao. During a campaign against the Xiongnu, however, he was defeated and captured, and was held prisoner at Gu mountain 孤山, presumably the ridge near present-day Houma in Shanxi. He had a son Shili, and a grandson Wuli, who took Dugu 獨孤 "Lonely Orphan" as their clan name and rose to high rank in the non-Chinese state. Qubi, ruler of the remnant Xiongnu state for Cao Cao at the end of Han, was a son of Wuli and great-grandson of Liu Jinbo.

Although it is possible that a Chinese officer could have been captured by Xiongnu during the rebellion of the early 140s, it is hard to believe that he could have been held in captivity by a government which was ultimately under the control of Han. The story appears designed to give an ancient Chinese imperial ancestry to a non-Chinese clan.

Liu Jing 劉荆 (d.67). Son of Emperor Guangwu by his Empress Yin, in 39 Liu Jing was named Duke of Shanyang and in 41 his title was advanced to King.

Like his other full brothers, Liu Jing remained at the capital until the death of Emperor Guangwu in 57. At that time he sent a letter to his half-brother the former Heir Liu Qiang, purporting to come from his uncle Guo Kuang, the brother of the former Empress Guo. In this remarkable document Liu Qiang was urged to rebel against his replacement Liu Zhuang, now emperor, while various real and mystical signs were listed to support such an action.

Liu Qiang immediately sealed the letter and sent it to the throne, and though Emperor Ming kept the affair secret, he removed Liu Jing from the capital to a county close by. In the following year, as Liu Jing continued to consult astrologers and make strange plans, his fief was transferred from Shanyang to the lesser and further territory of Guangling, and he was ordered to go there.

Some time in the early 60s Liu Jing called up a physiognomist, pointed out the resemblances between his features and those of the late Emperor Guangwu his father, and asked whether he should raise troops in his own cause. As the savant reported this to the court, Liu Jing became frightened and went to prison of his own accord. Again Emperor Ming kept the matter quiet, but ordered that Liu Jing should be kept under surveillance.

Eventually, in 67 it was reported that Liu Jing had arranged for shamans to hold sacrifices and utter curses. An investigation found that the allegations were true and recommended that Liu Jing be executed. When Emperor Ming was reluctant, his ministers pointed out that it was a matter of state, not of personal affection. Liu Jing was sentenced, but committed suicide.

Bielenstein suggests that Liu Jing was mentally deranged, which seems a fair assessment. At the same time, the problem which Emperor Ming encountered with this superstitious brother probably added to his anger when he had to deal with the allegations against his other siblings, Liu Ying, Liu Kang and Liu Yan 延. -HHS 42/32:1446-49*; Bn 67:31-32.

Liu Jing 劉京 (d.81). Son of Emperor Guangwu by his Empress Yin, in 39 Liu Jing was named Duke of Langye; in 41 his title was advanced to King.

A man of filial piety and good conduct, fond of classical learning, Liu Jing was a favourite of his elder brother Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming, who treated him more generously than anyone else. In 59 Liu Jing's fief was enlarged by six counties from Taishan and Donglai. In 62 he went out to his state, where he delighted in embellishing the palace at his capital, Gong, aided by the treasure of the late Empress Yin which was passed to him in full by the emperor. Liu Jing presented several poems, rhapsodies and hymns to virtue, and Emperor Ming admired them and had them preserved in the archives. He and his brothers attended court on occasion, and in 72 he was called to meet the emperor during his tour of the east.

Liu Jing's fief included a temple to Liu Zhang 劉璋, King of Chengyang 城陽 under Former Han [QH:405-406], and about 80 reports were brought to Liu Jing that the spirit of the site had warned that his palace was unhealthy and dangerous. He obtained permission from Emperor Zhang to exchange five of his counties for two others in Donghai and to shift his residence to Kaiyang in Langye, which was evidently regarded as more fortunate. When Liu Jing died soon afterwards, his tomb-land was specially incorporated into Kaiyang.

Liu Jing was succeeded by his son Yu, and thirteen other sons and two nephews were later granted fiefs. -HHS 42/32:1451*.

Liu Jing 劉旌 (d.114); Hanzhong. Well-respected locally, Liu Jing was appointed to the staff of the Administrator Zheng Qin. After Zheng Qin was killed by rebel Qiang in 110, Liu Jing joined Cheng Xin and other officers in an oath of vengeance, and when the Qiang came again four years later they all fought against them. The army was successful, but the oath-bearers were killed. [On the date of the campaign see sub Cheng Xin.]

In 118 an imperial letter ordered a grant of grain to the families of the heroic band. -HYGZ 2:16, 10C: 169.

Liu Jing 劉荆. Younger son of Liu Hong the King of Zhongshan, in 141 he was granted a marquise. -HHS 42/32:1450.

Liu Jing 劉靚. Nothing is known of his career, but Liu Jing is said to have kept excellent records. -XC 8:2b.

Liu Jing 劉靖. In 185 Liu Jing was a senior major under the command of Dong Zhuo in Liang province. When Dong Zhuo was sent by Zhang Wen to attack the Qiang, he left Liu Jing behind with four thousand men as rear-guard. Though he was blocked by the enemy, he was able to withdraw without great difficulty because the threat from Liu Jing's men prevented them from committing their main force against him.

As Sun Jian was approaching Luoyang in 191, Dong Zhuo described this strategy to his assistant Liu Ai and observed that Sun Jian had similar plans at that time. -SGZ Wu 1:1098.

Liu Jing 劉靖; Lujiang. An émigré, Liu Jing was well-treated by Sun Jiao, Sun Quan's commander in the west about 215, and was a devoted officer. As an aide responsible for planning, he later served Sun Jiao's brother Huan with similar commitment. -SGZ Wu 6:1207-08.

Liu Jingzhou 劉荊州 [Liu of Jing province] see Liu Biao 劉彪.

Liu Jingzong 劉景宗; Guangling. Administrator of Shanyang in the latter part of the second century, Liu Jingzong was a satisfied patient of Hua Tuo. -HHS 82/72B:2736.

Liu Jiuchang 劉久長, the Lady. Daughter of Liu Qing the father of Emperor An, after her brother acceded to the imperial throne in 106 she and her sisters were given titles and estates as princesses, and after the death of the regent Dowager Deng in 121 she was named Senior Princess of Puyang in Dong commandery. She married Geng Liang. -HHS 55/45:1804, 10B:457, 19/9:713.

Liu Ju 劉拘. Son of Liu Du and grandson of Liu Zhong, he succeeded to the family fief in Lujiang. -HHS 42/32:1430.

Liu Ju 劉據. Minister of Finance about 133, Liu Ju was accused of some fault. He was called to the Imperial Secretariat, reprimanded and subjected to a beating.

Zuo Xiong, Director of the Secretariat, protested to Emperor Shun that a Minister held one of the highest positions in the empire and such treatment was inappropriate. It had been introduced only by Emperor Ming, and there was no precedent in the ancient codes. The emperor agreed, and physical punishment was no longer applied in such cases. -HHS 61/51:2022.

Liu Ju 劉矩 [Shufang 叔方]; Pei. A nephew of the Excellency Liu Guang, Liu Ju was ambitious, but he resented the fact that his father Liu Shuliao had not received any advancement so he refused to have any dealings with the local authorities. Early in the reign of Emperor Shun, Liu Guang's colleagues Huan Yan and Zhu Chong had Liu Shuliao appointed as a Consultant, and Liu Ju then accepted nomination as Filial and Incorrupt.

As a magistrate in Chenliu, Liu Ju improved people's customs, inspiring some to improve their filial conduct, while he heard accusations only in private, to discourage tale-tellers. It was claimed, in cliché style, that if anyone found something on the road he would seek out the owner and return it. After four years Liu Ju left his post on the death of his mother.

Liu Ju was later nominated as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright by the Excellency Hu Guang, and after further appointments he became Director of the Imperial Secretariat in the early 150s. A man of direct honesty, he fell out with the General-in-Chief Liang Ji and was sent away to be Chancellor of Changshan. He left that office on grounds of illness, but was reluctant to return home, because Liang Ji's brother-in-law Sun Zhi was now the Chancellor of Pei; he therefore stayed with friends in Pengcheng.

A year or so later Liang Ji was somewhat reconciled, and Liu Ju took a senior post on his staff. He was again appointed Director of the Secretariat, and later became Minister of the Imperial Clan and then Minister of Ceremonies. Having evidently avoided implication in the fall of Liang Ji, in 161 Liu Ju succeeded Huang Qiong as Grand Commandant. For about a year he joined Chong Gao and Huang Qiong, who returned briefly to Excellency rank, in an attempt to restore good order to the state. Their work was widely respected, but their opponents used a series of fires as portents to argue for their dismissal. Emperor Huan at first refused but in 162, after rebellion broke out among the southern tribes of Jing province, Liu Ju was dismissed.

Liu Ju became a Palace Counsellor. When Dou Wu and Chen Fan controlled the regency for Emperor Ling in 168, he was re-appointed Grand Commandant. After the fall of the reformist party later that year, he was dismissed on account of an eclipse. He now received permission to retire from office altogether, and he died at home.

During his time in high office Liu Ju had recommended many worthy gentlemen and scholars, and he is classed by Fan Ye as a Benevolent Official 循吏. -HHS 76/66:2476-77*.

HHS 66/56:2164 says that as Excellency over the Masses about 166 Liu Ju joined Chen Fan and Liu Mao in a joint memorial on behalf of Chen Jin and other Administrators who had killed in defiance of an amnesty. Liu Ju, however, was not an Excellency at this time, and was probably not involved in the controversy: deC 89:375-376.

Liu Ju 劉據 (d.185). Son of Liu Zun the King of Langye, he succeeded his father in 138.

Liu Ju was succeeded by his son Rong. -HHS 42/32:1452.

Liu Ju 劉據. Though Liu Ju was the eldest son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, he did not succeed him at his death in 145; his younger brother Liu Ding was granted the fief. In 146 Liu Ju and eight brothers were made village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Ju 劉舉 i.e. Liu Zheng 劉政/正.

Liu Jugong 劉巨公; Hanzhong. Sometime Minister Herald, Liu Jugong was the father of the Lady Liu Taiying. -HYGZ 10C:170.

Liu Jun 劉均 (d.25). As the Red Eyebrows approached Chang'an in 24, the Gengshi Emperor sent Liu Jun with Wang Kuang and Cheng Dan to guard Hedong and Hongnong, north and south of the Yellow River.

Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, sent Deng Yu west with a large army and he laid siege to Anyi the capital of Hedong; the city held out, but Deng Yu defeated an army under Fan Can. In the summer of 25 Wang Kuang, Cheng Dan and Liu Jun made a further attack. They gained initial success, but were then heavily defeated by Deng Yu. Liu Jun was captured and killed. -HHS 1A:23, 16/6:600-01.

Liu Jun 劉鈞. Chief Clerk to Dou Rong, Commandant of the Dependent State of Zhangye, in 29 Liu Jun was sent as head of a delegation from the warlords of the northwest to acknowledge the rule of Emperor Guangwu at Luoyang and to confirm their rejection of Wei Ao's plans for independence. The accession was welcomed most warmly. -HHS 23/13:798-800, 34/24:1166.

Liu Jun 劉均; Pei. In 82 Liu Jun was Administrator of Zuopingyi when Song Yang, father of the disgraced imperial concubines Song, was arrested by the authorities of his home commandery Youfufeng. Liu Jun addressed them on his behalf, and through his efforts and those of the former magistrate Zhang Jun, Song Yang was released. -HHS 55/45:1800.

Liu Jun 劉鈞 (d.117). Son of Liu Xian the King of Chen, he succeeded his father in 96. Clever but cruel, he usurped imperial prerogatives and bullied his ministers. He intensely disliked the Lady Li Yi, widow of his late father, and in 99 he had his retainer Wei Jiu kill her and members of her household. Wei Jiu was arrested, and Liu Jun, anxious that he might be implicated, sent another client to kill him in prison.

The affair was discovered, and Liu Jun was punished by the loss of three counties from his fief.

Liu Jun later took the Lady Li Niao, who had formerly been in the imperial harem, as a secondary wife 小妻. He was again punished by the loss of three counties.

Liu Jun was succeeded by his son Song. -HHS 50/40:1668-69.

Liu Jun 劉雋. At the time of the Liang province rebellion in the 180s, Liu Jin was a county magistrate in Wuwei. Qu Sheng of Jincheng attacked and killed him. -SGZ 8:262.

Liu Junshi 劉君世. Administrator of Yongchang about 146, Liu Junshi had a snake cast from local gold as a present for the General-in-Chief Liang Ji. Chong Gao, Inspector of Yi province, intercepted the gift and reported it, so it was placed in the official treasury. -HHS 56/46:1827, 63/53:2093.

Liu Kai 劉愷 [Boyu 伯豫] (d.124); Pengcheng. Son of Liu Ban, Liu Kai was a student and protégé of Ding Hong. When his father died in 78 Liu Kai should have inherited his marquisate, but in obedience to his father's testament he ceded it to his younger brother Liu Xian. Ten years later the matter was raised by senior ministers at court, and Emperor Zhang, admiring Liu Kai's generosity, issued special orders for him to take the fief. Liu Kai, however, would not accept.

In 98 Jia Kui sent in a memorial praising Liu Kai's conduct, and Emperor He ordered that he be appointed a gentleman cadet. He then became a Palace Attendant, and was respected at court for his conduct. He transferred to a colonelcy in the Northern Army, and in 101 he became Minister of the Imperial Clan. He later left that office, was again appointed Palace Attendant, and was once more a colonel in the Northern Army.

In 107 Liu Kai became Minister of Ceremonies, in which office he was noted for his concern for tradition and his attention to promoting worthy men from retirement and obscurity. In 112 he was promoted to Excellency of Works, and in 115 he became Excellency over the Masses.

In 116 Liu Kai persuaded the regent Dowager Deng that senior officials should be required to withdraw from public life during the three-year mourning period for the death of a parent: hitherto only junior officers had observed mourning, while senior officials were not permitted to do so. The change was intended to encourage junior officers to take advantage of the provision and thus encourage moral standards, and though it was argued in court that it would disrupt the government, Liu Kai argued that setting a good example was more important than administrative convenience. The policy, however, did prove impracticable: it was rescinded in 121, revived in 154, but suspended once more in 159.

When Ren Shang, successful commander against the Qiang, was accused of embezzlement, bribery and extortion in 118, members of the Deng family of the Dowager sought to protect him, and they were supported by Liu Kai's colleagues the Excellencies Ma Ying and Li He. Liu Kai insisted that the charges against Ren Shang must be pressed: the general was executed and his property was confiscated. Ma Ying and Li He were reprimanded, and all at court admired Liu Kai's determination.

In 120 Liu Kai resigned his office on grounds of illness. A special edict approved his request, and he was rewarded with 300,000 cash, a pension equal to the salary of a 1,000-shi official, and an annual offering of meat and wine from the Intendant of Henan. When Emperor An took personal power after the death of the Dowager Deng in 121, he sent specially to enquire after Liu Kai's health and added further gifts and rewards.

In the following year the Grand Commandant Ma Ying was dismissed, and, after an eloquent recommendation from Chen Zhong of the Imperial Secretariat, Liu Kai took his place.

At this time there arose the case of Fan Bin, Commandant of Juyan, who had been convicted of bribery. Some fifteen years earlier, at the beginning of the reign of Emperor An, Shusun Guang the Chancellor of Qinghe had been found guilty and both he and his sons had been proscribed from office. The other Excellencies and the Minister of Justice believed that a similar penalty should be applied to the family of Fan Bin, but Liu Kai argued from the classics that punishment for wrong-doing should affect only the individual, not his descendants, and the emperor agreed.

In 123 Liu Kai supported the proposal of Dan Song and Shi Yan that the current Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar should be changed to accord with the apocrypha. Zhang Heng and other rationalists argued that the changes would only add errors and that the apocrypha were unworthy of serious attention, but in a wide-spread debate Liu Kai presented the majority view that the Taichu 太初 [Grand Beginning] system of Former Han, abandoned forty years earlier, should be restored, with adjustments for the apocrypha. Chen Zhong, however, opposed any change, and the Sifen calendar was maintained.

Later that year Liu Kai again sought leave to retire on grounds of ill health, and Emperor An reluctantly approved, with repeated instructions for the Intendant of Henan to present annual gifts. When Liu Kai died at home some twelve months later, imperial officials attended his funeral, special regalia was provided from the imperial workshops of the Eastern Garden 東園, and his family received half a million cash and a thousand bales of cloth. -HHS 39/291306-10*; Vervorm 90:121, 155, Loewe 86C:300, Bn 54 appendix # 144.

Liu Kai 劉開 or Liu Gong 恭? (d.131). Liu Kai was a son of Emperor Zhang by the Lady Shen. His half-brother Emperor He enfeoffed him King of Hejian in 90, creating the fief from the territories of Lecheng, Bohai and Zhuo. Liu Kai remained at the capital until the emperor's death in 106, when the regency government of the Dowager Deng ordered him to go to his fief. He was admired there for his modest conduct.

Liu Kai's grandson was Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, who was brought to the imperial throne in 146. In the following year Liu Kai was awarded posthumous imperial honours. Liu Hong, Emperor Ling, who came to the throne in 168, was Liu Kai's great-grandson by a different lineage. -HHS 55/45:1808-09*, 7:287-88.

Surprising as it may seem, though he was the grandfather and great-grandfather of two emperors it is possible that the major texts have recorded the personal name of this man wrongly.

1. HHS 42/32:1444 tells how Emperor Huan granted the kingdom of Rencheng to Liu Bo, who is described [in a corrupted text] as the son of Liu Gong the Filial King of Hejian 河間孝王恭. "Filial," however, was the posthumous title of Liu Kai, and there is no other reference to a king of Hejian named Gong.

2. HHS 55/45:1810 refers to Liu Kai 開 the King of Ji'nan; but this man was a direct descendant of the former King of Hejian, and should not have had the same personal name [see sub voce].

I have accepted the many references to Liu Kai in the annals of HHS and the biography in HHS 55/45, but it is possible that the personal name of the first King of Hejian was Gong 恭.

Liu Kai/Gong 劉開/恭, wife of: see the Lady Zhao 趙 II.

Liu Kai 劉愷; Yingchuan. About 150 Liu Kai was well known for his personal qualities. He was one of the few to recognise the potential of his kinsman Liu Tao. -HHS 57/47:1842.

Liu Kai 劉凱. Son of Liu Duan the King of Dongping, he succeeded his father in 179. He held his fief for more than forty years, but when the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, Liu Kai and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 42/32:1442.

Liu Kai? 劉開. Son of Liu Yun, he succeeded as King of Ji'nan in 207 after his father was killed by Yellow Turbans. When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, he and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 55/45:1810.

As the commentator Hui Dong points out in HHSJJ 55/45:1951, this man was a lineal descendant of Liu Kai the first king of Hejian; he should not have had the same personal name. There is evidently an error in the record, but there is no other reference to the man, so we cannot judge what his true name was. See also sub Liu Kai the King of Hejian.

Liu Kang 劉康 (d.97). Son of Emperor Guangwu by his first Empress Guo, in 39 Liu Kang was named Duke of Ji'nan. In 41 his title was advanced to King, and in 52 he was sent to reside in his territory. In 54 his fief was increased by six counties from Pingyuan, and in 57 his son De became a marquis.

Liu Kang behaved badly in his territory, and he recruited numbers of clients and retainers in order to oppress his subjects and neighbours. In 71 he was accused of treasonous contact with Yan Zhong and other members of the alleged conspiracy about Liu Ying the King of Chu. Because of their close relationship and affection, Emperor Ming forbade further investigation, but Liu Kang's fief was reduced by five counties.

The young Emperor Zhang was fond of his uncle, and Liu Kang resided for some time at the capital in the late 70s: see sub Zong Yi. In 83 Liu Kang's territory was restored, and he became celebrated for his wealth, with many palaces, 1,400 male and female slaves, over a thousand horses, and vast tracts of private farmland. He continued, however, to act extravagantly and viciously, without restraint, and though he paid lip service to the criticisms of his Tutor He Shang, he never changed his conduct.

Liu Kang was succeeded by his son Cuo, and seven of his younger sons were later enfeoffed as marquises. -HHS 42/32:1431-32*; Bn 67:27-34.

Liu Kang 劉伉 (d.93). Senior son of Emperor Zhang by an unknown concubine, in 79 he was enfeoffed as King of Qiansheng. His half-brother Emperor He treated him with the courtesy due an elder brother; he resided at the capital all his life and was buried near Luoyang. -HHS 55/45:1797*.

[Liu?] Kang 劉亢. A son of Liu Shang the King of Rencheng, and younger brother to his successor Liu An, in 110 he was enfeoffed as a district marquis. -HHS 42/32:1443.

HHS refers to this man only by his personal name: he is described as younger brother of a certain Fu 福, who was mother's younger brother 母弟 to Liu An. The Harvard and Kyoto indexes interpret this as indicating that Fu was a brother by the same mother 同母弟, and therefore had the surname Liu. Commonly one would understand 母弟 as referring to a maternal uncle, but there is no indication of the family name of Liu An's mother and thus none to any alternative surname for Fu or his brother Kang.

Liu Kang 劉康 (fl. 140) see Liu Bing 劉秉.

Liu Kang 劉康 (d.144). Administrator of Lingling, in 144 Liu Kang was found guilty of having executed innocent people. He died in prison. -HHS 6:276.

Liu Kang 劉康, King of Hejian, see sub Liu Yu 劉廆.

Liu Kongci 劉孔慈; Beihai. Fast-talking but of limited real ability, in the early 190s Liu Kongci and Wang Zifa were favourites of the Chancellor Kong Rong. -SGZ 12:372.

Liu Kuan 劉寬. In 76 Liu Kuan was Minister of Finance when the new Emperor Zhang called for nominations of Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright. Liu Kuan recommended the scholar Lu Pi. -HHS 25/15:883.

Liu Kuan 劉寬 [Wenyao 文饒] (120-185); Hongnong. Son of the former Excellency Liu Qi, Liu Kuan studied the New Text History according to the school of Ouyang Gao, the Poetry according to Han Yan and the Book of Changes according to Jing Fang. He was also skilled in mathematics and in divination by the stars and by the wind. Noted for his exemplary leniency and courtesy, he ran a private academy, then served at the capital in the 150s under the government of Liang Ji and became a member of the Imperial Secretariat. Having served as Chancellor of Donghai, he returned to be Director of the Secretariat in 165, and was later Administrator of Nanyang, where he encouraged learning and took part in scholarly discussions.

At the beginning of the reign of Emperor Ling in 167, Liu Kuan returned to Luoyang as a Palace Attendant, then became a colonel in the Northern Army and held a series of ministerial posts. He was Grand Commandant in 176, but was demoted the next year on account of an eclipse, or possibly on account of ill health. He was re-appointed in 179, but left office after another eclipse two years later.

Liu Kuan was known in the capital for his tolerance, for his informal conduct, and for his sympathy for his servants. He also enjoyed wine. On one occasion when he was Grand Commandant he fell into a drunken sleep during a court assembly, but when the emperor chided him he explained that he was over-awed by the responsibility of his great position.

Perhaps guided by astrology, Liu Kuan gave warning of the threat from the Yellow Turbans. His colleague Yang Ci had also sent in a memorial and in 184, when Emperor Ling proposed to reward him, Yang Ci asked to share his enfeoffment; this was done.

When he died in the following year Liu Kuan received special honours, and over three hundred students and officials, many of high rank, contributed to a stele in his honour. -HHS 25/15:886-888*, XC 1: 5a, LS 11:1a-6a, LX 12:5b-18b.

Liu Kuang 劉匡; Nanyang. Younger brother of Liu Mao, he joined the rising of the Liu clan against Wang Mang, and was enfeoffed as a marquis in 26. A modest man, he became Minister of the Imperial Clan under Emperor Ming. -HHS 14/4:564; Bn 54 appendix # 58.

Liu Kuang 劉匡. As a General of the Household in 49 he served under Ma Yuan against the non-Chinese people of Wuling. -HHS 24/14:843, 86/76:2832; Bn 67:70.

Liu Kuang 劉匡 (d.135). Son of Liu Jian the King of Liang, he succeeded his father in 124.

Liu Kuang left no sons when he died, but Emperor Shun granted the fief to his younger brother Cheng. -HHS 50/40:1678.

Liu Kuang 劉曠 see Liu Ping 劉平.

Liu Kui 劉攄 (d.172); Hejian. Son of Liu Yi the Marquis of Liwu, Liu Kui was the younger twin of Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, born to the concubine Yan Ming. When Liu Zhi was brought to the throne in 146, Liu Kui was granted succession to the marquissate, and in the following year he was appointed King of Bohai to maintain the lineage of the late Liu Hong, who had died without male heirs.

Liu Kui evidently shared his brother's interest in female companionship. He had at least eleven concubines, and two dozen servants for casual liaisons. Unlike the emperor, who sired just three daughters, Liu Kui had more than seventy children. He was predictably criticised for loose living, and it was said that he acted eccentrically and was proud and presumptuous. The Chancellor of Pingyuan Shi Bi sent in a sealed memorial to complain about Liu Kui, alleging that he disobeyed the law, that he held orgies of music and wine, and that his companions were irresponsible and dissolute. Claiming that the Tutor, the Chancellor and the provincial authorities were unwilling or unable to take corrective action, he pressed for an outside investigation and punitive reform.

The emperor was reluctant, but in 165 it was reported that Liu Kui planned rebellion. The senior ministers asked for his dismissal, and Emperor Huan was compelled to transfer him to the fief of Yingtao, a single county in Julu. Two years later, five days before he died on 25 January 168, the emperor restored Liu Kui to his former state.

It is said that Liu Kui had asked the eunuch Wang Fu to intervene on his behalf, and promised him fifty million cash if he was successful. When the restoration came in a testamentary edict from the ruler's death-bed, it appeared that Wang Fu had played no role in the decision, and Liu Kui refused to pay. Wang Fu was furious and waited for an opportunity of revenge.

The eunuchs Zheng Li and Dong Teng had been in friendly contact with Liu Kui, whom they admired for his free and sometimes frivolous conduct. In the winter of 172 Wang Fu reported them to the Director of Retainers Duan Jiong, Zheng Li was arrested and Lian Zhong, Director of the Imperial Secretariat, presented a false accusation that Zheng Li and his associates were planning to depose Emperor Ling and place Liu Kui upon the throne. Orders were sent for the Inspector of Ji province to arrest Liu Kui and investigate the charge of Impiety, while the Minister Herald was sent out with credentials, accompanied by the Minister of the Imperial Clan and the Minister of Justice. Under this pressure Liu Kui killed himself.

Sadly, the matter did not end there. It is said that the king's eleven concubines, his twenty-four serving women and all his children died in prison, while the Tutor and Chancellor of the kingdom, with their subordinates, were executed for failing to keep proper check upon him, and the state was abolished. Wang Fu and eleven of his associates were enfeoffed for their good work in uncovering the conspiracy, but we are told that the common people of the region mourned the fate of their ruler.

This appalling story may be read from another perspective. As the younger brother of Emperor Huan, Liu Kui was a possible heir to the throne. There was some tradition against it, but there was also precedent for transferring the imperial inheritance sideways: Emperor An had been a member of the same generation as both his predecessor and his immediate successor, while Emperor Huan was actually senior in the clan to his own predecessor Emperor Zhi. Liu Kui, therefore, both full-grown and prolific, could have been a suitable person to restore the dynastic fortunes. Other things being equal, in 168 he would surely have been a more appropriate choice than Liu Hong, youthful scion of an undistinguished cadet lineage. Though Liu Kui's conduct was extravagant, his brother Emperor Huan was notorious for the number of his concubines – the difference was that Liu Kui had produced sons.

Shi Bi's criticisms, moreover, are somewhat unusual. His territory shared a border with Liu Kui's state, and his own king, Liu Shi, was also a brother of Emperor Huan, but Shi Bi had no direct formal contact with Liu Kui, and was not even appointed in the same province; this was remarkable interference in another jurisdiction. Shi Bi had formerly held office at the capital, and he may have been acting for a more powerful interest, or he may have had only innocent, well-meaning intentions. It is notable that the vague allegation levied against Liu Kui in the following year was pressed by senior ministers and recognised only reluctantly by the emperor, and though Liu Kui was later restored his disgrace had ensured that he could not be considered for the imperial succession; this may have been someone's intention.

The history says specifically that Liu Kui was innocent of the treason with which he and his associates were charged in 172, and there is no more reason to believe that he had engaged in any earlier conspiracy against his own brother. The ferocious attack of Wang Fu, aided by Duan Jiong and Lian Zhong, may best be seen as a deliberate act of terror, to strengthen the eunuchs' power at court and to ensure that others would respond more readily to blackmail and extortion in future.

It is said that about 180 Emperor Huan appeared in a dream to Emperor Ling and reproached him with the fate of Liu Kui and of his former Empress Song. -HHS 10B:449, 55/45:1798, 64/54:2109, HHJ 22:57-58; deC 89:344-346, 128-129; Goodrich 66:190-191.

Liu Kui 劉曄. An Internuncio in 169, Liu Kui was sent to award Hu Shuo insignia as Administrator of Chenliu. -Cai 5:33-34.

Liu Kui 劉廞. Chancellor of Donghai in 192, Liu Kui joined a petition organised by Tao Qian, Inspector of Xu province, urging Zhu Jun to lead an army west to rescue the emperor at Chang'an. Nothing, however, came of the proposal. -HHS 71/61:2312.

Liu Kun 劉昆/琨 [Huangong 桓公] (d.57); Chenliu. A distant descendant of Liu Wu 劉武, son of Emperor Wen of Former Han who was enfeoffed as King of Liang, Liu Kun studied the Ritual when he was young, and in the time of Emperor Ping he became a pupil of Dai Bin 戴賓 of Pei, master of the New Text Shi interpretation of the Changes. He was also an expert player of the lute. During the reign of Wang Mang, Liu Kun maintained an academy with over five hundred students. Concerned for the state of true propriety, he held regular ceremonies in spring and autumn for sacrifices and the practice of archery, attracting large numbers of officials and junior officers.

Concerned at his influence, Wang Mang had Liu

Kun and his household arrested and imprisoned, but Wang Mang was destroyed soon afterwards and Liu Kun made his escape and took refuge from the disorders in the hill country south of Henan.

In 29 Liu Kun was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, but went instead to Jiangling on the Yangzi in Nan commandery. He maintained his teaching there, and Emperor Guangwu appointed him as magistrate. The territory had suffered from great forest fires for several years, but when Liu Kun kowtowed towards them, the winds eased and rain fell to put them out.

Liu Kun later came to the capital as a Consultant, and was promoted to Palace Attendant. Though he was the leading scholar of the Shi interpretation of the Changes, and there was an Academician for that field at the Imperial University, it does not appear that he was appointed to the chair, and it is not known who held it at that time.

Liu Kun then became Administrator of Hongnong. In that region tigers had been attacking travellers, but his virtue claimed another miracle, for after he had governed the territory three years the tigers withdrew north across the Yellow River. Emperor Guangwu heard of this and was suitably impressed; the same story is told also of Zong Jun in Jiujiang and other worthy rulers of this period.

In 46 Liu Kuan succeeded Du Lin as Minister of the Household. About this time Guangwu asked him how he had managed to end the fires in the south and drive the tigers from Hongnong. Liu Kun replied that it was just a matter of chance. Those present laughed at him for such a simple and direct explanation, but Guangwu admired him, and put him in charge of the instruction of the Heir and the imperial children who had been enfeoffed as kings and marquises, more than fifty altogether.

In 51 Liu Kun was named a Commandant of Cavalry, but in 54 he asked to retire on grounds of old age. He was awarded a residence at the capital and a life pension; he died three years later. -HHS 79/69A: 2549-51*; Bn 79:186.

Liu Li 劉颯 (d.26); Runan. Liu Li was a grandson of Xianxianchen 先賢揮, a Xiongnu chieftain who surrendered to Han in 60 BC and was enfeoffed as Marquis Who Turns to Virtue 歸德侯. Liu Li succeeded to the title in 31 BC. At some time the family was granted the honour of the imperial surname, possibly by an award of the Gengshi Emperor to Liu

Li himself.

As a General of the Household to the Gengshi Emperor, in the winter of 24 Liu Li was sent with Chen Zun on embassy to the Shanyu Yu of the Xiongnu, offering a new imperial seal on the same terms as had applied in the latter years of Former Han. The Shanyu, however, treated the approach with disdain. Claiming to have played a major role in the overthrow of Wang Mang, he argued that where his ancestor the Huhanye Shanyu had been grateful to Han, it was now appropriate for the Han to pay courtesies to him.

After the fall of the Gengshi regime, Liu Li turned to Guangwu and was permitted to retain his fief. HHS 89/79 says that he led another embassy to the Xiongnu in 30, but Bielenstein observes that this must be wrong, for HS 17 refers to Liu Li's death and the succession of his son Liu Xiang in 26. -HS 17:672 [where the personal name is miswritten as Feng 諷], HS 94B:3829, HHS 89/79:2940; Bn 67:103, 106, QHX:329.

Liu Li 劉鯉 (d.52); Nanyang. Youngest son of Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor, in 26 he came with his mother and his brothers to Emperor Guangwu and was granted a fief. He later became a favoured client of Liu Fu the King of Pei.

In 52 Liu Li arranged the murder of Liu Gong, elder brother of Liu Penzi, as revenge for the death of his father. As Bielenstein observes, the crime made no sense: Liu Penzi had certainly been the nominal leader of the Red Eyebrows when Liu Xuan was destroyed, but Liu Gong had been a most loyal supporter of Liu Xuan.

As a result of this crime Liu Fu spent a few days in prison, but Liu Li and many others were executed and there was a purge of the retainers attached to kings and marquises. -HHS 42/32:1427; Bn 79:138; Bn 54 appendix # 114.

HHS 41/31:1417, and HHJ 10:123, say that in 71 Liu Li was accused of involvement in the alleged conspiracy about Liu Ying the King of Chu; in fact his name has been miswritten for that of his nephew Liu Xun: HHSJJ 41/31:1506.

Liu Li 劉利, the Lady. Third daughter of Emperor He, in 106 she was appointed Princess of Linying in Yingchuan. In 114 she married Jia Jian, who was favoured by the regent Dowager Deng. Possibly at her initial appointment, but more likely at the time of her marriage, she was raised in rank to Senior Princess and granted the revenue from two additional counties [cf. her elder sister the Lady Liu Cheng]. -HHS 10B:461, 17/7:668.

Liu Li 劉理 or Liu Hui 恢 (d.172). Son of Liu De the King of Anping, Liu Li was initially enfeoffed as a marquis. In 148, after the disgrace and death of Liu Suan, King of Qinghe, in the previous year, Liu Li was appointed King of the renamed state of Ganling so that he might maintain sacrifices to Liu Qing the father of Emperor An.

Liu Li was succeeded by his son Liu Ding. -HHS 8:334, 55/45:1806.

Liu Li 劉利 (d.179). Son of Liu Jian the King of Hejian, he succeeded his father in 151. In the following year he was ordered to attend the funeral of the honorary Dowager Yan Ming, mother of Emperor Huan, who was buried in Hejian at the tomb of her late husband the marquis Liu Yi [HHS 10B refers to the King of Hejian as Liu Jian, the father of Liu Li, but this is an anachronism].

Liu Li was succeeded by his son Gai. -HHS 55/45:1808, 10B:442.

Liu Li 劉悝 see Liu Kui 劉惔.

Liu Li 劉釐. In HHSJJ 42/32:1523, Shen Qinhan notes a private genealogy which has Liu Li as the son of Liu Fu, King of Pei, and the father of Liu Fu's successor Liu Ding. Li, however, was the posthumous title of Liu Ding, and a later chronicler has mistakenly interpolated it. A similar error was made concerning Liu Gai: see sub Liu Jie and XTS 75B:3437.

Liu Liang 劉梁 [Jishao 季少] (d.23); Nanyang. Brother of the marquis Liu Chang and of Liu Qing and Liu Hong, Liu Liang had local reputation as a fighting man. As the Han rebellion against Wang Mang broke out in 23, Liu Liang took title as a chief general and raised troops in Yuzhang. He planned to control the lower Yangzi, but died a few months later of rheumatic fever. -HHS 14/4:567; Bn 54 appendix # 50.

Liu Liang 劉良 [Zibo 次伯] (d.41); Nanyang. Uncle of Liu Bosheng and of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu, Liu Liang was nominated Filial and Incorrupt in the time of Emperor Ping of Former Han, and became magistrate of Xiao county in Pei. When his elder brother Liu Qin 欽, father of Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu, died in 4, Liu Liang brought his children to live with him.

In 22, when Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu joined Li Tong and Li Yi to plan rebellion against Wang Mang, Liu Liang was concerned at the risk and expressed anger and disapproval. He did, however, accompany the army, and lost his wife and two sons in the debacle at Xiao-Chang'an.

When Liu Xuan was chosen as [the Gengshi] Emperor in 23, he styled Liu Liang Thrice Venerable of the State, highest titular rank but carrying no real power. Liu Liang accompanied the court to Chang'an.

In 25, as the Gengshi regime was on the point of collapse, Shentu Jian, Wei Ao and other members of the gentry party proposed that Liu Xuan abdicate the throne in favour of Liu Liang; they probably hoped their enemy Liu Xiu might accept the change and defend them against the Red Eyebrows. Liu Xuan rejected the plan, and it is in any case unlikely Liu Xiu would have changed his plans on this account.

After the fall of the Gengshi Emperor Liu Liang joined Liu Xiu, who had now taken the imperial title. In 26 Liu Liang was enfeoffed as King of Guangyang, and three years later was transferred to Zhao. He was sent out from the capital to reside in his fief, but was permitted to return at intervals.

In 35 the Director of Retainers Bao Yong accused Liu Liang of Disrespect for abusing his royal prerogative, insulting the General of the Household Zhang Han and oppressing the gate captain Cen Zun. Guangwu evidently took no action.

In 37 there was a general demotion and Liu Liang was reduced to be Duke of Zhao. He continued to live on his estates, but came to court each year and died at Luoyang about 40, during one of his visits. He was succeeded by his son Xu, who was later restored to the royal title.

As Bielenstein remarks, though Liu Liang was a senior member of the new imperial family, he was not a man of quality or distinction. -HHS 14/4:558-59*; Bn 54:103, 109, 116, appendix # 55, Bn 59:16, 97, Bn 67:24-28, Bn 79:139.

Liu Liang 劉梁. A grandson of Liu Cang the King of Dongping, in 89 he was granted a village marquiseate by the new government of Emperor He. -HHS 42/32:1442.

Liu Liang 劉梁 or Liu Cen 岑 [Manshan 曼山]; Dongping. Liu Liang's father died when he was young, and though his family was well-connected Liu Liang was poor. He sold books for a living.

Concerned at the endemic partisanship of his time, Liu Liang composed Poqun lun 破羣論 "Discussion on Eliminating Factions." Those who read it compared it to the praise and blame style by which Confucius compiled Chunqiu, but the work is now lost. He also wrote Bian-he tong zhi lun 辯和同之論 "Discussion on the Reconciliation of Differences," whose text is preserved in his HHS biography.

In the time of Emperor Huan, Liu Liang was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a county magistrate in the northern commandery of Zhuo. He paid attention to learning, building a great lecture hall and holding regular classes in the Confucian classics. People remembered his work for many years.

Liu Liang received special appointment to the Imperial Secretariat and about 180, after some other posts, he was again appointed as a magistrate, this time in Henei. He died on the road there. His collected works survived to the Sui dynasty. -HHS 80/70B:2635-40*, Sui shu 35:1058.

SGZ 21:601 says that Liu Liang was the father of Liu Zhen 劉楨, and gives his alternative personal name as Gong 恭 rather than Cen 岑. HHS 80/70B says that Liu Zhen was Liu Liang's grandson, and that appears more likely.

Liu Liang 劉良. A physiognomist, about 190 he foretold a splendid future for the Lady Zhen, future wife of Cao Pi. -SGZ 5:159.

Liu Liliu 劉禮劉, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Guangwu, in 41 she was appointed Princess of Yuyang in Nanyang. She married Guo Huang. -HHS 10A:403, 10B:458.

Liu Lin 劉林/臨 [Huzi 胡子? see below] (d.24); Zhao. Son of Liu Yuan 元 the former King of Pinggan 平干 [QHX:402], towards the end of the reign of Wang Mang Liu Lin commanded a group of followers and had wide local influence. When Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came as commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor in 23, Liu Lin approached him but received no recognition.

Liu Lin then turned to his old associate Wang Lang, who had developed a claim to the throne. Liu Lin persuaded Li Yu and Zhang Can, also leading gentry of Zhao, to support Wang Lang, and as Wang Lang took the imperial title at Handan in the winter of 23/24 he named Liu Lin as his Chancellor.

The new regime initially received wide, albeit patchy, support across the northern plain, but by the summer of 24 Handan had fallen to the Gengshi forces, and Liu Lin is not heard of again. -HHS 1A:11-12, 12/2:491.

HHJ 2:14 mentions a supporter of Wang Lang named Liu Huzi. It has been suggested that this refers to Liu Lin, and that Huzi was Liu Lin's style, but this appears unlikely: vide sub voce. -HHSJJ 12/2:479, 501.

Liu Lin 劉麟. As the armies of Emperor Guangwu first took control of Nanyang in 26, Liu Lin was named Administrator of the commandery, but a few months later the local leader Dong Xin led a rebellion which seized Wan city and captured Liu Lin. After the Han general Jian Tan recaptured the city, Liu Lin was presumably restored to his office, but he is not mentioned again; the situation remained precarious until the arrival of the main imperial forces under the emperor himself early in 27. -HHS 22/12:783.

Liu Ling 劉陵 [Mengao 孟高]; Yuzhang. Liu Ling became a magistrate in Changsha. The county had long been plagued by tigers, and people had left to escape them. After Liu Ling had established good government, the tigers went away and the people returned. Liu Ling later became a Palace Attendant at the capital and rode with the emperor in his carriage. -XC 7:3a.

Liu Long 劉隆 [Yuanbo 元伯] (d.57); Nanyang. A man of Anzhong county, from a junior lineage of the marquises of that fief, in 6 AD Liu Long's father Li 禮 was involved in the rebellion of the marquis Liu Chong 崇 against Wang Mang. The affair was discovered and the conspirators destroyed, but though Liu Li was executed Liu Long was spared because he was not yet seven years old.

When he grew to manhood Liu Long travelled to Chang'an to study, and he was probably there when the Han army captured the city in 23 and overthrew Wang Mang: there is no record of his involvement in any earlier stage of the insurrection. The Gengshi Emperor appointed him a Commandant of Cavalry, but he asked leave to return home, and later brought his wife and children to Luoyang.

In 24 Liu Long went north to join Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, and was again made a Commandant of Cavalry. At the end of the year he accompanied the general Feng Yi to the Meng Crossing of the Yellow River, where they faced Zhu Wei, general of the Gengshi Emperor who commanded the garrison in Luoyang. Liu Long had left his wife and children in the city when he went to the north, and Zhu Wei now killed them.

In 26 Liu Long was enfeoffed as marquis of a county in Dongping. He took part in the campaign of Wu Han against the Tanxiang bandits in Wei commandery, then followed He Yan against the imperial claimant Liu Yong. After the death of Liu Yong in 27 Liu Long was made a general, and in 29 he was sent to join Ma Cheng and others in the attack on the pretender Li Xian south of the Huai. Li Xian was destroyed early in 30, and Liu Long was then sent to establish military colonies in Nanyang.

At the beginning of 35 Liu Long joined Cen Peng, Wu Han and others in the great army raised to advance through the Yangzi Gorges against Gongsun Shu. On Cen Peng's recommendation, however, Liu Long stayed behind as Administrator of Nan commandery, returning his military commission.

In 37 Liu Long's fief was transferred to a county in Nanyang and increased in value, but in the autumn of 40 he was arrested for having presented false returns of population and cultivated land. Several officials involved in the scandal were executed, but because of his long connection to the imperial cause Liu Long was sentenced only to dismissal, forfeiture of his fief, and reduction to commoner rank [See sub Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming, and Bn 79:136-139].

In the following year Liu Long was restored as a marquis, though with only a district fief, and in 42 he was named a General of the Household and sent as second-in-command to Ma Yuan on the campaign against the rebel Zheng/Tr'ung sisters in Jiaozhi.

In the summer of 43 Liu Long took a detachment into the hills above the Red River delta, where he defeated a major force of the enemy, capturing the elder sister Zheng Er, killing more than a thousand and forcing a further twenty thousand to surrender. Returning to the capital later that year, he was restored to a county fief in Runan, and after the death of the Grand Marshal Wu Han in 44 he was named General of Agile Cavalry and Acting Grand Marshal.

Eight years later Liu Long returned his insignia and resigned from his high positions. He was rewarded with gifts of ceremonial meat and wine, received the title Servant at Court, excusing him from the obligation to reside at his fief, and was recognised as the spokesman for the marquises at court conferences.

In 54 Liu Long received his final fief, again a county in Runan. At his death in 57, he was awarded a posthumous title, and when Emperor Ming had portraits of his father's great servants painted on the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang, Liu Long was one of those who were honoured. -HHS 22/12:780-81*; Bn 76:26, Bn 79:65, 85, 137-139.

Liu Long 劉隆 (105-106) [Emperor Shang 殤帝, the Young Emperor (reg. 105-106)]. Liu Long was born in 105 to an unknown concubine of Emperor He. Because of a high mortality rate among the imperial children, the infant was taken from the palace and cared for by a commoner.

Emperor He died on 13 February 106, in the winter at the end of the Chinese year 105/106, and that same evening his widow, now the Dowager Deng empowered as regent, brought the three-month-old Liu Long back to the palace and placed him upon the throne. Liu Long was actually the younger of two surviving sons, but the Dowager passed over his elder brother Liu Sheng on the grounds that he was suffering from an incurable illness.

Liu Long himself lived only a few months after his accession. He died on 21 September, just one year old. His tomb, known as the Geng Mound 庚陵, was set close to that of his father in the southeast of Luoyang: Bn 76:118-119. Though his reign was short, it had extended across more than one calendar year, so he received a dynastic title; the character Shang 殤 "Young" refers to his early death [cf. the two Little Emperors Liu Bian and Liu Yi]. He did not, however, receive a temple name. -HHS 4:195-199, 10A:421-23.

Liu Luan 劉鸞. Son of Liu Zi the King of Jibei, he succeeded his father in 162.

Liu Luan was succeeded by his son Zheng. -HHS 55/45:1807.

Liu Mao 劉茂 [Ziwei 子衛]; Taiyuan. Liu Mao's father died when he was young, and Liu Mao cared for his mother. They were poor, and he earned his livelihood by physical labour, but the local people admired his filial devotion. Having studied the Confucian classics of Ritual, he established a school which attracted hundreds of students.

Nominated as Filial and Incorrupt during the time of Emperor Ai of Former Han, Liu Mao served on the frontier at Wuyuan and after a break for the mourning of his mother he became a magistrate in Shanggu. As Wang Mang took the imperial title in 9 AD, Liu Mao resigned his position and retired into the hill country of Hongnong, where he again maintained a private academy.

In 26 he returned to Taiyuan and joined the personal staff of the Administrator Sun Fu. At this time a force of 200,000 Red Eyebrows invaded the commandery, plundering the people and killing local officials. As they attacked the capital, Liu Mao took Sun Fu and his family away from the city to take refuge in a cave. They then went to a neighbouring county, where the party lay concealed during the day and Liu Mao gathered food by night. After three months the bandits left and Sun Fu was able to return to his headquarters.

In the following year an edict called for nominations of Men of Honour, and Sun Fu reported Liu Mao's fine conduct. He was called to the capital as a Consultant and then became Assistant to the Minister of the Imperial Clan. He was later a Palace Attendant, and died in that office. -HHS 81/71:2671*; Bn 54:46.

Liu Mao 劉茂; Taishan. A descendant of Liu Zhang 劉章, grandson of Emperor Gao who became King of Chengyang 城陽, Liu Mao was the second son of Liu Meng 萌, whose marquisate had been abolished by Wang Mang.

About 20, with his elder brother Liu Gong and their younger brother Liu Penzi, he was captured by the Red Eyebrows. Liu Gong became a member of the bandits' leadership group, and joined the court of Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor in 23. Liu Mao and Liu Penzi, however, remained with the Red Eyebrows, who put them in charge of herding cattle under Liu Xiaqing.

In 25, as the Red Eyebrows prepared to attack Chang'an, they had Liu Mao, Liu Penzi and Liu Xiao draw lots to decide who should be emperor; Liu Penzi was successful. He was young and frightened, but Liu Mao persuaded him to accept the title. Liu Mao himself is not heard of again. -HHS 11/1:480; Bn 54 appendix # 142.

Liu Mao 劉茂; Henan. A member of the imperial clan, Liu Mao was a cousin of Liu Xi and a distant relative of Liu Bosheng and his brother Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. When still only eighteen he had gained some authority in southern Henan, taking title as General Who Detests the Xin Dynasty 厭新將軍, and from the end of 23 he expanded operations over Yingchuan and into Runan. He maintained his independence and he paid no allegiance to the new imperial government of Han.

In the autumn of 25 Liu Mao attacked the Ao Granary in Henan, held by Jing Dan and other generals of the newly-proclaimed Emperor Guangwu, but was defeated and surrendered. Some of his men evidently failed to accept this submission, for there are later references to Yan-Xin 厭新 "Detest the Xin dynasty" bandits, presumably former troops of Liu Mao.

As a kinsman of the emperor, and in a move to encourage others, Liu Mao was enfeoffed as King of Zhongshan. In 37, with other kings outside the immediate imperial family, he was reduced in rank to be a marquis. -HHS 14/4:563; Bn 54 appendix # 57, Bn 59:29, 59-60, 105, Bn 67:25.

Liu Mao 劉茂 [Shusheng 叔盛]; Pengcheng. A younger son of Liu Kai, Liu Mao was known for his courtesy and care for ritual conduct. After a series of appointments in the Imperial Secretariat he became Minister of Ceremonies.

In 165 Liu Mao was promoted Excellency over the Masses, and in the following year he and his colleague Chen Fan sought pardon for Cheng Jin, Liu Zhi, Liu Zhao and Huang Fu, heads of commandery units who had taken aggressive action against eunuchs and their associates. Emperor Huan angrily rejected their plea, and other officials then sent in memorials to criticise them. Liu Mao pursued the matter no further, and left his position at the end of the year.

Early in the reign of Emperor Ling Liu Mao returned to office as a Palace Counsellor. He died in that position. -HHS 7:315-18, 39/29:1311; deC 89:63-80, Bn 54 appendix # 157.

Liu Mao 劉瑁; Jiangxia. Youngest son of Liu Yan 焉, in 188 Liu Mao accompanied his father into Yi province and was appointed a senior major. It is said that Liu Yan hoped great things for Liu Mao, for he married him to the Lady Wu, whose physiognomy appeared most favourable. When Liu Yan died, however, Liu Mao's brother Liu Zhang took over the government, and it appears that Liu Mao was incapacitated by some illness.

In 208, as Cao Cao was preparing to take Jing province he accepted overtures from Liu Zhang and granted him and Liu Mao title as generals. Liu Mao died about 210.

Liu Mao's widow, the Lady Wu, later married Liu Bei, but only after Liu Bei had been reassured by Fa Zheng that their lineages were not so close as to impede the marriage. Liu Bei named the Lady as his queen in 219, and as his empress in 221: her physiognomy had indeed proved auspicious, but it had not helped Liu Mao. -HHS 75/65:2432-34, SGZ Shu 4:906; C/C 99:116-117.

Liu Meng 劉猛. Son of Liu An the King of Jibei and younger brother of Liu Zi, in 146 he was granted a village marquisate. -HHS 55/45,1807.

Liu Meng 劉猛; Langye. During the 160s Liu Meng became Minister of the Imperial Clan, but resigned office because he disapproved of the corruption in the court of Emperor Huan.

When Emperor Ling was brought to the throne in 168, and the government was under the control of Dou Wu and Chen Fan, Liu Meng was recalled to appointment as Director of the Imperial Secretariat. Later that year the eunuchs regained power in a coup d'état, but Liu Meng remained in his position.

In 169 Liu Meng joined the minister Zhang Huan in a petition that Wang Chang and Li Ying, known enemies of the eunuch group, should take part in the selection of Excellencies. Cao Jie and the other leading eunuchs had an edict sent down to reprimand them, and Zhang Huan, Liu Meng and their associates presented themselves in bonds at the imperial prison. They were released on payment of a fine equal to three months salary.

About this time, however, Feng Fang, who was the adoptive son-in-law of Cao Jie and a member of the Secretariat, claimed that his colleague Huan Bin and two other officers had formed a faction. Liu Meng admired Huan Bin and took no action, but Cao Jie then claimed that he too was involved in the clique. Liu Meng was arrested, and although he was released soon afterwards, he was dismissed and proscribed from office.

The ban was not permanent, for in 172 Liu Meng was Director of Retainers. At that time the Dowager Dou died, and someone wrote on a palace gate that the eunuchs had killed her and that none of the senior ministers were willing to take action. Liu Meng was ordered to investigate, and to report every ten days. He personally believed that the accusations were well-founded, so he showed no zeal for the inquiry and after more than a month he had discovered nothing. Cao Jie had him demoted to Counsellor Remonstrant, and his place was taken by Duan Jiong, who made an energetic purge of the students of the University.

As Cao Jie pursued Liu Meng with further accusations, he was dismissed and sent to labour service. Many at the court spoke on his behalf, so he escaped punishment and was later restored to office.

We are told that Liu Meng fell foul of Cao Jie on at least three occasions: once in association with Zhang Huan in 169, when he is described as a member of the Imperial Secretariat; then through the ill-will of Feng Fang, when he was Director of that office; and then by unspecified accusations after he had been dismissed as Director of Retainers in 172. In each case he was imprisoned, then released and again given appointment. The order of events above seems most plausible, but the anecdotes are drawn from different places in the histories: though a man of good will in such times might well encounter difficulties, such repetition is suspicious. -HHS 37/27:1262, 65/55:2141, 78/68:2525.

Liu Mengyang 劉孟陽. A former county magistrate in Chenliu, Liu Mengyang was honoured for his service with a stele. -SJZ 8:3a.

Liu Mi 劉彌. Son of Liu Yuan the King of Liang, Liu Mi succeeded his father in 180. Forty years later in 220, as the dynasty of Wei took over, he and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 50/40:1678.

Liu Miao 劉邈. Younger brother of Liu Rong the King of Langye, in 190 he was sent by Liu Rong on a tribute mission to the capital, Chang'an, then under the control of Dong Zhuo. Liu Miao was rewarded with a marquisate and was named Administrator of Jiujiang. It is not known when or whether he took up that appointment.

During his time at Chang'an Liu Miao spoke well of Cao Cao to Emperor Xian. Since Cao Cao was at that time one of the leaders of the eastern rebellion against Dong Zhuo it was presumably a private conversation, but Cao Cao learned of it later and was grateful. In 206 he restored the defunct kingdom of Langye in favour of Liu Xi, nephew of Liu Miao and son of the late King Rong. -HHS 42/32:1452.

Liu Miao 劉邈. Son of Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, presumably by a concubine, in 212 Liu Miao was enfeoffed as King of Jibei, and in the following year he received the cap of manhood.

When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, Liu Miao and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 9:386, 390, 94/4:3105.

Liu Min 劉敏; Nanyang. Liu Min was a son of Liu Hong, who died in rebellion against Wang Mang, and his mother the Lady Fan was a cousin of the mother of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. After Liu Hong's death, the Lady Fan and her sons Liu Min and Liu Guo followed the Gengshi Emperor to Chang'an, but in 26, after his regime was destroyed, they came east to join Guangwu at Luoyang. Liu Min was enfeoffed with a county in Yingchuan.

A scholarly, competent man, early in the reign of Emperor Ming Liu Min became a colonel in the Northern Army. -HHS 14/4:567; Bn 54 appendix # 74.

Liu Min 劉閔. Marquis of Huan in Lujiang, in 41 Liu Min was killed by religious rebels led by Li Guang. It is not possible to tell how this man obtained his fief, nor what lineage he came from. -HHS 24/14:838.

Liu Min 劉閔; Nanyang. Elder son of Liu Ci, in 52 he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 14/4:565; Bn 54 appendix # 116.

Liu Min 劉敏. Son of Liu Su the King of Donghai, in 127 Liu Min was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 42/32:1426.

Liu Min 柳敏 [Yuqing 愚卿] (d.146); Ba. Liu Min served on the staff of his commandery, became Officer of Merit and received acting appointment as a county magistrate. He was then nominated Filial and Incorrupt, but died at that time. Over twenty years later, in 169, magistrate Zhao Tai had a stele set up to his memory. -LS 8:8a-9b, LX 5:3a-b.

Liu Min 劉敏; Lingling. As young men, Liu Min and his cousin Jiang Wan had local reputations. Joining Liu Bei about 210, both men rose in his service, and Liu Min became a leading general of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 14:1057, 1060.

Liu Mingxiong 劉鳴雄 see Liu Xiongming 劉雄鳴.

Liu Mou 劉茂 see Liu Mao 劉茂 [4 entries].

Liu Mu 劉睦 (d.74). Son of Liu Xing and grandson of Liu Bosheng, Liu Mu succeeded his father as King of Beihai in 64. Fond of scholarship when he was young, he became a favourite of his great-uncle Emperor Guangwu, who allowed him to attend discussions at court.

When Liu Zhuang, future Emperor Ming, was appointed Heir in 43, Liu Mu was one of his special companions. He was free to enter the private apartments to read with him, and he took the reins of the princely carriage when he went out. The new regime of Emperor Guangwu forbade members of the imperial clan to establish a network of clients and associates, but Liu Mu's generous nature and the respect he showed for learning meant that he had wide contacts, constantly received visits from scholars, and possessed a broad reputation.

In the time of Emperor Ming the regulations were applied more strictly, and Liu Mu dismissed all his clients and sought to content himself with music. It was his nature to take pleasure in reading, and he continued to do so. When a Palace Counsellor came at the time of the annual New Year greetings, Liu Mu asked what he would say of him at the capital. The officer replied that he would have no hesitation in describing him as loyal and virtuous, and a patron of worthy men. Liu Mu replied that such was the reputation he had acquired in his youth. Since he came to his state he had changed his inappropriate conduct: he now spent his days in idleness, occupying himself with the joys of the hunt and the pleasures of women and song. As Bielenstein observes, such cynical self-disparagement probably reflects the unease felt within the imperial family at Emperor Ming's suspicious nature, which had been nurtured by the alleged plots and treasonous conduct of his brothers Jing, Ying, Kang and Yan.

Despite this self-abnegation, Liu Mu left a quantity of literary and scholarly compositions, including hymns and rhapsodies, with studies of history including a commentary to Chunqiu – all are now lost. He was also widely admired for his calligraphy, and even as he was on his deathbed the emperor sent a special courier to have him write some samples of his cao shu 草書 "Grass Style."

Liu Mu was succeeded by his son Ji, and five other sons were later enfeoffed as marquises. -HHS 14/4:557; Bn 54 appendix # 137.

Liu Mu 劉穆. XTS 75B:3437 says that Liu Mu was a son of Liu Yi 虞 and grandson of Liu Gai/Zheng the King of Pei.

Liu Na 劉納 I. Commandant of Cavalry under Ma Wu in 37, he was stationed on the Hutuo River to guard the North China plain against attacks of the Xiongnu from present-day Shanxi. -HHS 100/10:3221, 1B:61; Bn 67:111-112.

Liu Na 劉納 II (d.179). Transferred from the Imperial Secretariat to a colonelcy in the Northern Army on account of his opposition to the eunuchs, in 179 Liu Na urged Liu He, Excellency over the Masses, to support Chen Qiu and recommend Yang Qiu be reappointed as Director of Retainers, so that he might continue his purge of the eunuchs and their associates. The plan was found out, and when the matter was presented to Emperor Ling as treason Liu Na and others were executed. -HHS 56/46:1834; deC 89:162-163.

Liu Nan 劉男, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Zhang, in 79 she was appointed Senior Princess of Wude in Anping. -HHS 10B:460.

Liu Nu 劉奴, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 60 she was appointed Princess of Pingyang in Hedong and later became a Senior Princess. She married Feng Shun. -HHS 10B:459.

Liu Pan 劉磐; Anding. Nephew of Liu Biao, about 199 he was based in Changsha and raided Sun Ce's positions in Yuzhang. He remained in that post until 208. -SGZ Shu 6:948, SGZ Wu 4:1190.

Liu Pan 劉般 see Liu Ban 劉般.

Liu Pan 劉攀 see Liu Zheng 劉政/正.

Liu Penzi 劉盆子 (7-?); Taishan. Liu Penzi was a distant descendant of Liu Zhang 劉璋, grandson of Emperor Gao, who had played a leading role in the destruction of the Lü 呂 clan of the Dowager of Emperor Gao, and had been made King of Chengyang 城陽 in the eastern region of Qi 齊. The royal lineage continued until the end of Former Han, while Liu Zhang became the subject of a wide-spread cult. [On Liu Zhang, see QHX:405-406.]

Liu Penzi himself was the youngest son of Liu Meng 萌, whose marquise had been abolished by Wang Mang. About 20 he and his elder brothers Liu Gong and Liu Mao were captured by the Red Eyebrows. Liu Gong became a member of the bandits' leadership group, then joined the court of Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor in 23. Liu Mao and Liu Penzi remained with the Red Eyebrows, who put them in charge of herding cattle under the officer Liu Xiaqing.

In 25, as the Red Eyebrows prepared to attack the Gengshi Emperor in Chang'an, a shaman from Qi drummed and danced in honour of Liu Zhang the late King of Chengyang, seeking his assistance for their cause. He then fell into a trance, possessed by the spirit of the king, and told his fellows that they should choose an emperor. When those who scoffed at the shaman were suddenly taken ill, the bandits became frightened and resolved to follow the instructions. As Bielenstein remarks, the shaman may well have been encouraged by some of the gentry who were among the group: proclamation of an emperor would give legitimacy to the cause and might aid their influence with the leadership.

Given the source of the message, it was decided that the chosen ruler must be a descendant of Liu Zhang, and although more than seventy men could claim him as their ancestor, only Liu Penzi, Liu Mao and a former marquis, Liu Xiao, were direct descendants. In the sixth month of 25, at Zheng county in Jingzhao, the Red Eyebrows gathered for the ceremony. Three wooden tallies were prepared, on one of which was inscribed the title "Supreme General" 上將軍. They were placed in a box and after sacrifice to Liu Zhang the three men each took one. Liu Penzi was successful, and he was proclaimed emperor, with the reign title Jianshi 建世 "Inauguration of an Epoch".

If the gentry among the bandits had hoped to set up an effective ruler and a proper court, they were disappointed. Liu Penzi was fifteen years old. Clothed in rags and barefoot, with his hair hanging dishevelled down his back, he showed his fear of the Red Eyebrows even as they sought to pay obeisance. He wanted to cry, and though his brother Liu Mao persuaded him to accept the insignia, he went straight back to his herds. Liu Xiaqing arranged simple regalia: he dressed him in red clothes, gave him a child's cap with his title on the front, and had him ride on occasion in a carriage with red screening and a team of tall horses. Otherwise Liu Penzi tended the cattle and had no part in the counsels of the leaders.

Soon afterwards the Red Eyebrows captured Chang'an and Liu Penzi was brought to the palace. The court and government were in constant turmoil: rival leaders argued and fought for power and booty; the bandits plundered the local people as they liked; and the emperor himself was powerless and frightened of their violence. He did provide some food for the women and courtiers abandoned by the late Gengshi Emperor, but after he left it is said they died of starvation.

His elder brother Liu Gong had now rejoined the Red Eyebrows but, seeing that there was no way to bring the disorganised rabble under control, he urged Liu Penzi to abandon his empty position. At a New Year gathering of 26, Liu Gong abused the leaders for their unruliness and Liu Penzi attempted to give up his insignia. Fan Chong and the other leaders apologised for their behaviour, but they refused to accept his resignation and forcibly tied the seal and ribbon back onto his belt.

A few weeks later, having exhausted supplies in Chang'an, the Red Eyebrows abandoned the city. They travelled west, returned briefly to the capital in the autumn, and surrendered at last to Emperor Guangwu in the spring of 27. Liu Penzi, who had been taken on all their travels, was received with sympathy and treated generously. Still only in his teens, he was appointed to the household of Liu Liang, King of Zhao.

Liu Penzi later lost his sight through illness. At this time, probably about 40, Emperor Guangwu abolished the Office for Price Adjustment and Stabilisation by the great Ao Granary in Henan at the head of the Vast Canal; Wang Mang's policy on this line had been a focus of complaint from his rebel opponents. Guangwu granted Liu Penzi a life pension from the tax revenues of the private markets which replaced the old official system. -HHS 11/1:477-86*; Bn 54 appendix # 143, Bn 59.95-120, Bn 80:169.

Liu Pi 劉辟 (d.200); Runan. Leaders of Yellow Turbans, during the early 190s Liu Pi and his fellows allied themselves with Yuan Shu and Sun Jian, and by the middle 190s they were numbered by the tens of thousands. In the spring of 196 Cao Cao led an army against them; Liu Pi's colleague Huang Shao was killed and the other leaders surrendered.

As Yuan Shao began his advance from the north, Liu Pi and the others supported him and plundered the region about Cao Cao's headquarters at Xu city. Yuan Shao sent Liu Bei to assist them, but their combined forces were defeated by Cao Ren and Liu Pi was killed. -SGZ 1:13, 20, 17:522, SGZ Shu 2:876.

SGZ 1:13 and 17:522 say that Liu Pi was killed in 196, at the same time as his associate Huang Shao, but SGZ 1:20 and Shu 2:876 mention him as leader of the raiders in 200. It is possible the group retained the name of Liu Pi even after his death [cf. the Liang province rebels under "Bian Zhang and Han Sui"], but it is more probable that the first account of his death is premature.

Liu Pi 劉丕 or Liu Ben 本; Donglai. Claiming distant descent from Emperor Gao, he was a noted Confucian scholar. He was nominated Capable and Good, Sincere and Upright, became a county magistrate in Pingyuan and died in office. -SGZ Wu 4:1183, HHS 76/66:2477 [HHS has his personal name as Pi; SGZ presumably avoided taboo on the name of Cao Pi, Emperor of Wei.]

Liu Pian 劉便 see Liu Bianqin 劉便親.

Liu Pianqin 劉便親 see Liu Bianqin 劉便親.

Liu Ping 劉平, initially Liu Kuang 曠 [Gongzi 公子]; Chu. In the time of Wang Mang Liu Kuang was a local officer in his commandery, acting as a county magistrate. He maintained good government and encouraged teaching, so the county became peaceful. Thereafter, whenever there was a local disturbance he was sent as temporary magistrate to settle the trouble, and so the whole territory was in good order.

In the troubles which followed the fall of Wang Mang Liu Kuang's brother Zhong was killed, and Liu Kuang took refuge with his mother in the marshlands. He took Liu Zhong's infant daughter with him, but left his own son behind. His mother wanted to rescue the boy, but Liu Kuang said that there was not enough for all of them, and it was more important to preserve the lineage of his brother.

On one occasion when he was looking for food, Liu Kuang met a group of starving bandits who proposed to eat him. He asked their permission to go back to feed his mother, but promised to return. When he did as he had said, the bandits were amazed at his honesty. They let him go and Liu Kuang presented them with three measures of food which he had collected.

Liu Kuang later returned to local office in his commandery. When the general Pang Meng rebelled in 29 he fought to protect the Administrator Sun Meng. Though he was wounded several times, the enemy admired his loyalty and let him and Sun Meng go. When Sun Meng was thirsty, Liu Kuang gave him his blood to drink, and when Sun Meng died a few days later he escorted his body home for burial.

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, Liu Kuang became Assistant in Jiyin commandery. The Administrator Liu Yu admired him, gave him wide responsibility, and commended him to Emperor Guangwu. About this time his father died – one may wonder where he was during the troubles ten years earlier. Liu Kuang left office, but at the conclusion of the mourning period he became a county magistrate in Jiujiang. He governed generously, making minimal demands on people's time for corvée and other work, and at inspection time it was found that there were no prisoners in his gaol. It was also claimed that he drove tigers away by his admirable government and Confucian teachings. He left office because of illness.

At the beginning of the reign of Emperor Ming, Zhongli Yi of the Imperial Secretariat nominated Liu Kuang and other gentlemen aged more than seventy who had influence for good in their local communities. The men were duly summoned to court for appointment as Consultants, and Liu Kuang later became a Palace Attendant. It was about this time that Liu Kuang changed his personal name to Ping.

In 60 Liu Ping was appointed Minister of the Imperial Clan, and he held that position for eight years. He recommended a number of worthy men for office, including Cheng Gong and Xun Ren. Retiring on account of ill health, he died at home. -HHS 39/29: 1295-97*, XC 2:4b.

Liu Ping 劉平. Liu Ping was a son of Liu Zhi the King of Chengyang by his chief wife. On his deathbed in 35 Liu Zhi returned his insignia of royalty, seeking only to maintain the rites of his ancestors through marquises. In 37 Liu Ping was accordingly enfeoffed with Caiyang county in the former family fief, while his half-brother Jian was granted a district.

Liu Ping was later found guilty of having communicated with kings of the imperial family. His fief was abolished, but Emperor Ming restored him as a marquis in 62. -HHS 14/4:562; Bn 54 appendix # 107.

Liu Ping 劉平. Son of Liu Jing 荆 the King of Guangling, and a younger brother of Liu Yuanshou, Liu Ping and two other brothers were granted district marquises in 71 and were later shown favour by Emperor Zhang. -LS 5:18a, HHSJJ 42/32:1446-47.

Liu Ping 劉平 or Liu Ziping 子平; Pingyuan. Two contradictory stories appear to refer to this man. Dian lue by Yu Huan of the third century, cited in commentary to SGZ Shu 2:871, tells of Liu Bei's involvement against the rebellion of Zhang Chun and Zhang Ju in You province in 187, and prefaces this by saying that Liu Ziping of Pingyuan knew of Liu Bei's military ability and recommended him to the recruiting officer.

The main text of Chen Shou, however, at SGZ Shu 2:872, supported by the Wei shu of Wang Shen and by HYGZ 6:77, describes how Liu Bei held various appointments at county level in Pingyuan, and in 191 became Chancellor of the kingdom in the service of Gongsun Zan. At that time Liu Ping, who had scorned Liu Bei before and was afraid he would take revenge, sent a retainer to kill him. The would-be assassin, however, was so impressed by the courteous reception he received that he could not bear to strike, but confessed and fled. Chen Shou uses the incident as an illustration of Liu Bei's personal charm and authority.

As the modern scholar Zhao Yiqing observes, the stories are so different they must refer to two different men. Alternatively, one or both are false.

Liu Ping 劉馮 (d.200). Son of Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, he was named King of Nanyang in the autumn of 200, but died a few days later. -HHS 9:381.

Liu Pingguo 劉平國. An inscription on a cliff-face composed in 158 describes Liu Pingguo as General of the Left at Qiuqi [Kuqa] 龜兹左將軍. -Nagata 94:132; Chavannes 07:208.

Liu Pu 劉輔 (d.116). Son of Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, he insulted a secondary wife 小妻 of his brother Liu Ding. Angry at such conduct, his father locked him in the stables. Liu Pu managed to escape. He attempted to present a petition to the local magistrate, but Liu Gong sent an officer with a posse of slaves, recaptured Liu Pu and upbraided him for having sought to evade his authority. Liu Pu killed himself.

The matter was reported to the throne by the Chancellor Zhao Mu, but Liu Gong was not punished. -HHS 50/40:1671, DGHJ 7:5a; Ch'ü 72:305.

Liu Pu 劉普 (d.123). Grandson of Liu Mu the King of Beihai, he was a marquis within that state. In 107 the Dowager Deng granted him the succession to the kingdom.

Liu Pu was succeeded by his son Yi. -HHS 14/4: 558; Bn 54 appendix # 164.

Liu Pu 劉普. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates, after the destruction of Liang Ji in 159 Liu Pu was granted a district marquise by Emperor Huan. When Zuo Guan and the other eunuch leaders were disgraced in 165, Liu Pu was reduced to a secondary fief. -HHS 78/68:2520-22.

Liu Pu 劉普; Jiujiang. A distant descendant of Emperor Guangwu, he was the father of Liu Ye. As she was dying, his wife warned their sons of his weaknesses. -SGZ 14:442-43.

Liu Pu 劉普, wife of: see the Lady You 攸. -SGZ 14: 442-43.

Liu Qi 劉奇 see Liu Qi 劉崎/琦. -LS 27:3b.

Liu Qi 劉崎/琦 [Shujun 叔峻]; Hongnong. Minister of the Imperial Clan in 129, Liu Qi was promoted to Excellency over the Masses. In 131 and 132 he was involved in the reconstruction of the Imperial University.

In 134 Emperor Shun asked Zhou Ju of the Imperial Secretariat to identify bad officials, and Zhou Ju named Liu Qi as a man who had held office for many years without useful effect. Charges were brought and Liu Qi was dismissed, together with his colleague Kong Fu. -HHS 6:257-64, 25/15:886, 61/51:2026, and the stele of his son Liu Kuan in LS 11, cited by HHSJJ 25/15: 943 Qian Dazhao in jiaobu. LS 27:3b lists a stele to an Excellency over the Masses Liu Qi 奇, this is probably miswritten.

Liu Qi 劉琦 (d.209); Shanyang. Eldest son of Liu Biao, but less favoured than his brother Zong, Liu Qi was sent out as Administrator of Jiangxia. As Liu Biao was dying in 208, Liu Qi was kept from any contact with him and Liu Zong then received the succession as Governor of Jing province.

Cao Cao arrived soon afterwards. Liu Zong surrendered, but Liu Qi joined Liu Bei to oppose him with the support of Sun Quan. The allies were successful at the Red Cliffs on the Yangzi, and Liu Bei gave Liu Qi title as Inspector of Jing province. Liu Qi died in the following year. -HHS 74/64B:2423-24, SGZ 6:213-14.

Liu Qi 劉契. Son of Liu Yao the King of Pei, Liu Qi succeeded his father. When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, he and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 42/32:1428.

Liu Qi 劉杞 see Liu Si 劉祀.

Liu Qian 劉乾 (d.164). Son of Liu Hong the King of Zhao, he succeeded his father in 116. In 118 the Chancellor of Zhao reported that during the time of mourning for his father Liu Qian had betrothed himself to one of his former concubines. Furthermore, he was in the habit of leaving his palace and journeying incognito. The court ordered that his fief be reduced by one county.

Dongguan Hanji has details of one incident. Liu Quan had left his own state and journeyed south to Wei, where the party halted for the night at a village post station. Liu Quan sent his slave Jin to commandeere some bedding, but Jin was accosted by one of the post officers, and stabbed him. As Liu Quan and his escort were chased by a posse, he first sought to escape involvement by hiding Jin, but then strangled him and left the body hanging on a tree by the roadside.

One of Liu Qian's gentlemen at court, Cheng Jian, known for his moral worth, was appointed as Tutor. He took the king in hand, and Liu Qian became a reformed character. Cheng Jian reported to the court on the improvement, and the county which had been taken was restored. In 146 one of Liu Qian's sons was granted a village marquisate.

Liu Qian was succeeded by his son Yu. -HHS 14/4: 559, DGHJ 7:2a; Bn 54 appendix # 155.

Liu Qian 劉虔. Inspector of Liang province in 177, Yang Xi was praised as an honest and worthy official in a memorial presented by Cai Yong. -HHS 60/50B: 1995.

Liu Qiang 劉彊 (25-58). Eldest son of Emperor Guangwu by the Lady Guo, when his mother was named empress in 26 he was appointed Heir. In 41, however, the Lady Guo was deposed and two years later Liu Qiang was removed as Heir. Changing places with his half-brother, the future Emperor Ming, he became King of Donghai.

In 52 Liu Qiang and other sons of the Lady Guo were sent to their fiefs, but Guangwu, recognising that Liu Qiang had lost the inheritance through no fault of his own, granted him special privileges of guards and music, enlarged his fief by almost thirty counties, and included the territory of Lu so that he might live in the splendid Lingguang Palace [of Numinous Brilliance].

Soon after the death of Guangwu in 57, Liu Qiang's half-brother Jing sent him a forged letter, purporting to come from his maternal uncle Guo Kuang, and citing favourable omens that he should take the throne from the new emperor. Liu Qiang immediately sealed the document and forwarded it to the throne. The affair was covered up, but Liu Jing was exiled from the capital. In the following year Liu Qiang died of illness, having presented an eloquent apologia. Emperor Ming admired his loyalty, granted special honours and paid respects to his tomb. -HHS 42/32:1423-25*; Bn 67:27-32.

Liu Qiang 劉膺; Nanyang. Son of Liu Jia, his father was awarded a county marquisate in 37, and soon afterwards, evidently as a further sign of favour, Liu Qiang received a second, albeit lesser, fief. -HHS 14/4: 568; Bn 54 appendix # 110.

Liu Qianqiu 劉千秋. Son of Liu Xian the King of Chen, in 100 Liu Qianqiu was made a marquis. A colonel of the Northern Army under Emperor An, he was one of the scholars who worked in the Eastern Pavilion on the official edition of the Confucian classics [see sub the Dowager Deng Sui], and he also began the compilation of a comprehensive guide to the offices of Han. He was later Minister of the Imperial Clan and then Minister of the Guards. -HHS 50/40:1668, 114/24:3555-56.

Liu Qin 劉欽 (d.4 AD); Nanyang. Descended in a cadet line from Emperor Jing of Former Han, Liu Qin married the Lady Fan Xiandu and fathered Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu, the future Emperor Guangwu. He was a county magistrate under Former Han, but died while his children were still young. -HHS 1A:1, 1B:86, 14/4:555-56; Bn 54:98-99, Bn 67:21.

Liu Qin 劉勤 [Bozong 伯宗]; Jiangxia: i.e. Xia Qin from Jiujiang. -XC 8:10b and HHSJJ 32/22:1188 Hui Dong.

Liu Qing 劉慶 [Weng'ao 翁敖] (d.25); Nanyang. Son of Liu Ren 仁, Marquis of Chongling district in Caiyang county of Nanyang, Liu Qing was a younger brother of Liu Chang, who succeeded to the fief. He was also a first cousin of Liu Zizhang 子張, the father of Liu Xuan who became the Gengshi Emperor, and a second cousin of Liu Qin 欽, father of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu.

As Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor established his capital at Chang'an in 24 he named Liu Qing as a king. Liu Qing stayed with the court at Chang'an, and as the Red Eyebrows took over the capital in 25 he was killed by mutinous troops. -HHS 14/4:566; Bn 54:96-98 and appendix # 51, Bn 59:53.

Liu Qing 劉慶. Chief general under the Gengshi Emperor in 24, with Chen Kang the Administrator of Wei commandery he was left in charge at Ye city in Wei commandery while Xie Gong went to attack the Youlai bandits in Henei. Though they were supposed to be allies, Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, ordered his officers Wu Han and Cen Peng to take Ye city. When Wu Han sent a skilled envoy to persuade Chen Kang to change sides, Chen Kang took Liu Qing prisoner and opened the gates to Wu Han. -HHS 18/8:677-78.

Liu Qing 劉慶 (78-106). Third son of Emperor Zhang, Liu Qing was born of a Lady Song, protégée of the Dowager Ma [HHS 55/45 says that his mother was the elder of two sisters, but XHS 4:3b says that it was the younger]. In 79 Liu Qing was named Heir, but the Dowager died soon afterwards and in 82 the Empress Dou compelled the two ladies Song, Liu Qing's mother and aunt, to commit suicide. Liu Qing was replaced as Heir by Liu Zhao, future Emperor He, and named King of Qinghe.

Sensible enough to the danger he was in, Liu Qing never spoke of his mother. His father the emperor still felt affection and sympathy for him, and ordered he be treated in the same manner as the new Heir. Indeed, despite the bitter rivalry of factions in the harem, and their own changed fortunes, the two princes were brought up together and remained close friends all their lives.

When Liu Zhao came to the throne in 88 he continued to treat Liu Qing with the utmost favour and confidence, and as they grew older Liu Qing was allowed his own apartments within the palace. As the emperor was preparing to attack the over-powerful Dou family in 92, he wanted to study the chapter on the imperial relatives by marriage from the Han shu, lately compiled by Ban Gu. He dared not trust his own attendants, in case they guessed his intentions, so he asked Liu Qing to borrow a copy from their half-brother Liu Kang the King of Qiansheng, then pass it on in secret. And Liu Qing served as a contact with the eunuch Zheng Zhong, who played a leading role in the coup. When the enterprise was successful, Liu Qing left the palace to take up his own residence at the capital; he was granted slaves, horses, carriages, money, silken cloth and other treasures, while his eunuchs and other attendants also received rewards.

A sickly man, Liu Qing was always treated with great kindness by his half-brother the emperor, but from the time he was deposed as a child he never felt secure. He resented the fact that his mother the Lady Song had not been buried with the proper rites, and he held ceremonies for her in private. When the Dou family was overthrown he first sent his former wet-nurse to offer sacrifice at her burial place, and when the Dowager died in 97 he sought permission to hold formal mourning for the Lady Song. Emperor He approved, and granted him access to the imperial workshops for the occasion, but Liu Qing was afraid to ask for fuller rituals lest it appear he was competing on his mother's behalf with the emperor's own mother the Lady Liang.

About 100, Liu Qing's grandmother the Lady Wang became ill. Widow of Song Yang, and mother of the Ladies Song, Liu Qing's mother and aunt, she had remained in Youfufeng after her husband's death, but Liu Qing claimed she could not receive proper medical treatment there, and he asked that she be permitted to come to Luoyang. Emperor He approved, and this became the occasion for a partial rehabilitation of the Song family as Liu Qing's uncles Song Yan and his brothers were also brought to the capital and appointed gentlemen cadets.

In 103 the senior officials recommended that Liu Qing and the other kings be sent to their states, but Emperor He would not agree. He took his half-brothers with him on tour to the clan tombs in Nanyang, and awarded each of them a platoon of imperial guards. Some time later Liu Qing's Palace Tutor, the eunuch Wei Xin, was found to have embezzled vast quantities of cash. Investigators were sent, and Liu Qing was asked why he had not reported the situation. He replied that members of his staff were appointed directly by the imperial court, and he was not entitled to question or investigate their activities. Emperor He was pleased with the reply, and he awarded Liu Qing all of Wei Xin's ill-gotten gains.

When the emperor died in the winter of 105/106 Liu Qing mourned him deeply, and again became ill. As the Dowager Deng set the Young Emperor Liu Long upon the throne, she also sent the kings away to their fiefs, and Liu Qing left the capital to take up residence for the first time in his state of Qinghe. He died there at the end of the year, in the winter of 106/107. His funeral was arranged by the Dowager's brother Deng Zhi; it was attended by high officials and displayed insignia of rank and favour.

In the mean time the infant emperor Liu Long had died, and Liu Qing's eldest son Liu You, who had been kept back at the capital when Liu Qing was sent away, was placed upon the throne. Another son, Liu Huwei, succeeded to the kingdom of Qinghe, while a third, Liu Changbao, was named King of Guangchuan, with territory taken from this brother's state. Liu Qing's eleven daughters were each given titles and estates as princesses.

In 121, as Emperor An took full power after the death of the Dowager Deng, he awarded his father posthumous imperial honours. -HHS 55/45:1799-1804*.

Liu Qiu 劉求; Nanyang. Eldest son of Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor, who died in 25, in the summer of 26 he came with his mother and his brothers to Emperor Guangwu at Luoyang. He was enfeoffed as Marquis of Xiangyi county in Chenliu in order to maintain sacrifices to his father the late emperor, and was later transferred to Chengyang county in the commandery of that name, later part of Jiycin [some editions have the fief as Xianyang near Chang'an, the ancient capital of the Qin dynasty]. -HHS 11/1:476; Bn 54 appendix # 112.

Liu Quan 劉全 (d.79). Son of Emperor Zhang by an unknown concubine, he was enfeoffed as King of Pingchun county in Jiangxia in 79, but died later that same year, leaving no sons. He was buried near Luoyang, and the kingdom was ended. -HHS 55/45:1799*.

Liu Qun 劉羣 miswritten for Liu He 劉郃. -HHS 102/12:3258.

Liu Rang 劉讓 (d.26); Zhending/Changshan. Brother of Liu Yang ["Goitre Yang"] the restored King of Zhending, Liu Rang held a marquisate, probably granted by the Gengshi Emperor in 23. In 25 he and his cousin Liu Xi joined Liu Yang in planning insurrection against Emperor Guangwu, but they were trapped by a false invitation from the envoy Geng Chun, and all were killed. Because the rebellion had not actually broken out, however, Liu Rang's son was permitted to succeed to his fief. -HHS 21/11:764.

Liu Rong 劉榮 (d.164). Son of Liu Guang the King of Pei, he succeeded his father in 144.

Liu Rong was succeeded by his son Zong. -HHS 42/32:1428.

Liu Rong 劉容 (d.193). Son of Liu Ju the King of Langye, he succeeded his father in 185. In 190 he sent his younger brother Liu Miao with tribute to the government at Chang'an, then under the control of Dong Zhuo.

At Liu Rong's death the state was ended, but it was later restored to the benefit of his son Liu Xi. -HHS 42/32:1452.

Liu Ru 劉儒 [Shulin 叔林] (d.169); Dong. Having received high praise for his speech and conduct from the moral judge Guo Tai, Liu Ru was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. He was graded First Class, and after some intermediate appointments he became a Palace Attendant.

During the reign of Emperor Huan, presumably in the 160s, after a number of bad omens a call was issued for men of Direct Speech. Liu Ru presented a sealed document in ten sections, identifying problems of the government and recommending reforms. His words were loyal and direct, too much of the latter for the imperial taste, and he was sent out to be Chancellor of Rencheng.

Liu Ru was later recalled to the capital as a Consultant, but in the Second Faction Incident of 169 he was arrested and killed himself.

Some information about this man is confused. His biography in the HHS chapter on the Proscribed Party, HHS 67/57:2215, says that Liu Ru came from Dong commandery. In JJ at 2424-25, however, Wang Wentai cites XC 4:9a, which describes him as a man from Guanghan, and says that he was an Administrator of Dong commandery, not a native of it, and that his tenure there was enlivened by a flock of auspicious red birds. On the other hand, Liu Congchen observes that if Li Ru had come from Guanghan it is surprising that he has no biography in Huayang guo zhi; he therefore discounts Xie Cheng.

Again, though HHS 67/57:2187-88, says that Liu Ru was numbered among the popular heroes in lists compiled by reformists and students of the Imperial University, in JJ at 2396 Hui Dong cites a list which replaces his name with that of Liu Yi 翊, and a couplet giving his style as Zixiang. See also sub Liu Yi II.

Liu Rui 劉叡. About 200 Liu Rui was Administrator of Wuling. On instructions from the warlord Governor of Jing province Liu Biao, Liu Rui prepared a list of celestial omens, the Jingzhou zhan 荆州占 or Jingzhou xing zhuan 荆州星傳.

Liu Biao himself sponsored another similar work, which appears in some bibliographies under the same title but is also known as Jingzhou xing jing 荆州星經. Both are now lost. -JS 12:322; Ho 66:129.

Liu Rui 劉瑞 miswritten for Liu Duan 劉端, King of Dongping.

Liu Ruo 劉若. In 213, with office as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, Liu Ruo was among the petitioners who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. In 220 he was the leader of a group of 120 officials urging Cao Pi to accept the abdication of Emperor Xian of Han and establish his own imperial state; he was one of the sponsors of a stele commemorating this occasion.

In 213 Liu Ruo's name appeared fifth in a list of thirty, after Liu Xun but before Xiahou Dun. In 220 he was evidently head of a group which wished to be associated with the imperial process but which was not at the centre of the operation: his name appears high on the list of forty-six sponsors of the commemorative stele, immediately after the Three Excellencies and the imperial cousin Cao Ren, and before other imperial kinsmen. Despite this evidence of his importance at the time, however, there is no other record of Liu Ruo; nothing is known of his lineage and/or achievements. - SGZ 1:40, 2:68-69, LS 19:3a; Leban 78:332, Goodman 98:129-130, 196.

Liu Sa 劉颯 see Liu Li 劉颯.

Liu Shan 劉燁 or Liu Hui 輝; Nanyang. Younger son of Liu Xi the King of Sishui, when his father died in 34 he was granted the succession, but only with the rank of a marquis. [Liu Shan's elder brother Liu Zhong had been separately enfeoffed as a king, but his descendants too held only marquises.] -HHS 14/4:563.

Liu Shan 劉禪 or Liu Chan [Gongsi 公嗣] (207-271); Zhuo: Later Sovereign of Shu-Han 蜀漢後主. Son of Liu Bei by his concubine the Lady Gan, Liu Shan was born when his parents were at the court of the warlord Liu Biao, Governor of Jing province; though he would have been formally registered as coming from his father's home commandery of Zhuo, he was never in that territory.

When Liu Bei went west to Yi province in 211 his principal wife the Lady Sun returned east to her brother Sun Quan. She tried to take Liu Shan with her, to serve as a future hostage, but her cortège was intercepted by Zhao Yun and Zhang Fei, who brought the boy back.

When Liu Bei proclaimed himself King of Hanzhong in 219 he named Liu Shan as his Heir, and when he took the imperial title in 221 he confirmed the appointment, while also naming the Imperial Chancellor Zhuge Liang as the young man's principal mentor. Liu Bei had earlier adopted a son, Liu Feng, and Liu Shan had two younger half-brothers, Liu Yong 永 and Liu Li 理, born of different women, but there was no debate about the succession, and when Liu Bei died in 223 Liu Shan duly took the throne.

On the other hand, though Liu Shan was already seventeen sui, Liu Bei had given Zhuge Liang full regency powers, and Zhuge Liang controlled the government until his death in 234. His dominance was followed by that of Jiang Wan, and it was not until the latter's death in 246 that Liu Shan took formal authority. Even then, despite his maturity, Liu Shan proved an unimpressive ruler. He was accused, probably correctly, of being more interested in his harem and his personal pleasure than in the responsibilities of government; he gave excessive power to favourites and eunuchs, and he appears to have been fairly stupid.

More generally, despite years of effort, the state of Shu-Han was never able to break out from the west, and the forces of Wei were able to maintain and consolidate their positions. In 263 a successful invasion and attack on Chengdu brought the abdication of Liu Shan, and he ended his days at Luoyang as a pensioner of Jin. -SGZ Shu 3*.

Liu Shan 劉禪, first empress of: see the Lady Zhang 張 VIII, daughter of Zhang Fei.

Liu Shan 劉禪, second empress of: see the Lady Zhang 張 IX, daughter of Zhang Fei.

Liu Shang 劉尚 also as Liu Yu 禹 (d.48); Nanyang. Though Emperor Guangwu addressed Liu Shang as a member of the imperial clan in 36 [see below], little is known of his origins. He is described as General Who is Firm and Majestic in the early 30s, and nowhere appears under any other title.

In 33 Liu Shang was one of the generals under the command of Lai Xi sent to take over the former territory of Wei Ao in the Wei valley. After the successful conclusion of that campaign, he went with Lai Xi to attack the Qiang and other non-Chinese and rebels of Jincheng, Longxi and Wudu, and then, still under Lai Xi's general command, he and Ma Cheng took over all Wudu commandery.

Liu Shang and his men were then transferred to the middle Yangzi, and in the winter of 35/36 he was senior assistant to Wu Han in the second wave of attack against Gongsun Shu from the east. As they approached Chengdu from Guangdu, Liu Shang was ordered to camp on one side of the river while Wu Han set himself on the other. The two columns were connected by a pontoon bridge, but though each was within ten kilometres of the enemy capital they were twenty kilometres apart; at the end of autumn Gongsun Shu's army under Xie Feng attacked and surrounded both camps. After three days, Wu Han was able to extricate his men and join Liu Shang, and their combined forces defeated the enemy.

Liu Shang then stayed to face Gongsun Shu's men at Chengdu while Wu Han returned to Guangdu, but in the winter of 36 he returned to the attack and Gongsun Shu was killed. As Chengdu surrendered, Wu Han slaughtered the enemy leaders and their families and allowed his troops to sack the city. Appalled at the news, Emperor Guangwu wrote to Liu Shang to ask how a member of the imperial clan could have tolerated such atrocity.

When the local officer Shi Xin rebelled in Shu commandery in 42, Liu Shang again accompanied Wu Han on an expedition to reconquer the territory.

Having stormed Chengdu and killed Shi Xin, Liu Shang remained at Chengdu while Wu Han dealt with remnant resistance along the Yangzi.

In the autumn of 43 Liu Shang was ordered to deal with a rebellion of non-Chinese tribes in Yizhou commandery led by Dongcan. The trouble had broken out in the previous year, no doubt echoing the disturbance caused by Shi Xin. With 13,000 militia from Shu, Guanghan and Jianwei, Liu Shang marched south through Yuexi.

Ren Gui, the non-Chinese chieftain of that commandery, had accepted formal office from Han. He was afraid, however, that his local position would be damaged by this expansion of imperial power, and it is claimed that he conspired with other leaders to offer poisoned wine to the Han troops, then attack the survivors. This may be no more than an excuse, but Liu Shang made a surprise attack on Ren Gui at Qiongzhou city, killed him and sent his family and household to Chengdu.

Aided by auxiliaries from Yuexi, Liu Shang engaged the insurgents in Yizhou through all of 44. The enemy took refuge in fortified settlements in the hill country, but Liu Shang captured their supplies of grain and animals, and at the beginning of 45 he took Buwei, by present-day Baoshan in Yunnan, on the edge of the former Han frontier [at that time part of Yizhou commandery, Buwei became the capital of the new commandery of Yongchang under Emperor Ming]. Dongcan was killed with seven thousand of his followers, and Liu Shang also took 5,700 captives and seized 3,000 horses and 30,000 head of cattle and sheep. The tribespeople now submitted to Han, and the region was settled.

In the spring of 47 there was a rebellion among the non-Chinese of Nan commandery, and Liu Shang was ordered downstream to the middle Yangzi. Bringing some of his men from the west, he put down the disturbance and shifted a number of the people from the region of the Yangzi Gorges west into Jiangxia commandery.

In the winter, far more seriously, the non-Chinese people of the Five Streams region, further south among the hills west of Wuling commandery, embarked on what would become a series of rebellions. Their incursions into Nan commandery were driven back by the general Zang Gong, but they were hardly discouraged and seized Linyuan in Wuling. At the beginning of 48 Liu Shang took ten thousand men by land and water up the Yuan River, tributary of the Dongting Lake. As they entered the gorges of the Wu Stream, they were cut off and surrounded. Liu Shang was killed and his army was destroyed. -HHS 15/5:588, 18/8:681-83, 13/3:543, 1B:75-76, 86/76:2831-32; Bn 59:194-197, Bn 67:66-69.

Liu Shang 劉尚, son of Liu Zhi of Julu, see Liu Xiang 劉向.

Liu Shang 劉商; Nanyang. Son of Liu Min 敏, he succeeded to his father's county marquisate, but this was later changed to the lesser fief which had been held by his uncle Liu Song. The change probably took place in the 70s, for Liu Song's fief was abolished by Emperor Ming on account of his alleged involvement with the disgraced King of Chu, Liu Ying; Liu Shang evidently suffered to some degree for the family problems. -HHS 14/4:565; Bn 54 appendix # 134.

Liu Shang 劉商. Son of Liu Yuanshou, he succeeded to his fief in Guangling about 90. -HHS 42/32:1449.

Liu Shang 劉尚; Nanyang. Younger son of the minister Liu Kuang, Liu Shang became a General of the Household. At the beginning of the reign of Emperor He in 89 he was named General of Chariots and Cavalry under command of the General-in-Chief Dou Xian, and was later Bearer of the Mace.

In 97, as the Qiang leader Mitang brought an army of the Shaodang and other tribes to raid Longxi, Liu Shang was given command as an acting general and sent west with thirty thousand men, combining troops from the Northern Army, garrison forces from Chang'an and central China, border levies and non-Chinese auxiliaries. Mitang was defeated in a great battle near Lintao and withdrew across the border, but imperial casualties were so heavy that the army could not follow up its success and retired within the frontier. In the following year Liu Shang was dismissed and imprisoned for lack of zeal. -HHS 14/4:564, 87/77:2883-84; deC 84:81; Bn 54 appendix # 88.

Liu Shang 劉尚 (d.101). Son of Liu Cang the King of Dongping, and a younger brother of Liu Zhong, in 58 Liu Shang was granted a county marquisate.

At the death of their father in 83 Liu Zhong succeeded to the kingdom of Dongping, but in the following year Liu Shang was made King of Rencheng, with three counties taken from the major fief.

Liu Shang was succeeded by his son An. -HHS 42/32:1443*.

Liu Shang 劉商 or Liu Yi 裔 (d.104). Son of Liu Xu the King of Zhao, he succeeded his father in 81. Evidently a superstitious man, on one occasion he sought to avoid an illness by taking up residence in the offices for education, but was prevented from doing so by the Chancellor Lu Pi.

Liu Shang was succeeded by his son Hong, and four younger sons later received village marquisates. -HHS 14/4:559, 25/15:883-84; Bn 54 appendix # 120.

Liu Shang 劉尚; Donglai. Youngest son of Liu Yao, he held military office under Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 4:1186.

Liu Shao 劉邵. A son of Liu Shang 劉尚, King of Hejian under Former Han who was deposed by Wang Mang, Liu Shao was restored to the royal fief by Emperor Guangwu in 31, but in 37, with other kings outside the immediate imperial family, he was reduced in rank to be a marquis. -HHS 1B:53, 61; Bn 67:25.

Liu Shao 劉邵 [Kongcai 孔才]; Zhao. Nominated as Reporting Officer of his commandery about 210, Liu Shao came to Xu city, capital of the Han court under Cao Cao, where he impressed Xun Yu, Director of the Imperial Secretariat, with his good sense.

About 215 Liu Shao was appointed to the offices of the Imperial Counsellor Chi Lü. When Chi Lü left office soon afterwards, Liu Shao joined the household of the Heir, Cao Pi.

Transferred to the imperial library, Liu Shao later became a member of the Secretariat of Wei and was named a Cavalier Attendant. He took part in the great compilation of Huang lan 皇覽 "Imperial Readings", an edition of all previous writings on the classics commissioned by Cao Pi in 220.

During the reign of Cao Rui Liu Shao served as Administrator of Chenliu, and in 234 he advised on the defence of Huai frontier when it was under attack from Sun Quan. He was commissioned to codify the laws, and in 237 he was invited to present a new system for appointing and examining officials; it was rejected by more conservative advisers to the court.

Liu Shao compiled a considerable number of scholarly works, including Renwu zhi 人物志. He was granted enfeoffment, and died some time after 240. -SGZ 21:617-20*.

Liu Shao 劉邵. During the early 220s Liu Shao was a general of Sun Quan's state of Wu. -SGZ Wu 2:1130.

Liu Shao 劉邵/劭 miswritten for Liu He 劉郃. -HHJ 24:287.

Liu Shaogong 劉少公; Liang. Son of the late King of Liang, Liu Li 立, and youngest brother of Liu Yong, Liu Shaogong was named Imperial Secretary and King of Lu when Liu Yong established an independent position in 24. -HHS 12/2:494.

Liu She 劉赦. Son of Liu Tong the King of Fuling, he succeeded his father in 167. He died about 200, leaving no heirs, and the state was ended. -HHS 42/32:1446.

Liu She 劉赦 (d.211). Son of Liu Yu the King of Zhao, he succeeded his father.

Liu She was succeeded by his son Gui. -HHS 14/4:559; Bn 54 appendix # 165.

Liu Shen 劉參 see Liu Can 劉參 [2 entries].

Liu Sheng 劉生, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Shun by the Beauty Yu, she was full sister to the infant Emperor Chong. In 138 she was appointed Senior Princess of Wuyang 舞陰 in Yingchuan. -HHS 10B:440, 461.

Liu Sheng 劉聖 see Liu Wang 劉望.

Liu Sheng 劉勝 (d.113). Elder son of Emperor He by an unknown concubine, because of the high mortality rate among the imperial children he was taken from the palace and cared for by a commoner. He nonetheless became seriously ill, and when his father died in the winter of 105/106 the regent Dowager Deng would not allow Liu Sheng to take the throne: she awarded the succession to his infant brother Liu Long, while Liu Sheng was named King of Pingyuan.

As the Young Emperor Liu Long died a few months later, in the autumn of 106, Liu Sheng was again passed over in favour of Liu You, Emperor An, son of Liu Qing the King of Qinghe.

The nature of Liu Sheng's illness is not known, and it may have been physical or mental. A number of officials believed, however, that it was not so serious as to disqualify him from the succession, and that the Dowager had chosen child rulers as a means to prolong her regency. In the winter of 107/108 the Excellency Zhou Zhang sought to arrange a coup to depose the Dowager and her nominee and set Liu Sheng upon the throne. The plot was found out, and Zhou Zhang killed himself.

Liu Sheng died at Luoyang five years later and was buried near the capital. He left no sons and may not have been old enough to have children. Liu De, son of Liu Chong the King of Le'an, was enfeoffed to maintain his lineage. -HHS 55/45:1810*.

Liu Sheng 劉勝 [Jiling 季陵 or Jilin 季林]; Yingchuan.

Having served as Administrator of Shu commandery, Liu Sheng returned home and lived privately. The Administrator Wang Yu admired his reticence, but when he raised the matter to Du Mi, who was at that time also in retirement, Du Mi criticised Liu Sheng for his failure to provide moral advice on public affairs. -HHS 67/57:2198, FSTY 5:42; Nylan 83:484-486.

Liu Sheng 劉聖 see Liu Wang 劉望. -HS 99C:4193; Dubs 55:468.

Liu [Shengbo] 劉聖博; Wu. Some time in the second century Liu Shengbo discussed local worthies of the region with Administrator Han 韓. No more is known of either man, nor details of their talk, but their conversation was cited in later times, and may be seen as a symbol of the developing interest in local history. -SGZ Wu 12:1324, and see sub Zhang Kai.

Liu [Shenggong] 劉聖公 see Liu Xuan 劉玄 the Gengshi Emperor: HHS and some other texts refer to Liu Xuan by his style of Shenggong.

Liu Shi 劉始. Chieftains of the Red Eyebrows, late in 26 Liu Shi and Wang Xuan held off Guangwu's general Feng Yi at the junction of the Wei with the Yellow River. After two months attack, they were obliged to surrender early in 27. -HHS 17/7:646.

Liu Shi 劉石 (d.70); Nanyang. Son of Liu Zhang 章 the King of Qi, he succeeded his father in 46. In 51 he was ordered to leave the capital and reside in his fief. In 54 his younger brother Zhang 張 was enfeoffed as a full marquis.

Liu Shi was succeeded by his son Huang, and two younger sons were later granted district marquisates. -HHS 14/4:553; Bn 54 appendix # 135.

Liu Shi 劉適; Qinghe. In 26 Liu Shi was Officer of Merit to the Administrator Zhao Gao. He and his colleague Huang Bing planned to embezzle funds for the building of a new yamen, but when the angry ghost of the former Administrator Xianyu Ji came to confront them, both men dropped dead. -SJZ 9:27b-28a.

Liu Shi 劉碩/石 also as Liu Gu 顧: HHS 55/45 has the personal name as 碩, HHS 10B as 石, and HHS 7 as 顧; Hejian. Son of Liu Yi the Marquis of Liwu, after the death of his father about 140 he was granted a district marquisate. In 146 his brother Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, was brought to the throne, and in 148 Liu Shi was enfeoffed as King of Pingyuan to maintain the lineage of his late father, who had at one time held that title.

We are told that Liu Shi was frequently drunk and failed to carry out his duties, so the Lady Ma, widow of Liu Yi, was given charge of his affairs. On the other hand, in 152 Liu Shi was named chief mourner for the funeral of the Lady Yan Ming, former concubine of Liu Yi and natural mother of Emperor Huan; this may have been a formality for a senior member of the family, but it implies that the Lady Yan was also the mother of Liu Shi and that he was not always drunk and incapable.

The further succession to the kingdom is not recorded. In 206 the state was abolished by the government under the control of Cao Cao. -HHS 55/45:1809, 7:292, 10B:442.

HHS 55/45 and HHS 10B say that Liu Shi was a younger brother of the emperor, but HHS 7 and HHS 10B TC refer to him as the elder. We may note that Liu Zhi succeeded to the county marquisate at his father's death, while Liu Shi was granted only a lesser fief; furthermore, when Liu Zhi was named emperor in 146, Liwu was granted to his twin brother Liu Kui. Liu Kui then became King of Bohai in 147, while Liu Shi was not appointed King of Pingyuan until 148. It appears, therefore, that Liu Shi held lower status in the family than Liu Zhi and Liu Kui, and was younger than both of them. On the same principle, though the Lady Ma was appointed as his guardian, she cannot have been his natural mother: regardless of age, if Liu Shi had been the son of Liu Yi's principal wife he would have been granted his father's fief before either of his brothers. From the fact that he was named chief mourner to the Lady Yan, it would appear Liu Shi was her son, and full younger brother to Liu Zhi and Liu Kui.

Liu Shi 劉石 (d.193). In 185 Liu Shi was a leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range. In 193 he was killed by Yuan Shao. -HHS 71/61: 2310-11, 74/64A:2381, SGZ 8:261, 6:194.

Liu Shinan 劉侍男, the Lady. Daughter of Liu Qing the father of Emperor An, following her brother's accession to the throne in 106 she and her sisters were given titles and estates as princesses, and after the death of the regent Dowager Deng in 121 she was named Senior Princess of Nieyang in Nanyang. She married Cen Xi. -HHS 55/45:1804, 10B:457, 17/7:663.

Liu Shou 劉綬 or Liu Huan 緩, the Lady (d.59). Daughter of Emperor Guangwu, in 45 she was named Princess of Liyi in Nanyang. Married to Yin Feng, she was spoilt and jealous, and in 59 her husband killed her. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Liu Shou 劉壽. Son of Liu Xian the King of Chen, in 100 he was made a marquis. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Liu Shou 劉壽 (d.120). Son of Emperor Zhang by his Honoured Lady Shen, in 90 Liu Shou was enfeoffed as King of Jibei by his younger half-brother Emperor He; his territory was taken from Taishan. The emperor kept his brother kings at the capital and did not send them out to their states, and in 103 they accompanied him on a tour to the south. Only in 106, after the Dowager Deng had taken over regency government, were they obliged to leave the court.

At the time of Liu Shou's death, because of troubles on the frontier, the Han court was restricting royal funerary expenses to 100,000 cash and 10,000 rolls of silk for first-generation enfeoffments and half that amount for their successors. Liu Shou was held in such regard, however, that he was allowed three times the regular amount.

Liu Shou was succeeded by his son Deng, and five younger sons were granted small marquisates from the territory of Taishan. In 125 one of these sons, Liu Yi, was brought to the imperial throne by the Dowager Yan and her family; he was known as the Little Emperor 少帝. -HHS 55/45:1807*, 10B:436.

Liu Shou 劉壽 (d.120). Son of Liu Yu the King of Langye, he succeeded his father in 103.

Liu Shou was succeeded by his son Zun, and four younger sons were later granted district marquisates. -HHS 42/32:1452.

Liu Shou 劉授 [Mengchun 孟春]; Pengcheng. Minister of Ceremonies in 122, Liu Shou was promoted to be Excellency of Works. Soon afterwards the Grand Commandant Yang Zhen refused to endorse appointments for a brother of the eunuch Li Run, recommended by the imperial uncle Geng Bao, and a nominee of the empress's brother Yan Xian. Liu Shou, however, gave his approval instead.

After the overthrow of the Yan clan and the establishment of Emperor Shun in 125, Liu Shou was dismissed for his servility to the former ruling clique and for granting office to men of poor quality. -HHS 5: 235, 6:251, 54/44:1763.

Liu Shou 劉壽 [Bochang 伯長]; Changsha. Minister of the Household in 138, Liu Shou was appointed Excellency over the Masses. It is said that his promotion was foretold in a frequent dream he had, of flying in a magical carriage to the north. He left office in 142, possibly as the result of impeachment by the special commissioner Zhang Gang, or because Liang Ji wished to confirm his authority at court. -HHS 6:268-72, HYZ 10B:157 and sub Huan Yuan.

Liu Shu 劉述; Julu. Son of Liu Xiang, he inherited the family marquisate, but in 72 he was accused of involvement in the alleged conspiracy of Liu Ying the King of Chu; the fief was abolished. -HHS 21/11:760.

Liu Shu 劉淑 (d.94). Liu Shu was a son of Emperor Zhang by an unknown concubine. In 90 his half-brother Emperor He enfeoffed him as King of Chengyang, dividing the territory of Jiyin to create the new state. Liu Shu resided at the capital and was buried near Luoyang. He left no sons when he died, so the kingdom was ended and the territory returned to Jiyin. -HHS 55/45:1810*.

Liu Shu 劉淑. Son of Liu Kai the King of Hejian, Liu Shu was enfeoffed as Marquis of Jiedu Village 解瀆亭. When his grandson Liu Hong, Emperor Ling, was brought to the throne in 169, Liu Shu received posthumous imperial honours. -HHS 55/45:1809, 9:327-28.

Liu Shu 劉淑, wife of: see the Lady Xia 夏.

Liu Shu 劉淑 [Zhongcheng 仲承] (d.168); Hejian. Liu Shu's grandfather Liu Cheng had been Director of Retainers, but from the time he was young Liu Shu concentrated upon the study of the Confucian classics. He maintained a private academy with several hundred students, but refused all invitations to local office or to take appointment at the capital.

In 154 there was a call for nominations of men as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright; the minister Zhong Hao recommended Liu Shu. He sought to refuse on grounds of ill health, but when Emperor Huan heard of his fine reputation he sent orders to the local authorities that they should arrange for him to travel to the capital regardless. So Liu Shu came to Luoyang, was graded first for his response to questions, and was made a Consultant. Giving advice on the good and bad points of the government of the day, he explained the meaning of ominous signs and disasters, and all his forecasts proved correct.

Transferred to the Imperial Secretariat, he continued to give excellent and loyal counsel and became a Palace Attendant. Transferred once more to be a General of the Household, he urged the emperor to dismiss his eunuch favourites, and though his proposal was rejected he had worded it so well that he suffered no penalty for his presumption. Treated with respect on account of his fine family background, he was regularly consulted in all difficult and intricate questions at court, while students of the University and junior officers at the capital praised him as one of the ideal men of his time; with the General-in-Chief Dou Wu and the Tutor Chen Fan, he held highest rank in the lists of heroes circulated by partisans of reform.

Despite his opposition to eunuch power and his popularity with the reformists, Liu Shu was not actively associated with the regime of Dou Wu and Chen Fan, who brought Emperor Ling to the throne and initially controlled his government [cf. Liu Shu 儵 below]. After Dou Wu and Chen Fan were destroyed in the autumn of 168, the victorious eunuchs nonetheless laid accusations against him. He was taken to prison and killed himself. -HHS 67/57:2190*, XC 4:5a.

Liu Shu 劉儵 (d.168); Hejian. Having served as Administrator of Taishan, Liu Shu became an Imperial Clerk, member of the Censorate.

When Emperor Huan died without an heir in the winter of 167/168 his Dowager Dou had authority to choose his successor from among any cadets of the imperial house, and she consulted her father Dou Wu. They were most interested in the descendants of Liu Kai, the son of Emperor Zhang who been King of Hejian, and since Liu Shu came from that region they asked for his recommendation. Liu Shu proposed the village marquis Liu Hong, and he was named an acting Household Counsellor and sent with an escort to bring his nominee to the capital. At the beginning of the following year the new Emperor Ling was placed upon the throne, and Liu Shu was appointed a Palace Attendant.

Though we are told that Liu Shu was asked to suggest members of the imperial clan who were noted for their moral qualities, it is difficult to see how he justified the choice of Liu Hong: twelve years old, he came from a very junior lineage, neither his grandfather nor his father had shown any personal distinction, and his later conduct was not exemplary. It appears the boy's chief claim for selection was that he was old enough to avoid the risks of infant mortality and young enough to require the guidance of a regent; so the choice was much to the benefit of the Dowager Dou and her family.

In the autumn, a few months after Liu Hong had been brought to the throne, Dou Wu and Chen Fan were destroyed by the eunuchs. The senior eunuch Hou Lan was jealous of Liu Shu's potential influence with the young emperor, so he had the Director of Retainers impeach him for wrongdoing during his time in Taishan. Liu Shu was killed.

Despite his disgrace, the emperor remembered Liu Shu fondly, and later appointed his brother Liu He as an Excellency. -HHS 8:327, 69/59:2241, 56/46:1834, 113/23:3283.

Liu Shu 劉舒; Donghai. Son of Liu Jia, Liu Shu became Administrator of Danyang. -HHS 73/63:2353.

Liu [Shuliao] 劉叔遼; Pei. Though he came from a distinguished official family, was a brother of Liu Guang the Grand Commandant, and was himself a good scholar and a worthy man, Liu Shuliao had acquired no local reputation and he received no official appointment. Liu Shuliao's son Liu Ju resented this, and himself refused invitations. Early in the reign of Emperor Shun Liu Guang's colleagues, the Grand Tutor Huan Yan and the Grand Commandant Zhu Chong, had Liu Shuliao appointed to the offices at the capital. He became an Academician and later a Consultant, while Liu Ju then accepted nomination as Filial and Incorrupt. -HHS 76/66:2476, FSTY 5:35; Nylan 83:450-451.

Liu Shun 劉順 [Pingzhong 平仲] (d.35); Nanyang. Son of Liu Qing, and a member of the lineage of the marquises of Chongling, Liu Shun was a distant cousin of Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu. It appears they were about the same age, for they grew up together and were close friends.

In 24 Liu Qing was enfeoffed as a king by the Gengshi Emperor, while Liu Shun was named a general, but when the Red Eyebrows took Chang'an in the following year Liu Shun fled to join Guangwu. He was named Administrator of Nanyang, but the conquest of that territory was carried out by professional soldiers such as Cen Peng, Jia Fu and Wu Han, and eventually by the imperial army under by the emperor himself.

In 26 Liu Shun was granted a county marquissate in Shanyang, with revenues double those awarded other members of the imperial clan. In 32 he was sent to put down bandits in Liu'an, and was then made Administrator of that commandery. He was later invited to return to the capital, but asked to remain in his position, and died there in 35. Guangwu sent an escort to bring his body to Luoyang and attended the mourning ceremonies in person.

The fief was later ended for lack of direct heirs, but as Emperor Ming was on tour in Nanyang in 67, he recalled the favour that his father had shown for Liu Shun and granted district marquissates to three of his nephews. -HHS 14/4:566*; Bn 54 appendix # 76.

Liu Shun 劉順. Grandson of Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, possibly through his son the late Liu Pu, in 118 Liu Shun was enfeoffed as a village marquis. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Shuo 劉鑠; Donglai. Second son of Liu Yao, he held military office under Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 4: 1186.

Liu Si 劉祀. Son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, and younger brother of his successor Liu Ding, in 146 he and eight other brothers were made village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Song 劉嵩; Nanyang. Son of Liu Ci and younger brother of Liu Min, in 54 he received a district or village marquissate. In the early 70s Liu Song was implicated in the allegations surrounding the disgrace of Liu Ying the King of Chu; his fief was abolished. -HHS 14/4:565; Bn 54 appendix # 117.

Liu Song 劉松; Nanyang. Son of Liu Chong 龍, in 37 he succeeded his father in the restored marquissate of Anzhong. -HS 15:460.

Liu Song 劉松; Hongnong. Son of Liu Kuan, he succeeded to his father's fief and held office as Minister of the Imperial Clan. -HHS 25/15:888.

Liu Song 劉嵩. Liu Song was a son of Liu Yu and grandson of Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan. His father had been deprived of his marquissate on account of some crime, but in 108 Liu Song's cousin Liu Xiang recommended in his favour and Liu Song was enfeoffed. -HHS 42/32:1433.

Liu Song 劉竦 (d.119). Son of Liu Jun the King of Chen, he succeeded his father in 117. He left no sons when he died, and the kingdom was ended. -HHS 50/40:1668.

Liu Song 劉嵩. Son of Liu Bao the King of Changshan, he succeeded his father in 152. At the time of the Yellow Turban rebellion in 184, he abandoned his state and fled. We are not told whether he was reinstated, but it is probable that he was [cf. sub Liu Xu, King of Anping]. The state was abolished by the Han government under the control of Cao Cao in 206. -HHS 50/40:1678.

Liu Su 劉肅 (d.125). Son of Liu Zheng the King of Donghai, he succeeded his father in 102. About 110 and again about 115 Liu Su made special payments to assist the expenses of the government's dealing with the Qiang rebellion.

Liu Su was succeeded by his son Zhen, and two younger sons were later made district marquises. - HHS 42/32:1425-26.

Liu Suan 劉蒜 (d.147). Son of Liu Yanping the King of Qinghe, he succeeded his father in 144. A few months later, when Liu Ping, the infant Emperor Chong, died, Liu Suan was brought to the capital and considered for the succession. The Dowager Liang and her brother Liang Ji, however, chose the seven-year-old Liu Zuan, Emperor Zhi, and Liu Suan was sent back to his state.

In the following year Liu Zuan died, and senior ministers, notably Li Gu, pressed the claims of Liu Suan, now twenty years old and an intelligent man of strong character. In the previous year, however, when the leading eunuch Cao Teng was sent to call him to the capital, Liu Suan had treated him with scant respect. The eunuchs were thus concerned at his likely attitude, and they urged the Dowager and her brother against him. The Liang group were likewise anxious not to establish a ruler who might take real power, so they chose the young Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan.

A few months later, in the winter of 147, there was an attempted coup by Liu Wen and Liu Wei, who sought to put Liu Suan upon the throne. The two men were swiftly taken and killed, but the incident gave Liu Suan's enemies the opportunity they needed to remove him. Accused of complicity, Liu Suan was reduced to be a marquis in Jianwei and sent to exile. He killed himself.

The kingdom was abolished, and Liang Ji so resented the memory that in the following year he changed the name of the territory to Ganling. On the other hand, many historians regarded the choice of Liu Zhi rather than Liu Suan as a lost last chance to restore the authority of Han. - HHS 55/45:1805-06.

Liu Taiying 劉泰英/太英, the Lady; Hanzhong. Daughter of Liu Jugong, the Lady married Yang Ju and bore him four sons and two daughters

Yang Ju died while still young, and the Lady brought up the children, admonishing her eldest son Yang Yuanzhen for drunkenness and her second Zhongzhen for his unsuitable friends. Each reformed his conduct, all four sons became noted gentlemen and officials, and the influence of her teaching was maintained for generations. - HYZ 10C:170-71.

Liu Tan 劉柱; Nanyang. Younger son of Liu Xi the King of Sishui, and brother of Liu Zhong the King of Zichuan, after the death of Liu Xi in 34 Liu Tan was granted a county marquise so that he might maintain his sacrifices. - HHS 14/4:563; Bn 54 appendix # 86.

Liu Tao 劉陶 or Liu Taotu 駒駟 or Liu Wei 偉 [Ziqi 子奇] (d.185); Yingchuan. Distantly descended from the royal house of Jibei in Former Han, Liu Tao's family had been transferred to Yingchuan by Emperor Guangwu. As a young man, Liu Tao was bluff and informal, loyal to his friends and companions, and had no concern for wealth or position.

For several years during the 150s Liu Tao attended the Imperial University at Luoyang. A long-term student, he became expert in Chunqiu and in both the Old Text and the New Text traditions of the Classic of History, while he was also active and influential in the political life of the capital.

In 153, when Zhu Mu the Inspector of Ji province was imprisoned for destroying the tomb of the father of the leading eunuch Zhao Zhong, Liu Tao led a mass of students from the University in protest. This was a new style of mass demonstration, and the government was persuaded to pardon Zhu Mu.

Soon afterwards, moreover, Liu Tao sent in a somewhat presumptuous memorial commenting on the fact that the Liang clan had maintained their regency even when Emperor Huan was of full age, while the emperor himself had as yet sired no sons. Relating these circumstances to a series of portents and natural disasters, Liu Tao urged reform, but his words were predictably unheeded. On the other hand, he successfully recommended the appointment of Li Ying as General on the Liao to deal with incursions of the Xianbi and troubles with the Qiang.

In 157 there was a proposal to increase the weight of the coinage. Though still a student, Liu Tao was allowed to take part in the debate, and he argued strongly that coinage was irrelevant to the requirement to relieve the hunger of the people. No change was made.

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, Liu Tao became a county magistrate in Runan. The territory was ravaged by disorder, but Liu Tao recruited a number of trouble-makers, forgave their crimes and formed them into a strike force to deal with others. The county was settled, and when Liu Tao left office on grounds of ill health the people celebrated his achievements in song.

During his retirement, Liu Tao continued his work of scholarship, compiling a list of rectifications of the Old Text and New Text versions of the History, which became known as the "Median Edition" 中文尚書.

About 180 Liu Tao was a clerk in the offices of the Excellency Yang Ci. The two men discussed the growing threat of the Yellow Turban movement, and on Liu Tao's advice Yang Ci sent in a memorial warning against Zhang Jue and his followers. As Yang Ci left office soon afterwards, however, the matter was pigeon-holed.

Liu Tao then joined the Censorate as an Imperial Clerk, and in 183 he sent in a memorial jointly with Yue Song and Yuan Gong, citing Yang Ci's earlier proposals and claiming that Yellow Turbans had infiltrated the capital and the court. This advice was likewise ignored, and Liu Tao was commissioned to compose the commentary Chunqiu tiaoli 春秋條例.

After Zhang Jue's rebellion broke out in the following year, Emperor Ling found the two warning documents in the archives. He enfeoffed Yang Ci and his senior colleagues, and granted Liu Tao a district marquisate.

After various promotions Liu Tao was named Director of the Imperial Secretariat, but he asked instead for a non-administrative post and was appointed Palace Attendant, a close adviser to the emperor. His criticisms were unpopular with senior officials, and it was proposed to send him out as Intendant of Jingzhao, but at this time there was purchase of offices, notionally to pay for restoration of the imperial palaces; Liu Tao was both honest and poor, so he claimed to be ill and refused to take up his duties. Admiring his ability, the emperor pardoned his recalcitrance and appointed him a Counsellor Remonstrant.

In 185 Liu Tao presented an outspoken memorial against the eunuchs, blaming their influence for the widespread rebellions, and urging their dismissal. The eunuchs accused him of exaggerating the troubles of the empire, and even suggested that he was in league with rebels. Liu Tao was taken to the Northern Prison of the Yellow Gates, controlled by the eunuchs, and was tortured to death. He was mourned throughout the empire.

Besides commentaries and editorial work on the History and Chunqiu amounting to hundreds of thousands of characters, Liu Tao wrote a discussion of the solar system, polemics in favour of Laozi and against the teachings of Han Feizi, and an essay to support the philosophy of Mencius. With rhapsodies, memorials and other scholarly, literary or political documents, his works amounted to over a hundred pian. -HHS 57/47:1842-51*, 43/33:1470, 54/44:1784, XC 3:8a-b; Yang 63:189-191, deC 89:1-3, 174-175, 180, 195-196.

Probably through confusion in the texts, the personal name of Liu Tao sometimes appears as Taotu 陶駘 or 陶駘: e.g. XC 3:8a. Cf. immediately below.

Liu Taotu 劉陶駘. Son of Liu Fu and grandson of Liu Xing, he succeeded to his father's fief. He also inherited his scholarly ability, and became a Collator in the library of the Eastern Pavilion. About 110 he was ordered by the regent Dowager Deng to join Liu Zhen, Ma Rong and Academicians of the Imperial University in preparing a definitive edition of the five Confucian classics, Changes, History, Poetry, Ritual and Chunqiu, under the supervision of the eunuch Cai Lun.

In 120 Liu Taotu and his cousin Liu Yi were further commissioned to work with Liu Zhen and Li You on the official history of Later Han, later known as Dongguan Hanji. The history had been started by Ban Gu and others under orders from Emperor Ming, with the initial title "Diary of the Jianwu Period" 建武注記. This second instalment contained annals for the period 58 to 106, being the reigns of Emperors Ming, Zhang, He and the infant Shang, together with tables and biographies of leading men, imperial relatives by marriage and noted scholars; the whole compilation was now entitled Han ji 漢記 "Record of Han." About 125 Liu Taotu and Liu Zhen asked that the celebrated scholar Zhang Heng join in the work, but Emperor Shun did not approve. Liu Taotu and Liu Zhen died soon afterwards, and this recension of Han ji may not have been formally completed.

On his own account Liu Taotu compiled four pian of essays, rhapsodies and hymns, and he supplemented the Exhortations 箴 originally compiled by Yang Xiong 楊雄 and worked on by Cui Yin and Cui Yuan. -HHS 14/4:558, 59/49:1940; Bn 54:10-11 and appendix # 152. See also sub Liu Tao 劉陶.

Liu Taoyu 劉陶駘 see Liu Taotu 劉陶駘.

Liu Tiao 劉條. Son of Liu Shang, he succeeded to the family fief in Guangling. -HHS 42/32:1449.

Liu Tong 劉統; Qinghe. A well-known gentleman scholar, at some time in the 30s Li Tong was recommended to Emperor Guangwu by Du Shi the Administrator of Nanyang. -HHS 31/21:1096.

Liu Tong 劉統 (d.167). Son of Liu Bian[qin] the King of Fuling, he succeeded his father in 159.

Liu Tong was succeeded by his son She. -HHS 42/32:1446.

Liu Tuo 劉佗. Son of Liu Jian the King of Hejian, Liu Tuo was enfeoffed as a marquis. In 175 Emperor Ling named him King of Rengcheng in order that he might maintain the sacrifices to Liu Kai, King of Hejian and grandfather of the late Emperor Huan. When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, Liu Tuo and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 42/32:1444.

Liu Tuoren 劉它人. Liu Tuoren was a son of the marquis Liu Zhang 張. His father died in disgrace about 80, but Emperor Zhang granted Liu Tuoren his former fief so that he might maintain the family sacrifices. -HHS 14/4:553.

Liu Wan 劉丸. Liu Wan was a son of Liu Du and grandson of Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan, His father had committed some fault and had not been enfeoffed with his brothers, but in 108 Liu Wan's cousin Liu Xiang recommended in his favour and Liu Wan was granted a marquisate. -HHS 42/32:1433.

Liu Wan 劉琬; Guangling. Son of Liu Yu, he maintained his father's scholarship and was expert in the interpretation of omens and of portents from natural disasters. He was nominated Sincere and Upright, but did not accept.

We are told that Liu Yu's family was destroyed after the fall of his patrons Dou Wu and Chen Fan in 168, but Liu Wan may have survived until the end of proscription in the 180s. -HHS 57/47:1858.

Liu Wan 劉琬. Son of Liu Zhi the King of Donghai, in 193 Liu Wan was sent to report to the capital at Chang'an. He was enfeoffed as a marquis and named Chancellor of Pingyuan. -HHS 42/32:1426.

Liu Wang 劉望 also as Liu Sheng 聖 (d.23). A member of the imperial clan who had formerly held title as a marquis, at the time of the rising against Wang Mang he established a position in Runan commandery, and after the defeat of their army at the battle of Kunyang in the summer of 23, two of Wang Mang's generals, Zhuang You and Chen Mao, fled to him for refuge.

In the autumn, following the fall of Wang Mang, Liu Wang took the imperial title in rivalry to the Gengshi Emperor. He named Zhuang You as his Grand Marshal and Chen Mao as Imperial Chancellor, but he and his party were destroyed by the Gengshi Emperor's general Liu Xin in the winter less than two months later. -HHS 11/1:469-70; Bn 59:29-35; Dubs 55:468.

Liu Wang 劉王, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Zhang, in 79 she was appointed Princess of Pingyi 平邑 in Dai. She married Feng You. -HHS 10B:460. [HHS 26/16:911 has the name of the Lady's fief as Ping'an 平安, while DGHJ 24:4b-5a has Anping 安平.]

Liu Wangzhi 劉望之; Nanyang. Elder brother of Liu Yi, Liu Wangzhi was an Assistant Officer under Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province. When two of his friends were slandered by rivals, Liu Biao had them executed. Liu Wangzhi protested, and he too fell from favour. Liu Yi warned him of the danger he stood in and urged him to leave, but Liu Wangzhi kept to his post; he was indeed killed soon afterwards. -SGZ 21: 613-14.

Liu Wannian 劉萬年 see Liu Wansui 劉萬歲.

Liu Wansui 劉萬歲 or Liu Wannian 萬年 (d.93). Son of Emperor Zhang by an unknown concubine, in 93 his half-brother Emperor He enfeoffed him as King of Guangzong, dividing the territory of Julu to create the new state. Liu Wansui died later that year and was buried near Luoyang. He left no heir, so the kingdom was abolished and the territory returned to Julu. -HHS 55/45:1810*.

Liu Wei 劉威 (d.96). Son of Liu Mu the King of Beihai by a concubine, in 75 Liu Wei received a district fief. When Liu Wei's half-brother Liu Ji, King of Beihai, died in 87, Emperor Zhang was unwilling to abolish the kingdom, and in 90 Emperor He awarded the succession to Liu Wei.

In 96 Liu Wei was found guilty of slander. As he was only a collateral member of the imperial lineage, a cage cart was sent to bring him to the prison of the Minister of Justice at the capital. He killed himself on the way. -HHS 14/4:558; Bn 54 appendix # 161.

Liu Wei 劉威; Nanyang. Grandson of Liu Fu, Liu Wei was a full brother of the marquis Liu Hu. Liu Hu died about 120, leaving no sons. Though Liu Wei was potentially next in line, the fief was awarded to his cousin Liu Gui, who had married Wang Yong, daughter of Emperor An's wet-nurse. -HHS 54/44:1762.

Liu Wei 劉威; Nanyang. Administrator of Jianwei, Liu Wei composed a hymn to the virtuous widow Cheng Zhenjue.

Liu Wei 劉瑋. Minister of the Imperial Clan in 124, Liu Wei joined the demonstration led by Lai Li at the palace Gate of the Vast Capital, protesting the dismissal of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. They achieved no success, but their support was recognised after the accession of Liu Bao at the end of the following year. Liu Wei had died, but his son was appointed a cadet gentleman. -HHS 15/5:591-93.

Liu Wei 劉鮪 (d.147); Wei [miswritten as Nan]. A local religious leader, in 147 Liu Wei joined Liu Wen of Qinghe in an attempt to set Liu Suan, King of Qinghe, upon the imperial throne in place of the young Emperor Huan. As the plot was discovered, Liu Wen and Liu Wei were executed and Liu Suan was forced to commit suicide.

Because of an alleged connection with Liu Wei, the General-in-Chief Liang Ji was also able to impeach Du Qiao and his colleague Li Gu and have them killed. -HHS 55/45:1805-06, 63/53:2087, 2093.

HHS 55/45 says that Liu Wei came from Nan commandery, but HHS 63/53 gives his place of origin as Wei. Wei bordered Qinghe, and is thus more likely than the distant territory of Nan on the middle Yangzi. HHS 43/33:1462 has the surname, probably wrongly, as Yan 嚴.

Liu Wei 劉韙; Donglai. Son of Liu Ben, he was kidnapped by bandits in 175, but rescued by his nephew Liu Yao. -SGZ Wu 4:1184.

Liu Wei 劉衛. Administrator of Guangyang in 184, Liu Wei was defeated by the Yellow Turbans. -HHS 8:349.

Liu Wei 劉威; Langye. Nephew of Liu Xun, his father served as Cao Cao's Inspector of Yu province, but took ill and died. Liu Wei also held office under Cao Cao, but he was dismissed when his uncle was executed. -SGZ 12:387.

Liu Wei 劉偉 (d.219); Nanyang. A close friend of Wei Feng, he joined his conspiracy in 219 and was executed when the plot failed. His elder brother Liu Yi had warned against Wei Feng, and was not personally involved, but he nearly shared his fate. -SGZ 21:616.

Liu Wei 劉緯 see Liu Chan 劉闡.

Liu Wei 劉偉 see Liu Tao 劉陶.

Liu [Weide] 劉偉德 (d.184); Runan. In 184 Liu Weide was a member of the local staff of the commandery. When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out the Administrator Zhao Qian led out the militia, but was defeated. Liu Weide and six other officers shielded Zhao Qian with their own bodies, and though they were all killed he was able to escape. An edict ordered that the gates of each of the officers' homes should be inscribed in honour of the "Seven Heroes" 七賢. -HHS 45/35:1527.

Liu [Weitai] 劉偉臺. A master of divination, in the mid-190s Liu Weitai became a favourite of the north-western warlord Gongsun Zan and was treated by him like a brother. -SGZ 8:245.

Liu Wen 劉文 (d.147); Qinghe/Ganling. A local leader, in 147 Liu Wen joined Liu Wei of Wei commandery in planning a coup to set Liu Suan, king of Qinghe, upon the imperial throne instead of the young Emperor Huan. When the plot was found out Liu Wen kidnapped the state Chancellor Xie Gao, and sought to have him join them. When Xie Gao refused, he killed him.

Liu Wen and Liu Wei were soon captured and killed, and though Liu Suan had not been involved he was reduced to be a marquis and then forced to commit suicide. -HHS 55/45:1805-06.

Liu Wen 劉文. Son of Liu Xian the King of Ji'nan, in 126 he was made marquis of a village. -HHS 42/32:1433.

Liu Wenbo 劉文伯 see sub Lu Fang 盧芳.

Liu Wenhe 劉文河; Pingyuan. In 110 the local bandits Liu Wenhe and Zhou Wenguang, who styled themselves as "messengers" 使者, joined forces with the pirate Zhang Bolu. Captured one county city, they went on to attack others, and they gained a large following.

Later that year the Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk Wang Zong, head of the Censorate, came to take command of a combined force gathered from the province and the commandery, and after several engagements Liu Wenhe and his fellows were defeated and put to flight. There was a confused attempt to surrender to an amnesty, and a final raid on Donglai, at the tip of the Shandong peninsula, in 111, but the last of the bandits were then driven across the sea to Liaodong, where they were destroyed by the local leader Li Jiu. -HHS 5:213-14, 38/28:1277.

Liu Wuji 劉無忌 (d.141). Son of Liu Huang, he succeeded to his father's marquisate, which had been reduced from a kingdom. Soon afterwards, in 88, the testamentary edict of Emperor Zhang recalled that Liu Huang had been the lineal descendant of Liu Bosheng, elder brother of Guangwu who had led the initial rising against Wang Mang. He urged that the royal state be restored, and in 90 Liu Wuji was promoted to be King of Qi.

Liu Wuji was succeeded by his son Xi. -HHS 14/4: 554, 4:170; Bn 54 appendix # 160.

Liu Xi 劉歙 [Jingsun 經孫] (d.34); Nanyang. A distant cousin of Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu, Liu Xi was an early supporter of the rebellion against Wang Mang, and his son Liu Zhong gave valuable assistance in the capture of Huyang during the early stages of the campaign.

Liu Xi and Liu Zhong accompanied the Gengshi Emperor to Chang'an and Liu Xi was enfeoffed as a king. After the Gengshi Emperor was destroyed in 25 both men went to join Guangwu at Luoyang; in the following year Liu Xi was again granted a royal fief, this time as King of Sishui, while Liu Zhong also became a king.

Liu Xi died in 34, and it is said that Liu Zhong was so affected by grief that he followed him a few weeks later. Their descendants held only the rank of marquis. -HHS 14/4:563; Bn 54:107 and appendix # 56, Bn 59:53.

Liu Xi 劉細 or Liu Gan 紺 (d.26); Zhending/Changshan. A cousin of Liu Yang the King of Zhending, in 25 he joined him in planning insurrection. The envoy Geng Chun trapped them with a false invitation, and both men were killed. -HHS 21/11:764.

Liu Xi 劉喜 or Liu Jia 嘉 [Gongzhong 共仲] (d.29); Julu. Younger brother of Liu Zhi, when Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in the winter of 23/24, Liu Zhi, Liu Xi and their cousin Liu Xin gathered clan troops and personal retainers numbering several thousand men, and seized the local county city of Changcheng. Declaring their support for Han, they opened the gates to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor. Liu Zhi was made a general and Liu Xi and Liu Xin became lieutenant-generals; all were granted title as marquises.

In 26 Liu Xi was with Cen Peng in operations against the rebels Dong Xin and Deng Feng in Nanyang. When his brother Liu Zhi died in battle in Yingchuan, Guangwu had Liu Xi take over his men, gave him too a general's title and also promoted him to a county fief.

At the end of 27 Zhang Feng the Administrator of Zhuo commandery joined the rebel Peng Chong of Yuyang, and in the summer of 28 Liu Xi and Zhai Cun were sent to attack him. They were successful within a few weeks, Zhang Feng was executed, and they next turned north against Peng Chong. Peng Chong attempted a counter-attack, but the troops of Shanggu under Geng Shu routed a column of Xiongnu auxiliaries led by his brother Peng Chun, and the imperial forces followed up. As Geng Shu and his father the Administrator Geng Kuang attacked from Shanggu, Zhai Cun and Liu Xi moved in from the south. Early in 29, with his cause clearly lost, Peng Chong was killed by his own slaves.

Liu Xi evidently died soon after this campaign, and his command was transferred to his cousin Liu Xin. His marquise was maintained for some generations, but the names of his descendants are not recorded. -HHS 21/11:760.

Liu Xi 劉喜/熹/燾 [Jiming 季明]; Donglai. Minister of the Household at the end of the reign of Emperor An, in 123 Liu Xi was named Excellency over the Masses. In 125, after Emperor An died on tour and as the Yan clan of his Dowager concealed the news, Liu Xi carried out state sacrifice as if the ruler was still alive. Then, when the Little Emperor Liu Yi was placed upon the throne by the Dowager Yan, Liu Xi became Grand Commandant and shared control of the Secretariat with the Grand Tutor Feng Shi.

When Emperor Shun was brought to the throne by the eunuch coup at the end of the year, Liu Xi continued as Grand Commandant, but in 126 he and other officials were impeached by the Director of Retainers Yu Xu for their earlier support of the Yan clan. There was some opposition to raking over old wrongs, and argument that the men had simply accorded with the situation at the time, but Yu Xu pressed the matter of personal responsibility, and Liu Xi, Feng Shi and their colleagues were dismissed. -HHS 5:237-42, 6:252, 10B:436, 58/48:1870, 101/11:3242.

Liu Xi 劉喜 (d.146). Son of Liu Wuji the King of Qi, he succeeded his father in 141.

Liu Xi was succeeded by his son Cheng. -HHS 14/4:554; Bn 54 appendix # 163.

Liu Xi 劉熙 [Chengguo 成國]; Beihai. A noted scholar, Liu Xi compiled commentaries to Mencius, to the Book of Filial Piety and to the history of Han, together with a study of posthumous titles Shi fa 諡法, a set of biographies of women and the Shi ming 釋名 dictionary. This last is an important source for the theory of language in the Han period, emphasising the correspondence of name and reality by means of glosses identifying the semantic value of a character through puns of similar sound.

During the 190s Liu Xi went to the far south, where he became a teacher to many of the local people and emigrés, and he may have been Administrator of Rinan [miswritten as Annan 安南 in the texts]. -SGZJJ Shu 12:5a-6a; Hou Kang:2109, Yao Zhenzong:2323, Texts:424-428 [Miller].

Liu Xi 劉熙 (d.216). Son of Liu Rong the King of Langye, when his father died in 193 he did not succeed to the fief. The state was ended, but in 206, as recognition of the support shown to Cao Cao by his uncle Liu Miao, it was restored in favour of Liu Xi.

In 216, however, Liu Xi was found guilty of having planned to cross the Yangzi to join Sun Quan. He was executed and the state was abolished. -HHS 42/32:1452.

Liu Xi 劉熙. Son of Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, presumably by a concubine, in 212 Liu Xi was enfeoffed as King of Jiyin. When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, he and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 9:386, 390.

Liu Xian 劉憲. Administrator of Lelang under the Gengshi Emperor, Liu Xian was killed about 25 by the local rebel Wang Tiao. -HHS 76/66:2464.

Liu Xian 劉憲; Pengcheng. Son of Liu Ban, Liu Xian was a younger brother of Liu Kai. When their father died in 78 his fief should have passed to Liu Kai, but he ceded the succession to Liu Xian. -HHS 39/29:1306; Bn 54 appendix # 145.

Liu Xian 劉羨 (d.96). Son of Emperor Ming by an unknown concubine, in 60 Liu Xian was enfeoffed as King of Guangping 廣平, divided from Julu. When Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 78, senior officials recommended that Liu Xian, Liu Gong, and Liu Dang should be sent out to their states, but their half-brother Emperor Zhang would not be parted from them and they remained at the capital. A keen and authoritative student of Confucianism, Liu Xian took part in the conference at the White Tiger Hall in 79.

Because Guangping was close to the northern frontier and expensive to defend, in 82 Liu Xian was made King of Xiping, comprising eight counties taken from Runan. When Emperor Zhang died in 88, his testament transferred Liu Xian's fief to Huaiyang commandery, renamed Chen. In that year the new government of Emperor He under the regency of the Dowager Dou ordered Liu Xian and his brother kings to leave the capital for the first time and reside in their states.

Liu Xian was succeeded by his son Jun, and his younger sons were later enfeoffed as marquises. -HHS 50/40:1667-68*.

Liu Xian 劉憲 (d.118). Son of Liu Yan 焉 the King of Zhongshan, he succeeded his father in 90. He was succeeded by his son Hong, and two younger sons were later granted village marquises. -HHS 42/32:1450, 5:228.

Liu Xian 劉顯 (d.128). Son of Liu Cuo the King of Ji'nan, in 108 he was made a marquis. In 126, after the death of his brother Liu Xiang in the previous year, Liu Xian was named King of Ji'nan to restore the lineage.

Liu Xian was succeeded by his son Guang. -HHS 42/32:1433.

Liu Xian 劉先 [Shizong 始宗]; Lingling. A man of learning, both in Huang-Lao doctrines and in the legal precedents of Han, Liu Xian became Attendant Officer to Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province. He urged Liu Biao to ally himself with Cao Cao, but when he visited the imperial court he warned Cao Cao not to attack Liu Biao. He then became Administrator of Wuling, south of the Yangzi on the margin of Liu Biao's control.

After Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208, Liu Xian joined the Imperial Secretariat of Han, and he later became head of the royal Secretariat of Wei. -SGZ 6:216.

Liu Xian 劉羨. Son of Liu Zhi 祗 the King of Donghai, Liu Xian succeeded his father in 200. When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220 he and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 42/32:1427. On some textual confusions over the kingdom of Donghai at this time, see sub Liu Zhi.

Liu Xiande 劉賢得 or Liu Jiande 堅得, the Lady (d.130). Daughter of Liu Qing the King of Qinghe and thus an aunt of Emperor Shun, Liu Xiande was enfeoffed as Princess of Yincheng 陰城.

The Lady married Ban Shi, but she was arrogant and vicious. When she took a lover she would call Ban Shi into the room and had him stand at the bed-side to watch. At last, in 130, Ban Shi became so angry that he stabbed her to death.

Emperor Shun avenged the Lady by having Ban Shi cut in two at the waist. -HHS 47/37:1586, DGHJ 16:2b.

Liu Xiang 劉襄; Runan. Son of Liu Li 颯, he succeeded to his fief in 26. -HS 17:672.

Liu Xiang 劉向; Julu. Son of Liu Zhi, he succeeded to his father's marquisate in 26, though the command of troops was given to Liu Xiang's uncle Liu Xi. The fief was later transferred into Dong commandery. -HHS 21/11:760.

Liu Xiang 劉向 see Liu Shang 劉尚: HHSJJ 20/10: 773 mentions a Liu Xiang as General Who is Firm and Majestic in the army against Wei Ao in 31, and Hui Dong identifies this man with the son of Liu Zhi. The name, however, has been miswritten for that of Liu Shang, who held that title as a general and who is described by other sources as taking part in that campaign. -HHSJJ 18/8:723-24 Qian Dazhao.

Liu Xiang 劉襄. According to the Annals of Emperor Guangwu, in the summer of 38, following the defeat of the pretender Lu Fang in the previous year, the Xiongnu sent an embassy offering tribute to the court of Han, and the General of the Household Liu Xiang was sent on a return embassy. It should be noted, however, that the Xiongnu were at this time raiding the border territories of Han and continuing to press against Chinese territory. -HHS 1B:63.

Liu Xiang 劉香 (d.125). Son of Liu Cuo the King of Ji'nan, Liu Xiang was serious and fond of learning. He succeeded his father in 103.

When his four younger brothers were enfeoffed in 108, Liu Xiang asked that his cousins Liu Wan and Liu Song also receive marquisates, though their fathers had earlier lost their titles for wrong-doing.

Liu Xiang left no sons when he died. The kingdom was ended, but was soon afterwards revived for his brother Liu Xian. -HHS 42/32:1432-33.

Liu Xiang 劉祥 of Guangling: see Liu Bian 辯. -XC 3:8b.

Liu Xiang 劉祥 (d.190); Lingling. Son of Liu Yao, in 189 Liu Xiang was Administrator of Jiangxia. As Sun Jian the Administrator of Changsha went north to join the alliance against Dong Zhuo, Liu Xiang took title as a general and accompanied him. The Administrator of Nanyang Zhang Zi failed to provide supplies and Sun Jian killed him, but the people of Nanyang later turned against Liu Xiang as his associate. He was defeated and killed. -SGZ Shu 9.980.

Liu Xiang 劉詳. A general under Yuan Shu, Liu Xiang was defeated by Cao Cao in 193. -SGZ 1:10.

Liu Xiao 劉孝; Qi. A descendant of Liu Zhang 劉章, grandson of Emperor Gao who became King of Chengyang 城陽 during Former Han, Liu Xiao's marquisate was abolished during Wang Mang. About 20 he joined the Red Eyebrows, either by force or voluntarily, and when the bandits sought to establish their own emperor in 25 they looked for members of the lineage of Liu Zhang. With the brothers Liu Mao and Liu Penzi, Liu Xiao was one of three direct descendants who were available. He took part in the drawing of lots to decide the new ruler, but the choice fell upon Liu Penzi. -HHS 11/1:480.

Liu Xiaomin 劉小民, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 76 she was appointed Princess of Cheng'an in Yingchuan. -HHS 10B:460.

Liu Xiaoji 劉小姬, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 69 she was appointed Princess of Pinggao in Henei. She married Deng Fan. -HHS 10B:459.

Liu Xiaoying 劉小迎, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 76 she was appointed Princess of Luoping in Dong commandery. -HHS 10B:460.

Liu Xiaqing 劉俠卿. A chieftain of the Red Eyebrows in the early 20s, he styled himself Officer of the Troops of the Enclosure of the Right 右校卒吏 after the title of a convict guard. He had charge of herding the cattle which accompanied the bandits, and in this capacity he was the supervisor of the kidnapped gentry Liu Mao and Liu Penzi. Though Liu Penzi was named emperor by the Red Eyebrows in 25, he avoided any role in the leadership, and as he returned to his herds Liu Xiaqing arranged a simple costume and a carriage for him. -HHS 11/1:480-81. YSS:9a has the name of this man as Liu Zhongqing 劉仲卿.

Liu Xie 劉協 [Bohe 伯和] (181-234) [Emperor Xian 獻帝 (reg. 189-220)]. In the summer of 180 the Beauty Wang, concubine of Emperor Ling, became pregnant. It is said that, frightened of the Empress He, she took drugs to abort the child, but the medicine failed; she also reported dreams that she was carrying the sun. In the spring of 181, on 2 April, first day of the third month, the Lady Wang gave birth to a son; seven days later the empress poisoned her.

The boy was a favourite of his father, who gave him the name Xie, meaning "resembles me." He entrusted him to the eunuch Zhu Zhi, who concealed the child and found him a wet-nurse, and Liu Xie was later cared for by his grandmother the Dowager Dong; he was known as Lord Dong 董侯 in distinction to his elder half-brother Liu Bian, Lord Shi, son of the Empress He.

When Emperor Ling died in 189, the Empress, now Dowager, and her brother He Jin put Liu Bian on the throne, while Liu Xie was made King of Bohai. In the autumn, however, He Jin was killed by the eunuchs, who were then themselves massacred. A small party, seizing Liu Xie and the young emperor, sought to escape north from Luoyang, but they were caught at the Yellow River and the eunuchs were killed.

As the two imperial children were brought back to the city they came into the hands of the general Dong Zhuo, who seized power to reform the government. Dong Zhuo was not impressed by Liu Bian, and he preferred Liu Xie on account of his connection with the Lady Dong, mother of Emperor Ling and a notional member of his own clan.

On 28 September 189 Dong Zhuo placed Liu Xie upon the throne. At that time aged 9 sui, he had no practical support and no power. In spring 190 he was obliged to move west to Chang'an, where he was held in effective captivity. Dong Zhuo's assassination in 192 was followed by the short-lived rule of Wang Yun and the capture of the city by Dong Zhuo's former officers led by Li Jue. Under their brutal regime, Liu Xie had a few small successes: after taking the cap of manhood in 194, he refused to establish a harem until his mother had been suitably honoured and ritually buried with his father Emperor Ling; and he punished the Imperial Clerk Hou Wen for corruption and enforced an honest distribution of grain.

In 195 the military leadership group fell apart. Li Jue took hold of the emperor, Guo Si kidnapped his senior officials, and as their unruly troops ravaged the palace and its people the ruler himself was nearly hit by flying arrows. He sought to make peace between the rival warlords, and in the late summer there was an exhausted truce. In September, aided by Zhang Ji and the adviser Jia Xu, Liu Xie bluffed his way out of the city and travelled towards the east.

The journey was contested at every stage, but by the end of the year, after a heavy defeat of his escort in Hongnong, a small imperial party escaped across the Yellow River north into Henei. Re-establishing the semblance of a court at Anyi, the emperor persuaded his quarrelsome supporters to assist a return to Luoyang, and in the autumn of 196 he took up residence at the former capital.

The position, however, was untenable: the city had been devastated, the people were starving, the troops and their leaders were ill-disciplined and unreliable, and the fifteen-year-old ruler had no base of personal power. When Cao Cao, warlord of Yan province, came to Luoyang and played the factions against each other, he found small difficulty in transferring the court and the capital to Xu city in Yingchuan, present-day Xuchang in Henan.

Cao Cao could now act in the ruler's name, and he used that borrowed authority most skilfully in the political and military manoeuvres of the next twenty-five years, the period proclaimed as Jian'an 建安 "Established Peace". The emperor gained the security of a competent guard, but he never left the city or his practical imprisonment again.

Liu Xie was not entirely passive, but he could take no effective action. In 199 he persuaded his cousin and boyhood friend Dong Cheng into a conspiracy against Cao Cao, but the plot was discovered early in 200; Dong Cheng and his fellows were killed, and Cao Cao also demanded the Honoured Lady Dong, daughter of Dong Cheng. She was pregnant at the time, and the emperor pleaded for her, but to no avail. In 214 his Empress Fu was likewise arrested and died, officially because she had encouraged her father Fu Wan to plot against Cao Cao, but no doubt also because her death cleared the way for the Honoured Lady Cao Jie, second daughter of Cao Cao who had been taken with two sisters into the harem in 213, to be appointed empress.

After Cao Pi succeeded his father, he forced Liu Xie to abdicate: at a ceremony held outside Xu city on 11 December 220 the Han dynasty was ended and Cao Pi was proclaimed emperor of Wei. Liu Xie was made Duke of Shanyang 山陽公, with special precedence and privileges, and sent to reside at his fief county in Henei. He died on 21 April 234 and was buried there on 30 September. His tomb was given the title "Mound of Contemplation" 禪陵.

Liu Xie's posthumous imperial title of Xian 獻, proclaimed by Wei, reflects his "offering" of the throne to the new dynasty. At the time of his abdication in 220, however, Liu Bei in Shu-Han held mourning as if he had actually died, and awarded him the title Min 愍 "Beleaguered" in reference to the oppression he had suffered from the Cao family.

Liu Xie was succeeded by his grandson Kang 康, and the fief was maintained until the early fourth century; as the dynasty of Western Jin fell into ruin, the last duke was killed by non-Chinese invaders. -HHS 9*; deC 96.

Liu Xie 劉偕; Langye. In 199 Liu Xie's cousin Liu Xun, Administrator of Lujiang, sent him to Hua Xin in Yuzhang to seek supplies for the refugees who had come to him after the death of Yuan Shu. Though Hua Xin appeared willing, his subordinate territories would not provide any substantial help.

Liu Xie wrote to Liu Xin, encouraging him to make a surprise attack, but when he did so he was cut off by Sun Ce's troops and lost Lujiang commandery. They were eventually driven north to join Cao Cao. -SGZ Wu 1:1108.

Liu Xin 劉歆 (46 BC-AD 23) see QHX:383-386.

Liu Xin 劉信; Nanyang. Son of Liu Xian 顯 the elder brother of Liu Ci, after the execution of his father he joined Liu Ci in raising a band of retainers to slaughter their rivals in a vendetta. The two then fled, but later benefited from an amnesty and were able to return to their estates.

In the winter of 22 Liu Ci and Liu Xin were among the first to join the Han rebels against Wang Mang led by Liu Bosheng, and when their cousin Liu Xuan was proclaimed as the Gengshi Emperor in 23 Liu Xin was sent to take over the campaign in Runan.

After the Gengshi Emperor set his capital at Chang'an in 24 Liu Xin was enfeoffed as a king. Sent to settle the lands south of the Yangzi, he occupied Yuzhang, but in the following year he was attacked and defeated by Zhang Long the Administrator of Guiyang. He went to Luoyang to make terms with the new Emperor Guangwu, and was enfeoffed as Marquis of Ruyin.

Like his cousin Liu Min, Liu Xin was involved in the disgrace of the King of Chu, Liu Ying, in 70. He was stripped of his fief. -HHS 14/4:564-66; Bn 54 appendix # 115.

Liu Xin 劉歆 [Xijun 細君]; Julu. When Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in the winter of 23/24, Liu Xin joined his cousins Liu Zhi and Liu Xi in declaring support for Han. Gathering several thousand clan troops and personal retainers, they seized the city of Changcheng and opened the gates to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor. Liu Zhi was named a general and Liu Xi and Liu Xin became lieutenant-generals, while all received title as marquises.

When Liu Zhi died in 26, Guangwu had Liu Xi take over his troops, and after Liu Xi's death in 29 Liu Xin succeeded him with title as a general; he was also awarded a county fief in Bohai.

That year Liu Xin was sent as subordinate to Geng Yan in operations against the eastern warlord Zhang Bu. In battle at Linzi against Zhang Bu's main army, Geng Yan allowed himself to be driven back in order to entice the enemy into the city, and Liu Xin's men held them there until Geng Yan launched a counter-attack to take Zhang Bu's men on the flank.

In the early 30s Liu Xin took part in the attack against Wei Ao, and in 35 he commanded an army under Cen Peng and Wu Han in the assault up the Yangzi against Gongsun Shu. He accompanied Cen Peng and Zang Gong in the van of the invasion.

It is not known when Liu Xin died. We are told that his fief was transferred to his descendants, but none of them are noted by the histories. -HHS 21/11:760, 19/9:708-11, 17/7:661.

Liu Xin 劉歆; Nanyang. Second son of Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor, in 26 he came with his mother and his brothers to Emperor Guangwu and was granted enfeoffment. -HHS 11/1:476; Bn 54 appendix # 113.

Liu Xin 劉訢; Nanyang. A senior member of staff to the Administrator Lu Nu in 163, Liu Xin was associated with a new temple at the source of the Huai in the mountains to the east of the commandery. -LS 2:12a-14b, Nagata 94:142.

Liu Xin 劉歆. As a senior officer in the Imperial Secretariat, about 170, Liu Xin was a close friend of his direct colleague Du Xi and the junior colleague Huan Bin. They would eat and drink together, but they despised Feng Fang, who was son-in-law to the powerful eunuch Cao Jie, and never asked him to join them. Resentful at this exclusion, Feng Fang accused the companions of forming a faction. When the Director Liu Meng took no action, Cao Jie had him dismissed and proscribed from office. -HHS 37/27:1262.

Liu Xing 劉興 (d.30). Liu Xing succeeded Su Jing as Guangwu's Administrator of Dai commandery, but in the summer of 30 he was killed in battle against Lu Fang's general Jia Lan. -HHS 1B:49; Bn 67:106.

Liu Xing 劉興. Probably the son of Liu Shun 劉舜, King of Changsha under Former Han who was deposed by Wang Mang, Liu Xing was restored to the royal fief by the Gengshi Emperor and maintained there by Emperor Guangwu. In 37, however, with other kings outside the immediate imperial family, he was reduced in rank to be a marquis. -HHS 1B:61; Bn 59:47, Bn 67:25.

Liu Xing 劉興/行 (d.64); Nanyang. Younger son of Liu Bosheng, the elder brother of Emperor Guangwu, in 26 Liu Xing was enfeoffed as King of Lu, with responsibility for the sacrifices owed to his late uncle Liu Zhong. In 37 he was reduced to ducal rank, but in 43 the royal title was restored.

Like his brother Liu Zhang, Liu Xing was granted special permission to hold official positions. Having distinguished himself as a county magistrate in Henan, he was appointed Administrator of Hongnong. There he found out and punished the crimes of the local officer Zhang Shen, and in a time of drought he sent worthy scholars to inspect the county prisons and release those guilty of minor offences; the territory was rewarded with opportune rain.

After four years, Liu Xing returned to Luoyang with the title Servant at Court, authorising him to reside at the capital, but in 51 he was sent out to live on his fief. In the following year he was transferred to be King of Beihai, while the territory of Lu was taken to augment the fief of the former Heir Liu Qiang, now King of Donghai. In 54 Liu Xing's son Fu was enfeoffed as a county marquis, and in 57 another two sons received equivalent honours. It is said that Emperor Ming valued Liu Xing's advice and consulted him on matters of state.

When Liu Xing died in 64, it is said that all work in his state ceased in mourning for him, while the celebrated writer Fu Yi composed a eulogy. On the other hand, he had arranged that his treasure was not passed intact to his eldest son and successor Liu Mu, but was distributed among his younger brothers. Several items were pieces of royal regalia to which marquises were not entitled, and these had to be bought back later. -HHS 14/4:555-56*; Bn 54 appendix # 115.

Liu Xing 劉興, the Lady. Fourth daughter of Emperor He, in 106 she was appointed Princess of Wenxi 聞喜 in Hedong. -HHS 10B:461.

Liu Xing 劉興. Son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, and younger brother of his successor Liu Ding, in 146 he and eight other brothers were made village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Xiong 劉雄. In 108 Liu Xiong was a county magistrate in Pingyuan when the pirate chieftain Bi Hao came into the commandery. Liu Xiong led a local force by boat against him, and they fought on the Yellow River. His men were defeated and Liu Xiong was captured. The bandits were going to spear him, but his junior officer Suo Fu asked to take his place. So Liu Xiong was released and Suo Fu was killed. -HHS 81/71:2672.

Liu Xiong 劉雄; Zhuo. Claiming descent from Emperor Jing of Former Han through the kings of Zhongshan and a short-lived fief in Zhuo held by the cadet lineage, Liu Xiong was an officer in the local commandery and provincial administrations about 150. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, he became a county magistrate in Dong commandery.

Liu Xiong's grandson Liu Bei became First Sovereign 先主 of the Three Kingdoms state of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 2:879.

Liu Xiong 劉熊 [Mengyang 孟陽]; Guangling. Descended in a cadet branch from the kings of Guangling, Liu Xiong was probably a son of Liu Ping and a younger brother of Liu Biao. As a county magistrate in Chenliu, he was honoured with a stele inscribed with the names of 180 sponsors and donors. -LS 5:15a-18b, Nagata 94:276-78, SJZ 8:3a.

Liu Xiong 劉雄 see Liu Xiongming 劉雄鳴. -SGZ 10:270.

Liu Xiongming 劉雄鳴 also as Liu Xiong or Liu Mingxiong [possibly a sobriquet: "Cock-crow"]; Jingzhao. As a young man, Liu Xiongming made his living by hunting and gathering medicines in the wilderness; he was credited with the ability to create clouds and mist.

During the 190s Liu Xiongming took refuge in the hills from the troubles at Chang'an. He was joined by many refugees, and later received recognition from the provincial and commandery authorities. Maintaining his independence, he rejected the local warlord Ma Chao, and though he surrendered to Cao Cao in 211 his followers soon forced him to turn away again. He then briefly opposed Xiahou Yuan, but was defeated and fled to Zhang Lu in Hanzhong.

As Cao Cao took Hanzhong Liu Xiongming was again obliged to submit, and he was sent away to an official post in Bohai. -SGZ 8:266, 10:270 [as Liu Xiong].

Liu Xiu 劉秀 [Wenshu 文叔] (5 BC-AD 57) [Emperor

Guangwu 光武 (reg. 25-57)]; Nanyang. Liu Xiu was born on 13 January 5 BC in the yamen of Jiyang county in Chenliu, where his father Liu Qin 欽 was magistrate. He was the third son of Liu Qin and the Lady Fan Xiandu, and the youngest brother of Liu Yan [referred to in this work by his style Bosheng]. Claiming distant descent from Emperor Gao through Emperor Jing of Former Han, the family had lost their noble status at the hands of Wang Mang, but retained position as prosperous local gentry.

Liu Qin died in 4 AD., and Liu Xiu, probably with his two elder brothers, went to the care of his father's younger brother Liu Liang, who was at that time the magistrate of Xiao county in Pei, where Liu Xiu attended school. When Liu Xiu grew to manhood he is said to have been 7 foot 3 inches tall [170 cm], slightly above the average height of seven feet, with a fine beard and prominent nose and forehead; much of this description, however, reflects the legendary attributes of a future emperor rather than the reality of Liu Xiu's appearance.

From about the age of 15 Liu Xiu spent some five years at the imperial capital, Chang'an, where he was formally studied the Classic of Poetry under the Palace Counsellor Xu Ziwei 許子威 of Lujiang. Even his biography in the imperial Annals claims only that he obtained a general idea of the classic; he was really just a young man about town.

Liu Xiu went back to the family estates in Chongling district of Caiyang county, but returned to Chang'an about 21 for a tax case on behalf of his distant cousin Liu Chang, former Marquis of Chongling. Liu Xiu's life as a member of the landed gentry, however, was disturbed by the activities of his eldest brother Bosheng, who had gathered a gang of retainers and, while perhaps harbouring ideas of rebellion to restore the Han, had also taken to banditry and plunder.

To avoid involvement as a relative of the trouble-maker, early in 22 Liu Xiu went to Xinye to take refuge with Deng Chen, husband of his sister Yuan. He was briefly arrested, but was thereafter protected by local influence and by a personal friendship with the magistrate Pan Lin. Liu Xiu also met Yin Lihua, daughter of another powerful family in Xinye, and in 23 she became his formal concubine.

THE INITIAL REBELLION

Before this, when Liu Xiu was in Wan city, capital of Nanyang commandery, to sell grain, he was approached by Li Yi, member of a leading local clan, and invited to meet his cousin Li Tong to consider rebellion against Wang Mang. Since Liu Bosheng had killed a half-brother of Li Tong, there was an uneasy relationship between the two families, but Liu Xiu agreed to the meeting, and although he went armed the two sides did agree to combine their forces. As Bielenstein observes, Liu Xiu was a useful first intermediary, but the leading role in his family was held by Liu Bosheng. Details of the early course of events are presented in the entries for Liu Bosheng and Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor.

The rising was called for the beginning of winter in 22, and Liu Xiu was commissioned to buy crossbows and other weapons; private ownership of crossbows in particular had been outlawed by Wang Mang in 10 AD. Liu Xiu then joined Li Yi in raising troops at Wan; they made no attempt to seize the city, but went to join the main body of the rebels at Chongling district, home country of the Liu family. Liu Bosheng was there acknowledged as leader and received additional support from troops of commoner bandits who had entered Nanyang from the south.

Liu Xiu killed some local officials and then joined an advance against Wan city. He barely escaped with his life from the defeat at Xiao-Chang'an, but by the following year Liu Bosheng had made alliance with a second group of bandits and returned to the fray. He defeated two armies of Wang Mang and now laid siege to Wan, but his position within the rebel movement was challenged by the election of his cousin Liu Xuan, the Gengshi Emperor, as the Han party's claimant for the throne. Liu Xiu was named Minister of Ceremonies under the new regime, while Liu Bosheng became Excellency over the Masses and continued to command the siege of Wan.

The newly-proclaimed government now sent another force, with Liu Xiu as a lieutenant-general, to take the north and east of Nanyang and move into Yingchuan, Runan and Pei. In the summer a major army led by Wang Mang's generals Wang Xun 王尋 and Wang Yi 王邑 came to Yingchuan, and the Han troops were driven into the city of Kunyang. Having escaped the encirclement, on 7 July Liu Xiu and some other leaders returned with reinforcements. Wang Xun and Wang Yi gave chief concern to the siege, and they sent only a minor force to hold off the relief but that detachment was defeated and the Han forces, with Liu Xiu in command of the van, attacked the besiegers from the rear. Aided by a sortie from the city, they gained a decisive victory.

The success at Kunyang produced quantities of supplies for the Han cause, and destroyed Wang Mang's major strategy to deal with the rebellion. Though one must accept that historians of Han tended to exaggerate the role played by Liu Xiu, it appears that he deserved considerable credit for the victory, and had obtained a position of respect independent of his energetic elder brother. Such status soon became important, for though Wan city had surrendered to Liu Bosheng three days before the battle of Kunyang, a few weeks later the Gengshi Emperor rid himself of his potential rival by executing him on a charge of treason.

Liu Xiu was thus left as effective head of his family group, with the problem of dealing in proper terms with the man who was responsible for the death of his brother but was nonetheless leader of the Han cause. Both found the relationship difficult, but Liu Xiu's achievements at Kunyang, besides his relationship to the initial leader of the rebellion, meant that he could not be disregarded. He remained on campaign in Yingchuan, with mixed success, until Liu Bosheng's death, but then returned quickly to Wan.

With his life clearly in danger, he resigned his ministerial office, he wore no mourning for his brother, and generally behaved as if nothing untoward had happened. For his part, the Gengshi Emperor promoted Liu Xiu to a general and enfeoffed him as a marquis of title. Such generosity indicates embarrassment for the past and an attempt at reconciliation with a notable group of imperial kinsmen; and it reflects both Liu Xiu's importance and also some expectation that he could be kept under control and would not embark upon a vendetta.

COMMISSIONER IN THE NORTH 23-24

In the autumn of 23, after the destruction of Wang Mang at Chang'an, the Gengshi Emperor named Liu Xiu as Acting Director of Retainers, and sent him to rebuild the palaces and offices in Luoyang in preparation for the transfer of the capital from Wan. A few weeks later, messengers were dispatched by the new regime to establish authority in the various regions of the empire; Liu Xiu was sent as a commissioner to the north, holding title as Acting Grand Marshal and bearing the Staff of Authority to make appointments and carry out punishments in the emperor's name.

Though Liu Xiu and his friends had sought the post, the appointment had been opposed by Zhu Wei and other advisers, and the emperor himself had doubts about the wisdom of granting such an independent command. On the other hand, each commissioner had to rely ultimately upon his personal authority and such connections as he could make; Liu Xiu had no past association with the north of the Yellow River, and he was only one amongst a number of other officials and local leaders.

Liu Xiu's primary area of responsibility was in Ji province, and he proceeded first to Ye, chief city of Wei commandery, then to Handan, capital of Zhao, and further north through Julu. Early in 24 he was in Shanggu, and at this time he faced perhaps his greatest threat, and surely his greatest opportunity, through the rebellion of Wang Lang.

Wang Lang had considerable reputation as a diviner, physiognomist and astrologer, and in the time of confusion which accompanied the fall of Wang Mang he developed a claim that he was a long-lost son of Emperor Cheng of Former Han. Few may have believed this fiction, but Wang Lang obtained the support of local magnates and was aided by general fear of the Red Eyebrows. In the winter of 23/24 he took the imperial title in Handan city, and his authority spread swiftly across north-eastern China as far as Liaodong.

Liu Xiu was at that time in Ji city in Guangyang, isolated from his natural sources of supply in the south, while Wang Lang's local support was so strong that he could raise no troops to oppose him. Escaping under close pursuit, he made his way to Xindu, where he was received by the loyalist Ren Guang. From there he marched in a half-circle north to gather troops, gained a series of successes, then turned to attack Zhao. Taken by surprise, however, the Han forces were defeated, and though Liu Xiu was able to recover much of their baggage he was driven to refuge at Guang'e city in Julu.

At this low point, reinforcements arrived from Shanggu and Yuyang, where the administrators Peng Chong and Geng Kuang had agreed to support the Han cause. Both men came from outside the region and were unaffected by the local appeal of Wang Lang, and both hoped for advancement from Liu Xiu. As they came south, moreover, the troops led by Wu Han and Geng Yan laid waste to Wang Lang's position in the north and turned the balance of power. Hereafter Liu Xiu could take the offensive with confidence, and though he suffered further setbacks, and support for Wang Lang remained strong, he received valuable assistance from the Gengshi Emperor's general Xie Gong, approaching from the south. At the beginning of summer the Han forces moved against Handan; the city fell three weeks later, and Wang Lang was killed as he fled.

The rebellion of Wang Lang had lasted little more than six months, and though Liu Xiu had faced moments of danger the rewards of victory were considerable. He gained gentry support by taking the Lady Guo Shengtong, niece of Liu Yang the King of Zhending, into his harem, while those who had supported Wang Lang were destroyed or forced to submit. More importantly, though there were many bandits and there would be further trouble with local leaders, including his temporary allies Peng Chong and Liu Yang, Liu Xiu now commanded the major organised forces north of the Yellow River.

IMPERIAL POWER 24-30

Soon after the destruction of Wang Lang, in an attempt to bring this new political player under control, the Gengshi Emperor sent a messenger to enfeoff Liu Xiu as King of Xiao, the county in Pei where he had been brought up, but ordering him also to disband his troops and return to court at Chang'an. Encouraged by his officers, Liu Xiu predictably refused. He concealed his plans from his erstwhile ally the Gengshi general Xie Gong long enough to have him trapped and killed by Wu Han, then sent Wu Han and Geng Yan north to take control in You province.

Some of Liu Xiu's excuse for not dismissing his army was that there was still major threat of banditry, and for the time being he concentrated on the northern plain, eliminating any official opposition, defeating several bandit formations and persuading the men and their leaders to join his army; he received so many troops in this way that the Gengshi court described him as the Bronze Horse Emperor 銅馬帝, after the name of one of the major groups. In the autumn of 24 a wing of the Red Eyebrows crossed the Yellow River into Henei, but Liu Xiu defeated them and drove the remnants south, where they joined the main force advancing west towards Chang'an. By the end of the year the Red Eyebrows had entered the passes and the Gengshi Emperor, already isolated from the bulk of the empire, was trapped. After months of confusion, in the winter of 25 the emperor was forced to surrender, and the region of the former capital fell into total disorder.

In the mean time, as he continued to deal with opposition in the further north, Liu Xiu sent Kou Xun and Feng Yi south into Henei: Kou Xun to take over the administration and Feng Yi to face the Gengshi garrison in Luoyang across the Yellow River. At the end of the summer of 25 they gained a major success and soon afterwards, on 5 August, Liu Xiu acceded to the urgings of his followers and took the imperial title at He 鄴 in Changshan; splitting its character, the county was renamed Gaoyi 高邑 "Eminent City." He proclaimed the reign-title Jianwu 建武 "Establishing Military Power" [Bielenstein: "Inauguration of Firmness"], and he is known to history by his posthumous dynastic title Guangwu 光武 "Military Brilliance." He was thirty years old, and would reign for thirty-two years.

As the Gengshi Emperor fell three months later, and the Red Eyebrows nominee Liu Penzi was clearly a nonentity, Guangwu became chief claimant to the throne. Zhu Wei, commander of the Gengshi troops in Luoyang, surrendered; though formerly a political enemy he was treated generously, and others gained confidence in the opportunity to change sides. Guangwu now set his residence in the recognised imperial city of Luoyang, and he held or acquired control over the greater part of the empire north of the Yellow River.

During 26 the incoherent regime of the peasant-led Red Eyebrows, having exhausted the region of Chang'an, attempted a sortie further to the west, but they were defeated and driven back by Wei Ao, warlord of the upper Wei valley. Returning towards the east, they were attacked with varied success by Guangwu's generals Deng Yu and Feng Yi, and in the spring of 27 they were finally trapped in Hongnong and were forced to surrender. Most were resettled about Luoyang, to provide a basis for the new capital and to keep them under surveillance.

For the time being, Guangwu made no further move towards the west, but relied upon the neutrality of Wei Ao and upon good relations with the more distant Dou Rong, who had taken control of the north-western territories beyond the Yellow River. Instead, over the following years the emperor's strategy aimed for full control of the northern plain and the extension of his authority over the eastern coast. In the north, he suppressed the last of the bandit groups, while dealing also with the rebellion of Liu "Goitre" Yang the King of Zhending, in 26, and the longer-lasting insurrection of Peng Chong in Yuyang from 26 to 28. In both cases much of the trouble came from the emperor's failure to reward earlier support, a decision influenced by the factional interests of closer associates; on the other hand, the campaigns removed regional centres of potential dissidence.

South of the Yellow River, in 26 and 27 Guangwu destroyed his imperial rival Liu Yong, and in 28 he followed that success by campaigns against the remnants of Liu Yong's party under the nominal leadership of his son Liu Yu, and against Zhang Bu, Dong Xian and Li Xian, whose territories ran from the Taishan massif and the Shandong peninsula south along the coast to the basin of the Huai. After steady pressure, in the early autumn of 29 the emperor defeated the combined forces of the warlords, and by the spring of 30 the last opposition had been eliminated.

Closer to home, in 26 the imperial forces destroyed bandit groups about Luoyang and the local leader Zhang Man was captured and killed at the beginning of 27. Armies were also sent south into Nanyang, but a successful campaign was interrupted by the mutiny of Deng Feng, who attacked his commander Wu Han in resentment at the way in which his home territory had been laid waste by the imperial troops. Deng Feng joined forces with the local leader Dong Xin to besiege Wan city, and they were defeated only by Guangwu himself.

Attention then turned to the warlord Qin Feng, based on Nan commandery, his associate Yan Cen, and his southern colleague Tian Rong. By the autumn of 27 the imperial general Cen Peng had forced a crossing of the Han River and set siege to Qin Feng, and in 29 the last resistance was ended: Qin Feng was killed, while Tian Rong and Yan Cen fled through the Yangzi Gorges to join Gongsun Shu in present-day Sichuan.

CONTROL IN THE WEST 30-36

Success in the east and in central China meant that the territories south of the middle and lower Yangzi were brought under control without great difficulty, and by 30 the major leaders in the empire other than Guangwu himself were Wei Ao in the upper Wei Valley, Gongsun Shu in the Sichuan basin, and Dou Rong in the far northwest. Seeing the success of Guangwu in the east, in 29 Dou Rong sent envoys to make an agreement with the new imperial regime, and he remained thereafter a useful ally.

Wei Ao was less easy to deal with. Guangwu held negotiations over several years and offered to respect his independence, but Wei Ao temporised between agreement with Han and alliance with Gongsun Shu to the south. Eventually, as the emperor prepared to attack Gongsun Shu, he sought passage for his troops through Wei Ao's territory and also called for support. Forced to a decision, Wei Ao refused Guangwu's demands, and the imperial armies promptly turned against him. An initial offensive in 30 was unsuccessful, but Wei Ao's counter-attack was easily repelled, and a further campaign in 32 all but destroyed him. A serious disturbance in the region of Yingchuan these interrupted operations, as Guangwu was obliged to return swiftly to the east, but early in 33 Wei Ao died and by the following year the disordered remnants of his followers had been defeated or driven away.

Gongsun Shu was now Guangwu's only major rival. From his capital at Chengdu he had long established control over the Sichuan basin and the upper Han, and he took the imperial title in 25. His territory, however, was isolated from the rest of the empire, and Gongsun Shu showed limited initiative in seeking to expand either north in alliance with Wei Ao or east into the middle Yangzi. While occupied elsewhere, Guangwu was able to maintain peaceable relations until he was in a position to take action.

Following the conquest of Nan commandery in 29, the imperial general Cen Peng prepared defensive positions by the Yangzi Gorges, and in the following year Gongsun Shu sent Tian Rong down river in an attempt to retake his former territory. That offensive was held, and at the same time Guangwu launched an attack on the Han valley in the north, to prevent any break-out into Nanyang.

He then took the occasion to force a decision upon Wei Ao, and the next years were occupied by the destruction of that warlord, while in 33 Gongsun Shu made one more sortie down the Yangzi. His forces set up defences across the river below the Gorges, but they made no further effective move, and in 35 Guangwu sent Cen Peng on a full offensive.

Destroying Gongsun Shu's floating defences and the army which held them, the Han troops advanced to Jiangzhou, present-day Chongqing, then moved against Chengdu in two columns. An advance across the Qin Ling ranges from the Wei valley was aborted by the assassination of the commander Lai Xi, while the southern approach was likewise disrupted by the murder of Can Peng in the winter of 35, but the Grand Marshal Wu Han followed with a second wave of attack and by the end of 36 he had invested Chengdu. Gongsun Shu was killed in a sortie, and Wu Han seized and slaughtered the city. The victorious commanders returned to Luoyang, and in the summer of 37 the emperor held a banquet to celebrate his triumph.

CONSOLIDATION OF EMPIRE

Though Guangwu had no serious opposition within China proper, the frontiers of the empire were not fully under control. The conquest of Gongsun Shu brought the further territories of the southwest face-to-face with the power of Han, and local officials and non-Chinese chieftains swiftly acceded. Ren Gui of Yuexi was granted a royal title and maintained some independence for a few years, but when rebellion broke out in Yizhou commandery in 42 the general Liu Shang put down the rising and restored imperial control. Though the Ailao people from beyond the frontier made trouble in 47, but their attack ran into difficulties and in 51 an Ailao king presented formal submission [see sub Liumiao].

The lower Yangzi had fallen into Guangwu's hands after his success on the North China plain during the 20s, and the territories south of the middle Yangzi, which had been independent for much of the civil war, acceded to his power after Cen Pang conquered Nan commandery in 29. Formally speaking, therefore, the empire extended once more across the Nan Ling dividing range to the far south coast and present-day Vietnam.

There were, however, two major areas of difficulty in this region. Firstly, in the summer of 40 the sisters Zheng Ce and Zheng Er [Vietnamese surname: Tr'ung] raised a rebellion in Jiaozhi commandery, on the Red River delta of northern Vietnam, and the insurgency spread south along the coast and east into Hepu. It was not until 42 that the general Ma Yuan, who became the leading military commander in these later years, was able to gather an army, but after twelve months, his success was complete: the sisters and many of their followers were killed, and Ma Yuan confirmed the authority of Han by seizing the sacred drums of the non-Chinese peoples and melting them down to create the statue of an ideal horse which was set up at Luoyang.

A second problem, more intractable, was presented by the non-Chinese of Wuling commandery, in the hill country west of the Dongting Lake in present-day Hunan, who rebelled in the winter of 47/48. Rebellion in Nan commandery, immediately to the north in the year before, had been put down by Liu Shang, but when he was sent against Wuling his army was trapped among the hills and gorges: the Chinese suffered a disastrous defeat and Liu Shang was killed. Ma Yuan, sent to replace him, was more successful, and though his army suffered and he himself died on campaign in the summer of 49, the enemy were forced to submit.

Wuling nonetheless remained a trouble-spot for the rest of the dynasty, with more major disturbances than any other part of Jing province, and it frequently became a centre for more wide-spread trouble. Chinese migration from the north began with the turmoil of Wang Mang's reign and the following civil war, and it continued through Later Han; and Wuling was on the major route to the south. Many rebellions reflected the resentment of local people at the pressure upon their lands, and though there was considerable settlement in the lands south of the Yangzi the difficulty of the terrain and the energy of the hills tribes meant that Wuling was in fact less settled than commanderies further south.

Along the northern frontiers of the empire the situation was very different. During the 30s trouble amongst the Qiang people of the northwest was put down by Ma Yuan, though many Chinese abandoned the unsettled territory, while Ma Yuan's policy of resettling surrendered Qiang within the frontiers would bring a deal of trouble in later times. The major difficulty, however, was with the Xiongnu.

From the mid-20s the pretender Lu Fang had maintained an imperial claim, first in the region of Anding and then in Shuofang and Wuyuan, on the northern loop of the Yellow River. His position was not strong, but he received support from the Shanyu Yu of the Xiongnu, who was pleased to have a puppet through whom he might press against China. In 30 Lu Fang's forces occupied Dai commandery, and Guangwu was forced onto the defensive.

After the defeat of Wei Ao, in 33 and 34 the Han forces returned to the attack. They gained no success, though an internal quarrel caused Lu Fang to give some ground. Lu Fang eventually withdrew in 42, but the empire received no respite, for the Xiongnu themselves now advanced within the frontiers. As pressure and raiding continued, the greater part of the north was abandoned and Chinese defences were stretched along the north of the plain.

By good fortune for China, the Shanyu Yu died in 46 and, as the northern regions suffered from drought, the state fell into a succession dispute. The prince Bi was indignant at being excluded from an inheritance he considered his due, and after a deal of intrigue he took title as Shanyu in the winter of 48/49. He had only limited support, however, and was soon obliged to entrust his fortunes to China: by 50 he was established in a puppet court in Xihe, with an undertaking to assist in the defence of the borders of Han.

The remarkable reversal allowed the imperial forces to re-occupy all but the furthest-flung frontier territories. The Xiongnu were no longer a major threat, and the other major groups, Wuhuan and Xianbi in the east, became at least nominal allies, with subsidies to encourage their loyalty. From further afield, various tribal states of Korea sent tribute, and in the last year of his life Guangwu received a mission from a ruler of distant Japan.

Some have argued that Guangwu should have taken advantage of the division of the Xiongnu to conquer his weakened enemies and establish dominion over the steppe, but the critical problem was that great areas of the troubled north had been abandoned by Chinese settlers who could neither be convinced nor compelled to return. Given this weakness on the ground, Guangwu's settlement of the north was sensible; it lasted well, and it was broken only by the excessive ambition of Dou Xian at the end of the century. [See Bn 67:126-130; cf. deC 84:417-422.]

THE RESTORATION OF CIVIL AUTHORITY

In 40, a few years after the conclusion of formal civil war, special commissioners were despatched into the provinces and commanderies to carry out an energetic purge of local disorders, whether caused by bandit groups or by leading gentry and their retainers; it appears that the heartland of the empire was largely settled. Also in 40, the traditional wushu currency 五鑄錢 was restored. The five shu weight of copper [3.25 g.] matched the face value of the coin, and promised a measure of financial stability.

The new regime largely accepted the structure of government which had developed under Former Han, so that the arrangements for ministries and local government were restored and Wang Mang's complicated and idealistic reforms and amended titles were abandoned. For most regions of the empire, moreover, the ravages of civil war had been a passing phase: after a few months of misery and disorder a measure of stability was restored by the armies of Han, and in this regard there is sharp contrast to the destructive turmoil which accompanied the fall of the dynasty two hundred years later.

Guangwu, however, did make three notable changes to his administrative inheritance. Firstly, at the capital, the status and significance of the highest officials was considerably amended. In Former Han, the Imperial Chancellor 丞相 had been the single highest officer of the empire, exercising power under the authority of the emperor, with the Imperial Counsellor 御史大夫 [Bielenstein: Grandee Secretary] as his associate holding particular responsibility for censorial matters. These two, and the less regularly appointed Grand Commandant 太尉 or Grand Marshal 大司馬, were known as the Three Excellencies 三公, but the Chancellor was the most senior.

In 8 BC, however, at the end of the reign of Emperor Cheng, a major reform raised the status of the Counsellor [renamed Grand Excellency of Works 大司空; Bn: Grand Minister of Works] and the Grand Marshal and reduced the power of the Chancellor [renamed Grand Excellency over the Masses 大司徒; Bn: Grand Minister over the Masses] to be one amongst equals. The plan, ultimately unsuccessful, was to restrict the growing power of the Wang family, but the result was that highest authority in the bureaucracy was divided among three senior officials. [Loewe 74:257-263, Bn 79:10-11, Bn 80:11-17]. The system had been maintained under the personal rule of Wang Mang, with the Excellencies rather advisers than executive officers of the regime, and the tripartite structure was inherited by Later Han.

Guangwu was an active emperor. During the civil war he had travelled widely across eastern and central China, leading troops in support of his generals in the field, and frequently sent instructions on strategy. In later years he continued to travel and to take an active interest in affairs of state, and while he would accept advice, and held court conferences to discuss questions of policy, he was determined to maintain control over the government and had no wish to delegate serious power to any subordinate.

In 25, therefore, Guangwu appointed Wu Han as Grand Marshal, Deng Yu as Grand Excellency over the Masses, and Wang Liang as Grand Excellency of Works; in 51 the title of the Grand Marshal was changed to Grand Commandant, while the prefix "Grand" was removed from the other two Excellencies. Furthermore, while Wu Han continued in his office until his death in 44, Guangwu frequently changed the occupants of the two civilian offices, and resented any attempt by the incumbents to interfere in his conduct of government. He was particularly firm with the pretensions of the various Excellencies over the Masses, who might otherwise have sought to match the authority of the old Imperial Chancellors and, as Bielenstein observes, there was a gradual shift in power within the triumvirate, so that the Grand Commandant was eventually seen as holding higher authority than the other two Excellencies. [On this process, see particularly Bn 67:60-68.]

Authority in the government of Later Han was thus firmly in the hands of the sovereign, and the chiefs of the bureaucracy had censorial and advisory rather than executive power. The system worked well for Guangwu and his immediate successors, but it rendered the dynasty increasingly vulnerable in later reigns, when younger, less energetic or less competent rulers came to the throne.

Secondly, though Guangwu largely maintained the structure of local government established by Former Han, with a hierarchy of counties and commanderies supervised by provinces, he made a number of changes. In 30 he abolished over four hundred of the more than 1,500 county administrations recorded in 2 AD; the reductions, primarily in the North China plain and on the northern frontier, reflect depopulation due to the flooding of the Yellow River in the one region, trouble with the Xiongnu and other non-Chinese in the second. Furthermore, though some were briefly revived, by the end of his reign Guangwu had confirmed the ending of the kingdoms established under the Former Han, combining ten former states into neighbouring commanderies. On the other hand, by 37 there were 137 marquisates of the imperial house, 365 which were classed as rewards for worthy subjects, with 45 held by imperial relatives by marriage or granted by imperial favour. As Bielenstein observes, the pensions reserved for these fiefs meant a considerable reduction in the tax revenues available to the central government [Bn 67:44-46].

Still more significantly for the longer term, the new regime relinquished control over the former monopolies of salt, iron and other minerals. In Former Han, these had been controlled by the Minister of Finance 大司農 [Bn: Grand Minister of Agriculture] at the capital, but from the time of Guangwu their responsibility rested with the local commandery units, while water control and the taxation of fishermen were similarly decentralised. Though they were required to submit annual reports and accounts, the heads of commandery units had a deal more independence than in the past. In 36, it was ordered that the heads of provinces should no longer come to court to present their reports, and in 42 the high-ranking Governors 牧 of provinces were replaced once more by regional Inspectors 刺史, who had no executive civil power but only the right to report to the throne on particular occasions and in limited number of fields.

Finally, we must note the abolition of compulsory military service across the bulk of the empire. Under Former Han, each male citizen had been liable for military service, supervised by the local Commandant 尉, which entailed a period of training as a Skilled Soldier [材官 caiguan], Cavalryman [騎士 jishi] or sailor in a Towered Warship [樓船 louchuan], followed by a year at the capital, on the frontier or in the provinces. Thereafter, they returned home to the local militia, which held an annual exercise and inspection each autumn.

In 30 AD, however, among the inner commanderies of the empire the position of Commandant was removed, with all military responsibilities transferred to the Administrator, and the annual manoeuvres were discontinued. In the following year, the units of Skilled Soldiers, Cavalrymen and sailors were also disbanded, and training was thereafter carried out through the organisation of People's Sections [民伍 minwu], presumably a form of home guard. General liability for conscription remained, men of the frontier were still called up for training, and on occasion of major banditry or rebellion the appointment of a Commandant to the relevant commandery may have indicated a short-term revival, but for the most part the citizens of Later Han were unskilled in arms and of limited use for major warfare.

By the closing stages of the civil war, Guangwu's intention was clearly to reduce the number of men under arms and so lessen the likelihood of future insurrections within the empire: the new policy meant a reduction in the military ability of future bandits and rebels, as well as those of the local loyal forces. From the evidence, it appears that this remained the policy of Later Han, and there was no attempt to restore the Former Han tradition of a nation under arms and an effective militia. Instead, the gengfu 更賦 military tax served as a source of revenue for the government, and volunteer recruitment provided a regular army. [See deC 84:48-50 & 467-468 and Lewis 2000; in contrast, Bielenstein argues that full conscription was maintained: Bn 80:191-192.]

As observed above, though unpleasant for each region in its short-term effects, the rebellion against Wang Mang and the civil war which followed proved comparatively benign in the longer term. Despite widespread brigandage and the scourge of the Red Eyebrows, much of the social, political and economic structure which had developed over the two centuries of Former Han survived remarkably intact, so the restoration of the dynasty and the establishment of a new government were made easier. At the same, most families which had held power in the country at large were likewise able to recover their position, while social and economic developments which had appeared in Former Han were encouraged by Guangwu's policies: in particular, his decentralisation of power meant that local gentry and their interests held increasing importance for the future of the dynasty.

RITUAL AND SCHOLARSHIP

From his accession to the throne in 25, Guangwu followed traditional patterns of legitimacy: ceremonies of respect to the gods of Heaven, of the Soils and Grains 社稷, and to his imperial predecessors, including the restoration of their tombs and the construction of an Imperial Ancestral Temple 宗廟 and an Altar of Heaven [the Southern Altar 南郊] at the new capital, Luoyang [Bn 76:54-56]. He also proclaimed amnesties, made general grants of noble ranks, and issued a number of edicts to apply the laws more humanely, including the freeing of slaves and the release of some prisoners.

On campaign in the east in 29, Guangwu ordered the Excellency Song Hong to offer sacrifice to Confucius, and in the spring of 56, one year before his death, he was persuaded to celebrate the Feng and Shan 封禪 sacrifices on Mount Tai 泰山 and its secondary peak

Mount Liangfu 梁父山; the occasion was marked by the proclamation of a new reign period, Zhongyuan 中元. About the same time he arranged for construction of the Spiritual Terrace 靈臺, the Bright Hall 明堂 and the Hall of the Circular Moat 辟雍, and prepared the Altar of Earth [the Northern Altar 北郊], where he held sacrifice just a few weeks before his death.

The Feng and Shan sacrifices and the ceremonial buildings, however, had lower priority than the Imperial University 太學, with its staff of Academicians 博士 [Bielenstein: Erudits] and junior staff 弟子 [variously understood as "disciples" or "students"]. Academicians were appointed as early as 26, and the emperor paid a formal visit to the new University buildings in 29. Though he had limited training in the classics it is clear that he was personally concerned with the fields of scholarship which were sponsored there.

Guangwu was strongly influenced by the theories of the New Text tradition, including the apocrypha 讖緯 and their many portents. During the civil war all sides made use of sayings and signs as propaganda, and though Guangwu was a rational man in most respects, and was not interested in any quest for immortality, he was nonetheless influenced by prognostications: he used them to select some senior officials, and he became angry when Huan Tan, Zheng Xing and Yin Min discounted their value. The official fields of study concerned the five classics of Changes, History, Poetry, Ritual and Chunqiu, all but one of the sixteen chairs established during his reign belonged to the New Text, and the one exception, granted to Li Feng a master of Zuo zhuan, was not maintained after his death. In 56, moreover, Guangwu proclaimed that the apocrypha were to be considered part of the Confucian canon, and the works and the theories associated with them were thus respected and preserved throughout the dynasty and beyond.

Guangwu died on 29 March 57, aged sixty-two by Chinese reckoning. He was awarded the temple name Shizu 世祖 "Epochal Founder", and his tomb, which had been constructed to the southeast of Luoyang was named "Mound of Beginning" 元陵. Guangwu had sought to establish a reputation for frugality and modest living, and his testament ordered that funeral and mourning should be carried out simply, as in the case of Emperor Wen of Former Han. Unlike the previous dynasty, no special county was established for his tomb, and this model was followed by his successors. -HHS 1A-B*; Bn 54 and appendix # 83, Bn 59, Bn 67, Bn 79.

Liu Xiu 劉脩, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Huan, perhaps by his concubine the Lady Feng II, in 166 she was appointed Senior Princess of Yangdi in Yingchuan. -HHS 10B:462.

Liu Xiu 劉脩/修 [Bolin 伯麟] (105-171). A man of family, after nomination as Filial and Incorrupt Liu Xiu became a gentleman cadet, but left that post for a mourning period. He returned to local office in his province, then became a clerk under the Excellency over the Masses at the capital and was later appointed as a county magistrate in Runan. We are told that he had many clients and students, while his subjects showed deep sorrow when he retired from office. He died at the age of sixty-seven, and a stele inscription was prepared for his tomb. -LS 8:13a-14b.

Liu Xiu 劉脩 [Jixu 季緒]; Shanyang. A son of Liu Biao, presumably a half-brother of Liu Zong and Liu Ji, Liu Xiu accompanied Liu Zong when he surrendered to Cao Cao in 208. About 210 he became Administrator of Dong'an, a commandery which had been established towards the end of Later Han from the north of Langye. He composed a number of poems, rhapsodies and formal hymns. -SGZ 19:560.

Liu Xu 劉翽; Taishan. During the disorders which accompanied the fall of Wang Mang in 23, Liu Xu and Yuan Zeng of Dongping raised local troops. Liu Xu took title as Colonel Thrice Venerable 校三老, and Yuan Zeng as Chief Assistant Officer 都從事; in this they reflected the pattern of the Red Eyebrows: see sub Fan Chong. Their forces ravaged the lower reaches of the Yellow River in present-day northern Shandong.

When the Gengshi Emperor established his government in 23, Yuan Zeng and Liu Xu sent messages of submission. Liu Xu was named Administrator of Ji'nan and an acting chief general, while Yuan Zeng received similar recognition. They continued, however, to act as independent warlords.

Later that year Yuan Zeng was killed by his own officers, and Liu Xu took over the combined forces. The Gengshi Emperor granted him honorary title as a marquis, without substantive fief, and he also ordered Liu Xu to disband his troops and return to his home country. Liu Xu appears to have obeyed, for he is not heard of again. -HHS 21/11:752; Bn 59:41.

Liu Xu 劉翽 (d.81). Son of Liu Liang, formerly King but then Duke of Zhao, Liu Xu succeeded his father in 41. In 43 his fief was raised once more to be a kingdom. Liu Xu normally resided on his estates, but in 56 he attended court for the New Year celebrations, and in 62 Emperor Ming came on tour and met him at Ye city in Wei.

In 54 two of Liu Xu's sons were granted district marquisates, and in 77 another ten sons obtained village fiefs. When Liu Xu died he was succeeded by his son Shang, and another three sons later received village fiefs. -HHS 14/4:559, 3:141; Bn 54 appendix # 84, Bn 67:29.

Liu Xu 劉盱. Administrator of Longxi in 56, as the Shenlang group of the Qiang raided Wudu commandery he sent a relief force which defeated them.

In the autumn of the following year the Shaodang leader Dianyu attacked east along the Yellow River. Liu Xu sent men to face him, but they were driven back into Jincheng. Further reinforcements were sent under the Internuncio Zhang Hong, but they too were heavily defeated. -HHS 1B:84, 87/77:2879; deC 84:79.

HHS 3:157 says that thirty years later, after the death of Fu Yu the Protector of the Qiang in 87, Liu Xu took over his position and defeated the Shaodang Qiang in Jincheng. HHS 87/77:2882, however, says that Zhang Yu became Protector after the death of Fu Yu and that it was he who defeated the Shaodang. It is probable that the belated reference to Liu Xu is a mistake.

Liu Xu 劉盱. Marquis of Liu'an in Lujiang, at some time in the 50s he was persuaded by Dou Mu and his family, using a forged edict of the Dowager Yin of Emperor Guangwu, that he should divorce his wife. He then married a daughter of Dou Mu, who thus obtained control of a coherent parcel of counties to form a family fief in the region.

In 61 the family of Liu Xu's divorced wife complained to the throne and Emperor Zhang was extremely angry. He dismissed Dou Mu and his relatives from all their offices, and appointed an Internuncio specifically to supervise their conduct. -HHS 23/13:808.

It is possible that this Liu Xu is the same man as the frontier commander described above, but there is no record of that Liu Xu being enfeoffed, and he appears to have always been engaged in the northwest. The marquis Liu Xu was probably a cadet member of the imperial family.

Liu Xu 劉續 (d.184). Son of Liu De, King of Anping, he succeeded his father in 151. In the following year he was ordered to travel to Hejian to attend the funeral of the honorary Dowager Yan Ming, mother of Emperor Huan [HHS 10B:442, refers to Liu Bao, King of Anping, but Liu Bao was the King of Changshan, and he had died a month before the entombment: see sub voce and HHS 7:297. It is probable that both men, as kings of neighbouring territories, were ordered to attend, and the text has conflated their names and titles].

Early in 184 Liu Xu was kidnapped by the Yellow Turbans. A ransom was levied from the people of the state and he was restored to the throne. When the state Chancellor Li Xie argued that Liu Xu had failed to maintain the principles of a true vassal, he was overruled and sent to prison for insulting the imperial clan, but a few months later Liu Xu was indeed found guilty of impiety. He was executed and the kingdom was abolished. -HHS 50/40:1674, 63/53:2091, 10B:442.

Liu Xuan 劉宣 [Zigao 子高]; Nanyang. Liu Xuan was a younger cousin of Liu Chong 崇 the Marquis of Anzhong in Nanyang, who made an unsuccessful rebellion against Wang Mang in 6 AD and was killed [Bn 54:88]. HHS 25/15:872 says that Liu Xuan did not take part, but he refused to serve the Xin dynasty: he changed his name and retired to a life of scholarship.

After Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, had taken the imperial title, Liu Xuan went to his court and was granted the marquise of Anzhong [but on this renewal of the fief see sub Liu Chong 寵].

Liu Xuan 劉玄 [Shenggong 聖公] (d.25) [the Gengshi 更始 Emperor (reg. 23-25)]; Nanyang. Liu Xuan's grandfather Liu Li 利, sometime Administrator of Cangwu, was a brother of Liu Ren 仁, Marquis of Chongling district in Caiyang county in Nanyang. The first marquis had been a grandson of Emperor Jing by Liu Fa 發 the King of Changsha. The fief had been originally in Lingling commandery, but it was transferred to Caiyang in the time of Emperor Xuan.

Liu Li's son Zizhang 子張, Liu Xuan's father, lived in Caiyang county, and Liu Xuan was born to his wife from the He 何 family of Pinglin district in Sui county. All these territories lay in the south of Nanyang commandery, east of present-day Xiangfan in Henan. Liu Xuan was a distant cousin of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu of Later Han, and his elder brother Liu Bosheng.

Early in the reign of Wang Mang, about 10AD, when the members of the Liu family had lost the prestige of their distant imperial connection, Liu Zizhang killed a local officer who had insulted him while drunk. No official action was taken, but ten years later, about 20, a son of the murdered man killed Zizhang's son Qian 騫, younger brother of Liu Xuan. Liu Xuan gathered supporters to renew the vendetta, but his men became drunk and jeered at the local captain of the watch, who promptly arrested them.

Liu Xuan fled to his mother's family district of Pinglin, leaving his cousin Liu Ci to take vengeance on their enemies. The local authorities in Caiyang arrested Liu Zizhang, but Liu Xuan let it be known that he was dead, and had his retainers carry out his funeral in Chongling. Liu Zizhang was released on compassionate grounds so that he might attend the ceremony, and father and son escaped together.

Liu Zizhang does not appear again in the records, but about 22, as famine affected the region and bandit groups appeared, Liu Xuan joined the Troops from Pinglin. Chen Mu and Liao Zhan, leaders of that force, made Liu Xuan an officer responsible for discipline in their erratic array. Soon afterwards the Troops from Pinglin joined the Han rebellion led by Liu Bosheng, and early in 23, after the victories at Jiyang and Yuyang and as the rebel army set siege to the city of Wan, capital of Nanyang commandery, Liu Xuan was named General of the New Beginning [Gengshi] 更始; confusingly, the same title was held by one of Wang Mang's officers. Now, however, the bandit chieftains held a caucus without the leaders of the Nanyang gentry, and they chose Liu Xuan to take the imperial title and act as their titular leader against Wang Mang. Liu Bosheng sought to dissuade them but was unsuccessful, and on 11 March 23, by the banks of the Yu River outside Wan city, Liu Xuan was placed upon a throne. He issued an amnesty, granted titles and nominal fiefs to over a hundred supporters and members of the imperial house, and took Gengshi as his reign-title. Since he was awarded no dynastic or temple name after his death Liu Xuan is known to history as the Gengshi Emperor.

Wan city fell in the summer, and three days later another Han army was victorious at Kunyang in Yingchuan. Very soon afterwards Liu Bosheng, who had held command at the successful siege of Wan, was accused of treason and executed. Liu Xuan now held undisputed authority among the forces of Han, while the battle of Kunyang had destroyed Wang Mang's major forces outside the region of the capital. Forced onto the defensive, he was also threatened by a plot in his capital, Chang'an, and by the insurrections of Wei Ao in Tianshui and of Deng Ye and Yu Kuang in Hongnong and western Nanyang.

Seizing the Wu Pass, which guarded the capital province from the southeast, Deng Ye and Yu Kuang moved into Hongnong and invited the Han troops to join them. Two armies were sent: Shentu Jian and Li Song led one towards Chang'an while a second column under Wang Kuang laid siege to Luoyang. Wang Mang's last field force was sent to Huayin to hold the mouth of the Wei River, but Deng Ye and Yu Kuang, possibly aided by the main Han army, outflanked the defence line and defeated the enemy.

Deng Ye and Li Song then invested the Capital Granary, also in Huayin county, but in the mean time Chang'an was overrun and plundered by local insurgents claiming to act in the name of Han. On 6 October 23 Wang Mang was killed; his head was sent to the Gengshi Emperor at Wan and was displayed in the market-place.

Soon afterwards the city of Luoyang also fell to the Han forces, and by the beginning of winter the Gengshi Emperor had taken up residence there. At the same time, continuing a program established after the victory at Kunyang in the summer, he sent messengers east and north to persuade local officials of Wang Mang to surrender and to arrange a peaceful transition to the new regime. These men held the Staff of Authority, which formally commissioned them to make appointments at every level in the provinces and to restore the legal system of Han. The new emperor also made contact with Fan Chong and other leaders of the Red Eyebrows bandits, and persuaded them to accept his suzerainty. They were made marquises of title, without specific territories, but Fan Chong and his colleagues soon returned to their own followers and maintained their independence.

At the beginning of 24 Liu Xuan transferred his court from Luoyang west to Chang'an. One reason was that the attitude and policies of Shentu Jian, Han commander in the west, had disaffected the local people and their leaders. The imperial presence was needed to restore order in the region about the greatest city in the empire, and the emperor had already sent his cousin and Imperial Chancellor Liu Ci to make repairs to the palaces and temples in readiness for occupation. As Bielenstein observes, however, the decisive point was that the gentry supporters of the new regime were anxious to remove their master from his connection with the commoner leaders of the Troops; critical to the initial success of the rebellion, these chieftains were now seen as rivals for influence. Bielenstein also argues that the transfer of the capital to Chang'an was a fatal mistake: the emperor was isolated from his allies and resources in the east, while if enemies broke the defence lines of the passes the government would be trapped.

Liu Xuan moved to Chang'an in the spring of 24, and awarded royal fiefs to his early supporters. He did this despite the opposition of the chieftain Zhu Wei, who argued that Han tradition allowed title as king to be held only by members of the imperial house; he refused to accept such a grant. The balance of political power, however, had changed, and Liu Xuan was now under the influence of Li Song and Zhao Meng, who urged the claims of the Nanyang gentry. Zhao Meng became one of three Grand Marshals, while Li Song replaced Liu Ci as Imperial Chancellor. Liu Xuan had been elected as titular head of the Han rebellion by the commoner chieftains, and thus owed his imperial position to their support, but he had now largely distanced himself from them, and neither he nor his ruling clique had any natural allies.

There are a number of anecdotes and sayings to indicate that the Gengshi Emperor had lost control of his followers, that men of poor quality were receiving appointments, and that his court was degenerating into disorder, but some part of those accounts were no doubt hostile propaganda from rival interests. In the course of 24 the new regime obtained the support of the Wei family, warlords in the west, and Wei Ao accepted a position at court. The agreement still left most local power in the hands of the Wei family, while further afield the authority of the new government was yet more limited. The local leader Lu Fang was recognised in the north but gave only a minimal show of loyalty; and to the east Zhang Pu of Langye was able to defy the imperial forces in the Shandong peninsula, while Dong Xian from Donghai was master of the seaboard and the plain between the Yangzi and the Yellow River. The loyalist Bao Yong achieved some success in the area of present-day Shanxi, Liu Jia gained Hanzhong and Liu Xin occupied Yuzhang but, far more important for the future, Liu Bosheng's brother Liu Xiu, sent initially as a commissioner to the northeast, defeated the rebel Wang Lang and established himself as the most powerful military commander north of the Yellow River.

In the summer the Gengshi Emperor sent an officer to enfeoff Liu Xiu as a king, but added instructions that he should disband his army and come to Chang'an. Liu Xiu accepted the royal title but refused to demobilise, and he extended his area of control northeast into You province, at the expense of the officials appointed by the emperor. He was effectively independent, and though he had not yet claimed the imperial title he was nonetheless at war with Liu Xuan.

By the second half of 24 the writ of the Gengshi Emperor had largely ceased to run outside the capital district, while hordes of the Red Eyebrows, defeated on the plain by Liu Xiu, were approaching from the east. During the winter three separate groups of bandits entered the passes on their way to Chang'an, and in the first month of 25 they joined in Hongnong, with numbers described as 300,000 men. At the same time Liu Xiu's general Deng Yu advanced on the north of the Yellow River and laid siege to Anyi, capital of Henei; this second front was a major distraction for Liu Xuan's attempts to deal with the Red Eyebrows.

The Red Eyebrows moved very slowly, but in the third month they inflicted a critical defeat on an imperial army led by Su Mao and Li Song. Li Song fled back to Chang'an while Su Mao took refuge with Zhu Wei, now isolated in Luoyang. In the summer the Gengshi Emperor sent Wang Kuang and other commoner leaders of Troops to attack Deng Yu, but they too were heavily defeated, and by autumn Deng Yu held all the commandery.

A multitude of rivals had now claimed the imperial title. At the beginning of the year Fang Wang made a claim on behalf of the Young Prince Liu Ying; though that party was swiftly destroyed, in the southwest Gongsun Shu named himself emperor in the early summer; while the Red Eyebrows put forward their own candidate, Liu Penzi, in the sixth month. Still more important, and at almost the same time, on 5 August 25 Liu Xiu cast aside pretence and set himself upon an imperial throne.

The outlook for Liu Xuan was very limited. As the Red Eyebrows approached, Wei Ao, Shentu Jian and other gentlemen proposed that he abdicate in favour of Liu Liang, uncle of Liu Xiu, in hope they might make common cause against the bandits. When Liu Xuan refused, Wei Ao and his associates joined Zhang Ang and other leaders of Troops in a plan to plunder the court and abandon the city. The emperor discovered the plot and killed Shentu Jian, but Wei Ao escaped back to the northwest and the other conspirators attacked the palace and drove Liu Xuan to take refuge with Zhao Meng outside the city. Li Song and Zhao Meng counter-attacked and forced the rebels from Chang'an, but the commoner chieftains now joined the Red Eyebrows, and at the end of autumn the bandits entered the capital.

As the victors installed their nominee Liu Penzi, Liu Xuan fled the city, but in the tenth month he was taken by one of his own officers and forced to surrender. He was initially granted a marquise, then named King of Changsha, but he was sent to herd horses in the countryside near the capital. A few weeks later the chieftains persuaded the Red Eyebrows leader Xie Lu to have Liu Xuan strangled.

His loyal supporter Liu Gong recovered Liu Xuan's body and Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, later gave orders that he be buried at Baling 霸陵, by the tomb of Emperor Wen of Former Han. His widow, with his son Liu Qiu and two younger brothers, also took refuge at Luoyang, and the young men were granted marquises. -HHS 11/1:467-76*, DGHJ 23:1a-2b [on account of a taboo, the personal name appears in that text as Yuan 元], XC 1:2a-b; Bn 54 and appendix # 78, Bn 59.

Liu Xuan 劉宣; Jingzhao. In 142 Liu Xuan was Administrator of Shu commandery. Special imperial commissioners reported unfavourably on his government, but he and others were protected by Liang Ji and the court eunuchs. The censorial officer Chong Gao then pressed the case, and Liu Xuan and a number of his fellows were impeached and dismissed.

Liu Xuan was evidently restored to favour soon afterwards: in 144 he was Minister of the Household and joined the reformist Li Gu in a memorial criticising the quality of recent appointees in the provinces and commanderies, the wastefulness of their tours of inspection, and their lack of attention to the practical details of government. Orders were then issued for a purge of corrupt officials. -HHS 56/46:1827, 63/53:2082, HYGZ 3:34.

Liu Xun 劉巡. Son of Liu Qiu and grandson of Liu

Xuan the Gengshi Emperor, Liu Xun inherited the marquisate of Chengyang in Langye, maintaining sacrifices to the late emperor. His fief was later transferred to a county in Hedong.

At the time of the alleged conspiracy involving Liu Ying the King of Chu in 71, Liu Xun and others were implicated by the confessions of Yan Zhong and Wang Ping. They were liable to execution, but the censorial officer Han Lang persuaded Emperor Ming to doubt the accusation. -HHS 11/1:476, HHJ 10:123, HHSJJ 41/31:1506; Bn 54 appendix # 133.

Liu Xun 劉循; Nanyang. Son of Liu Can, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 14/4:568; Bn 54 appendix # 132.

Liu Xun 劉巡 (d.111). Elder son of Liu Dang the King of Lecheng, probably by a concubine, he was enfeoffed as a county marquis. When his father died in 96 the royal inheritance was awarded to Liu Xun's younger brother Liu Chong, who died, however, two months later. Liu Chong left no sons and the kingdom was ended, but in the following year the fief was restored in favour of Liu Xun. -HHS 50/40:1673.

Liu Xun 劉遜 miswritten for Liu Jian 劉建, King of Hejian.

Liu Xun 劉勳 [Zitai 子臺]; Langye. As a magistrate in Pei during the late 180s Liu Xun became a close friend of Cao Cao. About 194 Yuan Shu appointed him Administrator of Lujiang, and in 199 he received the remnants of Yuan Shu's party at his capital, Huan city.

Sun Ce, warlord south of the Yangzi and an old rival of Liu Xun, was concerned at his increased power. He encouraged Liu Xun to attack south into Yuzhang to obtain supplies, but then left a detachment to cut him off and led his own army to seize Huan. Liu Xun sought help from Liu Biao and his general Huang Zu, but they too were defeated and Liu Xun fled north to Cao Cao. Named a general and enfeoffed as a marquis, he served for some time as Administrator of Henei, but his retainers were ill-disciplined and troublesome.

In 213 Liu Xun joined in recommending Cao Cao for the honour of the Nine Distinctions and enfeoffment as Duke of Wei. He became an associate of the Heir Cao Pi, but later presumed upon Cao Cao's favour and was executed for extortion and corruption. -SGZ 12:387, SGZ Wu 1:1104; deC 90:188-190.

Liu Xun 劉勳 [Ziheng 子璜]. Former Commandant of the Tiger Tooth Camp by Chang'an, about 191 Liu Xun quarrelled with Yuan Shao, who killed him. -SGZ 8:243, 7:236.

Liu Xun 劉循; Jiangxia. Grandson of Liu Yan 焉, Governor and warlord of Yi province, and son of his successor Liu Zhang, Liu Xun married a daughter of Pang Xi. When Liu Zhang left Chang'an to join Liu Yan in the early 190s, Liu Xun and his brother Liu Chan remained in the capital with their cousins the children of Liu Fan and Liu Dan.

In 194 Liu Fan and Liu Dan were involved in a failed attack on the regime and were killed, but Pang Xi managed to bring the rest of the family to the west. When Liu Bei deposed Liu Zhang in 214, Pang Xi persuaded him to allow Liu Xun to remain in Yi province, and Liu Xun later became General of the Household for the Equipage at the court of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 1:870.

Liu Xun 劉勳; Langye. In the latter part of the second century Liu Xun was Administrator of Henei. His twenty-year-old daughter had had a recurring ulcer in her left knee for some seven years. The celebrated doctor Hua Tuo cured her by a complex process which drove out a snake from the wound. -HHS 82/72B:2736-37.

Liu Ya 劉牙 see Liu Gai 劉丐.

Liu Yan 劉延, the Lady: see the Lady Liu Ying 劉迎.

Liu Yan 劉續 see Liu Bosheng 劉伯升.

Liu Yan 劉延; Nanyang. As Minister of the Imperial Clan for the new Emperor Guangwu in 25, Liu Yan was sent north into Shangdang with the general Feng Yin. They were opposed by the Gengshi officer Tian Yi, and though they captured Tian Yi's wife and family, they could make no progress. Tian Yi later sent envoys to submit directly to Guangwu at Luoyang.

Though he was evidently a member of the imperial house, Liu Yan does not appear again in the records. -HHS 28/18A:969.

Liu Yan 劉延 (d.89). Son of Emperor Guangwu by his first empress the Lady Guo, in 39 Liu Yan was enfeoffed as Duke of Huaiyang.

Though Guangwu deposed the Empress Guo in 41, he promoted Liu Yan and his brothers to be kings at that time. They remained at the capital until 52, when Liu Yan and all but the youngest of his full brothers were sent out to their kingdoms. Two years later Liu Yan's fief was increased by four counties from Runan. He and his brothers returned on occasion to court, and in 67 Liu Yan was called to meet Emperor Ming on tour in Runan.

In 73, however, Liu Yan was accused of involvement in witchcraft and sorcery and of plotting rebellion, and further investigation implicated a large number of people; those executed included the Excellency Xing Mu and Emperor Ming's brother-in-law Han Guang, husband of the Princess Liu Hongfu. It was proposed that Liu Yan should also be killed, and though the emperor did not take that advice, he transferred him to be King of Fuling in Jiujiang, with a state of only two counties.

As Bielenstein observes, the accusation against Liu Yan followed the problems with Liu Jing and then the alleged treason of Liu Ying the King of Chu, in which Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan had been implicated. The ramifications of the latter affair were still fresh, and Emperor Ming was constantly suspicious. Liu Yan is described as proud and arrogant, and he and his royal brothers may have been inappropriately interested in the occult, but there is no good evidence of organised conspiracy.

Three years later, however, at the beginning of the reign of Emperor Zhang, Liu Yan was again accused of conspiracy, this time with his son Liu Fang, and senior officials urged that they should both be brought to the capital in a cage cart. The new ruler pardoned Liu Fang, but he demoted Liu Yan to be a marquis and reduced his fief to just one county.

In 87 Emperor Zhang came on tour to the lower Yangzi and called Liu Yan and his family to meet him at Shouchun, the capital of Jiujiang. Touched by his miserable appearance, he restored four counties to his fief and, because Fuling was low-lying and unhealthy, permitted him to shift his capital to Shouchun. He also gave generous presents, and in the following year Liu Yan was permitted to pay court at the capital.

After Liu Yan's death in 89 his son Chong succeeded him, but the new government of Emperor He took away his father's augmentation and the fief was reduced once more to a single county. Besides Liu Fang, who later received the succession, twelve younger sons of Liu Yan were granted district and village marquisates in 96. *-HHS 42/32:1444-45; Bn 67:27-31, 35.

Liu Yan 劉焉 (d.90). Youngest son of Emperor Guangwu by his first empress the Lady Guo, in 39 Liu Yan was enfeoffed as Duke of Zuopingyi, being the eastern part of the full commandery of Zuopingyi; his elder full brother Liu Fu received the other half of the territory [Bn 67:27 citing the modern commentator Hui Dong].

In 41 Liu Yan and his brothers were promoted to be kings, and when his full brothers were sent out to their states in 52, Liu Yan, as the youngest, was permitted to remain at Luoyang. Two years later his fief was transferred to Zhongshan, but he continued to reside in the capital district, where he maintained a substantial estate.

In the winter of 59, early in the reign of his half-brother Emperor Ming, Liu Yan joined the other kings, who had been summoned to Luoyang for a ceremony at the Hall of the Circular Moat, and he was then ordered to leave with the others and take up residence in his fief. An edict noted his skill at archery and awarded him a special force of guards, while because of the favour he had received in the past he was permitted to visit Luoyang at his own volition. Soon afterwards, however, there was some scandal involving Xue Xiu, the Chancellor of Liu Yan's state.

In 72 Liu Yan strangled his concubine the Lady Han Xu for some fault. The Chancellor [possibly Zhang Chen q.v.] reported him, and Liu Yan was punished by the loss of one county from his fief. He was nonetheless favoured by the young Emperor Zhang, and during the late 70s he resided again for some time at the capital [see sub Zong Yi].

When Liu Yan died in 90, power at court was in the hands of the Dowager Dou and her brothers; that family was descended from Liu Qiang, former Heir and late King of Donghai, by his daughter the Princess of Piyang, who had married Dou Xun. Liu Yan was thus a full great-uncle to the dowager, and she arranged a most extravagant funeral. Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan, full brother of Liu Yan, and Liu Qiang's nephew Liu Zheng, who had succeeded him as King of Donghai, were both brought to the capital, while vast numbers of men worked on the tomb and its "spirit way" 神道, lined with stele. Supplies of cedar for the coffins, normally obtained from Changshan, Julu and Zhuo, were exhausted, and thousands of workmen were despatched throughout six provinces to collect more. Hitherto 300,000 cash and 30,000 lengths of cloth had been allocated to obsequies for the sons of Emperor Guangwu, and a third as much for their successors. On this occasion, however, the cost was a million cash, far beyond any other royal funeral.

Liu Yan was succeeded by his son Xian, and eleven younger sons were later granted marquisates. -HHS

42/32:1449-50*; Bn 67:21-30.

Liu Yan 劉弇; Nanyang. Son of Liu Zun, he succeeded to his marquisate, but died without an heir and the fief was ended. In 67 Emperor Ming recalled the favour in which his father had held Liu Yan's grandfather Liu Shun, and he granted district marquisates to three of Liu Yan's elder cousins. -HHS 14/4:566; Bn 54 appendix # 131.

Liu Yan 劉衍 (d.125). Son of Emperor Ming by an unknown concubine, in 72 Liu Yan was enfeoffed as King of Xiapi, hitherto Linhuai commandery. A good-looking young man, he was a close companion of his half-brother Emperor Zhang, who celebrated his cap of manhood by generous gifts to his tutors and the staff of his household. In 79 the value of Liu Yan's fief was enlarged by the revenues from five counties in Jiujiang.

When Emperor Zhang died in 88, Liu Yan and his brothers were ordered to leave the capital. Soon afterwards he became seriously ill, and there was question about the succession, for his eldest son Liu Ang had been found guilty of some crime. Each of Liu Yan's concubines urged the claims of her own son, and Emperor He sent their mutual half-brother, Liu Gong the King of Pengcheng, to adjudicate between the rivals. Liu Cheng was chosen, but as it turned out Liu Yan lived another thirty-five years. -HHS 50/40:1674-75*.

Liu Yan 劉延. Son of Liu Dao the King of Pengcheng, and younger brother of his successor Liu Ding, in 146 he and eight other brothers were made village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1671.

Liu Yan 劉焉 of Changsha was Inspector of Qing province. -LS 27:9b.

Liu Yan 劉焉 [Junlang 君郎/朗] (d.194); Jiangxia. Descended by a concubine family from Liu Yi, who had held a marquisate in Jiangxia, as a young man Liu Yan served in the offices of his commandery and of Jing province. A member of the imperial clan, albeit of junior and secondary lineage, he received appointment as a gentleman cadet, but left office after the death of his teacher and patron the Excellency Zhu Tian in 160.

Liu Yan retired into the hill country of Yingchuan, where he maintained a school of spiritual education 精學, but in 164 or 166 he was nominated Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright, entered the offices of the Excellency over the Masses, and began a successful official career. At one time or another he held the important posts of Prefect of Luoyang, Inspector of You and of Ji provinces, Administrator of Nanyang, Minister of the Imperial Clan and Minister of Ceremonies.

Towards the end of the reign of Emperor Ling, observing the disorder which had followed the turmoil of the Yellow Turban rebellion, Liu Yan argued that much of the trouble was due to the weakness and poor quality of the provincial Inspectors 刺史. He urged they be replaced by Governors 牧, who would be of higher rank and hold greater authority over the commanderies of their regions. After the deaths of Zhang Yi in Bing province and of Geng Bi in Liang, the policy was approved in 188. Liu Yan, Liu Yu and Huang Wan were appointed to Yi, You and Yu provinces while maintaining their ministerial rank. Inspectors were still appointed, but from this time on provincial units and their Governors began to dominate the politics of the empire and the strategy of the approaching civil war.

For his own part, Liu Yan was concerned at the lack of control at the capital, and he initially hoped for appointment to the southern region of Jiaozhi as a means to escape the disorder which might come. On the advice of Dong Fu, however, he changed his request to Yi province. The Inspector Que Jian was causing unrest there by excessive demands for taxation and labour services, so Liu Yan was ordered to arrest him and send him back for punishment. Given title as Governor, with authority as Military Commissioner and enfeoffment as a marquis, he set his headquarters at Mianzhu in Guanghan, some hundred kilometres north of Chengdu.

Before Liu Yan arrived, Que Jian had been killed by bandits, who were then defeated and put down by the Assistant Officer Jia Long. Liu Yan was thus able to establish his authority quickly, and soon after his arrival he began to look for independence from the capital. He raised troops on the excuse of joining the alliance against the usurper Dong Zhuo, but in fact took no such action. Instead, apparently influenced by the Lady Zhang, mother of Zhang Lu and an adept of popular religion, he appointed the sect leaders Zhang Lu and Zhang Xiu as provincial officers and sent them against Su Gu the Administrator of Hanzhong, who had sought to defy his authority.

When they had overthrown and killed Su Gu, however, the two religious chieftains set up their own regime, cutting the roads to the north; Zhang Lu later destroyed Zhang Xiu. Though he had lost control of Hanzhong, Liu Yan was not entirely dissatisfied with the situation: while he made no move against the "rebels," the Lady Zhang and other members of her family remained at his court as hostages for restrained behaviour by Zhang Lu; and the fact that communications to the north were cut meant that the central government had no access to intervene in his administration.

Confirming his government over the balance of the province, Liu Yan arrested and executed on various charges several leading men who might have challenged his position, and he recruited his own followers amongst migrants and refugees from the troubled regions of central China: these were known as the Dongzhou Troops 東州兵, men of the eastern provinces.

In 191 the Administrator of Jianwei Ren Qi and the loyalist Jia Long attacked Liu Yan. One group of rebels broke into Liu Yan's capital and fired the lower city, but they were driven back and defeated by the Dongzhou Troops and auxiliaries from the non-Chinese Qiang. Both leaders of insurgents were killed and no-one thereafter could dispute Liu Yan's position.

About this time Liu Yan transferred his headquarters from Mianzhu to Luo city, also in Guanghan, and he became steadily more ambitious in his display of authority, notably by the construction of an imperial carriage and a multitude of other official vehicles for his personal cortège. Liu Biao in Jing province criticised his pretensions, and the imperial government under Dong Zhuo sent Liu Yan's son Liu Zhang with a message to admonish him and a proposal to restore contact. Liu Yan, however, kept Liu Zhang with him and made no reply.

Encouraged by his two elder sons, Liu Fan and Liu Dan, in 194 Liu Yan formed an alliance with Ma Teng, warlord of Liang province, against the regime at Chang'an controlled by Dong Zhuo's successors Li Jue and his fellows. He sent five thousand men to aid the attack, but the enterprise failed and Liu Fan and Liu Dan were both killed.

After this sad event, followed by disastrous fires which destroyed, among other things, his collection of carriages, Liu Yan shifted his headquarters from Luo city to Chengdu in Shu commandery. He died soon afterwards, and was succeeded as Governor and warlord by his son Liu Zhang. -HHS 75/65:2431-32*, SGZ Shu 1:865-67*, HYGZ 5:70-71; deC 89:205-206, deC 96:84-85.

Liu Yan 劉彥; Kuaiji. During the 190s Liu Yan sought refuge with the Inspector of Jiaozi, his fellow-countryman Zhu Fu, who made him a local officer. Liu Yan and his fellows behaved so oppressively that rebellion broke out and destroyed the government. - SGZ Wu 8:1252.

Liu Yan 劉延. In 200 Liu Yan was Administrator of Dong commandery for Cao Cao. As Yuan Shao moved south early in that year, he sent Yan Liang to attack him, but Cao Cao led a rescue force which defeated and killed Yan Liang. -SGZ 1:19.

Liu Yan 劉琰 [Weishi 威碩] (d.234); Lu. Liu Yan served under Liu Bei as an Assistant Officer of Yu province in the early 190s, and accompanied him on his travels thereafter. An attractive man, skilled in speech, with kinship to the imperial house, he was a personal favourite.

Liu Yan became an Administrator in Yi province, and under Liu Shan he rose to high rank as a minister and a general. His wealth and pretensions, however, were not matched by performance in government, and when he quarrelled with the general Wei Yan in 232 Zhuge Liang stripped him of authority, though he was allowed to keep his formal titles.

It appears that Liu Yan became unbalanced by this misfortune, for two years later he accused the Sovereign Liu Shan of seducing his wife. After considerable scandal Liu Yan was executed. -SGZ Shu 10:1001-02*.

Liu Yan 劉延 i.e. Liu Yanping 劉延平. -HHS 5:238.

Liu Yang 劉陽 see Liu Zhuang 劉莊, Emperor Ming: his personal name was Yang 陽 until 43, when he was named Heir to Emperor Guangwu and a less common character was chosen to avoid problems of taboo.

Liu Yang 劉揚/楊陽, also known as "Goitre" 癭 Yang on account of the swelling on his neck (d.26); Zhending/Changshan. Son of Liu Pu 普, who was descended from Emperor Jing of Former Han through his son Liu Shun 舜 the King of Changshan, Liu Yang succeeded his father as King of Zhending in 7 BC, but lost the fief as Wang Mang took the imperial title in 9 AD.

When the Han dynasty was re-established under the Gengshi Emperor in 23, Liu Yang was restored to his former state. In 24 he considered supporting the pretender Wang Lang, but was persuaded by Liu Zhi, envoy of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, to join the Han cause. The alliance was confirmed by Liu Xiu's marriage to Liu Yang's niece the Lady Guo, later empress, and Liu Yang played the lute at the nuptial ceremony. Despite his services against Wang Lang, however, Liu Yang received no substantial reward, and he became disaffected. Encouraged by an apocryphal prophecy that "Goitre Yang shall be the Master," late in 25 he began to gather troops and make contact with local bandits.

At the beginning of 26 Guangwu sent messengers to summon him to Luoyang, but Liu Yang closed his city gates against them. Soon afterwards the Han general Geng Chun was sent to Zhending. Member of a leading clan in the north, and also a relative, he was acceptable to Liu Yang, and though Liu Yang was at first hesitant and pretended to be ill, he eventually agreed to visit him, taking a military escort. Geng Chun welcomed them courteously, but as Liu Yang entered the building with his brother Liu Rang and their cousin Liu Xi, Geng Chun seized them and barred the gates. The soldiers outside made no move, and Geng Chun had Liu Yang and his kinsmen executed. -HS 14:417, HHS 1A:28, 21/11:763-64; Bn 59:70, 121-123, 235.

Liu Yang 劉陽; Pei. A distinguished scholar, Liu Yang became a magistrate in Langye but died aged thirty.

Earlier, seeing Cao Cao as a threat to the Han dynasty, Liu Yang had planned to kill him but could find no opportunity. Cao Cao knew of this, and when he came to power he looked for Liu Yang's son. None of his family dared help the young man, but he was sheltered by Wang Lang, who was an old friend of his father. Eventually Cao Cao granted a pardon, and so Liu Yang's lineage was preserved. -SGZ 13:408.

Liu Yanping 劉延平 (d.144). Son of Liu Chong the King of Le'an, in 109 he was named King of Qinghe to maintain the lineage of Liu Qing. Liu Yanping was succeeded by his son Suan. -HHS 55/45:1804-05.

HHS 5:238 says that in 124 Liu Yan the King of Le'an came to the court of Emperor An, but the citation is mistaken: the King of Le'an at that time was Liu Chong, who was always at the capital. The King of Qinghe was Liu Yanping [not Yan], a son of Liu Chong. It was Liu Yanping who came to court from his state at this time.

Liu Yao 劉姚. Son of Liu Xun, grandson of Liu Qiu and great-grandson of the Gengshi Emperor, Liu Yao succeeded to the family marquise in Hedong. -HHS 11/1:476; Bn 54 appendix # 148.

Liu Yao 劉曜. Son of Liu Zong, he succeeded his father as King of Pei.

Liu Yao was succeeded by his son Qi. -HHS 42/32:1428.

Liu Yao 劉曜; Lingling. About 150 Liu Yao was Administrator of Cangwu. -SGZ Shu 9.980.

Liu Yao 劉曜 [Jini 季尼]; Dongping. Son and grandson of county magistrates, Liu Yao was an Assistant Officer and a brevet magistrate in Yan province, then held commissioned appointment at the capital. He left when his mother died, but returned to Luoyang as Major of the Vermilion Bird, in charge of guards at the Northern Palace. After nine years in that office he was sent out as Commandant of Juyan in the far northwest.

Liu Yao returned closer to home as Administrator of Henei and he was later a colonel in the Northern Army. He then held a series of ministerial appointments: Minister of the Imperial Clan, Minister of the Guards, and finally Minister of the Household.

When Liu Yao died at the age of seventy-three, his clients and friends set up a stele at his tomb. -LS 11: 23a-24a.

Liu Yao 劉繇 [Zhengli 正禮] (157-198); Donglai. Younger son of Liu Fang/Yu and nephew of the Excellency Liu Chong, as a young man in 175 Liu Yao rescued his uncle Liu Wei from a kidnapping.

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, Liu Yao became a county magistrate in Liang, but resigned because he disapproved of the favour to the eunuchs shown by the Chancellor of the kingdom. He later became an Assistant Officer in his native Qing province, and when he visited Ji'nan he recommended dismissal of the corrupt Chancellor, adopted son of a leading eunuch. Liu Yao later served in a clerical bureau under the Excellencies at the capital, but refused an invitation to join the Censorate.

In the early 190s Liu Yao went south to the Huai to avoid the disorders, and he was sent an imperial commission as Inspector of Yang province. Unwilling to face Yuan Shu, who controlled the area of the Huai, Liu Yao went further south to establish himself in Danyang, where he received many refugees from the turmoil of the north. At first he had support from Yuan Shu's officers Sun Ben and Wu Jing, but he later drove them away and guarded the crossings of the Yangzi against them. He was promoted Governor and appointed a general, while his nominee Zhu Hao held Yuzhang.

In 195 the young commander Sun Ce, then in the service of Yuan Shu, forced a crossing of the Yangzi and defeated Liu Yao's forces. At the end of the year Liu Yao fled west into Yuzhang. He eliminated Zhai Rong, who had seized power there, but he played no further substantial role in the affairs of the south.

After Liu Yao died in 198, his family came into the hands of Sun Ce, who treated them well. -SGZ Wu 4: 1183-84.

Liu Ye 劉曄 [Ziyang 子揚] (d.234); Jiujiang. Liu Ye's mother died when he was seven, leaving instructions that he should eliminate the wicked retainers of his father Liu Pu before they destroyed the family. At the age of thirteen, Liu Ye duly killed them.

In 199, when Liu Ye was a little over twenty, the local warlord Zheng Bao sought to compel him to join his company so that he could use Liu Ye's influence on the local people. Liu Ye, however, trapped and killed him at a banquet, took over his following, then handed command of these troops to Liu Xun, Administrator of Lujiang.

Liu Ye urged Liu Xun not to trust the southern warlord Sun Ce, but Liu Xun ignored him and was defeated. Liu Ye followed Liu Xun north to join Cao Cao and he became a trusted member of his staff, with particular advice on affairs of Yang province.

In 215 Liu Ye accompanied Cao Cao's attack on Zhang Lu in Hanzhong. As supplies began to run short, he urged a swift attack, which was successful. He encouraged Cao Cao to press further south against Liu Bei, but Cao Cao delayed and the opportunity, such as it was, was lost. Liu Ye was promoted to a military command.

He later warned Cao Cao against the future rebel Wei Feng, and in 220, after Cao Pi succeeded his father, Liu Ye advised him not to trust the surrender of Meng Da; his foreboding proved correct.

Liu Ye was involved in the processes which brought the abdication of Han in favour of Wei, and Cao Pi enfeoffed him and appointed him a Palace Attendant. He remained a close adviser to Cao Pi and to Cao Rui. -SGZ 14:442-49*.

Liu Yi 劉姬, the Lady: see the Lady Liu Ji 劉姬, daughter of Emperor Ming.

Liu Yi 劉軼 [Junwen 君文]; Chenliu. Son of Liu Kun, he maintained his father's scholarship on the Shi interpretation of the Book of Changes and had a great number of students.

During the reign of Emperor Ming Liu Yi became a member of the suite of the Heir, Liu Da, and when Emperor Zhang came to the throne he appointed him Minister of the Imperial Clan. He died in that office; a number of his descendants held the same post. -HHS 79/69A:2550-51.

Liu Yi 劉裔; Jiangxia. A distant descendant of the kings of Lu of Former Han, Liu Yi inherited the family fief, now a marquise, under Later Han. About 85 his territory was transferred by Emperor Zhang to a county in Jiangxia. -HHS 75/65:2431, SGZ Shu 1:865.

Liu Yi 劉毅. A younger son of Liu Mu the King of Beihai, Liu Yi was granted a county marquise in 77, but lost his fief for some fault about 90.

Liu Yi had been concerned with scholarship since he was young, and in 114 he presented to the throne his Hande lun 漢德論 "Discussion of [Men of] Virtue of Han" and Xian lun 憲論 "Discussion of the Laws;" the two compositions totalled twelve pian. Scholars such as Liu Zhen and Ma Rong praised his work, and the government of the regent Dowager Deng awarded him 30,000 cash and appointed him a Consultant.

In 118 Liu Yi presented a memorial urging that a further instalment of the dynastic history be compiled to cover recent events. This was approved, and in 120 Liu Yi and his cousin Liu Taotu were among those commissioned with Liu Zhen to continue the official history of Later Han, then called Han ji and later known as Dongguan Hanji. -HHS 80/70A:2616*, 14/4:558, 10A:426; Bn 54:10-11 and appendix # 154.

Liu Yi 劉裔 i.e. Liu Shang 劉商. -DGHJ 7:2a.

Liu Yi 劉翼. Son of Liu Kai [or Gong] the King of Hejian, in 119 Liu Yi was brought to the capital by the Dowager Deng, together with the other sons of Liu Kai, those of Liu Shou the King of Jibei, and junior members of the Liu and Deng clans. The young people were given special training in the classics, and the Lady Deng particularly admired Liu Yi's fine manners and appearance.

Liu De the King of Pingyuan, who had been designated to maintain the lineage of Liu Sheng, son of Emperor He, died about this time, and the Dowager transferred the fief to Liu Yi and kept him at the capital. As the modern commentator Hong Liangji observes, Liu Yi was succeeding a man who was his cousin in an elder generation; this was formally wrong, and may indicate special favour.

After the death of the Dowager in 121, however, Emperor An's wet-nurse Wang Sheng, the eunuch Li Run and others alleged that the Deng group had intended to depose him and place a king of Pingyuan on the throne. There is some confusion in the texts whether their candidate was Liu Yi or his predecessor Liu De, but it was most probably Liu Yi. In any event, he was reduced to be a district marquis and was sent back to Hejian.

Liu Yi dismissed his retainers and lived in seclusion, but in 130, on petition from his father Liu Kai, Emperor Shun took the county of Liwu 蠡吾 from Hejian state and granted it to him as a fief.

Liu Yi died about 140. In 146 Liu Yi's son Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, was brought to the imperial throne, and in the following year Liu Yi was granted posthumous honours as an emperor. -HHS 7:287-88, 55/45:1809-10, 50/40:1674.

Liu Yi 劉翼, wife of: see the Lady Ma 馬.

Liu Yi 劉翼, concubine of: see the Lady Yan Ming 閔明.

Liu Yi 劉懿 also Liu Du 犢 or Liu Yidu 懿犢 (d.125) [the Little Emperor 少帝 (reg. 125)]. A younger son of Liu Shou, King of Jibei, and thus grandson of Emperor Zhang, after the death of his father in 120 Liu Yi was enfeoffed as marquis of a district, Beixiang 北鄉.

In 124, influenced by accusations from his Empress Yan and her faction, Emperor An had dismissed his only son Liu Bao as Heir. When the ruler died in the following year the Lady Yan, now Dowager, and her brother Yan Xian chose Liu Yi to succeed him, and placed him upon the throne on 18 May 125. His date of birth is not known, but he was evidently a little over five years old. His claim was no stronger than that of many others, but he was a suitable puppet through whom the Dowager Yan could expect to maintain a long-term regency, much as the Dowager Deng had for Emperor An.

Soon after his accession, however, the child became seriously ill, and he died on 10 December. Within a few days of his death a coup led by the eunuch Sun Cheng destroyed the Yan group and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne.

Liu Yi held the imperial title within a calendar year, so he did not live long enough to inaugurate his own reign period 年號. He was buried with only royal honours, under his earlier title as Marquis of Beixiang, but he is more commonly referred to as the Shao 少 or "Little" Emperor. Ten years later, in 136, Emperor Shun raised the question whether some recent unfavourable portents could have been caused by such lack of funerary respect, but Zhou Ju argued in court conference that Liu Yi's early death was Heaven's way of showing disapproval for the way he had been brought to the throne. It was a warning against the wrongful use of power by consort families, and the young ruler indeed deserved no higher status. His argument was accepted and the matter went no further. -HHS 5:241, 10B:426-27, 61/51:2027.

Liu Yi 劉廙. XTS 75B:3437 says that Liu Yi was the younger son of Liu Gai/Zheng the King of Pei, who died in 109, and that he became Prefect of Luoyang.

Liu Yi 劉翼 (d.137). Son of Liu Pu the King of Beihai, he succeeded his father in 123.

Liu Yi was succeeded by an unknown son, and the state was abolished in 206. -HHS 14/4:558; Bn 54 appendix # 167.

Liu Yi 劉儀 (d.144). A younger son of Liu Zhang the King of Changshan, he succeeded his father in 127, while two older brothers were enfeoffed as village marquises.

Liu Yi was succeeded by his son Bao, while four older sons were granted village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1678.

Liu Yi 劉毅 (d.179). A eunuch, Liu Yi was an associate of Wang Fu and held office as Prefect of the Yellow Gates. In 179 he and others of their party were impeached by the Director of Retainers Yang Qiu; they were tortured and died in prison. -HHS 77/67:2499-2500.

Liu Yi 劉逸 [Daguo 大國]; Nanyang. In 176 Liu Yi was promoted from Minister of Ceremonies to be Excellency of Works. He left office a year later. -HHS 8:338-39.

Liu Yi 劉意 (95-184). Son of Liu Cheng the King of Xiapi, he succeeded his father in 127.

At the time of the Yellow Turban rising in 184 the rebels attacked Xiapi and Liu Yi fled. He was reinstated after the rebellion had been put down, but died a few months later at the age of ninety. -HHS 50/40:1675.

The Annals at HHS 8:350 say that Liu Yi had no sons and the state was abolished at his death, but HHS 50/40 says he was succeeded by his son Liu Yi 宜: see immediately below.

Liu Yi 劉宜. Son of Liu Yi 意 the King of Xiapi, he succeeded his father. He left no sons when he died, and the kingdom was formally ended in 206. -HHS 50/40:1675.

The Annals at HHS 8:350 say that Liu Yi's father had no sons and the state was abolished at his death, but HHS 9:384 refers to the abolition of Xiapi and seven other states in 206. HHS 50/40, says that Liu Yi 宜 succeeded to the fief but died a few months later: that would be in 185. There seems no good way to resolve the confusion: see HHSJJ 50/40:1814 jiaobu.

Liu Yi 劉翊 I; Yingchuan. Administrator of Runan in the 180s, he made Xu Jing his Reporting Officer and nominated him Filial and Incorrupt. -SGZ Shu 8:963. See also sub Liu Yi II below.

Liu Yi 劉翊 II [Zixiang 子相]; Yingchuan. A man of wealthy family, Liu Yi travelled widely to give alms. One winter when he was in Runan he encountered a certain Zhang Jili from Chen, who had come for a funeral but whose carriage had broken down. Liu Yi gave him his own carriage, and rode away without giving his name. Zhang Jili thought that it must have been Liu Yi. He tried to return the property, but Liu Yi closed his gates, made apologies, and refused to see him.

For a long time Liu Yi kept to his bed and refused to take part in public life, but he eventually agreed to accept office as Registrar to the Administrator Chong Fu, whom he approved of as the son of the worthy official Chong Gao. Chong Fu gave him complete confidence and accepted all his recommendations.

At one point a certain Huang Gang, who was a close associate of the Lady Cheng, a favourite of Emperor Ling, sought an area of public wilderness to create a private park. Chong Fu asked Liu Yi's opinion, observing that it could be dangerous to oppose the palace. Quoting Ritual, Liu Yi argued that mountains and marshes were the preserve of the common people, and that if Chong Fu agreed to the proposal he would be known as a criminal. So Chong Fu refused his permission. He later nominated Liu Yi as Filial and Incorrupt, but he would not accept.

After the Yellow Turban rebellion of 184 there was famine throughout the region. Liu Yi gave what he had, and saved several hundred people from starvation. He arranged funerals for those poor people who died, and helped their husbands and wives to find new marriage partners.

When the imperial capital was moved to Chang'an by Dong Zhuo in 190, Liu Yi was sent as Reporting Officer. The roads were blocked by robbers and bandits, but Liu Yi travelled by night and hid during the day, and he duly arrived at Chang'an. An edict acknowledged his diligence and loyalty, he was appointed a Consultant and was then sent out as Administrator of Chenliu.

Giving away his treasure, Liu Yi began his return to the east with only a horse and an ox-drawn wagon. As he came through the passes from Chang'an, he met a gentleman dying by the roadside; he gave his horse to provide him with a coffin and used his own clothing as a shroud. Then, however, he met more people in similarly desperate straits. He could not bear to leave them, so he killed his oxen to provide them with food. Everyone tried to dissuade him, but Liu Yi observed that "A true man cannot see a person in extremity and fail to help them." He starved to death with the others. -HHS 81/71:2695-96*, XC 6:3a-b [one edition has this man's surname as Xie 謝; it is surely mistaken].

Fan Ye placed the biography of Liu Yi in his chapter devoted to Men of Remarkable Behaviour 獨行, and this man certainly fulfils the criteria. It is strange that there should have been another Liu Yi 翊, also from Yingchuan, who served as Administrator of Runan about the same time: see Liu Yi I above, as cited in SGZ. From the dates of Xu Jing, however, it appears that the man who recommended him must have been Administrator in Runan by at least the middle 180s, while the Liu Yi of HHS 81/71 did not gain senior office until after 190. The histories may be confused, reflecting a number of anecdotes about a single man; and this may even apply to Liu Yi 翊 III below.

Disconcertingly, a variant set of texts, discussed by Hui Dong at HHSJJ 67/57:2396, suggests that this Liu Yi was numbered among the popular heroes in the lists compiled by the reformists and students of the Imperial University during the late 160s. Though Liu Yi's more publicised activities are dated over twenty years later, it is possible that his private generosity was apparent and recognised earlier.

Liu Yi 劉翊 III; Dongping? When Zhang Miao invited Lü Bu to seize Yan province in 194, he had his follower Liu Yi take a message to Xun Yu that he should welcome Lü Bu as an ally of Cao Cao. Xun Yu, however, was not deceived. -SGZ 10:308.

Liu Yi 柳毅; Liaodong. An associate of Gongsun Du in 190, it appears that Liu Yi later turned to piracy, for he was defeated by Cao Cao's general Zhang Liao on the coast north of the Shandong peninsula in 205. -SGZ 8:252, 17:518.

Liu Yi 劉虞 [Gongsi 公嗣] (181-221); Nanyang. When Liu Yi was ten years old his future as a Confucian scholar was foretold by Sima Hui, known for his judgement of men.

Liu Yi's elder brother Wangzhi became an Assistant Officer under Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province, but fell from favour when he protested the execution of two friends. Liu Yi warned his brother of his danger, but Liu Wangzhi refused to leave and he too came to grief.

Liu Yi fled east to Yang province, and about 208 he went to Cao Cao, who appointed him to his Imperial Chancellor's office. About 211 he was transferred to be a literary adviser in the suite of Cao Pi, who used him, however, primarily as a simple clerk. Liu Yi protested, but continued to serve, and in 213 he was appointed Gentleman at the Yellow Gates in the new state of Wei. In a memorial about 218 he urged Cao Cao not to attack Liu Bei in Shu, but to rely upon his personal virtue to bring his rivals to submit. Cao Cao was amused by the flattery.

In 219 Liu Yi's younger brother Wei was implicated in the failed conspiracy of Wei Feng and was executed. Though Liu Yi could have shared his fate, Cao Cao excused him and Liu Yi was suitably grateful. Appointed once more to the Chancellor's office, he presented a memorial criticising the poor quality of many nominees presented by provincial and commandery governments. He called for a probationary period of three years, with strict assessment of the candidates' performance.

When Cao Pi succeeded his father in 220 he appointed Liu Yi a Palace Attendant and awarded him a secondary marquissate. Liu Yi was involved in the processes which brought the abdication of the Han in favour of Wei, and he had a reputation for his understanding of the Mandate, of the calendar, the Mysteries [玄學 Xuan xue], and associated ritual. Though he left no sons, succession to his fief was granted to a nephew, presumably not a child of the failed rebel Liu Wei.

Liu Yi wrote a number of books on government, including Zheng lun 政論, which survived until Tang, and an essay on criminal law and ritual, Xingli lun 刑禮論 written in collaboration with Ding Yi 廙. Considering the crime of his brother Liu Wei and the fate of Ding Yi at the hands of Cao Pi, Liu Yi led a charmed life among dangerous contacts. -SGZ 21:613-16*.

Liu Yi 劉懿. Son of Liu Xie, Emperor Xian, presumably by a concubine, in 212 Liu Yi was enfeoffed as King of Shanyang. When the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, however, he and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 9:386, 390.

Liu Yidu 劉懿犢 see Liu Yi 劉懿, the Little Emperor.
Liu Yin 劉縝 (pronunciation from XHS 2:1b) see Liu Bosheng 劉伯升.

Liu Yin 劉隱. In 208 Liu Yin was sent as an envoy to appoint Sun Ben as a general. -SGZ Wu 6:1210.

Liu Ying 劉嬰 [the Young Prince 孺子] (4-25). Son of Liu Xian 顯, great-great-grandson of Emperor Xuan of Former Han, and youngest of the imperial lineage, in the twelfth month at the beginning of 6 AD he was chosen by Wang Mang as the successor to the late Emperor Ping, and Wang Mang confirmed his own position by marrying Liu Ying to one of his great-grand-daughters.

Three years later Wang Mang took the throne for himself and the Young Prince, with courtesy title as Duke Who Establishes Tranquillity 定安公, was held at Chang'an, so isolated that it is said he grew up retarded.

In 24, after the fall of Wang Mang and the accession of the Gengshi Emperor, Fang Wang and Gong Lin gained control over Liu Ying and took him away into Anding. At the beginning of 25 they proclaimed him as emperor, with Fang Wang as Imperial Chancellor and Gong Lin as Grand Marshal. They were promptly attacked by troops of the Gengshi Emperor, and the pretender and all his party were killed. -HHS 1A:18, 11/1:473, 14/4:562; Dubs 55:217-218, 260-264; Bn 54 appendix # 129, Bn 59.91.

Liu Ying 劉英 (d.71). Son of Emperor Guangwu by the Beauty Xu, in 39 Liu Ying was made Duke of Chu in Xu province based on Pengcheng; it is said that his fief was smaller than those of his brothers as the Lady Xu was no longer favoured.

In 41 Liu Ying and his brothers were promoted to be kings, and in 52 he and others were sent from Luoyang to live on their fiefs.

Liu Ying had been a close companion of Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming, who showed him special favour after he came to the throne, and granted a marquisate to his brother-in-law. A man of erratic conduct, Liu Ying gathered retainers and was a patron of Huang-Lao and of Buddhism; at this early time the latter was viewed to some extent as an off-shoot of the former creed.

An edict issued in 65 permitted persons under threat of the death penalty to make offerings in expiation of any wrongdoing. Liu Ying was evidently suspected of involvement in some intrigue, for he sent in a ransom of silk and a plea for pardon. In reply, Emperor Ming referred to his brother's understanding of Huang-Lao and his practice of the humane cult of the Buddha, to his three-month periods of purification and fasting, and the hospitality he offered to yipusai 伊蒲塞 [upasaka] and sangmen 桑門 [sramana]. He returned the silk in order that Liu Ying might continue his good work.

This edict of Emperor Ming is a first text for the history of Buddhism in China, giving evidence of early association with popular Taoism, and identifying Chu/Pengcheng as a centre of the cult [cf. Zhai Rong some 150 years later]. It is questionable how well the doctrine at this time reflected classical Indian tradition, and while it is generally accepted that the teaching came by way of the central Asia and then across China to this region of the southeast it may be that Liu Ying and his associates received instruction from sea traders to the south.

Liu Ying continued his eclectic practices, aided by alchemists, magicians and soothsayers, but in the winter of 70 he was accused of wicked associations and seeking false omens; the charges were categorised as Great Refractoriness and Impiety. The kingdom was abolished and Liu Ying was exiled to Danyang, south of the Yangzi. He killed himself early in the following year.

Liu Ying was buried with the honours of a marquis, but thousands of alleged conspirators were arrested, from Yuyang in the north to Kuaiji in the southeast. Confessions and further accusations were extracted by torture and great numbers of people were killed. Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan was implicated, and in 73 a similar accusation was levied against Liu Yan the King of Huaiyang. Emperor Ming remained fearful and furious, and kept up intermittent persecution until his death. As Bielenstein observes, however, though the royal brothers may have been inappropriately interested in the occult, there is no good evidence of organised conspiracy.

In 77 the new Emperor Zhang ended the purges. He reburied Liu Ying with royal honours and enfeoffed his sons as marquises. -HHS 42/32:1428-29*; Bn 67:33-35, Zürcher 59:19-22, 269-80, Demiéville 86:821-822.

Liu Ying 劉迎 or Liu Yan 延, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 60 she was named Princess of Longlü in Henei. She married Geng Xi. -HHS 10B:459.

Liu Yisun 劉義遜; Beihai. A local gentleman, he joined the staff of the Chancellor Kong Rong in the early 190s. Kong Rong ignored him, however, and after his colleague Zuo Chengzu was killed Liu Yisun left his service. -SGZ 12:372.

Liu Yiwang 劉義王, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Guangwu, in 39 she was appointed Princess of Wuyin in Nanyang and was later a Senior Princess. She married Liang Song 松, but he died in prison in 62.

Despite her husband's disgrace, the princess continued to support his family. She showed special generosity to her brother-in-law Liang Song 竦, and after the early death of his wife she brought up his three daughters, her nieces. She presumably had influence on the selection of the two elder girls into the harem of Emperor Zhang, where one became the mother of Liu Zhao, future Emperor He.

When Liang Song was executed in 83 and the two imperial concubines died, the princess was sent to house arrest south of Luoyang. She evidently died before the fortunes of the Liang were restored in 97. -HHS 10A:416, 10B:458, 34/24:1171-72; Bn 67:21, Ch'ü 72:300.

Liu Yong 劉永 (d.27); Liang. Descended from Emperor Wen of Former Han, Liu Yong's father Liu Li 立 had been King of Liang; he was killed by Wang Mang in 3 AD for his involvement in a plot with the maternal relatives of Emperor Ping.

After Wang Mang was destroyed in 23, Liu Yong joined the Gengshi Emperor at Luoyang and was enfeoffed as King of Liang, with his capital at his home city of Suiyang. In the following year he began to act upon his own authority, raising troops and sending officers to take over neighbouring territories until he controlled a substantial area between the Huai River and Mount Tai. Naming his brother Fang as a chief general and his younger brother Shaogong as King of Lu, he also gave titles and established nominal alliance with Dong Xian in Donghai and Zhang Bu in Langye and Taishan.

Following the destruction of the Gengshi Emperor, in 25 Liu Yong claimed the imperial title. Concerned at the possible rivalry from another member of the imperial clan, Guangwu gave priority to dealing with Liu Yong, and soon after his own accession he sent Geng Chun to attack him.

Geng Chun invaded Jiyin and captured Dingtao city, and early in 26 Guangwu also sent his general He Yan to attack eastwards through Chenliu. At the beginning of summer He Yan laid siege to Suiyang, and though the general Su Mao changed sides to join Liu Yong, He Yan drove him back. In the autumn he took Suiyang city by storm.

Liu Yong fled north with his household to the city of Yu but the people turned against him and killed his mother, wife and children. With a few dozen followers he took refuge with Su Mao, whom he had named King of Huaiyang but whose base was at Guangle, close to Yu city. Reinforced by Liu Yong's other supporters, Jiao Qiang and Zhou Jian, they attempted a counter-attack but were again defeated. Su Mao returned to Guangle, while Liu Yong went with Jiao Qiang and Zhou Jian to Huling city in Shanyang, some eighty kilometres northeast of Guangle.

In 27 the people of Suiyang turned against Guangwu and invited Liu Yong to return. He gave royal titles to Zhang Bu and Dong Xian, but neither sent him real assistance, while He Yan returned to besiege the city. Guangwu's Grand Marshal Wu Han also attacked Guangle, and though Zhou Jian sought to relieve Su Mao, he was defeated and forced back into Huling. Wu Han now joined He Yan outside Suiyang, and by autumn the city was starving. Liu Yong attempted to flee, but his officer Qing Wu wanted to surrender, so he killed him.

Su Mao and Zhou Jian retreated to Pei and proclaimed one of Liu Yong's surviving sons, Liu Yu, as his successor. -HHS 12/2:494-95*; Bn 54 appendix # 140, Bn 59:132-139.

Liu Yong 劉邕 [Nanhe 南和]; Nanyang. Liu Yong presumably joined Liu Bei about 208, and in 211 he accompanied him to the west. After he had taken Yi province Liu Bei appointed Liu Yong as Administrator of Jiangyang, established from the southern part of Jianwei. Liu Yong later became a general and was enfeoffed. -SGZ Shu 15:1084.

Liu You 劉祐 or Liu Hu 祐 (94-125) [Emperor An 安帝 (reg. 106-125)]. The Qing commentator Hui Dong, cited in HHSJJ 5:195, observes that the Shuowen dictionary identifies the character 祐 hu as the taboo personal name of the emperor, so HHS is mistaken in giving it as You 祐. Most scholars, however, still follow HHS.

ACCESSION AND TUTELAGE

Son of Liu Qing the King of Qinghe and his consort the Lady Zuo, it is said that when he was still young Liu You enjoyed the study of history and that Emperor He admired him and frequently invited him to the palace. When Emperor He died in 106, Liu Qing and his royal brothers were for the first time sent out to their states, but Liu You was kept at the capital. Emperor He's successor was his infant son Liu Long, but the Young Emperor died on 21 September, and two days later Liu You was brought to the throne. He was aged thirteen sui.

Emperor He had sired two sons by unknown concubines, and Liu Long had an elder brother Liu Sheng, but the regent Dowager Deng claimed, probably correctly, that he was incapacitated by illness, either physical or mental, and so he was twice passed over for the succession. Liu You's own father Liu Qing died at the end of 106, a few months after his son's accession, and he was known to have been ill. There were other sons surviving of Emperor Zhang, but Liu Qing had at one time been his father's Heir, he had been dismissed primarily through the intrigues of the Emperor Dou, and he had been a close friend and companion of the late Emperor He. So the Dowager's choice of Liu You was not unjustified: his appointment restored a lineage which had formerly been approved, and it removed the likelihood of a succession struggle amongst other descendants of Emperor Zhang.

Some officials believed that Liu Sheng's disability was not so serious as to disqualify him from the succession, and in the winter of 107/108, one year after the accession of Liu You, the Excellency Zhou Zhang attempted a coup to depose the Dowager and her nominee and set Liu Sheng upon the throne. The plot, however, was found out, and Zhou Zhang killed himself. There was no further questioning of Liu You's claim to the throne, and Liu Shen died without heirs in 113.

At the beginning of 109, at the age of sixteen sui, Emperor An took the cap of manhood and came formally to full age. Unlike his predecessor Emperor He, however, he remained under the control of the Dowager, who dominated the court until her death in 121. There were a number of protests, and the young emperor was bitterly resentful, but he had no effective authority; a discussion of politics and policy from 106 to 121 therefore appears under the biography of the Lady Deng Sui. Only after her death, in the summer of 121, did Emperor An achieve full authority in the government; he was then twenty-seven years old by Western reckoning.

In 119 the Dowager had called junior members of the Liu and Deng clans to the capital for special tuition in the classics, and she paid particular attention to Liu Yi 翼 the King of Pingyuan. Soon after her death the emperor's former wet-nurse Wang Shang and the eunuchs Li Run and Jiang Jing, close associates of the emperor and enemies of the Deng family, claimed that the Dowager had lost faith in Liu You's ability, and had been thinking of deposing him in favour of his cousin. It is doubtful she would indeed have taken such a drastic step, but the emperor attended to the accusation, and it is likely he was ready to rid himself of his powerful subjects. Though he had hitherto shown respect to the Dowager's family, he now gave a fine show of indignation, endorsed charges of Impiety and had members of the Deng group stripped of their fiefs and their property. At first the Dowager's eldest brother Deng Zhi was spared, but he was forced to quit the capital, was exiled to the south, and duly committed suicide. The disgrace of the late Dowager's family was soon revoked, and Deng Zhi received honoured burial, but the power of the Deng was broken, and Emperor An and his favourites could rule largely untrammelled.

AFFAIRS OF STATE

In the aftermath of the great Qiang rebellion, there was still trouble in Liang province, notably from the tribal chieftains Manu and Renliang, who made successful raids on Jincheng, Zhangye and Wuwei; only in 122, after they had been defeated by Ma Xian, could the program of reconstruction continue. The administration of Jincheng was returned to its former capital soon after the end of the major rebellion, but it was not until 123 that the headquarters of Longxi were restored, and the Baoye Road, chief imperial highway through the Qin Ling ranges, which had been damaged by the insurgents in Hanzhong, was re-opened only in 125. There followed some ten years of reasonable security.

The troubles of the northeast, already manifest in the time of the Dowager Deng, continued to develop. During 121 Gaogouli [Koguryo] and the neighbouring tribes of the Hui and Mo raided Liaodong and Xuantu, though the ruler of Fuyu sent aid to China and a measure of peace was restored in the following year. The incursions of the Xianbi were substantially more serious, for it was about this time that those people acquired a new war-leader, Qizhijian. In 121 Qizhijian led a major attack into Yunzhong and Dai, and also sent raiders against Xuantu, and though a garrison camp was set up in Yuyang, in the following year he led raids as far as Taiyuan. In 123 Qizhijian defeated the Southern Xiongnu in Wuyuan, and in 124 he defeated them in Dai commandery, killing one of their kings on each occasion. In effect, the whole northern frontier of the empire was now vulnerable.

Southwest, there was rebellion in Shu in 122 and in Yuexi in 123, and though these incidents were dealt with locally another Dependent State was set up in that region; similar defence positions had been set up by the regent Dowager Deng. The far south at least was peaceful, and both Jiuzhen and Rinan reported tribute missions and favourable omens.

More generally, there were several visitations of rain and floods, destructive winds and earthquakes, so various areas were given relief from taxes, while the government also issued grants of noble ranks, special summonses to office and calls for recommendations.

During the spring of 124 Emperor An made a tour to the east as far as Taishan, where he offered sacrifice to his imperial predecessors and to Confucius, and held a reception for members of the sage's clan; in the winter of that year he travelled to Chang'an, again paying respects to the tombs of the rulers of Former Han and their great ministers. A few months after his return to Luoyang, in the spring of 125 he embarked on a tour to south, visiting the tombs of Later Han ancestors in Nanyang, and ordering the Administrators of Changsha and Lingling to offer sacrifice to local deities of their region. Despite these demonstrations of goodwill, the emperor became ill and died on the journey back to Luoyang.

RELIGION AND SCHOLARLY PATRONAGE

As discussed under the entry for the Dowager Deng Sui, in 119 worship of a Sixth Venerable One 六宗 was restored to the official program of rituals, as practiced in Former Han and recommended by the Excellency Li He. Since the Dowager had sought to reduce and simplify state rituals, this addition may reflect the personal influence of Emperor An before he came to power, though in other respects it appears that the nominal sovereign held small influence at court.

In one respect the personal government of Emperor An specifically reversed a decision of the regent Dowager: it had been ordered in 116 that high officials must observe a three-year mourning period for the death of a parent; the requirement was impracticable and was withdrawn soon after the emperor came to power. More generally, the new regime showed itself anxious to recruit men of local distinction, particularly hermit scholars, and several special invitations and more general summonses were issued. Some of these calls to office were intended to bolster the prestige of the throne by attracting celebrated men, but one may also suspect there was genuine concern that the quality of new entrants to the bureaucracy was in some decline, and there was a real need to attract good men.

Emperor He and the Dowager Deng had both shown interest in scholarship, but the academic climate of their time was still dominated by the official New Text tradition, and their patronage had been extended to history rather than to philosophy. As Emperor An began his personal rule, Chen Zhong and others argued that the prestige and popular acceptance of his government would be enhanced by patronage of Confucian masters. The emperor agreed, and one of the first fruits of the new approach was the presentation of the path-breaking dictionary Shuowen jiezi 說文解字. Compiled by Xu Shen, the work was presented to the throne by his son Xu Chong.

It appears that the grasp of the New Text on official scholarship was weakening. Xu Shen was known primarily as an Old Text scholar, and although his work was completed about 100 it had not been presented earlier, evidently because of doubts about its suitability. Now it received official endorsement, and in 123 some junior officials were chosen for their knowledge of the Old Text History, of the Mao interpretation of the Classic of Poetry, also in the Old Text tradition, together with the New Text Guliang commentary to Chunqiu. In a further show of support, the emperor paid a formal visit to the University in 124, and he may have been planning the revival of an institution which was now at a low point of decline. He died, however, less than a year later, and it was left to his son and successor, Emperor Shun, to attempt a reconstruction and restoration.

In general, Emperor An was interested in and influenced by portents and omens. In 122 he dismissed the Excellency of Works Chen Bao on account of an earthquake, widespread rain and storms; this created an unfortunate precedent which weakened the long-term authority of the heads of the imperial service. Though natural catastrophes continued, the sovereign himself was no doubt encouraged by a steady flow of favourable omens: in 123 Rinan reported dragons and Jiuzhen auspicious plants; in 124 Youfufeng had white pheasants and Langye a yellow dragon, while Yingchuan reported a white deer, a white tiger and two "unicorns" 麒麟 qilin. At the beginning of 125 Dong commandery had two yellow dragons and another qilin, but despite such signs of good fortune the emperor died just a few weeks later.

COURT POLITICS AND THE SUCCESSION

Regardless of national affairs and questions of ritual and scholarship, power at court was strongly influenced by those whom the emperor personally trusted. He paid great respect to his maternal uncle Geng Bao, who was first appointed as a minister and then, in 124, as General-in-Chief, and he showed remarkable generosity to Feng Shi, on one occasion spending two weeks at his ministerial lodging and distributing valuable gifts; Feng Shi became Grand Commandant in 124. Within his private apartments Emperor An favoured his former wet-nurse Wang Sheng and the palace eunuchs Fan Feng and Li Run, but he was greatly influenced by his empress the Lady Yan Ji, whose brothers, led by Yan Xian, acquired ministerial and military posts, commanded the palace guards, and dominated the court.

The Lady Yan entered the harem in 114. She swiftly attracted the emperor's favour, and was made empress in 115. She did not, however, bear him children; and soon after her accession she poisoned the Lady Li II, who had given birth to a son, Liu Bao, in that same year. The regent Dowager Deng had Liu Bao named as Heir in 120, but although he had no brothers his position was not secure. In 124, after a complex struggle for influence, the Empress Yan, aided by the eunuchs Jiang Jing and Fan Feng, accused the nine-year-old of involvement in a conspiracy, and towards the end of the year he was dismissed as Heir. The decision was fiercely opposed by the minister Lai Li and many other senior officials who demonstrated before the gates of the palace, but the emperor held to his decision.

DEATH AND JUDGEMENT

On 23 April 125, as Emperor An was on tour to the south he was taken ill at Wan city in Nanyang. He continued his program for another few days, returned north past Wan, but died on 30 April, at the age of thirty-two.

Since the emperor's only son Liu Bao had been deposed there was no designated Heir and no obvious successor, and the right to choose his replacement and to act as regent devolved upon the Lady Yan, now Dowager. For the time being, she and her associates concealed the ruler's death. During three days on the road they had food and drink taken to the closed carriage and maintained the formality of an official diary, and it was not until the evening of 4 May, the day after the cortège had returned to the capital, that the death was announced. The Lady Yan then attended court, and she and her brother determined on the successor, the five-year-old Liu Yi 懿, the Little Emperor, a cousin of the late sovereign.

It is said that Liu You had shown intelligence and ability when he was young, but that he failed to live up to his early promise. He was certainly frustrated by the Dowager Deng's extended regency, and he became worried that she might replace him with a more impressive candidate. This could have been a good idea, for during his few years of personal rule Emperor An proved quite inadequate to his responsibilities. He displayed interest in ritual and scholarship, but his reliance upon personal favourites disturbed the balance of government, and his subservience to his Empress Yan, culminating in the dismissal of his only son Liu Bao, was a blow to the dynasty itself: it was dangerously significant that the legitimate heir had to be brought to the throne by a group of eunuchs. Unlike the Dowager Deng, and Emperor Shun after him, Emperor An had no great crisis to deal with: his failure was all his own and the damage he inflicted was considerable.

Emperor An was buried in the "Mound of Respect" 恭陵 northwest of Luoyang, and he was given the temple-name Gongzong 恭宗 "Respectful Exemplar." In 190 Dong Zhuo, who controlled the court of Han at that time, approved a recommendation of Cai Yong that his tablet should be deposed from a permanent position in the Imperial Ancestral Temple on the grounds that he had shown neither merit nor virtue: see MBeck 90:106-107 and sub Liu Zhao, Emperor He. -HHS 5*.

Liu You 劉祐 [Bozu 伯祖] (d.168); Zhongshan/Boling. A member of the imperial clan and a man of firm principles, Liu You studied the Yan interpretation of Chunqiu, the Ritual according to the New Text school of the Younger Dai, and the Old Text Classic of History. Having served as Registrar of his commandery, he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and later joined the Imperial Secretariat, where he became respected for his knowledge of precedent.

Liu You became a county magistrate in Rencheng, was graded for Exceptional Quality by the Inspector of Yan province, and was appointed Inspector of Yang province. In that capacity he reported the his wrongdoing of Liang Min the Administrator of Kuaiji, even though he was a kinsman of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji; Liang Min was dismissed.

Liu You was then transferred to be Administrator of Hedong. Many of the county officials were associated with the eunuchs at court, and the people suffered under their rule, but Liu You instituted strict reforms, and his government became a model for the neighbouring commanderies.

After further posts, in 161 Liu You was appointed Director of the Secretariat, then Intendant of Henan and then Director of Retainers, where he maintained authority over even the most privileged families. He was later Minister of the Imperial Clan, and in 165 he was Minister of Finance.

Though it was not within his area of responsibility, Liu You reported the eunuch Regular Attendants Su Kang and Guan Ba for having enclosed good farmland and wilderness throughout the empire, to the hardship of common people. Emperor Huan was angry at the interference, and Liu You, with his colleagues Li Ying and Feng Gun, was sent to convict labour, though with reduced punishment 弛刑. The Director of Retainers Ying Feng, who was Feng Gun's protégé, spoke for the three officials, and after some months they were released.

Liu You returned to ministerial office, and when he asked to retire on grounds of old age he was appointed an Attendant Counsellor. He had great influence at court, but though he was kept at Luoyang, he was not given any substantial office because of slanders made against him. He was named as a "hero" [俊 jun], second category in the major list of worthy men circulated by the reformist students at the University, and was commended to Emperor Huan by Dou Wu as one of the finest officials of the empire.

In the autumn of 168, as Chen Fan and Dou Wu planned to deal with the palace eunuchs, they named Liu You Intendant of Henan. When the eunuchs struck first and the reformers were destroyed, Liu You retired to his home. He died there soon afterwards, so his family was spared the persecution which followed. - HHS 67/57:2199-2200*, 69/59:2242-43, XC 4:6a; deC 89:59, 65, 98, 110.

[Liu?] You 劉攸, the Lady. Wife to Liu Pu and mother of Liu Ye, it is uncertain whether You was her personal name or her father's surname. - SGZ 14:442-43.

Liu You 劉由; Kuaiji. Local officers under Sun Ce in 197, Liu You and his colleague Gao Cheng were sent with tribute gifts to the Han court controlled by Cao Cao. - SGZ Wu 1:1105.

Liu Yu 劉紆 (d.29); Liang. After the defeat and death of Liu Yong in 27, his son Liu Yu was proclaimed King of Liang at Chuihui in Pei by his supporters Su Mao and Zhou Jian, and the succession was recognised by their colleague Jiao Qiang in Shanyang. On the other hand, Liu Yong's old imperial claim was left aside, and Liu Yu was no more than a figurehead for the warlord allies.

In the autumn of 28 Liu Yu and his associates were besieged in Chuihui by Guangwu's generals Ma Wu and Wang Ba, and after a failed sortie early in 29 the town closed its gates against them and the confederates were obliged to flee. Liu Yu took refuge with Jiao Qiang in Shanyang, but they were promptly attacked by Han troops under Du Mao, and Jiao Qiang and Liu Yu fled to Dong Xian.

In the autumn of 29 the combined forces of the southeast were defeated by Guangwu at Changlü in Donghai. Liu Yu took refuge with Dong Xian in his capital of Tan, and when that city fell a few weeks later he was killed by Gao Hu of the Wuxiao bandit group. - HHS 12/2:495-97; Bn 54 appendix # 156.

Liu Yu 劉育. Administrator of Jiyin in the early 30s, Liu Yu admired the qualities of his Assistant Liu Ping, gave him considerable authority in government, and recommended him to the throne. - HHS 39/29:1296.

Liu Yu 劉宇 (d.103). Son of Liu Jing the King of Langye, he succeeded his father in 81.

Liu Yu was succeeded by his son Shou, and eight other sons were later enfeoffed as marquises. - HHS 42/32:1451-52.

Liu Yu 劉昱. Son of Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan, Liu Yu was made a marquis in 90. Later, however, he offended the law and was deprived of his fief. - HHS 42/32:1432.

Liu Yu 劉豫. About 77 Liu Yu was a magistrate in Chenliu while Si Xie was a magistrate in Nanyang. Both men were admired for their firm administration, but the Excellency of Works Diwu Lun criticised their cruelty, and argued that those who had approved and promoted them should be reprimanded. - HHS 41/31:1400; Loewe 86C:292.

Liu Yu 劉禹. Son of Liu Zhen 真, he inherited the family fief. - HHS 14/4:562; Bn 54 appendix # 146.

Liu Yu 劉瑜 [Jijie 季節] (d.168); Guangling. Son of Liu Bian, Liu Yu claimed descent from the kings of Guangling in Former Han. When he was young he studied the Confucian classics, and also the arts of fortune-telling by diagrams, by astrology and by numbers. He was invited to local office by both the commandery and the province, but did not accept.

In 165 the Grand Commandant Yang Bing recommended Liu Yu as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright, and so he came to Luoyang. His candidate's memorial protested against the hereditary ranks which had been granted to the emperor's eunuch favourites, against the luxury of his harem and the number of his concubines, and against the general corruption and lack of proper conduct in the government. He was invited to further discussions on the basis of his knowledge of portents, but was also pressed to withdraw his stronger statements. Instead, he sent in a further eight thousand words reiterating his original comments.

Despite the controversy of his arguments, we are told that Liu Yu was graded First Class and was celebrated as "the Sincere and Upright candidate with long black hair" 方正長鬚. He was appointed a Consultant, but soon afterwards joined Cai Yan in protest against the punishment of Cheng Jin, the Administrator of Nanyang who had been arrested for killing the eunuch associate Zhang Fan and others during a time of amnesty. Their argument was outspoken, and both Liu Yu and Cai Yan were dismissed; Cheng Jin was later executed.

In 168, when the regency for the new Emperor

Ling was dominated by Dou Wu and Chen Fan, Liu Yu was brought back to the capital and appointed as a Palace Attendant. He took an active part in planning for the destruction of the eunuchs led by Cao Jie, and in the autumn he wrote to the Dowager and to Dou Wu and Chen Fan, warning them that the stars boded ill for great ministers and honest men, and urging them to take action. His letter triggered the first arrests of the eunuchs, and the interrogation of Zheng Li implicated Cao Jie and Wang Fu. Liu Yu was sent with the report to the Dowager recommending the purge, but the eunuch Zhu Yu found out, and Cao Jie and Wang Fu then destroyed Dou Wu and Chen Fan.

In the aftermath of the eunuchs' victory, Liu Yu and members of his family were among the first to be killed, and his major memorials to the throne were destroyed on the grounds that they were false. His biography in HHS 57/47, however, preserves a text of his candidate's memorial from 165. -HHS 57/47:1854-58*, 69/59:2241-44; deC 89:59-101.

Liu Yu 劉豫. Son of Liu Qian the King of Zhao, he succeeded his father in 164.

Liu Yu was succeeded by his son She. -HHS 14/4:559; Bn 54 appendix # 162.

Liu Yu 劉廙. A son of Liu Li the King of Hejian, in 174 he was enfeoffed as King of Ji'nan to maintain the lineage and sacrifices of Liu Chang, father of Emperor Ling. Liu Yu was succeeded by his son Yun. -HHS 55/45:1810.

HHS 55/45 gives the name of this man as Kang 康, but in JJ at 1951 Qian Daxin observes that an earlier ruler of Ji'nan had held that personal name, and his titular successor should have avoided the taboo. A fragment of XHS, preserved in Taiping yulan, gives the personal name as Yu 廙; the characters may have been confused in copying, but it is possible that he changed his name when he acceded to the fief.

Liu Yu 劉虞 [Bo'an 伯安] (d.193); Donghai. Son of Liu Shu, Liu Yu studied the classics and held local office in his county and commandery. He was sent to the capital as Reporting Officer, nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and became a magistrate in Dong commandery, where his virtue protected the county from a plague of locusts. He was then Inspector of You province on the north-eastern frontier. He wore the local clothing of fur and felt, his good government was praised by the people, and he received regular tribute from the non-Chinese.

After a period out of office, in 184 Liu Yu was sent as Chancellor to Ganling. His record was so good that he was excused the normal fine for official appointment, and his humane rule settled that hot-bed of Yellow Turban rebellion. He became Director of the Imperial Secretariat, then Minister of the Household, and was transferred to be Minister of the Imperial Clan.

In 188 Liu Yu was sent again to You province, this time as Governor with full authority over the territory ravaged by the rebellion of Zhang Chun and his Wuhuan allies. He arrived in 189, and following the campaigns of Gongsun Zan he induced the murder of Zhang Chun and persuaded Qiuliju to surrender. He was rewarded with enfeoffment and was appointed Grand Commandant, though he still remained in the northeast.

Dong Zhuo's regime later awarded Liu Yu honorary titles as Grand Marshal and then Grand Tutor, while Yuan Shao and some others of the eastern alliance wanted him to take regency power and even suggested him as a candidate for the throne: he was descended from Emperor Guangwu's son Liu Qiang, but his claim was extremely slight. Liu Yu rejected such offers, and he is said to have executed one of the messengers. Instead, while still keeping contact with Yuan Shao and his loyal rebels, he also sent reports to Chang'an, and he was rewarded with enhanced enfeoffment and wide civil authority; such favour, however, was of limited practical use in the troubles of the time.

You province had formerly been subsidised by revenues from Qing and Ji, but after the disruption of the Yellow Turbans this supply had dried up and the northeast was in great difficulty. Giving an example of thrift in his private life and conduct, Liu Yu encouraged silk farming, established a market in Shanggu for trade with the non-Chinese across the frontier, and developed the production of salt and iron. As a result the price of grain was low and refugees came from the south to this region of prosperity.

The aggressive Gongsun Zan disapproved of Liu Yu's peaceful policies towards the Wuhuan, and as Liu Yu sought to restrain him by limiting supplies to his army he became increasingly angry. In 191 Liu Yu's son He escaped from Chang'an to seek aid for Emperor Xian, but was held by Yuan Shu. Gongsun Zan then made alliance with Yuan Shu, Liu Yu with Yuan Shao, and the two came into open conflict.

As Governor, Liu Yu's capital was at Ji city in Guangyang, while Gongsun Zan built a fortified camp within the walls. In the winter of 193 Liu Yu led troops against him, but Gongsun Zan was fore-warned, while Liu Yu's men were not skilled and did not press hard. Gongsun Zan made a successful counter-attack, drove Liu Yu to flight, and a few days later he captured him with his wife and children. The emissary Duan Xun had just arrived from Chang'an with grants for both Liu Yu and Gongsun Zan, but Gongsun Zan charged Liu Yu with treason, based on Yuan Shao's earlier offer of the throne, and he obliged Duan Xun to approve the public execution of Liu Yu and his family. -HHS 73/63:2353-57*, XC 4:13a, SGZ 8:240-43.

Liu Yu 劉禹 i.e. Liu Shang 劉尚 the General who is Firm and Majestic. -HHS 18/8:680.

Liu Yu 劉興 see Liu Fang 劉方.

Liu Yuan 劉元 i.e. Liu Xuan 劉玄 the Gengshi Emperor. -DGHJ 23:1a-2b.

Liu Yuan 劉元, the Lady (d.22); Nanyang. Youngest sister of Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, she married Deng Chen and bore him one son and three daughters, but she and the three girls were killed at the battle of Xiao-Chang'an in 22. In 26 Liu Yuan was awarded posthumous title as Senior Princess of Xinye in Nanyang. A temple was established for her west of the city and her son Deng Fan was granted a county marquisate so that he might maintain her sacrifices. -HHS 15/5:582-83, 14/4:555-56.

Liu Yuan 劉元; Nanyang. About 150 Liu Yuan killed the visiting scholar Zhang Zong. In revenge, Zhang Zong's colleague Chen Gang killed Liu Yuan when he was drunk. -HYGZ 10C:167.

Liu Yuan 劉瑗; Nanyang. A senior member of staff to the Administrator Lu Nu in 163, Liu Yuan was associated with the new temple at the source of the Huai, in the mountains to the east of the commandery. -LS 2:12a-14b, Nagata 94:142.

Liu Yuan 劉元 (d.180). Son of Liu Cheng the King of Liang, he succeeded his father in 164.

Liu Yuan was succeeded by his son Mi. -HHS 50/40:1678.

Liu Yuan 劉淵 miswritten for Deng Yuan 鄧淵. -HHJ 28:334, ZZTJ 61:1960; deC 96:150.

Liu Yuanqi 劉元起; Zhuo. In the late 170s Liu Yuanqi's son Deran studied under the Academician Lu Zhi. Liu Bei, future First Sovereign of the Three Kingdoms state of Shu-Han, was a fellow-student.

Though the families were kin, they were not closely related, but Liu Yuanqi gave provisions to Liu Bei in the same fashion as to Liu Deran. When his wife questioned him, he explained that Liu Bei was a man of great quality and prospects. -SGZ Shu 2:871.

Liu Yuanshou 劉元壽. The father of Liu Yuanshou, Liu Jing the King of Guangling, was a full brother of Emperor Ming, but in 67 he was disgraced and his state was ended. In 71, however, Emperor Ming enfeoffed Liu Yuanshou as Marquis of Guangling, with revenue from six counties of the former fief, and gave district marquisates to three of his younger brothers. In the following year, moreover, as he was travelling in the east of the empire, he called Liu Yuanshou and his brothers to audience, received them with honours and awarded them gifts.

Showing similar favour, in 82 Emperor Zhang called Liu Yuanshou and his brothers to attend court at the capital in company with the kings of the imperial house. -HHS 42/32:1448-49.

Liu Yun 劉贇 (d.207). Son of Liu Kang, he succeeded him as King of Ji'nan. In 207 Liu Yun was killed by Yellow Turban bandits, but his son Kai inherited the fief. -HHS 55/45:1810.

Liu Yuzhou 劉豫州 [Liu of Yu province] see Liu Bei 劉備.

Liu Ze 劉側 (d.102). Younger son of Liu Bing the King of Huaiyang, in 90 he was enfeoffed as King of Changshan to maintain his father's lineage.

Liu Ze died without sons, but the kingdom was maintained through his nephew Liu Zhang. -HHS 50/40:1678, 4:170.

Liu Zhan 劉瞻. Gentleman at the Yellow Gates in the Han court at Xu city under the control of Cao Cao, in 213 Liu Zhan presented the cap of manhood to Emperor Xian's son Liu Miao the King of Jibei. -HHS 94/4:3105.

Liu Zhan 劉展. A general and a district marquis, in 213 Liu Zhan was one of the officers who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. -SGZ 1:40.

Liu Zhang 劉章 (d.46); Nanyang. Elder son of Liu Yan/Bosheng, in 26 Liu Zhang was enfeoffed as King of Taiyuan. In 35 he was transferred to be King of Qi, but two years later, with other members of the imperial clan, he was reduced in rank to be Duke of Qi. In 43 the royal title was restored.

By special favour of the emperor, Liu Zhang held appointments as a county magistrate in Henan and as Administrator of Liang, but he normally resided at the capital. He was a friend of Wang Pan, and his death in 46 may have been the occasion for the accusations laid against Wang Pan and his associates in the autumn of that year.

Liu Zhang was succeeded by his son Shi, and his younger son Zhang 張 was later enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 14/4:553, 24/14:851; Bn 54 appendix # 118.

Liu Zhang 劉張. Son of Liu Zhang 章 the King of Qi [nephew of Emperor Guangwu by his elder brother Liu Yan/Bosheng], and younger brother of Liu Shi, in 54 Liu Zhang was enfeoffed as a marquis.

Liu Zhang was recognised for his good advice on matters concerning the non-Chinese peoples of the west, and in the winter of 74, following the success of Dou Gu against the Xiongnu in the previous year, he was appointed Commandant of Cavalry to lead one of three columns sent out from Dunhuang; overall command was held by Dou Gu, while Geng Bing led a third column. Defeating the Xiongnu and their local allies at Pulei Lake, the expedition moved west to take over the territory of Jushi north and south of the Bogda range and restore the Protectorate-General of the Western Regions.

Liu Zhang was later criticised and slandered, fell from favour and was stripped of his title. After his death, about 80, Emperor Zhang restored the fief to Liu Zhang's son Liu Tuoren, so that he might maintain sacrifices to his father. -HHS 14/4:553.

Liu Zhang 劉章 (d.127). Son of Liu Fang, when his uncle Liu Ze died without heirs in 102, Liu Zhang was enfeoffed as King of Changshan to maintain the lineage. Emperor He felt sympathy for his father's early death and treated him generously, but as the Dowager Deng took over government after the emperor's death in 106, he and the other kings were sent out to their states.

Liu Zhang was succeeded by his son Yi, and two older sons were later enfeoffed as village marquises. -HHS 50/40:1678.

Liu Zhang 劉章; Nanyang. Son of Liu Xun, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 14/4:568; Bn 54 appendix # 147.

Liu Zhang 劉璋 [Jiyu 季玉]; Jiangxia. Son of Liu Yan 焉, when his father went to Yi province as Governor in 188, Liu Zhang remained at the capital with his elder brothers Liu Fan and Liu Dan; he became Commandant of the Equipage. All three brothers accompanied the court under the control of Dong Zhuo to Chang'an in 190, but soon afterwards Liu Zhang was sent to Yi province with a letter criticising Liu Yan for his moves towards independence. [It is also said that Liu Yan claimed to be ill and asked that his son be allowed to join him.] Liu Yan paid no attention to the letter, but he kept Liu Zhang with him.

During a rebellion in 194, Liu Fan and Liu Dan were killed by Dong Zhuo's successor Li Jue, and when Liu Yan died in the same year Zhao Wei and other leading men of the region set Liu Zhang in his place: he was seen as a humane man who would allow them greater autonomy. The court had sent a certain Hu Mao to be Inspector of Yi province, and there was an insurrection in his support inspired by Liu Biao from Jing province. The rebels were driven away, and an imperial letter then appointed Liu Zhang as Military Commissioner and Governor in succession to his father.

The theocratic warlord Zhang Lu had established himself in Hanzhong, but had been kept under some control by Liu Yan through the presence of his mother and other kinsmen in the capital, Chengdu. Liu Zhang followed the same policy, but in 200 Zhang Lu ceased to pay obeisance and moved towards real independence. Liu Zhang was provoked into killing Zhang Lu's mother, and as defiance turned to open hostility Zhang Lu occupied the north of Ba commandery.

It appears that Liu Zhang had also shown himself too weak for the taste of his earlier supporters; and they were particularly aggrieved at his reliance upon the Dongzhou Troops 東州兵, refugees from central China who had been recruited by Liu Yan and whose depredations against local people went unpunished. Zhao Wei, formerly a supporter of Liu Zhang, raised a rebellion based upon his garrison in the east. He gained wide approval in Guanghan, Jianwei and Shu commanderies, but when he brought an army against Chengdu, Liu Zhang received fierce support from the Dongzhou Troops, who feared for their lives under a new regime. Zhao Wei was driven away and then killed.

The Han court under Cao Cao's control sought to take advantage of this disturbance by sending Niu Dan as Inspector and calling Liu Zhang to appointment as a minister in the puppet government. Predictably, Liu Zhang refused, and he continued to hold chief power in the region. For the next several years Cao Cao was occupied by the contest with Yuan Shao and the subsequent take-over of the northern plain, Liu Biao had to face Sun Quan on the lower Yangzi, while Zhang Lu provided a buffer against the various warlords of the Wei valley without himself being strong enough to challenge Liu Zhang directly.

In 208, as Cao Cao advanced into Jing province, Liu Zhang sent envoys, but Cao Cao was primarily concerned with the campaign against Liu Bei and Sun Quan, and though he granted Liu Zhang title as a general he did not treat his messengers with great generosity. The envoy Zhang Song recommended to Liu Zhang that he withdraw his offers of support, and the decision was encouraged by Cao Cao's defeat at the Red Cliffs. As Liu Bei established himself on the middle Yangzi Liu Zhang made alliance and sent troops to assist him, while a number of his officers, including Zhang Song and Fa Zheng, became agents for Liu Bei within Liu Zhang's own councils.

When Cao Cao defeated the warlords of the Wei valley in 211 he sent his general Zhong Yao south against Zhang Lu. Zhang Song and Fa Zheng pointed out the danger if Zhang Lu surrendered and joined Cao Cao to attack, and they urged Liu Zhang to call Liu Bei, so that he might take Hanzhong before Cao Cao did. Their proposal emphasised Liu Zhang's political weakness, in that leading men of the province such as Pang Xi had an erratic record of loyalty, while he should be able rely upon Liu Bei as a fellow-member of the imperial clan. This latter argument proved false, and several of Liu Zhang's other officers foretold the betrayal to come, but it is notable that after more than twenty years of family rule in the territory Liu Zhang could not rely upon strong local support.

Liu Zhang invited Liu Bei, the alliance was celebrated with ceremony and assurances of good faith, and Liu Bei was given quantities of troops and equipment to establish himself in Guanghan and oppose Zhang Lu. Over the following twelve months he took no effective action against Zhang Lu, but constantly complained how Liu Zhang kept him short of supplies, and when Cao Cao moved against Sun Quan in 212 he asked leave to go to the aid of his lieutenant Guan Yu in Jing province. Liu Zhang, feeling with justification that he had received small return for the provisions he had given, and that the situation in the east was by no means urgent, refused his request, and Liu Bei took the excuse to turn against him.

Killing those officers of Liu Zhang who remained loyal, Liu Bei advanced against Chengdu. Liu Zhang was advised to refuse battle and adopt a scorched-earth policy which might force Liu Bei to withdraw, but he was unwilling to harm civilians by such a strategy. The troops he sent to oppose Liu Bei were defeated, and though Luo city in Guanghan, forty kilometres from Chengdu, held out for several months, Zhuge Liang and Zhang Fei brought troops from Jing province and the warlord Ma Chao came from the north to join them. By the summer of 214 Chengdu was isolated and invested, and after a few weeks siege, again reluctant to cause his people to suffer, Liu Zhang surrendered.

As he took over the government in Yi province Liu Bei sent Liu Zhang down-river to Gong'an, his headquarters in Jing province. Five years later, when Sun Quan's general Lü Meng destroyed Liu Bei's commander Guan Yu in 219, Liu Zhang came into his hands. As a challenge to Liu Bei, Sun Quan restored Liu Zhang's title as Governor of Yi province, with interim residence at Zigui, near the entrance to the Gorges. Soon afterwards Liu Zhang died. -SGZ Shu 1: 868-70*, HHS 75/65:2433-35*; deC 90:361-370, deC 96:297-298, 443-469, 551.

Liu Zhao 劉肇 (79-106) [Emperor He 和帝 (reg. 88-106)]. Born in 79, Liu Zhao was a son of Emperor Zhang by one of his two Honoured Ladies Liang. About this same time his elder half-brother Liu Qing, who had been born in the previous year to an Honoured Lady Song, was named Heir under the patronage of the Dowager Ma. When the Dowager died soon afterwards, however, chief influence in the harem was taken by the Empress Dou; in 82 the empress had the Ladies Song, Liu Qing's mother and aunt, sent to prison to die, and had Liu Zhao replace Liu Qing as Heir.

A grand-daughter of Liang Tong, leading associate of Emperor Guangwu's ally Dou Rong, Liu Zhao's mother was thus well-born and had an old connection with the family of the empress, but the Liang gained little from their scion's elevation; the Lady Dou had no wish to share her authority and influence. In 83 the Honoured Ladies' father Liang Song was charged with treason and executed. His daughters then "died of grief," and the Empress Dou thereafter brought Liu Zhao up as her own son; it is said that the child's true maternity was forgotten and he did not know the identity of his mother until many years later: the Lady Dou died in 97 and the matter was then investigated and reported by the Grand Commandant Zhang Pu. On the other hand, Emperor Zhang continued to treat the former Heir Liu Qing well; despite their formal rivalry, the two princes were close friends.

ACCESSION AND TUTELAGE

On 9 April 88 Emperor Zhang died and Liu Zhao came to the throne at the age of ten sui. The Dowager Dou became regent, the Grand Tutor Deng Biao accepted the lead of her family, and the Dowager's eldest brother Dou Xian held great power in government. Soon afterwards Dou Xian was involved in the murder of the imperial kinsman Liu Chang, and as the scandal broke the Dowager sought to distract attention by placing him in command of an expedition against the Northern Xiongnu. There was considerable opposition within the court, but the dissidents were quelled, the army was prepared, and early in 89 Dou Xian embarked on a campaign of conquest.

The operation was completely successful, the power of the Northern Xiongnu on the steppe was destroyed and by 91 the remnant court had been driven away to the west. In the longer term, on the other hand, the high cost of the war placed overwhelming strain upon the Han regime, while the Southern Xiongnu, allies and puppets of China, were unable to establish an effective government over their former rivals.

As Dou Xian returned from the northwest in the summer of 92 the prestige and authority of his family appeared to be at its height, but Emperor He was resolved to free himself from the control of his over-mighty subjects. Encouraged and supported by Zheng Zhong and other eunuchs, he gave orders to arrest the supporters of the Dou clan and had Dou Xian stripped of his insignia. Dou Xian and his brothers were sent from the capital and were either killed or obliged to commit suicide, while the Dowager was held under arrest in her apartments; she took no further part in government.

Emperor He had taken the cap of manhood in 91, when he was eleven by Western count, and was thus formally competent to rule without a regency, but it is impressive that he could organise a coup eighteen months later against such a powerful and apparently well-entrenched family. He surely owed a great deal to the energy of Zheng Zhong and his colleagues, and this was the first of several occasions in which eunuchs of the palace played a critical role in a struggle for power at the capital. We are nonetheless told that Liu Zhao consulted his half-brother Liu Qing, one year older than himself, as he was planning the project, so it appears that he was willing and able to take an active role.

Following the coup the Grand Tutor Deng Biao resigned his office, while the Grand Commandant Song You was obliged to commit suicide for his support of the Dou. Song You's successor Yin Mu was granted control of the affairs of the imperial secretariat, implying formal command over the government, but it is unlikely the emperor relinquished any real power; rather he was able to use Yin Mu as his chief executive. In any case, Yin Mu died in the following year, and for the rest of his reign Emperor He held undisputed authority.

COURT AND HAREM

In 92 the Lady Yin from Nanyang entered the imperial harem. A member of the same family as the second empress of Guangwu, she achieved swift promotion and imperial favour, and in 96 she was appointed empress. Unfortunately, she bore no children, and she steadily lost favour to her distant cousin the Honoured Lady Deng Sui, daughter of Deng Xun, former Protector of the Qiang, and also from a great clan of Nanyang. The empress showed her feelings at her gradual eclipse, and in 102 it was alleged that had engaged in witchcraft: it may have been a false accusation for political purposes, but it is possible she had sought magical aid to regain the emperor's affections and to conceive an heir. In any event, the Yin family was disgraced and the empress was dismissed and sent to the harem prison, where she died. A few months later, at the end of the year, the Lady Deng was named empress.

Born in 81, the Lady Deng had entered the harem in 96. She likewise bore her consort no children, though the emperor did have two sons by concubines. Nothing is known of the mothers, but Emperor He evidently trusted his empress to deal with the two boys, and when he died without naming an Heir in 106 the Lady Deng, now Dowager, was able to determine the succession and rule as regent.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

The destruction of the Northern Xiongnu by Dou Xian was supposed to produce peace on the northern frontier, but the effect of that military triumph was weakened by the failure of the Southern Xiongnu regime to achieve a settlement with the Northerners for whom it was now formally responsible. The prince Shizi, an established friend of Han, attacked and plundered even those who came south to submit, and when the new Shanyu Anguo sought to bring him under control in 93, Shizi appealed for help. In the following year a Chinese army attacked Anguo and he was killed. Shizi succeeded him, but there was then a rebellion amongst the Northerners, and though the Chinese came to his defence the insurgents escaped north into the steppe.

The leader of these rebels, Fenghou, was himself a Southern prince. He and his followers maintained their independence for several years, though they were under pressure not only from the Southern Xiongnu and the Han but, perhaps more dangerously, from Xianbi tribes moving west to fill the vacuum left by the fall of the Northern Xiongnu. By 104 Fenghou had been driven to seek surrender, but his request was not approved, and only in 118 were he and a remnant of his original following able to obtain refuge.

On the one hand, Fenghou's rebellion marked the failure of the Southern Xiongnu settlement; and on the other, his failure demonstrated how the Xianbi were taking over the steppe and removing any long-term hope of peace in the north. Furthermore, while the general Ren Shang was able to use Xianbi auxiliaries against Fenghou in 94, three years later there occurred the first recorded raid of Xianbi against the north-eastern frontier. The former allies were now turning against China itself, incidental attacks were reported in the following years, and in 104 a special military region was set up in the Daling ranges west of Liaodong. About the same time, moreover, perhaps inspired by the activities of the Xianbi, the people of Gaogouli [Koguryo] and other tribes of present-day Manchuria began to attack the far northeast.

At the beginning of the reign of Emperor He there was trouble with the Qiang war-leader Mitang, whose father Miyu had been murdered by the Han official Zhang Yu. In 89 Zhang Yu was replaced as Protector by Deng Xun, who opposed Mitang with a mixture of diplomacy and force, so that by the early 90s Mitang had been largely isolated from his allied tribes, while the Little Yuezhi people of the hill country in the west of Jincheng, who had been well-treated by Deng Xun, volunteered to form a Loyal Auxiliary.

Deng Xun died in 92, but his successors maintained the pressure, and after a last attack on the Longxi frontier in 97, which required troops from the capital to settle, Mitang was obliged to surrender in 98. A rising in 100 was put down by the Protector in the following year, and the court now ordered the restoration of Xihai commandery to the west of Jincheng near the Koko Nor/Lake Qinghai. This territory had been claimed by Wang Mang but later abandoned: it does not appear that the new unit was maintained for long.

The troubles on the frontier had made Chinese settlement in Liang province uneasy and unstable, and though the government sought to hinder emigration and to encourage new colonists, including convicts whose sentences were remitted as a reward, much land within imperial territory was taken up by Qiang people coming to live within the frontier. The process had begun with Ma Yuan at the beginning of the dynasty, but the growing numbers of these "Eastern Qiang" confirmed the demographic weakness of Han China in the northwest and brought major problems in the following reign.

Further afield in central Asia, by contrast to the misplaced effort in the northern steppe, the enterprise of Ban Chao achieved a great deal with small demand on resources from China Proper. He had been engaged in the region with increasing success since 73, he defeated an army of the Great Yuezhi in 90 and, following the destruction of the Northern Xiongnu in 91, he obtained the surrender of their former tributary Qiuzi [Kuqa], north of the Takla Makan. Though his brother Ban Gu died as a supporter of Dou Xian in 92, Ban Chao's position was not affected. He was named Protector-General of the Western Regions, and with the conquest of the remaining kingdom of Yanqi [Karashar] in 94 he gained control over the whole Tarim basin. The court received hostage princes and quantities of tribute from more than fifty states, while an embassy from Parthia came in 89, and a second, bringing a gift of ostriches 條枝大爵, arrived in 101.

Ban Chao was rewarded with enfeoffment in 95, and in 97 he sent Gan Ying on his celebrated mission to explore the far west. He remained at his post in Yutian [Khotan] until 102 when, at the age of almost seventy, he was at last given permission to retire. Ban Chao's achievements appear to have owed more to his personal authority and skill than to any real strength of Chinese arms, and his successor Ren Shang was a fighting man rather than a diplomat. Soon after the death of Emperor He in 106 a major rising amongst the dependent city-states forced the Chinese to withdraw from the region, and this was followed by the rebellion of the Qiang people in Liang province; the restoration of empire in central Asia proved as short-lived as the dynasty's triumph on the northern steppe.

Elsewhere, rhinoceros and elephants were received from the southwest in 94, and in 97 King Yongyoutiao of Shan in present-day Burma/Myanmar sent an embassy with gifts to the court, while there was formal submission of tribespeople beyond the frontier of Shu commandery. On the other hand, the non-Chinese of Wuling were in "rebellion" from 92 to 94, and those of Nan commandery in 101 and 102; both incidents no doubt reflect local resistance to Chinese colonisation. And in the furthest south there was trouble with tribes in the south of Rinan in 100, requiring the appointment of a military command for that region two years later. The south of the empire, however, saw no events so dramatic as those of the north, for this region was affected rather by the quiet and steady pressure of colonisation than by the need to defend a weakened and vulnerable frontier.

SCHOLARSHIP AND PHILOSOPHY

Following the conference at the White Tiger Hall in 79 the New Text had continued to dominate the University, but this tradition of thought and interpretation had lost its authority among the best scholars. Concerned at the Legalist tendencies of the government, regular New Text men such as Lu Gong and his brother Lu Bi sought to encourage moral teaching as a complement to the law, but as the struggle between orthodoxy and innovation continued, disillusion with the New Text, notably expressed in the writings of Wang Chong, affected the whole academic community.

Early in the reign, the capping ceremony of 91 was carried out according to the detailed New Rituals 新禮 which had been presented to Emperor Zhang by Cao Bao. Though Cao Bao was a scholar of the New Text, the timing of the imperial coming of age fitted the requirements of the Old Text tradition, for New Text theories would have delayed the ceremony until the ruler was twenty sui. The timing was important, for it entitled the young ruler to govern for himself, and gave him the opportunity to destroy the Dou family. The general procedure, however, had proven excessively complex, and about 95 the Grand Commandant Zhang Pu and Zhang Min of the Secretariat memorialised against the reforms and criticised Cao Bao for having confused the procedures laid down by the sages. Emperor He did not formally accept their recommendation, but Cao Bao's rituals were largely abandoned.

Emperor He was interested in scholarship and tolerant of both Confucian traditions. He continued to favour Jia Kui, but he also respected the New Text scholar Lu Pi, who had himself been recommended by Jia Kui despite their different approaches, and in 100 these two and others held discussions at court. Otherwise, there was a general decline in orthodox learning. In 102 the Excellency Xu Fang complained that the traditional meanings of the Confucian classics were being lost amidst a plethora of new interpretations, and that the confusion was reflected at the Imperial University. Seeking to improve the situation, he urged that examinations should encourage literal readings and accepted interpretations, and candidates who failed to follow authority should be penalised. The proposal was discussed at court, agreed and duly ordered, but the effect was rather to stultify than reinvigorate official scholarship, and as the Dowager Deng took regency power after the death of Emperor He in 106, Fan Zhun of the Secretariat presented a memorial in which he deplored the decline of Confucian learning and the empty formality of orthodox teaching.

On the other hand, the emperor was definitely interested in history. As the celebrated Ban Gu had fallen victim to the coup which destroyed his patron Dou Xian in 92, Emperor He ordered that his history of Former Han should be continued by his sister Ban Zhao – as in his dealings with Ban Chao's affairs in central Asia, it is clear that he was more concerned with the work that was done than with pursuing the relatives of a disgraced politician. In a most unusual step, moreover, the Lady Ban received formal appointment at the Eastern Pavilion in order that she might use the archives and books. We are told that the emperor visited the library on several occasions, and that he showed personal interest in the materials which were held there and in the recruitment of skilled staff.

STYLE OF GOVERNMENT

Recognising the support he had obtained from the palace eunuchs for the coup against the Dou, Emperor He increased the number of their senior ranks: where Emperor Ming had had four Regular Attendants, there were now twelve positions available, and there were twenty Attendants at the Yellow Gates. Zheng Zhong, leader of the coup, was rewarded with enfeoffment in 102, and his title later passed to an adopted son. Both through the circumstances of the coup and the imperial favour which followed, the eunuchs began to accumulate significant potential power, and gained influence at the expense of the traditional bureaucracy. On occasion Emperor He would ask advice from the generality of officials; he sought to improve and expand the procedures for selection; and he amended commandery quotas to accord with their population. It was nonetheless observed that gentlemen of middling rank were beginning to pay attention rather to their own interests than to those of the state and the dynasty, and there was concern that the bureaucracy was becoming corrupt and dysfunctional.

Unlike his father, Emperor He did not travel widely. He visited Chang'an to pay respects to the dynastic ancestors, but his only substantial journey outside the capital region was a tour to Jing province in 103, when he likewise visited ancestral tombs. He planned to visit the Yunneng marshes by the junction of the Han and the Yangzi, but the Excellency Zhang Yu sent messengers to discourage him, for there had been rebellion in Nan commandery during the previous year. The emperor returned to Luoyang, and rewarded Zhang Yu for his advice.

More generally, despite criticism of the regime as unduly Legalistic, the emperor gave ostentatious attention to public welfare, and responded particularly to natural disasters and misfortunes of the people. In one incident, when there was drought in the capital region in 94 he went in person to inspect the prisons and hold jail delivery. When it was found that a number of people were being held on false charges he had the Prefect of Luoyang sent to prison himself, while the Director of Retainers and the Intendant of Henan were both reduced in rank; good rain fell soon afterwards. On the other hand, an ordinance of 103 provided that judgements of minor offences could be carried out in summer rather than waiting for autumn. It was intended that justice would be done more swiftly and prisoners would not have to wait so long to know their fate, but many local authorities found occasion to inflict even capital punishment during the summer [see sub Lu Gong].

There were serious plagues of locusts and drought in the middle 90s, followed by floods in 98 and 100, and a number of earthquakes. These were met by a remission of tax, the opening of granaries, loans from the state, remission of debts, frequent donations and frequent relief to the poor. In 99 permission was given for distressed people to fish and gather fuel in the wilderness regions – they were probably doing so already – and edicts were issued for the resettlement of refugees from disaster areas. There were also three general remissions of tax, regardless of need.

Ebrey has remarked that the frequency and apparent success of such relief measures and donations indicates an overall prosperity and adequate government resources. It does appear, however, that the empire was affected by such a large number of natural disasters, and it is possible that the economy was weakened. The salt and iron monopolies which had been restored by Emperor Zhang were abolished early in the reign, and although a single office for iron was re-established in Zhuo commandery in 102, this was nothing like the scale which had applied during Former Han. Given the costs of war against the Xiongnu, the state had limited long-term capacity to maintain its benevolent role in time of need.

Towards the end of the reign of Emperor He there were some attempts to reduce expenditure on luxuries for the palace: in 103 it was ordered that the special courier service bringing lychees and longans to the imperial table from the south should be ended [see sub Tang Qiang], and this policy of restraint was followed still more energetically by the regent Dowager Deng after her husband's death. Increasingly, however, local communities were required to fend for themselves in time of emergency, and there are records of wandering people and evidence of weakening central authority.

DEATH AND JUDGEMENT

Emperor He died on 13 February 106, in the winter at the end of the Chinese year, twenty-seven years old by Chinese reckoning. He was succeeded by an infant son, and his widow the Lady Deng Sui maintained regency control of the government for fifteen years until her death.

The emperor was buried in the "Mound of Accord" 順陵, southeast of Luoyang [the variant "Mound of Circumspection 慎陵 is probably mistaken: Bn 76: 118], and he was awarded the temple-name Muzong 穆宗 "Solemn Exemplar." In 190, however, the scholar Cai Yong recommended to Dong Zhuo, controlling the court of Han at the time, that Emperor He and his successors should be deposed from their permanent positions in the Imperial Ancestral Temple on the grounds that they had shown no merit or virtue.

As Mansvelt Beck has observed, this deposition of Emperor He was necessary in order to rationalise the theory and rituals associated with the worship of the imperial ancestors and predecessors. His recommendations were accepted by a powerless court, but they made no real difference to the collapsing dynasty [MBeck 90:106-107]. In later times, historians have debated whether it was Emperor He or his successor Emperor An who was the first of the worthless rulers; given the circumstances of his time one must doubt whether Emperor He truly deserved the ferocity of Cai Yong's attack.

It appears nonetheless that the last years of the first century AD marked a critical point in the fortunes of Later Han. The government was still able to deal with its social and fiscal responsibilities, but it did so with increasing difficulty, while the unstable situations in the north and northwest were dangerous legacies for the future. The emperor himself had small opportunity to contemplate or deal with such problems: he died as a young man, after little more than ten years of active personal rule. For the sake of the dynasty, his greatest failure was his early death, and the fact that he left only children to succeed him: see Liu Sheng and Liu Long, the Young Emperor. -HHS 4*.

Liu Zhen 劉珍 or Liu Bao 寶 [Qiusun 秋孫 or Misun 秘孫 or Qianjiu 千秋]; Nanyang. A keen scholar when he was young, Liu Zhen became Supervisor of Internuncios about 110, and the regent Dowager Deng ordered him to join the scholars Liu Taotu and Ma Rong, with Academicians of the University under the supervision of the eunuch Cai Lun, to compile a definitive edition of the Five Classics, Changes, History, Poetry, Ritual and Chunqiu, in the library of the Eastern Pavilion.

In 120 Liu Zhen was further commissioned to work with Liu Taotu, Liu Yi and Li You on the official history of Later Han, later known as Dongguan Hanji 東觀漢記. The history had been started by Ban Gu and others under orders from Emperor Ming, with the title "Diary of the Jianwu Period" 建武注記. This second instalment contained annals for the period 58 to 106, being the reigns of Emperors Ming, Zhang, He and the infant Shang, together with tables and biographies of leading men, imperial relatives by marriage and noted scholars; the whole work was now entitled Han ji 漢記 "Record of Han."

Liu Zhen was later a Palace Attendant and then a colonel in the Northern Army. In 125 he was appointed Minister of the Imperial Clan in the government of Emperor Shun, and Minister of the Guards in the following year. He died soon afterwards.

It is said that Liu Zhen and Liu Taotu asked for the assistance of the scholar Zhang Heng to work on Han ji, but that this was not approved, and Liu Zhen and Liu Taotu died soon afterwards. This implies that the history was unfinished, and since later requests by Zhang Heng to complete the work were likewise rejected, the recension may never have reached final form.

Besides his editing of the classics and his contribution to the dynastic history, Liu Zhen composed seven pian of eulogies, hymns and other compositions. He is also said to have compiled a lexicographical work, Shi ming 釋名, though the surviving work of that name is generally ascribed to Liu Xi of the late second century. It is possible that Liu Zhen's work was developed by Liu Xi, but no identifiable portion remains. -HHS 80/70A:2617*, 59/49:1940; Bn 54:10-11, Texts:427 [Miller].

Liu Zhen 劉真. Son of Liu Ping, he inherited the family fief. -HHS 14/4:562; Bn 54 appendix # 130.

Liu Zhen 劉臻 (d.156). Son of Liu Su the King of Donghai, he succeeded his father in 125. Celebrated for filial piety and generosity towards their extended family, Liu Zhen and his marquis brother Jian were granted additional households to their fiefs by Emperor Shun.

Liu Zhen was succeeded by his son Zhi. -HHS 42/32:1426.

Liu Zhen 劉楨 [Gonggan 公幹] (d.217); Dongping. Liu Zhen was a grandson of Liu Liang/Gong/Cen [or possibly a son: q.v. sub voce]. Noted for his elegant literary style, he joined Cao Cao's staff and became a close friend of his sons. On one occasion at a private party, however, he was drunk and failed to bow to Cao Pi's wife the Lady Zhen when she came to meet the guests. When Cao Cao heard of this he ordered Liu Zhen's arrest and very nearly had him killed.

Liu Zhen died during the great epidemic of 217. In his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature" Cao Pi honours him as one of the Seven Masters of the Jian'an period. -SGZ 21:599-602*; Mather 76:550.

Another story says that Liu Zhen dreamt of a snake with four legs, foreshadowing a rebellion led by women, and that he was executed for impiety. This appears to be a confused combination of the incident with the Lady Zhen and a dream reported to Zhou Xuan q.v.

594 Liu Zheng

Liu Zheng 劉政 (d.102). Son of Liu Qiang the King of Donghai, Liu Zheng succeeded his father in 58. Described as a man of depraved taste and conduct, he had more than twenty sons.

In 90 Liu Zheng attended the funeral of his uncle Liu Yan the late king of Zhongshan, but took the occasion to seduce Liu Yan's chief concubine, the Lady Xu I, and other women of his harem. The Inspector of Yu province and the Chancellor of the state of Lu [part of Liu Zheng's fief] reported this to the throne and urged that he be executed, but Liu Zheng suffered only the loss of a single county from his fief.

Liu Zheng was succeeded by his son Su; twenty-one other sons were later enfeoffed as marquises. - HHS 42/32:1425.

Liu Zheng 劉正 see Liu Gai 劉丐.

Liu Zheng 劉政 (d.141). Son of Liu Kai the King of Hejian, he succeeded his father in 131. He behaved viciously and brutally, but was initially brought to order by the Chancellor Shen Jing and later by Zhang Heng.

Liu Zheng was succeeded by his son Jian. - HHS 55/45:1808.

Liu Zheng 劉政 (d.187). In 187 Liu Zheng was Administrator of Youbeiping. He was killed by the rebels Zhang Chun and Zhang Ju, aided by the Wuhuan chieftain Qiuliju and numbers of Xianbi. - HHS 73/63:2353.

Liu Zheng 劉政/正; Beihai. A man of local family, about 191 Liu Zheng went to Liaodong, where he set up a self-defence community. Gongsun Du, however, arrested his followers and intended to kill him. Sheltered by Bing Yuan, Liu Zheng went with Taishi Ci back to China proper, and Bing Yuan then persuaded Gongsun Du to let his people join him. - SGZ 11:350.

Liu Zheng 劉政 (d.206). Son of Liu Luan, he succeeded his father as King of Jibei. He left no sons when he died, and the kingdom was ended. - HHS 55/45:1807.

Liu Zhi 劉祉 or Liu Zhong 終 [Jubo 巨伯] (9 BC-AD 35); Nanyang. [His original personal name was Zhong, but he changed it later to Zhi.] Son of Liu Chang the Marquis of Chongling district in Caiyang county of Nanyang, Liu Zhi was a second cousin of Liu Xuan, future Gengshi Emperor, and a more distant kinsman of Liu Bosheng and his brother Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. Though he took no active role, Liu Chang had been sympathetic to the rebellion of Liu Chong 崇 in 6 AD, which sought to restore the dynasty.

When that enterprise failed, seeking support and protection from another powerful family, Liu Chang arranged for Liu Zhi to marry a daughter of Zhai Xuan 翟宣, son of the late Imperial Chancellor Zhai Fangjin 翟方進. Just as the alliance was confirmed in 7, Zhai Xuan's brother Zhai Yi 翟義 made a further attempt at revolt in Dong commandery. The young Lady Zhai was killed by the authorities in Nanyang, and Liu Zhi was arrested. His father pleaded for him, and Wang Mang, already planning to take the imperial title, did not wish to appear too harsh, so Liu Zhi was not executed.

Liu Zhi remained in prison for several years, and when a tax case arose his distant cousin Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, went to Chang'an in 21 to plead on the family's behalf. About this time Liu Chang died and Liu Zhi was released and permitted to inherit the family property. He was forbidden to hold office, and the family fief had been abolished early in the new regime, but Liu Chang had retained his estates and Liu Zhi was now extremely wealthy, with great prestige among members of the former imperial clan.

As the Han rebellion began in 22, Liu Zhi and his kinsmen joined the cause, but the people of their households were taken and imprisoned by Wang Mang's administrator of Nanyang, Zhen Fu 甄阜. After the defeat at Xiao-Chang'an, moreover, as Liu Zhi took command of the defence of the rebel base in Jiyang county, Zhen Fu killed his mother, his younger brothers and his wife and children.

When the Gengshi Emperor was proclaimed outside Wan in 23, Liu Zhi was given title as a general and restored as marquis of the former family fief at Chongling. Soon afterwards Liu Bosheng was destroyed, and Liu Zhi took the place of his brother Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, as Minister of Ceremonies.

Liu Zhi accompanied the final campaign to the west against Wang Mang and Chang'an in 24 he was enfeoffed as a king. As the Gengshi Emperor surrendered to the Red Eyebrows in 25, Liu Zhi made his escape to Luoyang, and he was then the first of the imperial clan to join Liu Xiu, proclaimed as Emperor Guangwu, at his camp in Huai county in Henei. Guangwu was glad at the recognition, and in 26 Liu Zhi was named King of Chengyang, with all the regalia of royalty, while his father was restored to posthumous title as a marquis.

Liu Zhi never went to his state, but lived and died at Luoyang. From his deathbed he returned his royal insignia, seeking only to maintain the rites of his ancestors as marquises. He was given posthumous title as king, but his sons Ping and Jian were enfeoffed as marquises.

In later years, the ancestral homeland of the imperial clan at Chongling district was changed to county status and renamed Zhangling. Because of the earlier position of Liu Zhi's family at the head of the clan in Nanyang, sacrifices and tomb estates were maintained for his father and other ancestors. -HHS 14/4:560-62*; Bn 54 appendix # 73.

Liu Zhi 劉植 [Boxian 伯先] (d.26); Julu [his county of Changcheng had been part of Xindu under Former Han, but the boundaries were later changed]. There is no record of any relationship to the imperial dynasty of Han, nor any account of earlier family history, but Liu Zhi and his kinsmen evidently held authority in their home country.

When Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in the winter of 23/24, Liu Zhi and his younger brother Liu Xi, with their cousin Liu Xin, gathered several thousand clan troops and personal retainers and seized the city of Changcheng. Declaring their support for Han, they opened the gates to Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor. Liu Xiu named Liu Zhi as a general, with Liu Xi and Liu Xin as lieutenant-generals. All were given title as marquises.

In the following year Liu Zhi was sent as an envoy to Liu ["Goitre"] Yang, King of Zhending, and persuaded him to accede to the Han cause. He then took part in the campaigns which settled the northern plain and captured Luoyang.

In 26 Liu Zhi was awarded his own home county as a territorial fief, and was sent to assist Jia Fu in operations in Yingchuan. He died in battle, and his general's command was transferred to his brother Liu Xi.

Recognising Liu Zhi as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 21/11:760*, 22/12:789-91; Bn 59:68-73, 152-153, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:84.

Liu Zhi 劉致, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 60 she was named Princess of Qinshui in Henei and later became a Senior Princess. She married Deng Gan. About 80 Dou Xian, brother of the Empress Dou of Emperor Zhang, used his influence to force the princess to sell him a pleasure ground at an unfairly low price. When the emperor found out about the extortion, he was furious. Though he did not punish Dou Xian, he forced him to return the property. -HHS 10B:459:16/6:606, 23/13:812.

Liu Zhi 劉祉. A major under the command of He Xi in 109, he accompanied Geng Kui and his Xianbi auxiliaries in their attack on the rebel Shanyu Tan of the Xiongnu in Xihe. -HHS 19/9.917.

Liu Zhi 劉祗. Administrator of Yuzhang in 120, Liu Zhi was advised on two inauspicious omens by Tang Tan. -HHS 82/72B:2719; Ngo 76:108, DeWoskin 83:68. [This cannot be the Liu Zhi from Shanyang who was involved in the Second Faction Incident of 169.]

Liu Zhi 劉志 (132-168) [Emperor Huan 桓帝 (reg. 146-168)]. Born in 132, Liu Zhi was a great-grandson of Emperor Zhang through his son the King of Hejian: the personal name of this man is normally given as Kai, but it may in fact have been Gong 恭 [qq.v. sub Liu Kai]. One of the king's sons was Liu Yi, Marquis of Liwu in Zhongshan, who had at one time been favoured by the Dowager Deng but had later been pressed into obscurity. Liu Zhi was born to the Lady Yan Ming, wife or perhaps concubine of Liu Yi.

ACCESSION AND TUTELAGE

In 146 Liu Zhi was brought to Luoyang and betrothed to the Lady Liang Nüying, younger sister of the regent Dowager Liang Na and her brother the General-in-Chief Liang Ji. Liu Zhi's distant cousin Liu Zuan, eight years old, was on the throne at that time, but Liu Zuan had spoken disapprovingly of Liang Ji, and he died soon afterwards. There is debate whether the boy was murdered, but it is certainly remarkable that the Lady Liang Na was to be married to the outsider Liu Zhi, and not to the reigning Liu Zuan.

The Grand Commandant Li Gu argued that Liu Suan the King of Qinghe, who was known to be a young man of character, should be granted the succession. He had made the same suggestion at the time Liu Zuan was appointed, and he was initially supported by the other two Excellencies, Hu Guang and Zhao Jie, but these two allies withdrew under pressure from the Liang group. When Li Gu continued to argue, the Dowager dismissed him. Liu Zhi was then brought to the throne, aged about fourteen by Western reckoning, and in 147 he was married to the Lady Liang Nüying. Soon afterwards, following an abortive rising in favour of Liu Suan, the unlucky pretender was exiled and committed suicide while Li Gu and Du Qiao both died in prison.

Emperor Huan took the cap of manhood in 148, and the Dowager formally handed power to him shortly before her death in 150, but in practice he was under the influence of his empress Liang Nüying, while the General-in-Chief Liang Ji exercised power as before. The emperor had no means to oppose his dominance, and it is possible that, like Emperor Shun before him, he had no particular ambition to do so. By the late 150s, however, after the Liang family had controlled the court for almost fifteen years, and Emperor Huan was in his middle twenties, it appears that he had become somewhat impatient and that he had reason to be concerned for his own future.

AFFAIRS OF GOVERNMENT 144-159

Though Liu Zhi had no real authority during the first years of his reign, it seems appropriate to provide a summary of events during that period, and indeed to extend the survey back to the two previous years, when his short-lived predecessors Liu Bing, Emperor Chong, and Liu Zuan, Emperor Zhi, were upon the throne.

Through the middle 140s the northwest of the empire continued to suffer from the aftermath of the second great Qiang rebellion, with occasional disturbance punctuated by formal surrenders. In the southeast, moreover, there was widespread rebellion in Yang province, led by Zhang Ying, Xu Feng and others, while a number of Administrators were found to have been corrupt or cruel, and suffered death in prison. Early in the regency, in 146, an edict complained of the quality of candidates recommended by the provinces and commanderies, and ordered that junior officers of ten years good service should be nominated, while the sons and grandsons of those found guilty of corruption should be excluded.

Also at this time, continuing the patronage which the Liang family had shown for the Imperial University during the reign of Emperor Shun, there was a first move towards establishing a regular procedure for student entrance into the imperial civil service. Later Han had maintained no regular system of examination entry such as had been used in Former Han, but in 146 the heads of commanderies and kingdoms were ordered to nominate men between the ages of fifty and seventy as Understanding the Classics, presumably with a view to their joining the staff of the University, while sons of senior officials, from the General-in-Chief to those ranking at Six Hundred shi, were required to attend as students, and ten successful examinees were made gentleman cadets or members of the Suite of the Heir, entry-level appointments to the bureaucracy. Other officers, cadets and young men of family were likewise encouraged to study and were rewarded with recognition, money and advancement.

Two years later, during the minority of Emperor Huan in 148, it was ordered that all students sixteen sui or older could take examinations similar to those given to candidates recommended from the commanderies and kingdoms as Understanding the Classics. The thirty-one most successful were appointed Gentlemen of the Household, most senior of the gentleman cadets, the next seventeen became members of the Suite of the Heir, and the next seventeen became Gentlemen at the court of a king. In 156, with government still in the hands of the Liang, a new system was introduced, allowing candidates to take examinations in an increasing number of classics over a period of years, and to rise with each success, so that it became possible to obtain a substantive post in the bureaucracy. Compared to the number of students at the University, and the number of officials recruited by other means, this route of entry was narrow, but the changes marked a restoration of entry to the civil service by academic examination.

In general, after so many changes of ruler, the Liang government felt the need to seek popularity. After an eclipse early in 147, it was ordered that senior officers should report on the problems of the empire, and this was followed by an amnesty and a wide variety of awards of noble ranks among the people. Soon afterwards officers were sent out to deal with famine relief in Jing and Yang provinces. In the summer there was a wide call for nominations and further advice from senior officers and marquises, together with edicts threatening heavy punishment for corruption. There was also some lightening of penalties for those condemned to death less one degree, notably that they were no longer to suffer the bastinado, which sometimes produced a fatal result, and orders were given year by year that convicts should be sent to settle the frontier regions; in reverse, an edict of 149 permitted the return of many families which had been exiled earlier.

In 148 the emperor's taking of the cap of manhood was celebrated by donations to the nobility and also to commoners over eighty, while the kingdom of Qinghe, held by the late Liu Suan, was renamed as Ganling and the son Liu Li/Hui of the Anping lineage was placed upon the vacant throne. More significantly perhaps, in the winter of that year there were two rebellions, one in Chen, where a certain Chen Jing styled himself the son of the Yellow Emperor 黄帝子, and one in Runan, where the chieftain Guan Bo proclaimed himself a Perfect Man 真人. Both were swiftly eliminated, but the titles they took were signs that the cult of Huang-Lao 黄老, combining worship of the legendary Yellow Emperor 黄帝 and Laozi 老子, had now acquired a political manifestation. About this time the regency government arranged for the construction of a temple to Laozi at his notional birthplace in Chen, and during the 160s Huang-Lao received patronage from Emperor Huan himself. These beliefs, however, also served as the basis of several rebellious movements, culminating in the Yellow Turban movement of the early 180s [Seidel 69:19-29, deC 80:78].

Following the financial crisis of 143, echoes of state poverty may be found in an edict of 149, allowing various penalties, including execution, to be alleviated by payment of a fine, though in the same year provision was made for grants to common people who could not afford the cost of a funeral. There were several ominous natural misfortunes, including earthquakes and floods, and occasional reports of such favourable signs as yellow dragons. In 151 there was pestilence in the capital and imperial officials were sent to distribute medicine, but later that year a drought is said to have caused famine leading to cannibalism in Rencheng and Liang. In 153 there were locusts over much of the empire, the Yellow River flooded, and there were numbers of displaced refugees in Ji province; the government attempted to provide relief, but similar disasters struck in the following year, and in 155 it was again necessary to provide aid to the starving in the region of the capital and in Ji province, this time by authorising the forced requisition of any supplies of grain that could be found.

Led by Gongsun Ju, there was serious banditry in the east about Taishan and Langye, affecting Qing, Yan and Xu provinces from 154. In 155 the government granted relief from taxes, and also established Commandant's offices in the affected commanderies, intensifying the military administration. In 156 the General of the Household Duan Jiong, later one of the leading military commanders of the day, settled that trouble, but after more than ten years of comparative quiet there was renewed difficulty in the north. In 155 the rebel chieftain Bode attacked the capital of the Southern Shanyu in Xihe, and although he was defeated by Zhang Huan, also to become a noted general, incursions by the Xianbi in following years extended along the whole frontier. In the south in 157, there was rebellion in Jiuzhen in present-day Vietnam and, within the empire, in Changsha.

In 154, evidently as further display of the regency government's commitment to good morality, it was ordered that mourning for parents must again be observed even by the senior officials of the provinces and commanderies, and two years later junior officers were ordered to follow the same regime. The reform had been attempted earlier, during the regency of the Dowager Deng for Emperor An in 116, but the disruption to government had brought its withdrawal in 121. The problem remained, and the edict was rescinded early in 159. In similar fashion, in 154 the government issued instructions to enforce the sumptuary laws for carriages and clothing, as in the ideal time of Emperor Ming.

Despite worthy edicts and moral exhortations, and attempts at generosity to the people, Liang Ji, his wife Sun Shou and their relatives were widely accused, probably with justice, of personal corruption and greed, and it appears that the emperor himself came to resent their dominance. The authority of the Liang was centred upon the empress, and when the Empress Liang died in the autumn of 159 the family position suffered a serious blow. Deprived of her alliance within the palace and the information which she had provided, Liang Ji was cut off from the centre of authority. He attempted to gain control of the emperor's favourite, the Lady Deng Mengnü, but her kinsmen resisted his plans and in an attempt to force their submission he killed her brother-in-law and attacked her mother, the Lady Xuan.

Given the history of his predecessors and the immediate threat to his favourite's family, Emperor Huan was now concerned for his own safety, and in a secret meeting held in a lavatory he enlisted the aid of the palace eunuch Tang Heng. Tang Heng gathered four colleagues, Zuo Guan, Shan Chao, Xu Huang and Ju Yuan, they swore an oath in blood with the emperor, and the five eunuchs carried out the coup with surprising ease [see sub Ju Yuan]. As the Director of Retainers Zhang Biao brought guards to surround Liang Ji's residence and remove his seals of office, Liang Ji and the Lady Sun Shou killed themselves. Many of their kinsmen were arrested and died in prison, and officials at court and in the bureaucracy who were seen as having supported the Liang were disgraced and dismissed. The five eunuch allies were rewarded with county marquisates and seven loyal officials received lesser fiefs.

PERSONAL RULE: THE POWER OF THE EUNUCHS AND THE POLITICS OF THE HAREM

In seeking assistance against Liang Ji, it was natural and inevitable that Emperor Huan should have looked to his eunuch attendants, for they were the only people with whom he had close contact and confidence: members of the outer court and the bureaucracy had no natural access and were controlled by the network of the Liang family power. At the same time, it was also true that after almost twenty years of dominance by the Liang there were many who had enjoyed their patronage and regarded the consort family as natural rulers of the state. In any event, the personal government of Emperor Huan was noted for the favour which he showed to his five eunuch allies, and the manner in which they and their colleagues, particularly the notorious Hou Lan, extended their influence and power.

Within a few months the division between the palace and the outer bureaucracy was entrenched by the case of Li Yun and Du Zhong, who were executed for their intemperate criticism. Attacks on the pretensions and corruption of the imperial favourites continued in following years, with some success, and in 167 Hou Lan, Zuo Guan and Ju Yuan were disgraced and dismissed, but the emperor's earlier support had offended many of the officials and gentry. The ruler's personal conduct was regularly called into question, there was criticism of his extravagance in construction and of the size of his harem, and protest from within and without the bureaucracy was combined, still more dangerously, with an increasing reluctance by men of good-will to involve themselves in the service of a state whose procedures and policies were seen as corrupt and immoral.

In many areas of the countryside, moreover, eunuchs and their associates took advantage of influence at court to claim a position against the gentry who had generally dominated the local communities; such conflicts led to a number of atrocities [see, for example, the case of Xu Xuan]. There were private feuds among leading families which were equally ferocious [see, for example sub Su Buwei], but the activities of the eunuchs did a great deal to alienate the imperial regime from the gentlemen at court and in the country who should have been its chief supporters.

Financially, the central government continued to suffer pressure. There were only limited resources to assist those affected by natural disaster or otherwise in need, and the costs of rebellion and war were greater than regular imperial revenues could cope with. In 161 the salaries of all officials were reduced and the pensions of kings and marquises were halved, while secondary marquisates, some lesser noble ranks, and various positions as guards about the palace were offered for sale [the regent Dowager Deng had been forced to a similar policy in 109]. In the following year, as an army was raised to deal with rebellion in the south, there was a forced loan of all official salaries, and royal and noble pensions were withheld. In 162 palace guards not on active duty lost their traditional allocation of winter clothing, and the issue was halved for all members of the bureaucracy. It is uncertain which of these measures applied only to that time of emergency or whether some were maintained for several years, but the evidence of stringency is clear.

In 165 an edict ordered a levy on arable land at the rate of ten cash per mou 畝. Land had long been subject to taxation, assessed at one-thirtieth of estimated production and normally paid in kind, but contemporary commentators such as Zhongchang Tong argued that this was quite inadequate for the needs of the state [Hsü 80:239, 72-76]. It appears that the new impost was an attempt to gain access to resources controlled by great landowners [Nishijima 86:595], but it is again impossible to judge how long the levy was maintained, though it was renewed by Emperor Ling in 185.

The general economic situation did not improve:

in 166 an edict observed that the harvest had failed, bringing hunger to the people, and that there had been floods, drought, pestilence and bandit disturbances, especially in the south. Relief from taxes was ordered for all territories, with full exemption for those most seriously affected. As famine became worse in the region of the capital and in Ji province, clerks of the Excellencies were sent to issue relief grain. In the following year there were river floods in six provinces and sea flooding at the mouth of the Yellow River. Once more there were awards of cash and orders for the distribution of grain.

During the few years of his personal rule, Emperor Huan left the capital only twice. In 163 he went on a hunting trip to Chang'an, accompanied by inevitable protests at such extravagance, and in the winter of 164 he made a two-month tour to the south, visiting the ancestral tombs at Nanyang, then journeying further to the Han River and the Yunmeng marshes by the junction of the Han and the Yangzi.

Despite the economic problems of the time, Emperor Huan is known as one of the great builders of Han. It is claimed that during the 160s his Court Architects were responsible for new parks and hunting grounds, while he took personal pleasure in the restoration of the Garden of the Shining Dragon in the Northern Palace [Bn 76:40: Sleek Dragon], including a number of pavilions and other buildings, and used it for his personal treasury. On the other hand, there were a remarkable number of fires during this period, so that much of Emperor Huan's building expense was owed to the need to repair palace buildings, tombs and other imperial sites after conflagrations. It is possible that some fires were deliberately lit by people discontented with the eunuch dominance of the state and seeking to protest by portent, and certainly the Excellencies Chen Fan and Liu Mou used a series of outbreaks at the end of 165 as grounds for memorials of remonstrance.

Besides his energetic construction work, we are told that Emperor Huan was fond of music, and was a fine performer on the lute 琴 and pipes 笙. He was more celebrated, however, for his love of women, and the size and expense of the imperial harem was a major cause for complaint. The inhabitants already numbered more than a thousand at the time of the Liang regency, presumably in the hope that they would distract the young ruler from more political matters, and the harem continued to grow even after complaints on its expense caused six hundred women to be dismissed in 161. By 166 the number of six thousand third-rank concubines was cited by the critic Xiang Kai, and if this is correct Emperor Huan may hold the world record: a maximum of three thousand was recorded towards the end of Former Han [HHS 10A:399]; in modern times it is said that the nineteenth century Ottoman Sultan Abdul Aziz had nine hundred women in his seraglio at Istanbul; and the twentieth century King Faisal of Arabia accumulated more than a thousand. Xiang Kai may have exaggerated, and some of the women may have been servants and attendants to others and not formally taken as concubines, but apart from the practical problem of personal dealings with such a mass of femininity, even by roster, the costs of housing and food were a serious burden on the state.

The imperial harem, however, was not only for the emperor's pleasure: it was supposed to produce an heir, and in that regard both the sovereign and his women were quite unsuccessful. Emperor Huan was fertile, for he sired three daughters, and possibly a son who died young [see sub Zhou Teng], while it is claimed that several pregnant concubines were killed by the empress Liang Na; XHS 1:5b also refers to imperial children dying young. The Empress Deng, however, had no son, and early in 165 she was dismissed. One accusation was that she had been engaged in black magic, and she may indeed have sought to obtain a child by use of potions. She died in the harem prison a few days later, her kinsmen were disgraced, and some were killed.

In the winter of that year the Lady Dou Miao was named empress in her place. Though Emperor Huan was reluctant, his position was weakened by the disgrace of his former favourites Zuo Guan, Ju Yuan and Hou Lan, and he was pressed by his senior ministers, notably the Grand Commandant Chen Fan and the Director of Retainers Ying Feng, who argued that it was for the good of the dynasty that he take a woman of family as his consort. He had no interest in the Lady Dou, however, and attended her rarely, if at all. His preference was for the Lady Tian Sheng, who shared his bed and his favours with eight companions, probably in hope that the magic number nine would help produce male children. In the event, such efforts were unsuccessful, and when the emperor died two years later the Lady Dou became regent Dowager and avenged herself upon her late husband's favourites.

NON-CHINESE AFFAIRS AND INTERNAL REBELLION

Following his coup against the Liang family in 159 Emperor Huan's prestige was no doubt enhanced when the court received an embassy from Tianzhu 天竺 [northern India, identified also as Shentu 身毒] a few months later. A second embassy arrived in 161, as did a tribute mission from Fuyu 夫餘, which bordered China in the region of Manchuria.

Most spectacularly, it is recorded that a mission from Daqin 大秦, identified as the empire of Rome, came to Luoyang from the south in 166. The envoys claimed that they had been sent by their king Andun 安敦, presumably the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus [reg. 161-180], and the gifts they brought, including ivory, rhinoceros horn and tortoise shell, had evidently been gathered on their journey. There was and still is some suspicion that these men were enterprising traders rather than accredited officials, but their visit provided valuable prestige to the emperor at a time of political difficulty. [It may be only chance, but the date of this visit coincided with the outbreak of the Antonine plague which ravaged the Roman empire from the middle 160s: the question of epidemics is discussed in the entry for Liu Hong, Emperor Ling.]

Closer to home, there was continuing trouble on the frontiers and major rebellion within the empire. In 159 non-Chinese tribes made incursions on the western frontier of Yi province, which were settled in 161, but in the meantime there arose the first of a series of disturbances which were to bedevil the south of Jing province.

In 160 the non-Chinese of the region of Changsha raided the commandery, and the hill people of Wuling attacked into Nan commandery. They were dealt with by Du Shang and Feng Gun, but in 162 there was major rebellion affecting Changsha, Guiyang, Lingling and Cangwu. An initial attempt to restore order was unsuccessful, the Inspector and the Administrator of Cangwu fled, and the situation was compounded by a mutiny of local troops. As the capital of Changsha fell to the rebels, raiding in Wuling drove the Administrator there to flight too, while the insurgents extended their depredations across provincial borders east into Yuzhang and south into Nanhai.

Feng Gun was then given an army and a general's command, and he gained some success, but the cost of the enterprise was sufficient to require a forced loan from official salaries and the withholding of royal and noble pensions. Trouble continued on a smaller but still substantial scale from 163, but was eventually settled by the Inspector Du Shang in 165.

During the middle 150s there had been widespread banditry about Taishan and Langye led by Gongsun Ju. Commandant's offices were established there, and though Gongsun Ju was killed in 156, his place was taken by Shusun Wuji. He in turn was eliminated in 160, but it was only in 162 that the Commandant's office was withdrawn from Langye, and not until 165 that the same sign of security was possible in Taishan. In that year, moreover, there were two rebel emperors, one northeast in Bohai and one southeast in Guangling. Both were swiftly destroyed, but they continued the religious tradition which had inspired similar claims in the late 140s.

The major problem facing the empire, however, was that of the Qiang in the northwest. Following the second great rebellion of the early 140s there was a period of comparative peace, notably in the late 150s through the benevolent administration of the Protector Diwu Fang. In 159 Diwu Zhong left that position, and he was succeeded by Duan Jiong, a man of very different temperament; the Qiang both within and outside the frontier became restless. In 160 a raid on Zhangye by "Western" Qiang was repelled by Duan Jiong, who then pursued the fugitives beyond the frontier and heavily defeated them.

Attacks nonetheless continued, and after Duan Jiong was dismissed in 161 on account of a mutiny, the situation rapidly became worse, as rebel "Eastern" Qiang from within the empire ravaged Liang and Bing provinces and threatened Chang'an. The general Huangfu Gui was sent out and defeated them, and in the following years various insurgencies were dealt with by local forces, but the whole territory was under constant threat and by 164 it appeared that Liang province was almost out of control.

At this point Duan Jiong was again appointed Protector, and began a program of active engagement against the Qiang along the frontier. After a series of campaigns, in the spring of 167 he achieved a decisive victory over the Dangjian group as they attacked Wuwei, and the Western Qiang were finally pacified.

There remained the Eastern Qiang, settled in what was nominally Chinese territory, whose most powerful tribe was the Xianlian. In the spring of 167, at the same time as Duan Jiong was concluding his business in the west, the Xianlian Qiang raided towards Chang'an. They were defeated by the general Zhang Huan but made further attacks in the summer and the winter of that same year. Now, however, encouraged by the success of Duan Jiong's energetic strategy, the court approved his proposal to apply the same firm policy to the Eastern Qiang; the program, however, was not ready until 168, the beginning of the reign of Emperor Ling.

PHILOSOPHY, RELIGION AND POLITICAL

OPPOSITION

The regent government of the Liang family had maintained the custom of calling for special nominations to office, and made particular point of sponsoring scholarship and the Imperial University. Under such patronage, the numbers of staff increased, and it was said that there were as many as thirty thousand students. As Emperor Huan took power in 159, this became a problem for his government.

Firstly, the University itself was not well regarded, for the official New Text teachings continued to be out of favour among serious scholars, who regarded them as pointless and trifling. Second, there were still only limited means by which a student could obtain direct entrance to the commissioned civil service through examination, and the vast majority had to rely upon patronage from senior officials at the capital or in their home country: there was thus a large number of frustrated politicians.

Furthermore, though many moral and traditional Confucianists had opposed the apparent excesses of the Liang, their opposition was now turned against the eunuch favourites of the emperor, and the Liang family's past patronage of scholarship meant that Emperor Huan could have little expectation of support. On the contrary, through the 160s there was increasing protest at his government, and the students of the University, notably under their leader Guo Tai, gave vociferous support to strong opponents of the eunuchs such as Li Ying and Ying Feng.

At the same time there was increasing reluctance by many good men to enter the imperial service. To some extent this was a development of the hermit tradition which had developed in earlier generations [Vervooorn 90], but it was compounded by widespread disapproval of Emperor Huan's own government and, still more significantly, by a growing tendency for men to reject nominations or resign their posts if they considered their patron or superior officer to be of poor moral quality 非其人. In effect, current Confucian principle regarded individual morality and personal relationships as more important than public service to the state. Many men, of course, were still prepared to serve, and long-term officials such as Hu Guang and members of the Yuan family received wide respect, but the imperial government itself received little support and considerable opposition from its traditional allies among the educated land-owning gentry.

By the middle 160s the excesses of the eunuchs and their associates had caused Emperor Huan to lose some confidence, but his relations with the moral Confucianist party was little improved and he was under pressure from his senior traditionalist ministers, particularly when they obliged him to accept the Lady Dou as his consort. It appears that he may have been seeking an alternative source of legitimacy, and found it in the worship of Huang-Lao 黃老, a combined deity of the Yellow Emperor 黃帝 and the ancient sage Laozi 老子.

Known since Former Han, the Huang-Lao cult became increasingly popular in the second century AD and inspired a number of religious and rebel teachers, such as Chen Jing and Guan Bo at the beginning of Emperor Huan's reign in the late 140s. About 148, moreover, the Liang regency dedicated a temple to Laozi at his putative birthplace in Chen, so there was a tradition of government patronage as well as rebel ideology.

In the spring of 165 the emperor sent the eunuch Zuo Guan to carry out worship at the temple to Laozi in Chen, the first occasion on which he had shown such interest. A few months later Zuo Guan and his family were disgraced, but in the winter the eunuch Guan Ba was sent on a second mission; it was probably at this time that the celebrated Laozi ming 老子銘 stele, composed by the local Chancellor Bian Shao, was set up. The inscription praised the combined deity and described how he could manifest himself to guide earthly rulers.

Very soon afterwards, moreover, an edict in the summer ordered the abolition of local shrines throughout the empire, on the grounds that they encouraged heterodox superstition. The prohibition does not appear to have lasted long, and certainly not after Emperor Huan's death, but it is probable that he was likewise seeking to establish his own orthodoxy at the expense of local rivals. [Some scholars have suggested that the emperor's interest in Huang-Lao was inspired by the Empress Dou, but this seems unlikely: Zuo Guan's expedition had taken place before she came to the throne, and we are told that Emperor Huan had little interest in her. It may be that he was encouraged by the eunuchs and some women of his harem.]

As culmination of this policy, in the summer of 166 the emperor himself carried out worship to Huang-Lao in the Garden of the Shining Dragon at Luoyang. The Treatise of Sacrifices describes how the altar was covered with cloth of patterned wool, with gold utensils, a special throne and palanquin for the deity, and music suitable to the imperial sacrifice to Heaven, and we are told that the ceremony also referred to the Buddha, cited as 浮圖 or 浮屠.

The ruler was evidently making a claim for legitimacy independent of traditional Confucianism and with potential appeal to many people at the capital and the provinces, but there is no way to assess how far this policy might have extended or to what long-term effect. In a critical pair of memorials soon afterwards the scholar Xiang Kai derided his pretensions to morality, and in any case Emperor Huan died just eighteen months later. There was no repetition of his patronage.

At the same time as it developed the worship of Huang-Lao, the government sought to curb the Confucianist officials and the students who supported them. In 166 the two Administrators Cheng Jin and Liu Zhi were executed for having supported or permitted attacks on eunuch associates and clients in their territories, and later in the year the anti-eunuch official Li Ying and his colleagues were charged with seeking favour among the students of the University and support in the provinces, and forming a faction to plan treason. Furious, the emperor had some two hundred men arrested and held under torture for several months. Though the influence of Dou Wu and Chen Han they were released with an amnesty in the middle of 167, but it was ordered that they should be proscribed from holding any office in the future. From the terms for proscription 禁錮 and for faction 部黨, the group is known to history as the Proscribed Party 黨錮, and this First Faction Incident would have major repercussions in the reign of Emperor Ling.

DEATH AND JUDGEMENT

Emperor Huan died at the very end of the Chinese year 167, on 25 January 168, at the age of thirty-six sui. He was buried in the "Mound of Comprehension" 宣陵 southeast of Luoyang and received the temple-name Weizong 威宗 "Majestic Exemplar." In 190, however, the court of Han controlled by Dong Zhuo approved a recommendation of Cai Yong, that Emperor Huan's tablet should be deposed from a permanent position in the Imperial Ancestral Temple on the grounds that he had shown neither merit nor virtue: see MBeck 90: 106-107 and sub Liu Zhao, Emperor He.

Though the emperor left only daughters, his twin brother Liu Kui might have succeeded him to the throne. That possibility was destroyed, however, when Liu Kui was found guilty of treason in 165. The charge was doubtful, and Liu Kui was restored to his former position just two days before the emperor's death, but it was clearly not possible for him to take the throne. As a result, the Lady Dou, now Dowager, and her father Dou Wu had freedom to choose among all male members of the clan. Their choice, and one cannot feel that it was a good one, fell upon Liu Hong, Emperor Ling.

Emperor Huan has been widely criticised by historians, both Chinese and Western. He is commonly coupled with his successor among the worst emperors of all time, and the great Sima Guang referred to the "stupid tyranny" of Huan and Ling. The reasons are not far to seek: Emperor Huan's reliance upon his palace eunuchs and his estrangement from the bureaucracy and gentry of the countryside did a great deal of harm, and the Faction Incident marked a very low point.

On the other hand, it must be recognised that the government was facing great difficulties. The frontier and the north-western provinces were increasingly unstable and vulnerable, the resources of the state were limited, and the long hegemony of the Liang family had weakened the links which should have bound the ruler to his natural allies among officials and other leaders of local communities.

These were very large problems, and though the young ruler failed to solve them, he was little aided by the economic and philosophical tendencies of the age, which encouraged men to cultivate private interests at the expense of any contribution they might make to the public good. Emperor Huan had many faults and made several errors of judgement, but he was not necessarily as bad as he has been painted by traditional historians. -HHS 7*; deC 81, deC 89.

Liu Zhi 劉質/瓚 [Wenli 文理] (d.166); Pingyuan. In 165 Liu Zhi was Administrator of Taiyuan. The commandery had been troubled by powerful families and associates of the palace eunuchs, and Liu Zhi attacked and punished many of these men and their followers. When it came to the eunuch Zhao Jin, however, who had also been causing trouble, Liu Zhi ordered his officer Wang Yun to deal with the matter. Wang Yun arrested Zhao Jin and, though there had lately been an amnesty, he nonetheless killed him. Zhao Jin's connections at court informed Emperor Huan, and Liu Zhi was arrested.

The case of Liu Zhi was linked to that of Cheng Jin, Administrator of Nanyang, who had killed a eunuch associate and his followers, also under amnesty, and also to those of Zhai Chao in Shanyang, who had attacked Hou Lan's property, and of Huang Fu in Runan, who had taken ferocious action against the eunuch relative Xu Xuan. There was great interest among the reform party at the capital, and the Grand Commandant Chen Fan, defying the emperor's anger, presented eloquent arguments, claiming that their disregard of the amnesty should be ignored in light of the officers' devotion to the public interest.

At this time too the scholar Xiang Kai came to court and submitted memorials on the government, with many references to portents and particular attention to the fate of Liu Zhi and Cheng Jin. The two men were indeed executed, but the intense interest and protests among those who sought reform and opposed eunuch influence played a major role in damaging the relationship between the imperial court and the administration which should serve it. -HHS 7:318, 66/56:2172, 102/12:3257-58, XC 4:3b; deC 76, deC 89:71-77.

Liu Zhi 劉祗; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Liu Zhi was a member of the group. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210, ZF:16a [in SGZ 6:211 PC]; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Liu Zhi 劉稚. Son of Liu Chang the King of Zhongshan, he succeeded his father in 174. He died without heirs and the fief was ended. -HHS 42/32:1450.

In contrast, the Annals at HHS 8:335 say that Liu Chang died without sons and the fief ended with him, and they have no further mention of the kingdom, nor of Liu Zhi. It may be that Liu Zhi died at almost the same time as his father, so his reign was not officially recorded.

Liu Zhi 劉祗 (d.200). Son of Liu Zhen the King of Donghai, he succeeded his father in 156, and died in 200. -HHS 9:381, 42/32:1426-27.

There is textual confusion about the kingdom of Donghai at this time. HHS 9:390 says that Liu Dun, son of Emperor Xian, was enfeoffed there in 212 but, as the commentator Qian Daxin points out at HHSJJ 9:258-59, this is mistaken. The kings of Donghai were descended from Liu Qiang, son of Guangwu, and the lineage was still maintained at that time through Liu Zhi's son Liu Xian: see HHS 70/60:2271. HHS 9 has miswritten Donghai for Beihai.

Again, HHS 70/60:2271 says that Liu Feng the King of Nanyang and Liu Zhi the King of Donghai died in 200, and goes on to record Emperor Xian's sorrow at their early death, while commentary to that text explains that both were sons of the emperor. As Qian Daxin observes at HHSJJ 70/60:2488, the reference to Liu Zhi in this passage is another error. Both kings indeed died in that year, the infant Liu Feng in the summer and the elderly Liu Zhi in the following winter, but only Liu Feng was the son of Emperor Xian, and only he was so mourned. The commentary of Qian Dazhao in HHSJJ 42/32:1521 is mistaken.

Liu Zhi 劉祗. Grandson of Liu He, long-lived King of Pengcheng, he succeeded him in 213. As the dynasty of Wei took over in 220, Liu Zhi and all other kings of the Han house lost their royal rank and were styled Marquises Who Honour Virtue. -HHS 50/40:1672.

Liu Zhide 劉直得, the Lady. Daughter of Liu Qing the father of Emperor An, following her brother's accession to the throne in 106 she and her sisters were given titles and estates as princesses, and after the death of the regent Dowager Deng in 121 she was named Senior Princess of Pingshi in Nanyang. She married Lai Ding. -HHS 55/45:1804, 10B:457, 15/5:593.

Liu Zhimao 劉智茂: probably miswritten for Liu Mao 劉茂. -HHS 104/14:3296; deC 89:376.

Liu Zhong 劉仲 (d.22); Nanyang. Younger brother of

604 Liu Zhong

Liu Bosheng and elder brother of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu, Liu Zhong joined the rebellion against Wang Mang but was killed at Xiao-Chang'an in 22. He was given posthumous title as King of Lu [see sub Liu Xing]. -HHS 14/4:555-56; Bn 54 appendix # 82.

Liu Zhong 劉終 see Liu Zhi 劉祉 [Jubo 巨伯].

Liu Zhong 劉仲; Chu/Pengcheng. Younger brother of Liu Ping, he was killed by bandits about 24. -HHS 39/29:1295.

Liu Zhong 劉終 (d.34); Nanyang. Son of Liu Xi, distant cousin of Liu Bosheng and Liu Xiu, he was a childhood friend of the future Emperor Guangwu.

In 22, as Liu Bosheng moved against Huyang in the initial stages of his rebellion, Liu Zhong gained entry to the city on pretence that he was a local official from Jiangxia. Once inside, he persuaded the people to turn against the government, kill Wang Mang's Commandant and open the gates to the Han.

Liu Zhong became a Palace Attendant at the court of the Gengshi Emperor, but after that regime was destroyed in 25 he and his father Liu Xi went to join Guangwu at Luoyang. In 26 both received royal fiefs, Liu Zhong becoming King of Zichuan.

When Liu Xi died in 34, Liu Zhong carried out the mourning and was so affected by grief that he followed him a few weeks later. Their descendants held only the rank of marquis. -HHS 14/4:563; Bn 54:107 and appendix # 85, Bn 59:23-24.

Liu Zhong 劉仲; the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 74 she was named Princess of Junyi in Chenliu. She married Wang Du. -HHS 10B:460.

Liu Zhong 劉种. Eldest son of Liu Ying, the King of Chu deposed in 70, Liu Zhong was appointed Marquis of Chu 楚 by Emperor Zhang in 77, and his five brothers were also enfeoffed. Liu Zhong's fief was later transferred to Liu county in Lujiang. -HHS 42/32:1430.

Liu Zhong 劉忠 (d.84). Son of Liu Cang the King of Dongping, in 58 he was granted a county marquisate.

Liu Zhong succeeded his father in 83. In 84 his state was reduced to provide the royal fief of Rencheng for his younger brother Liu Shang, while five other brothers were enfeoffed as county marquises.

Liu Zhong died soon afterwards, and was succeeded by his son Chang. In 89 his nephew Liu Liang and his six younger sons were enfeoffed as marquises. -HHS 42/32:1442.

Liu Zhong 劉种 see Liu Chong 劉冲, King of Fuling (d.91). -HHS 4:172.

Liu Zhong 劉重; Pengcheng. Son of Liu Xian, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 39/29:1306; Bn 54 appendix # 158.

Liu Zhong 劉忠 (d.189). Son of Liu Ding the King of Ganling, he succeeded his father in 176. At the time of the Yellow Turban rebellion in 184 Liu Zhong was taken prisoner by his own subjects. After his release there was question whether he should retain his state, but Emperor Ling, recognising the kinship of the imperial clan, insisted he be reinstated.

Liu Zhong's son and successor 嗣子 was killed by a group of Yellow Turbans, leaving no heir, but the date of his death is not clear. In 206 the state was formally abolished by the Han government under the control of Cao Cao. -HHS 55/45:1804.

Liu Zhong 劉終 see Liu Zhi 劉祉.

Liu Zhongli 劉中禮, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Guangwu, in 39 she was made Princess of Nieyang in Nanyang, and Emperor Zhang named her a Senior Princess. She married Dou Gu. -HHS 10B:458.

Liu [Zhongqing] 劉仲卿 see Liu Xiaqing 劉俠卿. -YSS:9a.

Liu Zhu 劉柱; Nanyang. Eldest son of Liu Zhong the King of Zichuan, after the death of his father in 34 Liu Zhu was granted a county marquisate so that he might maintain his sacrifices. -HHS 14/4:563; Bn 54 appendix # 121.

Liu Zhuang 劉莊 personal name Yang 陽 until 43 [Zili 子麗] (28-75) [Emperor Ming 明帝 (reg. 57-75)]. When Liu Yang was named Heir by his father Emperor Guangwu on 20 August 43, his personal name was changed to the less common character Zhuang in order to avoid problems of taboo. Despite anachronism, I regularly use the personal name Zhuang. The style Zili is given by YSS:1b.

BEFORE HIS ACCESSION

Liu Zhuang was born in 28, the fourth son of Emperor Guangwu but his eldest by the Honoured Lady Yin. After the conquest of Gongsun Shu in the west, the emperor was urged to grant fiefs to his sons, and in 39 Liu Zhuang was named Duke of Donghai.

We are told that the young prince was competent in Chunqiu, and about this time he was permitted to attend court audience behind a screen in the throne-room. Emperor Guangwu knew that registers of cultivated land were often falsified, and he was doubtful of the figures provided on the population of each commandery. Since the inspectors and administrators favoured the local gentry, they concealed the truth, but when the officer from Chenliu gave his report, he held a slip of bamboo which he did not present. The emperor demanded to see it, and found that the note said, "You can ask about Yingchuan and Hongnong, but not about Henan or Nanyang." The officer claimed to have found the slip on the road, and to know nothing more, but Liu Zhuang suggested this referred to the fact that Henan and Nanyang were exempt because the local gentry were protected either by contact with the court or by relationship to the imperial clan. Guangwu instigated a full investigation and in the following year, 40, a dozen heads of commandery units were executed, imprisoned or dismissed for having provided false returns.

In 41 Liu Zhuang's mother the Lady Yin was appointed empress in place of the Lady Guo, probably due to pressure from the Nanyang clique at court. The Lady Guo's eldest son, Liu Qiang, continued as Heir, but logic required Liu Zhuang should likewise replace his half-brother.

In 43 the general Zang Gong was engaged with a group of religious rebels led by Dan Chen in Henan, but several assaults had gained no success. Senior ministers argued that the attacks should be pressed harder, but Liu Zhuang urged that pressure be eased, in expectation that the rebels would seek to escape from the siege and could be defeated in detail. Zang Gong was instructed accordingly, and the enemy indeed scattered and were destroyed.

In the summer, soon after this successful advice, Guangwu appointed Liu Zhuang as his Heir, and Liu Qiang took his place as King of Donghai.

Liu Zhuang evidently held a substantial position in the counsels of the court. In 51, particularly, following the submission of the Southern Shanyu Bi of the Xiongnu, the Northern regime asked for peace. There was considerable debate, but Liu Zhuang argued that the commitment of Han to the Southern court precluded any rapprochement with the North; the new tributaries might become uncertain, and the long-term goodwill of the Northern barbarians could not be relied upon. It appears that he expressed both the consensus of the meeting and the wishes of his father.

ACCESSION AND REIGN

On the death of Emperor Guangwu in the early summer of 57, Liu Zhuang came to the throne without opposition or incident. Thirty years old by Chinese reckoning, he was the second and last of the rulers of Later Han to ascend the throne as a mature man. Adopting the reign-title Yongping 永平 "Everlasting Peace," he maintained it until his death, and the empire was indeed comparatively calm, with occasional natural misfortunes but several good harvests, and a number of favourable omens.

The Treatise of Economics of Jin shu, JS 26:781, says that Emperor Ming established an Ever-Full Granary 常滿倉 at Luoyang in 62. There was already a Great Granary 太倉 at the east of the city, by the terminus of the Yang Canal which brought supplies up from the Vast Canal system of the eastern plain; the emperor's initiative was to set up a system of official marketing, by which the government bought grain when it was cheap and sold it at low prices when supplies became limited. Senior advisers endorsed the scheme, and it was claimed that the price of a hu 斛 of unhusked grain [some 20 litres] was reduced from about a hundred to just twenty cash [see Yang 63:154 and the discussion of Bn 76:59-60].

Former Han and Wang Mang had maintained such a policy [e.g. Hsü 80:194-196], and there was an Office for Price Adjustment and Stabilisation by the Ao Granary at the head of the Vast Canal near Rongyang. Wang Mang's policy on this line, however, part of his government's monopolies or Six Controls 六筭/管, had been a focus of complaint from his opponents, and Emperor Guangwu had abolished the office [HS 98B: 4118, HHS 11/1:486, and see sub Liu Penzi]. Emperor Ming's program thus restored an earlier scheme, and reflected a centralising policy opposed to the new traditions of Later Han.

The matter was reconsidered a few years later, about 68, and at that time the official Liu Ban argued that though the idea was attractive, official purchasing actually raised the price of grain to profit great landholders in times of plenty, while the common people gained no advantage in time of shortage. The plan was therefore dropped. It may be noted that the biography of Liu Ban is the only text where official price control of grain is mentioned in Hou Han shu [HHS 39/29:1305; Hsü 80:243, Ch'ü 72:460]. Liu Ban was probably right: price control was a good idea, but its administration was beyond government competence. The experiment was short-lived and not attempted again. [Bielenstein, however, argues that price stabilisation was maintained by Later Han in the same fashion as Former Han: Bn 80:45-46 and Bn 76:59-60.]

More generally, in his father's style, Emperor Ming was prepared to tolerate the power of great landed families, and though there was an attempt to prohibit individuals from being involved in both farming and trade, the policy was largely ignored: by the middle of the second century the Simin yueling 四民月令 of Cui Shi described the working of a manorial holding, an impressive combination of agricultural production and marketing enterprise.

The economic recovery during the years after Emperor Guangwu's restoration of power allowed for a deal of new construction: in 60 the Northern Palace at Luoyang was restored, and new offices were built for a number of ministries. More importantly, it was now possible to tackle the immense problem of the flooded Yellow River, and in the late 60s, under the direction of Wang Wu and with the designs of Wang Jing, the government embarked upon the repair of the Vast Canal and Bian River complex by Rongyang in Henan. Emperor Ming inspected the completed work in 70, and issued an edict to commemorate the achievement.

With further controls established across the North China plain in following years, the danger of flooding was largely ended. Commanderies along the restored course were ordered to appoint officers to maintain the dykes 河堤員吏, while reclaimed land was to be distributed among the common people, not to the benefit of those who already possessed great holdings.

Like his father, Emperor Ming kept a firm hand on government, but he made considerable show of public goodwill, with several awards of noble rank, donations of land to the poor, and exemptions from taxation for favoured localities, while he also travelled widely: to Chang'an in 59, extensively across the east in 62, to the dynastic homeland in Nanyang in 67 and again to the east in 72, when he carried out the Ploughing ceremony at Xiapi. He was praised by later generations for maintaining his father's sense of morality and restraint, for his support of Confucian principles, and for the efficient conduct of his government. When the historian and writer Ban Gu presented his "Rhapsody on the Two Capitals" 兩都賦 he compared the moral restraint of Later Han to the excesses of the Former dynasty; and though Ban Gu was something of a flatterer he does appear to have expressed the ideals of the time.

FRONTIER AFFAIRS

During the late 50s the Qiang war-leader Dianyu embarked on a series of raids from outside the north-western frontier against Jincheng and Longxi, but he was defeated by Ma Wu and Dou Gu and brought to surrender in 59. Following the precedent set by Ma Yuan twenty years earlier, numbers of tribespeople were brought to settle within the frontiers of the empire: half a century later this policy proved to present a major problem.

Immediately to the north of the empire, the division of the Xiongnu in the time of Emperor Guangwu during the early 50s had weakened the traditional enemy, and the commitment of Han to the Southern Shanyu remained firm. In 65 there was some concern that the two sides might come to terms, so the office of General on the Liao 度遼將軍 was established, with an army based in Wuyuan to strengthen defences and ensure that the non-Chinese remained divided. Former Chinese inhabitants were encouraged to go back to the north, and prisoners were sent to join the army and to settle their families there, with rewards and recompense for those who died, but the program had only limited success: few people had any desire to return to the uncertain lands along the frontier.

For their part, the Northern Xiongnu vacillated between requests for peace and intermittent raiding, and in 73 the emperor approved a punitive campaign. The main army missed the rendezvous, so little was achieved directly and the commanders Zhai Tong and Wu Tang were punished. On the other hand, the western column led by Dou Gu defeated a Xiongnu king and occupied the region of Yiwu by present-day Hami, and in the following year Dou Gu and Geng Bing established a position in the region of Jushi near Turfan. This was the first time that Chinese arms had returned to central Asia since the time of Wang Mang, and some cities sent hostages to the Han court while the post of Protector-General of the Western Regions was re-established. Very soon afterwards, in 75, the garrisons were driven out by a counter-attack from the Xiongnu [see sub Geng Gong].

In the far southwest, the empire achieved a vast, albeit nominal, expansion in 69 when the king of the Ailao people came to the frontier by the Dali Lake and offered his submission. This followed a similar approach in 51, but the new subjects were numbered at over half a million, and other tribes likewise offered tribute. The commandery of Yongchang, comprising two new counties and six from Yizhou commandery, was set up to cope with the increase. The territory formally extended from present-day Yunnan into Burma/Myanmar and had general command of the routes towards India, but it was never strongly controlled by Han [see sub Liumiao.]

In similar fashion, under the influence of the Inspector Zhu Fu of Yi province, during the 70s the Zuodu people from the upper reaches of the Yangzi presented songs in praise of Han, while other tribes of the south and west and the Dan'er people of Hainan presented tribute in 74. Such donations and obeisance were of small local significance, but they added to the prestige of the imperial court.

IMPERIAL RELATIVES

In 52, while he was still Heir, Liu Zhuang took the young Lady Ma, daughter of Ma Yuan, into his harem. The Ma family was at that time out of favour, but the Lady made herself agreeable both to her consort and to her mother-in-law the Empress Yin, and in 60 she was proclaimed empress. She was unable to bear children, but an agreement was reached that she should foster Liu Da, fifth son of Emperor Ming by his Honoured Lady Jia, who was a maternal cousin of the Lady Ma. The child was named Heir on the same day as the empress was appointed.

The emperor held to the principle that close imperial relatives should not be involved in regular government, and he refused a request by his sister, the Princess Liu Hongfu, that her son his nephew should be commissioned into the civil service. Similarly, though the agreement of the Ma and the Jia marked a successful alliance between a leading family of the northwest and the Nanyang faction at court, neither family gained particular advantage from close connection to the throne; the model of the Wang at the end of Former Han was still very close. The Empress Ma made a point of her modesty, and her relatives received no fiefs or appointments. The Lady Jia was awarded insignia and gifts after the death of the Dowager Yin in 64, but she died in obscurity in the rear palace, and even after her son, Emperor Zhang, came to the throne ten years later she received no acknowledgement.

Emperor Ming enfeoffed his sons as kings in 72, but their states were only half the size of his brothers and half-brothers the sons of Emperor Guangwu. As he was planning their territories, with the maps spread out in front of him, his empress said, "Your sons have fewer counties to maintain themselves; isn't that a reduction?" The emperor replied, "How can I allow my sons to rank with those of my late father? If they have an income of twenty million a year, that is surely enough!"

The emperor had problems with his brothers. At the time of his accession the King of Shanyang Liu Jing, full brother of the emperor, sought to persuade the former Heir Liu Qiang to rebel against the new ruler. Liu Qiang promptly reported this treasonous advice to the throne, and the matter was smoothed over, but in the 60s Liu Jing began to give himself imperial airs, and in 67 he was found guilty of encouraging magicians and shamans to devise curses against his sovereign. He was arrested and committed suicide; it is likely he was not entirely sane, but the whole history made the emperor uneasy.

Soon afterwards and more seriously, there arose the affair of Liu Ying the King of Chu. A close friend of the emperor before his accession, Liu Ying was interested in various forms of the occult, including Huang-Lao and some early forms of Buddhism, and though there had been questions about his conduct during the 60s his brother had firmly supported him. In 70, however, Liu Ying was accused of wicked associations and seeking false omens, and the emperor was disillusioned and angry. Liu Ying was sent into exile, his fief was reduced to a marquise, and he killed himself in the following year.

The affair did not end at this, for the emperor pursued the alleged conspiracy with the utmost energy. Thousands of people were arrested and tortured, and great numbers were killed. Another half-brother, Liu Kang, was implicated and punished, and though the persecution was later eased a further, similar, allegation was made against the ruler's full brother Liu Yan, King of Huaiyang, in 73. Many more were killed, including the Excellency Xing Mu and Han Guang, husband of a princess.

Liu Yan was arrogant and aggressive, and he and his royal brothers may have been inappropriately interested in the occult, but there appears to have been no good evidence of an organised conspiracy. This series of problems, however, first with Liu Jing, then the alleged treason of Liu Ying, involving also Liu Kang, and finally Liu Yan, affected Emperor Ming. He had initially shown trust, and done his best to support his brothers, but during the latter years of his reign he was embittered and suspicious, and the accusations and purges did not end until his death. Disruptive though they were for the court and the high nobility, however, these unfortunate affairs do not appear to have had wide affect upon the empire as a whole.

RITUAL AND SCHOLARSHIP

Confucian scholarship and ritual were important to the apparent legitimacy of the rulers of Han, and Emperor Ming paid them a great deal of attention. Early in 59 he held a great assembly at the Bright Hall 明堂, attended by the whole court, and it appears that he not only completed the ceremonial buildings commenced by his father but also inaugurated the rituals and costumes to accompany them [MBeck 90:236].

Also in 59 the new ruler established sacrifices at the Five Suburban Altars 五郊祀 about the capital, to Welcome the Ethers 迎氣 at the beginning of each of the four seasons and at the middle of the year [Bodde 75:192-200, MBeck 90:101-103]. These were additional to the Southern and Northern Altars set up by Guangwu in 56 for the worship of Heaven 南郊 and Earth 北郊 [Bn 76:73-76], and Emperor Ming also added an Altar for Rain 雩場 to the complex about the Altar of Heaven, established the Temple of the Epochal Founder 世祖廟 in honour of his father [Bodde.75:192-198, 223-226, Bn 76:54-55, 74-77], and paid honours to Confucius. He several times undertook the ceremony of Ploughing the Sacred Field 耕藉田, and in 59 he also revived the ceremony of the Great Archery 大射 and, more importantly, that of Serving the Aged 養老, both at the Hall of the Circular Moat 辟雍 [Bodde 75:361-372, Bn 76:66-68].

In 58, moreover, the New Text scholar Fan Shu, a cousin of the late Emperor Guangwu, persuaded Emperor Ming to act as patron to studies on the classics by Academicians and other senior advisers, and it appears that the subsequent winter ceremonies at the Hall of the Circular Moat included expository sessions at which scholars discussed questions with the sovereign. On the first occasion the Five-fold Experienced Huan Rong and his disciples took part in discussions before the ruler, and in 71 Emperor Ming himself promulgated Wu[xing]jia yaoshuo zhangju 五行家要說章句 "Detailed Commentary to Major Points of the Tradition of the Five Powers." Final editing was carried out by Huang Rong's son Huan Yu, who was later involved in the conference at the White Tiger Hall under Emperor Zhang, and the compilation was then placed in the library of the Hall of All-Embracing Brightness in the Northern Palace. [For analysis and argument, see sub Huan Yu, and deC 2006B.]

The scholarly work carried out under the patronage of Emperor Ming may be compared to the debate in the Hall of the Stone Conduit [石渠 Shiqu], held by Emperor Xuan of Former Han in 51 BC, and to the later conference in the White Tiger Hall. Though Tjan 49:158 suggests that Emperor Ming held just one meeting in 59, it appears that the program began in 58 under the encouragement of Fan Shu, that it was maintained through the 60s and that publication of Wujia yaoshuo zhangju marked its culmination in 71; Emperor Zhang, in contrast, held a single long meeting in 79. Again, unlike the Stone Conduit debates, which were concerned to decide between contending texts, Emperor Ming appears to have fully accepted the New Text. The White Tiger Discussions sponsored by his son proved more influential, and began at least as a questioning of orthodoxy, but it was the intention of both rulers to appear as patrons of scholarship and philosophy, while Huan Yu's work of compilation was analogous to that of Ban Gu in 79.

During the course of this program, some time in the middle 60s, it appears that the emperor was considering abolishing the University, presumably because the work being carried out in the Hall of the Circular Moat rendered the deliberations of the Academicians superfluous. He was dissuaded by the Excellency Zhao Xi, who argued that both institutions had a role, and both should be maintained.

As another aspect of his concern for scholarship, in 66 Emperor Ming set up the Palace School for Noble Families 四姓小侯學校 [literally: "little lords of the four lineages"]. Established in the Southern Palace, the School was designed initially for young gentlemen of the four great clans of relatives by marriage, the Fan family of the mother of Emperor Guangwu, the Yin and Guo of Guangwu's two empresses, and the Ma of Emperor Ming's own consort [the phrase "little lords" indicated that they could expect noble titles, but had not yet been enfeoffed]. The School also accepted the families of kings and marquises, and likewise catered to princes of the Xiongnu who came as hostages. The curriculum was based firmly upon the Five Classics: Changes, History, Poetry, Ritual and Chunqiu, and this academy for young noblemen was maintained for most of the dynasty though, not surprisingly, its standards varied with the passage of time. The name of only one member of staff is recorded: Zhang Pu, first Tutor for the Classic of History, was later a tutor to the Heir Liu Da, future Emperor Zhang, and rose to become Grand Commandant. [On the Palace School, see particularly HHS 2:113, 79/69A:2546, and Bn 76:27.]

DEATH AND BURIAL

After a reign of eighteen years, Emperor Ming died on 5 September 75, at the Chinese age of forty-eight. He was awarded the temple name Xianzong 顯宗 "Illustrious Exemplar", and his tomb northwest of Luoyang was named "Mound of Illustrious Integrity" 顯節陵.

The emperor had no sons by his Empress Ma, and his chosen Heir was his fifth son Liu Da, born to the Honoured Lady Jia in 57. Liu Da's elder brothers had been born to concubines of no noted lineage, so Emperor Ming's choice of Heir was reasonable, but he left a very young successor. -HHS 2*.

Liu Zi 劉次, the Lady. Daughter of Emperor Ming, in 60 she was named Princess of Pingshi in Nanyang. -HHS 10B:459.

HHS 10A:413 tells how a fire accidentally started by a servant in the suite of the Princess of Xinping 新平 in the Northern Palace spread to the harem apartments. There was no such fief at this time, but Xinping may be a miswriting of Pingshi 平氏. Bielenstein suggests that this was a fire recorded for the winter of 76/77: see sub the Lady Ma, Empress/Dowager of Emperor Ming, and Bn 76:39, 112.

Liu Zi 劉次 (137-162). Son of Liu An the King of Jibei, he succeeded his father in 145. He was only nine years old at the time, but he displayed such filial piety that in 147 the Dowager Liang commended him with a special edict and added to his fief.

Liu Zi was succeeded by his son Luan. -HHS 55/45:1807.

Liu Zichan 劉子產; Yuyang. In 71, when Liu Kang the King of Ji'nan was accused of involvement in the conspiracy of Liu Ying the King of Chu, Liu Zichan was named as one of his contacts. -HHS 42/32:1431.

Liu [Zihui] 劉子惠; Zhongshan. In 189 Liu Zihui was Headquarters Officer to Han Fu the Governor of Ji province. Yuan Shao proposed to raise rebellion against Dong Zhuo, who had seized power in the capital, but Han Fu was reluctant to approve, and wondered whether he should support the Yuan clan or the Dong. Liu Zihui told him that the rising was for the good of the state, not the interests of any one family or faction. Suitably chastened, Han Fu gave his approval to Yuan Shao's enterprise. -HHS 74/64A:2377; deC 96:33.

Liu [Zijing] 劉子敬; Zhuo. Son of Liu Xiong and younger brother of Liu Hong, Liu Zijing expressed concern that the ambitions of his nephew Liu Bei would bring ruin upon the family. -SGZ Shu 2:871.

Liu [Ziping] 劉子平 As a county magistrate in Runan, Liu Ziping behaved discourteously to Chen Fan when he was out of office in the mid-160s. When Chen Fan returned to power, Liu Ziping was impeached for corruption. -FSTY 7:56.

Liu Ziping 劉子平 see Liu Ping 劉平 of Pingyuan.

Liu [Zishan] 劉子山. Magistrate of a county in Nanyang, in 168 Liu Zishan was the subject of a stele inscription. -LX 20:3b-4a.

Liu Zong 劉宗 miswritten for Liu Chong 劉崇, King of Lecheng. -HHS 101/11:3236.

Liu Zong 柳宗 [Boqian 伯騫]; Shu. About 160 Liu Zong gathered a group of nine friends to study together. He later held senior office in his commandery and the province, and he arranged that four of his colleagues received appointment in the imperial bureaucracy.

Liu Zong himself received provincial nomination as Abundant Talent. He served as a county magistrate in Youfufeng and perhaps as Administrator of Jiangxia. -HYGZ 10A:134-35, 12:214.

Liu Zong 劉琮. Son of Liu Rong the King of Pei, he succeeded his father in 164.

Liu Zong was succeeded by his son Yao. -HHS 42/32:1428.

Liu Zong 劉琮; Shanyang. Younger son of Liu Biao, he was favoured by his father through the influence of the Lady Cai, second wife of Liu Biao, whose niece Liu Zong had married. When Liu Biao died in 208, Liu Zong succeeded his father as warlord Governor of Jing province. Soon afterwards Cao Cao invaded from the north, and Liu Zong surrendered. He was named Inspector of Qing province and enfeoffed with a marquisate, but held no power. -HHS 74/64B:2423-24, SGZ 6:213-15.

Liu Zu 劉祖 also mistakenly as Liu Bo 伯 [Fengxian 奉先]; Nanyang. A fragment of Han-Wei xianxian xingzhuang, quoted by Hou Kang at HHSJJ 95/5:3542, tells how Liu Bo, whose style was Fengxian, was a conscientious scholar and a man of fine morality. During the early 140s he was an Investigator in the commandery, and when Yu Xu, the corrupt and greedy Administrator of Yuzhang, came to his territory and sought to exploit his position, Liu Bo attacked him and drove him away.

Hou Kang notes that the style of this man is the same as that of Liu Zu, who also served as a local officer in Nanyang and was Minister of the Imperial Clan in 171. He therefore suggests that this is a story from Liu Zu's early career and that the character 祖 has been miswritten as Bo 伯.

FSTY 5:39-40; Nylan 83:471-474 describes how when Liu Zu, future Minister of the Imperial Clan, was a clerical officer in Nanyang, the Administrator Gongsun Qing carried out the annual ceremonies for the imperial ancestors in Zhangling county [see sub Liu Zhi 劉祉]. Liu Zu was invited to hold the reins of the official chariot, which was regarded as a post of honour, but he declined on the grounds that it was inappropriate for a member of the imperial house to take such a menial position. Admiring his stand, Gongsun Qing nominated him Filial and Incorrupt; Ying Shao disapproves of Liu Zu's arrogance.

A text by Cai Zhi, preserved by the commentary of Liu Zhao to HHS 95/5:3121-22, describes the enthronement of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling in 171 and mentions the role of Liu Zhi, as Minister of the Imperial Clan, at that ceremony. [In HHSJJ at 3528 Hui Dong cites FSTY 5 as above.]

Liu Zu 劉租. A commandery medical officer 醫曹吏 in the late second century, Liu Zu applied deep and direct acupuncture to the local officer Xu Yi, but mistakenly hit the liver rather than the stomach. The celebrated doctor Hua Tuo observed his mistake but could do nothing to help, and Xu Yi died five days later. -SGZ 29:800.

Liu Zuan 劉纘 (138-146) [Emperor Zhi 質帝 (reg. 145-146)]. Son of Liu Hong the King of Le'an, Liu Zuan was a great-great-grandson of Emperor Zhang. His mother the Lady Chen was a former singing girl who had been taken by Liu Hong but had not been formally appointed as a concubine in his royal harem.

At the beginning of 145 the infant Emperor Chong, son of Emperor Shun, became mortally ill. Liu Zuan was brought to the capital by the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, brother of the regent Dowager Liang, and when the emperor died on 15 February, the Dowager and her brother agreed to place him upon the throne. Liang Ji was given the Staff of Authority to bring Liu Zuan from his lodgings to the Southern Palace, on 6 March he was enfeoffed as a marquis, and that same day he was placed upon the throne. Liang Ji continued to hold control of the Imperial Secretariat, together with the Grand Tutor of Emperor Chong, Zhao Jun, who died a few months later, and the Grand Commandant Li Gu.

There appears to have been little to distinguish Liu Zuan as superior to any other cadet of the imperial house, his mother's ancestry left much to be desired, and Li Gu had urged the claims of Liu Suan the King of Qinghe, a young, but grown, man of character. In fact Liu Zuan's chief claim to selection appears to have been that at the age of seven by Western reckoning he was old enough to avoid the risks of infant mortality, and young enough to require the guidance of a regent.

Despite his youth, Liu Zuan could notice the tight limits to his notional authority, though he was not perceptive enough to keep silent on the matter. On one occasion he glared at Liang Ji in public court and referred to him as an "over-bearing general" 跋扈將軍. Then, on 26 July 146, as the emperor was eating dumplings he was seized by stomach cramps. He called the minister Li Gu and asked for water, but Liang Ji, who was also present, forbade it in case the liquid made him vomit and compounded the problem. Almost immediately the boy died.

It was traditionally argued that Liang Ji poisoned Liu Zuan to remove a future threat to his authority, but it was possibly only bad cooking, and he may have been naturally weak and sickly. The death formally occurred in the Jade Hall, where Emperors Shun and Chong had also died, so one way or another it may have been prepared for. The most suspicious part of the affair is that the young Liu Zhi, future Emperor Huan, had been called to the capital before the death of Liu Zuan and formally betrothed to Liang Nüying, younger sister of the Dowager. Had it been expected that Liu Zuan would reign a normal life-time, the Lady Liang would surely have been committed to him in order to maintain the influence of her family. As it is, one must assume that Liang Ji and his elder sister had early knowledge of his fate.

Li Gu insisted that the imperial physicians be impeached and the death investigated, but nothing more came of the matter and the Liang group were free to maintain their power.

Liu Zuan was buried in the "Mound of Repose" 靜陵, east of Luoyang, but because his reign had been so short he did not receive a temple-name. Events during this short period are summarised in the biography of his successor Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan. -HHS 6:278-82, 63/53:2085.

Liu Zun 劉遵; Nanyang. Son of Liu Shun, he succeeded to his marquisate in 35, but was later found guilty of private communication with kings of the imperial family. His fief was transferred from Shanyang to Hedong, and its value reduced from two counties to one. -HHS 14/4:566; Bn 54 appendix # 109.

Liu Zun 劉遵/尊 (d.138). Son of Liu Shou the King of Langye, he succeeded his father in 120.

Liu Zun was succeeded by his son Ju, and three other sons later received district marquisates. -HHS 42/32:1452.

Liulang 柳狼 see Liumiao 柳貌. -HYGZ 4:60.

Liuli 劉利; Xiongnu. A chieftain of the Southern Xiongnu, he was a supporter of the prince Shizi. In 94 the Chinese officials Du Chong and Zhu Hui reported to the throne that the Shanyu Anguo planned to kill Shizi and Liuli. Anguo himself was later destroyed. -HHS 89/79:2955.

Liumiao 柳貌/邈. King of the Ailao people in the far southwest of China, in 69 Liumiao sent his son to the Chinese frontier by the Dali Lake to offer submission. His people were numbered at more than half a million. To cope with this vast increase in his subjects, Emperor Ming established the commandery of Yongchang, comprising two new counties and six from Yizhou commandery. The new unit extended across the frontier of present-day Burma/Myanmar, and had general command of the routes towards India, but it was never strongly controlled by Han. -HHS 86/76:2849; Bn 67:77-78, Yü 67:117.

HYGZ 4:60 gives the king's name as Liulang 柳狼 or Yilang 抑狼. Cf. also HHSJJ 86/76:3150 quoting Hui Dong, who cites the Ailao zhuan 哀牢傳 of Yang Zhong and suggests that Liumiao was the name of the father of King Huli [or Xianli], who paid tribute in 51, and that the man who brought his people to submit in 69 was Huli/Xianli's son Liulang.

Liumo 柳貌 miswritten for Liumiao 柳貌.

Liyan 黎弇 of Shule [Kashgar] (d.75). When Shule was attacked by the armies of King Jian of Qiuzi [Kuqa] in 75, the Chinese agent Ban Chao and his men initially fought alongside the defenders, but then Ban Chao was ordered to return to China. Angry and in despair at being abandoned, the Shule commander Liyan cut his own throat. -HHS 47/37:1575.

Long 龍 [personal name unknown]; non-Chinese of Zangke. Head of the clan of that name in the middle 20s, he and other leaders supported the Chinese Xie Xian, Officer of Merit of the commandery, in maintaining allegiance to Han rather than acknowledging the imperial claim of Gongsun Shu. They sent messengers by the south-eastern route through present-day Guangdong, and Guangwu rewarded them with ceremonial robes. -HHS 86/76:2845, HYGZ 4:54.

Long Duan 龍端 (d.121); Liaodong. A clerical officer in the commandery, in the summer of 121 Long Duan accompanied the Administrator Cai Feng and the local militia in an attempt to deal with a major raid from Gaogouli [Koguryo], supported by Xianbi from the north. Their troops were defeated with the loss of several hundred men. Long Duan and his colleagues Geng Hao and Gongsun Pu tried to shield their master Cai Feng, but all of them were killed. -HHS 85/75:2814-15.

Long Shang 龍尙 (d.166); Guangling. Evidently the head of a religious sect, about 165 Long Shang was joined by Dai Yi, who brought a blank golden seal which he had found. They accordingly held sacrifice to wells and fountains and prepared written charms and amulets 符書. Either Dai Yi or possibly Long Shang took title as Grand Supreme Emperor 太上皇 [cf. He Deng], but early in 166 they were taken and executed. -HHS 7:316.

Long Shu 龍述 [Bogao 伯高]; Jingzhao. In the early 40s Long Shu was a county magistrate in Nanyang. In a letter from Ma Yuan to his nephews Ma Yan and Ma Dun, reprimanding them for their excessive criticism of others, he praised Long Shu for his cautious speech, while still keeping high moral standards. With such an endorsement Long Shu was promoted to be Administrator of Lingling. -HHS 24/14:844-45.

Long Yuan 龍淵 [Dragon Well?]. An expert physiognomist, Long Yuan could also judge a client by the sound of his voice, and would receive each in accordance with his future rank. Interviewing Zhang Ji, he foretold that he would become an Excellency, but only after paying for the honour.

612 Longqiu Chang

Just at this time Liu Hong the future Emperor Ling, aged about ten and at that time only the Marquis of Jiedu Village, also came to call. When he learnt that Long Yuan was engaged he turned away, but Long Yuan told Zhang Ji that this would be a good young man to treat well, and Zhang Ji went after him and gave him generous gifts.

Later Liu Hong came to the throne, and Zhang Ji did become an Excellency – possibly being judged to have paid for the post in advance. -HHSJJ 45/35:1642 Hui Dong citing the third century compilation Shixue pian.

Longqiu Chang 龍丘萇; Kuaiji. Longqiu Chang was a respected gentleman scholar of the northern part of Kuaiji, which later became Wu commandery. In the time of Wang Mang he retired to live as a hermit, supporting himself by farming his own land, and he refused many invitations to office.

In 23 the youthful Ren Yan was appointed Commandant of Kuaiji for the Gengshi Emperor. His officers urged him to summon Longqiu Chang, but Ren Yan, a devotee of non-action 無爲, recognised Longqiu Chang's nature and instead sent frequent emissaries with gifts of books and medicines. After a year Longqiu Chang came in his palanquin to Ren Yan's office and asked to take office in order to discharge the debt of courtesy he had acquired. Ren Yan gave him an honorary post as an adviser. Longqiu Chang died soon afterwards, but the leading men of the commandery, inspired by his example, were now anxious to enter Ren Yan's service. -HHS 76/66:2461, XC 7:14b, XS:3a; Vervoor 90:131-132.

Longyuan 龍淵 [Dragon Well?] see Long Yuan 龍淵.

"Lord" 公 [honorary title of a scholar or gentleman] see under the relevant surname.

Lord of Thunder 雷公 see Zhang Leigong 張雷公.

Lou Fa 婁發. A military officer of Yi province under the Governor Liu Yan, after Liu Yan's death in 194 Lou Fa joined a rebellion against Liu Yan's son Liu Zhang to aid Hu Mao, the new Inspector who had been nominated by the government at Chang'an and who was supported by Liu Biao in Jing province. The insurgents were defeated, and Lou Fa and his fellows took refuge in Jing province. -SGZ Shu 1:868.

Lou Gui 婁圭 [Zibo 子伯]; Nanyang. A man of courage and ambition, in the early 190s Lou Gui established himself in the northwest of Jing province, recruiting refugees from the troubled region of Chang'an as retainers. He first supported Liu Biao, but then led his men to join Cao Cao, an old acquaintance, who gave him high rank as an adviser, but no direct command.

After campaigns against the Yuan family in Ji province, in 208 Lou Gui followed Cao Cao into Jing, where he advised that, since Liu Zong had come with his official insignia, his surrender was genuine. Lou Gui later distinguished himself in operations against Ma Chao in the northwest, notably by his recommendation of building a temporary fortification from watered sand in order to protect the bridgehead over the Yellow River.

Favoured by Cao Cao, Lou Gui accumulated great wealth, but was later reported to have presumed upon his position and shown a lack of respect. Cao Cao killed him. -SGZ 12:373-74*.

Lou Shou 婁壽 [Yuankao 元考] (97-174); Nanyang. Though his grandfather had been a General of the Household and his father was an Academician, Lou Shou lived as a scholar recluse 玄儒. He was nonetheless admired for his generous and courteous conduct, and when he died his neighbours set up a stele in his memory. -LS 9.9a-12a, Nagata 94:208.

Lou Wang 婁望 [Zici 子次] (21-100); Chenliu. As a young man Lou Wang studied the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu according to the Zhuang/Yan interpretation, and he was respected in his locality for his fine moral standards. About 45 Liu Xu the King of Zhao, cousin of Emperor Guangwu, heard of his reputation and sent messengers with gifts, inviting him to serve as his teacher. Lou Wang refused, but he later served as Officer of Merit in his commandery.

At the beginning of the reign of Emperor Ming, Lou Wang was appointed a Palace Attendant and a colonel in the Northern Army, and he taught the residents of the imperial palace. In 73 he was made Minister of Finance and in 75 he became Minister of Ceremonies.

In 79 Lou Wang took part in the great conference on Confucian philosophy at the White Tiger Hall, but in the following year he lost his ministerial office on account of some fault. He was made a Palace Counsellor and then a Gentleman of the Household responsible for gentleman cadets.

Despite his official career, Lou Wang continued to teach, and he was recognised as the doyen of Confucian scholars. He died in office at the age of eighty, and several thousand students accompanied his funerary cortège. -HHS 79/69B:2580-81*; Tjan 49:160-163.

Lou Yi 樓異. In 194 Cao Cao attacked Lü Bu in the city of Puyang in Dong commandery. As his troops were defeated, Cao Cao fell from his horse and injured his arm in a fire. Lou Yi gave him his horse, and so Cao Cao was able to escape [cf. Cao Ang and Cao Hong]. -SGZ 1:11.

Louban 樓班 (d.207); Wuhuan. Louban was a son of the Shanyu Qiuliju of Liaoxi, who died about 193 when Louban was still young. His cousin Tadun acted as Louban's guardian.

By the early 200s Louban was grown up and he was recognised by Nanlou, Supuyan and other chieftains as their suzerain, but Tadun continued as war leader and chief of planning.

In 207 Tadun gathered the tribes to aid Yuan Shang and Yuan Xi. When Cao Cao destroyed the Wuhuan army at White Wolf Mountain, Louban fled to Gongsun Kang in Liaodong, who killed him. -HHS 90/80:2984, SGZ 1:29, 30, 34-35; deC 84:403-411.

Loudeng 樓登; Qiang. Chief of the White Horse tribe who lived outside the frontier of Guanghan, in 27 Loudeng led five thousand households to pay allegiance to the new government of Emperor Guangwu. He was enfeoffed as Lord Who Turns to Righteousness 歸義君長. -HHS 87/77:2898.

Lu 陸, the Lady; Wu. Daughter of Lu Kang and a sister of Lu Ji, the Lady married Gu Yong and became the mother of Gu Shao; see SGZ Wu 7:1229, where Lu Ji is described as a maternal uncle 舅 of Gu Shao.

Lu 祿; non-Chinese. During the 140s Lu was the household slave of a village headman in Yingchuan. Ying Feng and Xu Xun passed that way on a journey to Luoyang and Ying Feng later surprised Xu Xun by his ability to recall the man's name. -HHS 48/38:1607.

Lu 路 [personal name unknown] was a Commandant in Kuaiji. -LS 24:3b-4a.

Lu Ang 陸印; Kuaiji. Lu Ang was a son of Lu Hong. -XTS 73B:2965.

Lu Bao 陸褒 [Shuming 叔明]; Kuaiji. Son of Lu Xu, Lu Bao was a dedicated scholar who refused all invitations to office. -HHS 81/71:2683.

Lu Bing 魯炳; Youfufeng. Commandant of Hongnong in 104, Lu Bing was guilty of an offence. His kinsman Lu Gong, Excellency over the Masses, was implicated and compelled to leave office. -HHS 25/15:879.

Lu Cheng 盧程; Anding. Younger brother of the pretender Lu Fang, he accompanied him about 26 to the court of the Shanyu Yu of the Xiongnu, where Lu Fang was enthroned as Emperor of Han. Lu Fang then stayed in the north, while Lu Cheng was given title as General of the Household and led a troop of Xiongnu cavalry back to Anding and Beidi.

In that region the Lu were opposed to the power of Wei Ao, who dominated the upper Wei valley from Tianshui. Lu Cheng is not heard of again, and when Lu Fang established himself on the northern loop of the Yellow River a few years later, he does not appear to have held any position south of the Ordos. -HHS 12/2:506.

Lu Cheng 鹵承 see Lucheng 鹵承.

Lu Chong 魯充. As an Academician, Lu Chong received imperial orders to give advice on procedures for the seven altars about the imperial capital 七部 [i.e. those for Heaven and Earth and for the five directions], for the Three Enclosures [the Bright Hall, the Hall of the Circular Moat and the Spiritual Terrace], and for the ceremonies of Serving the Aged and the Great Archery. -XHS 5:19a. It seems probable that such advice was required in the late 50s, as Emperor Ming was establishing these official rituals, so this was presumably not the same man as immediately below.

Lu Chong 魯充. An officer of the Imperial Secretariat at Chang'an in 195, Lu Chong joined Zhong Yao and others in a plot with Yang Feng, an officer of Liu Jue, to kill him. The plan was unsuccessful, but Yang Feng set himself up independently, Li Jue was weakened, and Emperor Xian made his escape to the east soon afterwards. -HHJ 28:336-37.

Lu Chou 陸稠; Kuaiji. Son of Lu Xu, Lu Chou became Inspector of Jing province and then Administrator of Guangling. -HHS 81/71:2683, XTS 73B:2966.

Lu Cui 路粹 [Wenyu 文蔚] (d.219); Chenliu. A student of Cai Yong and a man of literary talent, Lu Cui followed the Han court to and from Chang'an in the 190s, became a member of the Imperial Secretariat and then a senior clerical officer on Cao Cao's staff. In 208 Lu Cui drafted the memorial which accused Kong Rong of Impiety and brought about his execution.

Appointed as an officer of the state library in 219, Lu Cui accompanied Cao Cao on campaign to Hanzhong, but was found guilty of disobeying the sumptuary laws and was executed.

The Heir, Cao Pi, had been very fond of Lu Cui. He wept for him, and when he took the throne in the following year he appointed Lu Cui's sons to senior clerical office. -SGZ 21:602-03*, HHS 70/60:2278.

Lu Dang 陸黨 see sub Lu Yu 陸紆.

Lu Fang 盧芳/方 [Junqi/ji 君期]; Anding. During the later years of Wang Mang, about 20, Lu Fang raised a mixed troop of Chinese, Qiang and Xiongnu based upon Sanshui, by the Yellow River in present-day Ningxia, and he established a local power in Anding and Beidi with support from leading families. When the Gengshi Emperor came to Chang'an in 24 he named Lu Fang Commandant of Cavalry with responsibility for Anding and the west, and after the collapse of the Gengshi regime at the end of 25 Lu Fang took title as Supreme General 上將軍 and King Who Pacifies the West 西平王.

Lu Fang had by this time devised his own genealogy, asserting that his true name was Liu Wenbo 劉文伯 and that he was a great-grandson of Emperor Wu of Former Han, born of his empress who was a Xiongnu princess. According to Lu Fang, he was descended from the third son of this marriage: the eldest was the Heir who died in the case of Witchcraft in 91 BC, and the second became Emperor Xuan. Lu Fang's own ancestor had taken refuge in Anding and refused invitations to return. Lu Fang thus claimed descent from the ruling houses of both Han and the Xiongnu. In fact, the consort of Emperor Wu involved in the Witchcraft case was a woman of the Wei 衛 family, and the rest of the story was equally spurious: Loewe 74:37-90.

Wei Ao and other leaders of the northwest either accepted the claim or pretended to believe it, and Lu Fang allied himself with the Qiang and the Xiongnu. In 26 the Xiongnu Shanyu Yu invited Lu Fang to his capital and enthroned him formally as Emperor of Han. Lu Fang stayed at the Shanyu's court, but sent his younger brother Lu Cheng back to Anding with a troop of Xiongnu cavalry. Faced with the power of Wei Ao, however, who controlled the upper valley of the Wei, they gained no more than a marginal position in the Dependent State of Anding, and Lu Fang was thus increasingly committed to the north and reliant upon the support of the Xiongnu.

In 28 the Shanyu sent a senior officer to the local warlords in Wuyuan and Shuofang, persuading them to accept Lu Fang's claims, and in 29 Li Xing and Min Kan escorted Lu Fang back onto Chinese soil. He set his capital at Jiuyuan, chief city of Wuyuan, near present-day Baotou, and at the end of that year he repeated the ceremony of accession. Giving titles to his new warlord allies as administrators and magistrates, he held some authority over Shuofang, Wuyuan, Yunzhong, Dingxiang and Yanmen, but he does not appear to have had any position in his homeland of Anding, for the territory south of the Ordos had been absorbed into the interests of Wei Ao and his rival Dou Rong.

In 30 Emperor Guangwu made a diplomatic approach to the Xiongnu, but the Shanyu did not respond well and in the summer of that year, with the support of Xiongnu cavalry, Lu Fang's general Jia Lan attacked Dai, killed Guangwu's Administrator Liu Xing, and seized the commandery. Forced onto the defensive, in 31 Guangwu sought to strengthen his line with military colonies in Yanmen and Taiyuan.

Later that year Lu Fang killed the local chieftain Li Xing, whom he had named as his Administrator of Wuyuan, together with his brothers. He presumably sought to eliminate an ostensible ally of doubtful loyalty, but others now distrusted him. Tian Li of Shuofang and Qiao Hu in Yunzhong made terms with Guangwu, who confirmed them as administrators. The territory under Lu Fang's control thus shifted to the east, with Dingxiang, Dai and northern Yanmen linked through Xiongnu territory to his headquarters in Wuyuan. Guangwu was at that time occupied with Wei Ao, so he made no attempt to take advantage of the new situation. Indeed he withdrew his forces from Yanmen at the beginning of 33 and allowed refugees to settle in Taiyuan.

Then Wei Ao died, and Guangwu was able to concentrate men against Lu Fang. In the summer of 33 the Grand Marshal Wu Han was sent against Dai commandery with fifty thousand men. The attack was defeated by Lu Fang's generals Jia Lan and Min Kan, supported by Xiongnu cavalry and Wu Han returned to Luoyang, leaving defensive garrisons in Yuyang, Zhuo, Changshan and Shanggu. At the end of the year the general Du Mao led another assault, but the Han troops were again driven back by Jia Lan and the Xiongnu cavalry, and when Wu Han tried again in the spring of 34 he was no more successful. The Shanyu was evidently not willing to give Lu Fang the support he needed to challenge Guangwu for the empire, but he had no hesitation in sending such assistance as he needed to hold his position, and the Xiongnu themselves raided regularly along the frontier.

Later in 34 Guangwu formally abolished Dingxiang commandery and transferred refugees into Xihe, and in 35 he combined Shuofang, hitherto a separate entity, with neighbouring Bing province. Guo Ji, new Governor of the enlarged northern province, put a price on Lu Fang's head.

In 36 Lu Fang left his capital to lead an attack from the west on Yunzhong commandery, at the same time as Jia Lan invaded from Dai in the east. Sui Yu, however, Lu Fang's commander at Jiuyuan, was evidently interested in Guo Ji's reward. Subverting a large number of Lu Fang's troops, he attempted to take him captive. Lu Fang escaped, but he was followed by only a few horsemen and was forced to take refuge with the Xiongnu. Jia Lan disappeared, many of Lu Fang's officers changed sides, and Wuyuan, Yanmen and Dai commanderies now came under imperial authority.

The whole of the north, however, was still open to raiding by the Xiongnu and the Wuhuan, and a series of walls and connecting roads marked the retreat of the imperial forces and the capacity of the non-Chinese to live within the nominal border.

In the winter of 39 Lu Fang returned to take up residence with his allies in Dai commandery, but a short time later he unexpectedly sent messengers asking to surrender, and confirmed his submission by offering his imperial seal. Though he still maintained the pretence of imperial descent, it appears Lu Fang may have tired of his border-line game and his non-Chinese allies, while one account claims that the Xiongnu themselves told him to surrender in the hope of obtaining a reward. Guangwu enfeoffed Lu Fang as King of Dai, gave him presents of embroidered silk, and asked him to use his influence to make peace with the Xiongnu.

In fact, Dai commandery was now once more beyond imperial control, and the royal title did no more than recognise Lu Fang's position in the north. Late in 40, moreover, Lu Fang was called to audience for the coming New Year, but as he was on his way to the capital another message ordered him to halt, and advised that the meeting had been postponed twelve months. Angry and concerned at such discourtesy, Lu Fang turned away, and within three months of his nominal submission he was again in rebellion. This time, however, the disturbance was no more than local, and Lu Fang failed to establish a position of his own.

In the summer of 42 Lu Fang left Chinese territory for the last time, as he and his family were escorted to residence under the protection of the Shanyu. He died in Xiongnu territory some ten years later.

As Bielenstein observes, it is difficult to judge the degree to which Lu Fang was a free agent, an imperial candidate sponsored by the Xiongnu, or just a puppet of the Shanyu. In any case, fortunately for China, he never attracted the full support of the Shanyu, and he was an adventurer on the margins of the frontier rather than a serious challenger for central power. -HHS 12/2: 505-08, Bn 67:104-114.

Lu Feng 陸逢; Kuaiji. Son of Lu Xu, Lu Feng became Administrator of Le'an and was a senior officer of the Imperial Secretariat. He was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 81/71:2683.

XTS 73B:2968 attributes five sons to Lu Feng, but only by name, and the chronology is very doubtful.

Lu Fu 魯撫; Youfufeng. Son of the Excellency Lu Gong, in 103 Lu Fu was made a gentleman cadet and then appointed as an officer of the imperial escort. Nothing is known of his later career, and he probably died soon afterwards. -HHS 25/15:878.

Lu Fu 路佛; Taiyuan. In the early 170s the Administrator of Taiyuan, Wang Qiu, admired Lu Fu and wanted to bring him into his office. His officer Wang Yun opposed the idea, for Lu Fu had shown no particular ability. Wang Qiu threatened to kill Wang Yun, but Wang Yun was then called to join the staff of the Inspector Deng Sheng, and Lu Fu was sent away. -HHS 66/56:2172.

Lu Gong 魯恭 [Zhongkang 仲康] (32-112); Youfufeng. A man of family, Lu Gong's grandfather Kuang 匡 had been a noted minister under Wang Mang. Lu Gong's father became Administrator of Wuling under Emperor Guangwu, but died in office when Lu Gong was only twelve, and he and his seven-year-old brother Pi were admired for their extravagant display of mourning.

In 46, at the age of fifteen, Lu Gong went with Pi and their mother to the Imperial University at Luoyang, where he studied the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Lu. Both young men were noted for their devotion to learning and numbers of other students came to attend them. The Excellency Zhao Xi sent one of his sons each year to present wine and food, but they always refused the gifts. Lu Gong was concerned to see Pi established before he took any office himself, so he pleaded ill health when invited.

When the commandery administration sent repeated and most courteous requests, and his mother also added her pleas, he left for the west and maintained private teaching in Jingzhao.

Eventually, at the beginning of the reign of Emperor Zhang, Lu Pi received nomination, and Lu Gong then accepted local office in his commandery. Zhao Xi, now Grand Tutor, promptly appointed him to his own staff, and in 79 Lu Gong took part in the imperial council on the Confucian classics at the White Tiger Hall.

On further recommendation from Zhao Xi, Lu Gong received a special invitation and was appointed magistrate of Zhongmou in Henan. He governed by example, avoided using punishments, and persuaded some of the most recalcitrant litigants to yield their claims. In 82 a wide-spread plague of locusts destroyed crops in all the surrounding territories, but Lu Gong's county was spared. The Intendant Yuan An heard of this but did not believe it, and he sent his officer Fei Qin to check the story. Fei Qin found it was true and was amazed at Lu Gong's influence for good. A young boy refused to harm a nesting pheasant, snakes avoided the territory, and that same year the auspicious grain 嘉禾 appeared in Lu Gong's residence.

Yuan An gave him special commendation and reported to the throne. Emperor Zhang was duly impressed, and he later accepted Lu Gong's nomination of the local scholar Wang Fang for office. The people of Zhongmou celebrated his rule by setting up a shrine and a stele which recorded how his virtues extended even to the wild beasts [LS 20:4b-5a].

Lu Gong resigned his office when his mother died about 85, but he was later appointed to the Imperial Censorate. Generous in his support of others, he nonetheless exposed any wrong-doing.

In 88, at the beginning of the reign of Emperor He, Dou Xian the brother of the regent Dowager proposed to attack the Northern Xiongnu. Lu Gong sent in a strong memorial against the plan. He argued that the current famine in China deserved chief attention, that peace should be preferred to warfare, that it was immoral to seek advantage from the present weakness of the Xiongnu, that non-Chinese should not live mixed among the Han people and, finally, that earlier attempts had shown how the difficulties and distances of the steppe made an expedition dangerous and unlikely to achieve long-term success. His advice was not followed and the great campaign duly took place.

Appointed Academician for the New Text Lu interpretation of Poetry at the Imperial University, Lu Gong did a great deal to revive scholarship in that field. He then became a Palace Attendant, with his advice sought frequently by the emperor, and then went out as Chancellor of Le'an.

There were many bandits in the east at this time, but Lu Gong presented such a model of virtue and good will that the chieftain Zhang Han came with his followers to surrender. Lu Gong named Zhang Han a county commandant, and as the other leaders fought among themselves they were attacked and destroyed. The whole region was settled.

In 97 Lu Gong was brought back to the capital. Initially he was only a Consultant, but after Emperor He gave him special precedence at a banquet he was appointed as a Palace Attendant, and at the end of the year he became Minister of the Household. His recommendations for office were honest and fair, and none of the great families at the capital could influence him.

In 101 Lu Gong became Excellency over the Masses. In the following year he was sent to take the seal and ribbon from the deposed Empress Yin, and in 103 he accompanied Emperor He on tour to Nanyang. His son Lu Fu was made a gentleman cadet and then appointed as an officer of the imperial escort. As Lu Pi was a Palace Attendant at this time, three members of the family now held rank at court.

In 104 Lu Gong was involved in the disgrace of his kinsman Lu Bing, Commandant of Hongnong. He was obliged to leave office, but when the Young Emperor Liu Long came to the throne in 106 Lu Gong became Commandant of the Guards at the Changle Palace, the apartments of the regent Dowager Deng. In the following year, under the new Emperor An, he was restored as Excellency over the Masses.

A strong moralist, Lu Gong was concerned at the increasing Legalist influence upon government. During the reign of Emperor He an ordinance of 103 had provided that judgements of minor offences could be carried out in summer rather than waiting for autumn. The intention was to speed the administration of justice and ease the lot of prisoners awaiting trial, but local authorities took the opportunity to hasten the application of penalties and some even carried out executions for major offences during the summer. Soon after his re-appointment as an Excellency in 107, Lu Gong sent in a memorial urging that, as in ancient tradition, penalties should be inflicted only in autumn or winter. At a court conference called to discuss the whole question of timing, he emphasised that the well-meant reforms had been misinterpreted by junior officials, so that cases were not being investigated properly, while disruption of the natural cycle of the seasons not only interfered with farming but also brought bad weather and crop failures. The government agreed to revert to the original pattern.

During his two terms as an Excellency, Lu Gong recommended only men of the highest quality, regardless of family background; dozens of his nominees rose to high rank. At the same time, he was modest and reserved, preferring to gain his ends quietly and by indirection, so he was not widely praised as a man of heroic principle. He retired in 109 on account of old age and ill health, and died three years later. - HHS 25/15:873-82*, XHS 2:15a-16a; Hulsewé 55:106, Loewe 86C:304.

Lu Gong 陸宮 (d.145); Danyang. A bandit chieftain and an associate of Yu Lai, in 145 Lu Gong was defeated by the Administrator Jiang Han. - HHS 6:278.

Lu Hong 陸閎 [Zichun 子春]; Kuaiji. Member of an ancient and distinguished family, Lu Hong served as Director of the Secretariat under Emperor Guangwu. A handsome man, he regularly wore plain clothes of Yue 越 cloth from his homeland. The emperor admired the material and ordered that tax from Kuaiji should thereafter be paid in that fabric.

Lu Hong later became Administrator of Yingchuan, where his government was celebrated by the visit of phoenixes 鳳凰 and by sweet dew 甘露. - HHS 81/71:2682, XC 5:15a-b, XTS 73B:2965. XC describes Lu Hong as a man of Wu, but this is an anachronism, for the commandery was not separated from Kuaiji until 129; the family did, however, come from Wu county.

Lu Hong 盧洪. About 214 Lu Hong and Zhao Ta were Examiners in the kingdom of Wei; this new style of appointment probably represents an attempt by Cao Cao to establish a Censorate in the central government over personal conduct and the sumptuary laws. When their activities were criticised by the regular official Gao Rou, Cao Cao initially argued that the men were suited to their task, but he later found they were indeed corrupt. Lu Hong and Zhao Ta were executed. - SGZ 24:684.

Lu Huan 陸桓 [Shuwen 叔文]; Kuaiji. Son of Lu

Hong, Lu Huan died comparatively young. - XTS 73B:2965, HHS 81/71:2682 [which tells how his son, Lu Xu, was orphaned as a child].

Lu Huan 陸桓, wife of; Kuaiji. Wife and widow of Lu Huan, the Lady was the mother of Lu Xu. She had a distinctive manner of cutting food when she cooked, which her son recognised when he was in prison. - HHS 81/71:2682-83.

Lu Ji 魯奇. In 35 Lu Ji was a lieutenant-general in the army of Han commanded by Cen Peng, who was planning an assault on the defences on the Yangzi established by Gongsun Shu's general Tian Rong. Cen Peng offered rewards to whoever was first to reach the floating fortress bridge, which was guarded by a palisade of stakes set in the river. Lu Ji gathered a force of volunteers and, aided by a strong monsoon wind from the east which drove their boats upstream against the current, he led the attack. Blocked by the stakes in the river, they drove forward over the dead bodies of their comrades. Reaching the bridge, they set it on fire and opened the way for Peng Cen and his fleet to destroy the enemy.

Though the text is not specific, Bielenstein says that Lu Ji died in this enterprise. Certainly, the casualties were heavy, the leader's death is likely, and Lu Ji does not appear again. - HHS 17/7:661; Bn 59:189.

Lu Ji 陸績 [Gongji 公紀] (188-219); Wu. Son of Lu Kang and a precocious youth, Lu Ji was an expert in calendrical calculations. Despite the fact that Sun Ce had fought his father, Lu Ji joined Sun Quan's administrative staff in the early 200s, and became Administrator of Yulin and a lieutenant-general in his service. He then suffered ill health, and though he continued in office he concentrated upon the study of the Mysteries [玄學 Xuan xue], writing a commentary to the Book of Changes and to the Taixuan jing 太玄經 "Classic of the Great Mystery" by Yang Xiong 楊雄, and compiling Yuntian tu 暉天圖, a chart of the heavens. As an astronomer, Lu Ji was compared to the great Zhang Heng, and he constructed an armillary sphere which developed his principles further.

It is said that Lu Ji foretold the day of his own death. - SGZ Wu 12:1328-29*; Needham 59:359, Mather 76:554.

Lu Jun 魯峻 [Zhongyan 仲巖] (112-172); Shanyang. A man of family, whose father and grandfather both held commissioned appointment in the imperial service, Lu Jun studied the New Text Lu school of the Classic of Poetry and the Zhuang/Yan interpretation of Chunqiu. Having served as a local officer in his commandery and in Yu province, he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and after a period of probation as a gentleman cadet he became an Internuncio and then Assistant to the Administrator of Henei.

Lu Jun left office at the death of his father, but was later appointed to the offices of the Excellencies, graded First Class and became an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate. He was then a county magistrate in Dong commandery, and after four years he was promoted to be Administrator of Jiujiang; in both places he was admired for his honest and humane government.

Returning to the capital as a Consultant, Lu Jun became Chief Clerk to the Grand Commandant, transferred to be Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate, and in 164 he was made Director of Retainers. After a period of successful service, he resigned once more on the death of his mother.

Lu Jun later returned to office, again as a Consultant, and then as a colonel in the Northern Army. He left office on grounds of ill health, and died at the end of 172, aged sixty-one. He was buried in the following year, and more than three hundred gentlemen from different states and commanderies acknowledged themselves as his students [門生 mensheng] and set up a stele in his honour. -LS 9:4b-7a, LX 12:22a-23a, Nagata 94:202-04.

Lu Jun 陸駿 [Jicai 季才]; Wu. Son of Lu Yu, Lu Jun was admired for his generosity to his retainers and clients. About 188 Sun Jian the Administrator of Changsha crossed his borders to aid a nephew of Lu Kang, Administrator of Lujiang, against local rebels; this magistrate may have been Lu Jun.

About 190, probably reflecting the territorial ambitions of his uncle Lu Kang, Lu Jun was named Commandant of Jiujiang. He died soon afterwards. -SGZ Wu 13:1343, 1:1096.

XTS 73B:2968 says that Lu Jun was at some time an Academician.

Lu Jun 陸儁; Wu. Son of Lu Kang, in 195 he was named a gentleman cadet by the court at Chang'an in recognition of his father's heroic but unsuccessful defence of Lujiang. -HHS 31/21:1114.

Lu Kai 陸凱 [Jingfeng 敬風]; (198-269); Wu. A younger cousin of Lu Xun, Lu Kai was a noted scholar of the Mysteries [玄學 Xuan xue] and of divination. He became a high-ranking military and civil officer under Sun Quan and his successors. -SGZ Wu 16:1399-1403*; Mather 76:555.

Lu Kang 陸康 [Jining 季寧]; Kuaiji/Wu. Son of Lu Bao and member of a noted local family, Lu Kang was born about 125. A successful officer in the commandery, he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt by the Administrator Li Su. Li Su was later executed for cowardice, but Lu Kang escorted his body home to Yingchuan and carried out full mourning. He was admired for his loyalty.

Recommended as Abundant Talent by the Inspector Zang Min, Lu Kang became a magistrate in Bohai. The county had been considered a frontier territory, and there was therefore a local military levy, but Lu Kang ended it and maintained good order by honest and generous government. He was repeatedly commended for his work.

About 180 Lu Kang was Administrator of Wuling, then of Guiyang and of Le'an. From this last, about 185 he sent in a memorial protesting the extravagance and corruption involved in the project of Emperor Ling and his eunuchs for rebuilding the palaces at Luoyang. He was criticised for making analogies with bad rulers of the past, and his crime was categorised as Great Disrespect, a mortal offence, but the censor Liu Dai wrote on his behalf and Lu Kang suffered only dismissal.

Lu Kang returned home, but later went back to the capital as a Consultant. About 188 he was sent as Administrator to Lujiang, where he put down the rebel chieftain Huang Rang. As the empire fell into turmoil in the early 190s, Lu Kang maintained connection to the court of Emperor Xian, sending reports and tribute. He was named a general and raised in rank.

When Yuan Shu was driven south into Jiujiang by Cao Cao in 193, he sought provisions and supplies from Lu Kang but was refused. He then sent troops, at some time commanded by Sun Ce, to attack Lujiang. After two years siege in his capital, with heavy losses among his followers and kinsmen, Lu Kang surrendered, probably in 195. He died a month later, aged seventy. -HHS 31/21:1112-14*, XC 1:10b; Ch'ü 72:320-321, deC 90:155-156.

Lu Kuang 魯匡 [Gongfu 公輔]; Liang. Son of an Administrator, Lu Kuang became a county magistrate in Qinghe. He was commemorated with a stele at his tomb. -SJZ 22:16a.

Lu Lei 陸類 see Lulei 陸類.

Lu Li 陸颯 see sub Lu Yu 陸紆.

Lu Liang 陸梁. Probably in 189, Lu Liang was chief of a group of bandits in Yang province. The censorial officer Zhang Na was sent against him, and Lu Liang was destroyed. -LS 5:10b-15a.

Lu Mao 陸瑁 [Zizhang 子璋] (d.239); Wu. Son of Lu Jun and younger brother of Lu Xun, who became Chancellor of the imperial state of Wu, Lu Mao was known for his scholarship. He respected and supported colleagues who came to the south as refugees, and cared also for the children of his uncle Lu Ji and the gentleman Xu Yuan.

Lu Mao initially refused invitations to office, but joined Sun Quan's Secretariat in 232; he warned him against wasting resources in an attack on Gongsun Yuan in Liaodong. -SGZ Wu 12:1336-38*.

Lu Nu 盧奴; Zhongshan. Administrator of Nanyang in 163, Lu Nu built a temple at the source of the Huai in the mountains to the east of the commandery. -LS 2:12a-14b, Nagata 94:142.

Lu Nüsheng 魯女生; Chenliu. Lu Nüsheng was a contemporary of the celebrated doctor Hua Tuo in the latter part of the second century AD, but he spoke so naturally and in such detail of the time of Emperor Ming, a hundred years earlier, that people believed he must have been alive at that time. Despite his age he had a flourishing, youthful appearance and could easily walk a hundred miles in a single day.

Lu Nüsheng's longevity was initially ascribed to a special cake of sesame or linseed, but a number of supernatural tales gathered about him. In particular, it was said that a goddess had presented him with a copy of Wuyue zhenxing tu 五嶽真形圖 "Veritable Images of the Five Sacred Peaks." These mystical diagrams, also known as Wuyue tu 五岳圖, served as a talisman against misfortune, particularly for travellers, and modern copies may still be seen: e.g. Ngo 76:112. [Another tradition says that the symbols were presented to Emperor Wu of Former Han by the Queen Mother of the West 西王母.]

Lu Nüsheng disappeared in the early 190s. It was said that he had achieved apotheosis on the sacred Mount Hua, and a temple was erected there in his honour. -HHS 82/72B:2740-41; Ngo 76:127.

Lu Pi 魯丕 [Shuling 叔陵] (37-111); Youfufeng. A man of family, Lu Pi's grandfather Kuang 匡 was a noted minister under Wang Mang. Lu Pi's father became Administrator of Wuling under Emperor Guangwu, but died in office when Lu Pi was only seven. Lu Pi and his elder brother Gong were admired for their extravagant display of mourning.

In 46, at the age of ten, Lu Pi went with Gong and their mother to the Imperial University at Luoyang. Like his brother, he studied the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Lu, but he was also expert on the History and had a good knowledge of all the classics. Devoted to learning, Lu Pi had small time for social contact, but he did teach privately and was recognised as one of the leading scholars of his day. He later returned to his home country, where he became an Investigator and then Officer of Merit in the commandery.

In 76, when the new Emperor Zhang called for nominations of Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright, the minister Liu Kuan recommended Lu Pi. Assessed as the best of a hundred candidates, he was appointed a Consultant and then a county magistrate in Nanyang. After just one year, he received the highest grading from the provincial office, and he was promoted to be Inspector of Qing. Lu Pi was concerned to promote good men and reluctant to inflict punishment, but in 82 he was found guilty of some crime and was sentenced to two years convict labour.

In 84 Lu Pi was recalled to office and became Chancellor of Zhao. He continued to teach more than a hundred students, and he was celebrated throughout the east of the empire for his knowledge of the classics. The king Liu Shang was evidently a superstitious man, and on one occasion he sought to avoid an illness by taking up residence in the offices for education. When Lu Pi refused permission, Liu Shang appealed to the emperor. Lu Pi argued that man's fate did not depend on such niceties as site, and the king's request confused the proper barriers. The court agreed, and when Emperor Zhang came on tour to the east Lu Pi was granted a special audience and was rewarded.

In 90 Lu Pi was transferred to be Administrator of Dong commandery, and then to Chenliu. In each territory he encouraged irrigation to improve the people's livelihood, and he sought out and recommended worthy gentlemen for office. After three years in Chenliu, however, he was found to have made a false nomination, and was again sent to two years convict service.

In 99 Lu Pi was once more recalled to office, and became a Palace Counsellor. The Palace Attendant Jia Kui recommended him as an intelligent man, worthy of high office, and Emperor He invited him to take part in debate with a group of scholars at court, including Jia Kui and Huang Xiang, Director of the Imperial Secretariat. Impressed with Lu Pi's arguments, the emperor awarded him a suit of special robes, and Lu Pi responded with an eloquent memorial. In 101 Lu Pi became a Palace Attendant, but retired some time later.

In 108 the new regent government of the Dowager Deng called for nominations of learned men, and her brother the General-in-Chief Deng Zhi recommended Lu Pi. He became Palace Attendant once more, was made a General of the Household, and was honoured as Thrice Venerable, a central figure in the annual ceremony of Serving the Aged at the Hall of the Circular Moat. He died in office at the age of seventy-five. -HHS 25/15:883-85*.

Lu Ping 魯平. Administrator of Chenliu in the 90s, Lu Ping invited the scholar recluse Li Chong to become his Officer of Merit. When Li Chong refused, Lu Ping became angry: he had him arrested at his school and forced him to act as headman at the county capital.

Some years later Li Chong and Lu Ping were both Academicians at the Imperial University. Whenever they met, Lu Ping paid respects to Li Chong. -HHS 81/71:2685.

Lu Qi 鹿旗 became Administrator of Ba commandery. -FSTY 6f:137.

Lu Qian 魯謙; Youfufeng. Son of the Excellency Lu Gong, Lu Qian became a gentleman cadet and was later a well-reputed Administrator of Longxi. -HHS 25/15:883.

Lu Qian 陸謙; Kuaiji. XTS 73B:2966 says that Lu Qian was a son of Lu Chou and a brother of Lu Su.

Lu Qin 盧禽; Anding. Elder brother of the pretender Lu Fang, in 26 he accompanied him to the court of the Shanyu Yu of the Xiongnu, where Lu Fang was enthroned as Emperor of Han. He may have remained in the north as a partial hostage, but he is not heard of again. -HHS 12/2:506.

Lu Run 路潤. In 29, as Wang Ba and the general Ma Wu were besieging Liu Yu and his supporter Zhou Jian at Chuihui in Pei, their ally Su Mao came to the relief. He captured Ma Wu's baggage, and Zhou Jian and Liu Yu then made a sortie which put Ma Wu to flight.

Wang Ba held his men back until the enemy had committed themselves to pursuit but then sent Lu Run and a few dozen volunteers from the rear of his camp to attack the enemy. Having cut off their hair to show their zeal, Lu Run and his comrades took the enemy by surprise and drove them away in disorder. -HHS 20/10:736; Bn 59:220.

Lu Shang 陸尚; Kuaiji. Grandson of Lu Kang, about 189 Lu Shang was named a gentleman cadet in reward for Lu Kang's success as Administrator of Lujiang. He was the first husband of the Lady Xu V, future concubine of Sun Quan, but died about 200. -HHS 31/21:1114, SGZ Wu 5:1197.

Lu Su 魯肅 [Zijing 子敬] (172-217); Xiapi. A man of wealthy family, Lu Su's father died when he was born and Lu Su was brought up by his grandmother. By the time he came of age the country was increasingly disturbed, and for his part Lu Su was both disorganised and extravagant. Within a few years he had lost much of his estates, but he had an excellent reputation for his patronage of scholars and his generosity to the poor.

When Zhou Yu, then in the service of Yuan Shu, came on a foraging expedition about 198, Lu Su invited him to take the contents of one of his two granaries. Zhou Yu was impressed, and the two men became close friends. Yuan Shu appointed him magistrate of his home county, but Lu Su foresaw his failure. young men and trained them in the use of arms collected many of the people and led them to join Zhou Yu and go to the south of the Yangzi; at one stage of the journey he was threatened by provincial troops, but drove them off with arrows.

Having brought the group to Danyang, Lu Su returned to his home country for the funeral of his grandmother, then returned to the south. He was uncertain whether to remain, but Zhou Yu introduced him to Sun Quan, whom he impressed by his plans to establish a state, based on the middle and lower Yangzi, which might remain its independence of the north. Zhang Zhao believed Lu Su was over-confident, but Sun Quan showed him favour and gave such gifts that he was wealthy once more. He became a confidential adviser and agent.

When Liu Biao died in 208, Sun Quan sent Lu Su to Jing province, ostensibly to bear condolences but in fact to spy out the situation. As Cao Cao came forward and Liu Biao's son and successor Liu Zong prepared to surrender, Lu Su told the condottiere Liu Bei that Sun Quan might support him against the invader. He returned to the south, and when Cao Cao called for surrender he persuaded Sun Quan to call Zhou Yu, and they determined on the strategy which led to the victory of the Red Cliffs.

As Zhou Yu was dying in 210, he nominated Lu Su to succeed him in command in the west. Lu Su's command, however, was only that of a colonel, he lacked Zhou Yu's prestige and authority, and he was concerned at the exposed nature of the territory in Jing province. He therefore persuaded Sun Quan to grant or "loan" Nan commandery to Liu Bei and himself became Administrator of Hanchang, a new commandery set up from the north of divided Changsha, facing Liu Bei's holdings. As a lieutenant-general he took part in the capture of Lujiang in 214, and he was then promoted to full general.

In 215, after Liu Bei had taken over in Yi province, Sun Quan sought "compensation" on the middle Yangzi, notably by the return of the alleged "loan" of Nan commandery which had been negotiated five years earlier. Liu Bei was unwilling, and Lu Su then faced Guan Yu while Lü Meng led a detached force to seize the southern commanderies. The confrontation did not result in full-scale war, and a new agreement allocated more territory to Sun Quan and set the Xiang River as the frontier of the two warlord states.

Two years later Lu Su died. He was mourned by Zhuge Liang in Shu-Han, and when Sun Quan took the imperial title in 229 he gave credit to Lu Su's long-term planning. On another occasion, he compared Lu Su unfavourably to Zhou Yu and to Lü Meng for his advice to cede part of Jing province to Liu Bei in 210; but in the circumstances of that time Lu Su's advice was probably best. It was only later, when Guan Yu over-extended himself to the north, that Lü Meng and Sun Quan had an opportunity not available before. - SGZ Wu 9:1267-72*; deC 90:303-310, 373-375.

Lu Su 陸肅; Kuaiji. XTS 73B:2966 says that Lu Su, son of Lu Chou and a brother of Lu Qian, was a county magistrate in Danyang.

Lu Wen 陸溫; Kuaiji. XTS 73B:2965 says that Lu Wen was a son of Lu Hong.

Lu Xu 陸續 [Zhichu 智初/知初]; Kuaiji. Son of Lu Huan and grandson of Lu Hong, Lu Xu was orphaned when he was young. He became a clerk in the commandery, and when the harvest failed one year he was sent to issue gruel. The Administrator Yin Xing was impressed by his careful report on each of the six hundred people who received rations. Lu Xu then became Attendant Officer of Yang province, but left on grounds of illness and returned to the commandery staff.

During investigation of the alleged conspiracy of Liu Ying, King of Chu, in 70, Yin Xing's name appeared on a list. He was taken to prison at Luoyang, while five hundred of his officers, including Lu Xu, were also brought in for interrogation. Fiercely tortured, more than half succumbed and died, but Lu Xu refused to change his plea of innocence.

Lu Xu's mother had followed him to the capital, and though she could not let him know she was there, she contrived to send in food for him. Despite his suffering, Lu Xu had shown no emotion, but when he saw the dish of food he wept, explaining that he knew it was from his mother because of the neat cubes of meat and the way she cut the vegetables using her thumb as a measure. Enquiries were made, and she was indeed waiting outside.

Impressed by such filial recognition, the prison officers reported the matter, and Emperor Ming pardoned Lu Xu and his fellows. Though they were proscribed from office for life, they were able to return home and Lu Xu died old. -HHS 81/71:2682-83*, XC 5:15b, XTS 73B:2966; Bn 67:34, Bn 76:50.

Lu Xu 魯旭 (d.192); Youfufeng. Possibly a son of Lu Qian, Lu Xu served as Administrator in several commanderies and then became Minister Coachman. In 190 he accompanied the court to Chang'an, and in 192 he joined the conspiracy led by Wang Yun which destroyed Dong Zhuo. As Li Jue and other former officers of Dong Zhuo captured the capital later that year, Wang Yun and Lu Xu were both killed. -HHS 25/15:883, SGZ 6:182.

HHS 95/5:3121 LC quotes a description by Cai Zhi of the enthronement of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling in 171. One of the participants in the ceremony was a member of the Imperial Secretariat who is cited only by his personal name of Xu. In HHSJJ at 3528, Hui Dong suggests that this may refer to Lu Xu.

Lu Xun 陸遜 [Boxin 伯信] (183-245); Wu. Son of Lu Jun 駿, his original personal name was Yi 議. His parents died when he was young, and Lu Xun accompanied his great-uncle Lu Kang to Lujiang. In 194, as Yuan Shu came to attack, Lu Kang sent Lu Xun and other members of his family back to their home country in Wu. Several years older than Kang's son Lu Ji, Lu Xun acted as his guardian.

Early in the 200s Lu Xun joined Sun Quan's staff, first at headquarters, then in command of military colonies north of Hangzhou Bay. By issuing grain in time of shortage, and encouraging agriculture, he attracted people from the wilderness, and he defeated the rebel bandit Pan Lin.

In 216 Lu Xun accompanied He Qi in his attack on You Tu in Poyang in Yuzhang. He was then made a colonel, stationed on the Yangzi near Sun Quan's capital Jianye, and married a daughter of Sun Ce. To consolidate the power and resources of the government, he encouraged the policy of expansion against Chinese escapees and the non-Chinese of the south. As Sun Quan approved the strategy, Lu Xun attacked the renegade Fei Zhan in Danyang and settled the hill country of the southeast.

In 219 Lü Meng and Sun Quan made secret plans to attack Guan Yu in Jing province, and as part of the deception, Lü Meng pretended to be ill and came back to Jianye. Not knowing his true intention, Lu Xun urged him to strike against Guan Yu, echoing the strategy which was already underway. Impressed by such energy and imagination, Lü Meng recommended he be given command in the west.

From this new position, Lu Xun wrote courteous and even obsequious letters to deceive Guan Yu. Then, as Guan Yu was committed in the north against Wei, Lü Meng came from behind with the main attack, while Lu Xun moved directly west. He defeated and forced the surrender of Liu Bei's local commanders, seized the entrance to the Gorges and so cut the lines of communication up the Yangzi to Yi province.

Lu Xun was made a general, enfeoffed as a marquis, and given military authority over Jing province. In 221, as Liu Bei came down the Gorges with a great army to avenge Guan Yu and retake the territory, Sun Quan appointed Lu Xun as Commander-in-Chief 大都督 with the Staff of Authority.

Several senior officers were jealous of his promotion, and many urged him to counter-attack quickly, but Lu Xun waited through spring and summer until Liu Bei had extended a line of camps along the banks of the Yangzi. He then attacked from the flanks with fire. His victory was dramatic and decisive, much of the enemy force was destroyed, and quantities of equipment were taken. Liu Bei himself barely avoided capture, and his northern column was compelled to flee north and surrender to Wei.

Lu Xun now held great power, not only through his military command in Jing province, but also as Sun Quan's closest adviser. As Sun Quan took the imperial title in 229, Lu Xun became guardian to the Heir Sun Deng, and in 244 he was made Imperial Chancellor, still with authority in the west. In the following year, now aged in his early 60s, he was reprimanded for supporting the Heir Sun He 和 against his brother and rival Sun Ba 霸: angry and indignant, he died.

The Lu family continued its prosperity through the history of the state of Wu and the dynasty of Jin. -SGZ Wu 13:1343-54*; deC 90:334-339, 419-424, 502-503, Mather 76:555.

Lu Xun 陸遜, wife of: see the Lady Sun 孫 VII.

Lu Yi 陸議 see Lu Xun 陸遜.

Lu Yin 陸惇 see sub Lu Yu 陸紆.

Lu Yu 陸紆 [Shupan 叔盤]; Kuaiji/Wu. Son of Lu Bao and a substantial scholar, Lu Yu became Colonel of the City Gates at Luoyang. -SGZ Wu 13:1343.

XTS 73B:2968 says that Lu Yu had five sons: Dang 黨, Yin 惇, Li 颯, Yun 贇 and Jun 駿. Jun was the father of Lu Xun, minister of Wu, but nothing is recorded of the others.

Lu Yu 盧毓 [Zijia 子家] (183-257); Zhuo. Lu Yu's father Lu Zhi died when Li Yu was ten, and his two elder brothers also perished in the early stages of the civil war at the end of Han. During the famine which accompanied the fighting between Yuan Shao and Gongsun Zan in the 190s, Lu Yu cared for his brothers' widows and children, while he also became known as a scholar. In 211 he was appointed to the suite of Cao Pi.

Lu Yu then served as Registrar in the administration for Ji province, the fief territory of Cao Cao. When a man of leading family fled from Cao Cao's jurisdiction, it was required by regulations that the Lady Bo his wife should be executed, but Lu Yu argued she should be spared, for the marriage was recent and she had never lived with her husband. Impressed by his erudition, Cao Cao accepted the advice. He took Lu Yu onto his staff in the office of Imperial Chancellor, and in 216 Lu Yu joined the Secretariat of the royal state of Wei.

Lu Yu held senior provincial positions under the government of Cao Pi, returning to the Secretariat under Cao Rui; his recommendation was critical for senior appointments. In 239, out of favour with Cao Shuang, he was demoted to a ministry, but was restored and enfeoffed by Sima Yi. In 256 Lu Yu was made an Excellency, but he died in the following year. -SGZ 22: 650-52*, JS 44:1255.

Lu Yun 陸贄 see sub Lu Yu 陸紆.

Lu Zhao 路招. An officer of Cao Cao, as Yuan Shu was attempting to leave the south in the summer of 199 and join his kinsman Yuan Shao in the north, Lu Zhao was sent with his colleague Zhu Ling to support Liu Bei in intercepting him. Then Yuan Shu died, and Zhu Ling and Lu Zhao went back to the north, leaving Liu Bei in charge of Xu province. Liu Bei rebelled soon afterwards.

As Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208, Lu Zhao was given command over one of seven divisions in Nanyang under the Area Commander Zhao Yan. In 212 Lu Zhao and Zhu Ling were at Chang'an under the command of Xiahou Yuan in operations against the remnants of the north-western warlords. -SGZ 9:270, 23:668, SGZ Shu 2:874.

Lu Zhao 陸昭. Assistant Administrator of Kuaiji for Sun Ce in the late 190s, Lu Zhao arranged a meeting with the hermit scholar Gao Dai to discuss Zuo zhuan. The occasion went very badly. -SGZ Wu 1:1109.

Lu Zhi 路芝. A county magistrate in Qi in the middle 150s, Lu Zhi committed a number of faults. Then a son killed the murderer of his father in a vendetta; the Administrator Qiao Xuan was going to pardon him for his filial piety, but Lu Zhi executed him. Knowing Qiao Xuan would be angry, he tried to run away, but was caught and flogged by bastinado until he died. -XC 2:15b, HHSJJ 51/41:1831.

Lu Zhi 盧植 [Zihan 子幹] (d.192); Zhuo. Eight feet two inches tall [190 cm], with a deep, bell-like voice, Lu Zhi studied both Old and New Text Confucianism under Ma Rong. Noted for morality, he disliked frivolous essays and rhapsodies, and though Ma Rong led an active private life he admired Lu Zhi's self-control; Lu Zhi, on the other hand, had great capacity for wine. Refusing several nominations for office, he taught at home as a private scholar, but in 168 he presented a memorial criticising the General-in-Chief Dou Wu for awarding fiefs to himself and his family.

About 170 Lu Zhi came to the University as an Academician, and he compiled commentaries to the Classic of History and to Ritual. He supported and shared in the project of Cai Yong and others to engrave a definitive edition of the classics, including History and Ritual, onto stone.

Lu Zhi's scholarly work was interrupted in 175

when he was appointed Administrator of Jiujiang to deal with rebellion among the non-Chinese. He resigned on account of ill health, but his record as an honest and generous ruler meant that he was entrusted soon afterwards with a similar mission to Lujiang.

About this time, probably in 177, the court commissioned a further instalment of the dynastic history Han ji 漢記. Lu Zhi was named a Consultant and appointed to the committee, whose other members were Ma Midi, Cai Yong, Yang Biao and Han Yue. The work included annals for emperors An and Shun, for the infants Chong and Zhi and for Emperor Huan, with biographies updated to the end of the reign of Emperor Huan in 168. It was at this time that the history acquired the name Dongguan Hanji 東觀漢記, from the Eastern Pavilion 東觀 of the Southern Palace where the library and workrooms were located.

Lu Zhi later became a Palace Attendant and then joined the Imperial Secretariat. In 178 he used the occasion of an eclipse to urge pardon for members of the Proscribed Faction, and he criticised the current procedures for appointment, including Emperor Ling's policy of selling offices for the benefit of his private treasury. His advice was not well received.

When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out in 184, Lu Zhi was commissioned as General of the Gentlemen of the Household of the North with the Staff of Authority, commanding a force made up of troops from the Northern Army, the strategic reserve at the capital, Wuhuan auxiliaries and militia levies. He attacked Zhang Jue, killed or captured over ten thousand of the rebels and drove their leaders to refuge at Guangzong city in Julu. As he was preparing equipment to storm the place, however, he was slandered by the eunuch Zuo Feng, to whom he had refused to pay a bribe and who now reported that Lu Zhi had no will to fight. Emperor Ling ordered his recall and arrest; he was brought to the capital in a cage cart, and was sentenced to death less one degree.

A few months later Huangfu Song, victor over the Yellow Turbans, urged Lu Zhi's merits and achievements and obtained his release. Lu Zhi once more entered the Secretariat.

Following the death of Emperor Ling in 189, Lu Zhi warned the General-in-Chief He Jin against bringing Dong Zhuo to the capital. When He Jin was killed, Lu Zhi prevented the eunuchs from seizing the Dowager, and when they sought to escape with the young emperor Liu Bian and his brother Liu Xie, he went in pursuit. Supported by a posse under Min Gong, he brought the imperial children back to Luoyang.

Dong Zhuo seized power and announced his intention to replace the Little Emperor by his younger half-brother, the future Emperor Xian. Lu Zhi spoke against the proposal, and without intervention by his old colleague and friend Cai Yong, now in Dong Zhuo's favour, he would have been killed.

Now aged almost sixty and suffering from illness, Lu Zhi fled from Luoyang. Dong Zhuo sent men after him, but he escaped into the hill country north of his home in Zhuo. He lived there in seclusion; the warlord Governor Yuan Shao asked him to act as his military adviser, but he took no further part in affairs.

When Lu Zhi died in 192, he ordered his family to bury him in the simplest fashion, in a plain shroud without a coffin. He left a quantity of essays, inscriptions, memorials and historical writings, and he was celebrated as a fine Confucian. As Cao Cao passed that way in 207 he had ceremonies held at Lu Zhi's tomb. -HHS 64/54:2113-19*.

Lu [Zhongweng] 路仲翁. A fine scholar, Lu Zhongweng stayed at home, but students came long distances to attend his teaching. He was later an Academician at the University in Luoyang. -XC 6:14a.

Lu'er 盧兒 "Black Boy" see Yin Li 尹禮.

Lü 呂 [personal name unknown] (161-221); Nanyang. A general of Wei who served against Guan Yu in 219, he was rewarded with enfeoffment and commemorated with a stele at his death. -LS 19:14b-16b.

Lü Ba 呂霸; Runan. After Lü Meng's death in 219, Sun Quan gave three hundred families and a quantity of land to his son Lü Ba, so he could care for his tomb. -SGZ Wu 9:1280.

Lü Bing 呂并. A settler in an agricultural colony in Youfufeng, about 210 Lü Bing led a rebellion, occupied the city of Chencang, and proclaimed himself a general. Cao Cao's Area Commander Zhao Yan brought an army and destroyed him. -SGZ 23:669.

Lü Bo 呂勃. In 144 Lü Bo was a Counsellor Remonstrant. Following the death of Emperor Shun in that year, the regent government of his Dowager Liang proposed that his funerary tablet should be given a higher position than that of his short-lived predecessor the Young Emperor Liu Long, an infant who reigned just a few months in 106. This would mean that in a future generation Liu Long's tablet would be removed first.

The Minister of Ceremonies Ma Fang endorsed the idea, but Lü Bo argued that the proper order should be kept, and when the matter was opened for discussion at court the Minister Herald Zhou Ju agreed with him. The precedence was therefore maintained in order of chronology and dynastic descent. -HHS 61/51:2029-30.

Lü Bu 呂布 [Fengxian 奉先] (d.198); Wuyuan. An expert horseman, archer and fighting man, Lü Bu became the protégé of the military commander Ding Yuan, joined his staff and accompanied him to Luoyang in 189. When Dong Zhuo seized power, he was concerned about Ding Yuan's influence, but persuaded Lü Bu to kill his patron.

Lü Bu then became a confidant of Dong Zhuo and commanded his bodyguard. He was granted enfeoffment and they took oath as father and son. As the capital was moved to Chang'an in 190, Lü Bu was sent to plunder the imperial tombs about Luoyang. In 191 his disruptive conduct caused his commander Hu Zhen to be defeated by Sun Jian, and he was in turn defeated by Sun Jian and driven from Luoyang.

Dong Zhuo sometimes swore at Lü Bu, and on one occasion he threw a dagger at him. An enthusiastic womanizer, Lü Bu was also concerned that Dong Zhuo might learn of his liaison with a woman of the palace. In 192, therefore, he was persuaded by Wang Yun to join a conspiracy against Dong Zhuo, and he ambushed and killed his master.

Lü Bu now joined Wang Yun in government at Chang'an, but their regime lasted barely a month before troops led by Dong Zhuo's former officer Li Jue stormed the city and killed Wang Yun. Lü Bu fled to Yuan Shu in the east, but his men were unruly, Yuan Shu disapproved, and Lü Bu went to Zhang Yang in Henei. When Li Jue offered a reward for his capture, Lü Bu fled to Yuan Shao in Ji province.

In 193 he joined Yuan Shao's attack on the Black Mountain bandits, but his men again acted brutally, and Yuan Shao was angry. At Lü Bu's request, Yuan Shao named him Director of Retainers and sent him back to Luoyang, but he also ordered the escort to kill him. Lü Bu was suspicious: he had a man play on the zither in his tent and went himself into hiding. When his tent was attacked and destroyed he made his escape, and none of the men dared pursue him.

Lü Bu returned to Zhang Yang, calling on Zhang

Miao in Chenliu as he passed.

When Cao Cao attacked Tao Qian in Xu province in 194, his officer Chen Gong persuaded Zhang Miao and others to invite Lü Bu into Yan province. At first they did well: only three cities held out for Cao Cao, and he suffered several defeats. After several months fighting, notably about the city of Puyang in Dong commandery, both sides were exhausted and made a halt, but in 195 Cao Cao became increasingly successful. By the summer of that year Lü Bu had been driven away and took refuge with Liu Bei in Xu province.

In 196, however, as Yuan Shu attacked Liu Bei from the south, Lü Bu changed sides and seized Liu Bei's headquarters and his family at Xiapi. Liu Bei surrendered to Lü Bu. Lü Bu now quarrelled with Yuan Shu, so he restored some of Liu Bei's authority and renamed him Inspector of Yu province, subordinate to himself as Governor of Xu province.

Soon afterwards Lü Bu agreed to a new alliance with Yuan Shu, to be confirmed by marriage of his son to a daughter of Yuan Shu. Yuan Shu sent an army against Liu Bei, but Lü Bu, concerned that one of his two rivals might destroy the other and become too powerful, intervened to save Liu Bei. In a celebrated feat of archery, he hit the spike on a halberd set above a gate of the camp, so impressing Yuan Shu's men that they withdrew. On the other hand, when Liu Bei gathered more troops, Lü Bu turned against him once more and drove him away to Cao Cao.

Cao Cao aided Liu Bei to re-establish himself in the southeast, and the tripartite contest continued. In 197, with another flurry, Lü Bu first agreed to marry his daughter to a son of Yuan Shu, then broke from him to make formal submission to the Han government under Cao Cao.

By this time, however, Cao Cao had determined to eliminate the erratic warrior. In 198 he sent Xiahou Dun with an army to assist Liu Bei; both men were defeated, so in the autumn he went himself. Lü Bu was not a good co-ordinator, his commanders operated separately and were repeatedly defeated in detail, and he was driven back into the city of Xiapi. In a last-minute attempt to restore the marriage alliance with Yuan Shu, he made an unsuccessful sortie carrying the girl on his saddle-bow, but although he received some support, a group of his officers opened the city and Lü Bu was captured.

Lü Bu tried to persuade Cao Cao to accept him as a subordinate, but Liu Bei spoke against him, and Cao Cao hardly needed advice to rid himself of an untrustworthy nuisance. Lü Bu was strangled. -SGZ 7:219-27*, HHS 75/65:2444-52*.

Lü Bu 呂布, wife of. In 198, when Lü Bu was besieged by Cao Cao at Xiapi city, his officer Chen Gong proposed that he leave him and Gao Shun to hold the city, while he led a sortie on Cao Cao's line of supply. The Lady warned him not to trust the two men, and Lü Bu gave up the idea. -SGZ 7:227-28, HHS 75/65:2450.

Lü Bu 呂布; daughter of. In 196 she was betrothed to a son of Yuan Shu, but when Yuan Shu took the imperial title in 197, Lü Bu was persuaded to change his mind. The young woman was already on the road, but Lü Bu had her brought back, cancelled the match and sent Yuan Shu's envoy to Cao Cao for execution.

In the following year, as Lü Bu was besieged by Cao Cao in Xiapi he sought to revive the alliance with Yuan Shu. Tying his daughter to his horse, he attempted to fight his way out and deliver her to her promised spouse. He failed to get through, and the city fell soon afterwards. -SGZ 7:227.

Lü Cang 呂倉. In 108 Lü Cang was a Consultant at court when Fan Zhun, head of the Imperial Censorate, proposed a commission of enquiry into the eastern provinces to assess the causes of local distress and unrest and the means by which they might be alleviated. The policy was adopted, and while Fan Zhun was named an acting Household Counsellor and sent to Ji province, Lü Cang went to Yan. Fan Zhun established public granaries, arranged relief, and settled a number of the wandering people. Lü Cang's commission no doubt gave him comparable responsibility, but the histories have no further account of him. -HHS 5:209, 32/22:1128.

Lü Chang 呂常; Zuopingyi. A county magistrate in Yingchuan in 118, Lü Chang initiated the project for a stele to honour Mount Song. -Nagata 94:58-59 and see sub Zhu Chong.

Lü Chang 呂常; Nanyang. Having served before under Liu Yan, Lü Chang went with him into Yi province when he was appointed Governor there in 188. He died there in the early 190s. -SGZ Shu 9.988.

Lü Chong 呂种 (d.52). In 49 Lü Chong was a major on the staff of Ma Yuan during the campaign against the non-Chinese of Wuling. Ma Yuan died, but the enemy were ready to surrender, so the senior adjutant Zong Jun forged an imperial edict, and sent Lü Chong to the enemy camp to persuade them to terms. Lü Chong then became a provisional magistrate in the newly-occupied territory.

At an earlier time, Ma Yuan had warned Lü Chong of the dangers his kinsmen Wang Pan and Wang Su were running by emphasising their wealth and the numbers of their retainers. After the death of the Lady Guo, former empress of Guangwu, in 52, the emperor was persuaded that Wang Su was a danger, and he ordered the arrest and execution of all his associates. Lü Chong was caught up in the purge; as he went to execution he praised Ma Yuan's foresight. -HHS 41/31: 1412, 24/14:851.

Lü Dai 呂岱 [Dingong 定公] (161-256); Guangling. Having held local office in his county and commandery, Lü Dai moved south of the Yangzi during the troubles of the 190s. When Sun Quan took power in 200, Lü Dai went to him and was made an assistant magistrate in Wu. On a tour of inspection, Sun Quan found his stores and legal administration in perfect order, and he appointed him to his personal staff. Lü Dai was later sent out as magistrate in Kuaiji, and he raised more than a thousand good soldiers there.

About 205 Lü Dai was sent as a colonel under Jiang Qin to put down rebellion on the southeast coast, and was then promoted to be a General of the Household. In 211 he was sent on an abortive mission to seek alliance with Zhang Lu in Hanzhong.

In 215 Lü Dai led a combined force to seize Changsha and Guiyang, received the surrender of Liu Bei's and Guan Yu's officers there, and destroyed a later rising by loyalists in the south-eastern hills. He was then made Administrator of Luling commandery, established from the south of Yuzhang.

In 220 Lü Dai succeeded Bu Zhi as Inspector of Jiao province in the far south and put down a series of disturbances. He was made a general and enfeoffed.

When the local warlord Shi Xie died in 226, his sons Shi Hui and others sought to maintain themselves independently. Lü Dai promised them good treatment if they submitted, but when they duly came to his camp he executed them. He now took over the whole region, and also sent envoys south to obtain tribute from the states of Funan, Linyi and Tangming.

In 231 Lü Dai was brought back to Jing province, where he held civil and military office. He became a chief general, and in 252 he became Grand Marshal under Sun Liang. With no concern for private or family interest, he was noted for his honesty and plain living. He died at the age of ninety-six. -SGZ Wu 15:1383-87*; deC 90:443-449.

Lü Fan 呂範 [Ziheng 子衡] (d.228); Runan. Though not of wealthy background, Lü Fan was a fine-looking man and held local office in his county when he was still young. He sought to marry a young woman of the prosperous Liu clan [the Lady Liu 劉 XIII]; the mother demurred, but the father was confident Lü Fan would do well, and he approved the match.

In the early 190s Lü Fan went south to Jiujiang to avoid the civil war. He met Sun Ce and brought a hundred retainers to join him. Sun Ce had him go to Guangling to collect his mother the Lady Wu and his brothers. Tao Qian the Governor of Xu province was not fond of the Sun family and suspected Lü Fan was a spy sent by Yuan Shu. He had him arrested, but a group of Lü Fan's followers managed to rescue him and Lü Fan returned to Sun Ce.

Lü Fan and Sun He were Sun Ce's closest companions, and he treated them as members of his family. They accompanied him on campaign in Lujiang and then south of the Yangzi in 195. Lü Fan held magistrate appointments in Danyang and dealt with the local people of the hills, but then took service as adjutant (都督 dudu) for Sun Ce; though this was a lower rank, Lü Fan argued that it was essential for the future of the enterprise for administration to be properly ordered.

As Sun Ce turned on White Tiger Yan in 197, he sent Lü Fan on an expedition, probably by sea, to drive away Cao Cao's agent Chen Yu in Guangling. Lü Fan took part in campaigns against Zu Lang and Taishi Ce in Danyang, then against Huang Zu in Jiangxia in 199, followed by the conquest and occupation of Yuzhang.

As Sun Ce was killed in 200, Lü Fan returned to Wu for the funeral, and he remained at headquarters for several years in association with Zhang Zhao. He accompanied the army to defeat Cao Cao at the Red Cliffs in 208 and was later promoted to be a general and stationed on the Yangzi by the Poyang region.

After the destruction of Guan Yu and the conquest of Jing province, Sun Quan moved his headquarters there and sent Lü Fan back to Danyang, as Administrator and Area Commander eastwards to the sea. When Wei attacked in 223 there was a period of confusion as a storm wrecked several ships under Lü Fan's command, but the line of the Yangzi was held and Lü Fan was then named Governor of Yang province. He was to be appointed Grand Marshal in 228, but died before the seal was conferred; Sun Quan held mourning for him and had the insignia awarded posthumously.

Though scrupulously honest in his accounting, Lü Fan was personally extravagant, He matched He Qi in display, but his troops were always in good order and he was well respected; Sun Quan refused to hear any criticism of him. -SGZ Wu 11:1309-11*.

Lü Fang 呂放. A client of Liang Shang, about 136 Lü Fang was Prefect of Luoyang. He reported the poor conduct of Liang Shang's son Liang Ji, chief of police at the capital, and Liang Shang reprimanded him.

Liang Ji had Lü Fang killed, but concealed his involvement by claiming the murder was the result of some private quarrel. He arranged for Lü Fang's brother Lü Yu to be appointed in his stead and obliged him to arrest and execute over a hundred of his brother's household. -HHS 34/24:1178-79.

Lü Gai 呂蓋 [Junyu 君玉 or Junshang 君上]; Henan. In 97 Lü Gai was promoted from Minister of the Household to be Excellency over the Masses; he held that position until the winter of 101.

In 100 the Grand Commandant Zhang Pu laid a complaint against the Director of Retainers Yan Cheng for his investigation of clerks in the offices of the Excellencies, and Emperor He called a full court assembly to consider the matter. Lü Gai argued that Zhang Pu should have known better than to attack the Director of Retainers, who was fully entitled to carry out an investigation, and that he had set a poor example to the empire. Zhang Pu was dismissed. -HHS 4:184-89; HHS 45/35:1533.

Lü Gong 呂公 see Lü Jie 呂介.

Lü Gong 呂貢. In 219 Lü Gong was Cao Cao's Inspector of Yu province. As Sun Quan attacked along the Huai, Lü Gong brought troops to support Wen Hui the Inspector of Yang province. Soon afterwards Guan Yu attacked up the Han, and Cao Cao called Lü Gong and his men to assist the defence on that front. -SGZ 15:479.

Lü Guo 呂國 [Wenbao 文寶]; Youfufeng. Commandery Assistant of Wudu, in 171 Li Gong sponsored a stele to commemorate the road construction work of the Administrator Li Yu. -LS 4:10a.

Lü He 呂合; Kuaiji. About 205 Lü He and Qin Lang were leaders of rebellion on the southeast coast. The trouble was put down by Sun Quan's general Jiang Qin, and both men were captured. -SGZ Wu 10:1286.

Lü Jie 呂介. In 192 Lü Jie was an officer under Huang Zu in the service of Liu Biao. His troop was attacked by Yuan Shu's commander Sun Jian, and one of his men killed Sun Jian. -HHS 74/64B:2421, SGZ Wu 1:1101 [as Lu Gong 公].

Lü Ju 閻舉; Jiangxia. Well-treated by Sun Jiao, Sun Quan's commander in the west about 215, Lü Ju was a devoted officer, and he later served Sun Jiao's brother Huan with similar commitment. -SGZ Wu 6:1208.

Lü Kai 呂凱 [Jiping 季平]; Yongchang. About 220 Lü Kai was Officer of Merit in his commandery, and from the early 220s he maintained defence against the local leader Yong Kai who was supported by Wu. When Zhuge Liang came on his southern expedition in 225 he had him enfeoffed and appointed Administrator, but Lü Kai was soon afterwards killed by insurgents. -SGZ Shu 13:1046-48*; Fang 52:160.

Lü Kuang 呂曠; Dongping. In 203, as Cao Cao assisted Yuan Tan to attack Yuan Shang, Lü Kuang and Gao Xiang, officers of Yuan Shang, prepared to join him. Yuan Tan, however, sought to recruit them to his own service and secretly gave them seals as generals. They reported this approach to Cao Cao, who enfeoffed both men, and now had an excuse to turn against Yuan Tan. -HHS 74/64B:2414, SGZ 1:24, 6:202.

Lü Meng 呂孟 [Zhenji 真紀]; Guanghan. Lü Meng was known for his fine conduct. -HYGZ 3:39.

Lü Meng 呂蒙 [Ziming 子明] (178-219); Runan. About 195 Lü Meng and his family went south of the Yangzi to join his sister's husband Deng Dang, who became an officer under Sun Ce, and he accompanied Deng Dang on campaign against the hills people. Both Deng Dang and Lü Meng's mother protested at the danger, but Lü Meng argued that the family was poor and that military success was the only way to gain a position.

When one of Deng Dang's clerical officers slighted him on account of his youth, Lü Meng killed him. He took refuge for a time, but then gave himself up. He was granted pardon, and Sun Ce made him one of his personal attendants. Deng Dang died about 199 and Sun Ce allowed Lü Meng to take over his command with rank as a senior major.

As Sun Quan succeeded Sun Ce in 200, he held inspections in order to decide which of the smaller units of his army should be amalgamated. Lü Meng bought equipment for his men on credit, dressed them in red uniforms with bound leggings, and held a practice session for them to show their military skills. Sun Quan was impressed, and put more men under his command. Lü Meng did well in operations in Danyang, was promoted colonel and appointed as a magistrate.

In 208 Lü Meng commanded the van in the final attack on Huang Zu, and he killed the opposing commander Chen Jiu. As Huang Zu fled and was killed, Sun Quan promoted Lü Meng and awarded him ten million cash. Later that year he was with the army which defeated Cao Cao at the Red Cliffs.

When Xi Su, an officer of Yi province, came to surrender, his troops were allocated to Lü Meng. Lü Meng argued that Xi Su was worthy of command and should not suffer such a loss, so his men were returned to him. Some years later, he used the same argument in refusing to accept the troops of his late colleagues Cheng Dang, Song Ding and Xu Gu; despite Sun Quan's wishes, he was a firm supporter of the developing principle that a military unit was the possession and heritage of its commander. He was also generous and tolerant, putting up with the sneers of Cai Yi and even with the brutal and erratic behaviour of Gan Ning.

In 209, as the army was bogged down outside Jiangling in Nan commandery, Lü Meng advised Zhou Yu to send Gan Ning upstream to outflank the defenders, and he later suggested sending the major army to support Gan Ning, leaving Ling Tong with a skeleton force to hold the base. The operation was successful and Cao Ren withdrew to the north. Lü Meng was appointed as a lieutenant-general and magistrate of Xunyang, a strategic county on the Yangzi at the frontier of Jing and Yang provinces.

When Lü Meng began his career, he had paid small attention to scholarship or literary skills, but Sun Quan encouraged him to study, arguing that he needed more than a quick wit and military ability, and he set a reading list of the classics, histories and books on the art of war. When Lu Su succeeded Zhou Yu as commander in the west in 210, he came past Xunyang and was greatly impressed by the improvement in Lü Meng and by the quality of his planning. He paid his respects to Lü Meng's mother, and the two men became close friends.

About 211 Lü Meng attacked Cao Cao's commander Xie Qi, drove him away, and received the surrender of several of his officers and their followers. In 212

he took part in operations north of the Yangzi towards the Huai, and he encouraged Sun Quan to establish a fortified bridge-head at Ruxu in Lujiang. In 214 he joined Gan Ning in storming Huan city, capturing Cao Cao's local commander Zhu Guang. He was named Administrator of Lujiang, with increased troops, but continued in station at Xunyang, from where he put down local insurrections; Huan city was now an isolated outpost.

In 215, as Sun Quan pressed Liu Bei for a more equal division of Jing province, Lu Meng was sent with a detached force to the south. He persuaded Liu Bei's administrators of Changsha and Guiyang to submit, then tricked He Pu the Administrator of Lingling into surrendering. He then joined Lu Su to hold off Guan Yu, and after the settlement he returned to Xunyang, now with two fief cities to provide personal revenue.

Later that year Lü Meng accompanied the main army in the disastrous attack on Hefei, though he personally did well in the rearguard. When Cao Cao attacked south across the Huai early in 217 Lü Meng shared command of the defence about Ruxu with Jiang Qin. He repelled the attack and was promoted to full general.

A few months later Lu Su died, and Lü Meng took over in the west as Administrator of Hanchang, the north of Changsha, with four fief cities. Facing Guan Yu, he made every effort to reassure him of their alliance, but he discussed plans for a surprise attack with Sun Quan. In 219, as Guan Yu attacked Cao Cao's positions north up the Han River, the opportunity came. Lü Meng was ill, but he took advantage of that circumstance, withdrawing to Sun Quan's headquarters as a means to set Guan Yu's mind at ease but meanwhile preparing for the offensive. In the winter, disguising much of his force as a merchant fleet, he struck westwards up the Yangzi, seized Guan Yu's base garrisons, and cut him off from Yi province. The conquest was accompanied by generous treatment to secure support from the local people, and as Guan Yu returned from the north he was isolated, captured and killed.

Lü Meng had taken active command of the invasion, and had secured the whole of Jing province for his master, but his illness was now severe. Named Administrator of Nan commandery, he received great rewards of cash and was due to be enfeoffed by the Han court controlled by Cao Cao, but before the documents arrived he entered his last agony. Sun Quan watched him constantly, through a hole in the wall so as not to disturb him, and when there was a brief recovery he issued an amnesty in celebration. Soon afterwards, however, Lü Meng suffered a relapse and died, but not before he had given orders for all his gifts to be returned to the public treasury; there was barely enough even for his funeral.

Sun Quan granted land and followers to Lü Meng's sons so they could care for his tomb, and in later discussion he ranked him second only to Zhou Yu among his generals. -SGZ Wu 9:1273-80*; deC 90:385-407.

Lü Mu 呂睦; Runan. After Lü Meng's death in 219 Sun Quan gave three hundred families and a quantity of land to his son Lü Ba in order that he could care for his tomb. Lü Ba died and was succeeded by his elder brother Lü Zong, and after the death of Lü Zong the estate passed to his younger brother Lü Mu. -SGZ Wu 9:1280.

Lü Qian 呂虔; Pengcheng. Administrator of Zhuo commandery about 180, Lü Qian was a leading sponsor of a stele at the tomb of his former teacher Wen Mu of Runan. -SJZ 23:9a.

Lü Qian 呂虔 [Zike 子恪]; Rengcheng. As Cao Cao took over Yan province in 192 he heard that Lü Qian was clever and brave. He appointed him an Assistant Officer and gave him command of a garrison in Shanyang.

When a mutiny broke out among the militia commanded by the colonel Du Song in Donghai, the rebels planned to make alliance with the bandit leader Chang Xi. Cao Cao sent Lü Qian to take Du Song's place. As soon as he arrived Lü Qian invited the ring-leader Gui Mu and some dozens of his leading associates to a feast. He passed the wine around until they were drunk, then called his own men from hiding and had every one of his guests killed. He encountered no resistance thereafter among the rank-and-file.

Cao Cao then appointed Lü Qian Administrator of Taishan. Because of the troubled times, many people had hidden away in the rugged terrain of the region, while Guo Zu, Gongsun Du and others who had received titles from Yuan Shao had positions in the mountains from which they raided the settled population.

Lü Qian came with his household troops and offered generous and honest government. Guo Zu and his fellows came to submit, and the people who had taken refuge in the wilderness returned to their farms. Lü Qian chose the strongest among them to be soldiers, and the troops from Taishan became the finest in the empire.

In 206 Lü Qian joined Zang Ba under the command of Xiahou Yuan to attack the Yellow Turban Xu He of Ji'nan. After a dozen engagements, killing and capturing thousands of people, the rebellion was put down. Cao Cao then gave Lü Qian command of a combined force from the commanderies of Qing province and sent him to attack the bandit Li Tiao in Donglai, on the tip of the Shandong peninsula. He was successful, and Cao Cao issued an ordinance in praise of Lü Qian's achievements, granting him formal nomination as Abundant Talent and appointing him a Commandant of Cavalry. Continuing in Taishan, Lü Qian maintained effective government there for over thirty years; he was admired for both his authority and his leniency where required.

As Cao Pi came to the throne he promoted Lü Qian to be a major-general and granted him a village marquisate. He then transferred him to be Inspector of Xu province with rank as a general. He was admired for his ability to recommend and appoint good men to office, while still dealing firmly with occasional rebels. Lü Qian's fief was increased in the time of Cao Rui. He died about 240. -SGZ 18:540-41*.

Lü Qiang 呂羌. At the end of Former Han or in the time of Wang Mang Lü Qiang and Liang Gong and Fan Sheng were fellow-students of the Book of Changes according to the system of Liangqiu He.

At the beginning of Later Han Lü Qiang became Administrator of Shanyang.

About 27 Emperor Guangwu proposed to appoint Fan Sheng to the chair for the Liangqiu school in the restored University. Fan Sheng replied that Lü Qiang and Liang Gong were both older than he and better scholars, and he urged that one of them be appointed, but Guangwu gave him the post. -HHS 36/26:1227; Bn 79:187.

Lü Qiang 呂彊/強 [Hansheng 漢盛] (d.184); Henan. A eunuch, Lü Qiang entered the imperial palace when he was young, became an Attendant at the Yellow Gates and then a Regular Attendant. Honest and loyal, with strong concern for the public good, he refused an offer of enfeoffment, and Emperor Ling eventually accepted his decision.

About 179 Lü Qiang sent in a memorial protesting at the extravagance and luxury of the court and the harem, at the dangers of excessive eunuch influence in government, and at the unfair treatment accorded to such loyal officials as Duan Jiong and Cai Yong. Though the emperor is said to have admired his good intentions, he made no changes. A second memorial, objecting to the transfer of public money into the imperial private treasury through a notional commission, was equally ineffective.

Following the outbreak of the Yellow Turban rebellion in 184, Huangfu Song proposed that the proscription of the men of Faction, which had been maintained since 169, should be ended. Emperor Ling asked Lü Qiang for his opinion, and Lü Qiang agreed, emphasising that a number of disaffected and resentful gentry might even join the rebels. The emperor was concerned, and promptly issued a general amnesty.

Zhao Zhong, Xia Yun and other senior eunuchs, concerned at this development, accused Lü Qiang of plotting against the throne, and the emperor sent guards with a summons. Lü Qiang was so angry at this sign of distrust that he killed himself; his enemies used this as proof of his guilt, and his family was arrested and stripped of their possessions. -HHS 78/68:2528-33*, 67/57:2189, XC 5:8a; deC 89:159-161, 168, 178.

Lü Qihong 閻丘弘 see Lüqiu Hong 閻丘弘.

Lü Rong 呂榮, the Lady. The Lady Lü was married to Xu Sheng, an immoral man and a gambler. She worked to support the family, notably her mother-in-law, and would admonish her husband with tears for his bad behaviour. On the other hand, when her father wanted to take her away from such an unsatisfactory household she insisted on remaining.

Eventually, touched by his wife's good will, Xu Sheng reformed, travelled to study, and became a reputable scholar. About 140 he was called to local appointment in the province, but on the road he was killed by a brigand. The killer was captured soon afterwards, just as Lü Rong was on her way to receive her late husband's coffin. She went to the provincial office and asked the Inspector Yin Yue for revenge on the man. As her wish was granted, she cut off the murderer's head and presented it as an offering to Xu Sheng's spirit.

Some time later the commandery was attacked by bandits, and one of them attempted to rape her. Lü Rong climbed a wall to escape, but the attacker chased her and threatened her with a knife. For the sake of her honour, she still refused, and he killed her. At that moment a fierce storm of wind, rain, thunder and darkness came and terrified the bandits. They kowtowed in apology to the Lady's corpse and prepared it for burial.

According to Latter Biographies of Worthy Women 列女後傳, cited by Hui Dong in HHSJ 84/74:3080, the Lady's attacker was a Yellow Turban named Chen Bao. The name could be correct, but the attribution to the Yellow Turbans is most unlikely: apart from the fact that the region of Wu was not affected by the rebellion, which broke out in 184, the Lady's husband died about 140, and it seems improbable she would have been a suitable target for rape forty years later. Latter Biographies, moreover, says that the Administrator Mi gave money to assist in the construction of her tomb as a memorial, and another source identifies this Administrator as Mi Bao, who held office in Wu in 154. There are several different versions of the story of Lü Rong, and she has a biography in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳. -HHS 84/74:2795*; Ch'ü 72:308.

Lü [Shudu] 呂叔都 (d.115). Probably a renegade Chinese, Lü Shudu was a commander in the service of the rebel Qiang leader Lianchang. With other groups in 115, he led an attack south into Yi province. The invaders were opposed by the General of the Household Yin Jiu in command of levies from Nanyang, and Lü Shudu was assassinated by a group of Chinese from Shu commandery. -HHS 87/77:2889.

Lü [Shugong] 呂叔公; Youfufeng. During the first half of the second century Lü Shugong was a teacher of the classics. -HYGZ 10C:174.

Lü Tiao 呂條; Henan. In the time of Emperor Shun Lü Tiao was a local bully. He killed the student Zhang Chang, but was himself slain by Zhang Chang's friends Ning Shu and Wang Yan. -HYGZ 10B:150.

Lü Wei 呂鯁 also as Li Wei 李鯁; Youfufeng. A man of gentry family, Lü Wei became warlord of his native Chencang county during the troubled period of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the invasion of the Red Eyebrows. He and other local leaders were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu, but in 27 Emperor Guangwu sent his general Feng Yi to attack them.

Lü Wei and his colleagues Zhang Han and Jiang Zhen asked Gongsun Shu for help, and in 28 Gongsun Shu sent an army under his officer Cheng Wu. Feng Yi defeated the allied forces and drove Cheng Wu away. He then turned against Lü Wei, put him to flight, and received the surrender of his former dependents.

Lü Wei fled south to take service directly under Gongsun Shu, and in 35 he was sent with Yan Cen to oppose the advance of Guangwu's general Zang Gong up the Fu River into Guanghan. They were heavily defeated and Lü Wei is not heard of again. -HHS 13/3: 522-23, 537, 17/7:647-48, 662; Bn 59:161, 191-192.

Lü Weihuang 吕威璜 (d.200). An officer in the escort of Yuan Shao's supply train near Guandu in 200, he was killed by Cao Cao's raiding party. -SGZ 1:22.

Lü Xiang 吕翔. HHS 74/64B:2414 records Gao Xiang 高翔 and Lü Kuang 吕曠 as officers of Yuan Shang who joined Cao Cao in 203. SGZ 1:24 and 6:202 have the surname of Gao Xiang as Lü, but this is probably dittography.

Lü Yan 吕晏; Yingchuan. In the spring of 23, as Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, brought Han troops into Yingchuan, Lü Yan went to join him. In the summer Wang Mang's local officer Feng Yi, an old friend of Lü Yan, was captured. Lü Yan helped him to meet Liu Xiu, and he became one of the leading generals of the new empire.

In 24, as Liu Xiu first engaged Wang Lang, he appointed Lü Yan, Yao Qi and Fu Kuan as officers under Deng Yu. Deng Yu considered that Yao Qi had the greater ability, so he promoted him to be a lieutenant-general with command of two thousand men, and placed Lü Yan and Fu Kuan under him with only a few hundred soldiers each. -HHS 17/7:639, 20/10:731.

Lü Yi 吕义 (d.251); Nanyang. Orphaned son of Lü Chang, about 220 Lü Yi was appointed an assistant officer of the salt monopoly of Shu-Han under Wang Lian. He later held high office in the state. -SGZ Shu 9.988.

Lü You 吕由 (d.200). An officer of Tao Qian in Xu in 193, he was defeated by Cao Ren. -SGZ 9:274.

Lü Yu 吕禹. About 136 the General-in-Chief Liang Ji had Lü Fang, Prefect of Luoyang, killed. Concealing his involvement by claiming the murder was the result of a domestic quarrel, Liang Ji had Lü Fang's brother Lü Yu appointed in his stead, and obliged him to arrest and execute over a hundred of Lü Fang's household. -HHS 34/24:1179.

Lü Zhang 吕章. Recommended by the Director of the Secretariat Han Leng about 90, Lü Zhang became a good official. -HHS 45/35:1535.

Lü Zhi 吕植. As a man who understood ritual and the classics, Lü Zhi acted as master of ceremonies when the Gengshi Emperor Liu Xuan was set upon the throne in 23. He was named a general, but in 24 he was persuaded to surrender by Cen Peng, officer of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. -DGJHJ 23:1b, HHS 17/7:654.

Lü Zizhi 閻子直; Dong. About 160 Lü Zizhi joined Sun Bin and Zhen Ziran to rescue Diwu Zhong from exile and death, then sheltered him for several years. -HHS 41/31:1404.

Lü Zong 吕琮; Runan. After Lü Meng's death in 219 Sun Quan gave three hundred families and a quantity of land to his son Lü Ba in order that he could care for his tomb. When Lü Ba died, his elder brother Lü Zong succeeded him. -SGZ Wu 9:1280.

Luan Ba 爨巴 [Shuyuan 叔元]. Luan Ba is the centre of a number of stories, many of them relating to the supernatural. HHS 57/47 says he came from Wei commandery but the third century text Shenxian zhuan, claiming him as a Taoist adept, says he was a man from Shu; as Luan Ba is not mentioned in Huayang guo zhi, this is doubtful.

In the time of Emperor Shun Luan Ba served in the imperial harem and became an Attendant at the Yellow Gates. He had a strong sense of honour, and did not engage in the corrupt intrigues of his colleagues.

He later regained his virility. Reporting this to the throne, he asked to quit his position, and he was appointed a gentleman cadet. After a series of lesser posts Luan Ba was sent to the south as Administrator of Guiyang. The people of this region were strongly influenced by shamans, but Luan Ba enforced marriage and funeral customs, established schools to develop Chinese culture and insisted that his local officials attend. After seven years he sought to retire on grounds of ill health, but the Inspector Li Gu, recognising his excellent service, secured his appointment as a Consultant at the capital.

In 142 Luan Ba was named an acting Household Counsellor and joined the special commission of eight sent out to observe the conduct of the empire; Luan Ba was despatched to Xu province. Little came of the project and government fell further into the hands of the empress's brother Liang Ji and their kinsmen.

Luan Ba then became Administrator of Yuzhang, where he again encountered local cults, this time based upon the mystic marriages of young men and women to spirits of the mountains and rivers, while shamans extorted money for their rituals. Luan Ba countered the shamans with his knowledge of magical arts, destroyed their shrines and freed the people from their former superstitions.

Transferred to be Chancellor of Pei, he soon afterwards returned to take a position in the Imperial Secretariat at the capital. At the death of Emperor Shun in 144 the officials in charge of his tomb planned to clear a number of lesser burials from the area. Luan Ba protested, but the regent Dowager Liang resented this and sent him to prison. He was allowed to commute his punishment, but was proscribed from office and sent back to his home country.

More than twenty years later, when Dou Wu and Chen Fan held power after the accession of Emperor Ling in 168, they called Luan Ba back to court as a Consultant. Soon afterwards the eunuchs overthrew Dou Wu and Chen Fan, and Luan Ba was viewed as one of the defeated faction. Sent away to be Administrator of Yongchang in the far southwest, he sought to refuse the office on grounds of ill health but was refused. He presented a memorial of complaint, and also protested the cruel treatment shown to Dou Wu and Chen Fan. The young emperor, furious, ordered his arrest, and Luan Ba killed himself. -HHS 57/47:1841-42*.

Luan He 樂賀; Wei. Son of Luan Ba, during the reign of Emperor Ling he was Administrator of Yunzhong. -HHS 57/47:1842.

Luan Kui 樂規; Youfufeng. A gentleman scholar, in the mid-180s Luan Kui received official appointment. -JSCB 18:3a; Ebrey 80:342.

Luan [Wenbo/Wenfu] 樂文博/傅. About 200 Luan Wenbo was a Confucian teacher in the region of Chang'an. -SGZ 11:365.

Lucheng 鹵承; non-Chinese. A leader of the Kunming people who lived south of the Dali Lake in Yongchang, in 77 Lucheng brought troops to assist imperial militia against the Ailao chieftain Lei'ao. Lei'ao was defeated and killed, and Lucheng was rewarded with ten thousand rolls of silk and title as a marquis. -HHS 86/76:2851.

Luhu 盧忽(d.121); Qiang. In the early 120s Luhu and Renliang were chieftains of the Dangjian tribe. They were undecided whether to follow the example of their colleague Jiwu, who raided Chinese territory in 120. The Protector Ma Xian defeated Jiwu's incursion, however, and early in 121 he approached the Dangjian territory, summoned Luhu, and cut off his head. -HHS 87/77:2892.

Lulei 陸類; non-Chinese. Chieftain of the Qiaoyao tribe of pygmies in the far southwest, in 107 Lulei came to the frontier of Yongchang commandery with three thousand people and sent messengers with tribute gifts of elephant tusks, water-buffalo and another species of cattle 封牛. -HHS 86/76:2851; Bn 67:78, Schafer 67:47.

Luo Gaiyan 駱蓋延 see Luo Yan 駱延.

Luo Hao 落皓 (d.187). Magistrate of Zhongmou in Henan, Luo Hao was killed by bandits from Yingchuan. -HHS 8:354.

Luo Gong 羅貢, the Lady; Shu. Daughter of Luo Qing, the Lady was married to Jing Ji, a man of a neighbouring county. He died young and the couple had had no children; since she was still young her father sought to arrange a marriage with a certain He Shi. The Lady wrote to him, however, that she would not return from her late husband's house.

Luo Qing had He Shi complain to the provincial office, which ordered the county to send the Lady back. She in turn appealed to the Inspector, who admired her fidelity and accepted her plea. -HYGZ 10A:140, 12:216.

Luo Heng 羅橫; Shu. In 115, responding to a call from the general Yin Jiu, Luo Heng joined Chen Sheng to assassinate Lü Shudu, the leader of rebel Qiang who had come to attack Yi province. Both men were enfeoffed and rewarded with money. -HHS 87/77:2889.

Luo Heng 羅衡 [Zhongbo 仲伯]; Shu. Former students of He Chang, in the late second century Luo Heng and his colleague Yang Ban were celebrated for their administration as county magistrates. Luo Heng in particular established such secure government that people would leave their horses and cattle at the side of the road "entrusted to Lord Luo" 屬羅公, and two counties erected temples in his honour. -HYGZ 10A:136.

Luo, Huanglong 黃龍羅 [Yellow Dragon Luo] see Huanglong Luo 黃龍羅.

Luo Hun 羅暉 [Shujing 叔景]; Jingzhao. The Sanfu jue of Zhao Qi describes how Luo Hun and Zhao Xi, of the mid-second century, sought to emulate the cao shu 草書 "Grass Style" calligraphy of the earlier masters Cui Yuan and Du Bodu. The great Zhang Zhi, however, considered their work clumsy, and inferior to his own. -HHS 64/54:2122-23, HYGZ 10C:174.

Luo Jun 駱俊 [Xiaoyuan 孝遠] (d.197); Kuaiji. A man of both civil and military ability, Luo Jun became a local officer of his commandery when he was young. He was then nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and after a period in the Imperial Secretariat he became Chancellor of Chen. He treated the parents of newborn children well, with gifts of grain and meat, and a great many children were named Luo in his honour.

As civil war broke out in the early 190s, the king Liu Chong raised an army, and he and Luo Jun maintained Chen as a place of security. Though they were neighbours of the imperial claimant Yuan Shu, they maintained independence for several years, but in 197 Yuan Shu asked for supplies and Luo Jun refused him. Yuan Shu sent retainers to kill him and Liu Chong by treachery. So the state of Chen was destroyed.

The people mourned Luo Jun as if he had been a parent. -HHS 50/40:1669-70, XC 8:9a, SGZ Wu 12:1334-35.

Luo Ling 羅陵. Assistant Magistrate in Jianwei, he died in that office. His friend Wei Bao, magistrate of a neighbouring county, left his post to escort the body home. -HHSJJ 26/16:973 Hui Dong quoting the local history Jingzhao jiushi.

Luo Meng 羅蒙; Nan. About 200 Luo Meng travelled to Yi province to avoid the civil war. He became Administrator of Guanghan under Liu Bei. -SGZ Shu 11:1008; Fang 65:483.

Luo Qing 羅倩; Shu. Luo Qing was the father of the Lady Luo Gong q.v.

Luo Shao 羅邵. As the remnant imperial court came under Cao Cao's control in 196, the Consultant Luo Shao was one of those enfeoffed for good service in the escape from Chang'an. -HHS 72/62:2342, HHJ 29:344.

Luo [Shujing] 羅叔景. At the end of Han, Luo Shujing and Zhao Yuansi were celebrated in the west of the empire for their calligraphy in the informal cao shu 草書 "Grass Style." -JS 36:1065.

Luo Su 駱肅 [Wensi 文思]; Nanyang. A former Administrator of Yizhou, in 156 Luo Su was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16a.

Luo Tong 駱俊 [Gongxu 公緒] (193-228); Kuaiji. Luo Tong was a son of Luo Jun, but after the death of his father at the hands of Yuan Shu in 197, his mother became a secondary wife 小妻 to Hua Xin the Administrator of Yuzhang. Hua Xin surrendered to Sun Ce in 199. He returned to the north in the following year, but Luo Tong remained in the south and went to live with his elder sister's family in Kuaiji; he became known for his sympathy with the refugees of good family who suffered in time of famine.

When Luo Tong was twenty, about 212, he was given probationary office as a county magistrate in Wu. He did so well that he was appointed to Sun Quan's staff and was married to a daughter of Sun Fu. He encouraged Sun Quan to choose men of quality for his service, and to ease the burden of taxation, corvée labour and military levies, particularly at a time of widespread epidemic. He became a General of the Household, with command of three thousand archers, and when Ling Tong died in 217 he took over his troops too.

In 222 Luo Tong took part in the campaign to defeat Liu Bei at the Yangzi Gorges. He was promoted lieutenant-general and enfeoffed, and held command of the Ruxu fortress in Lujiang. He presented many reports and recommendations, and much of his advice was followed. He died at the age of thirty-six. -SGZ Wu 12:1334-36*.

Luo Tong 駱俊, wife of: see the Lady Sun 孫 IX.

Luo Wei 羅威. A filial son, in cold weather he would lie on a mat to warm it, then let his mother take the place. -YSS:21b.

Luo Xian 羅憲 [Lingzi 令則] (d.280); Nan. Son of Luo Meng, even he was young Luo Xian was known for his scholarly ability and his skill in literary composition. About 220 he was appointed to the suite of Liu Shan, Heir of Shu-Han, and later rose to high rank. When Shu-Han surrendered, Luo Xian transferred his allegiance with dignity and was honoured by the Jin. -SGZ Shu 11:1008-09, JS 57:1551-52; Fang 65:483.

Luo Yan 駱延 also as Luo Gayan 蓋延; Youfufeng. During the troubled period of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the invasion of the Red Eyebrows, Luo Yan became warlord in his home county of Zhouzhi. He and other local leaders were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu, but in 27 they were conquered by Emperor Guangwu's general Feng Yi. -HHS 17/7:647.

Luo Yan 羅衍 [Boji 伯紀]; Shu. A junior officer at the court of Gongsun Shu about 30, he persuaded Xie Wenqing and Zheng Wenbo to urge Gongsun Shu to submit to Emperor Guangwu of Han. Gongsun Shu was angry, and Xie Wenqing and Zheng Wenbo died in prison [on the date of this incident see sub voce.]

Luo Yan later became an Academician at the court of Han. -HYGZ 10A:138.

Luo Yao 駱曜 [the personal name of this man may have been Zhao 昭, changed to avoid taboo on the personal name of Sima Zhao, a founder of the Jin dynasty in the third century]. During the 170s Luo Yao was the leader of a heterodox, mystical sect in the region about Chang'an. He was probably a faith-healer, responding to the frequent epidemics at this time. -HHS 75/65:2436, SGZ 8:264.

Luo Ye 駱業. Intendant of Henan in 194, Luo Ye accompanied the cortège for the re-burial of the Beauty Wang, mother of Emperor Xian, by the tomb of Emperor Ling at Luoyang. -HHS 10B:452.

Luo [Yisun] 駱異孫; Zuopingyi. In the early second century Luo Yisun was a scholar and a teacher. -HYGZ 10B:148.

Luo Zhao 駱昭 see Luo Yao 駱曜.

Luo Zhen 駱珍. During the early 70s Luo Zhen was Administrator of Nanyang. -DGHJ 18:8a.

Luoluo 落羅 see Zhijianluoluo 置鞬落羅.

Luorilü 羅日律 see Zhijianluoluo 置鞬落羅 and/or Rilü 日律.

Luoshi 羅市 was the sobriquet of a leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range in 185. -SGZ 8:261.

Luxi 魯昔 (d.215); Wuhuan. A chieftain from Taiyuan, Luxi commanded an auxiliary force to Cao Cao's army. After the defeat of Zhang Lu and the conquest of Hanzhong in 215, he and his men were stationed in garrison in Youfufeng.

Luxi had a wife of whom he was very fond, but he had been required to leave her in Jinyang, capital of Taiyuan commandery, and he was afraid he would never see her again. Taking five hundred horsemen with him, therefore, he left his post and went back to Jinyang. He hid his followers in the hills and went alone into the city to collect his wife.

Luxi was known as a fine archer, and when the local Chinese officers learned of his escape they were reluctant to pursue him, so the Area Commander Liang Xi had his officer Zhang Jing call a group of Xianbi and lead them in chase. Luxi's horse was weighed down by its double load, and before he could reach the safety of his own men he was shot and killed by his pursuers.

When Cao Cao first heard that Luxi had absconded, he was worried that he might cause trouble on the northern borders. Delighted with the news of his death, he rewarded Liang Xi with enfeoffment. -SGZ 15:470.

Lüqiu Hong 閭丘弘/宏. In 124 Lüqiu Hong joined the demonstration led by Lai Li at the palace Gate of the Vast Capital, protesting the dismissal of the Heir, Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. It is uncertain whether Lüqiu Hong was a Palace Attendant or a General of the Household at the time. The demonstrators achieved no success, but their support was recognised: Lüqiu Hong died before Liu Bao came to the throne at the end of the following year, but his son was appointed a gentleman cadet. -HHS 15/5:591-93.

Lüqiu Mao 閭丘邈 or Lüqiu Qian 遷; Pengcheng. A scholar in retirement about 120, he was recommended for office by the Chancellor Zhang Hao. -SGZ Shu.1073 [邈], HYGZ 10B:155 [遷].

Lüqiu Qian 閭丘遷 see Lüqiu Mao 閭丘邈.

M

Ma 馬, Empress of Emperor Ming: see the Lady Ma I below.

Ma 馬, the Lady I (40-79); Youfufeng: Empress of Emperor Ming. The Lady was the youngest daughter of Ma Yuan 援 by his concubine the Lady Lin. Her father died in 49 and was followed swiftly by her full brother Ma Keqing, a child of great talent. Demented by grief at this double loss, the Lady Lin died soon afterwards, and the ten-year-old Lady Ma managed her household and its staff like a full adult. For some time no-one else in the family knew of her mother's fate, and when the situation was discovered everyone admired the girl's conduct.

Earlier, as the future empress was suffering a long illness, the chief wife of Ma Yuan had called in a shaman to tell her fortune. The shaman observed that the girl appeared both unlucky and destined for great honour; with such contradictory signs it was impossible to make any forecast. Some time later a physiognomist was invited to observe the three daughters of the family, and when he saw the youngest he remarked that he should call himself her subject, foretelling that she would rise to honour by caring for another's child more than for her own.

After Ma Yuan died on campaign against the non-Chinese people of Wuling in 49, his factional opponents, notably the Geng family but also Liang Song and Dou Gu, claimed that his strategy had been mistaken. The Ma lost favour, Ma Yuan was posthumously deprived of his fief, the family were unable to give his body burial in the family tomb, and even an audience with Emperor Guangwu failed to win a pardon. Under constant threat, they began to look for protection in a subordinate alliance with their rivals of the Dou faction.

Their cousin Ma Yan, however, had Ma Yuan's widow offer her daughters to the imperial family, and sent a letter to Emperor Guangwu praising the qualities of the three sisters and describing their physical qualities as "above the middle upper" 上中之上: the grade of 上中 [A2] was second of a possible nine. In 52, therefore, at the age of thirteen sui this youngest Lady Ma was selected into the harem of the Heir Liu Zhuang. The Lady was seven feet and two inches tall [166 cm], with a square-jawed face and beautiful hair, so luxuriant she could dress it into four triple coils and still have some draping down. She did not paint her eyebrows, but placed a dot of black at the corner of her left eye to lengthen the line. When opposed, she would claim to be ill, and she always got her way in the end. She understood the Book of Changes, enjoyed reading Chunqiu, and was particularly fond of Zhou li 周禮, Zhou guan 周官 "The Offices of the Zhou dynasty" and the works of Dong Zhongshu 董仲舒 of Former Han. She also recited from Chu ci 楚辭 "The Songs of the South" but is said to have done so only to enjoy the rhythm; she disapproved of the poets' florid vocabulary.

Within the imperial household, the Lady paid great attention to the Empress Yin, mother of Liu Zhuang, and was admired for the courtesy with which she treated all ranks of guests and friends. She was greatly favoured, and regularly visited the empress's private apartments at the rear of the harem.

When Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming, came to the throne after the death of Guangwu in 57, the Lady Ma was appointed an Honoured Lady, most senior rank of concubine. The new ruler had nine sons, none by the Lady Ma, but his fifth, Liu Da, was born in 57 to her cousin the Honoured Lady Jia: the Lady Jia's mother was an elder sister of the late mother of the Lady Ma. The Dowager Yin took over the child and had the Lady Ma act as his foster-mother. This she did with devotion, more than if he had been her own son, and Liu Da responded with affection.

At the same time, though she herself remained childless, the Lady placed the utmost importance upon maintaining the lineage, and would recommend other ladies for the imperial favour. Generally, she befriended and supported her colleagues and controlled the conduct of the slaves and other attendants. At one time it is said she undertook to prepare the dancing costumes for the harem, and worked so hard that her hands became raw.

In 60 the senior ministers urged the emperor to choose an empress. Even before he had addressed the question his mother the Dowager Yin told him that "In virtue the Honoured Lady Ma is leader of the harem. She is the one." So on 8 April she was appointed empress, and Liu Da was designated Heir on the same day. It is said that the decision was foreshadowed to the Lady in a dream a few nights earlier: a great number of small insects flew to her, some went under her skin, then they flew away again.

While the Lady's virtues and good conduct may be exaggerated, she had managed well in the complex politics of harem and court. The support of the Empress Yin was obviously critical, and the Lady Ma was able to convince her that she would pose no threat to the interests of her family. At the same time, the Lady Jia was obliged to acquiesce in losing not only her child but all the benefits to her kinfolk which might have flowed from his accession. Though the Jia were related to the Ma through a distaff line, it appears that they were in no position to withstand the rivalry of other factions, and one must assume that sponsorship by the Dowager and a take-over by the Lady Ma were the best options open. In fact, the male members of the Jia family gained no advantage from their close connection to the throne, and though the Lady Jia was awarded insignia and gifts after the death of the Dowager in 64, she died in obscurity in the rear palace and received no acknowledgement even after her son, Emperor Zhang, came to the throne ten years later.

The male members of the Ma family were likewise kept at a distance. Emperor Guangwu had noted how the power of the Wang family culminated in the usurpation of Wang Mang at the end of Former Han, and his son Emperor Ming neither ennobled the relatives of his consort nor gave them any significant office. The Empress Ma fully approved this policy, and she made a point of modest behaviour, always wearing a long robe of plain silk, without the border due to her rank. On one occasion, the ladies of the harem came to pay her court. They saw the robe from a distance and thought it was of the highest quality, but laughed when they got close and realised what poor stuff it was made of. The empress explained that she used the material because it took dye very well, and all the women admired her sense and frugality.

The Lady Ma did not enjoy excursions, and seldom took part in them. There was one time the emperor was in a park at the Northern Palace, surrounded by his concubines, with his son Liu Yan and others in attendance. They asked that the empress join them, but the emperor laughed and explained that "She does not enjoy music, so she takes no pleasure in such parties as these." At another time, when he was visiting a detached palace for a hunting party she expressed concern that he risked his health in the wind and damp of the early morning.

During the early 70s many people were implicated in the case of Liu Ying the King of Chu and were arrested. The empress was concerned at the numbers affected, and as she and the emperor were together at night she interceded for them. Influenced by her plea, the emperor became more uncertain, and many people were treated more leniently. About the same time, however, when he enfeoffed his sons as kings but granted them only small estates, she spoke on their behalf with little effect.

On another occasion there was a proposal from his military commanders, presumably on policy to deal with the non-Chinese peoples of the north and central Asia. His senior ministers gave conflicting opinions, but when the emperor discussed it with the Lady Ma she swiftly analysed the problem and found a solution to give all parties what they wanted. Thereafter he consulted her on many different affairs of state; she often made good suggestions and sought no advantage for her family. He admired her more and more, and never found cause for complaint.

As Emperor Ming died in 75, he was succeeded by Liu Da, Emperor Zhang, the son who had been brought up by the Lady Ma, and she now became Dowager.

When the Honoured Ladies of the harem were sent to live in the Southern Palace the Dowager was sorry to see them go; she had each of them granted royal insignia, a comfortable carriage, and quantities of fine cloth, silk and gold.

She took her position as Dowager most seriously: when a fire started accidentally in the suite of a princess in the Northern Palace and spread to affect the harem apartments, she took it as a portent in response to her own faults, became most depressed, and would not take part in a visit to the mausoleum of Emperor Guangwu because she felt unworthy to face him. [HHS 10A says the suite was that of the Princess of Xinping 新平, but no such fief had been awarded; it may have been the residence of the Lady Liu Zi, daughter of Emperor Ming, who was named Princess of Pingshi 平氏 in 60. Bn 76:39 & 112 suggests this was a fire recorded for the winter of 76/77.]

The Dowager also gave personal attention to compiling the Diary of Activity and Repose [起居注 Qiju zhu] for the reign of her late husband. During the last year of his illness her half-brother Ma Fang had attended the emperor with medicines morning and night, but she omitted all reference to this in the history. Emperor Zhang protested that Ma Fang's devotion should be recorded as an example to posterity, and it was wrong to leave it out, but the Dowager replied that she did not wish later generations to learn of the ruler's close connection to his relatives by marriage. It is said that she had the advice and encouragement of her brother Ma Liao in seeking to avoid too high a profile for herself and her family, and she certainly took the policy to heart.

In 76, the first full year of his reign, Emperor Zhang proposed to grant fiefs to the Dowager's half-brothers Ma Liao, Ma Fang and Ma Guang. He gave up the idea when she objected, but in the following year the matter was raised again, with the argument that a drought indicated the Han should return to earlier tradition, whereby the ruler's male relatives by marriage were granted "grace and favour" marquisates 恩澤侯. In a long and worthy statement, the Lady argued strongly against the proposal, citing the bad precedent of the Wang clan at the end of Former Han and the deliberate policy of Emperor Ming to restrict the size and value of his own sons' fiefs compared to those of Emperor Guangwu's; on the same analogy, her own family should not be given honours to match those awarded to Guangwu's Empress, the late Dowager Yin.

Furthermore, she added, though she herself, as mother of the empire 天下母, had made a point of living simply, to serve as an example to others, when her relatives went to audience with her late husband they had filled the roads with carriages and horses of the finest quality, their retainers clad in splendid green and white: her brothers' array was finer than the imperial entourage. She had not been angry at this, but had quietly arranged to restrict their annual expenditure, for fear they would bring misfortune to the state and destruction to the family. Ministers should not seek to match their ruler, and this applied with even greater force to relatives by marriage. She was concerned lest the Ma suffer the same fate as the distaff families of Former Han, which had risen to the heights and then been destroyed.

Emperor Zhang returned to the debate, but the Dowager responded, observing that at the beginning of Former Han Emperor Gao promised his followers there would be no kings who were not members of the imperial Liu clan and no marquises who had not given service to the state: the grace and favour marquises were thus quite inappropriate. Moreover, she added, while it was reasonable that men should seek wealth and honour to maintain their ancestral sacrifices and for their own comfort and that of their families, the family sacrifices of the Ma were paid for by treasure from all parts of the world [no doubt through the conquests of Ma Yuan], while their personal expenses were met from the imperial treasury. Why should they be enfeoffed as well? Again the fiefs were not awarded.

Before this, when the chief wife of Ma Yuan, the Dowagers' father, died in 74, her sons raised a tomb-mound for her slightly higher than regulations allowed. The Dowager now heard about this and made her views known, and the top of the tomb was lowered. She acted as a censor both for her own family and for the male members of the imperial house, making detailed investigations, giving praise and rewards for good and restrained conduct, and punishing those who behaved excessively, sometimes by having them sent back to their home country. So all the sumptuary laws were obeyed, and the imperial relatives showed far greater respect than in the time of Emperor Ming.

Within the palace the Dowager established a Weaving House for the rearing of silkworms and the making of silk, and she enjoyed visiting to observe the work. She spoke daily with Emperor Zhang about the Way of right action and good government, gave instruction to the young princes on the classics and the histories, and herself worked to the end of her life.

In 79, as the empire celebrated a good harvest and there was peace on every frontier, Emperor Zhang at last granted enfeoffment to the Lady Ma's half-brothers. She warned them against the danger for the future, but they accepted the honours. A few years later, in 83, the ostentatious conduct of the Ma earned them reprimands from the emperor, and the influence of the family began to decline.

That same year the Dowager was taken ill. She had no trust in shamans or medicine men, but went several times to pray. She died in the summer, on 16 August 79, after twenty-three years on the throne, aged just over forty sui.

The Lady Ma had sought to provide for the succession of the emperor and the continuing prosperity of her clan through patronage of two daughters of her cousin Song Yang. She brought them into the harem of Liu Da, and when he came to the throne in 75 both sisters became Honoured Ladies. In 78 the elder gave birth to Liu Qing, who became Heir in the following year.

HHS 10A:414 claims that the Dowager admired and approved of the Empress Dou, appointed in 78, but one may doubt that is true, for the rise of the Dou clan was a threat to the Ma. Political considerations would in any case encourage the ruler not to commit himself too firmly to one distaff faction, and after the Dowager's death the Song sisters and the brothers Ma were indeed exposed to attack from the Empress Dou and her family. In 82 the Dou were successful: Liu Qing was dismissed as Heir, the Ladies Song were forced to suicide, and in the following year the brothers Ma were disgraced.

The Lady Ma's efforts had thus preserved her family clique for some time after her death, but her forecasts of misfortune proved correct. On the other hand, while the Ma may have appeared greedy and over-powerful, their conduct paled into insignificance compared to that of the Dou, Deng, Liang and other distaff relatives who followed them. Admittedly the Ma had re-established the model of ambitious but brittle relatives by marriage observed in Former Han but, given the nature of harem and court politics and the formal responsibilities of an empress and/or dowager, it is doubtful if any self-abnegation would have prevented the pattern from developing once more. -HHS 10A:407-14*; Bn 76:38, Bn 86A:279-280, O'Hara 55:243-248, Ch'ü 72:297-298.

Ma 馬, the Ladies II & III; Youfufeng. Two daughters of Ma Yuan 援, they were born in 38 and 39. The family fell from favour after their father's death in 49, but in 52, when they were fifteen and fourteen, his widow offered the two ladies and their youngest sister to the imperial harem, while their cousin Ma Yan sent a letter praising their virtues and describing their physical qualities as "above the middle upper" 上中之上: the grade of 上中 [A2] was second of a possible nine.

The youngest sister, the Lady Ma I, was selected into the harem of the Heir Liu Zhuang, future Emperor Ming, and later became his empress, while their eldest sister, the Lady Ma Jiang, married Jia Wuzhong. Nothing more, however, is recorded of the Ladies Ma II and III. -HHS 10A:408.

Ma 馬, the Lady IV. Principal wife and then widow of Liu Yi the Marquis of Liwu, who was the father of Liu Zhi, Emperor Huan, she was not, however, Liu Zhi's natural mother: see sub the Lady Yan Ming.

Liu Zhi was brought to the imperial throne in 146, and in 148 the Lady Ma was named an Honoured Lady to attend the tomb of Liu Yi, with maintenance from the revenue of three counties. Also in 148, Liu Zhi's brother Shi was enfeoffed as King of Pingyuan. He was often drunk and incapable of carrying out his duties, so the Lady Ma was given charge of his affairs. -HHS 55/45:1809.

Ma 馬, the Lady V (122-187); Youfufeng. Apparently a grand-daughter of Ma Yan, and certainly connected to the family of imperial relatives by marriage from the first century, the Lady Ma was married to the Excellency Yuan Tang. Cai Yong composed a funerary inscription for her. -Cai 9:55.

Ma 馬, the Lady VI; Longxi. Daughter of Ma Chao, she became the wife of Liu Li 劉理, King of Anding and son of Liu Shan 劉禪, the second Sovereign of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 6:967.

Ma 馬 [personal name unknown] (d.24); Xindu/Anping. Member of a leading local family and younger brother of Ma Chong, in 24 he was a colonel under Li Zhong, officer of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu but at that time commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor. When Ma Chong turned against Han and invited the troops of the pretender Wang Lang into Xindu, he took members of Li Zhong's household hostage and sought to have him change sides. Li Zhong refused, and he killed Ma Chong's brother.

Ma 馬 [personal name unknown]; Youfufeng. Son of Ma Kang 伉, this young man lived at Luoyang with his uncle Ma Rong. He died about 120, and Ma Rong resigned office in respect for him. -HHS 60/50A: 1970.

Ma Ai 馬艾. Administrator of Dunhuang, he died in office about 220. -SGZ 18:550.

Ma [Boji] 馬伯濟; Nanyang. Son of Ma Wu, about 70 it was alleged that he was involved with Yan Zhong in a conspiracy on behalf of Liu Ying, King of Chu. The family fief held by Boji's younger brother Ma Tan was abolished, and it is likely Ma Boji was executed. -HHS 22/12:786.

Ma Can 馬參 see Ma Qi 馬齊.

Ma Ce 馬側; Nanyang. Son of Ma Zhen, he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 22/12:786.

Ma Ce 馬策 see Ma Ying 馬英.

Ma Chang 馬昌; Nanyang. About 150, when Emperor Huan was under the regency of the Liang family, the marquise inherited from Guangwu's general Ma Cheng was abolished because the incumbent, Ma Chou, was found guilty of some crime. When the emperor took power for himself in 159 he restored the inheritance in favour of Ma Chang, a great-great-grandson of Ma Cheng. The fief territory, however, was now only a village in Changsha commandery. -HHS 22/12:780.

Ma Chao 馬超 [Mengqi 孟起] (176-222); Youfufeng. Son of Ma Teng, about 197 Ma Chao served under his father against Han Sui, but was wounded and nearly killed by Han Sui's officer Yan Xing.

In 202 Ma Chao was sent to assist Cao Cao's Director of Retainers Zhong Yao against Guo Yuan and Gao Gan of the Yuan family. They defeated the enemy at Pingyang in Hedong, and Guo Yuan was killed.

As his father and brothers moved east in 208, Ma Chao remained in command about Chang'an, with rank as lieutenant-general and enfeoffment as marquis. About 210 he established a rapprochement with Han Sui: he told Han Sui how he had refused the orders of Cao Cao's agent Zhong Yao to assassinate him, described himself as Han Sui's son now that Ma Teng had gone to Cao Cao, and sought his paternal support.

In the following year, as Cao Cao's general Xiahou Yuan moved into the northwest Ma Chao and Han Sui gathered other chieftains to oppose him, but in the autumn Cao Cao defeated the allies at Huayin by the junction of the Wei with the Yellow River. The warlords were driven back to the west, and in the following year Ma Chao's father and brothers were killed at Ye city.

In 213 Ma Chao, now based in Longxi, allied to the Qiang and Di people and supported by Zhang Lu in Hanzhong, invaded Hanyang, seized the capital, Ji city, and styled himself ruler of Bing and Liang provinces. Cao Cao's general Xiahou Yuan could make no headway against him, but in the autumn a local rising led by Yang Fu and Jiang Xu broke Ma Chao's power and drove him south across the ranges to take refuge with Zhang Lu.

Zhang Lu at first received Ma Chao well, gave him high rank, and intended to have him marry his daughter. He was dissuaded from this because of Ma Chao's reputation for abandoning his father and brothers, but he did support Ma Chao in another attempt to re-establish himself in Liang province in 214. This time Ma Chao was defeated by Xiahou Yuan and, as Zhang Lu would assist him no further, he took refuge with the Di. Soon afterwards he was invited to join Liu Bei in his attack on Liu Zhang, Governor of Yi province. His accession was valuable, and when Liu Bei took over the province he made Ma Chao a chief general.

When Liu Bei attacked Hanzhong, now controlled by Cao Cao, in 217, Ma Chao and others were sent to occupy Wudu, but they were forced to withdraw early in the following year.

After Liu Bei captured Hanzhong and proclaimed himself king in 219, Ma Chao was one of the officials listed in the formal memorial to the emperor. He was appointed General of the Left with the Staff of Authority, and when Liu Bei took the imperial title in 221 he was named General of Agile Cavalry, Governor of Liang province, and was raised in fief. He died in the following year. -SGZ Shu 6:944-47*.

Ma Chao 馬超, wife of: see the Lady Yang 楊.

Ma Chao 馬超, concubine of: see the Lady Dong 董 V, and also sub Chong 种 [surname unknown].

Ma Cheng 馬成 [Junqian 君遷] (d.56); Nanyang. As a young man Ma Cheng was a local officer in his home county, but when rebellion against Wang Mang broke out early in 23 he joined the staff of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, with responsibility for military discipline. He accompanied the expedition to Yingchuan and later became a county magistrate in Runan under the Gengshi Emperor.

In 24 Ma Cheng heard that Liu Xiu had been sent as a commissioner to the north, and he left his post to join him, travelling on foot and carrying his own baggage. He was again appointed to Liu Xiu's personal guard and took part in all his campaigns. When Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25, Ma Cheng was named Commandant Protector of the Army, chief of military police.

In 26 Ma Cheng followed He Yan to attack the pretender Liu Yong, and after the death of Liu Yong in 27 he accompanied Liu Long and others on their first offensive against the claimant Li Xian, south of the Huai. In 28 he joined the main imperial army against the south-eastern warlords.

As the emperor arrived at Shouchun on the Huai, Ma Cheng was named a general and was sent with Liu Long, Song Deng and Wang Chang to raise troops in the commanderies about the lower Yangzi and the Huai and bring them against Shu city in Lujiang, Li Xian's last stronghold. Under strict instructions, they refused all challenges to battle but maintained a tight siege for more than a year. By the spring of 30 the city was starving and the imperial troops took it by storm. Li Xian and his family were killed, the remnants of his party surrendered, and the territory of the lower Yangzi and the south of the Huai was settled.

In 31 Ma Cheng was enfeoffed as Marquis of Pingshu 平舒, a county in Dai commandery whose name gave courteous reference to his "pacification" of Shu 舒 city. In the following year he joined the campaign against Wei Ao and was named Administrator of Tianshui, still with a general's command of troops. In the winter, however, after the main army had turned back to deal with rebellion to the east, Ma Cheng was faced with a local revival of support for Wei Ao and was obliged to withdraw to Chang'an. Wei Ao died soon afterwards, and in 33 Ma Cheng returned with the army under Lai Xi to mop up the last of his forces. After a preliminary advance into Wudu, Ma Cheng and Liu Shang were left to deal with the local non-Chinese and take over the whole commandery.

Early in 35 Ma Cheng accompanied Ma Yuan against the Xianlian Qiang in Jincheng, and in the summer he joined Lai Xi for the attack south through the Qin Ling ranges against Gongsun Shu. When Lai

640 Ma Cheng

Xi was assassinated by an enemy agent the campaign on that front was halted, but Ma Cheng settled Wudu commandery, then joined Ma Yuan to deal with the Qiang in Longxi.

In the winter of 36/37 the Excellency of Works Li Tong left office. Ma Cheng was named Acting Excellency in his place, but returned to command as a general a few months later.

In 38 Ma Cheng was sent north to supervise the defence of Changshan and Zhongshan against raiding from the Xiongnu. He took over the troops formerly commanded by the chief general Zhu You, and later replaced also the disgraced general Du Mao. For five or six years Ma Cheng was engaged in the construction of walls and signal-towers across Taiyuan and along the ridge of the Taihang Mountains as far south as the Wei River. Further north, another line of defence was built across Dai commandery, and in 39 the people of Yanmen, Shanggu and Dai were brought to the south. The fortifications were ambitious and extensive, but they meant that most of the territory outside the North China plain was abandoned to raiding and then settlement by the Xiongnu.

About 44 Ma Cheng was recalled to the capital on leave. Many people in the region remembered his efforts on their behalf, and as the Xiongnu were divided and weakened, and the north obtained a measure of peace, Ma Cheng was appointed Administrator of Zhongshan. He returned his general's insignia, but retained the right to lead troops beyond the commandery borders.

In the autumn of 48 Ma Cheng was sent with the Internuncio Li Song to halt the depredations by non-Chinese tribes in the west of Wuling, who had destroyed an imperial army under Liu Shang and were raiding into Nan commandery. Achieving no success, Ma Cheng resigned his office and Ma Yuan was given charge of the campaign.

In 51 Ma Cheng's county fief was transferred into Jiujiang. He took up residence there and died in retirement five years later. When Emperor Ming had portraits of his father's great servants painted on the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang, Ma Cheng was one of those who were honoured. -HHS 22/12:778-79*; Bn 59:142, Bn 67:112-113, 138, 171, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:85.

Ma Cheng 馬成 (d.48). A client of the Yin family of the empress, Ma Cheng was a bully and trouble-maker in Luoyang. In 48 the new Prefect Yu Yan arrested him, and though the empress's brother Yin Jiu appealed for him Guangwu supported Yu Yan. Ma Cheng was executed. -HHS 33/23:1152-53.

Ma Cheng 馬承; Longxi. Son of Ma Chao, in 222 he was granted succession to his fief in the state of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 6:947.

Ma Chong 馬寵 (d.24); Xindu/Anping. Member of a leading local family in Xindu city, in 24 Ma Chong opened the gates and gave entry to troops of the pretender Wang Lang at the expense of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu but at that time commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor. Wang Lang appointed a king of Xindu, presumably Ma Chong.

Ma Chong and his associates had captured the families of Liu Xiu's officers Li Zhong and Pi Tong, and they sent other members of their households with a call to change sides. Pi Tong wept and refused, while Li Zhong, more ferocious, arrested and killed Ma Chong's younger brother, who had been serving as a colonel in his command. Soon afterwards Xindu city was recaptured by troops of the Gengshi Emperor under Xie Gong, and the families of both Li Zhong and Pi Tong were rescued unharmed.

As Li Zhong now killed supporters of Wang Lang, Ma Chong and his family were certainly among the victims. -HHS 21/11:755-56, 758-59; Bn 59:74-75.

Ma Chou 馬醜; Nanyang. Son of Ma Yi 邑, Ma Chou succeeded to the family marquise, but he was found guilty of a crime about 150 and the fief was ended. See also sub Ma Chang. -HHS 22/12:780.

Ma Da 馬達 or Sima Da 司馬達 [the surname appears in two forms at two different places, and it is not possible to judge which is correct]. Administrator of Dunhuang, in the summer of 151 Ma/Sima Da led four thousand commandery troops, with allied forces, to attack Xiongnu raiders who had laid siege to the town of Yiwu [Hami]. The enemy withdrew and the Chinese gained no success.

Later that year the Chief Clerk of the Western Regions Zhao Ping died at Yutian [Khotan], and King Chengguo of Jumi [present-day Yutian] claimed he had been poisoned by King Jian. Zhao Ping's son reported this to Sima/Ma Da, who encouraged Zhao Ping's successor Wang Jing to investigate. Jian, however, was assassinated, and Wang Jing was killed in the rioting that followed. Sima/Ma Da wanted to lead an army against Yutian, but the court did not approve and he was recalled. -HHS 88/78:2916 [as Ma Da], 2930 [as Sima Da].

Ma Da 麻達 wrote a commentary to the Analects of Confucius. -FSTY 6f:137.

Ma Dai 馬岱; Longxi. A cousin of Ma Chao, Ma Dai became a general and a marquis in the state of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 6:947.

Ma Daosong 馬道嵩; Julu. A local officer under Zhang Dao the Administrator of Julu in 149, Ma Daosong took part in his work of water control on the Zhang River. -SJZ 10:17a.

Ma [Dibo] 馬第伯. As a junior official, Ma Dibo took part in the Feng and Shan sacrifices held by Emperor Guangwu in 56. His Feng-Shan yi ji 封禪儀記 is a personal record of their observance. -Bn 79:172-180.

Ma Du 馬度. Grandson of Ma Liao, in 109 the government of the Dowager Deng granted him a county marquissate in Yingchuan. This restored the fief which had been reduced and then abolished in the lineage of his uncle Ma Zun. -HHS 24/14:855.

Ma Dun 馬敦 or Ma Fu 敷 [Ruqing 孺卿]; Youfufeng. Son of Ma Yu and younger brother of Ma Yan, Ma Dun shared in his travels as a child. He was likewise respected as a scholar and a gentleman, though in the early 40s Ma Yuan sent a letter to reprimand Ma Yan and Ma Dun for their willingness to criticise others.

The family was briefly disgraced after the death of Ma Yuan in 49, but returned to favour as Ma Dun's cousin, the Lady Ma I, became consort to Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming. Ma Dun served as General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger. -HHS 24/14:844, 858-62.

Ma Fang 馬防 [Jiangping 江平 or Gongping 公平 or Xiaosun 孝孫] (d.101); Youfufeng. Second son of Ma Yuan 援 and half-brother of the Empress Ma of Emperor Ming, in 70 Ma Fang and his younger brother Guang were appointed Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. Ma Fang gained favourable notice from the emperor for his suggestions on supplying fodder for horses in campaigns beyond the frontier against the Xiongnu.

Though Emperor Ming neither ennobled the brothers of his consort nor gave them significant office, they each received a substantial pension from the official treasury. For several months, moreover, when the ruler was on his deathbed, Ma Fang came day and night to look after him and bring medicines.

When Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75, he wished to enfeoff Ma Fang, Ma Liao and Ma Guang, half-brothers of his adoptive mother the Empress, now Dowager, Ma. The Dowager opposed the plan, arguing that the favour was not deserved and would make the family too vulnerable. For the time being Ma Fang was made only a General of the Household and then Colonel of the City Gates.

In the summer of 77 the Qiang chieftain Miyu led tribesmen from Longxi and Jincheng into Hanyang. Despite opposition from the Excellency Diwu Lun, Ma Fang was named Acting General of Chariots and Cavalry and was sent with thirty thousand men from the Northern Army and local levies to attack the invaders.

As they came into Hanyang, the enemy chieftain Buqiao had laid siege to Lintao, headquarters of the southern Commandant of Longxi. Ma Fang wanted to go to the relief, but the army was held back by the difficulty of the terrain and the road. He therefore sent two majors with a few hundred horsemen as an advance guard, to set up a great camp some twenty kilometres short of Lintao and plant a multitude of banners to make it appear that the main army was on its way. The enemy scouts were indeed deceived, and returned to their own people with the news that an overwhelming force was about to arrive.

On the following day the small advance guard went forward to beat of drum, and the Qiang were frightened and fled. The Chinese pursued and defeated them, claiming more than four thousand heads, and the siege of Lintao was broken.

Ma Fang now persuaded the main Shaodang tribe of the Qiang to surrender, giving promises of fair dealing, and only Buqiao remained defiant in the valleys to the southwest. At the end of the year, however, the Qiang rose once more, defeating troops of Ma Fang's second-in-command Geng Gong and the Chief Clerk of Longxi in the hill country and inflicting several hundred casualties.

In the spring Ma Fang returned with a three-pronged attack against the enemy: as the major Xia Jun led five thousand men in a direct advance, his colleague Ma Peng took another five thousand in an oblique approach to surprise their base territory, while Ma Fang's own Chief Clerk Li Tiao led four thousand men to encircle them on the west. The three contingents joined to attack the enemy and defeated them, killing or capturing more than a thousand and taking a hundred thousand cattle and sheep. As the Qiang fled, they defeated Xia Jun in a rear-guard action, but Ma Fang resumed the advance and Buqiao, exhausted, brought ten thousand of his people to surrender. By autumn the Shaodang Qiang were again under control, and Ma Fang re-established a military presence in southern Longxi, with fortresses, watch-towers and signal posts.

Confirmed as full General of Chariots and Cavalry while still holding office as Colonel of the City Gates, Ma Fang returned to Luoyang. The emperor came in person to visit him, and Ma Fang was granted the right to nominate two candidates for the imperial service each year.

Ma Fang's second-in-command Geng Gong had been left to deal with those who had not yet surrendered. Geng Gong had earlier put forward a strategy to deal with the Qiang: noting that the north-western warlord and later minister Dou Rong had established good relations with the non-Chinese at the time of the restoration, he proposed that Dou Rong's nephew Dou Gu, a man of military achievement, be sent as an envoy with authority to settle them, while Ma Fang was stationed in Hanyang to provide a credible threat against any who stayed recalcitrant.

The plan may have been genuine, but the Geng had an old factional alliance with the Dou clan against the Ma, and Ma Fang saw the secondary place proposed for him as an insult to himself and to his family, which also had a long tradition in the northwest. On his return to the capital he made his feelings known, and an inspecting officer duly reported that Geng Gong lacked concern for his duties and resented imperial orders. Geng Gong was recalled, arrested and dismissed from his appointment.

In 79 Ma Fang ceased to be General of Chariots and Cavalry, but he and his brothers Liao and Guang received county fiefs, with title as Specially Advanced so that they might maintain residence at the capital; the brothers had initially asked to receive only secondary marquises. Ma Fang now also received credit for the care he had given Emperor Ming on his final sickbed, and for his conquests in the west. His fief in Yingchuan, with an appanage of 6,000 households, was augmented by a further 1,350 households.

The death of the Dowager Ma that summer brought no immediate decline in the family fortunes, and in 80 Ma Fang became Minister of the Household while Ma Guang was made Minister of the Guards.

Ma Fang regularly gave advice on matters of government, and he invited scholars and literary men to join his staff. He was a particular patron of music: he supported Bao Ye's proposal to reform the system of court music; and performances at his own events were compared to the state sacrifices. In 80 he proposed a musical enhancement of the seasonal ceremony of Welcoming the Ethers, and though his full repertoire was rejected because of the cost of instruments and players, the new ritual, based upon the Yue ling 月令 "Monthly Ordinances" of the pre-Han period, followed his initiative.

In 82 Ma Fang sought to retire on grounds of ill health. An imperial edict approved that he continue as Specially Advanced, and receive the estates in the capital district formerly held by Liu Yan, King of Zhongshan, maintaining him in royal style. The family was now at the height of influence and favour. Both Ma Fang and Ma Guang had over a thousand male and female slaves, goods valued in millions of cash, and great mansions and pavilions constructed on the finest land in the capital district. Their clients filled the roads and they had hundreds of resident guests, including such men of quality as Du Du, a celebrated man of letters from Jingzhao. Numbers of inspectors, administrators and magistrates came from the clan, and the bounty they extended to their dependent villagers each year was unmatched in history.

Besides his wealth within the empire, Ma Fang had also acquired great herds of horses and cattle which he used to gain support amongst the Qiang and other non-Chinese peoples. Displeased at this, however, the emperor reprimanded him on several occasions and eventually forbade all such contacts. As Ma Fang lost favour, the number of his clients declined.

Moreover, though the Dowager Ma had sought to protect her family by arranging the appointment of Liu Qing, son of her cousin the Honoured Lady Song, as Heir, after her death in 79 all were exposed to attack. In 82 the intrigues of the Empress Dou and her family were successful: Liu Qing was dismissed as Heir and the Ladies Song were forced to suicide.

In the following year it was further alleged that Ma Fang's nephew Ma Yu had complained to some junior members of the clan about the family's loss of influence: he was executed for criticising the throne. Soon afterwards Ma Fang and Ma Guang were accused of corruption and bad influence on the government. They were dismissed from their office and Ma Fang and Ma Liao were ordered out to their estates.

Ma Guang was allowed to remain at the capital and later returned to ministerial rank, but after the Dou clan was overthrown by Emperor He and his eunuch allies in 91 he was accused of association with them. The rest of the family was then involved, and Ma Fang was sent to Danyang, south of the Yangzi, with his county fief reduced to that of a district; his revenue, however, remained substantial and he was left independent of local officials.

Some time later, because of the unhealthy damp of the southeast, Ma Fang asked to return to his home country. Emperor He agreed, and Ma Fang died in Youfufeng in 101. -HHS 24/14:855-58*, 3:135-37, 87/77:2881; Bodde 75:199, Ch'ü 72:376.

Ma Fang 馬訪 also as Zhen Fang 甄訪. Following the death of Emperor Shun in 144, the regent government of his Dowager Liang proposed that his funerary tablet be given higher position than that of his short-lived predecessor Liu Long the Young Emperor, an infant who had reigned for just a few months in 106. This would mean that in a future generation Liu Long's tablet would be removed first.

As Minister of Ceremonies, Ma Fang endorsed this idea, but the Counsellor Lü Bo argued that proper order should be observed, and when the matter was opened for discussion at court the Minister Herald Zhou Ju agreed with him. So precedence was maintained in order of chronology and dynastic descent. -HHS 61/51: 2029.

Ma Feng 馬豐; Nanyang. Son of Ma Xiang, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 22/12:780.

Ma Fu 馬浮 [Yuanxian 元顯]; Nanyang. A former county magistrate, in 156 Ma Fu was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Ma Fu 馬敷 see Ma Dun 馬敦.

Ma Fu 馬復 see sub Ma Lang 馬郎.

Ma Gu 馬固; Youfufeng. Eldest son of Ma Yan, he did not distinguish himself. -HHS 24/14:862.

Ma Guang 馬光 [Shushan 叔山] (d.91); Youfufeng. Third son of Ma Yuan 援 and half-brother of the Empress Ma of Emperor Ming, in 70 Ma Guang and his elder brother Fang were given junior office as Gentlemen at the Yellow Gates. Though Emperor Ming neither ennobled the brothers of his consort nor gave them significant appointment, they did receive a substantial pension from the official treasury.

When Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75 he wanted to enfeoff the three half-brothers of his adoptive mother the Empress Ma, now Dowager. The Lady Ma opposed the plan, arguing that the favour was not deserved and would make the family too vulnerable, and she maintained her opposition for several years. The success of Ma Fang against the Qiang in the mid-70s, however, enhanced the fortunes of the family, and in 78 Ma Guang was promoted from a colonel in the Northern Army to become Bearer of the Mace.

In 79 all three brothers were at last made marquises of counties, with title as Specially Advanced, permitting them to remain in residence at the capital; we are told that they initially sought to reject the full fiefs, and asked only for secondary marquises. The death of the Dowager that summer brought no immediate loss to the family fortunes, for in 80 Ma Guang became Minister of the Guards while Ma Fang was made Minister of the Household.

A cautious and conservative man, Ma Guang did not play such a leading role in government as his brother, but with income from six thousand households at his fief in Yingchuan he shared Ma Fang's prosperity. Each possessed more than a thousand slaves, millions of cash in property, and mansions and pavilions across the capital district. They had a host of clients and hundreds of resident guests, while the clan produced several inspectors, administrators and magistrates.

The Dowager Ma had sought to protect her family by arranging the appointment of Liu Qing, son of her cousin the Honoured Lady Song, as Heir, but after her death in 79 all were exposed to attack, and in 82 the intrigues of the Empress Dou and her family were successful: Liu Qing was dismissed as Heir and the Ladies Song were forced to suicide.

In the following year it was alleged that Ma Yu, son of Ma Liao, had complained about the family's loss of influence: he was executed for criticising the throne. Ma Guang and Ma Fang were then accused of corruption and bad influence on the government and were dismissed from their offices. Ma Fang and Ma Liao were ordered out to their estates, but Ma Guang had attracted the sympathy of Liu Da, future Emperor Zhang, by his evident distress at the time of his mother's death in 74, and he received a last-minute reprieve. An edict ordered that he be allowed to take part in seasonal ceremonies to honour the late Dowager, and he was restored as Specially Advanced, with right to reside at the capital.

In 90, under the government of the young Emperor He controlled by the Dowager Dou and her family, Ma Guang returned to ministerial rank as Coachman. Besides the imperial stables, a major responsibility of that office was the breeding of horses for the army, and Ma Guang is said to have brought substantial savings to the expenses of the ministry. In the following year, however, after the power of the Dou was overthrown by Emperor He and his eunuch allies, Ma Guang was thought to have been too close an associate to the defeated faction, and he was ordered away to his estates.

Yu Dang, a slave of Dou Xian, was afraid for his life. He approached Ma Guang for help, but Ma Guang, no doubt to keep as much distance as possible, turned him away. Yu Dang was resentful, and when he was later arrested he claimed that Ma Guang had plotted treason with Dou Xian. Unable to disprove the allegation, Ma Guang killed himself.

Another former slave of Dou Xian by the name of Guo Hu later gave evidence which exonerated Ma Guang. His son Ma Lang then wrote to request that he might bring his body back for burial in the family tomb; this was approved. -HHS 24/14:855-58.

Ma Guang 馬光; Anding. When the frontier general Ma Xian was defeated by the Qiang in 141, his two sons also died in battle. In sympathy and recognition of Ma Xian's earlier achievements, Emperor Shun gave awards to the family, and in 142 he enfeoffed his grandson Ma Guang as a village marquis, with an annual pension of a million cash. -HHS 87/77:2895.

Ma Guo 馬國. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Ma Guo took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county fief in Julu.

In 126 Ma Guo joined Sun Cheng and others to support the Director of Retainers Yu Xu in attacking the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang. The emperor was compelled to disgrace Zhang Fang, but he was angry at the result, and in the following year Sun Cheng, Ma Guo and all their colleagues were sent out to their fiefs. In 128 the emperor formally recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Ma Ji 馬期 see Ma Qi 馬期.

Ma Jiang 馬姜, the Lady (34-106); Nanyang. A daughter of the general Ma Yuan and a sister of the Empress of Emperor Ming, the Lady married Jia Wuzhong, son of Jia Fu, and bore him four daughters.

Her husband died in 64, when the Lady was still young, but she brought up her daughters carefully. They all made good marriages, and one joined her aunt in the harem of Emperor Ming and became an Honoured Lady.

When the Lady died at the age of seventy-three, her children and grand-children had a stele set up at her tomb. -Nagata 94:44.

Ma Jiang 馬姜, the Lady [Zongmei 宗美]; Youfufeng. Sanfu juehu, cited by HHSJJ 24/14:908 Hui Dong, says that the wife of Zhao Qi 趙岐/歧, author of that work, was the Lady Ma Jiang. The biography of Zhao Qi in HHS 64/54:2121 says that his wife was the Lady Ma Zongmei, a niece of Ma Rong; Zongmei was presumably the Lady's style.

Ma Jiang 馬江 [Yuanhai 元海] (114-153); Jiyin. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt in 150, Ma Jiang entered probationary appointment as a gentleman cadet. Three years later, at the age of forty he became ill and died.

When Ma Jiang's widow the Lady Cao died in 170, a stele was erected to commemorate his life, her long widowhood, and also Ma Jiang's brother Wenxu, who had died earlier. -LS 8:11b-13a.

Ma Jiang 馬江, wife of: see the Lady Cao 曹 I.

Ma [Jichang] 馬季長; Youfufeng. Noted for his literary and scholarly ability in the first part of the second century, Ma Jichang later had an official career. He is mentioned by Cao Pi in his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature." -HHS 80/70A:2617 & JJ at 2870 Hui Dong, HYGZ 10C:174.

Ma Jingsi 馬敬司 see Sima Jingsi 司馬敬司.

Ma Ju 馬鉅; Youfufeng. Son of Ma Fang, at the time of the family prosperity and favour in the early 80s, Ma Ju was enrolled in the Palace School for Noble Families. When he was due to be capped in 81 Emperor Zhang gave orders for the ceremony to be held in the palace. He attended in person, and at the same time Ma Ju received appointment as a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates.

When the family lost favour in 83, Ma Fang was dismissed from the capital and then sent into exile, but after his death in 101 Ma Ju was allowed to succeed to his district fief. He later became a colonel in the Northern Army. -HHS 24/14:856-58.

Ma Kang 馬康 I (d.91); Youfufeng. Son of Ma Guang, about 84 Ma Kang became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, and when his father became Minister Coachman in 90 he was made a Palace Attendant.

After the power of the Dou family was overthrown by Emperor He and his eunuch allies in the following year, Ma Guang was accused of treachery and committed suicide. Members of his household and other dependents were sent back to their homelands, and many of them, including Ma Kang, were killed by local officials. -HHS 24/14:858.

Ma Kang 馬伉 II; Youfufeng. Second son of Ma Yan, he did not distinguish himself. -HHS 24/14:862.

Ma [Keqing] 馬客卿; Youfufeng. Youngest son of Ma Yuan 援 by his concubine the Lady Lin, and full brother of the future Empress Ma of Emperor Ming, Ma Keqing could sometimes appear slow, but was in fact extremely clever. He showed great talent as a child, and at the age of six he was able to greet and converse with visitors and clients. On one occasion, as a man fleeing from a death sentence came past, he hid him in a wine-jar and saved his life.

His father admired him and believed he had ability to hold the highest office. Inspired by the great travelling diplomats and administrators such as Zhang Yi 張儀 and Yu Qing 虞卿 of the pre-Qin period, he gave him the style Keqing "guest minister"; the personal name is not recorded.

Ma Keqing died young, soon after his father's death in 49. -HHS 24/14:852.

Ma Kuang 馬況 [Changping 長平 or Junping 君平]; Youfufeng. Eldest brother of Ma Yuan 援, he was Administrator of Henan and was enfeoffed under Wang Mang. -HHS 24/14:827, DGHJ 12:1a.

Ma Lang 馬郎 or Ma Fu 復 (see below); Youfufeng. Son of Ma Guang, after the death and disgrace of his father on allegations of treason, it was found that the charges were false. Ma Lang sought permission to collect his body and bury it in the family tomb, and Emperor He gave his approval.

In 113 the regent Dowager Deng called the descendants of Ma Lang's grandfather Ma Yuan 援 back to the capital for the seasonal ceremonies, and Ma Lang was enfeoffed with a district marquisate in Donghai. -HHS 24/14:858.

One edition of Shuijing zhu gives the personal name of this man as Fu 復, and dates his enfeoffment to the year 120: SJZ 25:7b.

Ma Leng 馬陵 [Bowe 伯威]; Youfufeng. Ma Leng was a descendant of Ma Yuan 援. His parents died when he was young and he was brought up by his cousin Ma Yi as if he were his own brother. When Ma Yi died, Ma Leng maintained the full three-year mourning for him.

Ma Leng became Officer of Merit in his commandery about 80, and was recommended Filial and Incorrupt. The clan fell into disgrace about this time, but Emperor Zhang admired Ma Leng's personal qualities and appointed him an Internuncio.

He became Administrator of Guanghan in 87, at a time of severe drought; grain was dear and people were starving. Ma Leng recommended abolition of the official salt monopoly to ease the burdens on the people, he reduced taxes, issued relief to the poor, and arranged public works of water control to develop arable land. The people set up a stele in his honour.

In 90 he was transferred to Hanyang, where he established a reputation for firm government. When Dou Xian was on campaign in Wuwei, Ma Leng enforced heavy taxation to raise money for the army. This was held against him when Dou Xian was destroyed in 92, but he was allowed to escape punishment by paying a fine.

A few years later, when there was unrest along the lower Yangzi, Ma Leng was sent to be Administrator of Danyang. He raised troops to attack the bandits and put down the disorder. There was some embarrassment when he was accused of involvement in robbery and banditry, but when the case was forwarded to the Minister of Justice at Luoyang, Ma Leng was exonerated. Transferred to Kuaiji, he was again noted for his good government.

About 110 Ma Leng returned north as Administrator of Henei, but a few years later he was found guilty of some fault. Having ransomed himself once more, he died at home. -HHS 24/14:862-63.

Ma Liang 馬良 [Jichang 季常] (186-222); Nan. Talented and good-looking, Ma Liang and his brothers were admired in their community, and Ma Liang was noted for having white hair in his eyebrows. A friend of Zhuge Liang, he became an Attendant Officer to Liu Bei after the victory at the Red Cliffs in 208. As Liu Bei and then Zhuge Liang went to the west in 212 and 213, Ma Liang remained behind in Jing province, but later returned to Liu Bei's personal staff and served as ambassador to Sun Quan.

When Liu Bei took the imperial title in 221, he named Ma Liang as a Palace Attendant, and as he embarked on his ill-fated attack down the Yangzi against Jing province, he sent Ma Liang into Wuling to raise the local tribes as allies. Liu Bei's army was defeated in the following year, and Ma Liang was cut off and killed. -SGZ Shu 9.982-83*.

Ma Liao 馬廖 [Jingping 敬平] (d.92); Youfufeng. Eldest son of Ma Yuan 援, Ma Liao was a keen scholar of the Book of Changes. He became a gentleman cadet in ren right of his father, but when Ma Yuan died in 49 factional opponents claimed that his last campaign, against the non-Chinese of Wuling, had been a failure. The family suffered eclipse and Ma Liao was refused the succession to his father's fief.

In 60, however, Ma Liao's younger half-sister became the Empress of Emperor Ming, and Ma Liao became an officer in the Feathered Forest guards and then General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger.

In 74 Ma Liao went with Zheng Zhong to the conquest of Jushi [Turfan], and he remained in Dunhuang with a watching brief as Protector of the Western Regions.

The testamentary edict of Emperor Ming ordered that Ma Liao should be given control of all access to the private apartments of the palace, and in 75 the new Emperor Zhang brought him to the capital as Minister of the Guards. He treated him with favour and respect, and the family held great influence at court.

The Lady Ma, now Dowager, paid close attention to government, but Ma Liao was concerned that although her intentions were good there could be difficulty later. He urged his sister to withdraw further from public life, and she indeed did so. Honest and loyal, Ma Liao had no interest in a great name for himself. The senior ministers argued that past precedent called for his family to be enfeoffed, and the emperor was anxious to arrange it, but Ma Liao and the Dowager opposed the idea on grounds that the favour was not deserved and would make the family too vulnerable.

In 79, after the success of his brother Ma Fang against the Qiang in the northwest, Ma Liao received a county fief in Nanyang, with title as Specially Advanced so that he might maintain his residence at the capital. At first, he and his brothers had asked only for secondary marquises, and though he was awarded many gifts, Ma Liao said that he was unworthy of such generosity, and refused them. He was too easy-going to engage in factional intrigue, and people at Luoyang admired his modesty.

On the other hand, though his brothers held ministerial rank, and his half-sister the Dowager had arranged the appointment of Liu Qing, son of her cousin the Honoured Lady Song, as Heir, when she died in 79 all the Ma group were exposed to attack. In 82 the intrigues of the Empress Dou and her family were successful: Liu Qing was dismissed as Heir and the Ladies Song were forced to suicide.

In the following year it was alleged that Ma Liao's son Ma Yu had complained of the family's loss of influence, and the senior ministers had him executed for criticising the throne. Soon afterwards Ma Fang and Ma Guang were accused of corruption and bad influence on the government. They were dismissed from their offices, and Ma Liao and Ma Fang were ordered to go to their estates.

Ma Liao was later permitted to return to the capital, and at his death in 92 Emperor He, recalling his status as brother-in-law to Emperor Ming, gave gifts for his funeral, held mourning in his honour, and awarded him a posthumous title. -HHS 24/14:854-55*, XC 1:4b-5a.

Ma Ling 馬稜 see Ma Leng 馬陵.

Ma Liu 馬留; Youfufeng. Sixth son of Ma Yan, he did not distinguish himself. -HHS 24/14:862.

Ma Lun 馬倫, the Lady (122-184); Youfufeng. A daughter of the scholar Ma Rong, she possessed comparable talent. Her husband Yuan Wei attempted to over-awe her with the prosperity and power of his family as compared to that of her own, while he also had strong and restrictive views about a woman's role. The Lady defended herself and her father, and she embarrassed Yuan Wei by her learned replies.

Yuan Wei later became an Excellency, and Ma Lun was also well known. Her biography appears in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳. -HHS 84/74:2796*, XC 6:8a-b.

Ma Mian 馬勉 (d.145); Jiujiang. In 144, after the initial success of the insurrection led by Fan Rong and Zhou Sheng, Ma Mian and his fellow-countryman Xu Feng also rebelled. While Xu Feng styled himself General Supreme, Ma Mian took the more ambitious title of Yellow Emperor 黃帝, indicating a claim to take over from Han. Wearing a deer-skin cap with yellow robes and carrying a jade seal, he set up a notional court in the hill country, proclaimed his own reign title, and sent a detached troop to attack the capital of the commandery. In the following year the rebels were heavily defeated by a provincial army led by Teng Fu. Ma Mian was killed. -HHS 6:276-77, 38/28:1279.

Ma [Miaoqi] 馬妙祈; Ba. Husband of the Lady Ma Yi, he died when she was young. -HYGZ 1:4.

Ma Midi 馬日磾 [Wengshu 翁叔] (d.194); Youfufeng. A collateral descendent of Ma Rong, Ma Midi was a noted scholar. As a Counsellor Remonstrant in 175, he joined Cai Yong and others in proposing that five Confucian classics be engraved on stone, to prevent deterioration of the transmitted text and forgeries by contemporary scholars. Emperor Ling agreed and the Stone Classics were completed in 183. With Cai Yong, Ma Midi played a major role in editing the Ritual, and his name appears in the colophon to the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu.

Probably in 177, moreover, the court commissioned a fourth instalment of the official dynastic history Han ji 漢記, and Ma Midi was appointed to the committee. Other colleagues were Cai Yong, Yang Biao, Han Yue and Lu Zhi, but these held appointments only as Consultants, and it seems likely that Ma Midi, as Counsellor Remonstrant, was the formal chairman and convenor of the group. Their work included annals for emperors An and Shun, for the infants Chong and Zhi and for Emperor Huan, with biographies updated to the end of the reign of Emperor Huan in 168. It was at this time that the history acquired the name of Dongguan Hanji, from the Eastern Pavilion 東觀 of the Southern Palace where the library and workrooms were located. In 178 Ma Midi was among a group of scholars who were consulted by Emperor Ling on a series of portents.

Ma Midi was later a colonel in the Northern Army, and in 188 he was made Grand Commandant, highest post in the imperial civil service. He probably owed his advancement to political adaptability in the eunuch interest, and he certainly paid money for the appointment.

Early in 189 Ma Midi was reduced in rank to become Minister of Ceremonies, but he was re-appointed Grand Commandant in 191 under the government of Dong Zhuo. After the assassination of Dong Zhuo in 192, he spoke bitterly against the subsequent killing of Cai Yong by Wang Yun.

Later that year, as Li Jue and other former officers of Dong Zhuo seized power at the capital, Ma Midi was named Grand Tutor with formal control of the Imperial Secretariat. He was then sent as ambassador for the new regime to the warlords of the east, but when he reached the camp of Yuan Shu he was forced to accompany him south to the Huai. Yuan Shu bullied and harassed him, seized his imperial insignia of authority, and tried to make him enter his service. Powerless and humiliated, Ma Midi became ill and died. Though a fine scholar, he was out of his depth as a public official.

In 197 his body was brought back to the imperial court, now controlled by Cao Cao at Xu city. It was suggested that he be given a state funeral, but Kong Rong argued that Ma Midi had been no more than a puppet for others and had failed to match the responsibilities of his great office. The proposal was dropped. -HHS 64/54:2117, 60/50A:1972, 60/50B:1990, 70/60:2264-65, SGZ 6:208-09, LS 14:8b.

Ma Mingsheng 馬鳴生 of Shu was the sage who taught Yin Changsheng q.v.

Ma Mu 馬牧 [the Shepherd] see Ma Yao 馬瑤.

Ma Mu 馬睦. In 162 Ma Mu was sent as Internuncio to command the local forces of Jing province against bandits from Yuzhang who were attacking Changsha. The army was defeated, and he and the Inspector Liu Du fled. Both men were sentenced to death less one degree. -HHS 38/28:1285, 86/76:2834.

Ma Peng 馬彭. A major under the general Ma Fang, in the spring of 78 he was sent with five thousand men in an oblique attack against the home country of the Qiang of Longxi, while his colleagues Xia Jun and Ma Peng led two other columns against the enemy. Attacking in combination, the three killed or captured over a thousand men and seized more than a hundred thousand cattle and sheep. -HHS 24/14:856.

Ma Ping 馬平 [Zishuo 子碩]; Youfufeng. Ma Ping's family claimed distant descent from the celebrated general Ma Yuan 援. During the 160s Ma Ping was a county commandant in Hanyang, and though he lost that post, he stayed in the west. Too poor to wed a Chinese, he took a woman of the Qiang people and they became the parents of Ma Teng. -HHS 72/62:2335, SGZ Shu 6:945.

Ma Pu 馬普; Jiyin. A scholar of history, Ma Pu came to the south during the civil war at the end of Han. The Administrator of Danyang Sun Yu ordered his officers and their dependents to receive his teachings. -SGZ Wu 6:1206.

Ma Qi 馬期. In 25 Ma Qi was Administrator of Wuwei under the Gengshi regime. When that government was destroyed, the commander Dou Rong was recognised as chief of the northwest. Ma Qi did not accept this and was obliged to leave. -HHS 23/13:797.

Ma Qi 馬齊 [Chengbo 承伯]; Ba. About 214 Ma Qi was Officer of Merit to the Administrator Zhang Fei. Zhang Fei praised him to Liu Bei, and Ma Qi was appointed to the Secretariat. He later joined the staff of Zhuge Liang and then became Administrator of Guanghan. After Zhuge Liang's death he returned to the Secretariat of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 15:1086-87. HYZ 12:222 lists Ma Can/Shen 馬參 with the style Chengbo as a hero of Ba commandery. Can/Shen was evidently an alternative or later personal name of Ma Qi.

Ma Qiang 馬強; Youfufeng. When Ma Rong was Administrator of Nan commandery about 146, the General-in-Chief Liang Ji had him accused of corruption. Among other allegations, it was claimed that Ma Rong's son Qiang had taken a bribe from the local Bo Shang to obtain a senior appointment on his local staff. -HHSJJ 60/50A:2130 Hui Dong quoting Sanfu juehu.

Ma Qin 馬秦 (d.218); Guanghan. In 218 Ma Qin and Gao Sheng led a great bandit force into Jianwei. The Administrator Li Yan brought commandery militia to defeat them, and both leaders were killed. -SGZ Shu 10:998-99.

Ma Qiu 馬秋 (d.215); Longxi. Son of Ma Chao by his secondary wife 小妻 the Lady Dong V, Ma Qiu and his mother were left in Hanzhong when Ma Chao left Zhang Lu to join Liu Bei in 214. When Cao Cao conquered Zhang Lu in 215, he gave Ma Qiu into his charge, and Zhang Lu killed him with his own hands. -SGZ Shu 6:948.

Ma Rong 馬融 [Jichang 季長] (79-166); Youfufeng. Ma Rong was one of seven sons of Ma Yan, possibly the youngest: commentary to the biography of Ma Yan at HHS 24/14:862 lists Ma Rong as the fifth son and Ma Xu as the last, but HHS 84/74:2785 describes Ma Xu as an elder brother of Ma Rong.

Handsome and talented, Ma Rong went to study with the scholar recluse Zhi Xun, who so admired his knowledge of the Confucian classics that he gave him his daughter in marriage. Probably about 100, when Ma Rong was in his early twenties, he and his brother Ma Xu were among the scholars chosen to assist the Lady Ban Zhao complete the Han shu of her late brother Ban Gu.

In 108 the general Deng Zhi invited Ma Rong to join his personal staff, but Ma Rong disapproved of him. He went to the borderlands of Wudu and Hanyang, but as the great Qiang rebellion became increasingly serious, food was in short supply and people were dying of starvation. So Ma Rong returned to take service with Deng Zhi, explaining in a letter to friends, and citing the teachings of the sages Laozi and Zhuangzi, that to avoid the wickedness of the court by destroying himself was not a proper course of action. He took the position of a disengaged "hermit at court" 朝隱, but he was a political operator and not all his contemporaries believed in the eremitic pose.

In 110 Ma Rong was appointed a collator in the library of the Eastern Pavilion, joining a team of scholars who were editing the classics and other philosophical texts under the supervision of the eunuch Cai Lun. Hitherto Confucianists had generally given preference to the civil arts and sought to downgrade military matters. No doubt influenced by his experience in the west, Ma Rong protested such imbalance, and in 115 he presented the satirical Guangcheng song 廣成頌 "Hymn to the Guangcheng Park" to make the point. His work offended the regent Dowager Deng, so Ma Rong gained no preferment. Though Deng Zhi's son Deng Feng recommended him, this did not help, for Deng Feng was disgraced in 118. Ma Rong remained at the Eastern Pavilion until about 120, when the death of his nephew gave him cause to resign. He was then proscribed even from local office.

Following the death of the Dowager in 121, Ma Rong was recalled to office. He was still only a gentleman cadet and he went out to be the head of stables to the king of Hejian, a very petty appointment. As Emperor An came on tour to the east in 124, however, Ma Rong presented a commemorative hymn, the emperor admired it, and Ma Rong was brought back to the capital, though still only as a member of the corps of cadets. When the emperor died in 125, and the Yan family placed the infant emperor Liu Yi upon the throne, Ma Rong pleaded ill health and returned home. He later became Officer of Merit in his commandery and then a county magistrate in Yingchuan. From this position he took the occasion of an eclipse to present a long memorial urging reform.

In 133, after a series of earthquakes and other ominous portents, there was a call for nominees to give advice, and Ma Rong was recommended by the senior official Cen Qi. His proposals were anodyne, but he was appointed a Consultant and became a senior member of staff of the General-in-Chief Liang Shang. In 140 he was Administrator of Wudu. He sent in protest against the punitive expedition proposed by Ma Xian; as he foretold, the enterprise was a disaster and major rebellion broke out as a consequence.

Ma Rong was later Administrator of Nan commandery. Though he governed well, the General-in-Chief Liang Ji became suspicious of his connection to Liang Buyi, his brother and potential rival, and he had Ma Rong impeached for corruption and sentenced to banishment in Shuofang. Ma Rong stabbed himself, but was then pardoned and reappointed as a Consultant. He returned to his scholarly work in the Eastern Pavilion.

Having defied two consort families and suffered the consequences, Ma Rong was evidently intimidated. He composed a hymn to the General-in-Chief, and it is claimed that in 147 he drafted the proposal to execute the loyal official Li Gu. Shamed by this, Ma Rong later retired on grounds of ill health. [There are doubts on this story.]

Ma Rong maintained an academy in his home until his death almost twenty years later, and his chequered official career was far out-weighted by his importance in the world of scholarship. A leader of Old Text learning, he regularly received more than a thousand students, including the later celebrated scholars Lu Zhi and Zheng Xuan. By eliminating many exaggerated theories of the official New Text, his work on the Confucian classics restored much of their authority; he compiled commentaries to the Analects of Confucius, to the Poetry and the History, the Ritual and Zhou li, the Book of Changes, and the Book of Filial Piety. Besides these, he also made notes on the Laozi, Huainan zi, the Li sao 離騷 of Qu Yuan 屈原 and on a Lienü zhuan 列女傳, biographies of women, either a work by Liu Xiang 劉向 of Former Han or the relevant chapter in the Han shu of Ban Gu. He produced a major commentary on the legal system and a great number of literary works, including rhapsodies, poems, hymns, songs, letters, inscriptions, essays and memorials.

Ma Rong reflected his eclectic approach to philosophy in his personal life. He would meet and teach students at the front of his home, but the rear part was private. There he played music – he was skilled on the drums, the zither and the flute – and enjoyed female companionship. He was "not bound by the moral constraints of the ru" 不拘儒之節. -HHS 60/50A*, XC 3:10a-b, JS 20:923; Künstler 69, Dull 72:37-38, Mather 76:557, Vervoorn 90:160-161.

Ma Run 馬閏; Guanghan. A local officer about 130, Ma Run revealed a private conversation with the Administrator Wu Fang. His colleague Yang Kuan and his brother Yang Kun spoke for him, but Ma Run later repeated his offence, and Yang Kuan in turn told of his private affairs. -HYGZ 10B:150.

Ma Shen 馬參 see Ma Qi 馬齊.

Ma Shi 馬寔/實 [Boqian 伯鸞]; Youfufeng. Presumably a member of the powerful clan of that region, when Ma Shi was a young man he studied the classics, and also the arts and skills of war. He travelled to Shanyang to pay his respects to Wang Chang, who at that time had yet to hold any official position. Wang Chang initially tried to turn him away but Ma Shi persisted, and Wang Chang eventually received him and treated him with the greatest friendship.

Returning to his home country, Ma Shi was recommended as Filial and Incorrupt and then joined the Imperial Secretariat. When the second great rebellion of the Qiang broke out in 140, Wang Chang was Director of the Secretariat and, knowing Ma Shi's interests and abilities, he recommended him for active service.

Ma Shi became Emissary to the Xiongnu, and in 143 he had an assassin kill the rebel chieftain Wusi. He sent the head to the court of Emperor Shun, and was rewarded with a hundred thousand cash. -HHS 6:273-74, 89/79:2963, XC 8:11b, HHJ 19:230.

Ma Shikuang 馬適匡 see Mashi Kuang 馬適匡.

Ma Shuan 馬鱣 Youfufeng. Fourth son of Ma Yan, Ma Shuan was known for his scholarship. When Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 57, he appointed him a gentleman cadet and invited him to the palace, but Ma Shuan did not distinguish himself further. -HHS 24/14:860-62. The character for this man's personal name can be pronounced in modern Mandarin as either shuan or zhuan. The reading shuan is indicated by HHS 24/14:860 TC; see also GSR:231I.

Ma Su 馬謖 [Youchang 幼常] (190-228); Nan. A younger brother of Ma Liang, Ma Su became an Assistant Officer to Liu Bei in Jing province. He later followed him to the west, where he became magistrate of Chengdu and then Administrator of Yuexi.

A talented man, Ma Su was interested in military planning, but Liu Bei was doubtful of his abilities in that field and warned Zhuge Liang. Zhuge Liang successfully used Ma Su as an adviser in his southern campaign, but when he gave Ma Su command against Wei in 228, Ma Su made serious errors and was defeated. Zhuge Liang executed him. -SGZ Shu 9.983-84.

Ma Tan 馬檀; Nanyang. Son of Ma Wu, Ma Tan succeeded to his father's marquisate in 61. Ten years later, however, he was stripped of his fief because it was claimed that his brother Boji had been involved with Yan Zhong in conspiracy on behalf of Liu Ying the King of Chu.. -HHS 22/12:786.

Ma Teng 馬騰 [Shoucheng 壽成] (d.212); Youfufeng. Ma Teng's family claimed descent from the celebrated general Ma Yuan 援, but Ma Teng's father Ma Ping was poor and his mother was a woman of the non-Chinese Qiang people. Ma Teng grew to be over eight feet tall [185 cm], well-built and strong-featured; he initially made a living as a wood-cutter.

Ma Teng later joined the militia and did well against the rebels of Liang province. In 187 he held a major's command under the Inspector Geng Bi, but when Geng Bi was killed by mutineers, Ma Teng and his men joined them, and under the command of Wang Guo he styled himself a general and joined the attack against Chang'an. After Wang Guo was defeated and deposed in 189, Ma Teng established himself in Longxi and maintained frontier warfare against the non-Chinese Qiang and Di.

When Dong Zhuo came to Chang'an in the early 190s he persuaded Ma Teng, with his fellow-rebel Han Sui of Jincheng, to assist him against the allies east of the mountains. After Dong Zhuo's death in 192 his successors, Li Jue and his fellows, confirmed Ma Teng as a general; he camped in Youfufeng.

In 194 Ma Teng turned against Li Jue and his colleagues, and attacked them with the aid of sympathisers inside Luoyang. He was supported by Han Sui, but they were defeated at the Changping Slope northwest of Chang'an. Withdrawing into Liang province, Ma Teng was pardoned and again given a general's title.

About 197 Ma Teng was persuaded by Cao Cao's agent Zhong Yao to send hostages to the imperial court. Soon afterwards, again probably under the influence of Zhong Yao, he quarrelled with Han Sui, and their forces were engaged in a number of skirmishes. Han Sui apparently had the better of the exchanges, at one time capturing and killing Ma Teng's wife and some children. Zhong Yao eventually negotiated a truce, and Ma Teng withdrew to his home territory of Youfufeng, setting his base at Huaili, near Chang'an; he was popular in that region.

In 202, Cao Cao's agent Zhang Ji persuaded Ma Teng to send his son Ma Chao with troops to support Zhong Yao against Yuan Shao's officer Guo Yuan in Hedong, and in 205 he and others assisted Du Ji, Cao Cao's new Administrator of Hedong, against the warlord Zhang Cheng.

In 208 Cao Cao's agent Zhang Ji persuaded Ma Teng to travel to the east. He was enfeoffed and appointed Minister of the Guards, but was kept hostage at Ye city while Ma Chao took over his troops in Liang province. In 211 Ma Chao joined Han Sui against Cao Cao, and in the following summer Ma Teng and his household were killed. -SGZ 6:182-87, 13:392-93, 15:472, SGZ Shu 6:945, HHS 72/62:2333, 2343.

Ma Tie 馬鐵 (d.212); Longxi. Son of Ma Teng and younger brother of Ma Chao and Ma Xiu, in 208 he went with his father to Ye city and held minor military office in the imperial government under Cao Cao. In 212 he was executed with Ma Teng in revenge for Ma Chao's opposition to Cao Cao in the northwest. -SGZ Shu 6:945.

Ma Wan 馬玩. In 211 Ma Wan was one of the north-western warlords who opposed Cao Cao; they were defeated at the battle of Huayin. -SGZ Shu 6:946.

Ma Wei 馬衛; Nanyang. Son of Ma Cheng, he succeeded to his fief in 56. -HHS 22/12:780.

Ma [Wenxu] 馬文緒; Jiyin. A brother of Ma Jiang, he is described as a man of talent. He served as commandery Registrar and Investigator, but died at the age of thirty-two. In 170, when a stele was erected in memory of Ma Jiang and of his late widow the Lady Cao, Ma Wenxu was also mentioned. -LS 8:11b-13a.

Ma Wu 馬武 [Zizhang 子張] (d.61); Nanyang. As a young man of the gentry, about 20 Ma Wu took refuge in Jiangxia from the consequences of a family feud. There he joined local bandits and became a leader of the Troops from Xinshi, associated with Wang Kuang and Wang Feng. He accompanied the group as they moved north into Nanyang and joined Liu Bosheng and the gentry rebels against Wang Mang.

When Liu Xuan took title as [the Gengshi] Emperor in the spring of 23, Ma Wu failed to obtain ministerial rank, but he was named a Palace Attendant, and after the victory at Kunyang in the summer he was made a general. In 24 he served under Xie Gong in the campaign to support Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu and at that time regional commissioner, against Wang Lang.

Following the defeat of Wang Lang, Liu Xiu had private contact with Ma Wu, and when Xie Gong was murdered by his nominal allies at the end of the year Ma Wu had no hesitation in changing allegiance. As Bielenstein observes, Ma Wu's position as a member of the gentry, particularly from Liu Xiu's home commandery, made it easier for him to gain acceptance than for commoner bandit leaders who received less generous treatment. On the other hand, as a late-comer to Liu Xiu's service, Ma Wu was low in the ranks of the Nanyang faction who supported the future emperor; he later became an adherent of the Dou family from the northwest.

Ma Wu became an attendant of Liu Xiu, and in late 24 he commanded the rear-guard of the army against the Youlai and Five Banners bandits in the north. After initial success, early in 25 the troops advanced too confidently and were taken by surprise. Ma Wu defended the withdrawal, broke the enemy line, and prevented the setback from turning into a debacle.

He was then in the van as the army of Wu Han and He Yan moved into Yuyang and Youbeiping. Following this success, and the victory achieved by Kou Xun over Zhu Wei at Luoyang, Ma Wu was the spokesman for Liu Xiu's generals as they urged him to take the imperial title. In accordance with propriety, Liu Xiu refused, and he accepted only on the fourth request, in the sixth month. He named Ma Wu a Palace Attendant and Commandant of Cavalry, and enfeoffed him as a county marquis.

In 26 Ma Wu took part in the campaign of Wu Han against the Tanxiang bandits of Dong and Wei commanderies, then followed He Yan to attack Liu Yong. After the death of Liu Yong, in 28 he led a detached force to capture county cities in Jiyin. Named as a general, in the autumn he was sent with Wang Ba to lay siege to the remnant of Liu Yong's party, now formally headed by his son Liu Yu, at Chuihui in Pei.

In the spring of 29, as a relief force under Su Mao appeared, Ma Wu lost his stores to a cavalry attack, then suffered a sortie from Chuihui led by Zhou Jian. His men fled, but Wang Ba had kept his troops in reserve, and as Su Mao and Zhou Jian pursued Ma Wu he struck them from the rear and turned the battle. On the following day Su Mao and Zhou Jian challenged the imperial troops to fight, but they refused, and as Su Mao and Zhou Jian withdrew they found the gates of Chuihui closed against them. Ma Wu and Wang Ba now attacked. They killed Zhou Jian, occupied the city, and put the rest of the enemy to flight.

Soon afterwards Pang Meng rebelled in Chu and drove He Yan north across the Si River. Ma Wu made a successful counter-attack, but Pang Meng established himself in Dongping/Rencheng. In the sixth month the imperial army under Guangwu arrived, and Ma Wu joined the campaign which defeated Pang Meng and the south-eastern warlords.

In the summer of 30 Ma Wu was ordered to join the chief general Geng Yan, initially to advance against Gongsun Shu, but then in direct attack on the recalcitrant Wei Ao. The imperial troops were defeated on the Long Slope, and as they withdrew Ma Wu once more took command of a rear guard. With a group of elite cavalry he halted Wei Ao's men, killing several thousand of the enemy and gaining a respite for the main forces to regroup.

In 35, as Wu Han attacked Gongsun Shu through the Yangzi Gorges, Ma Wu and others were sent to attack Wudu commandery in the north. After Gongsun Shu was destroyed, in 37 Ma Wu's fief was raised in value and transferred to Pingyuan, and he was sent north against the Xiongnu to support the defences in Changshan. His base was at Xiaquyang in Julu, on the Hutuo River east of present-day Shijiazhuang in Hebei; his position on the edge of the North China plain indicates the depth of the raiders' incursions, and two years later he was involved with Wu Han and Ma Cheng in the evacuation of Yanmen, Dai and Shanggu, bringing Chinese officials and people from those commanderies to be resettled in the plain.

Ma Wu was later found guilty of having killed one of his officers. He was ordered to take his family to residence in his fief, but went instead directly to Luoyang to return his general's insignia. His estate was reduced by five hundred households, and his fief was shifted to a smaller territory, but he was granted title as Servant at Court, which allowed him to remain at Luoyang. Ma Wu sometimes drank too much and made inappropriate comments, but Guangwu was prepared to laugh at his faults.

Following several years without appointment, in 48 Ma Wu was named a General of the Household to accompany Ma Yuan against the non-Chinese people of Wuling. After the successful conclusion of the campaign at the end of 49, he returned to the capital and handed in his insignia, but then joined Geng Shu and Liang Song in the unjustified denigration of Ma Yuan's responsibility for the victory, while he also claimed that Ma Yuan had appropriated pearls and rhinoceros horn after his campaign in the far south in 43.

In 51, following the establishment of the Xiongnu prince Bi as Southern Shanyu under Chinese protection, his northern rival the Shanyu Punu sent ambassadors to seek terms of peace on his own. At the court conference held to discuss the matter, Ma Wu and Zang Gong were leaders of the party which urged rejection of peace and a full-scale attack to destroy the northern state. Their advice was not accepted, but forty years later the Northern Shanyu was indeed destroyed by the armies of Dou Xian; the aftermath of that apparent triumph would indicate that Guangwu made the right decision.

After a further period without command, in 58, early in the reign of Guangwu's son Emperor Ming, Ma Wu was once more appointed a general and sent west against Dianyu, war-leader of the Qiang, whose forces had over-run Jincheng and Longxi. Ma Wu's army of forty thousand included trained men from the camps about Chang'an and from Liyang in Wei commandery, together with contingents of Wuhuan, loyal Qiang and other non-Chinese, as well as a number of convicts released into military service. His subordinate commanders included Wang Feng, Dou Gu and Chen Xin.

The army was victorious in a skirmish near present-day Lanzhou, but as the Chinese advanced through the Xining valley they were in their turn defeated, and the raiders escaped across the frontier. Nothing daunted, Ma Wu led his men south into the enemy homeland on the upper Yellow River, and there he gained real success: 4,600 Qiang were killed, 1,600 were captured, and the remainder took to flight. In 59 Dianyu surrendered and, following the earlier policy of Ma Yuan, Ma Wu brought seven thousand of the non-Chinese people east to settle in the region about Chang'an. In the long term this would be a problem, but for the time being the frontier troubles were ended.

Rewarded with an increased pension from his fief, Ma Wu died two years later. When Emperor Ming had portraits of his father's great servants painted on the Cloud Terrace of the Southern Palace at Luoyang, Ma Wu was among those who were honoured. -HHS 22/12:784-86*, 11/1:467, XC 1:4a; Bn 54:106-136, Bn 59:18-20, 77, 86, 102, 142, Bn 67:70, 113, 123-126, Bn 76:26, deC 84:79, 248.

Ma Xian 馬賢 (d.141). A Commandant of Cavalry in 113, Ma Xian accompanied the Protector Hou Ba in an attack on rebel Qiang in Anding. They captured a thousand men and twenty thousand herd animals, which were given to the non-Chinese who had assisted them. In the following year they led their allies west and re-took the territory on the upper reaches of the Yellow River, and in 115, after the disgrace of Pang Can for the failed offensive against Beidi, Ma Xian replaced him as Protector of the Qiang.

In the winter of 117 Ma Xian joined the general Ren Shang for a final assault on the last major Qiang leader, Langmo. His troops were initially defeated by Langmo in Anding, but the combined army then gained a decisive victory at Fuping in Beidi, on the Yellow River by present-day Qingyang in eastern Gansu. Five thousand of the enemy were killed, a hundred thousand head of stock were taken, and a thousand prisoners were rescued.

Though the major Qiang rebellion was ended, lesser risings and raids remained endemic. In 119 Ma Xian killed Haoliang in Longxi, and in 120 he led an army into Zhangye against raiders from the Shendi tribe of Shang commandery: he was defeated in the first engagement but destroyed the enemy on the next day. He then had to deal with the Dangjian tribe in Jincheng and the Shaodang and Shaoh in Zhangye, each of which had taken advantage of his absence. And in 121 he summoned the Dangjian chieftain Luhu from the upper Yellow River and cut off his head.

Ma Xian was enfeoffed for his successes, but Luhu's comrade Renliang predictably distrusted him. Forming a coalition to attack the Xining valley and Jincheng, he defeated Ma Xian and his auxiliaries of the Xianlian tribe; while at the same time the chieftain Manu of the Shaodang group defeated the commandery troops of Wuwei and Zhangye and plundered the region. Recovering from this set-back, Ma Xian pursued the enemy forces south through the Xining valley and across the Yellow River, defeating them and forcing their surrender.

After some further disturbances, in 126 Ma Xian defeated the Zhong tribe of the Qiang in Longxi and was again raised in fief. For the next few years Liang province remained without incident, but in 129 Ma Xian was dismissed for some wrongdoing.

In 133, reacting to Chinese expansion, the chieftain Langfeng attacked Longxi and Hanyang. The Protector Ma Xu [not a close kinsman] gained some success against the raiders, but Ma Xian was then appointed as Internuncio to take command. In 134 he killed 1,800 men and seized 50,000 head of herding beasts, and in 135 he killed Langfeng and forced his followers to surrender. He then turned against Langfeng's colleague Jiechang and likewise forced his submission.

In the following year Ma Xu was transferred to be General on the Liao. Ma Xian took his place as Protector, and in 137 he attacked and killed Jizhi and Leizu, leaders of the White Horse Qiang who lived on the frontier of Wudu and had been troubling the territory for some years. It was claimed that the northwest was now settled, but in 138 the Shaodang chieftain Nali brought three thousand horsemen to raid Jincheng. Ma Xian defeated them, capturing 1,400 horses, but the raiders turned west to attack Chinese settlements and allies. In 139 Ma Xian led ten thousand cavalry of the Huangzhong Auxiliary and other non-Chinese, and this time he killed Nali, took 1,200 heads, and obtained over a hundred thousand herding animals. He was promoted to be Administrator of Hongnong.

Ma Xian had been succeeded as Protector by a joint appointment of Lai Ji and Liu Bing, but despite advice they evidently caused trouble: in 140 a series of attacks by groups of Qiang against Jincheng stirred up rebellion amongst the non-Chinese of the Xining valley, many of whom had traditionally been allies of China. The combined force advanced to ravage the region about Chang'an, and Ma Xian was named a general and given command of a hundred thousand men, including elements of the professional Northern Army and also local militia. He advanced into Hanyang, while three hundred fortresses were set up to guard the Wei valley.

Though his nominal command was large, few of his men appear to have been suitable for active service, for at the beginning of 141 Ma Xian took only some six thousand horsemen into Beidi to attack the insurgents. In a major disaster for the Chinese, Ma Xian's small force was wiped out by the enemy, he and his two sons were killed, and the rebellion spread across northwest China as far as the Yellow River in Zuopingyi.

Emperor Shun mourned Ma Xian. He awarded grain and cloth to his family, and enfeoffed his grandson Guang as a village marquis with an annual pension of a million cash.

Ma Xian had spent almost thirty years on the frontier and his military career had been largely successful, but it appears from the record that he was both fierce and greedy. He was always aggressive, and his frequent seizure of herding animals – 50,000 from the Zhong tribe in 134 and 100,000 from the Shaodang in 138 – can have done little to reconcile the Qiang people. In that regard, the policy of Ma Xian and his colleagues explains much of the trouble which the empire encountered on the frontier. -HHS 87/77:2888-95; deC 84:106-120.

Ma Xian 馬憲; Wei. Possibly a eunuch, as a Palace Internuncio in 135 Ma Xian was responsible for the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang; because the bridge was built at the junction of the Gu with the Yang Canal, it is also known as the Yang Canal Bridge.

This has been claimed as the first bridge in China to be built entirely of stone, though Needham observes from the inscription recorded in SJZ 16 that it was probably constructed with stone pylons and wooden beams rather than with full stone arches. -SJZ 16:14b; Needham 71:172, Bn 76:17.

Ma Xiang 馬襄. Chief Clerk of Xihe in 62, Ma Xiang led local troops to aid the Southern Shanyu Shi repel a raid by the Northern Xiongnu against the frontiers of Wuyuan and Yunzhong. -HHS 89/79:2948.

Ma Xiang 馬香; Nanyang. Son of Ma Wei, he succeeded to the family marquise. -HHS 22/12:780.

Ma Xiang 馬香/相 (d.188). Bandits of Liang province, Ma Xiang and his colleague Zhao Zhi extended their operations south into Guanghan. Describing themselves as Yellow Turbans, within a very short time they had raised several thousand followers. They killed the magistrate Li Sheng, and as the government forces scattered their army rose to more than ten thousand men.

Ma Xiang then sent troops to attack Luo city, headquarters of Yi province, where they killed the Inspector Que Jian; in the east his men defeated and killed Zhao Bu the Administrator of Ba commandery.

As the rebels dominated the north of the province, Ma Xiang took the imperial title, but the Assistant Officer Jia Long then led a counter-attack from Jianwei, defeated Ma Xiang and killed him. -HHS 8:356, 75/65:2432, SGZ Shu 1:866, HYGZ 5:70.

Ma Xin 馬歆; Youfufeng. Third son of Ma Yan, he did not distinguish himself. -HHS 24/14:862.

Ma Xiu 馬休 (d.212); Longxi. Son of Ma Teng and younger brother of Ma Chao, he accompanied his father to Ye city in 208 and held minor military office in the imperial government under Cao Cao. In 212 he was executed with Ma Teng in revenge for Ma Chao's opposition to Cao Cao in the northwest. -SGZ Shu 6: 945.

Ma Xu 馬余 see Ma Yu 馬余.

Ma Xu 馬續 [Jize 季則]; Youfufeng. A son of Ma Yan, he was possibly the youngest: XTS 72C:2722 and commentary to the biography of Ma Yan at HHS 24/14:862 TC lists his seven sons with Ma Rong as the fifth and Ma Xu as the last; but HHS 84/74:2785, describes him as elder brother to Ma Rong, who was born in 79.

At the age of seven Ma Xu had read the Analects, by thirteen he understood the Classic of History, and at sixteen he controlled the Poetry and had a broad knowledge of the rest of the canon. He was also an expert mathematician and astronomer. The death of Ban Gu in 92, involved in the fallen faction of the Dou family, meant that his work on Han shu was left in disarray, while the Treatise on the Heavens 天文志 and the Tables 表 remained unfinished. Emperor He gave instructions that Ban Gu's sister the Lady Ban Zhao should complete the work in the library of the Eastern Pavilion with the assistance of scholars including Ma Xu and his brother Ma Rong; the two were at that time probably in their twenties. Though the Lady Ban had some ability in mathematics and astronomy, it is generally accepted that Ma Xu compiled the Treatise on the Heavens, and he may also have been involved in preparing the substantial introduction to the Table of Officials 百官公卿表: see MBeck 90:112, also Swann 32 and Bn 80. The Treatise on the Heavens is a major work, combining historical data of Former Han with knowledge acquired during the first century AD, including the calculation of synodic cycles and the attempted prediction of eclipses: see Needham 59:200.

After the conclusion of this scholarly enterprise

Ma Xu evidently obtained appointment in the regular imperial service. The first posts he held are not recorded, but in the autumn of 119 he was Emissary to the Xiongnu stationed in Xihe when a large force of Xianbi attacked the frontiers of Dai commandery. Similar incursions had taken place the year before, but this time the Chinese response was effective, as Ma Xu brought Xiongnu cavalry to assist Deng Zun, the General on the Liao, and militia from further east. They caught and defeated the raiders in the field, pursued them across the frontier, and returned with booty. The office of Emissary did not necessarily entail command of troops, so this was probably Ma Xu's first experience of active service.

During the 120s Ma Xu became Administrator of the frontier commandery of Zhangye, and in 131 he was appointed Protector of the Qiang, responsible both for liaison with the non-Chinese of the northwest and also, if required, for military action. Though the great Qiang rebellion had ended in 118, the northwest had long suffered its effects, but in 129, on urgings from the official Yu Xu, the court had resolved to restore the position of the past. Transferring the headquarters of Anding, Beidi and Shang commanderies back to their former territories, the Chinese began a program of resettlement, and Han Hao, Ma Xu's predecessor, had set up military colonies on the Yellow River west of Longxi.

The Qiang were restless at this, and Ma Xu at first conciliated them by withdrawing the colonies north into the Xining valley of Jincheng; then, however, he developed that new area until by 132 there were fifty such settlements. In 133 a commandant's district was set up in the south of Longxi and in the following year, reacting to the Chinese expansion, the Qiang chieftain Langfeng attacked Longxi and Hanyang. Ma Xu achieved some success against the raiders, but a former Protector Ma Xian [not a close kinsman] was then handed command of operations; he killed Langfeng and forced his followers to surrender.

In 136 Ma Xu was transferred to be General on the Liao, commanding a army based in Wuyuan to watch the Xiongnu. In the early summer of 140 the chieftains Wusi and Che'niu led a rising in Yunzhong and Dingxiang, then moved west against Xihe, where they attracted the support of the Worthy King of the Right, Yiti. Eight thousand men now raided across the north of the Ordos region, killing senior officials in Dai and Shuofang, and attacking the capital of the Shanyu Xiuli at Meiji in Xihe.

Aided by the Emissary Liang Bing, Ma Xu raised garrison troops and local levies, reinforced by Qiang tribesmen from the south and Wuhuan and Xianbi auxiliaries led by Wang Yuan the Protector of the Wuhuan. Though the combined army of twenty thousand forced the rebel Xiongnu back, they could not be brought to surrender and they continued to ravage the countryside. A few weeks later the situation was made more serious by rebellion among the Qiang to the south, followed by the suicide of the Southern Shanyu under pressure from the official Chen Gui. The traditional leadership of the Xiongnu thus fell into limbo, and in autumn, supported by his dominant colleague Wusi, Che'niu claimed the vacant title.

Ma Xu had been ordered to avoid direct combat, but to establish defences in the north and persuade the rebels to surrender. The Worthy King Yiti did return to his allegiance, but this was now of small consequence, for Wusi and Che'niu had the greater support, and had links with the Qiang and the Wuhuan. Defeating the local troops of Shang commandery, they raided south towards the Wei valley, while their influence extended from Bing southwest into Liang province, east into You, and even across the Taihang ranges to the North China plain. The empire was obliged to withdraw the administration of Xihe and Shang commanderies to the south, and combine Shuofang into Wuyuan, where the remnant civilian regime could be guarded by the garrison under Ma Xu.

In the winter at the end of 140 the Emissary Zhang Dan defeated the Xiongnu in Yanmen and forced the surrender of Che'niu, and a few weeks later Ma Xu led five thousand Xianbi horsemen to defeat Wusi and his Wuhuan allies in Xihe. Wusi made his escape, and continued his depredations in Bing province until he was assassinated in 143.

Ma Xu had been replaced as General on the Liao in the summer of 141; it is not known when he died. Though he has only a minimal biography in HHS, Ma Xu's abilities and career represent a notable combination of the talent in his family. As an indication of the variety of his achievements, CHOC indexes him as two different men, one the astronomer and the other a frontier general. -HHS 24/14:862, 87/77: 2894, 89/79:2960-62; Needham 59:200, 265, MBeck 90:112, 172-173, 196-197, 270, deC 84:117-118, 298, 306-315.

Ma Xuan 馬玄. An officer on the staff of Zhao Chong the Protector of the Qiang in 144, Ma Xuan went over to the Qiang and sought to lead them outside the frontier. The Deputy Protector Wei Ju/Yao chased the fugitives and heavily defeated them, but when Zhao Chong sought to follow up this success, he was caught in an ambush and killed. -HHS 87/77:2897.

Ma Xuan 馬玄; Nanyang. Son of Ma Feng, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 22/12:780.

Ma Xun 馬勳 [Shengheng 盛衡]; Ba. A clerical officer under Liu Zhang, Ma Xun was appointed to Liu Bei's staff as he took over Yi province in 214, and later served as his Attendant Officer. He died about 220. - SGZ Shu 15:1086-87.

Ma Yan 馬嚴 [Weiqing 威卿] (17-98); Youfufeng. Ma Yan's father Yu, an elder brother of Ma Yuan 援, held office and was enfeoffed under Wang Mang, but died in 23 when Ma Yan was very young.

After Ma Yu's death, Ma Yan's mother went with him and his younger brother Ma Dun to live with the father of his elder sister's husband, Wang Shu 王述, who was Administrator of Jiujiang and had been a marquis under Wang Mang. Ma Yan's mother died in the following year, and about the same time Wang Shu lost his position with the fall of Wang Mang's regime. The family went to live in Pei commandery, where Wang Shu died in 26. In the following year Ma Yan's cousin Cao Gong became a county magistrate in Chu, and he invited Ma Yan and Ma Dun to join him.

Late in 28 Ma Yan's uncle Ma Yuan came past on an embassy from Wei Ao to Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time campaigning against Li Xian in the southeast, and on his return in 29 he took Ma Yan and Ma Dun with him to the northwest. Ma Yan, now eleven, was taught military arts by one of the family retainers, became expert in sword-play and a practiced archer and horseman. He also studied the Confucian classics under Yang Taibo of Pingyuan, and at the age of thirteen he went to Luoyang where he was tutored by Chen Yuan in the Old Text scholarship of Chunqiu with Zuo zhuan. He proceeded to study the teachings of all the pre-Qin schools, was admired by the most senior men of the capital, and became a protégé of the powerful slave Bu.

For a time Ma Yan held local office as an Investigator in his native commandery of Youfufeng. His uncle Ma Yuan regularly discussed matters with him, and gave him charge of the affairs of the family. On the other hand, in the early 40s he wrote to reprimand Ma Yan and his brother Dun for their assumption of a high moral tone and their willingness to criticise others.

After Ma Yuan's death and posthumous disgrace in 49, the Ma were so out of favour that they were unable to give his body burial in the family tomb, and even an audience with Guangwu failed to win a pardon. Ma Yan and Ma Dun withdrew to Anling in Youfufeng, where they took up residence in the district of Juxia. Admired for their fine conduct, they were known in the region as the "two gentlemen of Juxia" 鉅下二卿.

Ma Yan encouraged the widow of Ma Yuan to offer her three daughters to the imperial family, and he sent a letter to Emperor Guangwu, noting the family's previous connection to the throne through two concubines of Emperor Cheng of Former Han, and praising the qualities of the young women. In 52 the junior Lady Ma was selected into the harem of the Heir Liu Zhuang, future Emperor Ming, and she was appointed as his empress in 60.

Even after this success, Ma Yan remained in retirement. Indeed, anxious that he might be the object of envy and criticism because of his connection to the throne, he sent all guests and clients away and moved into Beidi.

In 72 the empress arranged for Ma Yan to be called to Luoyang and received by Emperor Ming. The emperor was impressed and appointed him to the committee which was compiling the annals of the reign of Emperor Guangwu; this work, initially known as the "Diary of the Jianwu Period" 建武注記, became the first part of Dongguan Han ji. As Bielenstein observes, the committee was delicately balanced: it was chaired by Ban Gu, a member of the Dou faction which had been instrumental in the disgrace of Ma Yuan in 49; Ma Yan and Meng Ji represented the rival interest; and Chen Zong and Du Fu were probably neutral: Bn 79:121. Ma Yan was also friendly with members of the imperial clan; he joined the scholar Liu Fu in discussions on government, and both men were favoured by Emperor Ming.

Later Ma Yan was appointed Chief Clerk at Meiji in Xihe, with three thousand men of the Northern Army and Feathered Forest troops guarding the Southern Shanyu. He had majors and attendant officials under his command, and authority over local officials. As he was leaving Luoyang, he passed by the Arsenal and held sacrifice to Chiyou 蚩尤 the god of war. The emperor came to see the parade, and the people admired the quality of his troops.

When Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75 he appointed Ma Yan to the Imperial Censorate and soon afterwards made him its head; his son Ma Shuan became a gentleman cadet. In response to an eclipse of the sun that winter, the new ruler invited officials to present sealed memorials, and Ma Yan took occasion to deplore the lack of energy and concern displayed by provincial officials. He particularly accused the inspectors Zhu Fu, Ni Yue and Yin Ye, in Yi, Yang and Liang provinces, for the poor quality of candidates they recommended for office. He regretted the decision of Emperor Guangwu to do away with the office of the Guardian of Honesty, a censorial office under the Excellency over the Masses which had formerly reviewed nominees, but argued that officials should in any case be held to account.

The emperor dismissed all three inspectors. On the other hand, considering that Zhu Fu, long-serving in Yi province, had persuaded many non-Chinese in the southwest to submit to Han, and that the tribes which had come to him withdrew after he left, Ma Yan's criticisms may have been excessive, and not necessarily fair or appropriate.

In 76 Ma Yan was transferred to be a General of the Household, and three more of his sons were made cadet gentlemen. Ma Yan was regularly involved in discussions on frontier policy, and when the hero Geng Gong took leave for the death of his mother, Ma Yan was sent to present an ox and wine for the funeral, then ask him to end his mourning and return to office at Luoyang.

In 77 Ma Yan was named Administrator of Chenliu. As he left the capital he warned Emperor Zhang not to allow the Dou family too close to the throne, and cited the disgrace of Dou Xun under Emperor Ming and the wasteful expedition into the Western Regions led by Dou Gu in 73. Just at this time, two daughters of Dou Xun had been admitted to the imperial harem, and the eldest of them would be appointed empress in the following year. Dou Gu's enterprise, moreover, had not been so unsuccessful as Ma Yan implied. It is likely that his admonitions were designed to assist the intrigues of the Dowager Ma in support of the Ladies Song, her own candidates for the position of consort. In the event, Ma Yan's comments were reported to the Dou family, which did rise to power.

As soon as Ma Yan arrived in Chenliu he established firm government and kept his territory quiet. When there was a rumour that bandits were approaching from the east the people fled in all directions, spreading panic through neighbouring commanderies and affecting the capital. Imperial couriers were sent out to seek reports, but Ma Yan believed the fears to be groundless and made no special preparations for defence. His judgement proved correct.

In Chenliu Ma Yan reported the county magistrate Cao Bao, a scholar of ritual, for failing to execute a group of captured bandits, and had him dismissed for lack of moral courage. On another occasion he was taken ill and sent his officer Li Gong to report to the capital. Emperor Zhang called Li Gong to a personal audience, enquired about Ma Yan's condition, sent presents of gold, silk and a sword, and despatched the imperial physician to treat him.

In 81 Ma Yan was recalled on account of his involvement with the ministers Liu Yi and Ding Hong. He was still appointed a Palace Counsellor and then Court Architect, but in 82 the Empress Dou confirmed her authority in the harem by arranging the change of Heir and the elimination of the Song sisters, protégées of the late Dowager Ma. The power of the Ma family was broken and Ma Yan was dismissed.

Because of the enmity of the Dou, Ma Yan never held office again, and when Emperor Zhang died and the Lady Dou became regent Dowager he retired from public life to concentrate on the education of his sons and grandsons. He died at home, aged over eighty. -HHS 24/14:858-62*, 40/30A:1334; Bn 54:10.

Ma Yan 馬延. In 204 Ma Yan was an officer under Yuan Shang facing Cao Cao. As the armies engaged outside Ye city, he led his troops to change sides. -SGZ 1:25, 6:202.

Ma Yao 馬瑤; Youfufeng. In the second century Ma Yan lived as a hermit in the hills and trapped rabbits for a living. He had great influence for good among the local people, who named him Master Ma the Shepherd 馬牧先生. -HHS 83/73:2772.

Ma Yi 馬義, the Lady; Ba. Wife of Ma Miaoqi, who died when she was young, the Lady refused to marry again. As Qiang raiders attacked her homeland about 110, she was afraid they would take her chastity. With the Lady Wang Ji and the Lady Zhao Hua, two women in the same situation, she leapt into the Han River and drowned herself. They were celebrated as the Three Virtuous Women 三貞. -HYGZ 1:4.

Ma Yi 馬翼. In 124 Ma Yi was Emissary to the new Shanyu Ba of the Southern Xiongnu. The chieftain Azu rebelled and attempted to flee across the frontier to the north. The General on the Liao, Fa Du, was evidently ill, for he died soon afterwards, but Ma Yi led troops in pursuit of the fugitives and killed great numbers of them. None appear to have made their escape. -HHS 89/79:2959.

Ma Yi 馬毅; Youfufeng. A descendant of Ma Yuan 援, Ma Yi became Commandant of the Zhangye Dependent State.

As an elder cousin of Ma Leng, when Ma Leng's parents died he cared for him as if he had been his own brother. Ma Yi himself died comparatively young, leaving no children, and Ma Leng maintained full three-year mourning for him. -HHS 24/14:862.

Ma Yi 馬邑; Nanyang. Son of Ma Xuan, he succeeded to the family fief. -HHS 22/12:780.

Ma Ying 馬英 [Wensi 文思] (d.121); Taishan. In 115 Ma Ying was promoted from Minister Coachman to be Grand Commandant.

In 118 the successful general Ren Shang faced charges of corruption. Ma Ying and his colleague Li He joined members of the Deng family in seeking to shield him, but the Excellency Liu Kai pressed the case. Ren Shang was executed and Ma Ying and Li He were reprimanded.

In 121 Ma Ying died in office. -HHS 5:223-33, 39/29:1308.

Ma Yu 馬余 or Ma Xu [Shengqing 聖卿] (d.23); Youfufeng. Second elder brother of Ma Yuan 援, Ma Yu was a colonel in the Northern Army and Inspector of Yang province under Wang Mang, and received enfeoffment. -HHS 14/4:827, DGHJ 12:1a.

Ma Yu 馬豫 (d.83); Youfufeng. Son of Ma Liao and a nephew of the Dowager Ma, former empress of Emperor Ming, Ma Yu became a colonel in the Northern Army. The Dowager had sought to protect her kinfolk by arranging the appointment of Liu Qing, son of her cousin the Honoured Lady Song, as Heir, but after her death in 79 all the family was exposed to attack. In 82 the intrigues of the Empress Dou and her family were successful: Liu Qing was dismissed as Heir and the Ladies Song were forced to suicide.

In the following year it was reported that Ma Yu had complained to some junior members of the clan about the family's loss of influence. The senior ministers recommended that he should be dismissed from his appointment for criticising the throne; he was executed soon afterwards. -HHS 24/14:855.

Ma Yu 馬宇 (d.194). Early in 194 Ma Yu was a Palace Attendant at Chang'an under the control of Li Jue and his fellow-generals. There was a quarrel between Li Jue's party and the Liang province warlord Ma Teng, and Ma Yu joined Chong Shao in a plot to serve as agents within the capital for Ma Teng and to kill Li Jue. The conspiracy was discovered and the plotters fled to Huaili in Youfufeng, just west of Chang'an. Li Jue's army drove Ma Teng away, then captured Huaili and killed them. -HHS 56/46:1830, 72/62:3334.

Ma Yuan 馬援 [Jizhu 季主]; Youfufeng. Next elder brother of Ma Yuan 援, he became Administrator of Shang commandery under Wang Mang. As the regime was destroyed in 23 he fled into Liang province.

At the end of 25, after Emperor Guangwu had taken the throne, Ma Yuan went to join him at Luoyang and was reappointed to his former office in Shang. He died there a short time later. -HHS 24/14:827-29.

Ma Yuan 馬援 [Wenyuan 文淵] (14 BC-49 AD); Youfufeng. Tracing its ancestry back to the pre-Qin state of Zhao 趙, Ma Yuan's family had been brought to the region of the imperial capital in the time of Emperor Wu of Former Han. His ancestor Ma Tong 馬通 rose to high office, but rebelled and was executed after the Witchcraft Case of 91 BC. [After Ma Yuan's daughter became the consort of Emperor Ming, Ma Tong's surname was changed in the histories to 莽, pronounced Mu: Dubs 44:118, Bn 79:122, QHX:441.]

Two of Ma Yuan's aunts had entered the harem of Emperor Cheng, but the male generations of the family gained no high appointments. Ma Yuan's father Zhong 仲 died in 3 BC, when Ma Yuan was twelve sui, and Ma Yuan then lived with his elder brother Kuang. Ma Yuan grew to be seven feet five inches tall [173 cm] and DGHJ provides a [perhaps idealised] physical description: regular complexion and colour, strong hair, heavy brows and eyes like a dragon.

Ma Yuan studied at the capital under Man/Pu Chang 滿/溥昌, expert in the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Qi, but he was no great scholar. His elder brothers Kuang, Yu and Yuan 員, however, all of whom held office under Wang Mang, admired his abilities and potential, but rather than follow their administrative careers Ma Yuan planned to make his fortune as a grazier in the northwest. Ma Kuang argued against the idea but died about this time. Ma Yuan carried out full mourning for him, then became an Investigator in Youfufeng, his home commandery. As he was escorting a prisoner accused of a serious crime, Ma Yuan took pity on the man: he let him go, and himself fled into Beidi. A general amnesty was issued soon afterwards, and he was able to set himself up as a pastoralist.

Ma Yuan had connections in the region through his grandfather, his father and his brother Yuan 員, who had acquired clients and held office in the government horse-breeding enterprise. Now in his thirties and evidently a man of personal authority, Ma Yuan built upon these contacts and took six hundred families into his service. Extending his interests across the mountains from Longxi into the upper valley of the Han, he acquired thousands of head of cattle, horses and sheep, and vast quantities of grain. He nonetheless lived simply, dressed in sheepskins, and distributed his wealth to his brothers and to old friends.

In the early 20s, as rebellions were breaking out against the government of Wang Mang, the General of the Guards Wang Lin 王林 called up Ma Yuan and Yuan She 原涉 as leading men of the region. He first appointed them to clerical positions in his office, then recommended them to his cousin Wang Mang. Wang Mang named them as administrators, Yuan She in Tianshui and Ma Yuan in Hanzhong.

After Wang Mang was destroyed in 23 Ma Yuan's elder brother Yuan 員, Administrator of Shang commandery, took refuge in Liang province, and Ma Yuan left his position to join him. At the end of 25 Ma Yuan 員 went to the new Emperor Guangwu and was reappointed to Shang, but Ma Yuan remained in the west and took service with the warlord Wei Ao. Wei Ao admired him greatly, gave him title as a general and made him a member of his council.

In 26 Wei Ao sent Ma Yuan to visit Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title at Chengdu. Ma Yuan came from the same district as Gongsun Shu and the two had been friends, so he probably expected a special relationship and was very likely prepared to change allegiance. Gongsun Shu, however, insisted upon full court etiquette, and though he offered to appoint Ma Yuan a chief general and grant him enfeoffment, Ma Yuan was offended by the formality with which he had been received and persuaded Wei Ao to reject an alliance. Two years later, in the winter of 28, Wei Ao sent Ma Yuan on another embassy, this time to Guangwu, who was at that time campaigning in the southeast. Guangwu joked that he had now visited two emperors, himself and Gongsun Shu, and Ma Yuan, confident of his value, observed that, "These days, it is not only the sovereign who selects his subjects; the subjects also choose their sovereign."

Ma Yuan remained with Guangwu until the following year and accepted a minor appointment at court. He then accompanied the return envoy Lai Xi, who invited Wei Ao to send his eldest son as a hostage. It appears Ma Yuan had already accepted Guangwu, but for the time being he concealed this from Wei Ao. Asked for information and advice, Ma Yuan persuaded him to agree to the emperor's requests.

It is possible that at this time Lai Xi and Ma Yuan also went on embassy to Gongsun Shu, though their proposal for his submission was firmly rejected: see sub Chang Shao.

In 30 Wei Ao was forced from his isolation by pressure from Guangwu, and the two came to open warfare. Ma Yuan, now firmly in the imperial camp, obtained a commission from Guangwu to travel with an escort and seek to persuade supporters of Wei Ao and leaders of the Qiang people to change sides. An eloquent letter to Wei Ao's officer Yang Guang, preserved in HHS 24/14, was not successful, but he did attract the defection of Gao Jun and probably that of Ren Yu.

As the Han army attacked Wei Ao in 32, Ma Yuan advised Guangwu on the vulnerable points of the enemy and made a topographical map from rice grains to show the best routes for advance. After the death of Wei Ao in 33 Ma Yuan served under Lai Xi for the final campaign against the remnants of his party, and in the following year he was named a Palace Counsellor and second-in-command to Lai Xi for operations against the Qiang.

On Lai Xi's recommendation, in the summer of 35 Ma Yuan was appointed Administrator of Longxi to deal with incursions of the Qiang, and he defeated the Xianlian tribe at Lintao. Soon afterwards Lai Xi was assassinated by agents of Gongsun Shu, but Ma Yuan joined the general Ma Cheng in a campaign against the Qiang in Jincheng. They were successful, but Ma Yuan was wounded and could not maintain the pursuit.

In 36 Ma Yuan was given authority also over

Jincheng, but there was a proposal at court that the western part of that commandery, the Xining valley, should be abandoned. Ma Yuan opposed the plan, arguing that the territory was excellent and that if it was left to the Qiang they would have a base to cause constant trouble. His strategy was accepted, and orders were given that the Chinese who had taken refuge in Wuwei should return. Some three thousand were brought back, and Ma Yuan supervised the reconstruction of settlements, farmlands and irrigation works, roads and fortresses. The numbers, however, were far less than the former population, for most of the refugees had gone to the south.

Ma Yuan sent messengers to persuade groups of Qiang and of Di people from Wudu to surrender to Han, and in a final campaign in 37 he starved the rebel Shenlang Qiang of Wudu into submission. For the time being the frontier was at peace.

Besides attempts to bring Chinese back to the frontier, Ma Yuan sent many of the Qiang who had surrendered to settle within Chinese territory, the commanderies of Longxi, Tianshui/Hanyang and Youfufeng. It seems likely that numbers of non-Chinese were already there, and the program followed an established pattern of migration, while it certainly relieved external pressure on the frontier. Later, however, the uneasy cohabitation of Chinese and non-Chinese brought great difficulties for Han in Liang province.

While still on the frontier, Ma Yuan wrote to the emperor urging the reintroduction of wushu cash 五鑄錢, which had been in circulation under Former Han but was withdrawn by Wang Mang. The question was referred to the Excellencies, who shelved the matter, but when Ma Yuan was recalled to the capital as a General of the Household about 40, he asked for the arguments against the proposal. Thirteen items were raised, but Ma Yuan sent in a memorial replying to each one, and Guangwu ordered the re-issue of the coinage. Thereafter Ma Yuan held great influence at the court and with the emperor, who accepted any other proposals that he put forward, and remarked on one occasion that he had total confidence in Ma Yuan's planning.

Ma Yuan's military experience had hitherto been in the northwest, but from this time on he became the leading general of the dynasty. In 41 he was sent to deal with the religious rebel Li Guang in Lujiang. He raised troops from several commanderies, gathered a force of more than ten thousand and destroyed the insurgents.

In 42 Ma Yuan was sent to attack the rebel Zheng/Tr'ung sisters in Jiaozhi, and received title as General Who Calms the Waves 伏波將軍, a style by which he is widely known in the history of southeast Asia. He gathered 8,000 men from the south of Jing province and a further 12,000 from Cangwu on the upper Pearl River, then made rendezvous with a support fleet of 2,000 ships on the coast of Hepu. From there he advanced some two hundred kilometres through mountains and wilderness, rife with sickness, to reach the Red River delta in early 43. He may have suffered a set-back, but soon regained the initiative, and in the summer his associate Liu Long defeated and killed the elder sister Zheng Ce. As Ma Yuan then captured and executed Zheng Er, the rebels scattered, and in the winter Ma Yuan moved south to destroy remnant groups in Jiuzhen.

Ma Yuan now embarked on a brief but effective campaign of colonisation and control. Following the same policy as on the northern frontier, he brought several hundred non-Chinese leaders back to forced settlement in Jing province, while in Jiaozhi he set up stele, constructed roads, harbours, irrigation canals and fortifications, and established new counties. Forcing the non-Chinese people to accept Han law, he seized the sacred drums which had been the symbol of their chieftains' power. A connoisseur of horses, Ma Yuan had the bronze treasures melted down and re-cast into the figure of an ideal steed: this was presented to Emperor Guangwu and set up in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. As a result of Ma Yuan's energies, the region of the far south was free from major disturbance for more than a hundred years.

Ma Yuan returned to the north in the autumn of 44, reaching Luoyang in the early winter. Almost half of his men had succumbed to malaria 瘴疫 in the tropics, but he and the survivors were rewarded and Ma Yuan was now ranked with the nine ministers.

A few weeks after his return to Luoyang, the Xiongnu and their Wuhuan allies raided Ma Yuan's home country of Youfufeng, and Ma Yuan sought and was given chief command on the northern frontier. He established his headquarters in Zhao kingdom, and in the autumn of 45 he took three thousand men to raid the Wuhuan. They reached as far as Dai commandery, a territory now beyond Chinese control, but the enemy avoided his thrust, and as he returned he was attacked from the rear. Ma Yuan's troops were routed and he lost a third of his cavalry.

Though Ma Yuan remained in charge in the north for several years, he embarked on no further offensives, for the Wuhuan and the Xianbi turned against the Xiongnu, and as the Xiongnu state divided in the late 40s and the Southern Shanyu Bi became a client of Han, the Wuhuan chieftain Haodan also offered peace. With no further need or desire for active military action, the Han was able to resume its former territory and attempt to persuade or force the former Chinese inhabitants to return there.

In 48 the general Liu Shang and his army were destroyed by the non-Chinese of the Five Streams region, among the hills to the west of Wuling commandery. It seems likely, as Bielenstein suggests, that Ma Yuan was becoming concerned at the position of his family and faction at court, and felt the need for a demonstration of loyalty and energy after his comparative inactivity on the northern frontier. Though now sixty-two, he asked to lead a punitive expedition, and when the emperor suggested he was too old he showed his mettle by mounting his horse in full armour and weaponry. Guangwu laughed and said, "This is a valiant old man!" and gave him the appointment. His troops numbered 40,000, including levies from twelve commanderies and convicts released from punishment 弛刑, and he had four Generals of the Household under his command.

Geng Shu, one of these officers, argued that the army should approach the enemy by the land route north of the Dongting Lake, but despite difficulties in bringing supplies Ma Yuan preferred the more direct route south of the lake. The question was referred to the emperor, who endorsed Ma Yuan's plan.

At the beginning of 49 Ma Yuan defeated a raid by the tribesmen, then followed them as they withdrew into the wilderness. By the end of spring he had driven the enemy back to their fortifications and cut off their supplies. Supplies were also hard to come by for own army, and the troops were plagued by sickness through the summer, but the enemy became increasingly desperate. Though Ma Yuan was taken ill and died, by the beginning of winter the tribespeople had been starved into surrender, and Ma Yuan's deputy Zong Jun received their submission.

In the mean time, however, Geng Shu had written to his brother Geng Yan, a close confidant of Guangwu, criticising the conduct of the campaign. As Bielenstein observes, Geng Shu's complaints may have had some base in the earlier disagreement about strategy, but they were also a manoeuvre in court politics, for the Geng were supporters of the faction led by Dou Rong, rivals to the Ma.

The emperor sent his son-in-law Liang Song to investigate. By the time he arrived Ma Yuan's strategy had proved successful, but Liang Song was also an adherent of the Dou family and he had personal animosity to Ma Yuan, who had refused to show him the respect he believed he deserved. So his report endorsed the complaints of Geng Shu, and Guangwu accepted this and withdrew Ma Yuan's enfeoffment.

The way was now open for accusations of corruption and embezzlement, and the Ma were so far out of favour that Ma Yuan's widow dared not even bury his body in the family tomb. When she and her kinfolk approached the emperor directly, he showed them Liang Song's report, and after they had made repeated apologies for Ma Yuan's alleged wrongdoings the funeral was allowed to take place. Three years later, however, Ma Yuan's daughter entered the harem of the Heir Liu Zhuang and the fortunes of the family began to revive, reaching a peak as the Lady Ma became the empress of Emperor Ming in 60.

When Emperor Ming had the portraits of his father's great assistants painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang he omitted Ma Yuan; when his brother Liu Cang questioned this he laughed. In 74, however, after the death of Ma Yuan's widow, the emperor repaired his tomb and set up a shrine in his honour, and in 78 Emperor Zhang restored Ma Yuan's marquisate and granted him the posthumous title of "Loyalty Complete" 忠成.

Thanks to his enterprise in Vietnam, Ma Yuan has been celebrated for centuries as the General Who Calms [or Subdues] the Waves, and he was certainly one of the leading military commanders of his day. He dealt from a position of local power to establish the fortunes of his family and faction under the new dynasty, and for much of the first century the Ma played a leading role at court and in the palace. -HHS 24/14:827-44*, 86/76:2837, 90/80:2982, DGHJ 12, XC 1:4b, SJZ 37:9a; Ch'ü 72:133, Bn 59:164-167, Bn 67:63-65, 69-72, 115, Bn 76:26-27, Bn 79:87-88, 107-

113, deC 84:68-75, 377-381, deC 90:37-39, Schafer 67.

Ma Yuan 馬援, wife of (d.74); Youfufeng. Mother of Ma Yuan's three elder sons Liao, Fang and Guang, she had the fortunes told of her step-daughter the Lady Ma I, future empress of Emperor Ming.

After Ma Yuan's death in 49 a mass of accusations were presented against him, and the family lost such favour that the Lady his widow dared not even bury his body in the family tomb. An audience with the emperor had little effect, and only after repeated formal apologies was the funeral allowed to take place. When the future empress joined the harem of the Heir Liu Zhuang three years later, however, the fortunes of the family began to revive. -HHS 10A:408, 24/14:852, 858.

Ma Yuan 馬援, concubine of: see the Lady Lin 蘭.

Ma Yuanyi 馬元義 (d.184). A Division chieftain 方 of the religious leader Zhang Jue, Ma Yuanyi held command of several tens of thousands of the faithful in Jing and Yang provinces, and was a leader in planning rebellion against Han. Visiting Luoyang on several occasions, he claimed adherents even among the palace eunuchs.

It was planned to make a massive rising in the third month of 184, including a coup within the capital, but some weeks earlier the renegade disciple Tang Zhou sent a message to the court to tell of the conspiracy. Ma Yuanyi was arrested and then torn apart by chariots, while a purge of Zhang Jue's followers in Luoyang brought another thousand to execution. -HHS 71/61:2299-2300.

Ma Ze 馬側 see Ma Ce 馬側.

Ma Zhen 馬震; Nanyang. In 113 the regent Dowager Deng granted a village marquisate to Ma Zhen, grandson of Ma Wu [see also sub Ma Tan]. -HHS 22/12:786.

Ma Zhi 馬芝, the Lady; Youfufeng. Daughter of the scholar Ma Rong, and a younger sister of the Lady Ma Lun, Ma Zhi was also a woman of talent and character. She was young when her parents died, but she later composed the rhapsody Shenqing fu 神情賦 "Expressing my Feelings" in their memory. -HHS 84/74:2796.

Ma Zhong 馬忠. A major under Pan Zhang of Wu in 219, Ma Zhong captured Guan Yu in Jing province. -SGZ Wu 10:1299.

Ma Zhong 馬忠 [Dexin 德信] (d.234); Ba. Ma Zhong's original personal name was Du 篤, and he was brought up by his mother's kinsmen, so he took their surname Hu 狐; he later reverted to his original surname and changed his personal name.

Having held local commandery office, about 220 Ma Zhong was recommended Filial and Incorrupt and became a county magistrate, again in his home commandery. In 222 he was sent with reinforcements to Liu Bei, whose expedition against Wu had been defeated. Liu Bei was impressed with him, and Zhuge Liang appointed him to his staff.

Ma Zhong accompanied Zhuge Liang on his expeditions against Hanzhong and in the south, and in 233 he became Area Commander of Laixiang, controlling the southern part of Yi province. He put down insurgents, was enfeoffed and ranked as a general, but died in the following year. -SGZ Shu 13: 1048-49*.

Ma Zhu 馬助. An Imperial Clerk in the 180s, Ma Zhu was a member of the cortège sent by Emperor Ling to honour the funeral of the Excellency Yang Ci. -Cai 3:17.

Ma Zhuan 馬鱗 see Ma Shuan 馬鱗.

Ma [Zishuo] 馬子碩 see Ma Ping 馬平. -HHS 72/62: 2335, SGZ Shu 6:945.

Ma Zongmei 馬宗美, the Lady: see the Lady Ma Jiang 馬姜.

Ma Zun 馬遵; Youfufeng. Ma Zun was a son of Ma Liao. In 91, when the family was accused of having supported the powerful Dou clan lately overthrown by Emperor He and his eunuch allies, Ma Zun and his uncle Ma Fang were exiled to Danyang, south of the Yangzi. In the following year Ma Zun was allowed to succeed to his father's county fief, but was then transferred to a district. He died without sons and the fief was ended. -HHS 24/14:855-58.

Man 滿 [personal name unknown]; Nanyang. As Chancellor of Donghai in 172, he worshipped at the temple by the sea founded by his predecessor Huan, and celebrated his achievement with a stele. -LS 2: 10b-12a.

Man Chong 滿寵 [Boning 伯寧] (d.242); Shanyang. At the age of eighteen, in the late 180s Man Chong became an Investigator. The Administrator sent him to deal with Li Shou and a number of other men who had gathered retainers and were bullying the people. They acknowledged their wrong-doing and did not offend again.

Man Chong then became a brevet magistrate in the commandery. Zhang Bao, a resident of the county, was an Investigator, but he was greedy and corrupt and disrupted the government. Man Chong waited until he came on circuit, then brought officers to arrest him. He interrogated Zhang Bao and published his crimes, and on the day the process was ended he left office and returned to his own home.

As Cao Cao took over in Yan province in 192 he appointed Man Chong as an Assistant Officer, and when he took title as an Excellency in 196 Man Chong became his staff officer with responsibility for recruitment.

Soon afterwards Man Chong was appointed Prefect of Xu, the new capital of the imperial government under Cao Cao's control. As there was continuing trouble with the followers of Cao Cao's cousin Cao Hong, Man Chong arrested them, ignoring complaints and threats from Cao Hong. Then Cao Hong persuaded Cao Cao to summon the officers of Xu county. Man Chong knew that he would be ordered to pardon the offenders, so he killed them. Cao Cao admired his energy and attention to duty.

In the following year, Cao Cao ordered the arrest of the former Excellency Yang Biao, who was related by marriage to the claimant emperor Yuan Shu. Yang Biao was charged with treason and was sent to the prison at Xu city. Kong Rong and Xun Yu urged Man Chong not to question Yang Biao too harshly, and particularly not to flog him, but Man Chong applied normal procedures. He then went to Cao Cao and reported that Yang Biao continued to claim his innocence, and it would be an error to punish such a well-known man without good evidence. Because Man Chong had applied the full process, Cao Cao was prepared to accept his advice, and he let Yang Biao go. Kong Rong and Xun Yu had initially been angry at Man Chong, but after Yang Biao had been freed, they appreciated his policy.

Yuan Shao, the warlord north of the Yellow River, was at that time Cao Cao's chief rival. He came of distinguished family from Runan, and a number of clients and associates of the Yuan had established local forces to oppose Cao Cao. Cao Cao appointed Man Chong as Administrator, and Man Chong called up five hundred men and over-ran the various enemy camps. He then captured by trickery those leaders who had not surrendered, and killed about a dozen of them. The territory was pacified and Man Chong acquired two thousand soldiers and some twenty thousand households, which latter he returned to farm-work in the fields.

In 208 Man Chong accompanied Cao Cao into Jing province; as Cao Cao withdrew, he left Man Chong as an acting general in garrison in Nan commandery. Later, as Sun Quan launched a number of attacks against the Huai, Man Chong was called back to Runan. He was enfeoffed as a secondary marquis.

When Guan Yu attacked north in 219, Man Chong brought troops to assist Cao Ren. As flooding on the Han destroyed the support army under Yu Jin and began to erode the defence walls of Fan city, some officers urged that the position should be abandoned. Man Chong argued that losing Fan would expose great areas of the north to Guan Yu's assault, while it was reasonable to expect that the floods would go down as swiftly as they had come. Cao Ren agreed, and Man Chong drowned a white horse and gathered the defenders for an oath and covenant. As the city was relieved and Guan Yu forced to retreat, Man Chong distinguished himself in the fighting. He was rewarded with a village marquisate, and when Cao Pi succeeded as King of Wei he promoted Man Chong to be a full general.

In the following twenty years Man Chong served as a general and as an Area Commander, chiefly on the south-eastern front against Sun Quan. He returned to the capital in 242 and was honoured as an Excellency, but died soon afterwards. -SGZ 26:721-25*.

Man Yin 滿殷. Man Yin and Gao Dan are described as clients of Dou Xian about 90. Both held office as Administrators of Nanyang. -HHS 45/35:1520.

Man Zun 滿遵 see Pu Zun 蒲遵.

Mang 莽 [surname] i.e. Ma 馬 q.v.: see the entry for the surname Mu 馬/莽.

Manqu 滿居 of Anxi [Parthia]. In 101 King Manqu of Anxi sent an embassy to the court of Emperor He with gifts of lions and ostriches. -HHS 88/78:2918.

Mantou 滿頭; Xianbi. In 54 the chieftain Mantou and his colleague Yuchouben brought tribute to the court of Emperor Guangwu. Yuchouben was granted title as a king and Mantou was made a marquis. -HHS 90/80:2985; deC 84:291.

Manu 麻奴; Qiang. Son of Donghao, about 106 he succeeded his father as chief of the Shaodang tribe, which at that time was settled within Chinese territory in Anding commandery. In 107, disturbed by the mutiny of Qiang conscripts in Jiuquan and by the flight across the frontier of Dong'an and other chieftains, Manu and his younger brother also led their people to escape to the west. This marked the beginning of the unravelling of the Han position in the northwest and the start of the great Qiang rebellion.

Manu appears to have taken no major action during the period of the rebellion, but in 121 he allied with the chieftain Renliang of the Dangjian tribe on the upper Yellow River. As Renliang attacked Jincheng and defeated the Protector Ma Xian and his followers of the Xianlian tribe, Manu and his people defeated the militia of Zhangye and Wuwei and plundered the latter commandery.

Recovering from this set-back, Ma Xian attacked Manu, put him to flight, and in 122 he pursued Manu south across the ranges, through the Xining valley, and over the Yellow River. Manu's followers surrendered, and in the winter Manu brought his remaining people to submit. He was granted a gold seal and purple ribbon, while his followers were also rewarded.

Manu is not heard of again, but his younger brother Xigu was recognised as chief of the Shaodang in the following year. -HHS 87/77:2886-92.

Mao Dan 茅丹 see Fang Dan 芳丹.

Mao Gan 毛甘; Danyang. Mao Gan was leader of a group of Chinese renegades in the Huang Shan range of southern Danyang. He and his allies were conquered by He Qi in 208. -SGZ Wu 15:1378.

Mao Ji 毛機; Chenliu. Mao Ji was a son of Mao Jie, who died about 216; he was appointed as a gentleman cadet at court. -SGZ 12:377.

Mao Jie 毛玠 [Xiaoxian 孝先]; Chenliu. Noted as a local officer when he was young, Mao Jie took refuge in Yuyang about 190, but later returned and became a staff officer to Cao Cao when he came to Yan province in 192. He persuaded Cao Cao to seek recognition from the court at Chang'an in order to justify and bolster his position.

When Cao Cao became Imperial Chancellor in 208 Mao Jie and Cui Yan were given control of appointments and promotions, and they enforced morality and restraint.

In 213 Mao Jie was among the senior officials who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei, and he later became Deputy Director of the Secretariat for the state of Wei. When Cui Yan was disgraced in 216, however, Mao Jie was upset and Ding Yi and others then accused him of treason. Huan Jie and He Xia spoke for him, but Cao Cao refused to examine the matter further. Mao Jie was not formally punished, but he was dismissed and died at home. -SGZ 12:374-77*.

SGZ 12:377 says that despite this quasi-disgrace, Cao Cao granted funerary equipment for Mao Jie, and appointed his son Mao Ji as a gentleman cadet. SGZ 2:58 says that after Cao Pi came to the throne in 220, in recognition of Mao Jie's past loyal service, one of his sons or grandsons was made a gentleman cadet. [These statements may reflect the same award, probably that made by Cao Pi, presumably to Mao Ji.]

Mao Jun 毛暉. When Cao Cao was in Yan province in the early 190s he appointed Mao Jun and his colleague Xu Xi as military officers. As Lü Bu came to take over the province in 194, Mao Jun and Xu Xi changed to support him, and when Cao Cao recaptured the territory in the following year they fled to take refuge with Zang Ba in Langye.

After the destruction of Lü Bu in 198, Zang Ba gave his allegiance to Cao Cao. Cao Cao sent Liu Bei to require that he send him the heads of the two renegades, but Zang Ba explained that it was a matter of honour for him not to behave in such a way to men who had come for refuge. He felt obliged to obey Cao Cao's orders, but in turn he asked Cao Cao to be magnanimous, as befitted a true national leader. Cao Cao accordingly pardoned the two men, and appointed each as a commandery administrator. -SGZ 8:537.

Mao Kai 毛愷 (d.151). Major in charge of the military colony at Yiwu near present-day Hami, in 151 Mao Kai led five hundred men to oppose a raid of the local Xiongnu king with three thousand horsemen. His troop was wiped out. -HHS 88/78:2930.

Mao Qin 毛欽; Donglai? In 169 Mao Qin was an official in Donglai. As the reformist Zhang Jian fled the eunuchs' persecution, he took refuge with the gentleman Li Du. Mao Qin came in pursuit, but Li Du persuaded him to let such a worthy man go. -HHS 67/57:2210 [which describes Mao Qin as a county magistrate], HHJ 22:262 [which has him as an Investigator]; deC 89:113, 445.

Mao Rong 茅容 [Jiwei 季偉/瑋]; Chenliu. At the age of forty Mao Rong was a peasant. He was ploughing with others when it came on to rain, but as they sheltered under a tree his companions huddled together, while Mao Rong kept a dignified distance. The celebrated judge of character Guo Tai was passing by, noticed him, and asked to lodge with him.

In the morning Mao Rong brought a chicken. Guo Tai thought must be in his honour as a guest, but Mao Rong gave half the bird to his mother, put the rest away into storage, and offered Guo Tai only a share of his own vegetable dish. Impressed by his individual code of conduct, unwilling to give the food destined to his parents at a guest, Guo Tai encouraged Mao Rong to study, and he became a scholar of great virtue, celebrated for his ability in oratory and debate.

In 164, as scholars gathered to pay their respects at the funeral of Huang Qiong, the recluse Xu Zhi also came with an offering. Because of his skill in conversation Mao Rong was sent after him. He gave Xu Zhi food, which he accepted, then talked with him, but Xu Zhi would speak only of farming. There was feeling about this, but Guo Tai defended Xu Zhi's policy of withdrawal. -HHS 68/58:2228*, XC 4:10a; deC 89:44-45, Vervorn 90:182.

Mao Shu 茅叔. As the youthful Lian Fan left for the west to collect his father's body, he entrusted Mao Zhong, a former officer and client of the family, with a thousand acres of farmland. Mao Zhong died before Lian Fan returned, but he left instructions in his testament for his son Shu to return the property.

Mao Shu duly handed the land back, but Lian Fan returned it to him. He believed that the constancy shown by Mao Shu and his father was more important than his family's ownership: the loyalty of men was more important than the possession of things. -HHJ 9:114.

Mao Shuzhi 毛樛之 became a county magistrate in Dongping. -FSTY 5f:120.

Mao Tong 茅通. In 128 Mao Tong was a physiognomist assessing prospective recruits to the harem of Emperor Shun. On seeing the Lady Liang Na he exclaimed at her noble appearance. Liang Na was immediately appointed an Honoured Lady, and she became empress a few years later. -HHS 10B:438.

Mao Yi 毛義 [Shaojie 少節]; Lujiang. A man of humble family, Mao Jie became known for his filial piety. He was appointed commandant and then provisional magistrate of a county in Runan, but left office when his mother died and refused all further invitations.

Honouring Mao Yi's filial conduct, an edict of Emperor Zhang in 84 ordered the Administrator of Lujiang to present him with a quantity of grain and provide a sheep and a measure of wine each year. Mao Yi died of old age at his home. -HHS 39/29:1294-95, 27/17:946, XC 7:14b.

Mao Zhen 毛珍. A clerical officer under the Grand Commandant in 119, Mao Zhen questioned Ban Yong's proposal to restore the office of Protector-General of the Western Regions, arguing that in the past the cost of embassies from tributary states had been excessive. Ban Yong replied that such states were valuable allies of Han to protect the northwest of the empire, and the expense was far less than the cost of war if they fell under the sway of the Xiongnu. -HHS 47/37:1588.

Mao Zhen 茆鎮 see Yuan Zhen 苑鎮. -LS 12:6a-7b.

Mao Zhong 茅仲. As the youthful Lian Fan was leaving for the west to collect his father's body, he entrusted Mao Zhong, a former officer and client of the family, with a thousand acres of farmland. Mao Zhong died before Lian Fan returned, but left instructions for his son Shu to return the property. -HHJ 9:114.

Mashi Kuang 馬適匡; Hedong. Mashi Kuang was a local leader, but early in the reign of Emperor Guangwu he and his associates were executed by the Commandant Fan Ye. The commandery promptly came to order. -HHS 77/67:2491.

"Master" 子 [honorary title of a scholar] see under the relevant surname.

"Master" 先生 [honorary title] see under the relevant surname or sobriquet.

Mei Cheng 梅成 also as Mei Qian 乾 (d.209); Lujiang. A local bandit, Mei Cheng was allied to Chen Lan. About 200 they accepted the authority of Cao Cao's officer Liu Fu but continued to operate in the foot-hills of the Dabie Shan. After Cao Cao's defeat at the Red Cliffs in 208 they established a loose alliance with Sun Quan south of the Yangzi.

In 209 Cao Cao sent Yu Jin and Zhang Liao to attack Mei Cheng and Chen Lan. Though Mei Cheng pretended to surrender to Yu Jin, when Yu Jin withdrew he brought his men to join Chen Lan. The combined force then took refuge in the hill country of the Dabie Shan, but Zhang Liao pursued them into the wilderness, attacked their camp, and killed both leaders. -SGZ 6:209, 15:463, 17:518, ZZTJ 66:2098; deC 89:406.

Mei Fu 梅敷. In 220 Mei Fu was a general of Wei on the frontier of Nanyang facing Sun Quan's new position in Jing province. When Cao Cao died and Cao Pi succeeded him, Mei Fu sent his officer Zhang Jian with an offer to surrender, and came over with five thousand families from his former territory. -SGZ Wu 2:1121.

Mei Gen 枚根 (d.24). Administrator of Yuexi for Wang Mang, Mei Gen appointed the non-Chinese chieftain Ren Gui as a military officer. In 24, after the fall of Wang Mang in the previous year, Ren Gui led his people to kill Mei Gen, then took local power for himself. -HHS 86/76:2853.

Mei Ping 梅平; Guangling. In the late second century the military officer Mei Ping was taken ill while on service and returned to his homeland. As he was staying at the house of a friend on the way, the celebrated doctor Hua Tuo came by. Mei Ping's host arranged for him to see him, but Hua Tuo told Mei Ping that it was too late. If he hurried home, he would be in time to farewell his family, but he would be dead in five days. The prognosis proved correct. -SGZ 29:800-01.

Mei Qian 梅乾 see Mei Cheng 梅成.

Meng 猛, the Lady, see Deng Mengnü 鄧猛女.

Meng 孟 [surname unknown]; Wudu. Formerly a local officer at the headquarters of the commandery, in 171 this man sponsored a stele to commemorate the road construction work of the Administrator Li Yu. -LS 4: 10a.

Meng 孟 [personal name unknown] married the Lady Guo Yu, elder sister of the empress of Cao Pi, who bore him a son, Meng Wu 孟武. -SGZ 5:164; C/C 99:106.

Meng 猛; Xiongnu. XTS 75B:3437 says that Meng was a younger brother of Qubi, ruler of the remnant Xiongnu state under Cao Cao. The Dugu 獨孤 clan of Tang traced their ancestry through him. See, however, sub Liu Jinbo.

Meng Ben 孟賁; Henan? A eunuch Regular Attendant, in the late 130s Meng Ben was an ally of Cao Teng in faction struggles with various rivals in the palace of Emperor Shun. They were slandered by a group of eunuchs associated with the emperor's wet-nurse Song E, but in 137 the accusations were found to be false and their enemies were exiled.

Two years later the eunuch Zhang Kui and his associates, concerned at the favour enjoyed by Meng Ben and Cao Teng and their association with the Liang family of the empress, claimed they were planning to depose the emperor. Emperor Shun was reluctant to believe them, but Zhang Kui and his fellows had Meng Ben and Cao Teng arrested. They presumably hoped to extract some confession under torture, but Meng Ben managed to get a message to the emperor, who promptly arranged their release. Several of their accusers were killed and others fled for their lives.

Cao Teng went on to a notable career, but Meng Ben is not heard of again, so it is probable that he died about this time. -HHS 78/68:2518, 34/24:1176, 101/11:3245.

XHS 1:6a, quoted in SGZ Shu 12:1024 PC, says that Meng Ben was elder brother to the Grand Commandant Meng Yu, who came from Henan; see sub Meng Yu.

Meng Biao 孟彪; Ba. A local gentleman in the 190s, Meng Biao was recommended by Wang Shang and nominated Abundant Talent by the warlord Governor Liu Zhang. He rose to high office in Yi province. -HYZ 10B:147, 12:219.

Meng [Boyuan] 孟伯元; Guanghan. In the early first century Meng Boyuan sought to avenge his father's death on Jia Xu of a rival family. He was arrested by the local authorities, but Jia Xu then killed himself to end the chain of violence. -HYZ 10B:150-51.

Meng Bu 孟布. Meng Bu was a member of the Imperial Secretariat about 120, when debate arose on whether the right to wear a cap with two bridges 梁 [loops from front to back] should be granted to all officers ranking at 600 shi. The Foreman Clerk Zhi Kan put forward the argument, and though Meng Bu opposed it; the distinction was indeed extended over the next several years.

In 121 Meng Bu joined the Director Dai Feng in arguing for an end to the policy which required senior officials to leave office on account of mourning, as it caused excessive disruption to administration. Their proposal was approved. -HHS 120/30:3667 [as Meng Xi 希], 46/36:1560; MBeck 90:259.

Meng Chang 孟常; Wei. About 118 Meng Chang was second in charge of a village post station when Liu Qian the King of Zhao came on one of his incognito journeys. When the king sent his slave Jin to take bedding from the post hostel, Meng Chang tried to stop him, but Jin stabbed him. The post authorities sent a posse after Liu Qian's party. The king first tried to escape involvement by hiding Jin, but then strangled him and left his body by the roadside. -DGHJ 7:2a.

Meng Chang 孟嘗 [Bozhou 伯周]; Kuaiji. We are told that members of Meng Chang's family had held local office in the commandery for three generations; they probably included Meng Ying and Meng Zhang qq.v.

About 150 Meng Chang was Officer for Households

戶曹, responsible for population registers, for sacrifices, and for the general conduct of the common people. A woman who had cared for her dying aunt had incurred the resentment of other relatives, who accused her of poisoning her aunt and also her own mother. When the case came to the commandery, the Administrator failed to investigate it properly and passed swift sentence. Meng Chang knew the true situation and attempted to present a case, but the Administrator paid no attention. Meng Chang lamented outside the gates of the yamen, then claimed he was ill and went away. The woman was executed.

There was drought in the region for the following two years, and no manner of prayers brought any rain. When the new Administrator Yin Dan arrived, he enquired the reason for such misfortune. Meng Chang came forward and told the story of the wrongful execution. He urged Yin Dan to punish the people who had laid false charges, and as soon as this was done there was abundant rain and an excellent harvest.

Meng Chang later received both commandery and provincial nomination and became a magistrate in Xiapi. With excellent reports for his government, he was appointed Administrator of Hepu in the far south. This commandery occupied a narrow strip of coast east and west of the Leizhou peninsula, with some contact to Hainan island. It produced neither grain nor fruit, and the people obtained their food by trading sea-pearls with neighbouring Jiaozhi commandery about present-day Guangzhou. Greedy for the profits, previous officials had insisted on excessive harvesting; so the oyster-beds were fished out, pearls became rarer and there was no means to buy food. When Meng Chang arrived he took people's advice and reduced the demand. Such conservation meant that the pearls "returned," so trade was restored and Meng Chang was praised for a miracle.

When Meng Chang sought to leave office on grounds of ill health, it is said that the people held back his carriage so that he could not go, and he was obliged to escape on a boat by night. He retired into marshland in his home country, but such was his reputation that more than a hundred families came to live near him. Some time in the 160s his fellow-countryman Yang Qiao, a member of the Secretariat with influence at court, praised his splendid work in Hepu and urged that he be given another appointment. This did not happen, and Meng Chang died at home aged seventy.

He is classed by Fan Ye as a Benevolent Official 循吏. -HHS 76/66:2472-75*, XC 5:3b-4a; Yü 67:181.

Meng Da 孟達 [Zijing 子敬 later Zidu 子度: see below] (d.228); Youfufeng. In the late 190s Meng Da and his fellow-countryman Fa Zheng abandoned the devastated region about Chang'an and went to join Liu Zhang, Governor of Yi province. After the battle of the Red Cliffs in 208, Liu Zhang sent Meng Da and Fa Zheng to take support troops to Liu Bei, and they then became secret agents of Liu Bei at Liu Zhang's court.

In 211 Meng Da accompanied Fa Zheng on the embassy to invite Liu Bei into Yi province. Liu Bei took him into his own service, he stayed in garrison at Jiangling on the middle Yangzi, and when Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214 he was appointed Administrator of Yidu, on the Yangzi below the Gorges.

In 219 Meng Da was ordered to attack Fangling, the neighbouring commandery of Cao Cao to the north. Occupying that territory, he advanced to Shangyong on the Han River, so he now held the western flank of Cao Cao's position in the north of Jing province and linked with Liu Bei's territory in Hanzhong.

About this time Liu Bei proclaimed himself King of Hanzhong, and Meng Da changed his style from Zijing 子敬 to Zidu 子度 in order to avoid taboo on the name of Liu Bei's uncle Liu Zijing. Despite this, Liu Bei had become uncertain of Meng Da's loyalty, and he ordered his adopted son Liu Feng to move down the Han into Shangyong and take over command.

As Guan Yu attacked Cao Cao's forces in Xiangyang later that year he sent several requests for assistance, but Liu Feng and Meng Da claimed it would be dangerous to leave their newly conquered territories, and they made no move. After Guan Yu was destroyed by the attack of Sun Quan's general Lü Meng, both men felt uneasy, and they quarrelled. In 220 Liu Feng took over Meng Da's military band of trumpeters and drummers, and at this insult Meng Da resolved to change sides. He sent a letter to Liu Bei to bid farewell, and led four thousand followers to surrender to Wei.

Meng Da was a man of notable presence, and Cao Pi treated him generously. He shared his carriage with him, granted him a marquisate and title as a general, and appointed him Administrator of Xincheng, a new commandery formed by combining Fangling and Shangyong on the border of Hanzhong. Supported by the Wei army and aided by the rebellion of Shen Yi, Meng Da drove Liu Feng away and reclaimed the territory.

The minister Sima Yi and others, however, had advised Cao Pi that Meng Da could not be relied upon, and after the death of his patron in 226 Meng Da felt insecure. As his colleague Shen Yi accused him of planning to change sides once more, Meng Da became increasingly uneasy. He responded to overtures from Zhuge Liang of Shu-Han, but before he was ready Sima Yi forced a crisis, and when Meng Da did rebel at the end of 227 he was swiftly attacked and killed. -SGZ Shu 10:991-94; Fang 52:29-30, 245-249.

SGZ 24:679 mentions an Administrator of An ding named Meng Da, but this appears to be a different man of the same name.

Meng Dai 孟岱. An officer of Yuan Shao, after the defeat at Guandu in 200 Meng Dai claimed that Shen Pei's loyalty was doubtful, for he had two sons captive with Cao Cao. He was appointed Supervisor of the Army and replaced Shen Pei in command of the garrison at Ye city. -HHS 74/64A:2402-03.

Meng Dang 孟璠. A member of the Imperial Secretariat, in 166 Meng Dang was found guilty of taking bribes and revealing state secrets. He was executed. -HHS 102/12:3258; MBeck 90:128.

Meng Fu 孟孚 see Meng Li 孟李.

Meng Fu 孟扶. Commandant of the Dependent State of An ding in 185, Meng Fu was a sponsor for the stele of Li Kuan. -LX 12:5b cited by Hui Dong in HHSJJ 12/2:498.

Meng Gong 孟宏/肱; Zhuo. In 28 Meng Gong was Officer of Merit to the rebel Administrator of Zhuo commandery Zhang Feng. As the Han imperial forces approached, he took Zhang Feng prisoner and went to surrender. -HHS 20/10:740.

Meng Guan 孟觀. Inspector of a province, Meng Guan was in trouble for some wrongdoing, but he had his officer Zhou Shu prepare his defence and so escaped punishment. -XC 8:6b.

Meng Guang 孟光, the Lady [Deyao 德曜]; Youfufeng. Though not good-looking, the Lady Meng was a woman of strong and fine character. She had many suitors but refused them all. When she was over thirty her parents asked her whom she would choose, and she told them she wanted to marry Liang Hong. He too had refused many offers of marriage, but when he heard of the Lady Meng's interest he came and proposed to her.

When they were first married the Lady wore her finest clothes, but Liang Hong would have no dealings with her. She knelt before him and asked the reason, and he told her he wanted a wife who dressed in coarse cloth. Delighted with such plain virtue, she encouraged her husband to abandon the world for the hill country on the edge of the Qin Ling ranges. There she wove while he worked in the fields, and they established a model of hermit life together.

Meng Guang later accompanied Liang Hong to the east and south. In Wu her display of humility and respect for her husband caused the wealthy Gao Botong to appreciate his quality and receive him as an honoured guest. When Liang Hong died in the southeast, the Lady and her children returned to their home country. -HHS 83/73:2766-68; Vervoorn 90:197, 302. [A variant text, probably mistaken, says that the Lady had the surname Zhao 趙, not Meng.]

Meng Guang 孟光 [Xiaoyu 孝裕]; Henan. A kinsman of Meng Yu, Grand Commandant under Emperor Ling, Meng Guang was widely read, expert in the precedents of Han and in the Gongyang version of Chunqiu and in Zuo zhuan. He held clerical office at the capital in the late 180s, but escaped to Yi province when Dong Zhuo took the court to Chang'an in 192.

Meng Guang was well treated by both Liu Yan and Liu Zhang, and when Liu Bei took over in 214 he appointed him a Consultant and had him work on the codification of procedures and rituals. Due to quarrelling between Xu Ci and Hu Qian, nothing came of this project, while Meng Guang had scholarly disagreements with his colleague Lai Min.

During the reign of Liu Shan, Meng Guang held a series of appointments at court, and rose to ministerial rank. He died aged over ninety. -SGZ Shu 12:1023-25*.

Meng Guang 孟廣 see Meng Xuan 孟璇. -Nagata 94:266.

Meng Ji 孟冀; Youfufeng. After the fall of Wang Mang in 23, as the region about Chang'an fell into disorder, Meng Ji accompanied Du Lin and other gentlemen of the commandery leading a group of refugees to the west. On the road they encountered a group of several thousand bandits, who stole their goods, taking even their clothes, and intended to put them to death. Meng Ji, however, threatened them with the wrath of Heaven, who had punished the mighty Red Eyebrows and would deal all the more surely with such petty troops as these.

The leader of the band was impressed and fearful, and he let the party go. [Note, however, that in 23 the Red Eyebrows may have been perceived as a distant threat, but they had not yet reached the capital district, nor had they been destroyed, so there is anachronism in the account of this incident. As Bielenstein observes, such stories are of doubtful validity: Bn 54: 64-65]

Meng Ji became well known for quick thinking, and was a trusted adviser of his fellow-countryman Ma Yuan. Though Ma Yuan was posthumously disgraced in 49, his daughter became the consort of Emperor Ming in 60. In 72, as an officer under the Director of Retainers, Meng Ji was appointed to the committee of historians chaired by Ban Gu, which was commissioned by Emperor Ming to compile the annals of the reign of Emperor Guangwu. This work, initially known as the "Diary of the Jian'an Period" 建武注記, became the first part of Dongguan Hanji. It appears that Meng Ji and his colleague Ma Yan were chosen to represent the Ma faction, while Ban Gu and Yin Min represented the rival Dou interest and two other scholars were neutral. -HHS 27/17:935, 24/14:841; Bn 54:10, Bn 79:105, 121.

HHS 40/30A:1334, followed by Bielenstein 54:10, names the colleague of Ban Gu as Meng Yi 異 but, as the Qing commentator Hui Dong observes in HHSJJ at 1422, this is surely a miswriting for Meng Ji 冀. In later writings Bielenstein accepts the emendation.

Meng Jian 孟建 [Gongwei 公威]; Ruanan. During the 190s Meng Jian took refuge in Jing province from the civil war, and he studied under Sima Hui. Among his colleagues were Xu Shu, Shi Tao, Pang Tong and Zhuge Liang. Meng Jian was among those who recognised Zhuge Liang's particular abilities.

When Cao Cao came to Jing province in 208 Meng Jian went to join him. He became Inspector of Liang 涼 province in the far northwest and was later a general under Wei. Zhuge Liang always recalled him with affection. -SGZ 15:479, Shu 5:911-12.

Meng Li 孟李 or Meng Fu 孚. In the mid-140s Meng Li and his younger brother Mao, stone-masons, were paid 150,000 cash to prepare and erect a set of pillars for the Wu family of Shanyang. -Wu 89:24-25, and see sub Wu Liang.

There is uncertainty about the personal name of this man. The passage as transcribed by Chavannes in 1907, published by him in 1913 and reproduced by Wu 89, gives the names as 孟孚李弟卯. In his translation

Wu interprets 孚 as a first 李, but the text is confused. Meng Mao 孟卯. In the mid-140s the stone-masons Meng Mao and his elder brother Meng Li/Fu were paid 150,000 cash to prepare and erect a set of pillars for the Wu family of Shanyang. -Wu 89:24-25, and see sub Wu Liang.

Meng Min 孟敏 [Shuda 叔達]; Julu. Meng Min was a migrant into Taiyuan, the home country of Guo Tai. When a pot he was carrying on his back fell to the ground, he walked on without turning his head. Questioned by Guo Tai, Meng Min observed, "The pot is broken. What is the point of looking at it?" Guo Tai spoke with him further, admired his quality, and urged him to study at Luoyang. After ten years Meng Min had gained a high reputation. He was offered appointment in the offices of all three Excellencies, but refused the invitations.

On one occasion a kinsman had committed a crime and was liable to the death penalty. Meng Min was asked to plead for him, but at first refused to interfere in the course of justice. He was eventually persuaded to go to the county office, but did not say anything. The magistrate, however, was so impressed by Meng Min's mere presence that he treated the case leniently. -HHS 68/58:2229; Mather 76:558, deC 89:45-46.

Meng Sheng 孟生. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in the time of Emperor He, Meng Sheng was a collator in the imperial library of the Eastern Pavilion.

Meng Sheng became a Regular Attendant, and he was probably involved in the failed attempt of the Yan clan to keep Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, from the throne in 125; in 126 he was among those who were impeached by the Director of Retainers Yu Xu and were eventually dismissed. -HHS 58/48:1870.

Meng Sheng 萌生. A stele of 173 from the region of Shu commandery tells how Meng Sheng, Zhang Pu and four other Libationers of the Rice Magicians 米巫祭酒 received a mysterious text. These men were evidently members of an early form of the Rice Sect which was later led by Zhang Lu. -LX 3:8a-9a, cited by Qian Daxin in HHSJJ 75/65. 2689 jiaobu.

Meng Shu 孟叔. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Meng Shu took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and set Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county fief in Nan commandery.

In 126 Meng Shu joined Sun Cheng and others to support the Director of Retainers Yu Xu in his attack on the imperial favourite Zhang Fang and other eunuchs. The emperor was eventually compelled to disgrace Zhang Fang, but he was angry at the result, and Sun Cheng, Meng Shu and all their colleagues were sent out to their fiefs. In 128 the emperor formally recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital.

Meng Shu was later one of a group of eunuchs associated with the former wet-nurse Song E. Found guilty in 137 of corruption and making false accusations, they were sent to their fiefs and their pensions were reduced by a quarter. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Meng Tuo 孟佗 [Bolang 伯郎]; Youfufeng. A wealthy man, Meng Tuo befriended a slave of the powerful eunuch Zhang Rang, and gave many gifts to him and to his fellows. When they enquired what they could do in return, Meng Tuo asked only that they bow to him in public. This was done, and when people saw such display of respect they assumed Meng Tuo was on excellent terms with Zhang Rang. They gave him presents, which he shared with Zhang Rang, who had him appointed Inspector of Liang province; another story says he presented Zhang Rang with grape-wine, possibly as much as twenty litres, an import from the far west.

In 170, after Hede of Shule [Kashgar] had killed his nephew the king during a hunt and seized the throne, Meng Tuo sent his officer Ren She with a large allied army to attack Shule and restore order. They gained no success, and Shule was left effectively and chaotically independent. -HHS 78/68:2534, 88/78:2927; Ch'ü 72:491, deC 89:120.

Meng Xi 孟希 miswritten for Meng Bu 孟布. -HHS 120/30:3667.

Meng Xuan 孟璇 [Xiaoju 孝琚]; Jianwei/Dependent State? A fragmentary and undated stele found in the north of present-day Yunnan commemorated this man. He was a scholar of the Han interpretation of the Classic of Poetry and of the Book of Filial Piety, he changed his personal name to Xuan from Guang 廣, and he appears to have embarked on a marriage connection with He Yanzhen of Shu commandery. The text is too interrupted to be further interpreted reliably. -Nagata 94:266.

Meng Yao 孟曜. A member of the staff of Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province, Meng Yao assisted Du Kui to compose music suitable for the court of Han, but then Du Kui objected that Liu Biao was not entitled to have imperial music performed; it was not played. -SGZ 29:806.

Meng Yi 孟益/溢. In 188 Meng Yi was sent as a General of the Household to join Gongsun Zan in attacking the rebels Zhang Ju and Zhang Chun in Yuyang. -HHS 8:356.

Meng Yi 孟異 i.e. Meng Ji 孟冀 q.v.

Meng Ying 孟英 [Gongfang 公方]; Kuaiji. Meng Ying was Officer for Legal Matters 決曹 in the commandery when an edict ordered the provincial authorities to investigate the execution of the innocent man Wang Ping. Though the Administrator had given the order, Meng Ying claimed his master had been ill at the time and that he had acted on his behalf. He starved himself to death.

Meng Ying's son Zhang also sacrificed himself, and the family loyalty was later praised by Yu Fan. -SGZ Wu 12:1325 & JJ at 15a-b.

Meng Yu 孟馘/郁 [Jingda 敬達 or Shuda 叔達]; Henan. In 167 a stele was set up to commemorate the repair of the local temple to the sage Emperor Yao 堯 by the Administrator of Jiyin Meng Yu 郁, who came from Henan and whose style was Jingda. Expert in the Classic of History, he had served in six commanderies and in each post he had great influence on education. -LS 1:1a-5a; LS 22:16a-b also mentions prayers for rain at this temple.

According to HHS Annals, the Minister of Ceremonies Meng Yu 馘 was promoted to be Grand Commandant in 177, but left office in the following year. Commentary to that text says that he came from Henan and that his style was Shuda. These are presumably references to the same man: the characters of the personal name are interchangeable, and the variant style is a problem of transcription. -HHS 8:340; but see Hou Kang in HHSJJ 8:337-38 jiaobu.

XHS 1:6a, quoted in SGZ Shu 12:1024 PC, says that the eunuch Regular Attendant Meng Ben was elder brother to the Grand Commandant Meng Yu 郁. Meng Ben was active about 140, so if Sima Biao is correct Meng Yu was a good deal younger than Meng Ben and/or was very old when he received the highest office.

Meng [Yuanshu] 孟元叔; Beihai. A scholar of cosmology and divination, Meng Yuanshu was a teacher of Jing Luan. -HYGZ 10C:174.

Meng Yun 孟雲. Administrator of Wuwei in 84, Meng Yun was approached by emissaries of the Northern Shanyu seeking permission to trade. He referred the matter to the court at Luoyang, and the agreement was confirmed by the visit of a senior minister of the northern court.

In the following winter Meng Yun reported that the Southern Shanyu, dependent ally of Han, was sending raiding parties to attack, plunder and kidnap the northern caravans. The Northern Shanyu had protested, and was threatening to resume raids along the borders. A majority at court believed the Southerners should be allowed to keep their booty, but the minister Yuan An argued that the agreement for peaceful trade should be honoured. After fierce debate the emperor decided that the government would purchase the prisoners from the southerners, restore them to their own people, and pay blood-money for any who had been killed.

The peace party was thus formally successful, but in the longer term the Southern Xiongnu gained the advantage, for the agreement to pay ransom meant that their aggression was rewarded. Over following years, as the Northern Xiongnu became weaker the attacks on their caravans continued. -HHS 89/79:2950, 45/35:1518, 40/30A:1334; deC 84:262-263.

Meng Zhang 孟章; Kuaiji. Meng Ying was Officer of Merit in the commandery when the local army was defeated by bandits. As Meng Zhang shielded the Administrator, he was shot by arrows and killed.

Meng Zhang's father Ying had also sacrificed himself, and the family loyalty was later praised by Yu Fan. -SGZ Wu 12:1325 & JJ at 15a-b.

Meng Zheng 孟政 [Zijie 子節]; Kuaiji. In 25 Meng Zheng was a junior officer in the commandery. He accompanied the acting Administrator Yu Qing against a group of bandits, but when they encountered them their men ran away. Meng Zheng died fighting, and so Yu Qing was able to escape. -XC 8:11a. [Strangely, though Wang Mang's regime had been destroyed in 23, this incident is dated in the sixth year of his reign period Dihuang 地皇.]

Mengnü 猛女, the Lady, see Deng Mengnü.

Mi 祕 [surname] see Bi 祕 passim.

Mi 麋, the Lady; Donghai. The Lady was a younger sister of Liu Bei's associate Mi Zhu, who gave her to him as a principal wife 夫人 after Liu Bei's wife [or wives] and children 妻子 had been captured by Lü Bu in 196. Some domestic complications must have followed, for we are told that Liu Bei made peace with Lü Bu soon afterwards and his family was returned to him. The Lady Mi is not referred to again.

Liu Bei's family was captured once more by Lü Bu in 198, to be again returned later, and in 200 he was obliged to abandon his dependents to Cao Cao; that group never rejoined him. Had the Lady Mi been involved in those later incidents, one might expect that she would have been mentioned, so she probably died earlier, about 197. -SGZ Shu 8:969; C/C 99:48-49.

Mi Bao 麋豹. According to HHSJJ 84/74:3080, Mi Bao was Administrator of Wu in 154 and aided the construction of a memorial to the virtuous widow Lü Rong q.v.

Mi Chang 靡常, the Lady: see the Lady Chang Michang 常靡常. -HYGZ 10A:140, 12:216. The texts are confused whether her surname was Chang or Mi.

Mi Fang 麋芳 [Zifang 子方]; Donghai. Younger brother of Mi Zhu, Mi Fang was named Chancellor of Pengcheng by Cao Cao, but left to follow Liu Bei.

As Guan Yu attacked Cao Cao's forces north up the Han River in 219, Mi Fang held garrison command as Administrator of Nan commandery at Jiangling. There had been a fire in the arsenal, and Guan Yu blamed Mi Fang and threatened to punish him on his return. When Lü Meng brought an army of Sun Quan to attack Jing province, Mi Fang surrendered.

In 223, now in the service of Wu, Mi Fang went with He Qi to capture Qichun, north of the Yangzi in Jiangxia. -SGZ Shu 8:969-70, 6:941, SGZ Wu 15:1380. We may note that Mi Fang had the remarkable record of serving each of the rival Three Kingdoms.

Mi Heng 禰衡 see Ni Heng 禰衡.

Mi Qiang 弭彊 (d.25). An officer of the Gengshi Emperor, in 25 Mi Qiang was a General of the Household with authority in Hedong. In the summer, after Deng Yu had defeated the army of Wang Kuang, he took over the commandery, captured Mi Qiang and killed him. -HHS 16/6:601.

Mi Zhu 麋竺 [Zizhong 子仲]; Donghai. Of long-established and prosperous local family, with many retainers, Mi Zhu was a skilled archer and horseman. He became Attendant Officer to the Governor Tao Qian, and when Tao Qian died in 194 Mi Zhu followed his death-bed instructions and offered Xu province to Liu Bei. He joined his personal staff and became a close companion.

In 196, when Lü Bu defeated Liu Bei and captured his wife and children, Mi Zhu supplied him with two thousand of his own followers, quantities of treasure to raise more troops, and gave him his sister to replace the missing wife. Cao Cao later named Mi Zhu as an Administrator for the Taishan region, but he left again to follow Liu Bei.

As Liu Bei sought refuge in Jing province in 201 he sent Mi Zhu and Sun Gan to Liu Biao to prepare the way. Mi Zhu became a senior member of staff, and when Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214 he gave him title as a general, outranking regular commanders.

In 219 Mi Zhu's brother Mi Fang surrendered in Jing province to Lü Meng, then joined Sun Quan. Liu Bei did not hold Mi Zhu to account, but Mi Zhu was ashamed. He was a leading signatory of the memorial urging Liu Bei to take the imperial title in 221, but became ill and died soon afterwards. -SGZ Shu 8:969-70*.

Mian Ang 免昂 became Administrator of Shang commandery. -FSTY 5f:129.

Miao Bu 繆卜 see Miao Xi 繆襲.

Miao Guang 苗光. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Miao Guang took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. After the event, the successful conspirators were given rewards and fiefs. Miao Guang explained that he had been searching for weapons at the time and had not been present at the emperor's accession; he was therefore unworthy of such generosity. His fief was confirmed but the pension was reduced.

In 127, after Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang, he and Miao Guang and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in 128 the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital. -HHS 78/68: 2516-18.

Miao[?] Hong 繆紅 [Jiwei 季爲] (85-155); Pengcheng. An undecorated tomb and a funerary stele were discovered in southern Shandong, very close to the tomb of Miao Yu. The inscription does not give a surname, but it seems probable that the occupant was a member of the Miao family.

The inscription records his service as an Assistant Officer of Xu province and a brevet magistrate, and mentions that his father had been a secondary marquis. He was evidently a person of local importance.

In 165, ten years after this man's death, his wife died and was buried with her husband. Born in 95, she had also lived seventy-one years by Chinese reckoning.

672 Miao Meng

They left four children. -WW 1994/8.

Miao Meng 苗萌. In 23 Miao Meng was magistrate of Fucheng county in Yingchuan. In the summer, after the Han rebels under Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, had defeated Wang Mang's great army at Kunyang, Miao Meng and the local commandery official Feng Yi guarded the city for the Xin dynasty. Liu Xiu attacked, and Feng Yi was captured. Sent back into Fucheng, he persuaded the defenders to go over to Liu Xiu.

About this time the Gengshi Emperor had Liu Xiu's brother Liu Bosheng killed. As Liu Xiu returned to Nanyang, Feng Yi and Miao Meng refused entry to other officers sent by the Gengshi Emperor to take over the city. A few months later Liu Xiu was named Acting Director of Retainers and sent to restore order in Luoyang. He went past Fucheng, where he was welcomed by Feng Yi and Miao Meng and took both men onto his staff. Miao Meng is not mentioned again. -HHS 17/7:639.

Miao Pei 繆裴 [Wenya 文雅]; Donghai. Widely read in the classics, Miao Pei lived a private life at home. He was invited to join the offices at the capital, and was also offered appointment as an Academician at the University, but refused. When the government controlled by Dong Zhuo shifted to Chang'an in the early 190s, there was a special recommendation of leading Confucian scholars, and Miao Pei was invited to court as a Palace Attendant; he refused once more. -SGZ 21:620.

Miao Shang 繆尙. An officer under Zhang Yang the Administrator of Henei, when Zhang Yang was killed in 198 Miao Shang took his title, but Sui Gu held effective power in the region.

Sui Gu was an old enemy of Cao Cao, and in the following year he left Miao Shang and his colleague Xue Hong to hold Shequan city, while he went north to seek help from Yuan Shao. He was defeated and killed by Cao Cao, who then came to besiege Shequan. Before any assault was launched, Cao Cao's envoy Dong Zhao persuaded Miao Shang and Xue Hong to surrender. Both men were rewarded with enfeoffment. -SGZ 1:17, 14:438.

Miao Shi 繆十 see Miao Xi 繆襲.

Miao Si 苗祀 (d.195). Presumably a eunuch, in 195 Miao Si was Grand Prolonger of Autumn, in charge of the residence of the Empress Fu of Emperor Xian. He accompanied the imperial party on its escape from Chang'an, but was killed during the fighting in Hongnong. -HHS 9:378.

Miao Tong 繆彤 [Yugong 豫公]; Runan. Orphaned when he was young, Miao Tong lived with his three younger brothers. They held everything in common, but after they married their wives wanted to live separately and argued about the division of the property. Miao Tong slapped his own cheek, blaming himself as elder brother for not having influenced his siblings to behave properly. The quarrelling parties kowtowed and apologised, and the household became peaceful again.

Miao Tong later joined the senior staff of the county, but then the magistrate was arrested and charged with some wrongdoing and all the other officers were afraid they would be implicated. They denied any responsibility, but Miao Tong went to face torture and imprisonment, suffering so greatly that worms infested his body. In the course of four years he was held in five prisons, and was released only when the magistrate died.

The Administrator Liang Zhan appointed Miao Tong as his Officer for Legal Matters 決曹. When Liang Zhan died in office in 107 Miao Tong escorted his body back to his home in Longxi. As rebellion had broken out among the Qiang, Liang Zhan's wife and children fled to another commandery, but Miao Tong would not leave until he had seen to Liang Zhan's burial. For ten years he hid in a well during the day and carried earth for the tomb mound at night, and only when the rebels had been defeated was the tomb finished. When Liang Zhan's family returned, assuming Miao Tong must be dead, they were amazed at his work. As his fame spread throughout the region, he was offered carriages and clothing, but he refused everything and simply returned home.

Recommended by his province for Exceptional Quality, Miao Tong was appointed a magistrate in Henan. The county was close to Luoyang and had many powerful clans, but Miao Tong promptly executed a hundred bad officers and criminal clients of leading families, and his authority was instantly effective. He died in office about 120. -HHS 81/71:2685-86.*

Miao Xi 繆襲 [Xibo 熙伯] (186-245); Donghai. Son of Miao Pei, Miao Xi was a man of scholarly talent. Recruited into the offices at the capital, Xu city under the control of Cao Cao, he became a member of the Secretariat and a Household Counsellor of Wei.

Miao Xi composed a number of scholarly and literary works, including songs for imperial ceremonies and a collection of eulogies of worthy women. He also took part in the compilation of Huang lan 皇覽 "Imperial Readings", an edition of all previous writings on the classics, which was commissioned by Cao Pi in 220. -SGZ 21:620; Mather 76:558 [as Mu Xi].

The Treatise of Bibliography of Sui shu 34:1009 lists the Huang lan in 120 juan. It is ascribed to Miao Shi 繆十, also written as Miao Bu 繆卜, and others; commentaries explain 十 and 卜 as corrupted writings for Miao Xi. The first convenor of the project, however, was Wang Xiang, and he was succeeded by Wei Dan.

Miao Xu 苗虛 (d.29); Pei. A leader of local rebels, he was destroyed by Guangwu's general Wang Chang. -HHS 15/5:581, DGHJ 24:4a.

Miao Yong 繆彤 see Miao Tong 繆彤. -Ch'ü 72:8.

Miao Yu 繆宇 [Shuyi 叔異] (d.150); Pengcheng. The substantial and decorated but long-plundered tomb of this man, northwest of Pi county in present-day Jiangsu, close to the border with Shandong, was explored in the early 1980s. A fragmentary inscription records that Miao Yu died in 150 and was buried in the following year, and gives a list of the offices he held: 故彭城相行長史事呂長. The tomb has therefore been described as that of a Chancellor of Pengcheng 东汉彭城相繆宇墓.

The title, however, is mistaken. The tomb was in the territory of Pengcheng of Later Han, and it was forbidden for any man to hold senior commissioned appointment in his homeland. The inscription is better understood as indicating that he acted 行...事 as Chief Clerk 長史 under an unnamed Chancellor. Though a Chief Clerk was normally appointed by the central government, there was provision for a local man to serve in the position. Similarly, since Lü 呂 county was in Pengcheng, Miao Yu should not have held substantive office as a magistrate there; but again it was possible for a local man to act.

So Miao Yu was a leading member of the local gentry of Pengcheng, and at one time or another he held brevet appointment as magistrate 長 in a neighbouring county and as chief assistant 長史 to the Chancellor of the kingdom. -WW 1984/8, Nagata 94:108.

Miao Zen 苗曾 (d.24). Governor of You province for the Gengshi Emperor in 24, Miao Zen established himself in Youbeiping and raised his own troops. He was unwilling to recognise the commissioner Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, but Liu Xiu's officer Wu Han surprised him and killed him, then took over his army. -HHS 18/8:676.

Mijia 彌加; Xianbi. Commander of the eastern region under Tanshihuai in the 170s, Mijia was later independent beyond the frontier. His territory was not directly connected to China, but about 207 Yan Rou persuaded him to pay tribute to Cao Cao. He established trading relations and was enfeoffed as a king.

Mijia later came to terms with the rising power of Kebineng, but his title as king was re-confirmed by Cao Pi, and he evidently lived to a considerable age. -SGZ 30:838-40; Fang 52:62, 95-96.

Min 敏 [surname unknown]. In 181 he was Assistant to the Minister of Ceremonies Jiu Dan. -HHSJJ 92/2: 3418 Hui Dong.

Min Chun 閔純 [Bodian 伯典] (d.191). Attendant Officer to Han Fu, Min Chun urged him not to hand Ji province to Yuan Shao, and he joined Geng Wu in fighting other officers to prevent them deserting to the new ruler. Yuan Shao had both men killed. -HHS 74/64A:2378.

Min Gong 閔貢 [Zhongshu 仲叔]; Taiyuan. Known as a man of principle and admired for the simplicity of his life, Min Gong ate nothing but plain gruel and drank only water. His friend Zhou Dang offered some garlic to flavour his meal, but though he accepted it, he would not use it.

Min Gong was appointed to the offices of the Excellency Hou Ba about 30, but left in disgust when he found the minister had no real wish for his advice or service. He was later invited to become an Academician at the University, but would not go. He stayed some time in Hedong, very poor, but left when the magistrate had him given food. He travelled to Pei, and died there of old age.

Min Gong's abnegation of the world became a model for later generations. -HHS 53/43:1740, XC 7: 5a-b; Vervoorn 90:283.

Min Gong 閔貢; Henan. In 189 Min Gong was an officer of Henan commandery in charge of the Central Precinct 中部掾, a police position which covered the city of Luoyang. As fighting broke out at the capital, the eunuchs Zhang Rang and Duan Gui fled the massacre, taking the Little Emperor Liu Bian and his brother Liu Xie, future Emperor Xian, with them. Lu Zhi went in pursuit, and the Intendant Wang Yun sent Min Gong with a posse to assist him. They caught the fugitives at the Yellow River, killed the eunuchs and brought the two imperial youths back. Min Gong was enfeoffed and appointed a gentleman cadet. -HHS 69/59:2252, SGZ 6:173.

Min Kan 閔堪; Dai. A local leader, Min Kan took title as a general in the early years of civil war, but was forced out of Dai commandery by Emperor Guangwu. He re-established himself north of the Ordos in Wuyuan and Shuofang, and in 28, under the aegis of the Shanyu of the Xiongnu, he joined the alliance of leaders which supported the claim of Lu Fang to the imperial title of Han.

In 29 Min Kan accompanied Li Xing to escort Lu Fang from the court of the Shanyu to his new capital in Wuyuan. Returning to Dai after the conquest by Jia Lan in 30, in 33 he brought troops to aid him against the army of Guangwu under Wu Han. With additional support from Xiongnu cavalry and aided by a heavy rainstorm, they defeated the imperial forces.

When Lu Fang was driven to flight by the treachery of his officer Sui Gu in 36, Min Kan went with him, and he accompanied him on his return to Dai commandery in the winter of 39. Twelve months later, Lu Fang surrendered to Emperor Guangwu and was given title as King of Dai. Min Kan was named Chancellor, his younger brother Min Lin was Tutor, and both were granted rewards of silk.

Soon afterwards Lu Fang again rebelled, but this time Min Kan and Min Lin turned against him. After some months fighting the Shanyu sent cavalry to aid Lu Fang, and invited him back to the north. The Min brothers are not heard of again. -HHS 12/2:506-08; Bn 67:105-114.

Min Lin 閔林; Dai. Younger brother of Min Kan, he evidently followed him in support of Lu Fang. When Lu Fang surrendered to Emperor Guangwu in 40 and received title as King of Dai, Min Lin was named as his Tutor while Min Kan was Chancellor; both were granted rewards of silk.

When Lu Fang rebelled once more, the brothers turned against him, but the Shanyu sent cavalry to aid Lu Fang, and the Min brothers are not heard of again. -HHS 12/2:507; Bn 67:113-114.

Min Ye 閔業; Shanggu. In 24 Min Ye was a clerk on the staff of the Administrator Geng Kuang. When Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in Handan, he sent an officer to seek support. Min Ye supported Kou Xun's advice that Geng Kuang should refuse, and Geng Kuang made alliance with Peng Chong to support Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu.

Kou Xun several times mentioned Min Ye's loyalty to Guangwu; he was later granted a secondary marquissate and appointed Administrator of Liaoxi. -HHS 16/6:621, 627.

Min [Zhongshu] 閔仲叔 see Min Gong 閔貢 I.

Ming, Emperor 明帝 (reg. 57-75) see Liu Zhuang 劉莊.

Mitang 迷唐; Qiang. Son of Miyu, after his father's murder by the Protector Zhang Yu in 87, Mitang united his Shaoqiang people for revenge, and arranged marriages and subventions to make alliances with their former rivals the Shaohe, Dangjian and Dangdian tribes. Though his first raid on the Longxi frontier, probably in 88, was defeated, he gathered more men from Chinese territories and returned to the attack. Zhang Yu was unable to deal with the situation and was dismissed, but his successor Deng Xun bribed a number of Mitang's followers to defect, and recruited the Yuezhi people of western Jincheng, enemies of Mitang, into a Loyal Auxiliary 湟中義從胡. He then turned on Mitang's weakened forces and drove him back from the frontier.

Deng Xun died in 92, and his replacement Nie Shang attempted to break the cycle of warfare by a show of goodwill. Mitang returned towards the frontier and sent his grandmother and Bique to visit. Nie Shang appears to have treated the old lady with great courtesy, but when his envoys escorted her back to Mitang's camp, he murdered them and used their blood to swear an oath of enmity to Han. He then raided Jincheng, but in the following year a new Protector Guan You attacked his base in the Yu Valleys, on the upper Yellow River by present-day Guide in Qinghai. He occupied the territory and drove Mitang away.

Guan You died in 96, and his successor Shi Chong made another attack. This, however, was beaten off with loss by Mitang and his followers, and in the following year the Qiang raided deep into Longxi. Inspiring their kinsmen within Chinese borders to join them, they defeated the commandery forces, and the trouble was so serious that an army of thirty thousand was sent under Liu Shang and Zhou Tai, with troops from the professional Northern Army at the capital, from the base camps of Liyang in Wei commandery and the region of Chang'an, and a host of local militia and non-Chinese auxiliaries.

Mitang retreated beyond the frontier, and as the Chinese attacked he fought them to a standstill. Liu Shang was dismissed, but in 98 his replacements Wang Xin and Geng Tan bribed some of the insurgents to submit and Mitang himself came to surrender. He was sent to the court at Luoyang and his few remaining followers, now exhausted, settled in Jincheng.

Emperor He ordered that Mitang return to the upper Yellow River, but the territory had been under Chinese control since the expedition of Guan You, and Mitang asked to settle closer in. The Protector Wu Zhi granted him supplies and sent him across the frontier, but the haste in which this was done made the non-Chinese uneasy.

Two years later, in 100, Mitang again led a revolt, this time stirring up the non-Chinese of the Xining valley to plunder the region. Wang Xin, Geng Tan and Wu Zhi were all dismissed, but in the following year Mitang withdrew once more to the further reaches of the Yellow River. He made one more raid against Jincheng, but this time the new Protector Zhou Wei gathered the non-Chinese and joined the Administrator Hou Ba to oppose him. They pursued the raiders across the frontier and heavily defeated them; thousands surrendered and were brought in to be resettled in Hanyang, Anding and Longxi.

This proved to be Mitang's last great offensive. He had quarrelled with a number of his former allies who had submitted to Han, he had few remaining followers, and he became ill and died a few years later. One of his sons then came to surrender, with a total company no more than a few score.

The first great war-leader of the Qiang against China, Mitang never forgave the murder of his father Miyu, and he proved both resilient and energetic in gathering allies to cause trouble. The Mitang wars, however, were dwarfed by the disruption which accompanied the great rebellion of the Qiang in 107, just a few years after his death. -HHS 87/77:2882-85; deC 84:80-81.

Miu 繆 [surname] see Miao 繆 passim.

Miwu 迷吾 see Miyu 迷吾.

Miyu 迷吾 or Miwu (d.87); Qiang. Son of Dianyu and a younger brother of Dongyu, Miyu did not accept his father's submission to Han. With other brothers, he caused continual trouble in the frontier region.

In 77 Miyu and his followers sought to leave Chinese territory. He Zhong the Administrator of Jincheng attempted to stop them, but was defeated and fled. Many tribes now joined Miyu, and with fifty thousand men he raided Longxi and as far east as Hanyang. Eventually he and his followers were defeated and forced to submission by the general Ma Fang.

Miyu led another revolt in 86, but the raids ceased when his brother Haoyu was captured and then released by the Chinese. Miyu retired to the north of the Yellow River, but then the Protector Fu Yu arranged to stir up trouble with the Qiang, and Miyu again became their leader.

In 87 Fu Yu received approval for a campaign with his own levies and commandery troops, but advanced before the contingents were in place; he was defeated and killed in an ambush. Miyu withdrew before the rest of the army, but then resumed raiding.

Later that year the new Protector Zhang Yu defeated Miyu in Jincheng. Miyu asked to surrender and Zhang Yu agreed, but at the welcome banquet he drugged the wine and then had his men slaughter the Qiang chieftains. As Miyu's head was presented at Fu Yu's tomb, Zhang Yu sent his troops to kill and capture his people.

Miyu's murder was a short-lived success, built upon bad faith, and his son Mitang fought many years for revenge. -HHS 87/77:2881-82; deC 84:80.

Mo 莫 (d.57); Xiongnu. Younger brother of the founding Southern Shanyu Bi, when the separatist state was established in 48/49 Mo was appointed Worthy King of the Left, the office of the heir to the throne. Sent on an expedition against the north in 49, he defeated the guard of the Northern Shanyu Punu, captured his younger brother and drove the northern court away across the Gobi. Mo and his men returned with over ten thousand people, seven thousand horses, and myriads of cattle and sheep.

At the death of the Shanyu Bi in 56, Mo succeeded him with the title Qiufuyou di 丘浮尤鞮 Shanyu. He died in the following year. -HHS 89/79:2943-48.

Mo 謨 [surname unknown]. As a member of the Imperial Secretariat in 171, he took part in the enthronement ceremony of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling. -HHS 95/5:3121.

Mo Si 莫嗣. An Attendant Officer in Yi province about 200, Mo Si gave a disapproving prognostication on various outlandish fashions among men's and women's clothing. -HHS 103/13:3273; MBeck 90:151.

Mobie 摩螿 (d.167); Qiang. A leader of the Eastern Qiang, in the winter of 167 Mobie and his colleague Anwei gathered a number of groups together to raid the region about Chang'an. They were defeated and killed by Zhang Huan's officers Yin Duan and Dong Zhuo. -HHS 65/55:2140.

Mou 鄮 [personal name unknown]; Kuaiji. Formerly an officer of the commandery charged to deal with bandits, in the early 190s he was listed by Yu Fan among those who had risked their lives in battle to protect their Administrator. -SGZ Wu 12:1325.

Mou Chang 牟長 see Mou Zhang 牟張.

Mou Cun 牟存; Ba. As a local officer in 154, Mou Cun joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending that the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree. -HYGZ 1:5.

Mou Lin 牟麟; Beihai. Eldest son of Mou Rong, after his father's death Mou Lin was appointed a gentleman cadet. -HHS 26:16:916.

Mou Rong 牟融 [Ziyou 子優] (d.79); Beihai. Already learned as a young man, Mou Rong taught the New Text History according to the interpretation of the Elder Xiahou. Recognised as a leading exponent of that tradition, he had several hundred students and acquired a wide reputation.

Nominated Abundant Talent by the Excellency of Works, Mou Rong became a magistrate in Pei. In the three years he was there it was claimed that there were no legal disputes, and his county was rated the best in the province.

The Excellency Fan Qian urged that Mou Rong be given high office at court, and in 62 he was appointed Director of Retainers. His reports were strict and accurate, and all held him in respect. In 65 he was made Minister Herald, and in 68 he became Minister of Finance.

In debates at court, Mou Rong was noted for his clear thinking and effective arguments, and in 69 he was appointed Excellency of Works. He was again admired for his policies and proposals, and when Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75 Mou Rong was promoted Grand Commandant; he shared control of the affairs of the Imperial Secretariat, and hence formal command of the government, with his predecessor Zhao Xi, now Grand Tutor.

Mou Rong died in office four years later. The emperor came in person to his funeral, granted him a burial site by the tomb of Emperor Ming, and showed great favour to his family. -HHS 26/16:915-16*.

Sui shu 34:998 and the two Tang bibliographies list a collection of Mou Rong's scholarly work as Mouzi 牟子; this must be distinguished from the Buddhist apologia of the same name, allegedly composed by a retired scholar-official of Cangwu at the end of the second century: Zürcher 59:13-14.

Mou Yu 牟紆; Le'an. Son of Mou Zhang, he taught privately with hundreds of students. Emperor Zhang wanted to appoint him as an Academician, but Mou Yu died on the road to the capital. -HHS 79/69A:2557.

Mou Zhang 牟張/長 [Jungao 君高]; Le'an. As a young man, Mou Zhang studied the Classic of History according to the New Text school of Ouyang. He refused office under Wang Mang, but in 26 he was nominated by Song Hong, Excellency in the service of Emperor Guangwu, and became an Academician. He was later Administrator of Henei, but was dismissed in 40 for having presented false registers of taxable land. See sub Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming, and Bn 79:136-139.

Both as an Academician and in Henei Mou Zhang attracted thousands of students. He was later recalled to court as an Attendant Counsellor, but left after one year and died at home. -HHS 79/69A:2557*; Bn 79:187, 137.

HHS 79/69A says that Mou Zhang compiled a detailed commentary to the Classic of History 尚書章句 following the Ouyang interpretation. HHS 65/55:2138 says that the Mou Commentary 牟氏章句, also in the school of Ouyang, contained 450,000 characters, and about 150 the scholar Zhang Huan presented an abbreviated version of 90,000 characters to the throne of Emperor Huan. Commentary to that text ascribes the original work to Mou Qing 牟卿, an Academician of Former Han. Though there is no firm statement in the texts, it seems likely that Mou Zhang was a son or nephew of Mou Qing, and the Mou commentary was a family work, compiled by both Mou Qing and Mou Zhang with possible further additions from Mou Yu. See Tjan 49:148 and QHX:440.

Moyan 莫延; non-Chinese. King of the Dunrenyi people beyond the frontier of Yongchang commandery in the far southwest, present-day Burma/Myanmar, in 94 Moyan sent an embassy with tribute of a rhinoceros and an elephant. -HHS 86/76:2851.

Mu 莽 [surname] see Ma 馬 passim. In 88 BC, under Emperor Wu of Former Han, the general Ma Tong 馬通 was executed for rebellion. During Later Han, after Ma Tong's descendant the Honoured Lady Ma became the consort of Emperor Ming in 60, his surname was posthumously changed in the records to 莽 [modern mang]. As 莽 was the personal name of the usurper Wang Mang, a touch of political correctness was added by the amendment. The commentary of Yan Shigu to HS 6:211; Dubs 44:118 says that in Han times 莽 was sounded as mu, and this is followed by QHX:441 sub Mu Tong. See also Bn 79:122 and 219 note 265, citing GSR:709*a* and 40*a* amended by Malmqvist 75:23.

Mu 繆 [surname] see Miao 繆 passim

Mu 牟 [surname] see Mou 牟 passim.

Mu Bing 沐并 [Dexing 德信]; Hejian. Orphaned and poor when he was young, Mu Bing first made a name as an official under Yuan Shao and his sons. About 208 Cao Cao appointed him to his staff.

A man of strong principles, Mu Bing was personally abstemious and very willing to face powerful opposition. In the time of Cao Pi he became a magistrate in Henan, and later held various administrative and advisory positions. He died about 250. -SGZ 23:661-62.

Mu Cheng 母成; Ba. As a local officer in 154, Mu Cheng joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending that the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree. -HYGZ 1:5.

Mu Chong 沐寵 became Administrator of Dongping. -FSTY 5f:124.

Mu Gen 牧根 see Mei Gen 枚根.

Mu Lang 牧粮 became Administrator of Yuexi. -FSTY 5f:127.

Mu Mao 沐茂. Chief of a market at Luoyang, in 159 Mu Mao petitioned Emperor Huan seeking mercy for the presumptuous magistrate Li Yun. -HHS 57/47:1853.

Mu Mou 沐茂 see Mu Mao 沐茂.

Mu Xu 穆徐 see Cheng Xu 程徐.

Muqiu 母丘 [surname] see Guanqiu 毋丘 passim.

Murong 慕容; Xianbi. A commander in the central region about Yuyang under Tanshihuai in the 170s, he was very likely an ancestor of the imperial Murong clan of Former Yan in the fourth century. -SGZ 30:838, JS 108:2803; G/deC 77:42.

N

Nali 那離 (d.139); Qiang. A chieftain of the Shaodang tribe, in the winter of 138 Nali led three thousand horsemen on a raid into Jincheng. Defeated by the Protector Ma Xian, they turned west to ravage Chinese settlements and their allies. In the following year, Ma Xian attacked again, with over ten thousand allied cavalry. He killed Nali and 1,200 of his followers, and captured more than 100,000 herding animals. -HHS 87/77:2194-95.

Nammu [Korean] see Nanwu 男武 of Gaogouli [Koguryo].

Nanlou 難樓; Wuhuan. A chieftain in Shanggu in the late 160s, with command of nine thousand tribal groups, Nanlou styled himself as a king. In 195 he supported the rising against Gongsun Zan, and was given title as Shanyu by Yuan Shao.

He later accepted the hegemony of Louban and his general Tadun, but after their defeat at White Wolf Mountain, Nanlou [described as Nuolou 那樓 of (mistakenly) Shang commandery] surrendered to Cao Cao and was named an acting Shanyu. -HHS 90/80:2984, SGZ 30:834-35, 1:30; deC 84:396-412.

Nanwu 男武 [Korean: Nammu]; Gaogouli [Koguryo]. According to Samguk-sagi 三國史記, a Korean chronicle of the twelfth century based upon older material, Nanwu was the eldest son and successor of King Bogu [Paekko]. He died in 197, leaving no sons, and was succeeded by his younger brother Yanyou [Korean: Yon-u].

Early Chinese texts, notably SGZ 30:845, have no mention of Nanwu, and some scholars doubt his existence. Gardiner 72A:98-100 argues the possibility that he ruled from about 195 to about 205, and may have been the father, rather than the elder brother, of two contending princes Baqi/Faqi [Palgi] and Yanyou [Yon-u], the latter being also known as Yiyimo. See further sub Yiyimo.

Nengchendi[zhì] 能臣抵之; Wuhuan. A chieftain in Dai, Nengchendi surrendered to Cao Cao after White Wolf Mountain in 207 and was named acting Shanyu. It is said that he had been among the defeated allies at White Wolf Mountain, but this is probably an error, confusing him with Wuyan of Youbeiping.

In 216 Nengchendi and Pufulu caused trouble. They were settled by the Administrator Pei Qian, but when Pei Qian left in 218 they rebelled once more. They called on the Xianbi chief Kebineng for support, but they were then heavily defeated by Cao Zhang and Kebineng withdrew. -SGZ 23:672, 30:635-36; deC 96:358, 505-506.

Ni [Dingxing] 兒/倪定興; Pei. Sometime a gentleman cadet, when the magistrate Wang VII was transferred to Guanghan Dependent State, Ni Dingxing took a lead in setting up a stele to honour his good government. -SJZ 24:7b-8a.

Ni Heng 禰衡 [Zhengping 正平]; Pingyuan. A man of great but eccentric abilities, Ni Heng took refuge in the south in the 190s, then returned to join the imperial court under Cao Cao's control at Xu city. He despised most scholars and officials, and had no hesitation in saying so, while his erratic behaviour sometimes verged upon madness. Expert with the drum, on one occasion he was asked to play for a feast, but came in old and shabby clothes. When someone criticised him for this, he stripped off and performed naked.

Ni Heng was a close associate of Kong Rong and Yang Xiu, and Kong Rong recommended him several times to Cao Cao. It was clear that Ni Heng was intelligent, but he refused to show respect, and the connection later served as one ground for Kong Rong's execution on a charge of Impiety.

Ni Heng was invited by Liu Biao to return to Jing province. He achieved great success with his literary skills, but again made enemies of Liu Biao's attendants. They told Liu Biao that Ni Heng had described him as indecisive, a trait on which Liu Biao was sensitive, and Liu Biao then sent Ni Heng to his general Huang Zu.

Huang Zu's son Huang She admired Ni Heng greatly, and Huang Zu himself was initially impressed by Ni Heng's talents, but then Ni Heng abused Huang Zu before his officers during a banquet. Huang Zu ordered his execution, and his senior clerk, who had also suffered from Ni Heng, had the sentence carried out before anyone could change their mind. Huang She came too late to plead for him, and Huang Zu showed his regret with an elaborate funeral.

Ni Heng died about 199 at the age of 26. He composed a number of literary works, but few survived for long. Best known is Yingwu fu 鸚鵡賦, the Parrot Rhapsody, a strange work in which the composer combines formal thanks to his patron Huang She with personal statements on his isolation and effective captivity. -HHS 80/70B:2652-58*, SGZ 10:311-12, XC 5:12a; Mather 76:558, Sailey 78:236-241, Graham 79.

Ni Hong 倪/兒宏 (d.24). An officer of Wang Lang, in 24 he was sent to help Wang Rao in Julu, but was destroyed by the army of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 1A:14.

Ni Kuan 倪寬. As Administrator of Nanyang, Ni Kuan treated his subordinates so well that they had the utmost respect and affection for him, and never acted dishonestly. -HQ 2:6b.

Ni Meng 兒萌 [Ziming 子明]; Qi. During the troubles at the beginning of Later Han, Ni Meng's brother was captured by Red Eyebrows, who intended to eat him. Ni Meng went to offer himself as replacement, but the bandits had pity and let them go. -HHS 39/29:1300*. [Cf. also sub Zhao Xiao and Che Cheng.]

Ni Shi 兒式 (d.157). Administrator of Jiuzhen in 157, Ni Shi was killed in battle with rebels led by Zhu Da. In honour of his heroic death, an imperial edict awarded his family 600,000 cash, while two sons were appointed gentlemen cadets. -HHS 7:302, 86/76:2839.

Ni Shou 兒壽; Lu. LS 27:6a lists a stele dedicated to the worthy gentleman 尊士 Ni Shou.

Ni Xiaode 兒孝德. About 200 Ni Xiaode was acting as Administrator of Nanhai. A supporter of Cao Cao, he received the refugee Xu Jing. -SGZ Shu 8:964.

Ni Xun 兒尋 or 倪尋. Local commandery officers in the late second century, Ni Xun and his colleague Li Yan both suffered from headaches and fever. Though their symptoms were identical the doctor Hua Tuo gave Ni Xun medicine to reduce his temperature but gave Li Yan a draught to bring on perspiration. Questioned, he observed that Ni Xun's problem was external, while Li Yan's was internal and needed to be driven out. By the following day both men were cured. -SGZ 29:800.

Ni Yue 倪說. At the beginning of the reign of Emperor Zhang in 75 the head of the Imperial Censorate Ma Yan complained that many provincial officials lacked concern for their duties, and particularly accused Ni Yue, Inspector of Yang province, of recommending poor quality candidates for office. Ni Yue and two other inspectors were dismissed. [The accusations may not necessarily have been justified: see sub Zhu Fu.] -HHS 24/14:860.

Ni Zhi 兒直; Dongping. A local strongman of the 40s, expert with a cross-bow, Ni Zhi was generally opposed to the government, but when the county magistrate Zhongli Yi appointed him to his staff, both Ni Zhi and his similarly contumacious son became peaceful. -HHSJJ 41/31:1493 Hui Dong quoting the Secondary Biography of Zhongli Yi.

Nie 聶 [personal name unknown], Yanmen. Claiming descent from Nie Yi 聶壹 of Former Han, he was the father of Zhang Fan and Zhang Liao. The surname was changed by Zhang Liao to avoid a vendetta, and it appears that other members of the family followed suit. See sub Zhang Liao, and also the Lady Zhang 張 IV.

Nie Shang 聶尚. Administrator of Shu commandery in 92, Nie Shang was appointed Protector of the Qiang in succession to Deng Xun. The war-lord Mitang had been engaged in intermittent conflict across the frontier, and Nie Shang attempted to break the cycle by a show of goodwill. Mitang returned towards Chinese territory and sent his grandmother Bique to visit him. Though it appears that Nie Shang sought to show her every courtesy, when his envoys escorted Bique back to Mitang's camp he murdered them and used their blood to swear an oath of enmity to Han.

There is no explanation for the volte-face, but Nie Shang was dismissed in the following year. -HHS 87/77:2883.

Ning Ji 甯季; Henei. A bandit leader of Chaoge about 110, his forces dominated the county, killed local officials, and defied the forces of the commandery and the province. Yu Xu was then appointed as magistrate. He demoralised and confused Ning Ji and his men by infiltration, assassination and trickery, and the insurgency collapsed. -HHS 58/48:1867.

Ning Shu 甯叔 [Maotai 茂泰]; Guanghan. Ning Shu was a student at the Imperial University when his friend Zhang Chang was killed by the local bully Lü Tiao. Ning Shu avenged him, then presented himself at the prison. Admiring his conduct, Emperor Shun pardoned him. -HYGZ 10B:150.

Niu 牛 [personal name unknown] (d.175?); Xihe. The tomb of this man, in present-day Shenxi, was in the territory of Xihe commandery under Later Han. A brief inscription states that he held position as brevet magistrate of a county in Xihe, while one of the decorated doors has the date of 175. -WW 1996/4.

Niu Cheng 牛稱. Officers under the Inspector of Liang province Qiao Xuan about 153, Niu Cheng and He Zhuan were sent to summon Aluoduo and Beijun, contenders for the throne of Further Jushi. -HHSJJ 88/78:3267 quoting a stele erected for Qiao Xuan, but cf. sub Yan Xiang.

Niu Chong 牛崇 or Niu Rong 榮; Longxi. In 35 Niu Chong was Registrar to the Administrator Ma Yuan. The Officer of Merit was Yang Xi, and people joked about the three animals which held power: the horse 馬, the ox 牛 and the sheep 羊. -FSTY 5f:120 and HHSJJ 24/14:883, also XTS 76A:3365.

Niu Dan 牛壹. In 201 Niu Dan was General of the Household at the Han court under the control of Cao Cao. When Zhao Wei rebelled against Liu Zhang, warlord Governor of Yi province, Cao Cao sought to take advantage of the situation. Niu Dan was named Inspector of the province and Liu Zhang was called to the capital to become a minister in the puppet government. Predictably, Liu Zhang refused. -SGZ Shu 1:869.

Niu Fu 牛輔 (d.192); Longxi? Son-in-law of Dong Zhuo, in 189 Niu Fu was sent to defend Hedong against the Bobo 白波 bandits of Xihe.

As Dong Zhuo abandoned Luoyang in the following year Niu Fu was left to guard the north-eastern approaches to Chang'an, and in 192 he was stationed by the Yellow River in Hongnong, sending raiding parties to the east. When Dong Zhuo was assassinated Niu Fu repelled an attack from Wang Yun and Lü Bu, but was then killed by his own men.

It is said that Niu Fu was nervous and superstitious: when any of his followers came to him he insisted on having his physiognomy and trigrams checked, and he killed Dong Yue because a diviner told against him. When a disturbance broke out in his camp, although it was only a general scuffle, Niu Fu took fright and wanted to escape. He offered a reward to his body-guard Puhu Chi'er if he and his fellows would help him, but instead they killed Niu Fu, took all the treasure, and sent his head to Chang'an. -HHS 72/62:2327-32, SGZ 6:180-181.

Niu Gai 牛蓋 see Zhu Gai 朱蓋.

Niu Han 牛邯 [Ruqing 孺卿] (d.34); Longxi. Well known on the frontier for his bravery, Niu Han became an officer of the warlord Wei Ao.

In 31 his colleague and close friend Wang Zun went to join Emperor Guangwu of Han, and in the following year he accompanied the imperial army as it moved against Wei Ao. Niu Han commanded a defence position on the Long Slope, but Wang Zun wrote to him, pointing out that they had both joined Wei Ao as a means to support Han, but Wei Ao had turned against the revived dynasty. After some hesitation, Niu Han made apologies to his followers and went over to Han. He was promptly appointed a Palace Counsellor and his example inspired more defections.

The censorial officer Du Lin and the Palace Counsellor Ma Yuan both recommended Niu Han, and at the same time the official and historian Ban Biao urged the appointment of a Protector of the Qiang to settle those frontier tribes. In 33 Niu Han was named Protector with the Staff of Authority, and as Wei Ao's position collapsed he was sent with Lai Xi to settle the territory of Longxi. Niu Han died soon afterwards, however, and the post was not immediately renewed. -HHS 13/3:528-31, 87/77:2878; Bn 67:135-136, deC 84:83.

Niu Jin 牛金. An officer of Cao Cao at the defence of Jiangling in 209, Niu Jin led a sortie against Zhou Yu's army. Heavily outnumbered, he was rescued by his commanding officer Cao Ren.

Niu Jin later became a chief general. -SGZ 9:275-76.

Niu Rong 牛榮 see Niu Chong 牛崇.

Niu Shu 牛述; Longxi. A county magistrate in Chenliu, Niu Shu was fond of gentleman scholars and a good judge of character. He invited Yuan Yan, Fan Dan and Puyang Qian to serve in his administration. -HHS 48/38:1618.

Niujue 牛角 [Oxhorn: bandit sobriquet] see Qing Niujue 青牛角 and Zhang Niujue 張牛角.

Nongqi 農奇 of Further Jushi. Nongqi was a younger brother of King Zhuodi, who rebelled against Han and was killed in 97. Nongqi was then placed upon the throne. -HHS 88/78:2930.

Northern Shanyu 南單于 see sub Shanyu 單于.

Nukou 奴寇 "Outlaw Slave" see Zang Ba 臧霸.

Nuolou 那樓 see Nanlou 難樓.

O

Old Man of Chenliu 陳留老父. In 167 Zhang Sheng of Chenliu, who had been brevet magistrate in a neighbouring county, was placed under proscription. As he returned home he met a friend and they mourned the sad state of the nation, with so many worthy men being killed or removed from office.

An old man passed by and laughed at them. He remarked that dragons and phoenixes could not hide themselves, and if nets were set high enough they must be trapped. Such honourable officials as they were naturally doomed, and tears were useless. Zhang Sheng and his friend attempted to speak further with him, but he promptly disappeared and was not seen again. -HHS 82/72B:2775-76*.

Old Man of the Fu River 涪翁老父; Guanghan? The origins of this man were unknown, but in the first half of the first century he was a fisherman on the Fu River, the greater part of which flows through Guanghan. He would beg for food, but on occasion he cured a sick person by acupuncture, using a stone [flint?] needle 下針石. He compiled a treatise on that topic, Ji jing 針經, and a more general work, Zhenmai fa 診脈法. His disciple Cheng Gao passed on his teachings to Guo Yu. -HHS 82/72B:2735; Ngo 76:116-117, DeWoskin 83:74-75.

Old Man on the [Southern] Bank of the Han River 漢陰老父 or 漢濱老父; Jiangxia. In 164 Emperor Huan made a progress to the south, and viewed the Han River near its junction with the Yangzi at present-day Wuhan. All the local people came to see the imperial procession, except for the Old Man, who remained in his fields. Zhang Wen, a member of the Imperial Secretariat, was surprised at this and sent someone to ask why he did not go with the others to see the show. The Old Man smiled but made no reply.

Then Zhang Wen went himself. The Old Man asked whether the emperor was there to serve the empire, or the empire to serve the emperor? The sage rulers of the past, he observed, had brought blessings to the world but lived plainly and simply. The ruler of the present day, however, forced the people to toil for his own whims. He felt sorry for Zhang Wen that he was involved in such a regime; but how could he expect anyone to go and look at it? Ashamed, Zhang Wen asked the man's name, but he would give no reply. -HHS 83/73:2775*.

Old Men of Yewang 野王老者; Henei? Early in 25, soon after Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, had sent his general Deng Yu to attack the Gengshi Emperor in Chang'an, he went hunting in Yewang county in Henei. There he met two old men likewise engaged. When he asked where the quarry might be, they pointed to the west, but warned him that the hunter could also be hunted, and he should be very careful in his proposed enterprise. Liu Xiu understood, but did not change his plans. He did seek to employ the men, but they made excuses and went away, no-one knew where. -HHS 83/73:2758*; Vervoon 90:145.

Ou Da 區達 see Oulian 區連.

Ou Jia 耦嘉 was a Palace Attendant. -FSTY 6f:144.

Ou Jing 區景. An officer in the far south in the early 200s, it is said that he mutinied and killed Zhang Jin the Governor of Jiao province. -SGZ Wu 4:1192.

Ou Lian 區連 see Oulian 區連.

Ou Lian 區憐 or Ou Lin see Oulin 區憐.

Ou Xing 區星 (d.187); Changsha. In 187 Ou Xing was the leader of a large group of local bandits. Sun Jian was sent as Administrator, and swiftly destroyed him. -SGZ Wu 1:1095; deC 90:103-104.

Ouda 區達 see Oulian 區連.

Oulian 區連 or Ouda 區達; Rinan. Presumably non-Chinese, and connected to Oulin below, Oulian became Officer of Merit in Xianglin county. During the period of civil war in the early 190s, he raised rebellion, killed the magistrate, and proclaimed himself king of Linyi.

The territory was thus removed from Chinese control, but in 226 the new state paid formal tribute to Wu. Its capital was in the neighbourhood of present-day Huê, and it was later known as Champa. -Nan shi 78:1948 [區連], Liang shu 54:784 [區達]; Stein 47, Schafer 67:72, deC 90:40.

Oulin 區憐; Rinan. A non-Chinese from outside the frontier, in 137 Oulin led several thousand men to attack Rinan, burning offices and killing officials. The Inspector Fan Yan led troops to the relief, but his men mutinied, and although that trouble was put down the insurgency spread.

The Imperial Clerk Jia Chang also attempted to gather official forces, but he was defeated and then besieged. After a year, as supplies were running short, the government of Emperor Shun proposed a major expedition, but the staff officer Li Gu argued that the complications and dangers of such long-distance enterprise were prohibitive. He recommended that Rinan be abandoned for the time being, that the experienced officials Zhu Liang and Zhang Qiao be sent to the region, and that bribery be used to induce the various groups of rebels to turn against one another. This was agreed, and Zhu Liang and Zhang Qiao indeed restored order and re-established peace on the frontier. -HHS 86/76:2837-39.

Ouyang Can 歐陽參. As Inspector of Yang province, Ouyang Can impeached Cheng Gong Fu, Administrator of Kuaiji, for embezzlement, but Cheng Gong Fu was successfully defended by his officer Dai Jiu.

Ouyang Can then joined the Imperial Secretariat, and in 159 he was one of the non-eunuch supporters of Emperor Huan who were enfeoffed for their aid in the coup which destroyed Liang Ji.

In 165, as the emperor's former favourites Zuo Guan and Ju Yuan were disgraced, Ouyang Can and others rewarded in 159 were deprived of their fiefs. -HHS 57/47:1858, 81/71:2691.

Ouyang Fu 歐陽復; Qiansheng. Son of Ouyang Xi, he was granted the succession to his father's marquisate, but when he died without sons the fief was ended. -HHS 79/69A:2556.

Ouyang She 歐陽歙 see Ouyang Xi 歐陽歙.

Ouyang Shen 歐陽參 see Ouyang Can 歐陽參.

Ouyang Xi 歐陽歙 [Zhengsi 正思] (d.40); Qiansheng. A descendant of Ouyang Sheng 歐陽高, master of a school for the study of the Classic of History in Former Han, Ouyang Xi came from a long line of Academicians in the field, and his father Zheng 政 held scholarly appointment under Wang Mang.

Ouyang Xi maintained the tradition, and was known as a gentle and courteous man. He was a magistrate in Yingchuan under Wang Mang, then accepted the Gengshi Emperor and was transferred to a county in Henan. When the future Emperor Guangwu took over the territory, he was impressed by Ouyang Xi and made him Commandant and then acting Administrator of Henan. As Guangwu took the imperial throne in 25 he named Ouyang Xi his Intendant of Henan and enfeoffed him as a marquis.

Despite his reputation for goodwill, in 29 Ouyang Xi was dismissed for quarrelling in public with his colleague the Director of Retainers. In the following year, however, he was made Governor of Yang province. He attacked the rebel bandit Chunyu Lin, but had no success until his Attendant Officer Chen Zhong persuaded Chunyu Lin to surrender.

Ouyang Xi then became Administrator of Runan, where he remained for nine years. He attracted several hundred students and was noted for the quality of his government, though his Officer of Merit Zhi Yun objected to the favour he showed to the Investigator Yao Yan.

In 33 Ouyang Xi's fief was changed, and in 39 he was appointed Excellency over the Masses. At the end of that year he was accused of having accepted vast bribes during his time in Runan. He was arrested and sent to prison, but more than a thousand of his former students held vigil at the palace gates to ask mercy for him, some shaving their heads to show they wished to share his convict penalty. When news came that he was to be executed a young man named Li Zhen offered his own life in exchange. Reports were sent in of these appeals, but Ouyang Xi was already dead.

Emperor Guangwu agreed that Ouyang Xi could be buried with the insignia of an Excellency. He provided wood for his coffin and paid the funerary expenses, and he also permitted Ouyang Xi's son Fu to inherit his marquisate. -HHS 79/69A:2555-56*, XC 5:9a; Bn 79: 61-63.

Oxhorn 牛角 [bandit sobriquet] see Qing Niujue 青牛角 and Zhang Niujue 張牛角.

P

Pacify Han 平漢 see Ping-Han 平漢.

Paekko [Korean] see Bogu 伯固 of Gaogouli [Koguryo].

Palqi [Korean] i.e. Baqi 拔奇 of Gaogouli [Koguryo]. See sub Yiyimo.

Pan 潘, the Lady. A concubine of Cao Pi, she bore him a son, Cao Rui 叡 [to be distinguished from Cao Pi's eldest son, Cao Rui 叡, who succeeded him as Emperor of Wei]. -SGZ 20:590.

Pan 盤 of Shule [Kashgar]. In 133 King Pan of Shule sent a mission to China with tribute of lions and zebu. -HHS 6:263, DGHJ 3:3a.

Pan Hong 潘鴻 (d.164); Guiyang. From the 150s to the mid-160s Pan Hong and his comrade Bu Yang maintained a bandit force in Guiyang, with their stronghold in the mountains, but by 164 they were the last of the insurgents who had dominated Jing province and the south. The Inspector Du Shang attacked their base-camp and settled them. -HHS 38/28:1285.

Pan Jian 潘蹇. Nominated Administrator of Huaiyang for Emperor Guangwu in 26, Pan Jian was killed by Su Mao. -HHS 1:29; Bn 59:134.

Pan Jun 潘濬 [Chengming 承明] (d.239); Wuling. A scholarly man, Pan Jun studied under the New Text expert Song Zhong and then became Officer of Merit in his commandery. He was recommended by Wang Can to Liu Biao and became an Assistant Officer for the province, with responsibility for Jiangxia. He killed a corrupt magistrate there, and gained further reputation for his own fine administration of a county.

Pan Jun became a senior member of Liu Bei's staff about 208, and when Liu Bei went to Yi province in 211 he left him with Guan Yu in Jing province, responsible for civil matters.

When Wu conquered Jing province in 219, Pan Jun at first refused to serve, but he was persuaded by a personal approach from Sun Quan. He defeated the loyalist Fan Zhou and operated successfully against the non-Chinese people of his home commandery. He was made a general and enfeoffed, and when Sun Quan took the imperial title in 229 he named Pan Jun as his Minister of Ceremonies. Pan Jun's younger son Mi 祕 was given Sun Quan's half-sister, the Lady Sun V, in marriage, and his daughter also married into the imperial clan. -SGZ Wu 16:1397-99*.

Pan Lin 潘臨 also as Pan Shu 叔. Magistrate of Xinye county in Nanyang, about 20 Pan Lin intervened to protect Deng Chen and Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, when they were arrested for failing to salute an official and then giving false names. He continued to protect Deng Chen and Liu Xiu when the latter took refuge in Xinye after the first troubles of Liu Bosheng in 22, but after the defeat of the Han rebels at Xiaochang'an Pan Lin was obliged to demonstrate his loyalty to Wang Mang by destroying the houses and tombs of the Deng clan.

Soon after the proclamation of the Gengshi Emperor in 23, a detachment of the Han forces attacked Xinye. Pan Lin agreed to surrender, but only if Liu Bosheng received his submission. Liu Bosheng duly arrived, and Pan Lin opened the gates of the city. -DGHJ 11:1a, HHS 15/5:583, 14/4:552; Bn 54:101-109, 117.

Pan Lin 潘臨; Kuaiji. A local leader of bandits, Pan Lin was destroyed by Lu Xun. -SGZ Wu 13:1343.

Pan Miao 潘苗; Jiuzhen. Pan Miao's brother Pan Xin was killed by the Administrator Dan Meng about 220. Pan Miao then attacked the commandery offices and killed Dan Meng. -SGZ Wu 8:1252.

Pan Qian 潘乾 [Yuanzhuo 元卓]; Chen. Formerly the magistrate of a county in Danyang, in 181 Pan Qian was honoured with a stele. -LS 5:3a-5a, Nagata 94: 232-33.

Pan Shu 潘叔 see Pan Lin 潘臨, magistrate of Xinye.

Pan Xin 潘歆; Jiuzhen. Officer of Merit under the Administrator Dan Meng about 220, Pan Xin attended a banquet for Dan Ming's father-in-law Zhou Jing. Inspired by wine and music, he danced before Zhou Jing and offered him a toast. When Zhou Jing did not respond, Pan Xin attempted to force him, but Dan Meng was angry at the insult to his guest. He struck Pan Xin and killed him on the spot.

Pan Xin's brother Pan Miao then attacked the commandery offices. Dan Meng was killed and the rebels and mutineers took over the commandery. -SGZ Wu 8:1252.

Pan Xu 潘勖 [Yuanmao 元茂] (d.215); Henan. Expert in calligraphy and orthography, comparable to Sima Zhi, Pan Xu was a member of the Secretariat at the court of Emperor Xian under the control of Cao Cao. When Cao Cao was granted the Nine Distinctions and enfeoffed as Duke of Wei in 213, Pan Xu wrote the text for the presentation.

In 215 Pan Xu was named Chancellor of Donghai, but before he could leave for that post he was recalled to the Imperial Secretariat. He died a few months later, aged over fifty. -SGZ 21:612-13.

Pan Yin 潘業 (d.187); Henan. In 187 bandits from Yingchuan attacked Zhongmou county in Henan. They killed the magistrate Luo Hao and his Registrar Pan Yin. -HHS 8:354.

Pan Yin 潘隱. In 189 Pan Yin was a major under the command of the eunuch Jian Shi, chief colonel of the army of the Western Garden. When Emperor Ling died, Jian Shi planned to assassinate the General-in-Chief He Jin, uncle of the elder imperial son Liu Bian, and place the younger son Liu Xie on the throne. Pan Yin was an old friend of He Jin, and as he came into the palace he gave him a warning look. He Jin promptly withdrew, claimed to be ill and gathered his troops about him. With this threat from a distance, Liu Bian was duly established. -HHS 69/59:2247.

Pan Zhang 潘璋 [Wengui 文珪] (d.234); Dong. When Sun Quan was a county magistrate in Wu about 196, Pan Zhang went to join him. Generous and fond of drink, Pan Zhang was poor but assured his creditors he would repay them when he became rich and powerful. Sun Quan was fond of him, sent him out to raise troops, and gave him command of the hundred men that he recruited. After some success against the people of the hills he was promoted to be a senior major, and he became known for his success in dealing with robbers and bandits in Wu.

In the early 200s Pan Zhang was sent as a magistrate to Yuzhang, on the border of Liu Biao's territory in Jing province. He put a stop to raiding by Huang Zu's forces, and was promoted to be a colonel with command over a neighbouring county which suffered from banditry. He put down the trouble and collected eight hundred men for service on the eastern front.

In 215 Pan Zhang took part in the attack on Liu Bei's holdings in the south of Jing province, and later that year he accompanied the main army against Hefei. As Song Qian's and Xu Sheng's divisions broke and fled, Pan Zhang was in the second line of defence. Killing two men who were running away, he forced others to turn back and fight. Sun Quan made him a lieutenant-general and gave him command of a defence post on the Yangzi in Lujiang.

In the attack on Jing province in 219, Pan Zhang and Zhu Ran struck west to cut off Guan Yu's retreat in Nan commandery, and it was Pan Zhang's officer Ma Zhong who captured Guan Yu, his son Guan Ping and other officers. Sun Quan promoted Pan Zhang to be a general, enfeoffed him as a marquis, and made him Administrator of Guling, a new commandery at the mouth of the Yangzi gorges, to defend against Liu Bei. He was enfeoffed as a marquis, and when Gan Ning died soon afterwards he took over his troops as well.

When Liu Bei attacked in 222, Pan Zhang joined in the successful counter-attack by Lu Xun, and he was then named Administrator of Xiangyang, territory then controlled by Wei. When Sun Quan took the imperial title he named Pan Zhang as General on the Right.

Pan Zhang is described as rough and fierce, extravagant and greedy. If one of his men appeared well off he might kill him and seize his property, and he regularly broke the law. Because of his fine military record, however, Sun Quan never took action against him. -SGZ Wu 10:1299-1300*.

Pan Zhi 潘芝: original personal name of Pan Xu 潘勖. -SGZ 21:613.

Panchen 潘辰 of Shule [Kashgar] (d.80). Commandant at Shule, Panchen led a mutiny and rebellion but was destroyed by Ban Chao. -HHS 47/37:1577.

Pang 逢/逢 [surname]. These two characters are sometimes confused in the texts, and it is difficult to tell which is correct in each case. Though 逢 is transcribed as feng in modern Mandarin, I render both versions as Pang: the initials which are now expressed as p and f were very close during the Han period.

Pang 龐, the Lady; Henan. Daughter of Pang Xi, during the 190s she was married to Liu Xun the son of Liu Zhang, warlord Governor of Yi province -SGZ Shu 1:870.

Pang 滂 [surname unknown]. As a member of the Imperial Secretariat in 171, he took part in the enthronement ceremony of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling. -HHS 95/5:3121.

Pang Ai 龐艾. Inspector of Yi province in the late 170s, Pang Ai was praised by the reformist Yang Zhi. -HHS 67/57:2209. This is probably the same man as Pang Zhi 龐芝 below.

Pang An 逢安 [Shaozi 少子] (d.27); Langye. [On the appearance of the surname as 逢, see Bielenstein 54:137 note 4.] A man of the same commandery as Fan Chong, about 15 AD Pang An was also leader of a group of bandits. He later joined Fan Chong and, with other chieftains, they formed the confederation known as the Red Eyebrows.

The general account of this bandit horde is given sub Fan Chong, and Pang An was a close associate. On several occasions the two men from Langye are described as operating together, notably in 24, when they held joint command of the column which passed Wan city in Nanyang on the way to the Wu Pass into Hongnong and the capital region. When the Red Eyebrows set up their nominal imperial regime in 25 Pang An took title as Commander in Chief on the Left.

In 26 Pang An led an army south against the condottiere Yan Cen, but after an initial success he was heavily defeated and driven back to the capital. Having exhausted the capital district, early in 27 the Red Eyebrows were compelled to surrender to Liu Xiu, now Emperor Guangwu. The leaders' lives were spared, but within a few months Fan Chong and Pang An were again planning to rebel. They may have hoped to return to banditry in the east, but their plans were discovered and in the summer they were executed. -HHS 11/1:478-86.

Pang Can 龐參 or Pang Shen [Zhongda 仲達]; Henan. As a young man Pang Can became a junior officer in his commandery. Though he showed no particular distinction, the Administrator Pang Fen thought highly of his potential and recommended him as Filial and Incorrupt. Pang Can became Prefect of the Enclosure of the Left, in charge of convict labourers, but he later committed some fault and was sent to prison.

In 107, as the Xianlian Qiang rose in rebellion and the regent Dowager's brother Deng Zhi was sent to attack them, Pang Can had his son Jun forward a letter to the throne, urging that the people should be given relief from the burdens of taxation and labour service in order to ensure their goodwill before embarking on major military operations. At about the same time the head of the Imperial Censorate Fan Zhun also sent in a recommendation for Pang Can, praising his courage and ability in planning, and comparing him to Wei Shang 魏尚, a distinguished administrator of the northern frontier who had been pardoned by Emperor Wu of Former Han. He urged that Pang Can should receive an amnesty and be given a command. The Dowager agreed.

Pang Can was released and given appointment as Internuncio with authority over military operations in the region of Chang'an. After Ren Shang was defeated in Hanyang in 108, the Han armies were forced onto the defensive and Deng Zhi was recalled; as an imperial relative, his embarrassment was covered by promotion to General-in-Chief.

In 110, as Ren Shang sought to hold the line in Hanyang and the rebellion continued to devastate the northwest, Pang Can proposed that the whole of that territory should be abandoned. Based upon the distances and costs involved, he argued that it would be better for the empire to withdraw its citizens from the unstable frontier and settle them in the empty spaces which could now be found about the lower Wei: the attempt to hold the further west was over-stretching the resources of the heartland. "We claim we bring aid to Jincheng, but all we do is cause suffering to the people about Chang'an." Deng Zhi and the senior ministers agreed that the resources of the empire were no longer sufficient to maintain a forward position. They were prepared to accept Pang Can's policy, but a majority of the court, led by the junior gentleman Yu Xu, rejected the argument; the proposal was taken formally no further.

Pang Can was now appointed Administrator of Hanyang, where he gained the people's affections by generous government, controlling powerful families and assisting the weak. In 114 he succeeded Hou Ba as Protector of the Qiang. By this time the high point of the rebellion was passed, and the government had recovered Jincheng commandery, but attacks continued and not all Chinese offensives were successful.

Pang Can is said to have sought to restore control by kindness and good faith, and in 115 he received the surrender of the chieftain Haoduo and seven thousand tribesmen. The headquarters of the protectorate had been shifted into Zhangye in 110, but Pang Can was now able to return it to Lianju city in Jincheng near Wuwei commandery, restoring the line of communications between China and the northwest.

Later in 115 Pang Can was ordered to lead a combined force of surrendered Qiang and members of the Loyal Auxiliary of Yuezhi to join the general Sima Jun in an attack on the rebels in Beidi. As he advanced, his column was defeated by the renegade Chinese Du Jigong, and so he was late for the rendezvous. He claimed to be ill and led his men back, but the subterfuge was discovered and he was dismissed and imprisoned. The clerical officer Ma Rong presented an eloquent memorial, praising Pang Can and his colleague Liang Qin, and asking that they be pardoned; this was approved.

Pang Can then transferred to the northeast. As Inspector of You province in 121 he brought armoured militia to aid the General on the Liao Geng Kui against Xianbi attacks on Shanggu, Yunzhong and Dai commanderies. He became Administrator of Liaodong, and in 126, at the beginning of the reign of Emperor Shun, he was appointed General on the Liao. Probably at his recommendation, particularly to deal with increasing Xianbi raiding under the war-leader Qizhijian, the camp at Liyang, hitherto in Wei commandery, was brought forward to Zhongshan, where it served not only as a recruiting and training base but also as a mobile reserve against incursions along the northern frontier. It appears that this arrangement ceased after the immediate problem was ended, probably in the early 130s; certainly the camp was later returned to Wei commandery.

In 129 Pang Can was brought to the capital as Minister Herald, and later that year he gained Excellency rank as Grand Commandant with control of the Imperial Secretariat and hence formal command of the government. It appears, however, that Pang Can was now caught in a factional struggle. He suffered various slanders and accusations, but just as trouble was reaching its head, and when Pang Can had sent apologies for his absence from a court assembly on grounds of ill health, the Reporting Officer Duan Gong from Guanghan told the gathering how Pang Can was celebrated in his commandery for his honesty and fair dealing. Eunuchs were then sent to enquire about his illness, and the imperial physician was despatched with wine and meat.

Pang Can was involved in the reconstruction of the Imperial University during 131 and 132, but in the autumn of 133 he became the centre of a scandal when his new chief wife, threw the step-children borne to her predecessor into a well to drown. Zhu Liang, Prefect of Luoyang, was an enemy of Pang Can. As soon as he heard of the incident he led his men into the official residence of the Grand Commandant, investigated the matter, and reported that Pang Can was at fault. Pang Can was dismissed, though it was explained as being on account of some unfavourable portents. Zhu Liang was sent to prison because he had failed to obtain permission before he invaded the Excellency's offices, but a popular demonstration secured his release. [A very similar crime involving Zhu Liang is attributed to the titular wife of the eunuch Fan Feng: XC 7:13a.]

In the summer of the following year, 134, Pang Can returned as Grand Commandant, but he retired at the end of 135, this time because of a long-term illness. He died at home.

Pang Can's career, with active service on the frontier punctuated by periods of imprisonment, and culminating in the highest administrative rank of the empire, is an anomaly in the pattern of official service. He received no enfeoffment, and though there is reference to one son, Pang Jun, he appears to have left no successors: his second wife had evidently eliminated the other potential heirs. -HHS 51/41:1686-91*, 90/80:2987-88; deC 84:100-108, 301.

Pang De 龐惠/德 [Lingming 令明] (d.219); Hanyang. As a young man Pang De was a local officer in his commandery and then an Assistant Officer of Liang province. Early in the 190s he joined Ma Teng in Longxi, distinguished himself in a number of engagements against the non-Chinese Qiang and Di people, and was promoted to be a colonel.

In 202, as Cao Cao attacked Yuan Tan and Yuan Shang in Wei commandery, Yuan Tan sent Guo Yuan and Gao Gan to occupy Hedong. Cao Cao sent his officer Zhong Yao, who was an uncle of Guo Yuan, to assist with the defence, and Ma Teng sent his son Ma Chao to aid him. Pang De was with Ma Chao's army in the victory at Pingyang, and he took the head of the enemy commander Guo Yuan. It is said that Guo Yuan was believed to be dead, but no-one could find his head until Pang De brought it out from his arrow-quiver where he had put it for safe-keeping. He apologised to Zhong Yao for having killed his relative, but Zhong Yao assured him that it was for the good of the state. Pang De was appointed a General of the Household and enfeoffed as a village marquis.

Pang De continued in Ma Teng's service, distinguishing himself further by his courage and leadership in the defeat of Zhang Cheng in Hongnong in 205. When Ma Teng went to the east in 208, Pang De transferred to serve Ma Chao.

After Cao Cao defeated the north-western warlords in 211, Ma Chao fled west, and in 213 he went to Zhang Lu in Hanzhong. Pang De accompanied Ma Chao on these journeys, but when Cao Cao took Hanzhong in 215 he was among the troops who surrendered. Cao Cao had long known of his reputation; he appointed Pang De as a general and confirmed him with another village fief.

In 218 Pang De was sent under the general command of Cao Ren to attack the mutineers Hou Yin and Wei Kai in Wan city, capital of Nanyang. After the rebellion had been put down in the following year, Pang De was stationed at Fan city by present-day Xiangfan, on the southern front against Liu Bei's commander Guan Yu.

Pang De's cousin Pang Rou was an officer in the service of Liu Bei in Hanzhong, and some of Cao Cao's followers were doubtful of Pang De's ultimate loyalty. Pang De insisted on his enmity for Guan Yu, and he later engaged him in battle and hit him in the forehead with an arrow. At this time Pang De regularly rode on a white horse; the enemy were all afraid of the White Horse General.

As Guan Yu attacked up the Han River in 219, Cao Ren sent Pang De to an outpost some ten li north of Fan. In the autumn there were two weeks of heavy rain, followed by massive flooding along the Han, and the open plain about Fan city was covered fifty or sixty feet deep. Pang De and the other commanders took refuge on isolated patches of high ground, but Guan Yu and his men attacked them by ship. Yu Jin and the rest of the army were compelled to surrender, but Pang De fought ferociously, shooting arrows until his supply was exhausted, maintaining defence hand-hand until all his men were killed or captured, and then seeking to escape by boat to rejoin Cao Ren behind the walls of Fan city. The vessel was overturned, and Pang De clung to the keel until he was pulled from the water.

He was taken before Guan Yu, who referred to his cousin Pang Rou and invited him to join him in the service of Liu Bei. Pang De, however, abused him as being no more than a slave, and boasted of the power and authority of Cao Cao. So Guan Yu killed him.

When Cao Cao heard the news he was saddened at the humiliation of his old friend Yu Jin and the manner in which he had been shown inferior to Pang De. He wept for Pang De and enfeoffed two of his sons as marquises. In the following year Cao Cao's son and successor Cao Pi awarded special honours to Pang De's tomb at Ye city and enfeoffed four other sons as secondary marquises. He also had a record of Guan Yu's attack and Pang De's heroic defiance painted on the walls of Cao Cao's tomb: see also sub Yu Jin. -SGZ 18:545-47*; de C 96:533-34, Fang 52:54.

Pang Degong 龐德公 [known also by courtesy as Pang Gong 龐公 "Lord Pang"]; Nan. Pang Degong lived as a hermit, first on an island of the Han River, then in the hills east of Xiangyang; he never entered a walled city. He took pleasure in playing the zither and in books, and he and his wife treated each other with courtesy and respect. Celebrated for his ability to judge men, he favoured and recommended Sima Hui, Zhuge Liang and his own nephew Pang Tong.

Liu Biao, warlord Governor of Jing province in the 190s, several times asked Pang Degong to take service with him, but he would never accept. Liu Biao sought to persuade him that it was more worthy to save the empire than oneself, but Pang Degong laughed at the idea that the empire could be preserved. And when Liu Biao argued that he would leave nothing for his descendants, Pang Degong replied that others bequeathed danger to their children, while he was giving them safety. Pang Degong then withdrew further into the hills and did not return.

Pang Degong's son Shanmin/Shanren married a sister of Zhuge Liang and was later a clerical officer under Wei, while his nephew Pang Tong became a minister of Shu-Han. -HHS 83/73:2776-77*, SGZ Shu 7:953-54; Vervoorn 90:168, deC 96:364-365.

Pang E 龐貲, the Lady, see the Lady Zhao E 趙贖.

Pang Fen 龐奮. In 85 Pang Fen was Acting Emissary at the court of the Southern Xiongnu. Southern raiders had plundered Northern Xiongnu caravans as they came to trade in Wuwei, and Emperor Zhang ordered that Pang Fen and the General on the Liao Deng Hong should ransom any who had been kidnapped by the southerners, arrange their return to the north, and pay blood-money for those who had been killed.

Pang Fen then became Administrator of Yanmen, and in 95 he replaced Zhu Hui as General on the Liao. In 96, when some twenty thousand followers of the renegade Xiongnu leader Fenghou came to surrender, Pang Fen received them and arranged their resettlement along the frontier region.

Later that year another Southern Xiongnu chieftain, Wujuzhan, led a few thousand followers out across the frontier, then returned to raid the Chinese-controlled territory of the Ordos. In the autumn Pang Fen and his colleague Feng Zhu led a major attack, killed Wujuzhan and forced his people to surrender. They gathered more non-Chinese and brought a total of twenty thousand back to settle in Anding and Beidi.

In 100 Pang Fen was transferred to be Intendant of Henan. He served there for some time, but was evidently later demoted, for in 122 he held a comparatively humble post as Commandant of Liaodong or of its Dependent State.

At that time a group of dissident local leaders forged an imperial edict ordering the punishment of the Inspector Feng Huan and the Administrator of Xuantu Yao Guang. Pang Fen accepted the document, arrested both men and killed Yao Guang. Feng Huan died in prison, but had managed to send a petition to the throne. So the forgery was discovered and Pang Fen was punished. -HHS 5:233, 89/79:2951, 2956-57, 38/28:1280-81; Gardiner 69B:177-178.

Pang Gong 龐公 "Lord Pang" see Pang Degong 龐德公.

Pang Gong 龐恭; Hanyang. In 213 Pang Gong was in Ji city, capital of Hanyang, which had been captured by Ma Chao. He joined the conspiracy led by Yang Fu, Jiang Xu and Zhao Ang: as those local leaders raised arms, Ma Chao left the city, and Pang Gong, Liang Kuan and Zhao Qu then barred the gates against him and killed his family. Pang Gong was enfeoffed. -SGZ 25:702.

Pang Hong 龐宏 [Jushi 巨師]; Nan. Son of Pang Tong, Pang Hong became a commandery administrator in the service of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 7:956.

Pang Ji 龐季. In 190 Liu Biao the new Inspector of Jing province invited a number of troublesome local leaders to a banquet, then trapped and killed them. The bandits Zhang Hu and Chen Zuo escaped the massacre and prepared to defend themselves. Liu Biao sent Pang Ji and Kuai Yue to negotiate with them. Approaching alone, they persuaded the enemy to surrender. -SGZ 6:212, HHS 74/64B:2420.

Pang Ji 逢紀 also mistakenly as 龐紀 [Yuantu 元圖] (d.202); Nanyang? A follower of Yuan Shao, in 189 Pang Ji was recruited to office under the General-in-Chief He Jin and became his trusted associate. He evidently left the capital with Yuan Shao after Dong Zhuo took over, and in 191 he planned the take-over of Ji province from Han Fu and became a senior counsellor.

After the defeat at Guandu in 200, Pang Ji defended the loyalty of his former enemy Shen Pei, but claimed Tian Feng was glad his forecast of misfortune had come true. Yuan Shao killed Tian Feng.

Pang Ji and Shen Pei supported the claim of Yuan Shao's youngest son Shang to be his successor, in rivalry to Yuan Tan and his allies Xin Ping and Guo Tu, and when Yuan Shao died in 202 they forged a will in favour of Shang.

Yuan Tan then camped in the south and Pang Ji was sent with him, but when Tan asked for additional troops he was refused. He became angry and killed Pang Ji. -SGZ 6:191-204.

Pang Jian 龐儉 [Ayi 阿嶷]; Wei. During the time of troubles at the beginning of Later Han, when Pang Jian was three, he and his infant brother Yuezi were separated from their parents, taken south and brought up by others. Later, as Pang Jian was digging a well, he found a million cash. He became vastly rich, with slaves and maid-servants. Later again, it was found that his father was one of his slaves and his mother was one of his servants. The family was happily reunited and their descendants held high office. -FSTY 3f:104.

Pang Jun 龐俊/俊; Henan. At the time of the Qiang rebellion in 107 the former official Pang Can was serving sentence as a convict labourer. He arranged for his son Pang Jun to present a letter to the throne, urging the importance of securing the prosperity and good will of the people before embarking on full military operations. Pang Can was later released and given appointment.

The name Pang Jun 龐俊 does not appear again in the records, but during the second great Qiang rebellion in 141 the General of the Household Pang Jun 龐浚 was sent by the court to recruit volunteers. He camped in Youfufeng with 1,500 men, ostensibly as support for Liang province – though one must question how much actual use such a small troop can have been: it was probably intended as the core of a reserve in case the Qiang broke through towards Chang'an.

Though the characters of the personal names are different, it is likely the two men were the same. -HHS 51/41:1687 [俊], 87/77:2896 [浚].

Pang Lin 龐林; Nan. Younger brother of Pang Tong, Pang Lin became an officer of Liu Bei in Jing province, and in 222 he went with Huang Quan to guard the northern flank of the attack down the Yangzi against Wu. When the main force was defeated Huang Quan's force was isolated. He surrendered to Wei, and Pang Lin accompanied him into exile.

This apparent misfortune meant that after almost fifteen years Pang Lin was reunited with his wife the Lady Xi: they had been separated when Cao Cao took Jing province in 208. Cao Pi rewarded the couple for their fidelity; Pang Lin was enfeoffed as a marquis and later became Administrator of Julu. -SGZ Shu 7:956-57.

Pang Ling 龐凌; Henan. After the defeat of Ma Xian by rebel Qiang in 141, Pang Ling was named a General of the Household and was sent to raise 1,500 volunteers and camp in Hanyang to support the defence of Liang province. -HHS 87/77:2896.

Pang Meng 逢萌 [Zikang 子康]; Beihai. Though his family was poor, Pang Meng became a village headman and later went to study Chunqiu at Chang'an. In 3 AD, however, when Wang Mang killed his son Wang Yu for conspiring against him, Pang Meng quit the capital, returned to his home country, and then took his family across the sea to Liaodong. Expert in divination by Yin and Yang, he knew that the new dynasty would fall and retired into seclusion.

When the Han dynasty was restored, Pang Meng travelled to the mountains near present-day Qingdao, on the south of the Shandong peninsula, where he influenced people by his cultivation of virtue. The Administrator of Beihai under the new regime sent him courteous invitations, but when Pang Meng refused the Administrator became angry. He wanted to arrest him, and when the officer he ordered to go tried to dissuade him he sent him to prison. Another officer was sent, but the local people defended Pang Meng, and the party was driven back with injuries.

Emperor Guangwu later sent several invitations, but Pang Meng still would not accept. He died of old age. -HHS 83/73:2759-61*.

Pang Meng 龐萌 (d.30); Shanyang. Evidently a man of family, about 20 Pang Meng became an outlaw. He was with the Troops from the Lower Yangzi which joined the Han rebels in Nanyang in 23. The Gengshi Emperor named him Inspector of Ji province, but in 24 he held a general's command under Xie Gong in support of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, against Wang Lang.

Pang Meng warned Xie Gong that he should not trust Liu Xiu, but Xie Gong did not believe him. When he was surprised and killed by Liu Xiu's officer Wu Han, Pang Meng went with his troops to surrender. Liu Xiu took away his command, and asked Pang Meng how long he had known of his plans against Xie Gong. Pang Meng replied that he had never trusted him.

Despite this awkward beginning, Pang Meng showed himself agreeable and obedient, and when Liu Xiu took the imperial title he named him a Palace Attendant. It is said that he had great confidence in him.

In 28 Pang Meng was given command as a general under He Yan against Dong Xian and the other warlords of the southeast, but in the third month of the following year he rebelled: he killed Sun Meng the Administrator of Chu, forced He Yan back across the Si River, then made alliance with Dong Xian. Pang Meng is said to have been jealous of He Yan and afraid he had been slandered by him at court, but Bielenstein suggests he may also have been influenced by feelings of local loyalty, after his home commandery had been plundered in the previous year. Certainly, despite protestations, it is unlikely Pang Meng had ever felt truly secure in Guangwu's service.

Though he suffered an initial setback from the general Ma Wu, Pang Meng crossed the Si River and took title as King of Dongping. By the sixth month Dong Xian had sent reinforcements under Su Mao and Jiao Qiang, and they laid siege to the city of Tao. Guangwu was at this time in Luoyang. He was angry at the defection, and perhaps concerned at the example set by Pang Meng, and as the situation remained unresolved he brought the full imperial army east and ordered his generals to rendezvous in Liang. When he arrived there, however, and learned of the strong support Pang Meng had obtained, the matter became urgent.

Leaving his heavy baggage, Guangwu advanced by forced marches, but before he could relieve Tao city, he was obliged to wait for Wu Han and his army from Dong commandery. Despite the delay, and Pang Meng's fierce attacks, the defence held out, and the combined imperial forces then defeated Pang Meng and his allies.

As they retreated, all the warlords of the southeast came to join forces against the imperial troops, but their combined army was defeated in a three-day battle at Changlü in Donghai. Pang Meng fled with Dong Xian to his capital at Tan, and when that city fell to Guangwu's troops a few weeks later, he and Dong Xian escaped east to the coast, where they were besieged in Qu city by Wu Han.

In the spring of 30, Qu city was starved into submission. Abandoning their families, Pang Meng and Dong Xian escaped to the north. They took Ganyu in Langye by surprise, but were then driven out by the Administrator Chen Jun and fled into the marshes. Pang Meng attempted to return to the west, but he was killed by Qian Ling of his native commandery. -HHS 12/2:496-97*; Bn 59:144-150.

Pang Rou 龐柔; Hanyang. A cousin of Pang De, general of Wei, about 219 Pang Rou was an officer in the service of Liu Bei stationed in Hanzhong. The relationship made some of Cao Cao's officers uncertain of Pang De's loyalty, but Pang De removed all such doubts by his heroic defiance of Guan Yu at Fan city. -SGZ 18:546-47.

Pang [Shanmin] 龐山民 see Pang [Shanren] 龐山人.

Pang [Shanren] 龐山人 also Pang Shanmin 山民; Nan. Son of the hermit Pang Degong, who evidently gave him the style "Man of the Hills" with intent, Pang Shanmin married a sister of Zhuge Liang. He became a clerical officer under Wei, but died young. -HHS 83/73:2777, SGZ Shu 7:954.

Pang Shen 龐參 see Pang Can 龐參.

Pang Tong 龐統 [Shiyuan 士元] (179-214); Nan. Nephew of Pang Degong, as a young man Pang Tong appeared dull and unimpressive, but Pang Degong described him as a young phoenix, and when he was received and praised by the celebrated judge of character Sima Hui, he became well known.

Appointed Officer of Merit for the commandery,

Pang Tong emphasised the need to encourage personal morality in a time of difficulty for the nation. About 208 he entered the service of Liu Bei, and at the death of the allied general Zhou Yu in 210 he went on an embassy of condolence to Sun Quan and made friends among his officers.

On the other hand, when Liu Bei appointed Pang Tong a county magistrate in Guiyang, his administration was unsatisfactory and he was soon dismissed. Lu Su of Wu told Liu Bei that while Pang Tong was unsuited to be a local officer, he should take him onto his personal staff, where he could realise his full potential. Zhuge Liang made the same recommendation, and when Liu Bei interviewed Pang Tong he was indeed impressed and treated him thereafter almost as favourably as he did Zhuge Liang.

Pang Tong urged Liu Bei to seek to expand into Yi province rather than contend directly with Sun Quan, and when Liu Zhang invited Liu Bei to the west in 211 he left Zhuge Liang in Jing province and took Pang Tong as his senior adviser. Pang Tong proposed that Liu Bei should seize Liu Zhang at their very first meeting, but Liu Bei believed such a coup would be premature, for he needed time to establish himself and to gain popularity in the new region. After he had been a year in the west, however, Pang Tong presented three plans for him: a forced march directly against Chengdu; a pretended withdrawal to Jing province, followed by a sudden attack when Liu Zhang's officers did not expect it; or, the worst option, withdrawal to Jing province and a fighting return. Liu Bei adopted the second plan.

In 214 Pang Tong was killed by an arrow as he led an attack on Luo city, north of Chengdu. Liu Bei mourned him deeply. He appointed his father to an office at court and later granted Pang Tong posthumous enfeoffment. -SGZ Shu 7:953-56*; deC 96:432-444, Mather 76:559.

Pang Xi 龐羲; Henan. In 194 Pang Xi was a Consultant at the imperial court in Chang'an, then under the control of Li Jue and his associates. He was an old friend of Liu Yan, who became the warlord Governor of Yi province, and his daughter married Liu Xun, grandson of Liu Yan by his son Zhang. At this time Liu Yan's eldest sons Liu Fan and Liu Dan were killed in a failed conspiracy, but Pang Xi rescued their children and brought them to Yi province together with Liu Xun and Liu Chan, sons of Liu Zhang, who had left earlier but had been obliged to leave his family behind.

When Liu Zhang succeeded his father later in 194, he named Pang Xi a Gentleman of the Household, and he later sent him as Administrator to the northern part of a divided Ba commandery, to face the threat from Zhang Lu in Hanzhong and his adherents in the region.

Pang Xi achieved only limited success, and by 200 his enemies at headquarters had caused Liu Zhang to doubt his loyalty. The general Zhao Wei, also an old supporter of Liu Zhang, spoke in his favour, but Liu Zhang paid no attention. Resenting the growing influence of outsiders, Zhao Wei led a rebellion, and though it was soon put down and Pang Xi had played no direct role, he was ill at ease. He thought of raising non-Chinese troops to protect himself, but was opposed by his officer Cheng Qi and compelled to make peace with Liu Zhang. Despite the awkward relationship Pang Xi continued as a senior officer of the province.

When Liu Bei took power from Liu Zhang in 215 Pang Xi was able to transfer to the new regime, but received only comparatively low rank. In 219, however, he was one of the officials who signed the formal memorial to the Han court which recommended Liu Bei's enfeoffment as King of Hanzhong. -SGZ Shu 1:867, 15:1089, 2:884; deC 96:142, 298-306.

Pang Xing 龐行, the Lady; Guanghan. Daughter of Pang Sheng, the Lady married Jiang Shi. He was celebrated for his filial piety and the Lady was likewise most obedient and dutiful.

Jiang Shi's mother was fond of water from the river which flowed two kilometres away, and the Lady went regularly to collect it for her. One day there was a storm which prevented her from returning in time. Because his mother had gone thirsty, Jiang Shi sent his wife away.

The Lady went to stay at a neighbour's house. Spinning day and night, she also cooked delicious food and asked the neighbour wife to take it to Jiang Shi's mother. Eventually the old lady asked where the dishes came from and the neighbour told her. Embarrassed, the mother-in-law called the Lady back, and she resumed her service with even more respect.

Some time later the Lady's son went to get water, but fell in the river and drowned. To spare her mother-in-law grief at the death of her grandson, the Lady told her he had gone away to study. She prepared clothing for him each summer and winter, claiming that she was sending it for him to wear while he was away, but in fact throwing the garments into the river.

The biography of the Lady Pang appears in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳. See also sub Jiang Shi. -HHS 84/74:2783*, HYGZ 10B:153, SJZ 33:12a; Ch'ü 72:285-286.

Pang Xiong 龐雄 [Xuanmeng 宣孟]; Ba. As an Imperial Clerk in 109, Pang Xiong was sent to command provincial and commandery forces against the pirate Zhang Bolu, operating along the Gulf of Zhili. Zhang Bolu surrendered and Pang Xiong returned to the capital, but the bandits caused trouble again in the following year.

A few weeks later, as the Southern Shanyu Tan rebelled in Xihe, the general He Xi was appointed to lead operations against him; Pang Xiong, now a General of the Household, was his second-in-command. As the army was being collected, he was sent to support the local officer Geng Kui in a preliminary attack, and they inflicted heavy defeat on a Xiongnu army.

Pang Xiong then accompanied He Xi in the reconquest of Wuyuan. As He Xi died of illness, Pang Xiong took over command, and he joined the General on the Liao Liang Qin and the Emissary Geng Chong in a final advance which compelled the Shanyu Tan to submit. Pang Xiong received Tan's formal surrender, then passed on an imperial pardon and arranged his reinstatement.

Recognised for his military skill and achievements, Pang Xiong returned to Luoyang and was appointed Minister Herald. -HHS 5:213, 47/37:1592-93, 89/79:2957-58, HYGZ 12:218.

Pang Xun 龐訓 (d.179). A eunuch, Pang Xun was an associate of Wang Fu and held office as an Attendant at the Yellow Gates. In 179 the Director of Retainers Yang Qiu impeached several members of the party; they were tortured and died in prison. -HHS 77/67:2499-2500.

Pang Yan 龐延; Youfufeng. A man of local distinction, Pang Yan was recommended by Cao Cao's officer Zhang Ji about 215 and had a successful official career under Wei. -SGZ 15:477.

Pang Yu 龐滄 [Ziyi 子異]; Jiuquan. When he was a boy in 179, Pang Yu told his mother how the killer of her father, Li Shou, was holding a feast to celebrate his success in a family vendetta. The Lady took appropriate revenge: see sub Zhao E.

In 206 Pang Yu was an Assistant Officer of his native Liang province in charge of a county in Jincheng. Zhang Meng, Administrator of Wuwei, killed the Inspector Handan Shang. He promised no mercy to anyone who sought to attend his corpse, but Pang Yu left his post, carried out the mourning rites, then went to Zhang Meng's residence in hope of killing him. Recognising his sense of loyalty, and with some remorse for his treatment of Handan Shang, Zhang Meng did not put Pang Yu to death.

Pang Yu was now known as a man of honour, and the Administrator of his home commandery of Jiuquan, Xu Yi, invited him to be his Registrar. Some time later, about 210, the local leader Huang Ang besieged the capital city of Jincheng. Leaving his wife and children, Pang Yu escaped the city by night to seek help from the rulers of the neighbouring commanderies Zhangye and Dunhuang. Though they were at first suspicious, Pang Yu threatened to kill himself if they failed to support him, so they raised troops for a relief force. By the time the army arrived, however, the city had fallen and Xu Yi was dead. Pang Yu escorted his body to his home commandery and carried out three years mourning for his late master.

Hearing of his loyalty through his local agent Zhang Ji, Cao Cao invited Pang Yu to clerical office, and when Cao Pi took the succession in 220 he appointed him Administrator of Xihai, on the Xining river in the western part of Jincheng commandery of Han; Pang Yu was also named Commandant of Attendant Cavalry and enfeoffed as a secondary marquis. He later came to court as an Attendant Counsellor. -SGZ 18:547-48*.

Pang Yue 龐樂. In 201 Pang Yue was an officer under Zhao Wei, who had rebelled against the warlord Governor of Yi province Liu Zhang. When the rebels were defeated and Liu Zhang's army approached, Pang Yue and his colleague Li Yi killed Zhao Wei. -SGZ Shu 1:869.

Pang [Yuezi] 龐越子 of Wei was the younger brother of Pang Jian q.v. -FSTY 3f:104.

Pang Zhi 龐芝. In 176 there was a rebellion among the non-Chinese of Yizhou commandery. Pang Zhi aided the new Administrator Li Yong to gather auxiliaries among the Banshun people to attack and defeat them.

In a memorial presented by Cai Yong in 177, Pang Zhi was praised as an honest and worthy official. -HHS 60/50B:1995, 86/76:2847. This is probably the same man as Pang Ai 龐艾 above.

Pao Li 廙禮 is mentioned by FSTY 6f:145.

Pao Si 廙祀 is mentioned by FSTY 6f:145.

Pao Xuan 廙宣 is mentioned by FSTY 6f:145.

Pei 裴 [personal name unknown]; Hedong. The tomb of this man, excavated in southern Shanxi, contains a few inscriptions which apparently relate to his career as Officer of Merit and brevet magistrate in his commandery, then as Reporting Officer, and later as a general and Administrator of Anding 安定太守裴將軍. -WW 1994/8.

Pei, Old Man 涪翁 see Old Man of the Fu River 涪翁; DeWoskin 83:75.

Pei Bi 裴畢 [Junxian 君先]; Hedong. Magistrate of Zheng county in Jingzhao, which lay west of Mount Hua, in 181 Pei Bi set up a stele at a temple to the spirit of the mountain 華岳廟. His enterprise was strongly supported by local officials and gentry. -SJZ 19:32b-33a, LS 2:14a-21a.

Pei Cen 裴岑; Yunzhong. Administrator of Dunhuang in 137, Pei Cen led a commandery army of 3,000 men to defeat the Xiongnu: Nagata 94:78; Chavannes 07:198 and 214. The modern commentator Shen Mingyi expresses surprise that this event was not recorded by HHS, and doubts Pei Cen was so successful: HHSJJ 88/78:3275 jiaobu, and compare sub Cao Quan. On the other hand, it does appear that the Han re-established a presence in the state of Further Jushi after a heavy defeat there two years before.

Pei Hui 裴徽 [Wenji 文季]; Hedong. Son of Pei Mao and youngest brother of Pei Qian, he was widely known as a man of talent, and he was friends with many leading men. He became Inspector of Ji province under Wei. -SGZ 23:674.

Pei Mao 裴茂 [Juguang 巨光]; Hedong. Son of Pei Ye, Pei Mao became a county magistrate in the 180s and was then Administrator of a commandery. He later joined the Imperial Secretariat at Luoyang and followed the court to Chang'an under Dong Zhuo.

In 193, after unseasonable rain and cold in summer, Emperor Xian ordered Pei Mao, as an officer of the Imperial Censorate, to undertake jail delivery. The warlord Li Jue accused him of treason, but the emperor rejected the charge.

In 198, as Supervisor of Internuncios, Pei Mao was sent by Cao Cao to gather support from the leaders about Chang'an to attack and kill Li Jue. He was enfeoffed.

When Cao Cao became Duke of Wei in 214, Pei

Mao was the messenger who brought him the gold seal of rank.

Pei Mao died about 230. -HHS 72/62:2334, 2342, SGZ 6:187, 23:672.

Pei Mou 裴茂 see Pei Mao 裴茂.

Pei Qian 裴潛 [Wenxing 文行] (d.244); Hedong. Son of Pei Mao, as a young man Pei Qian acted very casually, and his father disapproved. In 189 he took refuge in Jing province from the disorders of the capital. Liu Biao offered him appointment, but Pei Qian refused and went to Changsha. When Cao Cao took Jing province in 208, he joined his staff and then held junior clerical office at Xu city.

In 216 there was trouble with the Wuhuan in the north. Pei Qian was appointed Administrator of Dai commandery, and settled them by firm but fair treatment. In 218 he was brought back to a clerical post in the Department of Justice, but forecast that his successor would treat the non-Chinese too leniently and there would be renewed disturbance. This did occur, and an army had to be sent under Cao Zhang.

Pei Qian was sent out again as Chancellor of Pei, and in 219 he was Inspector of Yan province. As Sun Quan attacked the key city of Hefei, Pei Qian brought troops to assist the defence co-ordinated by his colleague Wen Hui. He was then called west to assist Cao Ren against Guan Yu on the Han River, but the crisis was over before he arrived.

Pei Qian had several provincial appointments under Cao Pi, with special concern for agriculture, and he received enfeoffment. Under Cao Rui, Emperor Ming, he was Minister of Finance and then Director of the Secretariat. He held high rank at court until his death, and was granted posthumous honours.

Despite the early behaviour which had earned his father's disapproval, Pei Qian was later respected for his elegance, honesty and frugal conduct. He did not allow his wife and children to accompany him on his postings, and members of his household were often hungry and poor. -SGZ 23:671-73*; Mather 76:560.

Pei Xuan 裴玄 [Yanhuang 彦黃]; Xiapi. A noted scholar, Pei Xuan held position at Sun Quan's court and worked with Yan Jun and Zhang Cheng on Confucianist and Legalist texts. He held territorial appointment in Jing province about 230. -SGZ Wu 8:1248, 7:1238.

Pei Ye 裴曄; Hedong. A great-grandson of Pei Zun, during the mid-second century Pei Ye was Inspector of Bing province and General on the Liao. -XTS 77A:2237.

Pei You 裴優 (d.149); Youfufeng. A man from the region about Chang'an, Pei You could create a mist to spread across three li. In the reign of Emperor Huan he used this ability to carry out a series of robberies, then proclaimed himself emperor. He was taken and executed.

Before this, Pei You had sought instruction from the hermit scholar Zhang Kai, who was said to be able to extend a mist over five li. Zhang Kai would have nothing to do with him, but as Pei You was found to have used techniques similar to those of Zhang Kai, Zhang Kai was sent to prison. It was two years before his innocence was proven. -HHS 7:296, 36/26:1243; Vervooorn 90:191.

Pei Yu 裴瑜 [Zhihuang 雉璜]; Hedong. Honest and intelligent, Pei Yu was nominated Filial and Incorrupt by the Administrator Shi Bi. About 170 Shi Bi was falsely accused and taken to the capital in a cage cart. Pei Yu alone went to farewell him. He stood at the side of the road and shouted his praises, and Shi Bi was encouraged and grateful.

Pei Yu later became a member of the Imperial Secretariat. -HHS 64/54:2111-12.

Pei Zun 裴遵; Yunzhong. Having joined Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, Pei Zun served against Wei Ao and Gongsun Shu, and was appointed Administrator of Dunhuang.

In 41 Pei Zun protested to Guangwu about the proposal to name King Xian of Suoju as Protector-General of the Western Regions. Though Xian and his family were long-established friends of China, Pei Zun objected that it was wrong for a non-Chinese to hold such high office. The proposal had been put forward by Dou Rong, who knew the region, but Guangwu now reversed his decision and authorised Pei Zun to intercept Xian's envoy and change the seal for that of a chief general. When the envoy resisted, Pei Zun effected the exchange by force. King Xian was predictably offended. He took the title in any case, and began his own policy of expansion.

In 45 the rulers of sixteen states sent hostages to the court at Luoyang, asking for the appointment of a Chinese Protector-General. Guangwu did not wish to expand so far afield while the empire was still recovering from the civil war, so he refused the request and sent the hostages back with generous gifts. The rulers then wrote to Pei Zun asking for the hostages to be kept at Dunhuang: this would give the impression that the Chinese were intending to send a Protector-General, and even the possibility might serve to restrain Suoju. Guangwu approved this device, but in the following year Xian called the bluff. The hostages eventually went home, and the central Asian states were left to their own devices. -HHS 88/78:2923-24; Bn 67:132-133.

Presumably in reward for his services, Pei Zun was permitted to move his family's formal place of residence from the Yunzhong frontier to the inner commandery of Hedong. -XTS 77A:2235.

Peng 彭, the Lady; Chen. Member of a powerful local family in the 130s, the Lady lived in a great house and was in the habit of climbing a tower and staring at the yamen of the Chancellor Huang Chang. Huang Chang took offence at this, and had the members of the family arrested and killed. -HHS 77/67:2497.

Peng Cai 彭材 (d.213); Yuzhang. A leader of bandits in the east of Poyang, Peng Cai was destroyed by He Qi in 213. -SGZ Wu 15:1379.

Peng Can 彭参. Assistant to Zhang Dao the Administrator of Julu in 149, Peng Can took part in his work of water control on the Zhang River. -SJZ 10:17a.

Peng Chong 彭寵 [Botong 伯通] (d.29); Nanyang. Peng Chong's father Hong 宏 [or Wei 偉] was Administrator of Yuyang in the time of Emperor Ai of Former Han. He had great personal authority in the border region, but was killed by Wang Mang on a charge of treason: QHX:446-447.

As a young man, Peng Chong held local office in his commandery, and about 20 he became a member of the staff of the Excellency of Works. He accompanied the army of Wang Yi as it advanced against the Han rebels in 23, but as they reached Luoyang Peng Chong learned that his twin brother had joined the enemy. Afraid he would be executed on account of this association, he fled north to Yuyang and took refuge with a gentleman who had served under his father and thus owed the family a personal loyalty.

After the Gengshi Emperor had taken the throne in 23, he sent Han Hong as his commissioner to the far north. Han Hong was a fellow-countryman and an old friend of Peng Chong, and he appointed him lieutenant-general and acting Administrator of Yuyang. Towards the end of that year Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came as commissioner to the northeast, but before Peng Chong could call upon him, in the winter of 23/24 Wang Lang laid claim to the imperial title.

Many of the gentry wished to join him, but Peng Chong and his fellow-countryman Wu Han, who had also come to take refuge in the north, preferred the regime based upon their home country of Nanyang. In association with his neighbour, Geng Kuang the Administrator of Shanggu, Peng Chong sent troops under Wu Han to support Liu Xiu. He also provided supplies for the campaign, and he was rewarded with title as a chief general and nominal enfeoffment as marquis.

In the summer Wang Lang was destroyed, but the Gengshi Emperor sent new administrators to replace Peng Chong and Geng Kuang, probably because he distrusted their association with Liu Xiu. These new appointees were intercepted and killed by Geng Kuang's son Geng Yan, and the two men naturally confirmed their support for Liu Xiu. When Peng Chong at last met Liu Xiu, however, he did not receive the rewards he had expected: his former subordinates Wu Han and Wang Liang were given high appointments, but Peng Chong remained only Administrator of Yuyang, while Zhu Fu, a personal favourite of Liu Xiu, was made Governor of You province.

Zhu Fu and Peng Chong soon became enemies. Conceited and boastful, Zhu Fu was confident of support from Liu Xiu, now emperor. He made accusations against Peng Chong: that during the troubles just past he had shown a lack of filial piety by sending a party to rescue his wife rather than his mother; and that he had harmed supporters of the emperor. He also claimed that Peng Chong was laying up supplies and gathering troops.

Early in 26 Peng Chong was summoned to court, and when his request that Zhu Fu also be called up was rejected he became increasingly concerned. He sought assistance from others of Guangwu's followers, and when they refused him he gathered local gentry and attacked Zhu Fu. Geng Kuang in Shanggu rejected his offer of alliance, but in the autumn Peng Chong heavily defeated Zhu Fu and Guangwu's general Deng Long, and he besieged Zhu Fu in Ji city, at present-day Beijing.

By 27 Peng Chong had expanded his influence into the neighbouring commanderies of Youbeiping and Shanggu and had contact with Zhang Bu and various bandit groups to his south. He also made alliance with the Xiongnu on the frontier, marrying his daughter to the Shanyu Yu and giving presents of silk. At the end of the year he was joined by the Administrator of Zhuo commandery, Zhang Feng. Early in 28 Ji city fell, Zhu Fu barely escaped with his life, and Peng Chong proclaimed himself King of Yan 燕王.

694 Peng Chong

In the summer, however, Peng Chong's ally Zhang Feng was destroyed, and imperial armies under Zhai Cun and Liu Xi now advanced on Yuyang. Peng Chong moved against them, and sent his brother Peng Chun with Xiongnu auxiliaries in a separate column to the north. As Peng Chun was heavily defeated by a flank attack from Geng Kuang's son Geng Shu and the men from Shanggu, Geng Kuang and the imperialists followed up their success and gained further victories in Yuyang.

Early in 29, when it was obvious that his cause was lost, Peng Chong and his wife were murdered by their own slaves: see sub Zimi. There was a brief attempt to restore the state under Peng Chong's son Wu, but he was killed soon afterwards and the family was destroyed. -HHS 12/2:501-05*; Bn 59:71-72, 124-131.

Peng Chong 彭寵, wife of (d.29). The Lady was a strong-willed woman, her husband treated her with respect and she had great influence over him. In 26 she encouraged him to defy the orders of Emperor Guangwu and to enter into insurrection. She was later afflicted by bad dreams, foretelling danger within their household. Peng Chong accordingly sent his cousin Zihou Lanqing away, but husband and wife were then both killed by the slave Zimi and his fellows. -HHS 12/2:503-05, Bn 59:131.

Peng Chun 彭純; Nanyang. Younger brother of Peng Chong, in 28 he was sent with two thousand Xiongnu horsemen to attack Emperor Guangwu's generals Zhai Cun and Liu Xi in Zhuo commandery. They suffered a surprise attack from the army of Shanggu under Geng Shu, son of the Administrator Geng Kuang, and were heavily defeated. -HHS 19/9; Bn 59:130.

Peng Fei 彭非, the Lady; Guanghan. The Lady's husband Wang Fu died when she was still young. Her uncle attempted to have the Lady marry again, but she went before the Administrator Wu Fang and cut off her hair to show her determination to remain a virtuous widow. -HYGZ 10B:153.

Peng Feng 彭豐. Junior commanders under the eastern warlord Dong Xian, Peng Feng and Yu Xiu operated in Lu commandery in 26 and 27. Though Guangwu's Administrator Bao Yong forced several other such groups to surrender, Peng Feng and Yu Xiu maintained their independence and took title as generals. They were eventually tricked into attending a ceremony and were arrested and killed. -HHS 29/19:1019.

Peng Hong 彭閔 [Zuoming 作明]. At the end of Former Han Peng Hong was a pupil of Zhu Pu 朱普 at Chang'an, studying the New Text of the Classic of History in the Ouyang tradition.

In 44 Peng Hong was a gentleman cadet at court. There was a vacancy for an Academician at the University, and Emperor Guangwu wanted to appoint Huan Rong. Huan Rong had been a fellow-student of Peng Hong and Gao Hong, and he recommended both of them as more accomplished scholars, but Guangwu gave Huan Rong the post and appointed Peng Hong and Gao Hong as Consultants. -HHS 37/27:1250.

Peng Hu 彭虎 [Tiger Peng]; Yuzhang. During the early 200s Peng Hu was leader of a band in the Poyang region numbering several thousand men. He and his people were defeated and scattered by Sun Quan's commanders Dong Xi, Ling Tong, Bu Zhi and Jiang Qin. -SGZ Wu.10:1291.

Peng Kai 彭愷. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Peng Kai took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county marquissate in Pingyuan.

In 127, after Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang, he and Peng Kai and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in the following year the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital. Peng Kai died a few years later. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Peng Liang 彭良 (d.162). A county magistrate in Zuopingyi, in 162 Peng Liang was found guilty of killing innocent people. He suffered public execution. -HHS 102/12:3256.

Peng Qiu 彭璆; Beihai. A Confucian scholar, in the early 190s he was adviser to the Administrator Kong Rong, who made him Reporting Officer and nominated him for office. -SGZ 12:371.

Peng Shi 彭式; Wu. Member of a powerful local family in Qiantang county, about 220 Peng Shi was plundering the territory with a host of followers. Zhou Fang was appointed as magistrate, and he swiftly executed Peng Shi and his leading associates. -SGZ

Wu 15:1387.

Peng Tuo 彭脫 (d.184); Runan. A local leader of Yellow Turbans, Peng Tuo was destroyed by Huangfu Song and Zhu Jun. -HHS 71/61:2301; deC 89:180-184.

Peng Wang 彭汪 [Zhongbo 仲博]; Runan. He wrote a commentary to Zuo zhuan. -Yao Zhenzong:2358.

Peng Wu 彭午 (d.29); Nanyang. Son of Peng Chong, after his father's murder he was named King of Yan 燕王 by Han Li 韓立 and Zihou Lanqing, but was soon afterwards killed by the officer Han Li 韓利. -HHS 12/2:505.

Peng Xie 彭勰; Guanghan. A noted scholar, Peng Xie joined colleagues to compose a hymn at the death of the Lady Zhang Shuji, wife of Wang Zun. -HYGZ 10A:139.

Peng Xiu 彭脩 [Ziyang 子陽]; Kuaiji. At the age of fifteen Peng Xiu accompanied his father, a local commandery official, on home leave. They were taken by bandits, but Peng Xiu faced their leader with a sword in his hand to defend his father. Impressed by his loyalty, the bandit chief let them both go, and Peng Xiu was admired by his neighbours.

Later, as commandery Officer of Merit, Peng Xiu persuaded the acting Administrator Zai Chao to spare two other officers whom he had intended to execute.

When the pirate Ding Yi threatened Kuaiji, the people and officials were too frightened to resist, but the Administrator, whose surname was Bi, knew of Peng Xiu's courage and arranged that he act as brevet magistrate of Wu county. Peng Xiu went to face the raiders and warned them of the might of the empire that would be turned against them if they proceeded further. They disbanded and went away, and people sang a song in his honour.

Peng Xiu then became an Assistant Officer of the province, but when the bandit chieftain Zhang Zilin ravaged Kuaiji he went with the Administrator to attack him. The enemy shot a hail of arrows and Peng Xiu was hit and killed as he shielded his senior officer. The Administrator escaped unharmed, and when the bandits heard of Peng Xiu's gallantry they killed the man who had shot the fatal arrow and came to surrender. -XC 5:12a-13a, HHS 81/71:2673-74 [this latter text omits the story of how Peng Xiu discouraged Ding Yi].

Peng Yang 彭彥 [Yongnian 永年] (178-214); Guanghan. Eight feet tall [185 cm] and well built, Peng Yang was proud and arrogant. He became a junior clerk at the provincial office of the warlord Liu Zhang, but was slandered by his colleagues and sentenced to exile and convict service.

As Liu Bei came to the west, Peng Yang approached his officer Pang Tong, who was initially disinclined to receive him but was then impressed by his quality. He and Fa Zheng recommended Peng Yang to Liu Bei, who appointed him as his Headquarters Officer. As the sudden elevation went to Pang Yang's head, he showed contempt for others. Zhuge Liang disapproved, and on his advice Liu Bei sent Peng Yang away as Administrator of Jiangyang, established from the southern part of Jianwei.

Peng Yang was resentful. He told Ma Chao and suggested they plan a coup together. Ma Chao promptly reported the approach, and Peng Yang was arrested and executed. -SGZ Shu 10:994-96*.

Peng Yi 彭義 miswritten for Peng Yang 彭彥. -HYGZ 3:37.

Peng Zhu 彭珠 "Pearl." In 29, as Peng Chong and his wife were taken by mutinous slaves led by Zimi, Peng Chong tried to persuade one of his captors to release him, and promised his daughter Pearl in marriage. -HHS 12/2:504-05; Bn 59:131.

Pi Chai 邳柴; Anping. Son of Pi Yin, Pi Chai succeeded to the family marquisate. -HHS 21/11:759.

Pi Ji 邳吉; Xindu/Anping. Father of Pi Tong, he had been Administrator of Liaoxi under Former Han.

In 24 he and other members of the family were in Xindu when the city was taken by troops of the pretender Wang Lang. At the instruction of their captors, they wrote letters in their own hands, asking Pi Tong to change sides; Pi Tong refused to change. The city was recaptured by troops of the Gengshi Emperor, and Pi Tong's family was released unharmed. -HHS 21/11:757-58.

Pi Tang 邳湯 (d.43); Xindu/Anping. Son of Pi Tong, he was probably one of the hostages held briefly in Xindu by supporters of the pretender Wang Lang; see sub Pi Ji.

When his father died about 30, Pi Tang succeeded to his marquisate; in 33 the county fief was transferred from Changshan to Pingyuan. Pi Tang was succeeded by a son whose personal name is unknown; he died without an heir and the fief was ended: but see sub Pi Yin. -HHS 21/11:759.

Pi Tong 邳彤 or Pi Yong 彤 [Weijun 偉君]; Xindu/

Anping. Pi Tong's father Ji had been Administrator of Liaoxi under Former Han, and in the time of Wang Mang Pi Tong served as Administrator of Herong 和戎 commandery, which had been divided from Julu.

In the winter of 23, when Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came to the north as commissioner for the new regime of the Gengshi Emperor, Pi Tong offered submission and was confirmed in his post.

Soon afterwards the pretender Wang Lang took the imperial title at Handan, the greater part of the region accepted his claim, and Liu Xiu was held for some time in the north. In the spring of 24 he managed to escape south to join Ren Guang the Administrator of Xindu. Pi Tong sent two troops of cavalry, and then came himself with local levies. Despite this support, Liu Xiu was uncertain what to do, and he contemplated either turning bandit or retreating to Chang'an.

In an eloquent address, Pi Tong claimed that the people of the north had long been seeking the restoration of Han, and argued the importance of resistance to rally loyalist support. So Liu Xiu resolved on attack, and he named Pi Tong Chief General of the Rear while still keeping his office as Administrator.

Pi Tong and his men led the attack on Wang Lang's supporters in Julu, and he then took a detachment against a bandit force in Zhongshan. Wang Lang sent a detachment which seized Xindu city and captured Pi Tong's father Ji, his younger brother and his wife and children. They sent letters asking him to change sides, but Pi Tong, weeping, insisted that the imperial cause was more important. Soon afterwards the city was recaptured by Han forces, and Pi Tong's family was released unharmed.

In the summer Wang Lang was destroyed, and Pi Tong was awarded a titular marquisate. As Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25, Pi Tong received a substantive county fief in Changshan and was named Acting Excellency of Works. When the court came to Luoyang at the end of the year, he was appointed Minister of Ceremonies and then Minister Steward, but he left the latter office to become a Palace Attendant and follow Guangwu on his campaigns. Retiring to his estates in 30, he died soon afterwards.

Recognising Pi Tong as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 21/11:757-59*, 22/12:789-91; Bn 76:26, Bn 79:84.

Pi Xiang 蕃嚮 [Jiajing 嘉景]; Lu. A gentleman cadet in the late 160s, Pi Xiang was praised by the reformists and students of the University at Luoyang and numbered in their lists of worthy men. -HHS 67/57:2187-90: pronunciation of the surname is given by TC.

Pi Xun 皮隴. Pi Xun was Court Physician to Emperor Ming. On one occasion, after attending an imperial hunt in the Shanglin Park near Luoyang, he returned to the capital after sundown and lodged for the night in a palace gatehouse. It became cold and he was taken by an intestinal cramp 疝病. The cadet gentleman Deng Xun, on guard duty at the time, heard him cry out and went to help. Pi Xun asked him to bring a fire to warm his back. Deng Xun could not find any fire, so he blew warm breath on Pi Xun's back and called his fellow guards to take turns. By morning Pi Xun had recovered. -HHS 16/6:608, DGHJ 8:2a; Bn 76:82. Cf., however, sub Shi Xun.

Pi Yin 邳音; Anping. Pi Yin was a grandson of Pi Tong. The county marquisate awarded to Pi Tong had become extinct with the death of his grandson in the senior lineage, but in 114 the regent Dowager Deng enfeoffed Pi Yin as a village marquis. -HHS 21/11:759.

Pi Yong 邳彤 see Pi Tong 邳彤.

Pian 便 see Bian 便, King of Yetao/Shetiao.

Pian Jing 便敬 see Bian Jing.

Pianhe 偏何; Xianbi. In 49, hoping to break the hostile alliance of the non-Chinese peoples along the northern frontier, Zhai Tong the Administrator of Liaodong sent messengers with gifts to the Xianbi. The chieftain and war leader 大都護 Pianhe sent a return party to bring tribute. Zhai Tong entered negotiations and gave substantial gifts, and Pianhe entered a long-term allegiance.

As earnest of good faith, Zhai Tong proposed that Pianhe and comrades turn against the Xiongnu and send him the heads of those whom they killed. The new allies responded with enthusiasm, and their first campaign produced two thousand such grisly trophies. Thereafter the Xianbi attacked the Xiongnu every year, and the Chinese paid a bounty for each head they received.

In 58 Zhai Tong likewise directed Pianhe and his associates against the Red Mountain Wuhuan, who had been troubling Shanggu and Yuyang. They killed the Wuhuan leader Xinzhiben, his followers submitted, and the borders were peaceful. -HHS 20/10:745, 90/80:2985.

Pillar of Heaven, General, 柱天將軍 see General Who is Pillar of Heaven.

Pimihu 卑彌呼 [Japanese: Pimiko/Himiko]; Japanese. During the time of emperors Huan and Ling in the second century AD, the Japanese islands were divided among hundreds of petty tribal states, called Wa/Wo 倭 by the Chinese [on the possible origins of this name, see Tsunoda/Goodrich 51:4 note 2]. One of those in the west, Yamatai 邪馬壹 [Japanese: Yamato?], probably situated on Kyushu island, was ruled by an unmarried woman named Pimihu who controlled the people with sorcery, and whose authority extended over neighbouring states. Pimihu lived in seclusion, with a thousand female servants but just one man to serve her food and transmit her orders, while a younger brother assisted her in government. -HHS 85/75:2821; Tsunoda/Goodrich 51:2-3.

SGZ 30:854-58 also has a description of the Wo, and says that in the third century Yamatai, or the State of the Queen 女王國, had a number of tributaries. Embassies are recorded to and from the court of Wei, while SGZ 4:120 refers specifically to a mission from Queen Pimihu in the winter of 243. It appears that the queen maintained her authority by shamanism, and given the length of time since Huan and Ling it seems likely that Pimihu was a title rather than a name. Tsunoda/Goodrich 51:5 note 5 identify the name with the ancient Japanese title Himeko "Princess."

Pimiko [Japanese] see Pimihu 卑彌呼.

Pin Chang 頻暢 or Pin Yang 陽 became Administrator of Jiuquan. -FSTY 6f:146.

Pin Yang 頻陽: Yang is said to have been an alternative personal name of Pin Chang. -FSTY 6f:146.

Ping-Han 平漢. Three versions of this title are recorded among the Black Mountain bandits of the Taihang range in the 180s and 190s:

1. HHS 71/61:2310, refers to a chieftain in 185 who styled himself Ping-Han Daji 平漢大計 [Grand Design to Pacify Han].

2. Jiuzhou chunqiu, quoted by SGZ 8:261 PC, refers to a chieftain called Ping-Han Dahong 平漢大洪 [Mighty Pacification of Han]. [Both punctuated editions of HHS and SGZ indicate Ping-Han and Daji and Ping-Han and Dahong as separate men, but this seems less likely; I suspect it was one leader, with a variant account of the first character of his assumed title.]

3. HHS 74/64A:2381 and SGZ 6:194 describe the Black Mountain chieftain Tao Sheng q.v., who took the title General Who Pacifies Han 平漢將軍 and was active in 191.

About the same time, moreover, but quite separate to the Black Mountain groups, from 184 to 214 Song Jian of Longxi maintained a local state with the title King of the Sources of the River Who Will Pacify Han 河首平漢王.

Ping-Han Dahong 平漢大洪 see sub Ping-Han 平漢.

Ping-Han Daji 平漢大計 see sub Ping-Han 平漢.

Ping Shou 瓶守 became Junior Tutor to the Heir 太子小傅. -FSTY 6f:138.

Ping Shu 平叔 was a noted Confucian scholar; during the time of Emperor Guangwu Ping Shu became a Consultant. -DGHJ 16:8a.

Ping Yi 平軼. Son of Ping Shu, Ping Yi was also known as a Confucian scholar, and he too became a Consultant. -DGHJ 16:8a.

Ping Zhi 平直; Ba. A local officer in 154, Ping Zhi joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending that the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree. -HYZ 1:5.

Pingshi, Lady of 平氏君 see the Lady Zhao Yao 趙堯.

Po Qin 繁欽 [Xiubo 休伯] (d.218); Yingchuan. During the 190s Po Qin took refuge in Jing province. He was shown great favour by Liu Biao, but his friend and colleague Du Xi warned him against accepting such a limited master; Po Qin later returned to the north.

Celebrated for his ability in poetry, letters and composition, Po Qin became Registrar to Cao Cao as Imperial Chancellor, and he was a close correspondent of Cao Pi. -SGZ 21:602-03*.

Poison Yu 于毒 see Yu Du 于毒.

Pu 蒲 [surname] see also Man 滿 passim and sub Pu Zun below.

Pu Zun 蒲遵 is mentioned by FSTY 6f:143. Though the entry is intended to demonstrate the use of Pu as a surname, another citation refers to Pu Chang 昌, who is more commonly known by the surname Man 滿: QHX:432. It is possible that this man's surname should also be read as Man.

Pufulu 普富廬; Wuhuan. Chieftain in Dai in 207, he surrendered to Cao Cao after the battle of White Wolf Mountain and was named acting Shanyu.

In 216 Pufulu and other leaders caused trouble but were settled by the Administrator Pei Qian. When Pei Qian left the territory in 218, however, Pufulu and his fellows again rebelled; this time they were defeated and pacified by Cao Zhang. -SGZ 1:30, 23:672.

Puhu 朴胡 see Fuhu 朴胡.

Puhu Chi'er 支胡赤兒 see Chi'er 赤兒.

Pulu 普廬 see Pufulu 普富廬.

Punu 蒲奴; Xiongnu. Son of the Shanyu Yu (reg. 18-46) and younger brother of Wudadihou, when Wudadihou succeeded their father as Shanyu in 46 he named Punu as Worthy King of the Left, recognised as heir-apparent, and when Wudadihou died later that year Punu became Shanyu.

There was, however, another claimant to the title. Since the time of the first Huhanye Shanyu 呼韓邪單于 (reg. 59/58-31 BC), it had been regarded as customary that the title of Shanyu should be passed from elder to younger brother, and only when each generation had been exhausted should it be transferred to the next. The son Bi of the Shanyu Nangzhiyasi 囊知牙斯 or Zhi 知 (reg. 8 BC-AD 13), elder brother of the Shanyu Yu, claimed that the inheritance should pass to him rather than to his cousins Wudadihou and Punu. On his claim and subsequent disaffection see sub Bi.

At the time Punu came to the throne the Xiongnu court was already unsettled by two swift successions, but the territory was also affected by drought and a plague of insects, while the hitherto subservient Wuhuan made attacks from the east and seized considerable territory. Punu therefore sent messengers to China, seeking to restore peace, and the imperial court sent an embassy in return. It seems likely, however, that their agents had earlier made contact with Bi, and he had shown willingness to submit to Han.

In the following year Bi offered to act as an agent of Han within the Xiongnu court. Officers of the Shanyu Punu reported his actions and recommended that he be arrested and executed at the time of the great summer sacrifice. When Bi received warning of this, he gathered some forty or fifty thousand men to attack the Shanyu's officers, and though Punu sent ten thousand men against his cousin, they were outnumbered and forced to withdraw.

The response of the Shanyu had obviously been inadequate, while the Chinese were so confident of their diplomatic success that orders had already been given for a reduction of defences in the north. It seems clear that the Xiongnu court was in difficulty, and the central power of Punu's state was far weaker than under his father Yu. On the other hand, Bi's rival government could claim the allegiance of only a fraction of the Xiongnu tribes. Shifting his base into the Ordos region, he sought alliance from Han, and only when this was agreed, in the winter of 48/49, did he take title as Shanyu.

In 49 Bi sent his younger brother Mo with an army against the northerners. They defeated Punu's guard, captured his younger brother, and returned with more than ten thousand people, seven thousand horses, and myriads of cattle and sheep. Punu was forced to withdraw north across the Gobi. Two of his chiefs went to join the Southern court, and in the summer of 50 his unnamed younger brother, captured in the previous year, escaped from his nominal imprisonment and sought to establish himself as a third Shanyu.

Punu, however, was now able to mount a counter-offensive, and within a few months he had defeated his brother, forced him to suicide and killed his leading allies. The sons of those late allies attempted to withdraw with their people to the south, but the Northern army captured the renegades, and in a head-on clash they routed a Southern relief force. The incident was minor in itself, but the face-to-face encounter restored local supremacy to Punu and his Northern state.

Soon afterwards Bi's puppet state was established under Chinese control in Xihe commandery within the Ordos loop of the Yellow River, and the frontier was largely stabilised by the division of the Xiongnu between north and south. The Han government, however, was not able to arrange for an effective civilian re-settlement of the region, and the land was left largely open to the non-Chinese.

In 51 Punu in turn sent envoys to Wuwei commandery seeking terms with China, but when the matter was debated at the imperial court Liu Zhuang the future Emperor Ming argued that the approach should be rejected; so the Northern envoys were sent back. In 52 Punu offered to negotiate his authority in central Asia, and this embassy reached the capital, but a circumlocutory answer claimed only that Han had resisted pressure from the Southern state to destroy the North, and that the court placed small value on the offerings and goodwill of the Northern court. Some presents were given, but nothing more, and a similar approach in 55 received no more interest.

On the other hand, though still exposed to attack from the Xianbi and Wuhuan in the east, during the late 40s and 50s the Xiongnu expanded westwards into the Tarim basin, where Shanshan, Qiuzi [Kuqa] and the small states of Turfan offered submission and the state of Yutian [Khotan] was obliged to send tribute and accept a Xiongnu Resident. During the 60s, moreover, even as Punu continued to seek a treaty and the opening of frontier markets, the Northerners resumed raiding along the frontier of China Proper. Despite various attempts, the hostility of the Southern Xiongnu and the Chinese concern for their alliance ensured that no settlement was reached

There is no record of the date of death of the Northern Shanyu Punu, nor of his lineage and succession. The first of his descendants to be identified is the Youliu 優留 Shanyu. -HHS 89/79:2942-49; Bn 67:116-134, deC 84:229-264.

Puyang Kai 濮陽闕; Chenliu. A private scholar about 180, Puyang Kai taught the Poetry, Ritual and Zuo zhuan. One of his students was Zhang Hong. -SGZ Wu 8:1243.

Puyang Qian 濮陽潛; Chenliu. A gentleman scholar, Puyang Qian was Registrar to the county magistrate Niu Shu and later became Administrator of Shangdang. -HHS 48/38:1618.

Puyang Yi 濮陽逸; Chenliu. A refugee scholar, Puyang Yi crossed the Yangzi and joined the entourage of Lu Mao, who treated him well. Puyang Yi later became Administrator of Changsha for the state of Wu. -SGZ Wu 12:1336-37, 19:1451.

Q

Qi 郤 [surname] see Chi 郤/郤 passim.

Qi 錡 [surname] see Yi 錡 passim.

Qi Cheng 齊盛 see Qi Sheng 齊盛.

Qi Chou 箕稠 see Gongqi Chou 公綦稠. -HHS 73/63:2353.

Qi Gu 畦固 see Sui Gu 畦固.

Qi Ji 戚寄. A commander under Yuan Shu, about 198 he was persuaded by Liu Fu to change allegiance to Cao Cao. -SGZ 15:463.

Qi Mucan 綦母參 see Qimu Can 綦母參.

Qi Mukai 綦母闕 see Qimu Kai 綦母闕.

Qi Mushen 綦母參 see Qimu Can 綦母參.

Qi Sheng 齊盛 (d.179). A eunuch, Qi Sheng was an associate of Wang Fu and held office as an Attendant at the Yellow Gates. In 179 he and others of their party were impeached by the Director of Retainers Yang Qiu. They were tortured and died in prison. -HHS 77/67:2499-2500.

Qi Wucan 綦母參 see Qimu Can 綦母參.

Qi Wukai 綦母闕 see Qimu Kai 綦母闕.

Qi Zhou 齊周; Yuyang. A former Assistant Officer under Liu Yu the Governor of You province, in 195 Qi Zhou joined the rebellion of Xianyu Fu against Gongsun Zan. -SGZ 8:243.

Qian Bo 錢博; Nanhai. Early in the 200s Qian Bo was an officer under Zhang Jin the Governor of Jiao. After 211 he may have had an association with Bu Zhi the Inspector for Sun Quan, but by 220 he was a leader of rebels west of the Pearl River estuary. When Lü Dai replaced Bu Zhi, Qian Bo surrendered and was made Commandant in the new commandery of Gaoliang. -SGZ Wu 8:1252, 15:1384.

Qian Chang 芊昌 see Yang Chang 羊昌.

Qian Guo 虔國. As Administrator of Rinan, Qian Guo was constantly accompanied by a wild goose, and after he died in office the bird roosted for two years on a tree by his tomb. -XC 7:1a.

Qian Hao 牽顯; Anping. In 160 Qian Hao was Inspector of Yan province with some responsibility for operations against the rebel Shusun Wuji. -HHS 65/55: 2132.

Qian Hong 騫宏 [Hongbo 弘伯]. XTS 74A:3145 says that in the mid-140s Qian Hong migrated to Jincheng, where he became an Attendant Officer of Liang province.

Qian Ling 黔陵; Shanyang. In 30 Qian Ling killed the former rebel Pang Meng and sent his head to the capital. He was rewarded with enfeoffment. -HHS 2/12:497.

Qian Tong 錢銅 (d.199); Wu. A local leader, Qian Tong opposed Sun Ce in 196 but was defeated and killed. -SGZ Wu 1:1105.

Qian Xian 千獻 became Commandant of Shu commandery. -FSTY 5f:118.

Qian Xin 錢訢 [Ligong 禮公]; Nanyang. Sometime a county magistrate, in 156 Qian Xin was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b Qian Zhao 牽招 [Zijing 子經]; Anping. When still in his early teens, Qian Zhao went to study under his fellow-countryman Yue Yin, then followed him to Luoyang. After Yue Yin was killed in 189, Qian Zhao and his fellow-students escorted the body home. They were attacked by robbers but Qian Zhao stayed with the cortège as his colleagues ran away. The bandits were going to break up the coffin for its nails, but Qian Zhao pleaded with them and they left.

Qian Zhao later commanded Wuhuan cavalry for Yuan Shao, and after his death he served his son Yuan Shang. When Cao Cao attacked Ye in 204 Qian Zhao was sent to Shangdang for supplies. As Yuan Shang abandoned the city, Qian Zhao urged Gao Gan to send aid from Bing province; instead Gao Gan attempted to kill Qian Zhao.

Unable to rejoin Yuan Shang, Qian Zhao went to Cao Cao, who sent him on an embassy to the Wuhuan. He persuaded the chieftain Supuyan to reject alliance with Gongsun Du in Liaodong and not to support Yuan Tan.

In 207, after Cao Cao's victory at White Wolf Mountain, Qian Zhao was appointed Protector of the Wuhuan. Soon afterwards he returned to Ye city, and when Yuan Shang's head was displayed there he paid it mourning honours; Cao Cao respected his loyalty.

In 215 Qian Zhao took part in the conquest of Hanzhong, returning later to Ye, and was then sent as a colonel to Xu and Qing provinces, where he captured Donglai on the Shandong peninsula.

In 221 Cao Pi sent Qian Zhao to Shangu as Protector of the Xianbi. Working in co-operation with the Protector of the Wuhuan Tian Yu, he maintained a measure of security along the frontier for more than ten years. -SGZ 26:730-33*.

Qiang Hua 彊華; Yingchuan. About 20 Qiang Hua was a fellow-student of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, at Chang'an, and he remained in that region. In 25, as Liu Xiu was being encouraged by his followers to take the imperial title, Qiang Hua came to him with a favourable prophetic text, and Liu Xiu quoted from it as he announced his claim to the throne. -HHS 1A:21; Bn 59:240-241.

Qiang Shizhi 彊釋之 is mentioned by FSTY 6f:145.

Qiangduan 强端; Di. A chieftain in Wudu, in 218 Qiangduan led his people to destroy the army of Liu Bei's general Wu Lan and sent his head to Cao Cao. -SGZ 1:51.

Qiangqu 羌渠 (d.141); Wuhuan. In 140 the chieftain Qiangqu joined his colleague Ajian in a rising to support the rebel Xiongnu leaders Wusi and Che'niu. In the following year they were defeated and killed by the Emissary Zhang Dan. -HHS 90/80:2983.

Qiangqu 羌渠 or Qiangshen 羌深 (d.188); Xiongnu. In 179 Qiangqu was Worthy King of the Right of the Southern Xiongnu when the Emissary Zhang Xiu quarrelled with the Shanyu Huzheng and killed him. Though the Worthy King of the Right was not the natural heir, Zhang Xiu established Qiangqu as Shanyu.

In 187 the former official Zhang Chun rebelled and brought Xianbi to attack the frontier commanderies. Emperor Ling ordered Qiangqu to raise troops to assist the Han authorities against the rebels, and Qiangqu sent a contingent under the Worthy King of the Left. The Xiongnu people, however, had no interest in supporting Han, and were concerned that this was just the first of many conscriptions. There was a rebellion led by the Xiuchuge clan, and in the following year they killed Qiangqu and the Administrator of Xihe. -HHS 8:354-55, 89/79:2964-65; deC 84:345-347, deC 89:206.

Qiangshen 羌深 see Qiangqu 羌渠; Xiongnu.

Qianman 竊曼; Xianbi. Son of Helian and grandson of the great war-leader Tanshihuai, Qianman was young when his father died in the mid-180s, so his adult cousin Kuitou took the leadership. When Qianman came of age in the 190s he sought to regain his inheritance but was unsuccessful and soon disappeared. The conflict ended the unity achieved by Tanshihuai. -SGZ 30:838, HHS 90/80:2994; deC 84:343.

Qianwan 千萬; Di. King of the Zixiang Di 自項氏, in 213 Qianwan joined his colleague Agui in alliance with Ma Chao, but in the following year Xiahou Yuan destroyed their camp in Wudu. As Qianwan fled, his people surrendered; they were resettled in Youfufeng. -SGZ 1:42, 9:271, 30:838; deC 96:453-463.

Qiao 焦 [surname] see Jiao 焦 passim.

Qiao 喬 [surname] see also Qiao 橋; the two characters were originally the same, and are often transposed.

Qiao 橋, the Lady I; Lujiang. The Lady and her younger sister were celebrated beauties of the empire.

In 199 Sun Ce conquered Lujiang and took the Lady for his wife. She was presumably the mother of Sun Shao, who was born in the following year, though Sun Ce also had two daughters: see sub the Ladies Sun VII and VIII. -SGZ Wu 9:1260.

Qiao 橋, the Lady II; Lujiang. The Lady and her elder sister were celebrated beauties of the empire. In 199 Sun Ce conquered Lujiang and took the elder for his wife, while his friend Zhou Yu married the younger. Zhou Yu had two sons: Xun 循, who married a daughter of Sun Quan, and Yin 胤, who received enfeoffment, while there was also a daughter who married Sun Deng the Heir of Wu. Since all three achieved high rank, it is likely that they were born to the Lady rather than to concubines. -SGZ Wu 9:1260.

Qiao, King 峭王 of the Wuhuan, see Supuyan 蘇僕延.

Qiao Dai 橋載 [Yuanbin 元賓]; Liang. About 170 Qiao Dai was a member of the staff of the Grand Tutor, probably Hu Guang but possibly Chen Fan. He died a few years later, and in 176 his neighbours set up a stele to his memory. -SJZ 23:13b.

Qiao Hu 橋扈; Yunzhong. A local warlord, Qiao Hu held title as Administrator under the pretender Lu Fang, but in 31 Lu Fang executed Qiao Hu's colleague Li Xing the Administrator of Wuyuan. Qiao Hu defected to Emperor Guangwu and was confirmed in his office. -HHS 1B:53, 12/2:507; Bn 67:107.

Qiao Ji 橋基; Liang. Qiao Ji was descended from a noted scholarly and official family, and the HHS biography of his grandson Qiao Xuan says that he became Administrator of Guangling 廣陵. According to two inscriptions compiled for Qiao Xuan by Cai Yong, neither of which give his personal name, Qiao Ji was Chancellor to Liu Changbao, king of Guangchuan 廣川 from 107 to 108, and also became a Palace Attendant. -Cai 1:1 & 1:6, HHS 51/41:1695 & JJ at 1831.

Cai Yong's texts describe Qiao Xuan's grandfather as a 侍郎 Gentleman in Attendance, but this was a lowly cadet position. The more likely reading is 侍中 Palace Attendant, a high-ranking supernumerary appointment: HHSJJ 51/41:1831 Hui Dong. It is also possible there is some confusion between the kingdom of Guangchuan and the commandery of Guangling, and that Qiao Ji held office in only one of the two.

Qiao Jiu 喬就; Ba. As a local officer in 154, Qiao Jiu joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator

Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending that the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree. -HYZ 1:5.

Qiao Mao 橋瑁 [Yuanwei 元偉] (d.190); Liang. A kinsman of Qiao Xuan, Qiao Mao was a man of personal authority and kindness. He became Inspector of Yan province and then Administrator of Dong commandery.

In 189 He Jin ordered Qiao Mao to bring an army to Chenggao in Henan, by the junction of the Luo with the Yellow River, to intimidate the palace eunuchs and the Dowager. Later, after Dong Zhuo seized power, Qiao Mao forged a letter from the senior officials at the capital seeking aid against the usurper, and on this basis the rebel alliance was formed in the east. Qiao Mao was a leader of the group, but he was killed by his enemy Liu Dai. -HHS 69/59:2250, SGZ 1:6-8.

Qiao Min 譙敏 [Handa 漢達] (129-185). A eunuch who rose to be an Attendant at the Yellow Gates, Qiao Min was honoured with a stele after his death. The inscription describes him as a scholar of the classics. -LS 11:6b-8b.

Qiao Qing 譙慶; Ba. Younger brother of Qiao Xuan, who died in 35, after the destruction of Gongsun Shu in 36 Qiao Qing presented a report of Xuan's loyalty and fine scholarly conduct to the court of Han. Emperor Guangwu issued an edict that official sacrifices should be held in his honour and a grant of cash made to his family. -HHS 81/71A:2668.

Qiao Qing 譙岍 (the orthography of the personal name is uncertain) [Rongshi 榮始]; Ba. At the end of the second century Qiao Qing was known for his wide learning in the classics and apocrypha and his expertise on the Classic of History in the New Text tradition. He refused invitations from both the commandery and provincial authorities, but he held honorary status as a teacher. He died comparatively young. -SGZ Shu 12:1027, HYZ 12:224.

Qiao Rui 橋蕤 (d.197). A general of Yuan Shu, in 197 Qiao Rui was sent with Zhang Xun to attack Lü Bu at Xiapi. As their allies Han Xian and Yang Feng changed sides, they were defeated with heavy losses.

Later that year Qiao Rui was sent to hold Hu city in Chen against Cao Cao. Cao Cao stormed the city and slaughtered its defenders. -SGZ 1:15, 7:225, HHS 75/65:2442; deC 96:223-224.

Qiao Shu 橋術 [Bodao 伯道]; Nanyang. A former Administrator of Jiaozhi, in 156 Qiao Shu was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16a.

Qiao Su 橋肅; Liang. Son of Qiao Ji, Qiao Su served as Administrator of Donglai. -HHS 51/41:1695.

Qiao Xian 譙先 [Xiaoran 孝然]; Hedong. Evidently unaffected by hunger or cold, Qiao Xian was a mysterious hermit of the late Han and Wei period, regarded by many as an immortal 仙人. -SGZ 11:363-65.

Qiao Xuan 譙玄 [Junhuang 君黃] (d.35); Ba. A noted scholar of the Book of Changes and Chunqiu, Qiao Xuan was consulted on the occasion of an eclipse in 15 BC and then held a series of advisory posts at the imperial court. He advised Emperor Cheng against his irresponsible conduct, with predictable lack of success, and in 4 AD he was appointed to a commission sent throughout the empire to report on customs and instigate moral reform.

When Wang Mang took power in 6 AD, Qiao Xuan left his post, changed his name and went home to live in seclusion. After the fall of Wang Mang, when Gongsun Shu claimed the imperial title in the west, he sent several invitations to Qiao Xuan, but was repeatedly refused. Eventually he became angry, and gave Qiao Xuan the choice of accepting office or killing himself. The commandery Administrator entrusted with this ultimatum showed sympathy, and when Qiao Xuan's son Ying kowtowed and offered a ransom of a million cash he recommended clemency. Qiao Xuan was pardoned, and the people celebrated him in song.

Qiao Xuan went into hiding in the countryside, but he continued to receive students and maintained the tradition of classical learning even in time of disorder. He died before the fall of Gongsun Shu, but at the end of 36 his younger brother Qing reported Qiao Xuan's conduct to the Han court. Emperor Guangwu issued an edict that official sacrifices should be made in his honour and a grant of cash awarded to his family. -HHS 81/71:2666-68*, HYGZ 1:4; Mather 76:508, Vervoorn 90:142-143, QHX:454. [XHS 5:16a gives the personal name as Yuan 元, no doubt avoiding a taboo.]

Qiao Xuan 橋玄 [Gongzu 公祖] (110-184); Liang. Son of Qiao Su, and scion of a noted family of scholar-officials, Qiao Xuan studied Ritual and Chunqiu.

As a young man Qiao Xuan became Officer of Merit in his commandery. When Zhou Jing the Inspector of Yu province came on tour Qiao Xuan begged that he would make him Assistant Officer for the state of Chen, so he might investigate the wrongful conduct of the Chancellor Yang Chang. When Zhou Jing approved, Qiao Xuan promptly arrested Yang Chang's clients and began to interrogate them. The General-in-Chief Liang Ji intervened, and Zhou Jing now tried to halt the case, but Qiao Xuan persisted and Yang Chang was dismissed.

Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, Qiao Xuan became an assistant head of police under the Prefect of Luoyang. He left that office because he was ashamed to serve under the Intendant of Henan Liang Buyi; after a period at home he joined the office of the Excellency over the Masses. Graded First Class, he entered the Censorate, and in the early 150s he was Inspector of Liang; there he sorted out the dispute between Aluoduo and Beijun, rival claimants to the throne of Further Jushi [but cf. sub Yan Xiang].

Qiao Xuan later became Chancellor of Qi. There was a case in which a son avenged his father in a vendetta. Qiao Xuan had intended to pardon him for his filial piety, but then the county magistrate Lu Zhi killed him. Qiao Xuan killed Lu Zhi in turn, as apology to the dead man's spirit. Qiao Xuan was sent to convict service, but when his sentence was ended he became Administrator of Shanggu and then of Hanyang. In the latter posting he found that the magistrate Huangfu Zhen had acted wrongly: he had him flogged to death in the market-place of the capital; everyone was impressed.

Leaving office on grounds of health, Qiao Xuan later received a special summons to become Chief Clerk under the Excellency Chong Gao. In 165 he was appointed Administrator of Julu, to supervise Emperor Huan's brother Liu Kui, who had been charged with treason and demoted to a county fief there. Liu Kui later complained about him, and Qiao Xuan was recalled to the capital, initially as Court Architect, but then only as a Consultant. Indignant, he resigned his office.

In 167, as the north was troubled by raiding from the Xianbi, the Southern Xiongnu and Gaogouli [Koguryo], Qiao Xuan was appointed General on the Liao, with high insignia and wide authority. We are told he first ensured his troops were rested and fed, then attacked the enemy and drove them away. It appears he operated under the command of Zhang Huan, who held plenipotentiary powers across the whole of the north, but was chiefly concerned with the Xiongnu and the Qiang in the west: cf. sub voce.

At the beginning of the reign of Emperor Ling, Qiao Xuan was recalled to the capital as Intendant of Henan, then became Minister Steward and Minister Herald. In 170 he was appointed Excellency of Works, and for a few months in 171 he was Excellency over the Masses. Though he had earlier quarrelled with Chen Qiu, he now recommended his appointment as Minister of Justice. Discouraged by the weakness of the state and the problems of government, however, Qiao Xuan resigned on grounds of ill health and unfavourable omens.

A year or so later, Qiao Xuan became Director of the Secretariat. He urged the dismissal of the emperor's favourite He Sheng, who had embezzled vast sums when he was Administrator of Nanyang, but Emperor Ling promoted He Sheng from Palace Counsellor to Palace Attendant. Claiming illness once more, Qiao Xuan resigned his position and transferred to be a Household Counsellor. He served as Grand Commandant for a few months in 178-179, but again resigned for ill health and became a Palace Counsellor.

When Qiao Xuan's young son was kidnapped, he refused to pay a ransom, and as the criminals were captured the boy was killed. Qiao Xuan acknowledged his fault, but argued that paying only encouraged the criminals. There had been several such incidents at Luoyang, but Qiao Xuan's firm stand put a halt to them.

In 175, when Cao Cao was twenty and still unknown, Qiao Xuan recognised his potential, and told him that that when the empire fell into disorder he would be the man to restore peace. He also urged him to call upon Xu Shao, celebrated for his judgement of character, and Xu Shao produced the celebrated prophecy that he would be "a good servant in time of peace, a dangerous chieftain in time of trouble." So Cao Cao became well known, and he later paid respects to Qiao Xuan's tomb.

In 176, moreover, when a yellow dragon appeared at Qiao county in Pei, Qiao Xuan asked Dan Yang, a member of the Imperial Secretariat who was skilled in the interpretation of omens, for his opinion. Dan Yang replied that the territory was producing a ruler, and the dragon would appear again within fifty years. Cao Cao came from Qiao: forty-five years later, as Cao Cao's son Cao Pi succeeded him as King of Wei in 220, a yellow dragon was again reported from Pei, and later that year Cao Pi took the imperial title.

Despite his distinguished career, when Qiao Xuan died his household was poor and none of his sons had reached high office; he was admired for this. Cai Yong had written to praise him in 178, and composed six inscriptions in his honour, including one for his tablet in the family temple and one for a stele. -HHS 51/41: 1695-97*, 82/72B:2733, SGZ 1:2-3, 2:58, XC 2:15b, Cai 1:1 to 1:6; Ngo 76:14, DeWoskin 83:72-73, deC 89:119-121, 148, 151-154, 181, Bn 81:574 [on Cai Yong's inscriptions].

There is some confusion on the exact dates of Qiao Xuan's life and death. HHS 51/41 says that Qiao Xuan died in 183. Cai Yong says he died on 5 June 184, and this appears more circumstantial. Both agree that he was seventy-five sui.

In FSTY 9:75; Nylan 83:550-552, Ying Shao tells how in 165 Qiao Xuan was haunted by a strange light which appeared in his bedroom. Ying Shao advised him to consult the diviner Dong Yanxing, who told him that the sign was not harmful, and he would rise to high office; the prophecy came true.

Qiao Ya 橋雅; Jianwei. Member of a powerful local family, about 65 Qiao Ya received appointment from the Inspector of Yi province. -HYGZ 10A:136.

Qiao Ying 譙瑛/英; Ba. About 26 the pretender Gongsun Shu ordered that the well-known scholar Qiao Xuan either accept office in his regime or kill himself. The commandery Administrator entrusted with this ultimatum, however, showed sympathy, and Qiao Xuan's son Ying took the opportunity to kowtow and offered a ransom of a million cash. So the Administrator recommended clemency and Gongsun Shu pardoned Qiao Xuan.

Qiao Ying maintained his father's scholarship on the Book of Changes, and was an instructor to Emperor Ming. He later commanded a troop of palace guards and became a member of the Imperial Secretariat. -HHS 81/71:2668, HYGZ 12:217.

Qiao Yu 橋羽; Liang. Son of Qiao Xuan, Qiao Yu became Chancellor of Rencheng. -HHS 51/4A:1697.

Qiao Yuan 譙元 see Qiao Xuan 譙玄.

Qiao Yuan 橋元 see Qiao Xuan 橋玄.

Qiao Zai 橋載 [Yuanbin 元賓]; Liang. Son of Qiao

Xuan, Qiao Zai was a clerk under the Grand Tutor Chen Fan in 168, and was no doubt proscribed from office after Chen Fan was destroyed. After his death a stele was set up in his honour in 176. -SJZ 23:13b.

Qiao Zhi 橋稚; Jianwei. Member of a powerful local family, about 65 Qiao Zhi received appointment from the Inspector of Yi province. -HYGZ 10A:136.

Qiao Zhou 譙周 [Yunnan 允南] (199-270); Ba. Son of the scholar Qiao Qing, who died when he was young, Qiao Zhou lived in poverty with his mother and brothers, but became a devoted student of the classics and other texts, celebrated for his writing and his knowledge of astronomy. About 220 he became an Assistant Officer for Education 典學從事 in Yi province under Liu Bei, and after the abdication of Emperor Xian of Han he joined a petition which cited various works of divination and urged Liu Bei to claim the imperial title.

Highly respected as a scholar, Qiao Zhou held office in the suite of Liu Shan, Second Sovereign of Shu-Han and was awarded ministerial rank as a Household Counsellor. In 263 he advised Liu Shan to surrender to the forces of Wei, and was granted office and enfeoffment by the Sima family of Jin. He left a quantity of work on history, law and the classics, including studies on ancient times, on the history of the region of Shu and part of a history of Later Han; his – sometimes misleading – interpretations formed the basis for a number of Treatises in the Xu Han shu of Sima Biao. -SGZ Shu 12:1027-33*, XS:1b-2a; Fang 65:409, 436, MBeck 90:16-18, 27-32 et saepe.

Qiaosaiti 橋塞提 of Jumi [present-day Yutian]. King of Jumi about 50, Qiaosaiti was subordinate to the hegemon King Xian of Suoju [Yutian]. When Xian forced the surrender of King Yanliu of Dayuan [Ferghana] he appointed Qiaosaiti to rule that state.

The western state of Kangju [Sogdiana], however, made repeated attacks, and after a year Qiaosaiti abandoned his position. Xian restored him to Jumi and sent Yanliu back to his kingdom. -HHS 88/78:2925.

Qie 郗 [surname] see sub Que Jian 卻儉.

Qieyun 且運 see Juyun 且運.

Qili 齊黎 of Yutian [Khotan]. Qili was a younger brother of King Guangde of Yutian. In 86 Guangde attacked Suoju, where the ruler Bujuzheng had been protected by the now waning power of the Northern Xiongnu. He killed Bujuzheng and placed Qili on the throne in his stead.

In the following year Suoju was attacked and defeated by the Chinese agent Ban Chao, and then became subject to Han. -HHS 88/78:2926.

Qimu, Lord 綦母君; Langye. During the reign of Emperor Ling a certain "Lord Qimu" of Langye was a private scholar, expert in the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu. He is probably the same man as Qimu Kai 綦母闔 below. -SGZ 8:249, XC 5:1a.

Qimu Ban 綦母班 see Humu Ban 胡母班. -HHS 60/50B:2003 commentary.

Qimu Can 綦母參. Minister of Justice in 119, Qimu Can was among those who argued against a forward policy in central Asia. -HHS 47/37:1588.

Qimu [Guangming] 綦母廣明; Yingchuan. In FSTY 3:22, Ying Shao claims that Qimu Guangming was among those who approved the extended mourning popular during the latter part of the second century, involving men who were often most marginally connected to the deceased.

Qimu Jun 綦母俊; Kuaiji. A scholar of Zuo zhuan, Qimu Jun was nominated Filial and Incorrupt about 110 and became Inspector of Jiaozhi. -SGZ Wu 12:1325 & JJ at 15a.

Qimu Kai 綦母闔; Langye? About 200 Qimu Kai and Song Zhong were leaders among the group of scholars at the court of Liu Biao who produced a series of detailed commentaries on the five classics, Changes, History, Poetry, Ritual and Chunqiu. Their work was known as the "Later Edition" 後定. -SGZ 6:212, HHS 74/64B:2421. [Qimu Kai is probably the same man as Lord Qimu above.]

Qimu Shen 綦母參 see Qimu Can 綦母參.

Qin 秦, the Lady I; Nan. Daughter of Qin Feng, she was married to his ally Tian Rong. She died about 27. -HHS 13/3:537; Bn 59:28:156.

Qin 秦, the Lady II; Nan. Daughter of Qin Feng, she was married to Yan Cen. -HHS 13/3:537; Bn 59:155.

Qin 秦, the Lady III; Youfufeng. Descended from a distinguished official family, she entered the harem of Emperor Ming, received his favours and was appointed an Honoured Lady in 64. Her elder twin brother Qin Peng was admitted to the Palace School for Noble Families and then became captain of a gate at the capital. -HHS 76/66:2467.

Qin 秦, the Lady IV. A senior concubine of Cao Cao, she was the mother of Cao Xuan and Cao Jun 峻. -SGZ 20:579.

Qin 秦 [personal name unknown] (d.105); Guangyang.

In 105 a funerary column was set up for this man, who had been a clerk in the offices of You province. -Nagata 94:40.

Qin 秦 [personal name unknown]; Nan. A funerary stele was set up for this man about 175. He had been Administrator of Nanyang. -LS 27:8a.

LS 27:8a mentions a second stele in Nanyang itself. It may have been erected to honour this man's tenure of office.

Qin Asu 秦阿蘇 see Qin Lang 秦朗.

Qin Bao 秦褒; Youfufeng. Younger brother of Qin Peng and the Honoured Lady Qin, concubine of Emperor Ming, Qin Dun and his elder brother Bao both became colonels in the Northern Army. -HHS 76/66:2468.

Qin Dun 秦惇; Youfufeng. Younger brothers of Qin Peng and of the Honoured Lady Qin, concubine of Emperor Ming, Qin Dun and his brother Bao both became colonels in the Northern Army. -HHS 76/66:2468.

Qin Erjian 覃兒健 see Qinnijian 覃兒健.

Qin Feng 秦豐 (d.29); Nan. Having studied law at Chang'an, Qin Feng became a local officer in his home county, in the north of the commandery by present-day Xiangfan. As rebellion broke out against Wang Mang in 23, Qin Feng raised troops and occupied territory on either side of the Han River in Nan and in the southwest of Nanyang. Taking some counties formerly held by the Han forces of the Gengshi Emperor, he proclaimed himself King of Chuli 楚黎: the title was evidently based upon the name of the ancient state combined with that of Qin Feng's home district of Liqiu 黎丘. The warlord Tian Rong, who held territory in the south of Nan commandery along the Yangzi, made alliance with Qin Feng and married one of his daughters.

Some years passed without incident, but in 26 Emperor Guangwu's general Wu Han began the reconquest of Nanyang. He seized three counties held by Qin Feng, and when Qin Feng attempted a counter-attack he was defeated in Xinye. Soon afterwards Wu Han's subordinate Deng Feng rebelled and Wu Han himself was withdrawn, so Qin Feng obtained a breathing space, but in 27 Guangwu himself came to Nanyang and the greater part of the commandery was occupied by the imperial forces.

That summer, the condottiere Yan Cen, who had been driven from the territory about Chang'an, returned to his home territory of Nanyang. Defeated by the imperial general Geng Yan, he joined Qin Feng's officer Zhang Cheng, but their combined forces were then destroyed by Guangwu's general Zhu You. Zhang Cheng was killed, while Yan Cen fled to Qin Feng and married another of his daughters.

As the imperial forces began a full offensive against Qin Feng, he was swiftly driven from his territory in Nanyang. He held the line of the Han River, but after a few months Cen Peng lured him west by a trick, then crossed the river directly. Defeating Qin Feng's minimal force under Zhang Yang, he moved against his base at Liqiu. Qin Feng hurried back with his main army and attempted a surprise attack by night, but Cen Peng was ready for him and Qin Feng was heavily defeated.

Qin Feng took refuge in Liqiu and held out for eighteen months, even defying a call to surrender from Guangwu himself. By 29, however, after heavy casualties, he had barely a thousand men and their supplies were exhausted. In the summer, bringing his mother, wife and seven children with him, Qin Feng surrendered to Guangwu's general Zhu You. He was sent to Luoyang in a cage cart and then executed. -DGHJ 23:5a, HHS 17/7:656; Bn 59:26-28, 153-157.

Qin Gong 秦宮 (d.159). A senior slave, Qin Gong became the homosexual lover of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, who appointed him head of the Great Granary at Luoyang. As Liang Ji's wife Sun Shou also took him to her bed, Qin Gong acquired inordinate influence at court and in the government.

In 159, Liang Ji was concerned that the Consultant Bing Zun and the Lady Xuan, brother-in-law and mother of the Honoured Lady Deng, might interfere with his plans. He sent Qin Gong and a group of retainers, who killed Bing Zun and tried unsuccessfully to attack the Lady Xuan. We may assume Qin Gong died at the same time as Liang Ji, in the coup arranged soon afterwards by Emperor Huan. -HHS 34/24:1180-81, 102/12:3256.

Qin Hu 秦護. Though a man of humble family, Qin Hu would not accept gifts, and even in winter he wore only unlined clothing. His neighbours laughed at him for this. -XC 8:1a.

Qin Jia 秦嘉 [Shihui 士會]; Longxi. In the time of Emperor Huan, Qin Jia held office in his commandery and was sent as Reporting Officer to the capital. He was appointed a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates, but took ill and died in that office. He left a collection of writings, including several letters to his wife the Lady Xu Shu. -Yao Zhenzong:2425.

Qin Jian 禽堅 [Mengyou 孟由]; Shu. Qin Jian's father Xin was captured by non-Chinese tribespeople in Yuexi, then passed from one group to another until all trace of him was lost. At the time of his kidnapping, his mother was six months pregnant with Qin Jian, and after he was born she gave up hope for her former husband and married again.

When Qin Jian grew up and learned how his father had disappeared he resolved to find him. Hiring himself out as a labourer, he saved until he had acquired jade and pearls for a ransom. Then he searched the south-western frontier for over six years, defying illness and wild beasts, until he found his father. Qin Xin was overwhelmed, and his non-Chinese owners took pity upon the pair and let him go. Qin Jian escorted his father back to China, but he continued to care for his mother with proper courtesy.

Impressed by such a display of filial piety, the local authorities reported the matter to the capital, and the provincial government offered him appointment.

Qin Jian's conduct became a model: about 200 the Administrator Wang Sheng paid honours to his tomb and gave him posthumous nomination as Filial and Incorrupt; during Western Jin the county magistrate Li Bi 李苾 established a stele to Qin Jian, with ceremonies which were maintained for many years. -SGZ Shu 8:967, HYGZ 10A:136-37.

Qin Jie 秦頰 or Qin Xie [Chuqi 初起] (d.186); Nan. Having served as Commandant of Jiangxia, in 184 Qin Jie was appointed to replace Chu Gong, the Administrator of Nanyang who had been killed by Yellow Turbans led by Zhang Mancheng. Qin Jie defeated and killed Zhang Mancheng, but the rebels then occupied Wan city, capital of the commandery. The imperial general Zhu Jun now led Qin Jie and other local troops to besiege the city, and as the rebel leader Han Zhong attempted to flee he was captured and Qin Jie killed him.

After the rebels were destroyed Qin Jie remained in Nanyang, but in 186 he was killed in a mutiny led by Zhao Ci. A stele was erected at his tomb. -HHS 71/6A: 2309, 31/21A:1110, LS 17:6b-8a, SJZ 28:17a.

Qin Lang 秦狼; Kuaiji. About 205 Qin Lang and Lü He were leaders of a rebellion on the southeast coast. The trouble was put down by Sun Quan's general Jiang Qin, and both men were captured. -SGZ Wu 10:1286.

Qin Lang 秦朗 [Yuanming 元明; childhood name Asu 阿穌]; Yunzhong. Son of Qin Yilu, an officer of Lü Bu, Qin Lang and his mother the Lady Du were captured at the fall of Xiapi in 198. As Cao Cao took the Lady Du into his harem, Qin Lang went with her, and Cao Cao treated him as his own son.

Qin Lang became a general and a leading political figure under Cao Rui during the 230s. -SGZ 3:100, 9: 292.

Qin Mi 秦宓/密 [Zichi 子勅] (d.226); Guanghan. As a young man, Qin Mi was known for his scholarship. Disapproving of Zhanguo ce for its emphasis on selfishness and trickery rather than the honourable Confucian virtues, Qin Mi maintained himself as a recluse; he received invitations from both the commandery and provincial offices, but always pleaded illness and did not go. On the other hand, when Liu Yan became Governor in 189 Qin Mi presented an eloquent report in praise of his colleague Ren An. Liu Yan recommended Ren An for high office, but he too refused the invitation.

When the local official Wang Shang, a fellow-countryman of Qin Mi, established a stele in honour of the Former Han worthies Li Hong 李弘 and Zhuang Zun 莊遵, Qin Mi encouraged him to erect a similar memorial to Wen Weng 文翁, the Administrator of Shu who had sponsored scholarship in the west, and to the great composer Sima Xiangru 司馬相如.

In the time of Liu Yan's son and successor Liu Zhang, Wang Shang urged Qin Mi to accept some position and not to hide his light under a bushel, but Qin Mi replied with an eloquent letter to justify his withdrawal from the world of politics, even as he maintained a public position. He claimed that literary or scholarly ability was a fact of nature, quite consistent with high moral purpose, and did not necessarily indicate any desire for fame or glory.

As Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214, Xiahou Zuan the Administrator of Guanghan asked Qin Mi to join his staff as a scholarly adviser. Qin Mi claimed to be ill and took to his bed, so Xiahou Zuan brought other officers to call upon him and held a banquet by his bedside. When Xiahou Zuan expressed doubts about the quality of the men of Yi province, however, Qin Mi responded so firmly with praise of the region that Xiahou Zuan was embarrassed and asked him nothing more.

Qin Mi eventually accepted a position on Liu Bei's personal staff. As Liu Bei was planning his great attack down the Yangzi against Sun Quan in 221, Qin Mi argued that the times were unpropitious and that the campaign would not be successful. He was imprisoned for such defeatism, but was later released, no doubt when his prophecy proved correct.

In 224, in his capacity as Governor of Yi province Zhuge Liang brought Qin Mi onto his staff. When Zhang Wen came on embassy from Wu, Qin Mi challenged him in public debate for the honour of Shu-Han, and he composed an essay on the "legitimate succession" 正統 of Han. He was named a General of the Household, a colonel in the Northern Army, and later became Minister of Finance in the nominal imperial regime. -SGZ 8:971-76*, HYGZ 10B:151; Vervorn 90:226-227.

Qin Mu 秦牧 see Qinmu 秦牧.

Qin Nijian 覃兒健 see Qinnijian 覃兒健.

Qin Peng 秦彭 [Boping 伯平/Guoping 國平] (d.88); Youfufeng. Six generations of Qin Peng's ancestors had been senior officials, and they were known locally as the "Two-thousand shi family" 萬石秦氏. Qin Peng's twin sister entered the harem of Emperor Ming, received his favours and was appointed an Honoured Lady in 64. Through this relationship Qin Peng was admitted to the Palace School for Noble Families and became captain of a gate at the capital.

In 65 there was concern that the Northern and Southern Xiongnu might establish relations across the frontier. Wu Tang was therefore sent as General on the Liao to guard the line of the Yellow River at Wuyuan, while Qin Peng was appointed Commandant of Cavalry, to establish a camp at Meiji in Xihe, capital of the Southern Shanyu Chang, and keep watch on his activities.

In 72 Qin Peng was named assistant to Geng Bing for the campaign against the Northern Xiongnu which took place in the following year. Their column advanced some two hundred kilometres across desolate country, but the enemy retreated and they could not force a battle. Geng Bing planned a swift raid with light horsemen in an attempt to bring them to bay, but Qin Peng dissuaded him and they returned without making contact.

During that expedition, as Qin Peng was in charge of troops on detachment he killed a man for some offence. The commander-in-chief Dou Gu wanted to execute him for usurping authority, and a majority at court was in favour of punishment, but the clerical officer Guo Gong argued successfully that at the time of his alleged offence Qin Peng held a separate position and so was not subject to the rule that decisions of life and death lay with the supreme commander.

In 75 Qin Peng was named Administrator of Shanyang, and this inner commandery of the empire provided scope for his civil talents. Treating people with courtesy and unwilling to punish them, he sponsored Confucian virtues and education and maintained the ceremonies of sacrifice and archery each spring and autumn. Paying great attention to courtesies and procedures, he proclaimed rules to govern the conduct of fathers towards their sons, elder and younger brothers, and husbands with wives. He arranged that those who showed respect for good conduct and learning were appointed Thrice Venerable of their districts, and in the eighth month of each year he had wine and meat set out to Serve the Aged. If one of his officials committed a fault, he would dismiss him but apply no further penalty.

The people of the commandery loved him, and none offended the law. Encouraging the cultivation of rice, Qin Peng inspected each acre at critical times of the farming year, grading them in three categories by yield and maintaining records in each district so that corrupt officials had no opportunity to falsify the returns. He presented a memorial recommending the system, and an imperial letter urged its application to all parts of the empire.

After six years in Shanyang, in 82 Qin Peng was transferred to the great commandery of Yingchuan, where a variety of favourable omens were reported to celebrate his regime: phoenixes 鳳皇, a unicorn 麒麟, auspicious grain 嘉禾 and sweet dew 甘露. Emperor Zhang twice visited the commandery, giving rewards of cash and kind and showing grace and favour. Qin Peng remained in that post until his death in 88. He is classed by Fan Ye as a Benevolent Official 循吏. -HHS 76/66:2467-68*, 19/9:722-23.

Qin Qing 禽慶 [Zixia 子夏]; Beihai. A Confucian scholar, Qin Qing refused to serve Wang Mang. At the beginning of Later Han he joined his friend Xiang Chang on a pilgrimage to the five sacred mountains. They were not seen again. -HHS 83/73:2758-59.

Qin Run 秦閭. Assistant Officer of Yan province about 150, Qin Run and colleagues erected a stele in honour of the former Inspector Ban Mengjian. -SJZ 8:22a.

Qin Shao 秦召/邵 [Bonan 伯南]; Pei. A kinsman of Cao Cao, Qin Shao raised troops to join him in 190, and later gave his life to defend him. Cao Cao adopted his son Zhen 真 into the Cao lineage. -SGZ 9:281.

Qin Shang 秦尚 [Kongdu 孔都]; Youfufeng. A senior officer of his native county, in 185 Qin Shang contributed a thousand cash to a stele to honour the magistrate Cao Quan. -JSCB 18:3b-5a; Ebrely 80:342-344.

Qin Song 秦松 [Wenbiao 文表]; Guangling. During the late 190s Qin Song and his fellow-countrymen Zhang Hong and Chen Duan were advisers to Sun Ce. Evidently a man of conservative bent, Qin Song initially doubted whether Sun Quan would be able to maintain an independent state after the death of Sun Ce, but he nonetheless continued to serve.

As Cao Cao was advancing through Jing province in 208, Qin Song was among those who recommended Sun Quan to submit. He died soon after the victory at the Red Cliffs. -SGZ Wu 1:1104, 8:1247, 9:1261.

Qin Xie 秦頡 see Qin Jie 秦頡.

Qin Xin 禽信; Shu. A county magistrate in Yuexi, Qin Xin was kidnapped by non-Chinese people, then sold on from one tribe to another until all trace of him was lost. After many years his son Qin Jian, who had not been born at the time of his father's disappearance, traced him and brought him back. -HYGZ 10A:136-37.

Qin Yi 秦誼. In 192, under orders from Lü Bu at Chang'an, Qin Yi and a dozen others dressed as guards to ambush and kill Dong Zhuo. -HHS 72/62:2332. [Allowing for variant writing of the characters, this may be the same man as Qin Yi and Qin Yilu below.]

Qin Yi 秦翊. A commander under Yuan Shu, about 197 Qin Yi was persuaded by Liu Fu that he should transfer allegiance to Cao Cao. Qin Yi's decision surely reflects Yuan Shu's assumption of the imperial title, and Cao Cao at that time controlled the formal imperial government of Han. -SGZ 15:463. [Allowing for variant writing of the characters, this may be the same man as Qin Yi above and Qin Yilu below.]

Qin Yilu 秦宜祿 (d.199); Yunzhong. When Lü Bu was besieged in Xiapi by Cao Cao and Liu Bei in 198, he sent his officer Qin Yilu to seek aid from Zhang Yang and Yuan Shu. While he was on that embassy Xiapi fell, and Cao Cao took Qin Yilu's wife, the Lady Du, as his concubine; see also sub Qin Lang. Yuan Shu then arranged for Qin Yilu to marry a woman of the imperial Liu clan.

Despite the loss of his wife in such fashion, after the death of Yuan Shu in 199 Qin Yilu gave his allegiance to Cao Cao. He was appointed a county magistrate in Pei, but was killed by Zhang Fei soon afterwards. -SGZ 3:100, Shu 6:939. [Allowing for variant writing of the characters, this may be the same man as Qin Yi 秦誼 or Qin Yi 秦翊 above.]

Qin Yilu 秦宜祿, wives of: see above.

Qin Zhou 秦周 [Pingwang 平王]; Chenliu. Chancellor of Beihai, Qin Zhou was praised by the reformists and students of the University at Luoyang in the late 160s and numbered in their lists of worthy men. -HHS 67/57:2187-90.

Qing 慶 [surname] see also sub He 賀: the surname of the Qing family of Kuaiji was changed in 106 to avoid taboo on the personal name of the father of the new Emperor An.

Qing Chun 慶純 see He Chun 賀純.

Qing Fu 慶輔 see He Fu 賀輔.

Qing Hong 慶鴻; Henan. A local officer in his home city of Luoyang, Qing Hong was a close friend of Lian Fan, and people compared them to Guan Zhong 管仲 and Bao Shuya 鮑叔牙, celebrated comrades of the past. Qing Hong was later Administrator of Langye and of Kuaiji commanderies. -HHS 31/2A:1104.

Qing Niujue 青牛角 [Green Oxhorn]. When Yuan Shao destroyed the bandit groups of the Black Mountains in 193, one of his victims is mentioned with this sobriquet. A similar style had been held earlier by the chieftain Zhang Niujue [Oxhorn Zhang], who died in 185, so the reference to Green Oxhorn in 193 may be an anachronism. -HHS 71/6A:2310, SGZ 6:194, HHS 74/64A:2311.

Qingniu, Master 青牛先生 "Master Green Ox" [Zhengfang 正方]. A man from the east, Master Qingniu came to the region of Chang'an at the end of Han. Expert in astrology and divination by the wind, he left at the time of Cao Cao's invasion in 211, travelling to Hanzhong and then south into Yi province. -SGZ 11:365.

Qing Wu 慶吾 or Qing Yu. An officer of Liu Yong in 28, as Suiyang fell to the forces of Guangwu Qing Wu killed Liu Yong and surrendered. He was rewarded with enfeoffment. -HHS 12/2:495.

Qing [Zhongliao] 卿仲遼 (d.100). In 100 the governments of Dongping and Qinghe, either side of the Yellow River, reported that a certain Qing Zhongliao had criticised the court and had as many as a thousand followers. Thanks to Huang Xiang, Director of the Imperial Secretariat, the matter was dealt with leniently and the potential rebels were disbanded; one may assume that Qing Zhongliao himself was executed. -HHS 80/70A:2615.

Qingwuzi 青烏子 [Master Qingwu] was an excellent mathematician. -FSTY 5f:128.

Qingyang Jing 青陽精 became Commandant of the Capital for the kingdom of Donghai. -FSTY 5f:128.

Qingyang Yin 青陽愔 became Administrator of Donghai. -FSTY 5f:128.

Qinmu 秦牧 of Jumi [present-day Yutian]. A senior clerical officer of King Chengguo, in 151 Qinmu travelled to the rival state of Yutian [Khotan] and assassinated King Jian in the presence of the Chinese Chief Clerk Wang Jing. -HHS 88/78:2916

Qinnijian 覃兒徒 (d.80); non-Chinese. A tribesman of the hill county west of Wuling, in winter 78 Qinnijian rebelled, attacking and destroying three counties.

Early in the following year a force of five thousand men was raised from the commanderies of Jing province, together with released convicts from Yingchuan and Runan and four thousand auxiliaries from loyal local tribes. They attacked the rebels, and in the spring of 80 Qinnijian asked to surrender. This was refused, the campaign continued, and the rebels' submission was accepted only after Qinnijian had been killed in battle. -HHS 86/76:2832.

Qinzhiben 欽志賁 see Xinzhiben 歆志賁 -SGZ 30:833, 837.

Qiu 仇, the Lady. A concubine of Cao Pi, she bore his son Cao Lin 霖. -SGZ 20:590.

Qiu 仇 [personal name unknown]; Shang. Having served as a magistrate in two counties, in 162 he was appointed Administrator of Shuofang. He was later honoured with a stele by his local officers. -LS 21:12b-13b.

Qiu [Jizhi] 丘季智 [surname also as 邱 or 仇] see Qiu Lingju 丘靈舉.

Qiu Lan 仇覽 also as Qiu Xiang 香 [Jizhi 季智]; Chenliu. When Qiu Lan was young he studied at home and none of his neighbours knew about it. At the age of forty, however, the county appointed him to local office and he became a village headman. He encouraged the people in agriculture, so that there was a splendid supply of fruits and vegetables, chickens and pigs, and when the harvest was in he had the young people attend school. He also obliged vagabonds to work in the fields and maintained strict punishments according to the law, while he personally assisted with funeral rites and distributed alms to the poor. His reputation and influence spread widely, and he was particularly admired for the manner in which he reformed a certain Chen Yuan after his mother complained about his lack of filial conduct.

Impressed by his resolution of Chen Yuan's case without recourse to punishment, the magistrate Wang Huan appointed Qiu Lan to his senior staff and then arranged for him to attend the Imperial University at Luoyang, where he was taken up by his fellow-countryman Fu Rong and honoured by the great judge of character Guo Tai.

Returning to his home country, Qiu Lan refused offers of appointment from both the commandery and the provincial authorities on grounds of illness, and he continued to be noted for his strong sense of propriety and his personal self-control, even in private. If his wife or his children did something wrong, he took off his cap in self-reproach, and his family would wait outside until he put it back on as a sign that their show of contrition was accepted. All his three sons became talented scholars and historians.

Qiu Lan was later recommended as Sincere and Upright, but he became ill and died. He is classed by Fan Ye as a Benevolent Official 循吏. -HHS 76/66:2479-81*, XC 5:4b-5a; Ch'ü 72:308-309 [transcribed as Chou Lan].

Qiu Lingju 丘靈舉 [Jizhi 季智]; Yunzhong. A student at the Imperial University, Qiu Lingju was sponsored by Guo Tai, and became well-known and respected. -HHS 68/58:2231, XC 4:9b [which has the surname as 仇] and 10b [which writes it as 邱].

Qiu Shen 仇審 [Kongxin 孔信]; Wudu. A local officer of the commandery, about 170 Qiu Shen was involved in the road construction projects of the Administrator Li Yu; in 172 he joined in sponsoring a stele to commemorate the work. -LS 4:9b & 12b.

Qiu Sheng 丘騰 (d.144). In 144 Qiu Sheng was Administrator of Jiujiang when a major rebellion led by Fan Rong and Zhou Sheng broke out. Qiu Sheng was found to have governed badly, was sent to prison and died there. -HHS 6:275.

Qiu Xi 鄒熙 see Chu Xi.

Qiu Xuan 仇玄; Chenliu. Son of Qiu Lan, Qiu Xuan was a talented scholar and historian and became well known. -HHS 76/66:2481.

Qiu Zhen 丘禎. About 170 Qiu Zhen was a county magistrate in Yingchuan when the scholar Xu Jing, member of a leading local family, died. Qiu Zhen granted him posthumous title as Master of Profound Conduct 玄行先生 [cf. also sub Wang Huai]. -HHS 62/52:2050 citing the Gaoshi zhuan of Huangfu Mi.

Qiu [Zifang] 求欠方; Shu. About 160 Qiu Zifang was one of a group of local scholars associated with Liu Zong. When Liu Zong held senior office in his commandery and the province, he arranged for Qiu Zifang and three of his colleagues to receive appointment in the imperial bureaucracy. Nothing is known of Qiu Zifang's further career. -HYGZ 10A:134-35.

Qiu Zong 糗宗 was a county magistrate in Jiaozhi. -FSTY 6f:145.

Qiuliju 丘力居; Wuhuan. A chieftain in Liaoxi in the late 160s, with command of five thousand tribal groups, Qiuliju took title as a king.

In 187 Qiuliju joined the rebellion of Zhang Chun. They raised all the Wuhuan on the frontier and sent raiding parties across the frontier region and the northern plain. In the following year they were defeated by Gongsun Zan, and Zhang Chun was assassinated, but Qiuliju regrouped his forces and besieged Gongsun Zan, causing him heavy losses. He continued to be recognised as the senior chieftain of the Wuhuan, and he maintained raiding across the north.

In 190 Qiuliju was persuaded to surrender by the Governor Liu Yu. He died soon afterwards. -HHS 90/80:2984, SGZ 30:834; deC 84:396-401.

Qiulun 丘倫; Xianbi. In 109 Qiulun brought warriors to join the Wuhuan chieftain Wuhe in an attack on Wuyuan. They defeated the commandery forces, but in the following year they were defeated in turn by a major Chinese army under He Xi. Wuhe surrendered and Qiulun withdrew across the frontier. -HHS 90/80:2983; deC 84:390.

Qiwu 綦母 [surname] see Qimu 綦母 passim.

Qizhijian 其至鞬; Xianbi. In 120 Qizhijian came with his colleague Wulun and offered their submission to Deng Zun the General on the Liao. Both were granted gifts, Wulun was named a king, and Qizhijian received title as a marquis. Within a few months, however, Deng Zun had been dismissed by Emperor An, and Qizhijian embarked on a series of raids which made him the first great war-leader of his people.

In the autumn of 121 Qizhijian attacked Juyong in Guangyang, by the present-day pass of Bada Ling on the Great Wall north of Beijing. Cheng Yan the Administrator of Yunzhong led commandery troops against him, but was defeated and killed, and the Xianbi then besieged Xu Chang the Protector of the Qiang in Dai commandery. Geng Kui the General on the Liao and Pang Can the Inspector of You province came to the relief. The siege was broken, but the Xianbi thereafter made increasingly successful raids, killed numbers of Chinese officials, and began to assemble war parties with tens of thousands of mounted archers.

In the winter of 122 a raid into Yanmen and Dingxiang struck as far south as Taiyuan, and one year later Qizhijian defeated the Southern Xiongnu in Wuyuan, killing a king and over a thousand men. A further attack into Dai commandery in the autumn of 124 again defeated the Xiongnu and killed another of their kings.

In the autumn of 126 Qizhijian attacked Dai commandery and another Administrator died in battle. The Han now strengthened its border defence forces, bringing the training camp at Liyang forward from Wei commandery into Zhongshan to serve as a mobile reserve [it evidently later reverted to Wei commandery], and increasing the militia and guard posts in You province while arranging specialist training for cross-bowmen. In 127 the Chinese began a series of punitive expeditions, sending Southern Xiongnu and Wuhuan troops out from the frontier. The raids continued, but they were now answered with force and some success, and the Protector Geng Kui played a leading role.

After more than twelve years of this border warfare, Qizhijian died about 133, and a measure of peace was restored. Soon afterwards there were problems with the Qiang and the Xiongnu, but the next major attacks by from the Xianbi came under the leadership of Tanshihuai in the late 150s. -HHS 90/80:2987; deC 84:299-305.

Qizhongliu 齊鍾留; non-Chinese. During the early 30s the Di people of the northwest had been loosely allied to Wei Ao and Gongsun Shu, but after the death of Wei Ao in 33 they transferred allegiance to Han and were awarded seals and insignia.

About 34 Wei Ao's kinsman Wei Mao raised a rebellion in Wudu and killed the Han Administrator. Qizhongliu, a senior chieftain of the Di, influenced his fellows to remain true to the Han, and they joined the Commandery Assistant Kong Fan to attack and destroy Wei Mao. -HHS 86/76:2859-60; Bn 59:180.

Qu 區 [surname] see Ou 區 passim.

Qu [Boyan] 屈伯彥; Henan. A noted scholar of the Chunqiu, about 150 he was the teacher of Guo Tai. -HHS 68/58:2225.

Qu Chong 屈充 also as Fang Chong 房充. In 29 Qu Chong was a lieutenant-general under the imperial commander of the south, Cen Peng. Having driven Tian Rong the warlord of Nan commandery away to refuge with Gongsun Shu, Cen Peng established himself on the middle Yangzi and sent letters to the administrators of the southern commanderies of Jing province. He also sent Qu Chong with a formal call to arms. The administrators duly swore allegiance and sent tribute to Han. -HHS 17/7:659; Bn 59:157.

Qu Gong 瞿恭 (d.200); Runan. A local bandit, he and his group were destroyed by Li Tong, who sent his head to Cao Cao. -SGZ 18:535.

Qu Lan 巨覽 see Ju Lan 巨覽.

Qu Mao 瞿茂. FSTY 16f:147 says that Qu Mao became Administrator of Han'an commandery. That territory was established in 189, but lasted only for a short period.

Qu Mou 瞿茂 see Qu Mao 瞿茂.

Qu Mu 渠穆 (d.189). A eunuch, in 189 Qu Mu was an officer of the palace workshops 尚方. On 22 September he joined the group which waylaid the General-in-Chief He Jin. It was Qu Mu who cut off He Jin's head, and he was surely killed in the massacre which followed. -HHS 69/59:2251.

Qu Sheng 鞠勝; Jincheng. At the time of the Liang province rebellion in the 180s, Qu Sheng killed the magistrate Liu Jun in Wuwei. In revenge, the county officer Zhang Xiu killed Qu Sheng. -SGZ 8:262.

Qu Shengqing 鞠聖卿; Henan. A magician, Qu Shengqing had the ability to prepare spells written in cinnabar 丹 which gave power over the spirits. -HHS 82/72B:2759; Ngo 76:140, DeWoskin 83:87.

Qu Yan 鞠演; Xiping/Jincheng. A local leader in the Xining valley, the western part of Jincheng, in 215 Qu Yan, Jiang Shi and others sent Han Sui's head to Cao Cao as a sign of submission. It is not certain whether they killed him, or simply took advantage of his death from old age. See also sub Han Sui, where other accounts are cited.

While paying nominal allegiance, Qu Yan maintained an effective independence until 220, when Zou

Qi was sent as Inspector of the newly restored Liang 涼 province. Qu Yan and the other leaders refused to receive him, but the general Su Ze attacked, captured Qu Yan and executed him. -SGZ 1:45, 16:491-92.

Qu Yi 鞠義. An officer under Han Fu in 191, Qu Yi rebelled and helped Yuan Shao take over Ji province. Later that year he defeated the Xiongnu Yufuluo south of Ye city and drove him away.

In 192 Qu Yi commanded a small advance guard which faced and defeated Gongsun Zan at Jie Bridge, and in 195 he led a force to destroy Gongsun Zan's power in the northeast.

Relying upon these achievements, Qu Yi became insubordinate and Yuan Shao then killed him and took over his troops. -HHS 74/64A:2377-82, SGZ 8:243; deC 96:89.

Qu Yu 屈豫; Kuaiji. An Assistant Officer of Yang province in 195, Qu Yu received the refugee scholar Huan Ye/Yan, who foretold dangers when oranges fell from a tree in his courtyard. -HHS 37/27:1260, XC 2: 2a.

Qu Yu 曲庾; Ba. Registrar of the commandery, Qu Yu was celebrated for his loyalty. -HYGZ 12:220.

Qu Zheng 蘧政 (d.139?). In 139 Qu Zheng was a eunuch Regular Attendant. Concerned at the growing power of the Liang family, he joined Zhang Kui and others in claiming that the father of the empress Liang Shang, together with their rival eunuchs Cao Teng and Meng Ben, planned to bring princes of the imperial house to the capital and choose a replacement for the emperor. Though Emperor Shun doubted the story, Qu Zheng and his associates issued unauthorised instructions that Cao Teng and Meng Ben should be arrested and held within the palace.

The emperor was furious. He ordered the eunuch Li Xi to release the prisoners and arrest the conspirators. They all died in prison. -HHS 6:268, 43/24:1176, 101/1A:3245 [which last, however, says that some of the accused committed suicide, while others were able to escape].

Quan Cheng 圈稱 see Juan Cheng 圈稱.

Quan Cong 全琮 see Quan Zong 全琮.

Quan Rou 全柔; Wu. A man of local family, during the 180s Quan Rou was recommended Filial and Incorrupt and held a junior post in the Imperial Secretariat. As Dong Zhuo took power Quan Rou returned home, where he held appointment at provincial headquarters and was then Commandant of the east of Kuaiji. During a time of famine he did some trading in grain.

When Sun Ce arrived in 197, Quan Rou joined him and was made Commandant of Danyang. He was later Chief Clerk to Sun Quan and then Administrator of Guiyang. -SGZ Wu 15:1381.

Quan Zong 全綜 [Ziheng 子璜] (d.247); Wu. Son of Quan Rou, as a young man Quan Zong became known for his patronage of refugees from the north, providing them with food and shelter and gathering their support. Appointed a colonel by Sun Quan to attack the people of the hills, he recruited a considerable force and was promoted lieutenant-general.

In 219, as Guan Yu was striking against the Wei north up the Han towards Xiangyang, Quan Zong urged Sun Quan to take him from behind. Such a plan had in fact already been made, and it was carried out by Lü Meng. Quan Zong therefore received no immediate reply to his proposal, but at the victory feast afterwards Sun Quan acknowledged his advice and rewarded him with enfeoffment.

Taking a leading part in the defence of the lower Yangzi against Cao Pi in 222, Quan Zong was made a full general, and in 225 he was named Administrator of Jiujiang. In 228 he was appointed to the temporary commandery of Dong'an, and colonised the hills people about the Zhe River and Huang Shan.

As Sun Quan took the imperial title in 229 Quan Zong was named General of the Guards and Governor of Xu province, and was given the emperor's eldest daughter, the Lady Sun Luban 魯班, as his wife. He held high military command with varying success, while his influence and that of his family at court was not always beneficial. -SGZ Wu 15:1381-83*; Mather 76:518.

Qubei 去卑 see Qubi 去卑.

Qubi 去卑; Xiongnu. In 195, when Huchuquan, younger son of the late Southern Shanyu Qiangqu, took the nominal title after the death of his brother Yufuluo, Qubi was Worthy King of the Right and held a dominant role in the exile regime. At the end of the year, as Emperor Xian came east on his flight from Chang'an, Qubi led a force of Xiongnu to assist him. With Han Xian and other leaders of the Bobo bandit group they assisted the imperial troops to defeat Liu Jue and Guo Si in Hongnong, and though they were badly beaten in a subsequent encounter the emperor was able to escape over the Yellow River into Hedong. As Cao Cao took Emperor Xian under his control in Xu city, Qubi returned to the shadow court at Pingyang, on the Fen River in northern Hedong.

In 216 Huchuquan went to Cao Cao's city of Ye, where he was held as an honoured prisoner; when he died no Shanyu was named to succeed him. At the same time Cao Cao divided the remnant Xiongnu state into five regions under the overall supervision of Qubi, based at Pingyang. His territory, however, was now restricted largely to the valley of the Fen, with a nominal Northern Region 北部 extending over the old Bing province of Han, now effectively abandoned. -HHS 89/79:2965, 72/62:2340, SGZ 1:47; deC 84:349-354.

XTS 75B:3437 says that Qubi was descended from a captured Chinese general, but the story is doubtful: see sub Liu Jinbo.

Que Jian 卻儉 (d.188); Henan. A favourite of Emperor Ling, in 178 Que Jian was cited in a memorial by the Confucianist Yang Ci as a man who had received favour well above his true quality.

In 188 Que Jian was Inspector of Yi Province, where his excessive demands for taxes and service caused unrest. When news of this reached the court, Emperor Ling sent the minister Liu Yan to take over as Governor of the province and ordered Que Jian back to the capital for punishment. Before Liu Yan arrived, an army of rebels led by Ma Xiang and Zhao Zhi captured the provincial headquarters at Luo city in Guanghan and killed Que Jian. -HHS 54/44:1780:75/65:2431-32, SGZ Shu 1:865-66, HYGZ 5:70, 10A:170; deC 89:146, 205-206.

The form of the surname of this man appears variously also in the texts as 卻 Xi, 郟 Qie, or 郟 Xi/Chi, but the biography of his grandson Que Zheng in SGZ Shu 12:1033 confirms the reading 卻 Que. There is some confusion also with the third-century magician known as Xi Jian 郟儉, probably the same man as Hao Mengjie 郝孟節 q.v.

Que Yi 卻揖 [on other forms of the surname see sub Que Jian above]; Henan. Son of Que Jian, he accompanied his father into Yi province, and stayed there even after his death, as it appeared safer than the rest of the empire.

As camp commandant to Meng Da, general of Liu Bei, Que Yi accompanied him when he surrendered to Cao Pi in 220. He was appointed to senior clerical office, but died soon afterwards.

Que Yi's son Zuan 纂 remained in Shu-Han, changing his personal name to Zheng 正 on his father's death. He became a high-ranking scholar-official. - SGZ Shu 12:1034.

Que Xu 闕栩 became Inspector of Jing province. - FSTY 6f:147.

Que Xuan 闕宣 (d.193); Xiapi. In the early 190s Que Xuan commanded a local army in Xu province, probably with the tolerance of Governor Tao Qian, who permitted him to raid neighbouring Yan. In 193, however, under the inspiration of a prophecy, Que Xuan took the imperial title. Tao Qian then killed him and took over his troops. -HHS 9:374, 73/63:2367 [where the surname appears as Yan 閻], SGZ 1:10, 8:248; deC 96:117.

Queji 闕機; Xianbi. A commander in the eastern region under Tanshihuai in the 170s, Queji was later independent beyond the frontier. In 205 Yan Rou persuaded him to turn to Cao Cao; he established tribute and trading relations and was enfeoffed as a king. -SGZ 30:838-40.

Queju 闕居; Xianbi. Possibly a kinsman of Queji above, Queju was a commander in the central region under Tanshihuai in the 170s. -SGZ 30:838.

Quhou Yu 屈侯豫 was a gentleman cadet, possibly under Former Han. -FSTY 5f:126.

Quyan 去延; Wuhuan. In 132 the Protector Geng Ye sent Quyan under the command of Rongzhuhui on a raiding party against the Xianbi. They were successful, returning with many heads; Quyan and others were granted titles by the Han court. -SGZ 30:833; deC 84:391.

R

Ran Wen 然溫; Ba. Ran Wen served as General on the Liao and as Administrator of Guiyang. -HYGZ 12:219.

Rao Bin 饒斌 became Administrator of Yuyang. - FSTY 6f:149.

Rao Zhu 饒助; Wu. About 212 a no-man's land was developing along the Yangzi between armies of Cao Cao and the southern warlord Sun Quan. Sun Yu the Administrator of Danyang sent his officers Rao Zhu and Yan Lian to act as magistrates of counties in Lujiang, just north of the Yangzi, and they attracted many people from the territory that Cao Cao controlled. -SGZ Wu 6:1206.

Raolong Zong 擾龍宗. A member of the Imperial Censorate in the early 190s, Raolong Zong went to make a report to the warlord Chancellor Dong Zhuo, but failed to take off his sword. Dong Zhuo killed him. -SGZ 7:175.

Ren ren, the Lady I; Beidi. The wife of Feng Yan 馮衍, she was impatient and excitable, treated the women of the household badly and obliged her son and daughter to do the work. Eventually Feng Yan sent her away.

Angered by this, the Lady attempted to kill their son Feng Bao. He escaped, however, and made no accusation against her, claiming only that she was ill. He was surely correct. -HHS 28/18B:1002-04.

Ren ren, the Lady II; Pei. A woman of good family, the Lady was known for her beauty. She became a concubine of Cao Pi when he was young, but after he had taken the Lady Zhen in 204, he found her aggressive and irritating. Though the Lady Zhen pleaded for her, he sent the Lady Ren away. -SGZ 5:160; C/C 99.98.

Ren ren 仁 of Yutian [Khotan]. Younger brother of the new King Guangde, in 60 Ren was named a marquis and sent with an army against the former hegemon King Xian of Suoju [Yarkand]. Xian claimed kinship with him, and obtained a short-lived truce. -HHS 88/78:2925.

Ren An 任安 [Dingzu 定祖] (148-219); Guanghan. As a young man Ren An attended the University at Luoyang, where he and his fellow-countryman Dong Fu acquired a considerable reputation. They studied divination and the apocrypha under Yan Hou/Xu, and Ren An specialised in the Meng interpretation of the Book of Changes.

After they returned home the two men maintained private academies which attracted students from near and far. Ren An was invited to join the staff of his commandery and of the province, he was nominated as a candidate by both offices, and the Governor Liu Yan sent a memorial describing him as worthy of the highest rank. A carriage was sent to bring Ren An to the capital, but he would not accept. He died without holding office, and his students erected a stele in his honour.

Later, Zhuge Liang asked Qin Mi of Guanghan to compare Ren An and Dong Fu. Qin Mi replied that while Dong Fu would praise anything good but criticise the smallest fault, Ren An considered men's best qualities and ignored their faults. -HHS 79/69A:2551*, HYGZ 10B:147, SGZ Shu 8:972.

Ren An 任安, mother of: see the Lady Yao 姚.

Ren [Boyang] 任伯陽; Nanyang. A former Administrator of Shangdang, in 156 Ren Boyang was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16a.

Ren Chong 任崇. As a General of the Household in 172, Ren Chong was sent with authority to award posthumous honours as Grand Tutor and insignia as a marquis to the late official Hu Guang. -Cai 4:1.

Ren Chuo 任遼 or Ren Zhuo. In 115 there was a rebellion amongst the non-Chinese tribes of Cangwu, and in the following year the insurgents induced several thousand non-Chinese and Han people from the neighbouring commanderies of Yulin and Hepu to join them. The regent Dowager Deng sent the Imperial Clerk Ren Chuo to attack them, but also provided him with an edict of amnesty. The rebels agreed to submit. -HHS 5:225, 86/76:2837.

Ren Fan 任藩. A senior member of Cao Cao's personal staff, in 213 Ren Fan was one of the petitioners who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. -SGZ 1:40.

Ren Fang 任方. When Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun, was appointed as Heir in 120, members of his suite wore caps with two bridges 梁 [loops from front to back], which had traditionally been the privilege of senior officials. As an Imperial Clerk, officer of the Censorate, Ren Fang objected to this breach of protocol and urged that the new style should be used only in the presence of the emperor. Chen Zhong of the Secretariat, however, spoke against such a restriction, and Emperor An accepted the change. -HHS 120/30:2670; MBeck 90:259. [It is most unlikely that this is the attempted assassin described below.]

Ren Fang 任防; Henan. A local officer responsible for water control, in 135 Ren Fang was involved in the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang; see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16:14b. [It is unlikely this is the same man as in the entry above, but possible that he is the official described as Wang Fang 王防 q.v.]

Ren Fang 任防 [Wenshi 文始] see Wang Fang 王防, but also Ren Fang of Henan above.

Ren Fang 任方. In 160 Shan Kuang the Administrator of Jiyin was under investigation from Wei Yu the Assistant Officer of Yan province. He sent Ren Fang to kill Wei Yu. Wei Yi arrested Ren Fang and sent him to the capital, but he was able to dig a tunnel and make his escape. -HHS 41/31A:1404, 54/44:1771. [It is most unlikely this is the Imperial Clerk described above.]

Ren Fang 任昉/方 [Wenshi 文始]; Shu. Son of Ren Xun, Ren Fang became a magistrate in Nanyang. He brought many criminals to order there, and was promoted to be Chancellor of Liang. During the 150s Ren Fang was Director of the Secretariat, but the General-in-Chief Liang Ji was concerned that he was too honest. He had Ren Fang sent out to Wei commandery and then to Pingyuan; in each place his government was prosperous.

After the fall of the Liang in 159 Ren Fang returned as Director of the Secretariat, and he was later Director of Retainers and Minister of Finance. He died in that last office. -HYGZ 10A:134. HYGZ 11:136 refers to a Minister of Finance in Later Han named Ren Fang 方; surely the same man.

Ren Fu 任福. A colonel in the Northern Army with enfeoffment as a secondary marquis, in 220 Ren Fu was one of the sponsors of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. In 225 he was sent to put down a mutiny in Xu province. -SGZ 2:85, LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197, Fang 52:185.

Ren Gu 任覿 or Ren Jia [Chaoguang 昭光]; Le'an. A favoured student of Zheng Xuan, Ren Gu became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates at the court of Wei. -HHS 35/25:1212.

Ren Guang 任光 [Boqing 伯卿] (d.29); Nanyang. An enthusiast for the doctrines of Huang-Lao, as a young man Ren Guang became known for his loyalty and generosity. He was admired by the local people, became head of the district and then a junior officer in Wan, chief county of the commandery. As the rebel armies of Han captured Wan city in 23, one of the soldiers saw Ren Guang's fine costume. He forced him to strip and was going to kill him and take his clothing, but at that moment Liu Ci, Minister of the Household to the Gengshi Emperor, came upon the scene. Admiring Ren Guang's courageous bearing, he saved his life.

Ren Guang then brought his followers to Liu Ci and became his client. First appointed as an adjutant responsible for discipline, then a lieutenant-general, he served under Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. [It is said that he took part in the defeat of Wang Xun and Wang Yi, but since that battle took place at Kunyang in Yingchuan just three days after the fall of Wan, that does not seem possible.] When the Gengshi Emperor established his government at Luoyang Ren Guang was named Administrator of Xindu.

In the winter at the end of 23, as the pretender Wang Lang took the imperial title at Handan, the greater part of the region accepted his claim but Ren Guang refused to do so. He persuaded his officers and the people to hold the city of Xindu for Han, and when an officer of Wang Lang came with a summons, Ren Guang had him executed in the market-place.

Liu Xiu, at that time commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor, had been trapped in the north by Wang Lang's initial success, but in the spring of 24 he made his way south with a few companions and was welcomed by Ren Guang and his officers. They collected a force of some four thousand trained men, reinforced by two contingents of cavalry brought by Pi Tong, but Liu Xiu was uncertain whether he should face Wang Lang, retire to Chang'an, or even join the bandit leaders Yuan Zeng and Li Zidu.

Pi Tong argued the importance of holding the north for Han, however, while Ren Guang suggested that further troops could be raised from neighbouring cities, particularly if they were threatened with sack. So Liu Xiu resolved to take the offensive. He appointed Ren Guang Chief General on the Left, enfeoffed him as a marquis of title and sent him to raise troops.

Claiming support from Yuan Zeng and Li Zidu, Ren Guang acquired a substantial number of men in Julu, and joined the attack on the capital of that commandery, held by Wang Lang's troops. In riposte, Wang Lang sent a detachment which captured Xindu by treachery, and as Ren Guang was sent back to retrieve the situation, his troops deserted and went over to the enemy. He returned empty-handed, but reinforcements from Chang'an, led by the Gengshi Emperor's general Xie Gong, attacked and recaptured Xindu city.

By summer Wang Lang's capital had fallen, Wang Lang was dead, and Ren Guang returned as Administrator to Xindu. His loyal support had been of critical importance to Liu Xiu, and the victory against Wang Lang prepared the ground for his claim to the restored empire of Han. Later in 24 Ren Guang received a substantive marquisate, with a county fief in Zhuo commandery and revenue from 10,000 households. In 29 he was called to the capital and granted the title Servant at Court, excusing him from the requirement to reside at his fief. He died in the winter of that year.

Recognising Ren Guang as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 21/11:751-52*, 22/12:789-91; Bn 76:26, Bn 79:83.

Ren Guang 任光; Kuaiji. Formerly Registrar of the commandery, in the early 190s Ren Guang was listed by Yu Fan among those who had risked their lives in battle to protect their Administrator. -SGZ Wu 12: 1325.

Ren Gui 任貴 (d.43); Yuexi. A non-Chinese chieftain, Ren Gui was appointed as a local military officer by Mei Gen, Administrator of Yuexi for Wang Mang. In 24, after the fall of Wang Mang in the previous year, Ren Gui led his people to kill Mei Gen and take over the commandery. He styled himself King of Qionggou 邛穀, with his capital at Qionggou 邛都, present-day Xichang in Sichuan.

In 25 Ren Gui recognised the authority of Gongsun Shu, who had taken a royal title in Shu. In 35, as the Han army commanded by Cen Peng moved up the Yangzi and the Min River towards Chengdu, Ren Gui offered his submission. The local alliance, and security on the southern flank of the attack, was valuable and, although it formally broke the principle of Emperor Gao, that only members of the Liu clan should be made kings, Guangwu confirmed Ren Gui in his royal title.

In 38 Ren Gui was persuaded to send in a three-year report like a regular official, received insignia as Administrator of Yuexi and ceased to be recognised as a king. Formally, while he still governed the territory, he could now be dismissed or transferred like any Chinese.

In 43 the imperial general Liu Shang came south from Chengdu on his way to settle a rebellion in Yizhou commandery. It is said Ren Gui was afraid his position would be affected by this real expansion of imperial power, so he conspired with other local chieftains to offer poisoned wine to the Han troops, then attack the survivors. This may be no more than an accusation to justify what followed, for Liu Shang made a surprise attack on Ren Gui at Qionggou city, executed him and sent his family and household to Chengdu. -HS 95: 3846, HHS 86/76:2853, 13/3:536, HYGZ 3,42; Bn 59: 60, 107, 193, Bn 67:61-67.

HHS 86/76 refers to this man as Zhang or Chang Gui 長貴, the former pronunciation indicating a chief or headman.

HS 96:3846 says that Ren Gui was executed after the fall of Wang Mang, but this seems unduly summary. HYGZ 3:42 refers to Ren Gui as Administrator of Tianshui under Wang Mang, but this appears most unlikely. -QHX:459.

Ren Hui 任恢; Ba. Younger brother of Ren Man, about 30 Ren Hui was Grand Commandant in the claimant imperial government of Gongsun Shu. -HYGZ 5:68.

Ren Jia 任嘉; Shu. When Ren Jia was a child his father Ren Sheng travelled to study in Hanzhong. There were troubled times, however, and bandits blocked the roads, so he was unable to return. He migrated instead to Changsha, where he became a commandery officer.

For his part, Ren Jia received commissioned office and was made Administrator of Changsha. His mother went with him, and when she saw Ren Sheng she recognised him and arranged the reunion of father and son. -FSTY 3f:104.

Ren Jia 任嘉; Shu. Appointed as Administrator of Changsha, Ren Jia found that his long-lost father Ren Teng was a local officer of the commandery. -FSTY 3f:104.

Ren Jia 任嘉. During the time of Emperor Shun, Ren Jia was a county magistrate in Runan. Though corrupt and extortionate, he was favourably recommended by several senior officials and became Administrator of Wuwei. When he was later impeached and sent to prison, the Palace Attendant Yang Lun attempted to have the men who had supported him in the past held responsible for their bad judgement. -HHS 79/69A: 2564.

Ren Jia 任赧 see Ren Gu 任赧.

Ren Jun 任峻 [Shugao 叔高]; Bohai. About 140 Ren Jun was transferred from a county magistracy in Beihai to be Prefect of Luoyang. Using the best qualities of his local officers, he governed so effectively that wrong-doers abandoned the territory and in a whole year there were only a few dozen executions – one may contemplate the numbers involved in normal times and in other jurisdictions. Though not so cultured, his administration was compared to that of his great predecessor Wang Huan.

Ren Jun later became Administrator of Taishan. -HHS 76/66:2470.

Ren Jun 任顛 (d.142). In 142 Ren Jun was a county magistrate in Zuopingyi when rebel Qiang raided the region about Chang'an. Ren Jun attacked them, but was killed. -HHS 87/77:2896.

Ren Jun 任峻 [Boda 伯達] (d.204); Henan. In 190, as armies gathered from the east of the empire to attack Dong Zhuo in Luoyang, Ren Jun's home county of Zhongmou, in the east of Henan, was on the main line of their natural advance. Frightened at the prospect, the magistrate Yang Yuan planned to abandon his office and flee, but Ren Jun persuaded him to take control of the neighbouring countries and raise troops. Yang Yuan therefore appointed Ren Jun as his Registrar and Ren Jun proclaimed Yang Yuan as Acting Intendant of Henan.

Soon afterwards, as Cao Cao came on a sortie from the east, there was uncertainty as to how he should be received, but Ren Jun and his associate Zhang Fen arranged for the territory to accede to him, and Ren Jun brought several hundred of his own kinsmen and followers to join him. Cao Cao was then defeated at Rongyang, further to the west, and was obliged to retreat. He was nonetheless grateful for Ren Jun's support, appointed him as a Commandant of Cavalry, and had him take one of his cousins to wife. Yang Yuan and Zhang Fen are not heard of again.

When Cao Cao went on campaign Ren Jun would remain at base to organise the supply of the army. As there was constant shortage of food, about 196 the General of the Household Zao Zhi proposed the establishment of agricultural colonies in the region of Cao Cao's capital at Xu city, and this was done. Zao Zhi was appointed Commandant of the Colonies and Ren Jun became Commissioner for Agriculture, evidently with broader, supervisory authority. The experiment was successful, so that Cao Cao was able to rely upon regular supplies and stock-piles of grain. The program was later extended in several areas under Cao Cao's control, and notably on the frontier against Sun Quan along the Huai after 200 [see sub Liu Fu].

During the fighting against Yuan Shao about Guandu in 199 and 200, Ren Jun was responsible for the transport of supplies. The enemy sent raids against the approach roads, but Ren Jun established a system of convoys over several different routes, each guarded by camps and pickets. The raiding parties could not get close, and the provision of supplies was a decisive factor in Cao Cao's victory.

Ren Jun was rewarded with enfeoffment and was appointed Colonel of the Chang River Regiment, formerly a position in the Northern Army but now effectively an honorary post. Generous to poor people, he was valued for his honest advice, and when he died in 204 Cao Cao mourned him deeply. The marquisate was ended after the death of his eldest son Xian, but Cao Pi later recognised Ren Jun's contribution once more by the grant of another, albeit lesser, fief to his second son Lan. -SGZ 16:489-90*, JS 26:783-84; Yang 63:163, Hsü 80:319, deC 96:204-205.

Ren Kai 任愷; Nanyang. Son of Ren Yan, Ren Kai became Minister of Ceremonies. -HHS 76/66:2463.

Ren Kai 任愷 [Wenti 文悌]; Shu. Younger son of Ren Xun, Ren Kai was an effective Inspector of Xu province. -HYZ 10A:134, 12:212.

Ren Kui 任夔 (d.218). An officer of Liu Bei, Ren Kui went with the army commanded by Wu Lan and Lei Tong into Wudu in 218, but was killed on that campaign. -SGZ 1:51.

Ren Kui 任隗 see Ren Wei 任隗.

Ren Lan 任覽; Henan. Second son of Ren Jun, he was a friend of Wei Feng, but was warned against him by Zheng Mao. In 219 Wei Feng raised a conspiracy and was executed.

Ren Lan's father Ren Jun had been enfeoffed by Cao Cao about 200, but the marquisate was ended after the death of his eldest son and successor Ren Xian. When Cao Pi succeeded to the throne in 220, however, he recalled Ren Jun's achievements and recognised them again by the grant of a secondary fief to Ren Lan. -JS 44:1249, SGZ 16:490.

Ren Leng 任陵 see Ren Ling 任陵.

Ren Liang 任良; Youfufeng. During the troubled period of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the invasion of the Red Eyebrows, Ren Liang became warlord of his home county. He and other local leaders in the old capital district were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu.

In the summer of 27, as Emperor Guangwu's general Feng Yi came into the territory, Ren Liang joined the condottiere Yan Cen to attack him. Their army was defeated, and Ren Liang surrendered to Han. -HHS 17/7:647.

Ren Ling 任陵. Prefect of Luoyang in the early 90s, he sold a bamboo plantation to his fellow-countryman Wang Tiao the Intendant of Henan. -HHS 43/33:1479.

Ren Man 任滿 (d.35); Ba. A general of Gongsun Shu, in the middle 20s Ren Man was based at Jiangzhou, present-day Chongqing, the rear defence of the Yangzi Gorges. He was later named Excellency over the Masses in Gongsun Shu's imperial government, and in 30 he raided Nan commandery.

In 33 Ren Man accompanied the force led by Tian Rong which attacked down the Yangzi. They occupied part of Nan, but made no further move to expand their holdings, and the position was that of an advanced defence line rather than a salient which might become the basis of a further offensive.

In the summer of 35, the Han general Cen Peng attacked Tian Rong's river defences. As his ships broke through, Gongsun Shu's forces were destroyed, and Ren Man's officer Wang Zheng took his head and went to surrender to Han. -HHS 13/3:534, 542, HYZ 5:68; Bn 59:188-189.

Ren Min 任敏. An Academician in the time of Emperor Ming, Ren Min persuaded a court conference that the official Wang Shuhan did not deserve punishment for having taken leave when he mistakenly believed his father had died. -FSTY 3f:106.

Ren Mo 任末 [Shuben 叔本]; Shu. Initially a private scholar, while he was still a young man Ren Mo travelled to the University at Luoyang to study the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Qi. After he had been there ten years, his friend and fellow-student Dong Fengde died, and Ren Mo took his body in a hand-cart back to his home country for burial.

Ren Mo became known for this good deed, and he was invited to become Officer of Merit in his commandery. He declined on grounds of ill health, but taught a number of private students, including Jing Luan.

Ren Mo later went to attend the funeral of his former teacher, but he was himself taken ill and died on the road. He said to his nephew Ren Zao, "Take my body to my master's house. If the dead have consciousness then our spirits will be content; if they are not conscious there will be no harm done." -HHS 79/69B:2572*, HYZ 10A:137.

Ren Pu 任浦. When Ren Pu was Administrator of Wudu, the commandery was so well governed that items left on the road were not picked up. -HQ 2:6a.

Ren Qi 任岐 (d.191); Shu. In 191 Ren Qi was Administrator of Jianwei. As Liu Yan the Governor of Yi province made himself independent of the court of Han, Ren Qi took title as a general and led troops against him. He attacked Liu Yan's capital of Luo in Guanghan and burned the lower city, but was then driven back, defeated and killed.

The texts disagree whether Ren Qi acted in close alliance with the loyalist Jia Long, who also made an attack on Liu Yan about this time. -HHS 75/65:2432, SGZ Shu 1:867, HYGZ 5:70.

Ren Qian 任僉. In 123 Ren Qian was a senior officer under the Minister Herald. During a general debate at the court of Emperor An on a proposal to change the calendar, he joined the Academician Huang Guang in arguing for a return to a system of calculating lunar eclipses based upon the course of the moon, which had been used in the past. Zhou Xing and Zhang Heng, however, argued that the current system was the most accurate, others supported them, and no change was made. -HHS 92/2:3034 and see sub Zhou Xing.

Ren Ren 任仁 (d.110); Beidi? In the spring of 109 the imperial government sent Ren Ren as Commandant of Cavalry, with commandery militia and garrison troops, to assist the local commander Ren Shang against the rebel Xianlian Qiang in the Wei valley. He gained no success, he was consistently defeated, and in the following year his troops mutinied. Though the trouble was swiftly put down, Ren Ren was arrested and sent in a cage cart to Luoyang, where he died in prison. It is possible Ren Ren was a kinsman of his colleague Ren Shang. -HHS 5:212, 216, 87/77:2887; deC 84:97-100.

Ren Shang 任尚 (d.118); Beidi? There is no record of Ren Shang's place of origin, but it is probable that he was a member of the Ren clan of Beidi: see sub Ren Yu.

In the spring of 89 Ren Shang was Chief Clerk to the Protector of the Qiang Deng Xun, who had been appointed to deal with the rebel leader Mitang and had driven him and his followers from their homelands on the upper reaches of the Yellow River. As Mitang and his people tried to return Deng Xun sent Ren Shang with six thousand non-Chinese auxiliaries. Crossing the Yellow River in boats of hide sewn over a framework of bamboo, Ren Shang and his men attacked the Qiang settlements. They killed great numbers of the rebels, and drove them north into the hills of the upper Xining valley and the Koko Nor. Mitang attempted a counter-attack, but was again defeated with heavy losses in men killed and captured, and over three thousand animals taken. Exhausted, he abandoned the field and retired with the remnants of his followers far to the west.

As a major under the colonel Geng Kui in 91, Ren

Shang took part in the final assault sent by Dou Xian against the Shanyu of the Northern Xiongnu. In 92 the new claimant Shanyu Yuchujian, based at Yiwu near present-day Hami in Xinjiang, surrendered, and Ren Shang went with the Emissary Geng Kui to supervise him at his capital. When Emperor He destroyed Dou Xian later that year, Geng Kui was dismissed and Ren Shang took his place as Emissary.

In the autumn of 93 the Shanyu sought to escape to the north. Ren Shang chased him and persuaded him to return, but on the way back Yuchujian died, very possibly by force. There was no further attempt to establish a puppet state for the remnant Northern Xiongnu, and Ren Shang became Protector of the Wuhuan. In the winter of 94 he led Wuhuan and Xianbi auxiliaries to join the army of Deng Hong against the renegade Fenghou. With a combined force of eight thousand horsemen, he ambushed Fenghou and heavily defeated him, but the main body of the enemy escaped across the frontier and the imperial army abandoned the pursuit.

Ren Shang later served as Wu and Ji Colonel in the Western Regions under the Protector-General Ban Chao, and when Ban Chao retired in 102 he had Ren Shang succeed him. Ban Chao's biography claims that he advised Ren Shang to deal cautiously and tolerantly with the people of central Asia, but Ren Shang ignored his advice. The Chinese position in these distant territories was in any event tenuous, and in the autumn of 106, following the death of Emperor He, there was a general rising. Besieged at Shule [Kashgar], Ren Shang asked for help. Liang Qin, newly appointed as Senior Colonel, was sent with five thousand horsemen raised from Qiang and other non-Chinese peoples of the Gansu corridor, but the siege was broken before they arrived.

Ren Shang was replaced by his Commandant of Cavalry Duan Xi, but the troubles continued and worsened, and in the summer of 107 the government of the regent Dowager Deng gave orders to abandon the imperial position in the Western Regions. Such a retreat still required a major military presence, and when the Commandant of Cavalry Wang Hong called up more men from the Qiang, there was a major uprising throughout Liang province. By the winter of 107 the chieftain Dianlian of the Xianlian tribe had gathered a force which cut the Long Road leading to the west, and the Dowager's brother Deng Zhi was sent with a great army to deal with him.

Ren Shang accompanied Deng Zhi with rank as a colonel. The army was numerous and nominally powerful, but most of the men came from inner commanderies of the empire and were unskilled in war, while even the elite regiments of the Northern Army were at that time of poor standard. Deng Zhi's troops had serious problems of competence and morale.

Early in 108 the Qiang drove in the imperial advance posts in Hanyang and several months of inactivity followed. In the winter Deng Zhi sent Ren Shang to attack Dianlian with a force of commandery militia, but he was heavily defeated and lost eight thousand men. Deng Zhi was promptly recalled to the capital, while Ren Shang was left to hold the line in the Wei valley as best he could; he was granted a junior fief with revenue from three hundred families.

The situation continued to deteriorate, for the raids of the Qiang extended northeast to the edge of the North China plain, and rebellion broke out among the Xiongnu. In 110 Ren Shang was ordered to withdraw to defend Chang'an, the conscripts from inner China were sent back to their homes and two camps, the Tiger Tooth and the Camp at Yong, were established to train new troops. In the following spring Ren Shang was dismissed for lack of success, though it appears that the problem was due rather to the poor quality of his men than to his failings as a commander.

Later in 111 Ren Shang was again sent out, this time as an Imperial Clerk, and he defeated a raiding party of the Qiang as they came south through the mountains from Shangdang. The enemy lost only two hundred men, so it was not a major victory, but the situation was now regarded as secure enough to disband the garrison camp at the Meng Crossing of the Yellow River, which had been set up to protect the capital from the north.

In 112 Ren Shang was again dismissed, but three years later he was recalled to face the Qiang, this time with title as a General of the Household and Intendant of Jingzhao, commanding troops from the Northern Army which had been gathered about Chang'an. A recent offensive had captured the rebel base in Beidi, but the Chinese leaders then quarrelled and were heavily defeated. Rather than continue such direct strategy, Ren Shang, advised by the official Yu Xu, obtained imperial permission to dismiss his conscript infantry and use their scutage to equip a force of light-armed cavalry. Towards the end of the year he led a raiding party of these new troops against the renegade Du Jigong, killing four hundred of the enemy and capturing several thousand head of cattle, horses and sheep.

As the Chinese position in present-day Shanxi was now largely restored, Ren Shang constructed a line of fortifications north of Zuopingyi, to guard his flank as he sent further raids into Beidi. In the summer the General on the Liao Deng Zun brought Xiongnu allies south against the Qiang leader Lianchang, and in the winter Ren Shang sent another expedition which destroyed Lianchang's headquarters, killed seven hundred men, seized his insignia, captured his wife and children and took twenty thousand herding animals.

In 117 Ren Shang sent turncoat Qiang to assassinate Du Jigong and Lianchang, and that winter, in a final assault, he led commandery militia to join the Protector Ma Xian and defeat the last major leader, Langmo, at Fuping in Beidi, on the Yellow River by present-day Qingyang in eastern Gansu. Five thousand enemy were killed, a hundred thousand head of stock were taken, while a thousand slaves, presumably Chinese, were rescued and released.

With this victory, the great rebellion was effectively ended, and after Deng Zun had arranged the assassination of Langmo, little else remained but to mop up. At the end of the following year, however, Ren Shang was accused of having exaggerated his success while acquiring a fortune of ten million cash through embezzlement, bribery and extortion. He was arrested and brought back to the capital in a cage cart. Deng Zhi and others of his clan sought to protect him, supported by the Excellencies Ma Ying and Li He, but their colleague Liu Kai pressed the charges. Ren Shang suffered public execution, while his lands, his chattels and all his slaves were confiscated by the government.

The treatment of Ren Shang is remarkable. He had held commands on the northern frontier and in central Asia for thirty years, with involvement in some of the greatest successes and most dangerous set-backs of the Chinese armies. He concluded his career with three years in high command, culminating in a decisive victory, yet he was promptly disgraced and killed. Some accusations may have been true, and though Deng Zhi supported him we are also told that Ren Shang had contended with Deng Zun, cousin of the Dowager, in seeking credit for the final success: this mistaken, albeit justified, self-promotion may have encouraged the regent to make an example of a corrupt officer at a time of financial difficulty for the government.

The histories contain no formal biography of Ren Shang. -HHS 4:177, 179, 5:205-11, 224-29, 23/13:819, 47/37:1586, 1591, 87/77:2886-91, 89/79:2954-56; deC 84:90-115, 273-280.

Ren She 任涉. In 168 Hede of Shule [Kashgar] killed his nephew the king during a hunt, then took the throne for himself. In 170 Meng Tuo the Inspector of Liang province sent his officer Ren She and a large allied army to attack Shule and restore order. They gained no success, and Shule was effectively independent. -HHS 88/78:2927.

Ren Sheng 任勝 or Ren Teng 騰; Nanyang. Son of Ren Tun, he inherited the family fief. -HHS 21/11:754.

Ren Sun 任巽; Nanyang. A senior member of staff to the Administrator Lu Nu in 163, Ren Sun was associated with the new temple at the source of the Huai in the mountains to the east of the commandery. -LS 2:12a-14b, Nagata 94:142.

Ren Shi 任世; Nanyang. Son of Ren Sheng, he succeeded to his fief; it was later transferred to a county in Qi. -HHS 21/11:754.

Ren Tang 任棠 [Jiqing 季卿]; Hanyang. Ren Tang was a hermit and teacher of local reputation, and when Pang Can became Administrator about 110 he made a point of calling upon him. Ren Tang refused to speak, but set a large root of shallots and a bowl of water before his door-screen, and took his grandson to hide inside. One of Pang Can's staff officers protested that this showed a lack of respect, but Pang Can, after some thought, explained that it was intended to guide him: "The water is because he wishes me to be honest, the big torn-up root shows that he wants me to be firm with the great clans, and holding his son by the door indicates that he hopes I shall open my gates and show pity to those who are orphaned." With a sigh of admiration he returned to his office and governed in that fashion.

In 127 the official Huang Qiong urged Emperor Shun to invite Ren Tang and other worthy elders in retirement to come to office; Ren Tang did not accept. After his death, the people set up a portrait to honour Ren the Master Called to Office 任徵君. -HHS 51/41:1689, 61/51:2033; Vervorn 90:290.

Ren Teng 任騰; Jianwei. Having travelled to study in Hanzhong, Ren Teng found that he was unable to return to his family because of the troubled times and because the roads were blocked by bandits. He went instead to Changsha, where he became a commandery officer.

Ren Teng's son Ren Jia later achieved commissioned rank and was appointed Administrator of Changsha. As she accompanied her son, Ren Teng's wife recognised her husband and arranged their reunion. -FSTY 3f:104.

Ren Teng 任騰 see Ren Sheng 任勝. -DGHJ 24:4a.

Ren Tun 任屯; Nanyang. Son of Ren Wei, Ren Tun succeeded to his father's marquisate in 92. In recognition of his father's loyal advice against Dou Xian and the family of the Dowager, Emperor He also appointed him a colonel in the Northern Army. His fief was later transferred from Zhuo to a county in Jiangxia. -HHS 21/1A:754.

Ren Wang 任望 see Dan Wang 但望.

Ren Wei 任隗 [Zhonghe 仲和] (d.92); Nanyang. Son of Ren Guang, he succeeded to his fief in 29. Like Ren Guang, as a young man he was a devotee of Huang-Lao. He lived simply and showed great generosity to his kinsmen, caring for those who were orphaned. Emperor Ming heard of his philanthropy and invited him to Luoyang with the title Servant at Court, excusing him from the requirement to reside at his fief. He was appointed to command one of the troops of the Feathered Forest, then became General of the Household Rapid as a Tiger, in charge of the parallel corps, and was later a colonel in the Northern Army.

As Emperor Zhang came to the throne in 75 he continued to treat Ren Wei with affection and respect, appointing him first as Court Architect and then, in 80, as Minister Coachman. He replaced Dou Gu as Minister of the Household in 83, and after achieving distinction in every post and being celebrated for his honesty and humility, he became Excellency of Works in 87.

During the early years of the reign of Emperor He, as the family of the Dowager Dou dominated the court, Ren Wei was one of the few officials to maintain his independence. As Dou Xian embarked on his great campaigns against the Xiongnu in the early 90s, Ren Wei and his colleague Yuan An sent repeated memorials, urging that the extravagant enterprise be abandoned, and opposing Dou Xian's plan to set up a new Shanyu in the north as a puppet to rival the long-term ally of the south.

Ren Wei died in office in 92, a few weeks after the destruction of Dou Xian and his family by Emperor He. In recognition of his loyalty the ruler made his son Ren Tun a colonel in the Northern Army. -HHS 21/11: 753-54*; deC 84:268-274.

Ren Wengong 任文公; Ba. The son or younger brother of Ren Wensun 任文孫 [QHX:460], Ren Wengong was similarly skilled in divination by the stars and by the wind. At the end of Former Han he correctly foretold the future on several occasions, whether danger came from floods or from attacks by men. He became a local officer in the province and held clerical appointment at the capital, but left on grounds of ill health.

Foreseeing the fall of Wang Mang and the disorder that would follow, Ren Wengong trained the members of his household so they could gather their goods and run away quickly when bandits appeared. He then led them to take refuge in the mountains.

Under the regime of Gongsun Shu about 30, Ren Wengong forecast his own death, and his prophecy was again fulfilled. He was celebrated in the west as a man of incomparable wisdom. -HHS 82/72A:2707-08*, HYZ 12:217; Ngo 76:80-81, DeWoskin 83:46-48, QHX:460.

Ren Wuda 任武達; Beidi. When Feng Yan 馮衍 sent his wife the Lady Ren away because of her erratic conduct, he wrote to his brother-in-law Ren Wuda to explain his problems. -HHS 28/18B:1002-04.

Ren Xian 任先; Henan. Eldest son of Ren Jun, he succeeded to his father's marquisate in 209. Ren Xian died a few years later, and the fief was ended, but Cao Pi later honoured Ren Jun's memory by reviving the fief, in lesser form, for Ren Xian's younger brother Lan. -SGZ 18:490.

Ren Xing 任興. Administrator of Shanggu in 78, he organised a punitive expedition against a group of the Wuhuan. As widespread trouble broke out, the Internuncio Deng Xun was ordered to bring troops from the base at Liyang in Wei commandery to support him. -HHS 16/6:608.

Ren Xun 任循 [Bodu 伯度]; Shu. In the first half of the second century Ren Xun was Administrator of Changsha. -HYZ 10A:134.

Ren Yan 任延 [Changsun 長孫] (5-68); Nanyang. As a student at the University in Chang'an when he was only twelve, Ren Yan was known as the "Young Sage" 聖童 on account of his mastery of the classics. As the rebellion against Wang Mang broke out in the early 20s, Ren Yan took refuge in the northwest, though he refused to take service with the warlord Wei Ao.

In 23 Ren Yan went to the Gengshi Emperor at Chang'an, and he was appointed a Commandant in Kuaiji. The region was disturbed, but although he was only nineteen Ren Yan established his authority through non-action 無爲, through worshipping at a local shrine, and by sharing his salary with his subordinates. As a result of his courteous attentions the local hermit Longqiu Zhang came to join his staff, and all the leading men then sought appointment, while Ren Yan persuaded local chieftains to disarm their followers and take up farming.

Ren Yan then submitted to Emperor Guangwu; as he returned to Luoyang the people wept and sought to hold back his carriage. He met with the new ruler and was appointed Administrator of Jiuzhen in the far south, while his wife and children stayed at the capital.

In Jiuzhen, Ren Yan and his colleague Xi Guang the Administrator of Jiaozhi commandery were energetic sponsors of Confucian values among the native peoples, paying particular attention to farming and to the formalities of marriage. In first instance, it is said that ploughing with oxen was unknown and Ren Yan introduced metal tools and techniques for cultivation.

In the latter case it is said that hitherto men and women had coupled indiscriminately, but Ren Yan had his officers give up part of their salaries to provide wedding gifts: for the first time people could recognise their children and their lineage, and many gave the name of Ren to their off-spring as sign of gratitude. The moral and practical factors of his reforms produced splendid harvests.

After four years Ren Yan was recalled to the capital. He delayed on account of illness, and was demoted to be a magistrate in Liang, but the people of Jiuzhen set up a shrine in his honour.

Ren Yan was then appointed Administrator of Wuwei, where he destroyed the power of the local leader Tian Gan and established his own authority. As the territory was threatened on the north by the Xiongnu and on the south by the Qiang, many farmers had abandoned their fields, but Ren Yan organised a local militia, with a horse auxiliary from loyal tribes of non-Chinese, and maintained watch-positions on the passes: the raiders suffered several losses, and then left the land in peace.

Ren Yan organised a system of dams and canals to extend agriculture in the dry country, and he also set up schools and had his officers send their sons and grandsons to them, so the men of Wuwei became noted for their scholarship.

All these activities were in the pattern adopted by energetic "Confucianising" officials, who sought to transform the barbarians by introducing techniques of settled agriculture and social customs which would make them suitable subjects of Han. Ren Yan was classified by Fan Ye as a Benevolent Official 循吏, though he was demoted once again when he killed a number of non-Chinese Qiang people without first referring the matter to the throne.

After serving as a magistrate in Runan, in 57 Ren Yan was appointed Administrator of Yingchuan by the new Emperor Ming. In 59 he took part in the assembly at the Hall of the Circular Moat and then became Administrator of Henei, a post which he held until his death nine years later. -HHS 76/66:2460-63*, 86/76 2836, SGZ Wu 8:1251; QHX:461, Vervoorn 90:132-133, Bn 67:79-81, Miyakawa 60:31-34.

Ren Yang 任養; Hanyang/Tianshui. In 213, as Ma Chao attacked Hanyang from the west, Ren Yang led a rising in Shanggui city and let him in. -SGZ 18:550.

Ren Yin 任胤 [Bosi 伯嗣] (d.165); Nan. Nominated Filial and Incorrupt, after probation as a gentleman cadet Ren Yin became Assistant of Shu commandery and a county magistrate in Ba. He left office on account of mourning, but returned to be a magistrate in Nanyang, and in 162 he was transferred to Chenggao in Henan. He was noted in each place for his fine administration.

In 165 Ren Yin was sent south to be Administrator of Guiyang. That troubled territory had lately been settled by Du Shang, but as Ren Yin arrived he was attacked by rebels under Hu Lan and Zhu Gai; he abandoned his post and fled. Du Shang returned to put down the rebellion, while Ren Yin was taken to the capital and executed.

A stele was nonetheless set up in honour of Ren Yin, titled to refer to his tenure in Chenggao, and glossing over the unfortunate affair in Guiyang. -HHS 7:315, 102/12:3257, LS 20a-b, LX 15:3a.

Ren Yong 任永 [Junye 君業]; Jianwei. An expert in ancient learning, and particularly in calculations of the calendar, when Wang Mang came to power Ren Yong and his fellow-countryman Feng Xin pretended blindness in order to avoid any involvement in public affairs. Ren Yong's wife committed adultery in his presence, but he showed no emotion and said nothing, and when he saw a child fall into a well he made no move to save it [cf. Mencius 2A:6:3]. He likewise paid no attention when his servants coupled in front of him.

After Gongsun Shu was destroyed by Han in 36, the two men ended their pretence, and those who had acted so wrongly before them now killed themselves. Emperor Guangwu heard the story and invited them to court, but Ren Yong became ill and died, while Feng Xin was too old to travel. -HHS 81/71:2670, HYGZ 10B:156; Vervoorn 90:143.

Ren Yu 任禹; Beidi. As Wei Ao and Guangwu came to open conflict in 30, Ma Yuan induced a number of Wei Ao's officers to defect. Ren Yu was one of those who changed sides. -HHS 24/14:832.

We are not told directly of Ren Yu's place of origin, but XHS 2:14b, cited by HHS 24/14:828 TC, and HHS 28/18B:1002 both refer to a notable clan of that name in Beidi.

Ren Yue 任約 see Yuan Yue 袁約. -ZZTJ 67:2142; deC 96:495-498.

Ren Yun 任顛 (d.141). After defeating Ma Xian in 141, the rebel Qiang attacked the region of Chang'an. Ren Yun was magistrate of Heyang, on the Yellow River in the east of Zuopingyi. He sought to oppose the raiders, but was killed in battle. -HHS 87/77:2896.

Ren Zao 任造; Shu. Nephew of Ren Mo, he accompanied him to the funeral of Ren Mo's former teacher. Ren Mo died on the road, but in accordance with his instructions Ren Zao took his body on to the house of his late master so that, if there was indeed consciousness after death, they might communicate. -HHS 79/69B:2572.

Ren Zhi 任芝. A Palace Attendant and favourite of Emperor Ling, Ren Zhi was criticised in 178 by the senior official Yang Ci as a man of poor quality. In 180 Ren Zhi and his colleague Yue Song persuaded the emperor that he was entitled to construct the Jade Sceptre and Spiritual Jade parks, on the specious grounds that he would be "sharing them with the people" in the same fashion as the legendary King Wen of Zhou 周文王 [e.g. Legge CC II:153-154]. -HHS 54/44:1780, 1783; deC 89:165.

Ren Zhong 任仲. In 25 Ren Zhong was Administrator of Zhangye under the Gengshi regime. When that government was destroyed the commander Dou Rong was recognised as chief of the northwest. Ren Zhong did not accept this and was obliged to leave. -HHS 23/13:797.

Ren Zhuo 任遠 see Ren Chuo 任遠.

Renliang 忍良; Qiang. In the early 120s Renliang and Luhū were chieftains of the Dangjian tribe. They were undecided whether to follow the example of their colleague Jiwu, who raided Chinese territory in 120, but after the Protector Ma Xian had defeated Jiwu's incursion early in 121 he came to Dangjian territory, summoned Luhū, and cut off his head.

Ma Xian was rewarded for his success, but Renliang now held no faith in the Chinese. Fleeing beyond the borders, he gathered a coalition of tribes to attack Jincheng, and joined Manu, claimant leader of the Shaodang tribe. Ma Xian came with Xianlian allies, but was initially defeated, while Manu defeated the commandery militia of Zhangye and Wuwei.

Ma Xian recovered from his set-back and drove Manu to surrender; Renliang is not heard of again. -HHS 87/77:2892.

Rilü 日律; Xianbi. During the 170s Rilü was a commander in the west under Tanshihuai. -SGZ 30:838.

Rilütuiyan 日律推演 see Rilü 日律 and/or Tuiyan 推演.

Rong 戎 of Yutian [Khotan]. Son of King Weishi of Yutian, after his father was killed by the regional hegemon King Xian of Yarkand, Rong fled to China, where he was granted title as a marquis. -HHS 88/78:2925.

Rong Bao 榮保; Shanyang. It is said that during the mid-150s Rong Bao and Cao Yi were master craftsmen building a funerary temple for Xiang Tuo and his wife. -Nagata 94:118 [this text, however, is of doubtful provenance].

Rong He 榮郃 or Rong Ge or Rong Tai 郃; Jingzhao. Minister Herald in 195, he was among the senior officials taken hostage by Guo Si during his conflict with Li Jue in Chang'an. -HHJ 28:334.

HHS 9:381, the Annals for 199, describes how Cao Cao re-arranged the Imperial Secretariat to have two Deputy Directors. In JJ at 354-55, Hui Dong cites the Hanguan yi of Ying Shao, which says that Rong He, at that time Bearer of the Mace, was transferred to one of those positions.

Hui Dong also cites FSTY 6f:142, which refers to Rong He 榮郃 as Intendant of Jingzhao, and describes the family as descended from Rong Bo 榮伯, also known as Ying Bo 營伯, a minister of the legendary King Cheng of Zhou 周成王. Hui Dong, however, has the surname as Ying 營, while to add to the confusion the sound of the character 營 is given as 金+傾>jing; this probably reflects an early pronunciation: GSR 843f.

Rong Liang 戎良 [Zigong 子恭]; Jiyan. At the age of eighteen Rong Liang became the confidential clerk of the Administrator Zhuge Li. He was a good-looking young man, and after Zhuge Li had sent him into his private apartments to prepare some papers someone accused him of having intercourse with one of the maid-servants. Rong Liang promptly cut open his own breast to show Zhuge Li his loyal heart; we are not told whether he survived the gesture. -XC 8:12a.

Rongmohui 戎末魔 see Rongzhuhui 戎朱魔. -HHS 101/11:3244, XHS 5:22b, SGZ 30:833; deC 84:527.

Rongmomo 戎末魔 see Rongzhuhui 戎朱魔. -ZZTJ 51:1657; deC 84:527.

Rongwang 戎亡 see Rong 戎. -Chavannes 07:201.

Rongyang, Lady of 滎陽君 see the Lady Yan Zong 閻宗.

Rongzhuhui 戎朱魔 or Rongmohui 戎末魔 or Rongmomo 戎末魔; Wuhuan. During the reign of Emperor Shun Rongzhuhui was celebrated as a leader of Wuhuan people willing to support Han. Allied to the Protector Geng Ye, Rongzhuhui and his colleague Fushuguan distinguished themselves in several campaigns against the Xianbi led by Qizhijian, and in the early 130s Rongzhuhui was given title as Chief Commandant Friend of Han 親漢都尉. -HHS 90/80:2983, SGZ 30:833; deC 84:303, 391.

Ru Chen 汝臣; Youfufeng. In 23 Ru Chen was chieftain of a strong local clan. In the autumn the armies of the Gengshi Emperor of Han defeated the last field force of Wang Mang and sent advance parties towards Chang'an. Ru Chen and other local leaders took title as generals in the name of Han and came to attack the capital. While the main Han army was halted at Huayin, these irregular troops ravaged the city and killed Wang Mang. -Dubs 55:461, Bn 54:130. See also Ru Zhang below.

Ru Dun 汝敦; Jianwei. Ru Dun lived with his brothers and their wives. His parents had been prosperous, and his elder brother's wife wanted their goods for herself, so Ru Dun gave up everything and left.

Ru Dun later found a golden dish as he was ploughing. He and his wife agreed that they would hand this over too, but when they went to the family house his sister-in-law was at first angry to see them back. She changed her attitude as soon as she saw the dish, and Ru Dun's brother now realised how greedy she was; he sent her away. None of the brothers was willing to take the gold, each yielding to the other. They became known for their fine family feeling, and Ru Dun was later nominated Filial and Incorrupt. - HYGZ 10B:154.

Ru Kun 汝錕; Guanghan. When Ru Kun was killed by Zhang Ming, his friend Yang Kuan captured and bound the murderer, then sent him to Ru Kun's household to confess. - HYGZ 10B:150.

Ru Yu 汝郁 [Shuyi 叔異 or Youyi 幼異]; Chen. When Ru Yu was five his mother was taken ill and could not eat. Deeply distressed, Ru Yu also refused to eat, and when his mother saw this, she forced herself to take something. Their kinsmen all admired him, and Ru Yu had the character yi 異 "remarkable" incorporated into his style.

Ru Yu later became a hermit in the wilderness, until Jia Kui recommended him to Emperor Zhang. He accepted a most courteous invitation and was appointed Chancellor of Lu. His virtue affected all the people, and ten thousand families came to Lu to benefit from his rule. - HHS 26:1240; Vervoorn 90:286.

Ru Zhang 汝章; Youfufeng. During the troubles of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the invasion of the Red Eyebrows, Ru Zhang became warlord in his home county of Huaili, capital of the commandery. He and other local leaders in the old capital district were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu, but in 27 they were conquered by Emperor Guangwu's general Feng Yi. - HHS 17/7:647.

This man was surely a kinsman of, and perhaps the same person as, Ru Chen above.

Ruan Kuang 阮況; Xindu/Anping. As Wang Lang took the imperial title in the winter of 23/24, the greater part of the north accepted his claim, but Ren Guang the Administrator of Xindu refused to acknowledge him, and his Officer of Merit Ruan Kuang was among those who supported his loyalty to Han. They raised troops to oppose the pretender and welcomed Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, at that time a commissioner of the Gengshi Emperor.

Ruan Kuang became known for his ability, and Emperor Guangwu appointed him Administrator of the important commandery of Nanyang. He died in that office about 60. - HHS 21/11A:751-53, 43/33:1457-58. This is presumably not the same man as in the anecdote immediately below.

Ruan Kuang 阮況. As Inspector of Ji province, Ruan Kuang reported that Li Tong the Chancellor of Zhao was incompetent. Li Tong duly resigned, but he was then consulted by Emperor Zhang on a number of difficult law cases. Impressed with his answers, the emperor dismissed Ruan Kuang and appointed Li Tong to high office. - FSTY 5:40.

Though the names are the same, the dates and the careers indicate that these two men are different.

Ruan Yu 阮瑀 [Yuanyu 元瑜] (d.212); Chenliu. As a young man Ruan Yu studied with Cai Yong. An excellent calligrapher, he became a secretary to Cao Hong, but disagreed with him and transferred to Cao Cao's staff, where he and Chen Lin prepared his letters and orders.

Ruan Yu was a member of the literary circle about the young Cao Pi and Cao Zhi. In his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature" Cao Pi named him as one of the Seven Masters of the Jian'an period. - SGZ 2:599-602*.

Ruan [Xuqing] 阮胥卿; Chenliu. JS 52:1444 mentions Ruan Xuqing as a Palace Attendant of Han.

Rui Liang 芮良 [Wenluan 文鸞]; Danyang. Elder son of Rui Zhi, Rui Liang served under Sun Ce in the first campaigns on the lower Yangzi, and was appointed Commandant of the eastern region of Kuaiji. He probably died in the late 190s. - SGZ Wu 16:1398.

Rui Xuan 芮玄 [Wenbiao 文表]; Danyang. Son of Rui Zhi, after the death of his elder brother Liang, probably in the late 190s, Rui Xuan took over his troops. He became a General of the Household under Sun Quan and was enfeoffed as a marquis. He died in the 220s.

As Sun Quan was seeking suitable women for his son and Heir Sun Deng, his advisers commended the fine service of the Rui family. One of Rui Xuan's daughters was accordingly taken as a concubine 妃 for Sun Deng; she was probably not so high in status as the daughter of Zhou Yu, who is described as a consort 配. - SGZ Wu 16:1397-98.

Rui Zhi 芮祉 [Xuansi 宣嗣]; Danyang. An early and successful follower of Sun Jian, Rui Zhi was recommended as Administrator of Jiujiang, and presumably held that office under the auspices of Yuan Shu. He was later transferred to Wu, and was well regarded for his administration in both commanderies. It appears that he died in the early 190s, leaving two sons, Liang and Xuan. -SGZ Wu 16:1398.

S

Sai Wei 塞威 see Jian Wei 蹇威. -HYZ 1:6.

Sha Die 沙疊; Youfufeng. A county officer under the magistrate Wang Fu 王阜 about 70, Sha Die was ordered to play suitable dancing music for a flock of magical luan 鸞 birds. -DGHJ 18:5a.

Sanwu Qun 三烏羣 was a Reporting Officer for his commandery. -FSTY 5f:117.

Shama 沙麻, the Lady, of Further Jushi. Mother of Junjiu the King of Further Jushi, in 120 she encouraged him to turn against Han. -HHS 88/78:2930.

Shamohan 沙末汗; Xianbi. Son of Queji, after the death of his father about 215 he was confirmed as a king by the Han court under Cao Cao. -SGZ 30:840.

Shan 山, the Lady; Henei. Wife of Zhang Wang, she was the mother of the Lady Zhang Chunhua, who married Sima Yi. -JS 1:948.

Shan An 單超; Henan. A younger brother of the eunuch Shan Chao, Shan An became Administrator of Hedong. He governed badly. -HHS 78/68:2521.

Shan Bing 山冰 (d.168). A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates, Shan Bing was an ally of the Dou clan. In the autumn of 168, as Dou Wu and Chen Fan prepared to destroy Cao Jie and other palace eunuchs, they had Shan Bing replace Wei Biao as Prefect of the Yellow Gates. He impeached several eunuchs, and had Zheng Li sent to the Northern Prison of the Yellow Gates. As Shan Bing, the Director of the Secretariat Yin Xun and the censorial officer Zhu Jin interrogated him, Zheng Li duly implicated Cao Jie and Wang Fu in his alleged wrongdoing.

Shan Bing and his associates reported the confession and called for the arrest of Cao Jie and Wang Fu, but the letter was intercepted by the eunuch Zhu Yu, and Cao Jie and Wang Fu struck first. Taking the young Emperor with them, they forced the Secretariat to draw up a warrant for the arrest of Shan Ping and Yin Xun. Shan Bing fought back and was killed. -HHS 69/59:

2243, 102/12:3258; Bn 76:96-98.

Shan Chao 單超 (d.160); Henan. A eunuch, in 159 Shan Chao was a Regular Attendant. When Emperor Huan asked Tang Heng who might help him get rid of Liang Ji, Shan Chao was one of four whom he recommended, for Liang Ji's brother Liang Buyi had at some time arrested his brother and Shan Chao had had to plead to get him released. The young emperor accordingly called Shan Chao, Xu Huang, Ju Yuan and Zuo Guan to join him and Tang Heng; he bit Shan Chao on the arm so that the blood flowed as they swore a solemn oath.

On 9 December the coup was carried out and the Liang clan was destroyed [see sub Ju Yuan]. Though Shan Chao's role in the action is not mentioned specifically, he was evidently the leader of the group, for while each of the five received a county marquise and a cash donation, his reward was the largest.

Soon afterwards Shan Chao became ill, and in the following year he died. Emperor Huan sent messengers to his death-bed to grant him insignia as General of Chariots and Cavalry, the Court Architect was ordered to construct his tomb, and his funeral was carried out with every display of honour. -HHS 78/68:2520-21*; Ch'ü 72:476-480, Bn 76:94-95, deC 89:12-14.

Shan Fu 單甫. A Palace Attendant at the court of Han in the 180s, Shan Fu was the teacher of the diviner Zhao Da. -SGZ Wu 18:1424.

Shan Jing 單經. In 191 Shan Jing was named Inspector of Yan province by Gongsun Zan. In the following year he was sent to aid Tao Qian against Cao Cao, but was defeated in Pingyuan. -SGZ 8:242, 1:10.

Shan Kuang 單匡; Henan. A nephew, or possibly a brother, of the eunuch Shan Chao, in 160 Shan Kuang was Administrator of Jiyin. He ruled corruptly and greedily, and Wei Yu, officer of Diwu Zhong the Inspector of Yan, arrested his followers and family and seized quantities of extorted property. Shan Kuang sent Ren Fang to kill Wei Yu, but Ren Fang was arrested and sent to the capital. Shan Kuang, however, was able to arrange his escape from prison, and the affair was covered up. -HHS 78/68:2521, 41/31:1404, 54/44:1771, 66/56:2171.

Shan Qian 單遷; Henan. A younger brother of the eunuch Shan Chao, Shan Qian became Administrator of Shanyang. In 165 he was arrested for various crimes, and the Minister of Justice Feng Gun sentenced him to death. Shan Chao had died some years earlier, but his colleagues got together to aid Shan Qian. They sent in accusations against Feng Gun, and he was sent to convict labour. -HHS 38/28:1284.

Shan Yang 單颺 [Wuxuan 武宣]; Shanyang. Though orphaned and poor, Shan Yang became skilled in mathematics, astronomy and portents. When a yellow dragon appeared at Qiao county in Pei about 172, he foretold the fall of Han. [Qiao was the home county of the Cao family, and when Cao Pi, son of Cao Cao, took the imperial title, he did so under the auspices of the colour yellow, in cosmic succession to the red of Han.]

Shan Yang was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became Court Astronomer. In 175 he joined Cai Yong and others to recommend the editing and engraving of the Stone Classics at Luoyang, a project in which he probably shared, and in 178 he was among the group of scholars, including Cai Yong, which was consulted by Emperor Ling after a series of unfavourable portents.

Shan Yang became Administrator of Hanzhong, but was dismissed. He later returned to the capital as a member of the Imperial Secretariat, and died in that office. -HHS 60/50B:1990, 1998, 82/72B:2733*.

Shan Yu 山昱. In 159 a rising among the non-Chinese people of Shu commandery extended into the north of the Dependent State and also affected Jianwei. In 161 Shan Yu the Inspector of Yi province defeated the rebels and scattered them. -HHS 86/76:2857.

Shan Zhong 山仲. Shan Zhong was senior mason for the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang in 135; see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16: 15a.

Shan [Zidao] 山子道 of Youfufeng was known at the end of Han as an expert player of "surrounding chess" 圍碁 [Japanese Go]. -SGZ 1:54.

Shang, Emperor 殤帝 [the "Young" Emperor] (reg. 106) see Liu Long 劉隆.

Shang 尚 [surname] is frequently confused with Xiang 向.

Shang Chang 尚長 see Xiang Chang 向長.

Shang Chenggong 上成公 see Shangcheng Gong 上成公.

Shang Dan 尚但, the Lady. During the 180s Shang Dan was a senior member of the imperial harem 中大人. Zhang Rang, Zhao Zhong and other place eunuchs had built themselves great mansions and were concerned the emperor might see them. They had Shang Dan advise him that it would bring ill fortune to the nation if the sovereign climbed too high. Emperor Ling believed this, and the eunuchs were able to conceal their extravagance. -HHS 78/68:2536.

Shang Sheng 商升 (d.196). Magistrate of Houguan in Kuaiji, by present-day Fuzhou, Shang Sheng raised troops to support the Administrator Wang Lang against Sun Ce. He repelled an attack by Han Yan, but when He Qi arrived he prepared to surrender. Before he could do so, however, he was killed by his associates Zhang Ya and Zhan Qiang. -SGZ Wu 15:1377.

Shang Xu 尚栩 see Xiang Xu 向栩.

Shang Yao 商曜 (d.211); Taiyuan. A leader of bandits, Shang Yao was killed by Xiahou Yuan. -SGZ 9:270.

Shang [Zizheng] 商子徵 see Yin Zizheng 殷子徵. -XC 5:13b.

Shangcheng Gong 上成公 [Lord Shangcheng]; Henan. About 150 Shangcheng Gong returned to his home after a long absence and told his family that he had achieved immortality and had come to say goodbye. He then walked away from them, rising into the air as he did so, and disappeared into the clouds. The gentlemen Han Shao and Chen Shi were said to have witnessed this remarkable event. -HHS 82/72B: 2748*; Ngo 76:140, DeWoskin 83:86.

Shangguan Hong 上官鴻. In 100 Cao Feng was sent as Commandant of the western region of Jincheng to set up military colonies in former territory of the Qiang on the Yellow River outside the frontier. Shangguan Hong, Chief Clerk of Jincheng, later recommended that additional colonies should be established. This was done, but the settlements were abandoned after the great rebellion of the Qiang in 107. -HHS 87/77:2885.

Shangguan Zi 上官資. A gentleman cadet in 159, Shangguan Zi petitioned Emperor Huan to have mercy on the presumptuous magistrate Li Yun. -HHS 57/47: 1852.

Shanghuai Kuang 上淮況 [Kuang of Shanghuai]. Evidently from the region of the upper Huai River in the hill country of the Dabie Shan, he became a leader of the Bronze Horse bandits in the North China plain. Since the other named leader of the Bronze Horses is Huang Tu of Dongshan, who presumably came from the region of present-day Shandong, it appears the group was formed from a combination of at least two bands which had arisen independently.

In the autumn of 24 the Bronze Horse group and others were defeated in Julu by the forces of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who then pursued them into Wei commandery, where they surrendered.

Shanghuai Kuang and other chieftains were enfeoffed as marquises, while their troops were incorporated into Liu Xiu's army. -HHS 1A:16-17; Bn 59:79-83.

Shanyang, Lady of 山陽君 see the Lady Song E 宋娥.

Shanyu 單于: title of the ruler of Xiongnu and, on occasion, of other non-Chinese peoples. The chieftains are listed below by their dynastic or regnal titles. Those whose personal name is known are discussed under that heading, and some are known only by their personal names, with no record of dynastic title.

Huduershidaogao 呼都而尸道皋 see Yu 興;

Huhanxie I 呼韓邪 see sub Yu 興;

Huhanxie II [Southern] 呼韓邪 see Bi 比;

Huhanye 呼韓邪 see Huhanxie above;

Shanyu, Northern 北單于 see Punu 蒲奴,

Yuchujian 於除鞬, and Youliu 優留 Shanyu;

Shanyu, Northern [name and title unknown]

(reg. 87-91) see sub Youliu 優留 Shanyu, sub

Yuchujian 於除鞬 and sub Tuntuhe 屯屠何;

Shanyu, Southern 南單于 see Bi 比, Anguo 安國,

Huchuquan 呼廚泉 and below:

Hulanruo shizhujū 呼蘭若尸逐就

see Toulouchu 兜樓儲 (reg. 143-147);

Huxie shizhuhou 胡邪尸逐侯鞬

see Chang 長 (reg. 63-85);

Qiuchujulin 丘除車林鞬 see Su 蘇 (reg. 63);

Qiufuyou 丘浮尤鞬 see Mo 莫 (reg. 56-57);

Qute ruoshijū 去牠若尸就 see Xiuli 休利;

Tingdu shizhuhou 亭獨尸逐侯鞬

see Shizi 師子 (reg. 94-98);

Tuteruo shizhujū 屠特若尸逐就 see sub voce;

Wanshi shizhu 萬氏尸逐鞬

see Tan 檀 (reg. 98-124);

Xiluo shizhu 隴落尸逐鞬

see Bi 比 (reg. 48-56);

Xitong shizhuhou 隴僮尸逐侯鞬

see Shi 適 (reg. 59-63);

Xiulan shizhuhou 休蘭尸逐侯鞬

see Tuntuhe 屯屠何 (reg. 88-93);

Yifayulū 伊伐於/于慮鞬

see Han 汗 (reg. 59-59);

Yiling shizhujū 伊陵尸逐就

see Juche'er 居車兒 (reg. 147-172);

Yituyulū 伊屠於閭鞬

see Xuan 宣 (reg. 85-88);

Zhizhi shizhuhou 持至尸逐侯

see Yufuluo 於夫羅 (reg. 188-195?).

The characters 若 ruo and 鞬 di appear separately or in combination in the titles of most Southern Shanyu. HHS 89/79:2939 TC explains ruodi as equivalent to the Chinese 孝 xiao "Filial", which was part of the dynastic title of all Han emperors after the two founders Gao and Guangwu. The same custom was followed by Xiongnu rulers after the first Huhanye 呼韓邪 Shanyu (reg. 59/58-31 BC).

Shao 紹 [surname unknown] [Wensu 文肅]; Kuaiji. As magistrate of a county in Dong commandery he would not use the official residence, but slept at his hall of audience. -XC 7:10b.

Shao [Gongzi] 召公子. Formerly a man of low-caste occupation, either a butcher or a wine-seller, Shao Gongzi was nonetheless taken up by Guo Tai and became well known and respected. -HHS 68/58:2231.

Shao Kui 邵夔 or 召夔; Henan. A former officer of Zhou Ju, Shao Kui later became a General of the Household. He was a man of poor conduct, and though he offered friendship to Zhou Ju's son Zhou Xie, Zhou Xie rebuffed his advances.

About 150 Shao Kui was appointed Administrator of Runan, home of the Zhou family; Zhou Xie, in disgust, withdrew from public life. Shao Kui later killed Chen Bojing for assisting his son-in-law to escape arrest. -HHS 46/36:1546, 61/5A:3031.

Shao Qiangsheng 邵強生; Shanyang. It is said that during the mid-150s Shao Qiangsheng and Dai Sheng were master painters for the funerary temple of Xiang Tuo and his wife. -Nagata 94:118 [this text, however, is of doubtful provenance].

Shao Wu 召吳; Yingchuan. In 33 Shao Wu was the leader of a group of hills bandits. The Administrator Guo Ji persuaded him and his associate Zhao Hong to surrender. They and their followers came with bound hands, but Guo Ji freed them and had them return to farming. He granted pardons without reference to the throne, but Emperor Guangwu gave retrospective approval.

Then Shao Wu and Zhao Hong spread news of Guo Ji to their former colleagues south of the Yangzi and north across the plain. Great numbers surrendered on such generous terms. -HHS 31/2A:1092.

Shao Xiu 召休; Jiujiang. Grandson of Shao Xun, he became Inspector of Qing province. -HHS 79/69B: 2574.

Shao Xun 召馴 personal name sometimes miswritten as 訓 [Bochun 伯春]; Jiujiang. Shao Xun's great-grandfather Shao Xincheng 召信臣 had been a commandery administrator and then a minister in the time of Emperor Wu of Former Han, and Shao Xun's father was a county magistrate under Emperor Guangwu. Shao Xun was a scholar of the Classic of Poetry according to the New Text school of Han, and had a broad knowledge of all the classics and histories. He had great local reputation, held office in his commandery and province, and was then appointed to the office of the Excellency of Works at the capital.

In 76, at the beginning of the reign of Emperor Zhang, Shao Xun was named a Commandant of Cavalry, and he took part in philosophical discussions on the Old Texts led by Jia Kui. Appointed a General of the Household, he lectured to the young kings of the imperial house in the palace at Luoyang. Emperor Zhang admired his moral teachings, and treated him with particular favour.

Shao Xun was then sent out to be Administrator of Chenliu, and his service was rewarded with swords, cash and other gifts. Though Tjan discounts the idea, Shao Xun may have returned to the capital in 79 to take part in the Discussions at the White Tiger Hall, the scholarly conference convened by Emperor Zhang which confirmed the position of New Text Confucianism. He did continue in his provincial office until 85, when he was appointed Intendant of Henan, based upon Luoyang.

In 89 Shao Xun became Minister of the Household. He died soon afterwards and was buried with special honours. -HHS 79/69B:2573-74*; Tjan 49:161-163.

She 射 [surname] see also Xie 謝: for debate on the origin of this surname see HSBZ 21A:26a; QHX:468.

She 庫 [surname] also appears as Ku 庫: e.g. FSTY 5f:132.

She Gao 射髡 see Xie Gao 謝髡.

She Jian 射堅 [Wengu 文固]; Youfufeng. A man of good repute, during the 180s She Jian was appointed to the offices of the Excellencies and then became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. In the early 190s he and his brother Yuan left the troubled region of Chang'an and went south into Yi province, where She Jian became Chief Clerk to the warlord Governor Liu Zhang.

After Liu Bei took power in 214 She Jian served him as Administrator of Guanghan and then of Shu. He probably died before 220. -SGZ Shu 2:885-86.

She Jun 庫鈞 or Ku Jun 庫鈞. When Dou Rong was appointed to the northwest of Liang province in 23, he established a good relationship with She Jun the Commandant of Jincheng. As the Gengshi regime collapsed at Chang'an in 25, She Jun and his colleagues accepted Dou Rong's leadership and She Jun was named Administrator of his commandery. We are told, however, that the Qiang leader Fenghe had lately killed the former Administrator and taken over much of the territory, and it was not until 30 that Dou Rong took an army to drive Fenghe away.

In 32, when Dou Rong brought his army to assist Emperor Guangwu's attack on Wei Ao, She Jun and his fellows received titles as marquises. -HHS 23/13:796-97, 806.

She Yuan 射援 [Wenxiong 文雄]; Youfufeng. [For debate on the origin of the surname see HSBZ 21A:26a; QHX:486.] Younger brother of She Jian, She Yuan also had a fine reputation. The Grand Commandant Huangfu Song admired his ability and gave him his daughter in marriage.

During the early 190s She Yuan accompanied She Jian into Yi province, and became a senior adviser to Liu Bei. In 219 he was one of the officials listed in the formal memorial to the emperor when Liu Bei took title as King of Hanzhong. He later served Zhuge Liang, and probably died in the 220s. -SGZ Shu 2:885-86.

Shen 申, the Lady; Yingchuan. A woman of good official family, she entered the harem of Emperor Zhang at the age of thirteen and became an Honoured Lady. She had two sons, Liu Shou the King of Jibei and Liu Kai, who became King of Hejian and was ancestor of Emperor Huan. -HHS 55/45:1797, 1806.

Shen, Lord 申君 [personal name unknown]; Donghai. A scholar and teacher, he served as a county magistrate in Kuaiji. When he died, his student Dai Feng escorted his body home. -HHS 81/71:2683.

Shen 沈 [personal names unknown]; Ba. The stele of a Spirit Road 神道 in Qu 渠 county in Sichuan preserved inscriptions to two members of the Shen family. One had been an Internuncio and then held minor military rank. The other was a county magistrate in Jingzhao and then Commandant of Jiaozhi commandery. -LS 13:2a-b, Nagata 94:318.

Shen 神 [surname unknown]. With rank as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, in 220 he was a sponsor of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Shen 慎 [surname unknown]. With rank as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, in 220 he was a sponsor of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Shen 沈 of Weili 尉黎/犁: see Fan 汎 of Weili.

Shen Baoxu 申包胥. In the early 190s Shen Baoxu was an adviser to Tao Qian, ruler of Xu province. -SGZ Wu 1:1109.

Shen Cheng 沈成 (d.200); Runan. Local bandits, Shen Cheng and his group were destroyed by Li Tong, who sent Shen Cheng's head to Cao Cao. -SGZ 18:535.

Shen Dan 申耽 [Yiju 義舉]; Hanzhong. A local leader, about 200 Shen Dan established himself independently in the hill country about the Han River between Hanzhong and Nanyang. In the west he had contact with Zhang Lu and in the east with Cao Cao, who named him Commandant of Shangyong commandery in his home territory and gave him title as a general.

After his victory in Hanzhong in 219 Liu Bei sent his officers Meng Da and Li Yan, and his adopted son Liu Feng, to attack Shen Dan. Shen Dan surrendered and sent his wife and children to Liu Bei's court. He was again given title as a general, enfeoffed as a marquis, and re-appointed to his former territory under the authority of Liu Feng.

In the following year, however, Meng Da went over to Cao Pi. He was likewise given title to his former territory, but with the requirement that he capture it from Liu Feng. Aided by an army of Wei and assisted by the rebellion of Shen Dan's brother Shen Yi, he forced Liu Fang to withdraw. Shen Dan changed sides once more and surrendered to Wei. He was again named a general, but was now stationed in Nanyang, while Shen Yi took over his local power. There is no record of the fate of Shen Dan's family in Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 10:991-94.

Shen Dang 申瑒; Zuopingyi. Shen Dang was chieftain of a strong local clan when, in the autumn of 23, the armies of the Gengshi Emperor of Han defeated the last field force of Wang Mang and sent a detachment under Wang Xian to operate north of the Wei River. Taking title as a general in the name of Han, Shen Dang went to join Wang Xian, who led his new allies south across the Wei. He gained further troops from other clans and then, as the main Han army was halted at Huayin, his irregular forces seized Chang'an, ravaged the city, and killed Wang Mang. -Dubs 55:461, Bn 54:129-130.

Shen Feng 沈豐 or Zhen Feng 甄豐 [Shengda 聖

達]; Wu/Kuaiji. About 51 Shen Feng was Registrar to Diwu Lun the Administrator of Kuaiji. Diwu Lun's old mother had been unable to travel to the commandery with him, and he missed her very much, so Shen Feng went to Chang'an to escort her. When they came to the Yangzi, the old lady was afraid to cross, but Shen Feng held sacrifice and a banquet and had her toasted repeatedly until she became drunk. He was then able to get her across the river.

Shen Feng later became Administrator of Lingling, where his gentle rule brought favourable signs of sweet dew 甘露 and yellow dragons. -DGHJ 21:8a, XC 5:5a-b, HHSJ 41/31:1481 & 76/66:2719 Hui Dong.

Shen Fu 申輔; Yingchuan. Brother of the former Honoured Lady Shen of Emperor Zhang, in 107 Shen Fu was granted a small fief by the government of the Empress Deng, regent for Emperor An. -HHS 55/45:1806.

Shen Fu 沈輔 [Boqin 伯禽]; Kuaiji. When Shen Fu was young he was very economical: when his father died he carried out the funerary ceremonies himself, but then distributed all the property he had inherited to his needy kinsmen. -XC 7:12a.

Shen Gu 審固; Henei. A common soldier in Cao Cao's service, about 210 Shen Gu was promoted and recommended by his commander Yang Jun. He later held office as Administrator in several commanderies. -SGZ 23:664.

Shen Huang 審晃 [Yuanrang 元讓]; Wei. Administrator of Jiyin in 172, Shen Huang took a leading role in arranging the restoration of the Spiritual Terrace associated with the temple to the sage Emperor Yao and his mother 堯母. -LS 1:9b, 21:22b.

Shen Jing 沈景; Wu. Having served in the Imperial Censorate, about 131 Shen Jing was sent as Chancellor to Liu Zheng the King of Hejian, who was known for his cruelty and lack of restraint. When he arrived the king received him in informal dress, sitting with his legs apart. The courtiers bowed, but Shen Jing stood upright and asked the guards, "Where is the king?" Told this was the man, he asked how could he be, for the fellow was badly dressed and carried himself poorly. Embarrassed, the king changed his costume, and only then did Shen Jing make obeisance.

Then Shen Jing went to the gate of the city, summoned the king's Tutor and rebuked him for failing in his duty. As he reported the situation to the imperial court, an edict reprimanded the king and his tutor, and

730 Shen Liang

Shen Jing purged the local government, executing twenty of the worst offenders, and releasing a hundred people who had been wrongly imprisoned. Liu Zheng now regretted his previous faults and changed his behaviour.

Despite his high position, Shen Jing lived very simply, and did not permit his family to use the official residence. -HHS 55/45:1808, XC 6:12b.

Shen Liang 沈涼 (d.67). An associate of Liu Jing, King of Guangling, Shen Liang was evidently involved in the king's mistaken attempts at sorcery to gain the imperial throne, and he may have been one of the shamans consulted by Liu Jing. When Liu Jing was disgraced in 67, Shen Liang was executed. -HHS 101/11:3230; MBeck 90:128.

Shen Mi 沈彌. A military officer of Yi province under the Governor Liu Yan, after Liu Yan's death in 194 Shen Mi joined a rebellion against Liu Yan's son Liu Zhang to aid Hu Mao, the new Inspector who had been nominated by the government at Chang'an and who was supported by Liu Biao from Jing province. The insurgents were defeated and Shen Mi and his fellows took refuge in Jing province. -SGZ Shu 1:868.

Shen Min 沈暱. A friend of Gao Dai, about 193 Shen Min assisted him to escape with his mother from Xu Gong the Administrator of Wu commandery. -SGZ Wu 1:1109.

Shen Pei 審配 [Zhengnan 正南] (d.204); Wei. Member of a powerful clan, Shen Pei became Headquarters Officer to Yuan Shao when he took Ji province from Han Fu in 191.

In 199 Shen Pei encouraged the plan to attack Cao Cao, and as Yuan Shao moved south he was left in charge at Ye city. When he arrested a kinsman of Xu You, however, Xu You became angry and went over to Cao Cao at a critical stage of the Guandu campaign in 200. As Yuan Shao's army fled, two of Shen Pei's sons were taken by Cao Cao: Shen Pei's loyalty was questioned but he was defended by his former enemy Pang Ji.

Shen Pei and Pang Ji supported the succession of Yuan Shao's youngest son Shang, as opposed to Shang's elder brother Yuan Tan and his allies Xin Ping and Guo Tu. When Yuan Shao died in 202 they forged a will in favour of Shang and so procured his inheritance.

Shen Pei remained at Ye when Yuan Shang went to aid Yuan Tan in 202, and again as he attacked Yuan Tan in 203. When Cao Cao attacked in 204 he urged Yuan Tan to join against the common enemy, but Yuan Tan refused.

Shen Pei then defended Ye city against Cao Cao for three months. As the city was starved and then stormed Shen Pei was taken alive, but he maintained his loyalty to the Yuan and was executed. -SGZ 6:195-206.

Shen Rong 沈戎 [Weiqing 威卿]; Jiujiang>Kuaiji. XTS 74A:3146 says that Shen Rong was a son of Shen Jing 靖, who had left office and refused to serve Wang Mang.

As an Assistant Officer of Yang province early in Later Han, Shen Rong captured the bandit Yin Liang; he was offered enfeoffment, but declined. He later became Minister of the Household, and moved the family residence south into Kuaiji.

XTS also mentions Shen Rong's brothers Xun 勳 and Tai 臺, but gives no further details.

Shen Rong 審榮; Wei. A nephew of Shen Pei, in 204 Shen Rong was in charge of a gate of Ye city under siege by Cao Cao. One night he opened the gate and let the enemy in. -SGZ 6:202.

Shen Tai 沈臺 see Shen Rong 沈戎.

Shen Xiang 申翔; Liang. A member of the staff of the Court Architect, in 135 Shen Xiang was involved in the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang; see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16:14b.

Shen Xun 沈勳 see Shen Rong 沈戎.

Shen Yao 神曜 was a Commandant of Cavalry. -FSTY 5f:133.

Shen Yi 申儀; Hanzhong. Younger brother of Shen Dan, when Shen Dan surrendered to Liu Bei's forces in 219 Shen Yi went with him, and he also received appointment under Liu Feng. In the following year, however, Liu Feng's colleague Meng Da went over to Cao Pi and returned with an army of the Wei. Shen Yi then rebelled against Liu Feng, who was driven away.

Shen Yi was enfeoffed as a marquis and appointed Administrator of Weixing, in his home territory on the frontier against Liu Bei. He remained there several years, quite independent, and prepared himself an imperial seal with which he made a number of local appointments.

Shen Yi, however, was on bad terms with Meng Da, Administrator of neighbouring Shangyong, and in 227 he accused him of planning to change sides once more. Meng Da was indeed trapped and killed, but the imperial general Sima Yi also arrested Shen Yi for usurping authority. Sent to Luoyang, he was kept at the court with nominal title as a general. -SGZ Shu 10: 991-94, JS 1:5; Fang 52:29-31, 246, 262-263.

Shen You 沈友 [Zizheng 子正] (175-204); Wu. Known for his talent when he was young, Shen You became a noted scholar. He compiled a commentary to the Art of War ascribed to Sun Wu, and was said to have been equally skilled in military arts, in literature and in debate.

Shen You joined Sun Quan about 200 and advised him on strategy, but others spoke against him and Sun Quan lost trust. In 204 he confronted him in open court and Shen You defied him in the name of the emperor of Han. Sun Quan killed him. -SGZ Wu 2:1117.

Shen Zhi 沈稚 of Ba was an Administrator of Yongchang under Later Han. -HYGZ 4:60.

Shen Zhong 審忠; Liang. In 179 Shen Zhong presented a memorial to Emperor Ling, criticising his reliance upon the eunuchs. Predictably, the emperor paid no attention.

Shen Zhong is described by the history as a gentleman cadet 郎中, but he refers to having been in his post for fifteen years. Since a cadet held only probationary office for up to three years, it is more likely that he was a member of the Imperial Secretariat 尚書郎. -HHS 78/68:2526; deC 89:157-159.

Shen Zhuan 申轉; Yingchuan. Brother of the Lady Shen and uncle of Liu Shou, King of Jibei, in 107 the regent Dowager Deng enfeoffed him as marquis of a village. -HHS 55/45:1806.

Shen [Ziju] 沈子琚/子璩; Yingchuan. Appointed Administrator of Guanghan in 174, Shen Ziju had water control works carried out at Mianzhu, and in 176 a stele was set up to commemorate their completion. -LS 15:7b-9b.

Shen [Ziqu] 沈子璩 see Shen Ziju 沈子琚. -LS 27:10a.

Shendu 身毒 of Qiuzi [Kuqa]. About 50 King Xian of Suoju captured Qiuzi, on the north of the Tarim basin. He divided the state into two, appointing his son Ziluo and his officer Sijian as rulers. Some years later the people killed the foreigners, and invited the Xiongnu to appoint a new king from among their own leaders. Shendu was chosen as king of the re-united state, which now allied itself to the Xiongnu. -HHS 88/78:2924.

Sheng 盛 [personal name unknown]; Runan. A neighbour of the Dong family about 30, he killed two brothers in a vendetta. Dong Zizhang wanted to avenge the death of his father and uncle, but became mortally ill. His old friend Zhi Yun came to visit him on his death-bed, and though Dong Zizhang could not speak, he signalled with his eyes and Zhi Yun guessed the source of his distress. Taking a troop of retainers, he attacked the Sheng family, killed the murderer, and presented Dong Zizhang with his head. Dong Zizhang died happy. -HHS 29/19:1027, DGHJ 15:3b.

Sheng 盛 [surname unknown] (d.142); Guanghan. Sheng killed Yang Wen, but the murder was avenged by his daughter the Lady Yang Jingyang. -HYGZ 10C:177.

Sheng 生 [surname unknown]. With rank as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, in 220 he was a sponsor of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. Goodman suggests that he was Wen Sheng, son of Wen Hui q.v., but this seems unlikely, for Wen Sheng did not receive his father's secondary marquisate until some years later. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Sheng 乘 [surname unknown] see Cheng 乘.

Sheng Bao 盛包 (d.115). Administrator of Beidi in 115, Sheng Bao was sent as a subordinate commander under Sima Jun to attack the Qiang rebels and the renegade Du Jigong. They occupied the fortress at Dingxi in northern Beidi, but when Sima Jun sent Sheng Bao and other officers out to collect grain they ignored his orders and allowed their troops to scatter. They were cut off by the rebels and their Qiang allies but Sima Jun, angry at their disobedience, stayed in the city and refused to send help. The Chinese lost over three thousand men, and Sheng Bao died in battle. -HHS 87/77:2889; deC 84:107-108.

Sheng Dao 盛道; Jianwei. In 200 Sheng Dao raised a private troop to join the rebellion of Zhao Wei against the warlord Governor Liu Zhang. The enterprise was unsuccessful, and Sheng Dao was captured. He was due to be executed, but his wife Zhao Yuanjiang took his place. Sheng Dao was able to escape with his five-year-old son Sheng Xiang, but the Lady Zhao was killed. Sheng Dao was later amnestied, and in honour of his wife's sacrifice he never remarried. -HHS 84/74:2799, HYGZ 10B:161.

Sheng Dao 盛道, wife of: see the Lady Zhao Yuanjiang 趙媛姜.

Sheng Ji 盛吉 [Junda 君達]; Kuaiji. As a clerical officer at the capital, Sheng Ji was sent to inspect the imperial prison, and he arranged the release of the wrongly-accused Deng Rong.

Sheng Ji later became a conscientious and sympathetic Minister of Justice. Each winter, when it was time for executions to be carried out, his wife would hold a candle in the evening as Sheng Ji confirmed the sentences with a vermilion brush. Both wept as they worked. -XC 8:4b-5a.

Sheng Jing 盛精. Recommended by Yang Huai/Zhun about 150, Sheng Jing became a member of the Imperial Secretariat. -HYZ 10B:155.

Sheng [Kongshu] 盛孔叔; Runan. Though invited to office at the imperial capital, when their patron the Administrator Li Chang died, Sheng Kongshu and other nominees stayed to carry out his mourning: see sub Li Chang 俛.

Sheng Kuang 盛匡; Kuaiji. Son of Sheng Xian, after his father's death he fled to the north and held a junior military office under Cao Cao. -SGZ Wu 6:1215.

Sheng Liang 盛亮. Administrator of Le'an during the 140s, he was not impressed by Zhou Qiu/Jiu's plea for mercy for his murderous nephew, so the young man died in prison. -FSTY 5:37; Nylan 83:459-460.

Sheng Xian 盛憲 [Xiaozhang 孝章]; Kuaiji. An elegant, imposing man, Sheng Xian was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, joined the Imperial Secretariat, and was a close friend of Kong Rong. He became Administrator of Wu, but left office about 193, and his former officer Gao Dai arranged for him to take refuge from the troubled times with the local leader Xu Zhao. One account says that Sheng Xian was taken ill; another suggests that his successor Xu Gong took over by force, and Gao Dai persuaded the warlord Tao Qian of Xu province to give him a show of support so that Xu Gong would not press him further.

As Sun Ce took over the lower Yangzi, he saw Sheng Xian's high reputation as a threat to his own authority, and though Sheng Xian was not killed at that time he was always under threat. Kong Rong persuaded Cao Cao to offer him an imperial office which might serve as some protection, but about 202, before the commission had arrived in the south, Sheng Xian was killed by Sun Quan [see later sub Dai Yuan and Gui Lan]. -SGZ Wu 6:1214-15, 1:1105, 1109.

Sheng Xian 盛暹; Wu. About 216 Sheng Xian was recommended to Sun Quan as potentially superior in ability to his commander Ling Tong. Sun Quan remarked that he would be happy if he were as good as Ling Tong. For his part, when Sheng Xian came to headquarters Ling Tong made a point of welcoming him.

Sheng Xian is not heard of again. -SGZ 10:1297.

Sheng Xiang 盛翔; Jianwei. Son of Sheng Dao, when Sheng Xiang was five years old his father was guilty of some offence. His mother the Lady Zhao Yuanjiang persuaded Sheng Dao to escape with him in order to maintain the family line; she herself accepted execution. Father and son later returned home after an amnesty, but Sheng Xiang never accepted office. -HHS 84/74:2799, HYZ 10B:161.

Sheng Xiu 盛修. In 162, as Shang Xiu was Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate, a rebellion broke in Changsha and Lingling, extended into Guiyang and then south into Cangwu, Nanhai, and Jiaozhi commandery. The Inspector of Jiaozhi and the Administrator of Cangwu abandoned their positions, and their territory was overrun.

Sheng Xiu was sent to raise troops and deal with the insurgency. He gained no success, while a group of conscripts from Yuzhang, who had not been paid, mutinied and plundered Changsha. -HHS 7:310, 38/28:1285.

Sheng Yuan 盛元 see Sheng Yun 盛允. -XHS 4:12b.

Sheng Yun 盛允 [Boshi 伯世]; Liang. After the destruction of Liang Ji in 159, Sheng Yun was promoted from Minister Herald to Excellency of Works. In 160 he was made Excellency over the Masses, but a few months later he left office, probably on account of pestilence and a series of fires in the palace.

Sheng Yun died during the 160s. His tomb was marked by a shrine and a stele. -HHS 7:306-08, SJZ 23:16b.

FSTY 5:36; Nylan 83:494 says that Sheng Yun admired the quality of Fan Pang and wanted to gain his good will. He offered to get some appointment for his father Fan Xian, but Fan Pang rejected his overtures. [The text describes Shen Yun as a Consultant at the time, but it is more probable that he was an Excellency, for it was unusual that a Consultant could make significant recommendations for office.]

HHS 7:306 TC says that Sheng Yun's style was Bodai 伯代, but the text was probably changed from Boshi to avoid taboo on the personal name of Li Shimin 李世民, second Emperor of Tang. FSTY has the style as Zipian 子翮, but this seems to be an error. Sheng [Zhongming] 盛仲明; Chenliu. Presumably during the 160s, Guo Tai wrote to Sheng Zhongming observing that he and his fellows were the "beams and rafters" 棟梁 of the age. -YSS:18b.

Shentu Chen 申屠臣; Nanyang. Half-brother to Li Tong by the same mother, Shentu Chen was a doctor, but he was killed by Liu Bosheng about 21. In 22, when Li Tong and Li Yi wanted to form an alliance with Liu Bosheng for a rebellion against Wang Mang, Shentu Chen's death represented an unresolved cause for vendetta. Both sides, however, agreed to ignore it. -DGJJ 1:2a [where the surname appears as Gongsun 公孫], DGJJ 10:5a, XHS 2:4b.

Shentu Gang 申屠剛 [Juqing 巨卿]; Youfufeng. A descendant of Shentu Jia 申屠嘉, Imperial Chancellor to Emperor Wen in the second century BC, Shentu Gang was a man of strong Confucian principles. He became Officer of Merit in his commandery, and in the time of Emperor Ping he was nominated as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright; he took the occasion to present a long memorial criticising the dominance of the government by Wang Mang and his exclusion of other distaff kinsmen of the young emperor. Predictably, Wang Mang's aunt the regent Dowager declared his arguments false, and Shentu Gang was sent back home.

When Wang Mang took the imperial title in 9 AD Shentu Gang left for the west. At first he was in Ba and Shu commanderies, but in the mid-20s he took service with the warlord regime of Wei Ao. Loyal to Han, he argued without success against Wei Ao's temporising with Gongsun Shu. In 30, evidently at the suggestion of his fellow-countryman Du Lin, who had already left Wei Ao and taken service with Han, Shentu Gang received an invitation from Emperor Guangwu. As he left he wrote urging Wei Ao, again unsuccessfully, to make terms with the restored empire.

Arriving in Luoyang, Shentu Gang was made an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate, and then Director of the Secretariat. He maintained his rigid attitudes: on one occasion, as Guangwu was planning an excursion for pleasure, he objected because the west of the empire was still not settled; the emperor rejected his advice, but Shentu Gang then lay down in front of the carriage until Guangwu gave up the idea.

More generally, he protested many times at the emperor's influence in the selection of officials, based upon personal preference; and he sought a greater degree of independence for the Heir, Liu Qiang, in the choice of his courtiers and officials. These unpopular arguments reduced Shentu Gang's favour, and he was sent away to become a magistrate in Henan. He returned to court as a Palace Counsellor, but then left on account of illness and died at home. -HHS 29/19: 1011-16*; Bn 79:60, 69.

Shentu Jian 申屠建 (d.25); Nanyang. Of gentry family, Shentu Jian spent time at Chang'an as a student of the Classic of History under Cui Fa 崔發. When Liu Xuan took title as Gengshi Emperor in 23, Shentu Jian was appointed a special commissioner, and he urged the new ruler to kill Liu Bosheng, former leader of the rebellion.

Later that year Shentu Jian was named a chief general and given joint command with Li Song over the army which advanced through the Wu Pass to join Deng Ye and Yu Kuang in attacking Chang'an. After victory over the Nine Tiger army of Wang Mang at the mouth of the Wei, the army halted at the Capital Granary, and by the time they reached the capital the city had fallen and Wang Mang had been killed by irregulars under Wang Xian.

Shentu Jian had the leaders of the fallen regime executed, including his former tutor Cui Fa, who had been an Excellency. He also killed Wang Xian for lese-majesty, and he destroyed the local strongman Yuan She. In these circumstances, when he refused to grant any honours to the local chieftains who had stormed Chang'an, arguing that they had betrayed Wang Mang, the leaders of the region became anxious and gathered troops to defend themselves.

Shentu Jian now urged the Gengshi Emperor to shift his capital to Chang'an as a means to settle the people, and early in 24 the emperor did indeed move from Luoyang to the western capital. Shentu Jian was enfeoffed as king of a county in Nanyang.

In the summer of 25, as the Red Eyebrows were advancing from the east and Liu Xiu's general Deng Yu threatened from the north, Shentu Jian joined Wei Ao and others in urging the Gengshi Emperor to abdicate in favour of Liu Liang, uncle of Liu Xiu. When the emperor refused, Shentu Jian and Wei Ao conspired against him with the chieftains Zhang Ang and Liao Zhan. The plot was discovered, and the emperor called in the leaders, intending to kill them. Wei Ao refused to attend, and others became suspicious and left the gathering, but Shentu Jian stayed. He was taken and executed. -HHS 11/A:469-74; Bn 54:120-128, Bn 59: 20, 97-99.

Shentu Pan 申屠蟠 or 申徒蟠 [Zilong 子龍 or Ziling 子陵]; Chenliu. Shentu Pan came of poor family and his father died when he was nine. Shentu Pan distinguished himself by an excess of grief and mourning: he took no wine or meat for more than ten years, and on the anniversary of the death he would not eat at all for three days. It was said his father's tomb produced sweet dew 甘露 and a white pheasant in honour of his filial virtue.

At the age of fifteen Shentu Pan went to the county magistrate Liang Pei and persuaded him to obtain a pardon for the Lady Gou Yu, who had killed a man in vendetta. He later worked as an artisan in lacquer while attending the University at Luoyang. When his fellow-student Wang Ziju died he entrusted his remains to Shentu Pan, who took the corpse back to Wang's home country in Jiyin. As he was leaving he met an officer of the capital province who was impressed by Shentu Pan's piety and gave him an official tally to provide assistance. Shentu Pan threw it away and carried out the journey privately, then returned to his studies.

Shentu Pan became widely learned in the Confucian classics, apocrypha and the charts of divination. He was admired by Guo Tai and Cai Yong and was offered appointment by his commandery and province and in the offices of the Excellencies at the capital, but he refused all invitations and lived in seclusion.

In 165 the former Grand Commandant Huang Qiong died, and though Shentu Pan had not been willing to take appointment under him, he nonetheless attended his funeral in Jiangxia; he continued to refuse invitations to office. He was later nominated as Knowing the Way and was given a special escort to the capital, but he made his escape and fled.

Shentu Pan likewise disapproved of the reform party of moral Confucianists and their student supporters led by such men as Fan Pang, foretelling trouble when scholars out of office sought to take part in political affairs; the last time that had led to the persecution and burning of the books in the time of Qin. He retired to the wilderness, lived in a hut amongst the trees, and dealt only with local working people. As the Proscription crisis developed in 167 and 169, Shentu Pan was unaffected.

In the late 180s the General-in-Chief He Jin had his fellow-countryman Huang Zhong write to Shentu Pan with arguments why he should accept office. He made no reply, and even when there was a special call-up in 188 he still would not go. As Dong Zhuo seized power in 189 he summoned Shentu Pan and several others, indicating that he was prepared to use force to make them come. Shentu Pan laughed, ignored the summons and died at home.

As Vervorm observes, Shentu Pan was "an unusual mixture of stern Confucian scholar and ... social hermit." -HHS 53/43:1750-54*, XC 3:4a-b & 10a; Vervorm 90:178, 187.

Shentu Xiong 申屠熊; Yingchuan. Evidently the successor to Xian Fang, in 181 and 183 Shentu Xiong was Chief Clerk to Feng Xun, Chancellor of Changshan. He was associated in the setting up of two stele to a ridge of the Taihang Ranges known as Three Excellencies Mountain 三公山. -LS 3:21b-22a.

Shentu Xiong 申屠夔; Chenliu. A client of Cai Yong, Shentu Xiong commended to him the young but filial Cheng Wei. -Cai 8:2.

Shentu Zhi 申屠志. A follower of Liu Xuan the Gengshi Emperor, he was enfeoffed as a king but, believing that only those who held the imperial Liu surname should be granted royal rank, he returned his insignia and received a marquissate instead. -DGHJ 23: 2b.

Commentary to this text observes that the name of Shentu Zhi does not appear in HHS, while Zhu Wei is the only person recorded as having rejected a royal fief on such grounds. The citation may represent a confusion of Zhu Wei and Shentu Jian qq.v.

Sheqiu Bing 蛇丘炳 is cited by FSTY 6f:137.

Sheqiu Huo 蛇丘惑 became Administrator of Henei. FSTY 6f:137.

Shi 郗 [surname] see Chi 郗 passim.

Shi 郝 [surname] see Hao 郝 passim

Shi 適 (d.63); Xiongnu. Son of the founding Southern Shanyu Bi, Shi succeeded his uncle Han in 59, taking the title Xitong shizuhou di 醯幢尸逐侯鞬 Shanyu. In the winter of 62, with the support of local Chinese forces from Xihe, Shi led his troops to repel a force of several thousand Northern Xiongnu who had come to plunder Wuyuan and Yunzhong. -HHS 89/79:2948.

Shi, Lord 史侯 see Liu Bian the Little Emperor, and sub Shi Zimiao. -HHS 10B:449.

Shi, Marquis of 式侯: see Liu Gong 劉恭.

Shi Bao 史苞 [Shuwen 叔文]; Youfufeng. When Dou Rong was appointed to the northwest of Liang province in 23, he established a good relationship with Shi Bao the Commandant of Zhangye. As the Gengshi regime collapsed at Chang'an in 25, Shi Bao and his colleagues accepted Dou Rong's leadership. The Administrator Ren Zhong left the region and Shi Bao took his place.

As Dou Rong brought his army east to assist Emperor Guangwu's attack on Wei Ao in 32, Shi Bao and his fellows were given titles as marquises. -HHS 23/13:796-97, 806.

Shi Bi 史弼 [Gongqian 公謙]; Chenliu. Son of Shi Chang, as a young man Shi Bi was known for his scholarship and attracted several hundred students. At the age of twenty he became Officer of Merit in his commandery, and was admired for purging more than a hundred bad officials who had been appointed by the previous Administrator Song Xin.

Shi Bi held local office in the province, and was later recruited into the offices at the capital. He became Adjutant of the Northern Army, then a member of the Imperial Secretariat. Sent out as Administrator of Shanyang, he married the Lady Xue of that commandery. In accordance with the San-hu 三互 regulations, men were not permitted to hold office in a province to which they were connected by marriage. Shi Bi duly sent in a report asking for transfer, and was appointed Chancellor of Pingyuan. He treated powerful families firmly but was lenient to common people who fell foul of the law. The King of Pingyuan, Liu Shi, a brother of Emperor Huan, was frequently drunk and unable to carry out his duties, so his father's widow the Lady Ma generally had charge of his affairs.

About 165, however, Shi Bi sent in a sealed memorial to complain of the conduct of Liu Kui, also a brother of the emperor, who was ruler of the neighbouring state of Bohai. Shi Bi alleged that Liu Kui disobeyed the law, that he held orgies of music and wine, and his companions were irresponsible and dissolute. He claimed that the Tutor, the Chancellor and provincial authorities were unwilling or unable to take corrective action, and he pressed for an outside investigation and punitive reform. The emperor would not agree, but soon afterwards Liu Kui was accused of planning rebellion.

In making this complaint Shi Bi acted outside his jurisdiction, while Liu Kui's later misfortunes were largely due to Emperor Huan's eunuch favourites. It is doubtful whether Shi Bi intended to assist Liu Kui's enemies, but as the memorial evidently came to general knowledge at the court, his well-meant interference helped to justify later attacks on a possible heir to the throne, and did a good deal to damage the dynasty.

At the time of the First Faction Incident of 166-167, when heads of commandery units were ordered to send in reports on those involved, Shi Bi was the only one who gave no information. The authorities of Qing province sent an officer to make enquiries, but Shi Bi claimed that even if all other territories in the province had problems, his state did not, and he would not make false accusations. The officer arrested some junior officers of the commandery and reported Shi Bi, but soon afterwards the tension eased and Shi Bi was able to pay his way out of trouble. He had saved more than a thousand people.

Shi Bi later became Administrator of Hedong. The palace eunuch Hou Lan sent a number of his clients with a letter asking that they be nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and also seeking a share in the official salt revenue. At first they were unable to gain audience, but they then claimed to be concerned with some other matter and so presented the letter. Angry at the deception and the attempt to interfere with his government, Shi Bi had the men arrested and flogged. His assistant and local officers protested, but Shi Bi sent the men to prison and had them questioned by torture until they died.

Hou Lan, furious, made false accusations to the Director of Retainers, head of the province, and Shi Bi was brought to court in a cage cart. He was condemned to death, but Wei Shao, one of his former nominees, and other men from Pingyuan sold the commandery residence at Luoyang to pay a bribe to Hou Lan [but see sub Wei Shao]. Shi Bi's death sentence was commuted by one degree.

Having served as a convict labourer, Shi Bi was released and returned to his home. Closing his gates, he claimed to be ill, but after several invitations from Excellencies and other senior officials he returned to court as a Consultant, much to the anger of Hou Lan and his fellows.

About 180 Shi Bi was made Chancellor of Pengcheng, where he restrained powerful local families. He died in that office. -HHS 64/54:2108-12*, XC 4:1b; deC 89:55-56, 85-86, 345-346.

Shi Cen 史岑 [Xiaoshan 孝山]. Probably a member of the history office, about 118 Shi Cen composed a hymn to the virtues of the Dowager Deng. -Yao Zhenzong: 2416.

Shi Chang 史敞; Chenliu. Known for his skill in rhetoric, in the time of Emperor Shun Shi Chang was a member of the Imperial Secretariat and associated with a conservative group led by the Deputy Director Hu Guang. In 132, when the emperor was to choose an empress, there were four Honoured Ladies who had received his favour. It was suggested the decision should be made by lot, in order that spiritual powers might be involved, but Shi Chang joined Hu Guang and Guo Qian in protest, arguing that there was no precedent for such a method of selection, and the decision should be based upon quality of lineage. So the Lady Liang Na was chosen, and the Liang family began its rise to domination of the court and the government.

Later that year the Director of the Secretariat, Zuo Xiong, proposed tightening the processes of selection for office. Shi Chang, Hu Guang and Guo Qian argued that the current system worked well and was supported by a majority of officials, but the emperor approved the reforms.

Later, Shi Chang unsuccessfully recommended Hu Guang as Administrator of Chenliu, and was himself appointed Intendant of Jingzhao. His government, based upon moral teachings, was widely admired. - HHS 44/34:1505, 64/54:2108.

Shi Chen 史晨 [Boshi 伯時]; Henan. Having served as a colonel in the Northern Army, Shi Chen became Chancellor of Lu in 168. In the following year he sought permission to make offerings at the Temple of Confucius, and carried out the ceremony a few weeks later. An inscription commemorated the event. - LS 1: 25a-29a, 21:23a-b, Nagata 94:178-80.

Shi Chong 史充. In 96 Shi Chong was transferred from Administrator of Hanyang to be Protector of the Qiang. He led troops of the Loyal Auxiliary out of the frontier to attack the Qiang warlord Mitang, but they were heavily defeated. Next year Shi Chong was dismissed. - HHS 87/77:2883.

Shi Chong 世寵 was Commandant of Jiujiang. - FSTY 5f:120.

Shi Ci 士賜; Cangwu. Shi Ci's family claimed to have come to the far south from Lu during the civil war at the beginning of Later Han. About 160 Shi Ci became Administrator of Rinan. - SGZ Wu 4:1191.

Shi [Delin] 石德林 see Han Pin 寒貧.

Shi Fan 士汎. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Shi Fan took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county fief in Nan commandery.

In 127, after Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang, he and Shi Fan and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in the following year the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital.

Shi Fan was later one of a group of eunuchs associated with the former wet-nurse Song E. Found guilty in 137 of corruption and making false accusations, they were again sent out to their fiefs and their pensions were reduced by a quarter. - HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Shi Fu 士輔 i.e. Shi Kuang 士匡. - ZZTJ 70:2231. Sima Guang used the synonym fu 輔 to avoid taboo on the personal name of the founder of his own Song dynasty, Zhao Kuangyin 趙匡胤; Fang 52:221.

Shi Guang 石光 (d.139?). A eunuch, in 139 Shi Guang was Prefect of Valets 內者令 to Emperor Shun. He joined the Regular Attendant Zhang Kui and others in claiming that the father of the empress Liang Shang, together with their rival eunuchs Cao Teng and Meng Ben were planning to depose the emperor. Emperor Shun doubted the story, and when the conspirators had Cao Teng and Meng Ben arrested he became furious and had them killed. - HHS 6:268, 43/24:1176, 101/1A: 3245 [the last says that some committed suicide and others escaped].

Shi Huan 史渙 [Gongliu 公劉] (d.209); Pei. Bravo leader of a troop, Shi Huan was an early follower of Cao Cao. In 199 he defeated and killed Sui Gu in Henei, taking over his soldiers. In 200 he joined Xu Huang to destroy a convoy of Yuan Shao's supplies. He was given a trusted police office in the army and was enfeoffed. - SGZ 9:269-70.

Shi Huang 史璜. Administrator of Cangwu and an associate of Shi Xie and his brothers, he died about 204. - SGZ Wu 4:1192.

Shi Hui 士黼; Cangwu. Younger brother of Shi Xie and Shi Yi, he became a magistrate in Hepu. In the 190s he was named Administrator of Jiuzhen as part of the family control in the far south, but he evidently retired from that position about 220: see Dan Meng. When the sons of Shi Xie were destroyed by Lü Dai in 226, Shi Hui had his property confiscated and was reduced to commoner status. A few years later he was executed for some crime. - SGZ Wu 4:1191-93.

Shi Hui 士徽 (d.226); Cangwu. Son of Shi Xie, after his father's death in 226 he attempted to set himself and his brothers up in the region of present-day Vietnam independently of Sun Quan and his local ruler Lü Dai. Lü Dai, however, brought a powerful army against them.

Lü Dai was a friend of Shi Hui's cousin Shi Kuang and had appointed him to his personal staff. He sent him as an envoy to persuade Shi Hui and his brothers to surrender, assuring them of good treatment. They came to Lü Dai's camp, but he killed them next morning. - SGZ Wu 4:1193; Fang 52:205-206, 220-221.

Shi Ji 史跡. A Palace Attendant in 195, Shi Ji accompanied Emperor Xian in his escape from Chang'an. As the imperial party reached, Hedong Shi Ji and the Minister Coachman Han Rong were sent back to Li Jue and Guo Si in Hongnong; they negotiated the release of officials and palace people who had been held prisoner. -HHSJJ 9:352 and 72/62:2565 Hui Dong quoting Xiandi chunqiu.

Shi [Jianyuan] 史堅元; Chenliu. During the troubles of the early 190s Shi Jianyuan went to Xu province. The Inspector Tao Qian initially treated the refugees well, but later turned on them and had Shi Jianyuan and his colleague Xiang Zhonghua arrested. -HHJ 27:329.

Shi Jing 史靜; Pei. Son of Shi Huan, he succeeded to his fief in 209. -SGZ 9:270.

Shi Jingping 石敬平. A student at Luoyang, Shi Jingping died of spring fever after a winter chill 溫病. His fellow-student Dai Feng brought his coffin and all his possessions to Shi Jingping's home. -HHS 81/71:2683.

Shi Jun 史軍, the Lady; Yingchuan. When her son Shi Yu was found guilty of murder about 120, the Lady went to the prison and asked to take his place. She was duly strangled. See also sub Shu Yu. -HHS 48/38:1610.

Shi Kou 石口 was a successful and influential Administrator of Yanmen. -XC 7:10a.

Shi Kuang 士匡; Cangwu. Son of Shi Yi, he was named General of the Household by Sun Quan and became a friend of Lü Dai, Inspector of Jiao province.

In 226 Shi Kuang went as emissary for Lü Dai to persuade Shi Hui 徽 and other cousins, sons of Shi Xie, to surrender to mercy. Lü Dai, however, promptly killed them, while Shi Kuang was deprived of his property and reduced to commoner status. -SGZ Wu 4:1193; Fang 52:205-206.

Shi Liang 師亮; Anding. A man of wealthy family, about 195 he acted as patron to Su Ze, a refugee from Youfufeng. He did not, however, treat Su Ze well, and Su Ze foretold that he would return as Administrator and would take revenge.

Some years later Su Ze was indeed appointed as Administrator, and Shi Liang and his associates prepared to flee. Su Ze, however, sent messengers to reassure them, and he treated them with courtesy. - SGZ 16:491.

Shi Lu 史路. A student of Yue Yin, when his teacher was killed in Luoyang in 189 he joined Qian Zhao to escort the body home. As they were attacked by bandits, Shi Lu and his fellows ran away, but Qian Zhao stayed his ground and persuaded the robbers to leave his master's coffin intact. -SGZ 26:730.

Shi Miao 時苗 [Dezhou 德青]; Julu. When he was young, Shi Miao was known for his good conduct, though many people disliked him for it. About 208 Cao Cao appointed him to his Imperial Chancellor's offices and he later became county magistrate of Shouchun, capital of Jiujiang, where his influence spread widely.

At that time Shouchun was close to the frontier against Sun Quan and served as the headquarters of the administration of Yang province. Shi Miao went to pay a courtesy call upon Jiang Ji, who was Attendant Officer to the Investigator, but Jiang Ji was too drunk to receive him. Angry at the slight, Shi Miao set up a carved wooden figure in his courtyard, labelled it "the Drunkard Jiang Ji" "酒徒蔣濟" and shot arrows at it morning and evening. The provincial and commandery offices recognised that such conduct was out of order, but since Shi Miao carried out his other duties more effectively than anyone else they took no action.

When Shi Miao first took up his office he rode in a screened carriage drawn by a yellow female ox. After some years she gave birth to a calf, and as Shi Miao was called back to the capital he left the calf behind, telling his Registrar that he could no longer keep it, for it belonged in its home country. Everyone said that the calf had no comprehension of where it was meant to be, and should follow its mother, but Shi Miao insisted; he became known for his eccentricity.

After a period of appointment as Court Provisioner, Shi Miao went to his home commandery as Impartial and Just 中正, a new position established by Cao Cao to identify future officials. He particularly sought out men of generous spirit, and would emphasise the faults and disqualify those who did not show such sensitivity.

Shi Miao's old enemy Jiang Ji later became Grand Commandant of the empire of Wei, but Jiang Ji never held his insults against him, and Shi Miao did not alter his attitude now that Jiang Ji had risen so high. After several years in the provinces, Shi Miao became Commissioner for Agriculture, with responsibility for agricultural colonies. He died in the 240s, aged over seventy. -SGZ 23:662-63.

Shi Pin 石貧 see Han Pin 寒貧.

Shi Qi 史祈. Administrator of Yingchuan, he and his dead ancestors had an embarrassing encounter with the magician Liu Gen. -HHS 82/72B:2746; Ngo 76:137-138, DeWoskin 83:83. [Shenxian zhuan, however, ascribes Liu Gen to the Former Han period, and says that the Administrator who dealt with him had the surname Zhang 張.]

Shi Qian 師遷 (d.173). In 173 Shi Qian was Acting Chancellor to Liu Chong, King of Chen. He reported that the king and his former Chancellor Wei Yin had held ceremonies asking the deities for inappropriate good fortune; this was Impiety.

Shi Qian and Wei Yin were brought to the capital by cage-cart and were examined by the eunuch Wang Fu, together with the Director of the Imperial Secretariat and the censors. They found that the ceremonies had not been correct, but there was no question of Impiety; Shi Qian had laid false information against his king.

Both Shi Qian and Wei Yin were executed, but an edict ordered there should be no further investigation of Liu Chong. -HHS 8:334-35, 50/40:1669.

Shi Qian 石謙; Jianwei. In 203 Shi Qian and his fellow-countryman Cheng Zheng persuaded the Governor Liu Zhang to divide Jianwei and set up the new commandery of Jiangyang. -HYGZ 3:40, HYGZJBTZ:180.

Shi Ran 施然 see Zhu Ran 朱然.

Shi Ren 士仁 [Junyi 君義]; Guangyang. As Guan Yu attacked Cao Cao's positions north up the Han in 219, the general Shi Ren held command of the garrison at Gong'an in Nan commandery. There was some confusion about supplies, and Guan Yu promised to punish Shi Ren and his colleague Mi Fang at Jiangling when he returned. As a result, when Lü Meng of Wu came up the Yangzi in a surprise attack both men were willing to surrender. -SGZ Shu 6:941, 15:1090, SGZ

Wu 2:1120, 9:1278.

SGZ Shu 6 has the surname of this man as Fushi 傅士, but the other texts refer to him as Shi Ren. It is likely that the character fu is a mistaken addition.

Shi [Shubin] 史叔賓; Chenliu. About 160 Shi Shubin was generally regarded as a young man of talent, but Guo Tai thought him insubstantial. He later lost his reputation, for having composed false encomiums to flatter those in power. -HHS 68/58:2230.

Shi Shuo 世碩 wrote books. -FSTY 5f:120.

Shi Su 詩素; Jiaozhi. Shi Su was the husband of Zheng Ce [Tr'ung Trac], the daughter of a non-Chinese chieftain who rebelled in the region of present-day Vietnam in 40. Shi Su is not identified as a tribesman, so he may have been Han Chinese; he does not appear to have played a leading role in the uprising, so he may have died by the time of the enterprise. -HHS 86/76:2836.

Shi Tao 石韜 [Guangyuan 廣元]; Yingchuan. A fellow student and close friend of Xu Shu, he went with him during the 190s to take refuge in Jing province, where they studied under Sima Hui. Among their colleagues were Pang Tong and Zhuge Liang, and Shi Tao was among those who recognised Zhuge Liang's particular abilities.

As Cao Cao came to Jing province in 208 Shi Tao went with Xu Shu to join him. He served as head of a number of commanderies, and was later a Colonel in Charge of Agriculture 典農校尉 with responsibility for agricultural colonies 屯田. Zhuge Liang always recalled him with admiration. -SGZ Shu 5:911-12, 914.

Shi Tong 史佟. A member of the Imperial Secretariat during the 160s, Shi Tong was an associate of the palace eunuchs Guan Ba and Su Kang. -HHS 103/13:3283

Shi Wei 石鮪; Dai. A local leader, he took title as a general in the early years of civil war, but was forced out of Dai commandery by the forces of Emperor Guangwu. He and Min Kan then re-established themselves in the area of Wuyuan and Shuofang, north of the Ordos, and in 28, under the aegis of the Shanyu of the Xiongnu, they were brought into the alliance of leaders which supported Lu Fang's claim to the throne of Han. Shi Wei is not heard of again. -HHS 12/2:506.

Shi Wei 士韜 see Shi Hui 士黈.

Shi [Weize] 石威則. Some time after the time of the defeat of Yuan Shao at Guandu in late 200, Xiahou Dun wrote to Shi Weize referring to Zhang Jin holding office in Lingling and Guiyang commanderies. Nothing more is known of Shi Weize. -SGZ Wu 1:1110 PC quoting Zhi lin; deC 90:206.

Shi Wu 士武; Cangwu. Youngest brother of Shi Xie, in the 190s Shi Wu was named Administrator of Nanhai as part of the family control in the far south. When he died soon afterwards, the family lost its authority over the Pearl River region. -SGZ Wu 4:1191-92.

Shi Xiajun 史夏君. Inspector of Yang province in the 30s, Shi Xiajun appointed Zhongli Yi as his Assistant Officer resident in Jiujiang and later recommended him to the court. -HHSJJ 41/3A:1493 Hui Dong quoting the Secondary Biography of Zhongli Yi.

Shi Xian 是憲; Henan. Officer of Merit at Luoyang in the time of Emperor Zhang, Shi Xian had a man killed; his crime was found out by the Prefect Fang Chu. -XC 7:1b.

Shi Xie 士燮 [Weiyan 威彦] (137-226); Cangwu. Son of Shi Ci, he attended the University at Luoyang, was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, and joined the Imperial Secretariat.

Returning home at his father's death, he received provincial nomination as Abundant Talent, served as a magistrate in Nan commandery and then, in the 180s, became Administrator of Jiaozhi. Like his father, Shi Xie was head of a commandery in his native province: this was formally not permitted, but evidently reflects the local importance of the family and the distance from the central government.

When the Inspector Zhu Fu was killed early in the 190s, Shi Xie was able to name his brothers Yi, Wei and Wu as Administrators of Hepu, Jiuzhen and Nanhai respectively. Civil war had broken out in the north, and the court was in no position to object. With his family connections in Cangwu, and no doubt influence in Rinan from his father's former posting there, Shi Xie dominated the far south. His capital at Longbian, near present-day Hanoi, was an important trading centre, the prosperity, scholarship and splendour of his court were celebrated, and his territory became a refuge for emigrants from the troubles of the north. There was prosperous tribute/trade in goods from the south seas, and also contact into Yi province, which apparently sent horses overland from western China. [Some scholars identify Longbian with the Cattigara/Kattigara of Ptolemy, but other suggestions range from Hangzhou to Singapore.]

The death of Shi Wu about 200 reduced the dominance of the family in the Pearl River basin, and various northern leaders attempted to establish a position of their own there. Shi Xie, contenting himself with the western part of the region, made contact with the court under Cao Cao, receiving enfeoffment and title as a general.

When Sun Quan's nominee as Inspector of Jiao province, Bu Zhi, came to Nanhai in 211, Shi Xie offered him formal recognition, and in 217 he sent his son Xin as hostage to Sun Quan. Shi Xie, now elderly, was evidently concerned only with a minimal maintenance of his local authority. He offered little resistance to the encroachment of Sun Quan's officials in the east, and after the death of his officer Dan Meng in Jiuzhen he lost control of that territory too.

With his power restricted to Jiaozhi commandery in the Red River basin about present-day Hanoi, Shi Xie died in 226 at the age of ninety. His family was soon afterwards destroyed by Lü Dai, but Shi Xie is remembered by the Vietnamese, under the name of Si Nhiêp/King Si, as an early hero of their people. -SGZ Wu 4:1191-93*; deC 90, Taylor 83, Holmgren 80, Schafer 67:99.

Shi Xin 史歆 (d.42); Shu. Some time an officer under Cen Peng, Shi Xin later held military office at Chengdu, capital of Shu commandery, on behalf of Han. He resented the brutality with which Wu Han had treated his native commandery during the campaign of conquest against Gongsun Shu in 36, and in the spring of 42 he led a mutiny. Driving away the Administrator Zhang Mu, Shi Xin took title as Grand Marshal and sent out summons of recruitment. Yang Wei and Xu Rong raised several thousand men in Ba commandery to support him.

Concerned at the spread of the rebellion and at the fact that Shi Xin was an experienced soldier, Emperor Guangwu sent Wu Han with Liu Shang, Zang Gong and ten thousand men to deal with him. Approaching through Wudu, Wu Han called up troops from Guanghan, Ba and Shu, and laid siege to Chengdu. After three months, the city fell in the autumn and Shi Xin was executed. Wu Han then sailed downriver to destroy Yang Wei and Xu Rong. The victory was celebrated by a special imperial amnesty for Yi province. -HHS 18/8:683, 1B:69-70, HYZG 5:70.

Shi Xin 士歆; Cangwu. Son of Shi Xie, about 220 he was sent as hostage to Sun Quan and was named Administrator of the new capital commandery at Wuchang, present-day Echeng/Ezhou in Hubei.

After the death of his father in 226 and the destruction of the family power in the south by Lü Dai, Shi Xin was reduced to commoner status. He died soon afterwards, leaving no children, but his impoverished wife received a grant from the state. -SGZ Wu 4:1191-92.

Shi Xing 史興 (d.36). Son-in-law of Gongsun Shu, at the beginning of 36 he was sent with five thousand men to relieve Wuyang city, south of Chengdu, which was besieged by the Han forces under Wu Han. His troops were defeated and Shi Xing was killed. -HHS 18/8:681; Bn 59:194.

Shi Xiu 石修. In 75 Shi Xiu was a major under the Wu Colonel Geng Gong in Further Jushi, north of the Bogda range and east of present-day Urumqi. Their small force was attacked by a great army of the Xiongnu, and Geng Gong and his troops defended themselves with utmost courage for fully a year. Early in 76 the remnant garrison was relieved, though only thirteen men returned alive to Dunhuang. In a campaign during which hundreds of lower ranks perished, one may note that the commander and two of his majors, the next senior officers, survived.

The gallant and ferocious defence was widely admired, but the heroes were not treated generously. Shi Xiu became Assistant Magistrate of the Markets 市丞 at Luoyang. -HHS 19/9:723.

Shi Xu 石勛 [Zicai 子才]; Ganling. A distaff kinsman of Bi Feng of Wu, about 180 Shi Xu composed an inscription in his honour. -LS 9:20b-23a, 25:12b.

Shi Xun 史循, As Court Physician, Shi Xun was permitted to stay in the inner part of the palace. One cold night he was taken by an intestinal cramp. He wanted fire but could not get any. Some attendants blew on his back to keep him warm, and by morning he had recovered. -XC 8:4a. [This story is almost word-for-word the same as for the Physician Pi Xun in the time of Emperor Ming, recorded by DGHJ. One of the incidents must be dittography.]

Shi Yan 施延 [Junzi 君子 or Junping 君平]; Pei. A young man of humble family, Shi Yan was an earnest student of the Confucian classics and also of divination by the stars and by the wind. He travelled with his elderly mother to Lujiang and then to Kuaiji, where he supported her by working as a farm labourer. The Investigator Feng Fu appreciated his quality, and in 121 Shi Yan was nominated as Knowing the Way. Graded

First Class, he was appointed a Palace Attendant.

In 123 the Internuncio Dan Song proposed that the official Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar should be changed to use a jiayin 甲寅 year [cycle number 51] as base (Sivin 69:59: "working epoch") rather than a guisi 庚巳 year [cycle number 30]; this would accord with the apocrypha. Shi Yan's arguments in favour of the idea were supported by a majority, but Zhang Heng and other rationalists claimed the amendments would only add errors and that the apocrypha were unworthy of serious attention. Many others, including the Director of the Secretariat Chen Zhong, also opposed change, so the existing calendar was retained.

In 124 Shi Yan joined the demonstration led by Lai Li at the palace Gate of the Vast Capital to protest the dismissal of the Heir Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. The demonstrators achieved no success, but their support was appreciated, and after Liu Bao had been brought to the throne at the end of 125, Shi Yan and several of his colleagues were rewarded with high office and granted the ren right to nominate their sons as cadet gentlemen.

In 133 Shi Yan was promoted from Minister Herald to be Grand Commandant, but he was dismissed two years later on the grounds that he had recommended unworthy men for office. He died at the age of seventy-six. -HHS 6:263-265, 15/5:591-93, 46/36:1557-58, 92/2:3034, XC 7:10a-b.

Shi Yi 士異, the Lady, see Wang Yi 王異.

Shi Yi 士壹; Cangwu. Younger brother of Shi Xie, he served as an Investigator in his home commandery. In 188 was invited to Luoyang to become a clerk under Ding Gong, former Inspector of Jiaozhi and now Excellency over the Masses, but when he arrived the next year Ding Gong had left office.

Shi Yi was well treated by Ding Gong's successor Huang Wan, but as Huang Wan opposed Dong Zhuo, Shi Yi came under threat as one of his supporters. As the capital was shifted to Chang'an in 192 Shi Yi was able to make his escape and return to the south. Soon afterwards he was named Administrator of Hepu by Shi Xie, as part of the family pattern of control over the far south, and he remained there over thirty years.

Shi Yi followed Shi Xie's policy of accepting the authority of Sun Quan's officer Bu Zhi, appointed Inspector in 210. Having sent his son Kuang as hostage to Wu, he was enfeoffed and named a lieutenant-general.

As a result of Shi Yi's complaisance, Hepu fell increasingly under the control of Sun Quan's regime. When Shi Hui and the other sons of Shi Xie were destroyed by Bu Zhi's successor Lü Dai in 226, Shi Yi was reduced to commoner status and his property was confiscated. A few years later he was executed for some crime. -SGZ Wu 4:1191-93.

Shi Yi 士黼 see Shi Hui 士黼.

Shi Yi 是儀 [Ziyu 子羽]; Beihai. Shi Yi's original surname was 氏. When he was a young man he held local office in his county and in the early 190s he joined the headquarters staff of the Chancellor of Beihai, Kong Rong. Kong Rong made fun of him, saying that the character 氏 was too close to min 民, indicating the common people, and persuaded him to change it to 是. [Some moralists would criticise Shu Yi for abandoning his ancestral name, and Kong Rong for encouraging him to do so.]

Presumably after Kong Rong was driven from Beihai in 193, Shi Yi went to join Liu Yao the Inspector of Yang province south of the Yangzi. When Liu Yao was defeated by Sun Ce and driven west to Yuzhang, Shi Yi went east to Kuaiji, but that territory was taken over by Sun Ce in 196. As Sun Quan began to establish his government, he was anxious to attract men of learning, and when Shi Yi went to join him he was well received and given positions of increasing trust. From about 211 he was one of Sun Quan's confidential clerks, with Xu Xiang and Shi Yi, and held appointment as a Commandant of Cavalry.

Consulted on Lü Meng's plan to attack Guan Yu in Jing province in 219, Shi Yi strongly supported the venture and, despite his protests that he lacked experience, was given commission as a colonel. After the victory he was promoted major-general, enfeoffed, and granted status as a Palace Attendant. In 228 he took part in a successful operation in Lujiang and was made a lieutenant-general, then returned to the Secretariat at the capital. He was later assistant to the Heir, Sun Deng, in Jing province, went on embassy to confirm alliance with Shu-Han after the death of Zhuge Liang in 234, and continued to serve and advise until his death in the 240s at the age of eighty-one. -SGZ Wu 17:1411-13*; Fang 52:603, 654.

Shi Yiguan 師宜官; Nanyang. In the time of Emperor Ling, who was a great patron of the art, Shi Yiguan was regarded as the finest exponent of the li shu 隸書 "Clerical Style" of calligraphy, with a special form known as the "Eight-part" 八分, and the capacity to write characters both large and microscopic. It is said that he was extremely jealous of his ability, and would destroy his writing-blocks after he finished with them. On at least one occasion, however, his student Liang Gu got Shi Yiguan drunk and stole one of his tablets, possibly to pass it off as his own.

Shi Yiguan served as an officer under Yuan Shu in the early 190s, and wrote stele on his behalf. -SGZ 1: 31, JS 36:1064, and Shuduan.

Shi Yu 史玉; Yingchuan. About 120 Shi Yu was found guilty of murder. His mother Shi Jun went to the prison and asked to take his place. She was duly strangled, and the legal authority Chen Zhong agreed that Shi Yu should be spared the death penalty. Many years later, this decision was criticised by the commentator Ying Shao. -HHS 48/38:1610.

Shi Zhao 史昭; Chenliu. Appointed district head by the Administrator Niu Shu, Shi Zhao exerted great local influence for good, so much that the people paid attention only to him, and not to any county or commandery officials. -HHS 48/38:1618

Shi Zimiao 史子眇. After several imperial children had died within the palace, Liu Bian, the son of Emperor Ling by his Empress He, was entrusted to the care of the Taoist master 道士 Shi Zimiao. Liu Bian became known as Lord Shi 史侯. -HHS 10B:449.

Shi Zizhu 史子助 see Shi Zimiao 史子眇. -HHSJJ 10B:430.

Shihui 師會 of Yetiao/Shetiao 葉調. An officer of the state, which lay beyond the frontier of Rinan, in 131 he was sent by his king Bian on embassy to the imperial court. Emperor Shun awarded Bian the golden seal and purple ribbon of royalty, and granted Shihui title and insignia as Lord of the Cities of Yetiao which are Loyal to Han 漢歸義葉調邑君. -DGHJ 3:3a, HHS 6: 258, 86/76:2837.

Shili 師利; Xionggnu. -XTS 75B:3437 says that Shili was a son of the captured general Liu Jinbo and that he became a king in the Xionggnu state. The story of Liu Jinbo, however, is doubtful.

Shisheng 師升 [Japanese: Suishō]; Japanese. A king of the Wa 倭 [dwarf?] people of Japan, in 107 Shisheng sent a tribute mission with 160 slaves to the court of Emperor An controlled by the regent Dowager Deng. -HHS 85/75:2821.

Shisun Fen 士孫奮 [Jingqing 景卿]; Youfufeng. A man of most prosperous family, Shisun Fen served for a time as a senior local officer in his commandery, and his great wealth was celebrated even in the imperial capital.

About 150 the General-in-Chief Liang Ji presented Shisun Fen with a team of four horses and asked for a loan of fifty million cash. When Shisun Fen gave only thirty million, Liang Ji was furious. He told the authorities in Youfufeng that Shisun Fen's mother had been a slave in his store-house, and she had run away with ten hu 斛 [200 litres] of white pearls and a thousand jin 斤 [250 kilograms] of the valued alloy known as purple-sheen gold 紫金 [Needham 74:257-266]. Shisun Fen and his brothers were arrested and died under torture, while the wealth of the family, 170 million cash, was confiscated. -HHS 34/24:1181, XHS 3:8a; Ch'ü 72:472.

Shisun Meng 士孫萌 [Wenshi 文始]; Youfufeng. Son of Shisun Rui, during the short-lived government of Wang Yun which followed the assassination of Dong Zhuo in 192, Shisun Meng was ordered by his father to lead the family to refuge with Liu Biao in Jing province. Shisun Rui himself remained at Chang'an and was killed.

Shisun Meng was later enfeoffed by Emperor Xian in recognition of his father's loyal service. He was a close friend of Wang Can, who dedicated a poem to him. -HHS 72/62:2332, HHSJJ 66/56:2390 Hou Kang, SGZ 6:186.

Shisun Rui 士孫瑞 [Junce 君策 or Junrong 君榮] (d.195); Youfufeng. As the Liang province rebels under Wang Guo approached Chang'an in 188, He Xun the Intendant of Jingzhao persuaded Emperor Ling to commission private troops. Shisun Rui was one of five leaders of local gentry who received title as commandants, to raise their own regiments and join the imperial forces under He Xun's command.

In 191 Shisun Rui joined Wang Yun at Chang'an in plotting to destroy Dong Zhuo. The first scheme, while Dong Zhuo was still at Luoyang, had Shisun Rui made Administrator of Nanyang, to travel east with an army under the general Yang Zan, then turn against Dong Zhuo. As Dong Zhuo became suspicious, the plan was abandoned.

Shisun Rui then became Deputy Director of the Imperial Secretariat, and in 192, when Dong Zhuo had come to Chang'an, the conspirators met again. Quoting signs from the elements and constellations, Shisun Rui urged Wang Yun to action, and when Wang Yun brought in Lü Bu, Shisun Rui wrote the imperial orders for the assassination.

Despite his involvement in the coup, Shisun Rui refused any reward and allowed all the credit to Wang Yun and Lü Bu. A few weeks later Dong Zhuo's former officers, Li Jue and his associates, stormed Chang'an, killed Wang Yun and drove Lü Bu away; Shisun Rui's low profile meant that he came to no harm.

In 195 Shisun Rui was Minister of the Guards in the ramshackle imperial government. He was taken hostage by Guo Si in his quarrel with Li Jue, and later that year, during the emperor's flight to the east, he was killed by Li Jue. A fine scholar, his loyalty was recognised by the enfeoffment of his son Ming. -HHS 58/48:1883, 66/56:2174-75, 2178, SGZ 6:186.

[Shiyuan (style)] 士元 [surname, personal name and origin unknown]. Early in the third century this man was a leading follower of Liu Bei. -SGZ Shu 15:1085.

Shizi 師子 (d.98); Xiongnu. Son of the Southern Shanyu Shi, Shizi showed remarkable energy as an ally of the Chinese in their attacks on the Northern Xiongnu, and was already involved in skirmishes along the frontier in the early 80s. With title as a king, he commanded a contingent of horsemen in Dou Xian's great campaign of 89, and his cavalry accompanied the column led by Yan Pan, Geng Kui and Geng Tan which defeated the Northern Shanyu at Jiluo Mountain and drove him away to the west.

In the following spring the Shanyu Tuntuhe sent him to join the Emissary Geng Tan in a further attack on the Northern Shanyu. Both Tuntuhe and his predecessor Xuan admired him, and Emperor He himself is said to have been impressed by his prowess. On the other hand, even after the disappearance of the Northern Shanyu in 91 and the surrender of his successor Yuchujian in 92, Shizi maintained his hostility to the northern group. He and his followers pillaged the defeated people who came to submit, and their aggressive conduct made it impossible for the southern court to take peaceful control over the former subjects of the north.

In 93 the Shanyu Tuntuhe died, and he was succeeded by the prince Anguo, Worthy King of the Left and son of the former Shanyu Xuan. Anguo, however, was not popular among his people; though he had taken part in the campaigns of Dou Xian, he had shown no distinction and had always been overshadowed by Shizi. With no strong group of supporters, he was jealous of his cousin's success and recognition, and he sought support from the newly-surrendered northerners by showing hostility to their persecutor. Concerned for his own safety, Shizi left the court and went to camp in Wuyuan.

Anguo also quarrelled with the Emissary Du Chong, and in 94 Du Chong and the General on the Liao Zhu Hui reported that they doubted his loyalty and believed he intended to assassinate Shizi and other pro-Chinese chieftains. An investigation was ordered, and Anguo was kept under special guard. Then Du Chong and Zhu Hui led armed men to his camp one night; Anguo took flight, gathered his own supporters and a group of former Northern Xiongnu, and went to attack Shizi. Shizi took refuge at the headquarters of the General on the Liao, Anguo attacked him without success, and when Chinese troops arrived he was killed by his own followers.

Shizi succeeded to the position of Shanyu, taking the title Tingdu shizuhou di 亭獨尸逐侯鞬 Shanyu. His well-attested hostility, however, and the manner in which he had come to the throne, brought rebellion amongst the surrendered northerners. A large group attacked Shizi and Du Chong, who took refuge in a herding office and managed to hold off the enemy with the aid of the Shanyu's Chinese body-guard.

The rebels now proclaimed the southern prince Fenghou as their Shanyu and, killing Chinese officials and burning guard-houses, they made their way towards the frontier. The court sent a large army, but despite heavy defeats Fenghou and many of his people managed to escape and establish a state of their own in the steppe. In the aftermath of this crisis, Du Chong and Zhu Hui were found guilty of a major failure of policy. They were arrested and died in prison in 95.

Shizi later planned to arrest and question the subordinate king Wujuzhan, a friend of the late Shanyu Anguo whom he suspected of having planned to kill him. Wujuzhan fled into the hill country across the Yellow River and maintained a series of raids into imperial territory in the Ordos, but he was attacked and killed by Chinese armies in 96. Shizi himself died in 98.

Shizi's career and his brief reign as Shanyu marked the real failure of the forward policy on the frontier inspired by Dou Xian. Having made his name as an enemy of the northern tribes, Shizi was incapable of moderating his attitude after their defeat. On the contrary, he kept his approval amongst the southerners by harassing those northerners who came to surrender and, aided by arrogant Chinese officials such as Du Chong and Zhu Hui, he and his partisans removed all possibility of peace and re-unification. Any such program would have been difficult, but Shizi's conduct guaranteed weakness and turmoil along the frontier and across the steppe, and brought the eventual ruin of the Xiongnu state. -HHS 89/79:2955-57, 23/13:814; deC 84:277-283.

Shizi Miao 史子眇 see Shi Zimiao 史子眇.

Shizi Zhu 史子助 see Shi Zimiao 史子眇.

Shou Guanghou 壽光侯 see Shouguang Hou 壽光侯.

Shouguang Hou 壽光侯 [Marquis Shouguang]. A magician of the late first century, he could control the spirits. He demonstrated his ability by exorcising a sick woman: a giant snake appeared and then died, and the woman was cured. In similar fashion, there was a tree which killed people who went underneath it and any birds which flew into it. When Shouguang Hou cast a spell against it the tree lost all its leaves and another large dead snake appeared.

Emperor Zhang summoned Shouguang Hou to court and told him that a group of spirits were haunting a hall of the palace each night. Shouguang Hou undertook to destroy them. In fact, there had been no such apparitions, but the emperor ordered three of his attendants to play the role. Shouguang Hou cast his spell, and the three men fell to the ground and ceased to breathe. The emperor, very frightened, explained that it had only been a test, and Shouguang Hou restored the victims to life. -HHS 82/72B:2749*; Ngo 76:14A, DeWoskin 83:87.

[Shouju (style)] 守矩 [surname and personal name unknown]; Nanyang. Described as a major under the General of Chariots and Cavalry, in 156 this man was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Shu 舒 [probably a personal name, surname unknown]. Court Astronomer in 102, Shu took part in the work of Huo Rong on the clepsydra. -HHS 92/2:3032-33.

Shu [Boying] 舒伯膺; Chenliu. After a close friend was murdered, Shu Boying and his younger brother Shu Shao [Zhongying] took vengeance on the killer. Their conduct was widely admired. -SGZ Wu 6:1210-11.

Shu Dan 疏耽; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Shu Dan was a member of the group. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription of Emperor Ling. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Shu Shao 舒邵 [Zhongying 仲膺]; Chenliu. When a close friend was murdered, Shu Shao and his elder brother Boying took vengeance on the killer. Their conduct was widely admired.

During the early 190s Sun Shao was a county magistrate for Yuan Shu in Jiujiang. -SGZ Wu 6:1210-11.

Shu Shou 叔壽 (d.25); Yingchuan. Recommended by his fellow-countryman Feng Yi, in 23 Shu Shou joined the staff of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu. He became a chief general, and in 25 he went with Du Mao to attack the Wuxiao bandits in Guangping. The enemy were defeated, but Shu Shou died in battle. -HHS 1A:25, 17/7:639.

Shu Wei 舒鮪; Shu. A local officer under Administrator He in 57, Shu Wei supervised the construction of a gallery or trestle road 閣道 through the mountains. -LS 3:1a-b.

Shu [Zhongying] 舒仲膺 see Shu Shao 舒邵.

Shuaihui 帥會 see Shihui 帥會.

Shuasheng 帥升 see Shisheng 師升.

Shuang Fu 雙福; Bohai. Assistant Intendant of Henan, in 135 Shuang Fu was involved in the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang; see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16:14b.

Shuang Sheng 雙勝. A magistrate in Guangan in 142, Shuang Sheng ordered the pursuit of the Lady Yang Jingyang and her husband Guo Meng after the Lady had killed her father's murderer Sheng. When he heard it was a vengeance killing, he called off the chase. -HYGZ 10C:177-178.

Shubo 輸夔 of Yutian [Khotan] (d.152). In 152 the Chinese Chief Clerk for the Western Regions Wang Jing summoned King Jian of Yutian to answer a charge of having poisoned his predecessor Zhao Xu. Before any proper enquiry could be made, Jian was stabbed and killed by an enemy agent.

Shubo, a local leader in Khotan, now gathered troops, burnt the yamen, killed Wang Jing and displayed his head in the market-place. He wanted to take the vacant throne, but was promptly killed himself.

Some time later Song Liang the Administrator of Dunhuang sent orders that Yutian should have Shubo executed. As Shubo had been dead for more than a month, the people sent in the head of another man who had died more recently. Song Liang found out later, but could take no action. -HHS 88/78:2916.

Shuiqiu Cen 水丘岑; Beihai. About 30, Shuiqiu Cen was personal clerk to the Chancellor Dong Xuan. When the local leader Gongsun Dan and his son were executed for murder, a group of their kinsmen and followers raised a riot. Dong Xuan had them arrested too, and he ordered Shuiqiu Cen to kill them as rebels and bandit sympathisers.

Dong Xuan was impeached by the authorities of Qing province and sent to Luoyang to answer for this brutality, while Shuiqiu Cen was examined under torture. Dong Xuan took full responsibility, however, and the Inspector was told to take no further action against Shuiqiu Cen.

Shuiqiu Cen later became Director of Retainers. -HHS 77/67:2489.

Shun, Emperor 順帝 (reg. 125-144) see Liu Bao 劉保.

Shun 舜 of Yanqi [Karashar]. King of Karashar, he was an enemy of China and a supporter of the Xiongnu. In 75, either under Shun or under his son Guang, the people of Karashar attacked and killed the Protector-General Chen Mu. -HHS 47/37:1582.

Shunyu 淳于 [surname] see Chunyu 淳于 passim.

Shusun Guang 叔孫光. Early the reign of Emperor An, Shusun Guang, Chancellor of Qinghe, was found guilty of bribery; both he and his sons were proscribed from office.

This precedent was raised some fifteen years later in the case of Fan Bin, convicted on a similar charge about 121, but the Excellency Liu Kai urged that punishment for ill-doing should be applied to the individual, not to his descendants; the emperor accepted his argument. -HHS 39/29:1308.

Shusun Wuji 叔孫無忌 (d.160); Taishan. Leader of bandits, Shusun Wuji ravaged a wide area about Mount Tai. He was persuaded to a short-lived surrender by Wei Yu of Yan province, but in 160 he rebelled once more and killed the Commandant of Taishan Hou Zhang. He was then defeated and killed by Zong Zi.

-HHS 7:307, 41/31:1404.

Shusun Xuan 叔孫宣. A Confucian scholar, Shusun Xuan compiled a commentary to the laws. -JS 30: 923.

Shuxian 叔先 [surname] see Xian 先 passim.

Shuxian Xiong 叔先雄, the Lady: see Xian Luo 先絡. -HHS 84/74:2799-2800.

Shuyuan Mao 叔元茂 (d.108). In 107/108 Shuyuan Mao was involved in the coup planned by the Excellency Zhou Zhang against the regent Dowager Deng and the new Emperor An. The plot was discovered and it seems likely Shuyuan Mao died at this time. -HHS 101/11:3238.

Shuyuan Mou 叔元茂 see Shuyuan Mao 叔元茂.

Si Cong 斯從; Kuaiji. A local leader on the eastern coast of Kuaiji, with following among the non-Chinese hill people, Si Cong was killed as a trouble-maker by the magistrate He Qi. -SGZ Wu 15:1377.

Si Du 肆都. A retainer of the Ma family of Youfufeng, Si Du taught Ma Yan the arts of sword-play, archery and horsemanship. -HHS 24/14:859, DGHJ 12:5a.

Si Gong 汜宮 see Fan Gong 汜宮.

Si Min 肆敏 became Administrator of Yuyang. -FSTY 6f:141.

Si Xian 駟賢. A county magistrate in Pei, Si Xian was executed for corruption about 120. -HHS 79/69A: 2564.

Si Xie 駟協. About 77 Si Xie was a magistrate in Nanyang while Liu Yu was a magistrate in Chenliu. Both men were admired for their firm administration, but the Excellency of Works Diwu Lun criticised their cruelty, and argued that those who had approved and promoted them should be reprimanded. -HHS 41/3A: 1400; Loewe 86C:292.

Si Xun 駟勳; Kuaiji. In 70 Si Xun was Officer of Merit in the commandery when the Administrator Yin Xing was suspected of involvement in the alleged conspiracy of Liu Ying, King of Chu. Si Xun and five hundred other officers were taken to prison at Luoyang. Most succumbed to torture, but Si Xun continued to plead his innocence. Then the filial piety of his colleague Lu Xu was reported to Emperor Ming and all the survivors received a pardon. Though they were proscribed from office for life, they were able to return home.

Si Xun was later praised as a local worthy by Yu Fan. -HHS 81/71:2682-83, SGZ Wu 12:1325.

Sijian 駟鞬 of Guisai. In the late 40s, King Xian of Suoju [Yarkand] had established a general dominance in his region, and he sent messengers to the king of Guisai, no doubt asking for tribute. Guisai 媯塞, "Frontier of the Gui," was presumably on the headwaters of the Gui River, identified as the Oxus/Amuda'ya [e.g. Hulsewé 79 note 271], and thus in the Pamir mountains, in the southeast of present-day Tajikistan, some 250 kilometres from Suoju. Believing he was too far away and too well protected to be affected by Xian's pretensions, the king killed the envoys. Despite the distance, however, Xian took an army to capture Guisai and appointed Sijian, a local nobleman, as its ruler.

Later, Xian captured Qiuzi [Kuqa], on the north of the Tarim basin, and he named his son Ziluo as king there. Because Ziluo was young, however, Xian divided the state into two and brought Sijian back to govern the parallel kingdom of Wulei. Another nobleman was made king of Guisai.

Some years later the people of Qiuzi and Wulei joined to kill their alien rulers, then invited the Xiongnu to appoint a new king from their own nobility. -HHS 88/78:2924.

Silaibi 私來比. In 73 Silaibi was chief minister of King Guangde of Yutian [Khotan]. The Chinese agent Ban Chao came to court, but Yutian was committed to the Xiongnu and King Guangde did not treat him courteously. On the advice of his court shaman he sent Silaibi to demand that Ban Chao hand over his horse for a sacrifice. Ban Chao pretended to agree, but asked that the shaman come to receive the animal; when he did so he took him and Silaibi prisoner. He then killed the shaman, flogged Silaibi, and sent him back with the shaman's head. Guangde was suitably impressed and changed his allegiance. -HHJ 10:126-127.

Sili Yuancheng 司隸緣城 [Director of Retainers Who Scales the City Wall] was the sobriquet of a chieftain of the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range in 185, probably the same as Sili Yuanzai below. -SGZ 8:261.

Sili Yuanzai 司隸掾哉 was the sobriquet of a chieftain of the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range in 185. This is probably a miswriting for Sili Yuancheng above. -HHS 71/61:2310.

Sima Bao 司馬苞 [Zhongcheng 仲成] (d.115); Shanyang. In 114 Sima Bao was promoted from Minister of Finance to be Grand Commandant in the regency government of the Dowager Deng. Noted for frugality, he wore plain clothes and ate only coarse grains, while his wives and children were not allowed even to visit his official residence.

Sima Bao died in office in 115. Xie Cheng says that he and the Excellency Yang Zhen had been slandered by the eunuch Fan Feng; Sima Bao was asked to retire as a consequence, but died before he could do so. Yang Zhen, however, did not become an Excellency until 120, and Fan Feng's influence was rather with Emperor An than with the Dowager Deng, so the story appears anachronistic: cf. sub voce. -HHS 5:221-23, XC 7:7a-b.

Sima Da 司馬達 see Ma Da 馬達.

Sima Deng 司馬登 [Bozhi 伯志]; Shanyang. About 135 Sima Deng was appointed Internuncio for Control of the Yellow River, taking over from Wang Hui in charge of a major project to dredge and reconstruct the channel of the Yellow River and its tributaries near Rongyang. When the work was completed Sima Deng had a commemorative stele set up. -SJZ 7:8a-9a.

Sima Fang 司馬防. In 87 Sima Fang was an officer under the Protector over the Qiang Zhang Yu. As the chieftain Miyu led a raiding force of some seven thousand men against Jincheng, Sima Fang was sent with a thousand horsemen and a body of commandery troops to deal with him. He defeated the enemy and put them to flight, and Mitang offered to surrender. -HHS 87/77:2882.

Sima Fang 司馬防 [Jiangong 建公] (149-219); Henei. Son of Sima Jun 儁, Sima Fang was strictly honest, and although he spent some time as a hermit he had a strong sense of public duty. He was extremely fond of the accounts of worthy men from the Former Han period, and could recite vast quantities of Han shu from memory.

Sima Fang later held office in the commandery and provincial governments, and about 175 he became Prefect of Luoyang and then Intendant of Jingzhao. A member of the Imperial Censorate in 190, he was compelled to go with Dong Zhuo to Chang'an, but ordered his eldest son Lang to take the household back to their home country. Sima Lang then took service with Cao Cao, and Sima Fang was later able to join him. On account of his age he retired to become a Commandant of Cavalry.

As Prefect of Luoyang in the 170s Sima Fang had held authority over Cao Cao, who was then a county commandant. When Cao Cao was enfeoffed as King of Wei in 216 he joked with him about it.

Sima Fang had eight sons, Lang, Yi, Fu, Kui, Xun, Jin, Tong and Min. Each had the character 達 "distinction" in his style, and they were known as the Eight Men of Distinction. He trained them strictly, so that they would go to him only when summoned, sit in his presence only when told to do so, and speak only when spoken to. The second son, Sima Yi, became chief officer of the state of Wei and founded the fortunes of the dynasty of Jin 晉. -SGZ 15:466, 1:49.

Sima Fu 司馬孚 [Shuda 叔達] (180-272); Henei. Third son of Sima Fang and younger brother of Sima Lang and Sima Yi, he was appointed as a scholar to the suite of Cao Zhi, whom he criticised for his sometimes extravagant behaviour. He later became an adviser to the Heir Cao Pi.

When Cao Cao died in 220 Sima Fu encouraged Cao Pi and other members of his staff to cease their weeping and concentrate upon the succession. He and He Xia took a leading role in ensuring the Heir was properly guarded and in arranging his accession to power. When the new ruler proposed to establish a number of Cavalier Attendants, members of his staff when he was Heir urged that appointments should be restricted to their own number, but Sima Fu argued successfully that this was the time to look further afield and obtain the best men.

Sima Fu served Cao Pi as an agricultural officer and commandery administrator and was enfeoffed. He joined the Secretariat under Cao Rui and later became its head. In 249 he joined Sima Yi in the destruction of Cao Shuang, and then became an Excellency under the regime now controlled by his brother. When his great-nephew Sima Yan 司馬炎 took the imperial throne in 265/266 Sima Fu was enfeoffed as a king. -JS 37:1081-85*.

Sima Hui 司馬徽 [Decao 德操] (d.208). A hermit scholar of the Old Text at the end of the second century, Sima Hui was celebrated for his ability to judge character. He is described both as a man from Yingchuan and of Xiangyang in Nan commandery; he probably migrated south to avoid the civil war.

Admiring the recluse Pang Degong, some ten years older than himself, Sima Hui behaved to him as to an elder brother, and gave him the sobriquet "Lord Pang" 龐公. Pang Degong in turn described Sima Hui as a Mirror of Water 水鏡, for he was sensitive and clear in his assessment of men.

Sima Hui nominated Zhuge Liang and Pang Tong to the service of Liu Bei, he foretold the scholarly future of Liu Yi, and his students included Xiang Lang, Xu Shu, Yin Mo and Li Ren, the latter two travelling from Yi province to attend him.

When Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208 he wanted to appoint Sima Hui to a senior office, but Sima Hui died about that time. -SGZ Shu 7:953-540, HHS 83/73:2777; Mather 76:566, Vervoor 90:296, deC 96:362-365.

Sima [Jide] 司馬季德; Shanyang. Formerly an acting county commandant in his home commandery, Sima Jide was commemorated with a stele. -LX 1:6a-9a.

Sima Jin 司馬進 [Huida 惠達]; Henei. Sixth son of Sima Fang and younger brother of Sima Yi, he held minor court office under Wei. When his great-nephew Sima Yan 司馬炎 took the imperial throne of Jin in 265/266, Sima Jin's son Ti 悌 was enfeoffed as a king. -JS 37:1103.

Sima Jingsi 司馬敬司 also as Ma Jingsi 馬敬司, the Lady; Shu. Second wife of Zhang Ba, she bore him a son, Guangchao, but gave equal care to his three sons and one daughter by his first marriage.

When Zhang Ba died at Luoyang in the early 100s, his testament asked that he should be buried in Henan, not in his native commandery of Shu. The Lady carried out his wishes, but then returned with the family to Shu, and when she died she asked for separate burial there, taking example from the concubines of the legendary Emperor Shun 舜, and noting that each person must make their own decision.

The Lady's step-son Zhang Kai was inspired by her teachings. -HYGZ 10A:139 [surname as Ma], 12:216 [surname as Sima]; HYGZJBTZ:551 prefers Sima.

Sima Ju 司馬俱 (d.206); Le'an. Leader of a group of Yellow Turbans in Qing province, Sima Ju and his associate Xu He attacked a number of cities and killed senior officials in his home commandery and neighbouring Ji'nan. Towards the end of 206 Cao Cao sent Xiahou Yuan against them with a large force of local troops from Taishan, Qi and Pingyuan, supported by Zhang Ba and Lü Qian. After several engagements, with fierce fighting and heavy casualties, the rebels were defeated. Xu He was killed and Sima Ju presumably shared his fate. -SGZ 9:270, 18:540, 537.

Sima Jun 司馬均 [Xiaobin 小賓]; Donglai. A hermit recluse, Sima Jun lived in poverty but main-tained a private academy. Though he refused all offers of appointment, his conduct influenced the whole community and people would bring disputes to him for adjudication: if anyone was doubtful of his cause, he would withdraw rather than face Sima Jun's disapproval.

Recommended to Emperor Zhang by Jia Kui, Sima Jun was treated with the greatest courtesy and appointed a Palace Attendant. He later left office on grounds of old age and ill health and retired to his homeland, but he received a life-time stipend as a Counsellor. -HHS 36/26:1240, XC 8:12a; Vervoor 90:286.

Sima Jun 司馬鈞 [Shuping 叔平] (d.115). An officer under the General of Chariots and Cavalry Deng Zhi, in 108 Sima Jun commanded militia troops under Ren Shang; they were defeated by the Qiang leader Dianlian in Hanyang. He later became Administrator of Zuopingyi.

In 115 Sima Jun was given acting rank as a general and sent with eight thousand local levies from the Wei valley to attack the Qiang leader Lianchang and the renegade Du Jigong. A second column, commanded by the Protector Pang Can, failed to join up with him, but Sima Jun captured the enemy fortress at Dingxi in northern Beidi. He sent his subordinate commanders out to collect grain, but they disobeyed orders, allowed their troops to scatter across the countryside, and were then cut off by the rebels and their Qiang allies. Angry at their disobedience, Sima Jun stayed in the city and refused to send help. The Chinese lost several of their officers and over three thousand men.

Sima Jun withdrew with the remnants of his forces, but was arrested and committed suicide. -HHS 87/77: 2889, JS 1:1; deC 84:107-108.

Sima Jun 司馬儁 [Yuanyi 元異]; Henei. Son of Sima Liang, Sima Jun was a big man, eight feet three inches tall [192 cm] and broad about the waist. A leader among his kinsmen and the young men of the region, he was also a man of considerable learning. He became Administrator of Yingchuan. -SGZ 15:466.

Sima Kui 司馬馗 [Jida 季達]; Henei. Fourth son of Sima Fang and younger brother of Sima Yi, he became a Chancellor of Lu under Wei and was awarded a marquise. When Sima Yan 司馬炎 took the imperial throne of Jin in 265/266, Sima Kui's son Quan 權 was enfeoffed as a king. -JS 37:1092.

Sima Lang 司馬朗 [Boda 伯達] (171-217); Henei. Descendant of an established official family, Sima Lang was the eldest son of Sima Fang. When he was aged nine a man came to call upon his father, but referred to him by his style 字. Sima Lang observed that it was inappropriate for anyone to refer to a father by his style to his son, and the visitor apologised. [A similar anecdote is told of Chang Lin at the age of seven.]

In 182, at the age of twelve, Sima Lang passed an examination in the classics and was appointed a Junior Gentleman, giving early entrance to probation for a commissioned post in the civil service. Seeing that he was tall and well built, the examiner questioned his age, but Sima Lang replied that the people of his family had always been large [e.g. Sima Jun his grandfather], and he would be ashamed to seek advantage through deception. The official was suitably impressed.

In 190, as Dong Zhuo transferred the capital to Chang'an, Sima Lang's father Fang was obliged to go with the court, but he foresaw the turmoil ahead and ordered Sima Lang to take the family and household back to their home commandery. Sima Lang was arrested as a potential deserter, but managed to bribe his way free. Once in his homeland, he warned his elders that Henei would soon be a centre of conflict, and urged that they should take refuge in Wei commandery, where his kinsman Zhao Weisun commanded troops at the military base in Liyang. Most of the people preferred to remain in their homes, but Sima Lang led his own following away, and many of those who stayed behind were indeed killed or plundered.

In 194, as the eastern alliance broke up and civil war began in the east, Sima Lang brought his people back to their homeland. There was famine and starvation, but he cared for his dependents and encouraged them to support themselves.

Cao Cao later appointed Sima Lang to a clerical position in his offices, and he then became a county magistrate in Henan. He resigned on grounds of illness, but was again appointed to counties in Anping and in Wei. His administration was humane and the people were extremely fond of him.

Returning to Cao Cao's offices, he argued for the restoration of the pre-Qin feudal system, with five ranks, shared allocation of labour between work on public and private fields on the lines of the alleged well-field system, and local responsibility for self-defence. The last of these was largely put into practice, while the revival of the old ranks allowed Cao Cao to become Duke of Wei in 214.

Sima Lang was then appointed Inspector of Yan province. Despite his rank, he dressed in simple clothing and ate poor food, while his administration again won popular approval. Concerned at the importance of morality in politics, he was a keen judge of men. When Wang Can and Zhong Yao argued that good government could be achieved only by a sage, Sima Lang argued that enough men of high quality, even if they were not sages, could yet achieve success. His essay was admired by Cao Pi, and when he became Emperor of Wei he had a copy placed in the Imperial library.

In the spring of 217 Sima Lang accompanied the army to attack Wu, but he was taken ill and died on that campaign. -SGZ 15:465-69*.

Sima Liang 司馬量 [Gongdu 公度]; Henei. Son of Sima Jun 鈞, Sima Liang became Administrator of Yuzhang. -JS 1:1.

Sima [Mengtai] 司馬孟壹. LS 13:8a records a fragment of a stele from the Spirit Road 神道 of this man's tomb. He had been a magistrate in Hanzhong.

Sima Min 司馬敏 [Youda 幼達]; Henei. Eighth son of Sima Fang and youngest brother of Sima Yi, he died young and left no sons. -JS 37:1081.

Sima Tong 司馬通 [Yada 雅達]; Henei. Seventh son of Sima Fang and younger brother of Sima Yi, he served on the staff of the Director of Retainers under Wei and was enfeoffed. When his great-nephew Sima Yan 司馬炎 took the imperial throne of Jin in 265/266, Sima Tong's son Ling 陵 was enfeoffed as a king. -JS 37:1113.

Sima [Wenyu] 司馬文預 see Wen Yu 文預.

Sima Xun 司馬恂 [Xianda 顯達]; Henei. Fifth son of Sima Fang and younger brother of Sima Yi, he held middle-ranking civil office under Wei. When his great-nephew Sima Yan 司馬炎 took the imperial throne of Jin in 265/266, Sima Xun's son Sui 遂 was enfeoffed as a king. -JS 37:1101.

Sima Ya 司馬雅; Guanghan. Sima Yi was betrothed to the Lady Jiang Pin q.v. -HYGZ 10B:153.

Sima Yi 司馬懿 [Zhongda 仲達] (179-251); Henei. Descendant of an established official family, second son of Sima Fang, Sima Yi was regarded as superior to his elder brother Lang by Cui Yan and Yang Jun, both men known for their good judgement. In 202 he was sent to court as Reporting Officer for the commandery and was invited to join Cao Cao's staff. It is said that he was reluctant to enter Cao Cao's service, claimed that he was paralysed by rheumatism, and did not move from his bed even when Cao Cao sent a man as if to kill him [see, however, sub the Lady Zhang Chunhua]. In 208 Cao Cao repeated the invitation, threatening to have him arrested if he refused, and Sima Yi then accepted the summons.

As Registrar to the Imperial Chancellor, he accompanied Cao Cao on the campaign against Zhang Lu in 215, and after Hanzhong was captured he joined Liu Ye in urging a swift advance against Liu Bei in Yi province. Cao Cao, however, was unwilling to commit himself so far.

In 217 Sima Yi was appointed to the suite of Cao Pi as Heir to the kingdom of Wei, and he became a personal friend. Returning to Cao Cao's staff, he advised him on operations in Jing province in 219, and when Cao Cao died in the following year Sima Yi escorted the funeral cortège back to Ye city. Under the government of Cao Pi, Sima Yi received steadily higher appointments, and in 224 and 225 he was left in charge of domestic affairs while the emperor took the field against Wu.

When Cao Pi died in 226, his son and successor Cao Rui was formally an adult, but four regent advisers were appointed for him. Sima Yi was among that group, and within a few years he was the senior minister and chief military commander of the empire. Though his previous experience had been largely civilian, he proved to be an energetic and competent general, holding command in the south against Wu and in the west against Shu-Han, and in 238 he destroyed the Gongsun warlords in Manchuria.

When Cao Rui died in 239, his adopted successor was the seven-year-old Cao Fang 芳, and the government was placed under the joint regency of Cao Shuang 曹爽 and Sima Yi. Chief power at court was initially held by Cao Shuang, while Sima Yi concentrated upon military matters. He held wide support in the army and among men of good family outside the court, and he presented himself as representative for those who sought Confucian reform, morality and restraint in politics and society. In 249 Sima Yi seized the emperor and killed Cao Shuang and his associates; from this time on, the state of Wei was in the hands of the Sima family.

Sima Yi died in 251, but his dominant position was maintained by his eldest son Sima Shi 帥 (208-255), followed by Shi's younger brother Sima Zhao 昭 (211-265) and by Zhao's son Sima Yan 炎 (236-290).

When Sima Yan took the imperial title in the winter of 265/266, he gave Sima Yi posthumous title as Emperor Xuan 宣 of the new Jin 晉 dynasty. -JS 1*; Mather 76: 566-567.

Sima Yi 司馬懿, wife of: see the Lady Zhang Chunhua 張春華.

Sima Zhi 司馬直 [Shuyi 叔異]; Henei. A handsome man, with a fine reputation, about 185 Sima Zhi was named Administrator of Julu. At this time it was required that all senior officials should pay a fine on appointment, as contribution to rebuilding the palaces at Luoyang. Sima Zhi was known to be poor and honest, so his levy was assessed at only three million cash, as opposed to the twenty or thirty million which might be asked, depending on the size of the commandery.

Sima Zhi, however, objected strongly to the idea that he and his colleagues should recoup their expenses by exploiting the people they ruled. He tried to refuse appointment on grounds of ill health, but his excuse was rejected and he was obliged to leave for his post. As he came to the Yellow River, he sent in a memorial bitterly objecting to the extortionate scheme, and then killed himself.

As a result of this incident, the system of fines was suspended. -HHS 78/68:2536; deC 89:192.

Sima Zhi 司馬芝 [Zihua 子華]; Henei. A distant kinsman of Sima Lang and Sima Yi, Sima Zhi was a student when he was young. In the early 190s he went to Jing province to take refuge from the civil war with Liu Biao. On the way his party encountered bandits, and his companions all ran away, leaving the old and the weak behind. Unlike the others, Sima Zhi stayed by his elderly mother, and begged the bandits to care for her. They were so impressed with his filial sentiments that they let the pair go unharmed, and even gave him a rickshaw carriage to pull her on.

Sima Zhi stayed in the south for several years, tending his own fields and holding no official position, but when Cao Cao took over Jing province in 208 he appointed Sima Zhi as a magistrate in Ji'nan.

At that time the local area was strongly influenced by the commandery Registrar Liu Jie. A man of family, Liu Jie had a large body of retainers, and under his official protection these men avoided their corvée duties and acted like bandits. Soon after he arrived, Sima Zhi called up a group of these men, headed by a certain Wang Tong, and conscripted them as soldiers. His staff warned him that Liu Jie and his men had never undertaken forced labour, and that Liu Jie would cause trouble, but Sima Zhi wrote to Liu Jie, noting the bad conduct of his men and pointing out their obligations.

Liu Jie put his men into hiding, and sent an Investigator to develop charges against Sima Zhi. Members of Sima Zhi's staff were frightened, but he reported the whole matter to the Administrator, Hao Guang, with a catalogue of Liu Jie's offences. Hao Guang already knew of Sima Zhi's qualities, so he decided in his favour and compelled Liu Jie to take Wang Tong's place as a conscript. The whole province admired the manner in which Sima Zhi had forced a senior local officer to become a common soldier.

Sima Zhi was later transferred to a county in Julu, where some associates and retainers of the general Liu Xun, a friend of Cao Cao, regularly caused trouble. Liu Xun wrote on their behalf, but Sima Zhi made no reply and treated them according to law. As Liu Xun was later disgraced, Sima Zhi escaped punishment and was admired for his firm stand.

Sima Zhi came to the capital as a senior judicial officer of the kingdom of Wei, and was then Administrator of Ganling, Pei and Yangping [formerly part of Dong commandery]. In each territory he was noted for dealing firmly with powerful families and refusing private requests.

Sima Zhi continued to serve Cao Pi, distinguishing himself as Intendant of Henan. He was enfeoffed and appointed Minister of Finance by Cao Rui. He argued successfully that the wushu 五銖 coinage of Han, whose circulation had been ended by Cao Pi, should be restored as an official currency, and that those in charge of agricultural colonies should be ordered to concentrate upon farming for the good of the state, and forbidden to engage in trade. -SGZ 12:386-89*; Yang 63:191-192, Hsü 80:320.

Sima [Ziwei] 司馬子威. A common soldier, Sima Ziwei was taken up by Guo Tai and became well-known and respected. -HHS 68/58:2231.

Song 宋 [surname] see also Zong 宗. There are a number of occasions where these two characters are confused in the texts. In particular, the commentary of Hu Sanxing to ZZTJ 44:1413, quoted by HHSJJ 41/3A:1499, notes that the name of the Zong family of Anzhong 安衆 county in Nanyang is frequently written as Song; he adduces a quantity of evidence, including the texts of stele inscriptions, to show that the correct reading is Zong; Bn 67:69.

Song 宋, Empress of Emperor Ling: see the Lady Song IV.

Song 宋, the Lady I (d.82); Youfufeng. Elder daughter of Song Yang, the Lady was a cousin in the female line to the Empress Ma of Emperor Ming. Hearing of the beauty and abilities of the Lady and her sister, the empress brought them into the harem of the Heir, Liu Da, future Emperor Zhang, where they both attracted his favour. When Liu Da came to the throne in 75 the two sisters were appointed Honoured Ladies, and in 78 the elder gave birth to Liu Qing, who became Heir in 79 [XHS A:12a says that Liu Qing was born to the younger sister.] Recognising their duty, the sisters paid regular respects and offered gifts at the Dowager's apartments, and the Lady Ma appreciated their good conduct.

Despite her influence, the Dowager Ma was not able to arrange that the Lady became empress, and the position fell to a concubine of the Dou family. The Song sisters had been in the harem of Liu Da some five years longer than their rivals, and it seems likely that the Lady Dou attracted the attention of the twenty-year-old emperor because she was new and younger – and perhaps also because the relevant Lady Song was unavailable by reason of her pregnancy. Political considerations would in any case have encouraged the ruler not to commit himself too firmly to one distaff faction.

In the summer of 79 the Dowager Ma died, and without her patronage the sisters were exposed to the rivalry of the Empress Dou and her family. In 82 the intrigues of the Dou group were successful: Liu Qing was dismissed as Heir and appointed King of Qinghe, while the Ladies Song were accused of witchcraft, sent to the harem jail and forced to suicide.

Emperor Zhang nonetheless still mourned his late concubines, and he had them entombed near Luoyang. Through the efforts of her son Liu Qing the Lady Song received posthumous recognition from Emperor He, and in 121 her grandson Emperor An awarded her title as empress. -HHS 10A:415, 55/45:1799-1804.

Song 宋, the Lady II (d.82); Youfufeng. Younger daughter of Song Yang, she accompanied her elder sister into the harem of Liu Da, Emperor Zhang. According to XHS 1:12a, this Lady Song was the mother of the Heir Liu Qing, but it was probably her elder sister; it is not recorded otherwise that she bore any children.

The two sisters were disgraced and died in 82, but in 121 her great-nephew Emperor An posthumously restored the Lady Song's rank as a senior concubine. -HHS 55/45:1799-1805.

Song 宋, the Lady III (d.172); Youfufeng. A concubine of Liu Kui the King of Bohai, when her husband was charged with Impiety and killed himself in 172, the Lady was sent to prison and died. -HHS 10B:448.

Song 宋, the Lady IV (d.178); Youfufeng: Empress of Emperor Ling. A distant kinsman of the Honoured Ladies Song of Emperor Zhang, she entered the harem of Emperor Ling by selection in 170, was herself appointed an Honoured Lady, and after the young ruler had formally come of age in the following year she became his empress. Her father Song Feng was named Bearer of the Mace and he and his sons received small marquisates.

We may assume that the empress had originally been attractive to the young ruler, but she later lost favour and other concubines, envious of her high position, slandered her. Furthermore, her aunt was a concubine of Liu Kui the King of Bohai, and when he was destroyed through the agency of the eunuch Wang Fu in 172, that Lady Song died in prison.

Concerned that the empress might seek to avenge her aunt, Wang Fu and his ally the courtier Cheng A accused her of engaging in magical practices. It may be that the Lady Song was seeking to regain her consort's affections by such means, but such activities were considered treasonous and in the winter of 178, after eight years in her high position, the empress was dismissed. Soon afterwards she "died of grief" 以憂死 in the harem prison; she may have been assisted. Her father and brothers were killed.

Despite her lack of favour and the enmity of Wang Fu, it evidently took a considerable time before the empress was finally dismissed, and it is said that there was general sympathy among other eunuchs for her and her kinsmen, who were seen as innocent of the charges laid; many contributed to their funerary expenses.

We are told that about 180 Emperor Huan appeared in a dream to Emperor Ling and reproached him with the fate of his brother Liu Kui and of the Lady Song. -HHS 10B:448-49*; Goodrich 64-65 & 66.

Song 宋, the Lady V. A concubine of Cao Cao, she was the mother of Cao Hui. -SGZ 20:579.

Song 宋, the Lady VI. A concubine of Cao Pi, she bore him a son, Cao Yan 儼. -SGZ 20:590.

Song Bo 宋伯; Nanyang: see Zong Bo 宗伯.

Song [Bowang] 宋伯望; Langye. A fragmented inscription on a four-sided column discovered in 1893 describes a land dispute about 140, evidently accompanied by killing, which involved Song Bowang and two brothers, one of whom had the personal name He 何. -Nagata 94:92.

Song Bu 宋布; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Song Bu was a member of the group. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed that the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Song Chong 宋冲 [Zijun 子浚 or Zimei 子沒 or Zijun 子雋?] (d.171); Taiyuan. About 148 Song Chong and his fellow-countryman Guo Tai studied the Chunqiu under Qu Boyan in Henan. A fine scholar himself, Song Chong greatly admired Guo Tai, believing him to be the best man of Han. He urged him to take office, but Guo Tai preferred to remain in private life.

Song Chong was nominated as Knowing the Way and invited to appointment in the offices of the Excellencies, but he excused himself on grounds of ill health. Stele were set up for him and for Guo Tai outside their county town. -HHJ 23:274, 276-77, 12a-b, HHSJJ 68/58:2437-38 Hui Dong quoting the Gaoshi zhuan of Huangfu Mi and the Secondary Biography of Guo Tai, SJZ 6:7a-b.

Song Deng 宋登. In 29 Song Deng was sent with a general's command to join Ma Cheng and others in attacking the pretender Li Xian south of the Huai. -HHS 22/12:778.

Song Deng 宋登 [Shuyang 叔陽]; Jingzhao. Son of Song You and brother of Song Han, Song Deng taught the New Text of the Classic of History according to the Ouyang tradition, and gathered thousands of students. As magistrate of Ruyin in Runan, his wise and capable rule earned him the title "Spiritual Father" 神父. He became Chancellor of Zhao, then went to the capital as Deputy Director of the Imperial Secretariat.

Song Deng was granted the Staff of Authority by Emperor Shun to review the Imperial University, and he also made recommendations on legislative reform. As Palace Attendant, he presented a number of comments, but after he had shown his opposition to powerful political figures he was sent out as Administrator of Yingchuan. There he presided over an ideal government, so "there were no two prices in the markets, and items dropped on the roads were not taken." He retired on account of illness and died at home. The people of Ruyin set up a temple in his memory. -HHS 79/69A:2557*.

752 Song Di

Song Di 宋弟 see Zhu Di 朱弟.

Song Dian 宋典 (d.189). A eunuch, Song Dian served as a Regular Attendant during the 180s and was enfeoffed as a marquis. From 185 he was involved in the extravagant project for reconstruction of the palaces at Luoyang.

In 189 Jian Shi consulted Song Dian on his plan to assassinate the General-in-Chief He Jin. Song Dian almost certainly died in that year, either with Jian Shi or in the general massacre a few months later. -HHS 78/68:2534-37, HHJ 25:305; Bn 76:26, deC 96:4.

Song Diao 宋佻; Nanyang: see Zong Tiao 宗佻.

Song Ding 宋定. An officer of Sun Quan, about 210 Song Ding was stationed on the frontier of Jing and Yang provinces. He died about this time, and Sun Quan proposed to transfer his troops to Lü Meng, who held a position close by. Lü Meng protested that Song Ding had given good service to the state, and his troop should pass to his male heir, even though he was young. Sun Quan eventually accepted the argument, and Lü Meng sent an officer to guide the young successor in the management of this human inheritance. -SGZ Wu 9:1275.

Song Du 宋度 [Shuping 叔平]; Yuzhang. As a magistrate in Yingchuan, Song Du was respected for the simplicity of his food and clothing; he was able to persuade the virtuous scholar Du An to be his Officer of Merit.

Song Du later became an Internuncio. He took an imperial edict of pardon to surrendered non-Chinese people, and he also memorialised that the Minister Herald should be dismissed for failing in his duty. -XC 7:6a.

Song Du 宋都, the Lady. Daughter of Song Hong, Song Du became an Honoured Lady in the harem of Emperor Xian. She was with the emperor when he was held captive by Li Jue in 195, and she was one of the few palace women who managed to escape with him from Chang'an to the east; most of the others were taken by Li Jue's troops. -HHS 72/62:2337-41.

Song E 宋娥, the Lady. Song E was a wet-nurse to Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. [Note that there was also another wet-nurse, the Lady Wang Nan.] In 125 the Lady Song was marginally involved in the coup led by Sun Cheng which placed Liu Bao upon the throne, but she took no active role. In 126, when the eunuch Zhang Fang was accused of conspiracy, Song E pleaded for him; Sun Cheng, however, over-rode her intervention and Zhang Fang was banished.

The Lady Song remained a favourite of the Emperor, and in 133 he proposed to grant her a fief. This was ostensibly as a reward for her assistance in his accession, though Sun Cheng and other members of the coup had been enfeoffed six years earlier. The plan was opposed by Zuo Xiong, Director of the Imperial Secretariat, who took the occasion of an earthquake to draw comparison with the grant to the Lady Wang Sheng, wet-nurse to Emperor An. Emperor Shun vacillated. He initially ordered Song E to withdraw to her residence – which she was glad to do, for she was concerned at the attacks which were being made on her – but eventually the ruler's affection held sway, and Song E was named Lady of Shanyang, a county in Henei. She and her allies then slandered the reformer Li Gu, who had also opposed her enfeoffment, and had him sent to a petty post in the provinces.

In 137 the Lady Song and a group of eunuchs were found guilty of corruption and making false accusations. Song E lost her fief and was sent back to her residence. -HHS 61/51:2021-22, 58/48:1871, 78/68:2518.

Song Feng 宋豐/豐 [Boyu 伯遇] (d.178); Youfufeng. Song Feng was the father of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling. When his daughter was appointed in 170 Song Feng and his sons were enfeoffed, but when she was disgraced in 178 they were executed. -HHS 10B:448; Goodrich 66:190.

Song Gai 宋蓋; Youfufeng. Son of Song Yang and a brother of the imperial concubines Song, after the disgrace of 82 he returned with his father to Youfufeng.

About 100, however, through the influence of Song Gai's royal nephew Liu Qing, the family was rehabilitated. Song Gai and his brothers Yan, Jun and Xian were brought to the capital as gentlemen cadets, and when Liu Qing was sent to his state of Qinghe in 106, they accompanied his train.

In 121 Song Gai and his brothers were enfeoffed as county marquises. -HHS 55/45:1801-05.

Song Guang 宋廣 see Zong Guang 宗廣.

Song Guang 宋光; Wei? A man of family, about 140 he was accused of forging an imperial edict. The General-in-Chief Liang Shang had him arrested and questioned under torture, but his nephew Huo Xu presented an eloquent memorial pleading his innocence, and Song Guang was released. -HHS 48/38:1615-17.

Song Guo 宋果 [Zhongwen 仲文 or Zhongyi 仲乙]; Youfufeng. Hasty, aggressive and quarrelsome, Song Guo was unpopular with his neighbours. Then he met Guo Tai, who urged him to behave properly lest he bring misfortune upon himself. Accepting the rebuke, Song Guo kowtowed to Guo Tai and quite changed his conduct.

Song Guo later held clerical office at the capital, joined the Imperial Censorate and became Inspector of Bing province. In each appointment he showed energy and spirit, and reformed people's conduct. -HHS 68/58:2229.

Song Guo 宋果 see Song Ye 宋曄.

Song Han 宋漢 [Zhonghe 仲和]; Jingzhao. Son of Song You, Song Han was celebrated for scholarship in the classics, and was nominated as Abundant Talent. Inspector of Liang province in 122, he received the surrender of numbers of Qiang who had hitherto supported the chieftain Manu but were now in flight from the Protector Ma Xian.

Song Han became Administrator of Xihe, was Chancellor of Dongping in 126, and was then appointed General on the Liao. He had a reputation for honesty, firmness and sensible generosity.

Appointed Minister Coachman, he resigned on account of illness and was made Palace Counsellor. When he died in office he received an imperial encomium, special funerary honours, and a cash grant for his family. -HHS 26/16:905*, 87/77:2892 [surname as Zong 宗].

Song Hao 宋豪; Lujiang. About 210 Song Hao was a junior officer under Cao Cao's commander Xie Qi in the region of Qichun, north of the Yangzi opposite the position held for Sun Quan by Lü Meng. When Lü Meng made a surprise attack, Xie Qi was driven away, while Song Hao and some of his colleagues changed sides. -SGZ Wu 9:1275.

Song He 宋何; Langye: see sub Song Bowang. - Nagata 94:92.

Song Hong 宋弘/宏 [Zhongzi 仲子]; Jingzhao. Song Hong's father Shang 尚 had been a minister under Emperor Cheng of Former Han, but was punished for his opposition to Emperor Ai's favourite Dong Xian 董賢. Song Hong himself, a mild and agreeable man, became a Palace Attendant under Emperors Ai and Ping and a minister under Wang Mang.

When Chang'an fell in 23, the Red Eyebrows wanted him to join them, but Song Hong preferred to commit suicide by throwing himself into the Wei. Members of his household saved him, then claimed he was dead so that he could escape.

As Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 26, Song Hong was appointed a Palace Counsellor, and soon afterwards was made Excellency of Works and enfeoffed. Devoting all his income to his extended clan, he kept no property for himself. He was admired for his virtue, for promoting excellent scholars, and for his admonitions of the emperor: on one occasion he reprimanded Guangwu for looking too often during a court assembly at a screen which was decorated with the images of virtuous women. Guangwu's sister, the energetic Princess Huang, wanted to marry him, but when the emperor raised the matter Song Hong refused to abandon his wife.

As Song Hong accompanied Guangwu on campaign to the east in 29 he was sent to offer sacrifice to Confucius, but in 30/31 he was dismissed for making an unsubstantiated accusation against a commandery Administrator. He died a few years later, leaving no sons, and the marquise was ended. -HHS 26/16:903-05*, XC 1:5b; Ch'ü 72:294-296, Bn 79:33, 66.

Song Hong 宋泓. Probably in the 180s, Song Hong was Administrator of Changshan. His daughter Song Du became an Honoured Lady in the harem of Emperor Xian. -HHS 72/62:2341.

Song Ji 宋奇 see Song Qi 宋奇.

Song Jian 宋建 (d.214); Longxi. A man of Fuhan county, on a tributary of the Yellow River above present-day Lanzhou, Song Jian led one of the first insurrections to disturb Liang province in 184. He may have joined the main body of rebels and mutineers which seized Jincheng commandery in that year, and perhaps took part in the attack towards Chang'an in 185.

Soon afterwards Song Jian returned to Fuhan, where proclaimed himself King of the Sources of the River Who Will Pacify Han 河首平漢王, established an independent state and held power for thirty years, imitating the imperial rituals with reign-titles and officials. In the winter of 214 Cao Cao's general Xiahou Yuan attacked Fuhan, captured the city and took the heads of Song Jian and his officers.

Xiandi chunqiu names Song Jian as one of the first leaders of the rebellion and a former member of the Loyal Auxiliary. It is possible he was non-Chinese or, as suggested for Li Wenhou, a junior officer of Chinese origin. Dian lue refers to a Song Yang 揚 as one of the early leaders in Liang province, but this is surely a miswriting of Song Jian's personal name. - HHS 72/62:2321, 2343, SGZ 1:44-45, 9:271; Haloun 49/50, deC 84:161, 496.

Song Jie 宋階. An early friend of Cui Yan, he died young. Cui Yan cared for his children. -SGZ 12:370.

Song Jin 宋因 see sub Song Nie 宋臬.

Song Jing 宋景; Qinghe. Some time in the 90s Song Jing prophesied a great flood. Many people believed him, abandoned their homes and took refuge in the mountains. Nothing came of the forecast, and Zhang Heng later used this incident as an example in his attack on the apocrypha. -HHS 59/49:1912.

Song Ju 宋俱; Nanyang: see Zong Ju 宗俱.

Song Jun 宋均; Nanyang: i.e. Zong Jun 宗均. -HHSJJ 41/3A:1499 quoting the commentary of Hu Sanxing to ZTZJ 44:1413; Bn 67:69.

Song Jun 宋俊; Youfufeng. Son of Song Yang and a brother of the imperial concubines Song, after the disgrace of 82 he returned with his father to Youfufeng. About 100, through the influence of Song Jun's royal nephew Liu Qing, the family was rehabilitated. Song Jun and his brothers Yan, Gai and Xian were brought to the capital as gentlemen cadets, and when Liu Qing was sent to his state of Qinghe in 106, they accompanied his train. In 121 Song Jun and his three brothers were granted marquises. -HHS 55/45:1801-05, SJZ 8:4b.

Song Liang 宋亮. Following the death of King Jian of Yutian [Khotan] in 152, rioting led by the local chieftain Shubo brought the death of the Wang Jing, Chief Clerk for the Western Regions. As Ma Da the Administrator of Dunhuang was recalled, Song Liang took his place and sent orders that Yutian should have Shubo executed. Shubo, however, had been dead for over a month, so the people sent the head of a man who had died more recently. Song Liang found out later, but could take no action.

In 153, when King Aluoduo of Further Jushi turned against Han and then fled to the Xiongnu in the north, Song Liang recommended the former hostage prince Beijun be placed upon the throne. This was done, but Aluoduo was later reinstated and Beijun returned to Dunhuang. -HHS 88/78:2916, 2931.

Song Nie 宋臬 but see also below; Youfufeng. He was possibly a kinsman of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling.

When rebellion broke out in Liang province in 184, Song Nie was appointed Inspector to replace Zuo Chang. Believing that the cause of the trouble was a lack of education and moral cultivation among the people of the frontier, he was confident the rebels could be pacified by teaching them the Book of Filial Piety [cf. sub Xiang Xu, who had even more extreme ideas about the efficacy of this work]. The local officer He Xun sought to dissuade him from his idealistic strategy, but Song Nie insisted on putting his plan forward in a memorial to the court. He was promptly recalled. -HHS 58/48:1880, XHS 4:9b; deC 84:149.

HHS has the personal name of this man as Xiao 臬, while XHS has it as Quan 泉, but modern commentators suggest these are miswritten for Nie 臬; HHSJJ 58/48:2037 & 2054.

Song Qi 宋奇 (d.178); Youfufeng. Son of Song Feng, Song Qi was a brother of the Empress Song of Emperor Ling. When his sister became empress in 170 her male relatives were enfeoffed, but when she was disgraced in 178 they were all executed.

Song Qi had married a cousin of Cao Cao, and the palace eunuchs involved him also and had him dismissed from office. -HHS 10B:448, SGZ 1:3.

Song Qian 宋遷; Ba. When Song Qian and his mother the Lady Qing were visiting a slave's house for a drinking party, the host complained about the Lady's conduct. Song Qian abused him in return, and the slave then hit him with a piece of wood so that he died. -FSTY 3f:108.

Song Qian 宋謙 also as Zong Qian 宗謙 (d.162). Commandant of the Tiger Tooth Camp at Chang'an, in 162 Song Qian was found guilty of taking bribes. He died in prison. -HHS 7:311, 102/12:3256.

Song Qian 宋謙. An early follower of Sun Ce, Song Qian was one of his attendants at the time of the skirmish with Taishi Ci in 198.

In 215 Song Qian commanded a division in the attack on Hefei, but his troops were heavily defeated and fled.

When Liu Bei attacked in 222, Song Qian was one of the commanders under Lu Xun, and he led a flank attack to break the enemy line along the Yangzi. -SGZ Wu 4:1188, 2:1124, 13:1346-48.

Song Qing 宋靜, the Lady; Ba. She was the mother of Song Qian q.v.

Song Quan 宋泉 see Song Nie 宋臬.

Song Run 宋閏, the Lady. About 95 Song Run was a musician at the court of Liu Kang, King of Ji'nan. The Heir Liu Cuo approached her, but she refused him. -HHS 42/32:1432.

Song Shou 宋壽. An expert at the interpretation of dreams, Song Shou was an ornament to the court of Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 18:1425-26.

Song Song 宋嵩; Jingzhao. Younger brother of Song Hong, noted for his strict morality and filial piety, he was an imperial messenger in 29 and later became Intendant of Henan. -DGHJ 9:3b, HHS 26/16:905.

Song Tiao 宋佻; Nanyang: see Zong Tiao 宗佻.

Song Tiao 宋條; Nanyang: see Zong Tiao 宗條.

Song Xian 宋暹; Youfufeng. Son of Song Yang and a brother of the imperial concubines Song, after the disgrace of 82 he returned with his father to Youfufeng.

About 100, through the influence of Song Xian's royal nephew Liu Qing, the family was rehabilitated. Song Xian and his brothers Yan, Jun and Gai were brought to the capital as gentlemen cadets, and when Liu Qing was sent to his state of Qinghe in 106, they accompanied his train.

In 121 Song Xian and his brothers were enfeoffed as county marquises. -HHS 55/45:1801-05.

Song Xian 宋憲. In 198, as Lü Bu was under siege by Cao Cao in the city of Xiapi, he accused his officers Song Xian, Hou Cheng and others of treachery. Frightened and resentful, they went over to the enemy. -SGZ 1:16, 7:227-28.

Song Xiao 宋臬 see sub Song Nie 宋臬.

Song [Xiaojie] 宋孝節; Nanyang. When Li Gu was appointed Inspector of Jing province about 140, he consulted local worthies, including Song Xiaojie, on the quality of local officials. With their advice he reported against several Administrators. -HYGZ 10C: 165.

Song Xin 宋訢. Administrator of Chenliu, he left a legacy of corruption. The dishonest officials whom he had appointed were later investigated by the Officer of Merit Shi Bi and were dismissed. -HHS 64/54:2108.

Song Yan 宋衍; Youfufeng. Son of Song Yang, he was a brother (probably the eldest) of the imperial concubines Song. After the family was disgraced in 82 he returned with his father to Youfufeng.

About 100, through the influence of Song Yan's royal nephew Liu Qing, the family was rehabilitated. Song Yan and his brothers Jun, Gai and Xian were brought to the capital as gentlemen cadets, and when Liu Qing was sent to his state of Qinghe in 106, they accompanied his train and Song Yan became his confidant.

When his great-nephew Liu You, Emperor An, was brought to the throne in 107, Song Yan was granted a small marquisate, and in 121 he and his brothers received county fiefs. -HHS 55/45:1801-04.

Song Yang 宋楊/揚; Youfufeng. Descendant of a long lineage, Song Yang was admired by local people for his fine and filial conduct, but he refused all invitations to local office.

Song Yang was related in the female line to the Empress, later Dowager, Ma of Emperor Ming, and in the early 70s the Dowager brought Song Yang's two daughters, her cousins, into the harem of the Heir Liu Da, future Emperor Zhang. When Liu Qing, son of the elder Lady Song, was named Heir in 79, Song Yang came to the capital and received generous gifts. In accordance with the principles of the Dowager Ma, he was appointed only as a Consultant, and obtained no significant post.

When the Empress Dou secured the dismissal of Liu Qing and the death of the Ladies Song in 82, Song Yang was sent back to Youfufeng, where he was put under arrest by the authorities. Some friends exerted influence and obtained his release, but Song Yang, sad and frustrated, died soon afterwards. In 121 his great-grandson Emperor An awarded him posthumous enfeoffment. -HHS 55/45:1799-1805.

Song Yang 宋楊/揚, wife of: see the Lady Wang.

Song Yang 宋揚 see sub Song Jian 宋建.

Song Yao 宋繇 see Song You 宋由. -HHSJJ 3:149.

Song Ye 宋曄 or Song Guo 果. An officer of Yang Feng, who held command under Li Jue at Chang'an, in 195 Song Ye and his colleague Yang Ang became active agents in a plot to assassinate him and free Emperor Xian from captivity. Before they could take action, Li Jue killed Yang Ang for some unrelated reason, but Yang Feng then made himself independent and Li Jue lost much of his power. -HHS 54/44:1768 [as Song Ye], SGZ 6:185 [as Song Guo].

Song Yi 宋翼 (d.192); Taiyuan. Song Yi was a noted calligrapher, a pupil of the distinguished Zhong Yao.

In 192 Song Yi was appointed Administrator of Youfufeng under the regime of his fellow-countryman Wang Yun at Chang'an. Soon afterwards Li Jue and other officers of Dong Zhuo seized the capital and captured Wang Yun. Song Yi's colleague Wang Hong, Administrator of Zuopingyi, was a brother of Wang Yun, and the new rulers were concerned that the two could pose a threat. They accordingly called them to the capital. Wang Hong planned to refuse and combine the forces of the two commanderies in resistance, but Song Yi was reluctant to take such drastic action, so both men accepted the summons. Li Jue killed them, together with Wang Yun and his family. As Wang Hong went to execution he cursed Song Yi for a useless bookworm. -HHS 66/56:2177.

Song Yi 宋意; Nanyang; see Zong Yi 宗意.

Song Yin 宋因 see sub Song Nie 宋臬.

Song You 宋由 [Shulu 叔路] (d.92); Jingzhao. Son of Song Song, in 86 Song You was promoted from Minister of Finance to Grand Commandant. In 88, as the regent Dowager Dou was considering an attack on the Northern Xiongnu, Song You and his colleagues, led by Yuan An, protested strongly. The campaign, went ahead nonetheless, and Song You, intimidated by the power of the regency and also, perhaps, with some interest in the extension of Han power to the north, abandoned his objections. In debates at court thereafter he tended to side with Dou Xian.

Four years later, as the power of the Dou family was destroyed by the young Emperor He, Song You was accused of collaboration and lack of loyalty. He was dismissed and committed suicide. -HHS 4:174; deC 84:267-269.

Song Yuan 宋瑗; Taiyuan? An uncle of Jia Shu, Song Yuan was killed about 160. Jia Shu avenged his death, but was arrested and barely escaped execution. -XC 4:10a.

Song Yuan 宋鳧/淵 see sub Song Nie 宋臬.

Song Zhang 宋章. During the 80s Song Zhang was a clerk in the office of the Excellency Huan Yu. His colleague Yang Ren disapproved of his greed and improper conduct, so strongly that he would not speak with him or share his mat. It is said that people admired Yang Ren's fine principles. -HHS 79/69B:2575.

Song Zhong 宋仲 see Song Chong 宋冲.

Song Zhong 宋忠/衷 surname perhaps Zong 宗 [Zhongzi 仲子]; Nanyang. A strong exponent of the New Text, Song Zhong supported the apocrypha and opposed the more eclectic interpretations of Zheng Xuan and his followers. He taught the Taixuan jing 太玄經 "Classic of the Great Mystery," a development of the Book of Changes by the Former Han scholar Yang Xiong 楊雄, made commentaries to that and to other works of Yang Xiong, and also compiled a treatise on government under the title Shi ben 世本. He had many students, including Wang Su, Yin Mo and Li Ren, but none of his writings have survived.

About 200 Song Zhong and his colleague Qimu Kai were leaders among scholars at the court of Liu Biao, and under his sponsorship they prepared a series of detailed commentaries to the five classics, Changes, History, Poetry, Ritual and Chunqiu. The work was known as the "Later Edition" 後定.

In 208, as Liu Zong prepared to surrender to Cao Cao, he sent Song Zhong at the last minute to tell Liu Bei, who was predictably indignant. -HHS 74/64B:2421, SGZ 6:212, SGZ Shu 2:878; Yao Zhenzong:2381, Miao 82:72-75.

Song Zi 宋則 [Yuanju 元矩]; Jingzhao. Son of Song Han, Song Zi was a magistrate in Yingchuan and noted for his recommendations of worthy men.

When Song Zi's young son was practising archery with a slave, the man mis-shot and killed him. The slave expected to be executed, but Song Zi forgave him; he was widely admired for his generosity of spirit. -HHS 26/16:906, XHS 5:20a.

Song Zun 宋遵 (d.23). Governor of Yi province appointed by Wang Mang, he was killed by the bandit Wang Cen. -HHS 13/3:533-34.

Songxia 松下 see Supuyan 蘇僕延.

Southern Shanyu 南單于 see Shanyu and also Bi 比 etc.

Sovereign, First 先主 of the Three Kingdoms state of Shu-Han 屬漢 see Liu Bei. -SGZ Shu 2.

Sovereign, Later 後主 of the Three Kingdoms state of Shu-Han 屬漢 see Liu Shan. -SGZ Shu 3.

Su 蘇, the Lady. A concubine of Cao Pi, she bore him a son, Cao Yong. -SGZ 20:590.

Su 蘇 (d.63); Xiongnu. Son of the late Southern Shanyu Mo, he succeeded his uncle Shi in 63, taking the title Qiuchujulin di 丘除車林鞮 Shanyu. He died, however, a few months later. -HHS 89/79:2948.

Su 蘇 [personal name unknown]; Changshan. Member of a powerful local family in He county, in 24 he and his kinsmen were supporters of the pretender Wang Lang. As the army of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, was on its way to attack Wang Lang they halted at He. This man Su opened the gates of the city and invited Wang Lang's officer Li Yun to bring in troops and surprise the Han. Liu Xiu's officer Geng Chun discovered the plot, fought with Li Yun, defeated and killed him. -HHS 21/1A:762.

Su An 蘇安. In 75 Su An was a major in the service of Dou Gu, commander-in-chief of the expedition against Turfan. Because of the distance and the difficulty of the mountain passes, Dou Gu planned to concentrate on the more accessible state of Nearer Jushi, but his subordinate general Geng Bing led a successful attack on Further Jushi.

As King Ande came to surrender, however, Su An hoped to take the credit for Dou Gu, and he told the ruler that he should surrender to the supreme commander. Ande accordingly waited for Dou Gu to come forward with the main army. Geng Bing, furious, confronted Dou Gu, and Ande now came out from his capital to be received by Geng Bing and then taken to Dou Gu. -HHS 19/9:717.

Su Bo 蘇伯 (d.211); Hejian. In 210 Tian Yin and Su Bo led an uprising against Cao Cao in You and Ji provinces. They were defeated and killed in the following year by the general Jia Xin under the orders of Cao Pi. -SGZ 23:659.

Su Buwei 蘇不韋 [Gongxian 公先]; Youfufeng. Son of Su Qian, Su Buwei was eighteen in the late 160s when his father was killed by the family enemy Li Gao. Su Bao swore an oath of vengeance, and having put his mother in safety among the hills of Wudu commandery he changed his name and sold the family property to raise a private army. He attacked Li Gao but without success.

Then Li Gao became Minister of Finance. Su Buwei and some followers tunneled into his residential compound for several nights and eventually emerged in his bedroom. At that moment Li Gao was in the lavatory, but Su Buwei killed his concubine and his infant son, left a note for him and went away.

Li Gao now surrounded himself with guards and changed his sleeping quarters every night. Su Buwei then went to the tomb of Li Gao's father Li Fu, took the dead man's head and presented it as an offering at the temporary grave of Su Qian. Li Gao tried to catch him, but without success, and he died soon afterwards of an apoplexy.

Su Buwei later benefited from an amnesty, and he returned home to carry out the final entombment of his father. Many people were concerned at the manner in which he had maintained the vendetta, particularly his desecration of the dead, and believed that such conduct did not accord with ancient morality. The New Text philosopher He Xiu, however, compared Su Buwei to the legendary Wu Zixu 伍子胥: after the ruler of Chu 楚 killed his father, Wu Zixu fled to Wu 吳, arranged for an army of that state to conquer Chu, then avenged himself by taking the corpse of the former ruler from its tomb and flogging it. The celebrated moralist Guo Tai also praised Su Buwei's gallantry in challenging a powerful official with the resources of the state behind him, and argued that he was actually superior to Wu Zixu. Public opinion came to agree with him.

Though he declined an invitation to join the office of the Grand Tutor Chen Fan, Su Buwei did join the administrative staff of his commandery. His family were old friends of the frontier general Zhang Huan, but Zhang Huan quarrelled with his colleague Duan Jiong. When Duan Jiong was Director of Retainers in the 170s he invited Su Buwei to join his staff, but Su Buwei was worried and claimed to be ill.

Angry at this rejection and at the association with Zhang Huan, Duan Jiong also believed that Li Gao had been wrongly attacked for doing his duty as Director of Retainers against Su Qian, while Su Buwei's example inspired other young men in the capital district to raise private gangs of retainers.

Duan Jiong therefore sent his Attendant Officer Zhang Xian to kill Su Buwei, threatening his father's life if he failed. As Zhang Xian arrived, the Administrator sent Su Buwei to receive him; he was promptly arrested, and he and over sixty of his kinsmen were killed. The Su clan never recovered from the blow, though Duan Jiong's later destruction at the hands of Yang Qiu was seen by some as a belated vengeance.

To a modern sensitivity, with anxiety about "collateral damage" even in time of war, the brutality of Su Buwei's attack on Li Gao's innocent concubine and infant child, combined with his tasteless desecration of a tomb, arouses horror rather than sympathy. The fact that Guo Tai, the most noted moral critic of the day, not only defended but endorsed his conduct, and that he was supported by all right-thinking men, sheds an uneasy light upon the essential principles of reformist Confucianism at that time. [One may recall also the conduct of Wu Song 武松, hero of the romantic Ming novel Shuihu zhuan 水滸傳, who slaughtered men, women and children indiscriminately; e.g. chapter 31; Hsia 68:97-99.] -HHS 31/21:1107-09*, YSS:21a-b; Ch'ü 72:311.

Su Chen 蘇臣. An officer of Yan Cen in 27, Su Chen was defeated in Hongnong by Deng Ye and Yu Kuang, generals under the imperial commander Feng Yi, and surrendered with eight thousand men. -HHS 17/7:647.

Su Chun 蘇純 [Huangong 桓公]; Youfufeng. Scion of an old-established family, Su Chun was respected in the region about Chang'an for his forceful moral opinions.

In 73 Su Chun served under Dou Gu in the attack on the Northern Xiongnu and in the later expansion into the Western Regions. He did well, was enfeoffed, and later became Administrator of Nanyang. -HHS 31/2A:1106.

Su Dai 蘇代; Wu. Administrator of Changsha in 190, Su Dai acted as an independent warlord, but was persuaded to submit to Liu Biao. -SGZ 6:211-12.

Su Dan 疏耽; see Shu Dan 疏耽.

Su Ding 蘇定. Administrator of Jiaozhi in 40, Su Ding attempted to restrict the activities of Zheng Ce [Vietnamese: Tr'ung Trac], an energetic woman of chiefly lineage. Zheng Ce and her sister Zheng Er [Tr'ung Nhi], however, led a rebellion which captured the commandery capital and spread across all Han territory in present-day Vietnam. -HHS 86/76:2836.

Su E 蘇娥, the Lady; Cangwu. As the Lady Su was travelling, she and her attendant Zhi were murdered and robbed by the village headman Gong Shou. The crime was discovered by the Inspector of Jiaozhi Chen Chang, and Gong Shou was executed. -XC 6:13a-b.

Su Fei 蘇飛. A senior officer under Huang Zu, general of Liu Biao opposed to Sun Quan on the middle Yangzi, he several times recommended the fighting man Gan Ning, but without effect. Recognising Gan Ning's disappointment, Su Fei arranged for him to be sent away to be a county magistrate. Gan Ning was thus able to escape and join Sun Quan, while taking his personal troop of followers with him.

Soon afterwards, early in 208, Sun Quan made a final attack and destroyed Huang Zu. He had proclaimed that he had two boxes ready, one for the head of Huang Zu and the other for that of Su Fei. When Su Fei was taken, however, Gan Ning spoke on his behalf and Sun Quan let him go. -SGZ Wu 10:1292-93; deC 96:366-369.

Su Fei 蘇非. A senior officer under Guan Yu, about 210 he attempted to attack Xiangyang but was driven back by Cao Cao's garrison commander Yue Jin. -SGZ 17:521.

Su Gao 蘇高. Administrator of Jianwei, he reported the fine conduct of the widow Cheng Zhenjue. -HYGZ 10B:160.

Su Gu 蘇固; Youfufeng. Administrator of Hanzhong in 190, Su Gu was unwilling to accept the full authority of the new Governor Liu Yan. Liu Yan gave official positions to the religious leaders Zhang Xiu and Zhang Lu and sent them to attack Su Gu. They defeated and killed him, but then took Hanzhong for themselves. -HHS 75/65:2432, SGZ 8:263.

Su Heng 蘇衡. In 25 Su Heng held office in the warlord government of Wei Ao. -HHS 13/3:522.

Su Hong 蘇鴻. A Commandant in Ba commandery, Su Hong was killed by bandits about 150. -HYGZ 1:6.

Su Jing 蘇竟 [Bokuang 伯況]; Youfufeng. An expert in the Book of Changes and the History, at the end of Former Han Su Jing became an Academician in the latter discipline. In the time of Wang Mang he worked on text criticism with Liu Xin 劉歆 and was then a military officer in Dai commandery against the Xiongnu.

Following the fall of Wang Mang Su Jing was in Nanyang. About 27 he wrote a most eloquent letter to Liu Xin's kinsman Liu Gong, who was a member of staff of a junior commander under the condottiere Yan Cen, and he also addressed Liu Gong's senior officer Deng Zhongkuang. Both made terms with Han.

Guangwu later appointed Su Jing as Administrator of Dai, with responsibility once more for defence. In the winter of 29, however, as the renegade Lu Fang gained a strong position along the frontier the lieutenant-general Sui Di was sent to Dai. As Su Jing was taken ill, he transferred his troops to Sui Di and went to Luoyang with apologies for his lack of success. He was appointed as a Palace Attendant, but left office a few months later of account of his illness. [Su Jing's successor Liu Xing was killed in battle in the following year.]

In retirement Su Jing took pleasure in the study of esoteric arts. He died aged over seventy, leaving a text on conduct, Jihui pian 記誨篇, and other writings. - HHS 30/20A:1041-46*; QHX:492-493.

Su Kang 蘇康 (d.168). A eunuch, Su Kang became a Regular Attendant to Emperor Huan. In 165 the Minister of Finance Liu You reported that Su Kang and his colleague Guan Ba had enclosed good farmland and wilderness throughout the empire, to the hardship of common people. Emperor Huan, however, was angry at Liu You, and sent him to convict labour.

When Emperor Huan died in 167 his Empress Dou immediately killed his favoured concubine the Lady Tian Sheng, and she wanted to murder all the other Honoured Ladies who had shared the monarch's favour. Su Kang and Guan Ba protested and obliged her not to do so.

In 168, under the regency government of the Lady Dou, Dou Wu charged Guan Ba and Su Kang with wrong-doing and had them tortured to death. This was the first step in a planned attack on the eunuchs, eventually overturned by the eunuchs' counter-coup. The Dowager was not keen on that plan, but she may have been more ready to approve these initial deaths because of her disappointment at having been prevented from killing all her former rivals in the harem. -HHS 10B:446, 57/67:2199, 69/59:2242.

Su Kuang 蘇況; Hongnong. In the autumn of 26, Su Kuang raised a local rebellion, attacked the commandery capital and captured the Administrator. Emperor Guangwu's general Jing Dan died on the campaign, but Su Kuang is not heard of again. -HHS 22/12:773.

Su Kuang 王況 also as Yu Kuang 玉況 [Wenbo 文伯] (d.51); Jingzhao. A man of distinguished local family, learned in the Confucian classics and respected for his moral qualities, Su Kuang became Administrator of Chenliu. In 47 he was appointed Excellency over the Masses, and died in office four years later. -HHS 1B:75-79, 33/23:1152-53; Bn 79:61-63.

Xie Cheng's biography of Su Kuang, at XC 7: 8a, quoted by HHS 33/23:1153 TC, tells how his government of Chenliu so blessed the place that it escaped a plague of locusts [a similar story is ascribed to Zhao Xi in Pingyuan]. Xie Cheng also claims that Su Kuang became Excellency in 87, but this does not fit with any other source.

Su Lang 蘇林; Youfufeng. About 60 Su Lang was charged with having made false prognostications about current affairs based upon apocryphal and mystical works. He was arrested and executed. -HHS 40A:1334.

Su Lin 蘇林 [Xiaoyou 孝友]; Chenliu. A man of wide learning, Su Lin studied under Yu Sheng of Yingchuan. Expert in both ancient and modern orthography, he could interpret the most difficult passages of the classics and histories. About 211 he became a scholar in the suite of Cao Pi, who treated him with great courtesy. As Cao Pi took the imperial throne in 220 Su Lin was an Academician with additional titles as Serving within the Palace and Commandant of Cavalry; he joined Dong Ba to prepare a genealogy which linked the Cao family to the mythical Yellow Emperor.

When Cao Pi restored the Imperial University in 224, Su Lin was one of the first Academicians in the new order. He retired to his home on grounds of age, but continued to receive imperial signs of favour. He died aged over eighty. Yu Huan, compiler of Wei lue, identified Su Lin as one of seven Confucian Exemplars 儒宗 who maintained the tradition of Han scholarship in times of disorder. -SGZ 20:620-21; Fang 52:170-171, Goodman 98:107-108, 145.

Su Ling 蘇陵. Su Ling's name appears in the colophon of the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu in the Stone Classics engraved in the early 180s. He is described as a Gentleman of the Palace, which may have been only a probationary cadet appointment but may represent a more substantive rank. -LS 14:8b.

Su Mao 蘇茂 (d.29); Chenliu. Joining the rebellion of Han loyalists, Su Mao was named a general by the Gengshi Emperor. Early in 25 he took part in the campaign which destroyed the Young Prince Liu Ying in Anding. He then fought the Red Eyebrows in Hongnong, but was defeated and went to join the garrison at Luoyang under Zhu Wei.

Later that year, Su Mao was sent to make a flank attack on Guangwu's general Feng Yi while Zhu Wei attacked him directly. Su Mao was heavily defeated by Kou Xun, and both columns were driven back to Luoyang. In the winter Zhu Wei and his garrison surrendered. Emperor Guangwu again appointed Su Mao as a general.

In 26 Su Mao was sent under the command of He Yan to attack Liu Yong, who had taken the imperial title in Liang. Liu Yong was soon under siege in his capital, Suiyang in Liang, but at this point Su Mao changed sides once more. Coming from a neighbouring commandery, he appears to have been affected by local interest, and in the summer he killed Pan Jian, Guangwu's Administrator of Huaiyang, and joined Liu Yong.

Liu Yong named Su Mao as Grand Marshal and gave him title as King of Huaiyang, but as that territory was held by Guangwu's forces Su Mao set himself at Guangle, in the north of Liang. As He Yan maintained the siege of Suiyang, Su Mao attempted to relieve Liu Yong, but he was driven back.

In the autumn of 26 He Yan stormed Suiyang. Liu Yong and few dozen supporters fled to Su Mao. They were joined by Liu Yong's officers and allies Jiao Qiang and Zhou Jian, and they attempted a counter-attack but were once more defeated. Su Mao returned to Guangle, while Liu Yong went with Jiao Qiang and Zhou Jian to Huling city in Shanyang, eighty kilometres to the northeast.

In 27 Suiyang city rebelled against Guangwu and Liu Yong was able to return. He Yan once more laid siege, and in the summer Guangwu's Grand Marshal Wu Han attacked Guangle. Zhou Jian sought to relieve Su Mao, but was defeated and forced back into Huling, while Wu Han joined He Yan outside Suiyang. By autumn the city was starving, Liu Yong was killed as he attempted to escape, and both Suiyang and Guangle surrendered.

Still maintaining resistance, Su Mao and Zhou Jian withdrew to a new base at Chuihui in Pei, where they proclaimed Liu Yong's son Yu as King of Liang. The succession was recognised by Jiao Qiang in Shanyang, but Liu Yong's imperial claim was set aside and Liu Yu was no more than a figurehead for the warlord allies. Su Mao and Zhou Jian attempted to move north into Pengcheng, but they were defeated by He Yan and turned back.

In the autumn of 28 Guangwu's generals Ma Wu and Wang Ba laid siege to Liu Yu and Zhou Jian in Chuihui. Su Mao recruited some men from the remnants of the Wuxiao bandits who had been driven south of the Yellow River, and early in 29 he came to the relief with these new allies and a force of cavalry. He gained some initial success, capturing Ma Wu's baggage, and Zhou Jian and Liu Yu made a sortie which put Ma Wu's troops to flight. Wang Ba, however, held his men back until Su Mao and Zhou Jian had committed themselves to pursuit, then attacked their rear and reversed the course of the battle. On the following day Su Mao and Zhou Jian challenged him to fight, but Wang Ba held his men in camp and Su Mao and Zhou Jian were forced to withdraw for lack of supplies. As they returned to Chuihui, Zhou Jian's nephew Zhou Song changed sides and closed the gates against them. Liu Yu's party scattered, and Su Mao fled to Dong Xian in Donghai.

When Pang Meng rebelled in Chu and sought alliance with Dong Xian, Su Mao was sent to join him, and in the summer they laid siege to the city of Tao in Rencheng. In the autumn the warlord allies of the southeast were defeated by Guangwu at Changlü in Donghai, and Su Mao then fled north to Zhang Bu in the Shandong peninsula. Zhang Bu had just been defeated by Guangwu's general Geng Yan, and messengers were sent to him and to Su Mao, offering enfeoffment to whichever killed the other and surrendered. Zhang Bu struck first. -HHS 12/2,494-95; Bn 59.91-92, 103-104, 133-149.

Su Mao 蘇茂 see Su Mou 蘇茂.

Su Qian 蘇謙 [Zhongrang 仲讓] (d.166); Youfufeng. Member of the distinguished lineage which included Su Chun and Su Zhang, about 160 Su Qian became a commandery Investigator. The county magistrate Li Gao, a friend of the eunuch Ju Yuan, ruled with cruelty and greed, but because of his connections to the court no-one dared complain. Su Qian, however, impeached Li Gao, confiscated his goods and had him sent to convict service.

Su Qian held further offices in the imperial service, became Administrator of Jincheng and then retired to his home country. According to regulations, such a former provincial official was forbidden to visit the imperial capital without permission, but in 166 Su Qian made a private visit to Luoyang. Li Gao had become Director of Retainers; he took the opportunity to arrest Su Qian, had him die in prison, and then beat his corpse to avenge himself for the past humiliation.

Su Qian's son Su Buwei later exacted a ferocious revenge. -HHS 31/21:1107-08, YSS:21a; Ch'ü 72:311, deC 89:127-128.

Su Shuang 蘇雙; Zhongshan. Wealthy merchants, Su Shuang and Zhang Shiping went to Zhuo commandery about 180 to trade in horses. They met and were impressed by the fighting man Liu Bei, and gave him gold and other valuables so that he might recruit a large troop of followers. -SGZ Shu 2:872.

Su Shun 蘇順 [Xiaoshan 孝山]; Jingzhao. In the latter part of the first century Su Shun was celebrated for his literary and scholarly ability. He lived, however, in seclusion, paying chief attention to the means of nourishing life 好養生術 and the search for the Way. He accepted court appointment in old age, but died without holding substantive office. His collected works amounted to sixteen pian of rhapsodies, essays and eulogies, including one to Emperor He. -HHS 80/70A:2617*; Vervoorn 90:188.

Su Teng 蘇騰; Pingyuan. A private gentleman 處士, about 175 Su Teng joined in the erection of a stele at the temple of the ancient and worthy hermits Boyi 伯夷 and Shuqi 叔齊 at Shouyang Mountain. -SJZ 5:3a.

Su Tong 蘇統; Julu. A private scholar, Su Tong was known as an expert on calendrical studies, and in 85 he was consulted by Jia Kui when he prepared his report on the revised Sifen 四分 [Quarter Day] calendar for Emperor Zhang. -HHS 92/2:3027.

Su Xiang 宿詳 became Administrator of Yanmen. -FSTY 6f:135.

Su Yan 宿彥; Chenliu. Probably in the 170s, the clerical officer Su Yan was questioned by Cai Yong and confirmed the remarkable mourning behaviour of the youthful Cheng Wei. -Cai 8:2.

Su Ye 蘇鄴 (d.46). Director of Retainers in 46, Su Ye was accused of inappropriate association with the gentlemen Wang Pan and Ding Hong. All three died in prison. -HHS 1B:74, 24/14:851.

Su [Yishan] 蘇義山; Nanyang. A former Investigator of the commandery, in 156 Su Yishan, whose personal name is lost, was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17: 17a.

Su You 蘇由/游. In 204 Su You was left with Shen Pei to guard Yuan Shang's base at Ye city. As Cao Cao approached he changed sides and attempted an internal coup, but was defeated and fled. -SGZ 6:202.

Su Yue 蘇越. When Cao Cao was at Luoyang in 219 he ordered the construction of a new Hall of the Established Beginning. As the workman Su Yue began to cut a tree, the sap that flowed out looked like blood; soon afterwards, Cao Cao died. -SGZ 1:53.

Su Ze 蘇則 [Wenshi 文師] (d.223); Youfufeng. A descendant of Su Chun and Su Zhang, Su Ze was celebrated for his learning when he was young, and for his fierce honesty, but he refused early recommendations for office. About 195, as Chang'an fell into disorder, he took refuge in Beidi and then in Anding, where he received grudging patronage from the wealthy Shi Liang. About 200 he returned to his homeland, but then went with Ji Mao to live as a hermit scholar in the Qin Ling ranges.

Probably after Cao Cao's victory over the warlords of Liang province in 211, Su Ze held office as Administrator in the frontier commanderies of Jiuquan, Anding and Wudu. Isolated from the main centre of Cao Cao's power, he was obliged to rely upon his own resources and strategy, and it is questionable how far his writ could be made to run. In each territory, however, he established a strong reputation.

In 215, as Cao Cao moved against Zhang Lu in Hanzhong, he met Su Ze, was impressed by him, and appointed him to his staff as local adviser. After Zhang Lu surrendered, Su Ze negotiated the submission of various tribes of the Di people, and opened communications across the Yellow River. He was named Administrator of Jincheng, and though Cao Cao's policy was concentrated south towards Yi province rather than out to the northwest, Su Ze settled refugees, made peace with the non-Chinese, and put down rebellions.

In 220 Su Ze received additional appointment as Protector of the Qiang and was enfeoffed. In that year the new government of Cao Pi sent Zou Qi as Inspector of the new Liang 涼 province to restore civil administration in the far west. Led by Huang Hua and Wang Zhao, the local Chinese and non-Chinese combined against him, but with support from Zhang Ji, Inspector of Yong 雍 province on the east, and Zhang Gong the chieftain of Dunhuang, and despite policy restricting operations west of the Yellow River, Su Ze gathered an army to defeat the rebels, settle the region, and open the road to central Asia.

Su Ze was raised in fief and brought to court as a Palace Attendant, but lost favour when he criticised Cao Pi. Sent out again to provincial office, he died on the road. He was awarded posthumous honours, and was considered the most successful frontier general of Wei. -SGZ 16:490-93*; Fang 52:5-7, 26-28, Mather 76:571.

Su Zhang 蘇章 [Shicheng 士成]; Beihai. An enthusiastic scholar, Su Zhang travelled widely in search of the best teachers. -XC 1:9a.

Su Zhang 蘇章 [Ruwen 孺文]; Youfufeng. A grandson of Su Chun, Su Zhang was widely learned. In the time of Emperor An he was recommended as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright. Graded First Class, he became a Consultant and gave good advice on a number of matters. He was then sent out as a county magistrate to Pengcheng, where he alleviated a failed harvest by prompt opening of the official granary.

In the time of Emperor Shun Su Zhang became Inspector of Ji province. As the Administrator of Qinghe, an old friend, was under investigation for corruption, Su Zhang visited the commandery and invited him with great courtesy, but arrested and sentenced him next day. Asked to explain such a volte-face, he replied that on the first evening he had paid his duties as a friend, but the second day was official business.

Su Zhang was transferred to Bing province, but was dismissed for being unduly harsh to leading local families, and ignoring orders to be more lenient. He retired to his home, and though he was invited to become Intendant of Henan and praised as one of those who could assist in troubled times, he took no further part in public life. -HHS 31/21:1106-07*; Ch'ü 72:470.

Su Zhenghe 蘇正和; Wuwei. About 180 Su Zhenghe was an Assistant Officer of Liang province. The Administrator of Wuwei, who was well connected to the palace, abused his position to indulge his lust and greed. Su Zhenghe reported his misconduct, but the Inspector Liang Gu was anxious to avoid the political implications, and he thought to rid himself of the problem by killing Su Zhenghe. He consulted He Xun, to whom Su Zhenghe had once done a bad turn, but He Xun refused to allow his private enmity to affect his official position. He persuaded Liang Gu that Su Zhenghe was a worthy and useful officer, who should not be attacked in this way. Su Zhenghe attempted to call upon He Xun to offer his thanks, but He Xun refused to see him, saying, "My advice was given for Commissioner Liang, not for you," and he liked him no better than before. -HHS 58/48:1879; deC 89:186-187.

Su Zhi 蘇祇. At the end of 125, after the overthrow of the Yan clan and the restoration of Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, to the imperial succession, the scholar-official Cui Yuan, who had been on the staff of Yan Xian, was disgraced for his connection to the defeated faction. Su Zhi, a former student of Cui Yuan, sent a letter to the throne to tell how Cui Yuan had sought to persuade Yan Xian to restore Liu Bao to the succession. Cui Yuan refused such support, however, and retired to his home. -HHS 52/42:1723.

Subahui 蘇拔廌; Xianbi. A senior chieftain of his people, in 94 Subahui brought a force of cavalry to assist Ren Shang the Protector of the Wuhuan in pursuit of the renegade Xiongnu prince Fenghou. Their troops ambushed Fenghou and inflicted a heavy defeat, but the main body of the enemy escaped across the frontier and the imperial army abandoned the chase.

Subahui was rewarded for his services with title as King Who Leads his People 率眾王 and with gifts of gold and silk, but this was the last occasion of effective co-operation between Xianbi and Han. In 97 there is recorded the first of many future raids against the northern commanderies of the empire. -HHS 89/79:2958, deC 84:295.

Sufuwán 速附丸 i.e. Supuyan 蘇僕延. -SGZ 30:835.

Sui Di 隨弟. In the winter of 29, as the renegade Lu Fang held a strong position along the frontier, the lieutenant-general Sui Di was sent to Dai. The Administrator Su Jing transferred his troops to him and retired to Luoyang. In the following year Lu Fang's forces overran the commandery. -HHS 30/20A:1041; Bn 67:106.

Sui Fan 隨蕃 is mentioned by FSTY 6f:146.

Sui Gu 眭固 [Botu 白兔] (d.199). In 185 Sui Gu was a leader among the Black Mountain bandits in the Taihang range. In 191 he and others of the group were defeated by Cao Cao in Dong commandery, and in 192 Cao Cao defeated him and Yufuluo of the Xiongnu in Wei.

In 198 Sui Gu was a subordinate commander of Zhang Yang the Administrator of Henei. Zhang Yang was killed by his officer Yang Chou, and Sui Gu killed Yang Chou in turn. Though Zhang Yang's officer Miao Shang took over his title, Sui Gu was evidently the senior military commander and held power in the region. An old enemy of Cao Cao, he gave allegiance to Yuan Shao.

In the following year Cao Cao sent his officers Shi Huan and Cao Ren against him. Sui Gu sought help from Yuan Shao, but he was defeated and killed. It is said that Sui Gu camped at Shequan 射犬 "Shoot Dog" county, and a soothsayer warned him that a place with "dog" in its name was ill omened for a general whose style was "White Hare" 白兔. Sui Gu paid no attention, but suffered an appropriate fate. His troops were taken over by Cao Cao. -SGZ 1:8-9, 17, 8:251-52, HHS 71/6A:2311 [where the surname appears as Qi 畦].

Sui Xian 隨憲 also as 隋憲; Wuyuan. Sui Xian was a younger brother of Lu Fang's general Sui Yu, who turned against Lu Fang in 36 and surrendered to Emperor Guangwu. Sui Xian followed him and was granted a marquisate in the contested frontier commandery of Dingxiang. -HHS 12/2:507.

Sui Yu 隨昱 also as 隋昱; Wuyuan. A local warlord, in 28 Sui Yu was persuaded by an emissary of the Xiongnu Shanyu Yu to give his support to the pretender Lu Fang., and in the following year Lu Fang set his capital at Jiuyuan city in Wuyuan.

As Lu Fang led an army against Yunzhong in 36, he left Sui Yu in charge of Jiuyuan, but Sui Yu changed sides and attempted to capture him. Though Lu Fang escaped, his men joined Sui Yu, who went to Guo Ji, Guangwu's Governor of Bing province. Sui Yu was named Administrator of Wuyuan and entitled Marquis Who Chisels Away the Northern Barbarians 鑄胡侯. -HHS 12/2:506-07, 31/2A:1093.

Sui Yuanjin 眭元進 (d.200). An officer in the escort for Yuan Shao's supply train near Guandu, he was killed by Cao Cao's raiding party. -SGZ 1:22, HHS 74/64A:2401 [where the surname appears as Ju 睢].

Suicheng 遂成 of Gaogouli [Koguryo]. Known in Korean history as Susong, Suicheng was the son and Heir of King Gong. In the spring of 121, as Feng Huan the Inspector of You province led a punitive expedition across the frontier, Gong sent Suicheng with two thousand men in pretence of surrender. Yao Guang, Administrator of Xuantu, believed him, and the enemy took advantage of the respite to occupy defensive positions while they sent infiltrators into Chinese territory, burning settlements and killing or wounding two thousand people.

As the Chinese were disrupted by internal disputes, further successful raids followed. Gaogouli and its allied forces then besieged the capital of Xuantu, but in the winter they were defeated by Chinese provincial forces and an army from Fuyu, northern neighbours of Gaogouli.

Gong died at this time and Suicheng succeeded him, and though the Chinese sent diplomatic condolences rather than following up their success, it appears the set-back had been significant, and the threat from Fuyu was now a matter of real concern. Early in 122, therefore, Suicheng made a genuine surrender, sending back all the Chinese he had captured and receiving rewards for each of them.

Later Korean tradition describes Suicheng as a tyrant who was eventually assassinated by one of his own ministers, and it does appear that his reign was a period of unrest and comparative weakness after the earlier successes of his father Gong. Suicheng died about 130, and his son Bogu [Paekko] evidently came to the throne as a minor. -HHS 85/75:2814-15, Gardiner 69A:32, 69B:172-186.

Suli 素利 (d.228); Xianbi. A commander in the eastern region under Tanshihuai in the 170s, Suli was later independent beyond the frontier. His territory was not directly connected to China, but about 207 Yan Rou persuaded him and other chieftains to pay tribute to Cao Cao. They established trading relations and were enfeoffed as kings.

In 220 Suli's royal title was re-confirmed by Cao Pi. In 224 he was attacked by the powerful Kebineng, but he was relieved by the Protector of the Wuhuan Tian Yu and thereafter maintained an uneasy independence. -SGZ 30:838-40; Fang 52:62, 95-96, 181.

Sumashi 蘇馬謨; non-Chinese. A chieftain of the Han 韓 people of south-western Korea, in 34 Sumashi came to Lelang commandery with tribute. Emperor Guangwu granted him a noble title, with a fief dependent upon Lelang. -HHS 85/75:2820.

Sun 孫, the Lady I; Wu. Mother of Sun Jian, when she was pregnant with him she dreamt her intestines came out and wound themselves about the main gate of Wu city. A neighbour woman suggested this was not necessarily a bad sign, but whatever the significance of the omen, it was confused by the fact that the Lady gave birth to twins: cf. Sun Qiang. -SGZ Wu 1:1093; deC 90:74.

Sun 孫, the Lady II; Wu. Younger sister of Sun Jian, she married Xu Zhen. In 195 she was with her son Xu Kun as he joined Sun Ce to attack across the Yangzi and, rather than waiting for ships to be prepared, she suggested building rafts for the army from rushes and reeds. -SGZ Wu 5:1197.

Sun 孫, the Lady III; Wu. Daughter of Sun Jian by the Lady Wu, in 209 she was given as wife to Liu Bei by her brother Sun Quan. A woman of character, who maintained a corps of armed female retainers, she frightened her husband and was regarded as a threat to his embryo state.

When Liu Bei went to Yi province in 211, the Lady Sun returned east to her brother. She tried to take his infant son and heir Liu Shan with her, to serve as a future hostage, but her cortège was intercepted by Zhao Yun and Zhang Fei, who brought the boy back. -SGZ Shu 6:949, 7:960, HYGZ 6:82; deC 90:86, 294-295, C/C 99:46-47, 177.

Sun 孫, the Lady IV; Wu. Daughter of Sun Jian by a concubine, she married Hong Zi. -SGZ Wu 7:1231; deC 90:86.

Sun 孫, the Lady V; Wu. Daughter of Sun Jian by a woman of the Chen family, she married Pan Mi 潘祕, son of Pan Jun. -SGZ Wu 16:1399; deC 90:86.

Sun 孫, the Lady VI; Wu. Daughter of Sun Ben, in 198 she was married to Cao Zhang, son of Cao Cao. -SGZ Wu 1:1104.

Sun 孫, the Lady VII; Wu. Daughter of Sun Ce, about 217 she married Lu Xun. -SGZ Wu 13:1343.

Sun 孫, the Lady VIII; Wu. Daughter of Sun Ce, she married Gu Shao. -SGZ Wu 12:1229.

Sun 孫, the Lady IX; Wu. Daughter of Sun Fu, she married Luo Tong. -SGZ Wu 12:1335.

Sun 孫, the Lady X. A concubine of Cao Cao, she was the mother of Cao Zishang, Cao Biao and Cao Ziqin. -SGZ 20:579.

Sun 孫, the Lady: see also the Lady Liang IV.

Sun An 孫安. A nephew of the Lady Sun Shou, wife of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, Sun An was formally too young to hold office, but was nevertheless appointed a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates and given office in the Feathered Forest corps of guards. -HHSJ 34/24:1257 Hou Kang quoting Taiping yulan 242.

Sun Ben 孫贇 [Boyang 伯陽] (d.220); Wu. Born about 174, the elder son of Sun Qiang, Sun Ben was orphaned young, but cared for his young brother Sun Fu. Having held local office in Wu, he joined his uncle Sun Jian in 189 and took part in his campaigns.

When Sun Jian was killed in 191, Sun Ben, still only in his teens, took over his personal following in the service of Yuan Shu. Defeating Zhou Ang, Administrator of Jiujiang for Yuan Shao, he was named Inspector of Yu.

Sun Ben was later sent to join Wu Jing in Danyang, but in 194 they were driven away by Liu Yao. When Sun Ce arrived in 195, they returned south of the Yangzi and took part in his first campaigns.

In 196 Sun Ben returned to Yuan Shu. When Yuan Shu took the imperial title in 197 he appointed Sun Ben his Administrator of Jiujiang, but at the invitation of Sun Ce he went back south of the Yangzi. He had difficulty leaving Yuan Shu, and was obliged to abandon his wife and children, but he evidently recovered them later, for his daughter married Cao Cao's son Zhang.

Following the successful attack on Liu Xun in Lujiang in 199, and the death of Liu Yao in Yuzhang, Sun Ben was named Administrator of the latter commandery and then assisted his brother Sun Fu to defeat Tong Zhi.

Because of the marital connection, as Cao Cao occupied Jing province in 208 Sun Ben was inclined to support submission and the sending of hostages. Zhu Zhi, an old friend of the family, spoke firmly to him and Sun Ben changed his mind. Enfeoffed and given title as a general, he remained in Yuzhang until his death about 220. He was then succeeded in office by his son Sun Lin 隣, aged nine sui. -SGZ Wu 6:1209-10*.

Sun Biao 孫表. Sun Biao's name appears in the colophon to Analects in the Stone Classics engraved in the early 180s. He is described as a Gentleman of the Palace, which may be no more than a probationary cadet appointment or may represent a more substantive rank. -LS 14:13a.

Sun Bin 孫斌; Dong. During the 150s Sun Bin was a county officer under the magistrate Diwu Zhong, who treated him well.

In 160 the eunuch Shan Chao had Diwu Zhong exiled to Shuofang, where the Administrator Dong Yuan, a kinsman of Shan Chao, planned to kill him. Sun Bin told his friends Zhen Ziran and Lü Zizhi about it, and they gathered a troop to waylay Diwu Zhong's escort. They killed several men, then took Diwu Zhong to refuge until he was released through an amnesty. -HHS 41/31:1404.

Sun Bin 孫賓; Jianwei? The parents of the widowed Lady Cao Jing planned to betroth her to Sun Bin. -HYGZ 10B:160.

Sun Cang 孫倉; Shanggu. A local officer under the Administrator Geng Kuang in 24, he was sent with Geng Kuang's son Geng Yan on a tribute mission to the new Gengshi Emperor. As the party arrived in Julu, the pretender Wang Lang proclaimed his rebellion, and Sun Cang and his colleague Wei Bao wanted to join him. Geng Yan threatened them with a sword, but could not prevent them. -HHS 19/9:704.

Sun Ce 孫策 [Bofu 伯符] (175-200); Wu [posthumously titled King Huan of Wu 吳桓王]. Eldest son of Sun Jian, in the early 190s Sun Ce was with his mother and family in Lujiang, Danyang and Guangling, where he gained notice among his contemporaries and seniors. When his late father's old commander Yuan Shu was driven south to Jiujiang in 193, Sun Ce sought appointment, and some of his father's former troops took service with him. He was sent south of the Yangzi to join his uncle and cousin Wu Jing and Sun Ben, but was defeated by Zu Lang and returned north in the following year.

Named a colonel and granted another thousand men, Sun Ce attacked Lujiang for Yuan Shu. He was promised further promotions, but was disappointed each time, and in 195 he obtained permission to go back and support Wu Jing and Sun Ben against Liu Yao, Yuan Shu's new rival for Yang province.

Despite his youth, Sun Ce displayed remarkable military ability. Swiftly recognised as leader of the clan-based army, he crossed the Yangzi and in a series of engagements he defeated Liu Yao, his allies and subordinates. By early 196 he controlled much of Danyang and part of Wu, while Liu Yao took refuge in Yuzhang.

Sun Ce now invaded Kuaiji, pursued the Administrator Wang Lang down the coast to Dongye by present-day Fuzhou, captured him, then returned to deal with local opponents in Wu commandery. Naming himself Administrator of Kuaiji, he distributed similar titles to his ally Zhu Zhi, to Wu Jing and other members of his family. As Yuan Shu took the imperial title in 197, Sun Ce rejected his allegiance and made formal alliance with Cao Cao, who controlled the Han court at Xu city. He was enfeoffed as Marquis of Wu and styled General Who Exterminates Rebels, but demonstrated his independence by driving Cao Cao's agent Chen Yu back to the north.

In 198 Sun Ce eliminated his minor opponents in Danyang, and in the following year he moved upstream to the west. In swift succession he drove Liu Xun away and captured Lujiang, together with the remnants of Yuan Shu's party, then defeated Huang Zu, general of Liu Biao the Inspector of Jing province. Early in 200 he received the surrender of Hua Xin the Administrator of Yuzhang and took over that territory.

Sun Ce's forces were now unmatched in the southeast, but there was a rebellion in Wu led by Xu Gong and White Tiger Yan. Returning east, Sun Ce captured Xu Gong and killed him, then prepared to attack White Tiger Yan. Before he could do so, he was ambushed while hunting by retainers of Xu Gong, and died of the wounds they inflicted. There are stories that he was haunted by Gan Ji, a teacher and adept whom he had put to death as a rival to his own authority.

Young Gentleman Sun 孫郎 had a generous nature, a sense of humour and remarkable ability as a military commander: he was only twenty-six sui when he died, but he had laid the foundations of an independent state in the south. -SGZ Wu 1:1101-12*; deC 90, Mather 76: 573-574.

Sun Ce 孫策, wife of: see the Lady Qiao 橋 I.

Sun Chang 孫常; Kuaiji. Sun Chang and his younger brother Sun Lie maintained separate households and farmed separate land. When Sun Lie died in the early 20s, at a time of famine, Sun Chang provided food to his widow and children, but had title to his property transferred to himself.

When Sun Lie's son grew up, he sued to recover his father's land. When the case was heard at the commandery, a majority of the officers held that the arrangement was fair and that the claimant was behaving in unfilial fashion towards a senior kinsman. Zhongli Yi, however, argued that Sun Chang had responsibility to care for his brother's dependents, and he should not have taken their property under duress. This view carried the day. -HHSJJ 41/31:1492 Hui Dong quoting Kuaiji dianlu.

Sun Cheng 孫程 [Zhiqing 稚卿] (d.132); Zhuo. A eunuch, Sun Cheng became a junior officer of the imperial harem in the time of Emperor An, and served in the palace of the Dowager Deng, who acted as regent without allowing the emperor any authority.

When the Dowager died in 121 and Emperor An was able to take power for himself, he turned against her family and accepted advice from personal favourites. In 124, under the influence of his Empress Yan, the eunuchs Jiang Jing and Fan Feng, and a clique of others, he deposed his son and heir Liu Bao. In the following year Emperor An died, and the Dowager Yan established her own nominee, the five-year-old Liu Yi, known as the Little Emperor.

Soon after his accession, Liu Yi became seriously ill, and in the months which followed Sun Cheng enlisted Xing Qu, Wang Kang and Wang Guo in planning a coup to restore Liu Bao. The boy ruler died on 10 December, and four days later Sun Cheng and his associates gathered supporters among the eunuchs at the Hall of Virtuous Light in the Northern Palace, where the former Heir was imprisoned; they cut their clothes to swear an oath to him.

On 16 December the conspirators attacked. Killing Jiang Jing and other leaders of the Yan faction, and taking the influential eunuch Li Run as hostage to give credit to their actions, they set the ten-year-old Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne and established control of the Imperial Secretariat. The Yan group attempted a counter-attack, but the troops refused their orders, and they and their leading associates were captured and executed. By 18 December the new regime was firmly in place, and on 21 December an edict could even order that remnants of the Yan group should be treated leniently.

Sun Cheng was given honorary appointment as Commandant of Cavalry and enfeoffed as a county marquis in Bohai with a pension from ten thousand households, while eighteen of his colleagues and fellow-conspirators also received fiefs.

Early in 126 the Director of Retainers Yu Xu levied accusations of conspiracy and faction against the eunuch Zhang Fang. Though he had taken no part in the coup, Zhang Fang was a favourite of the emperor, who was reluctant to have him disgraced. In support of Yu Xu, Sun Cheng and his colleagues Zhang Xian, Meng Shu and Ma Guo, forced Zhang Fang to leave his position beside the throne and face charges in the body of the court. Zhang Fang was disgraced and exiled, some of his associates were executed, and others were sentenced to convict service or fined. Yu Xu had been imprisoned, but he now received a high post in the Secretariat.

Sun Cheng and his allies had acted high-handedly in the presence of the emperor, and the young ruler was angry at their conduct and at the result which had been forced upon him. He ordered Sun Cheng and others to go to their fiefs, and Sun Cheng's estate was shifted from his Bohai to an outpost county by the Yangzi Gorges in Nan commandery. Bitterly resentful, Sun Cheng returned his insignia and retired into the hills. Members of the Imperial Secretariat sought to remind the ruler how much he owed to Sun Cheng and his fellows, but they received no response.

Eventually, at the urgings of his clerk Zhou Ju, the Excellency Zhu Chang joined the protest, and the emperor now felt embarrassed. He sent men to seek out Sun Cheng, awarded him carriages, horses, clothing and other gifts, and restored his former territory. In 128, moreover, Emperor Shun formally recalled the achievement of the past and summoned Sun Cheng and his colleagues back to the capital. He renewed Sun Cheng's appointment as Commandant of Cavalry, gave comparable awards to his associates, and named them Servants at Court, permitting them to remain at the capital.

In 132, as Sun Cheng became extremely ill, he was granted title as General of Chariots and Cavalry and Specially Advanced, positions never before held by a eunuch. When he died soon afterwards he was granted a posthumous title, while his funeral was honoured by the emperor and accompanied by a special escort.

In response to his deathbed request, Sun Cheng's fief was granted to his younger brother Mei, but Emperor Shun also awarded half the estate and the title to Sun Cheng's adopted son Shou. In 114 the adopted son of the eunuch Zheng Zhong had been granted the succession to his fief, but this award to Sun Shou became the precedent for an edict in 135, which authorised all eunuch marquises to pass on their fiefs in this way. -HHS 78/68:2514-18*; Ch'ü 72:464-470, Bn 76:91-93.

Sun Chun 孫純. In 76 Sun Chen was Administrator of Longxi when the Bi'nan tribe of the Qiang killed the magistrate Zong Yan and raided the frontier. Sun Chen sent his officer Li Mu to join forces with troops from Jincheng and they defeated the insurgents. -HHS 87/77:2881.

Sun Chuo 孫綽; Wu. Son of Sun Gao 髡, Sun Chuo was a Commandant under his cousin Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 19:1444.

Sun Cong 孫琮 [Weishi 威石]; Beihai. Formerly Inspector of Qing province and then Administrator of Hanyang, Sun Cong had a tomb in his homeland. -Nagata 94:312.

Sun Deng 孫登 (d.26). A leader of bandits in Shang commandery, in the winter of 26 Sun Deng was proclaimed Son of Heaven by a combination of the Bronze Horse, Green Calf and Youlai groups. Very soon afterwards he was killed by his subordinate Yue Xuan, who brought the whole band, fifty thousand strong, to surrender to Emperor Guangwu.

An apocryphal prophecy concerning Sun Deng was later used by the ambitious sooth-sayer Zhai Fu. -HHS 1A:31, 48/38:1602.

Sun Deng 孫登 [Zigao 子高] (209-241); Wu. Though Sun Deng was the first-born son of Sun Quan, and always recognised as the senior among his brothers, his mother was of such poor background that there is no record of her name or family. Sun Deng was early given into the care of the Lady Xu V, consort of Sun Quan. He was always grateful to her, and while he accepted the position of her successor the Lady Bu in his father's affections, and showed her proper courtesy, on at least one occasion he spoke firmly on behalf of the Lady Xu as the senior wife.

When Sun Quan became King of Wu in 222, he named Sun Deng as his Heir, and the decisive break with Cao Pi of Wei took place when he refused to send Sun Deng as a hostage to the northern court.

Sun Quan chose Sun Deng's companions carefully, and he married him to a daughter of his great general Zhou Yu. When he took the imperial title in 229, he again appointed Sun Deng as Heir, and in that year, at the age of twenty, Sun Deng was left in formal command at Wuchang city in Jing province [formerly E county of Jiangxia in Later Han] while Sun Quan set his capital at Jianye in Danyang, present-day Nanjing. When his younger brother Sun Lü died in 232, Sun Deng took up residence at Jianye to be with Sun Quan, and affairs of the west were left with Lu Xun.

Sun Deng was interested in Huang-Lao, and encouraged Sun Quan in that doctrine. Though generally trusted by his father, he was unsuccessful in his protests against the short-lived influence of the favourite Lü Yi 呂壹 in 238.

After Sun Deng's death in 241, the succession of Wu became confused by rivalries at court and the caprices of an aging ruler. -SGZ Wu 14:1363-66*; C/C 99:218, deC 90:483, 499, 527, 529.

Sun Fu 孫福. In 26 Sun Fu was Administrator of Taiyuan when a horde of Red Eyebrows invaded the commandery. As they attacked the capital, Sun Fu's staff officer Liu Mao took Sun Fu and his family away to hide in a cave. They then went to a neighbouring county, where the party lay concealed during the day and Liu Mao gathered food by night. After three months the bandits left and Sun Fu was able to return to his commandery headquarters.

In the following year an edict called for nominations of Men of Honour. Sun Fu reported Liu Mao's fine conduct and Liu Mao was given office at the capital. -HHS 81/71:2671; Bn 54:46.

Sun Fu 孫輔 [Guoyi 國儀]; Wu. Born about 174, Sun Fu was a son of Sun Qiang and younger brother of Sun

Ben, who cared for him after their parents died. Sun Fu accompanied his cousin Sun Ce to the conquest of Danyang in 196, and in 197 he commanded the defence against Yuan Shu on the line of the Yangzi.

Following the successful attacks on Zu Lang and Liu Xun, in 199 Sun Fu joined Zhou Yu and his brother Sun Ben to defeat Tong Zhi in Luling, the southern part of Yuzhang, and was named Administrator there. He later received titles as a general and as Inspector of Jiao.

Later, probably after 208, Sun Fu was found to have been in correspondence with Cao Cao. He was exiled, his advisers were killed, and his followers were divided amongst members of the family. -SGZ Wu 6: 1211-12*; deC 90:260-261.

Sun Gan 孫乾 [Gongyou 公祐]; Beihai. When Liu Bei succeeded Tao Qian as Governor of Xu province in 194, Sun Gan was recommended to him by the scholar Zheng Xuan. He became a member of Liu Bei's personal staff and was frequently used as an envoy.

When Liu Bei rebelled against Cao Cao in 199, he sent Sun Gan to make alliance with Yuan Shao in the north, and as he sought to take refuge with Liu Biao in Jing province in 201 he sent Sun Gan and Mi Zhu to negotiate terms. Sun Gan remained a close confidant to Liu Bei, comparable to Mi Zhu and Jian Yong.

As Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214, Sun Gan received title as a general. He died soon afterwards. -SGZ Shu 8:970*.

Sun Gao 孫鬲; Wu. Sun Gao was the eldest son of Sun Jing, who was a younger brother of Sun Jian and uncle to Sun Ce. When Sun Ce died in 200, Sun Gao was stationed in Kuaiji with rank as a General of the Household. Though he came of a junior lineage, Sun Gao was older than Sun Ce and his brother Sun Quan. There was suspicion he might take over the commandery and claim leadership of the warlord enterprise, but Yu Fan, an older supporter of Sun Ce and at that time a magistrate in Kuaiji, warned him that none of the local officials would support him against Sun Quan. Sun Gao gave up his ambitions.

Though his four brothers held office under Sun Quan, and his sons played a role in the later history of Wu, Sun Gao does not appear to have held any senior position thereafter; he was probably kept at the family home. He has no individual biography in SGZ. -SGZ Wu 12:1319, 19:1444; deC 90:215-216 [as Sun Song].

Sun Gao 孫高. In 204 the Administrator of Danyang, Sun Yi, was murdered by Gui Lan and Dai Yuan, but Sun Yi's widow the Lady Xu IV had Sun Gao and other loyal officers kill the two mutineers. Sun Quan rewarded Sun Gao with appointment to his own headquarters staff. -SGZ Wu 6:1214-15; deC 90:232-234.

Sun Gen 孫根 [Yuanshi 元石] (111-181); Beihai. Sun Gen was a nephew of the Excellency Sun Lang; another uncle was Administrator of Le'an and a younger brother was Administrator of Hanyang and a member of the Imperial Censorate. Sun Gen himself held a number of court and provincial appointments and rose to be Chancellor of Anping.

A stele was set up to honour Sun Gen, with a sponsor list of almost 250 names, the vast majority being men of the Sun surname. Several of the titles claimed were current in Wei and Jin, not in Han, so it appears the list was added to in later years. -LS 10:10b-17b.

Sun Gong 孫恭; Wu. Son of Sun Gao 嵩, Sun Gong held court appointment under his cousin Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 19:1444.

Sun Guan 孫觀 [Zhongtai 仲臺] (d.217); Taishan. Chief of a bandit or clan self-defence group in the region of Mount Tai, he had the nickname "Baby" 嬰兒. His elder brother Kang was also a leader, but it appears Sun Guan was the dominant member of the family.

About 194 Sun Guan and the other leaders of groups in the region acceded to the authority of Zang Ba. They destroyed the local Yellow Turbans, and Sun Guan took title as a Commandant of Cavalry. In 198 he and his fellows went with Zang Ba to assist Lü Bu against Cao Cao, but when Zang Ba was captured and accepted service under Cao Cao he persuaded his fellows to follow suit. They were named as administrators of a series of commanderies about their bases in Mount Tai, and Sun Guan received the territory of Beihai.

Sun Guan accompanied Zang Ba on subsequent campaigns, guarding the east against Yuan Shao in 199 and 200, defeating Yuan Tan in Bohai in 205, and then settling the region of present-day Shandong. Regarded as second only to Zang Ba, he and Sun Kang and their colleagues were all rewarded with enfeoffment.

After the destruction of Yuan Tan, Sun Guan sent members of his family as hostages in Cao Cao's base at Ye city. He was appointed a lieutenant-general, and later became Inspector of Qing province with the Staff of Authority.

In 217 Sun Guan brought troops to join Cao Cao's attack on Sun Quan's positions on the north bank of the Yangzi. Though badly wounded in the foot, he continued to fight. Cao Cao, full of admiration, gave him field promotion to full general, but Sun Guan died of his wound soon afterwards. -SGZ 18:537-39.

Sun Guang 孫光. In 171 Sun Guang and other members of the staff of Yan province set up a stele in honour of the former Inspector Yang Shugong near the provincial headquarters at Changyi in Shanyang. -S/JZ 8:22a.

Sun Gui 孫規. An officer of Sun Quan, in 215 Sun Gui accompanied Lü Meng to seize the southern commanderies of Jing province from Guan Yu and Liu Bei. -SGZ Wu 2:1119, 9:1277.

Sun Hao 孫嵩 see Sun Song 孫嵩/崧.

Sun He 孫河 [Bohai 伯海] (d.204); Wu. A kinsman of Sun Jian, Sun He was adopted into the Yu 俞 family to maintain a lineage which would otherwise have continued through females. He followed Sun Jian to war and commanded his bodyguard, and in 195 he accompanied Sun Ce south of the Yangzi. In recognition of his loyalty, Sun Ce had him resume the family surname, and he became a county magistrate in Wu.

In 200 Sun He joined Sun Quan's attack on Li Shu in Lujiang and was named Administrator of the commandery.

In 204 Sun He held a general's command on the border of Wu commandery with Danyang. When Sun Yi the Administrator of Danyang was killed by Bian Hong, Sun He went to investigate, and he found fault with Gui Lan and Dai Yuan, Bian Hong's superiors. The two men were afraid, so they killed Sun He and went over to Cao Cao. They were destroyed soon afterwards. -SGZ Wu 6:1214; deC 90:150, 231-237.

Sun Huan 孫奂 [Jiming 季明] (195-234); Wu. Sun Huan was the fourth son of Sun Jing, and a cousin of Sun Quan. When his elder brother Sun Jiao died in 219, Sun Huan took his place, with title as a General of the Household acting as Administrator of Jiangxia. He encouraged scholarship in his territory.

Sun Huan served under Lu Xun in the defeat of Liu Bei on the Yangzi in 222, and he was enfeoffed for good service against Wei in 226. He died in office. -SGZ Wu 6:1208-09*.

Sun Huan 孫桓 [Shuwu 叔武] (198-c.222); Wu. Third son of Sun He, Sun Huan was a man of fine bearing and considerable intelligence, and he was admired by Sun Quan. He took part in the attack on Guan Yu in Jing province in 219, persuaded a number of the enemy to surrender, and captured quantities of supplies and equipment.

Sun Huan distinguished himself in the defence against Liu Bei in 222, and his counter-attack broke the enemy's line of retreat. He was enfeoffed and made a general, but died soon afterwards. -SGZ 6:1217*.

Sun Hui 孫徽. Prefect of Insignia and Credentials, Sun Hui took part in the flight of the court from Chang'an in 195.

After a heavy defeat in Hongnong, as the emperor was attempting to cross the Yellow River north to Hedong, it is said that Dong Cheng sent Sun Hui to seize some rolls of silk from the empress or her brother Fu De; an attendant was killed and blood splashed the empress's clothes. The story, however, is confused and probably false. -deC 96:166-167.

Sun Ji 孫期 see Sun Qi 孫期.

Sun Jian 孫堅 [Wentai 文臺] (155?-191); Wu. Sun Jian was a man from Fuchun county, present-day Fuyang in Zhejiang, very likely of merchant family. He became a local officer in the county, and gained reputation for defeating a group of river pirates.

Between 172 and 174 Sun Jian served as an acting major of commandery troops against the rebel Xu Chang. He was commended by the Inspector Zang Min and received imperial commission as an assistant magistrate, first in Guangling, then in two counties in Xiapi. In each place he gathered a personal following among the local youth and from his home country.

When the Yellow Turban rebellion broke out in 184 Sun Jian became an assistant major under Zhu Jun. With the nucleus of his personal following, he recruited or impressed additional troops and took part in several engagements, including the storming of Wan city in Nanyang at the end of the year.

In 185 Sun Jian was a staff officer in the imperial army against the Liang province rebels near Chang'an; he urged the commander Zhang Wen to punish Dong Zhuo for insubordination. After Dong Zhuo was successful in Youfufeng, Sun Jian took a lead in pursuit of the enemy.

In 186 Sun Jian returned to a holding appointment as a Consultant at Luoyang, but in 187 he was sent as Administrator to Changsha to deal with a series of insurrections. By the end of the year he had pacified the commandery; he was rewarded with a county fief.

After Dong Zhuo seized power at Luoyang late in 189, Sun Jian came north to join Yuan Shu in the eastern alliance against him. On the way he killed the Inspector of Jing province Wang Rui, and Zhang Zi the Administrator of Nanyang, and took over their troops. Yuan Shu named him Acting General Who Smashes the Caitiffs and Inspector of Yu province.

Sun Jian then moved north and east towards Luoyang, and was the most active commander in the loyalist attack. Defeated by Xu Rong early in 191, he recovered quickly and gained a victory over Hu Zhen. He then went forward to engage Dong Zhuo directly, drove him back and took possession of the capital. The position was untenable, however, and he withdrew into Yingchuan. While he was at Luoyang, some of his men found the imperial Seal of State 傳國璽, and Sun Jian passed it to Yuan Shu.

By this time the alliance was breaking up, and even as Sun Jian was advancing on Luoyang Zhou Yu, an officer of Yuan Shao, attacked his base camp. Sun Jian came back and defeated him, and Yuan Shu then sent him against Liu Biao in Jing province. He advanced to Xiangyang, on the Han at present-day Xiangfan, but was killed in a skirmish that winter.

From his humble background, Sun Jian proved to be a fine fighting general, notable for discipline and his ability to rally after defeat. -SGZ Wu 1:1093-1101*; deC 66A, deC 90:70-145.

Sun Jian 孫堅, wife of: see the Lady Wu 吳 of Wu/Kuaiji.

Sun Jiao 孫皎 [Shulang 叔朗] (d.219); Wu. Third son of Sun Jing, and a cousin of Sun Quan, as a colonel in command of two thousand men he distinguished himself against Cao Cao on the Yangzi in 212. Promoted general, he replaced Cheng Pu at Xiakou in Jiangxia, the mouth of the Han at present-day Wuhan, facing Liu Bei. When Huang Gai, commander in Wuling, died, Sun Jiao took over his troops too, and when his brother Sun Yu died in 215 he also gained command of his men in Danyang. He had broad authority over the west of Sun Quan's state, with four cities providing personal revenue 奉邑 and the right to appoint his own magistrates and local officers. A generous and honourable man, he had the affection of his own officers and wide support from the people of the region.

On one occasion Sun Jiao and Gan Ning became drunk and quarrelled; and though Gan Ning was willing to be reconciled, his brutal nature was probably incompatible to Sun Jiao's taste. Sun Jiao attempted to remove Gan Ning's troops, but when Sun Quan sent a mild reprimand, he apologised and made his peace.

Despite his rank and experience, it appears that Sun Jiao's position was primarily administrative, while Lu Su and then Lü Meng were responsible for military operations. As Lü Meng proposed to attack Guan Yu in 219, Sun Quan wanted to give joint command to Sun Jiao, but Lü Meng persuaded him not to; it appears that Lü Meng objected to the confusion of dual authority rather than to Sun Jiao's competence. Sun Jiao did command the rear and was involved in the successful campaign. He died soon afterwards. -SGZ Wu 6:1206-08*.

Sun Jin 孫瑾 (d.193). A former Chancellor of Changshan, when the Governor Liu Yu was killed by Gongsun Zan, Sun Jin came with other gentlemen to express their loyalty. They cursed Gongsun Zan and accepted death together. -SGZ 8:244.

Sun Jing 孫敬 [Wenbao 文寶]. A scholar hermit, Sun Jing was so keen on study that he slept on a hammock in his library. -XC 8:10b.

Sun Jing 孫靜 [Youtai 幼臺]; Wu. As Sun Jian was raising troops to join Zhu Jun against the Yellow Turbans in 184, his younger brother Sun Jing brought five hundred clansmen and local youth to join him. Though Sun Jian had authority to conscript troops, Sun Jing's contingent was a substantial part of his force and served as a personal guard.

Sun Jing later retired to the home country of the family, probably after Sun Jian's death in 191. In 196, as Sun Jian's son Sun Ce moved against Wang Lang the Administrator of Kuaiji, he asked Sun Jing for aid, and he again brought clan forces to support the attack. Sun Ce was at first unable to force a bridgehead across the Qiantang River, but Sun Jing led a detachment to cross further upstream. Wang Lang sent troops to meet them, but they were completely defeated and Wang Lang abandoned his position.

Sun Ce gave Sun Jing title as a colonel, but Sun Jing asked leave to remain at the family home and care for the tombs and other property. This was agreed, and though Sun Quan later named him a General of the Household, it does not appear that Sun Jing played any further military or political role. He died at home. -SGZ Wu 6:1205*.

Sun Jun 孫儁/俊. Administrator of Anding in the early 160s, Sun Jun plundered the local people and the Qiang. When Huangfu Gui came into Liang province in 162 he impeached Sun Jun, who was dismissed and may have been executed. -HHS 65/55:2133-34.

Sun Jun 孫俊 [Shuying 叔英] (d.250); Wu. Youngest son of Sun He, Sun Jun became a garrison commander on the Yangzi. -SGZ Wu 6:1217.

Sun Kan 孫堪 [Zizhi 子穉]; Henan. A man of family, with wide knowledge of the classics, in the time of troubles following the fall of Wang Mang's regime Sun Kan was celebrated for the courage he demonstrated as he defended a camp of his kinsmen.

During the reign of Emperor Guangwu Sun Kan held local office. Noted for his rigid honesty and for the fact that he donated all his salary to the poor, keeping nothing for his own family, he was promoted to be a senior officer. Governing effectively and admired by his subordinates, he became a full magistrate. When he went to take up office, however, the gate guard found his approach too informal and turned him away; Sun Kan promptly resigned his position.

He was later appointed Administrator of Zuopingyi, but the Director of Retainers recommended he be dismissed, again for excessively informal conduct. A few months later, Sun Kan was appointed to the Imperial Censorate and then became Director of the Secretariat.

In 68 Sun Kan became Minister of the Household. Still noted for his direct speech, his advice was frequently accepted by Emperor Ming, who showed him particular favour. The Minister of Ceremonies Zhou Ze was a man of similar character, and as both had the character zhi 穉 in their styles, they were known as "the two Zhi."

In 75 Sun Kan resigned his ministry on the grounds of ill health. He became Palace Attendant, a senior adviser to the emperor, with sinecure appointment as a Commandant of Cavalry. He died in that position. -HHS 79/69B:2578-79*.

Sun Kang 孫伉 (d.192); Julu. Members of leading families, Sun Kang and his fellows had influence with the government of the commandery. As Gongsun Zan attacked Yuan Shao in 192, they feared he would be too strong. The Administrator and other senior officers planned to change sides, while the people were restless and fearful.

Yuan Shao sent Dong Zhao to take over the government. Claiming there was a threat from bandits, he proclaimed a state of emergency and then executed Sun Kang and some thirty of his fellows under the provisions of military law. The people were duly impressed and Dong Zhao re-established good order. -SGZ 14:436.

Sun Kang 孫康; Taishan. Leader of a self-defence group in the region of Mount Tai, Sun Kang appears to have played a lesser role to his younger brother Sun Guan.

About 194 the various groups in the region acceded to the general authority of Zang Ba. They destroyed the local Yellow Turbans, and in 198 they accompanied Zang Ba to assist Lü Bu against Cao Cao. When Lü Bu was destroyed, Zang Ba accepted service under Cao Cao. He persuaded his fellows to follow suit, and they were named administrators of a series of commanderies about Mount Tai; Sun Kang received the territory of Chengyang, which had been a kingdom under Former Han but whose territory had subsequently been incorporated into Langye.

Sun Kang and Sun Guan accompanied Zang Ba on his subsequent campaigns, guarding the eastern front against Yuan Shao in 199 and 200, defeating Yuan Tan in Bohai in 205, and then settling the region of present-day Shandong. The two brothers and their colleagues were all rewarded with enfeoffment, but Zang Ba and Sun Guan ranked slightly higher. There is no detailed account of Sun Kang's subsequent career. -SGZ 18: 537-39.

Sun Kuang 孫匡 [Jizuo 季佐]; Wu. Born about 185, the fourth son of Sun Jian by the Lady Wu, in 198 Sun Kuang was nominated Filial and Incorrupt by his commandery and Abundant Talent by the province, and was married to a niece of Cao Cao. He died aged twenty, without holding office. -SGZ Wu 6:1213*.

Sun Lang 孫朗 [Daiping 代平]; Beihai. In 157 Sun Lang was promoted from Minister of Ceremonies to be Excellency of Works. After the destruction of Liang Ji and his family by Emperor Huan and his eunuch allies in 159, he and his colleagues Hu Guang and Han Yin were found guilty of failing to support the sovereign. Sun Lang was dismissed, imprisoned and sentenced to death less one degree, commuted by payment of a fine. -HHS 7:303-05; deC 89:13.

Sun Lang 孫郎 [Young Gentleman Sun] see Sun Ce

孫策.

Sun Lang 孫狼; Hongnong. In 218 the commoner Sun Lang led a rebellion against conscription for the west. Driven south, he received insignia and reinforcement from Guan Yu and returned to raid the border. He disappeared after Guan Yu's defeat. -SGZ 11:362.

Sun Lang 孫朗 or Sun Ren 仁; Wu. Born of a concubine, Sun Lang was the youngest son of Sun Jian and a half-brother to Sun Ce and Sun Quan. He was a subordinate commander on the Yangzi in 223, but was sent back in disgrace by the general Lü Fan; Sun Quan made him take the Ding 丁 surname, presumably his mother's, and barred him from office. -SGZ Wu 1:1101, 6:1213 [where Jiangbiao zhuan wrongly identifies him as Sun Kuang but is corrected by Pei Songzhi].

Sun Li 孫禮; Beihai. A local strongman about 135, Sun Li attempted to establish a relationship with the scholar and diviner Lang Yi. As Lang Yi paid no attention to his overtures, Sun Li killed him. -HHS 30/20B:1075.

Sun Li 孫禮 [Deta 德達] (d.250); Zhuo. A scholar of local reputation, Sun Li joined Cao Cao's military staff as he took over You province in 205. He later became Assistant Administrator in Hejian, then transferred to be Commandant of Rongyang, a new commandery formed from the eastern part of Henan. Appointed Chancellor of Lu, Sun Li settled banditry by issuing grain to those who came to submit.

Sun Li served Cao Pi as Administrator in a series of commanderies. When he accompanied Cao Xiu into Lujiang in 228, he warned him fruitlessly against the danger of an ambush by the army of Wu.

Sun Li later joined the Secretariat, held senior military and civil positions, including a ministry, was Inspector in five provinces and received enfeoffment. When Sima Yi seized power in 249, Sun Li became an Excellency. He died in that office in the following year. -SGZ 24:691-93*.

Sun Li 孫禮 see also Sun Zhi 祉.

Sun Lie 孫烈 see sub Sun Chang 孫常.

Sun Lin 孫林. Scholars of the mid-first century, Sun Lin and others lived near Zhang Ba at Luoyang in order to benefit from his learning. -HHS 36/26:1241, HYGZ 10A:133.

Sun Lu 孫魯. Marquis of a village in Ba commandery, about 150 Sun Lu was attacked by bandits. -HYGZ 1: 6.

Sun Lü 孫慮 [Zizhi 子智] (213-232); Wu. Second son of Sun Quan, by a woman too humble or obscure to be recorded, Sun Lü was enfeoffed as a marquis in 228. He was admired by his father and by senior officials, and in 230 he was appointed a chief general. When he died two years later Sun Quan mourned him deeply. -SGZ Wu 14:1367*.

Sun Mao 孫茂. An officer under Sun Quan, in 215 Sun Mao accompanied Lü Dai to attack Liu Bei's positions in the south of Jing province. -SGZ Wu 15:1384.

Sun Mei 孫美; Zhuo. Sun Mei was a younger brother of the eunuch marquis Sun Cheng, who died in 132. In response to Sun Cheng's deathbed request, his fief was granted to Sun Mei, but Emperor Shun also gave half the estate and the title to Sun Cheng's adopted son Shou. -HHS 78/68:2518.

Sun Meng 孫萌 (d.29). Administrator of Chu for Emperor Guangwu, Sun Meng was killed by the renegade general Pang Meng. -HHS 1A:38, 18/8:688.

Sun Mou 孫茂 see Sun Mao 孫茂.

Sun Qi 孫期 [Zhongyu 仲彘 or Zhongshi 仲士]; Jiyin. A scholar from his youth, Sun Qi was expert on the New Text Book of Changes according to the Jing Fang interpretation and on the Old Text version of the Classic of History. His family was poor and he herded swine in the marshland, but he cared devotedly for his mother. Students came from afar for his teaching, local people were influenced by his virtues, and in 184 the Yellow Turban rebels spared the village in respect for the worthy Master Sun.

The commandery recommended Sun Qi as Sincere and Upright, and sent an officer to present him with wine and food; Sun Qi continued to care for his pigs and paid no attention. In 189 the Excellency Huang Wan sent a special invitation, but again Sun Qi did not accept. He died at home. -HHS 79/69A:2554*, XC 5: 9a; Tjan 49:149.

Sun Qiang 孫羌. In 163 a group of Qiang tribes attacked Wuwei, Zhangye and Jiuquan. Sun Qiang the Administrator of Longxi defeated them and over three thousand of the enemy were killed or drowned. -HHS 87/77:2898.

Sun Qiang 孫羌 [Shengtai 聖臺]; Wu. Elder twin of Sun Jian, he died young, about 175, but left two sons, Sun Ben and Sun Fu. -SGZ Wu 6:1209.

Sun Qin 孫欽. A scholar of the calendar, at the beginning of Wei he debated the introduction of the Huangchu 黃初 [Yellow Beginning] calendar, named after the first reign period of the new dynasty. -JS

17:499.

Sun Qing 孫輕. During the 190s Sun Qing commanded a group of Black Mountain bandits under the leadership of Zhang Yan. In 204 he surrendered to Cao Cao's officer Zhang Liao. -SGZ 8:261, 17:518.

Sun Qiu 孫璆 [Shanling 山陵]; Anping. Administrator of Hongnong in 165, Sun Qiu arranged for the completion of a temple on the sacred Mount Hua which had been commenced by his predecessor Yuan Feng. -LS 2:1a-4a.

Sun Quan 孫權 [Zhongmou 仲謀] (182-252); Wu: Great Emperor of Wu 吳大帝. Second son of Sun Jian and younger brother of Sun Ce, Sun Quan was born when his father was an assistant magistrate in Xiapi. Ten years old when Sun Jian was killed, he accompanied his mother the Lady Wu on travels through south-eastern China, and joined his elder brother Sun Ce in Danyang in 196. He was treated with respect, nominated as a candidate for office, and named a county magistrate. It is said that he took part in discussions of policy, and he was among the commanders at the conquest of Lujiang and the attack on Huang Zu in 199.

When Sun Ce was mortally wounded in 200, he formally handed his command to Sun Quan. There was some uncertainty and dissent, with possible alternative candidates being Sun Quan's younger brother Sun Yi and Sun Ce's close friend Zhou Yu, but Sun Ce's leading officers united to support the succession. In this regard the warlord regime showed a remarkable coherence, for many others fell apart at the loss of their leader.

Sun Ce had been formally allied to the Han court controlled by Cao Cao, and Sun Quan was recognised as General Who Exterminates the Caitiffs and Administrator of Kuaiji. Li Shu, Administrator of Lujiang, was unwilling to accept the new leader. He sought help from Cao Cao, but Sun Quan persuaded Cao Cao, at that time heavily engaged against Yuan Shao, not to interfere; he then destroyed Li Shu.

For the next couple of years Sun Quan was to some extent under the tutelage of Sun Ce's old advisers Zhang Zhao and Zhang Hong, and there was a need to confirm his regime in the lower Yangzi. In 202, however, following the death of the Lady Wu [but see sub voce], he sent Zhang Hong away and began to act more aggressively.

In 203 Sun Quan returned to the offensive against Huang Zu, destroyed much of the enemy's fleet, then consolidated his control of Yuzhang. In 204 there was a mutiny in Danyang, when Sun Yi was killed, but that was soon settled, and in 205 he marked the success of his officer He Qi's expansion of territory in Fujian by establishing a new county; by 208 there was a full commandery in the region.

In 207 Sun Quan returned to the attack on Huang Zu, and in the following year he embarked on the final offensive. Huang Zu was destroyed and the Sun forces now controlled the Yangzi as far as the mouth of the Han.

At this point Liu Biao the warlord Governor of Jing province died, and Cao Cao came to take over his territory. Liu Biao's younger son Liu Zong succeeded him and promptly surrendered, while his elder brother Liu Qi and the condottiere Liu Bei fled to the south. As Cao Cao pursued them, they sought help Sun Quan, even as Cao Cao called him to submit. After tense debate among his advisers, Sun Quan decided to resist, and he sent Zhou Yu and Cheng Pu to support Liu Bei and Liu Qi.

Cao Cao's advance, far from home with newly-acquired troops from his recent enemies, may have been intended as no more than a reconnaissance in force, but the battle at the Red Cliffs, on the Yangzi upstream and south of present-day Wuhan, proved decisive. Cao Cao was driven back, largely by an attack from fire-ships organised by Sun Quan's officer Huang Gai. Cao Ren held Jiangling for a year, and thereafter maintained defences on the lower Han, but Cao Cao was obliged to abandon the line of the Yangzi. As Liu Qi died soon afterwards, Liu Bei and Sun Quan divided the territory of southern Jing province.

The arrangement was not satisfactory to Sun Quan. While his troops had been engaged with Cao Ren, Liu Bei had taken over Changsha and the south, so Sun Quan held only a narrow strip along the Yangzi between Cao Cao in the north and Liu Bei in the south. At the same time, his own offensive directly north from the lower Yangzi towards the Huai had been blocked at Hefei city, an embarrassing result which limited possibilities in that region. One alternative was an advance up the Gorges into Yi province, where the warlord Governor Liu Zhang was increasingly unpopular and was opposed by the theocratic state of Zhang Lu in Hanzhong. Zhou Yu, Sun Quan's leading general, was willing to try, but he was still making preparations when he was taken ill and died in 209.

This was a considerable blow to the Sun cause, for Zhou Yu had been the one commander who could match the experience and ability of Liu Bei and his leading followers. The position in the middle Yangzi was thus less tenable, and in a settlement negotiated soon afterwards on the advice of Lu Su, Zhou Yu's successor to command in the west, Sun Quan allowed Liu Bei to "borrow" Nan commandery – the significance of the term 借 jie was later disputed – and the greater part of Jing province. He now held only the south of Jiangxia and northern Changsha, the Yangzi basin from the Dongting Lake to the mouth of the Han. Though he had survived Cao Cao's attack, victory at the Red Cliffs had gained him little in comparison to Liu Bei.

For the time being there was no alternative, and Lu Su's advice, though cautious and later criticised, was probably correct. The best apparent opportunities lay north towards the Huai and, more imaginatively, in active colonisation of the hills country to the south, where He Qi, Lu Xun and other commanders maintained their pressure against exiles, refugees and non-Chinese who had not yet been brought to submission. In the mean time Sun Quan established his capital at Jianye, present-day Nanjing, and set up the Ruxu fortress as a bridge-head on the northern bank of the lower Yangzi.

The Sun forces did achieve some success in Lujiang, but the main defences of Wei in that region proved impregnable, for Cao Cao's officer Liu Fu had established a system of military colonies which guarded the region about Hefei. Sun Quan's failure in 208 was followed in 215 by an even more humiliating defeat and withdrawal, and the territory immediately north of the Yangzi remained a no-man's-land which neither side could control: if the Sun forces never took Hefei, the land-based forces of Wei could not break their naval defences on the Yangzi.

By this time Liu Bei had expanded into the west. In 211 Liu Zhang mistakenly invited him in to assist with the threat against Cao Cao, but in the following year Liu Bei turned against him, and in 214 he took over his power. Sun Quan sought compensation through return of the territory he had ceded or "lent" in Jing province, and when Liu Bei refused he attacked his positions there in 215. Liu Bei's general Guan Yu responded, but fighting was limited by the constant danger from Cao Cao in the north, and a new settlement was reached which at least gave Sun Quan more territory: he now held Jiangxia, Changsha and Guiyang, and the frontier between the two former allies was set along the Xiang River.

In 216 Cao Cao proclaimed himself King of Wei, and in the following year he made a major attack on the lower Yangzi. Though he gained no real success, he left a substantial army in place, and under this threat Sun Quan formally acknowledged his suzerainty; in practice, relations between the two warlord states remained the same.

In 219, after Liu Bei had driven Cao Cao's army from Hanzhong, Guan Yu sought to follow the success by an attack up the Han valley, but in a dramatic military coup Sun Quan sent his general Lü Meng to strike Guan Yu from behind. Surprise was complete, Sun Quan's forces captured the whole of Jing province, and Cao Cao recognised him as Governor of that territory.

Diplomatic manoeuvring followed, including the recognition of Sun Quan as King of Wu in 221 by the newly-proclaimed Emperor of Wei Cao Pi, while Liu Bei took the imperial title for himself. At the end of that year Liu Bei launched a great attack of revenge through the Yangzi Gorges, but after some months he was thoroughly defeated by Sun Quan's general Lu Xun in 222, and the state of Wu held full control of Yang and Jing provinces south of the lower and middle Yangzi.

The capture and retention of Jing province confirmed the viability of Sun Quan's state; he transferred his headquarters there for several years as a sign of confidence in his control of the new territory, and soon afterwards defied Cao Pi and broke the connection to Wei. In 223 he restored the alliance with Shu-Han, and in 226 his officer Lü Dai seized the whole of Jiao province in the far south. At the same time, within the formal frontiers of Wu, campaigns of colonisation continued, and increasing numbers of people were brought to serve the interests of the state. In 229 Sun Quan also claimed the imperial title, so three rival emperors now divided China between them.

Sun Quan lived another twenty years, but though he made several sorties to the north, attempted an alliance with the Gongsun warlord of Liaodong, and sent an expedition to Taiwan, nothing came of these ventures and his dominion was restricted to the south and southeast. Succession to the state was disrupted by his longevity, for his eldest son Sun Deng died before him, and the later choice of his youngest, Sun Liang 亮, as Heir, was not a good one. On the other hand, Sun Quan's long reign did much to ensure the stability of the regime for its time, and though the empire of Wu was limited and comparatively short-lived it laid the foundations for the refugees of Eastern Jin in the fourth century and the Southern Dynasties which followed for centuries thereafter.

As a military man, Sun Quan had appropriate skills of horsemanship and archery. He was personally brave, even fool-hardy, taking great pleasure in hunting tigers, but unlike his elder brother Sun Ce he could claim no significant ability as a general. He was capable of commanding an army, and he maintained a competent defence against Cao Cao in early years, but he was never involved in a notably successful campaign. At the time of the Red Cliffs in 208 and in Jing province in 219, Sun Quan stayed in reserve as others took the field, while his offensives towards the Huai were unsuccessful and in 215 disastrous. Cao Cao and Liu Bei were both noted military commanders, but Sun Quan owed most of his success to his subordinates; it was unusual for a successful warlord to have such a marginal military reputation.

Sun Quan did, however, possess the administrative and political skills appropriate to the ruler of a state, and if he was not a great tactician he had a good grasp of strategy, and the personal authority which inspired excellent officers to carry out his plans. Despite occasional lapses of conduct, moreover, and a tendency towards superstition, Sun Quan attracted a distinguished group of scholars, literary men and artists to a brilliant court, while the prosperous trade with the far south and the steady expansion of his territory made his capital, Jianye, an impressive centre of culture: see Knechtges 82:373-428, translating the Rhapsody on the Capital of Wu 吳都賦 by Zuo Si 左思 [style: Taichong 太沖]. -SGZ Wu 2*; deC 90, Mather 76:572.

Sun Quan 孫權, wives and concubines. Sun Quan had a substantial harem and a series of favourites and concubines, which are discussed in SGZ Wu 5; C/C 99:127-129. His first and second consorts, the Ladies Xie 謝 and Xu 徐, have their own entries here, as do his long-time favourite the Lady Bu 步 and his concubine the Lady Yuan 袁 V, daughter of Yuan Shu. Sun Quan's first two sons, however, his Heir Sun Deng and the younger Sun Lü, were born to women so lowly and/or casual that their names are not recorded: see sub voce.

Also mentioned in the histories are the Lady Wang 王 of Langye, mother of the sometime Heir Sun He 和, whose son Sun Hao 皓 reigned 264-280; and the Lady Wang 王 of Nanyang, mother of Sun Xiu 休, who reigned 258-264. In his old age, Sun Quan became most attracted to the Lady Pan 潘 of Kuaiji, and he granted the succession to her son Sun Liang 亮, who came to the throne in 252 at the age of seven. The turbulent reign of this boy did much to weaken the warlord state, and he was deposed in 258.

Sun Ren 孫仁: Ren was an alternative personal name of Sun Lang 孫朗 of Wu.

Sun Ru 孫孺 [Zhongru 仲孺]; Wu. A second cousin of Sun Jian, Sun Ru served as a senior local officer in the commandery. He became the father of Sun Xiang. -SGZ Wu 6:1210.

Sun Rui 孫瑞 see Shisun Rui 士孫瑞.

Sun Shao 孫紹 (200-?); Wu. Son of Sun Ce, Sun Shao was an infant when his father died, and he may have been posthumous. When Sun Quan took the imperial title in 229 Sun Shao was made a marquis. -SGZ Wu 1:1112.

Sun Shao 孫邵 [Changxu 長緒] (164-226); Beihai. Eight feet tall [185 cm], in the early 190s Sun Shao was a member of the local staff of the Chancellor Kong Rong. He later went south to join Liu Yao in Yang province, then joined the staff of Sun Quan as he succeeded his brother Sun Ce in 200. He proved to be a successful adviser, and after a term as Administrator of Lujiang he returned to Sun Quan's headquarters.

When Sun Quan became King of Wu in 221 he named Sun Shao as his Chancellor, with enfeoffment and title as a general. There was some surprise, for Zhang Zhao was senior and more experienced, but Sun Quan did not wish to appoint him, and though Sun Shao demurred, Sun Quan insisted he accept. When Sun Shao died a few years later he was succeeded by Gu Yong. -SGZ Wu 2:1131-32.

Sun Shao 孫韶 [Gongli 公禮] (188-241); Wu. Sun Shao was a nephew of Sun He, who was killed by mutineers in Danyang in 204. At that time Sun Shao was at the base camp, and though he was only seventeen sui he took over command and prepared the defences. When Sun Quan had settled the trouble he came back past Sun Shao's position and was impressed by his readiness and his personal qualities. He confirmed Sun Shao in the command, with rank as a colonel.

Sun Shao was eight feet tall [185 cm], with a refined and elegant manner. He was later promoted and named Administrator of Guangling. Though the territory was largely outside direct control of the Sun family, Sun Shao was responsible for defence against the Wei north of the mouth of the Yangzi. He cared for his men, maintained constant vigilance with advanced scouting parties, and applied such pressure that Cao Cao was obliged to withdraw all his positions south of the Huai, creating a no-man's-land.

When Sun Quan became King of Wu in 221 he gave Sun Shao title as a general and enfeoffed him as a marquis; he was later styled Governor of Xu province and held the Staff of Authority. He died in office. -SGZ Wu 6:1214-17*.

Sun She 孫社 see Sun Li 孫禮.

Sun Shou 孫壽, the Lady (d.159). Sun Shou was the wife of Liang Ji. About the time of the death of his sister the Dowager Liang Na in 150, Sun Shou was enfeoffed as Lady of Xiangcheng in Yingchuan. With additional revenues from a neighbouring county, her annual income was fifty million cash, while her seal and insignia matched those of a Senior Princess.

The historians acknowledge that Sun Shou was extremely beautiful, but in all other respects she is described in most unflattering terms. Sensual and seductive in appearance and manner, she had her eyebrows shaped and her cheeks painted to give a mournful, languorous look, and she wore her hair on one side in a style described as "falling from a horse" 墮馬. Her smiles appeared forced and painful "as if she suffered from toothache," and she walked with delicate, mincing steps as though her feet could barely carry her. In later generations, the name of Sun Shou became proverbial for beauty and wilful extravagance, and her conduct inspired Liang Ji to similar pretensions and foolish conduct.

Liang Ji had a mistress, You Tongqi, formerly a member of the harem of Emperor Shun. Sun Shou, jealous, had Liang Ji followed until she found where he kept the Lady You, then had a group of slaves seize her, beat her, cut off her hair and slashed her face. She even proposed to report the lese-majesty to Emperor Shun, but Liang Ji went to her mother, kowtowed, and through her persuaded Sun Shou to avoid the scandal. Eventually Sun Shou arranged for her son Liang Yin to destroy the You family, but Liang Ji managed to preserve the Lady Tong's infant son.

Liang Ji also had a homosexual affair with the slave Qin Gong, whom Sun Shou then took to her own bed. Qin Gong acquired enormous influence and became one of the couple's most ruthless agents.

Liang Ji later established a complex of pavilions for the many women who became his concubines, and he constructed a great town house, while Sun Shou built a mansion to match it across the street. Both husband and wife had vast pleasure grounds, and carriages decorated with gold and silver, covered by a canopy of feathers, to wheel them about the gardens.

Despite such tensions and rivalries, it is said that Liang Ji was besotted with Sun Shou and totally under her influence. In particular, she persuaded him to give posts to members of her family, though some, like Sun An, were too young, and others, like Sun Xun, were incompetent. As many as ten of the Liang kinfolk were dismissed from office to make way for relatives of the Lady Sun, several of whom took the Liang surname. With senior rank in the capital and the provinces, the Sun sent retainers and clients to arrest wealthy men on false charges, beating them until they paid ransom. Liang Ji behaved in the same way, but Sun Shou's influence enabled her family to share in the opportunities.

About 153 Sun Shou arranged for Deng Mengnü to enter the harem of Emperor Huan. The youthful Lady Deng was a step-daughter of Liang Gi 紀, who was a brother of Sun Shou's mother and was not directly related to the General-in-Chief Liang Ji 冀 [I use the variant transcription Gi to distinguish him from the General-in-Chief]. The emperor was delighted with his new concubine, and she was swiftly promoted to the rank of Honoured Lady, next only to the empress.

Sun Shou had evidently planned that the Lady Deng would support her family within the harem, but Liang Gi died soon afterwards and when the Empress Liang Nüying died in 159 Emperor Huan planned to replace her with the Lady Deng. There was a fierce struggle for influence, culminating in a coup by the emperor and his eunuch allies against the Liang clan and its associates.

On 9 September a mixed force of eunuchs and palace gentlemen surrounded the residences of Liang Ji and Sun Shou, seizing their insignia of rank and ordering them to exile in the far south. The Lady and her husband committed suicide that same day, their relatives and clients were dismissed from office, and many were arrested, executed or exiled. -HHS 34/24: 1179-81.

Sun Shou 孫壽; Zhuo. Sun Shou was an adopted son of the eunuch marquis Sun Cheng, who died in 132. Emperor Shun allowed Sun Cheng's younger brother Mei to succeed him, but awarded half his estate and the title to Sun Shou. This grant became the precedent for an edict of 135 which allowed all eunuch marquises to pass on their fiefs to their adopted sons. -HHS 78/68:2518.

Sun Song 孫嵩/崧 [Binshi 寶石 or Binshuo 寶碩]; Beihai. Of strong local family, as a young man about 160 Sun Song met with Zhao Qi, who had fled his enemies Tang Xuan and his brother the powerful eunuch Tang Heng, and was selling pots in the market place. Recognising his quality, Sun Song approached him. At first Zhao Qi was afraid he was a spy sent to trap him, but then he told his story. Sun Song swore friendship, and he hid Zhao Qi for several years in a concealed room in his house.

With the great scholar Zheng Xuan and other gentlemen of the commandery, Sun Song had links to the reform Faction of the late 160s, and they were all proscribed from office for several years. Sun Song maintained teaching, however, and his protection of Zhao Qi made him well-known in the east of the empire. After the Proscription was ended in 184 he became Inspector of Yu province.

During the troubles of the 190s Sun Song went south into Jing province. At first Liu Biao did not receive him well, but in 195 Zhao Qi came on an embassy from the newly re-established court at Luoyang. Greeting Sun Song with the utmost affection, he told Liu Biao how he had saved him, and Liu Biao thereafter treated Sun Song with respect.

Sun Song was named Inspector of his native Qing province, though that territory was currently a centre of warfare between Yuan Tan, Tian Kai and Kong Rong, and the title was rather a courtesy than a reality. He died in the south, but we are told that Zhao Qi carried out funerary ceremonies for him, and his tomb and stele are recorded in his home county, so his body was evidently repatriated to the north. -HHS 64/54:2122-24, 35/25:1807, SGZ 18:551-52, SJZ 26:25a; Ch'ü 72: 208.

Sun Tai 孫泰 (d.234); Wu. Son of Sun Kuang by the Lady Cao VI, he became a colonel. He was killed in an attack on the Wei city of Hefei in Jiujiang. -SGZ Wu 6:1213.

Sun Weizhi 孫威直 or Sun Xianzhi 咸直; Julu. When Guo Tai's mother died Sun Weizhi attended the funeral. Jia Shu, a local bully who had killed a man in a vendetta, was also there. Sun Weizhi was offended, but as he was about to leave Guo Tai explained that Jia Shu was a man of great moral potential, so he stayed. Jia Shu overheard Guo Tai's praise, and resolved to change his ways. -HHS 68/58:2230.

Sun Xi 孫胤; Wu. Sun Xi was the second son of Sun Jiao and younger brother of Sun Yin. When Sun Yin died without sons about 220, Sun Xi was granted his marquisate. -SGZ Wu 6:1208.

Sun Xia 孫夏 (d.184); Nanyang. After the death of Han Zhong, Sun Xia became leader of the local Yellow Turbans. He continued to hold out in Wan, but the city was stormed by imperial forces under Zhu Jun and Sun Xia was killed as he fled. -HHS 71/61:2309-10; deC 89:189.

Sun Xian 孫咸 or Sun Zang 臧. When Liu Xiu took the imperial title in the autumn of 25, he named Sun Xian as his Acting Grand Marshal because of a prophecy that "Sun Xian subdues the northern barbarians" 孫咸征狄. His senior officers objected, saying that Sun Xian was unsuitable, and the experienced commander Wu Han then became full Grand Marshal.

The order of the text indicates that Sun Xian was General Who Pacifies the Northern Barbarians 平狄將軍 before his brief appointment as Grand Marshal, but he may have received that title after his demotion, as a means to maintain the omen. There is no further record of him. -HHS 22/12:773; Bn 59:237.

Sun Xiang 孫香 [Wenyang 文陽]; Wu. Son of Sun Ru, who was a second cousin of Sun Jian, Sun Xiang served under him and remained with Yuan Shu after Sun Jian's death. He was promoted to general, and when Yuan Shu claimed the imperial title in 197 he named Sun Xiang his Administrator of Runan. Sun Ce wrote to invite him and other kinsmen, but though Sun Ben and Wu Jing were able to join him south of the Yangzi, Sun Xiang was too far away and could not do so. He died at Shouchun, Yuan Shu's capital, presumably about 199, during the last days of the fallen state. -SGZ Wu 6:1210.

Sun Xianzhi 孫咸直 see Sun Weizhi 孫威直.

Sun Xing 孫性; Beihai. A headman of a district under the county magistrate Wu You, Sun Xing embezzled a few hundred cash of tax revenue to buy a plain gown for his father. When his father found out, he was angry at the way Sun Xing had failed to match Wu You's example, and immediately offered himself for punishment. Sun Xing promptly went to court to take the blame.

Wu You held private audience with the two of them. Observing that Sun Xing had committed a crime against public order for the sake of family affection, he cited Confucius's teaching that "By observing a man's faults, one may see his virtues" [Analects IV.7] and ordered only that he make restitution. -HHS 64/54:2101.

Sun Xiu 孫脩/修 or Sun Xun 循. An officer of Liu Yan about 190, Sun Xiu was left in charge of Mianzhu after the capital of the province was transferred to Luo city. -HYGZ 3:36.

Sun Xuan 孫諲. Evidently an associate of the eunuchs at court, in 163 Sun Xuan was Administrator of Liaodong. Impeached for misconduct by the Excellency Yang Bing, he was dismissed and may have been executed. -HHS 54/44:1772.

Sun Xun 孫訓 [Zongxin 宗昕]. A nephew of the Lady Sun Shou, wife of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, though Sun Xun was illiterate he became head of the Great Granary at Luoyang and then Administrator of Ji'nan. In the latter office he was reported by Yang Huai/Zhun for allowing his relatives to abuse their position; he was sent to prison. -HYGZ 10B:155, HHSJJ 34/24:1246 Hui Dong.

Sun Xun 孫循 see Sun Xiu 孫脩/修.

Sun Yan 孫儼 alternative personal name of Sun Yi 孫翊.

Sun Yang 孫陽; Donghai. A bandit in Qu county in the north of Donghai, Sun Yang was associated with the local warlord Dong Xian, who took refuge there in 30 from the armies of Emperor Guangwu. In the spring Qu city was starved into submission. Dong Xian escaped briefly into Langye, but the Administrator Chen Jun drove him away, then turned against Sun Yang and settled him. -HHS 18/8:691.

Sun Yi 孫懿. About 120 there was a vacancy in the Imperial Secretariat, and an examination was offered to middle-range officials in the subjects of government affairs, astronomy 天文 and Taoist arts 道術; the candidate who scored highest would be given the position.

The Consultant Zhai Fu was concerned that Sun Yi, formerly Court Astronomer, could be a rival. He therefore warned Sun Yi of a prophecy that a man named Sun Deng 登 would prove to be a wicked official, and would be killed by the eunuchs of the court who resented his ability. The surname was the same and the personal name included half the character of Sun Yi's own. Zhai Fu, who knew physiognomy, added that Sun Yi's physical appearance, seven feet nine inches tall [182.5 cm], with a broad frame and a small mouth, also matched the omen.

Frightened by this, Sun Yi excused himself from the examination on grounds of ill health. So Zhai Fu came first and received the appointment. -HHS 48/38:1602.

Sun Yi 孫翊 or Sun Yan 儼 [Shubi 叔弼] (184-203); Wu. Third son of Sun Jian by the Lady Wu, Sun Yi was generous and energetic like his brother Sun Ce. In 198 he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt by Zhu Zhi, and Cao Cao formally appointed him to his office of Excellency of Works; he remained, however, with his family in the south.

In 200, as Sun Ce was dying, it was suggested that Sun Yi should succeed him rather than Sun Quan, but Sun Ce insisted on inheritance by age. Sun Yi, in any case, was a hasty man, and the family friend Zhu Zhi had several times admonished him and tried to keep him under control.

In 203 Sun Yi became Administrator of Danyang in 203, but was killed there by Bian Hong. -SGZ Wu 6: 1212*; deC 90:215-216, 232.

Sun Yi 孫翊, wife and widow of: see the Lady Xu 徐 IV.

Sun Yi 孫誼; Wu. Second son of Sun He, Sun Yi became a county magistrate in Wu, but died young. -SGZ Wu 6:1217.

Sun Yin 孫胤; Wu. When Sun Jiao died in 219, his eldest son Sun Yin was enfeoffed as a reward for his father's service. He died soon afterwards. -SGZ Wu 6: 1208.

Sun Yingzi 孫嬰子 [Baby Sun] see Sun Guan 孫觀.

Sun Yong 孫永. As a General of the Household in 49, Sun Yong served under Ma Yuan against the non-Chinese people of Wuling. -HHS 24/14:843, 86/76: 2832; Bn 67:70.

Sun Yong 孫邕; Ji'nan. As a young man about 180 Sun Yong served the adept Wang Heping, who planned to become an immortal 仙. They travelled to the capital, Luoyang, but Wang Heping became ill and died. As Sun Yong carried out his funerary rites, he also buried more than a hundred manuscripts and a quantity of medicines. Xia Rong, another disciple, later claimed that Wang Heping had arranged a false death 尸解, a device by which he had reached the world of the immortals. Sun Yong then regretted that he had neither read the texts nor taken the potions for his own use. -HHS 82/72B:2751, SGZ 29:805; Ngo 76:146-147, DeWoskin 83:88-89. [Another man named Sun Yong was Administrator of Chenliu under Cao Pi in 226: Fang 52:200.]

Sun Yu 孫昱. A clerical officer to Zhang Bu, in 26 Sun Yu was sent with Fu Long as envoys to Luoyang, taking a memorial and tokens of submission to the new Emperor Guangwu. -HHS 26/16:899.

Sun Yu 孫瑜 [Zhongyi 仲異] (177-215); Wu. Second son of Sun Jing, and a cousin of Sun Quan, about 200 Sun Yu was appointed a colonel. He was noted for the courtesy with which he treated the refugees from northern China who joined the warlord enterprise.

In 204 Sun Yu was appointed Administrator of Danyang, succeeding Sun Quan's brother Sun Yi who had just been killed in a mutiny. The office was obviously a sensitive one, but Sun Yu had thousands of followers, and he was soon named also as a general.

In 206 and 207 Sun Yu aided Zhou Yu to capture the independent camps of Mo and Bao in eastern Jiangxia, and in 212 he sent with Sun Quan to oppose Cao Cao at Ruxu. He urged Sun Quan not to engage in battle, but his advice was not taken and the army was indeed defeated.

As Administrator of Danyang, Sun Yu was concerned for scholarship. He established schools in the commandery, and insisted that his officers and their dependents study with the scholar Ma Pu. He also named his officers Rao Zhu and Yan Lian as magistrates of counties in Lujiang, just across the Yangzi; they attracted many people from the territory that Cao Cao controlled.

Sun Yu held his post in Danyang until his death. -SGZ Wu 6:1206*.

Sun Yu 孫毓; Taishan. Son of Sun Guan, after his father's death in 217 Sun Yu succeeded him as Inspector of Qing province in Cao Cao's service. -SGZ 18:529.

Sun Zang 孫臧 see Sun Xian 孫咸. -HHJ 3:28.

Sun Zhang 孫章. A eunuch, Sun Zhang became a Regular Attendant. About 75 a law case arose in which two brothers killed a man. Emperor Ming believed that the elder had chief responsibility and should be executed, while the younger could be spared the full penalty, but Sun Zhang issued orders for both men to be put to death. The Imperial Secretariat impeached him for usurping imperial authority; the penalty was to be cut in two at the waist 要斬.

The legal expert Guo Gong argued that since his error was unintentional Sun Zhang should be sentenced only to pay a fine. Emperor Ming had doubts, for Sun Zhang came from the same county as the men who had been executed, and could have had a personal motive, but he eventually accepted Guo Gong's argument for leniency. -HHS 46/36:1544.

Sun Zhang 孫璋. A eunuch, Sun Zhang was a Regular Attendant during the 180s and was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 78/68:2534, 102/12:3259.

Sun Zhao 孫肇. In 194, encouraged by his sons Liu Fan and Liu Dan, Liu Yan the Governor of Yi province joined the northern warlord Ma Teng in his attack on Li Jue and his associates, who controlled the imperial court. Liu Yan sent the major Sun Zhao with a small force, but their thrust against Chang'an was defeated and both Liu Fan and Liu Dan were killed. -SGZ Shu 1:867.

Sun Zhi 孫祉 or Sun Li 禮 also as Sun She 社. Elder brother of the Lady Sun Shou, wife of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, during the 150s Sun Zhi was Chancellor of Pei. -HHS 76/66:2476 [as 祉 and/or 社], FSTY 7:55 [as 禮].

Sun Zhong 孫重? [personal name uncertain]; Wu. Father of Sun Jian, he was possibly a merchant. A later legend gives his name, and tells how he presented a melon to a small child, who then revealed himself as a divine being. Offered a reward, Sun Zhong chose to become the ancestor of emperors.

In some contrast, the biography of Sun Jian tells how at the time of one of his early exploits against a group of pirates, his father argued that such public service was no concern of his, and urged him to take no action. -SGZ Wu 1:1093; deC 90:73-79.

Sun [Zhongyang] 孫仲陽; Langye. In 85 Sun Zhongyang set up a stone gate-tower 石闕 in memory of his late father. The cost was 15,000 cash. -Nagata 94:28.

Sun Zhu 孫著; Langye. Headman of a village, in 143 Sun Zhu was involved in settling the murderous land dispute involving Song Bowang and his brothers. -Nagata 94:92.

Sun Zhu 孫助; Wu. Eldest son of Sun He, Sun Zhu became a county magistrate in Wu, but died young. -SGZ Wu 6:1217.

Sun Zi 孫資 [Yanlong 彥龍] (d.251); Taiyuan. Orphaned when he was young, Sun Zi was brought up by his elder brother. He became a student at the Imperial University, where he was noticed by Wang Yun.

In 196 Cao Cao called him to join his staff. Sun Zi, however, had just murdered a man who had killed his brother and he took refuge with his kinsmen and clients in Hedong. The Administrator of Taiyuan also invited him, but he apologised on the grounds of illness.

About 202 his friend Jia Kui persuaded Sun Zi to join Cao Cao. He went to Xu city as Reporting Officer from Hedong, and presented special praise of Jia Kui's conduct in operations against Guo Yuan. He later held a number of county magistracies, impressed Xun Yu, and was appointed to the Imperial Secretariat. Leaving office for family concerns, he returned to Hedong.

In 213 Sun Zi was appointed to the library 祕書 established by Cao Cao for his ducal state of Wei. When Cao Pi renamed it as the Palace Library 中書, Sun Zi and Liu Fang held the senior positions. They became close counsellors to the new emperor and were granted enfeoffments.

Likewise trusted by Cao Rui, in 238 Sun Zi and Liu Fang had decisive influence in setting up the regency for Sima Yi and Cao Shuang, and excluding Cao Yu 曹宇 from power. Further honoured by Cao Fang under the regency of Sima Yi and Cao Shuang, they received titles as senior generals, but both men resigned on the grounds of age in 248. After the destruction of Cao Shuang in the following year, Sun Zi returned to court with the same rank and position as before; he died soon afterwards. -SGZ 14:457-61*, JS 56:1539.

Sun [Zicai] 孫子才; Lujiang. About 210 Sun Zicai was a junior officer under Cao Cao's commander Xie Qi in the region of Qichun, north of the Yangzi opposite the position held for Sun Quan by Lü Meng. When Lü Meng made a surprise attack and drove Xie Qi away, Sun Zicai and some of his colleagues changed sides. -SGZ Wu 9:1275.

Sun [Zixia] 孫子夏; Hanyang. Sun Zixia was a noted scholar of the mid-second century. -HYGZ 10C:174.

Sun [Ziyi] 孫子逸. Formerly a magistrate in Xiapi, Sun Ziyi became Chancellor of Lu in the early 120s. He nominated Kong Jichan as Filial and Incorrupt. -HHSJJ 79/69A:2811.

Sun Zong 孫宗. In the mid-140s the stone-mason

Sun Zong was paid 40,000 cash for a pair of lions to ornament the tomb complex of the Liang family of Shanyang. -Wu 89:24-25 and see sub Wu Liang.

Suo Ban 索班 (d.120). Chief Clerk to Cao Zong the Administrator of Dunhuang, in 119 Suo Ban was sent with a thousand men to set up a military colony at Yiwu near present-day Hami. The kings of Nearer Jushi and Shanshan paid their respects, but a few months later the Xiongnu and King Junjiu of Further Jushi attacked Suo Ban and destroyed him.

Cao Zong asked to send a punitive expedition, but this was not approved. In 125, however, Ban Yong captured Further Jushi. He executed King Junjiu and his Xiongnu ambassador at the place Suo Ban had been killed. -HHS 47/37:1587, 1590, 88/78: 2911, 2930.

Suo Feng 所奉; Pingyuan. Father of Suo Fu, in 108 or 109 Suo Feng was appointed a cadet gentleman at court in honour of his son's self-sacrifice. -HHS 81/71: 2672.

Suo Fu 所輔 (d.108); Pingyuan. In 108 Suo Fu was a junior officer in his county when the magistrate Liu Xiong was defeated and captured by the pirate Bi Hao. The bandits were going to stab him, but then Suo Fu came forward, made a kowtow, and asked to take his master's place. So Liu Xiong was released and Suo Fu, stabbed front to back with a lance, died in his stead.

Bi Hao was later captured by the Administrator of Donghai, who learnt of this incident and reported it to the court. An imperial letter gave Suo Fu posthumous honours, awarded his family 200,000 cash, and gave orders that his father Suo Feng be appointed a cadet gentleman. -HHS 81/71:2672.

Suo Jun 索頽. Wu Colonel at Further Jushi in 96, Suo Jun wanted to depose King Zhuodi and place the Han sympathiser Xizhi on the throne. Zhuodi, however, attacked Nearer Jushi, and it took a large army to defeat him. -HHS 88/78:2929-30.

Suo Lufang 索盧放 see Suolu Fang 索盧放.

Suolu Fang 索盧放 [Junyang 君陽]; Dong. A scholar of the Classic of History, Suolu Fang had more than a thousand students. He also held clerical office in the commandery.

In 24 the Gengshi Emperor sent a commissioner to the region. The Administrator of Dong commandery was found guilty of some fault and sentenced to execution, but Suolu Fang argued that the reason people had turned away from Wang Mang and supported Han was because it offered a more humane tradition of government; rather than seeing his master killed he offered himself in his stead. The commissioner admired his conduct, and pardoned all concerned.

Suolu Fang became known for this, and in 30 he was appointed Prefect of Luoyang. His government was widely admired, but he was obliged to resign on account of illness. He became a Counsellor Remonstrant at court and gave excellent advice on several occasions, but was again forced to leave office because of poor health.

Suolu Fang declined an invitation to return to office in the early 50s, but Guangwu nonetheless sent men to escort him for a special audience, made him a donation of grain, and appointed his son to the suite of the Heir.

Suolu Fang died at home. -HHS 81/71:2674-75*.

Supuwan 蘇僕丸 see Supuyan 蘇僕延.

Supuyan 蘇僕延 [HHS] or Supuwan 蘇僕丸 [SGZ] (d.207); Wuhuan. A chieftain in western Liaodong and the Dependent State during the late 160s, with command of a thousand tribal groups, Supuyan styled himself King Qiao 峭王 "Severe."

In 187 Supuyan joined the rebellion of Zhang Chun, but was persuaded to surrender by Liu Yu. In 195 he joined the attack on Gongsun Zan led by Xianyu Fu and Yan Rou and [under the name of Songxia 松下] was granted title as Shanyu by Yuan Shao.

In 204 Supuyan accepted Cao Cao's authority, but in 207 he joined the war leader Tadun to support Yuan Shang and Yuan Xi. After the defeat at White Wolf Mountain, Supuyan fled east to Gongsun Kang, who killed him. -HHS 90/80:2984, SGZ 1:29, 30:834-35; deC 84:396-412.

Susong [Korean] see Suicheng 遂成 of Gaogouli [Koguryo].

Sutuhu 蘇屠胡; Xiongnu: see sub Bi; Xiongnu.

Suyule 蘇榆勒 of Yutian [Khotan]. Chief minister to King Xiumoba in 60, after his death Suyule arranged the accession of Xiumoba's nephew Guangde. -HHS 88/78:2925.

T

Tadun 蹋頓 (d.207); Wuhuan. Nephew of Qiuliju of Liaoxi, following his death about 193 Tadun became the guardian of Qiuliju's son Louban. He led the Wuhuan against Gongsun Zan in the late 190s, and received title as Shanyu from Yuan Shao.

By the early 200s Louban was recognised as the leading Shanyu, but though Tadun was only a king he continued as the war leader of a loose confederacy.

In 207 Tadun gathered an army to aid Yuan Shang and Yuan Xi, but Cao Cao defeated them at White Wolf Mountain in the hill country of Liaoxi, by the present Daling River. Tadun died in the battle. -HHS 90/80:2984, SGZ 1:29, 30:834-35; deC 84:403-411.

Tai 泰, the Lady, was the mother of Wei Yuanpi, who left office for a time after her death. -LS 17b-20a.

Tai Chong 臺崇 (d.196). In 196 Tao Chong was a Palace Attendant at the remnant imperial court in Luoyang. As Cao Cao took over, he executed Tai Chong for wrongdoing. -HHS 9:380, HHJ 29:344.

Tai Tong 臺佟 [Xiaowei 孝威]; Wei. During the reign of Emperor Zhang, Tai Tong dug a hole in the mountains and lived there as a hermit, eating only herbs which he gathered himself. The provincial authorities invited him to office, but he would not accept.

On one occasion the Inspector came on circuit and brought Tai Tong gifts appropriate to a teacher. He expressed dismay at the hardship of his life, but Tai Tong replied that he far preferred it to the cares of office. He then went even further away and was not seen again. -HHS 83/73:2770*; Vervoorn 90:149-150.

Taiqi 臺耆; Xiongnu. A member of the royal house of the Southern Xiongnu, in 142 Taiqi and the chieftain Bode joined the rebel leader Wusi in plundering Bing province. Though Wusi was assassinated in the following year, Taiqi and Bode remained at large and continued to cause trouble.

In 155 Taiqi and Bode led some seven thousand men to attack the Xiongnu capital at Meiji in Xihe. Isolated and defeated by the Chinese commander Zhang Huan, they were forced to surrender. -HHS 6:272, 7:302, 65/55:2138, 89/79:2962-63.

Taishi Bing 太史稟 served in the Imperial Secretariat. -FSTY 5f:119.

Taishi Ci 太史慈 [Ziyi 子義] (166-206); Donglai. As a young man Taishi Ci was a scholar, then held clerical office in his commandery.

In 186 there was a dispute between the Administrator and the provincial office. Both sides sent in reports, but the province wrote first, so its messenger was ahead in the queue at the palace entrance and thus held the advantage. Taishi Ci, however, tricked the provincial officer into handing him his dispatch, tore it up, then urged his rival to run away lest he be punished for failing to take proper care. He too pretended to flee, but returned to present the commandery case, which was duly successful.

Fearing retribution by the province, Taishi Ci took refuge in Liaodong. Kong Rong the Chancellor of Beihai, who had not met him but admired his reputation, sent officers to pay respects to his mother. In response to this courtesy, when Taishi Ci returned from the north in 193 he went to help Kong Rong, who was besieged by Yellow Turbans. Volunteering to seek help, he tricked his way through the siege-lines, killing several of the enemy, then reached Liu Bei in Pingyuan and persuaded him to send relief.

Taishi Ci later went south of the Yangzi to join his fellow-countryman Liu Yao, who was defending himself against Sun Ce. Refusing Taishi Ci an active command, Liu Yao set him to guard the baggage, but on one occasion Taishi Ci encountered Sun Ce face to face, and though outnumbered he fought him hand-to-hand. As more soldiers came up from each side, the two men were separated before either could harm the other.

When Liu Yao withdrew to Yuzhang in 196, Taishi Ci remained in western Danyang, taking title as Administrator and making alliance with the hills people to the south. In 198 Sun Ce attacked and captured him. Recalling their previous encounter, he now appointed him as a personal guard and showed him full trust. He sent him to Yuzhang to observe the situation after the death of Liu Yao, and on the basis of his report he decided to take over that territory.

Seven feet seven inches tall [178 cm], with a fine beard and long arms, Taishi Ci was an expert archer. He was made Commandant of Jianchang to guard the west of Yuzhang from raids by Liu Biao's forces in Jing province, and after Sun Quan succeeded in 200 his responsibility was extended further south. He died six years later. -SGZ Wu 4:1186-90*.

Taishi Xiang 太史享 [Yuanfu 元復]; Donglai. Son of Taishi Ci, he became a member of the Secretariat of Sun Quan and was Administrator of Wu commandery. -SGZ Wu 4:1190-91.

Tan 鐔 [surname] see Xin 鐔 passim.

Tan 檀 (d.124); Xiongnu. Son of the former Southern Shanyu Chang, he succeeded his cousin Shizi in 98, taking the title Wanshi shizhu di 萬氏尸逐鞮 Shanyu.

Initially a firm supporter of Han, during the first years of his reign the Shanyu Tan continued to gain subjects at the expense of his renegade rival, the chieftain Fenghou, who found it increasingly difficult to maintain himself on the frontier. At the same time the Northern Shanyu sent a series of embassies seeking peace with China, though the imperial court responded only with gifts and gave no formal reply or acceptance.

In 107 the Han government was faced with the great rebellion of the Qiang in Liang province. The imperial armies suffered a series of defeats, and there were also heavy rains and floods in eastern China. In 109, as the Wuhuan of Yanmen combined with Xianbi from across the frontier to defeat the local troops of Wuyuan, the renegade Han Zong persuaded the Shanyu that he should take advantage of Chinese difficulties to seek independence. So Tan sent troops to attack the Emissary Geng Chong in his camp at the Xionggnu capital, Meiji in Xihe.

Geng Chong withstood the siege, but the Chinese response was confused by the death of the General on the Liao Wang Biao, evidently of natural causes. The minister He Xi was appointed to raise an army, while Geng Kui the Administrator of Liaodong brought Chinese militia and Xianbi auxiliaries from the eastern frontier. With assistance from He Xi's second-in-command Pang Xiong and other Chinese troops, he made a first attack towards Meiji and defeated a force of three thousand men sent by the Shanyu under the command of a king.

Geng Kui was compelled to abandon the offensive when disease broke out among the horses of his Xianbi companions, and early in 110 the Xionggnu raided Changshan and Zhongshan, on the North China plain below the Taihang mountains. By this time, however, the main army under He Xi had arrived in the north and moved west along the frontier to reoccupy Wuyuan. This army too was attacked by sickness, and He Xi died, but the rebel Xionggnu were isolated from their potential allies on the steppe.

The new General on the Liao Liang Qin now moved on Meiji with eight thousand men, defeating another Xionggnu king and his Wuhuan allies, killing three thousand, capturing women and children, and seizing quantities of goods and treasure. Shanyu Tan brought seven or eight thousand horsemen to surround Liang Qin, but he broke their lines and the Shanyu fled south into marshlands.

As the Chinese continued their advance, Tan became increasingly frightened. He sent envoys asking to return to allegiance, and when his request was approved he came bareheaded and barefoot to meet Pang Xiong and the imperial generals. He confessed his faults and received the imperial amnesty. All was established as before, and Tan returned the Chinese prisoners he had taken, together with a number who had been sold as slaves by the rebel Qiang, a total of ten thousand.

Though Tan had dealings with the rebel Qiang, he had made no alliance with them, and the fact that he received no substantial penalty is a measure of the Chinese concern to have the incident out of the way so they could concentrate upon the major problem. Tan kept peace with China for the remaining years of his reign, and allowed his soldiers to be used against the enemies of Han: in 116 the General on the Liao Deng Zun commanded the Shanyu and his troops against the Qiang headquarters in Beidi, and in the early 120s Geng Kui used Xionggnu auxiliaries under the king Huyouhui against Xianbi raids.

By the time of Tan's death in 124, the Southern Xionggnu state was clearly in decline. Apart from the failed attempt for independence in 109 and 110, the very scale of fighting at that time shows the weakness of organised power in the Ordos. Though Xionggnu raids had reached the North China plain, the armies which the Shanyu himself put into the field were small: the one defeated by Geng Kui was said to be three thousand men, and the two which faced Liang Qin were each less than ten thousand. This is far from the days of the first Southern Shanyu Bi, whose troops had numbered between fifty and a hundred thousand, and indicates both a depopulation of the northern frontier region, through unrest and insecurity among both Chinese and Xionggnu, and also the loss of control by the Shanyu's regime over the human and physical resources it had possessed just a few generations before. -HHS 89/79:2957-59, 19/9:719, 47/37:1592-93, deC 84:282-289.

Tan Bin 檀彬; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Tan Bin was a senior member of the group. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Tan Erjian 覃兒健 see Qinnijian 覃兒健.

Tan Fu 檀敷 [Wenyou 文有]; Shanyang. A scholar of poor family but high ideals, Tan Fu refused all offers of local appointment, official nomination and posts at the capital, but lived simply in the countryside and taught. His students came from far and wide and were numbered by the hundreds.

In the time of Emperor Huan, Tan Fu was invited to become an Academician at the University, but again refused. At the beginning of the reign of Emperor Ling in 168 he was nominated Sincere and Upright by the Grand Tutor Chen Fan. This time he accepted, for he approved the reformist tenor of the new regime. He was appointed a Consultant, then a county magistrate in Liang. Disapproving of the moral quality of the head of the commandery, he left office.

There is confusion about the period that Tan Fu accepted official appointment. HHS 67/57:2215 says that he was nominated by the Grand Commandant Huang Qiong, who held that office from 159 to 161 and died in 164. If that is correct, then Tan Fu took office soon after the fall of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, when there was also a sense of restoration and reform. HHS 67/57:2187, however, says that it was during the regency of Dou Wu and Chen Fan, and that regime appears more likely to have attracted Tan Fu.

Tan Fu's household was so poor that he and his sons and grandsons shared the same suit of clothes, wearing it in turns so each could go out, and they had food only on alternate days. Despite such privations, Tan Fu died at home at the age of eighty. His moral scholarship and frugality were admired by the reformists and students of the University, who included him in their lists of popular heroes during the late 160s. -HHS 67/57:2215* & 2187, XC 4:9a, SGZ 6:211; deC 75A: 24-29, Vervoorn 90:173.

Tan Jian 檀建; Shanyang. A county officer in the 40s, when there was an outbreak of banditry Tan Jian accepted responsibility. The magistrate Zhongli Yi only dismissed him, applying no punishment. Tan Jian's father, however, ordered him to take poison.

Another account says that Tan Jian had misappropriated a gift. -HHS 41/31:1407 & JJ at 1494.

Tan Mo 檀謨. Chancellor of Langye about 180, Tan Mo invited Zhao Yu to local appointment, but was refused. -SGZ 8:349.

Tan Nijian 覃兒健 see Qinnijian 覃兒健.

Tan Rong 潭戎 see Tanrong 潭戎.

Tan Xian 譚賢 [Bosheng 伯升]; Taiyuan. A man of principle, Tan Xian refused office under Wang Mang. He was invited to take appointment under the Han dynasty restored by Guangwu, but again would not accept. -HHS 83/73:2762.

Tan'erjian 覃兒健 see Qinnijian 覃兒健.

Tang 唐, the Lady I; Yingchuan. Adopted daughter of the eunuch Tang Heng, she was rejected by Fu Gongming, but was then married to the infant Xun Yu. -HHS 70/60:2281, SGZ 10:308.

Tang 唐, the Lady II; Yingchuan: see the Lady Tang Ji 唐姬.

Tang Ben 唐賁; Yingchuan. Son of Tang Hui, Tang Ben became an officer of the Imperial Censorate. He was the father of the future Excellency Tang Zhen and it is possible, though unlikely, that he was also the father of the eunuch Tang Heng. -XTS 74:3210 and see sub Tang Zhen.

Tang Chao 唐超 [Jingliao 景遼]; Nanyang. A former county magistrate, in 156 Tang Chao was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Tang Feng 唐鳳. A cousin of the palace eunuch Tang Heng, Tang Feng became Administrator of Kuaiji. Relying on his connection to the court, he governed with greed and cruelty; when his Officer of Merit Zhou Gui criticised and warned him, he had him arrested. Soon afterwards Tang Feng was impeached and taken to the capital in a cage cart. -HHSJJ 71/61:2527 Hui Dong quoting Kuaiji dianlu.

Tang Fu 唐扶 [Zhengnan 正南]; Yingchuan. Magistrate of a county in Jiyin, in 183 Tang Fu was honoured with a stele. -LS 5:7a-10b.

Tang Gu 唐固 [Zizheng 子正] (d.225); Danyang. Born in the early 150s to a humble family, Tang Gu devoted himself to learning. He wrote on Guo yu and on the Gongyang and Guliang commentaries to Chunqiu, and regularly had several dozen students.

After Sun Quan became King of Wu in 221 he appointed Tang Gu as a Consultant. Respected by Lu Xun and other senior officials, Tang Gu reached senior office in the Secretariat in 225, but died later that year aged over seventy. -SGZ Wu 8:1250.

Tang Han 唐邯. An officer under Wu Han at Chengdu in 36, Tang Han was one of the leaders of an elite reserve which broke the troops of Gongsun Shu as he made a final sortie. -HHS 18/8:682.

Tang Heng 唐衡 (d.164); Yingchuan. In 146, soon after Emperor Huan had come to the throne, as the General-in-Chief Liang Ji attacked the senior ministers Li Gu and Du Qiao the eunuchs Tang Heng and Zuo Guan told the young ruler how the two men had opposed his accession. Li Gu and Du Qiao were executed.

In 159 Zuo Guan and Tang Heng were Attendants at the Yellow Gates. Emperor Huan was increasingly concerned about the plans of Liang Ji, who had killed the brother and attacked the mother of his favourite concubine Mengnü and was attempting to force her into accepting adoption as his daughter. He called Tang Heng to join him in the lavatory, and asked who might help him against Liang Ji. Tang Heng recommended Zuo Guan, Shan Chao, Xu Huang and Ju Yuan, and the five eunuchs carried out the coup [see sub Ju Yuan]. Each received a county marquisate and a donation of cash, while Tang Heng and Zuo Guan were promoted to be Regular Attendants.

Shan Chao died a few months later, but the four other eunuchs presumed on their favour and influence to live in luxury, building great mansions and taking women of good family as [decorative and titular?] concubines. They adopted unrelated children and even slaves to maintain their lineages, while their kinsmen held high office.

When Tang Heng died in 164 he was honoured as General of Chariots and Cavalry in the same fashion as Shan Chao before him. -HHS 78/68:2520-22*; Ch'ü 72:476-480, Bn 76:94-95, deC 89:12-14.

It is possible, though unlikely, that Tang Heng was a son of the censorial officer Tang Ben: see sub Tang Zhen.

Tang Hui 唐會; Yingchuan. Son of Tang Wei, Tang Hui became a county magistrate in Wuwei. -XTS 74:3210.

Tang Ji 唐姬, the Lady; Yingchuan. Daughter of Tang Mao, the Lady was the favourite concubine of Liu Bian, the Little Emperor deposed to become King of Hongnong. In 190, as Liu Bian was compelled to take poison on the orders of Dong Zhuo, she danced at his request and sang for him.

The Lady returned home, but resisted her father's attempts to marry her off again. As Dong Zhuo's officer Li Jue raided to the east in 192, he seized her and brought her to Chang'an. He wanted to marry her, but she refused him. Though she did not reveal her former connection to the throne, Jia Xu of the Imperial Secretariat learnt of her situation and informed Emperor Xian. He arranged the Lady's release, and she received land and attendants to maintain her status as concubine of the late emperor and king. -HHS 10B:451.

Tang Long 唐龍; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Tang Long was a member of the group. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Tang Mao 唐瑁; Yingchuan. XTS 74B:3202-03 says that Tang Mao, son of the Excellency Tang Zhen, became Administrator of Kuaiji.

HHS 10B:451 tells how Tang Mao's daughter Tang Ji became the favourite consort of Liu Bian, who became emperor in 189 and was then deposed to be King of Hongnong. After Liu Bian's death at the hands of Dong Zhuo in 190, the Lady returned home. Tang Mao wanted her to marry again, but she refused.

Tang Qiang 唐羌 [Boyou 伯游]; Runan. Having served in the offices of the Excellencies, about 100 Tang Qiang became a magistrate in Guiyang. At this time there was a special service which brought longans and lychees from the far south for the emperor's table. As the couriers travelled day and night, many of them were attacked and killed by wild beasts. Tang Qiang sent in a memorial on the hardships of this traffic, and Emperor He ended the arrangement.

Soon afterwards Tang Qiang left his office. Refusing all further summons, he stayed at home and compiled the Tangzi 唐子 book in over thirty pian [for another work of the same name about this time, see sub Tang Tan below]. -XC 7:8a-b; Loewe 86C:301.

Tang Tan 唐檀 [Zichan 子產]; Yuzhang. As a young man, Tang Tan travelled to study at the University in Luoyang, specialising in the Jing Fang interpretation of the Book of Changes, the Han interpretation of the Poetry, and the Yan interpretation of Chunqiu. He also became an expert on the interpretation of omens and in astrology. Returning to his home country, Tang Tan taught privately, with more than a hundred students, and he compiled the Tangzi 唐子 book in twenty-eight pian [for another work of the same name about this time, see sub Tang Qiang above].

In 120 a miraculous zhi 芝 plant was found in the commandery, and the Administrator Liu Zhi planned to present it to the throne. Tang Tan advised him, however, that the plant was an ill omen, for imperial relatives by marriage, notably the regent Dowager Deng, held excessive power at court. So Liu Zhi did not report or present it.

Later that year a local woman of the region gave birth to quadruplets and Liu Zhi asked Tang Tan for his interpretation. Tang Tan replied that there was an aura of conflict at the imperial capital, and trouble would come from those close to the throne: Tang Tan's biography identifies this somewhat vague prediction with the coup of the eunuch Sun Cheng against the Yan family of the Dowager, which brought Emperor Shun to the throne five years later.

In 130 Tang Tan was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet. As a white rainbow appeared across the sun, he sent in a memorial warning that this was an inauspicious sign and advising the emperor how he should conduct himself in regard to Heaven, Earth and Mankind. He then left the court, and later died at home. -HHS 82/72B:2729*; Ngo 76:108-109, DeWoskin 83:67-68.

Tang Wei 唐蔚; Pei>Yingchuan. Tang Wei was a son of Tang Lin 林, who had been Director of the Secretariat under Wang Mang and had received enfeoffment [QHX:502-503]. The fief was abolished as Han was restored, and Tang Wei moved his residence from Pei commandery to Yingchuan. -XTS 74:3210.

Tang Xi 唐喜 (d.115). In 112 Tang Xi was sent as an Imperial Clerk in command of an army against the rebels Du Jigong and Wang Xin in Hanyang south of the Wei. His troops killed Wang Xin and over six hundred of his men, captured their women and children, and acquired great quantities of treasure. Du Jigong fled to join the Qiang.

Tang Xi went on to attack the Qiang rebels in Guanghan, north of Yi province, but he had no success. He was replaced by Yin Jiu in 115, and despite his earlier triumph he was now ordered to kill himself. -HHS 5:219, 87/77:2888, HYGZ 2:25; deC 84:106.

Tang Xiang 唐翔; Yingchuan. XTS 74B:3202 says that Tang Xiang was a son of Tang Mao. Appointed Administrator of Danyang, he took the occasion to move his family to the south. We are further told that Tang Xiang's son Gu q.v. held office in the Secretariat of Sun Quan.

Tang Gu, however, was born in the 150s, while Tang Mao was the father of the Lady Tang Ji, concubine of the young emperor Liu Hong in 189.

XTS also traces a descent to Tang Bin 彬, a general of Jin, but Tang Bin's biography in JS 42:1217 disagrees. XTS has evidently confused both the generations and the lineage of this family.

Tang Xuan 唐瑄; Yingchuan. Elder brother of the eunuch Tang Heng, Tang Xuan became Commandant of the Tiger Tooth garrison by Chang'an. Despised by people of the region for having received his appointment through connections rather than by ability, and was bitterly resentful.

In 158 Tang Xuan became Intendant of Jingzhao, and took revenge on Zhao Qi, who had been among the leaders of those who had sneered at him. Zhao Qi ran away, but Tang Xuan arrested members of his family on trumped-up charges and had all of them killed. -HHS 64/54:2122.

Tang Yi 唐姬, the Lady: see the Lady Tang Ji 唐姬.

Tang Yi 唐霈 see Tang Yu 唐虞,

Tang You 唐佑 [Junsi 君思]; Henan. In 165 Tang You was Assistant Commandant of Huayin county in Hongnong. With the Magistrate Zhu Jie and the Assistant Zhang Fang, he was ordered by the Administrator Sun Qiu to complete work on the temple to Mount Hua which had been commenced by Sun Qiu's predecessor Yuan Feng. -LS 2:3a.

Tang Yu 唐虞 or Tang Yi 霈; Langye. Noted for his longevity, Tang Yu was a contemporary of the celebrated doctor Hua Tuo in the latter part of the second century AD, but spoke as if he had been in personal contact with the Red Eyebrows and the warlord Zhang Bu at the beginning of Later Han. -HHS 82/72B:2740-41; Ngo 76:126.

Tang Yu 唐蔚 see Tang Wei 唐蔚.

Tang Yue 唐約 [Zhongqian 仲謙]. A member of the Imperial Secretariat, Tang Yue was expert in precedent, celebrated for the manner in which he gave good and firm advice without prejudice or revealing confidentiality. -XC 8:6a-b.

Tang Zeng 唐繒 see Tangzeng 唐繒.

Tang Zhen 唐珍; Yingchuan. Towards the end of the reign of Emperor Huan, Tang Zhen was Director of Retainers and a close associate of the leading eunuchs Guan Ba and Su Kang.

In 173 Tang Zhen was promoted from Minister of Ceremonies to be Excellency of Works. He left office at the end of the following year. -HHS 8:335-36, 103/13:3283; deC 89:477-478.

XHS 1:6a, quoted by SGZ 6:179 PC, says that Tang Zhen was a younger brother of the eunuch Tang Heng, who died in 164. Guan Ba and Su Kang were killed in 168, but other members of their party, such as Tang Zhen and Liu Ao, evidently continued to prosper.

XTS 74B:3201 traces Tang Zhen's ancestry back to Tang Lin 林, who was Director of the Secretariat and received enfeoffment under Wang Mang [QHX:502-503 and see sub Tang Wei above], and says that Tang Zhen was the son of Tang Ben, an officer of the Censorate.

If these statements are correct, then the eunuch Tang Heng had a notable lineage, but I suspect that Tang Zhen was the son of Tang Ben, and I doubt that an officer of the Censorate would have his son castrated.

Tang Zhou 唐周; Ji'nan. A disciple of the religious leader Zhang Jue, early in 184 Tang Zhou sent a message to the court of Han warning of the plot to overthrow the dynasty. -HHS 71/61:2300.

Tang Zou 唐叢 see Tangzou 唐叢.

Tangqi 堂谿 [surname] see Tangxi 堂谿. This surname also appears with the characters唐 and 溪, and the latter may be pronounced qi. A Tangxi Hui of Yingchuan, presumably an ancestor of the Later Han family, was a student of the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu during Former Han [QHX:504].

Tangxi Dian 堂谿典 [Bobing 伯并 or possibly Jidu 季度]; Yingchuan. There is confusion about the style of Tangxi Dian. Xianxian xingzhuang, quoted by HHS 60/50B:1990 TC and HHS 64/54:2103 TC, says that he had the style Jidu, but this may be confused with that of his father Xie: see the entry immediately below. At HHSJJ 8:317, Hui Dong quotes a fragmentary stele set up in 174 at Mount Song [see below] which gives Tangxi Dian's style as Bosheng. The stele has since disappeared, but this version appears more likely.

A scholar and teacher of Zuo zhuan [see also sub Jia Bosheng], Tangxi Dian was recommended by the eunuch Cao Teng and became a General of the Household.

In 175 Tangxi Dian was sent to Mount Chonggao 崇高山 to pray for rain. Now known as Mount Song 嵩山, this was the central one of the five sacred peaks of China, and was situated in the northwest of Tangxi Dian's home commandery of Yingchuan. A stele was set up to commemorate the occasion, and Tangxi Dian recommended that the name of the mountain, which had been changed by Emperor Wu in 111 BC, should revert to its former style of Songgao 嵩高. In the following year this was done [cf. Dubs 44:85].

Also in 175 Tangxi Dian joined Cai Yong and others in the proposal to engrave the Stone Classics at Luoyang, and when approval was given Tangxi Dian was certainly involved with the Gongyang text. The project was completed in 183. -HHS 68/58:2519, 60/50B:1990, 64/54:2103, DGHJ 3:5b, HHS 8:337, LS 14:9a.

Tangxi Xie 堂谿協 [Jidu 季度]; Yingchuan. Nagata 94:216 transcribes a fragmentary stele relating to Tangxi Dian's journey to Mount Songgao and his prayer for rain. A part of the text refers to "...the father of Dian, whose taboo given name was Xie, and whose style Jidu" 典大君, 諱協, 字季度. It goes on to tell how he became Registrar of the commandery, and in that capacity composed an inscription for the mountain. He was later nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became magistrate of Xi'e county in Nanyang, but died soon afterwards.

Xianxian xingzhuang, however, quoted by HHS 60/50B:1990 TC and HHS 64/54:2103 TC, says that it was Tangxi Dian who had the style Jidu and was magistrate of Xi'e. If the stele is correct, then Xianxian xingzhuang has confused the records of the father and the son.

Tangzeng 唐繒; non-Chinese. A king of the Zuodu people, in 100 Tangzeng and other chieftains led 17,000 people to the frontier of Shu commandery to offer submission. The leaders were awarded golden seals with purple ribbons, and lesser chiefs received gifts of cash and cloth. -HHS 86/76:2857.

Tangzou 唐叢; non-Chinese. A king of the Zuodu 荊都 people on the frontier of Shu commandery, about 74 Tangzou presented three songs in praise of Han. The Inspector Zhu Fu submitted a transcription and translation to the court of Emperor Ming, who was delighted to receive such recognition from afar. He had the texts and their Chinese rendering sent to the history office, and they were included in Dongguan Han ji.

The three pieces are Yuanyi lede geshi 遠夷樂德歌詩 "Songs of the Distant Barbarians Delighting in the Virtue [of Han]," Yuanyi mude geshi 遠夷慕德歌 詩 "Songs of the Distant Barbarians Longing for the Virtue [of Han]" and Yuanyi huaide geshi 遠夷懷德歌詩 "Songs of the Distant Barbarians Embracing the Virtue [of Han]." DGHJ 22 has what purports to be the original non-Chinese, with a line-by-line translation. In HHS 86/76:2856-57, Fan Ye used only the Chinese version, but the Tang commentary attaches the non-Chinese text. -HHS 86/76:2855-57, DGHJ 17:5a, 22:1b-2a.

In his memorial of presentation, Zhu Fu says that the poems had been submitted by King Tangzou of the White Wolf tribe 白狼王唐叢. Just before this, however, the main text of HHS 86/76 lists Tangzou as the name of a tribe, like the White Wolf. One of these statements must be wrong.

Tanrong 潭戎; non-Chinese. A tribesman of the hill country west of Wuling, Tanrong rebelled in the winter of 92, burning local offices and killing officials. The trouble was settled by local commandery forces. -HHS 86/76:2833.

Tanshihuai 檀石槐; Xianbi. A nominal son of Touluhou, Tanshihuai was born about 130. Touluhou had been absent for three years before his birth, but his mother claimed that Tanshihuai had been conceived when a miraculous hailstone fell into her mouth. Touluhou was not convinced and had the infant exposed, but his wife persuaded her own family to take the child in and care for him.

Gaining prominence in various clan skirmishes, Tanshihuai was recognised as a fighting leader while still in his teens, and he gradually gathered a confederacy with rudimentary laws and government. In 156, from headquarters in the hill country north of Dai commandery near present-day Zhangbei in Hebei, he embarked on a series of incursions against the Chinese frontier, and in 166, supported by Wuhuan and Xiongnu, he made a major attack on nine commanderies.

By this time Tanshihuai had shown authority both in war and as a political leader. The Han government attempted to engage him in the traditional pattern of alliance, and offered him insignia as a king, but Tanshihuai rejected such approaches. After a brief respite the raids were renewed in late 167, and they continued almost every winter until the early 180s.

By the 170s it was claimed that Tanshihuai's power extended along the whole frontier and north over Mongolia, Manchuria and central Asia – and that he had successfully attacked the Japanese 倭 [Wa]. This last is certainly an exaggeration, but Tanshihuai evidently held some authority over territory formerly controlled by the Xiongnu, and his raids reached as far west as Beidi, southwest of the Ordos, and Jiuquan in north-western Gansu. The loose hegemony was divided into three, each region containing ten or twenty tribal groups under a number of lieutenants. Neither a sophisticated nor a stable organisation, it was an effective pirate kingdom, devastating the northern provinces of China.

Unable to control the situation with local resources, in 177 the government of Emperor Ling approved a direct attack across the frontier by 30,000 men in three columns of cavalry and non-Chinese auxiliaries, led by Xia Yu, Tian Yan and Zang Min. A risky project, opposed by several advisers, it proved a disastrous failure. Cut off and overwhelmed, the imperial army lost all its material and most of its men, and the generals barely escaped. Not only did the defeat leave the frontier more vulnerable than before, it displayed the weakness of Han: for the first time since the beginning of the dynasty a full imperial army facing the barbarians could no longer be certain of victory.

Fortunately for China, Tanshihuai died about 185, a few years after this great success, at the age of forty-five. His empire disintegrated under the rule of his son Helian and in the faction fighting which followed Helian's death. -HHS 90/80:2989-94, SGZ 30:837-38; Schreiber 47, G/deC 77, deC 84:330-345.

Tantai Gong 澹臺恭 was an Academician. -FSTY 6f: 145.

Tantai [Jingbo] 澹臺敬伯; Wu. Having studied the New Text Han version of the Classic of Poetry under the Academician Xue Han, Tantai Jingbo became a well-known scholar. -HHS 79/69B:2573.

Tanzhe 炭遮 of Further Jushi. In 153 Tanzhe was an officer under King Aluoduo. When Aluoduo quarrelled with the Han agent Yan Hao and attacked the Chinese military colony, Tanzhe turned against him and sought to make peace. Aluoduo fled north to the Xiongnu. -HHS 88/78:2931.

Tanzhi 貪至; Wuhuan. A chieftain in the Dependent State of Liaodong, described as a King 王, about 188 this man brought his people to surrender to Gongsun Zan. -SGZ 8:239.

Tao Dun 陶敦 [Wenli 文理]; Henan. Sponsored by Deng Zhi, brother of the regent Dowager, about 110

Tao Dun was appointed Minister Steward.

At the end of 125, when the power of the regent Dowager Yan and her family was destroyed and the young Emperor Shun was brought to the throne, Tao Dun became Excellency of Works. In the following year he attacked the Director of Retainers Yu Xu for his excess zeal in impeaching the high officials Feng Shi and Liu Xi, who had held office under the Yan; Tao Dun argued that they were honourable men who had sought only to serve the government of the day. Yu Xu, however, then persuaded the emperor that moral reform must begin at the top. So Feng Shi and Liu Xi were dismissed, and Tao Dun left office a few months later. -HHS 6:251-53, 58/48:1870.

Tao Fan 陶範; Henan. In 125 Tao Fan was Minister Steward when Liu Yi the Little Emperor, who had been placed upon the throne by the Dowager Yan and her family, became ill. Tao Fan joined a plot with the Excellency Li He and the colonel Zhao Zhi to restore Emperor Shun to the succession, but the eunuch Sun Cheng and his colleagues carried out their own coup before they were ready to act.

The plan was not known at the time, but it was revealed a year later and Li He was offered enfeoffment. We are not told whether his associates were similarly rewarded. -HHS 82/72A:2718.

Tao Qian 陶謙 [Gongzu 恭祖] (132-194); Danyang. Tao Qian's father, a county magistrate in Kuaiji, died when Tao Qian was a child. As a young man, Tao Qian acted the fool and was a ringleader for local trouble-makers, but he impressed the gentleman Gan Gong, who gave him his daughter in marriage.

Tao Qian later became a keen scholar and a man of honour, though he could still be erratic in his conduct. Having held local appointment in his commandery, Tao Qian was nominated Filial and Incorrupt, served in the Imperial Secretariat, and became a county magistrate in Lujiang. The Administrator Zhang Pan, a friend of his late father, sent to welcome him, but Tao Qian snubbed him and left office.

Nominated by the provincial authorities as Abundant Talent, Tao Qian was appointed a magistrate, this time in Jibei, and was later Inspector of Yu province. In 185 he held military office and then a staff position against the Liang province rebels in the northwest, but was soon afterwards sent as Inspector of Xu province to deal with remnant Yellow Turbans. He restored order and established peaceful government, so that Xu province became prosperous and was a place of refuge for people escaping civil war.

In 191 Tao Qian sent three thousand men to support Zhu Jun against Dong Zhuo, and he later sought to form an alliance against Li Jue and his fellows. Nothing came of it, and in 193 Tao Qian made contact with the regime at Chang'an; he was promoted to Governor, named a general and enfeoffed. As he began to show increasing favour to corrupt officials, however, he lost the support of the gentry and his administration became disordered. He was now in a loose alliance with Yuan Shu and the northern warlord Gongsun Zan.

Towards the end of 193 soldiers under Tao Qian's command waylaid and killed Cao Song, father of Cao Cao the Governor of Yan province. Tao Qian may have been innocent of the affair, but Cao Cao attacked his territory with full force, defeated his army and ravaged Pengcheng and Xiapi. Tao Qian fled to Donghai, and in 194 he received support from Tian Kai and Liu Bei. Cao Cao attacked again, but was then obliged to turn back and deal with insurrection in his home territory. Soon afterwards Tao Qian died of illness. -HHS 73/63:2366-68*, SGZ 8:247-50*.

Tao Shang 陶尚; Danyang. Son of Tao Qian, he held no public office. -SGZ 8:250.

Tao Sheng 陶升; Wei. Formerly a county officer, Tao Sheng later styled himself General Who Pacifies Han 平漢將軍 and joined the Black Mountain bandits. In 191 the bandits captured Ye city, but Tao Sheng rescued the families of Yuan Shao's followers and other officials and brought them to safety. Yuan Shao named him a General of the Household. -HHS 74/64A:2381, SGZ 6:194.

Tao Shuo 陶碩 [Gongchao 公超]; Henan. A man without desires, Tao Shuo ate very simple food. -XC 6:11b-12a.

Tao Ying 陶應; Danyang. Son of Tao Qian, he held no public office. -SGZ 8:250.

Taoqiu Hong 陶丘洪 [Zilin 子林 or Zixiu 子休]; Pingyuan. Well-known as a scholar and a moralist, Taoqiu Hong refused nomination as Filial and Incorrupt, but later joined the offices of the Grand Commandant. He died at the age of thirty.

As a young man about 170, Taoqiu Hong expressed approval for the action of Wei Shao and his associates, who sold commandery property in order to fund a bribe to the eunuch Hou Lan and secure the reduction of the death penalty for their former Chancellor Shi Bi. He also expressed admiration for Liu Dai of Donglai and his brother Liu Yao, arguing that the initial nomination of Liu Dai as a provincial nominee of Abundant Talent should not disqualify his brother from following him if he was worthy to do so.

In 188 Taoqiu Hong considered joining a plot of Wang Fen and Chen Yi to kidnap Emperor Ling, but was dissuaded by Hua Xin. -HHS 64/54:2111-12, SGZ 12:371, SGZ Wu 4:1184.

Teng Dan 滕耽; Beihai. The brothers Teng Dan and Teng Zhou were gentlemen of the same province as Liu Yao of Donghai. As civil war broke out in the early 190s they went to join him in the south. They later joined the Sun group, and Sun Quan appointed Teng Dan as a major. He had a fine reputation, but died about 210. -SGZ Wu 19:1443.

Teng Fu 滕撫 [Shufu 叔輔]; Beihai. Having held office in his commandery and province, Teng Fu became magistrate in the chief county of Zhuo. The Administrator was so impressed with his ability that he gave him charge of the other six counties in the commandery. He maintained this regime for seven years, reforming customs and showing grace to the people, and all was peace and order.

In 144 there was major rebellion in the southeast, initially inspired by the insurrection of the bandits Fan Rong and Zhou Sheng. A first attack by levies from Yang and Xu provinces led by Feng Gun was defeated, and the disturbance spread across the whole of the lower Yangzi and the Huai. Teng Fu was sent as Commandant to Jiujiang, the centre of the trouble. One Administrator had died in early fighting, and his successor was killed in his capital of Hefei by another bandit group.

In such an emergency, Teng Fu's appointment as Commandant gave him powers largely independent of civil authority, and he restored support for Han by generous gifts to those communities which remained loyal. The situation had been so serious that there were plans to send a major army from the capital, but in the summer of 145 Teng Fu combined with Feng Gun and others to defeat the main force of the bandits, killing Fan Rong, Zhou Sheng and their colleagues.

Teng Fu was now named a General of the Household, replacing Feng Gun in charge of military operations in Yang and Xu provinces. Two more groups of bandits appeared, and the chieftain Hua Meng was strong enough to attack Hefei and kill the Administrator Yang

Cen. Teng Fu, however, defeated these in turn, taking many prisoners and quantities of cattle, horses and treasure, and over the next few months the region was gradually brought under control.

Returning to the capital, Teng Fu was granted the ren right to have one of his sons appointed as a gentleman cadet. He was also given rich rewards, which he distributed among his men.

Teng Fu was later Administrator of Zuopingyi, but the eunuchs disliked him because he was honest and straightforward and refused to be involved in court intrigue; and when it was proposed that he be enfeoffed for his achievements they argued against it. The Grand Commandant Hu Guang, who shared authority with the General-in-Chief Liang Ji, followed their lead and had Teng Fu dismissed from his post. There was general indignation at his treatment, but Teng Fu did not hold office again. -HHS 38/28:1279-80*.

Teng Shi 滕是. A eunuch, in 168 Teng Shi was member of staff at the residence of the regent Dowager Dou. When his colleague Zhu Yu learned that Dou Wu and Chen Fan planned to arrest the senior eunuchs Cao Jie and Wang Fu, Teng Shi was one of the people he called for support. The group took an oath in blood to destroy Dou Wu, and their coup was successful. -HHS 69/59:2243, 78/68:2524; Ch'ü 72:491.

Teng Yan 滕延 [Boxing 伯行]; Beihai. In 160 Teng Yan was Chancellor of Jibei. The imperial eunuch favourites Hou Lan and Duan Gui had estates in Jiying near the borders of his territory, and their retainers and clients plundered across a wide area. Teng Yan arrested them, killed several dozen, and laid the bodies on the roadside. Hou Lan and Duan Gui complained to Emperor Huan that he had killed innocent men, and Teng Yan was dismissed, but he was widely admired as a man of principle.

Teng Yan was later a most conscientious Intendant of Jingzhao. -HHS 78/68:2522-23, XC 8:2b; deC 89:26-27. HYZ 10B:155 refers to a Teng Yan 騰延, surely a miswriting of this man's name.

Teng Zhou 滕胄; Beihai. Teng Zhou and his younger brother Dan were gentlemen of the same province as Liu Yao of Donghai. When civil war broke out in the early 190s they went to join him in the south, and they later joined the Sun group. Teng Zhou was skilled at literary composition, and Sun Quan had him revise the drafts of his official documents.

Teng Zhou died sometime before 220. His son Teng

790 Teng Zi

Yin 胤 married a woman of the Sun clan and became a guardian for Sun Quan's son and successor Sun Liang. -SGZ Wu 19:1443; Fang 65:101.

Teng Zi 滕咨; Beihai. According to XC 3:14a, in the late 140s and 150s Teng Zi gave shelter to Li Xie, son of Li Gu, as he was pursued by agents of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji.

Ti 題 [surname unknown]. With rank as a general and enfeoffment as a village marquis, in 220 he was one of the sponsors of a stele commemorating Cao Pi's assumption of the imperial title. -LS 19:4b; Goodman 98:197.

Tian 田 [personal name unknown]. In 159 he served against the bandits of Taishan and Langye. -LS 21:21b-22a.

Tian 田 [personal name unknown]. In 177 a stele was erected in honour of this man, who had served as a county magistrate in Julu. The text gave details of his family and his career, but the top half of the stone is lost and the readings are uncertain. -LX 20:1b-3b.

Tian Bin 田邠 see Tian Fen 田芬.

Tian Cheng 田盛 see Tian Sheng 田盛.

Tian Chou 田疇 [Zitai 子泰] (169-214); Youbeiping. A scholar and a skilled swordsman, Tian Chou distinguished himself in 190 by journeying through frontier territory to take a message from Liu Yu, Governor of You province, to the court at Chang'an. Appointed to office there, he returned to the northeast just after Gongsun Zan killed Liu Yu in 193. He presented the return message at Liu Yu's grave, and though Gongsun Zan had him arrested he refused to acknowledge his authority or join his service.

Retiring to the north, Tian Chou gathered his kinsmen to establish a colony in exile among the hills of Xuwu in the north of Youbeiping. His simple rule attracted wide acceptance, and his government is seen as a model of gentry-led self-sufficiency and independence.

Tian Chou defied Gongsun Zan and later rejected the Yuan, but he was angry at the depredations of the Wuhuan in the region. As Cao Cao came north in 207 Tian Chou went to join him, then guided him on the oblique approach north across the frontier to surprise Tadun and the Yuan brothers at White Wolf Mountain. Yuan Shang had at one time recommended him for office, and when he was killed by Gongsun Kang Tian Chou held mourning for him.

Though Cao Cao pressed him hard several times,

Tian Chou refused enfeoffment and gave away all his rewards. He would accept only low advisory office. -SGZ 11:340-44*; Ebrey 86:630; deC 96:122-124, 356-361.

Tian Fen 田芬 or Tian Bin 邠 (d.195). As Minister Steward, Tian Fen accompanied Emperor Xian on his escape from Chang'an in 195. He was killed in one of the battles along the way. -HHS 9:378.

Tian Feng 田豐 (d.200) [Yuanhao 元皓]; Julu or Beihai. A man of local reputation, Tian Feng joined the offices of the Excellencies, was recommended as Abundant Talent, and became a member of the Imperial Censorate. Concerned at the eunuch influence in government, however, he resigned and returned home.

As Yuan Shao raised rebellion against Dong Zhuo in 190, he invited Tian Feng to join him, and when he took over Ji province from Han Fu in 191 he appointed him as Attendant Officer. Tian Feng killed the loyalist officers Geng Wu and Min Chun, became a valued adviser, and he sheltered Yuan Shao when their camp was attacked by troops of Gongsun Zan in 192.

In 198 Tian Feng urged Yuan Shao to attack Cao Cao's base city of Xu on a claim to rescue the emperor, but his pre-emptive strategy was not followed. As Yuan Shao prepared his offensive in 200, Tian Feng stressed the need to move quickly while Cao Cao was engaged against Liu Bei, but after Cao Cao returned he warned against a direct attack and urged a policy of delay and attrition. Yuan Shao disagreed and, as Tian Feng persisted, he imprisoned him.

Following the defeat at Guandu, Yuan Shao's officers regretted Tian Feng's advice had not been taken, but his rival Pang Ji claimed Tian Fang was glad to see he had been proven correct. So Yuan Shao killed him. -SGZ 6:200-01.

Tian Gan 田紺; Wuwei. Member of a powerful local clan, during the 30s Tian Gan was Chief Clerk in Command of Troops, effective head of the commandery. His kinsmen and retainers bullied the people, and when the Administrator Ren Yan arrived he arrested and executed Tian Gan and several others of his following. -HHS 76/66:2463.

Tian Gong 田恭; Jianwei. A clerical officer in the commandery about 74, Tian Gong dealt with the non-Chinese people and knew their language. When King Tangzou of the Zuodu people presented three songs in praise of the Han, the Inspector Zhu Fu had Tian Gong translate them, then sent him with his officer Li Ling to submit the transcription and translation to the court of Emperor Ming. Delighted to receive such recognition from afar, the emperor had the texts and their Chinese rendering sent to the history office; they were included in Dongguan Han ji. -HHS 86/76:2855-57, DGHJ 17: 5a, 22:1b-2a and see sub Tangzou.

Tian Hong 田鴻. An officer under Cen Peng, general of Emperor Guangwu in 29, after the warlord Tian Rong of Nan commandery was driven up the Yangzi to take refuge with Gongsun Shu Tian Hong was appointed Commandant of Yiling county, to maintain defence in depth against any incursion back through the Gorges.

In 30 Gongsun Shu sent Tian Rong in a counter-attack. The advance position under Feng Jun was overrun, but though the enemy entered the middle Yangzi, they were turned back without permanent effect.

In the spring of 33 Tian Rong and other commanders attacked again, and this time they broke through the defences, seized Yiling, and established a position which defied the Han troops for two years. Tian Hong was very likely killed in this campaign, for he is not heard of again. -HHS 17/7:659-60; Bn 59:184-187.

Tian Hui 田輝 [Shudu 叔都]; Zuopingyi. Well known as a young man, Tian Hui was frequently offered nomination by his commandery, but he became concerned that his elder brother Weidu had received no such recognition. Under the pressure he first became ill and was then struck mute. At first his friends thought he was pretending, but when they stole his bedding and found that he could make no cry of protest they were suitably convinced.

After four years, Tian Weidu was at last nominated, and as he went to pay respects at the family temple Tian Hui's speech was restored to him. He was promptly proposed as Abundant Talent by the provincial office of the Director of Retainers, and received invitations to join the offices of the Grand Commandant and of the General-in-Chief. He became an Imperial Clerk, but died soon afterwards. -FSTY 5:35-36; Nylan 83:451-453.

Tian Jing 田景 see Tian Yi 田儀.

Tian [Jingzhong] 田敬仲 see Jing 敬 [personal name unknown].

Tian Kai 田楷/楷 (d.199). Named Inspector of Qing province by Gongsun Zan in 191, Tian Kai fought Yuan Shao for that territory until a truce was agreed in 193. In 194 he brought aid to Tao Qian against Cao Cao.

By 196 Tian Kai had been pushed back north by Yuan Tan, and he joined Gongsun Zan at Yi city in Hejian. He died when the fortress was stormed by Yuan Shao.

Tian Li 田立. In 24 Tian Li was enfeoffed as king of a county by the Gengshi Emperor. He held command in the garrison under Zhu Wei which defended Luoyang against Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, but as Guangwu's army crossed the Yellow River in the autumn of 25, Tian Li surrendered. -HHS 17/7:642, 1A:24; Bn 59:56, 87, 105.

Tian Li 田颯 (d.57); Shuofang. A local warlord, in 28 Tian Li was persuaded by an emissary of the Shanyu Yu of the Xiongnu to give his support to the pretender Lu Fang, who established his capital in Wuyuan in the following year. Lu Fang recognised Tian Li as Administrator of Shuofang, but in 31 he executed Tian Li's colleague Li Xing, Administrator of Wuyuan. In the winter Tian Li defected to Emperor Guangwu; he was confirmed in his position in Shuofang.

Tian Li later became Chief Clerk in Command of Troops in Longxi commandery; though his rank was lower than that of an Administrator, this was a substantial military appointment and Longxi was far more important than Shuofang. In 57 he was part of a combined army under the Internuncio Zhang Hong against a Qiang raiding force led by Dianyu. As the Han forces were heavily defeated in Jincheng, Zhang Hong and Tian Li were both killed. -HHS 12/2:506-07, 87/7:2879; Bn 67:105-107, deC 84:79 [as Tian Sa].

Tian Lin 田林; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Tian Lin was a member of the group, and it is likely he was a kinsman of Tian Pan below. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210, ZF:16a [in SGZ 6:211 PC]; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Tian Lü 田慮. In 73 Tian Lü accompanied the envoy Ban Chao to Shule [Kashgar]. King Jian of Qiuzi [Kuqa] had deposed the king of Shule and replaced him with his own officer Douth. As local opponents to the new regime offered their support, Tian Lü was sent into the city, where he caught Douth by surprise and arrested him. Ban Chao then restored the native dynasty. -HHS 47/37:1574.

Tian Ming 田明. As Administrator-elect of Jiangxia about 146, Tian Ming went to pay his respects to Liang Buyi, brother of the General-in-Chief Liang Ji. Concerned at this sign of his brother's influence, Liang Ji had Tian Ming arrested, flogged, and sent to exile to Shuofang. He died on the journey. -HHS 34/24:1185.

Tian Pan 田槃; Shanyang. Probably a kinsman of Tian Lin q.v., Tian Pan was also a member of the ill-fated fellowship from Shanyang.

Tian Rong 田戎 (d.36); Runan. A migrant into the south of Nan commandery, Tian Rong was probably a refugee from the troubles which followed the flooding of the Yellow River. As rebellion broke out against the government of Wang Mang in 23, he and his associate Chen Yi took control of territory along the Yangzi, styled themselves generals and kings, and made alliance with Qin Feng, immediately to the north. Chen Yi is not heard of again, but Tian Rong married one of Qin Feng's daughters and the two warlords held their positions for some years without incident.

In 26 Emperor Guangwu's forces began the reconquest of Nanyang, and by the autumn of 27 Qin Feng had been driven south and was under close siege in his home district of Liqiu. His earlier wife, The Lady Qin, had evidently died by this time and he had married again; his new brother-in-law Xin Chen persuaded Tian Rong that he should surrender to the imperial army.

Early in 28 Tian Rong left Xin Chen to hold his base at Yiling, present-day Yichang, while he went by ship down the Yangzi and up the Han to seek terms at Liqiu. Xin Chen, however, plundered Tian Rong's treasury and went directly overland to surrender first. He sent a letter urging Tian Rong to join him, but Tian Rong realised he had been betrayed and was concerned at his likely reception. Having taken auspices by tortoise-shell, he refused to submit and tried instead to assist Qin Feng.

Some months later Tian Rong was defeated by imperial troops. He was forced back to Yiling, and in the spring of 29 Cen Peng came south against him. Defeated again near Jiangling, Tian Rong was driven up the Yangzi. Abandoning his wife and children and accompanied by just a few dozen horsemen, he fled west through the Gorges to Gongsun Shu, who recognised him as a king.

In the following year Tian Rong was sent with other commanders down the Yangzi to attack Nan commandery, no doubt in the hope that he might still have sufficient local support to regain his former position. Though the raiders broke through Cen Peng's defences and reached as far as Yiling, they achieved no substantial gain. Later that year Gongsun Shu's adviser Jing Han proposed that Yan Cen be sent north to seize the upper Wei valley while Tian Rong moved west down the Yangzi. Tian Rong and Yan Cen strongly supported the plan, but no action was taken, and Gongsun Shu's troops simply held their positions along the Gorges.

In 33, accompanied by the senior official Ren Man and an Administrator-designate for Nan commandery, Tian Rong was sent with a strong force on rafts down the Yangzi against Cen Peng. Defeating Feng Jun and other generals, they occupied the course of the Yangzi beyond Yiling and established encampments above the stream, with a fortified bridge floating across it, and barricades in the water. The Han troops could make no headway against these defences, and for the next two years Cen Peng remained inactive in his headquarters by Jiangling. For their part, Tian Rong and his associates made no move to expand their holdings in Nan commandery; their position was rather a defensive outpost than the spring-board for an offensive into the valley of the Han.

Eventually, in the summer of 35 Cen Peng led a full attack on Tian Rong's river defences. Aided by a monsoon wind which drove their boats against the current, his men broke through the palisade in the water and set fire to the floating fortress, which collapsed in flames. Tian Rong's men were utterly defeated and he withdrew through the Gorges to Jiangzhou, present-day Chongqing.

Cen Peng forced his way up the river and attacked Tian Rong. He achieved no success, for Tian Rong was well supplied in a strong position, but he then left Feng Jun to keep Tian Rong in check while he moved directly against Gongsun Shu's capital, Chengdu. Isolated in Jiangzhou, Tian Rong took no active part in the campaign which led to the death of Gongsun Shu in the winter of 36.

Before that, in the autumn of 36, Jiangzhou had fallen to storm. Tian Rong was captured and executed. -HHS 17/7:656-62, XC 8:1b; Bn 59:26-28, 153-157, 183-194.

Tian Ru 田弱; Youfufeng. A fellow-countryman of the hermit scholar Fa Zhen, Tian Ru recommended him warmly to Emperor Shun, but Fa Zhen refused to take any appointment. -HHS 83/73:2774.

Tian Sa 田颯 see Tian Li 田颯.

Tian Shang 田尚; Wuwei. Son of Tian Gan and member of a powerful local clan, after his father and brothers were killed by the reforming Administrator Ren Yan in the 30s, Tian Shang took title as a general and brought several hundred men to attack the commandery offices by night. Ren Yan brought his own troops to destroy the attackers, and there was no more such trouble. -HHS 76/66:2463.

Tian Shao 田韶 (d.190); Liaodong. Like other members of leading local families, Tian Shao had treated Gongsun Du with contempt as frontiersman. When Gongsun Du became Administrator in 190, he arrested Tian Shao and his fellows on various charges and executed them. -SGZ 8:252; Gardiner 72A:66.

Tian Sheng 田聖, the Lady (d.168). A Chosen Woman, lowest rank of concubine in the harem of Emperor Huan, when the Empress Deng was disgraced and died in 165 she and eight companions were taken to their master's bed, and they continued to share his favours even after his Empress Dou was appointed at the end of that year. The names of the other women are not recorded, though one may have been the Lady Feng II q.v. It seems probable that the women were engaged not only for their qualities as sexual partners, but also in the hope that one of the magical number nine might conceive a son. The Empress Dou, in any case, had been largely forced upon Emperor Huan by his senior ministers, and he does not appear to have shown any interest in her.

In the winter of 167/168, as Emperor Huan was dying, he promoted Tian Sheng and her colleagues to be Honoured Ladies. After he was dead, however, and even as his body lay in state in the palace, the Empress Dou, now Dowager, killed the Lady Tian; through the intervention of the eunuchs Guan Ba and Su Kang, however, she was obliged to spare the lives of the other eight favourites. -HHS 10B:445-46.

Tian Sheng 田盛 or Tian Cheng [Zhongxiang 仲嚮]; Chenliu. A friend of Guo Tai, Tian Sheng was also well-known and admired. Refusing to take any office, he journeyed as a scholar and died old. -HHS 68/58:2233.

Tian Si 田汜 (d.92). In 92 Tian Si was an officer on the staff of Nie Shang the Protector of the Qiang, who received a visit from the Lady Bique, grandmother of the warlord Mitang. Nie Shang appears to have treated the old lady with courtesy, and sent Tian Si and four other men to escort her back. When they arrived, however, Mitang murdered them and used their blood to swear enmity against Han. There is no explanation for this sudden ferocity; it may have been premeditated, or triggered by some unexpected breach of protocol. -HHS 87/77:2883.

Tian [Weidu] 田威都; Zuopingyi. Elder brother of Tian Hui, he received no recognition or appointment, while Tian Hui himself was regularly approached by the commandery with offers and invitations. Greatly concerned at this discrepancy, Tian Hui became ill and was stricken mute. Eventually Tian Weidu was nominated, and Tian Hui regained his speech.

Tian Weidu became Chief Clerk of Anding commandery and then Administrator of Wudu. -FSTY 5:35-36.

Tian Xi 田翕. Administrator of Lingling in 29, Tian Xi had received a formal commission from the late Gengshi Emperor, but controlled his own territory. Guangwu's commander in the south, Cen Peng, wrote urging him to accept the new imperial regime, and sent one of his officers with a formal summons to arms. Tian Xi duly sent tribute to Han and was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 17/7:659; Bn 59:157-158.

Tian Xin 田歆. Intendant of Henan in the early 140s, Tian Xin was required to make six nominations of men as Filial and Incorrupt. Five of the places had been pre-empted by relatives and clients of influential families, but Tian Xin was able to make one on merit alone. His nephew Wang Shen, whom he asked for a recommendation, proposed Chong Gao, and Chong Gao later rose to the highest rank. -HHS 56/46:1826; Bn 80:135.

Tian Xu 田續; Youbeiping. Tian Xu was a great-nephew of Tian Chou, who had given Cao Cao great assistance in the northeast but always refused reward. When Cao Pi came to the throne in 220 he awarded Tian Xu a secondary marquissate in honour of Tian Chou's good work. -SGZ 11:344.

Tian Yan 田胤. A general in the service of Gongsun Shu, in 32 Tian Yan was sent north to aid Wei Ao in Tianshui. For several months he and his colleague Li Yu joined the attack on Lai Xi's forlorn hope in Lueyang, but they failed to take the city and were driven off when Guangwu's main army arrived.

Tian Yan and Li Yu retreated to defend Shanggui in Tianshui, close to Wei Ao's refuge in Xi city of southern Longxi. At the end of the year Wang Yuan brought reinforcements from Gongsun Shu and the sieges were broken. Li Yu returned to the south, but Tian Yan remained in the Wei valley.

After the death of Wei Ao in 33, Tian Yan and his colleague Zhao Kuang attempted to support his son Wei Chun and maintain a presence for Gongsun Shu in the north. They were attacked by the imperial army under Lai Xi: Zhao Kuang was killed in 34 and Tian Yan probably shared his fate. -HHS 13/3:530, 15/5:588.

Tian Yan 田晏. In Duan Jiong's many campaigns against the Qiang, Tian Yan and his colleague Xia Yu were among his most trusted and effective officers. In 159 they led a small advance troop to entice an attack from the Qiang of Longxi, leading to Duan Jiong's successful campaign across the frontier, and they took leading roles in his operations to destroy the Eastern Qiang in 168 and 169.

Tian Yan later became Protector of the Qiang, but was dismissed. He was pardoned, but was anxious to regain credit.

In 177 Xia Yu proposed a great offensive against the Xianbi and their war-leader Tanshihuai. Many at court had reservations, but the proposal was supported by the eunuch Wang Fu, an old ally of Duan Jiong; there is no record of Duan Jiong's opinion, and he may have been away from court at the time. The expedition was approved, and Tian Yan led one of three columns of local levies and Xiongnu cavalry which advanced into Xianbi territory. The army, however, was disastrously defeated, the first such failure of Chinese arms since the time of Former Han. Tian Yan and the other leaders were brought back in cage carts, paid a ransom and were reduced to commoner status. -HHS 90/80:2990-94; deC 84:127, 137, 338-342.

Tian Yan 田彦. A disciple of Zhang Zhi, at the end of Han Tian Yan was a celebrated calligrapher in the informal cao shu 草書 "Grass Style." -JS 36:1065.

Tian Yi 田邑 [Boyu 伯玉]; Zuopingyi. Tian Yi's father Tian Feng 田豐 had been a general under Wang Mang and was enfeoffed as his representative kinsman from the ancient royal house of Qi 齊: Dubs 55:279, QHX: 209.

Tian Yi was a man of high morality and broad scholarship, skilled in literary composition. Despite the connection to Wang Mang he evidently had no difficulty in accepting the Gengshi Emperor, and he became Administrator of Shangdang under the new regime.

Early in 25 Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, sent Feng Yi and Kou Xun into Henei to oppose the Gengshi commander Zhu Wei at Luoyang. Feng Yi also drove north towards Shangdang, establishing a defensive position which was then held by Wang Liang, and which prevented Tian Yi from intervening in operations about Luoyang.

After the fall of Luoyang the armies of Emperor Guangwu attacked Shangdang, seizing two counties and capturing Tian Yi's mother, brother, wife and children. Despite this, Tian Yi remained loyal to the Gengshi Emperor and held back the invaders, but in the winter, after learning of the death of the Gengshi Emperor, he sent messengers to Luoyang and surrendered. Guangwu confirmed Tian Yi in his post.

Tian Yi told his former colleagues Bao Yong and Feng Yan of the new situation, but they refused to accept it and Feng Yan wrote to criticise him. Tian Yi replied, and their exchange was preserved as a model of debate. Bao Yong seized one of Tian Yi's cities, but Tian Yi arrested some of his kinfolk and urged him again to surrender. Bao Yong would not reply, and the two men's quarrel became personal.

Tian Yi was later named Administrator of Yuyang, but took sick on the road and was recalled to the capital as a Counsellor Remonstrant. He died soon afterwards. -HHS 28/18A:969-76, DGHJ 14:3a-4a; Bn 59:106, 209.

Tian Yi 田儀 or Tian Jing 景 (d.192). When Dong Zhuo was assassinated at Chang'an his Registrar Tian Yi went to attend the corpse; he was killed by Lü Bu. -HHS 72/62:2331-32 [Tian Yi], SGZ 6:179 [Tian Jing].

Tian Yin 田銀 (d.211); Hejian. About 210 Tian Yin and Su Bo led a rebellion in You and Ji provinces. In the following year they were defeated and killed by the general Jia Xin under the orders of Cao Pi. -SGZ 23:659.

Tian Yu 田豫 [Guorang 國讓]; Yuyang. Having followed Liu Bei into Yu province in 194, Tian Yu went back north to care for his aging mother. He became a magistrate in the service of Gongsun Zan, and dissuaded the mutineer Wang Men from attacking his city.

After Gongsun Zan was destroyed by Yuan Shao in 199, Tian Yu joined Xianyu Fu in Yuyang and persuaded him to support Cao Cao. He joined Cao Cao's staff and then held county magistracies in Yingchuan and Runan. About 213 he was appointed Administrator of Yiyang commandery, newly established in the hill country between Jiangxia and Runan.

In 218 Tian Yu was a senior adviser to Cao Zhang against the Wuhuan of Dai commandery, then returned south in 219 as Administrator of Nanyang. The commandery had long suffered from the hills people, either inhabitants or refugees, and it had lately experienced the mutiny and rebellion of Hou Yin, who seized the capital, Wan city, and obtained support from those people of the hills. As the trouble was put down, some five hundred hills people were captured. They were scheduled for execution, but Tian Yu released them all. Making the kowtow in gratitude, the prisoners went back to tell of their generous treatment. So the hills became peaceable and the commandery was settled. Cao Cao himself expressed admiration.

In 221 Cao Cao's son and successor Cao Pi appointed Tian Yu as Protector of the Wuhuan, dealing also with the Xianbi and particularly with the growing power of the chieftain Kebineng. About 230 Tian Yu was transferred to Runan, but returned to take command of naval forces in Qing province against the alliance of Gongsun Yuan and Sun Quan of Wu; in 232 he saw the wreck of the Wu fleet off Shandong. Back in the south, Tian Yu successfully defended the key city of Hefei against a major attack in 234. About 240 he was sent back north to deal with the Xiongnu, and he later held office at court. He died about 250 aged over 80. -SGZ 26:726-29*.

Tian Yue 田樂; Jincheng. In 215 Tian Yue and Yang Kui took the head of Han Sui to Cao Cao; they were rewarded with secondary marquisates. Cf., however, sub Han Sui. -SGZ 11:350.

Tianyu 填虞 i.e. Dianyu 滇吾. -JS 116:2959.

Tiao 刁 [surname] see Diao 刁 passim.

Tiao 銚 [surname] see Yao 銚 passim.

Tiaobian 調便 or Tiaopian or Tiaowang Bian 調王便 see Bian 便, King of Yetiao/Shetiao 葉調.

Tiaohe 雕何; Qiang. In 118 Tiaohe was sent by the Chinese general Deng Zun to assassinate Langmo, fugitive leader of the rebel Qiang. He was rewarded with title as Marquis of the Qiang. -HHS 87/77:2891.

Timieling 替滅陵 (d.58); non-Chinese. In 58 Timieling and Damu/Damou, tribal chieftains in Yizhou commandery, led a rebellion. They were defeated by local Chinese troops, and their heads were sent to Luoyang. -HHS 101/11:3229.

Tong 童/僮 [surname] see also sub Dong Hui 董恢: HHSJJ 76/66:2718 Hui Dong.

Tong Yin 僮尹 was either Inspector of Jiaozhi or Administrator of the commandery of that name. -FSTY 6f:142.

Tong Zhi 僮芝; Danyang. In 198, after the death of Liu Yao, Inspector of Yang province, in Yuzhang, various leaders divided up the territory. Tong Zhi occupied the southern part, in the marshlands and the upper reaches of the Gan River, and proclaimed himself Administrator of Luling.

After Sun Ce had taken over the major part of Yuzhang in 199, he left his cousins Sun Ben and Sun Fu to await an opportunity to move against Tong Zhi. Soon afterwards Tong Zhi was taken ill, and Sun Fu, aided by Zhou Yu, seized his territory. -SGZ Wu 4: 1190, 6:1210.

Toulouchu 兜樓儲 (d.147); Xiongnu. In the early 140s Toulouchu was a hostage prince at the Han court in Luoyang, and had been given the title King Who Maintains Loyalty 守義王. His exact connection to the royal house of the Southern Xiongnu is not known, but the succession had been interrupted after the suicide of the Shanyu Xiuli and his heir in 140. The chieftain Yiti may have been next in line, but he was compromised by his earlier involvement in rebellion, and the Chinese government preferred Toulouchu.

In the summer of 143, therefore, at a ceremony held in the presence of Emperor Shun, Toulouchu was proclaimed as the new ruler. He took the dynastic title of Hulanruo shizhujiu 呼蘭若尸逐就 Shanyu, received an official seal and other insignia, and was sent north a few months later, farewelled by another grand ceremony.

Toulouchu remained at his capital, Meiji in Xihe, under the guardianship of his Chinese supervisors, until his death four years later. It is doubtful, however, whether he or his successor Juche'er held any more than marginal authority over their nominal subjects. -HHS 89/79:2962-63; deC 84:313-315.

Touluhou 投鹿侯; Xianbi. Touluhou was the official father of Tanshihuai: after three years on campaign with the Xiongnu he returned to be presented with a new-born baby. His wife explained that she had conceived by mistakenly swallowing a hail-stone, but Touluhou was not convinced. He had the infant exposed, but Tanshihuai's mother arranged for her own family to care for the child. -HHS 90/80:2989, SGZ 30: 837; G/deC 77:16-24.

Tr'ung Sisters see sub Zheng Ce.

Tu Er 屠兒; Hongnong. According to Sanfu jiushi, ascribed to Wei Biao later in the first century and cited by Hui Dong in HHSJJ 1A:457, Tu Er took part in the final assault on Chang'an in 23 and aided Du Wu to kill Wang Mang. It seems more likely that the characters tu'er are not the name of a man, but describe the occupation of Du Wu as that of a butcher: see sub Du Wu, also Dubs 55:465 and Bn 54:132.

Tu Jingxian 屠景先, a man from Hedong at the end of Han, is mentioned in FSTY 6f:138.

Tu Yun 塗暉 was a Counsellor Remonstrant. -FSTY 6f:139.

Tuiyan 推演; Xianbi. A commander in the west under Tanshihuai in the 170s, this man may have been the ancestor Tuiyin 推寅 of the imperial Tuoba 拓跋 family of the Wei 魏 dynasties which ruled in north China from the late third century to the sixth. -SGZ 30: 838, Wei shu 1; G/deC 77:42.

Tumen Shao 屠門少; Jingzhao. In 23 Tumen Shao was the chieftain of a strong clan in Duling county. In the autumn the armies of the Gengshi Emperor of Han defeated the last field force of Wang Mang and sent advance parties under Wang Xian and Han Chen towards Chang'an. Tumen Shao and other local leaders took title as generals in the name of Han and came to attack the capital. As the main Han army was halted at Huayin, these irregular troops ravaged the city and killed Wang Mang. -Dubs 55:461, Bn 54:130.

Tumen Shao's local power no doubt suffered a few years later when the condottiere Yan Cen took control of Duling.

Tun 屯 see Tuntuhe 屯屠何.

Tun Moru 屯莫如 was Administrator of Changshan. -FSTY 5f:120.

Tunchuhe 屯屠何 see Tuntuhe 屯屠何.

Tuntuhe 屯屠何/河 or Tunchuhe (d.93); Xiongnu. Son of the former Southern Shanyu Shi and younger brother of the former Shanyu Chang, he succeeded his cousin Xuan in 88, taking the title Xiulan shizuhou di 休蘭尸逐侯鞬 Shanyu.

At this time, after the defeat and death of the Youliu Shanyu at the hands of the Xianbi in the previous year, the northern state was in complete disorder. The name and title of the new Northern Shanyu are unknown, but in 88 a dissident group of nobles set up his elder half-brother, the Worthy King of the Right, as a rival claimant.

In the autumn Tuntuhe reported this turmoil to the Han court and proposed a decisive campaign to take over the steppe. Emperor Zhang had died in the spring of 88, and the plan came before the Dowager Dou, regent for the young Emperor He. Embarrassed by the recent scandalous conduct of her brother Dou Xian, the Lady Dou was glad to give him occasion to gain credit, and though the expedition was opposed by Yuan An and other senior ministers, she insisted that it take place.

The army was prepared during the winter of 88 and Dou Xian was given command. In the summer of 89 four columns set out from the frontier to gather at Zhuoye Mountain, in the Gurvan Sayhan Uul range in the south of Outer Mongolia. While a detachment to the west defeated the Northern Shanyu at Jiluo Mountain and pursued him into the Altai ranges, the main army marched in triumph to the north, burned the sacred site of Longcheng, and erected a celebratory stele at Mount Yanren in the Hangayn Nuruu range. Southern Xiongnu horsemen played a substantial role both in the main expedition and in the detached force which defeated the Northern Shanyu.

The Northern ruler sued for peace, but Tuntuhe urged that his rival should be utterly destroyed, and in the spring of 90 the Emissary Geng Tan with eight thousand cavalry under the king Shizi attacked his refuge in the Altai Mountains. The Shanyu was wounded and barely escaped with his life, while the Chinese and their allies killed eight thousand of his followers, seized his seal and treasury, and took prisoner his consort the Yanshi 閼氏, five of his children, and several thousand of his subjects.

The Northern Shanyu still sought to obtain terms, but the southerners maintained their attacks, and Dou Xian advised that the northern ruler was so weak there was no point in treating with him. In 91 the colonel Geng Kui finally drove the Shanyu away to the west among the Wusun people of present-day Kazakhstan; he was not heard of again.

In the spring of 92, following the policy of Dou Xian, the imperial government sent Geng Kui with insignia to set the younger brother of the departed Shanyu, Yuchujian, in his place, to reside at Yiwu near present-day Hami, supervised and guarded by a new Emissary, Ren Shang. The arrangement was deliberately parallel to that of the southern court, and was a blow to the pretensions of Tuntuhe to reign over all the Xiongnu tribes.

The senior ministers Yuan An and Ren Wei argued against the move on the grounds that the Han had a long commitment to the Southern regime and that it was quite inappropriate, after the enormous expense of the campaign, for two tributary courts to be established. Both would require subsidy, and it would be far better to restore a single ruler and ensure he remained subject to China as in the days of the first Huhaxie Shanyu at the end of Former Han.

For the time being Dou Xian had his way, but Tuntuhe was bitterly hostile to the north, and the energetic prince Shizi was popular among the people of the south for his harassment and oppression of the northerners. In the autumn of 92 after the power of the Dou family was destroyed by the youthful Emperor He the position of the Northern Shanyu was once more brought into question.

In the autumn of 93 the Northern Shanyu Yuchujian "died while attempting to escape." Some children of his predecessor had been captured previously but are not referred to again, and an earlier candidate of Dou Xian, the prince Atong, was not acceptable. The line of inheritance of the northern state thus ended with Yuchujian, and the Shanyu Tuntuhe became the sole titular ruler of his people, both the original southerners and those of the north who had surrendered or been made captive.

There was naturally great tension between the two sides of the recent internecine conflict, for the triumphant Southerners were now obliged to share wealth and influence with the northern group, and those from the North, who had suffered attack for so long, had neither affection nor trust for their conquerors. Following the death of Tuntuhe in 93, and with the contested succession of Anguo and then Shizi, matters came to a head. -HHS 89/79:2952-54; deC 84:264-277.

Tuteruo shizhujiu Shanyu 屠特若尸逐就單于 of the Southern Xiongnu (reg. 172-177). Son of the Shanyu Juche'er, he succeeded his father. His personal name does not appear in the Chinese records, no doubt a sign of the weakness of his nominal state and the now marginal relevance of his position.

In 177 the Shanyu and the Emissary Zang Min led a contingent of horsemen to join the expedition led by Xia Yu and Tian Yan against the Xianbi ruler Tanshihuai. Their force was one of three columns, each said to have comprised ten thousand men.

The army was heavily defeated: it is claimed that the losses amounted to three-quarters of the troops engaged, and that the commanders fled with only a few score followers each. The Shanyu died a few months later, while the remnant authority of his state was now largely destroyed. -HHS 89/79:2964; deC 84:340-345.

W

Wa 洼 [surname] see Gui 洼 passim.

Wan Chi 萬熾 (d.126); Youfufeng. Son of Wan Feng and a great-great-grandson of Wan Xiu, he succeeded to the family fief. Wan Chi died without sons, and the fief was ended. -HHS 21/11:757.

Wan Feng 萬豐; Youfufeng. Wang Feng was a great-grandson of Wan Xiu, whose county fief had become extinct with the death of Wang Qin. In 113 the Dowager Deng enfeoffed Wan Feng as a village marquis. -HHS 21/11:757.

Wan Gong 萬恭; Youfufeng. Wan Gong was a great-great-grandson of Wan Xiu, whose family fief had twice become extinct for lack of heirs [see sub Wan Qin and Wang Chi]. In 159 Wang Gong was enfeoffed as a village marquis. -HHS 21/11:757.

Wan Liang 萬良; Zuopingyi. Officer of Merit under the magistrate Zhou Gong, Wan Liang killed a man to avenge his father, then went to the county prison in bonds. Zhou Gong set him free. -XC 1b-2a.

Wan Pu 萬普; Youfufeng. Son of Wan Xiu, he succeeded to his fief; the county was later transferred to Shangdang. -HHS 21/11:757.

Wan Qian 萬潛. In 192, after the Inspector of Yan province Liu Dai had been killed by Yellow Turbans, the Attendant Officer Wan Qian accompanied Bao Xin when he went to invite Cao Cao to take over the province.

As a senior clerical officer in 213, Wan Qian was one of those who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei.

After Cao Pi came to the throne in 220, Wan Qian and other officers were granted the right to have one of their sons appointed as a gentleman cadet. -SGZ 1:9 & 40, 2:59.

Wan Qin 萬親; Youfufeng. Son of Wan Pu, he succeeded to the family marquisate, which was later transferred to a county in Xindu. Wan Qin died without sons, and the fief was ended. -HHS 21/11:757.

Wan Xiu 萬脩/修 [Junyou 君游] (d.26); Youfufeng. In 23 Wan Xiu was appointed magistrate of Xindu county by the new government of the Gengshi Emperor. That winter, as Wang Lang took the imperial title, the greater part of the north accepted his claim, but Ren Guang the Administrator of Xindu remained loyal to Han, and Wan Xiu joined him in raising troops and welcoming Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, who was at that time a commissioner of the Gengshi regime. Wan Xiu was named a lieutenant-general and enfeoffed as a marquis of title, and after the destruction of Wang Lang in the summer of 24 he became General on the Right.

Wan Xiu took part in the capture of Luoyang and in the campaigns by which Liu Xiu conquered the north, and in 26 he was awarded a county fief in his home commandery. That year he was sent to attack the rebels Deng Feng and Dong Xin in Nanyang, but was taken ill and died. Recognising Wan Xiu as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 21/11:757*, 22/12:789-91; Bn 76:26, 79, 83-84.

Wan Yusheng 萬虞生; Kuaiji. Nominated by the Administrator Zhang Ba during the 90s, Wan Yusheng reached high office. -HYGZ 10A:133.

Wang 王, the Lady I. Wife and then widow of Song Yang, she became the mother of the imperial concubines Song and thus grandmother of Liu Qing. By 100 she was old and ill, and Liu Qing asked his half-brother Emperor He to allow her to come to the capital for treatment. The emperor agreed, and this became a catalyst for a limited rehabilitation of the Song family. -HHS 55/45:1801.

Wang 王, the Lady II; Yuyang. Sister of Wang Ping, she married He Fu and became the mother of He Ce. -HHS 18/8:689.

Wang 王, the Lady III (d.181); Zhao. Granddaughter of the General of the Household Wang Bao, and son of Wang Zhang, of whom nothing more is known, the Lady entered the harem of Emperor Ling as a woman of respectable family 良家. Good-looking and intelligent, she became a Beauty [second-rank concubine] and in the summer of 180 she became pregnant. It is said that she was frightened of the Empress He, and took drugs to abort the child, but the medicine failed, while she also reported dreams that she was carrying the sun.

In the spring of 181, on 2 April, the Lady Wang gave birth to a son, Liu Xie, future Emperor Xian. Seven days later she was poisoned by the Empress He. Emperor Ling composed a mourning hymn for her, and Zhuide fu 追德賦 "Rhapsody of Virtue Remembered."

After Emperor Xian had taken the Cap of Manhood in 194 he was urged to choose an empress, but he would not do so until his mother had been properly buried. This was done: she received posthumous imperial honours and a special mission was sent to arrange her burial in the tomb complex of Emperor Ling, alongside her killer the Empress He. -HHS 10B: 449-52, XHS 1:19a.

Wang 王, the Lady IV. Concubine "Brilliant Companion" 昭儀 of Cao Cao, the Lady had influence with him, and in 217 she supported the appointment of Cao Pi as Heir.

It appears the Lady had no children of her own, but when his concubine the Lady Chen died, Cao Cao had the Lady Wang act as foster-mother to her son Cao Gan/Lang, then aged three sui. Two years later, at a time Cao Cao was extremely ill, the Lady arranged that he commend the boy to Cao Pi, who undertook a special relationship with him. -SGZ 20:575, 585-86.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] I; Chenliu. He married the foster-daughter of Yu Yan. -XC 1:11a.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] II; Youfufeng. A magistrate in Jianwei, he had repair work carried out on the local roads. A commemorative stele was set up in 96. -LX 11:8a-9a.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] III; Shang. Administrator, probably of Yuyang, he nominated Xianyu Huang as Filial and Incorrupt. -Nagata 94: 156.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] IV. A magistrate of Guanghan in the commandery of that name, in 148 a stele was set up to commemorate the repair work he had carried out on the roads. -LS 4:8a-b.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] V. LS 13:7b records a fragment of a stele from the Spirit Road 神道 of this man's tomb. He had been a magistrate of Mianzhu in Guanghan.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown; style Gong? 公?] VI; Nanyang. Described as a private gentleman 處士, in 156 he was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:17a.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] VII. In 159 he was Chancellor of Chen, praised for his benevolence. -LS 20:12a-b.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] VIII; Zuopingyi. He served as a magistrate in Pei, and when he was transferred to Guanghan Dependent State the officials and people set up a stele in honour of his good government. -SJZ 24:7b-8a.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] IX; Shanyang. Son of Wang Qian, about 189 the General-in-Chief He Jin sought to marry his daughter to this young man or to his brother Wang Can. Wang Qian, however, refused the alliance. -SGZ 21:597.

Wang 王 [personal name unknown] X. Formerly a magistrate in Beihai, he died in the early 220s at the age of forty-one. A commemorative stele was set up at his funerary temple. -LX 11:12a-14b.

Wang Ba 王霸 [Ruzhong 儒仲 or 孺仲]; Taiyuan. A man of high moral quality, when Wang Mang took the throne in 9 AD Wang Ba abandoned public life and went to live as a recluse.

Some time during the 30s Wang Ba was invited to the court of Emperor Guangwu and came to Luoyang. When he gave his name to the Imperial Secretariat, however, he did not refer to himself by the usual term as "subject" 臣. Questioned on this, he demanded privilege as a Confucianist and quoted the Ritual to say that "The Son of Heaven has those who are not his subjects, and feudal lords have those who are not their friends" [cf. the present-day Li ji 禮記 41:10]. Not only was he not punished for such temerity, but the Excellency over the Masses Hou Ba asked to resign in his favour. Hou Ba's protégé Yan Yang, however, remarked that men from Taiyuan tended to form factions, so the matter went no further.

Wang Ba left Luoyang on grounds of illness and returned to his simple life as a hermit farmer. He received many more invitations to court, but would never accept. There was one sad occasion when an old friend Linghu Zibo, now a high official, sent his son, also an official, to bring a letter. Wang Ba's own son was so dazzled by the distinguished visitor that he could not raise his eyes to look him in the face. Wang Ba was ashamed that his simple life had caused his son to be simple too, but his wife reassured him and confirmed him in his principles.

Wang Ba died of old age at home. -HHS 83/73:2762-63*, XTS 72B:2632; Vervoorn 90:146, 193-194.

Wang Ba 王霸, wife of: the Lady's family name is not known, but her biography appears in Fan Ye's Chapter on Worthy Women 列女傳. -HHS 84/74:2782-83*.

Wang Ba 王霸 [Yuanbo 元伯] (d.59); Yingchuan. Wang Ba's family had a tradition of involvement with the law and was evidently rising gradually in the world: his grandfather had been Assistant at a prison and his father became judicial officer in the commandery. When Wang Ba was young he too became a clerk at court, but he did not enjoy office work and had wider ideals. His father admired his ambition and sent him to study for a time at Chang'an.

After the Han rebellion broke out against Wang Mang Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, came to Yingchuan in the spring of 23. Wang Ba brought clients and retainers to join him and was accepted as a Companion. In the summer he took part in the victory at Kunyang, but then returned to his home country. When Liu Xiu was named Director of Retainers by the Gengshi Emperor in the autumn of 23, he passed through Yingchuan on his way to Luoyang, and Wang Ba obtained his father's permission to join him once more. He accompanied Liu Xiu to Luoyang, and when Liu Xiu was named Grand Marshal he appointed Wang Ba to his office for personnel.

When Liu Xiu went as commissioner to the north of the Yellow River, Wang Ba accompanied him, but only a few dozen of his family retainers were willing to still follow him, and one after another they withdrew and went home. Liu Xiu nonetheless appreciated his loyalty all the more.

When Wang Lang claimed the imperial title in the winter of 23/24, Liu Xiu was at Ji city in Guangyang. He sent Wang Ba to call for troops in the market-place, but there was strong local support for the usurper and Wang Ba was forced to withdraw.

As Liu Xiu abandoned Ji and moved south, the supporters of Wang Lang followed in close pursuit and his men were frightened. When scouts reported that the Hutuo River had not yet formed its winter ice and could not be crossed, Liu Xiu sent Wang Ba to make a second assessment. The river was indeed impassable, but Wang Ba gave false assurance that it would bear, and the men went forward encouraged. Just as they arrived the ice was strong enough to cross, and it broke up as the last of the cavalry went over. So Liu Xiu's men were safe from pursuit. He praised Wang Ba's judgement, but Wang Ba replied that it was the will of Heaven, and the good omen cheered the troops.

Liu Xiu enfeoffed Wang Ba as a secondary marquis and appointed him Director of the Army, responsible for discipline. In the summer, as the Han troops captured Wang Lang's capital of Handan, Wang Ba and his men chased and killed the usurper and took his seal and insignia. Wang Ba was again rewarded with a district marquise, apparently in his own homeland.

He then took part in the campaigns to conquer the north of the plain, and regularly shared camp with Zang Gong and Fu Jun. Unlike others, Wang Ba took special care of his men: when one of them died, he was prepared to use his own clothes to dress the corpse for burial, and he went himself to attend the wounded. When Liu Xiu took the imperial title in 25 he recognised Wang Ba's care for his men and appointed him a lieutenant-general with command over Zang Gong and Fu Jun's troops; the latter two were named Commandants of Cavalry.

Wang Ba took part in the siege and capture of Luoyang, in 26 he accompanied the Grand Marshal Wu Han against bandits in Wei commandery, and later that year he followed He Yan to attack the pretender Liu Yong. In the autumn of 28, as Guangwu came to Pei commandery to supervise the campaign in the east, he sent Wang Ba with the general Ma Wu to besiege Liu Yu and his supporter Zhou Jian at Chuihui.

Early in 29 Su Mao came to the relief of the defenders. He gained an initial success, capturing Ma Wu's baggage, and Zhou Jian then led a sortie which put Ma Wu's troops to flight. Wang Ba, however, held his men back until the enemy had committed themselves to pursuit, then sent out a group of volunteers from the rear gate of his camp. These men attacked the enemy from behind and reversed the course of the battle. On the following day Su Mao and Zhou Jian challenged him to battle, but Wang Ba kept his men in camp to rest and feast, refusing to be provoked even when his cup of wine was hit by an arrow. As Su Mao and Zhou Jian were compelled to retreat for lack of supplies, Zhou Jian's nephew Zhou Song changed sides and closed the gates against them. Liu Yong's party was scattered, and a Palace Counsellor was sent to appoint Wang Ba as a general.

In 30 Wang Ba was in Hongnong, where he set up military colonies to guard the Hangu Pass west of Luoyang, and in the summer he accompanied Li Tong to attack Yan Cen in Hanzhong. In 32 he settled bandits in the east of Henan to the south of the Yellow River.

In the summer of 33 Wang Ba was sent under the Grand Marshal Wu Han, with three other generals and fifty thousand men, to attack Lu Fang's officers Jia Lan and Min Kan in Dai commandery. They were defeated, however, and forced to withdraw. Wu Han returned to Luoyang, leaving garrisons along the frontier, and Wang Ba was named Administrator of Shanggu, still with his title as a general, which gave him authority to operate outside the territory of his commandery.

At the end of the year Wang Ba joined an assault under Du Mao against Yanmen, which was defeated by Lu Fang's officer Yin You, and at the beginning of 34, as Wu Han launched another attack, Wang Ba and Chen Xin the Administrator of Yuyang were in the vanguard. Wang Ba was successful against a troop of Xiongnu cavalry, killing several hundred and driving them back across the frontier, but the offensive as a whole gained no ground. In 36, however, Lu Fang's position in China collapsed and he fled to the Xiongnu. In 37 Wang Ba's fief was increased in value and raised to county level.

The frontier was nonetheless still threatened by Lu Fang and his Xiongnu allies, and Wang Ba was ordered to take six thousand convict labourers to work with the general Du Mao on a system of fortifications, including the strategic Flying Fox Road from Shanggu through Dai commandery to the south, linking with a long wall across the border of Yanmen and Dai. Gold, silk and brocade were sent to pay the army and as presents for the people on the border.

In fact, the northern border commanderies were now largely lost to Han, and many people moved south to escape the raids of the Xiongnu and Wuhuan. In 39 imperial orders were given for officials and civilians to be evacuated from Yanmen, Dai and Shanggu, so Wang Ba held only a fraction of his nominal territory, and his position was rather that of a garrison commander than the civil head of a commandery.

The situation, however, changed dramatically as a succession struggle broke out among the Xiongnu after the death of the Shanyu Yu in 46. The non-Chinese state was divided between contenders, and by 50 the Southern Shanyu Bi was an effective puppet of China. In these circumstances another edict announced the restoration of the northern commanderies, and the frontier was now close to the old lines of Former Han. On the other hand, those lines on the map concealed a serious loss of the Chinese population which was needed to maintain the borders, and the empire in the north was never as strong as before.

Wang Ba was in Shanggu for over twenty years through all the changes, fighting constantly against the Xiongnu and the Wuhuan. Recognised as an expert on affairs of the north, he made several proposals for peace, and also urged the construction of canals to aid the transport of supplies northwest from Guangling and the region of present-day Beijing. Though the north was largely settled, there was a series of raids by the Wuhuan from 54, which ended only in 58, after the Xianbi had been enlisted as allies.

Wang Ba was awarded a final marquisate in Linhuai/Xiapi in 54, but he remained in the north until 59, when he retired on account of illness and died a few months later. Recognising him as one of the great assistants of the founding emperor, Emperor Ming had Wang Ba's portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 20/10:734-37*; Bn 67:107-131, Bn 76:26, 79, 83, deC 84:377-387.

Wang Bao 王苞; Zhao. Sometime a General of the Household, he was grandfather of the Lady/Beauty Wang, mother of Emperor Xian. -HHS 10B:450.

According to XHS 1:19a, the Beauty Wang was a daughter of a certain Wang Zhang, presumably Wang Bao's son, but nothing more is known of him.

Wang Bao 王豹; Donglai. Wang Bao died about 192, comparatively young, and was buried at Luoyang. His son Wang Ji became a high official of Wei, and when his mother, widow of Wang Bao, died in 248, Wang Bao was awarded posthumous title as Administrator of Beihai. -SGZ 27:755.

Wang Bao 王豹, wife of (d.258); Donglai. Mother of Wang Ji, who was born in 190, the Lady was widowed early but died at a good age. She was buried with her husband at Luoyang. -SGZ 27:755.

Wang Bi 王畢 [Shibi 世鼻]; Youfufeng. A senior man and an officer of his native county, Wang Bi was consulted by the magistrate Cao Quan, and in 185 he contributed a thousand cash to a stele in his honour. -JSCB 18:2b-4a; Ebrey 80:342-343.

Wang Bi 王必 (d.218). Assistant Officer to Cao Cao as Governor of Yan province, in 192 Wang Bi was sent as an emissary to obtain recognition from the imperial court at Chang'an controlled by Li Jue and Guo Si.

In 198 Wang Bi was Registrar to Cao Cao. When Lü Bu was captured he urged that he be killed.

In 217 Wang Bi was Chief Clerk to Cao Cao as Imperial Chancellor of Han, holding charge on his behalf over the court at Xu city. Early in 218 Jin Yi, Geng Ji, Ji Ben and others attempted to take over the city and invite Guan Yu in from the south, and Ji Ben's son Miao attacked Wang Bi's camp. Wang Bi was wounded, but he made his escape with the help of one of his staff officers. Next morning he obtained reinforcements from Yan Kuang and led loyal troops to destroy the rebels. He died of his wounds a few days later. -SGZ 13:392, 7:228, 1:50; deC 89:518-519.

Wang Bi 王祕; Wuwei. In 219 Wang Bi killed the rival warlord He Luan of Zhangye. -SGZ 15:474.

Wang Bi 王毖; Changsha. During the last years of Han Wang Bi took service in the north, probably attached to the puppet court of Han. In 220 he joined the process which brought the abdication of Han in favour of Wei. -SGZ 2:63, JS 20:635; Goodman 98:98.

Wang Bi 王弼 (226-249); Shanyang. Son of Wang Ye, Wang Bi was a notable but eccentric philosopher, central figure in the School of the Mysteries [玄學 Xuan xue] during the Wei period. He must be distinguished from the three men immediately above; e.g. Demiéville 86:829.

Wang Biao 王彪 (d.109). Administrator of Shuofang in 100, Wang Biao was transferred to be Acting General on the Liao. In 109, just as the Southern Shanyu Tan began a rebellion, Wang Biao died. -HHS 89/79:2957.

Wang Bin 王斌 [Wen'gao 文高]; Chen. Originally, Wang Bin was a slave named Diyu 地餘, owned by Gongsun Zhijie. Intelligent and literate, at the age of seventeen he ran away to Danyang, changed his name to Wang Bin, and later became a clerk in the commandery.

Then Gongsun Zhijie came as Inspector of the province, and Wang Bin was chosen to attend him. When he saw his former master, he kowtowed and confessed everything. Gongsun Zhijie took no action against him, and Wang Bin later became Administrator of Zangke. -FSTY 3f:105.

Wang Bin 王斌; Zhao. Elder brother of the Beauty Wang, mother of Emperor Xian, about 190 he was invited by the emperor with his family to Chang'an, was granted house and lands and made Commandant of the Equipage.

In 194 Wang Bin accompanied the cortège for the reburial of his sister by the tomb of Emperor Ling, and on his return he was enfeoffed and appointed Bearer of the Mace. He died soon afterwards, and was granted posthumous appointment as General of the Van and special funerary honours. -HHS 10B:451-52.

Wang Bo 王博 [Jixi 季習]; Guanghan. HYGZ 12:224 says that Wang Bo, eldest son of Wang Tang, was a noted scholar, but does not mention his style nor indicate any offices he may have held.

Wang Bo 王博, wife of: see the Lady Yang Jin 楊進.

Wang Bo 王博 [Jixi 季習]. XC 6:11b contains an extract from a biography of Wang Bo, whose style was Jixi, but whose place of origin is not recorded. It describes him as a conscientious officer of the Imperial Secretariat, with particular knowledge of tradition and precedent. It seems likely that this relates to Wang Bo of Guanghan; though it should be noted that the man Bo, possibly of the Wang surname, in the entry immediately below, had a similar style and certainly belonged to the Secretariat.

[Wang?] Bo 王博 [Jizhi 季智]; Hedong? This man is described in a stele unearthed in Henan in 1923. His surname is not given, but Bo is described as a younger son of an Excellency of Works. In particular, we are told in the stele, as below, that he came from the capital province of Sili, that his father died in office 薨, and that he joined the offices 府 of the General-in-Chief. The Excellency of Works Wang Zhuo from Hedong died in that post in 137, while Liang Shang and then Liang Ji were Generals-in-Chief from 135 to 141 and from 141 to 159. No other combination appears to fit those criteria, so Bo was most likely the son of Wang Zhuo.

The inscription describes Wang Bo as a worthy man with both public and private virtues, a scholar of the Changes, the Poetry and the History. He served as a local officer in his commandery, and also in the provincial offices of the Director of Retainers. After the death of his father he was granted position as a gentleman cadet and was also nominated Filial and Incorrupt, but he turned down both offers on grounds of ill health, and when he was later invited to join the offices of the Excellency of Works he left to mourn the death of his mother. In the early 140s he was nominated Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright by both the Director of Retainers and the Excellency of Works; he did then hold some appointments, but later resigned once more.

Returning to public life through the office of the General-in-Chief, Wang Bo became Inspector of Yan province and later joined the Imperial Secretariat, rising to become Director. He served with distinction as Administrator of Julu and was later Chancellor of Ganling. It appears that was the last position he held: the stele inscription goes no further, and its title describes him as Chancellor; it is not known whether he resigned or died in office. -Nagata 94:280.

Wang [Bochun] 王伯春 or Wang [Boqi] 王伯齊 see sub Diwu Lun 第五倫.

Wang [Boqi] 王伯齊 or Wang [Bochun] 王伯春 see sub Diwu Lun 第五倫.

Wang [Borong] 王伯榮 see Wang Yong 王永.

Wang [Bosan] 王伯三; Runan. Son of Wang Zifang, Wang Bosan was the elder brother of Wang Shufan q.v. -FSTY 3f:105-06.

Wang Bu 王誦 see Wang Pu 王誦.

Wang Can 王粲 [Zhongxuan 仲宣] (177-217); Shanyang. Son of Wang Qian and one of the great literary figures of Han, Wang Can was with his father at Luoyang in 189 and went with the court to Chang'an in 190. He was a favourite student of Cai Yong, who bequeathed him his vast library [see also sub the Lady Cai Yan].

In 193, at the age of only seventeen, Wang Can was invited to office, but after the fall of Dong Zhuo and the death of Cai Yong later that year, he fled to Jing province. In contrast to the recognition he had received at Chang'an, however, his unprepossessing appearance and unconventional conduct meant that Liu Biao paid him small regard. Liu Biao had thought to give him his daughter in marriage, but was put off by Wang Can's appearance and conduct, and married the young woman instead to Wang Can's cousin Wang Kai. During these years of exile Wang Can composed two works now celebrated: Qi'ai shi 七哀詩 "Poem of Seven Sorrows" on his departure from Chang'an; and Denglou fu 登樓賦 "Rhapsody on Climbing the Tower," about his wasted exile in the south [Knechtges 87:236-241].

After Liu Biao's death in 208, Wang Can urged his son and successor Liu Zong to surrender to Cao Cao. He joined Cao Cao's staff and was enfeoffed as a secondary marquis, and in 213 he was among the petitioners who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. He was made a Palace Attendant of the new state, with commission to reform the administration, but as he accompanied Cao Cao on campaign against Wu in 217 he became ill and died.

Wang Can left sixty pian of literary work, notably poems and rhapsodies, but also essays and official documents, and he compiled the contemporary history [Hanmo] yingxiong ji 漢末英雄記 "Records of the Heroes and Champions at the End of Han." In his Lun wen 論文 "Essay on Literature," Cao Pi honoured Wang Can as one of the Seven Masters of the Jian'an period.

In 219 Wang Can's two sons were executed for involvement in the conspiracy of Wei Feng, and he had no other direct heirs. The library which he had received from Cai Yong, and added to himself, went to his kinsman Wang Ye. -SGZ 21:597-99*, HHS 56/46:1826; Mather 76:595-596, Miao 82, Knechtges 87:362-364, MBeck 90:46.

Wang Cao 王曹 see Wang Chang 王昌 (*fl.*195).

Wang Cen 王岑 (d.23); Guanghan. As the empire fell into disorder after the destruction of Wang Mang, the self-styled general Zong Cheng came from Nanyang to raid Hanzhong commandery. The effect of his incursions extended south into Guanghan, and the local bandit Wang Cen attacked Luo city, headquarters of the province. He killed Song Zun, the Governor appointed by Wang Mang, and Wang Cen then took title also as a general and declared his support for Zong Cheng.

Gongsun Shu, Administrator of Shu, invited Zong Cheng to Chengdu. Wang Cen went to join him, but as Zong Cheng paid chief attention to plunder, Gongsun Shu had him killed. As there is no further mention of Wang Cen, he probably shared his colleague's fate. - HHS 13/3:533; Bn 59:30.

Wang Cen 王岑; Zhuo. When Zhu Fu was appointed Governor of You province for Emperor Guangwu in 24, he obtained support from the local gentry by appointing leading members to his staff. Wang Cen was one of these, and he later became Governor of Liang province. -HHS 33/23:1137-38.

Wang Chang 王昌 see Wang Lang 王郎.

Wang Chang 王常 [Yanqing 顏卿] (d.36); Yingchuan. Wang Chang's family came to Yingchuan from Youfufeng only at the end of Former Han, but they were numbered among the local gentry. About 20 Wang Chang killed a man to avenge the death of his brother. He fled south into Jiangxia, joined the bandits led by Wang Feng and Wang Kuang, and became a secondary leader.

In 22, as the group divided under the impact of sickness and privation, Wang Chang joined Cheng Dan and Zhang Ang to lead a separate party west into Nan commandery. They were known as the Troops from the Lower Yangzi. The name may reflect only that they came from the region of Jiangxia, downstream from Nan commandery, but it may also indicate the presence of a number of refugees who had come to the lands of the middle Yangzi after disastrous flooding of the Yellow River over more than ten years: those driven south from the plain would have migrated gradually south across the Huai and then along the Yangzi upstream to the south of the Dabie Shan. See Bn 54:152 and sub Wang Kuang and Fan Chong.

Wang Mang's government sent Zhuang You and Chen Mao with an army into Nan commandery, and Wang Chang and his fellows were defeated. Regrouping, they resumed their career of plunder and recovered sufficient strength to defeat the levies of Jing province. They then moved north into Nanyang.

At this time, the gentry rebel Liu Bosheng and his bandit allies, including Wang Kuang and Wang Feng, had just been defeated by Wang Mang's local officers Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci in battle at Xiao-Chang'an. Collecting his scattered forces at his base in Jiyang county, Liu Bosheng also went in person to recruit the Troops from the Lower Yangzi. Wang Chang agreed to join the rebellion, then persuaded his fellows and followers to accept the alliance. With these reinforcements, Liu Bosheng destroyed the army of Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci, and followed this with a successful attack on Zhuang You and Chen Mao, who had also come north into Nanyang.

In the spring of 23, as the rebel army laid siege to Wan city, capital of Nanyang commandery, the commoner leaders of the bandit Troops held a caucus meeting and chose Liu Xuan, the Gengshi Emperor, to be the imperial candidate against Wang Mang. Liu Bosheng, hitherto leader of the movement, was deliberately passed over; when he sought to argue the case Wang Chang was his only supporter, while Wang Chang's old colleague in the leadership of the Troops from the Lower Yangzi, Zhang Ang, was a vociferous opponent of Liu Bosheng.

Wang Chang was named Minister of Justice and a chief general under the new regime, and he took joint command of the army sent into Yingchuan, Runan and Pei. In July he and his fellow-commander Wang Feng held the city of Kunyang in Yingchuan while Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, led troops from outside. On 7 July they gained a decisive victory.

It does not appear that Wang Chang suffered for his earlier opposition to the Gengshi Emperor, and he was evidently too influential to be ignored. Though Liu Bosheng was executed soon after the fall of Wan in 23, Wang Chang received a marquisate, and he was given charge of affairs in Nanyang as the main force of rebels went to attack Wang Mang's capital.

In the enfeoffments granted after the Gengshi Emperor established his court at Chang'an in 24, Wang Chang was named as a king, with an appanage of eight counties. He was also granted the privilege of the Liu surname, but HHS always refers to him by his original surname; it is unlikely that he made use of the honour after the fall of the Gengshi Emperor who granted it.

In the summer of 26, after the destruction of the Gengshi Emperor, Wang Chang came with his wife and children to Liu Xiu, Emperor Guangwu, at Luoyang. Baring his back, he presented himself as a supplicant, but he was warmly welcomed and rewarded by the emperor, recognised as an old comrade-in-arms, enfeoffed as a county marquis in Pei, and granted formal control of the Imperial Secretariat. At another meeting of the court, Guangwu spoke of how Wang Chang had brought the Troops from the Lower Yangzi to join the forces of Han, and gave him title as General Loyal to Han.

Wang Chang was sent to Nanyang against the rebels Dong Xin and Deng Feng, and was later ordered north to deal with some local groups in Hejian and Yuyang. In 28 he joined Wu Han in Pingyuan, and the following year he accompanied Guangwu's campaign to the east. He led the troops which took Huling city in Shanyang by storm in autumn, then joined the emperor for operations against Su Mao and Pang Meng. Under a hail of arrows, he led repeated assaults against the city gate of Xiapi and drove back the defenders.

Guangwu, watching from higher ground, sent one of his personal attendants with orders to withdraw, but the city surrendered soon afterwards. Wang Chang then went with Wang Ba to put down the rebel Mao Xu in Pei.

As Wang Chang returned to Luoyang in the spring of 30, messengers from the emperor were sent to greet him in Yingchuan and escort him to carry out worship at his family tombs. He was sent west to camp at Chang'an against Wei Ao, and in 31 he was made a chief general. Later that year he defeated Wei Ao's general Gao Jun in Anding, intercepted other detachments, then went outside the frontier to settle some groups of the Qiang.

In the autumn of 32 Wang Chang was sent with the Excellency Li Tong and the Palace Counsellor Geng Chun to deal with a rebellion in Dong commandery and Jiyin. In the following year he attacked and destroyed a group of bandits in Wei. Wang Chang then went north into Zhuo to face Lu Fang and his Xiongnu allies, and in the summer of 33 he was sent with three other generals and fifty thousand men under Wu Han and Wang Ba to attack Lu Fang's officers Jia Lan and Min Kan in Dai commandery. Defeated in a rain-storm, they were forced to withdraw, and Wang Chang was left in garrison to defend Changshan. He died in the north three years later.

Recognising Wang Chang as a chief assistant of the founding emperor, Guangwu's son and successor Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 15/5:578-82*, 11/1:467-68, 20/10:737, 22/12:789-91; Bn 54:55-56, 74-80, 110, Bn 59:18-21, 220, Bn 67:107-108, Bn 76:26, Bn 79:79.

Wang Chang 王長 sometimes miswritten as Zhu Chang 主長; Hongnong. A local leader in 26 who had taken title as a general, he surrendered to Emperor Guangwu's officer Feng Yi. -DGHJ 9:3b.

Wang Chang 王萇 [Bo? 伯?]; Nanyang. Described as a former officer at commandery headquarters, Wang Chang was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu in 156. -LS 17:17a.

Wang Chang 王暢/暢 [Shumao 叔茂] (d.169); Shanyang. Son of Wang Gong, as a young man Wang Chang was noted for the manner in which he kept to his own standards, refusing contact with any political faction. Nominated as Filial and Incorrupt, he pleaded ill health and did not go, but about 140 the General-in-

Chief Liang Shang gave him special recommendation as Abundant Talent. He then held a series of posts at the capital and rose to be Director of the Imperial Secretariat; his career was no doubt aided by contacts of his father, who had been Grand Commandant in the late 130s.

Later, Wang Chang was successively Chancellor of Qi, Director of Retainers, and Administrator of Yuyang. In each post he gained a reputation for strict, clear government, and for reform of his staff, and in the late 150s he became Administrator of Nanyang.

Home country of the Liu imperial house, Nanyang was dominated by imperial relatives and families which took pride in displaying their wealth and power. Wang Chang, ostentatiously simple and frugal, was determined to bring them under control and to change the prevailing culture. He ruled very firmly, sometimes destroying the houses, trees and wells of those who had committed an offence, and the great families were terrified. His Officer of Merit Zhang Chang wrote to protest, arguing that his policy was counter-productive and a territory of such grand tradition deserved more respect. Others presented similar arguments, and Wang Chang was impressed. His regime became more tolerant, and we are told it was accepted and successful.

Returning to the capital, Wang Chang became Palace Assistant Imperial Clerk, head of the Censorate. About 163 various powerful families objected to the policy of Chen Fan and Huang Wan, who insisted that only men of good quality in the corps of Gentlemen should receive ministerial recommendation as Abundant Talent. Diao Wei and his superior Wang Chang approved the change and took no action, but they were then accused of faction: Chen Fan was dismissed, Huang Wan and Diao Wei were proscribed from office, and Wang Chang was demoted to be a Consultant.

Chen Fan soon returned to office, and in 165 he became Grand Commandant. Under the personal government of Emperor Huan the Imperial Secretariat gained great influence, and the emperor asked the Excellencies for suitable officers to staff it. Chen Fan recommended Wang Chang, and he was appointed.

As an associate of Guo Tai, Wang Chang was praised by reformers and students at the capital as an "ideal for the empire" 天下俊秀, and he appeared as a "hero" [俊 jun], second category in the major list of worthy men which was circulated at that time. Early in 168, following the death of Emperor Huan, Wang Chang returned to the capital as Commandant of the Guards at the Changle Palace, residence of the new Dowager Dou, and in the summer of that year he was promoted to be Excellency of Works in the reformist government dominated by Dou Wu and Chen Fan. He shared their intention to eliminate the eunuchs, but in the autumn a few months later he left office on account of heavy rain and flooding. He was therefore not involved in the purge which followed the fall of Dou Wu and Chen Fan soon afterwards.

Following the eunuchs' coup, by the beginning of 169 there was widespread pressure for Wang Chang to be brought back into the government, but he died about this time. -HHS 56/46:1823-26*, 61/51:2040, 67/57:2186-87, SGZ 6:211, XC 3:7ab; deC 89:110, 435.

Wang Chang 王萇 [Changde 長德]; Hongnong. In 165 Wang Chang was a senior clerical officer in Huayin county. He assisted the magistrate Zhu Jie, who had been ordered by the Administrator Sun Qiu to complete work on the temple at Mount Hua commenced by Sun Qiu's predecessor Yuan Feng. -LS 2:3a.

Wang Chang 王敞 [Yuanfang 元方]; Youfufeng. A senior man and an officer in his native county, Wang Chang was consulted by the magistrate Cao Quan, and in 185 he contributed a thousand cash to a stele in his honour. -JSCB 18:2b-4a; Ebrey 80:342-343.

Wang Chang 王昌. Palace guards at Chang'an in 195, under Li Jue's instructions Wang Chang and three hundred others escorted Emperor Xian to Li Jue's camp.

Soon afterwards the emperor sent Huangfu Li away, to avoid Li Jue. Wang Chang was sent after him, but was unwilling to see such a loyal man killed. He claimed he had been unable to catch him, and Huangfu Li was able to make his escape. -HHS 71/61:2306, SGZ 6:185; deC 89:154.

Wang Chang 王昶 [Wenshu 文舒] (d.259); Taiyuan. Son of Wang Ze, when Wang Chang was a young man he was a close friend of Wang Ling, though they were not closely related. Wang Chang entered the household of Cao Pi when he was Heir, and when Cao Pi took the imperial throne Wang Chang was appointed a Cavalier Attendant.

Having served as Inspector of Yan, Wang Chang was recommended by Sima Yi to Cao Rui, and became a leading general against Wu. In later years he was enfeoffed and made an Excellency.

806 Wang Chang

A man of strong Confucian principles, Wang Chang presented a letter on moral conduct to his sons and nephews, and he compiled treatises on government and military matters. -SGZ 27:743-50*; Fang 52:508-509.

Wang Chang 王常 see Wang Tang 王堂.

Wang Chen 王謹; Jingzhao. XTS 72B:2651 says that Wang Chen was the son of Wang Kang; he presumably inherited the family fief.

Wang Chen 王晨; Taiyuan. Described as the son of an elder brother of Wang Yun, Wang Chen was probably a son of Wang Hong 王宏 I [Changwen 長文].

When Chang'an was stormed in 192 by Li Jue and other officers of the assassinated Dong Zhuo, Wang Yun and many of his family were killed, but Wang Chen and his younger brother Wang Ling managed to escape and went back to their home country. -HHS 66/56:2177, SGZ 28:757.

Wang Cheng 王成; Shanyang. A gentleman recluse in the mid-20s, Wang Cheng refused invitations to office from the restored regime of Han. The Academician Fan Sheng accused him, Zhou Dang and others of insolence and ingratitude, but Emperor Guangwu approved their stance and even rewarded them. -HHS 83/73:2762.

Wang Cheng 王成. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Wang Cheng took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. He was rewarded with a county marquisate in Julu.

After Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang in 127, he and Wang Cheng and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in 128 the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital. Wang Cheng died a few years later. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Wang Cheng 王成; Hanzhong. A client of Li Gu, in 147 Wang Cheng was entrusted with the care of Li Gu's youngest son Li Xie, to preserve him from the wrath of Liang Ji. He took the boy with him to the east, where Li Xie served in a wine-shop and Wang Cheng told fortunes in the market-place. About 160, after the fall of Liang Ji, they were able to return. When Wang Cheng died, Li Xie mourned him each season, as for a most respected guest. -HHS 63/53:2090, HYZ 10B:167, 172.

Wang Cheng 王承. In 192 Ma Teng's troops in Liang province were short of food and Ma Teng brought them close to Chang'an. The local commander Wang Cheng feared Ma Teng was planning against him. He attacked Ma Teng by surprise, defeated him and drove him away. -SGZ Shu 6:945.

Wang Cheng 王盛 see Wang Sheng 王盛.

Wang Chong 王充 [Zhongren 仲任] (27-c.100); Kuaiji. Son of Wang Song, Wang Chong was admired locally for his filial piety. Encouraged to study by his parents, he attended the Imperial University in Luoyang and studied under Ban Biao. His family was not distinguished and he was too poor to buy texts, so he was obliged to read in book-shops, and he resented the general admiration for men of good background who held official rank even when they had no scholarly ability. Though widely learned, he had small interest in the vast and detailed commentaries which were common at that time, but when he observed an imperial visit to the Hall of the Circular Moat he was inspired to compose Daru lun 大儒論 "An Essay on Great Confucianism."

Returning to his home country, Wang Chong became a teacher. He was for a time Officer of Merit in his commandery, but was critical and quarrelsome and left that position.

In retirement and seclusion Wang Chong wrote a great number of essays on various philosophical and practical questions, including Jisu 讖俗 "On Common Morality" and Jieyi 讖義 "Censures" [which Forke interprets as a single work, "Censures on Common Morality"], Zheng wu 政務 "On Government," and Yangxing shu 養性書 "On Macrobiotics." Seventy or eighty of these pieces were collected into Lun heng 論衡 "Discussions" or "Discourses Weighed in the Balance," and the collection was probably extended later, to become an anthology of all Wang Chong's writing. Though chapter numbers vary, it is believed that the present-day text is largely complete.

Wang Chong later became Headquarters Officer to the Inspector Dong Qin, but again resigned. His friend Xie Yiwu recommended his work to the throne, and Emperor Zhang sent him a special summons, but he was ill and did not go. He died at home about 100.

The core of Wang Chong's philosophy was a common-sense scepticism for the metaphysics of official New Text Confucianism, challenging its more exaggerated claims, and insisting upon testing the historicity of alleged teachings from the past. His arguments are not always logical or fully founded upon evidence, but he rejected, for example, beliefs in the powers of ghosts and spirits, in the authority of shamans, and in the effectiveness of divination. He accepted the concept of man's inter-relationship with the natural world, including aspects of the Five Powers, but he believed that the world operated by spontaneous, natural development, and that individual destiny, ming 命, depended upon the strength of vital essence, qi 氣, and the accidents of chance. Despite the randomness of his fate, however, an individual can nonetheless be valued for moral conduct, and this was the true value of Confucian doctrine.

In his own time, Wang Chong's teachings were largely ignored, and there was no copy of Lun heng at the capital. During his exile to the south in the 180s Cai Yong encountered the work and spoke of it highly, and when Wang Lang returned to the north in 198 he brought a copy with him to the Han court controlled by Cao Cao at Xu city. Thereafter, as the fantasies of the New Text fell into disrepute, Wang Chong's rationalist approach became increasingly popular and influential. -HHS 49/39:1629-30*, XC 2:14a, YSS:14a; Forke 07 & 11, Ebrey 86:633-634, Loewe 86E:698-703, Ch'en 86:780-783, Texts:309-312 [Pokora and Loewe].

Wang Chong 王寵; Administrator of Nan commandery, Wang Chong carried out major canal and irrigation works. -SJZ 28:17b.

Wang Chong 王冲; Jianwei. Wang Chong was the suitor of the widowed Lady Cheng Zhenjue q.v.

Wang Chou 王稠. Emissary to the Southern Xiongnu in 133, Wang Chou sent one of his officers with the Xiongnu king Fushen on a successful raid of reprisal against the Xianbi beyond the frontiers. -HHS 6:262.

HHS 90/80:2988 also records this incident, but has the name of the Emissary as Zhao Chou 趙稠. It is not possible to determine which name is correct.

Wang Chun 王純 [Shaolin 少林]; Guanghan. As Wang Chun was travelling to study at Luoyang he came to an empty lodging where there was another student, desperately ill. He gave Wang Chun ten catties [24.5 grams] of gold and asked him to care for his corpse, but died before he could give his name. Wang Chun sold one catty to pay for the funeral, hid the rest in the coffin and kept nothing for himself.

Several years later Wang Chun returned home, and the county appointed him chief of a village. The first day he arrived at his new post a horse came galloping, then stopped in front of him, while the wind blew an embroidered cloth to drop at his feet. Wang Chun reported this, and the county authorities said he should keep the goods.

Soon afterwards, as Wang Chun rode to a neighbouring county, his horse bolted and carried him into the courtyard of a house. The owner was delighted to see the animal again, but accused Wang Chun of having stolen it. Wang Chun told his story, and showed the embroidered cloth, which proved also to have been blown away from that house. The owner asked what power he could have to collect such things, and Wang Chun told the story of the dead student; it turned out he had been the son of the family, named Jin Yan. The young man's body was brought home and the remaining gold was found intact.

The family offered many gifts, but Wang Chun refused all of them. Father Jin was an Attendant Officer, however, and he told the magistrate of Wang Chun's county. Now well known, Wang Chun was appointed Officer of Merit for the commandery, recommended as Abundant Talent by the province, and became a county magistrate in Youfufeng.

As he was travelling to his new position, he stayed at a post-house, which was said to be haunted by a murderous ghost. Wang Chun was not afraid, but he was woken in the night by a woman's voice wailing about her wrongs. He called her to come and explain, but she replied that she had no clothing. So he threw some clothes outside and she then appeared and made her accusation: that her husband, also a magistrate, had been murdered with all his party by the local headman. Wang Chun asked why she killed people herself, and she explained that she tried to tell them about the crime, but they paid no attention and went to sleep, so she got angry. Wang Chun assured her that her complaint would be dealt with, but she must stop killing people. The woman disappeared, leaving only her empty garments.

When Wang Chun questioned the headman, he confessed and implicated his companions in crime. All were executed and the post-house had no more disturbances. -HHS 81/71:2680-81*, HYGZ 10B:148.

Wang Chun 王純 [Bodun 伯敦] (103-161); Dongping. A man of family, Wang Chun's father had been Administrator of Wei commandery. Wang Chun became an Attendant Officer of the province, and in 137 he was nominated Filial and Incorrupt. After a period of probation as a gentleman cadet he became an Internuncio, then held other offices at court until an Excellency graded him First Class and he joined the Censorate as an Imperial Clerk.

Wang Chun was later an Inspector in Yang, Xu and Ji provinces, but left office for some fault and retired. When he died at the age of fifty-nine, a stele was set up at his tomb with the names of more than two hundred sponsors who described themselves as mensheng 門生. -LS 7:1a-2b, LX 12:18b-21b.

SJZ 8:8a mentions a stele to an Inspector of Ji province named Wang Fen 紛 which was set up on a hill in Dongping in 187. At LS 7:2b Hong Kuo notes that Wang Chun's stele was found in Dongping, and suggests that SJZ has miswritten 紛 for 純.

Wang Cizhong 王資仲; Shanggu. A noted calligrapher of the mid-second century AD, expert in the official li shu 隸書 "Clerical Style," Wang Cizhong is said to have been the inventor of the simplified kai shu 楷書, also known as zheng shu 正書 or zhen shu 真書, the "Standard Script" of the present day. Very little is known of his life. -SGZ 1:31, JS 36:1064; Ch'en 66: 50.

Wang Da 王大; Jingzhao. Wang Da was chieftain of a strong local clan in Xiagui county when, in the autumn of 23, the armies of the Gengshi Emperor of Han defeated the last field force of Wang Mang and sent a detachment under Wang Xian to operate north of the Wei River. Taking title as a general in the name of Han, Wang Da went to join Wang Xian, who led his new allies south across the Wei. He gained further troops from other clans and then, as the main Han army halted at Huayin, his irregular forces seized Chang'an, ravaged the city, and killed Wang Mang. -Dubs 55:461, Bn 54:130. See also Wang Xin.

Wang Dan 王丹 [Zhonghui 仲回]; Jingzhao. During the last years of Former Han, Wang Dan served in the local offices of his commandery and province, but after Wang Mang took power he refused invitations to office. A man of wealthy family, he delighted in charitable works, and would set out wine and delicacies for his field-workers at harvest-time. Widely respected and influential in the community, he was noted for his sense of morality, and he had a strong dislike for the traditional bullying of powerful local families. He criticised the arrogance of his fellow-country-man Chen Zun, Administrator of Henan for Wang Mang, and refused to deal with him, though he relented and farewelled Chen Zun as he embarked on his mission to the Xiongnu for the Gengshi Emperor.

As Guangwu's commander Deng Yu entered the passes in 25, Wang Dan brought his clan to welcome them and provided grain. Deng Yu recommended him as Administrator of Zuopingyi, but Wang Dan excused himself and left office on grounds of ill health. He returned home, but about 29 he was named Junior Tutor to the Heir Liu Qiang. Anxious to make friends, the Excellency Hou Ba sent his son Yu to welcome him as he came to Luoyang, but Wang Dan was reluctant to be involved with the nephew of a eunuch who had also served the usurper Wang Mang. Other senior ministers showed similar respect to Wang Dan; they were more successful, and Wang Dan became a leading moral figure at court.

Wang Dan was dismissed when one of his nominees for office was convicted of a crime, but he was soon afterwards re-appointed as Senior Tutor to the Heir. His protégé had been too embarrassed to apologise for his fault, but Wang Dan forgave him and treated him as before.

Wang Dan later retired from office; he died at home. -HHS 27/17:930-32*.

Wang Dan 王旦. When the Lady Bian, future consort of Cao Cao, was born in 160, a yellow mist filled the chamber. The Lady's father Bian Yuan consulted the diviner Wang Dan, and he foretold an auspicious future for her. -SGZ 5:156; C/C 99:91, Mather 76:342 [where the personal name appears as Yue 越.]

Wang Dan 王澹 see Wang Tan 王澹.

Wang Dang 王當. As Administrator of Runan, Wang Dang maintained an effective government by relying upon good local officials. -XC 7:8b.

Wang Dang 王當. About 190 Wang Dang commanded a group of Black Mountain bandits under the leadership of Zhang Yan. -SGZ 8:261.

Wang Dao 王道. A eunuch Attendant at the Yellow Gates in 125, Wang Dao took part in the coup led by Sun Cheng which destroyed the Yan clan and placed Liu Bao, Emperor Shun, upon the throne. Wang Dao was rewarded with a county marquisate in Dong commandery.

After Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang in 127, he and Wang Dao and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in 128 the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital. Wang Dao was named a Commandant of Cavalry.

Wang Dao was later one of a group of eunuchs associated with the former wet-nurse Song E. Found guilty in 137 of corruption and making false accusations, they were all sent out to their fiefs and their pensions were reduced by a quarter. -HHS 78/68: 2516-18.

Wang [Deyuan] 王得元 (d.100); Xihe. In 100 a stele was erected to mark this man's tomb. -Nagata 94:38.

Wang Dian 王典 see sub Wang Zun IV.

Wang Ding 王定 (d.192); Taiyuan. Third son of Wang Yun, when Chang'an was stormed by Li Jue and other officers of the assassinated Dong Zhuo, Wang Ding was executed with his father. -HHS 66/56:2177. Zhonghua and the Harvard-Yenching index interpret Wang Ding and Wang Jing II q.v. as brothers, but the Kyoto index combines the names to describe one person, Wang Jingding.

Wang Ding 王定; Jiyin. About 190 the peasant farmer Wang Ding is said to have found a jade seal with an inscription saying that "Yu is the Son of Heaven" 虞為天子. This was interpreted by Han Fu in a letter to Yuan Shu as support for his proposal that Liu Yu should be offered the imperial title. -SGZ 8:241-42.

Wang Du 王度; Yingchuan. Son of Wang Fu, Wang Du succeeded to the family fief in Jiangxia. He married the Princess Liu Zhong, daughter of Emperor Ming, and became a Gentleman at the Yellow Gates. -HHS 10B:460, 20/10:738.

Wang Du 王度. An assistant magistrate in Dong commandery in 184, he joined the Yellow Turbans but was defeated by the local gentleman Cheng Yu. -SGZ 14:425.

Wang Duan 王端; Zhao. Eldest son of Wang Bin, when his father died about 195 he succeeded to his fief. -HHS 10B:452.

Wang Dun 王惇 (d.256). After his conquest of Jing province in 219, Sun Quan confirmed his tribute relationship with Cao Cao, and sent Wang Dun to buy horses in the north.

Wang Dun later became a general, but in 256 he was put to death for conspiracy. -SGZ Wu 2:1121; Fang 65:243.

Wang Dun 王惇 see Wang Chun 王純.

Wang Fan 王汎; Kuaiji. Though Wang Fan was the son of a landowner, early in the first century he made his living as a merchant. He and his sons Meng and Song were local bullies, and the family was twice forced to move to escape enemies. Wang Fan became the grandfather of Wang Chong. -Lun heng 30; Forke 07:64, Ebrey 86:633.

Wang Fang 王魴; Jingzhao. XTS 72B:2651 says that Wang Fang was the son of Wang Zun III. He presumably inherited his fief.

Wang Fang 王方; Henan. About 82 Wang Fang was recommended by the magistrate Lu Gong as Worthy and Good, Sincere and Upright. Emperor Zhang sent a special carriage for him and he became a Palace Attendant. -HHS 25/15:875.

Wang Fang 王防 [Wenshi 文始]. As Director of the Imperial Secretariat, Wang Fang was concerned to offer loyal advice on government. He later became Director of Retainers, and in that office he set an example by eating only plain rice. He refused to deal with the leading families of the capital province and he applied the law firmly to the imperial relatives by marriage. No-one dared offend. -XC 6:8b-9a; one edition has the surname as Ren 任.

The Hou Han shu of Fan Ye has no mention of this man, and it is difficult to date him, but if the surname was in fact Ren, then he may have been involved in construction of the Stone Bridge at Luoyang in 135: see sub Ren Fang 任防 of Henan.

Wang Fang 王訪; Shanyang. Some time in the late 160s twenty-four men from Shanyang, under the leadership of the reformist Zhang Jian, swore an oath of fellowship and set up a stele. Wang Fang was a member of the group. Encouraged by the eunuch Hou Lan, in 169 the malcontent Zhu Bing claimed the association was treasonous. A warrant was issued for the members' arrest, and this was the trigger for the Second Faction Incident and the Great Proscription. -HHS 67/57:2188 & 2210, ZF:16a [in SGZ 6:211 PC]; deC 75A:28-31, deC 89:110.

Wang Fang 王方. A former follower of Dong Zhuo, in 192 Wang Fang joined Li Jue and others in the capture of Chang'an. He is not heard of again. -SGZ 6:181.

Wang Fen 王芬 (d.188). Inspector of Ji province in 188, Wang Fen led a conspiracy to kidnap Emperor Ling as he came on tour in the north, put another member of the Liu house on the throne, and kill the eunuchs. The plot was discovered and Wang Fen killed himself. -SGZ 1:4.

Wang Fen 王紛 see sub Wang Chun 王純.

Wang Feng 王鳳; Jiangxia. There was serious famine in the region of the middle Yangzi in 20, and many people in the Xinshi district of Jiangxia left their settlements to seek food in the marshlands. This misfortune was very likely a consequence of the disruption from immigrant refugees entering the lands of the middle Yangzi after disastrous flooding of the Yellow River over more than ten years. See sub Fan Chong and Bn 54:152.

Wang Feng and Wang Kuang, commoners who were recognised for honest dealing and fair judgement, became leaders of these rootless people. By 21 they had gathered some seven or eight thousand men, and they defeated a provincial army twice their number, capturing baggage and equipment. They stormed a series of county cities, abducted women and retired into the wilderness.

As the insurgents rose in number, the local authorities were quite unable to cope with them, but in 22 there was an outbreak of disease and the bandits made their way north into Nanyang under separate leaders. Wang Kuang and Wang Feng were now associated with Ma Wu, evidently a member of the gentry, and the lesser commander Zhu Wei, and their group was styled the Troops from Xinshi. They attacked a county city in the south of Nanyang, without success, but were then joined by local Troops from Pinglin led by Chen Mu and Liao Zhan.

In the autumn of that year, further to the north, Liu Bosheng, elder brother of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu, rose in rebellion against Wang Mang, and he sent his kinsman Liu Jia to propose an alliance. This was agreed to, and Liu Bosheng gained substantial reinforcements. As Bielenstein observes, however, the commoner troops whose support Liu Bosheng was compelled to seek would later be responsible for his loss of the leadership of the movement which he had begun. The combined force moved gradually against Wan city, capital of Nanyang, but the rebels were heavily defeated at Xiao-Chang'an, south of Wan, by commandery forces under Wang Mang's officers Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci.

Wang Feng and his colleagues threatened to leave the losing cause, but Liu Bosheng recruited another bandit group, the Troops from the Lower Yangzi, led by Wang Chang, Cheng Dan and Zhang Ang, and the balance of power against Wang Mang's local forces was restored. In the winter at the beginning of 23 the rebels again fought the army of Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci, and on this occasion they gained complete victory and killed both enemy commanders. A few weeks later they defeated another army, commanded by the generals Zhuang You and Chen Mao, then advanced to besiege Wan city.

At this time, however, in the spring of 23, the leaders of the Troops deposed Liu Bosheng as leader of the rebellion and named Liu Xuan as [the Gengshi] Emperor. Wang Feng was made Supreme Duke Who Perfects the State 成國上公, one of the highest titles in the new regime, and he held joint command of the army which invaded Yingchuan, Runan and Pei. In July he and his fellow-commander Wang Feng held the city of Kunyang in Yingchuan while Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, led troops from outside. On 7 July they gained a decisive victory.

In 24 the Gengshi Emperor named Wang Feng king of a county in Nan commandery; Bielenstein observes that the pattern of enfeoffments at this time reflected a political setback for the former bandit chieftains as against their rivals of the Nanyang gentry. There is no record of Wang Feng in accounts of the disorders which accompanied the breakdown of the Gengshi regime; he presumably died in 24 or 25. -HHS 1A:6-8, 11/1:467-71; Bn 54:75-80, 106-136, Bn 59:16-19, 53, 102.

Wang Feng 王豐. As Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, pursued some groups of bandits into Youbeiping in 25, his troops were defeated. Hard-pressed, he jumped down an embankment, and the light cavalryman Wang Feng gave him his horse. So Liu Xiu got away. -HHS 1:19. [It is possible that Wang Feng survived, and is the same person as the general immediately below.]

Wang Feng 王豐. In 57-58 Wang Feng was General of the Household and second-in-command to Ma Wu in his campaign against the Qiang war-leader Dianyu. -HHS 12:786. [This may be the man in the entry immediately above.]

Wang Fu 王扶; Youfufeng. Wang Fu was chieftain of a strong local clan in Zhouzhi county when, in the autumn of 23, the armies of the Gengshi Emperor of Han defeated the last field force of Wang Mang and sent advance parties under Wang Xian and Han Chen towards Chang'an. Wang Fu and other local leaders took title as generals in the name of Han and came to attack the capital. While the main Han army was halted at Huayin, these irregular troops ravaged the city and killed Wang Mang. -Dubs 55:461, Bn 54:130.

HHS 17/7:647 refers to a certain Luo Yan as warlord of Zhouzhi county in 27, so it appears Wang Fu may have lost his local position of leadership within a few years.

Wang Fu 王扶 [Ziyuan 子元]; Donglai. As a young man, Wang Fu migrated into Langye, probably to escape the troubles which accompanied the fall of Wang Mang; the people of the village where he stayed were inspired by his moral example. The Chancellor Zhang Zong invited him to appointment, and when Wang Fu would not accept he threatened him with force. So Wang Fu returned to his home country, where he was also sought for office, but was able to excuse himself on grounds of ill health. He likewise refused an invitation from Emperor Ming's Grand Tutor Deng Yu.

Then Zhongli Yi of the Imperial Secretariat nominated Wang Fu and other gentlemen aged over seventy who had influence for good in their local communities, and they were summoned to Luoyang as Consultants. When he came to audience Wang Fu bowed respectfully but did not speak. He was nonetheless admired for his upright conduct, and in his "Hymns to the [Men of] Virtue of Han" the imperial kinsman Liu Fu praised him as one of the celebrated ministers of Emperor Ming. -HHS 39/29:1297-98*; Vervoorn 90:148.

Wang Fu 王符; Yingchuan. Son of Wang Ba, he inherited his marquisate in 59. The fief was later transferred from Xiapi to Jiangxia. -HHS 20/10:738.

Wang Fu 王阜 [Shigong 世公]; Shu. A precocious scholar, at the age of eleven Wang Fu wanted to attend the University at Luoyang, and when his parents said he was too young he travelled to Anding to study the New Text Han School of Poetry.

Wang Fu was nominated Filial and Incorrupt by the Administrator Diwu Lun about 70, and he became a county magistrate in Zuopingyi. A flock of magical luan birds 鸞 stayed at his yamen for ten days. Wang Fu had his officers play music for them, and they danced and flapped their wings.

In the time of Emperor Zhang Wang Fu served as Administrator of Yizhou commandery, where he constructed schools to reform the local barbarian customs and maintained the peace by personal authority. His work was so successful that four magical horses appeared from the Dian Lake, sweet dew 甘露 fell, and white crows appeared.

About 90 the General-in-Chief Dou Xian, brother of the regent Dowager for Emperor He, sought to enlist Wang Fu as a client, and presented him with a splendid cloak. Wang Fu, however, refused the gift and later, when Dou Xian's attendant Li Wen came with a request for six million cash, he refused to hand it over until formal approval had been received from the court. -HHS 86/76:2847 [as Wang Zhui 追], DGHJ 18:5a-b, HYZ 4:49, 10A:133, XC 5:6b.

Wang Fu 王符 [Jiexin 節信]; Anding. Born about 90, the son of a concubine, Wang Fu was looked down upon by his neighbours, but he was a man of high moral quality and became a noted scholar. He was a friend of Ma Rong, Dou Zhang, Zhang Heng and Cui Yuan, but he was very out-spoken, took no advantage of any influence and never held office. He may have spent a number of years at Luoyang, but had returned to Anding by 145, where he was treated with respect by the noted general Huangfu Gui. He died about 165.

Wang Fu's Qianfu lun 潜夫论 "Comments of a Recluse," probably compiled for the most part in the late 140s and the 150s, is a wide-ranging work on the ills of the day. Wang Fu emphasised the need for personal morality, and he was particularly concerned with the need for honest and impartial administration, carried out by men of personal quality rather than those who had inherited their position, and he argued that even the emperor must recognise public duty above his private wishes. At the same time, however, he did not rely only upon the enforcement of law but looked also for a moral regeneration both in human and cosmic terms.

Three sections of Qianfu lun contain graphic descriptions of the great Qiang rebellions of 107-118 and 140-144, which strongly influenced Fan Ye's account in Hou Han shu. Wang Fu came from one of the affected regions, he may have experienced the troubles for himself, and he certainly knew people who had. From his point of view, the insensitivity and failure of Han policy in the northwest provided direct examples of the general malaise of the Chinese world. -HHS 49/39:1630-43*; Balazs 50, Pearson 89, Ch'en 86:789-794, deC 84:90, 103, Texts:12-15 [Ch'en and Pearson].

Wang Fu 王輔. In 93 the Northern Shanyu Yuchujian, who had surrendered to Han, tried to escape from Chinese control and return to the steppe. The Chief Clerk in Command of Troops Wang Fu and the Emissary Ren Shang were sent after him. They caught the Shanyu and persuaded him to return, but on the road back Yuchujian died, perhaps forcibly. -HHS 89/79:2954; deC 84:275.

Wang Fu 王輔 [Gongzhu 公助]; Dongping. A scholar of the Gongyang commentary to Chunqiu, and of Xiao jing wei Yuanshen qi 孝經緯援神契, an apocryphal work associated with the Book of Filial Piety, Wang Fu lived in seclusion in the wilderness.

At one time he took office in the capital and was then nominated as Knowing the Way. This entailed the presentation of responses to questions, and following this Wang Fu was appointed a gentleman cadet. He gave advice on portents, and was promoted to Consultant, but left office on account of ill health.

In 121 Wang Fu received a special invitation to office from the government of Emperor An, but he did not accept. -XC 6:6b, HHS 82/72A:2722-23; Vervoorn 90:158.

Wang Fu 王輔; Guanghan. Husband of the Lady Peng Fei, he died young. -HYZ 10B:153.

Wang Fu 王輔. In 132 an edict of Emperor Shun noted that unseasonable weather indicated the government was out of balance and the forces of nature disturbed. The Palace Attendant Wang Fu and others were sent with the Staff of Authority to offer sacrifice to the tutelary gods of Mount Tai and the Eastern Sea, and also to the Yellow River, to the Luo, and to the junction of rivers at Rongyang in Henan. -HHS 4:259.

Wang Fu 王福 [Zhongzhao 仲昭]; Nanyang. A former county magistrate, in 156 Wang Fu was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Wang Fu 王阜; Changsha. Magistrate of Qiao county in Pei in the 150s, Wang Fu erected a stele at the tomb temple of the Lady Li 李母, mother of Laozi 老子. This was at a time that the regent Liang family was showing patronage of the sage and had a temple constructed at his attributed birthplace in the neighbouring county of Hu in Chen state: see sub Kong Chou. -SJZ 23:5b.

Wang Fu 王甫/輔 or Wang Pu 輔 (d.179); Chenliu. A eunuch, at the time of the First Faction Incident in 166-167 Wang Fu was in charge of interrogations. He was then appointed to the Change apartments of the Dowager Dou.

As Dou Wu prepared to destroy the eunuchs in 168 he had his associates Yin Xun and Shan Bing torture Zheng Li until he implicated Wang Fu and Cao Jie, then sent in a report calling for their arrest. In a counter-coup, however, Cao Jie forced the Secretariat to appoint Wang Fu Prefect of the Yellow Gates and give him a warrant to arrest Yin Xun and Shan Bing. Wang Fu killed them both and then accompanied Zheng Li to seize the Dowager's seal. He sent officers to take control of the Southern Palace, and closed the Covered Way which linked the two compounds. Chen Fan led a small group into the Northern Palace but he was swiftly captured, and Wang Fu and Zheng Li now led a thousand palace guards to join Zhang Huan and Zhou Jing against Dou Wu and the Northern Army. Through Zhang Huan's prestige, Dou Wu's troops were persuaded to change sides.

As the eunuchs confirmed control, Wang Fu was promoted to Regular Attendant while still acting as Prefect of the Yellow Gates, and he thereafter held a leading role in government as a close ally of Cao Jie. His relatives and clients spread their influence through the empire, and Wang Fu and his associates were notorious for corruption and cruelty.

Liu Kui, King of Bohai and brother of the late Emperor Huan, refused to pay a bribe he had promised, so in 172 Wang Fu and Cao Jie had him accused of plotting rebellion. Liu Kui was executed and Wang Fu and eleven others were rewarded with enfeoffment.

In 177, as a favour to Tian Yan, Wang Fu urged his plan for a great attack on the Xianbi. The expedition was a disastrous failure.

In 178, fearing that the Empress Song might be resentful of his role in destroying Liu Hui, for her aunt had been a concubine of the late king, Wang Fu accused her of witchcraft. She was imprisoned and died.

When Yang Qiu became Director of Retainers in 179, he immediately accused Wang Fu and his colleagues of corruption. Wang Fu was arrested with his family as he was on holiday at his estates, and he and his associates died under the bastinado. His body was exposed by a gate of the capital, while his wife and surviving family were exiled to the far south. -HHS 78/68:2524-26, 77/67:2499-2500.

Wang Fu 王服 [Zifu 子服?] (d.200). A lieutenant-general at Xu city, in 199 he joined Dong Cheng's conspiracy against Cao Cao. In 200 the plot was discovered and Wang Fu and his family were destroyed. -HHS 72/62:2343.

SGZ Shu 2:875 and HYGZ 6:79 refer to the general Wang Zifu 王子服 as one of the conspirators. This is probably the same man; the character zi may be a mistaken addition, or Zifu was Wang Fu's style.

Wang Fu 王甫 [Guoshan 國山] (d.222); Guanghan. Skilled at debate, Wang Fu was a clerical officer under Liu Zhang. When Liu Bei took over Yi province in 214 he appointed him a county magistrate, and Wang Fu later served as a consultant in Jing province. He was killed in the defeat of Liu Bei's expedition against Wu. -SGZ Shu 15:1086.

Wang Gai 王蓋 (d.192); Taiyuan. Eldest son of Wang Yun, he became Palace Attendant in his regime at Chang'an. When the city was stormed by Li Jue and other officers of the assassinated Dong Zhuo, Wang Gai died with his father. -HHS 66/56:2177.

Wang Gao 王皋; Youfufeng. An officer under the county magistrate Cao Quan, in the mid-180s Wang Gao distributed medicine and clothing to the poor, and in 185 he joined in sponsorship of a stele in his honour -JSCB 18:3b; Ebrey 80:342-344.

Wang Gong 王龔 [Bozong 伯宗]; Shanyang. Member of a family which had held local position for several generations, Wang Gong received commandery nomination as Filial and Incorrupt, and later became Inspector of Qing province. When he sent in reports on several heads of commandery units who were themselves greedy and corrupt, Emperor An was impressed, and called Wang Gong to join the Secretariat at the capital.

In 121 Wang Gong was appointed Director of Retainers. He kept good order at the capital, and in the following year he became Administrator of the great commandery of Runan. He governed humanely and agreeably, paying attention to nominating men of quality for office, including Chen Fan the future leader of reform. It is said that he also attempted to contact the worthy recluse Huang Xian, but without success; Huang Xian, however, was born only about 118, so the story appears improbable.

In 126 Wang Gong was called to the capital as Minister Coachman and soon afterwards became Minister of Ceremonies. In 128 he was sent with the Staff of Authority to make offerings at Maoling, the tomb of Emperor Wu of Former Han which had been damaged by fire.

In 129 Wang Fu was appointed Excellency of Works. He left office in 133, after an earthquake in the capital district, but in 136 he returned to Excellency rank as Grand Commandant. In high office, Wang Gong was respectful and cautious. He did not deal with the minutiae of administration, but he sought to have the best men appointed to office, and he was increasingly worried about the growth of eunuch influence in government. He presented several memorials on this, and the eunuchs were so concerned they had several of their clients lay charges against him. His former subordinate Li Gu, now a senior assistant to the General-in-Chief Liang Shang, persuaded him to speak to Emperor Shun, and the matter was resolved. [XHS, however, says that Wang Gong had to be dissuaded from attacking the powerful eunuch Zhang Fang 張昉.]

In 140 Wang Gong retired from office on grounds of ill health. He died at home. -HHS 56/46:1819-21*, XC 3:7a, XHS 4:6a.

SGZ 21:597 PC quotes the Hou Han ji of Zhang Fan, which says that when Wang Gong's wife died, he and his children all bore staffs to the funeral. About the same time, Xue Qin treated the funeral of his wife in a more stoic, and classically Taoist, fashion. Ying Shao and others considered both approaches excessive: FSTY 3:22.

Wang Gong 王恭 [Jigong 季公]; Nanyang. A gentleman cadet, in 156 Wang Gong was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Wang Gua 王鵠; Jingzhao. XTS 72B:2651 says that Wang Gua was a son of Wang Chen; he probably inherited the family fief.

Wang Guan 王灌 see Wang Huo 王獲/獲.

Wang Guan 王觀 [Weitai 偉壺]; Dong. Orphaned and poor when he was young, Wang Guan was nonetheless a man of energy and ambition. About 210 he became a literary adviser on Cao Cao's staff as Imperial Chancellor, then served as magistrate in several counties.

When Cao Pi took the imperial throne in 220 Wang Guan was appointed to the Secretariat, and he later became a commandery Administrator and held high office at the capital. A supporter of Sima Yi and his family, Wang Guan was enfeoffed and named an Excellency. He retired and died at home about 260. -SGZ 24:693-94*.

Wang Guang 王廣; Shu. Son of Wang Hao, he escaped the slaughter of his family by Gongsun Shu and took refuge in the wilderness. Under the reign of Emperor Guangwu he was nominated several times for office, but refused each time, explaining that since he had been unable to avenge his father's death he had no right to worldly glory. He was admired for his high sense of honour. -HYGZ 12:215.

814 Wang Guang

Wang Guang 王廣; Yingchuan. Son of Wang Chang, he succeeded to his father's marquisate in Pei in 36. In 54 the fief was transferred to a county in Danyang. In 71 Wang Guang was implicated in the disgrace of Liu Ying, King of Chu, and was stripped of his fief. -HHS 15/5:582.

Wang Gui 王瓌 (d.190). A colonel in the Northern Army, in 190 Wang Gui was sent by Dong Zhuo on embassy to make peace with the eastern alliance. On orders from Yuan Shao, however, the Administrator of Henei Wang Kuang killed Wang Gui and his colleagues. -HHS 9:370, 74/64A:2376, SGZ 6:192.

Wang Guo 王國; Jingzhao. A eunuch, Wang Guo was a member of the household of the regent Dowager Yan, but in 125 he joined Sun Cheng in conspiracy to overthrow the Yan family and restore Liu Bao, son and former Heir of the late Emperor An, to the succession. The coup was successful and Wang Guo was rewarded with a county marquisate in Nanyang.

After Sun Cheng had forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang in 127, he and Wang Guo and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in 128 the emperor recalled their good work and they were permitted to return to the capital. Wang Guo died a few years later. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Wang Guo 王國 (d.189); Hanyang. Probably a former officer in Liang province, Wang Guo became leader of the local rebels after the assassination of the Inspector Geng Bi in 187. Taking title as a general, he raided Hanyang, and at the end of 188 he embarked on a major attack against Chencang in Youfufeng. The court sent an army under Huangfu Song with Dong Zhuo to oppose the invasion, and in the spring of 189 the rebels abandoned the siege. Following up, the imperial forces won a series of engagements, and Wang Guo was deposed and presumably killed by his own men. The Xiandi chunqiu by Yuan Ye of the third century refers to Wang Guo among leaders of the rebellion as early as 184, but his native Hanyang was not affected, and he does not appear prominently until a few years later. He may even have been in the service of Geng Bi at the time of the mutiny. -HHS 58/48:1877-78, 72/62:

2321; Haloun 49/50, deC 84:152-161; and see sub Han Sui.

Wang Guo 王國; Dongping. About 205 Wang Guo and Xue Ti were appointed as senior clerical officers on Cao Cao's staff in Ji province. They became known for their loyalty and honesty. -SGZ 22:645.

Wang Hai 王海 (d.213); Yuzhang. A leader of bandits in the east of Poyang, he was destroyed by He Qi in 213. -SGZ Wu 15:1379.

Wang Han 王漢; Zuopingyi. In 179 the private scholar Wang Han presented a book on lunar eclipses to the throne. His work was reviewed by the Court Astronomer Xiu and again, on orders from the Imperial Secretariat, by the officer Liu Hong. Both men rejected it as valueless, and Wang Han was sent home. -HHS 92/2:3042-43.

Wang Hao 王皓 [Zili 子離]; Shu. A county magistrate in Youfufeng during the reign of Emperor Ping, after Wang Mang took the throne in 9 AD Wang Hao left his office and returned home.

When Gongsun Shu claimed the imperial title in 25 he sent messengers to summon Wang Hao and his fellow-countryman Wang Jia. Concerned they might not obey, he had their families arrested. Wang Hao, however, replied that even dogs and horses can recognise their master, and this was still more true of men. He killed himself and had his head sent to Gongsun Shu's messenger.

Gongsun Shu, furious, had Wang Hao's family killed, though his son Wang Guang managed to escape. Wang Jia then followed Wang Hao's example. -HHS 81/71:2670, HYGZ 10A:138; Vervoorn 90:142.

Wang He 王和, the Lady; Guanghan. Widow of Bian Jing, who died young, she lived most virtuously, caring for his children and kinfolk. He Yu of Shu sent a go-between to ask that she marry him, and her elder brother Zhu accepted the distinguished connection on her behalf. The Lady, however, cut off one of her ears, to disfigure and disqualify herself. -HYGZ 10B:153.

Wang Hei 王黑 also as Wang Yi 異; Taiyuan. Wang Hei was a grandson of Wang Yun. After the imperial court had come to Xu city in 196, Emperor Xian awarded him a village marquisate in recognition of his grandfather's loyalty. -HHS 66/56:2178.

Wang Heng 王衡 (d.138); Wu. When Wang Heng was Administrator of Wu in 138, there was a mutiny led by the non-Chinese [Yue 越] brothers Yang Zhen and Yang Ye. Wang Heng defended his yamen, then defeated the rebels and killed their ringleaders. -HHS 6:267, 101/11:3245.

Wang Heping 王和平; Beihai. A practitioner of magical arts, with ambition to become an immortal 仙, Wang Heping travelled to the capital, Luoyang, about 180, but was taken ill there and died. As his follower Sun Yong carried out his funerary rites, he buried also more than a hundred manuscripts and a quantity of medicines. Wang Heping's disciple Xia Rong later claimed that Wang Heping had arranged a false death 尸解, a device to reach the world of the immortals; Sun Yong then regretted that he had neither read the texts nor taken the potions for his own use. -HHS 82/72B:2751*, SGZ 29:805; Ngo 76:146-147, DeWoskin 83:88-89.

Wang Hong 王閔. Son of Wang Tan 譚, an uncle of Wang Mang, Wang Hong was a Regular Attendant under Emperor Ai of Former Han. When the emperor died in 1 BC Wang Hong forced the eunuch and former favourite Dong Xian 董賢 to hand over the imperial seal which he had been given by the late ruler. As Wang Mang took power, he was distrustful of Wang Hong, and sent him out to Yan province.

In fear for his life, Wang Hong took no role in general politics but maintained his territory intact, and when Wang Mang was destroyed in 23 he acceded to and was accepted by the new regime of the Gengshi Emperor.

Wang Hong was named Administrator of Langye, but the local leader Zhang Bu kept him out. Issuing a summons to raise troops, Wang Hong managed to occupy some territory in the south of the commandery, but when he sought to move directly against Zhang Bu he was defeated.

In 24, as Liu Yong in Liang made contact with Zhang Bu, Wang Hong was surrounded. Making personal contact with Zhang Bu, with a fine defiant speech recorded by the history, he was treated with respect and accepted as Administrator; in practice, he was now under the warlord's control.

After the defeat and death of Liu Yong in 27, Zhang Bu considered recognising his son Liu Yu, but Wang Hong dissuaded him. As Zhang Bu surrendered to the forces of Guangwu in 29, Wang Hong also submitted. He is not mentioned again. -HHS 12/2:498-500; Bn 59:36, 58-59, 139, QHX:524.

Wang Hong 王閔 (d.30); Lelang. Wang Hong was a distant descendant of Wang Zhong 仲, a scholar of natural phenomena from Langye, who was consulted by the rival Lü and Liu families in the early second century BC, but took refuge from the troubles in Lelang, which was then beyond the frontier [QHX:566]. The family evidently maintained local authority and in the early 20s Wang Hong was Thrice Venerable of the commandery.

About 25 the local leader Wang Tiao killed the Administrator appointed by the Gengshi Emperor and took his title, but in 30 Emperor Guangwu named his own officer Wang Zun as Administrator of Lelang, and sent him to attack Wang Tiao. While he was still in Liaodong, however, Wang Hong and the local officer Yang Yi killed Wang Tiao and welcomed the Han forces.

The successful conspirators were named as marquises, but Wang Hong refused the honour. Guangwu was impressed and called him to court, but he became ill and died while on the road. -HHS 76/66: 2464.

Wang Hong 王弘. In the summer of 107, as the imperial government decided that the difficulties and costs of maintaining a position in the Western Regions had become too great, orders were sent to abolish the office of Protector-General and recall all Chinese colonists. Wang Hong was sent as Commandant of Cavalry with recruits from within the passes to escort the settlers back into Han territory, together with the troops commanded by Liang Qin and other officers of the region.

Besides his Chinese troops, Wang Hong was also ordered to impress several hundred Qiang horse-men and other non-Chinese from Jincheng and neighbouring commanderies. The number raised was just a few hundred, and the men were called up only for the current emergency, but the recruitment was hasty and the conscripts evidently believed they faced long-term exile. Added to an earlier levy by Liang Qin, and with Chinese weakness shown by the withdrawal, they were resentful and unruly, and as they came to Jiuquan the men mutinied and deserted.

This uprising marked the beginning of the great East Qiang rebellion, and it is probable that Wang Hong was one of the earliest victims. -HHS 47/37:1592, 87/77:2886; deC 84:90-91.

Wang Hong 王閔 [Gongxuan 公選]; Wu. A local officer when he was young, Wang Hong was recognised for his generous nature and his honesty. He was later Inspector of Ji province, known for its powerful families and fierce people. Wang Hong maintained firm government, refused to accept pressure from the local leaders, and was known as a man who kept to himself.

On one occasion Wang Hong was crossing the estuary of the Qiantang River by present-day Hangzhou when a fierce storm blew up and the boat was in danger of capsizing. Throwing his sword into the river, Wang Hong called on the legendary hero Wu Zixu 伍子胥. The wind abated and he was able to complete the crossing. -XC 8:3a.

Wang Hong 王宏 I [Changwen 長文] (d.192); Taiyuan. Elder brother of Wang Yun, Wang Hong was sponsored by his fellow-countryman Guo Tai, known for his judgement of character, and became well-known and respected. As Inspector of Ji province he dealt firmly with powerful local families, and as Administrator of Hongnong he killed several wealthy eunuch associates who were causing trouble.

In 192 Wang Hong and Song Yi were Administrators respectively of Zuopingyi and Youfufeng under the regime of Wang Yun at Chang'an. When Li Jue and other officers of Dong Zhuo seized the capital soon afterwards, they were concerned that Wang Hong and Song Yi posed a threat, and so they called them in. Wang Hong wanted to combine the forces of the two commanderies to oppose the new regime, but Song Yi would not agree. So both men obeyed the summons, and Li Jue had them killed with Wang Yun and his family. As Wang Hong came to execution, he cursed Song Yi for a useless book-worm. -HHS 66/56:2177, 68/58:2227: see also, however, sub Wang Hong II below.

Wang Hong 王宏 II; Taiyuan. The biography of Wang Xuanmo 王玄謨, an official of the Song dynasty in the fifth century AD, says that he was the descendant of Wang Hong, who was Administrator of Hedong and had been enfeoffed as a marquis. This Wang Hong was a nephew or junior cousin of the Excellency Wang Yun [described as his 從叔], and when Wang Yun was destroyed in 192 Wang Hong left his office and went to live in the north. He became Administrator of Yanmen and then of Xinxing, a new commandery set up by Cao Cao in 215 to replace the northern administrations of Yunzhong, Dingxiang, Wuyuan and Shuofang. -SS 76:1973.

If the lineage given in Song shu is reliable, then the potential identification of Wang Hong I above as an elder brother of Wang Yun cannot be correct, for Wang Hong II would be a son, a nephew or a close cousin of Wang Hong I, and two such kinsmen should not have the same personal name. There are a number of ways in which the records could have been confused or miswritten, but there is insufficient information to sort the matter out.

Wang Hong 王肱. In 190 Liu Dai the Inspector of Yan province killed his old enemy Qiao Mao the Administrator of Dong commandery. He named Wang Hong to replace him, but Wang Hong proved unable to deal with the many bandit groups of the region. In the following year Yuan Shao, Governor of Ji province and leader of the loyal alliance, ordered that Cao Cao, who had achieved substantial success against the insurgents, should take his place. -SGZ 1:8.

Wang Hong 王宏 [Zhengzong 正宗]; Shanyang. Son of Wang Ye and an elder brother of Wang Bi 弼, Wang Hong was Director of Retainers under Wei. -SGZ 28:796.

Wang Hu 王護. In 30 Wang Hu was Director of the Imperial Secretariat when the local official Feng Yan sent in a memorial proposing reforms. Emperor Guangwu wanted to see him, but Feng Yan's enemy Linghu Lue told Wang Hu and his officer Zhousheng Feng that Feng Yan would slander them. They therefore prevented the audience from taking place. -HHS 28/18A:977.

Wang Huai 王懷. About 170 Wang Huai was Administrator of Yingchuan. When the scholar Xu Jing, member of a leading local family, died, Wang Huai granted him posthumous title as Master of Profound Conduct 玄行先生 [cf. also sub Qiu Zhen. -HHSJ 62/52:2226 Hui Dong citing the Gaoshi zhuan of Huangfu Mi.

Wang Huan 王渙 [Zhizi 稚子] (d.105); Guanghan. Son of Wang Shun, Wang Huan was a troublemaker when he was young, but he later changed his conduct and became a conscientious scholar, with particular interest in the Classic of History and in legal matters. As Officer of Merit to the Administrator Chen Chong, he was one of his close assistants in pacifying the commandery, and when Chen Chong was called to the capital as a minister in 92, he recommended him to Emperor He.

Nominated Abundant Talent by the province, Wang Huan served three years as a magistrate in Henei, where he restored good order with a firm hand: it is claimed that people were able to sleep with their doors open and cattle could be left to graze in the open country. He then became Inspector of Yan province, where he again kept strong control, but was dismissed for making a wrongful arrest. After a year out of office he returned as an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate.

In 103 Wang Huan accompanied the emperor on tour to the south, and on return he was appointed Prefect of Luoyang, where he gained great influence and was admired for the manner in which he supported the weak against the strong, and exposed and punished hidden wrongs. When he took ill and died two years later, all number of people paid him honour, and as his funeral cortège travelled west through Hongnong, traders came to pay their respects because he had ended the corruption and theft they used to encounter when sending grain to the capital.

In 108 the regent Dowager Deng issued an edict to honour Wang Huan and appoint his son as a gentleman cadet. A temple was established for him, and when Emperor Huan gave orders in 165 that such local worship should be ended Wang Huan's shrine was specifically exempted. Fan Ye classified Wang Huan as a Benevolent Official 循吏. -HHS 76/66:2468-70*, XHS 5:9a, HYZG 10B:145; Loewe 86C:304.

Fragments of the inscription from Wang Huan's shrine are at Xindu 新都, near Chengdu in present-day Sichuan. -LS 13:1b-2a, 22:8b-9a, Nagata 94:42.

Wang Huan 王奂 [Zichang 子昌 or Zibing 子炳]; Henei. Expert in the Confucian classics, Wang Huan was an early friend and model to Fan Dan, though Fan Dan later quarrelled with him.

As a county magistrate in Chenliu, Wang Huan ruled firmly, but he admired the village headman Qiu Lan for the manner in which he reformed the unfilial son Chen Yuan without applying punishment. He appointed Qiu Lan to his staff and arranged for him to attend the Imperial University at Luoyang.

Wang Huan later became Administrator of Hanyang, then returned to Luoyang as a Consultant. He died in that office. -HHS 81/71:2689, 76/66:2480, XC 5:5a, 8:4a.

Wang Hui 王誨 [Mengjian 孟堅]; Donglai. In 134 Wang Hui was sent as Internuncio for Control of the Yellow River, to take charge of a major project to dredge and reconstruct the channel of the River and its tributaries, including the Vast Canal near Rongyang in Henan. The work was extremely expensive, and was carried out with contributions of cash and corvée labour from commanderies along the course of the River. Before it was finished, Wang Hui was transferred to be Inspector of Yan province, and the work was brought to completion by his successor Sima Deng. -SJZ 7:8a-9a.

Wang Hui 王暉 [Bozhao 伯昭] (d.211); Dependent State of Shu commandery. Formerly a Reporting Officer, in the year after his death Wang Hui was remembered with a stele. -Nagata 94:264.

Wang Huiyang 王惠陽; Dongping. A man of leading local family, Wang Huiyang was a close friend of Huang Lang, who came from poor background but had travelled to educate himself. Wang Huiyang treated Huang Lang's mother with the same courtesy as if she were his own.

Wang Huiyang became Administrator of Jiuzhen under Wei. -SGZ 23:676.

Wang Huo 王濩/獲 or Wang Guan 灌; Guanghan. A younger brother of the scholar Wang You, after Wang You's death he gathered his writings to compile the Wangzi 王子 book in five pian. -HYZG 10B:144.

Wang Ji 王紀, the Lady; Guanghan. Daughter of Wang Tang, she married an official. -HYZG 10C:177.

Wang Ji 王姬, the Lady; Ba. Widow of Wang Yuankui, who died when she was young, the Lady refused to marry again. As Qiang raiders attacked her homeland about 110, she was afraid they would take her chastity. With the Lady Ma Yi and the Lady Zhao Hua, two women in the same situation, she leapt into the Han River and drowned herself. They were celebrated as the Three Virtuous Women 三貞. -HYZG 1:4.

Wang Ji 王冀. Inspector of Yi province, Wang Ji laid false charges against the Administrator of Shu, but was defied by the Officer of Merit Zhu Pu. -HYZG 10A: 137.

Wang Ji 王吉. As Emperor Ming was on one of his tours to the east of the empire, a crow flew down and perched on his carriage. The guardsman Wang Ji shot it, then claimed that the omen promised the sovereign ten thousand years, while he would become a minister. The emperor gave him twenty thousand cash, and ordered that pictures of the crow should be painted on walls in the locality. -FSTY 2f:97. This may be the same man as immediately below.

Wang Ji 王吉; Langye. JS 33:987 says that Wang Ji, who became a Counsellor Remonstrant, was an ancestor of Wang Xiang and Wang Lan. This may be the same man as in the entry above.

Wang Ji 王吉 (d.179); Chenliu. Adopted son of the eunuch Wang Fu, Wang Ji had a good education but was cruel and corrupt. When just over twenty he became Chancellor of Pei, where he encouraged informers, dug up old cases and readily punished members of a wrong-doer's family. In the space of five years he carried out ten thousand executions, and he took particular pleasure in sending the bodies of those killed around the counties: even as the flesh rotted away, he tied up the skeletons and maintained the grisly cortège.

In 179 Wang Ji and his father were impeached by Yang Qiu the Director of Retainers. They were arrested and beaten to death in prison. [Both Wang Ji and his nemesis Yang Qiu are classified by Fan Ye as Stern Officials 酷吏.] -HHS 77/67:2501*, 78/68:2526.

Wang Ji 王基 [Boyu 伯輿 or Boxing 伯興] (190-261); Donglai. Wang Ji lost his father when he was young, and was brought up by his uncle Wang Weng. They were noted for the care with which Wang Weng treated his nephew, and the filial respect which Wang Ji showed in return.

In 206, at the age of seventeen, Wang Ji was called to local office in the commandery, but he left because he disapproved of the administration. He travelled to Xu province to study, and attended the private academy of Zheng Xuan.

In the time of Cao Pi, Wang Ji came to office at the capital. He served in the imperial library, but later became a leading general and an Area Commander against Wu. He compiled Shiyao lun 時要論 "Essay on the Needs of the Time," dealing with contemporary politics. -SGZ 27:750-56*.

Wang Jia 王嘉 [Gongqing 公卿]; Shu. Wang Jia became a gentleman cadet at the court of Emperor Ping, but left his office after Wang Mang took the throne in 9 AD.

When Gongsun Shu claimed the imperial title in 25 he sent messengers to summon Wang Jia and his elder fellow-countryman Wang Hao. Concerned they might not obey, moreover, he had their families arrested. Wang Hao committed suicide, and Gongsun Shu had his family killed.

When Wang Jia heard of this, he expressed regret only that he had not been the first to show his sense of honour in such a way. Following Wang Hao's example, he killed himself in front of the messenger. His family was also slain. -HHS 81/71:2670, HYGZ 10A:138; Vervorn 90:142.

Wang Jia 王甲; Taiyuan. HHSJJ 84/74:3066 Shen Qinhan cites an inscription referring to Wang Jia as a grandson of Wang Ba q.v.

Wang Jianshi 王堅石 (d.71); Yuyang. Son of Wang Yu, he succeeded to his father's marquisate. Later, however, he was involved through his younger brother Wang Ping in the alleged conspiracy of Liu Ying, King of Chu. Wang Jianshi was publicly executed, and the fief was abolished. -HHS 22/12:776.

Wang [Jicai] 王季才. Son of Wang Xing, Wang Jicai was enfeoffed by Emperor Guangwu in 25 with a marquisate in Zhongshan. -SJZ 11:1b.

Wang Jie 王捷; (d.32); Tianshui/Hanyang. In 25, as Wei Ao re-established himself in Tianshui after his return from Chang'an, he appointed Wang Jie as a chief general. Later Wang Jie and Wang Yuan advised Wei Ao against too firm a commitment to Emperor Guangwu.

In 32 the imperial general Wu Han laid siege to Wei Ao at Xi city, in the south of Longxi, and the defenders were in desperate straits. Wang Jie climbed a wall of the fortifications and shouted to the Han troops, "King Wei's men will hold to the death, and would rather die than betray him. You should end your attack at once. I kill myself as a sign of fidelity." He then cut his own throat. -HHS 13/3:522-30.

Wang Jie 王戒 [Wenbao 文寶]; Hanzhong. A staff officer to the Administrator Wang Sheng in 148, Wang Jie was associated with a stele celebrating the Baoye Road through the Qin Ling ranges, and honouring his master's fellow-countryman Yang Huan, who had urged its repair. -LS 4:5a.

Wang Jin 王金; Guiyang. Leader of bandits on the borders of Nanhai about 220, he was later defeated and captured by Lü Dai the Inspector of Jiao province and sent to Sun Quan. -SGZ Wu 15:1384.

Wang Jing 王景 [Zhongtong 仲通]; Lelang. Son of Wang Hong, Wang Jing studied the Book of Changes when he was young, and he also acquired knowledge of other classics, became skilled in astronomy, in divination by numbers, and in practical engineering. During the 60s he was appointed to the offices of the Excellency Fu Gong, and on account of his ability in water control he was ordered by Emperor Ming to assist Wang Wu in repairing the Junyi Trench in Chenliu, part of the Vast Canal complex. Wang Wu used Wang Jing's plans, notably the technique of holding back water behind sluice gates 水門, then releasing it to scour out the channel 塢流法: Needham 71:229. The danger of flooding in that region was ended.

In 69 the court resolved to carry out repairs at Rongyang in Henan, the centre of the Vast Canal system, where the Yellow River joined the Bian River and other waterways to the east and south. Wang Jing was called in and presented most thorough plans, and in the summer Wang Wu was given charge of the project, with a labour force of several hundred thousand men. One year later Emperor Ming came in person to inspect the completed works at Rongyang and issued a commemorative edict.

As Bielenstein has observed, the work at Rongyang restricted the flow of water from the Yellow River into the southern canals and restored the main stream to its former eastern course, entering the sea at the north of the Shandong peninsula. From the time the dyke system broke down at the end of Former Han, sixty years earlier, much of the flow of the Yellow River had gone southwards, along the canals to the Huai and to the sea south of Shandong. The floods which resulted had been massive and erratic, but the energies of the imperial government had been concentrated on the struggle for unification and war on the northern frontier, and it was not until the 60s that resources were found to tackle the problem.

The immediate work at Rongyang was essential, so that, as the edict says, "the Yellow River and the Bian have been separated and flow once more in their old beds," but the commission had required the course of the Yellow River to be controlled as far as the sea. The full project thus extended over five hundred kilometres, with sluice gates to control the flow every ten li, and may well have taken more than twelve months. Though we are told that Wang Jing worked very economically, the cost was still enormous, but when the work was done the danger of flooding on the North China plain was largely ended. Wang Wu and his senior assistants were awarded one grade of noble rank – not such a generous grant as one might have expected, considering the scale and value of the work – while Wang Jing became well known.

After some intermediate posts, Wang Jing became an Imperial Clerk, and he accompanied an imperial tour eastwards to Dongping in 73. Admiring how the construction had been carried out and was continuing to be effective, Emperor Ming named Wang Jing as Internuncio for Control of the Yellow River and awarded him a carriage and horses, silk and cash. It appears that he remained in charge of the work for another nine years, possibly as successor to Wang Wu.

In 82 Wang Jing was appointed Inspector of Xu province. Many years before, the literary Du Du had written Lundu fu 論都賦 "Rhapsody on the Capitals," urging that the court should return to Chang'an. Wang Jing now composed Jinren lun 金人論 "Discussion by the Metal Men," which replied to Du Du's work with eloquent praise for the qualities of Luoyang [the Metal Men were presumably the Bronze Men 銅人, statues which had been cast by the First Emperor of Qin and set up at Chang'an: e.g. Knechtges 82:120, deC 96:54]. The debate appears as a fore-runner of the great paired works by Ban Gu and Zhang Heng.

In 83 Wang Jing was appointed Administrator of Lujiang, where he reconstructed the irrigation system about the Shaobei lake. He established firm and clear regulations, while it is said that he also taught the native people the art of ploughing with oxen, encouraged the production of silk, and had instructions posted in every village. The region became vastly more productive and it was no doubt on account of this civilising and colonising work that Fan Ye classified Wang Jing as a Benevolent Official 循吏.

Wang Jing died in office, presumably in the second half of the 80s. Besides his practical work, he had also maintained his early interest in prognostications: his Dayan xuanji 大衍玄基 sought to reconcile some inconsistencies in this field. -HHS 76/66:2464-66*; Bn 54:147-150, Needham 71:229, 270, 281, 346, Demiéville 86:681.

Wang Jing 王敬 (d.152). In 151 the Chinese Chief Clerk for the Western Regions Zhao Ping died at Yutian [Khotan], and King Chengguo of neighbouring Jumi claimed King Jian of Yutian had poisoned him.

As he went to replace Zhao Ping, Wang Jing was briefed on this story, and it was repeated by King Chengguo. Eager to establish his authority, as soon as Wang Jing reached Yutian he invited Jian to a feast, then attempted to arrest him for investigation. Before this could be done, however, Chengguo's senior secretary Qinmu, who was present at the gathering, came forward and killed the king.

As the local leader Shubo gathered troops to attack, Wang Jing took Jian's head to the top of a tower and proclaimed that the killing had been by order of the emperor. This did not improve the situation: Shubo and his men set fire to the yamen, numbers of Chinese officers died and Wang Jing was killed. His head was displayed in the market-place. -HHS 88/78:2916.

Wang Jing 王景 (d.192); Taiyuan. Second son of Wang Yun, after Chang'an was stormed by Li Jue and other officers of the assassinated Dong Zhuo, Wang Jing was executed with his father. -HHS 66/56:2177. The Zhonghua edition and the Harvard-Yenching index interpret Wang Jing and Wang Ding qq.v. as brothers, but the Kyoto index combines the names to describe one person, Wang Jingding.

Wang Jing 王景; Jingzhao. XTS 72B:2651 says that Wang Jing was a grandson of Wang Fang, but not by his chief lineage through his son Wang Fang.

Wang Jingding 王景定; Taiyuan: see Wang Jing 王景 and Wang Ding 王定.

Wang [Jiran] 王季然; Xihe. Sponsored by Guo Tai, Wang Jiran became well known and respected, and was later Administrator of Beidi. -HHS 68/58:2231.

Wang [Jiuzhen] 王九真; Jiuzhen? During the last years of Han, Wang [of?] Jiuzhen was known as an expert player of "surrounding chess" 圍碁 [Japanese Go]. -SGZ 1:54.

Wang Jun 王俊. When Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, was faced with the Bronze Horse bandits on the north China plain in 24, Wang Jun recommended he send a screen of light horsemen ahead of the enemy, to have the people hide away their goods and defend themselves. Liu Xiu had Wang Jun carry out his plan, the scorched earth policy was completely successful, and the enemy were compelled to scatter and were defeated in detail.

Liu Xiu gave high praise to Wang Jun, but there is no further mention of him in the histories. -XHS 5: 18a.

Wang Jun 王均; Jingzhao. XTS 72B:2651 says that Wang Jun was a son of Wang Jing.

Wang Jun 王儁 [Ziwen 子文]; Runan. Born about 140, Wang Jun was a friend of Fan Pan and Cen Zhi, and a close confidant of the younger Cao Cao. He consistently refused invitations to office, but during the 190s he took refuge in the isolated commandery of Wuling and became the leader of some hundred families. He refused invitations from Liu Biao and also from the imperial court controlled by Cao Cao, but he advised Liu Biao against his alliance with Yuan Shao.

Wang Jun died in the early 200s, at the age of sixty-four. Cao Cao mourned him, and after he took Jing province in 208 he moved his tomb and honoured him as one of the worthy men of the time. -SGZ 1:31.

Wang Jun 王恂 see Wang Chun 王恂.

Wang [Jungong] 王君公 see Wang Zun 王遵 I.

Wang Kai 王凱; Shanyang. An elder cousin of Wang Can, Wang Kai went with him to Jing province in 193. The warlord Governor Liu Biao intended to give his daughter in marriage to Wang Can, but disapproved of his poor appearance and conduct, so he married the girl to Wang Kai. -SGZ 28:796.

Wang Kai 王楷. A staff officer under Cao Cao in 194, Wang Kai joined the conspiracy of Zhang Miao and Chen Gong which invited Lü Bu to seize Yan province, and he then served Lü Bu.

In 198, as Lü Bu was besieged by Cao Cao in Xiapi, Wang Kai was sent to seek aid from Yuan Shu. -SGZ 7:221-27.

Wang Kang 王康 (d.69). Director of Retainers under Emperor Ming, he was sent to prison for some fault and died there. -HHS 2:115. This may be the same man as immediately below.

Wang Kang 王康; Jingzhao. XTS 72B:2651 says that Wang Kang was the son of Wang Fang and a grandson of Wang Zun III. He presumably inherited the family fief. It is possible this is the same man as in the entry above.

Wang Kang 王康; Nanyang. A eunuch, Wang Kang became a member of the staff of the Heir Liu Bao, future Emperor Shun. When Liu Bao was deposed by his father in 124, Wang Kang felt it was wrong.

In the latter part of 125, as Liu Yi the Little Emperor became seriously ill, Wang Kang was now a junior officer of the harem, and he joined Sun Cheng in planning to restore Liu Bao to the succession. On 16 December, a few days after the death of the boy ruler, as the conspirators made their move, Sun Cheng and Wang Kang attacked their rivals Jiang Jing, Li Run and other senior eunuchs. They killed all except Li Run, whom they forced at knife-point to assist them place Liu Bao upon the throne and take command of the Imperial Secretariat. When the coup was successful Wang Kang was rewarded with a county marquise in Nan commandery.

After Sun Cheng forced the disgrace of the emperor's favourite Zhang Fang in 127, he and Wang Kang and their colleagues were all sent out to their fiefs, but in 128 the emperor remembered their good work and allowed them to return to the capital. Wang Kang died a few years later. -HHS 78/68:2516-18.

Wang Kang 王康; Guanghan. Eldest son of Wang Tang and his second wife the Lady Wen Ji, Wang Kang evidently held office. -HYGZ 10C:177.

Wang Kao 王考 [Wenzu 文祖]; Dongping. Inspector of Ji province during the late 160s, Wang Kao was numbered in the lists of popular heroes proclaimed by the reformists and students of the University. -HHS 67/57:2187 & 2190.

Wang Kuang 王况; Wei. A soothsayer, in 21 Wang Kuang prophesied to the administrator Li Yan 李焉 that the Han dynasty would be restored and the Li family should assist it. Wang Mang found out, and Li Yan was killed. -Dubs 55:408-409, Bn 59:235, QHX:533.

Wang Kuang 王匡 (d.25); Jiangxia. There was serious famine in the region of the middle Yangzi in 20, and many people in Xinshi district left their settlements to seek food in the marshlands. This misfortune was very likely a consequence of the disruption from immigrant refugees entering the lands of the middle Yangzi after disastrous flooding of the Yellow River over more than ten years. See sub Fan Chong and Bn 54:152.

Wang Kuang and Wang Feng, commoners who were known for honest dealing and fair judgement, became leaders of these rootless people, and by 21 they commanded some seven or eight thousand men. Defeating a major provincial army, they obtained baggage and equipment, then stormed a series of county cities, abducted the women-folk and retired into the wilderness. As the insurgents increased in number, the local authorities were quite unable to cope with them.

In 22, however, disease broke out. The bandits split up and various groups went north into Nanyang under separate leaders. Wang Kuang and Wang Feng were now associated with Ma Wu, evidently a member of the gentry, and the lesser commander Zhu Wei; their group was styled the Troops from Xinshi. They attacked a county city in the south of Nanyang, without success, but were then joined by local Troops from Pinglin under Chen Mu and Liao Zhan.

In the autumn of that year, further to the north, Liu Bosheng, elder brother of Liu Xiu the future Emperor Guangwu, led a rebellion against Wang Mang and sent his kinsman Liu Jia to propose an alliance. This was agreed, and Liu Bosheng gained substantial reinforcements. As Bielenstein observes, however, the commoner Troops whose support he obtained would later be responsible for his loss of the leadership of the movement which he had begun.

The combined forces moved against Wan, capital of Nanyang, but they were heavily defeated at Xiao-Chang'an, south of the city, by commandery troops under Wang Mang's officers Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci. Wang Kuang and his colleagues threatened to abandon the losing cause, but Liu Bosheng recruited another bandit group, the Troops from the Lower Yangzi, led by Wang Chang, Cheng Dan and Zhang Ang, and the balance of power against Wang Mang's local forces was restored.

In the winter at the beginning of 23 the rebels again fought the army of Zhen Fu and Liangqiu Ci, and on this occasion they achieved decisive victory and killed both enemy commanders. A few weeks later they defeated another army, commanded by the generals Zhuang You and Chen Mao, then advanced to besiege Wan city. At this time, however, in the spring of 23, the leaders of the Troops arranged a coup to depose Liu Bosheng as leader of the rebellion and to name Liu Xuan as [the Gengshi] Emperor. Wang Kuang was made Supreme Duke Who Settles the State 定國上公, one of the highest titles in the new regime.

After the fall of Wan city, the victory at Kunyang and the death of Liu Bosheng, in the autumn of 23 Wang Kuang was sent in command of the army to attack Luoyang, defended by his namesake Wang Kuang, who was Wang Mang's Grand Master and General. The city fell in the following month, a few days after the destruction of Wang Mang himself at Chang'an.

In 24 the Gengshi Emperor named Wang Kuang as king of a county in Nanyang, though Bielenstein observes that the pattern of enfeoffments at this time reflected a political setback for the former bandit chieftains as against their rivals of the Nanyang gentry. Wang Kuang and his associate Zhang Ang were soon afterwards reported as ravaging the region about Chang'an: embittered by loss of influence at court, they were evidently reverting to their original careers as bandits.

In the first half of 25, as the Red Eyebrows advanced towards the capital, Deng Yu, general of Liu Xiu, entered Hedong and laid siege to its chief city, Anyi. Wang Kuang, Zhang Ang and other chieftains attacked him, but they were heavily defeated and fled back to Chang'an, while Deng Yu took over the whole commandery.

Wang Kuang, Chen Mu and Cheng Dan were then stationed east of the capital to face the Red Eyebrows, but soon afterwards Zhang Ang and other leaders rebelled in Chang'an and the Gengshi Emperor abandoned the city. Suspecting their loyalty, he summoned and executed Chen Mu and Cheng Dan. Wang Kuang fled to his colleagues in Chang'an, but they were attacked by Li Song and Zhao Meng, loyal to the emperor, and after a month of fighting they were driven from the city.

As the Red Eyebrows came to Chang'an in the winter of 25, the chieftains went to join them, and when the Gengshi Emperor surrendered they persuaded the victors to have him killed. At the end of the year, however, falling out with the newcomers, Wang Kuang, Zhang Ang and Hu Yin surrendered to Guangwu's officer Zong Guang. They were taken under escort to the east, but "died while attempting to escape" before the party reached Luoyang. -HHS 11/1: 467-74, 16/6:600-04; Bn 54:106-136, Bn 59:53, 60, 92-102.

Note that there were two other men named Wang Kuang 王匡 about this time:

1. Wang Kuang 王匡, son of Wang Mang by a concubine, was born about 2 BC and was enfeoffed in 21 AD. -Dubs 55:407, QHX:532 & 669 sub the Lady Zengzhi 增秩.

2. Wang Kuang 王匡, son of Wang Shun 王舜, a cousin of Wang Mang, became Grand Master and General 太師將軍 for the Xin dynasty. He attacked the Red Eyebrows in 22 but was defeated and fled. In 23 he led an expedition against rebels in the east, but by the autumn of that year he had been brought back to defend Luoyang. After the destruction of Wang Mang he surrendered and was executed. -Dubs 55:316, 432, 467, Bn 54:128, Bn 59:31-32, QHX:532.

Wang Kuang 王况 [Wenbo 文伯]; Jingzhao. Recognised as one of the best men of the region about Chang'an, learned and of fine morality, Wang Kuang became Administrator of Chenliu. He carried out such excellent government that a plague of locusts which ravaged the region in 72 spared his territory, and it received a good harvest. -XC 7:8a.

XC 7 also says that Wang Kuang was appointed Excellency over the Masses in 87, but this appears wrong, for HHS 3:156 says that in 87 Yuan An was appointed Excellency over the Masses. Fan Ye has in fact no record of Wang Kuang.

Wang Kuang 王匡 [Gongjie 公節] (d.190); Taishan. A close friend of Cai Yong when they were young, Wang Kuang was known for his disdain of material things, but also had a propensity for violence. As a member of the staff of the General-in-Chief He Jin in 189, he was sent to recruit soldiers from Xu province to overawe the eunuchs.

Later that year, as He Jin was killed and Dong Zhuo seized power, Wang Kuang gathered an additional following of clan forces, styled himself Administrator of Henei and joined the eastern alliance. He ruled his territory with greed and cruelty, and when Dong Zhuo sent gentlemen as envoys to the east Wang Kuang killed them, including his own brother-in-law Humu Ban.

In 190 Wang Kuang advanced to the Yellow River to attack Dong Zhuo from the north, but he was taken by surprise and his force was wiped out. He fled back to Taishan and attempted to raise further troops in alliance with Zhang Miao, but kinsmen of his victim Humu Ban raised men to attack him, and with support from Cao Cao they killed him. -SGZ 1:6, 23:658-59, HHS 72/62:2328, 74/64A:2376, XC 5:2b.

Wang Lan 王覽 [Xuantong 玄通] (206-278); Langye. Son of Wang Rong by his second wife, the Lady Zhu, even as a small child he sought to protect his elder half-brother Wang Xiang against her enmity. Later he encouraged Wang Xiang to take office, and himself rose to high rank and enfeoffment under Jin. -JS 33:990-91*; Fang 65:242.

Wang Lang 王郎 or Wang Chang 昌 (d.24); Zhao. HHJ 1:11 says that this man's personal name was Chang and his style Lang; HHS 12/2:491 gives Lang as an alternate personal name. He is usually referred to as Wang Lang and I follow that convention.

Diviner, physiognomist and astrologer, Wang Lang was a friend of Liu Lin, from the royal house of Zhao 趙 under Former Han. About 23 Wang Lang developed a claim that he was in fact Liu Ziyu 劉子與, son by a concubine of Emperor Cheng of Former Han. It had been well established that no sons of that ruler were still alive, and a previous claimant had been executed by Wang Mang, but Wang Lang asserted that he had been substituted for another infant, then taken for refuge west to Shu and south to Danyang, and had come north as a young man.

Based upon this fiction, with the support of Liu Lin and other local magnates, and aided by fear of the Red Eyebrows, in the winter of 23/24 Wang Lang claimed the imperial title at Handan city in Zhao and took up residence in the royal palace of the Former Han kingdom. His regime gained support among the gentry of north-eastern China as far as Liaodong, while his immediate enemy Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu but at that time regional commissioner for the Gengshi Emperor, was isolated in the north.

Making his escape from Ji city in Guanyang, Liu Xiu went south to collect troops in Xindu. A first attack into Zhao was defeated and he was forced to refuge in Julu, but soon afterwards the northern administrators Peng Chong and Geng Kuang sent reinforcements and the Gengshi Emperor's general Xie Gong gave essential support. At the beginning of summer the Han forces besieged Handan, and the city fell three weeks later. Wang Lang was killed as he fled. -HHS 12/2:491-94; Bn 59:64-76, QHX:518 [as Wang Chang].

Wang Lang 王朗 [Jingxing 景興] (d.228); Donghai. Wang Lang's original personal name was Yan 嚴, but he changed it. A scholar of the Book of Changes, he compiled a commentary, Yi zhuan 易傳. Recommended as Knowing the Classics, Wang Lang became a gentleman cadet and then a county magistrate in Pengcheng; while there, he collaborated with the local scholar Zhang Zhao an essay on the ancient use of taboo names 諱. He left office after his patron Yang Ci died, and refused further invitations from the capital.

About 191 Wang Lang became Headquarters Officer to Tao Qian the Inspector of Xu province, and he joined Zhao Yu in urging Tao Qian to pay respects to the emperor in Chang'an. Tao Qian was rewarded with appointment as Governor and a general, and he made Wang Lang Administrator of Kuaiji. There he established a luxurious court and, in a tradition developing at that time, he asked his Officer of Merit Yu Fan about leading men from the region in that past; their conversation was recorded as an early form of local history.

In 196 Sun Ce attacked his territory. Wang Lang attempted to hold the line of the Zhe River, but his army was defeated and he fled by ship along the coast, hoping to reach Jiao province. Sun Ce pursued him to Dongye by present-day Fuzhou, and forced him to surrender, but Wang Lang refused to serve him. When Sun Ce established a rapprochement with Cao Cao in 198 he allowed Wang Lang to go north to the Han court at Xu city.

Despite his unsuccessful military career, Wang Lang was formally appointed to Cao Cao's military staff. In 213 he was among the petitioners who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei, and he then became Administrator of Wei commandery. He later held ministerial positions at the royal court, and was a leader of successful opposition to the proposal of Chen Qun that the old mutilating punishments should replace flogging.

When Cao Pi succeeded Cao Cao in 220, Wang Lang was enfeoffed and appointed an Excellency. No doubt based upon his early experience in the south, he was consulted on several occasions about relations with Sun Quan, each time urging caution and restraint. In another aspect of his interest in criminal policy, Wang Lang presented a memorial arguing the importance of education as a means to reduce the need for severe punishments. He continued as an Excellency under the new empire of Wei.

In 227, when the matter was raised once more by Cao Rui, Wang Lang again opposed the introduction of mutilating punishments, arguing that they were cruel and that they were not accepted among the people; he also criticised the extravagance of the court. He died at the end of the following year, leaving a collection of memorials and several more commentaries on the classics. -SGZ 13:406-14*, Wu 12:1324-25; Mather 76:590-591.

Wang Lei 王累; Guanghan. In 211 the warlord Governor of Yi province Liu Zhang was persuaded by treacherous counsellors that he should invite Liu Bei to assist him deal with the threat from Cao Cao to his north. The Attendant Officer Wang Lie strongly objected to the proposal, and hung himself upside down at the gates of the yamen in protest. Liu Zhang nonetheless continued his mistaken policy. -HHS 75/65:2434; deC 96:430.

Wang Li 王禮, the Lady. Former wet-nurse to Liu Chang, King of Liang, in the early 90s she was an associate of Bian Ji and encouraged the king to seek support and guidance from the spirit world. As a result of these activities, Liu Chang was reported for Impiety.

-HHS 50/40:1676.

Wang Li 王立; Zhongshan. In the time of Emperor Ming, the filial son Wang Li was commemorated with a stele. -SJZ 11:19a.

Wang Li 王歷; Youfufeng. Registrar of his native county, in 185 Wang Li was one of the sponsors of a stele to honour the magistrate Cao Quan. -JSCB 18:3b; Ebrey 80:342-344.

Wang Li 王立. As the imperial court moved to Chang'an in 191, Wang Li was Court Astronomer. Wang Yun, who was in charge of the government for Dong Zhuo, arranged for him to teach the Book of Filial Piety to the young Emperor Xian, and was also named a Palace Attendant.

In 193 Wang Li mistook the timing of an eclipse, but he was excused by the emperor, who took the error as a warning for his own government.

In 196, Wang Li read stars and signs to say that the emperor should go east from Luoyang to join Cao Cao, and foretold the succession of Han by Wei. Cao Cao, however, urged him to speak no more of the latter prophecy. -DGJ 21:4b, HHS 9:373, SGZ 1:13-14.

Wang Lian 王連 [Wenyi 文儀]; Nanyang. Having moved into Yi province, Wang Lian became a magistrate in Guanghan for Liu Zhang. As Liu Bei began to take over in 213, Wang Lian initially refused to submit, but Liu Bei admired his courage, treated him leniently and gave him further county posts. He did well and was given charge of the salt and iron monopolies, which he administered excellently, while he also recommended many good men for office.

About 220 Wang Lian was transferred to be Administrator of Shu, with rank as a general, still in charge of the salt office. He later became a senior assistant to Zhuge Liang, but died about 223. -SGZ Shu 11:1009-10*.

Wang Liang 王良 [Zhongzi 仲子]; Donghai. A keen scholar when he was young, Wang Liang was expert in the Younger Xiahou interpretation of the New Text Classic of History. When teaching at the capital about 1 AD he was called up by Wang Mang. Wang Liang's disciple Guo Xian argued that though Wang Mang was a high minister, as a student he should attend upon his teacher, not the other way round. Wang Liang did go, but he arrived late. [Cf. also sub Guo Xian.]

When Wang Mang took the imperial title, Wang Liang claimed to be ill and refused offers of appointment, but he maintained a school with more than a thousand private students.

In 26 Wang Liang refused an invitation to join the staff of the Grand Marshal Wu Han. He was criticised for this by the Academician Fan Sheng, but in the following year he accepted appointment as a Counsellor Remonstrant. He was respected at court for his ability in debate, his loyal advice and his recommendations for good conduct.

He was sent out to be Administrator of Pei, but as he arrived he said that he had been taken ill on the way and did not proceed to take up office. The local officials went to call upon him, but Wang Liang claimed to be extremely sick and asked to resign. He was brought back as a Palace Counsellor, and in 30 he replaced Xuan Bing as Guardian of Honesty, a censorial post under the Excellency over the Masses.

Wang Liang refused to take any personal advantage from his position. He would not allow his wife or children to live in the official residence, and he wore only cloth and ate off earthenware dishes. On one occasion, when the officer Bao Hui went to call upon his family at their home in Donghai, he found Wang Liang's wife in plain costume, bringing in firewood after work in the fields, and mistook her for a servant. He reported the visit when he returned to the capital, and all who heard of it shared his amazement.

Wang Liang again retired on account of illness. He was called to office once more a year later, but was too ill to accept. On the other hand, when he went to visit a friend the man refused to see him, for he claimed Wang Liang would not make up his mind to take office, and was just toying with ill health. Wang Liang felt deeply ashamed, and from that time on he refused all offers of appointment, even when the emperor made a direct request.

When Guangwu visited Donghai in 44 he sent messengers to enquire after Wang Liang. They were not able to speak with him, but an imperial edict granted exemption from labour services to his descendants. Wang Liang died at home. -HHS 27/17:932-33*; QHX:534 and 566 sub Wang Zhongzi.

Wang Liang 王梁 [Junyan 君嚴] (d.38); Yuyang. A member of local staff in his commandery, Wang Liang became a county magistrate under the local warlord and Administrator Peng Chong. In 24 he was one of the troop sent with He Yan and Wu Han to support Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, against Wang Lang.

With title as a lieutenant-general, Wang Liang took part in campaigns across the north, and after the fall of Wang Lang he was made a secondary marquis. He was then appointed as a magistrate in Henei under the Administrator Kou Xun, who was left to defend the region while Liu Xiu returned to further action in the north. Wang Liang held his position against the Gengshi Emperor's Administrator of Shangdang, Tian Yi, then joined operations against the Gengshi garrison at Luoyang.

Recognising his good work, and following a prophecy from an apocryphal text, when Liu Xiu claimed the imperial title in 25 he named Wang Liang Excellency of Works and enfeoffed him as a county marquis. The position as Excellency meant he was formally a chief of the civil administration, but Wang Liang continued to serve as a military commander.

Early in 26 Wang Liang was sent under the Grand Marshal Wu Han to attack the Tanxiang bandits in Wei commandery. Guangwu had ordered all officers to stay directly under Wu Han's command, but Wang Liang went to raise his own troops in Henei. He was sent a reprimand and told to stay in place, but again disobeyed and led his men east against the enemy. Furious at such disobedience, the emperor sent Zong Guang, an officer of his Secretariat, with authority to execute Wang Liang. Zong Guang, however, could not bear to kill such a loyal, albeit over-enthusiastic, officer, so he had Wang Liang sent to the capital in a cage cart. Wang Liang was pardoned, but was dismissed from his office as Excellency.

Soon afterwards Wang Liang was named General of the Household and acting Bearer of the Mace and sent west to hold the borders of Henei against any move by the Red Eyebrows along the north of the Yellow River. He attacked one group in Hedong and forced them to surrender.

Following the success of Wu Han's campaign in the previous year, in the spring of 27 Wang Liang was sent east with Du Mao against the remnants of the Wuxiao bandits on the North China plain. They conquered camps and settlements in Wei, Qinghe and Dong commanderies, either side of the Yellow River, and Wang Liang pursued a group north into Zhao, defeated them and forced their submission. In the winter of that year he was made General of the Van.

At the beginning of 28, as part of the imperial offensive against Zhang Pu and Liu Yu, Wang Liang advanced into Taishan and joined Du Mao to move south into Pei and Chu and attack Qiao Qiang and Su Mao. With reinforcements under Ma Wu and Wang Ba, they settled the territory, and in the following year Wang Liang joined the forces sent to relieve Tao city in Dongping. After the defeat of the rebel Pang Meng, claimant King of Dongping, Wang Liang was named Administrator of Shanyang. With responsibility for resettling the people disturbed by the recent military activity, he continued to hold his position as general.

A few months later, Wang Liang was recalled to become Intendant of Henan, head of the commandery about the new imperial capital. Though Luoyang lay close to the Yellow River, the Luo River was not navigable by the barges required to bring grain and other supplies to the growing city. Wang Liang undertook to build a transport canal from the Gu River which curved around the city, east for some twenty-five kilometres to join the lower reaches of the Luo. When the work was completed in 31, however, the gradients were wrong and there was insufficient water to carry traffic. Wang Liang asked to resign. Acknowledging his previous good work, but recognising the waste of labour caused by his mistaken project, the emperor ordered his demotion to Administrator of Ji'nan.

In 37, as Wang Liang was still in Ji'nan, his fief was raised in value and transferred to a county in Bohai. He died in the following year. Later, recognising Wang Liang as one of the great assistants of his father Guangwu, Emperor Ming had his portrait painted on the walls of the Cloud Terrace in the Southern Palace at Luoyang. -HHS 22/12:774-75*, SJZ 16:15a; Bn 59: 140, 237, Bn 76:16, 26, Bn 79:66, 85, 195.

Wang Lie 王烈 [Yanfang 彦方 or Yankao 彦考] (141-218 or 142-219); Pingyuan or perhaps Taiyuan [HHS and SGZ disagree on details of Wang Lie's style, dates and place of origin]. A man of learning, and a noted student of Chen Shi, Wang Lie's judgement was respected in his local community and he was renowned for his ability to reform men's character. On one occasion, a man who caught stealing some cattle claimed he would accept any punishment rather than have Wang Lie hear about it. Wang Lie did find out, and gave the man cloth in recognition of his conscience. The former thief later protected the property of others.

Wang Lie refused nomination and invitation to office. About 191 he took refuge in Liaodong, where he also obtained a high reputation among the local non-Chinese people. He likewise refused to serve the warlord Gongsun Du, and even became a merchant in order to disqualify himself. Cao Cao sent him several invitations, but the Liaodong rulers would not allow him to leave, and he died in the northeast. -HHS 81/71: 2696-97*, SGZ 11:355-56*; Ch'ü 72:382, deC 96:87.

Wang Lin 王琳 [Juwei 巨尉]; Runan. When Wang Lin was ten, his parents died, and as their neighbours fled the troubled times at the end of the reign of Wang Mang he and his brothers lived alone. Wang Lin's brother Ji was captured by Red Eyebrows bandits, who were going to eat him, but Wang Lin went and offered himself first, and the bandits were so impressed they let the brothers go.

Wang Lin became known for this. He was invited to join the offices of the Excellencies, but recommended others in his stead. -HHS 39/29:1300*.

Wang Lin 王林. In 96 Wang Lin was Chief Clerk in the Western Regions when King Zhuodi of Further Jushi attacked Nearer Jushi. Wang Lin gathered an army of Chinese commandery troops and non-Chinese auxiliaries, and he defeated Zhuodi and killed him in the following year. -HHS 88/78:2930.

Wang Ling 王靈; Wudu. Local leaders, in 213 Wang Ling and Li Jun joined Jiang Xu and Zhao Ang of Hanyang to attack Ma Chao and drive him from that commandery. -SGZ 25:701.

Wang Ling 王陵/凌/凌 [Yanyun 彦雲] (d.251); Taiyuan. Described as the son of an elder brother of Wang Yun, Wang Ling was probably a son of Wang Hong 王宏 I [Changwen 長文].

When Chang'an was stormed in 192 by Li Jue and other officers of the assassinated Dong Zhuo, Wang Yun and many of his family were killed, but Wang Ling and his brother Chen climbed the city wall and escaped to their home country.

About 206 Wang Ling was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a county magistrate in Dong commandery. Learning of his relationship to Wang Yun, Cao Cao brought him onto his staff. He later became Administrator of Changshan, then returned to the offices at the capital.

Wang Ling served Cao Pi as Inspector in several provinces, was enfeoffed as a marquis and became a general against Wu. When Sima Yi destroyed Cao Shuang in 249, Wang Ling was Excellency of Works. He was promoted to be Grand Commandant., but two years later he attempted a coup against Sima Yi. As the enterprise failed, Wang Ling was obliged to kill himself. -SGZ 28:757-59*.

Wang Liu 王流, the Lady; Guanghan. Daughter of Wang Tang, she married an official. -HYGZ 10C:177.

Wang Long 王隆; Dong. In 7 AD Wang Long's father Wang Weng 王翁 joined the rising of the Administrator Zhai Yi against Wang Mang. After Zhai Yi's force was defeated, Wang Weng continued to resist, but he was eventually captured and burned to death [QHX:554].

During the late 20s Wang Long was Officer of Merit in his commandery. As he accompanied the Commandant on a journey of inspection, their party was attacked by bandits. Wang Long was killed as he shielded his superior with his own body. -HHS 45/35: 1530.

Wang Long 王隆 [Wenshan 文山]; Zuopingyi. In the time of Wang Mang, Wang Long became a cadet gentleman through the ren right of his father, an official whose personal name is not recorded. Avoiding the troubles of the early 20s, Wang Long took service as an administrative officer under the western warlord Dou Rong, but later returned to the east and was a magistrate in Yingchuan under Emperor Guangwu.

Celebrated for his literary style, Wang Long composed a great number of poems, rhapsodies, inscriptions and essays. His Xiaoxue Hanguan pian 小學漢官篇 "Han Offices Explained for Beginning Students," describing the structure of the bureaucracy in rhyming verses, was admired by the scholar-official Hu Guang, who used it as the basis for his own substantial commentary, extending the information to the mid-second century. Sima Biao, compiler of HHS Treatise of Officials, however, regarded the work as superficial. -HHS 80/70A:2609*, 114/24:3555; MBeck 90:84-87, 198, 214-215.

Wang Long 王隆. An officer of the Imperial Secretariat at Chang'an in 195, Wang Long was among the group of senior officers taken hostage by Guo Si in his quarrel with Li Jue. -HHJ 28:334.

Wang Mao 王懋; Taiyuan. In the fifth century AD the minister Wang Yi 王懿 of the Song dynasty claimed to be a descendant of Wang Mao, a younger brother of the Excellency Wang Yun (d.192), who had been an Inspector of You province and a Palace Attendant. -SS 46:1390, XTS 72B:2642.

Wang Men 王門. A military commander under Gongsun Zan about 195, Wang Men changed allegiance to Yuan Shao and invaded Hejian. The magistrate Tian

Yu confronted him and shamed him into withdrawing. -SGZ 26:726.

Wang Meng 王孟; Jingzhao. Wang Meng was chieftain of a strong local clan in Lantian county when, in the autumn of 23, the armies of the Gengshi Emperor of Han defeated the last field force of Wang Mang and sent advance parties under Wang Xian and Han Chen towards Chang'an. Wang Meng and other leaders took title as generals in the name of Han and came to attack the capital. As the main Han army halted at Huayin, these irregular troops ravaged the city and killed Wang Mang.

A few years later the condottiere Yan Cen took control of Lantian, and Wang Meng went west to join the warlord Wei Ao in Tianshui. He commanded a defence position against the attack of the Han army in 32, but is not heard of again. -HHS 13/3:528; Dubs 55:461, Bn 54:130.

Wang Meng 王蒙; Kuaiji. Son of the merchant Wang Fan and elder brother of Wang Song, Wang Meng was the uncle of Wang Chong. The family were local bullies, and twice had to move in order to escape enemies. -Lun heng 30; Forke 07:64, Ebrey 86:633.

Wang Meng 王蒙. An Internuncio, in 75 Wang Meng was appointed to assist Qin Peng on the expedition to rescue the Chinese garrisons in Turfan under siege from the Northern Xiongnu. He is described as subordinate to Qin Peng, but appears to have played a leading role in strategic decisions.

At the beginning of 76 an army of seven thousand men, made up of commandery levies and auxiliaries from Shanshan, advanced along the Northern Road, joined up with the remnant troop in Nearer Jushi and attacked the capital of that state. Killing four thousand of the enemy and taking three thousand prisoners, they captured almost forty thousand head of camels, horses, cattle and sheep. The Xiongnu fled back to the north, and Nearer Jushi returned to its allegiance.

The Chinese commander in Nearer Jushi, Guan Chong, had died earlier, and Wang Meng and his fellows now wanted to return to China. Fan Qiang, however, an officer of the garrison in Further Jushi who had been sent to get winter clothing from Dunhuang, sought leave to bring aid to his commander Geng Gong. Wang Meng was reluctant to commit the main army, but he allowed Fan Qiang to take two thousand men through the mountains. The remnant of Geng Gong's force was rescued and brought back to China.

-HHS 19/9:722.

Wang Meng 王萌 (d.179); Chenliu. Adopted son of the eunuch Wang Fu, Wang Meng became Director of Retainers and then Steward at the Yongle Palace, the apartments of the Dowager Dong, mother of Emperor Ling. In 179 Wang Fu and his associates were arrested by the new Director Yang Qiu, put in prison and tortured. Wang Meng asked Yang Qiu to spare his aged father, but Yang Qiu refused. Wang Meng swore at him, and Yang Qiu filled his mouth with earth. All the prisoners were then beaten to death. -HHS 77/67:2499-2500, 78/68:2526; deC 89:155-156.

Wang Mi 王密. About 112 Wang Mi was nominated Abundant Talent by the Inspector of Jing province, Yang Zhen, and he became a county magistrate in Shanyang. Soon afterwards Yang Zhen was sent to be Administrator of Donglai, and on his way he passed by Wang Mi's new post. Wang Mi brought a present of gold, and when Yang Zhen demurred that it looked like a bribe, he argued that no-one would know about it. Yang Zhen replied that the two of them would know, and also Heaven and the spirits. Wang Mi left in shame. -HHS 54/44:1760.

Wang Min 王敏 [Shugong 叔公] (d.74); Xihe. In 73 Wang Min was promoted from Minister of Finance to Excellency over the Masses. He died in office in the following year. -HHS 2:120-21.

Wang Min 王旻. In 166 Wang Min was Administrator of Shang commandery, but left office and returned home because of mourning in his family. Wang Min's friend Huangfu Gui, who was at that time General on the Liao, was anxious to quit his post. He made a point of accompanying Wang Min across the provincial border, then arranged that the breach of procedure was reported to Hu Fang the Inspector of Bing province. Hu Fang, however, took no action. -HHS 65/55:2137.

Wang Min 王旻 (d.177). In 177 Wang Min was Coachman at the Palace of Perpetual Peace, in the detached garden of that name at the north-eastern corner of the city of Luoyang [Bn 76:46-47]. That year he was sent to prison and died; his crime is not recorded. -HHS 8:340.

Wang Min 王敏. In 186 Wang Min was Inspector of Jing province. He brought troops to assist the Administrator of Nanyang, Yang Xu, against the rebel Zhao Ce. The campaign was successful, and Wang Min was rewarded with a county marquisate in Bohai -HHS 8:353, 31/21:1110, SJZ 12:5b.

Wang Mo 王摩. In 200 Wang Mo was an officer of Yuan Shao commanding a detached camp on the Yellow River in the campaign against Cao Cao. The camp was destroyed in a raid led by Yu Jin and Yue Jin, and Wang Mo surrendered. -SGZ 17:523.

Wang Mo 王模; Le'an. As Cao Cao gave appointments to Wang Mo and Zhou Kui about 200, his officer Chen Qun foretold they would not do well. They were later executed for crimes. -SGZ 22:633.

Wang Mou 王謀 [Yuantai 元泰]; Shu Dependent State. Having been Administrator of Ba commandery, Wang Mou became Headquarters Officer to the warlord Governor Liu Zhang.

As Liu Bei took over the province in 214 he appointed Wang Mou his Attendant Officer, and when he proclaimed himself King of Hanzhong in 219 he named him Minister Steward. In 220, after Emperor Xian abdicated in favour of Cao Pi of Wei, Wang Mou was a signatory to the memorial urging Liu Bei to take the imperial title. -SGZ Shu 15:1082.

Wang Mu 王牧. Administrator of Wei commandery about 115, Wang Mu recommended the local gentleman Yin Fang as a suitable person to be an Excellency. Nothing came of the proposal. -HYZ 10C:178.

Wang Nan 王男, the Lady (d.124). A wet-nurse to Liu Bao, son of Emperor An and future Emperor Shun, she was a close and trusted favourite of the child Heir. [Note that there was another wet-nurse, the Lady Song E.]

In 124 Liu Bao became the centre of a struggle for influence, in which Wang Nan and the kitchen officer Bing Ji were opposed by the eunuchs Jiang Jing and Fan Feng and the Lady Wang Sheng, who had been wet-nurse to Emperor An. Upset and confused by the intrigues, Liu Bao took refuge at the mansion which had lately been built for Wang Sheng. Bing Ji and Wang Nan sought to regain control by arguing that the place was affected by spirits disturbed in the recent construction, but their protests were ignored and they lost much of their influence. Wang Sheng and her allies then accused them of conspiracy: Bing Ji and Wang Nan were killed and their families and associates were exiled to the far south.

Liu Bao mourned Wang Nan and Bing Ji, and the successful clique were concerned that he might later seek to avenge their deaths. A few months later, therefore, they told Emperor An that Liu Bao had also taken part in the alleged conspiracy, persuaded him to dismiss Liu Bao as Heir.

After Liu Bao was brought to the throne in the coup led by the eunuch Sun Cheng in 125, the Lady Wang's relatives and associates were permitted to return to the capital and were generously rewarded. -HHS 15/5:592-93.

Wang Pan 王磐 [Zishi 子石] (d.46). Son of Wang Ren 仁, a cousin of Wang Mang, after the fall of Wang Mang he gathered such property as he could and went to his father's former fief in Jiujiang. He held considerable influence in the region south of the Huai, and was linked by marriage to the great Ma family.

Wang Pan later travelled to Luoyang, where he became a friend of the leading officials Zhu Fu and Yin Xing, the latter being brother to the empress, and of Liu Zhang the King of Qi, nephew of Emperor Guangwu. Ma Yuan observed that this was unwise and dangerous: a survivor of the former imperial house, now destroyed and discredited, should keep himself at a distance and should not take a role in the society of the capital.

In the autumn of 46 Wang Pan, the gentleman Ding Hong and the Director of Retainers Su Ye were accused of inappropriate association; all three died in prison. -HHS 24/14:850-51.

Wang Peng 王彭 [Zhongguo 仲國]; Guanghan. Son of Wang Shang, Wang Peng was Administrator of Ba commandery about 220. -HYZ 11:188.

Wang Ping 王平 (d.71); Yuyang. Wang Ping was a son of Wang Yu. He and Yan Zhong were friends of Liu Ying, King of Chu, but in 70 they were denounced by Yan Guang for casting omens and planning rebellion. Arrested and interrogated, they implicated others. Wang Ping died in prison, and pursuit of the alleged conspiracy claimed thousands of lives throughout the empire over the next several years. -HHS 22/12:776, 42/32:1428; Bn 67:33.

Wang Ping 王憑; Kuaiji. Wang Ping, an innocent man, was found guilty of some crime and the commandery Administrator had the county execute him. Wang Ping's family complained to the emperor, and the provincial authorities were told to investigate. Though the Administrator had given the order, his Officer for Legal Matters 決曹 Meng Ying took the blame and killed himself. -SGZJJ Wu 12:15b.

Wang Ping 王平 [Zijun 子均]; Ba. Brought up by kinsmen of his mother, Wang Ping took their family name of He 何, but later reverted to his original surname.

In 215 the non-Chinese chieftains Duhu and Fuhu turned to Cao Cao, but were defeated by Zhang Fei and driven away. Wang Ping went with them, and was given a colonel's command by Cao Cao. He was with the army in Hanzhong in 219, and was captured when Xiahou Yuan was defeated at Dingjun Mountain. Liu Bei gave him position at his military headquarters with rank as a major-general, and Wang Ping became one of the leading military commanders of Shu-Han. -SGZ Shu 13:1049-51*.

Wang Pu 王輔 see Wang Fu 王輔 [eunuch].

Wang Pu 王誦 or Wang Bu. A Consultant at the Han court under Cao Cao's control, in 197 Wang Pu was sent on embassy to Sun Ce to award him insignia as a marquis, as Administrator of Kuaiji and as a Commandant of Cavalry. Sun Ce, however, insisted on receiving title as a general, which gave him greater freedom of action, and Wang Pu was obliged to grant him his wish. -SGZ Wu 1:1107.

Wang Pu 王普; Guanghan. Registrar to Xiahou Zuan, who was Administrator of Guanghan in the service of Liu Bei, in 214 Wang Pu accompanied him to a meeting with the scholar recluse Qin Mi. -SGZ Shu 8:975.

Wang Qi 王祈; Ba. As a local officer in 154, Wang Qi joined his colleagues in urging the Administrator Dan Wang to send in a report describing the difficulty of maintaining control over the great area of the commandery, and recommending that the territory be divided into smaller commanderies. The court did not agree.

Wang Qi 王頎 (d.192). After the assassination of Dong Zhuo in 192, Wang Qi was appointed a colonel in the Northern Army under the government of Wang Yun. He was killed soon afterwards, as troops led by Li Jue and other former officers of Dong Zhuo stormed Chang'an. -HHS 9:373, SGZ 6:182.

Wang Qian 王遷 miswritten for Wang Zun 王遵 I.

Wang Qian 王謙; Shanyang. Son of Wang Chang, about 189 he was Chief Clerk to the General-in-Chief He Jin. Because Wang Qian's father and grandfather had been Excellencies, He Jin sought to marry his daughter to one of Wang Qian's two sons. Wang Qian, however, refused the alliance. He retired on grounds of ill health and died at home. -HHS 56/46:1826, SGZ 21:597.

Wang Qiao 王喬; Hedong. During the reign of Emperor Ming Wang Qiao was magistrate of Ye/She 葉 county in Nanyang. A man of powers, he travelled regularly to the imperial capital, borne invisibly by shoes disguised as flying ducks, and his appearances at court were heralded by the beating of a mighty drum, untouched by human hands. A book of prognostication by the appearance of birds Niaoqing zhan 鳥情占, ascribed to Wang Qiao, is listed in Sui shu 34:1030.

Later a jade coffin descended from the skies, and Wang Qiao put on grave-clothes and laid himself inside it. The coffin promptly buried itself and a funeral mound was formed with the magical aid of local oxen. The people built a shrine to the Ye/She Lord 葉君, prayers were granted there, and magistrates and clerks paid respects. Many believed Wang Qiao to have been a reincarnation of the legendary immortal Prince Qiao 王子喬. -HHS 82/72A:2712*, FSTY 2:11-12; Ngo 76: 86-87, DeWoskin 83:52-53.

Wang Qiao 王欽. In the late 170s the palace eunuch Wang Fu had his client Wang Qiao set up a private toll-post on the borders of Jingzhao commandery. When the Intendant Yang Biao reported this, the Director of Retainers Yang Qiu took the occasion to destroy Wang Fu and his party. -HQ 2:1a, HHS 54/44:1766.

Wang Qin 王欽. Administrator of Shangdu 賞都 commandery [part of Han dynasty Runan] under Wang Mang, in 23 Wang Qin went to join Guo Qin and two other generals of the defeated Nine Tiger army in their defence of the Capital Granary. After Wang Mang was killed at Chang'an, Wang Qin and his colleagues surrendered; the Gengshi Emperor rewarded them with enfeoffment. -Dubs 55:467; QHX:547.

Wang Qin 王欽; Donglai. A local officer about 200, Wang Qin was sent by the Administrator He Kui to put down the bandit Wang Ying. -SGZ 12:379.

Wang Qing 王青 [Gongran 公然]; Dong. Son of Wang Long, in the late 20s Wang Qing became a junior officer of the commandery. As he went with his father on tour with the commandery Commandant, their party was attacked by bandits. Wang Long was killed defending his master, and Wang Qing was badly wounded in the throat, so that he could speak only with a hoarse shout.

Because of a regulation, that men who bore the wounds of metal weapons upon the body could not be nominated for civil office, Wang Qing was never recommended for the imperial service. When Zhang Pu became Administrator in 76, he learned of the case and was distressed that a family of such long loyalty to the Han should receive no acknowledgement or reward. He took Wang Qing onto his personal staff, and also sent in a petition, urging that an exception be made for him. The matter was referred to the highest officials, and it was agreed that Wang Qing, now aged about 60, could become a clerk in the office of the Excellency of Works. He later held commission as a major in the Northern Army.

830 Wang Qing

Not fully content with this concession, Zhang Pu nominated Wang Qing's son as Filial and Incorrupt, so that he might become a civil official in the imperial bureaucracy. -HHS 45/35:1530; XC 2:11a.

Wang Qing 王卿. Administrator of Jianwei, Wang Qing invited Du Fu to become his Officer of Merit, but was refused. -HYGZ 10B:156.

Wang Qing 王卿 [Jihe 季河]; Jianwei Dependent State. Assistant magistrate of Mianzhu 縣竹 in 176, Wang Qing was involved in the water control program under Shen Ziju the Administrator of Guanghan. -LS 15:8b.

Wang Qiu 王球. Administrator of Taiyuan in the early 170s, Wang Qiu admired the gentleman Lu Fu and wished to give him appointment. His officer Wang Yun objected that Lu Fu had shown no particular quality. Wang Qiu was ready to kill Wang Yun, but Wang Yun was then recruited to the personal staff of the Inspector Deng Sheng, and Lu Fu was sent away. -HHS 66/56:2172.

Wang Qiu 王球. In 175 an edict ordered that the boundary of Ji and You provinces should be formally marked. As Assistant Officer of Ji, Wang Qiu joined his opposite number Zhang Zhao from You province to set up an inscribed stele near Beiping county in Zhongshan. -SJZ 11:24a.

Wang Rao 王饒. General of Wang Lang in charge of the garrison at Julu in 24, Wang Rao resisted the attacks of Liu Xiu, future Emperor Guangwu, but after the fall of Wang Lang he is not heard of again. -HHS 1A:14, 12/2:493; Bn 59:74.

Wang Rao 王饒. Followers of the "Yellow Turban" leader Ma Xiang in 188, Wang Rao and Zhao Bo were sent to attack Luo city, headquarters of Yi Province. They captured the city and killed the Inspector Que Jian. -HYGZ 5:70, 10C:170.

Wang Ren 王任 of Langye was Inspector of Qing province during the second century. He was the father of Wang Rong. -JS 33:987.

Wang Rong 王融 [Juwei 巨偉]; Langye. Son of Wang

Ren, Wang Rong was the father of Wang Xiang q.v. and of Wang Lan. He was invited to office but did not accept. -JS 33:987.

Wang Rou 王柔 [Shuyou 叔優]; Taiyuan. During the 160s Wang Rou and his younger brother Wang Ze went to seek advice from the celebrated judge of character Guo Tai. He told them that they could both achieve high rank, but Wang Rou should look for advancement through service to the state while Wang Ze sought success through scholarship. As they followed his advice, Wang Rou became Emissary to the Xiongnu and Wang Ze Administrator of Dai. -HHS 68/58:2231, SGZ 27:744.

Wang Rui 王叡 [Tongyao 通耀] (d.190); Langye. A man of family [see sub Wang Zun IV], Wang Rui was Inspector of Jing province in the late 180s, joined Sun Jian, Administrator of Changsha, to deal with rebels in the southern commanderies, but treated Sun Jian discourteously.

In 190 Sun Jian came north to join the alliance against Dong Zhuo, and Wang Rui also had troops at his headquarters, Hanshou in Wuling. Cao Yin the Administrator of Wuling, whose capital was close by, had quarrelled with Wang Rui and was afraid of him. He sent forged orders to Sun Jian to execute Wang Rui. As Sun Jian arrived and proclaimed his intentions, Wang Rui killed himself. Sun Jian then took over his army. -SGZ Wu 1:1096-97; deC 90:112-114.

Wang Shang 王賞. With title as a colonel in the Northern Army, in 29 Wang Shang was sent to join Ma Cheng and others in the attack on the pretender Li Xian south of the Huai.

Wang Shang was later enfeoffed, and in 56 he accompanied the army of Ma Wu which defeated the Qiang war-leader Dianyu. -HHS 22/12:778, 100/10:3224.

Wang Shang 王上; Guanghan. Husband of the Lady Yuan Fu, who bore him two sons, Wang Shang died from excess of grief after the death of his parents. His widow killed herself rather than marry again. -HYGZ 10B:154.

Wang Shang 王商 (fl. late 160s); Donglai: see Wang Zhang 王章.

Wang Shang 王商 [Wenbiao 文表] (d.211); Guanghan. Son of Wang Zun VI and the Lady Zhang Shuji, Wang Shang was a distinguished scholar. He compiled a local history Ba-Shu qijiu zhuan 巴蜀耆舊傳 "Venerable Men and Ancient Affairs of Ba and Shu" [see also Zhao Qian and Zheng Qin], and about 195 he became Headquarters Officer to Liu Zhang the warlord Governor of Yi province. Liu Zhang was indecisive and lacked support from local leaders, but Wang Shang urged him to be more forceful, and Liu Zhang showed some improvement.

As the northern chieftain Ma Chao sought an alliance, Wang Shang warned against such fierce and ambitious men, and Liu Zhang kept his distance. Wang Shang's reputation extended to the east, and he corresponded with Liu Biao the Governor of Jing province and with the Confucian Song Zhong.

Recommended by the distinguished immigrant Xu Jing, about 200 Wang Shang was made Administrator of Shu. He encouraged moral conduct, teaching and farming, nominated scholars and gentlemen for official positions, honoured the local hero Qin Jian for his display of filial piety, and set up a stele to commemorate the Former Han worthies Li Hong 李弘 and Zhuang Zun 莊遵 [referred to by the surname Yan 嚴 to avoid taboo and by his style of Junping 君平: QHX:749].

After ten years of popular and successful local government, Wang Shang died in office. -SGZ Shu 8: 967, HYZ 10A:139, 10B:147, 11:188, 12:224; Yao Zhenzong:2369.

In the affair of Dong Tai and the widow Han Jiang, recorded in HYZ 10B:160, Wang Shang is referred to by his style, though it is miswritten Weibiao 為表 instead of Wenbiao 文表: HYZJBTZ:593.

Wang Shen 王諶 [Zisi 子嗣]. Nephew of Tian Xin, who was Intendant of Henan in the early 140s, Wang Shen was a learned man known for his judgement of character. Tired of the way in which leading families used their influence to obtain nominations for kinsmen and clients, Tian Xin asked Wang Shen for an honest recommendation.

On the following day Wang Shen met Chong Gao, who was at that time an officer in the county office of Luoyang. He admired him and recommended him to Tian Xin. Tian Xin laughed at his choosing someone who was already known, rather than a man of hidden virtue, but Wang Shen pressed the point. Tian Xin interviewed Chong Gao and was most impressed, and Chong Gao later rose to the highest ranks.

Wang Shen also recommended the legal scholar Wu Xiong, who likewise became an Excellency. -HHS 56/46:1826.

Wang Sheng 王聖, the Lady; Qinghe. Wet-nurse to Emperor An, she remained one of his favourites, and with the eunuch Li Run she was regularly in his company. They were concerned at the failure of the Dowager Deng to transfer power to the emperor even after he had attained his majority, and they became suspicious when the Dowager called various princes to the capital in 119 and kept Liu Yi the King of Pingyuan in residence. When the Dowager died in 121 and Emperor An obtained full authority, Wang Sheng and Li Run claimed that Deng Fang of the Imperial Secretariat and the Dowager's brothers Deng Kui and others had planned to depose him in favour of Liu Yi. Furious, the emperor destroyed the Deng clan and demoted his putative rival from a king to a district marquis.

Wang Sheng was enfeoffed as Lady of Yewang, a county in Henan, but the grant was opposed by many officials, while earthquakes and floods were presented as omens against her influence at court.

Soon afterwards Wang Sheng became engaged in a struggle for influence over the Heir Liu Bao: with her daughter Yong, the eunuchs Jiang Jing and Fan Feng, and the senior official and relative Geng Bao, she opposed the boy's former wet-nurse Wang Nan and the kitchen officer Bing Ji. In the end, Liu Bao went to the mansion which the emperor had ordered built for Wang Sheng, and though Wang Nan and Bing Ji argued that the place was affected by spirits disturbed in the recent construction work, their protests were ignored. Wang Sheng and her allies then accused them of conspiracy; Wang Nan and Bing Ji were killed and their families and associates were sent to exile in the far south.

Liu Bao mourned Wang Nan and Bing Ji, and the successful clique were concerned that he might later seek to avenge them. At the end of 124, therefore, Wang Sheng and her allies reported to Emperor An that Liu Bao had also taken part in the alleged conspiracy. Though he was strongly supported by regular officials of the court, he was dismissed as Heir.

A few months later, in the summer of 125, Emperor An died and the Dowager Yan and her family took power. They swiftly turned against their rivals, including Wang Sheng, the senior official Geng Bao, and their eunuch associates. Convicted of factionalism and conspiracy, Wang Sheng and her daughter Yong were sent to exile in the north. -HHS 16/6:616, 46/36:

832 Wang Sheng

1558, 15/5:590-91, 10B:437.

Wang Sheng 王升 [Zhiji 稚紀]; Jianwei. Administrator of Hanzhong, in 148 Wang Sheng had repairs carried out on the Baoye Road through the Qin Ling ranges. Having made a tour of inspection, he composed verses and set up a stele in honour of his fellow-countryman the Director of Retainers Yang Huan, who had pressed for the work to be done. -LS 4:4b.

Wang Sheng 王盛 or Wang Cheng. A stele of 173 from the region of Shu commandery tells how Wang Sheng, Zhang Pu and four other Libationers of the Rice Magicians 米巫祭酒 received a mysterious text. These men were evidently members of an early form of the Rice Sect which was later led by Zhang Lu. -LX 3:8a-9a, cited by Qian Daxin in HHSJJ 75/65:2689 jiaobu.

Wang Sheng 王晟; Wu. A local leader and a former Administrator of Hepu, Wang Sheng was among the gentry who opposed Sun Ce in 196. Their troops were defeated and Wang Sheng's associates were killed, but Sun Ce's mother the Lady Wu pleaded for his life. Before she married his father, she said, Wang Sheng had been one of her suitors, but now he was old and his kinfolk were all dead. Sun Ce had pity, and he let Wang Sheng live. -SGZ Wu 1:1105; deC 90:170-171.

Wang Shi 王嵒; Langye. XTS 72B:2601 says that Wang Shi was a son of Wang Zun IV.

Wang Shi 王石; Guanghan. Two years after Wang Shi's father Wang Huan had died as Prefect of Luoyang in 105, an edict of the regent Dowager Deng made Wang Shi a gentleman cadet in honour of his service. -HHS 76/66:2470.

Wang Shi 王始, the Lady; Guanghan. Daughter of Wang Tang and the Lady Wen Ji, she married an official. -HYZ 10C:177.

Wang Shi 王示, the Lady; Guanghan. Daughter of Wang Tang and the Lady Wen Ji, she married an official. -HYZ 10C:177.

Wang Shi 王寔; Taiyuan. XTS 72B:2642 says that Wang Shi was a great-grandson of Wang Yin, and that he became the father of Wang Yun, Wang Wei and Wang Mao.

Wang Shi 王士 [Yiqiang 義彊] (d.225); Guanghan. A cousin of Wang Fu, Wang Shi joined Liu Bei when he came to the west, was nominated Filial and Incorrupt and joined his headquarters. He served as Administrator in Jianwei and Yizhou, but was killed by non-Chinese as he accompanied Zhuge Liang's southern expedition.

-SGZ Shu 15:1088, HYZ 12:227.

Wang Shu 王述/術 (d.26). A distant cousin of Wang Mang, Wang Shu's father Wang Ren 王仁 was forced to commit suicide by the future usurper about 3 AD. Wang Shu inherited his marquisate under Han and was later Administrator of Jiujiang under the Xin; it appears that he was allowed to maintain his fief.

Wang Shu married the sister of Ma Yu 馬余, Inspector of Yang province, and when Ma Yu died in 23 his widow went to stay with him, accompanied by her sons Ma Yan and Ma Dun.

In 24 Wang Shu lost his position after the fall of Wang Mang's regime, but again continued to hold the fief. As the Lady Ma died about this time, Wang Shu took her two sons with him to Pei commandery. He died in 26, and the marquisate was ended. -HS 18:703, DGHJ 12:4b.

Wang [Shuhan] 王叔漢; Runan. Son of Wang Zifang, Wang Shufan was separated from his father for twenty years. Then, when he was a member of the Imperial Secretariat, someone said that Wang Zifang had died in their home commandery. Wang Shuhan had his elder brother Bosan go to attend the funeral and himself sought leave for mourning. This was approved, and he was also given a grant of twenty thousand cash.

It then turned out that the news was false, and that Wang Zifang had in fact returned north from Zangke. Wang Shufan went back to the capital, restored the money, and offered himself for punishment as one who had given false information. Emperor Ling ordered a high-ranking court conference to discuss the matter, and on the advice of the Academician Ren Min it was agreed that no penalty should be inflicted. -FSTY 3f: 105-06.

Ying Shao was active about this time and came from Runan, so he should have had good evidence for the story. Since Emperor Ling was known for his greed and miserliness, however, it is a little surprising that such a generous grant was made in the first place.

Wang Shun 王順; Guanghan. Towards the end of the first century Wang Shun was Administrator of Anding. -HHS 76/66:2468.

Wang Si 王思; Jiyin. Recruited into Cao Cao's offices in the early 200s, Wang Si was admired for his character and had a wide circle of friends, including Liang Xi, Xue Ti and Xi Jia. He served as Inspector of Yu province, and became a member of the Secretariat and a minister under Wei. He was enfeoffed by Cao Pi.

-SGZ 15:470-71.

Wang Song 王誦; Kuaiji. Second son of Wang Fan, Wang Song was the father of Wang Chong. Though the family were local bullies, and twice had to move to escape enemies, Wang Song never beat his son; he taught him to read at the age of six, and sent him to school at the age of eight.

Wang Song died while Wang Chong was still young. -HHS 49/39:1629, Lun heng 30; Forke 07:64-65, Ebrey 86:633.

Wang Song 王松; Yuyang. In 205 Wang Song controlled Zhuo commandery for the Yuan. Liu Fang, however, persuaded him to submit to Cao Cao. -SGZ 14:456-57.

Wang Su 王肅 (d.52). Son of Wang Pan, though his father had been disgraced and died in 46, Wang Su maintained his position as a wealthy nobleman at the capital, regularly visiting the imperial palace and the residences of the kings. As he had for Wang Pan, Ma Yuan remarked that this was most unwise behaviour, and the number of Wang Su's retainers was a particular cause for concern.

After the death of the former Empress Guo in 52, an anonymous letter to the emperor noted Wang Su's position as the son of a criminal who had been executed, and accused him of planning treasonous trouble. Guangwu was angry and ordered various local authorities to arrest Wang Su's followers. Several thousand people were executed. -HHS 24/14:851.

Wang Su 王蘇; Jianwei. In the late second century Wang Su was a client of Dong Tai. When the young widow Han Jiang refused Dong Tai's offer of marriage Wang Su and his colleague Zuo Xi abducted her. They forced her into the union, but the Lady killed herself. The Administrator learnt of the affair, and had Wang Su and Zuo Xi executed to avenge her death. -HYGZ 10B:160.

Wang Su 王肅 [Ziyong 子雍] (195-256); Donghai. Son of Wang Lang, Wang Su was born when his father was Administrator in Kuaiji. At the age of eighteen he went to study with the New Text scholar Song Zhong in Nanyang, whose teachings followed the classical interpretations of Jia Yi 賈誼, Sima Xiangru 司馬相如 and Yang Xiong 楊雄 of Former Han, and opposed the more eclectic approach of Zheng Xuan. Wang Su became a leader of this school, composing many commentaries to the classics and histories, together with official and ritual documents for the court, while he also developed the theories on the Book of Changes which had been put forward by his father Wang Lang.

It is alleged that in his zeal to attack Zheng Xuan and his followers, Wang Su forged an ancient text of the Classic of History and also Kongzi jiyu 孔子家語 "Home Sayings of Confucius." The first accusation is doubtful, the second may be correct; see Texts:385 [Shaughnessy] and Texts:259-260 [Kramers].

Wang Su held scholarly and administrative positions under Wei. His daughter married Sima Zhao 司馬昭 and became the mother of Sima Yan 司馬炎, founding Emperor Wu of Jin 晉武帝. -SGZ 13:414-20; Miao 82:73, Demiéville 86:828.

Wang Tan 王澹; Ba. A local gentleman in the 190s, Wang Tan was recommended by Wang Shang and nominated Abundant Talent by Governor Liu Zhang. He rose to high office in the province. -HYGZ 10B:147, 12:220.

Wang Tan 王潭. A member of the Imperial Secretariat, Wang Tan was admired for his knowledge of the laws. -XC 7:3a.

Wang Tang 王堂 or Wang Chang 常. Administrator of Wuling, Wang Tang held a commission from the late Gengshi Emperor but controlled his own territory. In 29 Guangwu's commander in the south, Cen Peng, wrote urging him to accept the new imperial regime, and sent one of his officers with a formal call to arms. Wang Tang sent tribute to Han and was enfeoffed as a marquis. -HHS 17/7:659; Bn 59:157-158.

Wang Tang 王堂 [Jingbo 敬伯]; Guanghan. Recommended as Abundant Talent by the Minister of the Household, Wang Tang distinguished himself as a county magistrate in Dong commandery. When rebel Qiang killed the Administrator of Ba in 116, the Excellencies recommended Wang Tang to replace him. He defeated the enemy and pacified the region, he recommended several worthy men, and the Inspector Zhang Qiao commended his Exceptional Quality. When he was transferred to become Administrator of Youfufeng the people erected a temple in his honour.

As Emperor An came on tour to the west in 124, the former imperial wet-nurse Wang Sheng and the palace eunuch Jiang Jing both sought to call upon Wang Tang, but despite his officers' urgings and the threat of slander he claimed illness and refused to see them. When the emperor died in the following year Jiang Jing and his associates were killed, and Wang Tang's prescience was widely commended.

In 127 Wang Tang became Court Architect, but was demoted for some fault two years later and became a Consultant. He was later Chancellor of Lu, where he kept the peace so well that there were no legal disputes for several years. Transferred to Runan, he reformed the local administration and named Chen Fan and Ying Si as models for his staff.

As Wang Tang refused to show them any special respect, the General-in-Chief Liang Shang and his associate Yuan Tang, Director of the Imperial Secretariat, became angry. When rebels from Lujiang attacked his territory, Wang Tang led commandery troops to against them. The rebels were defeated and scattered, but as Wang Tang pursued them Liang Shang and Yuan An reported that he had crossed the borders of his territory. Wang Tang was dismissed.

Wang Tang died at home at the age of eighty-six. He left no property behind and had only an earthenware coffin. -HHS 31/21:1105-06, HYGZ 10B:145.

Wang Tang 王堂, second wife of: see the Lady Wen Ji 文極.

Wang Tengzhi 王騰之. A county officer, in 135 Wang Tengzhi was involved in the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang; see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16:15a.

Wang Tian 王恬. In 94 Wang Tian was an officer of the Emissary guarding the Southern Shanyu Shizi, whose predecessor Anguo had just been killed and who was well known for his hostility to the surrendered Northern Xiongnu. Some hundreds of these people promptly attacked Shizi, but Wang Tian brought troops to defeat them. Several tribal groups then appointed their own Shanyu, Fenghou, and fled beyond the frontier. -HHS 89/79:2955.

Wang Tiao 王調 (d.30); Lelang. About 25 Wang Tiao led a rising against the regime of the Gengshi Emperor. He killed the Administrator Liu Xian, took his title and also styled himself a chief general. In 30 Emperor Guangwu sent an army against him under the new Administrator Wang Zun. As he approached, the Thrice Venerable of Lelang, Wang Hong, and the local officer Yang Yi killed Wang Tiao and welcomed the Han troops. -HHS 76/66:2464.

Wang Tiao 王調 [Shuhe 叔和]. Intendant of Henan in the early 90s, Wang Tiao was a client of Dou Xian, brother of the regent Dowager. He was criticised by several officials for failing to keep proper control of the Dou family and their retainers.

Wang Tiao was later dismissed for having bought a bamboo plantation outside Luoyang and then recommending that work on the eastern canal system be halted, presumably to preserve his new property. -HHS 41/31:1416, 43/33:1478-79.

Wang Tiao 王調; Bohai. When Li Gu was arrested at the behest of Liang Ji in 147, his client Wang Tiao put himself into fetters and sent a letter of protest. This was followed by a further demonstration of support, and the regent Dowager Liang released Li Gu; the Dowager's brother Liang Ji, however, had Li Gu arrested again and executed. -HHS 63/53:2087.

Wang Tong 王同; Ji'nan. About 210 Wang Tong was leader of a group of retainers and clients of Liu Jie, a man of local family who was Registrar of the commandery. Wang Tong and his men evaded their corvée duties and frequently acted like bandits, but Liu Jie always protected them.

When the county magistrate Sima Zhi conscripted Wang Tong and his fellows as soldiers, Liu Jie hid them. He then sent an Investigator to find charges against Sima Zhi, but Sima Zhi reported the whole matter to the Administrator, Hao Guang, and presented a catalogue of Liu Jie's offences. Deciding in favour of Sima Zhi, Hao Guang compelled Liu Jie to take Wang Tong's place as a conscript. -SGZ 12:386-87.

Wang Tu 王. As a Protector of the Army, responsible for discipline, in 213 Wang Tu was one of the officers who petitioned Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. -SGZ 1:40.

Wang Tun 王饨 see Wang Chun 王饨.

Wang Wang 王望 [Ciqing 慈卿]; Langye. Probably to avoid the disturbances at the beginning of Later Han, Wang Wang migrated into Kuaiji, but early in the reign of Emperor Ming Zhongli Yi of the Imperial Secretariat nominated him and other gentlemen aged over seventy who had great influence for good in their local communities. They were summoned to court for appointment as Consultants, and Wang Wang then became Inspector of Qing province.

There had been a drought and other natural disasters at this time, and when Wang Wang went on tour he saw the starving people. Filled with pity, he issued government stores of grain and clothing without seeking permission from the court. Emperor Ming and his senior officials intended to punish him for this breach of regulations, but Zhongli Yi argued on his behalf and Wang Wang was pardoned. -HHS

39/29:1297*.

Wang Wang 王望; Qi. A clerk in the commandery offices in the early 60s, Wang Wang proposed an effusive toast to the Administrator at an official function, but his flattery was sharply criticised by his colleague Wu Liang. -HHS 27/17:942.

Wang Wei 王威; Runan. Wang Wei held local office under Administrator Guo, who committed some fault and received a summons. Guo was frightened and wanted to kill himself, but Wang Wei took the document, threw himself into a fire and died. Guo escaped any penalty. -XC 8:8a.

Wang Wei 王衛. An officer under Zhang Huan in 155, Wang Wei was sent to face down the Qiang as they proposed to join up with rebel Xiongnu. -HHS 65/55: 2138.

Wang Wei 王隗; Taiyuan. XTS 72B:2642 says that Wang Wei was a son of Wang Shi and brother of the Excellency Wang Yun, who died in 192.

Wang Wei 王威 of Yi province (fl. 190) see Wang Xian 王咸.

Wang Wei 王威. As Liu Zong the Governor of Jing province was preparing to surrender to Cao Cao in 208, Wang Wei urged him to make a surprise attack. Liu Zong refused. -SGZ 6:214.

Wang Weibiao 王為表 see sub Wang Shang 王商. -HYGZ 10B:160, HYGZJBTZ:593.

Wang Weiqing 王偉卿; Ba. A friend of Wang Si, in the early 200s Wang Weiqing was Prefect of Chang'an. -HYGZ 12:218.

Wang Weng 王翁; Donglai. Wang Weng's nephew Wang Ji lost his father when he was young, and Wang Weng brought him up. The two men were noted for the care with which Wang Weng treated his nephew, and the filial respect Wang Ji showed in return. -SGZ 27:750 [cf. a different man of the same name sub Wang Long].

Wang Wu 王吳. During the 60s Wang Wu was appointed Internuncio for Engineering 將作謁者 to work on repairs to the Vast Canal, which linked the Huai valley with the Yellow River and Luoyang, and which had been broken and liable to flood since the last years of Former Han: Bn 54:147-150. As he was engaged with the Junyi Trench, a section in western Chenliu [cf. sub Yue Jun], Wang Jing was appointed to assist him and the two men established a partnership: it appears that the younger Wang Jing designed the work while Wang Wu organised the labour.

Early in 69 Wang Jing presented detailed plans for repairing the Bian River, the core of the Vast Canal complex, and for the control of flooding along the Yellow River. In the summer Wang Wu was formally commissioned to repair the break in the dykes at the central staging post of Rongyang in Henan, and to control the Yellow River eastwards to the sea at Qiansheng/Dong'an. It is said that a labour force of several hundred thousand men was organised, and twelve months later Emperor Ming visited the site and issued an edict to celebrate the completed work. He was presumably referring only to the closing of the dykes at that critical position; full control of the Yellow River would have taken longer. There is further discussion of the work in the entry for Wang Jing.

Wang Wu and his senior assistants were each awarded an advance of one degree in noble rank for their achievement, but Wang Wu is not heard of again. It is possible that he remained in charge of the Yellow River project until his death or retirement in 73, for that year Wang Jing was given a comparable title by Emperor Ming in 73. -HHS 2:114-16, 76/66:2464; Bn 54:147-150.

Wang Xi 王喜; Henei. A local elder, about 140 Wang Xi supported the placement of a stele at the funerary temple of the Grand Duke Lü Wang 太公呂望, founder of the ancient state of Qi 齊. -SJZ 9:7a.

Wang Xi 王喜 (d.146). Administrator of Guangling in 146, Wang Xi was found guilty of a lack of energy in dealing with rebels. He died in prison. -HHS 6:280.

Wang Xian 王咸; Taiyuan. XTS 72B:2622 says that Wang Ba [q.v.] had a son named Xian.

Wang Xian 王咸 (d.23); Hongnong. Formerly a local clerk in Hongnong commandery, in 23 he joined the forces of Deng Ye and Yu Kuang in their rebellion against Wang Mang. After the defeat of Wang Mang's last field army at Huayin, the allies entered the Wei valley. They halted to attack the Capital Granary, but sent Wang Xian, now a colonel, with a detachment of a few hundred men into Zuopingyi, north of the Wei.

As Wang Xian advanced, many local leaders and gentry came to join him. With troops numbering thousands of men, they took titles as generals in the name of the Han. While the main Han army remained in Huayin, unable to take the Capital Granary and preparing equipment to attack Chang'an, Wang Xian and his irregulars forced their way into the city. On 6 October they killed Wang Mang and his last attendants.

Flushed with pride at his nominal command of a vast army, Wang Xian styled himself a chief general of Han. He kept Wang Mang's seals, wore his robes, rode in his carriages and made use of the dead man's harem. Three days after the fall of Chang'an, however, Li Song, Deng Ye and the other generals of Han arrived with the regular army. Because of his extravagant conduct, and because he had failed to send the imperial seals immediately to the Gengshi Emperor in Nanyang, Wang Xian was executed. -Dubs 55:460-466; Bn 54:129-132.

Distinguish Wang Xian 王咸, an officer under Wang Mang at Chang'an in 23: Dubs 55:449, Bn 54:122, QHX:557 (6).

Wang Xian 王咸. A man of powerful family in Ba commandery in Yi province, Wang Xian was seen by the Governor Liu Yan as a potential rival. About 190 he was arrested on some charge and executed. -SGZ Shu 1:867, HYGZ 5:70 [which describes Wang Xian as Administrator of Ba commandery, so not a man of local family].

Wang [Xiancai] 王顯才. Son of Wang Xing, Wang Xiancai was enfeoffed by Emperor Guangwu in 25 with a marquisate in Zhongshan. -SJZ 11:1b.

Wang Xiang 王象; Bohai. Wang Xiang killed the scholar Hou Man. When Hou Man's fellow-student Kou Qi came to take revenge, Wang Xiang pleaded that he was ill. Kou Qi went away, but waited until Wang Xiang had recovered and then returned to kill him. -HYGZ 10C:175.

Wang Xiang 王象; Dongping. In the middle 150s Wang Xiang was a clerk in the office of the Grand Commandant Huang Qiong. When Huang Qiong complained to his staff that the balance of nature was awry and he felt responsible, Wang Xiang and others sought to encourage him by observing that even the legendary heroes of the past had experienced similar times of ill omen, but they would pass. Wang Xiang's colleague Li Xuan, however, urged their master to a more active role. -HHSJJ 61/51:2222 jiaobu quoting Hou Kang.

Wang Xiang 王象 [Xibo 羲伯] (d.222); Henei. Orphaned and poor, Wang Xiang became a servant, and at the age of seventeen he was flogged for reading books while he was herding sheep. The local leader Yang Jun admired him, purchased him from the family which owned him, arranged a marriage, and set him up with a house. Wang Xiang became known for his literary and scholarly ability.

In 206 Liang Xi, Cao Cao's Inspector of Bing province, recommended Wang Xiang and others, and Wang Xiang and his fellow-countryman Xun Wei became members of the household of Cao Pi, later Heir and successor to Cao Cao. After the deaths of Wang Can, Chen Lin and colleagues in the sad year of 217, Wang Xiang was the most distinguished of the surviving, younger generation.

When Cao Pi came to the throne of Wei in 220, he gave orders for the compilation of Huang lan 皇覽 "Imperial Readings," a comprehensive edition of the classics and their commentaries. Named a Cavalier Attendant, enfeoffed as a marquis, and appointed Custodian of the Private Library, Wang Xiang was the initial convenor for this massive project, assisted by Xun Wei and other leading scholars, including Liu Shao and Huan Fan.

Grateful to his early patron Yang Jun, Wang Xiang always spoke in his favour, and in 222 he joined Sima Yi and Xun Wei to intercede on his behalf when Cao Pi had him arrested. As their pleas proved unsuccessful, Yang Jun killed himself, and Wang Xiang died soon afterwards. -SGZ 23:663-664.

Wang Xiang 王祥 [Xiuzheng 休徵] (180-268); Langye. Wang Xiang was the son of Wang Rong by his first wife. His mother died when he was young and his father's second wife, the Lady Zhu, disliked him intensely. She turned Wang Rong against him, and after his father died, presumably about 210, she wanted to kill him. Wang Xiang was saved on several occasions by the intervention of his young half-brother Wang Lan, son of the Lady Zhu, but for his part he served her with the utmost filial duty. On one occasion, when she asked for fresh fish in the middle of winter, Wang Xiang went to the frozen river, took off his clothes and attempted to break the ice; as he did so, however, it opened itself and two fish jumped out. Such instances of his good will and magical benefits became celebrated.

In the time of troubles at the end of Han Wang Xiang and his family took refuge in Lujiang, and lived in seclusion for thirty years. When the Lady Zhu died he mourned her so deeply that he became ill and frail.

In the early 230s Wang Xiang was invited to office in the province. Urged to accept by Wang Lan, he became known for his excellent government. He rose to high rank under Wei and was enfeoffed by the Jin. -JS 33:987-90; Fang 65:242, Mather 76:586.

Wang Xiaoyuan 王孝淵 (d.128); Shu. Formerly Officer of Merit in his county and a local officer of the commandery, Wang Xiaoyuan was commemorated with a stele at his tomb. -Nagata 94:70.

Wang Xin 王歆; Jingzhao. During the troubled period of the mid-20s, at the time of the fall of the Gengshi Emperor and the invasion of the Red Eyebrows, Wang Xin became warlord in his home county of Xiagui on the lower Wei River. He and other local leaders in the old capital district were recognised as generals by Gongsun Shu, who had taken the imperial title in Shu, but in 27 they were conquered by Emperor Guangwu's general Feng Yi. -HHS 17/7:647. This man is surely a kinsman of Wang Da above.

Wang Xin 王歆; Yingchuan. Son of Wang Du and the Princess Liu Zhong, daughter of Emperor Ming, Wang Xin succeeded to his father's fief in Jiangxia. -HHS 20/10:738.

Wang Xin 王信. Following the dismissal of the general Liu Shang in 98, the Internuncio Wang Xin was given command of troops against the Qiang warlord Mitang. His colleague Geng Tan persuaded and bribed a number of Mitang's followers to submit, and Mitang himself then surrendered.

Wang Xin and Geng Tan disbanded their troops, but when Mitang led another attack two years later, Wang Xin, Geng Tan and the Protector Wu Zhi were all dismissed. -HHS 87/77:2884.

Wang Xin 王信 (d.112); Hanyang. A local leader south of the Wei, in the autumn of 111 Wang Xin joined Du Qi and Du Jigong in a rebellion allied to the Qiang. In the following year they were defeated by the Imperial Clerk Tang Xi. Wang Xin was killed and his head was sent for display at Luoyang. -HHS 5:218-19, 87/77:2888; deC 84:106.

Wang Xing 王興; Hanyang. Wang Xing's father Wang Tan 譚 held a marquisate under Former Han. Though he was a kinsman of Wang Mang, he would not take part in his new regime, for he believed he had been offered too low a position. After his death in 16 AD his son Wang Ren 仁, brother of Wang Xing, succeeded to his fief, but he was later killed by Wang Mang [QHX: 553 & 548].

Wang Xing sired five sons. Evidently concerned at the fate of Wang Ren, they took refuge in the hill country of Zhongshan. It is not known when Wang Xing died, but the sons were all enfeoffed by Emperor Guangwu in 25: see Wang Yuancai, Wang Yicai, Wang Xiancai, Wang Zhongcai and Wang Jicai. -SJZ 11:1a-b.

Wang Xiu 王脩; Kuaiji. Formerly an Assistant Officer of Yang province, in the early 190s Wang Xiu was cited by Yu Fan as an official remembered for his self-sacrifice. -SGZ Wu 12:1325.

Wang Xiu 王脩 [Shuzhi 叔治]; Beihai. Noted when young for his filial piety, generous conduct and scholarship, Wang Xiu was appointed Registrar to Kong Rong in Beihai about 190, and later became a county magistrate in that territory. The powerful Sun 孫 family provided a refuge for bandits, but Wang Xiu brought local militia, and though they were reluctant he urged them to the attack. The Sun were frightened and surrendered, and other families then submitted too. Appointed to another county, Wang Xiu killed the local bully Gongsha Lu and restored some order. Kong Rong was unable to maintain control of the territory as a whole; as he prepared to abandon his post he dismissed Wang Xiu for his own good.

Wang Xiu was then a magistrate under Yuan Shao and later served as Attendant Officer to his son Yuan Tan, though he had small influence in his counsels. When Yuan Tan was defeated by his brother Shang in 203 Wang Xiu brought him relief, but he protested to both brothers about their quarrel.

As Cao Cao attacked Yuan Tan in 205, Wang Xiu again brought help, but was too late. He begged Yuan Tan's body for burial, then received appointment from Cao Cao to take charge of grain supplies at Le'an. He captured Yuan Tan's Administrator of Le'an, Guan Tong, but refused orders to kill him. Impressed by his moral courage, and also by his lack of greed and his concern for scholarship, Cao Cao took Wang Xiu onto his staff. He was later appointed Administrator of Wei commandery, which he ruled with success.

In 213 Wang Xiu became a minister in the ducal state of Wei. When Yan Cai raised a mutiny at the capital about 216 Wang Xiu ignored protocol, which called for ministers to guard their own offices, but led his guards to attack the rebels. He became ill and died soon afterwards, leaving a number of works of literature and scholarship.

After Cao Pi came to the throne in 220, in recognition of his past loyal service a son or grandson of Wang Xiu was granted the right to appointment as a gentleman cadet -SGZ 11:345-48*, 2:58.

Wang Xiu 王休; Nan. As Guan Yu was besieging Xiangyang in 219, the local farmers Wang Xiu and Zhang Jia presented him with a jade seal they had found in the Han River. This was later taken as a sign that Liu Bei should claim the imperial title. -SGZ Shu 2:888.

Wang Xuan 王宣 or Wang Zhong 重. Chieftains of the Red Eyebrows, late in 26 Wang Xuan and Liu Shi held off an attack by Guangwu's general Feng Yi at the junction of the Wei with the Yellow River. After two months' resistance, they were obliged to surrender early in 27. -HHS 17/7:646.

Wang Xuan 王選. A senior member of Cao Cao's personal staff, in 213 Wang Xuan was one of the petitioners who urged Cao Cao to take title as Duke of Wei. -SGZ 1:40.

Wang Xun 王尋. In 76 Wang Xun was Administrator of Yongchang commandery, which had lately been established to supervise great numbers of the Ailao people who had come to submit. The headquarters of the commandery were on the Mekong by present-day Yongping in Yunnan.

In that year King Lei'ao of the Ailao quarrelled with his Chinese supervisor, who was probably attempting to extract greater tribute and obedience from the new subjects of Han. Killing several Chinese officials, Lei'ao drove Wang Xun back to the region of the Dali Lake and destroyed the new counties of the region. -HHS 86/76:2851, 101/11:3232.

This man of Later Han cannot be the same person as Wang Xun the general of Wang Mang, who was defeated by Liu Xiu and the Han forces at Kunyang in 23.

Wang Yan 王演; Kuaiji. Nominated by the Administrator Zhang Ba during the 90s, Wang Yan rose to high office. -HYGZ 10A:133.

Wang Yan 王晏 [Shubo 叔博]; Guanghan. Wang Yan studied at the Imperial University. When their fellow-student Zhang Chang was killed by Lü Tiao, Wang Yan and his colleague Ning Shu avenged him. Emperor Shun admired their conduct and pardoned them. -HYGZ 10C:175.

Wang Yan 王琰; Zuopingyi. Wang Yan was regarded as a man of poor background, for either he or members of his family had held dishonourable occupations or positions 不名為清白. He nonetheless became a county commandant in Jingzhao, and in 206 he captured and killed Gao Gan, who had raised an unsuccessful rebellion against Cao Cao and was attempting to escape into Jing province.

Wang Yan was rewarded with enfeoffment, but it is said that his wife wept when she heard this, for she believed that now he was wealthy and honoured he would take a new concubine in her place.

Wang Yan became Administrator in a number of commanderies and was also Protector of the Qiang.. -SGZ 6:207, 23:661.

Wang Yan 王嚴 see Wang Lang 王郎.

Wang Yanshou 王延壽 [Wenkao 文考 and Zishan 子山]; Nan. Son of Wang Yi, Wang Yanshou was a young man of great literary talent. When he was aged just over twenty he went on a journey with his father to Taishan, and composed the rhapsody Lingguang dian fu 靈光殿賦 "Rhapsody on the Hall of Numinous Brilliance" on the celebrated palace in Lu [Knechtges 87:262-279].

Wang Yanshou also suffered from strange and worrying dreams, and wrote Meng fu 夢賦 "The Dream Rhapsody," in an attempt to control them. As he was crossing the Xiang River on his journey home, he was drowned.

It is said that many years later the great Cai Yong also wanted to compose a rhapsody on the Lingguang Palace, but when he read Wang Yanshou's work he admired it so greatly that he made no attempt to emulate it. -HHS 80/70A:2618, XC 5:11a-b.

Wang Ye 王業 [Changxu 長緒]; Shanyang. Son of Wang Kai and the Lady Liu XIV, daughter of Liu Biao, he inherited the property of his uncle Wang Can, including the great library, after the death of his two cousins, the sons of Wang Can, in 219. Later, Cao Pi granted Wang Ye the succession to Wang Can's fief, and he became Supervisor of Internuncios under Wei. Wang Ye was the father of the precocious philosopher Wang Bi 弼. -SGZ 28:794-96; MBeck 90:46.

Wang Yi 王姬, the Lady: see the Lady Wang Ji 王姬.

Wang Yi 王逸 [Shushi 叔師]; Nan. A man of literary ability, about 115 Wang Yi went to the capital as Reporting Officer of his commandery. He was appointed a collator in the imperial library, and in the time of Emperor Shun he became a Palace Attendant.

Wang Yi compiled a detailed commentary to the Chu ci 楚辭 anthology, which was widely circulated. He also composed twenty pian of rhapsodies and prose works, and 123 Han shi 漢詩 "Poems of Han," while he maintained an erudite correspondence with his close friend Fan Ying. -HHS 80/70A:2618*, XC 5:11a-b.

Wang Yi 王誼 see sub Wang Zun IV.

Wang Yi 王翊 [Yuanfu 元輔]; Jingzhao. A county magistrate in Changshan, Wang Yi was involved in a series of stele arranged by the Chancellor Feng Xun. -LS 3:17b-23b.

Wang Yi 王邑 [Wendu 文都]; Beidi. Formerly a county magistrate in Xihe, in 195 Wang Yi was Administrator of Hedong. Following his escape from Chang'an Emperor Xian came to Anyi, capital of Hedong, at the end of the year. As he received the imperial party with food and clothing, Wang Yi was rewarded with enfeoffment and given title as a general.

In 205 the imperial government, now under the control of Cao Cao at Xu city, recalled Wang Yi and commissioned Du Ji as his replacement. Wang Yi was reluctant to leave Hedong, and his officers Wei Gu and Fan Xian, secret supporters of Gao Gan, officer of the Yuan family, wanted to avoid Cao Cao's new official. They went to the Director of Retainers Zhong Yao, asking that Wang Yi might stay, but Zhong Yao insisted he must hand his insignia to Du Ji.

Taking his seal and ribbon with him, however, Wang Yi went directly to Xu city. Zhong Yao wrote an indignant letter of complaint, but Du Ji eventually established himself in Hedong, and no further action was taken against Wang Yi. -HHS 72/62:2340-41, SGZ 13:394; deC 96:168, 341.

Wang Yi 王異 or Shi Yi 士異, the Lady. Wife of Zhao Ang of Hanyang, in 210 the Lady was lodging at Xi, by present-day Lixian in Gansu, while her husband served as a county magistrate in Wudu. As the city was stormed by the rebel Liang Shuang, the Lady's two sons were killed and she herself faced rape. She wanted to kill herself, but felt obliged to care for her six-year-old daughter Ying. They hid in a privy, and kept out of sight for almost a year.

Then Liang Shuang made peace with the authorities and the Lady was able to rejoin her husband. As she approached his city, however, she took poison, for she had failed to live up to the models of the past, and now her daughter was safe there was no excuse to live. An antidote was forced upon her, and her life was saved.

In 213 the Lady Wang was with her husband at Ji, capital of Hanyang, when Ma Chao attacked. She played an active role in the defence, but after the city fell her reputation as a woman of principle gained her favour with the Lady Yang, wife of Ma Chao; so Zhao Ang too was accepted and trusted.

As Zhao Ang planned a rising against Ma Chao, he was concerned for his son Zhao Yue, whom Ma Chao held hostage. He asked Wang Yi, and she replied that it was the duty of a son to give his life, if the purpose was to maintain his father's honour as a loyal officer. Zhao Yue was indeed killed. -SGZ 25:703-04.

Wang Yi 王異 see Wang Hei 王黑.

Wang [Yicai] 王益才. Son of Wang Xing, Wang Yicai was enfeoffed by Emperor Guangwu in 25 with a marquisate in Zhongshan. -SJZ 11:1b.

Wang Yin 王胤/印. A captain in the Dependent State of Jiuquan, in 31 Wang Yin was killed in a vendetta by Zhu Ying, younger brother of the Administrator of Jiuquan. -HHS 23/13:805.

Wang Yin 王殷; Taiyuan. XTS 72B:2642 says that Wang Yin was a son of Wang Ba, and that he became Administrator of Zhongshan.

Wang Yin 王音 [Shaoxuan 少玄]; Langye. XTS 72B:2601 says that Wang Yin was a son of Wang Zun IV, and that he held a clerical position under a General-in-Chief.

Wang Yin 王蔭; Henan. A local commandery officer, in 135 Wang Yin was involved in the construction of the Stone Bridge over the Gu River at Luoyang; see sub Ma Xian. -SJZ 16:14b.

Wang Ying 王嬰. The close friendship between Wang Ying and his fellow-countryman Fan Juqing became proverbial. -XC 7:4a.

Wang Ying 王應; Donglai. A local bandit about 200, he was put down by officers of the Administrator He Kui. -SGZ 12:379.

Wang Yong 王永 [Borong 伯榮], the Lady (d.125); Qinghe. Daughter of Wang Sheng the wet-nurse of Emperor An, Wang Yong also benefited from the imperial favour. As Emperor An took power after the death of the regent Dowager Deng in 121, she was granted access to the inner palace, and used her position to take bribes. Sent on missions to the tomb of the emperor's mother, the Lady Zuo, in Qinghe, she demanded special honours wherever she passed. Wang Yong also had an affair with the imperial clansman Liu Gui, who later took her as his formal wife, and through this influence Liu Gui obtained the inheritance of a family marquisate and position as a Palace Attendant.

The Grand Commandant Yang Zhen and other officials presented memorials against Wang Yong and her mother, citing omens and portents of criticism, but the emperor showed them the papers, and in 124 Yang Zhen was destroyed by their eunuch allies.

As the Yan clan of the Dowager took power after the death of Emperor An in 125, they turned against their rivals, including the minister Geng Bao and the Lady Wang Sheng. Convicted of factionalism and conspiracy, Wang Yong and her mother were exiled to the northern frontier. -HHS 10B:437, 54/44:1761, 46/36:1562.

Wang Yong 王永. Administrator of Yuzhang in the early 160s, Wang Yong was reported by Chen Xiang, Inspector of Yang province, for his corrupt alliance with the eunuch favourites of Emperor Huan. He was dismissed and sent to prison. -HHS 67/57:2213.

Wang You 王祐 [Pingzhong 平仲]; Guanghan. When Wang You was young he had a high reputation, and some considered him the finest scholar in the empire. He refused all offers of appointment from the province and the commandery.

After Wang You died at the age of forty-two, his younger brother Huo gathered his writings to compile the Wangzi 王子 in five pian. -HYGZ 10B:144.

Wang Yu 王禹; Yuyang. Son of Wang Liang, he inherited his father's marquissate in 38. He died some time before 70 and was succeeded by his eldest son Wang Jianshi.

Wang Yu was a friend of Liu Ying, King of Chu, and the connection was maintained by his younger son Wang Ping. It later brought disaster upon the family. -HHS 22/12:776.

Wang Yu 王郁. As Senior Colonel to the Emissary Duan Chen in 50, Wang Yu accompanied him on his mission to the Southern Xiongnu Bi and later commanded the Chinese troops guarding the Shanyu's court at Meiji in Xihe. -HHS 89/79:2943-45.

Wang Yu 王昱. Administrator of Yingchuan about 160, Wang Yu initially admired the reticence of the retired official Liu Sheng, but was later persuaded by Du Mi that such disengagement from public affairs was in fact a moral failure. -HHS 67/57:2198, FSTY 5:42.

Wang Yu 王寓. About 170 Wang Yu was Director of Retainers. An associate of the eunuchs, he proposed that the powers of his office should cover all officials at the capital, as high as the Excellencies. When the minister Zhang Huan argued against the plan, Wang Yu accused him of factionalism; Zhang Huan was dismissed and proscribed from office. -HHS 65/55:2141.

Wang Yu 王戩. As Attendant Officer to Liu Dai the Inspector of Yan province, about 190 Wang Yu encouraged him to seek the advice from Cheng Yu on whether he should ally himself with Yuan Shao or with Gongsun Zan. -SGZ 14:426.

Wang Yuan 王元 [Youweng 游翁 or Huimeng 惠孟: see also the entry immediately below]; Jingzhao. In 25, as Wei Ao re-established himself in Tianshui after his return from Chang'an, he appointed Wang Yuan a chief general.

Though Wei Ao acceded to the demand of Emperor Guangwu to send his son Wei Xun as a hostage, Wang Yuan and Wang Jie were among those of his officers who believed the emperor's success was not yet certain, and that Wei Ao should not give full submission. In 30, as the imperial envoy Lai Xi pressed for a firm decision, they urged Wei Ao to kill him and attack the region of Chang'an. Lai Xi, however, was allowed to leave, and it is clear Wei Ao was concerned only to maintain his position in the upper Wei valley and had no intention of enlarging his area of control.

As the Han armies prepared to move into Tianshui, Wei Ao sent Wang Yuan to oppose them on the Long Slope. After an initial defeat by the imperial vanguard under Zhai Zun, in the summer Wang Yuan won a major victory and forced the enemy to retreat. Wei Ao then ordered Wang Yuan and Xing Xun to counter-attack towards Chang'an, but they were defeated and driven back by Feng Yi and Zhai Zun.

When Guangwu renewed the campaign in 32, Wang Yuan again guarded the Long Slope. Wei Ao's position disintegrated behind him, however, as the Han forces out-flanked him on the north and many commanders sought terms from the emperor.

Wei Ao was then besieged in Xi city, in the south of Longxi, and Wang Yuan crossed the Qin Ling to seek aid from Gongsun Shu. In the winter he returned with reinforcements and, pretending his troops were far more numerous than they really were, he broke the siege, rescued Wei Ao, and brought him to Ji city. The imperial general Wu Han attempted to renew the attack, but as his supplies became short, his men deserted, and the invaders were forced to withdraw.

When Wei Ao died early in 33, Wang Yuan and Zhou Zong proclaimed his son Wei Chun as king in his place, but in the following year, 34, the Han armies returned in force. Wei Chun and his followers surrendered to the commander Lai Xi, but Wang Yuan escaped to join Gongsun Shu, who appointed him to command of defences in Wudu.

In the summer of 35, as Guangwu's forces moved west up the Yangzi, Lai Xi attacked over the mountains from the north. Wang Yuan and his colleague Huan An sent an assassin to kill him, and the Han made no further advance on that front. Wang Yuan then came south to assist the defences on the Fu River against the advance of the Han, but in the autumn, following the defeat of Yan Cen he surrendered to Zang Gong. -HHS 13/3:522-31, 541-42; Bn 59:175-180, 189-191. See also immediately below.

Wang Yuan 王元 [Huimeng 惠孟]; Youfufeng? HHS 13/3:531 says that Wang Yuan, whose career in the service of Wei Ao and Gongsun Shu has been described above, had sometime been a county magistrate in Runan, and after his surrender and despite his long record of hostility to the Han, he was made Chancellor of Dongping. In 40, however, he was found guilty of sending in false reports on the amount of arable land for taxation, and died in prison [see sub Liu Zhuang, Emperor Ming, and Bn 79:136-139].

After the destruction of Gongsun Shu in 35, some of his former supporters were noted for their ability by Guangwu and received office in his regime: e.g. Li Yu II. One must doubt, however, that a long-term enemy such as Wang Yuan would ever have been given senior appointment. He had, after all, arranged the assassination of the imperial general Lai Xi, while at the time of his surrender Guangwu had destroyed his last enemies and had little to gain from any show of leniency.

Furthermore, while HHS 13/3:531 gives the style of the Chancellor of Dongping as Huimeng 惠孟, HHS 24/14:832-33 has Ma Yuan referring to Wei Ao's military commander by the style Youweng 游翁. Again, the main text of HHS 13/3:522 says that Wei Ao's officer Wang Yuan was a native of Changling 長陵, but commentary quotes DGHJ, which describes him as a man from Duling 杜陵; both counties were in Jingzhao. The second-century local history Sanfu juehu, cited by HHS 13/3:531 TC, says that Wang Huimeng came from Pingling 平陵 in Youfufeng.

The modern commentator Hong Yixuan, in HHSJJ 24/14:880 [dealing with HHS 24/14:832-33], suggests that the same man had two styles. I suspect, however, that Sanfu juehu is confused, and that there were two men of the Wang surname from the region about Chang'an: both had the personal name Yuan, but they had different styles, they came from different counties, and they had different careers, one in the east and one in the west.

Wang Yuan 王元; Jianwei. About 120 Wang Yuan was Attendant Officer to Zhang Qiao the Inspector of Yi province. -HYGZ 12:229.

Wang Yuan 王元. Protector of the Wuhuan, in the summer of 141 Wang Yuan brought five thousand Xianbi horsemen to assist the General on the Liao Ma Xu against the rebel Xiongnu chieftains Wusi and Che'niu in Xihe. Despite some success, Ying Shao observed later that the auxiliaries had proved unruly and added to the troubles of the region. -HHS 48/38: 1609-10, 89/79:2962; deC 84:312.

Wang Yuan 王元. As commandery Registrar, Wang Yuan put forward recommendations without any consideration of personal affection or enmity. -XHS 4:20b; the commentary of Wang Wentai suggests that this passage in fact refers to Wang Yun 王允 of Taiyuan.

Wang Yuan 王苑 [Sunzhong 孫仲]. Wang Yuan lived as a hermit in a rush-made hut, eating only nettles and beans. -XHS 5:19b.

Wang [Yuanbin] 王元賓 see Wang Yuanshang 元賞.

Wang [Yuancai] 王元才. Son of Wang Xing, Wang Jicai was enfeoffed by Emperor Guangwu in 25 with a marquisate in Zhongshan. -SJZ 11:1b.

Wang [Yuankui] 王元愨; Ba. Husband of the Lady Wang Ji, he died when she was young. -HYGZ 1:4.

Wang [Yuanshang] 王元賞 or Yuanbin 元賓 (d.161). Descended from an official family, Wang Yuanshang became a county magistrate in Chenliu. A stele was set up when he died. -LS 22:2a, 24:18a-b [as 元賞], LX 19:2b-3b [as 元賓].

Wang Yue 王越 see Wang Dan 王旦. -Mather 76: 342.

Wang Yun 王憚; Dongping. Recommended by Li Gu in 143, Wang Hun was invited to office, but is not heard of again. -HHS 63/53:2081.

Wang Yun 王允 [Zishi 子師] (137-192); Taiyuan. Wang Yun was a member of a leading family; XTS 72B:2642 says that he was the son of Wang Shi. Ambitious to reform the state on Confucian lines, Wang Yun studied the classics and also practised horsemanship and archery. He was praised by his fellow-countryman Guo Tai.

About 155 Wang Yun was appointed to local office in the commandery. Some ten years later, as the eunuch Zhao Jin was causing trouble and disruption, Wang Yun arrested him, and although there was an amnesty in force he killed him. Zhao Jin's friends at court told Emperor Huan, and in the following year the Administrator Liu Zhi was executed, being the senior officer responsible for Wang Yun's conduct. Wang Yun escorted the funeral to Liu Zhi's home country in Pingyuan and stayed there for three years' mourning.

Returning to the commandery service, Wang Yun quarrelled with the Administrator Wang Jiu about the quality of the officer Lu Fu. Wang Jiu thought of killing him, but Wang Yun was saved by the Inspector Deng Sheng, who appointed him as his Attendant Officer. He then entered the office of the Excellency over the Masses at the capital, was certified First Class and became an Imperial Clerk in the Censorate.

At the outbreak of the Yellow Turban rebellion in 184 Wang Yun was appointed Inspector of Yu province. Urging an end to the long Proscription for involvement in Faction, he recommended Xun Shuang and Kong Rong for office. In the field, he defeated a detachment of rebels, then joined the main armies under Huangfu Song and Lu Zhi. Letters came into his hands revealing that clients of the palace eunuch Zhang Rang had been in contact with the rebels, and Wang Yun reported this to the throne. Zhang Rang persuaded Emperor Ling to take no action, but he was furious with Wang Yun.

Zhang Rang later found cause for an accusation, and Wang Yun was sent to prison. Released under an amnesty, he was promptly arrested on another charge. The Excellency over the Masses Yang Ci urged him to commit suicide in order to avoid torture, and officials of his province came with tears to offer him a draught of poison, but Wang Yun insisted on the virtue of his cause and went by cage-cart to the Ministry of Justice. Everyone admired his courage, and the General-in-Chief He Jin and the highest ministers pleaded for him. His sentence was commuted from death, and as ministers continued to argue his case Wang Yun was eventually released. Fearing further attacks, he fled the capital under a false name.

When Emperor Ling died in 189, Wang Yun returned to Luoyang as an adviser to He Jin, and he was appointed Intendant of Henan. After He Jin was killed, the eunuchs Zhang Rang, Duan Gui and others took the imperial children Liu Bian and Liu Xie and fled Luoyang, but Wang Yun ordered his officer Min Gong to lead a posse in pursuit and the two boys were brought back.

As Dong Zhuo took power after the death of He Jin and the massacre of the eunuchs, he appointed Wang Yun as Minister Coachman, with control of the Imperial Secretariat, and in 190 he named him Excellency over the Masses. In that year Dong Zhuo moved the capital to Chang'an, and Wang Yun arranged the transfer of as much of the libraries and archives as possible. When Emperor Guangwu shifted the capital from Chang'an to Luoyang he had brought the documents in two thousand carts. This time much had already been destroyed and the remainder required only seventy carts; there was heavy rain, moreover, and only half of them arrived. The current archives and classical works were however preserved.

While Dong Zhuo stayed by Luoyang to oppose the rebels from the east, Wang Yun controlled the government at Chang'an. He had Dong Zhuo's full confidence, but his real concern was to support the imperial house. He disapproved of Dong Zhuo's erratic regime, and he plotted with the Director of Retainers Huang Wan and Zheng Tai of the Secretariat to kill Dong Zhuo. Their first idea was to send Yang Zan and Shisun Rui to attack Dong Zhuo from the rear, but the plan was dropped as Dong Zhuo became suspicious.

In 191 Dong Zhuo came to Chang'an, and Wang Yun was obliged to accept enfeoffment for his role in moving the capital. In the following year he and Shisun Rui revived the project of assassination, and this time they secured the aid of Dong Zhuo's trusted guard Lü Bu. Dong Zhuo was killed on 22 June 192, and Wang Yun and Lü Bu shared credit and power.

Once in control of government, Wang Yun was both arrogant in his conduct and confused in his policies. He appalled scholars by ordering the execution of Cai Yong, the distinguished historian who had been given office by Dong Zhuo: Wang Yun accused him of sympathy for the dead usurper and argued that Cai Yong's work would slander his own party. It is said that he soon afterwards regretted the decision and sought to countermand the order, but Cai Yong was already dead.

Still more seriously in practical terms, Wang Yun gave small concern to the former officers of Dong Zhuo who commanded troops outside Chang'an. Evidently discounting their ability to organise and cooperate, he neither pardoned them nor offered acceptable terms. As a result, within a few weeks Li Jue, Guo Si and others had brought their forces against the capital, and on 28 June they stormed the city. Wang Yun was captured and was executed a few days later. -HHS 66/56:2172-77*, ZF:10b-11a.

Wang Ze 王澤 [Jidao 季道]; Taiyuan. During the 160s Wang Ze and his elder brother Wang Rou went to seek advice from the celebrated judge of character Guo Tai. He told them that they could both achieve high rank, but Wang Ze should seek success through scholarship while Wang Rou looked for advancement in service to the state. As they followed his advice, Wang Rou became Emissary to the Xiongnu and Wang Ze was Administrator of Dai. -HHS 68/58:2231, SGZ 27:744.

Wang Ze 王則. Commandant of the Equipage at the court of Emperor Xian controlled by Cao Cao, in 197 Wang Ze was sent as an envoy to grant titles to Lü Bu. -SGZ 7:225.

Wang Zhang 王章. A major under Teng Fu in 145, Wang Zhang led a detachment which defeated rebels and bandits in Lujiang. -HHS 6:279.

Wang Zhang 王璋 [Boyu 伯玉]; Nanyang. A county magistrate, in 156 Wang Zhang was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:16b.

Wang Zhang 王章/璋 or Wang Shang 商 [Boyi 伯義 or 伯儀]; Donglai. In 165 Emperor Huan sent officers to present sacrifices at the tomb temple of the legendary Prince Qiao 王子喬 of the Zhou period, who was considered an associate of the legendary philosopher Laozi 老子. As Chancellor of the state of Liang, Wang Zhang set up a stele to honour the sage, with an inscription composed by Bian Shao.

In the late 160s Wang Zhang became Minister Steward. He was praised by the reformists and students of the University at Luoyang and numbered in their lists of worthy men. -SJZ 23:15b, HHS 67/57:2187 & 2190.

Wang Zhang 王章; Zhao. XHS 1:19a says that the Beauty Wang, concubine of Emperor Ling and mother of Emperor Xian, was a daughter of Wang Zhang. HHS 10B:450 says that she was a granddaughter of Wang Bao, who had been a General of the Household.

Wang Zhang would thus have been Wang Bao's son, but nothing more is known of him.

Wang Zhao 王照; Zuopingyi. Bandits of the northern hills, in 220 Wang Zhao and Zheng Gan were attacked by the Wei general Zhang He. They surrendered. -SGZ 2:59.

Wang Zhen 王真 [Shujing 叔經]; Shangdang. A practitioner of long life at the court of Cao Cao in the early third century, Wang Zhen claimed to be a hundred years old, but had the appearance and behaviour of a strong, healthy man of fifty. He also said that he had travelled the world and climbed the five sacred mountains. He could hold his breath indefinitely, abstain from cereals and nourish himself merely by his own saliva, and he maintained regular sexual contact with women. -HHS 82/72B:2750-51*; Ngo 76:143-145, DeWoskin 83:88.

Wang Zheng 王政. In 35 Wang Zheng was an officer under Gongsun Shu's general and senior minister Ren Man. The Han general Cen Peng attacked Ren Man's army in Nan commandery, broke through the river defences and thoroughly defeated it. Wang Zheng then killed Ren Man, took his head and went to surrender. -HHS 13/3:542; Bn 59:189.

Wang Zheng 王政 [Jipu 季輔] (104-153); Rencheng. Wang Zheng's grandfather had been Administrator of Hanzhong, and Wang Zheng was known for his scholarship of the Classic of History in the Ouyang tradition of the New Text. He became an Assistant Officer of Yan province and served successfully as an acting county magistrate in Shanyang. He was then nominated Filial and Incorrupt and became a gentleman cadet, but before his period of probation was ended, he died at the age of fifty. -LX 1:1a-2b.

LS 27:6b cites the stele to this man, and says that it was found at his tomb in Rencheng.

Wang Zheng 王政. A retainer of the rebel Zhang Chun, in 190 Wang Zheng killed his master and sent the head to Liu Yu, Governor of You province. He was rewarded with enfeoffment. -HHS 73/63:2354, SGZ 8:240.

Wang Zhi 汪直 [Yuanxiao 元孝]; Nanyang. Described as a former local officer at commandery headquarters, in 156 Wang Zhi was one of the sponsors of a memorial stele for the eunuch Zhou Fu. -LS 17:17a.

Wang Zhi 王智; Chenliu? Brother of the eunuch Wang Fu, in 179 Wang Zhi was Administrator of Wuyuan. The scholar-official Cai Yong had been exiled in the north for nine months, but was pardoned and prepared to return. Wang Zhi prepared a banquet to farewell him, but when he offered a toast Cai Yong made no response. Wang Zhi was offended and embarrassed in front of his own followers, and Cai Yong was again under threat, but with the aid of his Yang kinsmen by marriage he took refuge in Wu and Kuaiji commanderies.

Wang Zhi 王穉/稚 [Shuqi 叔起] (d.203); Guanghan. Second son of Wang Tang and the Lady Wen Ji, Wang Zhi was known for his pure and scholarly life. He was repeatedly recommended and invited to office, but never accepted. After his death at the age of eighty-one, his disciples recorded his life and styled him "Illustrious Father" 憲父. -HHS 31/21:1106, HYGZ 10B:147.

Wang Zhi 王芝; Guanghan. Third son of Wang Tang and the Lady Wen Ji, Wang Zhi evidently held office. -HYGZ 10C:177.

Wang Zhong 王重 see Wang Xuan 王宣.

Wang Zhong 王忠. Wen Xu, Protector of the Qiang for Emperor Guangwu, was captured by Wei Ao's officer Gou Yu in 30 and committed suicide. His officers Wang Zhong and Han Zun brought his body back and told the emperor of his heroic death. Guangwu gave rewards of grain and silk, and ordered Wang Zhong to escort Wen Xu's remains to Luoyang.

Wang Zhong later served under the general Zhai Zun, and during the initial attack on Wei Ao in 30 he led a group of pioneers to clear the road forward. -HHS 81/71:2673, DGHJ 9:4b.

Wang Zhong 王忠; Jingzhao. XTS 72B:2651 says that Wang Zhong was a son of Wang Jing.

Wang Zhong 王仲. A man of great wealth, Wang Zhong offered a million cash to the scholar recluse Gongsha Mu. Gongsha Mu rejected the gift, explaining that prosperity and honour were the will of heaven, and he could not seek to establish his position in the world by such accidental fortune. -HHS 82/72B:2730.

Wang Zhong 王忠; Youfufeng. Sometime chief of a village post-station, in the early 190s Wang Zhong fled to Jing province from the turmoil about Chang'an. The local warlord Lou Gui tried to recruit him, but Wang Zhong escaped and led a thousand men to join Cao Cao.

In 199 Wang Zhong and Liu Dao made an unsuccessful attack on Liu Bei in Pei.

